My Heart Burns for You

by alwaysZutarian

Summary

Four years have passed since the end of the war, but as they meet again and encounter many obstacles, Zuko and Katara realize that whom their hearts truly burn for is one another. Can they love each other knowing they will hurt those that love them? What will become of them when a new enemy appears with a vengeful plot to destroy everything they had worked for to bring peace?

Notes

This story is rated MA for violence and sexual references. However, the smutty scenes will occur much later in the story, so have patience! I also want to warn you that this story will be very long and the romance might be slow. If you like those fast paced ones, then I suggest you look elsewhere. This story is also written almost like a romance novel.
Opening sharp, golden eyes, Zuko blinked at the minimal amount of light that entered his expansive room as the early rays of the dawning sun struck his pale skin. He always woke with the sun. That was just the way with firebenders.

Stifling a tired yawn, the young man sat up in his large bed and ran a hand through his short, loose hair as he surveyed his royal bedchamber. The bed was high and massive, almost covering one wall of the room, while large, comfortable cushions were spread on the other side of the impressive accommodations. Gold and red were the prominent colors that decorated the room with a glossy, black marble floor. On one wall hung a large tapestry of the Fire Nation emblem while extraordinary illustrations of Fire Nation scenery and resplendent dragons covered the other three. On the western side of his room was a large balcony, which oversaw the Capital. From there he could see where the sun touched the ocean as it began to set in the horizon. It was a beautiful, breathtaking sight, and he always tried to find time to see it.

His royal suite consisted of two large sections: the first being the bedchamber and the other being the antechamber, which must be passed in order to enter his sleeping quarters—though not many were privileged to do so, seeing as he enjoyed his privacy. In the antechamber was where he usually took all of his meals either alone or with those close to him. The royal chambers were now simpler than when Ozai lived there. As soon as he became Fire Lord, Zuko ordered for all of the gaudy decoration his sire preferred to be torn down and the rooms remodeled.

Zuko smiled to himself as he finished scanning his sleeping quarters. He still had trouble getting accustomed to his new room and new life. After spending so many years in a small cabin on his small metal ship, sleeping on the hard ground as a fugitive, and then living in a small, filthy apartment in the lower district of Ba Sing Se, it seemed unbelievable. However, it was not only his room that amazed him but the fact that he was now Fire Lord, ruler of the great Fire Nation. He had once lost hope of ever regaining his throne or even his home.

Pulling the covers away from his body, Zuko stood and stretched for a moment before moving to his meditation area. Sitting on an elaborate cushion placed before a small altar with candles, Zuko lit them with a flick of his wrist as he closed his eyes and cleansed his mind. He never missed his morning meditation as it gave him the patience required for the oncoming day of tedious work as Fire Lord.

It was nearly an hour later when Zuko opened his eyes and snuffed the candles out. He made his way toward his private bathing chamber that adjoined the room on the eastern side. The bathing room was as magnificent as the rest of his royal suite, a spacious area with the same dark, marble floor as the rest of the suite. But what he liked most about the bathroom was the large marble bathtub that was placed near the wall facing the door which he used quite frequently.
“Who ever said firebenders don’t like water?” Zuko remarked aloud, smirking.

He waited for the tub to be filled before dipping his hand into the water and warming it with his firebending. Once the water was at the temperature he preferred and steam floated in the air, Zuko quickly removed his sleeping pants and climbed into the tub. He sighed as the warm water touched his skin, soaking up the soothing feeling for a moment before he started scrubbing himself with a soapy sponge.

As he scrubbed his chest, Zuko paused and a small frown settled on his impassive features, the large scar on the left side of his face becoming more noticeable. With tentative fingers, he touched the scar on his chest that marred his otherwise perfect skin; the scar Azula had inflicted upon him as he flung himself in front of Katarə to protect her. It had healed nicely thanks to the lovely waterbender’s healing abilities and it was barely noticeable, at least not as noticeable as the one on his face that was inflicted upon him by his own father. But even if it had not healed and was as visible as the one on his face, he would not have cared. He received that scar saving Katarə’s life, and he was willing to receive more if it meant keeping her safe.

Katarə…

Memories of her tear-streaked face flashed before his eyes as she knelt beside him on that terrible day, her hands covered in glowing water as she desperately tried to heal his wound and save his life.

Her soft, gentle hands sliding down my chest… Zuko thought with a smile before he shook his head.

There he went again. Every time he recalled that memory, his thoughts would wander into something far less innocent than it was. Katarə was just healing him at the time, and he would always be grateful for her help and for her concern for his wellbeing and his life. However, that still did not explain why, after all these years, he kept seeing Katarə in his mind everywhere he went.

A soft knock outside his royal bedchamber roused him from his thoughts. Reality greeted him with the announcement of breakfast by his most trusted maidservant.

Zuko answered that he would be ready in a moment and took another few seconds to bask in the soothing, warm water. He sighed as he finally got out, lest his breakfast went cold, and dried himself with a plush, red towel. It was going to be another wearisome day reviewing long documents, signing petitions, hearing his people’s requests, and then the dreadful meetings with his advisors. But he should not be complaining. He wanted to become Fire Lord in order to help his nation and his people, so he had to deal with all of the duties and problems that came with that title.

It had not been easy. Hatred and mistrust ruled everyone. A few of the Fire Nation people had even risen in rebellion against him a year after the war ended, but they had been swiftly defeated. The hardest part of all, however, was trying to regain the trust of the other countries, especially the Earth Kingdom. Many people still did not trust him, afraid he would become as power-hungry as his father and grandfathers before him, but Zuko was determined to show them that he wanted peace among all nations, all elements, just as much as they did. Thanks to Aang’s peace seeking and Zuko’s leadership, it seemed a likely possibility.

Dressed and with his fire crown glinting on his head, Zuko exited his room and entered his antechamber where the food was already set up on the low table. He nodded at the maidservants as they stepped away from the table. Jiao, his most trusted servant, and the other short-haired maid bowed and retreated from the room.

He picked up his chopsticks and began the silent routine of consuming his breakfast meal. It was moments like these that he wished he were still traveling with the gang; watching Aang and Toph bickered with one another while Suki reprimanded Sokka for stuffing his face with food without leaving some for the rest.

Though he was confused as to why, Zuko most of all missed the way Katara would hand his bowl—full of her simple but delicious cooking—to him while she gave him a radiant smile.

Brown locks danced in the frosty breeze as Katara watched her young waterbending students with care and pride as they completed their training for the day. She smiled at the looks of concentration on their cute, little faces, and laughed softly to herself.

“Good job everyone. Remember to keep the water flowing gracefully around your form,” she instructed as she demonstrated the technique to the children by bending a small stream of water around her.

She waited until they got the move before she congratulated them, “Great! That was awesome! Well, I think that’s enough for today. See you tomorrow, and remember to practice whenever you have a chance.”

“Yes, Master Katara!” the children chorused as they ran to go play. Katara watched them leave and smiled.
“Katara!” she heard Sokka call from a distance.

The waterbender turned at the sound of his voice and watched as her older brother came up to her, walking with an air of self-importance.

“Don’t you mean Master Katara?” she replied with a teasing grin.

“Nope, Katara, that’s what I meant ‘cause you’re still my little sister and I’m the Mighty Warrior of the Southern Water Tribe,” Sokka replied seriously as he pointed a finger at himself. “Thus, you are the one who should show some respect to the Mighty Warrior Sokka,” he finished with a large grin on his face.

“Oh, huh,” Katara uttered as she returned his grin. “Well, Mighty Warrior Sokka, perhaps we should see who’s the one to show respect by having a little competition,” she challenged as she summoned a rather large water whip and twirled it around him. “What do you say?”

Sokka’s eyes widened as he stared at the water whip, but he straightened himself out comically as he coolly replied.

“Nah, I’m too tired because of all the new, great inventions I have to work on. Maybe some other time, Sis,” he said and yawned.

Katara laughed as she replaced the water into her waterskin while she rolled her eyes at her brother.

Four years had passed since the end of the war and many things had changed. Waterbenders from the Northern Water Tribe came to help reconstruct their southern sister. Once a small village with a few igloos and huts scattered here and there, the Southern Water Tribe was now a large city that continued to grow. When the men came back from the war, many families sprang up and many children came into the world, especially when many warriors from the Northern Tribe married and settled in the South.

Much like its sister, the Southern Water Tribe now was made of beautifully carved ice buildings that were placed in an elaborate pattern—thanks to Sokka. Not only did he help plan the formation of the village with its leaders and their father, the chief of the tribe, but he also made suggestions on how to make the canals run through the city and how to build a stronger defensive wall that would keep any invaders out, which she hoped would never be needed.
Katara thought that the best idea that Sokka came up with was how to illuminate the city at night. Candles were placed inside light-blue glass lamps that had been placed along the streets, bridges, and house walls, making the city glow in a heavenly light and causing it to become a winter wonderland.

Katara’s thoughts were interrupted when Sokka spoke up again.

“I just got another letter from Suki!” he exclaimed, briefly showing his sister the letter he had pulled out from his parka before he brought it back to his face and stared down at it lovingly.

“Suki says that Kyoshi Island has grown larger and stronger. And she says that the Kyoshi Warrior membership has grown so much they had to open another school! Can you believe it? More warrior women! Women are starting to gain control of the world!” he commented with a laugh.

“Who ever said women didn’t already have control? I can recall you doing anything I said in order to fill your big belly,” Katara countered playfully as she poked his stomach. She grinned when he rubbed his stomach with a huff. “And Toph always bosses you around. Not to mention that she’s younger than you!” She laughed loudly.

“She doesn’t boss me around! I agree with whatever she wants because I’m a nice guy,” he countered as he looked back down at the letter before muttering, “Besides, I don’t want to end up crushed between two boulders. What would happen to my handsome face?”

Katara giggled.

“It’s not like it’s not already messed up,” she teased.

Sokka looked up from the letter to glare at her.

“Besides not all faces have to be flawless to be handsome,” she said with a shrug.

The image of Zuko’s scarred face emerged in her mind as she said this and she remembered touching his scar that day under Ba Sing Se. It was rough, but at the same time, it was smooth and velvety. Even though the scar covered almost half of the left side of his face she never thought of him as ugly, maybe a bit intimidating at first, but never repulsive. The scar actually added to his complex character, giving him a bad-boy look, making him look mysterious…handsome.
She blushed as these thoughts entered her mind; though she admitted that she thought about the firebender more than she thought was actually proper. Every time she would stare at a glowing flame—be it a candle, a torch, or a bonfire—she would be reminded of Zuko when he would firebend, as well as that horrible day he had almost died while the Fire Nation Palace courtyard burned as a result of his fight with Azula. Katara winced and lightly shook her head.

That memory always made her stomach twist painfully as she recalled the way Zuko lay in pain on the cold floor, electricity sparking from his body, after taking a bolt of lightning to his chest in order to save her life. She had never felt as scared as when she screamed his name and ran to him. Not even when Aang had been struck by Azula. She was confused as to why it was so, but either way she was extremely grateful to Zuko for risking his life for her after the harsh way she had treated him when he had first joined their group.

Sokka’s deep sigh snapped Katara out of her thoughts and she looked up with a sheepish expression on her face.

Sokka, oblivious to what his sister was thinking, cried out dramatically, “If it wasn’t because they need me here I would’ve gone to Kyoshi Island a long time ago!”

“Aww! How cute,” Katara cooed teasingly.

Sokka’s tanned cheeks reddened before he scowled at her.

“What?” she asked innocently as she tried to hide her smile when he grumbled under his breath.

She knew that, even though Sokka acted all tough and macho-like, he would do almost anything Suki asked because he was madly in love with the Kyoshi Warrior. Who would have thought that such a terrible fighter and a sexist like Sokka would end up becoming, well…less of a sexist, a very skilled warrior, and a genius—the ‘idea guy’?

Her mental praise was interrupted at the sound of Sokka's stomach growling noisily.

“I’m hungry!” Sokka complained as he clutched at his protesting stomach. “What does a great warrior have to do in order to get some food around here? Why can’t dinner be earlier?”
Katara rolled her eyes. It seemed some things would never change.

Sitting silently on his throne set behind his flames, Zuko listened carefully and somewhat impatiently as the members of his Court Council argued amongst themselves about the welfare of the Fire Nation. Hours passed since Zuko had stepped into the meeting room and he could feel a headache coming on.

“More soldiers should be sent to protect and gain more control of our colonies in the Earth Kingdom!” one old and rather obese advisor yelled. “If we do not show more control, the Earth Kingdom residents will surely start a rebellion and will seek to overthrow our rule!”

Some of the older advisors agreed with him with low grumbles and nodding heads. Zuko resisted the urge to rub at his temples.

“But we cannot spend more money on recruiting more soldiers. Besides, as much as you hate it, we are not at war anymore. We have to use our funds to keep manufacturing goods so we could export them to the other nations. If we spend more money on the military we won’t have enough for our resources,” another elder explained calmly, which gained the support of most of the other advisors.

Zuko nodded in agreement. Opening up trade with the other countries was what helped his nation regain its feet, and not to mention a bit more trust from the Water Tribes and the Earth Kingdom. In order to keep manufacturing goods they needed the funds. Once, Zuko almost laughed when he read the monthly report that stated that what the other nations demanded the most was not their famous steel, but their red wine.

“But most of our products come from our colonies and if we do not keep control of these colonies, then guess what will happen…if you are smart enough,” the first advisor sneered, his large belly jiggling as he moved. “We would not only lose the colonies we fought so hard to gain, but we will also lose your precious goods, you fool!”

Zuko narrowed his eyes as he glared at the obese man. His name was Wei. He was rather old, but had a sharp mind and a sharp tongue. He was one of Ozai’s former advisors and was one of the few who still favored world domination. He constantly tried to argue that the war was for the betterment of the Fire Nation, but Zuko knew Wei only wanted power and wealth for himself.

Zuko hated the man. Wei was the first one on his list of the advisors he wanted to dismiss as he ascended the throne, but Iroh convinced him it was best if he kept the most influential and most wealthy around him in order to gain their trust and their support. Unfortunately, Wei was the wealthiest and most influential of them all. Even though some still sided with Wei, many of the... others started to see the foolishness of the war and longed for peace to settle among all nations once again.

Chao, the other man who was arguing with Wei, glared at the fat nobleman. Not only was he one of Iroh’s friends, but he was also wise, patient and among his fellow advisors, he had the best arguments against the war. Zuko had personally appointed Chao to his Council because he always asked for Zuko’s views and opinions and backed him in every decision he made. Something Zuko noticed that Wei never did.

The young Fire Lord always had to calm himself down every time Wei disregarded him because the old advisor thought he was too young to rule and not intelligent enough to comprehend how to be Fire Lord. He especially hated every time Wei called him ‘the Young One’. He was not a child, for Agni’s sake! Zuko had to breathe several times so as not to act on his urge to burn the ever-present stupid smirk off Wei’s face.

“Well, I think we should ask Fire Lord Zuko to give us his opinion on this matter,” Chao replied, looking confidently up at the twenty-year-old ruler.

All the advisors turned to look up at him, sitting behind the orange flames. Zuko could feel Wei wishing to see him make a fool of himself, but thanks to Uncle Iroh and Chao, Zuko had quickly learned how to handle politics.

“Yes, let us see what the Young One has to say,” Wei simpered as he leaned back in his spot.

Zuko clenched his hands as he growled in his head. That stupid imbecile! I'll burn that stupid smirk...

While he cursed in his head, his facial expression remained placid and neutral.

Zuko regarded the men in front of him calmly as he carefully thought over what to say. He needed them to side with him and see that ruling over the whole world was not the best thing for the Fire Nation. If there were anyone that could give out inspirational speeches that would make them all see reason, he would undoubtedly name Katara. But unfortunately the waterbender was all the way in the Southern Water Tribe, and so, not only could he not hear her voice, but he could not see her beautiful face or find comfort in her presence either.

A small cough brought him out of his thoughts. He inwardly shook his head before he straightened himself out so he could begin.
“I believe that what you have said is correct, Wei. Our colonies are a very important source for the production of our trading goods,” Zuko began. He could see Wei's smug grin broaden.

“But…” he continued and he inwardly smirked as Wei’s expression changed, “I don’t think sending more soldiers would be a good idea. Our colonies are well protected as they are and the governors I personally appointed are running the cities with justice and a fair amount of control. I have received reports stating that both Fire Nation citizens and Earth Kingdom residents are living well together. There may be some tension now, but I am sure that with time trust will win out.”

Many of the men in the meeting room chamber nodded in agreement, but he knew some were still skeptical.

“Besides, if we send more soldiers to the colonies, we might give the wrong impression. The Fire Nation citizens might believe they are being protected because they are in danger and might begin to distrust their neighbors, while the Earth Kingdom residents might think we are trying to control and oppress them,” he glanced at Wei for a second, “which might actually start a rebellion.”

Zuko paused and looked around the room behind the glow of flames.

“I really believe that in order for the Fire Nation to regain its honor and glory we need harmony among those living in our colonies. And if there is harmony between the elements in the colonies, then there will finally be peace and harmony among all nations and all elements. Then, hopefully, that harmony would never be broken ever again.”

The young Fire Lord stared at the men before him as the room went silent before he settled back on his throne cushion with a small sigh.

After removing his Fire Lord attire and putting on a comfortable tunic and a pair of pants, Zuko sat at the table in his anteroom reading over some documents he had not finished in his study. After giving his opinion in the meeting room, Zuko was actually surprised when most of the men smiled and even applauded him. He thought that maybe he sounded too idealistic, but that is just the way he felt the world should come to be. Peaceful. No more war, hatred, suffering, and death.

‘No more children being ripped from their parents,’ was what Katara had told him once when she was healing his chest a few days after the Agni Kai with Azula.
His thoughts were interrupted as a monotonous voice commented, “I hope this time they make a better soup.”

Mai sat across from him, her hands neatly folded on her lap under the table. He was so caught up in his thoughts that he had not noticed his thin, dark-haired girlfriend enter the room.

Zuko smiled slightly at her.

“Mai, I didn’t hear you come in. I’m sure the soup will taste fine. The Palace Cook always makes delicious plates,” he replied passively.

Mai just nodded.

“So, how was your day?” Zuko asked as he placed his papers to the side, hoping to be distracted from his work and thoughts, if only for a bit.

“Nothing interesting, just the same old routine, practicing with my daggers and reading,” she replied without emotion. “But I did receive a letter from Ty Lee. She seems to be enjoying herself on Kyoshi Island and informed me that they have opened a new school for incoming Kyoshi Warriors,” Mai said evenly as she watched him with her dark eyes.

“Well, Ty Lee always enjoys herself no matter where she is. I’m glad Kyoshi Island is doing well,” Zuko replied, hoping she would asked him about his day. He wanted to have a conversation with someone who was not always judging him or was intimidated by him.

A few of his advisors were frightened by him, not only because of his temper—which as he grew older he was gaining more control of—but because he had proven himself to be a great leader despite his young age. This made them uneasy because he had proven to be hard to manipulate, and thus, it made it hard for them to advance in their own interests.

Mai only nodded and sat there without moving. Zuko frowned as the silence became a bit uncomfortable. He was never good at initiating conversations...that was his uncle’s job. He missed Iroh terribly. He missed his uncle’s wisdom and his annoying hints. Hell, he even missed Uncle’s hot leaf juice!

Zuko wished Iroh was there helping him with his rule, but the old man had decided to go back to his teashop in Ba Sing Se once he realized that his nephew had learned how to handle the Fire Nation. As the silence grew longer, Zuko let out an inaudible sigh.

“Well, I certainly endured an exhausting meeting today,” he began.

She yawned lightly.

“Yes, I’m sure it must have been awful. Just like every other meeting,” she replied.

Zuko did not know whether to think she yawned because she was tired or she just did not want to listen to him talk about his dreary day, though he was slightly surprised that he was unaffected by it. As the years passed by, his relationship with Mai became unexciting. Not that it had been that wonderful after they became a couple when he returned with Azula from Ba Sing Se.

A few months ago, Mai asked him if she could move into the palace and he had accepted, not seeing any problem with it. Though he had to wonder what the point was since they hardly spent time together. Sometimes he wondered if he asked Mai to be his girlfriend because he hoped for their relationship to become something meaningful, or because back then he had been so lonely he just accepted her affections when she had approached him and confessed she had had a crush on him since they were children.

Just then dinner arrived and all thoughts of recounting his day were forgotten. They ate in silence as each dwelled in their own thoughts.

After they finished their meal, Mai looked up at him and glanced at the doors that led to his private rooms before she looked at him again. Zuko pretended he did not notice her request to enter his room and coolly looked away. He did not allow anyone into his sleeping quarters, except a few trusted servants to clean it, not even Mai.

When she realized that Zuko was not going to invite her in, like she had been hoping for ever since he became Fire Lord, Mai suppressed a huff as she gracefully stood up.

“Well, I’m sure you must be busy, so I think I’ll go to my room now if you don’t need anything. Good night,” she said almost coldly.

Zuko nodded and he, too, stood up to walk her out his door. He was a bit surprised, though he did not show it, when Mai turned around and kissed him lightly before the servants entered the anteroom to clean it.

“We should go to Ember Island again one day, Zuko, at least for some change in this boring life,” she murmured as she ran her thin hand down his chest.

Zuko frowned. Boring Life? Running this great country should be an honor.

“I’ll think about it and I’ll see if I have time for a small vacation,” he answered impassively.

Mai frowned slightly, but quickly recovered her emotionless expression as she gave a small nod and walked out the door.

Zuko sighed as he went to his bedchamber while the servants cleared the dishes from the low table. He removed his clothing and changed for the night. Piling all of his paperwork on his lap as he sat on his bed, he began to recall the events that happened in the last four years.

Becoming Fire Lord of a nation that had been badly governed and caused a great deal of destruction to the other countries was difficult. He had to deal with national debt and on top of that, he had to regain the trust of the Water Tribes and the Earth Kingdom. But the worst part was the hatred of his own people, mostly the elders, and more accurately Wei. They had been outraged when he called for peace and the end of the war. They thought him unfit to be their Fire Lord, not only because back then he had been a seventeen-year-old, but because they thought him a traitor to his own country. That really hurt, but Zuko never gave up and was determined to keep his promise of peace and was even more determined to regain the honor and glory the Fire Nation had lost in the hands of the previous selfish rulers. Thanks to his determination and great leadership, his nation became more prosperous and all the countries began to trade with one another, and in a way began to accept each other.

Zuko rubbed his temples as his vision began to blur from concentrating too much on the documents. It seemed that every time he finished one pile, another would spring up in its place. Putting his papers aside, he settled into his bed.

With a wave of his hand, the candles extinguished, but the fire from the fireplace near one wall illuminated the room a bit—the light cast shadows around the large bedchamber as darkness settled in.
As Zuko lay in his bed, his thoughts wandered to Mai and their relationship. He had imagined that once he became Fire Lord everything he wanted and wished for would finally come true, but it was not so. Mai was still…Mai. She was still dull and monotonous and she rarely talked. Not to mention her physical appearance had not changed much except for the fact the she was now as tall as him. There were days when they did have great times together, but that was rare. And it did not help that he was busy running a nation.

But he could not deny the fact that he was thankful that Mai stood up to Azula in order to save him from his psychotic sister. And he was impressed since it was not an easy thing to do—she could have really gotten hurt if Ty Lee had not intervened in Azula’s wrath.

Zuko frowned. He often thought about this event and he always felt guilty for not going after Mai when he helped Sokka rescue his father and Suki from the Boiling Rock. He had completely forgotten about her, as he was occupied with finding an escape from the island.

He began to feel even guiltier by admitting that he forgot about her because he was too busy with other matters such as finding a better way to firebend, teaching Aang firebending, the whole Sozin’s Comet situation…

Helping Katara find her mother’s killer in order to gain her forgiveness and friendship…

Zuko frowned and scowled slightly at himself for his thoughts.

Of course he wanted Katara to forgive him after all he had done to her and the rest of his friends. He had wanted her to see that he had indeed changed and the only thing he wanted was for his father to be defeated and the war to end. Besides, he had not wanted any more tension among the group as Katara and he had their differences. It had nothing to do with him wanting the lovely waterbender to like him. Of course not! That was just ridiculous!

Somehow, he had this feeling as if his conscience was laughing at him.

Okay, so maybe he did want Katara to like him, at least a little. There was nothing wrong with that. Right?

Zuko rolled over in his bed. Moreover, he helped her find her mother’s murderer because it was the only way she could get closure. It was the only thing he knew he could do to help her, and it worked. Katara did forgive him and she gave him her friendship.
Not only did she give him her friendship and trust, but she had embraced him as well. The only other people who have ever hugged him were his mother, his uncle, and Mai. He could still recall the day when they returned from confronting Yon Rha. The sun had been setting over the horizon, turning the sky and the ocean a bright orange and rich red color as Katara sat at the small dock with her feet dangling into the water before she rose to greet them when he rejoined her with Aang. The young monk had tried to comfort her, but she refused his words of comfort and instead turned to him and a small blush had seeped onto her cheeks.

Before he could have pondered deeper about the blush, she had walked over to him and told him that she was ready to forgive. Then she had flung herself at him, circled her arms around his neck, and embraced him. He had frozen in shock for a second before he quickly encircled her waist and returned the embrace, but all too soon, she pulled back.

He had surprised himself when he had almost tightened his hold on her when he felt her start to move away, and even now, he still wished the embrace could have lasted a bit longer or perhaps be repeated again sometime in the near future. He liked the way her small and soft body felt against his, how her hair caressed the side of his face, and how her arms encircled his neck.

Zuko frowned at his sudden need to see the waterbender and berated himself for having such thoughts about Katara. With a sigh he wondered what was going on with him after what happened that day and why all of the sudden his thoughts switched from his reflection on his relationship with Mai to the master waterbender.

“Katara is just a very good friend,” he argued silently to his dark room. “And Mai is my…girlfriend. And she was there for me after my fight with Azula.”

But you didn’t even think about Mai until she showed up in your room—right before your coronation, a small voice in his head said.

He flinched in consequence of the fact that he could not deny it. He had actually been surprised when he heard Mai’s voice as she entered his room to help him into his robe, by reason that he was in so much pain after Azula’s attack.

But I was glad she was there and that she was well, Zuko told himself.

Though there was a part of him that wished it had not been Mai that entered the room to help him, that it had not been her that he kissed but…Katara.
Zuko closed his eyes and sighed deeply as he waited for sleep to claim him so he could find some peace from his confusing thoughts. The same thoughts he had for the past four years.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After a quiet dinner, Katara's family made their way to their bedrooms to retire for the night. Since Hakoda had been appointed Chief of the Southern Water Tribe, their house was the largest in the entire tribe. It was not as grand as the Northern Tribe Palace, since it was not a palace in the first place, but it was still impressive nevertheless. It was made of smooth, thick ice and snow with many elegant carvings. It held the tribe meeting place as well as lodgings for guest and ambassadors. Their house actually had a stone floor given to them by Omashu’s eccentric ruler, King Bumi. It was the only building in the entire tribe that had a huge steel entrance door, a gift from Fire Lord Zuko himself.

Katara let out a soft sigh as she entered her room and closed the door softly behind her. She removed her clothes and put on her warm sleeping attire before she made her way to her small pinewood dresser. The young woman sat in front of the mirror before she picked up her brush and started to comb her long, curly brown hair.

Hanging on the walls of her small room were water paintings of scenes from beautiful lakes and oceans. There was an ice window on the western side of her room, and on the opposite side, sat one small bed piled with warm furs and blankets of various shades of white, silver, and blue. At the head of the bed was a large pile of fluffy pillows that Iroh had sent her over the past few years. Ever since she had spent time drinking tea with the lovable old man in his tea shop, Katara had come to care for him as her own uncle, and he had come to care for her as well. They even exchanged letters.

The best part of her new room, though, was that she had a private bathroom. Now she did not have to bathe with everybody in the same room, with only a blanket surrounding the tub for privacy. She enjoyed taking her time as she bathed, after all.

Katara was about to braid her hair when she heard someone knock on her door once before opening it. Her Gran-Gran entered the room with a small smile.

“My, my! You really have grown into quite a lovely young lady. Just like your mother,” Kanna exclaimed as she smiled at her granddaughter.

Katara smiled slightly at her grandmother’s words. She remembered her mother, always so beautiful and loving. Kya loved them so much she sacrificed herself to save them, to save her. Katara reached for the comfort of her mother’s necklace as she remembered the day her mother gave it to her.
Kanna noticed her granddaughter touching the blue necklace, and with a soft sigh, she walked toward her young granddaughter.

Reaching for Katara’s hand, the old woman added in a motherly tone, “Katara, I know how much this necklace means to you, but you must realize that one day you will have to part with it once you receive your own betrothal necklace. Then one day you will hand it down to your own daughter as I have to your mother when she married my son and she to you.”

Blushing, Katara replied, “But, Gran-Gran, I’m still too young to be thinking about marriage and having children!”

Kanna only chuckled and shook her graying head as she moved around so she could braid her granddaughter’s hair.

“But many girls in our culture marry at sixteen and begin to have children almost a few months or a year later,” the old woman reminded her. “You are already nineteen, my dear. You’re not that young.”

Katara remembered Yue being engaged at sixteen before she turned into the Moon Spirit. When she turned sixteen-years-old herself, many of the young men from both tribes had tried to court her, especially since she was one of the heroes of the war and daughter to the Southern Water Tribe Chief. But of course, she always declined their offers since she was Aang’s girlfriend, but this did not seem to stop the suitors.

And Kanna knew this.

“I am getting older by the minute, Katara,” she sighed as she finished braiding Katara’s long hair. “And your silly brother still does not have the courage to propose to that lovely Kyoshi girl. So I ask you this, when am I going to have great-grandchildren?”

Katara frowned at the question since she really did not know. She did not think she was ready for marriage, much less begin to have children.

Quickly changing the subject, Katara asked, “So how are things going with you and Master Pakku?”

After the war, Master Pakku and Kanna had married. And to Katara’s relief, Gran-Gran began to rant about how loudly Pakku snored at night.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The moon’s soft light spilled into the quiet room from the ice window. Gran-Gran’s words filled Katara’s head as she tried to sleep among her warm furs. Marriage had not entered her mind recently since she was too busy rebuilding her home and teaching the children waterbending.

She remembered the day, almost four years ago, outside Uncle Iroh’s teashop when she accepted Aang’s declaration of love. At that moment, she thought she was ready for a relationship, she thought she was sure of her feelings, and everything seemed fine at first. Aang was so sweet and lovable and they always had fun, but that was it. Their relationship seemed only based on having a great time, mostly on Aang’s part. He was always running around trying every new and exciting thing, sometimes even neglecting his duties. Sometimes it was just…childish.

Katara longed for a mature conversation, something more serious, something deeper. Not to mention how clingy Aang sometimes got, making her try all his newfound amusements. But it wasn’t Aang’s fault. He was a child at heart.

Katara sighed. It was even harder since Aang was absent most of the time doing his Avatar duties, bringing peace to the world. She could not blame him since he did not only belong to her, but to the whole world. Even though they spent a lot of time together when he came back to visit, it was hard for them to communicate when he was away. He did try to send her letters whenever he could, though they mostly consisted of things he did and saw.

Toph had also taken the trouble of writing to her and Suki had also written to her, even if most of her letters were addressed to Sokka. And Iroh—Uncle Iroh as he had so many times corrected her—wrote to her quite often, writing about his teashop and all the interesting customers.

Katara laughed quietly, touching the fluffy pillows that surrounded her as she remembered when the old man wrote about the time he was so busy flirting with a pretty lady that he almost burned the pastries. It was sometimes amusing to know that such a cheerful and charismatic person like Iroh could be related to Zuko, who was the complete opposite.

Even Zuko took the time out of his busy schedule as Fire Lord to write her a letter. It was short, but it was touching, nevertheless. It was a congratulating letter for her nineteenth birthday. He had apologized for being unable to attend her party and wished her the best, but the letter was not the only thing he sent. Zuko sent her a present...a beautiful, silver hairpin. It was shaped like a rose and embedded on its petals were small sapphires and rubies.

Upon opening the package to reveal the pretty jewel, everybody had gasped with admiration. Aang only scoffed saying Zuko was trying too hard to impress them all, and with a confident smile he gave her his bouquet of panda-lilies, hoping she forget the hairpin.
But she couldn’t. Katara tried to refuse Zuko’s gift, saying it was probably very expensive and did not deserve it, but Gran-Gran advised her against such an idea since it would be rude to return such a gift.

‘Besides,’ Kanna had reasoned, ‘Fire Lord Zuko sent it to you as an apology for not being able to come to your party.’

As Katara lay in her bed, she reached for her hairpin on the nightstand. It was too beautiful to keep hidden in a box and too precious to wear, at the risk of her losing it or damaging it, especially since she was always busy. She touched the lovely stones as they glistened from the moonlight that entered her room from the window. She loved the way the red and blue stones sparkled, and when she held it in a certain way, both stones seemed to fuse, creating a beautiful violet color. All her previous thoughts of her relationship with Aang were forgotten as she thought about Zuko.

She smiled. Zuko, the angry and arrogant former Crown Prince of the Fire Nation, now one of her friends and the new Fire Lord. She laughed. She could not believe how much they had changed.

“I wonder how much more he has changed since the last time we have all seen each other,” Katara thought to herself, stroking the hairpin as if she expected it to reveal something to her.

Right after the war, the gang had spent two weeks in Ba Sing Se at Uncle Iroh’s teashop before Zuko was called back to the Fire Nation. After that, the group hardly spent time together anymore. Toph was helping Aang around the Earth Kingdom. Suki continued to teach the Kyoshi Warriors and Sokka and Katara were helping in the Southern Water Tribe. But despite this, Aang always came to visit, obviously for her, and even Toph sometimes came. She always complained because she could not see nor bend, but they all knew she enjoyed herself. And Suki visited a couple of times with her Kyoshi Warriors, especially to see Sokka.

But not only was Zuko the farthest away, he was also the busiest of them all. He was the one who had to deal with trying to build trust among the other nations and deal with all the postwar hassle. But the hardest part must have been trying to lead a country who still called for the war to continue.

But he can take it. Zuko never gives up. He would do the impossible for the well-being of those he cares about, she thought.

Katara found herself blushing.
Just like when he almost got himself killed when he placed himself in front of his crazy sister’s lightning in order to save my life.

Every time she recalled this memory, she could not help feeling guilty. If only she had listened to him and had stayed out of the way, he would not have been hurt. She had felt horrible as she saw him lying there in pain, his life slipping away. She remembered how her hands scanned his badly injured chest.

His warm, muscular chest…

“What am I thinking?!” she exclaimed with a shake of her head.

She should not be having such thoughts, especially since Zuko had been almost fatally injured. She had just touched his chest to heal him. Nothing more.

With another shake of her head, Katara set the hairpin back on the nightstand, settled herself in her warm blankets, and finally fell asleep with a sigh.
After his regular morning meditation, Zuko made his way to the training arena, the only place where he could vent his frustrations without breaking something or hurting someone. That someone being Wei.

“Good morning, my lord,” Chao greeted as Zuko entered the arena. “I trust you had a good night’s rest?”

“Yes, lovely,” Zuko murmured sarcastically as he shrugged off his tunic and threw it aside.

Chao was frequently present whenever Zuko practiced his firebending, a favor Iroh had asked of him before he returned to Ba Sing Se. Iroh and Chao had been friends since their childhood and Iroh trusted him with Zuko’s care above anybody else in the Fire Nation. Chao reported all of Zuko’s progress to Iroh, either in his firebending or his Fire Lord duties. Though sometimes it made Zuko feel as if he were a child and he hated that feeling.

Zuko made his way to the middle of the small arena. Off to one side were a few wooden logs placed in an organized horizontal line. Each log stood vertically from the floor. The young lord glanced at them briefly as he stretched for a few moments before gracefully moving into a fighting stance. Inhaling deeply, he began to send fire blasts through the air. He moved with great agility, punching out with fiery fists and leaping into the air, sending powerful flaming kicks. For some time he practiced the basic moves, getting his muscles warmed up. Then shifting rapidly into his more complex steps, he created fire whips. He circled them around his form in a series of complicated moves before whipping them down, creating a loud cracking sound that resounded through the arena. Zuko rounded on the logs and with great concentration, he began cutting the pieces of thick wood set up for him in halves. The half pieces of wood fell to the side, without any of them catching on fire.

Silently, Chao watched intently as the Fire Lord continued with his daily practice, admiration showing slightly on his face. Through the years, Zuko had indeed become even more powerful at firebending the more he practiced and the more determined he got. He had really gained control of his element, unlike when he was younger.

Zuko retracted his fire whips, and without missing a step, he continued to punch fire blasts into the empty air before him. Now he had to practice his firebending alone, since none of his trained men could keep up with his advanced skill. He could not deny that this made him proud since he was much younger than they were, but sometimes he wished he had someone to spar with to make things more interesting…or less lonesome. Mai had offered once, but he did not want her to get hurt.
Taking a few deep breaths, Zuko slowed his speed and wound down his steps.

“Great move with the fire whips, my lord,” Chao praised him as Zuko finished his last stance. “Your uncle would be very proud of your incredible skill and the way you have greatly improved these past years.”

Zuko offered him a slight smile as he wiped the sweat from his face with a small towel.

“I’m sure Uncle would be even more proud if I finally learned how to make tea,” he said wryly.

Chao began to chuckle quietly when they were interrupted as a guard came running toward them. Zuko frowned and placed the towel around his neck as he waited for the guard to near them.

“My Lord Zuko,” the guard got out between huffs as he bowed respectfully, “Your presence is requested urgently in the throne room.”

Zuko and Chao looked at each other with questioning frowns on their faces before the young Fire Lord returned his gaze to the awaiting soldier.

“Tell them I’m on my way,” he stated as he turned around and quickly made his way to his bedchambers so he could clean up and change.

He wondered what the urgency was as a frown settled on his features.

Katara watched the restless children as they practiced, amusement dancing in her blue eyes. It was so obvious they were itching for their lesson to be over already and she decided that she would end their suffering early.

“Great job, you guys! That’s enough for today. See you tomorrow,” Katara announced with a smile as she replaced her bending water back into her waterskin.

The children bounded out of the area quickly after they gave her small bows and large smiles, their joyful laughter trailing after them as they went. They had been impatient to leave and go play since practice had started late.
There had been a tribe meeting earlier that day concerning the exportation of their goods to the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom, and as the chief’s daughter and waterbending master, Katara had attended. The Water Tribesmen’s perspective on having a woman in the meetings changed when she proved herself capable of expressing her opinions, not to mention she argued better than anyone else. But that was not to say that they were all accepting or that it was always easy. There were some meetings that she was not allowed to attend, but she did not let that get to her.

I used to be so impatient to prove myself, she thought absentmindedly as she made her way toward her house, that I got myself in trouble many times, especially that time when I stole that waterbending scroll.

Katara laughed at her own foolishness.

That ended with Zuko saving me from the pirates, then capturing me, and finally tying me to a tree. She let out another giggle.

Well, it was a good thing I was so impatient to learn since I came across Zuko again…

Her cheeks heated up as she remembered Zuko grabbing her wrists and then tying her to that tree. She blushed more fiercely as she remembered his warm breath near her neck and his soft voice close to her ear. Back then she had been frustrated at the thought that she had been so easily caught, angry that Zuko had used her mother’s necklace against her, and afraid of what he would have done to her. But looking at it now, the experience was oddly erotic and the memory made her stomach flutter for some strange reason she did not fully comprehend.

She shook her head and shoved those thoughts away.

“He was just trying to make me tell him where Aang was,” she said, then smirking she added, “And it didn’t even work.”

“Hey there, Sugar Queen!” Toph’s voice cut through Katara’s musings.

“Toph!” Katara exclaimed in surprise as she turned toward the sound of the earthbender’s voice. “Aang!” she gasped as she saw them both standing there beside Appa.
Had she been so lost in her thoughts that she did not even notice the ten-ton, flying sky-bison?

“Hi, Katara!” Aang cried out joyfully as he bounded up to her, his youthful face lighting up in his happiness to see her again.

“I wasn’t expecting you so soon. Why didn’t you send a letter saying you were arriving?” Katara asked as she approached them.

“I’m sorry, Katara, but I was just so impatient to come,” Suki explained as she appeared and climbed down Appa’s saddle.

“Yeah, we were so excited when Aang brought up the idea to visit!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she jumped down after Suki, making a somersault in the process and landing neatly on the ground before her feet sunk a bit on the snow.

“Suki! Ty Lee! It’s so good to see you!” Katara exclaimed as she ran to hug them.

“Um, where’s Sokka?” Suki asked as she pulled away from Katara. The female warrior looked away as she tried not to blush.

“Hmm? I’m not sure…” Katara began as she tried to remember where she had seen her brother last.

“Aang, Toph! When did you guys get here?” they heard Sokka call out as he marched up to them. He paused and his blue eyes widened as he spotted his girlfriend standing among his other friends.

“Suki!” he shouted out gleefully as he quickened his pace. “You’re here, too! You didn’t tell me you were coming in your letter!”

Katara smiled as she saw her brother and Suki run for each other, embracing and kissing one another without even caring about who saw them. She looked away when Aang walked up to her, giving her a hug and a kiss on the lips. She tensed slightly before she relaxed.

“I missed you so much. I was so impatient to see you again,” he said softly as he gave her another kiss.
Katara gave him a small smile as he pulled her away at arm’s length to grin at her while Momo chattered excitedly on his shoulder. Aang had not changed much over the years, his tattooed head was still shaved and he still wore his monk garb. However, his face did seem a bit more angular and he was taller than she was “Me too,” Katara replied quietly.

Momo jumped onto her shoulder and nuzzled her cheek. Katara giggled as his fur tickled her skin.

“I missed you, too, Momo,” she cooed and laughed when the little lemur purred at her.

“Oh, so I guess nobody missed me. The poor, blind girl,” Toph muttered sarcastically as she stood beside Appa with a deep scowl on her face. The others laughed as they turned to her.

“How can we not miss our favorite earthbender?” Sokka said as he and Katara both squeezed the short earthbender in a fierce hug.

“Okay, okay! I feel the love already! Let go!” Toph squeaked as she struggled against them.

“Group hug!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she wrapped her arms around the three of them.

“Great,” Toph grumbled as they all hugged with her in the middle as if they were a bunch of kids.

Appa groaned and swished his large tail, causing a cold gust of wind to ruffle the group’s hair and clothing.

“We missed you too Appa, buddy,” Sokka told him as he turned and hugged the hairy beast. Appa responded by licking Sokka’s whole head. “Yep, missed that, too.”

“Hey, Snoozles, love the hair,” Toph piped up with a grin.
“Really?” Sokka began as he touched his slobbered hair. “Well, I wasn’t sure if I should let it grow more or…Hey!”

“Never gets old!” Toph chortled as she pointed at her sightless eyes.

The group laughed as they made their way in the snow and to the house.

Zuko walked quickly, a dark aura surrounding him, as he made his way to the prison tower.

A weary-looking messenger had arrived with an urgent message a few hours ago. News of raids caused by a large group of thieves was reported to have struck some of the Fire Nation colonies in the Earth Kingdom. They not only plundered the houses and stores, but they destroyed the factories that held their manufactured goods, and worst of all, raped the women and killed anyone who came in their path. They were said to be both firebenders and earthbenders causing the trouble. This definitely was not what Zuko meant when he wanted ‘the nations to work together’. And the worst part was that nobody seemed able to find them.

Zuko sighed. It seemed that problems were increasing faster than he could solve them.

With silent steps, the irritated Fire Lord made his way to the farthest and most secured prison cell with his two personal guards following behind him. The stuffy air and dim light of the halls only added to his already dark mood. As he approached the guards positioned outside the cell, they straightened and bowed to him. He nodded at them before he pulled out a key from within his armor. He opened the heavy door and stepped inside before closing the door firmly behind him. The guards stood attentively outside in case their lord needed help.

With a flick of his hand, he lit up the torch that rested beside the door. Zuko blinked as he adjusted his vision to the oppressing darkness of the cell.

“Hello, Zuko. Come to pay your father a visit?” Ozai sneered as his son entered the small room. “I feel so loved,” he mocked as he leaned back against the far wall, rubbing his bearded chin with the back of his hand.

_He sounds more like Azula every day_, Zuko thought distastefully as he eyed his father across the divided prison cell.
“You know very well why I’m here,” Zuko responded darkly as he crossed his arms over his chest. “I am here to ask you once more to tell me where my mother is. And if you do, maybe I’ll be more lenient on you.”

“Oh, Zuzu.”

Zuko flinched at the nickname. Ozai laughed sinisterly at his son’s reaction.

“Unless you give me my freedom, I won’t tell you where your precious mother is,” he said evilly as he lifted his hand and casually inspected his nails.

“Never,” Zuko answered firmly. He was losing his patience, but he decided to make one more effort. “But I can make your miserable life a little easier, if you just tell me where to find her.”

“If I cannot have what I want, then you will not get what you want,” Ozai sneered nastily as he flicked his dark, golden eyes at Zuko, “Which does not seem that important to you since you don’t want to compromise.”

Zuko clenched his hands. It was always the same thing. He had tried many ways in order to get information on his mother’s whereabouts, but Ozai always refused to tell him. Even though he was impatient and desperate to find his mother, he could not give into his demand, seeing Ozai would probably try to regain the throne from him and restart the war if he were ever released. Even though this man was his father, Zuko despised him greatly.

Not only did he have to deal with his despicable father, he also had a handful with his crazed sister. Azula’s state was even worse than before; she cursed loudly and thrashed around wildly, and had even started biting people.

“One way or the other, I will find a way to make you to tell me where she is,” Zuko said between clenched teeth.

“Well, then, let’s hope you find out how before one of us ends up dead,” Ozai replied with a sinister smile.

Leaning close toward the cell bars, Zuko narrowed his eyes.
Zuko left the prison tower after one last glare at his malevolent sire and made his way back to the palace. As he passed the entrance to the Royal Palace Garden, he turned his head and briefly glanced at the pond that rested in the middle of the luscious green grass. Memories of happy moments with his mother passed through his head. Sighing, he made his way toward his bedchamber, but since he passed Mai’s room, he decided to stop in to see her.

“Who is it?” Mai’s monotone voice sounded as Zuko knocked on her door.

“It’s me,” he replied, hoping they could talk.

He never thought he would become so desperate to share his feelings and troubles with someone else, and since his uncle was in Ba Sing Se, the only other option was Mai.

“Oh. You can come in, Zuko,” she called back.

Zuko opened the door and went inside. He looked around the slightly illuminated room before he turned his gaze to the young woman that was staring silently at him.

“I hope I didn’t interrupt you if you were sleeping,” he said as he closed the door behind him, walking towards her bed where she was reclining. There was a thick book in her hands.

“No, I was just reading,” Mai replied as she closed her book, putting it aside.

“Oh, so what’s it about?” he asked as he sat on her bed.

“The history of shuriken.”

“Oh, how…interesting,” he muttered as he looked away to stare at a blank spot in front of him.
“Yes. So what brings you to my room?” she asked, smiling.

“I just wanted to spend some time with my girlfriend,” he replied.

Mai’s smile widened a little, something Zuko never seemed to get used to. It was not as bright as one of Katara’s smiles. Mentally shaking his head of such thoughts, Zuko glanced sideways at the dark-haired woman beside him.

“I went to see Ozai again today,” he commented quietly.

Mai’s smile faded and she turned away.

“Oh, I see,” she replied distantly. “And what happened?” she asked, sounding almost bored as she folded her hands placidly on her lap.

“The same as usual, he still won’t tell me where my mother is,” Zuko said angrily. “And that’s not the only problem. We received news of raids going on in the colonies.” He sighed as he lay back on the bed. “Things are getting more complicated.”

Mai eyed him for a moment before she moved closer toward him, placing a thin hand on his chest, stroking it as she looked into his eyes. He stared back at her. They had been intimate a few times, but it was not what Zuko had expected. Their first time together—although it had not been the first sexual experience for either of them—was awkward for both of them. He understood that. However, the next couples of times were just…disappointing. In all honesty, it was terrible, completely lacking in passion. She did not do anything to please him, and admittedly, he did not reciprocate either. Not to mention that it never lasted long, so that is why he had not gone to her for the past year. Such moments only made him feel...empty.

“I think I know how to make you forget about you troubles. How to get things off your mind,” she whispered seductively as her hand traveled lower down his chest.

Forget about them? Zuko thought.

Forget about the people who were being hurt? Forget about his mother? Zuko frowned. He should be ecstatic about the offer like any man would, but that was not what he needed from Mai at that moment and that realization made him feel even more depressed and lonely.
‘I just asked you if you were cold. I didn’t ask for your whole life story.’

He frowned at the memory. It seemed she still did not care about his feelings or his problems. Every time he tried to confide in her, she would ignore him or change the subject. Sometimes, he wondered how she could say she loved him. For this reason and others, he had tried to end their relationship a few times over the years. But she either talked him out of it or he changed his mind because he found it easier just to stay with her. He did not think another woman could come to care for him nor did he think he would be able to care for one of the other women of the nobility.

“Zuko?” he heard Mai call out impatiently.

Mai paused as he pushed her hand away and moved away from her. A small frown appeared on her pale features as he stood up and walked toward the door.

“It’s been a hard day. I think I’m going to bed. Good night, Mai,” he stated impassively as he walked out the door without glancing back at her.

With a sigh, he moved away from Mai’s room and silently made his way toward his bedchamber. He greeted his guards that were posted outside his doors as they bowed before he entered his rooms.

In his private bathroom, Zuko quickly submerged himself into the tub filled with hot water. He felt miserable. His muscles relaxed a bit as the water soothed the knots in his body. Water always did calm him down, whether it was when he was at sea or just taking a bath.

Large, cerulean eyes sprang into his mind as he drowsily thought about the soothing water.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

“And then after we helped with their crops, Toph and I decided to visit Kyoshi Island before we arrived here. Then we all decided to come!” Aang smiled broadly as he finished his story of the past few weeks.

“Yeah, we were supposed to have stayed longer, but Twinkletoes here was all impatient to see you again, Sweetness,” Toph snorted as she finished her food.

“I hadn’t seen her for weeks,” Aang replied with a pout, trying to defend himself. He scrunched up his nose at the sea prunes that were passed his way before he turned to smile at Katara. “I just needed to see you,” he said softly as he placed his arm around her shoulders.

Kanna, who sat near the fire, frowned as she listened to the young people. She shook her head as she continued knitting.

“I’m glad to know you wanted to see me, Aang, but you have responsibilities and you can’t just decide to abandoned them when you have a whim,” Katara chided him gently.

Kanna nodded. It seemed the young monk still needed a few more years to grow up. She smiled wryly.

“Yeah, it’s not fair that you should be the only one to do whatever you want. I mean look at Sparky. He’s so determined in his campaign to bring peace and help his country that you don’t see him running off to have a vacation whenever he wants to,” Toph remarked as she picked at her teeth.

“Speaking of that hot-tempered guy, I wonder how he’s doing. I haven’t seen him since four years ago,” Sokka spoke up, talking with his mouth full of food.

Katara’s heart skipped a beat at the mention of Zuko’s name, as it always seemed to do. She could not explain why it happened, but she had begun to notice it ever since they returned from confronting Yon Rha and she began to spend more time with Zuko.

“Oh, I’m sure he’s doing fine. I mean nobody is complaining about his temper,” she laughed lamely as she tried to calm herself down by taking a few more bites of her food.

Toph grinned. “Well, Zuko has changed a lot since the last time you saw him. I mean a lot. At least, that’s what I hear from the giggling servant girls.”

Her grin grew larger as she felt Katara’s heart race even faster before she felt Katara’s annoyance, probably at the mention of the girls.

“I haven’t seen Zuko and Mai for so long I want to cry,” Ty Lee exclaimed as she tried to balance her cup on her head.
Katara paused as she was about to sip her tea and became silent when Ty Lee brought up Mai.

“It would be nice to have a group reunion one of these days,” Suki spoke up. She paused and her cheeks reddened when she felt Sokka’s hand on her knee. He smiled at her innocently when she looked up to narrow her eyes at him.

“Yeah! We should have one when Zuko’s not that busy,” Aang said excitedly.

“I want to see Uncle Iroh, too. I would do anything for a cup of his delicious tea,” Katara said as she looked down at her own bland tea.

“Anything?” Aang asked almost inaudibly.

Nobody seemed to have noticed, but Kanna heard and she hoped she misunderstood.

“Huh?” Katara said as she turned to frown at the young airbender.

“Nothing!” he exclaimed. He blushed in embarrassment as he popped a slice of an apple into his mouth. Such thoughts were unbecoming of a monk! But he was also a hormonal teenager and he could not help it.

“I sure miss the old man. He wasn’t at the Fire Nation Palace the several times me and Aang have gone,” Toph commented.

Just then, Chief Hakoda and Master Pakku arrived at the dining room.

“Oh, I’m glad we ate at Bato’s house or else we would’ve had to go to bed hungry,” Hakoda remarked cheerfully, obviously having drunk red wine, as he noticed the empty plates of food scattered all over the table.

“Yes, it looks like a group of tiger-seals invaded the place,” Pakku remarked dryly, snorting.

“Oh, Gran Pakku, always so funny,” Sokka laughed.
Pakku crossed his arms over his chest and snorted louder.

“But, dear, I recall how much you ate when we were young,” Kanna piped in with a tiny grin.

Pakku uncrossed his arms and cleared his throat.

“Well, you should see the way your son drinks wine! It seems as if he was dying of thirst,” Pakku replied, trying to hide his discomfort.

“It’s not my fault Fire Nation red wine is so good,” Hakoda replied defensively. It had taken him a while to finally accept Pakku as his mother’s new husband, but he respected the old waterbender nevertheless. Hakoda frowned as he added, “By the way, we are running low and the men are anxious for the next ship to come with more supplies.”

“You wouldn’t be running low if you men didn’t drink it like it was water,” Katara stated with a roll of her eyes. “You’re just going to have to slow down until the next Fire Nation cargo ship arrives in a couple of weeks.”

The men complained under their breaths.

“So, what were you young ones talking about before we arrived?” Hakoda asked as he and Pakku sat near the fire with Kanna.

Pakku planted a kiss on her head as he sat beside his wife, but he straightened himself and looked coldly around the room when the others giggled at him.

“We were talking about how great General Iroh’s tea is!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she now balanced a plate on her head.

“I wonder how Iroh is doing,” Pakku mused as he stroked the small beard on his chin. “I have not heard from him since our last White Lotus meeting a year ago.”
“Uncle Iroh wrote me a letter saying he went back to Ba Sing Se after seeing that Zuko could handle himself without him,” Katara informed them as she took a sip from her tea.

“Oh, so that’s the real reason,” Toph said as leaned back in her seat with a grin. “I knew Sparky was lying when he said Iroh went back because he couldn’t stand another day away from his precious teashop. That Sparky, so modest.”

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko did seem like a formidable young man when I first met him,” Hakoda remarked. “Not to mention he risked his life to save my daughter’s own,” he said as he smiled fondly at Katara who smiled back.

“I sure would like to meet that young man again,” Gran-Gran spoke up. She looked up from her knitting to look at Katara, who blushed lightly just like she knew she would. “Of course, this time on better terms,” she added with a chuckle.

“Zuko wasn’t always that modest or heroic, you know. He used to be very arrogant, not to mention he always lost his temper,” Aang muttered with a hint of jealousy over Zuko’s praise. Why did everyone start loving Zuko all of the sudden? It all started ever since Zuko became Fire Lord.

“Yes, but Miss Toph said he has changed greatly,” Kanna replied as she tried to defend the young ruler she had heard so much about despite the way he had invaded their home once years ago. After all, he had rescued her son from that horrible prison and saved her granddaughter’s life.

“Well, he changed when he joined our side. And he didn’t lose his temper that much, now that I think about it,” Suki commented as she tapped her chin with a finger.

The younger people seemed to ponder over her words before they nodded in agreement.

“Yes, but Miss Toph said he has changed greatly,” Kanna replied as she tried to defend the young ruler she had heard so much about despite the way he had invaded their home once years ago. After all, he had rescued her son from that horrible prison and saved her granddaughter’s life.

“Yep, he sure learned a couple of things about being modest and honorable by spending some time with me,” Sokka spoke up playfully as he wiped his mouth almost gingerly.

“Oh, yes. I’m sure he learned how to be honorable because of you and not because of Uncle Iroh, and because you are such a good example, ‘Oh Mighty Warrior Sokka,’” Katara teased.

“Hey!” Sokka exclaimed indignantly as the rest laughed.
Katara smiled as her family and friends continued to banter back and forth.

Beside, it’s not like Zuko ever needed to learn about honor, she mused in her head as she turned to stare at the glowing fire. He was just a bit lost, but he always had it with him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

“It is said that once the raiders finish causing trouble they disappear without a trace,” the messenger explained as he bowed before the Fire Lord, the advisors sitting in their respective places behind him.

“How can that be?” one advisor asked. “Surely the people are so frightened that they started making things up.”

“I don’t believe so,” Chao reasoned. “It is said that there are some earthbenders among them, maybe they just go underground.”

“But when the guards go after them they lose them easily, and they never hear or feel the earth shake, which is common when earthbenders use their element,” replied the solemn messenger. “Besides, it would take a great amount of effort, time, and a lot of noise for such a large group to be submerged underground in a couple of seconds.”

Zuko furrowed his brow in confusion as he listened to what was being said. How can a large group of people disappear out of nowhere?

“I tried to tell you, you idiots, we need to send more troops to the colonies,” Wei spoke up gruffly. “It’s probably the neighboring Earth Kingdom villages, helped by the Earth Kingdom residents in the colonies, and they probably bribed some Fire Nation deserters to side with them. I’m telling you we need to control the rebellious Earth Kingdom residents.”

“No, we are not sending more troops,” Zuko responded firmly, causing the men to look up at him. “We are not going to war, so there is no point on drafting men away from their families to fight something we cannot even trace.”

“Well, we wouldn’t be having this problem, Young One, if you had not made the stupid mistake of calling off the war in the first place,” Wei sneered.
“Say that again and you will regret it, Advisor Wei!” Zuko snapped, narrowing his eyes irritably. He let out a breath to control his temper when the entire room became deadly silent.

Once he was sure he was calm enough, the young lord continued.

“I did make many mistakes in the past, such as siding with Ozai and Azula in capturing and bringing down the Avatar. But fortunately, I caught my mistake just in time and I made up my mind to set everything right when I joined the Avatar and his friends—now my friends also—in defeating my own cruel father and crazed sister. Calling off the war was not a mistake.”

The advisors nodded in approval at the way he defended himself against Wei’s taunting, who only sneered even more, though he remained silent after being chastised in front of the entire Council. The advisors had to admit they were impressed on how much the young Fire Lord had progress over the past four years.

With one final glare, Zuko turned away from Wei and addressed the other men that were patiently waiting for his orders.

“We do need to protect our colonies from these...barbarians, but instead of sending more soldiers we need to set up a stronger protection for the factories and for my people’s homes and safety. We will send more weapons and double the guard duty. We need to set up walls around the cities and whoever enters them shall be inspected carefully. I also think that in order to grow stronger, the people themselves should learn how to protect one another, so we shall set up a training school for benders and non-benders, Fire Nation and Earth Kingdom alike. Should these raiders come again they will see that we are not a weak people and we will defend and protect each other.”

While the attacks are horrific, I will try to make something good out of it, Zuko thought pensively. Now both Fire Nation people and those from the Earth Kingdom can finally come together in order to protect their homes.

The men were silent as they thought about what their lord had said before they turned to each other to discuss the possibilities. Sometime later—after a few heated discussions—they turned their attention back to their Fire Lord in excited agreement.

“We will send architects and engineers to build the walls and we will also send instructors to teach firebending, sword fighting, and hand-to-hand combat. I will see if I can find an earthbender instructor as well,” Zuko continued and nodded when they all agreed.
“The meeting has concluded,” the young Fire Lord announced coolly.

Standing from his throne, Zuko swiftly descended from the dais and parted the fire wall before him. His advisors bowed as he passed them, but he did not pay them much heed as he made his way towards his study a few corridors away.

As he entered the room, Zuko glanced around, taking in the large bookcase filled with scrolls and tomes that covered the entire left wall, a large map of the entire Fire Nation and its colonies on the other, before his eyes landed on his large, dark wood desk resting before a great glass window. Closing the door behind him, Zuko made his way across the room and sat down at his large chair with a sigh before he began to rummage through the pile of scrolls on his desk. A few minutes later, he heard a knock at the door, and with a strained command, he waited to see who was disturbing him.

“You handled yourself very well back there, my nephew,” Iroh praised from the doorway. “I knew I could trust your judgment. I’m so proud of you.” He beamed as he entered the room.

“Uncle!” Zuko exclaimed as he stood up and rushed to clasp the old man’s arm, but Iroh ignored the outstretched arm and hugged his nephew instead.

“I didn’t know you were coming,” Zuko continued after his uncle let him go. “Why didn’t you send me a letter? I apologize for not receiving you at the docks. I didn’t even prepare a welcoming reception.”

Iroh chuckled at his nephew’s uncharacteristic chatter.

“Don’t worry, Prince Zu…I mean, Fire Lord Zuko. I wanted to surprise you. And by the looks of it, I succeeded!” he exclaimed. He seemed proud of himself.

“You have no idea how glad I am you are here, Uncle,” Zuko confessed with a small smile.

“Ah, you don’t know how happy it makes me to know that someone still cares for this old man,” Iroh said with a mock sad look.

“You know there are many who are fond of you, Uncle,” Zuko replied, and then added teasingly, “And I’m sure there are plenty of ladies at Ba Sing Se missing you already.”
The old man sighed dramatically.

“Oh, yes. I feel so horrible leaving them behind. But making sure my nephew is doing well is more important,” Iroh said warmly.

Zuko smiled. He knew he did not have to say much for his uncle to understand how glad he was that he had arrived.

“Come. I’m sure you must be desperate to have some tea after not having any for a few minutes,” Zuko said lightly.

“A few minutes? It has been hours! Not to mention I ran out of ginseng tea on the ship on my way here!” Iroh complained as they made their way out of the study and toward Zuko’s private quarters.

The snow glistened as the sun’s soft rays struck it. Standing silently to the side, Katara watched as Aang played with the Water Tribe children. If it were not for the fact that he was taller, he sometimes could be mistaken for a child. Katara sighed.

“Katara?” she heard her grandmother call from behind her. “Is something wrong, dear?”

“No, Gran-Gran,” Katara answered without turning to look at the older woman as she stopped beside her.

Kanna’s wrinkled brow furrowed in concern at her granddaughter’s quiet reply. She followed Katara’s gaze and frowned when she saw the young airbender. Then her face darkened as she remembered Aang’s subtle remark at dinner the other day.

“Katara?” the old woman began softly, “I know you uphold our rules and traditions concerning young maidens guarding their virtue before marriage, but I am not too sure about Aang.”

Katara turned to face her grandmother with a confused expression. Why was her grandmother talking to her about this?
“Katara?” Kanna looked into her eyes solemnly as she asked, “Has…has Aang made you do anything you shouldn’t or didn’t want?”

Katara’s ears burned as comprehension dawned on her as she stared at her grandmother with a horrified expression.

“Gran-Gran!” she exclaimed in mortification. “How can you say that? Aang’s a monk!”

“Yes, but he is also a hormone-driven, seventeen-year-old boy. I am not saying that he is a bad young man, but I am advising you to be careful. Do not do anything you will regret later and do not let anybody make you do something you do not want,” Kanna advised.

“Don’t worry, Gran-Gran,” Katara replied, slightly embarrassed. “I respect our traditions and I know Aang does too. Everything is fine. There’s nothing to worry about.”

“You can’t lie to me, young lady. I know you have something in your mind. So out with it,” the old water tribeswoman ordered firmly as she placed her hands on her hips.

Katara suppressed a sigh as she returned her gaze to the playing Avatar and the children.

“It’s just that…well, I know I should feel flattered that Aang was so impatient to see me,” Katara began, “but I can’t stop feeling that what he does is wrong, irresponsible.”

“I see,” Kanna said with a nod.

“Gran-Gran? Am I wrong for feeling this way?” the young woman asked as she turned to look at her grandmother with confused eyes.

Kanna was silent for a moment as she regarded her granddaughter.

“No, dear. It just shows how mature you have grown. It shows that you put the well-being of the world over your own selfish needs concerning Aang. But you must also try to understand him, he’s still so young,” she said.
Aang is a good young boy, but what Katara needs is a man, and she needs one now! Or how else will I get great-grandchildren? Kanna thought.

A small grin appeared on her face, causing the wrinkles on her brown skin to seem more profound.

“Yes, but he has to learn that he has responsibilities that can’t just be put on hold,” Katara stated and crossed her arms over her chest.

“Just like Fire Lord Zuko,” Kanna added, eyeing her granddaughter closely.

“Yes, just like Zuko,” Katara agreed with a nod. “Determined, responsible, honorable, dutiful, and…”

“Handsome,” Kanna helpfully slipped in.

“And handsome, yes,” Katara agreed before she blushed as she clamped her mouth with a hand. “No, that’s not what I—”

“So you are saying that the Fire Lord is not handsome?” Kanna taunted innocently.

“No, of course he’s handsome…well, actually the last time I saw him I thought he was, but I haven’t seen him in years, so I don’t know anymore, but from what I’ve heard he is…” Katara rambled on nervously before she clamped her mouth close again.

Kanna only grinned bigger and she held back a giggle. For some time, she had been suspecting that her granddaughter thought more about the young Fire Lord than she realized.

“But that is not the point,” Katara continued as she waved her hand in the air. “The point is that Zuko’s an example of responsibility, that’s all I see,” she finished as she looked back at Aang.

“Yes, I’m sure,” Kanna replied with a smile.
Growing concerned again she said, “Katara, I’m very proud that you care for the well-being of others before your own, but I want you to know that there are times when we must also think of ourselves, of our own happiness. Even if it goes against the wishes of others, because in the end you will only live with regrets and sorrows that can never be fixed.”

Katara did not know what to say to her Gran-Gran’s words, so she only nodded as they made their way back home.

“I never thought I would say this, but I sure did miss your tea, Uncle,” Zuko remarked coolly as he sipped the soothing tea his uncle had brewed.

Across from him, sitting on a cushion beside the low table in his anteroom, his uncle beamed at him.

“Oh, Nephew, it makes me so happy to hear you say that,” Iroh responded with a wide smile. “Chao informed me you have kept up with your training.”

“Yes, I promised myself that I would learn everything there is about firebending,” Zuko responded with a nod.

“Well, it’s not like you have much to learn. You became a master when you trained the Avatar,” Iroh commented as he took a sip from his teacup.

Zuko gave him a small smile.

Iroh’s face then grew serious as he looked down at his tea.

“Has he talked?” he asked quietly.

“No, he hasn’t,” Zuko said darkly, suppressing a growl as his hands clenched around his teacup.

Iroh sighed. His brother was as selfish and cruel as ever.

“And Azula? How is she?”
Zuko let out a long breath.

“The same, she hasn’t changed much. I received the monthly report that she’s very aggressive and curses at everyone that comes her way,” he recounted solemnly.

Seeing Zuko grow into a dark mood, Iroh decided to change the topic.

“Tell me about these raids I heard at the meeting room. It sounds serious,” he said as he poured more tea into his cup.

As Zuko recounted the news, Iroh again frowned into his cup. His nephew was so young and he already had so many things to deal with. If only there was a way for him to help Zuko. Before Iroh had time to open his mouth, a quiet knock was heard at the door.

“Come in,” Zuko ordered as he took another sip of his tea, knowing full well who it was that stood on the other side of the door.

“Hello, General Iroh. I just heard you were here,” Mai greeted in a dispassionate tone as she stepped into the room and sat on the other side of the table.

“Yes, I just arrived a few hours ago, and I could not wait to share tea with my nephew,” Iroh told the young noblewoman.

“I’m sure you would be happy to drink with anybody and anywhere as long as it’s tea,” Mai replied without really looking at him.

Iroh countered smoothly with, “Perhaps you are right about drinking tea anywhere.”

But I sure won’t drink with just anybody, he continued mentally.

The old firebender eyed the noblewoman impassively as she declined some tea when Zuko asked her if she wanted any. It had surprised him when his nephew had sent him a letter a few months ago saying that Mai had moved into the palace, and he was not sure he liked the idea of her living with Zuko.

“So, Uncle, how is the Jasmine Dragon coming along?” Zuko asked. He pointedly ignored the way Mai rolled her eyes.

Iroh smiled mischievously as he turned to his nephew.

“Oh, it’s going great! I have so many customers that I now have to take reservations. Sometimes the waiting list is so long people have to wait for days, even weeks, to get a seat!” He hid a grin when he saw Mai trying to hide a yawn. “One time I was so enchanted by a lovely lady that I almost burned the pastries! It was very amusing, I tell you. I wrote about it to Lady Katara on my last letter,” he added almost casually.

Iroh noticed Zuko perk up at the mention of the waterbending maiden just like he knew he would.

“Does Katara correspond with you often, Uncle?” Zuko asked, trying to sound uninterested as he drank more tea.

“Quite often! She writes the loveliest letters. And her calligraphy is so adorable. I’ll show you one of her letters later,” Iroh replied. “But her writing is not the only virtue she has. She was always a pretty girl. I’m sure that now she has grown into an even lovelier young woman, her birthday was about a month ago, if I recall. What do you think, Nephew?” Iroh asked innocently.

For some reason he could not explain, Zuko felt his body warm slightly as he thought of Katara becoming a woman.

“Uh…I’m sure she has, Uncle,” he replied as he placed his teacup down on the table and looked out the window.

Iroh had to hide his growing grin behind his teacup as he noticed Mai’s irritation over Katara’s praise. It was just so easy to rile her since he knew Mai disliked Katara—even though she tried to hide it—and so he made it a point to remind his nephew of the waterbender every so often. It may be petty, but he did not like Mai that much. She was a cold woman and she was too serious for Zuko, who was already taciturn in his own right. Iroh thought Zuko could do so much better.
“If you would excuse me, I had a long day and I think I will go relax in my room,” Mai excused herself coldly, then in a whisper she addressed Zuko, “If you need anything, I will be waiting.”

Zuko nodded, half listening to her as he turned his attention to his uncle as she exited.

“So, it seems Mai hasn’t changed much during these years,” Iroh remarked nonchalantly as he sipped his tea.

“She has grown taller,” Zuko offered lamely.

“Yes, I can see that, but she is still so…serious,” Iroh put in politely.

Zuko didn’t reply since he could not argue with that.

“So how is your relationship going, by the way?” Iroh asked curiously.

“It’s going fine,” Zuko replied stiffly, returning to his old withdrawn self.

“Have you seen any of your other friends?” the old firebender asked. This seemed to pick his nephew up.

“Well, I saw Aang a few weeks ago for a meeting between some Earth Kingdom governors and me. And Toph visited a couple of months ago, since she sometimes travels with Aang in the Earth Kingdom,” Zuko replied.

“Ah, Miss Bei Fong. I haven’t seen the lovely lady for a long time,” Iroh mused with a smile.

Zuko inwardly grinned as he remembered the little rough earthbender who enjoyed teasing and irritating him. He knew that was just her way for being friendly and it was actually…fun. He sometimes even joined in her little games, though very rarely, mostly so she would leave him alone. That would make her laugh and punch him in the arm as she would say, ‘Not too shabby, Sparky, not too shabby.’
“What about the young Water Tribe Warrior and his Kyoshi girlfriend?” Iroh asked again.

“I haven’t seen either of them since the time we were last in Ba Sing Se,” Zuko replied. “They are also busy reconstructing their homes.”

“I see. So…” Iroh began, trying not to make his curiosity too obvious, “that means you also have not seen the lovely Miss Katara?” The old man could barely hide his amusement as he noticed Zuko flush faintly.

“No, I haven’t seen her either,” Zuko responded, quickly recovering his placid facial expression. “Besides, we are all too busy to be having reunions.”

I was too busy to even attend her birthday party, he added mentally.

Iroh frowned. He began to worry for his nephew. Zuko was still a young man, and instead of having a great time and enjoying his youth, he was burying himself in so much work that even an older man would not be able to handle.

One thing was very obvious: Zuko was not happy.

Well, I shall fix that soon enough, Iroh mused with a twinkle in his eye as a plan began to form in his head.

“So, Nephew, has Lieutenant Jee left to the Southern Water Tribe with the new supplies yet?”

“I promoted Jee to Admiral now. He has proved himself worthy of it. But, no, he is departing tomorrow morning. Why?” Zuko asked suspiciously.

“Oh, I just wanted to have a cup of tea with him before he left. Well, Nephew, I must be getting old since I can barely keep my eyes open,” Iroh said and yawned loudly. “I’ll see you tomorrow morning for practice. Good night.”

Now I need to plan a surprise! he thought excitedly as stood up and made his way to the door.
“Good night, Uncle,” Zuko answered as Iroh left.

He was a bit puzzled that his uncle had not begged him for a game of Pai Sho.

Maybe it's just the long trip that got to him.

But considering it was his witty uncle, Zuko had a feeling he was up to something.

Iroh made his way to the room his nephew had remodeled and had given to him for whenever he visited. There was a huge grin on his face. He told a servant who passed by to ask Admiral Jee to see him. Iroh then entered his room and sat down to write a letter, smiling smugly to himself as he finished and sealed it.

There was a knock on the door and Iroh invited whoever was outside to enter. He looked up as the door opened.

“General Iroh, it is good to see you again,” Jee greeted as he bowed before he crossed the room to grasp the retired general’s arm.

“Jee! You look better than ever,” Iroh chuckled amiably as he squeezed the admiral’s arm. “So I heard Zuko promoted you to Admiral. Congratulations.”

He motioned for the admiral to take a seat on the small table and he immediately poured them both a cup of tea.

“Thank you. I will always be grateful to Fire Lord Zuko for entrusting me with such an honor,” Jee responded respectfully before he smiled, “and I am very proud to serve him.”

Nothing like that haughty imbecile Zhao, Iroh mused.

“I’m glad Fire Lord Zuko has proven himself worthy of such praise,” the retired general said, sipping his tea.
“May I ask why you have called for me?” Jee asked as he took up his own cup and sipped the hot and sweet liquid.

“I heard you also export the Fire Nation’s goods to the Southern Water Tribe,” Iroh began before he saw Jee nod. “So how were you received?”

“Well, there was some tension the first day as we disembarked, but Lady Katara stepped in and helped settle the whole situation,” Jee recounted with a smile. “Now she is the one in charge of the Fire Nation imports in her tribe.”

“Oh, Miss Katara is such a wonderful young lady. Zuko informed me you are leaving to the Southern Water Tribe tomorrow morning,” Iroh said before retrieving the letter that he had finished writing from his pocket.

“Yes, sir, we leave a little after dawn. Do you need anything?” Jee asked as he eyed the letter in the older man’s hand.

“Well, as a matter of fact, I do, Admiral Jee,” Iroh replied with a smile. “You see, I was thinking that since my nephew is working so hard, he needs a little distraction. Therefore, I wrote this letter to Miss Katara hoping that she—that they all come to pay a little visit to Zuko. And I was hoping that you give it to her since you were going over there. It will save this poor old man some time.”

“Of course, General Iroh, it will be my pleasure. And it will make Fire Lord Zuko happy to be around people his own age, around his friends,” Jee said, almost as cheerful as Iroh, except his facial expression remained calm.

“Why, thank you so very much,” Iroh said as he handed the letter to the admiral. “If they accept, I was wondering if you could bring them back with you as soon as possible on your ship since it will be faster.”

Jee readily agreed as he tucked the letter into his armor.

“Good, but I beg you not to say a word of this to my nephew. I want it to be a surprise.” Iroh grinned.
Jee promised not to tell a soul and Iroh nodded with a pleased smile.

“Well, now that that’s settled…how about a game of Pai Sho?”

“Look! The Fire Nation cargo ship has arrived!” one of the Southern Water Tribe lookouts exclaimed.

The women sighed with relief at the prospect of more coal for the cooking fires and more fruit and vegetables. The men cheered at the prospect of more wine and metal.

“Man, I never thought that wine would make the Fire Nation so loved,” Toph joked sarcastically as she heard the commotion while she leaned on Katara’s arm as they made their way to the docks.

“The Fire Nation isn’t loved!” Sokka exclaimed with a sniff. “They’re just appreciated.”

“Oh, Sokka, please,” Katara muttered as she rolled her eyes as they arrived at the frozen pier.

She stood there eagerly, waiting. She watched as Admiral Jee emerged from the ship, but when nobody else seemed to be coming down after him, Katara was again slightly disappointed, which confused her.

Toph, who was hanging onto Katara for support, noticed how the waterbender’s heartbeat, which was previously racing, slowed down dramatically.

“It seems it’s only Jee we’ll be entertaining today,” she heard Sokka say. “Good, that won’t be hard.”

Toph grinned. So, Sugar Queen was expecting someone else, huh?

Katara smiled as the firebender finally spotted them.

“Admiral Jee,” she said, bowing respectfully as he approached them. “I’m glad you have arrived. I hope you and your crew had a safe trip.”
Jee smiled warmly as he returned the bow.

“Yes, thank you, Lady Katara. We brought more of the usual supplies as well as some new things.”

“You did bring new weapons to trade, didn’t you, Jee?” Sokka asked as if he were in charge.

Jee smiled and nodded at the young warrior.

“Well, I’m sure you must be exhausted. I will see that your men are taken care of while we go inside the house,” Katara spoke up.

Jee nodded his gratitude before he ordered his men to unload the cargo.

Zuko watched his uncle as the old man smiled to himself while they ate breakfast. For the past few weeks Iroh had been acting strange, such as going shopping more often (which was saying something) and making sure all the rooms were clean and tidy. Not to mention he kept on chuckling and smiling to himself every time an irritated Zuko retired to his room.

“Uncle? What are you up to?” Zuko asked as he regarded the old man carefully.

“Whatever do you mean, Nephew? I’m just drinking my jasmine tea,” Iroh answered innocently as he raised his cup to show he was speaking the truth.

“He means you’ve been acting strange, General Iroh,” Mai spoke up coldly.

Iroh stiffened at the hard way Mai always said his name.

Well, I guess I had that coming for every time I mentioned Miss Katara, the old man mused with a mental chuckle.

“Oh, it’s nothing to worry about. Don’t mind this old man,” Iroh replied and grinned into his cup when Mai snorted softly.

“Uncle, tell me what you’re up to,” Zuko said again.

But as before Iroh evaded the question by replying, “Patience is a virtue, my nephew. You will find out soon enough.”

“Ah, Admiral Jee, you have no idea how glad we are that you have arrived. We were almost running out of wine. Soon there would have been a riot!” Hakoda exclaimed humorously as they all finished lunch.

Jee only grinned at him.

“So, Admiral Jee,” Katara spoke up, embarrassed by her father’s dumb joke. “How long are you planning to stay?”

“I am planning on leaving tomorrow morning,” Jee answered simply.

“Tomorrow morning?! But you barely arrived from weeks out at sea,” Katara exclaimed, concerned.

“Yes, but I have urgent business to attend to,” Jee responded, though he was grateful for the young water tribeswoman’s concern.

“What business is that?” Aang asked as he played with Momo’s tail while the lemur chattered loudly.

“General Iroh has asked me to take something important to the Fire Nation Palace as soon as possible,” Jee answered, grinning slightly.

“Iroh’s back in the Fire Nation Palace?” Toph piped in as she sat up straight from her previous slouched position.

“Yes, and he asked me to give this letter to you personally, Lady Katara,” the admiral said, finally producing the letter from inside of his chest armor and handing it to her. He eagerly waited for her reaction as well as for the others’.

Katara took the letter eagerly.

What has Uncle Iroh written to me now? she thought as she quickly broke the seal, opening it and reading it out loud.

My Dear Miss Katara,

I hope you find yourself lovely and well as always. As Jee might have informed you, I am visiting the Fire Nation—or more precisely, my nephew. I found out that a few of your other friends are currently visiting the Southern Water Tribe, and so, I also address this letter to them.

“How did he know you guys were here?” Sokka interrupted.

“Shut it, Snoozles, let Sugar Queen finish!” Toph hissed and punched his arm, smirking when he yelped.

As you all know the postwar events have left us all busy, but I believe it has come harder upon my nephew, Fire Lord Zuko. It has a nice ring to it, does it not?

They laughed.

And so seeing that he needs a little break, and that he would probably rather play the tsungi horn than admit it, I want to ask you if you could pay a little visit to cheer him up. Besides, you all need a little break yourselves. You may be wondering why Zuko did not send you an official letter and that is because he does not know, and because it’s not an official visit, it’s a surprise reunion! I hope you will consider it, and if you do accept, Jee will gladly escort you to the Fire Nation on his ship. Well, then, I hope to drink tea and play Pai Sho with you soon.

General Iroh (Dragon of the West)

“Sweet,” Toph said as soon as Katara finished reading.
“I haven’t been to the Fire Nation since forever! I can almost taste the fireflakes!” Sokka exclaimed excitedly while drool practically fell from his mouth.

“I want to go! I do miss home. I can’t wait!” Ty Lee cried out enthusiastically.

Excited chatter resounded throughout the room at the idea of a reunion and a visit to the Fire Nation. But Katara was not listening to what the others were saying.

Go back to the Fire Nation? Meet Zuko again? Katara’s heart raced at the thought of seeing Zuko once more. Why am I even reacting like this?

“Well, I have to see that the ship is ready to depart. We are leaving early in the morning,” Jee told them as he exited with Hakoda, Kanna and Pakku.

“Hurry! We must go pack right now,” Suki instructed.

They all jumped from their seats and started to run towards their rooms to pack, all except for Katara, who was still holding the letter in her hands.

“Katara? Are you all right?” Aang asked as he noticed her sitting there as if in a trance.

“Huh? Oh, yes. I’m fine.”

“It’s okay if you don’t want to go. I’ll tell the others that we—”

“No!” she shouted before she cleared her throat and continued more quietly, “No, I do want to go. I mean…it’s just that I’m excited to see Zu—the Fire Nation Palace again after spending so much time here,” she said, quickly catching her slip.

“Oh. Okay then. We should pack now. Jee said they were embarking early. Do you need any help packing?” Aang smiled mischievously as he leaned forward to kiss her.
Katara pulled back quickly.

“Um…No, I can do it myself,” she said with a small smile as she left the dining room, leaving Aang frowning after her.

Katara quickly made her way through the icy corridors of her home in a daze as she tried to figure out what her reaction to the news meant.

“So, Sweetness,” Toph piped in as Katara reached her room, making the waterbender jump. “Are you excited to see the Fire Nation Palace again or excited to see something else?”

_or someone else?_ the blind earthbender added mentally.

“I’m also looking forward to seeing Uncle Iroh and Zuko again,” Katara answered as she opened her door.

“Me too…me too,” Toph said, grinning widely as she left.

Katara stared after the grinning earthbender with a confused look, but she shrugged as she entered her room and immediately started to look through her clothes and frowned. Most of her clothes were too warm for the Fire Nation weather.

Oh, well. She sighed as she held up a warm parka before she shook her head and placed it back in her drawer.

In a few minutes, she had everything packed. She looked around her room just in case she missed something.

Then her eye caught the silver rose hairpin resting innocently on the nightstand. She walked over to it and picked it up. Chuckling, she remembered the faces of all the other girls as they saw the hairpin. She could not help feeling smug at the other girls’ envious stares, wishing the Fire Lord would give them such a beautiful and expensive gift.

For her previous birthdays, Zuko had always sent a letter and a real rose. She had never seen such beautiful roses before, but she loved them. The dark red flower would always stand out in her white and blue room as it rested in a small vase in her nightstand. But for her nineteenth birthday, he had sent her this rose, one that would not wither away as time went by. One that shone brightly with the sunshine and the moonlight. She did not know why, but after her mother’s necklace, the rose hairpin was her favorite possession.

Katara placed it carefully among her other belongings in her pack. She could not leave it behind.

Zuko could not take it anymore. He hated not knowing what was going on, especially in his own palace.

“Uncle! I demand you tell me what is going on right this instant!” Zuko bellowed as he stormed into his uncle’s room without even knocking.

“What do you mean, Nephew? I told you that it is nothing,” Iroh replied calmly, unaffected by his nephew’s outburst.

“Nothing? You are cleaning the guest rooms and polishing the halls! The servants do not need more work piled on them. Not to mention that I found out you ordered more food for the kitchen than necessary. Don’t tell me it’s so I can eat healthier because I won’t buy that!” Zuko barked.

Then, lowering his head to face Iroh’s own, he added coolly, “Uncle. Tell me. What are you brewing?”

Iroh laughed as he placed down the scroll he had been reading.

“Zuko, you make it sound like I’m planning the end of the world! So what if I ordered the rooms and halls to be cleaned, there is nothing wrong with cleanliness. And the food is just in case something unexpected happens. But as I told you before there is nothing wrong, quite the contrary. Now, calm yourself and tell me about your day.”

Zuko let out a long breath and ran a hand down his face as his uncle poured him some tea.

“I think Azula has gotten worse than she already was. In a way it pains me to see her like that,” he said with a sigh as he sat heavily next to the little table.
Iroh nodded sympathetically, Azula was his niece after all, and Zuko’s only sister.

Putting his head in his hands, Zuko added dejectedly, “I went to see Ozai again today.”

Iroh lifted his eyebrow expectantly.

“He still won’t say anything,” the young man growled out.

Iroh let out a long sigh.

“I feel like I’m running out of time. I don’t know what to do,” Zuko whispered anxiously.

“We knew it wouldn’t be easy, Zuko,” Iroh responded comfortingly. “But Ozai will break one of these days. Just have hope and patience.”

“Hope?! Patience?!?” Zuko roared, slamming his hand on the table, causing the tea to spill. “Dammit! Years have passed, and Agni knows how many more will come and go, before I know where she is! And that…bastard won’t touch his heart to tell his own son where his mother is! His own wife!” Zuko looked down at his uncle, trying to calm himself down, “I don’t know how long I can take not knowing where she is. Without knowing if she is well. Without knowing if she is even…alive.”

Iroh saddened at his nephew’s desperation.

“Zuko,” he said calmly as he placed a comforting hand on his nephew’s tensed shoulder, “I know how hard it is to lose someone. When I lost my wife and my son, Lu Ten, I felt like my world had stopped. But if I had not kept my hopes and spirits up, I probably would have fallen to despair, and I probably would not be here today, with you. Fire Lord Zuko, do not lose hope. You will find a means that will help you find Ursa when you least expect it. Trust me.”

Zuko was silent for a few minutes before he let out another sigh and his shoulders relaxed.

“Thank you, Uncle,” Zuko said in a low, sad voice before he straightened himself.
Iroh patted his shoulder.

“Everything will come out fine in the end, Zuko, you’ll see.”
The sun was bright in the sky as the Fire Nation ship sailed over the blue ocean. Weeks had passed since they left the Southern Water Tribe. Getting to the Fire Nation would have taken longer if they had ridden on Appa all the way, since a ship did not need rest.

Leaning against the ship’s railing, Katara inhaled the salty ocean breeze.

Frantically, the gang had rushed to get their things packed and ready before the ship departed. Sokka left instructions for the production of his inventions and Master Pakku had agreed to substitute Katara’s waterbending class.

Looking at the sea, Katara remembered saying their goodbyes to the tribe. Kanna had approached her grandchildren and said, ‘Have fun, enjoy yourselves, and remember to cover up when it gets chilly.’

‘Gran-Gran, it’s the Fire Nation! We won’t suffer from frostbite. Don’t worry your pretty, white head,’ Sokka had said and laughed when Kanna scowled at him.

Then turning towards Katara, she had continued, ‘Say hello to the Fire Lord for me, Katara. And do whatever you can to cheer him up.’

Katara looked over the calm sea as she puzzled over this. Why was Gran-Gran all of the sudden interested in Zuko? And why will she tell her to cheer him up?

Appa groaned contently as he lay on a big pile of hay on the ship’s deck as it made its way. Apparently, riding on a ship without having to fly for days made him happy.

“Yes, I know, buddy, but don’t get too used to it,” Aang said as he rubbed his large friend’s nose. Appa only grunted in reply before he let out a wide yawn.

“How much longer are we gonna take?” Katara heard her brother complain. “It’s been weeks. I want some food!”
“Sokka, you’re already getting fed well,” Suki told him, putting an arm around his so she could lean on him. Her face looked a little pale.

“Yeah, but I want some real food not ship food!” Sokka explained as he wrapped his arm around her.

Katara rolled her eyes at his words just like the others did.

“I feel sorry for the palace cooks. They will probably quit their jobs in a few weeks,” Aang quipped.

“I say a few days,” Toph drawled and grinned, making them all burst into laughter.

Sokka only scowled and raised his chin.

Ty Lee sighed as she added, “No, but seriously, you guys, I can’t wait to see my home again. And Mai, too!”

“Oh, yeah. Mai, the dull, dagger-throwing girl. Hope she doesn’t mind us coming because we are going to have a blast!” Sokka exclaimed as he began to count all the activities that they could do once they arrived.

Jee appeared as Sokka counted activity number nine.

“We will be arriving at the Fire Nation capital tomorrow. I advise you to get your things ready,” Jee told them, then smiling, he added, “I’m glad you accepted to visit Fire Lord Zuko. He has been working too hard for such a young man.”

“Well, glad you called! We’re the best at having fun!” Sokka said as he began to recount his list while the rest groaned.

Tomorrow? We will arrive at the Fire Nation Palace tomorrow? Katara thought to her herself. In just one day I will see Zuko again. Her heart raced before she frowned once more at her reaction.
“Aang! You want to practice waterbending? I haven’t practiced since we left the Southern Water Tribe,” Katara called out in order to avoid her confusing thoughts—thoughts that seemed to be recurring a lot lately.

“Well, Suki, let me help you pack,” Sokka spoke up. Both of them were grinning as they made their way to her room.

“Sure thing, Katara,” Aang answered happily as he wrapped his arms around her and leaned down to kiss her.

“She said waterbending practice not kissing practice, Twinkletoes,” Toph called out, a bit annoyed.

Katara thanked her silently as Aang moved away with a sheepish grin.

Zuko looked at himself in the mirror as he finished shaving, checking to see if he had missed any spots and pushing his short hair out of his eyes. Then his gaze settled on his scar, the only place where he did not have to worry about shaving.

He used to always get upset every time he would see his scarred face in a mirror, but now he had learned to accept it—well, at least a little bit. It was a part of who he was and where his destiny began. Besides, it appeared that not everyone was disgusted by it. At least one person in particular—one with blue eyes—was not.

He had never let anyone touch his scar, pulling back like when Song tried to, or more often, nobody wanted to touch it, like Mai. However, it was different with Katara, he allowed her to touch it and she wanted to.

Zuko’s fingers traced the edge of the rough skin. He remembered the way she had softly touched it, her thumb resting on his lips, when they were under Ba Sing Se. She did not seem repulsed by it. She actually had kept her fingers there for a few moments before they were interrupted.

‘Maybe you could be free of it. I have healing abilities,’ she had said. Even if not literally, she did in a way heal him.
Zuko sighed as he lowered his hand. Her touch had felt good…comforting.

Why am I thinking about her? Again, he asked himself with a shake of his head.

He left the grand bathroom, put on his training pants, and then a light tunic, he usually practiced shirtless since it got very hot while he trained. Once he was ready, he headed out of his bedchamber and passed his anteroom just as one of the doors to his chambers opened.

“Zuko, where are you going?” Iroh asked as he closed the large door behind him.

“To train, Uncle,” Zuko replied as he made his way towards the door.

“But you can’t go! You will get all exhausted and sweaty!” Iroh exclaimed, pushing Zuko back into his antechamber.

“That’s what happens when you are training hard,” Zuko answered in an annoyed tone. Sometimes he doubted his uncle’s sanity.

“But you can’t greet your guests like that! Go change,” Iroh persisted.

“Guests? What are you talking about, Uncle?” Zuko asked, moving towards the door again, now confused and irritated.

“Well, the Avatar and his friends, of course,” Iroh said as if stating the obvious.

“What?!” Zuko exclaimed as he whirled around to face his uncle, a gleam of hope in his eyes.

“Oh, did I forget to tell you?” Iroh asked innocently. “Jee sent me a message stating they will arrive today.”

Today? And you tell me now? Zuko fumed, but deep down he could feel excitement building, something he had not felt for a long time.
I’m going to see Katara again! At least I hope she’s come too, he mentally exclaimed before he frowned and shook his head.

“I wanted it to be a surprise. And as usual, it worked. Surprise!” Iroh said as he beamed, rather proud of himself.

“So, this is what you’ve been hiding and making a bustle over, isn’t it?” Zuko asked as he quickly returned to his bedchamber.

“Ah, Nephew, always so perceptive,” Iroh said with an amused chuckle.

Zuko resisted the urge to roll his eyes as he search for something to wear.

“Well, enough chitchat and put on some clothes,” Iroh ordered. “You surely cannot greet them in just your training pants. I’m sure some ladies will be very uncomfortable. And distracted.”

The old firebender laughed as Zuko’s good ear reddened.

“There it is! I see it!” Ty Lee cried out as she jumped around the deck of the ship.

“Wow, I never actually looked at it before. It’s amazing,” Suki breathed out as they neared the Fire Nation Capital port.

“I’ve heard it’s even more amazing since Zuko ordered for the restoration of the cities’ old buildings,” Toph informed them proudly.

Katara’s pulse quickened as they drew closer. This is it. We are finally here.

At the dock, Zuko calmly gazed at the approaching ship, even though inwardly he felt somewhat nervous.
This is it. They’re finally here. After almost four years, he was going to finally see his friends again.

“Why are they taking so long to get here?” he demanded irritably.

“The ship is actually going at normal speed, Zuko,” Mai said as she looked at the ship without interest.

“Things seem to always go slow when one is impatient,” Iroh said to Zuko, “Especially since you are so impatient to see Kat—your friends again.” He grinned as Zuko flushed slightly at his ‘slip’.

Mai only yawned and checked the small daggers up her sleeves. Iroh looked at his nephew in alarm, but Zuko only shrugged.

“Look there’s Mai! And Iroh!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she leaned against the side of the ship, her long hair whipping around her.

“Wow, look at Zuko!” Suki exclaimed as she pointed ahead. Sokka grumbled at her enthusiasm.

Katara followed Suki’s arm pointing at the three figures standing on the dock along with some guards and curious citizens standing a few feet behind them.

She stared in amazement as her eyes settled on Zuko. He had grown much, much taller. His black hair was pulled back by his fire crown and he was wearing a slightly formal black and red robe and armor. He had really changed into quite a young man, she mused. His shaved, chiseled jaw had a fine structure. His nose and his one good eyebrow were even more defined and his scar only added to his complexion. He looked so regal; the very picture of a true Fire Lord.

Katara’s heart skipped a beat as she noticed his smile. It was not a wide one, but it was genuine… warm.

Oh, he is so very handsome, she thought before she blushed as she remembered her conversation with Gran-Gran.

She was brought back to reality as she noticed Mai put her arms through Zuko’s before he turned to look at the tall woman. Katara backed away from the railing, ashamed of herself for thinking in such a way. She raised her hand to clasp her necklace only to meet her skin. She panicked when she felt that it was not there. She looked around herself, hoping it had fallen near her, then remembering she left it on her bed as she bathed and changed. She ran to the room she had occupied on the ship.

“Mai!” Ty Lee yelled as she jumped off the ship before the crew even lowered the ramp.

“Ty Lee? I didn’t know you were coming.” Mai said in her usual voice, but with a soft smile on her face. She calmly returned the hug the enthusiastic acrobat gave her as soon as she had approached her. They talked with each other while the rest greeted the young Fire Lord.

“Zuko! How are you?” Aang exclaimed as he jumped off and floated toward the young man with Momo chatting excitedly behind him.

Sokka, Suki, and Toph walked down the ramp and quickly made their way toward the group.

“Iroh!” Toph exclaimed as she stomped towards the kind old man, giving him a bear hug, and then whispering, she said, “What took you so long?”

Iroh only chuckled as he patted her head.

Finding her necklace, Katara raced back toward the deck and then the ramp, stopping below it. She looked at the group and noticed that Aang barely came up to Zuko’s shoulder and would probably stay that way.

“I am glad that you have agreed to visit us,” Zuko said, bowing towards Sokka and Suki, trying to contain his sudden excitement.

“Oh, come now, Zuko, enough with the formal crap!” Sokka exclaimed, then grinning he yelled, “Group hug!”

Zuko stiffened slightly as Aang, Toph, Sokka, Suki, and even Iroh, surrounded him. Finally catching up, Katara smiled in amusement as she saw Zuko stiffen the same way he did when they shared a group hug back at the royal beach house on Ember Island before the war ended. The crowd laughed quietly behind their hands as they watched what was happening.
“Uh…thanks?” Zuko said uncomfortably as he resisted the urge to throw them all away from him. He had never been comfortable with such displays of affection.

Wait. Something is missing, he thought with a frown.

Iroh pulled back and watched with amused eyes as Zuko looked above the heads of the others.

Where is Katara? Zuko mentally asked as a pang began to form in his chest. Is she even here? Did she come? I shouldn’t have gotten excited. I shouldn’t have—

Zuko’s golden eyes widened as he finally saw her. Katara was standing behind the others, her hands clasped placidly before her. She had grown taller, her brown hair in a loose bun, her trademark hair loops framed her face. She was wearing light blue clothes just like the one she wore at the end of the war, but these clothes defined the curves of her body even more.

Her height was not the only thing that had grown during these years, he observed with heated eyes. She had lovely, wide hips, a thin waist, and defined breasts. Zuko blinked.

Oh, yes, definitely a lovely, young woman, he mused, but then berated himself for such ungentlemanly thoughts.

His heart raced faster as his eyes settled on her face. She had dark, long eyelashes, a petite nose, and plump lips. Oh, but her lovely smile and her beautiful, blue eyes were what really caught his attention and took his breath away.

Oh, she’s beautiful, he sighed wistfully.

He was brought out of his reverie as the group finally let him go to talk to Iroh and he mentally shook his head to clear his thoughts. He had never been rendered speechless by a beautiful woman before so what made Katara different? Clearing his throat, he walked over to her a bit nervously, though he hid it well. It would not do for the Fire Lord to act foolishly in front of his subjects.

Toph touched Iroh’s arm and both grinned.
Calm yourself. Don’t do anything stupid. You are the Fire Lord, Zuko commanded himself as he stepped regally up to her.

“Hello, Katara…I’m glad you’re here.”

Zuko cursed his lame greeting.

“I’m glad to be here, too, Zuko,” Katara replied as she smiled at him.

Zuko stifled a sigh of relief.

“So, I—” Zuko started but stopped when Katara suddenly wrapped her arms around him in a hug.

“Um…I…hm…”

“Well, everybody got to hug you, so it’s my turn,” the Water Tribe woman replied with a giggle.

Don’t just stand there, you idiot! Hug her back! Zuko heard a voice in his head that sounded so much like Toph yell.

You don’t have to tell me twice! Zuko argued back.

Zuko felt his pulse race as he placed his arms around her feminine waist, amazed at how great it felt to have her body pressed against his. Katara blushed despite herself as Zuko returned the embrace, his strong, muscular arms surrounding her. Both remembered the first time they had hug like this, when they had returned from searching for the murderer of Katara’s mother. When Katara had finally forgiven Zuko.

As they stood there for a while, the crowd began to murmur, speculating about the reasons why the Fire Lord and the master waterbender were embracing so long. Could it be that something had happened between them during their time together during the war? Many were intrigued at the scandalous possibilities. Zuko and Katara did not notice the commotion they were eliciting until Mai stepped in and interrupted them. The dark-haired noblewoman quickly pulled Zuko back, ignoring the way he glared indignantly at her.
“It sure is a surprise to see you again, Katara,” she said, her voice cool and emotionless.

Katara only smiled. “It’s great to see you, too, Mai.”

“So, Sparky, did you miss me?” Toph asked as she stepped between Zuko and Mai, ignoring the way Mai huffed at her. “Be honest now.”

Zuko smiled down at her. “You have no idea how much, Toph. I was depressed for weeks.”

Toph punched his arm.

“Oh, shut it, you,” she snorted with a silly smile on her face.

Katara smiled. She could see that they really got along well.

“By the way, I like the color of your clothes. It brings out the color of your eyes,” Toph remarked.

Zuko snorted amusedly.

“I’m sure you do, Toph,” he responded casually.

Katara grinned, too.

Zuko isn’t that stupid, she thought.

“Damn. I’ll get you next time!” Toph said, chuckling. “I shouldn’t be comparing you to Snoozles, here.”

“Hey!” Sokka protested as he turned around to glare at the blind earthbender.
They laughed while Zuko gave him a small sympathetic look.

“Don’t you guys get tired of making fun of me all the time?” the Water Tribesman groused.

“Hmm? Nope!” Toph replied with a chortle just as everybody else, except Zuko, laughed.

Sokka scowled at them all and crossed his arms over his chest.

Just then, the crowd gasped when they saw the ten-ton, flying sky-bison land beside their young lord. The guards stood nervously by, but Appa only poked his tongue out of his mouth and licked Zuko’s face, causing the spectators to relax and laugh lightly.

“Great,” Zuko grumbled as he wiped the drool from his face, then rubbing Appa’s nose he said, “Missed me already, huh?”

Appa groaned in reply.

Not wanting to be left behind, Momo landed on Zuko’s right shoulder and nuzzled him. Zuko stroked the lemur’s large ears.

“Well, all I need is for the Unagi to come and give me a pat on the back,” the firebender said impassively.

The rest laughed and Zuko frowned since he had not meant to be funny.

“Now I understand why you ordered so much food, Uncle,” Zuko whispered to Iroh as they all sat for dinner. Zuko grinned mentally as he watched the other two boys eat.

Sokka and Aang devoured everything in sight with Aang mostly getting the vegetable plates—of course he ate a bit more carefully than the blue-eyed warrior did.
Yes, just like old times.

“Ooh, this is good…I like this…Ah, I missed this…Ahh, too hot…Spicy chicken!” Sokka kept exclaiming as he stuffed food into his mouth.

Katara and Suki’s faces were red with embarrassment. Mai had a look of pure disgust on her face.

“You guys…slow down,” Katara told them with a scowl.

“It’s alright, Miss Katara. It makes me glad to know that our food is greatly appreciated,” Iroh reassured the girls.

Aang and Sokka grinned broadly at him with mouths still full of food and kept on eating.

“Yeah, girls, calm down. We can’t help it,” Sokka said as he refilled his cup with more red wine, “Missed this, too.”

Zuko smiled as he surveyed the people around him. They were eating in the royal family dining room, which he had not used since his mother’s disappearance and his banishment. It felt nice to use it again, especially with his friends.

Katara stared at her plate, having lost her appetite at the sight of the two stuffing their faces like they had not seen food for ages. She glanced to where Zuko sat at the head of the table. Unlike Aang and her brother, Zuko ate slowly. He actually took the time to chew his food before he swallowed. And he always took small bites, not like the other two who stuffed their mouths so full they looked like weasel-chipmunks. She did not know why, but Zuko’s eating habits pleased her.

Sensing someone looking at him, Zuko looked up to see Katara staring at him. She smiled before quickly looking away. He frowned in confusion as he watched her push her food around in her plate.

“So, Miss Katara,” Iroh spoke up as he saw her blush. “How are your students coming along?”

Katara smiled proudly as she turned to face the retired general.
“They’re progressing very well and they learn very fast. I wonder how they’re doing with Master Pakku,” she mused with a giggle.

Aang smiled at her and Iroh laughed as he exclaimed, “Those poor children! They will be worked so hard they will be waterbending in their sleep!”

They laughed loudly while Zuko smiled as he silently sipped from his wine cup.

“Well, now, I am sure you young people must be tired, so off to bed now!” Iroh proclaimed, clapping his hands. It was indeed very late. The sun had set a long time ago.

Zuko smiled as they all complained.

“But, Iroh we are not—” Aang began as he tried not to yawn.

“Now, now, you have all day tomorrow to enjoy yourselves. You all need a goodnight’s rest so you will be up early fresh and energized,” Iroh told them.

They all stood up reluctantly. Sokka stuffed more food in his mouth as he moved away from his chair.

“Let me escort you to your rooms,” Iroh continued with a grin.

He ignored the way Zuko eyed him suspiciously.

The old firebender led the way to the western side of the palace. Turning to one of the guest wings, he stopped at the first door.

“Here is your usual room, my dear Miss Toph,” he said, opening the door for the earthbender.

“Yeah, well, good night everybody,” Toph yawned loudly and stepped inside, slamming the door behind her.

“This is your room, Miss Suki,” Iroh announced as they approached the second room.

He opened it for her. Sokka peered inside and smiled mischievously as he turned to his girlfriend. Suki kissed him good night and went inside. As the rest walked on further down the hall, Ty Lee entered the next room happily.

“Your room, Miss Katara, is between Ty Lee’s and Mai’s. And if you keep going straight all the way to the end of this hall, and then make a right turn to the next corridor you will find my room and then, finally, Zuko’s royal bedchamber,” Iroh said with a twinkle in his eye.

Zuko felt his ears burn at his uncle’s words. Why was his uncle telling Katara where his room was located?

“Oh, uh…thank you,” Katara said with a small smile.

Aang frowned.

“Why will Katara need to know that?” he asked.

Iroh only shrugged innocently. “Oh, you know, just in case you need any help or something.”

“Where will Aang and I sleep?” Sokka asked, looking down the hall, hoping to see another room.

“Ah, well you boys will sleep in the previous corridor.” Iroh grinned when Sokka frowned. He led Aang and Sokka back the way they came from after they all bid each other good night.

The waterbender stood uneasily with Zuko and Mai outside her room. Mai seemed to be ignoring her, but Katara noticed that Zuko had an intense look as he stared at her. He seemed to be doing that a lot lately and Katara wondered why that was. Thought she had to admit she could not stop her eyes from glancing at him whenever she thought no one was looking.
“Well, then, good night,” she told them before she turned to smile at Zuko. “And thanks again for receiving us,” she said as she opened her door.

“You’re welcome. Good night, Katara,” Zuko answered as he stared after the young waterbender, smiling when she turned back to smile at him again before she closed the door.

He tensed when Mai grabbed his arm and pulled him towards her room.

“You must be cold, Zuko,” she murmured as she began to pull on his robe.

Zuko’s one eyebrow lifted as she began to kiss his neck. He frowned. She had never done such a thing before. She knew he hated to show any physical contact in public. Besides, all he could think about was that Katara was next door.

“I’m not cold at all, thanks. Good night, Mai.” He pulled away quickly, trying to hide his discomfort so as not to hurt her feelings.

“But, Zuko—” Mai began as a small frown appeared on her pale face.

“I’ll see you tomorrow,” Zuko told her as he briefly kissed her cheek.

Then he quickly turned to go to his bedchamber. All the way thinking, She’s here. Katara is finally here. They are all here.

As Katara entered her room, she surveyed her surroundings. The room was mostly a soft red and cream colored, with a marble floor, and she had a bathroom, which was a nice perk. It was impressive.

Noticing her bag next to the bed, she moved towards it. Unpacking her clothes which, she noted irritably, were too warm for this weather, she began to place them in the dresser. After she finished, she looked around the room again and noticed that there was a wooden closet on one side of the wall and walked toward it. She opened one door and peered inside, as expected, it was empty. She guessed it was for her clothes as well. A small laugh escaped her since she barely filled the top part of the dresser with the clothes she brought!
Changing into her too warm sleeping clothes, she reached her hand inside her bag to retrieve her hairbrush. As she pulled it out something fell to the floor with a soft ‘clink’. Looking down with a frown, she gasped and quickly grabbed the hairpin. She examined it carefully to see if it was damaged.

“Stupid. How could you have forgotten about it?” she berated herself. “I would never have forgiven myself if I lost it.”

What would Zuko say if he found out she lost the gift he gave her?

Sighing with relief after seeing it was not damaged, she headed for her bed. She pushed the blanket aside and settled herself on it. It was soft and comfortable, and slightly bigger than her bed back home.

Looking at the rose hairpin in her hand, she thought about the day’s event. They were finally in the Fire Nation after four years, after finally defeating the ruthless Fire Lord Ozai. She never would have thought that she would feel this pleased just being here, especially after being afraid for so many years of the country that had harmed her family and so many people.

Glancing at the small window in the room, she smiled. Iroh was still wise, jolly, and silly. And as for Mai…she was still tall, thin, and serious.

And Zuko.

Zuko…

She felt herself blush. Toph was right. He had really changed in every sense of the word. Well, at least physically. She was sure that as the years went by he would still be a very handsome man. Perhaps even more.

I wonder how he will look years from now, she mused before she shook her head.

Katara set the hairpin gently down next to her nightstand before she covered herself with the soft blanket as she prepared to sleep. But her thoughts would not let her go that easily. She felt her cheeks flush as she remembered Zuko’s warm, muscular arms around her waist as they embraced earlier that day. It had felt nice and…right.
“No! Stop! I can’t be having these thoughts! We’re just friends,” she told herself firmly. “Besides, I’m with Aang and…Zuko’s with Mai… Just like it’s supposed to be…”

Warm light fell on Katara’s face. She frowned as sleep began to leave her. She let out a small yawn as she slowly opened her eyes and startled herself fully awake. With a frown, she looked around the unfamiliar room that greeted her. She took in the red and cream colors and the decorations on the walls. Then noticing her half-unpacked things next to the dresser, everything that happened the previous day came back to her. They were back in the Fire Nation Palace after many years. They had come to visit Zuko.

“Zuko,” she said with a smile as she pulled the warm covers away and quickly got out of bed.

She glanced toward the light that poured into the room from the window and gasped once she noticed the brightness of the day. She had overslept!

“Great. Now everybody will think I can’t handle a long journey,” she muttered as she turned away from the window.

Katara ran to her dresser, rummaged through it for a minute, and pulled out her clothes before she raced to the bathroom. It took her a moment to figure how to work the unfamiliar bathtub, but once she got it she quickly took a bath, using her waterbending to hurry things along.

A few minutes later, the waterbender left her room and walked toward the guest room Suki had been given. With a smile, she raised her hand and knocked, but her smile turned into a frown when she received no answer. With a small shrug, she walked further down the corridor to Toph’s room. Considering the rough earthbender, Katara was sure Toph would still be in bed. She knocked and the same result followed. She frowned. Where was everybody?

“If they had gone off without me, there will be hell to pay,” the waterbender grumbled as she made her way down the hall. She glanced back over her shoulder.

I could always check Zuko’s room…

No. He probably had been awake since dawn, being a firebender and all.
She kept on walking down the golden corridor for a while as something dawned upon her that made her pause. She had no clue where to go or where she was since it had been almost four years since she had been in the palace.

“Come on, Katara, where is your head?” she scolded herself.

Katara wandered for some time hoping to find the others or at least a servant that could direct her to where her friends were, but she did not encounter one single person. It almost felt like she was the only one there.

I forgot how big the palace really is, she thought, And impressive, too.

She admired the beautiful vases on golden pedestals and the magnificent decorations on the walls. Such grandeur overwhelmed her since her home was much simpler, albeit still beautiful and elegant. Stopping to admire a stunning golden vase with crimson and black swirls that resembled dragons, Katara gazed at it in wonder for a moment before she noticed a rather chubby, old man huffing his way towards her. She smiled at him, about to ask him where the others were when the man scowled menacingly and started to yell at her.

“Who are you? What are you doing here? If you came to steal something, you are doing a terrible job!” he barked, his large belly shaking as he waved his hands in the air.

Katara stared at the man in disbelief.

“What? I’m not a thief!” she defended herself as she placed her hands on her hips. Who does this jerk think he is?

“Guards! Guards! Throw this wench into the prison tower!” he yelled as he looked frantically around them.

She backed away a step from the man and whirled around, although she hated to run away. I have to find Zuko or maybe Iroh!
But the old man grabbed her arm before she could advance and stopped her. Katara glared at him as she tried to pull away.

“Let me go!” she hissed as her other hand reached for her waterskin.

The old man sneered as he said, “You will not escape, you little—”

“Wei, you fool! Let the girl go!”

Katara turned at the new voice and saw an old man with long, white hair approaching them quickly, a deep frown on his wrinkled face.

“This woman was trying—” the fat, old man began as he dug his fingers into her arm, making her wince.

“She was trying nothing!” the other man interrupted. “Do you even know who this woman is? She is a master waterbender, daughter of Chief Hakoda from the Southern Water Tribe,” he continued, then with a small grin he added, “Not to mention one of Fire Lord Zuko’s closest friends, whom I’m sure will be most displeased when he finds out you have disrespected his guest.”

Katara wrenched her arm away from the man that still had a hold on her arm before she moved closer to the other one—who apparently was on her side—and smirked.

The large, old man eyed her for a moment before he snorted dismissively as he turned around and left without another word.

Well, so much for an apology, Katara thought angrily as she rubbed her arm.

“I apologize for that,” the white-haired man began, “Wei has always been a…”

“Jerk,” she filled in before she turned to smile at him. “Thank you for helping me.” She bowed. “I’m most grateful.”
The old man smiled and bowed as well as he said, “You’re welcome, Lady Katara. I am Chao, one of Fire Lord Zuko’s advisors and friend of General Iroh. May I ask what are you doing here in this part of the palace?”

Katara reddened in embarrassment.

“Well, you see I…I kind of…got lost,” she admitted sheepishly.

Chao chuckled deeply, reminding her of Iroh.

“I figured as much,” he admitted. “The palace is very immense. Come, I will take you to the royal family dining room where everyone is waiting for you to join them for breakfast.”

Katara smiled at the kind, old man. “Thank you.”

Zuko looked anxiously at the entrance door to the dining room.

_Is Katara all right? I should have sent someone for her_, he thought.

He tapped his fingers on the smooth table. Breakfast was supposed to have started an hour ago and there was still no sign of the waterbender.

Sitting on the young Fire Lord’s right side, Iroh glanced at Zuko’s face and then at his hands. He smiled as he noticed his nephew’s restlessness as he also waited for the young lady to make an appearance.

From the end of the long table, Toph reclined in her chair lazily while a grin appeared on her face. She could feel the firebender’s anxiety from her spot! She had felt the way Zuko and Katara’s hearts had raced wildly as they embraced each other at the docks the previous day. As much as she cared for Aang and did not want to see him hurt, Toph knew, since a long time ago, that Katara and Zuko had started to develop feelings for one another, even if they did not know it yet or did not want to admit to it.

_Well, I’ll guide them through the right path. They just need a little boost._ She grinned even more “Where’s Katara? She’s never this late,” Aang said with a frown as he stood up. “I’m going to look for her.”

“Relax, Twinkletoes. It’s Katara you’re talking about. She’s fine…See, I told you,” Toph said as the door opened to reveal the one in question talking to an old man.

“Katara, where were you? We’re starving,” Sokka teased, but deep down he sighed with relief.

“I’m sorry, you guys, I was just a bit…sidetracked,” Katara told them with a small shrug as she walked to the table and sat down.

“I’m sorry, you guys, I was just a bit…sidetracked,” Katara told them with a small shrug as she walked to the table and sat down.

“Sidetracked? What happened? Are you okay?” Aang began to bombard her with questions as he grabbed her hand in worry.

_La! I can take care of myself!_ Katara thought with an annoyed huff while she gave the young monk a light pat on his hand to calm him down.

Standing at the entrance, Chao spoke up as he looked at Zuko.

“She was a bit detained by Advisor Wei, my lord.”

“Wei?” Zuko said with narrowed eyes. If Wei was involved then that meant nothing good. Then looking at Katara he asked, “Are you alright? Did he bother you?”

Mai raised her thin eyebrows as she heard the concern in Zuko’s voice before she glared across the table at Katara. Iroh and Toph inwardly smiled.

“No, it’s fine. I’m all right. Chao here, helped me,” Katara answered, annoyed and at the same time glad for their concern. “Let’s eat. Hmm, this looks delicious,” she said with a large smile, hoping to change the subject.
Zuko looked away from the waterbender to raise an eyebrow at Chao and give him a look that said ‘You will tell me everything later’. Chao bowed and retreated.

“Well, Sugar Queen, for a minute there I thought you just overslept.” Toph grinned as she popped a piece of fruit into her mouth.

Katara glowered at her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After breakfast, the young men made their way toward the komodo rhinoceros’ stables.

“What’s that guy doing?” Sokka asked as he pointed at a man riding what looked to be a crazed komodo rhino.

Zuko turned to see where the warrior was pointing to.

“Oh, that’s called komodo bull riding,” he explained. “It’s basically riding an unbroken komodo rhino and trying to hold on without being thrown or trampled on.”

“Why would you do that?” Aang asked him excitedly as another man tried after the first one flew off the animal’s back.

“Well, it’s a way to train the animals in order for them to get used to being ridden. But it’s more of a game, a way for men to test their skills and their bravery,” Zuko informed them as they watched the second man get thrown off.

“That’s awesome!” Sokka exclaimed as he began to make his way toward the ring with Aang trailing after him with excited steps. Zuko and his two personal guards followed at a more sedate pace.

Seeing the Fire Lord approaching, the stablemen stopped what they were doing and bowed before him. Zuko nodded at them in acknowledgement and asked how the new komodo rhinos were progressing.

“We have broken all of them in, my lord. This one is the last one,” an older man answered as he jerked his thumb toward the rhino pacing agitatedly in the ring.

Zuko nodded at him as he looked over at the angry beast. He remembered the old man as being the one in charge of the komodo rhinos on his ship when he had been the banished Fire Prince.

They watched as man after man tried to ride it, but the animal would not even give them the chance to settle down on its back. One man was unfortunate enough to be slashed with one of its sharp horns before he was rushed to the infirmary.

“He’s very stubborn,” the stableman said, then with a smile, he addressed Zuko, “My Lord, I’ve seen you komodo bull ride before and you were great at it. Maybe you could do it?”

“You have komodo bull ridden before?” Aang asked excitedly as he looked up at the frowning Fire Lord.

“Well… I did when I turned sixteen. You could say it was like… an initiation rite,” Zuko answered with a passive look on his face.

“Cool. It’s just like ice-dodging,” Sokka piped in before he turned to grin at Zuko who narrowed his eyes warily at him. “Well, then, let’s see your super skills.”

“I don’t know. It’s been so long since I’ve ridden an unbroken komodo rhino,” Zuko told them with a small frown.

“Ah, come on, Zuko! Show us how it’s done,” Aang encouraged him, almost jumping with enthusiasm.

Zuko frowned at the young monk, but sighed mentally when Aang looked at him with large, hopeful eyes. He could still see the twelve-year-old boy he first met when Aang did that.

“Fine,” Zuko relented quietly as he stepped inside the ring. It had been a long time since he had had a bit of fun, anyway.

“My lord, are you sure?” one of his personal guards asked him.
Zuko gave them another reassuring nod as he waved their concern away.

“Don’t worry. I’ll be fine. Get the komodo rhino out here,” he ordered.

Katara and Suki tried to stifle their yawns as they, along with Toph, Mai, and Ty Lee, drank tea in one of the sitting rooms. They have been in the same room for about an hour, listening to Ty Lee gossip with Mai who only answered in one-word sentences.

When Mai and Ty Lee were not looking, Toph turned to the other two women.

“Miss Gloom sure isn’t a good hostess, huh?” she mumbled under her breath.

Suki and Katara smirked behind their cups of tea.

“Hey, not that this isn’t great,” the blind earthbender spoke up sarcastically, “but can we go outside?”

“Yeah, Mai! We’re near the komodo rhino stables, let’s show them!” Ty Lee told her tall friend as she jumped excitedly. Even though Mai was her friend, she could not stand being so serious.

Mai glared at them coldly before she conceded with a raised chin. They left the sitting room and made their way outside towards the stables and Toph let out a sigh when her feet touched the soil. They looked up when Iroh and Chao approached them and greeted them all cheerfully.

“I hope your day has been…interesting so far,” Iroh said with a grin.

“You have no idea just how fun it was.” Toph grinned back.

“What are they doing over there?” Suki asked as she pointed her finger ahead of them.

The group turned to see a small group of men bringing a wild komodo rhino toward a ring. Iroh smiled proudly and explained what they were doing, though Katara thought it was a little silly. Why would they risk their lives just to prove who was the bravest?

“Hey, isn’t that Zuko getting ready to ride it?” Ty Lee exclaimed as she pointed at the ring.

They all immediately looked closer.

“What’s going on?” Toph asked with a huff since she couldn’t see. Iroh leaned down slightly and filled her in on what was happening.

Well, if Zuko’s doing it, then it is not that silly, Katara thought as she saw him climb onto the back of the agitated animal.

Lowering himself onto the rhino’s back as a few men held it in place, Zuko grabbed the reins tightly, adrenaline running through his veins. He remembered the first time he did this on the third year of his banishment, when he had turned sixteen, ready to prove to all his men his worth and bravery. He glanced sideways and noticed his uncle, Chao, and the women watching from a distance. He had a strange urge to impress Katara as he noticed her blue eyes fixated on him.

As the men released the animal, Zuko braced himself. The rhino launched forward, roaring and grunting as it tried to shake off the strange weight on its back. It thrashed wildly around the ring, bucking, jumping, and occasionally stopping abruptly. However, as much as the komodo rhino fought and raged, it could not throw this man off.

Zuko held himself upright magnificently. His face was devoid of any expression or emotion, but excitement showed in his golden eyes. He moved with the animal, one arm raised above his head to balance himself while with the other he held the reins firmly.

All those around the ring stared in complete admiration as they observed the amazing scene before them. Zuko looked so grand and majestic, betraying no sign of fear or fatigue as the rhino kept on bucking and ravaging. As she saw all this, Katara could not help but stare in awe, something that made Iroh very happy as he glanced at her.

After what seemed like hours, the rhino began to slow down. The stablemen were preparing to grab the tiring beast when all of the sudden the komodo rhino reared on its hind legs, ready to throw itself onto its back.
Katara watched in horror as the animal came down and gasped loudly.

Oh, no! Zuko’s going to be crushed! she screamed in her head.

But quick as lightning, Zuko released the reins and jumped sideways, landing gracefully on his hands and feet off to the side as the sound of the saddle breaking under the animal’s weight was heard. Standing up casually, he dusted himself off as the stable hands rapidly grabbed the exhausted animal and led it away. The guards, who had ran towards him at the sign of trouble, stopped and glanced at each other with relieved looks.

Katara let go of the breath she did not know she was holding with a loud sigh and relaxed.

Iroh beamed.

“Just like old times,” he chuckled.

“Old times?” Toph asked after she was told of what had occurred. All the girls looked at him curiously. Iroh smiled as he readied himself for another story.

“Wow, Zuko! That was amazing!” Aang cried out as Zuko approached his two friends who had been leaning over the edge of the ring.

“Yeah, not bad,” Sokka said with a shrug as he stroked his chin. Zuko smirked at him.

“I wanna try it!” Aang piped in excitedly as he jumped over the fence and began to leave them behind.

Zuko furrowed his eyebrows in concern.

“Aang, I don’t think that’s a good idea. It’s too dangerous. You could get hurt if you don’t know how to ride a wild rhino. Maybe you could ride a tamed one,” Zuko told him, hoping to convince him.
“I’m not a baby! I can do it! I’m the Avatar, aren’t I?” Aang replied, lifting his chin up. “I’ve ridden dangerous animals before. Don’t worry. Trust me. Besides, you did it when you turned sixteen. I turned seventeen a few months ago!”

Zuko knew Aang was not a small preteen any longer and could handle it, but he was still worried. He had been around komodo rhinos all his life. Aang had not. After a few more arguments, Zuko relented reluctantly.

“Alright, but if anything goes wrong, we will stop,” Zuko said, hoping nothing went wrong.

He looked at Sokka who looked back at him with a slightly less worried face since he knew Aang always liked to ride on any weird or fascinating animals he came across.

Iroh finished recounting Zuko’s story to the girls and was about to start in another one when Mai interrupted with her usual dull tone.

“Isn’t that the Avatar in the ring?”

“What is he doing?” Katara asked as she started to walk towards the other group when they saw Aang settle himself on the rhino.

“Don’t worry, Miss Katara—” Iroh began to reassure her when he was cut off short as they saw Aang’s body being thrown off roughly to the ground.

“Aang!” Katara yelled in alarm as she started to run while she struggled to get her waterskin open as the rhino began to descend its feet upon Aang.

Just when it seemed that Aang was about to be crushed, Zuko stepped in between. Creating a fire whip, he smacked it on the animal’s chest, without actually burning it. The komodo rhino bellowed in anger, but it began to move back as Zuko cracked his whip again and again.

Katara slowed down unconsciously as she saw how well Zuko handled the whip. The guards quickly surrounded Zuko while the stablemen grabbed the defeated beast and led it away again.
“Aang, are you all right?” Zuko asked worriedly.

He helped the young boy stand up who shook his head to clear it. Aang coughed since the air had been knocked out of his lungs at the sudden impact of hitting the ground. He had been too sure of himself that he had not been careful enough of the danger. Well, he learned his lesson.

“Yeah, I’m fine. Thanks for—”

“Aang!” Katara called out as she ran towards them. “Are you hurt? Are you okay?”

“I’m fine!” Aang nearly yelled, feeling humiliated.

Katara frowned before she angrily whirled on Zuko.

“What were you thinking letting him ride that thing? You knew he didn’t know how! He could’ve gotten hurt!”

Zuko only stared as she yelled at him. She was blaming him for what just happened?

“Believe me, if I had known this would’ve happened, I wouldn’t had let him—”

“You did know!” Katara interrupted harshly. “And you still let him do it! You didn’t try to stop him!”

“Katara, wait—” Aang tried to cut in, but he was ignored. The rest of the people near the ring only stood there awkwardly as the two benders stared each other down.

“He could’ve been hurt, or worse, killed!” Katara kept on arguing.

Zuko was beginning to lose his temper. Nobody accused him of doing something he did not do. Nobody. But he just could not bring himself to yell at her. He knew she was just upset because she cared for Aang’s safety.
“Katara. Aang is not a child anymore. Stop mothering him and let him grow up,” Zuko ground out.

With that, he turned back to the palace, his guards trailing after him. He had work anyway.

Iroh shook his head at Katara, and looking at the rest of the group, he followed his nephew with Chao walking beside him.

Katara just stood there, dumbstruck. Mothering? I do not baby Aang!

“You really overdid it, Sugar Queen,” Toph said as she ‘stared’ after Zuko. “Poor guy.”

Great. One step forward and now two steps back, the small earthbender grumbled mentally.

“Aang could have gotten hurt,” Katara argued again.

“Katara, I was trying to explain. Zuko tried to stop me. It was my idea. I wanted to ride the komodo rhino, he tried to warn me, but I didn’t listen to him. It wasn’t his fault,” Aang admitted, looking down at his feet.

“Yep, it’s true. Zuko tried to stop Aang,” Sokka added, giving his sister a disapproving look.

“Not to mention he saved Twinkletoes here,” Toph added also.

As she listened to them Katara began to feel horrible, but she still had her pride.

Crossing her arms she said, “Yeah, well, he should’ve persuaded Aang better.”

They all sighed at her stubbornness.
Zuko decided to eat his dinner in his antechamber in order to finish some of his paperwork. He had asked Toph for help in finding an earthbending instructor for the colonies and she had promised to send letters to those she knew. He had received news that the walls were being built, the additional guard duty was effective, and that the firebending instructors were doing well. All he needed was a teacher for the earthbending residents.

A knock was heard at the door before it opened once Zuko called out for whoever it was to enter.

“Nephew, I was waiting for you to eat dinner with us. Why didn’t you show up?” Iroh asked as he entered the room, immediately pouring himself a cup of tea he had a servant bring.

Still keeping to his papers, Zuko answered, “I thought that I should finish these documents for the next meeting.”

“Or was it because of what happened at the stables with Miss Katara this morning?” Iroh asked, raising his white, bushy eyebrow.

“I’m not hiding if that is what you’re implying. No, that has nothing to do with me excusing myself from dinner,” the young lord told him as he looked up.

“Zuko, would you mind me asking why you act differently with Katara?”

“What do you mean?” Zuko asked, furrowing his eyebrows as he lowered the papers in his hands.

“Well, you know, Nephew, you really surprised me when you didn’t blow up in anger at her. I remember you would lose your temper quite often when I would want to go shopping,” Iroh chuckled, but Zuko remained silent with a blank expression on his face.

“Not to mention you seem nervous around her, especially when she smiles. You never act like that with other girls, not even with Mai. Is something going on?” he asked slyly.

“I do not act nervous! And I don’t know what you are trying to get at. The reason I may…act differently is because Katara is different from other women,” Zuko replied as he looked outside the window, as the sun began to set.
“She has gained my admiration and respect because she is an excellent waterbender and always puts up a good fight. She is kind and caring and always tries to help those around her. And she saved my life when Azula struck me with her lightning. She is just a very special friend,” Zuko explained before he let out a small sigh. “Not to mention both of us have one thing in common.”

“And what is that? If I may ask,” Iroh said curiously.

“We both had our mothers taken away from us at a very young age,” Zuko responded in a low voice.

He remembered their conversation in the Catacombs of Ba Sing Se. The way Katara had cried when she told him she lost her mother because of the Fire Nation. Hearing her sobbing voice touched his heart, and before he knew what he was doing, he confessed to her that he had lost his mother as well. He had never told anyone that he missed his mother before her.

Iroh watched as his nephew got lost in his thoughts and nodded.

“I see…Well then, I’ll leave you to your work,” he said as he stood up and left the room.

Zuko looked back down at his papers, but after a while, he set them aside as he ran a hand down his face. Did he really act differently around Katara? And if so…why?

A few minutes later, a knock sounded at his door and he called for the person to enter. Looking up, Zuko saw Chao open the door and he motioned for the advisor to take a seat on one of the cushions around the low table.

“You called for me, my lord?” bowing, Chao asked as he sat down.

“Yes. I want to thank you for helping Lady Katara, but I know something else happened with Wei that Lady Katara did not want to mention,” Zuko began, putting down his paperwork. “Tell me what that fool did to her.”

Even though she acted as if nothing happened, he had noticed she was a bit affected by it.
Chao nodded. He hoped Wei got what he deserved.

“That stupid idiot!” Zuko fumed as he entered his bedchamber after talking to Chao and closed the doors loudly behind him.

“How dare Wei say such things to Katara? Not to mention dared to handle her so roughly. Well, it won’t happen again,” Zuko growled under his breath.

The young man removed his robes and sat down on the cushion in front of his meditation candles. He lit the candles with a flick of his wrist, closed his eyes and inhaled deeply. He really wished he could dismiss Wei, but he needed to keep that imbecile on his side, at least for a while. He wished the rest of his people did not act like Wei with his other friends, but he was not that oblivious. People were still wary of each other even after the war.

After he finished meditating—after a few tries of trying to get his temper under control—Zuko walked a bit more calmly into his bathroom and heated the marble tub after it was filled with water. He divested himself of his clothes quickly before he climbed into the tub, the warm water making him heave a tired sigh.

As he washed himself, he frowned.

“Why am I even bothering to help her? She won’t even appreciate it,” he said with a scowl as he sat in the hot tub for a while, remembering the insults she had hurled at him.

Nevertheless, he could not blame Katara for what happened that morning. She was just worried for what could have happened to Aang. He used to easily lose his temper for everything—even his uncle pointed that out—so he had no right to be angry at her for her words. Zuko sighed.

She really does care for Aang, he thought as he remembered the worried look on her face.

He strangely felt saddened a bit at this thought.

I wish Katara would care for me like that…Wait. What am I thinking? Shaking his head, he submerged himself into the water before he could hear the knock sounding from outside his room.
When Zuko did not show up for dinner, Katara felt terrible. As she sat at her dresser in her guest room, she recalled the way she treated Zuko earlier that day and she felt miserable. Was he mad at her? Well, she would not blame him if he was after the way she had yelled at him. She felt a bit guilty, but she had been so scared of what could have happened to Aang.

Then a thought formed in her head. She had yelled and accused him in front of everybody and he did not even yell back to defend himself. Zuko, the hot-tempered guy, not to mention the Fire Lord had not done anything to rebuke her behavior. Now that she thought about it, he had never lost his temper at her; not even when she threatened him badly in the Western Air Temple. She felt even worse.

“Well, I’m going to set things right and apologize,” she said determinedly as she stood up.

Katara quickly checked herself in the mirror to make sure she looked fine and paused when she realized what she was doing before she shook her head.

The waterbender left her room and followed the directions Iroh had given her the previous night. As she turned to the next corridor, she realized that it was longer more decorated, and opulent than the other ones, and she could not help but be impressed. As she walked further, she passed the only other door visible, and assumed it belonged to Iroh. As she finally approached the end of the golden corridor after what seemed like forever, she was even more surprised by what she saw.

The entrance to Zuko’s bedchamber was two massive doors that almost reached to the high ceiling. The doors were wide, made of pure gold with intricate designs of Fire Nation symbols as well as dragons masterfully carved on them. Katara stood there, admiring the impressive doors for a while, before she remembered what she had come for.

She let out a long breath as she raised her hand to knock on one of the doors.

Calm yourself. You have to do this. He’s not going to bite, she told herself before an uninvited image of Zuko gently biting her earlobe crossed her mind, causing her eyebrows to rise high on her forehead. Where in the world had that come from?

With a mental shake, Katara quickly knocked on the door, feeling the surface with her hand as she waited. But no one answered. She knocked a few times a bit harder. Still no one answered. Was he avoiding her?
Well, he’s going to hear my apology, like it or not, the Water Tribe woman mentally huffed.

Katara opened the heavy door slowly, surprised that it was unlocked and that no guards were posted outside, before she peeked inside. She was even more surprised as she saw the elegant room with a low table, couches and cushions all around, but there was no bed. Was she in the right room?

Katara looked ahead and noticed another set of doors, exact replicas of the previous ones. She quietly crossed the empty room, walked toward the second entrance, and knocked gently, but as before, nobody answered. She frowned. Iroh told her Zuko was in here with his paperwork.

What if something happened to him? What if he’s hurt? she thought worriedly.

Katara quickly opened one of the doors a crack, peeked inside and gasped. This room was even bigger and more elegant than the other one, putting her guest room and the others to shame. She guessed the room she saw first was the antechamber and this room was Zuko’s bedchamber.

Without thinking, she went inside and marveled at the decorations on the walls and the black marble floor under her feet. She noticed a big fireplace crackling on one wall and off to one side near another wall was a small cushion on the floor and some candles. Then she noticed the window.

Wait. That window is huge! She moved closer and peered through the curtain. It’s a balcony! She had to resist the urge to open the doors.

Maybe Zuko’s sleeping, Katara thought after a while, a bit embarrassed for disturbing him.

The young woman turned slowly to look at the bed. She sighed with relief when she saw that no one was on it, but, as she looked closely, her eyes widened in shock.

That is the biggest bed I have ever seen! she mentally exclaimed.

She slowly moved closer to it, almost afraid something would jump at her from it, and noticed it had many pillows on its surface and was covered by silk sheets of different shades of red. She leaned closer, and reaching a hand out, she touched the top sheet. It was silky, smooth, and very inviting.
Grinning, she thought, I wonder how it would feel to be under these silky sheet covers with Zuko.

She slapped herself for her thoughts and quickly turned around to leave, but she froze when she heard another door open.

Katara gasped softly. It was Zuko. His short raven-black hair was wet and occasionally a drop of water would fall down his muscular shoulders. He was only wearing a red towel around his lean waist, which he was too busy tying at the moment to notice her dumbly standing there with huge, blue eyes.

Oh, my gods! Katara’s mind screamed as her eyes traveled along Zuko’s well-built, pale upper body. She knew she should look away, but it seemed she just couldn’t. His body was just so impressive, so…masculine.

She almost jumped out of her skin when Zuko finally looked up. Then it was his turn to widen his eyes as he stopped mid step.

“Katara? What are you doing here?” Zuko asked incredulously.

“I…I…w-was…” Katara stammered, her face turning even redder. At that moment, she wished she were an earthbender so the ground could swallow her up.

Zuko smirked as he realized her embarrassment.

“Yes?” he asked with an amused raised eyebrow.

“I just came to apologize for earlier…I’m sorry, but I did knock, but you didn’t answer, I got worried and I was about to leave when you came in,” she rambled on looking at the wall behind him.

“Slow down,” Zuko instructed as he held up a hand and smirked. “I’m sorry, I didn’t hear you knock. As you can see, I was busy.”

Katara blushed even deeper as she fidgeted with her fingers.
“Chao told me what Wei did,” Zuko said, his expression turning serious.

Katara looked away. “It was nothing, really.”

“Nothing? He disrespected you! You, my guest and friend. I promise you that fool won’t do it again,” Zuko said in a severe tone.

Katara smiled.

“Thanks. Anyway, that’s all I wanted to say. Aang and Sokka explained to me that you did try to stop Aang and I thank you for that. I’m really sorry for blaming you for what happened.”

Zuko only nodded.

“It’s okay. I understand why you reacted like that.”

“You do?” she asked as she glanced up at him.

“Yes. You were just worried for Aang’s safety,” he said, looking away.

“I was worried for you, too, when that animal almost fell on you,” Katara quickly added. She wondered why she admitted that. Maybe it was the dejected tone in his voice. But that was ridiculous. Why would Zuko feel sad?

“Really?” Zuko looked back at her with a raised eyebrow.

“Yeah. You know, I was really impressed at how well you rode that wild komodo rhino,” Katara confessed with a smile.

Zuko felt his heart expand at her compliment.
“I am glad to know that you liked it,” he said, smiling slightly.

Katara blushed and looked down. She frowned when she noticed the scar on the middle of his chest.

Zuko saw her frown and he wondered at it.

“What’s wrong?” he asked.

“The scar…It…it didn’t heal right,” she said softly. “I’m sorry.”

Zuko’s hand came up to his chest as if he were trying to hide it.

Does she feel disgusted that I have another horrible scar? he thought darkly.

“Don’t worry about it. At least nobody can see this one all the time,” he said dryly as he removed his hand from his chest and clenched it at his side.

Katara looked up as she heard the hard tone of his voice. She noticed his face had darkened, there was a hint of hurt in his golden eyes, and she realized what he was thinking.

“Zuko, it’s not the actual scar I feel so guilty about. Scars are not what make people ugly, you know that. It’s the fact that you got it because of me…that you could have…died…because of me. Because I didn’t listen to you and stay away. I felt so horrible when I saw you hurting so badly,” Katara softly said, her eyes filling with tears at the memory. “I was so scared.”

Zuko finally understood what she meant and he felt his heart warm at her words.

She was scared…for me?

As he noticed her cerulean eyes fill with tears, he quickly walked over to her.
Placing a gentle hand on her shoulder he said, “Katara, it wasn’t your fault. You tried to stop me, but I did not heed your words. You didn’t know Azula was going to disregard the Agni Kai rules. And if I had known, I wouldn’t have accepted the Agni Kai or I would have fought somewhere else. Besides, you saved me by healing the wound.

“Katara,” Zuko softly continued, “I would gladly receive many more scars if it meant I could keep you from getting hurt…to keep you safe.”

Katara looked up to see Zuko’s eyes. His beautiful, golden eyes, that seemed to be engulfing her.

He would really do that? Her heart fluttered. She looked down towards his scarred flesh.

“Thank you, Zuko,” Katara said as she reached to touch his new scar.

Both jumped slightly as they felt like an electric shock went through them both. They looked at each other wonderingly.

“No. Thank you, Katara,” Zuko warmly said as he placed his hand over hers.

Katara suppressed a shiver. She looked up and held his steady gaze. She could faintly feel Zuko’s heartbeat as her hand rested on his chest. Neither one of them moved for a while, it was as if time had stopped.

“What is going on here?” Mai’s cold voice sounded throughout the room.

Katara and Zuko quickly moved away from each other and turned. Mai was standing stiffly at the door, the twitching of her lip the only visible sign of her annoyance. Iroh stood beside her with a grin on his face.

I knew it! They can’t fool me! Iroh beamed.

He had always suspected his nephew had feelings for the waterbender even way back when Zuko was chasing the Avatar, even if he never admitted to it. He had noticed the way Zuko would seem to perk up every time he would see “the little Water Tribe peasant girl” and how eager he would be to fight her. Iroh would always muse to himself, believing that Zuko liked fighting with the girl to get close to her. As much as Zuko tried to justify his actions to himself, Iroh knew better. The retired general had tried many times to get his nephew interested in a girl, like that Earth Kingdom girl, Song, that healed his rash. Or Jin, from Ba Sing Se he made Zuko go on a date with. However, none were able to capture his attention.

Iroh then turned to see Mai’s irritated face as she glared at Katara. At first, he had thought that maybe Mai had succeeded where the other did not, but as Iroh got to know her better and her relationship with his nephew, he was gladly mistaken.

He turned back to see Zuko’s embarrassed face even though he tried to hide it. His suspicions were correct. He was, after all, the Dragon of the West. The lovely Water Tribe woman had captured his nephew’s attention and possibly even his heart. He knew Katara was the perfect woman for Zuko, the perfect one to make him happy.

“Um…I…” Katara blushed as Iroh gave them a silly grin.

I what? I was touching Zuko’s muscular, naked chest?

“Katara was just checking to see if my wound had healed completely,” Zuko quickly covered, keeping his expression unreadable, but his right cheek was red with embarrassment.

“Yes. And it’s fine. So I will be leaving now,” Katara said with a nervous laugh as she quickly exited the room. She noticed Mai’s hard glare as she passed her.

Iroh smiled as Katara left then he turned to his nephew.

“Well, that’s good,” he said, smiling broadly.

Zuko frowned at his uncle before he looked at Mai.

“Wait outside in the anteroom,” he ordered firmly.
The noblewoman seemed reluctant, but she left. She had never entered Zuko’s room before and that woman had. And he did not seem bothered by it. Mai silently seethed as she sat in the sitting room.

Before his uncle could say anything, Zuko raised his hand and said, “Nothing happened.”

He quickly returned to his bathroom to change and calm himself down. The last thing he wanted was for Iroh to get ideas, but what he did not know was that it was already too late.

Chapter End Notes

I know the plot is slow right now, but please be patient.

I don’t want this story to be like the other ones where Zuko and Katara meet, then next scene they fight, then they make up and realize they’re in love, then they have sex, then Katara ends up pregnant, blah blah blah...I want this story to be at least more realistic, where the characters actually have to go through many things to realize their true feelings...
Rare Laughter

The next couple of days were awkward for Katara. She could not stop herself from blushing every time she saw Zuko, especially when he would look at her intensely. So she tried to avoid being alone with him. She berated herself since there was no reason why she should act like they had not done anything wrong; nothing happened.

Though she did wonder what that little shock she felt when she touched him meant…

_That didn’t mean anything!_ she told herself, though she almost felt like she was hiding from him—which she was.

_That’s because I’m embarrassed! I mean I was touching a handsome, young man! I was alone in Zuko’s room and he was half-naked! What does that say? I hope Iroh and Mai don’t think wrong of me._

Katara sighed loudly as she fanned her face with her hand. The weather was hot, especially since she was wearing her Water Tribe clothes.

“Well, at least I won’t die of frostbite,” she muttered dryly as she bent the sweat from her forehead with a flick of her wrist.

She should buy some Fire Nation clothes for her and Sokka. Maybe she could ask Iroh which tailor shop would suit their needs best, after all, she was sure he knew every shop the city had to offer. She grinned.

Sitting under the shade of a tree in one of the palace gardens, Katara admired the view. There were many trees and flowers around, perfectly arranged in patterns. She had been told that this was a public garden for the noble ladies of the Fire Nation. She had seen many of them pass by as they gingerly walked on the stone paths, giggling and gossiping. Some of them had smiled or stared at her curiously, while others looked down at her with contempt. Katara paid them no mind as long as they kept to themselves.

“Lady Katara?” a gentle, feminine voice called out.

Katara turned around to see a young servant woman, her head slightly inclined, addressing her. She was pretty and probably around her mid-twenties, with the usual pale skin and dark hair all Fire Nation women had.

“Yes? Is there something you need?” Katara asked kindly.

The young woman lifted her eyes slightly and shook her head slowly.

“Actually, that is what I was going to ask you. Do you need a cool drink? Would you like some treats?” the woman asked as she humbly looked down.

“What? Oh, no, I’m fine. You don’t have to,” Katara began as she smiled uncertainly at the servant’s enthusiasm.

“The Fire Lord has ordered that his guests are to be treated well. It is my duty to provide you with whatever you need, Lady Katara,” the maidservant continued.

“Well, thank you, but I’m okay right now. Maybe later,” Katara replied politely.

The young servant looked up in disbelief. This woman was actually being nice to a mere servant! Katara gave her a friendly smile, which the older woman gladly returned before she bowed again and retreated.

“Katara!” Suki called as she and Toph came up to her. “Do you want to spar a little with us?”

The waterbender looked up and smiled at her friends as she stood up and brushed off her clothes.

“Actually, I was thinking of asking Uncle Iroh to recommend a tailor shop where I can buy some clothes,” she said as she again wiped at her forehead.

“It is pretty hot,” Suki commented as she shaded her eyes to look up at the sunny sky.

“Yeah, that’s why I wanted to ask Uncle Iroh,” Katara replied.
“Ask me what, my dear Miss Katara?” they heard Iroh ask.

The three young women turned to see the old man walk up to them with a serene smile.

“Oh?” Iroh uttered curiously with a quirked eyebrow.

“I need to buy some clothes, and I was wondering if you could recommend a place,” the blue-eyed waterbender informed him.

“Ah, I see,” Iroh said as he smiled at her, “Zuko did mention that you might need Fire Nation clothes for this weather, Miss Katara.”

He grinned broadly when the waterbender’s cheeks tinted slightly before she cleared her throat.

“I am free at the moment, so, if you’d like, I can escort you young ladies to one of my favorite shops,” he enthused as he smiled at them all.

“Well, what’re we waiting for? Let’s go already,” Toph piped in, stomping her feet and causing the ground to tremble.

Chuckling, Iroh motioned them to follow him back into the palace. He assured them he would wait for them in the courtyard with a carriage while they went to their rooms to collect their money. After leaving her room, Katara came across Sokka and explained where they were going. With a relieved exclamation, he quickly gave her money so she could also buy him Fire Nation clothes. Then he sternly told her to be careful. She rolled her eyes but promised she would.

Katara smiled when she spotted Iroh waiting for the carriage as she walked down the long flight of stairs that led to the palace front courtyard. She wondered how much longer Suki and Toph would take.
“Ah, there you are,” Iroh said when he saw her approach, “I hope you like the shop we will be visiting. They have many varieties of textiles and colors!”

“I’m sure I will,” the brunette assured him with a smile.

“I hope you also buy some red clothes too, my dear,” Iroh comment with a grin.

“Oh, uh, I was just planning on buying a few simple, blue outfits,” Katara muttered.

“Nonsense! You need a variety. You cannot always wear blue,” Iroh continued as he gave her a definitive nod before he was distracted by the arrival of the carriage.

Katara shook her head at his enthusiasm and smiled. Then with a small blush as she remembered the previous day, she hesitantly asked, “Uncle Iroh?”

“Yes, my dear?” Iroh answered as he turned to her.

“Um…about the other day…in Zuko’s room…I promise you that nothing inappropriate happened…I hope you don’t have a bad impression about me,” she told him quietly.

Iroh kindly smiled at her.

“Do not worry about it, Miss Katara. I know you are a decent young lady. Besides, Zuko already assured me of it, making sure your virtue was not questioned. I was just surprised to find someone else in his room, that’s all.”

“Why?” Katara asked curiously as she looked up at him.

“Well, you see…Zuko does not allow anyone to enter his bedchamber, except for his most trusted servants to clean his room and dress him in his formal clothes, and of course, me. Not even Mai had entered his room before that day,” Iroh replied.

“I’m sorry,” she quickly said. “I didn’t know, I just wanted to apolo—”
“Don’t worry. Zuko did not even seem bothered. So I guess it is fine,” Iroh quickly interrupted her with a reassuring smile before exclaiming, “Ah, here come Miss Toph and Miss Suki!”

Katara turned to see her friends approach them quickly. Soon they were sitting in the carriage and heading out the palace gates with a few guards mounted on komodo rhinos following them. Iroh told the girls they were the Royal Palace Guards and they were for protection. And for carrying their packages, he added with a chuckle. Settling comfortably in the gently swaying carriage, they chatted happily as they went.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko and Aang practiced their firebending for a while after they had finished breakfast. Aang was very impressed at how much better a firebender Zuko had become since the war, but he did not admit that he had not practiced his firebending much since he still was a little wary of it.

“Where are the girls?” Aang asked as he and Zuko took a break. A few servants rushed forward and handed them towels and drinks.

“I think Uncle took them shopping,” Zuko answered as he wrapped the small towel around his neck. A servant had given him a message from his old uncle as Zuko was making his way to the arena.

“Shopping? For what?” Aang asked as he drank from his glass.

“Fire Nation clothes,” Sokka spoke up from where he had been sitting watching them spar.

“Clothes? Why?” the young monk asked, scratching Momo’s head as the flying lemur rested on his shoulder.

“Well, they need Fire Nation clothing in order to handle this heat,” Zuko said as he wiped his forehead.

“They were hot? I didn’t hear them say so,” the seventeen-year-old said with a frown.

Zuko looked at the young monk in disbelief. He’s even blinder than a badger-mole.
“Yeah, I forgot how damn hot the Fire Nation is,” Sokka grumbled as he wiped his sweaty forehead. He had stripped down to just his thick pants and an undershirt.

Zuko smirked, but he put on his blank expression when he noticed Wei making his way toward them.

“Well, well. Is the Young One taking a break from all the hard work?” Wei taunted from a few feet before them.

Zuko glared hard at the old advisor, Aang rolled his eyes, and Sokka regarded the old man carefully.

“I thought you were impatient to ‘bring honor and glory’ to the Fire Nation. And here you are, having a play day,” Wei sneered.

Sokka narrowed his eyes; he did not like this man. He had a bad feeling just like he had with Jet and Long Feng.

“We were just practicing and doing some exercises,” Sokka spoke up as he rotated one of his shoulders dramatically. “Something you clearly know nothing about,” he said nonchalantly.

Zuko held back a smirk and Aang stifled his laughter as the older man’s face turned red with anger.

“Well, that is not helping the Fire Nation, now is it, you Water Tribe peasant?” the old man snapped.

Momo screeched and perched himself on Zuko’s shoulder, higher away from the scary old man. Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“You shall show some respect to my guests, Wei,” the young Fire Lord growled out, remembering his conversation with Chao. “And if I hear any more reports about your insolence, I will have to dismiss you from several meetings.”

Wei only huffed and hobbled away. Zuko resisted the urge to send a fireball at him.
“Don’t like him,” Sokka confessed, narrowing his eyes.

“Who does?” Aang said.

The three young men smirked before they resumed their training.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

A few hours later, Iroh and the three women returned to the palace. Katara smiled as she remembered their outing. Her eyes had widened when they entered the tailor’s shop. There were rows and rows of clothes and fabrics of different colors and designs. She had thought she would have only seen red and gold. As if reading her mind Iroh told them that Fire Nation women sometimes did wear different colored clothing for special events.

Iroh had moved around the shop like a child in a candy store, picking out different outfits for them. Toph chose, with the help of Katara, green robes of different shades, while Suki picked green ones as well as a few pink and brown. Katara had at first chosen two plain blue outfits, but Iroh shoved more clothes at her with different shades of blue and others of red with intricate designs.

Katara had no choice but to comply with the eager, old man. After they finished, they all left the tailor shop happily, except for the poor guards who were carrying their heavy packages behind them.

Coming out of her thoughts, Katara shook her head and grinned. They piled out of the carriage and headed back into the palace while the servants and guards rushed to unload their purchases by Iroh’s order.

Iroh and the women passed the training arena as Aang and Zuko finished their firebending exercises, and they stood aside for a few minutes to observe. Katara watched as Zuko wiped the sweat from his neck with a towel. She had never thought of a sweaty man as being attractive, but as she saw Zuko’s muscular body glisten under the sun she could not help but think so. She blushed at her thoughts.

“Alright, you had your fun bending and all. Now it’s my turn,” Sokka grinned as he unsheathed his black sword. “What do you say, Zuko? Are you up for a little sword spar? Or have you forgotten how to use real weapons?” He smirked.

Zuko smirked back and called for one of his servants to bring him his dual broadswords. He had never stopped practicing with his swords and he always carried them with him when he was outside the palace walls. Especially when he would occasionally sneak out at night to inspect his city in order to see what some people were truly like and what they did behind his back. He had resurrected the Blue Spirit. It was a part of him and he liked the freedom it sometimes brought.

After a few minutes, the servant returned and handed the swords to his lord.

Unsheathing his dual broadswords, Zuko faced Sokka and smirked.

“I’m sure I still remember some moves,” he drawled.

Sokka laughed and then rushed at Zuko, drawing his sword forward. Zuko blocked with one sword and attacked with the other, but Sokka quickly dodged it.

“Not bad, Fire Lord, let’s see if you can block this!”

Sokka began to slash and slice repeatedly at the firebender. Zuko parried each slash skillfully as he was driven backwards. Sokka then jumped forward and brought his sword downward, but Zuko blocked the attack by crossing both his swords in front of his face.

“Not bad yourself, Master Sokka,” Zuko remarked coolly as he smirked behind his swords.

Then he pushed forward and attacked Sokka, swirling, dodging, and slashing at the Water Tribe man. Both of their weapons clashed smoothly and gleamed brightly in the sunlight.

“Wow, they’re so great!” Suki exclaimed as one of her hands wandered to the golden fans at her waist belt.

Katara watched with pride as her brother attacked and defended himself with his dark space sword. They had thought he had lost it at the final battle, but somehow it had landed back in his hands when they had been visiting Iroh at his tea shop months later. The gang had gone shopping around Ba Sing Se and found the sword on the cart of a traveling merchant. Sokka lost all his money haggling over it, but was happy to have it back. Her attention shifted back to Zuko. Again, she was impressed by how great a warrior Zuko was, both in firebending and in sword fighting.
“Well, I’m sure we will see more of this later on, so let’s put your things in your rooms,” Iroh said, bringing them out of their trance. They reluctantly moved away and went inside the palace.

Entering her room, Katara watched as the guards settled the packages on the floor just as a few servants entered to help.

“Do you want us to unpack and hang your clothes right now?” the same young maidservant from before asked.

“No, it’s fine. I can do it myself. I don’t want to trouble you. Besides, you probably have more important things to do. If I do need your assistance, I’ll ask you for your help. What is your name, by the way?” Katara asked.

The young woman bowed, grateful that the waterbender actually wanted to know her name.

“My name is Jiao, Lady Katara,” she replied, “And I would be glad to assist you in whatever you need.”

“Well, Jiao, thank you,” Katara said, and then turning to the others she said, “Thank you all for everything.” She gave them all a friendly smile.

The guards and the servants smiled back and bowed as they headed out the door. As they left Katara caught part of a comment one of the servants made, “I like her. She’s nicer than Lady Mai…”

For the next couple of hours, Katara placed her clothes in her dresser, but since she had so many clothes thanks to Iroh’s enthusiasm she had to also use the wardrobe.

Iroh sure overdid it, she thought with a laughed. She could not wait to try them on.

She had almost finished putting everything away when she heard a knock on her opened door.

“Come in,” she called without looking up.
“Wow. I bet this was Uncle’s idea,” Zuko lightly joked as he entered her room and saw all of her clothes. He had been passing by on his way to his chambers and noticed her busy at work.

Katara blushed as she put away the shirt she had been folding.

“I tried to ignore him, but he kept insisting,” she told him with a giggle before she more softly added, “Thank you for asking your servants to help us, but I don’t want to cause any trouble.”

“It is no trouble at all. It’s my servants’ job to accommodate my guests. Did Jiao displease you?” he asked, slightly worried.

“What? No, no. She’s very nice and always asks if I need any help. It’s just that I can do things myself. I don’t need others to do things for me,” she told him as she crossed her arms over her chest.

Zuko smirked. That was another thing he liked about the waterbender. She was independent and not at all spoiled.

“Well, I asked Jiao to be your assistant because she is one of my most trusted servants. And I’m sure she will do her best.”

“Thanks,” Katara said with a smile.

“You’re welcome. And I’m glad you purchased Fire Nation outfits. It was very noticeable that you were terribly uncomfortable in your clothes,” Zuko told her. He had seen how uncomfortable she had looked, especially during noon.

“Was it that obvious?” she asked and laughed.

Zuko nodded and felt slightly smug for making her laugh. Then she stopped and he noticed her blush.

“Listen. About the other night…I’m sorry…for embarrassing you,” Katara said, playing nervously with her braid. “And I am also sorry for entering your room without permission. I didn’t mean to invade your privacy or anything.”
Zuko’s face flushed slightly and he cleared his throat. He could not forget the feeling of her fingers resting gently on his chest, the way it had cause a shot of heat to go throughout his body. To some lower regions of his body…

Composing himself, he responded, “You don’t have to apologize for entering my room, you didn’t know. It’s not like it’s a law or anything. It’s just that I find my room to be the only place where I can have some time to myself and have some peace and tranquility. And besides, nothing happened, right?”

“Yeah,” she answered.

Zuko smiled slightly and Katara laughed weakly.

“I hope your clothes fit in your wardrobe, Miss Katara,” they heard Iroh say as he entered her room with a silly smile on his face.

“Maybe you should have bought her a bigger wardrobe, Uncle,” Zuko said dryly.

“Hmm? That’s not a bad idea,” Iroh mused, stroking his chin.

Katara was about to object when everybody else entered her room and she sighed. Her sigh deepened when Mai and Ty Lee entered a few seconds later when they noticed everybody gathered in the room. So much for taking a rest.

“Well, it sure is hot,” Iroh commented casually before he snapped his fingers. “I know! Why don’t you young people go to the beach at Ember Island to cool off?”

“Ember Island? That place is so beautiful,” Suki said excitedly as she grabbed onto Sokka’s arm, who then smiled down at her.

“Yeah, remember when I did that sand sculpture of you? It was beautiful,” Sokka said, oblivious as the others snickered. “Before somebody destroyed it,” he said, pointedly raising his eyebrow at Zuko.
Zuko frowned at him before he shrugged. “I was just trying to get Aang to practice and—”

“You all have been to Ember Island?” Mai interrupted, looking at them coldly.

The others went silent at the way she was looking at them as if they had committed a crime. Toph snorted at the woman’s cold tone and crossed her arms.

“Yeah, I took them to the royal beach house when we were hiding during the war,” Zuko responded concisely.

He was slightly annoyed with her tone. Mai only looked away and raised her chin.

“Well, we can’t go anyway,” Katara replied carefully, not sure what to make of the hard frown on Zuko’s face. “We don’t have bathing suits.”

She was no longer fourteen so she could not wear her underclothes to swim in anymore. And she was sure Suki and Toph felt the same.

The young group turned at the sound of Iroh’s chuckles.

“You do not have to fret about that,” said he as he handed the guests a package each from the bag he had settled near his feet when he had entered the room.

He must have gotten them at the tailor shop, Katara thought as she peeked inside the package.

After Iroh reassured them that they did not need to repay him, their excitement resurfaced once again.

“We still won’t be able to go because Zuko is too busy,” Mai interrupted dully as she looked uninterestingly at her nails. She had tried to convince Zuko weeks ago and he had refused without hesitation.
They seemed to deflate at the noblewoman’s words.

“I’m sorry, I really would like to go, but I have—” Zuko began.

“Nonsense! You are all going!” Iroh cut in.

“But Uncle, I can’t leave. I have to—”

“Do not worry, Nephew. It is not that much work. And I can handle it. You need a vacation!” Iroh reassured him, but Zuko seemed reluctant.

“Yeah, Zuko, we came here to have fun,” Sokka said, “Not to sit around while you work. Don’t make us use the cactus juice!”

“Yes, we came here to cheer you up,” Katara piped in with a smile.

Zuko stared at her for a long moment as he debated with himself. He did not want to leave his responsibilities, but he also did not want to miss the chance of another trip with his friends. Who knew when he will have the chance again? Besides, he did need a vacation and his uncle was more than capable in handling the work in his absence. With an impassive expression he looked back at Iroh, who was smiling at him expectantly.

“If you think it is alright Uncle, I think we can go,” Zuko finally relented, “Of course, I can only be away for a few days.”

Iroh smiled broadly as the others immediately exclaimed their excitement. Mai’s eyes had widened in shock before she narrowed them in anger. Why did Zuko so easily relent to their request when he did not even consider hers for even a second? She clenched her hands tightly to her sides.

“Well, I’ll ask Admiral Jee to take you, since you can’t all ride Appa,” the old man spoke up over their chatter.

“But I can’t leave Appa alone,” Aang said, worried.
“It’ll be fine, Avatar Aang. He has plenty of space in the stables and food, and I promise you I’ll visit him every day,” Iroh promised the young monk.

After a few more reassurances, the young boy finally relented. They all excitedly began to talk about their vacation. Zuko frowned when Mai strode out of the room without another word.

“Yes! I can practice my Sandbending,” Toph said, pulling onto Zuko’s arm as Mai left.

Distracted, Zuko grinned down at her.

“Are you going to build a sand sculpture of me?”

Toph lightly punched him on his arm

“As if you don’t have enough monuments of you around the city,” she muttered sarcastically.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After settling their things in the royal beach house, the rest of the gang quickly made their way towards the beach while Zuko made sure everything was in order. The young man realized that everything had been set for their arrival already.

Uncle sure overdid it, he thought with a shake of his head.

As he walked around the beach house, he could not help remembering the times he had spent there with his mother. How they would wade in the water and sit under the stars at night.

I hope we could do all those things again...someday, Zuko thought sullenly before he shook his head and continued on his way.

A few minutes later, surrounded by his personal guards, Zuko arrived at the beach that was opened to the public and spotted his friends. He noticed the Fire Nation tourists bowing at the Avatar and at him and he nodded in return. They could have spent the day at his private beach at the back of the royal beach house, but the gang wanted to be around other people. He did not understand why.
He had his guards set up a spacious perimeter for him and his friends so they would not be disturbed by the crowd. He could see the excited people craning their necks to get a glimpse of the Fire Lord, the Avatar, and the war heroes. Zuko frowned at the attention, but decided to ignore it for the moment. He observed his friends for a minute before his eyes immediately started searching for Katara, but he frowned when he could not see her. He relaxed when he spotted her swimming in the water before he looked away. He did not want to seem too obvious he was looking at the waterbender. He saw Mai sitting on a blanket and beneath an umbrella to ward of the gleaming sun. He could not help but think that the shade made her look even gloomier. He slowly made his way over to her.

“You, there, fetch me a cold drink, now,” Mai—not having seen Zuko—ordered one of the servants she noticed pass her by.

Stopping, Jiao bowed stiffly before she went to collect the noblewoman’s drink. Mai watched the group of friends playing on the shore with a dispassionate look before she glanced to the side when Zuko sat down next to her. She smiled at him, but he did not seem to notice as he frowned at her.

“You have to treat my servants so coldly?” Zuko asked as he looked at her disapprovingly.

“They are servants,” she replied as if that answered it all.

Zuko frowned deeply before he looked away with a scowl. Even though he was Fire Lord, he did not like to be pampered too much and give extra work to his servants. And although he was not exactly an amicable lord to his servants, he always tried to treat them well. Yet, he knew Mai’s thoughts regarding servants were the same as the rest of the nobility.

Katara was the complete opposite. She treated them all with kindness. At the thought of the waterbender, his attention once again turned to her. He did not know why his thoughts kept turning to her, but it kept happening more and more. He admired the graceful way Katara swam and dove under the soft waves. He quickly looked away and cleared his throat when Mai spoke to him. Not having heard what she said, he turned to her before he paused.

“Mai, aren’t you hot in that thing?” Zuko asked as he looked at her.

She was wearing a black one-piece bathing suit under a light, transparent black cloak.
“No,” she answered listlessly.

Zuko shrugged before he looked over at the others who seemed to be clearing the sand for something. He noticed Toph wearing green shorts that came down to her thighs and a sleeveless shirt that covered down to her stomach. Suki was wearing a light brown bathing suit and Ty Lee her usual pink. He looked back at Mai’s lifeless outfit and frowned.

Suddenly, there was an explosion of water coming from the ocean. Zuko turned to see a large wave part in half as Katara emerged from the sea. She was surfing upon the large waves on a long piece of ice. She moved gracefully on the water as she bent the waves, twisting and swerving. The tourists on the beach turned to look at the waterbender with wonder. Coming towards the shore, Katara dissolved the ice surfboard, flipping her wet hair over her shoulder as she walked towards the others on the sandy beach.

Oh, Agni! Zuko could not help but think as he looked at the waterbender with wide golden eyes.

Her long, brown hair was pulled high into a ponytail. She was wearing a two-piece navy blue bikini, the top part crisscrossed at her chest, covering down to her ribcage while the bottom piece came down to her mid-thighs with small slits on either side of her thighs. And her bronzed skin seemed to glow even more under the sun’s rays as droplets of seawater clung enticingly to her smooth skin. Something stirred deep within him and he shifted in his spot. He had never been affected so much by a woman in a bikini before.

Mai did not like the look on Zuko’s face as he continued to stare at the waterbender and she narrowed her eyes. He had never looked at her that way.

“Zuko! Do you want to play ‘Catch Momo’?” he heard Katara call out.

Snapping out of his trance, Zuko mentally shook his head. He looked over to where the others were waiting and his eyes widened slightly as he saw Katara smiling at him as she waited for his answer. He felt his heart expand before he mentally shook himself as he tried to remember the game. He remembered them playing “Catch Momo” when they were on Ember Island during the war. Momo would fly and jump around to invade being caught while everybody gave chase and whoever caught him won. However, all the players also tried to stop each other from winning by using their bending or other skills. Even though Toph could not see well on the same she liked the challenge as she tried to make it difficult for the others. Zuko had come up with this idea in order to get Aang interested in practicing more as Sozin’s Comet approached.

“Well? Yes or no?” Katara asked and grinned.
“Sure,” Zuko finally managed to say before he turned to Mai when she cleared her throat.

“Do you want to join, Mai?” he asked casually.

“No,” she said dryly, “I don’t want to play such a childish game.”

Zuko frowned before he shrugged as he stood up and he walked over to the others. He was barely aware of how the young women standing outside the perimeter batted their eyelashes at him so he would notice them. But he paid them no heed, it was always the same. The women at Court did the impossible to get his attention—some of their ploys were extremely ridiculous—but he knew they only wanted the privilege of being married to the most powerful and wealthiest man in the world. Zuko took off his light tunic and tossed it to the side, wearing only gold and dark red swimming trunks. All the female tourists turn to stare at him, giggling and whispering to one another, but he ignored the commotion he had caused.

The color on Katara’s cheeks rose up as she saw Zuko flexing his muscles as he stretched and the sun’s rays shone upon his exposed skin. She quickly looked away as she remembered the previous embarrassing moment in his room.

But this is the beach. All the men are shirtless, a wicked part of her brain said logically, So it’s okay

With that being said, Katara discreetly looked back to admire the young Fire Lord’s body since the other situation had been too awkward to really take a good look. He had a well-sculpted body, lean and full of hard muscle. Not too lanky—she could not help but compare him to Aang—or too muscular. His alabaster skin was similar to the color of cool cream. She briefly glanced at the new scar on his chest and realized that it resembled a bursting star.

“Don’t get distracted now, Sugar Queen,” Toph piped in with a grin.

The Water Tribeswoman looked away in embarrassment as she threw a glare at Toph, who of course, could not see it and wouldn’t have cared if she could.

Focus Katara. You are a Waterbending Master. Nobody is going to distract me, Katara told herself.
Just don’t look at her body, at her caramel-colored skin, and perfect, slim legs, and perky breasts… Stop Zuko! Focus, Zuko scolded himself. No way am I losing.

“Alright whoever catches Momo wins!” Sokka reminded them excitedly as he glanced around at everybody. Now that the war was over, none of them had to feel guilty or worried about having fun.

Momo, oblivious to what was happening, sat on the sand grooming his tail. They took positions around him and slowly approached the furry animal. Large ears flicking on his head, Momo froze and looked up to see he was surrounded. With an excited shriek, he shot up and flew over Sokka’s head who jumped up to grab him. He cursed when Momo was pushed higher up by a burst of air Aang threw his way.

With a loud chip, the lemur landed on the sand before screeching when Suki pounced at him. He was saved, however, when Toph blocked the female warrior’s path with a wall of sand. Cursing, Suki jumped back in time to avoid colliding into it and scowled at the short earthbender who was grinning madly. Momo excitedly flew away.

Feeling heat close to his tail, Momo glanced back and shrieked when he saw a small ball of fire following close behind. He swerved sharply to the side to avoid it only to collide against something hard. His large, green eyes widen when he saw the tall male reach for him.

“Got you,” Zuko said triumphantly, only to curse when two water tendrils suddenly wrapped around his wrists and stopped him.

Seeing the opportunity, Momo chirped triumphantly as he again flew away.

“Good try, but not good enough,” Katara teased the young Fire Lord when he looked up and quirked an eyebrow at her.

Zuko raised his body temperature to evaporate the water ribbons and steam rose around him. When he looked up again, he saw Katara chasing after Momo with the others. Smirking, he sprinted forward. Again, they all tried to catch Momo only to have the small lemur deftly evade them or their attempts were thwarted by each other. A crowd had gathered outside the perimeter made up of intimidating guards, awed at the spectacle.

Katara grinned when she caught up to Momo. Gathering the water tendril wrapped around her arm, she flung it forward and wrapped it around the lemur’s middle. She skidded to a stop and pulled back her water and the small animal only to gasp when a fire whip sliced through the water whip, effectively breaking her hold. Chattering wildly, Momo again escaped. Katara turned around to see Zuko smirking at her.

“Not bad,” Zuko countered as he raced past the waterbender.

Grinning, Katara chased after him and Momo. A few seconds later, both the waterbender and the firebender were again blocking each other as they pursued Momo. They even pushed the others out of the way as they prevented each other from catching the lemur.

The firebender and the waterbender were too engrossed in their own game that they did not notice the annoyed faces of the other players as they came to a stop and stood to the side. Zuko and Katara’s attempts to win over each other seemed to take all day, neither one willing to lose. The crowd waited impatiently to see who would be the victor.

Feeling left out, Aang could no longer hold in his irritation as he watched his girlfriend and his friend too absorbed in playing with each other, ignoring him and the rest. Toph frowned as she felt the young Avatar’s pulse quicken and the ground around him shake a bit. Although it was more difficult for her to ‘see’ in the sand, Aang’s vibrations were beating so strongly that she could not help but pick them up.

“That’s enough!” Aang shouted just as Zuko was about to catch Momo, causing him to miss.

“What the hell!” Zuko growled out, annoyed at being interrupted and distracted.

Momo, sensing his master’s anger, headed toward the airbender before landing slowly on his shoulder. His ears drooped.

Katara frowned, a bit disappointed the game was broken up. She was having fun and she did not get the chance to beat Zuko properly.

“Do you have to take all the glory for yourself?!” Aang snapped, his whole face turning red.

Zuko looked at him with a raised eyebrow and then at the rest, confused.
“Yeah, we wanted to play, too,” Sokka spoke up.

Zuko frowned when he finally understood.

“I’m sorry, I guess I got carried away,” he responded. He honestly did not notice he was upsetting them.

“Yeah, well, I thought you were excellent at keeping focus,” Aang bit out, making Zuko clench his jaw.

Katara noticed Zuko was getting angry and she quickly tried to calm Aang down.

“Aang, please, I got carried away too. We didn’t mean to be rude. Besides, it was just a game.”

“Yeah, well, some game,” he grumbled.

“Well, it was still fun!” Ty Lee piped in as she somersaulted next to Katara, trying to lighten the mood. “How about we have a bonfire tonight?”

Zuko glared at Aang for a moment before he turned away and walked back to sit next to Mai.

“What?” he irritably asked as he saw her cold stare.

He noticed that Jiao was now fanning Mai and he glared at his girlfriend.

“Jiao, take a break,” he ordered firmly.

Jiao bowed at him gratefully as she retreated.

“Well, it seemed you really enjoyed…that game,” Mai said dryly.
Zuko looked at the young woman next to him with a hard frown. He was about to ask her what she meant by that when out of the corner of his eye he noticed Katara walking angrily away from an irritated Aang.

Katara stormed into the beach house and almost crashed into Jiao, who was carrying the laundry.

“I am so sorry, Lady Katara, I was not looking at where I was going,” the young servant explained.

“Don’t worry about it. I was the one who was not paying attention,” Katara reassured her, as she kept on walking.

Jiao frowned after her before she resumed in her duties.

Katara headed toward the room she shared with Toph and sat down with a huff on her bed after she wrenched the door open.

“What’s wrong, Sugar Queen?” Toph asked as she entered the room behind her.

“Ugh! Why does Aang have to be so irritating sometimes?” Katara exclaimed as she began to furiously bend the water from the basin on the wardrobe. “I let him have his fun, why can’t I?”

“Well, it’s normal for him to have acted like that. You and Sparky did ignore the others,” Toph said with a shrug.

“I apologized already! I just got carried away. He didn’t have to speak to Zuko and me like that,” Katara growled.

“I know, I’m not saying you guys are at fault,” the earthbender responded. “It’s just a game and both you guys were playing by the rules. It wasn’t right for him to go off at your guys like that.”

“Exactly!” Katara exclaimed.
“Maybe he just got jealous,” Toph said with a small smirk on her lips.

“Jealous? Of what?” Katara asked, confused. It was just a game. Nothing else…

“Oh, I don’t know,” Toph said casually and grinned.

The waterbender was about to ask what she was talking about, but she was interrupted when Aang knocked on the opened door.

“Katara, can I talk to you?” he asked quietly.

Toph patted Katara’s arm as she left the room. Aang watched her go before he turned back to the silent waterbender.

“I’m sorry I acted that way. I was just a bit mad that you were ignoring me and the rest of the group,” he said as he entered the room

Katara sighed and her rigid body relaxed slightly.

“I’m sorry I made you feel that way, but I told you it was unintentional. I promise I won’t do it again. But I felt hurt that you started yelling at Zuko and me. We were just playing,” she told him.

“Yeah, well, it didn’t seem like it,” Aang muttered.

“What was that?” Katara asked as she looked at him with a puzzled expression.

“Nothing...I hope Appa is okay,” he said instead, hoping the change of topic would dispel the tension between them.

Katara frowned. Why did he always try to avoid any issue that sprang up? The waterbender sighed. She was not in the mood to argue with him at the moment. She stood up and walked over to him.
“Don’t worry, Aang, he’s with Iroh. He’s fine. Besides, I bet he’s enjoying his rest.”

She could not help but remember the time when Appa was stolen in the desert and how devastated Aang became. Sometimes it seemed he cared more for his animals than for her. She quickly brushed the thought away.

“I guess…Well, let’s go to that bonfire then,” Aang said as he leaned down to kiss her. But Katara held up her hand, stopping him.

“Aang, don’t you think you should apologize to someone else?” she asked, raising an eyebrow.

Sighing, he answered, “You’re right. I will go apologize to Zuko right now. See you outside?”

She nodded before she sighed again when he turned around to head out the door. Why did it seem like she was becoming less patient with Aang lately?

“Ah, isn’t the night beautiful?” Ty Lee asked with a sigh as she looked up at the stars.

Mai snorted softly as she sat next to the acrobat with a cold look on her face. Katara did not reply as she waited worriedly for Zuko and Aang to show up. She hoped everything was well.

“Yeah, very beautiful,” Sokka said as he caressed Suki’s cheek, making the warrior blush.

Katara smiled as she watched her brother and her friend hug one another. They really loved each other deeply. Just like how she loved Aang?

Katara looked over at her brother and Suki cuddled against a log. It was the same question she kept asking herself ever since she had agreed to be Aang’s girlfriend. Then looking at the fire she frowned.

I don’t know…I’m confused.

No. She shook her head. Of course she loved him. Why else would she still be together with Aang if it wasn’t because she loved him?

She was interrupted from her thoughts as she noticed Aang and Zuko walking toward them. The Avatar was laughing and the Fire Lord was smirking. Katara sighed with relief and smiled as they sat down near the fire, shoving her thoughts far from her mind.

“Hey there, what took you guys so long?” Sokka asked. “We were about to send a search party for you.” He laughed.

Everything is back to normal again, Katara thought as they all sat under the night sky. At least, she hoped it was.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was their last day in Ember Island. They would be leaving the following morning, heading back to the Fire Nation Palace.

Finally we can leave this place, Mai thought glumly as she sat outside a tea shop, ignoring the noisy people around her. But first I have to get something straightened out.

Someone stood up from behind her and accidentally bumped into her, causing her to spill her tea across her table.

“Oops, sorry,” she heard someone say.

Mai only snorted in reply, irritated. She looked up to see who the idiot was that bumped into her and she wished she had not. It was that guy from the last time they visited with Azula, from that house party. What was his name? Ruon-Jian?

“Hey there, I remember you,” he said, grinning arrogantly.

“Oh,” Mai said simply. She had to admit that he was attractive.

Just then, she noticed Zuko coming toward them with the earthbender walking beside him. She smiled inwardly. It was a good thing Ruon-Jian appeared.
“Mai, there you are. We have been looking for you,” Zuko told her as he stood in front of her table.

He looked uninterestedly at the other young man also standing who had a look of terror on his pretty-boy face.

_He looks familiar_, Zuko thought absently.

“Oh, I was just here, talking to…Ruon-Jian. You do remember him, don’t you? From last time we were here?” Mai said in her usual flat voice.

This time she would not mind if Zuko got extremely jealous. She wanted him to confirm to everybody else that she belonged to him. Ruon-Jian looked about ready to die as he awkwardly bowed to the Fire Lord.

“Oh, yes I remember. Excuse my behavior from last time. I overreacted,” Zuko simply said as he stared at the other man passively.

Ruon-Jian only gawked.

“Oh, i-it’s f-fine!” he stammered.

Mai held back a frown. Did Zuko really mean that?

“We were just talking right now, that’s it,” she added, hoping to spark something within him.

Toph narrowed her sightless eyes. _Is the insipid woman trying to get Sparky jealous?_

Zuko nodded distantly, ruining Mai’s hopes.

“Anyway,” he continued casually, “I just wanted to tell you that we’re packing already. So if you want to buy anything, you should do it now. We will spend the rest of the day at the beach.”
Toph grabbed Zuko’s sleeve before Mai tried something else and said in an almost whining voice, “Come on, Zuko. Katara and the others are waiting for us.”

Zuko looked down at the short earthbender.

“Alright, alright. Let’s go. We’ll see you later, Mai. Nice seeing you again,” Zuko told the still gaping young man as he left with a grinning Toph.

Mai clenched the teacup in her thin hands, glaring daggers at Toph’s back as they left.

Ruon-Jian, sensing it was a bad time said, “Well, it was great seeing you again. I wish we could have talked some more.” And he quickly retreated without waiting for a reply.

As Toph and Zuko walked through the small island to find the others in the gift shops, Toph spoke up.

“So, Sparky, what’s the story between you and that guy? He practically had a heart attack!” She chortled.

“What guy? Oh, you mean Ruon-Jian? Well, last time Mai, Ty Lee, and I visited Ember Island was with…Azula.” He paused for a second before he cleared his throat.

“She made us go to this stupid house party that some pompous ass threw. Well, Ruon-Jian was trying to hit on Mai and I kind of got jealous and picked a fight with him. Mai got angry and we almost broke up, but we got it settled.” Zuko then frowned. “Now that I think about it, it was stupid of me for having acted like that.”

“So you are saying that you are not the jealous type anymore?” Toph asked smiling.

Or maybe not the jealous type of guy for Mai, she mused.

“Hm…I guess,” Zuko answered with a shrug, not really interested in the topic.
They noticed the others waving at them from one of the countless shops.

Well, we’ll see about that, Toph grinned wickedly.

“Hey, you guys! What took you two so long?” Sokka asked. When they tried to explain, he only waved his hand impatiently. “Never mind, let’s go. I can’t wait to buy some souvenirs!”

The group walked around the shops, looking at the many objects the shops offered with Zuko’s guards nearby. Everybody else marveled at the trinkets, but Zuko was not really interested in buying more unnecessary things.

As they entered another shop, Toph waited behind a tall vase for the others since she could not see the stupid things. She was starting to doze off when she heard a group of men chuckle amongst themselves.

“Hey, look at that one. She has a nice smile that goes with her pink outfit,” one of them said.

Toph yawned when the next comment stopped her.

“Well, look at the Water Tribe girl. She sure has a great body. Look at those legs.”

Toph furrowed her forehead.

Those perverts! She was seriously considering hurling some huge stones at them when she felt Zuko’s footsteps come close to where she was. She grinned. Time to test my theory.

“Hey, Sparky, find anything interesting?” she called out.

“No,” he answered as he walked towards her. “There is just a bunch of junk and—” Zuko stopped short at the comment that reached his ears.
“I wonder how that Water Tribe girl kisses. I bet her lips would feel good on my skin,” Zuko heard a man say.

“Yeah, bet that brown hair is soft. I wonder how that would feel,” another man commented with a deep laugh. They kept on making lewd comments as they stared at the unsuspecting young woman walking around the shop.

Toph grinned as she felt Zuko’s pulse quicken and the air grow a bit hotter around them.

_This is gonna be good_, she thought as she crossed her arms in front of her chest.

Zuko set his jaw and clenched his hands.

Those bastards were talking about Katara! How dare they say such things about her? He hated the leering looks they were giving her. Well, he was going to put an end to it! He marched towards them with so much poise, dignity, and outrage that the men’s attention fell on him immediately.

“I hope you men are not talking about my friend over there in such a disrespectful manner,” Zuko growled out dangerously while his two personal guards stood behind him with threatening looks. “Imprisonment could be an option for such lack of respect to the Fire Lord’s friends,” he drawled as he lifted one hand and lit a hot, bright flame.

The men noticed the fire crown on his head and the distinct scar on the left side of his face and immediately backed away, apologizing and bowing as they scrambled away with Zuko staring hard after them.

_Not a jealous type, huh?_ Toph mused.

“What was that about?” Katara asked as she came up to them, concerned.

“Nothing,” Zuko replied tranquilly. She did not need to know about those disgusting comments. Then smiling down at her he asked, “Find anything interesting?”

Katara swam gracefully beneath the ocean water, enjoying the refreshing sensation against her skin.
She stayed underwater for a while as she admired the fish swimming around her while the sun’s rays shone from above the surface. With a graceful flick of her wrist, she created an air bubble around her head and swam further down into the cool depths. She watched in admiration as colorful fish danced along the coral reefs while crabs scurried along the sand. A shadow fell over her and she looked up to see a pair of sea turtle-seals swim slowly above her. She enjoyed the peaceful silence and the breathtaking view for a moment longer before she decided to swim up. As she surfaced her element, Katara looked ahead toward the beach. Sokka and Suki were nowhere to be seen, probably walking in the city. Mai was—as usual—sitting under her umbrella, a servant bringing her a cool drink. Aang and Toph were playing around, trying to build the best sand impression of Momo.

Now that she thought about it, Sokka made a sand impression of Suki—even if it was not that great— but Aang never did one of her. He had only done one of Appa and now Momo. She was a bit sad by that, but she quickly shook the thought out of her mind. She should not make a big deal out of it.

She looked at the shore and noticed Zuko resting on his back near the water, the foamy waves gently lapping his ankles. Momo was curled up in a ball next to his head. Katara looked around once more, but nobody else was there since they were on Zuko’s private beach and he had dismissed his guards for their break.

A wide grin spread on Katara’s tanned face. Lifting her hands up, she summoned a large wave and, with a flick of her hands, sent it straight at an unsuspecting Zuko. Momo opened his eyes, and with a shriek, flew upwards as he, too, watched the wave go after the firebender.

“Argh! What the hell!” Zuko cursed as he shot up straight and shook the salty water from his hair, wiping the liquid from his eyes with a growl.

He looked across to the offending blue ocean and saw Katara clasping her mouth with her hands as she tried to hold her laughter.

“What was that for?” he growled lowly, narrowing his eyes.

Katara could not contain her mirth any longer and burst out into laughter as she waded toward him, bending the water from her body.

“Oh, Zuko! You should’ve seen your face! It was priceless!” She laughed. She paused to imitate his surprised face when he was doused before she continued with her giggle fit.
“That was not funny,” he grumbled, keeping his facial expression stony.

“Oh, yes it was!” Katara countered and she was seized by another fit of uncontrollable laughter. Momo landed beside them, making sure no more strange waves came his way before he started to groom his fur.

Zuko looked at the waterbender as she laughed uncontrollably. A small smile began to tug the corner of his lips, softening the sharp features of his face. He was not mad at all for what she had done, quite the contrary, he was amused. No one else would have dared do what Katara just did. The small smile then turned into a mischievous grin.

Since Katara was still laughing hard with her eyes closed while she held her aching stomach, she did not notice as Zuko moved toward the water’s edge. With a large smirk on his face, Zuko entered the cool water and with great force splashed the water at the Water Tribe woman.

Katara sputtered loudly since she had been laughing with her mouth opened.

“Hey!” she complained as she swept the seawater from her face before she glared at the firebender.

Then Zuko chuckled.

“You’re right,” he said, “It is priceless!”

And he began to laugh.

Katara looked at his handsome face as his golden eyes squinted shut and his smiling mouth opened for him to emit his laughter. He was pointing his index finger at her while with his other hand he clutched his side. Laughing still, he moved deeper into the ocean. Katara stared at him wide-eyed. She had never seen or heard him laugh before. She smiled. He had a nice smile and now she knew he had a wonderful laugh. She began to laugh with him.

Mai—who had been watching them like a hawk—was expecting Zuko to angrily shout at the woman and storm off fuming. But her black eyes widened in disbelief as she not only saw that Zuko remained calm, but he began to laugh! He was laughing because of that Water Tribe woman! Mai had never seen Zuko laugh, not even when they were children! She narrowed her eyes as she glared at the waterbender’s back.
I have to do something to stop this, Mai thought irritably. She did not like that Katara had been able to make Zuko do things he had never done before, not even when she had tried very hard.

“Oh, yeah?” Katara grinned at Zuko as she sent another wave aimed for his back, but he quickly diverted it with a fireball. While he was distracted by that, Katara jumped into the water, splashing him again.

“Hey,” Zuko said as she surfaced and splashed her face.

“Hey, yourself!” she countered as she sent splash after splash at him, making him laugh more deeply.

Zuko began to splash the water at her in return, each one determined to out splash the other. Zuko smirked widely and Katara shrieked with laughter as they began to move closer towards one another in order to splash even harder, the water now up to their necks.

No way is he going to beat me in my own element, Katara thought as she began to move her hands in order to summon another wave.

Zuko noticed and grabbed her wrists, making them both freeze as they stared at each other.

“Oh, no you don’t,” Zuko said coolly and smirked at her, but faltered slightly as she smirked mischievously back at him.

“Watch me,” she replied half in defiance and half in amusement. She lowered half her face into the water.

Zuko raised his eyebrow in confusion and wariness. Katara raised her head, her cheeks full of water, and without warning, squirted it straight at Zuko’s face. His eyes widened in shock as he just stood there. He had not expected that, and even though it was a simple act, he felt his heart skip a beat. Katara started to laugh again at his surprised face and Zuko could only smile down at her.

“What’s so funny, Sweetness?” they heard Toph ask.
They turned to see the earthbender standing at the edge of the shore, Aang beside her with a confused look and Mai next to them with a dark expression.

Zuko realized he was still holding onto Katara’s wrists and released them immediately, his face burning up, before he quickly recovered his normal demeanor. But Katara did not notice as she continued to laugh.

“Oh you guys! You should’ve seen Zuko’s face when I drenched him with a wave! It was hilarious!”

Toph grinned. “Bet it was priceless.”

“It was!” Katara giggled.

“Well, yours was pretty priceless as well.” Zuko smirked as he stepped onto the shore with Katara right behind him.

“You beat Sugar Queen in her own game? Wow, Sparky,” Toph whistled as she patted his back.

“He did not beat me! I was just caught off guard,” Katara protested as she crossed her arms and huffed.

Zuko smirked. “Come on, Katara, just admit it.”

Katara was about to reply defiantly when Mai cut in sharply, “Zuko, don’t you have to answer the letter Iroh sent you?”

Zuko’s unusual cheerful face returned to his regular stoic expression and Katara’s good mood fell as well.

“I forgot. I’ll see you all later,” he told them as he quickly walked back to the beach house, a few servants handing him a towel and his robe.
Mai coldly glanced at Katara and turned to follow after him.

Katara sighed. “Even though he’s supposed to be in vacation, he’s still working.”

Aang and Toph nodded.

Katara unthinkingly moved away as Aang tried to wrap his arms around her.

“I’m going to take a bath,” she said before she walked away.

Although not as grand as his royal bedchamber at the palace, the room Zuko occupied in the beach house was just as impressive after the entire building had been remodeled at his order. Sitting at the desk that rested against one wall, Zuko looked over the letter he had received that morning. He had asked Iroh to send him any information while he was away. Things seem to be actually going great, but he had a feeling something was wrong. Zuko looked out the window and noticed the moon. It was small, but it shone brightly.

He smiled as he remembered what happened with Katara that day. He had never played like that before, not even as a child. He always thought it was stupid and childish, but it had not felt like that with her.

His smile grew a bit larger. He had laughed, something he had not done since his mother disappeared and especially after the Agni Kai with Ozai. But now he had truly laughed and it was all thanks to Katara and her silly games.

After thinking about it for a long time, Mai decided she needed to do something. She did not like the way Zuko and Katara acted around each other and she was determined to keep things the way they were. She searched the beach house for the waterbender, but when she found no sign of her she stepped outside. She immediately found Katara and Aang sitting on the steps that led to the beach and she sneered.

“Good, now she won't be ‘confused’ any longer,” she thought. The young noblewoman did not care if she was making a big deal out of nothing, but it would give the waterbender a clear message in case she got any ideas about Zuko.

“Hello,” she said in her monotone voice, making Aang and Katara jump. “I think something is wrong with Zuko, he hasn’t been himself lately. I was wondering if you could…talk to him.”

Katara quickly got up as her face showed her concern. “Is he sick? Is he hurt? I can heal him—”

“No!” Mai yelled in order to stop her. Both looked at her in surprise at her uncharacteristic outburst. She cleared her throat. “I mean, it is not physical, maybe it’s too much stress. Can you talk to him… he won’t tell me what is wrong. He’s in his room.” With that, she left as silently as she appeared.

Aang and Katara looked after her with very confused looks.

“Do you think maybe she’s the one who needs a talk about her strange behavior?” Aang asked.

Zuko was getting ready for bed when Mai opened the door and closed it behind her, making sure it was unlocked.

“Mai, is something wrong?” he asked with an annoyed frown as he looked around for a tunic. He hated when people did not respect his privacy. Why did she enter his room when she knew that, especially when it was already late?

She walked over to him and surprised him as she placed her thin arms around his neck.

“No, Zuko,” she said.

Frowning, Zuko tried to pull her arms away from him, but she refused to move.

“If it is nothing, then you can leave,” he told her coolly. “I am tired and wish to rest.”

Mai narrowed her eyes at his dismissive tone, but before he could try to move away, she kissed him, drawing her thin body close to him.

Just then, the door opened.
“Zuko, are you okay? We—” Katara’s mouth flew opened as she saw them and Aang’s gray eyes widened behind her.

Zuko quickly pulled away.

“Katara!” he exclaimed.

“I’m sorry! I didn’t mean to interrupt you guys,” Katara said as she quickly whirled around and bolted outside.

Uncaring of the reason for the sudden anxiety he felt, Zuko was about to follow her, but Mai pulled him back.

“Well, I’ll leave you two alone,” Aang said with a silly grin as he closed the door behind him.

“Zuko, what’s wrong?” Mai asked innocently as she stroked his arm.

Zuko only stared at the door, his hands clenching at his side.

“Zuko?”

“I’m sorry Mai, I’m tired. We’re leaving early tomorrow, so get some rest,” Zuko answered tersely as he moved away from her.

The noblewoman frowned before she reluctantly made her way to the door.

“Alright, good night,” Mai said and closed the door behind her.

With silent steps, the dark-haired woman walked down the lightly lit corridor and made her way to her room. She had enjoyed the look on Katara’s face.
She hoped the waterbender finally got it in her head that Zuko would never be hers.

“Katara? What happened?” Toph asked as she heard the young woman slam the door close and throw herself on her bed.

“Don’t worry. It’s nothing,” Katara replied. She buried her face in her pillow as she tried to erase what she just saw.

“You’re lying. Tell me, Sugar Queen,” Toph ordered from her bed.

Katara sighed before she finally recounted what she saw to the blind earthbender. Toph raised her eyebrow as she listened to her friend.

“I mean, I should not be upset, right? They are a couple…They could do whatever they want,” Katara said, but she could not help feeling upset and she wondered why that was.

Jealous? Toph grinned.

“Did you actually see them…you know?” she asked with a shrug.

Katara looked up from her pillow.

“Well…no…” Now that she thought about it, they were just hugging and kissing.

“Then stop acting so embarrassed about it! Now go to sleep,” Toph yawned as she flopped herself back onto her bed.

“You’re right,” Katara mumbled.
Somehow, that comforted her and she did not understand why she should feel comforted. Katara stroked her necklace and then reached for the hairpin that she had placed on the nightstand near her bed as she waited for sleep to come to her.

“Katara?” she heard Toph ask on the bed next to her.

“Yes, Toph?”

“Was that Sparky laughing with you at the beach?”

Katara blushed as she remembered what happened earlier that day.

“Yeah, it was Zuko.”

“He has a nice laugh,” Toph said, loudly yawning again before she rolled over to her side.

Katara smiled as she looked down at the rose hairpin.

“Yes. He does.”

As the sun began to rise the next day, Zuko rose from his bed. After meditating, he made his way outside. He gazed toward the clear, blue ocean as the sun peeked over it, creating a light orange and pink color in the sky. The young lord inhaled the salty air, the breeze ruffling his black hair. Then he looked at the spot where he had been laying when Katara doused him. He smiled. He would never forget that. Then his face heated up as he remembered Katara’s shocked expression when she entered his room the previous night.

He pinched the bridge of his nose.

“What must she think of me?”

Though he did not know why he was so worried about what she thought about him. He was a man, not to mention the Fire Lord. He could do whatever he wanted, even have concubines if he so desired. He had a girlfriend, so such things were normal…

But I don’t want Katara to know that I…

Zuko sighed and ran his fingers through his hair. Why didn’t he? Why did it affect him what Katara thought anyway?

He looked up and noticed Jee approaching the royal beach house. The ship had arrived. Zuko sighed with relief.

Good. Now things can return to normal.

Jee bowed as he came up to the younger firebender.

“Fire Lord Zuko, we have arrived and are waiting for you and your friends,” he greeted with a small smile.

“Thank you, Admiral Jee,” Zuko replied with a nod, “We will be ready in a couple of hours. Care to join us for breakfast?”

Jee only stared. The Fire Lord was asking him to join His Highness and his friends for breakfast?

“I do not want to impose…” he said, not sure how to react.

“Zuko. Admiral Jee! Good morning!”

Both men turned to see Katara smiling cheerfully at them.

Damn! Why does she have to smile like that? Zuko thought as his heart clenched in his chest.

Jee bowed and smiled at her. “Good morning, Lady Katara.”
“Good morning, Katara. I asked Admiral Jee if he would join us for breakfast,” Zuko told her as the admiral seemed ready to leave.

Jee froze.

“Why that’s a great idea! I’ll tell the servants we have another guest and ask them to set up another plate.” Katara paused before she turned to Zuko. “If you don’t mind me asking them, that is…”

Zuko smiled and nodded, and she rushed off. Typical Katara, always making sure everybody ate their meals, just like when they were in the Western Air Temple.

“She sure is different from other women,” Jee commented quietly.

Zuko turned to look at him. “Why do you say that?”

“Well, she treats everybody equally and is friendly to everyone. It seems she does not mind being friends with lower subjects,” Jee observed.

“Yes…I guess you’re right,” Zuko said thoughtfully before he focused again. “By the way, how are the productions going at the colonies? Have there been any more raids?”

Since Uncle won’t tell me, he added dryly to himself.

Jee sighed as he straightened himself out.

“Well, a couple more incidents have occurred. But since the doubling of the guard duty and the construction of the walls they have not been able to inflict much damage,” the admiral informed him. “I also heard that some of the Earth Kingdom residents are a bit nervous that the firebenders are getting better trained.”

Zuko held back a sigh. He knew there was something else.
“Well, let’s go eat,” he said as he turned back inside the beach house with Jee following close behind. He would deal with this when he returned to the Palace. And Iroh will have to hear from him.
As soon as they arrived at the Fire Nation Palace, Aang ran to take Appa for a ride and the rest retreated to their rooms—Toph very much happy to be on solid ground again.

Zuko quickly made his way to his study, his guards and servants bowing to him as he passed them by. He opened the door once he arrived, and just as he suspected, found Iroh and Chao drinking tea and playing Pai Sho at a small table set up on one side of the large room.

“Zuko! You’re back!” Iroh called out cheerfully as he looked up from staring with a contemplative frown at the game board.

Chao turned on his cushion and greeted the Fire Lord with a respectful bow as the young man passed them and made his way to his large desk.

“Care to join us for some delicious jasmine tea?” Iroh asked. “And while we are at it, you can tell us all about the exciting things that happened during your vacation on Ember Island.” The retired general beamed.

A few servants quickly brought more tea and pastries before they quietly left the room.

“Why didn’t you send me information about the colonies, Uncle? I told you to send me a message if something came up,” Zuko said gruffly, not bothering to answer his uncle’s suggestion. He sat at his large work desk and began to look through his papers.

Iroh turned to Chao with a twinkle in his eyes, and as he stretched out a hand, he whispered, “Pay up, my friend.”

Chao rolled his eyes, and producing a gold coin from his pocket, gave it to the grinning old man.

“I guess nothing interesting happened,” he whispered back.

Iroh chuckled as he took the coin and tucked it into his sleeve. Zuko would never admit he had fun out loud.
“What are you two doing?” Zuko asked as he lowered the papers and raised a suspicious eyebrow at them.

“Oh, nothing.” Iroh replied airily as he nonchalantly waved his hand before him. “To answer your first question, the news was not urgent since the situation has been the same since you left. Moreover, I knew that if I wrote to you about it, you would not have hesitated to cancel your vacation. And we could not have that,” the old man finished.

He turned to his old friend and Chao nodded in agreement.

Zuko muttered darkly under his breath. He should have figured that out before.

“Have any letters arrived from the earthbenders Toph sought out?” he decided to ask instead.

“Yes, a few, my lord,” Chao answered as he walked over to the large desk and handed Zuko the letters.

“I’ll ask Toph about them later,” Zuko commented. She would know better.

After Chao and the servants were dismissed a few minutes later, Iroh got up from the low table after picking up his steaming teacup and sat in front of Zuko’s desk with a gleam in his eye that made the younger man look at him warily.

“Now you can tell me how it went on Ember Island,” Iroh said excitedly.

Or how it went with Miss Katara, he added mentally.

Zuko had to keep from rolling his eyes, and instead, settled on leveling his uncle with a blank stare. Though he knew he would not get out of this one until he had satisfied the old firebender’s curiosity.

“It went fine,” Zuko replied curtly as he returned his attention to the papers before him.
“How fine?” asked the eager old man.

“How fine?” asked the eager old man.

“How fine,” Zuko answered impassively as he picked up his ink brush and with graceful strokes of the thin writing instrument, began to write.

Iroh stroked his chin in silent contemplation as he watched his nephew immerse his full attention on what he was doing.

I need another way to make Zuko tell me how it went, even without full sentences, Iroh mused. A thought crossed his mind and a small grin curled his lips as he picked up his teacup and inhaled the sweet aroma.

“So...did you like the bathing suit I chose for Miss Katara, Zuko?” Iroh asked innocently as he took a sip from his tea.

Zuko jumped slightly at the sudden question, causing a smudge to appear on the paper he had been writing on with the ink brush.

Did I like it? Oh, how I liked it! Zuko answered quickly in his mind before he mentally shook his head as images of Katara wearing the mentioned bikini—as well as the sight of her wet skin—flashed before his eyes.

He cleared his throat and shifted slightly in his seat as a heat spread through his body.

“It was...nice,” he replied coolly as he tried to keep his face placid, but it did not work for his flushed right cheek.

Iroh did not miss it and he grinned into his cup.

“So what else did you do at the beach?” he asked.

Besides gawk at Miss Katara, he again added mentally. Iroh raised his teacup in order to hide his ever-growing grin.
Zuko shrugged as he returned his attention to the papers.

“We played a game,” was his short answer.

“I bet it was a fast and easy game,” Iroh said innocently, knowing his nephew hated to be considered a man who enjoyed something that was no challenge to him.

“Fast and easy?” Zuko snorted. “You should have seen how challenging it was.”

“So I take it that Miss Katara beat you.”

“She did not beat me!” Zuko defended himself as he looked up to glare at his uncle.

“Well, who won then?”

Zuko looked back down at his paperwork with a scowl.

“No one,” he muttered.

Iroh threw his head back and laughed.

“It is not that amusing!” Zuko growled irritably, yet Iroh was the only one he allowed to make him feel silly. “I just got…distracted.”

Iroh raised his eyebrow in curiosity, but his nephew did not go into details. The retired general was silent for a moment before he decided to try another tactic in order to get what he wanted to know.

“I bet you stayed away from the water,” he teased as he again took up his teacup.

“Well, you bet poorly because I did go into the water,” Zuko said absentmindedly as he placed his royal seal on a document. “Especially since Katara splashed me with a wave, but I sure got her back, and then I grabbed her—” He trailed off and shut his mouth quickly as he noticed his uncle’s gigantic smile. “What?”
“So you went into the water with Miss Katara and grabbed her, huh?” Iroh grinned as he wiggled his eyebrows before sipping again from his cup.

Zuko flushed slightly as he fought from gaping at his uncle.

“I grabbed her wrists! Because she was going to crush me with a wave!” he growled lowly.

“I see…” Iroh stroked his white and gray beard. To Zuko’s chagrin, the old man grinned even more widely.

“Uncle, don’t start getting any ideas,” Zuko warned as he leaned forward to level a mildly threatening glare at his beloved yet irritating relative.

“Me? Ideas? Oh, Nephew, you wound me!” Iroh exclaimed as he dramatically touched the left side of his chest.

Zuko rolled his eyes just as Toph barged in, throwing the doors aside loudly, before walking confidently in as if she owned the place.

“Hey there, Fire Lord Sparky and Iroh! Chao told me you received some replies,” the blind earthbender said as she stomped her way towards them.

Zuko silently thanked the gods for the interruption. Considering his persuasive uncle, Zuko did not want to divulge the fact that he had laughed. He would never live it down.

“Ah, Miss Bei Fong,” Iroh exclaimed as he saw Toph make her way into his room after she had firmly knocked once on his door.

He had left her finishing her discussion with Zuko hours ago. He frowned slightly. Something seemed to be worrying the small woman.

“Care to join me for a cup of tea before dinner?”
“Why, thank you,” Toph said with a grin.

She followed him to the low table in the middle of his room and sat herself on a cushion. There was a teapot already resting on the table and a few cookies on a porcelain plate.

Iroh handed a teacup to her outstretched hand before he picked up the decorative teapot he had bought in Ba Sing Se and patiently waited for her to speak.

“Iroh, I wanted to talk to you about something important,” the young girl began, “It’s about Sugar Queen and Sparky.”

“What about them, my dear?” Iroh asked as he poured himself more of the hot tea.

“Well, we both have suspicions that they might like each other. I know because I can…well…feel their…feelings, you get me?” Toph said with a frown as she tried to explain.

“Yes, I suspect that they may emit some big vibrations,” Iroh mused. They both laughed loudly.

“Yeah, I felt their feelings for each other change drastically after they returned from searching for the bastard that killed Katara’s mom and after their fight with that psycho Azula,” Toph huffed.

“I was so sure of it and I was so confused when Sparky showed up with Mai. And then imagine my surprise when Twinkletoes announced that Katara and he were together! I never would’ve expected it! His feelings were so obvious, but Sweetness never gave any indication of sharing his feelings. She always seemed like a big sister to him, you could even say like a mother. But when she’s around Zuko…I don’t know, she acts…differently.”

“Yes, I see. Well, I know because I know my nephew better than anyone. He may be calm and controlled in front of everyone else, but I notice how that girl affects him. He can’t hide it from me,” Iroh said and chuckled.

Toph smiled. She could only imagine.

“Well, you see, I kind of feel bad for the others,” Toph began, looking ahead to where Iroh’s voice was coming from.

“What do you mean, my dear?” Iroh asked as he calmly sipped his tea.

“I mean they don’t suspect anything because, as you said, Sparky can be unreadable and Sugar Queen can sometimes...well...be good at hiding things for the wellbeing of others. Besides the fact that they were former enemies, Katara acted indifferent...actually hostile is the right word, when Zuko first joined the gang so it’d be hard to believe they can have feelings for each other. Not to mention the whole crap about them being from opposing elements, and different cultures, and different social status. Everybody is positive that Katara is in love with Aang, and they won’t suspect her having feelings for another, especially because Katara is a very caring and proper person,” she explained rapidly.

“Yes, I understand. It seems we are the only ones willing to see the truth. However, they will have to face it one day. All of them,” he said with a determined nod.

“But that’s the problem.” The earthbender sighed. “Twinkletoes has had a crush on her for a long time and now he’s very happy that Sugar Queen finally accepted him. It kinda makes me feel sad to think how crushed he’ll be when he finds out that the girl he loves doesn’t love him back.

“I mean, Snoozles told me Aang went on an Avatar rampage when he thought she was buried alive! I don’t know what’ll happen to him or what he would do if he finds out. He’ll be devastated,” Toph confessed, lowering her head, her bangs covering her light green eyes.

Iroh regarded the young earthbender with kind eyes before he reached out to pat her small hand.

“My dear Toph, I know how you feel. I care for Avatar Aang as well because he is Zuko’s friend and because he is a good person. Do not think that I am only looking after my own nephew’s happiness—even though he really deserves it. I have thought about Aang’s feelings and, believe it or not, even Mai’s,” Iroh began.

“But let me ask you this, would it not be worse to let them all live a lie?” he continued, “To let Aang and Mai think they are loved, when in reality, the ones they love may be in love with someone else? Is it not be worse that while they are with their loved ones, the loves ones are thinking of someone else?” Iroh placed his hand on Toph’s shoulder. “And what about Zuko and Katara? Would you like them to be in relationships knowing they are not truly in love?”
Toph raised her head. “But, Iroh, I don’t think they are in love with each other yet.”

“Yes, that may be true, but with the way things are going, it seems a likely possibility. I have not lived many years for nothing. Believe me, I know,” he said before he added, “And what if they do fall in love and it is too late?”

Toph sat for a few minutes thinking about what Iroh had said before she straightened in her seat.

“I guess you’re right, Iroh. And all they need is a little help.” She grinned as she cracked her knuckles.

Iroh chuckled. “Yes, they do, for both are very stubborn and headstrong.”

Then with a smile he added, “Do not worry about Aang. He is young and good-looking, not to mention he is the Avatar. I am sure he will have plenty of girls to choose from.”

Toph lowered her head again.

“I guess,” she muttered.

“And I am positive he will find a great woman worthy of him. He will find a woman that will love him as he deserves and that he will love in return. You just wait.” He grinned as he patted her hand again.

Katara entered her room to take a quick bath and change for dinner. As she opened her wardrobe, she could not help but chuckle at Iroh’s enthusiasm. The clothes did help keep her cool in the hot weather, better than the ones she had brought from home. She was not sure she would get the chance to wear all of her clothing before she returned to the Southern Water Tribe, though. A twinge of sadness tugged at her heart as she thought about them leaving the Fire Nation, Iroh and...Zuko.

But perhaps it’s for the best. I would be able to get rid of all these confusing thoughts that have bothered me for the last couple of weeks, Katara thought as she bit her lip.

With a sigh and a mental shake of her head, the young woman looked through her newly acquired clothes to choose an outfit. She began to go for her familiar blue, but she remembered Iroh telling her she needed variety. Going through the clothes again, she chose a red sleeveless tunic with a high collar. It was trimmed in black lace with a sash that went around her waist in the same dark color. Then she put on a skirt of the same dark red that came down to her knees also trimmed in black. Finally, she slipped on a pair of black slippers. Katara went over to the mirror above her dresser and grinned at herself.

Not that bad, she thought with a smirk.

She brushed her brown hair, put it in a bun and made her usual hair loops. She then glanced at her rose hairpin that rested innocently on the surface of the nightstand.

“Katara, are you ready?” she heard Suki called from outside her door, snatching her gaze away from the jewel.

“Yeah, I’ll be there in a minute,” Katara called out.

She checked herself one last time in the mirror before she opened the door. Suki was waiting for her with a smile on her face. The young Kyoshi warrior was wearing a casual brown and pink dress.

“Whoa, Katara! You look wonderful!” Suki exclaimed as she elbowed the younger woman.

“So do you, Suki,” Katara replied and they laughed as they made their way down the hall.

“So when are you and my brother going to finally marry?” Katara asked, nudging the other young woman on her arm.

A dark blush stained the pale skin of Suki’s cheeks as she glanced at Katara before looking away.

“Well, I…Sokka hasn’t…asked me yet,” she replied sadly.

Katara patted her arm in comfort.
“Don’t worry, Suki. Sokka’s crazy about you! Maybe he’s just scared of being rejected,” she teased as they walked down the red and gold halls.

Suki smiled as she raised her head up and straightened her shoulders.

“Well, he shouldn’t because I’m crazy about him too,” she admitted with a grin.

The female warrior eyed her boyfriend’s sister curiously for a moment before she decided to ask the question that had been on her mind for a while.

“And what about you and Aang?” Suki asked as she watched the waterbender closely.

It was Katara’s turn to stammer for an answer as she played nervously with the sash around her waist.

“I…think it’s too early for that,” Katara finally replied with a small shrug.

“Katara,” Suki said seriously as she laid a comforting hand on the younger woman’s shoulder, “You know you can tell me anything. We’re like sisters. Are you…having doubts about your relationship?”

“What? Of course not…” Katara replied, avoiding the other woman’s eyes.

Suki frowned, unconvinced. She pressed her lips together as she removed her hand from the waterbender’s shoulder. She decided not to press the issue as they continued to walk toward the dining room.

Zuko sat at the head of the dining table with Aang on his right and Iroh on his left as they all waited for the young women to arrive.

“What is it with women and being late?” Sokka complained as he hungrily eyed the many plates full of delicious food that sat before him, tantalizing him with their delightful aroma.
Toph snorted and crossed her arms over her chest as she slouched on her seat. Mai rolled her eyes and Ty Lee grinned at the pouting warrior that was sending longing looks at the food.

“Be patient, Sokka, they’ll be here soon,” Aang reassured him as he grinned at his friend, who only frowned back at him.

“Women are such lovely, complicated creatures,” Iroh commented from his spot.

Zuko ignored the other’s talk as he thought back to the conversation he had earlier with Toph. They had gone over the earthbending candidates the Fire Nation had sought out, but Toph had told him none of them were good enough to be instructors and they all asked too much in return. He needed to find a capable earthbender teacher before chaos erupted between the firebenders and the earthbender in his colonies. But who could he ask? Who would be willing to help him and help the Fire Nation?

The young lord was brought out of his thoughts when the guards opened the dining room doors and the waterbender and the Kyoshi Warrior entered. All thoughts on finding an instructor vanished as he stared ahead with an awed expression.

“Wow, Suki! You look amazing!” Sokka exclaimed as he stood up from his seat, forgetting his hungry stomach for a moment, and walked his blushing girlfriend over to the table.

Suki giggled as Sokka gave her a lopsided grin.

“Oh, Sokka, stop,” she said, but he only kissed her hand in response.

Aang watched as Katara turned to look at him and he gave her a small smile. He could not deny that she looked lovely, but he really did not like her in red clothes, he would much prefer if she wore his native colors of yellows and oranges.

Katara frowned at Aang’s lack of reaction. She wanted to be fawned over like Sokka had Suki. She was seriously thinking of changing out of her outfit out of disappointment, but at that moment she glanced at Zuko and she was startled at the expression on his usually cool demeanor. His eyes were wide and he was staring at her with the most enthralled look on his face. She felt herself blush at the intensity of his stare.
“My, my, Miss Katara, you look great. Does she not, Zuko?” Iroh asked, poking Zuko’s arm while he ignored an irritated Mai that was sitting next to him.

“Um…yes, Uncle,” Zuko answered, quickly recovering his composure and glancing away from the lovely waterbender.

Mai raised a thin eyebrow at Zuko before she narrowed her eyes at the Water Tribe woman.

Her blush deepening, Katara muttered a shy word of thanks as she sat down at her spot.

Well, at least some people noticed, she thought as she sat down between Suki and Aang, the latter immediately turning a radiant smile at her. She was puzzled, however, when she noticed Mai’s cold stare from across the table.

“Yeah, you look great, Katara!” Ty Lee spoke up, not noticing Mai’s vexation as she sat next to her.

“Hey, nobody has said how great I look. What am I? Invisible?” Toph snorted next to the smiling Ty Lee.

Aang smiled at the grumbling earthbender.

“You always look great, Toph,” he answered sincerely. “Nobody has to keep telling you that!”

The others immediately agreed. Now seventeen, Toph had really changed into quite a young woman. Despite her rough behavior, she was petite, with a lady-like face and long black hair that she usually wore in a bun with her bangs almost covering her eyes.

“Yeah, yeah, I know,” Toph grumbled as she tried to hide a blush at their compliments.

“And I know I look great,” Sokka said as he wrapped his arm around Suki while with the other hand he stuffed a rice ball in his mouth.

“And so do I,” Iroh laughed as he caressed his slightly bald head.
“So, Sweetness, you sure know how to make an impression,” Toph began with a grin.

very big impression, she thought mentally.

“What do you mean?” Katara asked as she sat at the edge of Toph’s bed. “Sokka was too captivated by Suki and Aang didn’t even say anything.” She crossed her arms in front of her chest and frowned.

“Well, you can’t say the same thing about Sparky,” Toph piped in and grinned as she felt Katara’s heart skip a beat just like every other time the young Fire Lord was mentioned.

“What about Zuko?” Katara asked curiously.

“His heart was racing like crazy! I really wish I could’ve seen his face.” Toph laughed loudly.

Katara felt herself blush lightly before she shook her head at the possibility.

“Maybe it’s because he had never really seen me in red before,” she said with a shrug.

However, that was not true since he had during the war. She really did not have another explanation. Zuko would only ever look at her as his waterbending friend.

What do I have to do to make these people see?! Toph yelled in her head.

The shorter woman paused as the sound of footsteps reached her senses and she cocked her head sideways as she felt someone came down the hall. She grinned when she recognized the familiar footsteps.

“Wait here, Sweetness. I have to…go look for something…” Toph trailed off as she exited the room.

“Okay?” Katara muttered, confused.
First she wants to talk and now she leaves, the waterbender grumbled mentally.

As she walked out of her room, Toph quickly hid behind one of the great, golden pillars. She had to clasp a hand over her mouth to smother her amused chuckles. She felt like a mischievous kid. She grinned even wider as she heard Zuko’s light, but secure footsteps get closer until he was in her room.

“Toph? You wanted to talk to me?” Zuko asked as he walked through the opened door and entered the room.

He closed his mouth and stopped in his tracks as he spotted Katara sitting on the bed. He watched as she quickly stood up and smiled at him.

“Toph just left. Sorry, it’s just me,” she said jokingly as she placed one hand on her hip.

“Oh,” Zuko replied as he returned her smile before he cleared his throat as the opportunity to talk to her alone finally presented itself. He had been waiting to do so ever since the awkward incident in his room. “Um…Katara? About what happened on Ember Island the last night we were there…well…I…Mai and I…didn’t…uh…”

_Dammit! Since when do I stammer? _he groaned in his head.

Blushing deeply, Katara looked away with a shrug.

“You don’t have to explain anything to me. I…I understand…” she said quietly, though she could not stop from feeling embarrassed.

“Well, then…okay…” Zuko said uneasily.

And an awkward silence followed.

_Oh, for the love of everything that is earthbending! _Toph thought irritably as she could not help herself from eavesdropping on the two clueless benders.

“So…what does Toph want to talk to you about?” Katara finally broke the silence as she smiled at the frowning firebender.

Zuko stifled a sigh of relief that the awkward tension had been broken.

“We are trying to find an earthbending instructor for the Fire Nation colonies in the Earth Kingdom,” he replied.

“An earthbending instructor?” Katara asked curiously.

That’s right, she doesn’t know, Zuko thought to himself as Katara gave him a curious stare.

“It’s a long story. I’m sure you won’t be interested in it,” he replied with a small shrug.

“Try me,” Katara said flippantly as she smirked. “I go to meetings at my tribe.”

“Hm…Okay then,” Zuko said with another shrug of his strong shoulders.

He told her about the raids, the damage to the factories and property and about the people who have been killed. He told her of the firebending and earthbending raiders that seemed to be working together and about the strange way they escaped. He also told her of his plan to protect his cities and the people, and finally told her about his dilemma with finding an earthbending teacher.

“That’s horrible! I can’t believe there are still some people doing such awful things. Aang defeated Ozai already and you called the war off. There should be peace!” Katara stated and she sat back down heavily on the bed, rubbing at her temples. After four years, there was still trouble.

Zuko turned to look at her with wide eyes.

“You were actually listening to what I was saying?” he asked.
Katara looked up at him. He sounded surprised and that in turn surprised her.

“Of course, Zuko, why wouldn’t I? And I think it’s so great of you for protecting your people,” she told him sincerely as she smiled at him.

Zuko felt his heart warm at her words. Somebody else besides Iroh had listened to him and was interested in what he said and thought.

Leaning behind the cold pillar, Toph grinned as she listened in on their conversation. When they had seen that terrible play on Ember Island four years ago, she was telling the truth. Everything they had seen was the truth, even if the others did not want to acknowledge it. And that included the feelings these two had for each other. Now if only Zuko and Katara weren’t so afraid to see it, she wouldn’t have to resort to such methods.

The blind earthbender decided it was time to cut in since she felt the others making their way back to their rooms.

“Sparky, there you are! I was looking for you,” Toph called out as she entered the room, acting annoyed.

Zuko turned away from Katara to look suspiciously at the irritated earthbender as she made her way to stand before him.

“Well, here I am,” he replied coolly. “Have you figured out who could be a good instructor?”

“Well, not yet,” Toph said, scratching her head pensively. “I know I would be great, you know, being the Avatar’s former earthbending sifu and all.” She smirked arrogantly. “But I’m busy with the Earth Kingdom’s problems.”

Katara continued to sit on the bed as she silently watched them try to figure the problem out. She rose to her feet and approached them. She cleared her throat and smiled when they turned to look at her.

“Um…you guys? Why don’t you ask Haru? I’m sure he would accept gladly,” she suggested.
Zuko stared at her for a moment before he pinched the bridge of his nose and Toph smacked her forehead.

“Why didn’t I think of that?” Toph yelled as she flung her hands in the air with a disgusted snort.

“I’ll send him a request tomorrow,” Zuko stated pensively, then looking admirably at Katara he remarked, “You’ve barely been here a few weeks and have solved a problem in a few minutes. Thank you.”

“You’re welcome,” Katara replied with a laugh. How could they have missed that?

“Well, now that that’s settled, I’m going to sleep. Good night, you two,” Toph remarked and yawned loudly. Without waiting for either to respond, she pushed them out the door and slammed it behind them.

She has a lot of nerve to slam the door in the Fire Lord’s face, Zuko thought irritably as he glared at the door.

But he could not stay mad at her. Toph was like the little sister he wished he had—one that did not stab him in the back or tried to kill him in his sleep.

“Okay?” Katara said as she stared at the closed door with a frown.

They stood in the corridor uncomfortably for a few moments as they stole glances at each other.

“I’m sure you must be tired. I’ll…walk you to your room,” Zuko said, rubbing the back of his neck briefly, before he straightened himself.

Katara smiled at him.

“Okay, thanks,” she replied happily. It was not as if her room was far or dangerous to walk to, but who was she to complain?
They walked side by side, as they headed down the hall to her room. Zuko could not stop himself from glancing at her out of the corner of his eyes every so often. He still could not get over how fantastic she looked. Red really added favorably to her rich, dark skin.

_I wonder how more favorably her brown skin would look on top of my red bed cover, _Zuko _thought, his eyes becoming hooded. He mentally slapped himself. _I can’t be having such indecent thoughts about Katara!_

Katara turned her head as she caught a glimpse of him looking at her before he quickly looked away.

“What is it?” she asked.

_Do I have something in my hair? Something in my teeth? Oh, how embarrassing! _she thought as she discreetly touched her hair.

“Oh, it’s just that…you look wonderful in red,” Zuko commented softly, trying to hide his embarrassment by intensely looking straight in front of him.

Katara blushed.

“Really? You think so?” she asked, looking down at herself. Her heart did a little somersault.

“Yes, you look great,” Zuko again admitted before he smiled down at her, making her cheeks grow a deeper shade of red.

_She looks so cute when she blushes_, he thought. He frowned at himself. Since when did he use the word cute?

“T-thank you,” Katara said as they finally arrived at her room. “Well, good night, Zuko,” she told him as she opened her door.

“Good night, Katara,” Zuko replied as she closed the door softly behind her after she gave him a smile. He stood there for a few moments before he finally moved away.

He needed to go see Ozai the next day and send Haru his request.

“Why didn’t I think about asking him before?” he berated himself as he made his way to his chambers. “I’m glad Katara is here. I don’t know how long we would’ve gone before we finally realized.” Then smiling he said, “She actually listened to me and didn’t even seem bored.”

He slowed as he neared Mai’s room, debating for a brief moment if to go in, but he continued on his way toward his own chamber, smiling to himself all the way, glad no one was there to see his once in a lifetime silly grin.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After sending an official letter to Haru with his request and explaining the situation to his advisors, Zuko made his way toward the prison tower once again with the hope of finding some answers from his father, but as always, he returned with no more information than before.

Iroh watched his nephew sadly as he once again buried himself in work. Being a Grand Master of the Order of the White Lotus gave Iroh the advantage of being able to find information on anything —example being the gang’s whereabouts—but finding information about Princess Ursa’s location proved to be hard. Ozai seemed to be the only one who knew what happened to her or where she could be, and being the cruel person that his brother was, Iroh was sure only a miracle could help them.

Iroh decided it was time he paid a visit to his younger brother for the sake of his nephew.

Once Iroh stood before the large steel door, the captain of the prison guards quickly opened it for the Dragon of the West. Without any hesitation, the retired general stepped into the dark room and bid the guards to close the door behind him. As his old eyes became adjusted to the darkness, the only light coming from a small torch resting high on the wall beside the door, Iroh noticed the hunched form of his brother leaning against one of the cold walls. The old prince found it unbelievable to see his once condescending brother in such a state and place.

“Hello, Ozai. I see you are still alive,” Iroh said in a jovial voice as he made his way to the bars separating the room.

“Well, well. I’m glad to see you again…Older Brother,” Ozai hissed, the last words filled with hatred.
Iroh did not let it bother him as he took a moment to look around the dirty cell before he returned his gaze to the man behind the steel bars glaring at him with dark, yellow eyes.

“You know I did not come here for a family reunion, Ozai,” Iroh stated solemnly as he placed his hands inside his sleeves.

“I know why you’re here, but you’re just wasting what is left of your pathetic life…old man,” the former Fire Lord sneered.

Iroh sighed irritably. He and Ozai were born a good twenty years apart and such great difference of age did not allow them to become close. While Ozai was barely beginning to learn the art of firebending, Iroh was already beginning to climb the military ladder to becoming a great general.

“Ozai, please tell me where Ursa is,” Iroh began as he coolly observed his younger brother.

“I’ll tell you the same thing I told that sorry excuse of a son I have…not until I am freed from this place,” the disgraced Fire Lord retorted.

Iroh felt his anger rise at the insult inflicted at Zuko, but he kept his temper in check as he narrowed his eyes at his brother.

“Zuko has turned out to be a great man, many times better than you could ever be. And I am proud of what he has become,” Iroh rejoined sharply. “He should have been my son not yours.”

Ozai snorted in reply and flicked a dirty strand of hair behind his shoulder as he looked away.

The retired general continued.

“You will never leave this place because of all the atrocities you have committed against the world. This is where you belong. But you could at least do one good thing in your selfish life and let your son know where to find his mother,” Iroh said in a grave and serious tone.
“Never,” was Ozai’s cruel reply as his eyes flicked toward his older brother. “It is best she stays where she is for her own good.”

“Why do you say that?” Iroh asked warily.

A sinister smile spread across Ozai’s face.

“Let’s just say she would suffer even more if all of the sudden her reunion with her precious son is cut short,” he responded vaguely with a shrug of his thin shoulder.

“What are you talking about?” Iroh exclaimed in alarm. He felt a chill in his heart.

Ozai only stared at him with eyes filled with cruel amusement.

“Oh, you never know what life can bring. Death is always knocking when you least expect it.”

After a few more unsuccessful minutes, Iroh left the prison tower, worry etched in his wrinkled face. He prayed to the gods that Ozai was just bluffing.

After all, what can he do in a secured, enclosed prison cell?

A few days later, the gang sat at the large dining table eating their delicious Fire Nation breakfast. Iroh watched them eat with a small smile on his face before he winked at the short-haired servant who was placing another plate on the large table. He grinned when the young woman blushed before he turned worried eyes to his nephew who was currently talking to the young Avatar. He hoped that what Ozai had said was just a way for his younger brother to try to intimidate him.

Once it seemed the gang was finishing their meal, Iroh asked the young people what they planned to do for the rest of the day.

“I’m not going to be able to keep you company since I have some business to attend to with two elder noblemen,” Zuko told them with a long sigh.
“It’s alright, Zuko. You’re the Fire Lord and have a nation to look after,” Katara told him with an understanding smile.

“I know!” Ty Lee exclaimed. “How about we have a girls’ day out and we go to the spa? It’ll be fun!”

“Oh, no,” Mai grumbled lowly as she pushed her plate away from her.

“A spa? I haven’t been to one in such a long time!” Katara exclaimed excitedly before she turned to grin at the short earthbender. “Remember the one in Ba Sing Se, Toph? How exciting!”

“I guess I do need some pampering.” Toph grinned as she picked at her teeth with her fingernail.

“Well, I was going to take Suki for a romantic walk around the city,” Sokka announced as he embraced his girlfriend. “Do you want to go to the spa with them instead?”

“I already said I was going out with you,” Suki told him, tapping his nose, and earning a radiant smile from him. She turned away to smile apologetically at the others. “I’m sorry.”

“We understand,” Ty Lee said as she grinned at them.

Not wanting to be left out, Aang grabbed Katara’s hand and smiled brightly when she turned to look at him.

“Katara, I was hoping we could go out together, too. We haven’t gone out alone for a very long time,” he piped in with his usual cheery smile.

Katara frowned since it was true.

“But I wanted to go with the girls to the spa,” she told him softly.

“Come on, Katara. It’ll be fun,” Aang pouted before he added, “We are a couple and that means we have to do things together.”
Zuko frowned at the young airbender’s insistence. Katara did not want to go, could Aang not see that?

Sokka spoke up for his little sister as he turned to frown at the young monk.

“Aang, you can’t make someone do whatever you want. You have to consider what they would like, too,” he said, which earned him a few surprised looks at his words.

Toph snorted from her seat.

“Yeah, Twinkletoes. Katara wants to go with us. She has been working too hard, she needs some pampering,” she said.

Zuko nodded in agreement. At their words, Aang looked down and began to push his food around his plate. He didn’t think his request was enough to be chastised for. Could he not spend time alone with his girlfriend? He had missed her. He glanced briefly at Katara before he looked back down at his plate. Couldn’t she see that?

Katara saw the dejection on the airbender’s face and she felt a little guilty. That same feeling of wanting to shield him from the harsh world that she had felt since she rescued him from the ice berg once again surfaced within her.

“It’s okay, you guys. Aang’s right. We could go to the spa some other time,” Katara relented as she turned to smile at Aang.

Aang smiled broadly at her and again reached out to gratefully squeeze her hand.

Zuko frowned even more while Iroh sighed and shook his head.

Sokka’s usual grinning face held a frown and a scowl. He sometimes hated when his sister would always comply to Aang’s whims in order to calm him down. He had to agree with Zuko. Katara mothered Aang too much.
Toph pouted her lips and blew air out, causing her long bangs to lift over her head.

“Great. I’m stuck with Happy and Depressed,” Toph mumbled under her breath to Suki as she tilted her head in Ty Lee and Mai’s direction.

As Zuko went to deal with business, the girls headed to the spa, and Sokka and Suki went on their date, Katara walked around the city with Aang, who as usual, was excited by everything in sight, jumping from place to place. She had to admit she got caught up in his excitement as they walked around, but after a while, she was beginning to get exhausted.

“Aaang! Aaang!” they heard a man call out.

They turned at the sound of the voice and they watched as a man with a colorful outfit waved his hands at them as he swiftly approached them. He bowed deeply as he reached them before he quickly straightened up, his thin mustache twitching as he smiled at them.

“Hello, I am the Ring Master of the circus over there,” the man pointed to a group of more colorful tents off to one side. “Some of my best performers had food poisoning last night and cannot perform, so without any entertainment the people will be very disappointed and the circus will lose money. I was wondering, you being the Avatar and all, if you could help put on a show with some of your bending moves that will surely fascinate everyone,” the man gushed out.

Aang’s gray eyes sparkled with excitement as he turned to stare at the colorful tents where a large crowd was gathering. Joining a circus sounded like fun. It’s funny that a few years ago he would have been killed on the spot instead of being asked to join in a circus act. He looked over at Katara with a smile, but it faded and he frowned.

“I’m sorry. I would like to help, but I’m busy right now,” Aang said as he turned to smile apologetically at the circus man.

The man sank his shoulders in disappointment.

“It’s alright, Aang. I don’t mind. I know you’ll enjoy it and the children will too, so I say you should go,” Katara told him encouragingly. “I’ll meet you at the palace later.”

“Are you sure? I don’t want to leave you by yourself,” Aang said with concern as he reached out a hand to clasp hers.

Katara smiled since she knew he was impatient to go even though he was also worried for her. She laughed as she patted his hand.

“I’m a waterbending master. Don’t worry, I’ll be fine,” she reassured him.

Aang frowned for a few more seconds before he smiled and hugged her gratefully. She was always so considerate of him. How could he not love her?

“We’ll finish our date later, okay?” Aang said as he kissed her cheek.

She only nodded and gave him a small smile. Then almost bouncing with excitement, the young airbender followed the circus man. Katara watched the two walked away until they vanished among the crowd.

“Alright, now where do I go from here?” she said as she looked around, glad for some alone and quiet time, since Aang could sometimes be exhausting.

Katara walked along the clean and pretty streets. The last time she was in the Fire Nation, she was too busy with the war hanging over her head to really appreciate her surroundings. She watched as the people hurried along on the pavement, walking through the various stores and stalls that decorated one side of the street. She liked how the whitewashed houses seemed to reflect the late summer sunlight and how well they looked with the red roofs. She had to admit that she liked the Fire Nation architecture much better than the rough, block-like buildings of the Earth Kingdom. The Fire Nation had a certain elegance in the way the edges of the roofs curled upwards and the patterns and designs that decorated the red pillars and columns.

_of course nothing could compare with the beautiful carvings and designs on the Water Tribe buildings_, she boasted mentally.

_I wonder how Dad and Gran-Gran are doing_, she thought as she searched among the things in the stalls. She grinned. _I hope my waterbending students are treating Master Pakku well._

As she continued to walk through the city, she noticed the people staring at her with wide eyes as she passed them by. Her blue clothes, her dark skin, and her blue eyes set her apart as a Water Tribe woman. Some of the citizens returned her smile, while others only looked away haughtily and with disdain. It saddened her a bit, but she did not let it bother her much, she understood that there was still resentment and mistrust.

She stopped at a store that held interesting trinkets and peeked in through the large window that held the displays. She noticed a crystal tiger-armadillo in a lunging position with red stones as eyes. She smiled and could not help thinking of Iroh, the shopaholic. She was positive that if the cheerful compulsive shopper were there, he would have probably bought the whole store already.

Shifting her eyes to get a better look inside the store through the clean window, she caught the reflection of two men looking at her from behind the darkness of an alley. She turned her head slightly, pretending to fix her dress, and sure enough, they were still there, staring at her with dark eyes. They did not look like pitiable thieves for their clothes were those worn by the upper-middle class, so she had a feeling that they were not going to steal from her. Katara moved away quickly, but not too fast as to alert them that she had seen them. She shifted her waterskin closer to her hip so she could have better access just in case. She looked over her shoulder again and noticed the men were gone.

_Maybe I’m just being paranoid._ She shook her head and laughed lightly at her silliness.

After walking for a few more hours without any more incidents, she decided it was time to head back to the palace. She turned around and immediately stopped in her tracks. The two men she had seen earlier were now waiting ahead of her. She quickly turned back and took another street. She cursed mentally when the men followed closely.

Katara did not like the looks they were giving her. She resisted the urge to turn around and water whip them, she did not want to be the first to cause a scene that could make the Fire Nation citizens mistrust her more. As she kept on walking, she realized that there were less people around. She cursed herself for not paying closer attention to where she was going. She turned her head back and noticed they were closing in on her.

With quick steps, Katara turned sharply at a corner and ran into someone’s broad chest, eliciting a shocked gasp from her lips. At the sudden impact, she stumbled backwards and lost her balance. A pair of strong, familiar hands grasped her small wrists to catch her from falling, pulling her close against a hard chest.

“Katara!” she heard Zuko exclaim in surprise.

_‘I’ll save you from the pirates.’_
Katara shook her head as the memory surfaced in her mind before she looked up to see Zuko’s concerned face looking down at her anxiously. About six of his guards were standing attentively behind him as they watched their lord and the waterbender curiously. Katara averted her gaze when she realized she had been staring at Zuko’s face and she tried to keep from blushing at the proximity between their bodies.

“Katara, are you all right? I’m sorry. I didn’t see you there,” Zuko told her with a frown as he steadied her.

“It’s okay, I’m fine,” she reassured him and laughed nervously as she backed away a step before looking curiously behind her.

Zuko looked over her head to see what she was looking at and noticed the two men who had immediately stopped in their tracks. Realizing they were in the presence of the Fire Lord, the men tried to retreat quickly.

“Get them!” Zuko ordered fiercely as he pulled Katara to his side.

Two pairs of guards sprang forward at the command and quickly apprehended the men who were trying to escape. After bringing the struggling and protesting men toward their lord, the guards roughly pushed them to their knees.

“Why were you two following the lady?” Zuko questioned heatedly as he narrowed his golden eyes at them.

“We w-weren’t following her, y-your Majesty…We were just going the same way,” the oldest one spoke up innocently, trying to sound courageous. The younger man beside him bobbed his head rapidly in agreement.

“Don’t lie to me!” Zuko barked, causing the kneeling men to cringe in fear as he loomed over them.

Katara stared wide-eyed at the irate Fire Lord. She had almost forgotten how fierce-looking Zuko could be.
The young Fire Lord turned his head toward the silent waterbender, his expression softening for a brief moment before it turned dark again.

“Are you okay? Did they hurt you?” he asked, his voice turning hard as he looked back at the trembling men before him.

“No, I’m fine, really,” Katara reassured him. Then looking at the two frightened men she said, “Zu—Fire Lord Zuko, I’m sure they meant no harm,” she told him softly before she smiled at the men.

The two men only stared in disbelief. She was defending them?

“They better not have,” Zuko sharply replied.

Then in a calmer and stern voice, he addressed the men, who gulped at the glare he aimed at them.

“Gentlemen. I hope you were not trying to intimidate her because she is a Water Tribeswoman. We are at peace now and we must respect each other. You may leave now and let this never occur again,” Zuko ordered, his tone implying that there will be punishment if he were to be disobeyed.

The two men readily nodded and reverently retreated. They stole apologetic glances at Katara before they disappeared from sight.

“Why were you alone in the first place? Where’s Aang?” Zuko asked Katara as he looked her over in order to reassure himself that she was indeed okay.

Katara explained to him what had happened in the morning with Aang and shrugged nonchalantly.

“Don’t make such a big deal about it. I had everything under control. I can defend myself, you know,” Katara huffed and narrowed her eyes, placing her hand on her hips.

Zuko smirked.

“I never said you couldn’t,” he responded, “You have shown that many times over.”
Katara smiled at him for the compliment.

“Thanks, anyway,” she added.

Zuko nodded at her as he gave her a small smile that Katara would not have seen it if she had not been looking intently at his face.

“It’s a few hours past noon. I bet you must be hungry,” he remarked.

Tilting her head back to look at the cloudless blue sky, Katara was impressed at how well firebenders could tell time by simply feeling the sun’s energy. Zuko did not even bother to lift his golden eyes upward in order to judge the position of the sun. She then realized she had not eaten since the morning, had skipped lunch, and would have to wait for dinner. But she was not about to complain in front of the Fire Lord and his guards.

“No, I’m not hungry at all,” she lied and plastered a smile on her face.

But it seemed the world decided to cause her trouble for the day, because her stomach growled loudly just as she spoke. Katara clutched her stomach and blushed in embarrassment.

“Well, sure does not seem like it,” Zuko replied and chuckled quietly.

His guards stared in disbelief at their lord. They rarely ever saw the young Fire Lord smile and now he was chuckling!

“Great. I’m turning into Sokka. Now your cooks are going to have to work overtime!” Katara teased.

Zuko let out a low laugh. Katara smiled. Zuko’s laughter was nice to listen to since it was so rare.

I like to make you laugh, she thought as she watched him before she shook away her sudden daze.
The guards looked amongst themselves and smiled minutely. Maybe the Water Tribe woman was not that bad.

“Come. I have missed lunch also and dinner is still some hours away. Let’s go get something light to eat,” Zuko said as soon as he stopped laughing.

He walked ahead, motioning for her to follow him when he noticed her staring at him. His guards followed behind them at a close yet respectful distance so their lord could converse with the waterbending woman privately.

They were walking in what seemed to be the wealthy part of the city—not that the other parts were run-down like the lower district of Ba Sing Se, Katara amended. The waterbender observed how the citizens reverently bowed before Zuko, who would politely nod back in acknowledgment. However, she noticed with some confusion how some of them bowed rigidly as if they hated to do it. She became slightly annoyed at the cold stares they would give him and she wondered why they acted like that towards him and if Zuko even noticed.

As they kept on walking, Katara noticed that there were many noblemen and women riding on elegant palanquins. Some of their servants were carrying them while other servants trailed after them.

“Zuko? May I ask you a question?” Katara asked as she lifted her head to look at him.

“Yes, of course,” he answered as he kept walking straight ahead.

“Why aren’t you riding a palanquin? I mean, you’re the Fire Lord, shouldn’t you be carried everywhere?” she asked curiously.

Zuko chuckled again and the guards smiled beneath their serious expressions.

“You’re right, but I do not want to be pampered just because I am the Fire Lord. I like to walk around my city. But I do use the palanquin or a carriage when I go far or for special occasions,” he explained before he looked down at her. “Why? Do you want me to call for my palanquin?” he asked. He berated himself for not asking her if she was tired before since she had been walking around the city for hours.

“No. I can walk, too, you know. I’m used to it,” she said smiling before she shrugged. “I was just wondering.” She was glad to know Zuko had not become spoiled royalty.

Zuko led them to an elegant restaurant, where the short, bald owner and his customers greeted him superfluously.

“My lord, it is an honor to have you here! I will immediately set a single table for you,” the stout, old man said excitedly as he bowed a few more times, almost tripping over his feet in his excitement.

Before the man could turn to leave, Zuko spoke up coolly.

“I want a table for two. For the young lady and me,” he announced and nodded at Katara.

The bald man turned to look at her as if he barely realized she was there. Katara resisted the urge to roll her eyes at him.

Looking her over critically, the man finally spoke.

“Uh…yes, my lord, as you wish,” he agreed, though it was easy to detect the distaste in his tone. He then turned around and left to prepare their table.

The restaurant was a large, two story building with tall red wooden pillars and golden paper lanterns running along the ceilings and edges of the roof. It was considered one of the best restaurants in the city and so it was very crowded, much to Zuko’s annoyance. He did not like to eat out where there were so many irritating people, who were either trying to get his attention or were simply judging his every move. However, he decided to brush it all off since he could not let Katara go hungry.

As they were led to a more prestigious part of the restaurant, Katara noticed the glares she received from everyone and she wondered if it was because she was a Water Tribe member. Zuko noticed this as well and he was greatly displeased.

“I hope you are not being rude to the lady,” Zuko said sharply at the owner who seemed reluctant to acknowledge the waterbender.

“Of course not, your majesty,” the short man replied before he turned to look at the young woman.
“What would the young…lady like?” he asked curtly.

Instead of showing fear or anger, Katara simply smiled at him and answered politely. She tried to be cordial with the owner and his waiters and even to the customers that were closest to their table. She wanted to show them that she wanted no more resentment and hatred between all of them. They were taken aback by the waterbender and murmured quietly amongst themselves.

When the food was finally served to them, Katara looked over to Zuko, who was slowly and properly eating his food with his chopsticks, before she returned her attention to her own meal. They ate in silence for a while as they enjoyed the food. Finally remembering that Zuko was not really a good conversationalist, Katara decided to break the unbearable silence.

“So…how did it go with those bickering, rich men?” she asked as she took a small bite of a dumpling.

“The usual, tiring,” he simply answered.

“Come on, tell me how it went,” she insisted. When she realized he was not going to say anything she added, “We’re friends, aren’t we?”

Zuko looked up at her from his plate.

“It’s just political things,” he responded impassively. “I’m sure it’s not interesting.”

Slightly annoyed, Katara sighed loudly as she played with her food.

“Are we going to have this discussion again? I am not stupid! I know politics,” she told him as she pointed her chopsticks indignantly at him.

Zuko was unable to stop from rolling his eyes at her insistence.

“Okay, fine,” he relented with an inaudible sigh. “I had to go settle this dispute between two wealthy men. Their families have been neighbors for many generations, but the current owners now are fighting each other for a patch of land both claim as theirs. They have gone as far as inflicting damage to each other’s properties. I told them I’ll figure out a way to settle it,” Zuko explained. He was seriously considering seizing the piece of land away from them both and not giving them anything for wasting his time with such a foolish dispute.

“Well, that’s a silly thing to be arguing about,” Katara said with a frown as she chewed on a piece of vegetable. “You should take that patch of land so neither one of them loses or wins. If neither one has it, then they can’t fight each other for it.”

Zuko stared at her. It looked like he was not the only one who thought it was a good idea.

“Well, I’m just saying since you are the Fire Lord and all,” Katara quickly added as she continued to eat, hoping she had not stepped over the line.

“I think that is a great idea, Katara. But what will I do with it? I don’t need more land for myself,” Zuko said after the waiter set down their desserts.

“Well, why don’t you make it into a park or…a playground?” Katara suggested. She tasted the chocolate strawberry pastry and her blue eyes widened in pleasure at the delicious taste. “Mmm, this is good.”

Zuko smiled at the delighted expression on her face before he continued speaking, “That sounds great. The children will like that. Thank you for the advice.”

“No problem.” Katara smiled as she continued to savor the sweet dessert.

She would make a good advisor, Zuko thought as he watched her enjoy her pastry. If only the elder advisors allowed women to participate in the meetings.

They continued eating and talking pleasantly for a few hours, catching up on things that had happened to them for the past four years. As they finished their meal, Zuko thanked the owner passively as he turned to leave. Katara smiled and kindly thanked the stout man and those who worked for him for their service. They thanked her in return and bowed to her and Zuko.

“So has Haru responded to you yet?” Katara asked as they walked down the street again, a light breeze passing them by.
“Yes. I received a letter this morning where he said he was arriving in a few weeks,” Zuko informed her.

“Haru is visiting? How exciting to see him again! I hope he agrees to help you with the earthbenders in your colonies,” Katara said as they rounded a corner.

The universe seemed set to torture her on that day as she again bumped into someone. It was a small boy, who was carrying a rather large barrel of water with difficulty. As soon as they crashed into each other, the water spilled onto the floor and onto Katara’s short, blue dress.

Zuko again caught her in his arms before she fell backwards and held her to him. He felt Katara tense and he immediately placed her on her own feet before he glared at the one responsible. His eyes softened when he realized it was just a small boy, probably eight-years-old.

The boy had fallen to the ground on his rear and as soon as he recognized the people he was looking up at, he immediately went on his knees and hands, fear evident in his big eyes.

“Please forgive my clumsiness. I didn’t mean any disrespect. I’m sorry,” the child apologized on the brink of tears.

Zuko was faintly reminded of himself on that dreadful day when he had received the scar on his face from his own father as he watched the boy cower before them. Zuko, his guards, and the crowd that had gathered turned to look at Katara. Zuko knew it was just an accident, obviously the boy could not see over the large barrel.

“It’s okay. It wasn’t your fault. Are you hurt?” Katara asked softly as she lifted the small child to his feet and dusted him off, checking to see if he got hurt. She kneeled in front of him so they were eye-level and offered him a sweet smile.

“You aren’t going to punish me?” the boy asked as he looked up at the pretty lady.

“Punish you? Of course not! It was an accident,” Katara replied and she smiled gently at him. “Besides, no harm done.”
She stood up, and with a graceful sweep of her arms, she bent the water from her clothes and placed it back into the barrel. Then she did the same thing to the water on the ground, making sure the water was clean. Seeing the boy’s awed expression, Katara decided to use more of her waterbending for the boy’s amusement, to show she was not angry with him.

Smiling mysteriously, Katara gathered a tendril of water from the barrel and wound it around one of her arms, up around her neck, and back down her other arm until it collected into a ball of water between her hands. Watching the boy looking at her movements with curiosity, Katara gracefully twisted her hands and the liquid ball shifted and quivered into two shapes. Gracefully shifting her fingers and wrists, the two shapes transformed into a pair of koi fish with long flowing tails and fins.

The boy gasped in amazement as he stared at the floating shapes circling each other and Zuko smiled at the interaction between the waterbender and the boy. He heard the gathering crowd murmur in admiration.

Grinning, Katara again moved her hands and the two koi fish combined to make another round shape. Pulling her hands aside, she stretched the water into a long horizontal shape until it took on the form of a dragon with long streaming whiskers and tail. The boy’s eyes widened in delight. The liquid dragon twisted and weaved around itself in the space between the waterbender’s hands before it slowly floated toward the boy. It flew gracefully around his body and head. The boy laughed when the dragon’s tail brushed against his cheek before it returned into the bucket of water. Laughing enthusiastically, forgetting the incident from a few minutes ago, the boy looked up to smile widely at kind waterbender.

Zuko hid a smile as a few people in the crowd clapped delightedly at the show. He was sure if the incident had been with a Fire Nation noblewoman, the poor child would have had it bad. He smiled at how well Katara handled the situation, with kindness and gentleness. It touched his hardened heart.

“Tell me, boy, why were you carrying such a heavy thing in the first place?” Zuko addressed the child with a small smile.

Katara stared wide-eyed at Zuko. She was surprised at how softly Zuko asked the question.

The boy smiled and inclined his small head respectfully in the presence of the Fire Lord as he nervously played with the bottom of his shirt.

“My mother needed water and I was the only one who could bring it to her since my father got sick and he can’t stand yet,” he explained.
Katara noticed Zuko furrow his forehead in displeasure before he turned to one of his guards.

“Help the boy take the barrel to his home,” he ordered.

The guard bowed before he stepped forward and lifted the barrel. The boy looked at them gratefully and bowed with a huge smile on his young face as he followed the guard. The crowd murmured in approval. Without another word, Zuko turned away and continued walking down the street, away from the commotion.

“That was really nice of you, Zuko,” Katara praised as she fell in step with his long strides.

“It was the least I could do. Children are not supposed to carry such heavy things,” he replied.

Children are not supposed to be burned by their own father and banished from their homes, he thought bitterly.

Katara smiled at him.

“I’m glad you think so, too. Children are meant to play and have fun, not work hard in order to support their families.” She sighed.

She knew how that felt. She felt Zuko place his strong hand on her shoulder as he gave her a small smile. Her heart skipped a beat. Zuko sure had a nice smile.

They walked leisurely around the city as Zuko made sure everything was in order. He showed her around, both stopping to admire one thing or another, smiling or nodding in return to the citizens that passed them by in order to see the pretty and kind waterbender others were already talking about since the incident.

They did not realize it was getting late until the street lamps were lit, casting a warm, orangey color onto the city streets. They reminded Katara of the ones back home.
“It’s getting dark. We should head back to the palace,” Zuko commented as he held back a sigh.

“Yeah,” Katara agreed quietly.

They reluctantly headed back, each saddened to see their outing coming to an end. As they entered the palace, Zuko dismissed his guards, who bowed and smiled at them as they retreated.

“Um…Zuko?” Katara asked shyly.

“Yes, Katara?”

“Thank you…for giving me a tour of your city,” the waterbender said softly.

Zuko smiled. No, thank you for accepting.

“You’re welcome,” he responded.

Under the lamps and torches in the corridors, Katara noticed how the light reflected on Zuko’s fire crown and his black, red, and golden armor as well as on the scabbard of his broadswords on his right hip.

“Zuko, why are you wearing armor and why do you carry your swords?” Katara asked.

“My, my, you sure are full of questions today,” Zuko mused and chuckled.

“I can go back to ignoring you if you want,” Katara retorted playfully.

Zuko chuckled again before he shook his head and became serious once more.

“Well, I carry my swords and wear my armor when I leave the palace walls to protect myself. Even though we aren’t at war anymore, many people still wish me dead,” he said emotionlessly.
Katara gasped silently before she lightly touched his arm.

“That is only a handful of people, Zuko. But the rest of the world respects you and is grateful for what you have done to bring peace back to a chaotic environment. I know I am,” she said softly.

Zuko’s heart warmed at her words. He was about to clasp her hand in his when Aang appeared ahead of them.

“Katara! Where were you?” Aang called out as he approached them, the rest of the gang following behind him.

Katara pulled her hand away and Zuko resumed his usual unreadable demeanor.

“You said you were going to be here when I got back,” Aang said with a hurt frown. “I was waiting and you—”

“Aang, stop,” Zuko interrupted. “Katara has no fault that she forgot. She was with me.”

Iroh lifted his eyebrows at his nephew’s words and Toph smirked.

“And what were you two doing?” Mai asked icily. Aang waited for the same answer.

“We…bumped into each other, went to eat, and then walked around the city. We lost track of time. That is it,” Zuko said firmly, his voice hinting that there would be no more questions.

With that, the Fire Lord turned and walked toward his study room. Mai gave Katara one last glare before she went after Zuko.

Katara turned her attention away from the retreating form of Zuko and glared at Aang.
“I’m tired,” she said before he could talk and walked to her room.

Aang stared after her with a confused and hurt expression.

“So…anyone want to play Pai Sho?” Iroh asked the others that were left behind as he smiled sympathetically at the young airbender.

Zuko opened the door to his study and went over to his desk to finish some of his paperwork. He sighed angrily when he heard his door open and he looked up to see Mai’s irritated face.

“What is it, Mai?” he asked tersely as he looked back down to his papers.

“I want to know why is it that every time I ask you to spend some time with me you say that you have too much work,” Mai said, trying to keep her tone indifferent.

Zuko looked up.

“Well, because it’s true,” he replied calmly.

“But you took the Water Tribe woman out into the city!” Mai hissed.

Zuko frowned.

“Her name is Katara. And I told you we just met each other accidentally. And we were hungry, so I took her to eat. What’s the problem?” he asked irritably as his brow furrowed deeply.

Mai sighed angrily before she took a breath to calm her emotions down before she gave him a smile. She moved behind his desk, ignoring the wary look he sent her way.

“Well, how about we spend some time alone right now? You could put off your work for a few more hours,” she said as she leaned in to kiss him.
Zuko held up his hand to stop her.

“I don’t have time right now. I lost track of time already and I’m behind on my paperwork. But I promise I’ll take you wherever you want next time,” he told her so he could be left alone.

Mai frowned at first, but then smiled.

“Okay then,” she said before she kissed his right cheek and left the room.

Zuko sighed again and continued with his paperwork, but he was unable to stop thinking about his day with Katara. He just felt so relaxed and at ease around her. He replayed in his mind what Katara had told him earlier.

‘But the rest of the world respects you and is grateful for what you have done to bring peace back to a chaotic environment. I know I am.’

He was relieved to know that not everybody wanted him dead.
Sitting high on his throne, Zuko listened semi-patiently as several representatives of various Earth Kingdom villages and cities gave their speeches. Some asked for his aid in reconstructing their homes and others searched for a better trade agreement for both countries. Some were respectful—even cordial—when they addressed him, but others were stiff and impolite, making it clear they still did not trust him or the Fire Nation. And he had to deal with more in the next meeting.

As the last representative left the throne room, Zuko let out an inaudible sigh as he allowed his tensed muscles to relax. He had been prepared to step down the dais, but was surprised and a bit annoyed to hear that someone else was asking for an impromptu audience with him. Nodding his approval rigidly to his guard, he waited for the individual to make an appearance. The large golden doors were opened again and a tall young man with long, brown hair and green robes strode into the throne room. As soon as he saw the man’s face—or more accurately, his thin mustache—Zuko’s lips twitch into a small smile.

“Haru, I didn’t expect you so soon. Welcome,” he greeted genially.

Parting the wall of fire, the young Fire Lord walked down the smooth, marble steps from his throne to stand in front of the young man. Haru had grown taller since the last time they had seen each other, they were almost the same height, but he still had that affable face of his.

“Thank you,” Haru replied amiably.

He bowed and with a small smile he continued, “I heard some Earth Kingdom representatives were coming to the Fire Nation, so I boarded their ship. So in what way can I help you? Your message sounded urgent. I have to admit I was a bit surprised to know you needed my help.”

“Katara was the one who actually advised me to ask for your assistance,” Zuko admitted.

The young Fire Lord then briefly explained to the earthbender the situation in the colonies and the reason he had requested his presence. Haru regarded the young lord carefully as he listened attentively. He was glad he had helped Zuko claim the Fire Nation throne from Ozai. Zuko did seem interested in helping not only his nation, but the others as well.

“They’re just a few colonies and you will go from one to the other after the benders have been taught. I will pay you for your services, of course, and it will only be temporary until the earthbenders are able to protect themselves,” Zuko continued.

“I understand and will be glad to help you,” Haru agreed readily.

Haru’s own village had been full of mistrust between both cultures at first, but things had settled down and he would be glad if he could do the same for the other villages.

“Come, the rest of the gang is here, too,” Zuko announced as he turned toward the doors.

He motioned for Haru to follow him as he walked out the large throne room. As they talked about more details, Zuko smirked inwardly at the astounded expression the other young man wore as he stared at all the magnificent things they passed.

“Haru!” they heard Aang exclaimed.

Haru turned his attention to the voice and smiled as he saw Aang and Sokka walking over to greet him. He noticed the others sitting in what seemed like a very large sitting room off to the side of the corridor. There were sofas, divans, and cushions spread around the place. A large tea table rested in the middle where the women were currently sitting. Toph, Katara and Suki turned around and smiled.

“Is that your friend Haru?” Ty Lee asked. “He’s so cute,” she said barely above a whisper.

Mai rolled her eyes as she took a slow sip of her tea while Suki and Katara smiled and giggled at the moonstruck look on the acrobat’s face. Toph grinned as she scratched her chin.

“Hey, Haru!” the small earthbender called out as she reclined on the large cushion she was sitting on. “Long time no see.” She grinned widely at her words.

Haru smiled under his thin mustache.

“Hello, girls,” he said as he and Zuko walked towards them.
They stood up to give him friendly hugs as they chatted excitedly about what they all have been up to since the end of the war. Watching the reunited group of friends silently, Zuko noticed that Haru did not actually mind being hugged, unlike him who would stiffen at the idea. Not that he minded being embraced by a certain waterbender…

Frowning, Zuko quickly brushed the thought out of his head.

“This is Ty Lee. She’s an awesome acrobat, very bendy,” Toph spoke up with a grin as she pushed Haru toward the lively Fire Nation girl who had a large smile on her pretty face.

“Yes, I saw you before, at Zuko’s coronation,” Haru smiled shyly. “But you were wearing the Kyoshi armor.”

Ty Lee giggled. She was now wearing a typical Fire Nation outfit, only it was pink.

“I saw you, too,” she cooed as she twirled so she could show off her attire. “Anyway, since I’m in the Fire Nation I decided to change into my old style for a while. Do I look nice?”

She batted her eyelashes as she looked up at the handsome earthbender. Mai rolled her eyes again at Ty Lee’s obvious flirtation before she was distracted by the sight of Zuko staring at the waterbender before he looked away. She clenched her hands around her teacup tightly.

“Uh…y-yes,” Haru stammered and cleared his throat as he felt his cheeks burn.

His blush deepened when Toph elbowed his side and Suki and Katara stifled their giggles.

“So is everything settled?” Sokka asked, turning away from the slightly awkward display to look at Zuko.

“Yes. Haru has agreed to help. He will leave to the first colony in a few weeks after I give him more information,” Zuko answered.

“In a few weeks? That’s too bad,” Ty Lee pouted as she grabbed onto Haru’s arm, whose entire face turned red at the sudden attention.
The following day found Katara resting on her bed, bored. Zuko and Iroh were in a meeting. Aang, Toph and Haru were practicing earthbending with Ty Lee watching excitedly, and Sokka and Suki went out into the city again. They asked her if she wanted to go with them, but she did not want to be a bother, so she had declined their offer. And she sure did not want to spend her time with Mai.

She did not understand why Mai acted so coldly toward her. Had she done something to upset her? She brushed the question out of her mind. Mai never seemed like the friendly type. It was probably normal. Rolling onto her side, Katara looked at Momo sitting on one of her pillows, licking his paws clean.

“At least I have you to keep me company, right, Momo?” she said with a yawn.

The green-eyed lemur lifted his face from his task and chirped at her in response before returning to groom himself. Katara smiled at the cute little animal before she raised her head when a knock sounded on the partially opened door of her room. She noticed it was Jiao standing outside and she quickly sat up on the bed.

“Hello, Jiao,” she called out with a smile.

“Lady Katara, is there something you need? Some refreshments?” the maidservant asked as she entered the room with a small smile.

“No, I’m fine,” Katara replied with a shake of her head before she smiled again. “Well, I would like it if we could talk. You know, as friends.”

Jiao stared at the young Water Tribe woman with wide, confused eyes.

“You want to be friends with me? A servant?” she asked incredulously.

“Of course. I don’t agree with all that social status nonsense or whatever. You’re really nice to me. And Fire Lord Zuko and General Iroh trust you. So what do you say?” she asked, leaning back against the wall. Momo took the opportunity to sit on her lap to be petted.

The young servant woman shifted uncertainly for a moment before she broke out into a large smile.
This woman was different from the haughty and cold Fire Nation noblewomen—like Lady Mai. Now she understood why the Fire Lord appreciated the waterbender and had ordered her to personally attend to the water tribeswoman.

“It would be an honor, Lady Katara,” Jiao replied softly as she bowed.

After a few attempts, Katara finally managed to get Jiao to open up to her. They talked lightly about their interests and shared childhood memories. Katara found out Jiao was in charge of the Fire Lord’s accommodations, the only one allowed to enter his bedchamber to ensure that his room and clothes were clean and tidy. Zuko trusted her because she was an honorable servant and because her mother used to serve under Princess Ursa. Jiao was alone now, however. Her father died a few years after Ozai became Fire Lord and her mother died a few years ago. And Jiao had no brothers or sisters.

“Oh, Jiao, I’m so sorry,” Katara told her sadly. At least she had Sokka when their mother died and their father went away to fight in the war.

“You do not need to feel bad, Lady Katara. Fire Lord Zuko has been kind to me and I am glad to serve him,” Jiao assured her.

Katara noticed that Jiao held a fondness and respect for Zuko just as she had seen in Admiral Jee.

As they continued talking while Jiao tidied up the room, they noticed Mai walk quickly past Katara’s doors. Jiao held her breath until the young noblewoman was out of sight.

“Jiao, what’s wrong?” Katara asked as she noticed the servant’s reaction. She bit her lip before hesitantly asking, “Is Mai…mistreating you?”

She had heard of the nobility abusing their servants and nobody seemed bothered by that, but it bothered her. Jiao looked down and remained silent and Katara became alarmed.

“Please, tell me, Jiao. I’ll try to help you,” Katara encouraged her softly. “You can’t take that from anybody. Please, trust me.”

The young servant looked up and seeing Katara’s concerned face she quickly tried to reassure her.
“No, do not fret Lady Katara,” Jiao said with a shake of her head and a small smile. “Lady Mai does not mistreat me. I am not trying to complain or be ungrateful but...it’s just...she is very rude and cold, not to mention overbearing, acting as if she is the lady of the house.”

Upon hearing this, Katara looked away with a small shrug.

“Well, she will be someday,” she said, almost in a whisper. She did not know why the idea depressed her so much.

Jiao regarded her pensively for a moment before she walked over to stand before the young woman who was now sitting dejectedly on the bed.

“Well, I have to continue with my duties, Lady Katara. If you need to talk to me again, I will be glad to listen,” she informed her and bowed. Then smiling she said, “You know, Lady Katara, many things can change in a short amount of time.”

Katara stared after the young woman as she retreated out of the room and closed the door softly behind her. With a small sigh, Katara reached for her rose hairpin and began to caress the colorful stones. Feeling that she was settling into a confusing dark mood, Katara decided to go to the public garden. Maybe the fresh air would lift her spirits. Picking Momo from her lap, she made her way to the door.

As she walked to her destination, Katara held back an irritated groan as she came across the same rude, old man from before. Advisor Wei, she believed was his name. She tried to avoid the infuriating advisor, but he stepped right in front of her, cutting off her path—which was easy to do since he was so large. Momo chattered loudly, mistrustful of the man and climbed behind Katara’s back, his large ears and eyes peeking over her shoulder.

“And where are you going in such a hurry, girl?” Wei sneered.

“To the garden,” she simply replied. She glared at him as she tried to go around him again.

“But you can’t go there,” he mocked as he blocked her path again.

“And why not?” she asked defiantly as she crossed her arms. “No one has told me otherwise.”
“The garden is only for the Fire Nation nobility,” Wei sneered again. “And the last time I checked you are neither from the Fire Nation nor a noblewoman. You are but a simple tribeswoman.”

Katara opened her mouth to retort, but she stopped herself, letting her arms fall at her sides.

Maybe he’s right and I’m not supposed to be there, she thought with a frown.

“Advisor Wei!” Katara heard Zuko growl out.

Surprised, Katara and the old advisor turned at the sound of the young lord’s angry voice and they watched as he approached them in quick, irate strides. Katara felt her heart skip a beat at the sight of his tall frame.

“I thought I warned you not to bother Lady Katara again,” Zuko growled out as he stood beside the unusually quiet waterbender and glared at the man.

“I was merely telling her the truth,” Wei replied with a shrug. “She is just a Water Tribe peasant. She does not belong here.”

Katara looked down at the floor at his words, though it was more to keep from water whipping the advisor than anything else. Zuko, on the other hand, was unable to curb his anger, for he wanted Wei to know how greatly displeased he was.

“I’ll have you know, her father is Chief of the Southern Water Tribe. Lady Katara is a War hero and has proven to be a great healer and a skillful warrior. She could put many of my soldiers to shame with her waterbending. I will not tolerate any more of your insults, Wei,” Zuko told him in a harsh tone. Narrowing his eyes, he added, “You are dismissed from the next five meetings.”

Wei sputtered angrily for a moment before he opened his mouth to protest, but Zuko cut him off sharply.

“Leave my presence now,” he snapped and waved his hand dismissively.
Wei glared at them as he looked from one to the other, his chubby hands clenched at his sides in indignity and rage. A strange emotion flashed across his face before a smirk curled his lips. Without another word, the old man turned around and lumbered down the corridor.

Katara let out a sigh of relief as she turned to smile at Zuko.

“Thanks,” she said.

Zuko nodded at her as he glared after Wei, watching as he rounded the corner. Momo emerged from behind Katara’s shoulder and perched on it with a relieved chirp.

“The meeting is already over?” Katara asked in order to lighten up the mood.

“Yes,” Zuko answered with a slight nod before he looked down at her. “You were going to the public garden?” he asked.

“Uh…yeah,” she answered with a shrug.

Zuko turned so he could be facing her and he found that he did not like the way her shoulders drooped. He cursed Wei for distressing her. If only there was a way he could cheer her up. Jiao had told him that Katara liked to go into the public garden, but he was sure it was not good enough for her to enjoy. He smiled as a thought came to his mind.

“Come. I want to show you something better,” he said quietly.

Katara raised her eyebrow at him, but she followed him when he just smiled and began to walk away. Momo clutched her hair and chattered curiously. They walked the opposite way, going to where their rooms were located in the western wing of the palace. A moment later, they stepped outside, the bright sun enhancing the serene place before them. Zuko glanced at Katara and smiled as he watched her reaction to what she saw.

Katara gasped softly in surprise and her eyes widened as she took in the sight before her. It was another garden, but this one was much grander, surrounded by high walls lined with small golden lamps. From where she stood, she could spot white and purple orchids, firelilies, violets, hydrangeas, peonies and many other types of flowers beautifully and carefully arranged in patterns around the garden. There were also different varieties of trees from large oaks to weeping willows, and the vivid green grass was lush and carefully groomed. She had never seen such a beautiful garden before, and if they had still been at war, she would not have believed that the Fire Nation could hold such a lovely place.

She found it hard to believe that Ozai and Azula enjoyed spending time here. Maybe Zuko ordered it to be cultivated after he became Fire Lord.

“It’s so beautiful,” she breathed in awe.

Momo took off from her shoulder and flew around the quiet garden, chirping and chattering happily from tree to tree, occasionally snatching insects from the air as he went.

Zuko extended his arm courteously. Surprised but pleased, Katara gave him a low, playful curtsey before hooking her arm under his with a grin. Zuko smiled before he led her down the few marble steps to step onto one of the stone paths.

“This is the Royal Palace Garden, my private garden. Only members of the royal family and their close friends are allowed here,” Zuko explained. “Uncle and I come here often, and you can come here as often as you like. I was sure you’d like it as well.”

“Thanks. I like it very much,” she said softly.

A small blush blossomed across Katara’s cheeks as she gave him a pleased smile, which he returned immediately. Looking around the magnificent garden, the waterbender spotted a group of red rose bushes and an elated squeal escaped her lips.

“Oh!” she exclaimed. “Are those roses?” she asked as she paused to point at them.

Zuko nodded, and when her smile brightened, he led her to them, still holding onto her arm.

“The roses I sent you for your past birthdays came from this garden,” he told her.

“They were so beautiful, thank you.”
“I’m just sorry I was unable to be there for your birthdays, but I was…” he trailed off.

“It’s okay, Zuko. I understand,” she said. Then turning her attention back to the crimson-colored roses she added, “They look so much like the silver rose hairpin you sent me.” Katara smiled at him.

“Yes. I decided to send you a rose that will not die. I’m sure you look nice when you wear it,” he told her with a small grin.

Katara flushed and looked down at her feet.

“Well. I have not…actually worn it,” she admitted sheepishly.

Zuko’s heart sank painfully at her words. He remembered trying to give a pretty conch to Mai years ago, only to have her disregard it. It really did not bother him that much back then, but hearing this from Katara saddened him deeply.

He cleared his throat.

“Well, if you don’t like it, I could always give you something else.”

“What? No, no! I really do like it!” Katara was quick to reassure him. “I just haven’t worn it yet because there hasn’t been an occasion where I could show it off. Being busy teaching waterbending and reconstructing my home, I didn’t want my hairpin to get damaged or lost. And you know what? I always keep it on my nightstand where I can touch and see it.”

She gently touched his arm with her free hand, hoping he did not think her ungrateful. Zuko looked down into her ocean-blue eyes and smiled. He felt pleased that she liked it. And he liked how she called it her hairpin.

“You know, I never had a favorite flower before, since not many flowers grow in the Southern Water Tribe,” Katara confessed after a moment. “Guess what my favorite flower is now.” She grinned.
“Panda-lily,” Zuko answered as if stating the obvious. He was puzzled when Katara began to laugh.

“Why? Because Aang always gives them to me?” Katara asked after she had calmed down. “He was told they were the best gift for a woman.” She laughed softly again. “I mean, they are pretty, but the panda-lily seems too…childish. No. My favorite flower is the rose.”

Zuko’s heart skipped a beat and he held onto her arm tighter.

“The rose? Why?” he asked, trying to keep his voice in check, lest he showed his excitement.

“Well, because they are beautiful and elegant,” she told him with a pensive look.

She reluctantly disengaged her arm from Zuko’s, who seemed almost as reluctant to let her go. Zuko watched as Katara walked over to one of the prettiest roses and, bending slightly, she brought her petite nose to it and inhaled.

“And they have such a wonderful fragrance,” she breathed out.

Zuko felt his heat race as he looked at her among the flowers, like a magical creature surrounded by a sea of roses.

_I wonder how great her body would look laying on a pile of rose petals,_ Zuko thought with a groan. He felt his groin tighten at the fantasy and he turned away from her, cursing his dirty thoughts.

_This is the second time! How can I be having such thoughts about her?_ he thought, scolding himself.

He reasoned it was just that he had been too busy lately to relieve his sexual tension. Yes, that must be it. But then he never had such fantasies about Mai and she was his girlfriend.

_That’s because Mai is just like the other Fire Nation women,_ Zuko mused in his head with a frown. _Katara…well…she’s different. Maybe I’m just having such thoughts because she’s…exotic looking. But I can’t be thinking about her like that. It’s disrespectful._
After he felt like he had cooled down, Zuko turned back to gaze at her with a placid look on his face.

Katara was wearing a short red dress, outlined with gold and black, the sleeves falling down her arms. Zuko could not get over the fact that her caramel-colored skin looked so exquisite in red, not that she looked bad in blue. She looked wonderful in blue, too. His heart skipped a beat as he took notice of the style of her hair. Her brown, wavy hair was down with a small bun on her head, reminding him so much of his mother.

“You know,” he finally said, “this was my mother’s rose bush.”

His golden eyes looked deeply into Katara’s cerulean ones when she turned to look at him.

“The rose is her favorite flower. As well as mine,” he said softly.

“Really?” Katara asked quietly, unable to break away from his piercing gaze, her heart racing in her chest for some strange reason she could not understand.

“Really,” he replied.

After what seemed like an eternity, but was actually a few seconds, Katara looked away, embarrassed and confused.

Clearing his throat, Zuko continued.

“There is something else I’m sure will please you,” he told her. He offered his arm to her again and was glad when she quickly accepted it.

“What is it?” she asked excitedly. She liked the feeling of his warm arm against her own, it felt… right. Katara had to keep herself from leaning her head on his shoulder.

“It’s a surprise,” he replied coolly and smirked.

She mock pouted, causing him to chuckle quietly.
They walked along a different stone path, passing even more beautiful and exotic flowers and trees, their arms intertwined in each other’s while Momo flew ahead of them.

Soon enough, Katara spotted a single cherry blossom tree in the middle of a grassy patch. It was covered with young blossoms, white and pink, and little bright, green leaves. And on all these blossoms and leaves the sunlight glistened brightly. After admiring the cherry blossom tree for a moment, Katara looked beyond it and gasped.

“A pond!” she exclaimed in surprise.

Zuko again smiled at her reaction and quickly walked her over to it.

“It’s so pretty,” she whispered as she stared down at the lily pad covered surface of the pond. The other garden did not have one; it was made up of only grass and trees.

“I knew you were going to like it,” Zuko smiled warmly, seeming proud of himself.

“Yes.” Katara giggled as a few turtle-ducks came over to them, begging for crumbs. “How cute!”

Zuko sat down near the pond under the cherry blossom tree and watched Katara play with the turtle-ducks with some waterbending. Momo, tired for the moment, rested on his lap. Zuko smiled at the little creature. Absentmindedly, he began to pet him around his large ears. Momo purred in appreciation while Zuko began to remember all the times he had spent in the same spot with his mother when he had been a boy.

Katara turned around to call to Zuko when she noticed his face had a faraway look, one that seemed…sad. She quietly stood up from the pond’s edge and walked over to the tree, sitting down next to him on his right side.

“Zuko? Are you all right?” she asked, concerned.

Zuko blinked before he glanced at her from the corner of his eyes. How had she noticed his real mood when he always made sure to keep an impassive mask on? It was like second nature to him, not to show his weaknesses, ever since his father banished him from his home.
“Yes. I’m fine,” he uttered coolly. He looked over at the pond to where the turtle-ducks were frolicking around.

“Zuko, don’t lie to me. Tell me, what’s wrong?” she said softly as she gently placed her hand on his arm. “I’m your friend, you can tell me anything. Please?”

The Fire Lord looked at the young woman’s concerned face, again surprised at her perceptiveness and worry.

She wants to listen to me? he asked himself. Does she really want to know? Her large, blue eyes confirmed it.

Summoning up his courage, he said softly, “I was just remembering the times I spent with my mother in this garden when I was younger.”

Katara pressed his arm lightly, silently encouraging him to continue.

“We used to sit under this tree and would feed the turtle-ducks or talk or simply just sit quietly as we watched the sun go down.”

“Have you gotten any information on where she is?” Katara asked when he did not continue. She saw his face darkened.

“No. I have tried everything, but Ozai won’t tell me,” he growled out angrily before he let out a sigh. “I…really miss her,” he confessed quietly.

Zuko inhaled sharply and his heart skipped another beat as he felt Katara’s small hand slide down his arm to hold his hand. He looked down at their hands, pale and brown, a great contrast. He slowly looked up to see her concerned and understanding face.

“Zuko, I know how you feel. I also remember the times I spent with my mother. I remember when she used to cook, he wonderful aroma of her meals would waft around our hut. I also remember how beautiful she was and how she’d smile at us, making us feel very happy and special. When she’d tuck us to sleep, she would sing us lullabies until we would close our eyes, feeling safe and loved.
And I remember the day she gave me her necklace.”

Katara reached for her necklace with her other hand and let out a shaky breath.

“And then she was taken from me…I miss her a lot,” she said quietly as she clasped her necklace tighter, trying to keep her tears from spilling.

Zuko squeezed her hand lightly.

“Your mother was a brave woman, Katara. Just like you,” he said.

Katara blushed and released his hand after giving it a squeeze.

“I’m sure you will find your mother, Zuko. I’m positive,” she said, looking back up at him.

“I hope so, Katara,” he said solemnly as he again gazed over to the quiet pond.

Katara felt her heart go out to the young man. She had never seen him so down before.

Momo, feeling the mood change, began to chirp before flying off to catch some bugs.

They sat next to each other in comfortable silence as the sun began its descent. They watched as one of the turtle-ducklings tried to leave the pond, but was driven away from the edge by its parents.

Katara giggled. “Early curfew?”

Zuko’s lips curled into a small smile. He wondered why he found it so easy to smile with Katara.

“Some parents are very protective of their young. I had to learn that the hard way,” he commented with a small chuckle.
“What do you mean?” she asked as she turned to look at him in curiosity.

“Never mind,” Zuko evaded with a shrug.

“Ah, come on!” Katara huffed. “You can’t just say something like that and then decide not to continue! Tell me!”

After a few more insistences, Zuko finally relented and he told her about the time he was bitten by an angry turtle-duck mother when he was a young boy.

Katara placed a hand over her mouth and laughed. Zuko glanced at her, and instead of feeling insulted, he smiled. He liked to hear her laugh. It was like a sweet tune and he liked it even more that it was he who had caused her to utter such a joyous sound. He did not know why but he felt… happy. Even if that happiness lasted only for a moment, since his friends would be leaving the Fire Nation soon, he would enjoy it while he had the chance.

“I wish I could have seen that!” Katara giggled as she wiped that tears that had appeared from laughing too hard.

Zuko grinned.

“Well, it hurt more than I thought it would, and I asked Mother why the turtle-duck did that.” Then smiling softly he continued, “She told me ‘That’s what moms are like. If you mess with their babies, they’ll bite.’” He then snapped his teeth, imitating a turtle-duck bite.

Katara burst into a giggle fit. It was nice to see Zuko being playful, for it was very rare. She liked it.

“That’s true,” she agreed amusedly as she let out a sigh after calming down.

They did not notice that far off to the side, a very pleased Iroh and a very amused Toph stood by.

Iroh chuckled.
“Well, my dear, how about a cup of jasmine tea?”

“That sounds great.” Toph grinned as they walked back inside the palace.

A few days had passed since that day in the Royal Palace Garden and it seemed like it had somehow changed something between the Fire Lord and the waterbender. What it was, Katara could not really say.

Her long braid blew wildly in the air as Appa flew among the fluffy clouds and she got lost in her thoughts. She had missed flying and going on adventures like they all had four years ago. She turned to look at Aang sitting on Appa’s great head, holding the reins as the sky-bison flew in the sky. Aang had asked her if she wanted to ride on Appa with him and she agreed since she felt a bit guilty for having neglected him for the past few days. For some reason she kept bumping into Zuko which would lead to them spending time in the garden or talking about anything and everything before they went their separate ways.

The waterbender was brought out of her thoughts when she noticed the young monk stand up. Creating a small current of air, Aang landed softly beside her on the huge saddle. He placed his tattooed arm around her and gave her a kiss on the cheek. Katara smiled, but when he moved to kiss her lips, she pulled away. Aang frowned, but he kept his arm around her.

“Isn’t the scenery beautiful?” Katara said, smiling gently.

She leaned over the side of the saddle where she could see the mountains, the vast trees, and a river snaking its way toward the ocean. She could make out the capital city inside the hull shell of the dormant volcano from afar. She had to admit it looked amazing.

“Yeah…” Aang said, rubbing the back of his neck nervously with his other hand. “Katara, I… well…”

“What is it?” Katara asked, finally noticing Aang’s nervous state. “Is something wrong?”

“No, nothing’s wrong! It’s just that I…wanted to ask you something,” said the young Avatar, his cheeks turning pink.
Katara turned to face him and raised her eyebrow, waiting for him to go on.

“Well, you see…I…want to ask you…” he began before he trailed off.

She noticed him swallow loudly.

“Katara, will you…uh…”

“Aang, spit it out already! What is it?” Katara almost yelled irritably. Sometimes his timidity and hesitation annoyed her. It was fine when he was twelve-years-old and needed some reassurance, but he was seventeen now and practically a man!

“Will you…will you…take Appa’s reins?” Aang sighed loudly, his whole face red like a tomato.

Katara furrowed her eyebrows as she stared at him strangely.

“Sure…okay,” she muttered uncertainly. She tried to move away from him to rest on Appa’s head, but Aang held onto her.

“What is it?” she asked him, puzzled.

He hesitated, but then he smiled.

“I love you,” he said before releasing her.

“Uh…me too,” she replied, giving him a small smile.

Walking carefully forward, Katara sat on Appa’s fluffy head. Once settled, she turned around to look back at the seventeen-year-old who was mumbling angrily at himself. Shrugging, Katara lifted the reins and guided Appa back to the Fire Nation Palace.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Since the men were busy in a meeting later that evening, Ty Lee, Mai, and a complaining Toph decided to go to the city again. Katara stayed behind with Suki, who had been feeling ill for the past few days.

“Maybe I should go ask for the Palace Physician to check you and see what’s wrong,” Katara told the Kyoshi Warrior as she stood to leave.

“No, there’s no need. It’s nothing, really. I probably ate something that unsettled my stomach. I just need some rest,” Suki reassured her as she lay back on her bed. She gave out a small yawn. “So tell me what you and Zuko did the other day outside in the city. We haven’t had a chance to talk.”

This seemed to perk the waterbender up. For the next few minutes, she excitedly recounted everything from when she bumped into Zuko, to when he took her to that fancy restaurant, and to the incident with the small boy with the barrel of water.

“And then we noticed it was getting late and we returned to the palace,” she finished with a large smile.

“That was nice of Zuko, helping the small boy. I never imagined Zuko liking children,” Suki said as she moved into a more comfortable position.

“I was surprised too, but I guess we don’t really know that much about him. But it was really cute! You should’ve seen how the little boy smiled at him as if Zuko was his hero,” Katara exclaimed with a giggle and smiled at the memory.

Suki regarded the waterbender carefully, but sleep soon came to her before she could question the waterbender more. As Suki fell into a welcome nap, Katara decided to go to the Royal Palace Garden since Zuko told her she could go whenever she liked. She smirked smugly. Wei would probably have a heart attack when he discovered that a Water Tribe ‘peasant’ was allowed in the private garden by the Fire Lord himself.

Passing by the rosebush, the waterbender gingerly caressed the beautiful red roses, glad no noblewomen were around to throw unsubtle glares at her. They would probably envy her if they saw her. She made her way toward the pond and sat at its edge. Extracting a loaf of bread she took from the lunch table, she called for the turtle-ducks who waddled to her in order to be fed.

Katara giggled as the small animals begged for more, looking at her with black, beady eyes. She watched as the mother turtle-duck kept her young in check and she laughed softly when she remembered that Zuko, the Mighty Fire Lord, was actually bitten by one.

As she sat by the water’s edge, Katara thought back to the conversation she had with Zuko. She had really enjoyed their time together and their talk. It concerned something important and serious not just how fun it was to ride the elephant-koi or how exciting the circus was. Katara could not help but feel glad that Zuko had opened up to her since it was obvious he was not accustomed to that. And she had opened up to him as well. She also tried to retain her emotions in order not to worry the others, and instead she listened to their problems. Just like how she comforted Aang when he was unsure on what to do to end Ozai or when she comforted Toph about her parents.

But Zuko listened to her and even gave her some encouragement. She had never talked about the memories she had about her mother with anyone before, but she had with Zuko. Twice. First in the Crystal Catacombs of Ba Sing Se, and then in the garden. Perhaps it was easy because they both shared the same feelings regarding their mothers and knew how the other felt.

In was endearing to know that the serious, tough former Prince Zuko longed to see his mother. It was further proof that he had a caring heart despite what he had done in the past and how much he tried to hide it.

It must be hard to know that the person you once thought lost forever is actually not and harder still not to be able to be reunited with that loved one, Katara thought with a sad frown.

The young woman sighed sadly as she bent a thin, long ribbon from the pond water, twirling it around with her finger. She would like to help Zuko find his mother, but how? What could she do?

She paused in her waterbending and smiled as she noticed Iroh making his way toward her with a broad smile on his cheery, old face.

“Now, what is a lovely, young lady doing all by herself?” Iroh said graciously as he gave her an extravagant bow.

Standing up, Katara giggled as she brushed the grass from her blue pants.

“Oh, Uncle Iroh, so charming as always. Is the meeting over?”
Emitting his familiar chuckle, Iroh replied jovially.

“No. I just decided to take a break. I am not as young as before and I’m afraid I’d fall asleep and snore.” He laughed. “Besides, I know my nephew can handle himself. How about joining me for a cup of ginseng tea in the veranda?”

Katara smiled and nodded. With a grin, she accepted Iroh’s arm, and they made their way over to the veranda overlooking the magnificent garden. As the servants set up a small table with tea and pastries, Katara listened with amusement as Iroh recounted stories from his travels.

“One time while we were still in exile, I beat Zuko on a game of Pai Sho and made him play the tsunghi horn on music night. Oh, how angry he got!” Iroh laughed, the wrinkles near his eyes growing more profound.

“I can imagine his irritated expression,” Katara said and giggled. “He always had it the next couple of times we crossed paths.”

“Yes, that’s true, but he was not always like that. Zuko used to be a very happy and cheerful child,” Iroh replied before he sighed and took a sip from his cup.

He was silent for a moment as sadness settled on his aged face.

“After his banishment, Zuko was filled with so much pain and rage.” He paused and he smiled again. “But that was in the past, and luckily, he was able to overcome his anger.”

“Yes, you’re right, he has changed,” Katara agreed as she looked over to the cherry blossom tree where she had sat with Zuko a few days ago. “Uncle Iroh? How...how did Zuko...get the scar on his face?”

Iroh raised his eyebrow at her and she quickly added, “I mean it’s just that I would like to know how he got it. I know it has something to do with his banishment, but what?”

“That is not for me to say. You should ask Zuko yourself,” Iroh told her softly.
He knew Katara was just curious not because the scar itself was something of interest, but because she wanted to know what had caused him so much pain. He was sure it would do his nephew some good to have somebody listen to him, but the problem was whether or not Zuko was willing to open up.

Sokka stifled a yawn as one of the Earth Kingdom representatives rambled on and on about why his village was a good trade opportunity for the Fire Nation. Sokka stopped listening after a few hours of the old man’s endless talk. Now if the meeting had anything to do with battles, he would have been completely attentive. He was a man of action, after all.

He looked over to see how the other men were holding up. Some of the council members seemed to be listening, even Aang seemed interested.

Well, he is the Avatar and all, the warrior thought.

Sokka looked up at the dais behind the wall of flames to see how the Fire Lord was faring. He was not even surprised at all. Zuko regarded the man with a stoic expression as he sat in a straight and regal posture. Only when the man finished, did Zuko speak.

The Water Tribe Warrior suppressed another yawn as the next Earth Kingdom representative stood up before the Fire Lord.

Maybe I should have said no when Zuko and Aang invited me to come. This is boring! Sokka complained mentally, tuning out what the man was saying completely. I wonder what’s for dinner. Maybe some cow-chicken dumplings covered in sweet sauce or some rice pudding. His mind floated away.

I wonder what Suki will be wearing. He grinned.

An indignant exclamation from the men snapped him out of his precious thoughts.

“This is an outrage! How can you demand Fire Lord Zuko do such a thing?” Chao exclaimed indignantly. The other Fire Nation Council members agreed angrily.

Great. I just had to miss the good part! Sokka mentally groused.
“Aang, what’s going on?” he whispered to the exasperated-looking airbender.

The young Avatar looked at him with a frown.

“Don’t tell me you fell asleep, Sokka,” Aang whispered back, annoyed.

“No…I was just letting my brain take a break,” the warrior countered back.

Aang rolled his gray eyes at him before he pointed at a man standing before the Fire Lord.

“That man just told Zuko to return all Fire Nation colonies in the Earth Kingdom continent back to them.”

“What?!” Sokka exclaimed. A few of the men sitting near them shushed him. Sokka scowled at them.

“I have ended the war that had raged for generations and had caused countless atrocities to all nations. We are at peace now,” Zuko answered in a hard tone.

“Well, yes, but your colonies are in Earth Kingdom soil, and so, belong to us,” the large, old man said as he crossed his arms in front of his broad chest arrogantly.

“I have returned all newly conquered Earth Kingdom villages and cities such as Omashu and Ba Sing Se back to their rightful rulers. The Fire Nation colonies we have kept are the ones that have been under Fire Nation rule for decades. My people have made their lives there. I cannot just order them to leave their homes,” Zuko replied in a calm, firm tone.

“Well, you did not think of that when you invaded the villages in the first place!” the man snapped.

Uproar erupted between some Earth Kingdom representatives and the Fire Nation members. Sokka could not believe it. Was the man blaming Zuko for what his ancestors did in the past?
Zuko sighed in frustration, a stream of smoke coming out from his nostrils. He looked at Aang, who nodded in understanding.

“Noblemen, please!” Aang called out as he stood up.

The Earth Kingdom men reluctantly quieted for the Avatar, but the Fire Nation men still bickered until Zuko gave them a stern look. As the room quieted down once again, Aang turned to look at the man who caused the outbreak.

Breathing deeply to control his nerves, the young airbender began.

“The Fire Nation did wrong by invading the rest of the world, but that was because of Sozin’s greed and then the Fire Lords that continued his legacy. But that was in the beginning, many decades ago! You cannot blame Fire Lord Zuko for something he did not start. You should be glad he did not succumb to his father’s wishes, but instead followed his own destiny and ended the war. He has proved himself to be a great man.”

Aang regarded the men and took another steadying breath.

“You Fire Nation and Earth Kingdom men alike need to end that hatred and wariness you have for each other and move on with your lives!”

He returned his gaze back to the highly, irritated Earth Kingdom man.

“The Fire Nation colonies Zuko possesses and protects are much more Fire Nation than Earth Kingdom, so it would be the same thing all over again. Families will lose their homes as well as the lives their ancestors have built. Do you really want to start another war? Do you really want to continue making people suffer? Besides, the colonies are not hurting anybody.”

“How do we know that the Fire Nation won’t decide to take more colonies to increase their power? It happened before, it can happen again,” the man retorted. Then glaring, he addressed the tall figure behind the firewall, “Ozai’s blood runs through your veins! He left his mark evident on your face!”

The whole room broke out in chaos again. A few guards readied themselves to jump in defense of their lord just in case.
“You went too far!” Sokka yelled above the upheaval. Even the carefree Aang looked furious.

So that’s it, Zuko thought angrily. He gritted his teeth, the fire wall growing higher with his temer.

They still believe I’m like my father! Zuko clenched his hands, smoke coming out between his fingers.

What do I have to do to make these people see that I’m not like him? The room began to grow hotter.

Sokka and Aang looked at each other in alarm, but Zuko willed himself to calm down. He needed to show them he was different, that he will not make the same mistakes his ancestors before him did.

“I understand your concern,” Zuko finally spoke in a composed tone.

The men’s attention shifted to the Fire Lord as he parted the wall of fire and descended from the dais. Sokka noticed that some Earth Kingdom men gaped when they realized how young the new Fire Lord really was. Because of the way he argued, they expected to see someone older.

“I saw what my own country was doing during my exile, and I was ashamed. I assure you that all I seek is for all nations to live peacefully. I have opened trade with many of you and my colonies are the ones that provide you what you need. The colonies not only hold my people, but Earth Kingdom families as well and I arranged up for them all to be protected,” Zuko began in a stately voice.

“Believe me when I say that I do not want to start another power-hungry reign. I only wish to regain the Fire Nation’s former glory and honor along with trust from both Water Tribes and the Earth Kingdom,” Zuko firmly stated. “But that can only be accomplished if you let go of your prejudices and hatred. We can overcome our differences if only you are willing to meet me halfway.”

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After finishing all his meetings with the rest of the Earth Kingdom representatives and then his Court Council, Zuko made his way to his royal bedchamber to rest, but after what happened that day, rest did not seem possible. At the entrance of his antechamber, he dismissed his personal guards before returning to his room.

Removing his formal robes, Zuko opened his large, dark mahogany wardrobe and extracted a steel chest that rested at the bottom. Inserting a key, he opened the chest and took out its contents. He pulled on a black suit, black boots and a pair of black gloves. Zuko then reached back inside and pulled out a white and blue mask, an exact replica of the original. He ran his strong fingers along the mask’s fangs before he tugged it into his waist belt and then strapped his dual broadswords on the right side of his hip.

Donning a black and dark red robe outlined with gold, Zuko opened the large balcony doors and looked at the dark sky. Making sure no one was watching, he swiftly and stealthily climbed down the balcony and landed gracefully on the palace garden. Moving along the shadows, he came upon the palace walls. Allowing his sharp eyes to scan the garden to see if anybody was around, he removed and hid his robe among some thick bushes before he climbed over the tall wall. He strapped his swords behind his back so they were crisscrossing and then he extracted the blue and white mask from his waist belt and tied it to his face.

For most of the night, the Blue Spirit roamed through the city. Swiftly running and jumping along the rooftops, he made sure the guards were performing their duties and no trouble sprang up during the night. He was able to foil a burglary, but for the most part everything seemed well.

Zuko looked at his beloved city behind the hollow eyes of the Blue Spirit before he decided to return to the palace. After a few more minutes of much needed freedom, Zuko climbed over the palace wall again. He waited a few minutes before removing his mask and gloves. He pulled the robe back on and then readjusted his swords to his hip.

As he made his way back to his balcony, Zuko looked up toward the starry, night sky and noticed the moon was bright and full before he glanced over at the pond that seemed to glow with the moon’s silver light. Zuko moved away from the balcony and made his way toward the pond.

He leaned over the pond’s surface and regarded his reflection. Did people only see him as the son of Ozai, as the evil former Fire Lord’s spawn? Or was it because of his scar that they mistrusted him?

He sighed. Although he had thought he had finally moved on, the scar and the past still haunted him.

Katara tossed and turned on her bed. It was a night with a full moon, and so she could not sleep. She could feel the moon pulling and calling to her. Lifting the bed covers, she climbed out of bed and put on her clothes. Maybe a midnight walk in the garden and some waterbending would help her insomnia.

Katara walked quietly down the palace hall, being careful not to alert anybody. Stepping onto the private garden, she inhaled the cool night air and the flowers’ fragrance before she made her way deeper into the garden. She looked up at the bright moon fondly. She wondered how Yue was doing. Katara looked back down and stopped short as she noticed the lone, tall figure standing at the pond’s edge. She was about to turn back, but upon a closer look she realized it was Zuko.

Quietly making her way to him, she noticed how intently he seemed to be staring at the water’s surface and she wondered why that would be.

“Zuko? Can’t sleep?” she asked quietly as she stood beside him.

Zuko stiffened slightly, but upon realizing it was Katara, he relaxed. The young firebender glanced at her and noticed that Katara was wearing midnight blue pants and shirt with a white collar. She looked beautiful in blue, too.

Who am I kidding? Katara looks good in any color, Zuko admitted to himself before he mentally shook his head.

“Yeah, you could say that,” he finally answered. He discreetly moved his hand to make sure the Blue Spirit mask was well hidden under his robe. “What about you?”

Katara smiled and shrugged.

“It’s difficult for me to sleep on nights with a full moon.”

“Oh,” was his short answer. He remembered that the Northern Water Tribe Princess Yue gave up her life to be the Moon Spirit.

Seeing his dejected mood, Katara frowned.

“Sokka told me what happened in the meeting today,” she quietly said as she looked at his impassive face.

Zuko remained silent and so she continued.
“Zuko, I hope you ignored what that man said. You’re not responsible for what your ancestors have done in the past.”

“But there are many who believe so,” he replied without looking up. “They only see me as the heir of a line of ruthless dictators. They only see a second Ozai.”

“Well, you don’t look like Ozai at all,” Katara replied.

Zuko scoffed at her.

“And I don’t mean because of the scar, Zuko,” she said as placed her hands on her hips and scowled.

Zuko smiled faintly, but it faded as he remembered the meeting again.

“I have done many things in order to show how regretful we are for what the Fire Nation has done to the other nations in the past and I have sent out aid for the Water Tribes and Earth Kingdom reconstructions. But they don’t seem to take that into consideration,” he said bitterly.

“But, Zuko, there’s only a few people who still think like that. They just need more time to heal their wounds. Trust me,” Katara told him and looked up at the stars.

“I hope you’re right,” Zuko said as he kept his gaze on his reflection. “I just wish I could say the same thing about my own people.”

Katara looked back down with a frown.

“What do you mean?”

The young firebender sighed.

“There are still some Fire Nation citizens, mostly those who supported Ozai, who see me as a traitor, someone without honor and who’s weak…a disgrace,” Zuko said passively. He moved his left hand to the scar on his face.
Katara looked down at their reflections in the pond and noticed Zuko touching his scarred skin. She also noticed the sorrowful look in his eyes.

Weak? A disgrace? Why? Katara thought. Does the scar have something to do with it?

“Why do you say that?” she asked him, staring at him from the pond’s surface.

Zuko blinked as if he were brought out of a memory.

“No reason,” he replied coolly, replacing his features into a blank expression. “Forget what I said.”

The waterbender then turned to him and placed her small hand on his arm.

“Please. Tell me what’s wrong. Is it something related to your scar?” she asked quietly. She felt him stiffen. “Zuko...? How...how did you get this scar?” she asked him softly.

Zuko stiffened even more. He looked up towards the night sky.

Should I tell her? What if she thinks me foolish for having acted so rashly? Does she really want to know? He did not detect any form of ridicule in her voice just curiosity and…concern?

Taking his silence as a sign that she had overstepped the line, Katara quickly pulled her hand away.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to upset you. I understand if you don’t want to talk to me about it,” she said quietly.

She turned to walk away, but before he could think about it twice, Zuko quickly grabbed her wrist, stopping her from leaving. Katara turned to look at him with a puzzled expression.

“Please. Don’t leave. I would like…to tell you…” He sighed, running his pale fingers through his short, loose hair. “It’s just that it’s something…difficult to think about.”
Zuko released her wrist and clasped his hands behind his back, staring at the clear reflection on the calm pond. He was glad when Katara did not move away, but stayed by his side.

He took a long, deep breath.

“It all happened when I was thirteen years of age. I knew one day I would ascend the throne and rule the nation as Fire Lord, and so, I wanted to learn everything there was on how to become a great ruler. I asked Uncle to take me to one of the meetings the Court Council held. We both knew it was not really allowed, but I convinced him and he made me promise not to utter a word during the whole war meeting.”

Katara nodded for him to continue. She had never heard Zuko talk so much, but she found that she enjoyed listening to the sound of his deep, velvety voice.

“At first everything was well and I was fascinated by it,” Zuko continued then his voice grew hard, “But then a heartless general suggested sending the Forty-First Division, which was made up of mostly young and inexperienced recruits, to attack an Earth Kingdom city from the front while the real troops attacked from behind. I could not believe they were willing to sacrifice their own people as if they were mere cattle! Men and women who only wanted to show their love and loyalty for their country. I couldn’t believe it! I was outraged and disgusted by such injustice and I spoke out against such a dishonorable and despicable plan.”

He paused. He had never spoken this much before, but it seemed he could not stop himself from revealing everything to Katara just like he could not stop himself from smiling and laughing in her presence.

“It displeased my father since I spoke out of turn and disrespected him and the elders. So I had to fight in an Agni Kai for my transgression. I accepted without hesitation, ready to fight for what I believed in, thinking I would fight the general. But as I turned around in the arena I was stunned, for it was not the general that I faced, but…my father.”

Zuko paused as he heard Katara gasp softly beside him.

“As I faced him, my confidence wavered and I fell to my knees and hands. I did not want to fight him since he was stronger than I was and because I could not bring myself to fight my own father.
“To my shame I begged him for forgiveness as tears fell from my eyes, but it did not touch his heart. He told me that I was weak and a disgrace and that I would learn respect and suffering would be my teacher.” Zuko again paused as the horrible memory flashed before his eyes and he touched the scarred side of his face.

He let out a long, shaky breath.

“Then he lit his hand…and struck my face.”

Katara gasped loudly in horror, bringing the tips of her fingers up to her lips, her blue eyes widening in disbelief. How could a father do such a cruel thing?

“Your own father scarred you?!?” she asked incredulously, her voice lifting into a high pitch in her disbelief, “For standing up for those poor soldiers? How could he? You were just a young boy for Tui and La’s sake! That…that…monster!” Katara growled. She hated the man even more.

Zuko looked at her, slightly surprised at her strong reaction.

“He thought I deserved it for speaking out of turn and thus disrespecting him. He thought that by speaking out against their plan and by refusing to fight him, I was showing weakness. So he banished me, proclaiming me a disgrace and stripping me of my honor and my inheritance to the throne,” Zuko continued in an emotionless tone.

“When I found out, I was in the infirmary healing from the burn. I was devastated, but I could do nothing. Uncle was the only one who stood by my side during my whole exile, and put up with my volatile temper. He is the only one from my family, except my mother, who cares for me. He is more of a father to me than Ozai ever was or ever would be,” he continued. “The only way to regain my honor was to capture the Avatar, as you already know.”

Katara stared into his expressionless face.

“It was more than that wasn’t it? It wasn’t only your honor and throne you wanted, but…to return home and please your father,” she stated quietly.

Zuko noticed that her voice held no pity as he had feared but compassion. He only nodded to answer her question.
“And I judged you and treated you so badly. I’m so sorry,” she whispered sadly.

“That was in the past. You don’t have to apologize. Besides, I was always attacking all of you,” Zuko reassured her before he continued, “Many saw the Agni Kai between my father and me, and still see my disfigurement as a sign of my disobedience and weakness. And for years I believed that as well. That is why I closed myself away from others and fought hard to prove that I wasn’t weak.”

A gentle breeze blew by them, disrupting the images in the pond.

“Zuko, you’re only human, it’s okay to feel weak sometimes, you know. It’s alright to be afraid, but the important thing is that you faced your fears. And that’s what made you stronger,” she said softly.

She moved to stand in front of him and Zuko looked down into her face. Her sapphire eyes stared into his golden ones with determination.

“You never lost your honor, Zuko. What you did for those soldiers proves how great and honorable a person you are. You only had the best interest for your nation at heart.”

Zuko only stared at her in amazement. It was as if she had read his mind.

“Your scar is a symbol of your bravery and just heart,” Katara told him gently but firmly.

Zuko’s breath caught in his throat as Katara’s soft, brown fingers rested on his crimson, scarred eye. He slowly let out his breath and felt his heart skip a beat when he felt her begin to caress his scar gently. It felt so nice and comforting. He closed his eyes and leaned into her sweet touch as he lifted his left hand and placed it above hers.

Katara suppressed a shiver at his touch.

“Embrace it, Zuko. Be proud of it…just like I’m proud of you,” she whispered softly.

The Fire Lord’s tensed body relaxed as the young waterbender talked, her voice becoming soft and musical, almost caressing him. He felt as if a heavy burden had been lifted from his soul. He felt like a small flame had ignited his sad, lonely heart. And it burned strongly.

The firebender opened his eyes and stared at the young woman’s beautiful face that was illuminated by the full moon’s heavenly light. Another soft breeze blew by, causing her blue clothes and hair to ruffle gently. The rustle of leaves and grass were they only sounds in the night. The cherry blossom tree, as if thrilled, quivered and glowed under the moonlight above them.

Zuko reached out his right hand to caress Katara’s own cheek, and this time she could not stop herself from shivering under his warm touch.

Her skin is so soft, Zuko thought. He then moved his thumb down her cheek and began to lightly rub it against her soft, plump lips.

Katara shivered again and closed her eyes at the sensation.

Zuko felt a strange urge to embrace her, to take her into his arms, to press his lips against hers. He was becoming so enchanted with Katara’s desirable lips that he began to lower his head toward hers until their noses were almost touching. Then Katara opened her eyes.

“Zuko?” she whispered.

He immediately pulled away as if he had awoken from a trance and straightened himself, his expression again impassive.

“It’s very late. I’ll walk you to your room,” Zuko said, turning his eyes aside. Without waiting for a reply, he turned and walked away.

Katara was a bit alarmed at his sudden change of mood. Did she say something wrong? Was he upset with her? Why had he been so close to her? Had he been about to...kiss her? Shaking her head at the last thought, she walked quickly to catch up to the now silent Zuko’s long strides.

Silence settled between them as they entered the quiet palace and it remained unbroken until they stopped at her door.
“Um…well then, good night, Zuko,” Katara said uncertainly as she opened her door.

“Katara,” Zuko called out softly.

She paused at the sound of his quiet voice before she looked back over her shoulder.

“Thank you for…everything.” He gave her a small smile.

Katara’s smile returned to her face.

“You’re welcome, Zuko. Just remember that everything I said is true,” she told him.

She entered her room, and with one last glance, she closed the door behind her.

The young Fire Lord stood at the door for a while before he shook himself, ignoring the small voice in his head that insisted he follow after the waterbending woman. Just as he began to walk away, he heard another door open down the hall. He suspiciously turned toward the sound and was surprised to see Sokka walking out of Suki’s room.

The Water Tribe warrior’s whole face turned red when he realized he was not alone.

“Er…I…found out Suki wasn’t feeling well. I was…just checking on her to make sure she was okay,” he explained quickly before he cleared his throat. His clothes were wrinkled and disheveled and his hair was messy.

Zuko tried to change his surprised look into one of indifference.

“That’s nice. Well…good night, Sokka.”

“Yeah, you, too,” Sokka said, laughing weakly as he turned around to leave.
Zuko again shook himself as he finally made his way toward his bedchamber, thinking about his conversation with Katara the entirety of the way. Again he felt his chest lighten and warm. Then he remembered how he was about to kiss her.

What’s wrong with me? he asked himself. Never had he had such a powerful urge to kiss a woman before.

As he rested on his bed a few minutes later, waiting for sleep to take him, a new emotion he could not understand swelled and burned within his heart.
As the early rays of sunlight emerged the next day, Zuko immediately rose from his comfortable bed, threw on a light robe, and opened the balcony doors. The thick curtains shifted gently as the morning breeze blew in. Stepping outside, he breathed in the crisp morning air as he looked over to the ocean in the distance. He let out a contented sigh as a soft breeze caressed his features and ruffled his dark hair. The young Fire Lord leaned against the balcony ledge and looked down at his private garden, reveling in the fragrance of the flowers and trees.

When he had returned from his exile, the garden desperately needed repair. Ozai and Azula never enjoyed spending time in the garden, and so, it eventually began to die. The trees and flowers withered almost to dust and the grass had turned dry and brown. It had looked more like an abandoned graveyard than a garden.

However, as soon as he became Fire Lord, Zuko ordered the Royal Palace Garden to be restored to its original beauty by planting more trees and exotic flowers, and cleaning and expanding the turtle-duck pond. He especially had his mother’s rose bushes restored to their healthy and vibrant state.

He smiled, remembering Katara’s delighted face as she saw the garden and the pond a few days ago.

Returning inside his grand room, Zuko settled himself on his red cushion in front of the candles that rested on top a small altar-like table. An incense stick gently filled the room with its aroma. With a flicker of his hand, the candles immediately lit up, the small flames falling and rising steadily as he inhaled and exhaled in rhythm. He tried to banish all distracting and frustrating thoughts from his mind as he began to meditate, but the fresh memories of that day in the garden and the previous night occupied his mind.

He had never spoken to anyone about the times he had spent with his mother as a child before, not even Iroh. His uncle had tried to persuade him into talking and expressing his feelings, but he always refused. He had not wanted to seem weak speaking of such childish memories after what happened with Ozai. But he had somehow overcome that and told Katara, and she did not judge or ridicule him like he was sure Mai or anybody else would have. That was probably because Katara was a caring person and because she understood his sadness, for it mirrored her own.

And then the previous night, he had revealed his painful past to her and she listened to him with a compassionate heart. Her words about his scar surfaced in his mind again and they comforted him, the mark that was a constant reminder of his mistake. At least it was before, but now it was different. Katara was right, he should stop regarding his scar as such and embrace it as part of who he is, not who he was. She even touched it again with no sign of disgust or revulsion. She just caressed it gently.

The strange new flame in his heart burned again.

Nobody has listened and understood me like Katara has. Why is it that I find it so easy to talk to her? Zuko thought pensively, the candles burning steadily before him. We really barely know each other, and yet, it feels like we have been friends for a very long time, he contemplated.

It seemed that both he and Katara had more things in common than he had thought. They would have been a great couple if they were not already in relationships.

More than just friends...? Zuko thought, the idea causing his heart to give a strange, thrilled leap.

The firebender tried to suppress the heat that threatened to invade his face. He hoped Katara had not notice that he had been leaning too close to her in order to kiss her the previous night. He recalled how close her face was to his, he could almost feel her soft lips. If she had not opened her eyes and spoken, he probably would have kissed her.

No. What I am thinking? He shook his head. That is a crazy idea! More than friends? Impossible!

But why should it be?

Why? Because they were just friends and could only be friends! Katara had said that they were friends so many times already. And he could not betray Mai. Besides, Katara loved...Aang who, by the way, was also his friend!

Zuko groaned as he pushed his hair out of his face.

I can't be thinking like this and I have to stop having strange and disgraceful thoughts about her! And Aang has been a good friend. I can't hurt him in such a way. It'd be dishonorable. Katara and I are just friends.

With that, Zuko extinguished the candles and made his way toward his bathroom to get ready for another meeting. His last statement painfully echoed in his thoughts.

Just friends…just friends…

That afternoon Katara, Suki and Toph had a little spar in one of the many training grounds that the Fire Nation Palace possessed. Toph used her incredible earthbending talents, while Katara summoned her waterbending. Suki brought out her metal fans and used the Kyoshi fighting skills she had mastered years ago.

After a few hours of exercise, they decided to take a rest and, after bragging about her victory, Toph reluctantly followed her friends inside the palace. As soon as she entered her room, Katara quickly got ready to take a bath before dinner. After removing her clothes, breast bindings, and her undergarments she stepped into the tub and sat down, the warm water reaching over her chest.

The young waterbender submerged herself in her calming element with a contented sigh. She was rather impressed at the Fire Nation Palace water system. She just had to turn a knob and water would spring forth from a pipe at the head of the tub, filling the bathtub quickly. Non-firebenders just had to light the pieces of wood under the tubs with a candle and wait for the water to heat up. Then the servants would just remove the burned pieces of wood and replace them with new ones, unlike back home in the Southern Water Tribe where they had to drag the buckets with hot water to fill their small tubs.

Using her waterbending, Katara washed her body and long hair until she was completely clean and fresh smelling. Setting the soap aside, she thought back about what happened the previous morning. Aang had acted so strange. She knew he had wanted to tell her something, but as always, he ran away from it and played it safe. She wondered what he really wanted to ask her. Shrugging it off, she rested her head against the cool edge of the tub, letting the soothing water relax her tired muscles.

In a few more days, their stay in the Fire Nation would come to an end. Iroh would probably be returning to his teashop in Ba Sing Se. Aang and Toph were needed in the Earth Kingdom, and Suki and Ty Lee back in Kyoshi Island. And she needed to return to her waterbending students. She wondered how many more years would pass before they saw Iroh and Zuko again.

Zuko. Katara saddened, remembering what Zuko had revealed to her the previous night.

How could someone so young suffer so many hardships? How could he endure so much pain? And the worst part was that it was his own father that had caused him so much sorrow.
He had looked so tormented by his scar that she had wanted to comfort him so badly, to make him see it was not horrible. And so, she had touched his scar again. It felt like it did before in Ba Sing Se, rough and dry yet soft and warm.

Katara closed her eyes, revisiting the moment from the previous night, the way his tortured, amber eyes stared into hers while he caressed her own cheek. Katara absentmindedly touched her lips, remembering the way his thumb had touched them. His large hand, the same one she had seen him use to firebend powerful bursts of fire and handle his lethal broadswords, was so warm and gentle that she could not help but enjoy it. His touch had felt so nice and comforting that she had closed her eyes to relish in it.

And when she opened them...his striking face was so close to hers that she could almost feel his warm breath tickling her lips...

Katara snapped her eyes open and dropped her hand from her lips, feeling a blush creep onto her cheeks.

Why was he so close? she asked herself for the hundredth time. It looked like he wanted to...

Katara quickly placed her hands on her burning cheeks to cool them down. He wasn’t going to...kiss me, was he?

Katara felt her heart do a somersault and butterflies fluttered in her stomach at the idea of Zuko kissing her before she angrily berated herself for thinking in such a way.

Of course he wasn’t! Don’t be stupid! We’re just friends. Why would he want...to kiss me? she told herself.

She sighed. But deep down inside she wondered what it would have been like if Zuko had kissed her...

A knock sounded outside her bathroom door, relieving her of her confusing thoughts.

“Who is it?” Katara called, sitting up in the tub.
“It’s Jiao, Lady Katara. Dinner is almost served. Do you need any help?” the young servant called out from behind the closed door.

“No, thank you. I’m almost finished,” Katara told her.

Darn. Did I really take that long bathing?

She quickly got out of the tub, flushing the dirty water down the drain. She dried herself with a soft towel and started getting ready. It would be very embarrassing if I were to be late again!

And even more embarrassing if her cheeks did not return to their normal color. She quickly dressed and entered the room that Jiao was tidying at the moment. The young servant woman turned and smiled.

“A letter has been sent to you this morning, Lady Katara,” Jiao told her as she extracted a letter from her pocket and handed it to the waterbender.

Katara took the letter, looked at the blue string attached to it, and smiled.

“Thank you, Jiao.”

“If you’d like I could come back later to clean your room,” Jiao said. She smiled and bowed before she exited the room.

_Not only is she nice, helpful, and loyal, she’s also respectful of other people’s privacy, not like the other gossiping young maids. No wonder Zuko trusts her_, Katara thought. Thinking about Zuko made her blush again.

Shaking her head, she opened the letter and smiled as she recognized her grandmother’s writing.

My dear granddaughter,

I hope you are doing well in the Fire Nation heat. Remember to drink lots of water. I hope you are having lots of fun in the capital and I hope your silly brother is not making a fool of himself in front of royalty. I can’t wait for you to return and tell me all about your visit. Don’t forget to bring some souvenirs. Your father, Pakku, and I miss you and your brother very much. Your students are doing extremely well, but my poor Pakku is having some difficulty disciplining the smaller children who, instead of making water whips, make ice cubes to build miniature towers.

By the way, how are things with the young Fire Lord? I heard there is some trouble in his colonies. I hope it’s nothing serious. So young and having to deal with so many problems, what a shame. Have you been able to cheer him up? I am sure he is treating you well. Send him and his uncle our regards. Hope to see you soon.

Your Gran-Gran,

Kanna

Katara folded the letter and placed it inside her nightstand drawer. Picturing Master Pakku’s eye twitching with irritation made Katara giggle. And she could not wait to bring some Fire Nation souvenirs to her family. She missed them and her home with its white, peaceful surroundings.

Looking out the window, she noticed that the sun was setting. Katara forgot about her homesickness as she practically ran from her room to the royal dining hall.

During dinner, Mai kept showing off the new bracelet Zuko had bought her. Ty Lee—who kept on making Haru flush every time she caught his eye—exclaimed it was wonderful. Everybody else said it was nice except for Toph who found Mai’s constant bragging irritating.

Zuko had to stop himself from rolling his eyes. When Mai had asked him to spend the morning with her in the city because he had promised before, he expected it to have been a normal date where the couple walked around the city and had a picnic or something. Instead, she practically dragged him to a jewelry shop where she chose the bracelet.

“Isn’t it nice, Katara?” Mai asked innocently, almost shoving the golden jewel in the waterbender’s face.

“Yes, lovely,” Katara replied tersely.
What’s her problem? What does she want, for me to worship it? Well, she has another thing coming. Besides, it’s not as beautiful as my rose hairpin, Katara thought smugly.

As dinner continued, and Katara noticed the way her brother ate, she thought back to her grandmother’s letter.

‘I hope it’s nothing serious. So young and having to deal with so many problems, what a shame.’

Katara sighed. Her Gran-Gran had no idea.

‘Have you been able to cheer him up?’

Katara pondered. Well, she did make Zuko laugh, so that must count.

‘I am sure he is treating you well.’

Well, he had taken her out to eat and shown her around the Fire Nation capital. He defended her against those two men and his own advisor. He had shown her his private garden and his mother’s rose bushes. He had listened to her when she talked about her own mother.

And he had caressed her cheek and lips.

Oh, yes, he has definitely treated me well, she sighed dreamily.

Her heart skipped a beat and she felt another blush creeping into her cheeks. It seemed she had been blushing a lot more lately than she had ever had in her life. She peeked at Zuko and quickly lowered her face. She looked around at everybody else, but nobody noticed anything. She did find a grinning Toph unusual, though. She glanced at Aang—who was having a conversation with Zuko about the jewelry shop—from the corner of her eye and felt ashamed of herself. She ate silently for the rest of the meal except when Mai bragged about the bracelet again.

Placing his cup of wine down, Zuko pressed his lips tightly together. He was a bit annoyed by Mai’s strange behavior as he half-listened to what Aang was talking to him about. He tried to avoid looking at Katara, for whenever he did, that strange feeling engulfed his heart again. He felt his right cheek beginning to burn as he remembered her words and her touch. He discreetly touched his scarred face and stole a glance at the lovely waterbender who seemed a bit quieter than usual.

Maybe after she returns to the Southern Water Tribe everything would return to normal, he mused. But for some reason, that thought caused his heart to clench painfully.

He was glad when the meal was finally over. Excusing himself from the table, Zuko quickly retreated to his study to finish some paperwork and calm his confusing feelings. As he opened the door, he heard Sokka call to him.

“Hey, Zuko! Wait up!” the blue-eyed warrior called behind him.

Zuko turned around, and with a raised eyebrow, waited for the young man to catch up to him.

“What is it, Sokka?” he asked. He noticed that the warrior seemed a bit nervous and agitated.

“I just wanted to talk to you, you know, man to man, because you see I have this small problem… actually a big problem and I don’t know what to do and…I need your advice,” Sokka rambled rapidly on as he rubbed the back of his neck.

Zuko raised his eyebrow again as both of them stood outside his study room.

“Advice? On what?”

Sokka opened his mouth, but he closed it sharply when they heard the women’s voices coming down the corridor. Sokka seemed to panic and he whipped his head back and forth as if he was looking for a place to hide.

“Would you like to talk in my study?” Zuko asked him.

He was slightly amused at the way the confident and sometimes cocky Water Tribe warrior now seemed like a frightened moose-deer caught in the torchlight. He had a feeling that Sokka wanted to talk about something he did not want the girls to find out about.
“Yeah, sure,” Sokka answered smoothly, trying to compose himself, but when the women’s laughter became louder, he quickly jumped into the room.

Zuko smirked as he entered his study after the jumpy warrior, closing the door behind him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

“Wow! This place is amazing!” Suki exclaimed, turning her head to look everywhere around her.

“Yeah, and it’s huge! Ah, and the grass feels so good.” Toph sighed as she wiggled her toes on the green grass.

Katara smiled at her friends.

“I told you guys it was great,” she said as she looked around the Royal Palace Garden once again. She liked it more every time she visited.

She glanced over to where the cherry blossom tree stood near the pond, where she and Zuko had stood the night before with the bright moon in the night sky, the cool breeze, and Zuko’s warm touch...she flushed and brushed the last thought away.

“Are you sure we’re allowed to be here? You know how these Fire Nation people are about social class and all that stuff,” Suki asked uncomfortably. Her fingers rested rigidly against the metal fans tucked into her waist belt.

“Yes, Zuko told me we could visit the garden whenever we want,” Katara reassured her friends.

“Sparky told you that?” Toph grinned. It sounded more like a statement than a question. “Well, I’d still be allowed here since I come from the prestigious Bei Fong family, who is like royalty, by the way.”

She grinned broadly as she straightened herself and lifted her chin up in a mockingly haughty manner.
“I’ll just say you two are my ladies-in-waiting.” The blind earthbender smirked.

After the end of the war, Toph had returned to her worried parents. After explaining (rather irritably) to them that she was able to care of herself and in the process had helped the Avatar defeat the old Fire Lord, her parents forgave her for running away and accepted her decision to continue helping the Avatar by traveling around the Earth Kingdom, albeit reluctantly.

The three of them broke out into laughter at the thought since Toph was hardly the picture of a noblewoman and Katara and Suki were anything but meek servants. After taking a break from the fun, Katara spotted Iroh sitting in the veranda.

“I’ll be back, you guys. I need to talk to Uncle Iroh. You should check the pond. There are some cute turtle-ducks,” she told them hurriedly before she walked away.

“Okay?” Suki said as she replaced her fans. “What was that about?”

Shrugging her small shoulders, Toph replied, “Well, what are you waiting for? Take me to the pond now, servant.”

Suki rolled eyes.

“Now you’re just pushing it,” she said, causing Toph to cross her arms over her chest and grin.

Katara reached the little veranda where a pot of tea and pastries sat on the table. The sweet aroma of ginseng tea tickled her senses and she sighed contentedly.

“Ah, Miss Katara, care to join me for a cup of hot tea?” the jolly, old man asked, handing her a cup before she could respond.

Katara gave him a smile as she settled down and took the teacup.

“Actually Iroh—” she began, but paused when the old general raised his eyebrow at her. “Er…I mean, Uncle Iroh. I wanted to talk to you about something important. It’s about Zuko.”
Iroh grinned. Finally!

Katara fidgeted in her seat.

“I…I asked him about the scar,” she began quietly.

Iroh felt a bit disappointed.

“He…he told me…what happened,” she said almost in a whisper.

Iroh’s grin faded into a grim expression for he knew very well what had happened almost six years ago. He was a witness to everything that had caused his beloved nephew pain. But then, Iroh smiled softly.

“And he told you about it? That is incredible,” responded the retired general softly as he sipped from his porcelain cup.

“Incredible? Why?” Katara looked at the smiling man with confusion. Is he losing it?

“Zuko has never told anyone the story behind his scar, and not many people know the truth about it. I do not blame him for never wanting to talk to anyone about it. It is too painful a memory, especially because he believed the scar only represented his mistake and weakness.” Iroh sighed sadly, sipping from his cup again.

“While we were still in exile on his ship, I was the one who had to recount the tragic event to the crew, who were ready to participate in mutiny because of my nephew’s temper. Zuko barely even talked to me about it.” Iroh smiled warmly at her.

Katara gave him a small smile in return. She could not help feeling happy that Zuko had confided in her.

“I still find it very hard to believe what he had to bear. How could a father do so much damage to his own son?” Katara asked angrily.

Iroh detected loathing and sadness in her voice and smiled gently before he frowned.

“Ozai has always been a selfish and cruel person, and the worst father in history,” he stated.

Katara remembered Zuko saying that once, the first time they were on Ember Island, and agreed completely.

Iroh continued.

“Ozai was always hard on his children, expecting the best of them. He was especially hard on Zuko, for not only was he the heir, but also because he did not become what Ozai wanted him to be. Zuko was more like his mother, kind and compassionate, two things that my brother saw as weaknesses. Not to mention Zuko had a difficult time learning firebending as a child.”

“Zuko, as in former Prince Zuko and the new Fire Lord Zuko? He had trouble firebending?” Katara asked skeptically. By the way she had seen him fight, or by the way she had fought him, it seemed impossible.

“Yes, he did, and Ozai never ceased to point it out by favoring Azula. Not only because she was an excellent firebender, but because she was just like her father…cruel, heartless, ruthless, and cunning.”

Katara gripped her teacup tighter. The crazy fallen princess was all those horrible things and more. Not only did Azula try to kill Aang and Zuko, her own brother, she tried to kill Katara as well. And Azula would have succeeded if Zuko had not risked his own life to save her.

“Zuko was tormented by his father’s indifference, especially when Ozai kept saying that Azula was born lucky while he was lucky to be born.” Iroh sighed sadly again, looking at the steam rising from his cup.

“He would say that?!” Katara asked incredulously.
She could not imagine Zuko’s pain. Her father always treated his children equally and Hakoda would never stop loving them if they made mistakes. It must have been so horrible for a child to know his own father disliked and disapproved of him.

The more she found out about Zuko’s past, the guiltier she felt for judging and mistreating him, and the more she felt the need to be his friend. Katara felt her heart reach out for Zuko once again, for the lost, neglected boy and the hardened, lonely man.

“Azula was a child prodigy,” Iroh continued, “She would learn a new move instantly, while it took Zuko weeks and even months to perfect it. It infuriated him.”

“I don’t blame him,” Katara replied with a small smile. “I became angry and jealous with Aang when I first started to teach him waterbending. He got the bending moves in a few tries while it took me months to master them.”

Even as she thought about it, she was still a bit jealous.

“Well, you and Zuko have more in common than you think,” the wise general said with a grin before he sighed and took another sip of his tea.

“My nephew would practice so much and worked himself so hard that sometimes I worried for his health. But nothing deterred Zuko. All of his burdens just made him stronger. But those same burdens also made him angry and resentful for years. Of course, after he joined the Avatar and all of you, he changed. But he still is tormented by his past and by his father.”

Iroh sighed and shook his bald, white head sadly.

“My nephew is not happy. Not happy at all.”

Katara was silent for a moment as she stared at her cup of untouched tea. Everyone used to call Zuko the ‘angry spoiled Fire Nation Prince’, and she was no exception. But he never contradicted them. He never explained why he was forced to change into that angry person. He never complained; he kept it all inside.

Now she understood why Zuko had acted so cold and harsh when she first met him and all times they encountered each other after. She also understood why he barely smiled, and even more obvious, why he rarely played around and laughed. His past had hardened him.

Katara remembered the solemn look on his face under the moonlight the previous night. His expression had been unreadable, but she had seen his eyes filled with so much anger, hatred, pain, and sadness.

I’ll find a way for him to forget such horrible things. And I will find a way to make Zuko happy, Katara promised herself as she looked over at the cherry blossom tree in the garden.

---

Zuko waited impatiently behind his mahogany study desk for the Water Tribe warrior, who was fidgeting in his chair, to commence. After the Boiling Rock incident both had become good friends, though they sometimes got on each other’s nerves. Zuko looked out the window. The daylight was fading.

“Oh, right, right. Well, you see…Suki and I have been together for years now and we never been happier,” Sokka began with a happy look on his face.

Zuko cocked his one eyebrow. What did that have to do with him?

“You see, I think the time has come for me to stand up and make a serious decision.” Sokka paused, running his hand over his pulled back hair.

“And what decision is that?” Zuko asked as he waited for the response.

Sokka moved his hand from his head to rub the back of his neck.

“Well, I…I want to…propose to Suki,” the young warrior stammered, trying very hard not to blush.

Zuko smiled.
“Well, that’s great news Sokka. Congratulations,” he said sincerely before he frowned. “But I still don’t see why you need my advice.”

“I wanted to ask you how I should do it. How should I propose to Suki and make it memorable to her?”

Zuko’s dark eyebrow lifted even higher on his forehead.

“Do you even know who you’re asking? I’m not exactly the right person to ask for advice on romance,” he said dryly.

“You have a point there,” Sokka agreed. He chuckled when Zuko sniffed.

“I just don’t have another guy friend I could ask,” Sokka continued with a shrug. “I don’t think Aang can help me with…uh…this serious decision. I mean I can’t even talk to him about…intimate issues, if you know what I mean. He’s a monk I don’t think he knows about that stuff! And—"

“Okay, Sokka, you’re going off topic now,” Zuko interrupted since he really did not want to know about Aang’s…private life. “What makes you think I can help you?”

Sokka chuckled and winked his eye.

“Oh, come on, Zuko. You know probably more than me, and especially Aang, about…women.”

Zuko coughed as he tried to hide his flushed face. He had known a few women, though not as many as Sokka thought. It was expected of him since he was a prince, and when he turned fifteen his crew took him to a brothel for his first ‘initiation’ in becoming a man. Music night was not the only form of entertainment for the crew members on his ship. And as Fire Lord he could have all the concubines he desired, if only he liked that custom.

“I still don’t see your point in asking me for advice on how to make a proposal,” Zuko said instead.

“But surely you know how you’re going to propose to Mai. Come on, tell me how the Fire Lord is gonna go on with it,” Sokka said, leaning closer on his chair as if to take notes.
Zuko started. Propose to Mai? The idea had not entered his mind recently. Of course, he had thought about it since she was his girlfriend and it was expected of him, but with all the work and problems that came with running a nation, he had not thought much about it.

“Uh…I…well…” Now it was Zuko’s turn to stumble upon his words.

Sokka only raised an eyebrow at him.

Clearing his throat, Zuko answered instead, “I’m sure it doesn’t matter how you ask Suki just as long as you do. So why are you so insecure?”

Sokka laughed weakly.

“Me? Insecure? Please, I’m the Mighty Warrior Sokka. I’m not nervous at all…”

Zuko tapped his fingers on the desk and raised his eyebrow at him.

“Okay, okay!” Sokka surrendered as he flung his hands in the air. “Maybe I’m a bit nervous. It’s just that…I’m afraid.” He sighed.

“No!” Sokka exclaimed in a high-pitched voice. “I always wanted to get married and start a family. You know, have little Sokkas running around the place.”

Zuko cringed slightly at that thought.

“I even considered asking Suki after the final battle was won. But I’m afraid that if I ask her to marry me…she’ll reject me…I’m afraid of losing her,” Sokka confessed with a sigh, drooping his shoulders.
Zuko regarded the young man in front of him. His fear did seem reasonable.

“Sokka. Do you love her?” Zuko asked the warrior in a serious tone.

Sokka looked up, and raising his chin, he answered in a strong voice, “With all my heart.”

“Then ask her. Take a risk for you may never know if she is waiting for you to do it. If you keep hesitating any longer maybe you will lose her,” Zuko firmly stated.

Sokka sat silently on the chair as he thought about what his friend had said.

“You know what? You’re absolutely right. You even sounded like Iroh for a second. Thanks Fire Lord Hotman. This advice was even better than that silver lining in the horizon or whatever it was,” he said before he laughed hysterically, slapping his knee with his hand.

Zuko scowled at him at the reminder of that talk they had in the Boiling Rock.

“Well, I’ll leave you to your work,” Sokka said after wiping his eyes, looking at the pile of paperwork with disgust as he stood up.

Just as he opened the door, Iroh stepped in.

“Iroh, good to see you again, old man. How about a game of Pai Sho later on?” Sokka asked enthusiastically as he exited the room without waiting for a reply.

Iroh watched the tribesman leave before he turned to look quizzically at his nephew.

“Now, what was that about?”

Zuko smiled and shrugged as he sat back against his large chair.
“He’s going to propose to Suki.”

“Is he now? That’s wonderful!” Iroh cried out cheerfully. “I love weddings!”

Zuko almost rolled his eyes. Iroh loved every form of celebration.

“Don’t tell anyone, Uncle. He has only told me and I think he wants it to be a surprise,” Zuko warned him as he looked through the papers worthy enough of his attention.

“My lips are sealed,” Iroh promised gleefully, pressing his lips together with his thumb and index finger.

Regarding his nephew, who was busy with the scrolls piled on the desk, Iroh sat down heavily on the chair Sokka had occupied.

“Zuko, when will it be your turn to…” Iroh coughed, “propose to…Mai?” The old general swallowed distastefully.

Zuko looked up from his paperwork, again lost for words.

“I…um…I’m not planning to any time soon,” he managed to say.

“And why not?” Iroh asked curiously as he raised his white, bushy eyebrows.

“Well, because…I’m too busy running a country to be thinking about marriage right now,” Zuko answered, making a wide gesture at the enormous piles of paperwork for emphasis.

Zuko looked away and sighed.

And because I’m not sure I love her anymore...
Mai was the perfect example of a noblewoman. She was poised, calm and collected, knew Court life and etiquette. She was perfect for the role of Fire Lady…but not perfect for the role as his wife.

Zuko could not deny that he would always be grateful that she went against Azula to save him because she loved him, but Mai had never been there for him when he needed someone the most. He was fond of her, yes, but not in love with her.

He had thought he loved her when he returned from his exile the first time because she welcomed him and treated him fondly. The first time they became intimate he was nervous for he had only had sex before but had never made love. But he was sadly disappointed not only at her ‘performance,’ but because it did not feel special, like he had thought it would. The few times he had sex with her since was only to please her and so he would not have to use the local brothel to relieve his sexual frustrations. But that had been almost a year ago.

He soon realized that what he felt for Mai was just an attraction or affection because he had never had a girlfriend before. He was not even sure he was capable of loving someone in that unconditional way Sokka seemed to love Suki.

But if he had to marry someone it would be her since he knew her since childhood and she loved him. And if they did end up married he would try to make her happy even if he could not love her. Besides, he did not want to go through an arranged marriage and deal with an unfamiliar noblewoman.

His uncle’s voice brought him back from his wandering thoughts.

“Zuko, you are going to turn twenty-one in a few months and you are still unmarried! And seeing that you have not made a decision with Mai, the Royal Court has been pressing on you to choose a wife among the nobility,” Iroh reminded him seriously.

Zuko sighed irritably. The noblemen had been pressing their single female relatives on him. But he knew that they just wanted to rise in power and prestige by marrying into his family. That was not the kind of marriage he wanted. There had to be something special in a marriage. At least with Mai, he would know she was loyal to him and cared for him before he came into power.

“And the Court Council has called out for you to sire an heir immediately, Nephew,” Iroh continued, placing his hands inside his sleeves.
The Fire Lord stood abruptly from his large, cushioned chair and paced around the room angrily.

“An heir! I’m not even married yet and they already want an heir?!” Zuko thundered.

“You know the reason an heir is important. In case, spirits forbid, you…die.” Iroh shuddered as the cruel image of Ozai appeared in his mind. “The royal bloodline needs to continue to rule the Fire Nation. Otherwise, there would be chaos as the noblemen jockey for power.”

Zuko sighed again and ran his hand over his head. He knew that very well, but was he ready to be a father? Could he even be a good father?

“Perhaps you’re worried for Mai bearing children at the moment. She is still young and well…very thin and…frail. Maybe you could have an heir with a concubine,” Iroh suggested, waiting for his nephew’s reaction.

It was normal for the Fire Lords to sire an heir with a concubine if their wives were unable to bear children.

“No. You know I dislike the idea of concubinage,” Zuko replied harshly.

The women of the brothels got paid for their services and they were free to choose which man they would like to bed (at least most of the time), but concubines on the other hand were nothing more than sex slaves. The noblemen's concubines were mostly women whose own families had sold them to their new master because of debts or to raise themselves in status.

Zuko thought concubinage was wrong and he felt bad for the poor women, but he could not stop it, having concubines was a part of Fire Nation culture. If he banned it, the noblemen would surely be more outraged than they were at him for calling off the war.

The other reason he disliked this custom was because he remembered his father having many of them and it had hurt his mother deeply.

“The woman I marry will be the only mother of my children,” Zuko stated firmly.
An image of Katara holding a child lovingly in her arms appeared in his mind unbidden. He quickly brushed it aside and turned around so his uncle would not notice his flushed face. What was wrong with him? How could he think of Katara in such a way?

Iroh smiled and nodded in approval at his nephew’s declaration.

“Well, I just hope you find this woman soon because time does not wait for anybody and if you do not act fast you will regret it,” Iroh said cryptically. “And I’m getting older by the minute.”

The old prince then asked with a sparkle in his aging, wise eyes, “So Zuko? When are you going to give me grandnephews and nieces?”

After visiting the royal garden for a while, the girls decided to spend the rest of the day in Katara’s room. The sun had set over the horizon a long time ago and the small candles cast dancing shadows around the room.

“Well, it would be more believable if you acted more like a lady instead of a hog-monkey,” Suki teased, setting herself comfortably among Katara’s fluffy pillows.

Katara sat in front of her dresser, looking at her reflection in the clear mirror above it, half-listening to the other two young women. She could not shake off what Zuko and Iroh had told her these past few days.

Zuko had suffered so much and some people—like some of the stupid Earth Kingdom representatives—did not even consider that he had suffered just like everybody else and perhaps even more. And Ozai prolonged Zuko’s suffering by refusing to tell his own son where his mother was. There had to be a way to find out.

“Earth to Sugar Queen. Hello?” Toph called out loudly, snapping Katara out of her thoughts.

“Huh? Sorry, what were you saying?” Katara turned around to face them.
“Gees, Katara, which part of the Spirit World were you in?” Toph snorted, staring in the waterbender’s direction with her pale, lime-colored eyes.

“Is something wrong?” Suki asked as she walked over to Katara in concern. “It seems as if something is troubling you.”

What Katara had come to find out did trouble her, but she could not betray Zuko’s trust by babbling about his troubled past to everybody. She gave them a small smile.

“Don’t worry. I’m fine,” she told them. Toph snorted again, but Katara ignored her. “Anyway, what were you talking about?”

“I was telling Warrior Princess here that Snoozles has been acting weird, even more than he already does,” Toph said and grinned.

“Yeah, did you notice that right after dinner he ran from the dining room to talk to Zuko? He has become a bit distant, like he is hiding something from me,” Suki said dejectedly.

“Don’t worry about it, Suki. I’m sure it’s nothing. It’s probably just one of his ‘genius’ phases. He’ll come around,” Katara reassured her friend. She again began to ponder on Aang’s strange behavior from before. She needed to talk to him about it.

“Yeah, you’re probably right. Perhaps I’m overreacting over nothing,” Suki agreed with a small laugh. She sat back down on the bed, her eyes lighting up when she spotted Katara’s rose hairpin.

“Hey, isn’t this the gift Zuko sent you for your birthday?” she asked as she picked it up and inspected it.

Katara walked over to her and nodded with a smile.

“It’s very beautiful. Even more beautiful than Mai’s bracelet,” Suki stated as she stroked the blue and red gems and smiled.

“I bet it is,” Toph commented with a grin.
Katara blushed. It seemed she wasn’t being biased at all.

Toph tipped her head sideways and smiled.

“Sparky’s heading down the hall. I wonder where he’s going so late at night.”

Suki placed the hairpin back on the nightstand, and they watched as Zuko’s tall form hurriedly passed the room.

“Hey, Sparky! Where you going in such a hurry? Are you going for a midnight snack or more damn paperwork?” Toph called out loudly.

The women heard his footsteps stop and then head to the room. Zuko appeared and stood outside the door, leaning casually on the doorframe. He tried to avoid eye contact with Katara as well as tried to control his heartbeat.

“I didn’t know you were still awake. Anyway, I’m going out to some business,” he said coolly before he turned to leave, but Toph’s voice stopped him again.

“What kind of business?” the earthbender asked with a grin. She could feel Zuko’s uneasiness turn to irritation, but that did not bother her one bit. “And don’t lie to me. I want the truth.”

“Toph!” Katara chided her as if she were a nosy child.

Zuko was silent for a moment before he sighed as he turned around to face them.

“I’m going to the prison tower,” he said in a grave voice.

Toph’s grin fell from her face and Suki’s smile faded.

“The prison tower? Are you going to see…Ozai?” Katara asked quietly.
Zuko nodded. His face was unreadable.

“I’m going,” Toph announced, crossing her arms, the grin back on her face.

Zuko opened his mouth to protest, but she cut him off.

“I want to make sure that bastard is having a really bad time in prison.”

Katara placed her hand on the blind earthbender’s shoulder. Zuko suppressed a sigh of relief. He just knew Katara would make Toph see reason.

“I’m coming, too,” Katara stated.

Zuko’s mouth fell open before he clenched his jaw.

“What? You can’t go to the prison tower!” he said, crossing his arms over his chest.

“Why not? Just because we’re women or something?” Katara scoffed. “Like we’ve never been in prison before, right, Toph? We’ve been in more dangerous situations,” she retorted.

“Yeah, besides Ozai can’t do anything to us since Aang took away his bending. He’s a loser,” Toph added with another grin.

Zuko sighed. He knew he would not be able to change their minds. He turned to look at Suki, expecting her to join also. Suki just smiled and told them she had a headache and was going to sleep.

“Come on, Sparky! Lead the way,” Toph demanded as she stomped out of the room and into the hallway.

“Um…after you,” Zuko told Katara, stepping aside to let her pass.
Katara noticed that he had been avoiding looking at her in the eye. She frowned. Was he upset about the previous night?

Zuko usually rode on a komodo rhino with guards surrounding him when he visited the prison tower. This time he ordered a carriage to be brought for the two young women. Toph protested at first until Zuko told her he would not forgive himself if something happened to her like it almost did Aang. She relented with a grumble, but Katara was sure Toph was secretly glad Zuko cared about her.

They rode in silence toward the prison tower. A few guards rode in front of the carriage, Zuko rode behind it with his two personal guards while the rest of his guards brought up the rear. The rhinos’ pounding feet and the carriage wheels strolling along the path were the only sounds they could hear.
The streets were deserted and dark, but the guards held flames in their hands to illuminate their way.
The moon was still big, even if not full, and gave them more light to see by.

After a while, Katara noticed that the carriage had slowed down and she peeked outside the window.
The prison tower loomed before them like a dark specter, shadowy mountains lined behind it at a distance. She craned her neck around to look at Zuko. He was staring straight ahead with a stoic expression, the moon reflecting on his sharp features, his eyes dark and hard. He rode the komodo rhino magnificently, his posture straight with one hand on the reins and the other resting on his thigh.
Katara could not help but think that Zuko looked very regal and striking.

Zuko turned and caught her eye. She blushed at being caught staring at him but smiled nonetheless.
Zuko gave her a small smile before looking away. Katara frowned and sat back down inside the carriage.

A few minutes later, they came to a stop, and before the carriage driver could jump down to open the carriage door, Toph threw it open and jumped outside. Katara smiled at the driver’s surprised face before she accepted his hand to step down.

“I feel somebody else’s footsteps,” Toph said as they neared the prison.

They watched as a man came out from the building and walked off in another direction.

“That looked like Wei. I wonder what he was doing here,” Zuko said, eyeing the retreating advisor suspiciously.
“Maybe he was visiting a family member,” Katara suggested, but Zuko had a feeling it was something else. He just did not know what.

They entered the dark prison tower where the captain of the prison guard greeted the Fire Lord and led them to their destination. They went up many flights of stairs, passing many cells on their way. Upon hearing that there were visitors, the prisoners poked their dirty heads through the bars. They whistled as the women passed them, making so many disgusting and appalling comments that Katara wished she had stayed in her room. Toph kept her head up and once in a while retorted back hotly.

The prisoners were harshly silenced when Zuko threatened them ferociously, flames growing on his hands for emphasis. The inmates quickly disappeared back into their dark holes. Being locked up in prison was bad enough and being in prison with severe burns was worse.

Katara noticed that the farther they went, the darker and stuffier it got. There were no small windows on the dark halls any longer and only the torches along the walls shone the way. There were fewer and fewer cells until they came to one particular door. It was made of strong steel and had several heavy bolts securing it. Two guards stood on either side of the door and bowed to their Fire Lord before stealing surprised looks at the women.

“Are you sure you want to go in?” Zuko asked them about the tenth time.

“Just open the damn door.” Toph snorted, rolling her eyes impatiently.

Frowning, Zuko pulled out a key from his pocket and opened the door. The guards stood upright and waited in attention. Zuko held the door open and the women walked in before Zuko closed the door behind them, cutting off the light.

The waterbender could not see very well in the darkness, but as her eyes became adjusted, she noticed that they were in a room divided in half by iron bars. Zuko produced a small flame in his hand and lit the torch near the door.

Katara had to bite her tongue from screaming in fright. As soon as the room was illuminated, a very frightening face appeared behind the cell bars. His hair was dirty, messy, and long. He was sitting with his back to the wall, his thin form covered with red, raggedy clothes. But what frightened Katara was the look on his face. He had such an evil smile, his eyes radiating so much hatred it chilled Katara’s bones. She glanced at Toph who was grinning.
Only because she can’t see his face! she thought.

“Ah, Zuko, you came to visit me. I was beginning to think you forgot about me,” Ozai began, letting out a sinister chuckle.

He looked away and noticed the women standing beside Zuko and grinned.

“You really must be desperate to know where your mother is. You brought me prostitutes to bribe me. Spirits know how long it’s been since I’ve bedded a woman,” he commented leeringly. He licked his lips as he eyed them slowly. “I didn’t know you had it in you, but perhaps they could persuade me.” Ozai chuckled again, casting lustful stares at the women.

Katara and Toph snorted in disdain and revulsion.

“Shut up!” Zuko snapped. “These are my friends, the ones who helped me defeat you during the war and they just came to see your miserable state.”

Ozai sneered at them, his evil eyes piercing right through them.

“And why didn’t you bring Mai with you as well?” he said instead, “How is she by the way? Is she still striving to be Fire Lady? Has she stripped you of your wealth yet?”

Katara could see Zuko frown in confusion. She looked at Toph who was nodding and grinning.

Ozai continued after Zuko’s silence.

“Tell me, Zuko, is she as dull and boring in bed as she is in public?”

Katara cringed at the crude remark.

“You sick bastard!” Toph yelled in disgust.
Ozai only laughed.

“I’m not here to talk of such things, Ozai. Mai has nothing to do with this. Tell me where my mother is,” Zuko replied coolly, placing his hands behind his back.

But Ozai ignored him and turned his attention on Katara. She felt as if her blood had frozen as he looked her over and leered at her. Zuko narrowed his eyes and stood in front of Katara protectively.

“Tell me, Zuko. Is this the water wench my daughter Azula shot lightning at and you risked your pathetic life for? Now I can see why you did, she’s quite a lovely creature. She must be very rough and feisty when you ravage her.” He again chuckled licentiously.

Katara felt her whole face heat up in embarrassment and anger. Even Toph was speechless.

Ozai’s jeering laughter was cut short when a huge fire blast hit the wall an inch above his head. His eyes widened in surprise and fright. They all turned to look at an outraged young Fire Lord.

“Shut the hell up!” Zuko growled fiercely, his deep voice rumbling in the cell room. “Don’t you dare speak of Katara in such a way again! You will show her some respect or next time I will burn off your tongue!” he snapped menacingly.

Katara was surprised at the intensity in Zuko’s eyes and words, and could not help but smile at the way he defended her.

Ozai was silent for a moment, but then he began to chuckle.

“Are you sure you want to do that? Then how will you find out where Ursa is?” he snickered.

Zuko growled. Damn!

“Prince Zuko,” Ozai began mockingly, “you know your mother is alive, right? Have you ever thought about why she hasn’t shown up? You have been…Fire Lord for what, four years? And she hasn’t come to see you. Perhaps she doesn’t want to see the disgrace of a son you are,” he bit out.

Zuko winced.

“Look here you worthless piece of shit!” Toph addressed the older man sharply. “If you don’t start spitting out information, then we’ll make you.” She punched one of her fists into her palm and then she cracked her knuckles roughly.

Ozai laughed again. His cruel laughter was getting on their nerves.

“Oh, really?” Ozai said, standing up to walk closer to the cell bars. “You’re not the only one who has threatened me, you little runt. Zuko here has tried so many times, but he just doesn’t have the guts to act on those threats. He’s weak.”

Katara glanced over to Zuko. His posture was straight and his face was emotionless, but his eyes were full of anger and hurt.

Ozai continued on with his insults.

“How do you expect me to respect someone who is a weakling? He doesn’t have the backbone to use torture to extract information. And so nobody is going to get information about Úrsa from me.”

That’s not true, Katara thought.

She knew the reason that Zuko couldn’t use torture on him was because Ozai was still his father, no matter how much Zuko hated him. She was somewhat glad Zuko had not used torture because then he would become like his cruel father.

Ozai then turned his mad gaze towards his son.

“You’re a traitor to your nation, siding with the enemy, with that stupid child-Avatar and these whores,” he spat vehemently.
Zuko growled at the insult.

“You’re weak,” Ozai continued, “You always were since you were a little snooty kid clinging to your mother’s skirts.”

“Hey!” Toph yelled indignantly. “Shut your damn mouth!” She balled her fist in the air. She could feel Zuko’s distress and she hated it because she cared for him as a brother. “Don’t listen to him, Zuko.”

Katara felt her hands clench beside her as she listened to the loathsome man continue insulting his own son.

_How could he be so cruel? Zuko doesn’t deserve to have such a father. He doesn’t deserve to have suffered so much. And he certainly doesn’t deserve to have his mother kept away from him._

Katara felt her blood boil with so much hate and anger. She despised Ozai more than ever, even more than she despised her mother’s killer because he at least seemed a bit regretful while Ozai seemed to be enjoying the pain he was inflicting. Katara could feel the power of the moon calling to her, pulling her, making all forms of liquid evident around her, the small moisture in the room, the cup of water in Ozai’s cell, sweat…blood.

“You’ve been a disgrace to our family since the day you were born! I should have gotten rid of you when you began to show signs of failure,” Ozai growled out angrily. “And then you decide to go against me in my decision concerning my army, unable to handle the idea of sacrifice. And at the Agni Kai you backed down! You began to cry and beg for mercy instead of taking it like a man!”

“Shut up!” Katara screamed furiously, lifting her arms in front of her, her fingers spread apart.

Ozai’s body suddenly bent down in an awkward position, one arm painfully bent behind his back. His eyes became wide with pain and confusion.

“Shut up! That’s enough!” Katara repeated furiously. “Of course he did not fight you, you bastard! He was just a child! A child who only wanted what was best for his country. He only wanted his father’s approval to show his worth.”

Ozai’s arm bent more awkwardly behind his back and he cried out. Toph crossed her arms and grinned, rather enjoying hearing Ozai’s suffering.

Zuko’s eyes widened in surprise as he stared at the outraged waterbender. Her sapphire eyes were ablaze like blue fire and her concentrated face was contorted in anger and frustration. He could see her fingers and arms contract as she bent his father’s blood, reminding him of the first time he saw her bloodbend and of how terrified and impressed he was. Again, his heart warmed at her words. For a brief moment, he thought of how beautiful she looked even in her rage.

“Zuko showed how brave he is by standing up for what he believed in, by speaking out against such a horrible plan. Let me tell you something,” Katara continued heatedly, “Zuko is worth more than you and he has more honor than you will ever have!”

Katara then shifted her stance and brought her hands closer together. Ozai’s body went rigid and he began to choke. She was starting to feel exhausted since she had never practiced her bloodbending and it was not a full moon yet, but her anger gave her the energy to hold her death grip on the veins in Ozai’s throat. She had sworn never bloodbend again, but Ozai deserved it.

“Now you will tell Zuko this instant where his mother is before I kill you!” Katara commanded, tightening her hold.

The older man began to breathe harshly as his airway began to burn, but he answered with a strained, “Never!”

“Then you leave me no choice!” Katara yelled again.

“Do it, Sugar Queen! What’s taking so long?” Toph yawned and then smirked.

Ozai’s dirty face twisted into wide terror. He turned his gaze from the waterbender to Zuko. The young Fire Lord stared back emotionlessly and shrugged.

“Maybe it’s for the best. Katara, please end his misery. I could always find another way to find my mother,” Zuko drawled.

But deep down he was hoping Ozai broke down because he had no idea how else to look for her. Besides, he knew Katara was bluffing as well. She would never be able to kill someone. And he was aware that Katara could not hold on any longer, she looked so tired.
Ozai made a strangled cry when he heard him say that and choked when Katara shrugged and said, “If that’s what you want.”

“S-stop!” Ozai wheezed. “I’ll…I’ll tell you!”

“Are you sure?” Zuko asked, piercing him with his own glare.

“You better not lie,” Toph warned.

Ozai managed to squeak out a yes. He was thrown into a coughing fit when the grip on his throat was relinquished and he fell on his hands and knees.

Zuko walked closer to the cell bars, his strong footsteps echoing in the room. He bent down to glare at his defeated father who was panting roughly.

“Tell me where she is. Now,” Zuko demanded.

Ozai grabbed his throat as he took large gulps of air, then lifting his hateful gaze through the bars, he answered.

“She’s in…the Abandoned Fort.”

End of Part One

Chapter End Notes

Thank you for reading!
“The Abandoned Fort,” Zuko repeated with a dark frown.

He turned to Toph for confirmation of Ozai’s confession. When the earthbender nodded, Zuko sighed and returned to glare at his father.

“Your life has been spared again. How does it feel to know you owe your life to your enemies?” Zuko asked coolly.

Toph snickered and Katara grinned.

Ozai growled and lunged himself at Zuko, but the cell bars impeded his attack. Zuko didn’t even flinch at the sound of Ozai’s body smacking into the iron bars or his loud curses. He stared, unaffected.

“This isn’t over, boy!” Ozai yelled as he tried to grab Zuko’s throat.

“I think it is,” Katara said, but she paused when a wave of dizziness overcame her. She brushed it aside and looked over at Zuko.

“I got what I wanted. No need for us to remain here,” Zuko told the young women as he walked away from the cell bars and his raging father and opened the steel door.

Toph and Katara glared one last time at the older man and walked through the door. Just as Zuko was about to close the door behind him he heard Ozai laugh again.

“No. It has just begun,” he said between laughter.

Zuko frowned as the door finally closed. It seemed Azula inherited her insanity from their father. The young Fire Lord locked the prison door and bid farewell to the prison guards who bowed deeply in return.
What did he mean by ‘It has just begun’? Zuko pondered as he walked away.

He rounded the corner and noticed Katara leaning heavily on the cold wall with one hand pressed against her temple. Toph was holding onto the waterbender’s other arm with a worried frown creasing her forehead.

“Katara!” Zuko called out in alarm as he rushed toward the two women.

“She almost fell,” Toph said, turning in his direction as she continued to hold onto Katara’s arm.

Zuko walked closer and looked at Katara’s closed eyes.

“Katara, what’s wrong? Are you all right?”

“Yeah, yeah, I’m just a bit tired and dizzy. I haven’t gotten so angry and used bloodbending in years.” Katara laughed, trying to reassure her worried friends. She opened her eyes and saw Zuko’s concerned face before her.

“Are you sure you’re okay?” he asked with a frown.

“Yes,” she assured. She smiled and removed her hand from her temple. “There, much better.” She brushed Toph’s hand aside and moved away from the wall.

As soon as she stood on her own feet the hall began to spin horribly, making her feel sick, and she began to fall forward toward the floor, unable to stop herself.

“Katara!” she heard Zuko yell.

She closed her eyes for the impact. Katara felt her body hit something hard, flat and warm. Warm? She furrowed her forehead. Then she felt arms surrounding her back, supporting her weight.

“Katara?” Zuko’s concerned voice sounded above her head.
When he saw her falling, Zuko had caught her instinctively, not wanting her to get hurt from falling hard on the stone floor.

Oh, spirits! Katara felt her cheeks heat up and her heart began to beat faster. She pulled away from Zuko’s broad chest, but the sudden motion only caused her to feel dizzier. She leaned her forehead on his chest with a pained groan.

“Whoa there, Sugar Queen! Maybe you should wait a few minutes before moving,” Toph giggled.

Toph, giggling? Katara thought unbelievably.

“I’m fine!” she yelled, a scowl on her face. She felt Zuko’s chest tremble as he chuckled.

“Well, it doesn’t seem like it” he said with a grin.

“I said I’m fine!”

Katara scowled again as she looked up to glare at a grinning Zuko, who raised his eyebrow and looked down at his right arm. Katara looked down as well and her eyes widened. Her hands were gripping his upper arms tightly.

His very warm and muscular upper arms, she thought and blushed.

“Well, maybe you are fine,” Toph piped in and grinned. “Hey, Sparky, maybe you should carry Sweetness to the carriage,” she said in an innocent tone. She grinned widely when she felt both benders’ hearts jump and beat faster at the suggestion.

“No, it’s…it’s…okay. I’m just dizzy,” Katara stammered, hoping the dim light in the prison hall could cover her blushing cheeks.

“I…won’t mind,” Zuko said slowly before he shrugged casually as he tried to calm his own heart.
I won’t mind at all, he continued mentally. Katara pressed against him did not seem like a bad idea. He quickly brushed the thought away.

For a second Katara debated whether to accept his offer, but decorum won. What would people think if they saw her in Zuko’s arms?

“No, I’m fine really. It’s not like I broke an ankle or something,” she said firmly.

Zuko’s face remained impassive, but he felt his heart sink.

“Oh…alright then.” He cleared his throat and began to move away from her.

As soon as she felt his strong, warm arms leave her, Katara panicked and, without thinking, latched onto his upper arms even tighter. Zuko cocked his eyebrow at her.

“Um…I still feel a bit dizzy…Maybe I could…lean on you for support?” she asked, trying to keep from stuttering too much.

Zuko could not stop himself from smiling.

“Sure,” he quickly responded.

He removed his hands from her back and steadied her. Katara grabbed onto one of his arms, but again she resisted the urge to lean her head on his shoulder, just like when they were walking in the garden.

Toph placed her hand over her mouth to hide her huge grin as the pair moved away.

The three walked the same way they came in with Zuko’s personal guards behind them, only this time they took longer since Katara felt ill. The two guards said nothing as they watched their Fire Lord helping the young Water Tribe woman.

Zuko tried to concentrate on where he was going, but all he could focus on was the feeling of Katara’s hands holding his arm. He tried to calm himself and hoped she did not notice the smile that was plastered on his face.

He looked down at the waterbender from the corner of his eye and noticed that she looked exhausted and her tanned skin was a bit pale. He frowned and berated himself for his thoughtlessness. There he was, enjoying himself, while Katara was feeling ill because she bloodbended. She had resorted to what she hated the most and used it to help him. He was extremely grateful, though.

Zuko felt relieved and overjoyed. Now he knew where his mother was. He was finally going to see her again and bring her back home. He needed to set off to the Abandoned Fort at once. He needed to get his mother away from there and back to the palace where she belonged with him.

“Hey, Sparky,” Toph’s voice interrupted his thoughts. “Your mom’s living in an abandoned fort? That sucks!”

“Yeah,” Katara agreed. She tightened her hold as another wave of dizziness hit her. Zuko noticed and slowed down. “It must be terrible living all by yourself in a deserted place.”

“It would seem like it, but I assure you that it is not at all deserted,” Zuko replied as he led them through the prison halls.

He did not need to see their faces to know they were confused.

“The Abandoned Fort is actually a village. It used to be a great fort for the Fire Nation Army many centuries ago, but when Sozin sought out to conquer the rest of the world the soldiers were needed to conquer other lands and the fort was abandoned, thus gaining the name. The Abandoned Fort is actually in the middle of the Earth Kingdom and is neither controlled by the Earth Kingdom or the Fire Nation. Since there is no form of authority in that place it has become a refuge for thieves, beggars, and deserters from both countries.

“And now I need to go there and fast,” Zuko added as he tried to quicken his pace, but when Katara gripped his arm he slowed down again.

“Is it really that bad a place?” Toph asked as she moved forward on bare feet.

“How could a place full of criminals be a good place to live?” Zuko answered tersely. He sighed.
“Don’t worry, Zuko,” Katara assured him as she patted his arm. “I’m sure Lady Ursa is all right.”

Zuko looked down at her sadly.

“I sure hope so.”

Katara looked up at him.

“I want you to know I’m very glad you finally know where your mother is,” she told him sincerely and smiled.

Zuko’s heart warmed at her earnest words once again.

“Thank you, Katara.”

Iroh stood atop the long flight of stairs that led into the palace with a cup of steaming jasmine tea in his hands. He looked up at the night sky and yawned.

Jiao had told him that the Fire Lord had gone to the prison tower with the two young female Bending Masters. Iroh shook his head as he sipped from his cup. What was his nephew thinking in taking two young ladies to such a place and so late at night? He knew they could take care of themselves after being in worse situations, but he was old fashioned that way. He was glad Sokka and Aang had retired to their rooms early. Who knew what they would have done if they knew?

Just then, the huge entrance doors leading into the palace grounds opened and guards on komodo rhinos surrounding a carriage entered. The retired general notice Zuko riding on his own black rhino behind the carriage, which he presumed, held the two young women.

The carriage stopped at the base of the many steps leading into the palace, the rhinos huffing and pawing the ground. The young Fire Lord gracefully dismounted his komodo rhino and handed the reins to the stable hands. Zuko quickly walked over to the carriage and opened the door himself before the driver had a chance to move.
“As soon as you helped Katara into the carriage she knocked out,” Toph commented with a yawn. “Luckily, she doesn’t snore like Snoozles.”

The young man offered his hand to her, but the girl scowled and swatted his hand away before she jumped out. Zuko smirked before he returned his gaze back inside the carriage.

Katara sat on one side fast asleep with her hands tucked between one side of her face and the wall of the carriage. Zuko smiled as he watched the waterbender breathe softly. He considered stepping inside and carrying her to her room, but decided against it. By the way she refused at the prison tower, it seemed she disliked the idea. Shaking his head, Zuko sighed.

“Katara?” he called softly. “Katara, wake up. We’re here.”

Katara opened her eyes sleepily and gave a soft yawn.

“What?” she mumbled crossly. She rubbed an eye with her hand.

Zuko grinned at her annoyed face.

“I didn’t mean to disrupt your dream. Maybe I should tell the stable hands to take the carriage back to the stables so you can sleep.”

Katara yawned again and grinned back.

“Who knew a carriage could be a nice place to sleep in? Maybe you should stay with me and find out how nice it is.”

Zuko gulped and cleared his throat. He knew what she meant, but still…

“I’m sure it would be, but your brother would probably kill me if I let you sleep around…I mean rest in the stables,” he quickly corrected and rubbed his neck.

Katara laughed, too sleepy to catch the slip.
“Well, I guess I should get to bed now. I’m still a bit dizzy.” She moved to step outside and was so tired she yawned again.

“Here, let me help you,” Zuko quickly offered, taking one of her hands.

Katara opened her mouth to protest and argue that she was capable of doing it herself, but when she began to wobble, she closed it quickly. Besides, Zuko’s hand felt nice. Very, very nice.

Toph grinned as she walked up the long stairs and yawned loudly.

“Hey there, Iroh!” she greeted.

“Miss Toph, a young lady such as you should not be running around in a prison tower in the middle of the night,” Iroh chided gently.

Toph rolled her eyes.

“I’m a Master Earthbender, created Metalbending, and am an Earth Rumble Champion! I can take care of myself, thank you very much,” she snorted and crossed her arms.

Iroh chuckled.

“Where is Miss Katara, by the way?” he asked.

Toph grinned and jerked her thumb behind her. Iroh looked over her head and saw Zuko helping Katara out of the carriage.

When did my nephew become such a gentleman? Iroh mused.

When Katara stepped onto the ground she staggered forward, but Zuko caught her quickly. Iroh’s smile then turned into a frown.
“What happened? Katara looks so pale!” he said as he started to walk down the steps.

“Eh, nothing serious, don’t worry,” Toph answered with a shrug as she followed the old man.

“Sorry,” Katara mumbled in embarrassment as she tried to straighten herself.

Zuko smiled as he held onto her arms.

“It’s okay. As long as you are here, I promise that nothing will harm you,” he assured her, “You don’t expect me to let you get hurt, now do you?”

Katara was strangely reminded of the time Zuko pushed her out of the way from the falling rocks in the Western Air Temple. She smiled.

“I guess not. Thanks, Zuko.”

“Miss Katara?” Iroh called out as he stepped closer to them. “Are you feeling unwell, my dear?”

Katara and Zuko turned away from each other to look at Iroh. The young woman smiled.

“I’m fine,” she said as she tried to move away, but Zuko held onto her arms. She frowned and looked up at him. “What is it?”

“Where do you think you’re going?” Zuko asked with a raised brow.

Katara frowned even more in confusion.

“To my room, obviously,” she responded.
“Not by yourself you’re not. What if you collapse on your way up the stairs or in the corridors?” Zuko frowned.

Katara narrowed her eyes.

“I am not some frail little girl! I can—”

“I never said you were frail or weak!” Zuko interrupted, exasperated. “I’m just saying you need help since you can barely stand on your own!”

Katara opened her mouth to retort, but Toph piped in.

“He’s right, you know. Stop being so stubborn and let him help you! Some people want to sleep, jeez!” the blind seventeen-year-old exclaimed, flailing her arms in the air.

“Yes, Miss Katara, we wouldn’t want you to hurt yourself. Let my nephew help you,” Iroh said gently with a smile.

Katara was about to protest, but another yawn escaped her mouth. Blushing, Katara sighed.

“Okay, fine,” she grumbled.

She held onto Zuko’s arm and began to walk, but Zuko didn’t budge. Katara turned to ask him what was wrong when she felt him slip his arm away from hers.

Before Katara could react, Zuko bent down slightly and scooped her up in his arms, one hand supporting her back and the other under her knees. He straightened and shifted her so she would be comfortable. He knew she needed help and would just have to deal with him carrying her.

Katara squeaked in surprise.

“W-what are you doing?” she stammered, her heart racing wildly in her chest.
“You’ll be resting in your room faster if I carry you,” he responded calmly. He looked down at her, expecting her to object.

Katara found herself feeling comfortable in Zuko’s strong arms. She blushed and looked away. Being carried did not seem too bad.

“Um…okay…” she relented.

Zuko smiled happily and began to ascend the stairs toward the palace.

“Well, that wasn’t so hard,” Iroh whispered to Toph who grinned. They both walked up behind the pair.

“Uncle, meet me in my study. I need to talk to you about something important,” Zuko addressed his uncle as they entered into the golden palace halls.

Iroh raised his eyebrow but agreed. He bid the women goodnight and left the opposite way.

“Toph?” Zuko asked, “Er…um…come with me to Katara’s room.” He cleared his throat nervously.

Toph grinned and followed the tall young man and the young woman in his arms.

Katara could feel her face heating up and her heart racing even faster as they made their way through the long, elaborate halls.

Calm down. There’s no need to react like this. He’s just helping me…because that’s what friends do, right?

She could feel Zuko’s strong, warm arms supporting her rather chilly body and his warm breath tickled her head as he turned to speak to Toph.
Zuko is so warm, she thought.

Despite herself, she began to enjoy being held and rather lamented not letting him carry her in the prison tower. She could feel Zuko’s chest rise and fall as he breathed, setting up a relaxing rhythm. She was glad he was not wearing his chest armor. She still felt dizzy, her eyes were heavy with sleep, and so she found herself relaxing. Blushing, Katara settled her head at the crook of Zuko’s neck. She rested her hand a little below his chest where the scar he received to save her life lay and felt his heartbeat, strong and soothing.

She closed her eyes and could not help but feel comforted, warm and...safe. With these thoughts, she fell into a restful sleep.

As soon as he took her in his arms, Zuko realized how light and petite Katara was. He had not noticed it before because she had such a strong personality. A strange urge to protect her and keep her safe engulfed his being. Shaking his head, he walked down the corridor and looked down at the silent waterbender. She had her gaze averted and her cheeks had a hint of pink tint. He grinned smugly.

Then it was his turn to flush when he felt Katara place her head on his neck and her hand on his chest.

Breath Zuko, breath, he told himself. A few moments later, he heard her soft, even breathing and he realized she had fallen asleep.

He could feel her cool breath on his throat, sending a tingling sensation throughout his body. He was aware of her hand clutching his shirt, her hair tickling his neck and her breasts pressed against his chest. Zuko flushed brightly and began to feel extremely hot. He was sure his heart was racing a mile a minute, but if Toph noticed, she didn’t say anything. He was relieved she couldn’t see his face.

Zuko finally realized they had arrived at Katara’s room in the guest wing when Toph cleared her throat. Toph walked ahead of him and opened the door. She entered the room and rolled her eyes when Zuko stood uneasily outside.

“Don’t just stand there, Sparky. Take her to bed!” Toph exclaimed. She grinned when she felt Zuko’s heartbeat jolt at her choice of words.

Zuko gaped and flushed even more.
“I…um…will take her to bed. I mean I will take her to her bed. I will lay her—in her bed! So she could rest!” he stammered and swallowed.

Toph chuckled as she moved the bed cover to the side. Awkward Zuko was just too funny.

“Well, good night, Sparky. Have a great night.” She yawned and started to leave.

Zuko started.

“Wait!” he whispered so as not to wake the woman in his arms. “Where are you going? You can’t leave me here alone! What…do I do?”

“I thought a man like you would know,” Toph said with a smirk.

“Toph!” Zuko whispered harshly. He quickly looked down to make sure Katara was asleep.

The earthbender chuckled.

“Just place her on her bed and let her rest. I’m sure she’ll make it through the night with her day clothes on. Unless you want to help her into her nightgown…”

“Toph! You little…” the firebender muttered.

Toph grinned and yawned.

“Well, night, Lord Sparky,” she called and left the room with a farewell wave of her hand.

“Toph, get back here!” Zuko ordered uneasily, but the blind girl did not respond.
Zuko swallowed nervously. What would Uncle say if he saw him alone in a young lady’s room in the middle of the night? Especially if that young lady was Katara, whom Iroh adored?

Hoping nobody passed by the room, Zuko stepped next to the bed and gently deposited the sleeping Water Tribe woman on it, removing her clenched hand from his tunic. As soon as he let her go, Zuko felt cold and empty and he resisted the impulse to gather her in his arms again. Katara frowned and mumbled in her sleep as the warmth left her. Zuko held his breath and hoped she did not wake up, but the young woman relaxed and remained asleep.

Deciding it would be more comfortable for her, Zuko removed Katara’s slippers and set them beside the bed. As he straightened, he noticed the rose hairpin he had given her resting on her nightstand and he smiled.

He made to leave but remained standing near the bed. He looked down at the sleeping young woman and noticed how peaceful and beautiful she looked. He knew he should leave her room immediately before someone saw him and started spreading rumors, but he just couldn’t. He was too mesmerized by the lovely woman who had changed his life in so many ways.

Before he could stop himself, Zuko reached a hand and lightly touched Katara’s cheek. When she did not awaken, he moved his fingers down her cheek to her soft lips. Those full, plump lips that had enchanted him the night before and that kept enchanting him even more as time went by.

Katara leaned into his touch with a soft sigh. At the movement, her shirt slipped and exposed her bare neck and shoulder. Zuko gulped and continued to stroke her lips. His breathing became ragged as he tried to control his desire. He watched as a smile graced her face and he wondered what she was dreaming about. What would she say if she knew what he was doing? If she knew what he wanted to do?

Zuko brought his head down to hers and licked his lips. Just one kiss and he would be satisfied, he would stop thinking of her. She would never know. This was his only chance. Zuko again brought his hand to her soft cheek and lowered his head closer to her face. He could feel her breath on his lips, they were so close he could almost feel those soft lips of hers. Just one more inch and his lips would be pressed against hers.

He closed his eyes.

‘You never lost your honor, Zuko…. ’ Katara’s voice surfaced in his mind.
Zuko pulled away and clenched his fist and shook his head in disgust.

What is wrong with me? Stealing a kiss from an unsuspecting, sleeping woman! How dishonorable!

Zuko closed his eyes tightly. Gods, how he wanted her! How he wanted to kiss her! But he couldn’t do it, not only because he was not that kind of man or because he would dishonor her, but because he would betray her trust, as well as Sokka and Aang’s friendships.

Besides, what’s the point in kissing her if she couldn’t respond back? he thought.

Sighing miserably, Zuko covered her shoulder with her shirt and lifted the bedcovers over her body, tucking her in gently. He heard her sigh in contentment and he smiled.

“Good night, Katara, and thank you,” he whispered in her ear.

He walked to the door and took one last look at the sleeping waterbender’s form. He exited the room and closed the door softly behind him.

Resting a hand on the door, Zuko sighed again and bit his lip before shaking his head and heading down the lonely corridor toward his study.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Iroh was nodding off to sleep when he heard Zuko enter the study room. Stifling a yawn, Iroh stretched and straightened in his chair.

“You know, Zuko, it was not a good idea to take the two ladies into a prison, especially so late at night. Imagine what Master Sokka and Avatar Aang would say or try to do?” He chuckled before he frowned when he found his teacup was empty.

Zuko sighed as he moved toward his study desk and sat down heavily on his chair.

“They wanted to go and I couldn’t stop them,” he stated flatly before he added, “It’s a good thing they went, though.”
Iroh looked over at his nephew and noticed his face was flushed.

“Zuko, did something happen with—?”

“Katara is sleeping safely in her room,” Zuko cut in as he ran his hand over his hair.

Iroh felt a bit of disappointment go through him before he nodded in approval.

“So what do you want to talk to me about, Nephew?”

The Fire Lord remained silent for a moment before he looked up to stare intensely into his uncle’s eyes.

“I know where my mother is,” Zuko revealed quietly.

Iroh’s mouth flew open.

“What?! Where is she? How did you find out?” he asked rapidly.

Zuko held up his hand to calm the old man.

“I owe it all to Katara. She’s the one who made Ozai talk,” he said and then grinned.

Iroh lifted his eyebrow in curiosity.

“She used her bloodbending,” Zuko confessed.

Iroh frowned.
“She told me about it in a letter but she swore never to use it again.”

Zuko frowned and sighed guiltily.

“I know.”

“Well, tell me what happened, Nephew,” Iroh prompted. He set his empty teacup on the table and wished he had brought his teapot.

Zuko explained what happened in their visit with Ozai that led to Katara’s wrath and her resort to bloodbending.

“You should have seen his face. He looked so scared I was afraid he would soil his pants.” Zuko smirked.

Iroh could not help his chuckle at the thought of his arrogant brother reduced to such a state.

“Katara used her bloodbending to help you, Nephew. Did I not tell you that you would find some way to find your mother? Katara was that miracle.”

Zuko did not stop smiling.

“Yes, she’s a great woman and a good…friend.” He frowned as his words cause his heart to clench in a most uncomfortable way and closed his eyes.

“Zuko, is there something you would like to tell me?” Iroh asked hopefully.

“Like what, Uncle?” Zuko asked tersely as he looked away.

“Oh, I don’t know…something regarding Miss Katara?” Iroh asked innocently, staring at his nephew carefully.
Zuko felt himself flush despite himself.

Does he know what I was doing and thinking of in Katara’s room?

“Uncle, please send a messenger to tell my advisors that there will be an urgent meeting tomorrow morning,” he said instead, his tone once again business-like and serious. “I’m leaving tomorrow for the Abandoned Fort and I want to place the rule of the Fire Nation temporarily on you while I’m gone.”

Iroh smiled and shifted in his seat.

“Ah, well, you see, Nephew, I was thinking of returning to Ba Sing Se to check on my teashop. And I will be waiting for you there when you find Ursa.”

“What? But then who am I going to leave in charge of the Fire Nation?” Zuko exclaimed curtly.

Iroh smiled again.

“I’m sure Chao could handle it.”

Zuko thought about it for a moment before he nodded.

“Yes, you’re right. Very well then, thanks and good night, Uncle,” he said dismissively, examining some of the paperwork on his desk.

Iroh opened his mouth to ask about Katara again, but he closed it and nodded instead. He stood up and bowed.

“Good night, Fire Lord Zuko,” he said and moved toward the door.

“Uncle,” Zuko called out.
Iroh turned around and raised a brow.

“Uh…tell Jiao to take Katara’s breakfast to her room tomorrow. She should stay in bed and rest,” he said softly, keeping his face turned down on his papers.

Iroh smiled widely, agreed, and left the room.

First things first, I need some tea, the old man hummed to himself as he walked down the hall.

The young Fire Lord decided to stay in his study for longer than he needed to, afraid of what he would do if he went to sleep. Afraid of what he would start to think about…

After Zuko finished going through his pile of paperwork, he finally made his way to his bedchamber with reluctant steps. He needed to rest for his journey the following day, after all. As he exited his study, he found Mai waiting for him outside his office with a bored expression. Zuko stopped himself from jumping in surprise as he saw the tall, silent noblewoman. Regaining his composure, he looked at her with a raised eyebrow.

“I thought you would be asleep by now,” he remarked as he turned and began to walk down the hall.

Mai sighed heavily and moved away from the wall to follow after him.

“I was waiting so I could talk to you about your visit to the prison tower,” she told him quietly.

Zuko started, surprised that she knew where he had been. He opened his mouth to ask her how she found out.

“I asked a guard and he told me,” she explained with a shrug, her thin shoulder rising a tiny bit. She paused as she glanced at him from the corner of his eye. “And I kind of overheard you tell Iroh you found your mother.”

Zuko glared at her in mild annoyance, but she only stared at him, unaffected. Zuko looked away and furrowed his brow. Mai never wanted to listen to him when he tried to talk about his problems with Ozai and his missing mother before. So why did she want to talk about it all of sudden?
“I never would’ve thought you would take Toph and…Katara to the prison tower. It didn’t seem like a place you’d show them as a host,” Mai spoke seemingly uninterested.

“I did not take them. I didn’t even want them to set a foot in that place. They were the ones who wanted to go,” Zuko explained passively.

“You never showed any interest in going,” he continued blandly. Or never cared enough to go, he added mentally.

Mai lowered her eyes and looked away. They continued walking down the corridor in silence. Zuko was lost in his own thoughts as he let his mind wander back to Katara and how he almost kissed her. Again.

Shaking the thoughts and the strange, warm feeling away, he wondered instead of the moment he would finally be reunited with his mother. Was she all right? Was she still in the Abandoned Fort or had she moved somewhere else? Or more importantly…did she still love him? Zuko frowned as new fears surfaced in his mind.

Mai placed her thin arm around his and leaned her head on his shoulder. Zuko suppressed the urge to jump at the contact. He had forgotten Mai was walking next to him and he looked away guiltily.

“Zuko, I’m glad you finally know where Princess Ursa is and I hope you find her soon,” Mai said in her usual monotone voice, but with a thin smile on her face.

Zuko nodded, but he was confused to realize that her words of comfort did not affect him as Katara’s words did.

“And I have to thank Katara for that,” he said and smiled, looking straight ahead of him.

He felt Mai tighten her grip on his arm. He could not help but compare Mai’s bony, thin hands to Katara’s soft and comforting ones. He heard Mai scoff.

“Well, who wouldn’t divulge anything if all of the sudden some strange, crazy woman controls their body and is ready to kill them?” she almost hissed.
Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“Katara used her bloodbending to help me and she is not the kind of person who kills to get her way!” he snapped.

Mai fell silent again. She knew very well what he meant. The young noblewoman had killed while she was at Azula’s side. The reason she was not in prison at the moment was because of Zuko. Mai moved away from him and schooled her face into its usual expressionless look.

“Yeah, I guess she has a good heart and a pure soul unlike the rest of us,” she said flatly, but it was hard to miss the hint of bitterness and sarcasm in her words.

Zuko sighed guiltily and rubbed the bridge of his nose. He did not mean to snap at her, but every time somebody criticized or hurt Katara, he felt the need to defend her. And what confused him the most was that he did not understand why he felt compelled to do that. It was the same when he had protected Katara from the falling rocks with his own body when they were attacked in the Western Air Temple and when Azula shot lightning at her in the Agni Kai. He just had an…urge to keep her safe.

“I didn’t mean to yell at you. It’s just that it bothers me when you talk about Katara that way. She’s my friend and she has done nothing to earn your dislike,” he told her firmly.

Mai snorted and crossed her arms over her slightly flat chest.

“Oh, I have a reason,” she muttered.

“What was that?” Zuko asked with a frown.

“Nothing.”

They passed the waterbender’s door and Zuko glanced at it briefly before moving away. Mai noticed the almost imperceptible motion and narrowed her eyes. They finally arrived at her room in silence and Mai opened her door.
“Well, good night, Mai.” Zuko gave her a small smile as he stepped away, but Mai grabbed his arm before he could advance. He turned around and raised his eyebrow.

Mai stepped closer to him and stroked his chest with one thin hand.

“Well, good night, Mai.” Zuko gave her a small smile as he stepped away, but Mai grabbed his arm before he could advance. He turned around and raised his eyebrow.

“Why don’t you come in? It’s been so long since we have…spent some time together,” she whispered.

She placed her long, slender arms around his neck, leaned her face close to his, and kissed him. She was as tall as he was so she did not need to reach for him nor did he need to pull her to him. She pressed her thin lips against his, trying to elicit a response from him.

Without breaking away, Mai backed into her room, pulling him with her. She closed the door as soon as both were inside and began to untie his shirt, but Zuko broke the kiss and gently removed her arm from his neck. Mai looked at him and frowned.

“I’m sorry, Mai, but I’ve had a rather stressing day, especially after having to deal with my father. I’m very tired,” he said placatingly as he moved away from her.

The dark-haired woman grabbed his arm again before he could turn away.

“Zuko, what’s going on?” she asked, her voice a bit higher than usual. “We haven’t had sex for a very long time! Surely you must want it,” she hissed before she again kissed him.

Zuko slowly returned the kiss. It was true, he was like any other hot-blooded male, and he had not released his tension for a long time, almost a year to be exact. But it was not Mai he wanted but a certain water tribe maiden…

He felt himself flush at the thought and quickly pulled away.

“Not now, Mai. I’m sorry—”
“Is there someone else, Zuko?” she asked, her low tone angry, as her thin fingers tightened their grip on his arm.

Zuko’s eyes widened slightly.

“No…” he replied smoothly.

You’re lying, a voice inside his head that sounded so much like Toph said in a sing song tone.

“Then why are you refusing me? Answer me! Do you have some whore that’s making you happy somewhere around here?” the noblewoman asked bitterly, her grip tightening painfully causing Zuko to wince.

“Of course not!” Zuko growled as he roughly ripped his arm away from her grasp. “You know I’m not that kind of man! I thought you knew me better!”

And Katara is no whore! he mentally added as he soothed the skin on his arm. His eyes widened when the thought came to his mind.

Mai looked away, her cold expression turning sad.

“Then that means you’re tired of me? You don’t want to be with me? You don’t love me anymore?” she asked dejectedly as her arms fell to her sides.

Zuko felt disgusted with himself, guilty, and confused.

“No…don’t say that,” he said quietly. “I do…care for you. It’s just that I’ve been…distracted lately.” He touched her hand.

“Prove it,” she replied as she raised her head to look him in the eye.

Zuko furrowed his forehead.
“Prove that you still care for me by staying with me tonight,” Mai clarified, her black eyes hard.

Zuko opened his mouth to decline but the angry and despondent look in Mai’s eyes made him pause. He sighed and closed his eyes. If that would make her happy…

“Allright,” he replied with resignation. He grasped her arms, and before he could think more about it, he kissed her.

Mai smiled inwardly in triumph as she moved her arms from his grasp and wound them around his neck.

Zuko moved them to her bed, untying the sash around her thin waist with one hand as he did. He continued to kiss her as he guided her onto her back. And just as he expected, Mai remained still while she stroked his neck with one thin hand and allowed him to continue kissing her. He waited for that spark to go through his body like he had heard so many of his crewmembers boast about, but when it did not appear, he shoved the thought aside.

Finally opening her tunic, Zuko pulled away from the kiss to take a breath and he opened his eyes. He froze. Instead of the small, black eyes he was expecting, he saw big, blue ones staring at him. Instead of thin lips, it was pink plump ones. Instead of pale skin against his, it was brown skin touching him.

Zuko jumped away from the bed as if he had been scalded, and with his back toward the bed, he closed his eyes again. His breath was shallow and his heart was beating wildly in his chest, much faster than it had been a few minutes ago.

_Oh, Agni!_ What just happened? Was he still in Katara’s room? Did he just force himself on her? He cringed when he heard somebody move behind him.

“Zuko, what’s wrong?” Mai’s confused voice reached his ears.

Slowly turning around, Zuko opened his eyes and released a long breath of relief. He was in Mai’s dark room and Mai was the one he was looking at.
“Zuko, come back to bed,” Mai called out huskily as she stood before him with her top bare.

Zuko looked away and felt even more disgusted with himself, guiltier, and even more confused.

“I’m sorry, Mai. I can’t. I need to rest since I have an important meeting tomorrow morning concerning my mother. Good night,” he said quickly as he strode toward the door.

Without waiting for a reply, he opened the door and closed it behind him without looking back.

Zuko quickly made his way to his bedchamber, nodded to the guards posted outside his doors, and passed his anteroom. Opening and closing his bedchamber door, Zuko removed his boots and his fire crown. He walked over to his bathroom and filled the basin with water. He stared at his reflection on the clear liquid before he submerged his entire head into the cold water.

A few moments later, Zuko brought his head up, gasping for air. His wet hair plastered on his forehead and soaked his tunic. He slapped himself and then ran his hand down his face.

“What just happened? How could I have thought of Katara when Mai and I were about to...?” Zuko groaned in frustration and pulled on his hair. “What the hell is wrong with me? How could I be so disrespectful to Mai? And to Katara who has only helped me in so many things? How can I be having such indecent thoughts about her?”

He left his private bath and returned to his grand room. The fireplace gave out a cheerful glow, but he ignored it. He removed his clothes and put on his dark sleeping pants. Looking at his cushion and candles, he debated whether to meditate, but decided against it, knowing he would not be able to concentrate at all.

The young man moved toward his large, red bed and settled on it with a tired sigh. Tomorrow he would speak to his advisors and then leave to search for his mother.

Extinguishing the candles that illuminated his room with a flick of his wrist, Zuko turned on his side and closed his eyes. He replayed what just happened in Mai’s room, what he saw.

As he thought about it, he knew what he had felt was lust. Any man would feel the same since Katara was a beautiful woman, after all. He remembered the looks the men gave her when they were at Ember Island. That thought angered him. He frowned.
Yes, it was lust, but it wasn’t just that…There was something else…Something he did not know and did not understand.

He brought his hand to the scar on his abdomen and touched it lightly. Maybe the reason Katara appeared in his head was because he was extremely grateful for her help. Perhaps it was because it had been so long since he had been with a woman. Maybe it was because Katara had been so kind and understanding to him, something no other woman had been before. Or maybe it was because he was falling for her…

Zuko frowned and shook his head. Nonsense, he couldn’t fall for Katara. She was his friend, perhaps the best friend he had ever had in all his life. And he did not want to ruin that friendship.

Zuko rolled over onto his other side and closed his eyes. He willed his mind to be blank and he called for sleep to claim him in order to escape his confusing thoughts.

Zuko woke up abruptly with a sharp gasp. He was sweating and breathing in loud ragged breaths. Trying to calm his racing heart, Zuko glanced over at his balcony where the rays of the early sun were peeking around the edges of the curtains. He looked around and noticed his bed looked like it went through a fight. The bed sheets were in disarray and his bedcover was on the floor. Zuko frowned in confusion. Did he have a nightmare? Then his dream came back to him and he flushed…

He was kissing someone, a woman, but he could not see who it was since it was so dark. He did not care, though, for he was enjoying it immensely. The kiss grew more passionate and it consumed him. With a low growl, he ripped the woman’s shirt off and began to kiss her neck hungrily. He could feel her hands running down his back, causing him to let out another lustful growl. He was becoming more and more aroused by the minute. He wanted her badly. He needed to see her, needed to see her body. Pulling away, he raised one hand and lit a small flame. He gasped at the smiling face of the waterbender, of Katara…

That was when he woke up.

Shaking his head, Zuko got out of his bed and quickly made his way to his bathroom and filled the bathtub with water. Not bothering to heat it once it was full, he jumped into the cold water and submerged his heated body under it. He remained underwater until his lungs screamed for air.

He surfaced and coughed violently, taking large gulps of air for his burning lungs. He leaned his head against the edge of the marble tub and closed his eyes.
Something was seriously wrong with him. He had not had such dreams since his first years of adolescence and they were never that…arousing. Zuko groaned. It had felt so real, so good…

“Stop it!” Zuko growled at his treacherous thoughts and body.

What would Sokka do if he knew about the thoughts that he had been having about his little sister? The overprotective brother would probably castrate him and then chop his head off. And Aang? Zuko cringed. What would his young friend say?

And Katara...? Zuko swallowed.

Would she be disgusted and hate him for the rest of her life? Zuko winced as his heart clenched painfully. He would not be able to bear her hatred, especially not now that they were such good friends.

He shook his head. Maybe he was exaggerating a bit.

He ignored the cold water surrounding him as he closed his eyes. He was leaving that same day for the Earth Kingdom to look for his mother and the gang was leaving in two days. Again, Zuko felt saddened at the thought of them leaving, but perhaps it was for the best. Once they separated, everything would return to normal.

Katara woke up feeling strangely cold. She burrowed herself deeper into the blankets, but they did not provide the warmth she wanted. Opening her eyes, the waterbender looked around her room and then at her window. She guessed it was a few hours after dawn and so she had plenty of time before she needed to head to the dining room for breakfast. She turned over to her side and groaned. She had a terrible headache.

The events that occurred the night before came to her—Ozai’s taunting and scornful face, Zuko’s anger and hurt, and using her bloodbending, which almost caused her to collapse. She remembered the insinuations Ozai said about Zuko and her, and she blushed. Then she remembered Zuko helping her to the carriage and when they made their way to the palace, she fell asleep. The next thing she remembered was hearing Zuko’s voice telling her to wake up. Groggy and dizzy, she had stumbled out of the carriage, but how did she end up in her room?

Katara felt herself flush. Zuko had carried her in his arms, in his strong, warm arms. And he carried her so gently. Is that why she felt so cold now? When she was in his arms, she had felt so warm and protected, and so she found it easy to fall asleep. But what happened next?

Her eyes widened and she slowly lifted her blanket. She was wearing the blue clothes from the previous day and they were intact. She blushed deeply and berated herself for thinking otherwise. Zuko was not that kind of man, he was too honorable for that.

She sighed. She couldn’t lie to herself. She liked having Zuko’s warm body pressed against hers, but for the reason why she rather not acknowledge to herself. Aang had hugged her many times even if he had never carried her, but she had never felt so…good.

Katara touched her lips gently. They felt strange, but in a good way. They were tingling just like when Zuko had touched them at the garden. Did that mean that...? A knock outside her door made her jump. She blushed furiously and shook her head.

“Um…come in,” she called out. She combed her hair with her fingers and smoothed her clothes.

The door opened and Jiao entered, carrying a silver tray in her hands. Katara’s face fell in disappointment.

Well, why did I even expect him to come? She frowned at herself.

“Good morning, Lady Katara,” Jiao greeted warmly and smiled as she made her way closer to the bed.

Katara smiled back.

“Good morning, Jiao. What are you carrying?” she asked as she curiously eyed the tray.

“Your breakfast,” Jiao replied and laid the silver tray on Katara’s lap.

Katara raised her eyebrow.
“My breakfast?” she repeated as she stared down at the tray.

“Yes. General Iroh asked me to bring you your breakfast to your room. He told me Fire Lord Zuko said that you needed to rest since you had a tiring day yesterday,” Jiao explained. She smiled and removed the top that covered the plate.

Katara’s heart skipped a beat.

“Fire Lord Zuko said that?” she asked softly.

She felt happy that he cared for her health. Usually she was the one that looked after everybody else. She looked down at the exquisite food and her mouth watered. She inhaled the appetizing aroma and her stomach growled loudly.

“Excuse me,” she muttered and blushed.

Jiao giggled. “I’m also here to help bathe you, help you get ready for the day, and—”

“What?!” Katara choked on her fruit juice. “You don’t have to! I can bathe and do everything else myself.”

Jiao raised her eyebrow and placed her hands on her hips.

“Are you sure?” she asked uncertainly.

“Of course,” Katara replied and raised her head, but she cringed when her head throbbed even worse. “Okay, maybe some help is fine,” she mumbled.

Jiao nodded and smiled. She began to tidy up the room while Katara ate in silence. The servant moved to the closet to look for clothes for the young woman.

“Would you like me to help you pack your things?” Jiao asked as she turned back to look at the waterbender.
Katara wiped her mouth and frowned. “What for?”

“Well, are you not returning to the Southern Water Tribe in two days?” Jiao asked as she looked down.

Katara closed her eyes and leaned her head back against the wall.

“That’s right. I forgot,” she said. Sadness filled her heart.

Jiao regarded the silent young woman as she continued to pull out clothes.

“I also heard Fire Lord Zuko would be leaving today.”

Katara sat up quickly and almost knocked over the tray on her lap. She set it aside on her bed.

“He’s leaving? Where to?” she asked curiously.

“I do not know, Lady Katara,” the young servant replied as she pulled out an outfit from the closet.

His mother. He’s probably leaving to look for Princess Ursa, Katara thought.

She had made a promise that she would help him be happy and she was going to achieve it by helping him search for his mother. The waterbender shoved the blankets away from her and got out of the bed quickly, but she had to sit back down when she almost fell forward when a wave of dizziness hit her.

Stupid headache! Stupid bloodbending! Stupid Ozai! Katara cursed in her head. Once the room stopped spinning, she stood up.

“Lady Katara, what are you doing? You’re supposed to be resting!” Jiao rushed to her side.
Katara waved her away.

“I need to speak to Zuko. Where is he?” Katara asked, forgetting to add an honorific to his name as she made her way to the bathroom.

“Let me help you, Lady Katara,” Jiao said as she rushed to fill the tub with water and light the wood pieces. “Fire Lord Zuko is in his royal bedchamber preparing for an urgent meeting with his advisors.”

Katara nodded and after convincing Jiao that she could take a bath alone without drowning herself, she washed her body and her hair quickly. Jiao helped her get dressed and then she brushed and braided her hair. Katara had to admit it felt nice to be pampered once in a while.

Exiting the room, Katara and Jiao walked down the hall and made a right turn into the next more elaborate corridor. As they drew near the golden doors, Katara began to get nervous. The feeling of being in Zuko’s arms was still fresh in her mind.

They approached Zuko’s two personal guards and Katara swallowed uneasily.

Maybe they won’t let me go in. What was I thinking coming into the Fire Lord’s bedchamber so early in the morning? She resisted the urge to turn around and run back to her room.

The guards looked at the two women in surprise. They glanced at each other before the older of the two addressed Katara.

“Good morning, Lady Katara. Is there something you need?” he asked as he inclined his head, his dark, gray eyes curious.

Katara blushed.

“I…well…” she stammered. She turned to Jiao with wide eyes.
“Lady Katara needs to speak to Fire Lord Zuko urgently,” the woman replied.

Katara nodded. She watched as the younger guard stared intensely at Jiao while the older one raised an eyebrow.

“But I guess I could talk to him later,” Katara spoke up, “I don’t want to bother him—”

“Do not worry, Lady Katara,” the other younger guard interrupted with an amiable smile as he looked away from the servant. “Fire Lord Zuko always wakes up early to meditate. And you being his friend, we’re sure he won’t mind you entering.”

Both guards gave her small yet kindly smiles.

Katara realized the two guards were the same ones that were with Zuko when they walked around Ember Island and the capital city, and the same ones who followed them into the prison tower. She smiled back.

“Thank you,” she said.

They nodded and opened one of the doors for them.

Jiao took Katara’s arm and led her into the antechamber.

“Please wait here, Lady Katara. Let me announce you to the Fire Lord.”

The servant walked across the room and knocked on the other set of golden doors. Katara heard Zuko’s muffled reply before Jiao opened the door and closed it behind her.

Taking a deep breath, Katara sat at the table and waited for Zuko to come out.

After he had controlled his body and his thoughts, Zuko got out of the tub and dried himself off. He went back to his room and opened his mahogany wardrobe. Taking out his black pants, he put them on and searched for a robe. He glanced down at the floor and noticed the tunic he threw to the side.
the previous night.

He moved towards it and picked it up, holding it with both hands in front of him. It was the same tunic that had been pressed against Katara, the same one she had been clutching to as he carried her to her room. He rubbed his thumbs on it and wondered if it held her scent.

A knock at his door made him jump and he dropped the tunic. He narrowed his eyes in irritation. Who the hell was disturbing him this early in the morning?

“Come in,” he called curtly. He turned away from the door and picked up his robe and boots.

“Good morning, my lord,” Jiao greeted respectfully and bowed. “Please forgive my interruption.”

Zuko sighed.

“What is it, Jiao? Did you take Lady Katara her breakfast?”

“Yes, my lord, but she would like to speak to you.” Jiao smiled. “She is waiting in your antechamber.”

Zuko choked and then cleared his throat.

“She what?” he croaked.

Oh, crap! He was not ready to face her after that dream! Was she awake last night? Did she know what he was doing? Was she going to kill him? He paused and frowned at himself for his thoughts.

“Lord Zuko? Are you feeling well?” Jiao asked worriedly since his face was turning bright red.

“Er…yes, I’m fine. I’ll be ready in a minute. Fix my bed and…and tidy up the room a bit and then let Lady Katara in,” Zuko ordered.
Ignoring his servant’s bewildered look, he grabbed his clothes and bolted to his bathroom to finish getting ready.

Sitting in the silent antechamber, Katara played with her long braid nervously as minutes passed by with no sign of Zuko. What was taking so long? Did Zuko not want to speak to her? Maybe he was still asleep.

She finally decided to get up to leave when the door opened and Jiao came out.

“His majesty will be out in a second. He said that you should wait for him inside.” Jiao motioned for the bedchamber.

“I-inside?” Katara stuttered. “I thought nobody was allowed to enter his room.”

Jiao blinked before she shrugged lightly.

“Not without Fire Lord Zuko’s permission, but he seems not to mind if you enter,” she said. She noticed the waterbender’s hesitation and smiled.

“Do not worry, Lady Katara. He won’t bite.” She giggled softly.

Katara blushed as another image of Zuko nibbling her ear surfaced in her mind.

“I’m not worried,” the waterbender argued with a huff as she stood up.

Katara entered the opulent room and again looked around with admiration. It looked the same as the last time she accidently entered Zuko’s room. She looked over at the long, thick curtains and wondered what view lay beyond the balcony.

She heard another door open and she whirled around excitedly, half expecting Zuko to be wrapped in only a red towel again with his wet hair and muscular, bare upper body. But he emerged fully clothed and Katara had to hold back a cry of disappointment.
She blushed. What am I thinking?

“Good morning, Katara,” Zuko greeted, but he averted his eyes from hers. “Jiao, please wait in the anteroom.”

Jiao bowed and retreated, closing the door softly behind her.

“You are supposed to be resting,” Zuko told the waterbender. He frowned as he noticed that her skin still looked pale. “Is there something wrong?”

Katara blushed and fidgeted with her fingers.

“No. I just… wanted to thank you for taking the trouble of… carrying me to my room.”

Zuko felt his face flush before he cleared his throat and straightened himself.

“It was no trouble at all. I told you I wasn’t going to let you get hurt.”

Katara smiled brilliantly, causing Zuko’s breath to hitch at the sight.

“I’m so glad to have such a good friend like you, Zuko. I did need Jiao for a bit, thanks for being concerned for my health, by the way.”

Zuko smiled.

“Of course I’m concerned for your health since it seems you are more concerned for the others’ than your own,” he told her almost chidingly.

Katara looked at her hands and smiled. It was as if he was the only one that noticed.

Zuko sighed.
“It was because of me you fell ill in the first place,” he said grimly.

Katara looked up and saw the guilt written on his face.

“Your fault? How is it your fault that I felt dizzy?” she asked him incredulously.

“Because you used your bloodbending to stop my father,” he replied. He frowned again. “And I feel even guiltier because you used your bloodbending at all. I know how much you dislike to bloodbend, Katara, that you swore never to use it again. And because of me, you had to do what you hate the most. Please forgive me.”

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara sighed with a smile. “Don’t you go blaming yourself. It’s not like you ordered me to bloodbend, I made the choice. Yes, it’s true, I hate using bloodbending because it robs people of their free will. It’s too much power for me to handle over a person. But I don’t regret using it on Ozai. He deserved it for everything he did and for the hurtful things he was saying about you. It just made me so…furious!”

Zuko finally met her gaze and smiled.

“I did hurt a bit, but thanks to what you told me that night in the garden, it didn’t hurt as much as it used to. But I’m grateful and glad that you care enough for my…” Zuko cleared his throat, “uh…feelings since nobody but Uncle seems to care.”

Katara wondered why he did not mention Mai.

“And I am especially grateful that because of you I finally know where my mother is,” he continued as he smiled warmly at her. He reached for her hand, but he pulled it back.

Katara returned the smile, mesmerized by the warmth he was allowing her to see in his eyes.

“I’m sure you would have done the same if our roles were reversed, well, maybe except for the bloodbending part,” she said with a laugh.
Zuko chuckled. “Yeah.”

That and much more, he added mentally.

“I heard that you’re leaving today. Are you going to look for Lady Ursa?” Katara asked.

“Yes, the sooner the better,” Zuko said with a nod.

He turned away and moved to the fireplace.

“Have you…started packing yet?” he asked casually. He clenched his eyes shut against the sadness that assaulted him.

“No, not yet, but I guess I have to start packing immediately…” she began with a mischievous smile, “if I’m leaving with you today.”

Zuko whirled around to face her and he noticed the twinkle in her blue eyes. For a moment he got lost in those cobalt orbs of hers before he yelled, “What?”

Katara sighed.

“I said I’m going with you to help search for Lady Ursa. Are you deaf or something?”

Zuko scowled.

“I heard what you said. But you can’t go,” he said firmly.

This was not supposed to happen! They were supposed to part ways so he could stop thinking about her!

“And why not?” Katara retorted as she crossed her arms and narrowed her eyes.
“Because…you have to return to your waterbending students,” Zuko quickly said. He smirked and crossed his own arms.

Katara smirked back.

“I got that covered. I can just ask Gran-Gran to convince Master Pakku, her husband, to continue substituting for me. And he will in order to please her.”

Zuko frowned.

“Hm…What about Sokka? He won’t like the idea of having his little sister running around in the Earth Kingdom.”

Katara rolled her eyes and laughed.

“Well, he’ll have to get it into his big head that I’m not a little girl anymore.”

Definitely not a little girl, Zuko mused with a silent groan. He mentally slapped himself for straying off.

“What about Aang?” he asked slowly.

Katara smiled. “I’m sure he’ll understand.”

“Well, I don’t want you to come with me!” Zuko snapped, harsher than he intended.

Katara’s eyes widened at his outburst and she cast her eyes away, but not before Zuko caught the hurt in her beautiful blue eyes. He felt miserable. He had promised never to let anything hurt her and there he was breaking his own promise.

He sighed.
Thank you, Katara, but I don’t need your help. I can do it alone,” he said more quietly.

Katara looked up and saw Zuko staring into the fire. She was transfixed by the way the light danced upon his handsome features. She frowned. Was he trying to push people away from him again? Was he refusing help from those who cared for him? No, she couldn’t let him retreat into his old, solitary self after he was beginning to open up to her.

“Zuko, please let me help you,” she said softly.

She reached out a hand and gently touched his arm. Zuko suppressed a shiver at the touch.

“It’s the least I could do to repay you for what you have done for me,” she continued quietly.

The young Fire Lord turned to the woman beside him and frowned.

“What do you mean? You have already done enough.”

Katara shook her head.

“No. You helped me find closure with my mother’s murderer. You helped me move on and finally live my life without her. You were the only one who understood me and the only one who did not judge me for the hatred I felt for… that horrible man. You supported me, unlike Aang who tried to impose his teachings on forgiveness on me,” she said with a sigh. “You’re the only one who respected me enough to let me make my own choices.”

Zuko could not help but smile inwardly.

Katara looked up at him with a sad smile.

“I want to help you find your mother, Zuko, because I know I will never find mine,” she explained quietly.
Zuko turned away from her sincere, beautiful face and hesitated. If he were in her place he would want to help her too, but still…His thoughts returned to his dream but he brushed it away. It was just a dream, right? It was not like she would actually let him do those things.

“Please let me help you, Zuko,” Katara whispered again and gripped his arm. Let me help you be happy.

The golden-eyed male returned his gaze toward her and they stared at each other for a moment.

“Thank you, Katara,” he said with a sigh before he turned to face her fully. “Well…if that’s what you want…”

His eyes widened when Katara jumped with a happy squeal and hugged him. He stiffened, more out of shock than discomfort, and resisted the urge to hug her closer to him.

Katara pulled away and blushed, but she looked up to smile at him.

“Great! I should go pack. I’ll ask Jiao to help me,” she said excitedly.

Zuko smiled back. Well, at least he would not be bored in his journey.

“Okay then, we should go. I have to let my advisors know my plans,” Zuko chuckled. “Wei is going to die of happiness because I’m leaving.”

Katara giggled. “Not if Advisor Chao stays behind to keep him in check.”

Jiao smiled when she noticed the pair coming out of the room, laughing. She had never seen the Fire Lord laugh before. Jiao followed them as they exited the Fire Lord’s royal quarters. She looked at the guards who smiled at the young benders without much surprise on their faces. She figured it was not the first time they had seen their young lord laugh around the waterbender.

“Jiao, please pack my travelling things as well as Lady Katara’s,” Zuko addressed the young servant as they continued walking.
“Yes, my lord.” Jiao bowed.

The three stopped short when they heard a shout down the hall.

“Katara! There you are!” Sokka yelled angrily as he marched up to them with an embarrassed-looking Suki and a concerned Avatar following behind him. “I can’t believe you went to the prison tower! What were you thinking going to such a place and in the middle of the night?”

Katara sighed irritably and crossed her arms.

“I went with Zuko and Toph to see Ozai. I have a headache so stop shouting! How did you find out anyway?”

“Mai told us at breakfast,” Suki answered.

Zuko blew steam from his nostrils and Katara narrowed her eyes.

“Why did you let my baby sister go to such a place?” Sokka yelled at Zuko and jabbed his chest with a finger.

Zuko rolled his eyes and sighed. If Sokka reacted this way about such a thing, Zuko was sure the water tribesman would kill him if he knew what he dreamed about doing to his sister.

“Sokka, you idiot!” Suki grabbed him and pulled him away. “It’s not smart to disrespect the Fire Lord in his own home! Besides, I was there when he tried to stop Katara and Toph from going.”

“Sokka, calm down. Toph and I wanted to go, and even if Zuko tried to stop us, we would’ve gone either way!” Katara exclaimed. She pressed her temples with her fingers and groaned. “You’re making my headache worse.”

Zuko reached out to help her, but Aang stepped in and grabbed her arms. Zuko clenched his jaw.
“Are you okay?” the airbender asked worriedly.

“I’m fine, Aang,” Katara sighed.

“Because of Katara I finally know where my mother is,” Zuko explained calmly when it seemed Sokka and Aang were about to ask more questions.

Everybody went silent and stared at Zuko with wide eyes before they started firing question after question at him. He raised a hand up to quiet them down before he explained what happened, skipping the parts of Ozai’s insults on Katara and himself. Aang frowned when he heard that Katara had used her bloodbending, but decided not to argue about it.

“And thanks to Katara’s bloodbending, Ozai had no choice but to comply,” Zuko finished as he gave Katara a small smile.

“That’s my sister for ya,” Sokka said smugly as he beamed and hugged Katara with one arm around her shoulders.

The waterbender rolled her eyes. First, he was screaming angrily all over the palace and now he was praising her.

“I’m leaving today to the Earth Kingdom to look for her,” Zuko announced.

“And I’m going with him,” Katara added. Before they could protest she said, “Zuko helped me with my mother and now I will help him with his. It’s the least I can do.”

She looked up at Zuko and smiled.

Zuko’s heart skipped a beat and he smiled back in gratitude. He just hoped nothing bad happened during their journey. He returned his attention to the others.

“The Abandoned Fort is in the Earth Kingdom continent, but neither under Earth Kingdom or Fire Nation rule. It will take some weeks to get there, so I’m planning on us leaving today,” Zuko continued and turned to look at Katara who nodded at him.
“Hey! Why wasn’t I told there was a secret meeting?” Toph shouted as she stomped toward them, making all of them turn to look at her. “If it’s anything with loud noises and bloody noses I’m in!”

“Oh, Toph! What am I going to do with you?” Katara sighed in exasperation.

Toph just scratched her chin and grinned.

“I was actually filling them in on what happened in the prison tower,” Zuko responded.

Both Katara and he hoped the earthbender did not say more than she should about what really happened at the prison, but instead she grinned as she recounted the weak state Ozai was in. Sokka was also grinning at her description, while Aang frowned in disapproval for their enjoyment.

“Anyway,” Zuko interrupted with an impatient wave of his hand, “We have to prepare for our trip, so if you’ll excuse us—”

“Zuko and Katara are going to look for Princess Ursa,” Suki replied to the unaware earthbender.

“Really?” Toph grinned as she turned in the direction she knew the two benders were. “Well, what the hell are you waiting for? Have fun!”

Zuko frowned while Katara glared at the short earthbender.

“It’s not a vacation, Toph,” Zuko said gruffly.

“Yeah, whatever. Anyways, get going you two.” Toph smiled and waved her hand at them as if she were shooing a pair of puppies.

Aang looked at Toph and then between Katara and Zuko, and a crease appeared on his forehead that caused his tattooed skin to furrow.
“I would like to go as well…and help,” he said and placed his arm around Katara, giving her a cheery smile.

Zuko clenched his hands, resisting the urge to remove the Avatar’s arm from the waterbender. Toph tilted her head in Zuko’s general direction and smirked.

Calm down, Zuko told himself, There is no reason for me to react this way.

“You can’t go!” Toph yelled. All of them turned to stare at her for her outburst.

“Why not?” Aang asked, narrowing his eyes at his former earthbending teacher.

“Because…because…” Toph crossed her arms and looked away. Damn. She couldn’t say she wanted Zuko and Katara to go alone!

“I don’t know, Aang,” Katara began as she frowned when she saw Aang smirk at Toph, “Don’t you have to go back to Omashu?”

Aang turned away from the scowling earthbender to smile at her.

“I’m sure Bumi will understand.”

“Well, then I’m in, too!” Sokka announced. Before Zuko could protest Sokka continued, “I want to help, too. The more people searching the better. Besides, it would be a way to repay you for your hospitality, right, Suki?”

He turned to his girlfriend and smiled. Suki nodded and smiled as well, earning a kiss from the warrior.

Toph snorted in annoyance.
Great. Not only is Aang going, but the whole gang! How’re Sugar Queen and Sparky supposed to get closer with everybody around?

“Well, if the whole bunch of you are going, then count me in,” Toph announced as she crossed her arms over her chest.

Maybe I can figure something out during the trip, she mused.

The others did not notice the mischievous grin plastered on her small face.

Zuko looked at the people around him and gave them all a small smile. He could not help feeling glad and relieved. Glad because his friends wanted to help him and relieved because he would not have to travel alone with the woman that had begun to take over his thoughts.

Katara, on the other hand, pouted and frowned. She could not help feeling disappointed. She wanted it to be just Zuko and her like when they went after her mother’s murderer. Just two people who understood what the other felt about their mothers. But when the excited chatter of the others began, Katara became excited as well. They would be going on an adventure just like they used to four years ago.

Zuko turned to Jiao who was standing silently behind him and Katara.

“Jiao, please make sure everybody’s things are packed and loaded onto the flagship as soon as possible.”

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko,” she obeyed immediately.

She bowed to him and then gave Katara a smile. The young servant left to get everything ready.

“We will travel light. I was expecting only two ostrich horses with supplies for Katara and me,” Zuko informed them as he frowned in thought. “So now I guess we’ll take more ostrich horses and ___”

“Zuko?” Aang interrupted in a cheery voice, “Why not just ride on Appa?”
Zuko smiled. “Just like old times.”

“Just like old times,” they all agreed.

“Why did you plan on travelling alone, Zuko?” Suki asked. “Shouldn’t you be taking a carriage and komodo rhinos with supplies and tents as well as an entourage of servants and guards since you are the Fire Lord?”

Katara turned to Zuko for she was curious, too.

“I can’t take a group of soldiers into the Earth Kingdom. It will give the people the wrong impression and I do not wish for the peace and trust we have gained to be lost. Since there are still some who mistrust the Fire Nation and…me it is best that they don’t know the Fire Lord is passing by so trouble can be avoided,” Zuko explained emotionlessly, but Katara could see the discontent in his eyes.

The others nodded and then made their way to their rooms to make sure they packed what they needed. Zuko watched as Katara gave him one last smile as she disappeared down the hall before he continued on his way to the throne room.

Sitting behind the wall of fire, Zuko spoke to his advisors about his discovery about his mother’s whereabouts and about his plan on leaving that same day with the gang, though he made sure not to tell them where exactly he was going. He still mistrusted some of them.

“Advisor Chao, I will leave the Fire Nation into your temporary charge while I’m away,” Zuko addressed the old advisor. “Advisors Enlai and Jian will assist you as well.”

Chao bowed and promised to do his best. The other two advisors nodded their understanding. Zuko inwardly smirked as Wei turned to glare at them.

“I will take all the documents that need my signature with me to the flagship. I will inform Admiral Jee to bring them back as soon as he leaves us in the colony port,” Zuko continued.

“Fire Lord Zuko, if I may be so bold as to ask you a question?” Chao spoke up.
Zuko looked at his most trusted advisor and nodded his consent.

“How is it that Ozai finally decided to reveal where Lady Ursa is?” Chao asked curiously.

Zuko looked around the meeting room as the other advisors mumbled amongst themselves the same question. He saw no reason why he should not tell them part of the truth. He wanted them to see how incredible Katara was.

“Lady Katara of the Southern Water Tribe used a special technique that made even Ozai cry out in fear. This technique is so powerful and dangerous that only a few waterbenders know how to use it,” Zuko began in a low voice.

He paused and looked around the room, smirking inwardly as some of the men leaned forward to hear what he was going to say next.

“Bloodbending,” he said.

“Bloodbending?” the men murmured among themselves. They had heard of such a thing, of how people lose their will over their bodies and are controlled like puppets.

“But I thought bloodbending could only happen during a night of a full moon,” Wei spoke up with a sneer. “And there was no full moon last night.”

Zuko let a smirk appear on his face as he responded.

“Yes, but Lady Katara is a powerful waterbending master and she was able to bloodbend without the full moon,” he said proudly.

“Is that why Lady Katara was feeling ill this morning?” Chao asked with concern.

Zuko’s smirk fell from his face and was replaced by guilt.
“Lady Katara is a great waterbender, but she loathes bloodbending, so she has not had much practice with such a dangerous technique. But she used it, nevertheless, in order to help me. And I will always be grateful to her for that.”

The Court Council members could not help but feel fear as well as admiration for the Water Tribe woman.

“I really do hope she feels better,” Chao expressed. The other men nodded in agreement, except for Wei, who could care less.

Zuko graced them with a small smile.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After exiting the meeting room, the young Fire Lord left the palace and rode on his komodo rhino toward the docks where the others were waiting for him on his flagship. Only a small crowd who knew he was leaving gathered to see him off. Zuko dismounted and walked up the ramp to the metal deck of the ship. He stopped mid-step upon reaching the deck when he noticed Mai and Ty Lee waiting with the others.

“Mai, you’re coming, too?” he asked in surprised before he forced a smile on his face. After what happened the night before, the silent noblewoman had been ignoring him.

“Ty Lee and I are going to Ba Sing Se with Iroh,” Mai replied flatly, looking at him with dispassionate eyes.

Zuko looked at Iroh who gave him a shrug. Zuko frowned. Since Mai was his girlfriend, shouldn’t she be willing to help him with something so important to him?

Zuko noticed Katara walk to his side with a bright smile. Well, at least someone wants to help me, he thought.

And he could not have picked anyone better.

“Yeah!” Ty Lee exclaimed excitedly as she hopped in her place beside Mai. “We haven’t been to Ba Sing Se for years!”
“Yeah, ‘cause last time they overthrew the king and took over,” Sokka mumbled under his breath. Suki elbowed his side and Toph snickered.

The energetic acrobat continued rambling on.

“Haru, are you going with us to Ba Sing Se?” The acrobat batted her eyelashes at the shy, young man.

Haru flushed.

“Um…I’m actually going to the first Fire Nation colony to start teaching,” he answered. When he saw her smile fade he quickly added, “But I really wish I was able to go. Maybe…some other time?” He rubbed the back of his neck nervously.

Ty Lee smiled and rested her head on his shoulder, causing him to blush even redder. The other men grinned while the girls—except Mai, of course—giggled.

Iroh chuckled.

_Ah, to be young again_, he thought and sighed wistfully before turning to his nephew.

“Remember to come to Ba Sing Se after you find Lady Ursa,” the old man reminded him. “You should visit the Earth King again in order to further strengthen the ties between the nations.”

Zuko nodded.

Iroh then turned to the others.

“It’s been a while since we’ve all been together at the Jasmine Dragon, has it not?” He smiled. The others agreed excitedly.

Admiral Jee appeared a few minutes later and bowed to Zuko.
“We are ready to depart, my lord,” he announced with a smile.

Zuko nodded.

“Make sure to find the best and fastest route, Admiral,” he commanded.

“Yes, sir,” Jee answered, and with another bow, he left to follow his orders.

“So…” Sokka began as he grinned and rubbed his hands, “Can we eat now?”

The others rolled their eyes, but Zuko did not pay them attention as he looked toward the horizon. Soon he would finally find his mother.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Almost two weeks had passed on the ship, during which Zuko spent most of his time in his large cabin finishing all the paperwork he ordered to be given to him before he left the Fire Nation. He wanted to make sure everything was well in his absence so he would not have to worry about his responsibilities during his search for his mother. However, that was not the only reason he had shut himself in his cabin all day except for meals.

No, the main reason was a certain blue-eyed waterbender. The first few days onboard the ship, he had experienced two more dreams regarding the lovely water tribe maiden. The first was sweet and innocent where both he and Katara sat under the cherry blossom tree in the garden gazing out into the pond. The second dream was so erotic that he was left breathless and painfully aroused. Now every time he would lay his eyes on Katara he would feel his blood heat up as the memories of those oh so inappropriate dreams resurfaced.

However, as the days passed he found out that his plan backfired. Not only could he not stop thinking of her, but he also found himself feeling lonely and depressed. Sure, the others were there, and Sokka and he spent time talking about war strategies, technological advances and other things. Iroh kept him company until he would go play Pai Sho with the crewmembers. However, Katara was the only one he could actually talk to. The only one he could really speak to about his problems without hesitation and the only one who seemed to understand him.

Zuko signed and sealed another document at his desk. Why was life so complicated? It was like the spirits wanted his life to be miserable. And to top it all off, Mai had been avoiding him. The only reason he found himself affected at all by it was because he knew it was due to his behavior the night before they sailed away.

He felt guilty, not only because he was fantasizing about Katara, his friend, but because he felt drawn like a moth to a flame by another woman that was not Mai, his girlfriend of four years. But what could he say, really? He could not confess the real reason why he acted and left the way he did to Mai. It would be like asking to be stabbed by a poisonous dagger in the gut. Yes, the spirits seemed to hate him.

A knock outside the steel door brought him out of his depressing thoughts.

“Come in,” he called out absentmindedly as he returned to his papers.

Iroh opened the door and entered the large cabin carrying a tray with two cups of tea and a jolly smile on his face.

“Nephew, I brought you some tea to help you keep awake. It’s ginseng!” he cried out joyfully.

Zuko did not bother to look up as he gave a small nod.

“Thank you, Uncle. Just set it on the table,” he said dismissively.

Iroh frowned as his dear nephew did not even glance his way. Really, what was wrong with the young people these days? The retired general placed the steaming cup on the table as told and sat himself on a chair to drink from his own. After a few minutes of silence—of being completely ignored—Iroh gave out a dramatic sigh.

“My, I’m really getting too old to be travelling so much.”

“Mm,” Zuko gave as an answer and signed another paper.

“The weather is really holding up and it’s such a beautiful day.” Iroh tried again.

“Hm.”
Iroh rolled his eyes and sipped from his hot tea. What could he say to get a young man’s attention? Iroh grinned and inhaled the tea’s sweet aroma.

“I heard that you told the Court Council members about Katara’s amazing ability,” he commented casually.

“Yes, I wanted them to see that Katara is a powerful waterbender who has helped me a lot and deserves to be respected and admired,” Zuko responded.

Oh, now he talks. Interesting... Iroh mused.

“Zuko, we barely see you up on deck, and when you do show up for meals, you scurry down to your cabin as soon as it’s over. Why is that?”

“I do not scurry. I just have so many documents I must finish reviewing before the journey across the Earth Kingdom begins,” Zuko answered without removing his eyes from the paper he was currently reading.

“Hmm?” Iroh stroked his chin. “You know, Miss Katara is getting worried and she asked me if you were okay.” He smiled when Zuko looked up.

“She did?” Zuko asked, trying not to sound surprised and pleased. “Well, there’s nothing to worry about,” he continued gruffly. He cleared his throat and resumed his previous less interesting task. “I’m fine.”

Iroh sighed and shook his head.

“Now, if you’d excuse me, Uncle, I must finish these last documents.”

“You know, Nephew, it’s great that you are taking your responsibility and your duty to your people and your nation seriously. But remember this, sometimes we must think of our own happiness in order to make those around us happy,” Iroh said solemnly before a smile adorned his wrinkled face once again. “When am I going to see you married with little Zukos running around causing trouble? Others are already getting ahead of you, you know!” He chuckled.
Zuko looked up and furrowed his forehead at the statement, but before he could ask his uncle what he meant, Iroh changed the subject.

“I’m going up to make the helmsman pay up for our last Pai Sho game. Seriously, you would think by now that they would know they can’t beat a Master of Pai Sho!” The old man chuckled as he left the room.

Zuko stared at the door after the old man disappeared and he pondered his uncle’s words. He had just looked back at the scroll in his hand when another knock sounded on the other side of the door.

“Come in,” he called again as he continued to write.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” Jee greeted as he entered and bowed. “We will be arriving at the colony port in a few more days if the weather keeps holding up as it has until now.”

Zuko straightened in his chair and nodded.

“I’m glad. Excellent job, Admiral Jee.”

Jee straightened himself proudly before he bowed.

“Thank you, my lord.”

“Tell me,” Zuko continued, “has there been any news about the raiders?”

Jee cleared his throat and slightly shifted in place before he straightened himself again.

“Well, they have been driven off by the newly guarded colonies. Your plan about having the firebending and earthbending villagers working together succeeded. But…the colonies that are mostly made up of earthbending residents have suffered greatly.”
Zuko clenched his hands and sighed heavily.

“I will have Haru sent to these colonies first. Also, I want you to take food, medical supplies and other necessities to the colonies that have come under attack as soon as possible. I will send a letter to the Court Council to have everything ready. Thank you, Admiral. You may leave.”

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Jee said and bowed again before turning to leave. The older man looked over his shoulder and noticed the dejected look in his lord’s eyes.

“Fire Lord Zuko, if I may say something?” he began carefully.

At Zuko’s nod, Jee smiled warmly.

“I am honored to serve such a generous and just ruler. You have done so much for the betterment of our great Fire Nation. The people have never been happier.”

Zuko felt his spirits lift and he smiled.

“Thank you, Admiral Jee.”

The admiral bowed once more and opened the door to find Sokka, Aang, and Haru. Jee smiled at them as he passed and left the room.

“Hey, Zuko, we’ve come to get you,” Sokka announced and grinned as he strode into the room.

“What for?” Zuko frowned as he put down his ink brush.

“You’ve been stuffed in here all day!” Sokka exclaimed and gestured around the semi-dark room to make a point.

“Yeah, Zuko! You need some fresh air!” Aang agreed with a cheery smile.
Zuko suppressed the urge to sigh. He knew they would not give up until they dragged him outside.

“Fine,” he relented. He was getting a headache anyway.

The four young men exited the room and walked up to the deck of the large flagship. Aang and Haru excitedly compared earthbending techniques on the way while the Fire Lord and the blue-eyed warrior walked silently behind them.

“So, Sokka,” Zuko began casually as he eyed the Water Tribe warrior beside him, “When are you proposing to Suki? I hope this journey is not the cause for the delay.” He frowned.

“Nah, don’t worry,” Sokka reassured him as he waved his dark hand dismissively. “I just haven’t come up with a good proposal yet, and I need to finish some stuff, and I need to—”

“Oh, okay, I get it,” Zuko interrupted. “But thanks by the way…for helping me.”

Sokka laughed heartily and patted his Fire Nation friend’s back.

“It’s what friends do! You helped me rescue my dad and Suki from the Boiling Rock, so I will help you look for your mother…even if I have no clue how…”

Zuko smirked as they emerged onto the deck, the sun slowly sinking on the horizon. The firebender breathed in the salty air and felt his headache lessen.

“Yeah, Zuko,” Aang piped in as he heard what Sokka said, “we’re friends and help each other out. I would’ve liked to have had help finding the people I love, too.”

Zuko cringed. He knew Aang was talking about the Air Nomads, his people, the airbenders that were wiped out by the Fire Nation.

Aang noticed Zuko’s reaction and smiled good-naturedly.

“Don’t worry, Zuko. I don’t blame you for what happened to my people. That’s in the past.”
Zuko nodded, but he still felt guilty nonetheless, and it was not only because of Aang’s people…

“Hey, Sokka. Help me feed Appa,” Aang called after a while. “He’s probably impatient right now.”

“Fine,” Sokka grumbled, though he loved the big fur ball. “But you have to give me your dessert at dinner,” the warrior compromised as the two walked away.

Zuko stared out into the ocean for a while and remembered what Jee had told him.

“Haru?” he called after the silent young man beside him.

“Yes?” the young earthbender turned toward him.

“Thank you again for aiding me with the colonies. As soon as we arrive at the port, you will be escorted to the first colony. I will give you a pass with my seal that you must present to the governor. There have been some problems, but hopefully everything can be settled. You will be provided with a room in the governor’s home in every colony you stay at as well as all the food and necessities you need. After you finish teaching, the governor will pay you for your services and send an escort with you to the next colony.”

Haru nodded and smiled. “I’m just glad to help.”

They talked about a few more details before pausing when they noticed Katara and Suki walk across the deck with an irritated Toph trailing behind them. Zuko’s stomach flipped as he watched the way Katara’s blue eyes sparkled when she laughed.

“Katara’s a great woman, huh?” Haru said after a while.

Zuko started and ripped his eyes away from the lovely waterbender.

“Uh…yes, she is,” he replied softly.
He turned to Haru and noticed that the young man was blushing. Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“You know,” Haru began, playing with his thin mustache, “I use to have a crush on Katara.”

Zuko found himself glaring at the oblivious young earthbender.

“But I let it go when I realized that she only saw me as a friend,” Haru continued and sighed.

Zuko sighed as well and looked back towards the darkening ocean.

“What made you feel for Katara that way?” he asked, trying to sound disinterested.

Haru smiled as he, too, looked over at the sea.

“Well, she visited my village with Aang and Sokka during the war. She found out that the Fire Nation soldiers were controlling my village and had prohibited us from earthbending. Those that were earthbenders were removed from their families and homes, and were thrown in prison where they couldn’t bend. My father was one of them.”

Zuko cringed again. Maybe having people come along with him on this journey was not such a great idea.

Haru smiled at the uncomfortable look on Zuko’s face.

“Just like Aang, I don’t blame you. You have done much to help us all. That was a long time ago and the Earth Kingdom and Fire Nation people in my village are living together peacefully now,” he said before he continued with his story, “Anyway, I was trying to hide my bending abilities, but I was caught and thrown in the prison ship as well. Katara and her friends went out to rescue me, but when Katara saw the broken spirits of my people she decided to stay.”

“She stayed? But she isn’t even an earthbender,” Zuko said as he stole a glance at Katara who gave out a small laugh as Toph pouted at her.
“Yeah. She tricked the soldiers into thinking she was an earthbender. I asked her to leave because it wasn’t safe, but she refused,” Haru continued.

Zuko smirked. That sounds like Katara, alright.

“She was outraged that the people were being ripped from their element, separating them from what makes up a bender’s soul. She gave encouragement to those broken prisoners. She gave us the strength and courage to rise against our oppressors and fight for our freedom. So we bent the coal that fueled the metal prison ship and broke out, finally returning to our families and homes once again.”

Zuko’s golden eyes widened.

Metal prison ship? He glanced back at the smiling waterbender near the railing and looked at the blue necklace around her delicate neck. So she was helping prisoners escape and lost her necklace while she was at it. He smiled. And I found it.

“Her bravery, kindness, and spirit attracted me to her as well as her beauty,” Haru admitted as his face flushed.

Zuko nodded since he understood very well.

“But as I said, we’re just friends and I could ask for nothing better,” Haru continued and smiled.

Yes, just friends and nothing more, Zuko thought with a frown.

“Haru!” Ty Lee’s bubbly voice reached their ears. Both men turned to see the pink clad acrobat bounce her way towards them.

“You wanna play Pai Sho with me?” she asked with a smile.

Zuko noticed Haru’s blush deepened as he stuttered an ‘okay’. Zuko smirked as he watched the pair walk away with Ty Lee leaning on Haru’s shoulder.
The young Fire Lord returned his gaze upon the waterbender. Katara seemed not to care for her own comfort as long as she was able to help those that needed her. She left her home in the Southern Water Tribe to help the young Avatar save the world. She stayed in a prison to help those earthbending prisoners. She offered to heal his Uncle Iroh when Azula struck him with lightning in that abandoned village, and she also offered to heal his scar under Ba Sing Se, even though he was her enemy. She had risked her life to defeat a crazed Azula in order to save him from his severe wound. She had used her bloodbending, the thing she hated the most, to help him once more. And now she was giving up her time to help him search for his banished mother.

Zuko looked at Katara fondly, his heart burning with that strange feeling once more.

No. It was not just lust he felt for this beautiful young woman but something else…something deeper.

He frowned.

It’s only friendship, a very strong friendship.

She was special, yes, and he cared for her a lot, but that was it. That was all he could feel toward her.

Zuko continued to gaze at Katara, the way her chocolate-brown hair glistened in the setting sun, the way her sapphire eyes sparkled, the way her tan skin seemed to glow, the way her smile warmed his heart…

“If you stare any longer, you might set something on fire,” Toph spoke loudly next to him, her voice full of humor.

Zuko jumped and cursed.

“Dammit, Toph! Don’t do that!” he growled. How was it he did not sense her coming? “And I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Oh, Sparky,” Toph snorted. She lifted her hand to her mouth and yawned. “You’re gonna have to face the truth one day, and it better be fast or you may regret it for the rest of your life.”
Zuko stared at her in confusion.

“Face what truth?”

Toph rolled her creamy, lime-colored eyes.

“Really, Sparky, I thought Snoozles was the dumb one of the group,” she drawled.

Zuko opened his mouth to ask her what she meant by that when she punched his arm.

“Hey, take me to my room. I hate being on ships, even if they are made of metal! I’ll find a way to sleep my way through ‘till we arrive in good ol’ land!” she vowed.

Seriously, did people not understand she was blind?

“Do you want me to carry you and tuck you in?” Zuko asked and grinned.

Toph snorted and crossed her arms over her small chest.

“Only if you want to eat metal,” she retorted.

Zuko smirked as he grabbed a hold of her arm and led her down into the ship.

Katara played with the waves as she and Suki stood next to the ship’s railing. They had just noticed that Toph had disappeared while the two of them were talking. Katara inhaled the fresh, salty air and smiled. She had missed the ocean.

She looked down at her necklace and sighed. She wanted to talk to Zuko more about his mother, or at least just keep each other company, but he had not so much as glanced her way. After spending time with him, Katara had actually come to look forward to the next time both could share things about each other, or talk about any other thing, or just simply sit together in comfortable silence. And now she could not help but feel sad and lonely.

Touching her necklace gently, Katara wondered if perhaps she had somehow offended him for she could not find any other reason why it looked like he was trying to avoid her. And the thought of him trying to evade her saddened her so much it confused her at how painful it felt.

“Katara?” Suki called out softly after they were silent for a few minutes, the setting sun casting orange and purple colors across the sky. “There’s something I want to tell you, but…I’m scared of what you might say or think of me.” The Kyoshi woman let out a shaky breath.

Katara let go of the water she was bending and faced her nervous friend.

“What is it, Suki?” she asked with a worried frown. “You know you can tell me anything.”

Suki looked down and played with her short auburn hair for a moment before she exhaled deeply.

“Well, you see…I’m…” she whispered and her eyes filled with tears, “I’m pregnant.”

“You’re pregnant?” Katara breathed out quietly. “Are you sure?”

Suki swallowed visibly and nodded.

“Well, that’s wonderful! You’re going to be a mom!” Katara exclaimed excitedly.

Suki looked up, surprised.

“Y-you’re okay with it?”

“Of course I am! Why wouldn’t I be?” Katara asked with a frown.

“Well, I know in your tribe a woman is only supposed to have…sexual relations once she’s married. And I also know that she could be exiled if it is found out she did not keep her virtue or if she becomes pregnant before marriage,” Suki choked out a sob.

Katara embraced her troubled friend tightly and patted her back soothingly.

“That’s true, but that only counts for women of my tribe. And I know Kyoshi Island is different. Don’t worry, I don’t judge you. Besides, I know you and Sokka love each other so much that you could practically see hearts in both your eyes! It is Sokka’s, right?” Katara teased with a mocking dangerous tone.

Suki gave out a watery laugh and nodded as she clung to her understanding friend. Katara patted Suki’s back until her sobs quieted and then she giggled.

“I’m going to be an aunt! Aunt Katara…sounds nice,” she said and laughed happily. “I wonder if he or she will be a waterbender. So how did Sokka take the news?”

Katara moved away and held Suki at arm’s length. Suki looked away and sighed.

“I haven’t…told him yet,” she admitted softly, “I’m…afraid.”

Katara furrowed her eyebrows.

“Afraid? Why?”

“What if Sokka doesn’t want any children at the moment? What if he’s not ready to settle down and have a family? We’re not married, not even engaged!” Suki said rapidly, her eyes wet with more tears. “But I’m keeping my baby, and if he doesn’t want us, I’ll move back to Kyoshi Island and I’ll ___”

“Suki!” Katara interrupted loudly and grabbed the rambling woman’s hands. “How can you even say such a thing? Sokka loves you! He’s always wanted to start a family. He’s always wanted little Sokkas. Suki, you have to tell him. He has to know that he’s going to be a father. So what if you’re not married? I’m sure you will be soon. A child is always a blessing, no matter what. I’m sure Sokka will be ecstatic with the news.”
Suki sniffled and after a while she smiled.

“You’re right. Sokka loves me as much as I love him and I’m sure he will love our baby, too. Thanks, Katara.” She wiped her tears with her sleeve. “Sorry about that. I’ve been so emotional lately.”

Katara laughed and hugged her friend before she clapped her hands excitedly.

“So when did you find out you were carrying a little Sokka or Suki? How far along are you?” she asked.

Katara looked down toward Suki’s stomach and finally noticed that there was a small bulge. How did she not notice that before?

Suki smiled lovingly and patted her stomach gently. “Well…I’m actually four months pregnant—”

“Four months!” Katara squeaked. “And you’re barely speaking of it now?”

Suki again played with her hair.

“You see, I didn’t realize until a few weeks ago. My monthly bleeding stopped while I was in Kyoshi Island, but I didn’t make such a big deal about it. I was too busy with the new Kyoshi Warrior School and helping around my village. And I never got any morning sickness or cravings or anything that happens when you’re pregnant. But then when the third month came around and my monthly bleeding still had not come I began to notice that I was gaining weight when we arrived at the Fire Nation. Then I began to get nauseous weeks later and was getting tired easily.”

“Oh, yes, I remember.” Katara laughed quietly.

“So I asked the Fire Nation Palace Physician to give me a check up so I could know what was happening. I was delighted and scared when he told me I was with child.” Suki sighed. “I tried to tell Sokka many times, really, but the more I waited I guess the more nervous I got. And then he started to become distant and so I kept silent.”
“Well, you’re going to have to tell him eventually because you won’t be able to keep it a secret any longer,” Katara advised her. Then she giggled as she poked the small bulge on Suki’s stomach.

“I know,” Suki agreed with a small smile. “I’ll tell him when the right time comes.”

Zuko glanced at Sokka as they all ate lunch the following day. The two men had noticed that Katara and Suki had been acting strange lately. The two women would huddle together and whisper between themselves and then they would start giggling and sighing wistfully. Just like they were at the moment.

Zuko stared at the two women curiously. There was nothing to giggle about! The entire meal had been silent since Iroh was not present because he was playing Pai Sho with the crew and Toph was sleeping in her room.

Aang was sitting at Zuko’s right side, but the young monk was too busy eating steamed rice and vegetables and playing with Momo to notice. Ty Lee and Haru were sitting together while stealing glances at each other. The chair next to him where Iroh usually sat was empty, but next to that was Mai who refused to look his way. The only sound heard during the meal was the clicking of chopsticks, Momo’s chatter, and the quiet whispers and giggles from Katara and Suki.

Zuko again turned to Sokka, who was sitting at the end of the table next to Suki, and raised his eyebrow. Sokka glanced at the two girls and shrugged.

“Here, Suki, you should eat more,” Katara said as she piled more rice and meat on Suki’s plate. “It will give you more energy.”

“Alright, if you insist,” Suki relented easily with a laugh and began pecking her plate.

“Suki?” Sokka asked as he eyed his very hungry girlfriend. “Are you okay?”

Suki swallowed a big chunk of rice and laughed nervously.

“Of course I’m okay. Why wouldn’t I be?” She gave him a sweet smile.
Sokka forgot all the questions he had on his mind about her strange behavior when she flashed her smile at him.

“Uh…” he practically drooled.

Katara giggled behind her hand while Zuko shook his head from his end of the table. Before Sokka could recover, Suki rose from her seat and grabbed Katara’s hand that was halfway to her mouth with food.

“Katara and I are going to check on Toph. We’ll see you later,” the female warrior said. She gave a still dazed Sokka a kiss on his cheek.

Everybody stared at the women in confusion as Suki dragged the waterbender to the door.

“Okay?” Aang said after the door was shut closed after them.

The rest finished their meal in silence and after a while Aang spoke up.

“I’m going to check on Appa and make sure he has enough hay to munch on. Come on, Momo,” he said.

Aang stood up and walked to the door. Momo grabbed one last piece of fruit and flew to perch on the airbender’s shoulder.

“Haru and I are going for a walk,” Ty Lee announced gleefully and dragged a blushing and dazed earthbender outside before he could say anything.

The remaining three sat in silence as the servants waited for the Fire Lord to leave the table so they could clean it up.

“So…” Sokka began before he cleared his throat. “I think I should go and—” He stopped talking when Mai stood up abruptly and left the room hastily. “Uh…Was it something I said?”
Zuko sighed.

“Don’t worry about it. She’s mad at me,” he said, waving his hand dismissively.

“Why? Did you accidentally burn her while you were making out?” Sokka teased and laughed.

Zuko scoffed.

“It’s not like she instills enough passion for that, a voice inside his head said. Zuko for once agreed.

“Okay, so what really happened? If you don’t mind telling me,” the blue-eyed warrior added quickly.

Zuko let out a long breath. He couldn’t confessed the real reason to Sokka—which was that he imagined Katara while he was about to have sex with Mai. The warrior would surely go ballistic and decapitate him on the spot with his sword. But he would like to have someone to talk about guy stuff. He sure as hell did not want to discuss his sex life with his witty uncle.

Zuko motioned for his servants to retreat. Once they bowed and quickly left the room, he returned his attention to Sokka.

“Mai’s mad at me because…well, I…left her room suddenly while we were about to…have sex,” Zuko explained impassively.

“You what?!” Sokka exclaimed. “Dude, you seriously don’t do that to a woman unless you want an early death!”

Zuko sighed and drank from his wine cup.

“I know, but it’s just…I don’t know how to explain this, but…it’s like when I’m with her I feel…nothing. No stir. No heat. No passion. Nothing.”
Sokka stroked his chin and nodded.

“I see.”

“You do?” Zuko cocked his eyebrow at him.

The water tribesman rubbed the back of his neck and smiled sheepishly.

“It’s not that hard to believe, I mean no offense, but well…she’s not the liveliest or most passionate person I know,” he said.

“Yeah, I understand what you’re saying.” Zuko nodded. “But I feel horrible for doing that to her.”

“Why? It’s not your fault she can’t turn you on,” Sokka said, missing Zuko’s frown at the blunt manner in which he said that.

“Yes, but I mean, she loves me. She went against Azula to help me and has been by my side for all these years. And how do I repay her? By acting like a jerk,” Zuko replied. He narrowed his eyes and drank more of his wine.

Sokka regarded his friend carefully. For a man that was supposed to be in love, Zuko was taking Mai’s anger and avoidance rather well. If it were Suki and him, Sokka would have been practically begging for her forgiveness. But Suki and Mai were sure not the same. And hell would freeze over before Zuko begged for anything. Zuko shouldn’t be acting like this unless…

“Do you love Mai?” he asked cautiously.

Zuko started. But unlike Sokka quickly admitting it the first time he was asked almost the same question, he stammered.

“I…I…” He sighed and ran his hand through his pulled back hair.
“You don’t,” Sokka stated firmly before he added, “I’m not trying to dictate your life or anything, but I don’t think you should continue with this relationship. You’re my friend, Zuko, and you deserve to be happy. I’m pretty sure there’s someone out there that will make you happy…in every single way.” Sokka wiggled his eyebrows suggestively.

Zuko chuckled.

_Katara seems like that someone_, the same little voice said. Zuko flushed and mentally shook his head of such thoughts.

“I don’t know, Sokka. Most of the women who I meet either want me for my title or my wealth. Besides, I care for Mai and she doesn’t deserve my rejection.”

Sokka opened his mouth to say something, but Zuko continued.

“I don’t have time to be searching for my soul mate, my perfect woman, my other half or whatever you call it,” he added curtly.

Sokka rolled his blue eyes and sighed.

“Fine, do whatever you want, but don’t come crying to me when you realize it’s too late.”

“I do not cry,” Zuko protested.

“Whatever,” Sokka muttered as he stood up and grabbed an apple. “I’m going to look for Suki, _my_ soul mate.”

Zuko glared as Sokka exited the room, leaving him alone with his thoughts. He ran his hand down his face and let out a puff of smoke from his mouth before drinking the rest of his red wine.

Why did he always act like that when someone was trying to help him? And why did he feel like people were all of the sudden telling him he had a chance of finding someone who would truly make him happy?
Dismissing all confusing thoughts from his tired mind, the young Fire Lord stood from the table and made his way to his cabin to finish his paperwork. The only thing he needed to concentrate on was finding his mother, not the possibility of finding his future wife.
A couple of days later the setting sun shone on Katara as she leaned against the railing of the ship, absentmindedly bending the seawater into small tendrils, a huge smile on her face. Sokka and Suki were having a baby! She was going to be an aunty! She and Suki had been talking nonstop about the arrival of the baby. They would spend their time talking about what to get the child, such as clothes and toys, among many other things.

Katara had been too busy with everything that concerned Zuko that she only recently noticed that Suki now wore long and loose-fitted tunics and pants to hide her growing stomach. Katara giggled as the salty water sprayed her face. Gran-Gran would be so happy with the news. Now the nosy, wise woman won’t be bothering her anymore about her getting married and having children.

Katara sighed as the sound of waves crashing onto the ship’s side reached her ears.

‘I am getting older by the minute. So I ask you this, when am I going to get great-grandchildren?’ her Gran-Gran’s voice flowed through her mind.

Of course she wanted to get married, settle down, and have a family. She had a wonderful boyfriend who loved her immensely. Aang was kind, fun, cute, cheerful, and lovable. Not to mention he was the Avatar, the savior of the world. Everybody loved him.

So why did she feel unhappy? Why didn’t the thought of marrying Aang make her feel excited or feel like jumping with glee? She loved him, how could she not? But then why did she have this feeling that there was something more out there…something greater? What if there was someone better?

Katara shook her head and sighed again, looking over to the bright golden sun setting behind the blue horizon. Aang was the powerful bender that Aunt Wu predicted, the one she was to marry and have children and grandchildren with, right? So then why did a part of her doubt it?

The young waterbender closed her eyes and rubbed her temples with her fingers. She had not been this confused until they had arrived in the Fire Nation Palace weeks ago.

What had happened to make her hesitate so?
Zuko came onto the deck for some fresh air. He had been sitting in his cabin all day, plagued with different kinds of thoughts. Why did Iroh, Toph, and Sokka kept insisting that he choose a woman to make him happy as soon as possible or else he would end up miserable for the rest of his life? Why did they think that? And why didn’t they think Mai could make him happy?

Perhaps they were aware that Mai was not the one for him? Zuko frowned.

His thoughts were immediately dismissed from his mind as his golden eyes settled upon Katara’s profile. She was leaning against the metal railing with a pensive look on her lovely features. He watched as she sighed, her expression turning into a small frown.

_I wonder what she’s thinking about that’s making her look so frustrated_, Zuko thought as he silently continued to stare at her.

Katara was wearing a dark red tunic and dark gray pants with a gray sash around her waist. He was sure her outfit was one of the ones she bought with Iroh. She had her usual long braid falling down her back with her hair loops near her forehead, her brown skin shining softly under the warm sun, a soft salty breeze ruffling her braid and her clothes. Zuko felt his stress dissolve as he gazed upon the woman that affected him in so many ways.

Zuko’s breath caught in his throat when Katara turned and their eyes locked. He swallowed hard when she seemed to brighten up and she smiled at him.

“Hey, Zuko! I see you’ve finally decided to grace us lowly peasants with your presence,” she teased merrily as she walked toward him.

Zuko smirked and turned his head away from her with a haughty tilt of his chin.

“Yes, well, I decided to be generous today and allow the common people bask in my glory,” he drawled with mocking superiority.

Katara laughed at Zuko’s playfulness, causing him to smile and her to forget about her previous problems.

“Well, I guess I should feel honored, huh?” she said, batting her eyelashes innocently.
“Yes, you should,” the Fire Lord snuffed arrogantly.

He watched smugly as Katara laughed again. He wondered why it was so easy to joke and play around when Katara was near. She just made it so easy to drop his stoic mask. Soon he, too, joined in her laughter with a deep chuckle of his own.

Katara watched as Zuko’s golden eyes sparkled with his amusement, but then she stopped laughing suddenly, her face changing into sadness.

Zuko stopped as well and raised his eyebrow in question.

“Katara, what’s wrong?”

The waterbender turned away from him to look towards the ocean.

“It’s nothing,” she said with a shrug.

Zuko knew she was lying and he frowned.

“Katara, tell me,” he insisted.

The waterbender continued to look at the sea and avoided looking at him. When she remained silent, Zuko stepped closer to her and gently turned her to look at him.

“Tell me,” he ordered softly.

“It’s just that…I was kind of thinking that you were upset with me or something,” she replied softly. She grabbed her braid and began to nervously play with it.

Frowning, Zuko asked, “Upset with you? What makes you say that?”
Katara shifted her eyes to the side before she looked at him with a frown.

“Well, I mean, since we boarded the ship we haven’t talked or anything. I only see you at meals and we don’t even talk then. It almost seems like…like you’re trying to avoid me.”

Zuko’s face flushed. He had hoped she hadn’t noticed and he thought she wouldn’t have.

Katara glanced away before looked back at him hesitantly.

“Did I do something to upset you? If I did, I’m sorry. I didn't mean to.”

Zuko winced at the sadness in her voice. He never thought Katara would feel this way, blaming herself for his actions. But if she felt sad because they had not talked, then it meant she liked to spend her time with him as much as he liked to spend time with her. He smiled.

“No, Katara, don’t think like that. You have done nothing but help me,” he said softly.

He needed to reassure her. Yes, she was part of the reason why he was avoiding everyone, but it was not because of anything she had done wrong. Of course, he would never tell her that it was so he could forget those dreams. Zuko mentally shook his head before it wandered off too much.

“I just have so much paperwork to go through before we arrive at the Earth Kingdom. I need to leave the Fire Nation well provided for before I set out on our trip. I’m the one that should be sorry for neglecting you—and the others,” he quickly added, “I just have been busy.”

Katara looked down in embarrassment. Well, now she felt stupid. Zuko was a busy man, the Fire Lord for La’s sake! And there she was whining like a little girl because she didn’t have his attention.

Stupid, stupid, stupid!

“You’re right. This isn’t a vacation and you still have responsibilities to fulfill. And you don’t need me to add to your problems,” she said and smiled faintly.
Zuko smiled.

“You’re never a problem,” he reassured her.

Except in my dreams, he added mentally and cleared his throat.

Katara grinned at him.

“You say that now, but you’ll see,” she told him and laughed.

Zuko grinned as well and tapped his chin with a mocking pensive look.

“Yes, you are correct. Women do seem to cause many problems,” he commented coolly.

“Hey!” Katara protested, placing her hands on her hips. Her blue eyes narrowed as Zuko just smirked at her.

“You want problems?” she asked instead and smirked, “Then I’ll be honored to give you problems.” She removed one hand from her hip and swept it to her side.

Zuko cocked his black eyebrow at her statement and at the mischievous glint in her sapphire eyes. His eyes widened in realization, but before he could react, a water whip rose from the side of the ship and smacked him on the back of his head.

“What was that for?” he growled as he rubbed the stinging spot on his head.

Katara brought her hand to her mouth and laughed. Sometimes it was just too easy to mess with Zuko. Somewhere in the back of her mind, she wondered if she could be executed for smacking the Fire Lord.

“I’m sorry, Your Majesty, do please forgive me. It was an accident,” she said quietly and smiled innocently.

She yelped and jumped to the side as a small fireball flew by her head.

“Hey!”

Zuko chuckled.

“Oh! It slipped.”

He coolly placed his hands behind his back and smirked.

“Why you…” Katara scowled.

She called forth two large tendrils of seawater to her, coiling them around her arms, taking a fighting stance. Zuko’s smirk grew larger and his blood pumped with anticipation.

“Perhaps you’re in need of a lesson on how to properly act around the Fire Lord,” the young firebender remarked as he lifted his palms towards his face and lit them up.

Katara smirked.

“We’ll see who’s in need of a lesson,” she said pleasantly.

Without warning, she threw her right arm forward, lashing the long coil of water toward the young man. Zuko quickly stepped to the side and threw a blazing fireball at Katara who extinguished it with the water tendril on her left arm.

The water hissed as it collided with the fire.

“Hm, not bad.” Zuko drawled as he circled the young woman calmly.
Katara remained in her fighting stance as she watched the firebender eyeing her like a predator would its prey. The look in his golden eyes made her shiver delightfully, which confused her. She noticed that he had his hair tied into a topknot where his golden fire crown rested, glinting brightly under the sun. He was wearing black boots and pants and he had on a dark crimson sleeveless tunic outlined with gold that showed off his muscular, pale arms. Katara felt herself beginning to blush before she mentally shook her head to keep it clear. She watched carefully for his next move.

Zuko finished circling his opponent to stand before Katara.

“Here’s what. I’ll forgive your offensive manners and let you walk away while you still can,” he said regally before he smirked. He knew Katara would never back away from a fight, but it was so fun to taunt her.

“Ha! Yeah, I’ll walk away.” Katara smirked mischievously. “After I defeat you, that is!”

The waterbender spun around, bringing both salty tendrils together and making a larger water whip. With a flick of her hands, she aimed it at her opponent.

Zuko grinned and brought up a wall of fire, instantly vaporizing the water with a hiss. Katara bent the steam and turned it back into water surrounding Zuko. Exhaling her cool breath, she froze the liquid on Zuko and smirked.

Zuko frowned before quickly raising his body temperature and melting the ice from his clothes and hair before he rolled to the side and shot two fireballs at Katara.

Katara squealed as she dodged one and deflected the other with a shield of ice she called from the sea. As soon as she brought the ice shield down, Katara rapidly bent the water into two whips to deflect the fire blast Zuko threw her way.

“I see life as royalty has not made you forget how to fight,” Katara teased as she bent one whip into sharp icicles and sent them towards Zuko’s body.

Zuko called forth his own fire whips and sliced the icicles easily, melting them into a puddle on the metal floor of his flagship.
“If I do not keep up with my training, then how will I be able to crush my enemies?” Zuko replied in a haughty tone.

He cracked his fiery whips at Katara who countered with her own liquid ones. As both elements met, a hissing sound was heard and steam surrounded them.

Katara grinned.

“You know, if I didn’t know you any better, I would think you just called me your enemy, and that would not be pretty,” she said.

Zuko’s stoic expression changed into a grin.

“You’re right,” Zuko agreed, “Besides, I like you as a friend better. That way I know I won’t get frozen to a wall or something.”

Katara laughed.

“Yeah, I feel the same way except I don’t want to get tied to a tree again!”

Zuko smirked at her. He had actually liked that.

“As for the being frozen to a wall…” Katara continued, “You never know!”

She dashed toward the firebender, bringing her water to her right arm and bending it into an ice sword.

Zuko grinned again as he skillfully dodged and evaded the waterbender-made weapon. He noticed that Katara left many openings with her attacks; if he had his dual swords at the moment he could have killed her by now. Of course, he was a sword master and Katara wasn’t trained. Besides, he would kill himself first before hurting her.

Zuko flipped over Katara’s head and landed behind her. Katara spun around to face him and barely had enough time to raise her ice sword to block the fire dagger Zuko brought to her shoulder.

Now it was Zuko’s turn to drive Katara back as he stabbed and sliced at the waterbender with the hot fire daggers in each of his hands.

Katara’s blood raced with excitement as she deflected and attacked Zuko. She had almost forgotten how much fun it was to have a real spar. Waterbending students didn’t count, especially if they were eight-year-olds. She loved to spar with Zuko because he never held back. He treated her like an equal and never went easy on her just because she was female. She appreciated and was grateful for that.

And he really looks stunning when he firebends, Katara thought.

Zuko thrilled in the spar as his blood pumped wildly in his veins. He had not had such a worthy opponent since he became a firebending master, only practicing at the palace by himself. His wish of having someone to really spar with became true thanks to Katara. He admired her strength and her prowess in battle. And he could not help but admit that she always looked beautiful when she used waterbending, whether in a fight or to just have fun.

Katara spread her arms, weaving through a series of movements, commanding her element to follow her guidance. Shifting her weight slightly, Katara rose to the balls of her small feet and created a sharp ice wave, flicking it forward with a small yell.

Zuko smirked and at the last minute, when it seemed he was going to be hit and thrown overboard, he dodged it with an impressive somersault and landed a few feet away in a crouch. Standing upright casually, Zuko gave her a pleased expression and a nod of approval before he sprinted toward her, bright fire engulfing his strong hands as he shot blast after blast of fire which Katara deflected with large water tendrils.

As the firebender and the waterbender continued their intense match both remembered their first great battle in the Northern Water Tribe. But unlike that day in the Spirit Oasis, both fought for fun and to spend some time together.

After a while, both separated to catch their breath, eyeing each other both warily and appreciatively.

Katara was never that good at hand-to-hand combat, and Zuko was much faster than her, so when she took a punch at Zuko’s face, she quickly regretted it because he ducked before she could make Katara yelped as she lost her balance and pitched forward. She flailed her arms in front of her to grab onto something, which turned out to be Zuko, and brought them both tumbling down.

Zuko winced as he fell onto his back on the hard metal deck. As he tried to sit up, he realized he was being held down by something soft and warm. Zuko’s golden eyes widened as his eyes landed on Katara’s face that was inches from his own flushed one. They were both panting hard from their exercise.

Katara blushed before she broke out into laughter.

“Ha! I win!” she exclaimed victoriously.

She leaned back and sat on Zuko’s stomach with a triumphant grin on her flushed face. The waterbender squeaked as Zuko flipped them over easily, and found herself pinned down by the Fire Lord’s muscular body. Zuko held onto Katara’s wrists beside her head and straddled her stomach.

“I beg to differ,” Zuko whispered, his hot breath fanning across Katara’s face, causing her to shiver. Zuko smirked as he looked down upon his worthy adversary.

Having Zuko so close was making her body feel warm and strange. She tried to break away from Zuko’s grasp, but he refused to let go.

“Hm. Actually, I feel quite comfortable,” Zuko replied smoothly. He grinned as he looked down at her.

Katara huffed and glared at the arrogant firebender above her.

Zuko just smiled at her, taking in her flushed features, a fine sheen of sweat glistening on her tanned skin. A few strands of hair had come undone from her perfect braid, her chest was heaving up and down from their spar, and her cobalt eyes sparkling under the setting sun. And even through all this, she was still beautiful. Perhaps, more so. Zuko’s smirk fell from his face as he was hit by images from his dreams, those heated dreams where Katara’s face was flushed from a different kind of activity.
Zuko stiffened as his active imagination brought forth another problem. Katara furrowed her eyebrows as she felt something hard poking her stomach. Zuko held his breath as Katara looked at him with confusion written in her blue eyes.

“Zuko, are you okay? Why are you looking at me like that?” she asked.

She squirmed since she was getting uncomfortable, making Zuko close his eyes and hiss.

“Zuko! Are you hurt?” Katara asked in alarm.

_Oh, no! Did I accidently cut him with an icicle?_ She tried to sit up, but Zuko held her down, biting back a groan.

“Katara, stop, please! Don’t…move,” Zuko breathed shallowly as he tried to hide his erection.

It seemed so far Katara was oblivious to what was happening to him and he wanted to keep it that way. But it was so difficult while her small but lush body was touching his.

Katara stopped moving and looked into Zuko’s closed eyes. His face looked like he was trying to control himself, as if he was in pain. Katara began to worry.

“Zuko, are you sure you’re okay—?” She gasped when Zuko snapped his eyes open to gaze at her and she gulped as she noticed that his bright golden eyes were now a molten ambered hue.

“Katara,” Zuko breathed huskily as he leaned his face closer to hers. He could not stop himself. He wanted her.

“Katara!” a voice shouted out.

Freezing, both turned to see Aang glaring at them with Momo on his shoulder. Katara blushed in embarrassment and gave him a small smile. Zuko cursed under his breath because of the situation he was in and because they were interrupted. The young firebender quickly pulled them upright before he swiftly turned his back towards them and pretended to dust himself off, hoping that neither had noticed his still present erection.

Aang seemed to fly as he ran toward Katara before taking her in his arms and looking her over. Momo jumped to the side and landed on the railing of the ship as his master fussled over the female.

“Katara, are you okay?” the young monk asked hastily.

Before Katara could answer, Aang whirled on Zuko with an angry expression marring his usual cheerful face.

“What the hell were you doing to my girlfriend, Zuko?” he bit out.

The other two on the deck gaped at hearing the young monk curse.

“Aang, calm down,” Katara told him gently. “Zuko and I were just—” she tried to say, but was cut off.

“Answer me, Zuko!” Aang yelled, narrowing his eyes as Zuko continued to face away from them.

Zuko looked over his shoulder and gave the young boy a hard glare.

“I don’t see why you’re making such a big deal. Katara and I were just sparring and I happened to pin her down, thus winning our little match,” he said impassively.

Before Katara could protest about his self-proclaimed victory, Aang took a step toward Zuko and narrowed his gray eyes even more.

“If I didn’t know any better, and by the way you were looking at her, I would say you were enjoying that position rather well,” he growled lowly.

“Aang!” Katara gasped and looked at Zuko in embarrassment.
Zuko turned away and swallowed hard.

_You have no idea just how much_, he thought. His throbbing manhood made it hard for him to deny his enjoyment, at least to himself. He mentally shook his head.

“Don’t kid yourself,” Zuko snapped, “I will never look at Katara in such a way. She’s…not my type.” He inwardly flinched at the harsh tone of his voice.

_Liar! Liar! Liar!_ his conscience taunted him loudly.

Since his back was turned to her, Zuko missed the hurt and angry look on Katara’s face before she quickly hid it with a smile.

“Yeah, Aang. Zuko and I are just friends and we were just having a little competition to see who was best.” She smiled at Aang and held his tattooed hand in hers in order to calm him down.

Aang relaxed and let out shaky laugh.

“You guys are right. I never should’ve doubted you. You would never betray me.” He smiled and rubbed the back of his bald head sheepishly. “I’m sorry.”

Momo’s big, green eyes looked among the three humans with confusion before he flew away to find Appa.

Zuko nodded at Aang’s apology.

“You’re my friend and I will never do such a dishonorable thing. Thanks for the workout, Katara,” he added softly. Without turning around to look at them, Zuko walked swiftly back into the ship.

Katara looked after the firebender and sighed. She had begun to break through his closed walls, but it seemed he had returned to his old melancholy self.
“I didn’t mean to jump to conclusions,” Aang said softly as he pulled Katara into his arms. “It’s just that when I saw him just staring at you like that I couldn’t help but feel jealous and angry.”

Katara sighed again and wrapped her arms around Aang’s middle, giving him a small kiss on the cheek.

“It’s okay, Aang, but it hurt that you would think of us like that. You know I would never hurt you. Besides, you heard what he said. He would never see me more than a friend,” she said softly, though it was hard to keep the hurt from her voice.

Katara stiffened as she felt Aang glide one hand from her back to rest on her hip.

“Aang?” she called hesitantly.

“Yeah?” Aang mumbled as he placed a kiss on her neck. He slid his hand further down and gave her butt a gentle squeeze.

Katara quickly pulled away and looked anywhere but at him as her grandmother’s warning swam in her head.

“We should get ready for dinner,” she said nervously.

She turned away and started to walk back to her room to bathe, but Aang grasped her wrist and pulled her back, narrowing his eyes into irritated slits.

“Why do you keep acting like this?” he hissed angrily. “Why do I get the feeling that you try to avoid me every time I touch you? You never let me do anything but kiss and hug you!”

Katara wrenched her arm away and glared indignantly at Aang, placing her hands on her hips.

“Well, excuse me for being so inexperienced! You’re my first boyfriend, dammit! I don’t really know how to react, so stop pressuring me!” she yelled, feeling frustrated tears pricking at the back of her eyes. She had never done anything beyond hugs and kisses and everything else made her uncomfortable.
Aang flinched at her outburst and gently grabbed her hand.

“I’m sorry. The last thing I want is for you to be uncomfortable around me. I’ll wait until you’re ready for a more intimate relationship. I can be patient, you know, being the Avatar and all,” he joked. He smiled, trying to lighten up the mood.

Katara nodded and squeezed his hand in appreciation. How could she not love him, he was so sweet and kind. But then why was it that every time he tried to go a bit further she felt so uncomfortable that she felt like running away? She did not know why, but now when she kissed and hugged Aang, she felt wrong. Guilty.

“The others are probably waiting for us for dinner,” she said tiredly.

She gave him a smile that did not reach her eyes, but Aang missed it as he looped her arm in his and began to chatter about his day while they walked below deck.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko wrenched his door open and slammed it closed behind him, thankful that he met no one on his way to his cabin, knowing that if anybody saw his current situation he would never hear the end of it.

He closed his eyes and breathed in and out evenly to calm himself down. Opening his eyes again, he looked down at himself and groaned, banging his head on the hard door behind him. Why? Why did the spirits have to do this to him?

The young Fire Lord staggered to his bed and threw himself onto his back. Covering his eyes with one arm, he again tried to erase the image of a flushed and panting Katara underneath him from his mind.

He tried to forget how her tanned skin was tinted pink, or how her lush lips were parted so she could catch her breath, or how her soft body felt so perfect beneath his…

Zuko groaned loudly as his member throbbed.

“Stop torturing yourself!” he snarled and threw one of his pillows across the room where it bumped into the wall. “Katara is the best friend I have never had! She is not meant to be mine! She…she loves Aang.”

He closed his eyes tightly as his heart clenched painfully at his last words. He had seen how she had hugged and kissed Aang as he sneaked one last glance at them, causing his temper to flare before he had chastised himself.

Zuko sighed loudly and ran his hand down his face. He felt lucky that Katara had not noticed his arousal. He was afraid that if she had, she would have felt disgusted or angry. He would not be able to bear to have her hate him ever again. To have those blue eyes of hers burning with anger. Those beautiful sapphire eyes that had shined brilliantly up at him with such innocence and concern a few moments ago.

He felt disgusted with himself. While he had depraved and indecent thoughts about her she had only been worried for any injury he could had suffered. Katara, an innocent maiden with a huge loving heart.

And what about Aang? Zuko felt his once heated blood turn cold. Aang trusted him. He was the one who had asked to be friends that day the Blue Spirit helped him escape from Zhao. He was the one who gave him a chance to prove he changed and regretted his actions when he approached them at the Western Air Temple.

And how do I repay his friendship? By fantasizing about his girlfriend. Zuko groaned miserably and pulled at his hair that had come undone by the little exercise.

Perhaps if he started listening and actually began to look for someone else like everybody had been insisting lately, then he would finally be freed of all thoughts about Katara. Maybe all he needed was someone to capture his attention and interest, since Mai seemed not to bother to anymore, and then he won’t be so aroused by the interesting and exotic Water Tribe maiden.

But then why did it feel like he would never be able to find such a woman?

Shaking his head and dismissing all thoughts, Zuko raised himself from his bed and sat down heavily at his desk, hoping his paperwork would distract him.

Three hours passed in which Zuko finally finished his paperwork. Setting the stack to the side, Zuko opened one of the drawers from his desk and brought out a small scroll. He opened it slowly, almost reverently, as if afraid of damaging it. Zuko smiled wistfully as he gazed down at the small painting of him when he was about eight-years-old. He had found the scroll a few months after he was crowned Fire Lord. Standing next to him was a woman with a loving smile on her beautiful face.

Zuko placed the painting on the desk in front of him and sighed. What if his mother had forgotten about him? What if she never wanted to see him again?

A knock was heard outside his door.

“Enter,” Zuko ordered dispassionately, setting the ink painting aside.

The young man looked up to see Jee open the door and enter the room before standing before his desk and bowing. Zuko stifled a sigh of relief. He was beginning to depress himself. Again.

“What is it that you wish to tell me?” he asked.

Jee bowed again and cleared his throat.

“I’m here to inform you, my lord, that we will dock at the colony port tomorrow morning.”

“Good. I’m glad. Make sure everything is settled for our departure on Appa and inform the others about it,” Zuko directed.

“Yes, Your Majesty,” Jee said with a sharp nod. “And if I may say so, I am glad that you finally know where to locate your mother. I really do hope you would be able to find Princess Ursa and bring her back to the Fire Nation.”

Zuko graced his admiral with a small smile. He knew Jee was being sincere unlike some of the Fire Nation Court members who had said the same thing.

“Thank you, Admiral Jee. I have finished all the documents I had brought with me.” Zuko motioned at the stack of papers on his desk. “Take them back to the Court Council as soon as you refuel the ship. I will send you a letter informing you when we will return to the Fire Nation after we spend some time with my uncle in Ba Sing Se.”
Jee opened his mouth to agree when a soft knock interrupted him. Zuko frowned before calling out.

“Come in.”

Both firebenders watched as the door opened to reveal a smiling waterbender carrying a tray loaded with food with Momo on her shoulder munching on a nut. Jee noticed from the corner of his eye how Zuko flushed and squirmed in his chair. The Fire Lord was… blushing? Jee immediately composed himself from gaping in surprise.

“Good evening, Admiral Jee,” Katara greeted and smiled as she looked at the older man.

Jee smiled as he gave her a small bow.

“Good evening, Lady Katara. Here, let me help you,” the admiral said as he took the tray from her hands and set it down on an empty spot on the Fire Lord’s desk.

Momo flew away from his perch on the female and landed on the soft bed.

Zuko looked at the tray and then at Katara. Raising an eyebrow he asked, “Is there something you need, Katara?”

Katara laughed daintily, causing Zuko’s heart to skip a beat.

“Isn’t it obvious, silly?” she asked.

Jee discreetly looked at the Fire Lord for his reaction on being called silly. Apparently, he did not mind the young lady calling him that since Zuko remained calm. Jee remembered the young lord clenching his jaw and narrowing his eyes for being called silly by one of the elder advisors. Interesting.

When Zuko just stared at her, Katara rolled her eyes and sighed.
“We missed you at dinner and I figured you closed yourself in your room to burrow yourself in your work. Again. So I decided to bring you your dinner. What good does a leader do to his country if he’s starving to death?”

Zuko smiled at her. Katara, always the motherly one. It felt nice to know someone cared for him.

“Thanks. Now that you mention it, I am a bit hungry.”

“Of course you would be after I kicked your butt today,” Katara replied with a smirk.

Jee raised a gray, bushy eyebrow at the playfulness in the young woman’s tone. He had never heard anyone dare to tease his solemn lord before.

“Excuse me? If I recall correctly I was the one who held you down until I decided to help you up,” Zuko retorted and then chuckled.

This time Jee actually gaped as he watched and heard his stoic Fire Lord not only have a playful banter with someone, but he chuckled as well!

Katara crossed her arms over her chest and ‘humph’, causing Zuko to chuckle even louder. Jee smiled as he looked from one young person to the other. If both of them were not already in relationships, Jee was sure they would have made a great couple. And perhaps this young woman would have made his lord happy.

Clearing his throat, Jee interrupted the sweet scene. He watched as both young benders turn to him as if remembering they were not alone.

“I will place the documents in a safe right now and hand them over to the Council members once I return to the Fire Nation. Good night, Fire Lord Zuko.” He grabbed the stack of papers and bowed. Then with a warm smile he bowed to Katara. “And good night to you as well, Lady Katara.”

Katara blushed again at being shown such respect.

“Good night, Admiral Jee,” she said as he left the room.
Zuko now felt uncomfortable being alone with Katara after trying to suppress his desire for her a few moments ago.

“Uh…Katara?” he croaked. He cleared his throat. “I just want to say that I meant no disrespect this evening and—”

“Don’t worry about it,” Katara interrupted. She waved her hand and looked away. “You made it pretty clear you would never show such…desire for someone like me.” She turned back and gave him a small smile. “I understand, you know. I am a peasant after all.” She laughed, though inwardly she still felt hurt.

Zuko looked at the young woman standing before him and frowned at her words.

“Katara, I didn’t mean it that way. Besides, being the daughter of the ruler of a country does not make you a peasant, now does it? You could even be called a princess.” He smiled.

Katara felt her cheeks warm and she giggled.

“Peasant or not, you’re a very desirable woman,” he continued.

Very desirable, he mentally groaned.

He noticed Katara blush and even though he found her modesty endearing he knew he needed to say more.

“But you’re my friend, and as such, I would never try to disrespect you.”

Katara smiled warmly at his words.

“Thanks. There are not many men as honorable as you. I also want to thank you for…standing up for my honor against your fath—Ozai,” Katara told him softly.
Zuko felt his face flush before he narrowed his golden eyes.

“I could not allow such a sick person to insinuate such things about you. You are the most kindhearted person I know and I could not sit back while you get insulted. I swear I will cut off the dirty tongue of anyone who dares disrespect you or question your virtue,” Zuko promised fervently.

Iroh had explained to him how a maiden’s virtue was of great importance in the Water Tribes and he did not want Katara to be looked down upon.

Katara found herself blushing for the hundredth time that day and she felt her heart do a somersault. Nobody had ever said such wonderful things to her, not even Aang.

“T-thank you, Zuko. Um…you should eat your food before it gets cold,” she said, returning to her caring, motherly mode.

Zuko smirked and crossed his arms.

“I’m a firebender, my food never gets cold. As well as my tea, my bath and…my bed,” he could not help but to add with a grin.

Katara’s eyes widened before dismissing his words with a laugh.

“Jeez, not even I order people around that much,” Zuko muttered playfully, earning a glare from the waterbender.

Zuko pretended not to notice the glare as he picked up his chopsticks and began to eat. On the outside, he ate with a calm and expressionless face, but in the inside, he was rejoicing for finally tasting food and filling his complaining stomach.

Momo jumped from the bed to land beside Zuko’s tray of mouthwatering food, quickly grabbing a piece of fruit. Zuko glared at the little thief before chuckling.
After making sure Zuko was eating, Katara let her eyes wander around the Fire Lord’s cabin. Not surprisingly, it was larger and more elegant than the other rooms the gang and she occupied. It was smaller than his royal bedchamber in the Fire Nation Palace, but nonetheless, it was impressive. On the left side there was a large tapestry with the Fire Nation emblem and under it a cushion and a small altar with candles. On the right side was Zuko’s large desk where he was sitting and eating at the moment, a chattering lemur beside him. Katara was impressed that Zuko kept his room nice and tidy.

There was a porthole, a ship’s circular window, at the opposite end of the entrance door where a large bed was positioned. Katara noted that it was smaller than the very, very large bed at the palace.

I wonder if he gets lonely in that huge thing called a bed, Katara thought as she remembered the silky feeling of the red coversheet. Perhaps he needs someone to keep him company.

And that somebody would be you? a voice said in her head suggestively.

Katara felt her face heat up.

Bad, Katara, bad! she chastised herself.

Zuko watched Katara look around his room as he continued to eat. He noticed that she stared at his bed far longer than she had on anything else. He cocked his eyebrow when he noticed a blush stain her cheeks. Zuko choked on a piece of fish as a thought of showing her his bed more personally entered his head. Momo chattered worriedly as the firebender began to cough loudly.

Katara turned around and frowned. She walked rapidly around Zuko’s desk to pat him on the back as he began to cough uncontrollably.

“Are you okay?” she asked worriedly.

“Yeah,” Zuko rasped, “Didn’t chew properly.” He drank some red wine and cleared his throat as he shifted in his seat to hide his lie from her.

Katara laughed quietly at him before her eyes settled on the small painting placed on the desk. The scenery seemed to be a garden with many trees, flowers, and a pond. Katara smiled as she recognized the Royal Palace Garden she had come to love. There was a little boy with a huge smile on his cute little face, holding a turtle-duckling in both hands. Katara guessed it was a younger Zuko before...his father changed everything. Yes, it was Zuko with the same hair color, the same eyebrows, the same smile she had seen only occasionally, and the same eyes. Katara’s gaze moved to the woman standing beside him with one hand placed on the young boy’s shoulder.

The woman had beautiful, long black hair, pale skin, and an elegant and delicate face. She was tall and stood gracefully, wearing long royal Fire Nation robes. The lady was also smiling, but unlike the child Zuko’s wide, cheery grin the woman’s smile was small and gentle. She looked similar to Azula, and even though the ink painting was in black and white. Katara had a feeling the woman’s eyes were a soft gold, not cold like the fallen princess’, because they were so similar to Zuko’s own.

“Is this Princess Ursa, your mother?” Katara asked softly as she gently touched the painting.

Zuko stopped hiding to look back at the small scroll Katara was gazing at. His features softened as he replied.

“Yes, that’s her.”

“She’s beautiful,” Katara whispered in awe.

Zuko smiled.

“Yes, but her physical beauty was not the only thing wonderful about her. She was fun, loving, caring, and a great friend.”

Just like you, he added warmly.

Katara smiled, but then she saddened.

“I don’t have any paintings that show how my mother looked. I only have memories and...her necklace,” she said sadly and touched the cool, blue pendant on her neck.
Zuko frowned as her eyes began to shine with tears. He grabbed her hand—both jumping slightly at the little shock that went through them—and gave it a gentle squeeze.

“I’m sure your mother was a very beautiful and caring woman as well,” he said softly. He wondered when he felt like being the one to actually comfort someone. Or better yet, why he only felt like that for Katara.

Katara sniffled and turned to look at his warm, golden eyes.

“How can you be so sure?” she asked quietly.

Zuko smiled and touched her cheek.

“Because I’m looking at her daughter,” he replied softly.

Katara blinked and blushed shyly. She was the one who usually consoled people and it felt nice to be the one to actually be comforted. Zuko let go of her and cleared his throat.

“Uh…w-why is Lady Ursa at the Abandoned Fort in the first place?” Katara asked in order to calm her racing heart, hoping she wasn’t crossing the line.

A frown marred his handsome features as Zuko remained silent a moment.

“I’m not entirely sure,” he admitted. “She left the Fire Nation Palace the night my grandfather Azulon died. Father told Azula and me that she had died and I believed him until I found out four years ago that she was actually alive.”

Zuko sighed and scratched Momo’s head as the lemur settled on the desk right in front of him.

“I just hope she’s still at the Abandoned Fort because I have no other leads on where to search for her.”

“We’ll find her. You’ll see,” Katara proclaimed determinedly. She frowned as she watched Zuko’s eyes turn despondent as he continued to gaze at the painting while petting Momo. “Zuko, what’s wrong?”

Zuko looked away from the painting to stare at the wall ahead of him. How did she know something was bothering him? He always made sure his emotions stayed hidden, not even Iroh noticed sometimes.

When Zuko remained silent, Katara guessed he did not want to talk to her about it. In a way, it saddened her because she had thought he had liked to confide in her just as much as she had on him. She was startled when Zuko turned his piercing, golden eyes on her.

“I am…afraid,” he finally admitted softly.

When Katara looked at him expectantly, Zuko hesitated a moment before he continued.

“I didn’t decide to travel as an ordinary person, instead as Fire Lord Zuko, to keep the Earth Kingdom from reacting badly. I also did it because I was afraid of scaring my mother away if she knew I was looking for her.”

He again looked at the wall before him, ashamed of admitting such weakness.

“Scaring her away? Zuko, what in the world are you talking about?” Katara asked incredulously.

Zuko returned his gaze to her and Katara was shocked at the fear and sadness in his usually camouflaged eyes.

“What if she doesn’t want anything to do with me? What if she doesn’t want to see me anymore? What if Ozai was right and she’s ashamed of me?” he said quietly, unable to stop revealing his fears now that he had started talking. “I have done so many horrible things in my life and I’m afraid she’ll see me as a monster.” He unconsciously touched his scarred face. “What if…what if she doesn’t love me anymore?”

“Zuko! Don’t you say such things ever again!” Katara scolded him.
Her eyes softened as she gazed down upon the young man that had suffered so greatly since childhood.

“Zuko,” she said softly, “By everything you have told me about her it’s so obvious she loves you. A mother will never turn her back on her children, no matter what they do. You made many mistakes, yes, but you’ve worked so hard to right those wrongs. I forgave you, didn’t I? What makes you think your own mother won’t?”

She gently turned his face towards her and caressed his scarred cheek. Zuko immediately relaxed and sighed softly at her touch.

“Zuko, you are not a monster! I don’t ever want to hear you refer to yourself as such!” she told him firmly, “Ozai is the monster for tormenting his own son so much. It hurts me when you say such things.”

Katara blinked and a tear fell down her cheek. She was confused as to why having Zuko talk about himself in such a way affected her so much. She did not understand why she felt so compelled to take all his pain and suffering away.

Zuko felt as if his heart was burning as her words sank into his soul. And as she cried for him. Nobody had ever shed tears for him before. Perhaps only Iroh, but no one else, and it felt…nice.

He reached out to her face and gently wiped away her tear with his thumb.

“Thank you, Katara,” he said sincerely. “I don’t know what would become of me if I didn’t have such a great friend such as you in my life. You’re right, I should stop dwelling in the past and the what-ifs and look forward to the future.”

Katara gave a watery laughed as she wiped away another tear with her hand.

“Yeah, well, you’re welcome,” she sniffled.

She turned back to the painting and giggled.
“Aww! Tiny Zuko, you look so cute!” she cooed at the picture of the younger Zuko in a baby voice.

Zuko scowled and crossed his arms over his broad chest, making Katara laugh even more.

“But Big Zuko is cute too!” she chirped before clamping her hand over her mouth, her blue eyes widening.

She glanced at Zuko, who had a surprised look on his face before a grin spread on his lips, and she blushed.

“Why, thank you, Katara. I’m flattered.” Zuko chuckled as he grabbed his cup and took a sip of his tea.

Katara walked to her cabin to get some sleep. Momo glided silently beside her. The steel hall was silent and empty since everybody else had gone to sleep. Zuko told her they were arriving at the colony port the next morning and asked that she be rested for tomorrow. Katara blushed again in embarrassment.

_I can’t believe I actually admitted he was cute to his face! Well, I wouldn’t say cute...more like handsome and stunning..._ Katara thought dazedly before she shook her head.

She hummed softly as she walked silently to her room, already beginning to unbraid her hair. The bead on one of her hair loops fell on the metal floor with a soft ‘clink’. Momo landed beside it and looked up at the waterbender. Katara sighed and bent down to pick it up.

“Why are you avoiding Zuko?” Ty Lee’s voice sounded behind the slightly ajar door Katara was crouching in front of.

Katara quickly grabbed the bead and stood up to leave.

“He’s the one who has become so distant with me,” Mai’s monotone voice answered her acrobatic friend.

Katara frowned.
“What do you mean?” Ty Lee asked.

Katara bit her lip and looked at both ends of the empty hall. Eavesdropping was not right…

“Ever since his friends arrived, Zuko has less time with me. We barely even spend time together,” Mai’s dull voice continued.

Well, maybe if she sounded more emotional about it, it would be more believable that she cares, Katara sighed softly. She began to move away.

“It’s all that waterbender’s fault,” Mai accused coldly.

Katara stopped in her tracks and gaped.

My fault? She gritted her teeth.

“Katara?” Ty Lee asked. “What has she done? She’s a really nice person and friend. I remember one time at the South Pole she showed me how to snow fight and—”

Mai scoffed, completely cutting Ty Lee off.

“Ever since she came Zuko has spent a lot of time with her. You remember them saying they went to the city together? When they came back he seemed so…happy. But when he and I went out it seemed like his mind was somewhere else. He didn’t look around the jewelry shop we went to. He barely paid any attention to me! And then people would come up to him and ask after the ‘lovely Water Tribe maiden,’” Mai spat out.

Katara glared at the door and clenched her hands.

Well, it’s not my fault they like me better than a haughty noblewoman!
Mai continued, “I saw them walking in the Royal Palace Garden one day, talking and smiling like fools. And she had her arm around his!”

Katara rolled her eyes.

_It’s not my fault he likes to spend his time with me._

“So?” Ty Lee asked, her usual bubbly voice sounded annoyed. “You don’t like to go to the garden anyway!” she exclaimed, exasperated.

Katara imagined the acrobat flailing her flexible arms in the air.

“And you always complain when Zuko tries to do something nice for you,” she continued.

“You make it sound like it’s my fault,” Mai replied icily.

_Maybe because it is,_ Katara thought.

Something touched her shoulder. She jumped and turned her head slowly. She let out a relieved breath when she realized it was just Momo.

“Of course not, Mai!” Ty Lee exclaimed quickly. “I’m just saying that you shouldn’t blame Katara. She stood by him when they encountered Azula. She healed him when Azula struck him with lightning and now she’s helping him search for Princess Ursa. Zuko and Katara are really good friends and that’s it.”

_Yes, just friends,_ Katara thought with a frown as she felt her heart clench.

She heard Mai’s sigh as well as the sound of her feet as the dagger-thrower paced inside the room. Momo began to chirp as he pulled on Katara’s ear to get her attention. Katara quickly covered his mouth and shushed him softly.

“Did you hear something?” Mai asked suspiciously.
Katara closed her eyes and prayed to the spirits that the angry ex-assassin did not stab her with one of her sharp knives.

“I didn’t hear anything,” Ty Lee answered, “I think you need some sleep, Mai. Maybe a day at the spa in Ba Sing Se will help with your stress. Your aura is all muddy.”

Katara sighed and released her hold on Momo’s mouth.

“That’s not all, Ty Lee,” Mai said, ignoring Ty Lee’s concern, her voice turning hard, “Zuko has not been… intimate with me for a long time now.”

Katara blushed. Okay, now she really needed to leave. She did not want to know about Zuko’s sex life with other women.

Jealous? a voice asked in her head that sounded so much like Toph’s.

Of course not! It is none of my business what Zuko does, Katara huffed, surprised at the anger she felt.

“Really?” Ty Lee asked incredulously. “Zuko, whom the noblewomen claim is supposedly a sex god? How funny!” She laughed.

Sex god? Katara’s eyes widened and her cheeks flamed.

“This is serious, Ty Lee,” Mai’s cold voice cut in harshly. “The night he came from the prison tower with news about Ursa, I invited him to my room. Everything started out fine, but before we could actually do something he jumped away from my bed as if he did something wrong or saw something shocking. He told me he was sorry and that he was tired, and then he left without looking back.”

Katara could not suppress the smirk that appeared on her face.

Well, he was with me for a while…
“I think he has another woman somewhere. Probably a wild whore that knows how to please him,” Mai choked out.

Katara’s eyes widened in disbelief. How could Mai think like that of Zuko? He was the most honorable man she knew!

She heard Ty Lee gasp.

“How can you say that, Mai? Zuko would never betray you like that!”

“Well, he better not,” Mai’s gloomy voice threatened. “I love him too much to let him go…”

Katara quickly moved away from the door and walked down the empty steel corridor. The bright torches along the walls illuminated her path. She opened the door to her cabin and went inside, finally letting go of the squirming lemur. Momo chattered as he flew to the bed to groom his fur.

Katara removed her clothes and put on her nightgown. She opened the top drawer of the nightstand and retrieved her rose hairpin. Climbing into her comfortable cot beside Momo, she blew out the candle on her nightstand and lifted the blanket to her chest. Momo yawned and curled into a ball next to her pillow with a last chirp.

Stroking the hairpin, Katara narrowed her eyes. She could not help feeling angry with the Fire Nation noblewoman. And to think she wanted to be friends with her at one time.

How can Mai claim she loves Zuko when she thinks so poorly of him that she accuses him of cheating?

“No wonder he has grown distant. Not only is she cold and unemotional, she also has trust issues. And she’s blaming me! Ha!”

She turned to her side and watched the dark sky from the small window next to her bed.
If Zuko was becoming distant from Mai it was because she was not making him happy.

Zuko deserves someone better. Someone that would do the impossible to make him happy, Katara thought.

Yes, someone who would make him happy in everything. Katara blushed again at such a thought and looked down at her hairpin. So if Zuko had stopped sleeping with Mai then that meant Mai was not making him happy in bed either. Katara smirked and could not help feeling relieved.

Why? Jealous that he could be with someone else? again that voice that sounded so much like Toph taunted her.

I am not jealous! Zuko could have any woman as long as she makes him happy, Katara huffed.

Would it not be nice to be that woman? She was, after all, already trying to make him happy by helping him find his mother. Why not make him…happier?

Katara felt her face heat up even more and she pulled the covers over her head as if trying to drown out the voice. Katara shook her head violently and clenched the silver hairpin to her chest.

How could she even be having such thoughts? She certainly had never thought about such things before in her life! Besides, she was a virgin for Tui and La’s sake! She had no clue on how to… pleasure men, and Zuko was probably a very experienced man.

Zuko’s warm, muscular body covering hers surfaced in her mind. His hot breath tickling her face and making her body tingle. Katara blushed again and buried herself deeper into her blankets as strange and unfamiliar sensations surfaced in her body.

Such thoughts for a maiden were looked down upon in her tribe since their virtue was very important. Only married women were allowed to speak and think of such things. And there she was thinking such scandalous things about the Fire Lord of all people! Not Aang, her boyfriend of four years, but Zuko with the gloomy girlfriend. Katara frowned. What was wrong with her? Ever since she and Zuko had started spending time together and ever since he had caressed her face and her lips she could not stop thinking about him! Or was it way before that?

‘I’m sure your mother was a beautiful and caring woman as well,’ he had said softly.
‘How can you be so sure?’

‘Because I’m looking at her daughter.’

Touching her cheek where his warm hand had touched her skin, Katara smiled. Who would have thought the serious and sometimes cold Fire Lord could be so sweet and tender?

‘Peasant or not, you’re a very desirable woman,’ Zuko’s masculine voice surfaced in her head.

Katara smiled and caressed her hairpin softly. Did Zuko really think that men found her desirable? She was flattered by his compliment, and she was sure Aang did, but deep down she wished Zuko was the one who found her attractive. She mentally slapped herself.

Sighing, Katara placed her birthday gift on the nightstand and snuggled closer into her warm blanket. What was the point, really? Zuko had not only told her but Aang as well that he would never see her more than a friend. And that was how it was supposed to be. Right?

Katara clenched the blankets closer to herself. Maybe asking Zuko to allow her to come with him was not such a good idea.

Zuko closed his eyes as the cool wind ruffled his loose black hair. He had hid his fire crown in his travelling bag so he could journey without being recognized. Momo was curled up in a ball on his lap, seeking warmth. He wondered why the small little creature had become so attached to him.

The young firebender was half-listening to the chatter of the others as they flew on Appa above the lush land of the Earth Kingdom. They have been travelling for a few weeks after leaving the others in the colony. Haru was immediately sent to the first colony, Jee had departed to the Fire Nation with the documents Zuko had revised, and Iroh had left to Ba Sing Se with a tight smile as he shared a carriage with a very loud and enthusiastic young acrobat and a quiet and dull noblewoman.

The gang had picked up their old lifestyle from their days during the war, except this time they were not hiding from any Fire Nation soldiers with the weight of the world on their extremely young shoulders.
“Suki, are you feeling okay? You look a bit ill,” Sokka’s concerned voice made the others stop talking as Appa flew among the white clouds.

Zuko opened his eyes to look over at the couple that was sitting together. Suki’s skin had a green tint and she had her eyes squeezed shut. Frowning, Zuko sat up, making Momo stretch and yawn before settling back down.

“Yeah, I’m fine, Sokka.” Suki laughed weakly and rested her head on the warrior’s shoulder. “I think I ate something bad during lunch. Don’t worry, sweetie.”

Katara moved from her place beside Toph and sat down next to the Kyoshi Warrior. She placed the back of her hand on Suki’s forehead and frowned. Zuko noticed that Suki gave the waterbender a pleading look, which Katara seemed to understand.

“Aang,” Katara called to the Avatar sitting on Appa’s head, “I think we should find a place to settle in for the night.”

Aang turned around and gave her a bright smile.

“Sure thing, Katara,” he replied cheerfully and steered the flying bison to land.

As soon as Appa touched the ground, Katara helped Suki climb off the huge saddle before they quickly retreated behind the trees surrounding the clearing.

Zuko turned to Sokka, who had a worried expression on his face.

“Don’t worry, Sokka. I’m sure it’s nothing bad or your sister would have said something,” he said as he placed a reassuring hand on the Water Tribesman’s shoulder.

“Yeah, Snoozles.” Toph yawned, and summoning a small pillar of rock, she stepped onto it, lowering it down in order to stand firmly on the solid ground. “She just didn’t want to puke her guts out in front of her boyfriend.”

“Toph!” Aang chided, shaking his bald head.
“What? It’s true! And I don’t see why she should be embarrassed since Sokka does more disgusting stuff anyway,” Toph snickered.

“Hey!” Sokka protested and jumped from the saddle to pin a pointless glare at the blind earthbender.

Zuko suppressed a grin as he looked at the complaining warrior, a smirking earthbending master, and a concerned Avatar who was trying to stop them from insulting each other. Zuko knew Toph started it in order to get Sokka from worrying too much.

The young firebender glanced in the direction the two women had walked to. He hoped it was nothing serious.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Sitting before the cold campfire, Katara waited to start on dinner. She glanced over to where Suki was napping, her head resting on Sokka’s lap, her hair being caressed by her boyfriend. Katara was able to convince —with some difficulty—her overly concerned brother that Suki was fine. Of course, the real reason why Suki got sick was that something had upset her stomach due to her pregnancy. She frowned when she noticed that Suki was unconsciously covering her abdomen with her hands.

Katara sighed and shook her head. Suki needed to tell Sokka one of these days and soon. And how could her brother not notice? Suki was getting larger every day that passed. Sometimes she wondered how Sokka could be so clever and astute one moment and the next he was as stupid and clueless as a cow-chicken.

Momo landed on her shoulder and began to nuzzle her cheek.

“Don’t worry. You’ll get fed soon enough.” Katara laughed and scratched the lemur’s huge ears.

Appa groaned behind her and continued to munch on the green grass. Katara frowned as she looked at the empty cooking pot. They were just waiting for Aang and Zuko to show up from collecting firewood.

“Where are those two?” Toph complained loudly beside her. The little earthbender was lazily sprawled on the grass. “I’m starving here!”
Katara made a disgusted face as Toph began to pick the dirt from her nails.

“I’m sure they’ll be here soon,” the waterbender reassured her calmly, but she was getting impatient as well.

Toph sat up abruptly and cracked her knuckles.

“Finally!” she yelled impatiently, “Hurry the hell up before Sokka goes insane with hunger and tries to eat Momo!”

The little lemur screeched and hid under Katara’s long braid.

“What took you guys so long? Did you get lost?” Toph asked with a sardonic chortle. “It’s okay to admit it, it happens to some people.”

Zuko walked over to where Toph had cleared a spot with earthbending for the campfire and dumped a large pile of wood before he turned to scowl at a cheery Aang.
“No, we just got sidetracked,” he muttered darkly.

“What?” Aang said innocently, pulling out his puppy eyes. “I haven’t eaten kiwis for a long time! I just had to get them!”

Katara finally noticed that instead of wood the young monk was carrying a big load of ripe kiwifruits.

“Yeah, and you just had to get the ones at the top of a cliff,” Zuko grumbled.

With a shake of his head, the firebender began to pile the wood, and after adding some dry leaves, he stood up. Brushing the dirt from his hands, Zuko shot a small flame toward the woodpile, which instantly grew into a warm campfire.

“Gosh, Twinkletoes, make us all starve so you could indulge in your craving,” Toph spoke up with a displeased snort.

Aang ignored her and turned to Katara with a smile, but when she gave him a disappointed look, he frowned.

“I brought enough for everybody,” he added with another bright smile as he brought his full arms up to show the small green fruits. “I’ll just go wash them in the stream.”

Katara gave him a small nod as she placed the cooking pot over the fire. Zuko watched as Aang left the campsite for the small stream they had landed close to with the pile of fruits in his arms. After a quick glance at a yawning Toph, the young Fire Lord sat cross-legged beside Katara, giving her a smile which Katara quickly returned before she resumed her task of preparing everybody their meal.

Zuko had come to realize that staying away from Katara did him more wrong than good. He really could not stand being away from her, even if her presence sometimes affected him too much. But he figured that if he became too distant from her everybody would notice that something was up. Besides, he did not want Katara to think he did not enjoy her company.

“Sorry for taking too long, but I couldn’t drag Aang back to camp,” Zuko explained to the Katara laughed as she bent water into the pot.

“It’s really hard to get Aang moving once he finds something interesting,” she agreed with a small grin.

Zuko crossed his arms over his chest and nodded. Katara returned her attention to the pot and began to hum softly. After a moment of silence, the young firebender looked over to where the Water Tribe warrior and his sleeping girlfriend were resting. He had noticed that the Kyoshi warrior had grown larger, but since nobody had said anything, he dismissed it. Besides, he did not want to offend anyone.

He watched as Sokka gently caressed Suki’s short auburn hair, while the young woman’s head rested peacefully on his lap. Zuko looked away to stare at the red and orange flames of the small campfire. He somewhat wished he could share such innocent intimacy with someone such as his two friends did, but Mai would never behave so warmly with him and he was uncomfortable with public displays of affection.

Mentally shaking his head of such inane wishes, Zuko held back a sigh as he recalled the moment he bid farewell to his girlfriend as he prepared to leave with the gang. He had tried to talk to her before he left, but she only responded in clipped tones, not even bothering to look at him. He knew she was still upset about that night he suddenly left her room, but there was nothing he could do about it, so he said farewell and climbed on Appa with a guilty feeling. But once he settled on Appa’s saddle, Katara began to talk to him and he completely forgot his problems with his girlfriend and focused on the moment he would find his mother.

Zuko looked over to the waterbender who continued to hum softly. He watched Katara add the pieces of meat Sokka had hunted and Zuko had helped cut up into the boiling water. She sliced some vegetables and speared them on some sticks to grill over the fire for the vegetarian monk. Then she added the rest of the vegetables and some seasoning into the pot before stirring the hot stew. Zuko inhaled the delicious aroma and smiled. He remembered when Katara cooked the meals as they all traveled together at the end of the hundred-year war and now, after eating too much extravagant foods at the palace, Zuko appreciated Katara’s simple but appetizing cooking.

Not only was she a wonderful cook, but she also mended torn clothes, healed small wounds, and cured small colds. She was not like the women from the Fire Nation Court he was so accustomed to. While they were fragile and weak, cold and petty, Katara was strong, caring, and smart—albeit stubborn—all while still having feminine charm.
The young Fire Lord watched as the waterbender hummed a sweet tune while she brought out cheese and bread from the bag of food supplies. Katara sliced the bread and cheese into pieces and placed them on plates. Then she returned her attention to the stew and began to stir the pot once again. She picked up the wooden spoon, blew on it softly, and took a small sip. She frowned, dipped her fingers into the small bag of salt next to her and sprinkled some into the stew, stirring once more. She brought the spoon to her mouth and took another tiny sip.

Zuko watched as a pleased smile appeared on her face before she licked her lips. Mesmerized, Zuko swallowed as he watched her pink tongue glide over her moist, plump lower lip. Unconsciously, Zuko licked his own lips as he continued to stare at her mouth, wishing it were his lips her wet appendage was gliding over.

He blinked when Momo suddenly landed on his lap, looking up at him with his bulging-green eyes. Zuko felt himself flush for letting his thoughts wander off once more after he promised himself he wouldn’t do it again. He stared down at the small animal that had interrupted his small fantasy with a raised eyebrow.

Momo returned the stare for a minute before he yawned, stretched, and curled into a ball on the firebender’s lap. Zuko scowled before he looked up when he heard Katara giggle.

“He likes to sleep in warm places,” she said with a grin.

Zuko snorted and once again crossed his arms over his chest.

“I am not anybody’s bed-warmer,” he growled out lowly, but he scratched behind Momo’s bat-like ears.

Katara giggled again and resumed getting dinner ready. She noticed Toph sit up again with a mischievous grin and she frowned.

“Yeah, that’s because you’re the one with bed-warmer,” Toph commented slyly and grinned when she felt the waterbender’s annoyance.

Katara felt her temper flare at Toph’s innuendo before she quickly snuffed it out. Zuko’s eyes widened before he sneaked a panicked glance at the waterbender. But her expression was uncharacteristically blank, making Zuko wonder if he should be relieved or disappointed.
He turned to glare at the earthbender before replying lowly, “I do believe that is none of your business.”

“Yeah, you’re right. I don’t wanna know how you keep warm at night,” Toph replied with a chortle.

Katara scowled down at the small knife in her hand and began to chop the cheese with more force than necessary.

Before Zuko could retort, Aang returned with freshly-washed kiwis. He dumped them all inside a bag except for one, and sat down next to Katara. He gave her a wide smile.

“Is dinner ready?” he asked, taking a huge bite of the kiwifruit.

“Yes,” Katara replied and smiled back at him, causing Zuko to look away.

“Is the food ready?” Sokka complained once Suki woke up.

Katara rolled her eyes before repeating the answer.

Dinner went well as they talked while they ate their small meal. They all enjoyed the cool night air as the moon’s soft glow illuminated the leaves on the various trees surrounding their little camp. That is, all except Zuko.

Said firebender sat brooding silently as he glared at Aang who had Katara’s attention all to himself. Zuko stabbed at his food angrily as he listened to Katara laugh at whatever the young boy was saying. He wanted to talk to Katara as well, but ever the incident on the ship it seemed like Aang was hogging her to himself even more than usual.

“What’s the matter, Sparky?” a grinning Toph inquired in a low, innocent voice for only him to hear.

“Nothing,” Zuko lied with a clenched jaw.

He glanced once more to them before he caught Katara’s eye. She smiled at him, but before she could say something, Aang demanded her attention once again. Zuko suppressed a growl before he mentally slapped himself.

Stop this nonsense at once! he ordered himself. You’re acting like a foolish child! he continued to scold himself.

He needed a distraction. Setting aside his plate, Zuko retrieved his travelling bag, and after rummaging around for a moment, pulled out his map. Unrolling it, he scanned the map of the Earth Kingdom continent carefully. According to the map, they would be arriving in the Abandoned Fort in a few days. Riding on a flying sky-bison made the trip much shorter.

“How much farther is it?” Toph asked with a loud yawn.

“A few more days,” Zuko replied without looking up from the scroll.

A few more days and he will be reunited with his mother…or not.

No. I have to stop thinking of the what-ifs just like I told Katara I would, Zuko mentally reminded himself.

“Really?” Katara asked with a smile.

Finally disengaging herself from Aang’s interesting, but endless talk, she stood up and sat next to Zuko. She peered over at the unfurled map on Zuko’s lap with curiosity.

Zuko could not help feeling smug that he had finally gained Katara’s attention for himself.

“Yes,” he replied to her with a smile. He pointed to a spot in the middle of the map. “This is where we are at the moment and the Abandoned Fort is over here,” he explained to her, gliding a finger to another spot on the light brown-colored map.

Katara noticed that everywhere else on the map was colored green, except for a few red spots near the western coast, but the spot where Zuko’s long finger rested on was unmarked.
“We will arrive in a few more days,” Zuko repeated with a sigh.

He felt his heart skip a beat as Katara grabbed his hand and gave it a light squeeze. He gave her a small, grateful smile.

“Let me see,” Aang interrupted gruffly.

Katara quickly removed her hand and both looked away.

Aang grabbed the map and scanned it with a frown before a huge smile appeared on his young face.

“Oh look!” he shouted as he pointed to a place southwest of the unmarked spot. When the rest gave him puzzled stares, he smiled.

“It’s where the Cave of Two Lovers is!” he cried out gleefully.

Katara’s eyes widened in surprise and she blushed at the memory of what had happened there.

“Oh, don’t remind me of that horrible day!” Sokka cried out dramatically and raised his fists to the night sky above.

Zuko, Toph, and Suki gave him blank stares.

“Oh, yea, I guess the Ember Island Players forgot that part all those years ago, huh?” Sokka remarked with a grin.

Sokka and Aang spent the next few hours explaining how the three of them had no choice but to travel through the cave during the war.

“I was stuck with those annoying so-called musicians,” Sokka continued with a whine. “It’s also where I first saw a badger-mole,” he added randomly.
Aang turned to Katara with a knowing smile.

“It’s also where Katara and I first kissed,” he said with a soft sigh.

Everyone was startled when the campfire suddenly blazed up furiously, before it quickly settled down again. Momo screeched and jumped onto Appa’s massive head.

Zuko clenched his hands in order to calm his sudden anger. What was wrong with him?

Katara blushed again and sneaked a look at Zuko, whose face was more unreadable and colder than ever before. She frowned at herself. Why did she care what Zuko thought?

“You what?” Sokka croaked as he spit out a piece of meat he had been choking on. He turned angrily at Aang. “You kissed my baby sister in a dark cave while I was away? I thought I could trust you!”

“Sokka!” Katara yelled in embarrassment. “It was just one small kiss! And we only did it because it was the only thing we could think of to get us out of the cave!” she shouted.

She did not notice Aang’s hurt expression as she glared at her angry brother. Seriously, what was wrong with him? Aang had been a twelve-year old boy! What did Sokka think he could have done to her?

“How can a kiss help someone get out of a cave?” Zuko asked darkly as he glared at the fire.

Making sure the fire was normal again, Momo jumped onto the firebender’s lap and curled into a ball once more.

Suki raised an eyebrow at Zuko’s hard tone. Was it just her or was the young Fire Lord…jealous? She noticed the others did not seem to notice, but she did see Toph grinning.

“Uh…because it’s what it said in the Poem of Two Lovers,” Katara replied, suddenly feeling nervous.

She did not understand why she needed to explain and justify her behavior. Maybe it was because she did not want them to think she went around kissing boys in dark, isolated places. Especially not Zuko. She wouldn’t be able to bear him thinking badly of her.

Zuko found himself sighing in relief.

“I understand now. Uncle told me the legend of the two lovers, Oma and Shu. And how the war raging between their villages separated them, and how supposedly love can lead you to the other side of the cave.”

Sokka relaxed as well, but he grumbled when he sat next to Suki. He would not be able to face his father if Katara’s honor was damaged, though he finally admitted to himself that Aang had been too young for that.

“What do you mean ‘supposedly’, huh?” Aang asked with a smirk as he wrapped an arm around Katara’s shoulders. “It’s true! When Katara and I kissed, the cave lit up with small glowing gems that led us outside. Right, Katara?” He gave her a small peck on the cheek.

“Um…well…actually,” Katara stuttered.

“Hey, Katara,” Suki spoke up. “Are there any seconds?” she asked innocently, holding up her empty plate.

Katara silently thanked her pregnant Kyoshi friend for the interruption.

“Of course, Suki,” she replied with a grateful smile, taking the plate and filling it with more stew.

Zuko forced his facial expression to remain impassive as Aang placed his arm around Katara again after she sat back down. Why did it affect him so much anyway? Why was it that every time the airbender kissed or hugged Katara he felt like breaking something? Mainly Aang. Or setting something on fire? Or gathering Katara into his arms for that matter? He knew they loved each other, or that’s what he thought, so why did he feel so angry?
Zuko’s eyes widened as a thought entered his head. What if…what if he was…jealous…?

Mentally shaking his head at what he thought was an absurdity, the young lord returned to study the Earth Kingdom map with a sleeping Momo on his lap and stubbornly refused to think about the strange feelings surfacing within him.
Surprising Findings

Katara gazed at the picturesque scenery below her as the gang flew over the mountains, countless trees, meadows, and rivers. She smiled as her half-pulled up hair whipped around her as the soft wind rushed by them. She noticed the changes that nature was bringing to indicate that summer had ended and fall had arrived. The trees’ leaves were now gold, red, and brown instead of their usual green. The Earth Kingdom forest floor was now painted with patches of the changed, colorful leaves. Katara looked up as the sound of honking duck-geese flying to a warmer climate resonated around them.

Katara’s smile widened. Soon it would be winter, her favorite time of the year. She looked at Sokka and Suki and wondered if they would be able to return to the Southern Water Tribe for the Winter Solstice Festival. She glanced at Suki’s stomach and shook her head softly. Sokka needed to know they were going to have a child and soon. She grimaced. She hoped her grandmother would be joyous when she heard the news.

The waterbender turned to look toward the back of Appa’s saddle where Zuko sat in a lotus position, breathing evenly with his eyes closed, his hands resting on his knees. According to the map, Zuko had informed them, they would be arriving at the Abandoned Fort around noon. Then he had proceeded in describing what his mother looked like. She wondered why he did not show the others the painting of his younger self with his mother, but she supposed it was something too personal for him.

Even though to everyone else Zuko seemed calm and collected, Katara knew he was far from it. She closed her eyes as she remembered her conversation with Zuko from the previous night...

She woke up in the middle of the night to drink some water from her water skin. When she turned to rest on her other side, she noticed someone sitting near the campfire. Even though the person was turned away from her, she knew it was Zuko by the way he sat, his back ramrod-straight, broad shoulders squared.

Katara stood up from her warm bedding and wrapped her blanket around herself to keep her warm from the fall chill. She quietly walked over to the campfire and sat down next to the silent firebender.

‘Sokka’s snores aren’t that loud, you know,’ she teased with a sleepy smile.

She saw Zuko’s lips twitch into a small smile before it disappeared. Katara frowned and scooted closer to inspect his solemn face.
'Zuko, what’s wrong? Don’t tell me you have a stomachache from what I made for dinner,’ she said in another attempt at a joke.

Zuko looked at her in alarm.

‘No! Of course not! I always enjoy what you cook.’

Katara blushed at his words before she gave a soft giggle so as not to wake the others up.

‘If you say so,’ she replied with a tiny shrug. ‘So, if it’s not Sokka’s snoring or my cooking, then what’s keeping you up this time of night?’

She saw his face darken for a moment before he coolly replied.

‘It’s nothing.’

She rolled her eyes at his stubbornness before she noticed a small scroll by his crossed legs and recognized it as the painting of his mother and him. Her eyes softened in understanding. He was still having doubts.

‘We’ll find Lady Ursa tomorrow, Zuko. And she will be happy to see you,’ she assured him. She placed her small hand in his warm, larger one. She felt him squeeze her hand as he gave her a nod.

‘And then you will have to admit that I’m always right,’ she added with a smirk, hoping to lighten his mood.

Zuko scoffed playfully and snorted.

‘Alright, you don’t have to admit it,’ she grumbled before she smiled, ‘But you will have to do something for me.’
Zuko seemed to think over what she said before he asked, ‘Like what?’

Katara tapped her chin with a finger pensively.

‘Not sure yet, but I’ll think of something eventually,’ she teased.

She was surprised when Zuko shrugged and said, ‘Alright.’

She couldn’t believe it! She was able to make the most powerful man in the world agree to do whatever she wanted! Even if just once.

‘Eh…um…okay then,’ Katara stammered. ‘Well, tomorrow’s a big day, so get some sleep.’

She smiled. She watched as he finally turned to fully look at her with a small smile.

‘Thanks, Katara…’

Katara opened her eyes as she came out of her memories and smiled as she glanced at Zuko once again.

“We’re almost there,” Aang called out from where he sat on Appa’s head.

Zuko opened his eyes and sat up straighter, anticipation and apprehension churning within him.

“Land low where Appa won’t be spotted. Remember this place is dangerous and who knows what could happen if they knew the Avatar and the Fire Lord were coming,” Zuko’s baritone voice commanded.

Aang nodded in understanding and began to search for a place to land far away from curious eyes. Zuko leaned against the side of the saddle and closed his eyes again as he tried to meditate and control his sudden anxiety.
A few minutes later, Appa landed among some trees as quietly as a ten-ton beast was capable. The passengers quickly dismounted and looked around the thick forest, while dried fall leaves crunched beneath their feet. Sokka yawned and stretched his muscles theatrically, rotating his arms over his head. Suki shook her head at him and smiled when he gave her a goofy grin.

“Okay, Appa, take a break. We’ll be back soon,” Aang said as he hugged his huge friend’s head.

Appa grunted and licked his young friend and master’s face. Aang laughed.

“You stay here, okay, Momo?”

Momo chirped from his shoulder and landed on Appa’s head.

“Let us go,” Zuko said as he turned around and led the way.

The gang walked silently along a path through the forest for a few minutes before the trees began to thin out. Zuko stopped and let out a shaky breath. What if his mother was not there? He noticed Katara stand beside him with a reassuring smile. He remembered everything she had told him and he felt his confidence rise. He lifted his chin and squared his shoulders.

Zuko pulled up his dark, red hood to hide his identifiable scar before he gave a small nod. Aang placed a straw hat on his tattooed head and grinned. The gang emerged from the trees and stopped at the entrance of the almost hidden village.

“What a dump,” Sokka remarked. His comment earned him two slaps on the back of his head by his girlfriend and his sister.

Zuko could not have agreed more. The village was spread in a large clearing. There were hundreds of houses and huts scattered randomly in every direction. They were old, dirty, and falling apart. Many looked like they were ready to collapse the second a butterfly landed on their roofs. They could hear shouts, curses, and screams coming from the place that caused unpleasant shivers to run through them. A foul stench permeated the air ahead of them, making them grimace and wrinkle their noses.

On top of a hill in the middle of the village stood the once glorious fort that now seemed to be just as ugly as the houses that surrounded it. The fort loomed ominously over the village while dark shadows engulfed it from every angle, even though the sun was high in the sky.

“I think it’s best if we all split up and meet here before sunset,” Sokka suggested after the gang had remained silent for a while, taking in the distasteful sight before them.

“Remember not to say Fire Lord Zuko is looking for her. If you do find out where my mother is, return to the edge of the forest near the entrance,” Zuko spoke and nodded at the cluster of trees behind them, “and wait until the rest of us arrive. And then I will talk to her.”

Everyone nodded that they understood.

“Sokka, stay with Suki,” Katara spoke up as she turned to her older brother. “She…uh…feels a bit ill because of something she ate.” She did not want a pregnant Suki to walk all by herself in this village in her condition.

Sokka wrapped his arm around Suki and grinned. Who was he to complain?

When the others discussed which way each was to go, Zuko turned to Katara and gently took her hand.

“This place is dangerous. Be careful, Katara,” he said softly so only she could hear his concerned voice. He gently squeezed her hand.

Katara blushed at the touch of his hand and was grateful for his concern. She gave him a small squeeze in return.

“Don’t worry Zuko. I’ll be fine. Waterbending master, you know,” she reminded him and smiled.

Zuko nodded.

“I know,” he replied quietly before he released her hand. But he could not stop feeling anxious over finding his mother and concerned for her.
He turned back to the entrance.

“Let’s go then. Hopefully the spirits will be willing to aid us.”

The gang walked confidently forward and entered the Abandoned Fort.

Aang walked swiftly along the dirty, crooked streets, enduring rude passersby shoving him aside, not bothering to listen to his questions. Aang looked at every woman he came across, but not one fit the description of Zuko’s missing mother. He asked every person that passed him if they knew where a woman named Ursa lived, but they all gave him hard and confused glares. It seemed that nobody knew anyone with that name.

Aang watched as the corrupted city played before his gray eyes. There were fights at every turn, while drunks littered the streets even at the early time of day, and women with heavy makeup and extremely revealing clothes positioned themselves in very suggestive postures outside buildings with red lanterns hanging outside the doors.

The young Avatar frowned as he continued to walk down the streets. When he defeated Ozai, he thought everything would turn peaceful and nice. Cities and villages would be thriving and everybody would be happy and merry. But as he looked around himself he realized he was sadly mistaken and he felt guilty.

Sokka and Suki walked slowly through what seemed like the town marketplace. They could hear merchants shouting for customers while said customers argued for better bargains. There would be an occasional skirmish when a merchant would find a thief trying to weasel his way out of the crowds.

At first, Sokka went to see if he could buy something to eat at the food stalls for his girlfriend—and of course for himself—while he investigated on the whereabouts of his friend’s mother. He was utterly disappointed to find that not only was the food disgusting and barely edible, but nobody knew who Ursa was.

Suki clung onto Sokka’s arm as two men began to throw punches and curses at each other right in front of them. She instinctively shielded her body behind Sokka’s, protecting her swollen stomach. Sokka glared at the men as he led his beloved away from the brutes. He was feeling manly protecting her, which caused him to miss the strangeness of Suki hiding behind him instead of pulling out her iron fans in a defensive stance.
The people were rude and foul and Sokka had to resist the urge to gather Suki in his arms and run back to their meeting place in order to get away from the unpleasant village. But they had promised to help Zuko, and so, they continued on their exploration, hoping that the others were luckier in their search than they were.

Toph landed a heavy blow right on the man’s gut with a rock-covered fist. The man groaned painfully and fell into a heap on the floor. Toph turned her foggy eyes upon the other men who lay moaning in pain on the ground around her small frame.

“Next time I won’t be merciful you bastards!” Toph growled and purposefully stomped upon the injured men as she walked away.

The crown that had been watching the spectacle between half a dozen men and a small young woman quickly scattered away as the angry and obviously strong earthbender moved in their direction.

She just asked if they knew where Ursa was and those idiots acted as if she asked if they wanted to have a good time in an alley or something!

“Assholes,” she muttered.

Toph stomped around the place, demanding to know where Ursa lived. Some were so frightened by her that they peed in their pants, causing Toph to wrinkle her delicate nose in disgust. But by the vibrations everyone gave off, they all told the truth when they said they knew no one with that name.

Strange, Toph thought as she rubbed her chin.

She wondered if the others had better luck. She shoved another group of leering men from her path with two boulders. Zuko owed her big time.
“Excuse me, can you tell me where a woman by the name of Ursa lives?” Katara asked politely.

“Ursa?” the messy-looking woman with rotten teeth asked. She looked Katara over and scowled at the beautiful young stranger.

“I’ve heard no such name, so quit wasting my time, girl!” she snapped and roughly brushed past the offended waterbender.

“Well!” Katara groused as she flipped her hair over her shoulder. “I should have expected such rudeness from such a place!” She spun on her heel and stomped angrily away.

She looked around herself to see if she could spot Lady Ursa, but instead, she took in the unpleasant sight of the village. The small houses were falling apart, garbage was scattered on the streets, and people rushed or strolled the streets aimlessly. Katara frowned, unable to help feeling the urge to help these people, but then she remembered that these people were not being mistreated by a cruel governor or king. They were outcasts because they had decided to lead a life of crime and dishonor.

Shaking her head and straightening herself up, Katara continued on her search for Princess Ursa. She would not let anything stop her from reaching her goal. She promised to help make Zuko happy and finding his mother was the only thing that was going to make that happen. And even though it seemed that no one had any idea who Ursa was, thus making it seem hopeless, she was not going to give up that easily.

“Hey there, girlie,” a man’s rough voice broke through her thoughts. “Wat’s a purdy lil’ thing like ye doin’ walking all by ‘er lonesome?”

Katara looked up to see two dirty and disheveled men before her. The one she assumed had spoken to her was short, buff, and broad. He was wearing a bright red sleeveless shirt that showed his over exaggerated muscles that were covered with tattoos of disturbing images. He had coarse, black hair that reached his shoulders and a messy, black beard that looked more like a rat’s nest. The other one was tall and lanky with a bald spot reaching from his temples to the crown of his large head. When he snickered, Katara saw that he was missing his two front teeth.

Katara gave them an annoyed and disinterested look before she turned around and began to walk in a different direction.
“Hey now,” the bearded one chuckled darkly. “We only want ta get ta know ya better.” The other one laughed as both men followed after the young woman.

Katara clenched her hands and narrowed her blue eyes, but she continued on her way without giving them a second glance. She saw some of the people walking along the street scurry away, murmuring to each other while giving her sympathetic looks.

Suddenly, her path was blocked by the burly, tattooed man. Katara stopped herself from bumping into him and thus touching the rogue. She heard the other one snicker behind her. Katara stared at the man’s filthy face before her and pinned him with a hard glare. She discreetly moved her hand to her hip to uncork her water skin. She suppressed a shudder of disgust as the man eyed her up slowly. She wanted nothing more than to hide her body from their leering looks.

“Move away and leave me alone or else I will have to hurt you,” she threatened.

Both men barked out a laugh, amusement in their ugly, dark eyes.

“Will ya lookie here?” the gangly one said. “We got ourse’ve a fiery one. We don’t git those ‘round ’ere an’ more.”

Katara gasped and fear gripped her before she shook her head. No, she will not let these men touch her. Steeling her nerves, Katara growled lowly and seethed.

“I have more important things to do than to deal with you two. Get away from me. Now,” she gritted out.

The men stopped laughing at the death tone in the petite woman’s voice they were surrounding before the tattooed man began to chuckle again.

“Oh, we’ll enjoy this,” he laughed raucously towards his partner.

He reached out to grab Katara’s arm, but he was immediately stopped by a smack on the side of his face.
“Ow! Shit! Wat da fuck?” the man cursed and turned to the side, rubbing his face as he glared at whoever had dared to throw something at him, but instead found nothing. When he returned his attention to the woman, he gaped.

Katara had assumed her fighting stance, a water whip coiling around her, her eyes blazing with anger and revulsion.

“Touch me and you’ll regret it!” she threatened harshly. Now she understood why Zuko had been concerned.

She veered to the side and whipped the other man’s back who was trying to grab her by surprise. The man yelped as he crashed to the hard dirt floor, uttering a string of curses as he scrambled to his feet.

“I suggest you leave now before you’re even more humiliated.” She smirked. A small crowd had gathered and was cheering her on.

The short, bearded man growled and cursed. He pulled a knife from his pocket and charged at her. Katara sidestepped him, slashing the water whip across his back. The man stumbled before he turned to face her with angry eyes.

“Why ya little bitch! I was gonna try ta be gentle with ya, but now I’m gonna—”

“Let the girl be and depart immediately,” a soft feminine voice broke through the tension.

Katara saw both men stiffen visibly, the thin one gulped loudly. She turned in the direction she had heard the voice come from. A tall woman was standing to the side, silently and gracefully. She was wearing a long black cloak, the dark hood covering her face. Under her left arm she carried a basket filled with fruits and vegetables and a bow and a quiver of arrows were strapped on her right shoulder. Katara furrowed her eyebrows. There was something about this strange woman, but she could not put her finger on what.

“Y-yes, Lady Xiu!” both men stuttered as they scrambled to their feet and ran as if tiger-armadillos were chasing at their heels.

Katara’s tensed body relaxed.
“You are not from around here,” the woman addressed Katara matter-of-factly. “Most women tremble in fear when they encounter those two. I suggest you leave this place,” she said with a calm and gentle voice.

Katara just stared dumbly as the woman turned to leave, her black cloak swooshing behind her, before the waterbender snapped to her senses.

“Wait!” she called, but the woman was already out of sight.

“You’re lucky Lady Xiu came before something bad happened. Those men are bad,” a little girl with small pigtails on her head spoke beside Katara and peered worriedly at the older woman.

Katara looked down and smiled.

“Hello. And what’s your name, sweetie?” she asked gently, squatting down so she could be on eye level with the child.

The little girl beamed at being referred to as ‘sweetie’.

“My name is Li Ming,” she giggled joyfully and poked the shiny, blue necklace on the pretty woman’s neck.

“What a pretty name.” Katara smiled, making the little girl blush before grinning at her. “Are you here by yourself?” she asked, frowning.

Just then a woman with a long nose and black teeth approached them along with a limping old woman with a cane.

“Li Ming! How many times do I have to tell you not to run away from me?” the long nosed woman chided.

“You know how your grandma gets worried,” the stooped one scolded.
“I just wanted to see if the pretty lady was okay,” the little girl pouted.

Katara stood up and looked at the women.

“Um…who is Lady Xiu? Why does she have such power that she almost had those two dangerous men crying?” Katara asked curiously. Something about the way the woman carried herself intrigued her.

Both women squinted at her and frowned.

“Lady Xiu has been here for years and has gained the respect of many people, but she lives by herself on the outskirts of the village. Before she came many people died of diseases, illnesses, or wounds since nobody cared about the lives of others but their own. Lady Xiu was different. She helped cure many people by using different kinds of plants and herbs,” the one with the long nose said.

The older one with the cane nodded as she began to talk.

“Even though she is kind and gentle, she does not like cruelty shown before her and could be quite intimidating. She has threatened that her herbs can kill as well as heal, and nobody wants to get on the bad side of Lady Xiu or else find themselves poisoned with no one to help them.”

“Oh,” Katara simply said. It was hard imagining that woman as a killer.

A little boy holding his mother’s hand walked passed them and Katara remembered what she was there for in the first place.

“Can you please tell me where I can find a woman named Ursa?” Katara asked politely. She hoped they knew.

Li Ming frowned and scratched her small, dirty head.
“Ursa…Ursa?” the oldest one muttered as she stomped her cane on the ground as she thought. “No, I haven’t heard that name around here. You?” she asked the other one.

“No, sorry,” the little girl’s grandmother replied.

Katara’s shoulders slumped and her brow creased into a disappointed frown. She looked up at the sun and realized she only had a few hours left before she had to meet with the gang. She couldn’t go back empty handed. She wanted to be the one to bring news about Lady Ursa to Zuko.

“Thank you,” she sighed.

She smiled down at Li Ming who gave her a toothy grin before she skipped away with the old women following behind her at a slower pace. Katara sighed again as she continued with her zealous search.

After finding nothing, Katara decided to go back to the meeting place and wait for the others. Perhaps somebody else found out something.

She suddenly stopped in her tracks, hid behind the dirty wall of a house, and peered around. She spotted the same woman from before. The woman was kneeling before a little boy who was crying. The lady patted the boy’s head and Katara saw her smile beneath her hood. Katara watched as the young boy sniffled before he smiled back and took the apples the woman offered him. The woman stood up and the boy skipped back inside his home.

Katara watched as the boy’s mother came out of the house and bowed gratefully to the taller woman. Looking at the disheveled way the mother and child looked, Katara guessed Lady Xiu had helped them with a meal.

The mysterious woman nodded and moved away silently, walking to the edge of the village and into the forest. Katara bit her lip and looked around herself. She slid from the shadows and followed silently after the hooded woman. Lady Xiu seemed to be a healer, perhaps she knew who Ursa was and where she was living.

Katara watched as the woman disappeared into the foliage, the leaves rustling as the wind blew by. Katara ran to catch up with the woman, but upon entering the forest, she found herself completely alone.
Zuko narrowed his eyes and grasped the hilts of his broadswords on his right hip as another of the village women tried to cling onto him. The woman was short with a tousled, dull black bun on her head. She had heavy green eye shadow, dark pink blush on her chunky cheeks, and her lips were painted bright red. She was wearing a short, tight green dress. The top of her dress was partially opened, showing off her cleavage. Zuko turned away in disgust.

“Hey there, handsome,” the heavily perfumed woman cooed.

Zuko scrunched his nose as her cheap perfume assaulted his senses.

“How about we get out of here and go into my room?” she asked huskily as she pressed herself closer to the tall hooded man and smiled seductively.

Zuko frowned beneath his hood in revulsion. He had used brothels before during his search for the Avatar, but those brothels were prestigious, elegant, and for the wealthy. The women were respectful and clean—to a certain point.

But since he had stepped foot into the Abandoned Fort, the women that had been trying to get his attention, his money, and into his pants—just like the one rubbing herself on him was at the moment—were rude, vile, and they smelled too much of sweat and sex.

“I do not have time to waste on you,” Zuko said emotionlessly. He grabbed her arm with his free hand and pulled her away from his person.

The woman gasped in indignation at his cold tone before she smiled again. All the working girls in the village were vying for this mysterious man’s companionship and she was determined to be the one to seduce him and gloat about it afterwards, as well as enjoy the reward he would likely give her for her services.

“Playing hard to get, now are you?” She giggled and batted her long, fake eyelashes, causing Zuko to roll his eyes. “I’m sure I’ll make it worth your while,” she whispered throatily.

Zuko snorted and smirked.

“I highly doubt that,” he replied without glancing her way and turned around to continue on his search for his mother.
As soon as he walked a few steps, he was once again detained by another of the loose women. Unlike the other one, this one was very tall and thin, with long black hair that reached to her calves. She was wearing a long red dress with the same revealing top as the other prostitute. Her heavy makeup was red and black.

“Lan is not good enough for a man such as you,” the other woman crooned.

Zuko opened his mouth to snap at her when he felt his other arm being pulled.

“Oh, and I suppose you’re good enough, Mei?” the previous woman with the messy bun hissed and tightened her hold on Zuko’s arm.

“Of course,” Mei replied haughtily and tugged onto the young man’s other arm.

Lan narrowed her eyes and began to throw insults at Mei who returned them with equal fervor.

Zuko gritted his teeth and breathed hard in order to control his temper. He was not going to be caught in a catfight between two whores.

“Release me this instant and remove yourselves from my presence,” Zuko ordered harshly.

Both bickering women stopped arguing to look at the tall man whose hood hid his face in shadows. They looked at each other in surprise and confusion. Never had a man ever refused to spend their time and money on them, and almost all of them enjoyed being fought over. Narrowing their eyes at each other, both were determined to succeed in this…challenge.

“Why are you making this so difficult, handsome?” Mei teased and raked her sharp and long, black nails on his arm.

“Or will you prefer to spend your time with both of us?” Lan laughed and raised her very thin eyebrows suggestively.
“Did you not understand what I said? Both of your presences annoy me. Release me. Now,” Zuko growled lowly as his temper began to slip from his control.

He was supposed to be looking for his mother and these whores were wasting his time. Zuko roughly pulled away from their grasp and lifted his head high enough so his angry face could be seen.

Both women gasped in horror when they noticed the large scar marring the left side of the man’s face. Zuko watched as they backed away, their faces turning from shock to disgust in an instant. Unlike before where they were determined to get him to bed, both women now wanted nothing to do with the disfigured man. With one last look of revulsion, they turned around and quickly walked away.

Zuko understood their reaction since he had seen so many react the same way many times before, but that did not mean it did not hurt. The look of shock, horror, disgust, and worst of all, pity. He hated it.

‘Zuko you are not a monster! I don’t ever want to hear you refer to yourself as such!’

Katara did not see him like that, she treated him with friendship and kindness. She had even touched his scar gently, multiple times, more than anybody else had. Not that he would have allowed others to.

‘Big Zuko is cute too!’ Katara’s laughing but truthful voice sounded in his head. Zuko flushed at the memory. He could not believe that she thought him as…well…cute.

Zuko squared his shoulders, lifted his head high, and set his jaw in determination. Katara and Iroh, as well as his other friends, accepted him as he was and that was more than enough for him. Pulling his hood closer to his face, Zuko continued on his lonely way. Perhaps the women will leave him alone once Lan and Mei spread the news about their ‘shocking’ discovery.

The young Fire Lord scanned his surroundings carefully, but there was no sign of his mother anywhere. He did not know whether to feel disappointed that he had not found her or relieved that his mother did not live in such a place.

He walked over to a merchant who was bellowing loudly in order to attract customers. Zuko looked at the merchandise and resisted the urge to gag. The fish and vegetables were spoiling and flies were everywhere, leaving no empty spots on the food. Taking shallow breaths so as not to inhale the stench too much, Zuko addressed the man firmly.

“Ursa?” the short, grimy man asked while poking his hairy ear. He pulled his finger out and flicked the earwax away.

Zuko grimaced and looked away in disgust.

“Oh, I know where she is!” the man exclaimed.

Zuko looked back and his heart raced in anticipation. Finally he was going to see her!

“Oh, no, wait. Her name is Urla and she’s sixty-years-old.” The merchant scratched his head.

Zuko balled his hands and felt his heart clench painfully at the disappointment. Nodding his head once at the man, Zuko moved away from the rotting food stall and made his way through the village. Judging by the energy of the sun, Zuko knew it was time to head back to the gang. Turning on his heels, Zuko made his return to the entrance of the village where the meeting place was to be held. Maybe the others had better news.

Two men, one tall and bald and the other short and covered in tattoos, were walking ahead of him. One had a nasty bruise on the side of his face and the other one was limping. He noticed that as the men passed the people quickly moved out of their way.

“Do ya think we would’ve gotten da gurl had Lady Xiu not interrupted us?” the lanky one asked and rubbed his back.

“I dunno,” the burly one growled. “But da gurl was a beauty, wasn’t she? Too bad we didn’t git ta enjoy ‘er.” The man laughed lewdly.

Zuko narrowed his eyes and wished he could teach these men a thing or two about honor.

Vile, dishonorable bastards, Zuko growled mentally. However, the next words that came out of the man’s filthy mouth caused Zuko to stop dead in his tracks.
“Did ya see those big, blue eyes? Oh, and dat long mass of brown hair! And what da ya say ‘bout those nice lips on ‘er pretty face?” Both men whistled and laughed.

Zuko felt his chest tightened as worry began to gnaw his stomach.

No. Please don’t let it be Katara! Zuko prayed to Agni.

The tattooed man continued, unaware of the danger behind him.

“A rare beauty that’s fer sure. Not like these ugly bitches,” he said as he grabbed a woman’s behind as she passed by, causing her to cry out in indignation. “Yup, a beautiful wa’erbender. Wish I could’ve—”

The burly man yelped as he was harshly yanked backwards. He faced a tall hooded man whose visible lips were curled in an angry snarl.

“What da fuck! What’s da big idea ya fuckin—” He was cut off when two strong hands grabbed him by the front of his shirt, hauling him off the ground, his feet dangling over the ground. He came face-to-face with the stranger and he gulped when he saw the rage brewing in his golden eyes.

People stopped to gawk at the scene and murmured amongst themselves, wondering who the tall stranger was that faced the most dangerous men of the village without fear.

The man raised his fist to punch the taller man on the face, but Zuko let go and ducted. The tattooed man then flipped out his knife and slashed at him. Again, Zuko dodged out of the way and raised an eyebrow at the burly man’s poor fighting stance. With a shout, the man charged forward, but Zuko flipped over his head, landing behind him. The man staggered forward before whirling around. Zuko kicked the man’s hand, sending the knife flying to the ground. He grabbed the man by the neck and pinned him to the wall of a house.

“Where is she?” Zuko demanded between clenched teeth.

When the man looked at him dumbly, Zuko growled dangerously, making the man quiver in terror. When he did not answer, Zuko tightened his grip on the man’s neck. The bearded man choked and tried to pull his hand away, but with no success.

The other man yelled for Zuko to let go of his friend and rushed to pull the taller stranger away. Zuko quickly pulled out one of his dual broadswords with his unoccupied hand and pointed it at the advancing man’s neck, causing him to stop abruptly before the tip stabbed him. Zuko fixed his dangerous glare at the bald man who bailed out without a second thought. The crowd laughed as the gangly coward tripped over in his haste, falling flat on his face before scurrying back to his feet and out of sight.

“Where is the waterbending woman?” Zuko asked again. “What did you do to her?” he snarled. He was beginning to see red and he was fighting himself from slicing the man’s neck with his sword.

“N-nothin’!” the bearded man squeaked as he clawed Zuko’s hand. “Her wa’er whips didn’t even let us come near ‘er much less touch ‘er! I swear it by da spirits!” the man whimpered pitifully. “Me and the other one left when Lady Xiu approach’d! I dunno where she is!”

Zuko narrowed his eyes into livid slits and roughly dropped the man to the hard ground. The burly man began to cough roughly as he grabbed his neck.

“I should kill you for such dishonor you cause in this place, but you’re not worth my time,” Zuko drawled. When the man began to sob, Zuko sneered disdainfully. “Pathetic.”

Replacing his sword into its sheath, and without a second glance, Zuko strode away before he lost complete control of his anger and killed the man for daring to even look at Katara. Without even bothering to question why he felt so scared and angry, Zuko continued on his march.

He barely paid attention as the gathered crowd began to cheer for him. The only thought running through his worried head was Katara. Cursing himself, Zuko quickened his pace to the village entrance. He needed to see Katara’s face and hear her laughter to make sure she was indeed safe. He knew this place was dangerous and yet he allowed Katara to go by herself. He would never forgive himself if something terrible befell her.

Katara wandered through the thick forest, trying to find a trace of Lady Xiu. Red and brown leaves crunched softly under her feet in the eerily quiet forest. A small cool breeze blew by and Katara shivered as the chilly wind reminded her that the sun was soon to set and she needed to return to her friends. She wanted to talk to the mysterious woman, but she had no clue where the lady had gone and she had been searching for hours.
Turning around, the waterbender decided to make her way back to the village. Maybe she could tell the others and they could all return to look for the woman. Katara looked up from staring at the leaves under her feet and stopped. Frowning, she turned her head in every direction, but all she saw were identical bushes and shedding trees. Turning to her left, Katara continued to walk, but everything looked unfamiliar.

She was lost.

Katara raised her head to look at the sky, but the treetops obscured her view of the sun, making it difficult to know which direction it was positioned in. Cursing herself for not being more careful, she made her way to a huge rock that was ahead of her. Why did she always get herself into these situations? Sitting down heavily, she pulled her legs to her chest and rested her chin on her knees.

“Great. Now they will have to look for two missing women,” Katara grumbled and cursed herself a second time for causing Zuko more problems. How was she going to get out of here?

A grunting sound coming from behind her made her turn her head. Katara froze and closed her mouth before a frightened scream could escape. Right behind her, sniffing a berry bush, was a huge platypus-bear. It was quite large with dark russet fur covered in dirt and leaves, its bill-like maw crunching on berries.

Katara slowly and quietly got down from the rock and backed away. Feeling her heart pounding loudly, Katara sent a silent prayer to Yue to keep her safe. Platypus-bears were known to be extremely dangerous and vicious. When the animal began to walk away, she almost sighed in relief before her foot stepped on a twig, making a sharp snapping sound that echoed around them.

Holding her breath, Katara squeaked when the platypus-bear turned its head sharply in her direction. It sniffed the air before it growled. Katara gulped as the platypus-bear’s sharp fangs and claws gleamed in the small rays of light that were able to breach the treetops. She backed away slowly as the beast advanced menacingly toward her with a low snarl.

Without warning, the animal charged toward her, its bulky body shaking as its huge feet crushed the cold ground, its massive head swinging to the sides, its fanged mouth dripping with saliva and berry juice that Katara could not help but imagine as blood.

Moving her left arm to uncork the water skin at her left hip, Katara barely had time to raise a water whip before a sharp pain went through her arm, causing her to instantly drop her hold on the water. Dodging to the side, Katara pressed her right hand on her slashed arm and winced as warm blood soaked her sleeve and her fingers.
The platypus-bear roared, and raising to its feet, it slashed toward Katara’s face again with its sharp claws. Ducking the deadly paw, Katara summoned her element with her uninjured arm and slashed a sharp water whip across the animal’s chest, barely doing any damage because of its thick fur. It snarled in fury and again slashed its lethal claws towards the woman.

Katara evaded the blow, and without thinking about it twice, threw the water at her attacker’s face and froze it. The animal snarled angrily as the frozen water bit at its eyes and nose, but Katara did not wait to see if it freed itself as she tore through branches and bushes.

Cradling her bleeding arm, Katara ran frantically, her blood pounding hard in her head. Once a platypus-bear was angry, it did not stop from pursuing its prey until it was dead. Stumbling, she shoved branches and leaves to the side as she raced forward, occasionally flinching and crying out when her injured arm was hit. She wished one of her friends could help her, but she knew that somehow she had to get out of this alone. She dashed swiftly over the trodden path, twisting and twirling around the thick, large trees. Her only motive was to escape from the savage beast hot on her heels. Her sides hurt and her lungs screamed for more oxygen, her legs demanding she stop and rest.

Just when she thought she was safe, she heard the enraged platypus-bear thunder through the foliage, loud snapping and tearing sounds of trees could be heard resonating for miles. A flock of birds flew into the sky with loud squawks and screeches. When the beast broke through the trees, Katara sprinted straight ahead in order to escape, but she tripped on a rock and crashed down onto the hard forest floor, the wind knocked out of her.

Turning onto her back, Katara screamed in terror as the massive platypus-bear stood over her and roared. It opened its deadly jaws to crush the female, its white fangs glinting, when suddenly a whizzing sound ripped through the air.

The platypus-bear roared in pain and backed away a step as it pawed at its chest. Sitting up slowly, Katara noticed that an arrow protruded from the animal’s thick brown fur. The beast turned it small dark eyes over Katara’s head and growled. Katara turned her head over her shoulder and gasped.

Standing straight and magnificent amongst the trees was the mysterious hooded woman from the village. She was standing with a bow in her left hand, her right hand stretching the string taut with another arrow, aimed at its target.

Katara turned back around when the animal snarled and took a step forward. Katara gasped and backed away on her rear and elbows, but then a second arrow was shot and pierced through the beast’s fur on its chest. Snarling, it took another step forward before another arrow imbedded itself in its shoulder. It roared angrily before it backed away immediately with a pained and defeated whine.
before turning on its paws and limping away to heal its wounds and pride.

“I told you that you should have left,” the woman chided gently.

Replacing her bow over her right shoulder, she reinserted her arrow to the small quiver on her back. She quickly walked over to the young woman who was still sitting on the ground.

“It is dangerous to wander around the woods by yourself. Are you all right?” she asked softly as she helped Katara stand up.

“Uh…um…yes,” Katara muttered in embarrassment.

She was a master waterbender that had defeated many firebending soldiers and she was unable to defend herself from a platypus-bear! She dusted her blue pants and stared at the woman standing before her. It only took almost being killed to find the woman. The hood over the lady’s head was covering her face in shadows and Katara itched to know who was beneath the hood’s protection.

“Oh, spirits! You’re bleeding!” the woman exclaimed in alarm as she gently lifted Katara’s bleeding left arm. “I have bandages and medicine in my cabin. We must hurry so we could stop the flow before you bleed to death!”

“It’s okay. I can heal myself right now,” Katara reassured her.

She summoned the last of the remaining water in her pouch and covered her right hand with it. The woman gasped as the water began to glow. Katara pressed the healing water over her wounds and sighed with relief when her flesh healed and the blood and pain stopped. Removing her hand, she smiled as new skin appeared.

“See. All better,” she said with a small laugh.

“Amazing,” the lady whispered in awe, parting the torn pieces of Katara’s sleeve to look at the healed skin. “None of my herbs can heal that quickly. That is truly astonishing.”

“Yeah, well…it’s nothing remarkable,” Katara muttered as she blushed bashfully at the woman’s “Nonsense, don’t be so modest. I wish I had such a gift,” the woman replied. Lifting her hand to her head, she pulled back her dark hood and revealed a gentle smile.

Katara gasped and brought her hand to her mouth.

“Princess Ursa!” she exclaimed in surprise.

There was no mistaking it. The same eyebrows, the same pale skin, the same smile, and the same eyes just like the woman in Zuko’s painting. The only difference was that this woman’s long, black hair had a few streaks of gray near her temples and she had a few wrinkles near her eyes, nothing that time wouldn’t do. But the former Fire Nation noblewoman was still beautiful, elegant, and graceful.

The woman narrowed her golden eyes warily.

“I’m sorry. My name is Xiu,” she replied, her warm tone from a few moments ago now cold and terse. She replaced her hood over her head and turned to walk away.

“No. You are Lady Ursa from the Fire Nation, once wife of Ozai, and mother of Fire Lord Zuko and Princess Azula,” Katara said confidently. “I know it’s you. We’ve been searching for you.”

The older woman paused and stood silently, her back turned toward the younger woman. Katara remained standing with a determined look on her face as she waited patiently for the woman to admit it. And once she did, Zuko would be happy.

Katara heard the woman sigh heavily before she turned around again, and pulling her hood down, she folded her delicate hands in front of her.

“How did you know?” she asked quietly.

Katara smiled and walked forward to stand before the older version of Ursa.
“I saw your picture once. And you have the same eyes as your son,” she replied softly.

Lady Ursa gasped.

“My…s-son? You…know my son?” she asked softly.

Katara saw as Ursa’s eyes shone with sadness and longing.

“Yes, we’re good friends actually,” Katara explained and smiled softly. She laughed. “Well, we were enemies when we first met, but now I can safely say that he’s one of my best friends.”

Ursa raised one dark eyebrow in curiosity, which reminded Katara so much of Zuko.

“Why are you looking for me?” the older woman asked suspiciously and backed away a few steps.

Katara thought about what to say for a moment. Zuko had told them he wanted to speak to Ursa first before she found out he was looking for her.

“It’s a surprise,” she replied.

When Ursa frowned, she added, “It’s nothing bad, quite the opposite. I promise.” She smiled reassuringly.

At that moment, her stomach growled loudly, reminding her that she had not eaten since breakfast. Katara blushed and clutched her stomach in embarrassment. Why did this always happen to her? First Zuko and now his mother!

Lady Ursa laughed softly, her uneasiness disappearing at the uncomfortable look on the young woman’s face.

“Come. I have some soup and fish in my cabin,” she beckoned softly as she walked away and motioned for Katara to follow. “So you are a waterbender, and a very advanced one for being able to fight off those brutes from the village and heal a wound.”

Katara nodded as she tried to forget the leering looks she had received.

“So from which tribe to you hail from?” Ursa asked.

“Oh, please forgive me! How rude of me,” Katara gasped and blushed. “I am Katara of the Southern Water Tribe,” she said with a bow. “It is a pleasure to finally meet you, Princess Ursa.”

Ursa shifted uneasily at her former title before her eyes widened.

“Katara, as in Master Waterbender Katara of the Southern Water Tribe? Daughter of Chief Hakoda of the Southern Water Tribe? The Avatar’s waterbending teacher? The young lady who helped…my son claim the Fire Nation throne?” Ursa asked in surprise.

“Uh…yes,” Katara replied simply as they continued on their walk among the tall trees.

“Then perhaps you are here looking for me because of the Avatar,” Ursa guessed as she turned to her right.

Katara noticed that fear replaced her previous surprise in her golden eyes. Katara frowned and wondered what she feared.

“No,” Katara replied carefully. “I’m sorry, but I can’t tell you, at least not right now.”

Ursa nodded.

“Well…at least you can tell me about my son,” she asked quietly, hopefully.

Katara smiled. “I will tell you what I know.”
They left the thick forest and approached a circular clearing where a small wooden cabin stood in the middle. It had two windows and a porch in the front. A small line of smoke was finding its way up into the sky from the small hole on the roof.

As they neared, Katara noticed there was a small garden on the left side of the house where a few flowers and plants grew. She wondered how Lady Ursa would react if she knew Zuko had maintained her rosebushes and kept the palace garden thriving.

“Come inside from the chill and get warm. After you have eaten, you can tell me about your adventures,” Ursa said with a smile. She opened the wooden door and waited for the young Water Tribe woman.

Katara looked up to the setting sun briefly. A few minutes wouldn’t hurt and then she would get Zuko. Smiling, Katara walked up the few wooden steps and stepped inside.

Removing his dark red hood, Zuko relaxed as he spotted the gang just outside the entrance of the Abandoned Fort. Sokka had his arm around Suki, who looked exhausted, and Aang was smiling and shaking his head at something Toph was recounting as she punched a fist in the air. Zuko frowned as he scanned amongst his friends. Where was Katara?

Zuko quickened his pace, his stomach clenching with concern.

“Where is Katara?” he asked as soon as he was close by for them to hear him.

“Oh, hey, Sparky,” Toph said as she tipped her head in his direction. “She hasn’t arrived yet, but she still has a couple of hours left. Don’t worry.” She grinned.

Zuko nodded and suppressed any emotion from showing on his face when he noticed Aang staring at him. Katara knew how to take care of herself. She was a strong waterbender. Besides, he was sure Katara would not want him to worry the others.

_Especially Aang_, he grumbled mentally.

Sokka raised his head to look at Zuko with a defeated look.
“None of us were able to find anything about your mom. Some glares and insults we found, but nothing about Princess Ursa.”

Zuko’s shoulders drooped and he raked his fingers through his loose hair.

_How can this be? Nobody was able to find one lead? Did she perhaps leave the Abandoned Fort? Where could she be now?_

Zuko narrowed his eyes and clenched his hands. Perhaps Ozai lied to him and he was just wasting his time, searching somewhere else while his mother was in another part of the world.

“I take it by your depressed silence that you didn’t find anything either, huh?” Toph asked softly and crossed her arms over her small chest to ward off the chill.

“I’m sorry, Zuko,” Aang said and placed a hand on the taller man’s shoulder. “We can still search tomorrow,” he added optimistically.

Zuko sighed and nodded.

“Perhaps Katara found something,” Suki spoke up as she leaned on her boyfriend.

The young Fire Lord looked up into the evening sky. There were only a few more hours left before sunset.

“Hopefully,” he finally replied.

“Well, while we wait for my sister, let’s have something to eat,” Sokka piped in with a grin.

“We left the food supplies with Momo and Appa.” Aang frowned as he played with his straw hat, swooshing it around with some airbending as he wondered when Katara would return.

Sokka leaned forward with a grin and slid his hand into his shirt. Suki leaned away and shook her head.
“No worries. I got…this!” he exclaimed triumphantly. He pulled out a piece of moldy cheese from his pocket in front of him for everyone to see. Instantly a swarm of flies surrounded it.

Zuko blanched and Aang gagged.

“What the hell is that awful smell?!” Toph yelled and pinched her small nose.

“What? It’s aged cheese. The merchant said it was a delicacy,” Sokka defended himself and scowled.

“I don’t think aged cheese is supposed to look like that,” Zuko remarked with a frown.

“Or smell like garbage and sewage put together,” Toph groused.

Aang wrinkled his nose. “Or have a swarm of—”

“Okay, okay, I get it!” Sokka yelled and threw the bug infested cheese over his shoulder. “I was duped.”

“It’s okay, honey,” Suki patted her suddenly depressed boyfriend. “It happens to all of us.”

“But not quite as regularly as Snoozles here,” Toph whispered to Aang who only shook his head.

“We’ll wait for Katara to return with news and then we can eat,” Aang suggested.

The others nodded and sat down to wait for the waterbender.

The sun began to slowly move west as the hours passed, but there was no sign of the young Water Tribe woman anywhere. They began to get restless.
“Why’s Katara taking so long?” Sokka asked worriedly for the twentieth time. He nervously played with Suki’s short hair as her head rested on his shoulder.

“I don’t know,” Aang said softly as he paced back and forth, leaving a small dent on the ground as he continued to walk agitatedly.

The blind earthbender shifted on the small stump of rock she had erected to sit on.

“Maybe she found something,” she commented.

Standing straight and silent like he had been for a few hours, Zuko faced the village entrance from the small grove they were waiting in, never taking his eyes away from the spot. The sun was almost over the horizon. There was only a small amount of daylight left before night settled in.

Worry began to gnaw Zuko’s stomach as the despicable village men’s words endlessly floated in his mind. He fought the urge to rip the heads off those two who dared to think of touching Katara. What if Katara ran into trouble again and this time she was not able to get away? The firebender clenched his hands and cursed himself.

Without turning to look at the others, he narrowed his eyes.

“We will return to the village and look for Katara,” Zuko finally spoke in a firm voice, causing the others to jump. He heard Sokka and Aang sigh in relief.

“But what about Lady Ursa?” Suki asked as Sokka helped her to her feet. She discreetly made sure to hide her rounded belly.

Zuko closed his eyes and let out a long breath.

“First we find Katara and then we will continue with the search.” He pulled his hood over his face and led the way back into the Abandoned Fort.

The gang separated to different parts of the still restless village, but this time in search for their missing friend. Without a second glance at his companions, Zuko strode swiftly to the place he had seen the two men he ran into last. Scrutinizing the streets and the people carefully, Zuko began to feel despair engulf his heart as time went by.

“I’m telling you, if Lady Xiu had not intervene that girl would have been in deep trouble,” an old woman croaked and shook her cane.

“And I’m telling you that the waterbender would’ve skinned their hides clean if she had the chance. Those two would’ve been half-way dead by now. Did you see how her blue eyes burned? I’m telling you she was a strong woman,” another elderly woman with a long, pointy nose squeaked out.

A little girl with pigtails smiled as she held the second woman’s hand.

“The pretty lady was nice, too.”

“Excuse me,” Zuko addressed the elderly village women courteously as he approached them.

The women turned to look at the tall, muscular man and smiled.

“Would you be so kind as to tell me where the waterbender has gone?” Zuko asked politely.

Both women narrowed their eyes and eyed him up suspiciously.

“Why do you want to know?” the first one asked and gripped her cane tightly.

“Listen here, young man,” the pointy-nosed one said in a high-pitched voice. “The poor girl already had to deal with two other perverted swine, so why don’t you find yourself a willing female to sate your needs and leave her alone.”

Zuko gaped and he felt his cheeks burn in embarrassment. The little girl looked up into the hooded man’s face and smiled at the color that covered his right cheek.

“I-I’m…not looking for her for such d-dishonorable i-intentions,” Zuko sputtered disconcertingly.
“Are you the pretty lady’s boyfriend?” the little girl asked excitedly.

Zuko’s eyes widened as his heart skipped a beat at the insinuation.

“Boyfriend?” the one with the cane asked. Squinting, she looked at the man again and nodded in approval. “In that case, she went that way.” The old woman pointed a knobby finger to her left. “Make haste before some other dog tries anything.”

Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“I will break the fingers of anyone who tries,” he threatened darkly.

He blinked when he felt a small tug on the pants of his right leg. Zuko looked down to see the little girl give him a toothy grin.

“You have a very nice and pretty girlfriend,” she said with a giggle.

Zuko’s face flushed again, but he decided to let the child believe whatever she wanted.

“Oh…thank you.” He smiled slightly and patted her head. The little girl flashed him a bright smile.

With a nod of his head to the older women, Zuko walked past them to follow the direction Katara was last seen to have taken.

A few minutes later, Zuko came upon a street that led into the forest. The people he had asked thus far had all pointed him into this direction. Zuko’s brow furrowed as he looked around for any sign of Katara or any sign that she had used her waterbending to defend herself. However, all he saw were dirty houses and people wandering the streets, either aimlessly or drunkenly. His features creased into a worried frown as he continued to walk. Maybe she went in another direction and the others found her.

Zuko looked upon the last house on the street. There was a woman sitting on a very old wooden chair outside her door, sewing a pair of small trousers. A small boy sat at her feet, munching happily on an apple.

“Excuse me,” Zuko said as he approached the small family.

The woman looked up and quickly grabbed her child into her arms.

“Please, don’t be alarmed. I mean you no harm. I just want to ask you a question,” Zuko said gently as he held his palms up pacifically.

The woman looked at him for a while before she gave a nod.

“Okay. What’s your question?”

“I’m looking for a friend of mine. We just arrived here and I am afraid she has become lost. I want to know if you have seen her. She has tanned skin, brown hair half-pulled back into a bun, and large, blue eyes. She was wearing dark blue pants and a matching shirt with a gray sash around her waist and gray boots. She also has a Water Tribe necklace on her neck,” Zuko described. He half wondered how he knew what Katara was wearing. Oh, yeah, he was staring at her this morning. Mentally shaking his head, he silently prayed that the woman knew something.

The woman frowned.

“I’m sorry, but I haven’t seen anybody with such a description.”

Zuko closed his eyes and sighed.

“I saw a lady like that, Mamma,” the little boy piped in with a huge smile and disengaged himself from her protective embrace to stand before the mysterious man.

Zuko bent down on one knee and gave the boy an encouraging smile.

“Do you know which way she went?” he asked.
The little boy bobbed his head in reply.

“She went into the forest that way!” the boy informed proudly as he pointed straight ahead.

“Thank you,” the firebender said. Zuko took a few coins from the small pouch hidden in his sash and placed them on the boy’s little hands. “So you can help your mother, yes?” he encouraged.

“Yes, sir,” the boy beamed as the older man stood up.

Zuko frowned as he rapidly marched to the edge of the forest in the Earth Kingdom continent. Why would Katara walk into a dangerous and uninhabited forest without telling them, without any supplies, and when night was about to set in?

Quickening his already fast pace, Zuko scanned the forest floor carefully for any signs that Katara had passed through. His keen eyes noticed that some leaves were crushed, meaning someone had walked by and stepped on them. Crouching, Zuko brushed some leaves with his hand to look at the footprints on the dirt floor. The prints were small and light and he was positive they belonged to Katara. Keeping an eye on the trail, Zuko followed it. He squinted as the sunlight began to fade, casting long shadows across the forest floor.

He continued walking until the trail stopped near a large rock. Examining his surrounding for more signs as best as he could in the semi-darkness, Zuko blanched as he noticed platypus-bear paw prints mixed in with those of small footprints. By the size of the animal’s paw prints, Zuko knew it was large. He guessed that Katara tried to back away before the bear noticed and charged. Following the prints, Zuko’s chest tightened painfully as he noticed blood staining the forest floor.

“No,” Zuko breathed and clenched his jaw. “I swear I will kill that animal if I find it for hurting Katara,” he vowed between gritted teeth.

Frantically, Zuko followed the faint trail of blood and the far spaced footprints of Katara that indicated she had run to escape.

“Please be okay. Please be okay,” Zuko chanted loudly as he crashed into the foliage desperately.
He noticed more blood staining the broken leaves and branches and cursed. Zuko suppressed the pain and fear that sprang in his heart as he realized that Katara had tripped and fell before the platypus-bear came upon her. Dropping to his knees, Zuko clenched his eyes shut for a few seconds for the strange feelings to subside. Upon opening them again, he frowned in confusion when he did not see any other signs of blood or scratches on the ground that would indicate the animal had finished its kill, but rather the beast’s paw prints went away in another direction.

That was when he noticed a second pair of footprints near the other ones, and by the size of them, possibly another woman. He saw that both people had stood facing each other for a while before they both walked away in another direction together. Zuko narrowed his eyes. Did Katara follow the stranger willingly or was she forced to?

Standing upright once more, Zuko squared his shoulders.

“Just hang on. I’m coming, Katara,” he promised into the setting sun.

Keeping his eyes and ears trained to his surroundings, Zuko followed both sets of footprints deeper into the forest.

The sun was already setting, casting golden light above the treetops, when Zuko came upon a small cabin in a small clearing. He stopped to inspect the small wooden structure. Scanning the footsteps ahead of him, he saw that they led into the house.

Pulling his hood down over his head, he narrowed his eyes as he glared at the door.

“Katara!” he called loudly, and grasping the hilt of his broadswords with his right hand, Zuko braced himself for whatever was to come.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The bright sun was setting as Katara continued on her narrative in helping the Avatar and the former banished prince end the war and the events that followed after during the postwar. She was kneeling in front of the low table as she finished her meal. She was unsure if she should tell Lady Ursa about Zuko’s Agni Kai with Azula and decided it was best if Zuko was the one to tell her.

Lady Ursa listened with interest and occasionally asked questions about Zuko. Katara would give her a small amount of information that she knew about Zuko as Fire Lord, but she omitted the part where Zuko was at the village at that very moment looking for her.
Katara’s head swirled with question after question. Why did Ursa leave the Fire Nation in the first place? Why did she leave her children behind? Did she not care about Zuko’s tragic Agni Kai with his father and the banishment he suffered afterwards? And most importantly, why did she not seek her son after the war?

Katara itched to ask her all the questions she had had in her mind since Zuko began to open up to her about his mother, but she kept them in check and continued to relate her adventures. It was not her place to ask such things; it was Zuko’s, and she would be lucky if he decided to tell her one day.

“It was in an ink painting where I first saw you,” Katara said as she took a sip from the old teacup Lady Ursa had given her.

Katara grimaced slightly as the bitter tea slid down her throat. She wasn’t surprised the dirty village did not have decent tea. She wished she had accepted the teabags Iroh had offered her before they had departed. At least the food was pleasant.

“It was one with you and Zuko as a small boy. When I said that tiny Zuko was so cute, he crossed his arms over his chest and scowled.” Katara laughed as she remembered his annoyed face.

Ursa brought her elegant hand toward her small mouth and laughed daintily.

“He never liked it when he was fussed over and called ‘cute’,” she said, “He argued that being called cute was not manly.”

They laughed softly.

Folding her hands over her lap, the older woman sighed sadly.

“Tell me, Katara. Is…Zuko happy?” she asked quietly.

Katara’s eyes softened as Lady Ursa’s own eyes gleamed with unshed tears.

“I…I’m not sure, Lady Ursa,” she said truthfully.
But he will be after he sees you again, Katara thought hopefully.

Ursa sniffled as she nodded sadly.

“You still haven’t told me why you are here in the first place. Did you come alone or with someone else? Why are you looking for me if we have never met?” Ursa asked quietly, her voice hinting on demanding.

“Well…I…um…we…er…” Katara stammered for an answer.

“Katara!” a deep masculine voice sounded from outside the cabin.

Katara stiffened in her seat. That sounded like Zuko! Looking toward the small window, Katara gasped as she realized the sun was already setting and darkness was creeping onto the forest.

“Oh, Tui! I forgot!” Katara jumped up from the small cushion and raced to the door.

“Katara, what is going on?” Ursa asked in alarm as she raced to gather her bow and quiver of arrows in order to run after the younger woman whom she had gotten to like as a friend.

Zuko’s body tensed as the door of the cabin was swung open, the light from inside bathing the ground with a golden glow. He relaxed his grip on his hilt when Katara emerge from the house and ran down the few stairs. Zuko raced towards her as his heart gave a joyful leap.

“Zuko, I’m so sorry!” Katara exclaimed as she neared him. “I didn’t notice the sun was—”

Suddenly she was being surrounded by warm, strong arms. Katara’s eyes widened when she realized Zuko was embracing her— and tightly.

“Zu-Zuko?”
“Katara, please forgive me,” Zuko said softly. “I never should have let you go by yourself.”

He wrapped his arms around her back even tighter as if to make sure she was really there and all right. He could not explain it, but as soon as she appeared, he felt like gathering her in his protective arms so nothing else could harm her.

Katara blushed at the worried and guilty tone of the firebender that was still embracing her.

“It’s okay, Zuko,” she said softly as she gently patted his back to reassure him.

She felt him shake his head between her neck and shoulder as he continued to hold her. Katara sighed contently as his warmth surrounded her, making her feel safe. She shyly raised both her arms and hugged him as well. Zuko closed his eyes as his heart ignited at her innocent touch.

“Sorry, for not showing up, I lost track of time. But I’m fine,” Katara said.

Lady Ursa had barely walked out from the house, ready with her arrows, when she stopped in her tracks as she noticed her young friend in a tight embrace with a tall, young man, whose face was hidden in Katara’s hair. Ursa relaxed her grip on her bow and smiled at the protective way the man held the young woman. Was he Katara’s boyfriend or husband? With the smile still on her face, she approached them slowly.

“Fine?” Zuko scoffed severely. “I came upon your footprints with those of a platypus-bear and signs of blood! And because of me you got attack by those despicable bastards! I should have killed them,” he growled.

Zuko pulled Katara closer to his chest as he felt his anger and fear resurfacing. He buried his nose in her hair and breathed in her scent silently. Katara had a faint sweet scent, like fresh rain and gardenias. He felt himself immediately relax.

“I’m sorry I wasn’t there to protect you,” he whispered.

Katara blushed before she laughed lightly.
“As if those two idiots could have harmed me,” she scoffed softly, “As for the platypus-bear…it’s gone. Thanks anyway…for worrying about me.”

Zuko smiled before he realized what he was doing. Flushing, he pulled away and cleared his throat, suppressing the urge to take her delicate body into his arms again. Katara frowned as the warmth and comfort left her.

Ursa froze as the young man’s face finally appeared. She gasped softly as tears threatened to spill from her golden eyes.

Could it be?

Oblivious to anything but Katara, Zuko noticed the tattered and bloodied sleeve on her left arm.

“That must have hurt,” he observed softly as he gently touched her arm, where the wound should have been.

“Yeah, but it’s all better now.” Katara smiled and shrugged. “I was able to heal it after I was saved by—” She gasped as she finally remembered Lady Ursa.

She felt so stupid! There she was babbling about herself instead of reuniting Zuko with his long lost mother and making him happy.

“Katara, what’s wrong?” Zuko asked worriedly.

He saw Katara look over her shoulder and he followed her gaze. Zuko’s eyes widened as they landed on the woman standing behind them with her own golden eyes wide in shock. The woman he had longed to see again. The one he had been searching for all this time.

“M-Mom?” he whispered.
“Mom?” Zuko repeated unsurely as if afraid she would suddenly disappear and the pain would crush him again. As if he was making sure what he was seeing was not an illusion, but reality. Happiness was spreading through his heart. He had finally found her.

“Zuko?” Ursa gasped and a few tears fell from her eyes. “My son.”

Zuko took a hesitant step toward her. He did not know what to do as he continued to stare at the woman before him. The woman that had left him many years ago as a small child without an explanation. The woman who had left him with his cruel father. Zuko took a step back as he felt his joy and relief turn into resentment and hurt.

Katara watched worriedly as Zuko’s face darkened.

“You left me,” Zuko quietly spoke, his voice and face expressionless, but inside he was churning with dark emotions. “Why?”

“Zuko, I—”

“Why did you not come to see me? Did you not think that I needed you? That I missed you?” he asked as he lowered his head.

Katara noticed that Lady Ursa looked confused for a while.

“But you didn’t want to see—”

“Why did you leave me with that monster?” Zuko interrupted as he balled his hands, a few wisps of smoke escaped from his clenched fists as he fought to control his hurt and anger. “Why did you let him hurt me?” he growled lowly as he touched his scar. “Are you ashamed of me as well?”

Ursa gasped and vehemently shook her head.
“Of course not! I love you and—”

“Then why didn’t you come back for me?” Zuko asked in a low voice and looked away.

He was so confused. So many emotions and questions were swirling in his head that almost made him dizzy and sick. The biggest question running through his head was...why? The horrible spinning stopped when Zuko felt a soft, small hand gently touch his clenched fist. He knew that touch and he immediately relaxed.

“Zuko, is this how you’re supposed to greet your mother, whom you’ve been searching for a long time?” Katara chided gently as she looked up at him. “You can ask questions later. I’m sure Lady Ursa would like to answer them later on. Don’t you think you should greet her properly after finally finding her? After so many years of being separated?”

Zuko closed his eyes and let out a long breath.

She’s right. I’ve finally found my mother and she hasn’t run away from me, just as Katara predicted. And I’m the one pushing her away.

He opened his eyes and looked up to the woman who had brought him into the world. The one who had encouraged and supported him even after Azulon and Ozai favored Azula. The woman who had comforted him when his father could not or would not. Zuko took in her tearful and sad eyes and he felt ashamed. Why did he always push people away?

“Mother,” Zuko said softly as he took a small step forward, afraid she would turn away from him, away from his life once again.

Ursa smiled gently through her tears and opened her arms. The next thing he knew he had raced toward her and was soon enveloped in a comforting, motherly embrace.

“Mom, forgive me,” he whispered against her hair.

Ursa shook her head as she hugged her much taller son tightly for the first time in what had felt like an eternity.
“There is nothing to forgive. I am the one who should ask you for forgiveness,” she said softly. She pulled back a few inches to look into his eyes. “Oh, Zuko, my son, I missed you so much.”

Zuko smiled and he gently hugged her.

“And I you, Mom.”

Joy and relief filled his heart once again as he finally realized his search for his mother had ended and now he had found her, now he could take her home, now they could be happy again.

A few feet away, Katara smiled as she sniffled gently at the scene and sighed wistfully. She may never be able to be reunited with her own mother, but at least she had helped Zuko find his—which he deserved—and through him she was able to have a glimpse of how it would have felt to see her mother once again.

She continued to watch silently as Zuko held his mother while Ursa patted her son’s back gently, tears of joy falling from her eyes. Katara brushed a few tears from her own eyes as her heart warmed at the scene, at Ursa’s maternal caress, at Zuko’s warm gaze.

After a few more long moments, Ursa finally released her son and wiped her tears with a watery laugh.

“Why, Zuko dear, look at how much you have grown.” She cupped his face and crooned, “Look at how handsome my baby boy is! I bet the young ladies can’t leave you alone.”

“Mom,” Zuko almost whined in embarrassment.

Katara placed her hand over her mouth to muffle her amused laughter, but her giggles escaped through her fingers and caused the reunited mother and son to turn to look at her.

“What’s so amusing?” Zuko asked and raised an eyebrow.

“N-nothing,” Katara gasped between her giggles.
Ursa smiled when Zuko scowled at the young woman.

“I do believe this was the surprise you were talking about, am I right, Katara dear?”

Katara stopped laughing and smiled.

“You are right, Lady Ursa.”

Zuko looked between his mother and Katara and raised his eyebrow again.

“So how did you two meet again?” he asked.

“Oh, right,” Katara said as she played with her hair. “Lady Ursa scared those two village jerks away and I kind of followed her into the forest…and she saved me from the platypus-bear before it could have eaten me.” She blushed in embarrassment.

“I’m sure you could have taken down that beast by yourself if you hadn’t been caught by surprise,” Ursa reassured her with a smile. “You did fight off those two brutes at the village by yourself.”

Katara smiled proudly and nodded. Ursa lifted her own eyebrow when she noticed Zuko narrow his eyes angrily before guilt replaced them.

“I’m sure you have many questions, my son, as do I. Come, let us talk and have some tea.” Ursa motioned for them to follow her inside the house.

“Um…I’ll just wait out here,” Katara spoke up softly and looked towards the tiny garden.

Zuko turned to look at her and frowned.

“You can’t stay out here. It’s getting cold and dark.”
“It’s so you two can talk privately,” Katara replied with a smile before she added, “I’m not afraid of the dark.”

“Nonsense,” Ursa exclaimed with a wave of her hand. “You will come in before you catch a cold and you can listen to what I have to say as well. I’m sure Zuko would tell you all about my revelations later since you are my son’s betrothed, after all.”

“He’s not my—”

“She’s not my—”

Katara and Zuko clamped their mouths shut and blushed, stealing quick glances at each other.

Ursa furrowed her eyebrows.

“Oh, I thought…I mean, you’re wearing a betrothal necklace and then…by the way you embraced each other…” Ursa trailed off uncertainly.

Zuko’s face flushed deeply before he cleared his throat.

“I was just really worried about her. Katara is my friend and I care for her a lot,” he stated, causing Katara to blush a darker shade of red. “And the necklace is an heirloom.”

“Oh,” Ursa said and frowned in disappointment. “But I heard the new Fire Lord had a girlfriend.”

Katara crossed her arms over her chest and looked away.

“Well, yes…” Zuko said and rubbed the back of his neck. “Mai’s my girlfriend.”

“Mai?” Ursa gasped unbelievingly. “A-Azula’s friend? The quiet, sullen girl? She’s your girlfriend?” she asked disbelievingly.
I know, huh? Katara thought.

Zuko frowned.

“Uh…yes. Mai has…always had a crush on me.”

Ursa remembered little Mai, Azula’s friend, who was always stealing glances at her son. But Zuko never acknowledged her before, always considering his sister’s friends as silly, and it puzzled her now. The Fire Nation woman composed herself and gave a small smile.

“I’m sure she’s a nice girl and I would like to see her again. Anyway, let us go inside.” She looked at Katara, her smile even larger. “Zuko cares for you and trusts you, so you will come as well.”

Katara looked at Zuko who gave her a reassuring smile and a nod.

“I am honored by your trust in me,” she said as she smiled at them both.

Ursa nodded and continued on her way to the small house.

Zuko and Katara glanced at each other one more time before they followed the older woman into the warm and illuminated house, wondering what they will find out next.

Sokka and Aang paced back and forth in front of Appa, occasionally glancing at the little path that led into the Abandoned Fort. They had retreated back to where they had left their things with Momo and Appa and had started a small fire to ward off the chill.

“Do you think Katara’s okay?” the warrior asked as he rubbed his face.

“I don’t know,” Toph spoke up. She frowned and crossed her arms. “Sparky’s still looking for her. Maybe he found her already.”
“What if Zuko’s in trouble too?” Suki asked worriedly as she gingerly sat on Appa’s huge tail. “Maybe someone found out he’s the Fire Lord and captured him.”

“Nah,” Sokka said and shook his head as he sat next to her. “Zuko’s not that stupid to let himself get caught.”

Aang sighed and rubbed Momo’s ears. The little lemur was cuddled inside his shirt. Night had set in and the temperature was dropping.

“Let’s wait a while longer and then we’ll look for Katara again,” he said somberly. He was desperately trying to control himself as horrible scenarios involving Katara in trouble ran rampant in his mind.

Suki sighed and squirmed uncomfortably until she rested her head on Sokka’s shoulder.

“I wonder which one of us will be next,” Sokka said ominously, earning a sigh from his Kyoshi girlfriend and a snort from Toph.

Aang frowned. His usual cheerful features were now set in a worried crease. What if something did happen to Katara? He would be all alone. He could feel himself losing his temper and he clenched his jaw. He felt a small hand touch his. Surprised, he turned to see Toph standing beside him.

“Calm down, Twinkletoes,” she said firmly. “If Katara’s with Zuko, she’ll be more than fine.”

Aang sighed and nodded, clenching his hands tight to keep his emotions under control.

Lady Ursa listened quietly as her son and his waterbending friend told her how they found out where she was currently living. She balled her hands when they told her what Ozai had said about her and now she understood why Zuko had reacted the way he did earlier. They told her of how they journeyed from the Fire Nation to the colony port through the Earth Kingdom and finally to the Abandoned Fort with the Avatar and their other companions.

“I must admit that I was afraid of meeting you again,” Zuko confessed quietly. “I was afraid that you didn’t want to see me and would run away if you knew I was looking for you.”
He looked at Katara, who was sitting beside him, and smiled.

“But Katara gave me the courage I needed to keep going,” he continued.

Ursa noticed the warmth in Zuko’s eyes as he looked over at the young woman, who returned his smile with one of her own. Lady Ursa was extremely grateful that the young Water Tribe woman had kept her son’s hopes up and had promised to help him.

“Mother?” Zuko spoke up after they were silent for a moment.

The fire crackled and cast shadows around the small room. The sun had set a long time ago and the moon was barely peeking out from the clouds in the dark blue sky.

Zuko swallowed before he continued with the question that had been plaguing him all these years.

“Why did you leave the palace?” he asked.

Ursa looked down at her hands and frowned.

“It seems that you do not know, which has me greatly perplexed,” she began as she raised her head again to look at him.

Zuko only frowned in confusion.

Sighing, Ursa closed her eyes for a moment before she looked at her son sadly and anxiously.

“I am afraid of telling you now and what you might think of me after I reveal to you what I have done in the past,” she said quietly.

Zuko took her hand and grasped it gently.
“I promise I will try to understand because I know you loved us too much to forsake us,” he vowed.

Katara glanced at Zuko and smiled.

“Please, tell me what happened all those years ago,” the firebender insisted quietly.

“It calms my soul to know that you think as such,” Ursa admitted. She let out a shaky breath and cleared her throat gently.

“It all started when you were about ten-years-old,” she began. “When news of your cousin Lu Ten’s death, Iroh’s defeat at Ba Sing Se, and his fall to despair reached us, your…father asked Azulon to name him heir to the Fire Nation throne since Iroh seemed incapable of ruling the country in the future.”

Zuko nodded since he had overheard that part accidentally.

“Azulon was furious at his youngest son’s indifference to his older brother’s great loss,” Ursa continued quietly. “So in order to teach him a lesson and make him understand the pain of losing a child, your grandfather wanted Ozai to know such sorrow by losing his own son…by killing you.”

Katara gasped at such cruelty and looked at Zuko’s hard expression.

But he was just a child! First, that stupid Agni Kai and now this? Katara thought bitterly.

It seemed that Zuko’s entire family except for his mother and uncle wanted to get rid of him for one reason or another. She felt such great sadness that Zuko did not know what a real loving family was. It must be so hard to know his own blood wanted him dead.

Zuko closed his eyes and clenched his jaw.

“I suspected such,” he admitted, “Azula tried to tell me, but I wanted to believe she was lying.”

Ursa was silent for a moment before she sighed heavily.
“When I found out that my own son was going to be used to teach a ‘lesson’ to Ozai, I pleaded with him not to follow his father’s orders and to ask him for forgiveness,” she continued quietly.

“Let me guess,” Zuko sneered bitterly, “He said such a thing would be showing weakness and shame, didn’t he?”

Ursa lowered her head and nodded gravely.

“Ozai asked me what I would do in order to stop Azulon. I told him I would do anything in order to save your life. He regarded me for a few minutes, and then with a smile, he told me that there was one way. I was overjoyed when he told me that and I asked him to tell me what it was and that I would do it. And what he told me shocked me greatly for I never would have thought that the man I married would say such a thing.”

She paused and took a shaky breath.

“He told me that if I wanted to keep my precious son alive I had to…murder Fire Lord Azulon and never return to the Fire Nation,” Ursa’s voice lowered to a small whisper.

Katara placed her hand over her mouth in disbelief. Zuko’s eyes widened in shock at his mother’s words before they narrowed in anger.

“That coward,” he growled lowly. “That’s just like him, to make someone else do his dirty work, have his wife murder his father and send his son to chase after a myth.” He looked over at his mother whose face was filled with sadness and shame.

“And did you…do it? You killed Grandfather Azulon,” he stated softly.

“Agni knows I didn’t want to!” Ursa exclaimed fervently, pleadingly, as she stared desperately into her son’s eyes. “I abhorred the idea of taking someone’s life. I was brought up to be a good wife and mother, not an assassin!” She looked away and tears fell from her eyes, her body trembled with quiet sobs.

Katara quickly got up from her seat and handed the distraught woman a handkerchief as she patted her back gently. Ursa quietly thanked her. Katara looked over at Zuko with worried and terrified eyes.

Zuko gritted his teeth and blew smoke from his nostrils. He hated Ozai even more for causing his mother so much pain and for keeping her away from him. Frowning, he squeezed his mother’s hand.

“But…” Ursa’s voice quivered as she tried to continue, “I had no choice. I had to keep you alive. I was not going to sit back while the man I once loved killed our son!” She sniffled and wiped her tears with the handkerchief.

“So on that fateful night, I sneaked into my garden and gathered some herbs that grew in a corner. I crushed them into a fine powder, poison, that once placed in a drink it dissolves instantly without leaving a taste. I stole into Azulon’s bedchamber before he retired for the night and poured the poison into a pitcher of water that sat on his nightstand beside his bed and…left.”

Ursa took a deep breath.

“He died in his sleep without knowing his own son ordered his death and without knowing he was poisoned. I guess you could say that he died peacefully, even if he did not deserve it,” she continued softly. “Before his death was discovered, I raced to your room to see you one last time, hoping that perhaps one day you would understand and come looking for me.”

Zuko nodded. He remembered her parting words, but he had been young and did not understand what she meant. He never would have guessed what his mother was telling him now.

“Then I arrived at the back of the palace grounds where Ozai was waiting for me with a few simple clothes, a small amount of money, and a carriage. He ordered for me to be taken to the port where I was to take a ship to the Earth Kingdom and then to the Abandoned Fort. I was terrified for I did not know where I was going. I have never been outside the Fire Nation before,” she confessed and sniffled again.

“Before I left, he told me not to seek you or Azula out unless I wanted to be caught by the Fire Nation Council and thrown into prison, probably the Boiling Rock, for the rest of my life or perhaps be executed for treason. When he saw that I was reluctant to leave my children behind he promised me that he would keep me informed about you and your sister.”

She then explained how life in the Abandoned Fort had been difficult for her at first since she was brought up as a noblewoman, then a princess, and was unaccustomed to such worldly atrocities. However, she endured it because her son’s life was more important than her own comfort. Soon she gained the people’s trust and respect with her healing medicines and devotion to the sick. With some threats about being able to use poisons that had no cure, she made the more dangerous inhabitants leave her alone. Of course, those threats were idle, but they did not need to know that.

“I longed to see my children,” Ursa continued as she took a small sip from the tea Katara had poured for her. “I would receive information here and there about your progress as you grew up. Then one day as I shopped in the marketplace I heard news about the Agni Kai between Fire Lord Ozai and his son, and having lost, the young prince was banished from the Fire Nation. Why would Ozai fight his thirteen-year-old son?”

Zuko narrowed his eyes and explained what had happened in the war meeting almost seven years ago that led to his pointless quest to find the Avatar for his lost honor and admittance to his own home.

Ursa clenched her small hands.

“I knew that there had to be a rational reason why you would be called a traitor and a disgrace,” she said angrily.

She breathed deeply to calm herself before continuing.

“Confused and outraged, I threatened Ozai with returning to the Fire Nation and revealing everything if he did not lift such a harsh and uncalled for punishment.”

“And why didn’t you?” Zuko asked and looked away. “Why didn’t you come for me?”

Ursa frowned before she looked down at her hands.

“That is what has me puzzled. He wrote to me saying that you found out about what I did. He…he told me that y-you…h-hated me for killing your grandfather. Hated having a murderer for a mother, and that you did not want anything to do with me.”

A few more tears fell from her eyes at the painful memory. Katara again rubbed soothing circles on the older woman’s back. Her blue eyes showed her sympathy. She could not imagine the suffering Lady Ursa had to go through.

“I would never hate you! How dare he!” Zuko roared and slammed his hand down on the old wooden table, causing the teacups to rattle wildly.

He breathed deeply to regain his composure before he took his distraught mother’s hand and wiped her tears.

“He told me you were…dead,” he whispered and closed his eyes at the agonizing memory.

“D-dead?” Ursa gasped and covered her mouth with a trembling hand. “But he said…he…” she trailed off as her eyes widened.

“He lied to us all,” she whispered.

The firebender narrowed his eyes to infuriated slits and clenched his hands.

“He never cared for anybody but himself and possibly Azula,” he stated coldly.

“Azula…” Ursa whispered quietly and frowned sadly before she straightened in her seat. “I never heard much about you, once you were banished, since the Abandoned Fort is rarely interested in the outside world.”

Zuko looked away to stare out the dark window. His face darkened, the flames from the small fireplace casting shadows on his scarred face.

“I…have made many awful mistakes in order to regain what I thought was my lost honor, and I am ashamed,” he said quietly.

Katara looked between Zuko and his mother and kept silent, resisting the urge to comfort the young Fire Lord, her friend.

“All men make mistakes, Zuko, but only great men learn from them and try to correct them,” Ursa told him gently since she could see her son was tormenting himself.

When Zuko lifted his head to look at her, she smiled at him before she turned to look at the silent waterbender with another gentle smile.

“Katara has told me of the many wonderful things you have done for your country and the other nations,” Ursa told him softly, “I am proud of you, my son, and I am glad that you did not forget who you are.”

Lady Ursa gently took her son’s face into her hands and tenderly touched his scar with the tip of her fingers. Zuko cringed and tensed. Would she be disturbed by his scarred face? From the corner of his eye, he glanced at Katara who gave him a gentle, encouraging smile.

“If I had known Ozai would cause you so much pain, I would have fought for you even more. Please forgive me, my son,” Ursa whispered remorsefully, her golden eyes reflecting her pain and guilt.

Zuko relaxed at seeing that his mother was not disgusted by his disfigurement. He took hold of one of her hands and shook his head.

“It’s not your fault. It’s true that my scar haunted me for years, reminding me of my weakness and failure, but...” he paused as he looked at Katara and smiled warmly at her, “I have come to accept it and, thanks to Katara, I have come to embrace it as a part of who I am.”

Katara beamed at him. Ursa looked between the two of them and smiled.

Zuko turned back to his mother and continued, “I understand why you did what you had to do and I don’t judge you. After all, a mother would do anything to protect her young, right?”

Ursa and Katara smiled at his words.

“This is all Ozai’s fault,” Zuko growled out, his anger once again resurfacing. “I should have him executed for all the damage he has done to us.”
“No, Zuko,” Ursa protested and shook her head. “Do not be like him. You are better than that, better than him.”

Zuko sighed and nodded reluctantly before another question emerged in his head.

“Why did you not return to the Fire Nation when the Avatar defeated Ozai and I ascended the Fire Nation throne?” he asked with a frown.

The dark-haired woman was silent a moment and a small frown settled on her delicate features.

“I was still afraid of what you thought of me, but I had planned to return and plea with you to understand. That is, until I received a letter that said that you would never welcome me back to the palace after what I did,” Ursa said softly. “And so, with a sad heart, I remained in this place.”

“What?” Zuko asked and frowned. “I never said such a thing. Who could have sent such a letter if Ozai is in prison? Who else knows about what really happened to Azulon?”

“I don’t know,” Ursa responded and frowned deeply as well.

She stood up and walked across the small room to a dark wooden chest near the corner. Opening it, she ruffled through the contents until she returned to the small table with a scroll.

“I received this a few months after your coronation as the new Fire Lord,” she said quietly and handed it over to her son.

Quickly grasping the scroll, Zuko unfurled it and examined the piece of paper carefully for any signs that could reveal who could have sent the letter. Nothing gave any clues. The paper was thin and simple and the black ink was of cheap quality which indicated that it could not have been a member of the Royal Court. Unless, of course that was what the person wanted them to believe. Reading the words carefully once again, Zuko suppressed his anger at the words before he furrowed his brow as something nagged at the back of his brain. Was it him or did the writing style seem familiar?

“Did you find anything?” Katara asked as she peered over his shoulder. She noticed something flicker in his eyes that looked like recognition before he shook his head.
“No,” he sighed as his frown deepened. “I thought I did, though.”

He closed the scroll and glared at it as he held it in his hand. This was very troubling. He needed to be even more careful now.

“Well, the only thing that matters now is that you found your mother,” the waterbender chirped, bringing the Fire Lord out of his racing thoughts.

Zuko looked at Katara who smiled at him. He smiled at her and returned his gaze to his mother who was watching them with a curious smile.

“We shall leave the painful past behind us from now on and look to the future,” Zuko spoke up firmly. Standing up, he gently pulled his mother to her feet. “Let us return to the Fire Nation. To our home.”

Ursa packed a small bag with her meager belongings, and with a final farewell to her home for the past few years, followed her son and the young waterbending woman into the forest. Zuko had frowned at the few, old clothes his mother had packed and promised himself that she would never lack for anything ever again.

The three were currently making their way through the dark forest, with Zuko leading the way, a small flame on his palm. The last golden rays of sunlight had disappeared a few hours ago and a small crescent of a moon barely shone its light through the thick treetops. The firebender looked over his shoulder at his mother, still unable to believe she was finally by his side. He had to keep looking at her every few seconds, as if afraid she would suddenly disappear. She looked a bit older, but she also looked the same, her gentle smile and warm eyes were the same.

Zuko listened silently as Katara and Ursa immediately struck up a conversation concerning—of all things—how cute he was as a little boy. Zuko mentally groaned. Seriously, did they not understand how embarrassing that was? He heard Katara giggle as his mother finished yet another story from his childhood that, in his opinion, all involved embarrassing moments. He sighed. At least they were happy.

“One time when Zuko was four,” Ursa continued with a soft laugh, “he refused to wear his formal clothes for a ceremony, so he ran from his room nake—”

“Mother!” Zuko yelled in mortification and spun around. His face flushed when Katara started to “giggle. “I think that is enough about me. Why don’t you tell Katara about yourself?”

So I can at least salvage some of my male dignity, he mentally added.

Katara smiled brightly and clapped her hands enthusiastically.

“Oh, yes! Zuko told me that your favorite flower is the rose and it’s mine too!”

Ursa smiled and laughed daintily. “Why, that is wonderful, indeed!”

Zuko resumed walking and relaxed as the two women began to talk about flowers, chocolate pastries, cute little furry animals, and everything else that he categorized as female interests. He slowed his pace as he keenly scanned his surroundings for the path that would lead them to their campsite. Spotting a familiar cluster of trees and bushes, Zuko continued walking while he half-listened to his two companions.

“So, how did you learn to use the bow and arrows?” he heard Katara ask curiously.

Ursa looked over her shoulder to look at her bow and smiled.

“I actually learned in the Fire Nation Academy for Girls before…I married. All Fire Nation noblewomen are taught some form of self-defense, although many prefer to have their guards protect them. Since I am not a firebender, I chose the bow and arrows as my preferred weapon of choice. Of course, I never thought I would actually use it to protect myself as well as actually hit a living thing,” Ursa finished quietly as she lowered her head.

Zuko cursed Ozai for the millionth time for changing his mother into something she did not deserved or wanted to be.

Katara placed a hand on the older woman’s shoulder and gave her an understanding smile.

“My mother once said that not all of us are meant to be warriors because then who would be there to keep the peace?” she said with a small smile.
Ursa smiled and patted the girl’s hand. Now she understood why her son trusted this young woman so much.

“So you never told me how you two met,” Ursa called over to her silent son.

Zuko faltered in his steps before he straightened himself out.

“Uh…well…” He cleared his throat uneasily.

Katara laughed quietly at him.

“That was the first day we met he barged into my small village in the Southern Water Tribe with his ship, demanding we hand over the Avatar or else,” she explained. “And the next few encounters we had after that, he was always trying to capture us.”

Zuko’s shoulders slightly slumped.

“I told you I made a lot of stupid mistakes,” he said quietly to his mother.

“Yes, a lot of stupid mistakes,” Katara repeated, laughing teasingly. Now that they were very good friends, their hatred as enemies was long forgotten.

“Hey!” Zuko grumbled. “At least I didn’t kill you.”

Katara snorted and laughed.

“Not that you could if you tried,” she teased.

Zuko turned his head around and scowled at her, but his lips twitched upwards into a tiny smile.
Ursa smiled as she watched them banter.

“You made mistakes for understandable reasons, your honor and your home. In the end you joined the Avatar and stopped the war,” Ursa said.

“Yeah,” Zuko said and he smiled before he grinned. “But at first I wondered if I made the right choice.” He smirked. “I do recall somebody making my life a living hell when I joined the Avatar’s group.” He pointedly looked over at Katara.

Ursa looked over at the waterbender as well.

“I would not have thought you were like that,” she remarked lightly.

Katara blushed and ducked her head, causing Zuko’s smirk to widen a bit.

“Well… I mean… He betrayed me!” she accused weakly. “I was still a bit suspicious.” She looked away. Now it was her turn to feel remorseful for having treated Zuko so badly.

“Yes, and even though I confessed so many times that I was regretful and I really wanted to stop my father, she never stopped pestering me about my mistakes,” Zuko said with a loud mocking, sad sigh.

“I said I was sorry!” Katara cried out. She crossed her arms over her chest and huffed. “Be grateful I forgave you.” She scowled.

Zuko chuckled, unaware of the twinkle in Ursa’s eyes as she looked at one young person to the other.

Zuko and Katara kept Ursa entertained as they continued walking through the forest, playfully teasing each other for their past mistakes all the way. A chilly breeze blew by, causing Katara to shiver and rub her arms with her hands since she was only wearing a light tunic.

“Katara dear,” Ursa said worriedly, “Are you cold?”
Zuko looked over his shoulder and frowned as he continued to hold the flame in his hand.

Katara shook her head and smiled.

“No, it’s okay. I’m kind of used to the cold weather,” she said with a light laughed.

“Even so, you could catch a cold.” Ursa frowned, unconvinced.

Katara smiled at the worried, motherly tone the Fire Nation noblewoman had addressed her with. Her soft voice reminded Katara of her own mother and how much she missed her.

‘Katara, honey, put on your mittens,’ Kya ordered gently, ‘I don’t want you to catch a cold.’

Katara cleared her throat to keep her tears away at the memory.

“I’m fine, really. Besides, I can’t actually pull a parka out of nowhere—” She halted when they were suddenly plunged into darkness.

Katara’s heart pounded in alarm. She strained her eyes and ears in order to locate her companions. Why did Zuko disperse his flame? Where they being followed or something? Katara reached for her waterskin as she tried to calm her thoughts and her nerves.

She jumped when she felt something touched her arm before she felt smooth and warm material being draped over her shoulders. She tensed when she felt warm breath near her head. A slight shiver racked her body.

“Here, this will keep you warm,” Zuko’s baritone voice sounded behind her before she felt him step away.

A small flame reappeared and Katara found herself standing before Zuko. Ursa was a few feet away from them with a puzzled expression on her face before she looked her over and smiled. Looking down at herself, Katara realized that a dark red cloak was covering her shoulders and back.

What…?

Frowning, she looked over at Zuko and noticed he was just wearing his black tunic. Her eyes widened when she finally realized Zuko had taken off his cloak and placed it on her. It was still warm from his body heat, instantly shielding her from the chilly night.

“Thanks,” she said softly.

Blushing at his thoughtfulness and solicitousness, Katara wrapped the warm cloak tighter around herself and smiled at him.

Zuko gulped as a strange sensation coursed through his body at seeing Katara wearing his clothes. It pleased him. An unexpected and odd possessiveness took hold of him before he crushed it immediately. Clearing his throat, Zuko backed away and turned toward the path again.

“Your brother would probably try to kill me if I let you get sick,” he explained and shrugged, trying to hide his flushed features.

Katara laughed.

“Yeah, because then who would feed him?” She giggled again before she gasped. “Oh, no! They’re probably worried that I’m taking so long. Aang must be worried sick,” she whispered.

Zuko’s face hardened at the mention of the young monk’s name.

“Then we should hurry,” he said expressionlessly as the flame in his hand grew a bit hotter before he resumed his long strides with Katara following silently behind.

Lady Ursa stood in the same spot as a small frown marred her delicate face. She was puzzled at the sudden change her son’s mood took and wondered what had affected him.
Zuko looked behind him and saw that Ursa was not following.

“Mom, what is it?” he asked worriedly.

Did she not want to leave with him?

Ursa snapped out of her thoughts, and with a shake of her head, she smiled.

“Nothing, dear, I’m just glad to be returning to the Fire Nation with you,” she said instead and quickly walked to catch up to them.

Zuko smiled before he turned back around and led them into the silent night. Even though what his mother had said made him happy, he still felt a bit irritated at being reminded of his young airbending friend. Sokka and Toph had told him of instances where Aang would lose control and enter the Avatar State whenever something happened to Katara. Zuko did not blame him for being upset. He himself became upset and angry as well when Katara was in danger. But to lose complete control that he risked the lives of many innocent people?

Zuko mentally shook his head, reminding himself that Aang had been a young boy and maybe he had changed.

“Zuko dear,” Ursa’s soft voice brought him out of his thoughts, “How is Iroh doing?”

Zuko smiled fondly. “Uncle is doing well. We are actually on our way to Ba Sing Se to see him.”

“Ba Sing Se?” Ursa asked as she stepped over a tree root.

“Yeah, he owns a teashop called the Jasmine Dragon in the upper ring of the city,” Katara explained with a smile.

Katara listened silently as Zuko explained to his mother how the old prince had been by his side since his banishment, how they became fugitives from their own nation, and how they arrived at Ba Sing Se to try and start a new life. Katara grinned when Zuko told them he had to become a waiter. He, the Crowned Fire Prince! She stifled a giggle when she remembered coming upon him at the teashop with him wearing an apron.

“But Ba Sing Se is also the place where I did something awful. Something that I will always regret,” Zuko’s low voice continued, guilt evident in his tone.

Katara knew what he was talking about; his betrayal under the ancient catacombs that almost caused Aang’s death by Azula. And where her trust had at first been shattered by his siding with his sister.

“Didn’t we say we were leaving the past behind us?” Katara spoke up, to lighten the mood.

Zuko glanced at her from the corner of his eyes and smiled gratefully.

“Yes, thanks for reminding me.”

Ursa was confused, but it was obvious they did not want to talk about it and she understood. Perhaps once she was reunited with Iroh he could enlighten her a bit more. She smiled as Zuko continued with his account of what Iroh had been doing for the past couple of years.

Katara smiled as she watched Zuko interact with his mother. Sometimes he would turn to look at Lady Ursa as if making sure she was really there with him, and then he would smile.

Maybe he’s finally happy, Katara thought, proud for being the one to have found Ursa.

Another chilly wind blew by and Katara wrapped Zuko’s cloak tighter around her. On Zuko, the cloak reached to mid thigh, and on her, it fell down below her knees. The sleeves were too long for her, falling below her waist, which she was grateful for since they hid her hands from the cold. It was made of fine material, which did not surprise her since Zuko was the Fire Lord and all.

She glanced at Zuko, who was still conversing with Ursa, and blushed as she remembered how he had put it on her, his breath near her head, his warmth surrounding her body. And then when he saw her in it she noticed that some kind of emotion flickered in his golden eyes before he backed away.
Katara brought her covered hand to her face and subtly took a small sniff of the sleeve. Unlike Aang’s scent that reminded her of fresh grass and fruit, Zuko’s cloak had a mixture of spice, smoke, and sandalwood, all with a pleasant masculine musk. She blushed when she admitted to herself that she liked his scent, it was so warm and comforting.

“We’re here,” Zuko’s strong baritone snapped Katara out of her musings.

They could see a small campfire where two people were huddled near it—Sokka and Suki. Aang was standing a couple of feet away with his back turned toward the newcomers. His hands were balled into tight fists while Toph stood at his side obviously trying to calm him down. His form was trembling and he was shaking his head. They saw Toph rub her temples while she exhaled deeply.

Zuko glanced at Katara before looking away. He knew why Aang was upset.

“Katara!” they heard the Water Tribe warrior exclaim, relief evident in his voice.

Sokka leapt to his feet and raced towards his sister, stopping at the last second before he barreled into her. He took her into his arms and sighed heavily.

“Thank La you’re okay!” he exclaimed. He pulled her back out at arm’s length, checking her for any obvious injuries, before he groused, “You just love to give me heart attacks, don’t you?”

Ursa stood quietly as the young man fussed over her young friend. With a raised eyebrow, she glanced at Zuko who was smirking.

“I’m sorry I’m late, Sokka, but come on! I’m not a baby! I can take care of myself!” Katara huffed, but she smiled at her older brother. “But guess what? Zuko and I found Lady Ur—”

Before she could finish her sentence, Aang had practically flown from his previous spot and almost crashed into her as he hugged her. Katara stiffened at the unexpected act.

Zuko instinctively took a step forward before he relaxed, mentally shaking his head.

“Katara, I’m so glad you’re okay!” Aang cried out. “I was so worried something happened to you!”
He pulled away a few inches to place a hard kiss on her lips.

Katara’s eyes widened before she forcefully shoved him away. Ursa gasped and looked at her son, who had turned away from the scene, his face was dark and his lips were pulled into a tight, thin line.

“Aang!” Katara exclaimed angrily as she touched her lips, soothing them from the painful kiss.

Zuko glanced back at them and inwardly smirked at Katara’s irritated reprimand toward the Avatar. But Aang did not notice her disapproving tone as he crushed her into another hug. Zuko clenched his hands into fists to keep himself from ripping them apart. He looked away when he caught Ursa’s questioning look. He did not want to answer any questions she might have because he himself did not know the answers to his behavior.

“Where were you? Why didn’t you meet us as planned?” Aang’s relieved tone now slightly scolding.

Toph stomped her way over to them and wedged herself between them.

“Jeez, Sugar Queen! I’m so relieved you’re back! Twinkletoes here was ready to barge into the village in all his Avatar glory to find you. I don’t know how you have the patience to calm him down!” The blind earthbender crossed her arms and snorted.

“I was just really worried,” Aang said as he frowned.

Katara uncrossed her arms and sighed, feeling guilty for scolding him when he had just been worried for her.

“Not that this isn’t fun or anything,” Toph spoke up sarcastically. “But who’d you bring?” she asked, tilting her head in the silent woman’s direction.

The other three who had been waiting the arrival of their friends finally noticed the tall, graceful woman standing beside Zuko.

“As I was trying to say,” Katara spoke up as she moved away from Aang and Toph to stand beside Ursa, “Zuko and I found Lady Ursa.” She looked over at the woman and smiled.

Zuko nodded.

“That’s right. Sokka, Suki, Toph, Aang,” he called. He grabbed his mother’s hand and smiled. “I would like for you to meet my mother, Princess Ursa.”

Ursa smiled and gave them a small graceful bow in greeting.

“It is a pleasure to meet my son’s friends,” she said softly.

Toph grinned and bowed as well, elbowing both Sokka and Aang who were gaping. They blushed before they returned the bow. Suki finally stood up from her place to stand beside her boyfriend.

“Lady Ursa, this is my overprotective older brother, Sokka, and his girlfriend Suki, leader of the Kyoshi Warriors,” Katara introduced them and smiled fondly as she pointed at them.

“Uh, um, it’s nice to meet you, Princess Ursa,” Sokka finally said.

Suki smiled and gave a very awkward bow. Ursa looked the young couple over, especially the small bump on the young woman’s stomach and smiled.

“This is Toph Bei Fong,” Zuko said as he nodded toward his young friend. “She’s an Earthbending Master and Aang’s earthbending sifu.”

“Don’t forget Earth Rumble Champion and the first Metalbender in history,” Toph added and smirked, cracking her knuckles.

Katara rolled her eyes.

“Humble is one thing she’s not,” she muttered.
“I heard that,” Toph snorted before she addressed Ursa, “I’m glad to finally meet Sparky’s mom!”

“Sparky?” Ursa asked. Bemused, she looked over to her son who shook his head.

“And this is Aang, the Avatar,” Katara finished and pointed proudly at the young monk.

Ursa bowed deeply.

“It is an honor to meet the one who defeated Ozai,” she said.

Aang blushed and rubbed his neck.

“Uh…it’s an honor to meet you, too,” he replied. He laughed cheerfully as he returned the bow. “I’m also Katara’s boyfriend,” he added as he smiled at the waterbender.

“B-boyfriend?” Ursa stuttered, confused.

She looked at Katara who had found a sudden interest in her feet. Next she glanced at Zuko who again was looking away with an emotionless expression on his face. Ursa frowned in disappointment.

Before Aang could repeat himself joyfully, Zuko spoke up.

“We will rest here tonight and head to Ba Sing Se tomorrow morning,” he informed them. Turning to his mother, he continued, “Then toward the Fire Nation.”

Ursa smiled. She jumped in fright as something landed on her shoulder. Her eyes widened when she came face-to-face with a furry creature with bulging, green eyes and large ears.

“Z-Zuko?” she whispered uncertainly.
“It’s alright, Mother,” Zuko reassured her.

He smiled as he extended his arm. Momo did not hesitate to perch himself on the warm firebender’s shoulder with a content chirp.

“That’s Momo, a flying lemur,” Katara said as she smiled and patted the small animal’s head.

“From the Air Nomads,” Aang added.

Ursa relaxed and smiled slightly. Tentatively, she reached towards the small lemur and scratched his head. Momo closed his eyes and purred.

“He is adorable,” she cooed. A loud grunt made her jump again, she gasped slightly as a huge, white beast with horns and an arrow on his head yawned.

“Oh, and that’s Appa, my flying sky-bison,” Aang said proudly.

“How…furry,” Ursa said.

The others laughed quietly at her surprised expression.

“Let’s rest for the night,” Zuko spoke up again.

The others nodded and began to get ready for bedtime. Zuko made his way over to their belongings to grab an extra sleeping bag for his mother. He placed it near the campfire close to where he would rest. He smiled as Ursa struck up a conversation with Katara, Suki, and Toph. Katara placed her own sleeping bag on the opposite side of Ursa’s.

With a few yawns and good nights, they all settled in for the night, gaining warmth from the glowing campfire they surrounded. Zuko looked up at the starry night realizing that now—after four years—he would finally be able to go to sleep without wondering where his mother was or if he would ever see her again.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
They were a day away from Ba Sing Se when the travelers had decided to take a break in a small clearing surrounded by trees full of red and golden leaves. Small clouds lazily moved across the blue sky as the pale sun tried to give more warmth to the Earth below.

Ursa sat quietly, watching her son’s friends with a smile as they set up camp. She had observed that Sokka, Katara’s brother, was a funny and silly fellow who was obsessed with meat and was overprotective of the ones he loved, but he also had a clever mind. He and Zuko were very good friends, almost like brothers. His girlfriend, Suki, was a strong woman who usually kept Sokka in check. The young female warrior and she easily held conversations on weapons since both were non-benders. And Ursa was positive Suki would be a great mother.

She was amazed to find out that, even though Toph was blind, she did not let that hinder her and bring her down. She was rough and loud, always speaking her mind, sometimes very bluntly. The earthbender barely lifted a finger to help the others with chores, but the young girl had a noble heart and she always made Ursa laugh with her remarks. Ursa noticed that Zuko and Toph were fond of each other.

Unlike Zuko and Azula, she sighed sadly.

Aang, the young Avatar, was a very friendly and cheerful young man with a respect of all life and a gentle heart. But she had noticed that he was a bit overbearing in his relationship with Katara, always hovering over her as if he were afraid of being left alone. Ursa wondered why someone as mature as the young waterbender chose him as her boyfriend.

And then there was Katara, whom she had come to be very fond of. She was sometimes stubborn and headstrong, but she had a kind and loving soul. She was the maternal one of the group—always making sure everybody was fine and comfortable. Ursa had heard of Chief Hakoda, but his wife was never mentioned. She wondered to whom the necklace Katara wore used to belong to.

Finally, her eyes rested on her beloved son whom she had been afraid she would never see again. Zuko had grown into a strong and fine young man. From what Katara had told her, and from what she had observed herself, Zuko was a strong and just leader who worked hard for the betterment of his country and the peace among all nations. She was so very proud of her son, but something worried her. He was not as jovial and expressive as he used to be as a child, but quiet, stoic, and quick to anger. She was sure her former husband was to blame for that.

The Fire Nation noblewoman had observed that her son spent most of his time with Katara when Aang was not attached to her side. She also noticed, with some delight, that when Zuko was with the others he was impassive and calm, but when he was around Katara, it seemed like a bright light would ignite in his eyes and he would become carefree and almost cheerful. And when around him, Katara’s smiles were brighter and her laughs were louder.
Ursa puzzled over Zuko and Katara’s behavior. If she did not know any better, she would have believed those two had feelings for each other. Why were they with other people?

“Dinner’s ready,” Katara’s voice brought Ursa out of her observations. Lady Ursa moved away from the tree she had been sitting under to sit near the waterbender, who, as usual, was serving the evening meal.

Sokka appeared with a tired Suki by his side. The young tribesman had a worried and confused expression on his face as he helped Suki sit down on Katara’s other side. He noticed that his girlfriend had been so tired lately.

Zuko appeared next, after finishing his meditation. He walked over to the campfire and smiled as the delicious aroma of Katara’s cooking reached his nose. He sat himself between his mother and Katara and smiled at them both. Ursa smiled when Katara returned Zuko’s smile with a soft blush.

Aang and Toph showed up later, both laughing and shoving each other after a good earthbending spar. Toph dropped herself ungracefully across the fire and impatiently waited for her portion. Aang looked around the small campfire and scowled when he saw that there were no empty spots next to Katara. He looked at Zuko and gave him a pointed glare. Zuko just stared at him, unmov- ing, and raised a dark eyebrow.

“Aang, don’t just stand there, sit down,” Katara said, oblivious, as she began to hand over the bowls of steaming stew.

Aang frowned as he said, “But I want to sit next to—”

“Just sit down, Twinkletoes, so we can start eating!” Toph ordered loudly.

Aang grumbled lowly as he took a seat next to her and across the fire from where Katara sat next to Zuko. Aang was reminded of the time when they went to see the Ember Island Players four years ago, where he had wanted to sit beside Katara, but the former Fire Prince had shoved his way between them and took his spot.

_I wonder if Zuko does it on purpose_, Aang muttered in his head.
“When are we arriving at Ba Sing Se, Zuko?” Ursa asked her son as she gingerly ate her stew before smiling at the waterbender. “I must compliment you on your great cooking, Katara dear.”

Katara felt herself flush with pleasure.

“Thanks,” she said with a pleased smile, “My mother and grandmother taught me how to cook.”

Zuko smiled as he set down his spoon to answer his mother.

“If we leave at dawn tomorrow, we will arrive sometime before noon.”

“At dawn?” Sokka groused.

Zuko smirked.

“I know some find it difficult to rise at dawn,” he began, “but it’s best that we get there as soon as possible so I can return to my duties in the Fire Nation.”

Sokka sighed. “Yeah, I guess.”

“I am eager to see the great city of Ba Sing Se,” Ursa said with composed excitement. “I have never been outside of the Fire Nation before…well, except to the Abandoned Fort.”

Zuko frowned and cursed his father again. With a small frown, Katara watched as Zuko’s jaw clenched before she looked at Ursa.

“Oh, you’ll like it,” she spoke up with a bright laugh, hoping to lighten their mood. “We could take you and Suki to the spa, right, Toph?”

The earthbender snorted in her bowl in agreement.
“That sounds lovely. How long are we staying in Ba Sing Se?” Ursa asked again, missing the inside joke.

“Well,” Zuko began and furrowed his forehead, “I was thinking a few weeks.” He smiled as he took her hand. “And then we can finally return to the Fire Nation Palace together.”

_Aww, Katara cooed in her head, that is so sweet._

Ursa smiled before she looked at Suki and Sokka.

“Are you returning to Kyoshi Island or the Southern Water Tribe soon?” she asked curiously. “It is unwise to travel in your condition.”

Katara gaped and Suki brought her hand to her lips and gasped.

“What condition?” Sokka asked as he took a mouthful of the stew.

Ursa frowned at him.

“It is dangerous for both Suki and the baby to be traveling,” she said before she smiled at the wide-eyed female warrior. “Suki, you must take it easy and rest.”

“Baby?” Sokka repeated as he frowned and scratched his head while Suki held her breath.

Sokka’s eyes widened as he finally understood what Lady Ursa was saying before he started to laugh.

“Suki’s not pregnant! Right, Suki? Isn’t that funny?” he guffawed.

Ursa gaped at him and Katara groaned into her hands.
Sokka stopped laughing when Suki did not join in his laughter.

“Suki?” he asked again as he turned to look at her.

Suki’s bottom lip was trembling and her eyes glistened with unshed tears. At her hurt expression, Sokka felt his heart clench. He slowly looked down at her stomach and finally, finally noticed the bump. Sokka’s mouth flew wide open as the truth dawned on him.

Suki...is...pregnant? We’re having a baby? He was in shock for a second before he realized something else. I’m...I’m going to be a dad! Great joy flooded his heart to the point where he felt it was going to explode.

“Suki…” he began softly.

He moved to embrace her, but Suki jerked away from him and stood up. He gasped when he noticed she was crying and her eyes were full of hurt and sadness. Without warning, Suki turned on her heels and ran towards the dark trees.

“Suki!” Sokka yelled and sprang to his feet before racing after her.

Lady Ursa brought her hand to her mouth.

“I...I am so sorry,” she said guiltily. “I didn’t mean to divulge anything. I thought he already knew.”

“It’s okay,” Katara reassured her. “Nobody knew. Suki only told me. She was trying to find the right time to tell him. I guess I must thank you, I was afraid she would have finally revealed the news to him while she was giving birth!”

“Well, I’m glad Snoozles finally got it,” Toph remarked as she yawned, unimpressed.

“Wait, you knew?” Katara asked and placed her forgotten bowl next to her.

“Yep, I can feel more than just her heartbeat,” Toph said as she licked her fingers.
Katara looked over at Zuko who had a small smile on his face, unsurprised.

“Did you know, too?” she asked.

Zuko looked at her and shook his head.

“No, but I am not surprised by the news,” he said.

Katara opened her mouth to question him about it, but Zuko immediately interrupted her.

“I believe this will be a good time for Sokka to finally ask her,” he said. He did not want to tell Katara he had seen Sokka sneak out of Suki’s room in the middle of the night.

“Ask her what?” Aang piped in.

Zuko wiped his mouth before replying coolly, “You’ll see.”

They waited for a while for Sokka and Suki to reappear, but after a few hours with no sign of the couple, they began to grow anxious. Ursa sat quietly while Aang and Toph began to doze off.

Katara bit her lip nervously as she braided and unbraided her long hair several times. What if Sokka said something stupid and Suki decided to return to her home and leave him? Just as she was about to unbraid her hair again she felt someone’s warm hand cover hers. Startled, Katara looked up to see Zuko’s amused gaze.

“Everything will be fine. Sokka has a strange skill in getting himself out of trouble,” he said with a small grin.

Katara nodded and left her poor hair alone.

“You’re right,” she agreed with a small laugh. “Thanks.”
Aang, who was still sitting across from them, narrowed his eyes. He stood up and stomped his way over to them, sitting down on the empty spot next to Katara. Zuko released her hand and looked away, resisting the urge to roll his eyes at Aang’s glare.

Toph yawned and sat up.

“They’re coming back,” she said.

The group watched as Sokka emerged from the trees with a huge, goofy grin, holding a blushing and smiling Suki by the hand. The others visibly relaxed and smiled as well.

“Guess what!” Sokka said with a twinkle in his blue eyes. “I’m going to be a dad!” he exclaimed exuberantly.

“Tell us something we don’t know,” Toph muttered sarcastically and yawned.

Sokka scowled at the earthbender before he broke out into an ecstatic smile that almost reached to both his ears. He wrapped his arm around Suki’s waist while he placed a hand on her stomach.

“I proposed to Suki, and not only is she going to give me a child, she’s also going to be my wife!” he exclaimed happily. He placed a big kiss on his future bride’s cheek.

“Oh, my gods!” Katara squealed as she leapt to her feet and ran to her sister-in-law-to-be. They embraced each other and began to jump and laugh excitedly. “I’m so happy for you both!”

Katara pulled away and smiled at the betrothal necklace on Suki’s neck. It was a dark green leather strap with a smooth, light-blue stone in the middle.

“Thanks!” Suki laughed joyfully as she wiped a few tears from her eyes. “I’m so happy!”

Ursa stood up gracefully and gently hugged the pregnant woman.
“I wish you much happiness,” she said sincerely.

Suki smiled and thanked her.

Toph walked over to them and patted Suki’s back with a grin. A few years ago, Toph had been envious of the Kyoshi Warrior because she had gained the attention of the guy the blind earthbender had a crush on. But after realizing Sokka really loved Suki, Toph let go of her resentment and her silly crush. Unlike some people…

“Congrats, Warrior Princess. I hope the spirits give you lots of strength and patience to live with Snoozles,” Toph chortled.

“Hey!” Sokka complained indignantly.

Katara laughed and embraced her brother.

“I’m glad you finally stopped being stupid and asked Suki to marry you. Gran-Gran and Dad will be very happy,” she told him.

Sokka smiled and hugged his sister tighter.

“Thanks, little Sis.”

With a cheerful grin, Aang flew towards them with a small burst of airbending.

“Wow, guys, congrats!” he exclaimed.

Momo chattered excitedly on his shoulder.

Zuko, who had waited for everyone else to finish their felicitations, walked toward the newly engaged couple with a smile. He gently embraced Suki, mindful of her bulging stomach.
“Best wishes, Suki, on both your betrothal and your pregnancy.”

“Thank you, Zuko,” Suki said and smiled brightly.

Zuko moved next toward his Water Tribe friend and shook his arm while he patted his back.

“Congratulations, Sokka. This is indeed great news.”

“Thanks, man,” the warrior grinned broadly.

“Didn’t I tell you your fears were unnecessary?” Zuko reminded him with a smirk.

Sokka rubbed the back of his neck sheepishly.

“Yeah, I’ll admit you were right,” he admitted before he grinned. “We’re planning on having the wedding in the Southern Water Tribe in a few months, before the baby is born. And we’re hoping you all will be there!”

Aang and Toph immediately agreed.

Zuko looked at his mother and smiled.

“We wouldn’t miss it for the world,” he said.

Suki yawned softly and Sokka immediately pulled her to him.

“Suki, you look tired!” he exclaimed. “Let’s go get you and the baby some rest!”

Before Suki could protest, Sokka was already leading her to the spot he had chosen for them to sleep on. The others smiled as Sokka fussed over his pregnant betrothed, making sure she was comfortable enough in her sleeping bag, all the while cooing at Suki’s rounded belly.
Night had settled in, and with it, bright stars and a full moon. Zuko lay in his sleeping bag as he listened to the soft breathing of his sleeping companions and the occasional loud snore from Sokka.

‘Others are already getting ahead of you, you know!’ Iroh’s chuckling voice sounded in his head.

So…Uncle knew about Sokka and Suki’s child, huh? Clever, old man, Zuko mused and smirked.

‘When am I going to see you married and with little Zukos running around causing trouble?’

Zuko frowned. Sure, he saw himself married and with an heir since that was what was expected of the Fire Lord. But he never actually craved it like Sokka seemed to since he did not have great experiences with family.

‘You know, Nephew, it’s great that you are taking your responsibility in your duty for your people and your Nation seriously. But remember this, sometimes we must think of our own happiness in order to make those around us happy.’

Of course, he was happy. He had everything he wanted. He finally gained his rightful place on the throne, he was a powerful and respected Fire Lord, he had managed to save his country and his people from themselves and maintained peace with the other nations, he had a girlfriend who loved him, and he had finally found his mother.

Zuko turned onto his back so he could see the bright moon resting on the dark sky as a frown settled on his brow.

Then why did it seem like something else was missing in his life?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Midnight found Katara tossing and turning in her blue sleeping bag. It was a night with a full moon and she was wide awake, unable to close her eyes and get some rest for the following day.

Huffing, Katara sat up and looked around the small campsite. Toph slept in her earth tent a few feet behind her. With a sleeping Momo on his stomach, Aang slept on the other side of the still burning fire, away from the waterbender, where Sokka made him sleep ever since the young boy had reached puberty. Katara rolled her eyes. As if she would do anything ‘inappropriate’ while her brother slept a few feet away. Gross. Besides, she never felt the inclination to do such things with Aang.

Suki and Sokka slept close together a few feet away on her left side. Sokka was snoring, as usual, with a smile on his face. He had a protective hand over Suki’s swollen stomach. Katara smiled, wondering if she would ever be held in such an adoring and protective way.

Lady Ursa slept quietly on her right side, Zuko a few feet away from her in his own space. Katara sighed and smiled sadly. How long have Zuko and she been kept away from sleeping peacefully with their mothers close by to comfort them? How long have they been denied snuggling into their mothers’ loving embrace? Zuko, no longer a child, was denied that comfort. And she no longer had a mother to seek that comfort.

Looking up at the bright sliver moon, Katara touched her necklace and exhaled deeply in order to shake her melancholy away. After a few minutes of peaceful silence, the waterbender removed herself from her warm sleeping bag and quietly stood up. They had discovered a small lake less than a mile or so away from their camp. Maybe a midnight bath and swim would tire her enough to get some sleep.

Gathering a bar of soap and a white towel, Katara silently made her way toward the edge of their clearing. She passed Lady Ursa and then froze when she came near Zuko who had let out a groan. Katara glanced at the covered form that was Zuko and frowned when she noticed that he was breathing hard.

Is he having a nightmare? Is he hurt?

She reached out a hand to wake him up, but she paused when Zuko let out a moan. Katara pulled back when he rolled over onto his side with a sigh before he became still and resumed a steady breathing rhythm. Shrugging, Katara stood up and continued on her quest for some relaxation, letting the call of her element guide her through the darkness.

After a few minutes of walking, Katara pushed through a cluster of thick bushes and smiled at the scenery. The small, blue lake was surrounded by countless trees and bushes, serving as a sort of private bath. The full moon peeked through the clear top, which caused the surface of the dark lake to sparkle as if it were made up of dozens of bright diamonds. A few leaves detached from the tall trees and gracefully danced their way onto the surface of the water, causing a few serene ripples to spread.

Scanning her surrounding to make sure no unwanted visitors lurked around, Katara walked nearer to the water. Almost feeling like a giddy little girl, Katara removed her boots and pants. Reaching to remove her tunic, she stopped when her hands grazed soft, almost silky material. Looking down, she realized with some surprise that she was still wearing Zuko’s cloak. Taking it off, she held it in front of her before bringing it to her nose and taking a small sniff. Spicy smoke and sandalwood reached her senses.

Shaking her head, Katara carefully folded it and placed it on a neat pile with her belongings before removing her under-wrappings. Hanging the towel on a low tree branch, she grabbed the soap and gingerly walked to the edge of the small lake, careful of not stepping on a sharp stone or twig.

She dipped her right foot into the calm water and shivered at the cold contact. She rubbed her arms and blew warm breath into her hands. She vaguely wondered if bathing in cold water on a chilly night was a crazy idea before she took a big breath and dove into the clear water. She resurfaced and clutched her arms, her teeth chattering. Grabbing the slippery soap, Katara rubbed the small bar into a foamy lather and began to scrub her body. Next she scrubbed her scalp, and with some waterbending, washed her long, brown hair.

After she was finished, she placed the bar of soap on the edge of the small lake and dove under the water once more, swimming in a lazy pattern in her element. Resurfacing, she bent a few tendrils of water and made them dance around her as they glistened under the silver moonlight.

In a few weeks, they would leave Ba Sing Se and return to their homes and duties. She will resume her waterbending instructions with the children and help out with the upcoming wedding and festival. Aang and Toph will be heading to Omashu for a meeting with King Bumi before they joined them in the Southern Water Tribe to help with the upcoming events as well. Lady Ursa would finally return to the Fire Nation with her son after so many years of being away from her home country. Katara was a bit saddened by this for she had come to enjoy Ursa’s company, her soft voice and motherly concern made the young woman think of how her own mother would have been if she were still alive.

And then there was Zuko. He would be returning to his obligations to his country as Fire Lord. He would probably visit the Southern Water Tribe for Sokka and Suki’s wedding.

_Hopefully this time he won’t burst into our wall with his flagship_, Katara thought and giggled softly.

But then after the wedding…when would she see him again? In another four years? In a decade? When would they ever banter with each other? When would they have another spar? Would they spend time together talking pleasantly or just sitting in comfortable silence ever again?

Katara dropped the tendrils of water she was bending, surprised at the painful ache these questions brought to her heart. She touched her chest lightly and frowned.

“What is wrong with me? I knew we would part ways eventually. We both have our duties to fulfill.” She let her arm drop to her side and it splashed into the water. “I have helped him find Lady Ursa and now he will be happy. He doesn’t need me.”

Tears began to sting the back of her eyes and she was startled at her strange reaction. Blinking fiercely, Katara shook her head before she submerged her whole body into the cold yet comforting shadows of her element.

Zuko groaned as Katara placed light kisses on his face before she trailed her lips down his neck. He grabbed her by the waist and pulled her closer to him before he kissed her plump lips. He caressed her arms and then her hips.

Pulling away, Katara giggled and ran her soft hands on his chest, gently running her fingers to his abdomen and back up again. Zuko moaned as her hands teased his navel a few inches from where he wanted her to touch him before he growled in disappointment when she pulled her hands away to rest them behind his neck.

She placed her lips on his and sensually began to lick his mouth. Zuko let out another groan as he felt his length harden even more than it was. He moved his hand to the hem of her skirt and slowly lifted it up as his breathing became more labored. He wanted her so badly. He was about to remove the wrappings that kept her from him before a loud snapping sound startled him.

Zuko sat up abruptly as his still cloudy mind tried to take in his surroundings, his ragged breathing the only sound in his ears. Another snapping and popping sound made him stiffen before he realized it was just the wood being consumed by the flames of the campfire. Feeling his face flush, he listened in panic for the sound of his companions voicing their disgust for his...dream. After realizing he was the only one awake, Zuko held back a groan as he noticed his erection making a tent in his sleeping bag.

Not again! He pulled on his hair, wanting to slap himself for his perverted mind and body. He became outraged when other men dared to even consider looking at Katara, and there he was, having such erotic dreams about her!

Shoving his too warm sleeping bag to the side, Zuko stood up, and without looking at the spot where the star of his dream was peacefully sleeping, he walked to the edge of the clearing. Maybe a swim in the cold lake they found earlier will help cool down his blood. Not bothering to light a flame in his hand since the full moon provided enough light, Zuko broke from the undergrowth that led to the lake and held his breath.

The scene was indeed beautiful. The twin image of the bright, full moon rested tranquilly on the middle of the small, dark blue lake. The leaves of the trees danced elegantly as a soft breeze blew by. Zuko shook himself, and without another glance around the little sanctuary, he quickly made his way to the edge of the lake and dropped to his knees.

He scooped some water into his cupped hands and splashed it onto his head, shuddering as the cold water came in contact with his heated flesh, running down his head, face, and neck just like Katara’s kisses had done in his dream a moment ago. Shaking his head, Zuko splashed more water onto his face, deciding whether to throw himself into the lake with clothes on and all in order to cool down his heated blood.

Sitting on his hunches, Zuko took a deep breath and exhaled before something resting on the edge of the water near him caught his eye. He grabbed the object and realized it was a bar of soap.

Strange, he thought as he turned the wet soap over, Where did this come from?

A small movement in the calm lake caught his attention and Zuko looked over at the water, squinting. A person’s head had emerged from the lake, not realizing he was there. Zuko’s eyes widened and his mouth fell open once he recognized who it was.

“K-Katara…” he stammered in a low whisper.

Katara was playing with her hair that she had placed over her shoulder, covering her chest. She was in the middle of the small lake and in the center of the moon’s reflection. Her wet hair and skin gleamed under the moon’s soft light, making her look ethereally beautiful. She was humming a sweet melody as she caressed her wet hair.

He knew it was inappropriate from him to be there, staring. He knew he should return to camp before she saw him. He knew he should leave her alone, but he couldn’t. His body did not obey his command to leave the place. He was too mesmerized by the enchanting yet oblivious woman before him. He felt his loin twitch again and he dropped the soap. It fell into the water with a soft ‘plop’.

Katara froze at the sound, and looking up in the direction the sound had come from, she gasped.
“Zuko!” she shrieked and submerged herself into the water up to her chin, covering her chest with her arms, her cheeks burning.

Zuko opened and closed his mouth, but no sound came out as he continued to stare at her with wide eyes. Katara’s shock quickly turned to anger. Zuko gulped as he saw the fire in her eyes as she raised one arm from beneath the water.

“Ka-Katara…wait! I…I,” Zuko stuttered from the edge of the lake.

“Pervert!” she screamed and lashed out with a large water whip.

Zuko remained frozen as he tried to get his brain to function again before he jumped out of the way just in time before he was hit.

“Katara! Please, let me explain!” Zuko tried to say as he dodged another whip from smacking him.

But Katara wouldn’t have it as she continued to lash out in anger and embarrassment.

“I never thought you were this dishonorable!” she cried out.

“I am not dishonorable!” Zuko yelled indignantly as he finally dissolved her water whip with a fireball. “I’m trying to tell you it was an accident!”

Katara scoffed and raised another whip to show him what she thought about his accident, but she stopped it in midair when Zuko turned around, his back facing her.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to intrude upon your privacy. I didn’t know anybody was here,” Zuko’s calm and sincere voice reached her ears. “Please believe me when I say that I meant no disrespect.”

Katara regarded him for a long moment, her eyes narrowed in thought, before she sighed and dropped her weapon back to the lake.

“I believe you, but don’t turn around if you know what’s good for you,” she warned firmly.
Zuko heard Katara as she swam and pulled herself out of the water before her small footsteps reached his ears. His breathing sped up as he wondered what she was doing.

“You’re lucky you’re my friend or else I would’ve frozen you at the bottom of the lake,” he heard her grumble.

Zuko turned around to see Katara glaring at him with her hands on her hips. The young firebender was barely able to keep his facial expression neutral as his eyes roamed over the woman’s curvy body standing before him. Katara was only wearing a white towel that barely reached to her thighs and contrasted wonderfully with her dark skin. Little rivulets of water ran down her long hair, her caramel skin, her shoulders, her arms, down her long legs…Zuko swallowed as he fought from pitching a tent in his trousers at the delightful sight before him.

Katara raised an eyebrow and crossed her arms.

“It’s rude to stare, you know,” she said, hiding the shiver that ran down her body at Zuko’s intense gaze.

Zuko snapped his eyes away from her barely covered body to her blushing face. He smirked and walked closer to her, surprised that she did not back away. He circled around her to stand behind the young woman before he leaned close to her ear.

“I remember somebody had the same problem one day in my bedchamber,” he whispered.

Katara blushed. She had hoped he had not noticed her staring at his body when he was just wearing a red towel around his waist.

“Yeah…w-well…I was surprised, that’s all!” she stammered. “I was embarrassed and I didn’t know what to do!”

“Hm.” Zuko smirked. “Don’t you think I feel the same?” he murmured, his voice sounding soft and velvety, his hot breath caressing her ear.

Katara bit her lip softly has her stomach tightened in an unfamiliar way. Zuko moved his face from her ear to her hair. He sniffed discreetly and sighed as her sweet gardenia aroma greeted his senses. His mind was getting hazy as he leaned down to place a kiss on the waterbender’s neck.

A cat-owl screeched as it flew away from a tree and up into the sky. Both benders jumped in surprise before Zuko turned around as he tried to control his body’s reaction.

Clearing his throat, Zuko placed his hands behind his back.

“IT’s very late,” he stated coolly, “You should dress before you catch a cold. I will wait for you behind the bushes so I could escort you back to camp.”

“I can take care of myself,” Katara argued and sighed.

“I know, but the fact that we are no longer at war doesn’t make this forest less dangerous. Who knows what could be lurking in the shadows,” the firebender said, his voice turning hard at the thought of somebody daring to sneak a peek at a bathing Katara.

The waterbender shuddered.

“I guess you’re right. Thanks,” she said with a blush.

She watched Zuko give her a nod before he walked away, disappearing silently behind the bushes and trees. Katara snapped out of her daze before she walked back to where she had placed her neat pile of clothes, knowing Zuko would not break his promise about her privacy.

What just happened?

She had always been protective of her modesty and Zuko had almost seen her naked and yet that did not bother her. She was embarrassed and shy, yes, but somehow she did not feel outraged or uncomfortable. Even after he gazed at her entire body and stood quite close to her. Katara shook her head. Maybe it was because she knew Zuko would not be interested in her that way. After all, he had said so before.

With a long sigh, Katara finished dressing, and with a final look at the lake, she emerged from the secluded area. She noticed Zuko a few feet away, leaning casually on a tree, the soft moonlight making him look even more handsome. She moved toward him and lowered her gaze with a blush. Zuko moved away from the tree to hook a finger under her chin so he could look into her eyes.

“What’s the matter?” he asked with concern. He noticed her blush deepened in color.

“It…it’s just that…” she stammered. She was embarrassed to tell him that it would be scandalous if it were found out she was taking a bath while a man was near, even if nothing had happened.

It seemed he knew what she was thinking for he said, “There is no need for you to feel concerned. Your virtue and modesty have not been damaged.”

Zuko gave her a reassuring smile. Nobody needed to know. Katara smiled gratefully, the awkward tension disappearing. She lifted her hands and handed Zuko his cloak back.

“Here, I forgot to give it back to you. Sorry.”

Zuko reluctantly took it. He had noticed she went to sleep with it on and it had somehow pleased him.

“No worries. I don’t really need it anyway,” he said with a smirk and placed it over his shoulder. He grinned when Katara rolled her eyes. “It’s best we return before your brother…or Aang throws a fit.”

Katara laughed as she fell in step beside him. They walked in silence for a few minutes, the moon casting silvery light through the treetops, both lost in their own thoughts. Katara looked up as she heard the crackling of their small campfire before she felt Zuko grab her arm, stopping her before she reached the clearing.

“What is it, Zuko?” she asked quietly.

“I haven’t thank you for finding my mother and bringing her back into my life,” he whispered softly.

Zuko hesitated for a moment before he wrapped his arms around her body and pulled her into a hug. Instead of stiffening, Katara relaxed in his arms, smiling.
“Thank you,” he whispered against her head.

“Anything to make you happy, Zuko,” Katara said as she smiled and squeezed him.

_I have something in mind that will make me happy_, Zuko thought and mentally groaned before berating himself. He pulled away and turned her around so she wouldn’t see what needed to be made happy.

“You should go first and then I will follow a few minutes after so as not to raise any suspicions, just in case,” he said and gave her a light push.

Katara turned slightly to mouth the words ‘good night’ with a smile. Zuko nodded as she left and he waited for his turn to reappear. Judging that a reasonable amount of time had passed, Zuko made his way back into the clearing. Making sure not to look over to where Katara slept, Zuko crawled into his sleeping bag with a frustrated and inaudible sigh, willing his mind to forget his most recent dream and the lovely images of the lake.

No woman had ever affected him so much as this waterbender did. And now that he thought about it, it all started the moment he had first seen her when he invaded her small village. He turned in his sleeping bag, uncomfortable at the memory. He would always feel guilty for barging into the Water Tribe village and frightening Katara and her people.

He was not used to feeling such guilt, he was not used to feeling concern for anybody, and yet he always felt bad when he hurt Katara. He always felt the need to protect and comfort her. Why was it that he felt such things for her? Zuko rolled over onto his back and gazed at the bright stars and the large, full moon as if they could help him understand what was going on with him.

He closed his eyes after a moment of silence. Something told him he was getting himself into something deep, something that he had never encountered before, but the strange thing was that he did not know if he could or wanted to stop.
Enclosed City

The bright sun peeked over the tall mountaintops, warming the Earth below with soft pink, lavender, and golden hues, signifying the start of a new day. A chilly breeze blew by, reminding the world that the seasons were changing. A few birds rose from their warm nests and began to sing the coming of dawn.

Katara opened one blue eye and was greeted with the early colors of a bright new morning. Stifling a yawn, she blinked a few times to get rid of the sleep embedded in her eyes and frowned. Why did she wake up so early?

Sitting up with her warm sleeping bag still around her, Katara drowsily looked around their little campsite and noticed that everybody else was still asleep. A crackling sound drew her attention to the small campfire where the fire had died down during the night into a few glowing embers.

Suddenly, she remembered why she had woken up earlier than usual. They were to travel to Ba Sing Se at the break of dawn. But then why was everybody still sleeping? She looked over to where Zuko had laid out his sleeping bag the night before and saw that he was still asleep.

_That’s strange_, she thought, _Zuko’s always already awake by dawn._

She glanced at his sleeping face and noticed that he had a small smile on his lips. Smiling gently, Katara wondered if he was dreaming. A memory of what happened at the lake the previous night flashed before her eyes.

His intense golden eyes roaming her body, his warm breath caressing her ear…

Her cheeks began to burn and she was positive her face was turning red.

Oh, gods, I can’t believe Zuko almost saw me naked! How embarrassing! Mortified, Katara placed her hands over her cheeks and shut her eyes tight. Well, at least it was Zuko and not some old perverted stranger…She shuddered at the disturbing thought.

Another image from about a month ago surfaced in her mind. It was Zuko, almost nude with a crimson towel wrapped around his lean hips and droplets of water coursing down his muscular torso…
I guess we’re even now, Katara thought with a smirk before she blushed. Oh, La! I can’t believe I’m daydreaming about a half-naked Zuko!

Shaking her head, Katara decided to start on breakfast in order to keep her mind busy from confusing thoughts of glorious masculine bodies…namely Zuko’s.

Stop it! Katara yelled at her imaginative mind.

Blushing furiously, Katara opened the bag of food supplies and began to rummage inside. She had seen other men without shirts, especially in their trip to Ember Island. Aang tended to practice without shirts too. But then why didn’t the thought of Aang shirtless cause her face to burn like it did when she thought about Zuko?

Shaking her head with a frown, the waterbender pulled a pan from the bag. She again looked up at the morning sky and wondered if perhaps Zuko decided that they would leave for the great Earth Kingdom city later in the day. Shrugging, she added a few wood sticks and small logs to make the fire stronger and placed the pan over it.

Frowning, Zuko shifted in his resting place as the smell of roasting meat reached his nose. He rolled to his side, taking another sniff, and sighed as his dream resurfaced in his hazy mind…

He was sitting in the Royal Palace Garden under his favorite cherry blossom tree. Beside him sat his mother and they were smiling as they fed the turtle-ducks, who waddled away from the pond to nibble on the morsels they provided.

Suddenly, he felt someone come up from behind and sit next to him. Turning, he opened his mouth to greet Mai, but was mildly surprised when he realized it was not his black-haired girlfriend, but the blue-eyed waterbender that took a place by his side.

He smiled as she gracefully sat on the green grass, arranging her red dress around her feet. Zuko vaguely wondered why she was wearing red, but he found he was quite pleased. Katara returned his smile and thanked Ursa when the woman handed her a piece of bread and the two women laughed as they fed the little creatures. Zuko looked up to the sky and watched as clouds lazily passed them by. He felt so at ease.

A small weight on his shoulder brought his attention back to his surroundings. He looked over at Ursa and noticed that his mother was smiling warmly with a twinkle in her golden eyes. He looked down to where his mother’s gaze shifted to and noticed a head of brown hair resting lightly on his shoulder. He gasped when Katara lifted her head to give him a bright smile that caused his heart to skip a beat…

Zuko’s amber eyes opened and blinked a few times as the clutches of sleep began to leave him.

Whoa, that was strange, he thought. Where did that come from? He frowned. Well, at least it was not like the previous dreams that have begun to plague me constantly.

But he had to admit he had not had such a peaceful and relaxing dream since his early years of childhood. He sighed quietly. It made him feel…content.

The young Fire Lord allowed his eyes to scan around and he saw that light was shining on the trees before him. He heard birds chirping somewhere overhead before he yawned and closed his eyes to doze off again.

He bolted up into a sitting position and cursed. It was dawn already and he overslept!

He threw his warm sleeping bag from his body and scrambled to his feet. He opened his mouth to order the others to wake up when he noticed that Katara was already awake and had started on breakfast.

So that’s what I smelled in my dream, he mused as he put on his black, pointed boots and quietly made his way to the campfire.

Why am I having so many dreams about Katara? he asked himself as he quietly made his way to the busy waterbender who had still to acknowledge that he was awake as well.

Are these dreams trying to tell me something? He frowned as he felt an ache in his chest before a thought formed in his head. Am I really…falling for Katara?

Zuko shook his head before frowning even deeper.
No. That can’t be it. I can’t fall in love with my friend. It has to be something else. Yes, that’s it. It must be something else… He stopped a few feet behind the waterbender and sighed inaudibly… Right?

“Good morning, Katara,” he called softly, but apparently not soft enough because she jumped and almost dropped the pan she was holding. “Sorry, I didn’t mean to startle you,” he apologized quietly.

He watched as a blush stained her cheeks, reminding him of what he had come across the night before.

Smooth shoulders and long legs the color of caramel, wet chocolate-brown hair, damp white towel…

He mentally shook his head before it wandered off too much.

“N-no, it’s fine!” Katara squeaked before clearing her throat. “I just didn’t hear you.” She smiled bashfully. “Oh, and good morning even though I thought I would’ve said that a couple of minutes ago,” she teased and giggled.

Zuko rubbed the back of his neck and cleared his throat.

“Yeah, I…kind of overslept,” he muttered.

“Yeah, I kind of figured that out,” Katara retorted playfully. She laughed softly when Zuko scowled.

She turned around and continued with her chore.

“How about you wake the others while I finish here? That way we can leave right away. Uncle Iroh must be impatient to see us,” she said as she turned to smile at him again.

Zuko nodded and walked to where the rest were peacefully sleeping.

The young lord smiled as he heard the fondness in Katara’s voice as she mentioned the tea-loving old man. He remembered how his uncle had insisted the waterbender call him ‘Uncle’ Iroh that time they all helped the old firebender in his teashop after the war. He vaguely wondered why his uncle insisted Katara call him such and why only her. Iroh was fond of Toph too, but he never insisted that she call him ‘Uncle’ as well.

Dismissing the thought, Zuko first woke Aang, who rose with a loud yawn. Momo mimicked his master and stretched lazily on the airbender’s bald head.

After a few minutes, Zuko was able to wake a snoring and drooling Sokka, who immediately wrapped a protective arm around his betrothed and their unborn child while grabbing his boomerang. After realizing who had disturbed him, Sokka nodded groggily in understanding and gently shook Suki, placing a soft kiss to her temple to wake her up.

The young Fire Lord then knocked on the stone wall that housed Toph, calling to her that they were getting ready to depart. He then immediately left for he was smart enough not to insist too much unless he wanted to deal with a cranky earthbender early in the morning.

Zuko next moved to his mother and smiled at her peaceful face. Soon they would return home and she would have all the time she wanted to rest. He shook her shoulder gently and Ursa immediately stood up, greeting him with a warm smile. The young man helped her packed their things and handed their belongings to Aang who placed them on Appa’s saddle.

Zuko watched as the group dragged their feet around the clearing while rubbing the sleep from their eyes. Apparently, only firebenders were morning people.

After picking everything up, the little group settled around the small campfire and waited for the waterbender to serve them their breakfast. The sun was rising slowly, illuminating their small clearing and causing the dew resting on the tips of the green blades of grass to glisten.

A few minutes later, they heard a low rumble as Toph’s earth tent was lowered back to its original place in the ground and a grinning earthbender emerged, stomping her way to the circle of friends.

“Had a good night sleep, Toph?” Aang asked, smiling cheerfully as he munched on some berries Momo had given him. It was a bit unusual for the earthbender to wake up in such a good mood so early in the morning.

“Not really, what with all the vibrations last night,” Toph said as she yawned and smirked as if she knew something.
“What vibrations?” Sokka asked with a full mouth.

“Oh, I don’t know. I was sure I felt something…or someone walking in the middle of the night, possibly to the lake we found yesterday. Did you hear anything last night, Sugar Queen?” Toph asked innocently as her smile broadened before she tilted her head in Zuko’s direction. “How about you, Sparky? Did you have any trouble sleeping?”

Katara blushed lightly and averted her eyes to the plate in her lap. Zuko glared as Toph smirked.

“No, I actually slept well,” he answered impassively.

“Of course you did,” Toph replied.

She grinned and chuckled, making everybody look at each other in confusion and causing Zuko to inwardly cringe in horror at the possibility of her knowing what the first dream he had the night before consisted of.

Clearing his throat, Zuko looked around at the others.

“We should hurry if we are to arrive at Ba Sing Se today.”

The others nodded as they rushed to finish their small meal.

A few minutes later, Zuko waited patiently as all their supplies were piled on the sky-bison’s saddle. He looked around the small clearing they had made their stay in for the night to make sure they had not forgotten anything.

Zuko watched as Aang bent a small ball of air and propelled himself onto Appa’s massive head with a cheerful laugh. He then watched as Momo landed on Appa’s nose and the two animals began a conversation that consisted of grumbles and chirpings. Zuko frowned as Toph passed him by and gave him a huge grin while wiggling her eyebrows.
Okay…? he thought.

Smiling, he helped his mother stepped onto the large saddle, earning a loving pat on the cheek.

He then turned to look at the lovely and confusing waterbender whom it seemed he could not stop thinking about. Zuko watched as Katara bent down to grabbed her waterskin from the ground, unintentionally presenting to him her lush backside and causing his heart to race. He looked away and cleared his throat.

He smiled as Sokka helped his future wife settle comfortably on the saddle while cooing at her bulging stomach. Asking for an apple even though she had eaten breakfast a few minutes ago, Suki smiled lovingly as her betrothed readily agreed to give her one and searched through their food supplies.

Sokka turned around with the red apple in hand and went to give it to Suki, but cried out in indignation as Momo snatched it up. Sokka jumped after the lemur, but lost his balance and toppled over the saddle with a surprised cry.

It seemed they were ready to go.

“Look! We’re finally here!” Aang cried out excitedly before he called out, “Yip, yip!”

He flicked Appa’s reins, indicating to the sky-bison to fly faster. Appa let out a groan as he increased his speed.

The great city’s stone walls emerged before their eyes, casting shadows on the ground surrounding the borders.

“Oh, my! It is incredible,” Ursa awed as the small group flew over the tall walls of Ba Sing Se.

They leaned over the side of the saddle and watched as the people below looked up when the large animal’s shadow fell over them. The people began to cheer and point excitedly as they realized the Avatar had come to visit their grand city. Aang waved enthusiastically at them, earning a few more cheers.
“Your love for public adoration seems to never die, Twinkletoes,” Toph muttered sarcastically.

“I can’t help it if the people love me,” Aang replied and grinned cheerfully.

“Whatever,” Toph retorted with a scoff, rolling her eyes. She snorted and slouched deeper into the saddle.

Katara frowned as she looked over at Aang. She knew the people adored Aang for bringing down the terrible Fire Lord Ozai and she especially remembered a few girls who practically fell all over him. Koko from Kyoshi Island especially came to mind. She had felt slightly jealous in the beginning of their relationship, but now she felt almost nothing because she knew he was the Avatar and in a way belonged to everyone. The only thing that did bother her was that Aang seemed to enjoy the attention a bit too much to the point where it seemed he completely ignored her sometimes.

Is something wrong with me for feeling this way? Katara asked herself and frowned even deeper.

She returned her gaze to the ground below and noticed that a few people were now pointing and cheering for the young Fire Lord. She looked over to where Zuko sat perfectly straight with an almost bored expression, not acknowledging the cheers sent his way.

I guess he must be used to the attention since he is royalty and all, she mused.

Katara noticed that morning that he had changed into a more formal-type of travelling clothes. His short hair was now pulled back into a topknot with his royal fire crown resting proudly on his head. She guessed it was because Zuko was meeting the Earth King, and being the Fire Lord he had to present himself as such.

And he does look stunning, she admitted with a blush.

“Should we have sent a messenger ahead of us to prepare the Earth King of our arrival?” Katara asked, looking at Aang and then at Zuko.

“I believe it is unnecessary,” Zuko replied coolly as he looked over at her and nodded to the people below. “I’m sure King Kuei knows we’re here already.”
He turned his attention to his mother who was watching the extremely large Earth Kingdom City of Ba Sing Se rush below them. Ursa raised her head and looked over at her son with a confused expression.

“Why are there walls inside the city? It almost seems like the city is being divided into sections.”

“That’s because it is divided into sections,” Toph spoke up. She snorted again and crossed her arms over her chest.

“Ba Sing Se is divided into three rings,” Zuko elaborated. “The Upper Ring is where the rich and wealthy reside in elegant homes. The Middle Ring is the financial district, with shops and restaurants and the university. The Lower Ring is where merchants, artisans, the poor and refugees live in,” his voice sounded almost bitter. “This is where Uncle and I first lived when we came to Ba Sing Se during the time we were hiding from Ozai.”

Katara frowned as she remembered coming upon the Lower Ring of Ba Sing Se almost four years ago. She could not believe that she, along with her companions, were enjoying the pampered lifestyle of the wealthy when they had first arrived to the city of walls while others were barely able to enjoy a meal. If only there was something she could do about it just like that poor village where she appeared as the Painted Lady.

“That is horrible,” Lady Ursa gasped.

“Yeah, but it’s not as bad as it was four years ago,” Aang said and turned around a bit from his perch on Appa’s head. “Toph and I were able to convince King Kuei to send help to those from the lower district. It was small help since Ba Sing Se had lost much after the war, but at least the people are not as worse as they were during the war.”

“Perhaps I can do something about that,” Zuko spoke up, his face hinting no emotion, but his eyes glinting with determination. “Maybe I could promise King Kuei that I will aid the Lower Ring to prosper in exchange for something.” He frowned. “I just need to think of what.”

He remembered how hard it was to live by on what his uncle and he earned at the teashop in the dirty and poor district of Ba Sing Se. They had met a few people who were kind to them and so he wanted to help them. Ursa smiled proudly at him and patted his arm.

The ground below changed from the grand and elegant houses of the Upper Ring to a grand wall with a massive gate, and beyond that stood the Earth King’s palace. A few guards approached and waved their hands to signal where the sky-bison should land. Appa groaned as he slowed his speed and landed softly on the stone floor, a few clouds of dirt swirled at the landing breeze Appa created.

And just like Zuko predicted, King Kuei stood on top the long flight of stairs that led into the palace with a large smile on his young face. Bosco, his brown bear, lay by his feet with a small green vest and a hat. A few servants were waiting patiently behind them.

They were surprised, however, to find Iroh grinning madly at them beside the young ruler of Ba Sing Se with Mai and Ty Lee at his side. Iroh’s grin was then replaced by disbelief and then delight as he spotted Lady Ursa before he quickly made his way down the stone stairs. Once he reached the bottom, he raced toward the new arrivals.

The gang dismounted Appa, who was then led away to rest in the stables, and approached the long flight of stairs. Iroh reached them and opened his arms wide to the young woman who was his good friend and had gone missing for years.

“Ursa!” Iroh exclaimed happily and a wide smile spread across his excited wrinkled face. “I see Zuko has found you. It is good to see your lovely face again. I am so happy that you are finally here with us.”

“It was actually Katara who found me first,” Lady Ursa replied with a smile before she embraced the old man warmly, her eyes shining with unshed, joyful tears. “Iroh, I am glad to see you once again. I was afraid I would never see you or Zuko again in my life.” She tightened her hold slightly and laughed. “I see you have not change. You still smell like jasmine tea,” she teased.

Iroh chuckled joyfully and patted her back soothingly. They slightly pulled away and Iroh held onto her hands.

“I still can’t believe that after all these years I have been fortunate enough to see you once again,” he confessed, causing Ursa to smile.

Iroh returned his attention to his nephew, who was smiling at them, although he tried to hide it.

“Did I not tell you,” Iroh began, “that you would find your mother with some hope and patience?” The retired general then glanced at Katara. “And some help?”
“Yes, Uncle.” Zuko nodded as he, too, looked at Katara who blushed under his gaze. “That you did.”

Iroh beamed before he looked at Katara who was smiling at them.

“Ah, my dear Katara,” he exclaimed as he walked over to her and gave her a warm, grateful hug. “I want to thank you for helping my nephew.”

Katara blushed again and sneaked a glance at Zuko.

“Um…you’re welcome…”

“Let’s go greet King Kuei and his beloved Bosco. I bet you all must be tired,” Iroh continued as he chuckled before he looped his arm around Ursa’s. “And then we will discuss your whole disappearing act, my dear Ursa, over some nice warm tea.”

Ursa smiled slightly and allowed herself to be led toward the flight of stairs by her good old friend, whom she sometimes saw as her older brother.

“Yes, we have much to discuss, Iroh dear,” she said and inclined her head towards her son who was talking to the young Water Tribe woman before the Avatar stepped in.

Iroh chuckled and nodded.

The group finally climbed the stairs and began to greet the Earth King and his furry friend. Bosco gave a friendly growl and licked Aang’s face, causing the young boy to laugh. Katara laughed at the scene before she caught Mai glaring at her. Katara smiled tightly, but Mai only narrowed her eyes coldly and looked away.

I guess a day at the spa didn’t help much, huh? Katara mused inwardly before she narrowed her own eyes and glared at the back of Mai’s head as the noblewoman made her way to Zuko. Katara crossed her arms and looked away.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” King Kuei greeted and bowed to the younger ruler. “Welcome back to Ba Sing Se. Master Iroh has explained to me about your journey into the Earth Kingdom. It is a pleasure to have you here once again. I hope you enjoy your stay,” he said politely since this was the young man who had returned Ba Sing Se to him even though the new Fire Lord could have kept the city for himself.

Zuko returned the bow and gave a small nod.

“Yes, thank you for your hospitality, King Kuei, but I am only staying for a few weeks for I must return to my duties in the Fire Nation soon.”

“Ah, yes, I understand.” King Kuei smiled and pushed his thin glasses over his nose. After greeting Lady Ursa, the Earth King’s attention was then brought onto Aang, Bosco and Momo.

Zuko felt a pair of arms snaked their way around his own arm. He looked beside him and saw Mai smiling softly at him.

“Mai,” Zuko greeted with a frown. He had had a feeling that Mai would have still been angry with him for his behavior back in the Fire Nation Palace.

“I would like to speak to you once we are alone,” Mai responded lowly.

She waited until Zuko nodded before she moved her emotionless gaze towards the older noblewoman who was staring at them with a small frown.

“Princess Ursa,” Mai said as she bowed gracefully. “I am glad that Zuko found you. I hope you remember me. I am Mai, your son’s girlfriend.” She straightened her shoulders smugly and attempted a friendly smile.

“Ah, yes. I remember you. Little Mai, the governor's daughter,” Ursa replied as she gave a small smile before her gaze landed on the pink-clad young girl who was jumping excitedly in her place beside the tall, young noblewoman. “And I also remember you. Ty Lee, am I correct?”

“Yes, Princess Ursa,” the enthusiastic acrobat bowed deeply before giving off a radiant smile.
Ursa looked back to her son who was standing like a stone statue with an equally stony facial expression beside a bored-looking young woman. The older noblewoman looked Mai over, who was attached almost possessively onto Zuko’s arm. She saw that Mai was as tall as her son with long black hair, dark eyes, and pale skin. She stood gracefully, almost haughtily, with guarded features, the perfect example of a true Fire Nation noblewoman.

Ursa looked over to where Katara was laughing with the blind earthbender and the pregnant Kyoshi Warrior. She would have liked for the Water Tribe woman to be her son’s girlfriend. She was intelligent, loving, and caring and she made Zuko smile. Returning her scrutinizing gaze to Mai, Ursa frowned. She did not know Mai that well, but maybe she made her son happy.

Zuko furrowed his eyebrows as he noticed his mother looking Mai over with a frown before her gaze shifted to Katara.

_I wonder what she’s thinking_, he pondered.

“Come,” King Kuei’s soft voice brought everybody’s attention to him. “My servants will take you to your rooms so you could freshen up from your long journey. Bosco and I will be waiting for you in the dining hall with a grand banquet that has been prepared for such important guests such as yourselves.”

“Alright! I couldn’t have asked for a better trip,” Sokka cheered before planting a big kiss on Suki’s cheek. He grabbed her hand and shoved his way inside the palace with the others trailing after him.

Zuko allowed Mai to lead him away from the rest of the group after their meal was over. They all had spent a lot of time talking in the elaborate dining room. Well, the others had, while he listened and observed, occasionally offering his thoughts on things. He had noticed that even though the Earth King had learned many things as he traveled the Earth Kingdom he was still a bit naïve, especially since he considered his bear higher than anybody else.

_He sure is a bit strange_, Zuko thought absently. _I’m sure it will be easy to make a compromise with him about the Lower Ring…_

The others had gone to look around the palace, and to his annoyance, Katara had gone with Aang. Shaking his head, Zuko noticed they had stop walking and he shifted his gaze to the room they were in. It looked like a large sitting room where soft, green pillows and couches were placed in. There was a small table near a corner with a Pai Sho game board. He had a feeling his uncle had something to do about that. He returned his gaze back to Mai who was staring at him silently.
Zuko sighed and ran a hand over his hair.

“Mai, about the other night—”

“I’m sorry, Zuko,” Mai interrupted as she moved forward and wrapped her arms around his neck.

Zuko frowned before he slightly pulled her away.

“What?”

Mai stared at him before she let out a soft sigh.

“I’m sorry for trying to manipulate you, for accusing you of cheating, and for ignoring you. I have thought about what happened during these couple of weeks and I realized that I overreacted,” she said in her usual tone, void of any emotion. “It’s just that I got angry that you rejected me and I was scared that you didn’t want me anymore.”

Zuko closed his eyes before looking away.

“Mai, I…” He paused and frowned, as he could not think of anything to say.

“It’s okay,” the dark-haired woman said and smiled. “I understand.”

“You do?” Zuko asked skeptically and raised his eyebrow.

“Yes,” Mai replied with a nod. “You were just tired and wanted to rest. That doesn’t mean that you don’t love me anymore.”

Before Zuko could answer, Mai pressed her thin lips to his.
Zuko closed his eyes and waited for that spark...that heat to course through his veins that just one look from Katara seemed to install in him. But he was slightly disappointed when nothing happened. He felt Mai press herself closer to him while she tried to make him respond by nibbling on his lip.

Zuko cringe as a feeling of revulsion and guilt hit him. He jerked away and gently pulled her away from him. She looked at him with a questioning look.

“I need to speak with the Earth King about the problems with the Lower Ring,” Zuko said instead. He watched as annoyance briefly flashed across her face before she stared at him blankly.

“Oh, well, why don’t you go see to their needs before the world ends?” she said coldly.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at her.

She will never understand, he thought severely.

It was the same thing back in the Fire Nation. She never supported him on his decisions to help those in need and accused him of neglecting her in favor of strangers. Perhaps it was best they broke up.

“There are some things we have to discuss once we arrive at the Fire Nation,” he said harshly.

Mai’s eyes widened slightly at his tone of voice and she gasped.

“What are you saying?”

Zuko looked away and sighed deeply.

“Our relationship seems to be going nowhere. I believe it is for the best that we—” He was unable to finish as Mai clung onto his neck desperately.

“Please, Zuko, don’t,” she pleaded, a hint of nervousness and pain coating her once monotonous voice. “I’m sorry. I won’t question your decisions ever again.”
“Mai, I think it’s best—”

“You know what?” Mai interrupted and smiled. “You must be tired and that’s what is making you say such things. Maybe all we need is some time alone for the both of us to think. I think it’s time that I paid a visit to my family. I will leave to Omashu after you return to the Fire Nation and I will stay there for a few months.”

Instead of being the governor, Mai’s father was now the ambassador of the Fire Nation in Omashu. King Bumi was the one who proposed that the ex-governor of New Ozai stayed.

Before Zuko could argue, Mai gave him one last kiss before she hurriedly left the room. Zuko stared after her in bewilderment at her strange behavior and the obvious fear in her voice.

Perhaps he was being too brash about his decision to end his relationship with her. She loved him and she had been by his side for almost four years. Would he be able to break her heart?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Both the retired Fire Nation general and the Fire Lord’s mother were sitting in one of the many gardens that surrounded the Palace of Ba Sing Se. The gardens were beautiful, but Ursa noted that these gardens consisted of too much green colors with few rare flowers. The way the gardens were situated seemed too organized and rigid, not giving off the air of them being natural, something she made sure her garden possessed when she used to live in the Fire Nation Palace.

For the past few hours, Ursa had revealed her past to her trusted friend, who listened to her with an understanding and sympathetic ear. Mentally, Iroh cursed his brother for harming such a kind woman like Ursa and a young boy like Zuko.

“A-Azula?” Ursa whispered sadly, “Where is she? I have only heard rumors about her...Rumors that I am afraid could be true. Zuko has not spoken a single word about his sister. Is she...dead?” she asked in a strained voice and held her breath.

Iroh sighed and swirled his teacup, causing the steaming liquid to swoosh. It seemed Ursa had no idea that her daughter had become an insane ruthless warrior, one who almost tried to kill her older brother.

“No, Azula is alive, but I believe it is best that you ask Zuko what has become of her,” Iroh told her gently.
Ursa lowered her gaze and sighed sadly.

After being reacquainted again and falling into a comfortable setting, Ursa insisted that she be informed of everything concerning her son. And of course, being the caring mother that she was, Ursa wanted to know if Zuko was happy in his love life as well. She expressed her concern of the cold relationship between Zuko and Mai.

“It does not look like Zuko is happy, but perhaps that is just me. I have not been in his life for a long time,” Ursa said sadly before smiling when Iroh patted her hand. “Maybe I am not giving Mai a chance to prove herself.”

Iroh shook his head and sighed.

“Even if you give Mai a lifetime of chances she will never make Zuko happy. I fear that Mai is just like the other noblewomen who seek your son’s affection as well as the title of Fire Lady. She is too serious and depressing for him, something that Zuko seems to have too much of already.”

Ursa looked down at her teacup and frowned.

“What he needs is a lively young lady who would do almost anything to make him happy, a woman who complements the person he is. Preferably a beautiful waterbender with sparkling blue eyes, long brunette hair, and a lovely laugh,” Iroh said casually. He grinned and sip from his steaming cup of tea. His golden eyes glimmered with glee.

Ursa snapped her head up and gaped at her wise friend.

“So you have noticed the way Zuko and Katara interact with each other as well?” she asked and when Iroh grinned even wider, she smiled.

“To tell you the truth I am surprised you noticed also since it seems nobody else want to acknowledge the possibility that those two may have feelings for each other…especially the two stubborn ones concerned,” Iroh said and laughed.

“Then you would approve of Zuko pursuing a relationship with Katara, a Water Tribe woman and a “waterbender?” Ursa asked hopefully.

“I should be the one to ask you that question, but it seems that there is no need for me to do so since you seem delighted with the idea already. My dear Ursa,” Iroh chuckled softly, “I am their number one supporter besides Miss Toph!”

“Lady Bei Fong is aware as well?” the Fire Nation noblewoman asked.

“Are you kidding me?” Iroh exclaimed incredulously before he laughed again. “You are talking about the one who can detect a heartbeat a yard away through the ground! She was the one who noticed their changing feelings and attitudes toward one another as the end of the war approached. We are trying to lead my nephew and Miss Katara in the right direction, but they are the ones who have to realize it and take the next big step. They are just being stubborn.”

Ursa smiled and took a small sip of the jasmine tea Iroh had poured for her. She sighed in contentment as the sweet flavor coated her throat. She not only missed the jolly old man, but his wonderful tea as well.

She really liked the idea of having Katara as her son’s girlfriend, and with any luck, as his future wife and Fire Lady, and her future daughter-in-law. Iroh and she approved, but would the Fire Nation Court approve of such a relationship? Would they allow their Fire Lord to marry a woman from a different nation?

And what about Mai? Zuko had told her that the dark-haired noblewoman loved him enough to go against Azula. Maybe she was being biased because she had spent more time with Katara than she had with Mai. Perhaps once she got to know Mai better she would be able to decide if the noblewoman was the right one.

And if Mai wasn’t…well then, the much better she would feel if Katara was the right woman for her son. Looking up at Iroh she gave him a small grin.

Then she would gladly join in the ranks of those supporting a relationship between Zuko and Katara.

Zuko sighed tiredly as he paced irritably in one of the palace gardens. The sun had set a few hours ago and he had a headache. His problems with Mai were making it difficult for him to come up with something to compromise with King Kuei in exchange for his help towards the Lower Ring.
Should he continue with their relationship? Could their small time apart from each other help at all? And if he did decide to break up with Mai, he was positive the Fire Nation Court members would not hesitate to parade their single female relatives in front of him. He did not need more problems than the ones he already had.

“Calm down, Sparky, or you’re gonna pop a vein,” he heard Toph’s amused voice behind him.

Suppressing a growl of annoyance, Zuko spun around to pin a glare at the irritating earthbender, ready to snap at her to leave him alone. He closed his mouth quickly, however, when he noticed that Toph was not alone, and because of this, the blind girl was smirking knowingly. Katara was beside her and she was looking at him with a concerned expression.

Zuko looked away and closed his eyes.

_Why must she do that?_ he yelled in his head. _Those looks she gives me is what’s making me so confused!_

“Zuko, what’s the matter?” Katara asked when Zuko turned away from them. “Did something happen to Lady Ursa?”

“No, she’s fine,” Zuko replied quickly, unable to stop himself from reassuring her. “Where’s Aang?” he asked tersely.

Toph smirked when she noticed his barely contained jealous tone.

“Oh, uh…” Katara frowned at the hard edge in Zuko’s voice. “He went to check on Appa before he retired for the night.”

“Hm.” Zuko nodded and continued on his previous task…pacing around in circles.

“What’s bugging you, Hotman?” Toph asked as she sat herself on a stone stump she summoned from the ground. Crossing her arms over her small chest, she tilted her head toward the agitated young man.
“And don’t tell me nothing’s wrong ‘cause I ain’t buying that,” Toph added when she felt the firebender about to retort.

Zuko closed his mouth and snorted, stopping in his pacing to glare at the unaffected earthbender.

“Is it something we can help with?” Katara asked quickly before some bruises and burns appeared.

Zuko looked over at her and sighed.

If you can help me figure out what you’re doing to me, then be my guest, he muttered in his head.

“No, it’s nothing serious,” he replied coolly. At least part of it wasn’t. “I’m just trying to figure out what to ask King Kuei in return for aiding the Lower Ring of Ba Sing Se.”

“Oh, that,” Toph huffed as she waved her hand dismissively. “By the way you were pacing like a caged tiger-armadillo I thought you were having a life crisis. So what’s the problem with this compromise thingy?”

“Well,” Zuko began and frowned, “I want to help these people, but I just can’t spend the Fire Nation’s treasury by sending relief to people from another country without getting something in return. The Court Council would not like that.”

“So the only thing you need to do is figure out what King Kuei can give you in exchange for your help?” Katara asked and tapped her finger on her chin pensively.

“Yes.” The young Fire Lord nodded. “The thing is that I don’t know what Ba Sing Se can offer for the betterment of the Fire Nation.”

The three young benders furrowed their foreheads as they tried to come up with a good idea. A chilly wind blew by, rustling the few trees in the garden. Katara shivered and unconsciously stepped closer to Zuko who absentmindedly raised his body temperature to warm her.

Toph noticed their positions and grinned widely. They were already finding comfort in each other without even realizing it.
“I know!” Katara exclaimed suddenly and snapped her fingers. “While we were in the Fire Nation I noticed that there were only a few vegetables and fruits grown in the Earth Kingdom that are used in the meals.”

“Well, yeah,” Zuko said and shrugged, “The Fire Nation is not exactly a good place to grow many types of vegetables or fruits. And the common Fire Nation citizens do not buy Earth Kingdom produce regularly since they are too expensive.”

“Ba Sing Se is known for its vegetables and fruits production. So why don’t you tell King Kuei that in exchange for helping him with the Lower Ring he exports fresh green produce to the Fire Nation at a low cost? That way the common people could afford to buy vegetables and other fruits for their meals.” Katara beamed at her idea.

“Hm?” Zuko frowned, rubbing his chin as he thought it over. “Well, that does sound like a good idea, but it may not be enough for the Court Council members.”

Katara’s smile fell from her face and she frowned in concentration. She wanted to be a part in Zuko’s plan for aiding the Lower Ring. She was unable to do anything for those at the Abandoned Fort, but maybe if she thought hard enough she could help those in need in the poor district of Ba Sing Se. If only she could don the Painted Lady’s identity once more and sneak into the rich homes and ‘borrow’ money that could help the people.

What does Ba Sing Se have that can benefit the Fire Nation? Katara racked her brain. Well, there’s the zoo and the earthbending-powered train system. And then there’s Lake Laogai.

“Hm? Ba Sing Se has been almost isolated from the rest of the world for many years,” Katara thought aloud as an idea began to form in her head.

“Yeah, so?” Toph asked as she wiggled her dirty toes.

“Well…” Katara furrowed her eyebrows as she looked up at Zuko. “What if you could help without actually having to use a lot of the Fire Nation’s treasury?”

“What do you mean?” Zuko asked her.
“You can ask the Earth King to promise to lower the cost to the vegetable imports to the Fire Nation in which you will send money as is appropriate by how much the vegetables make a profit to the Fire Nation,” Katara began slowly, “The other promise King Kuei could make is that Ba Sing Se will help itself by opening its walls to the rest of the world.”

Zuko tapped his chin with a long finger as understanding began to dawn in his head.

“Ba Sing Se has many interesting things to offer,” he mused, “It is very probable that many people would like to see the grand City of Ba Sing Se. And with many tourists swarming the city…”

“Money pours from their pockets which will help Ba Sing Se rise!” Toph finished, as she finally understood what the other two benders were getting at.

“It is time that all nations opened their doors to each other,” Zuko said seriously. “I will talk about this with King Kuei tomorrow morning.”

He smiled down at the waterbender.

“Once again you helped me with a problem. Thanks,” he said sincerely.

Katara looked up at him with a smile before his warm eyes caused her to lightly blush.

“I’m glad that you accept and appreciate my help,” she said softly. “And it makes me happy to help you, but I also want to help the people in the Lower Ring just as much as you do.”

Zuko smiled at the determination that shone in the waterbender’s face. Her love in offering her help to those that needed her was what also made him admire the great woman that she was.

_Not to mention that she’s a beautiful woman_, Zuko thought with a dazed look before snapping out of his thoughts when Toph coughed. He glanced at the short earthbender from the corner of his eye and noticed she was grinning at him.

Straightening his tall frame, Zuko cleared his throat.
“Okay then, so I guess I’ll see you two in the morning,” he said smoothly. He looked at Toph then at Katara and a small smile appeared on his face. “Maybe we can all look around Ba Sing Se tomorrow after I speak to King Kuei.”

Katara smiled brightly.

“Yeah! That sounds like fun! We could visit Uncle Iroh at the Jasmine Dragon! Maybe Toph and I can take Lady Ursa and Suki to the spa.”

Toph pretended to scowl in annoyance.

“Eh, fine, but I swear that if my feet get touched, someone will die,” she drawled.

“You didn’t complain about the mud bath last time,” Katara teased and laughed, making Zuko looked between the two in bewilderment.

What the hell are they talking about? he thought before shrugging his shoulders.

“Okay, I guess I’m going to bed now,” Katara said with a yawn. “Good night, Zuko.”

“Good night, Katara. Sleep well,” Zuko replied with a smile. “And thanks again.”

Katara smiled and nodded before she turned back to looked at Toph who had not moved from her perch on the stone stump.

“Toph, are you coming?”

“I want to stay out here for a minute,” Toph said. “I’ll talk to you later. Wait for me in your room.” She grinned mischievously.

First, I’ll talk to Zuko about their little…outing last night.
Katara shrugged before she again bid them good night.

“I’m not really surprise Sugar Queen came up with that plan,” Toph spoke up and yawned. “She always tries to find a way to help others even if it gets her into trouble just like when we were at the village of Jang Hui.”

“You were at Jang Hui?” Zuko asked as he watched Katara make her way across the garden until she disappeared inside the palace.

“Yup, like four years ago, and let me tell you that place smelled horrible,” Toph said and wrinkled her nose at the memory.

“To tell you the truth I had no idea it existed when I was still Prince Zuko,” the young man admitted guiltily. “It wasn’t until we were told that the factory was destroyed that I learned about the village and the dishonorable way the people were being treated. It’s prospering now, though,” he added.

Toph smiled as she swung her small legs.

“Did you ever find out who destroyed the factory?” she asked.

“No. We were told it was probably some rebels,” Zuko answered as he continued to watch the spot where Katara had been standing last. “But I heard some rumors that the people of Jang Hui attributed it to a spirit by the name of the Painted Lady.”

“I’m glad they held their promise of secrecy,” Toph said casually.

“What?”

Toph began to bend two small balls of dirt between her fingers.

“Were you told how the factory was destroyed?” she asked instead.
“Well…” Zuko began and glanced at her suspiciously, “The soldiers reported that it seemed the factory was flooded before it exploded…” he trailed off as a thought popped in his head, “Did you guys have anything to do with that?”

Toph smirked.

“We really didn’t do much. It was all Katara’s idea. She and Aang destroyed the factory. Sugar Queen couldn’t stand the way the villagers were forced to live so she helped them, healing their sick, too.”

Zuko smiled.

“The river spirit the villagers were talking about…it was Katara, right? She was the Painted Lady,” he stated.

“Yup,” Toph admitted with a grin.

The young Fire Lord returned his gaze toward the entrance of the palace where Katara had disappeared to.

She was willing to help a town from the nation that had hurt her and her family. Will she ever cease to amaze me? he thought.

“Sooo,” Toph began innocently before she started to grin, “What were you and Sugar Queen doing last night? Please, spare me the obscene details.” She threw her hands before her face and laughed sarcastically.

Zuko spun around to face his small friend and gaped at her before he composed himself.

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” he said warily.

“You know damn well what I’m talking about,” Toph retorted and rolled her eyes. “I know it was you and Sweetness giving off those vibrations last night.” When Zuko did not respond, she smiled. “So are you gonna tell me what you two did?”
“No,” Zuko replied flatly. He had promised Katara that nobody would know, and even if Toph tortured him, he will keep his promise.

“Fine,” Toph huffed and jumped from her stone seat, lowering it to the ground.

_The best way to approach this is by making outrageous assumptions_, she thought wickedly.

“You both were lured by a mystical creature to an unknown land or perhaps both of you were sleepwalking?”

“Uh...no.” Zuko frowned and wondered what the hell Toph was talking about.

“I know! You got sick and started to vomit and Sweetness went to help you,” Toph continued and smirked.

“Of course not!” Zuko denied with a scowl.

Toph grasped her small hands behind her back and began to rock back and forth on the balls of her bare feet.

“Well, I guess the only thing left to think is…,” Toph leaned forward and whispered, “Katara and you sneaked away from camp in the middle of the night to have hot sex!”

Zuko backed a step with a shocked expression.

“N-no! We did no such thing! D-don’t be ridiculous!” he stuttered.

Toph grinned widely as Zuko’s heart skipped a beat before it began to race wildly.

“Katara and I doing that…” Zuko’s voice trailed off as he thought back on his dreams and on how much he really enjoyed the thought of such an experience from happening.
Mai and Aang’s betrayed faces surfaced in his mind and again he felt ashamed.

“…is impossible,” he finished and closed his eyes.

Toph sighed and crossed her arms over chest. That’s what you keep telling yourself.

“I was just messing with you, jeez. I’m going to sleep. See ya tomorrow,” she said with a grumble.

I’m not going to get anything out of Lord Uptight here. She grinned. But it would be so easy to make Katara divulge everything.

The scheming earthbender mischievously grinned inwardly as she passed by Zuko.

Stopping a few feet behind him, she spoke, “I hope you don’t get a heart attack with whatever dream you have tonight.”

She laughed loudly and ran towards the palace, leaving a gaping firebender standing in the middle of the garden.

Katara hummed softly as she passed the brush through her long, brown hair. She stifled a yawn as she looked over at the night sky through the window in her guest room. The room was a bit smaller than the one she was given in the Fire Nation Palace, but it was nice nonetheless. The soft, jade green bed was slightly raised from the ground with two stone steps leading up to it. The small dresser she was sitting at and a stone chest at one corner were the only other furniture in the room. The only thing the room lacked was a private bathroom. The palace actually had two separate public baths for men and women.

“Why is Toph taking so long?” she muttered. “I wonder what she wants to talk to me about. Knowing her, it’s probably something that will either irritate or embarrass me.”

At that moment, the door burst open and Toph emerged with a glint in her milky lime-colored eyes.
“Okay, what do you want?” the waterbender sighed in resignation. “I know you have something in your mind by that look on your face.”

The earthbender chuckled as she flopped herself onto the soft bed.

“Alright then,” Toph began. She grinned as she prepared herself to ask the same question, but this time, she was not leaving without getting any answers. “Why were you awake in the middle of the night yesterday?”

Katara turned around to face her friend and frown.

“There was a full moon and you know I can’t sleep on those nights,” she said.

“Well, what were you doing?” Toph asked innocently.

“I…uh…went for a midnight…walk,” Katara replied carefully as a small blush appeared on her cheeks.

“Really?” Toph smirked. “Then what were you and Lord Sparky doing together last night?”

“What?” Katara squeaked and slightly jumped in her seat. She felt the telltale signs that her face was imitating a tomato and she was glad Toph could not see it. “W-what…uh…we were…um…enjoying a midnight spar! Yeah, that’s right. We both couldn’t sleep and decided to do a little exercise, that’s all.”

“Riiight,” Toph stressed sarcastically before she scoffed. She snorted and lifted her eyebrow to show she did not fall for that lame excuse. “I thought you said you went for a midnight walk.”

Katara blushed even deeper as she tried to come up with something, but her mind was drawing blanks as her memories rushed before her eyes. She looked up when Toph began to chuckle.
“I get it,” Toph said as she sat up in the bed. “You and Zuko wanted some alone time, so you sneaked away to snuggle together under the romantic full moon.” She grinned as she waited for the waterbender’s usual outburst.

“That’s crazy!” Katara yelled frantically. “I was just swimming, minding my own business, when Zuko happens to come upon me while I was bathing and—” She gasped and clamped her hand over her mouth as she stared wide-eyed at Toph.

Toph’s mouth fell open before she started to chuckle.

“Woah, I never would’ve thought Zuko to be such a pervert!” Toph exclaimed. She grinned, knowing full well Zuko would never do anything to harm Katara.

“It was not like that!” Katara exclaimed and shook her head. “He didn’t know I was practically…” she trailed off as another blush stained her tan cheeks.

“Naked?” Toph finished for her.

She smiled as Katara’s heart practically had a marathon. Toph knew that if it had been any other guy, Katara would have raised hell for having her privacy intruded upon. Interesting.

“Well, yes…” Katara replied embarrassingly. “But Zuko apologized and was gentlemanly enough not to try anything. Then he looked away while I got out of the water to change and escorted me back to the campsite. It was like it almost didn’t affect him at all.” She frowned, wondering if perhaps she was not attractive enough.

“Oh, please,” Toph snickered. “He’s a guy! Any man with blood in his veins would be affected if he saw a girl bathing. Zuko just happens to know how to control himself.”

Katara frowned and wondered what Toph was trying to accomplish.

“Are you trying to say that Zuko was in some way affected by…um…seeing me almost n-naked?” she stuttered.
Toph rolled her eyes at her sometimes too innocent and naïve friend. Of course she will miss the signs a horny guy would give, but she guessed it was not the waterbender’s fault since Sparky was good at hiding his emotions.

“Did he really not do or say anything? He didn’t react at all?” Toph asked.

“Well, he was embarrassed for sure,” Katara replied and smirked at the horrified look he had on his face when she caught him staring at her. “He was also apologetic, and then…”

“And then?” Toph prompted.

Katara’s eyebrows furrowed and she placed a finger on her chin.

“When I got out of the water, I wrapped a towel to cover myself to face him. Then he…uh…well…he stared at me, almost as if he was looking me over.” Again she remembered the intense look he had in eyes and she shivered. “You don’t think that Zuko was…checking me out, do you?”

“Why not?” Toph asked and shrugged. “I’ve heard many comments from lots of guys who say you’re hot. I’m sure Sparky knows when to appreciate beauty. And stop being so embarrassed and shy about these things. It’s normal! Of course, if guys are being gross and perverted about it, then you can beat the crap out of them.”

Katara laughed, feeling a bit reassured about her physical appearance.

“Well, now that you got what you wanted, can I go to sleep? Oh, and uh…don’t tell anyone else, like Sokka and…Aang. They might get the wrong idea.”

“Don’t worry. I’ll be silent as a tomb.” Toph grinned before she jumped down from the bed and made her way to the door. She opened it, but before she left she turned around a bit. “Katara?”

“Yeah, Toph?” Katara asked as she made her way to her bed.

“You should try to make yourself be happy for once and admit what you feel even if it might hurt those that love you,” Toph said in a serious tone.
Katara looked up at the uncharacteristic manner Toph spoke, but her friend had already exited the room and closed the door behind her. The waterbender went to the door to call Toph back, but stopped and instead went to her travelling bag placed at the foot of her bed. Rummaging inside, she pulled out the object she was looking for and climbed into her bed. The single light-green lamp on the dresser was the only light inside the room. Sighing quietly, Katara opened her closed hand and looked at the beautiful, silver rose hairpin.

What was Toph talking about? What feelings am I supposed to admit? She stroked the ruby and sapphire gems gently with one of her fingers. Why did Toph all of the sudden say those words when they were just talking about Zuko?

Katara’s eyes widened and she gasped.

“Yes, surely she doesn’t think I have feelings for Zuko!”

Well, Toph is a smart and very perceptive person.

“Well, this time she’s got it all wrong,” Katara said aloud and frowned as she clenched the little trinket in her palm. “I can’t have feelings for Zuko because I love Aang. Zuko’s just a very good friend whom I happened to enjoy spending my time with.”

She couldn’t have feelings for him. They were too different. He was a very powerful man who had a country depending on him, and she was just a simple Water Tribe woman. He is destined to marry a refined noblewoman.

Probably Mai, she sighed.

And she…well…Aang had not actually asked her to marry him yet, but by the way he kept telling her how much he loved her, then it was a likely possibility that they would settle down and start a family.

Katara frowned as an uneasy feeling settled in her stomach at the thought. She looked down at her rose hairpin and sighed.
Why does this piece of jewelry make me feel so confused and yet so comforted at the same time?

Shaking her head, Katara placed the rose pin under her fluffy pillow since the room did not contain a nightstand. Resting her head and covering her body with the blanket, the young woman looked over at the window before she fell into a restless sleep.

Katara smiled as she took in the sight before her. She was standing before a beautiful, clear lake. A few bright stars were winking at her from the inky sky. There was a light mist that surrounded the place, giving it a mysterious and peaceful feeling. She bent down and reached into the water with one hand. Strangely, the water was warm, and a grin spread across her face.

She stood up and reached for the sash around her waist, but a hand stopped her and covered her own small hand. She tensed when she felt warm breath near her ear. Her heart began to pound in her chest as fear made her immobile.

“Katara, don’t be scared. I won’t hurt you,” a low masculine voice whispered in her ear.

Katara’s eyes widen in surprise and a small gasp fell from her mouth.

“Z-Zuko?” she breathed uncertainly.

She heard him chuckle before he brought his other hand to her shoulder. Slowly he slid his warm hand down her arm and brought it to rest on her hip, causing her to shudder in a strange but delightful way. She felt his breath near her neck before Zuko placed a soft kiss on her warm skin. Katara closed her eyes as a rush of heat coursed through her body.

“Katara, you’re a very desirable woman,” Zuko continued in a whisper.

Katara was positive she had heard him say that before, but now having him so near caused her to shiver and believe him even more.

She felt Zuko tug her hand as he slowly turned her around to face him. Katara gasped once again as she saw his intense golden gaze. She had a feeling she had seen that smoldering stare before, but her mind went blank as he suddenly drew her body closer to his.
Another gasp escaped her lips at the swift move. Her heart was beating wildly in her chest at the close proximity and she felt hot.

What is happening to me? she thought.

Zuko brought a hand to her face and caressed her cheek gently as a soft smile graced his handsome features. Katara watched, mesmerized, as his face began to descend to her own. Zuko’s lips touched her forehead, causing her to gasp. He moved his lips to her cheek while his hands ran down her back, causing Katara to let out a soft moan. She shivered as a strange sensation burned in the pit of her stomach.

“Katara,” Zuko breathed as he leaned his head closer to hers, his lips a few inches from her own. Another shiver ran down her spine. Katara closed her eyes as she waited for their lips to meet...

Katara opened her eyes and blinked as the morning light fell on her face. She was breathing heavily. She bolted to a sitting position on the bed and gasped, clasping a hand over her racing heart.

“What was that?” she asked herself as she removed her blankets, which were suddenly too warm for comfort.

She barely ever had dreams and she had never experienced such a dream before. Most of the dreams she did have were well…nightmares. She shifted in her bed and gasped as she realized that her most private area was hot and slightly damp.

“Oh, spirits! What’s happening to me?” she almost yelled in alarm.

This had never happened to her before. Well, she had felt attraction to men before, but never anything like how she felt toward Zuko. This strange, burning feeling was new to her.

Katara dropped her hand from her chest and gaped.

“A-am I…a-aroused by…by Zuko?” she stuttered.

She jumped from her bed and began to pace around the small room with a blush on her cheeks.
“This is all Toph’s fault!” she accused into the silent room. “She filled me with all those thoughts about Zuko and reactions and all that stuff last night! Yeah, that’s it! That’s why I was having a dream about Zuko.”

A slightly dazed look covered her features as she stopped in her pacing.

“And how he was holding and looking at me and...how he almost kissed me...” She gasped as she felt another rush of warmth in her nether regions.

She blushed furiously before she shook her head.

“It’s nothing to worry about, right? This is normal. I’m nineteen for La’s sake and I think these kinds of feelings were long overdue.” She laughed self-consciously. “There’s no shame in this, right? I mean what woman would not be turned on by someone as stunning as Zuko?”

A few women’s faces that they had encountered during their stay in Ember Island surfaced in her mind. They were practically drooling when the young Fire Lord passed them by with slightly heated looks on their adoring faces.

Katara blinked when she realized she was grinding her teeth.

_Ooh, someone is jealous_, a voice that sounded so much like Toph teased.

_I am not jealous!_ Katara denied and huffed before another thought crossed her mind that made her uneasy.

Why was she having such dreams about another man that was not her boyfriend? Zuko had never held her like that and yet in her dream it almost made her melt. Aang had kissed her, he had embraced her, he had held her, but then why was she not having those kinds of dreams about him? Why did just a smile or a look from Zuko make her blush and feel things Aang’s kisses had never done?

Katara slumped onto the small seat in front of the dresser with a long sigh. What was going on with her? What was happening? Was she really beginning to have feelings for Zuko?
But that couldn’t be because she loved Aang and she would never betray him. She could never hurt him. He loved her.

The confused young woman groaned as a small headache began to appear. She stood up to get another set of clothes to replace her...dirty ones. As she exited her room with the clean clothes, Katara headed towards Toph’s room to ask her if she would accompany her to the public bathhouse in the palace. She needed a cold bath.
Past Encounters

Katara stared down dazedly at the water that she was absentmindedly swirling around her hands. Steam rose from the warm water and floated around her still form, twirling around the grand and elegant room and into the vents near the ceiling.

The bathhouse was a lovely area, with a series of bathtubs strategically placed around the chamber. Plants and flowers adorned the light-green marble walls and surrounded the large bathtubs as if they were natural springs. The bathtubs were wide enough to accommodate a small party of six. A pleasant fragrance of lilies filled the quiet atmosphere.

The waterbender heaved another sigh as she again relived her little dream. She still could not figure out why her mind had decided to play tricks on her with such thoughts about Zuko, who was just a friend. Friends did a lot for one another like cook for them, or help them with a problem, or play and laugh with them. But friends did not have dreams about each other were their actions spurred such heat and longing.

Nope. In dreams, friends did anything but touch intimately and kiss passionately. Right? Those dreams were only reserved for married pairs, lovers, couples, and for those who lusted over each other.

Katara frowned at the twirling water and chewed on her lower lip. Zuko and she did not fall into any of those categories. They were not married, nor did they have a romantic relationship. And they certainly were not lovers! Wait. Did that mean that she…was lusting over Zuko?

Katara felt her face heat up at the thought and shook her head, causing her wet hair to splatter onto her face. That is ridiculous! She couldn’t be lusting over Zuko—she did not even desire Aang that way. Who, by the way, was her boyfriend! And how could she yearn over somebody when she had never been sexually intimate with any man?

You don’t need to have had sex to want somebody, a voice in her head piped in almost cheerfully.

Shut up! she inwardly growled at the voice for she had no response to that.

In front of Katara, Toph was sitting lazily on the small bench that lined the inside of the tubs for the guests to sit on. Both female bending masters were wrapped in towels that the maids had offered them at the entrance of the bathhouse, and since it was early in the morning, they were currently the only ones making use of the female bathing pools.

Toph crossed her arms and yawned loudly as they both continued to sit there in silence. Katara woke her up from a good dream so they could go take a bath! And so early in the morning, too! Toph had been ready to yell at her to leave her alone, but she noticed that her waterbending friend had been a bit more agitated than usual. So she had just sighed and stumbled her way out of bed, grumbling all the way to the public baths.

And now here she was, trying not to doze off and in the process find herself drowning. Katara, who sometimes found it hard not to talk, had been unusually quiet and pensive as they had made their way to the bathhouse and had not since changed. Toph could feel the gentle pull of the bath water as Katara manipulated it, but she could sense that the young woman was doing it without even realizing it. The earthbender did not need her sight to know something was bothering her friend for she could feel it.

“So, Sugar Queen, what’s eating you?” Toph asked with another yawn, shifting in her marbled seat so the water now reached her shoulders.

“Huh? Did you say something, Toph?” was her friend’s distracted response.

Toph sighed, pushing her wet bangs out of her eyes.

“What the hell is going on with you? You’re all quiet, which let me tell you is sometimes a relief, but just annoying right now. And you keep fidgeting in your spot, not to mention all those damn sighs you keep letting out are making me crazy!” Toph exclaimed. “Come on, spill it out!”

Katara forced a laugh.

“It’s nothing, really,” she replied quickly.

The blind young girl snorted and rolled her eyes.

“Even if we’re floating in water, I can still tell you’re lying,” she said dryly. “Seriously, Sweetness, I thought you would know me better by now.”
Katara sighed.

“You’re right, I’m sorry. But it’s nothing to worry about,” she said, hoping her sometimes too perceptive friend would leave it at that, but knowing Toph, Katara knew she would not stop until she got the truth out of her.

Toph raised an eyebrow with her arms still crossed over her towel-covered chest and stared in the direction of her friend without saying one word. The bathtub remained quiet for a few minutes as Toph remained perfectly still. The silence and Toph’s unnerving, unseeing stare became too uncomfortable for Katara that she had no choice but to relent.

“Fine!” Katara huffed. “I just have a lot on my mind because of some strange dream I had last night.”

Toph grinned triumphantly before Katara’s words peaked her interest.

“A strange dream, you say? What kind of dream?” she asked.

Katara squirmed in her place as she began to lightly tap the water with her fingers, desperately trying not to blush.

“It was just a silly dream,” she answered. Before the younger woman could demand her to say more she quickly continued, “Please, Toph, can we just leave it at that? I don’t really want to talk about it.”

She did not want to know what kind of amusement the earthbender would find in her embarrassing situation.

“Fine,” Toph snorted and frowned. “I bet it was a good dream that’s making you act all weird like this,” she teased with a grin.

Oh, you have no idea, Katara thought with another sigh before she scolded herself.

A fierce blush crept onto the waterbender’s tanned cheeks as once again her dream surface in her head, and she imagined Zuko’s hands roaming her body, his warm breath caressing her neck, and his lips so close to hers.
Katara shifted uneasily in her seat as she tried to calm her body’s reaction. Crossing one leg over the other, she cleared her throat and began to wash her hair.

Toph had a feeling that maybe Katara’s strange behavior had something to do with what they had talked about the previous night. At least, she hoped it did, for it meant that Katara was beginning to understand her feelings for a certain Fire Lord. The earthbender thought of making Katara tell her what it was that had her acting all strange, but decided it was best to leave her alone. She would be there if Katara wanted to talk to her, and apparently now was not the time.

After finishing their baths and exiting the bathing pools, both young women arrived at the grand dining hall of the palace and waited for the guards to open the doors. They entered the elegant room where their friends had already surrounded a long table filled different variety of dishes that made Sokka heave a dreamy sigh. King Kuei was sitting at the head of the table in a golden chair embedded with emeralds, and next to him, with a mouth full of honey, was Bosco, his brown bear.

Greeting everyone in the room, Katara hesitantly took her usual spot next to Aang, who was sitting on the Earth King’s left side. She smiled faintly when Aang helped her sit down. Iroh was seated at her left side and greeted her cheerfully, handing her a cup of tea, but not before the old firebender commented on how lovely she looked that morning.

Looking across the table, Katara noticed that Zuko was sitting regally on King Kuei’s right side. Both men were having a conversation and she could not stop herself from staring at the imposing way Zuko held himself with. Casting her eyes to the side, she saw his mother next to him. Katara smiled when Ursa looked at her with a bright smile before the older woman returned her attention to her plate. Katara’s eyes then shifted to the young noblewoman next to Lady Ursa. Mai was eating silently with her usual bored expression and both women seemed to be sitting stiffly.

Katara bashfully raised her head to look at Zuko again, but quickly glanced down when he turned to her.

“Oh, gods!” she thought as warmth reached her cheeks. She felt her heart begin to race before she scolded herself for her silly reaction.

“It was just a dream,” she told herself. “Just forget it and move on.”

She blinked when a hand rested on her knee. She turned to Aang who smiled widely at her. She forced a small smile before she gently pushed his hand away. She heard him sigh almost inaudibly before the airbender returned his attention to Momo who was trying to steal Bosco’s food away.

She felt uncomfortable when Aang touched her, and yet, she allowed Zuko?

Only because it was a dream, she reminded herself firmly. I had no control over my reactions!

She glanced at Aang who was laughing as Momo snatched a piece of fruit from Bosco. Would she feel the same way with Aang one of these days?

After he finished talking with King Kuei, Zuko returned his attention to his breakfast plate. He had requested an audience with the mild-mannered king after the breakfast meal in order to discuss his plan for aiding the Lower Ring. After paying a visit to the poorest district of the Earth Kingdom capital, he seriously hoped the king would concede.

After biding good night to Katara and Toph the previous day, Zuko had made his way to his guest room to retire for the night. After lying awake for a few hours without much success in falling asleep, the firebender had decided to roam the city of Ba Sing Se alone in order to see for himself the condition in which the people of the Lower Ring were subjected to after the war.

He had don his Blue Spirit mask and black attire, which he had hidden at the bottom of his traveling pack. One never knew when the Blue Spirit would be needed. Zuko had sneaked away from the palace without much trouble since the Dai Li were no longer in service to the Earth King. Crossing over the Upper and Middle Rings, a disguised Zuko had arrived silently at the place where he had once lived as a refugee.

Zuko noticed that what Aang and Toph had said about the aid King Kuei had sent was true. The houses now stood in better conditions than they did four years ago, but from what he was able to observe in the darkness of night it seemed that that was the only change.

Lowering his cup of the Earth Kingdom’s white wine—which he noted was not as exquisite as Fire Nation red wine—Zuko suppressed the frown that threatened to appear on his face. The Blue Spirit needed to pay another visit to the Lower Ring one of these nights to be able to further assess the condition for the poorest citizens of Ba Sing Se.

Zuko looked to his side at his mother who was attempting to have a conversation with Mai. He listened for a while as both Fire Nation women began a casual conversation. It seemed Ursa was trying to get to know a little bit more about Mai’s life and personality and it made him glad to know that his mother was trying.

It soon became rather obvious, however, that both women felt awkward around each other as they continued their awkward exchange before his mother gave a last polite nod and looked away to speak to his uncle across the long, narrow table. He was not sure if he should feel concerned about his mother’s reaction. What would he do if they didn’t get along?

What did concern him at the moment, though, was the behavior of a certain waterbender. Zuko glanced at Katara who, he noted, was once again eating in silence and had not even looked his way when she entered with Toph. She had greeted everybody else but him.

What did he do this time to make her angry?

But I didn’t do anything! Zuko mentally growled.

He smiled when Katara glanced at him, but she quickly looked away before he could even greet her. Zuko frowned as he felt a painful sting in his chest.

Is she avoiding me? Why? he asked himself, disgruntled. She was talking to me last night. What happened to make her act like this?

He did not like the strange, painful feeling in his chest and he especially did not like being ignored.

I will find out what’s wrong, even if it kills me, he vowed determinedly.

He was brought out of his thoughts when his mother began to speak to him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Suki sighed contently as the masseuse continued to massage her swollen feet. Katara had come up with the great idea that the women should spend a few hours being pampered at the spa, and Suki was mentally thanking her future sister-in-law every few seconds for bringing them here.

Her stomach was growing larger and heavier as the days passed by and her feet and back were killing her! Though pain was not something she shied away from, however. But what did frighten her about her condition were the horrible cravings she had been recently having. Odd combinations of food that not even her glutton of a fiancé would dare eat! And how many times had she shoved Sokka out of her way as she stumbled out of their bed in order to reach the bathroom and relieve her morning sickness?

Giggling softly to herself, Suki started to rub her belly in soothing circles. But it would all be worth it once she had her baby in her arms.

Suki smiled when Katara appeared and took the empty seat next to her, but she frowned when her waterbending friend did not even look her way, instead Katara rested her elbow on the cushioned chair’s armrest, placing her cheek on her hand as a faraway look covered her eyes. Suki watched as Katara heaved a huge sigh before the Water Tribe woman’s face turned bright red.

Suki raised an eyebrow at this.

“Are you finished, Katara?” she asked. When she didn’t receive a reply, Suki began to wave her hand in front of her friend’s dazed eyes. “Katara? Katara!” she yelled.

Katara jumped and looked around as if wondering where she was before she finally noticed her future sister-in-law frowning at her. She flushed again and scolded herself for letting her dreams of Zuko distract her once again.

“Sorry, what were you saying?” the waterbender asked sheepishly.

Suki smiled as she finally gained her attention.

“I asked if you were finished.”

“Oh! Yes, I just wanted a simple treatment and now I’m waiting for you guys.” Katara smiled.

“So, how is Lady Ursa enjoying her royal treatment?” Suki asked and grinned.

Katara laughed as she watched Suki’s masseuse excuse herself while another employee of the Fancy Lady Day Spa placed a tray with fresh fruit between them.
“She’s enjoying herself quite a lot and I don’t blame her since she’s lived quite a hard life these past few years. She’s in the mud bath next to Toph right now.” She laughed before she grinned. She wondered if Toph was making faces for Ursa and scaring the employees the way she did during their first visit. “So how are you feeling?”

Suki grinned before she let out a relaxed breath.

“Spirits, Katara, you’ve no idea how much I love you right now for suggesting we visit the spa. Ah, I feel like I’m floating on a cloud.”

Katara laughed and reached over to gently rub the large bulge that was housing her future niece or nephew.

“I think you deserve it for all these years you have suffered with my older brother…and for all the years to come,” she added teasingly.

They both laughed until Suki let out a soft groan.

“Suki, are you alright?” Katara asked in alarm.

“Yes, I’m fine,” Suki reassured her as she let out a deep breath. “The baby just likes to remind me how cramped it must be in there.” She laughed as she rubbed the left side of her belly.

“So you can feel the baby moving already?” Katara asked softly as she stared at the way Suki lovingly caressed her stomach. Would she ever know what carrying a child would feel like?

The Kyoshi Warrior nodded and smiled.

“Yeah, it started a few weeks ago and it kind of freaked me out at first,” she admitted. “You should’ve seen the look on Sokka’s face when he felt the baby kicking for the first time. His eyes widened so much I was afraid they would pop out of his head before he started gaping like a fish out of water.”
She laughed softly before an affectionate smile adorned her face.

“Then he broke out into a grin so wide I thought it would’ve split his face in two before he started to shower me and my belly with kisses,” Suki sighed happily, “It was so adorable it almost made me cry.”

Katara smiled.

“Sokka always wanted a family since…” she paused before she continued more sadly, “our family only consisted of Gran-Gran, him, and me for years.”

Suki reached over and patted her arm in comfort.

Katara sniffled before she grinned.

“Anyway, I’m very happy for you both and I can’t wait to help you with the wedding!”

They laughed as they began to share ideas for the perfect wedding, sometimes going too extravagant, but a girl could dream, no?

“What about you, Katara?” Suki asked after a while of calmed silence. “How would you like your wedding to be like once Aang proposes to you?”

Katara started to choke on a grape before she swallowed it whole. She coughed for a while as Suki patted her back before she cleared her throat.

“I…uh…I haven’t really thought about that,” she muttered.

Suki frowned as she leaned back in her chair.

“About the wedding or…about marrying Aang?” she asked curiously.
Suki watched as Katara lowered her head before she started to play with her braid, a sign that she was either nervous or uncomfortable.

This had been the second time Katara had reacted with unease and anxiety when the topic of marriage with the airbender was brought up. That was not how Suki felt every time the thought of becoming Sokka’s wife entered her head. Instead the Kyoshi warrior became so excited and ecstatic that she had been afraid she would burst. But Katara acted like…well…like she disliked the idea of marrying Aang.

Maybe she was seeing it all wrong, but Katara was her friend and she wanted her to be happy, and right now she was not sure that Katara’s relationship with Aang was the right thing for her.

Suki grabbed her friend’s hand as she addressed her in a serious tone.

“Katara, maybe it’s none of my business, but I think you—”

She did not get to finish her thought as Ty Lee burst into the room with a joyful squeal, followed by a not-too-happy Mai. Suki scowled at them as she leaned back in her seat, watching as Ty Lee rushed toward Katara to gush about her spa treatment. She would talk to Katara another time.

Zuko waited impatiently in the same sitting room Mai had brought him in the day before. He had just finished going over the compromise with the Earth King a few minutes ago. And just as he had expected, the ruler of Ba Sing Se had agreed excitedly to a trade. The King had also enjoyed the idea of having tourists from around the world visiting his great metropolis since Ba Sing Se had become almost isolated from the rest of the world due to Long Feng and the Dai Li’s control.

While Zuko was busy with the King Kuei, everybody else had gone out into the city. After he had reassured them they could go out without him, Sokka and Aang had decided to explore the city of walls. Iroh had gone to his teashop where they would visit once everybody returned to the palace, and the women had decided to take his mother—who had never been to Ba Sing Se before—and Suki to the spa. Ty Lee had to practically drag Mai to go along with them.

Zuko sighed and ran a hand down his face. Mai had not bothered him about their little argument, and instead, she would stand beside him quietly, sometimes reaching to take his arm. He knew she was trying to please and support him, so he had decided that perhaps he could give their relationship another chance. Maybe when she returned from her visit to her parents, everything would return as it was before.
The sound of laughter reached his ears and he looked up to see Aang and Sokka entering the room. He nodded in acknowledgement when Aang waved at him with a cheerful smile.

“Did the meeting with the Earth King go well?” Sokka asked as he flopped down on one of the plush cushions lying around the room.

“Yes,” Zuko answered simply.

He half-listened as his friends recounted their adventure in the city, especially going over the strange animals the Earth King had placed in the zoo since their last visit, while they waited for the women to arrive from their outing. After a while, the airbender headed to the window at the other side of the room with Momo on his shoulder.

_The Fancy Lady Day Spa, they called it, _Zuko remembered what the girls had chatted about and rolled his eyes. _What kind of name is that?_

Frowning, Zuko again wondered what was wrong with Katara. He had tried to talk to her after they finished their meal, but she had just laughed nervously and said they were late for their appointment at the spa. She didn’t even look at him.

He was slightly angry with himself for letting someone affect him so much. Not even his father’s indifference or Mai’s earlier avoidance caused him to feel so slighted and hurt.

_It doesn’t matter, _he thought as he narrowed his eyes. _I will find a way to fix what’s wrong and then Katara will talk to me again._ He crossed his arms over his chest, his eyes glinting in determination.

“I miss Suki,” he heard Sokka complain with a heavy sigh over at the cushion he was sprawled on.

“But you just saw her a few hours ago,” Zuko stated with a raised eyebrow.

Sokka lifted his head to roll his eyes at his firebending friend.

“I know that!” he snapped before he let out another sigh. “I just can’t stand being away from her for too long, especially now that she’s carrying our child,” he said with a smile.
Sokka hauled himself up into a sitting position as he regarded his reserved friend sitting on the couch with a questioning look on his face.

“You know what I mean, right?” Sokka asked innocently as he carefully observed Zuko’s reaction. “You feel sad and depressed when you’re away from your loved one even for a few minutes that you feel that you’d die if you don’t see her face? You know what I’m talking about, right?”

Zuko frowned at the words the warrior had said. Had he ever felt such emotions whenever Mai was away from him?

No, I haven’t, he answered his own question.

Was something wrong with him because he never felt sad when he was not near Mai or felt like he was dying if he did not see her? But then again he wasn’t a romantic like Sokka and the water tribesmen did exaggerate a lot. And then there was the fact that he did not love Mai the way that Sokka loved Suki.

“Right, Zuko?” Sokka repeated after watching different kinds of emotions flash across Zuko’s face.

“I…” Zuko began before he turned away with a snort. “That’s just ridiculous.”

Sokka smirked.

“If you say so,” he said with a shrug.

Just then the women arrived, leading a blushing Suki into the room. The Kyoshi Warrior had her usual short hair styled into an elegant bun and pretty, light makeup adorned her face. The women had decided to give her a special treatment as a gift to celebrate her pregnancy and engagement.

Zuko found himself relaxing as his eyes settled on Katara without even bothering to figure out why that was.
“Wow, Suki, you look beautiful!” Sokka exclaimed and rushed over to embrace his betrothed. He leaned down to give her a kiss, but cried out when Suki lightly slapped him away.

“None of that now, you’ll ruin the makeup,” Suki scolded gently and laughed when her husband-to-be pouted.

Katara smiled at both their antics before she noticed that Zuko was making his way toward them and he was looking straight at her. Blushing, she quickly moved away from her brother and Suki to stand beside Aang and took his hand. Aang looked at her and smiled joyfully before he squeezed her hand.

Zuko stopped as he watched Katara reach for the Avatar and he frowned, gritting his teeth when Aang kissed her cheek. Zuko lightly jumped when Mai looped her arm around his. He gave her a small smile before glancing once more at the waterbender who again was avoiding his eyes.

“Okay then,” Katara spoke up almost too cheerfully. “Let’s go to the Jasmine Dragon before Uncle Iroh starts to think we forgot about him.”

They exited the palace walls and entered the city, making their way down the streets to the Jasmine Dragon where Iroh was waiting for them. The people strolling along the streets of the Upper Ring pointed and cheered as the war heroes passed them by. Sokka and Aang waved back at them enthusiastically.

Zuko smiled, content with the citizens’ change in attitude since he last visited the city. Back then, he was given hateful looks full of mistrust, but now they seemed to give him grateful smiles and bows, for he was the one who declared the war over and returned their city to them.

He glanced behind him where the waterbender was walking beside Aang and Toph. Katara had been right. Some people did see the good he had done, all they needed was some time in order to realize it and time to heal their wounds. He barely felt Mai let go of his arm to join Ty Lee before he returned his discreet observations of Katara.

Ursa watched as the young noblewoman finally detached herself from the Fire Lord and took that moment to walk beside her son. Zuko smiled down at his mother and offered his arm to her, which she accepted with a smile.

“How was your time at the spa?” Zuko asked her softly, noticing the way she seemed to be avoiding being near Mai. Again, he wondered if he should be concerned.
“It was lovely,” Ursa answered with a small laugh. “I had not been so pampered since I was living in the palace. It was so nice of Katara to suggest we spend our time there.” She smiled before a small frown appeared on her delicate face. “I noticed she seemed a bit distracted, though. I hope it is nothing serious.”

So his mother had noticed as well. But why did it look like Katara only seemed to be acting differently towards him?

They passed a small store that seemed to sell medicinal herbs. It had a small wooden door with two large vases with beautiful flowers beside it. Ursa stopped and looked at the little building.

“Is something the matter, Lady Ursa?” Katara asked as she noticed the older woman and Zuko had stopped. The rest of their group paused as well and looked at Ursa.

“Suki woke up with a small headache this morning. I would like to buy some herbs and ask Iroh if he could make it into tea for her,” Ursa said as she smiled at the pregnant woman.

Suki smiled back gratefully. The group followed after the older woman into the small shop.

It was a bit dim inside and the scent of plants and medicine permeated the air in the room. Herbs and glass medicine bottles rested in shelves behind a small counter. A young woman with a long braid had her back turned towards them as she restocked the shelves.

“Excuse me, miss,” Ursa called out as they walked up to the counter. “Do you have some evodia fruit to help with headaches?”

“Yes, of course,” the young woman replied pleasantly as she set down her supplies and moved down the shelves. She looked around for a while before reaching the top shelf, grabbing a small jar filled with the small rounded fruits before turning around.

Zuko watched as Katara walked around the room before a small gasp reached his ears. He turned around to see the young herbalist staring at him with wide, brown eyes.

“Li!” the young woman gasped, barely catching the jar that almost fell from her grasp.
Everybody in the room looked at her before adjusting their gazes toward the silent young Fire Lord.

Zuko frowned as he looked the young woman over. He had not been called Li since his time as a fugitive all those years ago. The young herbalist had soft, brown eyes and a lovely smile. She was wearing a long pink and white dress with a small white apron tied at her waist. She looked familiar.

“I’m sorry, but have we met?” he asked.

Mai narrowed her eyes as she glided across the room to stand beside Zuko, glaring at the woman who had still not taken her eyes off her boyfriend and held a blush on her cheeks.

Katara looked between Zuko and the young, pretty herbalist and frowned as she wondered if Zuko knew this woman. A strange, uneasy feeling settled in her stomach at the way the woman blushed.

Toph grinned as she noticed Katara’s annoyance, indicated by the tapping of her foot on the stone floor.

The young girl seemed to snap out of her trance and made a bow.

“Maybe you don’t remember me, but I remember you. I healed your Uncle Mushi’s rash from the white jade bush,” she said softly and smiled.

Zuko’s eyes widened a fraction as he finally recognized her.

“Song?” he asked quietly in disbelief.

_Song?_ Katara frowned as she glanced at Zuko’s slightly shocked expression. _So he does know her?_ Without even thinking about it, she made her way over to Zuko and stood at his other side, examining the graceful and pretty girl behind the counter.

Zuko noticed that Mai had inched closer to him and that Katara had moved away from Aang and was now standing at his side. Composing himself, he looked around the small building more carefully than he had previously before returning his attention to the girl.

“What are you doing here?” he asked.

Song smiled as she approached the counter, placing the small jar on the smooth, wooden surface.

“My mother and I decided to move to Ba Sing Se two years ago since it seemed safer here than for two women living alone near the wilderness,” Song explained softly. “Thanks to some money we had saved from the infirmary we managed to open this shop three months ago.”

Unbeknownst to them, both Katara and Mai narrowed their eyes and glared at the smiling young woman with the pretty and delicate face.

“Zuko, who is she?” Mai asked in a low voice as she crossed her thin arms over her flat chest.

The young firebender finally looked away to glance at the irritated dark-haired woman.

“Uncle Iroh and I met Song and her mother when we were fugitives during the war,” he said.

A slightly guilty look crossed his features as he looked back at the brown-eyed girl. The two Earth Kingdom women had helped them, two complete strangers, and how did he repay their kindness?

“I apologize for taking your ostrich-horse after you and your mother welcomed us into your home,” he said sincerely.

“It’s alright,” Song replied with a small smile. “I was a bit saddened at first, but I figured that perhaps you needed it more than us. It seems our ostrich-horse did aid you. I can’t wait to tell my mother that we helped the Dragon of the West and none other than Prince Zuko, now the Fire Lord. She will be surprised.”

She paused as she looked over at his elegant clothes, to his fire crown, and then to his recognizable face. Both Mai and Katara subconsciously moved closer to the young man between them.
Zuko frowned, feeling a bit guilty.

“I am sorry for lying to you about who I really was, but it was necessary that both my uncle and I were not recognized,” he stated.

“I understand why you had to do that,” Song replied and smiled good-naturedly. “Even though you lied about your identity, I’m sure that the rest you told me about was the truth.”

What is she talking about? Katara asked, narrowing her eyes. She did not like how the young woman kept staring at Zuko. What truth did Zuko talked to her about?

Katara felt a bit troubled at the thought of Zuko sharing his thoughts with someone else. Even though it seemed silly, she wanted to be the only one Zuko went to in order to speak about his thoughts, ideas, problems and even feelings.

Song smiled when Zuko nodded. She then looked at Aang, who had a confused expression on his face.

“It is also an honor to meet the Avatar,” she said and bowed again. “I knew you would bring peace to our world again.”

“Uh, thanks,” Aang muttered. He blushed and rubbed the back of his neck sheepishly.

Song returned her soft gaze to the young firebender, both unaware of the annoyed expressions on the two young women standing beside him. Toph smirked and Ursa smiled behind her hand. Suki looked over at Sokka who only shrugged.

“The people of Ba Sing Se are thankful for what you have done, even though you could have taken advantage of our weakened state,” Song said softly. “I am sure the rest of the world is grateful to you for calling off the war and for all the help you have given us.”

I told him that first! Katara hissed mentally and crossed her arms over her chest.

“I know,” Zuko replied with a nod. “A very great person has already told me that,” he said warmly.
Katara looked up at his words and noticed that Zuko was looking down at her. She blushed when she realized that the great person he was talking about was her.

Smiling, Song handed the jar to Ursa, who thanked her. Zuko reached inside his tunic for his bag of money and handed Song a few gold coins.

“This is too much!” Song gasped softly as she stared at the coins in her hand.

“It’s for helping my uncle’s embarrassing ailment, for your kind hospitality for two poor strangers, and for the ostrich-horse,” Zuko replied and moved away before she could return the coins.

The young herbalist closed her hand and bowed gratefully.

“Thank you, Fire Lord Zuko,” she said. She straightened and smiled radiantly.

Zuko inclined his head slightly.

“It was nice seeing you again. I wish you and your mother good luck in your new business,” he said before he headed out the door, taking his mother’s arm in his.

Mai pinned one last glare at the beaming woman before she, too, went out of the building to walk close to Zuko. Katara looked back at the girl named Song and smiled.

That was nice of Zuko, Katara thought as she followed the rest outside, not admitting to herself that she was glad Zuko and Song were just mere acquaintances.

“Mushi?” Sokka laughed once they returned to the streets. “What kind of name is that? I would’ve thought the Dragon of the West would’ve had a more impressive fugitive name!”

“It was the only thing that came to my mind at the moment,” Zuko replied. He smirked and shrugged lightly, remembering the irritated look on his uncle’s face when he had given the name to the young, pretty nurse.
It was midafternoon when the group arrived below the impressive building known as the Jasmine Dragon. They climbed the short stairs that lead up to the elegant teashop and passed a bubbling fountain in the middle of the courtyard. A long line of people waiting to enjoy a cup of the Jasmine Dragon’s famous tea greeted them.

“I see Uncle was not exaggerating about how popular the Jasmine Dragon has become,” Zuko remarked dryly.

As they approached the wide entrance of the teashop, the crowd became excited and bowed to them. Iroh appeared at the entrance as the commotion reached his ears.

“Ah, you have finally arrived!” Iroh exclaimed cheerfully. “I was beginning to think you forgot.”

“We could never forget about you…Uncle Mushi,” Toph replied and chuckled.

Iroh turned around to look at the grinning short girl and gaped in horror. Frowning, he turned an accusing glare at his nephew as if saying, ‘How could you betray me like that?’

Zuko laughed inwardly at his uncle.

“We ran into Song over at an herb shop and well...she brought it up,” he explained coolly with a shrug.

Iroh’s annoyed look turned into curiosity before he inwardly grinned mischievously.

“You mean that sweet young nurse we met almost four years ago?” he asked innocently. He glanced at Katara who had crossed her arms with a scowl on her face. “She was such a lovely girl and pretty, too. Isn’t that right, Nephew?”

“Uh…” Zuko frowned. Why did his uncle always put him in such awkward situations?

“You, will you look at the time?” Katara interrupted with a strained smile. “I’m sure Suki and the baby are hungry, right, Suki? There, you see!” she said before the Kyoshi Warrior could respond.

Iroh mentally chuckled.

“You are right, my dear! Come in, come in! I have reserved your table already.” He motioned for them to follow.

Inside the opulent building, the group gaped at the amount of people sitting at the rounded tables, drinking their preferred blend of tea and nibbling on delicate pastries. It was obvious only those from high society occupied the room. Instead of its previous greenish glow from when it first opened to the public, a warm orangey light now cast its glow throughout the Jasmine Dragon. Iroh now proudly displayed his Fire Nation heritage.

They walked on a large red ochre carpet with a golden dragon curved along its length as they followed Iroh to their table. A few customers turned in their seats to look at the newcomers and began to chatter quietly about the young Fire Lord and the Avatar’s visit. Iroh led them to a large, cherry wood table almost at the far end of the grand teashop near an opened window.

“Sit, sit.” The teashop’s famous owner motioned for them to be seated with a smile. He waited as the group moved toward the rounded table to take their seats. “The waiters will come soon with tea and pastries.”

Being as subtle as possible, Iroh grinned as he gently pushed his nephew to sit next to the waterbender who, he noted, immediately tensed while a faint blush covered her cheeks. Unfortunately, he thought with a sigh, he was unable to prevent Mai from taking a seat on Zuko’s other side.

Zuko glared at his uncle for the treatment of his person, but the old man just gave him an innocent look. The young firebender adjusted his robes before unconsciously fixing his fire crown. Zuko watched as his mother passed the empty spot beside Mai and sat instead on the vacant chair beside Katara while his uncle sat between Ursa and Toph. He watched with veiled amusement when Aang pouted before reluctantly taking a seat next to Mai.

Zuko vaguely wondered why his mother had practically circled the table instead of taking the spot next to Mai before he returned his attention to the waterbender at his side who was fidgeting with the end of the blue sash that went around her waist. Again he wondered at her odd behavior towards him, but not before he wondered what he would see if he pulled on the sash wrapped around Katara’s trim waist...
After requesting one of his waitresses to bring a teapot to boil the evodia fruit for Suki, Iroh turned his gleeful face toward the expectant couple.

“So how far along are you, my dear?” Iroh asked Suki before he placed a mocked hurt look on his face. “I must say, I am bit hurt to be the last one to find out about your joyful news.”

Zuko rolled his eyes. “We all know you knew even before we did, Uncle.”

Iroh laughed as he stroked his small beard.

“Nothing can escape these wise eyes of mine,” he said proudly before he leveled his gaze on his nephew and at the young waterbending woman beside him. “Nothing.”

Both Katara and Zuko frowned at the mysterious tone in the old man’s voice and at the way he seemed to stare at them.

“Anyways,” Sokka interrupted as he placed a big, noisy kiss on Suki’s cheek, “We’re headed for our sixth month, right, Suki?”

“Sixth month, you say?” Ursa asked as a small frown appeared on her face. “I don’t remember being so…uh…large…at my sixth month when I was pregnant with Zuko and Azula. But having two warriors as parents, perhaps the child is growing big and strong.”

Sokka laughed as he rubbed Suki’s large belly.

“That’s right, my son will be big and strong just like his daddy,” he cooed at the bulging stomach.

“Oh, yeah?” Suki asked with a raised eyebrow.

“Who’s to say it won’t be a girl?” Katara asked with her own raised eyebrow.
Sokka grinned apologetically before he placed a kiss on Suki’s temple.

“Then my daughter will be beautiful and strong just like her mommy,” he added.

“Damn right,” Suki said with a chuckle as she ruffled her future husband’s hair.

The group laughed as they watched the playful display between the two.

“A boy or a girl, either one is a blessing,” Ursa said with a loving smile at her son.

“Whatever it turns out to be, I guarantee you all it’ll be a surprise,” Toph said with glint in her eyes that made the other’s wonder at her words.

“Yeah, but,” Sokka continued after he fixed his mussed hair, “I bet a bag of coins that it would be a boy.”

“I’ll take you on that bet,” Toph piped in with a grin.

“You’re on!” Sokka exclaimed enthusiastically as they both shook hands on it.

Iroh laughed with the rest as he watched a particular customer enter the building before being led to the table next to theirs just like he had ordered.

The Jasmine Dragon’s proprietor suppressed a mischievous grin from showing on his excited face. His young earthbending friend had informed him that morning about her ‘contribution’ to their ‘mission’, but Toph had been vague. It was something about a lake and dreams and he wondered what that meant. He hid his grin behind his teacup. Now it was his turn to ‘contribute’ and he was excited to know what the outcome would be.

Zuko smiled at the antics of his friends as he sat silently with clasped hands on the table. He had never seen anybody so excited about becoming a father as Sokka was. The guy was practically bursting at the seams with joy and excitement.
Frowning, Zuko wondered if he would feel such emotions whenever he learned he was to be a father before he mentally shook his head at the thought. It was not yet time for such thoughts since first he needed to find a wife, and right now, Mai did not seem to be it.

Zuko sighed inaudibly before he once again returned his attention to Katara who was currently gazing out the window.

“It’s been a long time since we’ve been here, huh?” Zuko asked casually for only the waterbender to hear. He watched as she tensed before she shifted nervously in her place.

Katara briefly looked up before nodding.

“Yeah, like four years,” she answered with a nervous laugh.

His closeness and warmth was making her remember her dream and the way her body had reacted. Not that she had been able to forget about it the whole day.

Don’t even go there, Katara, she warned herself.

Never before had she ever experienced such feelings nor had her body reacted in such a way. Since her village had been made up of only women and children during the war. When she had first met Jet she had felt small butterflies in her stomach and she had blushed constantly because of his roguishly handsome looks and bad boy attitude. Not to mention he was one of the few boys her age she had come across since she had left the Southern Water Tribe with Aang and her brother. However, once she learned of his true nature and intentions her silly crush ended almost as swiftly as it had first appeared.

Aang’s presence made her feel carefree. His cheerfulness and merry nature made her smile, but those same attributes were what sometimes drove her crazy. Aang was mature when it came to important decisions, but for the most part she could not help but feel as if he was an immature little boy who always wanted her attention. And besides all that, his hugs and kisses never seemed to inspire the passion she heard many people talk about. Maybe it would come later?

However, with just one glance of his amber eyes, Zuko made her feel intense powerful sensations that she did not know how to respond to nor was she able to understand.
Zuko racked his brain for something that would keep Katara talking to him before the corners of his mouth tilted slightly upwards.

“Remember when I had to keep the flames on the stove going while you bent hot tea into the teacups for hours? And we didn’t even get paid.” Zuko grinned down at the young waterbender.

Despite herself, Katara looked up at him and smiled at the memories.

“Yeah, I’ve never worked as hard in my life as I did during those weeks.” She laughed.

“I also remember when you accidentally poured salt in the fruit pastries instead of sugar,” Zuko smirked—though he knew it had not been her—and looked away as the waiters began to arrive. Katara was a great cook, after all.

Katara gaped at his words before she crossed her arms over her chest.

“That was not me! That was you!” she affirmed, dodging around a waiter who had placed their cups filled with aromatizing tea in front of them in order to give the arrogant firebender a small annoyed glare.

Zuko stroked his chin as if he was remembering the incident and carefully evaluating what the situation had been.

“No…I am pretty sure it was you,” he answered calmly as he raised the teacup to his lips.

Katara’s temper flared at the accusation and she opened her mouth to retort hotly when she saw Zuko glance at her from the corner of his eye with a small smirk.

Wait? Is he just joking with me? Is he…teasing me? Again? she mused disbelievingly.

Katara almost lost all coherent thought as she saw his golden eyes glint with amusement, something he never indulged in regularly. Katara’s heart raced as he turned his head to look down at her before a striking smile appeared on his face. Katara drew in a breath as his handsome face almost blew her away.
My gods! Why does he have to do that?! she yelled frustratingly in her head as she continued to stare at his barely concealed amused features.

She blinked when a waitress appeared between them and placed a tray with delicious sweets. She blushed in embarrassment at her reaction of having Zuko sitting so close to her, and for the strange feelings in her lower stomach and heart that his warm gaze caused her. She looked away, determined to keep her distance from him.

Zuko almost grinned when he saw Katara’s azure eyes flash with indignation and anger before realization dawned on her. A small smile began to spread on her face as he turned to look at her before it disappeared and she looked away from him. Again, he was surprised by the how much her reaction hurt him.

He sighed when he felt Mai touched his arm as she began to demand his attention.

Sokka had been watching Suki drink her evodia tea before he looked across the rounded table at his sister who was glaring at a smirking Zuko. He watched as her face lit up and a smile appeared on the young Fire Lord’s face. He was a bit confused, however, when his baby sister’s expression changed suddenly and she looked away. He was even more confused when Zuko frowned at her reaction. Was that hurt he saw in Zuko’s almost unreadable eyes? The Water Tribe warrior was distracted when he caught Suki reaching a hand to caress her growing stomach. He placed his own hand above hers and smiled down at her lovingly with excitement in his blue eyes.

Sipping from his teacup, Iroh glanced at Toph, who had a frown on her face, and then at his nephew, who kept stealing subtle glances at the blue-eyed young lady beside him, and then at Katara, who was rambling to Ursa as if she were trying to distract herself from something, and he sighed.

Katara took a break in explaining to Lady Ursa how to make sea prune stew as she tried to forget the handsome man beside her. Zuko’s proximity was enough to set her senses aflame and she was trying desperately to focus on Lady Ursa—who happened to be said handsome man’s mother.

Katara lifted her teacup to her lips to moisten her dry throat when someone bumped into her from behind, causing her to spill her hot tea onto her hand. Katara dropped the cup and hissed as the hot liquid burned her fingers.

She heard everybody call out her name in alarm, but before she could react, a pair of strong hands caught her own hand and began to wipe the tea with a silken handkerchief. Katara blushed when she realized that those comforting hands belonged to Zuko as well as the cool, velvety handkerchief. Both shivered as their hands made contact.

“Katara, are you all right?” she heard Zuko ask with concern as his pair of hands continued to gently dab her skin with the smooth cloth.

She looked up shyly and nodded as her heart fluttered. The pain was easing, but a different burning sensation had spread throughout her body, much the same way his touch did in her dream.

“I’m so sorry,” the young female customer apologized hurriedly and bowed.

“It’s okay. Accidents happen,” Katara replied without much thought as she continued to watch Zuko gently and carefully checking her hand for worse injury. The burn was not that serious and she could have healed it in an instant if it was, but Zuko’s care was better.

Much better, she sighed dreamily, her stomach fluttering with butterflies.

Content that Katara was indeed fine, Zuko turned his head around to pin a glare at the clumsy customer.

“You should be more careful,” he reprimanded harshly.

Toph elbowed Iroh, who in return looked at Ursa, who smiled discreetly at the protective hold the young Fire Lord still had on the Water Tribe maiden’s small hand.

“Yes, I’m terribly sorry,” the young woman said with a deeper bow before she looked up with an apologetic look.

Her large brown eyes widened and a small grin appeared on her face.

“Li! It’s so good to see you again!” she exclaimed and immediately straightened, forgetting the incident.
Katara frowned at the way the young woman was smiling at Zuko.

Does Zuko know this girl, too? she thought irritably and pulled her hand away from Zuko’s grasp, placing her hands on her lap.

Zuko reluctantly allowed Katara to remove her hand from his before he returned his glare at the woman, who seemed to have forgotten she was in presence of royalty and had caused his closest friend pain, although small. The young woman was a bit short, with a small bushy ponytail on her dark-haired head. She was wearing a short green dress and had a bright and friendly smile on her face. There was something familiar about her.

“Wow, it seems you have really accomplished a lot these past few years. First a juggler for the circus, then a waiter in a small teashop, and now you’re the Fire Lord,” the woman teased and giggled.

Ah, crap… Zuko cursed as he frowned.

“Jin…what are you doing here?” he asked carefully.

He could practically feel Mai’s anger next to him. Jin was nice and all, but he really did not want to be reminded of that embarrassing date. A date his uncle had forced him to go on.

He knew Iroh had been worried about him, afraid that his nephew would never find a girlfriend—not that it would have been hard—but the fact was that he had never been a very social person, and even less after what happened with his sire. That is why he had used brothels. There was no need for good impressions or great social skills in order to form a relationship since the few women he had bedded were just there to release his sexual frustrations. He thought he was horrible on his date with Jin and he did not need the others to know it.

Iroh decided to speak as he suppressed a chuckle at his nephew’s uncomfortable expression.

“Is it not strange to see Miss Jin after so long, Nephew?” Iroh asked innocently. “We ran into each other about a year ago when she came for a cup of tea, and now she comes to the Jasmine Dragon once every week. And since you two knew each other, I give her discounts!”

“And how do you two know each other exactly?” Mai asked coldly with unveiled irritation as she looked the Earth Kingdom woman over with disdain.
Zuko suppressed the urge to sigh and rub the back of his neck.

“We met in the Lower Ring of Ba Sing Se and well, we…uh…”

“We went out on a date almost four years ago,” Jin replied eagerly and then she blushed.

Zuko sighed.

Great, he thought sarcastically. I just hope she leaves out the part where Uncle did my hair and I humiliated myself by trying to juggle.

Katara noticed the pink hue that appeared on the woman’s cheeks and she was surprised to find herself feeling anxious and uneasy to know what happened on this date.

Zuko must have really liked her if he asked her out on date, she thought sadly. I wonder if he still likes her.

“Date, huh?” Katara said neutrally as she nibbled on a cookie, clenching it so tightly that it almost crumbled in her hand.

“Yes, it was wonderful and so romantic,” Jin said with a dreamy sigh.

Romantic? Katara frowned, Did Zuko give her flowers? Did they ride on a boat under the moon? Did Zuko tell her sweet things? she thought even though she knew that Zuko would probably never do such things. Why do I even care? she asked herself with a scowl.

“And what happened on this date?” Iroh asked innocently. “You never did tell me when you came back late that night, Zuko.”

Zuko glared at his uncle, but before he could respond, Jin piped in with another dreamy sigh.
“At the end of the day we kissed.” She blushed even redder.

Iroh coughed in order to hide his amusement at the look of embarrassment on his nephew’s face.

Katara clenched the cookie in her hand so hard in crumbled into tiny pieces onto the table. They what?

“Oh, really?” Mai asked with an icy tone as she glared at Zuko who was currently sipping at his teacup as if nothing had happened.

“You kissed? So how was it?” Ty Lee excitedly asked with her usual bubbly persona.

“Ty Lee!” Zuko snapped at her as he tried to keep from flushing.

“It was such an amazing kiss,” Jin responded with a dreamy look on her face as another blush appeared on her cheeks.

Zuko stared at the young girl as if she were crazy.

What the hell is she talking about? he thought. The kiss was sweet, but it sure wasn’t amazing, definitely nothing close to be sighing over.

“Wow, Sparky,” Toph spoke up with a smirk. “I never thought you were such a ladies’ man.”

“It was nothing like that,” the firebender assured as he glared down at his teacup. “We just went to eat at a small food place and then we walked around. That was it.”

Jin giggled.

“Of course that wasn’t it. Don’t tell me you’ve forgotten about that date?” she asked softly as she placed a hand on the young man’s shoulder.
Katara glared heatedly at Jin’s hand resting on Zuko’s shoulder.

How dare she touch him! she growled in her head as she vaguely wondered if her friends would figure out who could have doused Jin with the tea from their table.

Zuko tensed as he felt Jin touch him and slowly reached to shrug off her hand. He resisted the urge to snap at her for daring to touch the Fire Lord in such a way. He was surprised, however, when it was someone else who removed the unwelcomed appendage from his person.

Without thinking about it, Katara’s arm shot out to grab Jin’s wrist.

“You two probably know each other and went on a date a few years ago, but things have changed. Fire Lord Zuko is not Li anymore and you will show him the proper respect his title as Fire Lord demands for. Do not touch him again,” Katara hissed out dangerously as she pulled Jin’s wrist almost roughly away from Zuko.

Those at the table fell silent as the group stared in shock at the seemingly angry waterbender. Aang hesitantly stood up from his chair, but then sat down again as a deep frown settled on his face. If he wasn’t mistaken—and he hoped he was—it seemed like Katara was jealous. But that couldn’t be because she loved him, not Zuko. Mai seethed silently as she glared between the waterbender and the Earth Kingdom woman. Suki turned to look at Sokka who had an equally puzzled expression on his face.

Toph openly grinned as she leaned back on her seat. Ursa look at her old friend beside her and smiled knowingly while Iroh returned the smile with one of his own as he took another sip from his tea. His plan turned out better than he thought it would.

Zuko stared at Katara with curiosity at the way she was glaring into Jin’s face. He was a bit surprised at the strong and rather harsh reaction Katara had displayed because of a simple touch from an unfamiliar woman. If he didn’t know any better, he would think that she was jealous. But that couldn’t be, because she only saw him as a friend. However, he had to admit that the thought of having Katara jealous because of him did please him a bit…okay maybe it pleased him a lot.

Jin jerked back a step at the reprimand she received from the beautiful Water Tribe woman sitting beside the Fire Lord. Blushing in embarrassment, Jin bowed again.

“You’re right,” she said. “Please, forgive my rude behavior, Fire Lord Zuko. I didn’t mean any “Do not worry. All is forgiven,” Zuko replied coolly. “I’m just sorry you had to bear with me on that date,” he finished absentmindedly as he continued to stare at the irritated waterbender by his side.

She also looks beautiful when she’s mad, he thought with a smirk.

“You weren’t a bad date. It was the most wonderful night of my life, especially because of that kiss,” Jin said dreamily before she smiled. “Thank you, Master Iroh, for the tea. I’ll see you next week.”

Jin bowed again cheerfully as she left their table to exit the teashop with Katara and Mai glaring daggers at the back of her head.

“Well,” Iroh piped in, “That was interesting.”

He hid his grin behind his teacup when Katara turned back around and crossed her arms over her chest while she glowered at the innocent teacup in front of her.

Most interesting indeed, he mused.

Zuko sighed irritably, barely stopping himself from flopping onto the green couch in one of the palace sitting rooms. It was late at night and everybody else was getting ready to go to sleep after their busy day. Even though he was tired, he knew he would not be able to rest, much less sleep.

After the initial awkwardness from the encounter with Jin dissipated, they had finished drinking their delicious tea and eating their sweet pastries before the group had departed from the Jasmine Dragon with pleased smiles and satisfied stomachs. Iroh had stayed behind until the teahouse closed for the day before the old firebender made his way back to the palace.

The group had continued their trip as they walked around the prestigious Upper Ring of Ba Sing Se. They had stopped at a few shops along the way where, unsurprisingly—and to Ty Lee, Aang and Sokka’s delight—they were given free souvenirs.

They then had boarded an earthbending powered train to cross over to the Middle Ring of the city while sightseeing along the ride. Grumbling that the train was being too slow, Toph had decided to help it move along much quicker with a small amount of earthbending. The sights became a blur as the train whizzed by while the passengers held onto each other for their lives.

Deciding it was best to walk after that incident, they arrived at the University of Ba Sing Se. The war heroes were welcomed exuberantly into the grand school while they were shown around the campus by the whole faculty and student body no less. As the sun began to set, the group had decided to return to the palace where the Earth King, Bosco, and Iroh were waiting for them with another splendid banquet.

Zuko sighed again as he ran a hand through his unbound dark hair. And during all that time he was unable to enjoy himself.

The reason? Katara.

Once they left the Jasmine Dragon, Katara had continued to ignore him. He had thought that with the incident with Jin, Katara would have returned to her normal self and would have begun to speak to him again, but he had been wrong. She didn’t talk to him but only for a few words. He had tried to start conversations with her, but she would just nod and move away from him. She did not walk by his side, but remained attached either to Aang or Ursa.

But what he hated the most was that she did not even look up to his face. He was unable to see her lovely blue eyes because she either had them cast down or averted to the side. He did not like it at all and her evasive behavior was making him displeased and angry.

‘What did you do to make Sugar Queen act this way?’ Toph had asked him as the group stepped inside a pottery shop.

‘I didn’t do anything—’ he had begun to argue before he stopped and frowned. ‘I don’t know…’

Had he done something? Zuko tried to think of everything he could have possibly done to make Katara behave the way she had, but he could not come up with anything. It was as if they were back in the Western Air Temple where he had to endure her indifference.

No, this was much worse because back then Katara acknowledged that he existed even if it was with hostility, and he knew he deserved her treatment. But now they have become great friends, he had shared with her some things he was unable and unwilling to tell anybody else, and her avoidance saddened and pained him so much to the point that it scared him. Zuko closed his eyes as a dreadful thought came to his mind.

What if Katara was bored of him? What if she did not want anything to do with him anymore? Was she displeased and disappointed as his sire was once of him? Did she dislike him and hate him like his sister once did?

That is why he had a hard time trusting and befriending people. Every relationship he had had with someone ended badly. His mother was taken away from him when he was just a child because he had somehow displeased his grandfather and Ozai. He was scarred and banished from his home by his own father because he had stood up to him against a horrible plan. Azula, his own sister, had used him in order to save herself when their father believed the Avatar was dead and then she tried to kill him, her own brother. In the beginning of his relationship with Mai it had been nice and pleasant, but now it was cold, awkward, and…unexciting.

Was the same thing to happen with Katara? Was their friendship to end up like his past relationships did so many times before?

“No!” Zuko growled angrily as he slammed his clenched fist on the armrest of the couch he was sitting on. “I won’t allow it. I will find out what is wrong. Katara will tell me what is going on.”

He could not stand the thought of never speaking to Katara ever again, or listen to her laugh, or share his thoughts with her once more. He could not bear the thought of losing her.

Her friendship, that is, he clarified.

Zuko straightened in his seat and composed himself, resuming his stoic expression as the sound of light footsteps reached his ears. He was not about to show anybody how confused, irritated, and depressed he was feeling at the moment.

He narrowed his eyes into slits, but remained still, when Katara’s form emerged from the hall and entered the sitting room. She had a book in her hands and she appeared to be reading. Zuko watched silently as she made her way across the room without realizing she was not alone.

Katara turned the page from the small book she had borrowed from the palace library and yawned. Maybe reading a book was not such a good idea if she wanted to keep awake. She could not return to her room and go to sleep.
The reason? Zuko.

She did not want to fall asleep for she was afraid she would have another dream about a certain stunning firebender. It was difficult to forget the first one and she did not want to imagine what would become of her if she had another such dream. It was hard enough to keep her distance from Zuko that day as they walked around Ba Sing Se since she had come to enjoy his company a lot. She had to stop herself many times from reaching and taking his arm in order to show him one interesting thing or another in her excitement.

It had been difficult to stay away when Song appeared. The pretty and gentle herbalist had made her wary. But then she had wavered in her resolve to keep her distance from Zuko when Jin appeared next. The way the Earth Kingdom young woman had acted around Zuko did not sit well with her.

And she even dared to touch him! I swear! The audacity of some women! Katara narrowed her eyes as she continued her slow walk into the sitting room.

The overly friendly smile, blushes, and dreamy looks the big-hipped woman had thrown at Zuko had made Katara irritated. Even now she wished she could have frozen Jin right in her spot with all the tea in the teahouse.

Katara sighed. That was why she had to keep away from Zuko because his presence, his courteous actions, such as his care of her hand with the tea incident, combined with the dream from last night was making her think almost homicidal thoughts about other women. That wasn’t normal. What was happening to her? It was just making her so confused and frustrated!

Zuko watched as Katara made her way across the room with a frown on her face. She seemed to be deep in thought and he wondered what she was thinking about that was making her look so troubled. He watched as Katara finally looked up from her book and their eyes met. He saw her eyes widened and a small squeak escaped between her lips before she quickly turned around.

“Katara, wait!” Zuko shouted as he sprang up from the couch. He narrowed his eyes as he swiftly and determinedly strode towards the waterbender before standing directly behind her.

Katara stopped in her tracks at his hard tone and hesitantly turned back around without looking at him.
“Hey, Zuko,” she stuttered. “We sure had fun today, huh? Okay, then…it’s late, so I’ll just be heading to my room to go to sleep.” She laughed nervously as she took a step back. She gulped when Zuko took a step forward to match her own.

“Why are you avoiding me?” Zuko asked bluntly, suppressing the irritation he felt from showing in his voice.

“What? I-I’m not avoiding you. Don’t be silly,” Katara said as she took another step away from him, but again she was unable to keep the distance since he followed her.

“Do not lie to me, Katara!” Zuko hissed angrily as she continued to avoid looking at him.

Katara’s eyes widened at his outburst. He had never spoken to her with such an angry emotion before, not even when they were enemies. It pained her.

“I’m n-not l-lying,” she stammered.

Zuko’s eyes flashed dangerously at her statement.

“Yes, you are!” he growled. “Tell me what’s going on!”

“Nothing is going on! I don’t know what you’re talking about!” Katara yelled back, not understanding what his problem was.

“Oh, really?” Zuko asked sarcastically. “You’ve been ignoring me since breakfast this morning. You didn’t talk to me, but for just a few words. You avoided walking, sitting, or standing beside me, and when I tried to come close to you, you moved away from me as if I had some kind of disease!”

Was I really that obvious? Katara thought before she frowned at his words.

Zuko’s temper flared when Katara remained silent and still refused to look into his eyes.

“I demand to know what the hell is going on this instant, Katara!” he ordered heatedly.
“You can’t order me around, Zuko!” she yelled angrily. Her own temper surfaced at Zuko’s demanding tone and she raised her eyes to glare at him.

Zuko narrowed his golden eyes.

“That may be so,” he said between gritted teeth, “but I still want to know why you have been ignoring and avoiding me all day.”

Katara blanched and she looked away again as she clasped the small book in her hands. Zuko watched as Katara clenched the little book so tightly against her chest that her fingers turned almost white.

“Katara, tell me,” he demanded again.

Whirling on her heels, Katara tried to race to the door, but Zuko reacted quickly and grabbed her right arm, careful not to hurt her. He swiftly spun her around towards him, mentally groaning when the scent of gardenias hit his senses.

Katara gasped as she almost collided against Zuko’s broad chest if it wasn’t for her free hand that steadied her between their bodies. The small book fell between them, forgotten on the floor like the rest of the world around them.

Zuko frowned when Katara lowered her face, hiding her cobalt eyes from his sight.

“Katara?” Zuko called softly, his anger dissipating. He could never stay angry with her.

“Please, tell me why you’re ignoring me. Have I done something wrong again? Just tell me what I did and I swear I will fix it,” he told her as he still held onto her arm, pleading for her to help him understand. Pleading for her to reassure him that they were still friends and she did not hate him.

Katara frowned at what she just heard and at the sadness she detected in his voice. She looked up into his amber orbs and what she saw in them almost made tears fall from her own eyes. She saw anger, sadness, hurt, and…fear.
And then it dawned on her.

So many people—his own family—had hurt Zuko so much in the past. That was why he had a hard time opening up to others and letting people into his life. He was afraid of being hurt again as he had been repeatedly so many times before. She was trying to keep away from him in order to save some of her sanity, but it seemed Zuko saw her actions as a form of avoidance and rejection.

Oh, La! What have I done? she cried in her head.

“It’s not your fault, Zuko! You didn’t do anything wrong! I’m so sorry for making you think that I was avoiding you!” she cried out, reaching her hand, that was not being held by him, to touch his right cheek, hoping that he would believe her. “I’m sorry, Zuko. Please forgive me.”

Zuko searched her cerulean eyes for any form of deceit, but found none. He inwardly sighed in relief as he leaned into her touch before a small smile spread on his face. How could he have thought Katara would hurt him? How could he have thought she would be like all the others in his past?

“You don’t know how glad it makes me to know that,” he admitted softly, enjoying the feeling of her soft hand on his face. “Katara, I…” he paused.

When Katara looked at him expectantly, Zuko let out a small breath.

“I want you to know that I see you as a...very good friend, a friend that I have never had the privilege of having ever before, and well...I must admit I was a bit...worried that I had somehow...lost you,” he said carefully.

Katara felt her heart flutter at his words.

“Do you really see me as such a good friend? Am I really that important that you would be worried if you lost my friendship?” she asked quietly.

Zuko smiled.
“Of course. You have done much to help me and you are always there to listen to me when I have a problem.”

Katara looked away with a frown.

“There are others that do the same. Like Song for instance,” she replied tersely.

She inwardly cringed at her words. She had not intended to say that, but it had just slipped out because she had been brooding over it all day.

“Song?” Zuko asked, furrowing his forehead.

“Yeah, she said that even though you lied about your identity, the rest of what you told her about yourself was the truth,” Katara replied. “It seems that there are others who are willing to listen to you.”

“Well…” Zuko frowned. “When I met Song she told me she had been hurt by the Fire Nation and the only thing I revealed was that so had I, but that’s all I told her and did not go into much detail.”

“Oh, Katara thought, mentally slapping her herself.

“What you say may be true,” he continued, “but there are those who just ‘listen’ to you talk while there are those who listen and understand when you talk to them, just like you, Katara,” he emphasized. “You did not judge me when I revealed my past to you, but listened with a compassionate heart. And I must confess that you are the only person that I feel comfortable talking with and the only person alongside Uncle and my mother that I really enjoy spending my time with.”

Katara slightly gaped at his words.

“Really?” she asked him incredulously. Was that truly possible?

“Yes,” he replied simply, but that one simple word caused something in Katara’s heart to burn.
“But...what about...Mai?” she asked.

Zuko sighed before he slowly said, “She...is not the easiest person to talk to.”

“Oh,” the waterbender uttered. For some reason, his words made her happy.

Smiling gently, Katara looked back at him.

“I kind of find it hard to believe that I’m one of the few people you talk to, but...I enjoy your company a lot as well,” she admitted softly. “It makes me happy that you find me worthy enough to talk to and I want you to know that I will always be there if you need somebody to lend a sympathetic ear,” she stated truthfully.

Zuko smiled warmly at her words because he knew she would always be there for him as he would be there for her. They continued to gaze into each other’s eyes as both felt that there was something else they should admit, something much deeper, but they held their tongues, afraid of being rejected.

“Well, if I didn’t do anything wrong to deserve such disrespect,” Zuko said with a small grin, “then why were you acting so strangely?” he asked curiously after a few minutes of comfortable silence. He scolded himself when Katara quickly removed her hand from his face at his question.

Katara blushed and again looked away from him.

“Well, I...you see...uh...”

She couldn’t explain her odd behavior to Zuko! She could not tell him that last night she had a dream about him where he had been touching her and where he had almost kissed her that it had caused a fire to spread throughout her body. How embarrassing would that be?

Zuko watched as the waterbender’s cheeks turned bright red. He raised an inquiring eyebrow.

“Katara?” he prompted, gently squeezing her arm which he finally noticed he was still holding.
Katara noticed as well and her heart began to race in her chest. He was touching her. Even if innocently, his touch caused her mind to be flooded with images from their spar on the flagship, the dream from the previous night, the lake that started it all, and the new feelings and sensation that were brought forth because of these events.

“I...I c-can’t tell you!” she uttered quickly and tried to pull her arm away from his grasp, but she was unable to make him budge.

Zuko frowned.

“What is it, Katara? What's wrong? You know you can tell me anything,” he told her reassuringly as he was filled with concerned at her anxiety.

“I know I can, Zuko.” Katara smiled at him before she quickly averted her eyes. “But it’s just that… it’s too…embarrassing,” she whispered and blushed scarlet.

The young man furrowed his forehead as he tried to come up with anything embarrassing that could have happened that concerned him and the way Katara had reacted around him that day.

His face flushed. Well, there were those interesting dreams he had had lately, but she couldn’t know about those. At least he hoped she didn’t. And then there were those times his body reacted whenever she did something to make his blood boil like on the ship or in the lake. But he was still alive and with no important body parts frozen, so she did not know about that either.

Wait a minute. The lake! She must still be embarrassed about what happened even though he had assured her everything was fine. Now he understood. She was probably uncomfortable being around him after their little encounter.

Zuko smiled as he hooked a finger under Katara’s chin so she could look into his eyes and see he was being honest.

“It’s alright, Katara. I understand.”

Katara’s eyes widen in horror and her face turned a darker shade of red.
“You do?” she squeaked. “Oh, no!” she moaned, mortified. What did he think of her now? Would he laugh at her? Would he be disgusted?

Zuko nodded as he continued to smile down at her.

“You don’t have to be embarrassed about what happened at the lake the other night. I promised that I wasn’t going to tell anybody, so don’t worry, because I intend to keep that promise. And I assure you that I didn’t see anything that I wasn’t supposed to see, I swear it,” he told her. Though, he would not have minded catching a glimpse…

Katara gaped at his words and at his misunderstanding.

“That’s not what I—I mean…yeah…that’s it! How silly of me, huh?” She laughed almost hysterically.

“I’ll say,” Zuko chuckled.

“Hey!” Katara complained halfheartedly.

Zuko continued to chuckle softly before he reluctantly released her arm with a faint blush. He cleared his throat before reaching down to retrieve her fallen book. He handed it to her with a smile.

“Thanks,” Katara said, smiling as she grabbed it, hugging it to her chest. “I didn’t even realize I dropped it.”

“It’s not your fault you’re sometimes clumsy,” Zuko teased.

Again with the teasing! Katara gasped before she grinned.

“You’re calling me clumsy after you poured salt instead of sugar into the fruit pastries?” she teased.

“Damn,” Zuko cursed as he crossed his arms over his chest. “I knew I shouldn’t have brought that up.”
This time Katara laughed genuinely as he playfully narrowed his eyes at her. She would never again allow something as silly as a dream affect her so strongly...because her reaction to a dream made her hurt Zuko and break her promise to help make him happy.

Because that was all it was, right? Just a dream...
After resolving their little misunderstanding, Katara and Zuko—much to Aang and Mai’s displeasure and much to the delight of Iroh, Toph, and Ursa—became almost inseparable for the next few days. Upon Zuko’s request, Katara had readily agreed to help Zuko with the compromise between the Fire Nation and Ba Sing Se. Both rulers had decided to open up a trade system between their countries.

After debating for a while, the gang, with the exception of Mai and Ty Lee, entered the neglected part of the city of Ba Sing Se. Just as he had seen before while he observed the Lower Ring in the shadows a few nights ago, Zuko’s earlier assessment became accurate as the gang looked around the slums. The houses were fixed much better, but the living conditions of the people were not much improved; they hardly had enough money to buy food for their families. Trash littered the dirty streets and desperate thieves lurked behind alleys.

Once they realized who had come to visit, the people had flocked towards them with hope in their eyes. They had practically begged for their help, in which the Fire Lord and the Avatar reassured them that they would do everything in their power to aid them.

Katara was appalled at the sickly and starving looking populace that they passed, especially the small children who sometimes approached her with their curious and hopeful little faces.

“I wish I had the money to help these people right now,” Katara said sadly as she watched the children scurry away after they received a few coins from the Fire Lord and Lady Toph Bei Fong.

“Don’t worry, Katara,” Aang reassured her.

He smiled at her, but she did not notice it as she looked around the place. Aang suppressed a sad frown from showing on his face at her lack of reaction.

“Once the compromise starts, they’ll receive all the help they need,” he added softly.

“I know, but that could take months and possibly years!” Katara exclaimed, exasperated.
“For now the only thing we can do is wait patiently a while longer,” Zuko reminded her. He placed a comforting hand on her shoulder and Katara immediately relaxed.

She smiled up at him.

“I guess you’re right,” she consented and sighed.

Aang narrowed his eyes at Zuko who slowly removed his hand from the waterbender with a raised eyebrow.

“Why do they look so sick?” Suki asked what was on everybody else’s mind.

She grimaced at a slight pain in her lower abdomen, but assured her worried husband-to-be that she was fine when he moved to help her. Sokka had tried to convince her to stay at the palace and rest, but she refused to be sitting on her behind like a lazy noblewoman. She was a warrior for Kyoshi’s sake!

“Ohmm?” Zuko pondered as he scanned the area and the people around them. “The people didn’t look so unhealthy when Uncle and I lived here. I don’t understand.”

“Excuse me,” Aang said politely as he stopped an elderly couple who passed them by. “Why do the people look so sick?”

The bald, old man and his skinny wife looked up and squinted at the strangers with the nice, clean clothing. They immediately recognized the Avatar with his monk robes and arrow tattoos before they gaped at the tall, black-haired young man looking down at them. They saw the glinting fire crown, the fine red and black attire, and the infamous scar on his face.

“Fire Lord Zuko!” the aged couple exclaimed and began a series of bows.

Aang was a bit confused at the way they had basically looked past him. Since he was so used to adoring attention always being directed at him, being ignored irked him.

“Uh…please, you can stop that now,” Zuko said uncomfortably at the almost groveling people before him. He looked around surreptitiously to make sure a crowd was not gathering at this unwanted attention.

“Yes, of course!” the man obeyed, but not before they gave one last deep bow.

The man looked up and smiled. His wife beamed up at the young Fire Lord.

“Uh…thank you,” Zuko said, uncertainly. Sure, he was used to being showed respect since he was the Fire Lord, but never to this extreme.

“Why, anything for the one who stopped the war and brought our soldiers back home,” the man bowed again, mirrored by his wife.

Zuko was unsure on how to react to the sudden adoration. He was used to the indifferent and scornful looks—which were now abating—and now he was just getting used to the grateful looks he had been recently receiving. But adoration? He was surprised by it.

He noticed the others were staring curiously between him and the beaming couple, and he shrugged. He smiled when Katara gave him a grin and a look that said, ‘Didn’t I tell you?’

“Wow, Sparky. Looks like you have another fan club that isn’t all made up of a bunch of salivating, love-struck girls,” Toph stage whispered before she chortled. She didn’t need her eyesight to know Katara was glaring at her.

Zuko ignored the annoying earthbender as he addressed the elderly couple.

“Could you tell us why the people look like they have some kind of illness?”

“Certainly, Fire Lord Zuko!” the old woman exclaimed before she exchanged a look with her husband. “Our water system was contaminated a few weeks ago when some kind of animal fell in the reservoir and drowned before rotting in the water.”

“Ew, gross,” Sokka gagged, earning himself a smack to the back of his head by his future bride.
“We didn’t know until the rotting animal was found a few days ago, and by that time, the entire Lower Ring had used the water to drink, to cook, and to bathe,” the man continued after his wife.

“That’s horrible,” Katara said with a frown. “Is the reservoir still contaminated?” Maybe Aang and she could clean the water.

“Oh, no!” the man exclaimed and shook his head. “It has been cleaned out already. People are sick because we don’t have decent enough food to eat or medicine to take in order to help those who had taken ill.”

“But luckily we’re doing much better,” the woman spoke up with optimism, “Though there are some —mainly children—who are very ill in the local infirmary.”

“Where’s the infirmary?” the waterbender asked. “I would like to see what I can do for them right now.”

When the old couple gave her confused looks, Zuko spoke up.

“Lady Katara is not only a master waterbender, but a great and talented healer as well,” he said with an emotion that sounded so much like pride that it caused Katara to blush bashfully.

Aang glanced at them with narrowed eyes before he shook his head at himself for his reaction.

“Oh, why, that’s astonishing! In that case, just follow this street here, then on the seventh block make a left, pass the marketplace, and then a right and there you will find the small infirmary,” the woman replied as she made motions with her hands. “The children will be very happy to know they will be healed.”

“Who cleaned the reservoir?” Suki asked.

“The Freedom Fighters,” the couple informed. After a while, they gave another series of bows and left.
“Those kids are here again?” Sokka laughed after the elderly couple moved away.

Zuko frowned. Weren’t the Freedom Fighters that rebel group that had once been made up of a bunch of children and teens? The one led by that crazy guy, Jet?

“The Freedom Fighters are here?” Katara repeated. If they were here, then that meant…

“Ah, Sokka, I see that you’re still as stupid as ever. We’re no longer kids,” a smooth masculine voice sounded behind her, interrupting them.

Katara gasped as she turned around to face the owner of the voice.

“Jet!” she exclaimed in surprise.

Zuko tensed as he spotted the young man standing in front of Katara with a grin on his tanned face and a gleam in his dark eyes. Zuko instinctively grasped the hilt of his dual swords strapped to his right hip, but he remembered that his friends knew Jet and his motley crew after watching the horrible play at Ember Island. Did they know he was dangerous?

After the incident with Long Feng and the Dai Li under the Catacombs of Ba Sing Se, Katara had thought that Jet had been mercifully shot and died. She had mourned his death for he was so young and he had repented on his wrong ways, but she had moved on since she had the war hovering over her head as well as the responsibility of helping Aang become a full-fledged Avatar.

Low and behold her surprise when Jet appeared out of nowhere in one of the southern Earth Kingdom villages she had gone to help alongside Aang and Toph about two years ago. He had told them that he had insisted his friends put him out of his misery and kill him, but Smellerbee had vehemently refused and took him to a good healer she had heard about. He had been bedridden with excruciating pain for months after Smellerbee and Longshot managed to pull him out of the catacombs, and it was almost a year before he could start walking again.

“Nice to see ya again, Katara,” Jet greeted with a smooth smile, ignoring the rest of the group she was with. “You have grown even lovelier these past two years.”

Katara gave him a smile as a small blush reached her cheeks. Aang just rolled his eyes since he knew how Jet was with the ladies, but Zuko gritted his teeth and tightened his hold on one of his swords.
The Freedom Fighter leader had grown taller, but he still had his lean build, dressed in dark pants and a dark-green shirt beneath chest armor. His messy, dark-brown hair was a bit longer than it now fell to above his eyebrows and shoulders, and he had his usual cocky smirk on his handsome face, a wheat stalk between his lips. Behind him was Longshot who looked the same except for a small beard on his chin and Smellerbee who had longer hair that fell above her shoulders. A small group of unfamiliar people, possibly more Freedom Fighters, was standing behind them with curious expressions.

“What are you doing here?” Sokka asked in an annoyed tone, eyeing the rogue young man suspiciously.

Jet glanced at him briefly before he returned his intense stare to Katara who seemed unaffected by his appraisal.

“We were just around the area when we heard that the water was contaminated, so we decided to help,” he responded smoothly.

“That was nice of you,” Katara complimented and smiled.

Zuko narrowed his eyes as he felt a strange pinch in his chest.

Jet smiled at her. “It was because of you that I want to help others.”

Before they knew it, Jet had stepped forward and wrapped his arms around Katara’s waist and pulled her into a hug. Zuko growled lowly and started to unsheathe his swords while Sokka pulled out his boomerang, but it was Aang who beat them to it as he flew towards Katara and Jet.

Katara tensed before she began to struggle in Jet’s hold. She sighed in relief when Aang pulled Jet away from her.

“Don’t touch her, Jet,” Aang warned as he frowned at him, hoping the Freedom Fighters’ leader would understand.

Jet laughed and shrugged smoothly.
“Hello, Aang. Nice to know you’ve reached puberty,” he teased with a friendly smile.

“Don’t talk to him like that, you jerk,” Toph growled out, cracking her knuckles, since she did not know this Jet guy as well as the others.

_No one but me can talk to Twinkletoes that way!_ Toph barked in her head. She frowned at the thought before she shrugged it away.

“He was just teasing, Toph,” Aang reassured her, returning the smile at the young man.

Jet did not even spare the short girl a glance as he looked away from Aang to stare at Katara, giving her a charming smile.

“Did you miss me, Katara?” he asked her with a smug grin.

“Uh…” Katara backed a step when Jet reached for her hand to kiss it, but a strong hand gripping his shoulder almost painfully stopped him.

“I do believe Aang said not to lay a hand on her,” Zuko spoke with an authoritative voice, barely suppressing the urge to smash his fist into the other man’s face.

He did not like the heated looks Jet threw at Katara. Aang may not have noticed since Jet was his friend, but Zuko did, and he hated it.

Jet turned his head to glare at whoever dared to stop him before he roughly shrugged off Zuko’s hand as if he had actually been burned.

“You!” Jet hissed and jumped away from him.

“Jet! Calm down!” Smellerbee tried to tell him, but her leader ignored her advice.
“What the fuck are you doing here?” Jet growled, drawing his dual hook swords.

Zuko looked at him impassively, though he was seething inside.

“I do not have to answer to the likes of you,” he replied in a bored tone.

“You bastard!” Jet yelled angrily. “Answer me!”

Zuko narrowed his eyes dangerously.

“You are no one to order me around, much less tell me what to do,” he growled out.

The young Fire Lord started to unsheathe his broadswords, but a small hand stopped him. Zuko glanced down at Katara, who was giving him a pleading look, and he slightly relaxed his stance, though he did not remove his hand from the hilts of his swords and resumed glaring at Jet.

“Zuko, what the hell is going on?” Sokka asked. “You know who Jet is?” Even though his sister and Aang liked Jet after he showed he had changed, Sokka still hated his arrogant guts.

The firebender nodded without taking his eyes away from Jet.

“Unfortunately, yes,” he responded coolly.

Before they could ask him how he knew the Freedom Fighter, he continued.

“Uncle and I met Jet and his group when we boarded the ferry that brought us to Ba Sing Se after we became fugitives. He even asked me to join his merry little band,” he said humorlessly.

“That was before I knew what kind of scum you were!” Jet shouted. “I tried to warn everybody, but nobody believed me! It was his fault I was arrested by the Dai Li, was brainwashed, and was almost killed!”
“What?” the gang gasped and turned around to stare at Zuko.

“I did not get him arrested,” Zuko replied truthfully and frowned. “It was his own fault the Dai Li took him away. I was minding my own business, helping Uncle in the teashop when he draws his swords at me. Who in their right mind attacks a person in a teashop with innocent people around? And I was not about to let him kill me and get my uncle in trouble after all he had gone through so we could have a new start.”

“You attacked him?” Katara asked as she glared at Jet.

“They were firebenders!” Jet argued. “I just wanted to warn the people that they were being fooled by them!”

“It doesn’t matter anymore,” Aang piped in as he again began his usual task of settling arguments. He did not want to see his two friends fight.

“Of course it matters!” Jet yelled as he glared at Zuko. “I was right to mistrust him! Have you forgotten that it was because of him that Ba Sing Se was taken over, or better yet, that it was because of him that Aang was almost killed?”

Zuko flinched at the memory of his horrible mistake.

“What he did was inexcusable, but Zuko has changed for the better,” Katara said, defending him.

“How can you say that?” Jet exclaimed. “Why are you all with him? He’s a firebender!”

“I thought you changed your views,” Sokka said sarcastically.

“I changed my ways of dealing with the Fire Nation, but I have not stopped hating that damn country,” Jet gritted out. “I will never forget it was the Fire Nation that took everything from me! And this guy,” he growled as he pointed at Zuko with one of his hook swords, “is the spawn of those bastards. He’s the Fire Lord!”

“No duh,” Toph muttered sardonically.
“Zuko is the Fire Lord, but he’s different than the previous ones!” Katara exclaimed, as she placed her hand on Zuko’s arm. “He went against his own nation, his own father, and joined Aang for the good of the world. He has done much to help everyone, even when he was just shown hatred and hostility.”

“That’s right!” Sokka yelled in agreement.

Jet scoffed before he spat at the ground before Zuko’s feet.

“He could be the greatest saint in history, but that won’t change the fact that his country made a lot of people suffer,” he gritted out.

The gang opened their mouths to argue, but Zuko held up a hand to stop them.

“I understand how he feels and I don’t blame him,” he said coolly.

He looked at his friends as they all stared at him incredulously.

“It’s hard to forgive those who have caused so much pain and grief,” he continued. “And it’s almost impossible to get rid of the hatred, especially if that hate was fostered for years. I just hope that one day you would see that I have changed and am different,” he said as he looked at Jet.

“I guess we’ll see,” Jet said as he replaced his swords.

Both young men glared at each other a moment longer before a smirk appeared on Jet’s face.

“We have some things to take care of. It was nice bumping into you guys,” he said, looking at Aang and Sokka.

“And I hope to see you again,” he added, looking straight at Katara. He smirked when Zuko discreetly moved closer to the pretty waterbender with a clenched jaw.
With a nod at his group, Jet retreated into an alley with Smellerbee, Longshot, and the rest trailing after him.

“Spirits, he’s annoying,” Sokka groused as he pulled Suki to his side.

Zuko did not respond as he continued to glare at Jet’s back. He knew what kind of thoughts Jet had in mind as he looked at Katara. It made his blood boil in anger.

If he tries to so much as touch a hair on Katara's head, I swear I will kill him, he vowed as he clenched and unclenched his hands.

“Yes, let’s go!”

The Blue Spirit kept watch on top the roof of one of the old houses, hidden under the shadows of the night. There was a tiny crescent of a moon high above the sky and a few wispy clouds occasionally hid it away from the world. The vigilante raced swiftly along the roof and lunged himself at another house, landing as silently as a puma-cat on the roof tiles.

Zuko peered into the dark, empty street below behind the mask of his alter ego. Except for possibly his uncle, nobody knew of his night escapades into the Lower Ring, and except for Iroh and Aang, nobody knew the real identity of the Blue Spirit. He wanted to keep his identity concealed in fear of the Fire Nation Court Council’s reaction to knowing that their Fire Lord was the once wanted thief and criminal, the Blue Spirit.
Jumping down from the roof, Zuko landed in a crouch on the ground below, listening carefully for any sounds. He heard that ever since the Dai Li disappeared, peace and order had disappeared along with them. Thieves and other vile men had decided to cause turmoil as night settled in since there were few who could stop them. The Earth King had sent a few guards to keep watch and control, but they were not enough.

Zuko scarcely had time to hide behind a crate as a few drunken men burst out of a building. The Blue Spirit waited until the blundering men were out of sight, shoving each other and laughing boisterously all along their intoxicated merry way. Releasing a breath and berating himself angrily for not being careful, Zuko stood up and raced across the street, entering another dark alley.

That was the third time he had almost revealed his presence this night because his mind kept wandering off more times than he actually liked. And it all started after his unfortunate encounter with the leader of the Freedom Fighters. It had been a few days since the gang had seen Jet for the third time, and ever since then, Zuko had been unable to concentrate or relax.

His mind kept replaying the moment Jet had taken Katara into his arms when they first ran into him and he could not forget the lustful looks Jet kept throwing at her every time they came across the Freedom Fighters. Zuko had to forcefully calm himself down from slicing the man’s head off and burning him to a crisp. Which surprised him for he had never felt the urge to do such things ever before in his life, not even when Ruon-Jian had been flirting with Mai.

Zuko peered around the end of the passage before he dashed forward into the next empty alleyway, the moon making his blue and white mask and the hilts of his swords glint. A few rat-weasels scurried away as he ran, but he hardly noticed them.

But the thing that worried him the most was the thought that Katara would fall for Jet if he tried to make a move. During the play by the Ember Island Players, he remembered the scene where the plump Katara actress had been smitten with the crazy-haired Jet actor. Zuko was not sure how much of it had been true and he had never dared ask Katara, since at the time they were not sure if Jet was dead or not.

He also remembered how Toph hinted at a possible attraction when they had returned to the Royal Beach House, and thinking about the possibility of Katara having feelings for Jet was not improving his already sour mood.

But maybe he was making a big deal over nothing. Katara didn’t react like a girl with a crush when Jet had embraced her and she didn’t even notice or respond to the meaningful, hopeful looks he gave her. Yes, maybe he was just overreacting, though he wondered why he cared so much since it was none of his business.

Then again, Katara was his friend and he vowed to protect her and never let any harm befall her. Either way he would just have to keep an eye on her until they left Ba Sing Se and Jet behind.

Another thing that had him worried was that Katara seemed to be more tired recently. She had small, dark circles under her eyes and she yawned quite frequently. But when they asked her if something was wrong, she had just reassured them that it was probably her work at the infirmary. The gang had gone along with her these past few days to visit the sick from the Lower Ring and watched as she went about the patients, using her healing abilities to cure the illness the polluted water had caused them.

The Blue Spirit stopped to rest behind a large barrel. The night was quiet and the streets were empty. Besides the drunken men, he had not seen any signs of trouble. Maybe he should head back to the palace and return in a few nights from now.

Aang had tried to persuade Katara to stop and rest for a few days since it was taking a toll on her, but she had refused such an idea vehemently. Zuko was positive there was something else involved, though he couldn’t quite put a finger on what it was. But he knew it was nothing too serious or Katara would have told him since they have started to confide in each other more and more as the days went by.

Katara wouldn’t keep something from me, would she? he asked himself with a deep frown.

Just like you’re keeping your Blue Spirit secret from her? a voice in his head piped in.

Hm. Zuko frowned at the thought before he dismissed it with a scowl. He didn’t need to tell her everything. She was his friend not his wife—though that thought did not seem as unpleasant as it should have.

He sighed, remembering the words he had told her the night when he had demanded she tell him why she was avoiding him. He still could not believe he had confessed his fear of losing her. He was not used to displays of emotions and sharing such feelings, and had he not known Katara would understand, he would have been so embarrassed and angry at his sudden vulnerability.

Though he realized that perhaps Katara had felt the same way he did when he had avoided her on his flagship those weeks at sea, and so he vowed never to hurt her again by evading her. Luckily, it wasn’t too difficult since he had not had any erotic dreams of the waterbender recently, though a part of him did wish he still did…

Stop it, he told his imaginative brain as he tried to shove the images of Katara in his dreams away. Again, he berated himself for losing focus and frowned as his mind kept returning to thoughts about Katara.

What’s wrong with me? What’s going on?.

Again, he wondered at the possibility that perhaps he was falling for Katara. But could it be possible? Was love what he felt for her? Could he really love someone?

Shoving the confusing questions from his head, he decided to head to the palace, get some rest, and perhaps try to figure out what he really felt. Zuko was about to move away from his current hiding place, but quickly drew back into the shadows.

A lone, hooded figure emerged around the corner of the alleyway with careful steps, occasionally looking behind it, as if to see if there were any pursuers. Zuko watched as the mysterious person looked about almost uncertainly before continuing walking into the dark alley. The stranger silently passed by the barrel Zuko was hiding before disappearing into the street.

Unsure of what the person’s intentions were, Zuko decided to find out where the stranger was heading to and for what purpose. The Blue Spirit waited a few seconds before emerging from behind the barrel to follow behind the cloaked individual. He jumped onto a stack of old, wooden crates and landed on the roof of a house, quickly and silently pursuing the dark figure as he jumped from rooftop to rooftop without making a single sound.

The Blue Spirit observed the being below from his view on the roof as he was lead through streets and alleys, but as much as he tried, he could not figure out who was under the cloak since the person kept the hood down and it was dark. After a few more minutes, Zuko saw the lone figure stop before a building. The cloaked individual looked around for a bit—possibly, to make sure no one was around—before heading to the back and entering through a small door.

Zuko realized the building was the infirmary and he wondered what the hooded person intended to do since there were mostly children in the building. Narrowing his eyes, Zuko dropped from the roof and landed gracefully beside the back door, swords drawn. If the individual believed he could hurt those children, he had another thing coming to him.
The Blue Spirit carefully opened the door a crack and peeked inside, finding the hall empty. Sliding into the corridor with grace and ease, the masked man quietly and carefully walked down the passageway since the only light provided was from the moon’s light that poured from the small windows. Cautiously rounding the corner, Zuko just had time to catch a glimpse of the bottom tip of the being’s long, dark cloak as it disappeared into the next hall.

Swiftly and noiselessly, the Blue Spirit raced down the passageway before peering around the corner. Zuko watched as the mysterious individual opened a door before gracefully entering, leaving the door slightly ajar. Setting his jaw and gripping his broadswords firmly, the Blue Spirit silently strode toward the entrance and carefully peeked through the small crack of the wooden door.

At first, he did not see anything, but then the stranger stepped into his line of view. Zuko carefully opened the door a few more inches in order to see into the room better.

There were two rows of thin futons on either side of the walls and children laid on them, the room cold and dark. Zuko saw a few of the sick children lift their heads as the stranger walked towards them and he placed an arm on the door in order to burst into the room and protect the innocent children, but to his surprise they began to whisper and giggle. Confused, Zuko squinted behind his Blue Spirit mask and frowned as he saw that the children were smiling.

The mysterious person walked to one futon where the child seemed to be too sick to even lift his head. Zuko watched as the figure kneeled down beside the child and gently stroked the sick boy’s hair before reaching inside the dark cloak. A long stream of water followed the stranger’s hand movement and engulfed both of the person’s hands before the water began to glow in a soft blue light. Then the mysterious being placed both hands on the child’s small chest.

Zuko’s eyes widen in disbelief as the mysterious individual’s hood fell back and a lovely feminine face appeared. It couldn’t be? Katara? She was the one sneaking around in the middle of the night?

Well, that explains why she looks so tired lately, he thought.

He smiled and shook his head as he silently replaced his swords in their scabbards on his back.

Helping the sick during the day was not enough, and so she must have decided to come back during the night. Yeah, that’s just like Katara alright, he mentally chuckled before he shook his head with a sigh. Always thinking of others before herself.
He watched her quietly as she moved from child to child, healing them with her water and comforting them with her soothing whispers before he frowned. Why didn’t she tell them she was visiting the sick during the middle of the night? Didn’t she know it was dangerous to wander around alone in the dark, especially for a young woman? He knew she could defend herself, but still…

Zuko remembered the disgusting intentions the two vile men at the Abandoned Fort had towards Katara and he was not stupid to believe Katara would not come across the same type of bastards while she roamed alone in the dark in the Lower Ring. Zuko narrowed his eyes before he let out an inaudible sigh in order to calm down his temper.

Well, it seems like the Blue Spirit will just have to turn into a guardian as well, he thought with a small sigh, although he did not mind at all.

A few hours later, Zuko again was following the hooded figure through the dark streets of the Lower Ring, but this time he was making sure Katara made it to the palace safely. He ducked behind a wall when Katara turned in his direction and waited until she started walking again.

Frowning, Katara looked over her shoulder for the second time, but again found nothing. She could not shake the feeling that someone was following and watching her. Moving her hand to her waterskin at her hip, she continued to walk quietly and swiftly through the streets.

Smiling to herself, Katara remembered the grateful and adoring looks the little children had given her as she soothed their pain away. If she kept healing them during the day and then the night, soon there would be no more suffering patients.

Again, she looked over her shoulder before pulling the hood closer to her face. She wished she could have somebody there with her so they could keep her company and ward off the creepy feeling of walking completely alone in the middle of the night, but she knew if Sokka and Aang found out they would try to stop her. Maybe she should have asked Toph, but then the earthbender would complain that she was losing precious sleeping time.

Perhaps she should have asked Zuko. He would understand.

Katara blushed and smiled at the thought. Well, he did help her find Yon Rha and she was sure if she asked him to accompany her he would agree, but Zuko was already too busy with other things and he did not need sleepless nights to burden him even more. She thought back on what they had talked about the night they had come back from visiting Iroh’s teashop.
Katara vowed never to let her emotions get the best of her, so that they would not cause Zuko any more pain. He had endured enough hurt to last him a lifetime and more. She was still a bit confused that Zuko seemed to enjoy spending his time with her just as much as he did with his mother and Uncle Iroh, though she did not mind at all. Still, she had to wonder if he really enjoyed her company as much as she enjoyed his.

She was also bewildered about her strange reactions with their encounter with Song and Jin, but she dismissed it, thinking that perhaps she was just trying to protect her friend from gold-seeking, social climbing, women. But then she had to admit that neither Jin nor Song looked like that type of woman, which only served to confuse her even more.

Luckily, she had not been visited by any other dreams about a very amorous Zuko, because ever since the first one, her mind had become quite a mess and she still would heat up every time Zuko talked, sat, or even looked at her. However, she did not let that get to her because she was positive that such feelings would go away with time and she would feel normal around Zuko once again. At least, that was what part of her hoped. She was sure that Zuko would never look at her as more than just a friend. She frowned when that thought brought a pain to her chest.

She was brought out of her thoughts when a small noise from behind her reached her ears and she spun around only to see a shadow retreat into an alley. Narrowing her eyes, Katara uncorked her waterskin and summoned a small water tendril, which she coiled around her arm as her heart began to pound in alarm. Pretending that she saw nothing, Katara strolled along the street before rounding a corner.

Zuko mentally cursed as he glared at the box he had accidently stepped on before peeking from the dark alleyway. He barely had enough time to catch a glimpse of Katara’s cloak swirling behind her as she rounded a corner before he moved away from the shadows in order to keep following the waterbender.

The Blue Spirit barely had enough time to flip backwards as a sharp water whip came at him just as he was about to turn the corner. Zuko landed in a crouch before jumping away once again as the water whip came at him, slicing at a pile of barrels that were stacked behind him. Pieces of wood flew everywhere at the impact.

Katara cursed as the dark figure avoided her attack before he landed a few feet away from her. She spread her arms and exhaled a cool breath as the water whip changed into dozens of sharp ice discs, ready to attack. To her surprise, the man raised his hands in a pacifying way without making any other movements.

Frowning, Katara squinted in the dark since the moon hardly gave off any light. She noticed the man was wearing a black suit with black boots, two swords strapped at his back. Her eyes widened when, instead of a face, she encountered a white and blue mask, resembling some kind of demon with sharp fangs.

“The Blue Spirit,” she whispered. She recognized him by the wanted posters she had seen during the war.

The man nodded and slowly lowered his hands back to his sides. Katara shifted and reshaped her ice discs back into a stream of water that coiled around her shoulders.

“You’re the one who saved Aang when he was captured by Zhao,” she said with a small smile.

Zuko inwardly cringed, but answered with a silent nod. What would Katara say if she found out that he was the Blue Spirit and the real reason he had helped Aang escape was because he wanted to capture the Avatar for himself?

“What are you doing here? I’ve heard rumors that you were in the Fire Nation,” he heard Katara ask curiously. “And why were you following me?”

He raised his masked head toward her and shrugged. Katara tilted her head to the side and frowned. She watched as the Blue Spirit tensed, but made no move to attack or run away. She did not know how to explain it, but she felt like she knew him, though she wondered why since she had never met him in person before. She also had a feeling that he would not harm her.

“Are you trying to hurt me?” she asked carefully, just to make sure.

She watched as the Blue Spirit shook his head before he pointed in the direction of the Upper Ring.

“What?” asked she as she quickly looked in the direction he was indicating, “You want to know if I come from the Upper Ring?”

The Blue Spirit again shook his head in the negative, placing a finger to his temple as if trying to think. When the young woman frowned at him in confusion, the masked man pointed at himself then at her and finally toward the Upper Ring.
“Uh…” Katara furrowed her eyebrows before she pointed at the same place he had. “You… want to escort me there?” she asked, though it was more of an outrageous guess.

To her surprise, the Blue Spirit nodded.

“Why?” she inquired suspiciously.

Zuko sighed inwardly and resisted the urge to run his hand over his head at her questions. Though it was understandable than she was cautious of a complete stranger and had every right to question his motives since she did not know who the Blue Spirit was. Had he not been the Blue Spirit himself, he would have been glad to know that she was being cautious. But he couldn’t just leave; he did not want to let her wander all by herself in the middle of the night when men with bad intentions were lurking around waiting for unsuspecting, pretty girls.

Zuko gritted his teeth at the thought before he realized that Katara was staring at him strangely. Clearing his throat lightly, he slowly made his way to her and again raised his hands pacifically when Katara reached for her waterskin.

Katara eyed the mysterious man warily as he came near her, but she blinked when he walked right past her. She watched in surprise as he continued to walk away before he turned his head and beckoned her with his right arm to follow before he resumed his silent stride down the empty street, not even bothering to wait for her.

Katara huffed softly, but she ran quickly in order to catch up to him as she vaguely wondered why she was following a complete stranger who could probably be leading her somewhere else more dangerous. He was the Blue Spirit who was still a wanted criminal, but if he risked his life to save Aang, then it must mean he was not that bad of a person. But what was he doing in Ba Sing Se?

She heard the rumors when they were in the Fire Nation. Jiao had told her that the Blue Spirit would sometimes appear, but instead of causing trouble, he was the one who stopped problems from arising. She wondered what Zuko thought about a masked vigilante running around in his city.

Katara mentally slapped herself. There she went again, thinking about Zuko once more. It seemed like it was the only thing her brain wanted to think about nowadays!

Deciding to distract herself with other things, Katara looked up at the Blue Spirit walking in front of her. He seemed to be checking for any suspicious lurkers while he occasionally looked back at her from behind the blue and white mask. She tried to start a conversation with him, but he never uttered a single word. Instead he answered with a nod, a shake of his head, or a shrug. She supposed that he wanted to keep his identity a secret by hiding his voice, and again she wondered who the man behind the demon mask was. He had his back to her now and she could see his dual broadswords strapped there.

That’s weird. Those look oddly familiar, she thought with a frown.

She moved her eyes from the weapons and looked across his broad back, his upper arms, and then to his legs. Mesmerized, she could see the hard muscles flex from under the fitted black tunic and pants every time he took a step or moved his arms.

Katara blushed.

What’s wrong with you? she scolded herself. You barely know this guy and you’re ogling him?

But it was normal to mentally appreciate a person’s physical attributes, right?

Zuko glanced back over his shoulder to make sure Katara was okay and lifted an unseen eyebrow as he noticed the red tint on the woman’s cheeks.

Before long, Katara found herself safely at the entrance to the Upper Ring of Ba Sing Se. She turned around to face the Blue Spirit and bowed.

“Thank you for accompanying me, even though you don’t know me at all,” she said with a smile.

Of course, I know you. That’s why I escorted you here, Zuko voiced in his head, but answered instead with a small nod of his masked head.

“Are you going back to the Lower Ring?” she asked softly.

She watched as he hesitantly nodded before he turned around and walked away without another glance. She stood there silently until he disappeared into the shadows.
“Uh…okay…” she said, wondering what that was about. She also wondered if she would see him again.

Shaking her head, Katara entered the Upper Ring and headed towards the palace to get some much needed rest since there were still many sick children who needed her help the following day.

What she did not realize was that the Blue Spirit followed her until she was safely inside the palace and in her room before he slipped inside his own guest room to sleep.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Katara yawned softly as she silently made her way to the infirmary. Keeping awake late at night was making her so tired and she felt so guilty for lying to her friends, but she knew that if she told them they would try to stop her, especially Aang and Sokka.

She sighed before a smile lit up her face. Four nights had passed since she had attacked the Blue Spirit, and since that fateful night, she had met the mysterious individual each night after. He now always met her outside the infirmary, and once she was finished, he accompanied her back to the gates leading into the Upper Ring without saying a single word.

She blushed as she remembered the strange dream she had the previous night where she was walking down a creepy, dark alleyway and every shadow made her jump. Suddenly, a group of dark figures emerged out of nowhere and began to chase her. When she could not ward them off with her waterbending, and right when she thought she was going to be caught, the Blue Spirit appeared before her. Without thinking, she had thrown herself at him, somehow knowing that he would protect her. But that was the part that had her confused.

When she looked up at him, she stared in astonishment because instead of the Blue Spirit looking down at her, it was Zuko who held her to him with a soft smile on his face before he lifted his head and glared at her pursuers who immediately withdrew. The dream ended with Zuko touching her cheek and asking if she was all right.

Katara bit her lip as her stomach fluttered with butterflies and her heart did a somersault. She frowned. Why was she dreaming of the Blue Spirit and why did Zuko make an appearance? She remembered the strange looks Zuko was giving her recently, as if he knew something she didn't. When she asked him what was going on, he had just smirked and chuckled and said ‘Why nothing, little night cat-owl.’

What the hell was that supposed to mean? Sighing again, Katara rounded another corner and quickened her pace when the infirmary appeared. She smiled and waved her hand when she spotted her new friend leaning against the wall of the building. She grinned when he greeted her with a nod.

“How’s it going, Blue?” she asked with a friendly smile as she approached him.

Zuko nodded again and smiled behind his mask at the new nickname she had given him the second time they met. Without saying another word, they both walked to the back of the building before noiselessly entering the back door.

Zuko watched silently as Katara went from small patient to small patient, using her healing abilities, as well as her gentle words to calm and ease the sick children. He had followed her for four nights, silently making sure no harm came to her and watching as she tended to her sick patients without thinking of her own comfort. He felt guilty for keeping his identity from her, but he was afraid of how she would react if she knew the truth.

He watched as she stood up after retrieving her water before she lifted her head towards him. Zuko straightened himself and moved his gaze away from her when he realized he had been staring at her since they had entered the room. He heard her quietly walk in his direction until she was standing in front of him and then he turned his head to look at her.

“Thank you for keeping me company, Blue. I know you’re a good person for keeping watch over me and the small children,” Katara said sincerely with a bright smile on her face that made his heart skip a beat and made him wonder if she would continue smiling if she knew who the Blue Spirit really was.

He nodded once more and glanced around the room to make sure the children were safe before he moved toward the door with Katara following behind him. He listened for any noise on the other side of the door before he opened it a crack and peered outside. When he saw it was clear, Zuko opened the door wide, made an extravagant bow, and gestured for the lady to go ahead first. He smirked to himself behind his mask when Katara blushed.

“Why, thank you, Blue. That is so gentlemanly of you,” Katara said as she executed a little curtsy and batted her eyelashes exaggeratedly at him. Then with a soft laugh she passed through the door and into the empty corridor of the infirmary.

Zuko chuckled inwardly at her playful flirtation as he closed the door quietly behind him.
They exited the quiet building and stepped into the cool night air as they made their silent way back to the Upper Ring, a few clouds passed overhead, covering the moon and the stars above. Katara wrapped her dark cloak closer to herself as a cold wind blew by before looking ahead to where ‘Blue’ was walking.

He’s wearing nothing but a thin black suit and he’s walking like he’s at the beach! Katara complained as a small shiver ran down her back. Seriously, what’s the deal? Is Blue a firebender or something?

She pouted for a while before a silly smile painted her tanned face.

If Zuko were here, I could be all warm and toasty as he wraps his strong and warm arms around me, she sighed dreamily. A few seconds later, she realized what she had thought and she frowned at herself.

Zuko turned his head over his shoulder when he heard Katara sigh and noticed that the young woman was blushing again. Before he could ask himself what the cute blush meant, a group of drunken men rounded the corner ahead of them. Zuko quickly spun around and grabbed Katara by the waist, pulling her to him as he hid them behind a pile of empty crates.

Katara opened her mouth to scream, but he quickly placed his gloved hand over her mouth to silence her while he held her still with his other arm. She began to struggle as fear raced through her, but she quieted when he shook his head and gently squeezed her waist, making heat rush to her cheeks.

Her heart beating wildly in her chest, she watched as he slowly moved his hand away from her mouth and placed his index finger on the mask’s lips to indicate that she should be silent before he pointed in the direction they had been walking to. A few seconds later, Katara heard the drunken conversation of several men and her eyes widened at the disgusting things that were coming from their mouths.

Closing her eyes tightly, she pressed herself closer to the Blue Spirit’s hard chest and relaxed when she felt him wrap both his arms around her. A part of her insisted she should not let a stranger embrace her so intimately, but another part of her assured her that he would not hurt her. She was silently grateful he was there, and even though she could have defended herself, she did not want to have come across those disgusting men. She was once again confused when a sense of familiarity hit her as the masked man’s strong arms continued to hold her and the scent of smoky sandalwood reached her senses. She could have sworn she had been held like this before by the same type of arms. She blushed when she realized it reminded her of when Zuko found her at Ursa’s old cabin and the way she had felt instantly safe. And really good.
Zuko closed his eyes in contentment as he felt Katara lean into him as the inebriated men staggered away from where they were hiding. He noticed that she was grabbing the front of his black tunic with both her hands while her forehead touched his chest. He wrapped his arms tighter around her and held her protectively against him. To his surprise, Katara moved her hands away from his chest and circled him around his middle. He realized they were embracing each other, her petite body pressed so closed to his own, and he smiled.

The firebender held back a gasp as his body was suddenly filled with heat, with want. He drew her closer to him and was barely able to hold back a groan when her breasts pressed firmly against his chest. His desire for her came back tenfold, remembering all those erotic dreams he had had, all the moments he had spent with her, and he could not stop himself when his hands began to slowly slide up and down the beautiful woman’s small back.

Katara’s eyes shot open when she felt her back being caressed by warm, gloved hands. Her breath caught in her throat at the sensations his hands were causing to her body, but though her mind told her to run away, her body refused to give up the gentle touches. She was unable to hold back her gasp as his hand came quite close to skimming the side of her right breast.

When Zuko heard her small gasp, the urge to throw Katara to the ground and take her right then and there almost made him crazy with want. He wanted to see what other sounds he could elicit from her. Never before had he been so affected by any woman so easily and as fast as he seemed to be with Katara. Just a small touch from her made him as hard as steel!

“B-Blue?” Katara’s small whisper reached his hazy mind. He looked down to see the waterbender gazing at him with a blush and a confused expression. “What are you doing?”

Zuko stopped his hands from going any further and doing any more damage before he slowly released the young woman and took a step away from her, trying to calm down his boiling blood. And his raging erection. Luckily, it was dark enough for Katara not to notice since the clouds were blocking the moon’s light.

“I’m sorry, Katara,” Zuko apologized before he could stop himself. He closed his eyes and mentally cursed at his slip up.

“I-it’s okay. Thanks, by the way for—” Katara stopped talking as she realized the Blue Spirit had spoken before she gaped once she recognized his voice. “Z-Zuko! You’re…you’re the Blue Spirit?”

Zuko sighed and prepared himself for the worst. He reached behind his head and tugged at the ties before he slowly pulled off the Blue Spirit mask. Katara watched with wide eyes as the mask came off and Zuko’s slightly guilty face appeared before he raised his golden eyes to look at her. They stared at each other in silence for a while as Katara tried to get over her shocking discovery. How could she have not realized before? It explained why she felt as comfortable around the Blue Spirit, as she did with Zuko.

“W-why didn’t you tell me?” she asked quietly, sadly. “Did you not trust me with your secret?”

Zuko’s eyes widened at her words. That was not what he had expected. He had imagined that she would have yelled at him angrily for deceiving her, but he did not expect her to feel like she was unworthy of his confidence.

“No! It’s not that,” Zuko tried to explained as he gently took her hand.

“Then why didn’t you tell me when we met four nights ago?” she asked.

“I didn’t know how you would react if you knew that the Blue Spirit you thought highly of was me,” he admitted. He sighed as he ran a hand through his short hair. “That the reason I rescued Aang from Zhao was not out of a sense of justice, but because back then I wanted to capture the Avatar for my father.”

Katara let out a sigh as she gently shook her head in disbelief.

“I think I understand your reasons for hiding your identity from me, and I know Aang forgave you, but how many times do I have to keep reminding you that that was in the past and now we’re in the present? Seriously, sometimes I wonder if you and Sokka are the ones who are related,” she said sarcastically.

Zuko chuckled lightly.

“So you’re not angry with me?” he asked.

“No, just annoyed,” she admitted with a smile. “But now I understand all those smirks and looks you’ve been giving me recently. Why didn’t you tell Sokka or Aang that I was sneaking out of the palace?”
“Because I knew that they would try to stop you, and even though I don’t like that you’re working too hard, I understand that all you want to do is help those who are unfortunate. Just like when you helped Jan Hui disguised as the Painted Lady,” Zuko said with a smile.

“You know about that?” Katara asked. She was grateful that he understood.

“Yeah, Toph told me, and I have to say that I wished I could’ve been there to see you.” Zuko smiled, causing Katara to blush. “And who am I to stop you? Besides, I kept a close eye on you to make sure you arrived at the infirmary and back to the palace safely.”

“Thank you, Zuko.” Katara smiled gratefully as she placed her other small hand over Zuko’s larger one. “Jeez, it seems like all I’ve been doing lately is thanking you, huh?”

Zuko smirked.

“I don’t mind the praise,” he joked lightly.

Katara laughed before she blushed as a yawn escaped her lips, causing Zuko to smile warmly.

“Come on, you need your rest. Let’s go back to the palace before you fall asleep standing.” Without a second thought, Zuko tugged at her hand and led her back to the Upper Ring, their hands clasped together all the way.

After biding Katara good night and making sure she had entered her room, Zuko laid wide-awake on the soft bed in his guest room as he replayed what had occurred a few hours ago. He was glad Katara took his being the Blue Spirit well, but that was the least of his worries. Laying with the blankets thrown off his body, Zuko was trying—unsuccessfully—to stop himself from groaning out loud as he remembered Katara’s soft body pressed so close to his and the heated thoughts that had raced through his head as well as that burning feeling in his heart growing even hotter.

Drinking tea under the shade of a large tree in one of the palace gardens one afternoon, Iroh and Ursa watched with pleasure as the young Fire Lord and the waterbending woman leaned over the many parchments that lay on a small table concerning the new compromise. Momo was once again curled up on the firebender’s lap.

“So was Mai able to convince you that she would be perfect for Zuko?” Iroh asked nonchalantly as he moved a tile from their game of Pai Sho.

Ursa moved her piece before she answered.

“I am afraid that Mai has only been able to convinced me that she is not perfect for my son.”

She watched as her dear old friend moved his tile before she continued when he looked up at her expectantly.

“I am sure she would be a good candidate for Fire Lady,” she began, “Mai is calm, collected, refined, and cunning. There is no doubt that she could help run the Fire Nation.

“But that is the thing. She could do it, but it seems like she will not do it,” she continued as she placed her tile and took a sip from her green tea. “She gets bored too easily, almost to the point that she seems lethargic. She views the world in a dark light, so much so that she sees no point in helping to make it better,” she explained. “Though, Zuko seems to be too preoccupied with something else to notice.”

They looked at the young benders again before they shared a look, which said that they knew what, or better said who, was on Zuko’s mind.

Ursa sighed as Iroh made his move.

“I do not mean to belittle Mai, but it is just that she is not suitable to be with my son. Her dull and depressed character seems to transmit onto Zuko whenever she is around him. He rarely smiles and his eyes dim as if a light was snuffed out.”

Iroh nodded again as he took a sip from his ginseng tea.

“Yes, I had noticed that a very long time ago,” he said.

Ursa looked over at her beloved son as he stared at the waterbender’s lovely face—who was currently reading from a scroll—with such an intense emotion that it made her wonder if Katara could feel it.
“On the other hand, Katara is completely different,” the noblewoman continued. “She is not afraid to challenge Zuko, but she still maintains a sense of respect toward him. She is not materialistic at all, and whatever she is given, she accepts with the utmost gratitude. Though she is stubborn and has a temper to match Zuko’s, which may cause some conflicts, she is not the kind of person to hold a grudge for too long.”

Ursa had learned from her former brother-in-law all about the mistake Zuko said he had made in Ba Sing Se four years ago. Now she understood when Katara had said he betrayed her and so mistrusted him at first when he had joined the Avatar. And even though Zuko had done much to deserve her distrust, Katara forgave him and gave him something he needed…her friendship. And hopefully much more.

Iroh chuckled softly as he moved his gaze from the Pai Sho board to the two young benders who seemed to be arguing. Zuko had his arms crossed over his chest and was shaking his head while Katara had one hand on her hip while she used her other hand to point fiercely at him.

“You are right about the stubbornness and the temper part, my dear Ursa,” Iroh commented and smiled as he moved another tile.

Ursa laughed softly.

“But the thing I like the most about our young waterbending friend is that she makes Zuko smile,” she continued, “Whenever she is near he seems to perk up and his eyes seem to shine with a brilliant light, and when Zuko is near her, Katara smiles even more brightly than she does with anybody else. Zuko seems to trust her greatly, for he confides his thoughts to her, something that he won’t do with anyone else. Especially not with Mai.”

Both smiled as they gazed at the young benders, sitting under the warm sun. Zuko seemed to have relented in whatever Katara had been arguing about because he was frowning slightly while she beamed at him with those big, blue eyes of hers.

“I am positive that Katara makes Zuko happy. And I will swear to Agni that she will continue to make my son happy if they ever do end up together,” Ursa said and smiled.

Iroh grinned widely before a sound he had not heard in years reached his ears. Did he hear correctly or were his ears playing tricks on him? There! He heard it once more! That sound which he had feared he would never hear again was coming from the direction of the young benders. Zuko, his
The retired general shifted his aged golden eyes to Zuko who was sitting beside Katara. He watched as Katara said something with a huge smile on her face, which caused Zuko to tilt his head back as he let out a deep laugh. Not a humorless or even a cruel laugh…but a happy and amused laugh.

The Dragon of the West felt joyful tears pool at the corner of his eyes at the sight and he sniffled.

“Iroh dear, what is the matter?” Ursa asked with concern as she placed a hand on his arm.

“Zuko is…laughing.” Iroh’s voice shook with emotion and he wiped at his eyes.

“Of course he is laughing. You should have seen the way those two teased each other when the three of us left my old cabin in the Abandoned Fort.” Ursa frowned. “Why does it surprise you?”

Iroh continued to watch his nephew as he said something to make Katara playfully slap him on his arm with a mocking scowl on her face that only caused Zuko to laugh harder. Momo had moved from the firebender’s lap to perch on the female’s shoulder.

“Because, my dear Ursa, I was afraid Zuko would never be able to express such an emotion ever again,” Iroh responded softly.

When the noblewoman looked at him worriedly he continued.

“So, after the Agni Kai with his father and the announcement of his banishment, Zuko became cold, angry, hard, and distant towards the world around him. The only emotion he let himself express was anger. I tried everything to soften his view of his situation, but alas, nothing worked. Nothing made him relaxed or happy. Nothing made him smile, and especially, nothing made him laugh.”

Ursa wiped the tears that had fallen from her eyes.

“Oh, my poor son,” she said sadly, “He has suffered more than I thought and more than he let me believe. What kind of mother am I?”
Iroh patted her hand reassuringly.

“There, there Ursa. It was not your fault, but the man I have the misfortune of calling brother. Just remember what Zuko has told us, all that was in the past. And now look at him…laughing.”

Ursa nodded and smiled.

“And we have to thank Katara for that. That is just another reason why she is the perfect woman for Zuko.”

“I agree wholeheartedly,” Iroh said and he grinned as he stroked his small beard. “Now if they only stopped being so stubborn and admitted their feelings, we could start planning their grand wedding!”

Ursa laughed as they resumed their game.

“Did I mention they make such a lovely couple? Imagine the beautiful grandchildren and grandnephews and nieces they would give us,” she said dreamily before they broke into giggles and laughter like a pair of teenage girls.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Katara sighed sadly as she made her lonely way back to the palace. A week had passed since she found out Zuko was the Blue Spirit and she still wondered how she did not realize it sooner. She remembered the dream she had and wondered if her subconscious somehow realized that the Blue Spirit was Zuko. He still kept close to her as she made her way to the infirmary in the Lower Ring and to the palace, always making sure she was safe, but on this night, he did not make an appearance.

He had not been waiting for her near the building as he always did and she had waited an hour to see if he showed up, but he didn’t and now here she was walking back all by herself after healing the last of the sick children. She wondered if he was all right since he had whispered to her after they all had finished their dinner that he would be waiting for her as usual before Aang interrupted them and led her away.

Katara frowned. She had noticed that Aang had been acting strangely lately, more irritated and clingy. He would not leave her out of his sight, and every time Zuko and she would spend time together, Aang would appear out of nowhere and settle himself beside her, taking her hand almost possessively, until Zuko left almost reluctantly. She could have sworn Aang was sending him death glared. She did not know what had gotten into him, but his behavior was really getting on her nerves.

Again, her thoughts turned towards the firebender as she continued on her silent walk. She had also noticed that something had changed in Zuko ever since he confronted her about her behavior and they had embraced each other the other night. Katara raised a hand to cool down the heat that rushed to her cheeks as her feet stepped silently down the empty street. It was subtle, but she could sense it in the way he spoke to or looked at her. She did not understand what it was, but the way he acted made her heart race and her stomach twist, though not in an unpleasant way.

Shaking her head, Katara once again became concerned as she wondered what had detained Zuko from meeting her at the infirmary. She hoped it was nothing serious and that he was all right.

Katara slowed her steps as she realized someone was following her. When she stopped the sound of footsteps ceased as well. She continued walking casually and the footsteps followed. Her heart pounded in excitement and she smiled.

So Zuko thinks he can fool me, huh? Well, he’s sorely mistaken. Either I have gotten more observant or he’s beginning to falter in his skills, she thought with a mental smirk as she quickened her pace a bit.

When she was almost reaching the entrance to the Middle Ring of Ba Sing Se, Katara huffed irritably when Zuko continued to play his game and did not already show himself. Did he think she was stupid or what? Not being able to take his silence any longer, Katara spun around and placed her hand on her hips.

“Okay, you can stop that now and come out,” she called out as she waited for him to reveal himself. When he remained elusive, Katara huffed again. “Fine! Be that way.” She turned around and began to stomp away.

“Katara? Is that you?” a familiar, but unexpected masculine voice asked.

Katara froze in her tracks.

“Jet?” she asked curiously as she once again turned around.

She squinted at the dark alley she had passed, and sure enough, the Freedom Fighter emerged from the shadows with a smirk on his face.

Just great, she sighed mentally. This was probably the fifth time they had run into each other—though never at night—and she was not in the mood to talk to him.

“Why, this sure is a pleasant surprise,” Jet said smoothly as he stalked toward her with a charming smile that would have made her swoon a few years ago. “What are you doing out at this time of night, especially here in the Lower Ring when you can be all cozy in the palace?”

“Oh…” Katara smiled uncertainly. “I was just…taking a walk.”

Jet let out a mirthful laugh, his white teeth gleaming against his tanned skin.

“You’re such a bad liar, Katara,” he said and chuckled as he continued to slowly approach her until he was standing right in front of her. “Now, why don’t you tell me the real reason you’re here, hm?” He gave her a cocky smile.

Katara glared at him and took a step back.

“It’s none of your business, now is it?” she told him with a scowl. “I don’t have to explain myself to you.” She spun around to leave his arrogant ass in the middle of the dark street and stomped away.

Jet’s eyes gleamed as the beautiful waterbender walked away with an annoyed huff. Oh, how he missed her fiery temper. Ever since she stood up to him with those blazing, blue eyes of hers, he could not stop thinking about her. When he realized she was in Ba Sing Se all those years ago he tried everything to get her forgiveness. Therefore, he changed his ways and tried to help Aang, and now he helped wherever he could—like cleaning the reservoir—in order to prove to her that he had changed and all for her. And once she finally realized that, he would have her affections.

Sure, she was Aang’s girlfriend and all, but he was not fooled into thinking that that relationship would work. He saw that it was a one-sided attraction, from when they first met during the war, two years ago when he ran into them in that village, and still was now when he came across them a few days ago. The only thing he needed to do was convince her to go with him, make her realize that she was meant for him, and then he would show her what true attraction was as well as what a real man was really like.
Licking his lips, Jet smoothly followed her and sauntered confidently until he was by her side.

“You do know it’s dangerous walking all by yourself in the middle of the night, right?” he told her softly, eyeing her beautiful face since that long cloak she was wearing hid her body from his hungry eyes.

Katara rolled her eyes since she had heard that same thing from Zuko many times and chose to remain silent. Why did it seem like the men in her life always forgot she was a master waterbender?

Jet pulled the wheat stalk from his mouth and let out a disapproving sigh.

“I can’t believe Aang and your brother allowed ya to roam the Lower Ring all by yourself. I would’ve thought that at least that stupid, scarred firebender would’ve stopped you,” he said casually as he twirled the stalk between his fingers, though there was a hint of irritation in his voice.

Katara stopped walking and gritted her teeth as her temper flared at both his first words and the insults flung at Zuko.

“Shut up, Jet!” she growled out. “What makes you think I need their permission to do anything? You better leave me alone before I freeze you to another tree.”

Jet cocked an eyebrow at her.

“Are ya angry that what I said about the firebender is true?” he asked with a smirk before he gruffly added, “I don’t know how you can stand being around him.”

“Zuko is not stupid!” Katara snapped with a raised chin before she smirked. “I happen to enjoy his company. Quite a lot actually, if you must know.”

The Freedom Fighter closed his mouth, the wheat stalk drooped as his teeth clenched, and he narrowed his eyes at her for a second before another smirk appeared on his thin lips.

“You enjoyed spending time with me too when we first met, gorgeous,” he reminded her smoothly. “You even made me a hat.”
Katara flushed, but refused to let him win as she lifted her nose in the air.

“That was because I was a naïve little girl and I didn’t know what kind of person you were back then,” she retorted.

Jet just smiled as he reached a hand to brush her cheek, but Katara batted his hand away and glared at him.

“Well, there’s nothing better than the present,” he said smoothly as he took a step toward her, making her back away. “How about we get to know each other better right now?” he whispered huskily.

Katara did not like the heated look Jet was aiming at her or the way he was walking closer to her, almost as if he was ready to pounce on her. She hadn’t missed the looks Jet had been throwing her way or his innuendos whenever they met. She didn’t enjoy them, but she had brushed them off, not wanting to make a big deal out of them and cause a ruckus with the rest of the group. Before she could reach for her waterskin, she found herself pinned to a cold wall by a hard body with her hands on either side of her head. Katara looked up in alarm to see Jet’s smirking face looming over hers.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko cursed under his breath as he raced swiftly through the dark, empty streets of the Lower Ring. He turned sharply around a corner and jumped onto a rooftop without missing a step when he realized it was a dead end. Just as he had expected, Katara was not at the infirmary when he finally arrived and now she was walking all by herself in the dark!

Just as he was about to sneak out of the palace to meet up with Katara, a servant had knocked on his door with an urgent message from the Fire Nation. It was a message from Chao who was requesting his presence back at the palace before a riot sprang among the nobles of the Royal Court. Chao did not elaborate what the problem was, but asked that the young Fire Lord return home as soon as possible. Once he finished reading the missive and sent a message back to the Fire Nation in response, Zuko had hurried to the infirmary to explain to Katara that he was returning home with his mother the next day, but he was too late.

With another curse, Zuko leaped from roof to roof as he scanned the streets and alleys below for any sign of the waterbender. He had a strange feeling in his chest that was making him worried and anxious. He hoped Katara was all right or he would never forgive himself if something were to happen to her.

“Zuko is not stupid!” Katara’s angry voice sounded straight ahead. “I happen to enjoy his company.
Quite a lot actually, if you must know.”

Zuko slowed down in his frantic run as the sound of Katara’s voice reached his ears and he smirked at what she had said, wondering who she was speaking to. Letting out a sigh of relief, his heart leaped happily—something that he noticed was occurring a lot lately—as he approached her and peered over the edge of the roof just in time to see Katara get pinned to the wall by Jet, a look of alarm on her face. Zuko growled low in his throat as he unsheathed one of his broadswords.

_I am so going to kill him!_ he snarled as he prepared to lunged himself at Jet, ready to slit his throat open for daring to put his dirty hands on Katara, but he stopped momentarily when the tanned man began to speak.

Katara’s heart was racing in her chest in shock as she tried to struggle against Jet, but he was too strong for her and she could not reach her waterskin. How dare he treat her like this?! She was barely able to pay attention as Jet spoke since her mind was consumed by anger and indignation.

“Now, now, gorgeous,” Jet chided in a rough voice as he pressed himself closer to her, causing Katara to let out a sound of protest and making Zuko even angrier as he watched with fuming eyes above them. “There’s nothing to be scared of. I just want to get to know you better,” he cooed.

“Get away from me, Jet!” Katara managed to yell out angrily as she tried to stomp on his foot, but he quickly moved it out of the way.

“No. I finally found you again and I’m not letting you get away from me,” Jet replied huskily before he inched his face closer to the point where his lips almost touched hers.

Katara quickly moved her head aside. His breath caused her to cringe away instead of making her shiver pleasantly just like every time Zuko’s warm breath touched her skin. With an angry hiss, she swiftly brought up her knee and kneed him between the legs.

Zuko was about to launch himself from the rooftop in a rage, but he froze at Katara’s actions. His eyes widened before an amused smirk curled his lips. He knew Katara could handle this. Served the bastard right.

“Fuck!” Jet gasped in pain as he fell on one knee, his hands tenderly cupping his crotch. The wheat stalk in his mouth almost bent in half as he clenched his teeth.
“What the hell is your problem?” Katara fumed at him as she watched him moan in pain on the ground. Putting her hands on her hips, she angrily demanded, “Did you really think forcing yourself on me would make me like you?”

“I wasn’t going to do that,” Jet rasped, taking deep breaths to endure the pain. Damn, had she been trying to unman him? Once the pain subsided to a dull ache, he shakily got to his feet and frowned at the scowling waterbender.

“Oh, really? Did it look like I wanted you to kiss me?” Katara asked sarcastically.

Jet straightened himself and let out a relieved breath when the throbbing pain went away. He couldn’t well work on his seduction skills if he was hunched over in pain. But damn, she was a fiery one. All the more reason he wanted her.

“I was just trying to show you how much I missed and want you, gorgeous,” he told her, his tone was again smooth.

“Well, you have a strange way of showing it,” the waterbender retorted before she heatedly added, “I don’t appreciate being cornered.”

“Oh, come now, Katara,” Jet said huskily as he again approached her, though this time he made sure to do so slowly, trying not to seem menacing and trying to appeal to her feminine senses. With just a few sweet words, a charming smile, and smoldering eyes, he made women fall at his feet—and in his bed—all the time. Katara may resist him at first, but he was sure he would win her over and then she would be his.

“There’s no reason for you to be that way, gorgeous,” he cooed, “I promise that I’ll make you feel good.”

“Don’t make me freeze you to the wall, Jet,” Katara warned with narrowed eyes.

But the freedom fighter ignored her warning as he once again stepped close in front of her, invading her personal space.

“I’ve wanted you for so long and I’ll make you see that you’re supposed to be with me,” he said throatily as he quickly grasped onto her upper arms and bent his head toward hers.
With an angry hiss, not believing Jet had the audacity to try to kiss her against her will once again, Katara pulled her head back, ready to butt him in the face when Jet was suddenly thrown away from her and a loud punching sound echoed throughout the silent street.

“Touch her again and I swear that I will tear your filthy arms off your body!” she heard a deep masculine voice snarl.

Katara’s eyes widened in surprise, for standing in front of her with swords drawn in a fierce fighting stance was the Blue Spirit, err…Zuko.

“Zu—Blue!” she exclaimed as she moved forward to grab his tensed arm. Since when did he arrive?

“Katara, are you all right?” Zuko asked with a deep tone of voice as he quickly glanced down at her from behind his mask. He moved his arm from her grasp and instead pulled her to him, pressing her protectively against his side.

“Did this bastard hurt you?” he inquired in a hard and angry tone.

Katara was at first distracted by the fact that Zuko had pressed her body tightly against his harder frame that she didn’t immediately answer. When she heard Zuko call her name almost anxiously, she quickly shook her head.

“No, I’m fine,” she responded as she buried her face on his chest, reveling in his comforting and spicy scent, before she glared angrily at Jet who was barely starting to stand from where the Blue Spirit had flung him. “I wasn’t about to let him force himself on me.”

Jet touched his jaw and winced at the bump that was forming due to the hard punch he received. At her words, Jet looked at Katara with a shocked look on his face before it was replaced with a deep frown.

“I wasn’t trying to force myself on you!” he said, but when she raised a skeptical eyebrow at him, he exclaimed firmly, “I swear!”

“Really? Then what were you trying to do?” Katara asked.
They watched as a roguish smile curled the freedom fighter’s lips as his eyes stared intently into the waterbender’s blue eyes.

“Seduce you,” Jet responded huskily. “Make you go crazy with want of me.”

He ignored the way the masked man tensed as he continued to stare at Katara. He did not know who the stranger was, but he did not like the way he had Katara pressed against him. He watched as Katara’s eyes widened and a light flush surfaced on her cheeks. Smiling charmingly at her, he took a step toward her with a hand outstretched.

Angry, Zuko pushed the suddenly silent woman gently behind him and leveled his left sword at Jet’s advancing neck.

“Stay away from her or else!” Zuko threatened harshly.

If it wasn’t for his mask, Katara was sure his face would have been contorted into a frightening snarl. Though his harsh tone should have frightened her, it actually made her feel secure and comforted.

“This is none of your business, you masked freak!” Jet yelled as he glared at the masked man that was hiding Katara behind him.

“Everything that concerns Katara is my business!” Zuko growled with such intensity that it made Katara’s heart thump in her chest and caused a rush of warmth to rush to her cheeks.

Jet narrowed his eyes and unsheathed his dual hook swords from his back.

“I don’t know who the fuck you are to her, but I won’t let you get in my way!” he hissed.

Zuko pushed Katara farther behind himself and took in a fighting stance, accepting the challenge.

“Katara, go back to the palace,” he ordered.
“No!” Katara yelled defiantly as she tried to pull Zuko away. “Zu—I mean, Blue, let’s just go! Just ignore him. There’s no reason for both of you to fight.”

“Katara,” Zuko said between clenched teeth. “Please do as I say. I need to teach him a lesson about his despicable behavior.”

Jet snorted.

“You’re welcome to stay, Katara. That way you can witness the way I humiliate this guy as he loses to me.”

Katara narrowed her eyes at his arrogant proclamation.

“I can’t understand how I could’ve believed you changed,” she told him angrily before she looked up at Zuko.

“Let’s go...please,” she told him firmly, not noticing the way Jet frowned at her words. She squeezed Zuko’s arm once then she turned around and walked away.

Zuko watched her go before he glared once more at Jet and turned around to follow Katara. He wanted nothing more than to beat the freedom fighter to a pulp, but he didn’t want to upset Katara more than she already was.

Jet felt his temper rise as the mask man turned to look at him, believing the mysterious individual was laughing at him. The bastard! How dare that masked freak try to get between Katara and him?! With an indignant and angry yell, Jet lunged himself with his swords drawn and raised his right arm to attack the man’s back. He didn’t not notice that Katara had turned around to see if the man was following her.

“Zuko!” Katara shouted in alarm.

At the sound of Jet’s yell and Katara’s terrified scream, the firebender spun around and raised his right broadsword just in time to block Jet’s attack. The two metal weapons made a clashing sound as they met before Zuko slashed at Jet’s stomach with his other sword. Jet jumped out of the way just in time to avoid being sliced in half and once again brought his hook sword down in order to hack at the masked individual’s shoulder.
Zuko flipped backwards, and as he flew, he kicked Jet in the chest. Jet stumbled back with a curse, but managed to regain his balance. He rubbed his chest, positive he was going to get a bruise, before he raced toward Zuko with an angry yell, bringing both swords down. Zuko brought his broadswords up to block Jet’s attack and was pushed slightly backwards by Jet’s speed and strength. They held in this position for a while as both tried to push the other one off, muscles burning and straining at the effort.

“Zuko!” Katara called again in alarm as she uncorked her waterskin and bent the water into a whip, determined to help him.

“Stay away, Katara!” Zuko barked in an authoritative tone that made Katara stay still despite herself. “This is between him and me,” he said as he shifted in his stance and slowly drove Jet backwards.

Jet smirked.

“So, the great Fire Lord Zuko is the wanted Blue Spirit. How nice,” the young freedom fighter snickered as he tried to push Zuko to the side. “Don’t worry, I won’t tell anyone.”

“The once wanted criminal,” Zuko corrected with a bored tone that only caused Jet to get even angrier.

Zuko managed to unbalance his opponent and took the opportunity to slash with his left sword, making a hit on Jet’s arm. With a pained cry, Jet backed a safe distance away as he looked down at his injured arm with a scowl. A thin cut was oozing a little bit of blood. Dammit, he didn’t think the other man was that good to be able to touch him.

He looked up to glare at the masked Fire Lord and he growled when he saw that Zuko’s stance was more relaxed, insinuating that he didn’t believe Jet was a worthy opponent.

“You asshole!” Jet growled as he lunged himself forward, swords held at his side.

Zuko easily evaded the attack before he swipe a leg forward, effectively knocking the other man onto his back. He could not help but smirk beneath his mask when the other man cursed as he quickly jumped back to his feet. Jet was a good fighter, he’ll give him that, but he was in no way in his level. Zuko was a sword master, thanks to the many years of training since childhood. He was also skilled in hand-to-hand combat and martial arts. And if he used his firebending he could easily defeat Jet.

But he wanted to taunt the bastard for a while before he finally beat him. The arrogant man needed to be brought down a peg for daring to think of seducing Katara.

“What’s wrong, Jet? You look a little tired. Need a break? It’s understandable as it seems you are only used to attacking women,” the Fire Lord sneered.

Seeing red, the Freedom Fighter hastily charged forward, quickly swinging his right and then left hook swords at his opponent’s chest. Prepared for the attack, Zuko ducked under the blades and slammed his fist and hilt of his sword into his attacker’s stomach, causing him to hunch over in pain. The firebender then moved swiftly to the side and kneed Jet in the chest, causing him to fall back on his back. Zuko quickly sheathed his swords as he leaped into the air, intending to land on top of the other man so he could smash the cocky rebel’s face, something he had been itching to do every time he had run into the obnoxious man. But he was only met with cold concrete as Jet rolled away from him and into a crouching position a few feet away. They eyed each other warily as they slowly got to their feet. Zuko pulled out his dual swords. Both men stood facing each other as they panted slightly, eyeing each other warily, trying to regain their breaths and see what the other would do next.

Katara watched worriedly as she continued to watch them from a safe distance. She could tell Zuko was baiting Jet, which was making Jet more determined to fight him, despite the fact that he had several cuts on him and his face held several red marks that were sure to turn into bruises the next day.

Jet spat out the blood that had fallen into his mouth from the small cut on the corner of his lip. Damn the stupid scarred firebender. He was taunting him and it only made Jet angrier since he was trying to make him look like a fool in front of Katara. Well, two could play at this game.

“Why are you so angry?” Jet asked with a mocking grin.

The firebender snorted.

“Why do you ask me such a stupid question?” Zuko retorted, “I care for Katara, she is a great friend to me. I vowed to protect her, and you tried to hurt her.”

Jet let out a dark laugh.
“Stop lying to yourself, firebender,” he mocked and he smirked again. “The real reason you’re so fuckin’ pissed off is because you’re jealous.”

“I’m not jealous…” Zuko tried to deny, but Jet continued to talk as if he had not spoken.

“Are you jealous that Katara would have liked to spend some time with me? Alone,” he taunted. He grinned lasciviously as he sneaked a glance at Katara, who was too far away to hear their conversation.

“Shut up!” Zuko growled loudly as he moved to the side in order to block Katara from Jet’s view. He tightened his hold around the hilts of his dual broadswords, smoke coming out through his fingers.

Jet chuckled again as he continued to casually chew on his wheat stalk. Yes, he was getting a rise out of the damn Fire Lord who thought he was better than him.

“I knew I was right. You are jealous. And here I thought that you were too honorable to lust over your friend’s girlfriend,” he sneered.

Zuko clenched his jaw tight as the other man’s words struck him.

“You know nothing,” he replied before he raced towards Jet, swords drawn at his sides, more serious now.

“You’re wrong,” Jet said as he parried Zuko’s strike.

He tried to push the firebender back, but Zuko did not budge and instead swung his arm sideways, effectively clipping Jet on the side of the face with his fist.

Jet let out a pained grunt as the impact threw him to the floor. He quickly rolled away when Zuko brought down his foot before Jet sprang to his feet. He ignored the way his cheek and ear throbbed in pain.

“I’ve noticed the way you look at Katara the few times we’ve run across each,” he growled, “And the obvious way you hover over her protectively, almost possessively. I know you have feelings for her.”

Both young men’s weapons clashed loudly against each other as they once again continued to attack and evade one another.

Katara chewed on her lip uncertainly as she continued to watch them fight. She did not know what to do and even though she knew Zuko could take care of himself, she had to hold back a cry every time it seemed Jet could hurt him. She could see that something had changed and now they were both seriously trying to hurt each other. She saw them stop again, seeming to have a conversation and she wondered what they said to make Jet smirk like that and make Zuko tense up.

“I don’t know what feelings you’re talking about,” Zuko said guardedly as their weapons once again became locked together with another resounding clash of metal.

Jet laughed again and sneered.

“At first, I thought you just wanted to fuck her, and really, I can’t blame you,” he replied as he turned his head to leer at Katara.

“How dare you speak of her in such a way?!” Zuko roared angrily.

His rage caused his hands to light up in fire. With a pained cry, Jet flew back at the small explosion. He barely had enough time to defend himself when an enraged firebender sprang at him with flaming swords.

“Shit,” the freedom fighter cursed as he ducked to the side, narrowly avoiding having his head cut off. He moved a safe distance away and panted, wincing when all his injuries throbbed in pain, and yet he could not stop himself from taunting the scarred bastard.

“Don’t lie and tell me you’ve never dreamed of having her under you,” he sneered as he readied his hook swords as the firebender advanced on him, “Of what it’d feel like having her legs wrapped around you…”

“Shut up!” Zuko growled.
He again lunged himself at the freedom fighter, but Jet once again blocked him with his swords, causing their weapons to let out a loud booming clash. They glared at each other over their locked swords.

Sparks flew from Zuko’s clenched hands. How dare Jet utter such crude words?! How dare he refer to Zuko’s feelings for Katara as something as vulgar as that? Yes, he was attracted to Katara and he could not stop himself from looking at her body, but it wasn’t for such a base reason. No, his attraction for her ran more deeply than that. It wasn’t just her body and the pleasures he could derive from it that he thought off. She meant much more to him than just that.

“I knew it,” Jet hissed as another sneer appeared on his face. “It’s so damn obvious now…”

“What is?” the firebender growled as he readied himself to finish the bastard off.

Jet smirked before he narrowed his dark eyes.

“You’re in love with her,” he stated angrily.

Zuko froze in shock at his words, and Jet took the opportunity to disengage one of his hook swords and slashed it at the silent masked firebender. Zuko stumbled backwards as he clutched at his chest where a thin line of blood spilled forth from his ripped tunic. He was barely aware that Katara had cried out his name in fright before he noticed people suddenly approaching them. They must have probably woken up due to the noise, he thought absentmindedly.

Suddenly, he was surrounded by white mist and he could hear Jet’s angry yells as well as the confused voices of the people. A small hand grabbed his and began to pull him away through the fog. Though he could not see anything, he knew Katara was the one who was holding tightly onto his gloved hand.

Katara led them away from the commotion as she bent a thick blanket of cool mist around them as they made their way to the Upper Ring, parting the fog in front of her so she could see where she was going. She glanced back at Zuko with concern as he walked beside her without saying a word, almost as if in a daze, and she wondered what Jet had told him to make him lose focus.

Zuko remained quiet as he allowed Katara to lead him through the mist as Jet’s words kept repeating over and over in his head, and before he knew it, they were standing in front of the back wall of the Earth King’s palace. With his help, they stealthily sneaked over the wall until they were standing in the garden near the guest rooms.

Zuko walked over to a stone bench and sat down heavily on it before he reached for his Blue Spirit mask. Untying it, he let the mask slip through his fingers until it landed with a soft ‘thud’ on the green grass, a look of utter shock on his face.

In love? He was in love with…Katara?

He had asked himself that question and denied it many times in the past several weeks, but now that Jet had said it in that voice, as if he was confirming something that was undeniable, Zuko found himself at a loss for words.

“Oh, La! Zuko, you’re bleeding!” he heard Katara exclaim in alarm before he felt her sit next to him on the cool stone bench.

Dazed, Zuko looked down at his chest and noticed a dark crimson wet spot on his shirt, finally realizing that Jet, that insufferable bastard, had actually inflicted a wound on him! His breath caught in his throat as he felt Katara’s soft hand on his chest. Snapping his head up, he watched as she summoned a ribbon of water from the grass since she had used all the water from her waterskin to create the fog. Covering one hand with the glowing healing glove, she pressed it to his injury.

Zuko watched as her shocked face shifted into one of concentration, her brows furrowed slightly and her eyes full of determination as she moved her glowing hand over his bleeding chest. He watched as the moon’s soft light and the radiance of her healing water illuminated her gorgeous features, making her beautiful brown skin glow, her lovely chocolate-colored tresses shine, and her exquisite sapphire eyes sparkle.

“I was scared there for a minute,” Katara confessed softly. “I was afraid you two would have seriously hurt one another.”

“I’m sorry for frightening you,” Zuko finally managed to say as he held his gaze on her lovely features, “but I just got so angry at what he was trying to do to you.”

Katara lowered her eyes with a blush at the intensity in Zuko’s golden orbs as he continued to gaze at her and she bit her lip. The firebender watched as she nibbled on her plump lower lip and he was once again consumed with the strong desire to press his lips to hers, to take her in his arms…to love her for the rest of his life and never let go.

He closed his eyes in pleasure as the soothing cool liquid touched his flesh and sealed his wound. He loved the sensation of Katara’s small hands running across his chest just like they did when Azula struck him. He enjoyed the feeling of relaxation and ease that came over him for finally admitting what his true feelings for the wonderful and beautiful waterbender were.

I'm in love with Katara, he finally admitted to himself, and a small smile spread across his face.

“How do you feel?” Katara asked gently as the glowing of the water stopped and she slowly removed her hands from his broad chest.

Zuko opened his amber eyes and stared for a few seconds into Katara’s cerulean ones that were filled with concern. He raised his hand and tenderly caressed her cheek, making her gasp gently before she leaned into his hand, a questioning look in her soft eyes.

“Much better,” he whispered softly.

Chapter End Notes

I know Jet died in the series, but since his death was not actually mentioned, just alluded to, I decided to keep him alive in this story for plot purposes. Besides, I thought it cruel that he was killed even after he tried to reform his ways.
A comfortable silence followed after Zuko spoke last. Wispy clouds occasionally passed over the moon that rested on the dark night sky. The leaves rustling in the soft breeze and the crickets’ soft serenade were the only sounds that could be heard in the garden.

Zuko continued to caress Katara’s soft cheek as his heart seemed to burn even stronger after he admitted the truth of his feelings to himself. Why had he not admitted it before? Why had he tried to deny it for so long? He watched as a smile appeared on Katara’s face as she patted the hand he was touching her face with.

“It makes me so glad to hear that,” Katara replied with relief, oblivious to what was happening to the man that sat before her. Oblivious to the feelings she evoked in him. She touched his chest one more time before she looked up to smile at him. “I knew such a small wound wouldn’t have brought you down, but I was still worried.”

Zuko tenderly gazed down at the young woman whose face—which had been filled with concern a moment ago—showed the relief she felt for him. He felt that new feeling, which he now understood to be love, spread all over his body. He slowly moved his hand from her cheek, to her jaw, and then down her neck in order to touch the long braid that fell over her shoulder. Gently, he twirled the soft end with his long fingers.

Katara shivered at his caress on her cheek before blushing when he began to play with her hair. She looked down at his large hand curiously before she looked into his eyes, trying to understand what he was doing since it was rare for Zuko to behave so affectionately.

“Katara,” Zuko began softly. “There’s something that I have to tell you…” he whispered as he leaned a bit closer to her face.

“W-what is it?” the waterbender stuttered as she felt his warm breath touch the skin of her face.

Katara felt her heart begin to pound in her chest as Zuko’s face inched closer to hers in the same way it did in her dream. In that dream, his hands had been caressing her body, exactly like how his hand was touching her hair at the moment. Right before their lips almost touched. Her breathing sped up as she waited almost breathlessly for him to finish what her dream had started.

Zuko swallowed as he lowered his eyes from her bright, cobalt ones to quickly gaze at her lips, which he noticed, dazedly, were slightly parted. Before his gaze went back up to her blue orbs again. He wanted to tell her, to confess to her the depth of his feelings, to make her realize what she had done to him and how much she had changed and affected him.

“Katara, I…” Zuko breathed heavily as he moved his hand from her hair back up to her cheek.

“Yes?” Katara whispered softly as she gazed into his blazing eyes, wondering why he was staring at her so intensely and wondering what he was going to do.

Zuko opened his mouth, ready to confess his love for her, but the words did not come out. He did not know what to do and how to tell her what he felt. What if she rejected him? He would not be able to bear that, to hear her telling him she could never return his feelings because she already loved Aang and could only see him as a friend. And most importantly, what if his confession ruined their friendship? What if she began to distance herself from him again?

He closed his mouth and moved away from her, removing his hand from where it had been touching her to rest it on his lap where he clenched it tightly.

Katara snapped out of her daze when she felt his warmth and touch leave her, and she was unable to stop the disappointment from showing on her face before she berated herself for thinking in such a way. How could she have thought Zuko was going to kiss her? How could she have wanted Zuko to kiss her? It would be cheating on Aang and she could never hurt him. Besides, Zuko and she were only friends and could be nothing more. That’s what she tried to tell her still racing heart.

Zuko looked away from Katara and instead fixed his gaze on the large tree that stood a few feet before them with its branches almost bare from the fall season. He closed his eyes briefly to compose himself before he returned his eyes to her face.

“I…want to apologize,” Zuko said. His voice back to his normal cool tone once again. Although inwardly, emotions he had never experienced before were swirling chaotically.

“Apologize? For what?” Katara asked quietly, a bit confused at the sudden change in his mood.

“For not meeting you at the infirmary as I said I would,” Zuko explained as he once again looked away from her.
“Oh,” Katara replied. The disappointed feeling came back before she mentally shook her head.

What’s wrong with me? It’s not like I expected him to confess his love for me or something! She mentally laughed at the thought before she quickly sobered up.

“Yeah, if I had arrived sooner Jet,” Zuko practically spat the Freedom Fighter’s name, “wouldn’t have tried imposed himself on you. He wouldn’t have approached you if I had been with you,” he growled lowly before he looked back at her. “For that I apologize.”

Katara sighed and waved his apology away.

“Don’t worry about it. I had everything under control, though now that I think about it, maybe he wouldn’t have actually harmed me. Jet may be many things, but I’m sure a rapist is not one of them.” She shuddered at the unpleasant thought.

Zuko snorted, but said nothing to argue with her about what type of man the rogue really was. Even if Jet did not continue to force himself on her, the point was that he tried to coerce Katara, so that, to Zuko, made Jet’s actions unforgivable. And if he ever came across Jet again, Zuko was not sure he would be able to stop himself from seriously harming the bastard.

Katara shifted uneasily as Zuko’s face darkened before she cleared her throat to get his attention.

“So what made you late in the first place? I’m curious to know,” Katara said with a smile in order to change the topic.

Zuko blinked as the sound of her voice brought him out of his thoughts of the many ways he could hurt the freedom fighter before he let out a sigh.

“I was about to jump down the window from my guest room to join you when a servant knocked at my door and gave me a message that had arrived from the Fire Nation. It was from Chao, and so I had to read it since I told him to only send me urgent messages while I was away.”

“Oh, no.” Katara frowned. “I hope it’s nothing serious.”
“I don’t think it is,” Zuko reassured her. “Chao did not really explain what the problem is, but he asked me to return to the Fire Nation immediately. I wrote him a reply to let him know I was returning as soon as possible. Once the servant left to send the letter, I sneaked out of the palace to meet with you.”

He paused before he reached for her hand and grasped in tenderly, loving the feeling of her soft skin on his and saddening at what he was about to say. He tightened his hold.

“I’m leaving and going back to the Fire Nation. I plan on departing with my mother tomorrow morning,” he informed her softly.

“What?” Katara exclaimed. “But I wanted to take you and Lady Ursa to the zoo tomorrow... You had planned to stay in Ba Sing Se for a few more weeks,” she said sadly as she grasped his hand tightly, as if with that she could keep him from leaving. A small ache appeared in her chest when she heard his plan.

“I know,” he replied. “But I have a responsibility to my country. I hope you understand.”

Katara chided herself for her childish behavior.

“Of course I understand. Your people need you, just like my waterbending students need me,” she said with a small smile.

I need you, Zuko thought dejectedly, before he tugged at her hand gently as the thought of leaving her began to depress him.

“We’ll see each other again, right?” he said with a smile.

“Right,” she replied and squeezed his hand.

King Kuei’s servants moved quickly down the long flight of stairs with the few belongings that the Fire Lord and his mother possessed and strapped them securely to the back of the carriage that was waiting in the courtyard. The dragon-moose that was attached to the front of the elegant carriage snorted and pawed at the ground as it waited for the driver to command it to move.
Katara gave a small smile as Ursa pulled her into a warm hug.

“Thank you, Katara, for helping my son find me and for everything else,” the older woman said as she pulled away to smile at the waterbender.

Katara blushed lightly as she gave out a small laugh.

“It was nothing, Lady Ursa. I was glad to help,” she said sincerely.

Ursa smiled before she patted Katara’s hand.

“I look forward in seeing you and meeting your family at your brother’s wedding. I am excited to see the Southern Water Tribe and especially try those sea prunes you told me about,” she said.

Katara grinned in anticipation of seeing the noblewoman and her son again, but this time it would be in her own home. She could not wait to show Zuko around her city just like he showed her his when they were in the Fire Nation.

Zuko had explained to King Kuei, his uncle, and his friends that morning that he was needed at the Fire Nation immediately and he was leaving with his mother that same day. He reassured them all that it was nothing too serious and that they should not worry. Aang and Toph then stated that they could not postpone their visit to Omashu any longer and decided to leave for King Bumi’s city in a few days. Iroh had decided to stay in Ba Sing Se for a few more months while Sokka, Suki, and Katara decided that it was time they return to the Southern Water Tribe and announce the upcoming wedding.

Mai had left to visit her parents in Omashu with Ty Lee right after the breakfast meal. The young noblewoman had refused—with her usual bland expression—to travel with Aang and Toph on Appa, even though they were heading the same way. After talking with Zuko privately for a few minutes, she mounted another carriage the Earth King had provided for her and left. Katara was curious as to why Mai had gone to Omashu instead of back to the Fire Nation with Zuko and Ursa, but shrugged it off since it was none of her business, though a part of her admitted she was glad. However, another part of her wished she could be the one to leave to the Fire Nation with Zuko and Ursa. The Fire Nation climate was a bit too hot for her, but Katara still enjoyed sitting under the shade of a tree during the warm, sunny weather. She wanted to see Ursa’s reaction as she gazed upon the garden her son had ordered to be cultivated and renovated after the war. She wanted to smell the pleasant fragrance of the rosebushes as well as hear the quacking from the cute, little turtle-ducks in the beautiful Royal Palace Garden. But most of all, she wanted be near Zuko.

Katara frowned at her thoughts before she shook them away, thinking them as silly. The Southern Water Tribe was her home, not the Fire Nation.

When Ursa moved away from her to say her farewell to Iroh, Katara turn around to see Zuko thanking King Kuei for his hospitality. A strange ache in her heart appeared again as she stared at the firebender, at how he kept a stoic and reserved face when he was around everyone else but her.

After a few more minutes and promises to start the trade compromise as soon as possible, both leaders bowed to each other before Zuko turned away and made his way to his friends who were waiting by the carriage.

Katara watched with a sad smile as the gang said their goodbyes—Sokka roughly patting Zuko’s back with a grin and Toph punching Zuko on the arm—before she lowered her eyes to the ground. Just last night Zuko had come to help her, and while she had healed him he had looked at her with such a tender gaze that her heart stuttered and her skin warmed up. But now they were going their separate ways and she could not help the sadness and misery that had clung to her since he had first told her he was returning to the Fire Nation.

The tribeswoman was confused that she actually felt pain at the thought of Zuko leaving and not at the thought that Aang was departing. Sure, she felt sad that Aang was leaving since she cared for him, but it did not compare to the intense feelings she had at the thought of not seeing Zuko or hearing his voice again. She did not understand why she felt the way she did, but the only thing that mattered right then was that she did not want Zuko to leave.

Don’t be selfish, she chided herself. Zuko has responsibilities and I can’t always be demanding his attention. She frowned. I wonder if my constant presence will annoy him one day.

She did not like that thought either, for she had a feeling she would never get bored or tired of him. Zuko was such an interesting and complex person and there was always something new about him that never failed to surprise her. He being the Blue Spirit was one example.

With a small sigh, Katara continued to watch as her friends surrounded the young Fire Lord and she giggled softly at the uncomfortable expression Zuko tried to suppress when they began to hug him. He never was much for physical contact.
Zuko frowned when Aang only shook his hand and gave him a halfhearted smile before quickly moving away. He had noticed that the young monk had been acting strange lately, such as glaring and snapping at him more frequently, especially every time Zuko was talking to or sitting near Katara. Maybe Aang, like Jet, had sense Zuko’s feelings before he himself did and that was why he was treating him differently than the rest of the group? Zuko frowned.

Before Zuko could ponder deeper about Aang’s strange behavior, his uncle drew him into a crushing hug before babbling about the teabags he had packed for them and solemnly telling him to inform him about what Chao wanted. Iroh patted Zuko’s back and, with a huge smile, pushed his nephew none too gently in the direction where the waterbender was standing alone with a sad look on her pensive face.

Zuko glared at his uncle, but the old man had already turned his attention to Ursa and the other young people. Straightening his clothes, Zuko slowly lifted his eyes to where Katara was standing. He sighed inaudibly as his heart ignited once again at the sight of her before it clenched at the thought that he would not be seeing her face or be in her presence for the next few months.

Even though he had finally realized that he was in love with her, he did not know what to do with his newfound feelings, especially since there was no point in confessing it to her since she already loved another.

His jaw clenched at the thought.

He needed time to think, to become used to the idea that he was in love. Something he had been positive he never would have been able to experience or be capable of. He was unaccustomed to such an intense emotion and he was unsure on how to proceed, which did not sit well with him.

He relaxed when Katara approached him with a smile that made his breath hitch in his throat and sent his burning heart racing. Why did she have such a strong effect on him?

“It’s really unfortunate that our visit to Ba Sing Se had to be cut short,” Katara said. “But duty calls, right?” She grinned.

“Yes,” Zuko answered slowly and could not help the smile that appeared on his face even though the thought of separating from her made him miserable.

“But I promise we’ll see each other at Sokka and Suki’s wedding,” he assured her before he grinned, unable to resist making her laugh once again. “Unless of course Sokka does something stupid to make Suki call off the wedding, which knowing your brother, is a likely possibility,” he jested.

His heart seemed to flip when Katara’s soft laughter reached his ears.

Katara smiled up at Zuko before a small sigh escaped her lips.

“Zuko…I-I’m going to miss you,” she whispered before she could stop herself. Blushing, Katara began to ramble due to her nervousness, “It’s silly, right? I mean it’s not like we’re never going to see each other again, and we are meeting at their wedding in a few months, and—”

Zuko placed one finger on her lips to stop her nervous prattling and suppressed a groan at the sensation of her soft lips against his finger tip. He wanted nothing more than to feel those soft petals on his own lips and all over his heated skin.

Surprised, Katara stopped talking as a shiver ran down her spine at his touch, and with wide eyes, she stared up at Zuko curiously.

“I’m going to miss you, too,” Zuko whispered with a soft smile.

He moved his hand away from her plump lips, and before he could think about it twice, he wound his arms around her waist, pulling her close to him. Not even a second passed before he felt Katara wrap her arms around him to return the embrace.

A lump formed in his throat and he swallowed hard in order to get rid of it. He did not want to let her go. Now that he knew that what he felt for her was love, and not just pure lust, he hated the thought of leaving her and not getting to see her face or talk to her the following day and the day after that. He tightened his hold on her as he fought with himself, from confessing his feelings to her. From shouting that he loved her for all to hear. From pulling her head back and kissing her senseless.

But then he felt someone wedge between them, forcing them to separate. The empty feeling that followed was felt by both, though neither Katara nor Zuko knew that the other felt the same. Aang appeared between them before the young airbender placed a protective arm around Katara’s shoulders.

Zuko inwardly flinched at the suspicious and hurtful glare Aang was throwing at him before the firebender took another step back.

“Don’t you think it’s getting late, Zuko?” Aang said cheerfully, although his tone was too terse to be genuine. “I think that you should take advantage of the remaining daylight.”

Zuko composed himself as he gazed at the airbender coolly.

“Yes, you’re right,” he responded before he glanced sideways at the silent group that was staring at them curiously. “Mother, I think it’s best that we take our leave now. Admiral Jee and the crew will be waiting at the docks with nothing to do if we take too long.”

Ursa glanced one last time at Iroh, who gave her wink, before she stepped inside the carriage with one last farewell.

Zuko offered one last smile at his friends.

“Thank you again for coming on this journey with me and helping me find my mother,” he said sincerely. His golden eyes rested on Katara who was looking at him sadly.

Unwilling to look away and leave, his gaze lingered for a moment on her face before he continued.

“We shall see one another again soon.”

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The sun was beginning to set over the horizon, casting a bright golden light on the smooth surface of the calm blue ocean. A few clouds were spread across the multicolored sky as a soft salty breeze blew by, indicating that no storm would appear to disturb the serene scene any time soon.

Zuko watched the setting sun quietly as he stood alone on deck at the front of his flagship. The sounds of his crew members working above deck as Admiral Jee gave them orders barely reached his ears as he let out a deep sigh.

They would be arriving at the Fire Nation the following day and he would finally find out why Chao asked him to return. He needed to be on guard for anyone who tried to do anything to his mother since he still did not know who had sent her that false letter and he did not know how the Court Council would react to her reappearance. He needed to talk to Jee about his mother’s safety.

The ship rocked gently as he remembered the goodbyes and good wishes from his friends as he prepared to leave Ba Sing Se. Sighing, Zuko rubbed his right temple as he tried to recall the conversation he had with Mai before she left to Omashu. He had only nodded noncommittally when Mai told him she loved him and would see him again in spring for his birthday, because he was clueless as to what to do after realizing his true feelings for Katara. If he were honest with himself, he would say that he could not really recall their conversation since his mind had been occupied with a blue-eyed waterbender, which made him feel a little guilty.

Another breeze twirled around him and he inhaled the salty and fresh aroma of the clean ocean. The young Fire Lord smirked slightly at the thought that he would not be leaving Katara behind while Jet stilled lurked in Ba Sing Se since she was returning to the Southern Water Tribe. Another sigh escaped his lips as he touched the left side of his chest. The thought of not seeing or being near Katara made his heart ache.

He was in love.

_I am in love and with my best friend Katara no less_, he mused with a smile on his face.

As the days had passed by after his shocking epiphany, and the more he thought about it, he could not believe how stupid he was for not realizing his feelings for Katara much sooner. That insufferable Jet had to be the one to make him realize his true feelings for the waterbender! How irritating!

Perhaps if he had admitted his feelings earlier, if he had only acknowledged them at the first signs of his love for her, Katara would have been his by now. She could be travelling to the Fire Nation with him at the moment, wrapped up next to his side as they stared out into the setting sun together.

A wistful sigh escaped him before he shook his head sadly. He should not be thinking such thoughts now. Katara was with Aang and that was it. There was nothing he could do about it.

But that did not mean that he could stop his ardent feelings for the lovely Water Tribe maiden either.

Now he understood why he could not stop thinking about her ever since they went their separate ways after the war. Even then he must have had feelings for her. Why many things reminded him of her, and why even when he was asleep, innocent and not so innocent dreams about the waterbender played in his mind, warming and teasing him. Now he understood why he felt so at ease laughing with her, joking with her, playing with her, and talking to her. Allowing her to see a side of him he refused to reveal to anyone else.

Sure, she was annoying the first few times they came across each other as the war still raged on, and she continued to foil his attempts in capturing the Avatar. But as they continued to run into each other he began to respect and admire her for her great waterbending skills and for her loyalty to the Avatar and her mission for peace.

She was not like most Fire Nation noblewomen he knew and was used to. The women were submissive, delicate, and frail—with the exception of Azula and her friends, of course—something that Fire Nation male nobility seemed to look for in a wife. These were the same type of women his Royal Court introduced him to in hopes that he choose one among them to become his bride.

Though she had a temper to match his, Katara was strong and powerful. That was something else he admired about her. Although his fellow countrymen favored the meek little woman, he much more preferred a woman who would not be afraid to challenge him and would be able to keep up with his passionate side.

Of course, I would not mind making Katara be submissive once in a while, he thought with a small smirk as a few naughty images appeared in his mind before he shook his head again with a frown.

He thought she was beautiful since the first time he laid eyes on her frightened face when he invaded her small village. What with her exotic dark skin, dark-brown hair, and especially those captivating azure eyes. But at that time, he was too busy trying to fight a lost cause with his father to really think much about her. But now, as her body matured from a teenage girl to a young woman, he could not stop himself from appreciating her form every chance he got.

However, her physical beauty was not her only attribute that had gained his interest and captured his heart, but her kind soul as well. Katara had the most generous and the most beautiful heart out of everyone he had ever known. She was always trying to help those in need, even if it risked the waterbender her health or her life. She had offered to help him when they were still enemies, even after she had suffered under the hands of the Fire Nation. Had suffered personally under his hands. There were just so many wonderful things about Katara of the Southern Water Tribe.

How could he not have fallen in love with her? How could he not have been enchanted by that wonderful woman? But most importantly, why did he not see it and acted upon it sooner?

Zuko sighed. But even after all this he knew he had to forget about her, he had to let her go. Not only because she was Aang’s girlfriend, but because he was convinced she would never return his feelings. She was too good, too pure, for someone like him, whom life had scarred and hardened so much. He was not worthy of her.

That thought caused his heart to wrench painfully, and so he closed his eyes as another salty breeze swirled around his unmoving form.

Perhaps this separation would be best for him. By being away from her, perhaps his feelings could go away or at least be diminished a bit so that once they met again, he would be able to bear the sight of her being with Aang. He had to remind himself that she could never be his, that she could never love him in return, that they could never be…

“Zuko, are you all right, dear?” his mother’s soft voice broke through his thoughts.

The young man snapped his eyes open and turned his head to the side to see his mother frowning down at his hands. Zuko looked down and realized that his clenched fists were aflame with bright orange fire. Taking a deep breath, Zuko flexed his tensed fingers and dispersed his flames with an emotionless expression.

Zuko returned his golden eyes to his worried mother and gave her a small smile.

“Yes, Mom…I’m perfectly fine,” he replied impassively as he looked away to gaze at the horizon once more.

Ursa’s frown deepened at his attempt to assuage her concern, she knew something was wrong with her son. She had caught him on a few occasions as they sailed at sea with content smiles on his face, as he would stare out almost in a daze, before sadness would settle over him. She wondered what was going on, but she did not want to pry if he did not want to talk about it.

She turned her questioning gaze to the setting sun as she remained silent beside her firstborn child. The sky and the ocean had turned a soft orangey-yellow as the sun made its descent over the horizon. Soon they would arrive at the Fire Nation, both her birth place and the place she had thought she would never see again. Ursa glanced at her silent son from the corner of her eye as questions formed in her head.

The day they were ready to depart from Ba Sing Se and they were saying their farewells, she noticed that Zuko seemed unable to remove his gaze from Katara, almost as if he were afraid of never seeing her ever again. He surprised her when he wrapped his arms around Katara, when he seemed uncomfortable doing that with anyone else. And when she encircled her arms around him, he not only drew her closer to himself, but held her to him for a while, almost like he did not want to let her go.

Ursa was extremely curious as to what was happening and she could not help the giddiness that wanted to escape at the thought that perhaps her son had realized his feelings for the waterbender she liked so much.

“Zuko?” Ursa asked quietly as she watched his eyes seem saddened even more.

He blinked a few times before he answered her.

“Yes?” he replied.

“Zuko…” she began before she trailed off. Not wanting to perhaps ruin their ‘progress’, she decided to ask something else that had been on her mind since they were reunited. “What…has become of Azula? Where is my daughter?”

Zuko closed his eyes as he tried to find a way to explain to his mother what had become of Azula, his little sister. How was he supposed to give his mother the news that her own daughter had become a horrible psychopathic monster and had lost her mind to insanity? Ursa had suffered so much ever since Ozai banished her from the Fire Nation Palace and he did not want to cause her more pain that the information would surely cause her.

“Let’s go inside,” he said as he waited for his mother to take his arm before he led her away from the darkening sky.

Mother and son were both sitting at the low table in the cabin Ursa occupied on the ship. A few candles flickered around the dark room since night had almost settled in. There was a teapot placed in the middle of the small table and two cups filled with the hot tea sat before them, but neither one acknowledged the tea as one waited and the other prepared himself in order to start the conversation.

“Zuko?” Ursa asked softly as she touched his hand. “Your silence is scaring me. Tell me what has become of your sister.”
The young firebender looked up and saw a worried expression marring her delicate face and he looked away.

“What have you heard about Azula when you were in the Abandoned Fort?” he asked instead.

Ursa frowned as she removed her hand and placed it on her lap.

“I heard that she was an amazing and ruthless warrior and was sent by her father to capture the young Avatar. I know that she infiltrated Ba Sing Se, and with the help of her once banished brother…” Ursa trailed off as she glanced at her son, “she almost killed the Avatar, the last hope for the world.”

Zuko closed his eyes and let out a shaky breath before he nodded for her to continue.

“What else did you hear?”

“Nothing besides the fact that she was almost crowned Fire Lord because Ozai wanted to proclaim himself the Phoenix King. That is basically all I know or have heard of her,” Ursa admitted with a sad frown.

Once more the young man gave a short nod before he interlaced his fingers together and placed them on the table. Zuko sighed and the candles flickered, casting dark shadows across his weary face.

“The little Azula you knew changed. She is no longer the daughter you remember and loved. You, yourself know that she was not a very good child, always taunting me, ordering the servants around, and causing trouble wherever she went. And as she grew up, she only got worse. After I decided to…side with her in Ba Sing Se, I finally saw the person she really was.”

The young Fire Lord’s face hardened and his hands clenched into tight fists.

“You have no idea the things I witnessed while I was at her side. She was a cruel and sadistic person, enjoying others’ pain and suffering. I could never stay to watch, but Mai told me the horrible things Azula would do to torture the war prisoners she captured, claiming it was to extract information on the whereabouts of the Avatar.”
Ursa let out a strangled gasp and covered her mouth with her hand at the words her son was recounting about her daughter. Zuko took hold of one of her hands and held it gently until his mother calmed down so he could continue.

“Azula always wanted to please Father and she was fiercely determined to be his heir and prove to him that she was the better child. She wanted to show him that she was not ‘weak’ like her older brother, and so she showed no mercy and no compassion.” Zuko subconsciously touched his fire crown. “And I must admit that Azula was a very skilled firebender and warrior, she was better than me back then, even as children, if you remember. She was always cool and calculating, almost perfect.

“But that same determination to prove that she was the best was what eventually caused her own downfall in the end,” Zuko continued as a frown appeared on his face. “While Aang fought Ozai, and the rest of the resistance fought Ozai’s soldiers on the day of Sozin’s Comet, I set out to confront Azula and claim my rightful place on the throne as Fire Lord.”

Ursa frowned slightly. This is what she had wanted to hear about ever since she heard that Ozai had been defeated and her son had called off the war. She had been curious to know how her son had claimed the throne, but she had no idea about Azula’s part in it. She worried at the fate of her daughter.

Zuko looked up and smiled despite the depressing topic of the conversation.

“Katara agreed to accompany me to the Fire Nation Palace and seek out Azula. So we both left the Order of the White Lotus’ campsite and rode on Appa until we reached the palace.”

Ursa smiled slightly at her son’s smile, but frowned when Zuko’s smile disappeared.

“When Katara and I arrived, I immediately noticed that something was off about the way Azula acted when she turned her attention to me. I’m not really sure what happened to make her like that, to look so unstable, because when I left Ozai and joined Aang and his group, Azula seemed her perfect and controlled self. But as we came face-to-face I knew she was not as focused as she usually was, she was wild and unpredictable, and so I accepted when she challenged me to an Agni Kai.”

Zuko looked away when Ursa gasped.

“Katara had tried to argue with me about fighting Azula alone, but I did not heed to her words and reassured her that everything would be fine. We both fought fiercely, neither of us willing to lose. As we fought we were an even match, shooting fire at each other with the same strength and skill, which I believe, caught her off guard and made me confident that I would win.”

His hands tightened into fists once again.

“I should have listened to Katara. Azula was too far gone that she broke the Agni Kai rules. She saw that she found a match in me, that I had turned into a firebending master and I was not going to go down so easily, and so, she shifted her attention from me to Katara, who was watching a few feet behind me.”

A look of pain crossed his features so suddenly that it caused Ursa to become alarmed.

“Before I knew it, Azula shot a streak of lightning toward Katara and I knew she would not have been able to survive the sudden attack, even if she used her waterbending,” Zuko whispered lowly.

Ursa gasped again and her hand flew to her mouth.

Zuko closed his eyes, trying to escape the memory of Katara’s shocked and frightened face and the panic he felt at how close she had been to being killed. He was brought out of his thoughts when Ursa shifted nervously in her seat and he continued with his narrative.

“The thought of Katara getting struck frightened me so much that I jumped between her and the upcoming lightning attack, almost on instinct. My only concern was to protect her, but it was too fast and I was unable to redirect it properly, so I was hit on the chest and I fell on the floor in pain and unable to move as the lightning coursed through my body.

“Katara screamed my name and ran to help me, but Azula intervened before she could reach me and attacked her,” Zuko growled angrily and his eyes hardened. “I tried to stand up and help Katara, to save her, but my body was in too much pain.” A small chuckle escaped his lips. “My concern was futile of course, since Katara is a waterbending master. She was the one who actually defeated Azula, you know, she managed to restrain Azula without even harming her.”

Another smile came across his face as his eyes took on a faraway look, gleaming brighter due to the light from the candles’ flame.

“Then Katara ran as quickly as she could to where I laid twitching in pain, calling my name frantically before she knelt at my side. When she saw my wound she…she cried for me,” Zuko said softly as he moved his hand to the covered scar, rubbing it gently. “Then she healed me with her soothing element and her soft hands while silent tears ran down her cheeks, smiling once she realized I was okay and I was going to live.”

Ursa smiled at her son’s gentle expression and was again convinced that her son and the waterbender were meant for each other before she looked down at her clasped hands.

“And Azula? What happened to her afterwards?” she asked quietly.

Zuko blinked and the contented expression disappeared before he looked away.

“I was right when I noticed that there was something wrong with her.”

Reaching out, Zuko grabbed one of his mother’s hands and sighed.

“Azula…lost her mind. She became insane and wild, attacking everybody that came near her, screaming and cursing at everyone. I had her locked away from where Ozai is currently imprisoned. Some place where she cannot hurt anybody or herself.” Zuko gently squeezed his mother’s hand. “That is all I have to say about her.”

Ursa closed her eyes and a few tears escaped down from the corner of her eyes.

“My poor Azula,” she whispered wretchedly. “If only I had been there for her. If only I could have helped her, maybe she would have turned out differently. Oh, I have caused both of my children so much pain!” she cried out as she tried to move her hand away from her son’s grasp, but Zuko refused to let her go.

“No, Mother!” Zuko exclaimed sternly as he kept a firm hold on Ursa’s hand. “It’s not your fault, but Ozai’s. Everything that has happened to us, to you, to me, to Azula, is his damned fault!”

Zuko embraced his sobbing mother as she cried into his chest and he wondered if perhaps he should have not told her the truth. He was glad he left out the part where Azula had cackled maniacally with triumph and glee when she thought he, her own brother, had died when he had fallen and Katara had cried.
The young man held his mother for a long time until she finally pulled away from him, dabbing her tears with the sleeve of her robe before she finally raised her head to look at her concerned son.

“Thank you, Zuko, for telling me everything. Even though this news is something I did not wish to hear and it pains me, it helps me to finally know the truth and stop wondering what has happened to Azula.”

Zuko nodded gravely as he looked away to stare at the melting candles. He closed his eyes and his hands once more clenched into tight fists.

Remembering his encounter with Azula brought back the panic and fear he had felt at the thought that Katara could have died, that he would not have been able to see her blue eyes looking at him ever again, that he could have lost her forever. The young Fire Lord’s eyes snapped open as understanding came to him, as insight settled in his mind.

Is it possible that I had feelings for Katara since back then? Was the reason I had been willing to sacrifice my life and die for her was because I was already falling in love with her?

Zuko touched his chest again where the evidence of his affection for her rested, where Katara had used her healing abilities on him while she cried for him, and where his heart continued to beat strongly.

His heart seemed to say yes.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Aang sighed as he bent a small ball of air between his hands before he threw it toward the darkening sky. He had left the training area a few hours ago where Bumi was showing Toph how to ride Flopsy, his frightening-looking but gentle beast. They had help Bumi with some disputes among his people a few days ago and now Aang was sitting cross-legged in a small garden that belonged to the grand palace of Omashu, feeling lonely and depressed.

The young monk remembered the times he had gone in search of Katara over at Ba Sing Se in order to spend time with her and maybe receive lots of hugs and kisses, but to his disappointment, he had always found her in Zuko’s company, discussing the compromise or other things. Ever since they had visited the Fire Nation it seemed that Katara had no more time for him, but instead spent all of it with the young Fire Lord, and he would be lying if he said he was not jealous. Even Momo seemed to prefer being with Zuko!
Aang frowned as he let out a puff of air from his mouth. He knew he had no reason to be feeling such things since Katara and Zuko were friends and he could not stop them from talking to each other. He was sure Katara would have gotten very angry if he told her to stop spending so much time with Zuko, but he could not cease the angry thoughts that their closeness could make them fall for each other as more than just friends.

Unless it’s too late…he thought before he shook his head angrily at the idea.

“Hey, Twinkletoes, what’s got you so depressed?” The voice of his former earthbending sifu reached his ears.

Aang lifted his head to watch Toph make her way toward him with her usual grin on her lovely, pale face. The young earthbending noblewoman was now clean after her training and was wearing a long-sleeved, dark-green dress that reached her knees with a black sash around her thin waist. Her small feet were lacking footwear as usual. Her dark hair was pulled up into a simple bun with her long bangs almost covering her cloudy, lime-colored eyes that were framed by long dark lashes.

Aang knew and admitted—at least to himself—that Toph had grown into a very beautiful young woman, though her rough and blunt attitude did not disappear as she matured. Perhaps to others her brash attitude might seem unattractive and offensive, but he found it endearing and amusing…most of the time. Especially when it was not directed at him. Of course he only had eyes for Katara and he loved her, so he only saw Toph as a great friend.

Blushing at his thoughts, he finally remembered she had asked him a question.

“What makes you think I’m depressed?” he asked her in a false cheery voice.

Toph sighed and rolled her eyes as she sat next to him.

“Come on, Twinkletoes,” she huffed. “After spending all these years with you, I think I know you well enough to notice that something’s wrong. You haven’t once begged me with that annoying, pleading voice of yours to ride the mail slides since we arrived in Omashu!”

Aang smiled at her words as he glanced at her before he lifted his eyes to the sky. It was true. Except for maybe Katara, Toph seemed to know him better than anyone else since they had traveled together through the Earth Kingdom these past few years. She probably knew him better than he knew himself.
“I’m waiting,” Toph said impatiently as she crossed her arms over her chest and began to tap her fingers on her arm.

Letting out a resigned breath, Aang frowned at her as he tried to say what was plaguing his mind and making him uneasy.

“It’s just that…” he trailed off and sighed. “I-I don’t understand what’s going on with Katara.”

Toph raised her eyebrows.

“What do you mean?” she asked in a casual tone as she dug her toes in the soft dirt.

“Well…Katara spent a lot of time with Zuko ever since we first got to the Fire Nation. I’d see them together all the time, either talking or just sitting by each other,” he said as he ran a hand down his bald head.

“So?” Toph snorted. “Sweetness can’t spend her time with other people now?”

“That’s not it!” Aang exclaimed, frustrated. “She’s my girlfriend, and instead of spending her time with me talking, going out, or just sitting quietly together, she’s always with Zuko! I’m the one who has to seek her out when I want to be in her company! She never comes to me anymore, she always goes to Zuko!”

Toph remained silent after the airbender’s outburst, wondering if perhaps he had figured out what was going on between the Fire Lord and waterbender. She could detect the hurt and jealousy in his voice as easily as the ground shaking due to his emotions.

“I sense there’s something else that’s bothering you besides the fact that Katara doesn’t spend a lot of time with you, as much time as you think a girlfriend should,” she said in a deadpanned tone. “Isn’t that right, Twinkletoes?”

She heard him heave a huge sigh before she felt him stand up.
“I…I don’t know why, but…” Aang trailed off again as another sigh escaped his lips. “I sometimes can’t stop myself from thinking that perhaps there’s something more going on between Katara and Zuko…or that at least Zuko has other intentions towards Katara besides friendship.”

“Oh? And what makes you think that?” the earthbender asked as she brushed her bangs out of her eyes.

The agitated airbender shifted uneasily as he hesitated in answering.

“I noticed while we were in Ba Sing Se that Zuko would stare at her a lot—you have no idea how much—and he would smile with her more than he would anyone else. And sometimes I’d see some kind of emotion behind his eyes that I’ve never seen him direct at anybody else.”

Aang gritted his teeth as he continued.

“Did you know that when we were on Zuko’s flagship, Katara and he sparred? You may ask what the problem with that is, and I’m telling you there’s nothing wrong with that. It’s the part where I came upon them and he had her pinned under him with a look so intense on his face, a look that showed…showed something other than friendship, that it made me so angry,” he said in an irritated tone as he clenched his tattooed hands.

Toph raised her eyebrow and smirked. Wow, seriously? Way to go, Sparky!

“But besides that,” Aang continued, “Zuko was always by her side and only her side. Sure he talked to everybody else, but it was only Katara that he wanted for company, more than you or Sokka or even Iroh. And then every time I asked Katara if she wanted to take a walk with me or something she would tell me that she couldn’t because Zuko needed her,” he growled angrily.

“So you’re mad because you see Zuko as the one who’s keeping Katara away from you?” Toph rolled her eyes at his childish whining.

Aang scowled at her even though she couldn’t see him.

“No, I just think that he shouldn’t be around Katara so much. She’s my girlfriend and if he wants somebody to keep him company or help him, he has Mai!” he bit out.
He closed his eyes and took a deep breath in order to calm himself down. Toph waited silently for him to continue.

“You know what?” he said in a calm voice after a few moments of silence. “Don’t pay attention to what I said. Zuko is a great friend and Katara loves me, so there’s no reason for my thinking this way. Katara would never hurt me.”

He turned away from Toph and began to make his way to the stables.

“I’m gonna go check on Appa and Momo,” he muttered.

“But what if your suspicions are right?” Toph asked quietly as she continued to play with the dirt with her toes. “What if they liked each other more than friends should?”

What if they love each other?

With his back to where the young girl sat, Aang stopped at her words and clenched his hands tightly.

“I rather not think about that because I don’t know what I’ll do if that ever happens,” he stated between gritted teeth before he continued on his way.

Toph lay back on the ground and sighed. Aang was her friend and she cared for him a lot. He was kind, funny, and gentle, and from what she had heard from many girls, he was a handsome young man. She felt herself flush at the thought before she let out a small snort.

Because of him, she was given the opportunity to leave her home, which felt more like a cage—a golden one, but still a cage—and travel around the world. Because of the lovable monk, she was able to master her earthbending and realize her metalbending abilities. Because of Aang she was able to find the person she really was and become the independent woman she always wanted to be.

But there were times he frustrated her beyond reason, times that made her want to bash her head on a stone wall—or better yet, bash his.
She knew Aang could see that there was something going on between the young Fire Lord and the waterbender, but he was deep in denial, refusing to give up his feelings for Katara and acknowledge the possibility that Katara may love another and not him. There was a part of her that wanted to point it out to him, but she knew that he would not believe her.

Toph only hoped that once Katara and Zuko finally stopped being so damn stupid and admit their damn feelings, Aang would peacefully step aside for their happiness and for his own damn good.

But somehow she had a feeling that it would not be so damn easy.
The darkness seemed to surround them as they solemnly walked down the cold stone passageway of the prison tower. The few torches that aligned the walls flickered as they passed, making both Zuko’s and his guards’ armor glint eerily. The only sounds that reached their ears were their footsteps and the low voices of the prisoners that had moved back into their cells when news that the Fire Lord had arrived spread.

Zuko’s face was set in a hard, grave expression as he and his small group followed behind the captain of the prison guard to the deepest part of the prison tower. Jee and Zuko’s two personal guards were walking silently behind him. He glanced down to his left and frowned at his mother who stared straight ahead with an unreadable expression on her face.

They had barely set foot on land and the first thing Ursa had wanted to do was confront Ozai. Zuko had refused such an idea vehemently and had almost ordered Jee to use force if necessary to take his mother into the safety of the palace, but when she insisted that she needed to see her former husband, he had no choice but to relent.

The young Fire Lord was a bit wary about how the people of the Fire Nation would react to Ursa’s reappearance. He still did not know who had sent his mother that strange letter and he was anxious at the thought that the same person might try something to prevent his mother from staying with him. He pondered over the idea that perhaps it could have been Ozai himself who sent the note, even if it seemed impossible. There was no way Ozai could have done it, being locked up in a secured prison and all. Still, he needed to be alert and cautious at all times.

Zuko had explained the situation about why Ursa disappeared as well as the strange letter to his trusted admiral, and so he appointed Jee as Ursa’s personal guard until he could find someone else that he could trust to fit the job of protecting his mother. Jee had readily agreed and appointed his second-in-command to be in charge of his ship for the time being.

Ursa had refused to be followed around everywhere and treated like a helpless child, arguing that she had lived and survived all by herself for almost more than ten years, but in the end she had reluctantly agreed in order to ease the mind of her son, whom she knew already had so many things to worry about.

The sound of heavy footsteps echoed in the silent corridor as they continued on their walk even as the darkness oppressed them. Before long, they came to the large, steel door at the end of the deep corridor. Ursa watched quietly as her son nodded at the guards posted at either side of the cell before he inserted the key he produced from his pocket to unlock the thick door. Ursa squinted into the dark entrance before glancing at the grave face of her oldest child.
“I will go in first,” Zuko said as he briefly glanced at Jee who stepped closer to Lady Ursa with a solemn face.

Returning his attention to the prison cell, Zuko straightened himself even further as he took a few sure steps into the dark interior. He could hear the former Fire Lord shifting in the cell as he remained perfectly still in the dark cell room. After a few more minutes of silence, Zuko produced a small flame in his palm and lit the small torch that rested near the only door in the room.

As soon as the torch lit the small cell, Ozai’s dirty face became visible; a cruel smile on his lips as he sat casually against the wall. Zuko regarded his disgraced father with a cold expression as he clasped his hands behind his back.

“Why, Zuko,” Ozai began as he ran a hand through his long and tangled hair, “I thought you weren’t going to visit me anymore after I told you what you wanted. I am truly touched.” He sneered.

Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“Believe me, I would have preferred not to see your face again,” he replied coldly.

Ozai laughed as he moved from his sitting position to lie on his side on the stone floor with his head propped up by his hand. A picture of absolute tranquility. Zuko was not deceived.

“That only makes me assume that you failed in your search to find Ursa,” Ozai commented and chuckled cruelly. “Or perhaps you did find her, but she wanted nothing to do with you.”

“Quite the contrary, I waited years to see my son again,” a soft feminine voice interrupted.

Ozai’s laughter died in his throat as he looked to the door where the newcomer was making her way through, her long dark hair swishing behind her and her small hands clasped together before her. Ozai’s golden eyes widened and he quickly sat up straight.

“Ursa!” Ozai exclaimed before he jumped to his feet, his eyes softening as they landed on his former wife.
“Hello, Ozai,” Ursa greeted, her voice devoid of any emotion as she stepped up next to her son.

Jee appeared next and placed himself just behind his charge as he glared at the disgraced Fire Lord.

Zuko watched as Ozai’s eyes widened even more as some kind of emotion flickered across his face before it disappeared almost instantly. Zuko narrowed his eyes as his father continued to stare hard at Ursa before the prisoner looked away with a haughty lift of his chin as he returned his attention to Zuko.

“Well, I see that you’re not a complete failure then,” Ozai taunted as he began to stroll casually inside his prison cell. “So if you managed to bring her here, it means that—”

“That I know everything now,” Zuko interrupted angrily. “I know what happened on the night Azulon died and why. I know what you made Mother do and I know that it was you that took her away from Azula and me!” his voice rose in volume at the end as he glared angrily at his sire.

“I did what I had to do to gain the Fire Nation throne,” Ozai said with a sigh, flicking his greasy hair over his shoulder before he turned to glare at his son. “You should be grateful that because of me, you have the privilege of being Fire Lord!” he barked.

Zuko’s glare intensified.

“But not at the price of bringing harm to my mother,” he growled out lowly.

Ozai stiffened minutely before he turned away to continue strolling in his prison cell. Ursa placed a hand on her irate son’s arm and took a step forward. She shook her head when Jee tried to follow her before she turned her gaze to her former husband’s back.

“I am not here to argue with you about how you made me murder your father and leave the comfort of the palace in order to save my son’s life,” Ursa began as she took another step closer to the cell bars.

Ozai stopped in his pacing when she began to talk, but made no move to turn to face her or acknowledge her words.
“I’m here to tell you how... angry I am that you actually had the nerve to harm Zuko when he was just a young boy! I am irate at what you have done to make Azula what she is now!” Ursa yelled, her eyes narrowing as her slender shoulders began to shake due to her emotions.

Zuko stared at his mother in shock for he had never heard her shout before or seen her so livid in all his life. She had always been so calm and poised. He looked at the silent form of his father and noticed that Ozai had visibly stiffened at the resentment in Ursa’s voice. It seemed that his father had never seen her show her anger so strongly as well.

“I am furious that you lied to my children and told them I was dead! I’m enraged that you kept them away from me!” Ursa continued as she reached the cell bars and gripped them tightly with shaking hands. “But most of all I am livid that you made me believe my own son hated me!”

A sob escaped her lips as angry and sorrowful tears began to fall from her eyes and she pressed her forehead against the cold bars.

“How could you do this to us, your own family?” Ursa’s heated words turned into an anguished whisper. “Why? Why did you hurt us so? Why did you make me believe that you actually held some sort of affection for me? That you would never harm me?”

Zuko was about to move forward to reach his distressed mother, but he froze in surprise when Ozai spun around, raced to the cell bars, and fell to his knees before Ursa. Zuko actually gaped in shock when Ozai’s uncaring features melted into a pleading expression.

Could it be that he still has feelings for her? Zuko thought, reeling at the possibility of such a thing. If he did, then why did he do such awful things to her? Why did he harm her so? His hands clenched at his sides. I would never harm Katara in such a way, even for all the power and riches in the world!

“Ursa, please forgive me!” Ozai exclaimed as he looked up from where he was kneeling. “I never intended to go so far! I never intended to cause you so much pain!”

Zuko and Jee stepped forward when Ozai reached up to grasp the crying woman’s hands, but Ursa snatched them away before he could actually touch her. She took a few steps back as she quickly wiped the tears from her face, glaring at the man kneeling before her.

“But you did,” Ursa replied in a low voice as she straightened herself. “You did hurt me. And you caused me even more pain by hurting my children. I cannot believe how stupid I was for believing you were a good man, for believing in your lies.”

“Ursa, please,” Ozai pleaded as he reached for her. “Just hear me out—”

“No!” Ursa snapped. “I do not want to hear any more of your lies! Any excuse you give me will not make me help you get out of this prison. I just came here to tell you how much anger I hold towards you and how much I despise you. This is the last time you will see me because I do not want to see you ever again.”

Ozai’s head dropped in defeat, his long dark hair covering his face from their view. Zuko glanced at his admiral and gave him a nod. Jee moved forward and touched Ursa’s arm in order to lead her away. The noblewoman spared one last glance at the man she had once loved before she slowly turned around and followed Jee out of the prison cell, wiping the last of her tears from her face. Zuko glared at the defeated form of his sire before he turned to follow his mother and Jee.

“This is not over, Ursa,” Ozai’s voice reached their ears before they left the cold, dark room.

They all looked back to see him stand up, his hair still hiding his face and his hands clenching the iron bars harshly. His head snapped up and he glared at Zuko and Jee with cold and furious amber eyes before they landed on Ursa.

“I will reclaim you and the throne, one way or the other, Ursa. Mark my words.”

The soldiers standing guard at the grand gate that lead to the magnificent Fire Nation Palace immediately opened the huge double doors as the Fire Lord’s carriage came into view. Servants and guards stood at attention as the carriage pulled up alongside the long flight of stairs before the entrance to the palace.

Coming to a stop a few feet behind the carriage, Admiral Jee dismounted from his komodo rhino, handed the reins to one of the stablemen, and waited for the Fire Lord and Lady Ursa to make their appearance.

The carriage driver jumped down to open the door and moved aside with a bow as the Fire Lord stepped down from the carriage. As soon as they saw their lord, the servants and guards bowed and greeted him, straightening when he acknowledged them with a brief word. A few servants had already walked over to grab their lord’s belongings, ready for his return since Zuko had sent a messenger hawk with a note announcing his arrival that same morning.

Zuko turned from his guards and servants to help his silent mother step off the carriage before hooking her arm under his as he led her up the long flight of stairs that led into the Fire Nation Palace. After surveying the area carefully, Jee quickly fell in step behind the Fire Lord and Lady Ursa.

Zuko looked over at Jee and nodded at him as the older firebender walked a couple of feet away from Ursa before looking down at his mother worriedly. Ever since they had left the prison tower and Ozai behind, his mother had not said a word.

As soon as they reached the entrance to the palace, Zuko fixed his golden gaze on his servants as they formed a line in front of him before he addressed them firmly.

“This is Lady Ursa, my mother, and she has finally returned home. Make sure she is comfortable and I expect her to be respected,” he said without any further explanations.

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko,” the servants answered as one before they bowed in respect and obedience.

They all quickly bowed to her since in deference to their lord’s wishes.

Zuko called Jiao to come forth as the servants moved away and resumed their tasks, speculating amongst themselves. The younger servants were confused since they had believed Lady Ursa was dead and they looked at the tall noblewoman curiously. The older servants began to whisper and murmur amongst themselves as they recognized Lady Ursa. They were amazed to know that she was alive and they remembered that she had always been a kind mistress.

“Jiao, you will be assisting my mother as you did with…Lady Katara,” Zuko said and a sigh escaped him before he mentally shook his head at the longing that arose once more as he said the waterbender’s name.

Jiao kept her eyes down as she bowed to the noblewoman.

“It will be my pleasure to assist the mother of my lord,” the young servant said sincerely.
“Thank you,” Ursa said in a tired voice before she added, “Wait. I remember you. You are Little Jiao who used to bring me flowers to my bedroom while your mother tended to me.” She smiled and both Zuko and Jee relaxed. “Where is your mother? I do wish to see her again.”

Zuko politely looked away and Jee looked down at his boots as Jiao lowered her head even further to hide her sad eyes.

“She passed away a few years ago, Lady Ursa,” the young maid answered softly.

“Oh, no. I am so sorry to hear that,” Ursa said sadly. “Your mother was a great woman and my best maidservant.”

“Thank you,” Jiao replied.

Zuko cleared his throat lightly as he addressed his mother.

“Let’s go to the royal family wing, so we can freshen up before dinner.”

They walked down the golden halls with Jee and Jiao trailing after them as they made their way to their rooms. Ursa looked around herself and smiled at the bittersweet memories that came to her of a time in her life when she once had been blissfully happy as well as blissfully ignorant of what kind of man she had married.

Zuko kept a close watch over his mother as she looked around the palace with a sad expression as they walked. He remembered the words his father had said and narrowed his eyes. Ozai was mad if he thought Zuko was going to allow him to harm his mother again and reclaim the throne. Though he wondered how Ozai intended to carry out his plan since he was securely locked away. His comments were most likely all bluster.

They watched as an elderly man rounded a corner, and when he saw them, he paused before he strode towards them with a smile on his face, his long white hair swaying behind him.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” Chao greeted as he made a bow. “I am glad to see you again. It is good that you have returned. I hope General Iroh is doing well,” he said sincerely. He smiled at Jee who gave a short nod in greeting.
“Thank you, Advisor Chao, and yes my uncle is quite happy in his teashop right now.” Zuko graced his advisor with a smile. “Were you able to handle things in my absence?”

“Yes, my lord, with the help of Enlai and Jian, the Fire Nation was taken care of while you were away,” the advisor reported.

Zuko nodded before he turned to Ursa and touched her arm.

“Advisor Chao, I would like you to meet my mother, Lady Ursa. Mother, this is Nobleman Chao, my most trusted advisor and one of Uncle Iroh’s closest friend.”

The advisor bowed again.

“It is an honor to finally meet you, Princess Ursa.”

Ursa smiled and gave him a small nod of her head in acknowledgment.

“I am glad to meet another friend of Iroh’s,” she said.

Chao smiled before his expression turned solemn as he returned his gaze to the young man before him.

“My lord, I do hate to interrupt your time with your mother, but a situation has come up that needs your immediate attention, thus the reason I had summoned you unexpectedly.”

Zuko’s face hardened before he gave a sharp nod.

“Assemble my advisors to the meeting room immediately,” he ordered.

Chao cleared his throat before he shifted in his place.
“The Court Council members know nothing, my lord. It has only come to my attention.”

Zuko frowned in confusion, but Chao gave him a look that said it was something that should be discussed privately.

“Hm, I see. Wait for me in my study then. I will be there shortly,” Zuko ordered.

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko,” Chao obeyed as he gave one last bow to the royal members of the Fire Nation before striding away.

“I hope is nothing serious, dear,” Ursa said with a frown as they continued on their walk to the royal family wing.

As they entered the guest wing, Zuko discreetly glanced at the room where Katara had stayed on her last visit and he briefly closed his eyes as he remembered the way her small body felt when he had carried her into the room and how he had reacted to seeing her laying in her bed. Again, he wondered how he could not have noticed his real feelings for her at that moment.

The long corridor merged into the next hall—the royal family wing. Instead of turning right to where his bedchambers were located, Zuko made a left, hardly aware that Ursa, Jee, and Jiao were walking with him.

He had not been to this side of the wing since he left the palace to join the Avatar. His and Azula’s childhood bedchambers were in this part of the long corridor along with other rooms that were meant for any members of the royal family, but none of these rooms have been used for a very long time. Zuko slowed his steps as he passed his childhood bedroom before he looked away and continued in his long strides.

A couple of rooms down there was a door that was more elegantly decorated than the previous ones had been. Both mother and son did not spare a glance to the room that Ursa used to share with her husband before she had been forced to leave the palace and before Ozai had ascended the throne.
Zuko had not passed—much less entered—anywhere near that room since he was told his mother had died. Ursa was also silent as she gracefully walked down the familiar corridor beside her son to the private chambers that would have been hers had she stayed when Ozai became Fire Lord.

At the end of the elaborate hallway with the golden pillars and beautiful adornments, opposite to the Fire Lord’s grand royal suite, was the Fire Lady’s bedchamber. It was bigger than the other rooms on this side of the wing, but smaller and slightly less impressive than the Fire Lord’s royal bedchamber.

The Fire Lords and their wives have had separate rooms as long as anyone could remember. There were many different reasons for this; one being that most—if not all—of the marriages were for political reasons and some couples could not bear being close to each other since they were practically strangers.

Another reason was that the wives could not stand being anywhere near their husbands’ concubines. The harem was the room closest to the Fire Lord’s corridor and suite. The Fire Lord would be the one to visit his wife’s chamber if he felt like sleeping with her in order to take a respite from his concubines or if the need for an heir arose.

When Zuko became Fire Lord he gave Ozai’s concubines a choice of either returning to their homes or remaining in the palace and working as servants. Surprisingly, most pledged their loyalty to him and decided to stay, since it was their families who had given them to Ozai in the first place, often to advance to higher positions within the Royal Court.

Zuko had ordered the harem chamber to be remodeled and presented it to Iroh as his room for whenever the retired general visited so he did not have to sleep all alone in the dark and empty part of the royal family wing. It was also so they could be near each other like they had been during Zuko’s banishment.

Ursa grew uncomfortable as they neared the Fire Lady bedchamber. She had at first considered herself lucky because she shared a room with Ozai when they had first been married and he was always there every night. He had been such a wonderful husband in the beginning and she had fallen in love with him instantly.

But after she gave birth to Azula, Ozai’s true colors emerged. He became ambitious, selfish, and demanding and began to neglect her, returning to their room at night less and less. It had been Jiao’s mother who had confessed to her that Ozai had concubines of his own in Azulon’s harem, and when she confronted him about it, he heartlessly told her that he would not give them up for her.

She had been devastated. Her heart broken. The love she had felt for him began to diminish until she only felt a small amount of affection for him. And then that affection disappeared when he forced her to murder his father then ordered her out of the palace and leave her children behind in order to save their son.

Ursa shook her head to rid herself of the painful memories and the words he had told her last in the prison tower.

“Zuko, where are we going?” she asked quietly.

Her son turned towards her with a confused expression.

“To your room, Mother,” he replied, stopping when Ursa shook her head.

“No, my son, I do not wish to live there. I would prefer one of the other rooms,” she said.

Zuko frowned as he turned to face her. “But Mom—”

“That room does not belong to me,” Lady Ursa began before he could say anything else and smiled as she added, “The Fire Lady’s royal bedchamber belongs to your future Fire Lady and wife, my son.”

Zuko closed his mouth, clenched his hands, and looked away.

“Very well,” he replied impassively before he nodded at Jiao. “Prepare the first room at the entrance of the royal family wing for Lady Ursa as well as the room next to it for Admiral Jee.”

“Yes, my lord.” Jiao bowed and left to do her lord’s bidding.

Zuko looked at his mother who had a questioning eyebrow raised at him.

Resisting the urge to look away again, Zuko said, “I have to talk with Chao. Admiral Jee will accompany me for a while, but he will return shortly…” He smiled at her. “Would you like to see the Royal Palace Garden afterwards?”
Sitting in his grand chair in his study, Zuko glared at the small scroll in his hand as he reread it a third time. Chao and Jee sat quietly before Zuko’s large desk with worried faces as they waited for the young Fire Lord to speak.

We demand that you release Ozai from prison immediately for he is the rightful heir to the throne. He is the one who is capable of ruling and guiding our great nation to the rise of power that will never be accomplish by your pathetic rule of justice and peace between the other lowly continents and elements.

If you do not heed our words and release Ozai, our future Phoenix King, then we will do it ourselves. Be careful, young Zuko, because you will never know when we will strike. It could be in a few days, a few months, or a few years. We will be watching.

Zuko crushed the thin paper with his left hand and set it on fire as he slammed his right fist on the wooden desk.

“Does anyone else know about this?” Zuko asked darkly as he looked up at Chao.

The old advisor shook his head.

“I don’t think so, my lord. A small boy came up to me with the sealed scroll as I made my way home. He told me he had been paid to deliver the letter to me, saying I was to read it and give it to the Fire Lord immediately. I asked him if he knew who had ordered him to give me the scroll, but he said that he did not know for the man wore a cloak on with the hood covering his face.” Chao continued, “I thought it was best that no one knew of this, thus why I sent you that message saying there was a problem in the Royal Court in case it was intercepted.”

Zuko nodded approvingly before he narrowed his eyes as he stood up from his seat. He walked over to the large window behind his desk and gazed outside where he could see his private garden from a distance.

He watched as leaves fell from the trees and twirled in the air before they landed on the ground, reminding those who watched that winter was close. Zuko sighed. How he wished life was not so complicated and that at that moment he could be enjoying his private garden with Katara in his arms. Shaking his head from such thoughts, the young man finally spoke.
They are foolish if they believe I would release one of the most dangerous men in the world just like that. Do they think I would cower in fear because of their little threat and fall into their wishes?” Zuko scoffed before turning around and taking his place at his chair again. “Double the guard duty on Ozai’s cell and corridor as well as the ground below where his cell is located. If whoever wrote this letter is serious they will not succeed easily.”

“Perhaps they are bluffing,” Jee spoke up as he rubbed his chin pensively. “There are not many who still support Ozai anymore, and besides, how would they be able to break him free with so many highly trained guards and soldiers around? It would be a suicide mission.”

“Hm, perhaps you’re right, Admiral Jee, but I will not take any chances. Even if their supposed attack is not real I want to be prepared,” Zuko stated as he began to look at some of the papers that had begun to accumulate on his desk, but decided to instead write a letter to Iroh to reassure him everything was fine.

“I will see that more guards are posted at once before I return to my duties in standing guard of Lady Ursa,” Jee said as he stood up and bowed.

Zuko nodded as both older men made to leave.

“Chao. Jee,” Zuko called without looking up. “I believe it is best that no one knows of this. I don’t want to cause any unnecessary panic if this turns out to be an idle threat.”

“Certainly, my lord,” they said as they bowed and exited the Fire Lord’s study.

Sighing heavily, Zuko dropped his head into his hands before picking up his ink brush to begin writing to his uncle.

Katara pulled the hood of her parka up as the fresh, frosty breeze danced around her, slightly stinging her face with the cold temperature, making her cheeks and nose turn a warm pink.

If only Zuko were here to warm me up, she thought with a grin before she blushed and shook her head.

Their ship glided lazily on the currents as it neared the retaining wall that separated the Southern Water Tribe from the wide ocean. She glanced to her right where Sokka was embracing Suki from behind with both their hands on her swollen belly. Katara smiled when she caught Sokka’s eye and he grinned back. How they both missed their arctic homeland.

After leaving Ba Sing Se, Katara, her brother, and her future sister-in-law all agreed that it was time they returned home and give news of the upcoming wedding between the future Chief of the Southern Water Tribe and the Captain of the Kyoshi Island Warriors. As well as news of their baby. Aang had given them a ride on Appa to the nearest Earth Kingdom port not long after Zuko had departed. From there the trio boarded a ship that was heading to Kyoshi Island.

They had spent a few days at Suki’s home while the island celebrated the approaching marriage of their beloved captain and the water tribesman as well as the upcoming birth of their first child. Suki then had appointed a new captain to look after her warriors and her village since she had reluctantly agreed—after much begging from her future husband—to stay with Sokka in the Southern Water Tribe after they married.

A few days later, they boarded another ship, which was now currently making its way to the southernmost part of the globe.

The guards in watch of approaching ships waved from their positions on the small towers on top of the impressive wall and motioned for the ship to halt. Sokka stepped up to the front and called out to them to open the wall and allow them passage. Once they recognized Chief Hakoda’s children and the Kyoshi Captain, the waterbending guards split the solid, frozen wall into a vertical line moving it sideways before the small ship proceeded to enter, a few white waves trailing after it as it chugged along the dark blue sea.

Hakoda walked swiftly with his mother and her new husband following as they made their way through the crowd that had gathered beside the ship, watching as the passengers disembarked.

“Dad!” they heard Katara call out. “Gran-Gran, Master Pakku, over here!”

The three looked up to see Katara waving at them enthusiastically as she descended the ramp that had embedded itself on the soft snow.

“Katara!” Hakoda greeted excitedly as he took a few steps forward and enveloped his daughter in a big hug. “We’ve missed you so much.” He looked down at his youngest child that reminded him so much of his beloved wife and smiled.
Katara laughed as she moved away from him to embrace her grandmother who had her arms opened wide for her to receive a warm hug.

“I’ve missed all of you, too! And yes, that includes you, Gran Pakku!” she giggled at her former waterbending teacher.

Pakku crossed his arms over his chest and snorted, but Katara saw his thin lips turn up into a tiny smile.

“So how was your time in the Fire Nation?” her Gran-Gran asked.

“It was great!” Katara exclaimed happily.

“So were you able to help Fire Lord Zuko find his mother?” her father asked.

He had been curious ever since Katara had sent them a letter saying that the young Fire Lord had finally found out the whereabouts of his missing mother and the whole gang had decided to help the young man.

They watched as Katara’s smile grew even wider.

“Yes. Zuko has finally been reunited with Lady Ursa. He was very grateful for our help,” she said and looked down as her cheeks warmed at the memory of the way Zuko had thanked her the last night of a full moon where he had accidentally come across the lake while she bathed.

“Where’s your brother?” Hakoda asked, oblivious to his daughter’s thoughts.

“Huh? Oh...uh...he’s helping Suki get down the ramp,” Katara explained as she looked back at the vessel.

Her small family turned to the small ship and watched as Sokka led the young woman down the ramp with one arm around her waist and the other holding her hand. Katara grinned as she noticed Suki’s annoyed face at being handled like a fragile doll.
“Oh, my,” Gran-Gran whispered as she watched her grandson lead his girlfriend—a girlfriend with a rather large stomach—toward them.

“Hey!” Sokka greeted cheerfully as he approached his silent family.

Suki walked nervously beside him, afraid of what his family’s reaction would be when they heard the news that they were going to have a child out of wedlock. Katara gave her an encouraging smile and the pregnant warrior straightened herself.

“Sokka.” Hakoda smiled as his son gave him a hug. “I’m glad you’re back,” he said and grinned, “Now I can have a few days off while my future successor takes over a few problems that have come up.”

“Sorry, Dad,” Sokka said with a chuckle, “but you’re just going to have to wait for that vacation because Suki and I are going to be very busy.” The young tribesman wrapped his arm around Suki and brought her close to his side as he looked at each of his family members.

“Dad, Gran-Gran…Gran Pakku.” He grinned when the old waterbender snorted at the name. Sokka brought a hand down to Suki’s bulge. “Say hello to my future wife, the woman I love and the one who is currently carrying my son.”

“Or daughter,” Suki added with a small smile.

“Or daughter,” Sokka amended with a sheepish grin.

They waited nervously as the family remained silent for a while before Kanna stepped forward with a serious expression on her wrinkled face. She took Suki’s face between her hands and stared into her eyes. Suki shifted uneasily, but held the old woman’s unwavering gaze. Kanna pulled down the collar of the warm parka the female warrior had on and the shiny, green necklace around Suki’s pale neck glistened in the soft light of the sun.

“This goes against our marriage traditions,” the old woman began solemnly as she looked down at Suki’s large stomach, evidence of her pregnancy, before she turned her grave gaze to her grandson.
Both Suki and Sokka blushed, but the young man squared his shoulders and cleared his throat.

“I know, but I love Suki and I will marry her,” he said determinately. He tightened his hold on Suki as if making sure she would not be taken away from his side.

Hakoda and Pakku shared a look before they looked over at the silent and grim-faced older woman. Katara began to bite her lip and the expectant couple held their breaths as they waited for Gran-Gran to speak.

“Even though it may be viewed differently in your village, giving yourself before marriage could bring you great hardships,” Kanna began sternly as she stared at Suki.

The young couple stiffened at the hardness in the old woman’s voice and they both instinctively brought their hands toward their unborn child.

“But…” the woman continued and her voice softened a bit, “we all know that you are a great leader to your people and we know as well that you truly love my grandson.”

Kanna took another step forward and smiled as she enveloped them into a hug.

“Welcome to our family, Suki of Kyoshi Island.” She touched the swollen stomach. “Welcome, both of you.”

They all let out a sigh of relief. Hakoda gave out a joyous laugh as he drew his son into a bone-crushing hug before carefully embracing his future daughter-in-law who was carrying his first grandchild. Pakku smiled and congratulated them, but made no move to hug either. He did not like such mushy stuff. Katara clapped her gloved hands happily and grinned.

“Come,” Gran-Gran ordered as she began to usher them all in the direction of their home. “We have no time to waste! We have a wedding to plan!”

They laughed as they all made their way to their house with Sokka attached protectively beside Suki.

After his mother retired to her room for the night with Jee trailing after her, and the servants cleared the table in the anteroom where the three had taken their meal, Zuko entered his bedchamber. He placed his fire crown in its box before entering his impressive bathroom.

He removed his clothing and his boots, setting them aside, as he filled the tub with water from the faucet. He dipped one hand into the cool water, heated it up with firebending, before he submerged himself into his large black marble tub. He sighed contentedly as the warm water relaxed his tensed muscles.

He had a hard time convincing Ursa that it was not a good idea to visit Azula after her visit with Ozai, explaining that if Azula saw her supposedly dead mother, it could make her condition worse. Of course he did not mention that the first and last time he had visited her, Azula had cursed him for taking their mother’s love and screamed her hatred for him, uttering so many vulgar expletives that even a seasoned sailor would have blushed.

He sighed. Gods, his family was so messed up.

Zuko grabbed the unscented bar of soap and rubbed the soft sponge on it, before replacing the soap on its spot.

He did not know what to make of the anonymous letter he had received and he seriously hoped it was not a real threat. He already had to deal with the problems he was presented daily from his country, as well as the troubles that the raiders were causing in his colonies, and now his concern for his mother’s safety and Ozai’s last words. He did not need another thing piled onto his long list of worries.

Muttering irritably about how unfair life was, Zuko scrubbed his body with the sponge to clean himself of the dust that had accumulated during his long journey.

He smiled as he remembered the awed and grateful look his mother had given him as he showed her the new and restored private garden before she patted his cheek happily when she spotted her rosebushes. She smiled as she became acquainted with the new turtle-ducks before commenting about how large and beautiful the pond was with a small knowing smile on her lips.

Zuko had to look away to hide the blush that threatened to invade his cheeks, knowing full well that he somehow subconsciously had the pond expanded because he had a feeling Katara would have loved it if she ever visited the palace one day—which she did, of course.
His mother’s previous words about giving up the Fire Lady royal bedchamber for the future Fire Lady surfaced in his mind and a long sigh made its way out of his mouth. Zuko closed his eyes and rested his head at the edge of the marble tub as the steam from the warm water danced around the grand bathroom.

How was he supposed to explain to his mother that he could no longer see himself with a wife because the only woman he ever truly wanted could never be his? What would she say if she knew that the woman he wanted as his future Fire Lady was Katara, the love of his life?

Yes, he wanted Katara as his wife. He wanted to marry her, to share his life with her. He knew he had said many times before that he was not ready to get married and did not need a wife any time soon. But now that he understood that he was truly in love with her, he admitted to himself that he would marry Katara in an instant without hesitation.

But if by some miracle Katara agreed to become his wife, he would certainly not need nor want Katara to sleep in the Fire Lady room. She could have the bedchamber as a recreation room for her to relax in or something if she wanted to, but Katara would only sleep by his side in his room every day and night, sharing with him the same room and the same bed...which will be used for many things besides sleep of course.

Zuko’s eyes became slightly glazed and his lips curled into a large grin before he shook his head and splashed water on his face.

But what was the point, really? Even though he wished for all this to come true with all his heart, he knew it was hopeless. Katara would never be his wife and all he was doing was torturing himself with such thoughts, fantasies, and hopes.

Sighing at the pain in his chest, Zuko finished bathing and dried himself off before he returned to his bedroom. Putting on a pair of dark sleeping pants, the young man sat at the edge of his massive but lonely bed and stared at the fireplace as the flames danced and the wood crackled.

Would he ever find happiness?

_~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The waves gently lapped at his ankles as he soaked in the warm rays of the sun high above the clear sky. Not one cloud obscured his view of the blue heavens, blue like the eyes of the woman he loved and desperately wanted.
Zuko breathed in the fresh, salty breeze that blew from the ocean and listened to the soft crashing of waves in the distance as he laid upon the white sand of Ember Island, which was unusually soft, not all at grainy or gritty.

He vaguely wondered when he had returned to Ember Island, but he found himself not caring how he did or why he was there since he liked where he was. There was an explosion of water coming from the ocean, and Zuko sat up on his elbows to see what was happening, but the sea was calm as ever, the waves still crashing gently on the shore.

He raised an eyebrow when something dark appeared on the surface of the water and he squinted to make out what it was. He frowned when he realized it was the top of a head and he wondered if perhaps it was an unfortunate person that had drowned.

Suddenly the figure sprang out from the water, flipping wet, long dark-brown hair back, which caused dozen of droplets of seawater to fly in every direction that sparkled brightly due to the strong sunlight, revealing a beautiful face with azure eyes and a bright smile.

Zuko gasped as Katara began to swim away from the ocean, smile still in place. He watched dazedly as Katara rose from the water as she neared the shore, her steps slow and graceful. Her throat appeared first and then her shoulders, her hair clinging to the side of her cheeks and her tanned shoulders.

His breath caught in his throat when her breasts surfaced from the water—disappointed to find out they were covered by a dark-blue piece of cloth—followed by her flat, lean stomach, then her curvy waist, rounded hips, which he also noticed with disappointment were covered as well, before her long, brown legs emerged. Water fell seductively slow down her arms, stomach, and legs and sparkled from the warm rays of the sun.

Zuko swallowed hard and he felt the front of his bathing shorts tighten as Katara began to make her way to where he was still resting on the sand propped up on his elbows. Her eyes never once left his gaze with that breathtaking smile still adorning her sweet face.

He opened his mouth to ask her what she was doing, but his throat felt dry when she dropped herself next to him, water splashing onto his heated skin.

“Zuko,” she whispered softly as she reached a wet hand to his face.
Relaxing back onto the soft sand, Zuko sighed and closed his eyes at her touch before they snapped open in surprise when he felt her straddle his hips. Eyes wide, he watched as she smiled at him again before she began to run her hands down his face, his shoulders, and down his chest. He groaned softly when she started to place light kisses on his chest as she continued to caress his skin with her soft hands. He gasped when she suddenly ground herself against his erection.

Oh Agni.

He growled her name when she began to move against him, alternating between fast swivels of her hips and hard, slow grinds. His breathing accelerated as pleasure erupted within him at her movements. Grabbing her hips, he lifted his own up and ground back against her. He watched with satisfaction as she moaned his name and threw her head back.

He pulled on her hair to bring down her head and kissed her warm lips, smirking when she let out a soft moan. Holding her hair with one hand, Zuko squeezed her hip once with the other, earning another soft noise from her, before he touched her firm bare thigh, as he continued to kiss her. Katara moaned again as he reached the hem of the small blue piece of swimwear as he sought to touch her warmth where he wished to bury himself in...

A loud knock at the door brought Zuko out of his fantasy and he bolted upright in his huge bed, sweat running down his forehead, heart pounding, and erection throbbing painfully. He cursed when the ocean scenery disappeared and he took in the familiar surroundings of his royal bedchamber.

Damn it! he yelled in his head. It was just another dream! Why couldn’t it be real?

Now that he was reassured that his erotic dreams were not only based on pure lust alone, but combined with the love he felt for Katara, Zuko no longer felt so ashamed of himself for dreaming such things about her. In fact, he even fantasized about different erotic scenarios with Katara during the day before he realized what he was doing.

Another loud knock resounded in his bedchamber, reminding him that it had been that sound which had so rudely interrupted him.

“What is it?” Zuko growled, glaring daggers at the door, wishing he could murder whoever was on the other side for disturbing his dream with Katara. And just when it was about to get good, too!

“Fire Lord Zuko?” the youngest of his personal guards asked uncertainly. “The meeting with your “What?” Zuko growled. “The meeting is not until noon!”

He flopped back down onto his back with an irritated sigh and wondered if he could pick up where he had left off so he could take care of his morning erection.

“Um…it is noon already, my lord.”

Katara stared at her reflection as she brushed her long brown hair before the small mirror on her dresser. A month and a few weeks had passed since they had returned to the Southern Water Tribe and they had all been busy planning and setting up the upcoming wedding that had everyone in the Tribe excited.

However, she was still a bit miffed that the people did not care much that Sokka had impregnated a woman without them being married. But if one of the Water Tribe women was found out to be with child out of wedlock, she would be mistreated and possibly exiled. It was so unfair and she hated it, but there were just some things she could not change about her culture. She let it go though, because she was happy for her brother and his fiancée and glad that Suki wasn’t being looked down upon. Besides, there was nobody or nothing she could fight against to take a stand.

Aside from the wedding, the people were bustling about for the arrival of the Fire Lord, setting up rooms for him, his mother, and his uncle at Chief Hakoda’s large home. Some were excited at the thought of getting a glimpse of the new Fire Lord who was friends with their chieftain’s children and the one who had ended the war, but others were nervous and wary about having someone that used to be their enemy in their homeland. Both siblings tried to reassure them that Zuko was good and different than when he first came to the Southern Water Tribe, but old habits and prejudices die hard.

Sighing, Katara placed her brush down and lifted the silver rose hairpin that sat on the dresser. Months had passed since Zuko had given her the beautiful trinket and she had not even worn it once. Not only was she afraid of damaging it or losing it, but she had this strange feeling that she wanted to used it for the first time on a special occasion, to show Zuko how much she appreciated his gift.

The memory of their spar on his flagship began to play in her head and a silly smile appeared on her face. She remember how she had laughed at him when she fell on him before he rolled them over and he pinned her beneath him, his warm body pressed so close to hers, his breath caressing her face. Katara slowly ran one of her fingers over her bottom lip as her skin began to warm at the memory.
Why was Zuko looking at me with such an intense expression? I wonder what he would have done if Aang had not interrupted us, she thought hazily. Would...would he have kissed me? Would that kiss have led to something else...?

She blushed at her thoughts and shook her head. Stroking the silver pin gently, Katara gazed down at it as a small frown appeared on her brow.

She let her mind wander back to the last night they had stayed in the Earth King’s palace, the night where Jet had accosted her. She shuddered at what could have happened if Zuko had not arrived. Deep down she knew Jet would not have actually harmed her, but that still did make her forget the disappointment and anger she felt toward Jet for pushing himself on her the way he had.

But it was not Jet or what he did—or tried to do—that had her remembering that night. No. It was Zuko and the strange way he had acted when they had made their way to the palace garden as well as when she healed the small cut on his chest.

The way he looked at her with those golden eyes of his, the way he touched her cheek with that warm hand of his. It was just so tender, so caring, so...loving.

Loving? No, that couldn’t be it, Katara thought with another shake of her head as another sigh escaped her, Zuko said he only saw me as a friend.

Again, that sadness enveloped her as she once more thought about the firebender. She was startled and confused at how much she missed him, to the point where her heart ached and her eyes stung.

She missed his calm demeanor, his smiles, his rare laughs and small jokes. She missed their conversations and their silent companionship. She even missed their small arguments that ended in small spars.

She missed how he could make her laugh at the smallest things and then make her become serious and pensive in another instant. She missed how he could be cool and impassive one moment and then become tender and emotional the next—though she knew he tried to hide it.

But most of all she missed him. She missed his voice, his scent, his presence, his warmth, his comfort. She missed Zuko. She missed him terribly.
Could it be that what I really feel for Zuko is something stronger, something deeper than friendship? she asked herself as she chewed on her lip. Could it be that I am falling for him? That I may be in love with Zuko and not with Aang?

“Katara, honey, stop biting your lip or you are going to chew it right off,” her Gran-Gran’s soft yet scratchy voice made her jump.

“Oh, Gran-Gran,” Katara laughed nervously as she tried to subtly place the hairpin down before turning around in her seat. “I didn’t hear you come in.”

“Yes, I can see that,” Kanna muttered as she eyed her granddaughter carefully, she hadn’t missed her granddaughter’s attention on the hairpin. “We haven’t been able to talk much since you returned, but now is a good time as any.”

“Of course, Gran-Gran,” Katara said with a smile as she stood up and helped her grandmother sit on the chair she had been occupying.

Kanna sighed tiredly as she shifted in the small seat until she was comfortable. “So how is Aang? You have not mentioned him much since you returned.”

“Oh.” Katara frowned guiltily. “Um…he’s fine. The last time I saw him he was heading to Omashu with Toph. He tried to convince me to go with him, but I told him I was needed here.” She sighed. “I think he got upset.”

“Oh? Is that so?” Kanna asked.

“Yeah,” the younger tribeswoman nodded before she furrowed her eyebrows. “Now that I think about it Aang seemed more upset than normal ever since we arrived in Ba Sing Se.” She crossed her arms and huffed. “He would not leave me alone and was always demanding that I spend time with him. He was especially rude to Zuko, practically forcing him to leave every time I was talking to him. If Zuko noticed, he didn’t say anything, but I did and it annoyed me.”

“I see,” the old woman stated as she continued to watch her granddaughter ramble on as she paced around her small room. Kanna decided act on her growing suspicion about her granddaughter’s true feelings. “Tell me about your time in the Fire Nation. How did Fire Lord Zuko treat you? And what is Princess Ursa like?”
Kanna sat silently as a small smile appeared on her tanned and wrinkled face. She listened as her granddaughter, who reminded her so much of her departed daughter-in-law, began a nonstop narrative about her time in the Fire Nation as well as her travels into the Earth Kingdom.

Kanna was told of how the young Fire Lord took Katara on a walk around his city and treated her to one of the most famous restaurants in the capital. She listened as her granddaughter described the Royal Beach House on Ember Island and the Royal Palace Garden with the beautiful flowers and the large pond with a sparkle in her eye. She was told of how grateful Zuko had been when Katara found his mother and how kind and gentle Lady Ursa was.

And while Kanna sat and listened to the cheerful young woman, she learned what kind of person Zuko was and also that her granddaughter may actually love the young Fire Lord. Though she had her suspicious, Kanna did not want to jump to conclusions or plant any ideas in Katara’s head, at least not until she met this Zuko personally.

Katara wrapped up her long story with a sigh. She had told her Gran-Gran everything—except for the embarrassing and confusing parts—and flopped down on her bed.

Kanna smiled before she looked at the silver hairpin on her grandchild’s dresser. She remembered the wide-eyed expression Katara had as she opened her present and saw the rose hairpin for the first time. The old woman ran a finger on the smooth blue and red stones before she twirled the trinket in her hand.

“This Zuko you speak of sounds so different from the one who burst through our small defensive wall your brother kept vigil at,” Gran-Gran said and chuckled. “He seems like a very interesting person and a good man. I look forward to seeing him again.”

I do, too, Katara thought before she blushed.

“You’ll get to meet him next month at Sokka and Suki’s wedding as well as Lady Ursa, who by the way, would like to try your sea prunes. Oh, and Uncle Iroh is coming, too!” she said excitedly with a large smile.

Kanna smiled. It seemed her granddaughter was getting more and more comfortable with the young man’s family.

How interesting, she mused.
“Well, it seems there is much we have to do for the arrival of the Fire Nation’s Royal Family,” Gran-Gran stated as she stood up from her seat and made her way to where Katara was sitting on her bed. “And about your problems with Aang…” She frowned. “I hope you think really hard about how you truly feel about the young airbender. I know you care for him a lot, but that does not necessarily mean that you have to put up with his antics.”

Before Katara could argue, Kanna placed both her hands on either side of the young woman’s face.

“Katara, my dear, I love you very much and, just like your mother, all I want is for you to be happy. But I can’t help you because you are the one who has to fight for that happiness. I want you to promise me that you won’t make any major decisions until you are entirely sure it is want you truly want. Promise me that you won’t sacrifice your happiness because you are afraid that another person might be hurt.”

Katara frowned as she stared at her grandmother’s eyes that were full of wisdom. She did not understand why her Gran-Gran was telling her all this, but she had her suspicions. She knew she could trust her grandmother, however.

“Yes, Gran-Gran,” she said uncertainly as Kanna continued to hold her face. “I promise to try to fight for my own happiness.”

Kanna pursed her lips, but decided Katara’s answer was sufficient enough.

“Good. I just hope you don’t forget that.”
Two months. Two months had passed since the last time he had seen her. Since the last time he had spoken to her, since he had heard her voice, heard her laugh, since he had been in her calming presence.

Two months had passed since Zuko returned to the Fire Nation and during those two months he had been unable to forget about her…

Katara.

The woman he loved.

Zuko closed his eyes and let out a long sigh as the sound of the turtle-ducks quacking in the serene pond in the middle of his private garden reached his ears along with the sound of the rustling leaves from the various trees that surrounded the place. The last few cherry blossoms fell from the almost bare tree he was sitting under and danced their way to the ground, but he barely acknowledged them as they landed on the grass or on his lap.

The young Fire Lord had thought that by being away from the waterbender his feelings for her would stop or at least lessen as time went by, but it was not so. Instead his fervent feelings for her seemed to have increased the more time he spent away from her.

Again, he thought that perhaps he had always had feelings for Katara, maybe not love exactly, but feelings nonetheless. He spent a long time remembering every single moment he had had with Katara since the first day he had laid eyes on her face four years ago, including all the various times she had come across his path in his search for the Avatar.

He recalled suppressing the heat that had wanted to surface on his face when Jun, the bounty hunter, had insinuated that the beautiful, exotic-looking Water Tribe maiden was his girlfriend. He also remembered how he instinctively had steadied Katara when Jun’s shirshu had skidded to a stop, placing a hand on her back so she would not have fallen and hurt herself. He was sure he would not have done something like that for anyone else at that time.

He also remembered how he had ‘rescued’ her from the pirates, how surprised he was at receiving a small shock when his hands had touched the soft skin of her small wrists. He remembered the sight of her tied up in that tree as he circled her, speaking to her in a smooth and almost seductive tone. He would be lying if he said he did not have some naughty dreams about the tree incident long after it happened.

Another thing he remembered was the thrill that went through him as she fought him in the Spirit Oasis in the Northern Water Tribe with her blazing, blue eyes and confident smirk. That was when he admitted he had found a match in his bending skills. He had felt a bit guilty when he had knocked her out and left her all alone after grabbing the unresponsive Avatar. Something he had not felt for a long time.

Then there was the time under the Crystal Catacombs of Ba Sing Se where he had felt guilt, sorrow, and understanding when Katara had told him she had lost her mother because of the Fire Nation, which then resulted in his confession that he had also lost his own mother.

At that instant, Zuko now knew that he had to have developed some kind of connection or feelings for the waterbender in order for him to reveal such a personal thing, which also explained why he had gone through all the trouble of helping her deal with her mother’s murderer.

His feelings for her also explained why he jumped in front of Azula’s lightning bolt to save Katara without hesitation. Even though he hadn’t admitted to himself, he must have subconsciously known how he felt about her. Even then, he valued her safety over his own. Her life over his. It was a choice he never regretted, even as he was laying there, twitching and writhing in pain. He remembered clearly how his heart had beat so quickly when she put her soft healing hands over his wound. At the time he thought it was just adrenaline from the fight, but now he knew it was more, his heart had raced from her gentle touch.

And now he could not get Katara out of his head. Her image accompanied him everywhere, and as much as he tried to stop thinking about her, he just couldn’t.

She was there when he woke up, when he looked through his paperwork, when he attended his meetings, when he practiced his firebending, when he talked with his mother, Jee, or Chao, when he retired to his room and fell asleep. And she was also there when he dreamt. And oh, how wonderful was the dream he had the previous night! Even thinking about it made his blood boil and his loins burn! He had been so painfully aroused that he had to take care of his state himself. Again. Self-gratification was something he rarely ever indulged in, because he thought he had more control over his body than that, but it seemed it was becoming a frequent thing since Katara came back into his life.

Zuko opened his eyes and scowled halfheartedly at the pond and at the innocent, little turtle-ducks that swarm near him.
He did not know what to do and he honestly felt pathetic, sighing over a girl like a lovesick kitten-puppy! He did not like it one bit, but there was nothing he could do about it, and a part of him admitted that he would not change it for anything.

‘You know what I mean, right?’ Sokka’s question resurfaced in his mind once again, as it had ever since he had left Ba Sing Se. ‘You feel sad and depressed when you’re away from your loved one even for a few minutes, that you feel that you’d die if you don’t see her face? You know what I’m talking about, right?’

It seemed that Sokka was not exaggerating after all, because he felt just as the warrior had said. Well, maybe not the dying part, but Zuko did feel depressed, saddened, and miserable not being in Katara’s presence or looking upon her beautiful face, and there was this strange pain in his chest that would not go away.

The turtle-ducklings quacked at him and swam in circles near the edge of the pond as they waited for a treat, but after the man sitting under the cherry blossom tree presented no food, the little creatures swam away with disappointed quacks.

Unable to suppress the sigh that escaped him, Zuko rose from his place under the shade of the cherry blossom tree. With one last glance at the pond, the young lord began to walk morosely back inside the palace to finish on the paperwork he had been reading before his mind began to wander on Katara, causing him to leave his study. He hardly acknowledged the servants that bowed to him as he passed them by on his way to his study.

“Ah, I see that the Young One also needs his breaks,” Wei’s annoying voice reached Zuko’s ears just as he was about to enter his study. “What is the matter? Is your work too complicated?” Wei asked worriedly, though the smug tone in his voice belied his concerned question.

Zuko gritted his teeth as he resisted the urge to punch a hole on the door in front of him. He was in no mood to deal with the smug, old advisor. Wei had been even more irritating ever since Zuko came back to the Fire Nation that even the other advisors were getting annoyed.

Straightening his shoulders, Zuko turned around and regarded his hated advisor with an emotionless expression.

“Is there something you need, Wei? I have other important things to look into than listen to your taunting,” he said coolly.
Wei put on a hurtful expression as he raised a hand to the left side of his chest.

“Fire Lord Zuko, I do no such thing!” he exclaimed.

Zuko was unable to stop the unconvinced snort that escaped him.

A grin appeared on Wei’s wrinkled face.

“I met your mother a couple of weeks ago as we passed each other in the hallway. Princess Ursa is such a nice and wonderful woman. I wonder how it was that she was said to have been dead.”

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the curious look on Wei’s pasty face.

“It’s a long story that I have no time to recount at the moment,” he replied warily.

“Yes, I’m sure,” Wei responded and grinned again. “I do wonder why Admiral Jee seems to be hovering over her, though. Perhaps there is something going on between them?”

Zuko mentally frowned at the insinuation. He did not like having his mother used against him, even if it was just a taunt.

“Of course not,” the young lord replied imperturbably. “I placed Admiral Jee to keep her company and safe while I’m not around and until I find her another guard. I guess you could say I’m being overprotective since I have only recently been reunited with her,” he said with a shrug.

“Of course, that sounds reasonable,” Wei remarked with a nod.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the older man again.

“Now, if you’ll excuse me I have important documents to go through.” The young man went inside his study and closed the door behind him before Wei could respond.
Gods, how he disliked that man! He had a hard time enduring the irritating advisor’s presence without breaking his neck. Wei always gave him a bad feeling.

_Hmm…? Maybe I should keep a closer eye on Wei, Zuko thought, I will also tell Jee to keep him away from Mother._

Sitting heavily on his cushioned chair, Zuko began to sort the huge stack of papers on his large desk. Luckily, the Fire Nation was running smoothly and no problems had arisen since his return. The Fire Nation was doing well due to the new trade agreement with Ba Sing Se and he was pleased when King Kuei sent him word that his city, most importantly the Lower Ring, was thriving because of the trade and the tourists that had flooded to the city of walls.

Leaning back in his chair, Zuko looked up at the ceiling and frowned. He had begun to wonder if perhaps he overreacted to the anonymous letter he received two months ago. There had been no signs of an attempted breakout of Ozai, but it was best to always be on guard just in case.

He opened another letter and sighed when he realized it was from Mai, telling him that she was not going to attend Sokka and Suki’s wedding in the Southern Water Tribe because she wanted to spend more time with her family. Zuko had a strong feeling the truth was that she just did not want to go since she really did not like his friends and because she never liked the cold weather. He sighed guiltily when he read the part where she wrote that she missed him and loved him, anticipating the day they would see each other again for his birthday.

Placing the letter on another stack of papers, Zuko opened one of the drawers from his desk to retrieve his ink and brush when a rolled up scroll tied with a dark blue ribbon caught his attention. Forgetting the writing instruments for the moment, the firebender grabbed the scroll and unfurled it, placing another small paper that was inside to the side, and read once again.

It was the official invitation for Sokka and Suki’s wedding inviting the Fire Lord and his honored mother to celebrate the marriage ceremony in the Southern Water Tribe that was to take place a few months from now. Zuko picked up the other small piece of paper that came with the scroll, and inwardly chuckled at Sokka’s words.

_I placed this note without Suki noticing, but can you be a pal and bring me some of those addicting fire flakes with you? Thanks, Lord Hotman!_

There was a small picture at the bottom of the piece of paper that Zuko was half certain was Sokka’s attempt of a face eating the spicy treats. Zuko grinned at the warrior’s drawing; he had always been a horrible artist. Setting both letters aside, Zuko reclined in his chair and looked out the window.

In just a few weeks, he and Ursa, along with Jee, Jiao, and his personal guards will leave the Fire Nation and travel to the Southern Water Tribe to attend his friends’ wedding. He had not been to the South Pole since almost six years ago and the circumstances of his first visit had not been pleasant at all. He was a bit uneasy at the thought of what the tribes people would feel at having the lord to the nation that had caused them so much suffering, and the one who had once invaded their home, step into their city.

He guessed it was time that he paid them a visit so they could see he had changed and was different. But most importantly, in just a few weeks he would see her again.

Katara...he sighed.

He was both excited and apprehensive at the thought. How would he react to her now that he knew what his true feelings for her were? He was unsure he would be able to handle seeing her with Aang and he did not know if he could even act like he did not love her. Act like he only saw her as his friend.

Gods! Why was life so damn difficult?

He wondered if perhaps he should send a letter to Sokka saying he could not attend the wedding with some excuse about problems within his country, but he quickly dismissed the thought. He was no coward and he promised Sokka and Suki he would be there when they took their vows.

Besides, a part of him wished—wanted, no needed to see Katara again. Nothing would stop him from seeing her once more. Not even the pain that appeared in his chest when he told himself that she could never be his.

Aang frowned and resisted the urge to blow a puff of air of annoyance when Katara did not respond to his question. She had been staring distractedly at the piece of blue fabric in her hands that was supposed to be a part of the decorations for the wedded couple’s table for a while. It was the fourth time it had happened that day and he was seriously getting tired of it.

He and Toph had arrived from Omashu a couple of weeks ago in order to help with the wedding preparations—well, he helped, while Toph stayed in the chief’s house and lounged around. Ty Lee had hitched a ride with them because she wanted to attend her captain’s wedding and since Mai had refused to attend she was happy for the company.

Aang had been anxious to see his girlfriend again. Two months were two months too long. Katara had greeted him happily, but he was able to detect something was off by the way she acted around him. Even though they had spent a lot of time together, she seemed distant. He did not know what was going on, but he reasoned she was stressed with teaching the children waterbending and helping with the wedding arrangements that had her acting oddly. At least, he hoped that was the reason.

Katara’s eyes would become unfocused and dazed, then she would sigh loudly with a large smile on her face before a blush would stain her cheeks, and he again would wonder what was going on.

“Katara?” he called again, this time shaking her arm gently.

“Huh? What?” the waterbender said and blinked. Katara’s eyes refocused and she noticed that Aang was frowning at her.

Flushing guiltily, she smiled at him as she apologized.

“Sorry, Aang,” she said, “I was a bit distracted. What did you say?”

The airbender’s frown deepened as he repeated his previous question.

“I was asking if you need any help with setting up the canopy.”

Katara looked at the cloth in her hands and then at the ice poles above the table where the married couple was to sit for the feast after the wedding ceremony. The celebration was to be held outside under the blue sky and warm sun—that is if there were no clouds that day.

Four long ice poles rose from the frozen ground and converged in the center with a sparkling ice chandelier hanging in the middle. She had created it after seeing one in the Earth King’s palace. Two long pieces of jade-colored and one dark-blue cloth swung from the ice crystal chandelier, each piece twirling down three ice poles. One pole was still bare and she was currently holding the blue cloth that was supposed to decorate it.
“Oh, uh…yes, I guess I do need help with this one,” she answered with a smile as she passed the fabric to the young monk. “I’d appreciate it if you helped me.”

Aang readily returned the smile as he took the offered cloth and stepped up next to the unfurnished pole, unable to resist her beautiful smile.

As Aang propelled himself upwards with airbending, twirling the blue piece of fabric as he descended, Katara’s smile vanished and she looked away guiltily. She had not even noticed his presence or that he had been addressing her as she held the silky cloth in her hands.

Though the material was nothing compared to it, she could not help but be reminded of the silky, smooth feeling of the red covering on Zuko’s large bed at his palace, his handkerchief, and the warm cloak Zuko had draped over her shoulders to keep her safe from the chilly air.

A wistful sigh escaped her lips as she twirled a piece of her hair around her finger.

Everywhere she looked there was something or another that made her think about the golden-eyed firebender. Ever since they went their separate ways in Ba Sing Se, Zuko had been constantly on her mind and she would completely space out for minutes at a time, wondering what he was doing and if he missed her as much as she missed him. She was really getting annoyed at her brain for distracting her all the time, making her family and friends question her sanity.

When Aang came back, she tried to pay more attention to him and spend more time with him, taking walks around the city and going penguin sledding, wanting to reconnect with him. She tried to keep thoughts about Zuko and her confusing feelings for him away, honestly she did. But just when she thought she succeeded she would find herself thinking about him again without even realizing it until Aang would call out to her.

‘I hope you think really hard about what you truly feel for the young airbender…’ her Gran-Gran’s words floated in her mind.

Did her grandmother mean to imply that what she felt for her boyfriend of four years was not love? Was she trying to tell her that Aang and she were not meant to be?

Katara mentally shook her head. No, that couldn’t be. Aunt Wu predicted that Aang was the powerful bender she was to marry. It was her destiny, wasn’t it? They were supposed to be together, right?
Besides, Aang was sure to be good husband. He was so sweet, kind, and peaceful.

Yeah, those are nice qualities, but what about fierce and passionate? her subconscious decided to put in its two cents.

Yeah, those would be nice, too, Katara sighed dreamily.

I can think of someone who has those two qualities in abundance, the little voice continued.

Hm, me too, Katara thought dazedly as she became distracted with thoughts about a certain handsome firebender whose strong, pale body glistened with perspiration as his golden eyes burned with passionate intensity every time he used his firebending.

Her eyes becoming glassy, she replayed the dream she had two nights ago that woke her up with a racing heart, heavy breathing, and an unfamiliar throbbing between her legs...

Cool, soft snow descended from the heavens, dancing its way down to the white landscape below. Instead of being an ominous gray, the heavy clouds were blindingly white and glowed from the light the sun wanted to pass through. A soft wind blew by, but instead of being cold, it was warm.

Katara smiled as she twirled around in circles as the snowflakes danced around her form and embedded themselves in her hair. She had no clue why she was outside the city walls and alone, but it felt so peaceful that she found herself not caring.

She flopped down onto her back and was surprised to find that the snow was very soft and comfortable. Katara closed her eyes as the gentle snowflakes landed on her cheeks before she felt something heavy settle over her body.

Eyes flying open in alarm, Katara tried to sit up and figure out what was going on, but found herself pressed into the soft snow by a large, warm hand.

“Relax, Katara,” a familiar masculine voice whispered softly. “It’s just me.”
“Z-Zuko? Wha…?” was her intelligent reply as her eyes settled on his burning golden gaze that rendered her unable to move, much less think.

Zuko chuckled softly as he brought a hand up to her cheek before he lowered it to run it slowly down her arm, making Katara gasp softly. Lowering his head, Zuko touched her forehead with his lips and then he kissed both her cheeks before he pulled away with a gentle smile on his face that caused Katara’s heart to stutter.

Without another word, Zuko brought his hand up to her shoulder, down her side, sliding it painstaking slow to her waist before he settled it on her hip. Katara realized that the clothes she was wearing was not her usual winter wear since the fabric was thin, allowing her to feel Zuko’s warm caresses.

Katara shivered at his touch and she let out an almost inaudible moan before a loud gasp fell from her lips as she felt Zuko’s hand travel even further down her thigh then past her knee.

Her breath quickened, her skin began get hot, and a blush appeared on her face as Zuko’s hand did not stop and was now making its way back up her thigh as he once again pressed his lips to her cheek. She knew she should tell him to stop what he was doing and get off of her, but her mouth refused to say the words and her body refused to push him away from her.

“Katara,” she heard him whisper in a deep tone before she felt him place a kiss on the side of her neck, making her let out another soft moan.

She gasped when his hand did not take its previous path up to her hip to her shoulder, and instead, it lingered on her thigh before he began to trail his fingers inward…

The now familiar, but still strange feeling in her lower stomach brought Katara to an abrupt mental stop. A violent blush burned her cheeks that were once cold due to the wintry weather.

Stop it! Katara scolded herself harshly. I shouldn’t be thinking about that!

Fortunately—or unfortunately, depending on how one looked at it—it was just a dream and ended where it did.

Katara looked up as Aang landed lightly on the ground and began to secure the ends of the cloth into a bow. Guilt began to eat at her insides and she had to fight down the urge to run somewhere far away so she did not have to look at Aang’s loving and oblivious face.

Aang loves me. Zuko...does not.

That thought sent an unexpected shot of pain to her heart and she winced. The happy mood she had since the morning changed drastically and she had a hard time putting on a smile when Aang grinned at her as he made his way to where she was standing.

“How does it look?” Aang asked cheerfully as he gestured toward his decoration.

“It looks wonderful, Aang,” Katara replied, even though it looked the same as the other three pieces of cloth. She had to look away as the feeling of guilt intensified to the point that she actually cringed when he smiled happily at her.

Aang beamed at what he thought was her praising him before he blushed as he rubbed the back of his neck.

“Um… Katara? Can I ask you something?” he began and nervously shuffled his feet on the white snow.

“Sure, Aang,” she replied as she pretended to examine their work in order to avoid his eyes. “What is it?”

Aang cleared his throat as he nervously began to stammer.

“I-I just wanted to know…Katara, w-will you m-marry—”

“Katara!” Sokka’s anxious voice startled them and they both turned to see the waterbender’s brother waving frantically in their direction.

“Katara, hurry up!” Sokka yelled as he gestured for her to run. “Suki’s getting pains again and she wants you to help her with your creepy-magical-water-thingy!”
Katara sighed at her brother’s words, but let it slide since she knew he was just panicking because Suki was a few weeks away from giving birth. Turning back to Aang, she gave him a small smile.

“Sorry, Aang, but pregnant women get first priority.” She grinned. “We’ll talk later.”

The young Avatar forced a smile and nodded for her to go attend their friend. He watched as she flashed him one last smile before she raced to her distressed older brother who grabbed her hand and practically dragged her to their home where Suki was currently resting.

Aang sighed loudly and ran a hand over his shaved head. He reached one hand into the pocket of his parka and pulled out a necklace he had purchased in a jewelry shop while they were visiting the Fire Nation. It was a gold chain with a topaz gem hanging from a golden string at the center. He stared at the necklace as it glimmered softly under the weak sun for a moment before he closed his hand over it.

Zuko did not know why he woke up in the middle of the night, and he listened intently for any sign that could indicate why. The only sounds that reached his keen ears were the splashing of the waves against his flagship and the low howling of the wind. When he realized he was the only one in his cabin, his body relaxed and he turned onto his back, staring at the dark metal ceiling above his head.

Knowing he would not be able to return to sleep any time soon, the young man rose from his bed and put on a thick robe before making his way to the door. Zuko slowly walked down the silent metal corridors, passing his mother’s cabin, then Jee’s quarters, before he climbed the stairs that lead him up onto the deck of his flagship. A cold wind bit his face and he shivered slightly before he raised his body temperature slightly and blew warm air into his hands.

They were nearing the Southern Water Tribe and the temperature had dropped drastically. All the crewmembers—except for the navigator and a few guards—were below deck and away from the cold wind and freezing water. Though firebenders could use their inner fire to raise their body temperature, the cold climate was still uncomfortable and they preferred to avoid it.

Just a few more days and they would be entering the wintry southern nation. He wondered how much had changed since the last time he was there, though he had to admit he barely noticed it since he was too busy trying to capture Aang at that time. Katara had told him that Chief Arnook had sent some waterbenders to aid in the reconstruction of their sister tribe and now the city was flourishing. He remembered the way Katara’s sapphire eyes would sparkle as she described her beloved home to him and he found himself imagining the ice city with its soft, blue radiance and clean water canals as he listened to her sweet voice. He was curious to finally see the renewed place where Katara had been born and now lived.
But not as much as you wish to see her, right? a voice inside his head piped in.

Zuko sighed and looked up at the night sky dotted with millions of bright stars, admitting the truth with his silence.

Would this need of seeing Katara and being near her ever go away? He hoped it did for he did not know how he would be able to survive when they had to go their separate ways in life; when he had to return to his duties in the Fire Nation while she stayed in the Southern Water Tribe or married and left with Aang.

Jealousy began to spread through him and his hands clenched at his sides as the feeling clawed at his chest. Yes, he admitted it. He was jealous and he could not stop the ugly feeling even if he wanted to. The knowledge that one day Katara would want to start a family with her long-time boyfriend ate at him.

Zuko gritted his teeth so hard that his jaw hurt at the thought that one day Aang would be touching his Katara in an intimate way. Making love to his woman in the way he desired to do with his whole being! With a low growl, Zuko shot a ball of fire at the quiet night sky before it disappeared as it reached the colder air above.

Yes, his Katara! His, damn it!

Two more blasts of fire were shot toward the sea as Zuko raged, his face contorted into a ferocious snarl.

He wanted to be the one to bring Katara much pleasure in the ways of the flesh, to share with her their love and carnal lust as they lost themselves in passionate bliss! But more, he needed her, he wanted her by his side, and he wanted to make her happy! He loved her! And he was not going to lose her without a fight!

Zuko’s eyes widened at what he had just thought before his enraged face changed into a contemplative expression. Another chilly wind surrounded him, but he hardly noticed it as he became lost in thought.

He knew Aang loved her ever since he first saw her, but four years had passed since their relationship began and Aang had not made a move to propose to her. Sure, it was understandable since Aang was still young, but he could at least have told her about his future intentions to marry her, right?

A small smile appeared on Zuko’s thoughtful face as he pivoted on his heels and began to make his way back to his warm cabin. His footsteps were light and silent even with his heavy boots on thanks to his time sneaking around as the Blue Spirit.

Since Aang had not made a claim on her, so to speak, then that meant Zuko had a chance with Katara. A chance to make her see that he loved her and wanted her as his wife. He was positive she would not agree to it at first, but he would not give up until she at least thought about it. If by some miracle she ever reciprocated his feelings and said yes then he would ask Chief Hakoda for her hand in marriage in that same instant.

A small frown marred Zuko’s features as he entered his room and closed the door behind him. He knew he should break up with Mai first and let her know that they could not be together any longer, but he had no choice but to tell her when they saw each other again in the Fire Nation.

Throwing his robe on the back of his chair, Zuko made his way to his bed and sat down with a sigh. Taking his boots off, he lay back and pulled his warm covers over his body.

A deeper feeling of guilt ate at him at the thought that he would be in a way stealing Katara from Aang, but it did not deter him from changing his mind. Aang was his friend and he really did not want to hurt him, but like they say:

All is fair in love and war.

Right?

The Southern Water Tribe was bustling with excitement as the last details for the wedding were finished. Everyone was busy greeting the people that had been invited and were arriving from different parts of the world. Chief Arnook arrived in a beautiful and graceful ship and was welcomed exuberantly into the city. At first, Sokka had felt awkward at having the father of Yue, his first love, attend his wedding, but the chieftain had been affable and Suki, the love of his life, had been understanding.

Another ship containing villagers and warriors of Kyoshi Island arrived two weeks earlier and Suki was immediately surrounded by her beloved warriors and friends. King Bumi had sent a letter apologizing that he was unable to attend the wedding since the cold weather was not so good for his health, but he did send large amounts of sugar crystals as a gift for the couple. Haru had also sent a letter with congratulations, excusing himself from the event since he was still busy teaching earthbending in the Fire Nation colonies.

Chief Hakoda’s grand home was filled with endless chatter as the important visitors took residence in the guest rooms. Kanna, Katara, and a few other women were kept busy as they accommodated the guests and prepared the meals.

The tribes people had been surprised, and a bit wary, when the Dragon of the West arrived a week ago, but they were quickly won over by Iroh’s wise words and charming personality. Especially the women. They all had a laugh when the tea-loving old man began to flirt with Kanna and then he had to reassure Pakku that he was just teasing when the old waterbending master threatened to encase him in ice.

Making her way over to the defensive ice wall with quick and excited steps, Katara smiled and greeted the few people she passed by. Winter had arrived and the fresh patch of snow of the previous day made the city sparkle.

She stopped when she reached the dock and immediately began to scan the few ships that were docked. A disappointed sigh fell from her lips when she realized that no new ships had arrived and that none of the current ships was the one she was looking for in anticipation. With one last look at the docked vessels, Katara turned around and began to make her way back to her home, this time in a more sedate pace.

Her warm boots kept her from sinking into the soft snow that had fallen during the night as she strolled along the clean, white streets of the Southern Water Tribe. A few canoes floated leisurely up and down the wide canals with passengers from visiting cities taking in the sights with awe. Early risers crossed the bridges as they talked amongst themselves.

The waterbender lifted her head as her house appeared before her, but instead of walking straight to it, she turned to her right and made her way down another street until she came upon a small path where few people went. She climbed a small bridge, and with a heavy sigh, leaned against the frozen edge of the bridge carved with beautiful designs. Peering over the edge, Katara frowned into the calm water that flowed under her.

Every day for the past few months, she had made her way to the dock in order to be one of the first people to greet Zuko and Lady Ursa when they arrived, but every day she went back home with a sad and disappointed heart when she realized that they were not there.
What is taking them so long? she asked with a huff. The wedding is tomorrow and they haven’t arrived!

She stared at the blue water below her as if it would tell her what was going on before a thought popped into her head that caused her eyes to widen.

What if they’re not coming to the wedding? And if they’re not coming, then I won’t see Zuko!

Katara squeezed her eyes shut as her heart gave a painful clench at the thought. She shook her head.

No, they will come! Zuko promised, and being the honorable man that he is, he will keep that promise.

But that thought did not comfort her like she hoped it would. She had been waiting with eagerness to see him again, to be in Zuko’s company again. She had been thinking of him, dreaming of him ever since they left Ba Sing Se and she missed him so much that the possibility of him not attending the wedding upset her greatly.

Perhaps when she saw him again her feelings of longing would go away. She needed to see Zuko again so she could finally understand what it was that she really felt for him, as well as what she felt for Aang. What if what she felt for Zuko was just a physical attraction and nothing else? It would be foolish of her to jeopardize a good relationship just because of lust.

Another frown appeared between her eyebrows at the thought of Aang. The airbender had been constantly proclaiming his love for her while he showered her with small gifts, telling her that he was always happy at her side. She would thank him and blush at his comments and affections all the while ignoring the remarks others made about a second upcoming wedding. A few years ago, she probably would have been happy at the thought of marrying Aang, but now...now she was not so sure. Not until she was certain about her feelings regarding Zuko. It was unfair of her to keep thinking about another man while with Aang.

Katara sighed as her thoughts returned to the young Fire Lord. Folding her arms on the edge of the white bridge, she leaned against it and placed her head on her forearms. Again, she wondered why Zuko had not arrived yet and the uneasiness began to spread inside her.

“Katara, my dear, is something the matter?” Iroh’s calming voice floated to her restless mind. “Miss Toph has told me that you’ve been depressed lately.”
The young woman lifted her head when she felt a comforting hand on her back. Katara looked up into Iroh’s concerned but kind face.

“I’m fine, Uncle Iroh, really,” she replied as she straightened herself out. She tried to smile to reassure him, but the retired general just raised an unconvinced eyebrow.

“I’m just tired from my waterbending lessons and helping with the wedding,” she tried again.

“Yes, that must be it,” Iroh said, though by his tone he conveyed that he did not believe her.

When Katara did not respond, he decided to change the subject.

“May I ask why you left the house so early in the morning, my dear?” he asked curiously.

Katara looked up into the clear sky and smiled sheepishly when she realized that it indeed was a bit early in the morning to be out. Iroh smiled at her expression before he rubbed his hands together.

“My, it sure is cold here,” Iroh commented and chuckled cheerfully, sensing she did not want to answer the question. “I probably would have frozen to death if your lovely, wonderful grandmother had not given me this warm parka.” Smiling, he pointed at the red-colored winter wear he had been given when he had arrived.

Katara giggled, wondering if the jolly, old firebender liked to compliment her Gran-Gran so much because he liked to get Pakku riled up.

“Do you think Zuko would be able to stand the cold?” Katara asked with a smirk.

Iroh laughed.

“Of course he will! Zuko’s a strong young warrior, he could handle this weather.” A grin appeared on his face. “Besides, I’m sure that hot temper that resides just below the surface will keep him warm and cozy,” he said and chuckled affectionately.
Katara giggled again before she looked down at her hands.

“That’s if he’s even coming,” she said more to herself.

Iroh frowned.

“What are you talking about, Miss Katara? Of course Zuko’s coming, and Ursa as well!”

Katara looked away to stare at the ocean she could see at a distance.

“Then why haven’t they arrived yet? The wedding’s tomorrow!” she exclaimed in a tone full of exasperation and concern.

“It is unusual that Zuko is late in arriving, but I’m sure there is an reason for his delay,” Iroh reassured her.

“You think so?” Katara asked hopefully.

Iroh managed to turn his giddy grin into a small smile at the happy expression that came over the young woman’s face.

“I know so.” Iroh nodded as he patted her shoulder. “Just you wait.” A gleam appeared in his eyes as he smiled at her. “There is something here that I’m sure Zuko is anxious to see again.”

And that something is standing before me, the wise Dragon of the West added mentally with a grin.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” Jee bowed as he addressed his lord. “We will arrive in the Southern Water Tribe in about an hour.”

Zuko looked up from his tea to acknowledge his admiral while Ursa turn around to smile at him. They had been sitting in Ursa’s room, enjoying some calming tea when Jee had knocked on the door. and entered to give them the news. Jiao sat quietly near Lady Ursa and waited for her lord to speak.

“I’m glad to hear that, Admiral Jee. Thank you,” Zuko said sincerely as he placed his teacup down on the low table. “Make sure the crew is ready for arrival.”

“Yes, my lord,” the admiral answered as he turned to make his way back on deck before Zuko’s voice stopped him.

“Oh, and Jee?” Zuko called out coolly as he took another sip from his teacup, “Remind the crew once more that they are to behave properly and civilly when we enter the Southern Water Tribe. Any complaints about their improper behavior will not be tolerated. We are guests, and as such, we will be respectful to our Southern hosts. Understood?”

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko. I will remind them immediately,” Jee agreed as he bowed and left the room. When he did not need to keep an eye on Lady Ursa, which was whenever she was with her son, Jee commanded his crew like he always did as admiral of the Fire Lord’s flagship.

“I am so glad that we have finally arrived,” Ursa said with a smile as she looked away from the door to where her son sat across from her. “I was beginning to worry that we would not make it to the wedding.”

“Indeed,” Zuko agreed with a nod.

They would have arrived at the South Water Tribe a week ago had it not been for the wild storm that had appeared out of nowhere and without warning. The storm had lasted for a long time and the wind and sea had been so fierce that when the storm passed the passengers on the ship found themselves off course, thus making their journey to the Southern Water Tribe longer.

“I am excited to see the renovated great nation of the Southern Water Tribe,” Ursa commented as she picked up her teacup. “Katara always talked about it with much fondness.”

Zuko smiled since he had been thinking the same thing days ago before he looked out the small window with an inaudible longing sigh.

Ursa turned her head to the side where Jiao sat quietly with a smile on her face.
“You helped Lady Katara while she stayed in the Fire Nation Palace, didn’t you, Jiao?” she asked.

“Yes, Lady Ursa,” Jiao replied with a nod and her smile widened a bit. “Lady Katara is a very kind, friendly, and nice young woman.” She inclined her head at them as she continued, “I must thank you, my lord and Lady Ursa, for bringing me with you since I’ve always wanted to see the Water Tribes, and I do wish to see Lady Katara again.”

Zuko smiled kindly at her and acknowledged her gratefulness with a nod.

Ursa patted the young servant’s arm and smiled.

“Of course, Jiao,” she said as she turned to her son. “But you are not the only one who wishes to see Katara again. Am I not right, my son?”

Zuko suppressed the grin that wanted to appear on his lips and instead answered with a simple, “Yes.”

When his mother smiled at him with what seemed like a knowing look, Zuko turned his attention to the young servant girl.

“Jiao, please prepare our belongings for our arrival,” he said as he stood up. “If you’ll excuse me, Mother, I have some things I need to look after before we arrive.”

“Of course, dear,” Ursa said with the same knowing smile on her face as Jiao walked across the cabin and opened the steel chest to pack the noblewoman’s clothes.

An hour later, the mid-morning sun found Zuko standing upon the front of his flagship as it neared the impressive protective wall of the Southern Water Tribe. A small smirk appeared on Zuko’s lips as he remembered the pathetic little wall Sokka had kept vigil at…which had been easily destroyed by his small metal ship.

He glanced at his mother, who was standing beside him with Jiao at her side, and frowned deeply. The heavy robe his mother was wearing was still not warm enough since she kept shivering and sniffing. He knew he should have made her wear another robe over the one she was currently
A cold wind blew by and he shivered under the robe and armor he was wearing. If he was cold, then he couldn’t imagine how his mother and Jiao felt in this weather since both women were non-firebenders. Maybe he could purchase one of those parkas the Water Tribes were famous for once they were finally permitted entrance.

He watched as a lookout spotted them before the man made a signal, which then alerted the other guards to take up posts on the edge of the wall in order to make sure this Fire Nation ship was friendly. Zuko nodded at Jee who then signaled to his men to stop the ship in front of the wall.

“Who goes there?” a deep voice spoke from one of the watchtowers. “State your business.”

Jee followed a step behind his lord when Zuko moved forward. The older firebender noticed that a few of the guards recognized who he was since he sometimes brought them goods from the Fire Nation. The admiral glanced at the two women who stood a few feet behind them and frowned at the uncomfortable look on their faces before he returned his attention to his lord.

Zuko held up a hand in greeting as he looked up at the man who had spoken, assuming he was the one in charge of the guards.

“I am Fire Lord Zuko and I have come to attend my friends’ wedding ceremony,” he stated regally. “I would appreciate it if we were allowed entrance into your great city.”

He hid a smile when the man’s eyes widened and he gaped as the rest of the guards gasped and began to murmur.

“R-right away, Fire Lord Zuko!” the man croaked before he turned around and shouted, “Open the wall and let them through!”

Those who had not visited the Southern Water Tribe recently stared in awe as the thick frozen wall was split in half by waterbenders before the divided pieces were moved aside to reveal the entrance into the southern nation. With another signal from the Water Tribe guards, the ship started again and made its way through before the frozen wall was pulled back to its original solid state as soon as the ship passed.
Zuko barely noticed the other ships that aligned the dock as his eyes widened in astonishment and admiration as he took in the sight of the city before him.

This sure isn’t the same little village I remember, Zuko thought as his eyes darted in every direction.

Instead of a few huts and igloos, there were actual structural buildings, stretching for miles in every direction. They were neatly placed beside each other in a symmetrical pattern, which Zuko remembered Katara had told him had been Sokka’s idea, along with the canals and the defensive wall. The frozen walls and roofs of the white homes sparkled under the sun as well as the clean blue water that flowed through the canals. Zuko could see bridges that connected one street to the next. It was just the way Katara had described to him so many times before.

The city was forgotten the moment Katara entered his head, as she took all his focus and attention. Zuko’s heart began to pound in his chest in anticipation and he had to clench his hands in order to keep himself from jumping off the slow moving flagship and swim to shore so he could see her already. He wanted to see her so badly, to take her in his arms, to kiss her until her lungs burned for air!

Okay, maybe he was getting a little ahead of himself with the kissing, but that still did not stop him from wishing these things could happen.

“It is beautiful,” Ursa whispered softly, making Zuko come back to reality.

“Yes, it is;” he responded in agreement.

He glanced to his other side and noticed that Jee was looking over the side of the ship. Zuko followed his admiral’s gaze and finally noticed the people standing by the docks. A few of them were actually cheering and waving at them, but most stood stiffly to the side with wary expressions on their faces.

Perhaps they remembered the way he had arrived the last time? The young Fire Lord grimaced slightly.

Zuko scanned the docks in order to get a glimpse of Katara smiling at him with those big, blue shining eyes of hers looking up at him, but as much as he strained his eyes, he could not spot her. He watched curiously as the crowd parted with hushed murmurs before he straightened when Chief Hakoda stepped through the crowd with Sokka and Aang walking beside him.
Hakoda stopped near the edge of the crowd, watching patiently as the large steel Fire Nation ship glided through the water until it stopped near the dock and the crew moved back and forth to secure it. He could hear Admiral Jee’s voice barking orders to the crewmembers. He had not seen the young man who had helped his son rescue him from the Boiling Rock since he was crowned Fire Lord and he was curious to again meet the man who was spoken so highly of by his son and daughter… especially his daughter...

Hm... he mentally mused with a small frown. Actually, he had wondered a couple of times if his daughter might like the Fire Lord as more than a friend, but that couldn’t be it. Could it?

The chief was brought out of his thoughts when the crowd’s hushed murmurs became a bit louder and he looked up just in time to see the steel ramp of the ship being lowered to the snowy ground, a puff of white snow flying to the sides at the impact. His people waited with bated breath for the occupants of the ship to come down for they were all curious to see the leader of the nation that once had been their enemy.

A tall figure emerged at the top of the ramp along with whom they recognized as Admiral Jee along with two unknown women as well as a pair of guards. They watched as the tall man stopped for a moment to take in his surroundings before he began to descend the ramp in a dignified way. A collective murmur escaped from the large crowd at the dock.

The man was wearing shiny, black armor etched in red with black pointed boots. On his right hip was a sword sheath holding two sword hilts glinting under the sun’s rays. His raven-colored hair, which contrasted with his pale skin, was pulled into a short topknot where the fire crown rested, glinting brightly to all who saw it.

The Fire Lord arrived at the bottom of the ramp, his booted feet sinking a bit in the snow, but he stood perfectly straight with a stoic expression on his young face on which they could see his distinctive scar on the left side. There was something about him that immediately commanded their attention and respect. Another murmur sounded throughout the crowd at the tall man’s slanted golden eyes that seemed to pierce right through them.

Hakoda smiled when he looked around at the shocked expressions of his people and was positive the young Fire Lord had unknowingly stolen a few hearts among the young women. He grinned when said women sighed wistfully with big, adoring eyes and he could have sworn he saw small little hearts floating in the air above their heads. He chuckled to himself at his thoughts before looking back to the Fire Lord who now stood with Jee and two women, and the two guards a few feet behind them. Hakoda smiled as he made his way over to them with an excited Sokka and a silent Avatar at his side.
Zuko scanned the crowd again for any signs of Katara and sighed inwardly in disappointment before he returned his gaze before him as Chief Hakoda began to walk toward them. He smiled when Sokka grinned at him, but quickly averted his eyes from Aang who was also smiling at him, but with less enthusiasm. Zuko moved his eyes back to the chieftain as Hakoda stopped a few feet in front of him. The crowd became silent as their leader began to address the Fire Nation ruler.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” Hakoda greeted as he made a bow. “We, the people of the Southern Water Tribe, welcome you to our home.”

Zuko returned the bow respectfully as he responded sincerely.

“Thank you, Chief Hakoda. It is an honor to have been invited into the Southern Water Tribe.”

Both men straightened and smiled. Hakoda noticed—a bit in displeasure—that the younger man was slightly taller than him before he dismissed the thought as he greeted Jee, who smiled and nodded at him.

“Damn, Zuko!” Sokka exclaimed as he stepped up to clap Zuko’s back. “We were beginning to worry that you decided not to come!”

Zuko grinned slightly.

“I forgot that the Water Tribes’ weather could be unpredictable at times,” he said amicably.

Sokka laughed as he once more clapped Zuko’s back. The crowd murmured at the comfortable friendship between their future chief and the young Fire Lord. Aang just smiled and said a quick greeting, but made no move to approach the firebender, causing Zuko to frown, though he understood.

Hakoda watched the interaction between his son and Zuko with interest and was reminded of the time when they had escaped the Boiling Rock on the war airship. Then he looked to Zuko’s left where a tall, elegant lady stood as well as a younger woman he was sure was a maidservant. He noticed that both their noses and cheeks were pink from the cold.

“Chief Hakoda,” Zuko said as he noticed the man’s stare, “this is my mother, Lady Ursa.”
“Ah, yes,” Hakoda said with a smile and bowed. “My daughter has told me so much about you, Lady Ursa. It is an honor to have you here as well.”

Ursa smiled, trying to return the bow under the heavy robe she was wearing.

“Thank you, Chief Hakoda,” she replied gracefully when a small sneeze interrupted her. She blushed. “Excuse me.”

Hakoda laughed softly and waved her apology aside.

“Ah, please forgive me! What kind of host am I, letting my guests freeze to death?” He laughed again before he motioned for them to follow him. “Let’s go to my home so you can all warm up.”

“So did you bring what I asked you to, buddy?” Sokka whispered to Zuko when his dad turned around.

Zuko smirked again as he replied in a whisper as well.

“Yes, though I wonder if I should have since fire flakes always give you stomachaches, and with the wedding being tomorrow and all…” He chuckled inwardly when the young warrior scowled at him.

The crowd parted once again as they let the group pass through, their murmurs continued even as they disappeared. Different reactions and feelings—some good and some not so good—were expressed amongst themselves at the appearance of the young Fire Lord.

As he followed Chief Hakoda, Zuko admitted that the buildings were even more beautiful up close since he could see the elegant designs carved masterfully on the surface of the walls and doors as well as on the edges of the bridges.

It's pretty, but nothing can be compared to the magnificence of the Fire Nation's architecture, he thought with a small smirk.
They walked in silence down streets and over bridges, passing more people who stopped to stare or glare at him, but Zuko barely paid attention as he again wondered where Katara could be and when he would be able to gaze upon her face again. He turned to see his mother in a conversation with Jee before he looked at Sokka who was talking to Aang. He wanted to ask Sokka where his sister was, but he kept his mouth shut since Aang kept throwing strange looks at him.

No matter. He would see Katara soon enough when they arrived at Hakoda’s home. He just had to be patient…something he still needed a bit of work on…

He watched as Aang left in a hurry after telling them he was going to look for Katara, and Zuko tried to suppress the jealousy that once again rose within him before he was thankfully distracted by Sokka who asked him about the Fire Nation treats again.

Katara laughed when Iroh began to sing some kind of song about love and the seasons as they made their way back to the large house. His voice was not that of a great singer, but his cheerful demeanor made up for it.

They crossed another of the lovely bridges when they noticed a group of people talking excitedly in low murmurs. After looking at each other curiously, both made their way to the small crowd and asked what the commotion was about.

“Why, Lady Katara, don’t you know?” a short woman with a baby in her arms asked. “Fire Lord Zuko has arrived.”

“He arrived already?” Katara gasped before she looked at Iroh who was smiling at her. She broke into a huge, happy grin.

“Zuko’s here, Uncle Iroh! Hurry, we have to meet up with him!” she exclaimed as she took hold of Iroh’s hand and began to race toward the grand house, dragging a puffing retired general behind her.

I can’t believe it! I was just at the docks a few hours ago and I missed his arrival! Katara huffed mentally as she continued to run on the soft snow with Iroh hurrying behind her as they raced through streets and crossed over bridges.

Her heart began to pound in her chest and it had nothing to do with the running exercise. Zuko had finally arrived and she wanted to see him so badly, to look into his radiant golden eyes, to hear his rare laughs, to feel his warmth.
“Katara, slow down!” Iroh exclaimed as they rounded a corner sharply, almost crashing into the wall of the building. “We will surely fall to our deaths in this frozen ground!”

Katara only laughed.

“Don’t be silly, Uncle Iroh. I won’t let that happen. I have my waterbending, remember?” she said as she turned her head to smile at him before she tugged at his arm more insistently. “Now come on! I have to see Zuko! I missed him so much!”

Iroh grinned hugely at her confession, although he had a feeling Katara did not even realize what she had said. He smiled at the excited and eager expression on the waterbender’s face. Though he still believed that they could crash and he could break some bones with the speed she was forcing them to take.

They arrived just in time to see Hakoda leading the group toward the grand house and Iroh was forced to let go of Katara’s hand when her speed increased since he could not keep up with her youthful energy.

Katara’s heart raced even faster and her smile widened as her eyes rested on the dark armored-clad firebender, who was talking with her dad.

“Zuko!” she shouted happily.

At the sound of his name, Zuko stopped in his conversation with Hakoda and looked up just in time to see Katara lunge herself at him, the hood of her parka falling back as she wrapped her arms around his middle. Zuko instinctively caught her and was barely able to keep them from stumbling onto the snowy ground as she barreled into him.

“Zuko! I’m so glad you finally came!” Katara exclaimed, squeezing him as she buried her face on his armored chest—a bit disappointed that she could not hear his heartbeat through the armor—and smiled when his smoky sandalwood scent reached her senses.

Her heart slowed down a few beats from the frantic rhythm of before as she relaxed in Zuko’s strong arms and comforting presence. The ache that had been present in her chest for the past months disappeared instantly, and instead, a warm feeling replaced it.
Zuko could not understand Katara’s sudden reaction and attention and why she seemed so happy to see him, but he sure had nothing to complain about her warm reception. Quite the contrary, he was enjoying having her in his arms immensely, having her petite body pressed to his own larger one just like he had wished every day for the past few months…or maybe even for the past few years.

He pulled her a bit closer to himself and took a small whiff of her unique gardenia scent—made sharper by the frosty, minty smell of the snow—and smiled happily. Gods, how he missed her! His heart seemed to burn at the feeling of having her in his arms once again, of her scent floating to his nose, of her lovely face pressed to his chest.

Sokka had turned just in time to see his sister flying through the air toward Zuko only to be caught by the young Fire Lord. Seeing nothing unusual, Sokka just shrugged and waited for his sister to calm down from her emotional display so they could enter the house so Zuko could give him the delicious fire flakes—which he would have to hide from his pregnant bride if he wanted to even eat one flake. He rubbed his chin as ideas began to form in his head of where he could hide his spicy stash.

Hakoda, on the other hand, stared at his daughter and the young man who was holding her with wide eyes and an opened mouth. He looked between the two and then at his son—who did not seem affected by the scene or was fantasizing about food as usual—with a gaping mouth before he composed himself, a frown appearing on his tanned brow. The Southern Chief stared intently at the smiling Zuko suspiciously, almost as if he was trying to discover the true intentions of the young man currently embracing his beloved daughter, before he shook his head at his overprotectiveness. The young Fire Lord was an honorable man and he trusted Katara to behave herself and look out for men with bad intentions. Yet, this helped him confirm some of his recent suspicions regarding their actual feelings.

Iroh huffed as he finally reached the group, and seeing that his dear nephew was occupied at the moment, the winded man walked over to Ursa who had a hand to her mouth in order to hide her pleased smile. They exchanged a knowing look, and hope and joy gleamed in their eyes.

As for Jiao, Jee, and Zuko’s personal guards, they stared at their usually reserved and stoic Fire Lord and the waterbending young woman in his arms with disbelieving looks, but kept their comments to themselves since it was none of their business.

Chuckling lowly, Zuko gently patted Katara’s back.

“If I had known I was going to receive such a warm welcome, I would’ve visited the Southern Water Tribe much sooner,” he said with a small smirk.
As if finally realizing what she was doing and how it must look to everybody else, Katara stepped quickly away from him and laughed sheepishly. Her face turned bright red as she tried to avoid looking at anyone, especially her dad.

Zuko scolded himself mentally for opening his mouth since it made Katara move away from him, making him feel empty.

“Heh, sorry about that,” Katara muttered as she began to play with the end of her braid.

“No harm done,” Zuko reassured her with what Katara thought was an indulgent smile that caused her to blush even redder.

“Why, Nephew, you are such a lucky man!” Iroh exclaimed with a mocking sorrowful sigh, “I wish a pretty, young lady would have received me with such a wonderful greeting. But alas, it was not so.”

Realizing that his uncle was there as well, Zuko glanced at Iroh and gave him a warning glare which, as usual, the old man ignored by addressing his former sister-in-law.

“I tell you, my dear Ursa, the world is so unjust,” Iroh continued and shook his head sadly.

“Don’t let it bring you down, Iroh dear,” Ursa replied with a smile as she patted his arm in a playful gesture of comfort.

Zuko rolled his eyes while the men chuckled and the women giggled.

“I’m sad you’ve already forgotten the hug I gave you on your arrival, Uncle Iroh,” Katara teased with a grin.

The old man grinned back even as he let out a fake sad sigh.

“Yes, that was nice, but that was nothing compared to the one you just gave Zuko,” Iroh pouted. “So Katara abruptly stopped laughing and flushed, not noticing Zuko’s smug expression and her father’s scrutinizing stare. She finally realized that she had completely ignored the other arrivals because she had been completely preoccupied with seeing Zuko again.

“Lady Ursa!” Katara smiled as she stepped around Zuko—who was a bit annoyed to be ignored for the moment—to hug the older woman. “I’m so glad you made it.”

“I am too, Katara dear,” Ursa responded with a gentle smile that painfully reminded Hakoda of his beloved Kya.

Smiling, Katara turned to where Jee was standing a few feet behind Ursa.

“It’s wonderful that you’ve come as well, Admiral Jee.”

Jee bowed as he returned her smile.

“Thank you, Lady Katara. It is always a pleasure to see you.”

“Jiao? Is that you?” Katara asked as she moved her head to the side to see the other person standing silently a few feet behind the admiral. “It’s so nice to see you again.”

“Thank you, Lady Katara. I am happy to see you as well.” Jiao bowed and smiled happily at the knowledge that the young Water Tribe woman had not forgotten about her and still looked at her as a friend and not just another servant.

“Katara,” Hakoda spoke up and raised an eyebrow at his youngest child who had also greeted the guards and was now turning to talk to Zuko again. “Since we got the reunion out of the way, why don’t we let our guests go to their rooms so they could get out of the cold and rest, hm?”

“You’re right, Dad,” she answered, blushing once more at her rude behavior as she followed behind her father who again led the group to his home.
Her heart started beating faster when Zuko disengaged himself from Hakoda’s side to walk beside her. Now that he was here, she did not know what to say to him. Ever since those dreams, the thought of the possibility that she could like Zuko more than a friend, that she could be in love with him, was making her feel nervous and unsure.

But even if she did feel such a thing for him, Zuko would never see her more than a friend since he was in love with Mai. She mentally shook her head at the thought and at the feeling that suspiciously resembled jealousy that settled itself in her chest.

Zuko cleared his throat lightly as he glanced down at Katara from the corner of his eye. He noticed that she was wearing thick, light-blue pants with a parka of the same color that reached below her waist. Her long braid swished gently as a cold breeze swept by. He wished he could tell her his feelings that instant, but again the fear of rejection took hold of him. How should he go about declaring his love for her? Such displays of emotion were strange and unfamiliar to him, and he did not want to make a fool of himself—especially not in front of her.

“Well, here is our humble home,” Hakoda’s voice caught both their attention.

Zuko looked up to see the largest house he had seen since he had arrived at the Southern Water Tribe. Two guards posted at either side of the entrance grasped the large steel door handles and opened them for the group to enter. Zuko smiled when he recognized the steel doors he had sent as a present to the Southern Chief almost four years ago.

Looking around the wintry corridor as they entered, the young Fire Lord admired the carvings and designs that decorated the walls. Lines swirled in intricate patterns from the arched ceiling to the bottom of the ice walls. They were even more magnificent and more beautiful than the ones on the other houses and on the bridges. Instead of the ground being made of frozen snow, marble floor greeted their feet. He remembered Katara telling him it had been a gift from King Bumi and that was the reason why Toph spent most of her time inside the grand house rather than outside in the fresh outdoors.

“What a beautiful place,” Ursa marveled as she, too, gazed at what could be considered the Southern Water Tribe Palace.

“Thank you, Lady Ursa,” Hakoda replied and beamed as he looked around his new home proudly before he turned to address his children, “Why don’t you show our guests to their rooms?”
Before both siblings could move, Toph rounded a corner and stomped her way toward them, followed several feet behind in a slower pace by Kanna supporting Suki.

“There you are, Sparky!” Toph shouted with a huge grin on her face as she approached him. “Did you get lost or something?” she asked and punched his arm.

Zuko grinned slightly, discreetly rubbing the place where the small earthbender had hit him. Some things never changed, like the strength of her punch and the fact that she was the only one who could get away with treating him like that.

“No, we just ran into some difficulties on our way.”

“Uh-huh,” Toph said before she walked to Katara and placed an arm around her shoulders. “See, Sugar Queen. I told you Lord Sparky here was going to make it, so all that mopping of yours was for nothing.” She sighed deeply as if she felt some sympathy for the waterbender.

Katara blushed when Zuko turned to stare at her with gleaming eyes.

“I, um…uh…” she stuttered as she turned to glare at the grinning Toph.

She was saved from further embarrassment when her grandmother finally reached them with Suki, who greeted Zuko and Ursa happily, expressing how glad she was they had made it to her wedding.

Kanna stood silently to the side with a pensive look on her old and wise face. As soon as she spotted the tall young man, who was obviously Fire Nation, she never took her calculating eyes off him. She regarded him carefully, from the way he held himself, to how he kept his mother close to him, to the friendly yet aloof way he interacted with his friends. But most importantly, she observed, with great interest, the way the young man seemed to hover around her granddaughter in a discreet way.

After his future bride finished welcoming their friends, Sokka stepped forward and wound an arm around Suki’s waist to support her since her lower back had been hurting recently. Suki turned to smile at him gratefully.

Zuko watched with veiled interest as Sokka fuzzed over his pregnant, future wife. He subtly glanced at Katara—who was still standing beside him, rolling her eyes at her brother—and he could not stop the image of himself in Sokka’s place fussing over a rounded belly Katara, her blue eyes shining. brightly. He had to admit that he enjoyed the idea and wished that such a scene could become true.

Catching the adoring and longing look the firebender quickly threw at Katara, Kanna immediately knew that the young Fire Lord—whose cold and reserved personality preceded him—was indeed in love with her granddaughter. Not infatuated, but truly in love. Even so, that did not automatically gain her trust and acceptance, nor even her blessing. No, first he had to prove himself the honorable, great man everybody seemed to make him out as.

“Gran-Gran!” Katara exclaimed as she finally noticed her grandmother was still standing in the same spot and had not said a word. What she did notice was the scrutinizing look she was throwing at Zuko and she wondered what the canny old woman was up to.

Zuko watched as Katara moved away from his side and made her way to a short, plump elderly woman with deep wrinkles on her tanned face, a grayish braid over one shoulder, and thin lips on a blank face, staring at him with intense light-blue eyes.

Swallowing lightly, he stood as stoically as ever, though he was shaking nervously on the inside as Katara grabbed the woman’s hand and began to lead her to where he was standing.

This was Katara’s grandmother, her Gran-Gran, the old woman he had roughly grabbed by the collar of her parka almost four years ago, without considering that he was frightening her since all he wanted to know was the location of the Avatar. And right in front of Katara to top it all off!

Well, he knew Katara had forgiven him for all his past transgressions, but he was positive that the old Water Tribe woman had not forgotten that he had invaded their home and, in a way, held her hostage. And the strange look she was giving him was not reassuring in the least. If this woman did not approve of or like him, then he had a very small chance of winning Katara over.

“Gran-Gran, I would like you to meet Fire Lord Zuko,” Katara said with a smile before she directed a grin at the solemn faced Zuko, “And this is my Gran-Gran, Kanna.”

Zuko gave a respectful bow as he said, “Lady Kanna, I am glad to finally meet you.”

Properly, he added mentally.

Kanna returned the bow before she straightened and she eyed him carefully.
“And I you, young Fire Lord, and in much better circumstances, don’t you think?” she asked with a raised gray brow.

Both Katara and Sokka looked at each other worriedly while their father just stood back with a barely concealed smirk on his face. He wondered how the young firebender was going to get out of this one. Ursa frowned slightly and raised a questioning eyebrow when she turned to Iroh only to see him smiling, before he lightly shrugged his shoulders. Toph crossed her arms over her chest and openly grinned since she knew Kanna was not really upset. She vaguely wondered where Aang had wandered to, but shrugged the thought away. It wasn’t like she missed him or anything.

Zuko suppressed the urge to shift uneasily and glance away from Kanna’s piercing light-blue eyes and instead he straightened himself a bit and slightly inclined his head in agreement to her words.

“I assure you, Lady Kanna, that is what I believe as well,” he responded before he gave another small bow at her and Chief Hakoda. “I ask that you find it in yourself to forgive the rude manner in which I behaved toward you and your people the last time I was here.”

Both Kanna and Hakoda noticed he had the decency to look ashamed and both approved of his words. Deciding that she had tortured the poor young man long enough, Kanna allowed a warm smile to reach her lips. She inwardly chuckled when the firebender relaxed slightly when she dropped her cold demeanor.

“I never actually held that incident against you,” she admitted and smiled wider when her granddaughter visibly relaxed beside her. “You left as soon as Aang allowed you to capture him without plundering and destroying a village made up of only women and children as I’m sure other men would have done. I knew you were a man of honor since you kept your promise not to harm us if we told you the whereabouts of the Avatar.”

Waving her wrinkly hands in the air as if to chase away the past, Kanna smiled at the rest of the people who had arrived with the young Fire Lord.

“Oh, my, but where is my head? You all must be cold, tired, and hungry!” Gran-Gran exclaimed, “We will continue with any more conversation during dinner.”

She turned to her granddaughter who was again staring at the Fire Lord.
“Katara, you and Toph take Lady Ursa and the young maidservant to their rooms,” she directed.

“Yes, Gran-Gran,” Katara obeyed dutifully as she motioned for Ursa and Jiao to follow her. Turning back to Zuko, she smiled widely at him.

“Talk to you later?” she asked hopefully.

“Of course,” Zuko responded immediately, returning her smile with a more subdued one.

Gran-Gran lightly smacked the back of her grandson’s head to get his attention as well as his pregnant fiancée’s.

“Sokka, take Fire Lord Zuko and Admiral Jee to their rooms,” she told him, “Suki, come with me, the seamstress still needs to put the finishing touches to your wedding dress.”

Suki giggled when Sokka sighed almost mournfully before he placed a kiss on her forehead.

“Right this way, gentlemen,” Sokka said with a playful extravagant bow that made Jee grin and Zuko roll his eyes.

Kanna stayed behind with Suki and Iroh as the group began to move to their respective rooms. She watched with growing interest when Zuko strained his neck—as discreetly as possible—to follow Katara’s retreating form until she disappeared around a corner.

_I approve of him_, Kanna thought as she grabbed her chin with her fingers. _He is honorable, refined, and seems courteous, intelligent, courageous, and respectful. Quite handsome to top it all off! And he is in love with my granddaughter. It seems that this Zuko knows what’s good. _She smirked smugly. _Now, if only Katara would admit her feelings and let Aang down gently…_

“By that look on your face, my dear Kanna, I assume that you have noticed something going on between both youngsters?” Iroh observed with a huge grin on his face.

“Hm, yes I have,” Kanna confessed as she dropped her hand from her chin to her side. “And I approve if they should take their relationship to the next level.”
The old firebender and the old woman chuckled as they began to make their way to another part of the grand house, betting on how long it would take for the young ones to confess their feelings to one another.

Suki followed them with a puzzled expression on her tired face.

What in the world are these two babbling about? she thought.

Her eyes widened. No, they couldn’t be talking about Katara and Zuko. They were both in relationships after all...although, admittedly, she wondered at the possibilities as well. She mused for a moment before she finally realized something.

And the seamstress is not in this part of the house!

With a soft glow, the dawning sun made its appearance known to the residents of the Southern Water Tribe, chasing away the dark shadows that lurked around the snow and ice buildings. The light-blue sky was clear and, surprisingly, there were no gray clouds anywhere in sight. It looked as if the Spirits themselves were blessing the event that was to happen on that day.

The energy of the rising sun—though not as strong as it was in the Fire Nation—raised Zuko from his light slumber. Light spilled softly into the room from the frozen ice window as the young man stirred among the many soft, fur blankets he was encased in.

Opening his eyes languidly, Zuko scanned the room he had been given for the remainder of his stay in the southern nation before he sat up on the comfy bed, shivering slightly when the fur blankets fell from around his shoulders and the chilly temperature hit him despite the warm sleeping wear he had been given.

The blue covered bed stood neatly in the middle of the medium sized room, topped with many blankets and furs of varying tones and shades of blue, black, and silver. A low table was placed before the elegant frozen window surrounded with cushions in case he wanted to enjoy a light snack or tea. There was a large pinewood closet off to the side of the entrance that he was sure was placed there recently for his use. Jiao had unpacked his belongings the previous day while he dined with his family and friends.

Lifting the covers from the lower half of his body, the firebender swung his legs over the edge of the bed and stood up only to sit back down when his feet came in contact with cold marble, and a shiver ran up his spine. Reaching down, he quickly picked up and placed the warm fur boots Kanna had gifted him with on his chilly feet before putting on the parka that was hanging from the back of the chair near his bed.

He smiled slightly when he looked down at his parka that was dark red color with black fur on the inside and edges of the hood and sleeves, before he lifted his foot to see black fur boots that reached his mid-calves. His mother, Uncle, Jee, Jiao, and his guards were also given the same type of red winter wear, except that the fur on the women’s clothing was white. Kanna had told them that giving them red to wear instead of the normal blue was a way of showing that their Fire Nation heritage was acknowledged and accepted.

It still made him swallow nervously every time he thought about Katara and Sokka’s Gran-Gran and the way her piercing light-blue eyes made him feel like a child again. Luckily, the old Water Tribe woman had forgiven him for his past mistakes and welcomed him and his family warmly.

하지만, 너무 기뻐하기도 했습니다.

Kanna had asked him question after question about the Fire Nation and himself ever since they all sat down to a typical Southern Water Tribe dinner—which was not what he was used to, but was very pleasant nonetheless—with a large smile on her wrinkly face and a twinkle in her eye. The same twinkle his uncle and his mother had as well, he noted. Iroh had joined in answering Kanna’s questions, adding and talking about other things that the woman had not even asked.

Zuko did not understand what those two were up to, but he disregarded such thoughts as unimportant for the moment. What he was concerned about, though, was the way Aang had clung to Katara during the whole meal, even after she tried to tell the young monk to stop. The Fire Lord had almost broken and set the table on fire as he had been clenching it with both hands as the jealousy spread through him. Luckily, Toph had shoved her way between the Katara and Aang without giving an explanation as to why before she threw a smirk in his direction.

Walking over to the thick window that was shining softly due to the morning sun, Zuko gazed down to the clean streets below where shadows still lingered. He noticed that the streets were empty and he assumed that the people were still sleeping, but he knew the city would be bustling with energy very soon since the wedding was being held later that day.

A sigh escaped him and he pressed his forehead against the cold surface of the window. He was finally in the Southern Water Tribe, the small village that he had once invaded, but was now thriving quickly. It became quite apparent the previous day that many still mistrusted him as he followed Hakoda through the ice city, even though both the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe were in peace and trading with each other.
It was not like the people made it their purpose to show their negative feelings toward him with cruel words or actions, quite the contrary, they were respectful and hospitable, but he could sense their apprehension and uneasiness. Hopefully, during the few weeks that he stayed, they would be able to forget and dissolve such wariness toward himself as well as the Fire Nation.

However, there was a reason he had visited the Southern Water Tribe that was far more important than gaining the tribe people’s trust or to attend his friends’ wedding.

“Katara,” he said longingly and closed his eyes.

She was the reason he had travelled through a freezing and raging sea, the reason he endured the cold climate, the reason he was willing to humble himself before Chief Hakoda and Kanna, and the reason he was willing to confront Aang if necessary.

Katara was the reason he was there, she was the woman he loved, the one he wanted. He needed to tell her how he felt, tell her what she meant to him. But how was he supposed to go about it? Should he spend a few more days with her in order to learn more about her family and culture so she could see that he was really interested in her? Or should he tell her immediately?

The sun had finally risen, fully illuminating the blue morning sky, making the ice and snow buildings glisten brightly. A few minutes later, Zuko moved away from the window when he noticed that the citizens were moving about in the streets to get ready for the upcoming wedding.

Perhaps he would find the courage during the festivities to tell Katara what she meant to him. And hopefully, she would not break his heart…
Tribal Festivities

The city was bursting with excitement as the people began to get ready for the wedding ceremony. The flowers that were imported from the Earth Kingdom and the Fire Nation were placed in their respective vases, tables and areas, and the women were already preparing the delicious food that was to be served after the wedding ceremony. Already a few people were making their way to their seats so they could see the wedding take place.

“So how does it look?” Suki asked anxiously as she twirled in a circle in order for her friends to see the wedding dress she was to appear in a just a few moments. Kanna and an old seamstress moved around her as they adjusted a few last details.

The dress was dyed in Suki’s favorite dark green color, made of light warm fur, reaching down to her calves. It was slightly loose so it covered her large, rounded belly. Under her dress she wore warm white pants that were tucked into white fur boots with shiny beads on the top edges decorating her feet. Her short auburn hair was tied in a high, tight bun embedded with smaller beads and tiny white flowers. Her wrists were adorned with many shiny bracelets that tinkled against each other when she moved. Around her neck she wore many long necklaces made of beads and feathers as was tradition in the Southern Water Tribe. A light amount of makeup was placed on her eyelids and cheeks, and her lips were rouged.

“You look wonderful, Suki,” Katara exclaimed, reaching out to touch one of the soft, fur-lined sleeves. Three of Suki’s warriors agreed and gushed over the dress.

“Yeah, Suki!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she clasped her hands against her cheek and sighed. “Sokka won’t know what hit him!”

“I think it looks awful,” Toph commented casually from the chair she was sitting on in one of the corners of the room, waiting impatiently for the primping and preening to be over.

All the women stopped in mid-praise and stared at the earthbender with shocked and hurt expressions.

“But I could say the same thing about what I’m wearing right now, since I have no freaking idea what it looks like,” Toph said as she lifted her bangs to show her sightless eyes and began to chuckle.
They all unfroze and laughed uncertainly with the short blind girl, while Kanna and the seamstress shook their heads.

“So today is the big day,” Kanna said as she looked up at Suki’s glowing face. “Are you ready for the beginning of your new life?”

Suki squared her shoulders—her large stomach protruding farther in the process—and smiled softly.

“More than ever,” she replied.

Kanna nodded in approval and smiled as she helped the seamstress place a thin veil on Suki’s head that would hide the bride’s face until her bridegroom removed it during one part of the ceremony. Suki grimaced and hissed at a sharp pain on the right side of her round belly, but reassured the women that she was fine when they all rushed to her side. She had been having small pains since she woke up, but she assumed it was due to her nerves.

“Alright, girls,” Kanna spoke up as she opened the door to the room and motioned for them to leave so they could take their places among the crowd. Turning around, the old woman smiled. “We will be waiting for your entrance, Suki. And once again, I congratulate you.”

Suki thanked her as Gran-Gran and the rest left the room with only Katara and Toph staying behind. Suki squealed as she whirled around and embraced her soon-to-be sister-in-law. As both giggled and embraced each other, Toph just crossed her arms over her chest and rolled her eyes at their girlish antics.

“Oh, Spirits!” Suki exclaimed joyfully. “It’s my wedding day! I’m finally going to be Sokka’s wife! I’m so happy!”

“I’m so happy for both you guys!” Katara laughed as she pulled away from Suki whose eyes were threatening to spill tears of joy. “Don’t you dare cry, Suki! You’ll ruin the makeup and then Sokka will have to wait a few more hours so we could fix it,” she teased.

Suki sniffled and smiled as she took a few breaths to calm down. It seemed her pregnancy was making her overemotional again. She normally did not react like this or cry over every little thing like she had been recently.
“I never would’ve thought I’d marry and bear a child with the chauvinistic idiot that stumbled into my home in Kyoshi Island. But now I am eager to marry that idiot,” Suki said with a laugh before she sighed happily. “Can you believe how much has changed since we all first met?” she asked softly as she patted her stomach.

“Yeah,” Katara agreed with a smile as she watched her soon-to-be-sister-in-law coo at her pregnant belly.

Suki looked up to regard the waterbender questioningly.

“Did you ever think you’d end up as the Avatar’s girlfriend when you first met Aang?” she asked carefully.

Katara fiddled with her fingers as she looked away from Suki’s intense gaze.

“Uh, well…no,” she admitted after a while. “I really only saw him as a friend back then and I still find it kind of…strange. I can’t explain why, but I do.”

“Maybe that’s because you were never meant to be together,” Toph spoke up with a shrug while she still sat on the same spot she had been since she was shoved into the room. It’s not like she could ‘see’ anything since she had to wear stupid boots to walk in the snow anyway.

“What?” Katara asked in surprise as her eyes widened at Toph’s words. That thought had never actually crossed her mind.

“Of course we’re meant to be together,” she argued. “I mean…Aang and I…We…”

Frowning deeply, Katara paused since she did not know what to say as the words the earthbender had said began to make her think. What if Toph was right? What if she had just forced their relationship to mean something?

“Katara,” Suki spoke up carefully. “I think I’m with Toph on this one.”

“You’re what?!” both Katara and Toph exclaimed at the same time in disbelief.
Suki reached a hand to her obviously confused friend, squeezing her hand lightly when Katara grabbed hers.

“I’ve wanted to talk to you about your relationship with Aang for a while now, but every time I tried, something would come up to interrupt me.”

“Talk to me about what?” Katara asked with a frown.

“I’ve noticed that every time we talk about your relationship you seemed more confused and uneasy about it than happy or excited. And every time I mention the possibility of you two getting married, you immediately shy away from the topic, like you’re uncomfortable about it,” Suki said softly.

“Yup, I noticed that, too,” Toph piped in as she shifted in her uncomfortable dress.

Katara looked at them both and her frown only deepened at their words. Did she really do that?

“Katara,” Suki spoke again as she continued slowly, “I… I think you and Aang should take a break from each other.”

She quickly squeezed the waterbender’s hand, silencing her when it looked like she was going to protest the idea.

“Katara, you’re my friend, and now we’ll be family, and all I want is for you to be happy, to be happy on your wedding day just like I am on mine. I think that if you and Aang separated for a while it would do you both good. Maybe it would help make your feelings and relationship stronger… or maybe… you’ll find someone better.”

Like Zuko, Toph thought with a grin that had nothing to do with the fact that Aang could be single again.

Someone better? Katara thought.
That’s what she had also thought a few months ago! Could it be that perhaps it was true? But where would that leave Aang? Could she destroy their long-term relationship just because she wished to experience something else? To know if maybe there was something more for her out there?

Before she could answer or say anything at all, her grandmother reappeared to usher her and Toph out.

“So how do I look?” Sokka asked as he looked down at himself before he sat down. He rubbed his sweaty palms on his thighs that were bouncing due to his nervousness before he stood up as quickly as he had sat down.

“Well, do I look good or what?” he asked in a panicked voice when he didn’t receive a response—or more preferably, a compliment.

Hakoda chuckled deeply, his blue eyes squinting in his mirth at his son’s obvious anxiety.

“Don’t worry, Sokka, you look fine,” he reassured with a pat on the bridegroom’s back.

Sokka looked over at Zuko and Aang, who were standing a few feet behind, and relaxed when his friends gave a nod to convey that Hakoda’s words were true. Indeed, the young tribesman looked magnificent in the warrior attire he wore on special occasions.

Simple words were used to ease the mind of a man about his outfit while gushing praises and squeals were expected from a woman’s female friends about hers.

“Good,” Sokka breathed in relief as he ran a hand over his pulled up ‘wolf-tail’ before he started to tap his foot on the floor.

“Pull yourself together, son,” Hakoda ordered softly. “It’s too late to back out now, you know, with Suki being pregnant and all.” He chuckled.

“I’m not planning to, Dad.” Sokka scowled. “It’s just that…I’m getting married, for La’s sake!”

“And you realized that now?” Aang chirped with a large grin.
Sokka huffed and crossed his arms with a grumble when his father chortled loudly and Zuko chuckled.

Momo flew away from Aang’s shoulder and circled around the warrior’s head as he prepared to land, but Sokka shooed him away with exaggerated waves of his arms before the lemur could ruin his hair. Momo chattered angrily, but contented himself by sitting on the warm shoulder of the tall firebender.

“Ah, I remember the day I married your mother,” Hakoda spoke up as his laughter calmed down.

Sokka stopped grousing and turned to look at the soft expression on his father’s face and he sighed sadly. Aang and Zuko glanced at each other and remained silent as both the father and son’s mood changed slightly.

“I was so nervous I was afraid I was going to be sick,” the chieftain chuckled quietly before a melancholy sigh escaped him. “But all that vanished when I looked upon my beloved Kya as she made her way to marry me, and all I knew was happiness.”

A faraway look came over his features and the three young men remained silent as the chief got lost in his thoughts. Zuko shifted uncomfortably since it had been his country that had caused this family—Katara’s family—so much pain.

Hakoda shook himself and blinked to get rid of the tears that seemed not to have vanished even after all these years since his wife’s untimely death. He frowned when he saw that his son’s eyes were misting over as well. Straightening himself, the older warrior walked up to his heir and placed both his hands on his son’s strong shoulders.

“Your mother would be smiling and crying happily that her baby boy was getting married, if she were here with us today,” Hakoda said with a sad smile before he clapped Sokka’s shoulders in a paternal way. “I want you to know that I am very proud of the man you have become, Sokka. I am proud to call you my son.”

“Thanks, Dad,” Sokka croaked before clearing his throat to compose himself as his father gave him a manly hug.

After hearing Hakoda’s words, Zuko watched Sokka sadly and slightly enviously. Why couldn’t his father be like Hakoda? Ozai would never tell him how proud he was to have him as a son. His sire would never give him encouraging words on the day of his wedding or embrace him in a fatherly manner.

The firebender shook his head to rid himself of such thoughts. He had Iroh, who was like a father to him, and the old Dragon of the West was more than enough.

Hakoda stepped away from his son and gave him a hard pat on the back as he let out another loud laugh in order to dispel the sudden melancholy.

“Just try not to embarrass yourself by tripping or something, okay?” he joked lightly. He grinned as he made his way to stand between the amused Fire Lord and the Avatar.

“Jeez, thanks for boosting my confidence there, Dad,” Sokka grumbled, but returned the grin. He scowled again when Aang started to laugh. “Shut it, Aang!”

“Sorry,” Aang muttered, though a few chuckles escaped him.

“You laugh now,” Hakoda began as he turned to look at both young men on either side of himself, “but just you wait when your time comes to take a bride.”

He chuckled as he elbowed Zuko’s arm in a show of playfulness. It was also a way to show the young Fire Lord that he and his family held no resentment against the firebender over Kya’s death. Zuko seemed to understand and smiled.

“I do hope I’m an exception though,” Zuko drawled. “It would be embarrassing if the Fire Lord were to have a panic attack on his wedding day.”

Hakoda laughed harder as he also gave Zuko a pat on the back—though not that hard since he was the Fire Lord after all.

“Who knew firebenders had such sense of humor, eh?” he mused and chuckled as he smiled at Zuko to show he was joking.

“Indeed.” Zuko smirked.
“I think I’ll be too excited to be nervous on my wedding,” Aang piped in and sighed wistfully.

Zuko’s smirk instantly disappeared from his face and he gritted his teeth in jealousy and possessiveness since he knew who the bride in Aang’s dream wedding was. Hakoda stopped laughing immediately as well since he still found it hard thinking about having his little girl grown up and possibly married. Having to deal with one child getting married was enough for the day, he couldn’t handle even the possibility that his daughter could also be wed soon. Clearing his throat, Hakoda acknowledged Aang’s words with a small smile.

“Well, I think it’s time that I take my seat before Toph claims it,” Hakoda said with a grin. Clasping Sokka’s arm tightly, he said, “Congratulations, son. Today marks the first day of your new life.”

“Thanks again, Dad,” Sokka responded before he watched his father leave the room.

“I think I’ll get my spot next to Katara before someone takes it,” Aang muttered as he, too, made his exit. Momo jumped away from Zuko’s shoulder and flew away as he followed his master and friend outside the room.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the monk’s words and pressed his lips together in a hard line. Soon it would be him always taking the spot next to Katara…

“Have you noticed that something’s been off with Aang recently?” Sokka’s musing words broke through Zuko’s thoughts.

“What do you mean?” the raven-haired firebender asked, putting on a confused frown.

“I’m not sure…” Sokka said as he rubbed his chin. “He’s been acting more irritated than normal and he never leaves Katara alone. And then he’s been glaring and snapping at you more often. Don’t tell me you haven’t noticed.”

Zuko gave him a small nod.

“I have,” he responded coolly.
“Why do you think he’s acting like that?” the blue-eyed warrior asked as he continued to rub his chin.

Zuko glanced to the side and shrugged.

“I’m not really sure,” he confessed quietly.

He had suspicions, but he was not completely positive if they were true. Did Aang know what he really felt for Katara and what he planned to do in order to have her for himself?

“Well, there has to be a reason,” Sokka said as he flailed his arms in the air before he frowned at his stoic friend. “Maybe you should talk to him and see what’s wrong.”

“Maybe I should,” Zuko responded impassively.

Sokka stared at him for a moment before he shrugged. Clapping a brotherly hand on Zuko’s shoulder, Sokka smiled.

“Anyways, thanks for being here on my wedding day, Zuko.”

“You’re my friend, Sokka,” Zuko replied, “Of course I would attend your wedding.”

Sokka laughed and let out a mocking resigned sigh. “And since you’re my friend, I guess I’ll attend yours.”

Even if it’s Mai you marry, he added mentally.

Zuko smiled at his words and nodded again.

Of course you’ll be there for my wedding, Sokka, since it’ll be your sister’s wedding too, if I have anything to say about it, Zuko thought with a smirk.
The soft beating of drums reached their ears, indicating that the wedding ceremony was about to begin and signaling that the bridegroom was to present himself at once. Sokka rubbed the back of his neck nervously.

“Well, here I go,” Sokka said with a nervous chuckle as he placed his warrior helmet over his head.

The gray fur of the wolf’s head gleamed brightly as Sokka walked out the door with Zuko walking a few paces behind him.

Sokka smiled widely when Suki appeared and began to make her way towards him. Even though the veil she had on was covering her beautiful face, he knew she was smiling brightly beneath it. Finally, Suki was going to be his wife and he was going to make her and their child happy for the rest of their lives.

Suki blushed under the veil as she caught sight of her handsome soon-to-be husband and the way he was looking at her before she took his outstretched hand as they both faced the spiritual priest who began the wedding ceremony.

The crowd watched with smiles on their faces as the wedding took place, murmuring to themselves at how handsome the bridegroom looked and how lovely the bride was.

If only that could be Katara and me, Zuko thought longingly as the couple began to pledge their loyalty and undying love to each other. Oh, how he wished it were he that was finally taking Katara as his wife at that moment!

Zuko looked away from the couple to glance discreetly from the corner of his eye to where Katara was sitting one seat away from him, between Toph and Aang, and he inwardly sighed at the happy look she had on her face. He narrowed his eyes when Aang grabbed her hand before Zuko quickly looked away and glared at a random spot in front of him so he did not have to see the way Katara smiled at the Avatar. What he did not know was that Katara had smiled at Aang in order not to hurt his feelings when she slowly removed her hand from his since she knew he was thinking of their wedding.

Katara glanced at Zuko over Toph’s head and wondered at the annoyed look on his face before she looked back at the couple before them as she imagined her own wedding.
But…who was going to be the man she was going to marry?

She glanced at Aang sitting beside her before she looked back at Zuko. Angry and confused at her thoughts, she tried to focus on her brother and her friend’s wedding and not on her puzzling feelings that were making her head hurt.

The ceremony ended with the spiritual leader asking Sokka to remove the veil so he could kiss his new wife. The audience erupted into cheers and applause when Sokka quickly pulled Suki’s veil back from her face before he embraced her and kissed her deeply.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The entire Southern Water Tribe was alive with music and laughter as the wedding festivities continued throughout the evening. The sky had remained cloudless for the entire day, adding to the cheerful atmosphere thanks to the sun’s soft rays of light during the day and now the soft glow of the moon and the twinkling stars in the night sky.

The people were gathered in the large town square in the center of the ice city where many low tables where set up in rows. The guests sitting on cushions or furs chatted excitedly as they continued to eat the delicious banquet before them. Appa and Momo were off to one side with a table filled with food just for them.

Zuko watched with amusement and interest at the manner in which the tribe people celebrated, with long cheers and loud laughter. The Southern Water Tribe festivities were more entertaining and exciting than the stuffy and formal celebrations that were held for the Fire Nation Royal Court. The musicians used drums, flutes, and other instruments that were all made up from animal skins or bones, providing a thrilling and uplifting rhythm for the dancers. Some waterbenders trailed streams of water around their forms as they danced among the crowd, the clear water sparkling under the glow of the torches and the large bonfire that blazed merrily in the middle of the place. Even his crew had been invited by the people to join in the festivities and he had allowed those who were not on duty to go and enjoy themselves.

The young Fire Lord glanced to where Sokka and Suki sat on a small platform under a canopy made of ice with blue and green cloth hanging from what looked to be an ice chandelier. He had a feeling Katara had something to do with that. He watched as Sokka leaned down to place a small kiss on his wife’s cheek before Suki placed her head on her husband’s shoulder. Zuko smiled at the obvious happiness that was pouring out of them and was visible on both their faces for everyone to see.

Glancing around at the table that had been reserved from him, Zuko picked up his cup of wine and took a slow sip. His mother was sitting next to him deep in conversation with Jee and next to his admiral was Jiao. Normally, he would not have allowed a servant to join them for dinner since it went against Fire Nation protocol, but he made an exception this time since it had been Katara that had insisted that Jiao joined them in the celebration. Besides, Jiao was a nice young woman and a loyal, respectful servant.
Sitting on his other side with a grin on his face was Uncle Iroh—whom Zuko had discreetly taken a bottle of wine away from earlier. Already there were a few drunken men making their inebriated state known as they were either dancing wildly everywhere or passed out in the middle of the dance floor, adding to the cheerful atmosphere that was a Water Tribe party. While it was a party, he did not want to see what his beloved uncle would do if he got any tipsier.

Zuko’s attention was immediately drawn away from the amusing intoxicated men as he caught sight of Katara making her way to their table with Aang, Toph, and Ty Lee. Zuko’s breath caught in his throat as he once more became mesmerized by the waterbender’s beautiful formal tribal dress, even if it was simpler than the bride’s. The first time he saw her in her dress, he had felt his heart pound and his body warm at her beauty. However, it was the large smile on Katara’s face that made his heart skip a beat. He quickly composed himself as they all took a seat at the low table with laughs and giggles.

“Are you all enjoying yourselves?” Katara asked excitedly as she glanced around the table that was reserved for the Fire Lord and his family. She smiled widely when they all quickly answered that they were.

“I’ve never been to such a lively party before,” Ursa commented as she looked around at the partygoers.

Before Katara could answer her, one of the Water Tribe warriors stepped up to their table and offered his hand to Jiao.

“Would the lovely lady honor me with this dance?” the handsome warrior asked with a charming smile.

Jiao’s pale cheeks turned bright red as she looked at the offered hand before she looked up at her lord uneasily. Zuko caught Katara’s look that said ‘you better say yes or else’ before he gave Jiao a small nod.

“You may go if you wish, Jiao,” he conceded with a small smile.

He smirked smugly when Katara grinned at him. Those at the table smiled when the maidservant flashed them a huge smile before she shyly took the warrior’s hand with another blush as he led her away.
“Aww, how cute,” Ty Lee gushed as she watched them go. “I wish Haru was here,” she said with a sigh as she leaned her head on her hand.

The acrobat’s mood changed when a group of Kyoshi warriors approached the table with blushes on their faces as they tried to discreetly glance at the handsome Fire Lord and led her to the dance floor.

Just as the girls left, a Fire Nation soldier came up and bowed to Zuko before he walked over to Jee and whispered in the admiral’s ear. Jee nodded before he looked over at the young Fire Lord who was frowning at them.

“Something has come up at the flagship,” Jee explained as he stood up from the table. “I will look into it immediately if you wish, my lord.”

“Please do, Admiral Jee,” the young Fire Lord responded with a nod as the older man bowed and left with the soldier. What could that possibly be about?

“Is there a problem, Zuko?” Aang asked with a frown as he watched Jee and the soldier leave.

Zuko looked over at Aang, and at the concerned looked on the Avatar’s face, guilt once more twisted his insides.

“No, everything’s fine,” he replied.

_Hopefully_, he mentally added.

“So how do you like the food?” Katara asked after a while as she, too, became a little concerned that it could be more problems with the raiders in the colonies. She looked around the table as she voiced her question, though the person she really wanted to hear from was Zuko.

“It’s very delicious, Katara,” Zuko responded sincerely as he took another bite from his plate.

“Really?” Katara asked with a smile. She blushed lightly since his small compliment in a way made her feel like he was praising her for cooking a meal for him.

“Even the sea prunes?” Aang asked with a raised brow, a small smirk on his lips.

“Yes, even the sea prunes,” Zuko said as he glanced at the young monk and then back to Katara. “I’ll admit it’s not what I’m used to, but its unique flavor is what makes it appetizing.”

“I’m glad you think so,” Katara said with another smile before she briefly glanced at Aang, who was scowling at the table.

“So Zuko...how’s Mai doing?” Aang asked suddenly as he casually grabbed a piece of fruit from the bowl at the center of the table. “You must be sad that she couldn’t be here. You must really miss her.”

Zuko glared angrily at the airbender before he quickly looked over at Katara with a pleading look, to tell her that it was not so, but Katara was not looking at him, her face was turned to the side with an unreadable expression. He wanted to reach over and grab her hand, but he was not sure if she even cared about what Aang had said, not knowing that Katara indeed was affected by the mention of the young noblewoman.

Katara had narrowed her eyes as soon as Aang asked Zuko about Mai and her hands clenched on her lap as that strange feeling that resembled jealously flared inside her. She mentally shook her head before she looked away as she was reminded that Zuko was Mai’s boyfriend and he was not available. She had no right to feel such a way. Besides, he would never see her more than just a friend.

Toph narrowed her eyes in annoyance at Aang’s smug words. She knew he was trying to stop any feelings from developing any further between Katara and Zuko and so he brought up the fact that both of them were already in relationships.

Oh, hell no! He’s not going to ruin my hard work to get those two idiots to realize their damn feelings! Toph yelled in her head.

Springing to her small feet, the blind earthbender reached down and grabbed Aang’s upper arm tightly, yanking him off his seat, smirking when he let out a yelp of surprise. The entire table gaped as the young girl began to pull the Avatar away.
“Come on, Twinkletoes!” she called gleefully as she started to drag him away. “I want to dance!”

“Since when do you like to dance?” Aang asked incredulously as he tried to dig his heels on the snowy ground to stop from being hauled around. “And why are you dragging me to the dance floor?”

“Because I don’t have to kill you for stepping on my toes since you’re light-footed,” she replied with a shrug.

“But Katar—” Aang began as he glanced back at the still gaping waterbender sitting at the table.

“I’m sure Sugar Queen would be okay if I borrow you for one stupid dance,” Toph cut him off with an annoyed huff before she tilted her head in Katara’s direction. “You don’t mind, do you, Sweetness?”

“O-of course not, Toph…” Katara stammered.

“There, you see?” The earthbender grinned as she once again began to drag the young monk away. “Now shut up and lead me to the dance floor since I can’t see with these damn boots on!”

The people at the table were brought out of their shock when Iroh began to chuckle loudly.

“Well, there’s something you don’t see every day,” the retired general mused as he continued to laugh. He eyed the cup of wine in front of his nephew and sighed since he was stuck with only fruit juice. Really, it wasn’t like he was a bad drunk.

Katara smiled as she turned away from a grinning Toph dragging an annoyed and protesting Aang, and blushed when she caught Zuko’s stare. His golden eyes were gleaming brightly with their intensity, making her heart beat a bit faster than normal. She looked briefly away from his gaze and shifted nervously when she realized that she was the only one sitting with Zuko and his family and they were all looking at her with large smiles on their faces. Well, Iroh and Ursa were, while Zuko just stared at her with what seemed like a soft yet intense expression. What could it mean?

“So…um…how do you like the Southern Water Tribe?” she asked awkwardly as she began to chew on her lip.
“I like it so far, but I can’t give you a definite answer since I’ve not had the chance to really see it. We just got here yesterday,” Zuko responded distractedly as his eyes were drawn from her eyes to her lips that were being abused by her teeth. Those lips that he so wished to kiss.

“Oh…right,” Katara said as she gave an awkward chuckle. “I forgot about that.”

“Perhaps you can give me a tour of your city one of these days?” Zuko asked hopefully. He smirked when her face lit up with a large smile.

“Yeah! I was thinking of showing you around even before we left Ba Sing Se. Thanks for reminding me,” Katara exclaimed excitedly as she practically bounced on her cushion.

Iroh and Ursa shared a look and grinned.

“The Southern Water Tribe is very beautiful,” Ursa spoke up with a soft smile. “And the people are so nice, especially Chief Hakoda and your grandmother, though I have not met your mother yet. I would really like to meet her.”

Zuko and Iroh held their breaths as they silently glanced at Katara with sad expressions as the waterbender’s smile vanished from her face. Ursa became alarmed that she might have said something wrong when the young woman looked down. Ursa turned wide and concerned eyes toward her son.

“Mom…” Zuko began before he cleared his throat lightly as he shifted uneasily on his seat, “I don’t think Katara would like to—”

“No, it’s okay, Zuko,” Katara spoke up quietly as she lifted her head to smile sadly at the older woman. “I’m afraid you won’t be able to meet her any time soon, Lady Ursa. My mother was… killed when I was about eight years old.”

“By the Southern Raiders,” Zuko added lowly. He glanced anxiously at Katara and inwardly sighed in relief when she only gave him a smile to reassure him she still did not blame him anymore.

Horrified, Ursa gasped inaudibly before her face was quickly replaced by sadness and sympathy.
“Oh, Katara…I’m so sorry. I did not mean to bring up such sorrowful memories.”

“It’s okay, Lady Ursa,” Katara assured her as she touched her necklace. “I miss her and her absence still does make me sad, but…” she paused as she looked up at Zuko, her smile big once again as she continued, “Zuko helped me confront my mother’s killer, and thanks to him, I was able to move on.”

Zuko returned her smile, his eyes softening as he slowly reached over to grab her hand. Katara looked down at their hands with a blush before she squeezed his hand as she looked at him with a grateful smile. Zuko swallowed as his heart ignited at her touch and he knew that he needed to tell her that he loved her immediately. He wanted her—all of her—so badly.

“That is one of the reasons why you and my nephew are really good friends,” Iroh said wisely as he smiled at them both, making both young benders flush before Katara retracted her hand, which Zuko reluctantly let go of, and placed it back on her lap.

“Why do you say that, Uncle Iroh?” Katara asked as she looked away from Zuko’s handsome face to question the older man, but instead looked over at Ursa who responded for him as she touched her son’s arm.

“Because both of you have known the pain of being unjustly and cruelly separated from your mothers at a very young age,” the Fire Lord’s mother responded softly.

At the woman’s words, the waterbender once again looked at the Fire Lord. Zuko continued to gaze intensely into Katara’s eyes, willing her to see that what his mother had just said was one thing of so many that made them perfect for one another, that they were meant to be together. He watched as something began to enlighten in Katara’s eyes, but they were suddenly pulled away from each other’s gazes when Jee appeared suddenly in a hurried pace along with Zuko’s youngest personal guard.

“My lord,” Jee began as he bowed quickly, “A messenger hawk has arrived at the flagship with a missive from the Fire Nation. It was sent by Advisor Chao.”

Zuko stiffened slightly before he ordered himself to relax so he did not worry his mother or Katara.

“Thank you, Admiral Jee,” he said stoically as he stood up from his cushion, “I will look at it right now.”
He gave his uncle a discreet look since the older firebender was aware of everything that was going on in the Fire Nation.

“I’m going with you, Nephew,” Iroh spoke up, placing a cheerful smile on his face as he, too, stood up from his seat. “I think I need a walk since I can barely sit with all the food I ate!” He winked at the women. “Maybe after I walk I can continue to gorge myself with more of this scrumptious Water Tribe cuisine!”

Ursa and Katara giggled as they watched the men excuse themselves with a bow and walk away. Katara watched curiously as Zuko’s personal guard stopped abruptly in his tracks as he whipped his head toward the dance floor. She saw his eyes widen briefly before they narrowed and his nostrils flared. Then he turned away and quickly followed after his lord and the admiral. Katara wondered what it was that he saw before she shrugged the thought away as another more important thought caught her attention.

“Zuko’s always working,” Katara remarked sadly as she looked at the older woman with a concerned look.

“I know,” Ursa responded as she looked at the waterbender with the same expression. “Being Fire Lord is a big responsibility and Zuko takes that responsibility very seriously.”

Both were silent for a moment before Ursa cleared her throat delicately as she looked down at Katara’s blue necklace that wound around her neck.

“So, then the necklace you are wearing belonged to you mother? I remembered Zuko saying it was an heirloom when I assumed it was a betrothal necklace he had given you,” Ursa said casually, though she brought the last part up intentionally. She smiled when Katara blushed as she touched the blue pendant.

“Y-yes, it belonged to my mother and before that it used to be my Gran-Gran’s,” Katara stuttered. “Gran-Gran gave it to her as a gift when my mother married my father. When my mother died, my father gave me her necklace as a memento.”

“Oh, I see. So does that mean you will do the same? Give this necklace to your own daughter, I mean,” Ursa asked curiously.
Blushing once again, Katara nodded slowly.

“I…guess I will…When the time comes, of course.”

Ursa smiled at her as she raised her cup of wine and took a delicate sip. She looked over at the people having a great time on the dance floor and raised her eyebrow slightly as she caught sight of Aang and Toph dancing in the middle of a cheering crowd. Both young benders were laughing loudly at the attention they were getting.

“They seem to be having fun,” Ursa observed as she pointed at them.

Katara turned in her seat to look at the dancing crowd and smiled.

“Yeah, they are,” she agreed.

The Fire Nation noblewoman observed the young waterbender intently as Katara laughed and continued to smile as she watched Aang and Toph show off their dancing skills—though it looked like it was the small earthbender who was actually doing the leading instead of the young monk.

Ursa knew that Katara had feelings for Zuko, it was so obvious by the way Katara acted around him and especially the way she looked at him. She had a feeling that Katara was falling in love with her son just like he was falling in love with her, unless of course they were already in love with one another. But if this were true, then why have they not confessed their true feelings?

The chemistry between the firebender and the waterbender was so painfully obvious that she just could not get it into her head why both of them as well as some other people—specifically Aang — had not noticed or kept denying that there was anything going on between them!

Ursa glanced back at the Avatar on the dance floor with a pensive frown. From what she had heard and seen she knew that Katara held a great affection for the young boy, always worrying that nothing harmed him, always making sure that he was always happy. Perhaps the reason why Katara did not admit her feelings to Zuko and why she continued in her relationship with the airbender was because she thought that she loved Aang and did not want to hurt him.

Ursa remembered when they both had talked in her former home in the Abandoned Fort before Zuko found them. Katara had told her about her adventures ever since she found the young Avatar in the frozen iceberg, then when Zuko ‘arrived’ at her village, until the time they had all spent a few days in Ba Sing Se after the war. One thing that she kept remembering was the story Katara told her about the time they had encountered Aunt Wu and how the fortuneteller had predicted that her future husband would be a powerful bender.

“Katara dear,” Ursa began as she brought herself out of her thoughts and waited for Katara to turn back around and look at her. “I know this question will sound strange, but I would like it if you gave me an answer.”

Katara frowned as she settled on the cushion and placed her hands on the table.

“Okay, what’s your question, Lady Ursa?”

“Do you truly love Aang?” the noblewoman asked quietly.

Katara’s eyes widened at the unexpected question, the same question that her grandmother had posed to her as well. She shifted in her seat as she tried to gather her thoughts.

“I…I…” Katara paused as she frowned in thought.

She would have immediately said yes before, but now…now she was not so sure. What had changed to make her hesitate so? Could it be that she truly was not in love with Aang? Could it be that she was in love with someone else…with Zuko?

The confused young woman looked up as she felt someone tap her hand lightly and frowned when Ursa smiled at her.

“You don’t love Aang, dear,” Ursa stated softly, but with a convinced tone.

“No!” Katara exclaimed before she slumped down a bit. “I mean yes! I mean…I don’t know,” she whispered as she lowered her head to her hands.

She felt horrible for being unable to answer such a simple question concerning Aang because she had thoughts about another. She removed her hands from her face when she felt Ursa tug at them.
“Katara, have you ever thought that maybe, that perhaps you accepted Aang as your boyfriend because you thought you were obligated to love him because he saved the world…and because he loves you?” Ursa asked her gently.

“Of course not!” Katara argued with a shake of her head. Why was everybody now telling her that Aang and she were not meant to be together? First her Gran-Gran, and then Suki and Toph, and now Lady Ursa?

“I love him because we’ve been through so much together during the war. He’s so sweet and wonderful and he loves me deeply.”

The older woman sighed softly as she grasped Katara’s hands lightly.

“What you feel for Aang is not love, but affection, friendship, and gratitude,” she stated.

“No,” the waterbender denied again, but this time her voice was less convincing as things started to clear up. She looked down as a frown appeared on her face. “I mean, Aang and I…”

“Katara dear,” Ursa said as she gave the younger woman a smile at her stubbornness, “Aang is not the only powerful bender in the world, you know.”

Katara was stunned at the older woman’s words and remained silent for she did not know what to say. She knew that was true, she knew there were many powerful benders out there, but she had never actually given much thought about it. Perhaps she never gave it much thought was that she believed Aang to be ‘the powerful bender’ Aunt Wu had predicted she marry, and so truly believed that she loved him, that he was the one for her, and that they were meant to be together.

Katara raised her head and saw Ursa look at something over her shoulder before the older woman looked at her with a large smile. Katara turned around to see what the noblewoman had seen and gasped softly when she saw Zuko making his way toward them with Iroh and Admiral Jee a few paces behind him. The words Lady Ursa said rang in her head, her heart pounded, and her stomach seemed to flip as a thought entered her head.

Could it be that Zuko was the one, the powerful bender she was to marry? Could it be that the one she really and truly loved was Zuko? She touched the left side of her chest as a blush appeared on her face as she watched the firebender make his way to them.
Zuko was deep in thought as he continued towards his table, a deep frown on his face. The missive that had arrived at his flagship was indeed from Chao, informing him about an anonymous letter he had received in his home. Though Chao had not gone into great detail for fear of the missive being intercepted, Zuko knew the letter was another threat demanding he released Ozai from prison. Will he never get a moment of peace?

With a mental sigh, Zuko composed himself as they neared the table and looked up, only to see Katara staring at him with wide, blue eyes and a blush on her lovely face. He wondered briefly why she was looking at him in such a way before he trailed his own eyes over her features and his lips curled upward slightly.

Katara shifted on her cushion as she caught Zuko staring at her with that strange look in his eyes again and that small smile on his lips. Her heart seemed to burn and raced wildly in her chest as another blush began to form on her cheeks, but she could not bring herself to look away from him.

Finally reaching the low table, Zuko sat down gracefully and waited for his uncle and Admiral Jee to take their seats before he looked between Katara and his mother with a smile.

“So…what did I miss?” he asked lightly.

“Uh…w-well…” Katara stuttered as she began to fiddle with the hem of her sleeve, her mind was still reeling with so many questions and uncertainties.

She let out a relieved breath, as well as a disappointed sigh, when the Water Tribe warrior from before returned with Jiao, who was blushing so much due to the dancing, and of course, the fact that the handsome warrior was still holding her hand. The entire table watched as Jiao turned even redder when the young man raised her hand to his lips and thanked her for the dance.

Jiao sat down slowly with a dazed look on her face as she looked around at the people around her.

“Dancing is so much fun,” she said wistfully with a small smile on her flushed features.

Iroh chuckled merrily as he nudged his nephew’s arm with his elbow.
“Zuko, why don’t you go and dance? Show the ladies your impressive dance moves,” he piped in with a wiggled of his eyebrow.

Zuko glanced away from Katara to glare halfheartedly at his uncle.

“Uncle, you know I don’t dance if I don’t have to,” he reminded him coldly and scowled.

“Come now, Zuko,” Iroh insisted as he waved away his nephew’s statement. “It’s just dancing! It’s not like I’m not asking you to play the tsunghi horn in front of this whole crowd for Agni’s sake!”

“No,” Zuko persisted.

“Just this once?”

“No.”

“Oh, come on, dear,” Ursa piped in. “Listen to your uncle. Go dance and have some fun.”

Zuko turned to look at his mother as if she had just betrayed him.

“I am having fun,” he muttered darkly as he crossed his arms over his chest.

Katara could not help the giggles that escaped her as Zuko brooded in his spot. Though it could be seen as childish, Zuko was too regal and serious to be thought as anything remotely close to being childish.

“Don’t be a killjoy, Zuko,” Katara said and laughed when Zuko turned to glare at her.

The young Fire Lord’s glare intensified when his uncle and his mother started to laugh while Jiao and Jee tried to hide their amused smiles. Didn’t these people get it that he did not want to dance, damn it? Just because he knew how to—because of all those long hours of torturous dance lessons when he was a child—did not mean he wanted to. There was nothing that would make him get up and dance like an idiot on the dance floor.
Nothing!

He raised an eyebrow when Katara got up from her seat, walked around the table to stand beside him, and grabbed his hand with a large smile, which instantly dissolved his bad mood.

“Dance with me, Zuko,” she said with large pleading eyes. “Please?”

Zuko sighed at her tone of voice that sounded as if she would be devastated if he said no. Damn. There was nothing that would make him dance except Katara and her pleading blue eyes.

“Fine,” he relented and sighed again as he stood up reluctantly, still holding her hand.

When Katara’s eyes sparkled with glee as she gave him a large smile he found that he was not angry or displeased at all for having to dance. He allowed Katara to lead him away as she let out an excited squeal while he ignored his mother’s giggles and his uncle’s snickers for caving in so rapidly.

Besides, there was nothing for him to be complaining about since it was Katara that he was going to dance with, he was going to be able to be close to her and hold her. His grip on her hand tightened.

Both ignored the surprised whispers that surrounded them as they made their way to the dance floor as each was lost in their thoughts. Once they finally reached their destination both young benders turned to face each other, their hands still clasp together.

Oh, Spirit, what have I gotten myself into? Katara thought nervously as she stood before the man that she was now unable to stop thinking about, the man that was making her doubt her feelings for Aang, the man that she had…fallen for?

She jumped slightly when Zuko squeezed her hand lightly as he leaned down to whisper in her ear, his warm breath making her shiver.

“I do believe you brought me out here to dance, or am I mistaken?” he asked her in a low, husky tone as he placed his other hand on her back and pulled her a bit closer to him.
Zuko inhaled her sweet scent and sighed contently, loving the way her small body was close to his but displeased with the fact that it was not nearly as close as he wished. It was fine though, he wanted to show her how much he loved her, not frighten her away with his eager advances.

Katara felt as if her heart was about to jump out of her chest for it was beating so fast, and she was afraid that the entire crowd could hear the loud way her heart was beating. Her face was beginning to burn at Zuko’s close proximity and the husky tone of his voice. If she didn’t know any better, she would think that he was trying to flirt with her.

What’s wrong with me? she yelled in her head, This is Zuko! The one who only sees me as a friend! The one who…who loves another woman…

Katara reached for the hand that was at her back and pull it away as she stepped away from him. Looking at his face, she gave him a small smile when he looked down at her with a confused and hurt expression. He smiled at her when she did not let go of his hands but held them both with each of her own. Their hearts raced and their skin warmed at the contact of the other’s hands.

“That’s not how you dance to Water Tribe music,” she whispered with a small grin.

This was no time to be thinking of such things, to be saddened by such thoughts. It was her brother’s wedding and they were supposed to be having fun.

Zuko looked up to observed the way the other participants of the festivities were dancing and frowned at what he saw. The dancing partners were barely touching each other—with the exception of their hands—and they were spinning, jumping, and twirling this way and that, following the beat of the drums. It was nothing like the way he had been taught in the Fire Nation Palace.

What have I gotten myself into? He mentally sighed. Now he was positive he would make a fool of himself.

“I just remembered that it’s bad to do any form of exercise with a full stomach,” Zuko casually stated as he tried to slowly leave the dance floor.

“Ah, come on, Zuko!” Katara laughed as she grabbed onto his hands even tighter to stop him from leaving. Then with a mischievous grin she said, “Don’t be a coward.”
“I’m not a coward,” Zuko growled out lowly just like she knew he would.

“Oh, yeah?” Katara teased. “Then prove it.”

Smirking, Zuko locked eyes with her and tightened his hold on her hands.

“Alright. You asked for it,” he said.

Katara squealed with glee when Zuko spun them around, their hands never leaving each other, never breaking contact. Their laughter reached the ears of those around them and a few stopped to stare and cheer at the laughing Fire Lord and their master waterbender as they danced to the rhythm of the beating drums and the lively notes of the flutes.

“What’s going on?” Aang asked, stopping briefly from twirling Toph when he noticed that they were losing a few of their audience, who were moving away to watch something else. Once he spotted what was capturing the attention of the crowd, he felt his temper flare in anger and hurt.

Zuko was dancing with his girlfriend! Narrowing his gray eyes, the young Avatar made to stomp over to them and break them apart, but he was roughly pulled back by the hood of his parka.

“Ow! Toph!” he yelled as he turned his head to glare at the aggravating earthbender while he tried to pull free from her grasp.

“You’re my dancing partner for now, Twinkletoes,” Toph growled since she knew what he was trying to do. “Ditch me and die.”

Aang looked between the threatening earthbender and the dancing couple for a while as he tried to figure out what to do before he sighed and turned back to Toph, grabbing her hands once again. Katara and Zuko were just dancing and nothing more.

He glanced back at Toph. Besides, he did not have a death wish.

Jumping and spinning one more time, Zuko smiled when Katara let out another squeal of delight before she started giggling. He always tried to avoid dancing as much as possible when he was forced to attend Royal Court formal events, but he found that he was rather enjoying himself dancing with Katara, which was nothing surprising since he seemed to enjoy anything he did with her. He was positive that Katara was the only woman that would make him feel that way, the only one that would make him happy.

“That was so much fun!” Katara exclaimed with another laugh as the music stopped and they paused to catch their breaths.

“Yes, it was,” Zuko agreed as he stared at her, at the way her eyes sparkled and her cheeks flushed from their dance.

“And you said you didn’t know how to dance,” Katara teased as she poked him on the arm. “You lied to me, you liar!”

“No, I didn’t.”

“Liar, liar, pants on fire,” she sang teasingly before she grinned and added, “Get it, fire?”

Zuko shook his head and chuckled.

“You are definitely Sokka’s sister,” he said.

“Hey!”

“I did not lie,” he repeated more seriously. Smiling he reached up to touch her cheek which immediately made her pause in her giggles and lift her head to look up at him. “It seems that you brings out the best in me.”

“W-what…?” Katara asked, her eyebrows furrowing as she tried to understand what he meant by that, but his touch was distracting her.

Now, Zuko thought. Now was the time for him to confess his feelings for her, to tell her that he loved her, to make her understand that they were meant to be together, that he wanted to marry her.

“Katara,” he whispered softly as he continued to stroke her soft cheek. “Do you remember when we would sneak out of King Kuei’s palace so we could go to the infirmary?”

“Yeah…” Katara responded slowly.

“Remember when we returned to the palace after my fight with Jet?” he asked, though he was unable to stop the hard tone at the mention of the Freedom Fighter. “After you healed the wound on my chest…do you remember when I said that I needed to tell you something?”

“Yeah, you apologized,” Katara answered as a frown appeared on her face.

What was he trying to tell her? Both were unaware that there were people around them and some were staring at them curiously, as they continued to look into each other’s eyes.

“Well…” Zuko paused as he reached out his other hand to touch her other cheek, “There was something else that I wanted to tell you, but at that time I was unsure of how to say it…Something that I have known for a very long time, but was too stubborn to realize any sooner. Now I hope it’s not too late.”

Katara’s heart started to beat faster once more as she watched Zuko lean a bit closer to her just as he did so many times before. She shivered slightly when his warm breath touched her face.

Zuko swallowed thickly as he glanced down at Katara’s lips before he looked back at her brilliant cerulean orbs.

“I…I lo—”

“Suki!” Sokka’s terrified scream made them both jump and instinctively take up fighting stances, but once they realized they were not under attack they whirled around to where Sokka’s voice had come from, they were both still sitting in their place of honor.

Sokka was hovering over his new wife as he frantically asked her what was wrong. Suki was hunched over, her hands clutching at her rounded belly, pain etched all over her face, tears spilling from her eyes.

“Oh, La! I think Suki’s going into labor!” Katara exclaimed in alarm since it was a few weeks early. She started to make her way to her brother and his crying wife, but she stopped as she turned to Zuko with an apologetic as well as a worried expression. “Zuko… I’m sorry, but…”

“It’s okay, Katara,” Zuko reassured her as he gave her a small smile. “Suki needs you right now.”

Katara gave him a smile before she quickly dashed to the couple’s table where she asked Sokka to carefully pick Suki up and carry her into the house. Hakoda stepped up to reassure the alarmed and concerned crowd that everything was fine and that they should now celebrate the coming birth of a new member of the tribe before he rushed after his children and his daughter-in-law that was about to give birth to his first grandchild.

Zuko watched them go as he continued to stand where he had been since Katara left, before a deep sigh left him. He had been so close! It seemed that he would just have to wait a bit longer to confess his love to Katara, so he could finally have her as his, so that they could be happy together.

He glanced down as Toph appeared next to him. He vaguely wondered how she found him since she was wearing boots to walk in the snow. He watched as the short earthbender scratched her chin and tilted her head to the side.

“So much for the wedding night,” she remarked with a grin.

“Ah! This is torture! I can’t take it any longer!” Sokka exclaimed, failing his arms in the air agitatedly as he continued to pace along the corridor outside his and Suki’s bedroom where she was currently giving birth to their first child.

“You can’t take it any longer?” Toph scoffed as she rolled her eyes. “Suki’s the one who’s pushing something the size of a watermelon from her—”

“I am curious to know if the baby is a boy or a girl,” Ursa interrupted quickly as she turned slightly in her chair to look at her old friend. “What about you, Iroh dear?”

“Oh, yes.” Iroh nodded as he stroked his chin.
“Would you like a grandson or a granddaughter, Chief Hakoda?” Ursa asked as she looked to where the chieftain was standing, watching his frantic son with slight amusement in his eyes.

Hakoda looked away to smile at the Fire Lord’s mother.

“It doesn’t matter as long as I get a grandchild to dote upon,” he said with a tender twinkle in his blue eyes.

Ursa smiled from her spot between her son and Iroh. Jee was standing a few feet away from them. Aang, Toph, and Ty Lee were sitting on the floor playing what looked like a card game as they waited.

After he had deposited Suki on their bed, Sokka had tried to stay with her even after his sister, Toph, and Aang had warned him not to. He was dragged out by Katara and Jiao a few minutes later since he had fainted at the sight of Suki giving birth. A few hours had passed, and once he had regained consciousness, Sokka had been pacing nonstop in his worry, anxiety, and anticipation as he heard Suki’s screams of pain.

Sokka froze, and those waiting stared at him in shock, when Suki’s painful screams turn into curses hurled at him, screaming that everything was his fault and that she will never let him touch her again. The young warrior’s expression turn into hurt and his shoulders drooped.

“Do not worry, Sokka,” Ursa reassured the young man with a kind smile. “Some women react like that when they are in labor due to the excruciating pain, but they don’t really mean it.”

Sokka gave her a grateful smile as he continued in his pacing, wincing every time his beloved screamed in agony.

A few hours later, they all heard Kanna order Suki to give one more push before Suki gave out one last scream, which was followed by a soft and piercing cry—a baby’s wail.

Sokka stopped in his pacing as he heard his son’s cry and he was filled with so many emotions his eyes teared up. Zuko watched as Sokka’s face lit up with so much joy and pride, and he wondered if perhaps one day he would feel the same way.
To their surprise, there came a second piercing cry a few seconds later and Sokka’s mouth flew open.

“Two babies? I’m father of twins!” he exclaimed in shock as he raced to the door and waited impatiently for it to open so he could gaze upon his lovely wife and their newborn children.

“I told you guys you would be surprised,” Toph chuckled from her spot on the floor.

A few minutes later, but that seemed like hours to Sokka, the door opened and Kanna stepped out with a large smile on her face.

“You can all come in now and greet the new additions to our family,” she told them.

She looked at her impatient and excited grandson as she addressed him in particular. She nodded at the Fire Nation family as well when they looked at each other, uncertain if they were considered part of the family. They all stood up from their places as they made their way into the room.

As soon as he entered, Sokka rushed to Suki’s side. She was freshly dressed and resting on the bed, propped up into a sitting position by some pillows, with two small bundles wrapped in warm fur in each arm, and a loving smile on her tired face. Her smile grew wider when Sokka appeared next to her.

Sokka looked down at the bundles in his wife’s arms and once again was consumed with warm and tender emotions as he gazed down at the small faces of his two children. Both had light-tanned skin, but one had darker hair like him and the other lighter in color like Suki. Sokka turned loving eyes at his wife, kissing her sweaty forehead tenderly.

Katara watched as her brother cooed to his wife and their children, and a smile spread on her face. She, along with Jiao, had helped Kanna deliver the babies and she was glad it was finally over so that Suki could get some rest. She felt someone stand next to her, and by the warmth that reached her, she knew who it was. She looked up to see Zuko smiling at her with bright golden eyes. She gave him a small smile before she quickly looked away so she could hide the blush that his look had caused. Could her reaction mean that everyone was right? That she wasn’t in love with Aang, but with…?

She was distracted when Aang appeared between them and wrapped his arm around her. She watched as Zuko narrowed his eyes before he looked away to watch Sokka and his new family. That same guilty feeling twisted her insides when Aang smiled at her with shiny gray eyes and she looked away since it made her uncomfortable.

Sokka picked up the one with the darker hair gently so as not to scare the baby. His son opened his little eyes and blinked at him with bright, blue eyes.

“Hey, little guy. I’m your dad,” he cooed as he rocked the baby gently in his arms. The baby scrunched up his small nose.

“Um…sweetie?” Suki said as she giggled at her husband. “I think you mean little girl.”

“Oh, a daughter!” Sokka exclaimed happily before he glanced down at the other sleeping baby in his wife’s arms and crooned again, “Hello there, son.”

“Daughter,” Suki corrected again as she lightly rocked the sleeping child in her arms.

They all watched as Sokka’s face turned blank and they wondered if perhaps he was upset, it was no secret he was anticipating a son he could teach to become a warrior. All of the sudden, Sokka smiled so big that they were afraid his face was going to split in two.

“They’ll be the most pampered little girls in the whole Southern Water Tribe!” Sokka laughed softly as he continued to sway his daughter in his arms which immediately made her fall asleep.

“Hey, Snoozles,” Toph spoke up, though not as loud as she normally would, “Looks like I won our bet since you were wrong about it being a boy, but now it’s double since they’re two girls.”

The group laughed quietly when Sokka let out a defeated groan.

A new patch of white snow covered the roads and houses of the ice city, left from the snowstorm that passed the Southern Water Tribe the night prior. A few waterbenders were working under the weak morning light to remove the snow from the streets, sidewalks, and bridges so the citizens could go about their day.

Katara watched as her young waterbending students continued their lessons, honing their skills of their element. Though she was going through the basic moves, her mind was not really paying close attention. The small group of about a dozen little girls and boys, ranging from five to ten years old, held deep expressions of concentration on their cute little faces as they tried to mimic what their waterbending sifu was showing them.

Two weeks had passed since Suki gave birth to her and Sokka’s twin daughters. Both girls were big and healthy even though they had been born a few weeks early. Jing was the eldest one by a few minutes with a dark shade of hair like her father. Her younger twin sister with the lighter tuft of brown hair on her head was named Ting. Both baby girls had soft, light-tanned skin and large eyes of blue, just like both their proud and happy parents.

The chief’s house was filled with laughter and joy from having the new additions to the family and no one was able to escape the adorableness of the two little baby girls, not even the stoic young Fire Lord. However, there were mixed feelings when night came, bringing with it piercing wails that came from strong, healthy lungs that woke the whole household up. Poor Sokka and Suki had bags under their eyes, but they endured the sleepless nights when they would witness the joyful giggles and smiles of their baby girls.

Katara had been busy helping Suki recuperate after giving birth to two large babies and making sure that Jing and Ting were healthy, that she barely had any time for anything else. But now that everything had settled down a little, confusing thoughts and feelings had resurfaced in her mind, and with nothing to distract her, she could not hide from them any longer.

Lady Ursa’s words kept replaying in her head over and over again. Could it be true that she was not in love with Aang? Could it be true that perhaps she had never been in love with him in the first place? And then there was the thought that perhaps it was Zuko who she really had such feelings for. That he was the powerful bender that she was destined to be with.

Swirling the water whip around absentmindedly, Katara sighed as she relived the moment during Sokka and Suki’s wedding where she had shared a wonderful dance with Zuko. She thought back to the way he had been looking at her after the music had stopped and how his intense golden eyes had gazed into hers while he cradled her face in his warm hands. She wondered what it was that he had wanted to tell her before they were interrupted.

“Master Katara? Can we take a break now?” a little boy’s tired voice brought her out of her thoughts.

Katara blinked and stopped in her bending move, bringing the water whip down. She refocused her eyes on the children and smiled sheepishly when she noticed their weary little faces as they tried to keep up with her. She mentally blamed Zuko for distracting her for the millionth time.
“Oh, uh…yes! You all did excellent today! Now go on and have some fun. Class is dismissed,” she said.

She grinned and shook her head when the children bounded out of the small open arena with excited shouts before she had even finished the sentence.

Replacing the water back into the pouch on her hip, Katara quickly replaced her warm mittens over her chilly hands as she began to make her way back home. She absently acknowledged the people that greeted her as she passed them by as thoughts of the handsome firebender resurfaced in her mind again.

She had not spoken to Zuko much for the past few weeks, only seeing him at meals or an occasional break, and it was not just because she was the only one that had been busy. Zuko had been attending long meetings with both her father and Chief Arnook about strengthening the ties between the Fire Nation and both Water Tribes.

Quickening her pace a bit, she hoped that Zuko was not in another meeting at the moment for she wished to spend some time in his calming presence, even though the feelings he produced in her still confused her.

With an unreadable expression on his face, Zuko ignored the suspicious looks the people he passed threw at him as he walked through one busy street. His meeting with the chiefs from both Water Tribes finished a while ago and now he hoped he could spend a moment with Katara before either of their attentions was needed again. Sokka had given him directions to the place where Katara had her waterbending lessons and he was eager to see her. As he neared the edge of the city, the fewer people he came across. He hoped he was going in the right direction because many of the organized streets looked identical to him.

“Hey, Zuko! Wait up!” Ty Lee’s bubbly voice sounded from a few feet behind him.

Zuko paused before he turned around. He watched Ty Lee bound up to him with a scowling Toph grabbing onto the back of the acrobat’s parka. Once they reached him, Toph immediately released the enthusiastic girl and latched herself onto his arm with a deep scowl. The earthbender blew her bangs out of her eyes. She felt much safer having either Katara or Zuko lead her around since both benders were calmer and did not jostle her like Ty Lee did.

“Where are you heading, Sparky?” Toph asked him with a grin.
“I, uh, was just walking around,” Zuko muttered and cleared his throat.

“Uh-huh,” Toph uttered with a raised eyebrow before she cheekily added, “You were on your way to see Sugar Queen, huh?”

The young lord suppressed the urge to shift self-consciously.

“Maybe…” he hedged.

“You are. Admit it,” she said with a chuckle.

“Anyway,” the firebender stressed, “Where are you heading?”

“The same place as you,” the short girl replied with another grin.

“We were bored!” Ty Lee piped in. “We wanted to see if Katara wanted to hang out with us.”

“Yeah,” Toph said as they resumed their walk to the small arena where Katara taught her students. “Snoozles and Warrior Princess are with their little brats, Twinkletoes is busy, and your mom is having tea with the old folks.”

Zuko smirked slightly, wondering what Iroh would say if he heard Toph labeling him in with the old people that were made up by Katara’s Gran-Gran, Pakku, and their friends.

“Help! Help!” they heard a boy called out frantically.

The Fire Lord and the two women looked up to see a young teenage boy run down the lane with fearful eyes. A few people who were walking on the street turn to see what was happening. The boy stumbled a few feet from Zuko and the firebender strode forward to help him up. The boy’s eyes widened when he realized the Fire Lord stood before him and he gaped up at him.

“What’s wrong?” Zuko asked with a raised eyebrow.
The boy shook himself out of his stupor, fear once again etched on his young face.

“I-I spotted…arctic panther-wolves…a-at…the eastern edge of the city…” the boy panted as he tried to catch his breath and calm his frightened voice, “the kids…are playing there!”

“Oh, no!” a woman gasped as she grasped her throat.

“Go get the warriors!” an old man ordered the frightened youth.

The old man and two more men, who happened to be near by, raced toward the edge of the city where the small children sometimes played. Those that heard what the boy had said cried out and followed them, fearful that it could be one of their children that could be in danger. Arctic panther-wolves rarely caused any trouble since the tribe warriors kept them at bay, but the harsh condition of winter brought down the animals’ food supply, and so, they were sometimes forced to approach the human settlement in hopes of catching a meal.

Frowning deeply, Zuko swiftly followed them, thinking that the children could come to harm before the warriors arrived in time to save them. Ty Lee grabbed Toph’s hand and started to follow the grim-faced firebender and the small group of tribespeople.

Walking in a leisurely pace, Katara made her way to the grand house as she lost herself in her thoughts. She had come across one of the women who told her Aang was looking for her. Katara had thanked the woman for letting her know, but inwardly the waterbender hoped she could avoid him a bit longer, just so she could straighten out her thoughts.

Katara sighed once again. What should she do?

The sound of frightened shouts distracted her and she looked up to see a young boy racing down the street, calling for the warriors. She frowned, wondering what was going on. A group of women ran past her and she gasped at what they said.

Oh, no! she thought in alarm.

Katara removed her mittens and shoved them in the front pocket of her parka as she followed the Meanwhile, Zuko and the other villagers crested the small hill that was considered the border between the city and the arctic wilderness and peered down anxiously at the ground below. Zuko’s eyes widened at what he saw. The children were running as fast as they could toward the cliff so they could escape the beasts that had suddenly appeared, but the animals were much faster and were gaining ground.

The two arctic panther-wolves howled and snarled as they chased after their small prey. Their fur was pure white, dotted with dark spots from their heads all the way to their long, bushy tails. Dark, pointy canine ears sat on top of their feline heads, their sharp white fangs glinting brightly in the minimal light of the morning sun. Sharp black claws embellished huge paws that were attached to long, powerful legs, supporting their heavy, but slick bodies.

The crowd gasped as one little girl in particular was being left behind, she was younger than all the other children and unable to keep up with them. The old man shouted and began to make his way over the cliff as the animals started to close in on the little girl, but instead he had to hold back the child’s mother who was screaming hysterically as she tried to reach her daughter.

“Lien! Lien!” the woman screamed as she tried to wrench herself from the old man’s grasp.

They blinked in surprised when something streaked past them in a blur of black and red.

The small crowd became silent when they realized it was the Fire Lord that had dashed past them and was now skidding down the snowy cliff as he tried to reach the base quickly. Zuko jumped to the bottom and began to run without missing a beat, his strides long and fast. He ordered the children to climb the hill as he continued on his sprint to reach the little girl who had tears running down her cheeks as she tried to make it to safety.

Snapping out of her trance, Toph turned to glare unseeingly at the few people that were frozen in shock and fear around her.

“Don’t just stand there! Help the children climb up!” she ordered.

Ty Lee and a few others started to climb the edge of the cliff, gathering children onto their backs so they could reach the top quickly. Toph scowled and shifted from foot to foot since she could not see and had no dirt or stone that could allow her to help. She hoped Zuko didn’t get hurt. The old man was still trying to keep the frantic mother from running after her daughter and endangering both their lives.
They all gasped and the mother shrieked as the little girl tripped and fell to the snowy ground with a cry. The little girl turned onto her back and screamed in terror as one of the beasts lunged at her.

With a loud shout, Zuko jumped over the little girl, and with a spin, sent a fiery kick at the arctic panther-wolf’s head, sending it crashing back onto the second one. Both animals yelped as they stumbled onto the hard ground.

Landing in a crouch, the firebender swiftly stood up and sent two fireballs at the panther-wolves as they recuperated and threatened him with loud growls. Both animals snarled as they jumped to the side in order to avoid being scorched, but had to retreat even further when a wall of fire was erected before them. Zuko whirled around and quickly scooped the little girl up in his arms before he started racing back toward the cliff.

The little girl was sobbing and trembling in fear and Zuko tightened his hold on her as he continued on his run.

“It’s okay. You’re safe,” he said softly as he tried to comfort her.

The little girl buried her face in the crook of his neck and wrapped her small arms around her savior’s neck.

At that moment, Katara, along with more frantic people, arrived at the scene. The waterbender pushed her way through and looked down the cliff.

“Zuko!” she cried as she watched him running toward them with a little girl in his arms. She briefly noticed that a wall of fire held the panther-wolves at bay before she returned her attention to the firebender. “Zuko!” she called out more loudly.

Zuko’s heart jumped in his chest at the sound of Katara calling his name. He glanced up at the cliff and saw her standing at the edge.

Katara! he thought and he forced himself to run faster.

“Come on, come on, come on!” Katara prayed fervently as she watched Zuko approach them.
Twin howls of rage pierced the air and Katara shifted her attention to the panther-wolves who had begun to chase them with even more determination after the fire wall had extinguished.

“No!” she cried out.

Zuko began to run faster as the sound of pounding feet reached his ears. He was almost to the bottom of the snowy cliff! He would not let the little girl come to harm! He felt the girl lift her head a bit from his neck before she tensed.

“Watch out!” she screamed as she wrapped her small arms tightly around his neck.

Zuko glanced back and threw himself to the side, narrowly avoiding the swipe to his back by one of the panther-wolves’ deadly claws. He twisted around in the air and landed on his back so he would not crush and hurt the girl. His eyes widened when he realized that the beasts were upon them, and without a second thought, he placed the girl to the ground and jumped up to put himself between them. He manage to send a large fireball at the closest one, sending it flying backwards with a painful howl, but was not quick enough as the other one crashed into him with an angry snarl.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed as she watched in horror as he tried to rise, but the panther-wolf was swifter and sprang at him.

Her heart wrenched painfully in her chest before she instinctively brought her arm up and an ice spike appeared before the lunging animal. The panther-wolf crashed into it, but the other one avoided it easily and snarled as it lunged at Zuko’s throat with its deadly opened maw.

With an anguished cry, Katara brought her arm up and a torrent of snow crashed against the animal’s side, sending it flying a few feet away. Meanwhile, the first panther-wolf had recuperated and sprang at Zuko again, but a boomerang sang through the air from behind Katara before she could react. It headed straight at the animal before it could injure Zuko, and it hit the beast right on the face. The panther-wolf stumbled backward at the impact with a loud yelp as the boomerang made a turn and headed the way it came from. Katara spun around to watch the weapon make its return and cried out in relief when she saw Sokka grab it with Aang and Master Pakku running towards them with a few warriors rushing to their aid. More citizens were running after them with worried cries. The warriors wasted no time as they ran down the cliff with loud yells as they threw long spears and arrows at the huge panther-wolves who tried to attack again.

Regaining his feet in a bit of pain from the impact, Zuko summoned his fire whip and cracked it at the first panther-wolf’s chest as it sprang at him again before it jumped further back when another ice spike sprang from the ground in front of it thanks to Katara. The second one readied itself to launch again, but a large gust of wind from Aang barreled into it and sent the animal flying back.

The crowd standing at the cliff cheered. A second later, the panic-stricken woman’s husband arrived and grabbed her from the old man’s grasp, holding her consolingly as he, too, looked over at his daughter in anguish. Ty Lee and Toph quickly approached Katara and told her what happened since they ran into Zuko. After a moment, Katara tuned them out as she gave her full attention to the firebender. She felt her body slump in relief that she had made it in time to help him before tears pricked her eyes at the thought that Zuko could have been killed if she had been one moment later.

Once the warriors began to drive the arctic panther-wolves away, Zuko bent down to pick up the little girl. He smiled when the child immediately jumped into his arms before he began to quickly make his way to the others. Once he finally climbed over the small cliff, he froze in surprise when he was received with loud cheers as the crowd, grown larger since he had arrived, swarmed him. The little girl clung onto him in fright and anxiety and he patted her back reassuringly as people surrounded them from all sides.

“Lien! Lien!” a couple shouted with large smiles and tearful eyes as they shoved people aside so they could get to their daughter.

“Mama! Papa!” the little girl yelled happily as soon as she spotted her parents.

Zuko smiled as he handed the small child over to the open arms of her parents who immediately began to fuss over her, placing small kisses all over her small face.

“Zuko!” he heard Katara yell.

He spun around at the sound of her voice and once again was surprised when she lunged herself at him with a joyful cry. He caught her just in time, steadying her before they stumbled onto the ground. Smiling, he wrapped his arms around her and brought her closer to him, but not too close as to make it scandalous.

“Thank you for saving me,” he told her sincerely in a soft tone.

“I’m just glad you’re okay,” Katara whispered as she buried her face on his chest.
He looked down at her, his eyes widening when she lifted her head to look at him with teary eyes. He opened his mouth to ask her why she was crying, but she let him go when the little girl’s parents approached them.

“Thank you, Fire Lord Zuko, for rescuing our daughter,” the man said gratefully as he gave him a deep bow.

“You’re welcome,” Zuko responded as he inclined his head.

“We are forever in your debt,” the woman said as she gave him a small bow, she couldn’t bend any lower since she was holding onto her daughter. She then turned to Katara and thanked her as well.

The little girl squirmed in her mother’s arms and the woman reluctantly set her down on her feet. Before the young Fire Lord could respond, the four-year-old ran up to him and hugged his leg. Katara watched with a tender smile as Zuko looked down at the little girl with shocked, wide eyes before he gave her a hesitant smile.

“Thank you for saving me from the big, bad panther-wolves,” the small child said with something akin to awe in her voice as she looked up at him and gave him a large toothy grin.

_Aww, how cute!_ Katara gushed in her head as she looked at the little girl with adoring eyes and then at Zuko. Her heart warmed at the touching sight.

“You’re very welcome,” Zuko responded as he gave her a small pat on her head.

The little girl flashed him another bright smile before her parents led her away after thanking him several more times. A few seconds later, Zuko was surrounded with people praising him loudly for his heroic act. Frowning, Zuko nodded at their words as he tried to find a way to leave without insulting anybody since his ears were starting to hurt and his personal space was being invaded. The only one allowed to enter his personal space was Katara.

Sensing his irritation and uneasiness, Katara stepped up to him and touched his arm. She smiled when he relaxed at her touch before she turned to the excited crowd.

“I think Fire Lord Zuko needs to rest after his amazing rescue.” She grinned when Zuko glared at her. “Now if you’ll excuse us…” she trailed off as she grabbed his hand and led him away. The people quickly parted to let them through.

Zuko squeezed Katara’s hand, and when she looked up at him, he gave her a grateful smile that she returned with a light blush.

Ty Lee’s eyes widened in surprise as she watched her two friends leave.

“I can’t believe it,” she muttered in astonishment.

“Can’t believe what?” Toph asked. She was now holding onto the stupefied acrobat since Katara and Zuko had left her.

“Zuko and Katara…were holding hands,” Ty Lee said in wonder.

“Yeah? So?” the small earthbender asked. She winced when the crowd started cheering again when the warriors and the Avatar returned.

“Zuko is not one to allow such displays. He barely tolerates Mai grabbing onto his arm in public.”

Toph grinned. “Is that so?”

“But there’s something even more amazing,” Ty Lee continued in the same stunned tone, “I don’t know what to make of it.”

“What?” Toph asked.

“When Zuko and Katara were together, I decided to check Zuko’s aura to see if he was okay and it was a combination of clear red and…bright pink, the colors of sexual passion and…love,” the acrobat said in disbelief, “It’s never been pink with Mai, barely even red.”

“I’m sure if you’d checked months before you would’ve realized his feelings for Katara sooner,” the earthbender stated with a chuckle.
“Wow,” was all Ty Lee could say and she shook her head in awe before she sadly added, “Mai will be devastated.”

Toph shrugged her shoulders since she honestly could not say she cared what the cold noblewoman felt.

“Will you tell her?” she asked the pensive acrobat.

“I don’t know,” Ty Lee said truthfully yet guiltily, “Even if I can see people’s auras and understand what they are feeling, I try not to get involved too much. They have reasons why they want to keep things hidden and I try to respect that. I really don’t want to lose Zuko’s trust or have him mad at me.”

“I see your point,” Toph replied with a nod before she curiously asked, “Did you see Katara’s aura?”

Ty Lee frowned before she shook her head.

“No, I was too shocked by Zuko’s to pay attention to hers,” she admitted.

Toph frowned. Sokka and Aang disengaged themselves from the crowd and made their way to the two girls. Toph and Ty Lee immediately dropped the subject.

“Hey, what happened to Zuko?” Sokka asked as he looked around for his firebending friend. “He’s not hurt, is he?”

“Nah, he’s fine,” the earthbender replied as she waved her hand in the air, “As if some stupid animals could bring Sparky down.”

Aang scanned the crowd that was still praising the warriors and frowned when he did not spot the person he was looking for.

“Where’s Katara?” he asked.
Ty Lee answered absentmindedly, “Oh, she and Zuko went—”

“—back to the house!” Toph cut in and dug her nails into Ty Lee’s arm so she would stay quiet. “Yeah, you know how Sugar Queen is. She probably dragged him there so he could get some rest or something.”

Aang’s frown deepened before he narrowed his gray eyes as he clutched his staff tightly in his hands.

“I’m gonna go check on them, eh…I mean I’m gonna check on Zuko and make sure he’s okay,” he muttered as he started to make his way to the grand house.

“Wait! I’m coming with you!” Sokka called out as he ran to catch up to the young boy.

Ty Lee’s smile faded from her face once they were out of sight and she snatched her arm back, rubbing it to soothe the pain away.

“Ow, that hurt!” she groused before she added disapprovingly, “Aang is going to be upset when he finds out you lied to him.”

Toph just shrugged.

“It’s for the greater good,” she said simply.

Katara and Zuko walked through the snow in comfortable silence, their hands still clasped together, as they returned to the ice city. It was now noon and the sun was able to peek out from the clouds once in a while, making the soft snow glisten on the ground and on the frozen ice buildings. A few people were going about their business, but would occasionally stop and gawk as they watched their master waterbender with the young Fire Lord.

Zuko was not sure why Katara still held onto his hand and wondered if she was even aware of it, but he did not say anything so as not to make her move away from him. He was enjoying having her hand in his, their skin touching innocently.
Katara was well aware that they were still holding hands and she also noticed the looks they were receiving, but she could just not bring herself to care. She had been so scared when that arctic panther-wolf had almost wounded Zuko and touching him was enough to reassure her that he was indeed fine. She could not explain it, but she felt like she could not let Zuko leave her side at the moment.

Glancing up from the corner of her eye, Katara smiled when she noticed that he was content with their current situation and decided to break the peaceful silence.

“How did you know about the arctic panther-wolves?” she asked curiously.

Zuko glanced down at her and smiled.

“I was actually looking for you once I finished speaking to your father and Chief Arnook,” he began as he saw another group of people had stopped to look at them, “I asked Sokka if he knew where you were and he told me that you were in the training area. I was heading there with Toph and Ty Lee when the young boy brought the news about the attack.”

“Oh,” Katara said. “That was very brave of you, Zuko, risking your life to save the little girl against those two huge arctic panther-wolves all by yourself.”

“Well, you don’t expect me to just stand there and watch, right?” the firebender responded with a raised eyebrow. “I’m just glad I arrived in time, I don’t want to imagine what could’ve happened if I didn’t.”

Katara shuddered.

“I’m glad you did, too. Lien is such a sweet little girl and she doesn’t deserve to have her life ended in such a way.”

“Is she one of your waterbending students?”

“No,” Katara replied and shook her head. “Lien’s not a waterbender, but she usually comes to the training classes to watch her friends.” She laughed softly. “She’s more observant and interested than my actual students.” Pausing for a moment, Katara glanced back up at him again and smiled. “Thanks, Zuko, for saving her.”

“There’s no need for you to thank me. Anyone would have done the same,” Zuko said as he looked around the street they were walking on before he decided to change the topic. “So…where are we going?”

The waterbender laughed as she gave one last squeeze of his hand before she reluctantly let go. It wouldn’t do for their reputations to be tarnished. She missed the disappointed frown that crossed Zuko’s features as she skipped ahead.

“Well, you did ask me if I could give you a tour of the Southern Water Tribe,” Katara chirped. “We’ve been so busy lately, so I think now is a good time as any!”

Zuko gazed down at the young woman by his side, at her lively blue eyes and the playful curve of her lips, and smiled.

“I say it is,” he agreed.

The young Fire Lord was very attentive to everything Katara showed him as she guided him through the snowy streets and over frozen bridges of her white ice city. Again, he was impressed by the houses and buildings with their graceful carvings along their walls and by the well-organized paths of the crystal clear canals. He watched as merchants carried their things on tall buffalo-deer while children ran around as they played, weaving around warriors who passed by while polar bear-dogs playfully barked and chased after them.

People greeted them wherever they went, and to Katara’s annoyance, many young women would gather together to gawk at the handsome Fire Lord with loud giggles and excited squeals, drool threatening to fall from the corner of their mouths.

How pathetic can they be? Katara huffed mentally as she sent a glare to another group of squealing girls.

Katara looked up at Zuko’s striking face with his mesmerizing golden eyes and sighed inaudibly.

Though I can’t blame them since Zuko is quite stunning, she thought in a haze. She had to quickly look away before she started drooling like those silly girls.

They visited the infirmary where they watched young women learn how to use their waterbending for healing. Zuko learned that in the Northern Water Tribe female waterbenders were only supposed to use their ability for healing while fighting was typically for the men. He listened as Katara told him of how she was told to take healing lessons and was banned from learning how to fight while at the Northern Water Tribe by Pakku himself. He chuckled when she proudly told him how she went against the old master waterbender’s orders and actually picked a fight with him.

“Though I didn’t win, Master Pakku consented in teaching me how to use my waterbending to fight,” Katara told him with a grin.

Zuko smirked.

If she hadn’t been so stubborn and set on proving that she could be a warrior despite being a female, we’d never have been able to continue on our journey to end the war, he thought as he deliberately brushed against her arm and smiled when she blushed. And I would never have fallen in love with her and known that I could actually be happy.

Leaving the infirmary, Katara led him to another part of the city where many shops lined the streets. To their surprise, Zuko was given a gift in every store they stopped in, they eventually had to send a few young boys to deliver the things back to the grand house so they did not have to keep carrying the stuff around.

“Is it customary for the shop owners to give away gifts to visiting rulers?” Zuko asked curiously after they walked out from another small store with a bag of frozen candy.

They were small little balls that were cold in your hand, but melted instantly in your mouth with an explosion of sweet chocolate flavor. He had never come across such treats before, but he enjoyed them nonetheless.

Katara happily popped another frozen candy into her mouth and frowned.

“Oh…actually it’s not, which is weird,” she looked at him with a pensive expression. “So why are they giving you all this?”

“I don’t know,” Zuko answered with a shrug as he placed another piece of candy into his mouth.
Katara shrugged as well as she ate another frozen treat. She found nothing to complain about since she was getting free stuff too for just being with Zuko.

They later found out that Zuko was being treated much better now than since his arrival was because news about his heroic deed that morning had spread throughout the entire Southern Water Tribe. The people were now showing him their gratitude and that they harbored no ill feelings toward him anymore.

“Well, what do you know,” Katara piped in after another group of praising people had left them alone. “You’re touching the hearts of so many,” she teased and batted her eyelashes with a sigh.

“Hm,” Zuko muttered with a snort and scowled when Katara laughed at him.

Zuko sighed quietly when she looked away.

But have I touched your heart, Katara?

The more he found out about the Southern Water Tribe, about Katara and about her culture, the harder he fell for her. He found it difficult not to scoop her in his arms and confess to her what it was that he truly felt for her, that he saw her more than just a friend, and that it was becoming harder for him to keep his hands away from her.

Soon, he promised, soon she would finally know the real reason why he had visited the Southern Water Tribe. Soon she would know that he had all those meetings with both tribe chieftains so the three countries could have a friendly and comfortable relationship with no problems if they were ever to be married. Hopefully everything would go has he wished.

“Wow. It’s getting late,” the brunette woman stated as she frowned at the darkening sky before she turned to grin at him. “Are you hungry?”

Zuko opened his mouth to tell her he was fine, but instead he cleared his throat and flushed when his stomach growled.

“I think some food would be nice,” he said stoically.
Katara rolled her eyes and laughed.

“I know!” she exclaimed as she snapped her fingers. “Follow me!” she said as she grabbed his arm and quickly led him away through another street.

“Are we going back to the house?” Zuko asked as he allowed her to guide him.

“Nope,” Katara replied with a grin. “You took me to a restaurant when you showed me around the Fire Nation capital and I will do the same…well, not really since where I’m taking you is a far cry from a restaurant,” she mumbled before she chirped again, “Anyway, I want you to try something.”

“Alright,” Zuko responded as he eyed her with a raised eyebrow.

The sun was now sinking over the horizon and the large clouds that moved across the sky were making the afternoon become darker more quickly. They passed several streets and crossed many bridges until they came upon the center of the Southern Water Tribe where the wedding had taken place a few weeks ago, but now instead of rows of tables and flower decorations, the circular place was filled with stalls of varying merchandise. Vendors called for customers, while the citizens mingled amongst themselves and children played. And just like before, the people cheered once they spotted the Fire Lord.

Katara almost jumped with giddiness as she led the silent young man to one of the stalls, but she restrained herself so she wouldn’t look like a silly little girl. Zuko sniffed the air and raised his eyebrow as the smell of fried meat reached his nose, though the scent was not like anything he had ever smelled before. Once they drew near, Zuko noticed an old man placing some kind of dark red meat on sticks and coating them with some kind of batter before he dumped them in a frying pan.

The man looked up from what he was doing before he quickly set everything aside as he gave them a short bow.

“Master Katara, Fire Lord Zuko, how may I help you on this lovely afternoon?”

“I’ll have one, please,” Katara said with a smile before she looked over at Zuko who was still eyeing the fried sticks. “What about you, Zuko?”
Zuko glanced at her briefly before he looked back at the smiling old man.

“I’ll take one as well, please,” he said impassively, though there was a tone of curiosity in his voice.

“Of course, right away!” the vendor exclaimed happily.

He skewered two pieces of meat and coated them in the batter before he placed them in the frying oil. A few minutes later, he pulled them out, dabbed the excess oil away, sprinkled some salt, and then handed the two skewers to his young customers.

“Thank you,” both Katara and Zuko said as they grabbed their sticks and paid him. They turned around from the stall and began to walk away.

“I know this isn’t as fancy as the food from the restaurant you took us to, but I really like it,” Katara explained as she took a bite from the fried meat.

“This is fine, Katara,” Zuko said as he looked at her eat before he glanced down at his own food, “Though I wonder what kind of meat this is.”

“T-tiger-seal…?” Zuko stuttered as he gaped at the piece of meat in his hand.

Well, this sure was not what he was used to, but if it was what Katara ate and liked then he would try it and eat it. Katara never complained about any of his native dishes while she visited the Fire Nation and neither would he.

Katara paused midway from taking another bite as she looked at him almost gaping at his food.

“You don’t have to eat it if you don’t want to,” she said kindly softly. “We can get something else.”

“No!” Zuko exclaimed as he snapped himself from his stupor to look at her. “I’m sorry if I made you think I didn’t want to eat it. It’s just that, well…I never actually thought tiger-seals were edible, but like Uncle always says, ‘you learn something new every day’, right?’ He grinned at her.

Before she could say anything else, Zuko took a bite from the skewer and began to chew. The meat was a bit tough and it had a strange taste to it at first, but after taking two more bites, Zuko began to enjoy the unique flavors that assaulted his taste buds.

Katara chewed her lip as she waited for Zuko to say whether he liked it or hated it. She should have considered that perhaps Zuko would not like such food. Aang certainly didn’t, being a vegetarian and all. She would understand if Zuko did not like it and she knew he would try to tell her in polite words if that were the case. She watched as he took one last bite from the now bare stick, chewed on it a bit, and then swallowed.

“Well?” she asked after a few seconds of silence. She watched as Zuko stared at her for a moment before he looked down at the skewer in her hand.

“Are you going to eat that?” he asked as he indicted the stick with a nod of his head.

Katara gaped at him, then at the fried-meat-on-a-stick in her hand, back up at Zuko who had a hopeful look in his eyes, then at the stick again, then back at him before she burst out into loud laughter.

Zuko frowned as he watched her have a giggle fit. What was so funny?

The young woman clutched her side as she tried to breathe and control her laughter.

“S-sure, Zuko, you can have it,” she said between a few giggles. “I’m not that hungry anyway.” She grinned when she handed the tiger-seal meat stick to the still frowning young man.

“Hm, thanks,” Zuko muttered as he raised a quizzical eyebrow at her. He grabbed it and immediately took another bite.

The sun had completely disappeared from the sky when they began to head back to the grand house. The light-blue lanterns that aligned the streets and the walls of the buildings were lit and the ice city turned into a breathtaking, sparkly winter wonderland. They stepped onto one of the many beautifully carved bridges and leaned on it as a soft breeze swirled snow around their forms. They stared down at their reflections on the serene water below them before their eyes locked together.
They gazed into each other’s eyes for a moment, neither of them able to utter a single word before Katara looked away.

“Katara?” Zuko spoke up after another silent second.

“Yeah?” she responded as she looked back at him through the surface of the water.

“There’s something that has been on my mind ever since this morning,” he began as he held her gaze. “I have something to ask you, will you answer my question?”

“Sure, Zuko, what is it?”

“Why were you crying?” he asked softly.

“What?” Katara said as she furrowed her forehead and looked away from the water to stare at him. When was she crying?

“After I returned with Lien and handed her to her parents you…um…embraced me,” he said with a smile.

Katara looked away as a blush surfaced on her cheeks. “Y-yeah?”

“Well, when you looked up at me you had tears in your eyes. Why was that?” he asked again.

“Well, that’s a dumb question since the answer is so obvious,” Katara answered with a small giggle.

“Is it?” Zuko asked and frowned.

When she saw that he was indeed clueless, Katara let out a sigh before her cheeks heated again.

“When I saw the arctic panther-wolves attack you, I felt so...afraid. I knew that you wouldn’t have had a chance if both animals got you while you had Lien to worry about. And then when that one panther-wolf was about to b-bite your throat…the thought that you could’ve…died scared me so much,” she whispered.

“Really? Would my death affect you that much?” he asked quietly.

“Of course it would, Zuko!” Katara exclaimed as if that was a stupid question. “I…care for you a lot and I…don’t ever want to think about you…not being there.”

With me, she mentally added.

Zuko looked back down at their reflections that were illuminated by the glowing lanterns and a large smile appeared on his face before he could stop it. His heart skipped a beat before it started to beat faster as a warm feeling ran throughout his body. He still found it hard to believe that anyone aside from his mother and his uncle cared whether he was dead or alive and it really made him happy to know that it was her, Katara, the woman he loved. Katara really did care for him and he knew she liked him a lot, making his plan to woo her and gain her heart that much easier. Perhaps now was the time to confess his feelings for her. The moment was perfect.

Zuko cleared his throat.

“Katara have you ever…given thought about your future?”

“My future?” Katara said as she smiled sheepishly since she had asked Aunt Wu what her future held…well more accurately, what her future husband would be like. “Yeah, I guess. Why?”

Zuko clasped his hands behind his back as he looked up at the cloudy sky.

“Do you ever see yourself married and with children?” he asked quietly.

“Uh…” Katara uttered in surprise.

I so did not expect him to ask me that question! She pulled her braid over her shoulder and began to play with it.
“Y-yes, I do,” she stuttered with a blush.

Inwardly, Zuko smiled happily before he sobered up and clenched his hands tightly as he prepared himself for her answer to his following question.

“With Aang?” he almost choked out the question.

Katara’s eyes widened and she froze.

“I…” she paused before she exhaled deeply. “I don’t know,” she admitted guiltily.

The young lord mentally let out a sigh of relief that she had not said yes immediately.

“Really?” he commented casually.

The heavy clouds that had hung all day in the sky opened up and a few snowflakes made their descent to the illuminated city below.

Zuko extended a hand to catch a few of the fluffy snowflakes and watched as they melted in his palm. He looked around at the ice city before him with an awed look before he glanced back at Katara who was also trying to catch a few snowflakes with her gloved hands. Now he understood why Katara loved the Southern Water Tribe so much, since the more he saw of it the more he began to love it too. It was almost as beautiful as the woman who had captured his heart.

He moved away from the ledge of the bridge and straightened. He stepped a bit closer to her and turned all the way so he could be able to see her.

“Have you ever thought about the possibility that maybe the relationship between Aang and you would…one day cease to be? Have you ever thought about allowing another man court you?” he asked softly.

_What?_ Katara exclaimed in her mind. _Now Zuko’s telling me that Aang and I are not meant to be_?
And what’s with the last question?

“I…I don’t know what to say to that,” she confessed.

“Katara,” Zuko began as he gazed intently into her eyes as he had many time before. “Would you allow another man to court you if he were to tell you he was in love with you?”

Katara felt like her heart was about to leap out of her chest for it was beating so fast. Zuko’s amber orbs held her captive and his comforting warmth touched her even through the thick parkas they were wearing. What were these feelings that surged up in her every time she was with Zuko? She watched as he smiled at her and she averted her eyes with a light blush.

“I don’t know,” she said as she chewed on her lip, once again capturing Zuko’s attention. “Why are you asking me these kinds of questions, Zuko?”

Taking a deep breath, Zuko reached for her hand resting on the bridge’s edge and hoped that everything would go well, but he pulled back when they heard someone call the waterbender’s name. He cursed when Katara turned away from him to see who had called her. It was a young woman who was asking for her assistance in healing her husband who had slipped on ice and broke his arm and a leg.

“I’m sorry, Zuko. We’ll talk later, okay?” Katara said as she turned to him with an apologetic smile as she touched his arm.

“Alright,” the firebender muttered.

Zuko again cursed mentally as he watched the waterbender walk away with the worried woman. Why was it that every time he was going to tell Katara how he felt about her, something would interrupt him? It was as if the spirits were trying to intervene between them. He narrowed his eyes. It did not matter. He would tell her soon and nothing would stop him from having and loving her.

Nothing.
“Noooo!” Katara woke up with a scream, her hand flying to the left side of her chest right above her frantically beating heart.

Cold sweat beaded on her forehead as she looked around her surroundings with shallow breaths before she let out a small cry of relief. Sitting up on her bed, she grabbed the silver rose hairpin that rested on her nightstand and grasped it tightly in her shaking hands as she brought it close to her heart.

“It was just a horrible nightmare,” she whispered into the darkness of her silent room. She wrapped her warm furs around her shivering form and brought the hairpin closer to her chest as she tried to calm her nerves.

The dream began to repeat over and over in her head. Katara closed her eyes as if to stop seeing the dreadful images, but they kept playing in her head even behind the darkness of her closed eyes.

It started like any other harmless dream, and she knew it was a dream, because her mother was with her with that same beautiful smile Katara remembered her mother always had. They were both in the kitchen of the new grand house and they were talking, though Katara could not remember what they had been talking about or why she had blushed when Kya nudged her arm with an elbow and laughed softly.

Fear had crept into her when her mother’s face turned into a terrified expression just like the one she had that day she was killed, before the older woman grabbed Katara’s arm and started to push her out of the room, urging her to run to him before it was too late.

Him? Him who? Those were the questions Katara thought before the scene changed and disappeared, and with it, her mother’s voice and form.

Katara had frowned when she found herself outside in the snow, looking down at the cliff at the edge of the city. What she saw made her let out a loud gasp. Zuko was running towards her, sporting shredded clothes, blood covering his entire body. She had called to him and sighed in relief when he looked up and called her name, but what she saw next made her scream in fright and her heart wrenched painfully in her chest. Chasing after Zuko with earsplitting growls and snarls, were impossibly gigantic arctic panther-wolves, not two, but half a dozen of them with large, glowing red eyes.
She had screamed his name again as she started to make her way down the cliff that now seemed higher than normal in order to help him. But she gasped when she found herself unable to move, frozen in place as she watched helplessly as Zuko tried to run to her while he sent fire blasts behind him when the monstrous beasts got too close.

Then the worst happened. Zuko had tripped and crashed onto the unforgiving hard ground. He tried to get up, but another terrified scream tore itself from her throat as the rabid animals pounced on him and began to rip him apart. His crimson blood quickly began to stain the once pure white snow as his cries of painful agony resonated in her head.

Shuddering in her blankets, Katara shook her head in order to erase the horrible dream and she clutched the hairpin tighter, bringing it even closer to her heart as she sought the comfort the silver piece of jewelry always brought ever since Zuko had given it to her. She clenched her eyes shut again as she tried to will the images of Zuko being killed in such a brutal manner away from her mind.

“It was just a nightmare. It wasn’t real. Zuko’s not dead. Zuko’s alive,” she chanted quietly to herself as she lay back down on her bed with the hairpin still in her hands.

She knew the dream came to be because of what happened hours ago and how scared she had felt, though she did not know what her mother had to do with it. Seeing Zuko almost be hurt had made her feel so terrified, but watching him be gruesomely killed caused an unbearable pain to spread in her chest and tears to accumulate in her eyes. The pain was so great that it left her gasping for air.

She had never felt such an intense painful feeling before. Her mother’s death had hurt her, but never to such an extent as she was experiencing now. When Aang had almost died when Azula stuck him with lightning, she had been so frightened and worried, but it did not cause her so much pain like just the image of Zuko being killed in such a terrible way did in her dream.

Why? Why was she having such feelings? And it was not just the terrified feelings she felt at the moment, but the ones that had begun to confuse her ever since Zuko had joined them four years ago. What did it all mean?

Why did the simple thought of Zuko dying make her gasped out painfully? Why did she feel so compelled to ease Zuko’s suffering and help him be happy ever since he confided in her about his painful past? Why did she miss him so much when they separated those few months ago? Why did her heart always start to race wildly in her chest every time she was near Zuko, every time she caught his eye, or every time he touched her? Why did the thought that Zuko could be the powerful bender Aunt Wu predicted to be her husband made her so happy? Why did every time Zuko leaned so close to her did she hope it was so he could kiss her? She blushed. Why did she desperately wish Zuko would do what he had done to her in those erotic dreams she had had recently?
But most importantly why did she want to be with him always?

“Because I’m in love with him,” she confessed, sighing softly.

She bolted upright again and grasped her silver hairpin even tighter in her hands.

“Oh, my spirits, I’m in love with Zuko!” she gasped. She opened her clenched palm and gazed down at the trinket, a warm smile appearing on her shocked face.

There was no denying it now that she had confessed it out loud, now that she had admitted it to herself. The reason why she felt so many confusing yet wonderful feelings was because Zuko was the one that she was in love with, not Aang. Even though Zuko had done many mistakes in the past, and despite the fact that he had hurt her by betraying her on that day under the Crystal Catacombs of Ba Sing Se, she had fallen deeply in love with him.

Now she understood why her Gran-Gran kept on lecturing her about her relationship ever since she had told her that Aang was her boyfriend. Now she understood what Toph, Suki, and Lady Ursa were trying to tell her. What she felt for Aang was not true love, but a very strong affection, an affection that she had tried to force into being romantic love for his sake in order to make him happy. That was why she felt so awkward, so wrong when Aang hugged her too close or kissed her too eagerly. It was not him whom she loved. It was not Aang who was destined for her.

It was Zuko.

It was his company that she enjoyed looking forward to all day. He was the one who made her heart stutter and her stomach flutter with butterflies just by his commanding and warm presence and even just by the sound of his deep, masculine voice. Zuko was the one whom she dreamed and thought about, the one who occupied most of her thoughts. She blushed again. It was Zuko whom her body desired and yearned for.

He was just so very handsome despite the scar that covered most of the left side of his face. In fact, she loved it as much as she loved Zuko. His hair was the darkest shade of black and there had been many times where she had to stop herself from reaching up to touch his short hair. His voice, though impassive most of the time, could make her melt when he would lower it into a deep timbre. Regardless of his cold features, his almond-shaped golden eyes burned so fiercely, and every time she caught his eyes, she could not look away. Not to mention the lean muscles of his upper body that made her mouth water.
But it was not just his physical attributes that she loved. Zuko was so attentive to her, he protected her, though he acknowledged that she could defend herself and did not treat her like a helpless and weak woman. He helped her overcome her sorrow and anger about her mother’s death and he had shared his pain with her as well. He listened to her when she had a problem and gave her comfort when the others did not notice.

She loved his steady golden gaze, his warm hands, his honorable person and his reserved nature, and she loved his stunning smiles and his rare and wonderful laughter.

There were just so many things that she loved about Zuko, but what she loved the most was him. He was the one whom she wanted to spend the rest of her life with. Zuko was the one who held her heart.

Her fingers gently, lovingly, caressed the beautiful ruby and sapphire gems as another sigh escaped her lips. How come she did not see it before? How stupid could she have been for not realizing such things, for not realizing the depth of her feelings for Zuko much sooner? Or maybe she did all along, but she must have been so deep in denial that she just did not want to acknowledge it.

“Well, enough stupidity,” Katara told herself as a large grin settled on her lips.

With her heart hammering in her chest and her cheeks burning red, she threw her covers away from her body as she swiftly sprang from her bed. She excitedly pulled on her fur boots before she went to her dresser to pull out a long parka.

She could not wait to tell Zuko what it was that she truly felt for him! She was sure that he would be so surprised. The young woman giggled as she combed through her slightly mussed hair before she spared a quick glance at her window. She frowned as she finally noticed that it was still the middle of the night, dawn was still a few hours away, and everybody was still asleep.

Huffing, she placed the hairbrush down, took off the parka and boots, and settled back down on the bed with the rose pin still in her hands. She would have to wait until Zuko woke up at dawn to tell him. It was okay. She could wait a few more hours.

As the night progressed, her eyes began to droop and a small yawn escaped her. The darkness and silence surrounded her, and she replaced the blankets back on her body as the chilly air made her shiver, before a thought made her frown sadly.
Maybe she should talk to Aang first and tell him that they could not be together any longer before she sought Zuko out. It would be the proper thing to do. She sighed sadly and a guilty frown marred her features. Aang had been her friend for years now and she really did love him, just not in a romantic way, and she did not want to cause him any pain, she did not want to hurt him. He would be so devastated. She bit her lip. What should she do?

The more time went by, the happiness she had felt at her discovery began to drain away. She curled into herself with the trinket pinned between her hands and her chest as depression began to settle within her.

What was she thinking? She could not tell Zuko what she felt since he did not feel the same way she did for him. He had said that he did not look at her as more than a friend. Katara closed her eyes tightly. She…was not his type.

Besides, Zuko was not single. He was in a long-term relationship with Mai and she had heard rumors in the Fire Nation Palace that it was a likely possibility that they could become engaged soon. She gritted her teeth as the jealousy spread through her once again and she did not care to stop it even though she knew it was foolish of her to feel such a thing. Zuko and Mai loved each other. There was no place for her in Zuko’s heart.

Her heart clenched painfully in her chest and a small sob escaped her lips. She wrapped her fure blankets tighter around herself as she begged for sleep to take her.

No. She could not tell Zuko that she was in love with him. She would just have to act the same as she always did around him, even if all she wanted to do was jump into his arms and never let go. It would ruin their friendship, and she was afraid he would start to distance himself from her if she were to tell him.

She would rather keep being his friend instead of his girlfriend. It was better than being nothing at all.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Momo spread his winged arms with a chirp before he did a triple loop in the air. Chattering proudly at his achievement, the small lemur turned large, green eyes toward his human friend before he gave a sad chirp as unresponsive gray eyes looked in a different direction where a few young human females were babbling. Momo slowed in his flight as he made a wide turn before he settled back on the unusually silent man’s slender shoulder.
Aang blinked as he felt the small weight on his shoulder and a cold nose on his cheek. He turned his head to see his small friend nuzzle him while looking at him with questioning eyes and a concerned chirp. Aang smiled slightly as he petted Momo on his head.

“Sorry, Momo,” the airbender apologized. “I don’t feel like playing today.”

Momo tilted his head at the dejected tone in his friend’s voice and his large ears drooped. Aang sighed as he patted the lemur’s head again before he walked away from the gossiping women he had come across. What had reached his ears had him mad and hurt.

While he had been searching for Katara for hours the previous day, she had been with Zuko again. And it seemed the whole tribe was aware of it, though the thought of both benders being so close to each other did not seem to bother the people that much. But it bothered him, and it bothered him greatly.

Why was Katara spending so much time with Zuko instead of him? What was so great about Zuko anyway? The guy obviously had a temper problem, he was so serious and uptight all the time, and he had a scar on his face!

Aang frowned at his thoughts.

Okay, maybe the scar was uncalled for, but still!

What was so great about Zuko except for the fact that he was the Fire Lord, he worked so hard to right the wrongs his country had done to the world, he was honest and loyal, and had helped him in his firebending so he could confront Ozai?

Aang sighed.

Okay, so there are a few things that make Zuko interesting and a great person to be around with, but that still doesn’t make up for the fact that Katara’s spending so much time with him than she is with me like she’s supposed to!

Gripping his wooden staff tightly in his hands, Aang made a frustrated noise at the back of his throat.
Once they had visited the Fire Nation—or more accurately Zuko—Katara’s behavior changed even more drastically as more time passed by. Though he had told Toph to forget what he had said while they had been in Omashu, he still had that feeling that perhaps Zuko was after Katara, and he was afraid, very afraid, that she would leave him one day for Zuko. He would not be able to bear the pain, the betrayal if that were to happen.

He loved Katara so much and Zuko was his friend, he did not want either relationship to end, but he just could not seem to stop the little voice in his head that kept telling him that Zuko saw Katara more than just a friend and that if he did not do something fast, he would lose Katara to the firebender forever.

Spinning around, Aang made his way back to the grand house. He needed to speak to Katara without another moment to lose! Hopefully once he gave her his news she would become excited and accept his proposal and Zuko would back off, and then everything would return to the way it was supposed to. But perhaps he was just seeing things and being paranoid.

At least, that was what he hoped.

Katara forced a smile as the guards at the entrance of the grand house opened one of the large, steel doors for her, letting the smile vanish from her face once she passed through the doorway. She quickly moved away from the warm grand house and made her way to the training area for her class. It was a bit early in the morning, and her waterbending lessons did not start until a few more hours, but she felt like she needed to get away and be by herself for at least a few minutes.

After finally discovering and understanding her true feelings regarding Zuko, she felt like she was not ready to see or talk to anyone at the moment, especially Zuko. How was she supposed to act around him, knowing that she saw him more than just a friend? That she wanted to be more than just friends? That all she wanted to do was go up to him, wrap her arms around his neck, and kiss him?

And then there was Aang to think about. In some way she felt as if she was betraying him, and perhaps she was, but what was she supposed to do? Break up with him and in the process break his heart?

But the most difficult question was how was she to deal with her feelings toward Zuko when she knew that they could never be together? That he would only see her as Katara, his waterbending friend? That he would never…love her?

Katara winced and lightly touched the left side of her chest before she let out a low, sorrowful sigh. She needed time to get her emotions together before she faced her friends and family, before she faced him. Nobody had to know. It would be her secret to bear.

‘Have you ever thought about allowing another man to court you…? Would you allow another man to court you if he were to tell you he was in love with you?’ he had said to her.

She wondered again why Zuko had asked her such a question. Perhaps if it was some other man who was trying to woo her, then she would have said no, but if it was Zuko that wanted to court her, if it was he that told her he wanted to marry her because he loved her, then she would definitely say yes without thinking it twice.

But it would never be so and I have to stop wishing it, she told herself bitterly as her eyes began to sting with unshed tears.

“Katara! There you are!” the sound of Aang’s voice made her stop and cringe with guilt.

Katara slowly turned around, plastering another smile on her face as she waved at him. She frowned when she saw that Aang’s usually cheerful face was marred with an irritated look as he stomped up to her with a chirping lemur flying next to him. She felt a bit of panic swell in her chest. Had he figured it out?

“Oh, h-hey, Aang!” she greeted as she shifted slightly in her spot. Momo landed on her shoulder and she scratched his chin and cooed at him in order to avoid looking into Aang’s eyes. “I didn’t know you’d be out this early in the morning.”

Aang finally reached her and frowned when she looked way when he stared into her face.

“That’s the same thing I was going to tell you,” he said as he crossed his arms over his chest. When Katara just shrugged he let out a sigh. “Katara, are you avoiding me or something?”

“What?” the young woman said as she glanced at him briefly before she looked away. “Of course not…”

The airbender snorted and narrowed his eyes slightly.
“I was looking for you all day yesterday after what happened with the arctic panther-wolves,” he told her, “I wanted to make sure you were okay, but when I didn’t find you I became worried.”

“I’m sorry, Aang, but I was—”

“With Zuko, I know,” the airbender interrupted darkly before he added angrily, “The entire Southern Water Tribe knows.”

Katara’s heart skipped a beat at the mention of the Fire Lord’s name and she turned her head away in order to hide her blush as well as her guilt and sadness. She petted Momo’s head and scowled.

“Yeah, so?” she said defensively. “Zuko showed me around his city and I just returned the favor. What’s the big deal?”

“The ‘big deal’, Katara,” Aang hissed lowly, clenching his hands, “is that you spend too much time with Zuko when you’re supposed to be with me, your boyfriend! Do you know how hurt it makes me feel when I look for you only to find out you’re with him!”

Katara felt her stomach twist in more guilt.

“Aang, I—”

“Do you know how angry it makes me to see my girlfriend hanging all over another man all the time?” Aang yelled out as he swung his staff to the side, causing a gust of air to rise and blow the snow away from the ground.

Katara gasped before she glared angrily at him.

“You make it sound like I’m some deceitful…whore!” she said between gritted teeth before she spun around and began to walk away. Momo screeched and latched onto Katara’s shoulder at the sudden movement.

“No! Katara, wait! That’s not what I meant! I’m sorry!” the young monk cried out as he ran after her.
He grabbed hold of one of her hands to stop her before he walked around her so he could look into her face, but she turned her head away.

“I’m sorry, but it’s just that…” he trailed off as he ran a hand over his bare head. “You have to understand how weird it is to see your loved one spending more time with someone other than you.”

“You spend a lot of time with Toph and I don’t mind, nor do I find it weird,” Katara replied as she pulled her hand away from his grasp and sighed.

“Well, that’s because Toph and I are just friends,” Aang muttered before he frowned when he felt a small blush appear on his face.

“And Zuko and I are…just friends, too,” Katara responded quietly as the same pain made itself known in her chest before she let out a sigh. “Look, Aang, I’m sorry if you feel like I neglected or ignored you, but I swear I didn’t mean to or was aware of it. Besides, there’s nothing for you to worry about. Zuko and I have done nothing wrong, but he is my friend and you can’t tell me that I can’t spend time with him.”

Aang sighed and crossed his arms over his chest with an annoyed expression. That was something Toph had told him before. If he told Katara to stop talking to Zuko, it would make her mad and would only push her farther away from him, and that was the last thing he wanted. Even if Zuko started to come onto Katara, he was positive that she would turn his advances down because she loved only him and not the firebender. But that still did not mean that he liked seeing the woman he loved being so close to someone else.

Perhaps now was the time to finally find the courage to tell her what he had been striving for since the day he turned fifteen. And maybe she would stop paying attention to other people—namely Zuko—and finally be around only him all the time.

“Katara,” he said as he reached for her hand, ignoring the way she tensed as he stepped closer to her, “I’ll let you go to your students now, but would you make some time for me this evening? There’s something I’d like to talk to you about.”

Katara felt uncomfortable by the look Aang was giving her, but she gave in and nodded.

“Okay, Aang.”
“I heard that you went up against two arctic panther-wolves to save a little girl yesterday morning, Fire Lord Zuko,” Hakoda began as he exited the meeting room beside the young Fire Lord with his personal guards walking a respectful distance behind them.

“I did,” Zuko replied simply with a nod of his head.

Hakoda glanced at the younger man with a pensive look.

“I also heard that my people welcome you into the Southern Water Tribe much more openly now,” he said casually.

Zuko frowned as he looked over to see the chieftain’s suspicious expression.

“If you are implying, Chief Hakoda, that the reason I did what I did was so I could gain the people of the Southern Water Tribe’s respect or approval I assure you that it was not so,” he stated with a hard look.

The older man was silent for a while as he evaluated what the young Fire Lord had said before he chuckled and patted Zuko’s back good-naturedly.

“Yeah, I thought so!” he exclaimed and he grinned when the firebender just frowned at him. “So now that Chief Arnook and I have agreed to your terms for trade, what will you do now that he has returned home and there won’t be any more meetings?”

Zuko smiled slightly.

“Well, I was planning on watching Katara teach her waterbending students today,” he replied coolly.

Hakoda wondered what that smile on the usually stoic Fire Lord could mean and he crossed his arms over his chest with a frown.

“I have noticed that my daughter spends a lot of time with you,” he observed warily.
Zuko knew Hakoda was just worried about what Katara and he spending a lot of time together could imply and he was careful to keep his expression neutral.

“Yes, your daughter and I are very good friends, and Katara is one of few people that I enjoy having as company,” he replied seriously.

The Southern Water Tribe Chief stared at the younger man for a few more moments before he looked away with a pleased expression. Once again, he was convinced that the young Fire Lord was not after Katara to hurt her and was indeed respectful of her. Though it still made him curious as to why it was that his daughter was always mentioning the young firebender and what those quick looks they would steal at each other at meals when they thought neither was looking meant.

The long, bright corridor ended and both men stepped outside once the guards opened the large steel doors. There were no clouds like there had been for the past weeks and the sun shone brightly in the clear blue sky.

“What a nice morning,” Hakoda commented as he took in a large breath of the cool, wintry air. “Well, then you should hurry if you want to see Katara teach her students. I'll see you all for the evening meal.” He smiled when Zuko gave him a nod before he walked away.

Zuko stared after Katara's father and raised an eyebrow. Was it just him or was Hakoda trying to get something out of him? Shrugging the thought away, the young man motioned for his personal guards to remain inside when they made a move to follow him. They hesitated for a moment before they bowed respectfully at his wish. The young Fire Lord pulled the collar of his parka closer around his neck and made his way to the open arena Sokka had indicated to him the day before.

Katara had not been at the breakfast table that morning and he really wished to see her. Zuko frowned slightly. Now that he thought about it, Aang had not been present either. An uneasy feeling overcame him before he quickly brushed it away as he continued on his walk to where the training area was located.

Hopefully Katara would not mind his presence while she taught the children, and if everything went well, perhaps they could go walk around the city again, and while they were alone, he could finally tell her his secret that he had been hiding for months. He hoped that this time there would be no more interruptions. He was so sick and tired of them.

“Zuko!” his mother’s gentle voice brought him out of his thoughts and he turned around toward the
He smiled as he noticed his mother and Iroh walking carefully toward him since they were still unused to the snow. Ursa was leaning on Jee’s arm and Jiao was following a few paces behind the royal members. Zuko waited patiently for them to reach him.

“Did your meeting with Chiefs Hakoda and Arnook finish?” Iroh asked cheerfully.

“Yes,” the young firebender replied as he stared at the way Jee placed a hand on his mother’s back to steady her when her feet sank a bit deeper in the snow.

The admiral seemed to have noticed his lord’s attention on him for he swiftly removed his hand and bowed his head apologetically. Zuko frowned slightly.

“Where are you headed, dear?” Ursa asked as she smiled thankfully at her bodyguard, oblivious to her son’s scrutinizing gaze.

“I’m going to watch Katara teach her waterbending students,” Zuko replied as he tried to suppress the smile that wanted to appear on his face.

“Oh, are you now?” Iroh mused as he stroked his chin with a glint in his eyes that made Zuko instantly suspicious. “We understand, Nephew.”

“Understand what, Uncle?” Zuko asked with a quirked eyebrow.

“You must be anxious to see Miss Katara since she was not at breakfast,” the old man teased with a grin.

“Hm…perhaps,” Zuko responded with a small smirk before he turned around. “I’ll see you later,” he said over his shoulder.

Iroh and Ursa watched Zuko’s retreating back with surprised expressions on both their shocked faces for a long moment before they looked at each other with pleased smiles. Jee and Jiao looked at each other questionably as the Fire Lord’s mother and uncle grinned widely at each other.
“You don’t suppose he finally figured it out, do you?” Ursa asked her old friend.

Iroh looked back to see Zuko walking at a distance and he once again stroked his chin.

“I say that he had finally realized his feelings a long time ago, my dear Ursu,” he replied before he looked back toward the smiling noblewoman. “I just hope that he does something about it soon before it’s too late.”

A cool breeze blew by, picking up snow from the ground as the young firebender continued on his way to his destination. Zuko smirked inwardly at the surprised looks he had received from his uncle and his mother for his answer, though he had a feeling that they already suspected something about his true feelings regarding Katara.

He then remembered the way Jee had held his mother when she stumbled and he wondered back to what Wei had said a while back. Was there something between his mother and his loyal admiral? Zuko frowned since he did not know how to feel if that were the case before he brushed that thought from his mind as well. He nodded politely at the people who greeted him as he passed, still amazed at their changed behavior toward him.

His black boots crunched the soft snow below him as he finally arrived at the small circular arena less than a mile from the western edge of the ice city. The ground was made of a flat white stone and the snow had been cleared from it. A few large jars stood off to the side and he was certain they were filled with water for training. There were about twelve children spread out in a half circle and each one had a quivering ball of water suspended between their small hands. Their faces were in deep concentration as they tried to shape the water into a perfect round ball.

After taking in the almost silent place, Zuko’s eyes softened as they landed on Katara’s form. She had her back turned toward him as she faced her young pupils. She lifted her own ball of water—a perfectly round one—in the air and waited for her students to follow her lead before she spread her arms and bent the water into a perfect long line. Zuko watched with avid interest at how gracefully Katara moved as she shifted, coiling the ribbon of water around her lithe form. He could hear her gently instructing the children on how to feel their element call to them and use it as guidance as she watched them, occasionally helping them when they were having some trouble.

Zuko continued to watch silently off to the side for a while longer as Katara interacted with the small children and a feeling of admiration and warmth spread through him. He had known for a while now that Katara was great with children and that she loved them very much. He wished with all his heart that Katara could be the mother of his children. He would especially enjoy the making part of said children that would hopefully take many, many tries.
Katara was too busy helping one of the children to notice the young man that was staring at and fantasizing about her. She wondered what Aang wanted to talk to her about, but honestly, she really was not looking forward to it. Perhaps it was for that best, that way she could finally tell him what her real feelings for him were—that being that she was not in love with him.

Because I’m in love with someone else...with Zuko, she sighed sadly as she tried to ignore the pang in her chest.

She frowned when she spotted Lien scrambling to her feet from where she had been sitting to watch the session and ran past her with a large smile on her young face. Curious, Katara turned around and tensed as she saw Lien make her way to Zuko, who was standing perfectly straight off to the side with a faraway look on his face.

Oh, La! Since when has he been there? she asked herself as her heart skipped a beat. Now that she knew she was in love with Zuko, she was no longer confused with the strange feelings that she experience at the sight of him.

Wow. Doesn’t he look good today? a little voice in her head piped in.

Mm, I’ll say more than good, she responded in a daze as she felt her cheeks beginning to burn and her heart pound in her chest. Happiness settled on her as she was reassured that Zuko was indeed alive and her nightmare was just pure lies before she was overcome by sadness once again.

Zuko’s pleasant thoughts on the ways of procreation were interrupted when his leg was attacked by a small body. Zuko blinked and looked down to find the little girl he had saved the previous day hugging his leg again with another large toothy smile.

Katara watched as Lien clung onto Zuko’s long leg and craned her neck up to smile in innocent child delight at the tall man. She saw Zuko return the smile—though more reservedly—and pat the girl’s head gently. Her heart warmed at the adorable sight and she sighed longingly. With a shake of her head, she began to make her way toward them with the other children trailing excitedly behind her. She had to face him sooner or later, though she had hoped it would have been later rather than sooner.

“Hi, Fire Lord Zuko!” the little girl cried out enthusiastically.
“Hello…Lien,” Zuko said, smiling that he remembered her name as he placed his hand on her head to give her a small pat.

“Hey! You know my name!” Lien exclaimed happily, as she stepped away from him to clap her small gloved hands.

“Indeed I do,” he said with a nod. He looked up as he noticed Katara walking towards him with sparkly eyes and a gentle smile and he smirked mentally. “Lady Katara told me.”

“G-good morning, Fire Lord Zuko,” Katara greeted as she finally stopped a few feet from him. “Have you been standing there for long?”

“I seriously can’t remember since I was entranced by your graceful lesson,” Zuko responded smoothly. He suppressed a grin when she blushed. “I hope you don’t mind me watching.”

“Not at all!” Katara responded with a squeak before she cleared her throat. “I mean, you’re welcome to stay.”

“Thank you,” he said with a smile. “We missed you at breakfast.”

“Oh yeah, I…uh…had some stuff to do,” Katara mumbled as she looked away.

Before Zuko could questioned her about Aang’s whereabouts he was surrounded by curious children from all sides as they all gaped at him.

“Did you really fight two arctic panther-wolves yesterday?” one small boy asked.

“It wasn’t two, it was five!” another boy said above the commotion the others were making while another exclaimed, “That’s such a cool scar!”

“Yeah, he did!” Lien piped in cheerfully. “He saved me from the scary animals!”

“I was there, too!” a few others exclaimed.
“Wow! That is so cool!” others said.

Katara placed her hand over her mouth to stifle her giggles as Zuko shifted uneasily in his spot at the awed looks the children were giving him as he tried to respond to the many questions that were flying his way.

“Can we see you firebend?” one little girl asked.

“I’m not sure about that,” Zuko responded coolly. “Why don’t you ask Avatar Aang?”

“But Avatar Aang doesn’t want to show us firebending and we have seen airbending so many times it’s getting boring!” Lien slightly whined.

“Lien!” Katara chided.

“But it’s true!” another boy exclaimed.

“I don’t know…” Zuko began.

“Please, Fire Lord Zuko! Please, please, please!” the whole group of children begged with wide eyes.

“Well…” The young man looked up toward the grinning waterbender and raised an eyebrow before he smirked back down at the pleading youngsters. “Alright, I will show you some basic firebending moves.”

“Yay!” the children cheered.

Zuko raised a finger up to gain their attention.

“But…” he continued.
“Aww…” the kids whined.

“Only if you promise me to finish your lessons with Master Katara, hm?” he finished with a small grin.

“We promise!” they all quickly agreed as they raced back to their original spots.

Katara watched them go in amazement and could not help feeling impressed. Zuko had handled that situation rather well and again her heart burned in her chest as she glanced back at him.

‘Do you ever see yourself married and with children?’ he had asked her.

It would have been nice if Zuko could have been the father of her children…No. She had to stop thinking like that! She would only hurt herself since she knew it could never be.

Zuko had been watching Katara’s face for a while and frowned when her cheerful mood changed. He noticed there was sadness in her large, blue eyes and he immediately became concerned.

“Katara, what’s the matter?” he asked worriedly as he took hold of one of her hands.

Katara tensed slightly at his touch and briefly closed her eyes at the pleasing feeling it caused her before she placed a smile on her face.

“Oh, it’s nothing!” she said as she slowly pulled her hand away and went back to her lessons.

Zuko watched her go with a frown and took a step to follow her, but he stopped and looked down when something tugged the sleeve of his dark red parka.

“You can sit with me while they practice waterbending!” Lien said with a large toothy grin as she led him to her previous spot.
“Alright,” Zuko said as he followed the little girl.

He wondered what it was that was bothering Katara and he hoped she would tell him so he could find a way to help her. He hated to see sadness in her eyes, and if they did end up together, he would make sure it would never reflect in her eyes again. He focused his attention on the children when Katara began to give out instructions.

Surprisingly, the children worked extra hard in their training so they could see the famous Fire Lord do some firebending. As soon as their teacher told them lessons were over, they bounded over to the silent young man with excited squeals.

“Can we see you firebend now?”

“Please, please!” they yelled.

Zuko winced mentally at the volume of their excited pleas. Though he really did not have much experience with young children, and he knew that they sometimes were a handful, he found that they were not that bad and could be pleasant to have around. Jing and Ting were an example. He held up a hand and gave them a pleased smile when they immediately quieted down.

“Since you kept your promise, I will honor mine,” Zuko told them as he stood up before his expression turned serious. “Firebending is dangerous so you must stay back and sit still until I finish. Understood?”

“Yes, Fire Lord Zuko!” the children chorused as they scrambled to find a good spot so they could watch.

Zuko smirked slightly at Katara when he passed her to stand in the middle of the arena. Katara rolled her eyes, but was unable to hold back the smile that appeared on her face as she sat down in his previous spot next to Lien. She watched as he rolled his sleeves up to his elbows before he spread his feet apart and took a few deep breaths. She was a bit disappointed that the cold weather did not allow Zuko to firebend shirtless, so she could see his muscular, pale chest.

Bad, Katara! Not in front of the children! she chided herself, though not as harshly as she should have.
Zuko glanced at the children who were squirming in their seats in excitement around Katara and Lien before he rested his gaze on Katara’s lovely face. Maybe with this she would see that he was not that bad with kids and could perhaps one day be a good father? A good father to their future children?

Taking another deep breath, Zuko unexpectedly spun around and punched his fist in the air, sending a bright fireball to the side so his profile was to his audience. Since he was wearing the winter wear Kanna had given him, he would only be able to use his hands. He spun around again and sent two fire blasts in the opposite direction. He made sure to keep his fireballs small enough not to hurt the children, but big enough to impress them. The gasps and cheers that reached his ears told him his plan was working.

Shifting in his stance, Zuko spread his arms and called forth his fire whips. He twisted the hot fire whips around his tall form before he lashed with his right hand and cracked the whip in the air, doing the same with the other a second later.

“Ooohhh!” Katara and the children gasped as the arena was filled with the loud cracks from the fiery whips.

Katara fixatedly stared as Zuko moved gracefully on his feet, fire springing forth with controlled bursts from his hands, and she wondered back to Lady Ursa’s words. She was right. Aang was not the only powerful bender out there because Zuko was one of them.

After a few more magnificent moves with the fire whips, Zuko extinguished them before he began to spin in place, sending fire blast after fire blast up in the air. He did a backward somersault and punched the ground with a fist as he landed in a crouch, fire shooting from his fist and springing upward around his form.

“Whoa! Did you see that?”

“That was so awesome!”

“The air feels so warm!”

Katara smiled as she listened to the children’s excited chatter before she stood up and made her way to where Zuko was currently crouching. She watched as he stood up and casually smoothed his clothing. Her heart began to race wildly in her chest the closer she walked toward him and her breath caught in her throat when he looked up and their eyes met.

Zuko smiled at her when she finally approached him slowly. He frowned as he wondered what the hesitation in her step meant, but he was unable to ask her for all of the sudden they were surrounded by enthusiastic and squealing children.

“So what do you think?” Zuko asked her with a small smirk after the children had settled down a bit from their boisterous fuss.

Katara quickly composed herself and shrugged.

“Eh, it was okay,” she said dismissively, grinning when the children gasped in shock.

“Are you sure you were paying attention? That was way more than okay,” Zuko responded with a wider smirk.

Oh, I’ll say it was, Katara thought and sighed mentally.

“Yeah, Lady Katara!” Lien piped in agreement with her new hero, idolization in her bright eyes.

“Fire Lord Zuko was awesome!” another little boy exclaimed.

“See?” Zuko said with a smug look. “You should listen to what they say. Children never lie.”

“Okay, fine!” Katara exclaimed and sighed huffily. “I’ll admit it was awesome.”

She pointedly ignored Zuko’s arrogant smirk before an idea popped into her head. She grinned mischievously, causing Zuko to narrow his eyes warily at her. Katara looked down at the children and smiled.

“Who wants to go penguin sledding?” she chirped cheerfully.
“I do!” the children cheered as they dashed away from the training arena toward the tall hill at the western edge of the city.

“Come on!” Katara urged as she turned around to grin at the firebender.

She chuckled at Zuko’s cautious look as she grabbed his hand and raced after the screaming children. She ignored the rational side of her brain that told her she would keep hurting herself if she continued touching him.

A few minutes later, they all arrived at a tall snowy hill where the penguins were shuffling around. The children wasted no time as they made a beeline for the chirping flightless creatures and climbed onto their backs. Zuko watched with an amused smile as the children cornered the poor penguins and flew down the hill at a high speed, loud laughter trailing after them.

“Okay, Zuko,” Katara called out with the same impish grin, “Grab your penguin.”

Zuko stared at her as if she were crazy.

“Are you serious?” he asked incredulously. “I am not going to climb onto one of those things’ back.”

“Ah, come on, Zuko, lightened up!” Katara huffed. “It’s one of the joys of childhood!”

“Yeah, well, we both know my childhood was not full of joy,” he muttered and crossed his arms over his chest stubbornly.

“Well, the much better then! Just try it,” she insisted.

“No,” he repeated. “I already consented to dance in your brother’s wedding and I will not go penguin sledding.”

He sighed when she turned her huge, pleading eyes on him.

“Besides, I’m too heavy and big to be able to climb onto the penguin’s back. I’ll probably kill it and that will surely traumatize the children.”

Katara pouted since he was probably right. She had not thought of that since Aang always went penguin sledding, but Zuko was taller and much more muscular than the shorter and lighter airbender. Darn. She really wanted Zuko to participate in one of the pastimes she had enjoyed since she was a child. Now what?

Zuko watched as Katara’s excited expression fell and he cursed himself for making her sad, but even though he refused to be seen riding one of those animals, he also knew it was impossible since he was a grown man and not a small child. He was startled when Katara snapped her fingers and cried out in triumph.

“I got it!” she exclaimed, her excitement once more returning to her. “We don’t have to go penguin sledding to have fun!” She bent down and began to grab some of the soft snow from the white ground.

I know of some fun activities we could do…Zuko mused in a daze before he was snapped out of his thoughts when something cold hit his face. He stiffened before he wiped the melting pieces of snow from his skin and looked up in shock to glare at the laughing woman before him.

“O-oh, my gods! Y-your face was even more p-priceless that the one you made in Ember Island!” Katara laughed loudly as she pointed a finger at him.

“So this is your idea of fun, hm?” Zuko responded emotionlessly as he flicked his hand to the side to get rid of the snow from his fingers.

The waterbender stopped in her giggle fit at the blank tone of his voice, wondering if perhaps she went too far. She opened her mouth to apologize, but froze when she caught the mischievous glint in those amber orbs before Zuko’s lips curved at one side into a dangerous smirk. With a squeak, Katara turned on her heel and began to run away just as Zuko bent down to grab a large handful of snow.

Zuko grinned as he chased after the laughing waterbender before he took aim and let the snowball fly toward his target—though he made sure not to throw it too hard and hurt her. He laughed quietly when Katara yelped when the cold ball hit her on her back and she stumbled before regaining her balance. He watched amusedly as she whirled around to glare incredulously at him.
“You…hit me! You actually d*ared to hit me!” she yelled with a raised fist.

“Though it is the first time I have participated in such a game, I do believe that is the point of a snow fight, right?” Zuko responded calmly as he quirked a haughty eyebrow at her. “Or am I mistaken?”

“Ah! This means war!” Katara screamed before she burst out into laughter as she gathered more snow in her hands and hurled it at the smirking firebender.

Zuko easily dodged one ball as he threw another that hit Katara on the shoulder, but he was not quick enough when Katara retaliated and caught him square on the chest. He glanced down at his chest as the melting snow made the red color of the parka turn even darker before he smirked and gathered another handful of white snow, but Katara was already collecting her own frozen weapons.

Their loud laughter and Katara’s squeals immediately caught the children’s attention and they gaped as they watched the serious Fire Lord and their kind waterbending teacher having a snow fight. The kids quickly lost interest in the penguins at the prospect of a new exciting game and they ran to where the two laughing adults were throwing snowballs at each other. Soon the group was running and chasing each other while they threw snow at anybody that came within distance.

Zuko did not know when was the last time he had so much fun before meeting Katara. He evaded one of the children’s snowballs that was aimed at his face, getting even by throwing his own snowball at the child, making sure not to cause him harm, but he was still hit on the face by somebody else’s ball of snow.

He glared when he realized it was Katara that had caught him on the face a second time that day. She bat*ted her eyelashes innocently at him and he smirked. Her eyes widened and she spun around, racing away from them. With a low growl, he ran after her.

“Get her, Fire Lord Zuko!” the children cheered him on.

Katara looked back over her shoulder and let out a shout when she realized Zuko was closing in on her. She veered to the right, but faked to the left and ran even faster, but Zuko was quicker and was close on her heels. With a victorious yell, Zuko grabbed her around the waist, causing Katara to let out a cry, but he lost his balance since they were at the edge of the snowy hill and they toppled over. Zuko spun onto his back, bringing her safely down with him, as they stumbled onto the soft white snow. They rolled down the hill for a good few feet before they finally came to a stop with Katara facing the cold ground while being pinned down by Zuko from above. Zuko lifted himself a bit as Katara coughed and he turned her around so she rested on her back.
“Katara, are you okay? You didn’t get hurt, did you?” he asked with concern as he smoothed her hair out of her face.

“No, I’m fine,” Katara reassured him before she began to giggle again. “That was so much fun!”

Zuko let out a relieved breath after she said that and chuckled quietly. He had been afraid that he had accidently hurt her as they tumbled down the hill and he had been ready to carry her back to the grand house if necessary. He relaxed with a contented sigh and placed his head near her neck, her soft hair caressing his face. He breathed in her gardenia scent before he stiffened when her sweet smell and the softness of her body brought back all of his previous dreams he had had of her for the past months. Her nearness was causing his blood to heat up and it was becoming a bit hard to breathe.

Katara froze when Zuko leaned down and his breath tickled the side of her neck while his warm body covered hers. She was reminded of the dream she had and she almost expected Zuko to start roaming her body with his hands. A small shiver ran down her spine and her heart started to pound loudly in her chest while that almost familiar feeling burned in her lower stomach. She felt him tensed up a few seconds later and she became rigid as well as she repeatedly asked herself what she should do. The situation was even more complicated for her now that she knew her real feelings for Zuko. On one hand, she wanted to push him off, but on the other she wanted to hug him closer to her.

Though he found that their position was a bit distracting—although pleasing—Zuko began to wonder if the time was right for his confession. He did not want Katara to think that he was just saying such things just so that he could take advantage of her and their current situation. Lifting his head slightly, he gazed down at her to see what her reaction to their position was. He was relieved to find that she was not angry or indignant, instead she looked embarrassed and her cheeks were a deep shade of red.

Before he could tell her anything, the sight of her flushed features brought another memory of one of his many erotic dreams and his breath caught in his throat while his body began to get extremely hot. Before he knew it, the snow where his hands were resting began to melt with a soft hiss and steam floated around them. His arms sank deep in the melted snow, and without the support of the frozen ground, Zuko fell back on top of her, causing both of them to let out a gasp before they stared at each other with flushed features.

“Lady Katara! Fire Lord Zuko! Are you okay?” the children’s voices made them jump and snapped them out of their thoughts.
Both scrambled away from each other and turned around to smile innocently at the children. Zuko quickly jumped to his feet and helped Katara up before they both brushed the snow from their clothes with nervous laughs.

“Yeah, we’re fine!” Katara said with too much cheer in her voice as she gave then a shaky smile before she threw a mocking glare at Zuko who was looking off into the distance as if nothing had happened, “Though if I had broken a bone or something, it would have been his fault.”

Zuko turned around and raised an eyebrow at her.

“It’s not my fault that you’re sometimes clumsy,” he countered with a smirk.

“Oh, I’m clumsy? You’re the one who lost his balance when you tackled me!” Katara yelled and flailed her arms in the air.

“I don’t remember it like that,” he replied with a shrug, his eyes glinting in amusement.

Katara huffed, crossed her arms over her chest, and playfully turned her nose up in the air with a ‘humph’. Zuko chuckled quietly since he knew she was just playing around, but it seemed the children did not get that it was just their way of teasing each other since their expressions became worried.

“Uh-oh,” Lien said. “I think Lady Katara got angry.” She clapped her hands excitedly as she looked up at the tall man. “You should kiss her, Fire Lord Zuko!”

“W-wha…?” Katara choked out as she snapped her head around to gape at the girl.

Zuko’s eyes widened and he blinked down at the little girl looking up at him with an innocent smile.

“Excuse me?”

“I said you should kiss her so she won’t be mad at you anymore,” Lien continued in her innocent thoughts. “My papa says that’s what couples do. He does that when my mama gets angry with him.”
Katara felt her face burn in embarrassment at the little girl’s words and she hoped Zuko would not get offended by being told that they were viewed as a couple. Though a kiss would be nice…

“They’re not together!” another girl a few years older than Lien said. “Avatar Aang is Master Katara’s boyfriend!”

“But Fire Lord Zuko would be a better boyfriend for Lady Katara!” Lien gushed excitedly.

Both older benders stared at the little girl in shock before they stole a look at each from under their eyelashes, both flushing when they were caught staring at the other. Zuko crouched down to be eye-level with the child so she did not have to crane her thin neck to look up at him. He raised an eyebrow at her.

“You think Lady Katara and I are a couple?” he asked curiously while he kept his unwavering gaze trained on Katara’s wide blue eyes.

“Yup,” Lien chirped happily. “You both look so good together!”

“It’s true!” some of the other children piped in.

“Is that so?” Zuko mused as he stood up, his golden eyes never leaving the woman’s blue orbs standing before him with a furious blush on her face. “Well, what do you say, Katara? Children never lie.”

Katara stared at him in shock, startled that Zuko had not denied what the children thought about them both. Why was that? Oh, how she wished that she could happily confirm the children’s image of Zuko and her being a loving couple! But she couldn’t because it was not true and it would never be.

“I…uh…” she stuttered as she tried to avoid Zuko’s intense gaze. Was she missing something here?

“Hey, Sugar Queen! Finally we found you!” Toph’s loud voice rang out into the silent air.
They all turned to see Aang walking towards them in a quick pace with Toph holding onto his arm. Zuko’s mood darkened at yet another interruption and he cursed at Toph and Aang’s bad timing. He scowled when he found that Katara was already making her way towards them and he clenched his fists tightly when Aang let go of Toph so he could embrace Katara. He smirked slightly when some of the children made gagging sounds.

Katara stiffened in Aang’s arms and immediately broke away from his grasp. Aang frowned and his heart sank as she pulled away from him and avoided his gaze as she turned her attention to the short earthbender.

“What is it, guys?” Katara asked.

“Suki and Sokka think Jing and Ting got a cold and they want you to check on them,” Aang responded to her question before Toph could open her mouth.

Katara frowned slightly.

“I’ll go check on them now,” she said before she turned back around to smile at the children. “I think it’s time for you all to go home and eat.”

The children let out small whines and complaints, but began to head back home, nonetheless, after they said their goodbyes to the Fire Lord. Aang frowned again when the children just smiled at him as they passed him by. What was going on? First Zuko gets Katara’s attention and now the children’s too! He crossed his arms over his chest and sent a small glare of resentment at the unsuspecting firebender.

“I’ll see you guys at dinner,” Katara said to both young men as she followed after the children with Toph grabbing onto her arm.

Zuko and Aang watched her walk away before they turned to look at each other once she was out of sight. A long, uncomfortable and tension-filled silence appeared as they continued to stare at one another, both unsure of what to say. Their friendship used to be easy and secure, but now both could feel that it was changing, and not for the better.

Deciding to break the silence, Aang shot Zuko what he hoped was a cheerful smile.
“I’ve something to show you and I’d like to know what you think about it,” he said as he walked closer to the taller man and reached his hand into the pocket of his parka.

“Okay,” Zuko responded as he, too, tried to smile as if everything was fine.

He watched as Aang pulled out a golden chain with a topaz stone and held it in front of him with a genuine wide smile.

“That’s a nice necklace. What’s it for?” Zuko asked as he stared at it.

“It’s Katara’s betrothal necklace,” Aang responded as he eyed the young Fire Lord carefully.

Zuko stiffened at the Avatar’s words and he fought to remain unaffected by the news. He looked away from the glinting golden necklace and stared down at the silent monk.

“Her…betrothal necklace?” he practically choked on the words.

“Yes, I’m finally going to ask Katara to marry me,” Aang said as he returned the necklace to his pocket.

Zuko began to feel panic swell inside him and he unconsciously took a few steps towards Aang until he was towering over him.

“Are you sure about this, Aang? I mean…marriage is such a big step,” he said a bit too rapidly.

“Of course I’m sure about this,” Aang replied with a frown. “Katara is the one I want to spend the rest of my life with. We’ve been together for four years now and I think it’s time.”

“Yes, but you’re both so young to be married so soon,” Zuko argued again, though he knew that was a lame excuse, since he wanted to marry Katara now. “You should think more about it before you ask her,” he advised, this time sounding more normal.

“There’s nothing to think about, Zuko,” the younger man stated as he glared at him. “Shouldn’t you be congratulating me? I thought you were my friend,” he paused for a second before he continued, “or is there a reason why you don’t want me to marry Katara?”

Zuko looked away guiltily as he swallowed the lump in his throat.

“You’re right…”

He was running out of time! He needed to tell Katara about his feelings immediately before Aang got to her! He looked back at Aang and nodded.

“…Congratulations,” he muttered quietly.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Jing and Ting gave out small yawns as they huddled close together in the wooden crib near their parents’ bed. The lighter haired baby rolled over and covered her snoozing older twin with an arm and a leg. Sokka, Suki, and Katara chuckled quietly at the scene before the young father reached down and moved his younger daughter’s limbs away from her frowning sister. After making sure the baby girls were sleeping soundly, they moved away so they would not disturb them.

“Thanks for looking them over, Katara,” Sokka whispered as he smiled gratefully at his sister.

Suki nodded as she squeezed her sister-in-law’s hand.

“We were afraid that they could be really sick,” she said.

“They’re fine as long as you keep them warm,” Katara responded. “It’s normal for babies to catch colds during winter, and it’s only fatal if nothing is done to stop the illness in the beginning.”

“Well, we’re glad you’re here to help,” Sokka said.

“Yeah,” Suki agreed before she nudged the younger woman’s arm, “Now we’re sure that you’ll know what to do once you have your own kids.”

Katara blushed, but decided to change the topic.
“Just tell me if something happens with the twins during the night, but I’m sure they’ll be fine.” She gathered her supplies and smiled at them as she made her way to the door. “I’ll see you guys at breakfast tomorrow. Good night.”

“Good night,” they responded as she exited the room and closed the door behind her.

She had not even taken a step away from the door when Aang suddenly appeared before her as he moved away from the wall he had been leaning on. Katara jumped slightly in surprise before she scowled at him.

“Aang, don’t do that!” she cried out as she moved away from him and began to make her way down the corridor. “Why were you standing there anyway?”

The young monk frowned as he walked beside the waterbender.

“Remember you promised to spend some time with me today?”

“Oh, you’re right,” Katara responded lowly. “I’m sorry. I-I forgot.”

“I figured as much after I realized you were with Zuko again today,” Aang replied irritably as he crossed his arms.

“Please, Aang, don’t start,” she said with a sigh. “I have so many things on my mind and I’m tired.”

“Fine,” he said as he uncrossed his arms and took her hand.

“What is it you wanted to talk to me about?” Katara asked as she allowed him to lead her by holding her hand, though a small voice in her head kept telling her to pull away. She was a bit curious to know what he wanted. She glanced away guiltily when Aang smiled at her and squeezed her hand.

Though she knew that she would never be in a romantic relationship with Zuko, Katara had decided that perhaps now was the time to tell Aang that she could no longer be with him because she did not feel for him like he felt for her. Hopefully he would understand and accept just her friendship. It was late and all she wanted to do was go to her room and sleep so she did not have to keep thinking about her unrequited love for Zuko.

“It’s something that I’m sure would make you very happy,” the airbender replied with a cheery smile.

Aang glanced at Katara’s face and frowned at her unenthusiastic expression. He was not pleased at all by the change in attitude she had towards him. Since that day when he had emerged from the frozen iceberg, he had been the one who had all her attention, he was the one she worried and fussed over the most. But ever since the war ended and they spent those weeks in Ba Sing Se with Iroh, she had begun to distance herself from him and he hated it.

They arrived at one of the rooms were the residents and guests of the grand house could relax and socialize. Aang led her to one of the wooden benches covered in thick furs and sat down next to her, grabbing both of her hands in his. He swallowed nervously as he looked up to her face.

Katara looked down at their hands with a frown, but stopped herself from pulling away at the strange look on Aang’s face. She had a strange feeling and she was not sure she wanted to hear what Aang had to say anymore.

“Katara,” he began slowly, “I’ve wanted to tell you this for a while now, but I just couldn’t seem to gather enough courage to come out and say it.” He squeezed her hands once before he let go of one so he could pull the golden necklace from his pocket. “K-Katara...would you m-marry me?”

Katara gasped at his words and immediately pulled away from him. She stood up abruptly as she gaped at him.

“Aang...I...”

Aang stood up as well and quickly made his way to her, clasping her hands in his again.

“Katara, I can’t live without you! I love you so much! Please say yes and marry me!”

“Aang, I d-don’t know. I mean it’s so sudden and...” she trailed off as she avoided looking into his pleading, gray eyes again. This was not supposed to happen! How was she going to break up with “We’ve been together for four years. I think that’s enough time to be able to ask you to marry me!” Aang exclaimed as he desperately held onto her. “We love each other, so what’s the point in waiting much longer? Please say yes. It would devastate me if you reject me. I won’t be able to handle it,” he whispered as he stared pleadingly into her eyes.

Katara bit her lip at the anxious and fearful look Aang was sending her. She could not bear the thought of hurting him, but she also knew that she could not accept his proposal now that she knew she was in love with another, even if that love was impossible. She knew she would only hurt Aang more if they ever got married, and she did not want a marriage based on lies and false hopes.

“I’m sorry, Aang...” she began quietly as she gently extracted her hands from his, “but I can’t marry you.”

Aang flinched at her words.

“What? Why not?” he asked anxiously.

When Katara did not respond, Aang turned away from her so she would not see the tears that had gathered in his large, gray eyes. Taking a couple of shaky breaths, he tried to figure out what to do. He had not expected her to deny him and he was barely able to keep standing and not curl up into a ball and cry his eyes out, begging her to reconsider and agree to be his wife. Why was she doing this? Why was she denying him?

“It’s because of Zuko, isn’t it?!” he growled bitterly as he spun around to face her, his face red with anger.

Katara took a step back and gasped. Did he know the reason she denied him was because she loved Zuko? Would he hate her now?

“I knew the reason why he spent so much time with you was because he wanted to take you away from me!” he yelled angrily. “He seduced you and filled your head with things so you won’t marry me!”

“What?” Katara gasped before she shook her head. “Zuko didn’t do that! How could you even think... so ill of him? My decision has nothing to do with anything he has said or done!”

Aang let out a shaky breath as he tried to control his temper.

“Then why are you denying me?” he whispered brokenly.

Katara looked away from his hurt features and sighed.

“Aang…there’s something I have to tell you. I have known this for a long time, but I ignored it because I wanted you to be happy. But now I know I can no longer deny it.” She lifted her head and looked at him sadly as she continued, “I have come to realize that I love you…but not in the way you want me to or the way you deserve.”

Aang frowned as he stared at her, a feeling of dread forming in his stomach.

“Katara…w-what do you mean?”

“I love you as a friend, Aang,” she confessed quietly, “A friend and nothing more.”

Aang reeled back as if he had been slapped across the face. He felt as if his heart had been wrenched from his chest as he gaped into her sincere eyes.

No, this can’t be! Katara loves me! We are meant to be together!

“I’m so sorry, Aang, but I can’t marry you,” Katara repeated quietly.

The airbender winced again at her words as he looked away from her.

This has to be a mistake! Maybe Katara is just confused, he thought desperately. Yes, that must be it! She’s just confused and all she needs is some time to remember her feelings for me!
He still had hope. Katara had not accepted his proposal, but she had not broken up with him...yet. He just needed to find a way to make her realize she was making a horrible mistake so she could come back to his side like it was before. Gazing down at the golden chain in his hand, Aang turned back around to face her. She was looking away from him again and he hated the look of sadness in her pretty features. He walked up to her again, and grabbing her hand, he pressed the necklace into her palm.

Katara looked down at the necklace with wide eyes before she snapped her head up to frown at him.

“Aang, I said—”

“I know what you said, Katara,” he interrupted as he gazed into her eyes. “I will accept your answer for now, but in the meantime I want you to keep it as you think it over. I know that in the end you will see that we are meant for each other.” He closed her hand over the golden necklace and squeezed it gently.

“Oh, Aang,” she sniffled softly.

She had not expected him to do this. She had thought he was going to become way more upset than he currently was and throw a tantrum or something. She looked to his wide, pleading eyes, unsure of what to do. Maybe she should think about it some more? He was after all a very nice and caring man and he really loved her.

“I…I-I’ll try,” she said, but held a hand up when the airbender smiled happily. “But I can’t promise you that my mind...or my feelings will change.”

“All I’m asking is that you don’t dismiss the thought so easily,” Aang replied as he smiled at her. He pulled her closer to him and wrapped his arms around her.

I’ll make you see that you do love me, Katara. I won’t give up until you become my wife, he thought.

Katara stiffened at the contact since it was not Aang’s arms that she wanted to surrender to but Zuko’s. She shook her head. She had to find a way to forget about the Fire Lord and move on. Hesitantly, she brought her rigid arms to return the embrace, unaware at the pair of amber eyes that were staring at them in shock and hurt.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Zuko hurried down one of the corridors of the grand house and turned sharply at the corner. He could not find Katara anywhere and he was becoming anxious. His stomach twisted as a foreboding feeling touched him with cold fingers and he did not like it one bit. He needed to find her immediately and confess his feelings before Aang had a chance to sway her mind toward him. He briefly glanced into one of the sitting rooms as he passed, but froze mid step in shock.

\[\text{Oh, Agni, let it not be true! Please tell me my eyes are deceiving me! he pleaded in his head.}\]

Zuko slowly stepped back until he stood at the entrance to the slightly illuminated room. What he saw before him made his heart stop in his chest and a cold sensation to run throughout his body.

Aang and Katara stood in the middle of the room, wrapped in each other’s arms. But what caught his attention was the golden necklace that Aang had shown him earlier, the one Katara was currently holding in her hand, and he knew what it symbolized. Aang had already proposed to her…and Katara had accepted to marry him.

‘Have you ever thought about the possibility that maybe the relationship between Aang and you would…one day cease to be?’

‘I…I don’t know what to say to that.’

Zuko clenched his hands so hard that his blunt nails left marks on the inside of his palms as he tried to control his breathing. He was having a hard time not going on a rampage as his rage escalated to high proportions.

Had she lied? Had she always seen her relationship with Aang going this far, going into marriage? He had allowed himself to believe that he had a chance with Katara and he had truly believed that she really could have come to love him.

His anger began to dissipate, and in its place, a sorrowful pain began to fester in his cold heart. He had lost the woman he loved, and with it, his one chance at happiness.

With one last glance at the embracing couple, the devastated young man silently backed away from the scene before he turned around slowly and began his silent and lonely way back to his silent and lonely room.
He had been too late. He had lost her.

End of Part Two
Guilt was the first thing Katara felt when she woke up the next day, followed by sadness. She should have told Aang that there was nothing to think over, that she would not change her mind and marry him. She felt horrible for leading him on and letting him continue to think that she had feelings for him. But she did not want to hurt him. That fearful look in his eyes had twisted her insides in guilt and she had been unable to repeat herself to him that she did not love him—never had. She was afraid of what his reaction would be if she were to deny him. She remembered that hurt and frustrated look he had given her when he had unexpectedly kissed her the first time they were at Ember Island almost four years ago and how mad he had gotten when she had chastised him for it. She was not sure what he would do now. What if he hurt himself or accidently hurt others?

Pulling the blankets away, Katara slowly got off her bed and sighed. The young woman absently pushed her slightly mussed hair over her shoulder as she looked at the nightstand where she had placed the golden necklace Aang had given her the night before. She picked it up, frowning at it. The topaz gem that dangled from the center glinted softly from the small amount of sunlight that came through the window, and she closed her eyes when the color of the yellow stone made her think about the warm color of Zuko’s eyes.

With a shake of her head, Katara opened the nightstand’s small drawer and quickly placed the necklace inside, gently shutting the drawer firmly closed. Her eyes lifted again and immediately caught the shine of the silver rose hairpin that also rested on the nightstand. She stared at it for a while as the trinket brought images of Zuko to her mind. She reached for it, but stopped midway, retracting her arm back to her side. She instead stood up, made her way to the small frozen window in her room, and splayed her fingers against the smooth and cold surface of the ice.

How was she to tell Aang that the reason she could not accept his proposal, the real reason why she could never return his feelings, was due to the undeniable fact that she was deeply in love with Zuko?

Moving away from the window, Katara made her way to her dresser so she could get ready for the day. She wondered if perhaps she could ask her Gran-Gran for advice or even Lady Ursa, but she had no idea on how to begin telling them everything that was bothering her. She was afraid of what they would think of her, being in a relationship with Aang while she was in love with Zuko.

Katara touched the smooth blue pendant of her necklace and sighed. If only her mother still lived, if only she were there to comfort her. Her beloved mother would have listened to her with no judgment in her eyes and with a sympathetic smile on her beautiful face. Even though she loved a firebender, the Fire Lord no less, Katara was positive Kya would have supported her, even though it had been a firebender who had ended her life. She was sure her mother would have adored Zuko—despite his taciturn personality.
“Zuko,” she sighed.

A sad smile appeared on her lips as she remembered the time they had spent together the previous day with the tribe children. She closed her eyes and touched the left side of her chest. The more she learned about Zuko, the more time she was around him, and the more she got to see of him, the more her love for him grew. But it did not matter. Zuko would never return her affections. A sharp pain went through her.

The waterbender opened her eyes and caught the longing expression on her face in the mirror’s reflection. What should she do?

“You're leaving? Why?” Katara asked with a frown as she turned in her seat to stare at the unreadable expression on the silent Fire Lord’s face.

“I received an urgent letter from the Fire Nation and I must return immediately,” Zuko responded coolly without raising his gaze from his plate to look at her. He was afraid of what he would do if he looked at her.

They were eating in the grand house dining room and the morning laughter had died when Zuko had announced that he was leaving the Southern Water Tribe with Lady Ursa, Iroh, and the rest that had come with him. They had tried to persuade him to stay for a while longer, but he had been firm in his decision to leave.

Hakoda and Pakku glanced at each other, both wondering if the young ruler was having even more problems with his country and why had he not asked for their help. Kanna stared at the young Fire Lord with a raised gray eyebrow as she tried to figure out the sudden change in his behavior. Sokka and Suki looked at one another with frowns at the unexpected news before they gazed down at their sleeping twins, carrying one in each of their arms.

Toph crossed her arms over her small chest and scowled deeply since what Zuko had said was true, but she could also sense that he was lying.

What does that mean? Is there another reason why he's leaving? Toph grumbled in her head.

Iroh, Ursa, and Jee looked down at their breakfast plates with confused expressions. They had been informed the previous night about the change of plans by a morose-looking Zuko and they all wondered what was really going on.

Aang sat quietly in his spot with a calm Momo on his shoulder. He had mixed feelings about Zuko’s departure, and so he had remained silent during the entire meal. On one hand, he felt like he should talk to Zuko about his suspicions and perhaps they could resolve their problems and return to the friendship they shared before, but another part was glad that Zuko was leaving so Katara could pay more attention to him—attention that she had recently been giving Zuko.

However, the one that was most affected by the thought of Zuko’s departure and resulting absence was Katara. Her heart had almost stopped when Zuko announced that he was leaving and she pushed her plate away, no longer hungry as sadness settled in her chest. Why was he leaving all of the sudden and why had he not told her before? Though his presence caused her some pain since she knew they could never be, she did not want him to leave.

“But the Winter Solstice Festival is next week,” Katara said quietly.

Zuko clenched his hands at the sound of Katara’s sweet voice laced with sadness and hurt, and he resisted the urge to go to her and comfort her. It was not his place, but her...future husband’s. His insides twisted painfully at that and he took a quick drink from his cup of wine before he replied to her.

“I know,” he responded with the same impassive tone. “I was really looking forward to it and I apologize for being unable to attend the Winter Solstice Festival.”

With you, he added forlornly, still unable to look into those cobalt eyes of hers that he had come to love immensely.

He just couldn’t, afraid he would break down if he were to see the happiness in her eyes due to her...engagement. He wondered why Katara and Aang had not announced the news to everybody, but he was glad they had not said anything yet. That was the reason why he was desperate to leave as soon as possible. He would not be able to bear hearing the news of her upcoming marriage to another, especially coming from the mouth of the woman he was irrevocably in love with.

“We understand. Duty comes first, after all,” Hakoda spoke up since it seemed his daughter would not—or could not—say anything else. “We just hope that you could solve whatever problems that are troubling you.”
“Thank you,” Zuko responded simply as he resumed his breakfast, all except Katara doing the same.

A few hours later, the entire tribe gathered along the docks to bid farewell to the young Fire Lord they had come to respect. The crewmembers ran about the deck of the Fire Nation flagship as they followed the orders Jee was directing to them. A few gray clouds were spread in the morning sky, indicating that snow would descend upon the city soon.

Iroh watched his nephew carefully as he grasped Chief Hakoda’s forearm in farewell while the two exchanged some words. He shifted his eyes to the side and frowned when he saw Katara’s saddened look on her face as she continued to stare at Zuko with a confused expression.

“Iroh,” Ursa’s voice made him looked away so he could glance at her. “Is it true about the urgent message?”

The retired general sighed as he glanced back at his nephew who was now being embraced by Kanna. He would have chuckled when Zuko tensed and awkwardly hugged the old woman back had the situation been different.

“The message was important, but I do not believe it was that urgent that we need to return to the Fire Nation so soon,” he told her.

Ursa frowned as she looked away from her friend’s face as she, too, stared at her son.

“Then why are we leaving?” she asked softly.

“That I do not know, my dear Ursa,” Iroh responded with a deep frown. “Zuko won’t say.”

Katara watched as Zuko said his goodbyes to everybody else and she felt her anxiety grow when he began to near her. There was something off about Zuko and she wondered what it was that had caused him to be acting so strange, so distant, so…cold. Everything had been fine the previous day—he had even played with her and the children—but now he seemed more reserved than usual and he had not smiled once since the morning. She did not like what she was seeing and she was afraid that he was reverting to the way he used to be before.

Zuko moved away from Toph—who had punched his arm when he refused to give her his real reason for leaving—and hesitantly made his way to where Katara was standing. He made sure to avoid looking into her eyes as he approached her. Some part of him was telling him he was making a mistake and that he should have a talk with Katara, but another part kept replaying what he had seen the night before, which made him determined in his decision to leave the Southern Water Tribe, return to the Fire Nation, and forget everything.

“Well, I guess this is goodbye,” he stated emotionlessly as he stared at a point over her head.

“Zuko, what’s going on? Why are you acting like this?” Katara hissed quietly as she narrowed her eyes at him when he kept avoiding looking at her.

“I don’t know what you mean,” Zuko replied in a low tone as his own eyes narrowed. “This is the way I always am.”

“No, it’s not!” Katara exclaimed low enough for only him to hear. “You’re even more uptight and colder than ever! That’s not you!”

She sighed when Zuko did not respond.

“Why are you leaving all of a sudden? What happened?” she asked more softly.

Zuko closed his eyes briefly as another flash of Katara and Aang embracing appeared in his mind.

“Nothing happened,” he said dispassionately. “I’m leaving because I am needed in the Fire Nation.”
It was not the whole truth, but he could not tell her the real reason.

“I understand that…” Katara began as she continued to search Zuko’s face for any possible hints as to why he was acting so strangely toward her.

His behavior was hurting her and she wanted to know why he was behaving in such a way. She had finally realized that she was in love with him and now it seemed that something was pulling him away from her. She would never get to tell him what he meant to her.

“Zuko…I…I—”
“I’m sorry I won’t be able to participate in the Winter Solstice Festival,” Zuko interrupted as he glanced back at his flagship that was ready for departure. He briefly glanced at her face and frowned slightly at the look of sadness that he found there before he looked away again. No, he will not raise his hopes up and misinterpret the look to be something it was not.

“Perhaps we’ll see each other soon,” he said.

“Uh, I…” Katara began again and frowned.

“Goodbye, Katara.” Zuko smiled sadly and then in an even more emotionless tone he said, “I wish you much happiness.”

“Huh?” was Katara’s reply as she stared at him, confused. What was that supposed to mean?

Zuko lingered for a second before he turned around and began to quickly make his way to the awaiting ship, motioning for Ursa, Iroh, and the rest to follow him. He had almost reached his arms out to embrace her, but he had been able to stop himself before he caused himself more pain.

Katara watched as the large Fire Nation vessel began to move away from the docks while the people waved and cheered. She stood there unmoving until her brother’s voice reached her ears.

“Did you guys notice that something seemed off about Zuko?” Sokka asked as he turned to look quizzically at his family who was watching the ship sail away as well.

“Zuko, wait!” Katara called out after she came out of her stupor, making all those around her turn their heads in her direction.

Without another thought, she ran forward with her heart racing in her chest as she tried to reach him. She needed to tell him about her true feelings. She needed him to stay. But he had already boarded his flagship and it was almost at the great frozen wall that led to the outside ocean.

“Zuko!” she yelled as she came to a stop at the edge of the dock.
“Wait,” she whispered.

Zuko turned around on deck and moved to the edge of the ship. He noticed Katara standing all alone as she stared after them, though he could barely make out her features he admired the way her hair swirled around her as the wind picked up. He raised an arm and waved sadly as the noon sun made the city before him sparkle. He stood there with the chilly wind blowing around him until the protective ice walls closed after them and Katara’s form disappeared from his view as they moved away from the Southern Water Tribe where he had left the woman he loved and his heart behind.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Toph sighed irritably as she led Katara to her room. They had finished a silent dinner and Toph was worried since Katara had been unusually quiet all day after Zuko left. First Sparky was acting weird and now Sugar Queen, too? What the hell was happening? The small earthbender wrenched the door open and almost shoved the waterbender inside. She was even more concerned when Katara did not start yelling at her for treating her like that, but instead she just made her way to her bed and sat down.

“Okay, Sweetness, spill it,” Toph order as she crossed her arms over her small chest. “What in the hell is going on with you?”

Katara snapped her head up at the demanding tone Toph directed at her and she crossed her own arms as she scowled at her friend.

“It’s nothing, okay? Just leave me alone.”

“The hell I will!” Toph shouted as she stomped her way over to where Katara sat. “I want to know what’s making you act like this.”

When Katara remained silent, the blind young girl sighed loudly and plopped herself next to the waterbender.

“It has something to do with Sparky, huh?” Toph deadpanned.

Katara bit her lip as she tried to maintain her silence, but everything was too much, she needed to confide in someone.

“Toph…I’m in love with Zuko!” she blurted before she could stop herself. She groaned and she dropped her head onto her hands.

Toph gaped at her for a moment before a huge grin appeared on her face. She laughed and patted Katara’s back almost painfully in her delight.

“It’s about time you finally admit to it!” she exclaimed. “I was seriously beginning to question your intelligence.”

“What? How did you know?” Katara asked as she looked up at her friend with wide eyes.

“Oh, please,” Toph stressed, waving her hand in the hair as she rolled her eyes. “It’s so obvious that it’s making others suspicious! I mean come on! I’m blind and I know!”

The young tribeswoman frowned as she watched her sometimes annoying friend continue to laugh. She looked away and sighed. She tuned out Toph’s laughter as her thoughts returned to Zuko. Why did he act so distant from her? Did she do something wrong?

Toph stopped in her mirth when Katara became quiet again and did not argue back. Her dark eyebrows furrowed on her small face as she tried to figure what had Katara in such a mood.

“Okay, so you love Zuko,” Toph pointed out as she leaned back on the bed with one hand while she cracked the other to get the kinks out. “Why’s that making you all depressed and stuff?”

Katara pursed her lips.

“My love for Zuko is not what’s making me sad, Toph.” She sighed. “It’s the way he was behaving towards me. I just don’t understand what happened to make him act like that. I mean, he was laughing and joking with me yesterday, everything was fine. He…he seemed so…happy.”

“Oh,” Toph said. “I wish I could tell you what happened, but even I don’t know what was going on in Sparky’s head this morning.”

They were silent for a moment before something dawned on Toph that made her frown deeply. What if Katara confessed her feelings to Zuko and he rejected her? That could be the reason he was acting all weird. Maybe it made him feel uncomfortable.

Nah, that can’t be it, Toph dismissed the idea. I’m pretty sure Sparky would’ve been smiling like a lucky fool if Sugar Queen told him she loved him.

“Did you tell him what you feel for him?” the short girl asked.

“Of course not!” Katara exclaimed as she shook her head and blushed.

“Well, why not?” Toph demanded. “Don’t tell me you were all scared or whatever that he’d throw your feelings back to your face. I thought you had more guts than that.”

Katara growled irritably as she jumped away from the bed and began to pace the length of the room. She paused for a minute as something else came to her mind and she cringed.

“Does that make me a horrible person?” Katara asked almost in a whisper.

Toph stopped scowling and frowned at the waterbender’s dejected tone.

“What are you talking about?” she asked.

“I mean…I’m in love with Zuko, but…Aang is my boyfriend. I can’t stop feeling so guilty, and though I know I should break up with Aang, I can’t find it in myself to do it and hurt him. But I also can’t find it in myself to forget Zuko,” Katara said so softly that Toph almost missed what she said even with her great sense of hearing.

“I think the answer is so obvious,” Toph responded with a snort. “You should tell Aang what you really feel for him and let him down gently and then you should tell Zuko that you love him. See? It’s so simple.”

No, it’s not! Katara closed her eyes and clenched her hands.

What did Toph think? That she was a heartless woman who was willing to hurt the man that had loved her for years just so she could run into the arms of another? That she was so strong that she did not feel fear of being rejected? That she had the strength to pour her heart out without caring if her feelings were not reciprocated?

“Toph…please leave. I want to be alone for a while,” she said quietly and sighed.

Toph opened her mouth to retort, but decided against it and snapped her mouth close with a huff.

“Fine, I’ll leave you alone…for now,” she said as she stood up and stomped her way to the door.

Katara sighed once Toph closed the door and left. She sat back down on her bed and glanced at the rose hairpin resting innocently on the surface of her small nightstand. She looked away from it and lay back on her bed, hugging one of the pillows Iroh had given her close to her chest. She laid still like that for a few minutes as she went over her conversation with Toph before one part in particular made her heart ache.

‘Oh, please. It’s so obvious that it’s making others suspicious!’

If what Toph said was true, if she had really been making her feelings for Zuko so obvious, then that meant that Zuko also knew or had noticed. But since he did not say anything, since he did not acknowledge it, then it was just as she had suspected. He did not reciprocate her feelings, he did not love her.

Katara clutched the pillow closer to her as quiet sobs escaped her lips.

Two weeks later found the Fire Nation flagship sailing smoothly over the surface of the clean, wide ocean while the bright sun shone warmly and fresh salty winds blew by. The crew moved around and below deck as they worked to keep the ship going and made sure no unexpected attacks were thrown their way. Though the war no longer raged, pirates continued to roam the seas in hopes of looting a ship for treasures. But aside from that, it was an enjoyable day and the Fire Nation natives were enjoying the weather as it began to get warmer the farther they headed northwest. The only one who seemed unaffected by it was the Fire Lord.

Sitting alone in his lavish cabin behind his large desk, Zuko tried to read the document he held in his hand, but to his aggravation, he was unable to concentrate on the words. As much as he tried, he could not stop replaying what he had seen back in the Southern Water Tribe. Though he had not been able to see Katara and Aang’s expressions since the lighting of the room had been poor, he had no doubt that their expressions had been joyous. He kept seeing the way Aang had held Katara to him while she had her arms wrapped around him with the golden necklace in her hand.

Enraged, Zuko snarled and he jumped from his seat, throwing a fireball at the steel wall to his left. He breathed hard as he tried to rein in his temper and emotions before he slumped back down in his chair. He shoved the piece of parchment aside and laid his head on the desk as he let out a sigh.

He was angry, but his anger was not directed at either of them, not even Aang, and certainly not Katara. No, he was mad at himself for not acting sooner upon his feelings for Katara, for not confessing his love for her sooner, and for not having the courage to remain in the Southern Water Tribe to be witness to her happiness with another.

‘Oh, Sparky. You’re going to have to face the truth one day and it better be fast because then you’ll regret it for the rest of your life.’

Zuko chuckled humorlessly. Toph had been right. He had not admitted his feelings or acted upon them faster and he regretted it immensely. He had been so foolish to believe that Katara would have waited for him until he finally came up to her and confessed his feelings and wishes for a future together. He had been arrogant in his belief that Katara would immediately jump into his arms and forget about Aang. But most of all, it was stupid of him to believe he actually had a chance with her.

He should have listened to his earthbending friend. Toph was always right. And now he had set himself up for a life of loneliness and misery for his mistake and arrogance.

A knock at his door brought him out of his glum thoughts and he straightened in his chair.

“Enter,” he called out somberly as he picked up the document he previously discarded and began to scan through it.

He looked up to see his uncle close the door behind him and walk into the cabin with a worried expression on his aged face.

“Zuko, I heard a small explosion a while ago and I came to see what happened,” Iroh said as he glanced around the room until he noticed the scorch mark on the wall. “I’ll need to get someone to fix that,” he mused silently.
Iroh looked back toward Zuko before his eyes widened in concern at the dejected look on his nephew’s face.

“Nephew, what is the matter? Are you all right?” he asked in alarm as he rushed to his silent nephew’s side.

“No, I’m not all right,” Zuko replied emotionlessly. “I will never be.”

“What do you mean by that, Zuko?” Iroh asked while his bushy eyebrows furrowed in concern.

When the young man did not reply, Iroh’s unease grew. Zuko had closed himself in his room ever since they left the southern city and the only time he emerged was to check on the crew. He had been unable to make Zuko leave his room to enjoy the fresh air, and not even Ursa was able to sway his mind. It reminded Iroh of the journey they had taken to the Earth Kingdom to arrive at the Abandoned Fort all the months ago and the only ones that had been able to draw him out had been his friends and...Katara.

“Zuko...what is the real reason we left the Southern Water Tribe so suddenly?” Iroh asked curiously.

He watched as his nephew let out a sigh before Zuko closed his eyes and turned away.

“I would only hurt if I stayed.”

Suki smiled as she watched her sister-in-law play with her twin daughters. They were currently in her and Sokka’s room and the baby girls were giggling and gurgling as their aunt cooed at them and gently tickled their cute little faces. Jing cried out joyously and raised her small fists in the air while her younger twin giggled and stuck a fist in her mouth, her hand immediately getting drenched with baby drool. Katara laughed as she pulled Ting’s hand away from her mouth before rubbing Jing’s belly, but the lighter-haired baby just place her wet fist where it had been before.

The young mother smiled wider as she watched her daughters and Katara have their fun before a small frown appeared between her eyebrows. A few weeks had passed since Zuko and his family had left to the Fire Nation, and during that time, Katara had been stuck to her and the twins whenever she did not have waterbending training or meetings with her father and the elders concerning trade with the Fire Nation. Suki had also noticed that there seemed to be this sort of sadness and pain behind Katara’s eyes despite her efforts to hide them with smiles and laughter, and she wondered what was causing it.
“Katara?” Suki called out as she moved away from the bed and walked closer to the crib her children were laying in.

“Yeah?” Katara replied without looking up as she giggled when Jing grabbed her finger and tugged at it.

“What’s wrong?” the female warrior asked.

Katara finally pulled her finger free and looked up to frown at her brother’s wife with confusion written on her face.

“What do you mean?”

Suki let out an exasperated sigh before she replaced Katara’s finger with her own when Jing began to whimper in sadness.

“Come one, Katara! You’ve been acting so quiet and depressed ever since Zuko, Lady Ursa, and Iroh left.”

Katara’s heart skipped a beat at the mention of Zuko’s name and she blushed before she shrugged.

“It’s nothing that serious. I just miss…them,” she replied lowly, but what she had really wanted to say was ‘him’. She missed Zuko badly and she could not stop herself from longing for him.

“Oh,” Suki said as she eyed the waterbender whose mood had darkened again. “Anyway…So… Aang…”

“What about him?” Katara asked warily as she looked back at the twins who were giggling so they could receive attention again.

Suki frowned slightly as she placed a finger on her chin in thought.
“Well…I noticed that Aang seems to be very happy and excited about something.”

Katara shrugged again and looked guiltily down at her mother’s necklace. She had been unable to tell Aang the truth about her feelings since he was preparing his things for his return to the Earth Kingdom while he kept trying to regain her favor the times she consented in spending time with him.

Both young women were interrupted from their conversation when loud voices sounded from outside the room. They looked up when the door was thrown open and Toph marched in with her usual smirk on her porcelain face with a bubbly Ty Lee trailing after her, her long ponytail swishing from side to side as she bounced into the room.

“Toph! Don’t be so loud! You could’ve upset the babies if they had been asleep, and then I’d be the one to have to calm them down from their crying!” Suki exclaimed as she darkly scowled at the unabashed earthbender.

“Eh,” Toph grunted as she shrugged and waved her hand in the air. “I’m not the one who got myself knocked up, so deal with it.”

“Toph!” Katara chided and placed a restraining hand on the Kyoshi warrior, who had taken a menacing step toward the unwavering young girl. Suki sighed and muttered under her breath.

“Aww, they are so adorable!” Ty Lee crooned, unaffected by the actions of the others as she hovered over the giggling babies that had taken a hold of her long hair in their small hands.

“Of course they are,” Suki spoke up smugly.

Katara laughed and Toph snickered as she plopped herself down on the bed since she couldn’t see the little brats anyway.

“Just hope that they don’t inherit Snoozles’s stupidity,” Toph remarked and chuckled as she placed her hands beneath her head. She grinned when the door burst open again.

“Hey! I resent that!” Sokka groused loudly as he entered the room.
“I don’t see why, since it’s the truth,” Toph replied, pretending to examine her nails.

“Why you…” Sokka began before his daughters’ laughter caught his full attention.

He ignored the annoying earthbender as he made his way to his baby girls who laughed and wiggled in their crib as their funny father came into view. Sokka began to coo and make gibberish sounds as he tickled his daughters’ chins.

“See,” Toph piped in as Sokka had a conversation with the babies in unintelligible words, “I rest my case.”

The three other young women giggled when Sokka looked up to glare at Toph, who of course was unable to see or be affected by it.

“I wonder if my babies will be this cute,” Ty Lee mused as a sparkle appeared in her bright, brownish-gray eyes.

“I wonder how your and Haru’s babies would come out with you being all bouncy and stuff and him being all calm and shy,” Toph remarked from her comfortable place on the bed.

The others laughed as the usually talkative acrobat was rendered speechless while a deep blush surfaced on her cheeks as she gaped at the blunt, blind girl. Her momentary lapse of silence was forgotten as the normal smile on her face reappeared and she began to talk rapidly of a possible future with the young earthbending man.

Ty Lee clapped her hands as she enthusiastically said, “Well, then I want dozens of cute babies with my eyes and his hair, or his green eyes and my hair, or with his—”

“Yeah, yeah, yeah. We get it,” Sokka interrupted as he picked both babies into his arms.

Ty Lee was unfazed as she continued dreaming with a smile on her lips before she turned a bit serious.

“Of course I will pay attention to every one of my children unlike how my parents treated my sisters and me. And I will love them all, unlike Mai who doesn’t want kids since she can’t stand them.” The acrobat’s large eyes widened. “Oops. Maybe I shouldn’t have said that.”

The young tribesman shrugged as he let his daughters pulled at his small beard.

“It’s not like it’s surprising or anything considering how she is,” he stated.

Ty Lee opened her mouth to defend her friend, but was interrupted when Suki spoke up as she grabbed Ting from her father’s arm.

“What’s Mai going to do if she marries Zuko then?” the auburn-haired woman asked curiously.

Toph perked up at this and swiveled her head in Katara’s direction. The waterbender stiffened as her heart clenched painfully in her chest.

“Well…” Ty Lee responded, placing a hand on her cheek as she tried to remember what the noblewoman had told her. She glanced at Katara hesitantly as she continued, “Mai said that she’ll just have the heir. She said that she is sure Zuko doesn’t want too many kids either.”

Katara looked away as she frowned.

I don’t think that’s true. Zuko got along well with the children a few weeks ago. I’m sure he would like more than just one child. She mentally shook her head. I shouldn’t assume things. After all, Zuko had never voiced his opinion about having children to me.

“Is it official, then?” Katara spoke up quietly that it made everybody turn around to look at her.

When Ty Lee asked what she meant, Katara forced herself to say it.

“Is it official that Mai and…Zuko are getting married?” she asked and swallowed thickly. She was afraid of knowing the answer.

Ty Lee shifted from foot to foot as she debated what to say. She had noticed weeks ago that Katara’s aura had been the same color as Zuko’s had been after the incident with the arctic panther-wolves. But now it was tainted with black just like Zuko’s had been when he had left the Southern Water Tribe. She was confused as to what was going on. She did not want to hurt Katara, but Mai had been her friend for years and she was loyal to her.

“They haven’t made it public,” the young Fire Nation woman replied softly, “but Mai told me that they will very soon.”

Katara felt as if something had stabbed her chest and a cold sensation overcame her body. It became difficult to breathe at the pain she was feeling. They all jumped, startled, when Katara abruptly stood from the chair she had been sitting on before she quickly walked away and left the room.

“What was that about?” Sokka asked as he stared after his sister.

Ty Lee looked down and sighed guiltily. Sokka and Suki looked at each other with confused frowns, but Toph just sighed and left the room as well without giving an answer.

Meanwhile, Katara had raced to her room. Once she had firmly closed the door behind her, she threw herself on her bed and unleashed her anguish in sorrowful tears. She knew she should not have been surprised, after all, Mai already lived in the palace and she had heard Mai talking about them being intimate when they had been heading to the Abandoned Fort. She clenched her eyes tight at the thought of Zuko being with Mai in such a way. It hurt too much. But it just stood to reason that they were ready for marriage.

Tears fell down her cheeks as she clutched her pillow. She harshly scolded herself for thinking that Zuko would leave Mai, for hoping that she had a chance with Zuko, for even wishing that Zuko would love her in return.

“We have received news from the governors in the colonies that reside in the Earth Kingdom, my lord,” Chao addressed the Fire Lord as soon as the other advisor had finished recounting the agricultural procedures in the Fire Nation.

“Proceed,” Zuko responded passively as he sat on the dais behind the fire wall.

Though he really did not want to be sitting all day in the stuffy meeting room listening to some of his advisors babbling, he endured it since he knew he had an obligation to his country. Besides, it would distract him from his depressing thoughts concerning a certain blue-eyed waterbending woman.
“They have reported that Master Haru has done a great job teaching the earthbending residents in the colonies,” Chao continued while a small frown appeared on his aged face at the cold tone of the young Fire Lord. “They are most pleased with the way the people of both races seemed to be getting along.”

There was a snort among the Council members and Zuko’s glare immediately landed on Wei who was pretending to be reading from a scroll he held in his chubby hands. The other advisors shifted uncomfortably in their spots at the irritated and angry look on their lord’s face that seemed to be intensified due to the light and shadows that the wall of fire created.

After a while, Zuko returned his steely gaze to his most trusted advisor and nodded.

“You may continue.”

“Yes, my lord,” Chao responded with a small bow of his head as he picked up one of the letters in his hands. “The governors have also reported that the raiders continued to attack the villages, causing a few damages to crops and buildings outside the protective walls. However, thanks to the training of both firebenders and earthbenders, the raiders have been driven off before any more damage or loss of lives could begin.”

Zuko was silent for a moment before he let out an inaudible sigh.

“I am glad to know my people are no longer in too much danger,” he said.

Though his usual tone was even more emotionless and stoic than normal, the men could see that he was indeed glad.

“Is there anything else, Advisor Chao?” Zuko asked.

“That is all, my lord,” Chao responded as he bowed again before he sat back down on his cushion among the other advisors who sat in two lines facing across from each other.

Zuko nodded again before he looked around the room with cold, amber eyes.
“If there is nothing else to discuss, then the meeting is over,” he said dispassionately as he prepared to stand up from his elaborate cushion so he could descend the few step from the dais and leave the room.

“There is one more thing to discuss, Young One,” Wei’s grating voice irritated Zuko’s ears.

Zuko resisted the urge to hurl a fireball at the old advisor for the name, but instead he clenched his hands as he sat back down. The young Fire Lord glared at Wei and raised an eyebrow to command him to continue.

“As we all very well know, your twenty-first birthday is in a couple of months,” Wei began as he stood up from his spot to walk leisurely in front of the fire wall.

When the Fire Lord remained silent, Wei hid a smirk as he stood directly in front of the young man.

“And yet you have not chosen a wife and produced an heir. Is it not about time that you do? I am sure we do not need to remind you that if you do not marry soon we will have to choose a Fire Lady for you.”

The men jumped when Zuko snarled as he rose to his feet and seemed to loom over them due to his height and from standing on the raised platform.

“I’ll choose a Fire Lady when the time comes, and I will not allow anyone to pressure me into choosing my own wife!” Zuko growled angrily, the flames before him almost rising to the ceiling in his fury.

The advisors gaped in surprise at his fierce reaction as the young Fire Lord parted the blazing fire wall and strode down the dais before marching away from the suddenly silent meeting room. Wei smirked and Chao glared at him before he worriedly looked after the angry young man.

Zuko ignored everybody he passed as he made his way to his royal bedchambers in swift strides. One of his personal guards opened one door quickly as they noticed the murderous look on their lord’s face. Once he passed through and the door was shut, the guards looked at each other and silently prayed that they would not suffer their lord’s wrath for whatever had caused his dark mood this time.
Opening the other set of identical golden doors, Zuko slammed it shut before he took off his robe and threw it to the side, uncaring of where it landed. He walked angrily toward the fireplace on one wall and leaned his arm on the mantelpiece as he stared at the flames with glowing, golden eyes filled with outrage.

“How dare that fool try to force me into marriage?” Zuko growled. “I’ll choose a wife when I’m good and ready, dammit!”

The flames in the fireplace rose and a few embers floated in the air. Zuko noticed and took a deep breath to rein in his temper. Pulling away from the mantelpiece, he made his way to his bed and sat down heavily on it. Maybe he should not have reacted so heatedly in front of his advisors since he knew it was inevitable. As Fire Lord, it was expected of him to find a Fire Lady so they could produce an heir that will continue to rule the Fire Nation after his death.

But he could not stop himself from becoming angry when they brought up the subject. He did not want to marry and tie himself to any of the flimsy women the noblemen presented him or wanted to choose for him. What was he going to do? Maybe Mai would be the only possible solution to his problem. She was the perfect example of a true noblewoman and what the Fire Lady should be, and she loved him. He sighed guiltily since he had not thought about his ‘girlfriend’ ever since they had taken a small break from their relationship.

Maybe when she came back, he could try to work in their relationship and perhaps one day announced her as the future Fire Lady? Zuko shook his head and dropped his head on his hands. No. He just couldn’t. He did not want Mai.

He wanted, needed, and longed for Katara. She was the only woman he wanted by his side, the only one he wanted as his wife and Fire Lady, the only woman who had his love and held his heart. Ever since he left the Southern Water Tribe and returned to the Fire Nation, Katara was the only one who was in his mind all day. He could not stop thinking about her even though he had ordered himself to. By day in his silent study and at night in his lonely bedchamber, her image would come between him and the papers he strove to read or the sleep he tried to gain. The syllables of her beautiful name would call to him through the silence in which his soul relished and it would cast a sort of melancholic enchantment over him.

He had not visited the Royal Palace Garden ever since he returned, for it brought too many memories of her. He was sure that if he saw the many flowers that decorated the garden, especially the rosebushes, he would only see the way she had bent down to delicately sniff the sweet fragrance of the elegant, red roses…
If he gazed down into the clear and peaceful pond, he would remember the night they had stood under the full moon while petals from the cherry blossom tree fell around them as she sought to comfort him from his fear while she gently caressed his scarred cheek with her soft hand…

Zuko blinked and shook his head. No. He was only hurting himself. He had to stop thinking. He had to stop remembering. He had to stop…loving her.

He looked over at the closed curtains that blocked the balcony from view to where his private garden rested below it. Zuko sighed again.

If only it was so easy, he thought.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Most of the grand house was silent since everybody had either gone outside or retired early to their rooms. Sokka and Suki had decided to finally take the twins into the city so they could be greeted and lavished upon by the tribe people and the few guests that remained. Katara had decided to go along with them.

Toph’s bare feet carried her down the corridors of the frozen structure and, though the marble floor was chilly to the soles of her feet, it was better than going outside in the cold snow where she had to wear boots, which impeded her from ‘seeing’ where she was going or what was happening around her.

Toph was on a mission to find a certain airbender. She was not sleepy so she refused to just lay there in her room and she did not want to go outside only to become disoriented as somebody led her around like a helpless child while her face became numb from the cold. It was not that she disliked the Southern Water Tribe, quite the contrary, she like the amiable people she encountered, the unique and delicious food she was given, and the fresh and clean scent that reached her sensitive nose. The problem was that the freezing climate irritated her and her feet longed to bury themselves in warm soil while her senses became restored.

Where in the world is Twinkletoes? Toph grumbled mentally as she continued on her march.

After Katara had left with the young parents and their daughters, Aang had disappeared for a few hours, and the blind earthbender was getting really irritated since she had told him that they needed to talk about heading to some of the villages in the southwestern part of the Earth Kingdom that seemed to need their help. Aang had received a message two days ago about a problem in a village, and even though he had been determined to go offer some aid, the young monk would avoid her when she brought it up, almost as if he did not want to leave the South Pole.
The young girl grinned as she neared one of the sitting rooms and her senses picked up the familiar rhythm of Aang’s energetic heartbeat. Toph stomped her way inside the room, and by the vibrations she picked up from the stone floor, she was able to ‘see’ that Aang was sitting crossed-legged in the middle of the room, as if in meditation. She wondered if perhaps she should let him be for a while, but when she caught the unsteady beat of his heart and heard low grumbles come from him, she knew without a doubt that he was sulking.

“What’s wrong now, Twinkletoes?” Toph exclaimed loudly as she came up behind him to stand with crossed arms beside his sitting form. It was her way of showing her concern.

Aang jumped and yelped in surprise before he turned to scowl at the girl that had a raised eyebrow aimed at him.

“It’s none of your business!” he snapped at her as he crossed his own arms over his chest.

“Hey, don’t you talk to me like that!” Toph barked as she raised a fist at him. “I just wanted to help, but you can just forget it!”

She turned around to stalk angrily away from the room and away from the jerk, but she froze when Aang’s hand shot out and grabbed her wrist.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to yell at you,” Aang apologized quietly. The young airbender marveled at how thin and delicate Toph’s wrist was despite her rough and strong attitude.

Toph felt heat rise on her cheeks at the contact, but she quickly wrenched her arm away with a snort before she crossed her arms over her chest, resisting the urge to touch the skin where Aang had grabbed her. What the hell?

“Whatever. Are you gonna tell me what’s wrong with you or what?” she asked as she pretended to find an interest on the floor in order to hide the blush she knew was there. Did she hit her head or something?

Aang pressed his lips together as he debated whether to tell Toph what was bothering him or not. Finally, he sighed.
“I’m just frustrated with Katara because she’s avoiding me again and I don’t know why.”

Toph let out a sigh of her own as she ungracefully dropped herself on the floor to sit opposite the pouting Avatar. Seriously, sometimes Aang could be very wise for someone as young as him that it never failed to amaze her, but other times he was so clueless that it caused her to want to throttle him! Or was it perhaps that he pretended he did not understand and instead chose to believe whatever he wanted? Did Aang not see that Katara did not return his feelings and was avoiding him because she felt guilty being near him while she pined for another?

“I asked Katara to marry me,” Aang said softly after a few minutes of silence.

Toph stiffened at his words and her mouth flew open.

_What? When? Why didn’t Sugar Queen tell me?_ she thought. _Was this perhaps the reason why Sparky left? Did he somehow found out and was unable to bear the news? But that couldn’t be because then Katara would’ve said something about accepting Aang’s proposal._

“What did Sweetness say?” Toph asked with a frown.

She heard Aang sighed sadly before he replied.

“Katara rejected me.”

“What? Really?” the young woman asked as both her eyebrows rose on her forehead and a smile broke on her face.

She was puzzled at the happiness she felt at the news before her smile quickly vanished, and she scowled. Of course, she was glad because it meant that Katara and Zuko still had a chance to be together and be happy. Again, it had nothing to do with Aang finally being single.

“She said that she was not ready and then…and then she…and then she told me that she didn’t…love me,” Aang stammered brokenly that it even made Toph wince at the sorrowful tone to it.

The earthbender sighed.
“Oh, Aang—” she began, but was interrupted when the young man jumped lightly to his feet.

“But I know that she didn’t mean it!” Aang reassured.

Toph wondered if he was reassuring her or himself.

“She just needs some time to gather her thoughts and realize that she’s just confused and that she does love me!” Aang continued.

Toph opened her mouth to argue, but scowled when Aang just moved away from her and began to pace the room frantically, muttering quietly to himself.

“And then I’ll propose to her again and this time she’ll accept!” Aang continued with a wistful smile on his young face. “I mean what’s there to wait for? We love each other and we’re meant to be together.”

Toph stood up from her spot on the floor and placed a hand on Aang’s shoulders, effectively making him pause in his pacing. Aang looked down at Toph in surprise and gaped at the serious expression on her porcelain face.

“Have you ever thought that maybe that’s what you keep telling yourself?” Toph stated casually as she squeezed his shoulder.

Aang pulled away from her with an annoyed growl and, turning away, he began to walk to the entrance of the room.

“I know what I said is right. Katara loves me and we will get married one day,” he repeated himself stubbornly before he disappeared.

Toph stood silently in the middle of the room as she listened to Aang’s footsteps until they faded from her senses. With a huge sigh, Toph shook her head as she, too, exited the room.
They still needed to talk about heading to the Earth Kingdom, though.

Guards stiffened in their posts and servants scurried away with haste as the Fire Lord exited the throne room and made his way down the golden corridor toward the western wing of the Fire Nation Palace. Everybody seemed to be walking on eggshells around the young lord ever since his return. It seemed that he had little patience for anything nowadays and nobody wanted to bring on the wrath of their temperamental lord. No one knew what could have happened in the Southern Water Tribe to make him change so. They all wondered if he would ever revert back to the cool and impassive way he was before or if his current angry and volatile behavior would be permanent.

Zuko strode down the hallway with a dark scowl on his face, his amber eyes blazing in hardly controlled anger. He barely noticed the frightened servants he passed, trying to give him a wide berth while cowering as if trying to escape his notice. He occupied his thoughts with what he had learned in the meeting with his advisors as he continued on his way to his royal bedchambers. Trade with both the Water Tribes and the Earth Kingdom seemed to be going well, much better than it had years before when he had recently ascended the throne, and he was glad it had to do with his meeting with the Earth King and both Chiefs of the Water Tribes. His scowl deepened, however, for the thought of the Water Tribes always brought pain as well as warmth to his heart despite the fact that he had tried very hard to numb his feelings and shove them away.

His pace slowed slightly when he came upon the guest wing like it always did when he passed it in order to reach his room. Every time he walked on this part of the palace he always tried to keep his gaze ahead of himself when he came near the room a certain waterbender had slept in a few months ago. And every time he did, he failed miserably and ended up looking at the door to the room anyway as memories resurfaced in his mind.

Memories of how he had stared at the sleeping waterbender while he fought himself from leaning down to capture her lips with his.

And just like always he would shake his head from his thoughts as his gaze landed on the closed door while he resisted the urge to walked up to it and enter the empty room where he knew the woman he loved would not be sleeping soundly or waiting for him in. And at the same thought he always had, he turned away from the door and continued on his silent march with a stony expression on his face.

He nodded at his personal guards once he reached his rooms and entered without a word when they hastily opened the golden door. His gaze softened slightly when he saw his mother and uncle in the antechamber, sitting at a low table in the center of the room as they waited to dine with him. He had taken up eating in his rooms again since more memories would surface if he used the family dining hall. Besides, the table was too large for just three people to have dinner.
“Mother. Uncle,” Zuko greeted them dispassionately as he gracefully sank down on the cushion at what could be called the head of the table.

As soon as the Fire Lord sat down, Jiao and a short-haired servant moved forward, opened the lids to the food dishes and plates, and quickly began to serve the small royal family. Once finished, the two women bowed and excused themselves when Zuko absentmindedly nodded at them. They stepped outside the room and waited with the guards for the meal to finish so they could clean everything up. Jiao exchanged a knowing look with the two soldiers at the doors and the three frowned at the change in their respected and admired lord.

Zuko picked up his chopsticks when the servants left and the door was closed, and he stared blankly at the food placed in his plate before him. Without another word, he began to eat, occasionally picking up his cup of wine to take a drink of the burning, red liquid. Iroh and Ursa shared a worried look at the lifelessness in the young man’s eyes and how he seemed to be eating automatically.

Iroh cleared his throat loudly, and when his nephew looked up, the old man spoke.

“Nephew, is everything all right?”

Zuko stared at him for a brief moment before he gazed down uninterestingly at his plate.

“Yes,” he replied passively.

Ursa slammed her teacup down on the smooth, wooden table, causing the plates and utensils to rattle and the soup and tea to swoosh in their containers. Iroh calmly took a bite of the food from his chopsticks while Zuko snapped his head up and his eyes widened at his usually gentle and quiet mother who had her eyes narrowed down at him.

“I finally have had enough, Zuko!” she exclaimed angrily as she scolded her son with a glare. “I hate seeing you like…like…” she paused as she waved a hand at him, trying to find the words to describe his current state, “this. Please, my son. Tell us what is happening to you.”

Zuko looked away from the worried look on his mother’s irritated face. He felt slightly guilty for making her and his uncle worry, and he really wish he could tell them how horrible and miserable he was feeling at the moment, but he just could not find it in himself to speak. He still found it hard to talk about his feelings and open himself up to others, and the one person that he was willing to reveal so much about himself was the one person who was making him feel so depressed and the one whom he was currently trying to forget.

Looking back down at the table, Zuko gazed at his reflection on the surface of his cup of wine and glared at himself.

“It’s nothing, Mother,” he finally answered her and looked away from the red liquid. “It’s nothing for either of you to worry about.”

Ursa looked back at her old friend, who had been silent during the entire time, and silently pleaded for him to help her. Iroh returned her concerned look before he took a sip of his tea, and once he swallowed the soothing liquid, he placed the cup gently down on the table.

“Zuko,” he finally spoke in a calm and soft tone. “Does your behavior have anything to do with Miss Katara?” he asked.

Zuko stiffened visibly and looked away, unknowingly answering Iroh’s question by his reaction and silence.

“If you’ll excuse me,” Zuko muttered as he stood up from his spot, “I’m going to retire for the night.” He stood up, turned around, and began to make his way to the other set of doors that led to his bedroom.

“You’re in love with Katara, are you not, Fire Lord Zuko?” Iroh stated calmly. He smiled when Zuko tensed and stopped in his tracks with his back turned toward them. “Your feelings for her have been obvious for a long time, Nephew.”

Zuko closed his eyes before he let out a soft sigh.

“Yes…I am,” he confessed softly without glancing back.

Iroh and Ursa glanced at each other with pleased smiles at the fact that he had finally admitted his feelings for the Water Tribe woman both had come to care for.

“Then why are you so…sad?” Ursa asked gently as she looked at her son’s back with a concerned frown. “Did…did Katara…reject you?”

Zuko let out a humorless chuckle and shrugged lightly.

“Katara doesn’t even know how I feel about her,” he answered truthfully. “And she never will since she’s…marrying Aang,” he added bitterly.

“What?” Ursa gasped. “How can that be? Are you sure?”

“I saw them embracing and Katara had the betrothal necklace Aang had showed me before in her hand!” Zuko almost growled out. “What other explanation is there?”

“Zuko, maybe what you saw wasn’t what you think it was,” Iroh reasoned as he mentally willed his nephew to turn around and look at them. “We would have known by now if they were engaged. Besides, we’re sure Katara loves—”

“I don’t know why they haven’t announced their engagement yet,” Zuko interrupted, vaguely listening to what his uncle was about to say. He did not want to be reminded that Katara loved Aang. “But I’m sure they will eventually.”

Before either his mother or his uncle could say anything else, Zuko made his way to his room again where he opened one door and sighed.

“Please…I don’t want to talk about it,” he said quietly before he entered and silently closed the door behind him.

Silence permeated the antechamber for a moment before the only ones left in the room looked at each other with bewildered and concerned expressions.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Sitting among a pile of papers and different types of elaborate cloths in a large sitting room, Iroh and Ursa tried to determine what would be best for Zuko’s upcoming twenty-first birthday the following month. Iroh furrowed his eyebrows in concentration as he wrote down everything he thought was needed—as well as what was not—on the piles of scrolls that surrounded him on the table they were sitting at.
I wonder if Zuko would like the singing nomads Aang had told me about once to be the musical entertainment for the night, Iroh mused with a small grin before he shook his head. Zuko would probably throw them out.

“Iroh dear,” Ursa called out from her end of the table. She critically looked at the different kinds of fabrics made of various designs and shades of red and gold that the servants would hold out for her or move away if she did not like them.

When Iroh looked up from his paper, Ursa held out piece of material made of a dark wine color with intricate patterns woven in gold and black thread.

“Do you think this would look nice as the tablecloths?” she asked.

Iroh examined the material and nodded with a bright smile on his face.

“I think it would look wonderful,” he exclaimed.

Servants scurried back and forth, as they went about doing their lord’s family members’ biding. Invitations were sent, the cooks were told ahead of time of the menu that was to be served, florists were called, and musicians were searched for.

Four months had passed since they left the Southern Water Tribe and returned to the Fire Nation. Iroh and Ursa were busy as they strove to have everything ready and perfect for Zuko’s celebration. The entire nation was excited since their young Fire Lord had never had a celebration for his birth ever since he took up the throne and they all looked forward to the festivities. Zuko had refused to have a celebration this year just like he did in the past, claiming that his country’s economy and wellbeing was much more important than a lavish party, but Iroh argued that the Fire Nation was doing extremely well and the economy would not suffer if they gave him a party. Ursa then had told him that they had been separated from each other for so many years and it would make her happy if he allowed them to throw a celebration for him to make up all those years of her absence in his life, and with that, Zuko had relented.

The real reason, though, why they were insistent on giving Zuko a party was so that perhaps he could relax and enjoy himself for a change. Ever since they had returned and they had learned of what Zuko saw—or thought he saw—back in the Southern Water Tribe he had become more withdrawn and angrier than ever. The Royal advisors, courtiers, and servants were almost afraid of him due to his sudden terrible temper. He had almost fired a couple of servants and advisors if it had not been for Iroh’s intervention, and he had made a few of the young noblewomen cry or storm away in outrage when they had tried to flirt with him. He refused to eat in the royal family dining room, avoided visiting his private garden, buried himself in paperwork, and trained all the time when he had no political business to attend to in the throne room. Overall, it was not good and everybody was worried for him.

“Iroh?” Ursa called out again in a soft tone as she dismissed the servants with the pieces of cloth she did not like.

“Yes?”

“Did you send the invitation to Zuko’s celebration to the Southern Water Tribe already?” she asked as she looked at her old friend meaningfully.

Iroh, too, looked up and nodded.

“It was the first invitation I sent out,” he replied with a small glint in his golden eyes.

Both smiled at each other with significant looks before they continued in their task to make the party as perfect as it could be for the young man they worried for and loved so much. They were convinced that the only one that could bring Zuko back was Katara and they were looking forward to the day both young benders would meet again.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The Fire Nation sun began to make its descent towards the west. The bright sun was getting a bit warmer and stronger since winter was over and spring was approaching, but the warm weather seemed not to be acknowledged by the Fire Lord as he continued to practice his fiery element, despite the fact that he was perspiring profusely and his muscles screamed for him to take a break. He also ignored the obvious weary grimace his admiral wore on his face as he tried to keep up sparring with him.

Standing to the side of the large training arena, Iroh and Chao watched with frowns on their faces as Zuko hurled attack after attack toward Jee and easily evaded the ones the older man sent his way. Though they had to admit that the young Fire Lord was firebending magnificently and his control on his element was admirable, both old men were not pleased that he seemed to be driving himself too hard and they were afraid he would collapse at any moment.

Zuko dove to one side when Jee tried to punch his jaw and quickly righted himself before he sent a powerful kick to Jee’s torso when the older firebender pivoted around. The admiral barely had time to cross his arms in front of himself in order to protect his chest, but was unprepared for the force of the kick and he was sent flying backwards. He landed on his back on the stone ground and skidded on the smooth yet grainy surface for a few seconds because of the blow. He panted heavily from the exertion and groaned in pain when he sat up.

“Admiral Jee, are you all right?” Zuko asked with a frown as he reached a hand down to pull the older man up.

Jee winced as his back protested at the movement, positive he was going to have a bruise the following day, but he refused to cry out in front of his lord.

“I am fine, my lord,” he answered as he tried to straightened out. “I just can’t keep up with you anymore.” He smiled slightly.

Zuko nodded as he stepped back to give the winded man some space.

“Thank you for the training, Admiral Jee. I think you deserve some rest for the moment before you stand guard of my mother again.”

“Thank you, my lord,” Jee responded.

He bowed briefly before he walked away to his room to get some rest before he resumed his task as Lady Ursa’s personal guard. A few servants rushed to his side and handed him a towel and a cup of water, both of which he gratefully took before he stepped into the palace.

Iroh and Chao frowned even deeper when Zuko picked up his dual broadswords that he had placed to the side before he stepped back into the middle of the arena and resumed his vigorous training by himself since nobody else was able to keep up with him.

Chao glanced over at his old friend as he stroked his chin.

“Iroh, what is wrong with Fire Lord Zuko? Everyone in the palace is worried for our young lord since he has been acting so strange lately,” he stated curiously.

Iroh slid his hands inside his long sleeves and sighed heavily.
“I wish I really knew, my friend,” he replied with a low tone. What really happened in the Southern Water Tribe?

“Perhaps it is the news about the new attacks from the raiders in the colonies?” Chao pondered.

“No, it’s not that,” Iroh said with a shake of his head. “It’s something much graver than that.”

Both men looked back to the lone figure training in the arena without pausing in any of his vigorous moves. They were silent for a moment before Iroh huffed and narrowed his eyes. He was tired of seeing his nephew like this.

“Chao, I need to talk to Fire Lord Zuko in private,” the retired general said solemnly.

Chao looked over at the somber look on his old friend’s face and nodded before he walked back inside the palace. Iroh watched a minute longer as his nephew kept slicing the air while he channeled fire from his hands and into his swords. The Dragon of the West squared his shoulders and approached his young nephew with determined steps.

Zuko spun around, slashing the air with his flaming sword, but he paused when he caught sight of his uncle walking toward him. He did not want to stop, for when he did, thoughts, memories, and images about her would start playing in his head. But, nonetheless, he lowered his swords and straightened himself out as he waited to see what his uncle wanted to make him pause in his training.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” Iroh began and Zuko knew it had to be something serious if his uncle addressed him formally, “We need to talk.”

“There’s nothing to talk about,” the younger firebender growled and turned away since he knew what it was his uncle wanted to discuss.

“Yes, there is, Zuko,” Iroh insisted firmly.

Zuko briefly glanced at his uncle who had narrowed eyes trained on him before he looked away to dismiss his servants and guards. Once the training arena was empty except for the two of them, Zuko looked back at his aged uncle and raised a dark eyebrow.
“Nephew,” Iroh began with a concerned frown, “Please. Tell me what is really going on. You are worrying everybody.”

Zuko shrugged.

“It’s none of their concern,” he responded stoically.

Iroh took a deep breath in order to calm himself down and not slap his stubborn nephew upside his head.

“Of course it’s our concern! We are all worried for you, especially your mother and me. Zuko… when will you return to the way you were before? When will you stop being so…sullen?”

Zuko looked away and glared at the darkening sky above.

_I will never return to the way I was before. Not until I have Katara at my side_, he thought before he closed his eyes, _Which will never happen._

“You must overcome whatever happened in the Southern Water Tribe with Katara and find a way to live your life again, Nephew. Perhaps the best way is by admitting to Katara your love for her,” the older firebender said, exasperated.

When the young man refused to talk, Iroh cried out, “You are destroying yourself, Zuko!”

Zuko snarled as he spun around and released a fire blast that exploded against the wall on the opposite side of the training arena before he threw his swords aside and slumped to the floor with his head in his hands. Iroh ran to him with a small cry and knelt next to him, placing a comforting hand on his shoulder.

“Why?” Zuko whispered brokenly. “Why is love so incurable? Why does it have to hurt so much? Why is love so painful?”
Zuko raised his head from his hands and looked up at his uncle desperately, making the old man gasp at what he saw. Iroh frowned sadly as he realized that the anger Zuko had in his eyes disappeared and was replaced by incredible pain and sadness. He realized Zuko had hid behind his mask so he could conceal his hurt as anger just like he had done all those years ago.

“Nephew,” Iroh spoke softly as he squeezed the desolate young firebender’s shoulder. “Love is never easy, and most of the time, it will bring heartaches and anguish. But I want you to know that if you fight for it and never give up, all that pain, all that suffering, will be worth it in the end,” he said as he gazed carefully into the austere young man’s eyes. “Or would you have preferred to have lived your life without knowing what love is? Would you have preferred never to have fallen in love with Katara?”

Zuko looked away from his uncle’s wise eyes and looked down at his clenched hands. He was silent for a long moment as he tried to think over what his mentor and father figure had said. Would he have preferred never to have known what love is in order not to feel pain? Would he prefer not to love Katara?

“No,” Zuko finally replied in a low tone as he glanced back at his uncle who was now sitting by his side. “I don’t prefer to have never known Katara or never have fallen in love with her. I don’t regret my feelings for her and I will always love her despite the pain it causes me.”

With a groan, Zuko dropped his head back into his hands and sighed deeply.

“I don’t know what to do anymore, Uncle.”

He tilted his head back to gaze at the sky, which was a combination of golden and red hues and dark purples and blues.

“I can’t get her out of my head,” Zuko almost whispered and Iroh noticed that his nephew was thinking to himself by the faraway look in his eyes and the soft manner in which he spoke.

“What would I give just to kiss her? Just to hold her in my arms one more time? I don’t want to lose her. She’s everything to me…” Zuko trailed off before he blinked and looked back down to glare at the ground. “Yet there’s nothing I can do. She’s not mine to have.”

Iroh placed his hands inside his sleeves and stayed silent for a moment as he watched the way his nephew seemed to keep torturing himself. He was not surprised that Zuko had misinterpreted what had happened that day in the Southern Water Tribe, and yes, Iroh was positive Zuko had misunderstood because he would bet on his life that Katara loved Zuko. His nephew had endured hate and abhorrence from many people like Ozai and Azula since a young age, and Iroh had a feeling that the young man somehow felt that someone like Katara could never love someone like him.

He cleared his throat and sighed.

“Zuko, I know you think that you have lost Katara forever, but trust me when I say that you have not…at least not yet.”

“Why do you say that, Uncle?” the Fire Lord asked with a frown.

“I can’t tell you why because it is something between Katara and you,” Iroh began before he continued with a serious frown, “Zuko, you will never find peace and happiness if you don’t tell Katara you love her and find out what her response truly is.”

Katara watched with a proud smile on her face as her young waterbending students strove to complete the bending moves she had instructed them into doing before a melancholy sigh escaped between her lips. In a few years, the children would no longer be her students as they either decided to make their livings as normal citizens with jobs or become warriors for the tribe. If they decided to be Water Tribe warriors, then the older warriors, and occasionally her brother and Pakku, would take up their lessons. Her job was to ensure that the children learned the basics of waterbending and learned how to control their elements, encouraging them to embrace what they were.

Katara sighed at the memory of that time in the Fire Nation garden where she had told the same thing to Zuko. A small tear fell from her eyes and trailed down her cheek, but she angrily wiped it away before the children could notice it and become worried.

Why? Why could she not stop thinking about Zuko even after all the times she had told herself he was not meant for her? Why did she keep hurting herself by dreaming about him and the life and children they could have if only he were able to love her back?

Spirits, how much more pitiful can she be?

The children’s excited laughter reached her ears as they succeeded in accomplishing the most difficult part of their training for the week. She shoved her previous thoughts from her mind as she smiled down at the children with an approving smile.
“You all did excellent today! I’m so proud of you,” Katara told them sincerely and grinned when some of the boys puffed out their chest in pride while some of the girls blushed bashfully at the praise. “Class is dismissed. I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“Bye, Master Katara!” the children chorused enthusiastically as they raced away from the training area to either go play or go home and eat.

For the past few months, the curious children had constantly asked her why the Fire Lord had left so early. Her heart had warmed at the saddened and disappointed looks they gave her when she told them he had a responsibility to the Fire Nation and did not know if he was coming back for a visit soon. The truth was that it was the same thing that she asked herself every day since Zuko had left with that strange and cold behavior.

A small tug on her sleeve snapped Katara out of her thoughts and she looked down to see Lien looking up at her with a small frown on her young face.

“Lady Katara, are you okay?” Lien asked quietly as she tilted her head to the side.

Katara smiled down at the child and nodded.

“Yes, I’m fine, Lien. Why do you ask?”

The small girl’s thin eyebrows furrowed as she tried to explain to the young woman what she had in mind before she raised her head again and frowned.

“You aren’t the same Lady Katara since Fire Lord Zuko left,” she replied simply.

Katara’s eyes widened and she gaped lightly in surprise at the young child staring up at her before she looked away and sighed. Had she been that obvious? It only made her sadder. Looking back down at Lien, Katara opened her mouth to respond, but closed it again since she did not know what to say. She watched as Lien’s serious expression changed and turned into the delight and enthusiasm of a normal child.

“Are you…uh…” Lien began as she scrunched up her small nose as she tried to remember the word she was looking for before she smiled again, “breaking up with Avatar Aang to marry Fire Lord Zuko?” The small girl excitedly clapped her gloved hands.
“W-What?” Katara stuttered as she stared wide-eyed at the grinning girl in shock. “What makes you think that?”

Lien giggled at the funny look on the waterbending woman’s face as she gushed out, “You were staring at Fire Lord Zuko with big goo-goo eyes!”

“No I wasn’t!” Katara denied, horrified.

“Yes, you were, Lady Katara!” Lien argued back with another giggle.

Katara was about to retort before she rolled her eyes at herself for arguing with a child as if she were a little girl, too. She had to admit she was amazed at how children could be so intuitive at times as she stared at Lien who stared at her back with a large smile on her face.

“It would be nice if you married him,” Lien said suddenly.

“Why?” Katara asked, though she thought it would be wonderful to be Zuko’s wife, too.

The little girl looked up at her as if there was something wrong with the older woman’s head before she smiled with large, adoring eyes.

“Because you’ll marry a handsome and brave man who’s very nice and a strong warrior, too! And then you will live happily ever after!” she exclaimed dreamily at the thought. It would be like the stories about the handsome prince who saved the princess her mama told her when she went to sleep.

Katara smiled ruefully at the idolization in Lien’s eyes. If only everything could be as simple as children saw it. If only life could be so easy and she could have everything she desired, but she couldn’t because she was not that selfish and because life did not work that way.

“That sounds very nice, Lien,” Katara began quietly. “But it can’t be that way.”

“Why not?” Lien asked with a small pout.
Katara looked up at the bright sun in the sky before it was hidden from view by dark clouds.

“Because Fire Lord Zuko doesn’t have feelings for me like I…have for him.”

“Yes he does!” the small girl disagreed, making Katara blink down at her in surprise. “He wouldn’t stop staring at you! And then when you fell down he looked so worried! And then when you were both staring at each other it looked like he was gonna kiss you!”

Katara gasped and blushed deeply at the blunt manner in which the little girl had spoken. It vaguely reminded her of Toph before her thoughts wandered off. Katara touched her lips as she looked in the direction where the penguins lived and where Zuko and she had spent a day with the children. And how it had looked like Zuko wanted to kiss her when they had fallen on the soft snow.

Katara blushed again at her thoughts as she continued to touch her lips. It reminded her of the other times she had been with Zuko, such as when they were in the Royal Palace Garden or after their spar on his flagship where it seemed as if he had almost leaned over to kiss her. Would he have kissed her this time if the children had not interrupted them?

No, he wouldn’t have because he had to like me more than just a friend to do that, Katara thought with a sad frown. Even if I would’ve liked it, loved it really, if he had kissed me. I have to stop thinking and wishing things like this. I can’t let myself hope only to set up myself for more hurt and pain in the end.

“Lady Katara?” Lien called out worriedly when she noticed the older woman’s eyes begin to get watery.

“Lien, can I ask you to do something for me?” Katara asked instead as she composed herself.

“Okay!” the small child enthused happily.

“Don’t tell anybody about anything we said today, okay?” she asked softly.

“But Lady—’’
“Please, Lien? Promise?” Katara insisted gently.

Lien frowned deeply, her young face looking a lot older when she did that.

“I promise,” she replied in a low tone.

“Thanks,” the waterbender said with a small smile. “I think it’s time you go home and eat.”

“Okay,” Lien grumbled before another grin found its way to her lips. “But I know what I said about you and Fire Lord Zuko is true!” she exclaimed before she raced back toward the city.

Katara stared after the little girl and sighed heavily. If Lien had noticed that something was wrong with her, then that meant that her family and friends had noticed it as well and were probably worried about her. She had to get a hold of herself and her emotions so she could stop worrying them, she needed to toughen up and continue with her life. Maybe she could give Aang another chance and give their relationship another shot. He loved and needed her.

She closed her eyes and touched the left side of her chest over her heavy heart. But she knew that she would be miserable in the inside and she knew she would never be able to stop loving Zuko.

Shaking her head, the waterbender left the arena and aimlessly roamed the city for a few hours before she finally made her way to her home when dinnertime approached. After taking a few bites of her dinner, she excused herself and headed to her room, oblivious to the concerned looks her family threw after her.

Once she entered her room, Katara sat quietly on the edge of her bed in the semi-dark room, the only light coming from the full moon from the frozen window. She thought about the past weeks and sighed. Aang and Toph had left a few months ago and during the time they had been in the Southern Water Tribe, Aang had been nonstop trying to win her over again. Katara reached into her nightstand’s drawer, pulled out the golden necklace, and frowned at it. She had tried to return it to him and tell him their relationship was over, but every time she even made a hint about it, Aang would start talking rapidly about something else before he would make a hasty retreat.

She touched the yellow topaz stone and frowned even more at it. She had to admit it was a very beautiful necklace, but she just could not bring herself to accept and like it. She let out a wistful sigh. If only it could be Zuko’s necklace that she was holding and it was he that was asking for her hand.
in marriage. Shaking her head from such thoughts, she dropped the piece of jewelry back into the drawer and shut it closed. She glanced at the silver hairpin on top of the nightstand and finally picked it up since the last time she had done so months ago. She cradled it lovingly to her chest, blinking back the tears that wanted to escape her eyes.

Katara stood up from her bed and made her way to the frozen window in her room. Large, cerulean eyes stared unwaveringly at the bright full moon high up in the dark sky where not a single gray cloud marred the sight above her. Once again, the waterbender had been unable to find sleep due to the energy the full moon emitted.

But this time there is no Zuko that I could talk to. Zuko is not here to keep me warm and safe in the lonely and quiet night just like that time he accidentally came upon me while I bathed, she mused with a sad smile as she stared out from the frozen window in her room.

Katara blinked and looked down at her clasped hands that she had placed over her heart. She did not know what she would do once she saw him next month to attend his birthday celebration. She had tried to find a way to forget Zuko since she knew that he and Mai would be married sometime in the future, but as much as she tried, she just couldn’t. Instead, her love for him kept growing almost to the point that it felt like her heart would burst from her chest from the intensity of it. She longed to be by his side, to be wrapped securely in his warm and strong arms, to have his lips touch hers. But most of all she longed to show him her love for him and have his in return.

Katara moved her hands away from her chest and opened them slowly, revealing the silver rose hairpin with the precious ruby and sapphire gems that sparkled in the soft moonlight. She would wear the hairpin at the party to show Zuko her gratitude for the gift and to show her love for him as well...even if he would not know it.

“I can’t forget about you,” Katara whispered softly to the small trinket in her hand as she caressed it gently with her fingers, “Just like I can’t forget about Zuko.”

Zuko stormed into his room and slammed one of the golden doors shut. Removing his fire crown from his topknot, he placed it carefully in its designated elegant box before he ran his fingers agitatedly through his dark hair. He stepped into his private bathroom and let the marble bathtub fill with water while he fumed silently. He was furious that his courtiers and advisors—that mostly being Wei—were constantly harassing him into choosing a Fire Lady and producing an heir. How many times would he have to endure their badgering?

Once the tub was filled, the angry Fire Lord reached a heated hand into the water and warmed it until he was satisfied with the temperature. He disrobed, threw his clothes and boots to the side, and then climbed into the bathtub. Zuko sat down and let out a contented sigh as the warm water soothed his tensed muscles. He relaxed for a moment before proceeding to clean himself, but then he remembered how his day had been and he scowled darkly at the innocent sponge in his hand.

He was also irritated since everywhere he went he had been pestered about his birthday celebration that was to occur the following day—having to listen to whether he liked this food to be served or that, or if the banquet hall should be arranged this way or that, and other annoying questions that he really did not give a damn about. Did they not realize he was in no mood to celebrate? His life was miserable and the only person who was able to make him happy was probably already planning her own celebration…her wedding celebration.

Zuko threw the soapy sponge into the water, and with a heavy sigh, he reclined his head on the edge of the cold marble bathtub. His heart hurt at that thought and he sank deeper into the water until it reached his neck.

He remained in the tepid water for a few more minutes before he finally made himself get out. Once he was dried and dressed in dark red sleeping pants, the young man laid down on his bed with a tired sigh. He closed his eyes and attempted to fall asleep only to open them again with an irritated growl when sleep eluded him. Zuko stared at the dark ceiling above him for a few minutes before he rolled on his side and stared at the closed curtains that led to the balcony as well as the empty space on his large bed.

He reached a hand out and ran it down on the cold spot next to him. He had never given much thought about being the only one on his bed before since he had always liked his space and privacy. He had always avoided the subtle hints Mai would give him about letting her into it and he never even entertained the thought of having a concubine in it either.

Now, however, as he looked at the empty spot beside him on the rather large bed, a cold, empty, and lonely feeling assaulted him so greatly that he felt like he was suffocating due to the intensity of it. He no longer cared for his space or privacy because now he wanted, he longed, to have the woman he loved filling that empty space in his bed, in his life, and in his heart. What would he give to have that spot occupied by Katara while he watched her sleep peacefully next to him? To have her by his side, wrapped in his arms, as they reached passionate bliss together or were lulled to sleep in the comfort of each other’s warmth and presence? How he wished Katara were his to kiss, his to touch, his to make love to, his to enfold her petite body within the safety of his arms, his to love.

With a deep sigh and a shake of his head, Zuko looked away from the cold and vacant spot and sat up, running his hand through his short and loose hair.

He heard his uncle’s words echo in his head for the hundredth time since he had left the training arena a few weeks ago.
Could it be true that maybe I misunderstood what happened that day in the Southern Water Tribe? But then what could it have meant if not that Aang had proposed to Katara and she had accepted? At this thought, Zuko felt his stomach twist and he cringed.

But if what Uncle said was true then perhaps...maybe...I still have a chance with Katara? he asked himself with a pensive frown.

He felt pathetic, but he just could not bring himself to care. He could not stop thinking about Katara, and even though he had told himself countless of times for his own sake, he could not stop loving her either. Instead his heart yearned for her, for her presence, her smiles, her laughs, her touch. It seemed his love for her kept growing even to the point that he loved her more than life itself.

The only consolation he had about his birthday celebration the following day was that he would be able to see her again. Though it would probably only bring him more pain.
Imperial Celebration

The entire Fire Nation, from the western coast to the east and from the north to the south, was abuzz as the day had arrived for the Fire Lord’s birthday. In every remote village, island, and small city, the common people scrambled about with excitement as they set up their own festivities in their Fire Lord’s honor. They were grateful that they had a day off from their labor for the event. All those of nobility were swarming the palace with expensive gifts and greedy smiles, hoping that their single daughters or sisters would catch the lord’s eye. The women themselves preened their looks since the early hours of dawn in order to gain the Fire Lord’s attention for the evening—and hopefully night as well—and perhaps the title as his Fire Lady.

Inside the Fire Lord’s royal bedchamber, Zuko stood completely still in the middle of his room as he waited patiently for Jiao and another old maidservant to finish dressing him in his formal robes. The older servant placed the final layer of his attire and fixed the golden material that curled upward on his shoulders while Jiao reverently nestled his fire crown on the perfect topknot she had created. Jiao then handed him his sheathed dual swords, which Zuko took silently and placed them on his right hip. The servant women took a step back to admire their work and make sure everything was in its respective place before they moved the full-length mirror they had brought in and placed it before him.

“Thank you,” Zuko uttered coolly and dismissed them with a nod as he turned to look himself in the mirror.

Both servants bowed and quickly left the room, closing the door behind them gently.

Zuko took a moment to examine his formal attire before he frowned darkly. He knew he looked good—as arrogant as that might sound—but he really did not care for his appearance for that meant he would have to keep warding off the hordes of noblewoman that he knew were already flooding his home. He really did not want to go out into the banquet and ‘have fun’ as his uncle had kept telling him for weeks, but he was willing to endure the annoying noblemen and the noblewoman with their irritating giggles and not so subtle flirting for his mother, uncle, and his people’s sake. This day was proclaimed a holiday and many villages were hosting their own celebrations.

With one final look in the mirror, Zuko turned and made his way toward the doors of his balcony. He lifted a section of one of the thick curtains and sighed at the sight of the sun already making its way toward the western horizon. It would soon be time for him to make his ‘grand appearance’, as his uncle had gleefully put it, and he was actually dreading the moment.

Though his expression did not show it, Zuko was a bit tired since he had been out all night, running as the Blue Spirit around the edge of his city as he tried to tire himself out enough for him to be able to sleep as he had done for the past months. Unfortunately, it did not work. He had returned undetected into his room a few hours before dawn, dozed off for a while before he got up to get ready for the day.

The reason he had been unable to find sleep was due to another erotic dream he had about Katara that had left him breathless and disappointed when he realized it was just a dream produced by his desires and wants. The things they were doing—gods, the things she was doing to him—felt so real that it left him so painfully aroused when he woke up that he had no choice but to reacquaint himself with his right hand in order to relieve himself while he pictured Katara’s heated face beneath him. Even thinking about that dream was stirring his blood—not to mention certain lower areas—so hot that Zuko had to squeeze his eyes shut and think of something disgusting so that he did not have a repeat of what happened the night before and thus ruin the work Jiao and the other servant had done.

_I wonder when Katara is arriving. Is she already here? What would she be wearing today?_ Zuko mused for a moment before his eyes became hooded for a moment, _Though I would also like to see what’s underneath what she will be wearing..._

He snapped out of his thoughts and berated himself for breaking his promise to stop thinking about Katara in such a sexual way, though it seemed that this promise was regularly broken much more now that he knew he loved her.

Zuko dropped the curtain back into its place, and with a few breaths to regain his control, left his bedroom. He walked glumly across his antechamber and toward the outer double golden doors of his royal suite. He took another deep breath as he stepped outside and nodded silently at his personal guards who then took positions behind him as they made their way from the royal wing toward the banquet hall.

“Zuko! There you are!” his uncle’s cheerful voice made him heave a sigh.

Zuko watched as the old man approached him with a large grin on his face.

“I just came to make sure you didn’t climb out the window and run away!” Iroh exclaimed teasingly.

“Don’t be ridiculous, Uncle,” Zuko answered coolly.

He resisted the urge to roll his eyes at the cheeky smile his uncle directed at him.
Iroh placed a hand on his chin and gave a small hum as he looked his nephew up and down before he gave a nod of approval.

“Why, look at you, Zuko!” Iroh exclaimed. “You will need a stick to keep all the salivating women away from you!”

“Uncle, please,” Zuko groaned as he pinched the bridge of his nose when he heard his guards chuckle quietly under their breaths. A glare from him had them bowing their heads apologetically.

“What?” Iroh said with a shrug. “You know you won’t be left alone for a minute once you enter the banquet hall.” He chuckled when his nephew remained silent before he smiled wickedly. “Though I’m sure there is one particular young lady you would not mind being at your side for the entire celebration.”

“Uncle,” Zuko warned darkly, though the same thought had crossed his mind more than once during the whole week.

Iroh sighed and his expression turned serious as he leveled his gaze up at his glaring young nephew.

“I want you to remember what I told you about finding peace once you have really talked to her, Zuko,” Iroh reminded sternly. When Zuko just gave him a small nod, Iroh shook his head.

“I’ll see you at the banquet later, Nephew,” he added quietly before he turned away and walked in a different direction toward the room where the party was being held.

Zuko silently watched his uncle leave before he nodded at his guards to keep following him down the corridor. The sound of people talking and laughing reached their ears and Zuko ordered himself to keep walking instead of turning back around. He paused outside the large and elaborate set of doors that would lead to the raised dais where he was to make a speech about his gratitude for their attendance while asking Agni to bless the Fire Nation before he was to go and socialize with the crowd.

That thought actually made him shudder.

Both of his guards stepped before him and opened the heavy doors. The room became silent as the people inside stared at the doors that had been opened behind the dais surrounded by another fire
They waited anxiously for the appearance of the one whose birthday they were celebrating.

“Presenting our great and honorable Fire Lord Zuko!” the oldest of his personal guards bellowed.

Zuko took another breath to steady his nerves and told himself he just needed to go through this day, endure whatever came his way, and hopefully they would all leave at the time he requested so he could be left in peace.

Both of his guards bowed as he passed through the doors before he made his way to the edge of the dais. From behind the wall of fire, Zuko looked around at the gathered crowd bowing at him. He spotted Iroh and his mother with Admiral Jee at her side smiling brightly at the front of the gathered crowd, but he frowned when he was unable to spot the one person he had been wishing to see all day.

Where is Katara? Is she not coming? he asked himself and growled mentally at the feeling of a sharp pang of grief.

He was brought back to reality when he heard his uncle cough twice, a signal for him to stop standing there like an idiot and get on with the long and boring speech his uncle had made him memorize.

Zuko sighed inwardly as he raised his arms to the side to gain the crowd’s attention.

Zuko reluctantly greeted another of the noble families that approached him with sugarcoated words and large fake smiles. As soon as he had finished his speech and stepped down the dais after parting the wall of fire, he had been swarmed with enthusiastic people congratulating him and wishing he had many more years left of life. He wondered if they even noticed that he was not enthusiastic about the whole thing at all. He made it apparent by avoiding the hints the noblemen gave him when they would present their single female relatives to him, proclaiming all the good qualities the young women possessed while the girls themselves bowed delicately before him and batted their eyelashes at him with shy or daring smiles.

One set of doors that led into the banquet hall at the southern wall would occasionally be opened as more guests poured in while the guard posted outside would step into the room and announce the new arrivals. Every time Zuko heard it was not who he was waiting to see, his heart would sink at the thought that perhaps she was not attending his celebration.
Zuko tuned out what the old nobleman before him was rambling about and ignored the lusty look the man’s daughter was aiming at him. He discreetly began to look around the banquet hall while making sure to nod here and there so the man and his daughter would think they still had his undivided attention.

The guests seemed to be enjoying themselves rather well. Many were dancing in the center of the large banquet hall as the musicians played and others were talking and laughing amongst themselves while they ate and drank from the banquet table that he had already sampled from. He was impressed by how delicious the food tasted, the tasteful way the room was decorated, and the soft music that reached his ears. Although he appreciated what his uncle and mother did for him, he just could not find it in himself to really enjoy it.

“Thank you. Please enjoy the rest of the evening,” Zuko said as soon as the man made a pause in his drawn out speech.

He raised a dark eyebrow when the nobleman frowned and opened his mouth to say something before the man snapped it shut and dragged his daughter—who was oblivious as she continued to stare at the Fire Lord—away.

“That wasn’t very nice, Sparky.” Toph’s snicker made Zuko relax slightly before he shrugged as he turned around to see her.

The small earthbender was wearing a formal dress that typical Earth Kingdom noblewomen wore. The dress was made of a soft green material with gold thread embroidered at the hem and edges of the long sleeves. It had a high collar and it reached down to her small bare feet. Her dark hair was swept up into an elegant bun with golden flower pins holding it in place. Zuko still found it strange seeing Toph dressed up, but he knew that although she looked like a delicate noblewoman, she was the same blunt and rough master earthbender.

“I want to rip this stupid dress off! It itches, dammit!” Toph growled under her breath as she stretched the high collar away from her neck with a finger.

Ah, there was the Toph they all knew and loved.

Zuko tensed when he saw Aang step up beside Toph with his usual wide grin on his young face. Aang wore a formal type of Air Nomad garb of different shades of orange and yellow with the necklace symbolizing his high rank as a monk falling around his neck. His usual staff was at his hand with Momo, who gave a happy chirp, perched on his shoulder.
“Toph. Aang. I’m glad you decided to come,” Zuko said, recovering his composure quickly.

Momo flew away from the Avatar and landed on the tall Fire Lord’s shoulder. Zuko reached up to pat Momo’s furry head and smiled slightly as the small lemur began to purr.

“Of course we came!” Aang piped in excitedly. “You finally decided to have a birthday party!”

Zuko stared at Aang, and for a moment, he was reminded of the good times they used to have when their friendship was strong and everything was simple. He missed it. But Zuko looked away at the thought that Aang’s current happy mood was probably due to his…engagement. Why did that word always made a lump get stuck in his throat?

“I didn’t hear you guys being announced,” Zuko commented as he pretended to take interest in the crowd while Momo chirped on his shoulder.

“We arrived early even before you gave that boring as hell speech,” Toph responded with a shrug.

“Hm,” Zuko muttered with a frown.

“Happy Birthday, Zuko,” someone said and the three turned at the sound of the new voice.

Aang and Toph grinned and enthusiastically greeted Haru as the young man made his way toward them, his thin mustache sitting upon his smiling lips as he bowed respectfully before the Fire Lord. Haru was dressed in dark green and brown formal attire and his usual long, loose hair was tied in a long braid that fell down his back.

Zuko bowed his head.

“Thank you, Haru,” he responded sincerely. “I’m glad you were able to make it to my celebration.”

Haru nodded and smiled as he placed his hands inside his long sleeves.
“And I’m grateful you trusted me enough to teach earthbending in your colonies. I just finished teaching in the last village a few weeks ago, and luckily, I made it to your party in time,” the young earthbender said as he looked around the decorated room in awe.

“Well…I’m gonna go check if Katara arrived already,” Aang piped in. He glanced briefly at Zuko before he walked away with Momo trailing after him.

Zuko watched him go with a small glare before he shook his head and squared his shoulders. He glanced at Toph who had her head tilted in the direction the young monk had left.

“Uh…well, I’m going to look for Ty Lee,” Haru said quietly as he felt the sudden tension emitting from the tall and slightly intimidating Fire Lord. He blushed lightly when Toph elbowed him and wiggled her eyebrows at him before he bowed again and hastily retreated.

“You were right, Toph,” Zuko commented quietly after a few seconds of silence.

Toph straightened and crossed her arms.

“I always am,” Toph said with a smug grin before she frowned. “But why are you saying that now, Hotman?”

“I was…too late,” Zuko said simply as he tried to keep his voice even.

Toph was silent for a moment before she elbowed him on the ribs. Zuko winced and scowled.

“Don’t give up so easily,” was Toph’s reply before she turned away. “I’m gonna look for your old uncle.”

Before Zuko could asked her what she meant by that, he felt a pair of arms snake around him from behind. For a brief second he thought it was Katara, and his heart skipped a beat, before he noticed that whoever was holding him had thinner and longer arms than the waterbender. Zuko tensed and quickly stepped away, turning around with narrowed eyes to reprimand the person for the imprudent act, but instead his eyes widened in surprise.
“Mai,” he said.

The tall aristocratic woman smiled slightly and Zuko took notice that she was dressed up as well. Though her formal dress was all black with no intricate designs on it, it was made of the finest silks that reached well below her feet and fell down to cover her pale hands. Her long black hair sat atop her head in an elaborate hairdo with two crisscrossing golden sticks keeping the style together. Her pale cheeks had a hint of rouge and dark kohl made her eyes bigger than they were. Zuko had never seen her outside her usual style and he had to admit she looked nice. He felt a bit guilty that he had almost forgotten about her since he had a different woman on his mind recently.

“Hello, Zuko. I’ve missed you,” she finally said. Secretly pleased that it seemed he was appreciating her form, Mai stepped toward him to embrace him again.

Zuko held up a hand to stop her and gave her a stern look to remind her of her behavior in public. Mai took a step back and folded her hands before her and nodded that she understood, though inwardly she was annoyed that he had not changed his idea of keeping her at a distance while he allowed his friends to hug him—especially the insufferable Water Tribe woman.

“Mai, I’m glad you have come to my celebration,” Zuko repeated what he had told everybody else.

“My family and I arrived last night from Omashu. I would not have missed such an important day, Zuko,” she replied back as she looked into his eyes.

Zuko’s lips turned into a hard line and he looked away from her with rising guilt. Why could he not return her feelings? Everything would have been so much simpler. He thanked Agni for saving him from responding when Mai’s family approached them. Zuko glanced briefly at Mai’s face as she moved beside him and he frowned at the almost veiled irritated look she gave her family.

“Happy birthday, Fire Lord Zuko,” Mai’s father said with a smile as both he and his wife bowed to him while the older noblewoman held onto their young son’s hand. The now five-year-old Tom-Tom stared with unblinking eyes up at the tall man.

“Thank you,” Zuko said simply. He braced himself when Mai’s parents gave him calculating and expectant smiles.

Zuko spent the next few hours greeting and talking—or more precisely, half listening—to the people that came up to him while Mai remained fixed at his side. Her parents had tried to suck up to him and even hinted on a future wedding, suggesting that it was long overdue. Zuko had cleverly evaded the subject, though he knew that perhaps one day it would eventually happen since political marriages were common. Besides, it was not as if he was going to be able to marry the woman he really loved and wanted.

Mai smirked inwardly when she caught the conversation of another group of people remarking on how good they looked together and how she would make a fine Fire Lady someday. She raised her head higher than she already normally did and she sent blank stares at the single women who were watching her with pouts on their faces as she held onto Zuko’s arm. She glanced at Zuko who was talking with one of his advisors that had attended the event and she was filled with a smug and satisfied feeling that he was all hers.

A frown marred her stony features for one second before it disappeared as fast as it had appeared. She had to admit, though, that Zuko had been more distant with her as the years went by and it became even more obvious ever since his friends visited the Fire Nation in the late summer. The knowledge of his changed behavior regarding her did not sit well with her at all. She hoped this phase of his would pass soon and she had no doubt that after they married he would focus solely on her.

Zuko suppressed the undignified urge to roll his eyes as he once again caught a comment about his ‘future marriage’ with Mai. He dismissed what the people were saying since he was more preoccupied in keeping an eye for Katara’s arrival. The celebration had started hours ago and there was still no sign of the lovely waterbender and her family. It was getting late and he was beginning to get anxious, wondering where she was.

What if she isn’t coming? he thought with a frown as he once again scanned the crowd.

One part of him felt relieved, but a bigger part felt saddened at the thought. He had been looking forward to seeing her again, and the thought that perhaps she was not arriving had not crossed his mind before now.

Just then, the doors to the banquet hall were opened, and the guard stepped in.

“Presenting Chief Hakoda of the Southern Water Tribe and his family!” he bellowed.

The loud chattering in the grand banquet hall paused for a moment as the people turned to watch the Southern Water Tribe family enter the room before they resumed their talk while they eyed the newcomers with curious or resentful stares.
Zuko spun around to the entrance so fast he thought he actually heard his neck crack, but it was just a vague thought as he stared ahead with relieved and eager eyes—much to Mai’s displeasure.

_She’s here!_ he mentally sighed in relief, apprehension, and longing.

Zuko watched as his uncle and his mother, with Jee following close behind, walked up to them in welcome as Chief Hakoda and Master Pakku stepped forward while Kanna, Ty Lee, Sokka, Suki and their twins crowded around them.

And that’s when he saw her. Katara.

Zuko’s heart leapt and he swallowed hard. She was breathtaking.

Adorning the curves of her body was a long dress that fell down to her small feet enclosed in black slippers. Her dress was made of a silky material of a deep turquoise shade and black lace was wrought onto the edges of the hem and long sleeves. Zuko was astounded, though not displeased, to see that it was cut below her smooth shoulders that he wished to kiss. It was snug around her bounteous breasts that he longed to latch onto with his lips, as well as around her flat stomach that he dreamed of being made round with his child. A thick black sash tied her waist with its long ends falling to one side before the dress fell loosely at her wide hips. Those hips that he had dreamed so many times before of grabbing tightly in his hands while he thrust himself into her…

The young Fire Lord was enthralled by how gorgeous the waterbender looked and he was surprised at himself that he was able to resist the urge to dash up to her, scoop her in his arms, kiss her senseless, and take her passionately in the privacy of his room. Zuko felt his groin tighten and he was barely able to suppress the groan that formed in his throat. He was glad that he was wearing his formal robes or else his whole court would have seen his arousal through his trousers.

He wrenched his eyes away from Katara’s appetizing body so he could take in the rest of her, willing his body to calm down. He was surprised and confused to see that what was adorning her lovely neck was her mother’s necklace and not the one that Aang gave her, but he quickly dismissed the thought as he moved his eyes to observe her face next. She had kohl on her eyelashes and the rims of her eyes so that her bright, blue orbs stood out even more. A soft rouge dusted her cheeks while her perfect lips were glossed, making them even more kissable than ever. Her long and gleaming chocolate tresses were down from her usual braid and it tumbled down her back in soft brown waves and curls. But what pleased him the most was the fact that one side of her hair was swept away from her face by the silver rose hairpin he had given her on her own birthday. He could not explain how great he felt by seeing Katara wearing something from him.
Standing next to the silent firebender, Mai narrowed her eyes, getting tired of Zuko continuing to ogle the waterbender.

“Zuko, I’m thirsty. Let’s go get some punch,” she said as she tried to pull him in the opposite direction where the banquet table was situated.

“You go, Mai. I have to greet my guests,” was Zuko’s distracted reply as he disentangled her arms from his arm and walked away without removing his eyes from the vision before him. He did not notice the glare she threw after him.

“Katara dear! Welcome back! We are so glad that you have come,” Ursa announced to Katara after she had greeted the rest of the group.

Katara smiled as the older woman embraced her.

“Especially Zuko,” Lady Ursa whispered in her ear before she pulled back with a smile.

Katara blushed and fidgeted nervously with her fingers. How would Zuko act toward her now? Would he be distant like the day he left the Southern Water Tribe or would he smile at her warmly like so many times before?

She was so nervous at the thought of seeing him again that her stomach kept twisting and her heart kept pounding frantically in her chest. On one hand she dreaded seeing him again, seeing him act cold towards her, and seeing him with Mai on his arm, but on the other she was impatient to see his scarred yet handsome face, his warm golden eyes, and his small half smiles. She longed to be near him, to talk and spend time with him, and hear his low chuckles or the laughs that he sometimes allowed to escape him.

She looked up when she felt someone staring at her. Her breath caught in her throat as she watched Zuko making his way toward them…and he was looking straight at her, his golden gaze almost scorching her all the way to her toes.

Zuko was wearing a similar style of formal robes as the one he had donned when he had been crowned Fire Lord, except that his scabbard was secured at his side this time. She could see his black boots with their golden pointed tips as his long legs carried him to where she was standing frozen in place with the rest of her family. His sleek, raven hair was pulled back into his usual formal topknot.
with the glinting fire crown. Her fingers itched to remove it so that his hair hung loose in order for her to run her fingers through it like she had daydreamed ever since he came upon them in the Western Air Temple. Katara really liked what he wore just like how she liked when he wore his armor or comfortable shirts and pants.

Though I like it better when he’s shirtless, Katara hummed silently as she stared intensely at every step he took.

She was awestruck at how striking he looked and blushed at her thoughts, though she could not find it in herself to chastise herself since it was true. She was once again unable to break away from the heated look in his amber eyes, the same look she had caught him directing towards her many times before.

Zuko finally crossed the large room and reached them, bowing politely to the Southern Water Tribe Chieftain, a sign for his people to see that he respected and welcomed those from the southern country.

“I welcome you back to the Fire Nation, Chief Hakoda,” he said as he reluctantly looked away from Katara’s mesmerizing form to acknowledge the chieftain.

“Thank you, Fire Lord Zuko,” Hakoda responded with a smile as he returned the bow. “We would have arrived sooner if it wasn’t for a sudden storm that detained us for a while. Anyway, I wish you good things on this day.”

“Thank you,” Zuko replied before he turned to greet the rest of the family.

He smiled slightly when Kanna embraced him and wished him a happy birthday while Pakku just gave a respectful bow and good wishes. Gran-Gran, Iroh, and Ursa noticed happily that Zuko kept glancing at Katara who would also sneak peeks at him.

Zuko then returned his gaze to Katara and turned to her. Katara flushed slightly and took a step forward, mentally telling herself not to trip on her dress and make a fool out of herself in front of Zuko, his family, and his courtiers.

“Happy Birthday, Zuko,” Katara greeted with a tentative smile.
“Thank you, Katara,” Zuko replied with a warm smile that made Katara’s heart melt.

The waterbender hesitated for a moment since she did not know if it was proper to hug the Fire Lord with all the nobility hanging around, but she gave a mental shrug, and before her courage failed, Katara took another step forward and wrapped her arms around him. If Zuko was surprised, he did not show it as he returned her embraced by winding his arms around her. But to his disappointment, she quickly ended it and stepped away with a blush on her cheeks.

Sokka stepped forward with a large grin as he gave Zuko a one-armed hug while he carried his oldest daughter in the other just as Suki did while carrying their youngest.

“Say hello to your Uncle Zuko!” Sokka exclaimed as he held up Jing so she could be in Zuko’s eyelevel.

Zuko was startled at Sokka’s words as he stared at the little girl who was staring back at him with huge, blue eyes. It warmed his heart to know that Sokka saw him as part of his family despite all the hardships their countries had suffered. He glanced at Katara, who had wide eyes focused on him and her brother.

Smiling slightly, Zuko slowly reached out and gave the little girl a soft pat on her dark head. Jing squealed in delight and clapped her small, chubby hands before her attention was quickly drawn to the shiny metal crown on the tall man’s head. The group chuckled quietly as Zuko dodged the slimy fingers that were aimed at his hair.

“Wow, Zuko, you sure know how to throw one heck of party!” Sokka exclaimed as his blue eyes darted excitedly around the bright and lively room.

“Believe me, Sokka, if it was my doing, there would not have been a party at all,” Zuko commented dryly.

He noticed the young tribesman was half-listening to him, so with a mental roll of his eyes, Zuko motioned to the back of the room.

“The banquet table is that way.”

“Thanks, man,” Sokka said with a grin as he led Suki and their twins toward the food table.
“I can’t wait to see Mai again! I’ll see you guys later!” Ty Lee exclaimed as she bounced away after she said over her shoulder, “I hope Haru is here!”

The mention of the noblewoman’s name snapped Katara out of her reverie about Zuko carrying light-skinned, blue-eyed or dark-skinned and golden-eyed babies and back to reality. She quickly looked away as she pretended to scan the room, which she noted was beautifully decorated. It reminded her of a horrible nightmare she had months ago where she had come upon Zuko marrying Mai. She winced at the painful image before she mentally shook her head.

“Are Aang and Toph here already?” she asked.

When Katara mentioned the airbender, Zuko reverted into his distant self and looked away as well to glare at a random spot.

“They’re around somewhere,” he replied coldly.

Except for Ursa, Iroh, and Jee, they all turned to gape at the iciness in the usually stoic young Fire Lord’s voice. Katara frowned deeply and she was afraid that Zuko would start acting aloof towards her again.

“Zuko…?” Katara began, but was interrupted from saying anything else by the appearance of the mentioned young benders.

“Katara! You’re here!” Aang exclaimed gleefully as he made his way towards them with a bright smile lighting up his face.

“Thanks for stating the obvious, Twinkletoes,” Toph remarked snidely as she strolled in her insufferable dress beside him.

Aang ignored her as he briefly greeted Katara’s father and grandparents before he clasped Katara’s hand, both unaware at the death glare Zuko was sending him.

“Come on, Katara! Let’s go dance!” Aang cried out.
“Uh…” Katara uttered as Aang started to drag her away.

She looked back at Zuko, but he was looking somewhere else. A sad frown appeared on her brow before she turned back to Aang and plastered a smile on her face.

“Okay,” she relented.

Zuko watched them go from the corner of his eye. He turned his attention to the others, who had been silent for most of the time, and gave them a slight bow.

“If you’ll excuse me, I have to attend to my other guests. Please enjoy your time here,” he told them politely.

“Yes, thank you, young Fire Lord,” Kanna responded for them as she eyed him curiously after he had turned and left.

Zuko ignored the slight ache in his chest as he made his way among the crowd while his hands clenched and unclenched as he walked.

“Wait up, Sparky!” Toph called out as she followed him. She growled when he continued walking. “I said wait, dammit!”

Zuko spun around and pinned a glare at the irritating earthbender.

“Toph, you’re supposed to call me by me title and not ‘Sparky’ in front of my subjects!” he hissed lowly.

“Oh, right, right. I forgot,” Toph consented and pretended to lock her lips together. “Anyway,” she continued as she once again followed after him when he began to walk away. “Stop being a coward and tell Sugar Queen you love her already,” she said, low enough for only him to hear her.

Zuko paused in mild surprise for a moment at her words before he continued on his way.
“Mind you own business, Toph,” he growled as his hands clenched tightly at his sides.

Toph scowled, but before she could argue back, she shut her mouth as her scowl deepened.

“Gloom and Doom is heading this way,” she said before she whispered rapidly, “You better tell Katara!”

Zuko watched as the small blind girl stomped away just as Mai reached him. He glanced sideways as Mai took hold of his arm again.

“How about we get that punch now?” Mai asked.

Zuko did not say anything as he led her away to the banquet table. Though he tried really hard, he could not stop himself from searching for Katara’s form every chance he got. And although he was discreet about the way he stared at the laughing waterbender, he was unable to fool the young noblewoman that kept at his side.

Though she did not show it outwardly, Mai was seething as she once again caught Zuko glancing in the direction the annoying Water Tribe woman was. Mai snorted inwardly as she watched Katara giggle at something Iroh said while Lady Ursa laughed daintily behind her hand. She noticed Zuko glance their way, and to her surprise, she saw his lips twitch into a smile. Her eyes narrowed dangerously.

Mai was angry, for she had actually listened to her mother for once and allowed the servants to dress her up, place makeup on her face, and arrange her hair in a beautiful style just for Zuko. But it seemed he did not even notice her efforts for he only had eyes for the waterbender—who at times would also glance his way—while he greeted and talked to the people and ignored the infuriating women that were presented to him and tried to flirt with him.

Though she had only had very small suspicions about the relationship between Zuko and the waterbender back when they had visited Ember Island in the summer, now those small suspicions were growing into full-fledged certainty. Mai moved closer to Zuko when she caught Katara looking at them without making it seem too obvious. Well, it was just too bad because she rather die than allow the waterbender have Zuko.

Mai was brought out of her thoughts when a large, old man huffed his way toward them with a large smirk on his face. She knew he was one of the Court advisors, but she could not remember his name, and if she had listened to Zuko on the rare occasions that he wished to talk to her about his day, then she would have known that it was the one advisor that Zuko despised.

“I wish you a happy birthday, Fire Lord Zuko,” Wei greeted exaggeratedly as he pushed aside the nobleman that had currently been talking to the Fire Lord with his wife and two daughters standing beside him.

Wei made a mocking, flourishing bow before he looked over at the silent young woman standing indifferently beside Zuko.

“Lady Mai,” he greeted with a smirk.

Zuko stiffened and his eyes narrowed at the sound of the aggravating, old advisor.

“Advisor Wei,” he responded impassively and reluctantly returned Wei’s bow with a nod of his head since he did not want the family that was still standing there to think he was rude.

Wei straightened and smoothed his robe over his large middle and smirked, but before he could speak an older couple approached the small group.

“We wish a happy birthday, my lord,” the old man with cropped white hair said with a smile as he and the gray-haired woman bowed.

“Thank you, Physician Toshiro,” Zuko responded genuinely as he graced the physician and his wife with a small smile.

The old couple had always been kind to him ever since he became Fire Lord.

“Your celebration is going exceptionally well, Young One,” Wei interrupted rudely, ignoring the small glares the old couple sent him. “Everybody seems to be having a great time.”

“Oh, yes, Fire Lord Zuko!” the rather short nobleman enthused, not wanting to be outdone or ignored. “The celebration is magnificent! So wonderful!”
Zuko mentally sighed as he looked over at the crowd.

“I know,” he said coolly.

He glanced back at Wei and frowned. Why was Wei trying to have a conversation with him? One that did not result in Wei throwing subtle insults at him.

“Are you not enjoying your own party, Young One?” the old advisor asked with the smirk still in place.

Zuko’s frown deepened as the nobleman’s daughters gasped and he glared at the smirking advisor.

“I am,” he answered imperviously.

“Then why have you not danced? There are many beautiful, young ladies that would enjoy being your dance partner,” Wei remarked as he took a sip from the wine cup in his hand.

Wei grinned into his cup when the nobleman’s young daughters squealed and pushed each other aside so they could get the Fire Lord’s attention focused solely on them. Wei ignored the way the physician shook his head and his wife threw a glare at him.

Maybe that is the reason why I don’t want to dance, Zuko thought darkly as he ignored the obvious looks the young women were throwing his way.

“I am not for dancing tonight,” Zuko replied tersely. He resisted the urge to roll his eyes when the women gasped and almost whimpered in disappointment.

“Is that so?” the old advisor said as he twirled the cup while he pretended to scan the crowd without interest before he glanced sideways at Mai. “Or is it that you have just not found a woman worthy enough to get your attention?”

He ignored the three young noblewomen’s glares as he focused on Zuko’s expression. To his satisfaction, he watched as the young Fire Lord’s eyes briefly flicked toward one side of the large room. Wei looked in the same direction with a smirk and took another drink from his cup of wine as he stared over at the table where the Southern Water Tribe family was sitting near the banquet table. Where the beautiful, but rather irritating waterbender the young Fire Lord seemed to care for was laughing.

“Or perhaps you do have such a woman in mind?” Wei taunted with a sneer as he tilted his head toward the table.

Zuko fought to remain unaffected at Wei’s remark, not wanting to give too much to the mistrustful old advisor about his feelings for the waterbender, even though what Wei had indicated was true. Zuko again quickly glanced to where Katara was sitting. If he were to dance in front of this crowd, then he would have wanted it to be with Katara, but it seemed everything was set against him for the noblemen would not leave him alone even for a second. Besides that, Katara kept being asked to dance by different men, though her father, Sokka, and Aang cut the dances short. Especially Aang.

How he wished it were him she was dancing with as he watched her body sway to the sound of the music like one of her smooth water whips while she tossed her gleaming hair about. Oh, the thoughts that would run rampant in his head as he watched her dance to the music!

“Fire Lord Zuko, you must dance with one of my daughters!” the short nobleman exclaimed as he motioned for his daughters to move forward while he ignored the indignant glare Mai was sending them. “They were the best dancers at the Royal Academy for Girls! I’m sure my lord will be pleased to have one of them as his dance partner!”

Zuko eyed the man warily as the man’s wife practically shoved their daughters forward onto him. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw the physician and his wife give him sympathetic looks before he was forced to look back the young women eagerly waiting his response.

I’m positive that he would even say it would please me to have either one, or even both, as my bed partners as long as they get the title as my Fire Lady, he thought with distaste. He cursed Wei for bringing up the subject of dancing even though it was obvious he did not want to dance.

“I thank you for the offer, and I’m sure your daughters are excellent dancers,” Zuko responded dispassionately, “but I’m afraid that—”

“Fire Lord Zuko has already asked me for the next dance,” Mai cut in as she moved closer to him.
Zuko frowned at her, but said nothing to dispute what she had said. He would rather dance with Mai than some woman he did not know. Besides, it was only expected since Mai was technically still his girlfriend and all.

“Is this true, Fire Lord Zuko?” the nobleman’s wife asked as she eyed Mai.

The previous song the musicians were playing finished, and was immediately followed by another piece. Zuko squared his shoulders, pressed his lips into a tight line, and nodded to the woman’s question before he excused himself from the group. Impassively, he led Mai to the dance floor by the arm. He was unaware of the triumphant smirk that crossed Mai’s face as they moved toward the dance floor.

Katara happily chewed on a piece of chocolate covered strawberry pastry as she listened to her friends and family banter. She smiled slightly when Aang took hold of her hand before she pulled it away, missing the sad frown the young monk gave her.

She was currently trying to hide from all the young—and not so young—men that kept trying to dance with her. She would admit that she was a bit flattered at the attention the men were giving her, but it was not them that she wanted to ask her to dance, to hold her hand and hold her close as they glided down the dance floor. No, it was Zuko she wanted to dance with just like at her brother and Suki’s wedding.

With a doleful sigh, Katara popped the rest of the sweet dessert into her mouth. She was a bit surprised that such a simple dessert made its way into all the other exquisite pastries, but she was glad since it was one of her favorites, especially since it reminded her of that time when Zuko took her to that one famous restaurant all those months ago.

“Oh, my gods!” she heard one of the snobby noblewomen shriek, “Fire Lord Zuko is going to dance!”

Katara spun around on her seat to stare out onto the dance floor and her heart sank at the sight. She watched as Zuko regally made his way to the dance floor while Mai held onto his arm with her head held high. Katara’s stomach twisted as Zuko brought Mai to stand in front of him before he took the aristocratic woman’s hand in his while he brought his other hand to her back before he began to lead her into a dance as the music played. It hurt to watch them, to watch Zuko hold another woman, but Katara could not look away.

Zuko led Mai into one of the dance steps he had learned when he was a young prince. Though this particular dance was supposed to be soft and relaxing, Zuko moved stiffly as he held Mai, who was smiling at him in barely concealed glee. Zuko glanced away from her and began to scan the crowd until he spotted Katara staring at them with an unreadable expression on her face before she looked away and began to talk to her grandmother. Did she not care?

Ty Lee bounced onto the dance floor, holding onto a blushing Haru, and with a bright smile, she wrapped her arms around his neck while he wrapped his around her waist as they began to dance with the music. More couples stepped onto the dance floor while the young women without dancing partners seethed quietly at the edge.

Zuko watched as Admiral Jee bowed before his mother, who smiled and nodded as she allowed him to lead her to dance. His uncle moved along the dancing crowd with a blushing woman at his side. Iroh caught his eye and grinned, which Zuko responded with a roll of his eyes. The old man’s face became serious and he gestured at something behind him. Zuko slowly moved Mai around to see what his uncle was looking at and he scowled. He watched as Aang and Katara made their way toward the dance floor as well before they faced each other. He looked away when Aang placed his arms around Katara since it reminded him of what he saw in the Southern Water Tribe and how much the sight had pained him.

Katara again stiffened slightly as Aang held her before they began to dance. She smiled a bit uncomfortably when Aang smiled lovingly at her as he spun her around. Looking away, Katara peeked toward Zuko and raised an eyebrow since he was staring blankly at a spot over Mai’s head even though she was as tall as him.

Katara let her mind wander into much more pleasing thoughts. She imagined that it was Zuko she was dancing with at the moment and it was his warm and strong arms that were holding her and not Aang’s lean ones. She was unaware of how long the song lasted or that it was Aang she was dancing with until the musicians stopped playing. Blinking, she turned to see where Zuko was. She watched as Zuko moved away from Mai and quickly left the dance floor with the noblewoman following quickly behind him.

“Katara? Are you okay?” Aang’s voice made her jump.

“Uh…I don’t know,” was her soft response as her eyes followed Zuko’s tall form.

The evening progressed as the guests continued to enjoy themselves—and continued to try to gain the Fire Lord’s favor.

Katara let out a long, relieved breath as she took a seat at their table. Her feet were killing her from all the dancing that she had been subjected to because of Aang. He would not hear it when she protested that she was done dancing and would then tell her that it was to make up for the time he had been away in the Earth Kingdom. Luckily, Sokka, Toph, Haru, and a few young men had dragged him off to get some drinks even though he tried to protest that it was not proper for a monk as himself to partake in such things. Toph ignored his complaints as she grabbed the back of his robe and hauled him away, but not before giving Katara a wink and whispering to her that she deserved a break.

Katara fidgeted with a lock of her hair as she again looked for Zuko’s regal form among the large crowd. She sighed when she caught sight of him, though she hated that Mai was still hanging onto Zuko while he exchanged words with the families that came up to him. Katara did not like the look Mai would throw at every woman—especially at her—almost as if she was arrogantly telling them all she was Zuko’s girlfriend and for them to keep away.

As if she could keep me way from Zuko, Katara huffed as she narrowed her blue eyes at the pale noblewoman before she looked back at Zuko and sighed. That’s if Zuko still wants me around.

After he had greeted them when they had arrived a few hours ago, Zuko had not spoken to her or come near her at all during the celebration. Again, she wondered if he was avoiding her and if that avoidance had something to do with the way he had strangely acted when he left the Southern Water Tribe. She wished she knew what was going on with him so she could find some way to make things go back the way they used to be before. But then that was not what she really wanted. No. She wanted things to change, she wanted their relationship to go beyond friendship, she wanted to stay by his side, she wanted him to love her as she loved him.

She looked away when Mai leaned over to whisper in Zuko’s ear, missing the frown that appeared on Zuko’s face at what Mai had said before he gave her a disapproving look that made Mai look away with a raised chin.

A tug at her long sleeve startled Katara and she jumped in her seat before she looked to her side only to find a small boy with dark hair and big eyes staring up at her silently while he continued to hold onto her sleeve.

“Hi,” Katara greeted with a smile as she looked up to see if the boy’s parents were around, but found that no one was even looking their way. She looked back down at the boy and patted his dark head. “Where are your parents?”

“I don’t know,” the boy answered with a small shrug. “I lost them somewhere.”

“You lost them?” Katara asked with a small grin as the boy blushed while he shuffled one foot on the “Well…I got away from them because they were just talking to some old people and I got bored,” the young boy admitted. “But now I can’t find them or my sister and I’m tired and I wanna go home!”

Katara smiled and patted the seat next to her.

“Well don’t we wait for your parents or you sister to find you here? My family and friends are all having fun and I was getting somewhat lonely. Do you want to keep me company?”

“Okay!” the boy exclaimed as he let go of her sleeve and scrambled onto the empty chair with a large smile. “What’s your name?” he asked curiously as he tugged at the stuffy clothing he had been made to wear.

“Katara. What’s yours?”

“Tom-Tom,” the boy answered.

“Oh, that’s nice…Wait. Tom-Tom?” Katara asked slowly as she took a closer look at the boy who was also staring at her with a questioning expression. “Do you happened to be related to Ma…er…Lady Mai?”

“Yeah,” the boy huffed as he crossed his small arms over his small chest. “She’s my older sister.”

“Oh.”

Katara gaped slightly. Even though the dark-haired boy did have a resemblance to Mai it seemed they had completely different personalities. Katara leaned back onto her chair as she studied the boy who was now laughing at some of the clumsier dancers and she smiled since she could remember the baby she had taken care of back in Omashu almost four years ago.

Her smile widened when her family approached the table, looking at the boy sitting next to her with raised eyebrows as they took their seats before they continued in their conversations. Hakoda and Pakku were each carrying a sleeping twin in their arms while Suki and Sokka slumped in their seats in fatigue. Katara grinned at them before she returned her attention to the five-year-old boy.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Sighing intolerantly in his head once again, Zuko tuned out what the heavily perfumed young women that had surrounded him were babbling about and ignored the way Mai was sending them death glares while she opened and closed the dark fan she had pulled out from the sash around her thin waist. After a moment, the women moved away when they realized he was not paying them any attention. He did not even notice them leave nor did he notice Mai glaring at him. He focused instead on the time when the celebration would end and everybody would leave him in peace while he retired to his royal quarters.

Too bad I can’t have a bit more entertainment in my private room with a certain waterbender, Zuko mused with a silent groan. Now that would make my birthday much better.

“This!" Ty Lee’s bubbly voice made them turned to see the young acrobat in her pink attire making her way toward them while she tugged a weary-looking Haru after her. “Let’s go get some punch and hang out for a while!”

Mai glanced back at Zuko who was already talking to Haru, and with an upturned nose, she followed her over energized friend. She had to find a way to make Zuko more agreeable with her.

“There ya are, L-Lord Jerkbender!”

Zuko paused in mid-sentence as he felt someone pat him almost roughly on the back and he saw Haru gaped. With a sharp remark on his tongue, Zuko turned around with a raised eyebrow only to sigh when he realized it was Sokka, and by the red color on his tanned cheeks and the small sway of his legs, he was most likely drunk or getting there.

Sokka wound an arm around Zuko’s shoulders and patted his cheek.

“Great p-party! The food’s awesome and…and the wine! Oh, Spirits, the wine!” Sokka exclaimed while Zuko tried to pry him off without causing too much of a scene.

Sokka trailed off as his eyes became unfocused before he shook his head and slurred out some more words that neither Zuko nor Haru could understand before the young warrior took another swig of his cup of wine.
“I think that’s enough wine for today, Sokka,” Zuko admonished with a grimace as he wrenched the wine cup out of Sokka’s hands and handed it to a wide-eyed Haru who quickly took it.

“Ah, b-but I’m not ev…even drunk yet!” Sokka whined as he flailed one arm into the air while he continued to hold onto Zuko’s shoulder.

A hiccup interrupted him and he staggered. Sokka grinned sheepishly.

“Okay, maybe I’m a little drunk.”

“A little?” Haru muttered.

“Maybe you should get Suki,” Zuko whispered to the amused earthbender who nodded and quickly made his way to find the drunken warrior’s wife.

“H-heeey, w-where’s Haru-u go-ing?” Sokka hiccupped again.

“I see our dear friend enjoyed our wine immensely,” Iroh’s amused chuckle reached their ears.

“Iroh!” Sokka exclaimed as he moved away from Zuko and stumbled onto the shorter man. “Zu-u-ko took away my…my wine!” he cried out with a pout.

Zuko rolled his eyes as Iroh laughed and patted the poor desolate drunk’s back.

“There, there, Sokka. I’m sure Zuko did it for your own good,” he said before he grinned over at his nephew who just tiredly shook his head at them.

Iroh cleared his throat and his expression became serious.

“It seems Tom-Tom got lost. His parents are worried.”
Zuko sighed and looked around for one of his guards so he could give them orders to search for the young boy, but Sokka grabbed his shoulder and laughed.

“Oh, n-no! Quick! Before they think we kid-napped h-him again!” Sokka guffawed between hiccups.

“What are you talking about, Sokka?” Zuko asked as he steadied his friend when he swayed backwards.

“The uh…kid’s with…with Katara!” the young man explained drunkenly.

“Really?” Zuko asked quietly.

He turned toward the table he knew the Southern Water Tribe family had taken. He immediately spotted Katara, and to his surprise, Tom-Tom was indeed with her and they were both laughing.

“Yup. You know what he said? He…he told Katara that he l-likes her ‘cause she…she’s nice and pretty.” Sokka chuckled. “Seems like he keeps…finding a way…to…to her,” he slurred.

Zuko looked back at his uncle and raised a dark eyebrow which the old man responded to with his own raised brow. Before either could ask Sokka to explain—at least the best he could in his inebriated state—the warrior continued without any prompting and told them about how they accidentally came across baby Tom-Tom and were accused of kidnapping him in order to use him against the governor in exchange for King Bumi’s release, which he admitted they took advantage of.

“But the p-plan didn’t work ‘cause…Azula…your crazy sister, you know,” Sokka said and patted Zuko’s arm sympathetically. “She told…she told…damn…what’s her name?” He cursed as he snapped his fingers. “The tall, scary-looking dagger-thrower?”

“Mai?” Iroh offered with a grin and shrugged when Zuko frowned at him.

“Yeah! Her!” Sokka exclaimed with a nod. “Az-zula told her King Bumi was more…im-important a trade than a mere baby so…what’s her name again? Oh, yeah, Mai! She called off…the deal and…and attacked us!” He finished by telling them how Aang returned the baby without anybody finding out.
Zuko looked at his uncle in shock. He knew Mai was not a person to show much affection and care, but he could not believe that she would do such a thing to her own brother, to an innocent child!

“Katara took care of him while he stayed with us,” Sokka continued to explain, this time a bit more seriously as he looked at his sister with an affection smile. “Though the group we were staying with told us to get rid of the baby, Katara refused to leave him to fend for himself just because he was Fire Nation.”

The three men were silent for a moment before they saw Suki quickly making her way to them with a deep scowl on her face.

“Oh, shit!” Sokka cursed as he tried to move away. “Suki’s gonna kill me for drinking too much!”

Zuko smirked and Iroh chuckled quietly as Suki grabbed Sokka by the back of his shirt as he tried to escape and dragged him outside the banquet hall after sending them a quick apology.

Sobering up, Zuko scanned the partying crowd to look for Mai. He spotted her talking to Ty Lee and he frowned deeply before he looked away and his eyes focused on Katara’s form. His expression softened as he watched her tilt her head back and laughed softly at something Tom-Tom said. He was amazed that Katara took care of a child from the enemy side, but then again perhaps he was not that surprised since Katara helped anyone who needed it despite who they were. Just like when she was willing to heal his scar even though she still saw him as the enemy.

“Katara will make a wonderful mother someday, don’t you agree, Nephew?” Iroh spoke up as he watched Zuko watching Katara.

“Yes, she will, Uncle,” Zuko agreed instantly.

Iroh smiled and lightly nudged his nephew’s arm with his elbow, tilting his head in the waterbender’s direction when Zuko looked down at him.

“Don’t just stand there! Make a move already!” Iroh enthused. “Seriously, what is wrong with you young people?”
“I don’t know, Uncle,” he began slowly and sighed. “I feel a bit guilty…for both Mai and Aang. Mai loves me and Aang loves…Katara. I just…don’t know what to do.”

“You want my advice?” Iroh asked quietly. When Zuko nodded, he placed his hands inside his sleeves. “Break up with Mai.”

“W-what?” Zuko stuttered at his uncle’s blunt response.

Iroh turned a serious eye toward his nephew.

“Tell me, Zuko, are you going anywhere in your relationship with Mai? Do you see her as your future wife? Do you even want her as your wife? Or is Katara the woman you wish to marry and have at your side for the rest of your life?”

Zuko opened his mouth to respond and snapped it closed a second later since he knew he did not need to give his uncle an answer. They both knew what it would be. They remained silent for a few moments as they glanced back at the table where the blue-eyed young woman was sitting. They watched as Mai’s parents stomped up to the table to demand their son’s return, and to their amusement, they saw Tom-Tom latch onto Katara and begin to scream that he did not want to go back to listening to their boring talks. It was a while later that Katara was able to convince the young boy to go back with his parents, which he did reluctantly.

Iroh gave his nephew a slight push, and if Zuko had not been training for all of his life, he would have stumbled onto the floor and made a fool of himself in front of his subjects. Zuko turned to his uncle and glared at him, but the retired general just gave him a cheeky grin.

“Hurry up and make a move on Miss Katara already,” Iroh insisted as his grin grew even larger. “I do want many grandnephews and nieces before I die, you know.”

Zuko’s face flushed and he quickly turned away when his uncle began to chuckle loudly at his reaction. Squaring his shoulders and smoothing his impeccable formal robes, Zuko determinedly made his way to Katara, his eyes never leaving her enticing form.

Kanna spotted the young Fire Lord making his way to them and she smiled broadly at her
“I hope you are all having a great time,” Zuko said as soon as he came upon the table and smiled at the group before he looked down at Katara.

Katara jumped at the sound of his voice and blushed while the rest of her family enthusiastically answered the young Fire Lord. She caught her grandmother’s eye again and her blush deepened when Kanna winked at her.

“Katara?” Zuko asked softly.

“Yes?” she answered as she ordered herself to look at him. Her heart stuttered when he smiled down at her.

“Would you honor me with this dance?” Zuko asked as he reached out his right hand toward her.

Katara forgot how to breathe for a second as she stared in shock at Zuko’s outstretched hand. He was asking her to dance! Just like she had been hoping all night since she arrived in the Fire Nation!

“I would love to,” Katara accepted with a pleased smile that made Zuko’s breath hitch.

Katara placed her hand on Zuko’s larger one with a deep, red blush on her cheeks as he pulled her up from the seat. They looked at each other with wide eyes as their hands touched. It was as if their hands knew each other. There was no way to explain the emotions that such a simple touch evoked.

They both tensed when they heard Kanna clear her throat while Hakoda eyed them with a frown on his face. Zuko gave them a small bow before he entwined Katara’s arm around his and led her away toward the dance floor while her blush deepened. The loud chatter that had been resonating throughout the room died down to a low murmur as the nobility stared at them making their way arm in arm. Everybody was astounded and the young women were livid for the Fire Lord had refused to dance with anybody else much less asked another woman to dance, and here he was, leading a Water Tribe woman to the dance floor.

Zuko ignored the whispers that reached them since he was already used to it and Katara tried not to let the whispers and dark looks she was receiving ruin her chance to dance with Zuko. The crowd parted for them as they passed and soon they stood in the middle of the dance floor. Zuko brought her before him and they both stood nervously in front of the other as they waited for the musicians to pick up another song. Would this be the right time to confess their feelings for each other?

Once the song began to be played in soft melodies, Zuko took hold of one of Katara’s hands while she lightly placed the other on his shoulder as their eyes locked. He brought his other hand to her lower back and moved her closer to him, causing her to blush and let out a small gasp, almost making him groan aloud. Arms about each other, their bodies pressed together, the young Fire Lord and the waterbender moved and began to gracefully sail across the marble floor with the soft music guiding them.

They remained silent for a moment, both caught up in their thoughts, insecurities, and longings, but basking in the moment they had in each other’s arms.

Zuko admired the way Katara’s long, brown hair swirled around her, how her blue eyes sparkled in the warm light, and he felt his heart constrict in his chest. He cleared his throat as he tried to get rid of the lump that seemed to have gotten stuck there.

“Katara…you look very beautiful,” he whispered sincerely.

Katara was sure the blush on her face would not go away anytime soon as she briefly glanced away.

Zuko briefly closed his eyes. Why did it feel so good when it was Katara who said that?

“Zuko? Can I ask you something?” Katara asked slightly hesitantly as they spun around.

“Of course. What is it?” Zuko said as he looked at her worriedly when she looked away.

Please, let it not be about her engagement to Aang, he prayed in his head. I wouldn’t be able to take it!

“Why did you leave the Southern Water Tribe so suddenly?”
Zuko let out a mental sigh of relief and relaxed.

“There were…some things I needed to take care of,” he replied vaguely.

“Oh,” she muttered. “I thought there was something wrong. You acted so weird…so distant and cold. Were you…angry with me?”

“Angry with you?” Zuko asked incredulously as he tried to think back to the way he had behaved and was ashamed to realize that he had acted a bit indifferent toward her.

“I wasn’t angry with you, Katara,” Zuko told her.

Disappointed and hurt, yes, but not angry, he thought mentally.

“I’m sorry for acting like that. I just…had so many things on my mind,” he apologized as he continued to lead her in the dance while trying to forget the pain he had felt that night. “Forgive me?”

Katara pretended to think it over.

“I don’t know. Maybe we need to go on another secret mission so I could find it in myself to forgive your rude behavior,” she teased before she gave out a mocking sigh, “But since it is your birthday and all, I’ll forgive you.”

She grinned at him and he chuckled softly. Those that had been watching them closely were shocked to see their usually expressionless Fire Lord smile so broadly and they began to whisper amongst themselves, wondering what Lady Katara really meant to their young lord.

“How do you like the banquet food?” Zuko asked Katara with a small smirk, oblivious to the looks being thrown their way.

“La, the food is delicious! Especially the chocolate strawberry pastries!” Katara exclaimed enthusiastically.
Zuko smiled down at her as his hold on her hand tightened.

“I had a feeling you would say that, so that’s why it was the only request I had for my mother to serve for dessert,” he told her quietly.

“What do you mean?” Katara asked as she slightly tilted her head to one side with a confused expression that Zuko found quite endearing.

“You really liked that dessert when I took you out to eat at that restaurant in the middle of summer,” Zuko replied with another smirk.

Katara gasped.

“You remembered!” she exclaimed as she smiled up at him.

“Of course I remember,” Zuko said as he returned her smile, “It was one of the most enjoyable days I spent with you.”

Katara blushed at his words and she glanced away shyly.

“It was one of mine, too,” she confessed softly.

Zuko’s small smile broadened. He twirled her around and then pulled her closer to him before they resumed their dance. He was pleased that she did not protest his actions.

Kanna grinned into her cup of wine while her son and her husband looked at the dancing couple with confused frowns on their faces. Standing along the wall of the room with a slightly drunk Ty Lee, Mai gripped her fan so tightly it almost broke from the pressure as she watched the Water Tribe wench dance with her boyfriend with a sweet smile on her face.

Aang gaped at them with large eyes from the table he was sitting at with Toph, Haru, and a few other people. Toph smirked at the whispers that reached her ears and the vibrations that Katara and Zuko were sending as they danced. She quickly grabbed the collar of Aang’s tunic as he tried to make his way over to them.

“Sit your butt back down, Twinkletoes!” she ordered.

Aang glowered at her, but he remained on his seat while he crossed his arms over his chest.

Zuko and Katara were unaware of what was happening around them as they continued with the slow dance. Since Katara was smaller than Mai, Zuko had no trouble as he lifted Katara up with a small grin and twirled her around, her long hair and dress swirling around them. Katara giggled happily and smiled brightly once he settled her back down on her feet and he returned the smile with a small smirk, both unaware that the song had ended and the musicians were playing another one.

With a blush, Katara laid her head on Zuko’s chest and smiled when he did not move her away. She sighed happily and closed her eyes as his spicy sandalwood scent reached her nose.

Let me be happy at least for this night, she thought as she pressed her face closer to his strong chest where she could feel his heartbeat.

Zuko felt warmth spread through his body at her action, and without thinking it twice, he rested his chin on her head, inhaling her sweet gardenia scent with a soft sigh. How many times had he wished to hold Katara like this? To have her in his arms? Katara had her head on his chest and he knew his heart was beating like crazy, but if she noticed, she did not say anything.

He moved his head, but pulled back slightly when something cold touched his skin. He glanced down and smiled when he saw it was the rose hairpin. He admired the red and blue gems and raised a hand to touch them with his fingers.

“It pleases me to see you wearing the hairpin I gave you for your birthday,” Zuko whispered softly.

Katara shivered as his warm breath caressed her ear before she looked up at him with a smile.

“I thought this day was a good time to wear it so you could see how much I appreciate and love it.”
How much I love you, she added mentally.

Zuko smiled at her, thinking that perhaps now was the time to follow his uncle’s wise words and confess his feelings for her, but a tap on his shoulder interrupted him before he could speak and he growled under his breath. They stopped dancing and slightly pulled away from each other as if they finally remembered where they were. They turned to see Aang glaring at them, his cheeks red with anger. Katara immediately dropped her arms from around Zuko and looked down at her feet with a blush. Zuko composed himself into his usual impassive mask, but narrowed his eyes at Aang for interrupting them. Again.

“I was wondering if I can have the chance to dance with my girlfriend now,” Aang said with a fake cheerfulness in his voice.

Zuko really much wanted to tell the young airbender no and tell him to leave them alone to dance in peace, but before he could say anything Katara stepped around him and grabbed Aang’s shaking hand.

“Aang, are you okay? Let’s go sit,” Katara said gently since she could see that Aang was upset. She was afraid that he might to do something drastic. She looked back at Zuko apologetically.

“Thank you for the dance, Zuko,” she said before she added softly, “I really enjoyed it.”

“I did, too,” he responded as he looked at her, resisting the urge to pull her back and plead with her to stay with him.

Katara smiled before she led Aang away while Zuko looked after her with a small frown on his face. He glowered when Wei made his way toward him with a large smirk on his lips.

“Lady Katara is quite a beautiful young woman,” Wei remarked with his smirk still in place.

Zuko did not respond as he took one last glance to where Katara had gone before he turned around and walked away.

The hours were long into the night, the celebration was coming to a close, the musicians were playing the last songs, and the guests were leaving to their homes—some with excitement still on their faces, while others sported disappointed looks on theirs since it seemed the young lord had disappeared and thus they were unable to win him over.

Katara slipped away from the banquet hall and slowly made her way toward the silence of the private garden. She was tired. Tired of dancing with a way too cheery Aang, tired of seeing Iroh, Ursa and her Gran-Gran shooting grins at her, tired of seeing Zuko with Mai surrounded by a bunch of moon-eyed girls, but most of all, tired of feeling so sad and alone.

Now all she wanted at the moment was to find some peace and quiet in the Royal Palace Garden with its fresh-scented trees and beautiful flowers. She had really come to love the garden and its cute little turtle-ducks and had missed it when she had left the Fire Nation.

“Katara, wait up!” Aang’s jovial voice broke through her thoughts.

Katara groaned, but plastered a smile on her face as she waited for the young monk to catch up to her. Her fake smile disappeared, however, when she noticed that there was something strange with Aang since his cheeks were flushed and his steps were a bit wobbly.

“Where you going?” he asked a bit too cheerfully as he come up to her side and wrapped an arm around her shoulders.

Katara leaned away from him as the smell of alcohol assaulted her nose and she frowned at him, but he did not seem to notice since he was busy smiling broadly at her. Maybe she should not have allowed Toph to take the young monk to get some drinks. Gods knew how tolerable Toph’s blood was with alcoholic liquids, but Aang shied away from even taking a sip of wine.

Aang frowned at her before he started to chuckle.

“Nope. I’m just a little bit…how did Toph say it? Oh, yeah! Buzzed!” he said and laughed again. “I’m a bit dizzy, though.” He paused for a moment before he smiled at her again. “So were you going to the garden?” he asked as he squinted at the end of the bright corridor.

With a sigh, Katara nodded, but before she could say anything else, Aang grabbed her hand and began to lead her a bit unstably toward the large garden.
“I’ll go with you!” he exclaimed happily.

“Thanks, but—”

“I need some fresh air anyway,” Aang interrupted a bit more seriously than before.

Katara took a look at the green tint on the airbender’s face and sighed as she let Aang lead her outside in a hurried pace.

Zuko took a deep breath of fresh air as soon as he stepped into his private garden and leaned his tired back against the cool surface of the wall behind him. The banquet hall was getting too stifling and crowded and he needed some air and space from Mai and the people that seemed to have made it their goal for the day to suffocate him and bore him to the point he wished he could cut off his ears—or much preferably their tongues. He looked across the semi-illuminated garden with a fond smile, but did not venture further than the palace wall.

However, the main reason he escaped to his private garden was because of Katara. After their dance he was unable to stop staring at her, could not stop from admiring the way her hair would swirl around her as she danced, or stop from loving the way her cheeks flushed from dancing, and he was afraid that everybody would notice and would start to question his behavior. He could not stop remembering the way her small body had felt in his arms, how it was pressed close to his, how her sweet scent had washed over his senses.

Zuko shook his head as he felt his heart begin to throb in his chest as well as another part of him below his waist. He needed to leave the banquet hall for a moment because he did not know if he could control himself whenever he looked at Katara. He did not know if he could stop himself from going up to her, tilting her head back, planting a searing kiss to her lush lips, and carrying her to his room without caring what anybody else thought.

He ran a hand down his face, but froze when he heard voices coming from the hall. Zuko hoped for their sake it was not some nobleman and his annoying daughters. Deciding it was best that he did not let himself be seen, he hid behind the dark shadows of one of the pillars that stood beside the garden entrance and remained still.

He watched as two figures emerged from the palace and he tensed. His temper flared as he saw that it was Katara and Aang hand in hand and he quickly looked around to see if he could find some sort of escape. He did not want to stay around and see them get all…cuddly. He grimaced.
Katara watched as Aang shook his head and took a few gulps of fresh air. The green tint on his skin began to fade, but his cheeks were still flushed.

“Do you feel better now?” she asked as she patted his back.

“Yeah,” Aang responded as he took one more deep breath before he looked over at her and smiled.

Katara returned his smile, but was unprepared when Aang’s arms shot out and wrapped around her. He buried his face in her neck and the smell of liquor on his breath made her dizzy. She stiffened immediately, which only caused him to tighten his hold.

Zuko tensed when Aang pulled Katara to him in a tight hug. He pressed his lips tightly together to keep from growling, but frowned when Katara started to push Aang away with a scowl on her face.

“Aang, let go!” she demanded as she placed her hands on his chest to get him to back off, but he did not budge like she thought he would, instead he shook his head and tightened his embrace.

She realized it was the alcohol that was making him act this way and she sighed.

“You’re drunk. Maybe you should go lie down and sleep it off—”

Instead of answering her, Aang slightly pulled his head back before he sloppily kissed her.

Zuko gaped at them before he angrily glared at Aang. It surprised him, however, when Katara snapped her head away and roughly pushed Aang away from her with an angry expression on her face before she brought the back of her hand to vigorously wipe at her mouth.

“What the hell Aang!” she yelled irately as she gingerly touched her lips. “Why did you do that?”

“Because I wanted to!” Aang yelled back at her and flailed his arms in the air.
Katara stared at him in shock. She was expecting him to start apologizing like he always did when his actions went a bit too far, not for him to get angry and argue. She knew it was the alcohol that he consumed that was taking his inhibitions away and was making him be bolder.

“All you ever let me do is hug and kiss you!” Aang exclaimed angrily. “But I want more!”

“What?” Katara asked incredulously and Zuko narrowed his eyes from the shadows of the pillar.

“You know what I mean! I want us to go beyond hugs and kisses!” the airbender growled out as he ran a hand over his bald head.

“Well, I don’t—”

“I mean, Sokka has Suki and Zuko has Mai!” Aang interrupted. “You know they do those kind of things, so why can’t we?”

What the hell! Zuko growled in his head as he glared heatedly at Aang. Why does he have to bring Mai and me up?

Katara looked away from glaring daggers at Aang at the reminder of what Mai had said back in the flagship about…her and Zuko. She felt her heart ache at that thought and what Aang had said, but she pushed it to the back of her mind as she raised an eyebrow at Aang.

“How do you even know Zuko and Mai…do those kinds of things?” Katara asked.

Aang gave a careless shrug.

“Ty Lee got drunk and she told me that…” he trailed off with a blush and shuffled his foot, “Mai wasn’t…getting any from Zuko anymore so that’s why she was in such a…uh…bitchy mood.”

Zuko gaped at the young monk before he clenched his jaw at the thought that what happened in his private life was being shared around. He glanced at Katara, afraid of what she must think of him now that she knew about what Mai and he had done. He saw his chances for Katara to return his feelings begin to diminish in front of his eyes.
Katara looked away again as her stomach gave a painful twist at the truth before she turned away from Aang and looked across the garden.

“W-whatever Mai and…Zuko do is none of my business,” Katara said quietly. “You know my culture’s view of such things. Besides, I won’t do something that I will later regret just because everybody else is doing them!”

“But Katara I don’t want to be with you like that just because everybody else is doing it!” Aang exclaimed in exasperation as he grasped her shoulder and turned her around so she could see him. “I just want our relationship to go to the next level! I love you!”

Zuko resisted the urge to cover his ears. He did not want to be there at the moment, he did not want to see them anymore, and he did not want to hear what Katara’s response would be. He squeezed his eyes shut at the turmoil that began to fester inside him.

Before Katara could say anything, Aang forcefully slammed his lips to hers. Katara’s eyes widened and she grimaced at the foul taste of alcohol on his breath and mouth. She felt her temper surface when Aang tried to pry her mouth opened with his tongue.

Zuko stared at them wide-eyed and clenched his hands so tightly that his blunt nails almost broke the pale skin on his palms. He felt as if his heart was being wrenched from his chest and he flinched at the pain the scene of the woman he loved being kissed by another man caused him. He clenched his jaw. They were engaged, so it would only be natural for them to be more intimately close, though the thought still angered him beyond reason. He should not have listened to his uncle. He should not have raised his hopes up about there being a misunderstanding back in the Southern Water Tribe because it seemed that what he had seen back then was what it was…Katara had accepted to marry Aang.

Before he could find a way to escape, Zuko noticed that Katara began to struggle viciously in Aang’s hold, pushing at his chest with her small hands and trying to pull her head away. He realized that Katara did not want the young monk’s affections and he became enraged that Aang ignored her wish for him to release her. Zuko took a step to intervene, but froze when Katara freed one of her hands and slapped Aang across the face.

Aang immediately backed away in shock. When he looked at Katara’s hurt and angry face, he came back to reality. He was so shocked at what he did. Guilt and shame quickly began to eat his insides at what he tried to do to her. He was supposed to bring her back to him not scare her away and make her hate him.
He touched his stinging cheek where she had slapped him and he looked at her with horror in his eyes as he tried to apologize.

“Katara…I…I didn’t mean…I’m…”

“Just leave me alone!” Katara screamed at him as she spun around and fled deeper into the dark garden.

Zuko watched her go, her hair and dress whipping behind her as she fled, before he looked back at Aang and glared at him heatedly. He sighed quietly and shook his head when tears began to form in Aang’s large gray eyes while his shoulders slumped.

“I’m so sorry,” Aang whispered into the quiet night, but Zuko was the only one to hear his apology before the young boy turned around and went back inside the palace since he knew Katara would not want to see him at the moment.

Zuko watched Aang leave before he returned his gaze toward the garden where the young woman had run to. He hesitated for a moment as he stepped away from the shadows and approached the grassy edge of the garden. He wondered if he should leave since he wasn’t even supposed to hear their conversation in the first place, but he decided to go look for Katara since it was getting very late and the night was chilly. Even though he himself was hurting a bit, he loved Katara and he would be damned if he was not there for her.

Zuko stepped onto one of the stone paths that wound around the Royal Palace Garden and quickly made his way among the many flowers and trees that he had not seen for months. He sighed quietly when he immediately spotted the young Water Tribe woman staring at the pond, sitting at their spot beneath the cherry blossom tree that was now in full bloom. Their spot. It sounded right.

For a few minutes, Zuko remained standing a few paces away and watched her staring at the serene pond with her arms wrapped around her knees that she had brought to her chest while her beautiful hair gleamed under the soft light of the crescent moon and the few lanterns that were lit around the garden wall. With another small sigh, Zuko straightened himself and approached her.

“Katara? Is something wrong?” he asked softly once he neared her. He decided not to say anything about what had happened.
Katara jumped slightly at the sound of his voice. She turned her face away when Zuko slightly adjusted his formal robes and sat next to her, and she quickly wiped her eyes with the back of her hand. How long had Zuko been in the garden? Did he see what happened between her and Aang?

“I’m fine,” she replied, her tone emotionless.

She gasped softly when she felt Zuko’s fingers touch her chin before he lifted her face to his as he frowned down at her.

“No you’re not,” Zuko reprimanded gently as he touched her wet cheek with his other hand. “You were crying.”

Katara tried very hard to brush his concern aside and tell him there was nothing wrong, but his gentleness and his warm presence was too much for her that tears began to flow freely from her eyes. A soft sob escaped her lips before she lunged herself at him and buried her face on his chest.

Zuko instantly wrapped his arms around the crying woman and began to run soothing circles on her back just like when his mother used to do when he was small and had nightmares. He stroked her soft tresses as he allowed her to cry into his chest while she clung onto the back of his clothes as her small body shook with her sobs. He wished he could hurt Aang so bad that it would render him unconscious for weeks for making Katara cry. He could not help but wish that it were him she was crying for, to distress for, and not Aang—although he would rather not have her cry at all. His heart seemed to be breaking at every sob that escaped her lips, but he just could not push her away and let her suffer alone.

What Zuko did not realize, however, was that Katara was crying not because of what happened with Aang—her tears had nothing to with him. She cried because she could not hold her pain and sadness any longer because of what Aang had reminded her about Zuko and Mai and because Zuko did not love her. How she wished Zuko were holding her to him because he loved her, not because he wanted to soothe her tears away.

A cold breeze blew by, rustling the leaves of the tree above them, which caused the pink and white blossoms to dance their way down upon the pair sitting below wrapped in each other’s arms. It was a half an hour later when Katara’s tears stopped and her soft sobs subsided. Finally realizing what she had been doing, Katara slowly pulled away from Zuko’s warm embrace with a small blush, embarrassed beyond measure for her outburst.

Zuko was reluctant to let her move away from his hold, and so he gently pressed her back onto his chest. He smiled when she settled back down with a blush and watched as she tried to hide the tears.
that clung to her cheeks. With a small smile, he pulled a silky handkerchief from the inside of his sleeve and quietly handed it to her.

“Thanks,” Katara muttered as she grabbed the offered handkerchief.

She almost burst into tears again when she looked down at the silky piece of cloth, recognizing it as the one Zuko had used to dab the hot tea that Jin had accidentally spilled onto her hands in Ba Sing Se, but she took a deep breath and wiped the moisture from her cheeks.

“Sorry for crying on you like that. I didn’t mean to drench your robe with my tears,” she said shakily as she leaned back and tried to smile up at him. “I’m sorry for keeping you from your own party.”

“It’s okay,” Zuko reassured and smiled slightly as he ran his fingers through her hair and shrugged. “I’m actually glad I could escape from it for a while. Besides, you’ve always been there for me and I will always be there for you when you need me.”

Katara looked back down and bit her lip to keep from crying again. Though she knew that it would hurt later if she remained in Zuko’s embrace much longer, she buried her face in his warm chest and inhaled his spicy scent.

“Zuko?” she spoke up softly.

“Yeah?”

“Can we…stay like this…for a while longer?” she whispered almost timidly.

Zuko’s golden eyes widened and he looked down at the young woman with a blushing face in his arms. He wished he could tell her that she could stay like that forever, that he would be there for her and love her forever, but he refrained from telling her so because it seemed she was still shaken by what happened a few moments ago with Aang.

Katara felt her heart sink when Zuko did not respond right away, so she started to pull away, but she was surprised when Zuko tightened his hold on her and nodded.
“Of course,” he finally replied.

“Thank you,” she said quietly.

They were silent after that as they sat together under the dark sky in the middle of the grand garden. Both wished they could reveal their true feelings for one another, but so many things had happened that they did not know if they should.

Katara let out a soft sigh as Zuko’s warmth surrounded her. She could feel his strong and steady heartbeat beneath her ear, and within a moment, she was lulled to sleep by the sound of his beating heart and by Zuko’s long fingers caressing her hair.

Zuko rested his chin on Katara’s head as he continued to touch her long tresses. He looked up at the small moon in the dark sky and realized it was getting late. He was not much concerned about his guests since he knew his uncle had probably come up with an excuse for his absence, but he knew Katara’s family was probably worried about her. He looked down to tell Katara it was best they went back inside, but stopped when he saw that she had fallen asleep.

With a small smile, he reached his hand to her face and gently caressed her soft skin and then her soft lips. With a sigh, he pulled his hand away before he did anything that would upset her even further. Zuko placed his arms underneath Katara and stood up carefully so he would not disrupt her sleep. He shifted her slightly in his arms so he could have a secure hold on her and her head rested against his neck before he walked away from the cherry blossom tree and the pond.

He cautiously entered the palace, and when he saw that it was empty, he quickly made his way toward the guest room Katara had stayed in before. Luckily, her room was close to the Royal Palace Garden and away from the banquet hall, so Zuko was able to make it there quickly and without any incidents.

Zuko hesitated for a moment once he reached his destination as he recalled the times he tried to avoid that particular room. He brought Katara closer to his chest with a sigh before he awkwardly got the door open while trying to keep Katara in his arms without waking her up. He closed the door behind him with his foot, and with a deep exhale, he willed a few candles to light up. He slowly crossed the empty room before he gently deposited the sleeping waterbender on the bed, remembering the first time he had done the same thing all those months ago.

Instead of leaving, Zuko sat down at the edge of the bed and gazed down upon the peaceful visage of the woman. Katara sighed softly in her sleep, rolled to her side, and pressed herself closer to his warm side. He touched one of her hands, and when she did not stir, Zuko grabbed it and lifted it to his lips, relishing in the feeling of her soft skin.

How he wished he could stay with her, remain by her side and guard her sleep. But he knew such a thing was improper since she was engaged and all, though it still did not make him wish otherwise. He brought her hand to his cheek while he touched her own cheek with his right hand.

He would never be satisfied to be just her friend. As selfish as it sounded, he wanted all of her, all of what she could give for himself only. When she looked up at him, he wanted her to feel the same tightness in her chest that he felt when he looked at her, when he saw her smile, when he heard her laugh. He wanted her to long for him, and only him, when he was away as he had spent countless days longing for her.

Zuko reached for her hair and gently unclasped the silver rose hairpin. He looked down at it for a moment as he caressed the stones with his thumb. He could not even begin to express how pleased he was that she had decided to wear it for this day. After a few more strokes, he placed the hairpin down on the nightstand where he knew she would be able to see it when she woke up. Zuko then turned toward the sleeping Katara and sighed. He leaned down and pressed his lips to her forehead before he moved to her ear as he continued to caress her face.

“I would do anything for your love, Katara,” Zuko whispered quietly as he inhaled her scent deeply. “I don’t want just your friendship, but your love as well.”

He pulled away and held his breath when Katara stirred, but sighed sadly when she became still again as she continued to sleep. He closed his eyes as different kinds of emotions swirled within him.

He remained sitting beside her for an hour or two before he stood up and made his way to the door. With one last look at the sleeping form of the woman he loved but could not have, Zuko opened the door before he closed it quietly behind him.

Blue eyes snapped open and a quiet moan escaped Katara’s dry lips. Light was pouring from the window and she could hear a few birds singing outside. Looking around the semi-dark room, Katara brought a hand to her head and winced at the pain that she knew had to do with all the crying she had done the previous night. It seemed all she did was cry for the past several months.

She sat up and closed her eyes as the memories of what Aang did and said came rushing to her mind. She knew it was the amount of alcohol he had drunk that made him more daring than usual, but that still did not excuse the way he had treated her. She could not keep up with the way things were, she could not continue lying to herself and to Aang. She needed to have a talk with him. She would end their relationship, a relationship that was not even meant to be in the first place.
Having reached a decision, Katara opened her eyes and sighed as she felt like a weight had been lifted from her shoulders. She knew Aang would be angry and hurt at first, but she was positive that in the end he would realize it was for the best and hopefully he would be able to find happiness, for even though she was not in love with him, she did care for him and loved him as one of her best friends.

Katara looked at her nightstand and her eyes widened as she saw her rose hairpin resting neatly in the middle of the wooden surface of the furniture. She picked it up since she did not recall placing it there and then gasped as she then remembered that she had fallen asleep in Zuko’s embrace in the middle of the lovely garden after she had calmed down from her crying.

Katara covered her face and groaned.

I can’t believe I bawled like that in front of Zuko! What must he think of me?

She quickly shoved the depressing thoughts from her mind as they began to surface for she did not want to relive those moments where the realization of her horrible love life pierced her heart. Katara looked down at the hairpin in her hand and blushed at the memory of Zuko trying to comfort her. She felt a bit bad, though, that he had missed his party just to listen to her cry.

She looked about the room and she knew that Zuko had probably carried her to her room again. Too bad she had fallen asleep and could not enjoy being in his arms like that time when they returned from the prison tower. A soft knock at her door brought her out of her thoughts. The door opened and Jiao entered with a smile on her face.

“Good morning, Lady Katara,” the young maidservant greeted and bowed respectfully. “Fire Lord Zuko has asked me to come and see how you were this morning before the breakfast meal.”

“Oh…uh…I’m fine, thank you,” Katara replied softly as she pulled her covers away. She was shocked to find that she was not wearing her dress from last night but her nightgown.

Jiao turned away from the window she had opened when the young waterbender became quiet and did not move from the bed. The maidservant saw what the woman was looking at, and with an understanding giggle, she proceeded to help Katara stand up.

“I was finishing the last arrangements for your family’s stay in the guest rooms last night when I saw...
Lord Zuko come out from your room while I passed by,” Jiao began as she started to fix the bed. “He told me to retrieve your grandmother so she could change you into your more comfortable sleeping clothes.”

“Oh,” Katara giggled sheepishly as she moved away to let Jiao finish her job. She was amazed that she did not even notice.

Katara watched as Jiao smoothed the covers back onto the bed and fluffed the pillows before she blushed in mortification at what kind of woman Jiao must think she was when she saw Zuko leave her room so late at night. She liked Jiao and she did not want the young servant to think badly about her. What if someone else saw?

“Jiao, about last night…Fire Lord Zuko and I…we didn’t…uh,” Katara stuttered to explain.

Jiao looked at the blushing young woman and smiled.

“There’s no need for you to worry or even try to explain, Lady Katara. Besides, it is none of my business what Fire Lord Zuko or you do,” she said with a small shrug. “I understand that in the Water Tribes such things are viewed differently, but here in the Fire Nation, it’s not a big deal.”

Katara followed Jiao as she walked over to the bathroom and let the water fill the tub before she lit the wooden logs beneath it to heat the water up. Katara murmured quiet thanks as the young servant woman continued to talk.

“Especially among the nobility such things as sexual escapades or virginity do not matter as long as they are kept in secret. It is even expected for both partners to have lovers since most marriages are due to political reasons, not affection, and especially not love.”

Katara nodded silently, amazed at how different it was in her culture. She looked away sadly as Jiao smiled at her.

“I-it’s just like the…situation between…Lady Mai and Fire Lord Zuko,” she said quietly.

Jiao frowned slightly at the dejected tone of the young woman she had come to care for.
“Well…that could be an example. Lady Mai decided to move into the palace a few months ago since her home is so close, almost outside the palace gates,” Jiao said before she gave a small shrug.
“Though I don’t see why Lady Mai is still here since the Fire Lord rarely goes to her or even spends time with her anyway.”

Jiao gasped and she quickly covered her mouth as she turned to look at Katara with wide eyes.

“Yes forgive me for being so imprudent,” she hastily apologized and bowed.

Katara waved her apology away as a large smile broke out on her face.

“It’s alright, Jiao,” she reassured as she stepped closer to the tub and looked down at the steamy water.

“It actually makes me glad to know this,” she whispered softly to herself. She felt like her heart was beating easier now.

Jiao muttered another sheepish apology before she stepped out of the bathroom to lay out some clothes for the waterbender so she could get ready for the day.

Katara stepped out of her light-blue nightgown and entered the bathtub with a soft sigh, her smile still in place.

Those that were waiting in the dining room talked excitedly amongst themselves about the happenings from the party the previous night, making a groan or two come out from the Water Tribe warrior slouched at the end of the table as a result of the massive hangover he woke up to. Toph, Pakku, and his father laughed at him and his wife scowled at him gently while she fed their twins with the help from Gran-Gran and Lady Ursa. Ty Lee and Haru were whispering to each other while Mai sat beside the giggling acrobat with a cold look on her face.

Aang was oblivious to what the others were talking about as he fidgeted nervously in his seat while they waited for Zuko, Iroh, and Katara to show up. Jing began to squeal loudly as she tried to push away the food her mother was trying to feed her and Aang winced. He knew he should not have allowed the others to pressure him into drinking and now he had a painful headache. The young airbender leaned his elbows on the table and held his head in his hands.
He deserved the pain, though. He felt so horrible at the things he told Katara last night and what he tried to do and he was so ashamed of his actions. What would Monk Gyatso and Avatar Roku think? But he was more concerned about what Katara thought about him now. How was he going to regain her favor after what happened? He did not mean to have acted like that, and he knew part of the blame was the alcohol he had consumed, but he just could not help it. Katara had looked so beautiful in that dress, it just caused his brain to malfunction for a moment. But he knew his actions were wrong. He just hoped that Katara would find it in herself to forgive him.

Aang looked up when the guards opened the large doors and Katara came in with a maidservant walking a few paces behind her while she greeted everybody cheerfully. He smiled at her shakily, but Katara looked away from him and walked around the rectangular table to sit between Hakoda and Kanna. He felt his heart sink at her indifferent behavior and he looked down at the empty plate on the table in front of him.

“I see you had a good night’s rest, Katara,” Gran-Gran piped in and smiled knowingly at her granddaughter.

“Uh…yeah,” Katara said with a small blush.

“Katara,” Hakoda spoke up with a small frown, “why did you leave the party without telling us? Where did you go?”

Aang looked up at Katara with wide eyes, but she did not turn his way as she looked at her father.

“I…went for a walk in the Royal Palace Garden to get some fresh air,” she replied as she looked down at her hands.

“The room was getting a bit stuffy,” Ursa stated as she smiled at Katara. “Now that you mention it, Zuko left his own celebration a bit early as well. Was my son with you? He does like to go to the garden to relax, after all.”

Mai’s head snapped up at what Ursa had said and she narrowed her eyes at Katara.

“Uh…um…yes,” Katara stammered as her blush deepened in color. “Zuko came into the garden a bit later than I did and we…talked.”
Mai’s glare intensified and she clenched her thin hands tightly while Hakoda raised an eyebrow at his daughter.

Aang stared at her with a gaping mouth. Katara had been alone with Zuko in the garden? Did Katara tell Zuko what he tried to do? Maybe Zuko started to fill her head with things and that was the reason why Katara was avoiding him now more than ever.

The doors opened again and the people sitting at the table turned to see Zuko enter with Iroh grinning madly behind him. The old firebender caught Katara’s eye and winked, which almost caused Zuko to roll his eyes and sigh. He had not even said anything about what happened the previous night with Katara, but his old uncle had just looked at him for a moment before he guessed everything right.

Zuko walked to the head of the table while his uncle took his seat at his left.

“Good morning,” he greeted impassively as he looked around the table before his eyes settled on Katara and a slight smile curved his lips.

“Good morning, Katara,” he added.

Katara stuttered a reply along with the rest of her friends and family as she tried very hard not to blush at the sound of his voice, but failed miserably anyway. She avoided looking at her Gran-Gran when the old woman discreetly elbowed her arm. She ignored the death glare Mai was aiming at her. She could feel Aang staring at her face, but she could not bring herself to look at him.

As soon as the Fire Lord took a seat, the servants moved forward to uncover the plates and trays filled with the delicious breakfast meal while others moved around to pour juice for the Fire Lord and his family and guests.

The serene silence as they enjoyed their meal would occasionally be disrupted when Iroh would make a comment or when the twins would babble and giggle as they tortured their poor father. Nobody seemed to be aware of the tension that was coming from Zuko, Katara, and Aang as they tried to avoid each other’s eyes, or the light blushes that would appear on Katara’s cheeks when her eyes would meet with Zuko’s.

“If you’ll excuse me,” Zuko spoke up as soon as he finished eating and stood from his seat, “I have some important things that I need to look into. Please enjoy your stay in the Fire Nation.”
“We will, Fire Lord Zuko,” Hakoda replied with a small smile.

Zuko gave them a small nod, glanced at Katara one more time, and then left the large family dining room and made his way to his study.

“You have such a hardworking young man as a son, Lady Ursa. You must be so proud,” Kanna stated.

“Gran-Gran!” Sokka groused and then winced at the volume of his own voice. “Are you saying I’m not a hardworking son?”

Ursa laughed behind her hand as she smiled at the old Water Tribe woman.

“Yes, I’m so proud to have Zuko as my son,” she said contentedly. “Although I really wish he could settle down with a wonderful young woman already. I do want grandchildren to dote upon, after all.”

“Ah, yes, I know what you mean,” Kanna responded as she smiled meaningfully at the Fire Lord’s mother before she turned to Katara and patted her hand. “That’s what I keep telling Katara.”

Hakoda choked on his drink as he gaped at his mother who just grinned at him. Katara flushed deeply at the attention. She saw Aang give her a hopeful look, but she frowned and looked away.

Mai stood up abruptly from her seat and strode away without a single word.

“We should take a walk around the city,” Iroh piped in cheerfully as he turned to look at the silent old waterbending master. “What do you say about a game of Pai Sho after we return, my good old friend?”

Paku’s thin lips turned upwards into a smirk.

“Of course, though I must warn you that I have been practicing.”
Iroh chuckled as they all stood up from the table and left the room while the servants stayed behind to clean up.

A few minutes later, the group exited the palace gates and entered the city. Kanna’s eyes widened at the wealth of the Fire Nation capital, though Hakoda and Pakku were better at covering their awe. Ty Lee grabbed Haru’s hand and led him away in a different direction while he followed her with a red blush on his tanned cheeks. Iroh and Toph were walking a few feet in front of them all and were deep in conversation, while Suki took a break and handed her daughters over to Sokka, who groaned miserably when the twin girls began to pull at his small beard.

Katara was talking to Lady Ursa when she felt someone grab her arm. She tensed since she knew who it was and gently moved her arm away from his touch.

“What, Aang?” she asked quietly.

“Katara…I…I would like to talk to you…please,” Aang pleaded softly. He was a bit hurt that she had moved away from his slight touch.

“I’ll catch up with you later,” Katara said as she turned to smile at her family before she turned back to stare evenly at the young monk. “Aang and I need to talk.”

Toph was the last one to move away as the others continued walking while they gave each other confused frowns. Once they were out of sight, Katara crossed her arms and sighed.

“Katara…I’m so sorry,” Aang began as he ran a hand down his face. “I don’t really know what came over me last night and I’m sorry for…for acting like a jerk. I promise it won’t happen again,” he said as he looked at her with pleading eyes.

Katara nodded.

“Though I didn’t like what you did, I forgive you,” she said quietly.

She took a step back and held up a hand when Aang smiled happily and moved forward to hug her.
“And, I know you won’t do it again because there won’t be a next time,” she continued.

“K-Katara? What are you saying?” Aang asked apprehensively.

The young woman reached into the pocket of her dark blue pants and pulled out the golden necklace. She reached for Aang’s hand and gently placed the necklace onto his palm before she closed his hand over it. Aang gaped down at his hand and then back at her.

“It’s a lovely necklace, but I can’t accept it,” Katara began softly, “We can’t be together any longer, Aang. I’m sorry, but I won’t marry you.”

“No!” Aang exclaimed as he tried to press the necklace back onto Katara’s hand. “Please, don’t say that! I know what I did was inexcusable, but that’s not enough reason for you to break up with me!”

Katara shook her head as she pushed his hand away.

“That was just one of the many reasons why I can’t continue being with you,” she said with a sigh. She paused as she sadly looked away from him. “Aang, I…I don’t love you… Not in that way…I never had and I never will.”

Aang froze in shock at her words. He felt like he could not breathe, like the world had suddenly come crashing down on him, like his heart had been broken into a million pieces. He could not believe this was happening to him!

“No! This can’t be!” Aang whispered brokenly as tears began to form in his gray eyes.

Katara bit her lip to keep herself from taking back her words and comforting him like she always did. She hated to cause him pain, but she knew that what she was doing was for the best. She needed to do this for his sake and hers.

“I’m sorry, Aang,” Katara said gently. “I’m sorry for not telling you this sooner, for not telling you the truth before now, but you would only hurt more if I had continued leading you on and continued with such a lie. I hope one day you can find the person that will make you happy like you deserve.”
“Katara, please don’t! I don’t want someone else! We could work it out! Just give us some time and —”

“Stop it, Aang!” Katara interrupted a bit louder before she shook her head at him. “We’ve been together for four years and my feelings for you have still remained the same. I can only love you as a friend and nothing more.”

“Katara…please…” Aang pleaded desperately as he took hold of her hand, his tears beginning to pour down his face.

“I’m sorry,” Katara whispered as she pulled her hand away from him and quickly walked away.

Aang stood in the middle of the street with the golden necklace dangling from his hand, staring dejectedly after the woman he loved with tears falling freely from his gray eyes.

“No,” he whispered brokenly.
The young Fire Lord sighed as he read and signed another of the documents that were stacked atop his large desk before he placed it in one of the two piles with the paperwork that had been approved or rejected by him. No matter how long or how much he worked on his stack of important documents, it seemed that more kept pouring in the moment he looked away. Iroh had offered to help, as well as Advisor Chao, but Zuko preferred to do things himself; that way he could know what he was truly approving.

Zuko reached for another parchment to look over, but when the words began to blur together, he shoved it aside and leaned back on his chair with an exasperated growl as he raked his hand down his face. Although he had tried to keep his mind busy with other things, he just could not stop the thoughts about a certain woman that kept surfacing in his head—not that he had truly wanted to stop said thoughts.

The young firebender stood up from his seat and made his way to the large glass window behind his desk. The morning sun was bright in the sky and he could just make out the blossoming flowers in the trees in his private garden where he had sat under the moon the previous night with Katara sleeping in his arms, her hair tickling his chin and her soft body pressed against his. A sense of warmth engulfed his heart and he had to close his eyes for a moment at the intense feeling that he had not experienced since he had left the Southern Water Tribe…since he had left Katara. Now she was back, back in his home, and all the emotions that he had tried to keep sealed and caged inside him were breaking free of their confines.

Zuko opened his eyes only to narrow them as he remembered the way Aang had grabbed Katara; even though she had been protesting. If Katara had not shoved Aang away and slapped him, Zuko was not sure if he would have been able to stop himself from seriously harming the young airbender. His friendship with Aang may be a bit strained at the moment, but that did not mean he did not see Aang as his friend and wished him harm. However, if Aang hurt Katara, then Zuko would have no choice but to make the young boy see what he was doing was wrong.

Zuko wondered if perhaps with what happened, Katara would see that Aang was not the right choice for her husband, and maybe, she would start looking in his direction. However, he did not know how probable that was since Katara had always forgiven and accepted whatever the young airbender did. But then he would never know if he did not listen to what Iroh had told him and confess his true feelings for Katara.

The young Fire Lord watched as a few birds hopped from tree branch to tree branch before they took flight into the sky. He could not help but be relieved and thrilled at the fact that Katara had not been touched by Aang or any other man in any way yet. He wished with all his being that he could be her first in everything relating to carnal pleasure.
A knock at his door brought him out of his thoughts. Zuko frowned and wondered who it could be since Jee had told him that his mother and Iroh had gone into the capital with his Southern Water Tribe guests.

“Enter,” Zuko commanded loud enough for the person on the other side to hear him. He glanced over his shoulder when he heard the door open and firmly close.

“Mai,” he greeted as he straightened himself before he turned back around to stare out the window.

Mai remained silent as she looked at his back, her thin hands clenched tightly at her sides. When Zuko did not acknowledge her again, her dark eyes narrowed slightly. She moved away from the door and walked toward him until she stopped a few feet behind him.

“Now I know why I couldn’t find you at the end of the celebration last night,” Mai said in a dull tone. “I heard that you were in the garden with…Katara.”

Zuko glanced at her briefly and frowned at the iciness in which she had said Katara’s name.

“I was,” he replied truthfully.

Mai pressed her lips together until they turned white before she composed herself. She had been hoping that what she had heard at the breakfast table had only been a false rumor that the Water Tribe woman had tried to pass as truth in order to ensnare Zuko. But it seemed that it had been true and Zuko was not even bothered by it. She needed to win him back.

The thin noblewoman walked closer to him and placed a hand on his back before she slowly circled around him until she stood in front of him, effectively blocking whatever he had been looking at outside.

Zuko blinked and frowned down at her.

“Zuko, what is wrong with you?” she asked quietly.
His frown deepened.

“I don’t know what you mean by that,” he uttered coolly.

“Of course you know what I mean!” Mai hissed in a low tone. “You’re becoming more and more distant with me. You don’t spend time with me and you push me away. We haven’t even had sex for over a year now!”

“I’m not in the mood for such things right now,” Zuko answered dismissively.

“Maybe not with me, but certainly you’re in the mood with someone else,” Mai sneered.

“What are you trying to say?” the young man asked in a low, dangerous growl.

Mai closed her eyes and schooled her features into her expressionless mask, taking a deep breath before reopening her eyes. This was not the way she had planned to act. She needed to act coolly so she could win his favor.

“Never mind, forget what I said,” she murmured as she took a step forward and wound her arms around his neck. She felt him tense, but she ignored it as she pressed her lips to the right side of his face.

Zuko grabbed her forearms to dislodge her hold on his neck, but scowled when she did not move away but instead tightened her hold.

“Mai…” he warned.

“How about we spend the day in my room?” she whispered, her breath crawling on his ear. “You’ve only stayed for a short moment the few times we’ve been together before.”

Zuko remained still as Mai continued to press her lips to his face. If only the same words had come out from the mouth of a certain waterbender, he would have immediately accepted the offer, not only that, he would be the one to bar the doors so they would not be disturbed.
He grabbed Mai’s arms tighter in his hands and pulled her away a bit more forcefully; effectively making her lose her hold on him. She grabbed his forearms as she frowned up at him while he held her at arm’s length. With an unreadable expression on his face, Zuko carefully examined Mai and was deeply saddened and dissatisfied at what he saw.

Mai’s skin was pale, not the rich caramel color of Katara’s skin that he wished to taste with his tongue. Her lips were thin and colorless not plump and pink. Her jet-black hair was too straight and plain, it was not the wavy chocolate cascades of tresses that he so desperately longed to run his long fingers through. And her black eyes were so dull, so cold and expressionless, not a beautiful and lively cerulean full of care, passion, and warmth.

That was when he finally realized that he never loved Mai....because he had always loved Katara.

He needed to break up with Mai. He needed to end their relationship because he would never be able to marry her even if everybody else thought it was a good match. It was not fair for Mai to be tied to a man who could not return her affections, always pushed her away, rarely thought of her, and avoided her. He would only hurt her, for he would only see and love Katara for the rest of his life. It would be cruel of him to ruin Mai’s life in such a way when she could find her happiness with someone else. Zuko removed Mai’s hands from his arms and took a step away from her as he looked solemnly into her eyes.

“Mai…it’s over,” he said decisively.

“What…do you mean?” Mai gasped out.

“Our relationship is over,” the firebender repeated seriously as he looked her in the eyes. “I can no longer be with you.”

“No!” Mai cried out, her indifferent mask falling in her despair as she took a step back. “You can’t mean that! You can’t break up with me! You’re supposed to marry me!”

“I’m sorry, Mai—”

“You have to reconsider your decision!” she interrupted before she insistently added, “You’re making a mistake!”
Zuko narrowed his eyes at her.

“I assure you that breaking our relationship is not a mistake. I know my decision is the right one. I’m sorry, but I won’t change my mind because there is nothing further to think about.”

Mai glared angrily at him as she clenched her hands.

“Even after all I sacrifice for you!” she hissed, “Going against Azula so she wouldn’t hurt you, allowing her to throw me into a dirty prison cell so you could escape, and you are dumping me? Again?”

“I will always appreciate what you did for me, Mai,” Zuko replied, his tone softening as he looked at her sincerely, “but I will not allow that to be the reason why I would marry you. I will always care for you—”

“Care for me?” Mai stressed angrily.

“Yes, care. Because all I have for you is affection. An affection between friends,” Zuko responded softly as he took a deep breath before he said, “I don’t love you, Mai.”

“No…don’t…” Mai whispered and looked away as she closed her eyes so she did not have to see the truth in his. “Why are you telling me this now? After four years, you’re finally telling me that you never loved me?”

“I’m sorry for not telling you this since the very beginning and I regret causing you pain,” Zuko told her earnestly as he reached for her hand, but she snatched it away angrily.

Zuko sighed guiltily as he continued.

“I admit that the thought of marriage between us did enter my mind and there was a time when I was even planning in asking for your hand…but it was just a thought and not something I truly wished,” he confessed softly, “It’s not just for my own selfish reasons, but because I don’t want to bring you into a loveless marriage. You deserve better than that.”
Mai was silent as his words sank in. This was not supposed to happen. Zuko was supposed to marry her, make her his Fire Lady! Perhaps their relationship was not that perfect, or the best one out there, but that was not reason enough for him to break up with her. Something must have changed his mind…or maybe someone.

“It’s because of Katara, isn’t it?” Mai hissed angrily as she fought to keep the tears from falling from her eyes.

Zuko was taken aback, but he quickly recovered himself.

“What do you mean?” he asked carefully.

“You’re breaking up with me because of her, aren’t you? I’ve seen the looks you throw at her! You were practically drooling at the party last night every time you glanced at her!” the usually monotonous noblewoman screamed. “She’s the one who is taking you away from me!”

“Nobody is taking me away from you! I don’t belong to you!” Zuko countered angrily.

“Katara seduced you, didn’t she?” Mai accused with narrowed eyes.

Zuko gaped at her before he shook his head.

“Katara didn’t—”

“Now I understand why you haven’t touched me in a year! She’s been welcoming you into her bed, and, like a typical male, you have happily jumped into it! I shouldn’t even be surprised that she’s a whore since she was traipsing around the world and using her talents to—”

“Enough!” Zuko thundered as he tightly grabbed hold of her upper arms and loomed over her furiously.

Mai’s mouth snapped shut and her eyes widened in fright.
“Don’t you dare talk about Katara’s honor like that! I won’t allow you to spew lies about her!” Zuko growled angrily. “Besides, you are no one to talk about her supposed actions since you weren’t a virgin the first time we had sex! So don’t be a hypocrite!”

Mai gasped and looked away from him since she did not know how to respond. Her embarrassment and anger were making it impossible for her to argue back.

Zuko released her arms and turned away from her. He closed his eyes and breathed deeply so he could regain his calm and composure once again, but it was just so difficult since every time someone insulted or hurt Katara his temper flared. When he knew that he was calm enough to talk without yelling angrily, Zuko turned back around to face Mai who was glaring at a spot on the wall. He let out another guilty sigh. He didn’t mean to keep hurting Mai in such a way. He felt like such a bastard, but he was not selfless enough to sacrifice himself for her.

“That is beside the point,” Zuko continued with a sigh as he placed his hands behind his back. “We are not talking about Katara, or if I did or did not change my mind, but about our failed relationship as a couple. We’ve had problems since the very beginning, and these problems would probably increase if we do marry. That is not the life I want for you and me, so that is why I’m ending our relationship.”

He sighed again before he looked at her guiltily.

“I know I haven’t been a good boyfriend, Mai,” he said, “I’ve been mean to you, I’ve neglected you, and I’m sorry.”

Mai’s jaw clenched as she watched Zuko look guiltily away from her to stare out the window. She wished she could scream at him and slash at him as well as plead for him not to leave her, but instead she straightened her thin figure and placed her hands placidly before her. She was hurt, she was humiliated, and she was angry, but she still had her dignity. She would not beg him to take her back, like some stupid and frail woman. She just had to wait for a while, let him adjust, and then he would realize he was wrong. And then it will be him begging her to take him back.

“I see you are adamant to this idea of severing our relationship,” Mai said, her tone once again passive. “My parents will not be happy with this. I’m not happy about this. But I will accept it.”

For now, she mentally added.
Zuko nodded and sighed.

“I’m glad you see that it’s for the best. I really did not wish to hurt you, Mai, and I hope that one day you can forgive me.”

“I will tell the servants to pack my things. I’m moving back with my parents in Omashu for a while,” Mai intoned instead. She gave Zuko a stiff bow. “Goodbye, Fire Lord Zuko.”

Zuko frowned at the cold tone of her voice, but understood that her anger was reasonable. He would not blame her if she were to hate him for the rest of her life.

“Goodbye.”

Mai lifted her head high, and with one last look at him, she turned around and made her way to the door. She opened it swiftly, paused, and then closed it a bit loudly behind her as she exited the room.

Zuko sighed again before he returned to his chair and leaned back. He felt like a weight had been lifted from his shoulders. No longer did he feel suppressed or smothered, but he did feel bad for Mai. He wondered what she must be feeling at the moment, since she did love him and all, and she had hoped that they would have a life together. He did not want to hurt her, but he knew that he did the right thing by breaking off their relationship. It would only hurt both of them. He hoped Mai could find her happiness one day.

Feeling restless, Zuko once again stood up from his chair and walked to the large glass window. He wondered what he should do now; since he had no girlfriend or an intended. He was almost reluctant to announce that he was single again because he just knew that the Royal Court would start running up to him with a list of wives for him, and he did not want that to happen. He already had enough problems as it were. If only he could tell Katara what he felt for her, if only she could return his feelings. But then he would never know what her reaction would be if he never talked to her about it. Perhaps the prudent thing to do was wait, since he had just broken up with Mai only a few moments ago, but he could not miss another opportunity. He needed to tell Katara before it was too late.

A small smile crossed Zuko’s face as he watched a few butterflies flutter in the early spring air. Perhaps he could have another chance to tell her soon.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Jing and Ting babbled happily as they were carried down the shiny corridor by their mom and their aunt. The women were heading to the Fire Lord’s study to ask him if they could use the carriages so they could take a short tour to the edge of the capital. Suki and Katara giggled when Ting began to tug Katara’s hair and tried to stuff it in her mouth, but huffed when her aunt pulled her hair away just in time before she chewed on it.

“Katara?” Suki called out as she shifted her eldest to her other arm.

“Yeah?” Katara chirped as she bounced the baby girl in her arms.

“Why are you so cheerful today?” Suki asked with a large smile. “Did something happen?”

“Oh,” Katara muttered quietly.

She was a bit happy since she felt much better now that she broke up with Aang. That guilty feeling that had kept growing and growing had now disappeared and she felt light as a feather, although she still felt sad that she had to hurt Aang in the process. She knew he was depressed since he had flown away after their talk and had not returned since. She was sure he just needed time to see her decision was the best for both of them.

“So are you going to tell me?” Suki insisted as she elbowed Katara while they continued down the empty hall.

Both women and baby girls were startled when the door to the Fire Lord’s study was flung opened, revealing a dark-looking noblewoman. Mai narrowed her eyes at them and she shut the door loudly behind her. Her aristocratic face was impassive as always as she stepped away from the door, but she glared angrily at Katara once her dark eyes landed on her. The twins began to squirm uncomfortably at the look on the tall woman’s pale face.

“Uh…hi, Mai,” Katara greeted unsurely as she glanced at Zuko’s door with a frown, “Is Zuko in his study? We wanted to—”

“Are you happy that Zuko’s now available?” Mai interrupted sharply.

Katara frowned at her with puzzled eyes.
“What?”

“What?”

“Zuko just dumped me! You must be so happy now,” Mai said bitterly.

Her glare intensified as she saw Katara’s hopeful expression.

“But I must warn you it won’t stay like this for long. I will take Zuko back,” Mai vowed before she moved away from them and glided down the corridor.

The female warrior and the waterbender watched the noblewoman in silence as she walked away, and once she rounded the corner, they turned to look at each other in bewilderment.

“What was that about?” Suki asked with wide eyes. She rocked Jing in her arms when the little girl began to fuss.

“I don’t know,” Katara responded, equally confused.

She looked back to where Mai had disappeared to before she glanced at Zuko’s door. Her heart started racing in her chest in excitement, delight, and hope as she went over what Mai had said.

So Zuko broke up with her? Katara mused as she stared at the closed door more intensely. Then that means that since Zuko and I are single I could…finally confess my love for him!

She smiled happily at the thought before another thought entered her head and she frowned.

Is it too sudden? I mean I just broke up with Aang and I’m already jumping to tell another man I love him!

“Katara? Did you hear me?” Suki called as she shook her sister-in-law’s shoulder, which made the twins girls laugh. “I said we need to talk to Zuko.”

“I-I…uh…talk to Zuko…um,” Katara stuttered distractedly.
They jumped when the door was opened again, revealing a frowning Fire Lord. The baby girls squealed happily while their aunt gasped. Zuko stepped out and froze when he caught sight of them.

“Katara,” he said softly.

“Z-Zuko! We were just going to knock! Isn’t that right, Suki?” Katara stuttered rapidly, a deep blush appearing on her cheeks.

“Uh…that’s right,” Suki responded as she looked at Katara with a puzzled expression.

Zuko smiled at them. He reached out to pat Jing’s head before he glanced at Katara with piercing, golden eyes.

“I would like to talk to you, Katara. Will you allow me?” he asked.

Katara glanced at Suki with a confused expression before she looked back up at Zuko with a smile.

“Sure!” she said.

Zuko felt his heart start to pound as he turned back and opened his study door, motioning for her to enter.

“I would like it if we talked in my study. It is something very important and...personal,” he told her quietly.

“Uh...okay,” Katara mumbled with another blush.

She handed Ting to Suki who smiled at them as she walked down the corridor in search of her husband with her daughters in each of her arms. Katara scolded herself for her reaction since it wasn’t as if it was the first time they talked alone. The night before was one example.
Zuko smiled at her reassuringly as he placed a hand on the small of her back to guide her into his study. Now was the time for him to have a talk with Katara. He had wasted enough time in hiding his feelings for her, but now he had nothing to hold him back—except for her engagement to Aang.

Katara felt her heart leap to her throat and a red blush appeared on her cheeks at the feeling of Zuko’s warm hand on her back. This was the time to finally tell Zuko what she truly felt for him and that she had broken up with Aang because it was Zuko whom she truly loved.

“My lord!” a distressed voice cried out from down the hall.

Zuko looked back just as he was about to close the door behind Katara and him, and he frowned as he watched one of his guards running up to him with a troubled expression.

“What is it?” Zuko asked tersely as he glanced back at Katara who had turned away from the study as the soldier bowed and huffed in exhaustion before them.

“An ur-urgent…letter has arrived from the e-colonies, my lord,” the young guard managed to say as he took deep breaths to regulate his breathing. “The messenger that brought it collapsed after he said that your help is needed immediately.”

The frown on Zuko’s brow deepened as he took the sealed scroll from the guard’s outstretched hand. Breaking the seal quickly, Zuko unfurled the paper scroll and immediately began to read the short message that was addressed to him. Katara watched in concern as Zuko’s golden eyes widened in alarm.

“Zuko, what’s wrong?” Katara asked as she took a step closer to him to touch his tensed arm.

Zuko read the letter a second time before he looked at Katara to answer her question. He opened his mouth to speak, but instead pressed his lips tightly together as he crushed the missive in his hand.

“Some kind of terrible disease has struck one of the colonies located further inland in the great continent a few days ago,” Zuko began and paused when Katara gasped. “Many of my people are getting infected by this disease while others are close to death. Many of them…especially the children have…died.”

“Oh, Zuko, that’s horrible!” Katara gasped in shock as she clutched his arm. “Has help been sent
“The governor of the colony is asking for my immediate presence,” Zuko replied as he turned to look down at Katara’s worried face. He patted her hand and sighed at yet another interruption. “I must depart with medical and food supplies immediately.”

Katara grabbed his hand, but before she could say anything, loud footsteps coming down the hall caught their attention. They and the soldier turned at the noise and watched as Aang and Toph ran hastily toward them, concerned expressions lining their faces as well.

“What’s going on?” Zuko asked apprehensively as both young benders reached them with a loud chirping Momo trailing after them.

Aang swallowed as he raised his hand to show a scroll with the Earth Kingdom seal already broken.

“I just got this message when I came back from…being outside,” Aang began as he glanced briefly at Katara with a hurt expression before he looked back at Toph. “We’re needed in a village in the northeastern part of the Earth Kingdom.”

“Why?” Katara asked as she looked between the two with growing distress.

“Seems like some kind of revolt has started at some village,” Toph explained. “The governor and his family have been killed and the bastards who started everything are now trying to make other villagers follow them and go against the aristocracy,” she growled. “The scared governors from the nearby villages have asked for the Avatar’s help in calming the crowd and I’ve decided to go to help Aang put a stop to their idiocy!”

Zuko cursed under his breath before he turned back to the still awaiting guard.

“Inform Admiral Jee to load medical supplies as well as food and water onto my flagship and have it ready to depart as soon as possible. Tell Advisor Chao I need to see him in my study immediately!” Zuko barked out.

The guard jumped at the command.
“Yes, my lord!” he answered as he bowed and hastily ran to get the Fire Lord’s orders done.

“Our stuff has already been loaded on Appa. It’ll take us a couple of weeks to reach the Earth Kingdom village. Hopefully we make it in time,” Aang said as he shifted agitatedly in his spot before he turned to look back at Katara. “You should get your things ready so we can leave right now.”

Zuko paused mid-step as he made his way back into his study. It seemed his chance to have a serious talk with Katara had flown away.

“I’m going with Zuko to the colony,” Katara responded firmly.

“What?” both Aang and Zuko asked at the same time as they looked at Katara incredulously while Toph smirked as she crossed her arms over her chest.

“The colony is suffering from an illness. I can probably use my healing abilities to help the people. I will never deny anyone my help if they need it,” Katara told them as she touched the waterskin at her hip.

Zuko again stepped away from the room to stand beside Katara as he looked down at her with a concerned face.

“I don’t know, Katara,” he began quietly, “What if you get sick as well?”

What if you die? he voiced anxiously in his head. That thought caused a pang of panic to course through his body.

“I’m made of stronger stuff than that!” Katara exclaimed with a huff. “Besides, if the Fire Lord can go, then so can I. My healing abilities will be of great help.”

Zuko pressed his lips closed as he frowned down at her before he sighed reluctantly since he knew she made a good point. Besides, once Katara got an idea it took a miracle to change her mind. He would just have to keep at her side during their entire stay in the colony to make sure nothing fatal happened to her.

“Okay!” Katara responded urgently as she made to turn away. “I need to tell my father that we’re leaving—”

“Wait! Katara, you can’t go!” Aang cried out as he stepped forward to block her way.

“Aang…” Katara sighed as she looked at him with a deep frown that made the young monk wince. “You and Toph are needed in the Earth Kingdom. Zuko and I are needed in the colony and I’m going. Goodbye, Aang.”

Aang cringed at her last words. They were almost exactly the same ones she had used when she broke up with him. He hesitated for a moment before he reluctantly stepped away to let Katara pass. She smiled at him gratefully before she dashed down the long corridor so she could locate her family.

Zuko raised a dark eyebrow as he watched Aang stare after the waterbender with hurt in his eyes. Was it just him or did Katara sound…distant toward Aang? They did not give each other farewell hugs—or worse…kisses. What did it all mean?

“I hope you are able to control the revolt in the Earth Kingdom,” Zuko spoke up. “Hopefully we can do something before many more people have to suffer and die.”

“Yeah,” Aang replied distantly before he turned around and walked in the opposite direction toward the stables where Appa was getting saddled.

“What’s wrong with him?” Zuko asked with a concerned frown. He had not seen Aang so down ever before, not even when he had been told he needed to end Ozai’s life.

“I don’t know,” Toph replied with a shrug as she tilted her head toward the young airbender’s vibrations. But I think I have a feeling.

A few days had passed since the two urgent letters had arrived in the Fire Nation. The Fire Lord’s flagship was currently making its way rapidly through the waves of the large ocean in order to reach the great continent.
The Fire Lord was eating dinner with Katara and his uncle in his large cabin. He had left his mother behind after he reassured her he would be fine. Though Jee had wanted to accompany him and offer his aid, Zuko had ordered the admiral to stay behind and swear to keep Lady Ursa protected while he helped Advisor Chao as well. Chief Hakoda had then made Zuko promise to keep Katara safe and never let her out of his sight, though Zuko had already swore that to himself way before he had talked with Katara’s family.

Though Katara and Zuko talked, spent time together drinking tea and playing Pai Sho with Iroh to pass the time, and sparred a few times on the deck of the large steel vessel, they evaded the subject of their relationships—or lack thereof.

The two young benders continued to eat their meal in silence while Iroh looked at them with an exasperated frown.

Zuko drank from his cup of wine as he glanced at Katara over the rim. He was not sure if he should confess his feelings to Katara now and tell her that he had broken up with Mai. It seemed that every time he tried, something came up to interrupt him. Was it perhaps a sign that he was never meant to tell her? Maybe he could talk to her after the illness at the village subsided since they would both be distracted by his confession.

Katara took another bite of the delicious meal and chewed thoughtfully. She could not stop feeling giddy at the thought that Zuko had dumped Mai. Now they were both single and had no obstacles in their way. Should she tell him that she knew about his breakup? Even though he had not brought it up all this time they have been sailing away from the Fire Nation? Should she tell him that she broke up with Aang? But then she did not want Zuko to think that she was ready to jump onto the next guy after breaking up with another a few days ago. But what if Zuko was sad because of his breakup and was not ready for a new relationship?

They were startled from their deep thoughts as a knock sounded outside the steel door.

“Enter,” Zuko called after he had cleared his throat.

The door opened and a soldier came in before he bowed at the small group sitting at the low table as he waited for his lord to speak.

“What is it?” Zuko asked as he placed his chopsticks down.
“My lord, a messenger hawk has been spotted heading this way,” the soldier informed.

“I’ll see what it is about,” Zuko told the other two at the table. “I’ll return shortly.”

Zuko wiped his mouth before he stood up and exited the room, the soldier following behind him. Katara watched him go before she returned her gaze to Iroh when the old man cleared his throat. She blushed when he grinned at her.

“I hope this disease is not too serious. Hopefully we will be able to make it in time to help the sick,” Katara said with a worried frown.

“I hope so too, my dear,” Iroh responded with a grave nod as he took a sip from his jasmine tea.

Iroh inwardly admired the caring heart of the young waterbender sitting opposite him. She was willing to risk her own safety in order to save those less fortunate, something that had not been seen in Fire Ladies for generations. He again wondered when his nephew and the young waterbender would confess their feelings to each other. Seriously, he would have thought that they would already be giving him grandnephews and nieces by now! How he wished he could slap some sense into them!

The retired general watched as Katara absentmindedly touched her blue necklace, and with a smile, he took another sip of his hot tea.

“Do you remember that time when you lost your necklace and Zuko tried to return it to you?” Iroh asked as he gave her a huge smile.

“Yeah, by tying me to a tree!” Katara replied with a grin.

Iroh chuckled deeply as he twirled his teacup.

“Did you know that ever since Zuko found your lovely necklace on the metal prison ship he never let it out of his sight?”
“Really?” Katara asked as she clutched her necklace tenderly.

“Yes,” Iroh responded with a nod and a smile. “Zuko took great care of it. He would have it tied around his wrist and sometimes he would rub the smooth pendant with his fingers and stare at it when he thought no one was looking.”

Speechless, Katara stared at the old firebender before she began to caress the pendant around her neck as a wide smile spread on her face. Her smile disappeared, however, when the door was thrown open and Zuko strode into the room with a distraught expression on his scarred face.

“Nephew, what is the matter?” Iroh asked in concern.

“It seems the disease is getting worse. Many more people have died,” Zuko told them in a grave tone as he sat back down before he ran his hand down his face.

“Don’t lose hope, Zuko,” Katara told him as she grasped his hand.

Zuko squeezed her hand as he looked at her.

“I think it will be best if you go home. That way you won’t catch the disease and get sick…or worse,” he whispered as he tightened his hold on her small hand.

“Do you really think I will do such a thing?” Katara asked with a huff. “I’m going, and you’re not changing my mind.”

Zuko gave her a small smile as he caressed the back of her hand with his thumb. He smirked slightly when Katara stopped mid rant to stare at their hands.

“I had a feeling you were going to say that,” he told her with a small chuckle.

Iroh watched as they bantered back and forth with a large grin on his wrinkled face that he hid behind his teacup. He wondered if perhaps this trip would be more productive than just helping the village. He prayed to Agni that it was so.
Zuko woke up with a start when the flagship suddenly lunged to the side. He was disoriented for a moment as he tried to move the bedcovers away, but a crack of lightning made him realize that there was a huge storm. Zuko sprang from his bed, throwing on some clothes and forcing his feet into his boots. He almost crashed onto the steel floor when the ship shifted to the side again.

Staggering toward the entrance of his room while avoiding the things that had fallen to the floor, Zuko threw open the door and ran toward Katara’s room. This time he crashed onto the wall as another wave swung the boat forward. He knocked on her door once he reached it, but when Katara did not answer, he quickly opened it and looked inside the dark room. He was alarmed when he noticed that the room was empty and Katara was nowhere in sight.

Zuko scrambled toward the deck in mounting panic only to pause at the chaos that greeted him. His crew ran about in fright as they tried to keep the ship floating. There were ominous dark clouds swirling above them in the equally dark sky, so dark it was almost pitch black. Cold wind bit their skin and harsh rain unmercifully pelted their faces, while large, frightening-looking waves crashed onto the sides of the flagship.

Zuko snapped into his role of Fire Lord and began to bark orders at his crew in order to keep the ship from sinking. He saw his uncle and he quickly made his way to him.

“Uncle!” Zuko shouted against the howling wind. “Uncle! Have you seen Katara?”

Iroh turned to him as he squinted to keep the rain from his eyes.

“She’s at the back of the ship trying to keep the bigger waves from hitting us!” he shouted.

Zuko nodded as he turned away to make his way to the back of the flagship. A large gust of wind knocked him down, but Zuko quickly sprang to his feet as he fought his way to Katara. He held onto the railing to keep himself upright before he finally spotted her at the very edge of the ship. She had her arms raised high above her head before she spread them aside as she tried to bend the waves away from the vessel. Zuko stood frozen for a moment, mesmerized, as he watched Katara’s long hair and clothing whipping around her form from the harsh wind and the rain while dark waves moved to the side as she bent the water to her will. Zuko shook his head from the incredible sight before he quickly made his way to her.

“Katara!” he shouted in relief as he grabbed hold of her arm to get her attention.
Katara turned at his touch and smiled tiredly at him. Zuko frowned as he saw that she was tiring out and she was breathing heavily.

“Katara, go back to your room and rest!” Zuko told her as he tried to pull her with him and toward the stairs that led below deck.

“No!” Katara shouted back as she removed his hand. “If I don’t bend the waves away then they will swallow up the ship! Go help your crew! I’ll be fine!”

Zuko clenched his hands, but allowed her to move back.

“Be careful,” he told her.

The waterbender nodded and smiled before she turned around to resume her task, her face setting in concentration as she forced the large waves away from the ship. Zuko pushed his wet hair out of his eyes as he lingered near her for a moment longer before he made his way toward his crew to keep giving out orders, but he paused when he saw his uncle make his way toward him. He reached out quickly to steady his old uncle when Iroh stumbled.

“I’ve never seen a storm quite like this before!” Iroh commented over the sound of the rushing wind as he held onto his nephew’s strong arm.

Zuko was about to agree when a bright flash illuminated the sky and suddenly a bolt of lightning struck a pile of crates near them with a deafening boom. The crates exploded into a million flaming pieces. Zuko and Iroh instinctively raised their arms as they were thrown back onto the metal deck, but they saw as one wooden piece hit Katara on her back with so much force that she was thrown overboard.

“Katara!” Zuko cried out in horror as he dashed to the edge of the ship where Katara had disappeared.

“Zuko!” Iroh shouted after him. Before Iroh or any of the crewmembers could stop him, Zuko dove overboard into the churning water.
The cold water rushed over him as he entered the raging sea before Zuko swam to the surface. A wave crashed down on him and pulled him back underwater, spinning him painfully for a moment. Zuko again fought his way through the cold water as panic seized his heart. He broke onto the surface once again and almost went deaf as another thunderclap resounded throughout the stormy night.

“Katara!” he shouted again as he frantically looked at the surface of the angry water for Katara’s body, but he could not see since it was so dark. Zuko raised one hand to summon up a flame, but just like he knew it would, the flame died before it even completely formed.

Zuko felt like his heart was being squeezed as fear began to spread throughout his body when he was unable to spot Katara. He swam a few feet further away and cried out in relief when he finally caught sight of Katara floating on her back a couple of feet away from where he was as lightning raced across the sky.

“Katara!” he yelled in alarm as she began to sink into the dark water.

Zuko swiftly swam to where she had been and dove down after her. He struggled to see in the dark water, and began to panic when he couldn’t spot her in the murk. As another flash of lighting appeared, though, it revealed her, hair swirling serenely around her still form. He swam toward her with an outstretched hand, and once he was able to grab her arm, he pulled her close to him before he raced back up for air.

Zuko gasped as he broke the surface and took large gulps of air as he laid Katara against his neck and shoulder while making sure that her face stayed above the water. The firebender looked down at the woman in his arms in relief when he realized that she was still breathing, though her unconsciousness worried him.

The harsh wind slapped his face and the freezing seawater stung his eyes as he looked wildly around the dark ocean in order to locate his flagship so he could take Katara to safety, but to his mounting anxiety, he realized that he could not see where the ship was. Scanning his surroundings in desperation, Zuko cursed, for all he could see in front of him was water and darkness.

His uncle, his crew, and his flagship were nowhere in sight.

A wave hit him from behind and brought them underwater without warning, ripping Katara from his arms. Zuko fought to straighten himself out and furiously swam after the still unresponsive Katara, grasping her waist and protectively bringing her to his chest as he once again swam up. Just as he brought them above water, another large wave crashed over them. The firebender closed his eyes. and tightened his grasp on the woman as the wave sent them spinning wildly in the ocean water, large bubbles circling around them.

Burning lungs and tired limbs, Zuko once again swam to the surface where a bitter cold gust of wind greeted them, almost knocking them back underwater. Panting heavily from exhaustion, Zuko brought Katara’s head to his shoulder as he tried to find a way to get out of their situation. He did not know what to do and had no clue as to where they were.

Zuko looked down at Katara. Her dark chestnut hair was stuck to her face as the rain fell down on them and he turned her head closer to his neck to keep the cold rain from pelting her skin.

Don’t worry, Katara. I’ll find a way to get us out of this. I’ll keep you safe no matter what, he promised silently as he wrapped his arms around her waist even tighter.

The weary Fire Lord fought to stay above water for what seemed like hours as he prayed to Agni to keep them safe and help them find land. Just when Zuko thought that his energy was about to run out the angry storm stopped, almost as if it had never appeared. The dark clouds moved away and dawn broke through. Zuko allowed the current to take them and hoped that his flagship—or any other ship—would find them soon. His worry was increasing to the point of despair since Katara had still not woken up, even after he had called her name many times.

The sun was setting over the horizon again and the stars were appearing in the sky when Zuko finally spotted a thin dark line he was sure was land. Finding new determination, Zuko secured his hold on the waterbender’s waist as he used his free arm to swim toward land and safety. Once he got them to shore he would search for someone that could help Katara since he was not sure what was wrong with her.

A half-moon was high in the dark sky when gentle waves deposited Zuko and Katara onto the soft sands of the warm shore. Zuko dragged them out of the water as far as his tired limbs would allow him. He had just enough energy to make sure Katara was on her back so she could breathe more easily, before he dropped heavily onto the sand with a groan. He only rested a few seconds before he knelt next to Katara’s shoulders. He impatiently brushed the seawater out of his eyes as he stared worriedly down at her face.

“Katara?” he called out as he gently tapped her cheek.

When she did not reply, he felt his panic mount. What if she had inhaled too much water? He leaned his ear close to her lips before he pulled back with wide, anxious eyes when he could barely feel her breathe. He felt fear spread through his body as his mind scream at him to do something. He grasped his hair agitatedly before he straightened when he recalled what he had seen the medic on his flagship do to one of the crewmembers when the man almost drowned. Placing the heel of one of his hands over the center of her chest, he placed his other one on top of it. Zuko kept his elbows straight as he positioned his shoulders directly above his hands. Using his upper body weight, he pushed straight down on her chest a couple of times. He paused for a moment as he looked for movement on her chest before he resumed his task more urgently when Katara remained motionless.

“Come on, Katara,” he urged desperately as he compressed her chest a few more times, feeling an overwhelming anguish begin to fester in his chest the longer she remained unresponsive.

He was thinking of breathing into her mouth as he has seen the medic do, but Katara suddenly coughed and water spewed from her mouth. Zuko cried out in relief as he placed a hand under her head. Katara coughed a few more times before she stilled. Zuko placed his cheek over her lips and let out a relieved breath when he felt her breathing normally. He leaned back and watched as her chest moved.

“Oh, thank Agni,” he breathed as he collapsed beside the waterbender.

He laid at the water’s edge for a few minutes before he made to stand up. His knees buckled underneath him and he fell onto his hands and knees with a loud curse before he tried again more carefully. Once he was steady on his feet, Zuko bent down and scooped the quiet waterbender into his arms as he slowly made his way away from the now calm sea. He reached the edge of what seemed like the beginning of a forest, though he could not make out much except for a few very tall trees since it was almost pitch black. Zuko eyed the dark forest before him warily since he did not know where they were and what dangers could be lurking in the darkness.

He spotted a tall palm tree that rested a few feet away from the forest and made his way to it. He knelt down under the shadow of its leaves to gently set down his precious cargo. A deep frown marred Zuko’s features since Katara did not make one sound as he moved her. He desperately wanted to see her blue eyes and hear her soft voice.

“Katara, please wake up soon,” Zuko whispered as he reached down to brush her wet hair out of her lovely face.

Fatigue finally catching up with him, Zuko sighed heavily as he lay down beside her. In an instant, his eyes closed and he fell into a deep slumber while the waves crashed softly against the shore.

The sound of seabirds calling and the warmth of the sun began to awaken the tired Fire Lord, but Zuko was too exhausted to open his eyes and start another tedious day. His usual comfortable and soft bed seemed hard and cold. With a grunt, Zuko shifted slightly in search of a comfortable position only to have his arm bump onto something solid. He tensed as his foggy brain realized that there was somebody lying next to him. He frowned in irritation at the thought that Mai had dared to sneak into his room even after he had broken up with her. As the last threads of sleep began to leave him, memories of the urgent letter that made him leave his home surfaced in his mind. So, if it was not Mai, then who was curled up beside him?

Zuko allowed his arm to wander down the unknown person’s body, lightly and slowly so as not to wake up whoever was lying pressed up to him. His good eyebrow rose to his forehead as his hand traced a slim waist that ended up in wide hips.

That’s definitely not Mai, Zuko mused as he once again outlined the soft curves before he paused and berated himself for feeling up a stranger’s body while she slept.

He wondered whose luscious body was pressed to his, and unable to resist, Zuko opened his eyes only to meet thick, brown hair framing the serene face of a sleeping Katara. Zuko remained still as he gazed at the slumbering woman beside him, her olive skin seeming to glow in the early rays of dawn, and he wondered if perhaps this was just another dream.

Well, if it’s just a dream, then I will enjoy it while it lasts, Zuko sighed happily as he brought her closer to his chest.

He began to run his fingers through her tangled and damp hair when he realized that this dream seemed far more real than any he had ever had before. He could actually feel a misty breeze skimming his flesh, as well as hear the sound of birds and the crashing of waves, but most of all he could perfectly feel the warm and soft body of the waterbender that he had pressed closer to him. With a bewildered frown, Zuko looked away from the sleeping woman to stare at the sky above him only to have his view blocked by the leaves of a tall palm tree.

His eyes widened as memories of the wild storm that had come upon them and his struggle to find refuge for Katara and himself flashed before his eyes. Panic once again began to fill his chest as he remembered that Katara had been hurt and would have drowned if he had not jumped overboard after her. And while he had held her, she had not woken up even once.

Zuko hastily rose up to a sitting position as he stared down at Katara with a worried expression. He touched her cheek, but when she did not stir, he gently shook her shoulder.

“Katara?” he called out softly as he shakily brought his fingers to her neck so he could find a pulse.
His heart was pounding in his chest as his concern grew before he let out a deep sigh of relief when he found her pulse, though it was a bit weak.

Unsure of what to do, since he was no healer and had no knowledge of maladies except for small wounds and mild poisonings, Zuko lifted Katara from the ground and brought her to his lap, carefully guiding her head to his shoulder. He finally noticed that she was wearing a thin blue tunic, a pair of black pants, and dark boots that he was sure she had just thrown on when the storm hit and he hoped that she would not catch a cold as well. He hoped she would wake up soon on her own so they could start looking for a way to reach his uncle and his crew, but if she did not, then he would carry her to the nearest village he could find to get her some help, though he had not the slightest clue where they were.

Bringing her closer to him, Zuko enjoyed her softness and warmth as he prayed for Agni, and whatever spirits were listening, to bring her back to the waking world. He did not know what he would do if something terrible had happened to Katara to render her unconscious for such a long period of time.

He remained in the same sitting position with Katara on his lap as the sun rose higher in the horizon and chased away the mist from the dawn. He relished the feeling of having Katara so close to him, but he was unable to enjoy it as he would have wanted given the circumstances. His anxiety began to mount as morning turned to noon and Katara had not even stirred.

“Come on, Katara,” Zuko urged softly as he brushed her hair out of her face. “Please, wake up.”

He thought back on the night of the storm, about how a piece of wood had struck Katara on the back. What if she was wounded far worse and had broken bones or severe internal injuries? Reluctantly moving her away from his lap, Zuko once again brought her to lie back on the slightly grassy sand. He began to check her by starting with her head, and except for a lump on the lower part of her skull, he did not find anything else—no bruises, swelling, or blood. He moved away from her head to check the rest of her while studiously ignoring the temptation her soft body offered as he probed her bones beneath her clothing. He was relieved to find that there were no serious external injuries.

Running his hand through his loose hair, Zuko looked to the calm ocean in hopes of spotting his flagship, but not a ship was in sight. He hoped his uncle could find a way to find them soon. Not only did Katara need medical attention, but they were needed at the colony.

The young man looked away from the blue water and gazed down at the lovely face of the woman he cared for the most. He again reached for her face and gently began to stroke her soft cheek.
I wish I could touch you like this when you’re actually conscious, Katara, Zuko thought with a sad smile.

His stomach again growled in hunger, but Zuko ignored it as he continued with his vigil and his soft caresses of her face and hair. He remained that way for a few more minutes before his stomach began to complain more insistently. Deciding it was best that he find something to eat so he could gain more energy to help the both of them, Zuko stood up from his spot in search of something edible. He walked a short distance away closer to the edge of the forest where he could still keep an eye on Katara.

It was a few minutes later after he had glanced back at Katara’s prone form that he saw her begin to move. In a flash, he was at her side, taking her small hand in his.

“Katara?” he asked anxiously as he watched her grimace.

“Zuko?” Katara mumbled as she tried to sit upright only to groan as a painful throb began to form at the back of her head.

“Careful,” Zuko told her as he gently pushed her back onto the sandy ground. “You’ve been unconscious for almost two days.”

Katara frowned in confusion, though she relished at the gentleness in which Zuko was treating her. She opened her eyes only to hiss and screw them shut when the sun’s rays caused her headache to worsen.

“Are you okay?” Zuko asked anxiously as he placed a hand on her forehead.

“Yeah, I’m fine. I just have this horrible ache on the back of my head,” Katara rasped before she began to cough uncontrollably. “And my throat feels like a desert! What happened?”

Katara once again opened her eyes, but this time she did it more cautiously so as not to make the headache worse. She blinked as her eyes landed on the leaves of a palm tree and her ears heard the sounds of crashing waves. She turned her head to the side where she had heard Zuko’s voice. He was kneeling beside her, holding her hand in his, looking at her with a grim and worried expression. She blushed lightly before she smiled at him as she squeezed his hand to make him answer her question.
“You fell overboard the night the storm hit,” Zuko explained simply.

Flashes of fierce wind, loud thunder, and giant waves passed through Katara’s mind. She remembered the streak of lightning that struck the pile of crates she was standing a few feet away from and then the pain that followed when something smacked her on the back. She remembered crashing into the cold water as she was sent flying over the side of the ship before everything went black.

“I remember that,” Katara said quietly as she tried to sit up again.

“Here, let me help you,” Zuko offered as he placed a hand behind her back and helped her sit up.

“Thanks.”

Katara winced and brought her hand to the back of head as the throbbing became almost unbearable. She flinched as her fingers pressed on the bump that had formed there. Wanting to think of something else other than the pain, Katara looked around at her surroundings and was surprised to find that they were close to the beach and no one else besides Zuko and her were in sight.

“Where are we?” she asked as she scanned the water only to find no sign of the flagship. “Where is Uncle Iroh? And the crew?”

Zuko sighed deeply as he, too, looked over at the tranquil ocean.

“I wish I knew,” he responded in a low voice.

Katara snapped her head to the side to stare at him in perplexity.

“What do you mean by that?” she whispered anxiously, “Uncle Iroh and the crew are okay, aren’t they? The storm didn’t…?”

Zuko took hold of her hand again and gently squeezed it to soothe her worries.
“They’re fine, Katara. Don’t worry. The flagship was built to withstand the worst weather. Uncle and the crew are safe.”

Katara let out a loud sigh of relief and smiled brightly at him before it disappeared and she frowned at him.

“Wait. I’m guessing this means that you jumped after me even with the storm going on, huh?”

“Of course,” Zuko responded immediately with a serious expression. “I promised to keep you safe and I wasn’t going to allow anything to harm you.”

Katara felt her heart expand at his words, at his soft touch, and concerned gaze. If only his worry could be because he was afraid to lose her because he loved her and would be devastated if she had died. It was the way she felt for him.

“Thank you, Zuko,” Katara told him sincerely before she cleared her throat when it wavered.

Slowly removing her hand from his larger one, the waterbender wrapped her arms around her knees as she gazed out into the horizon. Zuko frowned at her as he let his hand fall back to his side.

“So…what do we do now?” the Water Tribe woman asked softly.

Zuko stared at Katara silently for a few moments before he sat down crossed-legged beside her and sighed.

“I think it is best that we wait until Uncle and the crew find us.”

“But that could take days, even weeks!” Katara exclaimed before another groan escaped her as the pain in her head grew at her outburst.

“I know, but we don’t know where we are,” the firebender reasoned as he placed a hand on her shoulder to steady her. “It’d be safer to stay here and wait.”
“I guess,” Katara sighed.

She watched as Zuko smiled at her before he reached behind him and grabbed something round from the ground. She raised an eyebrow as she realized that the brown, round thing on Zuko’s hand was a coconut and that there were three more huddled together on the sand.

“Here,” Zuko offered as he placed a coconut with a small hole at the top that he had cracked opened in Katara’s hands, “I know it’s not much, but it’s the only thing I could find that will not make us sick. We could look for more fruits, or nuts and fish, once you feel better.”

“It’s fine. Thanks,” Katara reassured him as she brought the fuzzy coconut closer to her.

She tilted the hard fruit to her lips and drank her fill before sighing contently as the cool liquid soothed her parched throat. Zuko offered her another one and she took it gratefully before taking a few more sips. She bent the rest of the coconut water into her palm until it glowed before she brought it to the small lump on her head. She could have summoned some water from the ocean, but the coconut water was closer at hand. She smiled when the healing liquid made the bump disappear along with the painful throb.

“Do you feel better?” Zuko asked with a small smile once Katara removed her hand from her head.

“Yes.” Katara grinned as she dug inside for chunks of the white coconut flesh and began to eat.

Zuko watched her for a moment before he, too, started to eat the small meal he had gathered. They sat side by side, as the sun made its way across the sky while they waited for any sign of help.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

A day had passed and there was still no sign of the Fire Nation flagship; or any other ship. The sun was bright in the cloudless sky so Zuko and Katara found refuge from the heat under the great palm tree. Their breakfast and lunch consisted of more coconuts and a few berries Katara was able to find growing in a cluster of bushes a few feet closer to the forest.

Katara felt her stomach give another growl even though she had eaten a few more of the bitter berries. She glanced at Zuko, who again was staring out into the sea, and she scowled. They could not just sit there doing nothing! They had to find a way to get help themselves!
Springing to her feet, the irritated waterbender stomped her way until she was standing right in front of Zuko, effectively blocking his view of the empty horizon. Placing her hands on her hips, Katara stared down at the frowning Fire Lord.

Zuko blinked as he found himself staring at Katara’s black-clad legs before he raised his head to look at her with a questioning frown.

“What’s wrong?” he asked.

“What’s wrong? What’s wrong?!” Katara yelled in exasperation, “We’ve been sitting here for two days, waiting! We have to venture into the forest and try to locate a village that could help us!”

“No,” was Zuko’s short response.

“No?!” Katara yelled. “The people at the colony are dying, they need our help, and we’re just here doing nothing but sit all day!”

Zuko growled as he sprang to his feet to tower over her. Katara felt her heart jump to her throat in surprise, but she held her ground as she glared at him.

“Do you think that I haven’t been thinking the same thing since we got here?” Zuko asked her with an angry glare before he added, “But we can’t just go traipsing through the forest! We have no supplies, no weapons, and no way of knowing where we are or what dangers could be lurking around!”

Katara huffed at him and crossed her arms.

“We’re both bending masters. We could take on anything that comes our way.”

“That may be true, but we don’t know that,” Zuko responded as he took a deep breath to prevent himself from yelling at Katara again.

But Katara flailed her hands in the air and continued yelling at him.
“You can stay here if you want, but I’m going to find help!”

“You can stay here if you want, but I’m going to find help!”

“Fine!” Zuko growled as he turned his head to look away from her.

“Fine!” Zuko growled as he turned his head to look away from her.

“Fine!” Katara hissed back as she lifted her head up and turned on her heel to walk away.

“Fine!” Katara hissed back as she lifted her head up and turned on her heel to walk away.

Zuko glanced at her retreating back from the corner of his eye. He watched as Katara paused at the edge of the beach and the beginning of the dark forest before she stepped into the trees and bushes without a second glance back at him.

Zuko glanced at her retreating back from the corner of his eye. He watched as Katara paused at the edge of the beach and the beginning of the dark forest before she stepped into the trees and bushes without a second glance back at him.

“Girls—no, women are crazy!” Zuko exclaimed as he sat back down on the sand with a low growl.

“Girls—no, women are crazy!” Zuko exclaimed as he sat back down on the sand with a low growl.

He crossed his arms over his broad chest and began to brood silently. A few seconds passed by before he ran his hand through his hair and let out a sigh.

He crossed his arms over his broad chest and began to brood silently. A few seconds passed by before he ran his hand through his hair and let out a sigh.

“I will go after her if she doesn’t come back in a few minutes,” he said.

“I will go after her if she doesn’t come back in a few minutes,” he said.

Grumbling lowly under her breath about stubborn Fire Lords, Katara parted frustrating branches and leaves as she made her way through the woods. The tall and thick trees were cutting off most of the sunlight and only occasionally would a ray of light find its way to the forest floor. Katara cursed mildly when another tree root almost made her trip as she tried to keep walking through the dark forest.

Grumbling lowly under her breath about stubborn Fire Lords, Katara parted frustrating branches and leaves as she made her way through the woods. The tall and thick trees were cutting off most of the sunlight and only occasionally would a ray of light find its way to the forest floor. Katara cursed mildly when another tree root almost made her trip as she tried to keep walking through the dark forest.

Katara yelped and jumped back as something sprang from the cluster of bushes she was about to pass through. With loud piercing cries, two large birds flew away from their disturbed resting place, and with a flutter of wings, they rose into the branches above. Katara placed a hand over her racing heart and laughed at herself. Once the forest grew quiet again, Katara continued to try to make some sense of the labyrinth of a forest she had found herself in. Pausing again, the waterbender took another look at her strange surroundings, unsure of where to go next.

Katara yelped and jumped back as something sprang from the cluster of bushes she was about to pass through. With loud piercing cries, two large birds flew away from their disturbed resting place, and with a flutter of wings, they rose into the branches above. Katara placed a hand over her racing heart and laughed at herself. Once the forest grew quiet again, Katara continued to try to make some sense of the labyrinth of a forest she had found herself in. Pausing again, the waterbender took another look at her strange surroundings, unsure of where to go next.

Maybe Zuko was right, Katara thought with a sigh before she grimaced slightly at the way she had yelled at him. I’ll beg for his forgiveness and hopefully he won’t bite my head off.

Maybe Zuko was right, Katara thought with a sigh before she grimaced slightly at the way she had yelled at him. I’ll beg for his forgiveness and hopefully he won’t bite my head off.

With a small sigh, Katara pivoted on her heels to walk back the way she had come from to go back to Zuko and the beach. From the corner of her eye, she noticed a hot and bright flash of light heading her way, and with a gasp, Katara dodged to the side as a ball of fire shot past her.

“What the hell, Zuko!” Katara yelled angrily as she stood up from the ground to glare at the vindictive jerk; only to freeze when she realized it was not Zuko who was looking at her, but some stranger.

The unknown man was a few inches taller than she was, but he was bulky and full of muscle made visible by the sleeveless red shirt he was wearing. The man, obviously a firebender, smirked as he let his eyes wander—very slowly—from her head to her feet.

Katara instinctively reached for her waterskin at her side, but cursed inwardly when she remembered that she had left it at the flagship in her haste during the storm. Tilting her head up in defiance, Katara regarded the strange man before her warily.

“Who are you and what do you want?” Katara asked with narrowed eyes.

The hulking man chuckled darkly as he raised his eyes away from her legs to stare at her eyes.

“Well, ain’t ya a purdy lil’ thing?” he sneered at her.

Katara shuddered in disgust and glared at him due to his lusty tone. Her hand that was poised above her hip where her waterskin was supposed to be tied clenched tightly. She hated when Zuko was right.

Leaves and twigs snapped loudly from a few paces behind the man and Katara’s eyes immediately flew to the source of the sound. She tensed when two more men stepped out from the foliage with loud laughter as they shoved each other back and forth before they quieted when they noticed the woman standing before them. Katara guessed that these two strangers were from the Earth Kingdom continent by their green eyes and the earthy tones of their rugged clothes, though she was not sure if they were earthbenders or not.

“What ya got there, Xiao?” the tallest of the males whistled crudely at the firebender as he scratched the dark stubble on his squared chin.

“Looks like one o’ ‘em Wa’er Tribe women we’ve ‘eard ‘bout, don’t it, Ping?” the third man observed with a leer. He had a bald head and a thin but deep scar running from his right temple all the way to his left lower lip, making him look like he had a permanent sneer on his face.

“Sure does, Feng. Look at those hips,” Ping remarked with a grin.

Katara took another step back as she leveled an icy glare at them so she would not appear like a helpless woman quaking in fear. She hoped they were just passing by and would leave her alone; but by the lustful looks they were throwing her way she had a feeling that they had much more… sinister ideas.

“I think it’s best you go on your way and leave me alone,” Katara warned. She may not have her waterskin, but that did not mean she was completely defenseless.

The three men glanced at each other before they burst into loud cackles, elbowing each other and pointing at the woman that dared to threaten them.

“Wat d’ya guys say we ‘ave ourselves some fun while we wait fo’ da rest ta catch up?” the bulky firebender chuckled darkly as he turned to grin at his comrades before he turned his attention on the woman, licking his lips.

“I says dat’s a great idea!” Ping exclaimed while the other one agreed with a vigorous nod of his bald head. With another nasty laugh, the trio spread out and began to advance on the weaponless woman.

Katara lifted her arms and spun round, bending the moisture from the large tree she was standing next to. The water twirled around her form as she spun while the tree dried up into a withered piece of wood, its once bright leaves falling to the ground. She inwardly apologized to the now weakened tree.

“She’s a wa’erbenda!” Feng exclaimed as they all paused in their advance in shock, which quickly passed since they were confident they could defeat one lone woman.

“All at once, the three men sprang at her from all sides with triumphant smirks, which then turned into stunned grimaces when a sharp water whip smacked into each of their backs. Katara smirked as she easily countered them.

“Oops. Did I forget to mention that I’m a master waterbender?” Katara taunted as she willed the water whips to grab onto each of the men’s legs and lifted them up before throwing them against the trees.

They cursed loudly as they landed hard on the floor. They quickly jumped to their feet as they glared heatedly at the now smirking woman standing before them with a water ribbon curled around her shoulders and arms like a snake.

“Ya lil’ bitch!” they screamed angrily as they lunged at her again.

The scarred man withdrew a thin sword from his back and brandished it at Katara, but she easily flipped to her side and threw a ball of ice right at his face, sending him flying back into a thick cluster of bushes. Ping roared as he watched his friend fly through the air and he stomped on the hard ground, causing a large wave of stone and dirt to fly at Katara. She stumbled as the earth trembled, but managed to stop the stone wave by freezing it in ice. Gathering more water from a patch of green grass, the waterbender then turned to the earthbender and threw the large amount of water on him. The man was thrown onto his back with a loud yelp. Katara quickly exhaled and the water froze him to the floor. He thrashed and cursed, but was unable to break the thick ice.

Katara yelped when a ball of fire almost hit her on the chest, but her quick reflexes saved her as she gathered the water before her as a shield. The water evaporated as the fire touched it and the firebender chuckled triumphantly.

“Seems like ya met yer match, lil’ gurl,” Xiao taunted.

“Hardly,” Katara countered with a smirk. Compared to Zuko this guy’s firebending seems like child’s play.

Katara once again gathered water from a tree and wound the liquid down her arms. The man growled darkly at her mocking smirk, and without warning, he began to send attack after attack of fire toward her. Katara easily countered off his attacks, extinguishing the flames as if they were from mere candles. She was better acquainted with fighting against firebenders since she had spent a great deal sparing with Zuko. She made a mental note to thank him later.

The firebender was getting more furious by the second that, as the woman continued to deflect his attacks, he forgot to keep his defenses up. Katara took advantage of this and, with a flick of her wrist, sent a torrent of water into his stomach that winded him and threw him to the ground a few feet away. The other two men groaned and continued to curse as he gasped for breath.

Well…that was…disappointing, Katara mused as she let her body relax slightly. She thought it best to freeze them so she could have time to find her way back to Zuko without them surprising her as she tried to figure out how to get out of the forest.

Katara raised her hands to let the water hover over the other two men when something flew from behind her and clenched onto her wrists, making a gasp fall from her lips as her hold on the water ceased and the water fell to her feet. Shocked, Katara brought her hands down to look at them and her eyes widened at what she saw. Encircling both her wrists were stone bracelets, thicker than two inches.

Lifting her arms again, Katara tried to summon her element, but the water that was seeping into the ground did not even ripple. She tried again, this time putting all her energy into the motion, but to no avail. A twig snapped somewhere close behind her and Katara spun wildly around in growing panic.

Out of the darkness of the trees stepped out a thin and tall man, almost as tall as Zuko, with a long, dark brown braid falling over his shoulder. His tanned face held a stern and dark expression as his piercing, dark green eyes stared at her blankly. He walked calmly away from the shadows of the forest with one arm held up with a clenched fist. Katara gasped as the bracelets tightened on her thin wrists.

Impossible! He’s blocking my chi! Blocking my waterbending!

Katara began to feel panic swell inside her at the realization as she desperately clawed at the stone bracelets while she took several steps back. Without her waterbending, she had no way of defending herself!

The tall earthbender stared at her without any emotion on his handsome face as the other men scrambled to their feet with groans and vicious curses. Xiao and Feng helped to break the ice from around the other man before they straightened. The silent newcomer finally looked away from the wide-eyed woman to glare sharply at the other men who seemed to cower at the intensity of his stare.

“Why are you three wasting time when you were supposed to be scouting ahead?” the tall man demanded in a cold tone. “Jianguo will be most displeased.”
The non-bender and the large jawed earthbender shrugged while the burly firebender stepped forward with a raised chin.

“We deserv’d some fun, ya know!”

When the dark green-eyed man turned his full attention to glare angrily at them, Katara did not waste any more time and spun around to escape only to gasp in pain when her legs were suddenly tightly encased in rock. She tried to struggle, but she could not break free from the hard stone with her slight frame.

The expressionless man calmly walked up her and stood before her with a raised eyebrow. Katara glared at him, but the man seemed not to be affected by it at all.

“What is a waterbender, a female waterbender, doing all by herself in the middle of the Earth Kingdom?” he asked tonelessly.

“Wouldn’t you like to know?” Katara retorted sarcastically with a raised chin.

The man narrowed his green eyes at her while the other, now silent, men snickered a few feet behind him.

“Tsk, tsk, waterbender,” the man admonished, “you are in no position to act defiant.”

To prove his point he willed the hard stone to tighten around her legs and the bracelets around her small wrists. Katara bit her lip to keep from crying out and instead she hissed angrily at him.

The tall earthbender let a small smirk appeared on his thin lips before he circled around her as if to examine her. Katara turned her head to continue glaring at him and make sure he did not do anything.

“Tell me, tribe woman,” he finally spoke up as he once again stood in front of her, “are you the Fire Lord’s waterbender?”

Katara felt her heart skip a beat at those words, but she refused to say anything and instead looked away with a raised head. She had a feeling these men did not want to have a pleasant talk over tea with Zuko, so she refused to tell them where he was.

“Ma’be we shou’d take da woman ta Jianguo for questionin’, don’t ya think, Chang?” the bald man piped in with a large smirk.

“Yah, ma’be Jianguo cou’d have some fun wit makin’ ‘er talk,” Xiao said as he touched his bruised head. “Per’aps he’ll share ‘er wit us afta he finishes wit ‘er.”

Katara’s eyes widened as she stared at them in horror before she began to thrash wildly in her encasement. No, this could not be happening! She needed to escape! She needed to find Zuko!

The tall, green-eyed man turned to look at the other three with a look of pure disgust.

“You never cease to repulse me,” Chang scolded.

Katara felt her hope rise at his words and that hope flared higher when the restricting rock fell away from her legs and returned to the ground. The quiet earthbender turned around and began to walk away before he paused and turned to look at the men over his shoulder.

“Bring her,” he ordered passively.

Katara’s hopes fell and despair took over as the other three men chuckled evilly and began to advance on her. Katara whirled around, but one of them grabbed her hair and pulled her back, causing a pained cry to escape her lips. She elbowed the one who had hurt her and he released her with a yelp, but before she could run again another one grabbed hold of her arm while the third man grabbed onto the back of her shirt. She began to scream, punch, and kick at them as she tried to fight for her freedom.

Katara clawed at the firebender who was trying to throw her onto his shoulder. She managed to inflict deep scratches on his face and he howled in pain as he grabbed onto his injured skin. With an angry snarl, he reared his arm back and flung it forward, slapping Katara hard across her face. Tears sprang from her eyes at the pain as her head snapped to the side before she fell to the hard ground due to the force of the blow.

She laid there for a moment, a bit disoriented, and she shook her head as she tried to stand up again to flee. Where was Zuko?

She gasped when she felt hands grabbing her, pulling her up. She felt her panic rise to extreme levels as her attackers chuckled lasciviously in her ear as they started to drag her after them.

“Zuko!” she shrieked desperately.

The almost setting sun found Zuko pacing impatiently back and forth at the edge of the forest. A while had passed since Katara had left angrily and she had not returned. He understood why she was angry, he himself was impatient to find a way to the disease-stricken colony, but he also knew that it would be worse if they ventured without supplies or weapons into an unknown area without knowing if they were in ally or enemy territory.

Zuko ran a hand through his loose hair as he glanced toward the dark and silent forest for the hundredth time since Katara had left his sight. He had this strange feeling that something was wrong and he could not shake that feeling of trepidation away. Pausing in his pacing, Zuko veered to his right and began to walk in the direction the waterbender had gone to—though he made sure to walk in a controlled pace so as not to seem too eager or anxious.

“Zuko!” the sound of Katara’s terrified scream broke through the foliage and made a cold shiver run down his spine.

“Katara!” Zuko called out in a panic as he dashed toward the sound of her frightened voice, all the while cursing himself for allowing her to venture off by herself. He increased his speed as he raced through the forest.

In the darkness of the trees, Katara continued to struggle to get free from the grasp the men had on her, but they were stronger and heavier than she was and she was not having much success, which was making her fear and anger escalate.

Chang turned around and walked back to where his men were struggling to subdue the woman.

“Zuko? So you are his waterbender then?” he asked as he looked at her as if he was seeing her for the first time, but instead of waiting for confirmation he spun around with quick strides. “So he must be somewhere close.”
Katara tried to scream for Zuko again, but the non-bender clamped a dirty hand over her mouth to silence her. She screamed against his hand before she fiercely bit down on it.

The man cursed and snatched his hand away as he glared at her heatedly.

“Ya fuckin’ bitch!” he cursed loudly before he slapped her with his uninjured hand.

Katara let out a yelp and tears sprang from her eyes from the pain, but she retaliated by kicking him hard right between his legs. The man let out a cry as he bent down from the blow before he fell to the floor on his side while holding onto his injured, sensitive area. The other men only laughed and jeered at their comrade who was rolling on the ground in pain, but quickly doubled their efforts when the woman tried to do the same to them.

“Enough!” bellowed Chang as he stormed up toward them.

The men jumped when an enraged roar reached their ears from behind the trees. They tensed but before they could gather in an offensive front, Zuko crashed down upon them from the thick foliage.

“Zuko!” Katara cried out in relief as she again elbowed the man who was grabbing onto her, but he only grunted and held onto her.

Zuko snatched his eyes away from the unknown men at the sound of Katara’s voice calling his name. His golden eyes widened as he took notice of the men holding onto Katara, the large, stone bracelets around her small wrists, and the red marks that were forming on her flawless cheeks. He felt his rage boil the blood in his veins at the unforgivable sight.

With a growl, Zuko sprinted toward them and blasted a large fireball at the tall man standing a few feet away, effectively knocking him into a tree. The other two men sprang toward him. One began to send large round boulders at Zuko, but he quickly pulverized them with more fire blasts. Zuko struck him hard on the jaw and sent him crashing to the ground. The other man cursed as he swung his sword at the angry firebender, but Zuko easily deflected the strike by grabbing the man’s arm and throwing him against another tree.

Xiao growled as he watched his comrades fall. He forcefully threw the woman he was still trying to control aside and rushed at Zuko with blast after blast of fire. Zuko almost wanted to laugh at the pitiful fighting skills these men had as he snuffed out the flames as they came near him before he sent his fire whip and cracked it against the man’s chest, throwing him onto his back.
“Katara!” Zuko called as he spun around to race to her and gather her in his arms, but he quickly took on a defensive stance as more men appeared out of nowhere and circled him.

Zuko felt his anger swell at the thought that they were keeping him away from Katara, who was injured and needed him, so he began to attack them to get them out of his way. The men fought back, with firebending, earthbending, or weapons. Zuko was thrown back as a boulder grazed his shoulder, but he quickly recovered and renewed his attacks with vigor. A few men lay unconscious at his feet.

A flash of fire caught their attention and Zuko spun around at the display with hands blazing only to come face-to-face with a muscular middle-aged man summoning a wall of fire on either side of him.

“Now, now, young Fire Lord,” the amber-eyed, older man chided with a small smirk, “Extinguish your fire or the waterbender gets hurt.”

Zuko turned away from him, but froze when he saw that Katara was being held by the tall earthbender with a sharp-looking dagger pressed against her delicate throat. He growled under his breath as he clenched his hands while his fire flared.

“No, Zuko! Don’t do it!” Katara yelled at him as she tried to pry the arm off her. She let out a gasp when the cold knife was pressed closer to her skin.

“Release her, this instant!” Zuko snarled at the earthbender.

“You may be Fire Lord, but none of us take orders from you,” the middle-aged firebender spoke in a deceptively calm tone, “Especially now that you are all alone with no guards and no help. Surrender now!”

Zuko narrowed his eyes at him as he clenched and unclenched his fiery hands. He was unsure of what to do. If he let go of the only form of attack he had, then how was he supposed to save Katara?

“Don’t you dare do it, Zuko! Run and find some help!” Katara screamed at him.

She knew if Zuko complied, they were both doomed. She was afraid and she did not want to think about the things these men could do to her; but she would never forgive herself if something were to happen to Zuko because of her.

The older firebender narrowed his hot, amber eyes at the interfering woman.

“Chang?” he inquired calmly.

“Yes, Jianguo,” Chang uttered passively.

The earthbender frowned coldly as he pressed the dagger into the woman’s neck. The knife bit at her skin and drew a thin line of blood, making Katara gasped at the pain inflicted on her and the threat to her life.

“Katara!” Zuko cried out in fear and outrage as he saw the blood flow down her neck and, without another thought, extinguished his flames and brought his arms to his sides in surrender.

“I have done what you wanted! Release her now!” he demanded as he heatedly glared at the other firebender.

The man named Jianguo let out a cruel laugh that the rest of his gang, except Chang, joined in. Zuko growled under his breath as he flicked his eyes around to give them all deadly glares. The middle-aged man’s laughter turned into deep chuckles as he finally moved away from the spot he had been standing to walk around the angry young Fire Lord as if to evaluate him. Zuko’s eyes narrowed as he eyed the man warily before he stopped just a few feet before him.

“I’m glad we didn’t have to go through all the trouble of going to the colony to get you,” Jianguo finally spoke with what resembled a pleased sigh.

“What do you mean by that?” Zuko asked suspiciously.

A strange and cruel smile forced the older firebender’s face dangerously awry.

Zuko felt his muscles tense as dread took over him.
Silence hung in the air for a few long seconds before Jianguo finally spoke, lifting his hand to light and then extinguish a small flame in his palm.

“I don’t see why I shouldn’t tell you what is going on, since we have you already,” he began as he glanced at the tensed Fire Lord. “We, my men and I, were actually on our way to get you from the small colony as we were expected to. But luckily for us, you came to us before we traveled there or fought our way to get you.”

“What do you want with me?” Zuko asked icily as he glared at the man before he flicked his eyes toward Katara who was staring back at him with large, petrified eyes. “Whatever you need me for can wait until the village has been helped.”

Zuko and Katara were startled when the large group of men burst into incredulous laughter. Zuko glared at them angrily as he took in their appearance. It looked like the band surrounding them consisted of both earthbenders and firebenders, though their clothing was dirty and ragged-looking, their hair was long and matted, and they looked like they had not bathed for years. Something clicked in Zuko’s brain as the men smirked evilly at him. He growled at the older firebender who seemed to be their leader.

“You! You’re the ones who have been raiding my colonies and wreaking havoc upon my people!” Zuko thundered as he clenched his hands. “Do you have any idea of all the damage you have caused?”

Katara gasped while the men sneered at the angry Fire Lord.

“As if we give a shit!” one of the men shouted out. His comment urged the others to give out remarks of their own.

_How can they say that? Katara thought angrily. Don’t they see the innocent lives they have destroyed?_

Their leader raised his hand and the men immediately quieted down after a few more curses. The middle-aged man smiled at them before he frowned at Zuko.
“How can you say this to us when it was you who have ruined us?” Jianguo said as he narrowed his eyes dangerously at the young firebender glaring at him.

“I don’t understand.” Zuko frowned at him.

Jianguo growled as he took a menacing step forward while his hands lit up for a brief moment.

“It’s because of you that we have lost everything and now live miserably!” he roared.

“What?” Katara cried out in disbelief as she tried to break the hold of the tall earthbender keeping her still. “You’re blaming Zuko? Why?”

Katara growled under her breath, angry at being intentionally ignored when Jianguo did not even turn her way as he kept his attention on Zuko.

“Your waterbender sure doesn’t know when to keep quiet, does she?” he commented as he raised an eyebrow at the silent young man before he glanced back at Katara with a lascivious grin, “Though I don’t blame you for keeping her around. She is quite a beauty.”

“My relationship with Katara is not as depraved as you think,” Zuko explained furiously. “She is only a very close friend of mine.”

“Well, that’s not what I’ve heard,” Jianguo said with a hum. “We know she means so much to you that you’d do anything to keep her safe, which is why we came up with the lie about the village being ravaged by an illness. We knew she would follow you in order to help them.”

“You…lied?” Zuko said in a cold voice. “So there never was a disease? The people, the children, never died then?”

“Yes,” Jianguo responded without remorse. “We tried many ways to make you heed our warnings —”

“By raiding my colonies and terrorizing my people,” Zuko interrupted harshly.
“Why yes,” Jianguo replied with a wicked smile, “It was so easy since many people let down their guard thinking that everything would be right in the world now that the war is over. They never saw us coming and so were unprepared when we came down upon them.”

Zuko glared at him, but a question that had been nagging him ever since he had heard of the raiding of the colonies stopped him from attacking the unremorseful man.

“How could such a large group be able to disappear undetected after every attack?” he asked.

“Ah, a good question, indeed,” Jianguo exclaimed.

He flicked his hand at Chang whose expression was as cold as a stone before a satisfied grin appeared on the firebender’s face.

“Chang here and a few of his earthbenders were gracious enough to show us a way to make a hasty retreat without giving any trace as to where we had gone,” Jianguo paused and slowly spun around to smile at his men. “Why don’t we give our guests a peek?”

The men snickered until Xiao and Ping stepped forward with large smirks on their faces. The earthbender went to stand behind Xiao and then he grabbed hold of both of his upper arms. Katara and Zuko’s eyes widened when the earth silently opened and they fell through before the ground sealed back up without any sign that it had been disturbed.

Almost like when General Fong buried me in the ground to force Aang into the Avatar State, Katara thought absently.

Everybody was silent, nobody moved, but Zuko and Katara never moved their eyes from the spot the men had disappeared through. To their shock, they watched as another hole appeared a few feet away and Xiao and Ping emerged. They stepped away from the opening, which closed just as silently as it had materialized, and gave an exaggerated bow when the other men erupted into hoots and cheers. Both men sneered at Zuko as they passed by him to stand among their comrades.

“Every firebender and non-bender has an earthbending partner,” Jianguo spoke up as he again turned his attention to Zuko. “We were able to escape with this little trick as we plundered your colonies, but you did not come to their aid yourself like we had hoped. Instead, you sent for the villages to be better protected and even had the people learn to defend themselves. I have to give you credit for...”
such a move, since it did detain us for a while,” he said, looking mildly impressed.

Zuko almost lost it right then.

“So, since that didn’t work very well, we began to send you a few messages, but you disregarded those as well,” Jianguo continued casually as he glanced down to nonchalantly inspect his nails.

“So it was you that sent me those threats!” Zuko accused angrily.

“Actually, you’re wrong about that,” Jianguo responded smugly. “It was someone else that was in charge of making sure you received those letters as well as keep an eye on you.”

“Who? Tell me who this traitor is!” Zuko demanded as he took a step closer, but paused when Chang moved the knife closer to Katara’s neck.

“I apologize, but I can’t reveal such a secret to you,” the older firebender said in mock regret. “But as I was saying, you ignored our request to release Lord Ozai and so we came up with this plan to lure you out in your courageous attempt to help save their lives.” He sneered. “But the only way that you would’ve complied to come with us without a fight was if your little waterbender was used against you. And as we can all see, it worked perfectly well.”

Another round of laughter resounded at his words.

Jianguo paced calmly on the dark forest floor as the men continued with their laughter. He smirked at his comrades.

“Quite pitiful, don’t you think?” he mocked.

Zuko’s jaw locked as he tried to keep himself composed.

“I still don’t see what you want with me or why you blame me for your misfortunes,” he said.

“Oh, I will tell you alright,” Jianguo replied with a smirk. “You ignored all the messages sent to you ordering you to release Ozai, our true Fire Lord, so we had to take matters into our own hands. We will use the waterbender to get you to remain compliant with us while we exchange your freedom for that of Ozai’s—"

“Are you crazy?!” Katara interrupted loudly. “Ozai’s a monster who deserves to rot in prison for all the evil things he has done to the world!”

“Silence, wench!” Jianguo ordered sharply.

The dagger was pressed even closer to her neck and she gasped.

“Let her go!” Zuko growled out as he took another step toward the silent earthbender holding Katara in his grasp.

Jianguo laughed at him before he turned away and calmly strode toward the grimacing waterbender. Katara felt her heart beat faster as the firebender loomed closer to her and she tried to back away.

“You really need to learn to keep that pretty mouth of yours shut, waterbender,” Jianguo cooed mockingly as he briefly glanced at Zuko with a large grin. “Quite a beauty, like I said. Maybe I would like to see why you find her so good to have around.” He reached out a rough hand to touch her cheek.

Katara cringed at his unwanted touch and at the slight pain from Jianguo’s hand touching her bruises from the fight.

“Don’t touch me!” Katara yelled at him.

“Don’t touch her!” Zuko snarled wrathfully.

“Or what?” Jianguo taunted with a chuckle. “You have no way to stop me.”

Zuko gritted his teeth as sparks flared from his nostrils.
Jianguo smirked at him as he patted Katara’s cheek. He let out another chuckle when the woman snapped her teeth to bite his hand.

“Feisty, isn’t she?” he remarked and the men laughed along with him. “So, young Zuko, if you want your precious waterbender to be safe, you will be submissive and let us block your firebending. We can’t have you attacking us, now can we?”

“Don’t listen to him, Zuko!” Katara demanded.

Zuko growled under his breath, trying to stall, but he immediately made up his mind when the men started to whistle and lick their lips toward the struggling female. He relaxed his stance and gave a small, almost imperceptible nod of his head.

“Don’t be stupid!” Katara screamed at him.

“I won’t let them hurt you if I can help it, Katara!” Zuko growled at her loudly as he turned to glare at her.

Katara gasped and quieted down as Zuko looked away from her to turn his attention back to Jianguo. Zuko held out his arms and another slim earthbender, just like Chang, raised one of his hands to summon a stone manacle to wrap around each of Zuko’s wrists and ankles in order to block every possible way he could use his firebending. As soon as the restrictive bracelets encircled him, Zuko instantly felt his inner fire being snuffed out and a cold and empty feeling engulfed him.

“No,” Katara whispered in despair as Chang tightened his grip on her.

Jianguo chuckled evilly as he walked away from Katara to circle around the now silent young firebender.

“Look at the Mighty Fire Lord now,” he taunted cruelly, “Helpless like a child.”

After the other raiders gave their share of taunts and sneers, Jianguo stepped up to Zuko with a triumphant smirk.
“How about we make both sides of your face match, hmm?” he asked in a sugary tone.

Quick as lightning, Jianguo raised his fist and struck across the unblemished side of Zuko’s face.

“Zuko!” Katara cried out as Zuko’s head snapped to the side with the force of the blow.

Zuko winced at the pain, but he managed to stop himself from crying out. He could feel his cheek quiver, but he refused to touch it and give Jianguo the satisfaction of knowing that it hurt. He lifted his head high as he glared defiantly at the older firebender.

Jianguo narrowed his eyes in displeasure as he took aim at Zuko’s face again, this time with more strength. Blood spurted from Zuko’s lip as it split from the strike, but again he refused to cry out in pain while Katara cried out for him to be left alone. His eyes almost blazing in anger, Jianguo threw a brutal blow to Zuko’s stomach. Zuko doubled over in pain and coughed as the wind was ripped from his lungs, but he bit his bloody lip to continue with his silence.

“Trying to play tough in front of your waterbending wench, aren’t you?” Jianguo growled out angrily. “Let’s see how long you can keep up the act!”

With a flick of his hand, Jianguo stepped away as half a dozen of his men eagerly sprang forward and began to land blow after blow on Zuko. Unable to keep standing on his feet from the excruciating pain, Zuko fell to the ground and landed on his side. He brought his arms over his head to protect himself and bit his lip even harder to keep from screaming.

“No, stop! Please! Don’t hurt him!” Katara screamed at them as she renewed her struggles to free herself so she could run to Zuko.

“Let me go, damn it!” she commanded heatedly. She ignored the pain and the flow of her blood from the knife cutting deep into her skin as she thrashed in the earthbender’s iron hold.

Zuko focused his attention on Katara’s voice as he tried to block out the pain that was raining down on him from all sides. He would not give them the satisfaction of knowing that their blows were really taking a toll on him. He wished he could fight back, make them regret messing with him, but he endured the punches and kicks so they would leave Katara alone and not hurt her.

“Stop it, please!” Katara pleaded as tears began to run down her cheeks in torrents, her heart
A few more blows were inflicted before Jianguo raised his palm up. The men ceased their assault and backed away, panting and huffing. With measured steps, their leader walked over to the wounded man on the ground. Zuko groaned under his breath and spat the blood that had fallen into his mouth. With a push from his foot, Jianguo harshly pressed Zuko onto his back as he smirked down at his bruised and bloodied face.

“That was just too easy,” the rebel said.

Zuko grimaced as he tried to stand up, but his arms gave way under him and he collapsed to the floor once again. He felt like all his bones had been broken. His breathing was loud and shallow. After a few painful tries, Zuko managed to get to his knees before he forced himself to stand on his feet. He swayed and his legs shook at the pain the effort caused him, but he managed to stay standing and not fall back down. With shaky limbs, Zuko slowly raised his head to glare defiantly at Jianguo.

“That’s what you may think, but I assure you that our plan will succeed,” Jianguo countered, examining his hand uninterestingly as he continued.

“Please!”

Zuko again spat out more blood as it accumulated in his mouth. He wanted to get to his feet again, his pride demanded it, but his body was in too much pain so he remained on the floor as the throbbing from the current blow traveled from his cheek to his head.

“You may hurt me, you may kill me, but you won’t succeed in releasing Ozai from prison,” Zuko gritted out between clenched teeth as he raised his eyes to give Jianguo a hateful glare.

“‘There is no one that will help you. Hakoda and his warriors are at sea at this moment returning to that primitive tribe of his. We made the Avatar go on a fool’s errand with no way for him to return soon. He and the blind earthbender will be surprised when they finally arrive and see that no revolt has erupted in the Earth Kingdom village, but once they realize that, it will be too late to save you. Iroh is perhaps searching for you right now, but he has no way of knowing where both of you are. And once news of your capture reaches him and the traitors that side with you in the Fire Nation, they will do anything to rescue you even if it means releasing Ozai from prison.”

Zuko remained silent at the realization that he and Katara were indeed all alone. It would take months before Aang and Toph heard news about their capture, since they were headed to almost the farthest village in the world. Jianguo and his men and whoever was his informant made sure to remove anyone that could come save them.

Then I won’t wait for help to arrive. I will find a way for Katara and me to escape, Zuko thought determinedly.

Jianguo dismissed him as if he were nothing as he turned to smirk at his men who had been watching the events silently and with twisted pleasure.

“There is no need for us to rush to the colony now that the ‘oh so Mighty Fire Lord’ has decided to drop by and stay with us,” he told them before he once again regarded the injured man lying on the ground below his feet. “We will stay here for the night. Set up camp now.”

Without another word, Jianguo lifted his booted foot and swiftly and forcefully kicked Zuko’s side. This time Zuko was unable to stop the painful cry that escaped his lips as he felt one of his ribs crack.

“Zuko!” Katara shrieked in anguish.

Mustering all the strength and all the will she had in order to run to Zuko’s side to comfort him, Katara pulled Chang’s arm away from her neck. The earthbender was so surprised that he did not fight to hold her still and doubled over when Katara elbowed him hard on his stomach and stomped on his foot. As soon as he backed away in pain, Katara wasted no time in racing toward Zuko.

“Zuko!” Katara shrieked in anguish.

She dropped to her knees as soon as she reached him and a soft sob escaped her as the bruises on his face became much more visible and grotesque. She reached a shaky hand and gently touched his arm, but immediately pulled back when he winced. Katara felt her ire flare in her heart as the man she loved above all else lay in pain before her just because he did not agree with the idea of world conquest like Ozai and these men did. She raised her head to glare with blazing, blue eyes at Jianguo who was staring at them with a cruel smirk on his face.
“You won’t get away with this,” Katara hissed at him.

Jianguo chuckled deeply as he ran a hand through his short graying hair.

“Oh, we will, waterbender,” he replied confidently. He remained standing before them for a moment before he smirked at her as he spun around and headed back to his men.

Katara continued to glare at the leader of the band of raiders until she lost sight of him. She did not pay attention as the other men ran around to get camp set up as tents were raised and a large fire was started, instead she focused her whole attention on Zuko who had his eyes screwed shut while a deep grimace marred his features. More tears gathering in her eyes, Katara again reached her hand to touch him, but this time more lightly.

“Zuko?” she softly called out. She scooted closer to him and gently raised his head to her lap where she began to smooth his hair back.

At the sound of Katara’s lovely voice and the tingling feeling of her soft touch, Zuko’s eyes flew open and darted around in search of her face. A small smile broke through his face once he spotted her hovering over him. He sighed contentedly at having his head cradled on her lap, but his smile vanished as he took in her own bruised cheeks, the thin line of blood on her neck, and the tears that wanted to fall from her beautiful, sapphire eyes.

“Katara?” he rasped as he painfully raised his arm to grab onto her small hand. “Did they…do anything else to hurt you?”

Katara let out a small sob and more tears began to fall down her face at the sound of Zuko’s concerned voice. He had been horribly beaten by half a dozen men and instead he worried about her?

“I’m fine, Zuko…” her voice trembled before she scowled at him as her tears continued to flow. “Stupid! Why did you let yourself be beaten up like that? You should’ve fought back! I know you would’ve been able to defeat all of them!”

Zuko frowned at her before he squeezed her hand to gain her attention. Katara sniffled as she looked into his burning, golden eyes.
“I would rather be beaten to an inch of my life than allow anyone or anything to harm you,” he told her fervently.

Katara let out a small cry before she lunged herself at him and crushed his head to her chest. Zuko hissed in pain.

“Careful, Katara! I had the living daylights beaten out of me. You have to handle me with care,” Zuko lightly teased as he tried to lighten up her mood.

“I’m sorry, I’m so sorry,” Katara apologized profusely as the tears continued to fall.

Zuko sighed as his joke—a bad one, he admitted—failed.

“Don’t blame yourself. It’s not your fault,” Zuko told her firmly.

“It is,” Katara whispered. “It’s all my fault we’re in this mess. I was the one who ignored your warnings and decided to venture into the forest by myself.”

“Yeah, but you had no idea that the rebels were looking for us,” Zuko tried to reason with her.

Katara sniffled again as she ran her fingers through his dark hair. How many times had she wished she could be able to do this? Touch Zuko’s raven-black hair with her fingers and have him so close to her? Though she relished that she was doing it at the moment, it saddened her that it had to be in these circumstances.

“I’m sorry I can’t heal you,” Katara spoke up remorsefully as she saw Zuko wince when he tried to move. She glared hatefully at the stone bracelets circling her wrists, preventing her from healing Zuko’s pain away.

“It’s okay,” Zuko reassured her. “It’s not like it’s the first time I’ve been severely injured. I’ve been through worse.”
Katara’s brow furrowed in a deep frown at his words, but before she could say anything, Zuko again squeezed her hand.

“I would really like to get off from the ground,” Zuko interrupted, hoping to distract her and calm her down. “Can you help me lean on a tree or something?”

Katara nodded as she carefully moved Zuko’s head from her lap. It took a few painful minutes for Zuko to finally move away from the dirt floor and lean against the trunk of a large tree further away from the unruly men. Katara bit her lip to keep from crying again as she watched Zuko try to keep his face from showing his pain and weakness while his chest moved in shallow breaths. Oh, how she wished she had her waterbending back so she could heal his injuries and make Jianguo and his men regret what they had done. She did not have any medical supplies and she worried that Zuko’s health might worsen if he did not get immediate help.

Both tensed as they noticed Chang leave the crowd of men and walk toward them in a poised stride with a disinterested expression on his thin face. Zuko straightened, and although the movement caused his injured side to send a jolt of pain through his body, he placed a protective arm across Katara to keep her slightly behind him.

The tall earthbender ignored both the gesture and the glare both the firebender and waterbender were sending him as he finally approached them to stand silently a few feet before them. Without a word, he threw a bag at their feet. When they eyed the bag and him warily, Chang silently slid his hands into his long sleeves and frowned at them.

“There are bandages, salves, and other medicinal supplies in the bag,” he said dispassionately.

“Why would Jianguo help us after the trouble he went through to harm us?” Zuko asked suspiciously.

“Believe me, Jianguo would rather keep you suffering and would be even glad if an infection took hold of you,” was Chang’s passive reply, “But I think it’s best you get your injuries seen to so you won’t slow us down.”

Without any more explanations, Chang turned on his heel to walk away.

“You’re Dai Li,” Katara observed quietly. She glanced at Zuko who nodded at her that he had figured it out as well. “Your silent and refined movements are just like the Dai Li. Not to mention you used the stone cuffs.”

The lean earthbender paused in his movements at the words the woman had said. There was silence for a moment before the man spoke.

“Yes, I was a Dai Li agent once,” he replied tonelessly.

“Then why are you going along with this stupid plot for Ozai to rule the world when you had been fighting to keep Ba Sing Se safe?” Katara asked exasperatedly.

“I would advise you to mind your own business, waterbender,” Chang told her tersely as he once again glided back to the group of rowdy men as silently as he had come.

Katara and Zuko watched him leave before they looked back at each other. Zuko moved his arm away from where it had been guarding Katara and groaned quietly, his whole body protesting at the movement as he tried to lean back on the tree. At the sound that came from Zuko, Katara was instantly at his side, helping him lean his back to the sturdy tree.

“Thanks,” he rasped out and swallowed another groan as the bruises on his back touched the rough surface of the tree.

Katara gave him a small smile, though her eyes were filled with concern. Once Zuko was settled, she hesitantly reached for the bag that was lying at their feet and brought it to her side. She eyed it suspiciously for a while, but when Zuko coughed and groaned, she immediately opened it and started to rummage through it. To her immense relief, she found everything she needed to take care of their bruises and wounds.

She took out the container that held healing ointment for bruises and burns, needles and thread to close deep wounds—though she was sure she would not need these—and laid out the bandages neatly in a clean spot on the grassy patch they were seating on.

She grabbed the lotion jar and opened it before she turned to Zuko. She knelt beside him and reached for his face, but she was startled when Zuko grabbed her shackled wrist and shook his head.

“What’s wrong? I have to dress your wounds before you get an infection or something.” Katara frowned at him.
Zuko again shook his head and grimaced.

“Not until you see to your own injuries first,” was his strained reply as he looked pointedly at her bloody neck and bruised face.

Katara huffed at him as she grabbed his hand and laid it gently at his side.

“I can handle a few bruises for a while longer, but you got it worse than I did and I won’t allow you to be in any more pain,” was her firm response. “Now, be a good boy and sit quietly as I take care of you.”

Zuko glowered at her halfheartedly, though her last words did warm his heart. He watched as she once again took hold of the lotion and turned to him with determined eyes. She reached into the container and scooped some of the strong smelling salve on her fingers before she pressed them to his cheek. Zuko winced at the cold contact and the slight pain the small touch brought to his skin, but after a moment, he let out a sigh as Katara began to spread the ointment gently to the bruises on his face. He tensed slightly when she moved to the scarred side of his face as it brought painful memories from his troubled past, but when he looked into her sympathetic eyes and she only smiled at him, he relaxed into her touch.

Katara pressed a cloth she found in the bag to the cut on Zuko’s lower lip and gently cleaned the blood away. She suppressed a blush as she stared at his lips for a moment to look at the cut. It was not that deep and luckily it did not need to be stitched. She wiped her fingers with the cloth once she finished with the bruises on Zuko’s face. It would have been much easier if she had her waterbending, but there was no point in crying over it. She needed to look at Zuko’s other wounds.

Sitting back on her heels, Katara eyed his shirt. She needed to take it off so she could start taking care of the rest of his injuries, but she found herself to be frozen in her spot at the thought of taking off Zuko’s shirt herself. Sure she had seen Zuko shirtless before, his muscular torso gleaming in the sunlight as he trained under it, but it was something different between looking at his chest and touching it. The few times she had done so when she tried to heal him after he was hit by Azula’s lightning always made her body tingle and feel warm.

“I…uh…I-I need to take off your shirt,” Katara stuttered before she rapidly added, “to look at the other wounds you have!”

This time she was unable to stop the blush from surfacing and she hoped that the small bruises on her cheeks hid her embarrassment as well as fascination.

Zuko raised an amused eyebrow at her as he gave her a slight nod and leaned a bit forward. Katara helped him out of his shirt, slowing down when he gave out a painful groan, until finally she removed it from his head and laid it beside her. She looked at his chest, but her blush disappeared when she saw the reddening bruises that marred the skin of his once perfect torso.

There were many on his stomach and back where he had suffered most of the blows and kicks the despicable men had given him, and although there were no visible cuts, Katara feared that there could be some internal bleeding. She immediately dipped her fingers back into the ointment and began to spread it on all the bruises she saw on his back, arms, and torso. She lingered for a moment as she gently touched the scar that he had received while trying to save her life from Azula’s attack. She felt a bit guilty that every time Zuko tried to keep her safe he got injured. She felt love and gratitude swell in her heart.

She paused when Zuko jumped and hissed loudly as she pressed her fingers to his left side. Katara jumped over his legs to kneel at his left side to look at him and a loud gasp escaped her lips as she noticed the large, black and blue bruise that was forming there. She remembered that it was the place where Jianguo had brutally kicked him and she immediately knew why Zuko was having such difficult time breathing.

“I’m going to have to press to see how much damage there is,” Katara told him gently.

“I understand,” Zuko answered with a slight nod. It would not be the first time he had broken some bones.

Katara bit her lip as she gently touched his side. Zuko hissed again, but remained still as Katara continued to press and prod his ribs. She sat back after a moment of examination and she smiled at him in relief.

“It looks like only one rib took the force of the blow. It’s fractured, but not broken, though it will take a few days or weeks for it to heal completely,” Katara informed him as she reached for more healing lotion and the rough bandages.

“I’m glad,” was Zuko’s quiet response as he sat motionless while Katara spread the cold salve on his injured side before she wound the bandages snugly around his torso.
Night was approaching by the time Katara finished dressing Zuko’s wounds before she began to tend to her own cut and bruises. Though the cut on her neck stung and her cheeks were swollen and they felt like they were on fire, Katara strove to endure the pain as silently as Zuko did his as she smeared the salve on the bruises and bandaged her neck. She could feel Zuko’s concerned as well as enraged gaze as he watched her, but she fought to keep from hissing and wincing too much in order not to worry him.

Once she finished, Katara packed everything back into the bag and placed it at her side as she, too, leaned onto the tree to rest. Zuko took a deep breath and then exhaled slowly.

“I’m…sorry,” he said softly.

Katara turned to him with a puzzled expression on her face.

“Sorry for what?” she asked.

“I promised to keep you safe, to keep you protected. I promised you and your father that I would not let anything hurt you, and look what happened,” he explained dejectedly as he reached a hand to hover over her bruised cheek before he let it fall back down.

Katara grabbed his hand as she shook her head at him. When he turned away from her, Katara reached for his face and gently guided his head so he could look at her again. Though his face did not show what he was feeling, Katara could see the anger and remorse in his amber eyes.

“Don’t you go blaming yourself, Zuko,” Katara told him with a small smile. “None of this is your fault. You didn’t know that everything was a lie and that there was no disease rampaging through the colony.”

Zuko pressed his lips tightly together even though it hurt slightly due to the cut dealt by Jianguo. He looked away from Katara’s trusting blue orbs and stared at a blank spot over her head.

_It is my fault_, he thought somberly. _It was my affections and feelings for Katara that brought her into their plans, though I still don’t know who could have told them that._

“You’re still blaming yourself, aren’t you?” Katara’s accusing voice brought him out of his thoughts and he glanced at her to see her lightly scowl at him before she grinned. “If I’m not allowed to blame myself, then you can’t either.”

Zuko frowned at her before he scowled playfully when she basically threw his previous words in his face. Katara grinned wider as he smiled at her, but she frowned when he again looked away and his smile disappeared. She knew he was worried about what Jianguo and his men could do to them—mainly what they could do to her—and concerned for the safety of his people and his country if Ozai was ever released from his prison.

“Don’t worry, Zuko, everything will be fine,” Katara reassured quietly. “The Fire Nation is safe because Uncle Iroh and Chao won’t allow these…men to succeed in releasing Ozai.”

The young Fire Lord did not reply to her words, but he nodded at her that he heard her. He hoped that what she said was true.

Both looked up as loud footsteps heading their way reached their ears and they tensed when they realized the three men from before were approaching them with plates in their hands and cruel smiles on their faces. Zuko again ignored the pain as he wrapped Katara protectively to his side while he heatedly glowered at them.

“Here’s da food fer ya,” the large-jawed earthbender spoke as he placed a plate with a few pieces of burnt meat on the ground while the other non-bender threw a small water canteen at them.

“Can’t ‘ave ya starvin’ and droppin’ like flies in da middle o’ da road,” Feng said.

The burly firebender squatted beside Katara and dropped a plate with overcooked rice. He smirked when the water tribeswoman scooted away from him and leaned closer to the captured Fire Lord who growled at him. He ignored them as he reached for a strand of hair that fell down the woman’s shoulder and twirled it in his dirty fingers.

“Yah, then ya’ll be all tired when we ‘ave fun wit ya later on,” he said huskily as he patted her cheek.

Katara’s eyes widened in horror at the man’s suggestive words before she slapped his hand away with an angry hiss. She gasped when she felt Zuko tightened his hold on her waist before he threw her to his other side and away from the rogue.
“I swear I’ll break your neck if you touch her again!” Zuko snarled angrily.

The three men laughed loudly before the bulky firebender stood to his feet to loom over them.

“Oh, yah? How ya gonna do dat if ya can’t even stand own yer feet?” he sneered tauntingly. “Ya won’t be able ta stop meh if I decide ta ‘ave me way wit the woman right now!”

As if to prove a point, the man reached down quickly and grabbed hold of the woman’s arm. Katara screamed as she latched onto Zuko’s neck with her other arm while she tried to keep the man away from her by kicking him. Zuko gritted his teeth as he tightened his hold on Katara’s waist before he swung his arm and struck the man’s nose. As soon as the man lost his hold on Katara with a painful howl, Zuko pulled her back to his side as he glared furiously at them all.

The older firebender cursed as he raised himself from the ground and gingerly touched his nose while the other two men laughed at him and mocked him that he had been beaten by an injured man. He cursed more loudly when he realized his large nose was broken and blood was pouring down his chin and onto his shirt.

“Ya bastard!” he cursed angrily. “Dat was a lucky shot, but ya won’t stop meh from takin’ ‘er now dat ya pissed me off!”

He lunged at them again, but a stone wall sprang between them and he crashed onto it before landing hard on his back. Katara looked up from burying her face in Zuko’s neck in fear while he pressed her closer to him despite his aching ribs. Both watched as Chang once again made his way toward them with a deep scowl on his face. He looked at them impassively and glared at the other two men, who bowed their heads, before he glared down at the firebender groaning on the floor while holding his nose that was bleeding profusely from smashing it on the wall.

“You were supposed to deliver the prisoners their food and then leave them alone. Can’t you even do that?” he told them icily. “Go make yourselves useful somewhere else.”

The other two men helped the whimpering man up from the ground and quickly retreated to the warmth of the campfire.

“Thank you,” Katara whispered as she continued to hold onto Zuko’s shirt.
Chang stared down at her and shrugged carelessly.

“I don’t condone the violation of women and try to intervene when I can, and though this time I was able to stop them, I can’t guarantee that I will always be able to.”

“Why do you say that?” Zuko asked as his hold on Katara tightened.

“My job is not to keep an eye on you all the time or keep you safe. I am always needed elsewhere,” the thin earthbender solemnly began stated. He looked down into Katara’s frightened eyes and added in a low tone, “I also won’t be able to do anything if Jianguo decides to have his way with you.”

At Katara’s horrified gasp, Zuko rubbed her arm soothingly and pressed her head back to his shoulder as he watched Chang leave them without another word. He could feel Katara shaking and her breathing quickening in fear while his own blood ran cold as Chang’s words echoed in his head. Dismissing the painful ache at his side, Zuko lifted Katara and placed her on his lap with her legs on one side and her head resting against his neck.

“Don’t worry, Katara,” he whispered soothingly as he caressed her hair. “Nobody will hurt you. I will find a way for us to escape. Please believe me.”

Katara nodded against him as she tried to calm her breathing and her nerves.

“I believe you,” she whispered back trustfully.

As long as she remained by Zuko’s side nothing would harm her. She felt Zuko run his fingers through her hair and she blushed when she finally realized where she was.

Oh, my gods! I’m sitting on Zuko’s lap! she squealed in her head before she sobered up as their situation once again hit her.

Though she knew she should probably move since Zuko was hurt and all, Katara could not find it in herself to give up her position. She relaxed in his hold as his smoky scent filled her senses and his strong heartbeat pulsed in her ear while his warmth surrounded her. Everything that had happened the past few days and hours caught up with her and soon Katara fell into a restless sleep as she snuggled closer to Zuko’s chest.
Zuko smiled as he felt Katara relax against him and heard her breathing even out into slumber. He held her to him tenderly as she slept, and even though he was bruised and wounded, he would not let her go and allow anything to hurt her again.

The sun had finally sunk into the horizon, plunging the dark forest into a black pitch. The only light visible was coming from the campfire where a few of the men still sat laughing and drinking. With the sun gone and his inner fire suppressed by the stone manacles, Zuko began to feel cold and helpless. He inwardly cursed Jianguo for their predicament.

He tried to figure out why Jianguo hated him so much. His name did sound a bit familiar, but Zuko could not remember why it did. He hoped that this plan for Ozai’s release failed and he prayed that he could find a way for him and Katara to escape so they could make sure the raiders’ plan never came to be. He worried that perhaps whoever seemed to have been watching him back in the Fire Nation was now targeting his mother as well and he hoped that Jee was keeping her safe. He also hoped that his uncle did not give up looking for Katara and him.

A cool, spring breeze blew by and Zuko shivered, frowning at the strange sensation of not having his inner fire in his immediate grasp. He looked down at the young woman in his arms and he sighed as he tightened his hold on her protectively while he tried to keep her warm.

I will find a way to get us free even if it kills me.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The following day, at the break of dawn, Zuko and Katara were rudely awaken with shouts, given a meager breakfast consisting of cold rice and a slice of bread, and then forced to walk the entire day until the large group stopped to make camp for the night, all the while ignoring the sneers and crude comments the men hurled their way. This was their routine for the next week and a half.

Zuko’s injuries were getting better as time passed and Katara dressed them, while Katara’s own bruises had already faded, but the constant walking long distances without being fed properly was taking a toll on them. Jianguo had told them that they were making their way to the village that supposedly had been affected by the disease to prove that they had indeed captured the Fire Lord and would not hesitate to kill him if their demands were not met.

Zuko tightened his grip on Katara’s arm as they jumped over a fallen log, making sure to keep her close to his side as the men glanced at her with licentious eyes. They were placed in the middle of the marching men in order to make sure they did not make a run for it. Zuko had tried many times to find some way to escape, but it was so difficult since there were so many of the rebels and they were always kept on watch. Zuko had taken into placing Katara on his lap every night as they settled to sleep so he could make sure she was not snatched away from him without him noticing as well as to soothe her with his presence.

Katara wiped the sweat from her forehead with her arm as they continued on their gruesome pace toward the colony. She hoped that they could get a break soon because her legs felt like they weighed a ton and she was not sure she would be able to keep walking or even remain standing. All she wanted to do was to sleep in a warm and soft bed after taking a long and soothing bath. She had not taken a bath in days and she hated the feel and smell of her hair! But the raiders seemed not to mind the grime that stuck to their clothes and skin, or the stench that clung to them. It was not only that she wanted to get clean, but she missed the feeling of water on her skin, missed the familiar soothing calling of her element.

She had taken to sticking by Zuko’s side all the time even to go relieve herself—though she always went behind a bush and he turned his back to her—for fear that the men might try to force themselves on her if she was left alone. At the end of the day, Zuko would always lean against a tree and draw her to his lap while he kept watch. She was extremely grateful for what he did to keep her safe. She loved it when he did that and she wished that the circumstances were different and that he would be tender with her for other reasons.

At the head of the large group, Jianguo paused and held up a hand, signaling for the men to halt. His followers immediately stopped in their march as they looked at their leader for directions.

“Make camp, now,” he ordered them without even looking away from staring far ahead of him.

The mass of men scrambled about to obey his orders. Some started to raise tents and others built a campfire while others went to look for small game to eat. A few of the men had already started passing out liquor and were laughing boisterously around the fire. Katara and Zuko dragged themselves to the farthest possible tree away from the rowdy men to rest, and dropped down between its roots with tired groans. An hour later, their food was thrown at them and again they ignored the suggestive remarks that the men gave Katara.

“I’m starting to hate rice,” Katara muttered as she set down her empty plate. She scowled when her stomach growled for more food.

“Here,” Zuko said as he offered her his piece of bread. “Eat it.”

The waterbender shook her head and pushed his hand back.
“No, you need more food to sustain you than I do. Besides, it’s not the first time we’ve gone hungry, right?” She grinned at him as she let her eyes roam over his jaw dusted with light stubble.

Zuko gave her a small smile as he reluctantly took a bite of the stale bread.

“Yeah. Remember that one time after we came back from confronting Yon Rha when Sokka accidently lost the only bag of money we had left?”

“Oh, yeah!” Katara exclaimed. “We had to eat berries and fish for days only to find out that Momo had hid the bag under Appa’s saddle!”

She giggled and Zuko chuckled quietly as both tried to think of better times and forget their troubles and the fear for Katara’s safety for at least a moment, but their small bout of humor died when Jianguo walked up to them with a gleam in his eyes. Katara attached herself to Zuko’s side while he wrapped his arm around her as they eyed the older firebender guardedly.

A wide smirk appeared on Jianguo’s face as he stared down at them with his hands clasped behind his back.

“Now, what is it that has caused my precious prisoners to laugh?” he asked sweetly. He chuckled when they pressed their lips together and glared at him. “It doesn’t matter. In a couple of days, humor will cease to exist for you both.”

“What do you mean by that?” Zuko asked tersely.

“Oh, I didn’t tell you?” the middle-aged firebender asked in mock surprise before he let out another cruel chuckle. “We are a week away from the colony and the end of your miserable existence.”

“I thought you said that you would let us go in exchange for Ozai’s release,” Katara spoke up.

Jianguo threw his head back and laughed loudly. A few of his men turned their way and smirked at their leader’s amusement. Jianguo leaned down and grinned widely at Katara, who backed away with an angry glare.
“Ah, so astute of you to remember,” he cooed at her before he glanced at Zuko with a smirk. “I see you know how to choose your women, Fire Lord Zuko,” he mocked. “Not only does she have beauty, but she has a brain, too.”

Katara growled under her breath at his remark. Zuko did not reply to his taunt and only intensified his glare. Zuko had tried to tell them that Katara was only his friend and not his lover—though he wished that were true, too—but Jianguo refused to believe that his affection for Katara went beyond the sexual aspect.

“But I guess I forgot to mention that we don’t plan in releasing both of you, but of course General Iroh and the rest won’t know that,” Jianguo stated with a smile.

“Why do you hate me?” Zuko asked suddenly with narrowed eyes.

Jianguo started at the unexpected question as he stared at Zuko with surprised eyes before he composed himself and chuckled deeply.

“It doesn’t surprise me that you forgot who I am,” Jianguo began before he stood up and flicked his short graying hair over his shoulder.

“You know, I used to be a wealthy and respected nobleman a few years ago, four years ago to be precise. I had everything, riches, titles, friends, and women.” He sighed and a faraway look came over his face before it disappeared and he glared hatefully down at Zuko. “But then I lost it all when you became Fire Lord. You were the one that ruined me.”

“I still don’t see how,” Zuko told him.

“Still keeping with the innocent act, aren’t you?” Jianguo growled out. “When you called off the war, I lost everything along with my long-life career in the military!”

Zuko’s eyes widened as he stared at the angry older man.

“Meng Jianguo. You are General Meng!” he said.
“Ah, so you do remember me!” Jianguo said with a twisted smile. “I was one of the top generals in the Fire Lord’s army. But you stripped me of my station and banished me, a few of my comrades, and our soldiers from the Fire Nation! And now here we are living like rats in this foreign land!”

Zuko sat up straight as he stared at Jianguo incredulously.

“Of course you and the rest were banished! You did not accept that the useless war was over. I gave you a choice to keep your military careers, but only if you served under me and my new rule. Instead you and the other group of traitors tried to revolt against me and the Fire Nation!” Zuko exclaimed angrily.

“We are not traitors to the Fire Nation!” Jianguo shouted heatedly. “You are! You are the one who went against our great Lord Sozin’s wishes to gain power for our nation! What for? To play hero with a bunch of kids and then become Fire Lord? So you could also fuck this waterbending whore?”

“Leave Katara out of this! She is nothing you think or say she is, so don’t you dare insult her and my honor!” Zuko bellowed furiously. “You know perfectly well my reasons for stopping my so-called father from conquering the world, and I won’t repeat myself to you. The point is, the war is over and your previous plot to rebel against me failed just as your current plan will fail.”

Jianguo’s nostrils flared and his hands burst into flames as he glared down at the enraged young Fire Lord holding the Water Tribe wench to his side. The urge to snap the young man’s neck was so tempting that Jianguo’s hands twitched, but he could feel his men watching them and the way he was allowing Zuko to make him lose his control. With a few deep breaths, the older firebender relaxed his tensed stance as he once again smirked down at the couple huddled together against a tree.

“I may have not succeeded back then, but I assure you that I will now,” Jianguo assured confidently before he continued more casually, “Luckily, my situation and hatred toward you reached someone’s ears and they gave me the choice to enact my vengeance toward you. They promised me that I will regain all that I had and more once Ozai becomes Phoenix King.”

“I won’t let you win and destroy the peace I have worked so hard to gain all these years,” Zuko retorted just as confidently.

“I won’t either,” Katara joined in defiantly.

“Ah, such defiance!” Jianguo exclaimed as he let out another laugh before he snapped his hand forward and grasped Katara’s chin between his thick fingers.

Katara yelped in surprise before she snatched her head away and slapped his hand while Zuko growled at him not to touch her. The firebender straightened as he smirked down at them with a raised brow.

“Do you really think you can order me around and tell me what I can and can’t do? You have no weapons, no bending abilities, and no way to escape,” he told them cruelly before his dark, golden eyes settled on Katara’s face. “If I wanted to take you now, there is nothing either of you could do to stop me,” he said huskily.

Zuko growled at him as he tucked Katara to his side, who had frozen up as the truth rang in her head. If Jianguo decided to force himself on her there was nothing she or Zuko would be able to do to stop him. Nobody would go against him to save her.

Jianguo looked back at Zuko and grinned evilly at him.

“The reason why your waterbender has not been taken yet by my men, who by the way, have not been with a woman in months, is only because of me. So if you don’t want me to change my mind, then both of you better sit still and obey me, or else I will be the one to take the waterbender to my tent for some…privacy.”

He laughed in cruel satisfaction at their horrified faces before he spun around and walked away, his laughter trailing after him like a plague.

Katara shuddered and buried her head in Zuko’s neck. She was terrified and repulsed! She did not want to be forced into having sex with a cruel man! She did not want her first time to be with someone she did not know or loved! She wanted, wished with all her heart, to give her virginity to Zuko and let only him take her body as well as her heart. But if they did not find a way to escape, then she would be defiled in the most brutal of ways!

She started to hyperventilate as her fear soared to great heights and she clung onto Zuko almost desperately. Zuko wrapped his arms around her as his panic began to grow as both Chang and Jianguo’s words rang in his head over and over. He felt Katara begin to heave dry sobs and he patted her back in soothing circles.

“Shh, Katara, calm down,” Zuko told her gently as he again lifted her and placed her on his lap while he continued to rub her trembling back.

“Zuko, I’m so scared,” she whispered in a small voice “I don’t…I don’t want…to be…t-to be…”

“You won’t!” Zuko vowed fervently. “I won’t allow anyone to hurt you! I will kill any man who tries!”

Zuko held the frightened woman in his arms as he continued to whisper reassuring words to her. He had to find a way to keep Katara safe. He had to find a way for them to escape immediately.

Five days later found Zuko and Katara whispering quietly between them as they once again came up with plans to escape, but with no luck of finding one that would actually work and not be dangerous. They had both noticed that Jianguo would stare intently at Katara whenever he had the chance. The heated gleam in his eyes would make Katara quake in terror and caused fury to swell in Zuko’s chest. They had to find a way to escape, and soon.

They were all currently camped beside a small stream, which the men utilized to fill their canteens with water. Katara could hear the sound of the tinkling water and something inside her dimmed at the longing she felt of being reconnected to her cool and soothing element. Both she and Zuko had tried to break the stone bracelets and forced themselves to bend water or fire, but their chi was securely blocked. Katara briefly wondered if perhaps this was how Aang felt when his chakra had been blocked almost four years ago that now seemed like centuries ago. How she wished they could be back in that time where they had just been a group of friends trying to save the world. She missed her family and she hated the thought of how worried her family and Zuko’s would be when news reached them that she and Zuko were being held hostage.

The waterbender felt Zuko reach for her hand and she looked up to see his warm, golden eyes staring into her blue ones. He gave her an understanding smile, which she returned with a small one of her own.

“I miss my mother and Uncle Iroh,” he confessed quietly. “But we’ll see our family soon,” he promised her.

“I know,” Katara replied with another small smile. “I just wished we were with them now.”

Zuko nodded at her before he began to run his thumb on the back of her hand in gentle strokes. Katara looked at their hands with a blush before she glanced at him curiously.
“Once we escape Jianguo and his men and we return to our families, I will finally tell you something that I have kept inside me for a very long time,” he told her quietly as he looked away from their joined hands to stare intensely into Katara’s brilliant cobalt eyes.

Katara tilted her head to the side and frowned.

“Why can’t you tell me now?” she asked.

“I wish I could…you have no idea how many times I’ve tried, but…what I have to tell you is something important, something special that I want it to be said without the fear of not knowing what will happen to us if Jianguo wakes up in a foul mood,” Zuko replied quietly.

So I won’t have to deal with fear as well as disappointment and sadness if you reject my feelings for you, he added mentally.

“Okay, then I’ll wait to tell you something important, too,” Katara told him with another blush on her cheeks as she held his intense gaze.

Their attention to each other was interrupted when a shadow fell down on them. Both tensed as they looked up to see who it was, but relaxed slightly when they realized it was Chang carrying their meager meal. The former Dai Li agent placed their plates of food near their feet without even glancing their way before he stood to leave without saying one single word.

“Wait!” Katara called out.

She licked her lips nervously when Chang turned his head back to raise an eyebrow at her while Zuko looked at her with a frown.

“You were a Dai Li agent,” she began, “Why are you willing to help Jianguo and the others take over the world?”

Chang twisted around to face her fully as he looked down at her with a deep frown on his stony face. His long braid swished as he moved and settled over his shoulder as he remained silent, almost as if contemplating her question. It was some time before he finally opened his thin lips to speak.
“Some of us don’t care who wins as long as we get paid,” he said tonelessly.

“You’re getting paid for all of this?” Zuko asked incredulously.

Chang shrugged as he placed his hands inside his sleeves.

“Thanks to your sister, the Dai Li have no place to go. When she fell into insanity…” he paused when Zuko flinched, “we were already banished from Ba Sing Se for siding with the enemy and for lying to the Earth King about the war. He and everyone else did not trust us any longer, so we had no place to call home. But then Jianguo found us and gave us the choice of siding with him in exchange for money. Money that will double once Ozai rules again. Many of the earthbenders that are gathered here are also in for the money and don’t care who is the one who gives it to them.”

“How are you being paid if Jianguo was stripped from all of his wealth?” Zuko asked.

“I don’t know and I don’t really care,” Chang answered truthfully.

“How can you say that?!” Katara exclaimed. “The Earth Kingdom will be burn to the ground, people will die if Ozai came to power again!”

Chang pressed his thin lips together and his face seemed to harden into stone.

“Eat your food before it gets cold,” he ordered passively as he turned to leave, but not after leaving a few parting words, “If both Jianguo and I leave the group there will be nothing to restrain the men from doing what they want.”

Katara trembled and Zuko tensed at his warning. They glanced at each other for a moment before Zuko reached for their plates and quietly handed Katara her own. Katara muttered her thanks as she took the plate before they began to eat the food in slow bites. They were silent as they ate, each lost in their own thoughts.

The moon had risen in the sky and darkness had settled in as the men continued to throw jokes at each other while taking large gulps of liquor from their flasks. More wood was added to the campfire and sparks flew up into the dark night.
Zuko was leaning against a large rock with Katara once again sitting on his lap as she began to doze off. He once again scanned his surroundings and cursed inwardly when he found that another group of men had been posted to keep watch over them. If only he had his firebending, he would be able to create a wall of flames that would buy them enough time to make an escape into the thick forest.

He was brought out of his thoughts as his attention was caught when Jianguo stepped out of his tent and walked to the middle of the campsite with his wide chest facing the campfire. The loud commotion died down as everybody gathered to hear what their leader was going to say.

“As you all already know we are three days away from the Fire Nation colony where the supposed disease had been spreading,” he stated loudly with a large smirk. A few chortles resounded at his words.

“Tomorrow, I will take a few men to scout the area and see what is going on in the village and if any news has reached them to cause them to increase their guard. Once I see that everything is as it should be, we will return here and bring the Fire Lord back to the village.”

A few men sneered at the word Fire Lord and threw Zuko dirty looks.

“Once our demand for our true lord, Ozai, is met we will have our revenge and our fortunes restored!” Jianguo shouted and the rest shouted along with him, raising their fists into the air.

“In the meantime, the rest of you will stay here to make sure the young lord and his waterbender are kept completely safe,” he said mockingly and the men chuckled evilly. “So rest up, for tomorrow will bring our glory!”

More cries rang out as Jianguo moved away from the campfire. His dark eyes fixated on Zuko’s as he made his way to them in a smooth and confident stride. Zuko tensed and he brought Katara closer to his chest. Sensing Zuko’s unease, Katara’s eyes flew open in alarm. She stiffened as she saw Jianguo heading their way with his usual cruel smirk on his lips.

“I just came to warn you that there is no way of escape. If my men catch you trying to run away they have orders to...harm your pretty wench,” he informed Zuko in sadistic glee.

He bent down to their level and patted Katara’s leg. Katara immediately tensed at the unwanted touch and Zuko moved her away from his lap to sit beside him. Jianguo just chuckled before he locked gazes with Katara.

“I will be back in a few days,” he said huskily. “And maybe I will finally see what you have that has attracted the Fire Lord so much.”

Katara glared at him indignantly, though inwardly she was trembling in fear.

“You won’t get away with it,” Zuko growled at him.

“Oh, but I will,” Jianguo answered with a smirk. “And I will be looking forward with relish to the occasion.”

He grinned at Katara as he licked his dry and chapped lips before he stood up and walked away.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Without another word, Jianguo left the campsite the following day in the early hours of dawn, with Chang and most of his men following quickly behind him. The rest, about ten of them, stayed at the camp to wait for their return and watch over their important prisoners. However, as the sun rose higher in the sky, the men forgot the gravity of the situation and began to bring out their liquor and exchange jokes and exaggerated stories of their triumphs and valor.

Though it seemed like their cheerfulness would make them forget their orders, Zuko was displeased to find out that it was not so. A group of three men would occasionally stand guard of them while they taunted them with roasted pieces of meat before they changed places with another group of equally loud men. Zuko was angry to see that Jianguo had been right about there being no way to escape. He was afraid that if they tried, the men will not hesitate to follow Jianguo’s orders to violate Katara, but he was desperate to flee with her for the warning that Chang had given them would not leave his mind and continued to torture him as the days went by.

Katara and Zuko ate the food that was thrown at them and silently ignored the men who made it their entertainment to hurl insults at them. They were relieved when noon approached and the temperature increased almost to the point that the forest felt like it was an oven for the men backed away to sit lazily under the shade of some trees while others splashed water on their faces at the small stream.
Katara eyed them enviously for she longed to feel the clean water on her sweaty and grimy skin.

“Care ta join us fo’ a dip in da wa’er?” Xiao’s husky voice brought them out of their thoughts. “‘Tis a hawt day afta all.”
Katara glared at him as she moved closer to Zuko.

“‘I think not,’ was her cold response.

Xiao shrugged while Feng and Ping snickered behind his back.

“‘Suit yerself then. I just wanted ta be nice and let ya cool off cuz of ‘tis awful wea’er.’”

“I’m sure that’s what was on your mind,” Zuko gritted out sarcastically as he laid an arm around Katara’s shoulders.

Xiao turned to glare at him as he touched his still sore nose before he grinned cruelly. He raised one palm and lit it before he juggled the flame to his other hand.

“So how das it feels ta see da fiyer, but not be able ta bend it?” he taunted sadistically.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at him, but remained silent. Katara glared at the chuckling firebender hatefully as she placed a comforting hand on Zuko’s arm.

“How can you be able to go along with Jianguo?” Katara asked in order to divert Xiao’s attention away from Zuko. “You’re all working for a wrong cause and are harming a lot of people!”

“Wat do we care ‘bout ‘em?” Feng spoke up and spat on the ground. “We ‘ave our own mis’ries ta look afta!”

“Yah! We ‘ave ta look afta ar own int’rests!” Ping piped in.

The three rebels turned their heads behind them when the others began to call for them to join them in a drinking round.

“If ya’ll excuz us,” Xiao said in a fake cordial tone as he gave them a mocking bow, “We’ll be back la’er!”
The trio snickered as they turned to leave. Once they disappeared among their other comrades after taking a few cups of liquor, Katara and Zuko breathed out a small sigh of relief as they leaned back against the tree.

“I can’t believe how cruel and selfish they are!” Katara exclaimed as she turned to look at Zuko with furrowed eyebrows.

Zuko pressed his lips together as he glared at the circle of the men who continued laughing and drinking while occasionally turning to throw sneers at them. He wrapped his arm around Katara and pressed her to his side so she could lean her head on his shoulder.

“They will get what they deserve,” was his quiet response as he gave her a tiny squeeze.

Katara returned his squeeze by pressing her head closer to his hard shoulder, but she did not say anything as she looked away from the merry men to stare at the small stream that she could barely make out from where she was sitting with Zuko.

The sun was a few hours away from setting when the men began to get restless and started to bicker loudly with each other. Zuko and Katara huddled closer together when fists started to fly and curses and insults were thrown around.

Zuko watched as the group that had been standing guard over them rushed over to see what the commotion was about and he felt his hope grow. He discreetly glanced around and was glad to see that nobody was paying any attention to them. This was it. It was time for them to make a run for freedom. He grabbed Katara’s hand and she turned away from frowning at the fighting men to look at him.

Katara opened her mouth to ask what was wrong, but quickly closed it when Zuko pressed his index finger to his lips as a sign to tell her to be quiet. For a moment, Katara remembered the time Zuko had done the same thing back in Ba Sing Se, only that back then his finger had been pressed against the Blue Spirit’s demonic lips. She saw him motioned around them, and with a puzzled expression, she took a moment to examine their surroundings. A smile broke through her face once she realized what Zuko was trying to tell her. Zuko leaned down close to her ear and Katara shivered as his warm breath coasted along her skin.

“It’s not a well thought out plan, but it’s the only thing I got,” Zuko whispered in her ear. “We will try to sneak into the bushes as silently as possible and, once we are a few feet away where they can’t hear us too well, we’ll run like the demons themselves are after us.”

Katara nodded that she understood and smiled at him once he pulled back. Zuko gave her a small nod and once again squeezed her hand. She squeezed it back before she made to rise to her feet. She had taken two steps forward when a silent gasp escaped her as Zuko suddenly pulled on her wrist so fast that she fell back down to the ground. She was about to scowl at him, but she did not get a chance to give him a piece of her mind for Zuko grabbed her around the waist and pulled her back onto his lap. She heard him curse under his breath and she looked around a bit disoriented. To her utter disappointment, she saw that the fight had stopped and the same men from before were returning to their spots.

Zuko pretended to be busy smoothing down Katara’s brown hair when the men gave them suspicious looks. He felt his anxiety grow at the thought that they realized Katara and he were about to escape, but he relaxed slightly when they sat back down a couple of feet away from them. He cursed their luck, for now he was not sure if another chance for escape would present itself.

“Shet up all o’ ya!” a large man, almost the size of a small platypus-bear, bellowed as a few men continued to squabble. “We’re all pissy and ya know why?”

“Yah, cuz we ‘aven’t been wit a woman since fo’eva!” another man shouted and the rest agreed with him with loud hoots.

Katara felt the blood drain from her face and she gasped, burying herself closer to Zuko.

“Those bastards!” Zuko growled angrily as he cradled Katara closer to him. He had a feeling he knew what the men were up to and he knew that Katara was aware since she had begun to tremble.

The group of men exchanged some whistles and more crude remarks before they all turned to stare at the only woman in their mists with devious intent in their eyes. They laughed when she huddled closer to the angry Fire Lord. Everything was quiet, even the rustling of the leaves was not heard, while the men licked their lips in anticipation. Feng was the one to approach first and he smirked when his comrades cheered him on.

Zuko lifted Katara from his lap and they scrambled to their feet to face the non-bender. Zuko protectively pushed Katara to stand behind him as he straightened himself to his full, intimidating height. He was satisfied to find that he dwarfed the non-bender by a full head.
“Keep away from her!” Zuko warned menacingly as his lips curled into a snarl that made his scarred side look more terrifying.

Feng’s stride faltered for a moment before his confidence flared back when the men continued to encourage him on.

“And wat are ya gonna do if I don’t?” he taunted with a large smirk. “I’m gonna enjoy meself wit da wa’erbenda while ya watch wat I do ta ‘er!”

Feng lunged forward with a raised fist in order to knock down his only obstacle to get to the woman, but Zuko easily grabbed the arm aimed at his face and threw his own fist forward to punch Feng’s stomach. The man doubled over and wheezed, but before he could straighten himself out, Zuko grabbed onto the back of his shirt and threw him to the side. The other men cursed and yelled at Feng to stand up and fight back.

“I may not have my firebending, but I can still fight,” Zuko growled as the man groaned on the hard floor. “I will not hesitate to kill anyone who tries to lay a hand on her.”

From her hiding place between Zuko and the tree, Katara peeked up at Zuko’s furious face at the words he uttered and she was convinced that he would keep his vow. She felt a small shiver run down her spine at the darkness in Zuko’s voice. She shifted on her feet anxiously, wishing there was something she could do to help Zuko, something she could do to defend herself. But she depended heavily on her waterbending to fight, so all she could do now was rely on Zuko’s protection, much to her frustration.

Feng hurled a few expletives as he staggered to his feet.

“Oh, shet up!” he yelled at the men who had begun to laugh and jeer at him for being so weak. He turned back to the glaring Fire Lord and smirked. “Why don’t ya prove it?” he shouted.

Katara tensed as Feng sprang at Zuko again. He threw a blow at Zuko’s jaw, but the firebender sidestepped his attack and struck him hard across the face. Feng stumbled back as he held onto his aching jaw. He turned his head to the side and spat out blood, only to cry out in anger when a few teeth flew out of his mouth and landed on the ground.

“I’ll kill ya fer dat!” he screamed as he pulled out his sword from its sheath on his back and swung at him.
“Zuko, watch out!” Katara shrieked in fright when Zuko leapt forward.

Feng sliced downward, but Zuko evaded the pathetic attack and managed to land a few more blows to the angry non-bender’s unprotected side. Feng yelped, but he turned around and slashed at Zuko again. Being a master swordsman, Zuko expected the attack, so he flipped over the non-bender’s head and kicked his back, causing the man to lose his balance and fall to the ground once again. Zuko landed lightly on his feet and quickly took his protective stance in front of the wide-eyed Katara.

“How pathetic,” Zuko commented impassively as he stared down at Feng. “No wonder you were all driven from my colonies with such terrible fighting skills. I’m surprised Jianguo still keeps you around.”

The group of men bristled at the insult while Feng jumped to his feet with an angry growl. He brandished his sword in the air, and with a cry, Feng rushed forward again.

Zuko smirked as he sprang forward to meet him, but his eyes widened in horror when Feng swerved around him and raced toward Katara with his sword raised high and a cruel smirk on his face. Zuko spun around, but he knew he would not make it in time.

“Katara! Move!” he shouted as he watched Feng swing at her.

Katara tore her eyes away from Zuko and gasped when she saw that Feng was coming toward her. She watched as he brought down his sword and she flung herself to the side, but she was not quick enough. A pained cry escaped her as the sword slashed across her stomach before she landed hard on her hands and knees.

A look of horror swept across Zuko’s face as he saw the sword rip Katara’s shirt in a clean, horizontal line before blood started to seep out.

“Katara! No!” he cried out as he raced forward to go to her.

An angry snarl escaped his throat when a few men leapt forward and held him back. He rounded on them with vicious strikes, but the massive man from before grabbed his arms and twisted them behind him until Zuko let out a pained hiss.
Zuko looked up to see Katara clutch her stomach before she raised her bloody hands to her eyes. Her hands began to tremble as she stared at them before she looked away to look at him with wide and shocked eyes. Zuko watched as her small hands dropped to the floor and her face paled before she fell to her side. He remained frozen in shock at the sight of Katara’s blue shirt turning a dark crimson while her blood pooled onto the ground beneath her. He heard the men laugh cruelly around him and he watched as Feng approached Katara and poked her leg with his foot.

“Ta bad we didn’t git ta enjoy ‘er,” Feng lamented before he laughed with the rest as he moved to joined them.

Something in Zuko snapped as he watched the manner in which they were disrespecting the woman he loved while she lay in pain, bleeding on the forest floor. His blood started to pound in his ears as his rage rose to dangerous levels. He could feel his fury boiling inside him until it began to grow into an intense inferno.

I will make them pay! I will make their blood run for daring to spill Katara’s! Zuko thundered in his head as the heat festered inside to the point that he saw red. The air around him began to grow extremely hot as steam began to rise from his body and swirled around his trembling form in a smoldering heat.

With an enraged roar, Zuko threw his head back and spewed a column of white fire from his mouth while the stone manacles encircling his wrists shattered and flew in every direction.

The unexpected burst of flame caught the large man holding him back right on the face. The man released him and he let out a scream of agony as his whole body caught on fire. The men scattered away as he ran towards them in search of help, but he crashed into a tree in his frantic search. He was dead before a firebender finally went to him to extinguish the fire.

The stunned men turned back toward the infuriated Fire Lord crouching protectively over the injured woman with blazing hands alight with white fire—the hottest part of a flame. He was panting heavily as he glared at them all with such malevolence that it made the hairs on the back of their necks stand on end.

“Git ‘im!” Xiao shouted and the nine remaining rushed forward to avenge their fallen comrade.

Zuko moved away from Katara and swiftly met them halfway. Katara watched from the ground as Zuko spun in the air, and with a fiery kick, he was able to slash the first two men that advanced on him. The white arc of flame that erupted from his kick seared through clothes, flesh, and bones as if they were made of butter. The two men screamed in torment while blood and intestines spurted everywhere, staining the grass and the trees before the men lifelessly fell to the ground. Zuko uncaringly stepped over them as he then threw a large blast of white fire that consumed two more men instantly. Their charred corpses dropped to the floor like burning stones.

A sword was thrust to his chest, but Zuko flipped backwards, kicking the rusty sword out of a small man’s hands. The sword scattered to the floor and slid a few feet away, but before the stout man could scramble after it, Zuko wrapped his arm around his neck and twisted. A loud crack was heard before Zuko dropped the dead man unceremoniously to the hard ground.

A large rock struck him from the back and sent him crashing to the floor, but Zuko swiftly regained his feet and ignored the pain in his blinding rage. He turned to face the earthbender who had attacked him and he growled when he recognized Ping positioned in a horse stance a few feet away. Remembering the revolting comments Ping had also thrown at Katara, Zuko felt his fury flare to an almost unbearable level. With a snarl, Zuko spun around and a large tendril of white fire encircled him before he lashed it out toward Ping. The earthbender summoned a stone wall before him to block the attack, but the fire blast broke through the wall and struck Ping on his chest, hurling him through the air until he crashed into a tree.

Xiao and another firebender stepped forward and began to run around Zuko while shooting fire from their hands. Through her intense pain, Katara gasped in fear as Zuko disappeared inside a tornado of fire and she felt her eyes sting with tears, but a white explosion of fire dispelled the orange flames and engulfed the two men. Their screams rang into the dark forest as their flesh melted from their bodies and their blood burst from their veins, their unrecognizable forms falling to the floor in black heaps of charred carcasses.

Clutching her bleeding stomach and whimpering in pain, Katara watched as Zuko emerged from the fire with an enraged snarl still in place, staring down at the two dead men with fire still burning in his hands. She had seen Zuko fight many times before, but she had never seen him be so ruthless. The horror in her stare was mixed with admiration.

Being the last one standing, Feng gulped when the furious Fire Lord leveled his livid gaze on him. With a loud cry, Feng raced at him in an attempt to kill with his sword raised high in the air. He swung it horizontally, but Zuko crouched to the ground, and with a spin, kicked Feng’s legs right from under him. Feng cried out as he tumbled down.

Before the man could stand up, Zuko sprang at him, snatched the sword from his hands, and grabbed him by the neck. Zuko lifted the shorter man up by the throat and snarled in his face. Feng coughed and wheezed as the hand tightened around his throat and blocked his air supply. He clawed at Zuko’s hands, but Zuko held firm.
“Don’t kill meh! ‘Ave mercy on meh, please!” Feng pleaded in a choked gasp.

“You should have thought of that before harming what is mine!” Zuko growled at him. “None of you deserve any mercy from me!”

Zuko raised the sword with his left hand, and without a second thought, plunged it right through Feng’s stomach. Feng cried out before he let out a loud scream when the sword was twisted until it broke right through his back. Blood spilled from his mouth and a gurgling sound escaped his lips before Zuko dropped him to the floor where his blood continued to flow and his eyes glazed over in death. Zuko did not pay any attention to this, however, as he raced toward Ping who was trying to lift himself from the floor.

Ping cried out as he was pinned to the ground with his face to the dirt. He was lifted harshly from the ground and dragged a few paces to where the waterbender lay in pain. Ping was about to lift his hands to bend, but he tensed when he felt a sharp metal at the back of his neck.

“Release the stone bracelets around Katara’s wrists, now!” Zuko ordered harshly.

The earthbender nodded vigorously before he flicked his wrists and the stone cuffs around Katara’s wrists fell to the ground. With the hilt of the sword, Zuko drew a harsh blow at Ping’s head, rendering him unconscious. Zuko threw the sword away and dashed to Katara’s side, dropping himself heavily on his knees beside her.

His rage lowered down into a simmer as his worry and anxiety grew as his eyes landed on Katara’s silent form. Her once tanned skin was pallid, her cobalt eyes were closed with a few remaining tears gathered on her dark lashes, her now colorless lips were slightly parted, and the lower half of her blue shirt was drenched in her blood.

Zuko felt his breathing quicken and his heart pounding fast in his chest as panic and dread spread through his body. He reached a trembling hand to her cheek as fear seized his heart.

“Katara?” he called out softly as he caressed her skin. “Katara? Please…say something.”

He felt instant relief and he sighed heavily when Katara fluttered her eyes open and gave him a shaky smile when she saw him, which then turned into a grimace as the pain increased. A whimper escaped her and a few more tears ran down her face, leaving a trail down her cheeks.
“Katara!” Zuko exclaimed in alarm as he pressed his hand against her stomach in an attempt to stanch the flow of blood. “Please hold on! I’ll get you to water!”

He pressed her hands to her bleeding abdomen and told her to keep them there. Zuko gingerly picked her up, but froze when she let out loud whimper of pain.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry,” Zuko chanted against her hair. “I need to get you to the stream so you can heal yourself.”

Katara moaned in pain, but nodded that she understood. Zuko secured his hold on her and quickly made his way away from the bloody scene and to the clean stream. He cringed when he felt her blood run down his arms. He swiftly and carefully made his way until he finally arrived at the edge of the calm brook. Without any hesitation, Zuko strode into the water, but the stream was small and shallow, so he had to sit on the smooth stones at the bottom. He shivered slightly when the chilly water touched him, but he ignored the discomfort as he placed Katara on his lap so that the water could reach her. The water around them instantly turned red before pink ribbons of blood floated down the current.

Zuko looked back down at Katara and his fear once again surfaced when he saw that her eyes were closed. He gently patted her cheek to get her to open her eyes again.

“Katara?” he said softly as he tried to keep his anguish under control. “We’re in the stream. You can heal yourself now.”

Katara heard what he said even though she knew they were in water. Once her bending was restored she could feel her element call out to her, but she was so tired…so sleepy.

“Come on, Katara!” Zuko called out a bit more loudly. He gathered water into one of his hands and let it trickle down her face to encourage her, but Katara did not stir.

“Katara, heal your wound!” he said forcefully.

Katara opened her eyes to look at him. She heard the desperation in his deep voice and saw the anxiety on his face, and it pained her to cause him such concern, knowing that it will cause him sorrow when she left him. She knew she had lost too much blood, she could feel herself weakening, her life slipping away. A small part of her wondered if perhaps she would be able to be reunited with her mother.

She heard Zuko call out to her again, but his voice sounded so far away and she could barely keep her eyes open to stare into the face of the man she had come to love. It saddened her to know that she never had the chance to confess to him what he really meant to her, how much she loved him. She reached a trembling hand to cup his cheek, feeling the light stubble tickle her fingers, and she gave him another small smile.

Zuko grabbed her small hand and leaned into her touch, pressing her hand closer to his cheek.

“Start healing yourself, Katara! Please!” he pleaded desperately.

He saw her smile at him once more before she closed her beautiful, sapphire eyes and let out a soft sigh. Her hand slipped from his grasp, her head lolled to the side, and her breathing halted. Zuko’s breath hitched in his throat and he felt his heart stopped cold in his chest.

“Katara? Katara!” Zuko cried out in horror as he grasped onto her hand again.

_No, no, no, no!_

He pressed his ear to her mouth, but he did not feel her sweet breath coasting over his skin. He then pressed his ear to her chest, but he could not hear the beating of her heart.

“No!” he shouted as he clutched her body to him. “Katara, wake up! Don’t you dare die on me!”

Zuko pulled back and smoothed Katara’s hair out of her serene face as he waited for her to respond, but when she didn’t, he crushed her limp body to his once again as he began to rock back and forth in his anguish. Tears fell down unchecked from his good right eye and landed on her skin as Zuko buried his head on her neck.

Sobs threatened to fight their way out from the back of his dry throat, scorching him raw and leaving him gasping. He reared his head back.

“Katara!” he screamed into the night as he continued to hold onto her limp body.
A distressed, choking sound fell from his lips. A desperate sound that surfaced from his very soul as he struggled to realize it all. All that he had lost, all that he would never gain, and all that he would never have.

Tears still running down his face, Zuko cried quietly against her neck as he continued to hold Katara’s cold body close to his own.

“Katara, don’t leave me,” he whispered despairingly in her ear, “I can’t live without you! I don’t want to live without you! Please, come back to me…”

Gasping brokenly, he pressed his lips against her skin.

“Katara… I love you.”

End of Part Three Heartfelt Confessions

The half-moon was high in the sky, but its glow seemed to be dimmer than usual. Nothing stirred and not a sound was heard throughout the entire dark forest, not even the buzz of an insect or the call of a night bird. Tears continued to fall from the distraught Fire Lord’s golden eye as he clutched the unresponsive body of the woman he loved close to him. Quiet sobs fell from his lips and his body shook as he cried out for his loss.

“Katara, don’t leave me,” Zuko breathed desperately in her ear. “I love you too much to let you go.”

When he did not receive a response, Zuko buried his face in Katara’s hair as he tried to muffle his cry of excruciating anguish. What was he going to do now? With Katara gone, he did not know if he could continue living. She was the one who gave meaning to his empty and lonely existence. He looked forward to her kindness, her laughter, her presence, and even her stubbornness and temper. Katara was the woman he wanted to be at his side for the rest of his life; she was the only woman that had captured and held his heart.

But now…she was dead.

Gone.

How was he supposed to move on when he never got the chance to tell her what he truly felt for her, what she truly meant to him?

Zuko pulled back slightly to plant a gentle kiss on Katara’s cold forehead while his tears continued to run unchecked down his face, landing on Katara’s colorless cheeks. Anger combined with his sorrow and the young man reared his head back as he glared at the dark sky above.

“It was not yet her time!” he roared angrily. “She didn’t deserve to die! You can’t take her! You can’t take her away from me!”

He growled when he was met with deafening silence, but his quick bout of fury dissolved, and in its place, agonizing grief consumed him. So great, it was unbearably painful. He once again buried his face in Katara’s tresses as quiet sobs escaped from deep within his throat.

Why? Why were the gods doing this to him? Right when it seemed like his miserable life was seeing some light, right when it seemed like he could finally find some sort of happiness, they decided to rip it away from him before he could actually grasp it, before he could enjoy it.

“Please,” Zuko whispered distraughtly, “Bring her back to me.”

After a few more painful and silent minutes, Zuko pulled back slightly to stare down at Katara’s closed eyes with a desperate expression on his sorrowful face.

“Katara, don’t leave me! Please…come back to me,” he whispered brokenly. “I love you…”

His voice trailed off and he froze. His eyes widened when he noticed that the tiny droplets of water on the skin of Katara’s face, made up from the liquid of the small stream and his tears, began to glow in a bright bluish-green light. He looked down at the water that came up to his lap, and where Katara’s middle was submerged in, and he noticed that around them the water was glowing with that strange radiance. Zuko pulled Katara’s cold body protectively to his chest; his grieving mind could not comprehend what was happening.

“Zuko?” a soft voice called out to him.

The Fire Lord held his breath as the sweet sound reached his ears, the sound of Katara’s lovely voice caressing his troubled soul, and his heart pounded hard in his chest with hope. But a small part of him was afraid that it was just his imagination and that she was still cold and dead in his arms. He knew that if he saw her lifeless face again, he would not be able to take it.

“Zuko? What’s wrong?” the soft voice said again.

Unable to resist any longer, Zuko pulled back a bit and looked down. An inaudible gasp escaped him as his eyes beheld Katara’s bright-blue orbs staring up at him in concern.

“K-Katara?” he whispered in shock before he cried out, “Katara!”

He crushed her small body to his chest and held her there for a long moment. A few more tears trickled down from his good eye as he heard her soft breathing, her heart beating, and felt her small hands circle around him.
“You’re alive, you’re alive!” he chanted softly into her hair. “Thank Agni, you’re alive.”

He did not know how or what happened; all he knew was that Katara was again alive in his arms. He felt like his breath was once again restored to him, like his life was bright once again.

Katara frowned slightly at his words. Did she…die? That thought caused an unpleasant shiver to run through her, but her attention was caught by something much more shocking.

She felt something wet fall on her neck where Zuko had placed his face and it astounded her to realize that Zuko was crying. He was not sobbing uncontrollably or weeping loudly, but she knew he was crying by the slight shaking of his body. Even rarer than hearing the young Fire Lord laugh was to witness Zuko lower his impassive mask and cry. It touched her heart to know her death affected Zuko so much, but she did not like the fact that it caused him so much grief.

Katara felt him pull away after a few more moments of silence and she looked up to see his face. A gasp fell from her lips as she saw that Zuko’s golden eyes were wet and slightly red and she felt her heart go out to him. She smiled slightly when Zuko cleared his throat self-consciously and hastily wiped at his eyes.

“How do you feel?” Zuko asked in a concerned tone as he laid her back on his arm so he could take a look at her bloody shirt.

Katara looked down at her shirt as well and grimaced when she saw that it was ruined before she paled at the realization that she had lost so much blood, evident by the amount that was staining the blue clothing. Before she could open her mouth to tell him she felt fine, just tired, Zuko reached down and pulled the bottom of the shirt over her stomach.

“What are you doing?” Katara squeaked as she tried to push her shirt back down, but the awed look on Zuko’s face made her stop.

“Not even a thin scar,” Zuko breathed as he stared down at Katara’s lean stomach where instead of an open wound, his eyes met smooth and healed skin. He gently touched her soft flesh with his fingers.

Katara felt her blood rush to her cheeks and a shiver ran down her spine, only this time it was pleasant as Zuko’s warm fingers pressed her stomach, as if to make sure that the wound was completely gone. Finally realizing what he was doing, Zuko paused and pulled his hand away, covering her stomach once again as he returned his gaze to her face—which was bright red—and cleared his throat a second time.

“How do you feel, Katara?” Zuko asked again after he realized that she had not answered his question and he brushed her hair out of her face.

Katara snapped out of her thoughts and she gave him a small smile.

“I’m fine. It seems like I managed to heal the wound, though I still don’t know how that happened. I feel tired and weak, but that’s because of all the blood I lost.”

Zuko closed his eyes tightly as the image of Katara bleeding on the forest floor flashed before him. For as long as he lived, he would never be able to get rid of that horrible picture of Katara bleeding to death or forget the pain he felt when she had died in his arms. Even though Katara was talking to him at the moment, fragile but alive, he was positive that she had died. Although the mystery of how she survived still perplexed him, he was grateful that she was back with him.

“I’m so sleepy,” Katara murmured as her eyes drooped while she gave out a soft yawn.

“First we need to find a place to rest somewhere far from Jianguo’s camp,” Zuko told her softly as he looked down at her weary face. “Once we are a safe distance away, you can sleep all you want.”

Zuko carefully stood up from his spot in the cold water with Katara still in his arms and he quickly made his way to the grassy edge of the shallow stream. Now that his senses had come back to him, he was anxious to put some distance between them, the bloody camp and Jianguo. He knew that if they were caught, they would not be shown any mercy; not after he had unremorsefully killed almost ten of Jianguo’s men. Perhaps the fact that he had ruthlessly killed those men should have repulsed or frightened him, but honestly, he felt nothing but satisfaction. He had enacted revenge on Katara’s part and now those men could no longer harm anyone else. Zuko felt elation at the thought of Jianguo’s shock once he realized what had happened when he met with the charred corpses of his men.

Let him see what I’m capable of when they hurt what is mine, Zuko hissed darkly in his head as his hold on the woman in his arms tightened. I want him to realize that I won’t be merciful if we cross paths again.

“Zuko, what’s wrong?” Katara’s soft voice broke through his sinister thoughts.
The young Fire Lord blinked and looked down at the worried expression on the waterbender’s face. He realized that he had not moved and was still standing near the stream, his boots and pants dripping water on the ground. Shaking his head, Zuko gave her a small smile to reassure her.

“It’s nothing,” he told her.

Wishing to change his dark thoughts, he said, “I think it would be better if I carried you on my back. That way we could travel faster and for much longer.”

“Okay,” Katara agreed with a small nod, though she had a feeling that he was hiding something from her.

Zuko placed her on her feet, but quickly reached out to steady her when she swayed. She gave him a grateful smile, which he instantly returned. Once he made sure she would not collapse, Zuko turned around and bent down, offering his back to her. Katara hesitated for a moment, but she eventually moved forward and climbed onto Zuko’s strong back, wrapping her arms around his neck to steady herself when he stood up and shifted her.

A silent gasp escaped her and she blushed deeply when she felt Zuko’s warm hands grab the back of her thighs, almost below her rear. She found herself wondering what it would feel like to have Zuko’s large hands on her bottom before she chastised herself for such a thought, especially with the dire situation they were in. Ignoring the thought for now, Katara wrapped her legs around him so she would not fall and so he could have a secure hold of her.

Zuko felt his face heat up as he felt Katara’s arms around his neck, her breasts pressed to his back, and her thighs wrapped around him. He would have preferred her to have been wrapped around him from the front instead…

Now is not the time for such things, Zuko chastised himself with a mental shake of his head.

“Hold on,” he told her quietly before he started to walk.

He hummed inwardly when he noticed that the ache on his side where his rib had been fractured no longer bothered him and he knew that somehow the glowing water had healed him as well. He found it interesting that he had not thought about his injury when he had fought the men in order to protect Katara.
The tall trees with their thick leaves blocked whatever light the moon would have provided and the forest floor was dark with unmoving shadows. Zuko picked his way through the darkness as he followed along the quiet stream, carefully scanning the ground to make sure nothing was in his path to cause him to stumble and drop Katara. He tried to go as fast as he could without jostling her too much, but he was more concerned with finding a safe place far away from the rebel’s camp. Once they found it, he would make sure Katara got all the rest she needed. The only good thing that came out from his fright of Katara’s near death was that it made him alert and it gave him an energy boost as he trudged along the uneven ground in the middle of the night. Luckily, Katara was small and did not weigh that much.

The hot temperature from the day had plummeted to a freezing chill when night settled in and they shivered when a cool breeze passed them by and stuck their wet clothes to their skin. Katara lifted a shaky hand and managed to bend the liquid from their clothing before she dropped her head onto Zuko’s shoulder with a tired groan. She felt happy to finally be able to waterbend, but at the moment she felt lightheaded and barely had enough energy to keep her hold on Zuko’s neck. The longer they walked, the harder it was for her to keep her eyes open, especially since Zuko’s warmth and his steady strides were soothing her to fall into welcome rest. She felt terrible that while she was hitching a ride on Zuko’s back and dozing off, he was doing all the walking.

Zuko did not know how long he had walked through the night, but he knew they needed to find shelter so they could rest. He could feel Katara fighting to stay awake. Her head would fall to his shoulder before she would jerk her head up and shake it.

“You can sleep while I carry you, Katara,” Zuko told her softly as he turned his head slightly to look at her when she had again quickly lifted her head from his shoulder when she had dozed off momentarily.

“No,” Katara murmured as she shook her head to clear the sleepiness from her mind. “I won’t let you walk alone in the dark.”

Zuko gave her an exasperated sigh, though deep down he was glad she remained awake. It still frightened him whenever she would close her eyes, as he feared that it would be the last time she would open them again. He was about to tell her that it was fine when his foot stepped on a thin, dried branch, causing a loud snapping sound to resound throughout the eerily silent forest. He jumped and Katara shrieked when a large moose-deer sprang directly into their path from a cluster of bushes at their left before it dashed away in the opposite direction and into thick foliage.

Zuko sighed and Katara breathed out heavily before the firebender took another step to continue walking. He paused mid-step when clanking sounds reached their ears before the same moose-deer emerged from where it disappeared, looked at them with large fearful eyes, before it crossed the small stream and sprinted away.

“What in the world is wrong with that moose-deer?” Katara yawned as she laid her chin on Zuko’s shoulder.

“Hm,” Zuko uttered distractedly as he stared at the dark foliage the animal had at first run into.

Why did it return when it was obvious the animal was frightened of them? Either there was something more dangerous in that direction or there was no form of escape so it had to return to where it first came from. Curious, Zuko tightened his hold on Katara as he followed the moose-deer’s hoof prints from the small amount of moonlight that found its way through the trees. They passed through thick bushes and other undergrowth until they came upon a dark cave opening. It was hidden so well that Zuko would not have noticed it had the moose-deer not left tracks directly to it.

Not hearing anything that indicated there was something living inside, Zuko carefully stepped through the curtain of flora until they stood inside the dry and dark cave. Breathing a small stream of fire between his lips, Zuko saw that the cave was indeed uninhabited and it was small enough to fit half a dozen people. It was the perfect place for them to rest without Jianguo and his men finding them.

“Are we resting here?” Katara asked quietly as she lifted a hand to rub her tired eyes.

“Yes,” Zuko responded.

He slid Katara gently off his back while he kept a hand on her arm to keep her from falling to the ground. He lit a small flame on his other palm as he anxiously looked at Katara’s face to make sure she was fine. Katara blinked at the sudden light and she looked around the small cavern before she looked back at Zuko.

“We are safe for the moment. You can sleep now,” Zuko told her softly.

Katara was unable to curb her loud yawn and smiled sheepishly at him when his eyes lit up in amusement. She dropped herself to the hard ground with a sigh. She wished that they at least had a few blankets since it was chilly, but she wasn’t going to complain. The tired waterbender looked up at Zuko and she watched as he peeked through the curtain of plants.
“Zuko?” she called out softly.

Zuko moved away from the entrance of the cave and quickly made his way to her. He knelt beside her with a worried frown, reaching a hand out to touch her forehead.

“What is it?” he asked as his eyes flickered to her face while the flame in his other hand flared a bit.

“You need to sleep too,” Katara told him. “You practically walked the whole night!”

The young man gave her a small smile as he sat down cross-legged beside her.

“I will, don’t worry,” Zuko replied with a nod. “Now rest. I will be here.”

Katara smiled at him before she reached for his hand. Zuko felt his heart skip a beat at her touch and he squeezed her hand to reassure her. He watched as she let out a soft sigh before she closed her eyes. He felt his fear resurface once her blue eyes closed, but he relaxed when he noticed her soft breathing as she fell asleep.

The hour was late as Zuko kept watch over her, gazing at her sleeping face. He would occasionally reach out to brush his fingers over her cheek or through her hair, to reassure himself that she was indeed fine. He grabbed her small hand with his unoccupied one and brought it to his lips, pressing a soft kiss to her warm skin. Warm, not cold, as it had been moments before she came back from Death’s icy grasp.

The flame in his palm flared for a second and Zuko’s attention shifted to the red fire he had summoned to provide some light. Flashes of blood, rage, and white fire surfaced in his mind and Zuko raised an eyebrow as he stared at the innocent flame in his palm. He wondered if he would be able to summon the white fire whenever he wanted or if it had just been a once in a lifetime thing. Zuko stared intensely at the red flame in his palm as he tried to change it to the hot white fire that he had bent a few hours ago.

The flame flickered but there was no change in its color or temperature. Zuko growled under his breath as he summoned all his will into the small flame in his hand. He was about to give up when the red flame flared and expanded before it turned blue and then white. Zuko smirked in satisfaction as he extinguished the flame on his left hand only to summon the white fire into his right palm. He could not wait to tell his uncle.
He had only heard of a few firebenders capable of bending extreme temperatures of fire, like Azula with her blue flames. Bending blue fire was almost like second nature to her, and despite how much training he went through, Zuko was never capable of achieving such a skill. Not only was Azula able to summon blue fire, but she could also bend lightning just like their father. Because of this, she was always the favored one while he was lucky to even get a small compliment from their sire. Bending white fire, however, was particularly rare and something even Azula was unable to accomplish. And here he was capable of such a feat.

Now his inner fire had strengthened. He was able to bend white fire because of the fury and fear he had felt when Katara had been injured. He had bent the white fire as if he had been doing it all his life, and with it, he killed all those bastards who tried to touch her. Zuko felt his anger rise and the white flame flared higher with his wrath before he took a deep breath to calm himself down. Even though he did not feel any remorse for getting rid of those men, he was a bit afraid that Katara would think him a ruthless monster.

No, Katara would never see me like that, Zuko thought with a shake of his head.

He looked away from staring at the flame and gazed down at Katara’s sleeping face. It was because of this amazing woman that many things had changed in him and for the better. But it was also because of her that he had experienced fear like no other.

Nothing could compare to the anguish he felt when Katara had almost left the living world, not even the pain dealt by his cruel father, the loss of his mother, and the hatred of his sister. Never in his life had he been so afraid, never had he felt so much sorrow and pain at the thought of losing someone, at the thought of never seeing the woman he loved ever again.

Zuko clenched his eyes tightly shut as he remembered the way her small body had gone limp in his arms and her breathing stopped. It felt like his own soul had been painfully wrenched out of his own body. He never wanted to go through such an experience ever again, for he would not be able to bear it. How could he go through life without her? The mere thought of losing her again chilled his heart and set his fear soaring.

Opening his eyes with a deep sigh, Zuko looked back down to Katara’s lovely face. He frowned when he noticed that her skin was still a bit pale and he made a mental note to look for food in the morning, since she had not eaten well and had lost a lot of blood. Zuko reached a hand to caress her soft cheek and smiled when Katara leaned into his touch.

He wondered what had happened since he was positive that Katara had died in his arms. Had the gods somehow listened to his prayers, took pity on his misery, and brought Katara back to him? It did not matter, and he would not question the will of the gods, for now that she was once again alive, he would not allow her to leave him ever again. He did not know if she had heard his confessing his love for her, but he reasoned that maybe she had not since she had not mentioned it. But now that he realized how short and fragile life really was, he would try, with everything in his power, to keep her at his side. He will tell her how much she meant to him.

With one last caress to Katara’s face, Zuko extinguished the now red flame in his palm and lay down beside her with a tired sigh. He wrapped his arm around her and smiled gently when Katara sighed and unconsciously snuggled closer to him. With the sound of Katara’s soft breathing in his ear, Zuko closed his eyes and allowed sleep to claim him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The sound of chirping birds brought Katara out of her deep slumber. She groggily opened her eyes and her hazy mind registered a dark wall. She frowned, a bit disoriented as she let her eyes wander around what appeared to be a small cave with a small campfire in the center. Where was she? How did she get here?

Katara closed her eyes as her head began to spin and she groaned at the dizziness it caused her before brief images of pain, blood, and death bombarded her mind. She remembered how Feng tried to force himself on her and how Zuko stood up to defend her, leading to the two of them to begin fighting. And once he realized he was no match for Zuko, Feng had directed his attack toward her and wounded her. There had been so much blood as she fell to the ground in pain and Zuko turned to look at her with horror written across his face.

Then his horror turned to rage and he let out his fury by killing every single man that crossed his path with an inferno of white flames. Another shiver of fear mixed with fascination ran down her spine.
Zuko had ended their lives without any hesitation or regret of his actions nor guilt on his face. He had been so frightening, so deadly, so…unmerciful. Though she herself had not killed anyone—at least not intentionally or that she knew of—she knew that it was not the same for others thanks to the hundred year war. She really could not blame him, though, especially since he was trying to save her.

The young woman opened her eyes and sat up with a groan, looking down at her bloody shirt with the help of the small amount of light from the fire. She reached a hand to her stomach and let out a relieved breath to find out that she was indeed healed. She remembered Zuko carrying her to the stream where he cradled her on his lap, where he pleaded her to heal herself…where he actually cried for her.

Feeling longing warmth in her heart, Katara struggled to her feet and leaned against the wall of the cave to steady herself when her legs threatened to give out on her. She felt utterly weak and helpless, but she had this strong wish to see Zuko, to hear his voice, and touch his face.

“Zuko?” she called out softly. “Zuko? Where are you?”
She squinted in the semi-darkness, it was a bit hard to see even by the low burning fire and the small rays of light that managed to pass through the thick foliage at the entrance of the cave. She frowned when she realized that he was not there. A cold emptiness filled her being as she realized that she was alone and a few tears threatened to fall from her eyes. A small sob escaped her as she wondered why Zuko had left her. Had he decided to leave her in the cave so she would not be a burden to him and so he could find some help faster, without having to wait for her?

She let out another sob before she slid down the wall and landed on the hard ground with a few tears falling from her eyes. She brought her knees close to her chest and wrapped her arms around them while she cried silently. Where was Zuko? Why was he not there? Katara buried her face on her knees and took a few calming breaths.

What am I thinking? Zuko wouldn’t abandon me! Katara reassured herself. That just wouldn’t be like him.

After a few more deep breaths, Katara sniffled and let out a long sigh. It was just waking up all alone and feeling weak that had caused her to react in such a way and feel so insecure. She raised her head and hastily wiped her cheeks, but paused when something on the ground next to her caught her eye. She leaned down and saw that it was some kind of writing, dark since the characters seemed to have been burned on the ground. Her eyes widened when she recognized Zuko’s neat writing. Excitement and dread filled her as she squinted to make out what the short message said.

I left you some fruit. Please wait and don’t worry. I’ll be back soon.

Zuko

Katara let out a relieved breath and she leaned against the wall again when her head started to pound when she tried to make out the words in the semi-dark cavern she was in. She looked about the small cave more carefully, and sure enough, she spotted a small pile of fruit a few feet away from her. Katara scooted over to her small meal since she could not find the strength in her to stand up and walk. She huffed tiredly once she reached it. She grabbed an apple and happily bit into it when her stomach began to bother her.

After eating the apple, a few berries, and a peach, the dizziness began to fade little by little and she began to feel a bit more strength come back to her. She knew she needed to eat more food, such as meat, and wait a few more days if not hours before she could go back to normal after losing so much blood. Katara slowly lifted herself up and leaned against the cold wall as she made her way to the entrance. She could see the sun’s rays through the small openings of the foliage, but she dared not venture out in case Jianguo’s men were searching for them. She wondered where Zuko had gone and she prayed that he was safe.

With a tired sigh, Katara sat down against the wall and decided to wait for Zuko’s return. She still could not believe that they had escaped Jianguo’s clutches and she hoped that they would not be caught before they went in search of help. She wondered if Iroh was looking for them and she worried at the thought that her family had received the news that they had been captured.

Katara closed her eyes as a more nagging thought entered her head.

Did I really…die?

Again, the thought caused an unpleasant shiver to run down her back. Now that her head was clearer and she was more alert, Katara tried to think back on what had happened the previous night, to see if what Zuko said was true.

She remembered being cradled in Zuko’s arms as an overwhelming sense of sleep and fatigue engulfed her. She remembered Zuko pleading with her to heal her wounds and she remembered the fear and anxiety in his golden eyes as he stared down at her. That sight had almost broken her heart, but she had been so tired. The last thing she remembered was touching his cheek while regretting that she would never have the chance to tell him how much she loved him. But what happened after?

Katara’s brow furrowed as she tried to figure out what had occurred during the time Zuko had said she had died. Her head started to pound as she strained herself to remember something, anything. Many would rather avoid the thought of their near death experience, but she wanted to know why, if she had died, she had come back to the living world.

Suddenly it felt like a part of her mind had cleared, like the sun breaking through the fog, and she could see clearly. She had felt like her soul had left her body as she stared up at Zuko’s eyes before everything went black. Darkness was the only thing she was able see for a moment before a dim light appeared before her. She had begun to make her way towards it, but something had stopped her.

That something was Zuko’s voice calling to her, she had turned her back toward the light at the anguish in his voice and all she wanted to do was soothe his pain away. But there was something…Something he said specifically that had pulled her back…But what was it?

Katara, don’t leave me! Please…come back to me…I love you…’
Katara’s eyes flew wide open and she gasped. She felt her heart flutter in her chest and she grasped her shirt above her heart. Did Zuko really say such a thing? Did Zuko really say he loved her? Or perhaps it was just her wishful thinking, wanting to think that he loved her as she entered the Spirit World? She needed to ask him. She needed to hear him say it. But what if he denied it? She would not be able to bear it.

No. She had to stop being a coward and face things head on even if it caused her pain. Perhaps once she heard him say that he did not love her in a romantic way, she would be able to accept it and move on. Of course, she would never stop loving him, she would long for him until the end of her days.

Katara once again looked at the green flora that hid her view from the outside world. She knew she needed to confront him once he returned, but…would she really be able to?

The day was coming to a close, the birds were no longer singing, and the fruit was now gone. The small shafts of light that penetrated the foliage had long since vanished and the small fire she had been able to keep alive—with a few logs Zuko must have left—was burning low, but he still had not returned. Katara bit her lip and began to wring her hands together as she continued to wait near the entrance of the cave. Patience had turn to worry and that worry had now turned to anxiety and fear as she stared at the dark green curtain intently. She worried at the thought that perhaps something happened to Zuko to make him be absent for almost a whole day. What if he had been attacked by a wild animal, or worse, what if Jianguo had captured him again?

She had just decided to venture out in search of Zuko when a twig snapped somewhere outside. Katara stiffened, her muscles tensing as she prepared to take flight if it was something that wished her harm. She heard a couple of soft footsteps and she quietly stood up from her spot, retreating slowly to the shadows at the back of the cave. She held her breath and her heart began to pound as the flora curtain was pulled to the side and a tall figure stepped inside. Katara relaxed from the defensive stance she had moved into when she noticed that it was Zuko with a few things in his arms. She felt her heart leap in both joy and apprehensiveness, but the reassuring sight of him made her quickly make her way over to him.

Zuko sighed as he placed the things he was carrying down onto the ground before he straightened and looked expectedly about the cavern for the young waterbender. He felt his heart beat easier and his worry lessen as he spotted Katara swiftly making her way to him, but before he could open his mouth to greet her, he found himself being embraced tightly by her slender arms while she buried her face in his chest. Zuko stood frozen in surprise at the sudden affectionate act, but he quickly composed himself and returned her embrace, wrapping his arms around her back. He buried his own face in her hair and inhaled her scent in order to soothe away the fear and worry that had still not left him.
“I was afraid something happened to you when you didn’t return,” Katara whispered as she closed her eyes to relish in his warmth.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t think I was going to take so long to come back to you,” Zuko replied just as softly as he ran soothing circles on her back. “I went to check on the camp and see if anything had happened since…we left. I got some supplies we will need in our search for a nearby village and I also grabbed a sword…just in case.”

He paused for a moment to wonder why Katara had not moved away from him and continued to wrap her arms tightly around him, since whenever they had previously embraced it had been brief and she would quickly pull away. Though he was sure not complaining, quite the contrary, he was enjoying it very much. He cleared his throat to continue.

“While I looked around the camp…” he began again and decided to skip the parts where he had stepped uncaringly over the dead corpses strewn around the bloody, forest floor, “I realized that Ping was not where he had been last.”

He pulled back slightly and stared down at Katara when she looked up at him.

“I think he woke up and I have a feeling he has gone in search of Jianguo. We need to keep moving and reach a village and find some way to contact Uncle before Ping reaches Jianguo and they come upon us again.”

Katara felt a bit disappointed at his choice of topic, but what did she expect? For him to run into the cave, grasp her hands, and confess his undying love for her? How foolish.

“Yeah, I think that’d be best. Hopefully we find Uncle Iroh before Jianguo is able to do something to advance in his plans,” Katara said quietly.

She gave him a small smile as she moved away and started to turn away from him, but Zuko grabbed hold of her wrist and she looked back at him with a raised eyebrow. She watched as he inhaled deeply while his golden eyes stared into her blue ones with such intensity that it made a small tremor run down her spine.

“Zuko…?” she asked curiously.
“Katara, I…” Zuko began as he gently tugged at her wrist so she could turn to fully face him.

Once she was standing before him, Zuko ran a hand softly down her cheek as he continued to hold her wide gaze. He needed to tell her. He needed her to understand the pain he had gone through.

“Last night in the stream when you had…” he cleared his throat when it seemed it had closed on him at the remembrance, “when you had…died in my arms…I felt so tormented. I have never felt so anguished and afraid before in my entire life. Holding your cold and unresponsive body, my heart felt like it was being wrenched from my chest, like the world was crumbling before me. You have no idea how much the thought of your death affected me…how much pain it caused me.”

Katara felt her breath catch in her throat at the pain in his voice that was also visible in his eyes and she felt her heart constrict in her chest. She reached out to touch his cheek as her eyes began to mist.

“Oh Zuko, I—” she began, but she paused when Zuko shook his head and placed his thumb on her lips.

“No, let me finish. I need to say this…especially after the painful reminder that life is too short.” Zuko paused and licked his dry lips before he let out an almost inaudible sigh. “I need to tell you what it is that I feel for you…”

Zuko strove to put into words the powerful feelings, desires, and longings that had accumulated in his mind and in his heart during the long months and perhaps years of silence as he stared deep into the sapphire eyes of the woman that had changed him in so many ways. He again brought his hand to caress the side of Katara’s soft face as he continued to hold onto her arm.

“Since the first time I saw you…almost five years ago when I had invaded your tiny village in the Southern Water Tribe, there was something about you that caught my attention. Maybe it was the way your blue eyes glared at me despite your fear. I don’t know, but what I do know is that ever since then you’ve been in my head.”

Zuko paused again when Katara’s wide eyes stared at him with surprise and curiosity. He inwardly smiled as he remembered the events from all those years ago. How could he have been so blind not to see it back then?

“Though I’ll admit that every time you crossed my path and my mind during my exile, I would banish your image without another thought. Back then I was more concerned with capturing the Avatar and winning the approval of my…father,” Zuko growled out the last part. Once again he found something that made him despise Ozai even more.

Katara gave a slow nod indicating that she understood about the time when he had made it his goal to chase Aang, capture him and bring him to the Fire Nation so that Zuko could be able to return home. Though she had no idea what he was trying to tell her by recounting the past. She felt her heart start to race in her chest when Zuko moved his hand from her cheek and began to run it through her hair. What was he doing?

Zuko mentally shook his head to rid himself of his dark thoughts about his cruel father and he once again focused on Katara’s bright ocean-hued orbs while he touched her soft hair with his long fingers.

“It was only after I began to know you when I joined the group, and the time we had spent together after the war, that I began to understand what my feelings were and why it was that I felt attracted and attached to you,” the young Fire Lord spoke softly as he tried to say what he had been trying to tell her for so long.

“Every time I see you, every time I’m near you, every time you grace me with a smile or a comforting touch I feel like my entire body tingles with joy…But at the same time…when I want to see you and I can’t, when I want to touch you knowing that I shouldn’t, when I long for you when I know you are not mine…it pains me,” he whispered.

He heard Katara gasp and he watched as her eyes widened, but he tightened his hold on her arm as he continued to reveal what it was that she made him feel.

“Katara…I know it may sound ridiculous, but…whenever I think of you…a fire blazes in my chest, so strong that it sometimes shocks me with the intensity. It feels as if…my heart burns for you,” he confessed quietly.

Shocked and buoyant, the waterbender stared intently into the glowing, golden depths that were Zuko’s eyes. She felt like butterflies were fluttering in her stomach as his sincere words reached her ears and what they implied, but she was afraid to get her hopes up. She did not want to misinterpret what he was trying to say to her and embarrass both herself and him. She brought her own hand up to grab onto his, which was again touching her cheek, as she stared hopefully and timidly into his eyes.

“Zuko…what are you…trying to say?” she asked softly. She could feel her heart pounding in anticipation in her chest.
Zuko pulled her to him, causing her to gasp, and he wrapped one arm around her waist to keep her from pulling away while he grabbed her chin with the other hand so they could maintain their eye contact. He could feel his body heating up again at her proximity and his hold on her tightened. He groaned under his breath when she placed her hands on his chest to steady herself.

“Katara, I love you,” he declared ardently.

Katara’s eyes widened in shock and a soft gasp escaped her lips. He loves me?

She stared deeply into his golden eyes in order to decipher if what he said was true and she had not just imagined it. But what she discovered shining in his amber eyes made her breath catch in her throat while her heart soared as happiness, relief, and warmth crashed into her being. How many times had she dreamed of him saying those words to her? How many times had she longed for him to say that to her? Words could not escape her and the only thing she could do was stare at him with bright and loving eyes. But before she could open her mouth, Zuko tightened his hold on her as his eyes seemed to blaze as he gazed down at her.

“I love you, Katara,” Zuko repeated fervently.

Without another word, Zuko crushed her small soft body to his tall muscular one. He placed a hand to the back of her head, threading his fingers through her hair, before he pulled her head back slightly as he stared at her with heated eyes before he leaned down and planted a soft kiss to her lips.

Katara’s eyes widened in surprise as an electric shock seem to run through her before she closed them to relish in the gentle kiss Zuko had bestowed upon her while her body melted into him. She could not believe it! After all this time of dreaming about it, Zuko was finally kissing her! His lips were so warm and firm. She loved them.

Zuko’s hold on her body tightened as he pressed his lips deeper to hers, loving the way it felt to finally be kissing Katara’s soft lips, having her body close to his. Just like he had longed to do ever since that night in his private garden when he had revealed his past to her. Her sweet and plump lips felt better than he ever dreamed or imagined and he wished he could go further, but he quickly pulled back to see her reaction to his sudden move, expecting her anger at his boldness.

Katara suppressed the disappointed moan that wanted to escape her when Zuko pulled away too fast, before she could fully respond, and she opened her eyes to see what was wrong. Zuko’s kiss had been sweet and short, yet at the same time passionate, and she was still reeling with the pleasure and warmth it had created throughout her body. Dazed, she met Zuko’s golden gaze and she noticed that he seemed to be searching her face for something. She wondered what it was that he was looking and waiting for as part of her mind focused on the tingling on her lips.

“I will understand your anger for kissing you like that,” Zuko began huskily, “but I will not apologize for doing it. I’ve been longing to kiss you for such a long time and I will cherish it for as long as I live.”

He paused again and he turned his face slightly away before he closed his eyes.

“Even though I know that you love…Aang,” he swallowed the painful lump as he said that, “and you are…engaged to him, I will always love you, Katara. And though—”

Snapping out of her kiss-induced daze, Katara quickly pressed her fingers to his lips. Zuko paused as he turned to look down at her with resignation and sadness in his eyes. Once again Katara felt her heart constrict in her chest at the torment in Zuko’s amber eyes before she removed her fingers to touch his cheek and give him a small smile.

“I never agreed to marry Aang,” she told him quietly.

Zuko jerked back slightly at her words before he frowned down at her.

“What?” he asked.

“Aang did propose to me, but I never accepted,” Katara repeated before her brow furrowed. “I didn’t tell anybody that he asked me…How do you know he did?”

“I…I saw you with him in the Southern Water Tribe…” Zuko began as his frown deepened.

Reluctantly, he finally released his hold on her and Katara frowned in disappointment. Zuko turned away to stare at the dark foliage at the entrance of the cave.

“I was searching for you to finally confess my…feelings for you when I came across you and Aang…hugging…and the betrothal necklace he had shown me in your hand.”
Katara gaped slightly before she composed herself. Everything had just been a misunderstanding! Now she understood why Zuko had left so quickly. He must have been so hurt and angry. A soft smile appeared on Katara’s face as she walked forward and placed a gentle hand on his tensed back.

“If you had come across us sooner you wouldn’t have left so abruptly and you wouldn’t have waited all this time to tell me...how you feel about me,” Katara said as a blush spread on her cheeks.

Zuko looked down at her with a raised brow.

“What do you mean?” he asked quietly.

“Aang did propose to me, but I didn’t accept. But...well...I didn’t reject him either,” Katara began quietly before she hurriedly continued to explain herself when Zuko tensed and began to move away from her. “I told him it was too sudden for such a thing and I told him that I was not sure I wanted to marry him. But he was so devastated when I said that to him and he pleaded for me to reconsider. It made me so sad to see him like that, so I told him I would think about it, but I never told him yes and we were never engaged.”

When Zuko did not say anything, Katara moved to stand before him and she reached for his hand. Zuko looked down at their hands before he looked back up to the young woman’s face.

“The day after your birthday celebration, I told Aang that I made up my mind and would not marry him. I...broke up with him,” Katara told him quietly as she looked into his eyes.

Zuko’s amber eyes widened as he stared down at her in disbelief.

“You...broke up with Aang?” he asked. He could feel his heart beating easier and his hope flared. “Why?”

Katara briefly looked away from him and gazed down at their still joined hands before she raised her head to look at him again.

“Because I never loved Aang,” she confessed truthfully.
Zuko raised an eyebrow in surprise. “Really?”

Katara nodded.

“I agreed to be his girlfriend, hoping that maybe I’d grow to love him like he deserves, and at one point I thought I did,” she admitted. “But I soon realized that I could never love him in that way. So I broke up with him because I couldn’t continue living in a lie and continue to hurt Aang by leading him on.”

Zuko felt like something stabbed his chest and he quickly looked away in hurt and sadness. So it was all just to spare Aang’s feelings?

“I see,” he replied stoically, his unreadable mask once again falling into place.

Katara frowned at the dejected tone of his voice and she reached her hand to his cheek to gently turn his head so he could see her again. Now it was her turn to confess to him what it was she truly felt for him.

Zuko opened his eyes to gaze down at her and he noticed that a soft blush had spread to her cheeks before she looked down as the blush deepened in color, making him wonder what it was that had caused her to react in such a way.

“I…um…well…” she stammered. “The main reason I ended things with Aang was because…I love someone else.”

Zuko stiffened and he felt his temper flare. Who was it? Who was the one that took Katara away from him? His anger and jealousy was then replaced by misery before he once again focused on Katara’s soft voice.

“It was someone else’s hugs and kisses that I wanted. It was his love that I longed for,” Katara continued as her confidence grew. “I thought of him every day and dreamed of him every night, and whenever I wasn’t near him and whenever it seemed like he didn’t wish to see me…it pained me as well.”
Katara looked up again and noticed that Zuko was once again looking away from her with closed eyes and his jaw tightly clenched. With an understanding smile, Katara brought his hand close to her chest and placed it above her wildly beating heart. Zuko’s eyes snapped wide open as he looked back at her in surprise. He looked down to where she had placed his hand and then back up to her eyes as he tried to figure out what she was doing.

“That someone is you, Zuko. I couldn’t be with Aang anymore because the one I truly love is you,” Katara confessed warmly.

Zuko’s breath hitched in his throat and his golden eyes widened at her words.

“You…love me?” he asked softly, almost afraid that he had heard wrong and was just dreaming.

Katara gave him a bright smile as she pressed his hand closer to her chest where he could feel that her heart was pounding rapidly beneath his hand.

“I do, with all my heart. I love you, Zuko,” she told him tenderly.

The young Fire Lord felt like his heart had been engulfed in a bright fire and it was about to explode in happiness, as the words he had longed to hear for gods knew how long, caressed his ears and his soul. Before Katara could say anything else, Zuko removed his hand from beneath hers and placed both arms around her before he lifted her up to his chest and crashed his lips to her soft ones.

Katara was surprised at his fervent reaction, but she quickly melted into his warm embrace. She pressed herself closer to his strong chest and wound her arms around his neck as he continued to press hot kisses on her lips, which she returned with equal fervor. A soft moan escaped her when Zuko ran a hand down her back and she tugged at the hair on the lower part of his head.

Zuko let out a low groan as heat flared in his body at her reaction and he was afraid that if he did not stop he would be doing more than just kissing her lips as happiness and desire swelled within him. He pulled back slowly and he watched with a small smile as Katara opened her lovely eyes to look at him in wonder while they both panted hard as they stared into each other’s eyes. Zuko sighed and he leaned down to bury his face on her neck, placing a soft kiss there and causing her to shiver.

“You have no idea how happy you have made me, Katara,” he whispered in her ear before he nuzzled her hair. “You have no idea how long I have wished to hear you say those words to me.”
Katara giggled quietly as she tightened her grip around his neck.

“You’re the one who has made me so happy, Zuko,” she said softly, “I was beginning to accept the fact that you would never return my feelings.”

Zuko pulled slightly away from her and leaned down to place light kisses on her lips before he pulled back to gaze down into her beautiful face. Her eyes were sparkling and she was giving him a wide and bright smile. Zuko smiled at her before he lowered her back to her feet. He chuckled quietly when she swayed and he quickly wrapped an arm around her to steady her. Katara blushed since she still felt a bit weak and Zuko’s amazing kisses made her feel even more lightheaded than she did a few hours ago. Her blush deepened when Zuko reached out to touch her cheek, and with a soft sigh, she leaned closer to his warm touch.

“Come. I brought some food I found at the camp. You need to eat,” he told her gently.

Katara felt her heart flutter as Zuko clasped her hand and lead her to the fire he had created that morning, which was now diminishing. He released her hand and walked back to the pile of things he had dropped at the entrance of the cave before gathering everything in his arms. Katara waited patiently as he placed everything beside the campfire before he added more wood into the fire, and with a quick exhale, willed the flames to burn higher. With the extra light, Katara noticed that among the firewood Zuko had brought there were a few bags and a small sword sheathed in a dirty scabbard.

She watched as Zuko sat down on the hard ground and she gasped softly in surprise when he grabbed her wrist and gently pulled her to sit close to his side. She blushed as their thighs touched, but she happily leaned her head on his shoulder. Zuko smiled down at her and wrapped an arm around her to press her closer to his side as both dwelled in their happy thoughts, both amazed at the turn of events.

After a few minutes of comfortable silence, Zuko reached for one of the bags and began to rummage inside, while he kept one arm around Katara. A small smile appeared on his lips when he found what he needed. He pulled out a small cloth bundle followed by a water canteen. He handed the canteen to Katara who gratefully took it and tilted her head up to take large gulps of the refreshing water to moisten her dry throat. She did not notice how Zuko’s eyes smoldered as he watched her swallow the liquid nor did she know about the indecent thoughts that were running rampant in his head as a small trail of water escaped her lips and trickled down her chin and to her neck.

With a content sigh, Katara turned to smile at Zuko only to raise an eyebrow when she saw that he was staring intently at her mouth. She licked her lips self-consciously and was surprised to hear him let out a small groan.
“Zuko?” she questioned with a slight tilt to her head.

Zuko blinked away the haziness that his fantasy had produced before he cleared his throat and returned his attention to the bundle he had placed before them. Agni, hearing his drunken crewmembers’ boasts and talk in detail about their sexual escapades really provided fuel for his imagination.

“I found some dried meat,” he rasped.

He hoped that she did not hear the huskiness in his voice as he opened the bundle to reveal a few pieces of the dried meat. He reached for one and handed it to her before he took one for himself.

“You need to eat to regain your strength. You…lost so much blood,” he said quietly and cleared his throat to dislodge the painful lump that had formed there and this time for a different reason.

Katara squeezed his hand since she knew he was still shaken by her near death. She would be shaken too if their situations were reversed. Her eyes watered at the thought of Zuko dying and she quickly took a bite of the dried meat in order to distract herself from the horrible images. When that did not work too well, Katara looked up at Zuko and a thought entered her mind that caused her to smile.

“Zuko?”

“Hm?” was his response as he chewed on the dried meat.

He looked down to see her cobalt eyes shining up at him, and once again, he felt his heart flare with heat. But this time it was more intense now that he knew the depth of her affection for him.

“When did you realize you…loved me?” Katara asked shyly, though she liked to say that.

Zuko smiled at her and pressed a kiss to her head before he gazed down into her soft, blue eyes.
“It was the night I fought Jet…that sorry excuse for a man…” he trailed off as he eyes narrowed at the thought of the Freedom Fighter before he continued when Katara tugged at his hand. “It was then in Ba Sing Se when I realized it.”

“That long?” Katara exclaimed.

Zuko chuckled at her before he reached a hand out to caress her cheek.

“Actually, I was in love with you way before that, but I finally admitted it to myself when Jet pointed it out.”

Katara smiled happily at him as she snuggled closer to his warm side. She could not believe it! Zuko had loved her for that long?

“Why didn’t you tell me?” she asked with a frown.

“I…well…” Zuko sighed as he looked away from her to stare at the fire before them.

“I was not used to such a new emotion and I did not know how to proceed. But I was ready to confess my feelings for you when I traveled to the Southern Water Tribe for your brother and Suki’s wedding. Though a small part of me was apprehensive and afraid of your rejection since I didn’t know if you would be able to return my feelings. Especially because you were…Aang’s girlfriend.”

Zuko sighed as he continued to watch the flames in the campfire flicker.

“I tried to dismiss the thoughts about you that came to my mind all the time and I tried to stop the attraction I felt for you since I didn’t want to distress you or hurt Aang since he’s my friend, but I just couldn’t. I was in love with you and I wanted you, so I was ready to fight Aang if it meant I got your affections, but then after the wedding I…”

“You saw us and assumed I agreed to marry him,” Katara added gently when he paused.

“Yes,” Zuko admitted before he cleared his throat and shifted uneasily. “You have no idea how angry and hurt I felt when I came upon you and Aang. It probably seems cowardly but I had to leave… I had to run away. I would not have been able to bear hearing about your… engagement to him.”

Katara wrapped her arms around him and kissed his cheek softly as she saw the pain in his eyes from the memory before she smiled gently when he looked away from the fire to look at her. Zuko saw her give him a sympathetic smile and he took a deep breath to dispel his dark emotions.

“So when did you realize you were in love with me?” he asked with a smirk.

“The answer is not since the first time I saw you if that’s what you’re thinking,” Katara responded with a grin.

Zuko crossed his arms over his chest and frowned at her.

“Hm,” he muttered.

Katara laughed at him, but quieted down when he turned to give her a small glare. She reached for his arms and uncrossed them before placing his arm around her waist, where it had been resting before and smiled.

“Well, actually I think I’ve been in love with you since a long time ago, but when I finally admitted it to myself was after Suki and Sokka got married… When you were almost hurt by those arctic panther-wolves when trying to save Lien,” Katara confessed quietly. “I had a nightmare where this time you couldn’t escape them and they… killed you.”

Zuko gave her a small squeeze and then rubbed soothing circles down her back when he noticed Katara’s happy mood change slightly.

“Just thinking about you dying… I couldn’t bear it,” Katara whispered as she wrapped her arms around him. “It was so painful.”

The Fire Lord wrapped his own arms around the young woman’s body as a way to comfort her, for he could not find another way since he did not know what to say. He knew what she meant for it was the same way he had felt, only that now he knew how horrible it truly felt for Katara had indeed died in his arms.
“And then what happened? After the nightmare?” Zuko asked as a way to distract her.

“I was confused that the thought of your death pained me so much, even more than my mother’s did, so I began to question myself as to why that was,” Katara began before a small smile appeared on her face before she pulled slightly away so she could look at him. “I wondered why you affected me so much. Why I always wanted to be with you, why a look from you made me blush, and why a simple touch from you made me tremble,” she continued as her cheeks turned red. “And next thing I knew I was confessing my love for you to myself.”

“Really?” Zuko asked with a large smile. “So I could have told you then and you would’ve accepted me?”

“Yeah,” Katara replied and giggled.

“Why didn’t you tell me then?” Zuko asked her with a frown. “We could’ve avoided the whole misunderstanding with…the proposal.”

“I was ready to tell you that same night, but…well, there were many reasons why I didn’t,” Katara responded with a small frown. “The first one being that I had not yet broken up with Aang. And then I was still getting used to my feelings for you. And another reason was…well…I guess I was also afraid of your rejection if I told you. I mean how could the mighty Fire Lord return my feelings? Me, a mere Water Tribe woman.”

“I know, huh?” Zuko teased while he tapped his chin and frowned deeply.

Katara playfully slapped his chest and scowled. “Shut up, you!”

Zuko chuckled at her and grabbed her offending hand before he brought it to his lips and kissed her knuckles. Katara blushed, but she gave him a loving smile.

“And here I was, the mighty Fire Lord, afraid of your rejection,” Zuko told her with a small smile while his golden eyes burned softly. “And you’re not a mere Water Tribe woman, Katara. You are much more than that. That’s why I fell in love with you.”
The soft blush on Katara’s cheeks deepened at his words and she gasped when he began to run his hand up and down her back before she nervously looked away when she saw the color of Zuko’s amber orbs darken. Zuko noticed her unease and slowly pulled back before he scared her away.

“I can’t believe how stupid we were for not noticing our feelings sooner,” the young firebender commented with another low chuckle.

Katara laughed along with him.

“I think Toph was beginning to question our intelligence,” she said before she scowled. “She knew about what we felt for each other and she didn’t tell me!”

“I think Uncle knew, too,” Zuko said with a fond sigh. “But knowing him he probably wanted us to figure it out for ourselves.”

Katara grumbled under her breath and scowled deeper. Zuko smiled down at her before he pressed his finger between her eyebrows to get rid of the scowl so her skin could be smooth again.

“So what was the other reason why you didn’t tell me about your feelings for me?” Zuko asked.

The waterbender’s blue eyes widened and she began to chew on her lip while she reached for her hair to twirl it around her fingers. Zuko’s attention was immediately drawn to her white teeth abusing her luscious lips. Unable to resist, he leaned down and pressed his lips against hers before he pulled back a moment later to hear her response.

“Well? Are you going to tell me?” Zuko asked her again and smirked when she looked at him dazedly.

“Because you already had a girlfriend,” she said quietly. “And I’m kind of glad I didn’t say anything back then, especially after what I heard.”

Zuko tightened his hold on her with one arm while he caressed her hair with the other. A small frown appeared on his face.
“Why do you say that?” he asked curiously.

“Because…well, I…” Katara began as she tried to forget the pain she had felt when she thought she would never have a chance with Zuko. “I felt like my heart had been broken and all my hopes and dreams were dashed when Ty Lee told Suki, Sokka, Toph, and me that…that Mai told her that she and you…were practically…engaged.”

Zuko growled under his breath.

“And you believed her?” he asked.

Katara pulled away and she glared at him.

“Well, what was I supposed to think? You’ve been together for years! And Mai lives in your palace and acts like the mistress of the house! What else was I supposed to believe?” she finished in a pained voice.

Zuko’s irritation melted when he heard her pain and saw it in her eyes and he felt his heart constrict in his chest. When she looked away, Zuko grabbed her chin and lifted it, pressing his lips to hers. He heard her give a small sigh and felt her relax against him before he pulled away slowly while keeping her head up so she could look at him.

“Katara,” he called out gently as he again touched her face, “What Mai said is a lie. I’ve never even spoken of marriage to her.”

“You haven’t?” Katara asked quietly.

“No,” Zuko told her. “I have to be truthful and tell you that marriage with her did cross my mind, but I never told her because it was a fleeting thought I had only as a way to placate my advisors and courtiers.”

He paused so he could press his lips to her temple when she frowned at him.

“Besides, you don’t need to worry because I broke up with Mai the day after my birthday celebration,” he informed her.

Katara gave him a small smile.

“I know,” she said softly.

Zuko gaped at her before he lifted his dark eyebrow.

“How do you know?” he asked.

Katara’s smile faded and she began to fidget with her hair again, but sighed in defeat when Zuko grasped her hands and repeated the question.

“Suki and I were outside your study when the door was pulled opened and Mai stepped out with the coldest look I’ve ever seen on her face,” Katara began as she looked down at her hands. “I asked her if you were inside and she snapped at me.”

“What did she say?” Zuko asked with a frown.

“Well,” Katara began as she pulled at her sleeve, “she said that I must be so happy because you dumped her and you were now available.”

“And were you?” Zuko asked with a small smirk.

Katara rolled her eyes at him before she smiled.

“Yes, I was,” she confessed.

Zuko smiled smugly before he kissed her cheek.

“Good. I’m glad,” he said before he frowned again. “I have a feeling that that’s not all Mai said, is “She warned me that it will not stay like that for long…She said she would take you back,” Katara told him quietly.

Zuko felt his temper flare and he growled under his breath as he turned to glare at the fire.

“I knew there was a reason why she accepted my rejection so easily,” he muttered.

Zuko paused as he looked away from the fire to stare at Katara’s brilliant sapphire eyes and he smiled at her. He leaned down and placed a soft kiss to her sweet lips before he pulled back slightly to look her sincerely in the eyes.

“I could never marry Mai because she is not the woman I want and love. That woman is you, Katara,” he told her affectionately.

The waterbender flushed before she frowned.

“I kind of find that hard to believe,” she said quietly.

A deep frown marred Zuko’s features. Why did she doubt his sincerity after all they have said to each other?

“Why do you say that?” he inquired.

“Well, you did say I was…not your type,” she reminded him.

Zuko winced at the hurt he detected in her tone. He berated himself harshly for being so foolish. In his attempt to defend himself against Aang’s accusations after sparring with Katara on his flagship, he had unintentionally hurt her.
“I lied,” he replied sincerely, firmly, as he reached out a hand to brush her cheek. “Back then I did not understand what it was I felt for you, so I tried to hide from it.”

He paused as he leaned his face closer to hers, his caress on her skin becoming tender.

“Katara,” he breathed out softly, “you are everything that I want and desire in a woman. If only you knew how much I want you.”

Katara’s cheeks took on a dark reddish hue. No one had ever spoken such passionate and loving words to her before. She shyly looked away from Zuko’s intense golden eyes, since they always made her shiver with delight, but Zuko would have none of that. Without giving a warning, Zuko pulled her onto his lap and held her against him, causing her to squeak in surprise. He immediately cut off the sound as he crashed his lips to her sweet ones.

Katara immediately surrendered herself into his warm embrace, the gentleness of his mouth against hers, and she wound her arms around his neck. Aang’s kisses could not compare to Zuko’s. She felt like lightning was running through her veins and she was getting very hot. She wanted more of his kisses.

Zuko could not get enough of Katara’s soft lips. He wanted more. He wanted to feel more. He pressed her soft body closer to him and tangled his fingers through her tresses before he gently pulled her head back so he could deepened the kiss. He groaned when Katara let out a soft moan and tangled her own fingers through his dark hair. He felt himself stiffen in arousal, but he stopped himself from grinding against Katara. He did not want to offend her with his advances, especially since they had just barely confessed their feelings for each other. Luckily, it seemed she was too distracted with his kisses to notice his predicament.

Katara could feel Zuko’s large hand running down her back, causing shivers to run down her spine, while his wonderful mouth continued to delight her. She had never been kissed like this before, she had never felt this wonderful before, and she was enjoying every second of feeling Zuko’s warm lips and having his strong arms wrapped around her so tightly.

Zuko felt like he was burning, like fire was spreading across his skin. He could feel his need for her growing the longer he kissed her and held her soft body against his. The need to rip her clothes off and take her right there on the cave floor was becoming more and more urgent that he felt he was going insane. He reluctantly started to pull away from her delicious lips and sighed mournfully when he no longer felt them, but he did not want to frighten her away with his eagerness. He smiled when Katara opened her eyes and gave him a dreamy look.
“Wow,” she breathed as they both panted against each other.

Zuko chuckled and leaned down to give her lips a brief peck.

“You haven’t seen the extent of my passion for you yet, Katara,” he told her huskily. He resisted the urge to press her against his erection to emphasize his point.

His chuckle deepened when her cobalt orbs widened before she gave him an eager look.

Katara was about to ask him to show her what he meant, but a yawn interrupted her and she blushed. Zuko smiled at her tenderly before he pulled her away from his lap and set her down next to him. He inhaled deeply and tried to calm himself down, which took longer than expected.

“Time for your nap,” Zuko teased as he got to his feet once he was sure the sight of him would not shock her.

Katara rose to her feet and, bringing her hands to her hips, scowled at him.

“I’m not a child!” she exclaimed and huffed.

Zuko’s eyes gleamed as he grinned at her. He grabbed her around the waist and pulled her up to his chest before she could react.

“Believe me, Katara, I know,” he growled in a low tone as his other hand squeezed her hip.

“Um…uh…ok then,” Katara stuttered as she blushed ten shades of red.

The hand on Katara’s wide hip twitched to go lower and grabbed something rounder. Zuko felt his heart, as well as another area below throb, when he felt her breasts pressed tightly to his chest. As he stared at her blush, he knew it had been a bad idea to tease her. Calling forth all his self-control, Zuko released her with a deep sigh. He gave her a quick kiss before he moved completely away from her so he could search through the bags. He pulled out a few blankets and settled them near the
“You need to rest,” Zuko told her as he settled himself on the fortunately clean blankets he had spread out. “We will be leaving the cave tomorrow in search of a village.”

When Katara did not answer, he looked up and he frowned when she did not move.

“What’s wrong?” he asked her in concern.

“Um…” Katara began as another blush invaded her cheeks. “We can’t…uh…s-sleep so close together.”

Zuko quirked an eyebrow at her.

“Why not? You’ve been sleeping on my lap for the past couple of days,” he reminded her with a smirk.

Katara’s blush deepened.

“Well, yeah, but now it’s different. We…we know what each feels for the other and we have…kissed a lot,” she stuttered out.

Zuko smiled indulgently at her shyness and modesty.

“That’s true, but you don’t need to worry because I won’t do anything that you don’t want me to,” Zuko told her gently before he reached out a hand for her. “I just want to hold you and make sure you remain next to me.”

Anguish flickered through his eyes for a moment.

“I admit that I’m still afraid of losing you again after you almost…died,” he said quietly.
Katara felt her heart go out to him as she saw the lingering fear and sadness in his eyes and voice. Why was she hesitating? She knew Zuko would not force her into doing anything she was not ready for. Besides, she really wanted to sleep close to Zuko’s warm side.

With that in mind, Katara walked over to him with a small smile and lay down next to him on the blankets. She sighed happily when Zuko lay down beside her and wrapped his arm around her. She stiffened at first, but she immediately relaxed against his warmth and the feeling of protection his arms provided.

“Zuko?” she called out softly as the flames in the campfire dimmed a bit.

“Yes?” he responded as he gave her a squeeze.

“I love you,” Katara whispered warmly. It felt so right to say that.

Zuko briefly closed his eyes at the intense emotions her words caused within him. There was no way to describe how happy and content it made him feel to hear her say that to him. He tightened his hold on her and he kissed her hair.

“I love you, too, Katara,” he said amorously.

Katara felt her heart flutter before she smiled and pressed herself closer to him. Zuko held his breath for a second when she moved closer before he let out a deep exhale to calm himself and his rising desire. In a few minutes, he heard Katara’s soft breathing as she slept and he smiled. He wrapped his arms tighter around her and sighed softly.

Zuko found great satisfaction in finally holding the woman he loved in his arms while she slept and he was unable to curb the soft smile that came to his lips as warmth spread through him. She loved him and he loved her, and they were meant for each other. He would never let her go. Katara was his and he would be damned if he let anything or anyone take her away from him.

The fire continued to blaze as the couple, wrapped in each other’s arms, slept in the safety of the hidden cave.
Gradually Progressing

The warm energy of the dawning sun gently roused the young Fire Lord from his light slumber. The chirping of birds and the buzzing of insects reached his ears and he slowly opened his eyes to the new day. The firebender blinked a couple of times to get rid of the haziness from his eyes. As he moved to sit up, he paused when he felt a light weight on his chest and something solid and warm pressed to his side.

Raising his head slightly, Zuko noticed that Katara’s head was resting on his chest, her long hair falling around her shoulder and down onto his stomach. One of her slender hands was clutching his tunic while he had his arm wrapped protectively around her waist. Zuko smiled at the sight as a warm feeling spread from his chest and throughout his entire body. His already semi-erect manhood hardened further and he groaned softly. Ignoring his state for the moment, he pressed Katara’s curvy body closer to his and sighed contentedly as he ran his fingers gently through her chocolate tresses.

He remembered their confessions from the previous night and his smile broadened. He could not believe that Katara returned his feelings, that she loved him, loved him for such a long time. He also could not stop thinking about how stupid he had been for not noticing it before, for ignoring the many hints his uncle, his mother, and Toph had thrown his way. If he had not been such a coward, Katara and he could have been married by now! That thought brought warmth to his heart and he tightened his hold on her.

Katara sighed and rolled over to lie on her back. She moved closer to him before she settled back down with another soft sigh. Zuko smiled at her as he wrapped his arms around her and gently kissed her head.

Now that he had her, now that he knew she loved him as well, and after his fright at her…death, he would not wait any longer to tell her that he wished to take her as his wife. That he wanted her to be by his side for the rest of their lives. He knew that there might be some problems with the Court Council, but he did not give a damn about what they thought. His arms tightened protectively around the young woman sleeping next to him.

Zuko looked at her lovely face, a subtle sleepy smile on her lips, and he sighed softly. Thin rays of light spilled into the dark cave as the sun rose higher in the sky, effectively catching Zuko’s attention and causing him to look over at the curtain of flora at the entrance. He knew that they needed to head out soon and keep on walking before Jianguo learned of what he had done, but he could not wake Katara up yet. She needed all the rest she could get since she had lost so much blood when Feng wounded her.

A dark look settled across Zuko’s face as that thought caused him to remember seeing Katara’s blood spreading on the forest floor, her skin losing color as her body weakened, and her eyes closing.
before she stopped breathing…

Heart constricting in pain, Zuko squeezed his eyes shut to block out the images. He buried his face in Katara’s hair and wrapped his arms tightly around her to bring her even closer to him. He would never let her out of his sight for he never wanted to feel such pain ever again. He knew she could defend herself, she was, after all, a master waterbender, but he would feel less afraid if he were there by her side. He pulled back slightly and firmly pressed his lips to her soft, plump ones, to reassure himself, while his hand gently touched her cheek.

He froze when he felt soft fingers touch his own cheek while the lips beneath his pressed back and he pulled away slowly. Zuko watched as Katara eyelashes fluttered, revealing her sparkling blue eyes. She blushed slightly before she gave him radiant smile.

“I didn’t mean to wake you up,” he told her softly as he returned her smile.

“It’s alright. We need to leave anyway,” Katara responded as she ran her hand down his cheek before she touched his lips with the tip of her fingers. “Besides, with that kiss you gave me I can’t possibly go back to sleep now.”

Zuko chuckled and he pressed his lips to her fingers before he leaned down to give her a soft kiss on her lips. He meant to give her one kiss and then move away, but Katara weaved her fingers in his hair and moaned. He gave a low growl in response and began to kiss her more eagerly, pressing her to the ground beneath him. He heard Katara gasp and he immediately pulled away, but not before he pressed a quick kiss to her lips when she frowned at him. Katara sighed and smiled at him.

Zuko felt his heart begin to pound in his chest at the way she smiled up at him and he felt his erection throb with need, so he sat up and moved away before he did something to scare her. He stood up, willing his arousal to subside, and cleared his throat before he helped her to her feet.

“We should eat before we set out,” Zuko told her huskily. He cleared his throat again and smiled at her.

“Okay,” Katara agreed as she walked over to the bag of food Zuko had brought.

She pulled out the rest of the dried meat and a piece of bread she found at the bottom of the bag while Zuko added more wood to the fire and raised it higher with a deep exhale. With a smile, Katara handed him his share of food when he sat down beside her. He thanked her and they began to eat quietly.

“Zuko?” Katara spoke up after a moment of comfortable silence.

“Yeah?” Zuko responded as he lowered the water canteen from which he was drinking from.

“How are we going to find a village?” she asked.

Zuko frowned pensively into the fire.

“I don’t know. We have no maps to tell us where we are or to guide us on where to go,” he began. “But we need to find a village soon and warn Uncle before Jianguo sets out with his plan. I have a feeling that he will send word to the Fire Nation that they have us as hostages while he continues to look for us.”

Katara saw the concern beneath his impassive expression and she laid a reassuring hand on his arm. She gave him a small smile when he turned to look at her inquisitively.

“Don’t worry, Zuko,” she told him. “Uncle Iroh and Chao will stop him and the Fire Nation will be safe.”

Zuko grabbed her hand and pulled her to his side so he could wrap his arm around her.

“I know that, Katara, but…” he paused and sighed as he gave her a small squeeze, “I’m also worried about what would happen if Jianguo catches us…what he would do to us.” He clenched his hand tightly as he looked away from her to stare at the fire before them.

“He would…hurt you to get to me,” he told her quietly.

He looked at Katara and saw her grow pale and her eyes widen. He swiftly pulled her onto his lap and wrapped his arms protectively around her while she buried her face on his neck.

“I swear to you that I will not allow anyone to hurt you ever again,” he whispered fervently in her ear as he ran a hand up and down her back to soothe her.

Katara raised her head to kiss his cheek before she wrapped her arms around his neck and snuggled closer to him with a soft sigh.

“I know,” she told him sincerely before her voice grew hard, “and I will not let myself be caught off guard ever again.”

They remained in each other’s reassuring embrace for a while before Zuko pulled away. He looked into her eyes and ran a hand through her tangled hair.

“We need to leave,” he reminded her before a small frown settled on his face. “Do you feel well enough to walk?”

“Of course! I feel much better now,” Katara told him with a grin.

Zuko nodded and smiled at her. With another squeeze, he let her go. Katara climbed off his lap and they both stood up. He began to gather their meager supplies while the waterbender picked up the blankets and the rest of the food and stuffed them into the bag.

Once he extinguished the fire, Zuko turned to look at Katara as she finished tying the water canteen to her hip. He was about to call out to her when he caught sight of the dried blood on her blue shirt. The sight of it clinging to her slightly torn blouse disturbed him so much that he remained standing, frozen in shock.

“I’m ready to go,” Katara told him as she slung the small bag of food over her shoulder.

When Zuko did not reply to her, Katara looked up to see what he was doing. She saw that his face held a troubled expression as he gazed at her and she frowned in concern.

“Zuko? What’s wrong?”

Zuko snapped out of his daze at the sound of her voice. He quickly looked away from her bloody shirt, only to see her looking at him with worried eyes.
“If I had protected you better, you wouldn’t have been hurt,” he whispered sullenly.

Katara saw him look down at her stomach and she knew he was affected by the blood that had dried up on her clothing. She wished she had another shirt so Zuko would not be tormented every time he looked her way.

“It wasn’t your fault, Zuko,” she told him firmly. “You did everything you could to keep me safe, and besides, such things happen and you won’t always be able to stop them.”

“But because of my distraction and overconfidence you died! You died!” Zuko rasped chokingly.

Katara rushed over to him and embraced him tightly, running her hands soothingly along his back. Zuko hugged her firmly to him and buried his face in her neck. He squeezed his eyes shut to bear the pain, sorrow, and remorse that coursed through him.

“Everything’s fine now,” Katara soothed him gently, “I’m alive and I am fine.”

“The times we ran across each other during the war, I was afraid of getting to know you,” he admitted quietly, “When we were at the Western Air Temple, I was afraid of hurting you. And now that I love you, I’m very afraid of losing you.”

Zuko pulled back slightly to gaze intently into her eyes, his golden orbs almost burning in their intensity. Katara was surprised at the intense way he was looking at her while he held her tightly to him.

“But now that I have you, I won’t let you go. Not even death will take you away from me,” he told her in a fierce whisper.

Katara felt her heart skip a beat and a tingle ran down her spine at the power in his promise.

“I will stay at your side as long as you want me,” she whispered breathlessly at him as she stared into his deep, golden eyes.
“Then that means forever,” Zuko growled out.

He placed his hand at the back of her neck, curling his fingers in her hair, and tilted her head back before his mouth met hers in a deep and yet gentle kiss. Katara moaned at the sensation of his warm and firm lips touching hers and she wound her hands around his neck.

Zuko groaned at the sound she made and he pressed her closer to his chest. He wanted more, he wanted to taste more of her in order to calm his anxiety and fear, but more importantly, he wanted to be closer to her. He opened his mouth slightly and gently traced her lips with the tip of his tongue, while he ran a hand down her back.

A tremor went through Katara as she moaned in pleasure at the new sensations. She felt his warm tongue begin to probe at her lips, and through the fogginess in her mind, she knew he was silently asking her for permission to enter her mouth. She hesitantly opened her mouth to him, shyly granting his searching request.

Zuko groaned triumphantly when she parted her lips for him, and without hesitation, he plunged his tongue inside her hot oral cavern, touching her smooth teeth, prodding the inside of her cheeks, tasting every inch of her delicious mouth. She moaned softly into his mouth and he experienced an amazing sweetish sensation in the back of his throat. His hold on her became tight and his fingers became tangled in the mass of brown that was her hair. Lifting her up, he crushed her smaller body to his tall frame and moaned when her soft breasts pressed closely to his hard chest, heat and warmth surging through every nerve of his body.

Katara felt like her heart was about to jump out of her chest as an almost familiar yet still strange heat pooled in the pit of her stomach. She whimpered softly at his heated embrace, but she grabbed hold of his short, dark hair and held onto him for dear life as pleasant and powerful sensations assaulted her entire body, as his tongue continued to invade her mouth. She could barely breathe, but she felt like she was in heaven as Zuko skillfully explored her mouth without leaving anything uncharted. But when his tongue made contact with her own, she jumped as though she had been struck by a thunderbolt.

Zuko felt her jerk against him when their tongues met, and not wanting to overwhelm her too quickly, he reluctantly wound down their incredible kiss. He had lost his control for a bit and he hoped that he had not frightened her with his fervor since he knew she was not ready for such ardent displays of affection. He had never thought kissing could feel so good. The only other women he had kissed before were Jin and Mai, and those uninspiring kisses had never produced such powerful, amazing reactions from him as Katara’s innocent yet passionate kisses did. Pulling back slightly after licking Katara’s bottom lip, Zuko looked down at her with heated eyes as they both panted hard against each other. When Katara opened her eyes, they gazed at one another and Zuko was relieved to see no apprehension in those sapphire depths. He smirked smugly at her dazed look, flushed face, and swollen lips while her small hands continued to hold onto his hair as if to help keep her from
“As much as I would like to spend the day kissing you, we have to be on our way,” he told her with a small grin.

Katara wanted to pout and tell him that she was not feeling as well as she had said she was, so they could remain in the seclusion of the small cave and perhaps share more wonderful kisses. But she knew that was a selfish wish that could endanger their lives as well as the world if they did not stop Jianguo. Reluctantly, she slowly disentangled her fingers from their grip on his short, black hair and she smiled at him in what she hoped was an understanding smile.

“Okay,” she replied, though she was unable to curb the disappointment that came over her when Zuko lowered her down to her feet.

Zuko grinned at her pouting face and he placed a light kiss on her lips.

“Don’t look so sad, Katara,” he teased lightly. “I promise that we’ll find plenty of time to kiss each other until our lips fall off.”

Katara blushed at his words before she giggled at him, moving away so she could compose herself while Zuko gathered his things. Inwardly she was already eagerly waiting for such a time to arrive. She never thought kisses could feel so good and she had never been kissed so passionately before. The times Aang had kissed her, they had been light and mildly pleasing, but when he tried to go a bit further, she would panic and immediately pull away. His hurt and slightly irritated expression would make her feel guilty, but she just could not help it. It unnerved her to even think about it.

But now it seemed like she could not get enough of Zuko’s kisses. She could not describe the amazing sensations she felt at the feeling of his warm and firm lips on hers, the way his taller frame seemed to surround her smaller body in a protective way, and of his hands touching her in such a gentle manner despite his intensity. Katara was surprised to find herself craving more of what he had to offer, she wanted more, and although she did not know what that more was, she just knew that she wanted it from Zuko. She felt herself getting warm and her breathing became a bit erratic as she lightly touched her still tingling lips. She felt her cheeks burn when she noticed the wetness between her legs.

“Katara?” Zuko’s confused voice reached her ears.
The waterbender jumped slightly and a deep blush spread across her cheeks and the tip of her nose as she realized what kinds of thoughts she was having about Zuko, despite the fact they had just confessed their feelings the day before. But that was normal, wasn’t it?

“What is it?” she replied quickly.

She busied herself by tying the water canteen more securely to her hip so she did not have to look at his handsome features and so he would not notice her blushing face. But her efforts were in vain for she felt Zuko walk up to her and place a finger under her chin, lifting her head so she could look at him.

“Are you sure you feel okay?” Zuko asked with a worried frown. “Your face is a bit flushed. We could start searching for a village tomorrow so you could rest a bit more.”

“I told you that I am feeling better,” Katara sighed at him before she patted his hand. “But thanks for worrying about me.”

“Of course I worry about you,” Zuko responded to her as he released her chin so he could caress her face. “I love you, Katara, and your well-being and happiness is important to me.”

At his words, Katara’s stomach did a flip and she flashed him a bright smile as she wrapped her arms around his middle and snuggled into him. She felt him wrap his arms around her and she sighed contentedly.

“I love you too, Zuko,” Katara replied softly. “And I worry for your safety as well.”

Zuko smiled at her words. After his exile all those years ago, he had told himself that he needed no one, that he was fine being alone, and he had gotten used to the thought of having only his uncle worry for him. But knowing that Katara cared so much about him made him realize that he could no longer bear the thought of being alone, of not having her by his side, and that he needed her so much. He watched as Katara raised her head to look at him and he felt his heart skip a beat when her shiny, blue eyes stared sincerely into his golden ones. She cupped his cheek and he leaned into her gentle touch with a soft sigh. The way she smiled at him made him want to kiss her breathless again, but instead he settled for a light peck on her lips before he gently pulled away from her embrace.

“We should get going,” he reminded her. “As we find our way to a village, we need to be constantly alert for any sign of Jianguo and his men.”
Katara’s face hardened and she patted the water canteen at her hip with a fierce grin.

“If we do come across them again,” she began with a gleam in her eyes, “this time I won’t be so easily distracted. I will show them that they shouldn’t have mess with us.”

Zuko smirked at her approvingly.

“I’m sure you’ll make them regret it,” he told her with a deep chuckle.

“You got that right,” Katara responded with a large grin.

They smiled at each other for a moment longer before they adjusted their belongings over their shoulders. Once ready, they stepped out of the cave through the green curtain of flora with one last glance at the place where they had finally revealed their love for each other.

Small animals scurried away and birds flew up from their nests, as Katara and Zuko made their way through the thick forest. The day had progressed well into the afternoon and it was getting a bit more difficult to see in the darkness that the large trees produced. They came across a part of the forest where the trees and other flora grew so tightly together that it plunged them into near darkness despite the fact that the sun was still up in the sky. Zuko had summoned a small flame in his left palm to light their way while he slashed at the branches and leaves with the small sword he had acquired. Katara had offered to help and had slashed the vines and branches from their paths with a sharp water whip, but to her dismay, she was unable to keep it up for long as she began to get tired and a little dizzy. Zuko had reassured her that she just needed a bit more time to regain all her strength and not to let it bring her down. She had given him a small smile, but had remained silent as they continued walking.

Zuko hacked through another thick and thorny bush and paused to take a break, rotating his shoulder to ease the ache. He glanced back worriedly at Katara. She seemed to have sensed his stare and she looked up to give him a bright smile. Zuko returned her smile and resumed his task of clearing a path for them. He would occasionally ask her how she was feeling and if she wanted to take a rest, but she would stubbornly tell him she was fine and that she was not some weakling. He would just shake his head at her; he was concerned that he was pushing her too hard.

Katara sighed and realized that Zuko was worrying too much about her when she caught him looking back at her. She decided to reassure him by filling up the silence with idle talk which would sometimes shift into bringing up events of the past few months and what they went through when they thought the other would never reciprocate their feelings.

Katara frowned as she looked ahead to stare at Zuko. She noticed his slightly torn clothes and could not help but be reminded of the beating he had to endure by Jianguo’s men in order to keep her safe.

“Back in Jianguo’s camp, when they…” Katara paused and swallowed hard, “when they h-hurt you… you said it was not the first time you’ve been severely injured and that you’ve been through worse. Were you referring to what happened with…Azula?”

Zuko looked back at her before he shook his head.

“Actually, I was referring to the time, before the siege of the Northern Water Tribe, when Zhao had some pirates blow up my ship so he could get rid of me,” Zuko explained. “I was barely able to escape. Uncle had thought I died.” He sighed.

“What?” Katara exclaimed in horror. “You were in a ship when it exploded? You really could have died!”

“But I managed to survive,” Zuko reminded her as he gave her a small smile before he let out a wry chuckle. “You know, the pirates that destroyed my ship were the same ones that I hired to try to capture you.”

“Hmm… then I can’t say I feel sorry for you now,” Katara mused before she let out a laugh when Zuko turned to give her a hurt look. “I’m just kidding. But Zhao was such a coward for having those pirates do his dirty work.”

“Yeah, but I was able to shock him when I appeared before him alive in the Northern Water Tribe.” He smirked. “He got what he deserved, though.”

Katara hummed before something dawn on her.

“Wait. So that’s why you had all those cuts and bruises when you arrived at the Spirit Oasis,” she stated before she narrowed her eyes at him. “And then you attacked me and carted Aang’s body away while he was in the Spirit World.”
Zuko turned to frown at her.

“I thought you said you have forgiven me for the wrong I did in the past,” he told her.

“I have forgiven you,” Katara reassured him with a smile. “I was just figuring out what happened, though you did knock me out pretty hard.”

“I apologize for that,” Zuko told her regrettably. “I didn’t actually mean to hurt you that badly, but back then I was more concerned with other things.”

“Yeah, I know,” she said with a nod before a grin spread to her face. “But I did knock you out pretty hard too when Sokka and I caught up with you.”

“You got lucky. I was injured when trying to escape from an exploding ship, after all,” Zuko replied nonchalantly.

“Oh, sure,” Katara said sarcastically and laughed, “You keep telling yourself that.”

She laughed harder when Zuko smirked and replied that he would.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Time passed as they continued in their search, but they only saw more vegetation and no signs of a village or any kind of civilization anywhere.

Katara was beginning to feel lightheaded, but she did not say anything about it for she did not want to worry Zuko more than he already was. She knew he was concerned for her and she was grateful that he tried to make the pace comfortable for her while helping her without making her feel like she was weak and useless. Now she could recall all those times Zuko had been there for her. How he had always tried to help her and save her, such as that time when he threw himself at her before she was crushed by falling rocks at the Western Air Temple. Or when he accompanied her to confront her mother’s killer. Or when he stepped in front of Azula’s lightning bolt. She could not believe how blind she had been for not recognizing the depth of his affection for her.

She still found it so surreal to think that Zuko loved her, had loved her for such a long time, and it made her heart grow warm at his confession that their separation had grieved him as much as it did her. But what was their new relationship called? Where was it going to lead? She wanted to marry him, she wanted to be his wife and be by his side forever, but what if that was not what he wanted?
Sure she knew he loved her, if by all the ways he had demonstrated it to her was any indication, but that did not necessarily mean he wanted to marry her. She knew the Fire Nation Council and his Royal Court wanted him to choose a Fire Nation noblewoman as his Fire Lady. She was just the daughter of a chief whose country had just recently begun to prosper. Zuko had told her that he was going to make sure she was going to be by his side forever, but did that mean as his mistress, or as his concubine? Katara felt anger, indignation, and pain at the thought.

Even though she loved him more than her own life, she would not become that for anybody. She was worth more than that.

Katara shook her head and frowned at herself as they continued to walk. Maybe the loss of blood had affected her brain. Zuko and she had barely confessed their love for each other and she was already thinking of marriage! She should not get ahead of herself, get herself worked up, or start imagining things. For now, she would just enjoy her time with Zuko while they walked through the fresh forest and then she would have a talk with him.

She was brought out of her thoughts when she felt Zuko’s warm hand grab hers tenderly and she looked up to see him gazing at her over his shoulder.

“What are you thinking about that’s making you frown like that?” Zuko asked her with a raised eyebrow.

Katara berated herself for thinking so poorly about Zuko for he would never hurt her or do anything that would reflect badly on her. She looked back at him when he squeezed her hand at her lack of response.

“It’s nothing. It’s just me, worrying needlessly,” Katara replied vaguely as she tried to give him a smile.

Zuko frowned at her and he found that he did not like how that smile she gave him did not quite reach her blue eyes. He brought them to a stop under a canopy of leaves and turned to fully face her, frowning deeply when he noticed the worry in her eyes that she could not hide.

“Katara, you know you can tell me anything,” he told her. “I will always try to help you.”

Katara felt her heart warm at his words and she squeezed his hand as she, this time, gave him a genuine happy smile.

“I know that, Zuko and I thank you,” Katara replied warmly. “But it’s nothing, really.”

She could still see that Zuko was not convinced, but she did not know what else to say to him. She could not tell him about her insecurities and fears about what their new relationship meant, she did not want to cause him any more concern or upset him. She squeezed his larger hand again and smiled gently at him before she moved to continue on their walk only to gasp when Zuko pulled her back toward him and kissed her before she could wonder what was happening.

Again, that electrifying spark flared through her at the feeling of his firm yet soft lips on hers and Katara quickly returned his affections by opening her mouth to him and wrapping her arms around his neck. Katara felt her doubts scatter into the wind as she took comfort in Zuko’s gentle kiss.

When he felt Katara relax against him, Zuko pulled back slightly and stared at her soft eyes as he brought his hands up to cradle her face and stroke her cheeks with his thumbs.

“I don’t know why you don’t want to tell me, but I want you to know that I will always be there for you when you need me,” Zuko reassured her firmly.

Katara covered his hands, which were caressing her face, with hers and she nodded at him as a bright smile adorned her face.

“And I’ll always be there for you, too,” Katara told him softly.

They remained staring at each other for a moment before Zuko smiled at her. He gave her one chaste kiss before he moved away from her to resume their walk, but not before he grabbed her hand and gently pulled her after him. It felt so good to be able to express his feelings for her, now that they have confessed. It was especially amazing being able to kiss her whenever he wanted. The trees seemed to have spread out the farther they went so they had no difficulty picking their way through the forest, hand-in-hand.

Zuko glanced at Katara again and frowned. He knew that there was something that was worrying her and he wondered what it was that had her so pensive and quiet. He hoped that she would tell him soon, but he decided not to press the issue for the moment since they had more pressing matters.
They kept silent for a few hours as they made their way around trees and through bushes, but soon the silence became too oppressive and they once again resumed sharing memories. Sometimes those memories would make both laugh and other times they would open wounds that they would then work together to mend.

“I just remembered our time in Ba Se Sing a few months ago,” Zuko spoke up. “Were you really avoiding me because of what happened when I came upon you at the lake?”

Katara felt heat rush to her cheeks and she averted her eyes when Zuko gazed at her more intensely.

“No,” she muttered softly.

“Then why were you avoiding me?” the firebender asked as a deep frown settled on his face.

“I…I had an e-erotic dream about you…and I was embarrassed,” she admitted as her blush deepened.

Zuko stopped in his tracks to stare incredulously at her. Katara stopped as well and lifted her head bashfully to look at him. Zuko let out a small chuckle before he wrapped his arms tightly around hers.

“Oh, if only you knew about the many erotic dreams I had about you since you arrived at the Fire Nation, you would be shocked,” he growled out huskily.

Katara’s eyes widened before Zuko swooped down to kiss her. They moaned against each other’s lips as pleasure rippled through them. Zuko pulled away when he felt his groin twitch. It was too soon for him to give in to his desires. He kissed her softly one more time before he took her hand and continued on their walk with a change of subject.

There was a comfortable lull in their conversation and Katara took the time to try to untangle a twig from her hair that had gotten stuck there when they passed through a thick shrub. She growled when it did not budge and she glowered at Zuko when he started to chuckle, which he quickly covered up by coughing. Katara fought with the insufferable twig for a long moment and was contemplating asking Zuko to cut that piece of hair off with his sword, when Zuko finally took pity on her and moved her hands away so he could help her. He managed to easily disentangle it from her hair and with a smile, he gave her the twig. With a huff, Katara snatched it from his fingers, threw the stick far away from her, and rubbed at her aching scalp while she muttered a thanks to Zuko.
“I really want a bath!” Katara complained as she pushed her long hair away from her face.

Zuko chuckled under his breath at her pouting expression as he grabbed her hand again and began to walk once more.

“You’ll get to enjoy your bath once we are farther away and can find a lake or pond,” Zuko told her.

“I could just waterbend some water to make a small pool, but I guess you’re right about covering more distance,” the waterbender said and pouted. “It’s just that my clothes are all dirty and itchy and I can’t wait to get out of them!”

At her words, Zuko faltered in his steps, but he quickly recovered his composure before Katara noticed. He knew she did not mean anything by what she said, but Zuko could not stop the pictures her words created in his head. The images were more realistic because they were created from memories that had surfaced in his mind. Visions of a young woman with drenched brown hair clinging to her tanned body, graceful limbs glistening with moisture, clad in a small white towel that hugged her curves. Zuko could not stop thinking about the time he had accidentally come across Katara while she bathed and it was a while before he was able to calm himself sufficiently enough to be able to speak without sounding like he was growling.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The sun was setting, and before they could be plunged into complete darkness, Zuko and Katara decided to settle down for the night. The Water Tribe woman took out the thin blankets and spread them on the cold ground before she rummaged around the bag for the remainder of the food Zuko had taken from the rebels’ camp, while the firebender looked for branches and leaves to start a campfire with. Once they had a strong and glowing fire going, they sat close together on the blankets and eagerly began to eat the salty dried meat and the last pieces of bread.

Katara was chewing thoughtfully for a moment before she turned to Zuko with a frown.

“How much longer do you think it will take before Jianguo realizes that we escaped and starts looking for us?” she asked.

“I’m not sure,” Zuko began as he paused in his eating to think it over as a solemn expression crossed his face. “Jianguo had only been gone for about a day when…when everything happened.” He cleared his throat and shook his head to keep the dark memories away. “Ping already had a head start before we set out, so perhaps he is getting close to them or maybe he has already caught up with them and has told Jianguo about what I did.”
A dark look settled on his face before he shook his head and frowned.

“If that is so, then we will need to travel faster and for as long as possible,” the young Fire Lord said. “We’ll need to be careful in case they catch up with us. They have more knowledge of this terrain than we do.”

Katara nodded and scooted closer to him. She hoped that they found help before they came across those men again. They were silent for a moment before Katara looked up at him with a worried frown.

“Zuko, we need to warn any villagers that we meet about the raiders. They need to be prepared for any attacks,” she told him firmly.

“Yeah, I was thinking of that, too,” Zuko agreed as he looked at the blazing flames before them. “I just hope that Jianguo doesn’t cause too much damage to any village he comes across in his pursuit of us.”

“But we’re no longer anywhere close to the Fire Nation colonies and any village we find now is going to be under the reign of the Earth Kingdom,” Katara spoke up. “From what you’ve told me before, Jianguo has only been attacking the Fire Nation’s colonies.”

Zuko nodded gravely.

“Yes, but there’s no saying that he won’t attack the Earth Kingdom villages in his quest to capture us,” he responded.

A deep frown appeared on Katara’s face as she thought over what Zuko had said. They needed to be as discreet as possible so they did not endanger any more innocent lives. Silence fell on them again as they each dwelled in their own thoughts.

Katara felt Zuko reach a hand up to touch her hair and she looked up at him curiously, but she noticed that he was caressing her hair absentmindedly as he stared intently at the campfire. His face was set in an impassive yet hard expression. The fire made shadows dance around his eyes, his nose, along his scar, causing his features to seem sharper and more severe than they actually were. He was lost in deep contemplation and she could detect that he was worried.
“Zuko, is something wrong?” she asked him quietly as she reached a hand out to touch his chest.

The young man blinked and looked away from the hypnotizing fire to stare down at the Water Tribe woman leaning against his side and gazing up at him in concern. He was only mildly surprised to know that she had sensed his disquiet. He continued to stroke her hair as he tried to gather his thoughts.

“I…I’m worried for my mother,” he finally admitted.

“Lady Ursa? Why?” Katara asked gently as she ran her hand on his chest in soothing circles.

“I don’t know…” Zuko trailed off uncertainly before a frown appeared on his forehead. “I have this feeling that the letter she received after my coronation was sent from the same person as the threatening letters that have been sent to me for the past few months.”

Katara gasped and her hand paused in her caress as she looked at Zuko with wide eyes.

“Do you think the same person would threaten Lady Ursa again?” she asked.

“I hope not,” Zuko responded in a harsh tone before he exhaled deeply. “But I’m confident that Admiral Jee, Advisor Chao, and my guards will keep her safe.”

Katara relaxed and leaned closer to him as Zuko wrapped his arm around her and sighed.

“Lady Ursa is well protected, Zuko,” Katara reassured him. “And besides, she can defend herself nicely. She has been living on her own for years, after all. Lady Ursa is a strong woman. Not fragile and helpless like the other women in your Royal Court,” she ended with a sniff.

Zuko smirked at her tone and reached his hand under her chin to pull her head up so he could look at her.

“Why, Katara, are you jealous?” he asked teasingly.
“No,” Katara huffed at him.

Zuko chuckled deeply at her obvious lie and grinned when she turned away from him with her nose in the air. He leaned down to kiss her cheek while he squeezed her waist as he continued to chuckle. Katara grumbled at him, but immediately relaxed in his hold.

“You’re right about my mother,” Zuko continued after he had calmed down and once again turned serious. “But I’d feel better if I was back in the Fire Nation to make sure she is all right. It will also make me feel less anxious if I have you in a safer place.”

Katara smiled at him and kissed his cheek before she snuggled closer to his chest. She was beginning to doze off when another disturbing thought crossed her mind and she tensed.

“You told me that it seemed Jianguo was being informed of everything about you, me, and the people closest to us,” Katara began.

Zuko frowned as he felt her tense and heard the worry in her voice.

“Yes, and once we return to the Fire Nation I will begin a search to find this traitor,” Zuko growled out in a low tone before he frowned at her. “Why? What’s wrong?”

“What if that same person you think could be threatening your mother is also keeping a watch on my family?” Katara began urgently before a thoughtful expression appeared on her face. “I need to return to the Southern Water Tribe and warn my father.”

Zuko felt fear creep into his heart at the thought of Katara leaving him to travel all alone, almost to the other end of the world, and his hold on her tightened so much that it made her stop speaking.

“Absolutely not!” he growled firmly. “I am not going to let you go!”

Katara gaped at him in surprise before that surprise turned into anger. She glared up at him menacingly.
“How dare you!” Katara shouted at him as she tried to get out of his hold. “You’re nobody to tell me what I can and cannot do! And if I want to visit my family, then I will! Now let me go, damn it!”

Zuko frowned at her angry words as he tried to ignore her struggling against his embrace. He knew he could not tell her what to do, especially since he was not her relative or her husband. Yet. But he was not about to let her get away from him and get herself hurt or worse. When Katara almost wrenched herself away from him, Zuko pinned her arms to her sides and pulled her so that her back was to his chest and again ignored her indignant shouts.

“How dare you!” he whispered gently in her ear. “It’s not like I want to force you or anything, but I just don’t want you to go on a trip to the Southern Water Tribe all by yourself.” He relaxed his hold slightly when Katara paused in her efforts to break away. “If we are being watched, they could capture you again, and this time they will succeed in their plan for I will give up everything for you.”

Katara’s eyes widened as his words sank in. She felt ashamed for how heatedly she reacted when she thought he challenged her independence and hurt her pride; without thinking about the consequences. She slumped against him with her head bowed.

“I’m sorry, Zuko,” she apologized softly. “I didn’t think about that.”

Zuko relaxed his hold completely and turned her around so she could look at him.

“I understand why you reacted like that,” Zuko reassured her as he swept her hair out of her face. “I know you just want to make sure your family is safe and so do I. Once we return to the Fire Nation, I’ll send Chief Hakoda and Sokka a warning.”

Katara wrapped her arms around his neck and sighed contentedly when he wound his arms around her and caressed her back.

“Thank you,” she told him as she nuzzled his neck.

A shiver ran down Zuko’s spine when Katara nuzzled into him, but he ignored it as he ran his fingers through her tresses.

“There’s nothing for you to thank me for,” he said softly. “I want your family to be safe as well.”
Since they will be my family very soon, he thought with a large smirk.

“I promise I won’t get myself caught,” Katara spoke up, oblivious to Zuko’s thoughts. “I won’t let them use me to hurt you or make you choose between the Fire Nation and me.”

“But there will not be much of a choice for I will always decide upon you,” Zuko told her ardently. “As much as I love the Fire Nation, and as much as it would pain me to hand it over to those bastards, I will sacrifice everything for you because I love you more.”

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara sighed at him as she reached up to place a quick kiss on his firm lips. “As much as it pleases me to hear you say that, I won’t let you do such a thing.”

She kissed him again when it seemed he was going to argue with her.

“Let’s just not get captured again and then you won’t have to make such a decision, okay?” Katara said and smiled when he sighed and gave her a curt nod.

“I’m as eager as you to send word to Uncle Iroh about Jianguo’s threat because I know how much you care for the Fire Nation,” Katara told him. “So that’s why I agree that we should travel faster and for as long as we can from now on.”

“I knew you’d understand how important my duties are to me,” Zuko told her as he attacked her neck with kisses, causing her to let out a few giggles. “That’s why I love you so much.”

“Why?” Katara asked in between more giggles as she tilted her head to allow Zuko to continue kissing her neck. “I know how important your duties are for you because I take my duties back in the Southern Water Tribe seriously, too.”

“That’s why,” Zuko told her as he gently nibbled on her earlobe. He smiled when she let out a small moan. “Most women would have been upset to know that their men consider their responsibilities more important than them.”

“Well, I’m not like most women,” Katara tried to reply with a huff, but instead her voice came out breathlessly.
Zuko pulled away from her soft skin and smirked at her.

“Oh, and don’t I know it,” Zuko told her huskily as he brushed his lips over hers.

Katara smiled as she basked in the wonderful sensation of Zuko’s kisses.

A chilly breeze blew by them, rustling the leaves and branches of the many trees surrounding them, and Katara shivered at the drop of temperature. She felt Zuko press her closer to him and she gasped softly into his mouth when he raised his body heat and made the campfire roar stronger, enfolding her in a warm and safe cocoon. They broke apart as Katara cuddled closer to Zuko in order to soak up his warmth, her gaze focusing on the glowing fire as a warm and happy feeling spread through her. She watched drowsily as the red and orange flames danced before her eyes, but then the fire turned scorching white and behind this white fire was an enraged Zuko. Her eyes widened at the memory.

“Katara? What’s wrong?” she heard Zuko ask and she felt him tense against her.

“It’s nothing. I was just remembering how…frightening you looked…when you attacked those men back in Jianguo’s camp,” she spoke up quietly.

Zuko stiffened and he stopped stroking her back. He closed his eyes and breathed deeply.

“The sight of you…bleeding and dying was more frightening,” he replied quietly.

Katara wondered at the change of his mood and shifted against him so she could look up at him.

“It just surprised me that you were able to kill so many men so easily,” she said.

Zuko tensed even further at her words as he looked down at her.

“What they tried to do to you and for causing your blood to be spilled was unforgivable. They deserved it for hurting you,” he replied darkly.
He looked away from her so he could stare out into the darkness beyond the trees.

“I don’t feel any remorse for killing them,” he confessed.

He returned his gaze toward her with a well-concealed apprehensive expression. He saw that she was looking at him with wide, blue eyes and his heart clenched in dread.

“Do…do you think less of me?” he asked her in an emotionless tone. “Do you see me as a monster now, Katara?”

Katara’s eyes softened at the slight anxiousness she could detect in his voice. When he looked away again, she reached for his face and turned his head so he could see her. Zuko looked into her eyes apprehensively, afraid that he might see her disgust or pity. Instead he was surprised to see her give him a compassionate and understanding smile.

“I would never think less of you for trying to protect me,” she told him sincerely. “I admit I was a bit shocked at your ruthlessness, but I understand that you did what you did to avenge me. And in a way, their deaths were for the best for now those men won’t be able to hurt anyone else.”

She ran her fingers along the scarred flesh on the left side of his face and she smiled gently when Zuko sighed and leaned into her touch.

“I will never see you as a monster, Zuko,” she reminded him firmly.

Zuko could not explain the relief and elation her heartfelt words of understanding caused him and he crushed her soft body to him and captured her lips in a fierce kiss that had them both panting in no time. Gods, he could not get enough of kissing Katara. He pulled away from her mouth with a soft groan after a moment and placed heated kisses on the skin of her face until he rested his head on her shoulder while she caressed his hair.

“I knew you would understand, Katara,” Zuko whispered into her ear.

Katara smiled before she decided to change the subject.
“I never knew you could bend white fire,” she told him in an amazed tone.

Zuko gave her a squeeze of gratitude at the change of topic before he moved slightly away so he could smirk at her.

“Neither did I,” he admitted with a quiet chuckle.

Katara looked at him with a confused expression. “What?”

“Most firebenders never reach the level of bending white fire,” the young man explained to her.

“Really? Why is that?” she asked as she tilted her head to the side curiously.

“Well…” Zuko began as he tried to remember what he had read about the technique during his studies as a child. “I’ve only heard of a few firebenders that were capable of achieving such high levels of firebending. I’m not sure how it comes to be, whether from intense years of training or… luck.”

“Luck?” asked the waterbender.

Zuko raised his head and gazed out into the trees again. He was silent for a moment before he finally replied to her question.

“Azula…she was able to bend blue fire since she began her first years of training, even though she was a very young girl,” Zuko began emotionlessly. “She did not need to try, it came naturally to her.”

Katara ran her hand soothingly along his arm since she knew Zuko was still hurt by the preference and praise Azula always received for her ability to master her bending so easily. She also knew that, despite what Azula had done to them, it still saddened Zuko to see his younger sister lost in insanity. Katara looked up at him to give him a large smile in order to cheer him up.
“So then that means that all your years of hard training paid off for you to be able to bend white fire,” Katara chirped.

Zuko tightened his hold on her as he looked away from staring into the distance so he could gaze into her bright cobalt eyes.

“Maybe my training was one cause,” he began as he gave her a small smile, “but the reason why I was able to achieve the level of bending white fire was because of you.”

“Me?” Katara asked skeptically.

“You don’t seem to comprehend how much you mean to me, Katara,” Zuko said and frowned at her, as his arms tightened around her. “I cannot stand it when you get hurt or are in danger and it always angers me when someone insults you.

“But back in Jianguo’s camp, you had been both disrespected and had been…fatally wounded. My usual anger turned into rage, a rage that had festered so intensely inside me that it exploded in white fire. All I thought at that moment was hurting those that had caused you pain and the need to get rid of them as soon as possible so that I could help you, but I…I was too late.”

“But I’m alive now,” Katara reminded him as she stared softly into his tormented golden eyes. “I’m all right. You need to put that in the past and forget it, Zuko.”

She was surprised when Zuko tightly clutched onto her, almost despairingly, his eyes seemed to blaze as he stared intensely into her eyes.

“I can’t, Katara! I can’t!” Zuko shouted heatedly. “I can’t forget the memory of you dying in my arms! Don’t you understand? I…I almost lost you…”

His voice trailed off brokenly and Katara quickly wrapped her arms around him to comfort him while he buried his face into her hair.

“You don’t need to worry anymore because I will never leave you,” Katara promised him fervently. “You don’t need to worry any longer because you will never lose me again.”
Zuko closed his eyes tightly as he took comfort in the words and loving embrace of the woman he loved above all else. They were silent for a moment as they clutched onto each other before Katara moved away slightly. Zuko wanted to pull her back to him, but he reluctantly let go of her. He watched as a faint blush spread across her cheeks and he raised an eyebrow in curiosity.

“Zuko? Did you really mean…what you said to Feng?” she asked almost shyly.

“What did I say?” he asked her with a frown.

“When the coward was begging for mercy, you told him that he should’ve thought about that before hurting what…what was yours,” she said, blushing more deeply.

Zuko quickly leaned down to press his lips to hers, reaching out a hand to brush the back of his fingers along her cheek.

“You are mine,” Zuko growled huskily against her plump lips as he stared intently into her shiny, blue orbs, “As much as I am yours.”

Katara felt elated at his fervent words and she allowed herself to get lost in the demanding kiss Zuko was bestowing upon her.

Zuko slowly pulled them down onto the blankets and settled his upper body lightly over hers as he continued to assault her mouth in languid kisses, while his hand gently stroked her side. He licked her lower lip and he smiled inwardly when she immediately opened her mouth to him. Without any hesitation, Zuko slipped his tongue inside her hot mouth, earning himself a low moan from deep within her throat while she gripped the hair at the nape of his neck. Their tongues touched and when she jumped against him, Zuko decided to slow down a bit, so she could get used to the sensations.

Their lips broke apart for a moment so they could catch their breaths before Zuko again leaned down to capture Katara’s sweet mouth. He slipped his tongue inside her moist mouth and lightly caressed her tongue, gently coaxing her into reciprocating his actions.

Katara experienced a strange and new level of pleasure as Zuko’s warm tongue continued to stroke hers in a soft yet firm caress. She moaned and breathed deeply through her nose as her whole body began to heat up. She tried to follow his lead as the weight from Zuko’s upper body touching hers delighted her in ways she had never known. Her tongue touched his a bit timidly and awkwardly at first, but when an encouraging moan sounded from his throat, her confidence flared. She began to taste and explore his mouth just as he had done to hers before. A spicy and smoky flavor covered her taste buds and she found that she liked it very much.

Zuko grinned in his head as Katara learned quickly and picked up the pace as she eagerly explored his mouth. A low and pleased groan escaped him when she wrapped her soft tongue around his while she ran one of her hands down his back. He had never experienced such immense satisfaction from just a kiss and he could not help but wonder how much pleasure he would experience once he actually made love to Katara.

That delightful thought and Katara’s current caressing mouth made his blood heat up to such intense levels that it was almost painful. The leisurely pace in which he had started swiftly changed into a frantic and heated kiss. Katara tried to keep up with him, but Zuko quickly dominated her mouth and she surrendered willingly while she tangled her fingers into his short hair. Her leg brushed the inside of his thigh, almost touching the evidence of his arousal, and he growled. Zuko pressed himself closer to her while his hands began to roam over her soft body that lay beneath his hard frame. His desire to shred her clothes away from her body and take her grew to such an extreme level that it almost scared him.

Katara was lost in Zuko’s fiery embrace as she felt his large and warm hands caress her body. She gasped as a shot of pleasure went straight to her core when one of his hands cupped her breast and she immediately stiffened as she also noticed something hard poking her thigh.

Zuko noticed her body tense and he froze. He moved his twitching hand away from her breast and slowly released her mouth as he also moved his lower body away from her. He placed his head against her shoulder and breathed heavily as he tried to calm his racing heart, embarrassed that he had lost his control like that. It had never happened to him before. Of course, the few women he had been with before could not make his blood flare up with heat the way just a single caress from Katara did. He pulled back slightly to look into her eyes and he swallowed when he saw her flushed features and swollen lips.

“I’m sorry for being too forward. I didn’t mean to overwhelm you,” he apologized quietly to her. His voice came out husky and he cleared his throat a few times.

Katara was still trying to take air into her lungs and make her fuzzy brain start working again so she could reply to him.

“I-it’s f-fine,” Katara tried to reassure him before she looked away from his eyes a bit bashfully. “It’s just that I’m not used to such things yet, but I…I really enjoyed it.”
Zuko smiled at her shy admission and he tucked a strand of hair behind her ear. She looked back up to smile at him, but he stiffened when her leg accidentally brushed against him.

“I, uh…” Zuko swallowed as his shifted. “I think it’s best that we get some rest now so we can set out at dawn.”

He pressed a quick kiss to her lips before he moved away from her. He stood up with his back turned toward her and smoothed his hair back.

“Where are you going?” Katara asked him innocently as she sat up. She blushed as she tried to straighten out her shirt, though her wrappings covered her breasts.

Zuko froze at her innocent inquiry as he was making his way to the trees.

“Um…I…” he stammered before he cleared his throat. “I need to…uh…step behind a tree…for a moment.”

He groaned inwardly in mortification at what he said before he looked over his shoulder to see what Katara thought.

“Oh,” was her simple reply. “Okay, then. Don’t take too long.”

Zuko gave her a small smile as she smiled back at him innocently.

“I’ll be back shortly,” he muttered. He hoped that she did not notice he was blushing. Dammit, he never blushed.

“Okay, I’ll be waiting for you,” Katara told him before she grinned. “I’ll probably freeze without your body heat.”

Zuko gave her a quick nod as he strode away. He tried not to walk too stiffly due to his erection. He disappeared in the shadows of the trees, clenching his right hand while his left hand, the one that had cupped Katara’s soft breast, twitched.
He sighed.

He could not wait for that glorious day when it would be Katara that would take care of the not-so-little problem currently in his hand.
Heated Chase

Two days later found the young Fire Lord and the waterbender walking carefully along a narrow path, their left hands tightly grasping the rough rock wall to their side in order to keep them from falling over the precipice to their right. Katara took another glance, to the plunging deeps below, before she quickly directed her eyes forward when her stomach made a queasy flip. It wasn’t that she was afraid of heights. She had ridden on Appa’s back while he flew in the sky high above the earth, after all. It was just the knowledge that if her footing faltered there would be nothing to save her from plummeting to the many thick trees and sharp rocks below.

The young Water Tribeswoman glanced at Zuko’s tensed back as he walked before her and a soft smile spread across her face as she remembered what had happened a few minutes ago. They had been walking along the edge for a while and she had taken the time to admire the beautiful scenery to their right when her right foot stepped upon a crumbling piece of the path, sending her almost careening over the side. Before she could even let out a scream, Zuko had whirled around, grabbed her arm, and pulled her back. She had been about to thank him when he had crushed her to his tall frame and began to berate her for not being more careful and then demanded that she paid more attention. At first, she had been indignant at his words, but then she understood that he had just been frightened when he began to press kisses on her lips and face while muttering his thanks to Agni that he was able to get to her before she had fallen to her death. Katara had reassured him that she was going to be more careful and then they had resumed their walk, albeit a bit more slowly.

Katara’s eyes became soft and loving as she continued to stare at Zuko’s strong back as he continued picking his way on the narrow path. She did not like Zuko to worry so much, but she had to admit that it made her feel all warm and happy when he became so concerned for her safety and care. She wondered what she could do to show him how much she appreciated everything he did for her and to show him how much she loved him.

The memory of the heated kiss they had shared a few nights ago flitted across her mind as she recalled the way his tongue had caressed her mouth so thoroughly while his hand boldly explored her body. A shiver went through her as she remembered the feeling of his hand on her breast and a small blush appeared on her cheeks when she felt her body responding to the memory. A now familiar heat flared in her lower belly, her breasts tingled and warmed, and moisture gathered between her thighs. Such new feelings unnerved her and she didn’t know how to react to them properly.

Katara noticed Zuko turn to her and she resisted the urge to cross her arms over her breasts self-consciously as she returned his concerned look with a small smile.

Zuko glanced over his shoulder for the twentieth time since Katara had almost plummeted to the trees below and he let out a relieved breath when his eyes landed on her soft face. He caught her reassuring smile before he turned his head forward again. His heart had felt like it jumped to his throat when he had heard the ground crumble behind him and heard Katara’s shocked gasp. He had instinctively turned around to catch her. He could not describe the fear that had resurfaced within him at the thought that he could have lost her again. She meant so much to him. He loved her so much.
And he would be damned before he allowed anything to take her away from him. He hoped that they could return to the Fire Nation soon where he would be more reassured that she would be safe.

The cry of a bird drew Zuko’s attention away from his thoughts and his eyes followed the eagle-hawk’s flight as it spread its long wings wide and soared across the orange-reddish sky. It reminded Zuko that night would settle soon and it would not be good for them to be stuck where they were in the darkness. Hopefully, the narrow path would end soon so they could find a place to rest.

In the last few days, they had been able to cover more ground since Katara had regained her strength and had insisted that she was feeling better and could walk longer distances. They would head out as soon as the first rays of the sun touched the sky, rest for an hour or two at noon, and continue late into the night until they found a place to sleep and rest. They were running out of dried meat, but fortunately, the forest had an abundance of fruits and nuts that would be able to sustain them for a while. Zuko was sure that they were many miles ahead of Jianguo and his men, allowing him to breathe a bit easier at the knowledge that they would not be caught and Katara would be safe until they found help or his uncle somehow found them.

Zuko hoped that Iroh was all right and nothing had happened to him and his crew during the storm, but he was confident his wise uncle had managed to evade any disaster. Zuko again found himself worrying about what his mother was going through. He frowned at the thought that she might think she had lost her son so soon after being reunited and after so many years of separation, but he vowed that once he returned home he would find a way to make it up to her.

It was a couple of hours later when the narrow path began to make a deep slope and they breathed a sigh of relief when they again found themselves on even ground. The trees were smaller in this area and there were less of them clustered together, allowing both weary travelers to see the sky above their heads. A few birds darted from tree branch to tree branch and did not seem to notice the two humans that walked below as they continued to chirp and squawk, nor did they noticed the calculating gleam the tall male sent their way.

Zuko looked away from the birds—or better said, the prospect of meat—and instead turned his attention to Katara who was now walking beside him. Though she did not complain much, Zuko saw that their continuous walk and the lack of food was taking a toll on her and he knew that he needed to find a way to gather more food before they starved. He had never in his life hunted an animal for food before, he was, after all, born a prince and had people who did that for him. Not even when he had run across the Earth Kingdom with his uncle when they were fugitives years before. And when he had joined the gang it had always been Sokka who hunted for meat and Zuko had just helped him carry it back to the group for Katara to clean and cook it. He had never set up a trap for an animal or hunted it down so he was not sure how he was going to go about it.
But then again, he was a skilled tracker, one of the reasons why he had always been able to come upon Aang and the group when he was hunting them, so maybe it would not be that hard to track one animal down so he could present it to Katara. There was this strange, almost primitive, urge inside him that demanded he provide for his woman, by feeding her and making sure she was taken care of, and it confounded him.

Shaking such thoughts and feelings away for the moment, Zuko reached out a hand to brush it tenderly along the small of Katara’s back. He felt her shiver against him and he smiled when she turned to look at him with bright blue eyes. Ever since they had kissed so passionately two nights ago, he found it hard to keep his hands away from her lovely body, and curb his desire to make love to her.

“We should start looking for a place to rest,” he told her in his usual cool tone.

Katara smiled and nodded at him. “Yeah, and then we could…”

Zuko raised an eyebrow when she paused mid-sentence before a large smile appeared on her lips and her eyes brightened.

“What is it?” he asked curiously.

“I can feel a large body of water calling to me,” Katara spoke up. “It’s probably a river or a lake.”

Katara closed her eyes for a moment as she savored the pull of her element after being blocked from her bending those two weeks they were held as hostages. She concentrated on the pull for a moment, letting it wash over her, before her eyes snapped opened to her right.

“I can feel it coming from that way,” Katara told him excitedly as she pointed through the trees. “Come on!”

Without waiting for Zuko to reply, Katara grabbed his hand and pulled him after her as she began to race toward the call of water. Zuko allowed the waterbender to drag him after her and he watched as her brown tresses flew behind her as they went around trees and through bushes at a fast run.

It was a few minutes later when the sound of rushing water reached their ears before they burst from the trees and skidded along the edge of a narrow river. Katara squealed happily, as she dropped her bag to the ground before she let go of Zuko’s hand and raced toward the water, eagerly stepping into it with boots and all. She enjoyed the feeling of the cool liquid against her legs and a deep sigh left her lips.

Zuko watched as Katara wound a thin water whip around her form and happily twirled in the river, the water reaching to her knees. A fond smile spread across his face at the obvious joy he saw on her beautiful features. Zuko waited for a moment as his beloved was once again reacquainted with her element before he dropped his own bag to the ground, laying the small sword on top of it before he finally stepped forward so he could stand right on the edge of the river.

“It seems like your wish to take a bath just came true,” Zuko spoke up with amusement lacing his voice.

Katara turned to smile at him as she bent the water whip into a small ball that hovered above her hands before her eyes narrowed at the gleam that reached Zuko’s golden eyes. She dropped the ball of water until it rained back down into the river and she crossed her arms below her breasts as she narrowed her eyes at him.

“I’m not going to bathe in front of you,” she told him firmly.

Zuko just smirked at her as he crossed his own arms over his broad chest.

“It’s not like it will be the first time I saw you in a swimming suit or your underclothes, you know,” he replied in a casual tone.

Katara gaped at him for a moment as a blush spread on her cheeks.

“W-what?!” she shrieked.

“You used to practice your waterbending in them in our travels during the war,” Zuko reminded her, smirk still in place on his lips. “You used to prance around in them.”

“I did not prance around!” Katara gasped in indignation before she pointed an accusing finger at him. “You’re the one with the perverted mind!”
Zuko felt his face flush at her words since he could not deny that he had enjoyed the sight of her, he had been, after all, a teenage boy. He couldn’t help himself noticing and enjoying the view, he wasn’t blind, for Agni’s sake!

“You’re the one who came into my room when I finished bathing and gaped at me while I only had a towel wrapped around my waist,” Zuko said instead.

Katara blushed before she raised an eyebrow at him.

“Oh, yeah? Well, you’re the one who walked in on me while I bathed at the lake a few months ago!” Katara countered.

“How could I forget that…?” Zuko breathed out wistfully.

Katara sputtered at him for a second before she shook her fist at him. “Why you…”

“It’s not like I come across a beautiful woman in her bath every day,” Zuko interrupted her with a smile.

Katara lowered her hand and she looked down at her feet submerged in the water as she blushed deeply at his words before she looked back up to his face with a suspicious look in her eyes.

“You told me before that you hadn’t been spying on me,” Katara began in an even tone. “Did you lie?”

“No,” Zuko answered truthfully. “I was telling you the truth when I said I didn’t know you were there. But…when you surfaced above the water with your hair and skin gleaming with droplets under the moonlight…I just couldn’t look away,” he admitted softly. “I knew I should have left you alone as soon as I realized you were there, but it was like my body refused to obey me.”

The gold in his eyes darkened slightly as he let his eyes roam her body in a slow caress that caused Katara’s skin to heat up.

“I would be lying if I said that I had not wished that you would have stepped out of the water so I could have seen all of you,” he told her, his voice turning deep.

He paused briefly when Katara’s eyes widened and her blush deepened. He loved it that he was able to bring the rich hue to her cheeks so easily.

“So perhaps you were right when you called me a pervert and attacked me,” he continued, “but it hurt me when you accused me of having dishonorable intentions towards you.”

Katara glanced away from his eyes before she again lifted her head to smile at him.

“I know you aren’t a dishonorable man, Zuko. It’s just that you startled me and I lashed out like any indignant woman would at having her privacy invaded,” Katara told him sincerely before she looked away from him shyly. “Besides, I can’t be mad at you for having such thoughts because…I…also wondered what you would have looked like without…the t-towel wrapped around your waist.”

Zuko chuckled at her blush and bashful admittance before he leaned forward a bit, his eyes gleaming under the setting sun.

“Very soon you will get your wish, Katara,” he promised in a whisper. “And I will also have my fondest wish to see you naked before me realized.”

He chuckled deeply at her shocked expression and he turned around before she could say a word.

“You should hurry up and bathe before the sun goes down,” he prompted her.

Katara closed her gaping mouth and huffed at him. Her lips lifted in a smirk, and with a flick of her hand, a small wave of water rose from the river and drenched the unsuspecting firebender’s back. Zuko jumped and hissed as the cold water met him and he whirled around with an angry glare.

“What was that for?” he demanded indignantly.

Katara laughed at him as the water clung to his hair and clothes, and it was a while before she calmed down enough to answer him.
“You need a bath too, after having such dirty thoughts,” she wheezed out before she broke out into giggles.

Zuko glowered at her through his wet bangs and he swiped his dark hair away from his eyes since it had grown longer during the past few weeks. He opened his mouth to shout at her to stop her laughter, but instead he closed it and his scowling lips were replaced by a devious smirk.

_Ah, if only you knew of the many ‘dirty’ things I have dreamed about doing to you and the many ‘dirty’ things we have done in my dreams, Katara_, he mused in his mind.

“You know what? You’re absolutely right,” he finally spoke up.

Katara stopped giggling to raise a questioning eyebrow at him.

“I am?” she asked suspiciously.

“Yes, I do need a bath,” the young lord said in a nonchalant tone.

He bent down to remove his black boots before tossing them to the side. He then raised his head to keep eye contact with Katara as he casually began to remove his red tunic, making sure to keep his face as smooth as a stone, though his eyes were burning with an intense fire. His tunic was tossed to the side and it landed right beside his dirty boots. Without a hint of emotion on his face, Zuko stepped into the water and made his way toward the frozen waterbender.

“What are you doing?!?” Katara shrieked as she took a step back.

Zuko stopped and cocked his head to side, giving her an innocent look, which did not fool her at all.

“Why, I am going to take a bath just like you said I should,” he replied with a small shrug.

Katara opened her mouth to scream at him to leave, but she found that she could not get any words out when her eyes landed on his muscular torso and stomach. Her brain seemed to have shut down when Zuko reached down to cup some water from the fresh river before letting it run down his smooth, alabaster skin in slow trickles. Her cheeks burned and her breathing picked up a little more than normal as her eyes followed the path the water drops made down his upper body, down gleaming pale skin and hard muscles, until they disappeared on the hem of his dark pants. Realizing that she was staring, Katara snapped her eyes away to look back at Zuko and she scowled when she saw that he had a smug smirk on his face.

Oh, yeah? Two can play at this game, Katara thought with an inward smirk as she wadded her way toward the edge of the river and stepped onto the grassy ground.

When Zuko looked up to frown at her, Katara gave him a wide and innocent smile before she turned away from him. Once she knew she had his attention, Katara reached for the sash around her waist and pulled one of the ends until it slowly unraveled away from her. She dropped the black material to the floor at her feet.

Zuko froze in his movements as he stared at Katara with wide eyes as she slowly began to undress before him.

What is she doing? he groaned in his head. She’s not really going to…Is she really going to…?

He could not continue that thought as the idea of Katara willingly standing before him nude as the day she was born made his head a bit foggy. He had actually expected her to have run away or frozen him to a tree the moment he took off his tunic.

His heart almost jumped from his chest when she bent down in front of him to unlace her boots and his eyes swept appreciatively over her firm backside until she straightened once she had rolled the bottom hem of her dark pants above her knees. Zuko felt himself beginning to pant as her smooth and tanned legs were revealed and he swallowed when he imagined those wonderful appendages wrapped around his waist. His eyes darkened slightly when more of Katara’s skin was revealed to him as she finally reached for her blue tunic and he groaned inwardly when she dropped it to the floor beside her boots. He cursed under his breath at the white wrappings on her chest that were hiding what he had been dying to see for so long. He just knew Katara would not actually undress fully; it was still too early for that.

Once she had removed everything except her under wrappings and her pants to cover her most private areas, Katara slowly stepped back into the water without even looking at the silent firebender already in it. Katara turned away from him so she could hide her blushing face. She could not believe she was doing this! What in the world had seized control of her to make her be so bold? She felt embarrassed and self-conscience, but she wanted to tease Zuko as he had been doing to her recently. So she swallowed down her embarrassment and the urge to run back to shore to put her clothes back on while she water-whipped Zuko across his face for staring and teasing her in the first place.
Commanding her arms to stop trembling, Katara bent a ribbon of water above her head and allowed it to sprinkle down on her. A soft sigh escaped her at the feeling of the clean water caressing her skin like refreshing drops of rain.

Zuko’s eyes became slightly hooded and he licked his lips as he watched Katara bathe before him. His eyes followed her graceful movements as she bent the clean water around her tempting form, leaving a wet trail on her lovely, caramel skin while her long hair clung to her back. Zuko felt his cock straining against the confinement of his trousers as he saw Katara’s white wrappings become almost transparent as the water touched them, and he knew that if he continued watching her he would not be able to stop himself from taking her. It had been a bad idea teasing her, he should have known she was going to find a way to get back at him. Zuko turned away from the delicious sight and hastily finished bathing before he pounced on her.

Once his skin and hair were free of the dirt and grime that had accumulated on him, Zuko cleared his throat lightly and averted his eyes when the waterbending woman turned to him.

“I’m going to start a fire. You should hurry before the sun sets completely,” he began before he turned narrowed eyes at the distant dark trees. “I don’t want anyone to come upon you and see you…in such a state,” he growled out before he flicked his eyes toward her. “I don’t want anyone to see what only I am supposed to see.”

“Uh…o-okay,” Katara stuttered, her heart racing at the possessiveness in his voice.

Zuko nodded at her before he stepped onto the shore. He raised his body temperature, and steamed rose from his body until his hair, skin and pants were completely dry. Once he was completely dressed, he turned to smile briefly at Katara before he turned away to get the small camp ready.

Once he had placed the blankets on the ground and had a nice fire blazing, Zuko sat down to watch over Katara and make sure no one came around as she continued to waterbend in the small river. He looked briefly at the darkening sky before he returned his attention to his future bride; the thought brought a smile to his face.

He noticed that Katara was no longer bathing but was now playing with the water. He watched as she would send balls or ribbons of water into the air before freezing them until they plopped down back into the river where they dissolved, and he knew she was trying to get reacquainted with her graceful element after having their bending abilities suppressed for so long.

Zuko glanced at the burning fire before him and he propped his chin over his interlaced fingers as a deep frown appeared on his shadowed face. It brought up a new question about how easy it was for someone’s chi to be blocked. He had hated the horrible feeling of not being able to feel his inner fire, and if he had not regained it so soon, Zuko was positive he would probably have gone mad. He wondered absently if that was how his father had felt when Aang had stripped him of his firebending. Is that why Ozai was the way he was now?

‘This is not over, Ursa…I will reclaim you and the throne one way or the other. Mark my words.’ Ozai’s words rebounded in his head.

Zuko narrowed his eyes and he began to wonder how Ozai could be so confident in his threat. Did his sire perhaps have a way to the outside world? Was he perhaps giving out orders? But how could that be? The disgraced Fire Lord was well guarded and Zuko had given his guards strict orders not to let anyone visit Ozai, orders that if not met were punishable by death.

He was brought out of his thoughts when he heard a splash and he looked up from staring at the red flames to see Katara waterbending waves from the bluish river until they reached great heights. Then she swirled them over her head in a small water tornado before letting them splash back into the running river, shiny droplets sprinkling her smooth skin and her chocolate tresses. Zuko watched as she lifted her lean arms before her and bent thin droplets of water into the air, and with a deep exhale, froze them into sharp icicles that she then, with a flick of her wrist, sent in fast succession toward some trees where they were embedded deeply into the thick bark.

A smile replaced his previous pensive frown and Zuko straightened in his spot so he could see his love better. He felt so proud and smug that it was he who was going to have the privilege of having such a strong woman as his wife. He marveled at how powerful yet graceful and beautiful she was, and she was all his.

His and no one else’s.

Zuko’s golden eyes widened slightly. He was a bit surprised at how possessive he felt over Katara, but he could not deny he would—as Sokka would say—‘beat the crap’ of any man that tried to take her away from him or so much as snuck a glance her way. She was all his and he would not share.

The amber in his eyes darkened as he once again took notice of Katara’s scantily clad form, though her back was still turned toward him. His eyes traced every dip and curve of her feminine body from her long legs, to her flared hips, to her narrow waist. His breathing became a bit labored, the hand that rested on his thigh twitched, as he watched droplets sliding down her smooth skin. He found himself envying them since he wanted it to be his tongue that took such a delightful voyage. Zuko wanted so much to spring to his feet, snatch the enticing woman in his arms, lay her on the grass and have his way with her in order to quench the fire that raged in his loins. After all, he had gone more than a year in abstinence; more than a year not knowing the touch of a woman. But the desire for intimacy had never been so strong until Katara once again came back into his life and he had realized he was deeply in love with her.

Katara absentmindedly turned a bit in his direction and Zuko’s breath hitched roughly in his throat as he took noticed of her generous breasts. They were bounded tightly with the white wrapping—perhaps so she could fight better and would not be distracted—but he could just make out their peaks straining against the fabric, the sight making the blood rush to his loins. A low groan escaped him when he brought his hand down on the big bulge visible on the front of his pants, trying to find some relief from his torment. He was about to rise to his feet so he could go to her, but he was able to stop himself before he did something that disgraced them both. He had promised that he was not going to do anything to her that she was not ready for and dammit he was going to keep that promise even if it killed him!

Zuko bit his lip as his hand gave a last squeeze to his covered erection before he moved it away to lay it on the cool grass beside him. He took a couple of deep breaths in order to cool down his ardor and mentally willed the evidence of his arousal to disappear.

Katara had a large smile on her face as she finally relaxed in her waterbending stance as the last rays of the sun touched her skin. She made her way back to shore where she quickly bent the water off her. She glanced briefly in the direction where Zuko was sitting and she blushed when she realized he was staring at her, and so intensely, over the glow of the fire. Katara quickly put on her clothes and boots before she made her way toward Zuko and the small campfire he had created.

Zuko lifted his head to look at the darkening sky as he realized Katara was walking towards him and he felt a moment of panic since he had been unable to completely cool his heated blood. He conjured up a memory from when he had accidently stumbled upon his uncle submerged in a hot spring during their time in the Earth Kingdom and a shudder of disgust went through him. That image was enough to wilt his arousal and he breathed a mental sigh of relief. He smiled when Katara plopped down next to him with a large smile on her face and thanked him when he gave her the last of their dried meat.

“Even though we have no soap, I feel much better,” Katara told him with a soft sigh as she ran her fingers through her hair. Now, if only she had a brush and another set of clothes.

Zuko smiled at the happiness that surrounded her and he wondered if she would be just as happy or more so when he told her about his future plans for them. He cleared his throat softly and when she looked up from eating, he reached a hand to brush it tenderly against her cheek. Tenderness was not something he was used to feeling or displaying, but with Katara, he could not stop himself from showing such affectionate emotions and actions.

“There’s something important that we need to discuss,” he said coolly.
Katara brought down the piece of dried meat from her mouth as she frowned at him.

“Discuss? About what?” Katara asked quietly.

“About us,” he responded softly as his fingers touched her lips.

Katara stiffened slightly at his words.

“Us?” she whispered.

Zuko nodded as he moved his fingers away from her lips to trace them down her cheek and then down her neck.

“Ever since we confessed what we feel for each other we have not discussed anything about our new relationship and what it will lead to,” he explained slowly as if choosing his words carefully.

Katara fidgeted under his touch, not only because it made her skin feel like it was on fire, but because of the direction their conversation might lead to was making her uneasy.

“I…I have been thinking about talking to you about that,” she spoke up softly.

Zuko paused in his light caresses and frowned at her obvious discomfort. A small ache formed in his chest as fear gripped him at the thought that maybe he was the only one who was ready for their relationship to take such a serious step as marriage.

“Alright,” he began hesitantly. “What do you want to tell me?”

Katara looked down at her lap where her hands were fiddling together in worry. She needed to get her insecurities out in the open and Zuko had to hear what she had to say. She took a deep breath before she looked up to stare him in the eye.
“Zuko, I love you,” Katara began seriously. “I love you more than anything in the world, but I will not allow myself to be treated as anything less than what I am.”

Zuko leaned back in bewilderment and brought his hand down from her cheek to rest it on his knee as he wondered at her words. A light frown marked his brow, betraying his confusion.

“What do you mean?” he asked.

Katara looked away from his hypnotizing, golden eyes for a second before she returned her gaze with a determined resolve.

“I won’t become…your mistress or concubine and live with you while you take a wealthy Fire Nation noblewoman as your wife and Fire Lady,” she told him firmly.

Zuko’s mouth fell open as he gaped at her in disbelief. Did she just say what he thought she just said? He felt his temper flare.

“Where the hell did you get such a ridiculous thought from, Katara?!” he exclaimed angrily.

“Ridiculous?!” Katara shouted resentfully.

“Yes, ridiculous!” Zuko shouted back as he practically loomed over her. “I do not want you as my concubine! I want you as my wife!”

Katara gasped and she reeled back in shock as she stared at Zuko for a few speechless seconds until she finally was able to stutter out, “W-wife?”

“Yes, wife,” Zuko repeated, this time more gently as he drew her to his side before he leaned down to place a soft kiss to her lips.

Katara did not immediately respond to the kiss as her mind was still whirling with different kinds of emotions raging from shock, confusion, to delight, but a second later she relaxed against him and returned his kiss with soft presses of her lips. Zuko pulled away a short moment later to frown at her as he once again continued to caress the side of her face.
“Do you really think I would disrespect you in such a way as to take you as a concubine?” he asked, slightly offended.

Katara blushed in mortification and looked away from his hurt expression. She felt guilty that she had again accused Zuko of something he would never do, even after she told herself that she would do anything to make him happy.

“I’m sorry,” she said softly. “I didn’t really believe you’d do such a thing. I know you would never really hurt me, but I really had no idea that you wanted me as your wife.”

Another frown crossed Zuko’s features at her words. He placed a finger under her chin and lifted her face so he could see her blue eyes. He saw the swirl of emotions in their depths and he wondered at them.

“Why wouldn’t you think that?” he asked.

Katara removed herself from his grasp and stood up. She frowned at him for a moment before she began to frantically pace the ground before him with an agitated sigh.

“How could you want me as a wife?” she exclaimed. “I’m just the daughter of a chief from a country that just finished rebuilding! I am a waterbender, the exact opposite of a firebender! I am not a noblewoman, I’m not wealthy, nor was I brought up to know the proper etiquette of court life! And above all, I am not a demure and submissive woman!”

Zuko swiftly rose to his feet, and within two long strides, he was upon her before she could step back. Her eyes widened in surprise when Zuko grabbed hold of her arm and tugged, causing her to bump into his chest. She opened her mouth to yell at him, but he silenced her with a firm kiss that stole the air from her lungs. Katara immediately surrendered to his embrace and caressing mouth, and she wrapped her arms around his neck to bring him closer to her, but she groaned in disappointment when he pulled back. They stared into each other’s eyes for a moment as each tried to figure out the other’s thoughts. Zuko leaned down and brushed his lips against hers as he stared deeply into her bright, sapphire orbs.

“Those are some of the many reasons why I love you and why I want you as my wife,” Zuko told her truthfully.
“W-what?” Katara stuttered. Her heart was beating fast as she basked in the soft touch of Zuko’s lips and his warm breath that coasted along her skin.

“The fact that you are not like one of those noblewomen is why I want you,” he began. “I admire your ability to defend yourself and your determination and kind heart to help those in need even if perhaps they do not deserve it. I love your defiance and your fiery spirit,” Zuko continued huskily as he groaned against her plump lips as his breathing increased. “You are a great waterbender, a great fighter, and I love the fact that despite this, you still radiate a feminine aura that makes me want to protect and cherish you.”

The young Fire Lord pulled away from her soft and wonderful mouth only to slide his lips against her cheek, across her nose to the other side of her face, and then down her neck. He heard Katara’s breath hitch as he flicked the tip of his tongue out to taste the skin there and he groaned deep in his throat at the clean and fresh flavor of her. He could feel his own breathing quicken, so he retreated when he knew he still had control of himself. He still found it hard to believe that this slip of a woman could affect him so much that it caused him to falter in the tight control he had on his emotions.

Katara’s eyes had closed in bliss at his words and touch, but she fluttered them open when Zuko leaned back. As she focused her vision, she found herself staring at warm amber eyes gazing at her from such a handsome face, and she felt her heart swell at the thought that this man loved her, truly loved her as much as she did him. She wanted to tell him just that, but she stopped herself so she could listen to him when he continued to speak.

“I’m glad you aren’t the same as most of the haughty and snobbish noblewoman from my Royal Court because then I would be bored out of my mind.” He grinned at her.

“I can barely tolerate Court life and my courtiers, so why would I want be tied to one for the rest of my life? Besides, if I really wanted to tie myself to one of those silly noblewomen I would have done so by now. And if I was really looking for one of the women from my Court as wife I would not have hesitated to…marry Mai.”

Katara felt a flare of jealousy at the thought that Zuko could have married the regal and silent noblewoman, since she could not deny that Mai would have been one of the best candidates for Fire Lady. Katara remembered the hurt behind the determination in Mai’s eyes as the young noblewoman vowed to take Zuko back and, aside from the jealousy, Katara felt a bit bad for her.

“Even though the fact that you broke up with Mai makes me happy because it gave me the chance to be with you,” Katara began with a small frown, “I kind of feel bad for her.”
“Why?” Zuko asked with a confused expression as he raised an eyebrow at her.

“Because she loves you and she lost you,” Katara spoke up quietly.

“I did not mean for her to get hurt,” Zuko said. “But just like you did not want to continue lying and hurting Aang, I didn’t want to do the same to Mai.”

Katara frowned for a moment before she nodded at his logic. Zuko caressed her cheek as he smiled down at her.

“You’re the one who made me realize that I did not love Mai and was not happy,” he told her. “And because of you, I had the courage to end that relationship that was going nowhere. Nothing good would have come out of it in the end.

“But with you it’s different,” he continued softly. “Because of you I was able to see that life did not have to be full of strife and gloom, but that I could find fun and happiness in it too. You love me for who I am and for what I have become. You have shown me how to truly love and it is you that I want in my life.”

Katara smiled at him tenderly for his words brought a comfort to her heart. It was rare to hear Zuko talk so much and also hear him speak about his feelings with such sweet and fervent words. She brought her hand up to rest it over his hand that was caressing her cheek.

“And you are the man that has shown me what true love is,” she told him sincerely. “It was because of you that I realized that what I felt for Aang was not the love I sought in a partner, in a lover, in a husband. You are the only one who has shown me enough respect about my fighting skills despite the fact that I’m a woman.”

She paused and a small blush coated her cheeks as she flicked her eyes briefly away from his.

“You are the only man who has shown me the pleasures one can find in simple intimacy.”

Zuko smirked smugly at her confession, but his humor passed and his expression once again became serious and tender as he ran his fingers down her face. He wanted to reassure her of his feelings for her, wanted her to know how much she meant to him. He wanted her to know that she was the only woman he ever wanted and had ever loved.
“And you are such a wonderful and beautiful woman, Katara,” Zuko breathed out softly as his fingers left her skin in order to twirl them around a thick lock of her chocolate hair that had fallen across her breast.

Katara blushed deeply at his compliment and she felt as if at any moment her heart was about to explode at the happiness and relief she was feeling. She could not take her eyes away from his intense, golden ones, as he played with her hair while his voice turned softer, almost contemplative, as if he were speaking more to himself than to her.

“You are so beautiful, so gorgeous,” she heard him say, “that I still find it hard to believe you could love someone like me…a scarred man.”

Katara’s serene face turned into a frown at his last words. Why would he say such a thing about himself? Couldn’t he see he was such an attractive and striking man despite the scar? Didn’t he see all the adoring and hungry looks women drew at him when he walked past them? Didn’t he see how flustered she would get just by looking at him? She hated it when he talked about himself in such a way.

Zuko tensed slightly when he saw Katara reach for the left side of his face. He did not mean to, it was just a reflex after his father had burnt him all those years ago, but he immediately relaxed against her touch when her fingers rested over his injured eye. The skin had been damaged so much that he lost some sense of feeling, but not that much that he could not feel her fingers running along the creases of his scar in a soothing caress.

“What is there that I wouldn’t love about you, Zuko?” Katara asked gently. “You are so strong, and smart, and such a remarkable leader to your people. Your firebending skills are so great that you’re the only one who can pose a challenge to me. And then you are so attentive and caring toward me,” she sighed softly.

“You say that I am beautiful,” she continued, “and I say that you are handsome. To me, your scar does not detract from your splendor, but enhances it. Just like I told you before on that night in your garden, your scar is a symbol of how brave you are and the justice you hold in your heart, Zuko.” She paused as she let her eyes roam over his features in a caress, much like her fingers were to his rough skin, before she breathed out, “There’s just no way I could describe how stunning you are to me.”

Katara leaned up on her toes so she could reach his face and she touched her lips against the skin of his right cheek just as he had done to her a few moments before. She watched as Zuko stared intently into her eyes before she brushed her lips along his strong jaw. She felt him swallow, and with a tiny inward smile, she again looked up at his eyes while her hand continued to run soothingly along the scarred skin of his face. She wound her arms around his neck and he immediately wrapped his arms around her.

“I have come to love this scar as much as I have come to love the man,” Katara whispered to him fervently.

Zuko drew in a ragged breath at her words since it caused him so much joy, but he was unable to stop the loud gasp that escaped him when Katara pressed a soft kiss to his scarred cheek. He felt an overwhelming stir of emotions inside him at the gesture that it almost brought him to his knees. Besides Katara, no one had ever touched his scar much less kissed it in such a loving manner, and for a moment he felt lightheaded. Ever since the age of thirteen, the mark on his face had haunted him until he learned to partially accept it as the war came to a close, and when Katara had touched it that night in his private garden the hurt had lessened further. And now he felt like the lingering piece of emotional wound had suddenly been lifted from his shoulders at Katara’s acceptance and tender gesture, and he knew that never again would he see his scar as a horrible mistake he had brought upon himself.

For a long moment, he reveled in something he could not remember any other woman offering to him before at any time of his life. Understanding, support, safety, comfort—given unfalteringly and without reserve. He felt like the immense love he held for Katara grew more than he thought was even possible.

When Katara pressed another soft kiss to his scarred eye and pulled back, Zuko smiled so affectionately at her that it completely stunned her. She had never seen such a look on his face, ever. The firebender wound his arms around her waist more tightly and drew her to his chest while he buried his face in the crook of her neck, breathing in the sweet scent of her skin, before he placed his lips close to her ear.

“Thank you, Katara,” he whispered sincerely in her ear and he knew that he did not need to elaborate in order for her to understand. “This is why I know you are the perfect woman for me. This is why I want you as my wife.”

Katara smiled radiantly at him when he pulled away before her smile turned small and sad.

“Your Royal Court will never accept me,” Katara told him sadly. “Some like me, others tolerate my presence, but most don’t bother to mask the aversion they hold for me.”

Zuko narrowed his eyes and he clenched his jaw as his hold on her tightened possessively.
“I dare anyone to take you away from me and defy my wishes,” he growled out, causing Katara’s heart to skip a beat at his declaration. “I have done everything in my power for my country, even sacrificing myself, but now is the time to do something that, for once, will finally bring me happiness. And I know I will find such happiness with you at my side.”

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara sighed softly.

She beamed at him, causing her beautiful features to become even more enthralling that it caused Zuko’s breath to hitch in his throat. He looked away from her to examine their surroundings for a brief moment before he returned his gaze to her shinning eyes.

“I know that the setting isn’t romantic or anything,” he began hesitantly. “And I don’t have a flowery speech or a betrothal necklace with me, but…” He swallowed nervously. “It would really make me happy if you agreed to marry me, Katara.”

Katara let out a joyful cry as she lunged herself at him so fast that it almost toppled them over had Zuko not reacted quickly enough and caught her. She could not believe it! Zuko had asked her to marry him! True, the proposal was not what she had visualized it was going to be like, but she wasn’t about to complain. All that mattered was that she was going to be Zuko’s wife and he her husband, and if the spirits allowed it, they would live happily together for the rest of their lives. The happiness she felt was almost too overwhelming to bear.

Zuko was taken aback at Katara’s reaction as he caught her before they tumbled to the forest floor, but the feeling of having her in his arms was gratifying. The kiss that she bestowed on him before he could say anything created a hazy and pleasant feeling in his head, having the same effect as several cups of red wine. Zuko’s amber eyes had widened in shock since it had always been him to initiate their kisses so far, but he was pleased to have Katara kiss him—and oh, so passionately.

His strong arms tightened around her narrow waist as he savored fully of her warmth and ardor. He was ecstatic that she had accepted! Mere words could not describe what he was feeling at the moment. He had experience so many emotions so quickly and in such a short time he was surprised he had not blacked out yet. Zuko could feel her soft breasts pressed tightly against his hard chest as his hand slid down her back and he groaned softly.

They finally pulled their lips apart and panted hard against each other’s mouths. A small smirk appeared on Zuko’s face as he stared down at her flushed features.
“I’ll take that as a yes,” he said smugly.

Katara grinned at him as she rubbed her hand on his chest.

“Actually, I was aiming for a definite maybe,” she teased.

She laughed softly when Zuko scowled at her before she gave him a small kiss and then a large smile.

“Of course it’s a yes, silly,” the waterbender laughed.

Another smirk curled Zuko’s lips before he crushed her small body to his hard frame.

“Good, otherwise I would have employed everything in my power to have made you accept,” he growled out.

Katara was about to asked him to elaborate, but Zuko had again claimed her lips in a fiery kiss that sent a current of electricity to her stomach and left her speechless. When he finally pulled away, Katara was sure her face was a deep red color since she had a feeling she knew what he had meant. But then she smirked.

“I’m curious to know what you would have done,” she said innocently.

“I think it would be best that you don’t know what I had in mind,” Zuko spoke up quickly.

Katara blushed again and opened her mouth to insist, but Zuko just shook his head at her.

“It’s getting late. We should sleep so we could set out at dawn,” the firebender interrupted.

Katara wanted to pout, but she shook the idea away, and with a sigh, nodded that she understood.
After another hot kiss, Zuko pulled away to fix their bedding as images passed through his head. A part of him wished that Katara had hesitated in accepting him, that way he could have done many varied and very interesting things to her to have changed her mind. With a mental shake of his head, Zuko glanced at Katara and he gulped when she flashed him a smile. He wondered if he would be able to end this new journey without going insane with his desire for the waterbender.

The couple continued to make their way through the forest a few days later. Their food supply had run out and they were living on fruits and a few wild vegetables they had come across, but after so many days without a proper meal, it was not enough. They had a run-in with an angry armadillo-lion, whom they later found out was just trying to protect its litter, but other than that, nothing eventful had happened.

The sun was bright and hot as its rays beat down upon their heads, but a cool breeze would occasionally pass by to give them comfort. They found shelter beneath the large shadows the trees provided with their large branches cradling many green leaves. A few insects would buzz by while birds took flight into the sky with gleeful chirps. Katara watched the peaceful nature that surrounded them and inhaled deeply in order to breathe in the flowery scent of spring. She could not help but compare the flourishing season to the blossoming relationship between Zuko and her.

Katara’s eyes again wandered to Zuko’s face as he strode calmly beside her and she was unable to stop the giddy grin that appeared on her face. She still could not believe Zuko had asked her to marry him after she told herself that maybe he never would. But now here she was, betrothed to Zuko, the Fire Lord no less! Who would have thought?

Suppressing a giggle, the young woman again looked forward to where they were walking. She felt much like a little girl since all she wanted to do was skip in happiness and sing with merriment, but she controlled herself lest Zuko began to think something was wrong with her and decided he had made a mistake in proposing to her. Katara chuckled mentally at that before she sobered up as another thought came to her mind.

Would it really be so easy for Zuko’s Royal Court to accept a Water Tribe woman as their new Fire Lady? Was she even ready for such a task as becoming a wife to a powerful lord? What would her family think? Would they accept her marriage to Zuko, a firebender and Fire Lord to the country that had brought so much hardship to their people?

And what about Aang? The news would surely devastate him since Aang considered Zuko his friend and Aang was in love with her. How would he take the news that she had agreed to become Zuko’s wife while she had rejected Aang’s proposal not that long ago? Guilt again formed in her stomach so strongly that it made her cringe.

Katara glanced at Zuko’s face again and the cool and tranquil expression on his features brought a sense of calm to her emotions. She shouldn’t worry so much for all that mattered was that Zuko loved her enough to ask her to marry him and she loved him enough to wish to be by his side for her entire life. Lovingly, Katara reached for Zuko’s hand, lacing their fingers together, and she smiled when Zuko turned to look at her with warm eyes.

Zuko smiled when Katara squeezed his hand and he squeezed her smaller hand back before she grinned and returned her gaze to their path as they walked in comfortable silence. Zuko continued to watch her and a sense of warmth settled in him at the happiness he could clearly see on his betrothed’s face. Zuko looked away to stare at the peaceful scenery before them and a smile appeared on his lips.

His betrothed. He liked the sound of that, but not as much as he would love to finally call Katara his wife.

He was beyond pleased that Katara had accepted to marry him, to be his forever. He could not explain the sudden fear he had experience at the thought that she would reject him, but that negative emotion was swiftly replaced with immense relief and joy when she had accepted him, and in a very intense way. He could not wait to return to the Fire Nation and announce the news to everyone. He was positive that his mother and his uncle would be ecstatic with the news since he knew that they had been trying to push him to admit his feelings for the lovely waterbender.

The young lord again glanced at the young woman’s face when she began to hum a soft tune. He knew the way he had proposed was not that great, or romantic, or even memorable, and although Katara had not said anything, he just knew that deep down she would have wanted it to be something special, so he promised himself to make it up to her some way or another, because she deserved it and so much more.

Zuko almost chuckled at his thoughts. He was not the most romantic guy out there, but for Katara, he would try. He was brought out of his thoughts when Katara tugged at his hand.

“Let’s take a break over at those rocks, yeah?” Katara asked as she moved her shoulders to shift the bag she was carrying into a more comfortable position.

Zuko spotted the rocks she was pointing at and the shade that the trees provided over the large rocks did look inviting.

“Alright,” he agreed with a nod.
They quickly made their way toward the cool stones, and once they reached them, the two benders plopped themselves down with relieved sighs. Katara unceremoniously dropped her pack to the ground and arched her back to get rid of the crick on her lower back while she watched Zuko lower his bag more carefully before he began to rotate his left shoulder. The rusty sword he had found at Jianguo’s camp was still strapped to his back and it brought memories to Katara’s mind of Zuko standing regally before her with his dual broadswords drawn. The image brought a small smile to her lips since she could not deny how striking Zuko looked in such a way. Shaking her head, Katara brought the water canteen to her lips to take a long drink before she offered it to Zuko.

“Thanks,” Zuko murmured as he took the canteen to sedate his thirst.

“We’ve been walking for days now,” Katara began with a tired sigh, “and we haven’t come across one village! And what are we going to do once we find one?”

Zuko took another deep drink of the water before he let out a sigh.

“I had first planned for us to find a village and have someone send a message to the Fire Nation or to Uncle,” he began with a pensive frown, “But now I’m not sure that’s a good idea.”

“Why not?” Katara asked.

“Not only could there be a possibility that Jianguo could find out where we are, but there’s also the problem that there are still some people who mistrust the Fire Nation. And I’m sure they will not be hospitable if they find the Fire Lord among them,” Zuko responded with a morose sigh.

Katara laid a comforting hand on his arm and leaned her head on his shoulder. Zuko wrapped his arm around her and pulled her close to him.

“You’ll see that in a couple of years they will change their view of you, Zuko,” Katara reassure him.

“Perhaps,” Zuko replied quietly.

“So what are we going to do now?” she asked.
“I was thinking that it would be best if we made our way to Omashu,” he told her. “King Bumi will provide us some protection until we can contact the Fire Nation.”

“You’re right,” Katara acknowledge with a nod. “All we need to do is find a village and ask how we can get to Omashu. Of course, we’ll need to find some way to disguise ourselves so they won’t recognize us.”

Zuko smiled and kissed her temple before he lowered his head so he could whisper in her ear.

“I can’t wait for us to return home so I can finally announce to everyone that you are mine,” he growled out in a low tone.

Katara smiled as she raised her head so she could look at him, but whatever she was about to say was drowned out when Zuko swooped down to kiss her. A small moan escaped her when Zuko easily parted her lips with his tongue and wasted no time to plunge it into her hot mouth. Katara wrapped her arms around his neck to bring him closer to her while she brought out her own tongue to battle with his.

Zuko growled his approval at her fervent response while he pressed her closer to him that she was practically sitting on his lap. When the need for air became too great, they pulled apart, but Zuko did not move away from her and instead began to place hot kisses down her throat while his hand roamed down her back. He paused when his lips touched the silky material of the necklace that was always present around her neck and he pulled away to stare at it.

Breathing heavily, Katara opened her eyes to see why Zuko had stopped. She saw that he was staring with a frown at her neck and she wondered what he was thinking about.

“What is it?” she asked breathlessly.

Zuko raised his hand and gently touched the cool blue pendant before he raised his eyes to stare at the sapphire orbs of the woman in his arms.

“It shames me to remember that I used your mother’s necklace against you when I tied you to that tree in exchange for information of Aang’s whereabouts,” he confessed quietly.

Katara pressed her finger against his furrowed brow to smooth it as she gave him a gentle smile.
“That was a long time ago, Zuko,” Katara told him softly. “And back then you didn’t know it was my mother’s and that it meant so much to me.”

Zuko kissed her gratefully for her understanding and he gently stroked the smooth stone with his thumb. He mentally vowed that he would give her a necklace of her own, one to show her how much she meant to him, but that also showed that she belonged only to him.

Katara sighed blissfully when he pulled away, but she quirked an eyebrow when the corner of his lips lifted in a small smirk.

“I did enjoy the sight of you tied up against that tree and in my mercy, though,” he told her huskily. “And I hope that maybe one day you’ll let me do it again, but of course this time you will only gain your freedom by giving me something much more…pleasant.”

Katara stared at him with wide eyes while a blush began to creep to her cheeks since she found the thought to be so scandalous yet arousing at the same time. Her heart began to beat a bit faster in her chest as she tried to come up with something to say.

She looked over Zuko’s shoulder and a shocked expression settled across her face. She gasped loudly, causing him to tense.

“Zuko!” she cried out as she pointed somewhere behind him.

Zuko swiftly jumped to his feet to stand protectively in front of her with sword drawn and a snarl on his face as he waited for Jianguo’s attack, but instead, a confused frown appeared on his brow as he was met with nothing but trees. His bewilderment increased when Katara’s giggles reached his ears and he turned around just in time to see her running away while she threw a grin at him over her shoulder.

“I can’t believe you actually fell for that!” Katara laughed as she raced away.

“Katara!” Zuko growled out as he picked up his bag, as well as hers, and chased after her. “Just wait until I catch you!” he threatened after her as he increased his pace. He growled angrily when Katara’s laughter became louder.
“If you catch me, then I’ll let you kiss me,” Katara promised as she dodged a cluster of thorny bushes. “If not, then you’ll become my servant for a day!”

As if I’ll become the servant of anyone, me, Fire Lord Zuko, he thought with a huff before a large smirk appeared on his face. Though, I wouldn’t mind servicing Katara. But for now, I will catch her and the kiss I will give her will teach her to mess around with me!

Birds flew from their nests with protesting squawks while small animals scurried away as the two racing humans streaked past them. They ran for a while, and though Zuko knew he could have easily caught up to her since he had longer legs and was swifter, he allowed Katara to get away from him in order to build up the anticipation and the fun. However, she did not make it so easy either, for she would nimbly twist away from his grasp whenever he got too close. Katara’s delighted laughter surrounded them and Zuko again found himself enjoying something that he normally wouldn’t, such as when he played with her at the beach or had a snow fight with her and the children back in the Southern Water Tribe. He knew it was only because of Katara. He was grateful that she had brought such a change to his once miserable and lonely life.

The sun was descending closer to the horizon as they continued in the chase and Zuko began to get anxious, the playfulness was running its course. He wanted to catch her already, wanted to devour her as a hungry hunter would its delicious prey—only in a different sense. Such thoughts made his blood pump faster, and with a growl, Zuko increased his speed.

Katara ducked under a tree branch and panted as she continued running. She knew Zuko had been letting her get ahead of him, but now she could feel that something had change and that Zuko was getting more serious. She could feel him upon her heels and could almost feel his warm breath on the skin of her neck. Her heart started to pound faster at the thought of being caught like prey when it knew it had no chance to escape from its relentless persecutor. She just knew Zuko would make good in his threat and she almost stopped just so she could know what he would do to her.

Zuko cried out triumphantly when he reached out to grab Katara around her waist, but he growled out in frustration when she gracefully swerved out of the way and dived through a narrow gap between two trees whose lower trunks seemed to be infused together. Zuko slid to a stop and braced his hands against the trees before he crashed into them since he was too large to be able to pass through as Katara did. With an impressed smirk, Zuko went around the intertwined trees and picked up his speed. Besides powerful and beautiful, he had chosen a clever woman as his future bride.

Katara was starting to tire out. She had detained Zuko for a moment, but she knew that any second he would be upon her. Her legs were burning, her sides ached, and she knew she could not hold on any longer, but she refused to be caught and be bested. She spotted a cluster of thick bushes to her left and without wasting any time, she dove into them. The bushes were thick enough to hide her in their shadows and she waited for Zuko as she tried to catch her breath.
Zuko increased his speed as a worried frown began to appear on his face since he could not find Katara ahead of him. Did she perhaps change course to a different direction? He began to worry that he might have lost her and an ache formed in his chest at the thought.

He was about to turned back around when out of the corner of his eye he spotted Katara diving into some bushes, and he inwardly sighed in relief before a large smirk appeared on his face. He stopped running and watched from a distance as the bushes engulf her form and he knew that he would have passed those bushes without knowing she was there. He silently went around the area until he was standing in the opposite direction from where Katara would be watching out for him. Zuko carefully placed the bags and the sword on the ground. Bringing forth all his stealth skills as the Blue Spirit, Zuko climbed a tree, and without a sound, sat on a thick branch that was directly above the bushes where his beloved was hiding in. He waited anxiously for Katara to appear, like a predator waiting for its prey to think it was safe and come out from its hiding place.

Then he would pounce and claim his prize.

Katara resisted the urge to fidget as worry began to gnaw at her stomach when time passed by and Zuko did not race past the shrubs. What if he went another way? Fear began to creep in her heart at the thought that they could become separated and she began to wonder if it had been so smart to start this game of chase in the first place. She just wanted to make Zuko forget his problems for a little while, but now she had lost him.

I have to find him! she exclaimed in her head as she began to struggle her way out of the thick bushes.

A large smirk curled Zuko’s lips and his golden eyes gleamed brightly as he watched the bushes rustle before Katara slowly emerge from her hiding place. He remained silent as she dusted her clothes off before she looked around with a frown on her face. His muscles tensed in anticipation when Katara moved away from the shrubs and passed right beneath the branch he was sitting on.

Katara froze when something dropped behind her and she whirled around, her hand reaching for the water canteen at her hip. She gasped when she was pushed against the tree and her back met the rough bark of the thick trunk as strong hands grabbed hold of her wrists.

“I caught you,” Zuko’s deep masculine voice growled low in her ear.

A shiver raced down her spine at the heated look Zuko was directing at her. Her eyed widened when Zuko pressed closer to her so that her breasts where crushed to his chest and he raised her hands beside her head. Her heart was beating wildly in her chest and she became a bit dazed as his strong sandalwood scent invaded her senses.

“I won and now I demand my prize,” Zuko demanded huskily at her.

Before Katara could say anything, Zuko’s firm lips had crashed down onto hers. She melted against him as Zuko devoured her mouth, capturing her lips with such passion that it took her breath away. This kiss was different—more wild than tender—from any they had shared so far. Never had she known such passion, such fire in a kiss. It was feral and deliciously unchaste and it stripped her of the innocence of virginal fantasies while it introduced her to sensual pleasure. Katara could feel her heart pounding a fast tempo against her ribcage and she gasped when her body began to warm up quickly and her breasts began to tingle again. Her nipples began to ache and she unconsciously rubbed them against Zuko’s hard chest in order to ease the ache, but instead the sensation caused a spark to flare right to her core. The feeling caused the wetness to increase in her nether regions as a searing heat began to grow in the depths of her body, arousing longings that were completely unfamiliar to her.

Zuko groaned when Katara’s tongue wrapped around his while she rubbed her soft breasts against him. He could hear his blood pounding hard in his head, the same blood that had quickly rushed to his groin. His erection was straining painfully against its confinement as he continued to devour Katara’s sweet mouth. He wanted more. He wanted to make her feel more. Bringing his right leg forward, he wedged his thigh between Katara’s legs and began to roughly rub against her warmth.

Katara gasped and moaned in delight at the new sensation that sent a pulse right through her. Her rationality left her and was replaced by a desire so great that it left her aching. Without her knowing it, she began to move her hips against Zuko’s hard thigh. She kissed him eagerly as she tried to get out of his grip so she could touch him while she continued to enjoy the incredible sensation she was experiencing in her untouched core. Her breasts began to beg to be touched and underneath her wrappings and beneath the firmness of his muscular chest her nipples hardened even more.

Zuko was panting hard and the fire in his veins increased at the soft moans and whimpers Katara made as he continued to press against her. He could feel her trying to wriggle her wrists from his grasp and he let go of her hands so he could grant her wish and so he could touch more of her. He tangled one hand in her hair as his golden eyes plunged to the depths of her cobalt orbs. He moved her head to the side so he could slant his mouth against hers, greedily taking what she had to offer, while his other hand moved up from her side to touch a breast, too far gone to stop himself and think about what he was doing. When Katara groaned at his touch, he cupped her covered breast more firmly and began to knead it, causing her to let out a moan into his hot mouth.

He wanted more. He was painfully aroused, he felt like his shaft was about to burst from his trousers, he needed to press it against something to relieve some of his torture. He wrapped his hands around Katara’s thighs, and lifting her up slightly and wrapping her legs around him, he pressed his painfully erect cock against her warmth, eliciting a loud gasp from her. Zuko groaned at the pleasurable sensation as he continued to kiss her hungrily. He had never felt so much pleasure at such a simple act and he desperately began to grind himself against her.

Katara could not explain the incredible sensations and the immense heat that were going through her at the feeling of Zuko’s hardness grinding against her untouched core as he moved his hips. She could feel herself getting so wet and her stomach began to coil in a tight spring. Katara cried herself from his hot lips and arched her back with a loud moan, shoving her head against the rough bark of the tree behind her and grabbing tightly to Zuko’s muscular arms at the massive pleasure she was experiencing. She began to frantically move her hips to press herself closer to the hardness between Zuko’s strong thighs as she sought something she still did not understand.

She felt Zuko latch onto the skin below her ear and she hissed in pleasure as he began to kiss his way down her neck. She felt Zuko’s lips brush against her mother’s necklace and she froze as she came crashing back to reality. She remembered her Gran-Gran’s words of caution and she did not know what to do. She did not want to go against her culture’s laws and bring shame to her family, but she also did not want Zuko to stop—oh, gods, she didn’t want him to stop! The pleasure was too great, and she would not be able to bear the thought of Zuko looking at her in irritation and frustration if she told him to let her go, just like Aang always did. No, the thought of Zuko looking at her in such a way was worse. Tears of indecision escaped from the corner of her eyes as Zuko continued to grind himself against her.

Zuko was lost in his pleasure of being so close to Katara in such a way that he increased his pace. He could feel himself reaching his point of completion and he wanted so much for Katara to join him. He moved his lips away from where there were sucking on her delectable neck and he raised his head so he could see the pleasure written on her beautiful face, but instead he found her eyes screwed shut and her face contorted as if in pain while a few tears slid down her flushed cheeks. His movements immediately stopped and he froze in horror as he realized what he was doing. He had lost complete control over his lust and he had almost…

“Oh, gods, what have I done?” he whispered in abject horror.

His inflamed desire swiftly cooled in his shame and guilt. He eased away from her and gently placed her back on her feet. He cupped her face and he urgently wiped her wet cheeks with his thumbs.

“Katara, Katara, I’m sorry!” he apologized profusely, “I’m so sorry! I lost control, I didn’t mean to break my promise, please forgive me! I’m so sorry, Katara! Please say you’ll forgive me.”

Katara quickly opened her eyes at the anxiety she could hear in his voice and was shocked to see the heavy remorse, anguish, and fear on his face, almost as if he was expecting her to hate him. Katara shook her head as she opened her mouth to speak, but her heart was still beating fast and her body was still trembling at the sensations Zuko had evoked in her. Her heart almost broke at the pain that rippled across Zuko’s face as he mistook her response to mean that she would not forgive him. She quickly reached for his face when he made to move away from her and she placed a reassuring kiss on his lips.

“There’s nothing to forgive, Zuko,” Katara assured him gently. “I’m not mad at you. I know you were caught up in the moment and I was too. If I really didn’t want your advances I would have fought you and frozen you to the ground.” She paused as she hesitantly tried to give voice to her reasons while she brought one hand to clutch at her necklace. “It’s just that I can’t…we can’t…”

Zuko finally understood what she was trying to say, and with some relief, he gathered her in his arms and gently shushed her.

“You don’t need to explain. I understand,” he told her softly.

Katara buried her face in his chest as she tried to calm herself down while she found comfort in his arms. Shyly, she leaned away from him a bit until he looked down at her.

“You’re… not angry with me…because I couldn’t…go further?” she asked tentatively.

“Of course not!” Zuko exclaimed with a deep frown. “I know that is what has been taught to you in the Southern Water Tribe and I respect that. I don’t want you to think that you have to do anything to please me when you aren’t ready for such intimacy.”

Katara wrapped her arms tightly around his neck and he immediately brought her closer to his chest.

“Thank you for understanding, Zuko,” she whispered to him gratefully.

Zuko pulled his head back slightly so they could see each other’s eyes. His expression was serious and his amber orbs shone with a heated golden fire.

“But you must understand that it will be difficult for me to keep my distance from you. I have wanted you for such a long time, Katara,” he told her, his voice becoming deep and husky as he brushed his lips lightly against hers. “It’s going to be hard not to touch you when all I want to do is to take you, to make love to you, to make you mine.”
A deep blush blossomed across Katara’s cheeks and her heart fluttered in her chest at his fervent words. She averted her eyes from his molten orbs, but Zuko gently grabbed hold of her chin and turned her head so she could look at him again.

“But I will try to be patient until that day comes when you will freely give yourself to me,” he promised.

The hesitancy in her blue depths dissipated and in its place was a firm resolve.

“And I will too,” she promised as well.

Zuko gave her a small smile before he tucked her comfortingly against his chest while Katara wound her arms around his middle. They embraced each other in silence for a moment before Zuko removed his arms and pulled away from her.

“We should continue before night settles in,” he said quietly as he turned away.

Katara nodded as she accepted the bag Zuko handed to her before she followed behind him in silence. A few tears pricked her eyes and threatened to fall down her cheeks as a feeling of anxiety and uncertainty gripped her heart. She could not help but feel like perhaps she had pushed Zuko away.

A soft gasp escaped her when Zuko turned to her and wrapped one arm around her waist, bringing her close to his side. She looked into his eyes for a moment and she let out a sigh of relief to see the same loving look in those amber eyes she treasured so much.

There had to be way to keep from pushing Zuko away from her that did not compromise her culture’s teachings and the way she was raised, a way she could show him how much he meant to her.

But what?
The afternoon sun was partially hidden by a multitude of white and fluffy clouds. Butterflies fluttered through trees, bees buzzed from flower to flower to collect honey for their hives, and birds rode the currents of the cool spring breeze. The day was bright and peaceful, with a sense of calm and serenity, but Katara was feeling anything but those things. Instead, what she felt was the complete opposite. Glancing up uncertainly under thick lashes, Katara watched silently as Zuko took a bite of another of the small fish she had caught from a small stream.

Their food had run out days ago, but luckily, they had come across the little stream where she had caught a few fish with her waterbending. After cleaning the fish, she had happily presented the new addition to their meal to Zuko. However, to her bewilderment, a deep frown had creased his forehead as he shifted his gaze to the fish and back to her before he pressed his lips together into a tight line. He had silently built a small campfire, and without saying a word, he took the fish and began to roast them on the fire. With a hurt frown on her face, Katara had stood near the edge of the quiet stream for a moment and only relaxed when Zuko turned to beckon her close with a smile. She had wanted to ask him what that was all about, but she decided not to say anything. They had not talked as much as they used to after the…incident against that tree and it was getting to her.

Katara glanced away from the firebender and returned her gaze to the half-eaten roasted fish she was holding with some large and clean leaves, her appetite leaving her quickly. Once again, the feeling of uncertainty and fear rose within her at the thought that maybe she had pushed Zuko away from her with her uncertainty, but she was still unsure and concerned about letting herself get closer to Zuko in the most intimate of ways. They had only confessed their feelings recently, after all!

But then again that did not stop her from agreeing to marry Zuko, now did it? Katara smiled wryly.

“What’s wrong?” Zuko’s concerned voice broke through her thoughts. “Is the fish not cooked well enough?”

Katara lifted her head to look at Zuko and she gave him a small smile to reassure him when he frowned at her.

“No, no, it’s fine! It’s just a bit hot,” she told him with a tiny shrug.

“Oh. Okay,” Zuko responded with a smile before he returned his attention to his own meal.
The waterbender let out a mental sigh as she glanced back down at her fish before letting her eyes travel toward Zuko's face again. Although Zuko had reassured her that he understood and accepted her reasons as to why she had been hesitant, she could not help but feel like she was the problem. She was grateful that he was being very understanding, but she could feel that holding back was affecting him.

She could see it in the way he looked at her, his golden eyes almost burning in their intensity, the way he touched her arm or the small of her back as if he could not get enough of touching her, and the way he would wrap his arm around her waist, as if he were laying a claim on her. She could now see that Zuko had been sincere when he said those fervent words about how much he desired her.

Since that day when they had almost lost their control, the day when she had found a pleasure she had never known with a man before, Zuko would only kiss her lightly and tenderly. Not wildly and passionately like he had before that just remembering it weakened her knees. Moreover, when they would rest for the night, Zuko no longer laid down beside her with his arms wrapped around her. He didn’t even touch her! It was as if he was afraid he would break her like some fragile piece of glass or she would run away from him at any moment, and she did not like it!

She was the one who should be afraid. Afraid that it would be him that would turn away from her. It frightened her to think that he would suddenly get tired of her and her uncertainty and he would eventually go in search of another woman that would not hesitate to please him, to give him what he wanted.

Katara gritted her teeth in jealousy at such a hurtful thought before she took a deep breath to calm herself down. Absentmindedly, she took a bite of the now cool fish and chewed thoughtfully.

It was not like she did not want to be with Zuko in such a way—quite the contrary, she craved it—but it was just so hard for her to do such a thing because she had no experience at all. She had no clue how to go about it, and admittedly, it embarrassed her. She was also afraid of what her family would think of her, sleeping with a man that was not her husband.

Then there was the fact that everybody thought she was still Aang’s girlfriend. She had been so concerned and distracted with the news that one of the colonies had been struck with a disease that she had not told anyone that she had ended her relationship of four years with Aang before she left the Fire Nation with Zuko and Iroh. What would people think of her when all of the sudden she came back with news that Zuko was not only her new boyfriend, but that she was now engaged to him?

How would Aang react to such news? She had a feeling that he had not told anyone that she had broken up with him because he still loved her. She knew he would not give her up so easily, and would try to find a way to convince her to get back with him and perhaps agree to marry him. He would surely be angry and devastated once he found out that she was engaged to Zuko and it pained her to think that because of her he would be hurt. Her relationship with Aang may not have been great, and she may not be in love with him, but he was still her friend and they did have some good times together. She just hoped that once she had a talk with Aang he would understand that, even though she cared for him, she was in love with Zuko and he was the one she wanted to marry. But in her heart she just knew it would not be so easy.

And if she did decide to give herself to Zuko how would Aang feel if he found out that she had willingly given Zuko what she had adamantly refused to give him?

The young woman clasped the cool pendant of her necklace and let out a quiet sigh. All of her life she had been taught to save her virtue until marriage, and although she sometimes had questioned the fairness of such a rule, she had followed it diligently. She had even thought that she would have been able to keep such a promise until the day she did marry, since she had no feelings of doing otherwise when she and Aang were together.

Dropping her hand away from the necklace, Katara again stole a glance at Zuko, who was now staring pensively at the flames, and a deep blush appeared on her cheeks.

However, things had changed; her views were different. Now that she was with Zuko, now that she knew what she felt for him was a great love, she found that it was harder to keep such promises than she had thought. Having Zuko kiss her so passionately, having his muscular body pressed so close to hers, and enjoying the things he did to her…she loved it. It was just so tempting and it felt so good!

Katara wondered if this was what the women who had their ‘unchastely’ behavior discovered went through and she felt some sympathy for them.

Her eyes widened when she felt Zuko’s hard thigh touch the side of hers as he brought his hand down on it and she could not stop the memory of the pleasurable feeling of having Zuko’s thigh pressed hard between her legs. She bit her lip to stifle a moan as she looked up at him. Once their eyes locked, Zuko quickly removed his hand from her thigh and cleared his throat.

“We should get going soon,” the firebender announced, his voice a bit husky.

“You’re right,” Katara responded softly as she looked down at her uneaten fish.

She felt Zuko place his fingers beneath her chin before he lifted her head. She opened her mouth to say something, but Zuko stopped her words as he leaned down to kiss her. This kiss was light and tender, and although Katara wished he could deepen it, she found pleasure in it too and immediately surrendered to his caressing mouth.

She did not know what to do. Should she uphold her culture’s ideals?

…Or should she succumb to her body’s desires?

The pleasant weather continued the next day while both benders climbed down a steep hill as they made their way through the thick forest. They stopped when they found a huge fallen tree blocking their path. There did not seem any other way around it, they had to go over it.

Without warning, Zuko swept Katara into his arms and smiled at her startled gasp. Before she could protest, he hopped onto the dry and thick log and then jumped over it. His deep chuckle resonated around them when Katara squealed and latched her arms around his neck before he landed lightly on the other side. Instead of placing the woman in his arms on her feet, Zuko held her to him tightly. Katara looked up into his eyes and a smile appeared on her face at the tender look he was directing at her. He inclined his head to place a small kiss to her lips before he buried his face on the crook of her neck and took a deep whiff of her scent. He heard her sigh and contentment filled his chest for a moment before he reluctantly settled her on her feet.

“Thanks,” she uttered softly as she stepped away from him.

Zuko nodded before a small smile appeared on his face. He took her hand lightly in his.

“You’re welcome,” he said as he began to walk, leading her after him.

He saw her open her mouth as if to say something, but it seemed she changed her mind for she shook her head and closed her mouth. A small frown appeared on his face. He had noticed she was being more quiet than usual and he was afraid it was because she was regretting what happened against that tree. Just remembering the incident, of having Katara wrapped around him while he pushed his clothed cock against her, made heat rush to his groin. Exhaling deeply, he mentally shook his head to dismiss the memory.

A few minutes later the ground even out again and they paused for a moment to get some rest before heading out again.
“Do you think we’ll find a village soon?” Katara asked as the silence stretched on. At least, it seemed like that to her. Zuko seemed not to notice. He was used to not talking much, after all.

“I hope so,” Zuko responded. “We’ve been walking for days. We’re bound to find something soon.”

“I miss civilization!” Katara exclaimed with a sigh. “It feels like we’re the only people in the world!”

“It seems like it, doesn’t it?” Zuko agreed with a small chuckle before he grinned at her. “Though I won’t mind roaming this earth with only you as my companion, finding comfort and pleasure in your arms every night and day with no one around to bother us.”

Katara blushed as a shy smile appeared on her face before Zuko leaned down to kiss her. She eagerly opened her mouth to him when his tongue probed at her lips and she moaned happily when he snaked his tongue into her willing mouth to deepen their kiss. But then it seemed he caught himself for he quickly pulled back and the gleam in his eyes dimmed a bit. He pecked her lips one last time before he continued to walk, tugging at her hand. Katara held back a frown as she looked at Zuko’s strong back with longing and remorse.

Zuko sighed quietly as he continued with his pace, even though he very much wanted to continue kissing Katara, he had to stop. Who was he kidding? He wanted to do more than just kiss her…so much more…

The firebender turned his golden eyes to the bright sun resting on the cloudy blue sky above them before he returned his gaze before him. He guessed that about less than a month had passed since that night of the devastating storm that had unfortunately led to Jianguo capturing them and now to this journey to find help. A month since he has been away from his mother, his home, and his duties to the Fire Nation. He hoped, for their sakes, that his Court Council was keeping their country well and safe in his absence. He had worked hard to raise the Fire Nation to the power it was now and if he found that all his hard work had been undone, heads would roll. He then wondered where the rebels were, what Jianguo was planning, and if they were causing destruction as they searched for him and Katara.

The young lord’s eyes strayed away from the trees before him and slanted to his left where Katara was walking by his side. His gaze roamed her body from her head to her toes, and although her clothes were bloody and dirty, he still found her enchanting. So much so, that he was unable to stop his desire from flaring. He quickly looked away from her before he pulled her to him, backed her against another tree, and continued what they had been doing days before after that delightful game of chase.
A tremor ran down his spine at the memory of having Katara pressed close to him while he kissed her hungrily, and his heart began to pick up its pace in his chest. Gods, how many nights had he dreamed of having Katara in such a way? Now that he almost did, he had to suppress his desires to respect her wishes. He did not want her to feel pressured. When the time came for them to join together, he wanted her to be willing, he wanted her to be craving him, he wanted her as his wife ready to love him for the rest of their lives.

However, his body wanted other things. It demanded that he forget his promises, that he take her as soon as possible, feel her soft skin beneath his, and claim her as his. His mind seemed to betray him as well for it would provide him with images of Katara stroking his hard cock with her hand, of Katara moaning as he suckled and fondled her breasts, of Katara screaming and writhing beneath him as he thrust himself into her…

Zuko suppressed the growl that seemed to want to erupt from his throat before he inwardly shook his head to shake off the tormenting yet delightful images from his mind.

He felt like such a bastard. Even though he understood why Katara was apprehensive about the act of lovemaking, he really wanted to ravage her all the time and everywhere. The smallest things like a tender kiss from her lips or a look from those deep, blue eyes of hers made his blood boil.

Therefore, he had to resort to kissing her lightly so he would not upset her and so he would not lose his control. He also had to force himself to sleep away from her so she would not noticed his body’s ardent reaction to her sweet scent and tempting form. He had promised her that he would not make her do anything that she was not ready for, but he was finding that it was becoming more and more difficult for him to keep that promise. He hoped they found his uncle or a way home soon before his resolve broke and he seduced her.

If it was already this difficult to keep his hands away from her, he did not think he would be able to survive not making love to her until they married! Why did the Water Tribes have to have such a ridiculous rule about chastity, anyway? Damn it! He shook his head at his thoughts.

“Zuko, look!” Katara’s excited voice made him focus his attention to their surroundings. “It’s a path!”

Zuko looked to where Katara was pointing, and sure enough, he spotted a track that seemed to have been worn down by the continual passage of human feet and animals of burden. It was not wide enough for wagons or carriages to drive upon it, but it was worn enough to mean that people used it regularly.
“There must be a village near here then,” Zuko stated as he squinted to see how far the path led, but the infernal trees cut off his gaze.

“There better be,” Katara muttered.

Amused, Zuko’s eyes flicked toward her before he returned his attention to the empty path.

“Come,” he beckoned her softly. “Let’s see what we find.”

Katara shouldered her now lighter bag as she followed beside him.

More than an hour passed as they followed the trail, and when they saw no sign of one single living being, they began to grow anxious and frustrated. What would they do if they never found a village?

A loud scream pierced though the calm silence of the forest, making both benders tense in alarm and awareness. They glanced at each other with serious expressions before they raced down the path toward the sound of the scream as more shouts reached their ears. Katara raced forward when she heard a pained cry, but she was stopped when Zuko grabbed her around the waist and to his chest, before pulling them toward the cover of the trees beside the road.

“Zuko!” she hissed as she glared at him while trying to get out of his hold.

“Don’t just rush forward without first knowing what is going on!” Zuko hissed back in a low voice as his eyes darted around them. “What if it’s a trap and Jianguo is patiently waiting for us to show up?”

“And what if it isn’t?” Katara whispered with a hard frown. “It could be someone that’s in danger and needs our help!”

A grim frown settled across Zuko’s face before he gave a curt nod.

“We’ll just have to find out, but we must be alert and careful,” he said as he slowly released her, though he continued to hold one of her arms. He looked intently into her eyes. “I won’t lose you again, Katara. Not after we have just found each other.”
Katara’s expression softened and she reached up to kiss his cheek to reassure him.

“You won’t,” she told him firmly.

Zuko gazed into her eyes for a moment until he finally let her go. He unsheathed the small sword at his back and nodded at her. Katara nodded back before she turned around and silently made her way to where they had heard the screams while Zuko strode protectively beside her, his senses on high alert. They paused behind the cover of some bushes as the sound of voices reached their ears, though the voices were too low for them to be able to distinguish if it was Jianguo and his men. They glanced at each other for a second before they cautiously peeked through the leaves.

In the middle of the trodden path was a woman with streaks of gray on her auburn hair kneeling beside a gray-haired man who had a nasty cut on one arm and across one cheek. The woman had her arms protectively around the injured man as they both glared defiantly at a young man who stood before them with a small dagger pointed threateningly at them. A small ostrich-horse with packs loaded on its back pranced nervously to the side, ruffling its feathers in agitation.

“Don’t play me for a fool, old man,” the younger one with raggedy clothes growled out. “Give me your money and I’ll let you and your old woman go.”

“Old woman?! Why you—” the woman shouted out angrily, but the injured man pulled her back when it seemed she was about to stand up.

“I’ve told you already we spent all our money in the village so we could stock up on our provisions!” the older man insisted as he returned his attention to the thief. “Take all our food from the ostrich-horse if you want, but leave my wife and me alone!”

“Don’t lie to me!” the dirty-looking man yelled as he flashed his knife. “Give your money or I’ll hurt your precious wife!”

“Don’t you touch her!” the gray-haired man roared as he quickly sprang to his feet as if he were a much younger man than he actually was, as he pushed his protesting wife behind him.

The thief raised his dagger as he moved to attack, but he froze when he felt the tip of a blade pressing dangerously on the skin of his neck. Turning slightly, he swallowed nervously at the golden eyes that glared ominously at him.
The elderly couple gawked at the tall, dark-haired young man with a frightening scar on his impassive face and they gulped when he pressed the sword further against the thief’s neck. They glanced briefly to the side when a blue-eyed young woman stepped from behind the imposing man with a small frown on her pretty features.

“Is there a problem here?” the scarred man asked in a deceptively cool tone.

“N-n-no!’ the young thief stammered out in fear and he flinched when the blade was pressed harder into his skin, causing a thin line of blood to appear.

“Good. Then I suggest you leave. Now,” the man ordered in a cold voice.

Without sparing another glance at the frozen older couple, the would-be-thief raced away as if he were being chased by a pack of hungry tiger-wolves until he disappeared among the shadows of the trees. The older couple returned their stunned gazes to the intimidating young man and they silently watched as he sheathed his sword at his back. The older man stepped closer to his wife who clung to his clothes from behind when the younger man turned piercing, golden eyes on them. They were surprised, however, when the young woman stepped forward and scowled at the dark-haired man.

“You didn’t have to scare that guy like that,” she berated him lightly as she placed her hands on her hips.

“He should be glad he only got a scare. Now he will think twice about stealing from others,” the scarred man replied impassively as he glanced down at her.

The silent couple looked at each other in surprise and slight amusement that such a petite woman was scolding such a frightening-looking man that was much bigger than she was. They tensed when the blue-eyed woman turned to them before she walked forward with a smile on her face. She opened the water canteen that was attached to her hip and they gasped when a thin string of water followed the movement of her hand. They watched as the water surrounded her hand like a glove and they jumped when the liquid began to glow.

“Here, let me heal those cuts,” she said in a kind tone.

Before the older couple could react, the young woman pressed her hand on the wounds on the gray-haired man’s arm and cheek. He let out an astounded gasp when he felt and saw them closing.
“There you go, all better,” the tan-skinned woman announced brightly as she returned the water to her pouch.

“Amazing,” the older man mused as he inspected the now healed skin on his arm. He snapped out of his thoughts when his wife elbowed him on his side. “Oh! I thank you both very much for coming to our rescue!” he exclaimed.

“Yes!” his short wife continued as she clutched at her heart. “What would’ve happened to us if you hadn’t scared that rogue away?” she cried out as she looked up at the tall man before quickly returning her attention to the blue-eyed woman. “And what would’ve become of me if my poor dear had bled to death?”

“Now, Pumpkin, we all know the cuts weren’t life-threatening,” her husband sighed affectionately.

“Nonsense, Sweet Potato!” his wife continued and waved her hand as if to chase away his silly comment. “You’re getting on in years, after all. Luckily these youngsters came just in time to help us.”

Katara and Zuko threw subtle and amused glances towards each other at the older couple’s banter and Katara held back a giggle at the endearing names they had for each other. Zuko cleared his throat and the badgering couple paused before they returned their attention to them with sheepish expressions on their faces.

“Oh, how rude of us!” the dark-eyed and robust man exclaimed as his wife blushed. “Please allow us to introduce ourselves. I am Zhuang Yu and this irritating yet enchanting lady is my wife, Satomi.”

Satomi huffed at her husband’s first description of her before she turned a large smile to the younger pair.

“Yes, and again we thank you for your help!” she continued as the older couple bowed.

“It was nothing,” Zuko spoke up as both he and Katara returned the small bow. “I am Li,” he continued before he placed his arm around Katara’s waist. “And this is Ka…uh…This is Tara, my betrothed.” He glanced down with a grin at Katara.
Katara blushed as a smile appeared on her face.

“Nice to meet you,” the waterbender said.

“Oh, you two are so adorable!” Satomi gushed before she turned to her husband. “It reminds me of us when we were younger and recently engaged. You used to be so handsome back then.”

“What are you talking about, woman?” Zhuang Yu grumbled. “I’m still handsome!”

“Of course you are, Sweet Potato!” his wife soothed. “But you used to be even more so when you were younger.”

Zhuang Yu rolled his eyes and mumbled under his breath as he crossed his arms over his broad chest. He opened his mouth as if to argue again, but his wife cut him off as she rushed forward to take Katara’s hands.

“Oh, my goodness! What happened to your clothes?” the old woman cried out as she looked down at Katara’s ripped and bloody shirt.

“Oh, uh, it was…just an accident,” Katara lied.

Katara took a peek at Zuko and she sighed mentally at the guilt that flashed across his face, though he was quick to recover his impassive expression when he noticed her frown.

“It seems like you two have gone through some rough times too,” Zhuang Yu stated as he eyed Zuko’s worn clothes.

“We became separated from our friends during an assault and became lost as we all tried to escape,” Zuko spoke up smoothly. “We are now trying to make our way to Omashu to reunite with them.”

Katara nodded.

“Could you point us in the right direction towards Omashu?” she asked sweetly.
“Of course!” Zhuang Yu exclaimed as he turned to his wife. “But first let us take you to our home for some dinner.”

“Thank you, but we do not wish to impose,” Zuko tried to politely decline.

“Nonsense!” Satomi cried out immediately, reminding Zuko so much of his uncle. “It’s the least we can do for you for helping us! Besides, I enjoy having company at our house! It’s been so lonely since our children moved away,” she sighed.

“And what am I? A rock?” her husband protested.

“You know I didn’t mean it that way, dear,” the short woman sighed dramatically. “You can be so sensitive sometimes.”

Zhuang Yu snorted at her comment.

“Uh…we really appreciate your kind offer,” Katara spoke up as she tried to hide a smile while Zuko nodded in acceptance.

“Wonderful!” Satomi exclaimed as her husband went to retrieve the ostrich-horse that was now lazily grazing under the shade of a tree.

“This way then,” Zhuang Yu instructed as he tugged at the protesting animal that finally moved after him with reluctant steps. Satomi automatically moved to her husband’s side with quick steps and a large smile.

Katara watched as the older man wound one arm around his wife and drew her snuggly to his side, kissing her graying head. He laughed happily when Satomi pulled his head down to give him a proper kiss on his mouth before she burrowed into him. Katara turned to Zuko who looked away from the loving couple to smile at her. Reaching her hand out to grasp his, Katara smiled at him as Zuko intertwined their fingers together before he leaned down to give her a quick kiss on her lips. He straightened himself and resumed his usual cool manner when the older couple looked over their shoulders to call out to them. Katara smiled as they hurried along after the now bickering pair and their lazy ostrich-horse as they walked through the pleasant forest.
“We had just come from the village when that man attacked us,” Satomi spoke up as she turned in her husband’s embrace to look at the younger couple walking behind them. “In all of our years walking on this path it’s the first time we’ve been assaulted!”

“Yes,” Zhuang Yu agreed. “And to think we built our home so we could live peacefully away from the village. Ah, here we are!”

Zuko and Katara looked up to see a modest sized house resting in the middle of a small clearing. It was made of wood and it had a porch that went all around the small building as well as what looked like a small stable at one side. It had a wooden and clay roof that slanted down and curled up at the edges. Zhuang Yu led the ostrich-horse to the stable while Satomi walked up the steps to the house, beckoning the younger couple to follow her. Taking off her sandals and placing them against the wall, she pulled the shoji door aside before stepping inside.

“Welcome to our home,” she said graciously as she turned to smile at them as they came in after her, taking off their boots and placing them next to her sandals.

“Thank you,” both Katara and Zuko sincerely replied.

“I will start on dinner immediately,” Satomi exclaimed as she bustled around the room, straightening things as she went. “Please make yourselves comfortable.”

“I would like to help you, if you don’t mind,” Katara spoke up. “We really don’t want to just sit around and do nothing.”

“Yes,” Zuko agreed. “I will help your husband unload your things from the ostrich-horse.”

“We really appreciate it, dears,” the green-eyed woman replied as she moved into the small kitchen with Katara following behind her.

Zuko walked outside toward the stable and helped Zhuang Yu carry their things into the house until only the task of feeding and brushing the ostrich-horse’s feathers remained. Zuko watched the older man tending to the animal as Zhuang Yu continued talking about the adventures he had had when he was younger. Zuko found the easy conversation refreshing since he did not have to worry about appearances or pretend as if he actually believed whatever story one of his courtiers was telling him. Here, he was just Li, an ordinary man.
“There you go,” Zhuang Yu cooed as he patted the ostrich-horse’s side as it began to eat. He pulled away and dusted his hands off before returning his attention to the silent young man that was standing casually to the side.

“How about we go see what our women are doing, eh?” Zhuang Yu said and grinned as he led the way back to the house.

They could hear the women laughing as they got closer and the robust man turned to wink at Zuko.

“You sure got yourself a fine woman for a future wife,” he congratulated the younger man.

A small smirk appeared on Zuko’s face.

“I know,” he responded smugly.

Zhuang Yu chuckled as he slid the shoji door aside before they entered after taking off their shoes. The sound of pans banging and a knife hitting a cutting board reached their ears while they inhaled deeply at the smell of cooking food. Both men approached the kitchen and they watched as the women moved around the room.

“Satomi, I’m going to see if there are any animals in the traps I set up the other day,” he spoke up when his wife turned to look at him. “We’ll be back soon. If anything happens just yell for us, alright, Pumpkin?”

“Alright, Sweet Potato,” Satomi called out as she returned to stirring the contents from the frying pan before her. “Hopefully you can remember where you set up the traps this time.”

“That was just one time!” her husband protested as he flung his hands in the air. “You’re never going to let me live that down, are you?”

“I was just saying,” his wife said and shrugged as she turned to smile at him.

Katara smiled as she continued chopping the vegetables. The couple’s banter reminded her so much of Sokka and Suki. Her smile faded as she sadly wondered how they were doing. How were Jing and Ting doing? Was her father, Gran-Gran, and Pakku worried about them?

“Tara?” Zuko’s soft voice reached her ears and she turned around to see concern in his eyes. “We’ll be back later, okay?”

Katara knew what he really wanted to say was that they would talk later and she smiled at him to reassure him she was fine.

“How do you—uh, Li,” she replied.

Zhuang Yu turned to Zuko after kissing his wife’s cheek to stop their silly argument.

“Come on, Li,” he said as he turned away from the kitchen. “Let’s check the traps.”

Katara smiled reassuringly when Zuko turned back to look at her before he followed Zhuang Yu out of the house. Once the men were gone, Satomi turned to smile at the young waterbender.

“We should finish here before they return,” she said.

Katara nodded and smiled. She raised her hand above a steaming pot and twirled her fingers to stir the water.

Satomi’s eyes sparkled with awe.

“I’ve never seen a waterbender around these parts before. It’s so exciting,” she exclaimed.

“Yeah, well… I like to travel,” Katara replied with a shrug.

They continued preparing dinner while Satomi asked Katara questions about waterbending and life in the Southern Water Tribe since she had never traveled away from the Earth Kingdom. It was some time later when the food was ready and the low dining table was set. All they had to do was wait for the men to show up so they could eat.
“I wanted to ask you if you would like a new tunic, dear,” Satomi spoke up as she eyed Katara’s bloody, blue shirt.

Katara looked down at herself before she looked back up to the waiting older woman with a small grimace.

“Yes,” she replied quietly. “It really bothers…my betrothed every time he looks at it.”

“He really loves you,” Satomi stated with a soft smile.

Katara blushed slightly as she returned the smile.

“And I love him,” she responded fervently.

The short woman chuckled as she moved into another room in search of a clean tunic while motioning for Katara to follow her.

“I understand, for I feel the same way about my husband,” Satomi said as she continued to chuckle, “Even if he’s a blockhead sometimes.”

The sun was just setting by the time Zuko and Zhuang Yu headed back to the house after finding a small boar-pig trapped in one of the snares. Zuko had marveled at how easy the older man made hunting seem. Zhuang Yu had easily sidestepped the angry and frightened animal as it stabbed its small tusks at him before he drew a blow at the back of the beast’s head to render it unconscious. He then pulled out his sharp knife and slit its throat to kill it without it having to suffer too much. Zuko had helped him bind the boar-pig’s feet before strapping it onto the ostrich-horse’s back, who was not at all happy to have its rest cut so short.

Zhuang Yu’s easy chatter reminded Zuko so much of Iroh that he found himself missing his uncle again. He then thought back to the saddened expression that had crossed Katara’s face a while ago and he wondered what it was that had caused her to look like that.

They paused when the ostrich-horse began to prance around nervously while it thrashed its head from side to side. Zhuang Yu tightened his hold on the reins as he tried to soothe the animal, but he froze when a loud squeal reached their ears just before something burst through from the bushes ahead of them. It was a larger boar-pig with huge curved tusks that pointed sharply at them as it pawed angrily at the ground, dust flying below its hooves.

“Damn,” Zhuang Yu cursed as he renewed his efforts in trying to keep the ostrich-horse from ripping the reins from his hands in order to run away.

The larger boar-pig’s beady eyes flicked wildly around before they settled on the dead carcass that was strapped to the back of the panicking ostrich-horse. Nostrils flaring, the boar let out a bellow of rage before charging at an incredible speed despite its rounded size toward the old man.

Zhuang Yu gasped in shock as he watched the beast charging at him when his vision was blocked as Li stepped before him. The younger man flicked one wrist forward and Zhuang Yu gaped when a thin fire whip shot forward and beheaded the angry animal before it could realized it was being attacked. With a sickening gurgled sound, the boar-pig crashed to the forest floor where it laid unmoving as its head rolled a few feet away and blood spread beneath it.

The forest seemed to have gone completely silent as both men turned away from the dead animal to look at each other warily. Then a grin spread across Zhuang Yu’s slightly wrinkled face.

“Neat move,” he finally spoke as he made his way over to the dead boar-pig while tugging the now passive ostrich-horse behind him. “Now we have more meat for the next couple of weeks!”

Zuko stared at the older man in shock as he began to tie the boar’s feet. He was surprised that Zhuang Yu was calm after learning that he was a firebender, but Zuko decided to shrug it off for the moment as he went over to help him place the body of the boar-pig beside the smaller one on the ostrich-horse’s back. They left the head for scavengers. Once both animals were securely tied, the men and the slightly protesting ostrich-horse continued on their way to the house.

“It’s nice to meet another fellow Fire Nation citizen,” Zhuang Yu spoke up after a while with a smirk.

Zuko glanced sideways at the grinning old man, taking in his tanned skinned that once must have been pale—as well as the few dark strands of hair among the gray—before he returned his attention to the path before him.

“You are from the Fire Nation,” he stated rather than questioned.
“Yes,” the older man replied with a nod. “I was a young man when I moved to the Fire Nation colonies about thirty-five years ago before venturing to the village close by here. That’s where I met my lovely wife.” He grinned.

“It must have been difficult for you both, being from different countries and all,” Zuko commented.

“Yes it was, especially in those days when the hatred and mistrust between those from the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom was great,” Zhuang Yu admitted with a small frown before he smiled. “But we didn’t care what everybody else thought and we got married. We built our home and made a family away from the leeches of the village and have lived happily since. Satomi and I love each other more than anything and we didn’t let anybody get in the way of our happiness.”

Zhuang Yu turned to smile widely at the young man walking pensively beside him.

“Much like you and your waterbending woman,” he remarked.

Zuko smiled as he gave a brief nod.

_I will not let anyone get in our way of our happiness either, Katara_, he mentally vowed as he looked longingly ahead of him.

He was brought out of his thoughts when Zhuang Yu continued to speak as he looked over the dead animals strapped to his ostrich-horse.

“Poor beast,” the old man muttered as he patted the bigger animal’s thick hide. “I don’t blame the boar-pig for attacking us like that when it was obvious it was outnumbered. Any creature would be filled with fury after finding out its mate has been killed. Hell, I’d go insane with rage if anyone hurt my Satomi!”

“I know the feeling,” Zuko growled out in a low tone.

Zhuang Yu looked at him curiously, but Zuko did not elaborate. He did not want to remember the feeling of losing Katara again.
“You know,” Zhuang Yu continued with a small chuckle. “Satomi was just as beautiful as your Tara when she was her age,” he said as he turned to wink at Zuko. “But I think she’s more beautiful now than ever before, especially since she has put up with me for all these years!” He laughed affectionately. “I know she thinks the same about me, despite what she says.”

Zuko smiled. He hoped one day in the upcoming years he would be able to say the same thing about Katara.

Silence settled between them as the sun continued to set, causing long shadows to fall across the forest floor. A few animals scurried away as they passed while birds flew back to their nests to settle in for the night.

“Something incredible must have occurred for the Fire Lord to be wandering alone in the Earth Kingdom,” Zhuang Yu spoke up in a neutral tone.

Zuko stiffened and he stopped in his tracks. The gray-haired man paused as well and he turned around to face Zuko as they both eyed each other—Zuko with suspicion and Zhuang Yu with curiosity.

“How did you figure it out?” Zuko asked warily.

Zhuang Yu chuckled deeply as he resumed his walk, pulling the ostrich-horse behind him. Zuko watched him for a moment before he followed.

“It wasn’t that hard. You do stand out like a sore thumb,” the older man continued to chuckle as he threw Zuko an affable smile. “A young firebender with a large scar on the left side of his face just like the Fire Lord’s, walking and talking in such a sophisticated manner that no common peasant would be able to boast about.”

Zuko gave him an impressed hum that caused Zhuang Yu to chuckle loudly.

“I may not be firebender or a good fighter, but I am a very observant person,” he commented before he glanced sideways at the silent young man. “I also have a feeling that the pretty, young woman that accompanies you is none other than the respected Master Waterbender, the Lady Katara.”
“Yes,” Zuko admitted.

“And she’s really your betrothed?” the older man asked curiously

“Yes, Lady Katara is my intended bride,” Zuko replied as a smile appeared on his lips.

Zhuang Yu hummed as a small frown appeared between his thick eyebrows.

“I thought…uh…” he began tentatively. “The word is that Lady Katara is Avatar Aang’s uh… girlfriend.”

Zuko felt his temper flare as jealousy gripped his heart before he took a deep breath to dispel the feeling. Instead, it was replaced by guilt. How would Aang react when he came face-to-face with the airbender to tell him that he was going to marry Katara?

“It’s complicated,” Zuko responded with a small sigh.

Zhuang Yu shrugged lightly before he smiled widely at the now dejected young lord.

“Well, it’s obvious Lady Katara loves you by the way she looks at you,” he said as he again winked at Zuko. “It reminds me of the way Satomi looks at me when she thinks I’m not looking.”

Zuko smiled as the older man chuckled and he felt his mood lightened at Zhuang Yu’s words before his expression became serious.

“I would appreciate it if you and your wife do not tell anyone you have seen the Fire Lord and Lady Katara,” he said grimly.

“There must be some dangerous people looking for you both,” Zhuang Yu stated with a frown. “But I promise we will not say anything. You did help us, so it would only be fair we do the same for you.”

“Thank you,” Zuko told him sincerely.
“If these people did happen to show up maybe it would be best that we lead them in another direction,” Zhuang Yu mused as he rubbed at his bearded chin.

“You should only resort to that if it is necessary, but it’s best you say you haven’t seen us,” Zuko indicated.

They finally arrived at the house, and after putting the ostrich-horse away, both men carried the two boar-pigs into the house to the delight of Satomi, who said she would start skinning the animals and drying the meat the next day. While Satomi finished the last touches in the kitchen and Zhuang Yu went to clean up, Zuko pulled Katara into his arms and kissed her softly. Katara sighed happily as they pulled apart.

“You changed your tunic,” Zuko observed as he played with the hem of the dark green tunic Katara was now wearing.

“Yeah, Satomi was nice enough to give me one of her daughter’s old tunics,” Katara explained as she reached up to touch his cheek.

Zuko smiled as he gently grabbed her hand to place a soft kiss on her palm. As Satomi walked back into the room, Zuko quickly moved away and schooled his features into a cool expression. Katara wanted to giggle at his reaction, but decided not to. She understood Zuko was not a man who enjoyed showing his soft and affectionate side for people to witness. It was enough for her to know that he showed his love for her when they were alone.

Once Zhuang Yu returned they all sat down at the low table to begin eating the delicious food the women had cooked. Zuko looked down to gaze tenderly at Katara who smiled back just as affectionately.

Night had finally settled in as the four of them sat at the table enjoying a cup of tea. It was not as great as one of Iroh’s delicious brews, but it was good nonetheless. Zhuang Yu finally explained which was the fastest route to use to Omashu and Zuko and Katara paid close attention to his directions.

“You could stop at the village for some things,” Zhuang Yu advised as he took a sip from his teacup.

“Yes,” Satomi spoke up excitedly. “You can buy some provisions for your journey.”
“That would be nice, but…we don’t have any money,” Zuko responded uncomfortably as he glared down at his clenched hands holding his teacup.

“I have some things you can trade in for money,” Zhuang Yu spoke up evenly.

“I appreciate it, but I must decline your offer,” Zuko replied through gritted teeth. He did not want them to think he needed their charity.

Zhuang Yu seemed to understand for he waved his words aside.

“It’s a small way to repay you for saving my wife and me,” he said neutrally.

“You have already repaid us by welcoming us into your home,” the young lord insisted.

Katara frowned slightly at Zuko’s resistance, but remained silent as she sat by him.

“I’d really like it if you would accept my offer…Li,” the robust man persisted as he stared at the younger man straight in the eye. “If it would make you feel better you can always pay me back.”

This seemed to pacify Zuko for he relaxed in his spot before he took a small sip of the hot tea.

“Very well,” he agreed, sounding so much like the lord he was. “I will repay you as soon as we return home.”

“Great!” Zhuang Yu exclaimed, a happy smile stretching his thin lips.

Katara held back a smile when she caught Satomi’s gaze and the old woman rolled her eyes at the men’s antics. The small room was filled with small talk as the sounds of the night resounded around them.

“That weapon you have there doesn’t seem like something you would wield,” Zhuang Yu remarked as he observed the small sword that rested beside Zuko.

“I…found this sword a couple of weeks ago,” Zuko said smoothly. “I am actually skilled at the dual broadswords.”

“Amazing,” the gray-haired man hummed as he stroked the small beard at his chin.

“That must be quite a sight,” Satomi commented with a grin as she turned to Katara.

“It is,” Katara agreed enthusiastically as she turned bright eyes to Zuko who looked at her with a smoldering gaze.

“Alright, let me show you the things you could trade at the village,” Zhuang Yu spoke up as he drank the last of his tea. He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand before he stood up. “They’re in the stable somewhere. Most of them are weapons that I have no use for, but will surely bring you in some money,” he said as he motioned for Zuko to stand up and follow.

Zhuang Yu sure had some nerves ordering the Fire Lord around, but Zuko did not find it at all offensive, since the old man had been very helpful so far. Zuko stood up and both men again made their way outside.

Katara helped Satomi clear up the table, and with the help of her waterbending, they were able to finish washing the dirty dishes in no time. They returned to the low table to drink some more tea and make small talk as they waited for the men to reappear.

“Tell me, Tara,” Satomi spoke up with a mischievous smile on her face. “It must be great having such a man in your bed.”

Katara felt her face burned up and she looked down at her teacup.

“W-we…uh…haven’t done a-anything like that yet,” she stuttered.

“Really?” the older woman asked incredulously. “I don’t understand why not. You’re beautiful and he’s so handsome. So why hasn’t he bedded you already?” Satomi asked curiously.
Katara flushed crimson as her mind screamed, I wish he had!

“It ... it wouldn’t be proper,” she ended up saying instead.

“Proper? Hmph!” Satomi huffed as she pursed her lips and frowned at the blushing young woman. “Don’t try to deny that you don’t want to bed him! It’s as obvious as the blush on your face.”

“I...I just...couldn’t!” Katara exclaimed as she tried to cover her burning cheeks with her hands. “I wouldn’t be able to look at my father or my grandmother in the eye ever again!”

“They don’t have to know,” the green-eyed woman huffed again. “I forgot you Water Tribe people have this outdated idea about chastity before marriage and all that nonsense.”

Katara frowned and opened her mouth to defend her culture, but she could not deny that some of their laws did seem a bit unfair and silly. Her frown deepened as she looked down at her curled hands on her lap.

“I’m sorry,” Satomi apologized with a small sigh. “I shouldn’t be so disrespectful. Everybody has different views and opinions.”

Katara gave her a tentative smile.

“But you know...” Satomi continued gently as she twirled the teacup in her hands, “you don’t have to do the whole act. There are other ways to be intimate.”

“There are?” Katara asked curiously even though the conversation was making her embarrassed and slightly uncomfortable.

“Well, what have you done so far?” the older woman asked.

“Done?” Katara repeated incomprehensively.
“Uh, well…you know…” Satomi began before she trailed off at the blank look on the young woman’s face. “What I mean to ask is…What have you two done to pleasure each other physically?”

“Oh!” Katara exclaimed as her blue eyes widened in understanding. “Well, um, all we’ve done so far is kiss and hold each other,” she began before she blushed deeply as she remembered the delightful feelings Zuko had evoke in her has he pressed his hardness to her heat.

“I see,” Satomi chuckled softly. “Kissing and holding each other is nice. There are times I like to snuggle with my husband in our bed and just kiss him,” she said before a large grin appeared on her face. “But having a man between your legs can be even more pleasurable.”

Katara choked on her tea and spluttered at the blunt manner this woman was talking to her with. Never before had she had such a conversation with a person and so casually.

“But if you don’t feel comfortable going all the way with him then it’s fine. As I said, there are other ways to be intimate,” the older woman reassured her.

“No, it’s not that the idea of…making love to Zu…uh…my future husband that makes me uncomfortable,” Katara tried to explained as she blushed. “Quite the opposite…I-I can’t stop thinking about it.”

“Then why are you hesitating?” Satomi asked with a huff.

“I promised my Gran-Gran that I would wait until marriage,” Katara explained before she again looked down at her hands. “And well…I don’t know how to approach him when it comes to such things,” she confessed quietly.

Satomi smiled softly as she reached across the table to pat Katara’s hand.

“I’m sure he’d understand and would probably be glad to teach you what he knows,” she said. “But that will only happen if you take the first step.” She pulled back to smile widely at Katara. “He must be waiting anxiously for you to encourage him.”

“Really? How do you know?” Katara asked curiously as she leaned forward eagerly.
“Why, it’s so plain to see he wants you!” Satomi exclaimed, ignoring the widening of the waterbender’s eyes. “It’s obvious by the intimate and possessive way he holds you to his side and the hungry look he has in his eyes when he stares at you, almost as if he wants to jump you right at the moment!” She sighed dreamily. “It reminds me of my dear Zhuang Yu. How romantic…”

Katara smiled happily at Satomi’s words since she had noticed Zuko’s behavior as well.

“Besides,” the short woman continued as she poured more tea into her cup, “no one has to know what goes on with you two. It will be a precious secret between you both.”

They paused when they heard the sound of the men’s voices and their footsteps nearing the house. Satomi turned away from the entrance to smile kindly at Katara.

“Just think about it, dear,” she said quietly so the men would not hear just in case. “Start thinking about you both and not what other people might say or think. You can’t always please them, anyway, so you might as well please him and yourself.”

“Thank you for your advice, Satomi,” Katara said sincerely. “I promise I’ll think about it.”

The sliding door opened and the men, carrying various things in their arms, entered before they placed their cargo in one corner of the room. Zhuang Yu nodded and dusted his hands before he turned to smile at his wife.

“So what were you two up to while we were gone, eh?” he asked with a chuckle as he sat down next to her.

“Oh, we were just talking about women things, you know, sewing and childbirth…” Satomi said as she threw a subtle wink at Katara before she turned large, green eyes at her husband. “Would you like to hear about it, Sweet Potato?”

“Uh…maybe some other time, Pumpkin,” Zhuang Yu replied with an uncomfortable look on his face.

Katara again held back a giggle as she stood up from the table to walk where Zuko was rummaging through the things they brought in. Zuko smiled and straightened as he saw her approaching him before he drew her close to him. Katara reached for his face and pulled him down to give him a deep kiss. Zuko’s eyes widened in surprise at her bold move. As she pulled away, he looked at the older couple who were ignoring them as they whispered to each other. With a smile, Zuko brought Katara closer to his chest and swooped down to press a kiss to her lips. They pulled apart and Zuko brought his hand up to caress Katara’s blushing cheeks.

“There’s something different about you,” Zuko whispered musingly to her.

“I just had a small talk with Satomi,” she replied vaguely as she smiled at him.

“Hm,” Zuko uttered before he handed Katara a small water pouch in exchanged for the heavier water canteen.

“Thanks,” Katara said gratefully as she replaced the water pouch to her hip and placed the canteen with the other things on the floor. “Thank you, Zhuang Yu,” she repeated as she turned to smile at the older man.

“Anything for such a pretty lady,” he said with a wink. He laughed when his wife swatted at him with an annoyed huff.

Katara giggled behind her hand while Zuko smirked as he played with the large, straw hat Zhuang Yu had given him so he could hide his identity better. Zhuang Yu and Satomi stood up from the table and walked to a small storage space in another corner of the room. They began to bring out thin futons, pillows, and blankets before placing them down in the center of the matted room after moving the low table against one wall.

“Spend the night here and you can set out early tomorrow morning, alright?” Zhuang Yu demanded with a smile.

“We appreciate your offer,” Zuko responded with a small nod of his head.

“Good night, dears,” Satomi spoke up as she looped her arm through her husband’s. “I hope you have pleasant dreams.”

“Thank you,” Katara replied with a smile.
The older couple went through another shoji door and the younger pair was left alone in the small room.

“I’m looking forward to not sleeping on the hard forest floor for at least tonight,” Zuko commented seriously, as he moved to fix their futons.

Katara laughed as she went to help him.

“I noticed that you seemed sad earlier,” Zuko spoke up quietly. “Do you want to talk about it?”

Katara frowned as she tried to remember what he was talking about before she let out a sigh.

“I was just thinking about my family,” she replied softly. “I miss them.”

Zuko placed his arm around her waist and squeezed reassuringly. “We’ll see our family again. I promise.”

Turning to smile at him, Katara nodded before he released her. She noticed he had said ‘our family’ and not ‘our families’. Her heart warmed at the thought that he was already combining their two families into one big one.

Soon they were both lying on the thin futons beside each other, the room dark except for one candle that flickered on the table. Katara gripped the blanket closer to her as she tried to swallow the sadness and disappointment at the fact that Zuko once again did not pulled her into his arms as they fell asleep. She thought about scooting closer to him, but decided not to since she did not know if Zuko would welcome her advances. With a soft sigh, Katara rolled over to lie on her side, facing away from Zuko’s sleeping form.

Her ears perked up when she heard the rustling of Zuko’s blankets as he moved before a smile broke on her face when she felt him snake his arm around her waist. She let out a contented sigh when he pulled her to his chest.

“Katara?” she heard him speak up softly.
“Yes?” she responded just as soft.

“Will you grow gray and old with me?” he asked her in a whisper as he placed a soft kiss below her ear.

“Yes,” Katara breathed out gently as her heart warmed at his sweet words.

“Will you stay by my side even if I grow ugly with age?” he asked, amusement lacing his deep voice.

“That’s a very good question,” she mused teasingly as she placed her hand over the one that held her to him.

“Hey!” he protested quietly and he squeezed her in retaliation.

Katara giggled softly.

“Will you still love me even when I get wrinkles?” she asked.

“Of course,” he replied sincerely.

“Then of course I’ll stay by your side,” she responded back as she turned in his arms so they could be facing each other before she grinned at him, “Though I find it hard to imagine you growing ugly with age.”

Zuko chuckled quietly in her ear as he squeezed her.

“I sure hope you’re right,” he said before he let out a quiet sigh as he gazed affectionately at her, “Though I know you’ll still be beautiful even when your hair turns white.”

Katara smiled at him as she leaned forward to place a kiss on his lips. Zuko sighed against her mouth before he pulled away. Katara feared he was going to pull completely away from her, but she relaxed when he just settled beside her.
“I love you,” he whispered.

“And I love you,” she responded back.

The sound of night cat-owls and crickets began to lull them to sleep as they snuggled close to each other. As she fell asleep in Zuko’s warm and strong arms, the last thing that went through Katara’s mind was Satomi’s words.
Zuko slowly opened his eyes, blinking the haziness away as he tried to calm down his rapid breathing. He felt hot and the hardness between his legs ached as the last details of his very arousing dream left his mind. A dream where he had been doing very interesting things to Katara against a sturdy tree. A small groan escaped him as yet again he was tormented by images of what he could not have, but craved with all his being. At least, for a little while longer. Grumbling under his breath, the young firebender absentmindedly let his eyes wander around the unfamiliar dark room as he tried to sit up.

He gasped, his body stiffening, when he felt something brush lightly against his erection. Looking down, Zuko swallowed thickly when he saw Katara sleeping in his arms, her head resting on his upper arm and her leg thrown over his hip, dangerously close to his evident arousal. He very much wanted to roll them over until he was pinning Katara down beneath him so he could rub himself against her, but he fought vehemently to keep his control. He knew he should have kept his distance from her like he had been doing the past few nights, but the only thing he had wanted to do was have her in his arms after the vows they had made the previous night and the loving smile she had directed at him. Never before had he had the need, the desire, to say such tender and emotional words, but those were the kinds of feelings Katara evoked in him.

Taking a few calming breaths, Zuko tried to carefully extract himself from the waterbender wrapped so tightly around him, which was difficult since all he wanted to do was continue laying there with her in his arms. However, he knew if he remained he would want to do more than just cuddle with the beautiful waterbender.

Once he had gently moved Katara away from him and laid her comfortably back on her pillow, Zuko scooted away from the futon and stood up with a groan as he tried to adjust himself. This was really becoming a slightly embarrassing problem. With a sigh, Zuko turned his gaze to the window, noticing that small rays of light were peeking from the curtains. He knew that it was time for them to head out soon.

Turning back to the sleeping waterbender, an affectionate smile curled his lips as he watched her frown in her sleep at the lack of his body and warmth. She mumbled in her sleep, her brow furrowing softly, before she rolled onto her back, her lips slightly parted, and her breasts moving up and down as she breathed. The front of his pants tightened again.

Agni, how he wanted her.

Heaving a loud and self-pitying sigh, Zuko again turned away from Katara’s enticing body. He had to get it into his head that he had to be patient and wait until the day came when he would finally be able to make love to her. And when that day finally arrived, nothing would be able to stop him from deriving pleasure from her body and returning the favor.

“Thank you, for your hospitality,” Zuko said coolly as both he and Katara gave a small bow to the older couple standing on the porch of their house.

Zhuang Yu and Satomi quickly returned the bow before they straightened up with smiles on their aged faces.

“You’re welcome. It’s the least we could do for helping us,” the gray-haired man replied.

“Have a safe journey, dears,” Satomi spoke up as she waved at them as they shouldered their packs. “And I hope you have a wonderful and pleasurable marriage.”

Katara blushed lightly when the older woman gave her subtle wink.

“Thank you,” Katara responded sincerely.

After bidding Zhuang Yu and Satomi another goodbye and promising to repay everything they had done for them, Zuko and Katara turned away from the small house and headed out toward the village where they would make one stop before making their way to Omashu.

“What was that wink that Satomi threw at you?” Zuko asked curiously as he looked down at the young woman walking beside him.

Another blush appeared on Katara’s cheek as she almost faltered in her steps.

“Oh, uh, it was nothing.” she replied with a nervous giggle.

Zuko eyed her suspiciously, but he shrugged and let it go. It was probably something between women that he probably would not be able to understand anyway. He felt Katara grab his hand and he smiled as he squeezed hers. Now that they were alone again, he felt no qualms in showing her his affectionate side. He knew that she understood that he was apprehensive in showing his tender side since he was not used to them—his father and sister were not the most affectionate people, after all—and he did not want to seem too soft in front of the eyes of those he was trying to show his fierce and authoritative side to. He could just hear his advisors and courtiers chuckling under their breaths.

The morning sun was bright in the blue sky as both young benders walked along the path that would lead them to the village sometime in the late hours of the night. After their small talk from the previous night, their conversations began to flow as comfortably and as enjoyably as they had many times before. As more time passed by getting to know and understand each other better, the more their understanding and their love grew.

They paused for a few minutes to take a small break under the shades of some trees since the day had become hot. Katara replaced her water pouch to her hip after drinking some water before returning her attention to Zuko who was drinking from the water canteen she had been using before. She watched as he wiped his mouth with the back of his hand before he let out a sigh. Katara allowed her eyes to roam Zuko’s tall frame even though his clothes were slightly impeding her view. She knew it was muscular and hard since his body had been pressed so close to hers a couple of times. Her eyes settled on the spot between his hard thighs as she recalled the feeling of another hard thing pressing into her.

A deep red hue surfaced on her cheeks and she quickly averted her eyes when he called out to her. She had been having such thoughts so many times recently that it slightly embarrassed her. Katara busied herself by retying the water pouch to her hip before she followed Zuko, taking his hand immediately when he held it out for her. He asked her if something was wrong, but she stuttered out that everything was fine. Not wanting for him to continue asking her, Katara pulled on his arm with a large smile and picked up their pace.

Ever since she had that talk with Satomi, Katara could not stop thinking about the older woman’s words. She agonized over the decision of what to do, of the repercussion that would follow if she were to surrender to her attraction to Zuko, of what her family would think if they ever found out. And Zuko wasn’t making it easier either, especially when he kissed her, or held her, or looked at her with smoldering eyes when he thought she wasn’t looking.

However, after her talk with Satomi, she had a new point of view that she had never considered before to help her make a decision. Satomi had said there were other ways to be intimate that would not compromise her virtue, but would be pleasant nonetheless. Katara did not know what these other methods of intimacy could be, but the more she thought about it, the more curious she got, and the more she wanted to find out. With Zuko.

But could she really do such a thing? Would she regret it later if she allowed herself to become intimate with Zuko in such a way before they married?

Katara looked up from frowning pensively at the ground beneath her feet and shifted her gaze toward Zuko as he walked silently beside her. As if he felt her intense gaze on him, the young Fire
Lord turned his head toward her and smiled as he brushed his fingers against her cheek. Katara let out a soft sigh and her heart stuttered in her chest at his affectionate gesture before she placed her hand over his.

Zuko paused at the adoring and soft look in her eyes before he wrapped his arms around her waist and pulled her gently into his strong chest. He was unable to stop himself from pressing a deep kiss to her lips, to express the same tender emotions he held for her that were difficult for him to expressed verbally. When Katara sighed delightfully into his mouth, he knew that she understood him just as she always did.

After a while of embracing and placing gentle kisses on each other’s mouths, they realized they were on a road where anybody could chance upon them and they pulled away. They smiled sheepishly at each other before they continued walking without saying a single word, they knew there was none to be said at the moment to emphasize what was in their hearts.

“Agni, Katara, it’s like you place a spell on me that makes me forget where I’m currently at and all I think about is kissing your lips,” the young firebender told her after a while with a playful frown.

Katara giggled as she flicked her hair over her shoulder with an equally playful glint in her eyes.

“Oh, yes, because I’m an amazing enchantress,” she said half sarcastically and half amusedly.

“Enchantress, indeed,” Zuko whispered to her with a slight growl before he cleared his throat and resumed his cool expression. “Come on then,” he urged as he tugged her along.

Katara smiled. That sweet kiss, Zuko’s words, and the way her body reacted to his mere presence had made the decision for her.

She would follow both her Gran-Gran and Satomi’s advice. She would keep her virginity until her marriage bed, but she would also allow her body the comfort and pleasure of being intimate with Zuko, however small that intimacy was. They did not have to make love and go through the whole act. No one needed to know what they did. It would be something special between Zuko and her. She felt so good when Zuko just kissed her and she burned to know what it would feel like if they went a bit further. She knew Zuko was an honorable man and he respected her wishes, even if it was obvious he had to hold himself back. That is why she trusted him, trusted him with her body and her heart. She loved him more than anything in the world and she was going to prove it to him by giving a bit more of herself to him than she had ever allowed any man before.
A small sigh escaped her as she flicked a glance toward her future husband’s face. The only problem was to find a way to make him understand what she wanted without embarrassing herself.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The sound of a large group of people coming from behind made them tense, and they quickly veered off the path to hide behind the bushes and trees. They were apprehensive at the thought that it could be Jianguo and his group, so they peered warily behind the shadows of the trees. The group that passed them did not seem like they were from the rebels’ camp and Zuko assumed that they were just heading toward the village. Both young benders looked at each other and smiled in relief at the thought that they were indeed heading back to civilization, however small it was. Just to be safe, they decided to walk beside the path, hidden among the trees, in case they ran into anyone else.

It was midafternoon when they decided to take a small break and eat the small rice balls Satomi had given them. Just as they were about to head out again, Katara paused and tilted her head to the side.

“What is it?” Zuko asked as he turned around when he noticed she had stopped.

“I can feel another large body of water not far from here,” Katara spoke up as she looked at a point beyond the trees before she looked up at Zuko. “Maybe we can refill my water pouch and your water canteen.”

Zuko frowned as he looked back at the path before he gave a small nod. They had consumed most of their water since the day had been hot.

“Let’s check it out then,” he said.

A few minutes later, they were struggling their way through a thick cluster of bushes before they suddenly emerged into a small and beautiful clearing. The lush green grass had a few patches covered with small white flowers that from afar resembled spots of white snow, while tall trees with branches heavy with green leaves encircled the peaceful glade to give it a feeling of a private haven. However, what had Katara smiling in delight was the tranquil waterfall that cascaded down in large rivulets from a small hill and pooled at a crystal clear pond surrounded by a few small boulders.

Zuko watched as Katara’s blue eyes sparkled in fascination as she stared at the serene pool, and a small smile tugged at his lips at the way she lit up at the simplest of things. Of course, that did not mean he was not going to pamper her with exquisite gifts once they married. After all, she deserved everything he could give her.
“How about we spend the night here?” Zuko spoke up once she finally ripped her gaze from the trickling waterfall. “We can arrive at the village tomorrow.”

“Are you sure?” Katara asked as a small crease appeared on her smooth brow.

“Yes,” Zuko assured her with a smile. “You can even take a bath after we eat.”

“Alright!” Katara relented easily with a large smile brightening her face.

Zuko chuckled at her quick response before he walked over to the edge of the pond and dropped the heavy bag with the things he was going to trade in the village. Katara quickly followed him and placed her lighter pack next to his. The only things she was carrying were a few new blankets Satomi had given them to replace the ones they had taken from Jianguo’s camp.

“How about you collect firewood while I try to see if I can get something for us to eat?” Zuko spoke up when Katara turned to look at him.

“Okay, but be careful, alright? Try not to set the whole forest on fire,” Katara told him with a teasing smile.

“I’ll try,” Zuko responded with a dry chuckle.

Walking away from the charming clearing, the young lord stepped into the thick forest as he tried to find something that he could present to Katara for their meal. So far, Katara had been the one that had provided them with food when she had caught some fish for them, and though he knew it was ridiculous, it had upset him. It was just that he felt like it was his responsibility to bring in the food. He was the man. It was his duty. And he wanted to prove to Katara that he was a man capable of providing her with what she needed.

Shaking his head, Zuko brushed the thoughts aside as he looked at his surroundings. He remembered the hunting tips Zhuang Yu had given him after bringing the boar-pigs into the house and he immediately set out to look for animal tracks. Watching for tracks was something he could do and was used to, and he carefully examined the forest floor as he went. Once he found small paw prints, he followed them until the tracks disappeared into a small hole between the roots of a large tree. As quietly as possible, Zuko retreated, sat in the shadows of some low trees, and stared at the dark hole to wait for the creature to emerge. He remembered that Sokka would wait hours for his prey to come out and have that perfect chance to strike. If the sometimes-silly warrior could do it, then Zuko was determined that he could as well. He just hoped it would not take that long so he could return to Katara.

As he waited, he was immediately brought back to the day when he and Katara had started that game of chase that led to a wonderful experience against the rough bark of a large tree. The taste of those plump lips of hers, the feeling of her soft breasts pressed so tightly against his chest, the feeling of her heat against his hard length as he moved against her...Zuko groaned quietly before he shook his head to clear his mind when it became evident that he was becoming aroused at the memory. Damn, never had he been so easily—and willingly—distracted by a woman before.

He snapped to attention when a movement caught his eye and he watched silently as a rabbit-squirrel stepped cautiously out of its hiding place. Its small nose twitched as it scented the air while its long bushy tail flicked behind it. It stayed at the entrance to its burrow for what seemed to Zuko like hours before it scurried away from the hole. It stopped a few feet away, flicked its large ears in every direction, and again darted away.

Zuko held his breath as the small animal froze a few feet in front of him, its long ears swirling wildly atop its head, before it moved again under the shade of a tree where many acorns were scattered around its roots. Standing noiselessly from his spot, Zuko took a small step forward as he prepared to flick his fire whip out and behead the rabbit-squirrel just as he did with the boar-pig.

The rabbit-squirrel, oblivious to the danger that was so close to it, continued to gather acorns into its puffy cheeks before it dropped one as a small twig snapped from behind. Zuko watched as the animal froze again before it spun in his direction with frightened eyes. They looked at each other, both unmoving. Without warning, the animal turned on its paws and sprinted away. Zuko took a few long strides as he raised his arm and flicked out his thin fire whip.

Katara finished refilling her water pouch and Zuko’s water canteen by bending the clean water from the waterfall into them before she returned to where their bags rested. She sat before the pile of wood she had erected for a campfire and chewed on her lip as she again debated whether she could go through with her decision. Every time she thought about bringing it up with Zuko, her face would heat up in embarrassment and uncertainty.

What if she was making a mistake? What if she made a fool of herself? What if she could not please Zuko?

Katara let out a calming sigh. She should not rush into things, but let it come naturally when the time was right. But when would she know when the time was right? She almost felt like laughing at how ironic her situation was now. When she had been with Aang, she had shied away from thoughts about intimacy, but with Zuko, it was all she could think about every waking moment of the day and in every dream at night.
The sound of someone approaching made her tense up and she reached her hand to the water pouch at her hip. She immediately relaxed when she saw Zuko stepping into the clearing and she raised a bemused eyebrow at the pleased grin that adorned his face, before a smile broke over her own face when he proudly raised the animal he had caught. She watched as he quickly approached her, and upon reaching her, he presented her with his kill with an extravagant bow.

“I hope this is good enough for my first kill,” he remarked with a smooth grin before he gave a little shrug of his broad shoulders. “I’ve never had the need to hunt down an animal before to eat it.”

Katara smiled widely as she took the beheaded rabbit-squirrel in her hands. She shivered slightly when he intentionally brushed his fingers against hers.

“It’s great. Thanks,” she said gratefully as she laid the animal in front of her before she raised her head to smile at Zuko who was grinning smugly to himself. “You know, there used to be a small tradition in our tribe, many, many years ago, where a man presented his kill to his chosen woman.”

“Really?” Zuko asked with interest as he watched Katara pull the small dagger he had given her from the pile of other weapons before she began to skin the small animal. “I thought that the man had to propose by giving the woman a necklace.”

“Actually that tradition was created in the Northern Water Tribe,” Katara explained absentmindedly.

“I see,” Zuko replied with a confused frown. “So your tribe doesn’t use it?”

“No, we do. After our sister tribe helped with the reconstruction of the Southern Water Tribe these past years, we have now adopted that tradition,” the waterbender explained as she continued to remove the animal’s fur. “It replaced the older one when the tribe began to expand, the living conditions became better, and of course after spending time with members of our sister tribe.”

“How interesting,” Zuko mused as he continued to watch her.

“I’ve always wondered if there’s a tradition in the Fire Nation for a man to propose to a woman,” Katara enthused as she looked up briefly to smile curiously at him.
“Well, I’m not sure about what the rest of the Fire Nation citizens do, but there is one tradition among the nobility,” Zuko informed her.

“Really? What is it?” Katara asked and tilted her head curiously.

A secretive smile appeared on Zuko’s face.

“I’ll tell you about it later,” he told her mysteriously.

Katara raised an eyebrow at him before she returned to her task. Skinning animals was nothing new to her, especially since the warm furs were a necessity in the cold climate of the tribes.

“So what did the earlier tradition of the Southern Water Tribe signify?” Zuko asked instead to redirect her thoughts from the subject.

“It was a way for the man to show the woman that he was a good hunter and that he would be able to provide for her and their future children,” Katara explained as she continued with her work.

“I see,” Zuko commented coolly as he eyed Katara’s concentrated face before he continued after a long moment of silence, “And how would the man know if his chosen woman had accepted him?”

Looking up from skinning the animal at the tone of his voice, Katara heard the undercurrent in his words and saw the uncertainty in his eyes. She placed the now bare animal beside her and washed her hands with some waterbending. She stood up before she looked at him to give him a reassuring smile.

“Why, the woman would accept his offering, of course,” she said softly as she reached a hand out to place it on his chest. She smiled when he shivered at her touch before she breathed out, “And she would also give him a small token of appreciation as her acceptance to his proposal.”

“What kind of token?” Zuko asked quietly as he stared down deeply into her eyes.

He held his breath when Katara rose on the tips of her toes and raised her face close to his until her breath tickled his lips. His breathing sped up as he waited anxiously for her to close the distance between their lips, but instead she moved her head to the side and placed a quick kiss to his cheek before she pulled back with a grin.

“There. That’s the token of my appreciation,” she said flippantly.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at her before he grumbled under his breath about her being a tease. When Katara giggled at him and made to move away so she could start on their meal, Zuko grabbed her arm and pulled on it until she stumbled into his chest. Before she could protest indignantly, the young lord cupped the back of her head and kissed her until she was begging for air. Pulling back, Zuko smirked smugly at her dazed look.

“I think it unfair that the man would only get a kiss on the cheek after possibly risking his life to hunt an animal down,” Zuko remarked casually as he moved away to light up the pile of wood.

“And what do you think would’ve been a better token?” Katara asked as she stared at him dazedly as he shot a spark of flames that instantly created a campfire.

Zuko dusted his hands off before he glanced at her from the corner of his eye.

“Oh… I think it’s best that I keep that to myself,” he muttered before he cleared his throat as he indicated at the animal at their feet. “Don’t you have to wash that before we roast it?”

Katara pursed her lips since it was the second time he had said the same thing to her before he tried to avoid telling her what he had in mind. Although a part of her shied away in virginal embarrassment, another part of her—the more insisting part of her—wanted to know. However, she knew that if she wanted Zuko to open up to her, she had to be the one to take the first step, he would never do anything to pressure her.

Looking up to the setting sky, Katara brought her gaze back down to Zuko as he started to fix their bedding and she again began to chew on her lip anxiously.

The flames of a small crackling campfire was the only bright light visible in the little clearing surrounded by the darkened forest. Crickets chirped and night birds called out into the calm night as the young Fire Lord and the waterbender rested on their backs atop the luscious grass and stared at the millions of twinkling stars that speckled the midnight sky.
Resting on her side with her head pillowed on Zuko’s arm, Katara watched—completely enthralled—the soft expression on Zuko’s face as he related a short myth about the brightest star in the sky Lady Ursa had told him when he was a child. She listened with a pounding heart as his deep, velvety voice caressed her ears as he spoke, as his sandalwood scent tickled her senses, and as the heat of his body warmed her skin as he tucked her to his side. When his large hand accidentally brushed against the side of her breast, Katara almost let out a deep moan.

Zuko finished his story, and with a soft smile, he looked down at Katara as she lay quietly at his side. He paused at the strange way she was staring at him, and when she did not say anything, he began to worry.

“What?” he called out as he gave her a small squeeze.

“We should bathe,” she spoke up softly.

“But it’s the middle of the night,” Zuko said in bewilderment as he frowned at her.

“I know,” Katara continued in that same soft tone.

Before he could speak again, Katara moved away from him and stood up. Zuko sat up, and with a confused expression, watched as Katara made her way toward the quiet pond until she stood at the edge with her back turned toward him.

His eyes widened when he saw her tug the dark sash around her waist before she dropped it to the ground beside her, followed slowly by her dark green tunic. Zuko swallowed thickly as the smooth skin of her shoulders and her lower back gleamed under the half-moon’s light. He was surprised, however, when she began to lower her black pants down her hips and he quickly averted his eyes before the sight of her became his undoing. However, when he heard her toss her clothes aside, he was unable to stop his gaze from returning to her form. He gulped when more of her skin was revealed to him, her slender arms, her bare thighs, her exquisite long legs…

Breathing rapidly, Zuko again looked away from her and leapt to his feet before he reluctantly turned away. He closed his eyes for a moment in order to regain his composure, but the sight of Katara in only her under-wrappings was burned into his mind, making it hard for him to achieve his iron control. He needed to get away, put some distance between him and the bewitching woman that stood in front of the sparkling waterfall, before he broke his promise.
“I’m…” he rasped before he cleared his throat as he began to walk away, “I’m going to look for more firewood.”

“Zuko,” her sweet voice called out to him and he immediately paused.

Katara watched timorously as Zuko shifted in his place and his hands shook at his sides before he clenched them to cease their trembling. When he did not turn around, Katara resisted the urge to gather her clothes and cover herself up in mortification at the thought that she had somehow done something wrong or that perhaps Zuko was appalled at her brazenness. But she steeled her nerves and took a few calming breaths to stop her own trembling. She needed to take the first step. She wanted Zuko to know that she was ready for them to take one step further in their relationship.

Swallowing her uncertainty and insecurity, Katara called out to him again in a timid voice.

“Please don’t go, Zuko.”

Zuko’s brow furrowed at her words as he clenched and unclenched his hands. Did she not understand what she was doing to him? Did she not realize how much trouble and pain it caused him to hold himself back from her? Did she not know what he would probably do if she did not let him go?

He was brought out of his thoughts, and his curiosity escalated, when the sound of Katara stepping into the pool reached his ears. He heard the water lapping at her legs as she waded deeper into the water. Unable to resist the temptation, Zuko slowly turned around with bated breath.

His breath hitched in his throat as he watched her making her way deeper into the glistening pond, the white wrappings around her chest and her hips a great contrast against the darker color of her skin and hair. He watched with heated eyes as she paused for a second, the water now reaching to her waist, before she submerged herself. A few ripples spread across the surface of the clear pool as she disappeared. He waited, his body heating up rapidly, until Katara emerged from the surface of the water a few seconds later and flipped her long wet hair behind her, the act causing sparkling droplets to fly in every direction. She looked like an enchanting water nymph luring him toward her, calling to his very soul. Zuko licked his lips as his eyes traveled over her wet body as it glistened under the gentle moonlight before he brought his gaze back to her face.

Their eyes locked and it seemed like their surroundings and the sounds of the night disappeared, and the only thing they were aware of was the presence of the other. A diffident smile appeared on Katara’s lips as she raised one trembling hand to beckon him forward.
“Join me, Zuko,” she said softly. “Please.”

Incapable of resisting her quiet call, Zuko slowly began to rid himself of his clothes as he continued to stare unwaveringly into Katara’s deep, blue eyes. Once he removed his dark boots, Zuko reached for his trousers, but there was still a small part of his brain that told him it would be best if he kept them on. He still did not know what Katara truly meant in calling for him to join her in the pond and he did not wish to frighten her.

He stepped slowly into the water and shivered at the cool contact before he unconsciously raised his body temperature to ward off the chill as he waded into the water toward her, never breaking eye contact. Once he was standing before her, Zuko intently stared into her blue orbs as he tried not to let his eyes wander below her face, lest his control broke.

“Katara,” he breathed as he reached a hand out to caress the skin of her blushing cheek with his thumb.

Katara’s heart was pounding hard in her chest at the proximity of his warm body and she closed her eyes at the sound of his masculine voice and the feeling of his soft touch on her skin. Did he understand what she was trying to tell him?

Zuko watched as a small droplet of water trailed down her forehead, down her petite nose, and over her lovely lips, until it quivered on her chin. He watched intently as the sparkling bead trembled when a small shiver racked through her body and he followed its path as it dropped onto her chest until it slid down between the cleft of her covered breasts. He stared hungrily at the sight of her hard nipples straining against the wet cloth and he groaned softly when his cock hardened almost painfully in his trousers. He heard Katara let out a shuddering sigh and his eyes immediately settled on her slightly parted lips.

Before Katara could utter another word, she found herself crushed against the hard and unyielding body of the man she loved before her lips were caught in a passionate and fiery kiss that left her breathless and weak in the knees. Afraid she would collapse at the sudden intensity, Katara wrapped her arms around Zuko’s neck, one hand gripping the hair on the back of his head, before she returned the assault on her mouth with equal fervor.

Zuko growled low in his throat when Katara pressed herself against him and a tingle went down his spine when her teeth accidentally grazed his tongue, causing him to tighten his arms around her body and lift her closer to him. She tasted heavenly. Just the pure, supple feeling of her wet skin under his hands was driving him insane with desire. He needed more, he wanted more. His hot tongue traced the line of her bottom lip before he pulled the plump flesh into his mouth and sucked on it.
The sound of Katara’s sharp gasp brought him crashing down from his lust-induced haze and his eyes shot open in shock and guilt at his sudden fierce assault. He wrenched himself away from her delicious mouth, and placing her back on her feet, he held her at arm’s length as he tried to control his harsh breathing, and in the process, call forth his iron restraint before he ended up hurting her.

Breathing equally as hard, Katara watched anxiously as Zuko closed his eyes and shook his head as he held her away from him.

“Ka…Katara…” he panted in a strained voice. “I think we should get dressed.”

“No,” Katara pleaded between breaths. “Zuko…”

“Please, Katara!” Zuko insisted firmly as he gave her a pained look. “We have to stop before I break my promise and…I take you…here.”

“Would it be that bad if it’s here or anywhere else?” Katara asked quietly as she wrapped her arms around herself. “Don’t…you want me?” she whispered.

Zuko shook his head and his eyes softened at the dejected look on her face before he lifted her chin with one finger so she could see his sincerity.

“If I could, I would have my way with you anywhere and anytime. Believe me, it doesn’t matter where or when... the thought is always there,” he groaned.

“But I…I want,” Zuko swallowed as he tried to find the words that could help him express himself without sounding like a complete idiot. “Our first time…I want it to be with you as my wife. I want your first time to be in our bedchamber back in the Fire Nation with silky sheets beneath you and candles shining on your perfect skin, not in a random part of an Earth Kingdom forest.”

Katara felt elated tears prick her eyes as Zuko’s heartfelt words made her heart expand until she was afraid it would explode. With a watery smile, she gently placed her hand on his wrist.

“That’s what I want too,” she told him tenderly. “I want to give all of myself to you as your wife. I want to be your wife when you…make love to me for the first time.”
A small crease appeared on Zuko’s brow as he tried to understand what was going on.

“But just now… it seemed like you wanted…” he trailed off.

A deep blush blossomed across Katara’s cheeks and she averted her eyes from his questioning golden orbs.

“Satomi said there were other ways to be intimate without… doing the whole act,” she stuttered shyly.

“Oh. I see,” Zuko responded with wide eyes and a light blush surfaced along his unscarred cheek.

“I know how much holding yourself back is affecting you and it made me feel so horrible. Then, you became a bit distant after that game of chase and it saddened me. So I t-thought that—” Katara began hesitantly.

Zuko pressed his thumb to her lips to stop her words before he shook his head as he frowned at her.

“I didn’t mean to make you believe my… predicament was entirely your fault and that you had to do something about it,” he interrupted solemnly. “And I’m sorry for making you feel like I was pushing you away. But you don’t have to force yourself to do something that you’re not ready for. I said that I was not going to pressure you and I won’t. I just have to—”

This time it was Katara’s slender finger that stopped his words. Zuko furrowed his eyebrows as he looked at her inquiringly. He had said that he did not want Katara to do anything she was not ready for, but it was becoming more and more difficult to keep that promise. Damn it, he was a hot-blooded male! How could he stop his body from desiring her?

“It’s not just because I want to please you…” he heard Katara whisper gently, causing him to shudder at the breathless tone of her voice.

Zuko swallowed thickly at the intensity he saw in her blue depths as she removed her finger from his lips and again closed the distance between them, placing her small hand on his chest, provoking a low moan from his lips at her cool touch on his heated skin.
“I want it too,” she said in a breathless yet firm tone. “I don’t want to keep suppressing my feelings for you and the way you make my body react. I want to experience the pleasure of simple intimacy with you, Zuko. Only you.”

Zuko had never heard sweeter words. Everything he had felt for this beautiful woman suddenly exploded within him, and he could not have argued with her even if he had wanted to. Drawing her firmly against his chest, he tangled his fingers in her wet hair, and tilting her head, he captured her lips with his. He groaned when he realized that she had already parted her succulent lips in anticipation of his kiss.

They kissed slowly, tenderly, as they held onto each other as they stood in the middle of the pond. Zuko slowly backed her up against one of the slick boulders while droplets from the waterfall rained down on them. He kissed her with such tender restraint and thoroughness that it made her sigh happily. Pulling away slowly, Zuko gazed deeply into her eyes as they panted softly before he rested his forehead against hers with a low moan.

“Gods, Katara, you have no idea how much I want you,” he groaned against her lips.

“I think I have a pretty good idea,” she replied with a smile as she gently pressed her stomach closer to him until she felt the hard bulge between his legs, causing him to let out a hiss.

Zuko wanted to push back and press his arousal into her stomach, but instead he grasped her hips and gently pushed her away until she was pressed against the boulder behind her. When Katara looked away from him as if he had rejected her, Zuko leaned down to press soft kisses along her neck.

“I want you to know,” he began softly as he buried his face in her wet hair, taking a deep inhale of her fragrant scent, “that I just don’t solely want you because of your body and the pleasures it will bring me.”

He pulled away from her hair to brush his lips against her soft ones.

“I want all of you…your body, your mind, your heart…everything,” he told her ardently.

“I know,” Katara sighed happily against his lips. “And I willingly give them to you.”
“Just like I want to give you everything that I am to you,” he growled against her mouth before he caught her lips in another searing kiss.

The tender kiss from before changed into a frenzied dance of lips, tongues, and mouths. Zuko’s arms closed around Katara’s small body as he kissed her with a hunger as scorching as the flames he commanded, his hard edges melting until she fitted perfectly against him. Shaken by his impassioned heat and the demands of his wet tongue, Katara clung to him tightly with a small cry as she responded to him as she had never responded to any man before.

Without breaking away from her lips, Zuko lifted Katara into his arms and he smiled when she immediately wound her arms around his neck. He walked to the edge of the pond and stepped out of the water. After Katara removed the water off their clothes with her waterbending, he carried her closer to the campfire where their blankets had already been laid out a couple of hours before. He knelt down slowly before he pulled away from their kiss and carefully laid Katara atop the warm blankets, the light of the campfire making her skin glow and her eyes glisten as they panted hard against each other.

Katara gazed at Zuko’s muscular upper body, at the way his alabaster skin gleamed under the moonlight like marble, and she marveled, not for the first time, at his perfection despite the scar that rested on his abdomen. She moved her gaze away from his bare chest and blushed deeply at the intense yet loving way he was gazing at her. She gave him another shy smile. Apprehension made her stomach flutter and anticipation made her heart pound. Was she doing the right thing?

