Zuko noticed the anxiety in her eyes and he brought a hand up to her cheek to soothe her worries. If only she knew, he was as nervous as she was. He knew there were other ways of intimacy, but the truth was that, besides the act of sex, he had never participated in such deeds. His only objective with the few women he had been with before was to find the quickest way to release his sexual frustration and, as soon as he achieved it, make his departure and forget the encounter. He had cared for Mai, but—as much as it embarrassed him to admit it—he had not been a good lover to her the few times they had been together.

However, the woman that lay before him was Katara, the woman he loved, and she deserved better than the way he had treated those women before, she deserved his full attention and devotion. Though he could not show his feelings for her by making love to her yet, he was determined to please her in other ways. He would just allow the little advice he had heard his drunken crewmembers boast about on music night as well as his male instincts to guide him in his actions. At the thought, his anxiety left him and he let out a calm sigh as he gazed down at her.

“You are so beautiful,” he whispered as he ran his hand slowly, reverently, down from her cheek to her slender throat.
Katara smiled at him, but she tensed when his hand moved down between her covered breasts until it rested on her quivering stomach where he splayed his fingers over her skin. Zuko leaned down toward her, his body hovering over her smaller form, and touched his lips to her mouth in a light caress. He felt her tension ease at the contact and she willingly opened her mouth to him before she slowly let out her tongue to run it across his lip, causing him to let out a pleased groan.

Katara forgot her worries and fears as she allowed herself to get so lost in the soft passion of Zuko’s kiss that she was unable to stop the surprised gasp that left her when she felt Zuko’s large hand cup her breast over her wrappings. He squeezed it lightly and she moaned as a flare of heat raced down to her warm core. Unable to stop herself, Katara tightly wrapped her arms around his neck and pulled him closer to her so that he was almost lying on top of her body.

Encouraged by her reaction, Zuko began to knead the soft, covered mound while he continued to make sweet love to her wonderful mouth. He was tempted to remove her under-wrappings, he very much wanted to feel her soft round flesh in his hand, but he did not know if she was ready for that yet. He was going to take this slow. He was going to please her unhurriedly and with tender care. This night was going to be about her, even though she had made this decision in order to please him and take away some of his torment in the first place.

They broke away from their kiss to catch their breaths, but Zuko did not detach his lips from her skin and instead trailed kisses to her ear. The young Fire Lord gently scraped his teeth against her earlobe, tugging at the soft flesh before engulfing it with a gentle suck. Katara’s breath hitched at the sensation and she moaned. She was immediately reminded of her thoughts about Zuko biting her ear the first time she entered his royal bedchambers, and she almost giggled.

Who would have thought that it would come true?

Zuko moved away from her ear before he attached his mouth to her throat. Katara sighed when Zuko kissed her neck and she moved her head to the side to give him more access, which he rewarded by trailing his hot tongue along the slender column. Katara moaned deeply when Zuko began to massage her breast more firmly and she let out a loud squeak when he pressed his thumb on her aching nipple.

“Zuko,” she breathed out as she pushed her breast closer to his warm hand.

Smiling against her skin, Zuko pinched the hard peak with his thumb and forefinger and grinned smugly when she let out a gasp and grabbed tightly onto his hair. He managed to loosen her grasp and again began to trail wet kisses along her neck before he moved to her collarbone where he dipped his tongue in the hollow of her throat. He pulled back slightly to see her and he watched, mesmerized, as her breasts heaved up and down with her ragged breathing while he continued to knead her left breast.

Before Katara could wonder what he was doing, she saw him lean his head down toward her right breast before she felt his tongue run over her hardened nipple.

“Oh!” she exclaimed as a jolt of pleasure once again sprang to her aching heat.

She was unable to stop the whimper that escaped her lips when Zuko attached his mouth to her stiff peak and began to suckle her through the rough cloth that covered her chest. Again, she shoved her fingers into his dark hair and pushed his face closer to her aching nipple as she called out his name. Groaning, he continued to suck the peak until the cloth was entirely drenched. She could feel more wetness seeping out of her aching core. As Zuko continued to touch her all her moral precepts disappeared and there was only Zuko and the love and desire she had for him.

The ache between her legs was becoming more unrelenting than ever as Zuko continued to caress her, and Katara strained her hips in order to find some sort of relief from the sensations coursing through her. When she lifted her hips again, she briefly felt the same hardness between Zuko’s legs as she did that day against that tree, and when she recalled the incredible feeling of it pressed against her heat, she lifted her hips more firmly. She heard Zuko hiss against her breast and she moaned when he pressed back into her. Instinctively, she raised her legs to wrap them around his hips, but she was startled out of her haze when Zuko shifted away.

“Zuko?” she asked between pants, “What’s wro—”

Zuko silenced her words by pressing his lips against hers again and he groaned when she whimpered into his mouth. When he had felt her press against his erection he had almost lost all control and almost reached down to rip the cloth that hid her wet pussy from his aching cock. He had to remind himself that this was about her, not him. Just her.

The hand that had been massaging her breast wandered down her side, across her lean stomach, over her waist, until he rested it on her hip. Zuko’s fingers played with the hem of her under-wrappings for a moment before he trailed his fingers south. His fingers moved to her inner thigh and Katara gasped at the soft touch. She had never been touched there before, and though it embarrassed her a little, it was a sweet pleasure. Zuko just continued to expose her to new sensations she had never experienced before.

Zuko again bent down to suck on her other covered nipple as he drew his hand slowly up from her thigh to between her legs, placing his palm flat against her covered heat. He groaned at how hot and damp she felt. He heard her breath hitch as she encouragingly pressed her hips against his hand.

A sharp gasp was ripped from Katara’s lips and she jolted when she felt Zuko’s hand cup her womanly heat more firmly. She felt him pause briefly before he again pressed his palm firmly against her damp core, eliciting a deep groan from her throat as she once again wrapped her arms around his neck when he raised his head to cover her lips with his. Zuko rubbed two knuckles against her covered sex and he immediately swallowed her loud whimper. She shifted beneath him and he gasped in pleasure when her thigh again pressed against his erection. Unable to help himself, he pressed his hard shaft tightly against her.

A heat flared deep in the pit of Katara’s stomach as Zuko continued to caress her, but it only intensified when she felt Zuko’s hardness pressing against her. Mewling, she lifted her hips at the intense sensations he was evoking in her and shifted her thigh against him. She moaned when she heard him groan deeply in pleasure as he increased the pressure against her core. A hot flare filled her in that instant, different from, but just as delicious, as the heat that had filled her when Zuko had pressed his thigh against her.

Zuko groaned against her mouth as the cloth that separated his fingers and her core became completely wet with her arousal and he began to rub more insistently. He watched as long dark lashes fluttered and closed over deep blue eyes with a soft moan, her long hair spread around her. Just watching her making such erotic sounds and expressions because of his ministrations was so pleasurable to him that it shocked him. Dazed with lust and satisfaction, Zuko began to grind his aching cock against her thigh.

“Oh, Katara,” he groaned long and loud.

Growling, he pressed his hand more tightly against her drenched sex and began to rub more furiously at the same time he ground his covered length against her thigh.

Katara broke away from his lips as she let out whimpers and moans while she thrashed her head from side to side. She felt something coiling inside her to the point that she thought she would pass out. It was overwhelming her and Katara felt like she was drowning. Then she felt Zuko tap his thumb on the nub above her entrance and the coil snapped.

“Zuko! Ooooh!” she screamed as she felt her core clench and convulse as stars appeared before her eyes and waves of ecstasy coursed throughout her body.

Hearing the cry of her sweet release, the pleasure he had given her, triggered Zuko’s own release. Growling, Zuko ground his erection against her a few more times before he cried out her name as he felt his cock throb and his seed spurt hotly in his pants. Moaning incoherently, he slumped forward but managed to catch himself with one hand before he crushed her beneath him.

Agni, that was incredible. And he had only rubbed himself against her thigh!

Once coherent thought returned, the firebender roused himself from his pleasured haze. Panting roughly, Zuko slowly lifted his head to observe his waterbender. He watched with a pleased smile as Katara trembled and moaned as she slumped beneath him while her uneven breathing reached his ears. He pulled his hand away from her drenched center and watched her for a moment as she panted, her eyes closed tightly, while her body continued to give small shudders.

“Katara?” he called out softly as he touched her flushed cheek.

Katara opened her eyes with a stunned look before she gave him a languid smile. She reached up slowly and rested her hand on his cheek, smiling when he immediately leaned into her touch.

“That…that was…wow,” she breathed out with a soft sigh before she smiled at him. “Thank you.”

Zuko smiled as he grabbed her wrist and kissed her hand. He settled himself beside her and drew her closely to his side. Gods, he felt so satisfied. He could not wait for them to do that again.

“If that was pleasurable, then I can’t wait to find out how much more incredible it will feel when you make love to me,” Katara sighed as she snuggled closer to him.

“I thought the same thing, too,” Zuko responded with a light chuckle as he pressed a gentle kiss to her temple. “And I can’t wait to find out.”

“Did…you also…?” she asked tentatively as she glanced down at his crotch before she raised her head to look shyly up at him.

“Yes,” he replied with a smile as he ran his fingers through her hair. “You pleased me so well.”

“But I didn’t even do anything!” she stammered as her flushed cheeks reddened again.
“Believe me you didn’t have to,” he told her huskily. “Just your scent, presence, and touch were enough.”

“But—” The waterbender frowned as she tried to sit up.

Zuko shook his head as he pushed her back down gently beside him, wrapping an arm around her waist. He gave her a small smile before he kissed her mouth.

“I promise you that another night I’ll make it your duty to bring me to great pleasurable heights, okay?” he told her with a grin.

Katara blushed deeply at the heated glint in his eyes before she gave him a smile.

“Okay,” she agreed before a yawn escaped her.

“I’m so sleepy,” Katara whispered and yawned again as she snuggled against his warmth.

Zuko smiled again at her tranquil words and languorous movements. Her contentment made him happy. He allowed his blood and body to cool as he tugged her close to him after placing one of the blankets over them, while the heat from the campfire warmed them. He decided that once she fell asleep, he would clean up.

“Sleep, Katara,” he said gently as he caressed her damp hair. “I’ll always be here, every time you wake up.”

Large gray clouds gathered overhead, blocking the bright early sun and the blue sky. The wind swept by swiftly and rustled the tree branches wildly about. It seemed that it was going to rain and the lost benders quickened their pace so they could reach the village before they were caught in the storm.

Despite the chilly and gloomy morning, Zuko’s mood was blissful and content as he replayed in his mind waking up to a scantily clad Katara wrapped snuggly in his arms. The heat that went through him at the sight was indescribable. And the sounds and expressions she had made when he had pleased her! And the incredible pleasure he had gained just by rubbing against her without them even being fully naked! He could not stop thinking about how amazing it would feel when they finally experienced true intimacy. He was very pleased and it pleased him that he was able to please her in such a simple way. At least, he hoped so since she had not said anything about it as they woke up, dressed themselves, and packed up their things. Did he do it right?

He had to admit that he was a bit worried that perhaps she regretted what they did. It would devastate him if she told him that she did, for he really wanted them to do much more, to know each other more intimately, to please her until she went insane with need of him, and he wanted to be able to find his own pleasure in Katara’s embrace over and over again.

A strong, chilly breeze rushed past them and Zuko looked up at the cloudy sky before he glanced at Katara walking silently beside him from the corner of his eye. He was just going to have to tread carefully so he would not scare her away like a nervous ostrich-horse, though he very much wanted to throw caution to the wind and continue with what they did the previous night.

Meanwhile, Katara felt like she was in a cloud of bliss as she remembered the wonderful things Zuko had done to her the night before. When she had woken up to Zuko’s warm gaze and their half-dressed state, she had waited for the feeling of shame and guilt to surface, but instead she had felt so wonderful, and an overwhelming feeling of love for Zuko had settled in her heart at the thought that he had been so tender and understanding. Though she had been unable to say anything to him since they woke up, for she had been a bit self-conscious and embarrassed at the loud scream she had let out when such an overpowering sense of ecstasy overcame her. She felt her cheeks warm at the thought before a small crease appeared on her brow. She was worried since she had no idea on how to return the favor to Zuko and please him. How should she go about it? If only she had asked someone for advice… but then again, she had never had to face this problem before.

If only Suki were here, Katara thought with a frown. I’m sure she’d be understanding and would give me some tips…

On second thought, perhaps that was not a good idea, since Suki probably did such things for Sokka, and that was just a bit disturbing. Katara shuddered before a pensive frown settled on her features. Satomi had told her to ask Zuko to teach her what he knew. Maybe that was the best way to go since he would be more experienced in that field, right? However, the thought of how Zuko would know such things made an ache appear in her chest. She shook the feeling aside. She would just have to think about Satomi’s advice when another wonderful occasion such as the previous night presented itself again. Oh, how she wished it would be sometime soon!

They were both interrupted from their thoughts when raindrops began to fall from the sky and land with big splashes on their heads. Katara tilted her head up and sighed as the cool droplets speckled the skin of her face. She loved the rain as much as she loved the snow. However, it was too cold in the Southern Water Tribe for there to be rain showers so she enjoyed it as much as she could when she visited the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom.
With a small grin on his face, Zuko watched the delighted smile that adorned Katara’s lovely features as she spread her arms to welcome the rain. She was indeed a water nymph and soon she would be all his. Though he would like to continue watching the enchanting scene, he thought it would be best if they found shelter as lightning streaked across the sky. They were currently walking through a clearing and it could be dangerous being in the open during a thunderstorm. He pushed his soaking hair out of his eyes as he touched her back.

“Come on, Katara,” he called out as the wind began to blow more strongly and the rain began to fall faster. “We should find a place to wait out the rain.”

Katara sighed as she dropped her arms back to her sides before she nodded at him.

“Fine.”

Zuko smirked at her pouting face before he turned away from her and started walking again. Katara started to follow him before a mischievous grin pulled at her lips. She gathered a small ribbon of rainwater that fell before her, formed it into a water whip, and before Zuko knew what she was planning, she playfully smacked the water whip across the firebender’s firm backside. Zuko yelped before he spun around to give her an astounded looked, which turned into an indignant glare when she began to laugh at him.

A loud thunderclap resounded throughout the forest, causing Katara to jump and let out a squeak. Then it was Zuko’s turn to laugh at her and she huffed.

“Are you afraid of thunderstorms, Katara?” he teased.

“No!” Katara retorted as she crossed her arms beneath her breasts, her wet hair sticking to her cheeks. “It just caught me by surprise.”

Zuko smirked at her, but Katara decided to ignore him, and with an upturned nose, she walked past him and away. Chuckling quietly, Zuko followed behind her, but his humor died when a flash of lightning streaked across the sky and headed straight toward the oblivious waterbender.

“Katara!” he shouted.
Katara watched in shock as the unexpected lightning bolt headed toward her, but her view was blocked when Zuko stepped before her. At that second, all Katara could think of was the first time the same thing had happened and how Zuko had been hit by Azula’s attack. She was frozen in place by fear, not for herself but for Zuko. She watched in horror as the lightning headed straight for Zuko, but he easily maneuvered the thunderbolt and shot it up to the sky.

Zuko breathed deeply as he waited for the remaining energy coursing through his body to dissipate before he lowered his arm. It was always such a rush to redirect lightning. His mind had been in a great state of turmoil for him to be able to produce and bend lightning before, but maybe once he returned to the Fire Nation, he would ask Uncle for some training. After all, his life was much better now that he was Fire Lord, had finally found his mother, and was engaged—unofficially for the moment—to the woman he loved.

Turning around to see if Katara was all right, Zuko became concerned at her frozen state and at the fear that was clearly written on her face. He pulled her gently to him and stroked her back in soothing caresses when she began to tremble. Thinking that she must still be in shock that she had almost been hit, he kissed her wet temple and twirled his fingers in her drenched hair.

“It’s okay, Katara,” he whispered to her gently. “You’re safe now.”

He was bewildered, however, when Katara shook her head frantically before she wound her arms around his middle so tightly that her strength shocked him.

“What’s wrong?” he asked anxiously as the rain continued to fall on them and thunder rumbled around them.

“Are you crazy?!” Katara screamed at him as she leaned away to give him a watery glare, her hands resting on his covered chest where the scar was etched on his skin. “You could’ve been struck, just like that time with Azula! And what if this time I wouldn’t have been able to heal you? You could have died!”

A small frown creased Zuko’s brow at her hysterical words and he ran his hands up and down her arms to try to calm her.

“I have had more training now, I’m not as untrained as I was when I faced Azula,” he stated before he sighed, his voice becoming softer. “Besides, you’re the one that could’ve been struck. I’m always going to protect you, no matter what.”
Katara again shook her head as she gripped his tunic tighter in her fists.

“Every time you save me, you get hurt!” she exclaimed chokingly. “Like when you jumped in front of Azula’s attack, or when you tried to protect me from Jianguo’s men! I…I can’t bear it any longer!”

Zuko opened his mouth to reassure her, but Katara’s grip on him tightened as she stared intensely into his eyes, her cobalt orbs shining brightly with her tears that combined with the raindrops, and he was rendered speechless at the sight.

“Promise me that you won’t risk your life for me ever again!” she demanded. “Promise me, Zuko!”

“I will make no such promise!” Zuko told her firmly as his grip on her arms tightened.

Katara glared at him as she opened her mouth to argue, but she paused when Zuko grabbed hold of her shoulders before he leaned down toward her, his warm breath coasting along the skin of her face, his golden eyes gazing intensely into her eyes. She could feel the warmth of his body despite the chill of the rain and she shuddered.

“I won’t be able to keep such a promise,” he told her, his voice was still firm but with a softer tone to it. “You’re too important to me, Katara. The thought of you being hurt, of you ever…dying again…is unbearable. It causes me pain to even think about it. I will always place your safety before my own.”

“And you don’t think it hurts me to think of you dying too?” Katara began with a deep frown. “Besides, you’re far more important than me. Many people count on your leadership, an entire nation depends on you, and—”

“You will never say such a thing to me ever again, do you hear me!” Zuko growled out angrily, causing Katara’s eyes to widen in shock. “Do not belittle your importance to me and the love I hold for you!”

Katara again opened her mouth to argue, but Zuko shook his head.

“Would you sit back and watch as someone you love gets hurt?” he asked her quietly.
Katara closed her mouth tightly before she glared at him halfheartedly, they both knew the answer. She would also risk her life if it meant she could save those she cared for the most. She looked away from him, but Zuko placed both of his hands on either side of her face and gently turned her head so she could see him. He stroked his thumbs softly against her wet cheeks as they stared silently at each other.

“Don’t be angry with me,” he told her softly. “I love you too much to let any harm befall you. I have vowed to protect you and I will gladly give up my life for you.”

“No…please don’t say that,” Katara whispered as she grabbed onto his hands while her eyes again began to sting with unshed tears.

“I am just stating the truth,” the young Fire Lord continued, “But I promise you that I will fight for my life and will not let myself die so easily. I plan for us to live together for a very long time. We did promise to grow old together, after all.”

His lips curled into a smile and Katara could not help but return his smile with one of her own.

“Zuko,” the waterbender breathed his name since she knew it was the best promise he would be willing to make.

She reached up to press her lips gently to his. Zuko removed his hands from her face and wrapped them around her curvy figure as he deepened their kiss. He groaned at the feeling of her wet body in his hands. Their kiss became more passionate as they recalled the events from the previous night, but another crash of thunder made their bones tremble and they pulled apart.

“We need to find shelter until the storm passes,” Zuko finally spoke.

Katara smiled inwardly at his breathless rasp before he cleared his throat as he grabbed hold of her hand.

They walked quickly through the rain, their boots squishing softly on the muddy ground, the rainwater running down over their eyes. As the dark clouds rumbled over their heads, they tried to keep the rustling branches from whipping them across their faces. When they almost stumbled over the roots of a tree, Katara raised one arm above her head and a sort of invisible barrier surrounded them, so that the water cascaded over them on every side, keeping them dry. Zuko gave her a grateful smile since the heavy rain had made it almost impossible to see where they were going.

It was a few minutes later when they spotted a large protruding rock that sprouted from a high mound and they quickly made their way to it. Katara lowered her arms as they stepped below the rock and they sighed as they dropped their packs before they sat down side by side. The jutted rock made the rain that flowed down over it seemed like they were sitting behind a waterfall.

“I hope the rain stops soon so we can find the village,” Katara commented as she reached a hand out to touch the cascading water.

Zuko did not respond as his eyes trailed passionately down Katara’s body since her wet clothes were clinging tightly to her curves while a few strands of her chocolate hair curled against her cheeks. Katara turned to look at him when he did not say anything.

“What are you thinking?” she asked as she tilted her head to the side.

“You should get out of those wet clothes before you catch a cold,” he replied huskily as he looked away from her blue orbs to let his eyes wander to her chest.

Katara looked down at herself and noticed the hardened peaks that Zuko was staring unabashedly at as they strained against her wet clothes. A reddish hue blossomed across Katara’s cheeks at his suggestive implication and the gleam in his golden eyes. Her first instinct was to cover herself, but then she smirked inwardly as she turned to face him fully.

“You’re right,” she chirped innocently. “I should do something about my wet clothes.”

“Yes, you should,” Zuko growled in agreement as he watched her eagerly.

He stared at her intently as Katara slowly stood up, her drenched clothes barely covering the length of her thighs and legs and the contours of her breasts, waist, and hips. His heartbeat picked up its pace as he watched her move her hands over her body, but he frowned in disappointment when, with a flick of her hands, she removed the water from her clothes and her hair before throwing the liquid outside their little shelter.

With another innocent look, Katara turned to smile at him.
“There. Problem solved,” she quipped.

Zuko glowered at her as he again muttered under his breath about her being a tease that enjoyed torturing him. With a few giggles, Katara sat back down beside him. She let her own eyes roam over Zuko’s frame and she felt herself warm at the sight of his defined muscles visible due to the soaked tunic that was plastered over his chest and arms.

“You should take off your clothes before you catch a cold,” Katara teased as she returned his previous words. She planned on not helping to bend the water away from his clothing.

“It wouldn’t be good to catch a cold right now, would it?” Zuko told her as he threw her a small grin.

Katara nodded quickly as she leaned forward eagerly when he stood up, though he had to bend a little since his head bumped against the underside of the protruding rock. With the grin still on his face, Zuko raise his body temperature until the water began to evaporate from his clothes, steam rising almost lazily from his form. Katara frowned—she forgot he could do that—before she scowled when Zuko smirked at her as he sat back down.

Maybe I did deserve that, Katara mused with an inward pout.

A comfortable silence settled over them as the rain continued to fall, lightning flashed across the sky, and rumbling thunder resounded throughout the forest. Zuko glanced sideways at the waterbender and noticed that she was staring outside with a peaceful expression on her face. Reaching his hand out, he touched her now dry cheek and waited until she turned her head to look at him.

“I’ve been wanting to ask…” Zuko began hesitantly. “Are you upset about what we did last night?”

Blue eyes widened in surprise as Katara gaped at the absurdity of his words.

“Of course not!” she immediately reassured him as she grasped his hand and brought it closer to her face until he was cupping her cheek. “How could I be upset about it when I enjoyed what you did to me so much?”

Zuko let out a sigh of relief as he caressed her skin and he smiled when she blushed at her
“You have no idea how glad it makes me to hear you say that,” he told her with a grin before he leaned down to place a soft kiss to her lips. He pulled away to give her a small frown.

“Is something wrong? You’ve been so silent all morning and I was worried,” he told her quietly.

Katara blushed deeply as she averted her eyes.

“It’s just that…um…you pleased me and you made me feel things that I’ve never thought possible, but I…didn’t exactly do the same for you,” she said softly.

Zuko was delighted at her words. It made him happy to know that Katara wanted to please him so much.

“I told you not to worry about it,” he reminded her gently. “Yesterday was about you. I wanted you to see that I could make you happy in a physical way.” A large grin curled his lips. “But if you’re so insistent, then I’ll make sure you return the favor to me very soon,” he growled out huskily.

“AAlright,” Katara stuttered out an agreement as her blush turned a darker shade of red.

“But there’s something else on your mind, isn’t there?” Zuko continued as another frown settled on his brow.

Katara looked away from him in embarrassment as she tried to gather her thoughts and confessed her insecurities.

“I’m worried that I won’t be able to please you,” she confessed quietly after a moment.

Zuko frowned at her since he could not understand such an absurd thought. Just a soft touch from her caused heat to rush to his loins!

“Why do you think that?” he asked her incredulously.
Katara sighed exasperatedly as she moved away from his hand and crossed her arms over her chest. Was he really going to make her say it aloud?

“I have no experience, okay!” she exclaimed in frustration when he continued to look at her in confusion. “I have no clue on how to please a man or what he finds enjoyable!”

Zuko grinned at her embarrassed and annoyed expression before he scooted a bit closer to her.

“I know that and that’s what makes me so happy,” he confessed.

“What?” Katara asked with a confused frown.

“It makes me glad to know that you haven’t done such things with Aa—uh, with anyone else. It pleases me to know that I will be your first for everything relating to the act of physical intimacy,” he said with a smug smile.

Katara frowned at him for a moment before a smile broke across her face when she finally understood what he meant.

“I’m glad that it’s with you that I will learn such things,” she told him sincerely.

Zuko grinned and leaned down to kiss her again, but he frowned when she moved her head away before she peered uncertainly under her lashes at him.

“I’m afraid I won’t be as good as…the other women you’ve been with,” she confessed quietly. A lump formed in her throat.

Zuko felt like he had been punch in the gut and he gaped at her for a long moment before he uncomfortably cleared his throat. An anxious frown creased his forehead at her blank expression and he shifted uneasily in his spot.

“How is it that you know…about that?” he asked her carefully.
Katara glanced at him briefly before she looked away again as the sound of another thunderclap reached their ears. The thought of Zuko being with other women had always irritated her, although before she understood her feelings for him she had ignored the emotion. However, now the feeling was many times worse. The thought of him being intimate with another woman, of him doing the same things he had done to her with someone else, caused a painful ache in her chest.

“When we made our way to the Abandoned Fort on your flagship…” Katara began quietly, “I…I overheard…Mai and Ty Lee talking about it. Ty Lee even said the noblewomen called you a sex god.”

“A sex god?” Zuko repeated slowly before he began to laugh. Loudly.

Katara turned to frown at him.

“What’s so funny?” she demanded to know.

“Sex god,” Zuko repeated again as he continued to chuckle, but he noticed that Katara was serious so he calmed down and cleared his throat. “I would surely disappoint them if they really knew.”

“Knew what?” Katara asked.

“That I’m no sex god,” he stated.

Katara rolled her eyes at him. “Obviously you’re no god, but—”

“No, I’m no sex god,” he cut her off, stressing meaningfully on the word.

“What do you mean?” Katara asked as she frowned at him incomprehensively.

Zuko closed his mouth into a tight line at the inquisitiveness in her tone. He again shifted uncomfortably and rubbed the back of his neck before he cleared his throat as he looked at her.
“I don’t want our relationship to have any secrets so I will be truthful with you,” he began tentatively, “It’s true that I…have been with other women. Mai included.”

Katara winced. It was one thing to hear others talk about Zuko’s past actions, but it was something completely different hearing the truth from Zuko’s own lips. She felt sick and her stomach made a painful lurch. She thought that maybe she should tell Zuko to stop and not tell her anything. That he could keep that part of his life a secret, but she also wanted to know, despite the pain it might cause her. Was one of the women he had been with one she had come across in the Fire Nation Palace? And if she did marry Zuko and became Fire Lady would she have to socialize with the other women, them knowing that they had shared Zuko’s bed? She did not know if she would be able to handle their knowing looks.

She focused her attention on Zuko when he cleared his throat again.

“I’m really not as experienced as many want to believe. Since I turned fifteen, I think I’ve been with only five women,” he admitted awkwardly.

“Five? Seriously?” Katara asked skeptically.

“Yes,” Zuko told her with a firm nod.

“What do you mean by you ‘think’ only five?” she asked again. Though she hated the topic, she wanted to know.

Zuko gave a small shrug as he looked away to stare at the rain that was now slowing down to a light sprinkling. Why did they have to talk about this?

“Those women had no importance to me other than to satisfy a physical need, so I did not bother to remember how they looked or who they were,” he said truthfully.

Katara narrowed her eyes at him and pursed her lips.

“That’s so cruel,” she said coldly. “How could you treat them like that?”
At the icy tone of her voice, Zuko turned to look at her before a small frown appeared on his face at the icy glare she was also directing at him.

“They are paid to take care of a man’s needs and not for a relationship,” he stated impassively.

“What? Paid?” Katara said with wide eyes. “You mean the women you have been with were…”

Zuko nodded when she trailed off.

“They were women from brothels,” he said before he tried to explain carefully. “It was a sort of initiation rite to become a man among the crew of my ship. And the few times I had…employed their services was when my crew would demand time on land to have fun and find some distractions. So when the need rose, I followed after my men to the brothels. Of course, Uncle always made sure it was a place where discretion and cleanliness was most important.”

Katara sat back to contemplate what Zuko had told her. Though she still did not like the thought of Zuko being with other women, she was glad that he had sought their attention in order to satisfy a physical need and not for something more deep and serious. Again, a small ache appeared in her chest. That may have been the case with the women of those places. However, it did not count for his time with Mai. They had been in a serious relationship, after all. It must have meant something. The ache grew more painful, so that it made her eyes water and her nose sting.

Zuko reached for her hand and gently cradled it between both his palms. When Katara looked up at him, he tried to give her a reassuring smile.

“There is nothing for you to worry about, Katara. It was such a long time ago,” he told her before he grinned at her. “Think of it as a way for me to have gained some experience so I can be able to please you now.”

“As you pleased Mai?” Katara said in a small voice before she could stop herself.

“Katara,” Zuko began with a frown, but he paused when she removed her hand from his grasp.

“Please don’t,” she said quietly as she turned away from him. “I don’t want to know.”
Zuko was struck at the hurt he saw in her watery eyes and his heart constricted in his chest.

“Katara, let me explain…” he began anxiously.

“We should leave. The rain has stopped,” Katara interrupted with a quivering voice before she cleared her throat as she grabbed her bag, stood up, and quickly stepped out of the shadows of the jutted rock.

Zuko quickly shouldered his pack as he scrambled to his feet in order to go after her as she walked swiftly away from him. It had been foolish of him to make a joke about his past experiences and how they must have contributed to his present expertise, for now he had caused her to suffer. He hated it when he hurt her, even if it was unintentionally. Any encounter he had had with those few women and Mai he would gladly renounce if it meant that he would not see the hurt in Katara’s beautiful face.

Zuko quickened his strides so he could catch up to her, though it was not easy since the muddy ground was slippery.

He had to find a way to make Katara understand that what had happened with Mai and those other women had meant nothing to him. He had to make Katara understand that it was only she that mattered, that she was the only woman he had ever loved.

But how was he going to make her see that?
Ardent Reassurances

The dark clouds from that morning had dispersed and the noon sun was shining brightly by the time the two young benders finally arrived at the village Zhuang Yu and Satomi had directed them to. If the older couple had not told them which way to go, Zuko and Katara would have probably passed it without knowing it was there. There was nothing remarkable about it, but it was sufficient for what they needed. A few small houses and buildings surrounded a medium-sized town square where a few merchants were setting up their stalls in order to sell their wares now that the small storm had since passed. People had already left their homes and were beginning to mingle and go about their business.

“We should see about trading Zhuang Yu’s weapons,” Zuko spoke up coolly. He fixed the straw hat so his face could be completely covered in shadows before he turned his head to look at Katara, who was staring straight ahead at the small village.

Nodding her head, Katara began to walk forward without saying a word. Zuko gritted his teeth as he quickly caught up to her and walked protectively by her side, despite her evasive silence. He was getting annoyed and frustrated. A small part of him wondered why Katara was so upset about his past encounters with those women since it was not like Katara and he had been together then and he had cheated on her. They had shared something special the previous night, they'd had a heartfelt talk after that lightning incident a few hours ago, and now things had changed for the worst.

Zuko sighed. He should not be so harsh on her. He would probably also be upset if he found out Katara had shared such experiences with other men before him. Who was he kidding? He would probably be more than just upset, but either way, it would not change his feelings for her. He sighed again. It was just something that Katara was going to have to let go by herself and he would help her by reassuring her that the only woman that mattered to him was she.

They both tried to ignore the suspicious looks the village people were aiming at them for their torn and dirty clothing as they explored the small town. After inquiring around for a few minutes, they were finally directed to a place where they could probably trade the weapons for some money. Once they finally spotted the small store, they had to wait patiently as the short, balding man behind the counter inspected each weapon carefully and meticulously as if they were valuable jewels before he finally agreed to buy them. Zuko thanked him as he grabbed the small pouch with money, and left the small store with Katara, before making their way to the marketplace.

An oppressing silence had settled between them as they walked, so it was not hard for them to overhear the loud conversation being had by a small crowd surrounding one of the merchants. The mention of the Fire Lord made them pause.

“As I stocked on my supplies in the Fire Nation colony, I heard that the Fire Lord has been “kidnapped,” the bearded merchant continued as he pointed at his fish. “At least, that’s one of the rumors that’s been spreading around.”

Katara looked up at Zuko as he turned to look at the merchant with a small frown. The small crowd did not notice the two benders as they turned and murmured amongst themselves.

“Yes?” an elderly woman gasped. “How did it happen?”

The merchant shrugged.

“I heard that Fire Lord Zuko’s flagship arrived at the colony, but the Fire Lord was not onboard. Another rumor is that he fell overboard during a storm. It is also said that General Iroh, the Fire Lord’s uncle, had the village searched high and low for him.” Then the merchant leaned closer as he lowered his voice, “I also heard that the Avatar’s girlfriend, the Lady Katara, went missing too.”

The murmurs became louder as the small group speculated the implications. Katara frowned at the crowd before she turned to look at Zuko who had a dark look on his face at the mention that she was still Aang’s girlfriend. She wanted to grab his hand to reassure him, but she held back since she was still feeling a bit hurt.

“Maybe the Fire Lord took the waterbender away with him and they eloped,” a young man piped in with a chuckle as he wiggled his eyebrows at the young women who blushed and giggled.

“How romantic,” one of them exclaimed with a sigh.

Zuko looked down at Katara as he wiggled his own eyebrows suggestively at her. Katara could not stop the amused grin the spread over her face before she dropped it and turned away. Zuko sighed inaudibly as he returned his attention to the crowd.

“But is it true that the Fire Lord was kidnapped?” another man asked.

“That’s what the rumors say,” the merchant replied with another shrug. “Though nobody knows why he’s been kidnapped. Many say it’s for a huge ransom.”
“Good. Maybe he’s being tortured,” a man, around his thirties, with a patch over his right eye and a wooden cane clenched in his left hand spoke up above the murmurs. “He deserves it.”

Zuko tensed at the hatred in the man’s voice. His jaw clenched tightly, but he relaxed when Katara touched his arm comfortingly. Even if she was angry with him, he was grateful that she still offered him her comfort and sympathy. But he was surprised when Katara turned to glare at the man as she took a step before Zuko as if to shield him protectively.

“How can you say that?” Katara exclaimed before Zuko could stop her. “Nobody deserves to be kidnapped and tortured.”

The small group turned at the sound of the new voice and their eyes widened at the fierce blue eyes of the woman that was glaring at them while a tall man stood behind her, the shadows of his face intimidating.

The one-eyed man snorted after he eyed the indignant young woman.

“It’ll be payback for what the Fire Nation has done to us. Look at me. I lost an eye, and my leg will never be the same thanks to them,” he said bitterly. “I think it fair if the Fire Lord loses both his eyes and hopefully his legs and arms too just so he could know how it feels.”

“Tara,” Zuko warned her, but Katara ignored him as she took another angry step forward.

“I’m sorry for your loss, but it’s not like you are the only one who has lost something,” Katara began. “I know it won’t be easy, but my advice would be to let go of that resentment, for it will do you no good. Believe me, I know.”

The man snorted again as he raised an incredulous eyebrow at her. The merchant and the other people stared at the young woman in wonder.

“Yes, the Fire Nation has done many horrible things, but that was in the past, we are now living in the present, and such things were done by men who are now dead or imprisoned,” Katara continued fervently. “You shouldn’t be blaming Fire Lord Zuko for their deeds and you should be thankful that he called off the war and be grateful for everything he has done.”

The small crowd was surprised at the fierceness in her voice and they mulled over her words. Zuko watched silently as Katara continued to berate the man with a sense of pride and a small smirk on his face. It got him excited when Katara got so feisty like this and tried to defend him. However, he decided to intervene when the one-eyed man made a snide remark regarding Zuko’s parentage that angered Katara even more. Zuko pulled Katara to his side when it looked like she was about to scratch the man’s other eye out.

“My betrothed is right,” Zuko interjected smoothly as he held Katara tightly to his side when she tried to move forward again. “Fire Lord Zuko is not responsible for the sins of his ancestors. He made mistakes, but he has proven to be sincere in his goal to right the wrongs committed to the world.”

The small crowd was silent for a moment before they murmured in agreement. The new Fire Lord had not attacked them when they were at their weakest and the Earth King and King Bumi trusted him.

“Besides,” Zuko continued coolly, “if the rumors are true that Fire Lord Zuko has been kidnapped, then perhaps you should be worried about who would ascend the throne after him.”

“You’re right,” the young man from before spoke up before he looked around himself with a cheerful grin. “But hopefully it’s just a rumor and the Fire Lord and Lady Katara are okay!”

The crowd agreed with him while the one-eyed man huffed at them and angrily limped away. As the merchant began to weave another tale about sailing in the seas, Zuko gently led Katara away from the crowd. He was not surprised when she immediately began to rant angrily about the man’s prejudices.

“But most seem to be changing their views of me and the Fire Nation just like you said they would,” Zuko finally said when she paused in her tirade.

“That’s true,” she said after a while of thinking about his words.

He grinned at her when she gave him a bright smile, but he frowned when her expression turned to concern.

“If these people know what has happened to us, then it must mean that our families know that we’re missing too,” Katara told him sadly. “They must be so worried.”
Frown deepening in equal concern, Zuko tucked her close to his side before he placed a soft kiss to her head.

“Once we arrive at Omashu we will send a message to reassure them,” he promised softly.

Katara sighed as she leaned on him and nodded against his chest. A smirk replaced Zuko’s worried frown as he leaned down toward her ear, his arm wrapping possessively around her waist.

“Do you know that I like it when you get all defensive of me?” he asked huskily.

Katara huffed at him before she let out a sigh as she looked up at him.

“It’s just that I’m getting so tired of all their nonsense,” she confessed before she narrowed her eyes and turned around as if she could spot the one-eyed man. “I wish I could just pound it into their heads that you are a good man and don’t deserve their hatred and mistrust.”

“If I hadn’t intervened over there, you would’ve probably attacked that man,” Zuko teased lightly.

Katara again looked at him and frowned.

“You make it sound like I’m some crazy person who attacks people for the slightest thing,” she said before she smirked. “Maybe you have me confused with your younger self,” she teased.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at her before he let out a quiet chuckle. His humor passed and he quickly sobered up. He stopped them and gently turned Katara around until she stood facing him.

“You’re not angry with me anymore?” he asked her quietly.

A small frown appeared on Katara’s face before she looked away from him.

“I’m not angry with you, Zuko,” she told him sincerely, her voice quiet and soft. “I just need time to get adjusted with what happened between you and…Mai.”
With a frustrated frown, Zuko opened his mouth to say something, but instead, he shook his head at her as he ran his hands down her arms.

“We will have a talk about this later,” he told her firmly. When he saw Katara narrow her eyes at him, he tightened his grip on her arms slightly. “You need to hear me out, Katara. Please.”

Katara stared into his bright, golden eyes for a moment before she looked away.

“Fine,” she relented with a dejected sigh.

Zuko continued to hold onto her arms before he reluctantly let her go. He did not like this distance between them and he especially hated to see her so miserable. He would make things right if it was the last thing he did.

“We should see if we can buy an ostrich-horse with the money we got from the weapons,” Zuko finally spoke, his voice again impassive and collected.

“You could look into that while I purchase food for our journey,” Katara replied before Zuko could walk away.

Zuko pressed his lips together as he frowned at her.

“I don’t want to leave you by yourself in a strange place,” he told her firmly.

Katara resisted the urge to roll her eyes at him since she knew he was just worried for her safety.

“I’m not some fragile woman that needs to be protected at all times. I know you’re still worried that I might be easily attacked, like what happened with Jianguo’s men, but I swear I’m not going to let the same thing happen again,” Katara responded just as firmly. “I’m a waterbending master and I won’t be treated as if I’m weak and defenseless.”

Zuko narrowed his eyes at her as he clenched his hands at the reminder of Jianguo.
“I know you’re a master waterbender and I know you can defend yourself, but we are running from a group of mercenaries in the middle of an unknown territory,” he tried to explain reasonably before he let out a sigh as fear flashed in his eyes. “Anything could happen when we least expect it. I will never forgive myself if something happened to you when I could’ve prevented it.”

Katara’s expression softened at his concerned tone and she immediately placed a hand on his cheek to soothe him.

“It’s the same way I feel about you, Zuko,” Katara told him softly. “I am more worried for your safety than my own since it’s you that they want to hurt the most.”

“And they will if it’s you they hurt,” Zuko confessed, his tone dark.

Katara sighed as she ran her hand down his cheek before she pulled away.

“I promise that I’ll be very careful when I buy the food and I’ll be alert at all times,” she promised as she patted the water pouch at her hip. “And to reassure you further, I’ll stay where there are many people at the marketplace and I’ll wait for you there.”

Zuko hesitated for a moment, a crease appearing between his eyebrows. He didn’t want to let her out of his sight, but he knew that Katara would just get offended if he insisted, so he relented with a morose sigh and gave her some money from the small pouch the short man from the store had given them.

“I’ll be quick and I’ll meet you at the food stalls in an hour if not less,” he told her.

“I’ll be waiting,” Katara reassured him with a nod.

They hesitated for a moment as they stared at each other before they turned around and parted ways. Both had walked a couple of steps before they turned around to see how far the other had gone. They smiled when they realized that they had turned at the same time before they turned away again to do their separate tasks.

Katara smiled at the kindly old lady, who returned the smile as she took the few coins the young woman gave her in exchange for bread. Placing the wrapped pieces of bread inside her bag, along with some cheese and vegetables as well as a pan and a pot she had purchased before, Katara thanked the woman before she weaved her way among the village people who were going about their day. Even though she had had a bad encounter with the bitter man who had insulted Zuko, Katara realized that the other people she met were friendly and helpful.

Making her way through the other stalls erected in the marketplace, Katara smiled since it brought memories of the days when she would do the same thing for the gang during the war, especially since Zuko and she were hiding and being chased down again. Her smile widened when she spotted one stand that sold various kinds of teas, and she eagerly bought two small clay cups, and a small bag of ginseng tea. The brew may not be as good as Uncle Iroh’s but having some tea along with their meals would be nice. Maybe it would help Zuko miss his uncle and mother a little less.

Zuko…

A sad sigh escaped her lips. Maybe it had been a bit too harsh of her to ignore him since they’d had that talk. She had promised him that she would never try to evade him again and she knew she was hurting him by keeping away from him. But she just could not help feeling so angered and hurt at the thought of Zuko being with those women…and Mai.

Looking through some fruit at the stall beside the one with the teas, Katara let out an inaudible sigh as she stared—without seeing—at the apple in her hand. She wondered what it was that Zuko wanted to talk to her about.

Frowning, Katara picked up another apple. Zuko had asked her if she was angry with him and she had told the truth when she said she was not. She was angry with herself for acting so hurt and for not trying to be understanding. She had no right to be angry with him for having been with those women since they had not been together and he had not been unfaithful to her. She should let it go. It was all in the past, after all. Yes, she would apologize to him for her behavior and she would tell him that he did not need to explain himself. She really did not want to know anything about his…time with Mai.

After all, it’s me Zuko has chosen for his wife, Katara thought with a smile. At that thought, it seemed she could breathe easier.

Letting out another sigh, this time more out of relief than dejection, Katara focused her attention on the fruit and began to pick several different kinds. Paying the man for the fruit, Katara shouldered the now heavier pack and turned around only to bump into someone. She staggered backwards for a moment before she caught her balance.
“I’m sorry. I didn’t see you there,” a soft masculine voice reached her ears and she was disappointed to realize it was not Zuko she had bumped into.

“It’s fine,” Katara replied absentmindedly as she shifted her bag behind her back before she looked up to see a smiling young man with tanned skin and bright green eyes.

“But still, I should’ve been looking…” the green-eyed young man began before he trailed off when he saw the woman’s lovely face and unique blue eyes. At least unique around these parts of the Earth Kingdom.

Katara frowned at the man when he continued gawking at her before she let out an irritated sigh when he did not move away.

“I’m in a hurry and must be on my way,” she told him tersely.

She stepped around him and quickly walked away, but to her consternation, the young man followed her. She whirled around, ready to use her waterbending if he so much as tried to attack her, but she faltered when he gave her a charming smile. Although he did not seem like he would belong to Jianguo’s group, she eyed him suspiciously.

“Do you need any help carrying your bag?” he asked smoothly, giving her another smile that Katara was sure he thought would make her swoon.

Ha! Not a chance, Katara thought with a mental smirk. Only one man’s smiles were able to affect her, being that they were so rare and were usually directed only at her.

“I don’t need help. I’m fine,” she replied curtly as she swiftly turned away.

When he continued to follow her, Katara planned on running to the edge of the village to get away from him, but she remembered that she had promised Zuko she would not wander away and would wait for him at the marketplace. Besides, if she was around a large group of people the man would not dare attack her and she would not have to reveal anything by using her waterbending to defend herself. She pretended to look around at the other stalls even though she had already finished buying what they needed and she only had one more coin left after purchasing the fruit. She hoped the annoying man would get the hint that she wanted him gone and away from her.
“You have such pretty eyes,” he flattered her as he followed alongside her. “It’s so unusual to see blue eyes around these parts.”

“I’ve noticed that,” Katara responded flatly, ignoring his attempts at flattery.

The charming smile fell from the green-eyed man’s handsome face and a small frown appeared on his tanned brow at the curt way this woman was acting toward him. Usually, he had but just to smile and women fell to his feet and practically begged to have a place in his bed.

“You must be new in the village,” he stated as he crossed his arms over his chest, his frown deepening.

“I’m just passing by,” Katara replied as she absently looked through a stand that sold cloth. Too bad they didn’t have enough money to buy new and, not to mention, clean clothes.

“Well, that’s just too bad,” the young man exclaimed arrogantly as he uncrossed his arms and not so subtly thrust out his chest. “I could’ve shown you many things.”

Katara rolled her eyes at his display. Compared to Zuko’s muscular yet lean body, this guy seemed like he had never spent a day in his life doing vigorous exercise.

“That is too bad indeed,” Katara quipped sarcastically as she picked up another piece of colorful cloth.

She tensed and her temper flared when she felt him place his hand on her lower back before he leaned toward her. Only Zuko was allowed to touch her so familiarly.

“Maybe I could show you one thing before you leave,” the young man whispered huskily.

Katara was about to spin around, slap him across his haughty face, and put him in his place, but she was startled when he was nearly thrown back away from her.

“Put your hands on my woman again and I’ll cut them off!” she heard Zuko’s deep voice growl out.
Uh oh. He’s angry, was the only thought that went through her mind as she turned around to see Zuko glaring murderously at the wide-eyed young man. However, she was not that surprised since Zuko had already shown just how protective and possessive he was over her. Maybe she should be annoyed at his reaction, but the truth was, it made her giddy with happiness to know Zuko cared for her that much.

She was brought of her thoughts when she noticed the man foolishly take a step forward to argue, but a fiery glare from the tall, ominous-looking golden-eyed male made him rethink his actions and he quickly retreated. A small crowd had gathered at the commotion, but Zuko ignored them as he grabbed Katara’s hand and led her away. Only when they were a distance away from the crowded marketplace did Zuko turned around to face her. Katara could still see the anger in his eyes before he took a deep breath to calm himself down, a frown appearing on his shadowed face.

“Are you okay?” he asked as he gave the hand he had not let go of a squeeze.

“I’m fine,” Katara reassured him. “He was just being an annoyance, nothing else.”

“That is another reason why I did not want to leave you alone,” Zuko ground out. “Every time I do, some bastard is trying to take you away from me.”

Katara could not help but giggle at his disgruntled look and she wrapped her arms around his middle, snuggling close to his chest. Zuko was a bit surprised since he thought she was still angry with him, but he immediately wound his arms around her to bring her closer to him.

“They could try, but no one is going to make me leave you,” Katara told him with a giggle.

She felt Zuko pull back and she raised her head curiously only to see the intense emotions burning in his golden eyes.

“You promise that?” he asked softly yet intensely.

“I promise,” she replied sincerely.

They stared heatedly at each other for a while before they realized they were standing in the middle of the street and the people that passed them by were looking at them strangely. After giving Katara a peck on her forehead, Zuko pulled completely away and cleared his throat before removing the bag from her and placing it over his shoulder.

“Did you finish?” he inquired as he gave her a small smile.

“Yeah,” Katara replied with a bright smile as she looked around them. “Did you buy the ostrich-horse? Where is it?”

She was puzzled when Zuko narrowed his eyes and his jaw clenched.

“We will have to walk to Omashu,” he replied darkly. When he saw that she was about to ask why, he quickly interrupted, “It’s getting late. Since I didn’t buy the ostrich-horse, we have enough money to stay at the inn for tonight before we head out early tomorrow morning.”

Katara smiled and nodded at him, even though she was curious to know why Zuko had evaded the subject of the ostrich-horse.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was not that hard to locate the inn since it was the largest building in the village, although it was still small compared to any other inn they had come across. Zuko paid for one room for them both, which caused the matronly wife of the innkeeper to give them a disapproving look until Zuko reassured them Katara was his wife. It wasn’t much of a lie since she would be soon if he had anything to say about it.

As soon as they were shown to their room on the upper level of the inn, they both took turns taking a bath in the adjoining bathroom—Katara had a hard time convincing Zuko that there was no need for them to bathe together. She was still adjusting to this new intimate part of their relationship, not to mention she was also trying to come to terms with Zuko’s past…dalliances.

Katara let out a contented sigh as she tied the sash around her waist after taking a warm bath. The soap the inn provided was an extra bonus. Tying her hair back into a high ponytail, Katara exited the tiny bathroom and entered the small but comfortable room. The only furnishings were a low table near the window, two chairs, a wooden chest, and a small bed against one wall where Zuko was currently sitting, his face now smooth-shaven. When he turned those piercing amber eyes on her, Katara was unable to stop the blush that surfaced on her cheeks and she shifted nervously on her feet. She knew it was silly to feel embarrassed since Zuko and she had been sleeping close together for the past few weeks, but this just felt different because…it was a bed. And at the moment, she did not know if she would like to continue where they left off after Zuko told her whatever it was he wanted to tell her.
As if sensing her unease, Zuko rose from the bed and gave her a small smile before indicating the door that led out to the hall.

“I found out they have a small dining area below,” Zuko told her casually. “We still have a few more coins left. How about we have a nice hot meal?”

“Yeah, that sounds great!” Katara exclaimed as she threw him a small grateful smile.

They silently made their way down the stairs before the jolly innkeeper led them to a table. There were a few people already sitting at other tables enjoying their food and drinks while four young waitresses rushed back and forth with plates of hot food or mugs with liquor in their hands.

“Your server will be right with you,” the innkeeper announced as he pushed his thick glasses over his long nose before he walked away to greet a new arrival.

Zuko returned his attention to Katara who smiled before she turned her gaze to the other patrons of the inn. Zuko frowned. She was not ignoring him as she had been in the morning, but she was also not acting as she usually did around him, and again he found his frustration surface. If he did not like being ignored in Ba Sing Se, he certainly hated being ignored now.

“This reminds me of that time I took you to that restaurant in the Fire Nation capital,” Zuko spoke up, trying to lighten up the mood and make her remember the good times they did have together.

“It does, doesn’t it?” Katara replied with a laugh as she turned around to grin at him. “Although this time, the innkeeper didn’t grovel at your feet like the restaurant owner.”

“Don’t remind me,” Zuko grumbled as he pulled the straw hat down his head to hide his face better before he looked at her. “Though I did want to wring his neck for the way he treated you at first. Maybe I should have shut his business down.”

Katara laughed behind her hand.

“Then that would’ve given him more reason to dislike me,” she stated before she shrugged. “Besides, he changed his attitude later on.”
“Hm. I suppose he did,” he agreed.

Zuko ran a hand down his face before he reached for her small hand that was resting on the table.

“Katara, about this morning…I—”

“Hello there!” a sugary feminine voice interrupted. “What can I get for ya? Our special for today is beef noodles.”

Zuko frowned at the interruption as Katara and he pulled apart to stare at the waitress, who was smiling sweetly at Zuko. Noticing this, Katara glared at the dark-haired woman who seemed to be pointedly ignoring her.

“I’ll get the beef noodles,” Zuko replied impassively as he returned his gaze to Katara and deliberately asked, “What would you like, Tara?”

“Um, what else do you have?” Katara asked the waitress wearing a tight dress with a neckline so low that her ample bosom seemed to be in danger of toppling right out of it. Katara scrunched her nose in distaste.

The female server gave an irritated sigh before she listed more dishes and impatiently waited for the pretty woman sitting with the mysterious and intriguing young man to choose. Once the blue-eyed woman finally decided what to eat, the waitress again fixed her attention on the silent male.

“And what would you like to drink, handsome?” she asked, her voice turning deeper. “We have sake, wine, and—”

“Tea will be fine,” Zuko interjected stoically without once removing his eyes from Katara.

The waitress frowned before a slow smile spread on her face.

“I’ll be back with your order,” she purred as she flounced away, her hips swaying dramatically as she went, though Zuko did not even bother to look her way.

Katara tried to control her temper as she glared after the flirtatious woman before she turned away and crossed her arms under her breasts.

“I can’t believe she had the nerve to flirt with you right in front of me,” she grumbled irritably.

“Just ignore her. I am,” Zuko responded with a shrug.

Feeling better at his words, Katara straightened in her chair as she tried to come up with something to say that would stall Zuko from mentioning what they had talked about that morning. A morning that had started out so wonderfully but was now ruined. And perhaps that was mostly her fault. Therefore, she launched an account of all the things she had bought in the marketplace including the clay cups and the ginseng tea.

She was interrupted when her food was practically dropped in front of her and Katara glared indignantly at the indecently dressed waitress, who had immediately turned her attention to Zuko, whose face was partially covered by the straw hat he wore.

“Here you go, handsome,” the woman said throatily as she lowered the bowl in front of him, and in the process exposed the top of her breasts above the hem of her shirt.

Keeping his gaze unwaveringly at Katara, Zuko nodded his thanks and asked her for their tea before she could say anything else. Huffing, the waitress spun around to retrieve their drinks.

Katara and Zuko ate their food in silence until the woman returned with their tea, but to Katara’s growing irritation, the woman did not leave and had the audacity to start a conversation with Zuko, while she tried to show off what the low shirt exposed. Clenching her chopstick so tightly that they creaked, Katara fought the urge to jump from her seat and rip the woman’s hair out of her scalp while screaming at her to back away from Zuko.

The woman’s flirtatious display made Katara think that she needed to get a little more serious about marking her claim on her man. She knew that women like her who made the commitment to remain chaste before marriage were uncommon in this part of the world. It had been easy to keep such a promise before because there had never been anyone who had moved her as much as Zuko did emotionally, or who aroused her as much as he did sexually. Now she truly understood why people made such a big deal about it. Yet, she was so afraid that she would not be enough for him. What would she do when what she had to offer did not satisfy him at all? What if it made him search for someone who could? It was a terrifying thought to consider because she truly could not imagine not having Zuko in her life. It would break her heart if she lost him for any reason, but it was inconceivable to think it could be because she could not express her feelings for him through shared intimacies beyond kisses and hugs. And she was not making things better by avoiding him.

Zuko could feel his temper rising as the irritating woman ignored his silence and continued to prattle on and on while she tried to cruelly entice him with her lewd attire. He glanced again at Katara and frowned at the dejected and annoyed expression on her face as she pushed her food around. It was not until Zuko snapped at the waitress to leave them alone that the she gave up and decided to look for prey somewhere else.

“If she had stayed one more minute I would’ve frozen her to the ceiling,” Katara hissed out lowly as she stabbed at her food.

“Are you jealous?” Zuko asked amusedly as he took a sip from the tea and grimaced again at the bitter flavor. Perhaps his uncle’s tea had spoiled him.

“I don’t like them near you,” Katara confessed sheepishly.

Zuko smiled contentedly before he grinned at her.

“Now you know how I feel when men approach you,” he told her.

Katara huffed at him as she poked at her food. She glanced at the waitress who was now flirting at a table with three men before she looked back at her meal with a small frown.

“She kind of reminds me of that girl from Ba Sing Se. Jin,” she said quietly.

Zuko shrugged as he picked up his cup to take another sip of the horrible tasting tea, but he lowered it when he saw Katara fidgeting in her seat while she threw anxious glances at him.

“What is it?” he asked curiously.
“Was Jin one of those women…you’ve been with?” she asked in a quiet tone.

Zuko gaped at her incredulously before his brow furrowed in a deep frown.

“You make it sound as if I bed every woman I meet,” he said curtly.

When Katara did not reply, he let out a sigh before he reached for her hand and held it firmly in his. He waited until she looked up to continue.

“I only went on an innocent date with her and that is it,” he stated firmly. “And before you ask, I did not sleep with Song either.” He let out another sigh as he stroked her hand with his thumb. “Besides those few women from the brothels and Mai, there has been no one else.”

Katara removed her hand as she tried to give him a smile.

“Okay,” she said.

Zuko pressed his lips tightly together and frowned since he knew that Katara was still not alright with what he said. Pushing his chair back as he rose, Zuko dropped some coins on the table before he grabbed her hand and pulled her up onto her feet.

“What are you doing?” Katara asked as she dropped her chopstick on her plate when Zuko began to tug her after him.

“Now is the time for you to listen to me,” he said, his voice not hinting at one emotion just like his face.

Katara allowed him to lead her up the stairs until they entered their room where Zuko shut and locked the door firmly behind them. Katara walked to the small window and stared outside for a moment before she sighed and turned toward Zuko who was watching her silently after he threw the straw hat onto the low table.

“I’m sorry, Zuko,” Katara began as she clasped her hands tightly together in front of her before she averted her eyes from him. “I’m sorry for acting the way I did and I’m sorry for ignoring you.”
“You know it hurt me when you did that in Ba Sing Se,” Zuko told her quietly.

“I know, and that’s why I’m apologizing.” Katara looked up briefly before she looked away again. “I know I shouldn’t have acted so hurt with what happened between you and Mai, but I just needed a little time to adjust to it. But I understand that it was all in the past. You don’t have to explain yourself to me.”

Zuko shook his head before he crossed the room to stand in front of her. She tried to turn away, but Zuko grabbed her shoulders to turn her toward him.

“No, Katara, you have to listen to what I have to say,” he insisted.

When she finally lifted her blue orbs to stare at him, Zuko moved one hand away from her shoulder to touch her cheek in a light caress.

“Katara,” he began and sighed, “While I do care for Mai, just like you care for Aang, whatever happened between her and I meant nothing. She was my girlfriend, so it only seemed logical that we would engage in…such activities.” He tightened his grip on her when she tensed slightly. “But I speak the truth when I say that I never truly enjoyed it, and during those four years I could probably count the times we…have been together with my fingers.”

Katara gave him a skeptical look, and though she really hated the topic, she could not stop herself from wondering on Zuko’s admission.

“Why is that?” she asked curiously.

Zuko cleared his throat uncomfortably.

“Well…uh…Mai wasn’t exactly the best, uh…bed partner,” he confessed awkwardly. “And well… neither was I.”

“Oh,” the waterbender uttered.
Katara’s stomach churned uneasily as she tried to say what was on her mind that continued to bother her.

“But…it still must have meant something to you,” she told him quietly, though she was unable to keep the quiver from her voice.

Zuko again shook his head at her.

“No. It didn’t,” he repeated firmly.

When he saw that Katara was still unconvinced, he decided to continue.

“Sex for most men is something that is instinctual. Its importance is based solely on the physical, and most often, emotions do not form part of it,” he tried to explain. “Most men only care for the physical pleasure or release it brings, they don’t need to have any special feelings for their partners, which from what I have heard, is the complete opposite for most women.”

A pensive expression appeared on Katara’s face as she mused over his words, but Zuko could see that she was still unsure.

“I have been celibate for a year now,” he confessed and shrugged at her incredulous look. “Sex was just not that appealing to me. I suppose that was due to the fact that the few experiences I’ve had were not that great. Besides, I had so much work as Fire Lord that it didn’t even bother me.”

He again caressed her cheek, his touch light as a feather as he stared sincerely into her eyes.

“If I could turn back time and erase whatever happened between those women and Mai, I would, even if it costs me everything I have, because it has caused you pain.”

Katara gazed into his sincere eyes and the ache in her heart eased at his heartfelt words. She raised her own hand to gently caress the edges of his scarred cheek.

“I can see that now and I thank you,” she told him.
A sigh fell from Katara’s lips when Zuko wrapped one arm around her waist and pulled her tightly to his chest while he tipped her chin up with the other. Again, her body warmed at the proximity and feeling of his hard frame. It seemed it was the same for Zuko for he groaned at the contact of her breasts pressed so closely to his chest.

“Gods, Katara,” he growled out huskily as his eyes fell to her lips before he looked into her wide eyes again. “Ever since you came back to the Fire Nation, staying celibate has become so damn difficult. When you appeared again, my libido emerged with a vengeance. All I could think about was making love to you.”

“W-what?” Katara sputtered.

“Remember when we sparred on my flagship as we made our way to the Abandoned Fort?” he asked as he leaned down toward her ear.

“Y-yes,” Katara replied as a tremor went through her at the feeling of his breath coasting her ear.

“Remember when I pinned you down? Did you feel anything?” he continued as he groaned in her ear at the memory. At her gasp, he knew she understood. “I wanted you then just like I wanted you at the lake where I accidentally came upon you bathing.” He brushed his lips against the skin on her ear and he sighed at her moan.

“Even though I tried to fight my attraction to you, I could not stop thinking about what it would feel like to have you naked in my arms,” he confessed, his voice deep and husky. “All I wanted to do was to carry you to my room and love you to my heart’s content.”

“Really?” Katara asked softly as she stared unwaveringly into his piercing, golden eyes.

Zuko nodded as he pressed her even closer to him.

“I have desired you almost as long as I have loved you, Katara,” he told her, this time his voice turning soft. “You say that you’re worried about Mai, but I’m telling you that there’s nothing for you to worry about. What I had with her is nothing compared to what I feel for you, Katara. You’re the woman that I desire, the one that I love.”
“Oh, Zuko,” Katara whispered breathlessly. She felt like her heart was about to burst.

She was unable to say anything else for Zuko captured her lips in a tender yet passionate kiss that almost brought tears to her eyes, and she moaned when he pressed a hand on her lower back to bring her closer to him. She let out a sigh when Zuko moved away from her mouth and she opened her eyes to see him staring warmly down at her.

“I find so much pleasure by simply kissing you,” he told her, placing a soft kiss to her lips, “touching you,” he sighed, running his hands down her back before wrapping both his arms around her, “holding you in my arms, that I know when we finally make love it will be amazing.”

He pulled away to brush kisses across her cheeks, to her ear, and back to her lips.

“I burn with the desire to sleep next to you each night, to wake up to your warm embrace each morning, with the desire to hold you, protect you, and love you like no other ever will,” he whispered fervently against her lips.

“Zuko,” Katara’s voice quivered with emotion, but she was unable to say anything since Zuko had again captured her lips.

Katara’s mind was in a blissful daze as Zuko continued to bestow searing kisses to her lips. Her heart felt lighter now that she knew that whatever had happened between Zuko and Mai did not compare to the feelings Katara knew Zuko had for her. Wrapping her arms tightly around his neck, Katara poured all of her emotions of relief, gratitude, and love into their kiss that had them both panting in no time.

Zuko pulled away from her mouth so they could catch their breaths for a moment, but he continued to place hot little kisses along her cheek, her neck, and the skin below her ear, causing Katara to let out a little breathless moan.

“Let me show you how much I want you, Katara,” he groaned in her ear. “Let me please you tonight.”

Katara tensed at his words. “But—”

“Don’t worry,” Zuko soothed, running his hands caressingly down her back. “I just want to please you like I did last night.”

A soft moan escaped her lips. Her body trembled as Katara remembered the sensation she had felt when Zuko had touched her so sweetly and erotically the previous night, and she could not deny him for she very much wanted to get close to Zuko again. Unable to form any words, Katara tightened her hold on him and nodded at him shyly.

At her consent, Zuko let out a groan before he smashed his lips to her soft ones, plunging his wet tongue into her hot mouth when she immediately opened it to let him in. Zuko traced his hand at the hem of her tunic before he drifted his fingers beneath the hem to stroke the skin of her back, causing a shiver to go through her body. Splaying his warm fingers possessively on her lower back, Zuko drew her even closer to him so that he knew Katara would not be able to ignore his reaction to her presence. By the groan she made, he knew she had felt it. Slowing down the kiss, Zuko reached for the sash around her waist, and with a firm pull, it came undone in his hands before he dropped it to the floor.

“Katara,” Zuko whispered against her mouth.

He pulled away from her lips to stare at the dark green tunic she wore which was now opened slightly down the middle. He looked up briefly at her wide blue eyes before he returned his gaze to her loosened tunic, reaching a hand out to part the edges further. His eyes smoldered as the white wrappings that covered Katara's heaving breasts appeared before him as well as the soft, tanned skin of her chest and her smooth stomach.

Katara trembled as she saw Zuko staring intently at her as he parted her tunic. She watched as he reached both his hands to her shoulders before brushing the tunic down her arms until it fell down from her and onto the floor. Reaching for the tie that had Katara’s hair pulled up, Zuko tugged it loose until her hair fell down her back and over her shoulders. Katara gasped when he touched her stomach, trailed his fingers up in a slow caress, before he cupped her right breast in his hand, eliciting a soft moan from her lips that he immediately swallowed into his mouth. So caught up in the sensations Zuko was instigating, Katara did not notice that he was backing her toward the small bed until the back of her knees hit the edge. She would have toppled over in surprise if Zuko had not caught her and gently laid her back across the bed.

“Zuko…” she uttered nervously as she tried to sit up.

“Sssh, it’s okay, Katara,” he reassured her softly as he pressed a small kiss to her blushing cheeks. “I won’t make love to you tonight, not until you’re proclaimed my wife before the whole world and the gods,” he promised. “I just want to show you how much you mean to me.”
“I already know,” she told him with a smile as she traced a finger down his cheek and along his jaw. “And by surrendering myself to you I’m showing you how strong my feelings for you are. I love you so much, Zuko.”

Zuko smiled at her, and grabbing her hand, he brought it up to his lips before he leaned down to capture her lips in a tender kiss that made Katara’s spine tingle. Her hands fisted on the fabric of his dark red tunic as he tightened his arms around her before Zuko pulled away and stood up beside the bed, his gaze heating at the sight of her flushed cheeks, closed eyes, and swollen lips.

Wondering why he had stopped, Katara opened her eyes and blushed at the intense manner he was staring at her with. Not knowing what to do, the waterbender gazed back at him. Not knowing what to do, the waterbender gazed back at him. She watched as he took off his black, pointy boots before her eyes widened when she saw Zuko reached for his tunic, discarded it swiftly from his body, and threw it somewhere behind him. Katara sat up on the lumpy bed as her eyes took in the incredible sight of his alabaster upper body. She had seen Zuko’s muscular torso many times, admiring the way his muscles flexed as he used his firebending or his broadswords, but she never got tired of gazing at it. The sight of his skin glistening with perspiration always made heat pool in the pit of her stomach just like at the moment.

“La, your body is so perfect,” Katara whispered softly.

Zuko felt his heart swell at her words and he smiled at her.

Biting her lip, Katara reached out a tentative hand to touch the smooth scar on his skin before she trailed them down to splay her fingers over his hard abs. His stomach quivered and Zuko groaned at her light touch. Unable to resist her, he pressed his lips to hers and pushed her gently down beneath him, making sure to keep his body away from crushing her.

“Zuko,” Katara moaned.

Zuko trailed one hand down her side, down her waist and hip, until he teased the hem of her dark pants. Sitting back on his knees, Zuko quickly pulled off Katara’s boots, throwing them to the side of the bed. He kept eye contact with Katara as he reached for her pants and slowly began to pull them off her legs. Katara blushed deeply as she raised her hips to assist him before looking briefly away once he had completely pulled them off her. Zuko was once again struck by the delicious sight of Katara clad only in her under wrappings that he had to take a moment to control the immense desire that flared within him.

Katara squirmed self-consciously when Zuko continued to stare down at her and her hands twitched as she resisted the urge to cover herself. As if sensing her unease, Zuko again leaned down to touch her lips with his own.

“I have a confession to make,” Zuko rasped out quietly as he pressed his lips to her cheek to control his breathing.

“What sort of confession?” Katara whispered as she looked up at him in concern, her breath coming out equally as harsh.

“I…I’ve never taken the time to…pleasure a woman before,” he confessed a bit awkwardly. “I’ve never had a desire to do so until you. And, well…you’re the only virgin I’ve ever been with.”

“Really?” Katara asked before a large grin curled her lips. “So I’m your first?”

Zuko chuckled quietly as he kissed her smiling lips.

“Yes, and you’ll be my first and only in many things just like I’ll be yours,” he told her warmly.

Smiling, Katara’s hands curled around to cup his neck and urge his lips down to hers. Both exhaled out a groan as their mouths blended together, a combination of warm swollen lips and hot grazing tongues. Katara let out a moan as Zuko traced her lower lip with the tip of his tongue before driving it between her plump lips. He again reached for her tempting breasts and he gently caressed one while he tried to find a way to take off the wrappings before he ripped them away. He was sure Katara would not appreciate that.

“Show me how to take these off,” he whispered throatily as he trailed his fingers along the edges of the wrappings around her breasts.

Katara stared at him with wide, blue eyes and she swallowed nervously. Never before had she let anyone see her chest uncovered, but with Zuko, it was different. Katara pushed him back a little and he eased back from her when he realized she wanted to sit up. Reaching for the hand that was still cupping her breast, Katara guided it with shaking fingers to the hem of the wrappings on her right side until his fingers touched a small piece of cloth that stood out. He gave it a slight tug and the white wrappings loosened around her chest, and with another tug, they fell down to pool around her hips. However, before he could have his first look of her, Katara crossed her arms to cover her bare chest in an endearing display of shyness.
He smiled affectionately at her downcast eyes and blushing cheeks, but he did not like it when she continued to refuse to remove her arms so he could have a look at what he had been dying to see for such a long time. He frowned slightly in mild disapproval and placed his hands over her arms to gently urge her to lower them down beside her.

“Don’t hide from me, Katara,” he told her gently, tenderly. “I want to see you. Please?”

Blushing deeply, Katara stopped fighting his hands and slowly lowered her arms away from her chest, bashfully averting her eyes. Zuko’s breath hitched at the marvelous sight of Katara’s soft breasts and a flare of heat went straight to his loins. He had always thought that Katara’s breasts were full, but he found that without the bindings, her breasts were actually bigger than they seemed, and his hands twitched to have their weight and softness in his palms. He took in the sight of delicious caramel-colored skin that glowed under the few candles around the small room, the exquisite round breasts tipped with dusky nipples that had hardened into tight buds due to the cool air of the room and his heated gaze. His mouth watered at the tantalizing banquet bared before him and he felt his cock strain against the front of his trousers.

“Agni, Katara, you’re so beautiful,” he groaned out in awe.

Katara’s heart fluttered in her chest, unable to stop the happy feeling that went through her at the thought that Zuko found her so attractive. She looked at him and blushed as Zuko’s eyes continued to be absorbed on her breasts, the golden color of his eyes darkening into molten amber as he reached out a hand to lightly glide his fingers over the soft skin of her upper breasts, drawing a surprised moan from her throat.

“So lovely,” he whispered softly.

Becoming more daring, Zuko cupped both of Katara’s soft mounds tentatively, gently testing their weight and enjoying the feeling of finally having them in his hands. Then he squeezed with tender fascination. His waterbender, his enchanting water nymph, was utter perfection.

Katara’s heart picked up its pace once again and she moaned as Zuko pushed her breasts up before kneading them gently. His warm, calloused hands felt so, so good. She had no idea having someone touch her chest would feel so wonderful. Bending down for a deep kiss, Zuko gently coaxed Katara to open her lips for him, and once she did, he did not hesitate to slip his tongue into her mouth. As their kiss became more passionate, Zuko removed his hands from her amazing breasts and wrapped his arms around her, while she lifted her arms to wound them around his shoulders. He groaned and she gasped as the tips of her naked breasts brushed against his muscular chest.
Easing away from her lips, Zuko pushed her gently down onto the small bed so he could see her flushed features. The sight of her breasts moving rapidly up and down as she tried to breathe caught Zuko’s full attention. Leaning down toward Katara’s chest, Zuko again grasped the soft mounds before he gave them a gentle squeeze, causing her to moan loudly. Zuko then took one of her dark nipples between his thumb and forefinger and gave the hard peak a gentle pinch that made Katara squeal. He rolled it between his fingers a few times, watching Katara close her eyes and moan, before he stuck out his tongue and ran the wet muscle across the hard peak. Katara jolted again and gasped. Unable to resist any longer, Zuko latched his hot mouth to Katara’s lovely nipple and twirled it with his tongue until it became even harder.

“Zuko!” Katara mewled as his tongue on her nipple caused the ache between her thighs to become almost unbearable. “Please! Ohh!” she pleaded.

Zuko groaned at the sounds she made. The sensation of his mouth when he groaned, made Katara gasp and throw her head back onto the pillow beneath her. Zuko pulled away before he took the other neglected nipple into his mouth while he fondled the breast he had just left, the dark tip glistening with moisture. Damn, how he loved Katara’s breasts.

Panting rapidly, Katara grasped Zuko’s hair, and pushing her chest upward, she brought his face closer to her, almost as if she never wanted him to leave her breasts, which Zuko was reluctant to part from as well. Heat was pooling in her stomach again, Katara could feel the heat streaking down into her core, scorching and intense. Trying to find some relief to alleviate some of the pressure, she pressed her thighs together.

Releasing the hardened nipple with a nearly audible ‘pop’, Zuko lifted himself up to press his hungry mouth against hers. She gasped in surprise, and using her parted lips to his advantage, Zuko grasped her plump, lower lip between his teeth and ran his tongue along its soft edge. He lowered his bare upper body to her naked breasts and they both hissed at the pleasurable contact of more of their sensitive skin touching.

“Gods, Katara,” he growled out softly as he ran his hands down her shoulders, down her bare breasts, and down her sides. “I want to touch you so badly. I want to memorize every part of your lovely body, trace my tongue over every inch of your skin, and find every little spot that makes you sigh, moan, and scream my name.”

Moaning, Katara pressed herself closer to him, causing him to groan.

“Then touch me, Zuko,” she breathed out, pleadingly. “I want you to touch me. I want to feel every single pleasure I can find in your hands, Zuko. Please?”
Another groan escaped the young lord at her words and the breathless way she said his name before he captured her lips with his. Gods, he couldn’t get enough of the sweet taste of her. He wanted to ravish her, leave her senseless beneath him, stimulating her lovely body with pleasure until she sang to the heavens, his name falling from her lips in escalating ecstasy, pleading and crying for him. He wanted her to feel what she made him feel, but he knew that that would have to wait until their wedding night.

Zuko moved slightly away from her so that he was lying beside her as he continued to kiss her. The firebender’s hand found its way to the wrappings that covered the waterbender’s lower half, caressing her trembling thigh. His hand slid closer to the warmth between her legs, feeling her muscles tensing beneath his palm as he advanced. He pressed his palm onto her covered core, swallowing her deep moan, before he trailed his hand up until it played with the hem of her lower wrappings.

Katara tensed and gasped when she felt Zuko slide his hand beneath her wrappings and she had to fight the reaction of clamping her thighs together. Zuko pulled away from her mouth to watch his hidden hand. His fingers played with her soft curly hairs for a moment and he groaned when he realized they were damp before he pressed down, causing a sharp gasp to escape Katara at the tingle that went down her spine at the strange feeling of being touched there. Zuko froze and his eyes darted to her wide orbs with a worried frown.

“Did I hurt you?” he asked her with concern.

Katara quickly shook her head.

“No, the feeling just surprised me,” she reassured him before she blushed. “It…it felt really good.”

Smiling in relief, Zuko kissed her again until their hearts were racing and their minds were fuzzy with lust. Zuko again moved his hand and with his middle finger circled her swelling nub nestled between her moistening folds. Katara moaned and jumped at the bolt of pleasure that went through her, wrapping her arms behind Zuko’s back to steady herself. Zuko pressed his lips to her throat before darting his tongue out to lap at her flesh, ravenously savoring her pulse speeding beneath her skin as he continued to touch her most sacred area.

Slowly, carefully, so as not to scare her, Zuko parted her soft folds and slid a long digit up and down her wet slit. Again, Katara jolted at the strange, pleasurable sensation. He groaned. She was so wet and he had barely touched her. He coated his finger with her essence as he sought the warm darkness between her thighs before he poised it right at her quivering entrance. He bent down to take one of her nipples into his hot mouth to distract her for a bit before he gently eased his finger inside her. Katara cried out and winced slightly at the strange invasion to her untouched core. She trembled as she tried to figure what she felt. It was a sort of stretching sensation that was slightly uncomfortable but not painful.

Zuko moved his finger slowly, allowing Katara to adjust to the foreign invasion, touching her gently, learning the intimate textures of her warm pussy. Gods, she was so tight and wet around his finger that he could not help but wonder how it would feel to bury his hard cock deep inside her. He began to pump his finger a bit more insistently as his desire flared, and Katara groaned loudly as pleasure sparked all over her body.

“Does that feel good, Katara?” Zuko growled out, his voice husky as he continued to ease his finger in and out of her wet warmth at a steady tempo.

“Y-yes!” was Katara’s strangled reply. “Please, don’t stop! Oh!”

She began to make nonsensical sounds that she had never known she was capable of creating as she raised her hips to the pacing of his finger. The tightness in her stomach that she now had an understanding of began to coil even tighter. Breathing rapidly, Katara opened her eyes and made them focused on the man that was giving her so much pleasure. She noticed that a fine sheen of sweat misted his alabaster skin, his body taut with restraint and desire, as he hovered above her looking directly into her deep, sapphire eyes, intensely watching her every reaction to his touch.

“Oooh!” Katara mewled when he picked up the rhythm of his finger and she felt a new rush of wetness surge forth. “Zuko! Ah!”

“Mmm, my lovely waterbender, you have no idea how great I feel to know that I’m the only man who has seen you in such a ravishing state. To know that I’m the only one to feel you this way,” Zuko groaned out before he added a second finger that caused Katara to wince and let out a sharp gasp before she arched her back.

“I want to watch you come undone in my hands, Katara! I want to hear you scream out your pleasure!” he growled.

He curled his fingers inside Katara’s tight heat in a way that generated sparks of electricity through her entire body before firmly pressing down with his thumb on the swollen nub above her entrance.

At his words, at the movement of his fingers, Katara felt like she had shattered into a million pieces as her back arched from the small bed, his name falling from her lips in a deep cry, before she collapsed back onto the sheets, her mind in a state of dazed bliss.
Zuko groaned as Katara’s wet walls convulsed around his fingers before he slowly slid his drenched fingers away from her dripping pussy, causing her to let out a weak cry. He stared at her flushed features for a moment as her body trembled in aftershocks while she tried to regulate her breathing. He couldn’t help feeling smug at the fact that it was he who had caused her to feel the way she did.

It was a long moment before Katara finally came back to her senses as she let out a satisfied sigh before she turned her head to the side to look at Zuko who was lying quietly beside her. His pleased smile and warm eyes made her hum softly before she smiled languorously at him.

“That was…amazing,” she breathed out.

Zuko smiled as he leaned down to press a kiss to her swollen lips.

“Are you sure you haven’t done this before?” Katara teased with a raised eyebrow.

“Positive.” He grinned back at her.

Her teasing smile turned soft and she sighed as she scooted closer to Zuko until she laid her head on his shoulder. He immediately wrapped one arm around her back and pulled her close. Katara blushed lightly when her naked breasts were pressed along his side, but mentally shook her shyness aside.

“I’m glad,” she admitted quietly as she looked up at him before another teasing smile spread across her face. “That’s too bad for those other women, but I can’t say that I’m not happy that they will never know your amazing skills.”

A quiet chuckle rumbled in Zuko’s chest and Katara shivered at the sensation, both of them glad that the day had turned out so well. Katara shifted her leg and she gasped softly when she brushed against Zuko’s hardness. He groaned and shifted away from her, but she held onto him when it seemed he was about to stand up.

“We should sleep now,” he said a bit huskily before he cleared his throat as he tried to force himself to leave her warm body. Maybe he could go into the bathroom and take care of his problem himself.

“But…you…I-I haven’t p-pleasured you yet,” Katara stammered as she felt her face heating up.
“Don’t worry about it.” Zuko tried to smile reassuringly as he patted her hand resting on his chest. “You can do that another time when you’re ready—”

“No!” Katara interrupted loudly. Her eyes widened at her outburst before she looked down to watch her fingers trace patterns on Zuko’s smooth chest. “I-I want to please you, Zuko! Just like you did to me.”

Zuko groaned at her words and his arm tightened around her. How could he reject her offer when it was what he craved? Katara pushed gently against his arm and he reluctantly let her go.

Katara sat up until she was looking down at the tensed body of her future husband. She could see that it was hard on him to keep his restraint and she felt guilty that she had not noticed it in all those instances before now. He had brought her so much pleasure and she was determined to do the same. She moved, hesitated for a moment, and then straddled his legs. She slowly traced her gaze from his face, down his muscular chest, and then to the visible bulge on his pants and she blushed. She looked up when he shifted and she watched as he rose a little off the bed, propping up on his elbows and looking at her with smoldering, golden eyes. Katara felt a bit of her courage falter. She had no idea how to go through with it. His touch had been so wonderful, so confident, and she did not have a single clue as to what she was doing or what she was supposed to do.

Averting her eyes from his face, Katara took a mental steadying breath before she lifted her hand and settled it on his muscular stomach, which quivered at her touch, before she gently lowered her hand and placed it down directly over his hard length.

“Averting her eyes from his face, Katara took a mental steadying breath before she lifted her hand and settled it on his muscular stomach, which quivered at her touch, before she gently lowered her hand and placed it down directly over his hard length.

“Katara,” Zuko groaned softly as he dropped back on the bed.

Encouraged by his reaction, Katara tentatively cupped her hand over the big bulge and gently began to rub her hand over his hard, covered flesh. She could feel the heat radiating through the fabric of his trousers and suddenly she wanted to feel him in her hand. Without pausing her hand’s movements, Katara laid back on her side beside him just as he had before and watched, mesmerized, as his chest heaved with his harsh breathing. She moved her hand away, smothering a smile when Zuko growled in disappointment, and trailed it over the edge of his dark trousers. Before her courage faltered again, Katara slowly dipped her hand into the waist of his pants until her hand touch something hard yet soft. Zuko jumped and hissed, and Katara pulled her hand away as if she had been burned.

“Did I hurt you?” she asked anxiously as she worriedly searched his eyes.
Zuko almost smiled since it was the same question he had asked her a couple of minutes before.

“No, no, it felt great,” he quickly reassured her as he grabbed her hand and gently but firmly guided her back into his pants. “Touch me again, Katara,” he urged. “Wrap your hand around me.”

Katara licked her lips as she hesitantly ventured further down until she grasped his hard length just like he wanted. Her eyes widened in amazement. He was so firm and warm, but most of all, he was huge! At least, that is what it felt like to her since she had nothing to compare him with. She could barely wrap her hand around him. An ache formed between her thighs again at the thought that Zuko would put such a large…thing inside her one day, and she stifled a moan of both apprehension and arousal.

“Ah, Katara!” Zuko groaned as he thrust his hips against her hand. Gods, just having Katara touch him with her soft hand was such an incredible feeling.

Katara watched his hips strain against her, but she froze self-consciously since she did not know what to do next and she was too embarrassed to ask Zuko what she should do. As if reading her thoughts, Zuko reached his hand down to cover Katara’s trembling hand before he curled her fingers more firmly around him.

“Squeeze a little tighter,” he instructed gently, though his words were coming out a bit ragged.

Katara breathed a mental sigh of relief before she did what he requested and squeezed his length. His hips jerked and she smiled. As if by some inner instinct, Katara wrapped her fingers around him more firmly and began to stroke his length in a steady rhythm.

“Yes, Katara! Just like that!” Zuko hissed as he dropped his head back against the pillow while the muscles in his neck became tense, his eyebrows bunched together, and his jaw clenched.

Gaining more confidence, Katara sped up the strokes of her hand a little and her eyes darted back to his face as Zuko growled and pushed his head back onto the bed.

“That feels so good, Katara,” he groaned. “So damn good!”

Katara let out a little moan.
“Don’t…” he panted, “stop!”

Even if he had made her, Katara would not have been able to stop. She was so captivated by what she was doing, with the feeling of Zuko straining beneath her fingers, but most of all, by the image of his face contorted with pleasure just by her touch. She wanted to bring him to release just as he had done for her. Her pace quickened and her strokes over his length became more firm.

Zuko’s hands twitched at his sides as his hips surged up to meet Katara’s stroking hand. Unable to resist, Katara reached up and kissed him deeply. Zuko shot his arms up, pressing one hand on the back of her head so they could continue devouring each other’s mouth while he wrapped his other arm around her to bring her body closer to his, both groaning when their naked chests touched. A delicious tingle went down his spine, his stomach tightened almost painfully, and Zuko knew he was close to finding his release. Katara gasped when she felt him throbbing in her hand as his movements became more agitated, the sound of his groans steadily becoming louder.

Zuko pulled away from her lips, but before he could warn her, he cried out her name, his entire body stiffening as his cock pulsed with his release, heavily spurting his semen into his pants. He felt like the air was knocked out of his lungs and he groaned deeply.

Katara’s eyes widened when she felt something hot and sticky coat her hand. She slowed her pace as she continued to stroke his pulsing shaft, watching as a moment later his face as well as the muscles of his body relaxed. Her brow furrowed in curious amazement as she felt him begin to soften in her hand and she slowly uncurled her wet fingers from around him, drawing her hand out from his dark trousers.

Panting, Zuko had his eyes closed as the last few tremors left his body. He hummed when he felt Katara lay down before she curled her lovely body against his side. He opened his eyes to stare dazedly at the ceiling before he turned his head toward Katara who was watching him with a bit of curiosity and nervousness. He grabbed one of the sheets from the bed and silently cleaned her hand of his seed. Once she was clean, he quickly reached out for her, wound his arms lovingly around her, and held her close to him.

“Agni, how I love you, Katara,” he groaned into her hair before he pressed a kiss to her temple.

Katara raised her head to smile shyly up at him.

“I guess that means I did okay,” she said happily.
Zuko’s eyebrow rose high on his forehead as he gave her an incredulous look.

“Okay? That was more than just okay!” he exclaimed as he gave her a squeeze. “That was…that was…I can’t even find the words to describe it!”

Katara smiled joyfully as she snuggled close to his warmth and sighed contently. Zuko stroked the smooth skin of her back and smiled. He had planned to leave the bed so he could clean up in the adjoining bathroom, but when Katara snuggled against him, he decided that he would do it in the morning. He smiled as he brushed her hair away from her face before he reached for the blanket that had been shoved to the foot of the bed. He lay back down beside Katara and gathered her into his arms until she was curled around him before he covered them with the blanket.

It was not long before both were lulled to a restful and sated sleep.
Possessively Protective

Chapter Summary

Things are heating up ;)

Soft light from the dawning sun spilled into the small room where two figures laid close together upon the bed resting against one wall. With a soft groan, Zuko opened his eyes and glanced at the small window where he could already see the night being chased away by the coming of day. He dropped his head back upon the slightly flat pillow with a tired sigh. They needed to head out soon and make their way to Omashu.

His gaze moved to his side and a pleased smile curled his lips when he saw Katara snuggled into him, her hand resting on his chest, her lips slightly parted as she slept. He had never, in his entire life, felt so relaxed and content. A warm tingle skittered down his spine at waking up with Katara wrapped in his arms. He never knew how amazing it would feel to wake up next to a woman, a woman he had intense feelings for. His hand began to caress the sleeping waterbender’s hair before he slid it down her smooth back to caress the skin there. He smiled when Katara let out a little moan.

Now, more than ever, did he want them to return to the Fire Nation, not only to exert his position as the true Fire Lord, but also so Katara and he could start preparing for their wedding. He wanted Katara to begin living with him as his wife, to be by his side forever. As soon as possible. He wanted everybody to know that she belonged to him, especially Aang.

A sigh escaped him. He was sure Aang would not only be hurt when he learned Zuko was going to marry the woman they both loved but angry as well. Perhaps Aang would come to hate him for a time, but Zuko hoped that the young monk could forgive him one day, because even though he still saw Aang as a friend, Zuko would not give up Katara. He would not lose his chance for a happiness that he had subconsciously longed for but did not acknowledge until Katara came back into his life. He just hoped the airbender would understand in time.

Katara, murmuring and snuggling closer to him, brought him out of his thoughts and his attention was immediately caught when he felt the soft sensation of her naked breasts pressed so close to him. The young lord stifled a groan and a flare of heat went through him as he remembered the things they had done the previous night. He was grateful that she had allowed him to enjoy her—at least in this manner—and he could not wait until he could finally take Katara as a man should his wife. He replayed in his head the delightful noises Katara had made as he pleasured her and the incredible sensations he had felt when she pleasured him in return.
Spirits, there were no words to describe them.

Zuko felt the stirrings of his cock in his trousers, so he tried to calm his thoughts. Though he loved this new physical side of their relationship—as limited as it was at the moment—he enjoyed the other aspects as well. Their playful banter, their serious talks, even the times they spent in comfortable silence, and he had a feeling Katara felt the same way. Never before had he had such a connection with a woman—with anyone, really—and he vowed that he would not lose Katara, for he knew he would never feel for another woman the way he felt for her.

The young Fire Lord’s eyes again shifted to the small, dusty window and sighed, reluctantly deciding that it was time for them to leave if they wanted to ever make it to Omashu so they could send for help to the Fire Nation. He was glad to know that Uncle and his crew survived that terrible storm and were indeed fine, if the rumors he and Katara had heard the other day were actually true. He wanted to find his uncle and return to his mother so they wouldn’t be worried anymore. Shifting on the bed until he was laying on his side, Zuko gazed down at the sleeping face of his waterbender.

His waterbender. A mixture of possessiveness, protectiveness, and love went through him at those words—words he had cherished in the privacy of his mind with equal love and anguish for months—and he tightened his hold on the sleeping woman as he continued to watch her.

She looked so peaceful, so beautiful, with her chocolate hair falling over her shoulder and her dark eyelashes fluttering against her cheeks, that he almost regretted waking her up. He gently nudged her a few times and he grinned when she rolled away from him with an irritated groan. He had become aware of how much Katara hated waking up early in the morning when they were traveling during the end of the war and it had sometimes amused him when she would walk around in a bad mood for a few hours. It seemed that she was still the same as the years passed by.

Zuko scooted close to Katara again as he wound his arm more firmly around her waist and placed soft kisses on her cheeks and down her neck. A small smile spread on his lips when she moaned before a soft yawn escaped her. He watched as she rubbed her eyes before she sleepily opened her blue orbs to look at him.

“Good morning,” he whispered softly as he brushed his nose against her hair while he gave her a gentle squeeze.

A small smile began to surface on Katara’s face before she realized that her chest was still bare, and she blushed, embarrassed because she was still not used to their new level of intimacy. Her blush deepened when she remembered the reasons why she was half naked.
“Good morning,” she muttered as she tried to discreetly cover her chest with her arms.

Zuko decided to spare her sensibilities, so after kissing her cheek, he got off the bed and stood up, stretching his muscles as he felt the early sun’s energy course through him. He had never felt so energized!

“You can rest for a moment longer while I take a bath first. Then we’ll head out,” he told her as he moved across the room, gathering his clothes as he went, before looking back at her.

“Okay,” Katara agreed as she sat up with another yawn, exposing her bare breasts as the blanket slid from her shoulders.

Zuko’s golden eyes darkened at the sight of such delectable flesh and he groaned when his body again reacted to the sight of her delicious form. He wondered why they had to leave again.

“Maybe you want to join me in my bath?” he teased her huskily.

Katara’s eyes widened when she saw where Zuko’s eyes were staring so intently and she quickly reached for the blanket before drawing it over her chest. Her blush deepened when Zuko chuckled at her.

“We’ve bathed together before, you know,” he continued, his tone still teasing. “The only difference now is that we won’t be wearing any clothing.”

“Just go take your shower,” Katara huffed as she threw a pillow at him.

She growled when he easily evaded it with a deep laugh before entering the bathroom and closing the door behind him. Katara scowled at the door before she clutched the sheets to her chest again when she realized she had let them go when she threw the pillow at Zuko. She slapped her forehead and groaned, berating herself for her reaction since Zuko had already seen her last night—and she had not minded one bit. With a contented sigh, she lay back on the bed and stared at the plain stone ceiling.

Though she was still getting used to this new side of their relationship, she could not deny that she enjoyed it, loved it, very much. But she knew that what they had was not just something physical because there were deep feelings involved—they loved each other.
There was nothing wrong with that, right? Nobody could judge her for feeling so happy, for wanting to be closer to the man she loved.

Images of what Zuko did to her the previous night slowly surfaced in her mind. The way he had touched and kissed her breasts, the way his fingers had touched her so intimately, the way he had looked at her. A small moan escaped her as she felt her body heat up and she closed her eyes to let the now familiar feelings Zuko aroused in her wash over her being. She opened her eyes again and a happy smile spread over her face when another thought came to her.

She was able to please Zuko, and by the sounds and expressions he had made, she must have done it pretty well for her first time.

But most of all she now felt reassured about Zuko’s past and what he felt for her. He may have known Mai physically, but Zuko loved her, Katara! She was the one he proposed to, the one he wanted as his wife, so that was what really mattered.

The waterbender was brought out of her thoughts a few minutes later when she heard the bathroom door open and she raised herself onto one elbow, her other hand clutching the bed sheet to her, and watched Zuko come out. He was shirtless, his powerful body only clad in pants and boots, and he was rubbing the moisture out of his hair with a thin towel. Her heart fluttered in her chest at the sight of him and she felt her core tighten in desire as she remembered the incredible sensations of his hot mouth on her nipples and his fingers inside her.

Zuko paused as he watched in fascination as Katara’s blue eyes darkened and her cheeks blossomed with a soft blush. He recalled that she had looked the same way the previous night when he had pleasured her and he groaned softly when he felt his cock swell with desire. His mind told him that he should leave her alone and not overwhelm her too soon, but his body demanded other selfish, naughtier, things. Now that they had shared some intimacy, he could not keep his hands off her. Before he could stop himself, he dropped the towel and strode across the room toward the bed, his eyes locked intensely onto hers.

Katara’s eyes widened and her breath quickened as she watched Zuko approach her like an avenging god, droplets of water running down his alabaster chest, his eyes passionate and determined. She could only look up at him wordlessly when he stopped next to the small bed and looked down at her. She could not mistake the desire she could see in his eyes and her heart raced wildly in her chest. She glanced down his body and felt herself flush at the prominent bulge in his pants. There certainly was no mistaking that he was definitely aroused. Her eyes darted back to his face when Zuko reached for the blanket she was clutching against her bare breasts. He gently tugged at it, silently asking for her permission and acceptance for what he desired. She only resisted a few seconds before the warm, passionate look in his eyes broke her resolve. She could not deny that she wanted to again experience the pleasure she had only found in Zuko’s arms.

Zuko groaned in both relief and satisfaction when Katara allowed him to pull the blanket away from her. He had been prepared to accept her rejection, even if it killed him, but he was glad to know that she wanted this as much as he. He admired the sight of Katara’s breasts for a moment before he climbed onto the bed. Katara leaned back onto the pillow when he moved over her. He leaned down to capture her lips in a slow, tender kiss that had the waterbender melting in passion beneath him. He pulled away to catch their breaths and they stared dazedly at each other, studying the emotions they could see in each other’s eyes, reveling at the powerful current sweeping between them like it always seemed to do.

“Katara,” he murmured huskily against her lips, “I need to touch you again. Please.”

“Yes, Zuko, please touch me,” she whispered softly as she reached out to wrap her arms around his neck, “I want to touch you, too.”

A loud groan escaped the Fire Lord before he swooped down to kiss the blue-eyed waterbender beneath him. Their mouths opened eagerly and their tongues immediately tangled and caressed, alternating between being in each other’s mouths. Katara moaned softly and Zuko murmured as their hands danced up and down each other’s bodies. The waterbender let out a gasp when Zuko cupped her breasts and began to gently knead them. She moaned when his lips left her mouth and trailed hot kisses down the column of her throat and to her chest. When his wet mouth engulfed one of her nipples, her eyes fell close in pleasure at the incredible, still shocking feeling, as it caused wetness to pool in her core.

“Oh, mm,” she moaned as she grasped at his dark hair with one hand.

Zuko pulled away to latch onto her other nipple. The hand that was not holding him up moved down her side, her waist, her hip, sending delicious shivers racing down her spine. He nudged her legs apart with his knees and knelt between her thighs when she shyly consented to his silent request.

The sensation of his trousers against her bare thighs and his boots against her feet made Katara’s stomach clench in need. As her firebender’s hand went lower to caress her smooth stomach before sliding lower to press against her covered sex, Katara felt herself quivering with desire. He sucked at her aching nipple and grazed it gently with his teeth at the same time he began to gently rub his knuckles against her center. Katara could not stop herself from arcing her back with a loud cry. Her thigh pressed against his erection at her movement and her eyes flew open when Zuko hissed in pleasure. Panting slightly, Katara mused that she could not be the only one receiving pleasure, so before she lost her courage, she reached down between their bodies and grasped his covered shaft.
“Oh, Katara,” Zuko rasped against her breast as his hips bucked into her small hand.

With his mouth still covering her nipple and his hand still touching her, Zuko clenched his eyes shut as he relished in the sensation of Katara’s hand rubbing his erection through his pants for a few more seconds before he decided that it wasn’t enough. He needed her to touch his bare shaft just as much as he needed to touch her slick pussy. He pulled away from her slightly to retrieve the blanket before he settled it over them, leaning back down to capture her lips before she could protest his absence. He was glad Katara was allowing them to go this far, but he was not sure if she would be comfortable seeing his swollen cock yet.

Pulling back from the kiss, Zuko panted as he stared down at an equally breathless Katara. The sight of her half-lidded eyes, flushed cheeks, and thin tendrils of her chocolate hair plastered to her forehead with perspiration caused his stomach to clench in desire and he groaned as he bent down to kiss her again. He pulled away and smiled when Katara tried to follow his lips. When she opened her eyes to look at him, he brought his hand up to caress her cheek.

“Do you trust me?” he asked her huskily yet softly.

Her breath coming out in soft pants, her heart pounding in her chest, and her skin burning with desire, Katara stared into his warm, golden eyes and knew that he was feeling the same yet he was still conscious of her reservations. She felt her love for him swell in her chest.

“With my whole heart,” she responded confidently, if breathlessly, as she tightened her hold of his hard length.

Zuko closed his eyes and let out a low moan before he gazed back down at her. Holding her gaze, he removed his hand from where he had been caressing her and clasped it tightly around her hand that was still rubbing against him. He squeezed her hand a few times and groaned in pleasure before he lifted her hand and slowly dipped it into his trousers, giving her time to pull away if she did not want to continue.

Katara hesitated for a moment since this was still new to her, but she could not deny that she wanted to feel him again and bring him pleasure, so she gave him a shy smile and a nod of her head. Zuko let out a sigh of contentment as he firmly, eagerly, slipped her hand further inside his pants until her fingers touched his hot erection. He groaned when Katara quickly grasped him tightly in her hand without waiting for his prompting.

“Shit, Katara,” Zuko groaned and closed his eyes as his hips bucked into her hand once again.
Katara smiled, this time she knew her touch was not hurting him, but giving him pleasure, and she squeezed him a little like he had taught her the previous night. Her pussy quivered in desire when he again rasped out her name. Katara admired the strained yet pleasurable expression on his handsome face, the sweat that appeared on his forehead and neck, and the way his muscles quivered and shuddered. The feeling of his hard erection, and the contrasting soft skin, of the throbbing strength straining in her hand, fascinated her beyond measure.

Holding her gaze with a smoldering one of his own, Zuko tugged on her hand and his cock sprang free of its confinement. Katara’s eyes widened in both apprehension and curiosity, but even if she looked down, she would not be able to see him clearly since the blanket Zuko had draped over them created shadows. She was distracted from her thoughts when Zuko bent down to nibble on her lower lip before he dipped his tongue inside her mouth. She was so focused on the astounding kiss he was bestowing on her that she did not noticed Zuko slip his hand inside her now loose under-wrappings until his fingers touched her swollen bundle of nerves.

“Zuko, oh!” she gasped into his mouth as her hips bucked into his hand.

“Mmm,” Zuko groaned when her hand tightened on his cock as a reaction to her pleasure. “Touch me, Katara,” he commanded huskily.

With a wanton mewl she didn’t know she could make, Katara began to slowly stroke his large length.

“Yesss, just like that,” Zuko hissed against her lips.

The arm that was holding him up trembled with the desire to crush his body above hers so he could wildly grind against her, but the still functioning part of his brain warned him against being too rough with her so soon. He loved her and she deserved to be worshiped and pleasured completely.

Tangling his tongue with hers, he slowly circled her clit before sliding his fingers down her slit. Katara gasped and quivered in anticipation as he rubbed against her folds just above her clenching entrance. All traces of apprehension and shyness were gone as Katara strained her hips against his hand.

“Do you like that, Katara?” he rumbled amorously just as he did the previous night. He pulled his head back slightly to look at her.
“Yes,” the waterbender whimpered as the pace of her strokes on his erection increased with her need. “Please, Zuko.”

A loud moan escaped her when he cupped her firmly. His mouth found hers again just as one of his fingers slipped inside her quivering pussy.

“Ohhh,” Katara gasped as her back arched off the bed at the sudden invasion. Although Zuko had already touched her inside, her body was still getting accustomed to the strange sensation.

“Ahh, you’re so wet,” Zuko growled huskily as he slowly pumped his finger inside her slick heat.

Katara’s response was grasping and stroking his length more strongly, causing Zuko’s breath to hitch in immense pleasure. His stomach tightened and he knew he would not last long. His tongue curled around hers and he pressed slow, deep, passionate kisses on her mouth as he dipped another finger inside her. He slipped both fingers in and out of her before he curled them at the same time he pressed his thumb on her bundle of nerves.

Katara was lost. She could feel and think of nothing but Zuko and what he was doing to her as all her blood rushed to that incredible spot between her legs. She began to stroke Zuko’s throbbing flesh even faster just as she reached her climax with a scream, the pleasure blinding and powerful. Zuko bucked his hips erratically into her hand as he felt her wet walls spasm around his fingers before a tingle of pleasure shot down his spine and into his cock, his orgasm hard and scorching. He jerked his hips and groaned as he spilled himself onto her hand and stomach.

Katara gasped softly when she felt him throb in her hand and hot liquid touch her skin. Zuko shuddered above her as he leaned his forehead against the crook between her shoulder and neck. They panted hard against each other, their bodies still quivering in pleasure, their minds hazy with their release. When Zuko finally lifted his head, Katara let go of his softening member at the same time that he slipped his fingers out of her, causing her to moan softly.

“Are you okay?” he asked with a rasp as he stared down into her eyes, searching for any sign that she regretted what they did.

“I’m fine,” Katara assured him with a sated smile as she reached out a hand to caress his scarred cheek. “That was incredible. I can definitely get addicted to this.”
“Gods, I love you,” he croaked before he placed a languid kiss on her lips.

“I love you, too,” she breathed out between kisses.

With a contented sigh, Zuko pulled away a moment later. Once he had tucked himself back into his pants, he threw the blanket off them and lay down beside her, pulling her to him to kiss her once again. Katara shivered when her nipples brushed against his sweaty chest before the cooling sensation of his release caught her attention. She pulled away and looked down at herself.

Zuko followed her gaze and his eyes darkened in pleasure at the sight of his white semen coating her smooth stomach. Something primitive and possessive inside him reveled at such an unfamiliar and erotic sight—as if he had somehow marked Katara as his. Just as he wondered if he should probably apologize, he watched as Katara slowly swiped her fingers on her stomach and scooped some of the white substance before she held her fingers to her face in curiosity.

“So this is what a man’s seed looks like,” Katara mused as she inspected the sticky fluid. She had felt it last night, but she had been unable to see when Zuko had quickly cleaned her hand. She blushed and bashfully looked up at Zuko from beneath her eyelashes.

Zuko chuckled both amusedly and happily at the pure joy of her as he leaned down to kiss her again. They kissed each other for a moment, both enjoying the soft afterglow of their intimacy before they pulled away.

“I need to bathe,” Katara murmured as she again pulled the blanket to her chest.

“I need another bath, too. We can save time if you take up my offer of helping you bathe,” Zuko teased again as he leaned toward her so he could kiss her, but he stopped when Katara scrambled off the bed with the blanket twirled around her body.

“I can do it myself, thank you very much,” the Water Tribe maiden said huffily as she moved around the room to collect her clothes before heading toward the bathroom. She paused at the entrance and looked over her shoulder to grin at him.

“But I’ll take you up on that offer one day,” she teased.

She giggled at his stunned expression before slamming the door shut when Zuko made a move toward her. Zuko scowled at the door before he shook his head as he fell back on the bed.

“Damn, that woman is going to be the death of me,” he muttered gruffly and affectionately into the empty room.

A few days later, a bright morning sun found the two benders walking once again. Three days ago they had noticed the land changing from green and lush forest to arid and mountainous land, and they knew they were heading in the right direction to the grand city of Omashu.

Katara brushed a lock of her hair away from her face and exhaled loudly. It was getting warmer the further they walked from the shade of the forest’s trees and into this barren land, and if they were not careful with their provisions they would probably find themselves in deep trouble.

“Why didn’t you buy the ostrich-horse?” she asked curiously as she looked up at Zuko who had been walking silently beside her for the past few hours. She had wanted to ask him that question a while ago, but it would always slip her mind whenever Zuko decided to become ‘affectionate’ with her.

“We could’ve arrived at King Bumi’s palace sooner,” she added. She frowned in bewilderment when she noticed Zuko stiffen and clench his hands. “What’s wrong? Was the price too high?”

“Yes,” Zuko responded in a strange, dark tone that sent a shiver down her spine. “The vendor asked for something that is too valuable for me to give up.”

Confused, Katara tilted her head to the side since she knew they did not have anything of value on them, so what could Zuko possibly mean?

“What did he want?” she asked curiously as she continued to stare at Zuko’s hardened features.

“Let’s just forget about it,” he answered instead as he glanced at her briefly before looking away.

Katara frowned at him and her curiosity rose at his evasive answer.

“Come on, Zuko. Just tell me,” she insisted as she narrowed her eyes at him.
She was startled when Zuko stopped and turned toward her with an intense stare. She was surprised by the anger she could see in his amber eyes.

“Zuko…?” she asked softly as she paused in front of him.

“You. It was you that man wanted in exchange for an ostrich-horse,” he ground out in barely concealed rage.

Katara gasped.

“What?” she cried out angrily, though she was not so surprised. After all, it was not an uncommon thing for women to be sold off and bought, especially in many of the cities and villages of the Earth Kingdom.

“He saw you when we were talking before we separated,” Zuko continued darkly. “Since he is the only one in that small village that sells ostrich-horses, he told me he would only give me one for the blue-eyed woman. I told him to forget it. You aren’t something that can be sold off,” he growled out.

Katara’s indignation melted and she smiled at his words before she laid a hand on his arm to soothe his temper. When she felt him relax beneath her touch, she asked him what else had happened.

Zuko looked away into the distance before he coolly replied, “Nothing. I left.”

“Uh-huh, sure you did,” Katara uttered skeptically as she raised an eyebrow at him. “Seriously. What happened?”

Zuko shrugged nonchalantly as he looked down at her from the corner of his eye.

“I may have punched him in the face before I threatened to set his place on fire if I ever saw him again,” he replied impassively as if what he had done was nothing of importance.

“You didn’t!” Katara exclaimed in disbelief, though she could not stop her lips from twitching in amusement.

“The sick bastard deserved it,” Zuko responded before he looked back down at her, pulling her flushed against him. “Besides, you’re mine,” he growled out lowly.

Katara shook her head at him, but she smiled as her heart skipped a beat at his words.

“Is that the reason why you were so angry when you threatened that guy that approached me in the marketplace?” she asked with a wider smile.

Zuko tightened his hold on her as he bent his head down to place hot kisses down her throat, as if to brand her skin, before leaning away to stare into her bright, cobalt eyes.

“I didn’t like the way he was looking at you,” he admitted with a growl. “It made me want to burn his eyes out.”

“Wow. I never knew you were so violent,” she teased as she ran her hand down his chest.

Zuko chuckled deeply as he gave her a squeeze.

“I never thought of hurting people so much until you came into my life,” he shot back.

“Hey! Don’t blame me for your homicidal tendencies!” she quipped with a laugh.

“Oh, but I do,” he murmured against her ear as he pulled her closer to his tall frame. “As I also blame you for the way my body reacts to your mere presence, my little waterbender.”

Katara shivered as his warm breath washed over her, and her heart fluttered when he called her his waterbender because it was true. She was his as much as he was hers. She moaned when Zuko kissed her, but when he sought to deepen the kiss she nimbly moved away from his grasp.

“We should continue if we’re to arrive in Omashu sometime this year,” she said impishly.
She giggled when Zuko scowled at her as he tried to adjust himself.

“I also blame you for leaving me in a half-aroused state most of the time,” he muttered and Katara laughed even louder at his disgruntled tone.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Later that day, as the sun made its descent into the horizon and covered the ground in a golden light, Zuko returned from his hunt to the small campsite they had built for the night with two birds. He had to admit that he was not a bad hunter for being so inexperienced and he was sure that with some practice he would be just as good as Sokka, if not better. Of course once he returned to his duties as Fire Lord, he may not have a chance to find out.

His eyes lit up as he spotted Katara sitting near the fire and he quickly made his way to her. A smile touched Katara’s lips as she took the two small birds in her hands before she began to pull out their feathers.

“You’re getting better at this.” Katara smiled proudly at him as she lifted the second bird.

“I’m just glad we don’t have to starve,” Zuko responded with a small, indifferent shrug.

Katara bit back a giggle since she could see the smugness pouring out of him despite his nonchalant reply. Once she finished cleaning the birds and placing them to roast on the fire, she drew the small pot with steaming water from the flames while Zuko pulled out the fruit, cheese, the small pouch of tea leaves and teacups from the bag they were in. The last rays of sunlight had disappeared while a thin crescent moon took its place in the night sky by the time the couple was done eating their small meal and drinking the tea Katara had thoughtfully bought in the marketplace.

“Well, I’m going to sleep,” Katara got out through a yawn as she turned to smile sleepily at Zuko.

With an amused smile, Zuko nodded at her as he placed his empty cup of tea aside.

“Good night,” he told her as he leaned down to brush his lips on hers. He let out a small chuckle when she yawned into their kiss.

Blushing sheepishly, Katara muttered a good night. Exhausted from their tiresome walk through the dry terrain, Katara made her way to their bedding and was soon asleep.

However, sleep could not find Zuko as pressing thoughts once again plagued him, thoughts that had not left him since they had fled from the rebels’ camp. The firebender turned away after watching Katara sleep for a moment and frowned darkly, the campfire’s light casting shadows on his face as he stared blankly at the dancing flames before him.

Where were Jianguo and his men? What if Jianguo was taking out his anger at their escape on the Fire Nation colonies? Did the Fire Nation think their lord was dead? Was his mother worried for him and Katara? Would Ozai’s wish of regaining the throne be realized?

Zuko’s frown deepened as another thought came to his mind. Who was the traitor living right under his nose? It had to be someone that had some sort of contact with him to be able to have given so much information about his affections for Katara to Jianguo. But who? Who could it be?

One of his personal guards or the soldiers he had placed to keep an eye on Ozai? A servant displeased with his or her lot in life? What if it was a vindictive nobleman or a noblewoman that felt he had scorned?

What if it was…Jee?

Zuko’s hands clenched as some sort of pained betrayal went through him at the thought before fear seized him since he had left the care of his mother to the admiral. But the feeling soon passed since he knew Jee was fiercely loyal to him and would never do anything to put both Katara and him in danger. Zuko trusted his admiral just as much as he trusted those he cared for—which admittedly were not many.

Dropping his head to his hands, Zuko let out a frustrated sigh. The only ones left in his list of suspects were his advisors, but why would they go against him when they were enjoying the privilege of being a member of the Royal Court Council? They knew that if they were caught in such traitorous acts they would be stripped of their status and wealth, and suffer a traitor’s death. But for the past four years they had come to respect him and accept him as Fire Lord. Well, all except Wei, that is…

Zuko’s head snapped up and he narrowed his eyes at the glowing campfire before him.

Wei! Of course! Why didn’t he realize it before? Wei had never pretended to hide his loathing for him and his decision to end the war! If the old advisor had the opportunity to get rid of him, Zuko was positive Wei would immediately jump at the chance. And if he remembered correctly, they had seen Wei walking out of the prison tower where Ozai was imprisoned, probably scheming on how to usurp the throne! And now that he thought about it, Wei had been asking him many questions and suggesting many things about Katara during his birthday celebration to probably get a reaction from him that would indicate his feelings for the waterbender.

That son of a btch! Zuko cursed angrily in his head and the flames from the campfire rose at his temper.

Because of Wei they had been captured, Katara had been hurt, he had been beaten, and Katara had almost died! She had almost been lost to him forever! Though he had no proof of his suspicions, Zuko would make Wei pay for everything. He would make sure of it.

Taking a deep breath to regain his control, the young lord glanced at the sleeping woman cocooned in a blanket a few feet away before he lifted his gaze to the night sky. But first he would make sure to keep Katara and his mother safe before confronting the traitor amongst his advisors.

Sleep still eluded him now that he had come to his conclusions, and so, Zuko decided to practice his white fire since now there was less of a chance that he would cause a forest fire if something went wrong. Standing up, Zuko moved a few paces away from the small campsite so he could practice at ease and not disturb Katara.

Beginning with a few exercises he had mastered years ago to warm himself up, Zuko began a series of firebending moves that would help him in his breathing and the control he had on his inner fire. Again, he relished in the sensations of feeling the fire’s warmth licking at his hands as he practiced, and he promised himself that never again would he experience the cold emptiness of having his chi blocked.

Satisfied with his progress, the young firebender then decided to summon his white fire, but to his consternation, nothing but red and orange flames appeared. Bewildered, Zuko extinguished the flames on his palms before he again tried to call forth the powerful, hot white flames that had helped him get rid of those bastards that had harmed Katara.

A loud frustrated sigh escaped him as the fire that appeared on his palms was not the white flames he wanted. His exasperation grew dangerously high as he glared angrily at the normal-colored flames. What the hell?
Why couldn’t he summon the white fire as easily as it had come when he fought Jianguo’s men? Was it perhaps, that bending white fire had only been a onetime thing, just as he had thought?

Alarm replaced his anger as the thought festered in his mind before he shook his head. Maybe if he concentrated just as hard as when he did in the cave where he had taken shelter with Katara, then perhaps he could bend the white flames again.

New determination flaring in him, Zuko drew in a deep inhale before he let out a slow exhale to calm his erratic emotions and clear his mind. He concentrated on the steady flare of his inner fire that kept a constant rhythm with his heartbeat, with the flow of his blood. He thought on the pleasing heat of the white flames on his skin and the feeling of power that washed over him when bending such powerful fire.

The red flames hovering over his palms flared for a moment and then expanded before the color changed to pale blue and then bright white and the temperature increased to swelteringly hot. Zuko let out a relieved breath, a satisfied smile curling his lips, as he stared in amazement at the burning white flames in his palms. The knowledge that he was able to bend such flames still continued to astonish him.

But why could he not summon the white fire as easily as before? Was he only able to because of the immense rage he had been experiencing when Katara had been hurt? Zuko frowned. He did not want his anger to control his firebending as it once did when he had still been trying to win his sire’s favor and the chance to return home. He was different now, he had changed.

I’ll just have to ask Uncle and perhaps he’ll be able to give me some answers, he thought with a small frown.

Placing his questions aside for the moment, Zuko again concentrated on the white fire he had summoned and began to go through a series of firebending moves. The white flames flew ferociously from his hands or his feet as he punched his fists out or jumped and kicked at the air. Exhilaration raced through his veins as he quickened his movements and he forgot the time as he lost himself in his firebending.

Katara rolled onto her side and scooted back as she tried to snuggle into Zuko’s warm body, but she frowned when she was met with nothing. Concerned, Katara immediately awoke and sat up, looking around herself in alarm. A bright flash of light caught her attention and she gasped when she saw Zuko surrounded in white flames as he rigorously went through his firebending exercises. A trickle of fear went through her since seeing white fire reminded her of that day when she had been injured…the day she had died. But as she continued watching Zuko, her fear vanished and her tensed muscles relaxed.

She watched in awe as Zuko leapt into the air, punched out a white fire blast that was immediately followed by a swiped sideways fiery kick, before he landed on the ground only to continue with more fighting stances. The more she watched him, the more fascinated she became, until she realized she was becoming aroused. She squirmed in her spot and blushed a bit as thoughts of Zuko touching her again with such powerful, slightly calloused hands surfaced in her mind.

Stopping at the last stance of his exercise, Zuko extinguished his flames before he relaxed and took a few deep breaths to regulate his breathing and the beat of his heart. He had tired more quickly than he normally did when he used the same set of exercise moves and he frowned. Did bending white fire require more energy perhaps? Another question he needed to asked Iroh about.

After he cooled off and stretched, he decided it was time to get some rest and quickly turned around so he could sleep next to Katara. With the anticipation of having her in his arms again, Zuko quickened his pace, but he frowned when he noticed that she was awake.

“I’m sorry if I woke you up,” he apologized softly once he had sat down next to her.

“Don’t worry about it. I quite enjoyed the show,” she told him with a grin. “You look so amazing when you firebend. It…it takes my breath away.”

Zuko chuckled at her words as he bent his head down to kiss her. Katara eagerly responded to the kiss and wrapped her arms around his neck to bring him closer. After a few more moments of just giving each other languid kisses, Zuko pulled away from her with a sigh and rested his forehead on her shoulder.

“What’s wrong?” Katara asked in concern.

“Summoning white fire is not as easy as I had thought,” he responded with another sigh.

Katara soothingly ran her hand through his dark hair before placing a kiss on his head. Zuko’s heart warmed at the gesture and he gave her a small squeeze.

“Well, maybe with more practice and with Uncle Iroh’s guidance you’ll get better at it,” she told him sincerely.
“Yeah, that’s what I was thinking too.”

Zuko gave her another squeeze before he again lifted his head and smiled at her. Katara returned the smile before she rested her head beneath his chin while he wrapped an arm around her.

“I’ve been meaning to ask,” Katara began as another small yawn escaped her, “Do you think we’ll be going through the Cave of Two Lovers on our way to Omashu?”

Zuko tensed and he pressed his lips tightly together as he shifted his gaze to the darkness beyond their small campfire. He remembered all the times Aang had brought up what happened in that cave and he felt his stomach clench in irritation.

“No, we won’t,” he responded curtly.

A frown creased Katara’s eyebrows at his terse answer and the way his body had stiffened, and she wondered what had caused such reactions.

“Is something wrong?” she asked curiously as she lifted her head to look into his eyes, but her frown deepened when she noticed that he had his eyes averted to the side.

“Nothing is wrong,” he replied stiffly.

“Come on, Zuko. I may not have Toph’s accurate ability to detect lies, but I can tell you’re lying,” Katara huffed as she pulled away to raise an eyebrow at him.

Zuko gave her a blank stare before he sighed when she narrowed her eyes at him. He knew she would not stop asking until he gave up and told her.

“I…don’t like to think about the Cave of Two Lovers,” he finally said after a few moments of tense silence.

“Why not?” Katara asked and tilted her head to the side in curiosity.
Zuko again shifted his gaze away from her before he let her go, placing his hands on his knees where he clung them when Katara frowned at him.

“Aang always boasts that it’s the place where he first kissed you and that because of the…affection you held for each other the crystals in the cave reacted. I hate the thought of it…of knowing he has kissed you,” he confessed darkly as he shot her a small glare.

Katara sat back and gave him an incredulous look. What right did Zuko have in getting mad at her? Kissing was the farthest she had gone with Aang while Zuko had…She shook her head. No, she will not think about that since that was in the past and best left forgotten. But still, why was Zuko so upset?

“Seriously?!” she exclaimed in disbelief. “That was such a long time ago and it was just one, innocent kiss!”

Zuko scowled at his hands before he sighed as he ran one of them through his growing hair. He returned his gaze to Katara who was frowning at him and he gave her a strained smile.

“I know that nothing serious happened,” he acknowledged her words. “And I know I have no right to react this way…especially with my brief history with those few women and Mai,” he muttered lowly.

When Katara winced before she again raised an eyebrow at him, Zuko reached for her hand and stroked it with his thumb before bringing it to his lips.

“I know my reaction is stupid, especially since you and Aang had never…” he trailed off before he continued with a frustrated sigh. “But I can’t help what I feel.”

Katara shook her head at him as she gave him a small smile. Now that she thought about it, Zuko had seemed upset when Aang first mentioned the Cave of Two Lovers as they all made their way in search of Lady Ursa, and she could not help feeling happy and slightly amused that Zuko had been jealous since then.

“Well, now you understand what I felt when you told me about your…past, don’t you?” she asked him softly.
“Yes, and I’m sorry for causing you pain,” he told her sincerely as he again brushed his lips against her hand.

“Let’s just forget about that and focus on our future, alright?” Katara told him as she lightly waved her other hand aside.

Zuko straightened, his dark expression lightened, and he gave her a nod of agreement before he smiled at her as he again brought her close to his chest.

“You know, I have a small confession to make,” Katara spoke up in a small voice after a short moment of silence where only the sounds of the nocturnal creatures could be heard.

Stiffening in anxiety at her words, Zuko cleared his throat as he replied.

“Well. What is it?”

“I…I never had the heart to tell Aang that the real reason the crystals lit up was because our light gave out,” Katara replied softly. “They glow in complete darkness.”

Zuko’s eyes widened in surprise before something like relief and elation washed over him. He placed his fingers beneath Katara’s chin to lift her head, and before she could react, he swooped down to kiss her passionately. Katara gasped in surprise at his ardor before a small moan escaped her when Zuko slipped his tongue inside her mouth and ran his hands down her back. When they pulled apart Katara was bewildered and dazed while Zuko looked smug and content.

“If it were true that the crystals glow because of the feeling of love, then I’m sure the cave would have lit up brighter if we kissed because the feelings we hold for each other is greater than anything else,” he growled out huskily against her lips.

“It sure would,” Katara immediately agreed with a grin before she tightened her arms around his neck and brought his lips to hers again.

La, I can’t get enough of kissing Zuko! Katara moaned in her head.
Zuko groaned against her mouth before he pulled away, nuzzling against her head as he let out a quiet sigh.

“I can’t wait for us to the return to the Fire Nation so we can announce our engagement,” he mumbled against her hair in an excited manner that was supposed to be subtle, but failed miserably.

He snapped back to awareness, however, when he noticed Katara shift uneasily against him.

“What’s the matter?” he asked anxiously. If she told him she did not want to marry him anymore, then he would use everything he had to convince her otherwise.

Katara felt a twinge in her heart at the anxious tone she heard in Zuko’s voice and she hoped he would not be too upset with what she wanted to tell him. She wiggled in his embrace and sat down beside him when he finally let her go. She watched as he turned his body to look at her, a frown appearing on his face, and she began to fidget at his intense stare.

“It’s just that…well…” she trailed off and looked down at her fidgeting fingers on her lap. “If we announce our engagement so soon after the two of us return…alone…people might think things…”

“We shouldn’t care what they think, after all, we know the truth,” Zuko responded with a displeased frown, although inwardly he let out a relieved breath that this was just a tiny concern compared to what he had thought Katara would have said.

“Maybe you’re right,” Katara consented with a nod before she took a deep breath as she stared right into his eyes. “But the other reason I think we should wait until we announce our engagement is because of…Aang.”

Zuko’s back stiffened almost painfully as he growled out, “What?!"

Katara quickly grabbed his hand when it seemed he was about to stand up and she brought it close to her chest.

“Please, hear me out,” she pleaded softly as Zuko turned his head away from her. “I want to talk to Aang first before he finds out about us, about our engagement.”
She paused when he didn’t say anything before she scooted closer to the now silent Zuko and touched his cheek so he could turn to her again. Once he reluctantly looked back at her, she continued.

“Aang is my friend, and I care for him, and I don’t want to hurt him by having him find out about us through other people,” she said softly. “He deserves an explanation and I want to be the one to tell him that I love you and that I’m going to marry you.”

Zuko could see her pleading with her eyes for him to understand, and he sighed since it was hard to deny her anything, and besides, he knew she was right.

“I understand,” he told her. “I also don’t want to hurt Aang and I would like to talk to him as well. I’d like him to understand my feelings for you and that I won’t let you go. But,” he paused and a frown appeared on his chest, “it could be a while before we see Aang again and I don’t want to wait so long to proclaim you as my future wife. I want everybody to now you are mine.”

“I know how you feel, but I still think it’s best if we wait a little to announce it,” Katara began, but when she felt Zuko about to protest again she placed a finger gently on his lips. “Please, Zuko. Remember on our way to the Abandoned Fort you promised me that you would do anything I asked of you one time?”

Zuko frowned deeply as she removed her finger from his lips since he had a feeling where she was going with this, but he nodded to show her he remembered.

“Then please do this. Wait a bit longer to announce our engagement,” Katara pleaded softly. “At least, until I talk to Aang and my family first.”

Zuko’s lips pressed together in a thin line as he debated with himself for a moment. If they waited until they told Katara’s family and Aang about them, then that meant that when they returned to the Fire Nation he would have to keep a distance between Katara and himself if he did not want nasty rumors to spread about her. Zuko frowned deeply at the thought since he did not want to be separated from her, but he eventually let out a resigned sigh and nodded reluctantly.

“Fine. I promise not to say anything about us until then,” he began before he looked seriously into her eyes. “But once you tell them, I will immediately announce our engagement. I will not prolong our wedding any longer than that, do you understand?”
Katara gave him a brilliant smile and she nodded. She let out a relieved sigh before she fell against him, wrapping her arms around his middle. Zuko rested his chin on her head as he ran his fingers through her long hair.

“Thank you, Zuko,” she told him gratefully as she placed a kiss on his covered chest.

Zuko did not respond to her for a while as he held her close to him since he still did not find the thought of waiting much longer than he had anticipated to take Katara as his wife agreeable, but he relented since he understood what she was saying and meant.

“What’s so amusing?” he asked her curiously.
“You also need to talk to my father first to get his consent to our marriage,” she told him with a grin.

“Then there won’t be a wedding after all,” Zuko responded as he let out a mock-defeated sigh.

Katara laughed as she snuggled closer to him, delighting in the teasing manner and the feeling of his arms wrapping possessively around her.

“Don’t worry,” she said as she giggled at him. “My father will grant you permission since he respects and admires you. Especially after helping Sokka rescue him from the Boiling Rock and for…risking your life for me when Azula attacked me.”

Zuko tightened his hold on the precious woman in his arms as he brought her protectively to his chest at the reminder that he could have lost her that day, but he quickly shoved the horrible memory away.

“Besides,” Katara continued as her voice became soft and tender, “my father will know I am happy for I have chosen you as my husband.”

“I sure hope you’re right,” he told her lightly as he tipped her chin up so he could claim her mouth.

Zuko groaned at the feeling of her soft, plump lips before he lowered his enticing water nymph onto the blankets while he lay at her side. Katara forgot everything but the feeling of being in Zuko’s strong arms, of his caressing mouth and hands, his sandalwood scent, and his soothing warmth. She gave herself to him without reservation or thought since she knew he would never hurt her if he could help it.

Zuko rolled over quickly until his body was covering Katara in one long embrace, and his hands moved over her clothes, molding her curvy body to him until she was a supple column of warmth beneath him. He slowly, carefully, slid his hands down her sides, over her flared hips, before he slipped his hands beneath her to cup her ass. He groaned at the feeling of having such firm orbs in his hands. He heard Katara gasp and he gave the perfect round cheeks a squeeze, eliciting a small moan from her.

“Mm, Zuko,” Katara moaned into his mouth. Before, she would have been shocked if her bottom was grabbed in such a way, but now she delighted in the feeling of having Zuko touch her.
She moved her hands from his shoulders, down his muscular back, kneading his hard flesh beneath the layers of his clothes, and she smiled mentally when he let out a tiny moan. She eagerly opened her mouth when he began to probe her lips and she sighed when he slid his wet tongue inside while she continued to run her hands down his back as he gave her butt a few more small squeezes with his large hands.

Slowly Zuko lifted his mouth from hers when the need for air became too great before he leaned his head down to her throat and placed hot kisses there. He paused and lifted his head so he could see his waterbender’s swollen lips and heaving chest.

“Katara,” he breathed out huskily as he leaned down to kiss her deeply once again, almost as if he wanted to devour her whole.

He gave her firm ass another squeeze before lifting her hips toward his own. Katara hesitated for a second before she slowly opened her legs so he could settle between them. They groaned when his covered aching erection settled firmly against her equally clothed wet warmth. The kiss grew more passionate as they began to rock frantically against each other as their pleasure rapidly increased. She gasped loudly when he shifted his hips and his hard erection pressed against that sensitive bud between her legs. His tongue was hot and firm as he took her mouth, flicking it against the inside of her cheeks, twining it with her own wet tongue, kissing her thoroughly as he strained against her center until she was crying out wordlessly against him. A few seconds later, Zuko gave out a loud groan before he slumped forward, barely catching himself before he crushed the quivering woman beneath him.

The firebender rolled onto his back and both lay there beneath the dark, twinkling night as they tried to catch their breaths. After a long moment, Zuko pulled her close to his side before he turned his head to gaze fondly at Katara, who was staring at him with dazed, sapphire eyes.

“Damn. Even with your clothes on you can excite me so, Katara,” he groaned out as sleep began to invade his mind. Practicing his white fire and now this passionate and pleasant moment with Katara had tired him out.

Katara felt her face heat up even as a smile came to her lips before she buried her face on his shoulder. Zuko chuckled at her bashful reaction before he nuzzled his face against her hair, taking in a deep breath of her gardenia scent.

Zuko smiled as he leaned his head down a bit so he could taste her lips again. They kissed each other softly and tenderly, but when their kisses were interrupted by simultaneous yawns they pulled apart to give each other sheepish smiles. Zuko reached for the blankets and brought them up to cover them both as they settled close to each other, the starry night sky their ceiling, the dry ground their bed, and the campfire their warmth.
Just as sleep was claiming them, Katara felt Zuko give her middle a small squeeze.

“I still wish we could tell everybody about us as soon as we arrive, though,” he muttered drowsily.

Katara giggled dreamily before they both fell to the clutches of sleep.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The two young benders soon found themselves walking through an area where various rocky hills and rough terrain made their process slower than they would have wanted. There did not seem to be any water or animals near, so they had to carefully limit their intake of food and water.

“How much longer do you think it will take for us to arrive at Omashu?” Katara asked tiredly after they stepped over several large rocks.

“I don’t know,” Zuko responded as he shaded his eyes from the sun’s glare in order to see ahead of them, but all he saw were the sun’s rays reflecting off the ground. “The times I have visited King Bumi for treaties and meetings I used an airship and everything looks different walking there.”

“Oh, I see,” Katara responded quietly before she continued walking without saying anything else.

Zuko became concerned at her silence since he could tell something was on her mind and he reached out a hand to brush his fingers against her back.

“What’s wrong?” he asked.

“It’s my family. I’m worried about them,” was her reply as she glanced at him briefly before returning her gaze to the rocky ground beneath her as she continued a bit hesitantly, “But most of all…I’m worried about Aang.”

Clenching his hands tightly, Zuko suppressed a growl as a twinge of jealousy went through him again. Why was Katara bringing Aang up so much recently? He did not like it one bit.

“Why?” he finally replied in a terse tone.
“It’s just that when it comes to me and my safety being threatened, Aang would sometimes react badly,” she told him softly since she could feel that Zuko was upset. “And I’m worried that he might do something drastic if news reaches him about my disappearance.”

Zuko’s jaw clenched and his nostrils flared. He understood what Katara was saying, but he still did not like that she always worried about the young airbender. Katara was his and she shouldn’t be so preoccupied with another!

His hand shot out and grabbed a hold of her arm, whirling her around until he had her pressed tightly against his chest, before his mouth descended on hers in a hard kiss. Katara’s eyes widened in surprise at his demanding kiss and the feeling of his fingers firmly clutching her arms, and she stood frozen in place since she did not know how to respond to his sudden fierceness. But just as suddenly as he had kiss her, Zuko pulled away, and she stared at him in equal amount of confusion and surprise.

“Aang is going to have to understand that it will be my duty to look after your wellbeing and happiness, not his,” he told her firmly.

Katara frowned deeply at him and his words as she slowly tried to pull her arms away from his grip. Zuko’s hands tightened at her movement before he let her go.

“There’s no reason for you to get jealous, Zuko,” she admonished him gently. “Have I not shown my love for you? Have I not allowed only you to know all of me?”

Zuko’s stiff shoulders slumped a little at her truthful words, but he refused to apologize for the way he felt, for the way he had reacted.

“Besides, Aang is my friend, as well as yours, so it’s normal for him to care and worry for me,” she continued.

“You know very well that Aang feels more than just affection for you,” Zuko retorted darkly before he pressed his lips tightly together.

“There’s nothing for you to worry about since it’s you whom I love and it’s you I’m going to marry,” Katara reminded him firmly as she placed her hands on her hips.
Sighing, she dropped her arms to her sides when that did not calm him as she had expected. She reached a hand out to run it along the edges of his scar and she smiled when he sighed and immediately relaxed at her touch. The young lord brought his hand up to cover hers as he looked down at her with serious, burning eyes.

“For his safety I hope Aang understands that as well,” Zuko responded in a grave tone that made the small threat sound more sinister. “Although I’m grateful to Aang for everything he has done, I won’t give you up, I won’t let you go. I will not lose you again, Katara.”

“I know,” was Katara’s breathless response as she lost herself in Zuko’s amber eyes and the feeling of his thumb caressing the skin of her hand.

Zuko wound his arms possessively around her small waist and brought her up to his chest before he pressed his lips against her plump ones. This time Katara responded to him, opening her mouth to his questing tongue and wrapping her hands around his neck to pull herself closer to him. He kissed her gently, carefully, as if silently asking her to forgive him for the harsh way he had kissed her earlier, and Katara accepted his silent apology by gently twirling her fingers in his hair and caressing his tongue soothingly with hers.

However, they were interrupted as the sound of something heavy running toward them from behind reached their ears. The two benders quickly pulled apart and, just as swiftly, took on fighting stances —Zuko summoning fire into his hands and Katara twining sharp-looking water tentacles around her form as they waited for an attack.

Their eyes widened as a huge beast appeared on top one of the stony hills and, without so much as a pause, it lunged itself downward, its dark-russet fur ruffling as the wind rushed by it on its descent, before it landed agilely on the ground before them with a grunt. Its eyeless, large head moved from side to side before it lifted its snout and sniffed wildly in their direction.

It was then that they noticed the figure sitting with ease on the large animal’s back, a small smirk curling painted lips and dark eyes glinting with both amusement and disinterest. Long fingers tipped with dark painted nails flicked a long tendril of black hair behind a shoulder where a large tattoo could be seen.

“Are you gonna attack me or just stand there like idiots?” a sultry feminine voice spoke and a thin eyebrow was raised on a smooth, pale face.
“Jun,” Katara exclaimed in surprise.

She relaxed a bit and returned her water to her water pouch, but Zuko did not relent on his rigid stance and instead moved protectively closer to Katara while he kept a wary eye on the bounty hunter. The last time they had seen her was when they had been searching for Aang when he disappeared from Ember Island just as Sozin’s Comet approached.

“Long time no see,” Jun replied as she leaned on her shirshu’s saddle and smirked mockingly down at them while the animal continued to sniff wildly about, a long thin tongue flicking out from a fanged mouth. The dark-attired woman continued to smirk at them as she patted her mount on its wolf-like head.

“Good job, Nyla,” she cooed, “I knew you’d find these two.”

Nyla made a soft growling sound as one of her ears was scratched by her master.

“What do you want, Jun?” Zuko finally spoke in a commanding tone.

“What? Can’t I just go on a ride and enjoy the scenery?” the woman replied as she placed one hand on her hip while with the other she kept a tight hold on the shirshu’s reins.

When both the Fire Lord and the waterbender looked at her skeptically, she shrugged a shoulder and laughed.

“Yeah, didn’t believe it myself either,” she drawled. Again, she flicked her hair behind her as she continued, “Actually, Uncle Lazy hired me to find you two. Promised me a big bag of gold if I could find you before the end of this week. Looks like I’ll be getting my money sooner than I expected.”

“Uncle Iroh is looking for us?” Zuko asked. He looked at Katara and they smiled at each other in relief.

Jun stared at them for a moment before another mocking smirk curled her wine-colored lips as she again leaned over Nyla’s saddle.
“So, Angry Boy,” she began with a taunting tone in her voice, “did your pretty girlfriend escape from you again?”

She chuckled deeply, but she paused in her amusement when she saw that they did not immediately start denying their relationship to each other like they had done in the past when she teased them about it. She raised a dark eyebrow in surprise at the quick glance they sent each other before she smirked at the blushing waterbender and the smug young Fire Lord. Another chuckle escaped the bounty hunter.

“Oh, I see how it is,” she teased as she winked at Katara who blushed even deeper at the suggestive gesture.

“Where is my uncle now?” Zuko decided to interrupt before Katara lost her temper at the way Jun kept on smirking and leering at them.

He frowned as he saw Jun slowly dragged her eyes over his entire form before a provocative smile appeared on her face. Noticing the way the older woman seemed to be eating Zuko with her eyes, Katara stepped before him and glared at Jun who raised an amused eyebrow at her.

They watched the bounty hunter warily as she swiftly dismounted from Nyla’s saddle before she led the shirshu over to a pile of large rocks where the woman fluidly sat and began to inspect her nails uninterestedly. Zuko felt his temper flare when she didn’t reply to his question, but before he could demand she answer him, Jun flicked her hand at them as she tilted her head to point in the direction she had come from.

“Uncle Lazy was following behind me, but when Nyla picked up your scent so close by I went ahead of him,” she informed them indifferently. “He’ll be here soon.”

Just as she finished talking they heard a thunderous sound come from the direction Jun had pointed, and both Zuko and Katara whirled around in anticipation. Instead of jumping from atop the hill just as Nyla did, four ostrich-horses raced down from it, loosening a few rocks below their clawed feet. Zuko felt his heart ease as he spotted his uncle riding ahead of two men—one of them leading a rider less ostrich-horse—and he smiled when Iroh’s face lit up and a large smile appeared on his aged face as he spotted them.

“Zuko! Miss Katara!” Iroh cried out joyfully as he reached them. He jumped from the ostrich-horse before the feathered animal had come to a complete stop.
“Uncle,” Zuko greeted warmly as he allowed his beloved uncle to hug him tightly. He had missed the old man.

He returned the embrace swiftly before his uncle let him go to bring the smiling waterbender, who had no qualms in hugging him back just as fiercely, into his arms. When the old firebender pulled away he had tears in his eyes as he smiled at them.

“Thank Agni, both of you are all right,” Iroh exclaimed shakily before he cleared his throat as he began to fuss over them, making sure both of them were indeed fine and had no injuries.

He patted Katara’s cheeks and he grinned when Zuko frowned at him when he ruffled his nephew’s hair, which was longer than his usual style. Iroh’s jubilant air diminished a bit and he gave them a watery smile.

“I was so worried,” he told them softly. A slight trembling could be heard in his kind voice. “I feared I had lost you both to the sea.”

“Oh, Uncle Iroh,” Katara said gently as she wound her arms around the older man while Zuko placed a comforting hand on his uncle’s shoulder.

“There’s no need for you to be worried anymore, Uncle,” Zuko spoke up as he gave Iroh’s shoulder a small, reassuring squeeze.

“Of course, of course!” Iroh exclaimed as he moved away from them to give them his usual cheerful smile. “You’re here, alive and well, so now we can return home.”

“Great!” the waterbender exclaimed as she threw a smile at Zuko who gave her a small grin before he schooled his features back to his stoic expression.

“My lord,” one of the men that had been standing silently to the side spoke up as both approached the three of them.

Zuko turned to look at them curiously before he gave them a small smile as he recognized his two personal guards. They were wearing plain Earth Kingdom clothes and not their usual uniforms, so he had not realized who they were before.
“We are glad both you and Lady Katara are safe,” the younger guard said as they bowed.

“Thank you,” Zuko replied sincerely and both guards straightened and smiled when Katara thanked them as well.

“Not to interrupt your little reunion,” Jun spoke up sardonically as she stood from the rock she had been sitting on where she had watched the mushy scene, “but we should head back to the colony. I do want my reward money, you know.”

“Why, of course, my dear Jun!” Iroh exclaimed with another large smile he directed at the female bounty hunter.

Zuko suppressed the urge to roll his eyes at his uncle and Katara giggled softly into her hand as Jun frowned at the old man. Jun sniffed before she turned to her shirshu and mounted without saying another word or looking at the grinning retired general.

One of Zuko’s personal guards handed the rider less ostrich-horse to him with a bow before he turned and mounted his ostrich-horse just like the other guard did. Silently, they waited for their lord’s orders.

Katara frowned when she saw Zuko settle onto the only other ostrich-horse available and she wondered where she was supposed to go, but before she could voice her concern, Iroh spoke up as he slapped a hand over his chest as if in shock.

“It seems we forgot to bring another ostrich-horse!” he exclaimed a bit too surprised to sound genuine. “Here, my dear. You can have mine.”

Iroh held out the reins to Katara as he moved his gaze toward Jun with a bright smile. Jun pressed her painted lips together as she glared at the scheming old firebender. Shrugging, Katara moved to take the reins from Iroh’s hand, but she gasped in surprise when she felt a strong arm go around her waist before she was lifted and settled on a saddle between two firm legs.

Iroh and the two guards stared in astonishment as the young Fire Lord pulled the waterbending woman toward him before setting her on the saddle in front of him with an impassive expression on his face, as if sweeping a woman from the ground was a normal occurrence.
“You can ride your ostrich-horse, Uncle,” Zuko spoke up coolly. “Katara will ride with me.”

A deep, red blush surfaced on Katara’s cheeks, which only deepened when she felt Zuko give her a small squeeze before subtly bringing her closer to his chest, but she did not protest since she knew that once they returned to the Fire Nation Palace they would not be able to be so close to each other like they have been, while wandering around in the Earth Kingdom.

“Oh…well, what a remarkable solution,” Iroh responded as he finally recovered from his shock.

He gave the pretty bounty hunter—who was smirking knowingly—a disappointed look before mounting his ostrich-horse. If Zuko’s personal guards found their lord’s behavior strange they did not comment on it as they took positions to guard the group, one before their lord and the woman he was holding against him, while the other rode behind the group.

When Katara shifted again before him, Zuko gave her another small squeeze until she relaxed against him. He smiled mentally before he turned to his uncle who had ridden beside them.

“What has happened since the storm?” he asked.

Iroh’s features turned solemn as he glanced at them before returning his gaze ahead of them.

“We will have a talk later over tea,” he responded lightly.

Zuko and Katara noticed his quick glance at Jun, who was riding ahead of them, before they nodded that they understood. They really could not trust Jun since she was only loyal to someone until another person came along with a bigger purse. So they waited and listened as Iroh began to tell them of their adventures as he and the guards followed Jun and her incredible shirshu in search for the missing Fire Lord and the master waterbender.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

“After both of you fell into the sea I was afraid I would never see you ever again,” Iroh confessed in a shaky and quiet tone as he gave them a brief pained smile before he looked down at his teacup.

Zuko and Katara silently looked at each other and frowned. The three of them were sitting before a small campfire Zuko’s personal guards had set up a few hours ago, drinking jasmine tea Iroh had brought with him. Katara prided herself in knowing she could cook amazingly well, but she could not deny Iroh was an expert when it came to any brew of tea. Jun had gone off somewhere without so much as a backward glance and the two guards had gone to patrol the area, so now was a good time for the three of them to talk in private.

Reaching a hand out, Katara laid it on Iroh’s arm and gave a reassuring squeeze. The old firebender smiled at her as he patted her hand gratefully before he returned his gaze to his silent nephew.

“What happened since the storm?” Zuko asked again, his tone soft as he waited for his uncle to compose himself.

Iroh let out a deep sigh before he took a sip of his soothing tea.

“After that horrible storm passed, I ordered for the flagship to return to the place both of you had disappeared from. We searched the area for a few days.” The retired general paused before another sigh escaped him. “I…feared that you had drowned and sunk to the bottom of the ocean,” he admitted softly before he looked up at his nephew to smile knowingly at him. “But I knew that you would not have given up so easily, especially if it came to the safety and welfare of Miss Katara.”

A small grin pulled at his lips when Katara blushed and Zuko nodded at him while one side of his mouth lifted as if he were suppressing a smile.

“And so I ordered for the crew to turn the ship to land,” Iroh continued with his story as he looked at the two young benders silently listening to him. “I figured that Zuko would make his way to the colony, especially since Miss Katara would have wanted to help the disease-stricken village, so we went to the colony first, prepared for the worst, but to my surprise I found the colony perfectly fine.

“Confused, I immediately sought out the governor and inquired about the disease, but he told me that no such illness had spread throughout the village, there were no great amounts of deaths, and he had not sent a message to the Fire Nation saying such,” Iroh told them with a frown that made the wrinkles on his face more profound. “That is when I became suspicious and concerned that something else was afoot, so I had the crew and the guards from both the flagship and the colony search the village and the surrounding areas for you both.”

Nodding, Zuko asked his uncle to go on while Katara again gave the old man’s arm a supportive squeeze. Iroh sighed tiredly, his frown deepening, and he took another sip of his tea before he continued as he gave them a look that shown both confusion and dread.
“After several weeks of anguish, I received a disturbing letter from Chao asking me if the Fire Lord was all right since all of the Royal Court Council members had received an anonymous message saying that the Fire Lord and his waterbending woman had been captured and would only be released if they set Ozai free.”

Pausing, Iroh stared at his nephew and the waterbender sitting next to him before raising an eyebrow at their unaffected looks.

“Chao’s letter alarmed me, but I sent him a reply telling him not to comply to the anonymous person’s demand since it could be a bluff. I told him to order the other advisors not to breathe a word of what was going on to anyone and to begin finding out as discreetly as possible who could have sent the messages while I remained in the colony searching for you. But a few days later I received an anonymous letter as well that said that they had you and if their demands were not met soon they would not hesitate to…kill you both.”

A ragged breath escaped Iroh at the reminder of such a threat before he cleared his throat when his nephew placed a hand on his shoulder. Iroh patted his hand as he turned to give Zuko a sad smile.

“I wanted what was happening to be kept from others, especially your mother, but Ursa…” Iroh trailed off with a frown.

Zuko stiffened, his stomach twisted and his heart clenched in worry as his golden eyes stared intently and commandingly at his solemn uncle.

“What about my mother?” Zuko growled out worriedly. What if she had been hurt because Katara and he had escaped? He would never forgive himself if that were the case. “Is she all right? Is she hurt? Why didn’t Jee protect her?” he demanded angrily.

“Calm yourself, Nephew,” Iroh interrupted him firmly before he continued when Zuko took a calming breath, “Ursa is fine and you know Jee will not fail in his duty to keep her safe.”

Iroh shook his head. “Anyway, what I was going to say was that your mother found out about both Miss Katara and your ‘capture’. She pleaded for me to tell her what was going on and if both of you were indeed in danger. I told her the truth about the storm and that you had disappeared, but I was not sure if you had indeed been taken. I asked her not to despair yet.”

Zuko dropped his head into his hands with a deep, painful sigh. Katara turned to look at him with concerned eyes and she automatically placed her hand on his shoulder to soothe him.

“I promised myself I would keep my mother safe, that I would make sure she would not suffer anymore after what Ozai did to her…but I failed,” Zuko growled out darkly.

Iroh opened his mouth to reassure his nephew, but his words died in his throat when he saw Katara wrap her arms around Zuko. His eyes widened in surprise when, instead of shrugging her off, Zuko leaned into her to soak up her comfort.

“You didn’t fail, Zuko,” Katara responded gently as she ran her fingers through his dark hair. “Didn’t I tell you to stop blaming yourself for every little thing that goes wrong? The important thing is that you try.”

“You’re right,” Zuko responded quietly before he sat up straight and cleared his throat, his features once again cool and impassive. “Please continue, Uncle.”

A white, bushy eyebrow was raised in both bewilderment and curiosity as Iroh continued to stare at them, but when they frowned at his silence his shoulders slumped slightly in disappointment. He had begun to hope that both his nephew and Katara had finally confessed their true feelings to each other. If they continued to be so stubborn he was going to lock them in a room until they did…and perhaps let them out until Zuko got Katara with child.

“A white, bushy eyebrow was raised in both bewilderment and curiosity as Iroh continued to stare at them, but when they frowned at his silence his shoulders slumped slightly in disappointment. He had begun to hope that both his nephew and Katara had finally confessed their true feelings to each other. If they continued to be so stubborn he was going to lock them in a room until they did…and perhaps let them out until Zuko got Katara with child.

“Uncle Iroh?” Katara questioned softly and Iroh shook his head to clear his thoughts while his silly smile dropped.

“Hm? Where was I…?” he began before he nodded once he remembered, “Ah, yes, as more days passed with no sign of either of you, my despair grew and I began to believe that perhaps it was true that you had been captured. Desperately, I ordered the entire village and those close by searched more thoroughly for you. I wanted to rescue you because, even though I do love you both, I know we cannot allow Ozai’s freedom...even in exchange for your lives.”

Iroh pressed his thin lips together before he looked away from them to glare at the burning campfire, ashamed. He was surprised when Katara wound her arms around his middle and he looked up at his nephew who was looking at him with a fondness that only Iroh could detect after staying at his side for more than seven years.

“It would be the correct thing to do, Uncle,” Zuko reassured him quietly. “Ozai cannot be allowed to regain his freedom and the Fire Nation throne.”

“Zuko’s right, so don’t feel bad, Uncle Iroh,” Katara spoke up as she gave Iroh’s broader middle a squeeze before she sat back to smile at him. “It’s what we would have wanted.”

“Thank you,” Iroh spoke up softly and sincerely as he gave them a small smile, even though he understood, it would not be an easy thing to do.

“What else happened?” Katara asked lightly in order to change the subject.

“Let’s see…Oh!” Iroh exclaimed and a wide smile appeared on his face that caused both young benders to relax a bit.

“When there continued to be no sign of you, I began to think of new ways to help me find you, and then I got an inspiration! I knew that if someone could find you it would be the lovely Jun. And so with the help of Zuko’s personals guards, we searched for Jun until we found her in a tavern in one of the Earth Kingdom villages not far from the colonies. And with the help of your fire crown, Jun’s shirshu was able to find you. And so here you both are!”

When Katara smiled at him and Zuko hummed pensively, Iroh’s exuberant smile faded into a confused frown and he crossed his arms over his chest, slipping his hands inside the long sleeves of his forest green shirt.

“Neither of you seem surprised at what I have told you,” he mused before his eyes widened in apprehension. “Were…were you really…captured?” he asked anxiously as his golden eyes darted from one to the other.

His alarm grew when Zuko turned away and Katara looked down at her hands which she had grasped tightly on her lap.

“Yes,” Katara finally responded and Iroh gasped in both shock and horror. Katara sighed and her shoulders slumped. “And it was because of me and my own stupidity—”

“No!” Zuko growled out as he snapped his head back toward her. He let out a deep breath to calm himself before he reached one arm out to bring Katara to his side as he more softly said, “No, it wasn’t your fault either. The good thing is that we managed to escape.”

Katara nodded her head and she wrapped her arms around Zuko as she let herself be comforted by his arms, his strength, his words, and his warmth.

Iroh wanted to ask who the ones responsible for kidnapping them were, but he sensed that now was not the right time—if the way Zuko kept frowning darkly at him was any indication. However, Iroh was surprised by the comfortable way Zuko and Katara were with each other as he comforted Katara and she, in return, immediately relaxed into Zuko’s embrace. Never had the retired general seen his nephew give comfort to another person before—and in such a gentle manner—that he almost wanted to pinch himself to make sure he was not dreaming. He became excited as his hope for a niece-in-law and little grandnephews and nieces grew more and more, but he decided to wait to get some answers since he also did not want to make it awkward for them if he were wrong.

He discreetly cleared his throat, and he almost grinned, when they immediately pulled away from each other with flushed faces. Well, Katara was definitely blushing, but Zuko was rather scowling more than blushing. Iroh looked away from his nephew when he heard Katara gently clear her throat.

“Uncle Iroh, I wanted to ask you something,” Katara began.

“What is it, my dear?” Iroh responded as he smiled at her encouragingly.

Of course you can marry my nephew and have his babies! was what he wanted to say. Iroh had to lift his teacup to his lips to hide his amused grin.

“It’s about my family,” Katara began as she twisted the hem of her shirt with her fingers as her worry once again surfaced, “Have you heard about them? Do you know if the news about our kidnapping reached them? My father, Gran-Gran, Pakku and Suki will be so worried! I don’t even want to imagine how Sokka would react!”

She let out a sigh when she felt Zuko reach for her hand and squeeze it gently. She looked up and smiled softly at his reassuring gaze.

“Actually, Miss Katara,” Iroh immediately responded, “I indeed sent a message informing them about the events during the storm a few days after the first search for both of you was in vain. But with all the rumors of your kidnapping flying around they probably already know. However, I haven’t heard from them since I followed after Jun.”

He took another sip of his tea as he subtly eyed their clasped hands. Why did they not say anything, for Agni’s sake? He had a feeling Zuko was not even aware of what they were doing, for Iroh was sure his nephew would balk at the thought of showing such affection. But perhaps Katara had changed him?

Katara frowned worriedly as Iroh finished talking, but she allowed herself to relax when Zuko again squeezed her hand before he slowly let go.

“So where were you heading before we found you?” Iroh piped in as he smiled at them both. “You were heading the opposite direction from the Fire Nation colonies.”

“We were actually on our way to Omashu and King Bumi…for help and protection,” Zuko spoke up with a blank expression, even though he was bristling inside at the reminder that they had been making haste in order to escape from Jianguo’s grasp.

“Oh, well, that sounds like a very good idea,” Iroh commented with a nod since he had a feeling he knew why they had been making their way to the Earth Kingdom city. “But I am so glad we were able to find you and that both of you were unharmed…”

He trailed off when he noticed their mood change darkly and he wondered at it.

“Both of you were not… harmed, right?” Iroh began before he trailed off again in alarm when Katara winced and Zuko sent him a dark look.

The sound of approaching feet from opposite sides of the campfire caught their attention and they all tensed, but when they realized it was just Jun and the two guards they relaxed their rigid postures. Zuko again glanced at his uncle, who was frowning anxiously, and he gave him a strained smile.

“I’ll tell you…everything later,” he said quietly.

Iroh gave a short nod before he stood up to greet Jun, who was now brushing Nyla’s dark brown fur, and he immediately began to flirt with her to the amusement of Zuko, Katara, and the guards, and to the annoyance of one bounty hunter.
“So how long have you and Angry Boy been together?” Jun asked nonchalantly with a smirk on her painted lips.

Katara jumped at the sudden question and almost dropped the blankets she was holding. She felt a blush coming to her cheeks when Jun’s smirk widened and she scowled at the older woman.

“It’s none of your business, Jun,” Katara responded dismissively as she returned her attention on her task of collecting things from around the now extinguished campfire.

Jun raised a thin eyebrow from her place against Nyla’s side where she was leaning casually as she watched the waterbender going about her duty. She raised her hand and looked at her nails disinterestedly.

“It must be fun playing around with both the Fire Lord and the Avatar. I like men with power too,” Jun commented suggestively as she looked away from her nails to glance at the Water Tribe woman.

A horrified gasp escaped Katara as she whirled around to glare indignantly at the smirking bounty hunter.

“I’m not playing around with both of them!” she hissed out, barely catching herself from screaming, which would have caused the men to hear and become attentive. “I broke up with Aang because I’m in love with Zuko and I didn’t want to hurt him! And Zuko and I just recently got together!”

Jun’s eyes widened at the waterbender’s outburst before her usual mocking smirk pulled at her lips. Katara groaned for spilling the truth out when it had been she that had insisted nobody found out, at least not yet.

“I see,” Jun remarked with a grin before she shrugged, her long dark hair spilling over her tattooed shoulder. “But I don’t see the problem if it was like that.”

“Only you would think that,” Katara muttered under her breath before she sighed as she looked Jun straight in the eye. “Please don’t tell anyone,” she forced herself to plead to the older woman.

“Hm, but this kind of news could bring me another large bag of gold,” Jun mused as she stroked her
At the blue-eyed woman’s gasp, Jun chuckled amusedly before she shrugged and waved her hand glibly in the air.

“But I don’t want the Fire Lord’s wrath to fall on me, so I’ll keep my mouth shut.”

Katara’s stiff shoulders relaxed and she let out a mental sigh of relief. She just hoped Jun would keep her word or else there will be trouble. Katara turned away from the smirking woman and continued stuffing the rest of their belongings into the bags while the men tended to the ostrich-horses and tied the bags that were ready to their saddles. They had been riding for a few weeks and the land had once again changed from rocky terrain to a thin forest now that they were close to the colony and the sea.

Discreetly shifting her eyes in Zuko’s direction, Katara watched as he saddled his own ostrich-horse, the muscles of his arms flexing as he worked, and a dreamy sigh full of longing escaped her. They had been sleeping separately every night for the past few weeks in order not to raise any suspicions, and other than riding together, they had not been close to each other. La, she missed him, missed being held by him, missed kissing him, sleeping close to his warm side, missed their small intimate moments…

“Have you slept with him already?” Jun’s whispered voice near her ear startled her out of her pleasant thoughts.

Katara jumped away from Jun—who had been leaning behind her and watching the Fire Lord as well—and blushed furiously as her heart began to pound rapidly in her chest as memories of what Zuko and she had done so far flashed before her eyes. When Jun crossed her arms over her chest with a raised eyebrow and a knowing smirk, Katara felt her face heat up even further.

“That…t-that’s not any of your b-business!” Katara sputtered as she tried to compose herself.

“By not denying it you’re making me think you have,” Jun responded with an amused chuckle.

Blushing darkly, Katara struggled to come up with a retort, but Jun leaned away from her with an unaffected shrug.
“I don’t see what’s so wrong if you had,” the female bounty hunter commented as she rolled her eyes at the blushing waterbender. Jun’s mood suddenly changed and a sultry smirk curled her painted lips as her eyes again traveled leeringly toward the Fire Lord who was now placing the bridle on his ostrich-horse.

“Maybe instead of Angry Boy I should say Angry Man, don’t you think?” Jun commented as her dark eyes raked the oblivious firebender’s tall form. “He sure grew into a fine male. I wonder if he’s good in bed as he is in firebending…”

Angry, narrowed blue eyes were aimed at the older woman as Katara’s embarrassed face suddenly turned cold and almost frightening as she stepped before Jun to block her view of Zuko. Her hands fist ed at her sides as she fought to control herself from scratching Jun’s leering eyes out.

“If you don’t want to find yourself in the bottom of the sea you better back off! Zuko is mine!” she hissed out through gritted teeth.

Katara brought a hand to her mouth and she stared wide-eyed at Jun who was gaping at her before her usual smirk replaced her shock.

“I was just saying. No need to bite my head off,” Jun remarked wryly before she smirked. “Besides, I always had a feeling that both of you were meant for each other since that day he handed me your necklace, we found you, and he captured you.”

Katara felt her heart skip a beat at Jun’s words, but before she could say anything the bounty hunter turned around and made her way to Nyla, who was patiently waiting for her master.

Still stunned at her outburst, Katara watched as Jun walked away before she resumed packing as a light blush flushed her cheeks. The jealous and possessive feeling continued to churn inside her and she took a few breaths to calm herself down. She had wanted to slap Jun for daring to stare at Zuko just like how she wanted to do to the women on Ember Island and the waitress at the inn from the village. Never before had she felt so possessive over someone and she did not know if she really liked the feeling. But now she understood what Zuko felt when other men approached her.

Straightening after closing the bag, Katara’s eyes again wandered toward Zuko and her heart once again fluttered at the sight of him. As if he felt her eyes on him, Zuko turned away from the ostrich-horse to look her way and they smiled at each other. Katara grabbed the bag into her arms and quickly made her way to him when she noticed that everybody else was almost ready to depart.
Either way, Zuko is mine and I am not going to let some other woman take him away from me! Katara vowed fervently in her head as Zuko smiled at her after taking the bag from her and tying it on the saddle.

“Are you ready?” Zuko asked.

“Yes,” Katara replied with her own smile.

Zuko moved closer to her before he grabbed her around her waist and lifted her onto the saddle so that she was sitting sideways facing him. Katara looked down into his amber eyes while he stared up into her cobalt orbs as he trailed his hands down from her waist, down her hips, and down her thighs until they rested on her knees. Katara bit her lip to stifle a moan at his touch while Zuko gazed at her with a smoldering expression.

“Nephew, do you really want to continue riding? The sun is almost setting, after all,” Iroh’s words broke their concentration from each other and brought them back to reality.

Zuko immediately moved his hands away from Katara and cleared his throat as he calmly climbed onto the saddle behind her, taking the reins in one hand while with the other he placed it lightly around Katara’s middle, before he turned to look impassively at his uncle who was too busy watching the bounty hunter to notice both agitated youths.

“I am impatient to return to the Fire Nation,” Zuko responded coolly as he moved his gaze to his awaiting guards, “And we are just a few miles away from the colony, aren’t we?”

The oldest of his personal guards pulled out a map from one of the bags tied to his mount, and after scanning it, he looked up to nod at his lord.

“If we continue riding we will arrive at the colony sometime late in the middle of the night or early at dawn, my lord,” he confirmed before he rolled up the map and replaced it in the bag.

“In the middle of the night would be best so that way we won’t attract attention from too many people and would be able to leave on the flagship the next day,” Zuko stated unemotionally.

“I believe that is a good idea, Nephew,” Iroh agreed from atop his ostrich-horse with a nod of his head.
The old firebender then turned around to smile at Jun who was also settled on her shirshu. Jun caught his smile and she gave him a bored look, which did not discourage him at all as he rode up next to her and began to talk charmingly to her. Although Jun replied to him in short, clipped words, Katara could tell that Jun was warming up to the charismatic man’s chatter. Katara looked up to smile at Zuko who only shook his head as he flicked his reins and set out on the grassy path with the rest following behind them.

Jun’s last words continued to bounce in her head and Katara leaned back against Zuko with a smile. ~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

As night settled, the small group found themselves riding through the dark since the small slip of a moon was being hidden by large, wispy clouds. Not wanting to draw attention to themselves and possibly risk being seen or attacked, the guard that was ahead of the group was the only one holding a small flame in his palm to lead him in the darkness while the rest followed after the small light. The younger guard was then ordered by Zuko to ride ahead of them into the village in order to prepare the governor for the Fire Lord’s arrival. As the hours passed late into the night, whatever conversation they made was low and almost in whispers.

Riding on the quiet ostrich-horse behind the rest of the group with Katara leaning against his chest in front of him, Zuko watched with slight amusement as Iroh continued to flirt with Jun despite the fact that she had snapped at him and told him she was leaving after she received her reward money. He glanced down at Katara, who had been silent since they set out, and his arm tightened subtly around her waist, smiling when she let out a small sigh before she leaned a bit closer to him. She was sitting astride and the feeling of her legs pressed against his made heat flare through him. He did not like that he was only able to hold her when they were riding on the ostrich-horse, he did not like that he was unable to embrace her, sleep next to her, kiss her lovely lips, and be intimate with her whenever he wanted.

He mentally shook his head to get rid of his annoyance before he cleared his throat slightly to gain Katara’s attention.

“What were you and Jun talking about earlier?” he asked her curiously as he bent his head down closer to hers.

Katara stiffened slightly at his words before she shrugged her shoulders in an indifferent manner.

“Oh, it was nothing that important,” she replied coolly as she waved one hand dismissively in the air.
“It can’t be ‘nothing’ since you were glaring at her quite menacingly,” Zuko chuckled next to her ear.

Katara crossed her arms beneath her breasts and pressed her lips tightly together as her anger once again resurfaced, but she refused to admit about the way she had reacted to Jun’s words and suggestive looks. But when Zuko insisted she tell him, Katara sighed reluctantly.

“She kept asking about my relationship with you and if we… had slept with each other already,” Katara muttered irritably. “Then she had the nerve to look at and think lustfully of you right in front of me!”

“Really?” Zuko commented with a raised eyebrow before he leaned closer to Katara. “And what did you tell her?” he asked her curiously.

His warm breath coasting along the skin of her ear and cheek made Katara shiver, but she shook her head to clear her thoughts. She glanced at the three riding ahead of them, and once she was sure that they could not hear their conversation she relaxed a bit.

“I-I kind of…threatened her to back off,” Katara began quietly as she shifted uneasily in the saddle before she straightened and her eyes narrowed, “And then I told her you were mine!”

Zuko’s golden eyes widened in surprise at her fervent words and he felt his heart thump in his chest, a warm tingle racing straight down to his groin at the possessiveness in her tone. Nobody had ever felt possessive of him before—well except for Mai recently, but it did not affect him much—and he would not have appreciated it. But with Katara he felt that he did not mind, in fact he relished in it for now he knew that he was not the only one who felt too possessive in their relationship.

“I like it when you get possessive of me,” Zuko told her in a low, husky voice.

“It…it doesn’t bother you?” Katara asked him hesitantly as a frown settled on her face.

“No,” Zuko admitted quietly as he gave her middle a squeeze, “because I know it means that you really love me and that you wish no one but you could have me. It’s the same way I feel about you.”

A soft sigh escaped him, his exhale ruffled Katara’s hair and warmed her skin, and he again gave her a squeeze but this time a bit more lightly, as if to soften his words.
“I know I have been acting very possessive with you, and perhaps it bothers you,” Zuko began before his hold on her tightened again, “but I can’t stop the possessive and protective feelings from surfacing when I’m around you, especially after what happened at…Jianguo’s camp. I just don’t want to lose you, Katara, either to another man or to…death.”

Katara blushed, and her heart fluttered in her chest. How did Zuko always manage to find the right words to soothe her, anger her, humor her, make her blush, happy, aroused, comforted, and protected? To make her fall in love with him more than she thought was possible? She smiled and she leaned back against him once again.

“It did kind of bothered me at first,” Katara confessed quietly as she settled her hand lightly over his hand that was holding her against him before she dropped it to her lap as she lifted her head to give him a small smile. “But not as much now since I’m being possessive myself, after all. Besides, I really like it when you get protective and possessive of me…as long as you don’t overdo it and lock me away somewhere so nobody can get near me.”

Zuko hummed as he stroked his chin with a pensive look on his face.

“Hm, locking you away sounds like a great idea,” he began in a contemplative tone before he continued huskily, “That way I can have you all to myself.”

“Zuko!” Katara hissed out quietly as she glared at him.

Zuko chuckled at her reaction before he calmed himself down and smiled at her.

“I’m kidding,” he replied coolly before his tone became soft, “Locking you up would not only make you hate me, but it will kill your spirit, and I don’t want that since it is one of the things that I love about you.”

Katara’s annoyed expression turn into a brilliant smile. Zuko’s breath caught in his throat at the sight of her, despite the fact that he could barely see her in the dark, and he remembered that he had been separated from her, that he had not enjoyed her company that way he wished for a long time. Katara raised an eyebrow when she noticed Zuko staring intently at her.

“You must be cold,” he suddenly spoke up.
Confused at his sudden words, Katara opened her mouth to say she was fine, but she was puzzled when Zuko unclasped and lifted both ends of the dark cloak that Iroh had given him and wrapped her in it before tying it again so that both were completely covered by it. Before Katara could figure out what was going on, she felt Zuko’s large hand on her left breast and she let out a quiet gasp.

“Z-Zuko! What are you d-doing?” she stammered in a whisper, but another gasp escaped her when she felt his other hand settle on her right thigh.

“I can’t help it, Katara,” Zuko growled lowly in her ear as he gave her breast a soft squeeze. “I missed touching you like this since Uncle found us. I want to touch you again, to please you again.”

“We can’t!” Katara exclaimed, scandalized. “We’re not alone!”

“The others aren’t paying attention to us at the moment, it’s dark and we are covered,” Zuko countered huskily.

“But—” Katara began but she had to bite her lip to keep from moaning when Zuko pinched her hardening nipple.

Zuko slightly pulled on the reins that he was holding on his right hand in order to slow the ostrich-horse down a bit so they could be away from the rest just in case they decided to turn their way, as well as for Katara’s comfort. Once he was satisfied they were a safe distance that they could not be heard and the others would not suspect what they were doing, Zuko wrapped the reins around his wrist and pulled Katara closer to him by pressing her breast until her back was against his chest.

“Zuko…stop,” Katara moaned out when Zuko began to knead her covered breast.

She held her breath when his other hand trailed up her thigh. Since she was sitting astride the ostrich-horse, Zuko was able to easily rest his hand on the warm spot between her parted legs. She jerked and gasped.

“No! We can’t—”

“Don’t worry,” Zuko soothed her quietly. “They can’t see us and as long as we keep quiet they Katara again bit her lip and her eyes darted to where the others were riding ahead of them. That was when she realized that she could not really see them since they were a bit far ahead, and with the only light visible being from the guard’s small flame, she could hardly recognize their forms. But still, what Zuko wanted to do was just too embarrassing.

“Please, Katara,” Zuko’s persuasive voice reached her ears. “Let me touch you, let me be close to you like I’ve been craving for the past several nights.”

Biting her lip in indecision, Katara closed her eyes as she tried to sort through her feelings. A part of her recoiled at the thought of doing such things out in the open, but another part of her demanded she relent since she felt the same way Zuko did. Besides, they were covered, not only by Zuko’s long cloak but by the darkness as well. She felt Zuko’s heart beating rapidly against her back, his warm breath caressing the side of her face, his left hand cupping her breast lightly while his other hand touched her covered warmth.

Then her eyes flew open when she realized that Zuko’s hands were just resting on her, they were only touching her, not making any more advances, and she realized he was waiting for her consent, that despite how much he wanted to, he would immediately back away if she told him to. Her heart warmed at the realization and she relaxed against him as her body and heart surrendered to him. She placed her hand over the one that was holding onto her breast and she gave him a squeeze to silently encourage him to continue.

Zuko groaned in relief at Katara’s silent permission. He did not know what he would have done if she had refused him. Heart pounding, he again moved his hands to caress her. He slipped his hand beneath her tunic and began to knead Katara’s soft breast more vigorously, pinching her nipple that was hardening beneath her wrappings between his fingers, while his other hand pressed more firmly against her heat, earning a soft moan from her. Katara leaned her head back against his shoulder as her heart began to race in her chest, her skin tingled, and her breathing became more erratic the more Zuko touched her and the more she tried to keep from moaning too loudly.

“Zuko,” Katara moaned softly as she grabbed more tightly onto his hand that was squeezing her sensitive breast.

Zuko pressed his lips together to keep from groaning at her breathless call of his name, the sound of her voice sending another electric shock to his groin, bringing his cock quickly to attention. Katara’s eyes widened when she felt Zuko hardening against her, but she was distracted when he suddenly slipped his hand into her pants. A gasp fell from her lips when his fingers touched her damp core and she trembled in both surprise and anticipation.
Pausing at her gasp, Zuko’s eyes darted toward the group ahead of them, concerned that they might have heard, but he relaxed when it seemed they had not. But nonetheless, he decided to pull the ostrich-horse back until the three ahead of them were only specks of light and shadows before he continued where he had left off. Katara was panting slightly and he smirked in male pride that he already had her in such a state and he had barely touched her.

Grasping her breast more firmly in his hand, Zuko began to gently rub Katara’s sex with the other. It was the third time he had touched her in so intimate a place since that time at the inn and he moaned huskily at the feeling of her soft curls drenched with her arousal. He slid his fingers along her soft folds, coating them with her essence, before he tapped the tip of his middle finger onto the small nub above her entrance, earning a shocked gasp from her. He nudged her head to the side, and once she exposed her throat to him, he pressed his hot mouth to her skin just as his finger delved into her wet pussy. He tightened his hold on her when she jerked before he began to slowly pump his finger inside her in a leisurely rhythm, enjoying the way her wet and warm walls tightened around his finger.

Katara felt like she was going crazy as Zuko continued to move his finger inside her and her mouth opened in a silent gasp when he added another one and increased his speed. She let go of his hand that was rhythmically kneading her breast just as his fingers were caressing her before she brought both her hands down to grasp onto Zuko’s muscular thighs and pressed herself against his hardness. She suppressed a grin when she heard him groan before she began to instinctively move her hips back and forth in order to keep pace with his fingers as well as to stimulate his own pleasure.

Moving his mouth away from her neck, Zuko pressed the side of his face against Katara’s, his eyes shut tightly together, his jaw painfully clenched while he began to move his hips to her movements, pressing his hard cock against her firm ass while slamming his fingers inside her when she moved back and forth into each. He was so close, his pleasure was increasing almost painfully, and sweat was breaking onto his skin as he fought himself to hold on a bit longer. Gods, how he had missed having Katara in such a manner!

Katara pushed her head back onto Zuko’s shoulder, screwing her eyes shut, as that pleasurable feeling Zuko had evoke in her a few times before washed over her, making her stomach tightened and her heart pound. Her hips began to move more desperately and her grasp on Zuko’s thighs tightened as she sought her release, but when Zuko again pressed his thumb on that spot above her entrance, Katara’s mind shattered and her mouth opened in a silent scream as ecstasy raced to every nerve of her body. Just as she reached the peak she ground her bottom almost fiercely against Zuko’s hardness.

Zuko’s hips jerked at the impact, at the feeling of Katara’s drenched pussy convulsing around his fingers, and he bent forward, caging Katara in his arms and bringing her closer to his throbbing erection. His sight blackened for a moment as a sharp tingle went down his spine and straight to his erection before he released himself in thick, hot spurts inside his trousers with a silent growl, the pleasure almost making him fall off the bewildered ostrich-horse.

He forced himself to sit back as both panted and tried to regain their breaths and their senses. Zuko sluggishly released his tight grip on Katara’s breast before he slowly removed his fingers from her tight warmth. Katara mewed softly at the sensation before she sighed and leaned against his heaving chest while Zuko wrapped his arms around her trembling form and dropped his head onto her shoulder with a soft groan.

They were silent for a moment before Zuko pulled one hand from beneath the cape and placed his fingers against Katara’s chin before gently lifting her head up to meet his lips. They kissed unhurriedly yet with no small amount of passion since they had not kissed each other in what they felt was a long time. A slightly cool breeze swept by them and they shivered as it touched their warm skin. They pulled apart to stare silently at each other before Zuko wrapped the dark cloak more securely around them and gently urged Katara to rest her head back onto his chest.

“Once we’re in the Fire Nation we won’t be able to this anymore,” Katara told him with a sigh.

A frown darkened Zuko’s features as his arms tightened around the woman’s body.

“We’ll see,” was his silent reply.

Before Katara could protest, Zuko again grabbed onto the reins and flicked them so the ostrich-horse could pick up its pace and join the others. They were relieved to realize that Iroh and Jun were too busy arguing about something to notice that they had disappeared for a moment. Katara frowned since now she could not argue with Zuko about why she thought it was best they kept their distance from each other once they reached the Fire Nation, though that thought made her sad.

“Sleep, Katara,” Zuko’s whispered baritone reached her ears. “I’ll wake you up once we arrive at the colony.”

Katara wanted to protest and argue that she could stay up, but she gave in when the warmth and comfort of Zuko’s body seeped into her tired and satisfied body, and she could no longer resist, especially since she knew she would not be able to be in this way with Zuko once they arrive at his palace. She snuggled against his firm chest, and sighed quietly when Zuko wound his unoccupied hand around her middle and brought her closer to him, and before she knew it, she was fast asleep.

A small smile touched Zuko’s lips when the sound of Katara’s soft breathing reached his ears and his eyes softened as he looked down to see her sleeping face pressed against his chest. He wanted to bring her closer until she was flushed against him and kiss her cheeks, but he refrained since he was catching up to the others.

He did not know if he would be able to keep his hands off Katara’s lovely body once they arrive at the Fire Nation Palace.

He just hoped Katara would not get too mad.

End of Part Four
The Fire Lord’s magnificent flagship glided swiftly through the choppy waters as a light rain fell upon the great ocean. Gazing out into the sea from the small porthole in his cabin, Zuko watched with wary eyes as gray clouds swirled above them and small waves brushed against the side of the metal ship. Flashes of the last storm surfaced in his mind and his expression turned grim. However, once he was satisfied that it was no huge storm that could cause them trouble, he returned to his desk where his uncle was sitting on one of the chairs before it with a deep frown on his face. Zuko sat on his chair and waited patiently as Iroh processed everything he had recounted from the time Katara and he washed to shore, their encounter with Jianguo, having their bending blocked, their escape, the old couple’s hospitality, the village, and finally ended with the day Iroh had found them with the help of Jun and her shirshu.

His room had been cleaned and tidied up, one would never have guessed that it once had been a complete disaster due to the last storm. Zuko leaned back in his seat and again glanced at the window were the only thing he could make out was the gray of the sky.

After reassuring the colony’s governor about the Fire Lord’s wellbeing and paying Jun her reward money so she could be on her way—much to Iroh’s disappointment—they were finally on their way to the Fire Nation and would be arriving in a few days. Zuko had sent a message to his Council and a letter to his mother to reassure them that he and Katara were fine. Katara had also sent a message to her family, though she only wrote that both Zuko and she were all right and were on their way to Zuko’s palace. He wondered how Katara’s family would react when they learned the whole truth.

He was brought out of his thoughts when Iroh let out a deep sigh before taking a long sip from his tea. Zuko straightened and turned back to his uncle who was again frowning into his teacup.

“We should have known a man such as the ex-general would seek revenge,” Iroh spoke up solemnly, his usual warm eyes glinting in suppressed anger. “Do you have any idea who the traitor within the palace could be that gave Jianguo so much information?”

Zuko placed his elbows on the wooden desk and rested his chin on his grasped hands as he stared at Iroh pensively for a few minutes before he finally spoke up, his features turning dark.

“I think I know who it is.”

“Who?” Iroh asked as he leaned forward curiously, his hands clenching his teacup in anticipation.
“Wei,” Zuko spat angrily.

White eyebrows lifting high on his forehead, Iroh leaned back in his seat in surprise as he watched his nephew curl his hands into tight fists. Another frown settled on his aged face as he rubbed at his chin.

“It does seem likely,” Iroh commented.

“It’s more than just ‘likely’, Uncle,” Zuko growled out lowly. “We all know how much Wei despises me and the fact that I called off the war. Katara, Toph, and I saw him leave the prison tower when we went to see Ozai and I have strong suspicions that Wei may have been seeing him.”

“But how?” Iroh spoke up as he settled his cup on the desk. “No one is allowed to visit Ozai, and except for you, the only other person to have a key to his cell is the captain of the prison guards, who uses it when Ozai’s meal is brought to him. Do you think the captain could be working for them?”

“I don’t know,” Zuko admitted darkly as he rose from his chair and began to pace the length of the cabin. “But why else would Wei be in the prison tower?”

He paused again at the porthole and sighed agitatedly as he ran a hand down his face before he turned back to look at his frowning uncle.

“I told you the reason Jianguo was able to capture me was because they knew I would not escape them if it meant Katara would be harmed,” the young lord continued as his eyes narrowed. “They knew about my affections for her, they knew what she means to me, and they took advantage of that by luring us both toward the ‘infested’ colony. During my birthday celebration Wei had been making hints about Katara, so it could have easily been him who told Jianguo!”

Iroh again rubbed his chin and stroked his small beard as he looked at his angry nephew with a pensive frown.

“You make a very good point, Nephew,” he began slowly, “but it will be difficult to accuse him without proper proof, especially since he’s a nobleman, a Royal Council member, and a very influential person in our society.”

Zuko growled as he abruptly moved away from the window toward his desk where he slammed his fist on the hard surface as he glared at his uncle, who, as usual, was unaffected by his outburst.
“I’ll find the evidence if it’s the last thing I do!” he ground out between gritted teeth before he growled out, “And if Wei is truly the culprit, not even the gods will be able to save him. I swear it, Uncle.”

Iroh was intrigued at the murderous look on his nephew’s face, but before he could comment on it, Zuko sat back down heavily on his large chair and began to rummage through the small stack of papers on his desk.

“I want to hurry and finish with these documents so we can meet Katara for dinner,” Zuko said as he picked one of the scrolls up and began to read.

The retired general was once again curious at the expression on his nephew’s face, although this time the dark look had been replaced by a soft one, and if he was not mistaken, Zuko’s tone had a hint of longing in it. Unable to curb his curiosity and hope any longer, Iroh cleared his throat to get the young firebender’s attention and smiled when Zuko looked up with a raised eyebrow.

“Nephew, I’ve been wanting to ask,” the old man began as he again took his teacup into his hands,
“Did anything happen between Miss Katara and you while both of you were traveling…alone?”

Zuko made sure to keep his expression blank as memories of what Katara and he had done so far surfaced pleasantly in mind.

“What do you mean, Uncle?” he asked instead.

“Well, Miss Katara and you seem much more comfortable around each other than before, so much so that you had no qualms in being comforted by her or of you comforting her,” Iroh commented casually in order not to make Zuko defensive and in the process close himself off.

“Nothing too drastic happened,” Zuko confessed with a small shrug before his lips curled into a satisfied smile. “And if it did, it wouldn’t really matter since Katara is going to be my wife soon anyway.”

Iroh almost dropped his cup as he stared in wide-eyed shock at his smirking nephew.
“W-what did you say, Zuko?” he asked incredulously as he placed the teacup on the table. He was almost sure he had imagined it.

Zuko suppressed a chuckle at his uncle’s skeptical yet hopeful look and he smiled.

“Katara has agreed to marry me,” he said, the smile on his face growing a bit wider. “She is going to be mine. She’s going to be my wife, Uncle.”

Iroh grinned widely as he leapt from his seat with a joyful cry before moving around the desk to grasped Zuko’s arm and clap him on the back.

“Congratulations, Zuko!” Iroh exclaimed enthusiastically. “You have no idea how long I have waited to hear such words! Your mother is going to be so overjoyed with the news!” he continued rapidly as he made his way back to his seat where he smiled widely at his amused nephew.

“Thank you, Uncle,” Zuko said simply and sincerely.

“You know, Nephew,” the retired general began with a large smirk on his face and a teasing glint in his eyes, “I was beginning to resign myself of never having grandnephews and nieces. I had begun to worry at your denseness.”

Zuko scowled him, but Iroh just smiled as he took a small sip from his tea. The delighted smile on Iroh’s face faded a bit and he frowned.

“But what about Mai and Aang?” he asked tentatively.

Zuko’s eyes narrowed before he shrugged.

“I ended things with Mai and Katara broke up with Aang before we left the Fire Nation,” he explained in a cool tone. “Now there is nothing to keep me from marrying Katara.”

“Well, that does make things easier for both of you,” the retired general commented with a smile.
“Somehow, I doubt it,” Zuko muttered. “I still have to ask Chief Hakoda for Katara’s hand in marriage.”

“Don’t worry, Nephew, all men have to go through such a thing at one point in their lives,” he said amusedly. “Let us just hope Chief Hakoda and Master Sokka go easy on you.”

He chuckled when Zuko let out a disgruntled grunt.

“So have you planned on when to have the wedding?” Iroh continued excitedly. “We must start immediately with the preparations! And we must send invitations to everybody! Oh, and you and Miss Katara must have a celebration to announce your engagement! And—”

“Uncle!” Zuko interrupted with a frown. When his uncle turned to him, he leaned back in his seat with a long sigh.

“Please keep my engagement to Katara a secret for now,” he said sullenly.

“I don’t want to keep it a secret!” Zuko growled out. “If it were up to me, I would have announced my intentions to take Katara as my wife as soon as we arrived at the colony! But Katara wants to talk to her family and to…Aang first.”

Iroh tried to protest the idea before he relented when Zuko told him firmly that it was what Katara wanted and he would not break his promise to her. They were silent for a moment as Zuko concentrated on his papers while Iroh inwardly mused about the upcoming royal wedding. Iroh just hoped the Court Council would not object to Zuko marrying the Water Tribe woman.

“Zuko, could you answer a curious old man’s question?” Iroh spoke up, breaking the silence beyond the sounds of the rain outside.

“Alright,” Zuko relented with a weary sigh as he placed the scroll he had been holding aside before looking up at his uncle with a cautious frown.
“What happened to finally make you and Katara confess your feelings to each other?” the old man asked with a large grin. But his curious grin dropped when he noticed Zuko tense and a dark expression appear across his face.

“What’s wrong?” Iroh asked in alarm.

“If it wasn’t for a near tragedy, I don’t know how long I would’ve taken before confessing my feelings to her,” Zuko began with a rough edge to his voice. “Agni, I was so stupid. I was such a coward for not letting her know sooner,” he growled out as he clutched his unbound, dark hair with his fingers.

“What are you talking about?” the old prince asked him with a concerned frown.

Zuko glanced at his uncle briefly before he looked down at his clenched fists now resting on the desk.

“I told you Katara and I escaped because I killed the men Jianguo left behind to guard us while he and the rest left toward the colony, right?” Zuko began in a low tone.

“Yes,” Iroh said slowly as he eyed his nephew curiously.

“Well, I didn’t tell you the real reason why I attacked them without mercy and without caring that it was me against ten of them,” Zuko told him as his eyes flashed in anger at the memory before he closed his eyes and clenched his hands.

“They…they wanted to…hurt Katara,” he said lowly and nodded when understanding came to Iroh who then gave him a worried look. “I wasn’t about to let them touch her, so I fought against the one who wanted to hurt her, but once he realized he could not win against me…he attacked Katara before I could stop him.”

Zuko clenched his jaw tightly and his nostrils flared at the memory of Feng wounding Katara before the bastard dared make a joke while she lay injured on the forest floor.

“The sight of Katara’s blood spilling around her, of her terrified and pained eyes, I…I just,” Zuko growled out as he stared at his hands before he snapped his head up to look at a wide-eyed Iroh with furious features, “I lost it, Uncle! I never felt so much rage in my entire life. I never wanted to kill someone as much as I wanted to kill them for hurting Katara! So I did. I killed them, ignoring their pleas for mercy.”

Taking a deep breath to rein in his turbulent emotions, Zuko unclenched his hands and ran them through his hair as Iroh waited for him to continue.

“I wanted to make them suffer before I ended their lives, but the only thing that stopped me from doing so was the urgent need to take Katara to the stream so she could heal her wound. But once I finally managed to place her in the water, she was already too weak…she had lost so much blood.” Zuko paused and drew in a painful breath as he glanced down at the desk before him.

“Katara…died,” he rasped out and squeezed his eyes shut. “She died in my arms. I almost lost her, Uncle!”

Iroh gasped in horror at his nephew’s words laced with pain and remorse, and he now understood the saddened look Katara had and the dark expression Zuko wore when he had asked earlier if they had been hurt.

“But…how…?” Iroh began before he trailed off as he placed a hand over his chest, “Oh, Agni.”

Zuko sighed and he slumped in his chair as he once again lifted his head to look at his uncle sitting across from him with a confused and horrified expression.

“I held Katara’s cold body in my arms as I raged at the gods to return her to me,” Zuko continued, his voice subdued. “I don’t know how it happened, or if perhaps the gods took pity on me, but Katara came back to life. She was weak from all the blood loss, but she was alive and I was not about to let her go, so I confessed my feelings to her, not caring if she rejected me.”

The Fire Lord let out a humorless chuckle as he smiled at his uncle.

“It really does take losing something important, or having the threat that they will be taken away, to make us understand its worth,” he said.

Iroh nodded in understanding as he gave his nephew a small smile.
“I have once before said that destiny is a funny thing,” he commented with a low chuckle.

“It sure is, Uncle,” Zuko agreed.

“But Katara is indeed fine?” Iroh asked with concern.

“Yes, there is no evidence that she had been injured at all,” Zuko reassured him.

Iroh cocked his bushy eyebrow as he wondered how Zuko would know such a thing, but decided he really did not want to know. All that mattered was that Katara was all right. Of course, that did not stop him from asking Zuko how he confessed his love for the lovely waterbender, and of course, his nephew refused to give him any good details except that he had told Katara his true feelings and she had confessed her love for him in return.

“Didn’t I tell you to trust me when I said that you had not lost Miss Katara’s love?” Iroh said with a cheerful grin.

“Why couldn’t you have just told me and saved me the misery of thinking I never had a chance?” Zuko asked with a small growl.

“And what would be the fun it that?” the old firebender commented innocently.

He sighed when his nephew glowered at him.

“I told you it was something that was between Miss Katara and you, and now look! Didn’t you find peace and happiness by telling Katara you love her and finding out what her response truly was?”

“I suppose you are right,” Zuko conceded reluctantly.

“And you are happy, correct?” Iroh prompted with a grin.

“I am in love and I am loved, Uncle,” Zuko answered quietly with a small smile. “Two things I thought would be impossible for me to experience in my life.” His eyes narrowed. “And I will not... lose them.”

An understanding and happy smile stretched Iroh’s thin lips as he sat back contentedly on his seat.

“I am happy to hear you say so, my nephew,” he admitted, the smile still on his face. “And I am very grateful to Miss Katara for making you this happy.”

“I would be even happier if she agreed to allow me to announce our engagement as soon as we arrive at the Fire Nation,” was Zuko’s muttered reply as he returned his attention to his forgotten papers.

Iroh chuckled loudly at his disgruntled words and laughed more loudly when his nephew scowled darkly at him.

“I am still curious to know how you were able to defeat ten men all by yourself while you had your bending blocked,” Iroh decided to change the subject before his nephew kicked him out for teasing him too much.

The old prince was once again intrigued by the smug smirk that appeared on the young Fire Lord’s face and he raised a thick eyebrow in interest.

“I was able to call forth a new level of firebending,” Zuko replied vaguely.

“And by this you mean…?” Iroh pressed with an inquisitive frown.

His frown deepened in curiosity as he watched his nephew raised his hands and light them with fire before Zuko closed his eyes and relaxed his features and body in concentration, while his breathing became steady and regular. A long moment passed with nothing occurring and Iroh began to wonder what his nephew was up to and if perhaps he planned not to say anything. He opened his mouth to get Zuko’s attention, but his words caught in his throat and he choked as the bright red fire in his nephew’s palms expanded and then changed into a lighter color.

“White fire,” Iroh breathed in incredulity and awe as he stared at the white flames before he raised his eyes to see Zuko’s satisfied face. “Zuko, you’re bending white fire!”
“I know,” Zuko responded with a low chuckle at his uncle’s amazed expression. “This is what helped me get rid of all those bastards that wanted to hurt Katara.”

“B-but how?” Iroh sputtered before he collected himself and smiled proudly at his nephew. “I mean, the last person known to have been able to bend this high level of fire lived many, many years ago! And it is said that not many firebenders will be able to achieve such a skill. So how did you do it, Nephew?”

“I don’t really know,” Zuko began with a frown before he clenched his flaming fist. “The rage that consumed me when Katara was hurt was so great that my suppressed inner fire just exploded from within me.”

The white flames flared at his heated emotions and Zuko took a calming breath to control the flickering fire before he looked at his uncle.

“But I don’t want my anger to control my bending,” Zuko continued and they both knew he refrained from saying ‘again.’

Zuko could feel himself tiring out, so after a deep exhale, he extinguished the white flames.

“I also can’t bend the white fire for too long for I tire too easily,” he explained before he asked, “Do you think it takes more energy to bend such fire?”

Iroh leaned back in his seat with a contemplative look as he stroked his chin.

“That is a very good question that, unfortunately, I cannot answer at the moment,” he began before he smiled encouragingly. “But I am sure we can find some old scrolls concerning everything there is to know about the art of bending white fire in the palace library.”

“You’re right,” Zuko agreed with a nod. It had been a while since he had visited the library last.

“You’ll see that with some practice you will master the white fire as well,” Iroh told him confidently. He placed his hands inside his sleeves and his eyes widened when his fingers came in contact with metal.

“Oh! I almost forgot to return this to you,” Iroh exclaimed as he extracted his hand from his sleeve and revealed the Fire Lord’s golden fire crown.

Zuko reverently took it from Iroh’s outstretched hand and stroked the cool metal with his thumb as he gazed down at it.

“Thank you, Uncle,” he said as he placed the fire crown inside one of the drawers of his desk so he would not misplace it. He planned to wear it again tomorrow.

“I also have something that belongs to Katara,” Iroh continued with a smile as he reached into his other sleeve and pulled out the silver rose hairpin before handing it to his nephew.

Zuko immediately took it before he smiled gratefully at his uncle.

“We should go to dinner now,” the retired general spoke up before he chuckled. “I’m pretty sure Miss Katara is as anxious to see you as you are to see her. Am I right?”

“Uncle,” Zuko groaned exasperatedly when the old man waggled his eyebrows at him.

It was early in the morning as the Fire Nation citizens crowded along the street that led to the palace, watching a group of guards mounted on komodo rhinos and surrounding their Fire Lord who was riding beside a carriage. If they looked into the opened windows they could see Lady Katara peeking out as she took in the sight of the bustling city. The people welcomed their lord and the master waterbender enthusiastically since there had been rumors that they had either died or had been kidnapped, and although they did not know if the latter was true, they were just glad to know their Fire Lord and Lady Katara were back and safe. The people remained outside the palace walls speculating about the events even after the Fire Lord, the guards, and the carriage disappeared behind the large steel doors.

Zuko breathed a mental sigh of relief once they entered the courtyard. He did not like to be surrounded by so many loud people, especially since he did not know how to react when said crowd was cheering at his return instead of hurling insults.

Riding expertly on his black komodo rhino, the young Fire Lord once again glanced at the window of the carriage and smiled slightly when Katara caught his eye and blushed before she was distracted when Iroh, who was sitting across from her, engaged her in conversion. Zuko returned his gaze back ahead of him and suppressed the smug smirk that wanted to appear on his face. Ever since they had pleased each other on that ostrich-horse, Katara had been unable to look at him without blushing, and every time he saw that lovely blush on her cheeks, he felt his body warm up. He had wanted to ride into his palace with Katara sitting in front him so he could have an excuse to have her lovely body pressed to his, but his uncle had convinced him it would be better if Katara rode on the carriage so as not to start any rumors.

When they arrived closer to the palace, Zuko noticed his mother standing atop the long flight of stairs with Jee standing at her side. The young Fire Lord felt an immense relief wash through him to see that his mother was indeed fine and he pressed his booted heel against his rhino’s side in order to increase its pace. He watched as his mother smiled brightly before she quickly made her way down the stairs, clutching her long robe with one hand as she descended.

Zuko dismounted from his komodo rhino and handed the reins to one of the stablemen before making his way to the carriage. He waved away the carriage driver, who backed away with a bow, and opened the door. He smiled as he offered his hand to Katara who blushed as she took it and allowed him to help her out of the carriage.

“Thanks,” she muttered once she was standing outside and slipped her hand away from his in order to smooth the dark red dress she had hastily packed when they had first made their way toward the colony.

“You’re welcome;” Zuko responded with a smoldering look.

Again, Katara felt her cheeks heat up since she could not stop remembering what they had done on that ostrich-horse before she scowled when Zuko smirked knowingly at her. Fortunately, Zuko decided to stop when Iroh cleared his throat as he stepped out of the carriage.

Zuko glanced at the grinning old man briefly before he turned away in order to go greet his mother, who had already reached the bottom of the stairs and was running swiftly toward them. Jee trailed a bit slower behind her. Katara watched with a smile as Zuko quickened his pace and opened his arms so his mother could embrace him as tears ran down her pale cheeks. The guards and servants pretended not to notice the scene and looked elsewhere.

“Zuko, my son, I was so worried,” Ursa cried out softly. “I was afraid that I might have lost you so soon after finding you again. I don’t know what I would have done if that had been so.”

Zuko’s arms tightened slightly around his mother before he pulled back to look at her—to make sure she was indeed alright—just as Katara and Iroh approached them.
“I’m sorry to have worried you, Mom,” he told her sincerely. “But I’m fine now and I won’t let anything take me away from you…and Katara,” he added softly.

He glanced at Katara who was blushing again before he looked back at his mother who was staring at them both with wide eyes. Ursa moved away from him and walked toward Katara who smiled at her.

“Katara dear, I am so relieved to know you are well,” the older woman told her sincerely as she embraced the waterbender.

“Thank you, Lady Ursa,” Katara responded as she returned the motherly embrace. She was reminded of her own mother for a moment before thoughts of her family surfaced in her mind. She hoped she could see them soon.

They pulled apart and smiled at each other just as Jee finally approached them.

“My lord, Lady Katara,” Jee began as he bowed, “I am very glad to see that both of you have returned safely.”

“Thank you, Admiral Jee,” Zuko responded as he graced his admiral with a small smile. “And thank you for keeping my mother safe.”

Jee smiled and gave another small bow. The small group finally made their way into the palace while the servants scurried to do their duties and the guards returned to their posts.

“You should refresh yourselves and rest before lunch,” Ursa suggested as she turned to smile at her son, Katara, and Iroh. “And then you can tell me what has happened since you left the Fire Nation.”

“That is a great idea, my dear Ursa!” Iroh exclaimed beside her.

“I would like a real bath again,” Katara chimed in with a soft laugh.

“Then we will meet in my antechamber for lunch,” Zuko spoke up as he led them toward the western wing of the palace where some of the guest rooms, the royal family quarters, and his privates
When they were standing outside the room Katara had used since her first visit, the two young benders looked at her door before they glanced at each other.

“Uh, well, I’ll see you all for lunch then,” the waterbender said, though she was staring at Zuko only.

“Yes,” Zuko responded without taking his eyes away from hers. His hands twitched at his sides as he curbed the need to tug Katara to him.

They were pulled away from each other when they heard Iroh clear his throat before he chuckled quietly. With a blush, Katara opened the door and quickly stepped inside before she closed the door behind her. Zuko ignored his uncle as he turned away and made his way to his rooms without saying another word.

Ursa watched as her son walked down the golden corridor before she glanced at the closed door where Katara had disappeared to, and then looked at her son’s retreating form again before she looked at Iroh with a raised, thin eyebrow.

Iroh smiled widely at her as he said, “I am positive you will hear good news soon, Ursa.” He chuckled again as he turned away to retire to his own room.

Ursa watched him go before she glanced at Jee who looked at her with an equally bewildered expression.

Zuko sat on the dais in the throne room with the wall of fire blazing warmly before him. He had just finished a pleasant lunch with Katara and his family and now he was having a much needed meeting with his advisors. Iroh and Jee had decided to accompany him and were sitting off to one side. He had just recounted some of the things that had occurred since he and Katara had left after they received that false message, and now he was silently listening to his advisors tell him how glad they were he was all right and that they had been worried that it might have been true that he was captured for they had been concerned of the right course of action.

“Even though we did not wish you and Lady Katara any harm, we could not release Ozai, not with the Fire Nation prospering so well,” Advisor Chao spoke up and he gave the young lord a respectful bow.
Zuko gave him a small nod before he let his eyes wander among his advisors.

“That would have been the best solution and I would have expected such from you all,” Zuko told them with a cool tone. “We cannot allow Ozai to escape and cause destruction to our nation and the world.”

He paused as the Court Council members murmured in agreement amongst themselves, but Zuko barely heard their words since his attention was focused on Wei who had been unusually quiet since the meeting had commenced.

He is probably disappointed that their plan failed, Zuko thought as he narrowed his eyes at the old advisor.

“You seem strangely quiet today, Advisor Wei,” Zuko spoke up suddenly in a deceptively calm tone. “Is there a reason for such behavior?”

Wei raised a thick gray eyebrow before he gave a small shrug of his shoulders, his round belly shaking at the movement.

“Of course not, Young One,” the advisor said with a small sneer. “I am just surprised that you managed to escape, after all, you said you were captured by a large group of rebels.”

“Is it surprise or disappointment you feel?” Zuko questioned casually.

“My lord?” Wei asked as his eyebrow once again lifted high on his wrinkly forehead.

“I have great suspicions that you are the traitor who has sent all those anonymous letters and the one who made it possible for the rebels to capture Lady Katara and me,” Zuko announced with a slight growl.

The meeting room went completely silent as the advisors looked in shock between the impassive Fire Lord and the wide-eyed Wei before they began to murmur quietly with each other. Wei shook his head as he recovered himself, straightened his back and narrowed his dark eyes.
“I do not appreciate being accused of something I had no part in,” Wei growled out indignantly.

Zuko’s nostrils flared as he swiftly dismissed everybody except for his uncle, Jee, and Chao as he stared Wei down. The other men reluctantly followed their lord’s order, though they were curious to know what was going to happen. Once the large doors were closed behind them, Zuko pinned an angry glare at the old advisor who was glaring back at him.

“I have many reasons to believe you are the culprit for what has happened,” he said darkly.

“I would like to know what those reasons are for you are wrong,” Wei demanded as he crossed his arms over his chest.

“Did you eagerly comply with Jianguo’s demands for Ozai’s release?” Zuko asked instead.

“My lord?” Chao spoke up quietly and swallowed when the Fire Lord turned piercing, golden eyes on him. “Advisor Wei actually was one of the first to refuse to do such a thing.”

Zuko was surprised at Chao’s words, but his facial features did not show it as he raised an incredulous eyebrow at him before he turned to glare suspiciously at Wei.

“I find that hard to believe,” he said coldly.

Yet maybe not, since Wei has always shown his dislike of me, and if Jianguo’s demands were not met I would have been killed, thus getting rid of me, Zuko thought.

Wei seemed to understand what he was thinking for he shrugged as he said, “I know we never got along, Young One, and I never hid my dislike of you, but I love the Fire Nation and I want to keep it safe.”

“If you want to keep the Fire Nation safe, then why did you want the war to continue?” Zuko countered.

“That was four years ago and my views have changed slightly,” Wei answered smoothly. “Although I still think the Fire Nation has the right to rule the other nations as the superior element,” he added with another shrug. “And besides, if Ozai was released he would not hesitate to kill us all for agreeing to be part of your new rule, and I am no fool to think Ozai would spare me, even if I disagreed with you many times.”

Zuko was silent as Wei’s words reached him. Wei may have argued about his new rule and his decision to end the war, but the advisor had never said that he supported Ozai. Was what he was saying the truth or all lies?

“Besides,” Wei continued with a dry chuckle, “Ozai has no army to back him except for a bunch of dirty rebels, so how could he dream of defeating the great Fire Nation Army? I would be a fool to ally myself to the side that will, undoubtedly, lose very quickly.”

Though he did not show it, Zuko was confused and irritated for Wei had an answer to everything and it all made sense, but he still had his suspicions and he will not let himself be deceived so easily.

“I saw you leave the prison tower where Ozai is held,” Zuko said in the same unaffected tone as if all he heard did not matter.

“I visit my younger brother who was one of the foolish ones who rebelled against your rule when you first became Fire Lord,” Wei responded with another casual shrug.

_Damn!_ He had been sure he would have caught Wei with that one.

Zuko glanced at his uncle, who was scowling slightly at Wei, before he glanced at Jee and Chao who were frowning, uncertain of what was happening or what they should do. He took a deep breath to prepare himself for the next reason for his suspicions.

“During my twenty-first birthday celebration, you were asking many questions regarding my… relationship with Lady Katara,” Zuko began with narrowed eyes. “Jianguo and his men knew Lady Katara is…important to me.”

“I am not the only one aware of the affection you hold for the waterbender,” Wei replied with another shrug and a small smirk.

Zuko frowned slightly since he had thought he was being discreet about his feelings for Katara. He was brought of his thoughts when Wei spoke up again.
“Are you done accusing me of such nonsense?” the advisor ground out with an annoyed expression on his round face.

Zuko leveled an irate glare at him.

“For now, you are dismissed,” Zuko growled out as he waved his hand irritably at him.

Wei glared indignantly as he stood up. He gave a stiff bow before he made his way to the doors and left once they were opened for him.

The three men who had been silent during the exchange glanced at each other before they looked questioningly at their silent lord. They watched as he stood up from his throne and swiftly descended the marble stairs before parting the fire wall and stepping through. He motioned for them to follow him, and they silently stepped behind him as they left the meeting room. They reached the Fire Lord’s study, and once the door was closed, Zuko strode behind his desk where he banged his palms against the hard, wooden surface. He looked up with blazing eyes, and except for Iroh, the other men flinched in uneasiness.

“Who else knows about the anonymous messages, Advisor Chao?” Zuko asked curtly as he sat down on his large chair.

“Except for the other Court Council members and your Lady Mother, I know of no one else, my lord,” Chao responded quickly. “Although I did send a message to Avatar Aang—”

Chao was startled at the anger in the Fire Lord’s voice that it took him a few seconds to answer.

“I thought Avatar Aang could help rescue you and Lady Katara if you were indeed being held hostage.”

Zuko caught Iroh’s disapproving look and he took a deep breath to calm himself down. His confrontation with Wei had not gone as he had planned and it infuriated him. And the jealousy he felt towards Aang at the moment was not making his temper any better.
“That was a good idea, Advisor Chao,” he consented.

“Lady Ursā asked me to send Chief Hakoda a message a few weeks ago informing him of what was happening. We received his reply a few days ago saying he will sail to the colony to help General Iroh search for you and his daughter,” Chao informed him quietly.

Zuko gave a curt nod. “Lady Katara has already sent her family a message that we were returning to the Fire Nation.” He was silent for a moment before he turned to Jee.

“Admiral Jee, could you send for the messenger that arrived with the false missive?” Zuko ordered as he shifted the stack of papers that had somehow accumulated on his desk since he had finished lunch with his family. He looked up with a frown when the admiral did not immediately respond to his request.

“Uh, my Lord,” Jee began before he cleared his throat. “The messenger caught a fever from exhaustion and died a few days later after your departure.”

“What?” Zuko exclaimed before he narrowed his eyes as he growled out, “Are you sure it was a fever that killed him?”

“That is what the physician’s assistant told me,” Jee explained.

Zuko frowned.

“It seems too convenient that the messenger who brought a false message died so soon,” he said. “Send for the Physician Toshiro. I want to ask him some questions.”

“He is not here at the moment, my lord,” Jee spoke up. “He received news that one of his daughters has given birth and he has gone to visit her.”

“Then send him to me as soon as he returns,” the young lord said tersely.

The room was silent for a moment before Zuko finally spoke up.
“Admiral Jee, I want you to send a few loyal men to discreetly spy on Wei and report to me everything they see and hear.”

“I will do so immediately, my lord,” Jee responded as he bowed and turned to leave.

“Admiral Jee, wait,” Zuko called out.

He waited until the admiral turned back to look at him before he continued.

“I know I told you that you would be in charge of my mother’s safety until I found her a personal guard, but with the threat of a traitor among us I’d like for you to continue to guard her, for I do not trust anyone else to keep her safe when I’m not around her. I’m afraid you will not be able to return to your duties as admiral to my flagship until we get rid of the problem.”

Jee bowed as he sincerely replied, “You are the lord and I will follow any order you demand. I will be glad to act as Lady Ursa’s personal guard until you decide otherwise.”

Zuko thanked him with a nod of his head, and after another bow, Jee retreated to accomplish his lord’s bidding.

After dismissing Chao as well, Zuko slumped in his chair with a tired sigh. Iroh sat on the chair across from his nephew and watched him silently. A long moment passed in which his nephew did not say a word, and Iroh began to wonder if he could ask a servant to bring him some tea while he waited.

“I didn’t think Wei would’ve been able to defend himself and I was so sure I had him,” Zuko finally spoke with a growl. “And if everything he said is true, then how can I accuse him? And without any proof how can I have him arrested?”

“Do not despair yet, Zuko,” Iroh advised him wisely as he slipped his hands into his long sleeves. “Perhaps the spies will find something useful that will convict Wei of his crimes and signal him as the traitor.”

“That could be a possibility, but what if they don’t find anything against Wei?” Zuko speculated as he clenched his hands.

“And what if Wei is really innocent?” Iroh spoke up and ignored his nephew’s unconvinced snort.

Zuko ran a hand down his face as he let out a frustrated sigh. “Then who could the traitor be?”

Before Iroh could answer, they were interrupted when a soft knock was heard at the door. Zuko glanced at his uncle before he called for whoever was at the door to enter. Both men watched as the door was opened and Ursa and Katara stepped into the room with Jee trailing behind them.

Zuko again felt his body warm up as his eyes landed on Katara for he had been unable to touch her, much less kiss her, since their arrival. He frowned, however, when he saw her look at him with a sad expression before she glanced back at his mother, and he wondered what was wrong. His eyes moved away from Katara so he could look at Ursa and his frown deepened at the solemn expression on the usual calm features of his mother.

“What’s the matter?” he asked worriedly as he stood up from his seat and walked around his desk so he could stand before them.

Ursa looked at him silently for a moment before she took a deep breath when Katara gently squeezed her shoulder.

“Zuko…I want to visit Azula,” she said determinedly.

“What?” Zuko exclaimed quietly before he shook his head. “You know that you can’t visit her,” he reminded her gently.

“Please, Zuko,” Ursa pleaded, her golden eyes filling with tears. “I was so afraid and devastated when I thought I lost you and it reminded me that I could so lose my daughter as well. I haven’t seen her in years!”

Zuko refrained from saying that Azula was already lost to them, but he did not want to distress his mother more than she already was.
“Azula is in no condition to see anyone,” he told her softly.

“My daughter has been alone for so long!” Ursa cried out. “I can’t stand the thought that my daughter is suffering by herself while I live comfortably in the palace!”

Katara again placed her hand on Ursa’s shoulder while Jee stepped hesitantly closer to the crying woman. Katara turned to Zuko who was looking worriedly down at his mother.

“Lady Ursa deserves to see her daughter, Zuko,” she told him firmly yet gently when he looked at her.

“If Azula sees our mother, her condition might worsen,” he said with a frown.

“Or it might help,” she countered.

They looked silently at each other as Zuko debated what to do. He felt warmth spread in his chest at the knowledge that Katara really cared for his mother, for he knew Katara held no great affection for his sister after what she tried to do to them. However, he was also afraid that his mother seeing Azula’s condition might hurt her and he did not want her to suffer. His mother had suffered enough.

“Please, my son,” Ursa pleaded one more time in a soft whisper.

Zuko looked at her silently for a moment before he let out a reluctant sigh.

“Fine,” he agreed with a displeased grunt before he frowned seriously at his mother. “But if anything bad happens, you will never set foot in that place again,” he told her firmly.

“Thank you, Zuko,” Ursa said gladly as she moved forward to embrace her son.

Zuko did not respond as he returned the embrace. He glanced at Katara who was smiling gently at him and he frowned.

Things were getting more complicated.
Glancing out the carriage window, Katara’s eyes widened as she took in the large white stone building that loomed before them, though it probably only seemed that way since it rested atop a large hill. Thick, tall walls surrounded the building where she could see a few sentinels standing guard. It had taken a few hours for them to ride away from the palace and arrive at the place where Azula was being held. She could already see the sun sinking lower in the sky. She would have stayed in the palace if Zuko had not insisted she accompanied him and Lady Ursa, for he did not want to let her out of his sight. She sighed. She really needed to get used to Zuko’s overprotectiveness.

Katara looked away from the building and sat back against the carriage wall. She glanced to her right at Lady Ursa, who had been silent ever since they climbed into the carriage, and placed a comforting hand over the older woman’s clenched one. Ursa looked up at her, her golden eyes filled with sadness and anxiety, before she gave her a tiny, grateful smile and patted Katara’s hand. Returning the smile, Katara retracted her hand and again sat back in her seat as she looked up at Zuko sitting across from them. She frowned when she saw him scowling darkly out the window just as he had been doing since they left the Fire Nation Palace.

He had changed into his dark red and golden armor and his hands were clenched tightly atop his knees as he sat there, silent and brooding. Katara knew he was upset about allowing his mother see what had become of Azula now. Although she would never be able to forgive the fallen princess for all the hurt and suffering she had caused Zuko, her friends, and her, Katara wanted to support Ursa, who had asked for her help in convincing Zuko to let her see her daughter. Katara knew that what the gentle woman would see might pain her, and even though she did not want Lady Ursa to get hurt, Katara thought it was the best way to stop Ursa from wondering and agonizing over what had become of her daughter.

It was a few minutes later when the carriage was let through the walls once it was known it was the Fire Lord and his mother visiting. As soon as the carriage stopped before the building, Jee dismounted from his komodo rhino and opened the door to help his lord and the women descend from it. Just as they were surrounded by Zuko’s personal guards, the doors to the wide building were opened and a tall elderly man with cropped, gray hair walked swiftly toward them. He was wearing a simple gray outfit and what looked like a long, thin white coat that reached down below his knees.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” the man exclaimed breathlessly as he bowed. He pushed his thin glasses up his nose once he straightened after Zuko gave him a curt nod. “I was not expecting your visit, my lord, so I apologize if you had to wait long.”

“Doctor Nao,” Zuko interrupted the older man, “we would like to see my sister.”

Doctor Nao paused and he looked over the Fire Lord’s shoulder as he finally noticed the other people standing with his lord. His eyes lingered curiously for a moment on the caramel-skinned young woman before his eyes widened in surprised when he noticed the dark-haired woman standing beside her who resembled both royal siblings so much.

“My lord,” the doctor began hesitantly, “I do not believe it wise for your sister to receive visitors at this time.”

“It will only be for a moment,” Zuko responded.

The older man hesitated for a few seconds before he bowed his head. Who was he to deny his sovereign?

“If you would please follow me,” he indicated as he turned back toward the doors.

Once they were inside with Jee and Zuko’s two personal guards following behind them, Katara took in their surroundings curiously. The design of the inside of the building was simple, with no decorations of any sort anywhere except for a few paintings of Fire Nation sceneries. The walls were painted a calming cream color. The doctor led them through different halls where they passed many steel doors. Katara could not help but wonder what kind of place this was for it looked different from any prisons she had seen before. As if he could read her thoughts, the doctor turned to smile at them.

“The patients are given a few hours a day to leave their rooms and walk in the garden. Of course, only those that are of no threat to the others are allowed to,” he explained.

“Patients?” Katara asked.

“Yes. This is a mental institute for those who…suffer mental illnesses,” Doctor Nao explained in a pleasant tone. “They receive the help and care they need.”

Katara guessed he had stopped himself from saying ‘who are insane’ and now she understood why Zuko did not have Azula locked in the prison tower.

“How is Azula?” Zuko asked quietly.
“She is doing much better these days, my lord,” Doctor Nao spoke up with a kind smile. “She has her moments, but she is calmer than she was when she was first brought in. Sometimes she is even allowed to go into the garden and we do not need to give her shots to suppress her bending in fear that she would hurt anyone or herself. She has been calm today.”

Zuko tightened his lips as he glanced at his mother before he continued walking without saying anything else. Katara glanced at Ursa who was walking silently a few paces behind her son before she looked at Zuko who was walking ahead of them, his shoulders tense and back straight. Katara wanted to run her hand along his back to soothe him, but she refrained herself from doing so.

She was brought out of her thoughts when she noticed they had turned into a very long corridor where there were fewer doors that seemed much thicker than the others they had passed so far. As they followed the doctor down the hall, one of the thick doors was thrown open and two large men wearing the same gray outfit as the doctor—minus the white coat—stepped out holding a young, burly man between them. The man had a blank expression on his face, but when he spotted the women standing before him he grinned widely and began to laugh deafeningly.

Katara’s view was partially blocked from the cackling man as Zuko stood protectively before her and she scowled at his back. She was about to step around him, but she was distracted when she saw Ursa grab tightly onto Admiral Jee’s arm who then gently grabbed her hand and squeezed it. She quickly glanced at Zuko to see his reaction, but he was not paying attention as he had turned to glare at the doctor who bowed and apologize as the two other men tried to drag the snickering man away from them.

Finally, the doctor stopped before a door, and after rummaging through a large ring holding many keys, he opened the door and stepped into the slightly dark room, motioning for the silent group to follow him. As they stepped in, Ursa let out a gasp and her hand flew up to cover her mouth.

Azula sat cross-legged in the middle of a cot with her arms wrapped around her chest as she rocked back and forth. They could hear her mumbling under her breath. Her skin seemed paler than usual and her lithe frame seemed thinner than before. Her once pristine obsidian tresses now fell straight down her back and shoulders with a few dark strands covering her face as her fingers clutched at the white shirt she was wearing.

“Princess Azula,” Doctor Nao called out gently. “Look. You have visitors.”

Azula’s head snapped up as she turned dark, golden eyes at those who dared disturbed her before her eyes widened when she noticed that one of them was her brother. A maniacal grin spread across her lips as she glared at Zuko.
“I haven’t seen you in a while, dear brother,” she mocked as she flicked a long strand of black hair over her shoulder. Her eyes flickered for a moment on the blue-eyed woman standing beside him before she looked back to Zuko. “How nice of you to bring your waterbending wench with you,” she taunted.

Katara clenched her hands at her sides while Zuko narrowed his eyes at Azula who had a sharp smile on her face. Before Zuko could respond, his mother stepped around him with her hands outstretched.

“Azula, my daughter,” she said softly.

Azula’s smile fell from her face as her golden eyes widened impossibly large before she glared at her.

“Go away!” she screeched before she grabbed her head tightly with her hands. “Go away! You’re not here, you’re not real!” she chanted loudly.

“Azula,” Zuko spoke up, struggling to keep his tone calm. “I finally found our mother, Azula. Mother is really here.”

Azula raised her head slightly away from her hands to look at Zuko suspiciously, almost as if she were trying to figure out if he was mocking her, before she turned her eyes toward Ursa who had a hopeful expression on her face. Azula looked at her silently for a moment before her pleasant features contorted into an angry snarl.

“Why are you here after you abandoned Father and your children?!” Azula growled out loudly as her golden eyes glinted in rage.

“Is that what your father told you?” Ursa asked with a horrified gasp.

“Father told me the truth!” Azula screeched as she pulled at her hair.

“It’s a lie!” Ursa cried out. “I never wanted to abandon you or your brother!”
“Of course you didn’t want to leave Zuzu,” the deranged princess sneered. “He’s always been your favorite!”

“No, Azula! I—”

“You always loved Zuko more than me!” Azula cut her off wildly. “You would scold me for everything I did, while you mothered Zuko for every mistake he made! Every time I tried to ask for your attention you would put me aside because poor Zuzu needed you!”

Katara gasped softly at the pain she could detect in Azula’s voice and she turned to look at Zuko whose eyes were wide with shock.

Zuko stared at his screaming sister in astonishment. He had never thought Azula felt that way, since she always seemed so confident, independent, and nonchalant when they were children. She had their grandfather and father’s respect and approval, two things he strove to gain when he still believed he needed them. He never thought Azula might have felt jealous because of the close relationship he shared with their mother. He was the one who had always been jealous that Ozai paid more attention to her. Perhaps this feeling of rejection was part of why Azula had lost her mind.

“I’m so sorry, Azula,” Ursa exclaimed as tears ran down her cheeks. “I did not mean to hurt you and make you feel as if I did not love you because I do! I love you and your brother the same—”

“Lies!” Azula screeched before she sneered. “You never loved me! How could you love a monster like me?”

Zuko stiffened for it was the same question he had asked Katara a while ago.

“Despite everything, I still love you, Azula,” Ursa tried to say as she moved forward with an outstretched hand.

“Don’t touch me!” Azula growled as she jumped away from the cot to stand menacingly before a wide-eyed Ursa. “I don’t want to listen to any more of your despicable lies!”

Doctor Nao could sense that things were about to turn for the worst and he quickly exited the room in order to call a nurse and some guards.
“Father is the only one who loves me!” Azula stated as her eyes darted wildly around the room. “He was the only one who praised me! He was even going to make me his heir!”

“Azula!” Zuko tried to intervene, for he could see her words were affecting their mother too much.

Azula turned to glare at him before she sneered in that mocking way he had become used to as they grew up together.

“You must be so happy your mommy came back to you,” she taunted in a fake sweet tone. “But Father loved me more than you and I would’ve been a better heir than you’d ever be! I could’ve been a better Fire Lord if you hadn’t saved that stupid Water Tribe peasant who later chained me down! I would’ve killed her! If you hadn’t stepped in she’d be dead by now!”

Zuko’s heart constricted in his chest at the painful truth and he shifted closer to Katara who also stepped closer to him as she gaped at the hatred she could see in Azula’s eyes.

“And then after the wench lay dead on the ground, I would’ve killed you next!” Azula continued and laughed maniacally as she cracked her fingers.

Ursa gasped.

“But he’s your brother!” she cried out.

“He would’ve killed me, too!” Azula screamed in rage as she turned to snarl at their shocked mother. “But you care more for his life than my own!”

“No, Azula! That’s not true!” Ursa protested loudly.

She moved forward again and tried to embrace her daughter, but she stumbled back when Azula pushed her away from her. Luckily, Zuko was there to catch Ursa before she fell to the floor. Zuko settled her on her feet beside him as he glared at Azula.

“I told you not to touch me!” she shrieked as she pointed a finger at all of them. “I hate you all!” she growled before she turned burning eyes at a crying Ursa. “I hate you!”
Ursa let out soft painful cry as she stood frozen in shock as her daughter’s words sank in. She did not even move when Azula raised her fist and shot a blue fire ball at her and her son’s frightened shout did not even penetrate her mind. She blinked when someone pulled her back and spun her around until she collided into a firm chest. She blinked again when she realized it was Jee. Ursa looked over his arm and watched as Katara drew up a wall of water to extinguish the fire blast just as Zuko rushed at Azula and pushed her down onto the hard ground.

Azula cursed and thrashed wildly as she tried to dislodge Zuko from her back, but he was holding her too firmly for her to do much. He had grown taller, heavier, and stronger with the years while she wasted her days locked in a cell.

It was a few seconds later that the doctor and a young woman carrying a tray in her hands entered the room with two big men who immediately rushed to pin the crazed princess down. Zuko stood up as soon as the men had a hold of her and he moved aside as the doctor and the woman approached. His mother approached him and he opened his arms to her. He held her to him as he looked up to give Katara and Jee a grateful look for keeping her safe.

The doctor grabbed what looked like a thin glass tube from the tray filled with a yellowish liquid and a long needle attached to it before he pierced the needle into Azula’s shoulder as he pulled the edge of her shirt down. They watched as Azula’s loud curses quieted and her thrashing calmed down until she lay still as she looked up at them with dazed eyes, giving her the expression of a person with terrible hallucinations. It seemed that reality was lost to her forever. Finally, her eyes closed and her breathing became soft and slow as Ursa continued crying softly while Zuko held her close to him.

Gliding smoothly over the calm water, the Water Tribe vessel sailed swiftly across the grand ocean. Two men with dark brown hair and blue eyes stood silently at the front of the ship as they stared across the sea, watching with grim expression on their tanned faces as the sun began to set over the horizon. The older of the two clenched the scroll in his hand while his other hand flexed at his side.

“First Iroh sends us a message saying that Katara and Zuko have fallen overboard during a storm and could not be found and that the illness in the colony was false,” Hakoda began in an angry tone, “and now we receive a message saying that they are probably captured! My daughter is being held hostage because of the Fire Lord!”

He pressed his lips tightly together when he felt his son place his hand firmly on his shoulder.

“Calm down, Dad,” Sokka spoke up with a frown as he glanced at his twin daughters who were trying to crawl away from their mother and great-grandparents before he added more quietly, “It’s not Zuko’s fault, and besides, you know that Zuko would never have put Katara in danger if he could help it. He will always try to keep her safe.”

Hakoda remained stiff for a moment before he relaxed and let out a deep breath as he nodded at his son’s words. It still amazed him that his son could be so mature when he bothered to be.

“Besides, Advisor Chao said they weren’t even sure if it’s true that they’ve been captured,” Sokka continued.

The chieftain nodded again just as the sound of his granddaughters’ laughter reached his ears. They glanced to where Suki, Kanna, and Pakku sat around the twins who were now playing with small wooden toys their father had tried to carve into animal shapes. Jing squealed happily as she banged the wooden toy against the deck of the ship while Ting giggled as she began to chew on her fist. The twins were oblivious to the worry and fear the adults were feeling at not knowing where Katara and Zuko were.

“If it’s true that they’re being held hostage, what will we do?” Sokka spoke up as he turned to frown at his father. “We can’t possibly let Ozai be set free.”

“We will search for them, of course,” was the Southern Water Tribe Chief’s immediate answer, confidence and determination deep in his voice. “We will rescue them. By rescuing Zuko, I will return the favor to him for helping you break me free from the Boiling Rock, and I will have my daughter back with us.”

“I won’t rest until my sister is safe with us again,” Sokka said solemnly, his usual cocky expression fierce and determined.

They were silent for a moment, each dwelling in their own thoughts, as the setting sun created a golden glow over the water. Sokka was worried and angry at himself for not keeping his baby sister safe as he had tried to do ever since his father left him in charge of protecting her. He should have insisted on going with her and Zuko to the colony, but he had a family of his own to think about now. He just hoped that everything was just a rumor and they were indeed okay.

Hakoda did not bother to wipe away the cool mist that landed on his face as the soft waves crashed against the swift Water Tribe vessel. He remembered the fear he had felt when he was told that his daughter had been lost in a storm and could possibly be in the hands of some damn rebels. His heart still clenched at the thought that she might be hurt or worse. He had been unable to save his beloved wife when their village had been invaded all those years ago and he was not going to lose their daughter as well.
The chieftain closed his eyes to help bear the pain at the memory of losing his Kya, of the memory of holding her burned and unresponsive body in his arms as he cried into her singed hair. She had been everything to him and her death had almost crippled him. If it were not because his children needed him, he might have let himself die along with her. But he had vowed to get justice for Kya’s death and protect their children. He had not been there for Sokka and Katara as they grew up, but he would be there for them now and in the future. He would find a way to return his daughter back to them.

“Dad! Look!”

Sokka’s voice brought him out of his depressing thoughts and Hakoda opened his eyes to see his son pointing at the sky. Squinting against the sun’s rays, the older tribesman watched as a bird flew toward them. His eyes widened when he recognized it as being one of the Fire Nation’s messenger hawks. He felt his stomach drop. Was it more terrible news?

He extended his arm and the reddish bird landed gracefully on it, flapping its wings for a moment before it tucked them against its body. Hakoda quickly retrieved the small scroll from the metal tube attached to the hawk’s back before he handed the bird to one of his men to feed it. He unfurled the thin paper just as the rest of his family crowded around him.

“What does it say, Hakoda?” Kanna asked with a worried frown.

Hakoda scanned the message quickly and his face broke into a relieved and happy smile before he looked up at his anxious family.

“It’s from Katara!” he exclaimed as he glanced back down at her neat writing. “She writes that both Zuko and she are fine and they are heading toward the Fire Nation. She wishes to see all of us soon.”

Kanna let out a relieved cry and Pakku held her to his chest and rubbed her back. Sokka let out a joyful whoop and wrapped his arms around his wife and their children that she was carrying at the moment.

“Thank the gods they’re both safe,” Suki said with a relieved sigh.

She looked up at her husband and they smiled brightly at each other. However, when Hakoda did not say anything else, Sokka frowned.
“That’s it?” he asked as he threw his hands in the air. “What about the storm? And the kidnapping?”

“She says that she’ll explain everything once we meet her in the Fire Nation,” Hakoda responded as he frowned at one particular sentence. “She also says that she needs to speak to me about something important.”

“I wonder what that could be,” Suki spoke up curiously as she shifted Ting to her other hip when Jing was picked up by her father.

Hakoda folded the paper and placed it inside his shirt as he turned around and began to bark orders for the vessel to be turned toward the Fire Nation at full speed. The waterbenders quickly scrambled around the deck as they worked to turned the ship to the west and toward the Fire Nation.

The doors to the meeting room closed silently behind the Fire Lord as he and his admiral exited and walked swiftly down the hallway. A deep frown marred Zuko’s features and he resisted the urge to pull his hair in agitation.

Things were not going has he had hoped. During the meeting, he had discussed with his advisors and generals about the rebels’ threat, but they had disappeared once again and nobody knew where they were hiding now. Zuko was concerned that they were planning something and he could not stop worrying over when and how they would strike next. The spies he had sent to watch Wei have not reported anything unusual about his activities that indicated he was really the traitor. Zuko had also confirmed that Wei indeed had a younger brother in the prison tower whom he visited once in a while.

To make matters worse, he received a letter a few days ago from Mai’s father basically demanding to know why he had ended his relationship with his daughter and at the same time subtly begging Zuko to reconsider taking her back. Zuko had sent a message in reply, saying he had done the right thing in breaking up with her and did not regret it before firmly stating that he will not reconsider resuming his relationship with her.

He scoffed, causing Jee to look curiously at him, but Zuko just shook his head and continued walking.

As if I would resume my fake relationship with Mai now that I have the real thing with Katara, he thought.
He sighed. He had not spent any time with Katara since they arrived in the Fire Nation, for both of them had been busy. He was either in meetings with his advisors and generals or stuck in his study, going over everything that had been neglected since his absence. Katara had spent her time with his mother, trying to bring her out of her depression.

A week had passed since they had left a subdued Azula behind and his mother was still not the same. As soon as they had arrived at the palace from the mental institute, Ursa had closed herself off in her room and refused to come out and eat. Jee had to stand outside her door and Zuko knew the admiral disliked being idle, though he never complained. Katara had not left the older princess’ side since and tried to help her with her dejected state. Her care had paid off, for two days ago, Ursa had finally left the room to eat her meals with her family or walk in the private garden to take care of her rosebushes and herbs, and she seemed more relaxed. Zuko was grateful that Katara was caring for his mother when he did not have the slightest clue how, which made him even angrier at himself.

He had cursed himself many times for relenting to let his mother visit Azula, for even though Ursa had survived and lived by herself for years, she was still a gentle and delicate person, and he had known that if she saw Azula’s condition it would hurt her. Although his mother reassured him that she was fine and was grateful that he had taken her to see her daughter, he still felt responsible and guilty for her unhappiness. Iroh had convinced him that it was for the best for both Ursa and Azula to have seen each other and expressed what they felt. Perhaps one day, Azula would become better and be able to talk with her mother more calmly. Zuko was not sure and he did not want to raise his mother’s hopes.

He was still shocked over Azula’s words and he could not stop replaying them over in his head. It seemed like both of them had some lack of self-confidence about whether they were worthy of being loved. If Ozai had been a different man, a more respectful husband to Ursa and a more loving and encouraging father to Azula and him, would everything be different, better? Would they have been a happier family?

But if that were the case, Zuko would never have been banished, he never would have seen the atrocities of the war, and he would have never joined Aang to end said war. Everything that had happened to them had been for a reason, a part of their destiny, what fate had planned. Perhaps if his mother had never been made to leave, his father would have never burned and exiled him, and Azula would have never lost her sanity, but then Zuko would have never ended the war and many people would have died. But most of all he would have never met Katara, never would have fallen in love with her and known what true happiness and true love really were.

Zuko felt his heart clench at the thought. He may have suffered many things, but he would endure them again if it meant he got to be with Katara. He would not trade anything or wish for things to have been different. Maybe it was selfish of him for thinking in such a way, but such was the way he felt.
His pace increased and he was barely aware that Jee had to practically jog after him to catch up with his long strides. He needed to see Katara, even though he could not touch her, kiss her, hold her, he wanted to see her beautiful face and those bright, cobalt eyes staring at him as she gave him a lively smile with those lovely, soft lips of hers. His feet took him past the guest rooms and toward the Royal Palace Garden for that is where Jee had said Katara, his mother and uncle were last.

His golden eyes scanned the peaceful private garden until he spotted them sitting at the veranda drinking tea. He quickly stepped onto one of the stone paths and made his way toward them with Jee quietly following behind him. His eyes landed on Katara, who had her back to him, and his body heat flared again at the sight of her and at the sound of her delighted laughter caressing his troubled mind.

“Zuko!” his uncle exclaimed as Zuko finally stepped into the veranda. “We’re so glad you could join us! Would you like some jasmine tea?”

Zuko felt like having something stronger than tea and he grunted a ‘no’ before turning to tell Jiao to bring him some wine.

“Right away, my lord,” Jiao said as she bowed and hurriedly went to follow her lord’s orders.

Zuko watched as Katara turned around to look at him so quickly that her hair even whipped around her, their eyes locked, and they shivered as if an electric current had passed through them. She flushed at the smoldering look he was aiming at her and she looked down to nibble on a cookie as he moved to sit at the head of the low table on her left side. Zuko had insisted that she sit next to him on his right side as was the custom for the Fire Lord’s wife to sit, and she had agreed with a pleased blush, especially since they had not eaten with any of his courtiers who would notice the significance. Zuko finally took his eyes off his blushing bride-to-be and looked at his mother who was watching them curiously.

That’s right, we still haven’t told her, he mused as he gave his mother a small smile.

“How are you feeling, Mom?” he asked softly.

“I am still sad, and it still pains me to know what Azula…feels toward me, but I’m doing much better thanks to Katara,” Ursa replied to her son with a soft smile which she also gave Jee as he stood guard over her.
Katara smiled at her after she took a sip of the tea to wash down the cookie she had just eaten to keep herself from staring too much at Zuko.

“I’m just glad to help,” she replied.

Ursa patted her hand before she again turned to smile brightly at her son, who was watching their interaction with a pleased expression on his face. It pleased him to know that the two most important women in his life got along so well.

“Katara is such a wonderful woman, Zuko,” Ursa remarked just as Jiao finally returned with the wine and more snacks.

“You’re right, Mother,” Zuko agreed with a small smile before he added, “That is one of the many reasons why Katara will be much help to the Fire Nation in the future.”

He suppressed a smirk as he watched Katara blushed deeply. He noticed his uncle grinning widely over the rim of his teacup as his mother looked at him with wide eyes, Jee frowned curiously, and Jiao pretended not to be listening. He wondered briefly if he should dismiss Jee and Jiao from this conversation, but thought that the admiral and the maidservant would find out soon enough, if they already did not suspect something going on between Katara and him.

“Zuko dear, are you saying what I am hoping you are saying?” Ursa asked as she stared at him with hopeful eyes.

“I confessed to Katara and she said she returns my feelings. She has agreed to marry me,” Zuko informed her with a pleased smirk as the blush on Katara’s cheeks darkened as she smiled at him.

“Oh my goodness! Really?” Ursa exclaimed happily as she got up and rushed toward her son to give him a hug before she moved to embrace Katara before he could react. “I am so happy for you both! Congratulation! You must allow me to help plan your wedding!”

Zuko was a bit surprised at his mother’s enthusiasm, but he was glad to see the pain and sadness diminish a bit from her eyes with the news.

“Thank you, Lady Ursa,” Katara replied just as happily as she returned the older woman’s embrace. “I’m relieved to know that you approve of our marriage.”
“And why would I not approve, Katara dear?” Ursa asked with a soft smile as she turned to touch her son’s hand. “You are the woman my son wishes as his wife. You are the one who will make him so happy.”

Katara looked down in embarrassment at such praise as she mumbled another thank you when Jiao congratulated them in a shy tone. The waterbender glanced at Zuko out of the corner of her eye and saw that he had a smug smirk on his lips. Lips that she wanted to kiss so much…

“Congratulations, my lord, Lady Katara,” Jee’s words startled her out of her thoughts and she looked up to see Jee smiling at her before he turned to give Zuko a sly grin. “Though I must admit, I did suspect something.”

“It seems everybody else knew except for these two,” Iroh chimed in with a cheerful smile.

“Uncle,” Zuko growled out, but as usual, the old man ignored him and instead took another sip of tea.

“Oh, I cannot wait to hold my grandchildren in my arms,” Ursa exclaimed with a dreamy sigh and Jiao placed her hand against her mouth to muffle her giggles.

“Mother,” Zuko muttered.

He looked at Katara whose cheeks were a deep red hue as she glanced at him from beneath her long lashes. Well, it wasn’t like he had not thought of Katara pregnant with his child. A smirk pulled at his lips.

“Why haven’t you announced your engagement yet?” Ursa spoke up with a frown as she returned to her cushion beside Katara.

Katara saw Zuko raise an expectant eyebrow at her and she scowled at him before she turned to Ursa and gave her a strained smile.

“Well, uh, I would like to speak to my family first and Zuko must ask my father for his consent,” Katara began as she fidgeted with her fingers. “And even though I already ended things with Aang, I want to tell him the news first.”

Ursa frowned and she turned to look at her son who was scowling at the table before him.

“Well, I admit I am not happy for the wait, but I will respect your wishes,” Ursa said with a small nod of her head before she broke into a curious smile. “So how did you confess to each other?”

Katara suppressed a giggle when Zuko groaned, and they spent a few minutes telling Ursa a milder version of it. And then the men listened silently as Katara and Ursa enthusiastically went over ideas for the wedding.

The sun had just set and the moon was rising in the dark sky by the time Iroh finally decided to step in.

“My, it sure is getting late,” the retired general commented innocently as he gave a dramatic yawn. “I think I will retire to my room.”

He glanced at Ursa and Jee and then at the young couple who were eating each other with their eyes, though they were trying to be discreet about it. Ursa smiled once she understood what Iroh was trying to do and she gave a soft yawn of her own.

“I believe I will retire for the night as well,” she said.

Zuko looked away from watching Katara’s reaction to his smoldering looks and frowned at his mother.

“Are you not feeling well?” he asked with concern since it was still early.

“No, I’m perfectly fine,” Ursa assured him as she stood up from the table along with Iroh and Jee. “I just had too much excitement for one day. Jiao, could you help me with my bath? You can clean the table later.”

“Of course, Lady Ursa,” Jiao replied quickly as she turned to smile at Katara.
“Why don’t you keep Katara company for a while longer, Zuko?” Ursa addressed her son. She smiled when Zuko’s eyes lit up in understanding. “Good night, dears.”

Once they left and only Katara and he remained, Zuko turned to smirk at her. She was blushing at the knowing looks they had received.

“Well, if that wasn’t subtle, then I don’t know what is,” Katara remarked as she turned to grin at him.

Zuko chuckled at her before he took a sip of his red wine. He poured more wine into another cup and offered it to her.

“No thanks,” she declined with a small shake of her head.

“Are you refusing to drink Fire Nation wine?” Zuko asked in a mock insulted voice.

“Only because it’s late,” she replied with a grin.

“It’s never too late to indulge in some good Fire Nation wine,” he stated with a serious frown, although his lips twitched in amusement.

“I’m pretty sure there are other things better than wine to indulge in,” Katara countered as she thought of some of her own tribe’s drinks.

She raised an eyebrow when Zuko’s lips curled into a devious smile and she swallowed at the smoldering look he was sending at her.

“Really?” he whispered huskily. “How about we test that?”

Before Katara could asked him what he meant, Zuko took her left hand and brought it over to his cup of wine before dipping her finger into the cool, red liquid.
“What are you doing?” she asked with a confused frown.

Her frown deepened when Zuko did not reply and only gazed at her with those heated, golden eyes of his. Katara watched as he raised her hand to his lips and she shivered as he pressed a kiss on her wet skin before she gasped when he opened his mouth and slid her entire finger drenched in red wine into his hot mouth. A shiver went through her at the sensation of her cool finger being warmed by his mouth combined with the blazing look he aimed at her, and she squirmed as the spot between her legs began to tingle.

Zuko watched her wriggle in her spot as she stared at his mouth, and he curled his tongue around her finger. A low growl vibrated in his chest as the taste that was her and the flavor of the sweet red wine exploded in his tongue. He heard Katara let out whimper before she tried to pull her hand away, but Zuko tightened his hold on her wrist and pulled her closer to him until she was almost leaning over the low table.

Katara watched as Zuko’s eyes darken into a molten amber color, and she moaned softly as he wrapped her finger more firmly with his tongue as if he were trying to wipe all traces of the wine from her skin, even though she had a feeling there were none left. The amazing feeling of her finger in his warm mouth stirred Katara’s arousal and she was unable to curb another moan from escaping her lips. She watched, mesmerized, as he pursed his moistened lips while he watched her with half-lidded eyes before he pulled her finger out, forming a loud sucking sound as he did so. Instead of releasing her, Zuko brushed her gleaming finger along his bottom lip before he gently nipped the tip of it, causing her body to shudder almost violently as she tried to suppress her growing arousal.

“How?” he murmured and smirked when her dazed, blue eyes snapped to his. “Some things do taste better than red wine. It makes me wonder what else is there that I can indulge my thirst on.”

Katara saw him looking at her as if she were an oasis for a thirsting man and she swallowed thickly as her heart pounded hard in her chest when his eyes fell upon her lips and he began to lean toward her.

“I, uh… I think it’s best we, um, go to our rooms and, uh, sleep,” Katara stuttered as a blush surfaced on her cheeks.

Zuko paused and leaned back with a frown. He wondered if he had overwhelmed her too much, but he refused to part from her so soon now that they finally have some time to themselves. Zuko stood up, and with her wrist still clasped in his hand, he pulled her gently to her feet as he gave her what he hoped was a calm smile in order for her to relax once again.
“I still think it’s too early. Will you walk with me in the garden?” he asked, his husky voice from before now soft.

Katara eyed him cautiously for a moment before she smiled and agreed with a small nod. She was still trying to get used to this new side of Zuko—his blatant masculine sensuality—and the sensations he easily evoked in her. Zuko smiled as he hooked her arm under his and led her away from the veranda and into the cool, stone path. They walked around the quiet place, admiring the many beautiful flowers that surrounded them, breathing in the fresh night air, until they finally stopped alongside the serene pond like so many times before. The little white and pink flowers from the cherry blossom tree danced gracefully around them as they leaned over the water and glanced at each other through their reflections upon the clear surface.

“Do you remember the last time we were here?” Zuko asked quietly.

“Yes,” Katara responded just as silently and she ducked her head while she fidgeted with a long strand of her hair. “You held me to you as I cried my eyes out,” she mumbled.

“That night I…I overhead you and Aang arguing,” he began in a strained voice and his hands clenched at his sides.

Katara’s eyes widened. “You did?”

“I saw what he did and I wanted to hurt him so badly,” he continued and let out a sigh. “But when I saw you crying…I wanted to comfort you, even if it pained me.”

“Why would it pain you?” she asked softly.

“Because you were crying…for him,” he answered with a growl.

“What?” Katara exclaimed with a frown before she shook her head. “That was not the reason for my tears.”

Zuko looked up to frown at her.
“Then what was the reason?” he asked, unable to curb his curiosity.

Katara was silent a moment as she stared at the tranquil pond before them.

“I cried because the words Aang said about your… close relationship with Mai pained me and… because I thought you would never return my feelings,” she replied with a sad sigh at the memory.

Zuko’s eyes widened at her soft confession and he scowled, berating himself for his foolishness.

“If only I had told you my feelings for you sooner, we could have avoided all these misunderstandings,” he said with a deep sigh as he again returned his gaze to their reflections upon the still pond.

“There’s no point in crying over it now,” Katara spoke in a light tone, trying to dispel the dark mood. “What matters is that we now know our feelings for each other and we are together.”

Zuko smiled as he caught her eye from their reflections.

“You’re right. We are going to get married and that’s what matters,” he said with a smirk.

“Your mother was happy with the news of our engagement,” Katara spoke up and she leaned back to grin at him.

“I told you she and Uncle would accept you,” he reminded her with a small chuckle as he straightened before he quieted down and grimaced. “Now it’s my turn to be nervous and wonder if your family will accept me.”

“Oh my!” Katara gasped dramatically. “The Great Fire Lord Zuko is nervous?! What has the world come to?!"

Zuko chuckled at her antics and the teasing glint in her blue eyes, but then he let out a deep sigh and his expression turned serious.
“Once they know what happened, that I did not keep you safe, that you…died, they will hate me,” Zuko began in a grave tone as he looked across the pond to a point beyond the distance. “They will not allow me to marry you.”

A small frown appeared on Katara’s brow and she reached her hands up to grab his face and gently turned it so he could be facing her again. She did not like to see the guilt and pain in his eyes.

“I was not planning on telling them about my near death,” she said quietly.

“But, Katara, they need to know!” he exclaimed as he brought his own hands to grasp her upper arms.

“And have them lock me away so I won’t get hurt again?” Katara huffed before she shook her head when he frowned stubbornly at her. “Besides, what matters now is that I’m alive. You saved me by letting yourself get beat up in order to protect me and you defeated all those men that…wanted to hurt me.”

Zuko’s grip tightened at the reminder before he pulled her close to his chest and wrapped her tightly in his arms. Katara wound her own arms around him and placed her head on his firm chest with a soft sigh.

“What matters is that you always try to keep me safe,” she told him softly.

Zuko buried his face in her neck and breathed in the scent of her hair as he gave her a gentle squeeze.

“Thank you. I really needed to hear that,” he told her in a strained voice.

Katara did not reply as she squeezed him in return and placed a quick kiss to his covered chest. They remained in the same pose for a moment before Katara finally pulled away with a blush. She had forgotten where they were and she was afraid that someone might see them. Zuko allowed her to move away and he began to search among his dark robe before he pulled out a small trinket.

“With everything that has happened since we arrived, I kept forgetting to return this to you,” he said as he opened his hand to reveal the silver rose hairpin.
“My hairpin!” Katara exclaimed happily as she took it and brought it close to her chest and stroked the smooth blue and red gems. “I was afraid that I lost it. Thank you.”

“Uncle kept it safe until our return,” he explained briefly as he watched her gaze fondly at the silver flower-shaped hairpin. “It pleased me very much to see you wear my gift to you during my birthday celebration.”

Katara looked up at him and blushed.

“I told you I thought it was a good time to wear it so you could see how much I appreciated and loved it,” she began before she smiled. “To show you how much I love you even if I couldn’t tell you.”

Zuko smiled at her as he took the hairpin from her hand and clipped it on her right temple so that her loose hair was up and exposed her face and smooth neck. His fingers touched the trinket before he trailed them down the soft skin of her face and down the column of her throat, causing her to shiver at his warm touch, before he trailed his fingers back up until he glided them against her plump, lower lip. Agni, he wanted to kiss her again, feel those soft lips of hers molding against his, taste the sweet flavor of her mouth. He leaned down to take her lips, but Katara gasped and placed her hands against his chest to stop him.

“No, you can’t,” she told him nervously. “Someone might see us.”

But Zuko did not let that stop him as he grabbed her around the waist and pulled her close to him.

“No one is here to see us,” he said in a low and husky voice.

He looked around the quiet garden to make a point, and before Katara could protest again, he swooped down and captured her parted lips. He kissed her with all the pent up passion and longing he held within him as he delved his tongue deep within her hot mouth. Katara immediately responded to him since she had missed being close to him as well and she moaned when the sweet taste of the red wine he had consumed earlier hit her taste buds and gave her a heady feeling.

Zuko smiled inwardly as Katara surrendered to him. Agni, how he had missed having her in his arms. His lips teased hers for a while before he gently captured her lower lip between his teeth, that plump and delicious piece of flesh that always tempted him to taste. He heard her let out a soft moan and he again kissed her deeply, fiercely—biting, caressing, and sucking her lips. His hands ran up and down her back before he began to glide his hands down to caress the lovely curve of her waist and hips until he slid his hands over her firm ass. With a groan, he lifted her slightly and pressed her tightly against him.

Katara gasped before she stiffened and quickly pulled her lips away from his hot kiss.

“We can’t,” she repeated breathlessly as she tried to twist away from his tight embrace.

Zuko became irritated at her resistance and he gave her a frustrated frown before he drew her to him again despite her struggles.

“Dammit, Katara! Can’t you see I miss you?” he growled out as his golden eyes flashed in both annoyance and suppressed arousal. “I miss touching you, kissing you, watching you come undone in my hands, and I hate it that we can’t be close to each other, hate it that we have to hide our feelings for each other and our relationship.”

He pulled away from her and ran his hands down his face with a frustrated growl before he turned blazing eyes at her.

“Tell me, Katara, do you even want to marry me?” he asked her in a cold tone.

“What?! Of course I want to marry you!” Katara exclaimed as she brought her hands to her hips. “You know the reason why we have to keep a distance between us is because I need to speak to my family first and I need to tell Aang that—”

“I know, but I still don’t like it,” Zuko cut her off gruffly.

He sighed and again wrapped his arms around her luscious form to bring her to his chest. He bent his head down to nuzzle against her throat before he kissed the smooth column.

“I desire to kiss you, to protect you, to take you, to love you,” he groaned into her ear before he again brushed his lips along her throat. He nibbled on her skin and she moaned softly before he leaned back just enough to gaze into her conflicted eyes.
“All I want to do,” he whispered huskily as he brushed his lips against hers, “is announce to the entire world, to let Aang know, that you are mine and that you’re going to be my wife.”

Katara could sense his upset, feel his tense muscles beneath her hands, see his frustration in his usually masked eyes, and she felt a twinge of guilt in knowing that it was she that was causing him to feel this way. She reached both hands to cup his face and urge his head close to hers so she could kiss him. She pressed her lips soothingly against his, ran her tongue gently against his lower lip, until he relaxed and returned the slow and gentle kiss.

When they pulled apart to gather some air, Katara raised her head to kiss his jawline which he responded by squeezing her.

“Please be a bit more patient, Zuko,” she asked him softly. “I can’t have rumors be spread about us, I can’t have my family’s honor ruined because of me.”

Zuko closed his eyes and sighed. It was so hard for him to keep to his word since what he really wanted was to have her as his wife already, but he had to respect her wishes, for after all, she would be sacrificing a lot more than he when she finally married him, she would be leaving her family and childhood home behind. The least he could do was control his desire and be patient.

“I understand, love,” he told her quietly.

Katara gave him a grateful smile before her eyes widened at the endearment.

“Did you just call me ‘love’?” she asked softly, her heart swelling in her chest.

Zuko stiffened slightly for the word had just slipped from him, it just seemed so natural. Did it bother her?

“What if I did?” he asked warily.

Katara smiled as she noticed the darkening stain on Zuko’s right cheek despite the stoic expression on his face and she threw her arms around his neck with a happy cry.
“I love it!” she exclaimed happily before she added amusingly, “It’s better than ‘pumpkin’!”

Zuko relaxed and let out a soft chuckle. He pulled her back slightly so he could place his fingers beneath her chin to lift her head toward him before he kissed her softly. When she returned the kiss and his body began to warm up again, he wondered if he really could keep his promise and not find a way to seduce her. He moved away from her delicious mouth and pushed her at arm’s length in order to regain some of his control.

“I think it’s best we retire to our rooms before I try to change your mind,” he said huskily with a small grin.

A blush blossomed across Katara cheeks before she smiled at him.

“Okay, my love,” she breathed out.

Zuko felt his heart skip a beat at her words and he smiled at her, at the way her cheeks flushed and at the swollen look of her lips, feeling smug at the thought that it was he that caused her to look in such a way. He again grabbed her hand and placed it beneath his arm before he led them back inside the quiet palace. They were silent as they made their way down the semi-dark corridor, and it was not long when they finally reached her door. Wanting to take another sweet gift from her before he retired for the night, Zuko quickly leaned toward her and stole a kiss from her lips, but the sweet taste of her again robbed him of his senses. With a low groan against her mouth, Zuko backed her up against her door and pressed himself against her soft body.

“Zuko,” she tried again to protest as she weakly pressed against his chest, even as her lips moved against his.

Zuko reluctantly pulled away from her delicious mouth with a deep sigh and buried his face against her shoulder with a frustrated groan. Damn, his lower regions ached so badly he felt he would explode at any moment. There was nothing to do except for him to return to his room and solve the problem himself. Damn it.

“Alright, alright, I’ll leave you alone now,” he said with another sigh as he moved his arms away from her, taking a few steps away to put some distance between them so he could regain some control. “Get some rest. I’ll see you at breakfast tomorrow.”

With a strained smile, the golden-eyed young man with a problem in his trousers turned away from the blue-eyed woman with irresistible curves and began to make his way to his room, but a small hand clutching the back of his tunic made him pause.

“I’m sorry,” he heard Katara whisper.

Frowning, Zuko again turned back around to face her, but she was looking down at her feet.

“For what?” he asked.

“I…I know it frustrates you that I keep you at a distance and that…we can’t be i-intimate,” she said softly. “I’m sorry for making you wait, especially since I know in the Fire Nation it is expected for a couple to—”

She was cut off by Zuko pressing his thumb on her lips as he gently grasped her chin with his fingers.

“We’ve already talked about this,” he said sternly yet gently. “I already told you that I will respect your views and your wishes. Yes, it frustrates me not to be able to make love to you to my heart’s content, but for you I will endure it and so much more.”

He gently added pressure to her chin to encourage her to lift her head up, and once she was looking at him, he smiled at her while his thumb caressed her lower lip.

“Waiting will create anticipation and once our bodies are finally joined together in the most intimate of ways it will be beyond wonderful,” he finished huskily.

“You think so?” she asked softly.

“I know so,” he answered just as softly.

He leaned back toward her, but he straightened himself and his face became the usual cool mask he wore, although his eyes continued to burn with a strong intensity.
“Good night, Katara,” he said before he added with a soft smile, “Sleep well, love.”

“Good night,” Katara sighed out dreamily as she struggled for a moment to open her door since she could not take her eyes away from the man before her.

Once she finally had the door opened, she slipped inside the room—their eyes still locked together—until she closed the door and blocked them from each other’s view. Katara leaned her back against the door for a moment. She heard Zuko’s soft footsteps move away until she could no longer hear them. With a sigh, she slipped down onto the floor and let her head fall back against the door.

She hoped she could talk to her family and Aang soon for she did not know if she would be able to resist Zuko any longer.
The Fire Lord’s antechamber was filled with the sound of rattling plates, the clicking of chopsticks, and excited talk as the Fire Lord and his small family consisting of his mother, his uncle, and his intended bride ate their breakfast. Ursa and Iroh were talking nonstop about the upcoming wedding, when it should be, who should be invited, and how wonderful it would be combining traditions from both the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe.

Sitting on the Fire Lord’s right, Katara was amused at the way Zuko would blanch at the outrageous ideas Iroh would come up with and she could not help but to pitch in with outrageous things from old wedding traditions of her tribe.

“How about we just get married right now to save ourselves the trouble?” Zuko threatened with a raised eyebrow.

Katara snapped her mouth shut before she grumbled when he smirked at her. She picked at her food with her chopsticks, but she stilled when she felt Zuko’s hand slide beneath the dark red skirt she had on. Soft hues of pink prickled on her cheeks when he rested his hand lightly on her thigh. She shivered when his fingers padded gently up and down her skin before he slowly trailed them inward. She quickly grabbed his hand to stop him when he came dangerously close to her aching warmth. Her eyes darted to Iroh and Ursa—who were too busy arguing about a certain part of the wedding ceremony to notice—before she turned to give Zuko an uncomfortable look. With an inaudible sigh, Zuko reluctantly moved his hand away and brought it upon the low table where he clenched it into a tight fist. Katara smiled at him gratefully, but he just gave her a strained smile in return.

She felt her heart sink when he looked away and resumed eating in silence for she knew that it frustrated him that they were unable to be together as often as they wanted, much less be intimate with each other. It was not as if she did not want to, because she did. She missed him, missed his touch, missed the times when it was just the two of them. But they couldn’t do such things since it would raise suspicions and rumors would spread. She had already broken a few rules the few times she had allowed herself to get close to him and if they continued who knew what could happen. She just did not want to risk it.

Katara was brought out of her thoughts when Zuko rose from his place beside her and she looked up.

“I must take my leave,” he said coolly as he placed his napkin down. “I have a meeting with the
“I think I will go with you today, Nephew,” Iroh spoke up as he, too, rose from his cushion beside Ursa.

Zuko nodded at him and smiled at his mother before he looked down at Katara. His eyes softened and he let out another inaudible sigh.

“I’ll see you both at dinner,” he said before he made his way to the door with Iroh following behind him.

Katara looked longingly after him before she returned to her meal once the doors were closed behind him and Iroh.

“It’s just you and me again today, Katara dear,” Ursa spoke up from across the low table with a smile.

The waterbender returned the smile before she looked down at her unfinished meal, allowing her mind to wander. Zuko and she had not held each other, much less kissed, since that time in the garden a few days ago for they were rarely alone and Zuko refused to show his affectionate side in the presence of his mother and uncle. Although he could not hide his feelings when he would stare intensely at her with those smoldering, amber eyes of his.

She sighed softly. She hoped she could talk to her family and Aang soon so she could finally marry Zuko. So they would not have to hide their immense feelings for each other anymore and so she could make him happy.

However, there was a part of her that felt a sense of dread that made her stomach twist and she wondered why.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The Fire Lord listened silently as one of his generals made his monthly report concerning the Fire Nation army and the progress of training new recruits. His advisors sat quietly in their places as they waited for the general to finish his report so they could begin discussing matters within the country as well as international relations with the other nations. Zuko lifted a hand to silence the general before he asked him to leave a written report on his desk with the excuse that he had other matters to attend to. The broad-shouldered general agreed, and after a respectful bow to his lord, he left the meeting room.
Zuko waited until he left before he returned his attention to his advisors. He wanted to make sure not to say too much with Wei present, even though he still had no evidence of Wei’s treachery. As for Wei, he continued to act as if he had not been accused of treason against the Fire Lord and Zuko again wondered if he might have been wrong in his assumptions against the advisor.

One of the members of his council stood and began to list the monthly profits from the trade with the other countries. Zuko tried to pay attention to what the man was saying, but his mind began to wander to Katara and her family. Once they arrived, he would be one step closer to taking Katara as his wife.

He remembered the way her smooth thigh had felt under his hand and he shifted slightly when his groin twitched. Agni, how he missed touching her, kissing her, watching her face flush as he brought her to that blissful release, but he was unable to do any of those things because Katara did not want them to raise any suspicions. But all he wanted to do was crush her to him and kiss her senseless before everyone so they could all see that she was his and she was the woman he was going to marry!

He was snapped out of his thoughts when the advisor finished and he frowned at himself for allowing his focus to wander. He would blame Katara for his distraction if it weren’t for the fact that he did not mind so much when he thought of her. He would just have to read the written records of the trading profits later in order to know what had been said. Clearing his throat, he thanked the man who bowed and sat back down.

“If there is no other matter to attend to, then the meeting is over,” the Fire Lord spoke coolly as he made to stand up from his throne.

He wondered if he could convince his uncle to ask Jee to escort his mother and Iroh outside the palace, that way he could have Katara to himself for the rest of the day. He was about to step down the marble stairs when he heard one of his advisors clear his throat rather loudly—obviously to gain his attention. Zuko paused and looked at the men with a frown.

“My lord,” one of them spoke up and bowed his head when the Fire Lord’s eyes landed on him, “may I have a word?”

Frown deepening, Zuko gracefully sat back down.

“Go on,” he said curtly.
The man cleared his throat again—this time nervously—before he spoke.

“There are rumors that Lady Mai has moved out of the palace,” he began slowly, testing his lord’s reaction. “Such a rumor could only imply that your relationship with her has ended.”

Narrowing his eyes, Zuko frowned. He knew servants would always gossip, so he really should not have been surprised to hear that the news had spread. He let out an inaudible, tired sigh and resisted the urge to rub his temples.

“It is true,” he answered in an impassive tone. “I am no longer in a relationship with Lady Mai.”

If that is what it ever really was, he thought to himself.

He immediately became wary when many of the men sat up and smiled calculatingly. He mentally prepared himself for what he knew would come next.

“You are now single and must be looking for a woman as a candidate for your wife and Fire Lady,” another of the advisors commented with a glint in his eye.

“No,” was Zuko’s direct and simple response. He ignored the shocked murmurs of his advisors.

It was true that he was not searching for such a candidate for he had already found his woman, and if he had his way, he would have been married to her already. He glanced at his uncle who was grinning knowingly at him.

“But, my lord!” another man exclaimed, “You are already twenty-one years old! That’s three years past the age of when you should have married and produced an heir!”

“I will marry when I am good and ready!” Zuko growled out automatically to their nagging protests.

“You have already been captured once, what if the next time you…die?” the first advisor that had spoken said with concern and frustration. “There will be no one to inherit the throne, the royal Zuko again resisted the urge to rub his temples since he knew they made a good point, but he could not tell them he was already engaged to Katara for he had promised her that he would not say anything, even if he really wanted to.

“Perhaps the Young One already has a woman in mind?” Wei interrupted over the loud protests of the other advisors.

Zuko turned to look at him suspiciously, but Wei only raised a gray eyebrow and shrugged.

“Yes, perhaps he does,” Iroh immediately piped in with smile. “Maybe you already have a lady in mind, Fire Lord Zuko?” he asked pointedly.

Zuko got the hint and gave his uncle a small smirk before he addressed the murmuring men.

“That is correct. I do have a woman in mind,” Zuko proclaimed and he suppressed a grin when the men gasped in shock. “It is very likely that she will soon become my wife.”

“Who is the lady?” one of the advisors asked with a displeased frown.

“First, I must make sure to secure her hand before I announce the news to you,” the young lord replied simply.

Before they could ask any more questions, Zuko swiftly stepped down from the dais, parted the wall of fire, and strode toward the doors. Iroh stood up from his spot and gave the baffled men a cheerful smile before he followed after his nephew. Once they were a good walking distance away from the throne room, Iroh let out a deep chuckle.

“That was good thinking, Zuko,” he praised as he smiled at his silent nephew.

“I just hope that will make them shut up and leave me alone,” the Fire Lord replied tersely.
“Oh, I doubt it,” the older firebender retorted with another chuckle. “Now that you are ‘single’, the noblemen will come down upon you to flaunt their unmarried female relatives at you.”

“There will be so many broken hearts,” the old man commented with a sigh.

He grinned when his nephew rolled his eyes.

The following day, Iroh’s prediction came true. Every single woman from the Fire Nation nobility flooded the public garden accompanied by their male relatives as they asked for an audience with the Fire Lord. Tension was high amongst the women of the upper society as the competition to win their lord’s favor became intense. Although they hid their hostility and competitiveness behind deceitful smiles and fake flattery.

The Fire Lord was not at all pleased to have his home invaded in such a way for now he had less of a chance to sneak in a private moment with his waterbender. It was all he could do not to throw them all out and ban them from the palace until she was safely married to him.

Blue eyes narrowed in annoyance, Katara balled her hands as she made her way toward the public garden where Advisor Chao had directed her to Zuko. When she woke up that morning she had been looking forward to another pleasant day in the Fire Nation Palace and even wondered if she could make some kind of excuse so she could have Zuko all to herself. But those wishes had been dashed rather rudely when the sound of feminine giggles and loud male voices reached her ears as she moved further away from the west wing.

At first, she had wondered if there was some kind of celebration that she did not know of to have gathered so many people, but when she asked Jiao what was going on, she had been so surprised and angry that it took all of her control not to cause a scene. Jiao had explained to her that the noblewomen had heard news of Zuko’s breakup with Mai and had invaded the palace in order to catch the Fire Lord’s eye and be proposed to!

The nerve!

Katara’s pace quickened a bit, but not so much as to raise any questions about her agitated state. She had to stop herself many times from running to the public garden in order to keep all the women away from her Zuko. She refused to make a fool of herself in front of all these snobbish noblewomen.

The public garden finally came into view and Katara paused at the edge to look around and take in the sight before her. There were so many people, more women than men, mingling around the garden as if there was a party going on. She stepped onto one of the stone paths and began to make her way through the noisy crowd in search of Zuko. She ignored the curious and disdainful looks the women threw at her and she did not notice the way the men eyed her appreciatively when she passed them. She had donned a light blue dress edged with silver lace at the hem that fell just below her ankles. She had placed her long, brown hair into a loose bun so that a few wisps of hair fell around her face in order to entice Zuko into spending some time with her. But it seemed that plan had also gone to waste.

Glancing around the garden, she finally spotted him surrounded by a group of women who were smiling coquettishly at him as they each tried to start a conversion with him over each other. Katara clenched her teeth as jealousy flared within her before she closed her eyes briefly and took a deep, calming breath, telling herself to be reasonable, since this was essentially her fault. She took a step forward, but paused and frowned when she saw one of the pretty noblewomen touch Zuko’s arm. Katara watched as Zuko looked down with an impassive expression at the woman who then threw him a coy smile, though her eyes were seductive as she leaned toward him. Katara’s heart constricted in her chest and her hands fisted at her sides, but she was relieved when Zuko frowned and slowly lifted the woman’s hand off him before he looked away.

Unable to watch the women flirt with the man she loved and was secretly engaged to, Katara turned away and began to swiftly make her way through the crowd so she could escape into the palace, her happy mood from that morning now gone. She was startled when her way was blocked and she looked up with a frown only to be met with four young men smiling charmingly at her.

“Good morning, Lady Katara,” one of them spoke in a pleasant tone as he and the others gave a polite bow. “It is good to see you again,” he continued as he flicked his long, black hair over his shoulder.

“And you look as lovely as always,” another of them said as his dark brown eyes raked her form before he smiled at her.

Katara frowned at them since she did not know who they were, but then realized they were a few of the men she had danced with during Zuko’s birthday celebration. But since her attention had been entirely centered on Zuko, she could not remember their names or anything about them. Not wanting to be rude, Katara gave them a small smile and returned the bow.

“Noblemen, it’s, uh, a pleasure to see you again,” she said politely as she tried to go around them, but she narrowed her eyes when they moved to block her again.
“We are so glad to see that you and the Fire Lord returned safely,” the shorter of the men spoke up sincerely.

“Yes, there were so many rumors, one more horrible than others,” the first man with the long, dark hair spoke up. “Being stranded on an island after falling overboard during the storm must have been terrible.”

Is that the story that is being told to the people? Katara thought to herself. But before she could ponder on it any longer another man with a long crooked nose spoke up.

“It must have been so frightening for you,” he said in a deep voice filled with sympathy.

Katara resisted the impulse to roll her eyes at him. Just because she was a woman did not mean she would let something as being stranded in an island scare her.

“Oh, well, Fire Lord Zuko did everything he could to keep me safe—” she began before she was interrupted by the man with the dark eyes who still had a leering smile on his lips.

“Who would not want to keep a beautiful woman as yourself protected?” he cooed.

The waterbender frowned. She was not in the mood for their flattery, but before she could reply, the one with the long hair interrupted her musings once more.

“The Avatar is so lucky to have such a beautiful woman as his companion,” he said with a wistful sigh.

Katara opened her mouth to say something, but she paused when a deep, baritone voice caressed her ears.

“Lady Katara, may I have a moment to speak with you?” Zuko asked as he appeared at her side, his tall form towering over the other men who stiffened at the dark look he was sending them.
Katara shivered at the cold tone of his voice before she finally found her own.

“Of course, Fire Lord Zuko,” she said formally as she glanced briefly behind him to see the group of women frowning after Zuko.

She bowed to the men who returned the gesture with enthusiasm and to the silent Fire Lord who did not spare them another look as he turned to walk away. Katara followed him quietly, ignoring the curious looks the courtiers gave them as they opened a path for the Fire Lord and the waterbender. Once they entered the palace, Katara had to lift the hem of her dress a little in order to quicken her pace as Zuko swiftly strode down the golden corridors. She noticed that his shoulders were tense and his hands kept clenching at his sides, and she wondered what was wrong. The silence was killing her!

It was not long before she realized they were walking toward the western wing where only those with permission from the Fire Lord were allowed to enter, and she knew that Zuko was taking them to a place where they could talk in private. Zuko led her toward the Royal Palace Garden and stopped only after they were standing below the cherry blossom tree before he whirled around to face her.

Katara reeled at the angry look on his face, but before she could ask what was going on, he grabbed her upper arms to crush her to him before his lips smashed into hers in a hard kiss. A gasp escaped her at the fierceness of it, and Zuko immediately took advantage of her parted lips to plunge his tongue inside her mouth, flicking it against her cheeks, twining it around her tongue, dominating her mouth. Katara struggled for a moment at his unrelenting kiss, but her body soon surrendered to the sensations and she was returning the kiss just as fervently. But then, Zuko pulled away with a growl and pinned her with a glare.

“How could you let those bastards flirt with you?!” he asked angrily.

“Excuse me?!” Katara exclaimed indignantly as she tried to steady her breathing and calm her racing heart. “You’re the one who has a bunch of lustful women throwing themselves at you and you don’t seem to mind! I’m the one who’s supposed to be angry here, not you!”

Zuko opened his mouth to retort, but instead he let out a sigh and frowned. He eased his grip on her arms and gently ran them up and down to soothe her.

“You’re right. I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have reacted like that,” he apologized as he took her hand and brought it to his lips. “It’s just that when I saw those men surrounding you, looking at you like you were a piece of meat…It made my protective instincts surge forward and I immediately made my way over, almost knocking the noblewomen out of my way.”
He chuckled dryly before the angry fire returned to his eyes again.

“But when one of them mentioned you being Aang’s girlfriend…” he trailed off with a growl, “It took all I had not to shout that you are mine and not Aang’s.”

“I’m sorry, Zuko,” Katara apologized softly as she brought his hand holding hers to his lips toward her cheek. “I know how much this displeases you. I’m sorry for making you so unhappy, for hurting you—”

“No,” Zuko interrupted firmly as he cupped her cheek. “You don’t make me unhappy and I know you would never hurt me intentionally. It just frustrates me that we’re keeping our relationship a secret, but I already told you that I understand and will respect your wishes.”

Katara’s blue eyes began to glisten with tears and she wound her arms around him before she buried her face in his chest. Zuko immediately wrapped his arms around her and rested his chin on her head.

“You’re too good to me, Zuko,” she whispered against him and sniffled softly.

“You’re the best thing that has ever happened to me, Katara,” Zuko responded sincerely and squeezed her gently. “And I will do everything in my power not to screw it up and lose you.”

“You won’t lose me if you make mistakes because I’ll probably make some, too,” she replied as she lifted her head to give him a watery smile.

“Well, then we’re just going to have to learn from our mistakes, just like Uncle would say,” Zuko said with a soft chuckle.

“Yeah,” Katara agreed with a giggle.

“You look very beautiful in this dress,” Zuko praised with a grin as he brushed his fingers along the lacy edge of the top, touching the skin of her chest as he did so. “It took all I had not to carry you off to my room.”
Katara laughed at his words, pleased that he found her beautiful in her outfit, as she again snuggled into him.

“Yeah, well, every time I’m near you my heart starts to pound like crazy,” she told him with a grin.

“Really?” Zuko asked with a playful concerned look as he pulled her slightly away to stare at her chest. “Maybe you’re sick. We just have to check it,” he stated seriously and buried his face between her breasts as if he were trying to hear her heartbeat.

Katara laughed and tried to push him away. Zuko chuckled as he ignored her attempts and instead brought her back against him.

She sighed against his warm chest, at the feeling of being protected and cherished, as Zuko wound his arms tighter around her to bring her closer to him. The shade the cherry blossom tree provided against the sun felt wonderful as the scent of various flowers combined with the sound of chirping birds, quacking turtle-ducks, and the rustling of leaves surrounded them in a pleasant cocoon.

“I must return to my guests before they start to demand my presence,” Zuko spoke after a while in a dry tone. He gave her one more squeeze before reluctantly letting go. He wished he had more time to spend with his water nymph, as he had come to call her in his mind.

“Can’t you just kick them out?” Katara asked with a pout that caused Zuko to chuckle and peck her pursed lips swiftly.

“I wish I could, love, but unfortunately, I can’t be rude and have them thrown out of the palace if I want to avoid any problems,” the young lord explained coolly before he sighed. “As long as I do not present to the Royal Court with the woman I have chosen to marry, they will not stop in their pursuit to win my favor.”

Katara’s shoulders slumped as she began to wring her hands together.

“I know and I’m sorry for making us wait,” she began quietly before she looked up to narrow her eyes at him. “It’s just that seeing all those salivating women clinging to you just…Ugh!”

Zuko smiled at her irritated expression as he pulled her to him again and kissed the top of her head.
“You don’t need to worry about them, love,” he reassured her as he nuzzled his nose against her cheek. “I have chosen to take you as my wife.”

“I love hearing you call me your love,” Katara said with a bashful smile.

“It is what you are,” Zuko responded matter-of-factly. “You are the one I love.”

Katara sighed happily—it never stopped amazing her to hear Zuko say he loved her—and she relaxed into him.

“I miss us being like this,” she said softly as she squeezed him and placed a kiss on his covered chest.

“I do too,” he responded just as softly. “But soon we will marry and I will have you all to myself, just like you will have all of me.”

Katara raised her head to smile brightly at him as she said, “That’s a promise.”

A large smile appeared on Katara’s face, Lady Ursa laughed softly, and Zuko’s two personal guards were grinning as the admiral’s cheeks flushed lightly, though he tried to hide it by pretending to fix the sheath of his sword tied to his hip. They had been teasing the man when they finally made him confess that he had grown fond of the little turtle-ducklings that lived near the Royal Palace Garden’s pond.

Once he knew he had composed himself, Jee looked up to glare at the two smirking guards before he scowled halfheartedly at the giggling females that were very important to his lord—and to him as well.

Jee’s eyes widened at the last thought before he mentally shook his head. When Lady Ursa smiled at him and told him he need not feel embarrassed, he again felt that strange feeling in his chest that started when he began to guard her. He hardened himself, he could not get attached for he was a simple admiral and he was just doing his duty in protecting his lord’s mother.

“We should hurry to the garden before General Iroh becomes impatient and begins to drink the afternoon tea without us,” Jee spoke up gruffly.
“You’re right, Admiral Jee,” Lady Ursa responded with a soft smile, hoping she had not gone too far in teasing him.

Ursa, Katara, Jee, and the two guards continued their walk down one of the hallways that would lead them to the Royal Palace Garden. A week had passed since the palace was invaded with almost all the single female members of the Royal Court and their male relatives. Even though Zuko continued to ignore the men’s hints and requests and the women’s advances, they did not give up and continued to arrive at the palace. Fortunately, the Fire Lord did not invite them to stay in the guests rooms, and so, they had to return to their homes at night, leaving the lord, his family and servants in peace.

While Lady Ursa and Jee had a light conversation, Katara glanced at the two guards that were silently following behind her as they had been doing for the past few days before she glanced away with an inaudible sigh.

She had left her room one day when Zuko approached her with his personal guards and simply told her he was appointing them to protect her, which meant in Katara’s mind ‘to follow her everywhere she went’. He had already told them that she was his intended bride and they had immediately agreed to protect her. She had pulled him aside after giving the guards a small smile before she hissed at him that she refused to be babysat and did not need to be protected as if she were one of those delicate noblewomen. Zuko had frowned at her before he firmly replied that the Fire Nation was not as safe as the Southern Water Tribe and now that there were so many speculations about his relationship with her, someone may use her to get to him again. And besides, they still did not know who was the traitor living among them or when they would strike next, and Zuko was not about to risk her safety.

‘I also want them to discourage any more eager noblemen from approaching you,’ he had added with a growl.

She had wanted to roll her eyes, but she could see the worry and determination in his eyes, and after a long moment of debating with herself, she had relented. The relieved smile he gave her was enough to compensate for her sense of lost independence. But she should not have worried, for the two guards followed her at a respectful distance and did not interrupt with whatever she was doing. Sometimes she even forgot they were there.

Katara glanced back at the two silent guards, and when she caught their eye, she smiled at them. Their lips twitched into a small smile and she turned back around with a grin on her face since it was so funny to break them from the stern expressions they had on to ward off everybody else. The first day they began to ‘guard’ her, she asked them for their names. The older of the two was named Shen and she had found out that he had been one of Zuko’s soldiers when the young prince had been banished. When the new Fire Lord had asked him if he would like to be one of his personal guards,
Shen had immediately accepted. He had a severe expression and was rather silent most of the time, but he loosened up a bit with those he held loyalty to. The other taller guard was named Kuo, and he was only a few years older than Zuko. Katara found out he had a funny sense of humor and smiled easily, but when he was on duty he turned into a rather intimidating being. No nobleman or noblewoman had dared to approach her with two fierce-looking guards standing behind her.

“Katara dear, is there anything specific you would like to do today?” Lady Ursa’s voice brought the musing waterbender out of her thoughts.

“Not really, but is there something you would like to do?” Katara asked as she looked up to smile at her.

While the older woman asked the admiral if they could all go into the city, Katara's smile widened a bit. Although she could tell Lady Ursa was still sad and hurt over what happened with Azula, the gentle woman was doing much better if she wanted to leave the palace and the sanctuary of her room. Zuko had thanked her for helping his mother out of her depressed mood and Katara had sincerely replied that she was glad to help, after all, she had been the one who had suggested Ursa visit Azula.

At the thought of Zuko, a smile spread across her face and she let out a tiny blissful sigh. She recalled all the stolen moments they had shared since Zuko had pulled her away from those noblemen that had been flirting with her in the public garden. Those stolen moments between them were filled with quick kisses, light touches, whispered loving words, and although they were short, she treasured those small moments she was able to have with Zuko.

As they passed the hallway that led to Zuko’s study, Katara wondered if she could pop in for a small visit. She glanced at his door only to freeze when she saw Mai opening the door. Mai paused as she noticed her, and with a blank expression, she entered the room and closed the door behind her without another glance.

When did Mai get here? Did Zuko already know? Katara thought to herself as she felt her heart constrict in her chest. And why is she going into his study?

“Katara?” Ursa called out her name gently and touched her arm. “I’m sure Zuko must have an explanation.”

Katara nodded slowly as she allowed Lady Ursa to lead her away, ignoring the worried looks Jee and the two guards gave her. As they walked away, Katara glanced once more at the closed door, wondering what it was Zuko and Mai were talking about and what they could be doing.
Frowning at the knock on his door, Zuko called for whoever it was outside to enter as he finished sealing the message addressed to the prison guard captain directing him to report any activity surrounding Ozai and Wei’s brother. He heard the door open and then close, and he suppressed a tired sigh.

Placing the scroll aside, Zuko looked up and his eyes widened slightly when he saw Mai standing silently before him. Leaning back against his chair, he frowned as he regarded her curiously.

“Mai,” he began. There was a brief pause before he asked, “What are you doing here?”

Mai walked closer to the large desk with a soft smile and Zuko eyed her warily.

“I was worried when news that you had been stranded on an island reached me, so I returned to the Fire Nation to see for myself that you were truly all right,” she responded simply as she moved closer.

Zuko frowned at her words for she should have known he was fine after he had sent a message in reply to her father who had begged him to take her back.

“I am fine,” Zuko replied with a small smile. “You should not have traveled all the way from Omashu, but I thank you, nonetheless, for your concern.”

“Of course I would be concerned about you and would want to make sure you were indeed well,” Mai reiterated with a small frown marring her pale features. “I was worried that you were hurt. I love you.”

Zuko let out a sigh as he stood up from his chair, turned toward the large window, and stared outside.

“You already know what my feelings toward you are,” he reminded her softly.

Although he had his back toward her, Mai gave a small nod and straightened herself as she regarded him silently.
“I’ve been thinking a lot this past month,” she began quietly, “and I have come to realize that I may not have been the best girlfriend for you. But if you give me another chance, I will try my best to be.”

Zuko turned away from the window to frown at her.

“I will not give you another chance because I will never be able to love you like you wish me to,” he told her gently yet firmly.

“But why?” she demanded with narrowed eyes. “Why won’t you?”

Zuko pressed his lips tightly together. He wanted to tell her he would never consider giving her a second chance for he was in love with Katara and he was going to marry her. But, he remained silent since he had promised Katara not to say anything about their engagement yet. Instead, he looked away and turned his gaze back to the scenery outside the window.

Narrowing her eyes in frustration, the tall noblewoman walked around the desk to stand beside him, but he did not even glance her way. She resisted the urge to grind her teeth in anger at his dismissive manner.

“There are other rumors, besides the one about you breaking up with me,” she said dryly, “that say you have already chosen a woman.” Her tone became strained at the end of her sentence. “Is it true?”

Zuko glanced at her from the corner of his eyes before he returned his attention back outside as he answered a simple and truthful, “Yes.”

Mai flinched before she closed her dark eyes and clenched her hands tightly at her sides. Once she knew she was in control again, she reopened her eyes and slowly unclenched her hands.

“Who is this woman?” she asked coldly.

“Everybody will find out soon enough,” he said shortly.
“It’s Katara, isn’t it?!” she hissed angrily.

Zuko let out a sigh as he finally turned his head to look at the angry woman standing beside him. He felt terrible for hurting her. She had been by his side for almost four years after all, even if he had been unhappy during that time. And he had to admit that he was not exactly a good boyfriend to her either. They were just not good for each other.

“Yes,” he confessed softly for he did not want to hurt Mai more than he already had. “Katara is the woman I have chosen as my future wife.”

He sighed guiltily when Mai let out a pained gasp before she recovered herself.

“Why her?” Mai demanded to know. “I am better suited for the position of Fire Lady, I know the way of court life, and I know what is expected of such a position, while Katara is nothing but a simple peasant with no special qualities—”

Her eyes widened when Zuko whirled around to pin her with an angry glare.

“I told you not to insult Katara ever again!” he growled out furiously. “The reason I am marrying Katara is not because she will be the perfect Fire Lady, but because she will be the perfect wife for me!”

Hurt flashed across Mai’s usually expressionless face before she looked away.

“You never defended me like you always do her,” she said blankly.

Zuko let out a tired sigh and pinched the bridge of his nose before he looked at her again.

“After everything I went through for you, this is how you repay me?” she asked bitingly before her voice became laced with pain. “My parents never showed me any affection and I never knew any happiness. But with you I thought I would finally have that chance, a chance to be what I wanted to be and have someone love me. You made me believe I did for four years and now you’re telling me that you’re marrying someone else!”
“I am sorry if I hurt you, if I caused you pain. That was never my intention,” Zuko told her softly. “In the beginning, I truly believed you would make me happy as I would make you. But I cannot lie to you now and say I love you, because I don’t. I can’t.”

“It’s all because of the waterbender,” the dark-haired woman said without any hint of emotion as she stared at him.

Zuko again returned his gaze outside the window where he could just barely see his private garden, the place where Katara and he spent most of their time when they had some free moments to themselves, however brief. A wistful sigh escaped him.

“I have fallen in love with a divine being, a wonderful woman that has shown me how to forget and forgive the horrible events and mistakes in my life,” he spoke up almost to himself.

“How can you say that to me? Don’t you know it pains me to hear you say you love another woman?!” she cried out.

“I’m sorry, Mai, truly I am,” he told her as he again looked at her. “But I am honest with her and with you. While I do care for you and am grateful for everything you have done, I love Katara.”

Mai turned away from him and clenched her eyes shut. Zuko felt another pinch of guilt and he reached out a hand to touch her shoulder.

“If you’d like, we can be friends,” he told her softly. “I’ll help you forget the past—”

She wrenched her shoulder away from his touch and she spun around to glare at him.

“I don’t want to be just friends!” she gritted out. “I don’t want to forget what was between us, I don’t want to stop loving you, and I don’t want you to love another woman!”

“Do not cling to the impossible!” Zuko reprimanded sharply. “I told you that I can never love you. I will always love Katara and she’s going to be my wife!”

He sighed at her pained look and then more softly he said, “Do not hurt yourself anymore, Mai.
Please accept that there is nothing between us and there never will. I’m sure one day you will find a good man who will truly love you.”

“You promised me four years ago that you would never break up with me again,” she reminded him stubbornly.

“This time I cannot keep my promise,” he stated.

Mai was silent for a moment as she continued to stare at him before she straightened her thin shoulders and clasped her hands before her.

“At least this time you didn’t break up with me though a letter,” she said coldly.

Zuko cringed at the reminder before he replaced his impassive mask.

“I already apologized for that,” he said as he clenched his jaw.

She ignored him as she turned away and began to make her way to the door. She opened it and stepped out, but not before looking over her shoulder to give him one last glare.

“You and Katara will regret this,” she warned silently before she closed the door behind her.

Zuko frowned at her words before he sighed as he sat down heavily on his chair. Maybe he should not have said he would be her friend since he knew that he could not, for it would hurt Katara to have to tolerate his former girlfriend’s presence, and he did not want to cause Katara such pain.

He hoped Mai would return to Omashu and someday find the happiness that she longed for. He also hoped she had just said those last words because she was angry and truly did not mean it because if she somehow tried to harm Katara he will not be merciful to her.

Jee frowned as he studied the Pai Sho tiles before him and tried to find a good move. He resisted the urge to smile triumphantly as he moved his piece and sat back to watch the retired general take his turn. Iroh sipped his tea calmly as he studied the Pai Sho board before he reached a hand out and moved his tile.
Katara, Ursa, and Chao glanced at each other with smothered grins when Admiral Jee scowled as he looked down at the game board and Iroh smiled cheerfully as he took another sip from his green tea. They smiled at Jiao as she passed them some pastries and Katara turned to ask Shen and Kuo if they wanted any. A smile had begun to spread across Kuo’s face as he stared at the pastries, but a jab to his side from the older guard’s elbow made him decline and resume his alert position. Shen turned dark, gray eyes to Katara and smiled politely. Katara rolled her eyes at them, but let it go as she turned back to watch Iroh and Jee play Pai Sho.

She remembered watching Mai enter Zuko’s study and she smothered the jealousy that flared within her. It did not matter what Mai wanted because Zuko had assured her he had never loved the young noblewoman and will never resume a relationship with her. But still, that uncertainty continued to nag her.

Iroh and Jee were interrupted from their game when a shadow fell across the board and they all looked up toward the entrance of the veranda where they had been resting for the past hour or so. Realizing it was Mai, they glanced around at each other before they all looked at Katara.

“Why, Lady Mai,” Ursa greeted politely, “I did not know you had returned from Omashu.”

“I just arrived this morning, Lady Ursa,” Mai replied tonelessly. “It is good to see you again, General Iroh.” She gave a small bow to the Fire Lord’s mother and uncle before she turned dark eyes on the silent waterbender. “I would like to speak to Katara.”

It did not go unnoticed by the others that the noblewoman had refrained from adding the respectful title of ‘lady’ to Katara’s name.

Shen and Kuo took a step forward with menacing looks. They had never liked the cold noblewoman and they were not about to allow her to insult the woman that had changed their lord for the better and meant so much to him. The entire palace had noticed that their Fire Lord was no longer in the livid mood he had been in when he returned from the Southern Water Tribe. There was a subtle softness and contentment in his eyes, and Kuo and Shen knew it was all thanks to Lady Katara. They paused, however, when the kind waterbender waved them away with an unaffected smile before she turned to regard the other woman with a wary look.

“Alright,” she consented as she stood from the low table before she smiled at the small group who frowned at her. “I’ll be right back,” she told them.
“We’ll be waiting for you here, my dear,” Iroh piped in with a smile.

Katara nodded, and with another suspicious look aimed at Mai, she walked past the silent dark-haired woman and stepped back into the garden. Mai felt a twinge of resentment swell within her. She had been unable to get close to Zuko’s family like the waterbender had and she clenched her jaw tightly as she followed after the blue-eyed woman.

Iroh and Ursa looked at each other worriedly while Zuko’s personal guards walked toward the entrance of the veranda so they could see the two women. Chao cleared his throat uncomfortably and Jiao nervously began to clean the table of crumbs for both had never seen such a deadly look from the young noblewoman.

“Kuo?” Iroh spoke up softly.

“Yes, General Iroh,” Kuo immediately responded. The younger guard’s light amber eyes flashed as he glanced away from the retreating women as he turned to look at his lord’s uncle.

“I think it’s best you tell my nephew to come,” Iroh told him before he glanced at Ursa. “I have a bad feeling about this.”

Kuo glanced briefly at Shen, who nodded, before the younger guard bowed and swiftly made his way back inside the palace in search of his lord.

Katara led Mai some distance away where they could not be heard, but still be seen before she turned toward the taller woman with a guarded expression. She had to stop herself from blurting out the question of what she had been doing in Zuko’s study.

“What do you want to talk about, Mai?” she asked brusquely.

“I know you are the reason why Zuko dumped me,” Mai replied instead in a bitter tone. “You are the reason why Zuko doesn’t love me,” she added more quietly.

Katara frowned at the pain she could detect in the other woman’s cold voice before she let out a sigh. She could understand that Mai must be hurt and that was why the older woman acted so curt toward her—she would probably be the same way if their roles were reverse.
“I had nothing to do with Zuko’s decision in breaking up with you,” she said softly.

“You are lying!” Mai hissed and her hands clenched at her sides. “Zuko would have never broken up with me if you hadn’t intervened! What did you do to snare him?”

The waterbender narrowed her blue eyes indignantly at Mai’s words. As if she would lower herself to tricks just to steal a man. However, she was not even going to bother denying such a stupid accusation.

“The only thing I did to win Zuko’s heart was show him the compassion and friendship that he needed in his life,” Katara answered instead as she raised her chin determinedly. “I lent him a sympathetic ear when he needed someone to talk to, I was there to listen to him and be there for him when he needed someone to keep him company, even if he said so otherwise.” Her cobalt eyes glared angrily at the expressionless woman before her. “Unlike you, I showed Zuko that I love him for everything he is, for both his virtues and faults, and not just for what he has. I showed him that he is worthy of being loved.”

Mai reared back a step as if she had been physically slapped, but she immediately composed herself and squared her thin shoulders, raising her chin even higher as she glared heatedly at the brunette waterbender.

“If Zuko has really told you he will marry you, then why has he not announced his intentions of doing so?” she spat out angrily.

“Oh, if he had his way, Zuko would’ve done so the moment we arrived in the Fire Nation,” Katara replied with a smug smile. “But he held back because of me, because I asked him to wait a bit longer to announce our engagement.”

Mai gritted her teeth together and clenched her hands so tightly that her pale skin turned white.

“Do you really think the Royal Court will accept a mere Water Tribe woman as their Fire Lady?” she asked harshly. “Do you really believe you can handle the tasks and responsibilities of being wife to the Fire Lord and Fire Lady to the Fire Nation?” Mai continued, her tone turning cold and cutting. “You do not even know the way of court life, so how can you believe that you are worthy of such a position, that you will be welcomed?”
Katara felt her stomach sink since all Mai had said was true, those were the same questions she kept asking herself, but she refused to back down and be cowed by this bitter woman.

“As long as Zuko wants me as his wife, that is all that matters,” the blue-eyed woman replied confidently.

There was a long, tension-filled silence as both women glared unwaveringly at each other. The sounds of rustling leaves and the quacks of the turtle-ducks went unnoticed as well as the curious and worried stares from the small group waiting in the veranda. Katara’s eyes narrowed cautiously when a malicious smile spread across Mai’s thin lips.

“You must know some of the Fire Nation traditions,” Mai began casually as she brought a thin hand up to brush her long, dark hair over her shoulder. “Do you really believe Zuko will be faithful to you? As Fire Lord he can have as many concubines, mistresses, lovers as he desires.” Her malicious smile grew. “Perhaps I will be his favorite one. We have been acquainted with each other quite intimately, after all.”

Katara felt a stab of pain, anger and jealousy in her chest at the reminder. She had to force down the urge to lunge at Mai and pull out the woman’s hair in rage. However, she pushed those feelings away and told herself that all of that was in the past and will never be repeated again. She ignored the haughty look Mai gave her at her silence, for Katara knew Zuko was going to marry her, so she tried not to let Mai’s words upset her.

“You may have been close to Zuko in such a way, but it seems you were unable to satisfy and please him, both of which I’ll make sure to do once we marry,” Katara countered with a cool smirk that caused Mai to stiffen and growl under her breath. “Whatever you have to say doesn’t matter because I know Zuko loves me and only me. So just because you were unable to win his love, you don’t have to take your anger out on me.”

Katara’s head snapped to the side when Mai’s palm connected with her cheek. She heard Ursa and Jiao’s loud gasps from all the way in the veranda as well as the men’s angry voices as they shouted her name in concern. Katara brushed her hair away from her face as she slowly turned back. She noticed Jee and Shen swiftly making their way toward them, but she waved them away as she pinned blazing, azure eyes on Mai. Without warning, Katara struck her hand out and slapped Mai’s cheek, causing the noblewoman to gasp and stumble a bit to the side.

Mai looked up to glare at the waterbender as she touched her throbbing cheek with incredulous and angry eyes. She jumped a step back as she slid two small daggers from each of her sleeves before throwing them at the waterbender. Katara expected some sort of retaliation, so she had already pulled a stream of water from her waterskin, and when she saw the daggers heading her way, she flicked them aside with her water whip before she threw a sharp ice disk at Mai, who easily jumped out of
Just as she landed a few feet away, Mai slashed her right arm sideways and a few shuriken flew from her sleeve and headed toward Katara who raised an ice shield before her with one hand. The sharp, metal stars imbedded themselves in the ice with sharp crackling sounds before they were thrown to the side as Katara returned the ice to liquid while with the other hand she cracked her sharp water whip at Mai. The noblewoman tried to dodge but she was not fast enough as the water whip cracked against shoulder. Mai cried out in pain as the force of the blow had her spinning in the air before she fell to the ground.

Standing a few feet away, Jee and Shen looked on with worried frowns as they wondered if they should separate the fighting women.

Katara watched with angry, narrowed eyes as the noblewoman jumped to her feet and clutched at her bruised shoulder. She did not want to hurt Mai out of jealousy, but she was also not going to let the older woman defeat her. She wanted to make it perfectly clear to Mai that Zuko belonged to her and there was nothing the noblewoman could do to separate them.

“Zuko is mine! He is supposed to marry me!” Mai screamed angrily as she righted herself.

“You should accept that Zuko never loved you!” Katara tried to reason with her as well as keep her jealousy away. “Zuko will only love me!”

“Shut up!” Mai shrieked. Her once blank features now contorted in an angry snarl.

Crossing her arms over her chest, she slashed them sideways and a few darts flew at Katara again. The waterbender was able to repel all of them, though there was one that came close to slicing her cheek open. Katara did not let it faze her as she shot forth a few balls of ice. Mai quickly evaded them as she again raised her arm to throw another barrage of sharp weapons. Katara did not give her a chance to launch her attack as she wrapped a water tentacle around the woman’s ankle and pulled it back. Mai gasped as her leg was pulled under her and she landed hard on her side. The waterbender called back the liquid tendril and it coiled around her shoulders as she watched the dark-eyed woman with a satisfied smirk.

“You bitch!” Mai screamed as she swiftly jumped to her feet.

She attacked again, but to her growing anger, the waterbender easily deflected her attacks.
The small crowd in the veranda looked at the fight with worry since it seemed obvious that Mai seriously wanted to hurt Katara. As the fight continued, they wondered what was taking Zuko so long.

Zuko’s worried frown deepened as Kuo silently urged him to go faster. He had been looking through his general’s written report in his study when Kuo had entered and quickly told him his presence was needed in the Royal Palace Garden. The concern in his guard’s eyes made Zuko immediately leave his desk and race down the corridor toward the garden. Kuo had not explained what was going on and Zuko hoped it was not something serious for the thought of something happening to Katara or his mother made his stomach clench.

The entrance to the garden finally came into view and Zuko swiftly stepped out only to be frozen in shock at the scene before him. Katara and Mai were fighting and it was obvious they were intent on harming each other. His eyes quickly accessed his waterbender and he was relieved to see she was unharmed before he looked at Mai. It was obvious she was not faring well against the master waterbender. A few bruises had already formed on her cheeks, there were rips on a few parts of her clothing, and her usually neat hairdo was in disarray.

He wondered what the hell was going on as he stood rooted to the spot—puzzled at the scene and admiring Katara’s graceful movements. He watched as Katara spun away when Mai threw a few kunai at her before Mai was knocked back when Katara slammed a ball of water into her stomach. With a pained grunt Mai landed on her back a few feet away. When it seemed Mai was too exhausted to stand up, Katara relaxed from her fighting stance and turned around to head back to the veranda.

Zuko snapped out of his confused daze when he saw his former girlfriend quickly regain her feet, and with an angry shout, throw more darts from her sleeves at the retreating back of the woman he loved. Katara swiftly whirled around to repel the attack. However, one of the sharp weapons sliced Katara’s arm and her sleeve immediately became stained with blood, causing Zuko to become enraged at the sight. He immediately rushed forward with Kuo running after him.

A satisfied smirk appeared on Mai’s thin lips as one of her darts caught Katara’s arm, making the waterbender wince as she jumped back. Mai slipped a dagger into her hand and swiped her arm out, the small sharp blade flying out swiftly from her hand and aimed at the waterbender’s heart. Katara’s eyes widened but before she could bend some water to block the dagger, a bright fire whip shot forth and deflected it, causing the blade to spin away before it imbedded itself in the grass a few feet away.

“That is enough, Mai!” they heard Zuko roar and both women turned to see him striding angrily toward them.
Kuo, Jee, and Shen were following close behind him with dark expressions on their faces, but they stopped a few feet away just as Iroh, Ursa, Chao, and Jiao approached. They waited quietly to see what was going to happen.

Zuko’s body was stiff with anger as he stopped to stand protectively beside Katara, who was grateful that he had not insulted her skills by pushing her behind him. Katara could feel her sleeve becoming wet with her blood by the small cut on her arm, but she refused to show that the injury and pain affected her. She would heal it later since it was a minor wound. The warmth of Zuko’s body close to hers and the way his arm brushed against her uninjured arm made her heave a relaxed and contented sigh in her head.

Panting in exertion, Mai’s eyes narrowed at the closeness between Zuko and the waterbender’s bodies, but she backed down and relaxed her aggressive stance as she resumed her emotionless mask, though her dark eyes blazed with rage as she glared at Katara. She could not believe she had allowed the water wench to affect her so much that she lost her composure. The noblewoman returned her gaze to Zuko’s hard features and a pleading expression came over her face.

“Zuko, I—”

“How dare you come into my home and attack the one I care so much about,” he cut her off with a growl.

Mai’s hands clenched at her sides as she hissed out, “I was just fighting for what is mine—”

“I already told you that I never belonged to you!” Zuko again interrupted her in a hard tone.

“You would if it wasn’t because of her!” Mai hissed as she turned her glare at Katara. A few strands of her disheveled hair fell over her face and she angrily flicked them away. “She’s the one who took you away from me!”

“It’s not Katara’s fault I was unable to love you,” Zuko growled out lowly, his patience now gone as he stated, “It was your own fault.”

Mai stepped back with a gasp as if he had physically struck her.

“I had foolishly offered my friendship to you and you repaid it by harming someone that is very important to me,” Zuko continued in a biting and hard tone as he stepped closer to Katara. “I will not make the same mistake twice.”

Katara frowned slightly as she glanced at Zuko while Mai’s eyes widened.

“What do you mean?” the dark-haired noblewoman asked as she clutched at her throat.

“I do not want to see you again, Mai. For daring to hurt the one I love most, you are prohibited from entering the palace until I say so otherwise,” Zuko proclaimed coldly.

“You cannot do that!” Mai exclaimed angrily as her back stiffened.

“I can and I will, for I am Fire Lord,” he replied firmly.

He paused when he felt a small hand touch his arm, and he looked down to see Katara staring up at him with a small frown.

“Maybe you’re being a bit too harsh, Zuko,” she said softly.

Despite the violent anger coursing through his body, Zuko placed his hand above her own and squeezed it gently as he looked intently into her blue eyes.

“I will not forgive those that harm you, Katara,” he told her firmly.

He returned his hard gaze to Mai, who was watching them with angry, narrowed eyes.

“I want you to leave my home immediately, Mai,” he ordered. “Return to your house or to your parents in Omashu. You are not welcomed here until I deem it fit to lift your punishment.”

Mai’s fuming expression disappeared and in its place there was desperation and hurt. What would people say when they found out she had been banished from the Fire Nation Palace?
“Please, Zuko, don’t do this to me!” she exclaimed. “I am sorry! I—”

“Leave now before I ask my guards to escort you out of the palace gates,” Zuko interrupted as his hand continued to hold onto Katara’s, who had decided to let him handle things as he saw fit.

Mai stiffened and her hands clenched at her sides as she glared at them both with hatred. Jee and Zuko’s guards prepared themselves in case the noblewoman decided to attack their lord and his future wife, but she relaxed and straightened herself into the noblewoman she was raised to be, her blank features once again returning to her. She looked at Zuko sadly before she glared at Katara.

“Everything I told you before is the truth,” she said in a monotone voice. Without another glance or word she turned around and walked back toward the entrance of the palace.

Once she was out of sight, Zuko swiftly turned to Katara to check on her, his enraged features now full of concern as he brushed his fingers along the bloody sleeve.

“Are you all right? Does it hurt too much?” he asked worriedly as his eyes darted back to her face to see if she was in too much pain.

“I’m fine. It’s just a small cut,” Katara reassured him as she covered her hand with glowing water and brought it to her wound to heal it. “There, all better,” she said as she looked up to give him a reassuring smile.

Not caring if they were being watched or not, Zuko wrapped his arms around her and gently pulled her to him. Katara tensed for only a second before she melted into his warm and protective arms.

“I was worried,” he confessed quietly against her temple where he pressed his lips.

Katara pulled slightly away to frown at him.

“I am more than capable of defending myself against Mai,” she told him stiffly.

“I know you are,” Zuko admitted. “But when I saw your sleeve get stained with your blood it reminded me of…” he trailed off since they both knew he was thinking of the time Feng had wounded her. His arms tightened around her.

“Katara?” they heard Ursa called out and they pulled apart to watch her approach them quickly with the others following behind her. “Are you all right, Katara?”

“Yes, I’m fine,” Katara reassured them with a small smile.

She tried to ignore the fact that her cheeks were probably painted red with her blush. Her smile widened when Ursa embraced her briefly before she pulled her sleeve up to make sure her wound was healed, smiling gladly when she saw it was.

“What are you going to do with Mai?” Iroh asked as he grimly looked at his nephew.

Zuko took his eyes away from Katara long enough to address his personal guards.

“Shen, Kuo, alert the other guards that Lady Mai has been banished from the palace until I say otherwise,” he told them firmly. “She is not to approach Lady Katara.”

“Yes, my lord,” Shen immediately answered as his features hardened in determination.

“We will keep Lady Katara safe,” Kuo answered fiercely.

Both of them bowed before they turned away to follow their lord’s orders as well as to make sure the noblewoman had left the palace. After fussing over Katara a while longer, Ursa and Iroh, along with Jee, Chao, and Jiao, walked back inside the palace to give the young lord and his waterbending woman some privacy.

As soon as they were alone, Zuko pulled her close to him again and kissed her softly on the lips before he tucked her against his chest as he ran his hand through her mussed hair, whispering to her that he was glad she was all right and that he would not have forgiven himself if something happened to her. Katara relaxed in his embrace since she knew he had been worried and afraid due to past memories of their capture. Besides, she needed some comforting since Mai’s parting words shook her up a bit.
Blue eyes staring blankly at the dark ceiling, Katara let out a sigh before she rolled to her side and stared at the window in her room. The curtains were drawn closed, so the room was dark except for the light coming from the small candle on her nightstand. It was sometime in the late hours of the night and she could not find rest no matter how much she tried to make herself sleep, for Mai’s words kept repeating over and over in her head. She knew she should not allow what Mai had said affect her, but she could not deny the fact that some of the things she had said were true. Katara was born an ordinary woman, and even thought she was a chieftain’s daughter, it did not hold the same significance of a noblewoman in her culture. She did not have the right upbringing to be Fire Lady, and she was probably not going to be accepted, being from the Southern Water Tribe and a waterbender.

She knew in her heart that Zuko wanted to marry her for her, because he loved her, loved who she was, but she did not want him to have any problems with those of his court or with his people, because of his decision of taking a waterbender as his wife. But she also did not want to give him up. A deep sigh escaped her and she rubbed her eyes. What should she do?

She was startled out of her thoughts when a faint scratching sound coming from the window reached her ears. She tensed, fearing that someone was trying to break into her room. She held her breath in order to make sure what she heard was real, and when she made out the sound of something outside her window, her heart began to pound in anxiety. She glanced at her door. Should she run and search for Zuko?

Shaking her head and berating herself for letting herself be frightened, she took a deep breath to calm herself down before she quietly slipped from the bed, gathering water from the basin on the dresser and bending it into a liquid ribbon around her arm as she moved toward the window. She paused beside it when she heard the window being opened and her heartbeat increased as cold sweat beaded on her forehead. Narrowing her eyes and preparing herself for a fight, Katara swiftly pulled one side of the curtain aside before she threw the water at the shadow. Hearing a muffled curse, she gathered more water to her and prepared another attack.

“Katara, wait! It’s me!”

“Zuko?” Katara asked incredulously.

She cautiously stepped closer to the window and looked down, and sure enough, she spotted Zuko hanging from the windowsill, his face, hair, and clothes dripping with water as he glared at her. She suppressed a laugh at the sight of him, but Zuko saw her lips twitch in amusement and he scowled at her.

“What are you doing here?” Katara asked softly as she looked around to see if anybody was watching them. “You should leave before someone sees you.”
Zuko pulled himself up and crouched on the windowsill as he raised his body temperature to dry himself before he climbed off and stepped into the room. Katara backed away to give him some space, returning the rest of the water to the basin before looking at him again. She noticed he was wearing his Blue Spirit outfit minus his swords. The white and blue demon mask hung behind his head. Zuko turned to close the window and pulled the curtains close before he turned back to face her. Katara felt her heart skip a beat as he continued to stare at her without saying anything and she self-consciously pulled at her white nightgown as she shuffled her bare feet while her other hand tried to smooth back her hair.

“Zuko?” she called out softly.

Zuko blinked at the sound of her voice and he snapped his eyes away from admiring her form and looked back to her blushing face. He had never seen Katara in a nightgown before and he was unable to stop himself from staring. The white nightgown was long, lose, and simple, not at all revealing or provocative, but the innocent look it provided Katara along with the red blush on her cheeks and her mussed hair made something clench within him and his desire spike. It took all he had not to carry her to her bed. Damn, he knew he should not have come.

“I, uh,” he stammered before he inwardly scolded himself. He had never allowed a woman to affect him the way Katara did without even trying. He cleared his throat as he pulled off his gloves and tucked them into the sash around his waist.

“I’m sorry if I woke you up, but I wanted to see you and make sure you were really okay after what happened with Mai earlier today,” he said with a concerned look.

“I’m fine,” Katara reassured him again before she crossed her arms beneath her breasts and narrowed her eyes. “I was not about to let your ex-girlfriend defeat me.”

Zuko frowned at her words before he sighed as he ran a hand through his short hair.

“I’m sorry,” he began softly, “I should have known Mai would’ve done something since she was very upset when she came into my study to ask me to give her another chance and I refused. She was even more upset when I confessed that you are the woman I love.”

Katara felt her heart flutter at his words and she uncrossed her arms as she gave him a soft smile before a frown appeared on her brow.
“You told Mai about our engagement?” she asked.

“No, she figured it out on her own. She heard people gossiping that I already have a woman in mind as my future wife,” he replied. “And when she asked me if it was you, I could not deny it.”

Katara nodded before she sighed as she brushed her hair out of her face. She missed the smoldering look that flashed across Zuko’s face as her smooth throat was exposed by her action.

“I hope she doesn’t say anything about our engagement before I can talk to my family and Aang,” she muttered.

“Mai is not a person that enjoys to gossip,” Zuko assured her. “And I’m sure she will not say anything in order to avoid being ridiculed for losing the Fire Lord’s favor.”

Or maybe she won’t say anything because she still believes she can win you back, Katara thought grimly.

“I see,” was her low response before she sighed. “She was very hurt.”

“I know,” he responded quietly as he again ran a hand through his loose hair. “I didn’t mean to hurt her. I had hoped that she would understand and accept my decision to break up with her the first time, but I see now it was foolish of me to think that. But,” his voice hardened, “that is no excuse for her attacking you.”

Katara sighed again and wrapped her arms around herself.

“Katara,” Zuko spoke up softly as he moved closer to her, though he refrained from touching her since he wanted to maintain control. “My mother told me you and Mai had been arguing for a while before she attacked you,” his face darkened as he said this, “and you fought back, and I was wondering if you could tell me what she said to you.”

Katara stiffened slightly before she turned away and moved closer to the center of the room. Zuko frowned in alarm and concern as he followed after her, placing a hand gently on her shoulder to stop her from moving further away from him.
“Katara, what did she tell you?” he asked more commandingly.

The blue-eyed woman sighed before she turned to look into the concerned eyes of her beloved. La, she loved him so much and she did not want to lose him. She would not be able to bear it if that were to happen.

“Mai just wanted to let me know that she will not give you up,” she began hesitantly. She relaxed a bit when Zuko scowled. “She basically said that…that I am not right for you.”

Zuko frowned darkly as he growled out, “As if she’s right for me.”

He lifted his hand from her shoulder and caressed her cheek softly with the back of his fingers before he cupped her smooth cheek. Katara immediately relaxed underneath his touch and she leaned her head toward his warm hand.

“You are the woman for me, Katara, for in some ways you are just like me, but in others you are different and complement who I am,” he told her resolutely.

Katara smiled at the conviction in his voice and she reached up a hand to gently trace her fingers along the edge of his scar. Zuko pressed his lips against her wrist as he smiled softly at her, a tender smile he only reserved for her and no one else. They were silent for a moment as they stared into each other’s eyes, their hands caressing each other’s faces, before Katara sighed and moved away, causing Zuko to frown.

“Mai did make some good points, though,” she said quietly as she moved toward the window where she slightly lifted one side of the curtain and peered out into the dark night.

“And what are those?” the golden-eyed lord asked as he followed her, his frown deepening.

Katara remained quiet for a moment before she let out a tiny sigh as she dropped the curtain in its place and turned to regard Zuko with a frown.

“Your courtiers will probably not accept you taking a Water Tribe woman as your wife,” she began, “And I don’t want to cause any problems for you—”
“No,” Zuko interrupted her quickly with a shake of his head. “Don’t think that you will be problematic for me. I know some will protest the idea of having a Water Tribe woman as my wife and their Fire Lady, but they will eventually have to accept my decision. If there are problems, they will be worth it as long as I have you.”

“Zuko,” Katara breathed out.

“Besides,” Zuko continued firmly, “I could always add that times have changed and a marriage between us will benefit both our countries. It will bring a strong alliance between the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe and ensure peace.”

“I…I guess you’re right about that,” Katara agreed hesitantly.

“They will accept you eventually. Don’t worry,” he told her gently with a small, reassuring smile.

“But there’s also the fact that I know nothing about being a Fire Lady,” she continued slowly. “What if I make a mistake and I end up shaming you?”

“I know you are not knowledgeable about court life and the responsibilities of being my Fire Lady, but that is not why I chose to marry you,” Zuko stated as he crossed his arms over his chest and frowned at her.

“I know that, Zuko,” Katara replied with a bit of exasperation. “But I refuse to be an incompetent Fire Lady!”

Zuko opened his mouth to argue, but Katara did not let him say anything as she placed her hands on her hips and looked at him determinedly.

“If I am going to marry you, then I want to learn how to act with the Royal Court, what traditions I should know of the Fire Nation, and what will be expected of me as Fire Lady,” she told him firmly.

“It will be too much to learn so quickly,” Zuko warned her softly.
“I will learn everything there is to know. I will not make a fool of you or myself,” Katara stated decisively. “I will prove Mai wrong. I will be a worthy wife and Fire Lady for you!” she added and her blue eyes blazed with determination.

Zuko felt a flare of heat go through him at her flashing cobalt eyes and resolute words. This was the woman he wanted as wife, strong and beautiful, determined to stand by his side and do everything in her power to help him and make him happy. Not a placid and emotionless woman like Mai or a simpering and fragile female like the other noblewomen.

The young lord swiftly took the few steps that would bring him closer to the waterbender and he wrapped his arms around her body, drawing her close to his chest and nuzzling his face against her hair.

“You have always been worthy,” he whispered gently near her ear and he smiled when Katara shivered as his breath coasted along her skin. He squeezed her once before he pulled back slightly to look at her.

“I will ask my mother and have a tutor help you so you can be prepared for when we do marry,” he told her with a smile.

“Thank you, Zuko.” Katara returned the smile with a bright one of her own and she nuzzled her face against his chest and squeezed him tightly with her arms, making Zuko chuckle softly as he returned her embrace.

Zuko kissed her temple and sighed as he rested his chin on her head as he softly said, “I should be the one thanking you for wanting to take your responsibilities as Fire Lady seriously. It makes me glad to know that my wife will be willing to help me in my rule.”

Katara blushed slightly and smiled happily as she snuggled into him with a content sigh. How she missed having Zuko’s arms wrapped around her.

“Did Mai say anything else to you?” he asked with a sharp edge to his voice and his arms tightened around her protectively when Katara tensed slightly. “She did, didn’t she? What did she say?” he asked again more darkly.

Katara pulled away from him as she hesitated for a moment for she did not want to show him how pathetically low her self-esteem was concerning him. Exhaling deeply, she turned away and sat down at the edge of her bed. Zuko watched with a frown as Katara looked down to stare at her hands in order to avoid his eyes. He walked forward and quietly sat down beside her, staring intently at her as he waited for her to continue.

“She asked me if I truly believe that I will be the only one in your life,” she said almost in a whisper.

“What?” Zuko asked as his brow furrowed.

“She said that being Fire Lord allows you to have all the women, concubines, you want,” she continued quietly and clenched her hands on her lap.

Zuko’s frown deepened as he watched her chew her lip and glare at the floor, still refusing to meet his gaze.

“That is true,” he began slowly before he continued quickly when he heard her sharp intake of air, “But I refuse to have them. I have refused the concubines a few noblemen have tried to gift me since my coronation. I don’t have a need for them. You don’t have to worry about that because I am not going to accept or demand any in the future.”

“Are you being truthful or are you just saying that to placate me?” she asked warily.

“I am being truthful,” Zuko growled out firmly before he continued more softly, “I witnessed how it hurt my mother to know Ozai slept with Azulon’s concubines.”

Katara gasped softly. Poor Lady Ursa. She deserved someone better who could treat her and love her the way she deserved. Perhaps one day she will find that person to make her happy.

“My mother’s love for Ozai disappeared with his mistreatment and unfaithfulness and she suffered so much. I will never hurt you in such a way, Katara,” he reassured her definitely.

He reached out to take her hand and brought it to his lips as he stared into her conflicted eyes.

“Besides, you’re the only woman I desire,” he stated huskily.
“You say that now, but what if you get bored of me once you finally have me?” she countered quietly as she tried to pull her hand away.

Zuko tightened his grip on her hand and pulled her firmly to him, until she was caged within the circle of his arms. He lifted her chin with one hand and narrowed his golden eyes at her, causing Katara to gasp softly at the simmering anger she could see in those amber orbs.

“That is not going to happen,” Zuko growled out as his face contorted into a fierce scowl. “I already told you it isn’t just your body that I desire. I desire everything that you are! You’re the only one I love, you’re the only one who makes me happy, something Mai and no other woman could or would be able to do. I don’t want to hear you say something like that again.”

Katara stared deeply into his eyes for a long moment, and what she saw made her heart swell and her doubting spirit ease. She reached for his face, and pulling him down toward her, she pressed her lips fiercely to his, licking his lower lip and pulling it into her mouth to nibble softly at it. If Zuko was surprised at her reaction to his words, he didn’t show it as he lifted her to him so their upper bodies pressed tightly together, and he returned her kiss just as ardently. They groaned against each other’s mouths for it had been a long while since they had kissed one another so passionately. When they pulled apart to take in some air, Katara gave him a radiant smile that made his breath hitch.

“Good, because having concubines or lovers is unacceptable in my tribe, and I will not allow you to have one and disrespect me in such a way,” Katara told him sternly. “If I’m to learn and follow your traditions, then I expect you to know and follow some of mine.”

Zuko chuckled quietly as he pressed a kiss against her furrowed brow.

“It’s only fair I do so,” he agreed with a nod.

“You are mine and mine only,” she continued with a low growl and Zuko shivered pleasantly at the possessiveness in her tone. “I do not and will not share, you hear me?”

“Perfectly, love,” Zuko replied as he gave her a playful squeeze as he smirked at her. “You don’t need to worry about any concubines because you are the only woman that can arouse me so quickly and for the slightest thing.”

He proved his point by pressing against Katara’s lower back and pulling her tightly against him.
Katara groaned as she felt his hardness against her stomach and a low moan escaped her lips. She tensed, however, when one of his hands cupped her breast and she immediately tried to place some distance between them.

“Zuko…” she said breathlessly as she tried to fight the desire growing within her. “You should leave…”

“No, let me stay.” Zuko murmured against her ear as he grazed his nose down her throat and inhaled her scent. “Just for a few more minutes, love. Who knows when I’ll be able to touch you again like this in the following days?”

Katara pressed her hands against his chest to push him away, but his whispered words and the feeling of his lips against the skin of her throat made her fist her hands in the fabric of his black shirt and she tilted her head slightly to the side to give him more access to her neck. Zuko groaned as she again relaxed against him and he pressed hot, wet kisses on her skin.

One of his hands caressed her cheek before he curled it around to cup her neck and urge her lips up to his, sighing when he savored her sweet taste. When she moaned softly against his mouth, he outlined her lower lip with the tip of his tongue, and when she opened her mouth, he swiftly thrust it between her succulent lips. Katara felt her bare toes curl as Zuko’s wet tongue played with hers and her hands clenched more tightly onto the fabric of his shirt as he tightened his grip on her long hair.

As they pulled slightly apart to gather some air, Katara again tried to convince him to leave before she lost all reason. With his reassurance came a quiver of warmth and desire that she linked with being caressed and kissed by him. He was hard and masculine yet he was also gentle. Every time he touched her, he taught her what her own body wanted and needed. Only being within the warmth and strength of Zuko’s arms did something strong and fierce awakened deep inside her, something that strained hungrily toward him and only him. The longer they touched, the more they kissed, the more difficult it was for her to stick to her principles. Unlike Aang or Jet, she could not resist Zuko. There was a part of her that was nervous and frightened at what she would find if she gave into her desires. But she knew Zuko would never hurt her. When Zuko pressed his lips against hers once again and dipped his tongue inside her mouth, Katara melted against him, her resistance evaporating like a puddle in a desert, and she reciprocated his passionate kiss with her own.

Zuko groaned loudly at her surrender, immensely grateful that she was once again gifting him with a part of herself that she had never given any man before. He did not take her capitulation for granted, for he knew how much it cost her to disregard what her culture dictated in order to please him and be close to him. He cherished and treasured her more because of it. With a sigh, he deepened their kiss and pressed closer against her.

Katara moaned against her firebender’s mouth when Zuko slid his hand up her side to firmly cup her breast through her nightclothes. She inhaled sharply when his palm brushed against her nipple, causing it to immediately harden. She wrapped her arms tightly around his neck and gently sucked on his probing tongue.

Zuko groaned at the pleasurable sensation as he began to gently knead her breast. He smiled against her lips when she softly called his name. He could feel his cock straining against the tightness of his black pants, and it was all he could do not to take her right then and there. He squeezed his waterbender’s soft breast a few more times before he slowly began to slide his hand down her side, the slimness of her waist, and the curve of her hip until he stopped at her knee. Tangling his tongue with hers, Zuko slowly raised the hem of her white nightgown until it bunched up past her knee. He felt more than heard Katara gasp as his hand roamed up under the thin nightdress.

Katara trembled in Zuko’s embrace as she felt his warm hand slowly, gently, travel up her thigh. He traced languid circles on her flesh and she felt her breath quicken when he trailed his fingers inwardly. She held her breath when his long fingers inched closing to her aching core, sending a shock of electricity through her body.

Zuko’s breath hitched in surprise when his fingers came in contact with her bare, damp curls. Pulling back from their kiss, Zuko panted heavily as he stared down into her face. He watched as Katara opened her eyes to give him a shy smile.

“You aren’t wearing your wrappings,” he stated the obvious in a husky tone.

“I only do so when I’m not camping in the wilderness. They’re uncomfortable to sleep in,” she responded dazedly.

“All this time I was talking to you while you were naked beneath that nightdress,” he groaned as he kissed her cheek. Then he again bent down to devour her mouth.

Katara moaned against his lips before she gasped in surprise and delight when Zuko began to rub his fingers gently between her legs. The touch of his hand on such an intimate place was no longer a shock, but it was powerful nonetheless. The waterbender felt a rush of her arousal seep out from within her at the incredible pleasure and she kissed him desperately. She moaned loudly and threw her head back when he slipped his fingers between her slick folds and slid them up and down. He stroked her a few times before he gently slid a finger inside her, eliciting a loud moan from her. When he curled his finger and rubbed against her slick walls, Katara’s head fell forward on his shoulder with a whimper.

“Mm, you’re so wet, Katara,” Zuko growled delightedly against her hair.
He gently pulled her head back with his other hand so he could stare at her face. His eyes darkened and his cock throbbed at the sight of Katara’s flushed cheeks, kiss-swollen lips, and parted mouth. When she opened her ocean blue eyes to stare at him with a dazed, passion-filled gaze, he swooped back down to capture her mouth. Katara groaned as their lips rubbed against each other and their tongues intertwined. Suddenly, Zuko pulled his finger out of her and she groaned in disappointment. A surprised gasp escaped her when Zuko wrapped an arm around her waist and pulled her up so she could straddle his lap—the nightgown now pulled up to her thighs.

“Zuko,” she breathed tremulously as she pulled her head back to stare at him—equally nervous and aroused.

“Shh, it’s okay,” the firebender soothed her softly as he reached up a hand to gently caress her cheek. “I just want to touch you.”

He drew her face down and touched his lips to hers. Katara sighed breathlessly at the sultry kiss he was bestowing on her. Zuko grabbed her hips and caressed her slowly for a moment before he pulled her tightly against him. Katara gasped loudly as her aching core came in contact with his covered hardness. A long groan of pleasure escaped Zuko’s throat. He could feel her damp heat through the only cloth that separated them and his hips grinded against her at the thought.

“Ohh,” the waterbender mewled at the sensation, “Mmm.”

She again opened her eyes when Zuko ended their kiss and she watched dazedly as he stared passionately at her before his eyes roamed down to her heaving chest. She felt her heart thump wildly when Zuko reached up and slowly tugged at the laces that held the top of her nightgown closed. She felt the cloth give way beneath his hands and she moaned, desperate to feel his hands on her aching breasts. When he began to part the edges aside, she ground her hips into his in anticipation, causing him to pause as he groaned her name. She felt his erection straining against his pants and she squirmed a little harder, moaning as pleasure sparked up her spine at the amazing sensation.

“Gods, Katara, you’re killing me,” Zuko rasped before he captured her lips in an ardent kiss that soon had them breathless.

Zuko quickly pulled away, closed his eyes, and breathed deeply in order to once again rein in his urge to throw her onto her back and make her his.
Not yet, he reminded the animal side of him, But soon.

“Zuko?” he heard Katara called out to him inquiringly as she gently touched his cheek.

He reopened his eyes and smiled at her reassuringly before he kissed her forehead then her mouth. He leaned away and again returned his attention to where his hands were still holding the sides of her nightdress. He quickly slipped his hands inside and touched her chest, causing her breath to hitch. He ran his hands up onto her shoulders then down her arms, slipping the white material down until it pooled around her waist. His eyes quickly fixated themselves upon her exquisite breasts. His mouth watered when he saw that her dusky peaks were hard and protruding.

Katara trembled at the sensation of the chilly temperature hitting her bare flesh and at the hungry gleam in her firebender’s amber eyes. Her hands twitched anxiously in the dark strands of hair at his nape.

“So beautiful,” he breathed tenderly, causing Katara to smile.

Her smile soon turned into an ‘O’ of pleasure when Zuko bent down to lick her right nipple while one of his hands stroked her other breast. Her hands clenched more tightly into his hair when he licked a few more times before he sucked the stiff bud into his hot mouth.

“Oh, ah!” she cried out, her back arching instinctively closer to him.

Wrapping one arm tightly around her lower back, Zuko closed his eyes in pleasure and began suckling her more insistently as he rubbed his aching erection against her warm core. When she moaned, Zuko gently scraped his teeth on her nipple before soothing it again with his tongue and lips. He pulled his head back to watch the pleasure on her face as his hand continued to knead her breast.

Leaning forward to press his lips against her cheek, Zuko cupped her ass with his other hand and began to grind his waterbender’s hot, drenched pussy slowly against his cock. He felt her jerk and heard her gasp when the ridge of his shaft rubbed against her little bundle of nerves, and he smiled.

“Ah, my little waterbender,” he breathed huskily into her ear, “can you feel what you do to me?”

Katara could only moan as pleasure robbed her ability to speak and turned her brain to mush. Her body felt like it was on fire and it seemed like all her blood had rushed down to the spot between her legs where Zuko was rubbing his hardness against.

With a groan, Zuko leaned his forehead against her and began to rock his hips against her at the same time he ground her against him. They both gasped in pleasure as they moved against each other. Zuko again leaned down to suck her nipple into his mouth while his hand continued to squeeze and rub her other breast.

“Zuko, oh!” Katara cried out as her head fell back.

She closed her eyes tightly and breathed shallowly as her stomach quivered in pleasure. Her fingers dug into his clothed shoulders. Zuko’s movements were slow, but the friction of his clothed erection against her bare sex sent shockwaves of immense pleasure throughout her body. Just when she thought the pleasure could not get any better, Zuko let go of her breast and slipped his hand between their straining bodies. Katara cried out when his fingers circled the swollen nub nestled above her clenching entrance at the same time he tugged her nipple with his lips. When she felt Zuko moved his head away, Katara dazedly opened her eyes and looked at him. She was mesmerized by the sight of his face as he continued to rock them together. The strong line of his jaw was tense, the muscles flexing and jumping underneath his skin, sweat beaded on his forehead, his teeth tightly clenched together. His eyelids were low as he watched his hand move frantically beneath the hem of her white nightdress as he continued to touch her slick pussy.

Zuko’s golden eyes flickered up toward Katara’s face when he felt her watching him. Her long, dark eyelashes fluttered over the soft skin of her flushed face. Her liquid blue eyes held so much wonder and desire it made his breath hitch and pleasure skitter down his spine. He crashed his mouth to hers and kissed her hungrily, exploring every inch of her delicious mouth with his eager tongue. The contrast between Katara’s semi-nude body and his fully clothed one caused his stomach to tighten and his shaft to throb. He could feel her aroused fluids saturating into his pants, and the damp feeling against the skin of his cock only caused him to grind his hips faster and fiercely rub against her clit as his orgasm approached.

“Ahh!” Katara’s cry of ecstasy was swallowed by Zuko’s mouth as she jerked and strained against his firm body.

“Ohhh!” Zuko groaned in pleasure a few seconds later as he wrapped his arms tightly around her and followed her off the cliff into his own shuddering release.

They pressed their lips together in a small kiss before they rested their foreheads together as they panted and trembled, waiting blissfully to come back from their orgasms. Zuko again captured Katara’s lips with his, tenderly gliding them together in gentle, affectionate kisses. Katara sighed contentedly against his mouth as she slumped against his strong frame. Zuko smiled at her obvious contentment and he brought her tightly against his chest, tucking her head beneath his chin, while one hand stroked her back.

“I can’t wait to finally make love to you, Katara,” he breathed softly against her head, “I want to make you mine in every way possible.”

Katara felt her cheeks heat up both in pleasure of his words and embarrassment for her lack of self-control when it concerned Zuko.

“How do you have us continue in such a manner until we marry.”

Zuko frowned and his chest tightened. Did she regret what they did?

As if reading his thoughts, Katara pulled back to stare softly into his eyes and cupped his left cheek with her hand.

“I don’t regret any of the moments I’ve spent in your arms, Zuko,” she told him truthfully, “I enjoy them very much, too much, and that is the issue.”

When he frowned in confusion and apprehension, Katara leaned forward to peck his lips before looking at him again.

“My desire for you is so powerful that it scares me to think that I will shame my family’s honor and our traditions in a moment of passion and heat,” she continued hesitantly.

Zuko relaxed and he reached up his own hand to cup her soft cheek.

“I understand,” he told her, “My desire for you is as powerful if not more so, but I will never do anything that would hurt you.”

“I know,” she breathed with a smile.
She paused briefly and Zuko watched as she nervously licked her lips.

“Perhaps…if we make sure I do not become completely undressed as I am right now…it would be okay?” she began carefully.

Groaning, Zuko bent down to kiss her gratefully and his arms tightened around her. When he pulled away he smiled widely at her. Katara’s hesitation disappeared at his expression and she smiled at him.

“Thank Agni you said that,” the firebender muttered huskily, “I think I would die if you don’t let me touch you again.”

Katara could not suppress her giggles at his exaggerations.

Zuko stared intensely into her blue eyes before he leaned toward her face, his warm breath coasting along the skin of her lips. Katara’s eyes fluttered close when Zuko brushed his lips against hers in a gentle kiss. Zuko sighed as her sweet taste once again coated his tongue. He could not get enough of her. He could sit here with his waterbender straddling his lap, languidly kissing her all night, but he knew he could not if he wanted to keep his promise to respect her family and culture, which caused a pang of regret to appear on his chest.

With another sigh, he wound their kiss down before slowly pulling away. Katara opened her eyes when his lips no longer touched hers. Zuko gently lifted her from his lap and settled her back down on the bed beside him. He smiled affectionately when she blushed as she hurriedly retied the laces of her nightgown.

“I’ll let you rest now. You’ve been through a lot today,” he said as he caressed her blushing cheek.

Katara nodded as she looked down to smooth down her nightdress, remembering in pleasurable detail the sensation of her sex pressing against the hardness between Zuko’s legs. Her eyes automatically landed on that spot of his anatomy and they widened in embarrassment at the evidence of her aroused wetness staining his dark pants a darker color.

Watching the direction of her gaze and the reddening of her cheeks, Zuko glanced down at his lap. A smirk curled his lips at the large, damp spot before he looked up at her with a roguish smile.
“I will definitely never wash these pants again,” he said wickedly.

“Zuko!” Katara exclaimed even as a laugh escaped her mouth.

Chuckling, Zuko stood up and grinned in satisfaction down at her. Katara shook her head, but a smile still tugged at the corner of her lips as she stood up before him.

Zuko’s expression softened as he cupped her cheek and bent down to kiss her one more time before pulling away. Sighing softly, Katara slowly opened her eyes. Her heart skipped a beat at the look he was giving her, a look that expressed all the love and tenderness he felt for her and only her.

“Good night, Katara,” he breathed softly against her skin, causing a pleasant shiver to trickle down her spine.

“Good night, Zuko,” she whispered with a loving smile.

Zuko returned the smile briefly at her before he again turned toward the window, pulling the Blue Spirit mask over his face and his gloves over his hands. He lifted one side of the curtain, and once he was sure there was no one in sight, he pulled the curtain aside and opened the window. He climbed onto the windowsill and the curtains ruffled as a night breeze blew in, and with one last look over his shoulder from behind the mask, he dropped down silently and disappeared.

Katara stared at the spot where Zuko had been before she moved to close the window and the curtains before going to the bathroom to clean up. She blushed deeply as she washed between her legs, remembering the passionate moment between them from a few minutes ago. She had to be more careful when she was around Zuko. It seemed as if she could not control herself. Once finished, she returned to the comfort of her bed. As she laid down, she brought her fingers to her lips where it still tingled because of the last kiss Zuko had given her. Closing her eyes, she let out a sigh as she waited for sleep to claim her as her doubts and that strange sense of dread disappeared for the moment as she recalled Zuko’s words and his touch.
Painful Insecurities

Resisting the urge to rub her temples, Katara took a deep breath as she repeated all the names of the past Fire Lords and their family members for the third time. Once she ended with Zuko as the current Fire Lord and Lady Ursa and General Iroh as his only family members at the moment, she beamed proudly for getting all the names and their orders right without stumbling.

“Very good, Lady Katara,” Madam Fang Hua praised her with a small smile and an approving nod of her head before her aged face again returned to its stern expression. “Now we will study some of the most important traditions in the Fire Nation.”

Katara’s smile dropped a bit and her shoulders sagged in fatigue for a brief moment. Sitting beside her, Ursa smiled sympathetically and patted her hand. The three women were sitting on a pile of large, comfortable cushions surrounding a small low table covered with piles of scrolls and tomes. Jee was sitting on a chair some distance away reading over a report, and standing quietly on either side of him, were Shen and Kuo.

They were in the spacious library of the Fire Nation Palace, and although not as magnificent as Wan Shi Tong’s Library that was now buried deep in the Earth Kingdom desert, Katara still thought it was impressive. Dark mahogany shelves reaching from the floor to the high ceiling along all four walls of the large room were filled with thousands of books and scrolls. There was another door that led into another room with more scrolls and tomes, and when Katara asked about that room, she was told it was where the ancient records and scrolls were held. Some of the documents were so old they had to be handled carefully or they would come apart.

Ever since Mai had attacked her, Zuko was even stricter with her safety. And it did not help matters when a few more noblemen had tried to approach her again. Whenever he was not with her, Zuko had Shen and Kuo, or other guards accompany her everywhere she went despite her angry protests. Luckily, he had relaxed a bit once they found out Mai had again departed for Omashu when it was obvious Zuko was not going to forgive her any time soon, if ever. Katara had tried to reason with him again, arguing that he may have been too harsh on his punishment of the noblewoman, but Zuko had again told her he would not forgive any who dared hurt her.

With an inaudible sigh about his stubbornness and overprotectiveness, Katara straightened herself and listened to the slightly rough, yet soft tone of the old tutor as she began another lesson.

Madam Fang Hua was the head of the oldest noble family in the Fire Nation after her husband died two years before. She was a tiny, old woman whose small round face held more wrinkles than wet leather and whose head was covered with long silver hair that reached almost to her knees. Her rich, brown eyes still held a hint of sharp intelligence and cunning that caused most people to become unnerved by them. However, when she smiled and her eyes brightened in amusement or approval,
Katara could see that in her youth the small woman must have been a beauty.

Madam Fang Hua had been delighted when she was asked to instruct Fire Lord Zuko’s future bride about everything there was to know about the Fire Nation, such as its traditions and history, as well as the way of court life. If she was surprised to find out the future Fire Lady was from the Southern Water Tribe, the old woman did not show it and swore not to tell anyone whom the Fire Lord planned to marry. She took her job seriously, practically pounding all her lessons into Katara’s head.

As the morning turned into noon, Katara felt a headache coming on as the lessons continued. For the past few days, both noblewomen taught her all about court life, the proper way to behave among the upper society, the history of the Fire Nation and its traditions, and all the responsibilities that came with the title of Fire Lady. Katara felt overwhelmed as she tried to remember everything she had learned so far and along with what was being said at the moment, but there were so many things to remember! Some of the traditions were just so different from the Southern Water Tribe. The more she learned, the more she questioned if she could really do this, if she was capable of leaving her safe and simple life in her tribe to live in this strict environment with so many rules, politics and intrigues.

But she wanted to marry Zuko, there was no question about it. If she was going to become the wife of the Fire Lord, then she would have to endure it and learn everything she had to learn.

She had also found out that the Fire Sages were visited by the Fire Lords and the rest of the nobility in order to see which day special events—such as the Fire Lord’s coronation and wedding—should be held due to the good omens given by the position of the stars and planets in the sky. She wondered if Zuko was going to take them to the Fire Sages to see what day they considered the best for their wedding. That is, if she was accepted by the council once they announced their engagement. What if the Fire Sages refused to marry them?

Madam Fang Hua was interrupted from her lesson when the large door to the library was opened and the occupants in the room turned to see Zuko and Iroh enter. All except Ursa and Katara stood and bowed to the Fire Lord who acknowledged them briefly with a nod of his head, for his attention was solely focused on his waterbender. Their eyes met immediately and Zuko frowned slightly when he noticed the weariness in his future bride’s blue orbs. It was all Zuko could do to break eye contact so he could address the old noblewoman.

“Madam Fang Hua, I believe that is enough for today,” he spoke up coolly. “You may return tomorrow morning to resume your lessons with the Lady Katara.”

“As you wish, my lord,” the tiny woman immediately agreed with another bow. She smiled at the Water Tribe maiden before she again turned to the silent Fire Lord. “Lady Katara is a very determined young woman and she is learning very quickly. It will not be long before she is ready.”
Zuko graced her with a smile as he said, “I am glad.”

The silver-haired woman bowed again before she gracefully made her way to the door and disappeared.

Zuko sat down next to Katara and smiled at her just as Iroh took a seat beside Ursa and began to talk to her about a particular brand of tea he was trying at the moment.

“How are your lessons going?” Zuko asked her curiously.

“There are so many things to remember,” Katara responded with a tired sigh before she smiled determinedly at him, “But I will try my best to be worthy of being called your wife.”

“I have no doubts,” he replied with a nod of his head.

Katara felt herself flush at his confidence in her, and in order to change the subject, she asked, “How was your meeting with King Kuei’s representative?”

“It was fine,” he said with a small shrug. “The representative informed me that the trade between the Fire Nation and Ba Sing Se, as well as the tourism flooding the city, is really improving the Lower Ring.”

“That’s great!” Katara exclaimed sincerely.

“After the meeting, I dispatched a messenger to head toward the Earth Kingdom to give the money we owed to Zhuang Yu and Satomi,” the young lord said before a small smirk curled his lips, “after all, we have much to thank them for.”

Katara felt her cheeks warm up when she caught his meaning, since not only did the old couple welcome them to their home and help them on their way to Omashu, but thanks to Satomi’s words, she and Zuko had been able to enjoy each other in an intimate way that did not compromise her virtue. Ever since that first night Zuko had snuck into her room, he had done so a few more times. He was always careful to arrive late at night and leave before dawn. Although they made sure to always keep their lower halves covered, they were able to bring each other pleasure nonetheless.
There was a knock at the entrance and Kuo immediately went to open the door. Jiao stood outside and she blushed at the guard who smiled as he moved aside to let her enter the room. Jiao walked toward the royal family while the younger guard closed the door and moved to stand beside Shen and Jee.

“What is it, Jiao?” the young Fire Lord asked.

“A message for Lady Katara arrived a few minutes ago, my lord,” Jiao responded with a bow before she handed the scroll bound by a blue ribbon to Katara.

“It’s probably from my family,” Katara exclaimed happily as she untied the scroll and broke the seal. She read the rather short message quickly and she smiled at her family’s relief that she was safe.

“What does it say?” Zuko asked with a small frown.

Katara looked up to smile at him.

“My father writes that they are relieved both of us are all right and that they are on their way to the Fire Nation,” she summarized. She decided to leave out the part where her father threatened bodily harm on the Fire Lord if he found one hair on his daughter’s head misplaced.

“That’s wonderful news!” Iroh commented as he turned to wink knowingly at his nephew.

“Yes,” Zuko responded with a smirk.

Katara smiled as she rolled up the scroll.

“Now I won’t have to wait much longer to announce to Chief Hakoda that I wish to marry his daughter,” Zuko continued as he turned to smile at Katara while his eyes simmered brightly.

Katara blushed deeply when Ursa laughed daintily and Iroh chuckled loudly. When his old uncle and his mother turned to each other to speculate on the reaction of the Southern Water Tribe chieftain, Zuko leaned down to whisper in Katara’s ear.

“You’ll talk to your father as soon as they arrive, right?” he asked her before he added, “I don’t want to wait any longer.”

“I will,” Katara reassured him softly. “And once you ask for my hand, we can meet with the Fire Sages to set a date.”

“That’s if your father agrees,” Zuko muttered with a frown.

Katara laughed quietly behind her hand as she said, “Don’t worry, Zuko.”

Her face reddened again when Zuko gave her a smoldering look as he whispered huskily, “Soon you’ll be mine.”

A strong burst of white fire shattered another of the stone targets placed in a horizontal line across the large arena. A second later, another one was destroyed into many pieces that flew in every direction. Taking a deep breath, Zuko punched his other arm out and another ball of white fire shot forth and struck the last target with a loud, shattering explosion.

“Excellent, Nephew,” Iroh called out from the sideline, “Your strength is improving.”

Zuko did not get a chance to reply for his uncle was already instructing him to begin a series of advanced firebending moves while using his white fire.

Ever since they returned to the Fire Nation, Zuko and Iroh had spent hours and days trying to find any information regarding the art of bending white fire, and when they had not found anything, Zuko had begun to despair. But fortunately, they finally found an old scroll wedged in a corner of a bookshelf in the ancient Dragon Bone Catacombs that was written by the last person known to have been able to bend such a high level of fire.

There were many theories as to why only a few people were able to reach such a level of firebending, one being that it could be only triggered by a traumatic event. Another theory was that it was achieved by a great amount of training and discipline, and another was that the person had to have a strong will and inner fire, and yet another said that the firebender was born with the ability. Whichever the real reason was, the author wrote that the most important thing was to harness and master the white fire for it could lead to a loss of control that could cause destruction, and if used incorrectly, could even lead to the loss of that person’s firebending.

“Good, Zuko,” Iroh praised as he continued to guide his nephew as the young lord quickened his pace.

Zuko adjusted his stance as he remembered what he had read on that old scroll. White fire came easily when the person was experiencing extreme emotions such as anger and fear, but these emotions could not be relied upon if one wanted to truly master it. Bending white fire required more energy from the inner fire of every firebender, which was the reason why it was difficult to maintain for long when one was untrained, unless that person was calling it forth due to those extreme emotions. However, with rigorous training and many hours of deep concentration to strengthen and steady the inner fire, one can come to fully master the white fire.

Zuko found that now it was easier for him to summon the white flames, but he still could not bend for long periods of time or he would become extremely exhausted, and if he forced himself to bend longer, he would feel lightheaded and his limbs would feel like they were sapped out of their energy. Luckily, Iroh was always there to make sure he stopped to rest so they could continue another day. Today, however, Zuko felt as if he could go on longer, and he continued practicing his white fire as Iroh continued to instruct him.

And that was how Katara found him.

She paused at the edge of the arena and smiled excitedly at the scene. She had convinced Shen and Kuo to take her to the arena and she was glad she had come up with the excuse that she wanted to practice her waterbending. She watched how Zuko’s dark-raven hair plastered to his forehead and the nape of his neck with sweat, how his alabaster skin gleamed under the sun with perspiration, how his muscles rippled as he moved vigorously yet gracefully along the stone floor of the arena, and she blushed lightly when she felt her skin heat up. She was again amazed by the glorious sight he made as he bent white fire, and again she thought that Lady Ursa was right when she said that Aang was not the only powerful bender in the world. Katara was positive that Zuko was the bender Aunt Wu had predicted she would marry. She felt as if her heart would burst in happiness at the thought as she continued to watch Zuko firebend.

“That is enough for today, Zuko,” Iroh spoke up proudly.

Zuko slowed his movements to cool down before he stopped. A servant rushed forward to hand him a towel and some water. Zuko drank the refreshing water before handing the cup to the servant who bowed and retreated. Wiping the sweat from his face, Zuko placed the small towel around his neck as he watched his uncle approach him.
“You were able to endure longer today,” the retired general commented with a proud smile, “Soon you will master the white fire.”

Zuko did not respond for he had spotted Katara walking toward them with Kuo and Shen following behind her. She had a bright smile on her face as she looked at him and he wondered why her cheeks were flushed. He felt his loins stir and again he frowned at how easily his body responded to Katara’s presence.

“You’re getting better at bending the white fire,” Katara told him once she was standing next to them.

Shen and Kuo stayed on the sideline of the arena to give them some privacy.

“Thanks,” he replied with a smile before he turned to his uncle, “Of course, I wouldn’t be if it wasn’t for Uncle’s guidance.”

“But it’s all because of your determination, Zuko,” Iroh demurred with a smile. He grinned at them both before he said, “I’m going to look for Chao to see if he wants to play Pai Sho.”

Zuko smiled at his uncle gratefully for he was giving him a chance to be alone with Katara—well, as alone as they could be with servants and guards around them. Once Iroh left, they looked at each other longingly, each wanting to be in each other’s arms, but knowing they could not for they were not alone.

“With a bit more practice you’ll master the white fire,” Katara commented.

“Yeah, and I have to thank Uncle for that,” he said as he stared at her. His hands twitched to touch her.

A playful smile appeared on Katara’s face as she patted her waterskin.

“I’d like to spar with you and see how it feels to go against such a high level firebender,” Katara told him with a grin.
“No,” Zuko immediately refused, fearing for her safety.

“What?!” Katara exclaimed indignantly as she placed her hands on her hips, “You think I can’t fight you?”

Zuko shook his head and frowned at her.

“It could be dangerous, I could lose control and accidentally hurt you,” he explained and swallowed thickly at the thought, “I am not willing to risk your safety.”

Katara crossed her arms over her chest and huffed at him before she sighed when he continued to look at her with that concerned expression on his face that made her insides tingle pleasantly. Damn him.

“Fine,” she relented with a small pout before she brightened. “But we can still spar like we used to before. I haven’t practice my waterbending in a while and I really need the exercise after being cooped up in the library for days.”

“Alright,” Zuko agreed immediately with a smirk.

He was a bit tired, but he chose to ignore it if it meant he could spend some time with Katara. After throwing the towel aside, he lit his hands in red fire and took on a fighting stance as he smirked at her. Katara smiled happily and immediately uncorked her waterskin and pulled forth her water as she, too, took on a fighting stance, her blue eyes glinting in excitement.

Without warning, Zuko shot a fireball at her and Katara immediately brought up a water whip to destroy it before she retaliated with a few sharp icicles that he quickly melted as they collided against a wall of fire.

They sparred for a long while, both firebender and waterbender refusing to back down. Shen, Kuo, the other guards and servants watched the display of both bending masters with awe as fire flashed, water splashed, and steam rose around them. They all knew that their lord usually practiced by himself since no one was able to keep up with his skill, but it seemed the kind waterbender was a match for him, although they could also see that both of them tried not harm the other.
Katara and Zuko pulled apart after a series of fast attacks to regain their breaths as they eyed each other appreciatively.

“I hate to cut this short, but I have a meeting in a few minutes,” Zuko spoke up as he glanced briefly at the sun before he returned his attention to the flushed woman before him. “How about we continue another time?”

“Alright, besides, I promised your mother I would accompany her to buy something in the city,” Katara told him as she returned the water into her waterskin.

Zuko frowned. “You’ll be careful, right?”

Katara stopped herself from rolling her eyes and instead said, “Admiral Jee, Shen, and Kuo are going with us. So don’t worry.”

Zuko opened his mouth to say something, but stopped when he saw a guard heading swiftly toward them.

“My lord,” the guard greeted as he bowed before he lifted his hand toward Katara to reveal a scroll, “this letter arrived for Lady Katara.”

“Thank you,” Katara said with a smile as she took the scroll.

The young guard flushed as he stuttered, “Y-you’re welcome, Lady K-Katara.”

He bowed again and quickly retreated.

Katara turned to Zuko and raised an eyebrow at the frown he was aiming at her.

“What?” she asked.

“With just a smile you have my well-trained guards acting like fools,” he muttered.
The waterbender laughed at his disgruntled tone as she turned her attention to the scroll and immediately opened it. Zuko watched her curiously as she read, but he became concerned when her eyes widened and she paled slightly.

“What is? Who’s it from?” he asked her with a frown.

She looked up at him before she quietly whispered, “Aang.”

Zuko’s golden eyes narrowed at her tone. He grabbed her by the elbow and led her a bit away so they could have some privacy from anyone who could hear them before he released her and turned toward her as he held out a hand.

“Let me see it,” he commanded between gritted teeth.

Frowning at his tone, Katara hesitated for a moment before she reluctantly handed the letter to him. Zuko took it and immediately began to read. His eyes narrowed into dangerous slits and his nostrils flared as his eyes become fixated on one sentence:

I’m coming back for you, Katara.

Zuko rolled the scroll up before he looked up with hard features at Katara who had been watching him silently.

“By Aang’s letter, it doesn’t seem like you broke up with him,” he said coldly.

Katara narrowed her own blue eyes as she hissed out, “Are you calling me liar?”

Closing his eyes, Zuko breathed deeply before he again opened his eyes to look at her.

“No,” he replied with a sigh, “It’s just that I can’t stand the thought that Aang still believes you are his.”

Katara reached out a hand to touch his arm, even though what she wanted to do was wrap her arms around him to give him some comfort.

“I was never Aang’s,” she said softly.

“But Aang seems to think so,” he growled out lowly.

Katara moved her hand away and remained quiet since she could not dispute with him. Zuko let out another low growl as he ran a hand through his damp hair.

“As soon as Aang arrives, I want us to set him straight on that notion and immediately inform him that we are engaged,” he told her firmly.

“I want to be the one to talk to Aang,” Katara repeated just as firmly.

“Why can’t we tell him the news together?” he asked her angrily.

“Because I want to tell him gently so he won’t get hurt,” she answered.

“It doesn’t matter how he finds out, he’s still going to be hurt,” Zuko ground out, “Why do you worry so much about him? He’s not a kid that needs to be protected from everything anymore, Katara.”

“I know that!” Katara snapped as she glared at him. “But Aang’s my friend, we’ve been through so much together, and he cares for me. And I’m not about to repay all that by hurting him!”

“If you were going to be this worried, then you shouldn’t have broken up with him and agreed to marry me!” Zuko growled out angrily as his hand burst into flames, which immediately burned the paper until it was nothing but ashes.

Katara gasped and her eyes widened at his angry words and features.

“Zuko…”
“I have things to do,” he interrupted coldly.

Before she could say anything to him, Zuko turned away from her and strode toward the palace. He had to get away before he gave in to the urge to shake some sense into her or before he kissed her and did something more to her to stake his claim.

Katara stared after him, wide-eyed and shocked. She was barely aware of Shen and Kuo approaching her until they were standing before her and she looked up to see their concerned expressions.

“Is everything all right, Lady Katara?” Kuo asked her softly.

Katara nodded stiffly before she silently made her way back to the palace. Shen and Kuo glanced worriedly at each other and wondered what had happened, hoping it was not something serious, before they followed her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After having dinner with Iroh, Ursa, and Jee, Katara slowly made her way to the Royal Palace Garden. Was it just her or did Jee look at Lady Ursa in a certain way? Katara shook her head and sighed, just as she had been doing a lot lately.

A day had passed since she had last seen Zuko or spoken to him, and Katara felt terrible for she knew he was angry and frustrated with her. She did not like it when they were angry at each other, but what could she do?

Just as she rounded a corner she bumped into a firm chest and she gasped when familiar hands grasped her arms to steady her when she stumbled back. She raised her head and her eyes locked with piercing, golden orbs. Her heart fluttered when Zuko’s warmth and his sandalwood scent reached her senses, but it stilled at the unreadable look in his eyes. They stared silently at each other for a moment before Zuko let go of her and moved away a step. He cleared his throat and ran a hand over his bound hair.

“I’m sorry for my reaction yesterday,” Zuko apologized lowly, his features smooth as stone, “but I still do no approve of your choice.”

Katara frowned at him, at the cool way he was acting and speaking to her.
“I understand how you feel, but I feel that I must do things this way,” she told him softly.

Zuko was silent for a moment as Katara stared at him resolutely before his brow furrowed into a frown.

“I don’t like it, but I will try to be understanding,” he told her impassively, “I just hope you do a better job at explaining things to Aang than I did with Mai.”

Katara felt her heart clench in worry as that feeling of dread once again surfaced within her.

“You don’t think Aang will attack you, do you?” she asked with concern.

He gave an indifferent shrug, but when Katara’s frown deepened, he added, “I don’t think so. Or I hope not because, despite everything, I’d still like to be friends with him. After all, Aang was the first to befriend me and give me a chance to prove myself.”

“That is why I want to talk to Aang,” Katara explained carefully. “I want him to understand my feelings and not get angry with you and think that you seduced me or something.”

Zuko nodded to acknowledge her words.

“I hope so too, but if it’s a fight Aang wants, then it’s a fight he’ll get,” he told her grimly, “I will not give you up.”

Katara frowned at him as she said, “I hope it doesn’t come to that.”

They were silent for a moment before Zuko let out a deep sigh. He reached out for her, but stopped himself since he still felt upset and frustrated with their situation.

“I wish your family and Aang arrive soon,” he said with another sigh.
“I do, too,” she replied softly.

She watched as Zuko again reached out for her, but just as before, he stopped himself and brought his arm back to his side.

“I’ll see you at breakfast,” he told her coolly.

With one last look, he walked passed her and headed down the silent corridor.

Katara watched him go with a frown. He was becoming distant with her again and it pained her. She placed her hand on her chest as the feeling of trepidation increased.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Katara felt tears prickle her eyes as she glanced around at all the angry, disgusted, and disappointed looks the people of her tribe aimed at her. Snow was falling heavily on them and a cold wind was howling around them.

“How dare you bind yourself to the Fire Lord!” her father said angrily. “Even after everything the Fire Nation has done to us.”

“But, Dad, I love him!” Katara tried to argue.

“Love?” Sokka spat as he glared at her, “How can you love our enemy?”

“But Zuko isn’t our enemy!” Katara again tried to make them see reason, “The Fire Nation isn’t our enemy anymore!”

“She’s only saying that because she lusts after him!” Suki hissed as she clutched Jing and Ting to her protectively.

“No!” Katara gasped, horrified.

“You are no longer welcomed here. Leave,” Kanna spoke up, her light-blue eyes hard and unyielding.
“Gran-Gran?” Katara cried out in shock. “Why?”

“You have shamed us by letting him touch you,” Kanna hissed.

“She’s no better than a whore, spreading her legs for the Fire Lord!” a voice among the angry crowd exclaimed.

Katara stared at them in shock as the words continued to echo around her as one by one the people began to disappear until she was standing by herself in an empty, cold winter land.

The scenery changed suddenly and Katara found herself in one of the Fire Nation Palace’s grand halls. Again she was surrounded by a crowd, but this time by angry noblemen and noblewomen.

“How dare you think yourself worthy of being our Fire Lady!” one old man cried out.

“She can’t do anything right!” another person shouted.

“How could Fire Lord Zuko choose a Water Tribe peasant as a wife?” a beautiful, young woman said with a sniff. “I would have been a better choice.”

Before Katara could retort the crowd parted to make way for the Fire Lord.

“Zuko!” she exclaimed in relief.

She rushed toward him, but she gasped when he moved away from her with a dark scowl before she could touch him.

“I regret choosing to marry you,” he said angrily, “You have been nothing but trouble to me. I don’t know how I could’ve believed I was in love with you.”

“Zuko!” Katara cried out in shock. “Why are you saying this? Haven’t I done everything to make “you happy?”

“Marrying you was the biggest mistake I’ve ever made,” he continued coldly.

Katara felt tears sting her eyes at his cruel words. She watched as he lifted a hand up to his side and a thinner hand settled atop his. She followed the pale arm to see who it belonged to, and she felt her heart clench when she realized it was Mai’s. Katara made a strangled sound when Zuko pulled the taller woman to his side as he continued to stare at her with cold eyes.

“I want you leave the palace immediately so I can marry Mai,” he said as he smiled at the noblewoman before he turned to glare at the shocked waterbender, “She would be a much better Fire Lady than you.”

A broken sob escaped her and she clutched at her chest. She felt as if her heart had just been ripped from its confined cage and crushed into a million pieces.

Again, the scene changed and Katara found herself walking on one of the stone paths that led to the turtle-duck pond in the private garden. She smiled when she spotted Zuko feeding the turtle-ducks.

“Zuko!” she called out happily as she quickened her pace.

Zuko turned at the sound of her voice and smiled at her as he waited for her to near him. Something shot past her, and a gasp escaped Katara as she froze in dismay when an ice dagger pierced right through his heart. Zuko clutched at his chest as blood began to seep onto his tunic and he raised a trembling hand to look at his bloodied fingers. He turned pained eyes on her and a cry escaped Katara at his look of betrayal.

“W-why did you betray me? Why?” he whispered just as the ground opened up beneath him and swallowed him.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed in horror as she tried to run to where he had been, but a pair of arms wrapped around her from behind and stopped her.

She looked down and gasped when she saw the blue arrow tattoos on the arms that were holding her back just as she heard Aang whisper near her ear.
Katara’s eyes flew open and she realized she was screaming before she slapped her hand over her mouth. She bolted into a sitting position and frantically looked around herself only to notice she was in her room and it was morning. She could feel perspiration on her forehead as well as tears sticking to her cheeks just as her heart continued to pound wildly in her chest.

“It was just a nightmare, it was just a nightmare,” she chanted quietly to herself as she wrapped her arms around her middle. She wiped her tears and laid her face against her knees that she had drawn to her chest.

A knock on the door made her jump and her head snapped up to see the door open and Jiao walk in with a smile and a silver tray in her hands.

“Good morning, Lady Katara,” the young maidservant said cheerfully after she had closed the door, but she paused and frowned at the pallor on the waterbender’s face. “Are you not feeling well?”

Katara swallowed thickly as she tried to calm her pounding heart and harsh breathing. She removed her arms from around herself and tried to smile.

“I’m fine,” she said.

Jiao frowned at her, unconvinced, and Katara cleared her throat as she pulled away the covers and stood up from the bed.

“Where is the Fire Lord?” the blue-eyed woman asked instead as she eyed the tray.

The maidservant smiled at her as she placed the tray with food on the nightstand before she began to rummage for clothes in the small wardrobe for the waterbender to wear.

“Fire Lord Zuko has been called to the outskirts of the capital and has told me to inform you that he will not be able to see you until late today,” Jiao said as she pulled out several articles of clothing, “He also said that he had Shen and Kuo accompany him and would like for you to remain in the western wing of the palace until they return.”
Katara nodded and made her way to the bathroom as she tried to forget her dream and the dread that had spread through her. She relaxed slightly as she started to get ready for the day and start her lessons with Madam Fang Hua.

“I am sorry, my lord, but my master has not returned from his morning ride yet,” the retainer apologized in a tremulous voice as he did a series of bows before the frowning Fire Lord.

The golden-eyed firebender watched the sweating old man with cold eyes, and when it seemed the man began to tremble in anxiety the longer he remain staring silently at him, Zuko looked away to stare out the window he was standing in front of in the sitting room he had been directed to a few minutes ago.

“I will wait until he finally shows himself,” Zuko finally replied in a hard tone. He hated when he was made to wait.

“Oh of course, Fire Lord Zuko!” the balding servant stammered out as he again made several more bows, almost groveling at Zuko’s feet. “I will send a few maids to bring you more tea and some refreshments—”

“There is no need,” Zuko interrupted the man sharply. “Just send your master to me as soon as he appears from his morning ride,” he ordered dryly before he waved a dismissive hand.

The man bobbed his head as he answered before he turned away and practically raced out of the room so he could send for a few servants to go search for their master before the Fire Lord became more impatient and angry.

Zuko narrowed his eyes as he glanced around the overly furnished sitting room before he again returned his attention to the window where he could see a few men scurrying into the surrounding woods, probably in search of their lord who it seemed did not know what common courtesy was. It was the nobleman, after all, who had sent for him in the first place with a message saying he had an important matter to discuss with him.

Early that morning, Zuko had just entered his study when he had been interrupted by a knock on his door, and once he had bid whoever was outside to enter, he had been curious to see one of his maidservants close the door behind her. The servant had told him one of the royal advisors had approached her the previous night as she went about her duties in the palace and asked her to give the bound scroll to the Fire Lord, saying he had to meet with him immediately. Zuko had opened the scroll to find out the old advisor had information about a possible plot against the Fire Lord.

He had startled the young maid as he barked for Shen and Kuo to have his komodo rhino saddled and a group of guards ready to come with him before he raced to his room to change into his armor and grab his swords. He had enough time to inform his uncle and mother what was going on and to order Jiao to tell Katara he would arrive late, before he mounted his komodo rhino and headed toward his advisor’s country house where he probably waited so they could have more privacy to talk. Zuko was curious for the old advisor was usually very quiet and seemed a bit timid most of the time, so it was strange to know that such a man had such dire information. Of course, Zuko took a group of guards with him in case it could be a trap to lure him out of the palace unprotected.

However, upon arriving at the country house, the main manservant had told him the nobleman had not returned from his morning ride and Zuko found himself getting irritated at the man’s audacity to keep the Fire Lord waiting after urging him to meet with him immediately. If it wasn’t because the man might have important information, Zuko would have had the man arrested for wasting his time.

Moving away from the window, Zuko sat on one of the gaudy chairs and grimaced when he sank down in the overly soft cushion before he resumed his stoic and alert expression as he waited for the nobleman to make an appearance. He ignored the cooling tea that had been placed on the golden table before him when he had entered the room and again looked around the extravagant room in distaste before he let his mind wander to other thoughts while he waited.

He wondered how the old advisor had come upon the discovery of a plot against him. What kind of plot was it and when did they plan to strike? Zuko narrowed his eyes and clenched his hands in anger. Why were they so set against him since all he had done was for the betterment of the Fire Nation? They were fools if they believed it would have been or would be better if Ozai remained in power. Did the advisor know who was behind this plot? Was it Wei? What if it was the same traitor who had made it easy for Jianguo and his men to capture him and Katara?

Katara.

He sighed as he reached up a hand to rub his temple. He had not seen her since yesterday, much less spoken to her, since he had been so upset with her and her constant worrying over Aang. How would she like it if he was constantly worrying about Mai? Not at all, he was sure. And honestly, he did not care if he acted like a jealous jerk whenever Aang was brought up or whenever another man approached her.

Gods, something was wrong with him.
Dismissing such thoughts from his mind for the moment to focus on more urgent matters, Zuko again glanced at the window only to realize that the morning had now turned into noon and the nobleman had still not shown himself.

Clenching his jaw in impatience, Zuko rose from the uncomfortable chair and made his way to the window only to see a few of the servants returning without any sign of their lord. The raven-haired firebender watched as the men approached the old retainer and talked with him, while shaking their heads and shrugging their shoulders. The old servant shook his head and wrung his hands in worry as he kept throwing nervous glances in the direction where the Fire Lord was currently waiting. Zuko frowned deeply as he turned away from the window to pace the length of the garish room in restlessness.

A few minutes later, there was a timorous knock on the door before the old servant appeared and immediately began to bow in apology.

“I am sorry, Fire Lord Zuko, but it seems my master is nowhere to be found,” he said as he kept his head bowed and his body tense, almost as if he expected Zuko to strike him down for the unfavorable news.

Zuko frowned at him and almost sighed when the man flinched. As if he would hit an old man for something that was not his fault. Turning away from the servant, Zuko rubbed his chin as he again frowned in thought. He had either been given another false message or the advisor had run away. However, he strongly suspected that whoever was behind this plot had found out that the old advisor knew of the conspiracy and had thus gotten rid of him. Zuko ground his teeth together.

_Damn it all to Koh’s lair!_

“I will have some of my guards search for your master,” Zuko spoke up impassively, “Thank you for the tea.”

Before the servant could respond, Zuko swept past him and out the door. Shen and Kuo immediately stepped up behind him and the three strode down the flashy passageway of the country house until they went outside where the rest of Zuko’s guards awaited him. Mounting his komodo rhino, Zuko motioned for one of his guards to step up next to him.

“I want you and a few of the men to search the area for Advisor Kang,” he said grimly, “Report to me if you find him…or if you don’t.”
“As you wish, my lord,” the older guard replied as he bowed before he turned away and pointed to a few men to follow him.

Zuko pressed his heels against his mount’s side and the black komodo rhino immediately began to walk down the path that led outside the walls surrounding the large country house. With Kuo, Shen, and the rest of his guards following, Zuko rode back toward the capital city and to the palace in deep thought.

Hopefully they found the nobleman alive, but Zuko highly doubted it. Just when things seemed to be going well, this had to happen, making him wonder if things could get any worse.

Once she was bathed and dressed, Katara rapidly ate her breakfast before walking toward the library with Jiao following quietly behind her. Katara did not need to look at the young servant to know she was worried, but Katara could only smile at her as reassurance. They entered the library and headed toward the corner covered with cushions surrounding the low table where Madam Fang Hua was already waiting for Katara to begin their lessons.

“Good morning, Lady Katara,” the old woman greeted with a gentle smile that made the wrinkles around her eyes more pronounced, “I hope you are ready to continue with where we left off yesterday.”

Katara bowed as a greeting before she took a seat across the silver-haired woman. She could already feel a headache forming.

“I am ready,” she replied with a strained smile.

Madam Fang Hua nodded and handed the waterbender more scrolls for her to read through.

As more time passed, the more Katara became overwhelmed with everything. She began to question if she was really capable of remembering everything there was to know about how to act like a proper lady, not only of the Royal Court, but also as the Fire Lord’s wife and Fire Lady.

‘She can’t do anything right!’

‘How could Fire Lord Zuko choose a water peasant as a wife?’
‘I regret choosing to marry you.’

‘W-why did you betray me?’

Katara’s stomach twisted at the memory of that horrible dream and her anxiety rose.

How could she have thought that it would be so easy? Was she perhaps rushing into things? Could she really leave her family and home in order to live in a foreign land that once used to be their enemy?

“Lady Katara,” the tiny old woman’s stern voice brought Katara out of her rushing thoughts, “repeat all the family names of the Royal Court and their connections to each other.”

“Yes, uh, there is the Hong Family, the Lee Family, and…” Katara trailed off as her mind suddenly went blank. She tried to call forth the names of the families she had memorized the previous day, but she could not seem to remember them and she began to despair as the words from her nightmare echoed harshly in her head.

“There is the…um…the…” Katara struggled to say before she cried out as she covered her face in frustration, “I will never get this! There are just so many!”

“You need to know all the noble family names in order to keep the peace among them and not offend anyone by forgetting them,” Lady Fang Hua stated firmly as she pointed with a gnarled finger at a scroll laid on the table with the list of the noble family names.

“I know, but it’s just that there are so many new things to memorize and know!” Katara exclaimed as she looked up with anxious eyes at the old woman.

“As the future Fire Lady of the Fire Nation, it is your responsibility to be knowledgeable in its traditions and history,” Lady Fang Hua informed her firmly, “By knowing the noble family names it will aid you in establishing alliances between the Fire Lord and them.”

Katara swallowed and nodded.
“It is also the central duties of the Fire Lady to supervise the departments of education and art as well as social campaigns such as orphanages, hospitals, schools, and the rights of the common people,” Madam Fang Hua continued. “You must educate any future children you bear Fire Lord Zuko of their heritage. You must guide the future heir that will one day rule over the nation as his father does now. That is why you must learn all that I am teaching you.”

When the waterbender looked at her with wide eyes and a trembling lip, the silver-haired woman’s eyes softened and she let out a tiny sigh, taking pity on the poor girl.

“I know everything must be overwhelming for you, child,” the old woman said softly as she reached out a warm and wrinkly hand to pat the waterbender’s clenched fist, “but you must not despair. With just a bit more work, you will succeed in learning what you must.”

“Thank you,” Katara said quietly.

“Get some rest,” the woman encouraged as she brought back her hand to her lap, “We will resume tomorrow.”

Katara thanked her again as she stood up and bowed before making her way to the door with Jiao following behind her. Once they left the library and were walking down the golden corridor, Jiao cleared her throat.

“Would you like to eat now or would you like to wait for the Fire Lord to eat dinner?” the maidservant asked softly.

“I’m not hungry,” Katara replied silently, “Please tell Fire Lord Zuko and his family that I’m very tired and that I’ll see them tomorrow.”

Jiao frowned slightly as she replied, “I will, Lady Katara.”

She bowed and hesitated for a moment before she walked away to continue her other duties.

Katara watched her go for a moment before she turned away and headed to her room. Once she arrived, she closed the door behind her and made her way to the bed where she threw herself onto her back. Staring unseeingly at the ceiling, the waterbender began to wonder if what she was doing was the right thing.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Long, pale fingers drummed against the wooden surface of the low table as the Fire Lord stared impatiently at the doors that opened to his antechamber. His mother and uncle were silent as they waited for Katara to show up for breakfast and it was all he could do not to leave his anteroom in search of her. He looked out the window as he let his mind wander.

Once he had arrived at the capital city the previous day from the nobleman’s country house, Zuko had visited the prison tower afterwards, but the captain of the prison guards had told him no suspicious people had visited Ozai or been near his cell at all. And except for Wei, nobody else visited the old advisor’s brother.

And to make matters worse, they still had not heard any news about where the rebels could be hiding or what they planned to do now that he and Katara had escaped them. Zuko feared something worse could happen, and he had ordered for the palace security to increase. He may be going overboard with his paranoia, but he did not want to take any chances with the safety of Katara, his mother, and his uncle.

In a dark mood, he had returned to the palace and had been anticipating spending some time with Katara during dinner, but to his disappointment, Jiao had told him Katara had retired early. He had not wanted to disturb her, so he had eaten with his family and prepared himself to wait for morning so he could see her and perhaps talk to her about the distance that seemed to be growing between them.

There was a knock at the door before it was opened, and Zuko looked up with an expectant smile only to frown when it was not the person he wanted to see. Jiao bowed after Kuo closed the door behind her.

“Where is Lady Katara, Jiao?” the young lord asked with a deeper frown.

“Lady Katara sends her regrets, but she will not be joining you for breakfast,” Jiao began before she hurried to finish when the Fire Lord narrowed his eyes, “She is not feeling well this morning.”

Zuko’s frown turned into a concerned expression and he stiffened in his spot.

“Is she okay?” he asked worriedly.
“Has she seen the physician’s assistant?” Ursa asked with a frown.

The Palace Physician had still not returned from visiting his daughter and new born grandchild, so that left his assistant.

“Lady Katara said it is just a mild headache and wishes to rest,” the servant responded as she kept her eyes to the floor in deference to her lord.

Zuko made to stand before he changed his mind and sat back down. He wanted to see Katara, but it would not be proper for him to be seen entering her room while she was indisposed.

“Tell her we will see her once she feels better,” he ordered the maidservant.

Jiao bowed before she retreated. Once the door was closed behind her, Iroh and Ursa turned to look at the frowning Fire Lord.

“I hope it is nothing serious,” Iroh said worriedly.

“Katara has been acting a bit strangely recently,” Ursa commented with a deep frown on her delicate features.

Zuko clenched his hands. He had a strange feeling in his chest and he did not like it. He just hoped Katara felt better soon so he could see her and get rid of the uneasiness that had suddenly taken hold of him.

Katara did not feel better the next day and remained in her room where only Jiao and Ursa could enter. Zuko was worried and he wanted to see her to make sure she was all right. His mother had assured him that Katara was fine, although she did look tired, almost as if she barely slept, and she looked extremely anxious. He wondered what was bothering her and it upset him that Katara refused to see him and tell him what was wrong.

Zuko strode purposely down the corridor that would lead to the northern wing of his palace. He had just arrived from some business in the capital and he still had no news of the missing advisor. He had no doubts that the man must be dead by now. He would have to be more careful and vigilant than
He decided to think of such things later as he wondered if Katara was still in her room. He glanced back at Shen and Kuo, who had accompanied him into the city, before he turned back around and resumed walking toward his study. He could see his personal guards were worried for Katara as well and it made him glad for it meant they would protect Katara with their lives as they would him. If Katara did not leave her room this day, however, he will barge into her room and damn the consequences.

Spotting Jiao turning a corner with a basket of laundry, he quickened his pace, his features determined. The servant woman froze and her eyes widened when she saw the tall Fire Lord almost barreling down on her.

"Jiao, how is Lady Katara feeling today?" he asked even before he reached the young woman.

Jiao relaxed once she saw the Fire Lord was not angry with her before she smiled as she shifted the basket more securely on her hip.

"Lady Katara left her room a few hours ago and is in the library at the moment," she informed him with a small bow.

A bed sheet fell from the basket as she bowed, but before she could reach down for it, Kuo stepped forward and picked it up before placing the sheet back into the basket. Zuko raised an eyebrow at the blush that surfaced on Jiao’s cheeks as she smiled at his guard, who returned the smile briefly before he resumed his position next to Shen. Zuko thanked the servant and quickly headed to the library. His two personal guards practically had to jog after him as he strode speedily down the passageways.

Once the doors that led into the massive library came into view, Zuko paused before them to regain his composure before turning to his guards, ignoring the knowing looks they were trying to hide.

"You may take a rest," Zuko told them coolly.

"As you wish, my lord," both guards said as they bowed and walked away to get some food.

Zuko turned back to the doors and quietly opened one of them before stepping into the library and closing the door behind him. He glanced around the grand library, though not as ancient or extensive ever.
as the Dragon Bone Catacombs, it was impressive nonetheless. After his eyes adjusted to the dim lighting of the room, Zuko walked further into the silent place until he spotted Katara sitting alone at the low table surrounded by many cushions and pillows. A smile began to spread on his face before it disappeared and a frown replaced it when he noticed that Katara was clutching her head, her elbows resting on the table covered with piles of scrolls and papers.

“Katara,” he called out softly as he walked up to her. His frown deepened when she gasped and jumped.

“Zuko!” she exclaimed as she straightened before she began to nervously fidget with her hair. “What are you doing here?” she asked hesitantly.

The frown marring Zuko’s features deepened even further as he finally stood before her.

“I haven’t seen you in two days and I wanted to make sure you were all right,” he told her.

“I’m fine,” Katara answered quickly and shrugged.

“You’re lying,” Zuko growled out lowly and Katara flinched. He sighed before he more softly asked, “What’s wrong?”

“Nothing’s wrong,” Katara insisted.

“I know there is something wrong,” the golden-eyed male growled out, “How can I help you if you don’t tell me?”

Katara remained silent for a moment before she slowly stood up, her unbound hair covering her face as she looked away from him.

“I promised your mother I’d meet her in the garden,” she said quietly.

She moved away from the table and walked past him, but Zuko was not about to allow her to walk away, and so, he grabbed her arm and spun her around to face him.
“Tell me what’s wrong, Katara,” he demanded again with narrowed eyes.

At his commanding tone, all of Katara’s pent up emotions of anxiety, doubts, and fears broke free and she harshly wrenched her arm away from his grasp as she looked up to glare at him.

“I can’t do this!” she screamed.

Zuko’s eyes widened at her outburst and he felt his heart twist in his chest.

“What do you mean?” he asked her with a frown.

“I will never be able to get the perfect noblewoman act right!” she exclaimed in frustration as she rubbed her face. “Many of the Fire Nation traditions are so different from my own! There are so many rules, what if I forget something and I make a major mistake?!”

“Katara,” Zuko called her name softly, “nobody would expect you to know everything and be perfect. You were born to a different culture with different traditions and it’s understandable.”

Katara shook her head as she continued, her arms flailing beside her as she tried to make Zuko understand.

“That’s easy for you to say because you want to marry me!” she began exasperatedly.

“I just found out the Fire Lady has to be submissive to her husband and do everything he says even if she doesn’t agree with it!” she exclaimed loudly. “If he wants to have a mistress, the Fire Lady has to silently endure it, if the Fire Lord wishes to have children with his concubines, the Fire Lady has to accept it, and if he wants to send her away to live somewhere else, she has no say in it! I will not be such a woman and I will not put up with such disrespect!”

“You know I will never treat you in such a way, Katara,” Zuko told her with a frown, “and I know you will never become such a submissive and weak woman. That is why I want to marry you because I don’t want a slave as a wife but someone who will help me rule the Fire Nation and always be by my side.”
Katara relaxed slightly at his words, but her shoulders drooped a little and she glanced away as she clutched at her mother’s necklace.

“I will be leaving my family and home. I’m going to miss them,” she said quietly, her voice breaking in the end.

Zuko frowned darkly. He did not like where this was heading. He had enough problems already and he did not want to deal with this at the moment.

“It’s not as if you could not visit your family in the Southern Water Tribe,” he told her, “and your family will always be welcome into the Fire Nation.”

Katara could feel her anxiety lessening as Zuko confidently answered each of her concerns, but there was still that sense of dread that would not leave her.

“Aang is going to be angry,” Katara muttered.

“That is a given,” Zuko responded with a shrug.

“You could get hurt,” she said quietly and her eyes clenched tight as the memory of the ice dagger piercing Zuko’s heart resurfaced in her mind.

“You don’t have any confidence I could defeat Aang?” he asked her tersely.

“That’s not what I meant!” the waterbender exclaimed as she looked at him with pleading eyes.

“So what do you mean, Katara?” Zuko asked her gruffly. Why was she saying all these things?

Katara froze before she took a deep breath as she averted her eyes from him.

“Maybe we’re making a mistake,” she said softly.
“What?” Zuko exclaimed as his golden eyes widened.

“We have only confessed our feelings a few weeks ago and we’re already planning to get married,” she continued quietly, “Maybe we’re rushing into things that we’ll later regret.”

Zuko had begun to shake his head even before she had finished her sentence and he frowned at her.

“I have never been so sure of anything in my life,” he told her firmly.

“How can you be so sure?” she asked him as she spread her arms wide. “What if later on you regret marrying me and not a Fire Nation noblewoman…or Mai?”

“I will not regret it,” Zuko growled out angrily as he took a step closer to her. “If I wasn’t sure I wanted you for the rest of my life, I would not have asked you to marry me! What? Would you want me to ask Mai to marry me instead? Would you want me to sate my carnal urges with another woman?”

“No!” Katara shouted, her heart wrenched at the thought.

“Then why are you hesitating?” he asked coldly. His nostrils flared and his hands clenched into trembling fists at his sides as he gritted out, “Are you regretting that you agreed to marry me? Did you now find out you really do not love me as you believed you did?”

“No!” Katara denied again, shocked at his words and the pain she could detect in his voice. “I do want to marry you and I do love you!

“Then what is the problem?!” Zuko shouted angrily.

“It’s just that everything is so overwhelming!” Katara tried to explain. “Things are going too fast!” She took another deep breath as she looked at the dark-faced firebender from beneath her lashes as she more quietly said, “Maybe we should slow things down…and wait a year or two—”
“No,” Zuko cut her off firmly.

“But, Zuko—”

“No,” he interrupted her again with a growl. “I already agreed to wait for us to get married until you talked to your family and Aang, and I will not wait any longer! I will have you as my wife and soon!”

Without another word, Zuko spun around and headed toward the doors, his broad shoulders stiff and his hands balled into fists beside him. If he waited for them to get married, then how could he keep her safe and protected?

“Zuko, wait!” Katara called after him in alarm.

Zuko did not turn back—even though he really wanted to run to her and pull her to him—for he was beyond angry and frustrated and he was afraid of what he would do if he remained any longer in her presence. He wrenched the door open and slammed it behind himself, the last thing he heard was the sound of Katara’s voice calling to him.

The turtle-ducks quacked questionably at the silent figure sitting at the edge of the pond, begging for treats before swimming away to frolic in the water when no morsels were tossed their way. Katara stared blankly at the little creatures waddling in the water before her arms tightened around her legs as she dropped her head to her knees, biting her lip to stifle a sob.

Almost two days had passed since she had that argument with Zuko and it was killing her. She hated that they were fighting, hated this distance between them, but most of all hated that Zuko was angry with her and that she was causing him unhappiness. She felt miserable and there was a familiar pain in her chest from being away from him. She buried her face into her knees and sighed sadly.

What should she do?

“Good morning, Miss Katara,” Iroh’s cheerful voice startled her out of her thoughts.

“Uncle Iroh, good morning,” Katara replied as she looked up, plastering a smile on her face, as he sat down beside her.
“Zuko is angry,” Iroh commented bluntly.

Katara looked away and sighed.

“I know,” she responded quietly.

“What is the problem?” the wise firebender asked gently.

Katara hesitated for a moment, but when Iroh squeezed her arm gently in comfort, she relaxed slightly and again looked at him.

“I…I told Zuko that I wanted to wait a bit longer before we got married,” she confessed sadly.

“I see,” Iroh muttered as he rubbed at his bearded chin, “No wonder he’s so upset.”

Katara looked down at her lap, ashamed. Iroh cared so much for his nephew and she was hurting him. Would the wise old man hate her for it?

“Why do you want to wait?” he asked her after a moment of silence in which Katara began to chew on her lip in anxiety.

Katara again hesitated before she finally confessed to him her insecurities of never being able to understand court life, her doubts of being able to carry on the responsibilities as Fire Lady, her struggle of leaving her family and home, and her fear of being rejected by the Royal Court.

“I don’t think I’m ready for all of it yet,” she finished quietly and clenched her hands on her lap.

“How can you say that?” Iroh exclaimed with a shake of his head.

When the waterbender turned wide and confused eyes on him, he continued a bit more softly.
“How can you doubt yourself when you left your home to help the Avatar at age fourteen and helped save the world at fifteen? If you were ready for all of that, then you are ready for anything, even becoming the wife of the Fire Lord and the Fire Lady to this nation.”

Katara was silent as she pondered his words for they did make sense. She used to be so courageous and did not allow anything stop her. What happened to her, to her adventurous and fighting spirit?

“What else is bothering you, my dear?” he asked her.

He pulled out a small bundle of cloth from his sleeve and opened it to reveal a piece of bread. He broke it in half and gave one piece to the silent waterbender before he returned his gaze to the pond.
He crumbled a piece of the bread, threw the crumbs into the water, and smiled when the turtle-ducks immediately swam close to them to snatch the treats out of the water.

The blue-eyed woman threw some crumbs into the water and looked at the quacking animals for a moment before she finally replied to Iroh’s questions.

“I don’t want Zuko and Aang to fight because of me,” she said guiltily.

“Love causes much happiness as well as much pain,” Iroh told her wisely, “Unfortunately, Aang will be the one to suffer such a pain this time, but he must, eventually, accept that you and Zuko love each other. You should not ignore your own happiness just because you are afraid to hurt Aang.”

Katara nodded at his words for it reminded her of the words her Gran-Gran had advised her all those months ago.

‘Promise me that you won’t sacrifice your happiness because you are afraid that another person might be hurt.’

She planned on keeping her promise, for even though she did not want to hurt Aang, she was still going to remain by Zuko’s side.

They were silent for a moment as they continued to feed the turtle-ducks with the bread. Once they ran out, Katara wiped her hands from remaining crumbs and folded her hands on her lap while she “What are you truly afraid of, Katara?” Iroh finally asked.

The question made her tense up and she clenched her hands as she stared at the water before her. She was silent for a long moment, but Iroh patiently waited for her to speak.

“I… I’m afraid Zuko will end up regretting marrying me,” she finally confessed in a whisper.

Iroh ‘tsked’ and shook his head as he slid his hands inside his sleeves while he regarded the young woman sitting beside him with her shoulders slumped and her hands fidgeting on her lap.

“That is a ridiculous fear, if I do say so myself,” Iroh mused with another shake of his head.

“How can you say that, Uncle Iroh?” Katara exclaimed indignantly.

“Zuko has been pressured into marrying ever since he turned eighteen and he has been fighting against the Royal Court about it for years,” Iroh informed her, his bushy eyebrows furrowing deeply. “If he really did not want to marry you, or if he thought he would regret such a decision, he would have continued refusing to marry and not have proposed to you.”

When Katara looked up to stare at him, Iroh continued, “Zuko is not a fickle man, and when he cares for something or someone, he will do so forever.”

Katara felt her heart clench and her eyes begin to sting with tears. She brought her hands to cover her face as the tears she been holding back finally fell from her eyes and ran down her cheeks.

“T’m being stupid, aren’t I?” she asked with a small whimper.

Iroh placed a hand on her back and rubbed comforting circles as he waited a moment for her tears and soft sobs to subside.

“It is normal to have doubts and fears,” he reassured her gently as he softly patted her back.
“Marriage is a big step, especially for someone like you who would be leaving her family and country behind to become the wife and consort to the Fire Lord.”

There was another short silence which the turtle-ducks filled with soft quacks and splashes of water.

“Katara,” Iroh began in a soft voice as he turned to regard her seriously, “have you ever thought that Zuko would one day get tired of waiting and decide to marry someone else? Although he is resisting the Royal Court at the moment, it is his duty to marry and produce an heir, after all. Besides, a person can only take so much before they feel rejected.”

Katara gasped and her heart constricted painfully in her chest as her eyes once again filled with tears. She had not thought of that possibility, but she would not blame Zuko if he wanted to break up with her now.

“Think about all I have said,” Iroh told her softly as he stood up, “Just follow what your heart tells you, even if the whole world is against you, it will not lead you astray. But just remember that Zuko loves you.”

He brushed his clothes from clinging grass and smiled gently at her before turning around toward the palace. Watching the retired general until he disappeared inside the palace, Katara turned back to stare at the quiet pond as she went over his words.

‘…there are times when we must also think of ourselves, of our own happiness,’ her Gran-Gran’s words resounded in her head, ‘even if it goes against the wishes of others, because in the end you will only live with regrets and sorrows that can never be fixed.’

Was this one of those times?

One of the grand golden doors was thrown open as Zuko stormed into his bedchamber before he slammed it shut behind him. He roughly stripped his robes from his body and threw them aside before sinking onto his bed and clutching his head between his hands, his fingers grasping almost painfully onto his messy hair.

He had not seen or spoken to Katara in a couple of days and he felt like he was going insane. Never before had he had such a great need to be around one person constantly and he did not know how to deal with it. But he wanted to be near her, dammit!
He growled and crushed the heels of his hands into his clenched eyes as the same pain in his chest he had felt when he had left the Southern Water Tribe and Katara behind intensified.

But he was just so angry, frustrated, afraid, and hurt and he did not want to say or do something he would later regret if he approached Katara at the moment. He had spent his days brooding, throwing himself into his work, bending white fire until exhaustion, and all the while thoughts of Katara and a potential plot set against him bombarded his mind.

He was not only impatient to marry Katara because he could not wait to have her as his wife, but he would be able to have her close and protected from anyone who tried to harm her once they married. If he let her leave his side, who knew what could happen or if someone would try to kidnap her again to get to him. He could not let that happen. He had promised to protect her. But she was making it so damn difficult!

He wanted to barge into Katara’s room, yell at her for all these strange feelings she caused within him that made him feel weak and vulnerable, yell at her for denying them, yet he also wanted to gather her in his arms in order to keep her safe, beg her not to leave him, and then make sweet love to her until she surrendered and agreed to marry him as soon as possible.

Agni, what was wrong with him?

Glaring into the darkness, he saw himself as a creature driven by anxiety and his eyes burned with anguish and anger. The main reason he was afraid to approach Katara was that he feared she would tell him that she did not want to marry him anymore. It pained him to think that she would leave him, that she would remove herself from his life forever. He had always scoffed at the melodramatic words of lovers, but he was now sure that if Katara went out of his life it would cripple him.

The royal bloodline would cease to exist for he refused to have another woman as his wife or mother of his children, he would not love another. Just the thought of being with another woman disgusted him.

And the thought that Katara would find another man, maybe go back to Aang, made him want to kill something. And if she did leave him, he would know pain and loneliness the likes of which he had never known that it would not surprise him if it actually killed him.

Snapping his eyes opened, Zuko moved his hands away from his head and clenched them on his knees.
“I won’t let her leave me,” he growled out into the dark and silent room. “I won’t let her go. I will just have to convince her that there’s no reason for us to wait to marry!”

He rose from his massive bed determinedly and glanced at his balcony. The curtains were pulled slightly apart and he could see that it was already dark. His family and Katara were probably just finishing their dinner—he had taken his by himself in his study.

Now was a good time as any to have a talk with Katara.

Turning toward his dark mahogany wardrobe, Zuko extracted the steel chest that rested at the bottom and inserted the key he always had with him. Opening the lid of the chest, he took out the Blue Spirit’s black suit, black boots and the pair of black gloves. He looked at the white and blue mask for a moment before he decided to leave it behind.

After dressing in the dark attire, Zuko opened the balcony doors, looked warily around, and then jumped down to his garden without a sound. He waited a few seconds before he slinked off and disappeared among the shadows.

He will not allow anything to take his waterbender away from him, not a plot set against him, not the rebels, not Aang, and especially not Katara’s doubts. He would not allow Katara to refuse him.

The cool wind rushed swiftly by as the large creature flew at an incredible speed above the dark ocean. The light the crescent moon provided reflected off the white fur of the flying sky-bison as well as the pale skin of the two passengers riding on the back of the great beast.

Appa let out a low groan before he quieted when his master and friend patted his furry head after flicking the reins.

“Just a bit longer and then you can get some rest, Appa,” the young Avatar said softly so as not to wake Toph up and have to deal with her crankiness.

Appa grunted before he remained silent as he swished his tail to gain a bit more speed. Aang sighed guiltily and promised himself to reward his sky-bison with a long rest and a huge pile of his favorite food once they reached their destination. They have been flying almost nonstop since they left the Earth Kingdom village in the northeastern part of the great continent and Aang was impatient.
He glanced over his shoulder and his eyes landed on the small form huddled in the center of the huge saddle. Toph was wrapped in a blanket he had tucked around her once she fell asleep and she had a small frown on her face—probably because she hated sleeping on something that was not solid and steady ground. Momo was curled against the petite earthbender’s side and he was also sleeping, one of his huge bat-like ears twitching at every little sound. Aang smiled softly for all three of them—Toph, Appa, and Momo—kept him from breaking at the pain he felt inside. He winced and turned away to stare at the dark sky.

He remembered the false missive he had received when he was in the Fire Nation almost more than a month ago and wondered what was going on. Toph and he had arrived at the village, prepared for the worst, but to their shock they were met with a peaceful little town. The villagers had been surprised to have the Avatar visit them, but they did not waste any time in welcoming him and the master earthbender to their village and immediately prepared a feast in his honor. Confused, he had sought out the village headman to inquire about the rebels, but the governor had been just as confused for he had not sent such an urgent message to the Avatar.

Toph had advised him that they should head to the Fire Nation colony to help Katara and Zuko. He had been reluctant at first for he was still hurting over Katara’s final words before he finally agreed, but the governor had asked him to stay, for even though there was no revolt in the village, they were having some problems with wild animals as well as bandits attacking their homes and destroying their crops. So as an excuse to hide from the pain of losing Katara, he had been helping the small village with the help of Toph for the past month.

Shaking his head to dismiss his memories, the airbender reached inside his tunic and pulled out two small scrolls. The first one was from Chao informing him that Katara and Zuko had been kidnapped and asked for his help. He almost had a heart attack and flew into a panic, ready to go save Katara from her captors, but Toph had yelled at him to calm down before she knocked him out for an entire day. He had been grateful, as well as a bit resentful, that she had stopped him for he could have lost control, but he was also angry that he had wasted time in which he could have been searching for and rescuing Katara—and Zuko as well, of course.

Glancing at the second scroll, Aang let out a relieved sigh. In it, Chao told him that Zuko and Katara had managed to escape and were on their way to the Fire Nation. He was glad to know that both of them were safe, but once he arrived at the Fire Nation he will make sure to never let Katara out of his sight again. He placed the messages back inside his tunic before he reached inside his sleeve and pulled out the necklace he had made himself this time. It was simple yet beautiful like the one he had made for Katara when she had lost her mother’s necklace years ago—which Zuko had found.

Frowning, Aang’s gray eyes narrowed before he shook his head as he smiled at the thin necklace in his hand. He hoped that this time Katara would like it and agreed to marry him once he proposed to her again. He was sure she will accept him this time. When she broke up with him on that day and told him she did not love him the way he loved her, he had been devastated and he felt like the world was crumbling around him. But a month later, he now felt positive that she must have regretted her decision and come to terms with her feelings. He had been upset ever since he left the Fire Nation at the thought that Zuko was alone with Katara, but Aang was positive that Katara only loved him despite what she had told him earlier, and now that time had passed surely she had come to realize it.

They were some days away from the Fire Nation, and soon he will see Katara again, have her in his arms again, and soon they will be married.
Katara sighed dejectedly as she made her way to her room to hopefully find some sleep, which had been eluding her ever since she had that argument with Zuko. He had not been at dinner that evening just like last night, and once again, she felt that stab of guilt in her chest. She went over the advice Iroh had given her earlier in the day in her head. She knew he was right, she knew she was in a way being unreasonable, but she was still so afraid and unsure of the future looming before her.

Following silently behind her, Shen and Kuo looked at her worriedly. Sensing their concern, Katara glanced back and gave them a small smile to reassure them. The two guards glanced at each other, unconvinced, but they did not say anything as they escorted the waterbender to her room before they could retire for the night.

“Good night, Lady Katara,” both guards said with a small bow once they reached her room.

“Good night and thank you,” Katara responded as she plastered a smile on her face.

They again looked at her with concern before they turned around and silently headed down the corridor. Katara’s smile faded and she sighed as she opened her door and stepped inside, closing the door softly behind her. She turned around and frowned when she saw that the room was completely dark and the candles had not been lit. Perhaps Jiao forgot to light them.

Katara walked blindly in the direction of the window so she could open the curtains and have a bit of light from the moon, but she could not see a thing and she worried she would trip over something. Suddenly the candle on her nightstand sparked to life and Katara let out a surprised gasp as she whirled around toward the light. Her hand automatically moved to her waterskin when she detected a moving shadow, ready to defend herself against an attack. She froze and her eyes widened when she realized it was Zuko. She had almost not noticed him in the shadows since he was again wearing all-black.

He was sitting on her bed, leaning back against the wall, and his eyes were dark and simmering while the candlelight cast shadows on his impassive features, causing his scar to look even more intimidating.

“Zuko, you scared me!” Katara exclaimed with a scowl as she brought her hand above her racing heart.
Zuko did not reply as he stood up from the bed, his expression unreadable as were his eyes, and Katara began to fidget uncomfortably in the silence. After a moment, Zuko flicked his wrist and a few more candles lit up so that they could see each other better.

“There is something that I need to tell you,” he finally spoke, “and you will listen.”

Katara felt her heart pound in her chest at the hard tone of his voice. She would have retorted that he could not order her around, but she could sense that her temper would only make matters worse. She gave a small nod for him to continue since it seemed she could not find her voice. She swallowed thickly and bit her lip.

“I am sick and tired of this situation and I’m going to put an end to it,” he continued in the same hard tone.

_Oh, La, he’s going to break up with me!_ Katara cried out in her head.

She felt as if her heart was being wrenched from her chest and she choked back the pleas that wanted to burst from her lips.

“I…I don’t blame you for it,” she said brokenly and looked down at the floor before taking a deep breath.

She wanted to tell him that she had been thinking things through and that she was starting to see that some of her worries were not so bad. She wanted to beg him not to leave her, but she could not do that, she could not make him do something he did not want—and it seemed that he no longer wanted her. She needed to be strong and endure the pain since this was her fault, her doubts and insecurities had finally tired him. She had pushed him away.

“I’ll pack my things immediately and leave,” she said quietly.

Zuko’s confident stance faltered at her words and he stiffened, his eyes widening in shock and pain.

“What do you mean?” he asked.

His eyes narrowed as his temper began to rise while he tried to ignore the ache that was beginning to form in his chest. Was she leaving him?
Katara looked up to frown at him, her eyes glistening with unshed tears that made him frown.

“I understand that you want to…end things with me,” she said miserably.

“What?” Zuko asked in bewilderment as he frowned more deeply.

Clenching her hands besides her, Katara glanced away as she tried to hide the tears that were beginning to gather in her eyes, and she grit her teeth to stop herself from screaming at him for making her repeat herself.

“You said that you wanted to e-end things with me,” she repeated quietly, grimacing at her stammer.

“No!” Zuko exclaimed as he rushed forward to crush her to his chest, his arms tight around her as if he were trying to keep her permanently in place, “What I meant was that I want to put an end to your doubts about us.”

Katara sagged against him in relief, and Zuko held her close to him as she buried her face into his chest.

“I thought you d-didn’t want m-me anymore!” she cried out softly.

He pulled away slightly to frown at her as he asked, “What made you think that?”

“You avoided me!” Katara exclaimed as she returned his frown with one of her own. “What else was I supposed to think other than that you didn’t want me anymore?” she continued more softly.

“That will never happen, I will always want you,” he reassured her, his anger now simmered down in face of her tears. “I admit that I thought it was you who wanted to leave me because you regretted accepting my proposal.”

The waterbender again frowned at him as her hands clenched onto his dark shirt.
“I never wanted to leave you and I never said I didn’t want to marry you!” she told him with an exasperated sigh. “I was just so overwhelmed and I wanted time to adjust, but instead of trying to understand me, you got angry.”

“I… I thought you were having second thoughts about marrying me,” Zuko admitted with a guilty frown.

“I would’ve explained myself better if you would’ve stayed to listen to me and hadn’t ignored me,” she said with a soft sigh.

“You avoided me too,” he countered in a low tone.

Zuko stared into Katara’s hurt, blue eyes before she looked away in shame.

“You’re right,” she said sadly, “I’m sorry.”

He felt his stomach clench in guilt, she was also right. He had allowed his anger to control him and he had not stopped to listen to what she had to say.

“I’m sorry, Katara,” he apologized as his frown deepened, “I admit that I acted like a jealous and insensitive jerk, but you must understand that all of your doubts about us and your constant pushing me away was bound to make me angry.”

“Yeah…I guess I would’ve been angry too if our roles were reverse,” Katara admitted.

“I also ask that you be patient with me,” Zuko told her as he tightened his hold of her arms slightly before he cleared his throat as he continued, “This whole serious relationship thing is still new to me and I’ll probably continue to make many mistakes, especially with how impatient and temperamental I am. But I promise that I will try my best.”

“I understand and I promise that I’ll try my best to make this work, too,” Katara replied with a small smile before she grimaced, “I know that I have let my doubts control me, but I will try to work them out.”
The firebender relaxed and smiled at her before he furrowed his brow when she glanced down to his chest and took a deep breath.

“It’s just that…I’m scared,” she confessed quietly.

She did not want to seem weak or cowardly in front of Zuko, but she knew she needed to be honest in order for him to understand.

“Scared of what?” he asked her worriedly.

He again pulled her to him and tightened his hold on her, as if to protect her from whatever was distressing her. Perhaps she knew of the plot against him and was afraid that she would be hurt? No, that was not like Katara, and besides, he was going to make sure that nothing and nobody hurt her.

“I’m scared that I will not do a good job as your wife and Fire Lady,” Katara admitted as she continued to stare at his chest. “I’m scared that…you’d regret marrying me and end up resenting or even…h-hating me.”

Zuko pulled her slightly away to scowl down at her and Katara felt her cheeks warm up in shame.

“You silly woman,” he growled out frustratingly yet affectionately. “Do you really think I’d marry you only to regret it later?”

Katara lowered her head sheepishly as she muttered, “Uncle Iroh told me the same thing.”

“We both know how wise Uncle can be,” he told her.

He sighed deeply when she continued to avert her eyes and he reached up to cup her cheeks and lift her head so she could see him and he could gaze into her cobalt eyes.

“You’re not the only one who has fears. I also have fears and insecurities,” he admitted as his thumbs stroked her soft skin, “But I try not to let those fears stop me from getting what I want.”
“What kind of fears do you have?” she asked him incredulously.

The young Fire Lord hesitated for a moment for he disliked showing any kind of weakness, but he knew he could trust Katara, and he wanted her to understand what he was feeling.

“What if I can’t make you happy? What if I make a mistake and drive you away? What if you realize that you don’t love me? What if it’s you who regrets having me as your husband?” he said quietly.

Katara gasped at the uncertainty and fear she could see in his eyes and she felt her heart constrict. She never would have imagined that Zuko would have the same kinds of fears and doubts as she did. And the fact that he had admitted to them made things more painful, sadder, and caused her to want to love, protect, and comfort him even more.

“Never!” she exclaimed fiercely and she wrapped her arms tightly around him. “I will always love you and will always be happy at your side!”

Zuko felt his heart ease and then swell with happiness at her firm tone, and he buried his face in her hair, breathing in her sweet gardenia and rain scent. Gods, how he had missed her! He hoped he did not have to part from her for so long again. Granted, it had only been a few days, but still. He did not give a damn if it seemed like he was a sappy fool.

“Now you understand how I feel when you doubt me?” he whispered in her ear.

Katara’s eyes widened as his words sank in and she buried her face on his warm chest while she grabbed onto the back of his shirt.

“I’m sorry, Zuko. I’m sorry,” she said quietly.

Zuko rocked her gently in his arms as he shushed her softly.

“I don’t like for us to be fighting or to be angry with each other. There was plenty of that years ago,” he said dryly before he sighed. “I hate it when there is a distance between us,” he told her as he ran his fingers through her long hair, “Stop denying us, Katara.”
“I don’t want to,” she replied as she looked up at him with a frown, “But what if the Royal Court doesn’t allow you to marry me? Our countries were once enemies, after all.”

Zuko’s face darkened and he tightened his arms around her once again.

“They will regret it if they try to keep you from me,” he growled out in a low tone.

His expression softened as he pulled away slightly to look at her.

“I…You…” he began before he let out a frustrated sigh as he tried to put into word what he felt, “You mean so much to me, Katara, and I’m so happy being with you, but I hate it when you don’t trust me when I say that there’s nothing for you to worry about.”

“It’s not that I don’t trust you,” Katara told him with a frown, “but you can’t always get what you want, even if you are the Fire Lord.”

“I know, but I won’t let anyone stop me,” he answered with a growl before he added more softly, “Let’s forget the past and what people might say. Let’s focus on our future together.” He paused to smile at her.

Katara was silent a long moment as she stared into his unwavering, golden eyes. Could it really be that easy? Or maybe it won’t be, but would she let that stop her from achieving her happiness? But the most important question was if she would allow herself to be separated from Zuko because of the prejudices of other people.

And the obvious answer was a firm ‘no’.

Katara smiled as she rested her head on his chest with a soft sigh.

“You’re absolutely right,” she said softly, “What matters is that I love you and you love me.”

Pulling her back slightly to look at her, Zuko regarded her for a moment, his eyes searching hers.
“Katara, there is something else you need to know,” he began seriously as he continued to gaze at her. “There may or may not be another plot set against me.”

Katara gasped as she tightened her hold on him.

“What kind of plot? Is it against your…life?” she asked anxiously.

“I don’t know,” Zuko responded with a frown, “But I just want you to be aware that things will not always be peace and happiness, but I promise you that I will do everything in my power to keep you protected when you’re married to me. Are you…okay with this?”

“Of course!” Katara replied quickly as she stared determinedly into his golden eyes. “Something like that isn’t going to stop me from marrying you, quite the opposite, it makes me want to marry you even more in order to help you and keep you safe!”

She paused before she more softly added, “I won’t leave you to deal with this alone. I will stand beside you through the good times and bad.”

Zuko’s eyes softened and he smiled at her words.

“Then you’re still willing to marry me as soon as your father gives his consent?” he asked her slowly, carefully.

“Yes!” Katara assured him with a joyful smile. “I will have no more doubts and I won’t let my fears get the best of me again. I won’t allow anyone or anything to stop me from marrying you.”

Reaching her hands up to grabbed Zuko’s face, Katara pulled his head down and kissed him fiercely, licking and sucking on his lower lip and grasping his hair between her fingers, conveying all of her love, relief, and hope in the kiss.

Zuko groaned loudly against her mouth, at the way her small tongue caressed his lips and her hands played with the hair at his nape, and he pulled her even closer to him until she was flush against him. He felt his body immediately respond as it always did with her and he growled out when Katara began to rub her breasts against his hard chest. Agni, how he had missed her, his little water nymph. Grabbing her round bottom with both of his hands, he drew her toward him, and they both moaned at the delicious friction against their aching parts.
Katara gasped when Zuko suddenly lifted her into his arms and moved them toward her bed while he continued to devour her mouth. When he settled her on the soft mattress, Katara quickly tried to sit up, but Zuko placed a hand on her shoulder and gently pushed her back down as he hovered above her, nibbling on her lips.

“Zuko,” Katara panted against his mouth, planting her hands against his chest to push him away as a reflex, but her attempts were weak and halfhearted. After the nights he had snuck into her room to bring her pleasure she could no longer deny him. “Wait, Zuko…Oh!”

She moaned when he grabbed one of her breasts and gave it a gentle squeeze before he pinched her hardening nipple through her clothes.

“Let me touch you again, love,” Zuko murmured against her cheek as he grazed his nose against her soft skin, “I just want to make sure you are still here with me…make sure I won’t suddenly wake up finding you gone.”

“I won’t leave you,” she reassured him, her hands fisting in his black shirt.

She let out another gasp when he nipped at her throat and she automatically tilted her head to the side to give him more access while he trailed his hand slowly down her stomach.

“I-it’s just that I already broke so many rules and—”

A loud gasp cut off her words and she arched her back when Zuko gently pressed his hand against her aching warmth.

“I know that you like it when I touch you,” he whispered huskily against her mouth as his hand pressed against her more firmly before he moved it away to grab her hand, bringing it toward his covered erection and curling it until she was cupping him in her small hand. “And I also like it when you touch me,” he groaned against her lips before again taking possession of her mouth.

Katara felt her heart pound in her chest at the feeling of his clothed hardness in her hand, while she fought to stay coherent as Zuko kissed her so passionately. She clenched her eyes shut as she warred with herself for a moment as her previous nightmare resurfaced in her mind, at the cruel words that had been directed at her by her people—even if it had just been a dream. Should she again keep him at a distance or give in to what her body wanted—no, what her heart desired.
This was what her heart wanted, to be close to Zuko, to love him, to marry him, to be by his side forever. Even if she could not be a perfect Fire Lady, even if the Royal Court hated her, even if she had to leave what she knew behind, she would endure it all as long as Zuko loved her. And even though she could not completely gift Zuko with her body yet, she will give him what she could at this moment, make him forget his worries for at least a moment.

Breaking slightly away from the hot kiss, Katara cupped him more firmly in her hand, eliciting a surprised and pleased grunt from Zuko.

“Touch me, Zuko,” she whispered against his lips, her blue eyes bright as they stared into his blazing golden one, “Please, touch me.”

At her words and touch, he broke. Letting out a loud growl, he hungrily possessed her mouth, brushing his wet tongue against her full lower lip before sliding it inside her mouth to probe against her own questing tongue as he again brought his hand to rub against her covered, damp center, while she continued to give him gentle squeezes. They both let out moans as he lowered himself gently on top of her.

She needed more. She needed him to touch her, to show her how much he wanted, needed, and loved her. She wanted him to reassure her she belonged here with him, that no matter what, they will always be together and that he will never let her go. Filled with determination, Katara moved her hand away from the big bulge in his pants and shifted beneath him, spreading her legs a bit until he was cradled between her thighs. Her firebender gasped when she lifted one leg around his hip and brought him closer to her covered core as she took over their kiss and began to dominate his mouth, clenching his hair in her hands.

Groaning in pleasure at her fervent actions, like that of a swift and raging river, Zuko grasped her full breast more firmly in his hand, pinching the nipple between his fingers while his other hand trembled beside them as he held himself up so he would not crush her. He wanted to bare her wonderful breasts once again, feel her skin against his, and so, he quickly untied the sash around her waist and parted her dress. He heard her gasp just as he threw his own shirt somewhere behind him. Before Katara could try to stop him, he pulled at the end of her breasts bindings until the white wrappings were hanging loosely around her chest, before he impatiently grabbed them and let them fly over the bed as well, revealing her delectable mounds tipped with dusky nipples to his hungry gaze. Gods, the wonderful sight of Katara’s breasts was unbearably alluring. His already painful erection throbbed more insistently.

Blushing bashfully, his waterbender tried to cover herself, but he grabbed her hands and gently placed them beside her. With a groan he buried his face on the soft mounds as his hands reached up to squeezed them. He took in her sweet scent for a moment before he flicked his tongue out to slowly lick one of her hardening nipples. Katara gasped and threw her head back onto the pillow, her hands shooting up to grab his head so she could bring him closer to her aching breasts. Flicking at the hardened peak a few more times, Zuko then drew the delicious morsel into his hot mouth and swirled his tongue around it.

“Ah!” Katara gasped as her fingers tightened in his short hair.

Zuko sucked on her stiff peak fiercely before he let it go with a loud, wet ‘pop’. He leaned forward again to kiss her mouth ravenously.

“When we’re married, I’m going to make love to you so passionately that you won’t be able to live without my touch,” he whispered huskily against her mouth as he nibbled and sucked on her lips.

Katara groaned when she felt her aching core clench in need. As if reading her thoughts, Zuko smiled lustfully down at her.

“Do you want to feel me inside you, Katara?” he asked her throatily, eliciting a moan from the waterbender. “Do you desire to know what it feels like for me to push this…” he paused as he ground his cock tightly against her covered pussy, “inside your body?”

Katara moaned again at his words, her arousal spiking at the images he created in her head. She gasped as her hips arched when he rubbed more firmly against her womanhood.

“Does the thought make you wet?” he purred huskily as he licked her lower lip before he softly commanded, “Answer me, Katara.”

“Oh, gods, yes,” the waterbender moaned before she could stop herself.

“Yes, what, love?” he asked teasingly as he kissed her jaw.

Katara felt her cheeks heat up and she bit her lip. When Zuko stopped all his movements and looked down at her with a raised eyebrow, she groaned in frustration before she smiled at him bashfully.

“Yes…I want to feel you inside me,” she whispered breathlessly, “The thought makes me so wet.”
“Ah, Katara,” Zuko groaned deeply as he captured her mouth again in a fiery, passionate kiss before he again bent down to suckle at her other neglected nipple.

Zuko groaned as she cried out and her hips bucked beneath his. He wanted to strip all of her clothes from her so he could touch more of her skin, but the still functioning part of his brain advised him against it. He did not know if he would not end up taking her if he did.

With one last suck on Katara’s nipple, Zuko pulled away so he could kiss the panting waterbender’s lips, and they both hissed pleasurably when their naked chests touched. Twining their tongues together, Zuko pressed his aching cock against her covered sex more firmly, hissing when a shot of pleasure skittered along his spine, eliciting a soft mew from her, before he began to rock almost frantically against her.

The semi-dark room was filled with quiet sighs and loud groans, the only other sound was that of rustling fabric as they moved against each other. Katara closed her eyes, her heart racing wildly in her chest, as she threw her arms around her firebender’s bare back as that familiar feeling coiling in her lower stomach made itself known once more. She again wanted to feel that amazing, pleasurable release that she had only found with Zuko, she wanted to feel close to him, wanted to be reassured that she belonged with him.

“Zuko,” she panted against his lips.

Zuko pulled away from her mouth so they could gather some air and he buried his face against her neck as his movements became more agitated while his waterbender continued to gasp beneath him as she strained her hips against him. He mentally cursed the clothes that impeded him from being where he wanted to bury himself so badly, but he knew that that time would come soon.

He was going to be her first and that thought made him groan with pride and pleasure. He would be the one to explore, touch, and taste every inch, every part of her. He would be the only man to learn the secrets of Katara’s beautiful body, and no one else would ever be able to make her feel the things he could.

Zuko closed his eyes tightly, imagining how Katara’s entire naked body would feel against his, how her hands would clutch his shoulders and her legs would wrap tightly around him when he finally made love to her. He imagined how he would hold her gaze, his hands cradling her hips, as he slid himself inside her, taking her, making her his, loving her and feeling her warmth surrounding him, taking him inside her to make him hers, their names on their lips as they reached that glorious state of ecstasy. With his body, he would make her understand what he felt in his heart, show her how much she meant to him, and it would be incredible.
Grinding himself more firmly against her, Zuko angled his hips so that the ridge of his shaft kept striking against her sensitive bud and he growled when she began wailing his name and undulating desperately beneath him.

“So close, Zuko, so close,” she chanted desperately as she clawed at his back. “Please!”

Growling her name, Zuko again captured her mouth and kissed her with so much passion and longing that it caused the coil to snap within the waterbender. Zuko heard Katara cry out, felt her body tense with her release, and he let himself go with a low growl. Heaving, he twisted his body off her before he collapsed atop her, and brought her with him until they were both lying on their sides, panting and trembling against each other, relishing in the feeling of their release and of being close.

It was a few minutes later when they finally opened their eyes to look at each other. Katara blushed and averted her eyes bashfully as she gathered her dress closed before returning to gaze back at him. The words from her nightmare evaporated from her mind as she stared into his warm eyes.

Was it so wrong to desire the man she loved? It couldn’t be.

Tucking a strand of hair behind her ear, Zuko gave her a small smile before he caressed her flushed cheek with his fingers.

“Promise me you won’t push me away again, Katara,” he told her softly yet firmly, “I won’t tolerate it.”

“I promise,” Katara responded quietly as she stared into his eyes, “I promise I’ll try not to let fear control me again. I promise to fight for us, for what we feel for each other.”

“That is all I ask,” he said as he continued to touch her skin before he lifted his head to kiss her lips as he stared intensely into her blue orbs. “I won’t let you go. Your heart belongs to me.”

“You sound so sure of yourself,” Katara teased as she smiled against his lips.

Zuko pulled away and cocked a brow.
“I don’t hear you denying it.”

“You arrogant jerk,” she muttered.

Chuckling quietly, Zuko pulled her to him so her head was resting on his shoulder. Katara brought one arm around him and snuggled closer to him.

“But you’re my arrogant jerk,” she confirmed teasingly.

“And you’re my infuriating and beautiful woman,” he responded seriously.

He chuckled a bit more loudly when she smacked his chest. Gently bringing her head down on his shoulder again, he sighed contentedly. All the anger, fear, and hurt he had been feeling for the past few days vanished to be replaced with relief and anticipation.

“I’m sorry for the way I was acting,” he heard her whisper against his neck.

“It’s okay,” he told her gently as he ran a hand up and down her back, “And I’m sorry for not being more understanding about your feelings. But you don’t have to worry if you make a mistake as Fire Lady, I will always be there to help you. You won’t be alone since you also have my mother, Uncle Iroh, and even Jiao to help you.”

“You’re right,” Katara replied softly as she rested contentedly against his warm side.

“If…if I was not so desperate to marry you and keep you safe, I would have agreed for us to slow things down,” Zuko told her quietly before he paused and moved a bit away so he could look at her. “Maybe you should add selfish bastard to your list,” he said with a frown.

Katara reached a hand up to smooth his brow before she cupped his cheek.

“No,” she said softly and she smiled at him, “Now that I have decided to place my doubts and fears aside, I’m as desperate for us to marry as you are.”
“Good,” Zuko stated as he returned her smile, leaning into her hand, “Just remember that we belong to each other and no one will separate us.”

The smile faded a little from her face and Katara bit her lip.

“I just hope no one tries to separate us,” she said quietly.

“They won’t. I will not let them,” Zuko growled out reassuringly as he wrapped his arm protectively around her.

With a soft sigh she clung to him, wrapping her arms tightly around him, burying her face in his neck. She felt him curl around her body, enveloping her in his strength, his firm, larger body warming her, reassuring her just like his confident words did.

“I love you so much, Zuko,” she told him fervently, “So much.”

“And I love you, Katara,” he whispered against her hair, unable to contain himself from saying it again.

He sighed softly against her. Now he understood that it was he who needed to say it and not so much for her to hear it—which, of course, she did, especially at the moment—but it was more to release the burden of emotions that this beautiful woman made him feel that he sometimes found difficult to understand and express. All these strange sensations he experienced only in her arms, only with his waterbender.

Tightening his hold on Katara, he brought her closer to him, so close they could feel each other’s steady heartbeats against their chests.

“More than I ever thought possible,” he continued in the same quiet tone.

Three days passed since they settled their misunderstanding and worked at reassuring each other. They still had arguments about one thing or another, but they tried to find a way to work it out—which admittedly was a difficult task since both had hot and stubborn tempers.
Whenever Zuko did not have meetings or was surrounded by eager noblewomen and greedy noblemen, he would spend his time with Katara whenever she did not have lessons with Madam Fang Hua. They would either spar together or Katara would watch Zuko practice his white fire, or they would go out into the city and walk around. The people speculated about their relationship, but Katara tried not to let it bother her for she knew Zuko and she were not doing anything wrong.

They already had to deal with some disapproval from the noblemen about their close relationship, but without any evidence to outright call them out on it, the Royal Court was left to seethe in frustration and suspicion. They tried to command the Fire Lord to tell them who was the woman he had chosen to marry, but the young lord continued to avoid answering their questions. Katara worried that they might force Zuko to pick a woman from his court, but Zuko reassured her that they could try but it wouldn’t work.

Katara went into her lessons with such renewed determination that it surprised and pleased Madam Fang Hua so much she would not stop singing her praises to the Fire Lord whenever he would stop by to check on his betrothed’s progress—much to Zuko’s amusement and Katara’s embarrassment.

Although they had not heard any news about an attack on the Fire Lord, or who the traitor was or where the rebels were, the young couple tried to continue with their lives. They would spend their time in the private garden when they were alone, either in comfortable silence or in conversations that would lead to light sparring matches or hot make out sessions. Ever since they had reassured themselves in a most pleasant way that night, Zuko could hardly keep his hands off Katara that she had a hard time convincing him to stop before somebody caught them, reassuring him that he will have all of her once they married. Of course that did not stop him from sneaking into her room late at night so they could indulge in each other. They were both anxious for the arrival of Katara’s family and they worried about Aang’s reaction once he was told.

Glancing at the sun moving toward the western horizon, Zuko looked away to stare impatiently at the palace entrance. He, along with his uncle, Admiral Jee, and his two personal guards were waiting silently for Katara and his mother to show up so they could head into the capital. Zuko wanted to take Katara to dinner at the restaurant he had taken her to the previous summer and he decided to invite his family since he felt a bit guilty for neglecting them.

“Why do women take so long to get ready?” Zuko grumbled as he crossed his arms over his armored chest in annoyance.

“It is one of the many mysteries of the fairer sex,” Iroh commented with a wistful sigh.

Zuko resisted the urge to roll his eyes while Jee, Shen, and Kuo tried to hide their grins. Tuning out his uncle and Jee, Zuko’s mind wandered to the nightmare he had the previous night…

He smiled at Katara as he took hold of her hands. They were standing before the Great Fire Sage as he and Katara waited to take their vows of marriage while all their love ones watched.

“Do you take Fire Lord Zuko as your husband?” the fire sage asked the waterbender.

Zuko watched in anticipation as she opened her mouth to respond.

“Katara!”

Zuko stiffened at the shout and he watched as Katara quickly looked away from him to smile in the direction the voice had come from.

“Aang!” she called out happily.

Head snapping to the side, Zuko narrowed his eyes on the airbender as he stood before the murmuring crowd with an outstretched arm as his gray eyes held those of the waterbender.

“Don’t marry him, Katara,” the Avatar said softly, “Come with me.”

Katara pulled her hands away from his as she tried to turn away, but Zuko grasped her arm and pulled her to him.

“Let me go!” she screamed.

“No,” Zuko growled, “You belong with me! You said you were never going to leave me!”

“That was because I thought I loved you!” she shouted.

“W-what?” Zuko asked in a strained voice.
“I can’t marry you,” she told him in an irritated tone, “I don’t love you. I love Aang.”

“No,” Zuko muttered as he shook his head, her words piercing right through his heart, “No. You love me.”

She again pulled away from him with an angry scowl.

“The one I love is Aang,” she repeated.

Zuko felt his body go numb at her words and he watched with a constricting heart as she stepped away from him and ran to Aang. She threw herself at the airbender, who caught her with a happy laugh. Before Zuko could do anything to bring Katara back to him, they disappeared, leaving Zuko standing alone in shock and pain...

Shaking his head to get rid of the dream, Zuko clenched his hands as he tried to calm his anger and bring his fear down.

Katara loves me, he reassured himself, She would never betray me with Aang. She would never leave me.

He again shook his head and instead focused his thoughts on the two engagement trinkets he had ordered for Katara and were now safely stored in his room. One was a tradition from his nation and the other was a tradition from Katara’s, and he wondered about the best way for him to present them to her once he finally had Hakoda’s consent. He was still learning about being romantic and he was afraid he would do something wrong and end up embarrassing himself. He now had a feeling what Sokka must have gone through when he had thought of proposing to Suki.

The young lord was brought out of his thoughts when he saw the men straighten and he looked at the doors where the two women finally appeared, chatting animatedly with each other and unaware of the men waiting on them. Zuko felt his mouth go dry at the sight of Katara clothed in a simple yet elegant dark blue qipao edged in silver thread that seemed to hug her every curve. Her hair was pinned elegantly up on her head by the rose hairpin he had gifted her with and a few wisps of her chocolate hair curled around her cheeks. He thought the wait was so worth it.

Finally wrenching his eyes away from Katara’s lovely form, Zuko cleared his throat to get their attention as well as to clear the lump that had gotten stuck there.
“If we don’t hurry, the restaurant is going to close by the time we get there,” he said dryly.

“No it won’t,” Katara piped in cheerfully. “They know the Fire Lord’s arriving with his family. They’d probably have it open all night until you finally appear.”

“Hm, they probably would,” Zuko mused with a frown, causing the Water Tribe maiden to giggle.

With an impassive face, Zuko extended his arm toward Katara, who eagerly grasped it and allowed him to lead her down the stairs and to the carriage waiting for them.

Glancing over her shoulder, Katara watched curiously as Jee bowed to Ursa before offering his own arm to help her descend the long flight of stairs. The golden-eyed woman blushed lightly before she smiled at the admiral as she grasped his arm. Jee averted his eyes and his face became blank as he stepped onto the stairs. Katara watched as Lady Ursa frowned slightly at his behavior before the waterbender was distracted when she almost stumbled on a step and Zuko tightened his hold of her hand. She righted herself before anybody could have noticed, but she saw Zuko’s lips quirk when she glanced his way. She scowled at him and his lips twitched again.

Soon they were on a carriage surrounded by guards on komodo rhinos, and headed out of the palace grounds. The Fire Nation citizens talked excitedly as they spotted the royal carriage passing them by. A few minutes later, they finally stopped before the large building and entered the busy restaurant. Once again, Zuko was greeted exuberantly by the short restaurant owner who greeted Katara just as enthusiastically once he saw her among the royal family.

As they ate the delicious food, reminiscing about the last time they had been there, Katara continued to watch the odd behavior of the admiral as he sat stiffly beside Ursa, who kept frowning his way whenever Iroh was not distracting her. Since Jee spent all his time guarding her, Ursa decided to treat him as a friend more than her guardian so it was now normal to see the admiral eating with the family. Jee had tried to protest at first, but Zuko had agreed with his mother since he still felt a little guilty that Jee had to leave his post on the flagship to watch over Ursa. Katara looked away from Ursa and Jee to glance at Zuko and finally noticed the smoldering looks he kept aiming her way and she blushed.

She felt as if her blood was melting in her veins when she would catch his eye, feel she needed air when he would not so accidentally touch her, feel her heart pound when he would lean toward her to whisper something in her ear as a pretense because of the loud din of the restaurant.
It was hard to relax, much less concentrate on what Iroh or Ursa were saying, with her firebender’s vivid golden gaze looking at her with an intensity to which she was still getting used to. And as if that was not enough, she held no power over her own traitorous gaze, as time and again she found herself staring at him before she caught herself and looked away. She could feel his appraisal, the weight and heat of it, as pleasantly as if he were trailing his fingers over her skin.

So it was to her relief when they finally finished their meal and headed out of the restaurant with the short owner thanking them profusely for their patronage again and again.

Katara again took notice of Admiral Jee’s distant behavior as he gently handed Lady Ursa into the carriage before he quickly turned away to mount his komodo rhino and wait for his lord’s signal for them to make their way back to the palace. The waterbender looked at Zuko to see his reaction, but it seemed as if he had not notice anything different as he grasped her elbow to help her.

Zuko was about to hand Katara into the carriage when one of his guards quickly approached them down the street on a komodo rhino. Feeling himself stiffen, Zuko tried to relax when Katara turned a worried look on him. Releasing her hand, the young lord straightened as he waited for the soldier to dismount once he reached them.

“My lord,” the young guard greeted breathlessly as he bowed, “A Water Tribe vessel has been spotted heading toward the docks.”

Hearing Katara gasp, Zuko turned to look at her and he smiled when she gave him a joyful smile.

“It’s my family!” she exclaimed assuredly.

Zuko turned to the guard and ordered him to have the servants prepare rooms for the guests and more carriages brought to the docks. Once the guard bowed and rode away, the young lord turned back to Katara with an expression full of anticipation.

“How about we head to the docks and greet them?” he asked coolly and smiled when Katara enthusiastically told him to hurry up and get in the carriage.

Katara watched excitedly as the Southern Water Tribe vessel docked and she had to stop herself from jumping up and down in happiness as she spotted her family waving from the deck of the graceful ship. Standing silently beside her, with his mother and uncle beside him and Jee and his personal guards behind them, Zuko had to swallow down his anxiety as the ramp was lowered and Katara’s family quickly stepped down.

“Katara!” they heard Sokka cry out as he handed Jing to Suki and raced toward his sister.

“Sokka!” Katara shouted happily as she moved away from Zuko’s side and ran toward her brother who caught her up in a bear hug before their father stepped in to embrace her just as tightly.

“Katara, I’m so relieved to see you’re all right,” Hakoda exclaimed with a catch to his voice as he cupped his daughter’s cheeks, “I was afraid I had lost you as well.”

“I’m sorry to have worried you all,” Katara told softly as she squeezed her father’s hands, knowing he was referring to her mother. She hugged him again before she moved next to embrace Kanna who was too relieved to talk at the moment. “But I am fine.”

Zuko and his small family watched quietly off to the side as Katara was next surrounded by Pakku and then Suki holding the twins, who giggled and babbled at their aunt as if asking where she had been all this time. Zuko waited patiently as the Water Tribe family had their moment and he felt himself smile at the happiness that surrounded his beloved.

As if finally remembering they were not alone, Katara pulled away from them to motion for Zuko and his family to approach them. Zuko hesitated for a moment, but when Katara smiled at him reassuringly, he composed himself and strode regally toward them until he was standing beside her.

“Chief Hakoda, Master Pakku, Lady Kanna, I welcome you again to the Fire Nation,” he said as he gave them a respectful bow which they returned with a happy greeting.

Turning to give Sokka and Suki a small smile, he said, “I’m glad to see you again.”

“Thanks, man,” Sokka said with a grin as he again grabbed his oldest daughter from his wife’s arms. “I’m glad to see you’re okay, too.”

Then it was Iroh and Ursa’s turn to greet them and express their pleasure at their arrival, although only Zuko and Katara knew the real reason was because now Zuko could have a talk with her father.
“I’m very glad to see Katara is well,” Hakoda said with a smile.

“It’s all thanks to Zuko that I’m still alive,” Katara spoke up softly as she looked up to smile at her firebender.

“Thank you, for keeping my daughter safe,” Hakoda said sincerely as he gave Zuko another bow, “I will be forever grateful to you.” He straightened and frowned. “But I would like to know what was really going on during your disappearance. Are the rumors true about your capture?”

Zuko cleared his throat before he gestured toward the awaiting carriages.

“We will discuss everything in the palace,” he said grimly.

Hakoda frowned deeply but gave a nod of acknowledgment. The others quickly agreed and they followed behind the Fire Lord as he led them toward the carriages while the guards rushed to secure the guests’ belongings to another carriage.

Without thinking about his actions, Zuko reached out to help Katara into the carriage. Katara was so distracted by having Zuko’s hand grabbing hers that she stepped incorrectly on the small step and stumbled forward. Zuko immediately caught her before she smashed her face against the floor of the carriage, and without thinking about it, he brought her close to his chest.

“Are you all right?” he asked her worriedly as he cupped her cheek.

“I-I’m fine,” Katara stammered as she felt her face flush in embarrassment. “Thanks.”

Zuko smiled at her before he froze when he heard Iroh clear his throat. Settling Katara on her feet, Zuko released his hold on her before he turned to look stoically at the tribesmen who were scowling at him.

“Hakoda, Sokka, don’t just stand there and get inside,” Kanna chided from the window of the carriage the women were sharing. She looked at Zuko and winked.

Zuko looked at the old woman in bewilderment just as Hakoda and Sokka scowled at her and moved toward the carriage the men were going to share toward the Fire Nation Palace, but not before aiming a suspicious look at the young lord.

Zuko groaned inwardly. Things were not looking good.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

They all descended from the carriages once they arrived in the courtyard and climbed the long flight of stairs just as more servants appeared to retrieve their belongings. Zuko automatically placed his hand on the small of Katara’s back to guide her into the large sitting room before he could stop himself. He stiffened when this time he heard Hakoda clear his throat and he immediately moved his hand away from Katara when he saw her father and brother narrowing their eyes on him.

“I think we should talk now,” Hakoda gruffly told Zuko as he took a step closer to his daughter.

Zuko nodded as he led the way in silence. As soon as they arrived in the sitting room where the large low table was surrounded by couches and plush cushions, Ursa immediately asked a servant to bring the guests refreshments as they all entered the room.

As her family moved to sit, Katara leaned toward Zuko and whispered, “Please try to be more discreet with your affections.”

“You’re the one who makes it so hard,” he replied back with a low grunt.

Katara did not have a chance to reply for her father was calling for her to sit between him and Sokka on one of the couches. Katara gave Zuko another reassuring smile as she moved to sit between her overprotective male relatives, who were again eyeing Zuko suspiciously.

Zuko exhaled deeply and prepared himself for the next few hours. Just as he was about to move toward one of the elegant chairs, a commotion from outside caught their attention. Jiao appeared a few minutes later and gave a low bow.

“My lord,” the maidservant said, “Avatar Aang and Lady Bei Fong have just arrived.”

Both Zuko and Katara stiffened and their eyes quickly darted toward each other. Katara gave him a nervous smile and Zuko’s face smoothed into an unreadable mask as he clenched his hands beside him. He had hoped to have talked to Hakoda about marrying Katara first before they had to deal with Aang.
“Have them meet us here, Jiao,” he said impassively as he straightened himself.

He was silent as his mother and uncle made small talk with Katara’s family while they waited for Aang and Toph to show up. He glanced at Katara and frowned slightly when he noticed her nervous fidgeting before he gave her a smile when she looked at him. It was a few minutes later when they heard Toph’s sarcastic remarks as she complained to Jiao about having to ride on Appa for days before her slight figure appeared at the entrance.

Toph paused before the group and crossed her arms as she raised a dark eyebrow while her lips curled into a wry smirk.

“What’s this? A party and I wasn’t invited?” she said, “That’s messed up.”

“Toph!” Katara exclaimed as she jumped from the couch to hug the short earthbender, “I’m so glad to see you.”

“Yeah, yeah,” Toph sniffed as she allowed the waterbender to hug her for a moment before she pushed her away. “Sweetness and Sparky, scare me like that again, and I’ll kick both your asses,” she grumbled sardonically. It was her own way of saying she had been worried about them.

“Rude as ever, I see,” Zuko commented coolly before he smirked when Toph turned to scowl at him, “But we missed you, too.”

“Whatever,” Toph muttered as she again crossed her arms over her chest.

“Where’s Aang?” Sokka spoke up as he tried to move his head away from his youngest daughter who was trying to pull at the bead on the short beard on his chin.

“Eh, getting Appa settled,” the blind earthbender responded with a shrug.

Just then, the mentioned airbender appeared hurriedly at the entrance with Momo flying behind him. Aang’s gray eyes were bright and expectant as he looked around the room before a huge smile broke on his face as they settled on Katara.
“Katara!” he cried out happily, and before anyone could react, he rushed forward as if he were the wind itself, pulled the waterbender to him, and kissed her.

Suddenly the candles and torches placed around the room flared dangerously high and the others gasped in surprise. Katara quickly pushed Aang away from her, wiping her mouth on the back of her hand, and turned wide eyes on Zuko, who had a thunderous expression on his face as he shot flaming daggers at Aang with his eyes. Without saying a word, the Fire Lord turned around and stormed out of the sitting room, the flames settling back to their normal state once he left.

“What was that?” Suki asked with wide eyes.

Ursa and Iroh looked at each other and grimaced, while Kanna shook her head and sighed just as Hakoda stared with a frown at the spot where the Fire Lord had last been. Katara took a step to follow after Zuko, but she paused when she felt a hand gently grasp her arm.

‘I have come back for you, Katara.’

She gulped as the nightmare resurfaced in her head before she looked over her shoulder at Aang, who was smiling at her.

“I’m so glad that you’re okay, Katara,” Aang told her sincerely, “I’ve been so worried. I missed you so much.”

He leaned down to kiss her again—much to Hakoda’s displeasure—but Katara quickly pulled her arm away from his grasp and stepped away from him with narrowed eyes.

“You can’t go around kissing me whenever you feel like it, Aang,” she told him firmly.

Aang stiffened as he gave her a hurt look.

“What’s going on?” Sokka asked as he looked between his sister and his friend.
Katara glanced away from Aang and looked at her family, who were frowning, before she straightened herself.

“I broke up with Aang before I left for the colony,” she said softly.

They looked at Katara in shock before they glanced at Aang—who had his head bowed—with sympathy.

Hakoda cleared his throat after a long moment of uncomfortable silence.

“Well, uh—”

“I’ll be right back!” Katara interrupted her father as she made her way toward the corridor, “I need to find Zuko so we can finish telling you all what has been going on.”

Before they could say anything else, she stepped into the corridor, missing the longing look Aang aimed her way. She spotted Jee, Shen, and Kuo looking down the corridor in bewilderment and hurriedly made her way toward them.

“Did Fire Lord Zuko go that way?” she asked even though she already knew the answer.

When they nodded at her, she quickly raced down the hall until she turned the corner. She did not spot him, so she continued until she came to another empty corridor. She saw another puzzled servant and quickly asked which way Zuko had gone. The servant immediately told her that it seemed the Fire Lord was heading to his study. Katara thanked him before she hurried in the direction of Zuko’s study, all the way cursing the tight dress Jiao had insisted she wore for their outing. She hoped Zuko was not angry with her, for after all, it wasn’t as if she wanted Aang to kiss her. She had not been expecting it.

‘Why did you betray me?’

She harshly shook the memory of her nightmare away.

Finally she arrived at the Fire Lord’s study and quickly knocked on the door as she softly called out his name. When she heard Zuko grunt out a gruff ‘enter’, Katara opened the door.

Just as she took a step inside, she was pulled forward and the door was firmly closed behind her before she was pushed with her back against it as Zuko pressed himself against her front. Her gasp was cut short as Zuko’s mouth crashed onto hers, and she only had a second to realize he had taken off his armor and was only wearing the tunic underneath, before her thoughts scattered. He kissed her roughly and possessively, as if he were trying to wipe all traces of Aang away and only leave his taste in her mouth and only his touch on her body as his hands roamed just as roughly over her curves.

When he pulled away from her mouth, Katara opened her eyes and she swallowed when she saw the rage in his amber orbs. He eclipsed her completely, standing tall, a daunting shadow of masculine superiority. But despite his great strength, his explosive temper, his many years training for violence, his jealousy and possessiveness, never did he make her feel other than safe, protected, and loved.

“Watching another man kiss you made me see red,” he growled out against her lips, his harsh breathing coasting against the sensitive skin of her face. “It was all I could do not to throw Aang away from you and smash my fist in his face.”

“I don’t know why he did it,” Katara said quietly as she looked him straight in the eye in order for him to see she was being truthful, “but I told him that he can’t be kissing me anymore since I already broke up with him.”

“It’s obvious that he still wants you,” Zuko growled out. “He still hopes that you will take him back.”

“You know I won’t,” she told him.

She frowned when he did not immediately agree. She shifted slightly since he was still pinning her to the door, but he did not budge, instead, he pressed himself even closer to her so that her breasts were smashed against his hard chest. She felt her entire body flush just like she knew her cheeks were.

“Only I can kiss you, you hear me?” he growled out in a low tone as he rubbed his lips against hers. “Only I can touch you,” he continued fervently as his hands again roamed over her, squeezing her breasts, caressing her sides, grasping her hips, touching her thighs. “You’re mine!”

Again, he captured her mouth in a possessive kiss that had Katara’s head spinning and her knees
This kiss was fire—a sweet, fierce fire that she had no desire to extinguish. His lips molded over hers, claiming them entirely, giving heat, fire, and passion and demanding it in return just like his element. She moaned when he pulled her closer against him and her heart raced in her chest. He asked no permission as he swiftly parted her lips and slipped his tongue into her mouth, leaving nothing untouched, not even her soul. The excitement she always felt when he was near rose quickly within her, causing her heart to pound and her body to tremble. He continued to kiss her, unrelentingly and greedily, his tongue engaged ardently with hers, his lips demanding, his body so close, so firm and tight.

Maybe she should have been angry at the possessive way he was kissing her, but the truth was that she reveled in it, in the knowledge that he did not want anyone else to have her but him because she felt the same way toward him. She did not want to share him.

It seemed like hours, though it was just minutes, when he finally broke the kiss, but only enough to lift his lips from hers. The warmth of his breath, the rise of his chest, the heat of his eyes, evoked an even deeper quavering within her as his growled whisper caressed her ears.

“You’re mine and no one else’s,” he repeated fiercely.

“Yes,” she told him softly, sincerely, hoping to calm him down. She moved her hands that had been holding tightly onto his back and reached up, pulling his head down until his forehead met hers. “Only yours.”

Zuko closed his eyes and exhaled deeply as his tensed body relaxed slightly and his heart eased at her words. When he saw Aang kiss her, it reminded him of the nightmare he had. He had felt such immense anger mixed with pain that he had no alternative but to leave before he did something he would later regret—like break Aang’s neck. Katara was his and he would kill anyone who tried to so much as to touch a hair on her head. However, there was a small part of him that had feared that Katara would somehow realize she loved Aang and not him, that she belonged with the airbender. He was afraid that she would leave him for Aang.

He opened his eyes when he felt Katara touch his cheeks, her fingers leaving trails of heat in her wake, before she traced the contours of each of his ears. As she touched the burned shell of his left ear, he almost pulled away, but he ordered himself to remain still for he knew that she did not find his disfigurement revolting at all. He felt her press her lips softly against his forehead, then against each eyelid, placing a lingering kiss on his scarred eyelid, a kiss as light as a fluttering feather, and he knew that she was trying to reassure him and calm him down. Then her mouth was on his, brushing his lips so gently he thought he might have imagined it if it weren’t for her sweet breath. She pulled away slightly, and when she kissed him again, he moved to capture her mouth, shaping his lips to hers. His tongue probed her lips beseechingly this time, and as she quickly parted them, he felt the rush of her breath and tasted her against his tongue.
When she opened her mouth to him so trustingly and without reserve, something inside him snapped at the surge of need that burst to life within him. Need for her, hot and fierce, made itself known again in his loins, but at the moment there was a greater need to place a claim on her for everyone to see that she was his. He wanted to hold her, touch her, and explore every inch of her luscious body and brand it with his hands, with his tongue, with his body for all time. But he knew that he could not until she was married to him. Yet a primal part of him told him that there was another way.

He cradled her head between his hands, his fingers burying in her hair, as he deepened their kiss, possessing her mouth. He wedged a thigh between her legs and the hem of her qipao rode high on her thighs as he pressed against her. He ached to feel more of her skin, and so, his fingers worked quickly to unfasten the ties that held her dress closed until the top half of her dress parted open. He broke their kiss as he looked at her covered breasts with a hungry gleam in his eye. Katara tried to cover herself again, but he grabbed her hands and pinned them over her head just as his head leaned down and his mouth took one of the hardening nipples through the cloth of her bindings. He could feel his shaft hardening even further as desire exploded within him.

“Oh!” Katara gasped and her back arched, instinctively pushing her chest out to get closer to his mouth only to groan in disappointment when Zuko pulled away to stare into her eyes.

“Your body will only be seen and touched by me,” he growled out as he reached down a hand to slip it beneath the hem of her dress to cup her covered heat while he grasped both her wrists with the other.

Katara let out another moan before she gasped when he pressed his thumb on the little sensitive bud through her clothes, sending a tingle to shoot to all of her nerve endings. She whimpered and rocked her hips when he pressed firm circles on her clit. She could feel a rush of her arousal seep out of her, drenching her under-wrappings.

“I’m a very possessive man, Katara, and I will also not share what belongs to me,” he continued huskily, repeating the exact sentiment she had told him after her fight with Mai.

He moved his hand away and Katara moaned in disappointment before gasping when he scooped her up a little against the door so he could wedge his hips between her thighs and press his erection against her sex.

“Ohhhh, mmm,” she mewled when he began to move his hips in a slow grind.
Zuko reached up to grab her breast, pinching the nipple between his fingers, causing her to moan and buck against him. Nudging her with his nose, Zuko made her tilt her head to the side and he brushed his mouth against her throat, pressing hungry kisses. He stuck out his tongue, tasted the skin of her neck, felt the pulsing vein of her life force flutter against his lips as he lapped at her throat while his hand continued to knead her concealed breast and his hips rocked against hers. With that urgent need driving him more insistently, Zuko opened his mouth and latched onto the place where her neck met her shoulder, biting her skin gently and then sucking on it almost desperately. Katara gasped at the sensation and tilted her head further aside to give him more access, causing Zuko to groan appreciatively as he ground his erection even more tightly against her warmth.

But as much as he wanted to continue where they were going, he knew they needed to stop unless they wanted someone from her family—mainly her father or brother—to walk in on them, thus ruining Zuko’s chance of winning Hakoda’s approval. With one last gentle lick of her skin to soothe the sting, Zuko moved his mouth away and buried his face in her neck as he tried to somehow rein in his need and will his arousal away.

Katara wound her arms around him, as if understanding what he was going through, and held him tightly against her. He felt the difference of her soft body and gentle hands compared to his hard frame and the slightly rough way he had touched her before. Her heart beat rapidly yet smoothly against his chest as she ran her hands gently down his back. With each breath he felt her bound breasts press against him and he closed his eyes. Gradually her warmth seeped into him like sunlight, relaxing him until he no longer felt that wild possessiveness within him.

“You’re mine just like I’m yours and we belong together…for eternity,” he finally spoke up in a firm tone.

“For eternity,” Katara agreed softly.

Zuko moved away from her neck and lifted his head to look at her. She had a gentle smile on her lips and he felt his heart clench at the almost brutal way he had handled her, even though he knew she would have frozen him to the wall if she had truly been outraged at his behavior. Leaning down toward her face, Zuko caressed her lips with his.

“Do you love me?” he whispered against her lips.

“More than anything,” she replied truthfully before she just as softly asked, “Do you love me?”

“More than my own life,” he stated.
Katara smiled before she pressed her lips gently against his. Despite his stoic and impassive tone, and despite not voicing it out loud, she knew that he feared she might leave him for Aang.

“You don’t need to worry, Zuko,” she told him tenderly, “I will never leave you. No man is going to take me away from you. My heart only belongs to you.”

Zuko groaned softly as he again captured her mouth in a searing kiss, wrapping his arms around her and drawing her tightly close to him. He felt his fear lessen at her sincere words.

“You buried yourself in my soul and I will never let you go, ever,” he growled out fiercely.

He kissed her once, twice, three more times before he finally settled her back on her feet and stepped slightly away from her. Katara blushed deeply when the air of the room brushed against her chest and she quickly closed the top half of her qipao and began to fasten the ties while avoiding looking at Zuko. She cleared her throat.

“My family must be wondering what’s taking us so long,” she mumbled.

“I’ll think of something to tell them,” he said distractedly as he watched her.

He was a bit disappointed to see her semi-uncovered top disappear, but he knew they had to hurry and go to the others if they wanted to avoid any problems. His eyes moved away from Katara’s covered chest and drifted to the spot where he had marked her, where a love bite now decorated her skin, thanks to him. Though he knew nobody would be able to see his mark, it pleased him greatly to know it was there and that it was he who had done it.

Animalistic and savage? Perhaps…

Chauvinistic? Maybe…

Possessive? Definitely.
He reached out a hand and gently touched the red spot with his finger, causing her to slightly flinch. She smiled at him when he frowned. He leaned his head down and pressed a tender kiss to the mark before he leaned back and straightened her clothes around her. She tightened the sash around her waist and he fixed the collar at her throat while she fixed her hair until she looked as presentable as she was before he had pulled her into his study.

“Alright, let’s go back,” he said impassively once his erection had finally gone away, but not before he pressed his lips against her forehead and then her lips.

“I think you should talk to my father about us until tomorrow when he’s more rested and less anxious. Especially after we tell him about Jianguo and the traitor’s plans,” she told him as she smoothed the tunic over his chest.

Zuko was a silent for a moment before he gave a brief nod.

“That would probably be best.”

They lingered for a moment, staring at each other silently, both hoping everything came out well, before they finally stepped out of the study and headed back to where the others were. Zuko nodded and Katara smiled when they passed Kuo, Shen, and Jee, who bowed their heads to hide their curious expressions.

“There you are,” Ursa exclaimed with a smile as her son and the Water Tribe maiden finally appeared, “We were wondering what was taking you so long.”

“Is everything all right?” Hakoda asked with a frown as he stared between his daughter and the young Fire Lord.

“I apologize for leaving so abruptly,” Zuko spoke up coolly as he went to sit on one of the plush chairs placed at the head of the table.

Instead of sitting between her father and her brother again, Katara sat on the other chair next to him.

“A problem came up that I had to see to,” Zuko continued.
“I hope you were able to solve your problem,” Kanna spoke up as she glanced at her granddaughter, who tried not to blush as she smiled at everyone innocently.

“I did,” Zuko spoke up cryptically as he glanced at Katara beside him before he looked at Aang who was sitting silently on one of the cushions beside Toph, “I just hope I will not have to deal with it again in the future.”

His hands clenched as he watched Aang throwing sad yet hopeful looks at Katara before he told himself to relax.

“Alright, well, now that we’re all here, can you tell us what is going on?” Hakoda spoke up again as he reached inside his tunic to pull out all the missives he had received for the past month. “General Iroh wrote that both of you fell overboard during a storm and could not be found, and then we’re told that you might have been captured, but everyone is saying that you have been stranded on an island all this time. What is the truth?”

Katara and Zuko glanced at each other briefly before they returned their gazes to the frowning chief.

“We were captured,” Zuko affirmed grimly.

“What?” everybody cried out in shock.

“How?!” Aang asked as he gripped his staff.

“Why?!” Sokka shouted.

“How dare they!” Pakku exclaimed.

“Who captured you?!?” Hakoda demanded angrily.

“When Zuko swam us to shore we decided to wait until Uncle Iroh found us, but…” Katara trailed off as she looked down at her clenched hands, “I was impatient to go to the colony and I ventured into the forest, even though Zuko tried to reason with me that it was a bad idea. That’s when I came upon three men. They attacked me and I fought back, but a fourth man appeared, a former Dai Li agent, and he blocked my bending. When they tried to take me away, Zuko appeared and attacked them.

“And Sparky kicked their asses and you escaped, right?” Toph spoke up.

“No,” Zuko said solemnly, “More men appeared and attacked me. I tried to fight them all, but Chang, the Dai Li agent, held a dagger against Katara’s neck. Their leader spoke up and told me to back down unless I wanted Katara to be hurt. So I did. I stopped fighting them and they suppressed my bending as well.”

“Are you both all right?” Suki asked worriedly.

She still had nightmares at the torture she and her fellow Kyoshi Warriors had gone through when Azula had captured them. She shivered but smiled when Sokka placed a comforting hand on her thigh.

Hakoda looked at his daughter with a pained frown.

“Did they…?” he trailed off and cleared his throat.

“No,” Katara said and shook her head, understanding what her father was trying to ask her. “Zuko kept me safe. He even let himself get beat up in order to protect me.”

Everybody seemed to let out relieved breaths, but then they frowned when she said Zuko had been hurt.

“Thank you for keeping her safe,” Hakoda spoke up as he turned to look at Zuko.

“I did what I could, given the circumstances,” Zuko replied with a small nod before he glanced at Katara. “I was not about to let them hurt her,” he continued in a hard tone.

Aang frowned at the way Zuko was looking at Katara and he clenched his hands on his knees just as Kanna and Sokka repeated their thanks.
“But who kidnapped you?” Sokka finally asked, “And why did they do it?”

“It was mostly out of revenge,” Zuko informed them darkly, “They are the group of rebels that have been terrorizing my colonies for the past months. I had banished them from the Fire Nation four years ago when they tried to rise against me, and they wanted vengeance. Jianguo, their leader, especially hates me.”

He paused before he continued, “But their main objective in capturing us was to demand the Court Council to release Ozai from prison in exchange for our lives.”

“What?” they exclaimed.

“They’re fools!” Aang cried out as he gripped his wooden staff. He did not go through a difficult emotional struggle in his decision to end or spare Ozai’s life just so the evil former Fire Lord could be released!

Zuko and Katara glanced at each other before the firebender took a deep breath as he began to relate all they knew from what Jianguo had told them. They explained that it was the rebels who sent those false messages about an illness striking the colony and about the revolt in the Earth Kingdom in order to lure them out. They recounted how they had been stripped from their bending and forced to march through the Earth Kingdom for weeks. They gave small details about their escape, their journey for help, and finally ended with how Iroh found them with the help of Jun and her shirshu—of course they left out the parts that would reveal their relationship.

The sun had finally settled over the horizon by the time they finished. Katara’s family, Toph, and Aang sat in silence as they processed what they had heard. Jing and Ting, oblivious to the adults’ concern, were happily playing with the wooden animal figures by their parents’ feet.

“Who could the traitor be?” Sokka finally asked as he pulled Suki to his side.

“I had suspicions that it was Wei,” Zuko spoke up darkly, “But, unfortunately, I have no evidence against him. I have people working on finding out everything he does as well as looking to see the possibility of someone else being the traitor. I also have others searching for the rebels.”

His eyes narrowed and he fistbanged his hand as he growled out, “And once I know who this traitor is, I will make sure they regret crossing me and daring to hurt Katara.”
“But why did they lure Katara out, too?” Aang finally asked with a deep frown marring the arrow tattoo on his forehead.

“To keep me subdued. They knew I was not going to let any harm befall her,” Zuko replied imperturbably as he stared levelly at the frowning airbender.

Aang narrowed his eyes at him.

Sokka glanced at his father as if to say ‘I told you so’ and Hakoda nodded in consent.

“You all must be tired,” Ursa finally spoke up when the twin girls gave simultaneous yawns. “Why don’t you retire to your rooms to rest after a light supper?”

“Thank you very much, Lady Ursa,” Kanna spoke up before the men could protest, “We’ve had a very long and tedious journey to reach the Fire Nation.”

As they all stood, Zuko turned to address Katara’s father.

“Chief Hakoda,” he began before he continued once he had the older man’s attention, “I would like to speak to you about something important tomorrow once you are rested.”

Hakoda frowned in wonderment before he nodded. Who was he to reject Zuko’s request after he had saved and protected his daughter?

“Of course,” he said with a small smile before he turned to Katara and clasped her hands, “You have no idea how relieved I am to see that you are well.”

“You don’t have to worry anymore, Dad,” she told him reassuringly as she squeezed his hands and smiled at him.

After a few more words with her, Katara’s family finally began to head toward their rooms for some much needed rest. Aang ignored Toph’s jab on his side to make him walk outside the sitting room, and instead, he headed toward Katara who was talking to Zuko’s mother. He missed the narrowed look Zuko threw at him as he approached the waterbender.

“Katara,” he began hesitantly.

When she turned to look at him, Aang gave her a small smile as he said, “Can we talk? There are some things I want to say to you.”

“I’m sorry, Aang,” Katara told him softly. She could feel Zuko’s eyes on them and she resisted the urge to look at him. “We’ll talk tomorrow. I also have something to tell you.”

Aang frowned before his heart swelled in hope at her last words. Maybe she wanted to tell him that she had thought over breaking up with him! Once she apologized, he will immediately tell her that he would take her back!

“Okay,” he said as his smile turned a bit wider, “Until tomorrow then, Katara.”

Katara gave him a brief nod, missing the hopeful look in his eyes as he walked away, and she turned to smile warmly at Zuko as he answered when everybody bid him a good night. Kanna waited by the entrance for her granddaughter while her husband, son, her grandson and his wife lingered outside.

Aware that they were still not alone, Zuko watched as Katara passed him by slowly and he tried to keep himself from reaching out to pull her to him.

“Only one more night before I can announce our engagement,” he whispered to her as she passed.

Katara turned her head to smile at him as she whispered, “One more night.”

She turned back around and smiled at her family as they surrounded her and began to again express their relief that she was all right. She smiled and laugh with them as happiness spread through her. Just one more night and she will finally be a step closer into marrying Zuko.

She ignored that sense of dread that rose again in her chest.
The next day found Katara sitting on her bed and going over another of the scrolls Madam Fang Hua had given her to study. She had finally found some alone time since her family had not let her out of their sight all day. Aang had also tried to get her attention, which worried her since he acted as if they were still together. She really needed to talk to him and soon.

Zuko had to settle something in the city and had asked her father for a private word after dinner, and Katara and he had agreed that she will talk to Aang at the same time. That dreadful feeling came over her again and she shook herself to get rid of it.

She wanted Aang to understand that there never was going to be another chance for them and that she loved Zuko and he was the one she wanted to marry. She knew Aang would be hurt and angry, but if she dragged this on, then he would get his hopes up and be even more hurt in the end. Besides, she would also be hurting Zuko and that, to her, was worse.

The door was suddenly thrown open and she jumped in surprise only to scowl when she saw Toph barge into her room with Suki trailing after her with the laughing twins.

“Don’t you know you’re supposed to knock first before you enter someone’s room?” Katara asked sarcastically as she rolled up the scroll and placed it on the nightstand.

“But this way’s more fun,” Toph countered with an unrepentant grin.

“I’m sorry, Katara, I tried to stop her,” Suki said with a small laugh as she placed her daughters on the bed beside their aunt before she sat on their other side.

Toph dropped herself at the foot of the bed with a snort.

Katara cooed at the twins for a moment as they reached out to her with their chubby hands and gurgled happily before they lost interest in her and began to play with each other.

“It must have been scary for you with what happened with the rebels,” Suki spoke up softly after a while.

“It was,” Katara admitted quietly as she unconsciously ran her hand over her stomach where she had been injured, “Especially since Zuko and I had no way to defend ourselves when they took our bending away. And then the men tried to…” She trailed off and shuddered in disgust before she smiled slightly when Suki patted her arm in comfort. “But Zuko kept me protected as much as he could and stood up to them when they tried to…attack me.”

Suki nodded to show she understood and she smiled at her sister-in-law.

“I’m glad Zuko fought to keep you safe,” she said.

“I wonder how Sparky managed to defeat them all by himself,” Toph piped in with a raised brow.
She was curious since they had been vague about that part.

Before Katara could respond she was distracted when Ting rolled over and bumped onto her hip.
Katara laughed softly as she reached down to steady the younger baby and place her back beside her sister. She looked up when Suki cleared her throat.

“Did you really break up with Aang?” the female warrior asked curiously.

Toph sat up and tilted her head in Katara’s direction.

“Yes,” Katara answered truthfully.

“I noticed Twinkletoes was depressed while we were in the Earth Kingdom village, but he never said anything,” Toph commented as she crossed her arms over her chest.

“I figured as much,” the waterbender muttered.

“Twinkletoes told me you wanted to talk to him after dinner,” the small earthbender remarked before she casually asked, “Are you gonna take him back?”

“No,” Katara responded.

Toph uncrossed her arms and frowned slightly when she felt her racing heart slow down.
“Why?” Suki asked curiously.

Katara fidgeted for a moment and Suki raised an eyebrow when the waterbender blushed.

“Because I’m in love with Zuko,” Katara replied softly.

Suki gasped, but Toph smirked as she again crossed her arms.

“Please tell me both of you stopped being stupid and finally confessed to each other,” the milky green-eyed woman asked sardonically.

Katara scowled at her and Toph grinned even though she could not see it. The waterbender wondered if she should confessed to them that she was now engaged to Zuko before she told herself that they were her friends and would not say anything until her father knew. Taking a deep breath, Katara let it out slowly as a bright smile spread across her face.

“Zuko has confessed that he loves me,” she said with a wistful sigh and ignored Toph’s snicker. “Right after dinner, Zuko is going to ask my dad for my hand in marriage,” she said rapidly and then she blushed.

This time Toph gasped along with Suki as both women gaped, wide-eyed, at the smiling waterbender before the earthbender shook herself and chuckled, bringing the auburn-haired woman out of her shock.

“Well, that was pretty quick,” Toph remarked with a grin, “But knowing Sparky, I shouldn’t be so surprised.”

Suki stared at Katara for a moment longer, watching the pleased blush on the dark-skinned waterbender’s cheeks, before she smiled happily as she patted Katara’s hand.

“I admit that I did suspect there was something going on between you and Zuko, but I never thought you loved each other,” Suki spoke up with a small grin. “But marriage? Wow.”
“Yeah, I know,” Katara said before she laughed sheepishly and rubbed her arm. “I almost had a panic attack and I had some doubts, but Zuko reassured me that there is nothing for me to worry about as long as we have each other.”

“Wow, did Sparky really say that?” Toph asked as her grin grew, “You must’ve really gotten to him.”

The blue-eyed woman again ignored her as she smiled at Suki who was smiling along with her.

“I love him so much and I want to marry him,” Katara said softly.

“I understand how you feel since it’s the same thing I felt toward Sokka,” Suki replied with a soft giggle. She opened her arms and hugged the brunette waterbender tightly as she exclaimed, “Congratulations!”

“Yeah, Sugar Queen, congrats!” Toph piped in as she lightly punched Katara’s arm.

Katara laughed before she calmed herself down and grimaced.

“Well, we still have to see what my father says,” she mumbled.

“So this is why you wanna talk to Twinkletoes? Let him down gently?” Toph asked as she leaned back on the bed on her elbows.

“Yes,” Katara replied and sighed deeply as she tickled the sleepy twins, “I just hope Aang will understand.”

“I hope so, too,” Toph muttered, “but I have a bad feeling.”

Katara bit her lip.

_I do too_, she thought.
The only sign of his apprehension was the flexing of his hands as Zuko walked away from his bedchamber after removing the armor that he had worn for his visit to the city. In a few minutes, dinner would be served and, after they finished their meal, he would ask Hakoda to give him his consent to marry his daughter. His stomach twisted in anxiety.

Although Katara had reassured him that her father would grant his permission, Zuko was not so confident. Hakoda may respect him, and he may be grateful to him for helping Sokka save him from the Boiling Rock and for saving Katara, but that did not automatically mean the chieftain would accept his daughter marrying the lord of the country who had brought their family and people so much pain.

Zuko winced as he continued walking down the empty corridor. And as far as he knew, Hakoda seemed to like Aang and perhaps wished for him to be his son-in-law. That thought made him grit his teeth before he ordered himself to calm down. He would just have to make Hakoda see that he really cared for Katara and would not give her up, and if he had to beg for the man’s consent, he would.

He just hoped it didn’t come to that.

Once Hakoda gave his consent, he planned on proposing to Katara again with the two engagement items. He hoped she liked them.

There was still time left before dinner, so the young lord decided to visit his private garden to take in some fresh air and find some peace and calm. As soon as he stepped into the garden, he took in a deep breath of the sweet aroma that greeted him and sighed when he felt some of his anxiety ease before he stepped onto one of the stone paths to make his way to his favorite spot beneath the cherry blossom tree. He paused and a smile curled his lips when he spotted Katara standing there, feeding the turtle-ducks.

For a long while, he silently admired her form, the way her hair gleamed beneath the sun, the way her dark blue outfit fitted against her body, her lovely face lighting up as she fed the eager little creatures in the pond. She really was a water nymph that continued to enchant him and lure him to her without any resistance from him. Feeling warmth spread through his chest, he finally moved toward her in an unhurried pace so his eyes could continue taking her in.

“Katara,” he called out softly so as not to startle her.
Katara paused before she turned to him with a wide smile as she dusted her hands of crumbs before straightening herself.

“What are you doing?” he asked with a smile.

“Killing time before dinner,” she responded with a shrug as she grinned at him.

“That was my plan, too,” he admitted as he glanced at the descending sun before he returned his gaze to the pond.

They were silent for a moment as they watched the turtle-ducks frolic in the water before they looked at each other again.

“Are you ready to tell Aang after dinner?” he asked with a cocked brow.

“Yes,” Katara responded with a firm nod before she smiled at him as she asked, “And are you ready to talk to my father?”

“I’m more than ready,” he replied firmly.

His eyes drifted from her smiling face and landed on the high collar of her blue tunic that effectively covered the skin of her throat.

“It’s too hot to be wearing a high collar today,” he commented casually, but the affect was ruined when he smirked knowingly.

Katara scowled at him as her hand flew to her covered neck before she pointed an accusing finger at him.

“I’m not about to go parading around with a bruise on me,” she grumbled.

“Not a bruise, Katara, it’s a love bite,” he corrected, his smirk growing a bit wider.
It was the first time he had given a woman a love bite and he could not help feeling smug that it was also the first time Katara had received one. A flood of color rushed to the waterbender’s cheeks before she looked away with a huff. Zuko frowned at her and he again felt a bit of guilt gather in his stomach. Maybe he had been too rough.

“I won’t do it again if it bothers you,” he said quietly.

“No!” Katara exclaimed as she whirled back to look at him. She blushed at her outburst and at the raised eyebrow he aimed at her before she cleared her throat. “Uh, I mean…it’s not that bad. And if I didn’t like, I could’ve healed it,” she said softly as her blush deepened in color.

Zuko stared at her wide-eyed for a moment before he chuckled quietly as she looked away in embarrassment. She was just so adorable when she became shy and embarrassed. It made him want to do naughty things to her.

He glanced around the garden and listened to their surroundings for a moment, and when he did not see or hear anyone else near them, he quickly reached out for her and pulled her to him before she could react.

“Zuko,” Katara protested even as her hands wound themselves around him.

“As soon as your father accepts my proposal, I will announce my wish to take you as my wife to my people,” he said against her hair.

Katara felt her stomach flutter in anxiety, but she told herself to calm down as she took comfort in Zuko’s embrace and his warmth. She pulled away slightly to grin at him.

“I can’t wait to let everybody know you are mine,” she said with a smirk.

Zuko groaned before he leaned down to kiss her softly on her plump lips.

“I can’t wait either,” he replied huskily.

He moved one hand away from around her so that he could open her tunic slightly apart just enough to pull her collar aside. The red love bite contrasted nicely against her brown skin and Zuko again felt that pride and possessiveness swell within him at the sight of it. He leaned down to touch it softly with his lips before he flicked it with his tongue. Katara jumped and hissed as she clutched at the back of his robes. Zuko gave it a languid lick before he pressed soft kisses on it and along her throat, causing Katara to shiver and moan softly.

“Soon you’ll be all mine,” he whispered huskily against her skin as he pushed her gently against the cherry blossom tree behind her.

Katara moaned softly at the feeling of his hard body pressing against hers.

Zuko pulled away from her throat to brush his lips against hers, parted already as if awaiting his kiss expectantly. His hand reached up to tangle in her hair and he pulled her head slightly back so he could kiss her more deeply. Reaching a hand down, Zuko caressed the back of her thigh before trailing it up until he rested it on her ass. He squeezed gently and Katara moaned as she pressed herself closer to him. His tongue slipped inside her mouth eagerly, and they moaned against each other’s lips as they lost themselves in their passion, forgetting everything else but themselves and the sensations and feelings they felt with each other.

“Get your hands off her!” they heard someone angrily shout.

Zuko and Katara pulled away from each other’s mouths in surprise as their heads whipped in the direction of the voice.

“Aang!” Katara exclaimed in horror.

The airbender was trembling in both shock and rage as he gripped his wooden staff tightly while he glared angrily at Zuko, who had yet to release Katara.

Aang took a menacing step forward as he demanded between gritted teeth.

“What the hell is going on here?”
Anticipated Confrontation

“I said get away from her!” Aang shouted again as he pointed the wooden staff menacingly at the Fire Lord.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the command, but decided to comply in order to avoid any problems. He reluctantly moved his hand away from where it had been resting on Katara’s backside. Zuko steadied her on her feet before he took a step away from her stiff form as he turned to stare levelly at the angry Avatar.

Katara swallowed nervously as she watched the two men glare silently at each other and she prayed nothing drastic would happen. How did things come out like this?! She and Zuko had been very careful to hide their relationship, but it all had been for nothing just because they had lost themselves momentarily in each other.

Zuko cleared his throat.

“Aang, let us explain—”

Aang interrupted him as he heatedly demanded, “How dare you assault Katara like that?!”

“Aang, it’s not what you think,” Katara tried to explain as she took a step forward, but she froze when the airbender turned to look at her.

Aang opened his mouth to ask her if she was all right when he noticed that her tunic was slightly open, but he stopped when a mark on the skin of her neck caught his attention. His gray eyes widened in shock when he realized it was a bruise before they narrowed in anger at the thought that Zuko dared to hurt her.

“Step away from him, Katara!” he demanded as he turned to glare with fury at Zuko. “You’re a monster for hurting her!” he shouted as his grip on his staff tightened so much that his pale knuckles turned even whiter.

Zuko stiffened at the accusation. How dare Aang accuse him of such a thing! He took a threatening step toward the younger man, but he paused when Katara immediately placed her hand on his arm to stop him.
“I would never harm Katara,” Zuko growled out angrily.

Katara quickly pulled the collar up and closed her disarrayed tunic before she looked up to frown at Aang.

“There are some things you don’t know, Aang, so you shouldn’t say such things about Zuko,” she told him firmly.

“Why are you defending him?” Aang asked her incredulously, “He was kissing you against your will!”

“If Katara didn’t accept my advances, she would’ve done something about it,” Zuko responded between gritted teeth.

“Katara, get away from him so I can teach him a lesson!” Aang shouted, ignoring Zuko’s words entirely in his anger and jealousy.

“No,” Katara told him defiantly as she took a step closer to the tensed firebender, “Zuko wasn’t doing anything wrong.”

“W-what?” Aang stammered as he frowned at her.

Katara took a deep breath as she gathered her courage. She needed to make Aang understand that he did not have the right to demand things from her and that he needed to see that she would never take him back.

“I wanted to tell you this privately so you could understand,” she began slowly.

“Tell me what?” the airbender asked as the grip on his staff tightened in anxiety. He had a feeling he was not going to like what she was going to say.

Katara glanced at Zuko and he looked down at her questioningly before his eyes widened when she took his hand, entwined their fingers together, and gave it a firm squeeze. Aang’s eyes also widened as he saw the gesture before he looked up at Katara with a pained frown.

“Zuko and I are engaged,” she confessed softly.

A horrified gasp escaped the airbender and he backed away a step as if he had been struck. He stared at her in both shock and hurt.

“N-no, that can’t be!” he stammered, shaking his head almost violently in denial.

“Aang, please listen—”

“Tell me you’re lying!” he interrupted as he looked at her with a pleading expression, “Tell me it’s just a joke!”

“It’s not a joke,” Zuko spoke up coolly as he gave Katara’s hand a squeeze. He had feared that Katara would never have explained to Aang what was going on, but he was glad that she had finally told him about them. “We are really engaged.”

Aang’s hurt expression turned into one full of fury as he turned on Zuko, causing Katara to gasp for she had never seen the lovable monk so angry before.

“How dare you seduce Katara while we were separated?!” Aang shouted at him.

“I didn’t seduce her,” Zuko growled out.

“You know how much Katara means to me!” Aang continued, again ignoring Zuko’s words in his anger and pain, “You knew I wanted to marry her, so why are you taking her away from me?!”

Then in a broken voice, he said, “I thought we were friends.”

Zuko frowned and then sighed guiltily at the hurt expression on the gray-eyed airbender’s face.
“I tried to keep away from Katara because I did know what you felt for her and I didn’t want to ruin our friendship,” Zuko began before he added more firmly, “But I could not stop…my feelings for her.”

“What?” Aang exclaimed just as Katara turned surprised eyes on Zuko for his confession.

Zuko pressed his lips tightly together at his admittance since he was always uncomfortable talking about his feelings with another person that was not Katara, but he wanted to make Aang understand that he loved her and that he will not give her up.

“I love Katara,” the golden-eyed Fire Lord stated before he determinedly added, “And I’m going to marry her.”

“No!” Aang shouted as he again shook his head furiously before he again turned his glare on Zuko. “You have Mai! You could have any woman you want! So why did you pick Katara when you knew we were together?!”

“We already ended things!” Katara exclaimed exasperatedly.

Aang ignored her words as he turned pained eyes on her.

“How could you do this to me when you know how much I love you?”

“Aang,” Katara said more softly as she spread her hands pleadingly, “Please understand…”

She paused when he shook his head at her and took another step back before he looked at Zuko with cold, gray eyes.

“Why did you take her away from me?” he hissed.

“I didn’t do it to hurt you, Aang,” Zuko responded with a frown. “And besides, Katara is…was free to be pursued.”
“You’re lying!” the airbender raged, “I noticed all those looks you would throw Katara even when we were together! I had my suspicions that you were trying to get her for yourself and I see that I was right!”

The airbender slashed his wooden staff to the side and a gust of wind flew at Zuko, sliding him a few feet away from Katara.

“Zuko!” Katara cried out as she whirled around to see where Zuko had skidded to a stop.

Once she knew he was all right, she turned to look at Aang with narrowed eyes.

“Stop it, Aang!” she exclaimed, “Let’s just talk about this!”

But Aang’s attention was on Zuko who was casually straightening his clothes with a cold expression on his face.

“Leave Katara alone!” Aang demanded.

“Unless Katara tells me otherwise, I will not leave her,” Zuko responded with a growl, “And even if she does, I would do anything to get her back.”

With an angry shout, Aang again shot a gust of wind at him, his entire body trembling in anger. Zuko crossed his arms over his face as the ball of air hit him full force and again pushed him a few feet away before he looked up once he skidded to a stop. He narrowed his eyes once he realized Aang was moving him away from Katara, so he deliberately took a few steps toward her.

“Why are you taking her away from me?!” the young Avatar shouted as he took a step closer to the anxious waterbender when he saw Zuko moving toward her again.

“I already told you I’m not doing it out of malice!” Zuko hissed out as his hands clenched at his sides, “And she doesn’t belong to you!”

“Stop lying!” Aang cried out as this time he summoned a chunk of rock from the ground and hurled it at the golden-eyed firebender.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed.

Zuko shot a ball of fire to destroy the incoming rock and it exploded into many pieces just as he turned to glare at Aang.

“I don’t want to fight you,” he said between gritted teeth.

“Well, that’s too bad!” the younger man growled as he raised his staff and prepared to send another attack.

“What’s all the damn shouting about?” Toph’s annoyed voice interrupted Zuko from responding, Katara from protesting, and made Aang pause from attacking.

The three turned in the direction of the earthbender’s voice and they saw that she was not alone but was accompanied by Katara’s family as well as Zuko’s. Jee, Shen, and Kuo were standing behind them with tensed postures as they eyed the airbender with guarded looks. The others were looking at the three with confused and curious expressions.

“What is going on?” Hakoda asked as he frowned at the three of them.

Zuko tensed and groaned inwardly as he flicked a glance at Katara, who gave him a worried frown, before he returned his attention to the chieftain. Things were not supposed to be like this!

Katara took a step toward her father as she tried to give him a smile, which came out more like a grimace.

“Dad, let me explain—”

“Zuko seduced Katara and he’s trying to take her away!” Aang interrupted her as he pointed an accusing finger at Zuko.
“What?” Hakoda, Sokka, and Pakku growled out in unison.

“That is not true,” Zuko said as he narrowed his eyes angrily at Aang.

“Zuko didn’t—” Katara tried to explain, but once again Aang cut her off. She gritted her teeth in annoyance.

“I will not give Katara up!” Aang told Zuko stubbornly.

“Neither will I,” Zuko responded just as adamantly.

With another angry cry, Aang again threw a ball of wind at Zuko to keep him away from Katara. The waterbender cried out as Aang ripped a large chunk of earth and flung it at the raven-haired man, who again, demolished it with a quick fire blast.

“Stop it! Both of you stop fighting!” Katara demanded angrily.

This was not how things were supposed to be! Zuko was supposed to talk to her father and she was supposed to explain things to Aang in a calm manner! All of her trouble of keeping her engagement to Zuko a secret, all of her distress of keeping Zuko at a distance, and all of her anxiety to keep Aang from being hurt and from fighting with Zuko was all in vain just because Aang had accidently caught them kissing!

She ran to Aang in order to stop him when he raised his staff once again to attack Zuko, but Aang did not notice her and accidently knocked her sideways when he slashed the wooden staff to the side. With a pained cry, Katara flew a few feet before she landed on the ground on her side, coughing loudly when the wind was knocked out of her lungs and wincing at the jarring impact.

“Katara!” everybody shouted in alarm.

“I’m so sorry!” Aang cried out as he rushed to help her.

He skidded to a stop when a wall of white fire suddenly sprang in front of him, cutting him off from Katara. Aang quickly jumped back in surprise as well as from the heat of the scorching flames.
When the wall of fire extinguished, they all gaped in shock to find Zuko standing protectively before Katara with white fire engulfing his clenched hands that trembled with his rage.

“What the…?” Sokka breathed in awe as his blue eyes widened in shock, not only at the intimidating sight Zuko made as he stood protectively in front of his sister, but at the fact that the Fire Lord was bending white fire. How was that even possible?

Zuko glanced worriedly at Katara, who was sitting up and shaking her head as if to clear it. When he saw that she was all right, he turned to look at Aang with a livid expression. The wrath present in the Fire Lord’s glare made it seem as if fire could shoot forth from those golden orbs and incinerate the airbender on the spot.

Zuko had felt his anger flare at the sight of Katara hitting the ground. He tried being understanding toward Aang, but with this, he felt his patience and sympathy vanish. He wanted to make Aang see that Katara belonged only to him.

Sensing that Zuko was angry, Katara quickly rose to her feet and clung onto his arm, careful of keeping her body away from the white flames in his hands.

“Zuko, it was an accident!” she tried to reason with him as she gave his arm a reassuring squeeze to calm him down.

“It doesn’t matter,” Zuko responded coldly as he continued to glare at the wide-eyed Avatar, “The point is that he hurt you and you know I’m not going to allow anyone who harms you get away with it.”

Glancing at her from the corner of his golden eye, the young Fire Lord then firmly added.

“You are mine to protect.”

Katara felt her cheeks burned as her heart fluttered at the words he had uttered in front of everybody and she found herself speechless as she stared at his serious profile.
“Zuko…” she breathed out.

“Katara doesn’t belong to you!” Aang shouted heatedly, interrupting their moment.

With an livid yell, Aang summoned another burst of air to separate the two so he did not hurt Katara again when he fought Zuko. Never had he felt such rage and pain in his life!

Katara crossed her hands over her face as the dust stung her eyes just as she felt the wind push her away from Zuko. Once the wind died down, Katara’s eyes flew wide open and immediately darted in search of the men. She cried out as she saw them fighting with each other, Zuko forcefully punching white fire in Aang’s direction while the airbender attacked just as angrily with sharp rocks and piercing wind. She was a bit relieved to know that Zuko did not have his dual broadswords with him at the moment. Who knew what would happen then.

The others were amazed and confused as they watched the Avatar fight the young Fire Lord. They did not know what was going on to have brought both friends to attack each other. Jee and Zuko’s personal guards were tense since they wanted to rush forward and protect their lord, but they knew that this was a fight they could not intervene in.

Aang slashed his staff to the side and a great burst of air flew at Zuko and crashed into him. Zuko clenched his teeth as he planted his feet firmly on the ground to keep from being thrown in the air, and instead, he slid backgrounds, dust and debris flying around him as he dug his feet on the grassy ground. As he straightened himself, he saw Aang bend a sharp water whip he gathered from the pond and aim it at his chest.

Narrowing his eyes, Zuko shot forth his own fire whip, but due to his anger it burst into white flames that immediately evaporated the cool water whip. He cracked the white fire whip on the ground before he lashed it at Aang. The airbender gasped as he saw the deadly attack aimed at him. With a gust of wind from his staff, he bounded into the air just as the fiery whip struck the place where he had been standing a second ago. The grass turned into dark ashes and a hole was torn into the ground as the tip of the white fire whip touched it.

Growling, Aang landed a few feet away and brought down his staff parallel to the ground. Another gust of wind was hurled at Zuko, who easily flipped to the side before he was hit. Anticipating his move, Aang summoned another chunk of rock and struck Zuko from behind, knocking him forward.

Katara cried out as Zuko crashed onto the ground and Aang let go of the rock to crush him. Zuko rolled to the side, sprang up and jumped back, shooting another fireball at the rock that immediately destroyed it. Landing gracefully, Zuko aimed a glare at the angry Avatar.

Aang again hurled a piece of rock at Zuko, but the firebender again destroyed it with a fiery kick and simultaneously shot a ball of fire at the airbender. Aang cried out as the fireball struck his shoulder, but he quickly extinguished the flames and then jumped back in time before he was struck by Zuko’s fire whip. But he had not anticipated Zuko flicking his second fire whip, which tore a howl of pain from Aang when the fiery whip slashed his chest. Aang ground his teeth in both pain and anger as he watched Zuko retract the fire whip with an unreadable expression. With a cry, Aang again attacked him, ignoring the pain in his chest.

“Stop it!” Katara shouted once more as she watched them fly at each other again. She did not want them to fight over her as if she were a prize that was to be given to the victor!

She took a step forward to stop them, but her arm was caught by a strong hand and she was pulled back. With a growl, she turned her head to shout at whoever was holding her back to let her go, but she paused when she saw it was her father, who had a dark frown on his face.

“Don’t rush in there,” he ordered her. “You could get hurt.”

“But, Dad!” she protested as she tried to pry his hand away from her arm, “I have to stop them! I can’t let them hurt each other!”

“Listen to your father, Miss Katara,” Iroh interrupted as he laid a firm hand on her shoulder as he looked seriously into her eyes, “Let them work out their differences this way.”

Katara clenched her teeth in both frustration and anxiety. Could they not see that one of them could be seriously hurt?

She allowed her father to pull her back as she returned her worried gaze to watch her friend fighting with the man she loved. Zuko had a small bruise forming across his forehead, a small cut on his right cheek, and his clothes were dirty and disarrayed. But Aang was much worse. The airbender had a painful burn mark on his arm, his shoulder, and across his chest, and his clothes were ripped and burned in a few places. Both young men did not seem to notice as they continued to attack each other for the woman they both loved and refused to give up.

The once beautiful garden was being destroyed as the Fire Lord and the Avatar continued fighting. Aang would tear chunks of grassy ground and use the water from the pond to attack Zuko, while the firebender would leave scorch marks on the grass as he used his firebending to attack Aang. They would have been evenly matched. After all, Zuko had once been Aang’s teacher and Aang had the benefit of being able to use all four elements, while Zuko had the advantage of being a trained warrior that had the ability of bending such a strong level of white fire. Aang, however, had allowed his emotions to control him, which was causing him to fight sloppily.

Aang growled in frustration as he once again was thrown back by Zuko’s blast of white fire. He quickly rolled away when Zuko brought down a flaming fist to where the airbender’s stomach had been a second before. Jumping a few feet away, Aang panted hard and quickly wiped the sweat running down his eyes before resuming his fighting stance.

He had given up using water since Zuko’s white fire was too strong and easily evaporated or melted any water attack he threw at him. Rock seemed to help him a bit, but Zuko just as easily destroyed any of his earthbending attacks. Wind and fire were the only elements that he was able to use to throw in an attack. He had never heard of a firebender being able to bend white fire and he was beginning to realize that perhaps he would not be able to defeat Zuko as easily as he had thought. However, he refused to give up. His heart was in too much pain and his mind was filled with too much anger and jealousy to stop and think about what he was doing. All he knew was that Zuko was taking Katara away from him and he needed to stop the firebender from keeping him away from the woman he loved.

“Leave Katara alone!” Aang shouted when they paused to catch their breaths and figure out each other’s next move. “She’s mine!”

“Katara is going to be my wife, so you should accept it,” Zuko growled out as sparks flew from his mouth and the white flames in his hands flared.

That seemed to make something snap within the airbender. With an angry cry, Aang attacked Zuko with all four elements and began to drive him back more fiercely. Zuko cursed as he narrowly avoided having his head lobbed off by a large rock before he somersaulted over Aang’s head and kicked the airbender’s back. He landed in a crouch and resuming his fighting stance. Aang stumbled forward, but managed to propel himself up with a burst of wind he shot from his mouth before whirling around to continue with his attacks. Zuko met his attacks fiercely since he refused to back down. He would not lose Katara!

They broke apart and landed a few feet away from each other, both panting from exhaustion and eyeing each other angrily.

“Give up, Aang,” Zuko growled at him with narrowed eyes, “Katara’s mine!”
The airbender stiffened before his body began to tremble with rage and the arrows tattooed on his pale skin began to give out a low glow. He tightened his hold on his staff as wind began to swirl around his form, ruffling his clothes and picking up debris, and he hissed at Zuko.

Zuko waited for Aang to attack him, but his eyes widened in shock when his feet were suddenly encased by rock before he was pulled into the ground until he was submerged to his calves. He tried to pull his legs up, but of course it didn’t work. With a growl, Zuko shot a burst of fire at the rock trapping his feet, but it seemed to only scratch the surface and caused the ground to tighten around his legs, causing him to wince, effectively making him immobile. With a growl he looked up to glower heatedly at Aang who now held a small smirk on his lips. Zuko glared at him. As if he would allow himself to be trapped!

Standing off to the side with her worried and bewildered family and friends, Katara pressed a hand to her chest as she felt that same dread return more painfully than before as the last scene of her nightmare surfaced in her mind. She could not stop remembering the vision of Zuko being pierced through his chest, blood running down his clothes and staining his hands before the earth swallowed him.

“Zuko!” Katara cried out in fear. She needed to do something! She needed to protect him!

“Katara isn’t yours!” Aang shouted at Zuko, his usual cheerful face contorted in a snarl. “I’m not going to allow you to take her away from me!”

Before he could retort, Zuko watched with wide eyes as Aang squatted down with his palms to the ground before he flung his arms up. At the movement, a large boulder burst from the ground and hovered in the air. Zuko ground his teeth since he knew that if he was hit by that rock he would be in deep trouble.

“Aang, stop!” Toph shouted just as everybody else gasped when Aang raised his hands.

It was as if time had slowed down as they watched the Avatar flung his hands forward and the huge rock headed straight for the young Fire Lord.

Zuko narrowed his eyes as he brought his flaming fists to his chest, preparing himself to hurl a large fire blast in order to destroy the boulder, but he dispersed his white flames when he saw Katara suddenly lunge herself at him. Katara wrapped her arms around Zuko and clenched her eyes tight, ignoring her family calling her name in horror. All that she was thinking at the moment was that she had to protect Zuko, that she could not let her nightmare become true. Zuko felt his stomach clench in fear at the thought of Katara getting hurt and he grabbed her to him, curling her into him to protect her as much as he could with his body as he waited for the impact.

But as soon as he noticed Katara, the airbender immediately crushed the rock into a million pieces and the dust flew past the pair, coating their clothes, skin, and hair in dirt, as they continued to hold each other.

Peeking through his lashes, Zuko opened his eyes fully when he saw that they were fine. With a shaky breath, he hugged Katara closer to him, terribly shaken, as he was again reminded of how he had almost lost her once. It seemed he would never be able to forget it.

“Why did you do that, Katara?!” Zuko growled angrily into her ear even as he gave her a gentle squeeze, “You could’ve gotten hurt.”

Katara shook her head as she clutched the back of his tunic.

“I couldn’t bear the thought of you getting hurt,” she responded softly.

Zuko sighed and did not argue with her on how he had been about to destroy the boulder as he tightened his hold on her. Damn, stubborn woman always putting herself in harm’s way in order to protect someone else. But that was why he loved her.

Aang watched them with wide eyes and his entire body shook with shock and remorse before he glanced down at his trembling hands in horror. He had almost hurt his friends because of his jealousy! What kind of person was he? He felt so ashamed. But still, how could they do this to him?

He watched as Zuko pulled slightly away to gently grasp Katara’s face as if to reassure himself she was unharmed while Katara grabbed his wrists and smiled at him before she also looked him over. Aang felt his heart give a painful lurch in his chest. He had seen how Katara was willing to risk her safety for Zuko and Zuko had done the same. He wondered if he had been wrong about Zuko’s intentions and Katara’s feelings for him, especially by the loving manner they were staring at each other. Katara had never looked at him in such a way and that realization pained him. He did not want to accept that he may lose her, that she never loved him. With a movement from his hand, Aang released Zuko from the ground as he watched them with pained eyes.

At the feeling of his feet being released, Zuko and Katara finally seemed to snap back to reality and they turned to look at the airbender.
“I’m… I’m sorry,” Aang said quietly before he looked at Katara with a pleading expression. “Maybe you’re just confused again. You need more time to think about this.”

His voice was strained in the end, hoping that it was like last time when he had pleaded with her and she had relented to give him another chance. He was willing to wait for her to clear her head because surely she could not love Zuko! She couldn’t! She loved him!

“I’m not confused, Aang,” Katara replied firmly as she grasped onto Zuko’s arm. “I already told you that I only see you as a friend. I’m sorry for not telling you sooner, but the man I love is Zuko.”

Aang ignored everybody else’s gasp as he vigorously shook his head as if to deny her words. No, no this couldn’t be! She must be lying! But why? He turned angry eyes on Zuko as if he could make the firebender confess that he was forcing Katara to say such words, but Zuko only narrowed his eyes as he wrapped an arm around Katara and brought her closer to him. As if understanding his thoughts, Katara shook her head as she looked up at Zuko before returning her gaze to him.

“Zuko’s not at fault. I can’t return your feelings, Aang,” she told him with a frown before she softly added, “I’m sorry for hurting you, but it was time that I made a choice for myself to be happy. And that choice is Zuko.”

Except for Iroh, Ursa, Toph, Suki and Kanna (who already had her suspicions) everybody else murmured to themselves in shock while Sokka shouted a loud ‘Say what?!’ He yelped when Suki elbowed his side sharply.

Aang ignored them as he lifted agonized, gray eyes to Katara. He was devastated at her words, at the way she leaned comfortably against Zuko, at the way Zuko brought her protectively and possessively close to him. He felt like the world was falling apart around him, like a knife had twisted his heart, and he felt his eyes sting with tears. He looked away as he tried to hold them back and his shoulders slumped in defeat. He wanted to deny her words, but he could see that she was serious. After everything they had gone through during the war, after everything he had done, it had not been enough. He could now see that all this time he had been lying to himself.

And it hurt. It hurt so much.

He looked up when he heard Zuko clear his throat.

“I’m sorry you had to find out this way, Aang,” Zuko said sincerely, “I didn’t want things to come about like this, I didn’t mean to hurt you, but I will not give Katara up. She means too much to me.”

Aang stared at him silently for a long moment as he again tried to convince himself Zuko was lying, but he knew Zuko would never do such a thing, he knew Zuko was being truthful. Licking his dry lips, the young airbender tried to gather his sluggish yet flying thoughts and control the whirling emotions that churned within him. He wanted to fight, to somehow bring Katara back to him, but he knew deep down in his aching heart that there was absolutely nothing he could do to change the fact that Katara loved Zuko and Zuko loved her.

After a long moment of tense silence, Aang finally spoke in a quivering voice.

“I…I’m devastated, hurt, and angry,” he began shakily before he cleared his throat, “But I can see there’s nothing I can do.”

I can see that I have lost, he thought dejectedly in his head.

“If…if it means your…happiness, then I will learn to accept it,” he said before he added, “At least, I will try.”

“Aang…” Katara tried to say, but Aang cut her off with a shake of his head.

“I-I need to leave, gather my thoughts…come to terms that I have l-lost you,” he told her miserably, his voice cracking in the end.

“I hope you can forgive me one day,” Katara said softly as she gave him a hopeful look.

Aang did not reply as he gave her a strained smile. Turning to Zuko he gave him a hard look. Zuko stiffened and narrowed his eyes on the young monk.

“You better take care of her,” he said threateningly.

“I will,” Zuko responded firmly with a nod of his head.
Turning to Katara to give her one more pained and longing look, Aang turned around and headed swiftly back toward the palace. He passed the stunned audience silently, and without another word or another glance, the young Avatar disappeared into the palace.

Toph turned to Zuko and Katara and crossed her arms over her chest.

“It’s about time everything came out in the open,” she said with a snort before she grinned. “Congrats and I wish you good luck.”

“Wait, what? What’s going on?” Sokka shouted as he looked at Toph and then at Katara before he glared at Zuko.

“I’m sure Sparky can explain,” the blind earthbender replied sadistically.

Toph grinned impishly when Zuko growled at her as all of Katara’s male relatives turned their attention on him before she turned away and followed after the monk.

As soon as he had turned the corner of another empty corridor, Aang punched his fist on the wall. With a pained sigh, he leaned on it and pressed his forehead to the cool surface as the tears that he had been holding back finally fell from his eyes and ran down his pale cheeks just as his other hand pressed his constricting chest.

Why? Why was this happening to him? He defeated the evil former Fire Lord. He saved the world! He was supposed to get the girl! After everything he had done, he was supposed to be happy!

He shook his head even as his tears continued to pour out from his blurry eyes. He needed to leave before he broke down in anguish or did something he would later regret. Once he found Appa and Momo, he will leave the Fire Nation and fly far away, away from everything, away from the pain.

Rubbing his hands across his eyes to dry his tears, Aang pushed himself away from the wall and hurriedly made his way to the stables where he knew his loyal flying sky-bison and flying-lemur were resting.

“Wait up, Twinkletoes!” he heard Toph shout out.
Without even turning to look at her, Aang continued in his fast pace down the golden passageway.

“Leave me alone, Toph,” he said between gritted teeth. “I don’t want to hear you say ‘I told you so,’ okay?! I want to be alone.”

The small earthbender was unfazed by his words as she continued to follow him.

“I’m coming with you to make sure you don’t do anything stupid,” she told him with a snort and an indifferent shrug.

Aang sighed since he knew he was not going to be able to stop her even if he tried.

“Do whatever you want,” he said morosely as he continued walking.

He tried to suppress the vision of Katara in Zuko’s arms, of them kissing each other, their bodies pressed close together from surfacing in his mind, but the image seemed burned into his brain. Again his heart lurched painfully in his chest.

He needed to get away.

Katara watched as Toph disappeared back into the palace and she sighed sadly as she remembered the pained look in Aang’s gray watery eyes. Would he ever forgive her and Zuko?

As if sensing her thoughts, Zuko gave her waist a gentle squeeze and she looked up to see him look at her with reassuring amber eyes even if his face had changed back into its emotionless mask. Smiling gratefully, Katara snuggled closer to him.

“What is going on?” Hakoda’s deep voice made them turn to him.

He had a hard look on his face as he eyed the way the young man was holding Katara before he gruffly demanded, “Step away from my daughter, Fire Lord Zuko.”

Even though he was still shaken by the thought that Katara could have been hurt, Zuko reluctantly let go of her as he faced the frowning chieftain since he did not wish to have problems with her father—and hopefully, his future father-in-law.

Blushing, Katara cleared her throat to get her father’s attention away from Zuko.

“Dad, one of the reasons I broke up with Aang was because I’m in love with Zuko,” she told him softly before she glanced briefly at Zuko to give him a reassuring smile.

Hakoda stared at his daughter with wide eyes, he never would have thought his daughter loving the firebender possible, before he looked at the silent Fire Lord with a raised eyebrow.

“The reason I wanted to have a talk with you after dinner, Chief Hakoda,” Zuko began in his usual cool tone, “was because I wanted to ask you for Katara’s hand in marriage.”

Hakoda and Pakku gaped at him, Kanna grinned, and Sokka shouted another loud ‘Say what?!’

The blue-eyed chieftain composed himself immediately and cleared his throat before he frowned at the Fire Lord who was staring at him steadily with Katara at his side. How did this suddenly come to be?

“We must have a talk. This is just too sudden,” Hakoda finally said.

Zuko gave him an understanding nod as he glanced at Katara briefly before he returned his gaze to the frowning older man.

“We can talk in my study,” the young firebender suggested.

“I would like to speak to my daughter first, if you don’t mind. I’ll be in your study soon,” Hakoda spoke up seriously.

Zuko again glanced at the silent waterbender beside him, who gave him an encouraging smile and a reassuring squeeze of his arm, before he turned to the chief with a nod.
“I will be in my study then,” the young Fire Lord stated coolly.

Zuko glanced down at himself and frowned as he took in his dirty clothes before he looked up with an unreadable expression as he added, “I will change quickly first.”

Grabbing Katara’s hand, which was still holding his arm, Zuko gave it a gentle squeeze as he looked at her before he let her go and silently made his way back to the palace with Iroh, Ursa, Jee, and his personal guards following behind him.

Katara watched as Zuko waited for his mother to catch up to him then he talked to her quietly for a moment before resuming to his destination. Lady Ursa smiled widely as she turned to glance briefly at the waterbender before she pulled Iroh next to her and began to talk quietly to him as they headed toward the palace. Katara wondered what they were up to.

Those from the Southern Water Tribe stared after the royal family, and once they disappeared, they turned to Hakoda.

“Can you please leave us alone?” he asked them with a raised eyebrow.

They glanced at each other before they turned to leave. Kanna glanced back and smiled reassuringly at her granddaughter who gave her a grateful smile in return.

Once father and daughter were alone, Hakoda walked toward the destroyed pond and glanced down at the remaining water at its bottom as he stopped at its edge. He stood there in silence for a long moment before he sighed and turned toward his daughter, who was also staring silently into the ruined pond with a sad expression.

“Do you truly love Zuko, Katara?” he asked her softly.

Katara looked away from the pond so her father could see her sincerity.

“I love him more than I’ve loved anyone else,” she responded firmly.

Hakoda assessed her heartfelt expression for a few moments before he smiled as he glanced at a patch of flowers that had been spared from the terrible fight between the young Fire Lord and the Avatar.

“It is the same way I felt toward your mother,” he said with a melancholy sigh.

Katara smiled sadly and she reached out to embrace her father since she now had an understanding of what her father must feel for having lost the love of his life. She would feel the same if she ever lost Zuko. Hakoda allowed his daughter to hug him for a brief moment before he cleared his throat and gently pulled away to smile at her before his expression turned serious once again.

“How did this relationship between Zuko and you come to be?” he asked with a raised brow.

“I…well, the more time I spent with Zuko, the more I came to know him, and all the times he would protect me, made me fall in love with him,” Katara tried to explain concisely. “But I tried to deny my feelings for him because I didn’t want to hurt Aang and because, well, I thought Zuko would never return my feelings.”

She paused and took a shaky breath as she continued, “But when we were captured and we thought we’d lose the other, we finally confessed our feelings to each other. And when Zuko asked me to marry him, I immediately accepted.”

Hakoda nodded as he said, “Your grandmother tried to make me see what was going on between you two, but I ignored it since I never thought it could be possible.”

Pausing, he turned to his daughter with a grim expression as he grabbed her hands and held them protectively in his larger and calloused ones.

“But are you sure about this?” he asked her gravely. “He once invaded our home. Zuko is the Fire Lord, ruler of the country that has hurt us so much, the country who took your mother away from us. I’m just not sure I want my daughter to marry into the nation that has caused us and the world so much pain. To marry a man that has once been our enemy.”

Katara squeezed her father’s hands and she looked resolutely into his concerned, dark blue eyes.

“But the Fire Nation did cause a lot pain, but that is in the past,” she told him firmly before she more softly added, “Zuko did make mistakes, but he has changed, he is trying to help the world, and you know he is not responsible for Mom’s death.”

Hakoda stared into his daughter’s unwavering gaze and sighed.

“I know that and I know Zuko is a good man, but…” he paused with another sigh before he continued more quietly, “I just don’t want to lose you after finally getting you back.”

“It’s not like I’m going to be held captive in the Fire Nation and you’ll never be able to see me again,” she said softly. “Zuko has told me that we’ll visit the Southern Water Tribe whenever we can, and you and the others will always be welcome to visit the Fire Nation.”

Hakoda felt glad at her words and he relaxed slightly.

“Are you sure you want to marry Zuko?” he asked her again with fatherly concern in his tone, “You will have lots of responsibilities if you become his wife and Fire Lady.”

“I know it won’t be easy, but I will endure everything as long as I have Zuko as my husband,” Katara told him determinedly.

Hakoda was silent for a long moment as he contemplated everything his daughter had told him as well as the things she had not but that he was becoming aware of. He remembered the fleeting glances the Fire Lord and Katara would throw each other when they thought no one was looking, or all the times Zuko would protect Katara. He wanted to tell her that she should think things through before she married the Fire Lord, after all, he was a father who wanted to keep his only daughter close to him so she would not be hurt. He also did not want to think of his little girl as someone’s wife. But ever since his beloved Kya gave birth to his children and he held their little bodies in his hands, he knew that one day they would grow up and have a family of their own to love and protect.

He had nothing against Aang, but he had hoped Katara would have ended her relationship with the young airbender and married a warrior from the tribe so that way they could live close by, but now she wanted to marry the Fire Lord and live in another country. But he knew that Zuko was a good man and would be a better husband to his daughter than any young man he knew, a man that could handle her strong and loving spirit.

“If you truly love Zuko and if marrying him is truly what you want, then I will not stand in the way of your happiness,” Hakoda finally spoke with a tender smile on his tanned face.
Katara smiled happily at her father, but before she could thank him, his expression once again turned serious.

“But first I need to have a talk with Zuko before I actually consent to the Fire Lord marrying my daughter,” he told her firmly.

Her smile faded into a serious expression and Katara gave him a nod.

“I understand, Dad,” she began before she continued more strongly, “But even if you refuse, I will still marry Zuko.”

Hakoda stared at her with a dark frown for a moment, at her determined features and steadfast blue eyes, and he knew she was serious. Even if he did not give his consent, he was positive she would marry the Fire Lord because of the love she held for him.

“Then I hope the Fire Lord convinces me,” he said with a small smirk.

Katara gave him a small smile as he placed his arm around her shoulders and led her away from the destroyed garden and back to the palace where the rest of their family was anxiously waiting for them.

“Well?” Sokka asked impatiently as he held a sleeping Ting in his arms.

“I will talk with the Fire Lord now,” Hakoda said as he let go of Katara and turned around in the direction of the Fire Lord’s study.

“Dad, wait!” Sokka spoke up.

The older man turned around and watched as his son handed one of his sleeping granddaughters to Katara before swiftly walking toward him.

“I’m coming with you,” the young Water Tribe warrior said firmly.
Sokka ignored Katara’s protests and Suki’s groan as he stared at his father. Hakoda nodded. He was proud that his son wanted to protect his sister and make sure she was not making a mistake. They turned around and walked in the direction of the Fire Lord’s study.

Holding her sleeping niece in her arms, Katara stared after her father and brother with hopeful eyes. As much as she loved her family, she was not going to give up Zuko even if they were against their marriage.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Staring silently out the large window of his study where he could see the sky changing into red and orange colors as the sun began to set, the young Fire Lord waited anxiously for Chief Hakoda to show up after he talked to Katara. He wondered what they could be talking about before he dismissed the thought from his mind since it was making him more nervous. He hated feeling nervous.

Deciding to think of something else, Zuko looked down at himself and nodded approvingly at his more presentable appearance. He casually smoothed down his dark royal robe and then reached up to fix his fire crown before he frowned when he caught his reflection on the glass. He touched the small cut that marred his cheek and winced slightly before his expression returned to his normal stoic mask.

He remembered what happened with Aang moments ago and how Katara almost got hurt, and he narrowed his eyes. He remembered the anger he had felt toward Aang for hurting Katara—even if it had been unintentional—as well as at Aang’s words when he kept insisting Katara was his. Zuko had been unable to control his rage and jealousy, even if he had felt terrible that Aang had to find out about them in such a way. He understood the way Aang had felt for he would have probably felt the same way had their roles been reversed, although he would probably have reacted much worse and seriously harmed Aang.

Looking at the setting sky, Zuko wondered where Aang had gone to and if one day they could be friends again like they used to be. His thoughts again wandered to Katara and her father, and he wondered if perhaps now he would not have a chance with her because of the things Aang had said about him and because of the way he had lost his temper.

He began to panic at the thought that perhaps Hakoda was trying to convince Katara not to marry him. What would he do if Katara decided to obey her father and left him to return to the Southern Water Tribe? He could not just force her to remain in the Fire Nation against her will and marry him. And if he did, another war could be started. He could not let that happen.

Gazing in the direction where he could just make out the trees from his private garden, the young Fire Lord frowned before he straightened himself with a determined glint in his amber eyes. He was a descendant of Agni and of Avatar Roku, son of the great Fire Nation, and Fire Lord of one of the most powerful countries in the world. He will face everything head on and not cower down for fear of what may come. He will convince Hakoda that he was the perfect man for his daughter and he will marry her.

Zuko placed his hand to the hidden pocket of his robe and smiled once he felt the two engagement items he had picked up from his room after he had showered and dressed. If Hakoda agreed for him to marry Katara, then Zuko’s plan of presenting them to her would come true and asking his mother to help him would not be in vain.

He was interrupted from his thoughts when a firm knock reached his ears.

“Enter,” Zuko called out impassively as he turned away from the window to face the large door.

He schooled his features back into an expressionless mask in order to hide his anxiety just as the door opened and Hakoda stepped in with Sokka following behind him. Zuko was not surprised to see that Katara’s overprotective brother had also come. He waited until Sokka closed the door behind them before he bid them to take a seat on the two chairs that were placed before his large desk. Hakoda nodded as he and Sokka took a seat just as Zuko did the same on his own large chair across from them.

“Is it true that you seduced Katara?” Hakoda began bluntly with a sharp look in his eyes.

“That is a lie,” Zuko responded just as frankly.

Hakoda and Sokka relaxed noticeably and Zuko did not doubt for a second that both tribesmen would have castrated him in order to avenge Katara’s honor. Both dark-skinned men were silent as they eyed the young Fire Lord for a long moment while Zuko return the stare without showing one single emotion—even though inwardly he could feel his anxiety rising as the silence stretched on. Finally, Hakoda moved and he leaned forward with a dark expression.

“Is there a particular reason why you want to marry Katara right after you returned from the Earth Kingdom?” he asked suspiciously, “After all, you never made it known you had any interest in her before. Why the rush?”

Zuko resisted the urge to narrow his eyes.
“No,” he responded firmly, “I respect Katara and her traditions.”

Sokka relaxed against his chair. He knew Zuko had too much honor to seduce Katara. But why did he want to marry her?

“I wanted to marry Katara a long time ago,” Zuko continued as if he could read their thoughts, “But I never acted upon my wishes because both of us were in relationships and I didn’t think I had a chance with her.”

Hakoda gave another nod as he said, “I understand.”

There was silence again before Sokka decided to speak up.

“Katara isn’t royalty or wealthy, she isn’t from the Fire Nation, nor knowledgeable about being a Fire Lady,” the younger man began before he continued with a curious frown, “So why do you wanna marry my sister?”

“I’m aware of all of that,” Zuko replied with a frown, “but I still want to marry her.”

“Is it to bring an alliance between the Southern Water Tribe and the Fire Nation?” Hakoda spoke with another frown. “It seemed that was what you were doing when you were in the Southern Water Tribe for Sokka and Suki’s wedding. If that’s why you want Katara, then you can just forget it. I am not about to sacrifice my daughter’s happiness to ensure peace between our countries.”

Zuko resisted the urge to scowl at the older man for thinking he would be so callous to Katara’s feelings in order to help his nation. Instead, he frowned deeply.

“That’s not the reason why I was in the Southern Water Tribe,” he said in a serious tone, “I wanted to ensure an alliance, a friendship, with both tribes in order to make it easier to marry Katara.”

“I see, but I still want to know why you want to marry her,” the southern chieftain insisted as he crossed his arms over his chest.

“She’s a beautiful woman, both on the inside and physically,” Zuko responded sincerely. “She would help me greatly in my rule. She understands me and makes me happy—"

“So you want her just so she could make you happy?” Hakoda interrupted gruffly.

Zuko’s jaw clenched and he balled his hands into fists in order to suppress his raising temper since it seemed Hakoda kept thinking the worst of him. He ordered himself to calm down so he could respond without growling.

“I am also looking out for Katara’s happiness,” he replied firmly, “When we marry, I will make sure to provide for her, give her whatever she needs and wants, and protect her and any children we have with everything I am.”

Both Water Tribe warriors did not miss that Zuko had said ‘when’ and not ‘if’ and Hakoda had to admire his confidence and determination. Sokka was still reeling at the turn of events, but he knew Zuko would not just marry Katara out of a whim and he was sure Zuko cared about her. He would not mind having Zuko as his brother-in-law, but it was up to his father to have the final say.

Hakoda’s resolve that Zuko would make Katara a fine husband seemed to become more firm, especially now that he was aware that any children Katara bore would be cared for as well. However, until the young man told him what he really wanted to know would he give his consent. Leaning back in the chair, the blue-eyed chief regarded Zuko silently for a moment before he spoke.

“Katara does not need any luxury to be happy and she could be provided for and protected at home just like any man could do, including Aang.”

Hakoda watched as the young firebender clenched his jaw and his golden eyes flashed before he calmed himself and took a deep breath.

“What can you give her that no other man can?” Hakoda again asked, “Why should I allow you to marry her?”

Without showing any reaction, Hakoda felt his son kick his foot when Zuko again clenched his hands. He knew he was tampering with the Fire Lord’s short temper, but Hakoda was determined to find out the answer he wanted to know.

It was then that Zuko realized that Hakoda was trying to make him confess his feelings for Katara.
He stopped himself from shifting uncomfortably in his seat for it would not do for the Fire Lord to show his uneasiness. It was one thing to say what he felt to Katara and admit it to his uncle and mother, but it was another thing to admit his feelings to another person. Could they not see his deep feelings for her through his actions? Must he say it out loud? Apparently Hakoda would not be satisfied until he heard the words coming from his mouth. But if he wanted Hakoda to accept his marriage to Katara, then he would have to lower his defenses.

Staring Hakoda straight in the eye, Zuko finally responded.

“Because I love her.”

Both father’s and son’s blue eyes widened in surprise before they composed themselves.

“Really?” Sokka asked.

“I would not lie about something like this,” Zuko firmly replied as he stared at both men sitting before him with determined eyes, “I’ve been in love with Katara for a long time now, but I already explained why I didn’t pursue her.”

Hakoda inclined his head again to acknowledge his last words.

“Is that why the rebels lured Katara into the colony, too?” Sokka spoke up with a frown.

Zuko stiffened slightly before he gave a curt nod.

“Someone found out about my affections for her, and because of it, she was also captured in order to keep me compliant until their demands were met,” the Fire Lord admitted grimly.

He wondered if this would cause Hakoda to deny his wish to marry Katara, but he knew that he needed to be truthful. He was surprised, however, when Hakoda smiled at him.

“You kept her from harm and even allowed them to hurt you so you could keep her safe,” the chief said.
Zuko relaxed a bit, but he stiffened again when Hakoda’s expression turned serious and dark once again.

“Howver, how will we know that the same thing won’t happen again during her marriage to you...if you get married?” Hakoda added.

Zuko’s hands again clenched into fists, but he ordered himself to calm down since he understood that Hakoda was just concerned and wanted guarantees that his daughter will be safe.

“I have taken measures for Katara, as well as my mother, to be protected at all times by people that I trust,” he began in a strong tone. “I also have people searching for the traitor and the rebels. I will not allow anyone to harm Katara. She means everything to me.”

Sokka listened silently as his father and his friend talked and he found himself believing everything Zuko had said. Sure, he once had hated the Fire Prince when he had invaded their home and continued to chase after them, but once Zuko had joined their group and helped defeat the former Fire Lord, Sokka had accepted that Zuko was not such a bad guy. And as the years passed by, Sokka came to see him as one of his best friends. He knew Zuko was an honorable man and if he said he would do anything to keep Katara safe, Sokka knew he would. He was still surprised to know his sister and Zuko loved each other, but once he began to remember all those little moments between them, such as when Zuko had taken Katara to avenge their mother or the tea incident in Ba Sing Se from a few months ago, Sokka wondered how he could not have seen it coming. Glancing at his silent father, Sokka waited to see what his answer would be.

Hakoda remembered all those subtle looks Zuko had thrown Katara back in the Southern Water Tribe last winter, the softer way Zuko would speak to her and act around her, and he wondered how he did not realize it sooner even after Kanna had hinted at it. He then remembered that Zuko had protected Katara while they had been captured and he had again protected her during the fight with Aang, shielding her with his own body.

“You are mine to protect” were the words Zuko had told Katara, and Hakoda knew that the young Fire Lord would give up his own life for her if it came to that. Not that he wanted Zuko dead, but it was a comforting thought to know his daughter would always be protected.

Staring into the sincere and unwavering golden eyes of the young Fire Lord, the Southern Water Tribe Chief felt himself relax with relief at the knowledge that his daughter will be taken care of, but most of all she would be cherished and loved.
“I can see that you are sincere and I can see that you indeed love Katara,” Hakoda finally spoke up. “You will make a good husband for her.”

He suppressed a smirk when the Fire Lord’s impassive face lightened up in hope.

“If it means Katara’s happiness, then I give you my consent for you to marry my daughter,” Hakoda told him with a firm nod.

Zuko had to stop himself from grinning like a fool at the thought that now nothing was standing in his way in taking Katara as his wife.

“Thank you, Chief Hakoda,” Zuko said with a grateful bow of his head. He looked up at Sokka when the younger man cleared his throat.

“I also agree that you’ll make Katara happy, but…” he trailed off and narrowed his blue eyes on Zuko as he stroked the boomerang that was strapped to his hip, “if I find out you’re making my little sister unhappy, I’ll immediately sail to the Fire Nation to give you a good beating.”

This time Zuko was unable to stop himself from rolling his eyes just as Hakoda nodded his head in agreement to his son’s statement. Seriously, did they not have faith in him to make Katara happy?

“That won’t be necessary. I plan on doing everything I can to make her happy,” Zuko told them seriously.

Both blue-eyed men nodded, satisfied.

“When will the wedding take place?” Hakoda decided to ask now that he had given his consent.

“I would like it to be as soon as possible, but first I must let my advisors know I intend to marry Katara and then I have to present her to my Royal Court,” Zuko began as he relaxed slightly back into his chair. “Then we have to see what day the Fire Sages believe the right date would be for the wedding to take place.”

“Hopefully that will give us enough time to gather Katara’s dowry,” Hakoda said as he stroked his
“I don’t need to be given a dowry,” Zuko told him with a frown.

“But you will get it, nevertheless,” the tribal chief insisted firmly.

Zuko’s frown deepened. He did not want Katara’s dowry, he just wanted her. She was all he needed and wanted. He opened his mouth to refuse again, but he was cut off when Sokka shook his head at him.

“It’ll look like an insult if you refuse the dowry,” Sokka explained. “It’ll seem like you found Katara’s dowry lacking, which will then look like she’s lacking in something, too.”

“Alright,” Zuko immediately conceded. He will not do anything that would harm his waterbender.

“We will discuss the details of the wedding and the conditions of the marriage later,” Hakoda spoke up with a satisfied nod.

“Don’t forget it’s a new tradition in the tribes that the bridegroom gives his bride a betrothal necklace. It would be something that Katara would like,” Sokka said before he added with a proud smirk, “I made Suki’s.”

“I already have one engagement article to give her,” Zuko began as he reached into his pocket and pulled it out to show them, “It is tradition among the Fire Nation nobility to give it to the brides.”

“It is very beautiful,” Hakoda said as he studied the trinket, “I’m sure Katara will like it.”

Zuko replaced it into his robes with a pleased smile before he cleared his throat.

“About the betrothal necklace…since I have no idea how to go about carving a necklace, I was wondering if it’s alright that I design the pendant but have a professional make it. I want Katara to have the best.”
The tribesmen frowned as they looked at one another in deep thought before they turned to look at the silent firebender. Hakoda rubbed his chin as he thought.

“You see, I already had it made,” Zuko added as he reached into his robe and pulled out the necklace before placing it across his hand to show it to them.

They leaned forward to see it better and their eyes widened in amazement as they gazed upon it.

“Well, I have to say that is a very excellent piece of craftsmanship,” Hakoda remarked with an approving nod. “Not to mention it is a very clever way to combine symbols of both countries.”

“Yeah,” Sokka agreed enthusiastically as he admired the carving a moment longer before he looked up at Zuko, “and you designed it?”

“Yes,” Zuko responded proudly as he once again replaced the necklace into his robe.

“Since you are not used to such a tradition, I do not see why not as long as Katara is proposed to with her own betrothal necklace,” Hakoda relented.

“Thank you,” Zuko said as he gave out a mental sigh of relief.

The chief nodded before he gave Zuko a large grin as he said, “I’m sure Katara must be anxious to know what I have decided. I wonder how she’ll react to the necklace.”

He chuckled when Zuko immediately stood up. The two tribesmen stood up with another series of chuckles that made the Fire Lord give them a small glare.

“I will go to her immediately,” Zuko said.

“But I expect her to be in her room early,” Hakoda spoke up with a serious expression.

“Of course,” the golden-eyed lord responded smoothly.
Even though what he really wanted to do was to celebrate with Katara in a very pleasing manner, Zuko decided not to tempt the fates and have Hakoda retract his consent if he were to somehow find out that Zuko had been unable to completely keep his hands away from Katara.

Zuko almost shuddered at the thought.

With another threat about having Katara in her room early, Hakoda and Sokka opened the door and closed it quietly behind them. As soon as they left the room, Zuko slumped back down onto his seat and exhaled deeply. Well, that was not as bad has he had thought it would be.

A smile spread on his lips at the thought that he was now able to marry his waterbender. Standing up quickly from his chair, Zuko left his study and walked swiftly down the corridor toward his private garden where he had told his mother to tell Katara to wait for him.

He could not wait to give her the news.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Standing beneath the cherry blossom tree, Katara chewed on her bottom lip as she anxiously waited for news. Would she be receiving joyful congratulations or would she be saying goodbye to her family forever? Shaking the last thought from her mind, the waterbender looked around the destroyed garden and sighed sadly. The turtle-ducks were nowhere to be found and she hoped they had found a temporary shelter somewhere. Fortunately, the cherry blossom tree had been spared from the Avatar and Fire Lord’s wrath.

She chewed on her lip more insistently as she again wondered what her father, brother, and Zuko were talking about. As soon as her father and Sokka left to meet with Zuko, Lady Ursa and Jiao had hurried her to her room so she could take a quick bath to get rid of the dirt that clung to her. Then she was given a beautiful silver dress to wear after Jiao had brushed her hair until it shone, before she was rushed back to the garden where Ursa had told her to wait for Zuko. She hoped all this dressing up was worth it. A long time had passed since they had left and she hoped her father had accepted Zuko’s request because she did not want to choose between Zuko and her family.

“Katara,” she heard a rich, baritone voice call her name softly and she gasped as her heart skipped a beat at the familiar timbre.

Looking up at him as he approached her, Katara waited until he was standing before her.
“Zuko,” she said his name softly before she hesitantly asked, “What did my father say?”

She became alarmed at his blank expression and she felt her heart sink.

Oh, no! This can’t be happening! she cried out in her head.

But before her anxiety rose higher, Zuko broke into a large smile and he gave her a nod. A small gasp escaped her and then, with an exultant cry, Katara threw herself at him. Zuko immediately caught her in his arms with a happy chuckle as he brought her close to him. Their lips met instantly and they kissed each other with both relief and happiness. They pulled away and Katara rested her head against his chest as he placed his chin on the top of her head. They remained that way in silence for a moment, each reveling in the good turn of events.

Finally, Katara pulled away and Zuko watched as she gathered water from her waterskin and onto her hand. It glowed around her slim hand and Zuko silently allowed her to heal the bruises and cuts on his face since he knew that she would not stop worrying until she had healed him. He sighed at the cool and tickling contact. As soon as she finished, Katara replaced the water into her waterskin before she smiled at him as she snuggled into his chest again.

“Thank you,” he said as he gave her a squeeze.

“You’re welcome,” she responded as she leaned back to smile warmly at him.

Katara again placed her head on Zuko’s chest while he wound his arms around her, but she frowned when she again noticed the damaged garden.

“The garden is destroyed,” she said sadly.

“I’ll order for it to be restored. Don’t worry, love,” Zuko responded and squeezed her gently.

Raising her head, Katara smiled at him before she licked her lips nervously as she carefully said, “I’m…I’m worried about Aang and what he might do.”

Zuko was silent for a short moment as the jealousy once again tried to surface within him before he... firmly pushed it down. Katara was his, he was now able to marry her, and he did not need to fear that she would leave him for Aang. And he had to admit he was also a bit worried about the airbender since he had looked terrible when he left.

“As long as Toph’s with him, he’ll be fine,” he finally responded.

Katara relaxed against him when she realized he had not gotten angry with her for her concern. She did not want to make him jealous, she was just worried for her friend—their friend.

“Do you think Aang will forgive us someday?” she asked quietly.

“Aang is hurt and angry at the moment, but he’s not one to hold a grudge for long,” was his reply.

Katara nodded against his chest. She hoped he was right.

She looked up when Zuko pulled slightly away and she raised a curious eyebrow when he grabbed her hand, turned around, and silently led her away from the cherry blossom tree, the destroyed garden, and into the golden corridors of the palace.

“Where are we going?” she asked curiously.

“You’ll see,” was his mysterious reply as he glanced down to smirk at her before he tugged on her hand so she could continue to walk beside him.

They were heading toward the west wing and she felt a bit of disappointment at the thought that he was escorting her to her room, since she had wanted to talk to him about what her father had said and celebrate in some small way for their success. She was confused when they passed her room and headed toward the royal wing, and she raised an eyebrow when they turned right and headed toward the Fire Lord’s royal bedchambers. Soon they were at the entrance of the anteroom, and Katara blushed when Shen and Kuo tried to suppress their smiles as one of them opened the door for their lord and the waterbender.

With another glance at his betrothed, Zuko brought her to his side as he stepped into the anteroom before Shen closed the door behind them.
Katara gasped in amazement as she took in the sight. There were candles everywhere! On the low table were two sets of plates, a pitcher of wine, two golden candlesticks with long glowing candles, and in the center was a vase filled with fresh flowers.

“Oh, Zuko! It’s wonderful!” she exclaimed as she turned to smile at him.

“Well, to tell you the truth, I only planned to have a small meal for the two of us since we missed dinner,” Zuko muttered as he sheepishly rubbed the back of his neck before he cleared his throat, “It looks like my mother and Uncle outdid themselves again with the candles and the flowers.”

“Well, it’s still wonderful,” Katara told him with another smile as she reached up to kiss his cheek.

Zuko smiled as he again grabbed her hand and led her to one of the cushions at the table before he took a seat beside her. They spent a few minutes eating their delicious meal and drinking wine as each recounted what had happened with their talks with Hakoda. Katara had to stop herself from laughing at Zuko’s scowl when he mentioned that her father threatened him if he did not return her to her room early. Then they finally turned their conversation to their future and what could be expected of their marriage.

The candles, the flowers, the food, the wine, Zuko’s presence, his warm gaze, and his velvety voice, as well as the thought that her father had accepted their marriage, made the waterbender feel like this was one of the best nights of her life.

Katara had just finished taking another sip of the cool wine when she felt Zuko grab her hand as he stood up. Placing the cup down, Katara stood up as well and she raised her eyebrow again when he led her to the center of the candle-lit room before he turned around so that they were facing each other. She watched curiously as he swallowed nervously before he straightened himself out, his features shifting into his trademark cool expression, as he gazed steadily into her eyes.

“I know the first time I asked you this it wasn’t at the best time, or at the best place, or in the right way…” Zuko began before he gave a small shrug as he added, “And I still don’t have a flowery speech, but I wanted to make it at least a bit more memorable for you.”

Katara’s eyes widened as he grabbed both her hands and brought them to his lips where he touched them softly before he lowered them as his golden eyes again stared intensely into her blue orbs.

“I love you, Katara, and it will be my great honor if you agreed to become my wife,” he said
sincerely before he asked her softly, “Will you marry me?”

He was doing all of this for her? Katara felt overjoyed tears gather in her eyes at his sweet gesture but she forced them back since she did not want to ruin the moment with her tears. Instead, she gave him a large, elated smile as she jumped up and wound her arms around his neck.

“Yes!” she exclaimed as she kissed him before she repeated the word a few more times, each time more softly, as she placed another swift kiss on his lips at the end of each word.

Zuko gently grabbed her chin to stop her before he kissed her mouth properly as his other arm tightened around her. He felt just as ecstatic, if not more so, from the first time he had heard her accept his proposal, but this time he finally had something—two to be more precise—that would show her his commitment. Pulling apart from their kiss, they breathed deeply as they embraced each other for a moment before Zuko leaned down to whisper in her ear.

“Do you remember when I said that I would one day tell you what the engagement tradition for the Fire Nation nobility is?” he asked.

“Yeah,” Katara responded with a nod as she tried to calm her racing heart.

She felt him pull away from her and she looked at him with a confused frown when he reached into his robe. She watched curiously as he took her left hand and slipped a thin gold ring onto her third finger. Katara stared at the beautiful ring in surprise as she noticed the elegant engravings on its smooth surface before she looked up at Zuko—who was staring at her with glowing amber eyes—with a confused expression on her face.

“I ordered it made as soon as we arrived in the Fire Nation,” he said with a small smile.

Lifting her hand to his lips, he kissed the gold metal before he continued.

“This ring symbolizes that you are spoken for, that you are an engaged woman now, and once we marry it will symbolized that you are a married woman,” he began before he pointed to one particular design that was craved on the surface. It looked like a dragon coiled around itself. “Once they see this symbol, my Royal Court will know that I have chosen you as my wife.”

Katara smiled joyfully as she brought her hand to her chest and caressed the cool ring before she lifted herself on her toes to peck his lips. When she pulled away, she smiled brightly at the warmth and satisfaction in his golden eyes.

“It’s lovely,” she told him.

“There’s still one more thing that I want to give you,” he told her with a smile before he added, “I had the idea for the design of the pendant ever since you agreed to marry me the first time.”

Reaching into his robe again, he grasped the necklace and pulled it out. Grabbing her hand, he gently placed the trinket on her palm as he watched anxiously for her reaction. Would she like it?

Katara gasped softly as she stared wide-eyed at the piece of jewelry that she was holding in her hand.

It was a choker—much like the one she had on—made of a black silky cloth and with a round pendant hanging from the center. The charm was made of a black onyx stone, but what had her speechless in astonishment was the design of the engravings on its smooth surface. On the right side, filled with gold ink, was a carving of a form of a magnificent dragon curled on its side, and on the left side was a graceful koi fish curved on the surface of the dark stone etched in silver. The tip of their tails touched the other’s head where she could see that both creatures had a small gem as an eye—a blue sapphire for the dragon and a red ruby for the koi fish. The way they curled around each other reminded her of the yin and yang symbol and she smiled.

It was just like them. Red and blue. Gold and silver. Fire and water. Fire Nation and Southern Water Tribe. Male and female.

Zuko and Katara.

“Oh, Zuko, it’s beautiful,” she breathed in awe as she looked up to give him a watery smile.

“So… you like it?” he asked her hopefully.

“I love it,” she responded genuinely, happily. “Thank you, so much.”

“I wanted to give you something that described us,” Zuko said softly, “I’m glad you approve of it.”
He smiled at her, pleased at her obvious delight, and he touched her cheek, marveling at how content he felt at her happiness, something he had never experienced with anyone before and probably never would.

He reached down to take the necklace from her hand and he gently led her to a mirror that hung on one wall of the room. He placed her in front of it as he moved behind her. He caressed her neck for a few seconds before he slowly unclasped her mother’s necklace. Katara touched her bare skin before she moved her hand away when Zuko brought the betrothal necklace he had given her to her throat. Katara moved her hair out of the way and she watched with a smile as he placed it against her throat. Once he had fastened it, he pressed her mother’s necklace into her hand before he moved her hair so that it fell down her back again. He placed his hands on her shoulders, and tugging the edge of her dress slightly down, he leaned down to place a kiss on the love-bite on her skin and then on the black lace of her necklace before he kissed her cheek.

“You look beautiful,” he whispered into her ear as he looked at her through their reflections.

Katara touched the new necklace that now adorned her neck as she smiled at him before she glanced down to look at her mother’s necklace. She had worn it for many years in order to keep the memory of her mother alive, but now she knew that her mother will always live in the hearts of her loved ones.

Raising her head to look at Zuko, who was regarding her silently with simmering golden eyes, Katara smiled as she clasped the new pendant gently. Now she had a betrothal necklace of her own, she had a man who loved her immensely, and they had a future ahead of them. And although she knew it would not always be easy, she knew they would try their hardest to be happy.

“I will wear it proudly,” she told him softly.

“I know you will,” Zuko responded.

He turned her around so they could face each other and he ran his thumb on the engraved pendant before he leaned down to kiss her plump lips again. She sighed softly against his mouth, and with a groan at the feeling and taste of her, Zuko reluctantly pulled away before he carried her to the bedchamber so he could show her his pleasure in her acceptance in a more personal manner. That would surely anger the Southern Water Tribe Chief, if he were to find out.

“After I introduce you as my intended bride to my Royal Court, we must visit the fire sages to see when the best day for our wedding would be,” he explained as his eyes softened.

Katara nodded even though she felt anxiety swell within her again at the thought of what Zuko’s courtiers would think of her, but she pushed it aside as she smiled at her betrothed.

“I can’t wait,” she told him sincerely.

She gasped when Zuko wrapped his arms around her and brought her flush against him as he smirked at her.

“Neither can I,” he said huskily as his eyes darted toward the doors that led to his bedroom before he looked at her again. He smiled when she blushed.

Leaning down, Zuko captured her lips and they both groaned when their tongues met as they opened their mouths while their hands gently roamed the other’s body. It was a few minutes later when they finally pulled away from each other to gather some air and regain their control.

Katara resisted the urge to laugh when Zuko groaned as he muttered that it was her father and Sokka’s fault he had to behave himself.

With a soft sigh, Katara rested her head against his chest as she stroked the stone on her new necklace a few times before she brought her left hand to her face so she could gaze at the beautiful ring on her finger. It seemed to shine at her with the light of the many candles. She felt her heart swell with happiness at the thought that she would soon marry Zuko, that she will soon become his wife and he her husband.

Zuko smiled as he watched his future bride admiring and lovingly stroking the ring he had given her before he tilted her chin up with his fingers and kissed her lips softly before pulling away.

“I should return you to your room before both your father and brother come upon me to avenge your honor,” he said with a serious expression, though there was amusement in his amber orbs.

Katara giggled this time as she took his offered arm and allowed him to lead her toward the doors. She bid the two guards good night and they responded with small smiles as they watched their lord reluctantly walking her to her room. Once the couple disappeared around the corner, the guards turned to look at each other. Shen’s lips lifted in a small smirk and Kuo chuckled quietly since they had noticed the new necklace on the waterbender’s neck and the golden ring on her finger. But just as quickly, they sobered up and resumed their positions.

As they neared her room, the blue-eyed waterbender leaned her head against her firebender’s shoulder.

“Thank you, Zuko,” Katara told him with a happy sigh, “This night was so wonderful.”

“You’re welcome,” he responded with a smile as he gave her waist a squeeze as they stopped at her door.

Looking around them in order to make sure no overprotective fathers or brothers were lurking around, Zuko again brought Katara to him and kissed her deeply before pulling away. He smirked at her dazed look.

“But I promise that I’ll give you even more wonderful nights after we marry,” he promised her in a husky tone as he brushed his hands against her rear before he grabbed her hips and pulled her tightly to him.

The blush surfaced once again on Katara’s cheeks as she felt a tingle in her core and anticipation flutter in her stomach before a tiny smile touched her lips as she gazed at him beneath her lashes.

“Really?” she asked coquettishly, “I’m curious to know what we will be doing on these wonderful nights.”

“Don’t tempt me, love,” Zuko told her with a groan.

Katara bit her lip to stop herself from giggling when she felt the evidence of his arousal against her stomach. She was glad to know she was not the only one to be affected. With a smile, she reached up to kiss him softly on his lips before she whispered against them as he held her to him.

“Soon,” she said.

“I can’t wait,” he responded just as softly as he kissed her. Then he moved to huskily whisper in her ear, “I’ll see you later tonight in your room.”

“Zuko,” she breathed both uncertainly and excitedly.

“I promise I’ll be careful,” he told her as he nibbled at her ear, causing her to moan softly.

“Then I’ll be waiting,” she responded softly.

Zuko groaned and he again kissed her mouth deeply before pulling away to smile at her as he gave her waist a gentle squeeze.

They had passed two obstacles this day. Now they had a few more before they could finally be happy together.
“What a beautiful ring,” Suki gushed as she admired the golden ring on her sister-in-law’s finger.

Katara retracted her hand and placed it against her chest as she stroked one of the engagement trinkets Zuko had given her. Right at that moment Zuko was talking to his royal advisors about his engagement to her. She was so nervous about what they might say, but she could not stop feeling happy.

“Isn’t it?” Katara replied to Suki with a pleased sigh.

The waterbender was sitting at the low table in the library with Gran-Gran, Suki, and Lady Ursa. As they waited for Madam Fang Hua to arrive for Katara’s lessons, the women exclaimed over the engagement items Zuko had given her the previous night. As soon as they noticed Katara wearing them, her grandmother and sister-in-law had rushed forward to congratulate her before they demanded she tell them how Zuko had proposed. Katara had enthusiastically recounted to them how romantic and sweet his proposal had been before she made them swear they wouldn’t tell anyone in order not to embarrass him. He hated showing his soft side to anyone but her.

“Do all Fire Nation women receive a ring when proposed to?” Kanna asked curiously as she turned toward the Fire Lord’s mother, who was lightly tickling the twins.

Ursa patted the little girls’ heads before she looked up to answer the gray-haired tribeswoman.

“No, only the women from nobility,” Ursa explained with a small smile.

“But why a ring?” Suki asked as she carefully watched her daughters, who had begun to crawl away from the table.

“Since noblewomen tend to wear many pieces of jewelry, a ring placed specifically on the fourth finger of the left hand makes it known to all that she is spoken for,” Ursa replied with a patient smile.

“Just like everywhere else, it’s the woman who has to wear something to show she belongs to a man,” the auburn-haired warrior muttered as she crossed her arms.
Katara frowned at Suki’s words before she gave a nod of agreement. Lady Ursa and Kanna glanced at each other and smiled ruefully at the younger women’s thoughts. It was just the way their world worked.

“You know,” Lady Ursa began as she smiled gently at Suki before she turned to Katara, “many years ago, before marriages among the nobility were for convenience like they are now, there used to be another reason behind the ring.”

“Really? What was it?” Katara asked curiously.

“It was thought that a large vein connected the fourth finger on the left hand to the heart,” Ursa explained with a wistful expression, “So the man would place the ring on his intended’s finger to symbolize he would forever be connected to her heart.”

“Aww, how romantic,” Suki breathed before she was distracted when her daughters began to crawl further away from them. She stood up to retrieve them and then placed the two giggling girls next to her again.

Katara looked down at the golden ring on her finger in a new light and she smiled happily as she again stroked the cool metal. She was positive Zuko had given her the ring to forever remind her that their hearts were linked. Although he had a hard time showing it, Zuko really was sweet—at least when it came to her.

“That is a very beautiful thought,” Kanna spoke up as she smiled at her granddaughter before she turned to Ursa. “Were you given a ring when Oza—?” she cut herself off and her eyes widened in mortification of what she had brought up.

Ursa looked down for a moment before she returned her gaze to the old woman, who was looking at her guiltily. The golden-eyed princess smiled softly to show she was not upset.

“Yes, he gave me a ring when he proposed to me,” she began quietly, unable to even say his name. “I was young and thought myself to be in love, and I thought he had given it to me to show his love and devotion…But I was wrong. He only saw me as a prize and wanted everybody to know it.”

A frown settled on her delicate brow as her gaze took on a faraway look.
“But when he banished me, he completely destroyed our already fragile marriage bond. So when I ran out of money, I sold the ring. It was either keep it as a reminder of my unhappy marriage or sell it to survive. Besides, I refused to be reminded of the fact that I once belonged to such a man,” she said, her usual serene voice turning dark as she rubbed the now bare finger on her left hand.

She paused and smiled apologetically at the other silent women.

“Please excuse me. I didn’t mean to ruin the mood with my sad tales.”

“There’s no need for you to apologize,” Kanna spoke with a kind smile.

“Yeah,” Katara added, “He didn’t deserve you and you didn’t deserve to go through all that.”

“Perhaps,” Ursa consented before she gave a genuine smile. “At least something good came out of such a broken marriage. My children…” She paused and her smile turned a little sad. “Well, at least, Zuko did.”

The other women knew she was thinking of how badly Azula turned out and they did not say anything. Kanna cleared her throat and clapped her hands heartily, the sound seeming to push away the melancholic air that had suddenly settled over them.

“The ring is lovely, but I think the betrothal necklace is simply beautiful!” the old woman exclaimed before she frowned, “Though I still think the young Fire Lord should have made it himself.”

Katara clutched the onyx pendant protectively as if to shield it from the old woman’s disapproving statement and she frowned deeply at her grandmother.

“Zuko can’t be expected to do something that he’s not used to and is not his tradition. At least he gave me a betrothal necklace,” she defended her future husband. “Besides, he doesn’t have time to be learning how to make a necklace.”

“Hm, well, that is true,” Kanna conceded.

“And he was the one who designed the symbols and chose the materials,” Katara added with a proud
“And it came out amazing!” Suki exclaimed. She touched her own necklace and smiled. It was simple, but she loved it because Sokka had made it for her.

The women again began to talk about how unique and beautiful Katara’s necklace was, and how surprising it was to find out Zuko had a romantic side to him—albeit a small one. They were interrupted from their lively chatter by a knock at the door. They looked up as the door opened and Madam Fang Hua stepped into the library with Jiao and another servant trailing after her with trays full of refreshments. Another servant followed them with arms full with scrolls and papers.

The tiny, old woman quickly made her way to the low table, but then she froze in her spot, almost causing the servants to crash into her. Then the old noblewoman began to exclaim over the two engagement trinkets and how it was about time her lord found a wife.

Katara smiled smugly at the thought that she was one of a few women, if not the only one, who was the proud recipient of not one, but two engagement items. And from the Fire Lord no less.

“Enough stalling. We need to continue your lessons,” the tiny noblewoman spoke sternly a moment later, effectively making Katara’s smile vanish from her face.

“Yes, Madam Fang Hua,” Katara managed to say without a tired groan.

When the old woman ruffled through the many piles of scrolls on the low table, the waterbender scowled at Suki and her grandmother when they coughed to hide their amusement.

“Now,” Madam Fang Hua began as she looked up with a small smile, “we have covered the most basic traditions and responsibilities you will need to follow, but now we will discuss the most important duty you will have as Fire Lady.”

“Alright,” Katara said with a pensive expression.

_I wonder what duty is that_, she mentally mused as she took a sip of tea.
“You must bear Fire Lord Zuko an heir as soon as possible,” Madam Fang Hua stated bluntly.

Katara choked on the tea and then coughed loudly as the hot liquid burned down her throat. Her grandmother patted her back with an amused smile on her wrinkled face, while Lady Ursa pressed her lips to keep from smiling and Suki openly grinned at her sister-in-law.

Clearing her throat in a more delicate manner, Katara raised her head to stare at the unperturbed old noblewoman with a dark blush on her cheeks.

“Oh…why as soon as possible?” she finally managed to ask.

“Fire Lord Zuko is already three years past from when he was supposed to sire an heir,” the tiny woman explained as she calmly sipped her tea before she placed the teacup on the table with a small frown, “Although times are better than they were four years ago, one never knows if something fatal could befall the Fire Lord. I know it may sound cruel, but we need the royal bloodline to continue.”

Katara nodded in understanding, although she vowed to herself that she would do everything possible so Zuko may live a long life with her, and then their child would be ready to take the throne. However, she was not sure if she was ready to be a mother yet. But then again, she was well past the year she was supposed to marry by her tribe’s standards. Women usually wedded at sixteen and were mothers soon after. Some would say it was about time she got married and started a family, but did Zuko and she really need to start having babies so soon?

Yet, she could not deny the warmth that went through her at the thought of having Zuko’s children.

“But of course conception may take a while,” Madam Fang Hua continued in a lighter tone as her thin lips curled into an impish grin, “So that means there will have to be many tries before the Fire Lord can impregnate you.” She chuckled.

Katara’s mouth flew open and she was sure her entire face was glowing red as all the women laughed. She would never have thought the stern noblewoman would say such a thing.

But the thought of those ‘many tries’ made Katara grin inwardly.

The royal advisors talked quietly amongst themselves as they wondered where Advisor Kang could be, since he had again missed a meeting. However, their musings soon turned toward the Fire Lord who was just finishing talking to one of the governors from a small northern island. They were curious to know why they had been summoned so early in the morning, but not as curious as to know why Chief Hakoda, Master Pakku, and Master Sokka were in the throne room as well. The three tribesmen were sitting on cushions across from them, their arms crossed over their chests, and their blue eyes piercing as they silently stared at the old advisors. They almost let out a simultaneous sighs of relief when their lord finally concluded his meeting with the governor and the Water Tribe warriors’ attention shifted to the Fire Lord.

Sitting among them, Chao resisted the urge to grin at his fellow advisors for their behavior as he waited for his lord to speak. The Fire Lord had confided in him that he was finally going to be able to marry Lady Katara, and Chao had agreed immediately to help his lord sway the advisors’ minds in his favor. He caught Iroh’s eye, who was sitting beside the tribesmen, and he smiled and nodded when the retired general winked at him.

As soon as the door was closed behind the governor, Zuko briefly glanced at Hakoda, Sokka, and Pakku before his eyes landed on his advisors.

“I have received consent from the father of the woman I want to marry,” Zuko spoke up without stalling.

The old men looked around each other curiously and enviously as they tried to figure out if there was anyone among them that had gained their lord’s favor, before they returned their attention to the figure sitting behind the wall of fire.

“Who is the woman you have chosen to marry?” one of them finally asked.

“Lady Katara of the Southern Water Tribe,” Zuko responded coolly, although his heart was pounding wildly in his chest, “Chief Hakoda has agreed to allow me to marry his daughter.”

“What?” a few exclaimed in shock.

“But, my lord!” others cried out.

“Surely you jest,” one of them said.

The sound of two throats clearing rather loudly brought the old noblemen from their protests and their eyes darted toward the tribesmen whose arms were still crossed over their chests, their dark eyebrows raised high on their foreheads challengingly, their eyes hard. The advisors sat back in their spots and grumbled to themselves. It would be catastrophic if they were to begin protesting too much when the Southern Water Tribe members were present

“I am speaking the truth when I say that I have chosen Lady Katara to be my wife,” Zuko repeated impassively as he stared at his advisors levelly.

“By not picking a noblewoman from the Fire Nation, your own country and your own people, you are insulting us,” one of the oldest of the men spoke up.

“None of your female relatives or any other noblewoman has been able to catch my attention,” the young Fire Lord stated bluntly. “And besides, if I had chosen a woman from the nobility, the rest of you would have been insulted anyway.”

The men glanced at each other sheepishly before they grumbled lowly to themselves just as Chao tried to reason with them in a subtle way.

“But my lord,” another spoke up, “if you marry Lady Katara, the pure royal bloodline would cease to exist!”

The other advisors perked up at this and immediately began to agree and exclaim that they needed to preserve the royal bloodline, but they were cut off by a dark look from their lord.

“What matters is that any children Lady Katara bears me will have my blood,” Zuko stated firmly.

At this statement, the men quieted down again as they mused over the idea while they sneaked glances at the silent and intimidating tribesmen.

Expression impassive, Zuko was proud of himself for coming up with the idea of having Katara’s father, brother, and new grandfather attend this meeting with him since his advisors were not protesting as much as he knew they would have for fear of insulting the Southern Water Tribe Chief, his heir, who was a master swordsman, and the master waterbender.

“Chief Hakoda and I have agreed that with my marriage to Lady Katara there will be a peace treaty signed between our countries to ensure another war does not occur,” the Fire Lord continued, his
The advisors murmured amongst themselves for a long moment before they finally agreed that a peace treaty was a good idea. Iroh mentally congratulated his nephew.

“Are you sure you want to do this, Young One?” Wei’s voice interrupted the other men and everybody turned to look at the balding advisor who was looking at the Fire Lord with an indifferent expression. “You can still have a peace treaty, you don’t have to marry the woman. Having her as your royal concubine will serve the same purpose.”

Iroh grit his teeth, and Chao and the other advisors gasped just as the fire wall blazed and Hakoda, Sokka, and Pakku sprang to their feet in outrage, their azure eyes blazing in anger and indignity.

“Hell no!” Sokka snarled angrily as his hand immediately went to his hip to grasp his sword. To his regret, no weapons were allowed in the throne room, which perhaps was a good thing or else he would have killed the old bastard for the insult to his sister.

“My daughter will never be made a concubine!” Hakoda roared in outrage.

“Even for a peace treaty between our countries!” Pakku growled.

“Chief Hakoda, Master Sokka, Master Pakku,” Zuko spoke up in a stoic tone as he kept his dark gaze on the old advisor, “Would you please sit down?”

The three tribesmen remained standing as they fought to regain their control and rein in their anger before they slowly sat down next to an equally angry Iroh. However, they continued to glare murderously at Wei, who ignored them as he frowned at the Fire Lord.

Zuko had expected Wei to oppose his marriage to Katara, but he did not give a damn what the man thought, especially since he was still a suspect.

“I respect Lady Katara and I will never insult her, her family and her culture by making her my concubine,” Zuko stated definitely as he added, “I want her as my wife.”
“But why?” Wei asked as if he could not wrap it around his head why Zuko would want a woman from the water tribes.

“Why?” Zuko repeated as if the question was plain stupid before he said, “Why not? She helped save the world, she saved me when Azula attacked me, she helped me find my mother, and she was willing to help the colony when we were told it had been infected.”

He paused and a small smile tugged at his lips just as his amber eyes darkened a little.

“And she is also a very beautiful woman. Why wouldn’t I want her as my wife?” he asked.

The other men immediately agreed with nods and murmurs, but they stopped and pretended to find an interest in something else when Hakoda cleared his throat and glared at them. Zuko felt himself flush for admitting his attraction to Katara in front of her father before he composed himself. It would be stupid of Hakoda if he had not realized Zuko was physically attracted to his daughter. And it would be best the chief accepted it, for Zuko will have a hard time keeping his hands off Katara once they married. Not that he would be showing his desire for her in front of anybody.

“She’s an intelligent and strong woman with a caring heart,” he continued, “And I know that she will help me and the Fire Nation once she becomes my wife and Fire Lady.”

The advisors again murmured in agreement since they had also heard the common people speak highly of her and her kindness.

“But she has no knowledge of how to be a noblewoman, especially not a Fire Lady,” Wei spoke up with a sneer.

Zuko glared at him heatedly before he smirked.

“Lady Katara had been concerned of that as well and that is why she has insisted in taking lessons with Madam Fang Hua,” he told them. “Madam Fang Hua has expressed her approval on how well Lady Katara is doing in her lessons.” He was unable to keep the pride from reaching his voice.

Wei frowned and the other advisors exclaimed in surprise. They were pleased to know the waterbender was taking her duties seriously and they wondered if it would be that bad for their lord to marry her, especially if the respected Madam Fang Hua approved of her.
“We understand all of this, my lord,” one of the younger advisors spoke up, “But any other noblewoman could do the same.”

Zuko had to stop himself from snorting at the man’s words. All the women he had been forced to listen to as they invaded his home only wanted him for his power and wealth, and possibly his body as well.

“Why are you so adamant on marrying Lady Katara?” the man continued to ask.

Zuko balled his hands as he stopped himself from shifting uncomfortably on his throne. He already had to confess the real reason to Hakoda and Sokka and he refused to say it to his advisors.

“I… We… care for each other,” he said smoothly.

“More like they are deeply in love with each other,” Iroh piped in cheerfully.

Hakoda and Pakku suppressed their amused grins and Sokka outright guffawed at the deadly glare Zuko sent his witty uncle, who again was unaffected by his nephew’s dark look as he smiled at the shocked men.

The advisors looked at the silent Fire Lord with wide, unbelieving eyes and gaping mouths, but when he did not deny his uncle’s words, they composed themselves as they began to murmur amongst each other again. Now they understood why their Fire Lord and the waterbender spent so much time together.

After a few more attempts to change his mind, the men finally give up, after all, they really did not have any real reason to disapprove of Lady Katara except that she was from the Southern Water Tribe. Besides, they really did not want to incur their lord’s wrath if they denied his wish to marry the woman he had chosen.

“If it is what you wish and if you are positive she will fulfill her duties as Fire Lady, then we accept your marriage to Lady Katara of the Southern Water Tribe,” the oldest of them finally spoke up.

Zuko’s eyes widened slightly before he again resumed his impassive features. He was surprised since he had expected that they would have argued more insistently, but he supposed they were just relieved to know that he had finally decided to marry.

“Thank you,” he said sincerely.

After a few more minutes of discussing the peace treaty, they all agreed to converge again another day to go into more detail. Zuko heaved a mental sigh of relief as he left the room with the tribesmen, Iroh, and Chao following behind him.

“Congratulations,” Hakoda spoke up with grin as he gave the Fire Lord a clap on the back. “That went better than I expected.”

“Yes,” Zuko agreed with an incline of his head before a small smile tugged at his lips.

“Wow, now it feels more real that you’re gonna be my brother-in-law!” Sokka piped in with a dramatic gasp. “I’m gonna be related to Lord Jerkbender, here. Can you believe it?”

He grinned hugely when Zuko gave him a dark look. Chuckling, Sokka placed an arm around Zuko’s shoulders and squeezed.

“I know you must be glad to have the Mighty Warrior Sokka as your brother-in-law!” Sokka exclaimed cheerfully as he puffed out his chest. “Who wouldn’t? I am amazing, after all.”

Zuko shrugged the young warrior’s arm from his shoulders and gave him a blank stare.

“Maybe it’s a good thing you live in another country,” Zuko said coolly.

“Ouch. That hurt!” Sokka cried as he dramatically clutched his chest.

Zuko smirked and the other men laughed. Hakoda sighed at his son’s antics, though his lips twitched in amusement.

“I’m going to look for Katara in the library,” Zuko spoke up with a smile.
The smile dropped and he scowled when the men grinned at him and his uncle waggled his eyebrows. Without another word, the young Fire Lord turned around.

“Wait! I’m coming with you!” Sokka said as he quickly followed after the firebender. “I want to see Suki and my little girls.”

The older men watched them go with amused expressions on their faces.

“Ah, to be young and in love,” Iroh mused with a grin.

The others chuckled as they watched the Fire Lord and the Southern Water Tribe heir disappear around the corner before they agreed to play Pai Sho with the retired general.

Zuko had to stop himself from increasing his pace as he and Sokka neared the library where he knew Katara was once again taking her lessons with Madam Fang Hua and his mother. Sokka had been teasing him nonstop on their way to the library, but Zuko had learned to tune him out. Zuko raised a dark eyebrow when he spotted Jiao and Kuo talking quietly to each other beside the doors that led to the room before they stopped when they saw him approaching. Kuo straightened himself and resumed his alert position while Jiao blushed as she bowed to her lord before she hurried down the corridor in the opposite direction.

Zuko chose to ignore them as he knocked on the door once before he opened it and went inside. Sokka followed after him with a grin. Zuko found Katara surrounded by his mother, Kanna, Suki, and Madam Fang Hua, while the twins played near their mother’s feet. He was curious since it seemed the women had been arguing before they abruptly stopped when he and Sokka appeared.

“Uh oh,” Sokka whispered loudly to Zuko, “We must have intruded upon their girl talk.”

“What’s going on?” Zuko asked.

“What’s going on is that Madam Fang Hua and your mother are insisting that I get fitted for new clothes when I already have a lot with the ones Uncle Iroh had me buy last summer!” Katara exclaimed in one breath.
“Pfft! That’s it?” Sokka said carelessly as he waved his hand in the air.

He walked forward to kiss Suki on her forehead before he knelt on the ground to play with the twins. Katara turned to glare at her older brother before she turned back to Madam Fang Hua when she began to speak.

“The future Fire Lady must wear appropriate and formal attire deemed by her title and position,” the tiny old noblewoman insisted calmly.

“Well, we still don’t know if I’ll ever become Fire Lady,” Katara retorted stubbornly as she crossed her arms over her chest, “And I don’t need to be fitted for new clothes.”

“Madam Fang Hua,” Zuko spoke up coolly even though his eyes were locked on Katara’s, “Please have the royal seamstress meet with Lady Katara tomorrow.”

“I already said that…” the waterbender began before she trailed off with a gasp. Eyes wide and staring at Zuko, she asked, “Does that mean the Court Council agreed to our marriage?”

Zuko inclined his head and smiled at her.

“Your father, brother, and grandfather can be quiet intimidating,” he said with a small grin.

With a happy squeal, Katara jumped to her feet and race to her firebender before she lunged herself into his arms and began to rain kisses along his strong jaw. She heard him clear his throat and she immediately pulled away from him with an embarrassed blush staining her cheeks.

“Sorry,” she mumbled as she stared at his chest.

She felt him place a finger under her chin and she looked up when he gently nudged her to lift her head. He smiled down at her.

“You can show me how happy you are when we’re alone tonight,” he whispered so only she could hear.
Katara’s blush turned a darker hue as Zuko straightened and looked away to smile at the women who were congratulating them enthusiastically. Mentally shaking her head, Katara smiled in anticipation. Hooking her arm under his, Zuko led her toward the table where Katara again took a seat. Turning to his mother, Zuko smiled.

“Mother, I want Katara to be appropriately attired for when I officially announce her as my future wife,” he said.

“Of course, dear,” Ursa told him happily, “When would you like to have the engagement party?”

“In three days,” Zuko replied smoothly.

“In three days?!” the women exclaimed.

“Damn, you have it bad,” Sokka piped in amusedly as he allowed his daughters to crawl onto his lap.

Zuko pointedly ignored his future brother-in-law as he addressed the women.

“Yes,” Zuko said before he looked down at Katara with a frown, “I told you I was going to announce our engagement as soon as the Court Council agreed.”

“I know,” Katara responded with a smile, “I was just surprised, but I’m happy.”

She grinned at him brightly and Zuko relaxed as he returned her smile with a small one of his own.

“Then I will send the invitations for your engagement party immediately and have the seamstress look into fitting Katara for new clothes,” Lady Úrsa told them with a joyful smile.

Madam Fang Hua turned to Katara with a haughty expression.
“Do not argue with a wise old woman again, my dear,” she advised.

“I tell her that all the time,” Kanna spoke up, a teasing glint in her light blue eyes.

Zuko gave Katara a sympathetic look when she groaned as the women and Sokka laughed.

Sitting on a rock overlooking the ocean with knees clasped to his chest, Aang sighed sadly before he rubbed his neck to soothe the ache that had appeared there since that morning. After leaving the Fire Nation, he had had Appa fly nonstop until they landed on this small uninhabited island. Luckily, Toph had remained silent during the entire ride since he did not feel like talking. The feeling of betrayal, anger, and pain were still too real.

For the past few days he had vented his anger onto the small island, causing a lot of damage, before he felt guilty and began to fix what he had destroyed. But now that he had exhausted himself and had nothing to do, the pain returned, and with it, plaguing thoughts. He thought over what had happened during his confrontation with Zuko and he felt ashamed for almost hurting his friends, but could anyone really blame him for the way he had reacted?

Yet he had known for some time that Katara did not love him the way he loved her, but he had ignored it for fear of losing her. He had also known Zuko had feelings for her and that Katara had feelings for him, but he had also ignored that and preferred to think that Zuko just wanted to seduce her to hurt him. But why did they not tell him sooner and why did they let him continue to believe he had a chance with Katara? Why did she lead him on?

He clenched his hands tightly before he relaxed them and sighed.

No, she had not been leading him on. She had told him no when he proposed to her and broke up with him, but he had not accepted it. It was not Katara’s fault—not even Zuko’s—it was his own fault for not accepting the truth sooner and choosing to ignore it.

Momo chirped beside him and nuzzled his hand. Aang smiled sadly and scratched behind the small creature’s large ears before sighing as he wrapped his arms around his knees again.

Glancing at the sea once more, Aang watched as the golden sun touched the blue ocean as it began to set and he could not help but think of Zuko and Katara and how they had been kissing and embracing each other when he had caught them in his search for her. Wincing, he looked away as he once again clenched his hands at the pain in his chest.
He had told them he wished for their happiness and he had told Katara he needed to come to terms, but would he ever be able to let her go and accept her relationship with Zuko? Would he ever stop loving her? Would he ever find happiness?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The Fire Nation nobility were arriving at the palace in hordes for the Fire Lord’s engagement celebration. He had finally announced that he had chosen a woman to be his wife and Fire Lady and they were all curious to know who she was and from which noble family she came from. They were envious at the thought, however, that another family had gained their lord’s favor. The women were jealous and disappointed at the thought that they now did not have a chance to marry the Fire Lord because another woman had beaten them to it.

Walking toward the great banquet hall with Shen and Kuo walking behind them, Zuko and Katara quietly went over what she was supposed to do during the engagement party.

“There really isn’t much for you to do except talk about yourself if any of the nobility asks you, which they will,” Zuko informed her coolly. “You will remain by my side all night and mostly listen to their flattery. They will not let us leave their sight throughout the entire celebration.”

“How fun,” Katara said sarcastically.

“I will enter first to introduce you and then you will join me,” he reminded her.

Katara nodded to show she understood before she bit her lip and clasped her hands in anxiety. La, she was so nervous! What if they hated her? What if they made Zuko change his mind? What if they made him choose a noblewoman as his wife?

She was brought out of her thoughts when she felt Zuko touch her bottom lip with his thumb to make her stop chewing on it and she glanced up at him with a frown.

“There’s nothing for you to worry about, Katara,” he told her reassuringly. “We already passed the most difficult obstacle in convincing the Court Council. Even if the nobles disagree with me and my choice of wife, they can’t do much unless they wish to have my wrath fall upon them.”

“Anybody will say they agree with you in order to avoid your temper,” Katara remarked dryly.
Zuko shrugged at her words.

“I’m glad you know it,” he said with a smirk.

Katara smacked his arm and scowled at him.

“Don’t mess with me,” she grumbled, “I’m already nervous at it is.”

Zuko grasped her hand where he had placed her ring and kissed it briefly since Shen and Kuo were walking behind them, although far enough behind to give them some privacy.

“Everything will be okay,” he told her softly before he smiled at her as he reached up to touch the betrothal necklace, “You look beautiful.”

Katara felt her anxiety lessen a bit and she smiled as Zuko allowed his eyes to discreetly wander down her form. His waterbender indeed looked beautiful in her new blue dress he had ordered to be made for her. Zuko wanted his people to acknowledge her Southern Water Tribe heritage. He looked away when his body again stirred in desire the longer he stared at her enticing form, and he again glanced up to admire the way the betrothal necklace wrapped around her slender neck before he looked at the golden ring around her finger. A smug smile curled his lips at the thought that now everybody will know Katara was his.

Soon they were standing before the large doors that lead to the dais of the banquet hall. Zuko stared at the doors as he reminisced about the last time he had been standing before them on the day of his birthday celebration, thinking that he had forever lost Katara and his chance of happiness. He glanced at his waterbender, who smiled at him softly, and he immediately returned the smile as he thought that now he had her and he would never let her go.

Shen and Kuo stepped forward and opened the doors just as the older guard announced the Fire Lord’s appearance. With one last smile aimed at his intended, Zuko smoothed his features into his usual stoic expression before he stepped through the doors and strode to the edge of the dais where a small wall of fire blazed. The people bowed in deference to him before they straightened to look at him expectantly.

“I have asked you all to come here today so that I may announce to you that I have finally found the woman worthy enough to be my wife and Fire Lady,” Zuko began in a strong voice that carried toward the ends of the room. “She will not only make a good wife, but she will also help me in my rule of this great nation.”

He paused for a moment and he almost grinned as some of them actually leaned forward in anticipation.

“I proudly present to you my future bride,” he began as he turned toward the doors which opened again as Katara stepped through, “Lady Katara of the Southern Water Tribe.”

The noblemen and -women gasped loudly in shock before they murmured amongst themselves at the revelation.

Zuko’s golden eyes gleamed in pride as he watched Katara walked toward him confidently, none of her anxiety and fear showing through, and he extended his right arm toward her. She smiled beautifully as she took his outstretched hand, placing her small hand delicately in his larger one. The nobility gasped again as they noticed the golden ring on her finger and they knew their lord was serious.

Zuko brought Katara close to his side as he again returned his attention to the people.

“Lady Katara took part in ending the hundred year war that had hurt many people. She also saved my life. She is a wonderful woman with a great love for those less fortunate and she will make a great Fire Lady,” the raven-haired lord continued, “With our marriage, the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe will have an unbreakable peace treaty drawn that will ensure another war does not occur.”

The older noblemen grumbled in discontent at having the Fire Lord marry a woman that was not from the Fire Nation, while the young noblewomen groused silently in jealousy that a Water Tribe woman had gained the Fire Lord’s favor. The low murmurs paused when they saw the waterbender take a step forward with a smile on her face.

“I know I may not be a noblewoman, or from the Fire Nation, but I swear that I will do everything in my power to help Fire Lord Zuko, my future husband, as well as both the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe,” Katara stated in a calm yet strong voice.

There was silence for a moment as the people stared at her in surprise before they began to murmur amongst themselves again. Zuko resisted the urge to smirk since it was just like Katara to make a speech in order to ease their minds.
The nobility contemplated what they had heard for a moment before they bowed to the Fire Lord and his future Fire Lady in acceptance since not only did they not have the power to go against him, but also they did not want to bring the Fire Lord’s displeasure on them. The young women were less reluctant to accept as they continued to whine and pout, but their elders hushed them and nudged them to bow respectfully.

Katara let out a subtle breath of relief as her racing heart calmed. There was a small part of her that felt irritated that all of her fears and doubts had been for nothing, but a bigger part of her felt relieved that no one had actually protested the idea of Zuko marrying her. She knew some of them still did not really approved of her becoming Zuko’s wife and Fire Lady, but she vowed to herself that she would change their minds. She glanced at Zuko to smile happily at him. Zuko did not return her smile, but Katara saw how his eyes lit up and her smile widened a bit.

“Please partake in the refreshments set out for your enjoyment,” Zuko finally spoke as he gestured toward the banquet tables.

Taking Katara’s hand and tucking it under his arm, Zuko parted the wall of fire before he led them down the dais to mingle with the crowd.

As soon as they stepped down, they were surrounded by people who immediately began to congratulate them. The men would comment to the Fire Lord on how beautiful his chosen wife was while the women would admire and flatter Katara’s ring and necklace. Katara’s head swam as men praised her beauty and women after women vied for her attention. Zuko had warned her that this would happen since the noblewoman would want to gain her favor so they could form part of her female courtiers. She was not sure if she really wanted to have a group of gossipy women following her around wherever she went.

Finally Zuko got tired of their annoying presence and tersely excused Katara and himself. The crowd parted to let the Fire Lord lead his intended bride to where his family was standing with hers. The nobility frowned at the loss, but they were soon distracted by the delicious food set out before them and the soft music that reached their ears.

“That’s something I’m going to have a hard time getting used to,” Katara muttered as she touched her temple.

“I know how you feel. I’m still not used to it after all these years,” Zuko commented dryly.
“That’s not surprising. You hate having your personal space invaded,” she remarked with a small giggle.

“True, but there’s one person that I don’t mind invading my personal space,” Zuko countered as he gave her hand a squeeze while he glanced at her with smoldering eyes. “In fact, I want her to be as close as possible to me.”

A small blush surfaced on Katara’s cheeks since she had a feeling she knew what he was referring to before a small smirk appeared on her lips.

“That will have to wait until we wed,” she said impishly.

Before Zuko could remark on her words, both their families stepped up to them. He resisted the urge to roll his eyes when Hakoda and Sokka narrowed their eyes suspiciously at him. Zuko let go of Katara’s arm as her grandmother embraced and congratulated her before his mother and then Suki did the same, while the men grasped his arm and clapped him on his back.

“You really outdid yourself with the betrothal necklace, Zuko,” Sokka commented after he had given his sister a one-armed hug.

“Katara deserves nothing but the best,” Zuko stated coolly.

“Gees, man. Way to put pressure on the rest of us men, Lord Hotstuff,” Sokka said with a dramatic groan.

Katara ignored her brother as she smiled at Zuko. She glanced at her grandmother when Kanna elbowed her side.

“This one is a keeper, Katara,” the old woman teased.

The group laughed when Zuko flushed and cleared his throat as he composed himself.

“Fire Lord Zuko, Lady Katara.”
Zuko and Katara turned at the sound of their names and they watched as an elderly man with cropped white hair and a woman with a graying braid bowed to them.

“My wife and I express our most sincere congratulations upon your upcoming wedding,” the man said.

“Physician Toshiro, thank you,” Zuko said as he inclined his head.

The old physician smiled before he turned to smile widely at the waterbender.

“I am sure you will make a wonderful Fire Lady, Lady Katara,” he said genuinely.

“Thank you,” Katara replied with a pleased smile.

“I did not know you had returned to the palace,” Zuko spoke up, “How are your daughter and grandchild?”

“They are both well, my lord,” the Palace Physician said happily.

“Our grandson is such a healthy baby boy,” his wife added joyfully.

“I’m glad to hear that,” Zuko began before he more seriously added, “Now that you have returned, Physician Toshiro, I would like to speak with you tomorrow about something urgent.”

The old man frowned slightly before he bowed.

“Of course, my lord,” he complied.

With another few words of congratulations to the engaged couple, the physician and his wife left to talk with the other nobles. As soon as they were out of sight, Katara squeezed Zuko’s arm as she looked up at him in concern.
“Are you sick?” she asked worriedly.

“No,” Zuko quickly responded in order to cease her worries.

He glanced discreetly around before he more quietly said, “I want to talk to Physician Toshiro about the false messenger that collapsed when he arrived at the palace. I want to know why he got sick and why he died.”

“Zuko dear,” Ursa spoke up softly.

When Zuko looked at her, the noblewoman continued in the same quiet tone.

“Did he have a high fever? What were his other symptoms?” she asked.

“I don’t know,” the golden-eyed firebender replied with a frown. “Why?”

Ursa pressed her lips tightly together as she looked around them to make sure on one else was listening before she took a deep breath.

“What if he was…poisoned?”

Zuko’s eyes widened slightly before he frowned deeply as they all contemplated the possibility of the false messenger being poisoned intentionally.

“Poisoning seems a likely possibility,” Zuko began pensively before he straightened as he looked at his mother, “Can you be there when I interrogate Physician Toshiro?”

“Of course, my son,” Ursa responded immediately.

When he felt Katara again squeeze his arm, Zuko looked down to see her worried blue eyes. He sighed guiltily.
“I’m sorry for talking about such things on our engagement party,” he apologized.

“It’s all right. I understand,” she told him with an understanding smile.

Placing his hand atop hers, Zuko gave her a small smile as his eyes warmed.

“Let’s pretend we believe the nobles’ flattery, shall we?” he asked with a smirk.

“Why, of course,” she replied with a giggle.

After a quick smile to their family, the Fire Lord and the waterbender left them and headed to the dance floor, but just as they had been expecting, they were swarmed by people before they could actually reach it.

“I feel like my stomach is eating itself. How about we head to the banquet table, Suki?” Sokka spoke up with a smile as he hooked his wife’s arm under his, then with a grin he whispered in her ear, “Then you can satisfy my other kind of appetite later.”

Suki shook her head and laughed as her husband waggled his eyebrows suggestively at her.

“Let’s go,” Suki said with a grin as she tugged on her husband’s arm. They had left their daughters in the care of Jiao since the engagement party had started late and would probably end late.

As soon as the younger people left, Iroh turned to grin at Kanna who scowled when she caught his eye.

“Didn’t I say my nephew and Miss Katara would be getting married this year?” he said cheerfully, “Now you need to pay up, my dear.”

“I was only a year off,” Kanna grumbled as she crossed her arms over her chest.
The others laughed as the party continued.

A few days after the Avatar calmed down, Toph’s brow furrowed again as she felt Aang sulking on the boulder as he had been doing after he had vented his anger on the island. She had kept quiet at first to give him time to heal, and then she had tried to cheer him up, but he would either ignore her or tell her that he was not in the mood for her jokes and wanted to be left alone. She had again given him his space so he could come to terms with everything that happened, but it seemed as if he was getting worse instead of better. She missed the cheerful and sometimes annoying boy and hated this depressed and melancholy shell of a young man.

Narrowing her milky green eyes, Toph balled her hands into fists. She had had enough of his angst!

She stomped over to where he was sitting, and with a firm stomp of her foot, she threw him off the rock. Aang landed on the ground with a startled yelp.

“What is your problem, Toph?!” he yelled as he picked himself off the ground and dusted himself off with a low growl.

“Stop being a sissy, toughen up, and move one!” she told him firmly, “So what if Sweetness dumped you? It’s not the end of the world!”

“It’s not that easy!” Aang angrily shouted at her, “I can’t just forget and stop loving Katara after four years!”

“Well, that’s too bad ‘cause you’re gonna have to. Katara loves Zuko, and if I know Sparky, he’s planning to marry her as soon as possible,” the short earthbender said bluntly.

“Shut up!” Aang screamed, “Stop reminding me!”

“It’s not like Katara’s the only woman in the world!” Toph finally snapped as she stomped her foot, causing the ground to tremble, “If you would just open your eyes and stop being so damn stupid, you would’ve realize that there are others who like you!”

Aang’s gray eyes widened and he gaped at the angry earthbender.
“What do you m—?”

He was interrupted, however, when Toph roughly grabbed him by the collar of his tunic and pulled him down before she smashed her mouth to his. Aang froze in shock as Toph kissed him and at the thought that she could like him, but before he could react, she pulled away. Speechless, he stared down at her sightless eyes as she glared at him, but there was a light pink flush to her pale cheeks. He had only seen Toph blush a few times.

“Toph…I—I had no idea,” he said quietly.

The dark-haired young woman let him go and shrugged.

“I tried to stop it and I tried to deny my feelings, but it was useless,” she said with another shrug. “Love’s like a sneaky little thing that crawls up behind a person when they least expect it. You’ll never know it’s there until it bites you in the ass. It couldn’t be helped.”

Aang frowned at her.

“You make it sound like it’s a bad thing,” he muttered.

Toph grinned at his disgruntled tone.

“I’ll let you get used to the idea,” she began before she lightly punched his arm as she firmly said, “But I won’t wait forever for you to make a decision, ya hear?”

“I…I will try, Toph, but I won’t make any promises,” he told her sincerely

“I’ll change your mind,” she responded confidently.

She again grabbed hold of his shirt and pulled him down to kiss him again. Wow, this was better than she imagined and she be damned if she would ignore her feelings. Now there was nothing standing in her way of what she wanted except for his lingering feelings for Katara, but Toph was determined to change his feelings and sway them toward herself.
Aang gasped slightly when he felt a small tingle run down his spine as Toph kissed him a second time before he closed his eyes to enjoy this new sensation. He found that he liked Toph’s warm and slightly rough lips on his.

He was not sure if he would be able to return Toph’s feelings, but if it meant both their happiness, then he was willing to give it a try.

Perhaps destiny had an entirely different plan for him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Early on the day after the engagement party found Zuko sitting on his throne behind the wall of fire. His advisors were murmuring amongst themselves as they wondered why they had been summoned again and why the Palace Physician was also in attendance. Zuko ignored them for the moment as his eyes wandered to where Katara and his mother were sitting between Iroh and Jee. Katara had insisted on attending since the matter of the false message about the ‘infested’ colony also concerned her. Their eyes met briefly before Zuko returned his gaze to the physician sitting alone before him.

“What was the messenger’s condition when he supposedly collapsed after arriving in the Fire Nation Palace?” he asked in a blank tone.

The physician started at the sudden question before he frowned as he tried to remember.

“Other than being exhausted from the long journey, his condition was fine,” the white-haired man began before his frown deepened, “That is why I was surprised when he suddenly fell terribly ill.”

“When did you notice he had fallen ill?” Zuko asked in the same cool tone.

“The following day when I went to see if he had awakened,” the man informed him, “When I examined him, he had a high fever, which did not lessen until his death.”

“When did you notice he had fallen ill?” Zuko asked in the same cool tone.

“The following day when I went to see if he had awakened,” the man informed him, “When I examined him, he had a high fever, which did not lessen until his death.”

“Were there any other symptoms besides the high fever?” the Fire Lord questioned.

“Yes, there was weakness of muscles, dizziness, a rapid heartbeat, excessive sweating, nausea and vomiting,” Physician Toshiro listed off with another frown as he again tried to remember, “On the last days before his death he began to have seizures.”
Zuko glanced at his mother, who gave a subtle nod to indicate she had been correct in assuming the messenger had been poisoned. With an emotionless expression on his face, Zuko returned his attention to the old physician.

“These sound like symptoms of poisoning,” Zuko stated.

The physician frowned as he thought over what the Fire Lord had said before his eyes widened

“That is true, but why would anyone poison him?” he asked in bewilderment. “And besides, except for my assistant, I was the only one near the messenger.”

Zuko was silent for a moment as he regarded the old man before him. He did not doubt for a second the physician’s loyalty for he had been there ever since Zuko could remember. Toshiro was the one who had seen to the wound on his face when Ozai had struck him all those years ago. The old physician had lamented quietly about such a cruel fate for a young boy as he gave Zuko sleeping draughts for the pain. And when Zuko returned to the palace as the newly crowned Fire Lord, Toshiro had looked after any injury or small illness he had sustained within the years with such dedication.

After a few more minutes of tense silence, Zuko called out to one of his guards. When the soldier stepped up and knelt before him, Zuko spoke.

“Bring me the physician’s assistant,” he said impassively.

The Palace Physician gaped at him for a moment as the guard bowed before he left to do his lord’s bidding.

“Surely you do suspect my assistant, my lord,” Toshiro exclaimed, “Such an act is treason and Kuro is the most loyal person I know.”

“We’ll see about that, Physician Toshiro,” Zuko responded coolly.

The advisors again began to talk quietly amongst themselves as they speculated about the recent events while they waited for the guard to appear with the physician’s assistant. A few minutes later, the guard arrived with the assistant following behind him. The young man looked around the throne room in confusion as he was led below the Fire Lord’s dais where he bowed before taking a kneeling position next to the physician.

Zuko silently eyed the young assistant. He was of medium stature, slim, with unremarkable features, dark eyes and long dark hair.

“Kuro, correct?” the Fire Lord finally spoke.

The young man jumped at the commanding voice before he bowed his head.

“Yes, your majesty,” he replied.

“How long have you been an assistant to Physician Toshiro?”

“Three years.”

“Do you enjoy your job?”

“Very much so, my lord.”

“Do you have any complaints about the way you are living? About my rule?”

“Of course not, Fire Lord Zuko!” the young assistant exclaimed with wide eyes.

“What were you doing on the night the messenger that brought the missive from the colonies died?” Zuko asked without any more pretenses.

“I was helping Physician Toshiro try to save the man, but nothing we did worked, my lord,” Kuro responded quickly as he sat perfectly still.
Zuko was silent for a moment as the rest in the room waited to see what was going to happen next.

Katara frowned as she stared at the man. If only Toph were there, they would know if he was lying. The blue-eyed waterbender then glanced to where her future husband sat in deep thought and she bit her lip and grasped her hands in worry. Could Zuko be in the same danger as the messenger had been? She prayed it wasn’t so.

Zuko suppressed the frown that wanted to appear on his face as the man answered all his questions without any hesitation. What if it was someone else who had poisoned the messenger? But who? Yet, Zuko still could not ignore the feeling that the assistant had something to do with it. The young lord glanced at Wei, who was staring at the young man with a curious look on his wrinkled face. Why was Wei not reacting? Was he not afraid Kuro would point him out?

Straightening, Zuko decided to test the assistant and see what would happen, and if the man was innocent, then Zuko was going to be back to the beginning of the problem and his suspicions of Wei.

“Stop lying,” he said coldly.

“M-my lord?” Kuro stammered in surprise.

“I know everything,” the Fire Lord continued in the same icy tone, “Before his disappearance, Advisor Kang told me everything and insisted that the messenger’s death was all your idea.”

“That is a lie!” Kuro shouted, his meek posture immediately changing into indignation, “It was all his idea!”

Kuro choked on his words as he slapped his hand over his mouth. He stared wide-eyed at the intimidating-looking Fire Lord while everybody gasped.

“K-Kuro?” Physician Toshiro stammered in shock as the young man glanced at him before lowering his gaze.

Zuko’s eyes widened slightly in surprise. So Advisor Kang was behind all of this? But then why had the old advisor urged him to meet with him in order to warn Zuko about a plot? What really happened to the advisor to cause his disappearance? Narrowing his golden eyes, Zuko leaned forward as the shadows the flames cast made his features seem darker.
“You will explain everything,” Zuko commanded firmly, “If not, the information will be tortured out of you.”

“Y-you’re b-bluffing,” Kuro stuttered even as he tried to act fearless.

“For my safety and those close to me, I am capable of anything,” the Fire Lord replied darkly.

The young man paled and he stiffened.

Zuko stared down at the wide-eyed assistant, waiting for a response, but when he received none, the flames that stood before him flared in his impatience. Kuro jumped with a frightened gasp.

“Tell me everything you know,” Zuko demanded imperially.

Zuko glanced quickly to where Wei sat, thinking that he could have evidence against the old advisor now that the assistant would reveal everything. He was confused, however, when he saw that Wei did not seem alarmed and was looking at the young man with an intrigued expression just like the rest of the advisors.

“I-I know nothing!” Kuro shouted with wide, fearful eyes.

“Don’t lie to me!” Zuko growled out angrily.

Kuro flinched at the Fire Lord’s anger and he cowered down in his spot.

“Whatever Advisor Kang said was false!” the young man exclaimed as he again looked up at the angry Fire Lord.

“Then let me hear your version,” Zuko said in a deceptively calm voice.

Zuko watched as the assistant glanced at Toshiro, as if looking for help or understanding, before
Once again lowering his eyes when the old physician frowned sadly at him.

When Kuro did not immediately respond, Zuko added more darkly, “If not, then I will have you killed for treason.”

The young assistant did not even hesitate as he immediately launched into his own story.

“The day the messenger arrived, Advisor Kang approached me when I was going on an errand! He told me to poison the messenger in exchange for a very large sum of money…and I agreed. So that same night when Physician Toshiro had left, I sneaked into the messenger’s room, mixed the poison with a draught, and made him drink it. I-I did this for several nights until he d-died.”

Katara gasped softly. Did he not feel any remorse for killing a man just to get money?

“Why would Advisor Kang want to poison the messenger?” Zuko asked.

“I-I don’t know the particulars, but I think it was so the messenger could keep his mouth s-shut about something. P-permanently,” Kuro stammered.

“Advisor Kang asked me to visit him in his country house,” Zuko said as if he had not heard a word, “He wanted to tell me that you had planned a plot against me.”

“But I wasn’t behind the plot, my lord!” the young assistant exclaimed in dismay, “I was just in it for the money to have a better life for my family! I swear it!”

Kuro grasped his hair as he looked imploringly at the silent Fire Lord.

“When he offered me more money for another job, I immediately refused!” he continued, “It’s one thing poisoning an unknown messenger, but it’s another thing poisoning the Fire Lord!”

Zuko remained immobile even as he heard Katara, his mother and Uncle Iroh gasp in horror.
“What?” the advisors shouted in shock and the entire room erupted into chaos.

Raising the flames of the fire wall, Zuko continued once everybody calmed down enough for him to be heard.

“Were you really not going to poison me even after you were offered a reward?” Zuko asked cynically.

“Of course not, my lord!” Kuro exclaimed as he again fell to his knees before he bowed low until his forehead touched the ground. “I am loyal to you and the Fire Nation.”

“What else happened?” the Fire Lord asked.

The man lifted his head and he trembled at the blank expression and tone of the Fire Lord. He once again glanced at his mentor imploringly, but Toshiro looked at him sadly and shook his head.

“Answer the question, Kuro,” Toshiro said in a quiet, tired tone.

Sitting silently, Katara watched as Kuro once again lowered his gaze and swallowed. She could only imagine how ashamed Kuro must feel to not only have betrayed his lord but the man that had taken him in as his assistant.

“W-when I told A-advisor Kang that I refused, he became angry and…threatened me,” Kuro continued.

“How?” Zuko asked.

“He…planned on telling you that I was the one who poisoned the messenger and that I was the one behind the plot against your life. He knew you suspected Advisor Wei, so he believed you would have no reason to doubt him. And once he gained your trust, he planned on finding a way to end your life.” He paused before he added with a scowl, “I wasn’t about to let him screw me over!”

Katara’s eyes widened in fear before she grasped Ursa’s hand when the noblewoman gasped while everybody else in the room murmured amongst themselves about what had been revealed.
Zuko was silent for a moment as he stared at the cowering man before he looked at Wei, who caught his eye and raised an eyebrow. Zuko narrowed his eyes before he looked back down at the assistant.

“Are you the reason why Advisor Kang is missing?” he asked impassively.

Kuro’s eyes widened again before he pressed his lips tightly together and looked down at the floor.

“Answer me,” Zuko ordered firmly.

“Yes,” he replied quietly, “When I found out that Advisor Kang was meeting with the Fire Lord, I rushed over to his house and surprised him during his morning ride.”

“You killed him,” Zuko stated bluntly.

“I didn’t mean to!” Kuro shouted pleadingly. “I just wanted to make the advisor stop with his plans, but he ignored me! I got angry and threw a rock at him, but it stuck his ostrich-horse and the animal reared at the impact. It threw off the advisor, who fell on the ground and struck his head on a large rock. He was dead before I reached him, I swear!”

All the advisors gasped.

“Why didn’t you tell anybody about what happened?” Zuko asked.

“Nobody would’ve believed a simple physician assistant!” Kuro cried out, “Nobody would’ve believed it was an accident! I would’ve been accused of killing him on purpose!”

“What did you do with the body?” one of the advisors dared to ask.

At the Fire Lord’s nod for him to continue, Kuro swallowed as he wrung his hands in anxiety.

“I-I buried his body somewhere in the surrounding area of his country house,” he confessed quietly.
“What else do you know?” Zuko asked again, “What about the rebels? And Ozai?”

Kuro frowned.

“I don’t know what you mean,” he said truthfully.

Damn it, Zuko cursed in his head.

“Guards,” he growled out as he motioned for them, “Take him to the prison tower for further questioning.”

“But, my lord!” Kuro protested as two guards grabbed him by the arms and hauled him up. “Let me go!” he shouted as he struggled against the guards who were dragging him away.

As soon as the door closed behind them, the men in the room immediately began to declare their indignation about a plot set against their lord’s life while exclaiming their concern at the same time. Wei did not say anything as he sat back and crossed his arms above his protruding stomach and frowned.

Zuko did not pay them any attention as he sighed inwardly. He still had so many questions left unanswered. He again glanced at Wei and his brow furrowed when he saw the old advisor speculating with the others. Had he been wrong all this time in suspecting Wei? Or was Wei just pretending he knew nothing?

He looked away to see how his family was taking the news. Jee and Iroh were frowning at each other while his mother and Katara murmured lowly to themselves. Katara looked up and again their eyes met. He frowned at the worry in her eyes.

“Advisors,” he called out coolly.

The men paused in their commotion and looked at him expectantly.
“This meeting is concluded for today. We’ll discuss what happened later.”

“But—”

“Do I have to repeat myself?” Zuko cut off the man that had begun to argue with a growl.

The old advisors frowned as they mumbled to themselves before they finally stood up, bowed, and reluctantly headed toward the doors. Once they had all left and the doors were closed behind them, Zuko sighed as he stood up from his throne and stepped down the marble steps. Just as he part the fire wall and stepped through it, he found himself in Katara’s tight embrace. He looked up to see his uncle, mother, and Jee talking to each other a few feet away, and with a soft sigh, he wound his arms around his waterbender and hugged her close to him.

“Just the thought that you could’ve ended up like the messenger…” Katara began in a strained voice before she trailed off with a shuddering sigh.

“But I didn’t,” he reminded her reassuringly, “Kang is dead and so is his plan.”

Katara nodded against his chest before she pulled away from him since she knew it made him uncomfortable to show physical affection in front of other people. He touched her cheek briefly and she smiled.

As if just noticing their moment had passed, the other three approached them.

“Zuko,” Ursa said anxiously as she grasped his arm, “Why didn’t you tell me there was a plot against your life?”

“I wasn’t sure if there really was a plot,” he answered as he squeezed her hand, “I didn’t want to worry you.”

“You cannot keep such things for your mother,” Ursa admonished him with a frown, “Promise me you will never do it again, my son.”

Zuko did not immediately respond, but he eventually conceded.
“What are you going to do now, Zuko?” Iroh asked.

“I don’t know,” the young man admitted with a growl, “I can’t even trust my own advisors.”

“You should have all the advisors’ houses searched without alerting anyone else,” Katara suggested, “Maybe we can find something.”

“That’s a good idea,” Zuko responded with a pensive frown before he turned to Jee. “Please look into that, Admiral Jee,” he commanded.

“Yes, my lord,” Jee immediately replied, “I will lead the search.”

Zuko gave a nod, satisfied. He then returned his attention to his worried mother.

“Are there any antidotes for poisoning?” he asked her.

“Yes,” Ursa said, “I know how to make a few.”

“Since we don’t know which poison they used, could you make a few different ones?” he asked, “Just in case.”

“Do you think someone else would attempt to…poison you?” Katara asked worriedly and she bit her lip in anxiety.

“If not me, then anybody close to me,” Zuko responded darkly before he more softly added as he gazed down at her, “I won’t allow anyone to harm my family.”

Katara gave him a small smile, even though she was not as concerned for herself as she was for him.

“We should go to dinner,” Ursa reminded them, “I am sure Katara’s family is anxious to know what happened.”
The four of them left the throne room in silence. Jee bowed to them before he parted ways in order to organize the search. Iroh and Ursa walked ahead of the young couple in order to give them some space since the moment Katara’s family had arrived, they had not allowed Zuko to be alone with her for more than a minute.

“Katara,” Zuko called her name softly.

When she looked up at him, he continued in the same quiet tone.

“Things are getting complicated,” he said, “Are…are you sure you still want to marry me? I don’t want you to get hurt…or worse.”

“Of course I still want to marry you, Zuko!” Katara exclaimed in the same soft tone as she frowned at him, “I already told you I’m not going to leave you to deal with this alone. I will try my best to keep you safe.”

“That’s supposed to be my line,” Zuko said with a small chuckle.

He let out a mental sigh of relief at the thought that she would not leave him.

Katara smiled at him.

“Then we’ll protect each other,” she replied.

His eyes warmed as he continued to stare at her.

“Always,” he promised.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Admiral Jee stood perfectly straight in the middle of the dead Advisor Kang’s study as some of his soldiers went about rummaging and searching the large house. All of the servants of the town house huddled together in confusion as they watched their dead master’s house being ransacked. Papers, scrolls, and books littered the polished floors, furniture was overturned, and the once neat bedrooms were a mess.

Jee watched it all silently as he waited to hear of anything important. He had informed the Fire Lord that he would have his men search every single advisor’s house at the same time so none of them could be alerted as to what was happening, and thus, have a chance to hide anything. Jee had decided to go to Advisor Kang’s house himself in order to find any more clues about a possible plot against his lord.

The admiral narrowed his eyes as he grasped his hands behind his back. If they did find anything that could possibly mean a threat to the Fire Lord, he was determined to stop it at all cause. Fire Lord Zuko was a great and honorable lord. Granted, Jee had disliked him in the beginning of his exile before General Iroh had told them the reason why the young prince acted the way he did. Zuko treated his loyal subjects well and he had even promoted Jee to admiral. Zuko gave him his trust by appointing him to look after duties that should fall to someone else, something the older man would forever be grateful for. And Jee had vowed that he would serve and protect him with his life.

But there was another reason why Jee was determined to destroy any plot set against his lord, and that was Lady Ursa. If anything happened to her son, the gentle and kind woman would be devastated and she would suffer more than she had during her banishment. Jee could not allow Lady Ursa to suffer ever again and he would do anything in his power so it will not be so. She deserved to be happy after all the harm her former husband had caused her with his ambitions to become Fire Lord.

The admiral ground his teeth and clenched his hands into fist at his sides at the thought of the previous Fire Lord. Jee would never forgive Ozai for causing such a wonderful woman as Lady Ursa so much pain. If Lady Ursa were married to him, he would treat her like the princess she was and—

No. He could not think such things. Lady Ursa was the mother of his lord, the young man Jee admired and vowed to honor and protect. She was only his charge that was assigned to him to guard. She was royalty and he was a simple admiral. It would never work out. She would never see him as more than just her personal guard. Fire Lord Zuko would never allow him to marry his mother.

Jee’s head kept repeating this to himself and he knew it was right.

Yet, it seemed his heart refused to listen to him as it would beat wildly in his chest whenever he was near her, whenever he heard her soft voice and her musical laughter, whenever she would give him one of her gentle and beautiful smiles.
Stop, he growled at himself.

He needed to get rid of such thoughts. He was no teenage boy whose hormonal body heated at a single glance from a pretty girl for Agni’s sake! And Lady Ursa was no girl. She was royalty, a mother, a woman to be respected and protected.

And that was all he was going to do. Respect and protect her as her guardian.

“Admiral Jee,” Shen’s voice brought him out of his thoughts.

Jee blinked as he suddenly noticed Shen and Kuo standing in front of him before he composed himself as he shoved his thoughts away. Now was not the time for such things. He had a duty to uphold.

“Did you find something?” he asked the older of the Fire Lord’s personal guards.

Shen gave a firm nod as he indicated to a chest he and Kuo had carried and lowered before the admiral. It was a rusty metal chest wrapped in heavy chains and closed tightly with a large lock.

“We found this in the cellar hidden beneath many other boxes,” Kuo spoke up as he gave a curious kick to the heavy trunk, “We thought it could be important since it’s sealed so tightly.”

“We should open it before showing it to Fire Lord Zuko,” Jee replied as he eyed the chest with a frown, “It could be nothing and I don’t want to waste his time.”

Both guards nodded. The admiral called for another guard to bring something sharp to break the lock. He did not want to risk setting the chest on fire if he used his firebending in case there was something important inside. After a few unsuccessful tries, the lock finally broke under the heavy blows and the thick chains fell to the floor with a loud ‘clang’.

Looking at the other two guards surrounding the box, Jee lifted the lid and peered inside. He frowned at the contents he found before he lifted one thin scroll. As he unfurled it and started to read, his eyes widened in shock.
“What is it?” Shen asked.

Jee did not reply as he furled the scroll up and placed it back inside the chest before closing the lid.

“Fire Lord Zuko has to see this,” was his grim reply.
Katara glanced around Zuko’s study as she sat on the chair across from his large desk. She again took in the large bookcase that lined the entire eastern wall, scanning all the scrolls and books that were neatly stacked on the shelves. Her eyes shifted to the amazing map that depicted the entire Fire Nation and its colonies on the opposite wall before she glanced back to where Zuko sat before her. She wanted to jump over the large desk and plant a passionate kiss on his lips. It had been so long since they had shared a moment alone together, at least it felt like it. Zuko did sneak into her room last night, she mused with a dazed grin. However, she refrained from doing so since they were not the only ones in the room.

Sitting next to her was Sokka, deep in conversation with Zuko about something that she had stopped listening to a while ago. Zuko had asked her to meet him in his study after lunch in order to go over her lessons with him as an excuse so they could spend some time together. But just as soon as she had arrived and closed the door so she could jump into Zuko’s arms, Sokka barged into the room. As he strode in, he had exclaimed that he had missed his firebending friend and wanted to catch up. Katara had fiercely scowled at her brother and Zuko had frowned deeply. They both knew that Sokka had said that as an excuse for him to be there so they wouldn’t be alone.

It was the same thing with her other family members. Whenever it seemed she could have a moment alone with Zuko, her father, Gran-Gran and Pakku, or her brother would pop out of nowhere with a lame excuse. Did they seriously think Zuko was going to seduce her and she was going to allow herself to be seduced by him while they were there? La, did they have no faith in them? They had never acted that way when she had been dating Aang for four years. It was as if they thought Aang was too innocent to do anything inappropriate to her or maybe it was because he was a monk that they trusted him more. On the other hand, they treated Zuko as if he was a randy bull-horse that could not control his sexual urges.

If only they knew, she thought with a mental giggle, even as her cheeks flushed red.

Katara glanced at her brother with a frown and then she glanced at Zuko with a scowl as they continued talking. Zuko had seemed so urgent about being alone with her, but now he was ignoring her for her brother! But then again, she could not always demand his attention and it had been a while since Sokka and Zuko had seen each other. She couldn’t begrudge them that. And it was nice to know that her brother and her future husband got along well.

With a soft sigh, Katara leaned back in her seat as she wondered if she should go look for Suki so they could have a nice girl talk or a small sparring match. Just as she was going to interrupt both men, a knock at the large door made them pause.

“Enter,” Zuko called out coolly.
The door opened and Iroh walked in with a smile on his face.

“Ah, Nephew, I see you have visitors,” the retired general commented, “I suppose I’ll come back later.”

“Don’t worry about it, Iroh,” Sokka spoke up as he stood up, “I was just about to leave to find Suki and my daughters.”

Oh, now he leaves, Katara thought as she glowered at her brother when he turned to look at her.

He either did not notice or chose to ignore it as he gave her a big grin before he moved toward the door and left. Iroh looked after the young warrior before he turned toward the silent couple with an amused twinkle in his golden eyes.

“It seems the role of chaperon as fallen onto me now,” Iroh mused with a chuckle.

Zuko frowned at his uncle before he turned to Katara, who had a small pout on her lips and her arms crossed beneath her breasts. He knew he was the one who had asked her to meet with him, he did not mean to ignore her, but Sokka had distracted him. Sokka was the only person he could term as something of a best friend and it had been nice to have a conversion with a male his age. But still, he did not want Katara to think he was ignoring her. He cleared his throat, and when Katara turned to look at him, he gave her an apologetic look. She sighed before she gave him a small smile to show she was not angry.

Still chuckling, Iroh moved to sit beside Katara. Before any of them could say something, another knock was heard at the door. Zuko let out a sigh before he again called out for whoever was outside to enter. He wouldn’t be surprised if it was Katara’s father.

They watched as the door opened and Jee stepped inside with a serious expression on his face before he bowed as he neared the desk.

“My lord, I have come to report to you that we have searched all of the advisors’ houses,” the admiral informed him.
Zuko straightened in his chair as anticipation curled in his stomach. Would they finally find answers? It had been a day since Kuro had been arrested after confessing that he had poisoned the messenger at Advisor Kang’s command and Zuko was still amazed that they had solved one problem.

“Did you find anything?” Zuko asked expectantly.

“We found a heavily chained chest hidden in a cellar,” Jee stated with a nod.

“Let me see it,” the Fire Lord commanded coolly.

Jee walked to the door and called for Shen and Kuo. They watched as the two guards walked into the room, carrying a metal chest between them, before Jee closed the door immediately behind them. Kuo and Shen settled the heavy box on the floor before they straightened and stepped away.

“You will find many interesting things within the chest, my lord,” Jee spoke up again.

Zuko stood up from his chair and quickly made his way to the mysterious chest. He noticed briefly that the lock had been broken before he lifted the lid and peered inside. He saw numerous small bags that he knew contained coins, along with a disarray of countless papers and scrolls. He picked up one of the scrolls and read it before his eyes widened in disbelief. He picked up another of the missives and read briefly through it before a dark expression settled on his features.

“What is it, Zuko?” Katara asked worriedly.

“Many of these letters are from Jianguo,” he said with a growl.

Katara gasped. Zuko scanned through another letter that seemed to be the most recent one and he narrowed his eyes.

“Jianguo writes in this one that they are laying low until further instructions, although he doesn’t address any of the letters to a particular person,” he said before he turned to Jee, “Where did you find this chest?”

“In Advisor Kang’s town house,” Jee told him.
Zuko’s eyes again widened before he composed himself. So Kuro had been saying the truth after all. Zuko had harbored a small doubt about his confession.

“Did you find anything in Advisor Wei’s house?” he asked.

“We searched Advisor Wei’s as well as the other advisors’ houses thoroughly, but we found nothing that could convict them,” Jee responded.

Zuko frowned as he looked down at the chest filled with money and paper. Had he been wrong about Wei all this time? It seemed that while he was accusing another, the real traitor had been going about unnoticed. Until now, that is.

“Thank you, Admiral Jee,” the Fire Lord said before he thanked his personal guards who bowed. “Shen, inform the advisors to meet me in the throne room tomorrow for further questioning of Physician Toshiro’s assistant.”

“Yes, my lord,” the dark gray-eyed guard said.

“You are dismissed,” the young lord told them as he returned his attention to the letters in his hands.

Katara frowned as Jee bowed along with the two guards before they turned to the door and left after closing it softly behind them.

“Can you help me read through all of these?” Zuko asked as he gathered a pile of papers. “I want to see if we can find anything else that is important.”

The waterbender and the retired general stood up and walked toward the metal chest. They gathered more of the papers before walking back to Zuko’s desk and placing them on the smooth surface. All three sat on the chairs and began to go through the letters. They spent the next few hours sorting through the pile in silence until Iroh finally broke it once they finished.

“I never would have guessed the quiet and seemingly insignificant Advisor Kang was behind all of this,” the old firebender said with a frown.
“Looks can be deceiving,” Katara stated.

“That is very true, my dear,” Iroh agreed with a nod.

Zuko was silent as he stared at all of the letters that Jianguo had written. If the chest had not been found in Kang’s home, they would not have known to whom he was sending the letters to, since Jianguo did not address the letters to anyone. It seemed that Kang was the one who had been supporting and giving information about the Fire Lord to the rebels. Zuko never would have imagined Kang would be behind all of this. He seemed so loyal. Why would the former advisor want to get rid of him? Was he also the one who sent that cruel letter to Ursa to stop her from meeting her son when he was crowned Fire Lord four years ago?

In the letters, Jianguo reported everything they did such as the attacks on the villages, how they had captured the Fire Lord and his waterbender, and how Jianguo had found his men slaughtered and their captives missing. Zuko crushed that particular missive in his hand. It made his blood boil at its contents and he did not want Katara to see it. Jianguo had ranted angrily throughout the letter about the deaths of his comrades and how he would make Zuko pay by taking his waterbender away from him and using her as his sex slave.

Over my dead body would I let him touch Katara, Zuko vowed vehemently.

“It seems Advisor Kang was really wealthy if he agreed with Jianguo’s demands in exchange for his help in freeing Ozai,” the blue-eyed woman commented, snapping Zuko out of his murderous thoughts. She held out a short message with the demand for some money.

“Kang had no family to worry about,” Zuko replied bluntly before he growled out, “If only Jianguo would have written where he and the rebels hid, I could’ve sent men to capture them. But Jianguo was cautious enough to never reveal any of their locations to give their positions away.”

“Well, now that their main conspirator and informant is dead, Jianguo and the rebels have no one to guide them,” Iroh spoke up.

“Yes, but that doesn’t mean they will stop causing me trouble,” the golden-eyed lord replied with a growl. “I need to send more men in search of them.”

“Do not worry, Nephew,” Iroh began before he continued quickly when Zuko turned an incredulous glare on him, “I have asked the Order of the White Lotus for aid in finding the rebels.”

“What? Why haven’t you told me this before?” Zuko demanded with a frown.

“Because they haven’t had any luck either,” the retired general responded calmly before he added, “But with your men and the members of the Order, I am sure they will be found soon.”

“I hope you’re right, Uncle,” Zuko muttered.

Leaning back in his chair, he rubbed the bridge of his nose and sighed irritably.

“I’m going to have to apologize to Wei for accusing him of treachery when it had been Kang all along,” the young lord grumbled, “But I had been so sure Wei was the traitor.”

“Maybe that’s why Kang was so confident,” Katara spoke up, “He knew you would immediately suspect Wei since everybody knows both of you don’t like each other.”

Zuko was silent for a moment as he thought over what she said before he nodded.

“That makes sense.”

They speculated a moment longer before they decided to take a much needed rest.

“I will have to show this to the advisors tomorrow,” Zuko said as he leaned back in his chair.

“Well, for now all we can do is hope your men find the rebels,” Iroh replied as he stood up, “I am going to look for Chao and ask him if he wants to share some tea.”

He walked to the door before he paused and turned to look at the young couple with another twinkle in his eyes and a grin on his lips.
“Promise me both of you will behave,” he told them amusedly.

Katara blushed lightly and Zuko glowered at his uncle.

“Just go drink your tea,” the young firebender growled out.

Iroh chuckled as he opened the door and stepped out, giving them a wink before closing the door behind him.

Zuko stood up from his chair and turned toward the large window behind him with a deep sigh. Katara was silent as she watched him with worried eyes.

“I can’t believe the traitor was so close to me without me knowing it.” Zuko growled out as he clenched his hands at his sides, “If it weren’t because of the Kuro’s objection to poisoning me, who knows if Kang would’ve succeeded in killing me.”

Katara sprang from her seat and rushed to him, encircling her arms around him from behind and placing her cheek against his broad back.

“Luckily nothing happened to you,” she said softly before she added in a shaky voice, “I wouldn’t bear it if you were harmed…or k-killed.”

Zuko turned around in her embrace to look at her and his heart clenched at the sight of her wide, worried eyes and the anxious frown on her lovely features. He reached up to touch her cheek before he brought her close to his chest, his arms tight around her.

“It scares me more to think that Kang could’ve targeted you too,” he told her quietly as his hold tightened.

“I guess all that matters is that the traitor’s dead and we’re all fine,” the waterbender replied softly as she grasped the back of his clothes tightly with her fingers.

“You’re right,” he agreed with a nod. “I’m glad that the traitor mystery has been solved. I just hope it’s the last of our troubles.”
He pulled away slightly and Katara looked up to see him frown down at her as he tucked a strand of her hair behind her ear.

“I’m sorry all of this has set us back from planning our wedding.”

“Why are you apologizing? It’s not your fault,” Katara told him softly as she pressed a finger on his brow in order to smooth his frown. “This is important and it couldn’t be ignored.”

Zuko caught her hand and gazed down upon the golden ring he had given her before he looked up to smile at her. He knew he had made the right choice in choosing Katara as his wife for she was strong and did not allow what was happening to scare her away. She was resolute in helping him, in keeping him safe and in loving him. What more could he ask for?

Cupping a hand behind her head, Zuko leaned down to place a kiss on her lips. Katara wrapped her arms around his neck and he lifted her to him in order to deepen the kiss. He felt Katara lick the seam of his lips, and with a groan, he opened his mouth to allow her access to his mouth. She slipped her tongue inside and explored his mouth slowly, occasionally touching his tongue briefly before pulling away, teasing him. He smiled against her moist mouth as he briefly mused on how she had changed from shy and hesitant to confident and passionate.

He tangled his fingers in her soft hair and pulled her head back. Zuko deepened the kiss and took over her mouth, as he caught her elusive tongue and entwined it, caressed it, with his. Katara moaned and pressed herself closer to him. It had been a while since they had been able to do this outside of Katara’s room late at night.

At the thought, Zuko pulled away from her delicious mouth with a groan and pressed his forehead against hers, both panting against each other.

“I think we should stop before someone from your family barges in,” he said dryly.

Katara giggled as she moved her arms away from his neck, taking a step back and smoothing her hair and clothes. Just as she opened her mouth to retort, there was a knock at the door. They glanced at each other before Zuko called out a tired ‘enter’. The door opened and they watched as Hakoda stepped in.

“Ah, Katara, there you are. I was wandering if you wanted to spend some time with your father,” Hakoda said innocently even though he was eyeing them suspiciously.

Katara glanced at Zuko and saw that he had a raised eyebrow aimed at her as if to say, ‘Told you so’.

“I guess I’ll see you later,” she said as she smiled sheepishly at him.

The next morning found Zuko in the throne room, sitting behind the wall of fire, silently observing his advisors, who squirmed and frowned as the minutes dragged on without their lord having said a single word since they had arrived. They wanted to demand to know why the Fire Lord had his guards search their homes without their notice, but they decided to remain silent and see what was going to occur.

“I know all of you are wondering why I had your houses searched,” Zuko finally spoke in a cool tone and caused a few of the men to jump.

When the men nodded and murmured that they were, Zuko continued.

“Advisor Kang was supposed to be a loyal advisor that I could trust, but I found out that he had planned on killing me,” the young lord began in the same impassive manner, “I could not risk the same betrayal happening again, so I had your homes searched in order to see who else was plotting against me.”

“I would never betray you, my lord!” one of the younger advisors exclaimed.

The rest of the men immediately began to assure him that they would never plot against him while at the same time they stated how honored they were to serve such a great Fire Lord.

Zuko did not respond or give any indication that he was moved by any of their words as they pledged their allegiance to him. Just because no evidence was found to condemn any of them did not necessarily mean that Zuko believed all of them were loyal to him. Perhaps they were, but he preferred to be wary of them all.

“Nothing suspicious was found in any of your homes,” the golden-eyed lord interrupted the men. “But evidence of his treachery was found in Advisor Kang’s house,” he continued as he indicated the metal box that rested below the dais with a nod of his head.
“The chest contains many letters from Jianguo, the leader of the rebels,” Zuko continued as his expression turned dark. “Here is the evidence that indicates Kang was the traitor that was working with the rebels. It seems he was the one who came up with the idea of the ‘infested’ colony, giving them information about me that helped them capture Lady Katara and me.”

“What?” a few of them exclaimed in shock.

“I never would have imagined Advisor Kang being behind the plot of releasing Ozai,” Chao commented with wide eyes.

“He seemed so unsuspecting,” Enlai, another of the advisors, remarked.

“Well, now he’s dead for planning to assassinate the Young One,” Wei commented with a shrug.

Zuko stopped himself from growling indignantly at the name, and instead, he looked emotionlessly at Wei sitting unaffectedly with the rest of the men. He was still not convinced that Wei was completely innocent, but with all the evidence it was obvious that the true culprit was Kang. Was he perhaps just letting his loathing for the old advisor rule his judgment? Either way, he knew he needed to apologize to Wei publicly.

“Advisor Wei,” the young lord spoke up stoically.

When the old man turned to raise an expectant eyebrow at him, Zuko continued.

“Now that we are aware who the true traitor is, it seems I owe you an apology,” Zuko began before he forced himself to say the words, “I…apologize for accusing you falsely of plotting against me.”

“I knew that you would have eventually realized you were wrong,” Wei responded with a smirk as he gave an uncaring shrug.

Zuko clenched his teeth at the triumphant look on Wei’s face and his eyes narrowed into a glare the longer he continued glowering at the smug, old advisor. If it wasn’t because he knew it was the right thing to do, Zuko would have never apologized to the irritating man. The sound of Iroh clearing his throat made Zuko order himself to calm down.
He acknowledged Wei’s words with a stiff nod before he focused his attention on the other men, who had been silent during the exchange. They were aware that it had been difficult for their lord to admit he had been wrong and to apologize for it to the one advisor they knew he did not get along with. And that was putting it nicely.

They froze when the young Fire Lord suddenly looked at them with piercing, golden eyes and a dark expression on his face that seemed even more intimidating due to the shadows the wall of fire created before him.

“I want to make one thing clear,” Zuko began in a dark and chilling tone, “If I find out that anyone else dares to plot against me, I will be unmerciful to the traitor. I will make sure he suffers in the worst possible way for betraying me.”

The old advisors trembled at his promising words and they immediately rushed to say that they understood, that they would never betray him, and that he did not need to worry.

Satisfied at their response, Zuko gave them a nod before his face once again returned to its stoic expression. He almost smirked at their obvious relief.

“Now that the issue with the traitor is settled, we need to decide what punishment to deal onto Physician Toshiro’s former assistant,” the young lord told them. “Even though Kuro refused to kill me, he still poisoned the messenger, whom Kang feared would have revealed that he was behind the idea of the ‘diseased’ colony to lure Lady Katara and me out.”

They spent a few hours trying to decide what punishment the former assistant deserved, but they would all disagree with each other over one thing or another. Zuko felt as a headache began to form and he was losing his patience with all the arguments going on. Half of the advisors believed Kuro should be given a lenient punishment since he refused to kill the Fire Lord, while the other half argued that the assistant should be given a more severe punishment for going along with half of Kang’s plot.

“Fools,” Wei’s mocking voice made the other men pause in their arguments and turn to glare at him. “The obvious punishment is death for treason.”

The men gasped.
“But he refused to poison Fire Lord Zuko,” one of the men argued.

“He committed treason by not revealing the plot sooner and letting us know that Kang had been behind it,” Wei responded with a sneer. “Because of his silence, I was accused of treachery while the real traitor continued with his life, unperturbed.”

“So you’re taking revenge upon him?” Chao asked with a frown.

Wei gave another shrug that caused his large belly to shake.

“He kept important information secret, and would have continued to do so if he had not been caught,” the rotund advisor continued as he narrowed his eyes on Chao. “His execution will be an example to anyone who dares to take place in a plot against the Fire Lord and the Fire Nation.”

Zuko eyed Wei warily just as the other men murmured to themselves and debated whether or not to agree with him. However, before any of them could voice their opinion, the large double doors were thrown open and the men turned toward the entrance with startled exclamations. Zuko’s golden eyes narrowed in irritation at the rude interruption, but he settled down with a frown when he noticed the captain of the prison guards marching quickly toward the dais where he stopped with one knee and one fist to the ground.

“My lord,” the captain of the prison guards breathed in anxiety as he tried to catch his breath.

“What is it?” Zuko asked in alarm as he sat stiffly on his throne.

Did Ozai escape?

“Physician Toshiro’s former assistant was found dead this morning,” the man informed him as he kept his head bowed in respect.

“What?” Zuko exclaimed with a growl just as the other men gasped in shock. “How did he die? Did you find his murderer?”

“It seems he committed suicide sometime in the middle of the night, my lord,” the guard continued in a grave tone.

“Suicide?” Zuko repeated in disbelief. “How was he able to accomplish it?”

“It appears that he broke the clay cup he had been given to drink water with the night before and used a sharp edge to…slit his wrists,” the man continued, his frown deepening, causing hard lines to surface on his forehead. “He bled to death.”

The old advisors gasped and began to talk rapidly amongst each other at the unexpected news.

“Silence!” the young Fire Lord growled out and the men immediately quieted down.

“How did you not notice until this morning that he was dead?” Zuko asked the captain with a suspicious frown.

“When one of my guards passed his door to check on him during the night, he thought the prisoner was sleeping since he was lying down on the cot and completely covered with a blanket,” the graying-haired guard replied immediately. “The guard that brought him breakfast noticed something was wrong when the prisoner did not respond to him. And when he entered the room to check up on him, he saw one of the prisoner’s hands hanging from the cot…his wrist sliced open.”

Zuko sat back with a frown and suppressed the tired sigh that wanted to escape him.

“But why would he kill himself?” Iroh finally spoke up after remaining quiet during the entire meeting.

The captain shifted his eyes toward the old prince before he again turned his attention to his lord.

“A few hours after being locked up in his cell, the prisoner kept screaming that he had saved the Fire Lord’s life and did not deserve a traitor’s death before he finally quieted down.”

“A traitor’s death?” Zuko repeated with a deep frown. “He was being held in the prison tower until he was brought to me for further questioning. Nobody told him he was going to suffer a traitor’s death. Why would he think that?”
The captain glanced up with an apologetic look.

“I do not know the answer for that, my lord.”

Zuko waved his hand at him to show he did not expect him to answer as he again got lost in his thoughts. He closed his eyes and sighed heavily as the advisors began to speculate amongst themselves in hushed tones.

“Besides screaming that he did not deserve a traitor’s death,” the captain continued slowly as if hesitant to interrupt the Fire Lord’s thoughts, “the prisoner also repeated that he needed to speak to you about something important that would surely sway your mind about executing him.”

“Did he say what that was?” Zuko asked, even though he already knew the answer.

“No, my lord,” the man replied.

Then why would he kill himself, if he knew of something that would save him? Zuko thought to himself as his brow furrowed pensively.

If only Kuro had waited to be interrogated, Zuko would have let him go after a small punishment since the former assistant had saved his life, after all. Even if he had kept Kang’s plot a secret. His death had been in vain and unnecessary.

“Take care of the body, captain,” Zuko finally spoke up.

“Yes, my lord,” the man replied as he continued to kneel before the Fire Lord.

The next few hours, Zuko ordered that the former assistant’s family be informed of what had occurred before he let his advisors know that he would later decide what to do with Kang’s properties and possessions as well as the recovery of his body from where it was buried in the woods. Finally the meeting was concluded, and Zuko and Iroh exited the room in order to have dinner with Ursa, Katara, and her family.
Zuko tuned out his uncle’s words about how strange were the ways of life as he let his mind wander to other things.

He still could not believe that he had found out who the traitor was that had been causing him so much trouble, and although Kuro’s death was unfortunate, there was nothing Zuko could do about it except wonder if he could have gotten more information out of the former assistant. All he needed to do now was find the rebels and put a stop to their terror and their plan of releasing Ozai in order for everything to be peaceful again. Now he did not need to worry about someone targeting Katara as well when they got married.

Was it really that easy?

He could only hope.

Katara watched with curious blue eyes as the fire sages murmured amongst themselves about the right day for the royal wedding to be held. She was kneeling silently beside Zuko as the men continued with their task.

After the last details about Kang and Kuro were finally settled and everything had returned to normal, Zuko had finally taken her to meet with the fire sages. He had apologized again that such matters were causing their wedding planning to be pushed aside, but she again had reassured him that she understood and did not hold it against him.

As they had neared the Fire Temple, she had been worried that the fire sages would be the ones to finally protest the idea of Zuko marrying a Water Tribe woman. But just like Zuko’s advisors and courtiers, the fire sages had reluctantly accepted his choice and immediately began to search for the best day for their wedding. She had been slightly shocked since she had prepared herself for their objections, but she decided not to dwell on that too long, and instead, she allowed herself to be happy in knowing that they had not come across great obstacles. She was so overjoyed at the thought that she really was going to marry Zuko.

The waterbender was brought out of her thoughts when she felt Zuko’s fingers briefly caress her thigh before pulling away. Glancing furtively at him, she saw that he was also looking at her inconspicuously, his amber eyes warm and intense, and she could practically hear his thoughts saying that soon he would make her his. She felt herself blush before she returned her attention to the old fire sages, but not before throwing him a small, happy smile.

Some of the fire sages were looking studiously through old scrolls. Others were looking at the night sky and the positions of the stars and planets through long instruments she had seen a couple of times during her travels that she now knew were called telescopes. Zuko’s birthday and hers were also taken into consideration in order to find a most auspicious day for their wedding. In her tribe, a couple decided upon what day they wanted to marry by the season they favored the most. When she was a little girl she had always imagined her wedding being during the winter since it was her favorite season, but that was before she met Zuko, who as Fire Lord, had to follow his own country’s traditions.

A few minutes passed, and Katara shifted slightly on her cushion since one of her legs was getting cramped from sitting in the same positions for so long. In order to distract herself, Katara looked around the grand temple curiously, but she did not get the chance of seeing much since one of the fire sages finally stepped away from the others and slowly approached her and Zuko.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” the thin, old man that Zuko had introduced her as the Great Fire Sage began, “We have finally found the best date for your wedding to the Lady Katara.”

Zuko gave him a regal nod as he asked, “When?”

“The end of spring, my lord,” the Great Fire Sage informed them, “Exactly two months from now.”

A small frown appeared on Zuko’s impassive features. Two months? It was still a long time for him to wait to marry Katara, but he knew he had no choice but to accept what the fire sages had concluded.

“Thank you,” he finally spoke up before he added in a cool tone, “As the Great Fire Sage, you will lead the ceremony along with the main spiritual leader of my betrothed’s tribe.”

“As you wish, my lord,” the old man replied with a gleeful smile. It was a great honor to participate in the Fire Lord’s wedding.

After a few more details were discussed, Zuko and Katara left the great temple and climbed inside the carriage that would take them back to the Fire Nation Palace.

As soon as the door was closed behind them and the carriage was moving, Zuko pulled her onto his lap and kissed her passionately just like he had done when they had left the palace. Katara moaned into his mouth as their tongues danced around each other’s and Zuko ran a hand up her side. Since no one from her family was near, they had taken advantage and smothered each other with affection and longing kisses. But when Zuko again tried to divest her of her clothes, she playfully smacked his hand away like she had done before and climbed off his lap with a giggle.

“I had to try again,” he remarked with a smirk as he tried to regain his composure.

Katara rolled her eyes at him as she straightened her clothes and smoothed down her hair even as her cheeks continued to flush.

“Two more months will give me more time to prepare for the wedding,” she said happily.

“Two months is two months too long for me to wait to marry you,” Zuko grumbled as he leaned back and crossed his arms over his chest with a frown.

Katara giggled at him and she was almost tempted to tease him and ask if the mighty Fire Lord was pouting, but she decided not to say anything since she herself was anxious for the wedding day to finally arrive.

“Shouldn’t you be celebrating your last days as a bachelor?” she asked with a teasing smile.

Zuko snorted as he uncrossed his arms to give her a dry look.

“What’s there to celebrate?” he asked dryly. “It’s not as if I enjoyed my bachelorhood.”

A mischievous smirk curled his lips as he leaned toward her, reaching out a hand to trail the back of his fingers on her stomach, up between her breasts, across her collarbone, and then down her side. His smirk widened when she shivered and bit her lip at his touch.

“Besides, I am sure to celebrate much more pleasantly on our wedding night,” he told her in a hushed, husky tone.

He suppressed a grin when Katara’s cheeks immediately reddened, and he leaned down to nuzzle her flushed flesh before kissing her sweet lips. She responded to him immediately, opening her mouth eagerly, and pressing herself closer to him. Zuko groaned against her mouth when she began to rub her breasts against his chest as she breathlessly murmured his name. He could feel his hard shaft pressing against his trousers and he knew it would not go away if Katara did not do something to relieve his tension.

“Katara, if you don’t let me touch you and you don’t touch me, I’m going to go insane,” he rasped against her eager mouth.

Panting softly, Katara pulled back slightly, her heart pounding hard in her chest, her arousal seeping into her wrappings, and she smiled at the strained and intense expression on her soon-to-be husband’s face. She knew having to hold back because of her family’s presence was greatly affecting him—heck, it was affecting her too—and she did not want to keep denying them when they had this opportunity. Leaning toward him again, she sweetly kissed his lips as she wrapped her arms around his neck.

“Then what are you waiting for?” she asked throatily.

Zuko’s eyes widened a little at her quick acceptance, but he did not hesitate for fear that she would change her mind. With a low, husky growl, he pulled Katara onto his lap until she was straddling his hips, her long dress rising to her thighs. They both groaned when his hard length pressed against her aching warmth. Grasping her ass gently with both his hands, Zuko began to rock her against him, following the rhythm of the swaying carriage. It wouldn’t do to have the guards knowing what they were up to.

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara moaned softly as she dug her nails into his shoulders. “Mmm, that feels so good.”

The firebender ground her against his cock and he groaned quietly as pleasure skittered up his spine. He removed a hand from one of her ass cheeks and he reached up to firmly grasp her breast. Katara threw her head back with a gasp and her eyes fluttered closed when her core clenched at the pleasure. Suddenly, she felt Zuko wrap his arms around her before he carefully brought them down upon the floor of the carriage. She spread her legs wider so he could fit his hips perfectly between them and smiled when he rasped her name. She arched her back when he began to grind his hardness against her throbbing core, hitting that sensitive nub above her drenched entrance, and she wrapped her legs around his waist to pull him closer. She could feel another surge of wetness seep from her pussy and pleasure coursed throughout her body. She missed being this close to Zuko.

“Katara,” the young Fire Lord growled lowly in pleasure when she began to rock herself against him. “Damn, so good.”

He swooped down and again captured her lips in a soft and passionate kiss just as he grabbed her breast. He kneaded the soft mound as his tongue tangled with hers while he rubbed his erection tight and roughly against her center. A few moments later, he felt her body begin to thrash as she let out a low whimper and he mentally smiled in satisfaction that he already brought her so close to the edge. He could feel himself reaching that glorious end as well and he began to grind harder against her. Groaning, he firmly pinched her nipple through her clothes just as he pressed himself tightly against the damp heat between her luscious legs. He swallowed her loud moan just as her body arched against him and her limbs tightened around him. A second later, he was softly groaning his release as he slowly rocked against her, vaguely paying attention to the sensation of his hot seed coating the inside of his trousers. Once spent, he carefully slumped over her with a quiet moan of her name.

Katara sighed softly in satisfaction as she caressed Zuko’s hair, her body still giving little spasms of pleasure. If she had not been feeling so wonderful, she would have flushed at the sensation of her arousal drenching her undergarments. Her heart warmed at the comforting feeling of having Zuko’s larger body pressed close to hers and the warm sensation of his panting breath against the skin of her neck. She was no longer surprised how well Zuko could make her body follow his erotic demands. It also pleased her that she could do the same thing to his body. There was no denying their bodies and pleasures were truly compatible. It only made her wonder how much more incredible it would be when they finally made love in the true sense of the word.

Once coherent thought returned, Zuko realized Katara might be feeling uncomfortable lying on the hard floor of the carriage. Wrapping his arms around her, he rose to his knees and carefully sat back on the cushioned bench. He placed his waterbender sideways on his lap and kissed her temple before he tucked her head under his chin.

Katara murmured softly as she snuggled close to his chest. Her body felt sluggish in her sated state. How could she deny him when he made her feel so good, so cherished?

“I can’t wait for these two months to be over,” Zuko murmured deeply as one of his hands slowly played with her long, wavy hair.

“Me too,” the waterbender replied softly as her fingers traced patterns on his covered chest.

She felt Zuko grasp the back of her head and gently nudge it back. Katara lifted her head to look at him. He leaned his head down and she eagerly lifted hers to meet his lips halfway. Their mouths touched in a languid, sensual kiss and they murmured softly against each other.

Their moment was interrupted when the carriage came to a stop and they heard their driver jump from his seat in order to open their door. The young couple quickly pulled away from each other as they scrambled to straighten themselves before they caught each other’s eye and laughed.
“Sokka and your father would have my head if they knew what we just did even after all their precautions,” Zuko said in a low tone, his eyes gleaming in amusement, as he smoothed down Katara’s hair.

“Good thing they won’t know,” Katara replied with a grin as she fixed his fire crown.

A few minutes later they were inside the palace. They made a quick stop at their respective rooms to quickly wash and change before they went in search of their family in order to give them the news that they finally had set the date for their wedding. Shen and Kuo followed silently behind the couple. Both guards smiled discreetly at each other since they could see that their lord was happy. They had never seen him look so content in all the years they had served him.

As they rounded a corner, they saw Physician Toshiro walking down the corridor with a short, young woman at his side. Katara noticed that the woman was really pretty with dark hair pulled up into a bun and skin as pale and blemish-free as most of the noblewomen. Although she was wearing the clothes of a servant, Katara could see that she carried herself in a different manner, more graceful and refined than normal maids. As soon as the physician spotted Zuko, he smiled widely and quickened his pace to meet him.

“Fire Lord Zuko,” he greeted with a small bow that the young woman mimicked although she kept her head down. “I was on my way to your study to see if you had finally come back.”

“We just arrived from the Fire Temple,” Zuko responded as he glanced at Katara with a gleam in his eye.

“Oh, I see. Congratulations,” Physician Toshiro told them sincerely before he gasped softly as if he had just remembered something.

“Oh! I just wanted to tell you that I found a new assistant,” he said as he indicated to the silent woman beside him. “This is Yin-Min. I wanted to present her to you for approval after what happened with…my other assistant.”

He frowned deeply and Zuko saw the sadness that flashed in the old man’s eyes. Zuko had heard that Physician Toshiro had looked at Kuro as a son for the old physician only had daughters, and Zuko could only guess how greatly betrayed he felt.

When he noticed that Physician Toshiro was still waiting for him to approve of his choice, Zuko finally looked at the young woman who had not said a single word. He was surprised to see that she was wearing the uniform all maids wore and he wondered why Physician Toshiro had chosen a servant for his assistant. As he looked her over, Zuko realized he had seen the young woman a couple of times cleaning the royal family wing and guest wing, but he had never paid much attention to her. He did not know her and he was wary of her becoming the new physician’s assistant.

“How is it that you could help Physician Toshiro?” he asked her calculatingly.

The young woman jumped when he addressed her and she nervously bowed her head.

“I was a top student in the medicinal arts when I used to attend the Fire Nation Academy for Girls, my lord,” she replied quietly.

Katara looked at the young woman in surprise. She wondered how a servant could have attended a prestigious academy meant only for the nobility. It seemed Zuko thought the same thing since he was frowning and looking at the woman suspiciously.

“Did you truly attend the academy?” he asked her doubtfully.

Yin-Min nodded as she glanced briefly at the tall Fire Lord before she again lowered her eyes.

“I did until my stepfather took me out of the academy seven years ago in order to become one of Ozai’s…concubines,” she said very quietly that they almost did not hear her.

Katara gasped softly as she watched the woman avert her eyes and clasp her hands tightly together as she ducked her head. Yin-Min did not look much older than herself, so Katara concluded with sympathy that she must have been very young when she became Ozai’s concubine.

Zuko cleared his throat uncomfortably as he glanced at his physician.

“She is very knowledgeable in the art of medicine, my lord,” Physician Toshiro told him with a firm nod.

Zuko again returned his attention to the quiet woman before him. She must be one of the few of Ozai’s concubines that had decided to remain in the palace as servants when Zuko gave them the choice when he became Fire Lord.

“How will I know you would not betray me?” he asked her sternly.

Yin-Min’s head snapped up at his words and she looked at him with wide, yellowish eyes.

“I will never betray or hurt you, my lord,” she said steadfastly, her posture now strong as she tried to make her loyalty known. “Not after you rescued me and my friends from Ozai’s clutches and gave me a choice to remain in the palace as a servant instead of making me return home where I am unwanted and mistreated.”

Katara felt her heart go out to the young woman who seemed had suffered so much in her young life. She was timid and hurt, and Katara felt herself get angry at the thought that such a fragile girl had to be subjugated to Ozai’s lust just because her stepfather had wanted to rise in prestige among the Royal Court. Katara looked at Zuko, silently beseeching him to accept Physician Toshiro’s choice of assistant.

Zuko saw Katara almost pleading with him to give the woman a chance. With an inward sigh about how easily he caved when Katara looked at him in that way, Zuko turned to the physician and nodded. Shen and Kuo, who had seen the exchange, suppressed their amused smiles.

“Alright. If you believe she will be of help, then I approve of your choice, Physician Toshiro,” he said.

“Thank you,” the man said with a bow.

Zuko turned to the woman and he raised an eyebrow at her.

“As long as you do your duties, you will be his assistant,” he told her firmly.

Yin-Min smiled widely before she caught herself. She blushed faintly as she gave him a grateful bow.
“I promise I will do my duties well, my lord,” she vowed.

“I will teach her all she needs to know,” Physician Toshiro added.

Zuko did not reply as he gave a nod before he walked past them and headed down the corridor.

“Congratulations,” Katara told the woman sincerely.

Yin-Min looked up in surprise before she bowed her head.

“Thank you,” she said softly.

Katara smiled at them before she walked quickly away to catch up to Zuko, who had stopped to wait for her and his two personal guards when he finally noticed that she had not been walking beside him. She smiled at him and he returned the smile briefly before he again made his way down the golden passageway.

As they reached the western wing, the small group came upon Jiao and a short-haired servant carrying empty trays as they made their way to the kitchens.

“Jiao, where is everybody?” Zuko asked as the two women bowed respectfully.

Jiao did not need to wonder who he was referring to since the only people he interacted with willingly were his family and Lady Katara’s.

“They are drinking tea in the sitting room, my lord,” she replied with a small smile that she also directed at Katara.

Since the Royal Palace Garden was being restored, the sitting room was the place that they all gathered in now.

Katara watched as Jiao discreetly glanced at Kuo, who caught her eye and smiled at her. The young servant blushed as she bowed to Zuko and Katara before she scurried away with the tray held tightly in her hands while the other servant hurried after her.

“Shen, Kuo, you may take your break now,” the Fire Lord spoke up as he turned to glance at his guards.

“Thank you, my lord,” they replied in unison with a bow and a small smile directed at Katara before they turned and followed after Jiao and the other maid toward the kitchens.

Zuko again began to walk, heading toward the sitting room, and Katara quickened her pace to catch up to him.

“Is it just me or does Jiao always blush when Kuo’s near?” Katara whispered to Zuko.

“I’ve noticed too, but what of it?” Zuko responded with a shrug. “Kuo has that effect on many women.”

“Yeah, but Kuo acts differently around Jiao,” the waterbender retorted as she glanced behind her where the two people they were talking about had disappeared to.

“Don’t start seeing things that are not there, Katara,” he told her with a small frown.

“Well, it’d be nice if they ended up together,” she said with a wistful sigh.

“Well, don’t get your hopes up,” the firebender advised her.

“Why do you have to ruin my fun?” Katara asked with a huff.

Zuko chuckled quietly as he threw her an amused look, but he did not respond since they had finally arrived at the sitting room. His mother and Katara’s female relatives were drinking tea, eating pastries, and talking. Iroh and Pakku were playing Pai Sho while Hakoda and Sokka watched. They all stopped what they were doing and looked up when Katara and Zuko stepped into the room. Suddenly, the place was filled with commotion as they all asked at once what day did that fire sages decide on for the royal wedding.
Katara smiled happily as she moved away from Zuko’s side and glided swiftly to where the women were sitting.

“It’ll be in the end of spring!” she exclaimed joyfully.

“Exactly two months from now,” Zuko continued in a more subdued tone yet not lacking in happiness.

Everybody again began to talk excitedly at the news.

“We need to send the invitations as soon as possible!” Ursa exclaimed.

“We need to start on the wedding dress!” Kanna and Suki said at the same time.

“We need to begin planning the wedding celebration!” Iroh piped in cheerfully.

Zuko was unable to curb his sigh as the women and his uncle prattled on and on. He glanced to his side when Hakoda and Sokka approached him with the same tired expression on their faces.

“Can we go to your study to talk?” Hakoda spoke above the squeals and exclamations.

The young Fire Lord mentally thanked his future father-in-law for giving him an excuse to escape. Planning any kind of celebration was not his thing.

“Of course,” Zuko responded with a nod as he turned around and walked out of the room with the two Water Tribe men.

Once they finally arrived at his study, Zuko made his way to his large chair while the other two men sat across from him after Sokka had closed the door behind them.

“What do you want to talk about?” Zuko asked coolly, though inwardly he was feeling a bit anxious.
What if Hakoda was beginning to regret giving him his consent to marry Katara?

“I must return to the Southern Water Tribe,” Hakoda began as he leaned back in his seat, “I have been away from my duties for too long and we also need to prepare our end of the wedding preparations.”

Zuko inclined his head to show he understood, but before he could talk, Hakoda continued.

“Because it is tradition in our tribe, Katara has to come with us and live with her family until the day she gets married as a…precaution,” the chief said and cleared his throat as he glanced at his son.

Sokka had the decency to blush since he had gotten Suki pregnant before they got married.

Zuko frowned and he felt his heart sink at the thought of Katara leaving him even if it was just for two months. He did not want to let her out of his sight, he did not want to be without her presence, but he understood that it was the tradition in the tribes. He could not argue with them since they were already consenting to do many things the way they were supposed to go in his own country’s traditions.

“I understand,” Zuko finally replied even as his hands clenched.

“I plan on us leaving tomorrow,” Hakoda continued.

“Tomorrow?!” Zuko repeated in disbelief.

It was too soon! He wouldn’t have enough time with Katara before she left!

“It’ll give us more time to have everything finished for the wedding,” Sokka spoke up with a knowing smile.

Zuko gave a nod as a response.

“We should tell Katara now,” the blue-eyed chieftain said as he stood up.
Both Water Tribesmen paused when the Fire Lord cleared his throat and they turned to look at him.

“There’s a favor that I’d like to ask of you to do while you’re in the Southern Water Tribe,” he began.

“What kind of favor?” Sokka asked curiously.

After discussing what Zuko wanted of them, the three men left the study. Soon they were in the sitting room once again where the women and his uncle were still chattering about the day of the wedding and what needed to be done before it. Hakoda cleared his throat a few times until he finally gained their attention.

Katara looked at her father curiously before she glanced at Zuko, and even though he was not showing a single emotion on his face, she could see the discontent in his eyes.

“What’s wrong?” she asked worriedly as she stood up from her spot between Lady Ursa and Gran-Gran.

“We need to return to the Southern Water Tribe before the wedding, we leave tomorrow,” Hakoda answered her question.

Katara gasped softly as her eyes again locked with Zuko’s. She did not want to leave him, but she knew she could not go against her father wishes, not until she was married and moved out of her father’s house. But she still did not want to leave Zuko, even if it was just for two months.

“We should start packing our things,” Kanna spoke up as she stood up from her spot with Pakku’s help.

Katara and Zuko did not look away from each other as the others started to make their way to the door, though Hakoda stayed at the entrance to watch Zuko warily. Katara could see the subtle message in Zuko’s golden eyes and her heart pounded. Before Zuko could say anything to Katara, Suki slowly approached them. Zuko looked away from Katara and glanced at the female warrior, who looked at them with a grin when Katara blushed deeply at being caught staring so intently at Zuko.
“Katara, do you want me to help you pack?” she asked with a smile to show she would pretend she saw nothing. “We can even have a sleepover before we have to leave tomorrow.”

Zuko and Katara frowned before they caught the knowing gleam in Suki’s eyes. Zuko suppressed a smirk and Katara blushed faintly. How did Suki know?

“Sure, thanks,” Katara responded as she smiled at her sister-in-law.

Suki grinned at them both before she turned around and waited for the waterbender in order to give them a few more moments together. Satisfied that his daughter was not going to be alone with Zuko, Hakoda turned around and left. Suki watched her father-in-law go and mentally grinned. Oh, if only the chieftain knew what the looks Katara and Zuko were throwing at each other meant. She did not know for sure if her sister-in-law and Zuko were already intimate, but she had a feeling they would like to have some alone time before they left the Fire Nation. Suki hoped that by pretending she would be helping Katara, Hakoda would not get it into his head to start snooping around in order to keep his daughter safe from the Fire Lord.

“I’ll see you tomorrow for breakfast,” Zuko told his waterbender with a small smile before he whispered, “I’ll be in your room later tonight.”

Katara felt her body tingle with anticipation even as her heart ached with sadness at their separation. She gave him a small smile.

“See you tomorrow.”

Katara anxiously paced the length of her room as she waited for Zuko to show up. She paused and her heart pounded in her chest when she heard the soft knock at her window. The waterbender quickly went over to pull the curtains aside and open the window. She stepped back to let Zuko enter. He was again wearing his Blue Spirit outfit minus his swords. Zuko swiftly closed the window and the long curtains before he pulled down his mask over the back of his head. As soon as he turned around, Katara flung her arms around his neck and Zuko wrapped his arms around her body and lifted her to him, their lips instantly crashing together in a desperate and hard kiss.

“I don’t want to leave,” she told him between kisses.

“I don’t want you to leave either,” he responded against her soft lips as he brought her even closer to him.
“But I have to,” the waterbender replied with a sigh.

She pulled slightly away from his kisses and Zuko watched as she looked up at him with hesitating eyes.

“I don’t want to leave you, but I also need this. I want to visit the Southern Water Tribe one last time before I become your wife and the Fire Nation becomes my permanent home,” she said softly and held her breath almost as if she were waiting for him to get angry or disappointed.

“I understand and I won’t take that away from you,” Zuko responded with a soft smile to convey he did not resent her feelings, “Especially since you have to give up so many things to become my wife.”

“All that matters to me is that I’ll be your wife,” she replied with a gleeful smile which then turned sad as she pressed her cheek on his chest and whispered, “I’m going to miss you.”

“Me too,” he said with a sigh.

“I’ll try to come back two weeks before the wedding to help Ursa and Iroh,” she added softly.

“I’ll be eagerly waiting your return,” he said as he tightened his hold of her.

They pulled apart to look at each other, their eyes met with an electrifying intensity, and then their lips were once again devouring each other’s. As their mouths continued to ravish one another, Zuko moved the hand that had been holding the back of Katara’s head and trailed it down her cheek, sliding it softly against her neck until his fingers came in contact with the hem of her nightgown. Katara let out a disappointed moan when Zuko’s mouth left hers before a sigh escaped her when he touched his lips to her cheek, following the trail his hand had created before down her neck and pressing his lips against her betrothal necklace.

His fingers pulled her collar aside and he nuzzled against her hot skin for a moment. He pulled back slightly to gaze at her soft brown flesh and he smiled when he noticed that, although the love bite he had given her was very faint, it was still there.
Katara watched as her firebender’s golden eyes gleamed with restrained desire and pride as he gazed at her neck and she knew what he was staring at so intensely.

“The love bite is fading, but now that you are wearing my ring and betrothal necklace, everybody will know you belong to me,” he said with a soft growl.

Katara gasped when his mouth came into contact with the fading love bite he had left on her skin, sucking and nipping at it softly, not hard enough to break the skin, but enough to send her senses flaring with heat.

“Very soon, Katara,” he began huskily as he softly kissed the fading mark, “You’ll be completely mine.”

The waterbender did not respond as she tilted her head closer to him, touching her lips to the pale skin below Zuko’s right ear before she trailed them slowly closer to his jaw. She parted her lips slightly and touched the tip of her wet tongue on his skin, causing Zuko to jump slightly and gasp in surprise at the unexpected sensation at the contact. Katara continued to lavish his skin with soft licks and nips that made Zuko groan, and before he knew what she intended to do, she bit him.

Zuko’s body jerked in shock, a loud growl erupting through his lips as the small pain sent a shot of pleasure straight to his groin, causing his cock to harden even further. When Katara pulled away to soothe the sting with her tongue, he grasped her hair to tilt her head back so he could crash his mouth against hers.

“Did you just mark me?” he asked incredulously against her lips as he stared into her bright, blue eyes in astonishment.

“Yes,” Katara responded without hesitation even as her cheeks flooded with color. “Like you said, the betrothal ring and necklace allows everybody know that I belong to you…”

She trailed off and she lightly touched the spot where she had bitten him with her finger. When Zuko hissed and tightened his hold on her, a smirk curled her lips.

“So I only though it fair that I should leave a mark on you to show everybody that you belong to me,” she continued smugly before she narrowed her eyes as she growled out, “Hopefully once they see my mark, no woman will approached you while I’m away.”
“Even if they did, I will order them away,” Zuko promised as he suppressed a smile at her jealousy and possessiveness. They were both so alike.

He pressed his finger on the stinging bite between his ear and his jaw, and he smirked since he knew that Katara had chosen a spot where her mark would be visible for all to see since he would not be able to hide it. Not that he wanted to. Not only would everybody know that she was his, but everybody would now that he was hers while they were separated.

Groaning, he bent down to capture her lips in another passionate kiss. Katara moaned as she pressed herself closer to him, rubbing her breasts against his chest and grinding her stomach against his hard erection. Liquid heat pooled between her legs. With a soft growl, Zuko scooped her up into his arms and swiftly carried her to her bed.

No more words were said as they held each other close. Wet tongues intertwined inside hot mouths, desperate hands roamed feverish bodies, hearts pounded hard against aching chests as they tried to take something from the other to cherish during their brief separation.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko watched with a stoic expression on his face as the Southern Water Tribe vessel was being loaded. The young Fire Lord tuned out what his family, Katara, and her family were saying as the ache on his chest grew at the thought that she was leaving. Not only did he not want to wait two long months to finally make her his wife, but he was not going to see her, kiss her, or be in her presence for those months. He had grown so accustomed to the fact that he could see her whenever he wished, that now he did not know how he would be able to continue without her presence. How did he even live without her before?

Discreetly, Zuko pressed lightly against the mark Katara had left on his skin the previous night. As he had entered the royal family dining hall that morning, he had immediately felt every eye in the room zoom in on the love bite. His uncle had winked at him, his mother had blushed lightly, Suki had grinned, Kanna had frowned slightly but a small smile had appeared on her thin lips, while Katara’s male relatives all glared at him suspiciously. He had ignored them as he took a seat at the head of the table and turned to greet Katara, who sat quietly next to him. Everybody then turned to Katara as if she would confirm their suspicions. His waterbender had flushed deeply, but luckily Iroh and Suki had spoken up and quickly diverted their attention.

During his meeting with his advisors after breakfast, the men had stared at the mark near his jaw in surprise and the servants stared at it with curiosity. Zuko refused to hide it. Instead, he wore it proudly and smugly, which caused Katara to flush with pleasure.

But now she was leaving. And the love bite would soon fade.
He was brought out of his thoughts when he noticed Katara disengage herself from everybody and began to approach him. His mother and uncle smiled as they walked to the awaiting carriage while Katara’s family began to board the swift vessel after again saying goodbye to him. He mentally thanked them since he knew they were all giving Katara and him a moment alone to themselves.

Katara gave him a small smile as he stared down at her.

“I know I’ll see you soon,” she began softly, “but I’m going to miss you so much.”

“I will miss you, too,” he replied in the same quiet tone.

Katara remained silent as she stared into Zuko’s simmering, golden eyes, waiting for him to say something else or give her a farewell hug. But when he did neither, she smiled since she knew that Zuko hated showing any kind of affection in front of other people. She sighed softly as she continued to smile sadly at him.

“I’ll see you in a month and a half,” she told him as she began to turn away.

Suddenly struck by the full significance of how miserable he would be with her gone, Zuko stepped forward, and to her shock as well as those around them, clasped her to him tightly and captured her lips in an ardent kiss. He did not care if everybody saw them. He had to kiss her one more time before they had to separate again. Let them see how much this wonderful woman had changed him. Let them see how much she meant to him.

When he finally pulled slightly away to gaze down at her, Katara’s blue eyes were dazed and her cheeks were glowing with her blush.

“I wish Agni could make time go by quickly,” he whispered as his mouth lingered over hers, “I can’t bear the thought of you leaving and not being able to see you, touch you, or kiss you.”

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara sniffled as she stared sadly into his eyes, “That’s how I feel, too. I don’t want to leave, but I have to.”

“I know,” he replied with a soft smile as he brushed away a tear that had escaped her eye with his thumb. “I will be counting the days until you finally become my wife.”
“Oh, Zuko,” Katara breathed and sighed blissfully.

Before she could say anything else, the sound of someone clearing their throat brought them out of their own little world. Zuko immediately moved a step back from her as he cleared his own throat before they turned to their side to see Sokka standing with his arms crossed.

“Can you guys hurry it up?” Sokka told them with exaggerated exasperation. “We’d like to set sail sometime today.”

He grinned when his sister and his future brother-in-law glared at him. With another exasperated sigh, he turned and made his way toward the ship, but not before throwing them another grin.

Katara and Zuko looked at each other again. Without saying another word, they kissed one more time, their lips lingering for a moment, before Katara stepped away and turned to follow her brother. Just as she was about to step on the ramp, she glanced over her shoulder at Zuko, who was still watching her, before she boarded the ship.

The firebender watched the sleek vessel glide away as Katara moved to stand at the back of the ship’s deck. They held each other’s gaze as the vessel continued to sail away. Zuko continued to stare after his waterbender until the ship disappeared in the horizon and a sigh escaped him as that ache in his chest grew a bit more.

It’s just a little over a month, he repeated to himself.

He glanced to his right when he felt someone step up next to him. When he saw it was his uncle, the young lord again returned his attention to the blue sea. Blue like the eyes of the woman he loved.

“Before you know it, you’ll be a married man, Nephew,” Iroh commented with cheerful chuckle.

Zuko did not reply as he turned around and headed toward the carriage where his mother was waiting for them. He heard his uncle chuckle again as he followed him.

Zuko smiled since his uncle was right. The next time he saw Katara, they would be getting married.
He could not wait.

End of Part Five
Final Preparations

Closing the heavy steel door behind him, Zuko blinked as his eyes adjusted to the darkness of the dank cell. The flames from the torch beside the door cast disturbing shadows along the walls. Zuko’s eyes coolly observed the dark room before he settled his sight on the figure resting against a wall behind the cell bars.

“Ozai,” he called out dispassionately.

His sire stirred and sat up to glare at him. Standing smoothly to his feet, the former Fire Lord allowed a mocking smile to touch his pale lips.

“Why, Zuko,” he greeted, “how nice of you to visit your father. It’s been awhile.”

Zuko ignored his mocking tone and glared at him. With a sniff, Ozai flicked a piece of his long, dirty hair over his shoulder.

“There must be something you want from me if you brought yourself to see me,” the older man said with a quirked eyebrow.

Zuko again remained silent as he studied his ruthless father. There was indeed something Zuko wanted from him, but would Ozai tell him what he wanted to know? Zuko mentally snorted. He highly doubted his sire would help him. But still, Zuko needed to do something even if it seemed impossible to gain what he wanted. He was tired of waiting idly for news of the rebels. It had been a week since Katara’s departure to the Southern Water Tribe and he missed her terribly. He wanted to ensure Katara’s safety when they got married in two months and he could hardly do that with Jianguo and the rebels on the loose. But would his father give him the answers he needed?

“I remember from my last visit that you told Mother you would reclaim her and the throne,” Zuko began in an impassive tone, “What made you so confident you would succeed?”

Ozai gave a nonchalant shrug of his shoulders and glanced down at his dirty nails.

“What makes you believe I’m confident I would succeed?” Ozai countered evasively. “I could have just said that in my anger. Or maybe I just wanted Ursa to know she’s still mine. Or I just wanted to anger you. Who knows?” Another shrug followed his statement.
The younger man growled at his sire’s oblique words.

“Mother doesn’t belong to you,” Zuko growled lowly. He wanted to make this point clear and added, “You lost every right to call her your wife when you banished her from the palace and abandoned her to live a hard life just so you could become Fire Lord.”

Zuko felt a small amount of satisfaction when Ozai’s impudent manner and expression immediately shifted to one of anger and pain. He watched as his sire tried to relax from his suddenly stiff posture and unclench his hands.

Good. He was glad to know he could unsettle Ozai.

“She belonged to me once and she will belong to me again!” the older man growled.

“Keep telling yourself that,” the young Fire Lord said smoothly. “She will never go back to you. She hates you.”

Ozai’s golden eyes blazed in rage and his face contorted into any angry snarl, but Zuko could detect the pain hidden in his eyes. However, he could find no sympathy within him for Ozai after everything he had done to his mother.

“So here you will stay to rot like the monster you are,” Zuko added.

“You insolent brat!” Ozai snarled. “Instead of just scarring you face, I should have ended your life!”

Zuko inwardly flinched. Even though he did not care about Ozai, it still hurt to think his own father hated him so much as to want to outright kill him. But he would not let that bring him down. He had matured and done well without a father (for the most part), so he did not need Ozai. Besides, Iroh was a great surrogate and now Zuko found the love and affection he needed from Katara.

“Too bad you didn’t succeed in that,” Zuko finally replied to the older man’s irate words.
“Oh, don’t count yourself lucky yet,” Ozai chuckled humorlessly before he hissed, “I will find a way out of this wretched hell hole even if I have to sell my soul to Koh.”

“I’m sure Koh would appreciate adding your face to his collection,” Zuko replied indifferently.

Ozai growled. Zuko’s satisfaction immediately changed into one of wariness when he saw a leering smirk suddenly appear on his sire’s thin lips. Ozai flicked his long hair over his shoulder as he relaxed his posture.

“So tell me, Zuko, how is that erotic waterbender of yours? Why didn’t you bring her with you, hm?” Ozai asked leeringly.

Zuko tensed this time and he glared at the older man.

“She is none of your concern,” Zuko growled out.

“My, such protectiveness,” Ozai taunted before he lewdly added, “Why don’t you bring her back so I could play with her? Maybe she can pry the information you need out of me by using her hot body to pleasure mine? I’m sure that hot little mouth of hers can have me spilling all my secrets and—”

“Shut up!” Zuko roared furiously as he blasted a fire ball at Ozai’s feet, causing the older man to jump back with a curse. “I swear I’ll cut off your disgusting tongue and feed it to the wolf-dogs! I won’t have you talking about my future wife in such a way!”

“Future wife?!” Ozai exclaimed incredulously. His eyes widened in disbelief before he narrowed them as he growled, “You’ve got to be joking! I won’t have you tainting the purity of our line with a woman from such a primitive country! Hell, I would rather you tie yourself to that cold bitch Mai than have a tribe woman as Fire Lady!”

“I don’t give a damn about what you think!” Zuko snarled as his body shook with his rage. “You have no say in who I marry. Katara is going to be my wife and I could not have asked for a better woman in my life.”

“If it’s because you derive so much pleasure from her body, then I understand wanting her around, but you don’t have to marry her,” Ozai sneered, “She can serve you well enough as your concubine and give you the pleasures you need—”
“I thought I told you not to talk about her in such a way!” Zuko growled angrily as his hands blazed at his sides. “I’m marrying her and no one, especially not you, will stop me.”

“You’re such a fool! Don’t you see you’re making a mistake?” Ozai hissed.

“You’re one to talk,” Zuko replied darkly, “You did all those horrible things to Mother just to gain control of the throne and now you want her back. I won’t make the same mistake as you and cast the woman I care for from my side.”

Zuko took a deep breath to calm himself before he turned around and headed toward the door when he found he could not bring down his anger.

“I see I wasted my time here,” he said coldly.

“This isn’t over, boy!” Ozai screamed after him.

Zuko ignored his shouts as he stepped out of the cell and closed the heavy door with a loud slam, effectively cutting off his sire’s words. He locked the door and nodded grimly at the guards posted outside before he strode down the dark corridor as he tried to rein in his temper. He could still hear Ozai ranting as he walked away. He knew it was a mistake coming to visit Ozai. His sire never helped him before so why would he start doing so now? He would just have to find another means of locating Jianguo and the rebels.

Zuko’s mind shifted from his disastrous meeting with his father and instead focused on his upcoming marriage to Katara. In just a little over a month he would see her again. He could not wait to kiss her, touch her, and hold her in his arms. And soon they would be married and she would never leave his side nor he hers.

He would never make the same mistakes as his father did.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

A proud smile touched Katara’s lips as she watched her young waterbending students complete their last bending move. This was her last waterbending class with them before she had to take up her responsibilities as Fire Lady.
“You all did so well today,” Katara praised the little ones before she gave them a sad smile. “I’m so proud of all of you.”

“Thank you, Master Katara,” the children chorused as they relaxed in their stance. They smiled at her knowingly.

They all knew this was the last time they were going to have the kind waterbender as their teacher before she had to go live in the Fire Nation with her new husband. The children had enthusiastically congratulated her on her marriage to Fire Lord Zuko and it had warmed her heart.

“Will you come visit us again?” the youngest of her students asked.

“Of course,” Katara responded with a smile.

“Will Fire Lord Zuko come with you, too?” the oldest boy asked hopefully.

Katara suppressed a grin at the look of hero worship in the boy’s eyes.

“Yes, he will,” she replied with a smile.

After a few more curious, childish questions, congratulations, and ‘see you later, Master Katara!’ the children bounded away to go penguin sledding. Katara watched them go with a wistful smile. Startled out of her melancholy mood, she looked down to her side when she felt the bottom of her parka being tugged gently. She smiled when she saw it was Lien, the little girl Zuko had saved the last time he had visited the Southern Water Tribe for Sokka and Suki’s wedding.

“I knew you were gonna marry Fire Lord Zuko,” Lien said with a grin. “I told you he liked you.”

Katara laughed happily as she bent down to hug the little girl tightly who giggled along with her. Katara pulled away to playfully tap Lien on the nose.

“You were right. I should’ve listened to you,” the waterbender commented with a grin.
“My daddy says that I’m too smart for my age,” the little girl said proudly.

“And he’s right,” Katara agreed with a serious nod before she smiled.

“I wish I could go to your wedding,” Lien grumbled as she crossed her arms. “I wanna see you marry Fire Lord Zuko.”

“We’ll come visit you,” Katara told her as she tickled her sides to make the little girl laugh.

“Promise?” Lien asked after she stopped laughing.

“I promise,” the waterbender replied.

Lien smiled, and after a quick hug and a goodbye, she raced after her friends to play with the penguins.

The smile on Katara’s face fell since penguin sledding reminded her of Aang. She sighed sadly at the memory as she began to make her way home. She had not heard from him since his confrontation with Zuko and she wondered if he was okay and if Toph was helping him. Before she left the Fire Nation, Katara had asked Lady Ursa to send a wedding invitation to Toph’s parents’ house in case both young benders stopped by. Though, Katara did not know if Aang would come to her and Zuko’s wedding. It would be nice if both her friends were there to share such a happy day with her, but she would understand if Aang did not want to go. However, if he decided not to attend the wedding, Katara would not have that ruin the day she was to become Zuko’s wife.

Katara reached into the pocket of her parka to retrieve her mittens only to have her fingers brush against paper. She smiled before she excitedly pulled out the letter Zuko had sent her and she had received on her way to her last waterbending class. She eagerly broke the red seal on the scroll and quickly unfurled another of the many letters Zuko had sent her over the past weeks. Her eyes lovingly caressed the masculine writing of her beloved.

Katara

How are you? I hope you are doing just as well as you have said in your previous letters, which, by the way, I keep rereading just so I can imagine your voice recounting what you have written to me.
Katara smiled since it was the same thing she did, rereading every word he had written and cherishing it in her heart.

The next part of Zuko’s letter was always the same. He would write about his Fire Lord duties, his investigation about the rebels, his arguments with his advisors, how the wedding preparations were coming along for their part, and how his mother and his uncle were driving him insane with everything. She had guessed that Zuko always wrote this informative part in order to balance the last part of his letter, which was more about his feelings and his longings for her. Only Zuko would add mundane information in a love letter. She giggled as she continued reading.

I miss you so much, Katara. You have no idea how many times I find myself turning to ask you a question, or reaching out to draw you close to me so I could kiss you, only to realize that you are not there. I wish you were here with me. I wish I were there with you. And it kills me to think that I still have to wait three more weeks before I can see you again.

I love you so much, Katara. Ever since I met you, you woke up feelings in me that I never thought could be real. Such strong feelings that I have never felt for anybody else before. And that’s not adding how greatly you have increased my libido. All I can think about is making love to you. I must admit that it even shocks me at how much I lust after you. What have you done to me?

Yet, I would have it no other way. I will show you how much I desire and love you on our wedding night, so I warn you now that you better be prepared, my little waterbender.

Katara blushed and she felt a tingle in her core as she read his words, imagining the desire smoldering in his amber eyes, and she bit her lip. She continued reading.

I can’t wait to see you again. I can’t wait to finally be able to call you my wife. So until that day finally comes, I will content myself with reading all your letters again and again, and with the thought that you are thinking of me and that soon you will come back to me.

Zuko

Katara sighed happily as her heart warmed at his words. She folded the letter and brought it to her lips as she closed her eyes and imagined him waiting for her, his golden eyes warm and a wistful smile on his handsome face.
She touched her chest where an ache had formed ever since she left Zuko and the Fire Nation. She missed him so much, but soon she would see him again. In a few days she will be leaving with her family for the Fire Nation. She felt her heart swell with joy at the thought that in just a few more weeks she would be married to Zuko, the love of her life.

Opening her eyes again, Katara carefully tucked the letter into her parka until she could place it with the other bound letters she had hidden beneath her clothes in her dresser. She then glanced at the golden ring on her finger. With a smile, she caressed it lovingly for a moment before she touched her betrothal necklace. She loved them both. They were so beautiful and they showed how much Zuko cared for her.

A small, smug grin appeared on her face as she remembered all the jealous stares the young women—from both the Southern Water Tribe and the Fire Nation—had thrown her way. It reminded her of the envious looks she received when Zuko sent her the beautiful rose hairpin for her birthday. She shook her thoughts away as she put on her warm mittens.

She had made Zuko a wedding gift as a way to repay him for the betrothal gifts he had given her. She had worked so hard on it and she prayed to La that he liked it. It had taken her several tries until she was finally satisfied with it. There was another reason why she had created it for him, however. Though she knew he would be more amused than annoyed when he found out why she had made it.

Again she shook her thoughts away, and when she looked up, she finally realized that she had arrived at the edge of the ice city. As she walked down one of the clean, snowy streets, she began to remember everything that had happened over the past few weeks since she had arrived. She remembered all the preparations, the fitting of her wedding dress, and the gifts and good wishes of her people, who surprisingly, had accepted her marriage to the Fire Lord quite easily. There had been a few young men, however, who had tried to convince her to rethink her marriage to the Fire Lord and give them a chance—after all she was a war hero and the daughter of a chieftain. She had firmly rebuked their advances, but they had been persistent. It was not until Sokka threatened them to leave her alone unless they wanted the wrath of the Fire Lord to fall upon them for trying to steal his bride that they stopped. Katara and Sokka had a good laugh when the men had immediately backed away after that.

As she climbed one of the ice bridges, Katara paused and gazed at her snow city fondly and with admiration. They had changed and grown so much from the tiny village they had been years ago. The waterbender felt her eyes begin to mist with nostalgia. She was going to miss teaching waterbending, the chirp of the penguins, the way the bright moon made the sea and the snow shine, the exquisite delicacies of her tribe’s cuisine. She was going to miss her tribe, her people, her family, her home.

No, her home was now going to be the Fire Nation where she will live with her husband as his wife and Fire Lady. It was not as if she would never return to her home country, which she would always love and cherish in her heart, for Zuko had promised her that they would visit the Southern Water Tribe whenever they could.

Zuko. Oh, how she missed him! She missed his strong presence, his protective embrace, his large smiles and loud chuckles that he would only let her see and hear. And it was torture not being near him—to touch and kiss and to be touched and kissed by him—especially now that she would have such erotic dreams about him almost every night.

The brunette waterbender felt her cheeks warm just as her entire body did. She understood how Zuko felt when he wrote about how lustful he had become for it was the same for her. Soon she would not dream or imagine what it will be like to be with Zuko in such a way because it will become a reality.

“Katara!”

Suki’s voice snapped Katara out of her thoughts. The waterbender blushed more deeply before she tried to compose herself as she smiled at the older woman.

“I’ve been looking everywhere for you!” the auburn-haired warrior huffed and playfully scowled at the waterbender.

“Sorry, I was reading a letter Zuko sent me and I lost track of time,” Katara apologized sheepishly. “Why are you looking for me?”

“Gran-Gran wants you to meet her in your room to put the last touches on your wedding dress before we have to sail to the Fire Nation,” Suki told her with a smile.

Katara groaned softly. It was tiring to have to stand in the same spot for hours and be poked at with needles. She already had to deal with that when Zuko had agreed with Lady Ursa and Madam Fang Hua that she be fitted for more royal clothes before the engagement celebration. Not that she didn’t love her clothes and her wedding dress.

Suki laughed as she grabbed her sister-in-law’s arm and lead her toward the chief’s grand house. She knew how the waterbender felt.

“How are you feeling about your upcoming wedding?” Suki asked after a while.
A large, bright smile lit up Katara’s face.

“I feel so nervous but mostly excited!” she exclaimed.

Suki smiled at her. Katara had responded so differently from the last time Suki had asked her if she ever thought of marrying Aang. The auburn-haired woman could see that Katara really loved Zuko.

“Every bride must feel that way,” Suki finally responded with a laugh.

A wistful sigh coming from Katara made Suki glance at her.

“Oh, Suki, I miss Zuko so much,” the waterbender began with another sigh as her blue eyes took on a faraway look. “I can’t wait to marry him. I love him like I’ve never loved anyone else. Whenever we’re together we’d almost destroy each other with kisses. Just thinking about him makes me so happy. I love everything about him. His intense, golden eyes, his velvety baritone voice, his warm hands, his skin touching mine, his perfect mouth…”

Katara blinked away the haziness and her vision of Zuko when she heard Suki clear her throat. Embarrassed, Katara covered her mouth with her hand and blushed deeply.

“Sorry,” she mumbled.

Suki laughed quietly as she waved aside her apology.

“I don’t see anything wrong with that,” she said with a small shrug. “Besides, who am I to judge?”

Katara braced herself when an impish smile curved Suki’s lips.

“Have you and Zuko…?” she asked before she trailed off suggestively.

“No!” Katara exclaimed with wide eyes before she embarrassingly added more quietly, “We’ve only…touched each other.” Her blush deepened.

Suki gaped at her innocent sister-in-law in surprise before a grin appeared on her face. She leaned closer to Katara so they would not be overheard.

“So…how is it?” she asked curiously with the grin still on her face.

“How is what?” Katara asked with a frown.

“Every woman must be curious to know how…big the Fire Lord is,” the older woman rephrased her question.

When Katara continued to stare at her incomprehensibly, Suki flushed and cleared her throat.

“You know, how big is his…” she trailed off as she pointed down.

Katara’s blue eyes widened impossibly large when she finally understood what the other woman was trying to say.

“Suki!” she exclaimed, horrified.

“What? As I said, every woman must be curious,” Suki responded with an innocent look.

Katara sputtered for a moment, but when it seemed that Suki was not about to let the subject drop, she decided to be truthful.

“I haven’t seen…it yet,” she stuttered.

Suki frowned in disappointment before she shrugged.

“It’s understandable since you grew up with such strict traditions,” she said with an understanding
Another frown appeared on her face and she stopped them, turning to face Katara and grabbing her hands.

“I’m telling you this so that you won’t be too shocked on your wedding night,” she began with a serious look, “When you first see his…uh, it…it will look frightening, but you shouldn’t be intimidated by it because it will bring you much pleasure.”

Katara was blushing hard at her words, though she was grateful that a woman her age was telling her this. She knew her grandmother was going to talk to her about her wedding night soon, as was tradition, since her mother was not there to do it. How embarrassing.

“Thank you, Suki,” she said sincerely as she squeezed her sister-in-law’s hands. “I will remember your advice.”

“You’re welcome,” Suki replied with a smile as she again hooked her arm under Katara’s and again began to walk toward the grand house. “I wish I had someone tell me what to expect for my first time. I was so scared the first time I saw Sokka’s that I almost threw him off me in order to get it away from me—”

“I really don’t want to know about my brother’s sex life,” Katara quickly interrupted her with a grimace.

“Oh, right. Sorry,” Suki apologized as her pale cheeks turned pink.

Katara smiled at her as she changed the topic to something less embarrassing, mainly the final preparations before they sailed to the Fire Nation. As they neared their destination, Katara stopped them when she noticed Sokka and her father entering the grand house.

“Sokka and Dad have been acting suspiciously for the past few weeks,” Katara remarked with narrowed eyes.

Suki stiffened almost unnoticeably beside her.
“What do you mean?” she asked calmly.

“I’ve seen them carry boxes into the Fire Nation cargo ships that would depart to the Fire Nation,” the waterbender replied.

“It must be nothing serious,” Suki said with a nervous laugh.

Katara eyed her suspiciously, but Suki distracted her as she again tugged at her arm to lead her into the house.

“I have to check on my daughters and you need to go to Gran-Gran and the seamstress before they get impatient,” she said with a grin.

Katara let out another groan and Suki laughed as she dragged her reluctant sister-in-law into the grand house.

Resisting the urge to pinch the bridge of his nose in frustration, Zuko quickly left the room where he had had a meeting with his mother, Iroh, and a professional planner about the upcoming wedding. He honestly did not care how it was done as long as he married Katara, but he knew that a royal wedding was mostly a show for his people to see their Fire Lord take a wife. And he also understood that a wedding was something women dreamed of, and he knew that Katara was excited about hers. Besides, he wanted everybody to see him take Katara as his wife and she deserved the best wedding ever. So that meant he had to endure all the hassle of planning a wedding.

Just as he rounded a corner, he almost bumped into someone, but he reflexively jumped back to avoid colliding with the person. He looked down to see yellowish eyes staring widely at him from a pretty feminine face. He took a step back as he stared at the short woman warily before he realized it was Physician Toshiro’s new assistant.

“I am so sorry, my lord,” she said softly as her cheeks flushed slightly and she bowed. “I was not paying close attention to where I was going.”

What was her name again? Yin-Min, he believed, although he was not too sure. He suppressed a frown when he realized that she looked familiar though different, as if he had seen a similar woman like her but with a different attitude and attire, before he mentally shook his head. He noticed that she was staring at the fading love bite Katara had left just between his ear and his jaw and he again felt that smugness spread through him whenever someone looked at it.
“Do not worry about it,” he told her coolly as he stepped around her and began walking again, but he paused briefly when her meek voice reached him.

“Congratulations on your upcoming marriage, my lord,” she said quietly.

“Thank you,” he replied absentmindedly as he continued walking without looking back, his mind already occupied with the many things that he needed to see to.

For the rest of the day, Zuko went through his paperwork in his study. Once he was finished, he went to check on the two surprises he had in store for Katara as a wedding present. He was pleased when he saw that they were almost complete. He could not wait to see Katara’s reaction when he showed them to her. Just two more days and he would see her again. In just a few weeks they will be married.

He still could not believe it was happening. He almost expected a problem to suddenly appear to impede them from marrying each other. For years it had seemed as if happiness would always vanish from his life whenever he thought he could finally grasp it.

He quickly destroyed his dark thoughts. He had to believe that he deserved this happiness.

After a light dinner with his uncle and his mother—who kept going on and on about the preparations for the wedding and all the guest they had invited—Zuko finally made his way to his royal bedchamber, which in about two weeks would become his and Katara’s room. Their room.

As he entered the large bedchamber, his eyes immediately landed on the massive bed that rested against the northern wall across from the grand doors. He could not wait to finally have Katara in his bed—and that also meant she could sleep next to him. He mentally chuckled at his thoughts.

He would never have thought that he would be anticipating the day he would marry. Before he had finally realized he was in love with Katara and wanted her as his wife, he had briefly entertained the thought of marrying Mai and he had always dreaded the thought of marrying a noblewoman that would be chosen for him. But he could not wait to tie his life to Katara’s, share himself with her, and love her for the rest of his days.

After taking off his royal robes, Zuko walked to his wardrobe and pulled out the metal chest from the bottom. Inserting the key on the lock, he opened the lid and stared at the items that made up his Blue
A few minutes later, a dark figure was running swiftly from rooftop to rooftop as he surveyed his city in the cover of the night. He felt exhilaration course through his body as he leapt over buildings and silently hid behind objects when it seemed he was about to be spotted.

The night after Katara had left toward the Southern Water Tribe, he had been unable to find sleep, his mind had been too agitated and his body too restless at the reminder that he would have to wait two whole months to see his waterbender again. So he had donned on his Blue Spirit ensemble and slipped out into the city in order to tire his body out. He had been doing the same thing for the past weeks and he loved the sense of freedom he experienced when he left the palace and roamed the dark streets as the Blue Spirit. He had caught a few thieves, however, only two were enough of a challenge that he actually had to use his swords, but other than that there weren’t many disturbances. At least, that could be seen. He wondered if this had to do with his upcoming marriage to Katara. As he hid in the shadows, he had heard the people talk. Mostly those of nobility were still upset over his choice of wife, but the common people seemed to love the idea of Lady Katara being the Fire Lady.

Without making a single sound, the masked being dropped at the edge of a house’s roof that stood directly in front of a tavern. He wondered if maybe tonight there would be some trouble that would need the use of his skills in order to defuse it. He was itching for a confrontation that would tire him out enough that he could find some rest as he waited for Katara to return to him. He did not know if he would continue running as the Blue Spirit once he married.

I suppose I’ll find out later, he mused as he prepared himself to wait.

An hour later three drunken men burst out of the rowdy establishment, staggering against each other as they bellowed a bawdy song off-key and with slurred words. Zuko eyed them from behind the Blue Spirit’s white and blue mask, before he snorted when they tripped over their feet and promptly fell asleep where they had landed. When it seemed like nothing else was going to happen, he decided to return early to his room instead of slipping back in before dawn.

After making sure no one would be able to notice him, he jumped over the palace wall and landed in some bushes. Then he swiftly crossed his garden before leaping onto his balcony, closing the door softly after him and pulling the curtains closed. Placing his swords on their respective place, he quickly took off his clothes and put them back into the chest until he found time to wash them. Then he walked into the large bathroom to take a quick bath. As he dried his wet skin and placed dark sleeping pants on, he glanced at his reflection on the mirror that hung above the basin. He reached up a hand to brush his hair from his forehead. He had not cut it since he and Katara returned to the Fire Nation and now it fell a little below his neck. He thought it was time for a new look.

Shifting his attention to the rest of him, his eyes landed on Katara’s fading love bite. It was barely visible now, but the memory of Katara’s lips and teeth grazing his skin was still imprinted on his mind. He reached up to touch the mark and he hissed lightly as it made his loins twitch. The day after Katara had given him the mark, everybody had stared at it. He knew that they understood what it was and he was not ashamed of it. He wanted them to see how much he trusted Katara and just how much she meant to him that he allowed her to leave a visible mark on him. He wanted everyone to see that he belonged to her.

He had not allowed any of the few women he had been with before to place any form of mark on his body for he rebelled at the thought of belonging to anyone. But with Katara it was different. She was different. He wanted to belong to her just as he wanted her to belong to him and only him.

Agni, how he missed her.

He hoped the next two days passed quickly.

Zuko left the bathroom and began to get ready for bed, anticipating the dream that would visit him that night featuring Katara. A knock on his door, however, brought him out of his fantasy and he frowned as he wondered if there was a problem. He was glad he had decided to return early before the entire palace went into a panic at his disappearance. He placed a light robe over his bare torso and sighed.

“Enter,” he called out coolly.

He turned to see Jiao bow at the entrance and he frowned again.

“What is it?” he asked with a raised eyebrow.

“A letter arrived for you a few minutes ago, my lord,” Jiao responded immediately, “I was sure that you would have wanted to read it now. It is from Lady Katara.”

Jiao suppressed a smile when the Fire Lord quickly approached her with an outstretched hand.

“Give it to me,” he commanded.
Jiao handed him the scroll with a small smile.

“Thank you, Jiao,” he said as he grasped it.

Jiao smiled again, bowed, and closed the door behind her.

Zuko was barely aware of the door shutting as he made his way to the bed. Taking off his robe and throwing it to the side, he quickly broke the seal and opened the scroll. As he settled on the bed, he again admired Katara’s feminine calligraphy and absentmindedly remembered when Iroh had mentioned it all those months ago. Touching the writing on the paper as if he were caressing Katara’s skin, he began to read.

Dear Zuko

I’m very well, thank you. I hope you feel just as great as I do as our wedding date comes closer and closer. I smiled at the last letter you sent me since I also reread every single letter you have written to me.

Zuko smiled at the thought that she was doing the same thing. In the next part, Katara described more things about the Southern Water Tribe, about their part of the wedding preparations, how she hated getting fitted for clothes, although she really liked how her wedding dress came out and hoped he did too. He had to grin at the part where she wrote that she had noticed her father and her brother acting strangely and he thought that soon she would find out why. She continued with details about their journey as they sailed toward the Fire Nation.

He had to smile again on how perceptive Katara was. She had noticed that he was a bit uncomfortable writing a love letter and she had responded to him in the same format in which he wrote to her—unimportant information mixed with feelings. His first attempt at writing to her had been a failure. He had been too worried about sounding too lovesick, so he had written about everyday things. It had sounded like a report, so he had discarded that one. The next try he wrote about his feelings and how much he missed her. It was so sappy that it made his eyes hurt and he immediately lit it on fire. He had wasted many pieces of paper until finally he settled in writing with a balance of the first two attempts.

With a chuckle, he continued reading.

A long time has passed since we last saw each other. I know it’s just been less than two months, but it seems like it has been forever. I miss you so much, Zuko. The desire to see you, to feel your strong arms wrapped around me, your lips kissing mine is nearly killing me. This separation is so painful I don’t know how much longer I’d be able to take it. I need to see you, be near you. I wish you could come for me, but I know you have things to take care of before our wedding.

I love you so much, Zuko. More than I’ve love anyone and more than I will love anyone else. Because of you I have experienced an immense passion that I never would’ve thought possible to have felt with a man. Because of you all I can think about is the moment when you will make love to me, when you will make me yours. I have such erotic dreams about you that leave me breathless and aching for your touch. Even now as I write this letter, I feel myself blush as flashes of my dreams make my body heat up.

What have I done to you? What have you done to me?

I will hold you to your promise that you will show me how much you desire and love me on our wedding night and I promise that I will show you how much I desire and love you. At least, I will try with the little knowledge I have about lovemaking.

I’m so impatient to see you again. And I can’t wait for the day I will come back to you so you can make me your bride.

With all my love, yours always,

Katara

Zuko sighed as he finished reading her letter, her words causing warmth to spread throughout his body. He missed her so much and he could not wait to marry her. His eyes drifted to the part where Katara wrote about her erotic dreams and how much she desired him. He groaned softly. It seemed he was not the only one who was having such dreams. She wrote that she would try to show him how much she wanted him even though she was inexperienced. But what she did not know was that just being with her would be an amazing experience for him. His loins stirred at the thought that Katara was aching for him, and when his thoughts shifted to their wedding night and how he would finally be able to make love to her, he felt his cock stiffen.

He tried to suppress his arousal and shift his thoughts to other things, but his mind instantly went to the hot dream he had had of Katara a few nights ago. A dream in which he had been doing very naughty things to her that caused her to moan and scream his name. As if on its own accord, the hand that was not holding Katara’s letters glided down his stomach before drifting close to his hard erection. He paused, and his fingers twitched, as he fought himself for a moment, but then the tip of his fingers touched the head of his covered length and he groaned quietly.

He rubbed himself a couple of times through his sleeping pants and his breath hitched at the pleasure. He brought back to mind the times when Katara had touched him and he groaned.

He squeezed a few times, but frowned when that was not enough to satisfy him. After a few more squeezes, he reached into the front of his dark pants and pulled out his hard shaft. He stroked his swollen length a few times and moaned.

He wondered how it would feel to have Katara take his heavy cock into her warm mouth. No woman had ever done such a deed to him. One of the women of the brothels had offered, but he had vehemently refused when he had seen her rotten teeth. But a few days ago, as he had gone in search of his uncle for another lesson in his white fire, he had come across a few of his guards who were on their break and had been eating. He had accidentally overheard as they began talking about how incredible it felt to have a woman’s mouth on that part of the body. Now the thought of having Katara’s mouth on him was all he could think about.

His breath came in rough pants as he felt his heavy balls start to pulse before he released his dripping shaft. Swiftly, he stripped himself of his sleeping pants then sprawled out, lifting his knees up and spreading his legs. Eyes sliding shut once again, he reached down and began to stroke his hard, aching flesh, biting his bottom lip as he did. Zuko groaned as his speed increased as he again brought up the memory of Katara wrapping her small hand around him and experimentally stroking him. He growled lowly when that flared his arousal. He stroked himself faster and groaned as he visualized sinking his cock into Katara for the first time, hearing her soft cries of pleasure as he penetrated her.

He resumed pumping his shaft in a tight fist, threatening to rub his skin raw as his release slowly began to grow. Needing more stimulation, he rubbed a thumb across the wet bulbous head of his erection as he imagined that it was Katara stroking his cock, kneeling naked before him and looking at him with sultry, blue eyes. Ah, his exotic water nymph! His body tightened as his increased arousal caused his hard length to throb.

He then imagined how it would feel to finally make love to Katara, having her tight, wet pussy surrounding him. Hips arching up off the bed, meeting his hand as he stroked firmly, he grunted harshly, feeling his skin tingle, dancing with sensation as his release started approaching. Imagining her long legs wrapped around his hips, holding him tightly to her as his fingers tangled in her chocolate mass of hair while he thrust into her, he threw his head back and growled loudly as a sharp tingle shot down his spine and into his cock. His back arched sharply as he ejaculated large spurts of his whitish seed onto his hand and stomach while his hips continued to thrust and he squeezed his swollen tip as his body still tingled with pleasurable sensations. Softly moaning Katara’s name as his orgasm finally subsided, he fell back on the bed in a slightly sweaty heap, his eyes shut.
Panting harshly, Zuko felt his entire body still pulsing from his release and he reveled in it. Before he knew his feelings for Katara, he rarely pleasured himself, but now he found himself doing it more often due to his desire for her. And as it had been so infrequent before, the sensations were even more intense. As he lay thinking about Katara, he thought of how he wanted to hold her tenderly against him after they both found their pleasurable release, something that made him exhale a contented sigh. If he were completely honest he wanted such a moment almost as much as he wanted the sexual act itself.

Zuko waited until the last tremors left his body before he opened his eyes. He looked down at himself, his hand still tightly grasping his now flaccid shaft, and groaned when he saw his stomach and chest coated with a big amount of his semen. He slowly released himself with a satisfied sigh. As he sat up carefully, he noticed that his other hand was tightly clenching Katara’s letter. He would definitely keep this letter.

He swung his legs over the edge of the bed and stood up. Nude, he walked across the room to place the letter atop his dresser before he made his way to the bathroom to clean himself off.

Soon Katara would be the one who will bring him to release. He grinned. He could not wait to have her in his bed.

Every inch of the large desk in the Fire Lord’s study was covered with piles of papers and scrolls. Leaning back in his chair, Zuko rubbed his neck tiredly after placing his seal on another of the documents. Then he placed it atop one of the piles. He had so much paperwork to go through before he could enjoy his wedding and honeymoon.

For the past week, important guests from every nation that his mother and uncle had invited to attend the royal wedding were starting to arrive to the palace in droves. That was one of the reasons why Zuko had retreated to his study in order to find some peace and quiet.

As Zuko placed another sealed scroll on a pile and picked up another document, he wondered where Iroh was. He had not seen his uncle all day, which was strange since the old man hardly left him alone these days. Zuko placed the paper aside with a sigh since he could not concentrate on the words, and with a frown marring his features, he stood up and turned to look outside the large window.

He could not stop the feeling of anxiety that wanted to rise within him. The wedding was to take place in less than two weeks, but Katara and her family had not arrived yet. They were supposed to have reached the Fire Nation four days ago so Katara could give her input on the preparations. He was worried about what could have detained them. Was Katara all right? Would she make it in time for the ceremony? His eyes widened in dread as a sudden thought came to him. Did perhaps Jianguo capture her again?
He shook his head. That couldn’t be, could it? There had to be logical explanation for her tardiness.

A soft knock brought him out of his thoughts and he scowled as he called out a cold ‘enter’. He hoped it was not another person come to congratulate him again and try to make small talk with him. He hated making small talk.

He heard the door open and then close softly, and he turned around to see who had entered, only to freeze in surprise. He recovered quickly from his stupor, however, and a smile melted his cold features and warmed his impassive eyes at the sight of the person standing before him.

“Katara,” he called out softly. There was evident relief in his voice and the way his tense shoulders relaxed.

“Zuko,” she responded with the same soft tone.

Zuko hastily rounded his desk and approached her in quick strides while Katara rushed toward him with a happy cry. He opened his arms to her and she flew into them with a happy laugh. They embraced, their arms swiftly encircling the other tightly, and their mouths met in a passionate kiss. They moaned and pressed their bodies tightly together to reacquaint themselves with the other’s touch. It was a long moment before they finally pulled slightly apart to regain their breaths.

“When did you arrive?” Zuko asked her huskily as his lips continued to touch hers. “I was worried that something happened.”

“The twins got sick during the journey and we had to stop at a port in the Earth Kingdom until they got better. I’m sorry to worry you, but everything’s fine now,” Katara responded breathlessly as she clung to him. “We arrived about an hour ago.”

Zuko pulled back slightly to frown at her.

“Why wasn’t I told?”

“I asked Uncle Iroh not to tell you because I wanted to surprised you,” she told him with a smile.
“And it’s a lovely surprise indeed,” Zuko responded as he kissed her again.

He pulled away when he felt moisture touch his fingers as he reached up to caress her face. Tears of both sadness and joy rolled down a face the color of soft caramel and cheeks as red as wine.

“What’s wrong, love?” he asked her worriedly as he brushed her tears away with his thumbs.

“Oh, Zuko, I missed you so much,” she said as she placed her hands above his.

“So did I,” he replied as he leaned down to kiss her. He sighed against her mouth. “I hope that we won’t have to be separated from each other that long again.”

“I hope so, too,” she said softly as she pulled back to stare into his eyes.

She kissed him again and Zuko cupped the back of her head to deepen the kiss. The ache that had formed in their chests began to vanish.

Zuko inhaled deeply of her sweet scent and reveled in it. His waterbender felt so good in his arms—where she rightly belonged—and he had never felt as good as he did when she held him in her arms.

As if she had read his mind, she spoke.

“I’ve never felt as good as when you hold me, Zuko.”

Zuko groaned against her lips.

“And I’ve never felt as good as when I hold you.”

The soft kisses and tender embrace soon turn heated and passionate. Katara gasped softly when she felt Zuko’s hardness press against her stomach, and with a moan, she pressed herself more firmly against him. Zuko groaned and pressed back for a moment before he pulled away and held her at arm’s length. He panted hard as he tried to control himself just as Katara tried to do as well. They gazed into each other’s eyes and Zuko smirked.

“We need to stop or else we’ll be having the wedding night before the actual wedding,” he told her huskily, his golden eyes smoldering.

A blush stained Katara’s cheeks and she giggled.

“If that happens, my father and Sokka will come down upon you to avenge my honor,” she teased.

“I’d like to see them try,” he responded with a sniff.

Katara playfully rolled her eyes at his arrogance.

“Where’s your family?” he finally asked once he reined in his desire, although it still simmered on the surface.

“They’re settling in their rooms, but before they noticed, I rushed over to see you as soon as I arrived at the palace,” she told him with a shy smile.

“I’m glad you did,” the dark-haired male growled out as he leaned down to brush his lips against hers before pulling back. “I really needed this moment with you before I went insane.”

Katara blushed as the memory of his words in the letter he sent her where he described his desire for her surfaced in her mind. She was about to respond, but paused when she got a better look at him. She tilted her head to the side and smiled.

“Your hair is longer,” she observed as she reached up to brush a few strands of his dark hair.

Zuko had his hair pulled back into a topknot with his fire crown nestled on it, but instead of the neat hairdo he wore before, a few strands escaped down his forehead and the back of his neck. It reminded her of the time when he had been crowned Fire Lord years ago.
“Yeah, I decided to grow it out,” the firebender replied self-consciously as he reached up to smooth his hair back. “I figured I needed a new look for my new life.”

Katara smiled and she again wrapped her arms around him.

“I’m sure you’ll look even more handsome,” she assured, then with an impish grin she added, “I can’t wait to run my fingers through more of your hair.”

“Damn it, Katara,” Zuko groaned huskily as he bent down to capture her lips in another hot, intense kiss.

Another moan escaped the waterbender and she pressed herself closer to him. She felt her entire body heat up in desire, so she pulled back this time. She decided to change the subject before she embarrassed herself.

“Your mother stopped me on my way to see you to tell me that we’ll be given a brief lesson about what we have to do for the combined wedding ceremony later today,” she told him rapidly. Her anxiety rose a bit. “I’m also going to help her and Uncle Iroh with the preparations tomorrow.”

Zuko inclined his head and smiled reassuringly.

“I still have some things to finish here so I can be free for our wedding and honeymoon,” he informed. He smirked when he saw the blush on her cheeks darken. “I’ll see you as soon as you refresh yourself and get some rest.”

“Will you visit me in my room tonight?” she asked throatily.

“Nobody will be able to keep me away from you,” Zuko rasped as he stared intensely into her darkening blue eyes. “I’ve missed touching you so much.”

“Me too,” she moaned softly.

Zuko leaned down to kiss her and Katara raised herself on her toes to meet him halfway. They kissed each other ardently again, each reluctantly to let the other go, but this time it was Katara who pulled away first. She bit her lip at his smoldering gaze.

“I’ll see you soon,” she said.

“Yes.”

With a smile, she slowly made her way to the door and opened it. She glanced behind her shoulder with another smile before she closed the door behind her.

Zuko licked his lips to savor her lingering taste and groaned as he went to sit back down on his chair as he again tried to mentally will his arousal away.

Soon he would be able to have his problem seen to by his wife.

The following week found Katara, Ursa, Iroh, Kanna and Suki finishing the preparation for the upcoming wedding. Katara found it both amusing and frustrating when Iroh and her Gran-Gran argued about which wedding traditions should be added based on their cultures while they rejected each other’s ideas. Alright, honestly, it was more than frustrating, though luckily Katara was the one who had the final say. Sokka had tried to put in his own thoughts—which, not surprisingly, were terribly outrageous—but was quickly shot down. Zuko and the other men had wisely stayed out of the women’s way.

As the day of the wedding approached, more people began to arrive at the palace. Zuko had asked Katara to help him greet the dignitaries. She had been nervous at first, but she was eager to start her first duties as Fire Lady. To her satisfaction and Zuko’s pride, she was doing a remarkable job and the visitors were pleased with her warm reception. It also helped that she knew most of the great leaders of the other countries thanks to her travels during the war.

Master Piandao arrived in his usual serene manner and was immediately sought out by Sokka. King Kuei, along with Bosco his bear, and King Bumi had arrived together at the beginning of the week. It was all Zuko could do not to visibly flinch every time the old king of Omashu would make a joke, clap him hard on the back, and cackle loudly. Katara had been unable to hide her amusement, until the old king turned his crazy humor on her and began to make suggestive remarks about Zuko’s virility and her stamina. Then it was Zuko’s turn to be amused.

Chief Arnook arrived with his wife and some of his men two days ago, expressing how surprised he had been when he first received the invitation to the Fire Lord’s wedding to Hakoda’s beautiful daughter. But he had immediately rushed to the Fire Nation to be witness to the wedding that would combined the Fire Nation and the Southern Water Tribe.

Toph’s parents had also arrived a few days ago, and when Katara and Zuko had inquired if their daughter and Aang would attend the ceremony, they had said they were not sure since the airbender had not said a word when he saw the invitation. Katara and Zuko would have liked it if their friends were to be present for such a special occasion, but they understood if Aang did not attend.

A few more minor lords and governors and their families had arrived from both the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom. Zuko was not surprised when he found out Mai and her family had declined the invitation his mother had reluctantly sent to them. He was glad since he did not want to deal with Mai on the day he took Katara as his wife. Katara was also glad she did not have to tolerate the vindictive noblewoman. If Mai had so much as tried to impede their wedding, Katara would have frozen her to the ceiling of her guest room.

Haru also arrived and Zuko and Katara were not surprised to see that Ty Lee had arrived with the earthbender. They had been amused to see Haru flush when Ty Lee had asked for her things to be placed in the same room as Haru’s.

All the guest rooms of the Fire Nation palace were occupied and the palace was full with so many people that were going to attend the royal wedding—not counting the Fire Nation nobility that were also going to attend. Zuko really could not be blamed for hiding in his study.

The Fire Lord and his waterbender could feel their anticipations rising as their wedding drew closer.

Katara smiled happily at the chattering people around her as they ate dinner in one of the many grand halls of the palace, in order to accommodate everybody. Zuko sat at the head of the table, with her on his right and Iroh on his left. Lady Ursa sat next to Iroh and next to Ursa sat Jee with a blank expression on his face. Katara’s family sat beside her and Sokka was devouring everything in sight. Sitting on the other chairs were Master Piandao, Chief Arnook and his people, King Kuei and King Bumi and the people they had brought with them, and finally Haru and Ty Lee.

Katara could not help but wonder how they finally confessed their feelings to each other.

As Zuko talked to Jee about the security issues for the wedding ceremony that was to take place the next day, Katara thought back to the practice lesson Lady Ursa, Madam Fang Hua, Gran-Gran, the fire sages, and the oldest spiritual priest of her tribe had given her and Zuko. She could not wait for the actual ceremony. She was nervous and excited—nervous that she might end up doing something wrong and excited because she was finally going to marry Zuko.
“The betrothal necklace Fire Lord Zuko gave you is so beautiful, my dear,” Chief Arnook’s wife commented with a sweet smile on her delicate feminine features.

“Thank you,” Katara responded with a pleased flush as she smiled at the woman sitting a few chairs across from her.

“It is an excellent piece of craftsmanship and creativity,” the Northern Water Tribe Chief praised as he turned to look at the Fire Lord.

“Thank you,” Zuko responded with a small incline of his head, also pleased.

King Bumi’s loud cackle interrupted the conversation and they turned to look him. There was a large grin on his wrinkled face and his green eyes gleamed with mischief as he stared at the engaged couple. Zuko and Katara braced themselves for whatever he was going to say next.

“So will we be seeing a new heir nine months from now?” he asked with a cackle before he added with a waggled of his eyebrows, “Or would it be sooner than that? Haha!”

Katara could feel her entire face heat up at the mad king’s implication as everybody stopped what they were doing to stare at them. Zuko fought to remain unperturbed when Hakoda and Sokka whipped their heads to glare at him. Geez, would it matter if he had gotten Katara pregnant before their wedding? They were going to get married anyway. Besides, Sokka had no right to judge him. He looked at Sokka in the eye and raised an eyebrow. As if reading his thoughts, Sokka flushed and cleared his throat. Zuko suppressed a smirk. He enjoyed it when he was able to get back at his future brother-in-law.

“I assure you that our heir will not be born before then,” Zuko finally responded in a smooth tone.

Katara’s family relaxed at his words while everybody else smiled and stirred to different topics.

As soon as dinner was over, everyone that was not the couple’s family piled out of the room and wished the soon-to-be-married couple good night. The two families remained at the table to talk some more before they decided to call it a day. Jee lingered as he waited to escort Lady Ursa to her room. Katara turned away from talking to Suki and caught her father’s watchful eye. She noticed Zuko and her father having a silent staring contest and she wondered what was going on.
“Come on, Hakoda,” Kanna’s soft yet stern voice was heard. “Let the young ones have a moment to themselves before their big day.”

Hakoda’s eyes narrowed before he finally broke eye contact with the Fire Lord in order to smile at his daughter.

“Oh, alright,” he consented. “Good night then.”

“Good night,” Pakku addressed the Fire Lord, though he was smirking at his stepson.

“I will come to your room later, Katara,” the old woman added, “We need to have a talk.”

“Yes, Gran-Gran,” Katara muttered since she knew her grandmother was going to talk to her about her wedding night as was tradition.

“I would like to come too,” Suki added quickly.

The female warrior smiled reassuringly at her sister-in-law. She did not know if Gran-Gran would scare Katara more than help her. Katara would benefit more in hearing about the experiences of a younger married woman. Did Kanna, in her advanced age, even have sex anymore? Suki shuddered at the thought of what Kanna and Pakku did in the privacy of their room.

Ew, don’t think about it! Don’t think about it! Suki mentally chanted as she cringed.

She caught Sokka giving her a questioning look and she gave him a strained smile. Well, at least Jiao had agreed to look after the twins, so that gave Suki a bit of time to herself.

“I would also like to join you three, if you don’t mind,” Ursa spoke up with a gentle smile aimed at her future daughter-in-law.

I didn’t think I needed that much advice, Katara mused wryly.
“I think that would be wonderful,” Kanna said. “We can even spend the night in Katara’s room to talk.”

The old woman glanced at the Fire Lord and grinned.

Zuko’s eyes widened before he frowned. Damn it, he had planned on sneaking into Katara’s room that night. Well, now there was nothing for him to do but sleep in his lonely room.

“Well, if you girls are having a ladies’ night, we guys should have one too!” Sokka piped in with a grin. “I’m sure Lord Hotstuff will appreciate the advice from us married men.”

Zuko inwardly cringed when Sokka, Iroh, Hakoda, and Pakku turned to give him evil smirks. He had a bad feeling about this. He glanced at Jee, the only man besides him who had never been married, and grimaced when the admiral gave him a sympathetic look.

“That is a wonderful idea, Master Sokka,” Iroh piped in with a cheerful grin aimed at his frowning nephew. “How about we meet in my room? I have a special bottle of sake saved up for such an occasion.”

“That is genius, Iroh old man!” the blue-eyed warrior exclaimed before he turned to grin at the admiral. “You have to join the party too, Jee.”

Jee was unable to respond because the other men were already agreeing to it. He glanced at Ursa to see her smiling at him.

Zuko opened his mouth to dissuade the men from their plans, but he was interrupted when Pakku spoke next.

“I also have a special alcoholic brew from the Northern Water Tribe we can partake in,” the old waterbending master said with a smirk as he crossed his arms over his chest.

“You’re not going to back down are you, Fire Lord?” Hakoda asked as he grinned at his future son-in-law.
Zuko narrowed his eyes at the challenge.

“I will meet with you in Uncle’s room,” he finally agreed.

The men cheered and the women shook their heads at their antics. Men, they would never grow up.

“Fine, but I expect Zuko to be in good shape for the wedding,” Katara spoke up firmly as she looked at her male relatives seriously.

“Relax, Sis,” Sokka assured as he waved his hand in the air. “I promise he’ll be functional tomorrow.”

Zuko snorted. He did not need to be looked after. He could handle his alcohol very well, mostly because of his heated blood, thanks to his firebending. Most firebenders were renowned for being able to drink other benders under the table. In fact, he would bet a large sum of money that he would not feel the effects of the alcohol the following day. His uncle was an even better drinker than him. It would be amusing to see the usually grim Pakku and the level-headed Hakoda drunk, though. He suppressed a grinned at the thought.

The men headed toward Iroh’s room while the women went to their rooms to gather their sleeping attires, so they could give the couple a moment to themselves. Zuko looked down to smile at Katara.

Without a word, they began to walk slowly to her guest room. They wanted to spend as much time together as possible since they would not be able to see each other until the wedding ceremony because it was considered bad luck according to Water Tribe customs. Too soon, they were standing outside her door. Katara turned around to look at Zuko.

“This will be the last time you sleep in this room,” Zuko stated with a smirk.

“Yeah,” Katara replied with a smile.

Looking around, and not seeing anyone watching them, Zuko reached toward her and drew her to him, leaning his head down to place a soft kiss on her expectant lips. Katara grabbed the back of his clothes as she pressed herself closer to him. But just as quickly, they pulled away. It was best not to tempt fate.
“In just one more day, we’ll be married,” Zuko told her before he huskily added, “And in one more night I’ll make you fully mine.”

Again, color rushed to Katara’s cheeks as she shyly averted her eyes before she looked up to smile at him.

“I can’t wait,” she said softly.

Their lips again met in a tender and promising kiss before they pulled away. With one last lingering look, they both went their separate ways, both anticipating what the next day would bring.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

From the shadows of some thick trees, dark golden eyes narrowed at the sight of the lively Fire Nation colony. The villagers were scurrying from place to place in excitement as the sun began to set. His right hand clenched the object in his fist more tightly as his anger soared before he took a deep breath to tame it for the moment. The sound of light footsteps combined with the heavier ones of booted feet caught his attention. Slanting his eyes toward the approaching men, the silent individual waited for them to inform him about what they had found out.

“It was as you suspected,” Chang’s passive voice reached his ears.

“Yah, the Fire Lord’s marryin’ da waterbendin’ wench tomorrow,” Ping spoke next with a sneer.

“Every village is preparing to celebrate,” Chang continued as if the other man hadn’t spoken. “What do you plan to do, Jianguo?”

Jianguo returned his gaze to the unsuspecting village before them as he got lost in his thoughts. When they did not receive an immediate answer, Ping dared to speak again.

“Are we gonna do somethin’ ta stop da weddin’?” he asked in anticipation. “Maybeh raid another village? Have some fun with da women?” His smile curled into a leer.

“You know we can’t attack the colonies now that they are protected,” the former Dai Li Agent reminded him. “Besides, we haven’t been given any more orders.”
The other earthbender sniffed and then spat at the ground in frustration.

Still silent, Jianguo’s thick eyebrows furrowed deeply at Chang’s word. He had not received one word from their informant in months. Had something happened? Had he been caught? His other hand balled at his side. How dare Zuko foil his plans! First, Zuko killed his men and escaped with the lovely waterbender. And now the bastard might have destroyed the only way Jianguo could gain information, and thus his ultimate goal for revenge and glory. Ping had recounted to him what had happened that night his prisoners escaped. Jianguo could still not believe that Zuko had the ability to bend white fire. Such a thing was a myth! Besides, the whelp could not possibly have the power to wield such immense fire.

“What are your plans?” Chang once again asked.

“Yah, so wat are we gonna do?” Ping asked in exasperation.

“Nothing,” Jianguo said calmly.

“Wat?” the earthbender growled, “Wat da ya mean we’re gonna do nothin’? I thought ya wanted revenge on da bastard.”

“I do,” the firebender responded in the same cool tone.

“Then why you say we’re doin’ nothin’?” Ping asked in confusion as he scratched his dirty head.

“For now we aren’t going to do anything and we are going to lay low,” the golden-eyed man continued.

“So ya gonna let the bastard marry the waterbenda so they can live happily with each other?” Ping mocked before he spat again in distaste.

“Yes,” Jianguo replied casually.
Chang frowned and Ping sputtered in disbelief.

“I’m going to let Zuko marry the waterbender,” Jianguo continued, “I’m going to let him have a taste of happiness.”

Both Ping and Chang froze when Jianguo turned to them with a dark and cruel smile that caused the hair on the back of their necks to stand up.

“Because it’ll hurt him more when I ripped everything he loves from him,” he said with a low, malicious laugh.

Jianguo turned away from the now silent men and looked down at his clenched hand. He opened his palm and looked passively down at the bloody blue tunic one of his men had found floating down a river. He was positive it was the same one the beautiful, blue-eyed waterbender had worn when he had captured her along with that insolent Zuko. A small, lewd smile appeared on his thin lips as his thumb caressed the fabric as it were her skin he was touching.

“You have no idea of the pain I will inflict on you, Zuko,” Jianguo murmured to himself as the smile turned into a cruel smirk, “But you will when I take the waterbender away from you.”
Early the next morning, the entire Fire Nation was aflutter with activity and excitement as the common people prepared their own celebrations in honor of their Fire Lord’s upcoming marriage to Lady Katara. They hoped the new Fire Lady would aid them, for she must understand their situation a bit better. After all, she was not born a noblewoman—not that they were suffering under the rule of their Fire Lord. They had heard stories of her kind heart and compassion, so they knew she was perfect for their lord.

The Fire Nation Palace was alive with busy servants as they rushed to put the last finishing touches on the decorations. Everybody in the kitchen bustled about as the main cook gave out orders for the delicious banquet to be readied for the guests to enjoy after the ceremony. Jee and another general were ordering the guards to secure the premises and apprehend anyone who dared ruin their lord’s wedding. The Fire Nation nobility all crowded into the palace to witness the wedding of the year, while the ordinary people of the capital city waited beneath the balcony outside the palace. They could not wait to have their first glimpse of their lord’s new wife and their new Fire Lady.

Zuko stood perfectly straight as he was readied for the ceremony. Although he was not outwardly showing it, he was both excited and nervous. In just a few moments he would finally marry Katara. Again, he was assaulted with the thought that something horrible would occur. It would be just his luck, since it seemed every time he was happy something happened to change it.

He shook his head. Today was a joyous day and he refused to allow his pessimistic thoughts to ruin it.

Once his polished fire crown was nestled on his topknot, Zuko thanked the old servants as they backed away after they had finished dressing him. He was getting ready in one of the many empty rooms in the royal family wing. His mother and uncle had practically kicked him out of his bedchamber as soon as he woke up and prohibited him to enter it until the wedding night.

Agni, he could not wait. He could not wait to marry Katara. He could not wait to finally make love to her and live the rest of his life with her.

The servants placed a full-length mirror before him so he could admire their work. As Zuko looked himself over in the mirror, a small smirk curled his lips. He was sure Katara would like what she saw. His feet were encased in black pointed boots edged in gold that reached below his knees. His legs were clad in dark red trousers that were tucked into his boots and on his torso he wore armor of the same dark red color also edged in gold. A thick, golden sash wound around his waist, its two long ends falling down his side. Clipped to his armor and hanging down his back was a black cape trimmed in gold that reached right behind his knees. Tied to his right hip were his sheathed dual broadswords. They were more of a show to demonstrate his strength and power since it was not as if he was going to use them. At least he hoped not, but if someone dared to object to his marriage to Katara, he would cut them down.

He was interrupted from his thoughts when a soft knock was heard at the door.

“Enter,” Zuko called out absentmindedly as he again adjusted his swords at his hip.

He looked up as the door opened and he smiled softly when his mother entered with a joyful smile on her lips. The two servants bowed and retreated, closing the door behind them.

“Mother,” he greeted warmly.

“Look at you, Zuko,” she said proudly. “You look so handsome.”

“Thanks,” he muttered as he turned toward the mirror and pretended to fix his fire crown.

Zuko turned back to look at his mother when he heard her clear her throat. He raised a curious eyebrow when he noticed that her cheeks had turned pink and she was looking at him with a serious expression.

“Zuko…about your wedding night,” she began carefully.

Oh, gods, no, Zuko thought in mortification.

It was one thing listening to his uncle’s advice about sex and what to expect on his wedding night, but it was another thing having his mother talk to him about his sex life. Zuko was sure his right cheek was a deep red color.

“It is easy for men to engage in…intimate activities,” Ursa began slowly, “But for a woman her first time will be painful and far from pleasant if the man is not gentle and careful of her.”

She paused and took a deep breath, and if Zuko had not been looking at her, he would have missed her slight wince. Zuko frowned darkly. Was his mother talking about her own experience? Was Ozai
…rough with her on their wedding night? Zuko would not put it passed his sire. Ozai was a selfish bastard and he did not care if he hurt anyone as long as he got what he desired.

I won’t be like him, Zuko vowed fervently. I will never hurt Katara in such a way.

He was brought out of his dark thoughts when he saw his mother shake her head as if to dispel her memories. She gave him a shy smile.

“In order for you and Katara to have a memorable wedding night, you must rein in your passion in order to heed her needs and be mindful of her discomfort,” she continued kindly. “Once she feels the pain subside she will let you know, but I advise you that for the first time you should…be gentle.”

Zuko understood his mother was just worried that he would allow his lust to take complete control over him, that he would not be attentive to Katara’s pain. Probably just what Ozai did to Ursa. But she should not have worried for Zuko had already planned on doing everything possible in order for Katara to have a wonderful and enjoyable wedding night. His uncle had already given him advice on how he should care for Katara, but he supposed it did not hurt to have a woman’s perspective on the matter. After all, his mother knew what she was talking about. Zuko quickly shook the thought away. He did not want to think about it or else he would get angry.

“Thank you for…the advice,” he said before he cleared his throat. “I promise I will be mindful of Katara’s comfort and…pleasure.”

Ursa smiled and the awkwardness quickly dissipated. She walked closer to her son, placing a hand on his arm so he could turn to face her again. She reached both her hands up and cupped his face.

“I also wanted to let you know how proud I am of you, my son,” she told him softly. “You are a fine young man and I know you will be a fine husband for Katara. I could not have asked for a better son.”

She paused and sadness settled on her features.

“I am so sorry that I was not there for you as you grew up. I will always regret it,” she continued, her voice strained with remorse and sadness.

“It saddens me too, but you had to do what you had to do,” Zuko reassured his mother as he placed his hands over hers. “Thanks to you, Mom, my life was spared and thanks to your sacrifice I was able to meet the woman I will love for the rest of my life. And now I’m going to marry her.”

Ursa smiled at him gratefully as her eyes glistened with unshed tears. She took a few breaths to calm herself before she ended up crying before her son’s wedding even began and she smiled.

“Katara is a wonderful woman, Zuko,” Ursa commented assuredly as she took his hand and gave it a motherly pat. “She will be a good wife to you. She will make you happy.”

“I know,” Zuko responded with a smile.

“Well, I have to go help Kanna finish getting Katara ready,” the Fire Lord’s mother said enthusiastically. “From what I have seen, Katara is coming out wonderfully!”

“I can’t wait to see her,” the firebender said excitedly.

“Patience, my son,” she told him with a soft laugh.

Zuko flushed and grumbled under his breath when his mother laughed a bit more loudly. With a peck on his cheek and wishes of good luck, Ursa left him alone. Not a minute passed after she left than there was another knock and the door was opened. Silently, Zuko watched as his uncle stepped in followed by Jee, Hakoda, Sokka, and Pakku.

Zuko suppressed a smirk as he remembered the drunken antics of the tribesmen the previous night. Even Jee had loosened up a little and joked with the men. It had been amusing, awkward, and embarrassing when they had tried to give him advice about his marriage—which included keeping his wife well satisfied in bed—by talking about their own experiences. He did not think they realized they were giving him advice on how to keep Katara satisfied until he pointed it out. Then it seemed to dawn on them that they were also talking about their other female relatives. Sokka had freaked out at the thought of what his dad did to his mom and what Pakku had done to his grandmother. Hakoda had also been scandalized at the thought of Pakku doing such things to his mother. The waterbending master had flushed so deeply, Zuko thought it would become a permanent color on him. The expressions of horror on the men’s faces had been hilarious and he had been unable to curb his chuckles.

Sokka had then angrily and drunkenly demanded Zuko to keep his hand off his baby sister unless he wished to die. Zuko had wickedly retorted that he was no eunuch and, as long as he was alive, he would touch his wife as much as he wished. The men had spluttered and raged, their faces flushed with their intoxication, anger, and embarrassment, but they were distracted when Iroh had cheerfully asked if they wished for more of his special sake. Iroh had been the only one who found the entire experience humorous. They had lasted a few more hours before the tribesmen passed out in a drunken stupor on Iroh’s floor. Feeling the effects of the alcohol a little, Zuko had made it to his room without staggering and stripped himself of his rumpled clothing. He had only had time to bemoan the fact that he had to wait until the next day to see Katara before he promptly passed out on his bed.

Fortunately, he had been able to wake up at dawn as usual without any lingering effects, which could not be said for the other men. When his uncle arrived to kick him out of his room, Iroh had amusedly told him the tribesmen had woken up with massive hangovers and had continued to lie on the floor, groaning over their discomfort and misery. The only reason they got up was because Kanna and Suki had arrived to order them to bathe and change and drink a potent Water Tribe beverage that was said to cure any hangover. It seemed it worked since the men did not look as if they would be getting sick at any moment.

“Nephew, you look so gallant!” Iroh exclaimed with a grin. “Miss Katara will surely swoon at the sight of you.”

“Oh uncle,” Zuko muttered.

He glowered as the men laughed.

“I congratulate you again on your wedding, my lord,” Jee interrupted, taking sympathy on the young man. “All the guards are in position. Nothing will ruin your wedding to Lady Katara.”

Zuko inclined his head to show that he understood. He had ordered Jee to keep an eye on Wei. Even though the old advisor had not done anything suspicious as of late, Zuko still did not trust him.

“Thank you, Jee,” the young lord said sincerely and with a small smile.

Hakoda cleared his throat and Zuko turned to look at his soon-to-be father-in-law. The firebender sobered up when the chieftain gave him a serious look.

“Katara is my only daughter and I love her dearly,” Hakoda began, “She has been the light of my life ever since my Kya brought her into this world and she deserves to be happy.”
“I swear to you, Chief Hakoda, on my honor, that I will do everything in my power to make it so,” Zuko vowed firmly.

Hakoda smiled and gave an assured nod.

“I know,” he said as he reached out a hand to firmly grasped Zuko’s forearm before he added with a grin, “Congratulations.”

“Take care of my baby sister, you hear?” Sokka spoke up as he gave Zuko a manly pat on the back.

“I will,” the young lord promised.

After a few more congratulations and jesting remarks, mostly from Sokka, all the men left except for Iroh. Zuko looked up from smoothing his cape when his uncle remained quiet.

“Uncle?” he called out.

Iroh smiled as he moved closer to his nephew until they were facing each other.

“You have changed so much over these past years, Nephew, especially this year,” he began as he smiled, “I am so proud of you.”

“Uncle,” Zuko again said when it seemed the old man’s words caught in his throat due to his emotions.

Taking a deep breath, Iroh again smiled as he placed his hands on Zuko’s shoulders.

“If Lu Ten had lived and married I’d be saying this to him, but I will say it to you since I consider you as another son,” Iroh continued in a firmer tone, “I’m proud of the man you have become. You have come across many obstacles in your young life, but you fought against them and became stronger. You have found your destiny and you have become a great Fire Lord.”
“And now you have come to the next stage of your life and I know you will try your hardest to be a good husband to Miss Katara,” he said proudly. “I wish both you and your new bride much happiness.”

Zuko smiled at his uncle fondly. His real father may hate him and Ozai may be the worst father ever, but Zuko was glad to say that Iroh was like a true father to him. And Zuko knew he did not need to say the words aloud to express his feelings, for his uncle understood.

“Thank you, Uncle,” he told him sincerely.

A grin again appeared on Iroh’s face and he gave Zuko’s shoulders a few pats.

“I’ll see you at the ceremony, Nephew,” he said with a chuckle.

With a nod, Zuko watched his uncle turn and leave. The young lord turned away from the mirror and began to slowly pace the room as he waited for the ceremony to begin. He had not walked a few steps when another knock sounded at the door. Zuko frowned. Who the hell could it be now?

As he heard the door open and close, Zuko turned around only to stiffen in shock when he saw who had entered the room. Aang stood before him wearing a formal monk’s robe, his wooden staff clenched tightly in his hand. Zuko hid his surprise in a stoic mask as he wondered what Aang could be doing there. The memory of the nightmare he had where Aang took Katara away from him surfaced in Zuko’s mind and he quickly shoved it away.

The Fire Lord and the Avatar eyed each other guardedly for a moment without saying a single word.
Tension was thick in the air. Zuko heard Aang take a deep breath and he prepared himself for what the airbender had to say.

“Even though it was a hard decision…” Aang began slowly as he glanced away. Then after a moment, he again looked at Zuko. “I decided to come because I wanted to be there for your and Katara’s…big day.”

Zuko relaxed slightly and he unclenched his hands. He had not even realized he had balled them into fists.

“Thank you,” Zuko said coolly. “Katara will be happy.”
There was a tensed pause before Zuko continued, his cool tone defrosting a bit.

“I never meant to hurt you, Aang, and I really am sorry that you had to find out about Katara and me the way you did,” he said truthfully.

“I know,” Aang responded lowly. “And I’m sorry for attacking you.”

“I understand why you reacted the way you did,” Zuko replied with a small shrug.

Aang took another big breath and Zuko could see that this was difficult for the young airbender. He also noticed that Aang seemed…different, more…mature.

“Even though it still hurts, the thought of Katara being with you…” Aang trailed off in a strained tone before he cleared his throat and continued, “I want Katara’s happiness and I now accept that that’s with you.”

“I will make her happy,” Zuko promised before he added, “I hope one day we can be friends again.”

Aang gave him a small smile.

“We’re still friends,” he said and chuckled when Zuko gave him an incredulous look, “But it’ll take a while before things return to normal and the awkwardness goes away.”

Zuko chuckled quietly as the dark tension that had grown between them over the past months seemed to lessen.

“I see now that Katara’s good for you,” the gray-eyed monk commented with a grin, “You’ve changed.”

“I know,” the dark-haired lord replied with a smirk.
Aang’s grin faded and he sighed as he rubbed at his chest above his heart.

“Even though it’s hard, I’m working on moving on,” he added before he mumbled, “But Toph’s helping me with it.”

“Toph?” Zuko repeated with a raised eyebrow.

“Yeah,” Aang replied as his pale cheeks flushed.

“Well, I wish both of you luck,” Zuko said with a small grin.

The blush deepened on Aang’s cheeks as he muttered a low ‘thanks.’ Clearing his throat, the Avatar then gave the Fire Lord a hard look.

“You better treat Katara right and make her happy. Or else I’ll come after you,” he threatened.

“You’ll have to get in line then,” Zuko said dryly.

Aang laughed at Zuko’s disgruntled expression.

“Well, I guess I’ll see you later,” the airbender said once he composed himself.

Without another word, Aang left.

Zuko sighed and then smiled. Well…he had not expected that to happen so soon, if at all. But he was glad Aang had forgiven them. Perhaps Aang being there was a good sign that everything would come out all right. Maybe nothing bad will happen. Perhaps Zuko really was finally going to be happy.

Katara tried not to fidget as her wedding dress was given the finishing touches. She had been woken up right at dawn by the women and rushed to the bathroom where she bathed in water that had been mixed with sweet smelling oils and soap that left her skin feeling as smooth as a baby’s. Then she was quickly taken back into her room in order to begin styling her long hair. A few hours later, her chocolate-brown hair was piled atop her head in an elaborate coiffure. Light makeup was applied to her face and black kohl lined the rims of her eyes. Soft rouge was applied to her cheeks and her lips had been slicked with a soft red paint in order to enhance her natural beauty. Then she donned her beautiful wedding dress.

She was so nervous! But she was more happy and excited than anything else. In just a few moments she would become Zuko’s wife!

She had asked Ursa how Zuko was faring that morning after drinking with her male relatives the previous night. Ursa had assured her he was perfectly well and eager to see her again. Katara had been amused when Suki told her the other men had been feeling the opposite and she and Kanna had to whip them back into shape for the wedding.

The waterbender tried to tune out what the other women were talking about as they fussed over her. Suki and Ty Lee were each carrying an excited twin. Lady Ursa had returned to place beautiful gold and black jeweled pins on Katara’s hair to compliment her necklace. Gran-Gran and the palace seamstress were making sure everything was perfect with the dress. Ty Lee had confessed a few hours ago that she had suspected Zuko and Katara loved each other because of the color of their auras, but she had not wanted to intervene in their business, so she stayed quiet. Katara had scowled at her halfheartedly.

“So when did Haru and you finally get together?” Suki asked curiously as she bounced Ting on her hip.

Ty Lee let out a dreamy sigh.

“Haru came to visit me on Kyoshi Island a few months ago,” the acrobat began happily, “He confessed that he loves me and I confessed that I love him, and now we’re together and couldn’t be happier!”

“Young love is an amazing thing,” Lady Ursa commented as she smiled at Katara who returned the smile.

“But Lady Ursa,” Ty Lee exclaimed with wide eyes, “you’re still young! You can find love again!”

Katara quickly glanced at the beautiful noblewoman who held a sad smile on her face.
“Not everybody is meant to find true love,” Ursa said quietly.

Katara almost blurted out that she should give Jee a chance, but she bit her lip and remained silent. It was none of her business and she was not completely sure if Jee was interested in Ursa romantically. Besides, she did not know how Zuko would feel at the thought of his mother being with another man. She was brought out of her musings when she felt her hands being clasped in a gentle hold. She looked up to see Lady Ursa smiling gently at her.

“Thank you so much for being there for my son when I could not,” the older woman began softly, “Since the moment when you left my old cabin and I saw you two embrace, I knew you were the right woman for Zuko. Thank you for giving him your love.”

Katara felt her eyes prickle with tears and she fought to hold them back.

“I will try with everything I am to make him happy,” Katara promised as she gave her future mother-in-law a watery smile.

“I still remember when you told me you were not ready for marriage,” Gran-Gran piped in with a teasing smile, “Seems the young Fire Lord changed your mind rather quickly.”

Katara again felt herself blush when the women laughed, but she could not deny it. They were interrupted as a knock sounded at the door and all the women turned to look at it curiously.

“If it’s the Fire Lord, we’ll have to kick him out,” Kanna said with a small grin on her aged face.

The door was thrown open and they watched as Toph strode in with her own grin.

“Luckily, I’m not Lord Sparky then,” she commented with a chuckle.

Katara gasped.

“Toph!” she exclaimed happily.
“Even if I can’t see you, I’m sure you’ll give Sparky a heart attack,” Toph teased with another chuckle.

Katara felt herself flush as the women laughed and giggled.

“I’m so glad you came,” the waterbender said after the laughter had calmed down.

“I wouldn’t have missed your wedding to Zuko for anything in the world,” the short earthbender remarked with a casual shrug before she added with a grin, “Especially since I’ve been waiting for it for years!”

The women again laughed and the waterbender scowled. Sobering up, Katara wrung her hands as she looked at Toph anxiously.

“Did…Aang come with you?” she asked quietly.

“Yup,” Toph responded with a nod before she jerked her thumb toward the door, “He’s waiting outside to speak to you.”

Katara’s eyes widened in surprise. Then she looked at everybody with an expectant look.

“We’ll wait outside,” Kanna spoke up as she began to usher everybody out before she added sternly, “But you only have a few minutes since we haven’t finished yet.”

Katara nodded and smiled gratefully at her grandmother. As the other women stepped out of the room, Kanna motioned for Aang to enter before she stepped out, leaving the door open behind her.

As soon as he spotted Katara, Aang’s gray eyes widened.

“Y-you look wonderful, Katara,” he stuttered and then blushed as he rubbed the back of his neck awkwardly.

“Thanks, Aang,” Katara replied softly as she gave him a small smile. “Despite everything, I’m glad that you decided to come.”

“Although it still hurts, I wanted to be there for you on your...wedding,” he responded in a low tone.

“Thank you,” the waterbender again said before she sighed sadly. “Aang, I’m so sorry for hurting you.”

Aang shrugged.

“The pain is just a dull ache now as I’ve come to terms with what happened and what you feel for Zuko,” he reassured her.

“Do you really mean it?” she asked softly.

“Yes,” he said with a firm nod.

Katara’s shoulders sagged a bit in relief and she smiled.

“I’m glad,” she told him sincerely.

She was curious when Aang suddenly blushed, averted his eyes, and shuffled his feet.

“Toph’s been helping me move on,” he admitted.

“How?” Katara asked curiously.

The flush on Aang’s cheeks deepened.

“She has made me see that I still have another chance at love,” he said with a smile.
“Toph?” Katara repeated with a raised eyebrow.

Aang laughed and then grinned.

“Zuko reacted the same way.”

Katara quickly got over her shock and composed herself as she smiled.

“I’m sure if you give Toph a chance, she’ll make you happy,” she said assuredly.

“I know,” Aang responded with a soft smile on his lips that suddenly turned sad. “At first, I was so hurt and angry when I thought that Zuko had taken you away from me, but the more time I spend with Toph, and as I thought things over, I realized something.”

He paused and took a deep breath as he stared at her sadly.

“I never lost you, Katara,” he began quietly, “because I never had you.”

Katara’s eyes softened at the sadness in his eyes, but she could not dispute with what he said because it was true.

“I also realized that I had sometimes been a childish and selfish person, and that’s one reason why you couldn’t love me,” he continued, “You needed a man, not a selfish brat, and Zuko was that man.”

Aang shook his head and smiled again.

“I hope one day I can come to love Toph the way she loves me, so she won’t know such a pain as unrequited love,” he said softly. “It is the worst kind of love because it is an incomplete love. I…I want to make her happy.”

Katara gave him a glad smile.
“And I’m sure you will,” she told him encouragingly before she added, “Thank you so much for forgiving us and for coming.”

“No, thank you, Katara,” he said with a shake of his head and a smile, “You set me free from the iceberg, you were there when I needed someone the most, and because of you I know what love can be. You taught me that I am capable of loving someone, and if it’s fate’s plan, I will show that love to Toph.”

“I wish you both luck,” Katara told him sincerely before a teasing smile appeared on her lips as she added, “Maybe there will be another wedding soon.”

Aang’s entire face turned red and he stuttered while Katara laughed quietly.

“Well, I’ve said what I needed to say,” he told her after he composed himself. “I’ll see you and Zuko at the end of the ceremony before Toph and I leave.”

With one last sad and pained smile, he turned and walked out the room. Katara let out a small relieved sigh. She was glad to know Aang did not hate her and Zuko, and she was so grateful that he had decided to attend their wedding even though it still pained him. She hoped that Aang would find his happiness soon—hopefully with Toph.

As soon as Aang left the room, all the women except the blind earthbender rushed back inside. They began to fuss over her again since the time was drawing near for the ceremony to begin. Once they were satisfied, they stepped back to admire their work.

Kanna and the seamstress stepped forward, the latter carrying a long box, and stopped before the waterbender. The seamstress held out the box and Kanna opened the lid before she carefully pulled out a long, beautiful veil that was made of a shimmering, transparent material to cover Katara’s face as was tradition in the tribes. They had decided to make it translucent since the bride’s face was uncovered in Fire Nation tradition. Kanna moved behind her granddaughter and pinned the elegant veil below Katara’s elaborate hairstyle so her hair could be seen. Then she moved the extra part over her head until it fell gently down to cover her face.

Katara turned to look herself in the full-length mirror that had been brought in while she had been taking a bath. The waterbender gasped softly at her reflection.
Her wedding dress was tinted a dark cerulean color with gold and black embroidery to compliment her jewelry. The beautiful dress fell below her feet, which were encased in slippers of the same dark blue color, and ended in a small train. A thick golden girdle with black embroidery and a blue braided cord accented her slim waist and her hips. Long sleeves edged with gold designs ended to her knuckles and flared several inches below the elbows. Her betrothal necklace was in view for everyone to see due to the slight draped neckline. The veil had been the last detail.

“Oh, Katara, you look so gorgeous,” Suki gushed.

I hope Zuko thinks so too, Katara thought to herself as she softly thanked the women who kept complimenting her.

Another knock at the door made the chattering women pause and turn toward the sound. Ty Lee bounced toward the door and opened it, revealing the smiling father of the bride. As Hakoda stepped inside the room, he stopped short at the sight of his daughter before he quickly walked up to her. Katara was glad to see her father did not show any signs of his drinking binge of the previous night.

“Katara, you look beautiful,” he exclaimed in fatherly pride before a nostalgic smile touched his lips. “Just as beautiful as your mother on the day I married her.”

“Thanks, Dad,” Katara replied with the same sad smile.

Hakoda shook himself to disperse the sudden melancholic mood and he grinned at his daughter.

“Are you ready?” he asked before he added teasingly, “There’s still time left for you to change your mind.”

He ignored his mother’s scowl and Lady Ursa’s frown.

“There’s nothing that will change my mind, Dad,” Katara responded as she laughed softly at her father’s teasing. Then in a firmer tone, she added, “I’m ready.”

Hakoda reached out to gently grasp his daughter’s hands in his, squeezing them softly as he smiled down at her.
“You have grown into a strong and beautiful woman, Katara,” he began with a catch to his voice, “I am so proud of you and I am honored to call you my daughter.”

He paused before he continued in the same melancholy tone as before.

“I’m sure if Kya still lived she would have said the same and much more to express our happiness since she was always better at these things.” He paused again and cleared his throat.

“Oh, Dad,” Katara sniffled as she wrapped her arms tightly around her father.

She had not said anything before, but as soon as Zuko had proposed to her, Katara had lamented the fact that her mother would not be present to witness her wedding to the man she loved. But Katara was so happy to hear her father say how proud both her parents were of her. She sniffled again as tears began to sting her eyes.

“Don’t you dare cry!” Suki cried out. “You’ll ruin the makeup.”

Hakoda’s booming laughter resounded around the room as he pulled away and joked that Katara’s ruined makeup would give her more time to think things through. They laughed since they all knew he was trying to make up for his small emotional moment.

The southern chieftain then turned to his daughter. She was his little girl no longer for she was now a wonderful woman that was soon to become the wife of a great man.

“You’ll do great,” he told her when he noticed her looking nervously out the window.

Katara took a deep, calming breath and smiled at her father.

“It is time,” Lady Ursa spoke up and smiled gently at Katara.

After a few more congratulations and good wishes, the women left the room in order to take their seats among the excited crowd. Katara and Hakoda were the last ones to leave the room. The waterbender smiled when she spotted Shen and Kuo who had been waiting outside in order to escort her to the wedding ceremony. Both guards returned the smile, and soon the small group was heading toward the public garden, which Ursa had convinced Katara would be a better place for the ceremony to be held than the banquet hall.

As they walked, Hakoda squeezed Katara’s hand, which was tucked beneath his arm. He smiled at her when she looked up at him.

“Zuko is a good man and he’ll make a fine husband for you. If he wasn’t, I wouldn’t have allowed him to marry my precious daughter,” Hakoda told her with an assured nod and a soft smile. “I know he will do anything to make you happy.”

“Thanks, Dad,” Katara replied with a grateful smile.

Soon they arrived at their destination with the silent guards following a respectful distance away. Katara was curious of how the decorations came out to be. Although most of the ideas were hers, Ursa and Iroh had not allowed her to step into the garden while it was being prepared. Hakoda and Katara paused just outside the entrance to the public garden. The waterbender gasped in awe at the sight that greeted her.

There were red and blue paper lanterns hanging overhead and the trees had been decorated elegantly with silks and crystals. Beautiful flower arrangements were placed around the place and lined the aisle on which she was going to walk down. The aisle led to a small platform beneath a canopy of flowers and silks where the Great Fire Sage and the Water Tribe spiritual priest were waiting to officiate the wedding ceremony. The many rows of low benches that were placed on either side of the aisle—which was speckled with red fire lily and white rose petals—were crowded with people conversing animatedly with each other as they waited for the big event to commence.

It was magnificent. All the preparations for this day had paid off.

Suddenly, the deep sound of a gong resonated throughout the garden, and Katara gulped when everybody turned in their spots to look at her. Taking a deep breath to calm her nerves, Katara stepped into garden and a soft tune composed of Fire Nation and Southern Water Tribe instruments floated around them.

Standing straight at the front, Zuko spun around as soon as he heard the gong and the people gasp. His breath hitched at the sight of his bride walking down the aisle toward him. She was breathtaking in her wedding dress and it was all he could do not to spring toward her and scoop her up in his arms. He watched as Katara smiled at the people she passed by before she turned her gaze before her. A shock went through him when their eyes met through her veil.
Katara gasped softly at how incredibly handsome her soon-to-be-husband looked. The satisfaction and warmth in his amber eyes made her speed up a little. Her father had to gently hold her back. She blushed when she saw Zuko’s eyes gleam with amusement and she heard her father chuckle quietly under his breath.

The bride and groom could not take their eyes off each other. The people murmured amongst themselves about how dashing the Fire Lord looked and how beautiful the woman he had chosen to marry was.

Finally, the soon to be wedded couple thought as Katara finally made it to where Zuko was standing.

Katara and Hakoda bowed before Zuko as a sign of respect and he returned the gesture as a sign of acceptance. With one last squeeze, Hakoda handed his daughter’s hand over to her future husband and Zuko immediately took her hand in his.

“Take care of her,” Hakoda said softly.

“I will,” Zuko responded.

Hakoda smiled as he stepped down to take his seat on the front bench where the family of the couple was sitting.

Zuko tightened his hold on Katara’s small hand and he smiled down at her.

“You look beautiful,” he whispered softly.

The elegant gossamer-thin veil did little to hide his bride’s blushing cheeks as she returned his smile and compliment. They turned around to face the Great Fire Sage and the spiritual priest, then they knelt down on elaborate red cushions as was custom in the Fire Nation.

“Today we celebrate the union between Fire Lord Zuko and Lady Katara,” the Great Fire Sage began in a loud voice that carried throughout the garden, “This marriage between this man and this woman will not only unite two people but two nations.”
“We are here to witness the beginning of a new life for this man and this woman,” the Water Tribe spiritual priest spoke next before he looked at the couple before him. “Marriage is not an easy road, but if both of you put your minds, wills, and hearts into making your partner happy, marriage can be a wonderful thing.”

After both men finished their speech, the spiritual leader stepped forward with a long, thick string which was made of red and blue threads entwined together. Zuko held out his left hand and the old man tied one end of the string on his middle finger before tying the other end on Katara’s right middle finger.

“This string is as a symbol of your lives, hearts, and souls being forever tied together in matrimony,” he recited.

As he finished, the man stepped back to again stand beside the fire sage .The Great Fire Sage stepped forward with a golden chalice in his hand filled with a bittersweet wine.

“The sharing of the cup of bittersweet wine is a symbol of the married couple sharing both the bad and good times during their life together,” the fire sage recited. “It is a reminder that there will be hardships, but there will also be happiness.”

He handed it to Zuko who took it with an incline of his head and brought it to his lips to drink from before he turned to Katara and handed it to her. Katara inclined her head to his offer and took the goblet to drink the rest of the wine. Then she handed it back to the fire sage. Once the tribal priest had taken the cup from him, the fire sage turned to address Zuko.

“Do you, Fire Lord Zuko, swear before Agni and before your people to provide for and protect your wife and any children she bears you?” the fire sage asked.

“I swear,” Zuko responded firmly.

“Do you promise before Tui and La to be a strong beam for your wife where she can find support from her troubles? Do you promise to be faithful to your wife, to stand beside her through both hardship and happiness, through sickness and health, for as long as you both live?” the spiritual leader recited from the Water Tribe’s tradition.

“I promise,” Zuko again replied fervently.
He turned slightly to smile at Katara who smiled lovingly back at him. The waterbender returned her attention forward when the Great Fire Sage addressed her next.

“Do you, Lady Katara, swear before Agni and your new people that you will help Fire Lord Zuko in his rule, to care for your husband and any children he gives you?” he asked.

“I swear,” Katara responded immediately.

“Do you promise before Tui and La to be a refuge for your husband where he can find solace from his burdens?” the spiritual leader continued, “Do you promise to be faithful to him, to cherish him, and stand by his side through both hardship and happiness, through sickness and health, as long as both of you live?”

“I promise,” Katara replied firmly as she glanced at Zuko and smiled when he glanced at her with bright, golden eyes.

The spiritual priest then grabbed a small bowl that was resting beside the golden cup and stepped toward the couple again. He carefully removed the string from their fingers and placed it inside the bowl before turning toward the fire sage who was holding a lit candle. The fire sage handed it to the other man, who tipped the candle into the bowl so the small flame could touch the red and blue string. As soon as the flame touched it, the string caught fire and incinerated into ashes. It was a symbol of precaution, as if by having the string cut the couple’s relationship would be severed.

“Once two individuals,” the old tribesman began in a loud voice for all to hear, “will now become one. May no one dare to come between what the gods have now joined.”

Once finished, he stepped to the side as another fire sage appeared and stood behind the Great Fire Sage with a golden box held in his hands. The Great Fire Sage stepped up to stand before the bride and he looked down with a serious expression on his face.

“Are you, Lady Katara of the Southern Water Tribe, willing to take your responsibilities as Fire Lady?” he asked.

“I am,” she replied.
“Are you willing to help Fire Lord Zuko in his rule, to help him make the right decisions if needed to guide this nation, to help the Fire Nation and its people?”

“I am.”

“Are you willing to provide Fire Lord Zuko an heir in order to continue the royal bloodline?”

“I am,” Katara responded fiercely, her blue eyes glinting in determination.

The Great Fire Sage turned toward the other man holding the box. Lifting the lid, he pulled out the golden fire crown. The Fire Lady crown was smaller and more feminine-looking than the Fire Lord’s. Stepping forward, the Great Sage held the crown high for everyone to see.

“I proclaim you Fire Lady Katara!” he said loudly as he pinned the crown in Katara’s hair.

The crowd applauded and cheered.

“Rise and acknowledge your people,” the old man told the couple.

Zuko took hold of Katara’s hand and helped her up before they turned around to face the crowd.

“I present to you Fire Lord Zuko and his wife, Fire Lady Katara!” the Great Fire Sage exclaimed. “May they reign over the Fire Nation justly and may they live happy lives together!”

Again the crowd cheered and applauded. The newlyweds smiled when they heard Iroh and Sokka whistle and Toph shout a ‘hell yeah!’

The spiritual priest again stepped forward as he exclaimed in a lively voice.

“The groom may now kiss his bride!”
Zuko and Katara turned to face each other for the Southern Water Tribe’s traditional first kiss of the newly married couple. Such a display was not done in the Fire Nation wedding tradition since such affectionate acts in public were frowned upon by the upper society. But when Katara had asked him what he thought about such a tradition, Zuko had immediately agreed upon it.

Eyes gleaming brightly, Zuko carefully lifted the thin veil over her head, and Katara blushed at the intensity in which he stared at her. Grabbing her arms gently, Zuko pulled her to him and their hearts raced as he leaned down to kiss her lips softly.

The watching crowd burst into louder cheers and whistles.

Pulling away, Zuko smiled at his blushing bride.

“I finally have you,” he whispered to her. “Now nothing can take you away from me. You are mine.”

The waterbender felt her heart skip a beat and she smiled at him.

“I’ve always been yours,” Katara replied softly.

Warmth spread through Zuko’s chest at her words and all he wanted was to kiss her again. Before he could do so, the Great Fire Sage cleared his throat. Zuko suppressed a frustrated frown as he turned to look at the old man.

“You must present your Fire Lady to your awaiting people, my lord,” the fire sage reminded him.

Zuko inclined his head to show he remembered the tradition. Tucking Katara’s arm beneath his and placing her hand over his forearm, Zuko stepped down from the small platform and walked back down the aisle with Katara at his side. The people had risen from their seats and were smiling and cheering as the married couple passed by.

As soon as Zuko and Katara stepped back into the palace corridor, Kuo and Shen appeared behind them to escort them toward the grand balcony that overlooked the walls of the palace and to the city below. As they stepped onto the balcony and walked toward its edge, Katara gasped at the multitude of people standing below. A cheer went up when the crowd spotted the couple.
Zuko held out the hand that was not holding Katara’s arm and the people quieted.

“Children of the Fire Nation,” Zuko began in a loud and strong voice, “With Agni’s blessing I, Fire Lord Zuko, present to you your new Fire Lady and my wife, Fire Lady Katara!”

Katara smiled in delight at their excitement. She raised a hand to wave at them and more cheers erupted at her gesture and smile. She heard Zuko chuckle quietly beside her and she glanced at him to see a pleased expression on his face.

“Go and celebrate this joyous day!” Zuko again shouted and the citizens again cheered.

After a few more cheers as Katara waved, Zuko led her away from the balcony and the loud crowd. They headed back to the public garden with Shen and Kuo following silently behind.

“They love you already,” Zuko murmured, pleased, as he glanced at her from the corner of his eye.

“I hope you’re right,” Katara replied softly.

“I am right,” he answered assuredly before he added in a more quiet tone, “But not as much as I love you.”

“Zuko,” Katara whined softly, “Don’t say such wonderful things when you know I can’t kiss you.”

Zuko chuckled quietly at her pout, but he could see the pleasure in her eyes due to his words.

Soon, they stepped back into the public garden. The rows of benches had been moved around the place and tables had been brought in so the hungry guests could partake in the delicious banquet.
As soon as they were spotted, the newlywed’s family swarmed around them to congratulate them with hugs and good wishes. Then they were led to the table of honor where the royal couple was to sit for the celebration. Just as they sat down, Katara and Zuko were approached first by Chief Arnook, King Kuei, King Bumi and their people followed by the rest of the minor nobility of both the Fire Nation and the Earth Kingdom. If Iroh had not stepped in to point out that the married couple should also have a chance to partake in their own banquet meal, they would not have been left alone.

As soon as they had finished their meal, Zuko helped Katara up and led her toward the center of the garden for their first dance as a married couple. Katara smiled joyfully and Zuko’s eyes gleamed in happiness as he twirled her around and brought her close to him. Those that watched them could see how much they cared for the other. The Fire Nation nobility were surprised to see their usually emotionless lord so happy.

“You know,” Katara began teasingly after Zuko had spun her around again and brought her close to him, “I think the noblemen might think something’s wrong with you if you continue smiling like that.”

Zuko shrugged before he grinned as he brought her even closer to him as he spun them around.

“Well, if there’s someone to blame for that, it’s you,” he replied grimly yet the playfulness could be heard in his tone.

“Well I’ll take the blame,” she replied impishly.

Zuko chuckled and his golden eyes gleamed.

After the dance ended, the Fire Lord and his Fire Lady began to mingle with the crowd—much to Zuko’s reluctance. Again, they were surrounded by people. The royal couple was glad to see old friends they had come across during the war. Haru’s parents had also arrived to witness their marriage. Teo and his family were also there and The Duke, now a young teen, had come with them since both boys had become best friends during the group’s time in the Western Air Temple. Zuko was glad to know that Katara had not invited Jet to their wedding and Katara was relieved that Mai had decided not to make an appearance.

Katara smiled when she saw her brother and his family approaching them again when Chief Arnook and his wife left them. Sokka tried to keep Suki from being around his first love Yue’s parents too much so she would not feel uncomfortable.
“Congratulations you two,” he said with a grin.

“Thank you, Sokka,” Zuko responded with a nod and a small smile.

Sokka gave him a manly pat on the back with one hand, while he held Jing with his other arm.

“If you need any advice about being a great husband, I’d be glad to give it to you,” the blue-eyed warrior said with a grin.

“I’m sure that won’t be necessary,” Zuko responded wryly. Did Sokka forget he had already declined his offer the previous night?

“Oh, come now,” Sokka exclaimed with a laugh. “You can ask me about anything. You should listen to a wise, married man, my dear brother-in-law.”

“Oh, really?” Katara interjected with an impish grin aimed at her older brother. “Anything? Does that also include the more…intimate aspects of marriage?”

Suki laughed and Zuko smirked when Sokka’s eyes bugged out in horror.

“Ew, gross!” Sokka shouted as he tried to cover his daughter’s ear with one hand. He shuddered. “Anything but that!”

“But Sokka,” Zuko spoke up smoothly, though his eyes gleamed in amusement, “You said you’d give me advice on anything.”

Yeah, he doesn’t remember anything about last night, Zuko mused with wicked enjoyment at Sokka’s discomfort.

Eyes narrowed, the tribe warrior turned to glare at the amused Fire Lord.
"I said anything but that!" Sokka repeated vehemently. "If you try to talk to me about you doing...that with my baby sister, I will cut off your tongue."

"Believe me, I will not be going to you to talk about such things," Zuko replied sardonically. It always amused him when he was able to discomfit the joker of the group.

"Good," Sokka said with a firm nod.

He ignored his sister's snicker and his wife's laughter. When they calmed down from their amusement, Sokka looked at Katara and his expression turned serious.

"I'm gonna miss my baby sister," he began with a sigh. "I promised Dad I was gonna look after you and I tried to keep my promise to keep you out of trouble," he teased and laughed when Katara scowled at him. Sobering up, he added, "Now I place that responsibility of taking care of you to Zuko."

Katara felt tears gather in her eyes and she stepped forward to hug her brother that, although sometimes was a jerk and a bit of an idiot, had been her protector and her friend. She was going to miss him.

"Thanks, Sokka," she said with a sniffle.

With a tight squeeze, Sokka finally let his sister go, placing an arrogant smirk on his face.

"What are big brothers for?" he asked haughtily.

"I'm still trying to figure that out," Katara replied musingly.

"Hey," he protested.

She laughed when Sokka scowled down at her before he looked up to scowl at Zuko who was chuckling quietly. Then he frowned at Suki when she snorted as she tried to suppress a giggle. He really hoped his daughters were laughing because of something else.
“I’m just teasing,” Katara told him as she again moved forward to hug him.

“Whatever,” Sokka replied with a sniff although he did return the hug with one arm.

They laughed when Jing tried to grab the shiny fire crown on her aunt’s head.

“Hey look. It’s a gang reunion,” Toph’s voice reached them and the small group turned to see the small earthbender approach them with Aang at her side.

“Uh…congratulations,” Aang mumbled with a small, pained smile as he shuffled his feet awkwardly.

“Yeah, congrats,” Toph piped in before she turned to grin in Katara’s direction, “I knew Sugar Queen was a fitting name for you.”

“Aw, Katara, you’re the queen of Zuko’s heart,” Ty Lee’s bubbly voice interrupted as she approached them with a smiling Haru. By the way her cheeks flushed greatly and her body swayed, they knew she was a little drunk.

“Please don’t say that out loud,” Zuko muttered with a grimace.

“So that means I can say it in my head?” Ty Lee responded with a cheesy grin.

Zuko scowled when the small group laughed, even Aang laughed genuinely at the Fire Lord’s discomfort.

Katara then turn to Toph with a raised eyebrow.

“So you and Aang, huh?” she said and the blind earthbender could almost hear her teasing smile.

“Yeah,” Toph replied with a shrug although her pale cheeks had turned pink.
Aang blushed as well as his lips lifted into a small smile.

“And you ranted about mine and Zuko’s denseness when you didn’t even confess to Aang your feelings for him,” Katara continued.

Toph scowled and crossed her arms over her chest.

“I know I’m awesome and all, but I can have insecurities too, jeez,” she muttered.

They chuckled and Toph relaxed when she felt Aang gently place his hand on her back. As the days passed, Toph noticed that Aang was getting more comfortable with the idea of giving love a second chance and she again felt her heart skip a beat. She was also trying hard to make this work since it was not as if she had any past boyfriends or men lining up to ask her out. They were intimidated by her, but not Aang.

After talking idly about different things, the small group left the newlyweds in search of food and entertainment. Sokka spotted Master Piandao and he immediately rushed toward his former sword master to reminisce.

Katara watched them with a content smile before her eyes landed on Lady Ursa and Jee. Her mother-in-law was conversing with one of the Fire Nation noblemen. Jee was standing close behind her and he was glaring darkly at the other man, who quickly bowed and moved away once he saw the broad-chested admiral’s dark look. Katara watched as Lady Ursa frowned slightly in confusion, but as she turned to look at Jee, the admiral moved back a step and schooled his features into an emotionless one.

“What are you looking at?” Zuko’s voice made her look away.

“Nothing,” Katara responded quickly as she smiled at him.

It was not really a lie since she really did not know what was going on between Lady Ursa and Jee. Maybe she was just seeing things that were not there.

The rest of the day and well into the evening was spent eating, drinking, and dancing while people continued to congratulate the royal couple. They would admire Katara’s wedding dress, her necklace, and her ring. At the same time, Zuko would be praised for having married such a beautiful and wonderful woman. Zuko was sure that some of them were still upset with his marriage to Katara, but he did not care.

However, as the evening sun finally sank into the horizon and the moon rose high in the night sky, Zuko’s impatience began to grow greatly. He even surprised himself that he had not started to snap at people. He could not wait to have Katara in their rooms. He could not wait to finally make love to her after all this time of desiring her, of imagining and fantasizing of making her his. Now she was married to him, but he still could not have her because of the celebration. But he could see that Katara was having a good time and he did not want to interrupt her fun and end their wedding celebration early—even if he was going insane with want and need.

Taking his eyes away from Katara’s enticing form before he lost control and carried her to their rooms in front of everybody, Zuko glanced around disinterestedly at the crowd. He barely paid attention as Katara talked to Physician Toshiro and his wife. He had noticed that as soon as night appeared, Aang and Toph had left. He understood that Aang must still feel uncomfortable with the thought of Katara having her wedding night with him.

Agni, how much longer will he have to wait?

Just when Zuko thought about throwing decorum to the wind and scooping Katara into his arms, he saw his uncle step upon the platform. Iroh cleared his throat lightly before shooting a spark into the air to gain the people’s attention. Zuko let out a relieved breath since he knew what his uncle was going to say and it could not have been at a better time.

Once the crowd had quieted down to listen to him, Iro grinned.

“It is time for the bride and groom to retire for the night,” he announced and winked at the royal couple. “The rest of us will continue to enjoy the delicious banquet!”

Zuko smirked slightly and Katara’s cheeks flooded with color when a few whistles—courtesy of Ty Lee and Bumi—were thrown their way and others wished them a good night with knowing smiles and winks. Kanna and Suki moved away from the crowd and headed toward Katara in order to prepare her for her wedding night.

Just before the women could reach them, Katara felt her heart pound in her chest when Zuko leaned down to whisper in her ear.
“I will see you soon, love,” he told her huskily, his tone full of promise and desire. He pulled away when the women approached.

Katara felt her legs turn to mush at the intense manner in which he was looking at her before she was lead back into the palace by her grandmother and Suki. Once they stepped inside they were joined by Jiao.

Soon, Zuko thought anxiously as he stared after his bride, Soon we’ll be joined in more than just name, Katara.
The light from a small campfire illuminated the lone figure before it as soft breeze blew by and a bird sang into the night. Eyes closed, hands resting on knees, and sitting in the lotus position, Aang tried to clear his thoughts by meditating. He tried to cast away all thoughts about what was going to occur that night. He tried not to think about Katara being in Zuko’s arms, about Katara letting Zuko kiss her, touch her, love her…

“You’re gonna have to accept it, one way or the other, Twinkletoes,” Toph’s voice mercifully yanked him from the path his thoughts were heading.

He had not realized Toph had woken up. As soon as they had left the palace, they had flown for a while before landing in a small clearing to settle for the night. Tomorrow, Aang planned on flying them nonstop toward the Earth Kingdom.

With a sigh, Aang gave up meditating and opened his eyes as he relaxed his rigid posture. He glanced at Toph as she plopped herself next to him. Appa and Momo were sleeping a few feet away, the lemur slumbering on the flying sky-bison’s nose.

“I know,” the airbender finally replied to her comment, “But…it’s hard.”

With a groan, he rubbed his eyes with the heels of his palms before running his hands over his bald head.

“I always thought I was going to be Katara’s first and only like she would be mine,” he continued in a strained voice, “But now I have to accept the fact that Zuko is going…That he’s going…to love her…not me.”

“I thought you said you were moving on,” Toph said with a snort, but Aang could detect the hurt in her tone.

He sighed guiltily. He did not want to hurt Toph, who had been by his side all these years and loved him—in her own way. She was not a typical woman who was very emotional and affectionate, and he understood part of it was because she had no experience with such things. So it was a little difficult for him to get closer to her since he liked to kiss and cuddle like he had done with Katara when she had let him. He shook his head before he answered her.
“I have,” he assured her. “Part of me has accepted their love for each other and is glad they’re happy.” He paused before he continued slowly as if trying to find the right words, “But another part of me is…hurt and jealous. The thought of them together…it kills me.”

His shoulders sagged and he sighed.

“I’m sorry,” he told her softly.

Toph let out a sigh of her own as she crossed her arms over chest. Although she would never admit it out loud, his words did hurt her. It made her want to hurl boulders at something to vent her anger and jealousy. But she had known this was not going to be easy, especially since Aang had been infatuated with Katara for years. She understood that it was something hard to forget. But she was determined to win Aang’s heart—as corny as that sounded. She would make him realize that the only woman he could really love was her…even if that meant that she would have to do certain things that she was unaccustomed to.

“Don’t apologize,” she snorted with a frown. “As long as you’re willing to move on and give us a chance, then that’s what matters. But like I said, I won’t wait for you forever.”

“I know,” he said quietly before he again turned to look at her. “I really do like you, Toph,” he admitted before he smiled when he detected a faint blush on her cheeks. “And I can see that with a bit more time, perhaps I’ll come to love you.”

“More than Sweetness?” she asked with a casual tone as she raised a dark eyebrow.

Aang had to smile since she could not hide the hope in her voice.

“Maybe even more than my own life,” he said with a grin, although he was being serious.

“You’re so cheesy,” she muttered even as her blush deepened a little.

The airbender laughed. This was one of the reasons why he could see himself falling in love with Toph. He liked making the brash and rough earthbender blush prettily with embarrassment or pleasure that she struggled to hide by making snide remarks. He wanted to shower her with love and affection. Something she had never received since her birth because her parents had been more overprotective than loving due to her blindness. But it was hard since she hated shows of affection.
“All we need is time,” he finally spoke in a cheerful tone.

He raised his eyebrow when Toph turned to face him fully. Curious, he did the same so that he sat staring at her. He watched as the pink blush on her pale cheeks darkened a little and she averted her lime-colored eyes for a moment.

“I know what else we can do to bring us closer,” she said in an uncharacteristic, soft tone.

The airbender’s gray eyes widened in shock and he gaped at her. He was mildly surprised when his heart started to beat faster in his chest.

“T-Toph, I don’t think that’s a good idea,” he stuttered, “I mean, not that I don’t like the idea, but it’s too soon and—”

“Whoa, hold on, Twinkletoes!” Toph interrupted him loudly, “Keep it in your pants. That’s not what I meant.”

“It’s not?” Aang asked and he rubbed the back of his neck in embarrassment.

“I didn’t know you were such a perverted monk,” Toph teased him with a smirk. Now it was her turn to make him squirm uncomfortably.

“I’m not!” Aang protested with a scowl.

But come on! He was seventeen-years-old! What else was he supposed to think? Yet, he knew it was still too early for them to engage in…such activities. Even though the Air Nomads were not as strict in their rules as the Southern Water Tribe was about chastity and engaging in sex before marriage, Aang wanted his first time, their first time, to be special. Something they would cherish because of their mutual feelings.

When Toph chortled, Aang scowled more deeply.
“Well, then what did you mean if not…that?” he grumbled.

Toph fell silent at his question and she resisted the urge to snap at him to forget it. What she had in mind was a bit embarrassing, but she would admit to herself that she looked forward to it. But what if Aang laughed at her? The earthbender mentally berated herself. What was wrong with her? She was not a sissy! And if Aang laughed at her, she would just punch him in the face. Okay, maybe she wouldn’t do something so dramatic—or violent.

“What I meant was…that we…uh…could…um,” she mumbled.

“That we could what?” he asked her with a teasing smile.

“That we could kiss and cuddle, damn you!” she shouted before she snapped her mouth shut and scowled at him fiercely.

Aang again suppressed his laughter at her words that contradicted with her actions, but he would not tease her anymore—especially since she was willing to do something that made her uncomfortable. Besides, he really liked the idea of cuddling with and kissing Toph.

“Why didn’t you say so before?” he asked as he scooted closer to her.

The earthbender muttered under her breath before she stilled when Aang gently grasped her upper arms. She held her breath when she felt him lean down to brush his lips against hers. They both sighed. She really liked having Aang’s warm, thin lips on hers. Not wanting gentle kisses at the moment, Toph grabbed the front of his tunic and pulled him closer to her so she could deepen the kiss.

Aang chuckled at her enthusiasm as he wrapped his arms around her petite form. All thoughts about Katara, about what could have been, about what she and Zuko were doing left his mind and the pain around his heart lessened. All he cared about at the moment was Toph’s soft body against his and the passion that her ardent kisses aroused in him.

Katara fidgeted nervously as she once again stepped into her guestroom where she was going to prepare for her wedding night. As soon as the door was closed, Kanna and Suki immediately began to gush about how wonderful the wedding ceremony had been, and what the guests had said and did during the reception. The new Fire Lady barely paid attention to what they were saying. After reassuring Katara about the events that were to occur that night, they bid her good night. Jiao softly closed the door behind them.

Katara bit her lip as she remembered the talk she had had with her grandmother, Suki, and Lady Ursa the previous night about what to expect. All three women had different experiences. Suki had said the first time was wonderful, though she did not go into much detail since it did involve Sokka. Katara had been both relieved Suki had not explained much since she really did not want to know what her brother did to her, but she was also disappointed that Suki did not give her more details to reassure her. Kanna had said her first time with her first husband had been awkward, uncomfortable, and a little painful. To Katara’s sadness, Ursa’s experience had been the worst. Ursa had said that her wedding night with Ozai had been extremely painful and even a little traumatizing. However, all three women had agreed that it got better with practice and time.

As she recalled Ursa saying how painful the first time was, the more nervous and frightened Katara became. She was not ignorant. She knew that the first time for a woman was supposed to be very painful, but was it really that horrible as Ursa and Gran-Gran had described it?

However, it wasn’t the thought of the pain exactly that made her nervous, but the unknown. Why didn’t they give her advice on what she should do? What if she did something wrong and she displeased Zuko?

What…what if I’m not as good as the other women Zuko…had been with? she thought anxiously and her stomach clenched painfully at the thought.

Katara was snapped out of her thoughts and she shook her head as Jiao returned from the bathroom and moved forward to begin assisting her out of her elaborate wedding dress. Jiao carefully laid the dress aside and guided the musing waterbender toward the bathroom, then stepped back inside the room.

Once she finished taking a bath in the sweet scented water, Katara stepped out of the bathtub. After patting her skin dry and using her waterbending to remove the water from her hair, she wrapped the towel around her form and returned to the room. She saw that Jiao had laid out her night clothes on the bed. Katara was surprised to see that her under-wrappings had been replaced with different ones. She picked up the strange, white undergarments and inspected them curiously. The lower undergarment was one piece like that of the bottom of a bikini and the wrap that was to cover her chest was also one piece with strings at the back to hold it close. Turning to Jiao, Katara raised an eyebrow.

“These are undergarments women of the upper class wear. Fire Lord Zuko would like it if you wear these from now on,” the maid informed her. Then with a smile, she added, “For…easier access.”
“Oh,” was Katara’s reply as she flushed.

As Jiao turned away, Katara dropped her towel and quickly put on the new undergarments. It took her a moment to figure out how to tie the strings of the upper garment, but once she finished she was surprised at how comfortable they felt. They were made of silk, not the itchy material of her wrappings. They were not tight around her, but still fit nicely. And the sensation of the silky material against her most intimate parts felt nice. Katara then put on a light blue nightdress that fell just below her knees.

Jiao then motioned for the waterbender to sit on the corner of the bed and began to brush the long, brown locks. She brushed Katara’s hair until it gleamed and fell down her back in soft waves.

In just a few moments, Katara thought, she would finally become Zuko’s woman. She let out a shaky breath and chewed on her lip.

“Are you all right, Fire Lady Katara?” Jiao asked gently.

Katara was startled for a moment at her new title before she let out another sigh.

“I’m fine,” she responded, “Just a little nervous. I’ve heard so many stories about how painful the first time is, and I’m afraid that I’ll do something wrong and embarrassing. I…don’t want to disappoint him.”

“Don’t worry so much, my lady,” Jiao spoke up when Katara paused, “Although it is painful the first time, it doesn’t last long. Once the pain lessens, you will experience a pleasure like no other.”

Katara turned around to look at the older woman curiously, and Jiao paused in fixing her lady’s hair.

“Have you...been intimate with a man?” she asked softly.

Jiao’s cheeks turned pink and she averted her eyes, even as a smile came to her lips.

“Yes,” she replied simply.
Katara eyed her silently for a moment before she smiled.

“Is he someone I know?” she asked teasingly.

The young servant fidgeted as her blush darkened.

“Yes,” she admitted softly, “It’s Kuo.”

Katara’s eyes rounded before her smile widened.

“I knew it!” she exclaimed, “I knew there was something going on between you two!”

Jiao was blushing hard, although she could not stop herself from smiling happily.

“We’ve been dancing around each other for four years,” she began with a giggle, “But it all changed thanks to you.”

“Me?” Katara asked incredulously.

Jiao smiled as she motioned for Katara to turn around so she could continue fixing her hair.

“At your brother’s wedding last winter, when that Water Tribe warrior asked me to dance and you persuaded Fire Lord Zuko to allow me, Kuo saw us,” the dark-haired servant began.

Katara remembered wondering why Kuo had stared at the dance floor with a dark look.

“He became jealous at the thought that another man could take me away,” Jiao continued. “So the night after I helped Lady Suki give birth to her twins, Kuo approached me and confessed the feelings he’d tried to hide. He had not wanted a relationship to distract him in his duties, but he changed his mind at the possibility that he could lose me and then began to quietly court me.”
“That’s so romantic,” Katara gushed.

“It is,” Jiao agreed with a smile, “And as the days pass, the more I love him.” She paused with a dreamy sigh before she shook her head, as if she remembered the reason why she had begun this conversation. “Well, when we returned to the Fire Nation, we consummated our love.”

“How…was it?” Katara asked curiously.

“The first penetration was painful, but Kuo was very patient and gentle, and I enjoyed it,” Jiao admitted softly. “I heard that it could be extremely painful to some women and often women don’t find pleasure the first time,” she explained before she added reassuringly when Katara frowned, “But if that were the case for you, you shouldn’t feel discouraged because it will get better.”

Katara gave a stiff nod.

“You will be sore a bit afterwards,” Jiao continued in the same kind tone, “But that will also go away.”

Gran-Gran had already told her that.

When her lady did not say anything, Jiao remained quiet as she finally finished piling Katara’s hair into a loose bun. Kuo had told her some men liked to loosen their women’s hair and watch it fall down over their bodies, and Jiao was sure her lord would want to do that to his new wife.

“My lady,” she said in a soothing tone, “What matters is the act of lovemaking, the intimacy shared between a man and a woman.”

Katara turned around when Jiao took a step away to signal she had finished and the waterbender smiled.

“You’re right, Jiao,” she said, “Thank you for the advice.”
“I’m sure Fire Lord Zuko will be considerate of your needs, my lady,” Jiao added with a gentle smile, “He loves you and will try to cause you the least amount of pain. He will treat you well.”

Katara felt her uncertainty diminish a little and she smiled.

“I’m sure he will,” she responded softly.

With a smile, Jiao then handed her a long robe of the same light blue color to put on above the thin nightdress and then some soft slippers. Katara placed the robe on, tying the sash snuggly around her waist, and again sat down on the bed to put on the slippers.

A soft knock sounded at the door and the women glanced at each other curiously before Jiao went to open the door. Standing outside was Yin-Min, the new physician’s assistant, holding a tray with a cup.

“Congratulations on your marriage, my lady,” the small woman said meekly and bowed.

“Thank you,” Katara said with a smile as she eyed the cup. “Please come in.”

The young woman hesitated before she stepped into the room slowly. She looked around nervously as she approached the waterbender who was smiling encouragingly. Katara wondered what horrible things Ozai had done to the young woman when she had been his concubine to make her so skittish. She mentally cursed the evil man.

Once she was standing before the waterbender, Yin-Min gave her a small smile as she timidly held out the tray to her.

“I have nothing expensive to give you for your marriage and for helping me get the position as Physician Toshiro’s assistant,” she began in a low tone, “but I can give you this.”

Katara eyed the cup before she looked at the small woman curiously.

“It’s wine that I mixed with a special blend of crushed flowers and herbs,” Yin-Min began as she smiled into the cup before she smiled at the waterbender.
“Thank you,” Katara said as she finally took the cup and looked curiously into the dark liquid. “What’s so special about the blend?”

Yin-Min’s cheeks turned pink as she averted her eyes bashfully.

“The blend of such ingredients helps with fertility,” she muttered shyly.

“Oh,” Katara said and blushed.

“If my lady keeps taking the blend of herbs, you will soon become with child and you will give Fire Lord Zuko his heir,” Yin-Min said, “That is my gift to you.”

Katara smiled happily at the thought.

“Thank you,” she said again.

Katara lifted the cup of wine and sniffed it delicately.

“It has a unique aroma,” she remarked before she brought the cup to her lips and drank it.

When she lowered the empty cup, her eyes widened in surprise and she smiled at the young assistant.

“It tastes very bitter, but it leaves a sweet aftertaste,” she commented.

Yin-Min smiled proudly.

“Then it means that I’ve mixed the ingredients perfectly,” she said with subdued happiness.

Reaching into her apron, Yin-Min pulled out a small bag and handed it hesitantly to the waterbender, almost as if she were afraid her gift would be rejected.

“I placed the crushed herbs into this bag for you,” she said with a shy smile, “Mix a small amount with any kind of drink you like. If you take it every morning, you will soon conceive, although sometimes it takes a while for the body to get used to it. Of course, you may not even need the help of the blend.” She blushed.

Katara reached for the bag with a grateful smile and thanked the small woman again, who flushed in pleasure.

“I won’t waste any more of your time and keep you from going to my lord,” Yin-Min said and flushed more deeply.

With a small smile and a bow, Yin-Min walked to the door and closed it softly behind her.

“That was really nice of her,” Katara said.

“Yin-Min has always been shy and quiet, but helpful when she became a servant,” Jiao responded. “I think she was only fifteen when she was brought here.”

“Maybe her experience as Ozai’s…concubine affected her a lot,” the waterbender said with a sad frown.

“Perhaps,” Jiao agreed.

Poor Yin-Min, Katara thought with a frown. She could not imagine the things the young woman had to endure.

Katara looked down at the bag she still held in her hands.

Would the herbs really make her more fertile? She again asked herself if she was ready to be a mother. Well, Yin-Min did say that sometimes the body had to adjust to it. But still it was a nice gesture, especially knowing that the Fire Nation nobility expected Zuko to sire an heir soon. She felt her body warmed at the thought of what they first had to do before they conceived a child.
Jiao pinned the Fire Lady crown in Katara’s loose bun and then stepped back.

“You are ready, my lady,” she proclaimed with a smile.

Katara again felt her stomach squeeze nervously, but she took a few breaths to calm herself down. After all, it wasn’t as if she did not want Zuko to make love to her.

They left the room in which Katara had stayed in during her every visit, but will never use again now that she was married to Zuko. La, she was a married woman now! Katara felt her anxiety lessen again in her happiness.

As they reached the corridor that led to the royal family wing, Katara made to turned left toward the Fire Lady bedchamber, but Jiao stopped her and led her to the right toward the Fire Lord’s royal chambers. Katara was confused as they headed toward Zuko’s room.

“Madam Fang Hua said it was tradition to have the wedding night in the Fire Lady’s room,” Katara said as her confusion mounted.

It was where she was going to sleep for her entire marriage and where Zuko was to come to her whenever he wanted to make love to her. She had wanted to sleep next to Zuko every night just as married couples did in the Southern Water Tribe, but she knew that many Fire Nation married nobles slept in separate rooms. Besides, she knew that Zuko liked his privacy and did not allow anyone but a few servants to enter his bedchamber. But perhaps she could persuade him to change his mind. After all, he had been insistent in sneaking into her guest room to be with her, she mused with a mental grin.

“Fire Lord Zuko has ordered for you to be brought to his chambers, where you will wait for him to come to you,” Jiao answered with a reassuring smile.

Soon they approached the end of the long corridor and stopped before the great golden doors of the Fire Lord’s royal chambers. Stationed on each side of the doors were Shen and Kuo. Katara blushed and averted her eyes at the knowing smiles the guards gave her. She glanced back in time to see Kuo smiling tenderly at Jiao, whose cheeks turned pink as she returned his smile. Katara suppressed a giggle when Shen rolled his eyes. She could see that the older guard knew of Kuo and Jiao’s relationship. Shen opened one of the heavy doors before he moved aside and smiled at his new lady.
“Thank you,” Katara said softly.

“You’re welcome, Fire Lady Katara,” the older guard replied.

Katara smiled again at the title before she stepped into the antechamber. Jiao seemed to snap out of her stupor and quickly followed after the younger woman. She guided Katara toward the low table and the waterbender slowly sank onto the cushion as she again began to bite her lip nervously.

“Please wait here for Fire Lord Zuko, my lady,” Jiao told her.

With another reassuring smile, the young maid turned around and stepped out of the room. The door was closed after her.

Katara took a few deep breaths as she prepared herself to wait for her husband.

Her husband.

She felt warmth spread through her entire body at those two words and her heart fluttered in her chest. She hoped Zuko did not take long to come to her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko had to stop himself from running as he headed swiftly toward the royal bedchamber he would now share with Katara for their entire lives. That way their children, a thought that never failed to make him equally happy and nervous, would know that their parents loved each other just as much as they were loved. As soon as Jiao had appeared to inform him that Katara was ready for him, he quickly strode out of the room where he had taken a bath and prepared himself for the wedding night. Then he raced to where his wife was waiting for him.

His wife.

Agni, did those words sound wonderful.

His pace quickened as did his already pounding heart.
He did not know when was the last time he had made it so quickly to his rooms, but he soon found himself outside the grand doors. His personal guards bowed to him.

“You are dismissed for the night,” he told them impatiently.

With amused and knowing smiles, Kuo and Shen bowed again before they left their posts and retreated.

Zuko took a moment to calm himself down before he pounced on Katara and ended up hurting her with his eagerness. But he could not deny that he was also nervous. It had been a long while since he had sex with a woman and he had never bothered to pleasure one before during the act. He might as well be a virgin, he mused wryly. What if he could not last long and humiliated himself? What if he was unable to bring Katara to ecstasy? What if he hurt her badly and frightened her enough that she would never let him touch her again?

Oh gods, he would die if that were to happen.

The Fire Lord shook his head and straightened himself. He would not fail his waterbender. He refused to have Katara remember their wedding night as a bad memory. He wanted her to enjoy this night as much as he and he would make sure she did.

He smoothed down the dark red night robe he had placed over his black sleeping pants. He raised a fist and knocked on one of the golden doors softly to alert Katara of his presence before he opened the door. He quickly closed it behind him as he stepped into the antechamber.

Zuko’s blood raced in his veins and he felt his desire flare up at the sight of Katara standing by the window, clad in a simple yet elegant light blue robe. Katara turned to look at him, and the sight of her wide, cobalt eyes made something clench within him. He did not speak as he finally moved away from the door and approached her. She also did not say anything as he made his way to her. Once he was standing before her, Zuko slowly lifted his hands to caress her cheeks before he cupped them softly. Slowly, he leaned down and kissed her lips gently.

At the soft touch of his lips, Katara sighed and she felt herself relax a little as she returned his soft kiss. But when they pulled away and she noticed his intense amber eyes, she felt her anxiety return. Trying to give herself a few more minutes before her life changed indefinitely, she decided to ask the question that had not left her mind.
“Why are we here?” she asked.

Zuko frowned in confusion.

“What do you mean?” he questioned as he looked around before he turned to gaze at her with a worried look. “It’s…our wedding night.”

Katara suppressed a smile at his misunderstanding. She could almost hear his trepidation at the thought that she would back out of consummating their marriage.

“Oh, Zuko,” Katara breathed with a delighted smile as she leaned into his touch. “Thank you. I really didn’t want to sleep by myself, because I wanted to share a room with you too.”
that he had control of himself again, Zuko smiled down at her and took her hand, leading her toward the bedchamber that was beyond the other set of identical golden doors.

With another glance at each other, Zuko opened one of the doors before swiftly sweeping Katara into his arms. Katara squealed and held tightly to his neck as he stepped into the bedchamber and closed the heavy door swiftly with his back. As they turned their attention to the room, Zuko froze and Katara gasped at the sight that greeted them.

Candles were placed everywhere and the fireplace was blazing merrily, giving the room a warm and inviting atmosphere. Red rose petals were strewn across the marble floor and there was a path leading from the doors to the bed. The top bedcover had been turned down to reveal a silky white sheet beneath that had also been sprinkled with the deep scarlet petals.

Katara looked up to grin at Zuko and he looked down to stare at her.

“Let me guess, this is your mother and uncle’s doing, huh?” she asked with a giggle.

“Most likely,” was Zuko’s response as he smiled at her laugh before he added, “But do you like it?”

“Yes. It’s beautiful,” Katara replied honestly.

“I’m glad,” Zuko told her as he brought her closer to him and bent his head down to kiss her again.

Sighing when they pulled away to gather some air, Zuko walked upon the petal path toward the center of the room. Slowly, he placed Katara on her feet, his hands sliding up her body as she went, causing her to shiver lightly.

“Let me put our fire crowns in their box,” he said as a distraction when he noticed that she began to breathe heavily due to her anxiety.

Biting her lip, Katara gave him a nod and Zuko smiled as he reached up to pull the Fire Lady fire crown from her bun. Katara’s eyes followed him as he moved to the dresser resting on the eastern wall and opened a beautifully engraved ebony box, placing her crown inside. Zuko removed his own fire crown and ran his fingers though his now lose hair before placing the crown next to hers.
“I had this box made a few weeks ago so it could hold both our crowns,” he told her after closing the lid and walking back to her with a soft smile.

Katara returned the smile.

“That’s a sweet gesture,” she told him softly as he finally stopped before her.

He stared at her silently for a moment and Katara wondered at the emotions she saw in his eyes. What he said next made her heart swell with love.

“I’m determined that our wedding night be perfect, Katara,” he began as he cupped her cheek in his large hand, his expression intensely serious, even as he touched her gently.

Katara brought her hand up to rest it upon his and she leaned into his touch as she smiled at him.

“I’m sure it will,” she began, but she paused when he lightly shook his head.

“It will. It has to,” he added firmly.

Katara was speechless at the fiercely determined expression on his face.

“I love you like I’ve never loved before, Katara,” Zuko continued as he stared intently into her blue orbs. “I sometimes find it difficult to express how much. My life used to be full of darkness and monotony, but you’ve brought light and happiness into it. Before you, I wasn’t living, only existing. Can you understand what I’m trying to tell you? You gave meaning to my life that I didn’t know I needed.”

“Zuko,” Katara said breathlessly, “I understand what you’re telling me. And I promise that I will try with everything I am to continue making you happy because I love you so much.”

“I know you will,” Zuko responded confidently as he brought his other hand to cup her cheek, his thumbs caressing her smooth skin, “You have already shown me so many times, but I’ll never get enough. I can’t get enough.”
He leaned down to kiss her ardently and Katara moaned into his mouth.

“I’m so glad that you’re in my life, Katara,” he said, his lips still caressing her lips, “I’m so glad that you’re my wife. And I promise to make you glad of it too, every single day, every single moment, for the rest of your life.”

Katara felt tears pool in her eyes before they trickled down her cheeks where Zuko gently wiped them away with his thumbs.

“Oh, Zuko, you don’t have to promise me,” she told him with a watery smile, “Because you have already started.”

Zuko smiled down at her as he again brushed her tears away before he seized her lips in a slow yet passionate kiss that soon had them both panting and straining against each other. Slowly, so as not to startle her, Zuko reached for the sash around her waist and gently tugged at it until it loosened around her. He paused briefly when he felt Katara tense slightly before he pushed the edges of her robe down her shoulders until it slid to the floor.

He stepped back a little to look at her and smiled slightly at the thin, light blue nightdress she was wearing that contrasted nicely with her dark skin. His anticipation flared. It was as if he were unwrapping a gift. A very exquisite and precious gift.

He leaned down to kiss her when she began to tremble before pulling away again. He reached up to release her hair from its bun and he watched, mesmerized, as her chocolate tresses tumbled down her back and framed her face. He gently combed her soft hair with his fingers before he gently clasped a piece of it and brought it to his nose. He deeply breathed in her sweet gardenia scent before letting her hair slip through his fingers and fall down onto her left breast.

Katara tried not to fidget as Zuko lifted his hands and slowly, very slowly, pulled the strings that held her nightdress closed. With a tug, the thin nightgown slid down past her breasts, her hips, her legs, and pooled into a silky puddle around her feet. She felt her cheeks heat up as she stood before him in just her undergarments and she fought to keep her hands to her sides.

Zuko groaned softly at the sight of Katara, clad only in the white undergarments he had ordered made for her as a few locks of her hair fell onto her chest. Again, he fought himself from taking her like a lustful beast. When she began to fidget nervously as he continued to stare at her ravenously without saying a word, he gave her an encouraging smile.
“Why don’t you take off my robe, love?” he asked her, partly so she won’t feel as if she could not participate, and partly because he was feeling smothered in the red robe as his body heated up in desire.

The waterbender suppressed a relieved breath as she moved closer to Zuko, glad that she would not be the only one half naked, and that she had something to do. Slowly, just as Zuko had done before, she tugged the sash until it hung lose before she slowly parted the red robe aside. Her eyes widened a bit when she revealed pale flesh underneath and not a tunic. With shaky fingers, Katara placed her hands gently on his chest and heard him let out a sigh.

The waterbender stared at her hands as she leisurely slid them up his torso and then sideways to his shoulders, before pushing the red robe aside so that it fell to the marble floor. She ran her hands down to his chest where Zuko stopped her by placing his hands above hers. Looking up at him, Katara saw him stare at her with simmering eyes. He bent down to capture her lips in a fiery kiss that made her knees buckle from the intensity.

With a low growl, Zuko quickly swept her into his arms, and without parting from her soft lips, he walked toward the massive bed. He placed her gently upon the petal covered sheets as he continued to kiss her, his body hovering close above hers but not quite touching. Katara had her arms wrapped around his neck and Zuko groaned when she nibbled gently on his lower lip. The firebender placed one of his hands on her waist and rubbed the flesh for a moment, before he trailed his hand up her side and past her ribs. But before he could touch her covered breast, he moved his hand to her back.

Katara let out a disappointed moan since she had been anticipating his touch on her aching breast. But then she felt him tug at the strings of the top that covered her chest and she tensed slightly before she forced herself to relax. After all, it wasn’t as if Zuko had not seen her already. Soon Zuko had her top undergarment loose around her chest as he continued to bestow hungry kisses on her lips. She felt him grab one end of it before tossing it aside. He lifted his mouth from hers and pulled back slightly so he could see her.

Zuko watched as his wife blushed endearingly before she moved her hands to cover her breasts either in an involuntary reflex, or because of his hungry gaze. With a small frown he placed his hands over her arms.

“Please don’t hide from me again, Katara,” he told her in a soft yet firm tone, “I enjoy looking at your wonderful breasts.”

Katara gave him a small smile as she moved her arms away and placed them gently down at her sides.
Zuko’s golden eyes took her all in. Her large sapphire eyes shining up at him, her soft lips that were parted so she could take air in, her brown skin glowing from the light of the fireplace and the many candles spread throughout the room, and her wavy, chocolate tresses that fanned out upon the white pillow beneath her. His eyes then landed on her soft breasts that moved up and down as her breathing accelerated—those soft mounds that were tipped with tight dusky buds that just begged to be kissed and savored. His gaze lingered for a moment before he allowed his eyes to take her all in once again.

His eyes caressed her lovely face, her wide blue eyes, her flushed cheeks, her lightly parted, plump lips. His gaze then traveled down her slender neck, her shoulders, and her gleaming chest. Then his eyes landed on her generous breasts and he admired the perky globes—staring with satisfaction at her nipples that had hardened into pebbles and were almost pleading him to take them into his mouth. Moving his gaze away from the temptation for the moment, he continued his perusal down her lean stomach, her slim waist, her curvy hips, and her long, toned legs—admiring every flawless inch of her soft, bare flesh. He took in her scent of rain just hidden beneath gardenias and he let out a deep sigh. How marvelous she looked laying beneath him in nothing but a white piece of cloth that covered where he so desperately wanted to be buried in. She was perfect in every single way and she was all his.

“So beautiful,” he whispered as he again leaned down to kiss her.

Katara sighed softly into his mouth before he moved away.

The young Fire Lord kissed his wife on her smooth brow, on her pert nose, on each of her cheeks, and finally on her mouth again. He gazed deep and loving into her large cobalt eyes, eyes that gazed back at him lovingly, but nervously. He wanted so much to be inside her, but he knew that she was not ready yet to receive him.

“So lovely, my wife,” he whispered tenderly. Again those two words caused an intense emotion to go through him.

“So Zuko,” Katara moaned softly.

His light touches, his penetrating gaze, and his loving words were making her body heat up and her core tingle. She wrapped her arms around his neck and pulled his head down so she could kiss him. But he quickly moved away from her mouth so he could trail his lips down her jaw, which he nibbled softly, and down her throat, which he licked slightly. Then he moved down her collarbone, which he bit gently, before moving down the valley of her heaving breasts.
A soft moan escaping her, Katara felt her heart quicken its already fast pace when Zuko began to trace his lips slowly around her right breast, occasionally flicking out his tongue to taste, while her other breast was being gently caressed and squeezed by his calloused hand. She waited almost breathlessly as Zuko’s mouth spiraled closer and closer to her aching nipple in that same infuriating slow pace. A fire was building inside of her as she silently begged him in her mind to finally end her torture. She cried out when his mouth suddenly latched onto her tight peak.

“Zuko, oh!” she cried as her fingers threaded into his dark hair, bringing him closer to her chest.

Zuko felt his cock stiffen as he licked, flicked, and sucked on her lovely nipple while he continued to squeeze her other breast, pinching and rolling the neglected tip between his fingers. He quickly switched breasts and engulfed the other stiff crest in his hot mouth while he grabbed and pushed her other breast up, revealing a glistening peak into the warm air. Katara pushed her chest up so he could have more access, then gasped when the movement caused her sensitive nipple to brush against the rough texture of his scarred cheek.

She felt Zuko freeze before he pulled away from her breasts to look at her. She did not like the wary look that had appeared in his eyes, as if he were expecting her to recoil with disgust at having his scarred flesh touch her. She was not repulsed. It had felt good, very good. Why could he still not see that she loved all of him? Scars and all—whether physical or emotional. With an inviting smile, she gently urged his head back down.

“Don’t stop,” she whispered. “That felt so good. Do it again. Please?”

Zuko stared down at her incredulously as he tried to fight the pressure of her hand. Did she really mean what she said? Was she really not disgusted that such a lovely part of her body came in contact with that flawed part of him? As he stared into her darkened, blue eyes, he felt his body relax slightly while his heart expanded as he saw the lust, longing, and love in them. Why did he think Katara would turn away from his disfigurement? She had told him that she loved his scar as much as she loved him.

She was so beautiful. With her glittering, blue eyes, soft skin, and delicious feminine curves that made his loins ache every time he saw her. But it was her heart, her honesty and loyalty, that he loved the most. She looked at him as the man he really was rather the title he bore or the immense wealth he possessed. Or the scars that marred him. Katara was special and unique. And she was his.

With a growl that reflected his delight as much as his relief, Zuko buried his face between her breasts and nuzzled them before again sucking on her left dusky tip as he caressed the other breast. He teased her neglected nipple with his fingers for a second before he slowly rubbed his scarred eye against it. He heard and felt Katara’s breath hitch before she moaned.

“Oh,” she breathed out as she tightened her hold on his hair and pushed her nipple closer to his face. “That feels so nice.”

In response, Zuko sucked harder on her peak while he roughly brushed her right nipple across the rough texture of his scarred skin.

Katara gasped and she pushed her breast closer to her husband’s caresses. Her body was getting so hot and that tingle in her center was getting even more intense. She could feel her arousal leaking into her undergarment. She felt him latch his teeth gently on her nipple and tug on it before covering it entirely with his mouth and twirling it with his tongue. Suddenly, Zuko groaned around her nipple and the vibration sent a shock throughout her body, causing her to tremble and moan as she felt another rush of liquid seep from her aching core.

With one last roll of his tongue, Zuko pulled away and sat back on his knees. His lust flared and he felt his erection push against the confines of his sleeping pants as he gazed down at his wife. She was panting beneath him, her glistening breasts heaved as she breathed, and her blue eyes were dazed as she gazed back at him.

Katara moved her eyes away from Zuko’s darkened, golden orbs and his handsome face as she allowed her gaze to trail down. She regarded in admiration at his lean-muscled broad shoulders and then his smooth pale chest and muscled stomach. Her eyes rested for a moment on the scar that marred his otherwise unblemished flesh—the scar he had received in order to save her life, the evidence of his feelings for her. Raising herself up until she was sitting before his kneeling form, Katara lifted her hand and softly placed it on the skin between his chest and stomach, right above the scar that resembled a bursting star. She caressed it a moment before she leaned down to kiss it gently. She pulled back and glanced up to see his face. He was looking at her with a smoldering look, yet she could see the tenderness in those bright amber eyes as he allowed her to touch him.

Breaking eye contact, she returned her attention to his upper body. She moved her hand to his rib cage, slowly spreading her fingers, gliding them up again toward the left side of his chest where she could feel his pounding heart beneath. She then placed her other hand onto his right pectoral and it quivered. His body was incredible, all lean muscles and hard planes. As her hands slid upward, her fingers gently brushed his small nipples and she watched as the muscles underneath her exploring fingers jumped reflexively. Surprised, she stopped briefly before she brushed them again a bit more firmly. She heard Zuko suck in his breath and again the muscles quivered.

“Do you like that?” Katara asked curiously as she again raised her eyes to his.
“Yes,” Zuko responded in a surprised tone, “I’ve never been touched like that before, but it felt… nice.”

Katara suppressed a smug smirk as she quickly looked down to see her hands kneading his hard body. She thought on how amazing it felt to have Zuko touch her breasts and nipples with both his hands and his mouth, and she wondered if it would feel the same for him. She could feel Zuko’s curious gaze on her, but she did not look up as she leaned her head down and touched her lips to his hot skin. Again the muscles leapt at her touch and Zuko let out a sigh. Before he could figure out what she was planning, Katara opened her mouth and ran her wet tongue over his dark male nipple. This time Zuko’s entire body jumped at the new sensation and he gasped. Smiling, Katara caught his small nipple gently between her teeth and tugged softly, before she caressed him with her tongue as he had caressed her a moment ago.

Zuko placed his hand on the back of her head as she continued to tease his nipple with her lips. He had never thought having them touched would feel so good. It was like he was new to all of this and he was learning just like Katara was—which in a way he was. Suddenly Katara’s hands were sliding down his chest and down his stomach, and he felt his cock twitch as her hands lowered closer to it.

Quickly he had her beneath him again with their mouths pressed together and his hands holding her wrists beside her head. He wanted her to touch him so badly, but not yet. He was not sure he would be able to control himself.

Pulling away. Zuko again knelt back and ran his hands leisurely down her sides, past her slim waist, until he rested them on her hips. His fingers played with the edge of her last piece of clothing before he slowly began to tug it down. He saw Katara tense rigidly and he paused, flicking his eyes up to see her staring at him with wide, nervous eyes.

“It’s okay,” he murmured reassuringly, “Relax.”

Katara swallowed thickly as Zuko again tugged at her undergarment. Her body stiffened even further as he pulled it down her hips and her breathing increased as he slid it down her legs. She felt her face heat up as he held the small white clothing in his hands, stared at the damp spot heatedly for a moment, before tossing it over the bed like he had done to her top wrap.

Zuko’s eyes quickly darted to the place he had wished so many times to gaze upon and feel surrounding his thick cock, only to be disappointed when he saw that Katara had closed her legs tightly. She was lying woodenly on the bed, her eyes uncertain and embarrassed. He leaned over her and kissed her mouth softly, trying to comfort her and distract her for a moment.
Katara trembled beneath her husband’s body as he kissed her reassuringly. She knew that with nothing covering her most intimate of places, it meant that the time had come for them to consummate their marriage. She was nervous and afraid, but most of all embarrassed that such an intimate part of her was going to be seen. Granted, Zuko was her husband, but she was still shy of letting him see what no one had seen before. She was brought out of her thoughts when Zuko moved away from her mouth so he could brush his lips on her neck. She shivered.

“I want to see you, Katara,” Zuko groaned huskily near her ear, “Spread your legs for me, love. I need to see all of you. Please.”

Katara heard the immense need in his voice and something clenched within her, but it was what he had asked her to do that caused that fire within her to flare. After a slight hesitation, she gave him a nod and relaxed slightly.

When he felt her nod and her body relax, Zuko again knelt back and eagerly watched her. He heard her let out a deep breath and then he saw her slowly part her legs so he could finally see what now belonged to him.

What he found delighted him, and a pleased and aroused groan fell from his lips. He gazed at the neatly trimmed curls, a shade darker than her tresses, which rested above her womanhood and were gleaming with her juices just as were her smooth upper thighs. But what had his cock straining against its confine was the glistening slit of her sex.

Zuko ripped his eyes away from what would be his paradise and looked at Katara again. A deep red blush had blossomed across her cheeks. She was biting her lip as her naked body lay upon the white sheets and above the crimson rose petals like he had once fantasized about months ago.

Of all the women, no, goddesses assembled together, she was the most beautiful, the most ravishing. And she was all his.

He finally noticed that her eyes were nervous and uncertain as she looked at him, as if she anticipated his disapproval at any moment. Well, that moment would never come because he was far from disappointed. He was pleased beyond belief and had no doubts that being inside her will feel divine. But for now he needed to reassure her.

“So beautiful,” he whispered huskily and he smiled when he saw her relax and her eyes brighten.
Katara had been sure that Zuko would immediately touch her uncovered flesh, but instead he placed his hands on her legs. He trailed them slowly upward, past her knees, to her thighs, before sliding his fingers inward. He traced circles with his thumbs on the sensitive skin of her inner thighs, so close to her aching core that it caused more of her aroused fluids to leak out at the anticipation of having Zuko touch her. She felt his hands slide up again as his gaze continued to be riveted on her most intimate place. Her heart sped up in excitement, but she let out a frustrated groan when he pulled his hands away. He chuckled and she raised her eyes to his to give him a small glare.

Even her blue eyes glaring at him caused Zuko’s covered shaft to throb. He looked away from her eyes so he could again return his attention to his new fascination. He reached down one finger and slid it along her wet slit, causing her to jerk, throw back her head, and moan. Zuko continued to run his finger up and down the cleft of her pussy. Then he gently parted her feminine folds with both of his thumbs, revealing the dark pink flesh of her sex that contrasted deliciously with her brown skin, wet and swollen with her arousal. He groaned deeply at the sight and the feeling of her as he coated his finger in her essence and continued to touch her.

“Ohh,” she moaned in pleasure. “Mmm.”

Closing her eyes, Katara pressed her head deep into the pillow beneath her. She let out a soft mewl as Zuko continued to caress, touch, and tease her sex, but always avoiding her entrance and that bundle of nerves above it. She arched her hips and strained against his hand, but it was to no avail.

Suddenly Zuko was no longer touching her and her eyes flew open to see what happened. She was surprised to see that he was not kneeling before her but was standing at the foot of the large bed, his eyes dark with desire. He was rubbing himself through his clothes and she blushed as she stared at the hand that he used to pleasure himself. Sitting up, Katara watched him, that fire inside her growing even stronger. Zuko’s hand moved away from himself and he trailed it up so he could pull at the strings that held his dark sleeping pants up. He placed both hands on the edge of his pants and pushed down. Katara’s eyes quickly darted up to his face again.

“Look at me, Katara,” he demanded huskily. “I want you to look at what you do to me.”

Katara looked away from his amber eyes and slowly allowed her eyes to again trail down his body, admiring every perfect line of his torso, the perfect planes of his muscular chest, and the perfect ripped ridges of his muscular stomach. Her eyes went lower, tracing the twin lines between his hips, the thin trail of dark hair that led down, and then her eyes landed on that part of him that she had only touched a couple of times.

She gasped softly and her blue orbs widened. When she had touched him, she had thought that he was big, but actually seeing it made her realized that she had underestimated him.
He was huge! His cock jutted brazenly out of a neat thatch of dark hair, rearing high like a fearsome dragon, the big dark-reddish tip level with his stomach. It was long and thick, and Katara felt a twinge of fear surface at the thought that Zuko would be putting such a huge appendage inside her. With his fingers alone it was a tight fit.

Zuko stepped forward and slowly crawled onto the bed toward her with a predatory grace, like that of a great panther-tiger, his golden eyes now molten amber. Katara’s eyes widened impossibly large as he neared her and her gaze again became transfixed on his erection, which bobbed with his every movement. She raised her eyes to his face once he was kneeling before her.

“Touch me, Katara,” he told her in a husky tone. “Touch the evidence of my desire for you. What belongs to you.”

At his words, Katara’s gaze dropped once again to his well-endowed member that seemed to be pointing at her, as if begging for her touch. Slowly, she raised her hand toward it. She paused when she neared his shaft and glanced up to give him a swift look of inquiry, asking his permission. Zuko nodded encouragingly, smiling at the pure delight of her.

Looking back down, Katara curiously admired his large, turgid shaft for a moment. There were several bluish veins, and a large vein in particular grew from the root of his groin and traveled the long length of his arousal, stopping at the thick mushroomed head. Instead of placing her hand directly on him, Katara moved her hand to his upper thigh, massaging the flesh as he had done to her, before moving inward. Her fingers came in contact with his dark hair and she curiously coiled them in the thick curls.

Lifting her hand, Katara again moved it until it hovered above his erection, and then she grazed the head of his member with her fingers. Zuko hissed and jumped in both shock and pleasure at her touch, before throwing his head back with a groan. Encouraged by her firebender’s pleased sound as well as her growing fascination, Katara began to circle the head with her fingers. She played with the round edge before sliding all the way down his length and to his base, causing him to let out a deep groan. She traced the large bluish vein and admired the feeling of the pulse of blood underneath the pads of her fingers. Then she gently followed its path to the heavy sac below before trailing her fingers back up again.

Closing his eyes, Zuko let out another hiss when Katara dragged her fingers up again to circle his swollen tip, before he looked down to stare at the movement of her hand. His breathing accelerated as he watched, fascinated, as she touched him, the golden ring he gave her glinting at her movements. He ripped his eyes away from her hand and looked into her face. Katara exploring him, touching him, caressing him with such wonder in her eyes was the most arousing thing he had ever seen. Agni, she was so incredible, and yet, she returned his fervent affections with all the innocent curiosity and uncertainty of a woman being made love to for the first time. He was so utterly captivated by her as she continued to pleasure him with her fingers, that he jerked in surprise when she finally wrapped her small right hand as much as she could around his aching cock.

“Ah, Katara!” he cried out with a deep moan as he slightly thrust his hips into her hand.

“Oh,” Katara gasped softly.

The needy sound that escaped her husband made Katara’s stomach clench and her core quiver. She tightened her grasp a little. She again marveled at the paradox of how soft his skin was, yet how hard his shaft was beneath, like steel sheathed in velvet. Giving a soft squeeze, Katara began to stroke up and down his length like he had taught her before. Her other hand curiously moved lower and she gently cupped one of the heavy sacs below his length, before squeezing the other one. The pleased grunt that escaped from him at her touch had her attention diverted from what she was doing to see his furrowed brow and strained features. She felt feminine pride swell within her at his obvious pleasure, and she quickened the pace of her hand. Looking back down, Katara noticed the semi-translucent, whitish liquid seeping from the small slit on his tip. She stroked him one more time before pressing her thumb on his swollen head, spreading the liquid around it. His cock jerked almost violently from her touch, the sight of it causing hot liquid to slide down her nether lips.

Zuko growled.

Agni, he was so hard and aroused that it was all he could do not to throw Katara down and thrust himself inside her. Her light touches were building a rampant pressure inside him. The feeling of him in her hand as she meticulously explored and stroked his engorged shaft was causing an immense inferno to roar within him. Awash in passion, Zuko shuddered with the force of his need. Those delicate fingers of hers were tormenting him to the point of embarrassing himself, and he knew that if he allowed her to continue he would not last any longer. He refused to find his release on their wedding night so soon.

“Stop, Katara. That’s enough,” he commanded in a harsher tone than he intended as he grabbed her wrists and drew them away.

She looked up at him with hurt and confused eyes, and he knew she was wondering if she had done something wrong to displease him. He could not let her continue thinking that. He quickly pulled her to him and kissed her ardently before gently laying her back on the bed with him hovering over her smaller frame.

A gasp was torn from Katara’s throat as Zuko brought his long, lean body down along hers and every inch of their bare skin touched. She delighted in the weight of his body against her, how his hard, muscular planes and every dip and rise in his flesh molded perfectly with her soft curves. In that moment, she felt so feminine and delicate. Another gasp escaped her when she felt his hard length pressing insistently into her thigh, hot and heavy, scorching her, leaving her breathless.

“I can’t take it any longer,” Zuko panted against her mouth as his body trembled, “I need to be inside you, Katara. Now.”

He felt how Katara’s entire body froze beneath his and again he worked to reassure her and calm her down enough so she could be ready for him. He reached down a hand toward her wet center, parted her slick folds, and swiftly inserted his middle finger. Katara gasped sharply and moaned as her hips instinctively moved up so she could press his finger closer. As he continued to kiss her, Zuko then inserted a second finger inside her hot pussy. He curled and twisted them, stretching her for his thick girth and preparing her for when he would finally and completely make her his.

“Zuko, ah!” Katara cried out into his hot mouth as she strained her hips to his touch. Her head thrashed from side to side as the pressure in her belly began to grow intensely.

Zuko groaned and quickened the pace of his fingers a little. He was drunk with joy and smugness at the thought that no other man, not even Aang, had touched her like he had. He was her first, and he would be her only. He lamented the fact that she would not be his first, but he vowed that she would be his only from now on. No one but Katara, his wife, would do.

No other man knew the softness of her brown skin, no one had heard her little breathless moans and soft cries. No one else had seen the deep blush that would cover her cheeks entirely as her passion grew, no one had gazed upon her beautiful sapphire eyes that darkened in lust, and no one knew where and how to caress her to make her melt into one’s arms. No other man knew how sweet her kisses tasted, how amazing her touch felt, how wonderful it felt just to be with her.

No one but him.

_Mine_, was the one word that resonated in his head as his kiss became more passionate—fueled by his thoughts and desire.

This woman was made for him and only him. Zuko did not know which god had decided to place such a wonderful woman in his life and as his wife, but he dared not question it and discard such a gift. A gift that he would treasure above anything else for the rest of his life.
He pulled away to stare intently into Katara’s dazed eyes as she panted with her arousal.

“Your body was made for me and for me only,” he growled lowly.

Katara’s answer was a sigh through parted lips and a small smile. There was an almost imperceptible change in her tensed body, a delicate movement that revealed more evidently than words that she had already given herself to him in her mind, just like she had in her heart. Katara felt the shudder that went through him at her acceptance and her smile widened a little bit.

“Make love to me. Please,” she murmured softly, “make me yours, Zuko.”

Zuko groaned as he felt his cock stiffen even more at her amorous words. He had thought he was stiff and aroused before, but he found that he had never been this hard in his life. It actually hurt.

“I will,” Zuko finally managed to groan out. “I will make love to you tonight, Katara,” he promised passionately.

He continued to pump his fingers in and out of her for a moment longer as he tried to adjust to the fierce arousal within him. But he could see that, although she was still nervous and fearful, Katara was as ready as any woman could be who had never before been made love to by a man. Pulling his drenched fingers out of her when her walls began to clench around them, Zuko knelt back between her parted legs as she groaned in disappointment. Uncle had advised him that sometimes if the woman was really aroused and almost at the brink of release, the first penetration would not be as painful. He hoped it worked for Katara.

Besides that, he wanted his waterbender to find her first release with him buried deep inside her.

Zuko brought the hand that had been pleasuring his wife to his cock and he stroked himself, spreading her juices along his length. The sensation ripped a groan from him and the visual elicited a moan from her. Amber eyes burning with lust and love, Zuko gently descended on top of her again, spreading her smooth legs widely so he could be cradled by her hips. Leaning down slowly, he claimed her mouth once more as he settled completely between her parted thighs, allowing his heavy, rigid member to rest gently over the mound at the apex of her legs. He moaned again as their skin, from their chest to their thighs, touched, sending a delicious spark to skitter up their spines. Gods, nothing had ever felt so good, so pleasurable, as being like this with Katara.

The feeling of Zuko’s stiff cock pressing softly against her core, however, made Katara tense as her fear resurfaced tenfold. Would it really be as horrible as Ursa made it seem? What if she was one of those women who could not find pleasure the first time as Jiao had said? What if she ended up disappointing Zuko?

He was so long and thick and she was so small and tight. Would he even fit?

“Zuko?” she whimpered uncertainly.

Zuko immediately paused in his movements as he lifted his mouth from her lips so he could see her. Her blue eyes were again wide and nervous and he leaned back down to kiss her softly.

“Ssh, love,” he crooned tenderly as if he could read her mind, “It will fit.”

At her unconvinced look, he tried to give her a reassuring smile.

“It will hurt at first, but once the pain subsides, we will both enjoy the tight fit,” he told her, “I promise.”

Katara gazed at him for a long moment, to make sure he was telling her the truth, before she gave him a stiff nod and wrapped her arms around him to steady herself.

At her consent, Zuko felt his erection throb almost painfully. He was amazed that he had been able to hold back his need and desire for her this long, but he had to if he wanted to make this a memorable and pleasurable night for Katara.

Reaching down with one hand, Zuko grasped his cock and squeezed the darkish head slightly before he rubbed it against her slick folds and swollen nub, causing her to throw her head back and moan softly. The sound of her pleasure seemed to envelop him, making his already engorged shaft throb with need. It was exquisitely painful, his need to bury himself within her, to fill her, make her his. Her heat was calling to him, and he could no longer ignore its sweet call.

Unable to wait for one more second, Zuko brushed against her feminine folds in order to coat his entire length with her slick fluids before carefully dipping the tip of his cock into her entrance. He met a bit of resistance, so he pulled back slightly before pressing against her tiny opening a couple more times until finally he pushed the bulbous head inside her. He saw her wince slightly, but she did not cry out, she only tightened her hold of him. Agni, just the feeling of his tip inside her was pure bliss!

Zuko slid slowly inside an inch, groaning as her burning sheath contracted around him as it stretched to his girth. He paused when the head of his cock nudged against a barrier—her maidenhead.

Only mine, he thought smugly and possessively.

Katara was biting her lip as she tried to adjust to Zuko’s impressive girth, but when he paused as he nudged something within her, she looked up into his eyes. With a gasp at the burning fire within his golden orbs, she knew he had reached her maidenhead. Her eyes seemed to burn in his golden orbs while his seemed to drown in her cobalt ones. She forgot her discomfort for a moment as she lost herself in his loving and intense stare, admiring the many different golden-colored flecks embedded in his eyes.

Not wanting to prolong her discomfort and pain, Zuko pulled his hips back a little before thrusting forward, breaking her virgin barrier, claiming her innocence, and making her his forever before burying himself deep within her.

Katara cried out at the searing pain. She clenched her eyes shut, her fingers digging into Zuko’s back, as a few tears trickled down the corner of her closed eyes.

Oh La, it hurt! It felt like she was being ripped in two, like she was being stretched beyond capacity…and it burned.

“I’m sorry,” she heard Zuko moan near her ear before he nuzzled her cheek, “I’m sorry.”

_Damn, she’s so tight!_ Zuko groaned mentally, _So good._

By the power of Agni, she was molten warmth and silky wetness. Zuko fought to take in air and resisted the need to move as Katara’s tight, wet walls continued to constrict around him, as if unsure whether to push him out or pull him in. Her hot passage embraced him, tantalizing him to begin pumping inside her, to bury every inch of his aching shaft within her body’s tight grasp. But he knew she was still in pain and he refused to hurt her more than was necessary.

Gritting his teeth tightly, Zuko took deep breaths as he held himself back, waiting for a sign from her to continue, even as his throbbing cock begged for completion. And because this was Katara, he would have no qualms about releasing himself inside her, as he had refused to do with those other women from his past. He wanted to fill Katara with his seed. It would be even more intimate, for it seemed as if he had saved this right just for his lovely wife, for the woman he loved.

“Relax, Katara,” he prompted her gently, though he could not stop the groan that escaped him.

Katara tried to heed his words, but the pain and discomfort were making it hard for her to do so. She heard him repeat his regret for her pain before he began to whisper little words of thanks, desire, and love to her. She felt Zuko again nuzzle her cheek before he claimed her lips in a heady kiss. He nibbled softly on her bottom lip, and when she opened her lips to him, he entered her mouth. She finally began to relax as the pain subsided until there was only a dull ache, and she returned his kisses fervently.

Coiling their tongues together, stroking and probing her mouth in an imitation of what he longed to do within the heaven of her hot pussy, Zuko did not move until her fingers eased their grasp on his back.

Pulling away from his mouth, Katara looked down between their bodies and saw where they were joined, where Zuko’s thick member was buried inside her. Then she looked up into his strained and pained features. Again, she felt her heart swell with love and gratitude at the knowledge that he was holding himself back because he did not want to hurt her when it was obvious his need was great. Experimentally, Katara shifted her hips slightly. The pain did not return and she felt only mild discomfort, so she lifted them and then squeezed her inner muscles around him, causing Zuko to close his eyes and groan deeply.

“I’m fine,” Katara whispered when Zuko continued to remain still before she added softly, “Love me, Zuko.”

With a nod, Zuko pulled his hips back, gazed deeply into her eyes, before slowly sliding back in. A growl ripped from his throat, before he again pulled back and then thrust slowly forward.

It was incredible. There were no other words that he could think of to describe what taking Katara was like. She fitted perfectly around him, as if her body was especially made for him, clenching around him in a hot silken grip. Moving his mouth to her ear, Zuko gently licked and sucked on her lobe as he began to move in and out of her in a slow rhythm. He did not pull out of her amazing core too far because he could not even stand the thought of it. With a groan, he continued his slow pumping inside her body, because he wanted Katara to adjust fully to his large girth, and also because he wanted this moment to last forever.
Katara remained still as Zuko continued to move in and out of her, and for a brief moment, she wondered if something was wrong with her when she did not feel that amazing pleasure she had heard about.

But suddenly a loud gasp fell from her lips when a tingle of pleasure started to grow within her core when Zuko picked up his speed a little. Then she moaned loudly as the delightful friction when he plunged his hard length into her caused a spark of pleasure to shoot up her spine. She tightened her limbs around him. Now that the pain was gone, Katara marveled at the new sensation, at having Zuko inside her, making love to her so slowly, so gently. His huge cock driving into her, stretching her to accommodate him, made her feel so full. It felt perfect. She felt complete, as if she had been empty all this time and he had been the missing piece. The brunette waterbender sighed when her husband kissed her softly on the lips.

Katara then felt herself blush when the erotic wet sound of Zuko plunging in and out of her drenched core made her arousal flare to high levels. She groaned as a particular stroke of his caused her toes to curl and more liquid to rush from her core.

“Zu-ah! Zuko!” she mewed, “Uuuuh, oh!”

“You feel so good, Katara, so warm, so damn good,” Zuko groaned hoarsely near her ear before he began muttering huskily, almost to himself, “So wet, so tight! Ahh, feels so good.”

With a soft moan, Katara pushed her hips up to meet his. Again he thrust into her and again she met him, this time with no sign of pain or discomfort, just the pleasurable feeling of being full. It was a feeling like no other and she did not want it to stop. She wanted it to last forever.

Zuko delighted in the feeling of Katara’s soft hands tracing his body, her hips meeting his insistently, her tight, wet pussy squeezing him firmly as all her shyness and uncertainty disappeared. He could see that she was intent on bringing him as much pleasure as he was giving her…and he loved it.

“Tell me…uuh…how do I make you feel?” he told her with a deep, passionate grunt, “Does it…ahhh...feel good, Katara?”

“Ohh, yes! So good,” she panted passionately, “You make me feel so good, Zuko.”

“Gods, Katara!” Zuko growled as her words caused his cock to throb excruciatingly.
Changing his slow pace into a slightly swifter one, Zuko looked down to see his waterbender throw her head back and cry softly, as her cheeks flushed a deep red hue and a slight sheen of sweet began to coat her olive skin. Zuko could not remember ever seeing anything as beautiful as the sight of her at that moment. He leaned back down to engage her mouth in another passionate kiss. He felt her inner muscles squeeze him and he moaned as he pulled himself out before slamming back in.

Katara cried out as he spread her open once more. There was a slight pain, but she ignored it in favor of the pleasure he was giving her. She squeezed him again, causing him to throw his head back and groan loudly as he closed his eyes shut and clenched his jaw tight. She was mesmerized by the sight of the veins that throbbed on his neck with the strain, the muscles that flexed with his thrusting movements and quivered with her touch, the glistening sweat that ran down his pale skin due to his exertion that made his dark hair stick to his temples, and the pleasured yet anguished expression on his handsome face. La, she had never seen anything so magnificent in her life, and she arched her back with a moan as more hot liquid seeped out and coated around his pumping shaft.

With a growl, Zuko knelt back, grabbed her hips gently, and slowly plunged himself into her over and over again. She winced at first at the new angle, but soon moaned as she stared passionately at him. Zuko looked down to the place where they were joined and he groaned deeply at the sight. He watched as his thick shaft stretched her tight, pink hole as he pulled in and out of her, his cock glistening with her aroused juices and her virgin blood. The firebender had never seen such an erotic and incredible sight and he felt his engorged shaft pulse painfully. With another growl, Zuko quickly leaned back down over her and nuzzled the necklace he had given her before he kissed her neck, licking and sucking softly at her flesh, tasting the slightly salty flavor of her sweaty skin. Then he lifted his head to kiss her lips, devouring her sweet mouth hungrily. Both his tongue and his cock thrusting fervently and simultaneously inside Katara’s mouth and pussy was pure ecstasy.

Lifting his mouth from hers with a breathless gasp, Zuko clenched his teeth as he tried to hold back his release a bit longer as his wife continued to moan and gasp underneath him. Gazing down, Zuko’s attention was caught by the sight of Katara’s breasts jiggling and bouncing with each of his thrusts. He grasped her right breast with one hand while the other held him up over her thrashing body.

“Aahh, Zuko!” Katara cried in pleasure at having her sensitive mounds touched and then moaned when Zuko kissed her again. “Mm!”

Running his palm over her nipple, Zuko caressed it firmly, eliciting a loud groan from his wife. Then he massaged the entire breast with his large hand as he continued to gently thrust into her. He moved his mouth away from hers, and bending down, he licked the other neglected nipple. He drew the tight, pebbled peak into his mouth, sucking on it greedily, and reveled in the taste of her skin that was just as arousing as her loving touch and sweet scent.

Katara cried out as she buried her head into the pillow beneath her as all the sensations Zuko was bestowing upon her were causing that fire to blaze fiercely within her. Her hips began to lift to his harder as she ground herself against his pelvis insistently.

A growl forced itself from Zuko at the sound of her pleasured wail and at the feeling of his wife beneath him, her every interior molding around his hard length to perfection. He could wish for no better place than to be buried within her every day of his life. He swallowed her every sigh and whimper, every moan and cry, and he kissed her again, over and over again, reluctantly letting her catch her breath before diving back in to capture her lips. Again, he was ecstatic at the thought that she fit him as though the gods themselves created this woman just for him, only for him.

Mine, he growled mentally, She is all mine.

He began to thrust more insistently inside her, though not as hard as he wished for fear of hurting her. However, his increased pace caused Katara’s eyes to roll back. The sound of their flesh slapping against each other resonated around the large room. Zuko could feel his end coming, he was so close! He groaned deeply at the sound of his balls slapping against Katara’s firm ass as he continued to thrust into her wet pussy that caused loud squelching sounds. Such a sound, combined with her pleasured moans, caused his shaft to grow impossibly hard and made him delirious with lust.

“Haa, oh, Zuko…ah, Zuko!” Katara chanted his name against his mouth as moans, sighs, and mewls escaped her to signify her pleasure. “I…uuh…I love you,” she cried out as that wonderful pressure began to grow incredibly within her center.

“Ka-tara…I…ah, mm…” Zuko groaned in between pants, growls, and grunts as if his pleasure was robbing him of his ability to talk, “love…ah…love you…Gods, so good…”

His hand went to her hair, chocolate strands sticking to her sweaty forehead, as he repeated the words. It was as if having once spoken of love he could not stop, conveying to her with each caress, each breath, each kiss, each thrust how preciously dear she was to him. Katara’s words of love blended with his, her mouth caressing him, her hands touching him, her body loving him, communicating to him in return what he told her with his words and his body.

Katara cried out at a particular hard thrust of his. Her jaw dropped open on a silent moan when she felt Zuko’s thick member pulse and throb within her and she felt herself tipping toward the edge of release, but not quite there yet.

“Z-Zuko,” she managed to moan out as she stared at him with large eyes that told him she was close.
Zuko could feel his balls tightening, he knew that he could hold on no longer, and he wanted to bring Katara to that blissful released with him.

“Let go, Katara,” he growled out, “Come for me, love!”

With a few more thrusts, Zuko reached down a hand between their straining bodies and firmly rubbed his thumb on her swollen nub, causing the dam to break.

“Zukooo!” Katara screamed as she threw her head back, dug her nails in his back, and raised her hips as the coil inside her snapped. Stars burst before her eyes and flames erupted within her, sending her screaming into a world of rapture.

If he thought she was tight before, it did not compare to the pleasurable sensation of Katara coming around him. At the sound of Katara screaming his name and at the feeling of her tight, silken walls constricting almost painfully around him, Zuko felt his cock throb before an immense pleasure, the likes of which he had never known, exploded throughout every inch of his body. He ignored the reflex of pulling out to spill himself on the sheets and instead drove himself as deeply as he could go inside his wife’s welcoming body.

“Kataraaa!” he roared his own passion into the room, and the flames of the candles and fireplace flared wildly as he released into her body.

Katara gasped and convulsed at the sensation of jets of burning liquid hitting her walls. She could feel Zuko’s shaft pulsating, like a heart, pounding, thumping, throbbing as spurts of his hot semen emptied into her.

Groaning loudly, Zuko wrapped his arms around his wife, pulling her closer to his hard body.

“Katara, oh, Katara,” he chanted in her ear in rapture as his hips jerked convulsively again and again as he spilled his hot, thick seed inside her, filling and coating her clenching pussy. Oh gods, the sensation of coming inside her instead of on the sheets was indescribable—pure ecstasy. Then he drove into her one last time, gasping her name, before he slumped and shuddered atop her trembling body as his pleasure robbed him of all coherent thought.

Katara clung to his sweaty form as her body continued to give little spasms, her core continued to constrict, and her heart pounded wildly in her chest. The feeling of her husband’s heavier body on top of her did not bother her, instead the reassuring weight of him as he shuddered and panted hard against her made her sigh in happiness.

Heaving, Zuko carefully pulled his now flaccid member out of her, simultaneously making her wince and eliciting a soft mewl from her at the sensation. She flushed when she felt their combined fluids, warm and sticky, pour out from her opening and run down the line of her bottom to coat the sheets beneath her.

Zuko kept his grasp on Katara until his breathing started to slow down and the intensity of what he was feeling began to subside, but not completely vanish. Body still shaking, he knelt back and looked down between them. He saw his seed mixed with her juices and virgin blood seep out of her clenching hole. He groaned as the sight caused a primitive part of him to howl in triumph at his conquest of the woman he loved. He carefully laid back down over her to kiss her softly. He then languidly rolled himself away from her and lay down on his back to her left. He brought his wife with him, cradling her tightly against his side as he waited for the thundering beat of his heart to ebb. He heard her sigh softly as she rested her head on his chest while the rest of her body remained limp. He trailed a hand over the soft and flushed skin of her back, his mind still astounded by the explosive release his body had just experienced. Nothing he had ever experienced approached the mind-blowing ecstasy that Katara had wrenched from him.

Looking down at his wife, whose gleaming, glorious naked body lay trembling partially atop him, her eyes closed, a sated expression on her lovely face, the young lord smiled. He brought a hand up to brush a few sweaty strands of her hair away from her flushed cheeks. At his touch, Katara slowly opened her blue eyes to look up at him. Zuko leaned his head down to kiss her softly before pulling away.

“Gods, you’re amazing,” he muttered, his voice still hoarse from his cry of release, “I can’t thank Agni enough that you are my wife.”

A happy smile spread on her kissed-swollen lips.

“Mm, Zuko, my husband,” she breathed out softly as her eyes fluttered. “That was so, so…uuhh, incredible,” she groaned softly.

Zuko smirked smugly before his eyes softened when she yawned softly. He could sense that she was exhausted and at the brink of sleep. They had had an eventful day after all. He wanted to take her again, already he could feel his body stirring for another round of lovemaking, but he would allow her to sleep since she had pleased him immensely. Besides, he knew that she would be in pain soon for having to accommodate and stretch for his size for the first time. But once she was feeling better and rested, he would have her again, and again, and again.
“Get some sleep, love,” he told her gently, “I will be by your side when you wake up like I’ll be for the rest of our lives.”

Katara murmured and rubbed her face gently against his skin.

“I love you, Zuko,” she managed to whisper as sleep began to claim her.

She smiled softly when she heard him respond, “And I love you, Katara.”

With a flick of his wrist, the many candles were extinguished. It plunged them into darkness except for the light of the fireplace and the moonlight that spilled from the partially opened curtains of the balcony. Zuko moved away from her so he could grab the warm coverlet at the foot of the bed before settling back down beside her. When she frowned at the loss of his warmth and touch, he took her again into the protection of his arms before he pulled the blanket over them. He curled himself protectively around her and she sighed softly in her sleep.

A feeling of peace and contentment that he had never felt before settled over Zuko as he held his sleeping wife in his arms. It was not long before sleep claimed him as well.

It was a wonderful night as the joining of two bodies, two hearts, and two souls combined into one.

And it will not be the last.
Groaning softly as he pressed closer to something warm and soft, Zuko slowly opened his eyes. He blinked for a second to rid himself of any lingering sleep, and then looked down to his right. A soft smile spread on his lips as he gazed down upon Katara, now his wife and Fire Lady, sleeping next to him. Her head was pillowed on his upper arm that was holding her to him, her right hand resting on his chest. The blanket with which he had covered them both the night before was now pulled down around their waists, revealing their bare upper bodies.

He admired her sleeping and naked form curled into his body, gleaming with the morning rays of sunlight that spilled into the room from the slightly parted curtains of the balcony. He was surprised to realize that dawn had passed three hours or so ago and he had slept through it. But he did not mind since his exhaustion was caused by something pleasant—his Katara. Crushed rose petals were strewn around her and a few were stuck to her soft, brown skin. His eyes darkened a little as he remembered wondering a few months ago how Katara would look lying naked among roses and he thank the gods that he was able to find out for himself that she looked divine. He brushed the petals from her skin and then ran his hand slowly, caressingly, down her soft back. She moaned softly at the touch, but continued in her sweet slumber.

The sound that escaped her caused Zuko to remember their wedding night and the moans, gasps, and screams he had elicited from her as they made love for the very first time. Even more surprising were the sounds he made. He had never been vocal during sex before. He brought back to his mind the way his waterbender’s nude and soft body had felt against his heated flesh, how her darkened blue eyes had gazed intently into his, how incredible it had felt being buried inside her. He groaned as he felt his body immediately respond with arousal.

And oh gods, he had no idea how gloriously pleasurable the sensation of coming inside a woman—no, not just any woman, but Katara—was and he was sure he was already addicted to the feeling. Katara had ruined him for finding his release in any other form. Masturbating would never be as pleasurable and not even the stroking of her hands would live up to the amazing sensation of coming inside that wonderfully tight, wet pussy of hers.

Agni, the entire experience had been amazing. She has been amazing.

He could not compare the pleasure he had felt to anything. Those times with those women in the brothels and with Mai could not come close to how amazing it felt being with Katara. With them it had been having sex, a way for him to find some release for his sexual frustration and nothing more. Those encounters had always ended quickly and were forgotten just the same.

But with Katara it was something better, something more deep and meaningful. Having those previous encounters made him realized how incredible and special it was and would always be with Only with Katara had it ever felt like making love. They had shared themselves completely, not only physically, but emotionally as well. And it was the most rewarding, trilling, pleasurable, and touching experience he had ever had. Only with Katara did he feel complete.

He could not describe how content, happy, and astounded he felt right at that moment.

The feeling of Katara sleeping in his arms, after all this time of yearning for her, filled him with a sense of satisfaction as he gazed down at her. He took a deep breath and let it out slowly as her scent gently floated to his nose. The thought of having her sweet scent permeating his pillows and bed made him tighten his hold of her with a content sigh. Of course, now it was their bed and their room.

He loved how soft her brown skin felt, the way her long hair curled around them, and the way her plump lips were slightly parted in her sleep. He loved how her dark lashes fluttered softly to graze her cheeks, and how her small body exuded warmth. Feeling her soft breath caressing his skin, her bare breasts brushing against him as she breathed, and her delicate body pressed tightly against his larger frame, made his heart swell with possessiveness, protectiveness, and love for his wife.

She was all his now—his and nobody else’s. Ever.

She is completely and irrevocably mine, he crowed mentally.

He wrapped his arm more tightly around her, bringing her even closer against him, and he pressed his lips against her soft hair. He reached his other hand out to caress her cheek before he placed it above her smaller hand resting on his chest as he allowed his mind to wander while he waited for her to wake up. It was still early in the morning even if dawn had passed.

The feeling of being pressed against something hard and warm, and the sensation of her back being stroked softly, began to stir Katara from her deep sleep. It took her a moment to realize where she was—or more importantly, whom she was with. She felt her chest fill with warmth and a small smile curled her lips. She decided not to let Zuko know just yet that she was awake, for she wanted to enjoy this moment a bit longer.
She reveled in Zuko’s warmth, at the feeling of her smaller body fitting so nicely against his bigger and stronger frame. She felt so good, so protected and loved, wrapped in his arm and curled into his side, his other hand holding hers right above his beating heart. A heart that was beating just as strongly, just as passionately, as hers was and forever will be for her husband.

He was only and entirely hers. They belonged to each other and she would not let anything or anyone to take him away from her—not a lustful woman or a vengeful rebel.

Her thoughts scattered when she felt Zuko slide his hand down her back. She held her breath when he touched and lightly squeezed her bottom before trailing his hand up her back once again, caressing her skin with his fingers. She began to remember what Zuko did to her the previous night and she blushed lightly. His first penetration had been painful, but once her body had adjusted to his massive girth, she had experience a pleasure the likes of which she had never known.

Her mind replayed the passionate events of the previous night—their wedding night. The way his scorching tongue seemed to brand her skin as he kissed and suckled her breasts, the way his fingers had touched her so intimately, how incredible it felt as he thrust his large shaft in and out of her, and the way his eyes had gazed at her with so much passion, heat, and love.

She felt herself flush even more deeply and her body warmed as she became aroused at the memory.

Zuko paused in his caresses when he felt Katara’s body warm up a little and he glanced down to see that a soft, red blush was staining her cheeks and she was lightly biting her lip. He smiled when he realized she was awake. Why was she pretending to be sleeping?

“Good morning, wife,” he greeted her warmly as he gazed down at her with a small smirk.

Knowing there was no point in pretending she was still asleep, Katara opened her eyes and smiled at him, pleased by his words.

“Good morning, husband,” she replied softly.

Her blue eyes brightened in happiness at the sight of him lying next to her, his pale upper body exposed and majestic.

Zuko’s smile widened a bit. After all the obstacles they had gone through, they were finally married.
And now there was nothing that could separate them.

“How do you feel, love?” he asked her gently as he brushed a few of the rose petals from her mussed hair.

Katara took a moment before she answered him. She felt her inner muscles ache a bit when she moved and she blushed slightly.

“A bit sore,” she answered truthfully before she added with a loving smile when he frowned, “but I feel wonderful more than anything.”

Zuko smiled at her words for he felt the same way. He leaned toward her and they kissed gently—not how they had devoured each other’s mouths last night. When they pulled away, Katara sighed softly as she gazed into his gleaming, golden eyes.

“You made me feel like a true woman,” she remarked with a blush.

“And you made me feel such incredible things I’ve never thought possible,” was his husky reply, “I’ve never experienced anything as amazing as what I did with you.”

Katara smiled happily before her smile faded a bit and she averted her eyes. Zuko frowned at the sudden change in her mood and he reached out a hand to cup her cheek so she could look at him again.

“What’s wrong?” he asked her in concern. Did he perhaps hurt her too much?

“I…I was just curious to know…” she began before she trailed off and again avoided his eyes.

“Curious to know what?” he prompted her as he caressed her cheek with his thumb.

“Never mind,” she responded instead, “It’s nothing.”

“What is it, Katara?” he encouraged her. “I’m your husband. You can tell me anything.”
Encouraged by his words, she glanced at him again.

“Was I…?” she began before she paused.

She did not know why she wanted to ask him what was on her mind, especially when they were having such a sweet moment, but she needed to know his honest answer. She bit her lip, debating with herself for a moment, before she let out a deep breath as she hesitantly continued.

“Was I as good as any of the other women…you’ve been with before? Was I as good as…Mai?” she asked quietly.

Zuko’s hand stopped as he stared incredulously down into her hesitant and insecure eyes. Was she serious?

“How can you ask that?” he asked her in disbelief, his tone almost harsh.

At her confused frown, he continued more softly, more reassuringly.

“You can’t compare yourself to them, Katara,” he told her firmly, “You were amazing, the best. Even being inexperienced, you were truly astonishing, fantastic, and you brought me a pleasure I’ve never known.”

He paused briefly before he asked, “And do you want to know something else?”

“What?” she asked almost inaudibly, wanting to hear what he had to say next with an intense anticipation.

“With them I’ve never…let myself go completely,” he confessed quietly, choosing his words carefully.

It took a moment for Katara to understand what he meant, but once she understood her eyes widened.
“You mean I’m the only one you…uh…” she trailed off and blushed deeply.

“Yes, you’re the only one I’ve released my seed into,” he continued for her in a husky tone.

“Why?” she asked before she could stop herself.

This was such an awkward conversion, but it made her glad to know that Zuko had only shared himself in such a way with her.

“Because it was something too intimate, something I did not want to experience with a complete stranger…not even Mai,” he responded slowly as if he were trying to find the right words to explain himself before he smiled as he held her gaze.

“And I’m glad I didn’t because experiencing it with you was the best feeling I’ve ever experienced,” he continued before his voice turned passionate and husky as he brought her closer to him, “I wanted to share such intimacy with you, to find my release within your wet, tight core. I craved it, dreamed of it. And now that I know how amazing it feels, I will want to experience it many, many times more.”

Katara felt her cheeks burn at his almost crude words even as her heart swelled with giddiness and her belly clenched in desire. He had been honest about what he had felt and she wanted him to know her own thoughts and feelings over the matter.

“I…also loved the sensation of you…spilling your seed inside me,” she confessed breathlessly and she watched as Zuko swallowed thickly and his eyes darkened at her words. “It was hot and thick and it made me feel even fuller, even with your hard…uh, manhood inside me, filling me up completely.”

“Gods, Katara,” Zuko groaned deeply as he stared intensely into her wide eyes, “You’re so damn incredible. I will never get enough of you.”

He swooped down to kiss her passionately yet still gently. The kissed each other for a moment before they pulled apart to gather some air.
“You don’t know how happy it makes me to know that,” she told him, referring to everything he had confessed to her.

“I told you that you will be my first for many things,” he reminded her with a small smirk.

Katara grinned at him and her eyes glinted with curiosity and mischief as she ran her fingers lightly across his bare, muscular chest.

“I can’t wait to know what those things are,” she said excitedly before she frowned when the soreness between her legs made itself known again right at that moment.

As if understanding, Zuko’s smirk turned into a soft smile.

“Soon,” he said gently, yet huskily.

He leaned down to kiss her and they groaned lowly before he pulled away to stare at her.

“I can only imagine how much more incredible you’ll make me feel once you gain some experience,” he told her with a husky growl as he gave her a small smirk.

Katara gazed deeply into his eyes and she smiled when she saw that he was being completely honest. She felt her heart expand with happiness and relief. He began to caress her cheek again and she leaned toward his hand as they continued to hold each other’s gaze.

“Being with you was amazing,” Zuko continued as his voice turned into a softer tone, “Because, unlike with those other women, I love you. I made love to you, Katara. Do you understand?”

“Yes,” Katara replied with a large happy smile before she lifted herself up a little to kiss him passionately.

Zuko groaned against her mouth and he wrapped his arms tightly around her, their bare upper bodies pressed flush against each other. Katara moaned softly and the sound again made the blood in Zuko’s veins heat up. He could feel his semi-erect cock stirring with his arousal and he growled lowly at the thought of making love to Katara again. But then his uncle’s words about waiting until she felt better and was ready again to engage in intimacy came to his mind.

With a sigh, Zuko reluctantly pulled away from her soft lips and he gazed into her slightly darkening blue eyes. Agni, he wanted her again. He wanted to ask her if he could take her again, but he was concerned that she would agree even if she were in pain. No, he will wait until she was feeling better.

“I’ll get your bath ready,” he began and cleared his throat at the huskiness in his voice, “I’m going to get ready in another room and then I’ll ask the servants to bring our breakfast.”

He did not know if he would be able to resist making love to her if they were to bathe together. Better not to tempt the fates.

Katara suppressed a confused frown since she had thought he was going to make love to her again, but she was a bit glad that he had not for she was feeling very sore.

“Thank you,” she said with a gleeful smile at the mention of a warm bath and food.

Zuko smiled at her, kissed her softly on the lips, before moving away from her and standing up from the bed. He wanted to stay in bed with Katara for a moment longer, but he knew that they couldn’t remain in bed all day while their family waited for them to show up.

“Don’t take long with your bath,” he told her with a smirk as he turned toward her.

Katara blushed slightly as he regally stared down at her, looking magnificent and imperious even without a piece of royal garb to cover his nudity. Though he had nothing to be ashamed of, for his body was perfect and she enjoyed looking at it.

“Okay,” Katara finally remembered to answer when he raised a dark eyebrow at her.

With a satisfied nod, Zuko turned away. He paused briefly, however, when he noticed his reflection on the full-length mirror standing in a corner. It was not his body that caught his attention, but what he saw behind it. He saw that Katara was surreptitiously glancing at his ass with a blush tinting her cheeks. He felt male pride swell within him at the knowledge that his wife was pleased by what she saw.
Zuko had never thought much about his good looks or about his body. The visible scar on his face had damage his confidence about his physical image a bit, and although many women praised him for his appealing looks, he sometimes found himself not believing them. But the way Katara always looked at him made him feel as if he were the handsomest male in the world and he himself began to believe that he was indeed an attractive man despite his disfigurement.

With a small smirk, the young lord stretched his muscles, allowing his body to lengthen and his muscles to flex and define. He heard her breath hitch and watched her eyes widened, and he smiled. He was glad she found him physically attractive and he was glad to know his body pleased her.

“Do you like what you see, Katara?” he asked her with a smirk.

Katara jumped, startled. How did he know? She looked beyond his body and finally noticed the mirror and that he was looking at her with a teasing smirk. She wanted to hide in embarrassment, but instead she raised her chin with a smirk of her own.

“Very much,” she replied impishly.

The smirk on Zuko’s lips widened and his eyes darkened a bit.

“And I very much like what I’m seeing, too,” he responded huskily.

Katara frowned in confusion before she noticed where his gaze was directed at. She looked down and saw that her breasts were completely exposed, and with a gasp, she instinctively covered herself with her arms before she scowled at him when he chuckled amusedly.

Still chuckling, Zuko walked toward the bathing chamber.

Katara watched him go with a pleased smile. He was so handsome, his body was so perfect, and he was all hers. She fell back on the bed as her smile widened. She rolled to her side so she was now lying on Zuko’s pillow and buried her face in its softness so she could curb the sudden urge to giggle giddily. The spicy sandalwood scent of her husband reached her senses and she inhaled it deeply before sighing softly as it brought a feeling of warmth and happiness to her entire body. She would never tire of waking up to Zuko’s masculine scent.
Her thoughts once again returned to the intimate event of the previous night. She was even more aware of her body now. Her breasts felt heavy and her nipples ached pleasantly due to Zuko’s caressing mouth, by his lips suckling firmly on the peaks and his tongue licking them insistently. Her breasts were not the only place that felt the remembrance of Zuko’s touch, she mused dazedly as she again remembered the amazing feeling of his cock filling her deeply. Her womb contracted and her core ached with both arousal and soreness.

In the large bathing room, Zuko quickly filled the bathtub with water before returning to the room to find his wife scooting toward the edge of the bed, trailing the blanket after her.

Katara did not want to leave their bed so soon, she wanted them to cuddle some more, but she knew they could not do that…at least, not right now. As she stood up from the bed, she suppressed a hiss of pain when her inner muscles protested at her movements. Muscles she had never known existed ached painfully, but she smiled at Zuko when she saw him return so as not to worry him.

However, Zuko had noticed her small wince and he frowned guiltily.

“I’m sorry,” he apologized softly as he approached her.

“What’s there to feel sorry for? It’s normal,” she replied with a small shrug, “So stop feeling guilty, okay?”

Zuko was silent for a short moment before he smiled at her.

“Okay,” he responded.

Katara smiled before she wrapped the sheet around her body. She was still shy about walking around nude. Zuko smiled affectionately at her bashfulness.

_She’ll get used to being naked around me soon_, he thought with a smirk.

His thoughts deviated when something dark on the white sheet that covered the bed caught his attention.
Katara watched curiously as Zuko frowned slightly before his lips curled into a pleased and smug smirk as he stared at the bed. Following his gaze, Katara’s cheeks flooded with color as she saw the dark red blood stains.

The evidence of her virginity.

Katara glanced up to stare wide-eyed at Zuko.

“You’re not going to show our families, right?” she blurted out in mortification before she could stop herself.

“Well…” Katara hesitated before she explained, “It’s tradition in the tribe, especially among the most conservative members, for the newlyweds’ families to inspect the bed after the wedding night in order to check if the bride had been pure before her marriage.”

Zuko stared at her incredulously. What an embarrassing tradition. But he decided not to let his thoughts known.

“Does everybody follow such a tradition?” he asked.

“Not anymore,” the waterbender replied. “If the husband doesn’t confront his in-laws that his bride had not been a virgin, then everybody assumes that she had been untouched before her wedding night,” she said this almost angrily.

“I see,” Zuko remarked before he continued with a distasteful frown, “No, I won’t show our family.”

Katara let out a relieved breath. It would have been so embarrassing to have them see the evidence of their activities from their wedding night. She raised an eyebrow when she noticed that Zuko was smirking again.

“But the servants will see when they clean the room,” he commented smugly. “And soon news that the Fire Lord had deflowered his wife and Fire Lady will spread throughout the country by tonight.”
Katara gaped at him in horror.

Zuko chuckled at her mortified expression before he pulled her tightly to him to kiss her soundly on her mouth. When he pulled away, he stared intensely into her dazed eyes.

“You’re mine and only mine, and everybody will know it,” he growled lowly as he kissed her again.

When they pulled away, Katara smirked up at him.

“And you’re only mine too,” she retorted firmly as she pulled him down so she could kiss him fiercely.

Zuko smiled against her lips before he pulled away. Lifting her into his arms, Zuko carried her to the grand bathroom. Katara wrapped her arms around his neck and sighed contentedly as she rested her head on his shoulder. Once inside the bathing room, Zuko gently placed Katara on her feet near the black marble bathtub. Dipping his hand into the water, Zuko raised his body temperature. Soon the water was warm and steam was rising toward the ceiling.

Satisfied with the water temperature, Zuko straightened and again took Katara into his arms and kissed her softly.

“I’ll see you soon,” he told her before he moved away from her and headed out of the bathroom, closing the door softly behind him.

Katara looked after him dazedly before she shook herself and returned her attention to the great bathing chamber. Why was she not surprised to see it was as magnificent as everything else Zuko possessed? Gold and black designs covered the top edges of the dark red walls and the black marble floor had a glossy shine to it. A small cabinet rested against one wall with neatly folded towels. Then she turned toward the large marble tub that rested against the wall opposite the door, already filled with the inviting, steaming water. A shelf was carved on the wall next to it with a great assortment of bath oils and soaps.

Dropping the blanket with a delighted smile, the waterbender carefully stepped into the tub before gratefully sinking down into the heated water with a content groan. Leaning against the edge, she sighed blissfully as the warm water immediately began to soothe her aches. She stayed immobile for a few minutes, just relaxing, before she started the act of bathing herself.
She examined the soaps on the shelf and smiled when she saw that next to the almost scentless soaps for Zuko there were perfumed ones for herself. She grabbed a blue glass bottle, uncorked the top, and inhaled curiously. She sighed in contentment at the delicate, flowery scent. She poured some of the liquid into her palm and meticulously began to wash her hair. Then she grabbed a new sponge, rubbed the bar of soap on it until there was a rich, soapy lather, before she washed her body. As she brought the foamy sponge to wash between her legs, she bit her lip and flushed as she remembered the feeling of Zuko’s hot seed spilling into her before it leaked out of her, warm and sticky, when he pulled out. Swallowing, she shook her head as she resumed in her task. As she pressed more firmly, she winced slightly at the dull ache she felt in her core. She ignored it as she again began to remember the previous night.

It had been painful at first, and she had even wondered why women wanted to have sex, before the most incredible pleasure she had ever experienced crashed into her. She was glad that she had not caved in to Aang’s insistences, and even Jet’s proposal that night in Ba Sing Se. Having her first time be with Zuko, giving her virginity to him, had been wonderful and special. Making love to him was a mind-blowing experience. Would it always be that way? She hoped so because she wanted to experience it again.

She shifted in order to wash her legs and again she winced at the soreness in her center.

Okay, maybe not anytime soon, she mused with a wry smile.

She frowned pensively. Maybe her healing abilities could help relieve the pain. Nodding in satisfaction, Katara wrapped her hand in glowing, healing water and brought it to her sex. After a few unsuccessful minutes, Katara decided to stop and frowned in confusion. The pain lessened only a little, but it was still there. Was it perhaps because muscle soreness was natural and not an injury or illness? What now?

She bit her lip. What if Zuko wanted her again soon? Could she deny him? Maybe the pain would go away soon and she would not have to worry.

Finished with her bath, Katara rose from the now tepid water and stepped out of the tub. She dried her hair with waterbending, but decided to use the soft towel to pat her skin dry. Wrapping another towel around her, Katara walked slowly toward the door and opened it.

She paused as she stepped into the room when she spotted Jiao opening the curtains to fully let the sunlight in. Jiao turned around and smiled warmly at the waterbender when she saw her.
“Good morning, my lady,” the maidservant greeted softly as she walked away from the closed balcony. “I brought you a fresh set of clothes. Fire Lord Zuko wants a bigger wardrobe to replace this one before your clothes are brought in.”

“Oh,” Katara muttered as she glanced at her clothes resting at the foot of the bed.

Jiao walked toward them and motioned for the frozen Fire Lady to come closer. Katara blushed as she neared the bed, but she was grateful when Jiao studiously ignored looking directly at the center of the bed as she handed Katara her new undergarments first.

“Thank you,” Katara said with a smile as she grabbed them.

Jiao smiled and turned around to allow her lady privacy before turning back in order to help Katara place the rest of her clothes on. Now that she had to wear formal attire, Katara found out that she needed help getting dressed.

“Are you all right, my lady?” Jiao asked softly as she tied the sash around the waterbender’s waist.

Katara understood what she was asking and she smiled.

“Yes,” she responded immediately, “You were right, Jiao. Zuko was so careful and gentle and understanding…” she trailed of wistfully and then sighed happily. “Oh, Jiao! It was amazing!”

She smiled even as her cheeks turned red. Jiao returned the smile happily.

“I’m glad, my lady,” she said sincerely.

They smiled at each other as the older woman helped the waterbender finish getting ready. They said nothing else as Jiao combed and styled Katara’s hair before pinning the Fire Lady fire crown on the bun she had created. As Jiao stepped away, Katara looked at herself in the mirror and smiled at the image she made.

“Thanks, Jiao,” she said.
Jiao bowed her head and smiled before she reached into the pocket of her apron. She pulled out a small bag and handed it to Katara.

“I thought you might want this,” she said, “It’s the gift Yin-Min gave to you last night.”

“Oh!” Katara exclaimed as she grabbed the bag. “I forgot about it.”

“I brought a cup of juice in case you wanted to take the blend,” Jiao said as she walked toward the dresser where she had placed the cup on the surface. Grabbing it, she walked back to her lady and handed it to her.

Katara opened the bag and sprinkled some of the crushed herbs into the juice before taking the cup. She drank the juice quickly and smiled at the sweet aftertaste as she gave the cup back to Jiao. Would the blend really work? Would she soon become with child? What would Zuko say?

“Thanks, Jiao. You’ve been of great help,” Katara told her.

“You’re welcome, Fire Lady Katara,” Jiao replied as she sincerely added, “I’m honored to serve such a wonderful woman as you. I’m glad Fire Lord Zuko chose you as his wife.”

Katara blushed, pleased—though she still had to get used to being referred to as Fire Lady.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Staring outside the window in the antechamber, Zuko stood perfectly straight with his hands clasped behind his back. His face was expressionless as two of his servants quietly set out the breakfast meal on the low table for the newlyweds. He had bathed in the room he had used the previous day and had to resort to pleasuring himself to release the arousal that had overtaken his body when he woke up next to a wonderfully naked Katara. Once finished and changed, Zuko had rushed back to see her.

Although his outer appearance did not show it, Zuko’s mind was preoccupied with images that made his heart race in his chest and his groin twitch. He imagined Katara bathing, her olive skin glistening with drops of water, and her long, wet hair curling around her flushed cheeks.

He had to force himself to remain where he was and not barge into the bathroom where his... waterbender was bathing as he once again felt the stirrings of his arousal. Now that he knew what it felt to make love to Katara, he wanted her again and would want her again and again after that.

He closed his eyes as he ordered himself to calm down. He knew that he could not act upon his carnal desires at the moment since Katara was still in pain from receiving him for the first time. He did not want to cause her more discomfort. He had to be patient and wait until she was ready.

But he wanted her again, damn it!

The young Fire Lord was brought out of his thoughts when one of the doors to the bedchamber opened and he heard quiet feminine voices. Snapping his eyes open, Zuko turned around expectantly and he watched as Katara and Jiao walked out of the room. He took in the dark red dress of his wife and the fire crown that rested on her head. His eyes warmed at the lovely sight of her dressed in his colors. As if sensing his intense gaze, Katara paused in whatever she was saying to Jiao and turned to him. When a soft blush blossomed on her cheeks and a pleased smile curled her lips as their eyes met, Zuko thought it was going to take all his self-control to resist her.

Mentally shaking his head, Zuko moved away from the window and approached his wife in a few long strides. He took her hand and smiled down at her.

“Come, let’s eat our breakfast, my lady,” he told her coolly as he gestured to the low table where the servants had just finished setting up.

“As you wish, my lord,” she replied just as serenely.

Katara smiled since she could see by the gleam in his eyes that he was pleased by her appearance and her words even if he had not said anything. As long as there were strangers around them, he would act taciturn and aloof, and she understood.

Without another word, he led her to the table and helped her sit down on the elaborate cushion before he sat beside her. As soon as they began to eat, Jiao and two other maidservants entered the royal bedchamber to clean it. The royal couple ate in comfortable silence for a few minutes, while stealing glances at each other with teasing smirks and knowing smiles.

The door to the bedchamber was opened once again and Jiao and the other servants came out with baskets of dirty laundry. They were blushing and smiling as they covertly glanced at the young pair of newlyweds. Katara blushed deeply and looked down to stare intently at her plate, while Zuko unperturbedly continued eating the delicious meal.

Once all the servants left, Katara looked up and let out a relieved breath. How embarrassing. She glanced at Zuko and scowled when she saw him smirking smugly.

“So I was right,” she began with a smug tone in order to distract his thoughts.

“About what?” he asked as he took a sip of his tea.

“Jiao and Kuo are together!” she exclaimed with a smile.

Zuko shrugged.

“Doesn’t surprise me,” he replied casually.

“They won’t get into trouble for being in a relationship, will they?” she asked in concern. She would feel guilty if they got in trouble because she just blurted out their secret.

“As long as they both continue to do their duties well, I don’t see a problem,” he reassured her.

Katara relaxed and smiled happily as she ate some fruit.

“So what are we going to do now?” she asked curiously. “Do I have to start on my duties as Fire Lady today?”

“No,” he responded as he placed down his chopsticks, “We have a week to ourselves before we have to return to our duties.” A smile curled his lips as he continued, “I want to take you to the royal beach house on Ember Island for the rest of our honeymoon.”

“That sounds like fun,” Katara agreed in excitement, a smile brightening her face, “I can’t wait.”
“Rather eager, I see,” Zuko teased suggestively.

Instead of blushing in embarrassment as he had expected her to do, the young lord watched as a mischievous smile spread on his wife’s lips and she batted her eyelashes coquettishly at him.

“Of course. Aren’t you?” she asked innocently even as her eyes gleamed warmly.

“Oh, you have no idea,” he replied with a groan as he looked at her with heated eyes.

Katara threw him a coy smile before she continued eating. She loved it when Zuko allowed himself to flirt with her.

The rest of their meal was spent in teasing banter and suggestive glances. Once they were finished, Zuko looked at Katara for a moment before he let out an unenthusiastic sigh.

“We have to meet with our family now,” he muttered as he took a final sip of his tea. He wanted Katara all to himself and did not want to share her—even with family—but he knew they would have to see them eventually.

Katara smiled happily that he had said ‘our family’ and not ‘our families’. She then hid her grin as she wiped her mouth with her napkin at his reluctant expression.

Zuko stood up first and then helped her to her feet before leading her toward the doors, out of the royal chambers, and into the golden corridors. Shen and Kuo were already posted outside and they greeted the royal couple with bows before following behind them toward the sitting room where everybody else was gathered.

Katara suppressed a grimace as her intimate parts ached and protested at her movements, and although she wanted to ignore the pain, it caused her to walk stiffly.

Noticing her strange manner of walking, Zuko wondered what was wrong before he understood. He thought of carrying her in his arms so she would not feel pain, but he knew she would refuse to be treated as if she were weak and fragile. So instead, he adjusted his long strides to smaller steps to match her speed and he tightened his hold of her arm that was tucked under his in order to support her. His eyes gleamed in pleasure when she looked up to give him a grateful smile.
Soon they were entering the sitting room where everybody was chattering loudly as they drank tea and waited for the newlyweds. As soon as they were spotted, all the women smiled knowingly and all the men grinned reluctantly, except for Hakoda and Sokka who were frowning with arms crossed over their chests. After a greeting, Zuko led Katara toward one of the plush couches and then sat next to her. Katara was smiling, and although Zuko was not, they could all see his pleasure and contentment.

“You are late,” Kanna was the first to speak, her tone teasing as were her light blue eyes, “Were you two unable to sleep?”

“Maybe you should have slept in this morning,” Ursa said innocently, although she was smiling.

“You guys look tired,” Suki spoke up next with a grin, “Did you have a rough night?”

“Here, have some tea,” Iroh said with an amused smile as he poured them two cups of the sweet-smelling, hot liquid. “It will replenish your energy after going through such…vigorous activities.”

Katara blushed deeply, even Zuko’s right cheek flushed lightly, when they realized they were being teased about their wedding night. Before Zuko could coldly demand them to stop, Hakoda cleared his throat loudly.

“That’s enough,” he said gruffly, his frown deepening as he glanced briefly at his daughter and her husband. “A father does not wish to hear such things about his daughter.”

Everybody else laughed quietly at his disgruntled expression while Sokka nodded in agreement with his father, but they decided to stop with the teasing and talk about other subjects—much to the relief of Katara and Zuko. Iroh and Pakku moved toward the Pai Sho game board and Sokka sat down on the floor to play with his daughters. The Fire Lord and the Southern Water Tribe Chieftain began to talk about the treaty between their countries that had been signed the day before and expressed their hopes about the future relationship between the two nations.

Katara had been listening intently to what her husband and her father were saying, but her attention was diverted when the women surrounded her and carefully dragged her toward the cushions they had been sitting on. Zuko glanced at her before returning his attention to his father-in-law. Katara scowled. She was a bit annoyed for she had wanted to hear more about the treaty.
I’ll just ask Zuko later, she thought with a firm nod before she reluctantly looked at the women surrounding her. She had a feeling she knew what they wanted to talk to her about.

“Are you all right?” Kanna asked with concern when she saw her granddaughter wince slightly as she tried to find a comfortable spot on the cushion. “Does it hurt a lot?”

“No, I’m fine. I’m just a bit sore,” Katara responded quickly.

“Your husband wasn’t too rough with you, was he?” the old woman asked with narrowed eyes.

“Of course not!” Katara exclaimed, immediately wanting to defend Zuko against any accusations they might have. Then with a dark blush staining her cheeks, she added softly, “He was gentle and patient…It was wonderful.” She sighed blissfully.

The women relaxed before they began to tease her again. Katara was both mortified and amused. Now that she had experienced what goes on in a marriage bed, the older women had no qualms in talking about and joking about sex with her. Katara smiled with pleasure since it seemed that now she was truly being treated like a woman and not a girl that needed to be kept safe and ignorant.

When it seemed both her grandmother and new mother-in-law were distracted by something else, Katara leaned closer to Suki with a small grin. Suki raised an eyebrow in curiosity.

“How about what you asked me back in the Southern Water Tribe…” Katara began in a teasing whisper, “Now I can give you a reply.”

The older woman frowned as she tried to remember what that question was.

“Oh yeah?” she asked, “And what is the answer?”

Katara glanced quickly at her occupied husband before she returned her attention to Suki with a smirk curling her lips.

“I was pleased to find out last night that…Zuko is very, very big,” she confessed smugly.
The auburn-haired warrior’s mouth fell open and she blushed at her sister-in-law’s words before she giggled.

“I’m sure you’re the envy of many women,” Suki stated.

“You got that right,” Katara replied with a soft laugh.

“And I will say the same thing about Sokka and me,” Suki added with another laugh.

They both grinned at their husbands when the men glanced in their direction at the sound of their laughter. Sokka grinned back at his wife, even though he had no clue what had caused her amusement, while Zuko aimed a raised dark eyebrow at his waterbender before their attention was once again called for.

Ursa and Kanna asked what had caused them to laugh, but the younger women quickly said it was nothing and changed the subject. Their fun was cut short a few hours later when the Fire Lord cleared his throat to gain everybody’s attention.

“I plan on taking Katara to Ember Island for the rest of our honeymoon,” Zuko informed them coolly.

His announcement brought another round of teasing and suggestive remarks, but the happy mood soon changed when Hakoda spoke next.

“We will be returning to the Southern Water Tribe after both of you leave,” he said with a bit of sadness as he turned to look at his daughter.

Katara felt herself get teary-eyed at the news, but she ordered herself to calm down. She did not want to make it harder on her family with her tears.

“I’m going to miss you all,” she said with a sad smile.
“We’ll visit the Southern Water Tribe whenever we have a chance,” Zuko promised as he turned to his wife with a soft look in his eyes. Again he felt warmth gather in his chest when she gave him a grateful smile.

“Take care of my precious granddaughter,” Kanna spoke up as she placed a hand above Katara’s.

“I will,” the young lord vowed with a firm nod.

“Please write to me whenever you can,” Kanna told Katara.

“To me, too,” Suki spoke up.

“I promise I will,” the waterbender assured them as she hugged them both.

“Remember what I said about making Katara happy,” Sokka threatened teasingly to Zuko as he again stroked his dark space sword.

“I won’t forget,” Zuko responded dryly.

Sokka chuckled and the mood soon lifted into a happier one. Not understanding what was going on, but reveling in the laughter, Jing and Ting babbled and giggled happily as they demanded their father’s attention.

Just as dinner approached, Zuko stood up and excused Katara and himself for the evening. They both flushed when they were teased again as they left the room.

“Sorry about that,” Katara said with a sheepish smile as she squeezed Zuko’s arm, “They can be too much to handle sometimes.” She meant her family’s unabashed teasing.

“I don’t mind,” Zuko responded with a small smile, “It means that they really have accepted me into your family.”

“Just like your mother and uncle accepted me,” she replied happily.
“And they were doing much of the teasing, too,” Zuko remarked with a dry chuckle.

Katara giggled before she stopped when she finally noticed that they were heading toward their rooms. She bit her lip in anxiety. Was Zuko going to make love to her again? She was still sore. Maybe she could distract him for a while before they went to their room.

“Let’s go to the Royal Palace Garden!” she exclaimed a bit too loudly, causing Zuko to jump slightly at the sudden outburst. “I miss the turtle-ducks!”

After composing himself, Zuko’s eyes widened before he frowned. He could not allow Katara to see the garden yet. Her present was still not ready. It had been difficult keeping her away from it for the past few weeks, but luckily she had been distracted with the preparations for the wedding. He needed to come up with a good excuse.

“We’ll go another day. It’s getting late and dinner is being brought to our rooms,” he told her in a cool tone. Not the best excuse, but it would have to do.

“Okay,” Katara replied reluctantly as she walked beside Zuko in the same slow pace from before.

They finally arrived at the royal chambers and entered the anteroom where the servants were already setting up their dinner on the low table. It was a Fire Nation tradition for newlyweds to share meals alone during their entire honeymoon before they could join the rest of their family and friends. It was meant for the couple, who were most of the time strangers, to have alone time to get to know one another without any interference.

Once all the servants, except for Jiao, left, the Fire Lord and his wife ate in silence, mainly because both were preoccupied with their own thoughts about what to do for the rest of the night. As soon as they finished, Jiao began to clean up before she asked another servant to help her take everything back to the kitchen. Zuko again helped Katara stand up, and she nervously followed him toward their room.

Zuko held opened one of the doors only closing it after Katara went in. The waterbender looked around the room and saw that it was meticulously clean once again, candles no longer lining up every surface or rose petals scattered on the bed. She noticed that on the bed their sleeping attire had been laid out for them. She also noticed a great pile of wrapped boxes and objects in one corner of their room. Those were a few of their wedding presents from their family and the most important dignitaries from the other nations. Zuko had ordered the rest of their presents—which were too numerous to fit in their bedchamber—to be placed in another room.

The waterbender took a deep breath. Maybe it wouldn’t hurt that bad, maybe she would feel pleasure despite the discomfort? Why didn’t the aching go away? Why did women have to go through such pain and soreness when they lost their virginity?

So unfair, she thought with a scowl.

She really wanted to make love to Zuko again and enjoy it.

Still mentally debating the issue, Katara helped Zuko take off his fire crown before she walked to the box to place it and her own crown inside it. Then she turned around to face her silent husband, who was puzzled at her behavior.

As he started to remove his regal robes, Zuko noticed Katara stiffen slightly before she tried to hide it as she began to slowly remove her own clothes.

“What’s wrong?” he finally asked her.

Katara opened her mouth to say there was nothing wrong before she remembered that he had told her she could tell him anything. She fidgeted with the sash around her waist before she looked up at him.

“Are you going to…take me again?” she asked as she blushed. “I mean I want you to…but I’m still a little sore…”

Zuko could see that, although she was nervous, she was determined. He frowned before his features softened. He walked up to her and cupped her cheek, caressing her soft skin with his thumb.

“I very much want to make love you again, Katara, but I understand that you must still be in pain. I’ll wait until you’re ready.”

“Thanks, Zuko,” she said sincerely as she smiled at him and nuzzled his hand.
She gasped softly when he pulled her tightly against him and kissed her deeply. When he pulled away she gazed at him dazedly and wonderingly. His golden eyes now seemed a deep amber color.

“But once you’re ready, you better be prepared,” he told her huskily as his arms tightened around her, “because I plan on having you again and again.”

“I’m eagerly waiting for it,” she replied with a coy smile.

She pulled his head down and kissed him before she pulled back to gaze lustfully into his eyes.

“Maybe we can just touch each other like we did before we married,” she said huskily.

“Yes, please,” Zuko groaned.

Katara giggled quietly at his eagerness before she moaned softly when Zuko crushed her to him and kissed her passionately before they pulled away to get ready for bed. Once they had washed separately in the bathroom, Zuko helped her into her nightgown. Even though she could see the lust in his eyes as her flesh was bared to him before being covered up, he touched her in a gentle manner and without any sexual intent. It almost made her give in to him and damn her discomfort.

They climbed into the bed and wrapped their arms around each other and kissed. Soon they were pulling at each other’s sleeping clothes and were touching each other erotically until they were both lying sated on the bed. Katara had only been able to handle gentle touches before the discomfort became too much, but she enjoyed herself nonetheless.

They spent their time touching each other, reading out loud to each other from the books Zuko had asked Jiao to bring to them, and looking over their presents. They smiled at the sentimental ones given to them by their family and close friends and laughed at the more outrageous ones from the nobility.

They did not seem to notice as the vivid sun finally dipped below the horizon and the moon appeared bright in the dark sky. The night ticked away, minute by minute, hour by hour, as Katara lay in Zuko’s warm and protective arms. They lay in bed, basking in their time together, their voices softly hushed as they spoke of many things from their past, their present, and their hopes, dreams and yearnings for their future together.
Zuko rested on his back with Katara pressed against his side with one of her slender legs tucked between his muscled ones. He would occasionally bend his head down to kiss her softly or teasingly nibble on her earlobe or neck. Katara would brush her lips against his smooth chest or just as teasingly nip his flesh as their eyes shone with the deep feelings they held for the other.

It was the beginning of a marriage. The building of a sturdy foundation that could be enhanced by the pleasures and happiness life could bring, but that would also stand firm against any trial and tribulation that life would equally throw their way.

It was a gentle blending of two lives, two souls, into one.

Standing at the bow of the magnificent flagship, Katara watched excitedly as Ember Island became more visible as they neared, the setting sun casting a warm glow over the small island with its white sandy beaches and tall palm trees. It was just as beautiful as the last time she had seen it and this time she would be exploring the island as a newly married woman.

Zuko stood calmly beside his thrilled wife and he smiled affectionately at her when she smiled endearingly at him. He admired the way the sun gleamed off her olive skin and how the wind gently ruffled her brown hair around her. His water nymph still continued to charm him.

The pleasing warmth radiating from her husband’s body reminded Katara of how warm she had felt when she again woke up in his arms that morning before they sailed toward Ember Island. She smiled sadly as she thought of bidding her family goodbye. She would miss them, but she comforted herself with the thought that she would see them again.

She then remembered how caring her firebender had been to her the previous night and she was grateful that he had been concerned for her even though his desire had been obvious. But now that she was feeling better, there was no longer any aching or discomfort, if Zuko wanted to make love to her again, then she would not object and would even encourage him. But she was embarrassed to tell Zuko she was ready to be intimate with him again.

Oh, La, she sighed and berated her own bashfulness.

Unknown to her, Zuko kept wondering if Katara was ready to allow him to take her again. He did not want to be a lustful and insensitive jerk and pounce on her when she was still hurting. It had been almost two days since he had made love to her, but his body craved her again, hot and writhing against him. But unless she told him that she was feeling better, he would not pressure her by bringing up the subject.
A few minutes later, they were disembarking the ship and then heading toward the royal beach house with Jiao, Kuo, and Shen following behind. The servants that maintained the house during the royal members’ absence had already prepared for the Fire Lord’s arrival with his bride and they were now scurrying about to settle them in comfortably.

After introducing the servants to his wife and their new Fire Lady, Zuko led Katara to what was now their room. Anticipation curled in his stomach as they entered the grand chamber before he squashed it down.

Katara took in her surroundings with curious and wondrous eyes. The room was not as large as the royal bedchamber in the palace, but it was impressive nonetheless. She admired the tasteful decorations, the low table in the middle of the room, the plush cushions piled on one side, and the large couch across from them. Then her eyes landed on the bed that rested against the wall. It faced the large opened window where the thin curtains were swaying gently by the breeze that blew in from the sea. She crossed the room and stood at the window, admiring the fantastic view of the beach and of the setting sun over the blue ocean. Another salty breeze swept in and she took in a deep breath before she turned to smile at Zuko, who had been admiring her instead.

“This room is wonderful,” she exclaimed as she glanced around again before settling her gaze on her husband. “I didn’t get a chance to really look at it the last time when Mai…” she trailed off and smiled awkwardly.

Zuko frowned as he made his way to her and stood beside her as another soft breeze ruffled their hair and clothing.

“I always wondered why you came in looking so worried that night,” he said curiously as he remembered that day last summer. Had it really been almost a year?

“Well, uh, Mai told me that you weren’t feeling well and she asked me to check up on you,” she confessed in a quiet tone, “I just wanted to help you, but instead I intruded upon…an intimate mome —”

“No,” Zuko interrupted her firmly, “I didn’t plan for Mai being here that night, she had never been here before, and she caught me off guard. But when you appeared, my thoughts shifted toward you, and when you left, I ordered Mai to get out.”

“So that night…you guys didn’t…?” she trailed off again when Zuko shook his head.
“No. We didn’t do anything,” he told her truthfully. “And even though you and I weren’t together then, I didn’t want you to think we did.”

Katara smiled.

“You tried to tell me that before,” she said before she turned around to gaze at the ocean outside, “And I told you that you didn’t need to explain, but the truth was, even though I didn’t know why then, the thought of you two together…it made me jealous.”

Zuko reached out and wrapped her in his arms, pulling her back into his chest and resting his chin atop her head.

“Don’t think about that, or Mai, or any other woman again since they’re not important,” he told her firmly but softly, “What matters to me now is you. The woman I love is you.”

“And the one I love is you,” she said lovingly as she turned around and raised herself on her toes to kiss him softly.

Zuko pulled her up to him, placing his hand behind her head in order to deepen the kiss and groaning softly at the taste of her lips and the soft sounds she made. Just then, Katara’s stomach growled and they pulled away to stare at each other. She was blushing in embarrassment and Zuko could not help but chuckle at her expression, earning himself a scowl from her.

“This reminds me of that time when I ran into you in the Fire Nation capital last summer,” he said amusingly.

Before Katara could retort, her stomach gave another growl. Her blush became darker.

“What kind of husband am I? Having my lovely wife suffer so?” Zuko asked with mock mortification.

“Well, why don’t you start being a good husband by feeding your lovely wife first?” she retorted with a giggle.
Zuko chuckled as he grabbed Katara’s arm and hooked it beneath his.

“I have already asked the servants to have dinner ready for us to enjoy, my lady,” he said gallantly, causing Katara to let out another laugh.

“Then lead the way, my lord,” she said with a grin as she allowed him to lead her out of the bedchamber and toward the dining room.

During dinner they reminisced about the past times they had been on the island and then planned what to do during their stay as they finished the delicious meal that had been prepared for them.

Once they finished, Zuko then surprised her when he told her to dress elegantly because he wanted to take her to see a play. He laughed at the uncertain look on her face before he promised that it was not the Ember Island Players, but a famous group of actors visiting from one of the big cities of the Fire Nation. When they arrived at the theater in all their regalia, the people gawked and admired them as they passed by surrounded by a group of guards. They were led to the royal box before they were left alone. It was the first time Katara had experienced such privileges, and although it made her feel a bit awkward that they were in plain sight of the audience below, she ignored it in favor of enjoying the play.

The actors were wonderful and the play exquisite, although the end brought a few tears to her eyes when the lovers in the story decided to die together instead of being ripped apart by envious and vengeful people. Zuko grasped her hand and gently squeezed it and she looked up at him to give him a smile. It was late by the time the royal couple left the theater and returned to the royal beach house.

Zuko took her toward the back of the house to enjoy the night scenery. He sat on the top step and pulled Katara to sit on the step below it, placing her between his legs, before wrapping his arms around her and holding her close. They stared silently at the dark waves that crashed onto the beach and the many bright stars that dotted the inky night sky. When the sea breeze became colder they decided to return to the warmth of their room.

The young lord stopped his wife before they entered their chamber and she looked up questioningly. Noticing her confused frown, Zuko gave her a reassuring smile.

“Why don’t you get ready for bed, love?” he asked her, “I have to look into something before I can join you.”
“Okay,” Katara responded with a raised eyebrow as she curiously watched him smile at her briefly before he turned around and walked away.

Once he disappeared around the corner of the corridor, Katara turned back toward the door, opened it, and then went inside before closing it softly behind her. She wondered what Zuko was up to as she took off her clothes, took a quick bath, and then combed her hair. Wrapped in a towel, she searched for one of the sleeping attires that Suki had convinced her to take for their honeymoon. Once she found it, she looked at it with an unsure frown before she gathered her courage. She donned on the thin, silvery nightdress that had long, billowy sleeves and fell down to the middle of her calves, but that was the only modest thing about it. It fit nicely to her curves with a low neckline that exposed her ample cleavage.

She walked toward a long mirror that hung from the wall and looked at herself. She blushed at her reflection and the sight she made since she was not used to wearing such revealing outfits once her body had matured. She remembered the outfit she wore when she and the gang had barely arrived at the Fire Nation years ago and wondered how she would look in it now that her body had filled out completely. She was sure Zuko would love it. But now she wanted to let Zuko know that she was ready and willing and wanted him desperately without having to actually say the words. She gave herself a once over before she grinned at herself. She did look nice.

_I hope Zuko doesn’t take long_, the waterbender thought in anticipation.

Moving away from the mirror, Katara sat down on the low table and rummaged through one of the small bags containing her essential items. A small smile appeared on her face as she took out the small pouch of blended herbs Yin-Min had given her. She poured some water from the pitcher into a cup that also rested on the table, sprinkled some of the crushed herbs, and then quickly drank the liquid. She shuddered and grimaced at the taste. It was more bitter than sweet mixed in with just plain water.

Placing the empty cup down on the table’s surface, she stood up and walked to the bathroom to wash her mouth, hoping it would get rid of the bitter taste. As she dried her mouth, she wondered if the herbs would help her conceive much more quickly. She gasped.

_What if I’m pregnant right now?_ she wondered.

The thought was both joyous and frightening. Was she ready to be a mother? Her thoughts scattered when she heard Zuko call out her name from the room. After smoothing her nightdress down and patting her loose hair, Katara walked out of the bathroom and saw Zuko taking off his dark tunic, leaving him only in his trousers. She felt heat gather in her belly.
Zuko turned around when he heard Katara walk into the room, but his words got stuck in his throat when he saw what she was wearing. Agni, she was so sexy and stunning. Was she trying to make him lose control? He ripped his eyes away from her tempting form and swallowed thickly as he tried to will his arousal away. Clearing his throat, he gestured toward the low table where two bowls, another pitcher of wine, and cups had been placed.

“I brought you something,” he said huskily.

Katara inwardly frowned at his lack of reaction to what she was wearing. Did he not notice? Or worse —did he not desire her anymore? She shook her head before she moved toward the table. She glanced at Zuko, who had a small smile on his face, before she looked down at the plates. She gasped softly in surprise. One bowl held large strawberries, deeply red and ripe, and the other was filled with melted chocolate.

“I wanted to share dessert with you in the privacy of our room and with no servants lingering around,” he told her softly.

Katara looked up to smile happily at him.

“Thank you, Zuko,” she exclaimed before she grinned, “You can be so romantic sometimes.”

“I try,” he responded dryly.

Katara laughed as she tiptoed to kiss his scarred cheek before eagerly sitting down on one of the cushions. Zuko smiled contentedly as he joined her. When she reached for a strawberry, Zuko quickly caught her wrist to stop her. Frowning, she turned to him curiously, but he just smiled as he placed her hand back down. Instead, he reached for one of the bright, red strawberries, dipped it in the creamy chocolate, and then brought it to her lips.

Blue eyes bright, Katara smiled widely before she opened her mouth and carefully bit into the delicious morsel. She moaned as the tangy and chocolaty flavors exploded on her taste buds.

“How is it?” Zuko asked quietly as he stared at her mouth.
“Delicious,” Katara responded blissfully, unaware at the erotic thoughts that were running through her husband’s head.

Once she finished eating the treat, Katara quickly reached into the bowl to grab a strawberry before he could stop her, coated it with chocolate, and then brought it to Zuko’s mouth. Golden eyes gleaming, the firebender caught the offering between his teeth before taking it into his mouth, but not before sticking his tongue out to lick her fingers. Katara gasped and shivered, and Zuko watched her with a smirk as he ate the chocolate covered fruit.

Without a word, Zuko grabbed another treat and pressed it against his wife’s lips. Staring into each other’s eyes, she bit into it. Strawberry juice ran down her chin and Zuko leaned down to lick the sweet liquid before licking the chocolate away from her bottom lip. He leaned back and licked his lips with a groan.

“I’m glad I decided to have dessert later,” he commented.

Katara giggled.

They continued to feed each other the chocolate covered strawberries, drink wine, and tease each other until there were no more strawberries and chocolate.

“It’s late,” Katara remarked as she glanced at the opened window where moonlight spilled through.

“Yeah,” Zuko responded.

They fell silent as both waited for the other to make the first move, but neither of them did. With a resigned sigh, Zuko slowly stood up, keeping his stare away from Katara’s lovely body clad in such seductive attire.

“I’m going to get ready for bed,” he said.

“Oh kay,” Katara muttered.

With a small frown, Zuko walked toward the bathroom. After a quick bath, Zuko dried himself with firebending and then placed on a pair of dark red sleeping pants. He wondered if he should say something and make the first move.

Gods, he wanted Katara so badly. But what if his insistence annoyed her? What if she said yes in order to please him even though she was still hurting? No, he could not do it. He had to wait until she approached him.

Running his hand through his hair in frustration, Zuko shook his head before walking back into the room. He paused when he noticed Katara already lying on the bed with the blanket up to her stomach. His shoulders slumped a little at the thought that she was ready to sleep. Maybe tomorrow he could make love to her again? He hoped so for he did not know how much longer he could wait without possessing her again. Silently, he walked toward the bed and slid in beside her, covering his legs with the blanket.

Katara’s heart pounded in anticipation when Zuko snuffed out the candles and the room was plunged into semi-darkness thanks to the light of the moon as he settled himself next to her. She bit her lip as she waited for him to take her into his arms and make love to her.

When Katara did not say anything or move, Zuko sighed in disappointment.

“Good night,” he said coolly before rolling to his side with his back to her in order to keep his control on his desires.

Disappointed, Katara replied quietly before she, too, rolled to her side with her back to him. Was something wrong? It had seemed like he wanted to take her a few moments ago. Maybe he was just tired, she tried to convinced herself.

She bit her lip and frowned. She wanted him to want her just as desperately as she wanted him. Maybe she could ask Jiao for advice since it would be less embarrassing than asking Suki, especially now that her sister-in-law was back in the Southern Water Tribe. Resolute, she closed her eyes and waited for sleep to claim her, hoping everything would be better by tomorrow.

A few seconds later, she heard Zuko roll over and her eyes snapped open when she felt him place his arm around her waist before she felt him hover over her. Curious, Katara moved to lie on her back to look at him. By the light of the moon, she saw his strained features and she wondered at it.

“I can’t do it, Katara,” he groaned huskily.
“Zuko, what’s wrong?” she asked him in concern.

“I know I should wait until you’re feeling better, but I can’t,” he rasped, his hand now squeezing her hip desperately, “I want you, I need you so badly.”

Katara felt her heart ease at his words and at the same time she felt her body flare in desire.

“Zuko,” she said breathlessly.

“I want you, Katara, my body needs you,” Zuko continued, his voice husky and strained. “I’ve been holding myself back in order to honor your culture’s traditions before our marriage, and then to allow your body to heal. Please,” he pleaded with a growl.

Katara lay there, speechless and amazed at his obvious need of her, and she watched with bated breath as Zuko leaned down to kiss her. However, it seemed like he caught himself for he stopped, leaving his lips within just an inch of her own as his warm breath fanned softly across her face.

She could not wait any longer. With a soft cry, she forcefully closed the gap between them as she wrapped her arms tightly around his neck and crashed her anxious lips to his. She devoured his mouth brazenly, pushing her tongue desperately into his gasping mouth as her fingers flew to his dark hair and fastened themselves deep within the longer strands. Zuko groaned deeply as he returned her kisses just as fiercely.

“I thought you were just tired,” Katara managed to get out through panting kisses.

“Even if I was exhausted I would still crave your body,” he groaned before he leaned back to roughly brush his lips against her, “I’m a man in love who has finally gotten the woman he’ll love for his whole life. I will always want you.”

“Zuko,” Katara again breathed his name as many delightful emotions swirled within her. She brought his head back down and kissed him softly.

“Does this mean you’re ready?” he asked her when they pulled away to gather some air.
“I’ve been ready for you since morning,” she confessed with a soft blush, “But I was too shy to say so.”

“We’ve just been married two days and we’re already having misunderstandings,” he remarked with a dry chuckle.

“We just need more work on communicating,” she reassured with a smile.

“True,” he consented before he added with a smirk, “But for now we need to work on getting our bodies acquainted with each other again.”

Katara giggled softly before a moan escaped her when her firebender took possession of her mouth in a passionate and promising kiss that had them soon panting and pressing against each other. Pulling away, Zuko willed a few candles to light up and he knelt back to admire her appealing body clad in that tempting nightdress.

“You look so sexy, my wife,” he said huskily as he glanced at her briefly to give her a roguish smirk that caused Katara to melt.

“All for you, my husband,” she responded with a coy smile.

“All for me,” Zuko repeated her words with a possessive growl.

He placed his hands on the hem of the silky piece of clothing before slowly lifting it up, exposing her exquisite body as he went, before depositing the lovely nightdress over the bed. He then quickly got rid of her undergarments before letting them fly behind him. He was glad he did not have to worry about undoing her complicated under-wrappings anymore. He would set them on fire if she ever wore the irritating things again.

He swallowed visibly as he again took in Katara’s body, glorious and naked beneath him. He brought his hands to her thighs and then up her waist, his fingers slightly shaky with his need as they touched her soft skin. He felt his erection protest its confinement and he groaned deeply.

“Your skin on mine brings out an almost animalistic quality in me that I didn’t know I possessed,” Zuko growled out lowly as he ran his hands firmly up her waist, up her sides, and then even further up, cupping her soft breasts within his warm and large hands.

“Oh!” the waterbender moaned. “More,” she managed to pant as she stared at him.

Zuko responded to her plea by squeezing her mounds more firmly before leaning down to capture her lips fervently. He pressed both thumbs on her hardening nipples and she whimpered into his mouth as his tongue worked ardently against hers.

They kissed frantically as their hands roughly roamed the other’s bodies, gripping and clasping each other as though they would never get enough.

She wanted and needed him, she was desperate for him. She needed to show him how much she craved him, how overwhelming and powerful her love and her desire for him were.

“Zuko,” Katara moaned against his mouth as she wound her arms around his shoulders and crushed herself impossibly closer to him, wishing she could express the burning sense of need that arose within her body at his every touch and kiss.

As if he could hear her thoughts, his hand flew to the back of her head, tangling his fingers in her hair, before pulling her head back as he started spreading desperate kisses across her face, down her throat, and then down her heaving chest. His lips never left her as he licked, kissed, and nipped his way across her flushed skin, causing her to shiver and moan against him.

“I want you,” he growled against her skin.

With the hand that was not tangled in her hair, he pushed her right breast up and lapped the tight bud hotly before he sucked on it fervently, causing her to cry out. Then he pushed his hips against hers, his clothed cock pressing against her wet core desperately.

A needy cry escaped Katara as she felt his erection press firmly against her aching entrance and she bucked her hips against his wantonly. A scorching fire ignited within her as Zuko’s tongue swirled firmly around her aching nipple, the simmering warmth that had been growing within her erupted into licking flames as she again pressed her hips roughly against him, arching her back sharply when his hardness hit that sensitive little bud.
Zuko grunted in pleasure and pushed back against her as he continued suckling at her breast. Agni, he wanted her so much. He could not explain the overpowering craving for her that racked his body every time he touched, saw, or even thought of her. The need for her was consuming him, compelling him to have her, to draw her closer to him, to show her the desperation that was blazing hotly within him.

“I need you, Katara,” he murmured huskily against her soft breast as his hands began to roughly caress every inch of her body that he could reach. He had to feel her, to touch her, wanting her to want him just as fiercely as he wanted her.

“Then make love to me, Zuko,” she moaned, partly commandingly and partly beseechingly, “Take me, please! I need you!”

With a growl, Zuko swiftly divested himself from his sleeping pants, and just as quickly, he was lying between her warm thighs, pressing his throbbing erection against her wet entrance, as he kissed her passionately. He reached down between their bodies, parted her moist folds, and swiftly inserted two of his fingers into her warm core, causing her to cry out softly in pleasure. When he found her slick with her aroused cream, ready for him, he pulled his fingers out with a groan. He settled atop her and ground himself against her a few more times, causing their anticipation and pleasure to rise even further, before he pushed the bulbous head into her clenching entrance as he stared at her.

The Fire Lady’s cobalt eyes were burning with the same undeniable passion that had overtaken the Fire Lord’s impassioned senses, and in one, slow and fluid motion, he slid completely inside her.

Katara winced slightly when her walls stretched to accommodate his girth, but the small discomfort soon disappeared and her arousal flared at the feeling of being full. Zuko groaned against her mouth as his wife kissed him passionately and he stilled for a moment as he allowed the incredible pleasure of being surrounded by Katara’s impossibly tight and magnificently wet pussy wash over him once more.

“Agni, I can’t describe how damn good you feel, Katara,” he growled as he pulled his head slightly back in order to catch his breath.

“And it’ll feel even better once we start moving,” was her breathless response as she slightly lifted her hips against his.

Zuko groaned and pushed back into her as he leaned back down to kiss her, thrusting his tongue inside her delicious mouth as his cock jerked inside her hot sheath. Then one of his hands fastened around her waist and he crushed her closer to him as he began to move in and out of her in a slow Katara moaned softly into her husband’s mouth and she wrapped her arms around his back as the friction of him moving inside her caused the fire within her to erupt even hotter. Her hands began to wander down his back, gripping, caressing, and stroking every dip and curve of his muscular body with her fingers. Zuko responded to her touch as his hand began to roam up and down her trembling body, sliding up from her hip, up her waist, caressing her side and then gliding across her chest before cupping her left breast firmly.

“Yes, oh!” the waterbender mewled.

A slight shudder racked his body as Zuko swallowed her soft cry, and he bucked his hips sharply, moving himself within her and making her whimper loudly from the sensation. When the need for air became too great, they pulled apart from their frantic kiss and panted hard against the other as Zuko continued to plunged into her slowly, stroking the immense inferno within them to scorching heights.

She needed more! She could not stand the slow pace, the slow torture any longer! She wanted him to take her with everything he had!

“Faster, Zuko, please harder!” Katara panted out, as she wrapped her arms more tightly around him with a cry.

“As you wish, love,” he ground out.

Grasping her hips firmly, Zuko moved back onto his knees and thrust himself inside her as he quickened his pace, immediately causing Katara to cry out in pleasure as she arched her back. He looked down and watched the place where their bodies were intimately joined as he pulled out of her. He was once again fascinated by the sight of her juices coating his engorged cock and how her slick pussy, having stretched to accommodate his large size, reverted back to the tiny hole that it was before he had penetrated it. He would never tire of such a magnificent sight.

“So damn hot,” he growled out as his gaze continued to be absorbed with what he was seeing.

He pressed forward again, watching as the head of his thick length disappeared and she stretched to take him in. He gripped her hips more tightly, brought her closer to him, and watched as he did it again.

Even though she could not see what Zuko was seeing, Katara moaned and clenched the sheets beneath her with her fingers at the ardent gleam in his amber eyes as he continued to thrust himself into her. Katara then squeezed her inner muscles since she had found out from their last coupling that he really enjoyed it when she did that.

Zuko gasped at the sensation of Katara squeezing him and his eyes rolled to the back of his head as his hips surged forward more forcefully.

“Yes!” Katara screamed as he hit a particular spot that made her toes curl, “More, Zuko!”

“I’ll always give you more,” Zuko growled out as he leaned back down over her and wrapped his arms around her, pressing her bouncing breasts against his muscled chest as he pumped into her.

“Oh, oh, Zuko!” she cried out.

Back and forth, their bodies swayed, much like the ebb and flow of the ocean’s tide outside their window that sent waves crashing against the sandy shore only to withdraw before doing it all over again.

Katara wrapped her legs around his hips, and they both gasped when it caused him to press deeper inside her. She could feel him touching her womb. With a growl, Zuko buried his face in Katara’s neck as his pants grew heavier. He began to kiss, lick, and nip at her perspiring skin while she gasped and moaned as her nails clung to his sweaty back. He trailed one hand down her back until his palm was tightly cupping one of her firm rear cheeks, then he jerked her towards him as he shoved his hips harder against hers.

Katara let out a loud cry against his neck as his move caused her stomach to clench sharply and a pleasurable jolt to explode through her nerves. She tightened her limbs around him and squeezed her inner muscles around his length once again. Zuko groaned against her skin before he raised his head to kiss her hungrily.

“I need you, Katara. Dammit, I need you!” Zuko growled huskily against her lips as his hips buckled above her. “But I don’t want to hurt you,” he panted in a strained tone.

The passion in his voice made the heat in Katara’s belly flare intensely, but his concern for her, even during such a passionate time, seemed to melt her heart. Her entire body burned with delight from the awareness that he needed her with the same intensity that she needed him. With a soft moan she crushed herself harder against him, smashing her sensitive breasts against his hard chest as she crashed her mouth against his.

“Take me as hard as you want, my love,” she told him fervently against his lips, “I won’t break. Please. I need you.”

“Katara,” Zuko groaned deeply since he could feel his desperation reflected in her tone.

At her words, at her consent, he growled loudly as he gripped her ass more firmly, drawing her more tightly against him, before he began to pound into her, taking her with a desperate and frantic need as he had dreamed of doing ever since he realized he loved her.

“Ah, ahh, ah, Zuko!” Katara screamed as she held more tightly onto him as her pleasure increased more than she thought possible as he wildly plunged himself inside her.

She heard him growl and she gasped when she felt his thick member twitch with excitement within her drenched folds, causing a pleased shiver to rack her body as she arched into him again.

Zuko’s golden eyes were penetrating and attentive as he brought her pleasure while seeking his own. He watched her hungrily, reveling in her soft sighs and loud moans. His jaw clenched as he shifted the angle of his hips, going deeper inside her warm pussy. The sound of their flesh slapping loudly against each other and the wet sounds as he plunged into her only caused him to go faster. He saw Katara’s eyes roll to the back of her head as she groaned and gasped loudly. The Fire Lord growled and dipped his head towards his wife again, catching her lips with his as he increased the speed and force of his hips to a frantic pace.

“Agni, Katara,” Zuko groaned as he stared at her flushed features. “So good.”

With another fierce growl, Zuko began to ram himself inside her as the tightening of her wet walls caused his balls to tighten with his impending release.

Katara could no longer follow his movements as Zuko took her with a wild abandon and everything within her flushed body began to wind up so tight she could not even breathe anymore as she panted in short, quick gasps. She was so close!

As if reading her thoughts and needs, Zuko twisted his hips sharply at the same time he pressed his thumb firmly on the oversensitive nub above her entrance where he was buried in.
“Yes, Zuko!” Katara screamed as the coil snapped and she spiraled up into euphoria.

Bright stars flashed before her eyes as fire erupted throughout her body, sending electric jolts through every fiber of her being, causing her toes to curl and her back to arch as she clung to Zuko like a lifeline. She gave herself up to the incredible sensation completely, letting every inch of her body burn with ecstasy.

Her scream, the clenching of her hot core and the rush of liquid coating his shaft, triggered Zuko’s own pleasurable release.

“Katara!” he roared loudly and gloriously as he came inside her for the second time.

Staring up at him, Katara was lost in awe of the primal beauty of her husband’s climax. She felt pleasured pride go through her at the thought that she had done that, that her body had given him such pleasure. The undeniable power that emanated from his roar of ecstasy and the feeling of his hot seed coating her insides sent her into another delightful orgasm.

Shit, so good, so good, Zuko chanted incoherently in his head as his throbbing cock continued to spurt his semen inside his wife’s spasming passage. Once spent, Zuko groaned deeply and he managed to twist himself to the side before he crushed his wife. He brought her with him, still buried deep within her swollen folds. His seed combined with the fluids that he had so skillfully coaxed from her body poured out of her and slid between her thighs and fell upon his.

They panted and trembled against each other as they basked in the afterglow of their lovemaking. The sounds of the waves could be heard once again in the now silent room.

After several minutes, Zuko’s hand began to gently stroke Katara’s back and she moaned softly before she lifted her head to look at him. Her husband’s gaze was serious as he looked down at her and she frowned slightly at his expression.

“What’s wrong?” she asked quietly.

Zuko moved his other hand to brush a stray lock of hair away from her face before he caressed her kiss-swollen lips with his fingers.
“I was too rough,” he stated grimly, “Did I…hurt you?”

“Of course not!” Katara exclaimed as her brow furrowed.

A blush appeared on her face as she smiled at him.

“I…loved it,” she confessed in a shy whisper.

Zuko’s tensed body relaxed and he let out a relieved breath as he leaned down to press a kiss to her forehead.

“I’m glad to hear you say that. I can’t stand the thought of hurting you,” he told her quietly.

“I know you will never hurt me on purpose,” was her confident reply as she nuzzled her face against his chest.

The waterbender felt him place a finger beneath her chin and she raised her head to look at him again only to see a crooked smirk curl his perfect lips.

“You don’t know how excited you make me feel to know you love it that I take you hard,” he said with a husky growl.

His fingers swept lightly across her blushing cheek, and he chuckled quietly for a moment at her embarrassed expression before planting a gentle kiss on her mouth. When he pulled away, he was surprised to see an impish grin on her lips.

“I’ll always look forward for you to make love to me, whether it’s gentle or rough,” she declared breathlessly, causing Zuko’s breath to catch in his throat.

“Good,” he replied huskily.

Katara grinned before a small yawn escaped her, making her blush and causing Zuko to chuckle softly.
“Sleep,” he ordered gently.

With another yawn, the young woman nuzzled her face comfortably into the crook of her husband’s neck.

“I love you,” she whispered as she snugged closer to him, wrapping one of her arms around him.

“As I do you,” Zuko sighed as he wrapped his arm more tightly around her smaller form.

Katara shifted and blushed when she finally realized that Zuko was still buried inside her, although now his shaft was soft and limp.

“Can I remain inside you while we sleep?” she heard him ask her softly.

“Yes,” was her whispered reply as she settled comfortably against him. She wanted to feel close to him while they slept.

Zuko smiled, pleased.

Soon he heard his wife’s even breathing and he knew she had fallen asleep. He tightened his arm around her and brought her even closer to him. He had wanted to make love to her throughout the night, but he supposed he could do that another time—after all, they had a whole week for their honeymoon, not to mention the rest of their lives. Still, he held her tightly against his body, afraid of moving too much that it would cause him to slip out of her warm core. If he could, he would want to be buried inside her until the day he died. He smiled. He wondered how she would feel about that.

A soft breeze blew into the room from the opened window and gently swayed the curtains before they settled serenely back in place. They newly wedded couple slept, their bodies pressed tightly together and their limbs intertwined, the soft crashing of waves their lullaby.

Ignoring the wailing woman beneath him, Jianguo groaned harshly as he spilled himself inside her. Panting roughly, he quickly pulled out of her, moved away from her, and lay on his back to recover. He never bothered to pull out of the women he fucked because the sensation was more pleasurable than having to release himself on them or on the sheets, although he sometimes did pull out and had them suck him off until he came. Prostitutes were taught to be cautious of the consequences when their clients made use of them. Jianguo knew, however, that such precautions were not always effective, but he did not care if he got them pregnant. There were ways to deal with an unwanted pregnancy and if they decided to go through with raising a brat that was their problem. He was sure he probably had several bastards roaming the world, but he really did not care.

He closed his eyes as he brought back to his mind the vision of the blue-eyed waterbender writhing underneath him as he strove to find his pleasure with another woman’s body. He found the desire of taking the Water Tribe woman’s body overtaking his everyday thoughts more and more. It was closely followed by the pleasing thought of knowing Zuko would suffer once he did.

He heard the Earth Kingdom whore he had taken for the night stir beside him before he felt her place her head on his naked chest and wrap her arm around him. He frowned darkly when her dirty smell of sweat and sex—that had accumulated for who knew how long—reached his sensitive nose. It was nothing compared to the clean and sweet scent of the waterbender.

“Ye sure know how ta please a woman,” her shrill voiced irritated his ears as she rubbed her cheek against his chest. “Can we do dat again?”

Snapping his eyes open, Jianguo grabbed her arm and flung it away from him in disgust before he stood up. Nude, he moved across the room he had rented for the night for his pleasure. He couldn’t actually summon a prostitute to his campsite unless he wanted her to blurt out where his hideout was located. Picking up the bottle of liquor he had purchased, he took a deep drink before turning around to regard the woman silently.

She had sat up on the bed and was looking at him expectantly, her long, dark hair falling wildly down her shoulders and her naked breasts. The only reason he had picked her from the other bunch of whores that stood outside the tavern was because she was young and fairly pretty. But she was not the beautiful and fiery waterbender he was obsessed over.

“Ye won’t ev’n ‘ave ta pay me,” she purred seductively.

She spread her legs apart to entice him. He watched as she dipped her fingers inside herself before pulling them out to reveal them slick with his semen before she crudely placed them into her mouth and moaned. He felt his cock stir at the sight, but he ignored it.

“Get out,” he ordered impassively.
“Aww, don’t be like dat, handsome,” she teased as she brought her hand back down to rubbed herself and moaned, “Ye can ev’n ‘ave me for da whole night. Ye can fuck me as hard as ye want.”

With a smirk, the firebender moved back to the bed and leaned toward her. She looked at him lustfully from beneath her heavily painted lashes as she smiled at him. He reached out to roughly fondle her breast, pinching her nipple almost cruelly, and smirked when she moaned loudly before he gently ran his fingers along her throat. He leaned close to her face and smiled.

“Do you really think I’ll just spend my time with one whore?” he asked, “One that’s not even that good?”

Her sultry look immediately vanished and she frowned. Before she could indignantly retort, she gasped in pain when he circled his hand around her neck and pressed tightly.

“I said to get the fuck out!” he growled in her face before he threw her off the bed.

The woman hastily scrambled to her feet and just as quickly pulled on her soiled dress, not even bothering to tie it as she ran and opened the door. As if gathering courage by being far away from him, she turned around to glare at him.

“It ain’t dat big anyway, ya bastard!” she hissed before she whirled around and slammed the door shut.

Jianguo’s nostrils flared at the insult before he calmed himself and again picked up his liquor bottle. As if he would allow a simple whore’s words to affect him, though maybe it had been too hasty of him to kick her out so soon. After all, she had been willing to service him without being paid.

He shrugged. He could easily find another companion for the night if he wished.

Moving toward the wooden chest placed in the corner of the room, he opened it before he pulled out the missive one of his men had handed to him as he had made his way to his room with the woman. Now he had time to read it.

Walking toward the lumpy bed, he sat on it before he untied the string and unfurled the letter. He leaned close to the candle resting on the small table near the bed and eagerly read what his men had to say.
He had found out the royal bastard and the exotic waterbender had planned to visit Ember Island for their honeymoon, so he had sent a few of his most inconspicuous men to the island to spy on them. It was the best chance they had of being near the royal couple since they were always protected in the capital.

As he read, his mood soon changed to anger. The only thing his men wrote was that by the small glimpses they had been able to see of the royal couple when they ventured into town showed that they were completely smitten with each other. The royal beach house was too heavily guarded for them to be able to sneak into it without being apprehended.

“Incompetent fools!” he cursed.

How was this insignificant information going to help him? He still did not know what had happened to his informant in the palace, so now he had to find another way to enact his revenge on Zuko and regain everything he had lost. But Zuko was too cautious and astute and had thus far ruined all his plans.

Jianguo narrowed his eyes as he crushed the letter in his hand.

He would make Zuko pay for taking everything away from him. He would make Zuko suffer in the worst possible way. He would make Zuko wish he were dead.

Setting the paper on fire until it turned to ashes, Jianguo stood up and again made his way to the chest. He pulled out a bloody and ripped blue tunic and smirked evilly.

And he would do so by taking away from Zuko what he cherished the most.

The stunning waterbender.

Was Zuko enjoying taking pleasure from her lovely body at that moment? Jianguo could just imagine the incredible sight the blue-eyed brunette made. He could practically hear her screams of pleasure. He brought the tunic to his nose and inhaled deeply, imaging her scent on it. He closed his eyes and shuddered as he felt himself harden before he placed the tunic back in the chest and closed it. Placing his trousers on, he turned around and headed toward the door.
It seemed he would need to look for another woman to keep him company for the night after all.
The first thing Katara became aware of as she slowly drifted up from the depths of slumber was Zuko’s warm and strong hand moving over her skin, bringing a pleasure that made her entire body melt like the sweet chocolate they had eaten the previous night. The second thing that reached her senses was the soothing sound of waves. In her still foggy mind, she realized her husband was hovering over her by the warmth and light weight of his body touching hers. His lips brushed her cheek, moved to caress her lips for a moment, brushed against her other cheek, before again returning to kiss her mouth. She murmured softly as his light caresses and kisses sparked a flame within her.

“Mmm,” she moaned softly when his fingers slowly trailed down her side.

As if knowing that he had succeeded in waking her up, Zuko’s soft touches became more firm and adventurous.

“Good morning,” she heard him greet huskily.

“It’s morning already?” Katara muttered as she gave out a soft yawn before finally deciding to open her eyes.

She saw Zuko looking down at her with a smile and gleaming, golden eyes before she allowed her gaze to sweep the room as her drowsiness began to leave her. A light furrow appeared on her brow when she saw that the dark room was bathed in a soft orangey and yellowish color before her eyes widened in disbelief.

“It’s barely dawn!” she almost whined as another yawn escaped her.

She felt more than heard Zuko chuckle and she glanced back at him with a halfhearted glare.

“I did tell you,” he said amusedly before he continued in a husky growl, “I rise with the sun.”

With that said, he bucked his hips slowly and Katara gasped in shock when she felt him harden inside her, reminding her that they had fallen asleep with their bodies connected intimately. She felt herself flush along with the rest of her body as her core immediately clenched in need.

“Mm,” Zuko murmured in pleasure at the sensation of her warm walls fluttering around him. “They say the mornings can be the best time to make love,” he commented with a wolfish grin.

“What you say about the mornings is a pretense because it doesn’t seem to matter to you the hour or the place,” she retorted playfully as she giggled.

“You know me so well, my wife,” he responded with a chuckle.

Their laughter was cut short, however, as the trembling motion rocked their bodies, causing a pleasurable vibration to throb through the intimate spot where their bodies were joined. Their eyes locked instantly as they felt the tremors pulse between them. The waterbender was unable to stop the wanton mewl that escaped her as her firebender stared at her with obvious need.

The young Fire Lord’s golden eyes seemed to darken into molten amber at her soft cry, regardless of the soft light of dawn that was shining through the windows. She was just as beautiful moaning underneath him in the early light of day as she had been moaning beneath the glow of moonlight the night before.

They were motionless for a moment, regarding each other passionately, attempting to express their emotions using just their eyes. As she continued to stare at him, captivated by the allure of his eyes, Katara found herself unconsciously moving toward him. The small movements of her body beneath his stirred their joined parts once again, and she felt his cock jerk immediately inside of her. Katara moaned and froze instantly, desire written across her face as his length began to grow firmer and larger inside of her.

Knowing she was not nearly wet enough for him to continue, and after a few seconds of silence heavy with anticipation, Zuko moved and dipped his head down toward her. A thrill shot through Katara as she watched him with rapt attention as he brought his head closer to hers and his erection stiffened and thickened between her folds. The passion between them seemed to send electrical currents through the air as they held one another’s gazes and their arousal flared. As he continued to lean towards her, Zuko managed to tear his gaze away from her azure eyes and dart them down to her lips, staring at those soft petals with unrestricted need. They were only a few inches away from his now, and he watched as she licked her lips eagerly as he continued to draw closer. He desperately wanted to taste her again.

The waterbender relished the anticipation as he continued to move slowly, inching his way towards her awaiting lips as his cock swelled completely inside of her. She resisted the urge to shift against him as she felt him filling her to the brim, pushing inside of her, stretching her to encompass him snuggly. Her breath grew heavier as the incredible sensation caused wetness to rush from her depths.
Her eyelids grew heavy with desire, but she kept them firmly open and continued staring at him ravenously.

Her own hunger reflected in Zuko’s penetrating stare as his eyes continued to bore into hers. He was again mesmerized by the flecks of dark and light colors that made up her beautiful cobalt eyes. Then, with a soft growl, Zuko swiftly cut the distance between them and hungrily captured her plump lips, leaving her almost breathless with his intensity. Before she could respond to his kiss, however, he moved away to latch his mouth onto one of her dusky nipples.

“Ohhh!” she moaned as she arched her back in order to press her breast closer to his hot mouth.

Zuko swirled his tongue around her lovely nipple, tugged on it with his teeth, and then hungrily suckled it until it hardened into a tight pebble. Once satisfied, he moved his mouth to her other neglected and aching peak and gave it the same treatment as she wound her arms around his neck.
He slowly painted a path with his fingers down her stomach, making the muscles quiver and her body shiver. His fingers went lower and he began playing with the soft curls of her sex for a moment. Then he went further down, parted her dampening folds, and pressed the little swollen bud that made her go wild.

Katara gasped and bucked her hips against his. Zuko groaned when he felt another flow of her aroused juices coat his hardened shaft and he pressed deeper inside her. He circled the bundle of nerves with the tip of two of his fingers as he continued to suck on her nipple. His eyes were closed as he tried to keep himself still for a moment longer. He paused when he felt Katara’s fingers join his in pleasuring her and his head jerk back to stare at her. She was blushing hard, but she did not look away from his gaze as she breathed heavily as their fingers moved together. Her actions only caused his cock to harden more than he thought possible that he again jerked his hips against hers, causing her to moan deeply.

He pulled his hips back a little before sliding back in. She gasped and he groaned before he did it again. Zuko slowly moved their drenched fingers away from her swollen clit and trailed them down to her entrance where his shaft was buried deeply in. Katara’s eyes widened as she continued to stare at Zuko when their fingers touched his length as he pulled out of her before thrusting back in. She shuddered and moaned.

Unable to stand the slow pace any longer, Zuko removed their hands from between their bodies, gently placed Katara’s hand around his neck, and then proceeded to make morning love to his wife in a fierce rhythm.
"Zuko!" Katara cried out and threw her head back onto the pillow as she thoroughly enjoyed the sensation of Zuko taking her so fervently.

With a pleased grunt, Zuko again leaned down to take possession of her mouth. Katara tightened her hold around his neck and locked her legs around his hips as he began pumping even faster into her.

Zuko would never tire of being entangled in Katara, in his wife. Her sweet scent, soft skin, slender limbs, her burning heat, her wet clenching walls, and her soft whimpers and resonating cries all summed up to overpowering ecstasy. He gasped and then clenched his jaw when he felt his end come upon him more quickly than he had anticipated, but first, he needed to bring Katara with him.

He again brought his hand between their straining bodies and quickly began to rub her swollen clit.

Wholly vulnerable to his touch, Katara cried out as she writhed wildly beneath him, suspended in a sweet agony that only he could end, helplessly consumed by her firebender. He moved swiftly and powerfully, claiming her body more deeply with each penetration of his thick shaft. Then with a combined press of his thumb on her oversensitive nub and a sharp twist of his hips, she was crying out his name as her entire body arched into him.

Only when he felt Katara meet her end, did Zuko surrender to her softness and heat.

"Uuuhh," Zuko growled quietly as he spilled himself inside her with a final thrust of his powerful hips.

Panting and shuddering from the intense ecstasy, the young lord rolled away from her, carefully slipping his flaccid member out of her overflowing pussy, and lay down upon his back beside her as they tried to calm their racing hearts and trembling bodies. After a long moment of comfortable silence that was only interrupted by the sounds of the soft breeze that ruffled the curtains and the crashing of waves, Zuko opened his eyes and turned his head to look at his waterbender. She had her own eyes closed with a sated expression on her beautiful face. He sighed softly and smiled proudly at the thought that he was able to please his wife so well.

As if sensing his intense stare, Katara opened her eyes and gave him a radiant smile. Zuko raised a dark brow when her forehead creased slightly with a small frown as her eyes landed on his neck.

“What is it?” he asked curiously.
“The love bite I gave you is gone,” she remarked.

Zuko reached up a hand and touched the spot where the love bite Katara had given him before she departed to the Southern Water Tribe two months ago had been. It had healed a few weeks before their wedding.

“I wore it proudly when you left,” he confessed. Then he gathered her in his arms with a wicked grin as he suggestively said, “But you can give me another one if you’d like.”

Katara playfully smacked his arm with a giggle as he tried to drag her beneath him again. She managed to wiggle away from his grasp and jumped away from the bed wrapped in a silky sheet, laughing more loudly when he actually pouted at her.

“Even if I do, it'll eventually fade away,” she told him as she moved to where their clothes had been stored away for their visit to the island.

Zuko raised himself on his elbows and he watched her rummage around. He frowned in disappointment at the thought that she was getting ready for the day, but he was surprised when she returned to the bed, holding something in her hand behind her back, while the other clutched the bed sheet closed around her nude form. She sat down beside him, the sheet slipping down one of her shoulders, exposing her delicious brown skin to his view. He sat up in order to see what she was holding without bothering to cover himself.

“While I was in the Southern Water Tribe, I made this for you as a wedding present,” she began with a shy smile, “I know it’s nothing fancy or great, but I hope you like it.”

Grabbing his larger hand, she brought her hand from behind her back and placed her gift on his palm. Zuko stared at her with a smile before he looked down to see what she had made for him.

It was a wristband made of a thick, black leather strap, but what caught his attention were the designs carved into the leather. They looked like ancient symbols of the moon and the sun. It was impressive.

“The sun and the moon represent us,” he stated rather than asked as he looked up from the wristband to smile at his wife.

“Yeah,” Katara said with a smile as she touched the pendant of her necklace with the golden dragon and the silver koi fish.

She placed her hand back on her lap and cleared her throat a little as she averted her eyes for a moment, her cheeks turning slightly red, before she stared unwaveringly into his eyes.

“But there is another reason why I’m giving you this present,” she told him with a firm tone despite her blush.

“Oh? And what’s that?” Zuko asked as he again glanced down at the wristband before once again looking at her.

“I have two things that let everybody know I belong to you,” she began as she again touched her necklace and then lifted her left hand to show the golden ring. “I made you this wristband with both symbols from both our cultures to show the world that you belong to me,” she told him resolutely.

Zuko suppressed a smirk as her possessiveness brought a shiver of pleasure down his spine. Her reason behind her gift did not bother him since it was only fair that he wear something to show everybody that he was completely and exclusively hers.

“I’ll wear your gift proudly,” he promised fervently.

Katara seemed to relax at his words and she smiled brightly at him as she leaned over to kiss him gleefully before pulling away when he sought to deepen the kiss. She grinned when he frowned at her.

“Will you put it on?” he asked her as he held out his left arm.

With a happy nod, Katara grabbed the wristband and placed it over his wrist, quickly tying the thinner strings attached at the ends together into a tight knot. Once finished, she pulled away and Zuko stretched out his arm to admire the thick wristband.

Then without warning, he pounced on her. Katara shrieked in surprise, which quickly turned into a moan when he crashed his mouth to hers, not allowing her to pull away from his kiss this time. She did not protest when he ripped the sheet away from her, and instead, welcomed him eagerly into her body again when he ground himself insistently against her. The room was once again filled with pleasured moans and groans and then a final pleasurable scream and a roar.
After they finished the second round of lovemaking of the day, they spent a few hours in bed kissing and talking before the rumbling of their hungry bellies finally incited them to get ready for the day and leave their room in search of food.

Once they finished their breakfast, the royal couple headed out of the royal beach house and ventured into town with their personal guards trailing protectively behind them. As they explored the island, the people bowed and congratulated them excitedly as they passed by. But when the Fire Lord got tired of the constant congratulations, whether sincere or not, he led his wife to the royal beach house for dinner. Then they retired to their room late at night for another round of lovemaking.

So far their honeymoon was coming out perfectly and they couldn’t be happier.

On the third day of their honeymoon, the young couple decided to spend the rest of their day on their private beach after having a light lunch in the town. Not a single cloud marred the bright blue sky or impeded the sun to shine its rays on the ocean water and the sandy beach below. It was a perfect day to go for a swim.

After a playful sparring match, Zuko sat down on the sand with a contented sigh before shaking his head to get rid of the seawater that clung to his hair. He had been too distracted staring at his wife’s enticing form to notice the wave she had summoned behind him. When he had finally realized what she was doing, he had already been doused. It reminded him of their last visit to Ember Island and how Katara had drenched him with a wave when he had not been paying attention as he lay back on the shore.

He smiled wryly. He never would have thought he would lose his concentration at the mere sight of a woman—although it was only understandable if that woman was wearing an appealing bikini and that woman also happened to be his wife. He never would have bothered to participate in such playful antics if it wasn’t for Katara and he would probably have continued being a harsh and unyielding person if it wasn’t for her.

A dark look settled on his features as the thought reminded him of why he had insisted they spent their time at the private beach and not in town.

After lunch in a quaint little restaurant, they had stopped at the small marketplace. They had not wanted to bring attention to themselves and be bothered by annoying people, so he had reluctantly agreed with Katara to put on some disguises. As Katara looked at a stall that sold exotic candy, Zuko had stayed a short distance away with Shen and Kuo also dressed like ordinary people to the insistence of their Fire Lady. He had watched her with a soft look in his eyes that he hid beneath the straw hat he was wearing, only to stiffen in anger at the conversation that had reached his ears.
A small group of visiting nobles from the Fire Nation had been arguing with two wealthy tourists from the Earth Kingdom. The former group had kept insisting that the Water Tribe woman their lord had married was unfit to be their Fire Lady. The Earth Kingdom tourists had retorted by saying that the violent Fire Lord did not deserve such a kind and gentle woman as the Lady Katara and were positive he would make her life miserable.

Zuko had begun to turn around in a rage at their words, but Kuo had stepped forward to block him. His guard’s interference had only increase his wrath, but Zuko had been aware enough to notice Kuo tilt his head forward with a frown. Zuko had looked over his shoulder to see that Katara was making her way toward them with a happy smile on her face and a bag in her hand—not doubt filled with candy. He had immediately composed himself in order not to worry her and returned her smile stiffly before immediately suggesting they spend the rest of their day on their private beach.

He had thought she had not noticed his agitation when she instantly agreed, but once they arrived in the privacy of their rooms to change into their swimwear she had asked him what had happened. At her determined insistence, he had recounted to her what he had heard.

She had been sad at what the Fire Nation group thought of her before she became angry at what the tourists had said about him. Then she had embraced him and reassured him that she would always be happy with him and they only needed time to make the world see they were happy with each other. He had crushed her tightly to him and said he hoped she was right before he led her toward the private beach. But the words he had heard earlier would not leave him alone.

With a shake of his head, the young Fire Lord’s eyes landed on his waterbender who had decided to stay in the water. He watched as she gathered thin tendrils of seawater around her form as the waves lapped against her legs and the sunlight made her wet olive skin shine and her chestnut hair gleam, making her resemble a water nymph more than ever.

Although she could sometimes be as fierce as a raging storm when angered, most of the time Katara was as gentle as a spring shower, especially now that she had matured. Soothing, fresh, and tender; just like her element of water.

He frowned slightly as he glanced at his clenched hands. She was different from both him and his own element of fire. Fire could be wild and dangerous and, if not controlled, could cause much pain and agony. Much like him when he became enraged.

They were so different—their elements of fire and water and themselves. He could understand why some would say that they were unsuited for each other.
But both elements also depended on the other. Fire could be a destructive force without mercy and could destroy everything in its path without the cool influence of water. And water could be cold and harsh without the warmth fire can provide.

It was just like Katara and him. They may be different, but their differences were what made them perfect for each other. It was her gentle and calm nature that soothed his fiery and explosive temper, and it was his ardent and vehement feelings for her that ignited a fire in her heart and body.

Yet, they were also very similar.

His tense form and whirling mind seemed to relax at the truth of his thoughts as he glanced at the now setting golden sun touching the blue ocean before returning his admiring gaze to his waterbending wife. As twilight approached, Zuko swiftly stood up, and without making a single sound, he stalked toward her, stepping carefully into the cool water. He scooped her into his arms without warning, causing her to shriek and drop her hold on her element. Then he swung her high with a deep laugh before pressing her close to him and kissing her deeply. When he pulled away, he smirked at her dazed expression.

“I love you in this new bathing suit,” he commented with a rakish grin as he allowed his eyes to roam down her form. “You look delicious in it.”

Katara blushed, but she smiled with pleasure.

“Thanks,” she said coyly before a mock pout appeared on her face as she looked down at herself. “Are you sure it looks nice on me?” she asked with an innocent bat of her long eyelashes as she twirled around slowly to allow him to look at her with a critical eye.

Zuko hummed deeply as he drank in every inch of her lovely body covered in the bikini. It was much the same style as the one Iroh had bought her during their last visit to Ember Island. He had a feeling his witty uncle had done it on purpose so his nephew would notice her—not that Zuko hadn’t before—and he had appreciated the sexy bathing suit. Just as much as he did the one Katara was wearing now. Instead of being navy-blue, however, it was a deep burgundy color that accentuated her tanned flesh magnificently.

“It looks great,” he reassured her huskily, “I like it has much as I did the one you wore last summer.”
“Do you even remember that?” she teased with a grin.

“Of course,” Zuko immediately responded, “I couldn’t take my eyes off of you and keep the erotic thoughts out of my head…but at that time it only made me feel confused and guilty.”

Katara smiled sweetly as she wrapped her arms around his neck and raised herself on her toes to kiss him.

“Well, you don’t have to feel guilty anymore,” she told him softly.

“True,” Zuko agreed before he smirked as he tightened his embrace, “And I also don’t need to stop my erotic fantasies about you from becoming reality.”

Katara squealed when Zuko again scooped her up without warning, placed her over his shoulder so that she was lying on her stomach, and rapidly strode away from the shore.

“Zuko! Put me down!” she screamed as she playfully pounded his back with her fist and wiggled in his hold.

“Silence, woman,” Zuko teasingly demanded as he grabbed the back of her thighs to keep her in place.

“Make me!” Katara retorted as she wriggled even more wildly.

“Don’t tempt me, my love,” Zuko warned with a grin and then he lightly smacked her ass.

Katara gasped loudly, more out of shock than pain.

“Hey!” she protested.

Another light slap and a deep chuckle was his response. A smirk curling her lips, Katara lifted her hand and smacked his backside in retaliation. He froze in surprise and she burst into giggles.
“Oh, for that you shall suffer the consequences,” he growled out playfully and he quickened his pace until he was nearly running.

Katara shivered and her stomach clenched in anticipation as she remained still over his shoulder. Zuko practically bounded up the stairs to the beach house and Katara used her waterbending to extract the water from them so they would not wet the clean floors. They did not notice the shocked and amused gazes of the quiet servants as they passed by. Then Zuko burst into their room, slammed the door shut behind them before making his way to the bed. He gently dumped Katara on it and a gasp escaped her when he pounced on her and claimed her lips in an intoxicating kiss.

“Mm, I can’t get enough of you,” Zuko groaned against her mouth as his hands caressed and squeezed every inch of her.

“I know how you feel,” Katara responded with a soft moan as her hands tangled in his hair. It was growing longer and she loved being able to grab more of the silky strands.

After a few more ardent kisses, Zuko pulled away and sat back to stare at her lustfully as his hands slid down her shoulders to cup her covered breasts. His cock hardened painfully when Katara moaned.

“I hope you are ready for the consequences of your actions, waterbender,” he warned teasingly.

“Bring it on, firebender,” she retorted playfully.

“Oh, I will,” he promised huskily.

Moaning softly at the intense look he gave her, Katara’s eyes rolled back and she held her breath as his fingers came to rest lightly on the hem of her dark red bikini top. He gently hooked his fingers under it and slowly started to pull it up, exposing the bottom of her pert breasts. His cock hardened painfully when Katara moaned.

After a few more ardent kisses, Zuko pulled away and sat back to stare at her lustfully as his hands slid down her shoulders to cup her covered breasts. His cock hardened painfully when Katara moaned.

“I hope you are ready for the consequences of your actions, waterbender,” he warned teasingly.

“Bring it on, firebender,” she retorted playfully.

“Oh, I will,” he promised huskily.

Moaning softly at the intense look he gave her, Katara’s eyes rolled back and she held her breath as his fingers came to rest lightly on the hem of her dark red bikini top. He gently hooked his fingers under it and slowly started to pull it up, exposing the bottom of her pert breasts. Then with a growl, Zuko quickly pulled her bikini top over her head and groaned when her breasts bounced at the action. He bent down to plant hungry kisses all over her chest and soft mounds before he again pulled back, this time to drag the bottom of her swimsuit down her slender legs in order to have her completely naked before him. Then he was hovering above her again, resting between her legs, and kissing her senseless once more.

Katara mewled when their naked chests touched and his wet tongue invaded her mouth. She opened her eyes when he pulled his head away and she shivered as his hot breath coated over her face. She could see his well-defined arms and shoulders flexing as he held the weight of his body over her. Slowly, Zuko pushed his clothed erection against her, causing her to gasp loudly and buck her hips wildly to press him further into her aching center. She felt him trail one of his hands down her side before he moved his hand inward to touch her slick sex. She cried out and arched her back when he swiftly inserted two of his fingers inside her.

“Mm, you’re already so wet for me, my lovely wife,” he hummed lustfully.

“Always,” she purred before she gasped as he twisted his fingers along her clenching walls before she cried out when he made a scissoring motion inside her.

When it seemed as if she was about to find her release, Zuko quickly pulled out his fingers and smirked when she growled in disappointment. He glanced down to gaze at his fingers drenched with her juices before he glanced back to her strained features. He bent his head down and grazed her ear with his lips, before softly nibbling on her lobe, her panting breaths loud near his ear.

“I want to try something,” he whispered throatily.

“Like what?” she managed to say through her dazed mind as her passage trembled and ached with her interrupted climax.

Zuko did not reply and her thoughts scattered when he kissed her deeply once again before moving away from her mouth. He quickly divested himself of his swimming trunks before kissing her again. He moved downward and placed soft kisses on her heaving chest and down her lean stomach. She moaned and strained at his caresses. Once he reached her navel, his tongue slid out to dip in the tiny hollow. His tongue did a few delicate swirls, causing her muscles to quiver, before he blew gently against the damp circle. Katara gasped at the sensation. She felt him placed his hands around the deep curve of her waist, and then he shaped the roundness of her hips in his palms, caressing and kneading softly as he went another inch lower.

The feathery brush of her curls against his chin was a potent incentive and Zuko worked his mouth down even closer to her inviting warmth, ignoring her sudden jump of uncertainty. He had never done what he was about to do, but he had dreamed of pleasuring Katara in such a way. He slowly moved his mouth lower to the small patch of soft curls, her heady scent calling out to him, pleading him to taste the honeyed depths and pleasure the woman beneath him. He breathed in her slightly musky scent deeply and then groaned when his cock became even stiffer by the sweetness that was her essence.
“You smell so intoxicating, Katara,” he murmured in a husky tone.

As he kept his eyes on hers, Katara blushed when he pressed his nose into her lush curls and inhaled deeply.

“I want to know how you taste,” he growled throatily as he continued to hold her gaze.

The waterbender’s brow furrowed as she looked down at him incomprehensively.

Looking away from her curious gaze, Zuko gently pushed her legs wider apart before he continued down until his face was finally settled between her thighs.

Katara’s blue eyes widened in shock, her face turning a deep shade of red, once she understood what he intended to do.

“Zuko, stop!” she exclaimed in dismay and embarrassment.

Her hands went to his hair and she yanked his head up before closing her thighs tightly together. Mortified that Zuko would do such an act, Katara struggled frantically to escape him. Ignoring her struggles, Zuko quickly slid his hands up the insides of her thighs, gently urging her to part them again. When she refused, he slowly crawled back up her body and kissed her reassuringly.

“There’s nothing to be ashamed of, love,” he told her gently. “Open your legs for me,” he urged her between groans as he hungrily kissed her lips. “I’ve never done this before, but I want to pleasure you. Let me taste you and drink up your warm juices, Katara.”

Gasping against his hot mouth, Katara’s entire body flushed as his bold declaration made her feminine walls clenched in anticipation just as much as the erotic images that played in her mind at his words. Zuko broke their kiss and she watched as he again crawled down her body and caressed her upper thighs expectantly.

The waterbender decided to push her shyness aside and see what Zuko would do, though she was still embarrassed that he would dare to place his mouth in such an intimate place. Letting out a deep breath, she slowly parted her legs and allowed Zuko to again settle down between them.
Glancing at her with a pleased smile, Zuko spread her legs farther apart, revealing the swollen folds that hid the place that he loved to be buried in, and he breathed her in. He was rapidly becoming drunk by the intoxicating scent of her essence and he could not wait any longer to find out if she tasted as good as she smelled. He pressed his lips softly against her curls.

Katara sucked in a sharp breath as she felt him kiss her and her heart began to pound wildly in her chest. She shifted slightly, but he hooked his arms beneath her knees and pulled her closer to him. At the first touch of his mouth against her feminine folds, Katara jolted nervously, but Zuko grasped her thighs firmly and stopped her from pulling away from him.

Zuko reached down over her thighs and slowly slid his thumbs along her slick folds. He groaned at the sight of her pink flesh as he spread her open like a ripe, trickling peach. Looking up the line of her body, he could see Katara looking down at him with wide, blue eyes above her heaving breasts as he brought his mouth closer and closer to her wet core. Without any warning, Zuko slipped his tongue out, slid it up her slick folds and grazed the sensitive nub at the top of her hot center.

“Ah!” Katara cried out pleasantly at the sensation and she jerked. Zuko found himself loving her reaction.

“Mm,” he groaned at both the sound she made and her taste.

He would never have thought that the taste of her would be unbelievably erotic. Her nectar was tangy yet sweet.

“You taste so good, love,” he growled out against her sex, causing her to gasp at the sensation.

Katara groaned a halfhearted protest as he reached deeper into the wet cleft, searching for the heady taste of her body. Without another word, Zuko covered her enticing swollen folds with his mouth and tugged firmly with his teeth.

“Ohhh!” the waterbender gasped.

Once again, Zuko glided his tongue up her moist slit and applied a bit more pressure on both her entrance and her clit. He was rewarded with another soft cry and a fresh rush of juices seeping from her clenching pussy and leaking down the line of her firm ass.
“Uhhh,” she moaned as Zuko thrust his tongue into her slit, dipping slightly inside to collect a bit of her aroused cream before withdrawing only to do it again a moment later.

Katara let out a soft cry and Zuko chuckled pleasantly, causing his warm breath to roll against her opening. She whimpered as a delightful tremor racked her body. As Zuko ran his tongue through her folds again, she instinctively thrust her hips toward his mouth, anxious for more.

Zuko smiled against her damp flesh as Katara pressed herself closer to him. He pulled back slightly and he chuckled quietly when she groaned in frustration. He spread her drenched folds with his thumbs to reveal her clenching hole. Glancing back to her half-lidded eyes, Zuko lowered his head again to gently press his tongue more insistently against her entrance.

“Oh, gods, Zuko!” the waterbender mewled, as her body thrashed with the sensation of his warm tongue pressing against her opening.

Then her breath escaped her in a sharp cry when Zuko slid his tongue more firmly and deeply into her, rubbing against her quivering walls in extraordinarily wonderful ways. Zuko groaned as his tongue gathered more of her delicious essence as he swept insistently inside her before pulling away to drag it upwards to part her soaking lips and then to briefly touch her clt. Katara cried out again, and with a growl, his hot tongue began to rub up and down her slit.

Gods, her taste and the sounds she made as he pleasured her with his mouth caused his already stiff cock to harden excruciatingly. But he took his time. He wanted to learn what brought her the most pleasure as he explored her sweet, intimate place with his mouth.

Katara’s hips started undulating towards him once again as she mewled and whimpered, but Zuko immediately placed his hands on her hips and pinned them firmly against the bed to keep her still. The waterbender pressed her head back against the pillow and roughly bit her lip as she tried to keep from moving like he wanted. But when Zuko’s tongue once again dipped into her entrance, she bucked toward his wonderful mouth before she could stop it. As her cries resonated through the air, Zuko groaned softly against her wet skin, causing sizzling sparks to shoot from her center and spread throughout her body, before he pushed his tongue deep within her pussy at every thrust of her hips.

“Do you like that?” Zuko asked her with a growl as he flicked his tongue in rapid succession, “Do you like how I’m devouring your sweet, little pussy?”

“Y-yes,” Katara managed to moan out even as her cheeks blazed at his dirty words.
Zuko pulled back slightly before he latched his mouth against her engorged clit.

“Ahh, Zuko!” she yelped as he began to work his tongue and lips harder against her.

Having Zuko’s mouth, his wonderful tongue, tasting and touching her most intimate place felt so incredible, so unlike anything Katara ever imagined. Her stomach twisted into a tightly wound coil as the flame inside her leapt into a scorching inferno, so much like her husband’s element.

Encouraged by her passionate cries, Zuko sucked harder on her swollen nub as he pressed and rubbed his erection against the mattress to relieve some of his torture.

“Mmmm,” he groaned at the pleasure and he slurped up at her warm juices even more eagerly.

“Ohhhh!” Katara screamed and her hands flew into his hair as she ground his face into her. “Yes! So good!”

She felt her husband’s hands wrap tightly around her hips again, but instead of pushing them back down to keep her still like she thought, he hastily shoved his hands under her to grab her rear and jerked her upwards, sending her core colliding against his face.

“Oh, gods!” she gasped out as his tongue again swept deeply into her clenching passage. She locked her legs around his neck as she felt her orgasm approaching rapidly.

Zuko’s hands firmly gripped her ass, kneading her cheeks as he held her hips above the bed, causing her back to arch and her head to press hard against the pillow. Gods, he couldn’t get enough of her!

Katara felt Zuko growl and she let out a deep groan as he moved to pleasure her clit, occasionally sucking on it and kissing it with his lips or licking it and flicking it with his tongue. The sensations were overwhelming and the pleasure was assaulting her senses like a wild hurricane. That raging fire that was gathering in her stomach blazed into dangerous flames and she dug her toes into the bed just as she tightened her hold of Zuko’s hair as her walls began to pulse. She groaned when Zuko placed her hips back on the bed and moved his hands back up her thighs. But just when she thought the pleasure could not get any better, Zuko proved her wrong as he quickly inserted two of his fingers into her just as he firmly pressed his tongue onto her bundle of nerves.

“Ahhhh!” she cried out as she again thrust her hips toward his face as she felt the pressure of her
She looked down to see his dark head buried deeply between her legs and she moaned. She was so close. Her stomach was coiled painfully tight and her entire body was throbbing, desperately craving its glorious release.

And then, Zuko lifted his eyes, locked his impassioned gaze with hers, and thrust his fingers rapidly into her at the same time he scraped his teeth gently across her swollen bud.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed his name as she shattered with a fierce force, arching her back sharply as she threw her head back and rode the scorching waves of her climax. She felt the warmth of her release gush from her core and she moaned loudly as she writhed beneath him.

Zuko’s entire being shuddered with satisfaction when Katara cried out his name. His golden eyes smoldered heatedly as he watched her pussy spasm around his fingers as he continued his thrusting. Each time he pulled out, more of her cream coated his hand. A tremor ran through him of both pride and pleasure that he was able to please her. As his wife continued to ride her climax, Zuko removed his fingers from her quivering core and replaced it with his mouth. He groaned deeply against her pussy as he continued to rub his tongue along her clenching walls, coaxing all the honey she could give him into his mouth.

Katara shuddered and her eyes rolled back as his mouth only intensified her orgasm and sent hot tremors of ecstasy sparking throughout her body. She groaned with pleasure as she felt Zuko lapping every drop of her release with his tongue.

After it seemed as if he had licked her clean, Zuko pulled his head away and slowly, meticulously licked his lips. With one last, tender kiss on her swollen folds, Zuko crawled up her body to nuzzle her flushed cheek.

“Gods, Katara. You’re so delicious,” he crooned against her ear before he kissed her passionately.

Katara tasted herself on his tongue and found that it was not that bad or disgusting as she had thought—especially after the incredible pleasure he had given her. He pulled away and she opened her to eyes to see him.

“I have to take you now,” he growled out lustfully.
Katara was still dazed with her powerful climax that the only thing she could do was moan.

As her last tremors subsided, Zuko settled himself between her thighs and grabbed her hips in his large hands. Without another word, he swiftly pushed the head of his erection inside her still clenching sheath, and she gasped at the friction against her oversensitive flesh. Tightly swollen, Zuko had to fight her milking pussy in order to slide the entire length of his throbbing cock deep within her. He gave a pleased groan and Katara moaned deeply as they wrapped their arms around each other. Zuko pulled his hips back until only the tip of him remained inside her before he rammed himself back in, causing them both to groan and gasp. He did it again before he began to thrust into her in a fierce motion. Their bodies pressed tightly together until there was no space left between them as they rocked and bucked against each other while they hungrily kissed one another.

It was not long before Katara felt her stomach twist into another climax, and after a particular sharp thrust of Zuko’s hips, Katara screamed his name repeatedly. A few seconds later, Zuko stiffened and growled as he met his own end before collapsing atop his wife. Feeling the shudder of his release hitting deep within her womb, Katara sighed softly as she enfolded him in her arms.

Once he was completely spent, Zuko rolled onto his back with a groan as he continued to pant. He stared at the ceiling blankly for a moment before he moved to lie on his side propped up on his elbow and gazed down upon his shuddering Fire Lady. He again licked his lips at the fading taste of her and he smiled as he reached down to caress her flushed cheeks.

She opened her blue eyes and turned to give him a sated smile.

“I’m guessing I did excellent for being my first time doing such an act,” Zuko commented with a smug grin.

“That…that was…wow,” was the only thing she could get out.

Zuko chuckled quietly as he wrapped his arm around her and kissed her gently.

“Good, because I plan to pleasure you in such a way again, my little waterbender,” he vowed.

“You won’t hear any complaints from me,” she replied with a grin even as her cheeks turned a red hue as she snuggled into him.
The young Fire Lord chuckled again before he sobered up and a determined expression appeared on his face.

“Zuko?” Katara asked curiously at the sudden change of his mood.

“Despite what anybody else says and thinks, we are meant for each other, Katara,” he stated firmly and she knew he was referring to what he had heard in town earlier in the day. “I don’t care if they think you aren’t right for me because you are, you are perfect for me, you make me happy. And I promise that I will do everything in my power to give you a happy and wonderful life with me.”

Katara smiled as she reached up a hand to caress his face before gently touching his scarred cheek. She raised her head to lovingly press her lips against his.

“I know,” she responded softly but with conviction, “There will always be difficulties in life, but I know you will strive to make me happy, just as I will do anything to make you happy. They can say what they want, but we know the truth, and the truth is that we belong together.”

Zuko seemed to relax at her words and he let out a soft sigh. He pressed his forehead against hers and his golden eyes gazed long and deep into her ocean-blue eyes before he captured her lips in a gentle yet passionate kiss that spoke of unbreakable promises.

The rest of the night they spent making love to each other just as Zuko had fantasized about doing since he ask her to marry him.

Come what may, they would withstand everything that life threw at them. And they would do so together.

Katara discreetly pressed her napkin against her mouth to hide her yawn as a servant refilled her cup of juice before he stepped back with a smile when the Fire Lady thanked him. After taking a sip of the delicious tropical drink, Katara returned her attention to her breakfast, but just as quickly, her gaze shifted to Zuko who was sitting at her left, silently eating his own meal. She kept getting distracted by her husband’s mouth as he ate and occasionally darted his tongue out to lick his lips. She would feel her core clench as she continued to watch his mouth since it brought back to her mind how it had been her that he had eaten last night. She blushed at her thoughts and squirmed in her spot.

He had been insatiable the previous night as he kept her awake with round after round of lovemaking before he finally allowed her to sleep a few hours before dawn. Not that she was complaining. She loved every second of it and wanted more.

Her eyes once again moved to his mouth and she suppressed a whimper when his tongue darted out. Having his mouth pleasure her most intimate place in such a way had been amazing. It was incredible, such a scandalous act, and she hoped that he would do it again. She was glad that he had never done such a deed to another women and she felt smug at the thought that she was the only woman who had been honored with the touch of his skillful mouth. She wanted to return the favor.

Hearing Zuko call her name snapped Katara out of her thoughts and she quickly moved her gaze from his mouth to look into his eyes.

“Are you all right? Does the food not please you, my lady?” he asked her coolly with a raised eyebrow. But the gleam in his amber eyes and the slight twitch of one corner of his mouth let her know that he knew what she was thinking.

Katara cleared her throat delicately as a few servants turned to her in concern at their lord’s words.

“I am fine, thank you, my lord,” she replied calmly as she returned to eating. She then smiled reassuringly at the servants. “And the food is delicious.”

The servants relaxed.

“Yes, very delicious,” the Fire Lord repeated as he took a sip of his drink.

Something in his tone made Katara pause in eating and look back at him. His eyes were smoldering over the rim of his cup as he stared at her before he lowered it and slowly, deliberately, ran his tongue across his lower lip. Katara’s eyes widened and she blushed deeply once she realized he was repeating the same words he had said about her when he had brought her to ecstasy with his mouth.

If the servants were not around she would have lunged at him and attack his lips with her own for teasing her. But instead she just smiled at him before continuing with her meal.

“I would like to take you sailing today,” Zuko’s stoic voice again brought her out of her thoughts, “Would that please you?”
“Yes,” Katara responded enthusiastically, “That sounds exciting.”

Zuko allowed a small, pleased smile to touch his lips and Katara returned his smile with a wide one of her own.

After the meal, Zuko took her to the beach where a servant was waiting beside a low sailing boat that bobbed gently with the waves. Zuko helped his excited wife climb in before he jumped in after her. Then with a nod of his head, the servant pushed the boat into the water before climbing in once they passed the waves. They spent the next few hours soaking up the sun and enjoying the salty breeze that ruffled their hair and clothes as the servant expertly maneuvered the small vessel above the water. Zuko watched contentedly as Katara would lean down over the low edge to skim her fingers on the ocean’s surface or used her waterbending to trail ribbons of water after them with a happy laugh.

Just as the sun began to set, Zuko ordered the servant to take them back, and a few minutes later, they were once again walking on the shore and heading to the beach house. They arrived just in time to take quick baths and change clothes before they were served their dinner. Then they headed toward their rooms to retire for the night.

As soon as the door was locked behind them, Zuko lunged at Katara and pinned her on the bed underneath him as he took possession of her mouth.

“I want to taste you again,” he told her huskily.

“Yes,” she moaned, “Please.”

Before Katara knew what was happening, Zuko had divested them of their clothes, lifted her so that she was sitting at the edge of the bed, and had eagerly spread her thighs widely apart as he knelt on the floor and settled his head between them. The sensation of the cool air of the room hitting her heated sex had her shuddering and moaning. He plunged a finger into her and she arched her back with a cry. He pumped furiously before inserting another finger, causing her to wail and throw her head back in pleasure. He pulled them away a second later, and holding her gaze, he placed his drenched fingers into his mouth and sucked. Katara moaned as she stared at him. She had no idea such a sight could be so arousing. Once he had cleaned his fingers of her sweet nectar, Zuko pulled them away from his mouth and grinned wickedly at her. She shuddered.

He wrapped his arms up around her thighs, holding her still, and his head dipped low into the space he had created for himself. Katara placed her hands out behind her to keep her up as she watched him. He swept through her soft curls with short, coaxing touches of his tongue. Then he stroked her soaked slit, teasing her sweet softness.

Pulling away slightly, Zuko then parted her drenched feminine folds with his thumbs and licked his lips as he stared intently at the swollen pink flesh, glistening with the combination of her juices and his saliva. He watched as her tiny hole clenched and unclenched, wanting to be filled by him. With a husky growl, he swiftly leaning his head down to plunge his tongue inside her. Katara cried out as she felt her center throb. Zuko groaned as her passage clenched around his tongue. He continued to firmly caress her inner walls before pulling away. Then he was kissing, licking, nibbling, and sucking from her clit to her tight, quivering pussy.

“Ah, Zuko, mm!” she mewled as her hand reached down to grab his hair. “Yes…y-yes, just like…that!”

Zuko groaned she gripped his hair tightly and her hips bucked in her pleasure. He moaned as he tasted her essence again, he could not get enough of her and her reactions to his touch. There was only one word he could think of:

_Delicious._

She was so warm, compliant, and beautiful as he loved her with his mouth, lips, and tongue as he had done the previous night, becoming more acquainted with her body and its responses. He again entered her with his fingers and he smirked when she bucked her hips and whimpered. After a few strokes, he replaced his fingers with his tongue once again before bringing his hand coated with her essence down to his thick erection to spread along his length. As he stroked himself with a deep groan, smearing her juices along his sensitive tip with his thumb, Zuko firmly flicked his tongue against her folds and then furiously lapped at her sex before burying his tongue deep inside to taste her fully.

With a soft cry, Katara fell back upon the bed, clenching the sheets tightly with her hands as the sensations shook her entire body. Releasing his aching cock, Zuko hooked his arms beneath her knees and pulled her closer to him, so that her enticing ass was resting on the edge of the bed and her slender legs were resting over his shoulders.

“Z-Zuko,” she moaned breathlessly.

The firebender insistently inserted his tongue into her wet pussy, and a few seconds later, his wife was thrashing and bucking on the bed as she reached her climax. Zuko eagerly drank up her juices, but before he could go any further and bring her into another release, he felt Katara pull at his hair. He reluctantly leaned his head away to stare inquisitively up at her as he licked his lips.

After recuperating from her pleasure, Katara sat up. She moaned as her gaze became riveted by the sight of his mouth and chin glistening wetly with her aroused cream. She really wanted him to continue, but she wanted to do something before she lost her courage. Removing her legs from his shoulders, she smiled at him as he raised an eyebrow at her. With another pull of his hair, she finally managed to coax him to stand up, even though he was frowning as he did so.

Katara bit her lip as Zuko’s turgid cock came to the level of her face before she stood up on shaky legs. She wrapped her arms around Zuko and he immediately wound his arms around her as she kissed him. Again she tasted herself on his tongue, but she ignored it in favor of something better as she subtly turned Zuko until his back was facing the bed. She pulled away and his eyes searched hers as he held her to him. She smiled coyly at him, and the eagerness that ignited in his golden eyes made her sensitive core ache. With one gentle push from her, Zuko sat down on the edge of the bed, and although he was looking up at her in confusion, there was a fire in his eyes.

“Let me pleasure you,” Zuko heard her say softly, though he could hear the shyness in her tone. Curious, he let himself relax a bit, even though his throbbing length was demanding he find release within her folds.

Katara’s gaze moved from his intense amber orbs and his handsome features, down his alabaster, muscular torso, caressing every ridge of his muscled stomach, until her eager eyes landed on his impressive length that seemed to be straining toward her. She felt her mouth water and she suppressed a moan.

He was so perfect and he was all hers.

Again her wet center ached to be filled by him, but for the moment Katara ignored it. She wanted to know what it felt like to take him into her mouth and taste that part of him that brought her so much pleasure. Jiao had hinted at it that morning as the servant dressed her when Katara had subtly asked about what women could do to pleasure their men. Katara wished to see if she could bring Zuko great pleasure by using only her mouth, lips, and tongue just like he had done to her.

She bit her lip in uncertainty. She had no experience or idea on how to proceed, but she hoped that some feminine instincts would guide her. But what if she did it wrong and ended up displeasing him? Yet she could not deny that she wanted to know how it felt to have him in her mouth, to taste him, to bury her nose in the dark curls, and breathe deeply of his musky, masculine scent.
It seemed she had been lost in her thoughts longer than she thought for she heard Zuko hoarsely call out her name. She glanced up at her husband’s face to see his strained features and his clenched jaw.

Zuko had been wondering about what was going through his waterbender’s head as she stood unmoving before him, but when her gaze became fixated on his aching cock, he felt like he was going to go insane with lust. Why was she not doing anything? Before he could grab her to him so he could finally bury himself inside her, his wife positioned herself between his legs and leaned down a little to place a deep kiss on his lips. He groaned into her mouth as she ran her hands down his chest and caressed his abdomen. His mind became hazy with the heady kiss she was bestowing on him, but then she pulled away and he opened half-lidded eyes to look at her.

She smiled diffidently at him as she slid her hands down his chest, letting her fingers trail the path of his defined upper body. Silent and intense, Zuko watched her as she dragged her fingers along his muscular stomach before she sank down to her knees between his legs, so that her face came close to his hard shaft. His breathing accelerated and he felt his stomach tighten as he waited to see what she had in mind.

Admiring his erection once again, Katara raised a hand and lightly touched the length of him with her fingers, causing him to let out a deep groan, before she firmly grasped him just how he liked it. Zuko hissed and bucked his hips into her small hand. She stroked him for a moment as he panted above her and she thought it was so erotic to be sitting there and gazing onto Zuko’s incredible shaft. She was unable to stifle her moan at the arousing sight of another small, white drop of liquid oozing from the slit and clinging to the darkish head of his erection, glistening temptingly in the candlelight. Gathering her courage, Katara leaned forward and tentatively licked his wet tip with her tongue.

“Ah, Katara!” Zuko cried out in both shock and pleasure as he stared down at her with wide eyes.

Katara pulled back slightly and swallowed. It wasn’t exactly good, but it wasn’t bad either. She decided after a moment that she liked the way he tasted as the salty and spicy taste of him hit her taste buds. She looked up into his smoldering eyes and smiled.

“You taste so good, my love,” she purred at him, repeating what he had told her the previous day.

Zuko groaned as her words caused his cock to jerk and he shuddered. Katara was amazed that anything could make this strong, sometimes ruthless but perfect man tremble, least of all her. The waterbender leaned back down and gently swirled her tongue around his swollen head before she took the tip into her mouth.

“Gods, yes!” Zuko groaned as his fingers clutched tightly onto the sheets beneath him in order to stop himself from thrusting his cock between her soft, plump lips.

A fine tremor overtook his body as something he had fantasized about so many times finally became a reality. The sight of Katara kneeling naked between his legs and the sensation of her hot mouth enveloping his cock stunned him. He had never felt anything so incredible before except for the sensation of being inside his wife’s tight, wet sheath. Yet this feeling was so new to him and he loved it. He had never thought that a woman’s mouth could be so amazing before Katara. The feeling of her tongue as she slid it along his shaft had him shuddering and his heart pounding hard in his chest.

Katara released his tip and began to lick her way down his shaft before coming back up, smiling when he again let out a moan. Rolling her tongue over the bulbous tip once again, she coaxed a few more drops of his arousal to fall upon her tongue. The only word that she could think of to describe his taste was that it was so deliciously male. She lifted her eyes and saw that he was watching her intently as he panted and trembled from the pleasure she was giving him. She smiled inwardly in triumph.

Panting harshly, Zuko watched as Katara pulled back slightly to plant a gentle kiss on his weeping tip as she held his gaze before she opened her lips and took his length into her mouth as far as she could.

“Uuhh!” Zuko growled out deeply as he laced his fingers through Katara’s chocolate tresses.

It was so hot and tight. It felt so good. When her warm mouth closed more tightly around his shaft, the capability for rational thought fled his mind as he grabbed the sheets beneath him with his other hand more tightly as if they were a lifeline.

Unable to draw his entire length into her mouth, Katara sighed softly around the hard flesh. Her jaw ached a little since she had to open her mouth wide to accommodate his girth, but she ignored the slight discomfort.

Consumed with arousal, Zuko breathed hard as he watched Katara pull away, and he groaned in disappointment as the silky heat of her mouth vanished. Then he growled when she leaned forward to capture the traces of liquid that she had managed to coax from his rigid body before she again took him into her mouth and swirled her tongue around him.

Fuuuuuck, he mentally cursed.
Panting, he watched as his waterbender looked up to see him watching her as she cupped his heavy sac within her palm. His eyes became half-lidded in response to the gentle massage of her fingers, mouth, and tongue. She tugged his tender flesh experimentally and she was rewarded with a strangled groan. Katara moaned against him as her body reacted to his obvious pleasure. Zuko gasped when she wrapped her fingers around the length that she could not fit into her mouth and began to stroke it reverently. He moaned her name as he felt a bit more of his arousal seep out.

Katara moaned as the taste of her husband’s essence filled her mouth again, and Zuko groaned deeply from above her. The firebender entwined his fingers in her hair and gently thrust his length into her mouth. The gentle pull of his fingers in her hair caused Katara to moan softly, and she felt her husband’s body shudder as his erection jolted inside her mouth. Desire flaring within her, Katara immediately began to pump her lips up and down his length, pressing her tongue firmly up against his shaft.

“Yes, Katara!” Zuko moaned from above her as his grip on her hair tightened. “That feels so damn good.”

He looked down at her, locking his eyes with hers as her head bobbed up and down on his cock, slick now with her saliva, while her hand stroked his base. Agni, the sensations were so unbelievable, not to mention the erotic sight of her pleasuring him with her mouth with equal fascination displayed in her eyes. She was so magnificent in that moment that he would not have been able to look away even if the world was coming to an end. He was reduced to panting, groaning, and growling, unable to stop the way the muscles in his legs jumped and his cock jerked as his pleasure mounted to sweltering levels. What she lacked in experience, his wife certainly made up for it by utter, determined enthusiasm.

Her husband’s scorching gaze and his pleasured groans caused Katara’s wet walls to clench tightly and she trembled as her desire leapt. His pleasure was making the fiery heat of her lust begin to engulf her completely. It consumed her so much that she began to rub her lips furiously up and down his engorged length.

Zuko growled as he watched her, and then he felt her force him deeper into her mouth until he felt his tip strike the back of her throat.

“Oh, gods!” he shouted in pleasure.

Pausing, Katara suppressed her gagging reflex as she watched as Zuko’s eyes rolled back before he dropped his head back and his mouth fell open. Still pumping him with her hand, she pulled away to catch her breath before she once again engulfed him into her mouth as much as she could as she continued to watch him intensely.
Snapping his head back down, his eyes met hers once again and Katara felt her stomach clench. His golden eyes were a dark amber imbued with passion, his lips were pressed together, and his jaw was clenched tightly as he stared down at her. She felt him push her head faster onto him as he began to thrust himself into her mouth.

“Yes, Katara, yes,” he chanted between clenched teeth before he growled thickly, “Just like that. Suck me harder!”

Oh, gods, the pleasure was incredible. He was so close! But he was not sure if she would like it if he released himself into her mouth.

Her husband’s guttural words caused wetness to gush from her pussy and Katara moaned. With each throb of his erection, her body grew hotter until the fierce flames of her desire raged in her core, causing her aroused fluids to flow from her folds and down her thighs.

“K-Katara, stop…” Zuko gasped out even though what he wanted was the complete opposite. He halfheartedly tried to push her away from him. “I’m…oh, Agni…about to…uuuh…come!”

He growled when Katara ignored his weak attempts to dislodge her, and instead, increased her pace a bit as she let out a deep moan. The vibration of Katara’s moan caused his thick shaft to throb and Zuko growled fiercely as he began to pump his cock into her mouth with more force while his hand tangled tightly in her hair.

Katara knew he was close and she met his thrusts eagerly, taking him deeply while she stroked him within her small fist. His erection was hard and fully swollen. She desperately wanted to bring him to release.

Zuko was growling and panting as he watched Katara with unrestrained desire, and he felt his shaft pulse as she met his lustful gaze with one of determination and elation. When he thought the sensation could not get any better, Katara proved him wrong. She sucked his length firmly as her hand squeezed him and then she hummed.

“Katara!” he growl violently as he gripped her head to hold her in place as he felt his release shoot up his cock and into her mouth.

Katara’s eyes widened when Zuko’s hot semen burst into her mouth with such force that she was unable to swallow quickly, causing a little to dribble from the corner of her mouth. Although his hand held her head firmly in place as he jerked his hips into her mouth, she could not help but moan around him as he came for her. She continued to caress his pulsing length with her tongue as she fervently swallowed every drop he had to offer.

With each pulse of his release, Zuko’s hips jolted upwards, stroking his cock jerkily between his wife’s wonderful lips as he rode the waves of his climax. Once his orgasm subsided, he slowly released Katara’s hair as he limply fell back onto the bed on his elbows and panted, feeling as if his entire energy had been sapped from his body. He felt Katara pull away before she placed a gentle kiss on his now semi-flaccid cock and he shuddered at the sensation. He opened his eyes to stare down at her and groaned at the sight of her swollen lips and flushed cheeks as her eyes gleamed with new knowledge and unadulterated, wanton desire.

Katara almost swooned from the lusty smirk that appeared on her husband’s face as he again sat up and looked down at her as she remained kneeling between his legs. She felt her aching walls quiver. Reaching toward her face, Zuko swiped the remnants of his semen from her chin to the corner of her mouth with his thumb before he gently pressed it to her lips. He watched as Katara quickly opened her mouth and gently sucked his thumb, licking her hot tongue around the digit, before swallowing.

With a growl, his arms flashed out and he grabbed her by the arms to haul her roughly up to him, before spinning them around and pinning her beneath him. Before she could speak, Zuko’s lips crashed to hers. When she gasped he swiftly thrust his tongue deeply in her mouth, stroking the wet appendage against hers as he rubbed her lips frantically with his. He groaned at the strange taste of himself on his wife’s tongue, and he felt her shiver fiercely against him as she wrapped her slender limbs around him. He felt her ground her wet pussy against him, but he knew he had to wait a moment before he could recuperate from such an intense orgasm. They pulled away from devouring each other to gather some air and they panted hard against the other.

“Agni, Katara,” he groaned against her lips, “You are incredible.”

“And you are simply delicious,” Katara quipped with a grin.

Zuko chuckled quietly since that was the word he used to describe her taste. Settling himself beside her, he brushed his lips roughly against hers as he wrapped her tightly in his arms.

“That was even better than I ever imagined,” he whispered against her mouth.
Katara leaned her head back slightly to look at him curiously.

“You mean I did better than what you thought I would?” she asked.

“No,” Zuko said, “I meant that my fantasy of such an act, of imagining you taking my cock into your mouth, is nothing compared to the real thing.”

Katara’s blue eyes widened in surprise as she stared into his gleaming, golden eyes.

“Are you saying that…you’ve never experienced it before?” she asked quietly, her heart racing.

“I told you that I was going to experience many firsts with you,” he reminded her softly.

“You’ve already experienced many firsts with me,” she mused curiously as she held his gaze, “It makes me wonder about what you have done…before.”

She felt a small pinch in her heart and looked away before Zuko could see the hurt and jealousy in her eyes. She felt her ardor cool. She really needed to get over his past. But it was so difficult. She felt him grabbed her chin gently before turning her back so she could look into his eyes.

“If it will make you finally stop wondering about my past, then I’ll tell you that what I’ve done before, we have already done,” he told her firmly.

“What’s that?” Katara asked hesitantly.

“Before you I’ve only…found my release in the traditional position and no other way,” he confessed before he smiled wryly, “Well, except with my hand when I was longing for you.”

“Really?” Katara asked incredulously.

“I told you that I only sought the quickest way for sexual release and nothing more,” he again reminded her, “And I’ve already confessed to you that I’ve only come inside you instead of…on the sheets. It’s only with you that I learned there are many different ways to receive and give pleasure.”
The implications of what Zuko had just said made that small ache in Katara’s chest disappear as she realized that Zuko was exploring the wonders of sexual intimacy with her just like she was with him. It made her heart swell with happiness at the fact that he was only hers and that only she would ever know him thusly. She felt her body once again heat up with her joy and arousal.

“I’m glad to know that,” she said breathlessly as she kissed him deeply, “I can’t wait to see what other firsts we can discover together.”

Zuko groaned against her mouth as he felt his shaft twitch and then immediately harden. He didn’t think that was possible.

“You know what’s another first?” he asked her huskily as he nibbled on her lower lip. “I’ve only wanted round after round of lovemaking with you and the thought of stopping actually hurts me.”

Katara giggled softly before she smiled sultrily up at him.

“Then come here, my lord,” she purred as she pulled him atop her, “I’ll make the hurt go away.”

“I know you will, my lady,” he responded with a wicked smirk.

Throughout the rest of the night, Zuko proved to his wife that she was the only one that mattered to him, and that because of her, he found out he was insatiable. And Katara enthusiastically proved to her husband that she could be just as insatiable as him and only because of him.

“Oh, Zuko! It’s so amazing!” Katara enthused as she spread her arms wide to indicate the scenery before them.

“Yes, it is,” the young lord agreed as he took in the sight.

Standing among tall grass that reached to their ankles, they stood upon the edge of a high cliff on the eastern side of the island that overlooked the great ocean. From their high vantage point they could see the houses of the town far off behind them, and below them, they viewed the jagged rocks where the foamy waves crashed before retreating. The sun was rising on the horizon, painting the sky and the few wispy clouds a soft pink and lavender hue while the sun’s golden rays made the dark water sparkle.

Zuko glanced at Katara, admiring the soft colors that touched her lovely features and the way the salty sea breeze made the strands of her hair dance around her. It was the last day of their honeymoon before they had to return to their duties and he wanted to do something special for his wife. Seeing her enthralled expression, he could not help but smirk.

After allowing her to sleep for two hours after another vigorous session of lovemaking, he had gently woken Katara up and told her to get dressed in something warm and comfortable. She had scowled and snapped at him to let her sleep before she burrowed deeper into the blankets.

Undeterred, he had pulled the blankets away from her, exposing her nude body to the chilly air and again told her to wake up. She had curled into herself, determined to continue sleeping, before she reluctantly sat up to glare groggily at him. She had tersely asked him why they needed to dress when the sun was not even up yet, but he had only told her it was a surprise. Grumbling, she had tiredly rolled out of bed before standing up to find something to wear just as he did. She had still been grumbling when he led her out of the beach house and into the carriage that waited for them. She had muttered a reply when Shen and Kuo had greeted her upon their komodo rhinos before climbing inside the carriage. Zuko had exchanged a brief amused look with his personal guards before he followed after his irritated wife. She had instantly dozed off as the carriage left the royal beach house property, past the sleepy town, and out into the uninhabited part of the island.

An hour or so later, he shook her gently and told her they had arrived. She had allowed him to help her out before she frowned when they came upon a hillside before her eyes widened in incredulity when he told her they were going to climb to the top. She had given him such a frigid stare that, for a moment, he actually thought she was going to freeze him to a tree. He pretended not to notice, however, as he told his guards to wait for them before he gently took her hand and tugged her after him, urging her to quicken her pace before they missed it. It took them a few minutes to climb, especially since it was still dark, before they finally reached the top of the cliff, just in time to see the sunrise.

“Is it amazing enough to ignore some lack of sleep?” he asked her amusedly as he came out of his thoughts.

He watched as his wife’s cheeks turn a soft red, probably in embarrassment for her grouchy behavior from before. She gave him a small smile of apology.

“Yes and thank you,” she told him happily before she slightly narrowed her eyes at him, “But next time at least let me get some rest from your insatiable appetite before you drag me out of bed before the sun is up.”
“I make no promises,” he retorted with a wicked grin.

Katara rolled her eyes at him—although she admitted there was nothing for her to complain about—before she turned around again so she could admire the splendor of dawn. She felt her husband move behind her before he wrapped his arms around her middle, pulling her against him and resting his chin on her head. With a soft sigh, the waterbender leaned her head back on his chest and placed her hands above his arms, enjoying the warmth he provided her against the chilly air. The world may think that Zuko was a harsh, cold, and unfeeling person, but she knew he was the complete opposite—at least, when it came to her. She loved him for it and vowed to herself that she would always show him her appreciation and love for his loving gestures.

Even if he dragged her out of bed before dawn.

“Before my mother…passed away,” she began softly after a moment of silence, “Our family was a very happy one. We all loved each other so much, but nothing could be compared to the love my dad and mom shared. I remember I would wake up at night to see my parents cuddled before the fire wrapped up in a fur blanket. My dad would whisper in her ear and my mom would smile as she raised her head to look at him.”

Zuko squeezed her softly as he listened to her talk in a nostalgic tone. He appreciated the fact that Katara always felt comfortable enough with him to talk about her mother and show how much she still missed her. It had been the same way with him before he found his own mother after so many years of missing her.

“The love that shown in their eyes always fascinated me and the sorrow that later appeared in my dad’s eyes when she was gone brought a pain to my heart. But it was something that I didn’t fully understand at that time,” she continued, the sea breeze carrying her soft voice toward Zuko’s ears.

“But as I got older and I listened to the women’s stories of brave warriors and the great feats they did because of their women’s love made me long for what my mom and dad had. I wanted a love as deep as the ocean, but I never held hope that I would find it because I was afraid I would lose it to the war.”

“Just like your father lost his,” Zuko murmured quietly.

“Yes,” Katara replied softly before she lifted her head.
Zuko looked down to gaze into her blue eyes, but instead of finding sadness or melancholy in their sapphire depths he was surprised to find a quiet happiness.

“But now I understand the love that appeared in my parents’ eyes when they looked at each other,” the brunette continued softly, “Because I’m sure it’s the look that shines in our own eyes.”

An affectionate smile spread across the Fire Lord’s lips before he bent down to tenderly kiss his wife’s mouth.

“Now you share a love that can’t be measured by the depths of the sea,” he whispered against her lips.

Katara smiled pleasantly as her heart gave a joyful leap at his words before she turned around to once again stare at the dawning sky and the calm sea below. If her mother were still alive she would have been so delighted to see how happy her daughter was. Kya would have greatly approved of Zuko.

Silently, they stood facing the horizon for a few more hours before Zuko turned her toward him. His arms still wrapped around her, he leaned down and Katara raised herself on tiptoes to meet his lips. They kissed slowly, unhurriedly, but with a soft, simmering passion. When they pulled apart, Zuko tucked a few flying strands of her hair behind her ear before he sighed.

“We have to pack our things for our return to the palace tomorrow,” he said, his tone once again cool.

Katara felt their happy bubble burst as reality intruded upon them. She frowned slightly before she mentally shook her head. They had responsibilities they had to look into, but she was sure that that would not stop them from enjoying each other’s company. She rose on her toes to peck his lips before she smiled at him.

“Then let’s go pack,” she said, “Besides, I miss Uncle Iroh and Lady Ursa.”

Zuko’s lips turned up into a small smile. He took hold of her hand and, interlacing their fingers together, he led her away from the cliff and back down the small trail to their awaiting guards and carriage.
Just as they spotted them, Zuko tensed and quickly brought Katara close to his side as he just as quickly pulled out one of his swords and held it before them.

“What is it?” Katara asked in concern as she moved her hand to her waterskin at her hip.

“I thought I heard something,” Zuko said in a low tone as he stared hard at a cluster of bushes where he had heard a rustle.

He opened his mouth to demand who the coward was hiding behind the bushes when a jackal-fox darted out, stared at them for a second, and then raced away in another direction. Katara and Zuko glanced at each other before they relaxed.

“Is everything all right, my lord?” they heard Shen ask.

He and Kuo had raced toward the royal couple when they saw their lord pull out his sword. Both guards went to stand on either side of them as they scanned the area carefully.

“It was just an animal,” Zuko responded coolly as he replaced his sword back into its sheath, though he did not let go of Katara.

Both guards relaxed slightly before they escorted them back to the carriage. Once he helped Katara climb in, Zuko glanced back toward the cliff before he shook his head and climbed inside to sit beside his wife, pulling her close to his side to reassure himself that everything was fine.

He missed the two pairs of eyes peeking from the bushes.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Once they returned to the beach house, the couple ate breakfast before they started packing their most personal things. Once they did, they allowed the servants to finish packing the rest of their belongings and the small souvenirs Katara had purchased during their stay on the island.

Once noon approached, Zuko proposed they have lunch in town as Jiao and a few servants gathered the last of their things so they could be placed on the flagship. When Katara did not immediately respond, Zuko turned away from packing his dual broadswords to look at her. Her blue eyes were large and innocent, but he could see the impish smile on her lips. He narrowed his eyes at her. He knew she had something in mind.
“Can we have a picnic at the beach instead?” she asked softly, beseechingly.

The servants paused, attentively listening to what their lord decided so they could make the arrangements.

“I would really like it if we spent our last day with only the two of us,” the Fire Lady continued. “Please, my lord?”

There was something about Katara being so formal with him that delighted Zuko to no end. As Fire Lord, he was used to his subjects treating him with respect and addressing him with formality. However, listening to his wife, a master waterbender who helped end the war and the only woman who was able to capture his heart, speak to him in such a way empowered him beyond his imagination.

“If it would please you, my wife,” he acquiesced, unable to deny any of her requests—especially when she was looking so innocently at him like that.

Katara beamed at him.

“Thank you, my lord,” she said as she lowered her eyes demurely, which Zuko knew was just to excite him.

He glanced at his servants who immediately bowed and hurried out of the room so they could make the preparations for their picnic. He looked back at Katara only to see her walking to the bathroom with a new blue bathing suit in her hand before she flashed him a grin as she closed the door.

Zuko raised an eyebrow since he had thought all their belongings were packed before he looked around the room to see if he could spot his swimming trunks, and sure enough, he found them laying across the arm of the small couch. Zuko frowned before he chuckled as he shook his head. Katara had known he was going to agree with her. The minx.

An hour later, they were sitting on a blanket beneath a large beach umbrella and eating a light and refreshing lunch. However, Zuko barely paid attention to the food as he watched Katara eat. Now he understood why she had been unable to look away from him as they ate breakfast the previous morning when he had pleasured her orally the night before. Every time she would lick her lips or suck on a piece of fruit, he was reminded of how it had been him that she had sucked on last night.
He had been unable to stop thinking about it since he woke up.

The sensation of having Katara pleasure him with her mouth had been unbelievable. Even thinking about it made his loins twitch. His imagination of how great it would feel had been completely off. Although it wasn’t as amazing as being inside her wet, silken core, he sure hoped that Katara would please him with her mouth again many more times. He had heard that some women hated the act and he fervently hoped Katara wasn’t one of them. But by the moans she had made and the triumphant look she had given him when he came, he was sure that she enjoyed it as much as he enjoyed pleasuring her.

He was brought out of his thoughts when Katara asked him if he was finished eating so they could build a sandcastle. He opened his mouth to protest that the Fire Lord did not build sandcastles, but he sighed in surrender when she again turned her huge, blue eyes on him. Really, he needed to find a way to become immune to that look.

Although they didn’t have Aang or Toph’s earthbending skills, they thought they did a pretty good job in creating a decent sandcastle. Once satisfied, they spent the next few hours swimming, basking in the sun’s rays, and sparring.

After distracting Zuko with a wave, Katara laughed as she raced away from him and ran along the shore, sprinting further away from the beach house. She heard Zuko growl as he pursued her. It reminded both of that game of chase they had when they were in the Earth Kingdom after having escaped the rebels. It seemed like such a long time ago.

Katara cursed inwardly when her path was blocked by some huge rocks. To her left was the forest that was part of the beach house property and to her right was the ocean. Just when she decided to race into the water, she squealed when Zuko grabbed her around the waist and spun her around in his arms with a deep chuckle.

“You should know by now that I will always catch you,” he whispered in her ear in a husky tone.

“That’s what I was hoping for,” she purred.

Zuko chuckled as he gave her a squeeze before letting her go. They sat down to catch their breaths and enjoy the cool breeze that swept through them.

“Do you remember when I caught you off guard and doused you with a wave last summer?” Katara asked with a grin as she turned to rest on her side with her elbow propping her up so she could look down at Zuko. The water was lapping at their legs as they lay on the shore, letting the late afternoon sun soak into their skin.

When Zuko made a noncommittal sound as he lay on his back with his eyes closed, the waterbender’s grin widened.

“I still say your expression was priceless,” she continued amusedly.

Zuko opened one eye to glare at her, but it only caused her to laugh. When his glare intensified as he opened his other eye, Katara leaned down to press a kiss to his lips before pulling back. She watched as his expression softened as he reached up to touch her lips.

“Thanks,” he said.

“For what?” she asked curiously, captivated by the soft look in his golden eyes.

“Because of you I can laugh and play around more easily,” he said, “Because of you I know what happiness is like.”

Katara gently grabbed his wrist, where the wristband she had given him was, and turned her head so she could kiss his palm.

“And I’ll do anything for it to remain that way,” she promised fervently.

Zuko’s eyes became smoldering embers at her words. She was his and he was hers, and it would be so until forever. Tangling his hand in her wet hair, he kissed her deeply. Katara moaned. Without breaking their intense kiss, the hand that had been gently grabbing her head started to slide down her face, her neck, over her shoulder and down her arm until it settled on the exposed skin of her waist. Katara sighed softly as she moved closer to him, delighting in the sensation of his hand on her flesh. In response, his hand trailed slowly up and down her side, heating her more with his touch, before he slid his hand down to caress her upper thigh.

Gently, Zuko guided her onto her back on the wet sand as his hand continued to stroke her. Ever so slowly, his hand slipped higher until his thumb was grazing the side of her covered breast. Katara gasped as the contact caused her nipples to instantly harden. The firebender pulled his head back and looked down at her, his golden eyes ablaze with lust. Katara moaned. Her husband’s alabaster skin was gleaming under the sunlight and his raven hair was wet and disheveled from their swim and recent run. Without breaking eye contact, he grasped her breast, kneading the soft mound before he gently pinched her nipple. Katara arched her back and whimpered as again that flame ignited in her belly.

“Katara,” he breathed before he again swooped down to kiss her.

Katara moaned into his mouth and the sound seemed to spark something in his sunlit eyes for he brought her roughly up against him, grinding his hard erection against her covered sex, as he devoured her mouth.

The waterbender’s hands flew to his dark hair before sliding down his strong shoulders, raking her nails down the muscles of his solid back. Zuko took a shuddering breath at the slight pain and then he leaned down to place hot kisses across the swell of her breasts.

“I need you, Katara,” he growled lowly as he pressed himself desperately against her.

“Then let’s go to our room,” she panted as she looked at his strained features.

“No,” he rasped, “I can’t wait. I want you now.” With a deep groan he pulled her closer, possessing her mouth hungrily.

“Zuko…” Katara breathed uncertainly, “Someone might see us.”

“This is private property, no one is allowed to come here,” he reassured her, “I have guards patrolling the area at all the times. I also ordered the servants to remain near the house for today. No one will see us.”

When she continued to look at him with an unconvinced expression, he frowned slightly.

“Do you really think I’ll allow anyone to see what only I can see and touch?” he asked her with a low growl.
Then he bent down to gently brush his lips to hers.

“I want to make love to you with the sunlight warming our skin and with the ocean waves cooling us,” he said softly.

Katara moaned softly and immediately relaxed against him, trusting him wholeheartedly. Zuko groaned in triumph at her surrender and kissed her ardently. He knelt back and again reached for her breasts, squeezing them softly, before he pulled her bikini top down so that the blue fabric was cupping her exposed breasts. He groaned at the sight of her dusky tips already hardened in arousal before he leaned down to gently suck on one while he rolled the other between his thumb and forefinger.

“Mmm,” the brunette moaned as she placed her hands behind his head. “Uhhh.”

The feeling of the wet sand beneath her and the cool water brushing against her legs in contrast with the warmth of Zuko’s masculine body above hers and her own rising temperature caused a spark of pleasure to tingle up and down her spine. Her firebender moved away from her sensitive breasts and looked up at her. Her breath caught in her throat at the sight of his eyes dark with passion.

“I’m going to make love to you now, Katara,” he murmured huskily.

“Yes, Zuko, please,” she pleaded breathlessly.

He knelt back between her legs and took in the sight of her brown skin and cobalt eyes shining softly as the sunlight touched her. Never breaking contact with her gaze, he slid his red swimming trunks down only enough to quickly pull out his swollen cock. He moved over her again, placing his left hand on the sand beside her, while with the other he grasped his turgid member. He pushed the edge of her bikini bottom aside with the head of his erection before he pressed a few times against her clit and then her wet entrance. Katara moaned softly and wrapped her arms around his neck.

Slowly, gently, he slid inside her. Zuko released a deep breath as he drove himself in inch by agonizingly slow inch, savoring the feeling of Katara’s sweet pussy, hot and tight around him, before he slammed into her.

“Yes, Zuko!” Katara wailed, “Oh, gods, more! Please!”
She threw her legs around his hips, making him penetrate her even more deeply, and then she squeezed her inner muscles.

“Agni, Katara! Oh, gods,” he groaned as he jerked his hips forward. Then with a growl he reared back and began to pound into her harder and faster.

“Ah, ah, ah!” she screamed with each plunge as she bucked her hips to meet his every thrust, “Zuko!”

He growled at the sound of his name falling from his wife’s sweet lips and picked up his pace, thrusting fiercely into her that it caused their slapping skin to send sprays of seawater flying around them.

Katara’s eyes rolled back as she felt the coil tighten in her stomach and her inner walls quiver as her climax approached. She was so close!

“Zuko, oh, Zuko!” she chanted as she thrashed her head from side to side.

Understanding that her release was upon her, Zuko’s amber eyes blazed.

“Yes, Katara! That’s it,” he growled out hoarsely. “Let go! Come for me!”

At his words and a sharp twist of his hips, Katara threw her head back and screamed his name, her body arching off the sand and into his thrusting hips as sweet agony racked her body. Zuko’s eyes widened when large waves crashed around them at the power of her orgasm. A second later, Zuko sucked in a sharp breath before he rammed into her one last time as he released into her convulsing pussy with a hoarse cry.

Panting, he shuddered as he rested his head on Katara’s shoulder as the last tremors of his orgasm subsided. Gods, he would never get enough of the incredible sensation of coming inside Katara. The suddenly turbulent water calmed and receded into its normal peaceful rhythm. He slowly pulled himself from her, pulled his swimming trunks up again, and languidly lay down at her side, bringing her close against him after he had pulled up the bikini top to cover her chest. He looked into her eyes to see her shyly avert them. He reached up a hand to gently nudge her chin up so she could look at him. He smiled at her when her blush deepened.
“Still so shy, my sweet wife?” he crooned, his tone amorous and intimate from their lovemaking as he caressed her cheek. “It is both amusing and endearing.”

“You make me lose all inhibition,” she responded truthfully, breathlessly.

Zuko smiled as he leaned down to kiss her softly before he pulled back and pressed her close to his side again. They let out soft, satisfied sighs as the sea’s sprays cooled their heated flesh. After a moment of silently watching the sun begin to descend closer to the horizon, Zuko felt Katara nuzzle his chest before she gave it a soft kiss.

“These have been the best days of my life,” she breathed gently.

“Mine, too,” he told her softly.

“I love you, Zuko,” she whispered tenderly as she raised her head to look at him.

“And I love you,” he murmured and his lips met hers in a slow and tender kiss.

As the sun fully disappeared and the moon began to rise, they finally stood up and returned to their room to indulge in one another once again. Sometimes they loved playfully, teasingly, something Zuko found as refreshing and delightful as when he allowed himself to indulge in such playfulness with Katara outside their room. Other times they loved fast and rough, yet not lacking in love and passion. But most of the time, they loved each other gently, taking the time to explore their bodies and learn the other’s reactions to the caresses of hands, mouths, and lips.

For the rest of their lives, they would never forget the past few days they had spent together, exploring and loving each other. They hoped many more days of such happiness would come in the future and that nothing would ever separate them.

Chapter End Notes

Not much of a plot, I know. This was more of a filler chapter. I want to show a bit of their blissful life before the next arc of the story.
The magnificent Fire Nation flagship gradually made its way across the rough ocean. Strong gusts of wind and large waves crashed against its steel sides. Light rain pelted its surface. The storm had appeared suddenly that morning, causing the royal couple to have to wait until after noon before embarking. Luckily, the storm was abating now. Unfortunately, it caused the ship to go slower as it rode the high waves. Now they were expected to arrive at the Fire Nation capital sometime the next morning instead of that same day, as was planned.

After carefully pouring red wax on a scroll and stamping it with his royal seal, Zuko placed the document aside before grabbing another of the scrolls upon his desk. As soon as Katara and he had boarded the flagship, he had been given all the important paperwork that had sprang up during their honeymoon. After enjoying a delicious dinner in their opulent cabin, he had excused himself to Katara and began to sort through the pile of papers. Katara had only smiled and made it her purpose not to distract him from his work as she busied herself with other things.

Zuko’s eyes slanted away from the paper he was looking over and discreetly glanced at his wife. Currently, she was sitting on the bed and reading a book Madam Fang Hua had insisted she read. There was a small frown on her face, and occasionally, he would hear her mutter something. He glanced back at the words before him, but not a second passed before his eyes were once again taking in her form. Agni, he wanted her again. But he had to finish going through everything that needed his immediate attention before he could satisfy his carnal desires—which had not lessened since the first time he made to love Katara. Actually, it seemed it had only increased.

If he didn’t know any better, he would think Katara had bewitched him and cast a spell on him that turned him into a lustful animal. Zuko shook his head to clear his thoughts before he smirked.

Later, he promised himself as he returned to reading and signing papers.

Oblivious to her husband’s thoughts, Katara suppressed a sigh as she continued reading the book Madam Fang Hua had given her on court etiquette. Were all these etiquette rules and traditions really necessary? Why did they have to make everything so damn complicated?

Well, there was no point in crying over it now. As Zuko’s wife and the Fire Nation’s Fire Lady, she had to do her best. Once they arrived at the palace, she planned on asking her mother-in-law to help her with her first duties. She vowed that she would show all those who thought her unfit to be their queen that they were wrong.

Lowering the book a little, Katara glanced over it to where Zuko was sitting at his desk. She sighed as she looked at him longingly as he continued working. She admired his serious and concentrated expression as he took his responsibilities earnestly. She watched as his hands moved to smooth the scrolled papers on his desk, and all she could think about was his hands on her flushed body. Gods, she wanted him again.

Cheeks burning, Katara looked away and again glanced down at her book. La, what had she become? Ever since Zuko introduced her to the art of lovemaking, all she wanted was for them to make love again and again. Was that normal?

Dismissing the thought for the moment, the brunette waterbender set aside the book and closed her eyes with a soft sigh. She was getting a headache and decided a small break would do her good. She had not slept much the night before; Zuko had kept her busy in the most pleasurable ways all night and had woken her up right at dawn to continue. Not that she minded. It made her happy to know that Zuko desired her as much as she desired him. She wondered if once they returned to the Fire Nation Palace and their responsibilities, they would still have moments to indulge in each other as often.

The next thing Katara knew she was drowsily fluttering her eyes open. She did not remember dozing off or for how long, but she found herself being pulled from her slumber as she felt large hands caressing her now bare breasts and a hot mouth kissing, licking, and sucking her exposed, wet sex. Her silky undergarments were gone and the hem of her dress was bunched around her waist.

“Zuko,” she moaned as she gently thrust her hips into his face. Gods, what a way to be woken up.

She could see that it was night now as the only light visible were from a few candles. The soft rolling of the ship and the heavy patter of raindrops against the window let her know the storm had not gone away. Her attention was brought back to her firebender when he squeezed her breasts more firmly before he plunged his tongue into her quivering pussy and stroked her drenched walls. She cried out loudly and she bucked her hips in pleasure.

“I didn’t want to wake you, you looked so peaceful in your sleep,” Zuko groaned softly yet huskily against her slick folds, “But I couldn’t help myself. I want you again.”

Another cry escaped the waterbender when he began to gently rub his fingers against her clit while he roughly sucked at her folds.

“Mm, you taste so good,” he rasped against her damp flesh, “So wet.”
Katara reached a hand down to gently pull his hair so he could look at her. Once he raised his head, looking at her with lust-induced eyes, she smiled at him a smile of invitation to worlds of rapture.

“I’ve been waiting for you,” she purred, her previous drowsiness causing her voice to sound even sultrier than usual. “I want you so, so desperately.”

Zuko groaned as he crawled up her body and leaned down to capture her mouth in a searing kiss as he tried to get rid of the rest of her clothes, but he frowned in bewilderment when Katara grabbed his hands to stop him. His frown deepened when she wiggled beneath him. He reluctantly moved away from her and sat at her side. He relaxed, however, when she gave him a sexy smile and he watched in curiosity as she moved off the bed to stand beside it. He swung his long legs over the edge of the bed to see what she was planning to do.

With the same sultry smile on her lovely lips, Zuko watched as his wife slowly discarded one article of clothing after another. With each new flash of exposed skin she presented to him, he felt his breath accelerate as his erection strained against his trousers. It was the only article of clothing he had left on when he had begun to rouse his dozing wife with intimate kisses and caresses. Soon, Katara stood completely nude before him and Zuko groaned at the wondrous sight. He was glad to know that she was getting more comfortable around him.

With a satisfied smile at the way her husband was gazing passionately at her exposed body, Katara stepped away from the pile of clothes at her feet and slowly approached him. His intense stare caused her inner walls to tighten and changed her previous bashfulness to wanton desire. She knelt between his legs, and with darkening eyes, she placed her hands on his knees before she slowly slid her palms up his thighs.

With bated breath, Zuko watched the movement of her hands as she trailed them higher, but he growled in disappointment when she deliberately avoided the big bulge straining for her touch, and instead, lightly pulled at the hem of his trousers.

“Will you take this off, please?” she inquired softly as she looked up at him from beneath her long, dark lashes.

Manfully refraining from moving in tactless hurry, Zuko eagerly fulfilled her request as he stood up. She scooted back a little to give him space. He had a feeling he knew what his wife was planning to do and he could feel himself harden even further in anticipation. He quickly dropped his trousers, stepped away from them, and swiftly kicked them out of the way as his cock stood proudly erect for her excited perusal.
Without preamble, Katara’s hand wrapped around one of her favorite aspects that her firebending husband possessed. Stroking his hard flesh, she leaned forward and sighed into the dark hair of his sac. Zuko groaned as he tangled his fingers in her long tresses. With another soft sigh, Katara deeply inhaled his musky scent before running her cheek along his stiff erection that had begun to throb within her grasp. Looking up into his dark, amber eyes, Katara stuck out her tongue and slowly licked a path from his base to his weeping tip.

Zuko felt his knees go momentarily weak and he bit back a crude curse at the amazing sensation and the sight of her hedonistic delight. Afraid his legs would give out on him from the pleasure, he sank back down upon the bed with a groan. Katara did not miss a beat as she continued to lick and nip his turgid flesh and he growled as he tightened his hold on her hair.

“I like touching you,” she murmured sensually against his skin. “I love knowing that I can make you feel good. It pleases me.”

She smiled when Zuko’s breath hitched as her palm fondled his heavy sac while her other hand continued to stroke the hard length before her.

Zuko’s eyes rolled back as he felt himself grow impossibly hard in her hands with her sultry words. Agni, she would make him orgasm with only her voice if she continued. Even though she was still learning, she was truly a magnificently sensual woman, one who sought to bring him the most pleasure. And she was all his. His blood even seemed to sing her name. A gasp escaped him, disrupting his thoughts, as she engulfed him in her sweet mouth.

“Yessss,” he hissed as he gently thrust his shaft between her soft lips. “Gods, that feels so damn amazing.”

With a soft whimper, Katara rolled her tongue over the bulbous head and coaxed a few drops of his arousal to fall upon her tongue. She pulled back to catch her breath and smiled coyly up at him as her hand continued to stroke his base. Just as she leaned back down to take him into her mouth, the ship gave a violent jerk as a huge wave crashed into it. Katara gasped as she lost her balance and fell on Zuko just as he grabbed her upper arms to steady her.

Zuko’s eyes widened and he groaned as his shaft became wedged between Katara’s breasts, his tip brushing against her lips as she fell forward. The waterbender gasped in shock and tried to jerk back, but he tightened his hold on her and pressed her against him again.

“Don’t move away,” he ordered huskily, “Having my cock between your soft breasts feels so good.”
Katara’s cheeks flushed a deep crimson color at his words before she slowly looked down to see the dark-reddish head of his length poking from between her breasts. She bit her lip when Zuko shifted lightly and her hardened nipples brushed against his groin. She gasped softly when he grabbed one breast in each hand, pressed them even more tightly against his erection so that it was completely encased between them, and began to slowly thrust his hips. She moaned loudly when pressed his thumbs on her nipples so that they rubbed against his hard length as he stroke himself between her breasts.

“Agni, that feels incredible,” Zuko growled out as he stared down at what he was doing before he lifted his eyes to her wide, blue orbs. “You just keep surprising me, love.”

Katara moaned softly as she felt more of her juices seep from her core and slide down her upper thighs as she watched Zuko use her breasts to pleasure himself. La, she could not wait to feel him doing the same inside her, stroking, stretching, and caressing her walls until her mind and body were completely overwhelmed with pleasure. She smiled when her eyes landed on the dark wristband she had made him. He was all hers. Wanting to participate, Katara gently persuaded him to move his hands away before she cupped her own breasts and slowly began to move them up and down his thick shaft.

Leaning back on his hands, Zuko began to pant heavily as he watched his wife rub her breasts against him. For a second he had been afraid that she would have protested his scandalous actions, but he had been unable to stop such an unexpected outcome that had felt so wonderful. He was happy to know Katara was determined to pleasure him.

Looking away from her firebender’s fascinated expression, Katara glanced back down to see how his secreting tip would disappear between her breasts before popping back out to point at her face.

Zuko looked away from the arousing sight to gaze at Katara’s features as his heart pounded hard in his chest and his breathing accelerated. He watched as Katara leaned down and wrapped her lips around his swollen head.

“Gods, Katara!” Zuko growled as he threw his head back and groaned deeply at all the new sensations. “That’s it. Suck me harder.”

Breathing heavily as her own arousal mounted, Katara did just as he wanted and sucked the bulbous head even more firmly, making sure to tease his slit with the tip of her tongue, while she pressed her breasts even more tightly against the rest of his throbbing cock.
“Uuuuh, yesss,” the firebender growled as his eyes rolled back at the intense pleasure.

As Katara continued to suck on his tip while she stroked his throbbing length between her delectable mounds more rapidly, Zuko felt the telltale signs that his climax was approaching much faster than he anticipated. Mustering all his willpower, Zuko placed his hand on her shoulder to stop her. When she released his tip from her mouth, he looked back down at her as he panted.

“Not…yet,” he rasped as she frowned at him, “I want to come inside you.”

Katara moaned and pressed her thighs tightly together as her core clenched almost painfully at his words. He leaned down to kiss her deeply before pulling her up roughly against him. He moved them so that he was hovering over her on the bed as they continued kissing, nipping and sucking each other’s lips and tongues almost desperately, but then he suddenly rolled them until she was straddling his stomach. Panting, Katara steadied herself by planting her hands on his muscular chest. She glanced down at him with a confused expression on her flushed face.

Agni, what a wonderful sight. Zuko could not stop the groan that escaped him at the feeling of his wife’s wet pussy on his skin. His fingers outlined the generous curve of her breasts, the perfect arch of her waist, and traveled down to her hips. Katara was so wonderfully, perfectly proportioned. He continued to trace the shapely curve of her hips before he allowed his fingers to slide downward. Then he began to glide them up and down her thighs as he indulged in the softness of her brown skin.

“I want us to make love with you on top this time,” he told her huskily as he gently squeezed her hips.

The waterbender’s eyes widened in shock and uncertainty. Feeling her anxiety, Zuko rose up slightly to give her a reassuring kiss while he ran gentle circles on her hips with his thumbs. Pulling away, he lay back down and smiled at her.

“I have never allowed myself to be in such a vulnerable and emasculating position before you,” he confessed to her in an impassioned and soft tone, “But I want you to make me yours at your own rhythm.”

Katara moaned softly since his confession caused a tingle to shoot up her spine, but she did not make a move as she stared down at him. Did he really want her to take control of his body in such a manner?
Sensing the uncertainty in her eyes and body’s movements, the young lord frowned slightly. Did she really not yet comprehend the astounding power she held over him?

“I need you, Katara,” he whispered ardently beneath her lovely body. “Take me inside you and ride me hard before I go insane.”

Katara felt her heart pound even fiercer in her chest and the ache inside her increased. Taking a deep, labored breath, she lifted herself slightly and slid down. She could feel his heat at her center and she looked up to his face. Even though his expression was one of patience and curiosity, his amber eyes were burning with wild anticipation.

She raised herself on her knees, and with his help, positioned herself over his stiff erection. Zuko’s breath hitched and Katara felt his length twitch against her wet entrance. She looked down at him, hesitantly gazing at him with her wide eyes. She felt so exposed in this new position. Her breath caught in her throat when she saw that his strong jaw was clenched tightly and his chest rose and fell in short, quick breaths. But it was the look in his eyes, smoldering like golden embers as he stared intently at her as if she were the most desirable woman in the world that vanquished her uncertainty.

Well, if he wanted her to love him at her own pace, then she would. With a sultry grin, she pressed her wet folds against his solid length, causing him to groan.

Zuko clenched his teeth at the sensation of her hot sex rubbing up and down his stiff shaft at a deliciously, slow pace. The sight of her body hovering over his erection was incredibly erotic. Letting out a deep, guttural groan, his gaze swept down her nude body as she swayed back and forth, massaging his engorged cock between her drenched folds, while teasingly eluding the heaven of her core. She leaned toward him and pressed her lips against his with a soft moan. She pulled back slightly to gaze into his eyes, her hair falling around them like thick waves of chocolate, before she captured his lips again. One of his hands flew to the back of her head as he ravished her mouth and bucked his hips against her. She gasped and his stomach clenched sharply as she began grinding against him more insistently, making sure to rub her swollen clit against his hardness. Zuko could not stop himself from thrusting up to meet her just as he thrust his tongue into her mouth.

Katara moaned deeply as the ache in her center became fiercer. She needed to feel him inside her, completing her, filling her fully. With a groan, she pulled away from his skillful mouth and sat back with deep panting breaths. Keeping her gaze on his, she again lifted herself over him. Reaching one hand down between them, she grasped him and positioned his large erection to her entrance. She gave him a soft look of inquiry, and she watched as he immediately nodded, giving her silent permission to do as she pleased.

Taking another deep breath, Katara gripped his hard shaft in her hand more firmly and guided the mushroomed tip into her before she slowly sunk herself onto his stiff erection, whimpering in pleasure as his thick hardness stretched and stroked her walls.

“Oh, Katara,” Zuko breathed out harshly as her wet, tight pussy enveloped him as she completely impaled herself on him.

A deep moan escaped the waterbender, in this position he was so deep inside. The feeling of him within her, pushing deep into her, forcing her body to stretch for his massive girth, was a blissful sensation that she was quickly becoming addicted to. Holding his passionate gaze with her own fervent one, Katara raised herself up until only his bulbous head was inside her before plunging back onto him.

“Ahh!” she cried out as she threw her head back in pleasure before she did it again.

“Katara,” Zuko groaned as his hands clenched the sheets beside him.

He saw a pleased and seductive smile appear on her flushed face before he felt her lower herself on him more firmly at the same time she squeezed her inner muscles around him so tightly his breath hitched. His jaw went slack from the pleasure and his eyes rolled back.

“I’ll make you mine,” she vowed with a warm purr, a wicked smile curling her lips, when his eyes focused once again on her face.

Before Zuko could feel shocked at her brazen behavior, a loud grunt escaped him when she impaled herself roughly onto his thick erection over and over again. He watched in delight as his wife whipped her head back, tossing her luscious brown tresses behind her so that the tips tickled his thighs, and started bouncing rigorously on top of him as she took her pleasure from his body while she reciprocated it to him. He was fascinated with the sight of her breasts bouncing above him.

“Oh! Oh! Zuko! Ah!” Katara screamed. “So good, so good!”

She closed her eyes, savoring the new sensations and moaning with each delicious thrust as she continued to bounce on him as hard as she could. Then she began grinding against his pelvis and cried out loudly as her clit rubbed against him. It felt so good. She relished at the force with which his length kept striking her depths as she roughly ground and impaled herself on him. She could hear Zuko groaning and she forced her eyes to open so she could see her magnificent husband.
She had never seen anything as erotic as the vision of Zuko beneath her as she controlled their pleasure. His hands were tightly clenching the sheets beneath him and his veins strained against the pale flesh of his muscular arms. His chest was heaving and his muscles were rigid as he groaned deeply with each breath he released. But it was the expression on his handsome face that caused her body to shudder in pleasure. His eyelids drooping heavily with lust, his mouth hung slightly open in order to take in air. His golden eyes blazed as he looked at her as if he wanted to devour her whole, while his body rocked against the mattress with the rhythm of her movements. The sight of Zuko watching her as she took him inside her and rode him fiercely was utterly sinful that it caused flames to erupt in her stomach.

It made her feel immensely, sensually powerful.

Beneath half-lidded eyes, Zuko watched as Katara squeezed her blue eyes shut as her desperate cries of pleasure complemented each of her cadenced thrusts. Each time she deliciously impaled herself on him, it forced a delirious groan to rip from his throat. He could not look away from the perfection above him.

His waterbender’s head was thrown back in her desire and her soft moans and loud cries accompanied the sounds of the raging storm outside. He stared in lustful enthrallement at the place between their bodies, watching as his cock would appear glistening with her juices before it disappeared within her swollen folds again. The undulating motion of her body was fascinating, and the real vision of Katara riding him as he had fantasized so many times before quickly overwhelmed his senses. For the moment he was in no hurry for their lovemaking to end, so he continued to let her direct their movements, blissfully content to watch her as she steadily rocked against him.

“Oh, Zuko, mm!” she moaned, “Uhhh. Ahh!”

Panting, Zuko looked up into her pleasured face before his gaze traveled down the column of her slim neck, pausing briefly on her necklace, before moving lower. He was again captivated by the sight of her beautiful breasts bouncing with each thrust of her hips. And he watched them bounce and jiggle before him with hungry eyes.

He unclenched his fingers from the bed sheet and quickly grabbed her tantalizing mounds, fondling them roughly.

“Yes!” she cried out, “Oh, Zuko! Touch me! Please!”

With a growl, he lunged towards her and began kissing and suckling her alluring breasts while she continued to ride him. He took one hard nipple into his mouth, savoring the taste of her sweet, salty peak on his tongue, while his hand kneaded her other soft mound as she moaned. She slowed her movements a little and began to grind hard against him, causing them both to groan loudly. Zuko pressed both breasts together and rubbed his face against them, making sure his rough scar touched her nipples as he had learned she liked. When she groaned more deeply, he began to roughly lap her nipples before engulfing both into his mouth. She whimpered under his touch, and his shaft jerked violently as Katara again threw her head back and began to moan repeatedly.

Zuko groaned, but then he found himself on his back once again when Katara pressed against his chest. Dazed, he looked up at her as she again gave him that sexy smile. Then his breath hitched when she began to press hot, moist kisses to his chest and nipples, occasionally flicking out her tongue to taste him as she increased the force and speed of her rocking hips. His eyes rolled back. He had planned for Katara to bring them to release, but he couldn’t wait anymore.

Groaning loudly, his hands ran down her back before he swiftly cupped her exquisite behind in both of his hands and jerked her onto him roughly. Katara pulled her head back a little and gasped, but did not stop her movements. Zuko gently massaged his wife’s firm, round cheeks as he lean forward a bit to kiss and suck on her bouncing breasts. He continued to knead her sweet flesh before he roughly spread her ass cheeks wide open. He heard her cry out her pleasure and felt her body shudder just as her wet walls squeezed him tightly, shooting scorching vibrations throughout his body. Growling in carnal need, he grabbed her ass more tightly and began to roughly shove her onto his cock as his hips surged forward into her.

“Ahhh!” she screamed at his every thrust, “Zu-Zuko! Ah! Ah!”

“Oh, Agni! Katara!” he cried out, “Oh, gods, yes!”

His voice was rough and husky by his overpowering need, but he could not stop thrusting into her for anything in the world. He was buried so deeply in her tight core that he could feel every one of her muscles as they began to ripple around him.

Katara felt as if her entire body was consumed in the flames of passion as her throbbing pussy dripped heavily around his erection. She was so close. Her muscles were tightly clenched and she was just hanging by a thread. She did not care that Zuko had taken control—all she wanted was to reach that blissful release.

“Zuko, please! I’m so close!” she begged wantonly.

Zuko almost came at the sound of her pleading voice, but he forced himself to hold back for just a moment longer to give his wife what she needed. Removing one hand from her ass, he reached... down between them and began to rub furious circles on her sensitive nub. Katara’s sapphire eyes widened as she looked down at him with blazing need, and he looked back at her, reflecting the scorching passion in her expression. Then she stilled on top of him.

Katara cried out as her climax raged through her body and she immediately surrendered to the inferno.

“Zuko!” she screamed his name.

She gripped his sides as her entire body trembled and writhed with the blasting surges of pleasure. She heard him growl deeply as he again grabbed her ass with both hands and continued to pull her onto him. His continued assault only caused the blazing waves of pleasure that were mercilessly rolling through her to prolong, and she continued to scream out her husband’s name with each rough thrust. Then she gripped his sides more tightly and threw her head back, screaming in ecstasy as another intense orgasm crashed into her.

Zuko growled as her slick walls clamped even more tightly down on him as she continued to wail his name. The hot flow of her cream around his cock that gushed down his heavy sac and thighs caused a violent need to swell through him and he gripped her round ass more tightly as he rammed himself up into her. Then a fierce roar ripped from his throat and he froze as his cock tightened for the final time. His eyes rolled to the back of his head as his hips surged forward, burying his entire length inside her tight pussy, before he exploded.

His release was staggering. It felt as though his entire being had combusted from the sheer force of his climax. Each incredible pulse of his release inside Katara’s body racked his body and he shook violently.

Katara gasped before she moaned as the sensation of the hot spurts of her husband’s release inside her sent new waves of bliss rushing throughout her body. She collapsed against his sweaty chest, trembling and moaning, lost in a sea of pure ecstasy. She closed her eyes as she listened to her husband’s thundering heartbeat and panting breaths, much the same as her own. After a moment, she felt his hands slide up and down her back in soothing caresses before he leaned down to kiss her head. She hummed softly. She felt as if her limbs had been sapped of their energy, but she managed to lift her head enough to look at him, her chin resting on his chest. There was a wide, pleased grin on his face, and she raised an eyebrow at him.

“That’s definitely one of my favorite positions,” he said huskily, “I can’t wait to explore more with you.”
“There’s more?” she asked incredulously, her eyes wide in shock, but also in delight.

“Yes,” he answered amusedly yet with a hint of anticipation. “I heard there are even books that teach them.”

“There are?” she asked, her eyes growing even bigger.

Zuko chuckled quietly at her reaction. He slowly lifted her off him, both of them groaning at the sensation as he slipped out of her warm sheath. Still breathing heavily, Zuko glanced down between them to see his whitish seed pour out steadily from his wife’s core and onto his currently resting shaft. Agni, he would never tire at the sensation and thought of releasing inside his waterbender and seeing the evidence of his claim on her. Smiling up at her, he rolled them until they were lying on their sides. Propping himself on his elbow, he leaned his head closer to her face and grinned widely when she blushed bashfully. She was so adorable. Her chocolate hair rested wildly around her and her blue eyes were wide, but there was a small smile on her lips and her cheeks were still flushed from their incredible lovemaking. His heart skipped a beat at the sight of her, and he leaned down to kiss her softly before he nuzzled her cheek. She sighed contentedly, and when he pulled away, she was smiling radiantly at him.

“I love you,” she whispered.

Zuko smiled and bent down to kiss her, knowing that he did not need to say the words out loud for her to know that he felt the same about her.

He caressed her sweet lips gently, tenderly, and then he brushed his lips against her cheek before kissing her mouth again. He pulled back to see she was still smiling at him, but he could see that sleep was claiming her. Stubbornly, she weakly tilted her face upwards, asking for one more kiss. Zuko smiled at the precious woman beside him, and he bent down again to give her one more loving kiss before wrapping one arm around her and curling her into him.

“Sleep,” he ordered softly.

“You can’t order me around,” Katara muttered sleepily even as she sighed and nuzzled her face against his chest.

Katara felt his chest shake with silent laughter as he again rubbed his hand soothingly up and down her back. She smiled drowsily before sleep claimed her. Zuko heard her breathing even out and he sighed contentedly as he gathered her closer to him. His wife’s warmth and the sound of the rain outside, coupled with their vigorous and pleasurable activities, soon lulled him to sleep.

Aang grinned as he finally spotted a place where they could find shelter from the storm that had suddenly appeared that morning. They had been flying above the ocean when it took them by surprise before they finally sighted a small island a few hours later. It was now sometime late at night. The airbender smiled when Momo let out a chip as he burrowed deeper into his shirt to ward off the raindrops.

“Yip, yip!” Aang shouted above the howling wind.

Appa let out an answering groan as he descended onto a clear path the trees made. Aang glanced down and noticed a swift river passing below them.

“How much longer do we have to wait?” Toph’s irritated voice reached his ears.

“I spotted a cave in a cliff just ahead of us,” he told her, “It’ll be just a few minutes.”

“Stupid storm. Couldn’t it wait until we were on land?” she grumbled.

Grinning, Aang turned around to look at the earthbender. She had a scowl on her face and her arms were crossed over her chest to clearly indicate her annoyance and discomfort, but all Aang could see was strands of her dark hair plastered to her porcelain cheeks and the outline of her petite body as her wet clothes clung onto her skin. The airbender felt himself flush as his heart began to race in his chest as it had been doing for the past few weeks. The more time he spent with Toph as a potential love interest, the more attracted he became to her and the more the pain he felt at losing Katara lessened.

Instead of Katara’s face that was always on his mind, it was Toph’s. Instead of the waterbender’s soft voice, it was Toph’s teasing tone that he dreamed of. Everything he saw reminded him of her. When he saw something that he would think she would find pleasing or amusing, he would describe it to her in great detail so she could fully appreciate it. The first time he did so, he had been afraid she would be offended, but Toph had only grinned and said that she was sure that the way he was describing it was better than if she saw it.

His eyes drank her every expression from her fierce scowl, her teasing smirk, to the blushes he was able to bring out of her. His ears reveled in her voice, chortles, and the soft moans he elicited from her when they kissed. He especially liked those sounds she made and the way her cheeks flushed once they pulled away from each other’s mouths before they got carried away.
He enjoyed their moments together, and if he was honest to himself, he began to wonder if what he really felt for Katara was the true love he always made it to be. Perhaps what he felt for Katara was a young boy’s first love, a crush that almost bordered on obsession. That is not to say that he did not care for Katara anymore, that a part of him did not wish they could have ended up together, and that he did not feel hurt that she had chosen Zuko over him. However, he had never felt the way he did with Toph when he was with the waterbender. But what was it that he truly felt for Toph? He cared for her deeply and he was greatly attracted to her—if his body’s reaction was any indication—but did he love her? Could he love her? What if he was just accepting her feelings for him now because he did not want to be alone until he found someone else?

He shook his head. No. He wouldn’t do that to her. Not only could he not hurt her, but he could not imagine feeling the same way he did for anybody else. Yet, could he really have fallen for her so soon?

With a sigh, Aang rubbed his wet face before he shivered when another strong, cold wind swept through them. He opened his eyes and ducked to the side with a gasp as a broken tree branch almost hit his face. He watched it fly passed him only to shout in alarm when it struck an unsuspecting Toph’s head with enough force that it threw the small earthbender over the side of Appa’s saddle.

“Toph!” Aang screamed in horror as he watched her fall.

He pulled on the sky-bison’s reins to turn him around before he flicked them urgently so Appa could dive down after her. Chattering in fright at his master’s agitation, Momo crawled out of his tunic to clutch onto one of Appa’s horns. As they neared Toph’s falling, unconscious form, Aang jumped away from Appa and propelled himself with airbending while he stretched out one hand. But he was not fast enough and she plunged into the river. Aang dove into the cold water after her as his panic rose. He waited a second until another streak of lightning illuminated the dark water before he spotted her being pulled away by the river’s current. Boosting forward with waterbending, he finally caught her in his arms and held onto her tightly before he created a water tornado to push them out of the water and high into the sky. He gasped in air just as he saw Appa moved under them. He let go of the water and created a current of air to soften their landing on the sky-bison’s huge saddle just as another crack of thunder rumbled the sky.

Sitting down, Aang placed Toph across his lap and looked down into her closed eyes in growing fear. Momo flew away from Appa’s head to land beside them with ears drooped in concern. Placing his fingertips on her chest, Aang pulled them up until a string of water followed his movement out of her mouth. He bent the water away as he peered down at her face. He was relieved to see that the tree branch had not struck her hard enough to open up a wound, but she had not responded even after he had pulled out the water from her lungs.
“Toph!” he shouted as he lightly slapped her cheek, “Toph! Wake up!”

When she didn’t respond, he felt his heart constrict tightly in his chest. No, no, this couldn’t be happening! Not now! Not when he was beginning to realize how much she meant to him!

“Toph!” he screamed as he bent over her.

“Damn, Twinkletoes! Are you trying to make me go deaf?!” he heard her asked gruffly even though there was a weak quiver to her tone.

With a relieved gasp, Aang pulled back to see her frowning at him, though there was a subtle expression of pain on her delicate features.

“Toph!” he exclaimed in happiness before he crushed her to him, “I’m so glad you’re okay! I was worried!”

“As if some stupid branch would be the end of me,” she sniffed haughtily, though she felt herself blush in pleasure when she found herself pressed tightly to his chest.

Just as she opened her mouth to make another snide remark, she felt Aang pull away before she felt him crash his mouth onto hers. Gasping, her eyes widened in surprise at the suddenness of it and then she jumped when she felt Aang take advantage of her opened lips to plunge his tongue inside her mouth. He kissed her with a fierce desperation that left her breathless and clinging to his clothes. He had never kissed her like that before. Her surprise quickly vanished, however, and she was soon battling his tongue for dominance, but then she gasped in pain when his hand touched the bump the tree branch had left on her head. She groaned in disappointment when he immediately pulled away.

“Are you okay?” he asked in concern.

“I’m fine. Nothing a little rest won’t fix,” she assured him with a snort.

Aang had to smile at her bravado even though he could see she was in pain. He frowned. They needed to stop soon so they could take care of her injury. Toph felt him nuzzle the other side of her head as he let out a sigh.
“I thought I lost you for sure,” she heard him whisper near her ear, “I don’t know what I would’ve done if I had.”

For once, Toph was at a loss for words as she felt her heart skip a beat. Would it really affect him that much if something suddenly happened to her? Did he care that much for her? Had he finally let Katara go? She wanted to ask him those questions and more, but she did not want to sound whiny or jealous, so she remained quiet and basked in the affection he was bestowing on her.

“I think we’re almost at the cave,” he said.

Toph waited for him to lift her from his lap so he could settle her on the wet saddle, but instead, he carried her gently in his arms as he again settled her on his lap as he sat back down on Appa’s head to grab the reins to lead him toward the cave. She protested at first, but he stubbornly refused to let her go, so she had no choice but to cross her arms and remain still on his lap. She couldn’t ‘see’ anything flying in the air, but listening to Aang’s steady heartbeat as he pressed her face against his chest to ward of the rain made her relax.

Once they arrived at the dry cave, Aang erected a stone wall to keep the rain out, and then used waterbending to dry them off before he created a fire to warm them from the chilly air. Even as he did all of this, he did not once let her go. Her protests fell on deaf ears as he sat down with her on his lap. She grumbled when he insisted on checking her injury, and after seeing that it was only a bump, he gathered some water and bent it into a small block of ice and had her press it on the bruise. He then pulled out their bedrolls, set them side by side, and finally laid her down on hers before he did the same. Toph tried to sit up, but Aang gently pulled her back down before he wrapped his arm around her and pulled her close against him. Toph blushed profusely since they had never been this close when they slept, but exhaustion soon fell upon her and she snuggled against his warmth with a sigh. Maybe things were going better than she had hoped. Would he soon forget Katara?

Aang knew that he had been able to order Toph around only because she was in pain and tired. He smiled once he heard her snore lightly in her sleep, and he brought her even closer to him as he remembered the moment her body disappeared over Appa’s saddle before plunging into the cold river. He screwed his eyes shut as the fear of losing her once again resurfaced and his heart clenched.

No. He couldn’t lose her.

I…I love her, he confessed quietly to himself.

As soon as he did, he felt like he could breathe again, like the world was bright once more, like everything was right, more than right. Maybe he had been in love with Toph all along, after all those years of traveling together, but had stubbornly ignored it in his obsession over Katara. Whatever it was, what mattered was that he truly did love Toph and it had taken a near tragedy for him to see it. He brought Toph closer to him and grinned when she murmured a protest before once again falling
Now the only thing left was to convince Toph of it.

The blue-eyed Fire Lady could not stop smiling in pleasure as their carriage passed through the gates of the Fire Nation Palace. As soon as they had disembarked from the flagship, they had been greeted excitedly by the common people all the way to the palace. Katara had gracefully waved at them from the carriage window, while Zuko remained impassive beside her. She knew many of the nobles disapproved of her, but she was glad to know that the rest of the population accepted her. She vowed that she would do everything in her power not to disappoint them. As the gates were closed behind them and the carriage came to a stop, she glanced at Zuko and grinned when she noticed the pleased expression on his face.

A few minutes later, they were walking down one of the impressive, golden corridors in search of Iroh and Ursa with Shen and Kuo walking silently behind them. As they passed, the servants bowed and greeted them respectfully. Zuko responded with just a nod, unfazed, but Katara found that she really needed to get used to the sudden deference that came with her new title. As they rounded a corner, they spotted Chao walking down the hall.

“Chao!” Katara greeted the old man happily before she covered her mouth with her hand. A proper lady never raised her voice in public as that book she read stated. She glanced up at Zuko and scowled when she saw his lips twitch in amusement.

At the sound of his name, Chao looked up and smiled at the approaching royal couple. The old advisor bowed as they neared him.

“Welcome back, my lord, my lady,” he greeted sincerely.

“Thank you, Advisor Chao,” Zuko spoke coolly, his demeanor now that of a lord and not the relaxed and playful man Katara had come to know. “Have you seen my mother and uncle?”

“I left them in the sitting room, my lord,” Chao responded with a smile.

With a nod, Zuko continued walking. Katara smiled at Chao before she followed her husband. Shen and Kuo stepped behind them once again. As they approached the sitting room, Zuko dismissed his personal guards, who bowed before retreating silently.
“Are you ready?” Zuko asked with a dry smile.

“Yes,” Katara replied with a grin.

As soon as they entered the room, there were gasps and exclamations of surprise. Iroh and Ursa quickly rose from their cushions and rushed toward the royal couple. Jee followed them at a more sedate pace.

“Zuko! Katara!” Lady Ursa exclaimed happily as she embraced her son and then her daughter-in-law tightly. “We expected you to arrive yesterday.”

“I suppose your honeymoon was too good to return to the palace as was planned,” Iroh mused with a waggle of his bushy eyebrows.

Katara felt herself blush and Zuko glowered at his uncle, but the old man ignored his look as usual.

“There was a storm,” was the only thing Zuko said as an explanation.

“Ah, of course,” Iroh said as he continued grinning.

Zuko ignored his uncle as he turned his attention to Admiral Jee who was standing patiently beside Ursa.

“I hope there was nothing amiss during our absence,” he said.

“Nothing unusual or suspicious presented itself, my lord,” Jee responded with a bow of his head.

Katara looked up at Zuko and smiled. He returned her smile briefly, but he could not stop the suspicious feeling from rising in him. He could not believe that everything had suddenly turned out peacefully, but he decided to enjoy it while it lasted. He was brought out of his thoughts when his mother lightly clapped her hands.

“You are just in time for lunch,” she said as she urged the newlyweds toward the low table.
They spent the next hour or so eating and talking about the last few days. Katara had been expecting their teasing and suggestive remarks, but they kept the conversation normal and she relaxed. After much cajoling, Zuko finally relented and allowed Katara to recount their honeymoon, skipping their more intimate moments, of course. Ursa exclaimed that it sounded so romantic before a sad, wistful expression flashed across her face. Zuko and Katara glanced at each other with a frown since they had a feeling she was thinking about Ozai before they resumed eating. Katara subtly glanced at Jee and noticed that a dark look had settled on his face before it quickly disappeared.

As the servants cleared away the dishes and brought them more tea, Katara cleared her throat lightly and smiled at her mother-in-law.

“Lady Ursa,” she began.

“Call me Ursa, Katara,” the older woman interrupted with a kind smile, “We are family now, after all.”

“Ursa,” Katara repeated and smiled.

Zuko looked at his wife and his mother with a pleased expression before he glanced at his uncle to see him smiling.

“I was wondering if you could guide me in my first duties as Fire Lady,” the brunette asked.

“Of course, my dear,” Ursa immediately replied and the two began to discuss what they should do first.

Zuko frowned slightly since he was anxious to show Katara one of her presents. And maybe she would express her gratitude and happiness in a delightful manner. Anticipation curled in his stomach. He was interrupted from his thoughts, however, when a servant appeared at the door and bowed.

“What is it?” the young lord asked. He knew his small vacation had just ended.

“My lord,” the servant greeted, “You are needed in the capital.”
“I will be there shortly,” Zuko responded.

The servant bowed before retreating.

Katara’s brow furrowed as she turned to look at her now impassive husband. They had just arrived and Zuko was already being bombarded with work, but she understood it was inevitable as a country’s sovereign. She wiped the frown from her face when he turned to look at her.

“Duty calls,” he said apologetically.

“Go,” she told him with an understanding smile, “I have things to see to as well.” Then more quietly so only he could hear, she said, “I’ll be waiting for you.”

Zuko gave her a grateful look before he regally stood up, placing his blank mask on, before he turned to Iroh who was looking at them with a subtle smile.

“Uncle, I need to speak to you,” he said before he strode out of the room.

Taking another sip of his tea, Iroh placed the cup down, smiled at the women and at Jee, before standing up and following his nephew out the room. Once they were both standing outside, the old firebender raised a curious eyebrow.

“I want you to distract Katara and make sure she doesn’t see her wedding gifts,” Zuko told him.

“Ursa and I will keep her occupied,” Iroh assured him with a grin.

Zuko inclined his head in thanks before he adjusted his scabbard more securely on his hip. Iroh’s bushy eyebrow rose even higher on his forehead as he noticed the thick wristband on his nephew’s left wrist.

“It’s Katara’s wedding gift to me,” Zuko said in a pleased tone.
“Ah, I see,” the old man said with a smile before he frowned. “I hope whatever needs your attention in the city isn’t too serious.”

“I won’t get my hopes up,” Zuko muttered before he turned around. “I’ll be back later.”

Zuko strode silently down the golden corridor, and a moment later, he was walking down the long flight of stairs that led to the palace courtyard. He was pleased to see that his komodo rhino was already saddled and his personal guards were waiting for him. He hoped whatever needed his attention in the capital city did not take long so he could return to Katara.

As he thought of his wife, he felt his legs shake a little as he swung himself onto his komodo rhino. This had been the longest time he had gone without taking her since their first night on Ember Island. Every time they made love, his desire for her seemed to intensify. He only needed to recall her flushed and passionate face in his mind, think of her soft moans near his ear, remember the feeling of her tight, wet feminine walls surrounding him, to be overwhelmed with the fierce need to possess her once again. Remembering all their passionate moments thus far, it was all he could do not to turn his mount around so he could be with her again.

No, he had responsibilities to look after and maybe later he could practice his white fire. It would certainly make it easier for him to maintain control if he tired himself out a little. He should have known that Katara would prove as unrestrained in love as she did in life. Not that he wished it otherwise. He would merely have to grow accustomed to walking around in a state of semi-arousal. He smiled wryly.

With a light press of his heel, he urged his komodo rhino to move forward, and soon they were passing the palace gates.

Meanwhile, back in the sitting room with her in-laws, Katara sipped the last of her tea before standing up with a smile.

“I want to visit the garden,” she told them when they looked up at her, “I haven’t seen it in a while.”

“No!” Iroh exclaimed before he cleared his throat when they all turned to look at him in surprise, “Ahem, I mean, you have duties to attend to first.”

Ursa frowned at his outburst before she smiled when she understood what Iroh was trying to do. She stood up gracefully and gently grabbed her daughter-in-law’s arm.
“Iroh is right. We will help you,” she said softly.

Katara mused that if Zuko took his responsibilities without complaint, then so would she. She would prove to everybody that she would be a great Fire Lady. With a smile, she allowed Ursa to lead her out of the room.

“She needs a break.”

“Please show me,” she said.

For the rest of the day, Katara spent her time sending thank you letters to the nobles that had attended their wedding and had given them wedding presents. Ursa explained to her that personally sending the letters would show that she cared and appreciated their thoughts. Katara held back an unconvinced snort.

As she signed another of the letters, she wondered when Zuko would return and if he was having trouble with whatever had called him into the city. But she was distracted when Iroh handed her another piece of paper, and with a tired sigh, she began to write.

“Can we take a break in the Royal Palace Garden now?” she asked an hour later.

“After you look over this list of possible charity organizations,” Iroh told her as he handed her a scroll.

“And then you must look over the set dates for when the noblewomen may visit you to pay their respects,” Ursa added.

Katara felt her eye twitch before she took a deep breath. She glanced at Jee, who had been silent the entire time, and watched him give her a sympathetic smile. She returned his smile gratefully—although she was sure it looked more like a grimace. She turned back to her in-laws, who were piling more papers on the low desk, and she frowned suspiciously. If she didn’t know any better, she would say they were trying to distract her from something. But she dismissed the thought as she glanced at the list of charity work in her hand.

During her lessons, Madam Fang Hua had told her that setting up charity organizations was the Fire Lady’s duty, but many of the past Fire Ladies had not bothered with such responsibilities since they were more concerned with their personal advancements. The charity work had also suffered since there had not been a Fire Lady after Azulon’s wife died. Ozai did not have a Fire Lady when he had ascended the throne. Madam Fang Hua had added that the Fire Lady’s involvement in charities usually endeared her to the people, who then appreciated their Fire Lord even more for marrying such a woman. Katara hoped that with her participation she could help strengthen Zuko’s popularity among the common people. She also found that the thought of helping people because of her status as Fire Lady made her feel great. She did not have to worry at the thought that she was only useful as an adornment.

An hour later, the new Fire Lady was given another tour of the entire palace so she could become more familiar with her new home and remember what each wing held. She already knew the western wing was made up of the royal family rooms, the private garden, and a few guest rooms for close friends as well as the chambers she now shared with Zuko. The northern wing was where Zuko’s study was located along with the throne room and other rooms where he conducted his royal business. Katara now knew where the servants’ quarters were, where the soldiers’ barracks stood outside the palace, as well as the location of the huge kitchen and the storeroom where the food that fed everybody in the palace was kept.

“And here is the infirmary,” Ursa pointed out to her daughter-in-law with a smile as they entered the room.

The small group watched as Physician Toshiro and Yin-Min looked up from the many scrolls and books piled on the desk they were sitting at. The old physician and his new assistant immediately stood up and bowed.

“My lady, I am glad to see you have returned,” Toshiro spoke up with a smile, “I hope you had a pleasant time with Fire Lord Zuko.”

“It was wonderful, thank you,” Katara replied even as she tried to suppress her blush at the reminder of how pleasant it had been.

“Welcome back, my lady,” Yin-Min spoke up quietly as she glanced shyly up at the waterbender.

“Thank you, Yin-Min,” Katara replied kindly as she smiled at the timid woman. She glanced at the books resting on the table before asking, “Are you studying?”

Yin-Min fidgeted at the attention before she gave a small nod.

“Even though I was a top student of my class, there is still much I need to learn,” the small young woman explained softly.

“And she is doing a wonderful job,” Physician Toshiro spoke up with a proud smile, “If she keeps this up, she might replace me when I finally leave this world.”

“Don’t say that, Toshiro,” Iroh piped in with a grin, “You make me feel old, and you’re only a few years older than me!”

The old physician laughed.

“That is exactly what Chao told me,” he chuckled, “And he’s older than both of us!”

Katara, Ursa, and Jee glanced at each other bemusedly as the old men continued chortling as they left the room in search of Chao without even sparing them a second glance.

_Probably to badger him_, Katara mused with a shake of her head.

As Ursa turned to talk to Jee about something, Katara walked up to Yin-Min with a smile as the physician assistant tidied up the table. She suppressed a frown when the woman tensed slightly before she relaxed. What had Ozai done to her? Katara vowed that she would somehow make Yin-Min be less afraid and more open.

“So how is Physician Toshiro treating you?” she asked softly.

A small smile appeared on Yin-Min’s thin lips.

“He is treating me well. He is very kind, patient, and understanding,” she began in an adoring tone, “He reminds me of my father. He even looks like him with his white hair and the deep wrinkles on his forehead.”

“Really?” Katara asked with wide eyes, “But Physician Toshiro is an…uh…”

“Old man?” Yin-Min finished for her with a quiet giggle as she placed a stack of books aside.
Katara flushed slightly.

“My father was forty years older than my mother...He was an old man when her parents arranged for her to marry him,” the dark-haired woman explained. A sad smile appeared on her face as she absentmindedly caressed one of the books she held in her hand, “But I loved him dearly because he loved me and cared for me so much. It pained me greatly when he died a few months before my tenth birthday.”

Katara remained silent as she allowed Yin-Min to talk with a faraway look in her yellowish eyes. She would always lend a sympathetic ear to anyone who needed it. And she knew what it felt to lose a parent.

“A few months after his death my mother married her lover, a nobleman much younger and more handsome than my father,” Yin-Min continued and her voice turned bitter. “A year later they had a son they completely doted upon and I was cast aside. Only my father had cared for me. My mother had always ignored me, even though she gave birth to me.”

“You mentioned before that it was your stepfather who...gave you to Ozai,” Katara said sadly.

Yin-Min started and blinked rapidly as if she had not realized someone had been listening to her. She glanced into the comforting, blue eyes of the new Fire Lady hesitantly for a long moment, unsure if she should tell her or not, before she finally nodded her head to answer her question.

“As I came of marriageable age, my stepfather grew concerned. He did not want to part with his wealth to give as dowry to someone who was not his own daughter...” she trailed off with a quivering sigh.

“So he gave you to Ozai to be his...concubine,” Katara continued softly for her.

Yin-Min swallowed thickly as she gave a jerky nod.

“I didn’t even know about it until my stepfather and mother came to take me from the Royal Academy for Girls and brought me to the palace,” Yin-Min said as her voice became even quieter, pain laced in her tone. “I still did not grasp what was going on as two very beautiful women dressed me in elegant but seductive attire, much like their own, before they took me to a very grand room and left me alone.”
Yin-Min’s eyes became watery and filled with pain and sadness as her voice began to tremble.

“I still didn’t comprehend even as my m-mast— I mean Ozai e-entered the room and approached me. It was only when he…when he grabbed me to him and…t-that I understood what they had done.”

Katara watched as Yin-Min screwed her eyes shut and her body shuddered as if she were trying to suppress the memory. The waterbender felt her chest ache at the thought of what the young woman had to go through. Then she felt herself grow angry at what Yin-Min’s mother and stepfather did just as she felt revulsion for what Ozai must have done.

“Yin-Min—”

“Please,” the small woman begged in a small whisper as she opened her tearful eyes, “I don’t want to talk about it anymore…”

“Of course,” Katara said quietly, “I’m sorry for bringing up the subject.”

“I…I just need some time alone,” Yin-Min whispered. She gave Katara a swift bow before she quickly turned away and headed out the door.

Katara sadly watched her leave the room. As Yin-Min passed, Ursa and Jee stopped in their conversion and watched her too before they turned to Katara.

“Is anything wrong?” Ursa asked.

“No,” the waterbender responded. She did not want to talk about someone else’s painful history.

“Come, Jee is going to show you the rest of the palace grounds,” her mother-in-law continued as she grabbed Katara’s arm and led her out of room.

Katara forced a smile as she followed the two. She would somehow help Yin-Min overcome her troubled past. Everybody needed a friend.
As the hour grew late, Iroh reappeared and they all headed to the dining room to have dinner since they had not had a word of when Zuko was returning. Tuning out what Ursa and Iroh were talking about, Katara frowned as she pushed her food around her plate. She hoped Zuko was not having too much trouble.

She glanced up and noticed with curiosity that Jee was again staring intently at the dark-haired princess before his expression softened a little when she laughed. Then it seemed like he caught himself for his expression turned blank again and he looked away. The waterbender wondered at the admiral’s behavior. She then glanced at her mother-in-law and wondered how Ursa could not notice. Maybe she did not return his feelings.

Poor Jee, Katara mused before she mentally shook her head. Maybe she was wrong. Perhaps now that she was happily married to Zuko she wanted everybody else to find their true love. She smiled wryly. Zuko was right. She should not start seeing things that were not there.

Just as the servants were beginning to clean everything, Zuko walked into the room. As her eyes landed on her husband, Katara realized that she had missed him despite the fact that they had only been apart for a few hours.

“Zuko,” she greeted softly as he sat down beside her with a small smile.

Even though nobody else could see it, she noticed that he was tired and perhaps a little annoyed.

“Have you eaten?” she asked in concern.

“Not yet,” he replied coolly.

Katara turned to one of the servants and smiled.

“Would you please bring my husband his dinner?” she asked softly.

The servant flushed as he immediately bowed before he hurried to do her bidding. Katara was a bit surprised at how quickly her order had been followed. She really needed to get used to giving orders to the servants, among many other things. But when Zuko gave her a grateful smile, she thought that she could do anything for him.

“You have chosen a good wife, Nephew,” Iroh commented with a grin.

“I know,” Zuko replied with a pleased nod.

Katara suppressed the smug smirk that wanted to appear on her face and instead she smiled brightly at him.

After the servant brought the Fire Lord his dinner and everybody had left except for the royal family and Admiral Jee, they talked about idle things while Zuko ate in silence. When it seemed he was about to finish his meal, they decided to give the newlyweds some alone time.

“Good night, dears,” Ursa told them as she stood up with Jee.

“Have a pleasant rest of the night,” Iroh remarked with another waggle of his eyebrows.

Zuko again frowned at him and Katara bit her lip to keep from giggling at the old man as the three walked away. Once they were alone, Katara turned to grin at Zuko, who only shook his head as he continued eating.

“Was there a problem in the city?” she finally asked worriedly.

“It was nothing serious,” he reassured her as he took another drink of his red wine, “Just the usual dispute between some old noblemen that I finally settled without throwing them into the prison tower for wasting my time with their stupid arguments.”

Katara pressed her hand against her mouth to hide her smile at her firebender’s irritated face. Zuko placed his wine cup down and smiled at her, his stoic expression melting immediately now that it was just the two of them.

“So what did you do today?” he asked.
They spent the next hour talking about their day and discussing the things Katara had to work on. Zuko was pleased he married Katara for she listened attentively to what he said and eagerly and intelligently responded to his questions. Once he finished eating, the young lord stood up and reached a hand down to pull his wife up beside him.

“It’s late. Should we retire for the night, my lady?” he asked with a smirk.

“I think we should, my lord,” she quipped with a grin.

Tucking her arm around his, Zuko led them away from the dining room where the servants would later go in to clean up. As they walked closer to the royal wing, Katara felt her heart beat faster in her chest. But instead of turning right, Zuko turned left into the royal family wing. Confused, Katara followed him silently. But when they neared the Fire Lady bedchamber, Katara frowned and she felt her heart sink. Did Zuko change his mind and now wanted her to sleep in the Fire Lady room?

As they approached the large door, Katara’s confusion and anxiety rose.

“Do…do you want me to sleep here now so you can have your privacy?” she asked quietly as she looked up at him.

She watched as he frowned before his golden eyes locked on hers. They were smoldering with an intensity that she had not been expecting that it nearly stole her breath away.

“No, of course not,” he stated firmly before lifting his hand to caress her cheek.

His brow creased faintly as his lips curved slightly. When he spoke again, his tone was almost spellbinding.

“I like having you sleep next to me,” he clarified softly, “I like waking up to you in the morning. I want to come to you or wait in our bedchamber for you to come to me at night. I love to see you read and catch you singing to yourself when you think I’m not there.” He smiled when she blushed.

“I love to watch you get ready for the day and crawl into bed with me every night. I love that you are the first thing I see when I wake up and the last thing I see when I fall asleep,” he murmured slowly, as if he were trying to choose the right words to express himself. “So of course I want you sharing my room—our room now. It’ll be difficult enough that we’ll have to be away from each other during the day. I don’t want to be apart from you when night comes.”

Katara felt her heart swell with every word he uttered that when he finished she let out a dreamy sigh and leaned against him.

“You really do know how to charm a girl, my love,” she said with a pleased smile.

Zuko quirked an eyebrow.

“Only you, wife,” he replied amusingly.

Katara laughed quietly before she turned her attention to the door before them.

“Okay, so now that we established that we like to share a room,” she said with a grin, “why are we here then?”

“I have a surprise for you,” he replied, his tone taking on an edge of excitement.

The waterbender raised her eyebrow at him as he opened the door for her before she walked in curiously. She looked around the small room and admired the tasteful decorations. There was a low table in the middle and a few plush cushions spread around, but when she saw that there was no bed, she realized it was the anteroom. It was lovely, but what had her bewildered were the prominent colors of the room. Instead of it being the typical red and gold of the Fire Nation, it was blue and white. Before she could comment on the color scheme, Zuko led them to the other set of doors. Her eyes widened in wonder when she saw that these doors were made of silver and they had intricate Water Tribe carvings. She was distracted when Zuko opened one of the doors with a smile on his face and motioned for her to enter. She gazed at him curiously as she walked past him. As soon as she stepped into the other room, she froze and gasped in awe as she took in her surroundings.

The Fire Lady bedchamber had been remolded to imitate a Southern Water Tribe room. The antechamber had just been a preview. The floor was made up of pure white marble that sparkled softly as if it were snow. The walls were a soft blue color where the paintings that used to hang in her old room now decorated them. There was a low, white wood table in the center surrounded by piles of cushions and furs of different shades of white, black, and silver. A large gray fur rug rested neatly before the small blazing fireplace. Her eyes landed on the four poster canopy bed made of white wood opposite the door. The semi-transparent white canopy was not tied to the posters at the moment and flowed gently down the sides. And although it wasn’t as big as Zuko’s—their bed, it was impressive nonetheless. It was beautiful.

Zuko closed the door softly behind him and waited in anticipation for his wife to say something. Finally, she turned toward him wide-eyed and speechless, looking at him questioningly.

“I wanted to gift you with this place where you can come to if you’re in need of some peace or whenever you’re feeling homesick,” he told her quietly.

With a happy squeal, Katara threw herself at him and he caught her with a breathless gasp. Then she was planting joyful kisses on his mouth.

“I take it you like it,” he mused breathlessly as they continued kissing.

“I love it! Thank you!” she exclaimed before she gave him one more deep kiss. Pulling away, she sighed softly as she said, “I love you.”

She kissed him again, but before Zuko could deepen it, she flitted away from him like a butterfly. Zuko smiled at her happiness as she explored the room like an excited child and he was content just to watch. It seemed everything had paid off if her pleasure was any indication.

Katara then entered the bathing room and smiled happily at what she saw. The walls were also a pale blue, but the white ceiling was made up of some kind of material that made it sparkle like snow when the morning light touched it. There was a large stand with neat white and blue towels laid out. What caught her attention was the white marble tub that was sunken into the floor with a long rack mounted on the wall next to it filled with many bottles of bath oils and soaps. She could not wait to try it out one day—with Zuko of course. She grinned at her thoughts before she continued with her observations. Once she had seen everything, she turned to look at her firebender with a curious expression.

“When did you have the time to get all this?” she asked.

“I asked for your father and brother’s help,” he confessed.

“So that’s what they were up to,” she mused amusedly before she frowned. “Your present is better than the wristband I gave you.”
He walked up to her and drew her into his arms.

“You can’t compare the two,” he told her, “I love my wristband because it shows that I’m yours.”

Katara smiled at him before she raised an eyebrow when a smirk curled Zuko’s lips and his eyes darkened. A small shiver went through her; Zuko seemed to notice for his smirk widened.

“If you want to give me another gift,” he began in a low, husky murmur, “then gift me the first pleasurable night in this room tonight.”

A tingle trickled down the waterbender’s spine. She married an insatiable beast. She grinned mentally. And La, did she love it. Katara gave him a small, coy smile as she looked at him beneath her lashes.

“Why, anything my lord desires,” she purred.

Zuko groaned at her words as he tightened his hold of her before he swooped down to kiss her hungrily. Then he was pulling off her clothes while she did the same to his. Only when she was clad in her undergarments did he scoop her up into his arms and carried her toward the bed. He pulled aside one of the gauzy curtains and laid Katara gently on the center of the bed as he continued to possess her mouth.

Katara reached her hands up to dive into his hair, fisting tightly into the dark strands as their tongues passionately tangled together. She whimpered when he pulled away before she moaned softly when he placed hot kisses along her throat—licking, nipping, kissing, and sucking all the way to her navel. She tensed in anticipation when his chin nudged the hem of her satin undergarment before she exhaled deeply when he crawled lower to kiss her thigh.

Zuko grinned as he licked every inch of her exquisite leg and gently kissed her toes. His explorations caused her to giggle and moan. Then he repeated the same thing to her other leg but in reverse so that he was moving up her thigh.

The waterbender moaned softly when her firebender slowly parted his lips, and his warm wet tongue began to stroke its way higher, making an unhurried trail up to the edge of the piece of clothing that hid her intimate parts. He spread her legs a little and moved inward. As soon as his mouth came in contact with the fabric, Katara could feel the wetness between her legs growing rapidly. It was all she could do not to grab his face to shove him against her center. She cried out when she felt his tongue roughly lick the silky cloth heavily saturated with her arousal before pulling away. Before she knew what was happening, Zuko crawled up her body like an animal stalking its prey, planting moist kisses on her skin as he went.

He suckled and teased her breasts and nipples until she was writhing and moaning beneath him before he pulled away. Then he quickly divested her of her last articles of clothing, while she took off the rest of his clothes with equal urgency. Once they were both naked, Zuko pressed his entire body along hers. They groaned at the close contact of their warm flesh as they continued to devour each other’s mouths, their hearts pounding together as their flesh warmed the other.

“I’m going to make love to you, Katara,” he crooned as his lips brushed roughly against her lips. “I need you so badly.”

“Then make love to me, Zuko,” she begged wantonly as she raised her hips to press her wet sex against his thick length. “Please. Take me!”

Zuko’s eyes rolled back and he tightened his arms around her. He would never know what he had done to deserve such an amazing woman, but she was his, and he was going to enjoy her to the fullest and forever.

He reached down between them and swiftly inserted one finger inside her, causing her to bow her back and cry out.

“Mm, you’re already so wet, my little waterbender,” he growled approvingly.

“Always for you, my love,” she purred as she raised her hips against his hand so his finger could sink deeper into her.

With a groan, Zuko pulled his hand away and quickly spread her legs further apart before wrapping her slender limbs around his hips. He rubbed his cock against her swollen folds for a moment, making sure to press against her swollen clit, then without warning, he roughly thrust himself into her tight, wet pussy until he was buried to the hilt. Katara cried out and he grunted in equal pleasure.

His name was the only word that fell from her lips as they came together, their bodies fitting perfectly. Katara threw her head back and moaned when Zuko pulled back only to slam into her again.
“Oh, Zuko, uhh,” she groaned and panted as he began to pound into her in a slow, even rhythm.

His hands began to caress and knead her body while his mouth drove her to heights that only he could as he teased and sucked on her throat and breasts. As he continued to move gently within her, her body matched to his as only she could, and she raked her nails down his back as she squeezed her slick walls tightly around him just the way she knew he liked it. Zuko growled deeply at the sensation and his hips began to thrust more fiercely between her parted legs. She gasped when she felt her release come upon her faster than she had anticipated and she groaned as she waited for the sweet climax.

Then she felt Zuko stop suddenly before he pulled himself completely out of her. Her eyes flew open, her chest rose and fell rapidly, and her core ached with her interrupted orgasm as she looked up at him in bewilderment.

“Wha—?” she began.

She gasped when Zuko suddenly flipped her onto her stomach. Dazed, she vaguely noticed that they had not bothered to remove the silky blue comforter and that she was lying on a dark fur blanket. Her thoughts scattered when she felt Zuko grasp her hips and lift them up so she was kneeling with her backside in the air. She moaned when he pressed a kiss at the back of neck before he moved lower. She gasped and trembled when she felt his wet tongue lick its way down her back to the cleft of her ass.

Zuko pulled back and he groaned at the sight of her swollen, pink folds glistening with her aroused juices. Kneeling further back, Zuko gently grasped each of her rounded cheeks and spread them further apart before he roughly shoved his face to her drenched pussy.

“Ahh!” the waterbender cried and her hips bucked. “Oh gods!

Zuko groaned at the delicious taste of her cream coating his tongue and throat. Gods, he could not get enough of her. He reached down and grasped his cock, still slick with her juices. With a loud growl he began pumping the hard length fiercely and quickly, groaning when pleasure shot up his spine.

Katara gasped when her husband began to wildly lap at her folds and suck on her swollen nub. She cried out loudly when his tongue suddenly plunged deep inside her and began to insistently press against her fluttering walls.
“Zuko, oh, mm!” she moaned as her back arched and she pressed herself closer to his skillful mouth, thrusting herself into his face. “So good!”

The firebender licked, sucked, and kissed his wife’s wet and swollen sex a moment longer before he abruptly pulled away. He was panting hard as he continued to roughly stroke his cock, occasionally thumbing his weeping tip to spread his seeping seed around the edge. He groaned as he licked his lips of her juices, his arousal almost unbearable, then he moved up so he covered her back.

Delirious with need, Katara felt him press his chest against her back and kiss her right ear. Moaning in arousal, Katara shivered when the rough texture of her firebender’s scarred cheek brushed against the sensitive skin.

“Move up onto your hands and knees, love,” he rumbled softly as his hands caressed her sides. “I want to take you from behind, like an animal would his mate.”

Katara’s eyes widened at his words and she moaned when his hot breath sent a chill scurrying down her spine. A gasp escaped her when she felt him press his erection against her backside. Zuko smirked against her ear as he felt her drenched core twitch in anticipation. He pressed against her firm rear again and groaned when she shuddered. His mind was hazy with lust.

“I want to watch my cock disappear into your tight, wet pussy as you moan and scream my name, Katara,” he growled huskily.

The waterbender’s eyes widened. She had found out that the more times they made love, the dirtier his words became. Instead of being shocked, however, she found that she liked that the usually proper Fire Lord lost control around her. She was panting so hard in anticipation. She groaned. Would he also like it if she were to be as naughty as him?

“Please, Zuko,” she moaned wantonly, “I want you inside me. I want…I want your…big cock inside me.”

She felt him freeze and she tensed, wondering if she had disturbed him with her words. She gasped loudly when he pressed even more tightly against her with a growl.

“Gods, woman,” he rasped in delight. “You make go crazy with want of you.”
With a groan, the firebender knelt back up and helped guide her to her knees. He pulled her back against his chest and his rigid shaft became delightfully wedged against the cleft of her ass. He trailed his hands slowly up the curves of her body, worshipping her irresistibly feminine form, before moving to her breasts to roughly pinch her sensitive peaks as his mouth greedily sucked on the skin between her neck and shoulder. Katara trembled violently against him, whimpering softly in obvious need, and it sent delightful sensations through his body all the way down to his erection. She began to grind herself against him and he gasped as his cock was delightfully massaged between the twin globes of her beautiful backside. He gently pushed her shoulders down so she was resting on her hands and knees in front of him. Zuko took another moment to admire the view of her glistening sex. He caressed her back for a moment, admiring the sexy dimples on her lower back, and then slid his hands down to fondle her rear cheeks.

“You have such a lovely, perfect ass, Katara,” he rasped as he continued to caress her round flesh, squeezing, kneading, and spreading them widely apart.

Then he reached between her legs. Katara let out a loud gasp when he pushed two fingers inside her and began to pump rapidly in order to inflame her arousal once again, making her forget her slight embarrassment from being in such a position. A deep moan escaped her lips.

When he felt her walls begin to quiver around his fingers, Zuko pulled away and almost smirked when she growled in disappointment. He loved it when he made her insane with need for him. He sucked his fingers clean of her sweet nectar before he placed his hands on her hips and pulled her back against him. He nudged her slick entrance with his large tip, and then he slammed into her, jolting her to the core. A deep growl ripped from his throat, but it was lost beneath the sound of the hoarse, feminine cry from Katara. Zuko closed his eyes to relish the sensation. He was buried so deep inside his wife’s slick sheath in this position. Panting, he snapped his eyes open and looked down the line of his body to where he was joined with his trembling waterbender. He pulled back and then rammed himself back in.

“Oh, gods!” Katara wailed loudly and she clenched the fur blanket tightly with her fingers. It felt so good in this position.

Zuko leaned down to kiss and lick a path up her back and to her shoulder. Then he covered her perspiring back with his chest as he set up a fast pace.

In and out, in and out. Over and over again.

Growling in pleasure, Zuko grabbed a fistful of her long hair and gently pulled her head back so he could hungrily kiss her throat and jaw, while his other hand squeezed her breast and pinched her pebbled nipple. Katara panted and moaned as she tilted her head aside so he could have more access.

“Do you like that, Katara?” he growled in a low tone as he gave a sharp twist of his hips, causing her to cry out. “Do you like it that I take you from behind? Do you love it when my huge cock stretches you tiny pussy widely apart?”

“Yes! Oh, La, yes!” Katara screamed with each plunge of his massive length, “Oh, Zuko! Ah! Ah!”

Zuko hissed through his teeth before he let her go and knelt back. He placed a hand between her shoulder blades and forced her upper body down on the bed, causing her lovely behind to lift a little. Katara moaned and her fingers convulsed since his thrusting was making her sensitive nipples rub against the soft fur. She gasped when she felt his heavy sac slap unrelentingly against her clit, causing her stomach to tighten at the pleasurable sensation.

Zuko growled as he looked down at his beautiful wife moaning before him. He enjoyed dominating her body, controlling and bringing her pleasure as he sought his own. The utter dominance of this position, and his power over her delicate body, excited him beyond belief. The feeling and erotic sound of her backside slapping against his pelvis only incited him further. Sliding his hands away from her curvy hips, he gripped the cheeks of her ass and spread them apart so that he had a better view. He sucked in his breath and groaned. He watched in rapt fascination as he pulled out of her tiny, pink hole until only his bulbous tip was prodding her. He rolled his hips a little, rubbing against her wet feminine walls, before shoving back inside her, stretching her pussy for his invasion. He almost came right then and there at such an erotic sight. He would not last any longer.

“Come on, Katara,” he urged ardently, “Come for me!”

Reaching one of his hands around her hip, he found her drenched and swollen bundle of nerves and began to furiously rub it. Katara’s eyes clenched shut as liquid flames erupted from her core and spread along her veins. Then she cried out her release with a loud scream as her body convulsed at the immense ecstasy. Dazed, she barely felt his hand fist tightly into her hair and his movements become erratic as he sought his end, for all she was focused on were the waves of pleasure coursing through her.

Zuko growled as he rode her release, pumping even faster into her clenching pussy, until he reached his own climax. There was a desperate need to spill his seed inside her and mark her in the most primitive of ways and from the most primitive of positions. He thrust one more time before he buried himself deep, coating her warm walls with his hot essence. He gasped her name as he stiffened in pleasure, then collapsed on top of her, panting heavily against her ear.
When he heard her groan, he carefully pulled out of her before he gently rolled her limp form until she was lying on her back. Moving just enough so that he would not crush her, he folded her beneath him and laid his head between her breasts and over her rapidly beating heart, curling his leg and arm around her sated body.

Once his body relaxed from his high and coherent thought returned, Zuko frowned in concern. He hoped he had not been too rough. And he hoped she did not become upset with his crude words. As he had told her before, she just brought an animalistic side out of him that he never knew he had. She just made him want to possess her body in every way possible. Just as he opened his mouth to apologize, he felt her hand gently caress his hair.

“Mm, that was amazing,” she breathed out throatily, “I can’t wait for that to happened again.”

Zuko sighed and he felt his suddenly tense body relax at her words. He should have known Katara would not shy away from his fierce actions. She was just as passionate as he. He pondered if she would ever understand how the unconditional giving of her body, demonstrating her complete trust in him, made him love her even more.

He chuckled softly from his paradise between her soft, delectable breasts.

“I’m glad to know my wife is so eager for my amorous attentions,” he crooned huskily.

“Eager and always ready,” she quipped with a soft giggle.

Zuko responded to her words by tightening his arm around her and nuzzling her breasts, planting playful nips against the swell of her soft mounds. Katara bit her lip to stifle a moan when his scarred cheek brushed against her nipple.

“Thank you again for the room, Zuko,” she told him with a happy sigh, “It’s perfect. I will visit it whenever I have time.”

“You’re welcome,” he responded before he raised his head a little to look into her eyes, “Even if the days are busy for both of us, I want the nights to be just for us to enjoy each other.”

“I’d love that,” she said with a smile. She raised an eyebrow when Zuko suddenly smirked at her.
“I hope that will give me enough time to satisfy my wife’s insatiable appetite,” he teased.

“My insatiable appetite?” she exclaimed with another giggle, which Zuko joined with a deep laugh of his own.

Katara smiled. It was moments like this where it really sunk in that he was hers. For the rest of her life, she would have moments such as this where she would welcome him after a busy day, where they would banter and converse about their day, flirting playfully and making love.

---

A low groan escaped the young Fire Lord as the early energy of the sun coursed through his body and nudged him into the waking world. He tried to ignore it and fall back asleep, but he knew he could not afford to remain in bed with his wife even if he really wished it. Thinking of his waterbender made Zuko open his eyes. He was met with a mass of soft, brown hair where he had buried his face and he inhaled deeply of her sweet scent. He smiled when he realized that sometime during the night he had spooned against Katara’s back. His thighs were tucked beneath her bottom and his arm was wrapped around her waist. His smile turned into a wicked smirk when he realized that his other hand was grasping Katara’s breast.

He raised his head a little and blinked as he found himself in unfamiliar surroundings. He frowned when he saw that they were surrounded by a white mist before he realized that it was not mist but the canopy of the four poster bed. He relaxed once he remembered they had fallen asleep in the remolded Fire Lady bedchamber. He felt smug pride settle in his chest at the knowledge that Katara had really loved his gift to her. He could not wait to see how she reacted when she saw her second wedding gift.

He was brought out of his thoughts when he heard Katara let out a little moan as she snuggled closer to him. Zuko swallowed thickly when her rear rubbed against his stirring manhood. Groaning, Zuko gently squeezed her breast as he fantasized about lifting her leg so he could slide himself into her before he shook his head. As much as he would love to, he did not have the time. He had a busy schedule that day since his honeymoon had set him back from his paperwork. Besides, he should really let Katara sleep after being at her all the time this past week. Though he was sure she did not mind in the least.

With a sigh, he reluctantly removed himself from around her, but not before fondling her soft breast one more time. Just as he moved to sit up, Katara rolled toward him and sleepily grasped his wrist. Zuko looked down to see her blinking blearily at him.

“Where you going?” she mumbled drowsily.
“I have an early meeting with the advisors and then I have to go back into the city,” he informed her in a quiet tone. “I will see you later today. Now go back to sleep, Katara,” he ordered her softly.

Katara murmured her consent before she sighed contentedly when Zuko kissed her gently on the lips. He pulled back and chuckled affectionately when he saw that she had already fallen back asleep. Shaking his head, Zuko removed the warm blankets from him before he pulled aside the white curtain and stepped onto the chilly floor. The light of dawn softly illuminated the room. He silently searched for his discarded clothes that Katara had strewn around the room in their haste to indulge in their passion before he quietly dressed. He frowned slightly when he saw that his clothes were wrinkled. He hoped he did not come across anyone when he made his way to their bedchamber so he could bathe and put on clean clothes.

He went back to the bed, and parting the gauzy curtain aside, he gazed down upon his sleeping wife. She had rolled onto her stomach with her hair falling around her pillow and her lower body covered by the dark fur blanket. Her bare back and shoulders were subjected to his hungry stare before he let the curtain fall in place. He turned around and headed to the door, which he then closed quietly behind him before leaving.

A few hours later, blue eyes fluttered open and a soft yawn was heard. Katara stretched lightly before she raised her arm to drape it over her husband only to be met with cool sheets and not a warm body. Frowning, Katara lifted her head and saw that the spot beside her was empty. Where was Zuko? This was the first time since the morning after their wedding night that she had woken up alone.

The memory of Zuko murmuring to her that he will see her later and telling her to go back to sleep before kissing her came to her mind and she relaxed. Sitting up, the waterbender pushed her mussed hair back before she stilled when she was met with white curtains in every direction. Then she remembered Zuko’s sweet gesture in giving her this room and she smiled. A blush stole onto her cheeks a second later at the wonderful memory of what they had done the previous night. Pushing the fur blanket away, Katara pulled the light curtain aside before sliding away from the bed and onto the floor. She quickly gathered her scattered clothes and dressed.

She headed toward the door before she paused and turned back around. She took another moment to admire the room that reminded her of her homeland and she smiled. She would definitely come back when she had the time.

The brunette turned back toward the door and opened it, walked across the antechamber, and slowly opened the other door. She peered outside cautiously to see if anyone was around. She did not want anyone to bump into the new Fire Lady looking like a disheveled mess. Maybe she could ask Jiao to place some spare clothes and other items for such occasions in the room. Once she was sure there was no one around, Katara stepped away from the door and closed it quickly. Smoothing down her wrinkled dress and tilting her head up, she swiftly walked down the long, long corridor of the royal family wing until she finally reached their royal rooms at the other end. She was glad to see that Shen and Kuo were not posted outside the huge doors. Once inside the bedchamber, she let out a relieved breath only to stiffen when she heard a soft knock behind her.

“Who is it?” she asked warily.

“It is Jiao, my lady,” the maidservant’s voice sounded behind the door, “I’ve come to help you prepare for the day.”

“Oh,” was Katara’s response before she smiled, “Please come in, Jiao.”

The door was opened as Jiao stepped in with a small smile.

“Good morning, my lady,” she greeted, “Fire Lord Zuko told me to come back later when I came earlier to see to your needs.”

“Oh, yeah, I was, uh, busy,” Katara stammered before she composed herself, “I’d appreciate it if you got the bath ready.”

With a knowing smile, the older woman bowed her head before heading to the bathroom to get the bathtub ready. A few minutes later, Katara was soaking in the warm, sweet-scented water. After bathing, getting dressed, and taking the blended herbs Yin-Min had given her, the new Fire Lady was walking into the antechamber in order to join her mother-in-law for breakfast. Jiao had told her Iroh had gone with Zuko to his meeting and would accompany him into the city.

“Good morning, dear,” Ursa greeted happily as she watched her daughter-in-law walk into the room, “I hope you slept well.”

“Very well,” Katara replied with a smile.

After Zuko let me sleep, of course, she added mentally with an inward grin.

“Did you like Zuko’s gift?” the dark-haired noblewoman asked curiously as the servants placed their food on the low table, “He had been frantically making sure everything came out flawless for when you saw it.”

“I love it,” Katara admitted with a gleeful smile.

“I’m glad,” Ursa said as she raised her chopsticks.

They spent the next few minutes going over what duties Katara had to see to that day as they ate. Once the servants had left after cleaning their plates away, Ursa turned to give Katara a stiff smile.

“I should warn you that the first batch of noblewomen will be arriving today to pay their respects,” she said with a tired sigh.

“Now that they don’t have a chance to marry Zuko, they will try to gain your favor instead,” Ursa reminded her.

“Ugh,” the waterbender grumbled.

She really did not want to deal with the noblewomen’s false flattery and spiteful gossip. But she could hardly throw them out. It would not only make them hate her more, but might also cause problems for Zuko. She refused to cause him any trouble.

“Fine,” Katara consented resignedly as she stood up, “But I make no promises that I will like them.”

The two women laughed as they exited the room and headed toward the large sitting room where the royal family greeted their less familiar guests. An hour later, eight noblewomen were led into the room after the Fire Lady had allowed them an audience with her. As they introduced themselves, Katara found out three of them were the mothers of the five younger women. Behind their placid and friendly expressions and greetings, Katara could see their envy and jealousy as they stared at the golden ring Zuko had given her.

She ignored their less than kind expressions as she asked a servant to bring them refreshments before she elegantly returned her attention to the women. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw her mother-in-law nod approvingly and Katara mentally smiled in pride. She could do this.

A few hours later, Katara retracted her previous declaration as she listened to the women chatter on and on about what noblewoman said what, who wore what, and who did what. She was about ready to freeze them to the wall just to get them to shut up. She dreaded the days to come. She was grateful for her mother-in-law’s help for she was sure that if she was left to her own devices she would have done something not befitting a Fire Lady. Ugh, she preferred throwing herself into paperwork than having to deal with these foolish noblewomen.

Katara almost sagged in relief when the women stood up to leave as dinnertime approached, but not before promising to visit her again. They enthusiastically claimed she was a much more charming woman than they had previously thought she was. Katara could not discern whether they meant it or not, or if to feel insulted or not. Once the eight guests left, the waterbender actually slumped in her chair.

“Well, that went better than I thought,” Ursa commented with a smile, “You did wonderfully.”

“Thank you,” Katara said before she added dryly, “Though it took all I had not to do something drastic so they’d stop talking. Seriously, who cares that Lady Fu wears a wig to hide her balding head?”

Katara’s disgruntled remark only made Ursa laugh.

“I see you met up with some of the noblewomen today,” Zuko’s voice caused both women to turn their heads in his direction. He was walking into the room with a grinning Iroh.

“Zuko!” Katara called out happily as she sat up before she rolled her eyes, “I can see why you refused to marry a noblewoman. They’re…”

“Annoying,” Zuko finished for her in a blunt tone.

“I was going to say silly,” Katara told him with a grin.

“Well, Zuko doesn’t have to worry about that anymore,” Iroh piped in as he took a seat beside Ursa while his nephew stood beside Katara’s chair, “I’m sure you will keep him on his toes, Lady
Zuko did not refute his uncle’s words since they were true. Katara was not a meek and fickle woman. She constantly challenged him, but that was why he loved her. He knew his life would never be boring with her around.

“Are you tired?” Katara’s concerned voice brought him out of his thoughts.

Zuko looked down to see her looking up at him worriedly.

“A little,” he admitted with a shrug before adding, “But I want to spend some time with you before we retire to our room for dinner.”

The waterbender smiled brightly at him and the Fire Lord immediately returned her smile. They missed the happy and satisfied look Iroh and Ursa shared. They were glad to know they had been right in thinking that Katara was perfect for Zuko as he was for her.

After bidding Ursa and Iroh good night, Zuko helped Katara from her chair and led her away from the room. As they headed toward the western wing where their royal chambers were located, Katara felt her heart pound in anticipation for the passionate night to come. But she frowned when Zuko gently tugged her hand and led her another way. Curious, she looked up at him.

“I have another present I want to give you,” he told her.

“Another one?” Katara asked incredulously.

Her tone made him chuckle.

“Any other woman would be delighted to be given gifts,” he commented.

“Well, I’m not like other women,” she responded dryly.

“I know,” Zuko reminded her, “And that’s why I love you.”
Before Katara could respond, the feeling of a soft breeze and the aroma of flowers reached her senses, letting her know they were outside. She smiled when she realized they had stepped into the Royal Palace Garden, before she gasped. The once destroyed garden had been restored to its previous beauty.

_No, it’s slightly different_, she observed.

There were many more evergreens and deciduous trees and the grass had grown into a lush green carpet. Speechless, she allowed Zuko to lead her onto a stone path so they could walk deeper into the garden. There were many new patches of different varieties of flowers and plants. She spotted the firelilies, violets, white and purple orchids, hydrangeas, peonies from before, but she could also see irises, gardenias, and azaleas arranged in beautiful patterns. She could not see any evidence that showed there had been a fight between the Fire Lord and the Avatar.

“Oh, Zuko,” she whispered in awe.

Zuko smiled since he was reminded of the first time he had showed Katara the private garden last summer. She had appreciated it then and he was sure she would appreciate it more now.

“I didn’t want to show it to you only until it was perfect,” he confessed quietly as if he did not want to break the sudden spell that had befallen them.

“It’s beautiful, perfect,” she praised as she turned to smile at him. “Is that why Ursa and Uncle Iroh kept trying to distract me from coming here?”

“I knew you would’ve notice,” he said wryly.

She laughed. As they passed Lady Ursa’s rose bushes, Katara veered off the path with Zuko beside her. She bent down toward one particular bloom to take in its fragrance and sighed contentedly. Zuko swallowed thickly, remembering how Katara looked lying naked among red rose petals—simply stunning. Katara straightened so she could smile at him and Zuko cleared his throat.

“Come,” he said as he tucked her arm beneath his, “There is something else I want you to see.”

He took them back onto the stone path as they walked to the center of the large garden. Katara smiled as she spotted the familiar cherry blossom tree before she paused in surprise as her eyes landed on the pond. It was bigger.

Eager, Zuko quickly led her to the pond and the Fire Lady peered down at it. There were large lily pads floating on the clean surface of the water with white, pink, and lavender blooms. A movement in the water caught her eye and she gasped when she realized there were many koi fish gliding about ranging from small to large sizes. There were golden ones as well as red, orange, black, white, and silver ones. Many of them had beautiful patterns and combinations of these colors. Then Katara smiled widely as she spotted the turtle-duck family making their way toward them with loud quacks.

“How do you like it?” he asked softly.

“I love it,” she said happily, “Thank you.”

She bent down slightly to coo at the turtle-ducklings as they quacked at her as if in greeting. Zuko smiled smugly at the thought that he had pleased her again. But then he quirked an eyebrow when he noticed a frown mar Katara’s brow.

“What’s wrong?” he asked as he glanced around as if he could spot what the problem was.

“It’s not that I don’t appreciate what you give me,” she began carefully as she looked at him, “It’s just that I don’t like to be the only one receiving gifts when I haven’t given you anything.”

She paused when he pressed his thumb against her lips as he cupped her cheek. She watched him frown.

“How can you say that?” he asked, “You have given me something more precious. You’ve given me your love, your body, and your mind. What more can I ask?” He leaned down to press a soft kiss to her lips. “Besides, I like to give you gifts because I can and because I want to.”

“You’re too good to me,” she sighed blissfully as she melted against him.

“No, don’t think that,” she admonished him gently as she wrapped her arms around his neck to bring him closer so she could kiss him. “You are more than worthy of my love, Zuko.”

“The same could be said of you,” he told her as he deepened their kiss.

They pressed against each other as they kissed slowly and tenderly before they pulled away when the sounds of the turtle-ducks distracted them. Katara laughed when Zuko turned to give them a small glare. Taking his hand, the waterbender led her husband toward the cherry blossom tree, where she sat under its leaves. She tugged at his hand to urge him down next to her, and with a smile, he did. But instead of letting him sit beside her, she gently tugged him to lay down with his head pillowed on her lap. With a smile, Zuko did as she asked and relaxed against his wife with his eyes closed. Katara smiled as she glanced down at her husband lying on her lap with a peaceful expression on his usually impassive face.

A moment later, Zuko felt Katara carefully removed his fire crown before releasing his hair from its topknot. Then a content sigh escaped him when he felt her gently run her fingers through his slightly longer hair. He remembered wanting such simple intimacy when he had seen Sokka and Suki in the same position as they made their way to find his mother before he had dismissed the thought as idle fantasies. But now, lying on the grass and his head pillowed on Katara’s warm lap with her fingers caressing his hair, he understood why he had been envious of them. He loved the passionate, physical acts he shared with Katara, but he also enjoyed these sweet and simple moments.

Moments he hoped they would continue to share in the future.
Fulfilling Fantasies

One month passed after the most talked about wedding of the year took place. It was a month the Fire Nation royal couple spent in utter bliss—with a few minor arguments as were to be expected. Zuko’s days belonged to meetings, treaties, training, and other lordly duties. To Iroh’s delight, he came to master his white fire, but Zuko decided to keep his ability a secret. He wanted to keep Jianguo wondering and ignorant of his skills. He had also convinced Iroh to help him bend lightning and not just redirect it. It was slow process, but he was doing much better than he thought he would. Iroh had assured him that in a year or so, Zuko would be able to master the art of bending lightning too.

Although it had been extremely difficult at first and she was still learning, Katara was taking her responsibilities as Fire Lady rather well. Her time was consumed with the undertakings of the palace’s necessities, the wellness of their people, charity works, practicing her waterbending, and the careful friendship and correspondences with the noblewomen, to ensure alliances between their husbands. More work than any Fire Lady had done in memory. Katara was happy to know that she was more than a mere trinket as wife to the Fire Lord. The work gave her purpose during the day and kept her busy when Zuko and she had to be apart. When she had free time or was feeling lonely and homesick, she would visit the remolded Fire Lady bedchamber where Zuko would later find her and either stayed with her or led her back to their room. It had been an eventful, delightful month.

Blue eyes fluttering open, Katara yawned softly as she searched the spot beside her for Zuko only to again be met with cool sheets. She let out a sigh as she again reminded herself that Zuko now always woke up before her to start his busy schedule. With another soft yawn, Katara rolled onto her back only to frown as she remembered that something had woken her up. Just as she was wondering what it was, a small cramp on her lower abdomen made her grimace.

Just great, she groaned irritably.

She quickly got out of bed and headed toward the bathroom. As the bathwater heated up, the waterbender took off her clothes only to groan again when she saw that her underwear was lightly stained with blood. It confirmed her suspicions that her monthly bleeding had come. How could she have forgotten about it? Well, she had been pretty busy.

A disappointed frown marred her features as another thought entered her head. It meant she was not pregnant yet. She shook her head and smiled. Zuko and she had only been married a month. They had plenty of time.

With a nod, she bundled the silky piece of cloth to be discarded later since it was stained. Then she quickly stepped into the bathtub and began to wash herself. She was glad Zuko was not there at the moment. It would have been embarrassing.
A few minutes later, she stepped back into the room, wrapped in a towel. She smiled when she saw that Jiao was already straightening the room. Katara was now used to having Jiao dress her for the day and no longer felt embarrassed to stand half naked before the older woman.

“Good morning, Jiao,” she greeted.

“Good morning, my lady,” the maidservant responded with a smile and a bow as she stepped back from fixing the bed.

“Jiao, I was wondering,” Katara began slowly. “Do you have any old rags I could use?”

“Old rags?” Jiao asked with a bewildered frown.

“Yeah,” Katara replied, “I need them for my monthly bleeding.”

“Oh,” Jiao uttered once she understood before she smiled gently, “Fire Nation noblewomen don’t use old rags.”

“They don’t?” Katara asked before she dryly added, “Why? Do they use silky cloth instead?”

Jiao laughed softly as she moved to pull aside the curtains at the balcony to let the sunlight in.

“No,” she responded amusedly, “There are special strips of cloth they use that are very absorbent. I’m sure if I ask the palace seamstress she can provide some for you whenever you need them.”

“Well, that sounds better than old rags,” Katara responded with a grin before she grimaced as she felt another cramp.

“I’ll go get some for you right now,” the older woman said as she moved toward the door.

A few minutes later, Katara made her way from the royal bedchamber to meet with her mother-in-law to discuss her wish of building a new school for the children in a town miles away from the capital. That way the children would not have to travel a long distance to the capital to attend class and it would also be closer for the children of neighboring villages. As she sat in the sitting room with Ursa after breakfast to discuss more details, Katara was grateful for the new cloths Jiao provided for her. They were soft and comfortable, unlike the rough old rags she made use of before.

As the day progressed, however, the cramps became more painful, and worse, it distracted her from her work. It caused her good mood to disappear and she became cranky and irritated. When lunch came, Zuko decided to join them. Katara’s mood lifted a bit, but only for a short moment so that Zuko found himself the recipient of her sharp tongue and irritated glower. Confused, the young Fire Lord had wisely decided to retreat until his wife’s temper cooled down.

As dinner approached, Zuko made his way toward the royal family dining room in high spirits. He had just received news from one of his colonels stationed in the colonies about the possible whereabouts of Jianguo and his men. It seemed the rebels’ leader had been frequenting a particular tavern to make use of some prostitutes and, apparently, Jianguo had offended one of the women. She did not have any qualms in pointing out his location to the Fire Nation authorities when she saw the wanted poster for his capture when she moved to a bigger town in search of…richer clients. Zuko had sent a reply to his colonel to immediately send men, but to do so as discreetly as possible so as not to alert the former Fire Nation general. Zuko hoped that this time they could finally capture Jianguo and thus end the threat to the Fire Nation, Zuko’s position on the throne, and Katara.

At the thought of his wife, a small frown appeared on his face. He wondered if Katara’s strange mood from before was better now. He did not know what had caused her to become so irritated, but he hoped that this time he would be graced with her smile and not a scowl. As he entered the family dining room, he greeted his mother and uncle when they called to him with nods before he sat down at the head of the table. He frowned when he saw that the chair to his right was empty.

“Where is my wife?” he asked one of the servants as they moved around to place their food before them.

“Fire Lady Katara said she was not hungry and retired early, my lord,” she rapidly replied.

Zuko frowned as he picked up his chopsticks and absentmindedly started eating. Was Katara not feeling well? He barely paid attention to what Ursa and Iroh were talking about as he finished his meal quickly. Once done, he swiftly stood up.

“I’m going to check on Katara,” he said as he strode toward the doors, “Good night.”

He did not hear their replies since he was already out of the room. He walked quickly toward the chambers he shared with Katara. He was eager to make love to her. A month had passed since their wedding night and he still could not get enough of her. She touched him in the ways he liked best, ways that brought him immense pleasure. She would tell him how handsome he was, how happy he made her, and what great pleasure she derived from his touch, stroking his male pride. He hoped he could help Katara with whatever was affecting her at the moment so they could spend the rest of the night in more pleasurable activities.

As he reached the large golden doors that led to the royal rooms, Zuko swiftly opened one and closed it behind him. He quickly crossed the antechamber before he opened the other set of doors that led to the bedroom. He closed the door softly and frowned when he saw it was dark, even the fireplace had been extinguished. With a smirk, he willed a few candles to light up and he eagerly scanned the room for his wife. His lusty grin faded from his face when he saw that Katara was already lying down with the blanket drawn up to her neck.

I’ll just have to wake her up, he thought wickedly as he began to discard his clothes. His grin reappeared as he strode toward the bed.

Not bothering to put on his sleeping pants, the firebender lifted the blanket and slid in naked beside his sleeping wife. He pressed close against her back and groaned quietly as his loins rubbed against her firm rear. He reached around her and softly began to play with one of her covered breasts. He heard her groan, and with a triumphant smile, his caress became rougher as he ground his hips more insistently against her.

“Zuko?” he heard her mumble.

“I want you,” he growled huskily against her ear as he squeezed her breast.

“Not now,” she grumbled as she pushed his hand aside and scooted away from his heated advances.

Zuko could only stare at her back in shock. Was…was she rejecting him? Surely that wasn’t it. She was just playing, right? She was just challenging him, trying to make him go crazy in want of her. With a smirk, Zuko wrapped an arm around her and pulled her back against him.

“Why not?” he asked throatily.

“I’m not in the mood,” she responded with a low hiss.
“Well, I can change that really quickly,” he told her in a husky tone as he again pressed his growing erection against her backside and began to pull the hem of her nightdress up, “Now let’s get this off so we can—”

“I said not now!” Katara snapped as she slapped his hand away and again moved away from him.

Zuko’s eyes widened in shock at her outburst as well at the fact that she did not want to be intimate with him. He had heard that after a few years some wives lost interest in sex, but he had never thought his own wife would…and so soon in their marriage! It would kill him if Katara no longer allowed him to make love to her! He frowned deeply and opened his mouth to ask what the hell was going on, but he paused when he saw her curl into herself as she let out a pained groan.

“Katara!” he asked in alarm as he gently placed his hand on her arm, “What’s wrong?”

“Nothing. I’m fine,” she mumbled before she groaned softly in pain again.

“Don’t lie to me, Katara,” he growled.

“Leave me alone,” she moaned miserably as she crossed her arms over her abdomen.

“I won’t leave you alone until you tell me what’s wrong,” Zuko insisted firmly as he sat up so he could look down at her. He frowned in worry as he noticed her pinched features. “Katara?”

“It’s just cramps,” she mumbled after a while.

“Cramps?” he asked with a frown. “Did you eat something bad? Do you want me to call Physician Toshiro?”

“No,” she quickly replied, “It’s nothing serious. You don’t have to call him.”

“I don’t understand. You look to be in pain,” he responded in worry as she again groaned.

Katara glanced over her shoulder to see his concerned face. She felt her face heat up a little before she turned away and curled more into herself.

“I...I’m on my monthly bleeding,” she whispered shyly.

“Monthly bleeding?” Zuko repeated with an incomprehensive frown before his eyes widened once he understood what she meant.

He was not very familiar with the ailment that befell all women—after all, he had lived on a ship with only men for years. But he had a vague understanding about it just like all men did. When Azula had been chasing them down, his uncle used to joke that Azula was at her most homicidal when she had her monthly time.

“Oh,” he uttered for lack of anything better to say. Now he understood why Katara had been in a bad mood.

Katara’s shoulders slumped. It seemed her anger had rushed out of her.

“I’m sorry,” she said quietly.

“Why are you apologizing? It’s not your fault,” he told her gently, “It’s not like you can help it.”

“Well, I’m sorry for snapping at you,” she replied before she again looked over her shoulder to give him a sheepish smile, “It’s not like it’s your fault I have to suffer this every month.”

Zuko shrugged and gave her a small smile before he frowned.

“Why didn’t you tell me?” he asked.

He cocked an eyebrow when she averted her eyes.

“I was embarrassed,” she finally mumbled.
“What’s there to be embarrassed about something that is natural?” he replied gently, “Besides, we’re married. I’m bound to find out every time it happens.”

Katara turned her head to smile at him.

“You’re right,” she told him as she snuggled back against him.

Zuko lay back down beside her and wrapped an arm around her, glad to know she was not really mad at him.

“You know, it’s tradition among the Fire Nation nobility for women to sleep in separate rooms from their husbands during such a time,” the firebender idly informed her.

Katara turned slightly so she could look at his face. She frowned.

“Is this your way of telling me you want me to leave?” she asked with a raised eyebrow.

“Of course not,” he responded quickly as he pressed her back against him again. “I was just saying.”

“Good,” the waterbender said as she again snuggled into him with a grin, “because I’m not moving. If you want to sleep in a separate room during my monthly time, then you can leave.”

“Oh? What’s this? You dare kick the Fire Lord out of his own room?” Zuko told her in a mock indignant tone.

“Our room, my love,” Katara reminded him with a grin.

Zuko chuckled quietly as he curled himself around her and placed his hand against her lower stomach. He froze before he slowly made to move his hand away. He paused, however, when Katara grabbed his hand and pressed it back against her abdomen.

“Your warmth makes the pain go away a bit,” she said with a soft sigh.
Zuko pressed his hand more firmly against her and smiled when she let out a relieved breath.

“Do you always get cramps?” he asked curiously.

“No,” she responded, “I usually don’t get them at all, but when I do they’re very painful.”

“Is there anything that can help your pain?” he asked with a frown.

“I think there are some teas that can help,” she replied after a while, “I’ll ask Ursa if she could recommend one.”

Zuko nodded. They were silent for a moment, each lost in their own thoughts. Katara was beginning to doze off since Zuko’s warm hand was soothing her cramps, but Zuko was far from sleepy. This would be the first night that he wouldn’t make love to Katara since the first night of their honeymoon. His body was still too strung up from his earlier arousal.

“How long does your, uh, monthly bleeding last?” he asked carefully.

“A few days,” she responded with a soft yawn.

A few days?! Zuko exclaimed mentally in dismay. He will have to abstain from taking Katara for a few days?! How was he going to survive?

His was brought out of his self-pitying thoughts when he heard Katara let out a pained groan as she again curled into herself. Without even thinking about it, Zuko warmed his hand with firebending and rubbed it against her lower abdomen. He smiled when he felt Katara’s tense body relax and heard her let out a contented sigh.
How much more of an insensitive jerk could he be? He told himself that he could sacrifice his desires while his wife was on her monthly time. After all, she was the one who was truly suffering. Besides, the anticipation would only make it sweeter for when they could be joined physically again.

With a sigh, Zuko tightened his hold of her and closed his eyes.

“Are you warm enough?” Aang’s concerned voice made Toph huff.

“I’m fine,” she muttered.

The bedrolls they were laying on, plus the blankets and the large campfire had her feeling very toasty. She could hear Appa’s loud snores and Momo’s soft chirps as they slept off to one side.

Ever since the incident, Aang never left her side and did everything in his power to please her. She would snap at him and indignantly remind him that she was a strong earthbender and did not need to be pampered, though secretly there was a part of her that was pleased at the attention. She may be a tough fighter and an independent individual, but she was a woman, and what woman did not like being shown affection by the man she favored? Aang ignored her protests and insisted that he just wanted to make her happy.

Toph frowned slightly. Something had changed, she didn’t know what it was, but Aang seemed different somehow when he interacted with her. Even the kisses they shared were different, though not in a bad way. His kisses were more gentle, passionate, and…caring?

She shook her head. She was confused at his behavior, but he had not said anything and she did not want to pressure him into telling her anything he did not want…at least not until she lost her patience.

She brought the blanket that Aang had covered them both with up to her chin. Ever since that night Aang had held her in his arms as she slept, he had continued to do so every night. He would not hear any of her protest to be given her space, though they both knew that if she really wanted her space that badly she would have done something about it. And she knew that he knew that she enjoyed sleeping next to him if the smugness that radiated off of him the next day was any indication.

The smug bastard, she thought irritably.

But she loved the jerk. There was no denying that, even to herself. And even though it galled her to admit it, she was afraid to tell him again. Sure he already knew when she had told him after his confrontation with Zuko, but she had not repeated it since then. If he decided one day that he really could not love her, then she preferred that they parted ways without feeling like a rejected fool and without letting him know that she would be heartbroken. She sighed.

Now I know how Sweetness and Sparky must have felt, she thought begrudgingly.

She was interrupted from her thoughts when she felt Aang wrap his arm around her before he let out a sigh. By the sound of his even breathing and heartbeat she knew he had fallen asleep. With a yawn, the small earthbender closed her eyes and cuddled closer to him now that she knew he was not awake to notice. She was just drifting off to sleep when Aang’s sudden increase in heartbeat caught her attention followed by his soft groan.

“Toph,” she heard him whimper in his sleep.

She frowned. Was he having a nightmare? She made to roll to her other side to wake him up, but she was unable to because he tightened his hold of her. With a huff, she reached for his arm so she could loosen his hold enough so she could breathe, but paused when she felt something poking her lower back. She frowned. What the hell? Was she lying on a stick or a rock? Still constricted, she reached behind her to see if she could find the stupid thing and throw it away so she could sleep. Her hand bumped against something and she grabbed it, finding it hard and warm. She absentmindedly heard Aang moan, but she was more concerned with getting rid of the annoying rock. As she grabbed it more tightly, she heard Aang gasp before she felt him grab her hand.

“Toph!” he exclaimed in surprise, now completely awake, before he quickly apologized, “I’m sorry. I can’t control my body’s reaction.”

“What?” she asked. Then her eyes widened once she comprehended what he meant, but more importantly what she still held in her hand. Her green eyes widened even more when she felt it grow bigger.

Aang groaned softly. He had been dreaming about doing very erotic things to Toph before he was awaken by a spark of pleasure that raced up his spine as his semi-erect member was grabbed by a hand that was not his. He was afraid of her reaction, but how could he have stopped his body’s response to having the woman he loved pressed so close to him? Mustering all his will, he tried to move her hand away so he could be at a more safe distance before she lashed out at him. He gasped in shock when she did not pull away, but instead tightened her hold as she turned toward him. Wide-eyed, he stared down at her to see her blank expression.
“Where you having a naughty dream about me, Twinkletoes?” she asked with a raised eyebrow.

“I-I…uh…” he stammered, knowing that he could not lie because she would immediately detect it and also knowing he would be in big trouble if he admitted it.

“Well?” she insisted.

She squeezed him again and he groaned. Why had she not let him go? If she continued touching him, he would be searching for clean trousers soon.

“I…um…I…Yes,” he finally confessed quietly before a smirk appeared on his lips.

Why should he feel bad? If she was truly angry or repulsed, she would have thrown him away from her as soon as she realized what was happening, but instead she hadn’t and was still holding him.

“Why? Are you happy I have naughty dreams of you?” he whispered huskily.

By the light the campfire created, he watched as a blush spread across her cheeks even as she spluttered, and his smirk widened. She tried to pull away from him immediately, but he held her hand against him and even made her squeeze him again as he leaned closer to her.

“This is what you do to me,” he groaned before he smashed his lips to hers.

Toph gasped, unsure whether to push him away or bring him closer. She decided to press herself closer to him instead as she returned his ardent kisses with fervent ones of her own. She was not the least bit intimidated, just curious, and honestly, excited that she was able to affect him so strongly. She was so lost to the sensations and the heady feeling of power that she almost missed his whispered confession.

“I love you, Toph.”

She froze instantly and he stiffened, though he still continued to hold her.
“What…what did you say?” she asked in an uncharacteristic soft tone.

“I love you,” he repeated softly, “I think I’ve loved you for a long time, but didn’t want to acknowledge it. But when you got hurt…” He paused and let out a shaky breath before he continued, “I love you like I’ve never loved before.”

“Not even Katara?” she asked with a raised eyebrow.

He was quiet for a moment as he evaluated the feeling before he continued.

“Yes,” he admitted before he smiled, “I did tell you that maybe one day I would love you more than my own life.”

Toph was silent a moment and Aang knew she was trying to detect if he was being sincere. It seemed she found what she wanted because she grinned broadly.

“Good,” she said before she brought him down toward her so she could kiss him deeply.

Toph could not stop the frantic beating of her heart as a sudden fierce joy spread through her chest. She could not believe it. Aang loved her! Not Katara, but her, Toph! She never thought she would ever know what love was or what being loved in return meant, but she was starting to see that it was amazing.

After a moment, Aang pulled away with a gasp before he frowned.

“Well?” he prompted.

“Well what?” she asked.

“You didn’t say you love me back,” he said with a deeper frown.

“So?”
“So?” he repeated incredulously before he more firmly said, “I want to hear you actually say it.”

Toph bit her lip as she gathered her courage to tell him, it was embarrassing, after all. It seemed she had taken too long to answer because Aang sighed sadly and began to move away from her. She tightened her hold of him to keep him against her.

“I love you, you idiot,” she mumbled with a blush before she bit out, “Happy?”

“Very!” he exclaimed gleefully before he pressed his lips against hers again.

A few seconds later, he pulled away with a gasp when her thigh brushed between his legs. His arousal had not gone away, but increased instead.

“I see that something else is happy,” she teased with a grin, not at all shy or scared at his reaction.

She chuckled when Aang pressed his head onto her shoulder with an embarrassed groan.

The light streaming from the opened balcony stirred Katara from her slumber. She blinked her eyes opened and saw the curtains swaying gently as the sun’s rays fell upon the marble floor. The previous night had been hot, so Zuko had opened the doors to let the cool air in. She smiled as she remembered the day Zuko had shown her what lay behind the curtains. It had been the day after he had shown her the restored Royal Palace Garden. He had not wanted to spoil the surprise by letting her see the renovated garden from the balcony.

‘Come,’ he said with a smile as he held out his hand, ‘I want to show you something.’

Katara paused from reaching for her fire crown in order to place it in its box. Curious, she took his hand and smiled as he led her toward the dark curtains that hid the outside view. Zuko pulled the curtains aside before he opened the doors. A soft breeze blew in and Katara deeply breathed in the flowery scent that came to her senses. Taking her hand again, Zuko led her onto the balcony.

‘Wow,’ the waterbender breathed.
Below them she could see one part of the beautiful garden. The cherry blossom tree and the pond were a few feet away. And behind the wall surrounding the garden at the distance, she could see the setting sun touching the ocean.

‘Amazing, isn’t it?’ Zuko spoke up quietly.

‘Yes,’ she responded just as softly.

She felt Zuko stand behind her and she smiled when he wrapped his arms around her and pulled her against him. They stood on the balcony in comfortable silence for a long moment, even as the sun disappeared and the moon rose high in the sky.

With a soft smile, Katara rolled onto her back only to freeze when she bumped into something hard. She glanced to her left side, and blinked owlishly as her blue eyes met with the body of her sleeping husband. She was curious as to why he was still asleep since he was always awake at dawn and gone before she woke up. Not that she minded. She liked waking up next to him while he slept. Shifting so that she was lying on her side facing him, Katara admired his sleeping form with warm, caressing eyes. He was lying on his back and his lips were slightly parted. Her eyes traced every inch of his handsome face before trailing down to caress every muscular ridge of his naked torso. Too bad the bed sheets impeded the rest of her view.

He had been so busy lately, he needed his rest, but she knew they could not afford to sleep the day away. She would make sure to have him sleep that night and ignore his pleas for intimacy, although they had not made love the past few days due to her monthly time. Even though he had tried to be understanding and had not made any sexual advances towards her, she had known he was affected by it, so she had proposed that she pleasure him with her mouth and hands until she was ready again. He had protested at first, but only a few times before he caved in.

Katara grinned before she shook her head. She needed to wake him up before he was late to any of his meetings.

She reached over and caressed his cheek, but he did not stir at all. She called his name softly, but he only murmured sleepily. She ran her hand down his chest and over his stomach. He groaned softly, but did not wake up. With an affectionate smile on her face, Katara shook her head and sighed. Sitting up, the young Fire Lady crawled over him and sat on top of him, straddling his waist.

“Zuko,” she called again, “Zuko, it’s time to get up.”
“I am up,” she heard him mumble and saw his lips curl into a smile.

She gasped softly when he gently bucked his hips, letting her feel his swelling length against her. He ran his hands over her thighs, trying to raise the hem of her nightdress up.

“I didn’t mean it like that!” she exclaimed with a giggle as she slapped his hands away.

Zuko chuckled and opened his eyes to grin at her as he tried to lift her nightgown again. Katara again playfully slapped his wandering hands.

“Dawn passed hours ago. You’re going to be late,” she reminded him as she tried to get off him, but he stopped her by grabbing her hips.

“I don’t have much of a busy schedule today,” he told her unconcernedly as he rubbed circles on her covered hips with his thumbs.

“That’s good. You needed to catch up on some sleep,” she said with a smile.

Before Zuko could respond, she removed his hands and rolled away from him. She scooted toward the edge of the bed before standing up.

“I’m going to get our clothes ready,” she informed him as she walked toward the large wardrobe.

Zuko sat up with a suppressed groan as his morning erection throbbed with his need. Trying to redirect his thoughts on something else, Zuko looked around the room and surveyed how it had changed now that he was married to Katara. His old wardrobe had been replaced by a larger one that could hold both their clothes, shoes, and other items—though there was a secret plank on the bottom of his side where he hid his metal chest containing his Blue Spirit outfit. He had bought Katara a vanity set that had replaced his old bureau. It was made of the same dark wood as the rest of his furniture, but he had commissioned the vanity set to have beautiful and elegant carvings of flowers round the legs, the edges, and the frame of the delicate mirror. An elegantly iron-wrought, full-length mirror was placed in one corner for both their use. Before the fireplace were two comfortable armchairs where they sometimes sat to read and a small table between them so they could place their tea. There were also a few feminine items such a flower vases and decorations that Katara had tastefully brought in because his room had been ‘too masculine’.
It was different, but he did not mind for it meant that he was no longer alone and had someone to share his room and life with. He felt more satisfied with life at that moment like he had never felt before. He finally had his mother back with him after thinking her dead for so many years and now he was blissfully married to and deeply in love with a wonderful woman like Katara.

It reminded him that in just a few more days it will be her birthday. Katara was a bit sad at the news that her family would not be able to be with her because Hakoda had accidentally fallen on ice and broken his leg and Jing and Ting had caught a cold. She had wanted to immediately rush back to the Southern Water Tribe to help, but they had insisted that they were fine before reminding her she had duties to attend to now as Fire Lady. Although her family could not be there, Zuko vowed that he would give her an unforgettable birthday. He needed to talk to his uncle and mother and start planning.

“I’m going to get the bath started,” Katara’s voice brought him out of his thoughts.

Zuko watched her hips sway as she walked into the bathing room. He licked his lips and smirked before he frowned. He wondered if Katara was ready to be made love to already. He had not had her for days once her monthly time began and he was going crazy with want. Sure he enjoyed it when she pleasured him with her hands and that wonderful mouth of hers, but it was not the same as being inside her tight, wet passage. And they had not had morning sex since their honeymoon because he always woke up early to start his busy day, he mused with a wistful expression.

Pulling the bed sheet aside and swinging his long legs over the bed, Zuko stood up naked, stretched, and quickly walked into the bathroom. He saw that Katara was about to heat up the water. With a smirk, he silently stepped closer.

“Let me,” he offered huskily.

Katara started in surprised before she turned toward him. Zuko stepped beside her near the tub and dipped his right hand into the water. He heated the water with firebending, and once the water was steaming nicely, he pulled his hand out.

“Thanks,” Katara said with a smile.

She gasped when Zuko suddenly wrapped his arm around her and pulled her up against him. She moaned softly when he kissed her deeply before pulling away.
“We’ll save water and time if we share a bath,” he told her playfully as he smirked down at her.

He was surprised when, instead of being embarrassed, Katara smiled coyly yet seductively as she wrapped her arms around his neck.

“I did tell you we would share a bath one day, so let’s take a bath together,” she purred.

“Is your monthly bleeding over?” he asked hopefully.

“Yes,” Katara assured him with a smile before she pressed herself closer to him, “And I want you, Zuko.”

Zuko groaned deeply before he pulled her up to kiss her fervently. He quickly stripped her of her clothes, uncaring if he had torn them in his haste for his mind was already hazy with his lust. He swiftly grabbed her to him again and they both moaned when their naked skin touched. Katara wantonly rubbed her stomach against his hard erection and Zuko hissed in pleasure before he swiftly lifted her into his arms. He hastily yet carefully stepped into the bathtub before sinking into the warm water, resting his back against the edge. He brought Katara down upon his lap and moaned when his hardening shaft became wedged between them. He enjoyed the wet, slippery sensation of their flesh pressed together and he groaned throatily.

Ignoring the temptation of just lifting Katara onto his stiff cock for the moment, Zuko grabbed the sponge and poured some of the liquid soap from the bottle his waterbender had laid out on the edge of the tub. Rubbing it into a rich lather, he brought the sponge and his other soapy hand to her shoulders and began to massage her flesh gently. Then he worked on her neck and face before returning to massaging her shoulders again.

Katara let out a soft sigh of contentment. She moaned as his long fingers worked the tension from her body and her head fell forward so she could give him more access. Zuko carefully laid her against his arm and urged her head closer to the water so he could cup some of the warm liquid and pour it onto her head until her hair turned a dark chocolate brown from being drenched. Then he pulled her back up against him and once again picked up the soapy sponge. He rubbed it along each of her arms and then as far as he could reach of her legs in this position before he gently scrubbed it over her back.

Katara sighed softly again. She was feeling so relaxed. She had assumed that Zuko would have immediately attacked her with his passion and she had been eagerly waiting for it. But this felt really, really nice.
Slowly, caressingly, Zuko graced his wife’s stomach and torso with the sponge and his warm hand. Her breath accelerated when he moved closer to her breasts before he pulled away. He smirked when she huffed in disappointment. He poured more soap onto the sponge before he placed his hands right below her breasts. He trailed his hands down her lean stomach before slowly trailing them back up. Then his hands were on her breasts and she let out a soft, little cry as her head fell against his shoulder. He took a much longer time on washing each breast, paying extra attention to her hardening nipples.

Looking over her shoulder, Zuko watched the movement of his hands. He was mesmerized by the sight of her soft mounds and dusky peaks glistening wetly and covered with suds as he pushed them up and continued rubbing them. He loved the feeling of having Katara’s wet breasts cupped in his hands. Agni, he wanted her. He nuzzled her cheek before he nudged her to lift her head toward him. Once she did, gazing at him dazedly, he bent down to kiss her sweetly parted lips with all the leisured meticulousness of a man in no hurry.

Moaning softly into her husband’s mouth, Katara trembled as he continued to touch her. She felt herself grow so hot and wet with need. And he was not even touching her most sensitive spot! She could feel her heart pounding in fierce anticipation. As if reading her thoughts, he suddenly turned her around on his lap, causing her to gasp as he made her straddle him with her legs spread around his hips. She heard him moan deeply when her core pressed against his hard erection. The warm, soapy water and her juices created a wonderful lubricant.

“Mm,” he murmured as he gazed down at her, “I saved the best for last.”

Katara moaned and arched her back when he pressed the sponge to her sensitive center. She began to pant heavily as he rubbed the soapy sponge along her delicate folds. She could feel more of her aroused fluids seep out of her as her walls clenched in need. Her head rested heavily on his shoulder, her eyes closed, as she panted and moaned near his ear. She was ready to come apart by the time he lifted a hand to grab one slippery mound and brought it up to his face so he could take a wet, pebbled nipple to his hot mouth. She began to shamelessly moan and whine into his shoulder, quietly pleading for more, begging him to bring her to that blissful end.

Zuko suckled his waterbender’s nipple hard before he pulled away so he could watch her face. Her features were flushed and filled with passion as he continued to move the sponge firmly against her pussy. He was more than ready to make love to her again. He never knew bathing his wife could be so incredibly arousing and erotic. He was so hard he was sure he would go insane if he did not bury himself inside her soon. The sounds she was making and the way her wet breasts rubbed against his chest certainly were not helping him to retain his control. She truly was a water nymph.

“Please, Zuko!” she moaned urgently, “Take me! Please!”
A loud groan escaped Zuko’s throat at her plea. With a growl, he threw the sponge aside, grabbed both her ass cheeks in his hands and lifted her before he swiftly impaled her onto his hard cock in one, fluid move.

“Yes!” the young lord hissed in pleasure.

With a cry, Katara wrapped her arms around his neck and pressed her thighs tightly around his flexing hips as he thrust hard and fast into her like a man possessed.

“Ah, Katara!” he growled as he impaled her roughly onto him, “I missed being inside you so much! It was torture!”

Katara could not find her voice to respond to him as she continued to cry out her overwhelming pleasure every time his hard shaft penetrated her so wonderfully. The feeling of him inside her, pushing deep into her and forcing her body to stretch for him was a blissful sensation that she would never tire of. Water splashed everywhere around them as they rocked desperately against each other. A few minutes later, their release came upon them faster than they had anticipated and they cried out their pleasure as they clung to each other once they reached that wonderful pinnacle.

They moaned and trembled against one another as they waited for their incredible pleasure to subside and their heartbeats to slow down from their thundering pace. After a long moment of just basking in the afterglow, Katara pulled back slightly to smile at him.

“That was wonderful,” she breathed, “I wish I hadn’t waited this long for us to bathe together.”

Chuckling, Zuko cupped her cheek gently before he kissed her, claiming her lips in a slow dance of tender passion.

Katara sighed as she returned his kiss just as affectionately. He made her feel so thoroughly cared for, so utterly desired and loved, that she felt herself fall even more in love with this man than she thought possible. She did not know what she would do if she were ever to lose him. She trembled at the thought and kissed him almost desperately as she pressed herself even more tightly to him, as if she could permanently hold him to her forever. They pulled apart when the need for air became too great.
“Let me wash your hair,” he said as he smiled at her now that he no longer felt like he was about to die in want of her. Still imbedded inside her, he twirled one of her long, wet locks around his finger.

“Okay,” she replied with a bright smile, “Then it’s my turn to wash you.”

They took turns washing each other meticulously before they decided they were both satisfactorily clean. With Katara in his arms, Zuko stood and carefully stepped out of the tub before setting her down on her feet. He grabbed the red towel she had set aside and rubbed the moisture from her hair. Then he slowly began to dab the drops from her face, her arms, her stomach, and her legs. He took extra attention of patting her inner thighs and breasts dry. Katara sighed blissfully at his attention even though she could have used her waterbending to dry both of them off. Once he stepped away, Katara opened her eyes to smile at him.

She grabbed another towel and copied his actions—although she focused most of her attention in wiping down his manhood. She quickly moved away with a giggle when it twitched and Zuko reached out for her with a growl. Once they were both dry and Katara had used her waterbending to remove the water off the floor into the tub, they returned to their room and helped each other get dressed, which took longer than usual since they kept teasing each other.

“Do you have anything important to do today?” she asked once they stepped out of their room.

“No. I just have a few papers to look over,” he replied before he looked down at her with a raised eyebrow, “Why?”

“I was wondering if you wanted to have breakfast in the veranda and spend some time with me in the Royal Palace Garden,” she began with a smile, “It’s such a beautiful day.”

“Hm, what a difficult decision,” Zuko mused playfully, “Look over a bunch of boring papers or spend some time with my beautiful wife…?”

He frowned as if it was really a hard decision and Katara bit her lip to curb her smile.

“Fine,” he finally replied with a mock resigned sigh. “But just know that I protested with all my might.”
Katara laughed as she tucked her hand under the crook of his arm and leaned against him.

“That’s what we’ll tell everybody, my lord,” she said with a serious nod before she laughed again.

In the private garden, they ate their delicious breakfast and then spent the entire morning feeding the turtle-ducks and koi fish, walking among the flowers, sitting beneath their cherry blossom tree and talking about idle things the way only lovers do. When noon approached, they ate lunch before they had to go their separate ways to attend to their duties, but not before promising to see each other later that night.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

In his study the next day, Zuko was just signing one of the last documents on his desk when he heard a knock at his door. He bid whoever was outside to enter before looking up when he heard the door close. He raised a dark eyebrow when he saw it was Kuo. His personal guards were usually training or doing other things when he was in his study, so he was curious to know why he was there.

“Kuo, what is it?” he asked.

The young guard bowed before he approached the desk. He cleared his throat before he straightened himself more fully.

“My lord,” he began slowly, “I’ve come to tell you that I have asked Jiao to marry me.”

Zuko relaxed against his chair. For a second he had been worried that something had happened to his family.

“Congratulations, Kuo,” he told him sincerely, “Jiao must be very happy.”

“She is,” Kuo replied and a small smile appeared on his face.

“So when is the wedding?” Zuko asked as he set aside the document he had signed.

“Jiao and I have decided to get married after Fire Lady Katara’s birthday,” Kuo informed him, his smile growing a bit more.
“That was pretty quick,” Zuko mused before he mentally laughed at himself, Says the one who wanted to marry Katara as soon as he realized he was in love with her.

“That’s great,” he said instead.

Kuo cleared his throat again and subtly shifted, indicating to Zuko that he was nervous about something. Zuko raised his eyebrow again in silent inquiry.

“I would like to ask for your permission to allow Jiao and me a day off for our honeymoon, my lord,” Kuo told him, his tone hiding a hint of hope.

Zuko gave him a small smile.

“Both of you have served me well these past years and for that I will give you three days for your honeymoon as a gift.”

Besides, Katara will give me hell if I only gave them a day off, he mused dryly.

Kuo’s light-golden eyes widened at such generosity. After all, most of the time servants were expected to keep working after any special occasion. He smiled and bowed deeply in gratitude.

“Thank you so much, my lord,” he said gratefully.

A few minutes later, Kuo was rushing out of the Fire Lord’s study in order to search for his future bride to tell her the good news.

Zuko could only chuckle at his personal guard’s enthusiasm as he went back to work. Was he just as eager when he sought Katara out to let her know the Court Council had allowed them to get married? With a shake of his head, the Fire Lord unfurled the next scroll before him.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

“How generous of you, Zuko!” Katara exclaimed as she grasped the maidservant’s hands and gleefully squeezed.
“Thank you so much, my lady,” Jiao responded with a large, happy smile as she just as joyfully returned the gesture. She no longer felt so shocked whenever the Fire Lady acted so friendly toward her.

“This must be the year for weddings,” Lady Ursa commented with a smile as she watched the young women.

Katara and Jiao looked at each other and giggled.

Kuo had interrupted their activity a few minutes ago and asked to speak to Jiao. Katara and Ursa had surreptitiously glanced at the couple as they talked in the entrance of the room only to gape when the usually calm Jiao had squealed and jumped into Kuo’s arms. They had been even more shocked when the normally serious Kuo had laughed deeply as he caught her and kissed her intensely before he pulled away in embarrassment once he remembered they were not alone. He had bowed and muttered a sheepish apology before he quickly turned around and left. Jiao had come back into the room with a large smile on her face, and after some prompting, she told them the Fire Lord had given them permission to get married and have three days off for their honeymoon.

“If only my parents were alive to see me get married,” Jiao said with a sad smile.

“I’m sure they are proud of you, wherever they are,” Katara told her gently, “And they would’ve approved of Kuo. He will make you happy.”

“I know,” Jiao replied as her happiness once again returned.

After a few more congratulations, Katara and Ursa once again turned their attention to their plan on setting up the school. Once they had all the details straightened out, they would have to present their ideas before the Court Council and the Fire Lord. Even if the advisors protested, both women knew Zuko would approve. And if the Fire Lord approved, the old advisors would not be able to say much about it.

A few hours later, the Fire Lady and her mother-in-law made their way to the royal couple’s anteroom to meet up with Zuko and Iroh for dinner. Katara smiled as Zuko entered a few minutes later and sat down next to her with a small smile of his own. She told him she was very happy he allowed Jiao and Kuo to have three days for their honeymoon. Zuko only shrugged and smiled at her as they continued to eat. Once they finished, the servants cleared the dishes and brought them tea as the Dragon of the West had asked them to.
“Here, don’t forget to drink your tea,” Iroh interrupted the couple as he poured them each a cup of tea from a separate teapot.

Katara smiled as she took the offered teacup and took a small sip. Zuko also took a sip before he frowned down at the tea.

“Uncle, why do you give us separate teas?” he asked suspiciously as he eyed the other teapot Iroh was using to pour himself and Ursa tea. “You’ve been doing it for a few weeks.”

“Ah, always so perceptive, my nephew,” the retired general exclaimed with a calm smile as he took a sip of his own tea.

“It’s not hard to miss two teapots,” Zuko responded dryly.

Katara giggled softly.

“It’s only ginseng tea…” Iroh began innocently.

Zuko raised his dark eyebrow.

“…blended with the extracts of rose petals and Damiana leaves,” the old man added.

“What does it do?”

“Are you accusing your old uncle of deceit?” Iroh asked with wide innocent eyes.

“Absolutely,” Zuko responded bluntly.

“Ah,” Iroh feigned shock, throwing his hand over his heart. “You wound me terribly, Nephew!”
Katara and Ursa chuckled at his dramatic display.

“What’s the reason behind the blend?” the Fire Lord prompted firmly.

When Zuko raised a dark eyebrow again, the old man’s hurt expression vanished.

“Why, it’s so you can perform your husbandly duties, Zuko!” Iroh finally confessed with a grin, “It’s an aphrodisiac tea that I recently created. Is it good?”

“Uncle!” both Zuko and Katara exclaimed in embarrassment.

“What?” the old man said innocently. Ursa hid her laughter behind her hand.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at him before he straightened himself and tilted his nose in the air.

“I don’t need the help of any tea to bed my wife,” he said with an arrogant sniff.

“Zuko!” Katara yelled in mortification as her entire face turned red.

“Good! Then it won’t be long before the next heir will be born!” Iroh exclaimed cheerfully.

Zuko smirked and Katara turned a darker shade of red as she looked down at her teacup in embarrassment. The Fire Lord watched intensely as his wife sat very primly next to him, the very picture of decorum. Nothing indicated that her very hands, small and delicate, folded so modestly in her lap, had raked his back during her throes of pleasure the previous night, leaving small welts on his skin. Not that he was complaining, he mused with a mental groan.

At that moment, there was a knock at the door before Jiao appeared. With a small bow, she told Katara there was something that needed her attention. The waterbender did not even wait for her to be finished before she was walking out the door. Jiao turned around and smiled when the Fire Lord gave her an approving nod for calling his wife away as planned. Then she closed the door and followed after the still blushing Fire Lady.
Zuko found it tremendously endearing that his wife was so demure and bashful when it came to such things in the company of others, yet was a wanton goddess when it was just the two of them in the privacy of their room. He found such a contrast to be so enticing.

The young firebender looked away from the door once Katara was out of his sight to give his uncle a small glare for embarrassing them like that, but the old man grinned unrepentantly, even going so far as gesturing for his nephew to continue drinking the tea. Ursa shook her head with a smile before she cleared her throat.

“Now that Katara is away, we can start planning what to do for her birthday,” she began.

“We should make it a big celebration just like Zuko’s was,” Iroh suggested as he calmly took a sip of his normal green tea.

“Katara won’t like it,” Zuko immediately rejected the idea, “especially since her family won’t be able to visit.”

“That’s a shame,” the old man said with a small sigh.

“I want Katara’s birthday celebration to be special and intimate,” Zuko began musingly.

“I think that it a wonderful idea,” Ursa said with a smile, “That way she won’t have to be surrounded by irritating nobles and will have fun.”

The three of them continued planning before pausing when the door was opened and Katara stepped into the room. The waterbender paused after a step since they had all stopped talking and turned to look at her.

“It’s getting late. I think I will retire for the night,” Iroh was the first to speak. He stood up with a small yawn. “Good night.”

“I think I’ll retire to my room as well,” Ursa spoke up softly as she stood up, “I wonder if Jee has already returned.”
Both of them did not wait for a reply as they quickly left the room. Katara watched them go in bewilderment before turning to her silent husband once the door was closed.

“What was that about?” she asked as she approached the low table.

“Nothing,” he responded coolly with a small shrug as he stood up.

Then with a smirk, he reached for her and pulled her toward him until she was flush against his body.

“You know, I think Uncle’s tea is really effective,” he told her huskily, “I really want to bed my wife right now.”

Katara giggled at him as he leaned down to kiss her before squealing when he scooped her into his arms and strode quickly toward their bedchamber.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

A few days later, Katara found herself waking up alone in their room. She frowned since she did not remember Zuko rousing her enough to say good morning and that he would see her later in the day like he always did. Today was her birthday, the day she turned twenty years old. Did he forget? She shook her head when she felt sadness settle over her. She was getting ahead of herself. She was sure Zuko would remember later. After all, he was a very busy man.

Pushing the blanket aside, the waterbender got up and headed toward the bathroom to take a bath. She smiled as she remembered that pleasurable day when they had bathed together. They would definitely do that again. As she returned to the bedchamber a few minutes later, she saw Jiao straightening the room. Her clothes were already neatly laid out at the foot of the bed.

“Good morning, Jiao,” Katara greeted her happily.

“Good morning, my lady,” the maidservant replied with a smile.

She neared the Fire Lady and quietly began dressing her for the day. Katara’s smile faded when Jiao did not congratulate her as she continued to dress her silently. Maybe Jiao did not know it was her birthday. After all, only those closest to her knew.
Once Katara was dressed and ready, Jiao led her to the antechamber where her breakfast was being laid out. Katara sat down on the cushion and waited silently for Zuko, Ursa, and Iroh to show up. When a few minutes passed and there was no sign of them, Katara turned to Jiao with a frown.

“Jiao, where is everybody?” she asked.

“Fire Lord Zuko went into the city with General Iroh,” the young woman spoke up, “Lady Ursa said she would be visiting a friend and Admiral Jee went with her. They told me to let you know they won’t be back until late.”

Katara looked sadly down at her plate as she felt a pinch in her heart at the news. Then she frowned as her temper flared slightly. How could they forget it was birthday? The anger vanished quickly and was once again replaced by sadness and hurt.

She mentally shook her head. She had to understand that they were busy and she was sure they did not mean to hurt her. She dismissed the thought as she picked up her chopsticks and began to eat silently. A few minutes later, she left the room to go about her duties. Being busy helped her forget her sadness for the rest of the day.

However, as night approached she became dejected again. Her family back in the Southern Water Tribe could not come and her new family forgot. It was her first birthday being married to Zuko, she had wanted it to be special, but she supposed that she could not have everything. With a sigh, she made her way to the antechamber to have dinner before she retired for the night. She would not be able to sleep since it was the night of a full moon, so she wondered what she could do to spend the hours until she could finally sleep. She did not even know when Zuko would return, but she knew she was going to feel lonely.

Just as she was about to round the corner of the royal wing, she heard Jiao call out to her. Katara paused before she turned around to wait for the maidservant.

“What is it, Jiao?” she asked. Her heart picked up its speed at the hope that Zuko and the others had returned and were waiting for her to celebrate her birthday.

“Fire Lord Zuko has returned,” Jiao began.

Katara felt a smile start to appear on her face.
“Uh, an ambassador from the Earth Kingdom has arrived unexpectedly and Fire Lord Zuko wants you to get ready for when both of you greet him,” Jiao continued as she averted her eyes for a second.

Katara felt her smile fall before she snapped out of her sadness and disappointment as she rushed to get ready to greet the ambassador. If Zuko was willing to meet with him at such a late hour, then he must be someone important. Katara did not even question Jiao when the woman helped her into a beautiful formal dress she had never seen before. It was an exquisite cyan color that shimmered in the candlelight, but she had only a moment to admire it before Jiao sat her down to fix her hair into an elaborate hairdo and retouched her makeup. Once she was ready, Jiao rushed her out of the room and into the Royal Palace Garden. This confused Katara since she thought that they would meet the ambassador in the throne room like they did all the other visiting dignitaries.

As they stepped onto the stone path that led to the veranda, the waterbender frowned since the garden was completely dark and she could not see or hear anything. She looked around herself before looking forward again so she could ask Jiao what was going on. Her eyes widened when she realized she was all alone.

“Jiao?” she called out softly. She tensed and her heart pounded in alarm. Was this a trap?

She cursed mentally since she forgot her waterskin. Just as she prepared herself to call forth some water from around her, a number of sparks flew out of nowhere and the garden was flooded with light. She gasped in surprise at what greeted her eyes.

There were many candles placed in small glass bowls surrounding the place, while blue and white paper lanterns hung from the branches of the many trees above her that were also decorated. She jumped when a loud screech was heard before a firework exploded in the dark sky. She gasped in awe as a few more flew up and exploded in amazing colorful patterns.

It must indeed be a very important ambassador if he was having such a grand welcome, she thought. Her eyes shifted before her when the veranda was suddenly lit and she frowned when she saw Zuko, Iroh, Ursa, and Jee standing there. She also noticed Jiao smiling at her as she stood between Kuo and Shen a few feet back. Glancing back at her husband, Katara saw the warmth in his golden gaze as he gave her a small smile.

“What?” she uttered in bewilderment. Where was the ambassador?

“Happy birthday!” she heard them all shout.
“Oh my,” was the only thing Katara could get out in her surprise and delight as she remained frozen in place.

Zuko stepped down from the veranda and approached her quickly in a few long strides. He opened his arms and she quickly fell into them as she felt herself tear up.

“I thought you forgot,” she whispered against his chest.

Zuko embraced her tightly to him as he nuzzled her head.

“How could I forget the day the woman I love was born?” he whispered softly into her ear.

Katara felt her heart melt at his words and she leaned back so she could give him a joyful, watery smile—her previous hurt and anger quickly being replaced with happiness and gratitude. Zuko reluctantly let her go and Katara soon found herself being tightly hugged by her mother-in-law and Uncle Iroh. Jee and the others respectfully congratulated her, before Jiao and the guards left in order to give them privacy.

“Surprised?” Iroh asked with a grin.

“Very,” the brunette replied with a smile which widened when Zuko placed his arm around her waist. He was becoming more comfortable showing her affection outside their rooms—at least when only their family was around.

“Come,” he prompted, “Let’s eat.”

As they ate the delicious dinner, Katara listened to them tell her that everybody knew it was her birthday, but Zuko had ordered for them not to say anything to ruin her surprise. Well, they sure did not give her any hints that they knew, she thought wryly. She also found out the entire Fire Nation was celebrating in her honor as well. She felt her heart warm at that bit of news.

Once they finished eating, Katara was presented with her gifts. She was not surprised when most of the gifts—including her new, stunning dress—were from her husband. She laughed and kissed Zuko on the cheek, causing him to flush slightly, when she opened his last present for her. It was a finely made waterskin with elegant designs stitched on it that would complement the formal clothes she now wore. She smiled when she was then handed letters from her family, Aang and Toph wishing her a wonderful birthday.

They spent the next few hours talking and laughing, but as the hour grew late and the moon rose high in the sky, the royal couple watched the others stand up.

“I hope you enjoyed your birthday, my dear,” Ursa said with a smile at her daughter-in-law.

“I did, thank you,” Katara responded as she immediately returned the smile.

“I have a feeling you will continue to do so,” Iroh piped in as he waggled his eyebrows.

“Uncle,” Zuko spoke up with a frown as Katara smiled behind her hand.

The old man only chuckled as he bid them good night and left. Ursa and Jee did the same before leaving them alone. Zuko had given strict instructions that nobody should enter the garden to bother him and Katara and he turned to smile at his wife.

“Why don’t we test your new waterskin?” he asked.

“Okay,” she responded with a grin as she grabbed her new present.

Tucking her arm beneath his, Zuko led her toward the large pond beneath the cherry blossom tree where Katara filled the waterskin with water and tested it out for a while. She found that the design made it easier for her to uncork the opening, thus, she would be quicker to pull out her element when she needed to. Since it seemed the turtle-duck family was sleeping, they spent the next few minutes feeding the koi fish, whose scaly bodies gleamed under the silvery moonlight as they glided in the tranquil water.

“Thank you, Zuko,” Katara spoke up softly as she looked away from the fish to smile at him, “I will never forget this day.”

“I have another present for you,” Zuko replied with a smirk as he reached into his long sleeve and Katara wondered at the gleam in his eye as she grabbed the item he handed to her. She raised an eyebrow when she saw it was a scroll. Curious, she unfurled it before her eyes widened when she saw what it was. It was a replica of the waterbending scroll she had stolen from that shop years ago that eventually led to Zuko capturing her. She looked up inquiringly at him.

“Do you remember what happened because of the original scroll?” he asked her with the smirk still in place.

“You had pirates try to capture me,” she said with a sniff.

“But I rescued you later,” he responded.

A small snort escaped Katara as she stared at him.

“Yeah, and then you tied me to a tree,” she replied as she crossed her arms beneath her breasts and cocked her hip to the side.

She gasped when Zuko suddenly backed her against the cherry blossom tree. He took the scroll back and she shivered at the intense look in his eyes.

“I haven’t been able to forget the vision of you tied to that tree and at my mercy,” he reminded her huskily. “But back then I thought capturing Aang more important. But now…” he trailed off as he pressed closer to her, “I will not miss the opportunity.”

He backed away completely from her and Katara could only stare back at him as she exhaled deeply.

“Tell me where it is and I won’t hurt you,” he told her in a cajoling tone.

Katara frowned in confusion since she did not understand what he was talking about, though his words did sound familiar.
“I wonder how much money this is worth,” he mused.

She watched as he silently produced a flame on his palm and held one end of the scroll over it. Her eyes widened once she remembered that night almost five years ago before she smirked when she realized he was reenacting, although with altered words. His amber eyes seemed to darken when he realized that she understood what he was doing.

“Tell me where it is and I won’t hurt you,” he repeated in the same soft voice.

“Go jump in the river!” Katara replied in an angry tone even as her blue eyes danced with playfulness.

Zuko smiled, pleased that she was playing along with one of the many fantasies he had had of her. Extinguishing the flame, he tucked the scroll into the sash at his waist before he began to slowly circle around her and the tree.

Katara’s breath accelerated when he left her line of sight, but she could still hear and feel him behind her. She stayed unmoving, her back pressed against the tree’s trunk. She did not need ropes to hold her in place, only Zuko’s powerful presence and mesmerizing voice. She did not want to escape.

“Please try to understand,” she heard him say in the same coaxing tone on her left side, “I need to restore something I lost.”

When he did not say anything else, Katara decided to improvise to make it even more exciting.

“Even if you kill me, I won’t tell you,” she responded firmly, although a bit breathlessly.

She gasped when she felt him place his warm hand gently over her throat as he leaned close to her from behind. His sandalwood scent made her head spin.

“I don’t want to kill you,” he whispered in her ear as his fingers trailed down her throat to dip below her collar. She bit her lip when they touched the top of her breasts as he continued, “But I won’t be above using…other methods to make you tell me what I want to know.”

Another shiver raced down her spine and her core clenched since she really wanted him to use such “Your methods won’t work on me, firebender,” she retorted in breathless anticipation.

She gasped softly in surprise when Zuko suddenly appeared before her again. His golden eyes were gleaming as he smirked down at her. Reaching up, he pulled her hair free from its coiffure, causing it to fall in waves around her.

“Oh, they will, waterbender,” he told her huskily, “I’ll have you screaming over and over again once I’m done with you. You won’t be able to stop.”

A moaned escaped Katara when Zuko crashed his mouth to hers and kissed her roughly as he pressed himself tightly to her. Electricity seemed to spark in the air around them. He pulled at the ties that held the top part of the new dress he had commissioned for her as a birthday gift. He leaned away from her mouth and they panted hard against each other.

Zuko looked down as he pulled down the top undergarment that covered her chest and groaned when her breasts bounced as they became exposed to the moonlight. Katara gasped as the chilly night air hit her sensitive peaks before moaning softly when Zuko cupped her breasts in his large, warm hands. Not wanting to be undone, she quickly had his chest as exposed as hers and she gently scraped her nails down his flesh. He growled softly before he pinned her hands against the tree and nuzzled his face between her mounds before he began kissing and suckling on them.

“Zuko, mm,” she moaned again.

“I want to make love to you under the moonlight shining on your skin,” he groaned throatily.

She stiffened at his suggestion. What if somebody saw them? As if sensing her thoughts, he covered her body with his as he extinguished all the flames illuminating the garden. Once they were plunged into the darkness with only the ethereal light of the full moon to help them see, he kissed her again, this time slowly and tenderly.

“I made sure everybody stayed away,” he assured her.

Sighing softly into his mouth, Katara relaxed against him, trusting him completely. Zuko groaned in triumph as he crushed her to him before he ran his hands down her sides and thighs. He bunched the hem of her dress in his hands and pulled it above her waist. He cupped her ass, kneading the tantalizing mounds, before he lifted her swiftly and pressed his hard erection against her covered sex. They moaned as their arousal flared at the sensation. Wrapping her legs around him, Zuko began to slowly grind his confined cock against her covered, wet pussy. Katara gasped and moaned as she wrapped her arms tightly around his neck, mentally cursing the material that separated them.

“Instead of trying to capture Aang,” Zuko panted harshly against her ear as he continued to leisurely grind against her, “I should have made love to you like this instead that night. You would’ve been mine for all these years.”

Before Katara could respond, Zuko stepped away and swiftly lifted her into his arms. He took them deeper into the garden where they could find more privacy. He stepped through a cluster of thick bushes and into a very small circle of trees where he gently laid her down among a bed of forget-me-nots. Katara glanced up and her eyes met the starry night sky and the full moon shining over them from the opening the circle of trees made. It reminded her of the enclosed lake where Zuko had come upon her as she bathed and she knew Zuko had intentionally had this part of the garden imitate it. She was brought out of her thoughts when Zuko laid down over her and kissed her passionately.

As their lips and tongues continued to connect in a slow and erotic dance, Zuko slowly ran a hand down her now exposed chest and over her lean stomach where he splayed his fingers possessively, causing her to moaned softly. Then he trailed his hand further down to grasp the bottom of her dress before he sensually pulled it up until it again bunched around her waist. She trembled.

Not wanting to part from her for even a second, the firebender ripped her last silky undergarment away from her before he let it fall beside them. Katara gasped softly at his rough actions and moaned. His hands devoured her, savoring the feminine curves and silky softness of her body. Zuko heard her moan more deeply and the anticipation made his cock harden further. His kiss became more passionate as he settled himself between her lush thighs and pressed his clothed erection against her now exposed core. They both groaned at the amazing sensation.

Pulling back after a moment, Zuko panted as he looked down at his waterbender lying with her front bare beneath him. Her blue eyes were sparkling as she stared at him. Her chocolate hair was spread around her in curling patterns. His attention was drawn to her breasts which rose and fell at her panting breaths before his eyes traveled down the length of her until he stopped at the spot between her wonderful legs. Her pink folds were swollen with her arousal and glistening with her juices. She was naked among the blue and white flowers that contrasted nicely with her skin and he looked at her with molten golden eyes.

For a long moment he did not touch her, fighting to control the hunger thundering in his blood.

Moonlight kissed feminine curves and tanned skin, leaving highlights and shadows as his wife reached up and lovingly ran her hands down his chest. He closed his eyes at the heightened desire that coursed through him at her touch. He opened his eyes again and he saw her, his water nymph, smile at him.

Agni, she was so beautiful it was almost painful to watch. He bent down swiftly and captured her mouth. With each breath he took, he could taste her on his tongue, and her sweet and enticing flavor overwhelmed his senses as her lips fell slightly open with desire.

“I want you…” he rasped against her lips, “You make me so hungry for you…”

“Love me, Zuko,” she breathed softly against his mouth, mesmerized by the fierce hunger she could see in his eyes. “I need you inside me.”

With a groan, the firebender quickly reached into his trousers and just as quickly pulled out his achingly hard shaft. He continued to devour her mouth as he rubbed his length against her wet folds, coating his hard flesh with her essence and causing them both to moan, before he slowly pressed his tip into her. She hissed softly in pleasure at the intrusion of his hard flesh and she wrapped her arms tightly around his neck, but she surprised Zuko when she lifted her hips firmly and impaled herself on him, unable to wait any longer.

“Ah!” she cried out softly.

The firebender let out a deep gasp, shuddering at the feeling of her tight walls sucking at his cock. Her heat was indescribably pleasurable, wet and constricting. Gazing at each other passionately, they paused for a moment to savor the sensation of being so intimately connected before they simultaneously began to slowly rock their hips together just as their mouths pressed hungrily together. The secluded area of the garden was filled with sighs and moans and whispered words as the couple strove for that pleasurable end.

When he felt her walls begin to flutter, Zuko pulled away from her lips to intensely, tenderly, watch her fall over the edge. He reached between their bodies and gently pressed his thumb on her sensitive nub just as his hips gave a sharp twist.

With a pulse of pleasure so strong it actually took her breath away, Katara went over, softly chanting his name out over and over as she convulsed underneath him.

Zuko watched in awe as she became undone under his ministrations, her release so achingly beautiful, before his vision inverted, and he groaned loudly as his orgasm was forced from him.
Body rigid, teeth gritted painfully tight, he rammed into her one last time, forcing himself as deep as he could go as the rush of his seed spilled into her. Her clenching pussy pulled his seed from him ruthlessly as she moaned and writhed against him. With a gasp, he collapsed on top of her. He stayed that way for a moment before he carefully slipped from her still clenching core to rest beside her.

Both panting, Katara felt him wrap an arm around her as he pulled her close against him. Opening her eyes, Katara stared dazedly up at the bright, full moon above them before she glanced at her husband, whose eyes were closed as he breathed harshly. She admired the way the moonlight flowed over pale skin and ridges of hard muscle and made his dark hair glisten against his perspiring forehead. She glanced down and smiled when she saw his now flaccid length, resting against his thigh, also gleam under the moonlight from both their mixed fluids. Once she came down from the cloud she had been floating on, she placed her hand over his chest, feeling his heartbeat return to normal.

“Thank you for the birthday present, Zuko,” she told him with a smile a few minutes later.

She watched as he opened his eyes and turned to look at her with a small smirk.

“Oh, it’s not over yet, my little waterbender,” was his husky reply as he tightened his hold of her, “We still have a few more hours until your birthday ends.”

“Oh, really?” Katara asked coquettishly as she batted her eyelashes at him, “You mean you have more gifts for me?”

“Oh, yes,” he responded throatily as his smirk widened a bit, “I’m sure you’ll find much pleasure in the gifts I’m going to bestow on you.”

Before Katara could reply, Zuko stood up and tucked himself back into his dark pants before he bent down to pick up her ripped underwear. He smirked at her as he tucked it into his sleeve. Just as Katara moved to tie her sash to close her dress, Zuko scooped her into his arms. The sudden move made her gasp and cling to his neck, causing him to chuckle. She looked up to give him a playful scowl. He walked out of the secluded place where they had indulged in their passion among the flowers and beneath the moonlight before he stepped back onto one of the stone paths. Instead of making his way back to the entrance into the palace as she had feared, considering their disheveled appearance, he walked in another direction until he stood beneath the balcony of their bedchamber. Katara frowned in confusion when she saw a rope hanging before them.

“Get on my back, Katara,” he told her as he settled her on her feet.
Still confused, Katara did what he asked and wrapped her arms and legs around him after he had helped her settle on his back. She watched him grab onto the tied rope before he began to climb up toward the balcony, using the wall to push himself with his feet. She grinned.

“You thought of everything, didn’t you, my love?” she purred next to his ear.

He chuckled.

Once he climbed onto the balcony, he helped her slide down from his back before he spun around to bring her tightly to his chest. Pressed tightly together, they kissed unhurriedly yet not lacking in passion, an intricate dance of tongues and mouths.

After a long moment of ravishing her delicious mouth, he pulled away. Zuko grinned when she sighed in pure bliss before she slowly opened her eyes. Her ocean eyes were clouded over with pleasure, the haze seeming to seep into her body as she turned to mush against him.

Katara saw him smile down at her and she let out another sigh. He took her hand and she eagerly followed him into the room, leaving the balcony doors open to let the sweet night air in. He stopped them beside their bed and she looked up at him wonderingly. The gleam in those sun-colored eyes of his made her stomach clench in need of him again. He took off her fire crown and walked toward its box to place it and his own crown inside before he quickly returned to her. His hair was longer now, the ends reaching just above his shoulders, and her fingers twitched to bury themselves in the dark strands.

He held her gaze as he slowly began to divest her of her clothing. The lovely silk dress he had gifted her slithered almost noiselessly toward the marble floor to pool around her feet like a cyan colored puddle. Then he scooped her nude body into his arms and laid her gently on the bed, her blue eyes held captive by his soft, passionate gaze. He bent his head down and Katara readily raised her head to meet his mouth, but she frowned when he pulled away quickly. He chuckled at her expression as he raised a hand to brush his knuckles against her cheek.

“Patience, love,” he purred sensually, his baritone voice making a pleasant shiver run down her spine.

Before Katara could answer him he moved away from her and stood beside the bed once again. She watched eagerly as he slowly began to discard his clothes, revealing his alabaster flesh and hard muscles until he stood completely naked for her fervent perusal, his shaft already full and erect. She moaned softly. This was definitely one of her favorite presents he had given her so far.

The brunette waited with bated breath for him to join her on the bed again, but she was confused when he instead walked away. She raised herself on her elbows to see him approach the small table they used to set their tea between the chairs they used for reading. She watched him place the scroll and her ripped undergarment on it before he picked up a tray with two small bowls. She had not even noticed the bowls when they entered the room. Curious, Katara watched as Zuko walked back to her before he paused to pick something up from the floor, but she was distracted when he placed the tray next to her. When she looked at the contents in the bowl, she smiled.

One contained melted chocolate with a small spoon dipped into it and the other had sliced strawberries and a few whole ones. Did he plan on feeding her the treats again like he did on their honeymoon?

“Lay back, Katara,” he ordered her softly as he climbed on the bed and knelt before her.

Katara did as he asked as her curiosity and anticipation grew. She closed her eyes with a soft moan as he captured her lips in another slow and tantalizing kiss. His teeth gently grazed her bottom lip and she opened her mouth for him. Their tongues immediately met in a sensual dance. Forgetting the treats, her arms moved to wrap around him, but she paused when he grasped her arms to prevent her from doing so. Frowning, she opened her eyes to see him smirk crookedly at her. Her pussy clenched in sharp need at the sight.

“Ah, ah, ah, love,” he chided her, “Lie still.”

Smiling at her, he took her hands and pulled them above her head. Katara watched as he reached for the item he had picked up earlier and realized it was his dark red sash. Silently, he wound it around her wrists and secured the ends to the headboard before she realized what he was doing. Tilting her head back in confusion, she pulled on her binding, but it did not give way. It was secure to keep her bound, but it was not too tight that it caused her harm. She looked back to turned curious eyes on her husband.

“What are you doing?” she asked as she squirmed in her place, but her bindings held her still.

Satisfied that the binding would hold, Zuko sat back on his heels and observed his beautiful, restricted wife with a smirk.
“Having my dessert,” he answered her huskily as he leaned over her.

Katara felt her arousal spike, an almost inaudible moan escaping her. She had an idea of what he planned to do and she could not wait. She wriggled again.

Taking a whole strawberry carefully between his long fingers, Zuko dipped it into the melted chocolate. Turning back to her, he smiled. He rubbed the fruit over Katara’s lips, leaving a trail of the rich chocolate to coat her plump lips. Leaning his head down, he slowly ran his tongue across her lips, meticulously cleaning the sweet topping from them. Once the substance was completely gone, he moved back. Her cobalt eyes were sparkling at him and he smiled down at her. He then placed the ripe strawberry between his lips before he leaned back toward her face. Raising her head, her lips met his and he bit down gently. He pulled away with half of the sweet fruit and left her with the other. Her breath speeding up a little, Katara chewed her half of the strawberry slowly and moaned. Holding his gaze, her tongue darted out to catch the juice that had fallen on her bottom lip.

With bated breath, the firebender watched as her pink tongue licked the honeyed liquid from her delectable lips as he swallowed his half of the fruit. The image had his cock throbbing as he recalled a number of delightful uses for that wonderful tongue of hers. He almost decided to forgo his plan so he could give them what they both wanted, but he firmly ordered himself to control his raging desires. He intended to savor his dessert and make this an incredible birthday his waterbender would never forget.

He reached for the bowl of chocolate and lifted the spoon. Carefully, he drizzled some of the melted chocolate into the hollow of her throat and she shivered at the feeling. Zuko painted a path of the treat down the valley of her soft mounds, then down her lean stomach before he stopped at the beginning of her slick folds. He could hear her breathing accelerate and he grinned. Once he was satisfied, he set the bowl back on the tray before picking up the other one.

He positioned one slice of strawberry at her throat atop the chocolate before he placed another just a little below it. Breathing shallowly, Katara watched him work. She smiled as she caught sight of the wristband she gifted him. Zuko continued to place strawberries slices on the trail of chocolate he created until he reached the end. Sitting back, he contemplated his masterpiece before he decided to place one last touch. Smirking, he picked up the bowl of chocolate once again and placed dollops on each of her hardened nipples until they were completely covered.

Katara moaned as she began to squirm again, partly from the strange feeling of the sticky substance on her skin, and partly from the erotic thoughts she was having about how he would eat his dessert. Then she gasped when she felt him place another strawberry slice into her drenched pussy.

“Zuko,” she murmured wantonly as her arms strained again her bindings.
“Don’t move or else you’ll ruin my dessert,” he reprimanded her softly as he smirked at her.

He moved away to place the tray down on the floor beside the bed before he returned quickly to her side.

“I’m going to enjoy my dessert now,” he growled softly.

He knelt with his knees on both sides of her and kissed her lips, careful not to destroy any of his work. Once he was satisfied that her lips were wet and swollen with his kisses, he pulled away to leave a path of scorching kisses from her jaw down to her neck. He nuzzled her necklace before he continued on his trail down her throat.

Wanting to touch him and pull him down over her, Katara pulled at her ties, but they held firm. She groaned. She forgot about escaping her bindings, however, the moment she felt his tongue lick across her throat, swiping up some chocolate and a strawberry slice into his mouth. He gave a low growl.

“Delicious,” he purred throatily.

Katara closed her eyes with a sigh as his teeth lightly scraped her skin as his lips closed over the next strawberry slice. She shivered at the blazing path his lips and tongue were creating as he went lower. He paused to worship her soft mounds. His tongue swirled around, teasingly avoiding her hardened nipples, causing her to pull on her bindings.

She cried out when his hot mouth finally closed on one peak and he began to suck hard in order to clean all the chocolate away. If possible her nipple got even harder as he nipped it with his teeth before soothing it with his tongue. Then she felt his teeth scrape her other neglected tip before he slowly lapped up the chocolate, causing her to moan loudly. Her moan deepened when he pulled the nipple into his mouth and suckled fiercely, engulfing her breast as much as he could into his widely opened mouth. A spark tingled down her spine all the way to her curling toes.

Once he had paid proper homage to her breasts and had her panting beneath him, he continued his downward path. His mouth left no trace of his delicious artwork in his wake. Katara moaned and writhed at the sensations. She had felt his tongue, lips, and mouth on her body many times before, but this was different, something indescribable. This was one of the most erotic moments she had thus far experience with Zuko and she loved it, craved more of it. She pulled on her bindings again. Her senses were becoming overwhelmed. Every time she would open her eyes to watch his progress, they would close again as intense feelings overcame her.

“Ooohhh,” she moaned as his tongue licked the chocolate from her belly.

Zuko smirked as he resumed his slow journey down her body. He felt masculine pride swell within him at how absolutely her mind had detached from reality, all but the reality of his erotic touch upon her exquisite body. Scraping his teeth against her flesh as he picked up another slice, he then licked the chocolate slowly until her skin was clean of the substance. Smiling, he let his warm breath coast on the lingering wetness and become a cool caress. Pleased at the intense shiver it evoked from her, he continued on his trek, immensely enjoying his dessert and the effect he had on his wife.

Once he swallowed the last strawberry slice at the end of the chocolate trail he had smeared on her and roughly licked all the remaining chocolate, he raised his head to look at her face. He smirked when he saw that her eyes were closed in delight and her face was flushed. He licked his lips to relish the last of his amazing masterpiece.

“So delicious,” he whispered huskily to her when she opened her eyes and looked down at him.

Holding her gaze, he spread her legs wide then he gently lifted them and laid them over his shoulders as he prepared her for his ultimate banquet. Running his hands gently on her thighs, he turned his head to place soft kisses on her right inner thigh. He smiled when she trembled and moaned.

Settling his head at the apex of her sex, he groaned softly at the sight. Her feminine folds were swollen in her arousal and the fruit slice he had inserted into her opening was drenched in her juices. Heart pounding in his chest, he let his tongue slowly stroke her wet petals. He paused when she cried out and bucked her hips against his face as she again fought her bindings. Placing one hand on her hip to hold her still, he let his tongue continue to tease her before he engulfed his mouth on the strawberry slice and sucked it into his mouth. Chewing and then swallowing, Zuko groaned as the combined flavor of the fruit juice and her cream exploded on his tongue.

“So sweet. So delicious,” he groaned against her wet skin before he began to devour her sweet pussy hungrily.

Thrashing her head, Katara cried out loudly at the stroke of her husband’s skillful tongue on her hot center. She curled her hands into fists at the need to shove her fingers into his hair, but the sash he had tied around her wrists continued to restrict her. The sensation only caused the flame in her belly to erupt even fiercer and she moaned and whimpered shamelessly. When his tongue suddenly touched her oversensitive bundle of nerves, the flames exploded and she cried out her release, her hips bucking at the intensity.
“Zuko, ohhh!” she wailed.

Smirking in prideful exultation as her release came more quickly than he had anticipated, Zuko pulled back to watch her opening clench with her orgasm. His smirk widened. He had not even used his fingers to explore her wet passage.

When it seemed his waterbender was coming down from her euphoria, Zuko did not give her a reprieve as he again latched his mouth onto her soaked folds, causing her to arch her back and cry out. He plunged his tongue into her core and rubbed against her tight ring of muscles, savoring her flavor and the mewls she emitted as she weakly strained her bound arms toward him. He trailed his tongue up her slit and prodded the swollen bud above her opening, making her moan his name as he flicked and swirled his tongue around it. Then he latched his mouth on her clit and sucked hard just as he plunged one long finger into her and curled it. He growled in triumph when he again sent her over the edge, screaming and thrashing beneath him.

“Oh, oh, gods!” Katara screamed as she pushed her head against the pillow just as she pushed her hips up to ride her next orgasm following so close to the previous one. The pleasure was so overwhelming it was almost painful, but she loved it, she did not want it to stop.

Zuko turned his head to the side and rubbed his lips against her inner thigh as he waited for her climax to subside. He groaned against her perspiring skin at the sensation of her slick walls clenching his finger. He could not wait to experience the same sensation on his aching cock. He grunted in pleasure. When he felt her body slumped against the bed, he waited a moment longer until her trembling stopped.

“I’m not done with you yet, Katara,” he rumbled huskily against her skin.

“Oh,” the brunette managed to moan as she closed her eyes when her stomach once again clenched in arousal.

Slowly, Zuko began to move his finger and she mewled softly. Once he had stretched her enough, he swiftly inserted a second finger, the long digits pushing upward inside her tight passage to press against her drenched walls. She arched her back, his name a whispered cry on her lips. He continued the slow pace before he carefully pressed his thumb on her oversensitive nub. She moaned deeply, but he made sure not to apply too much pressure. He wanted to string her along for as long as he could, so that her next climax would be all the more powerful and intense.
When it seemed her release was upon her, he would slow down or stop completely, ignoring her disappointed cries and impatient pleading. Then he would resume his ministrations until he had her panting heavily and writhing beneath him as she strained against her bindings before he stopped once again. He was panting hard himself as his arousal continued to increase at her pleasure. He knew he was torturing himself as well, but he wanted to bring her to as many climaxes as he could before he surrendered himself into her wet heat. Painful as this was, he could not deny the deliciously tormenting pleasure rippling through his powerful body.

Katara felt as Zuko again brought her toward the pinnacle for what seemed like the tenth time and she bit her lip hard to keep from moaning, hoping that the sound would not alert him so he could finally let her fall into that pleasurable abyss, although she knew he would immediately know when she was close. Just as she felt her core flutter with her impending release, she closed her eyes to savor the sensation before Zuko stopped again to prevent her from truly tasting it. Her eyes opened in surprise and delight when he did not stop, but instead increased his speed and force of his plunging fingers and she moaned long and loud.

As he continued to fiercely impale her with his strong fingers, Katara felt him engulf his mouth on her clit and groan loudly as he sucked it before he curled his fingers up and furiously rubbed against that sweet spot inside her. Her eyes widened and she opened her mouth to scream as a wave of ecstasy—more intense than any she had ever experienced before—crashed into her like the ocean waves crashing violently against a group of rocks.

“Aahhhh!” she shrieked as her body convulsed and her eyes rolled to the back of her head.

Zuko’s eyes widened when a heavy gush of her clear fluids squirted everywhere—drenching his hand, arm, face, and throat. It was the first time it had happened, and he was confused for a moment, before he remembered hearing that a few women were able to ejaculate almost like a man when they were touched in the right way. His ego swelled in his chest just as his cock throbbed with pleasure and need. Growling softly, Zuko continue to suck her clit and rapidly pump his fingers into her clenching pussy as he prolonged her release before he replaced his fingers with his mouth.

“Oh, mmmm,” the waterbender moaned incoherently.
Zuko chuckled against her oversensitive folds and Katara trembled when his warm breath rushed over her.

“Do I make you feel good, love?” Zuko whispered throatily against her thigh.

Katara moaned as she weakly nodded her head before she collapsed limply against the mattress, her breath coming out in short, panting intakes. A moment later, she lifted her head to look down at him. His eyes were gleaming with satisfaction as he grinned triumphantly at her—his lips, chin, and throat glistening wetly with her juices—before he looked back down to observe her still quivering center. She moaned as she let her head fall back. She did not know what Zuko had done to pull such an intense orgasm out of her, but she thoroughly enjoyed it.

“What…what did you do to me?” she asked breathlessly.

“I think people call it squirting,” he replied huskily.

“You definitely made me squirt,” she panted heavily.

“How did it feel?” he inquired curiously as he caressed her wet thigh.

“Incredible,” she moaned.

“Good,” Zuko groaned deeply as he continued to stare at her, “Because I plan on making you squirt many times more.”

“Oh gods, yes,” Katara moaned loudly, feeling her oversensitive pussy throb at his promising words.

She was extremely glad it was a night of a full moon. The energy the sliver orb in the sky was radiating seemed to be giving her extra strength, as well as serving as a kind of aphrodisiac. She had never experienced such an overpowering feeling before, not until Zuko had introduced her to what passion truly was. She moaned as fire seemed to race through her veins to collect at her heat where she could still feel Zuko’s fingers imbedded in her. La, she wanted him. She needed him inside her.

“More,” she begged softly, “Please. More.”
Zuko’s head shot up toward her face at the breathless, wanton sound of her voice. It almost sounded as if she were caught in some sort of enchantment. He saw her lift her head to look at him and the passionate expression on her features and the hungry sparkle in her sapphire eyes made his shaft throb almost painfully.

“More, Zuko,” she repeated with a moan, “I want your cock inside me. I want to come around you…uuhhh…I want you to come inside me.”

The young Fire Lord groaned deeply at her words, thrilled that she was still eager to feed his hunger. He slowly removed his fingers from her overflowing core and quickly brought them to his mouth to clean every trace of her juices. Once he did, he placed her legs back on the bed before he slinked up her lovely body. He bent his head down and she quickly met him halfway. They moaned as their mouths devoured each other. Pulling away, Zuko quickly untied the sash around her wrists and threw it to the side.

He barely had enough time to assure himself that her delicate skin had not been damaged before she shot her arms forward to bring him down to her as she took possession of his mouth. His eyes widened briefly at her aggressiveness before he reciprocated her fervent kiss. Katara clenched his longer hair in her fingers and pulled, causing Zuko to growl lustfully at her at the slight pain. As they continue to kiss, Zuko reached down between them and tightly grasped his aching erection. He stroked himself a few times before his hand guided his hard cock to the opening to his paradise.

He eased into her tight wetness, not stopping until he was buried completely inside her, their hips pressed so tightly together that there was no open space between them. They moaned into each other’s mouths. Hesitating only a moment to revel in the sensation of wet warmth surrounding him, Zuko began to slowly thrust his hips. He increased his pace a little as he continued thrusting inside her before he reached down between their bodies to firmly rub her sensitive clit. He watched as her mouth fell open and she threw her head back when another orgasm hit her hard. He delighted in the little whimpers and cries coming forth from his wife’s lovely mouth as her pussy tightened almost painfully around his engorged length. He groaned when she loudly cried out his name into the room.

He slowed his pace and pressed light, tender kisses on her lips as he waited for her to come down from her euphoria. When she moaned and pressed back against his mouth, he lifted his head slightly to look at her face.

“Gods, Katara, you are so beautiful when you come,” he rasped huskily as he stared deeply into her azure eyes—dark with her arousal and warm with her love for him. “I love it when you come around my cock.”
When she smiled at him and clenched her inner walls tightly around him, Zuko swooped down with a groan to kiss her passionately at the same time he plunged powerfully and swiftly into her, unable to hold back his intense hunger for her any longer. She clung to him with her arms and legs as they continued to rock against each other for a long blissful moment. Then she grasped his ass tightly, drawing him forward into her, reluctant to release him. He pulled away from her mouth with a gasp and buried his face at her throat. He felt his impending release approach him, but he closed his eyes as he tried to control it. He wanted to bring his waterbender to the throes of passion with him one more time.

“Ah, Zuko, uhh,” she moaned against his ear with his every thrust, “Faster, harder!”

Zuko grunted harshly as he increased the pace and force of his penetration. He smirked when she threw her head back and wailed. He could sense her next release coming closer just like his own was, and with a growl, he began to wildly pound into her, causing their flesh to slap loudly together. She began to fiercely dig and scratch her fingernails into the flesh of his back and he groaned at the mixture of pain and pleasure as he felt her go wild beneath him.

Katara cried out before she forced her eyes open when she felt him pull his head away from her neck. Mesmerized, she saw him throw his head back with a groan, his eyes closed in concentration and pleasure. She felt the cored muscles of her husband’s body, which she was tightly wrapped around like vines on a marble statue, begin to tighten. He looked like a god in his throes of passion and she felt her heart flutter wildly in her chest. She could feel her pussy contract, heralding her next imminent climax, and she knew she could not hold back even if she wanted to. The scream in her throat released the same time she did.

“Oh my gods, Zuko!” she screamed, his name echoing off the walls around them, as pleasure exploded in her belly.

Zuko’s breath hitched when he felt another surge of Katara’s aroused fluids flood around his shaft and gushed against his sac and thighs as he pounded into her.

“Katara!” he roared as he felt his balls tighten before his cock throbbed unceasingly. He thrust once, twice, before he gasped as his burning seed erupted forth to spurt against her clenching walls. Agni, he loved coming in Katara so much.

Labored breathing and soft moans were the only sounds that reigned in the otherwise silent chamber as they trembled and clung to one another. Hands leisurely caressed sweat slicked bodies and mouths tenderly touched. Holding his wife’s sated body close to him as their thundering heartbeats returned to normal, Zuko sighed in contentment and pride at the fact that he was able to bring his wife to such great heights and so many times. They were silent for a long moment, basking in the afterglow.
“Happy birthday, love,” he rumbled softly after a moment.

“This is definitely the best birthday ever,” she murmured as she rubbed her face against his chest.

“There are still many more birthdays to come, Katara,” he told her huskily.

“I don’t think I’ve ever looked forward to getting older before,” she responded with a laugh.

Zuko chuckled as he bent his head down to kiss her head.

“If only the noblewomen knew how right they were in their suppositions about you,” Katara spoke up as she looked up to grin at him.

“What do you mean?” he asked with a raised eyebrow.

“You are a sex god,” she said with a wicked smirk.

Zuko’s eyes widened at her words before he laughed as he hugged her tightly to him. Agni, how he loved her.

“Oh, Katara, Katara,” he rasped amusedly and lustfully against her hair, “It seems we are made for each other since you are my delicious sex goddess.”

He heard his wife giggle and he affectionately tightened his hold of her. He felt Katara squirm in his grasp and he reluctantly released her with a confused frown. He watched as she crawled toward the edge of the bed before she stood up.

“Aren’t you tired?” he asked.

“Nope,” she responded with a seductive grin, “There’s a full moon tonight…and I feel like I have a lot of energy to spend.”
Curious, he watched as she picked up the tray he had previously placed on the floor before she climbed back on the bed, placing the tray next to him. There remained a few more strawberry slices and a bit of melted chocolate in the bowls. Then she turned to smile sexily at him and his heart throbbed in his chest before something else below his waist did the same when she straddled him.

“What are you doing?” he asked her huskily as he placed his hands on her hips.

He raised his eyebrow when she grabbed his hands and tied them against the headboard with the same sash he had used on her.

“You had your dessert,” she purred as she reached for the bowl of chocolate before she turned to him, “Now it’s my turn. You made me…squirt so many times, so I think it’s fair that I make you do the same.”

Zuko was no longer surprised when he felt his cock immediately swell beneath her so soon after his last release. When Katara scooted back to place a thick coat of the chocolate substance on his cock, he thanked the gods for creating his wife, full moons, and waterbending.

The Fire Lord’s study was quiet as Zuko read over the reports from the colonies. He was pleased to see that they were prospering well after they had been taught to protect themselves from the rebels. As he came to the last report, he eagerly opened it when he realized it was from the colonel he had sent to capture Jianguo.

As he read the letter, the Fire Lord’s eyes blazed with anger before he growled as he threw it on the desk. His colonel wrote that a few of his men had discreetly entered the village where the woman had said Jianguo frequented. After searching for a while, they realized Jianguo and his men had not stepped foot in the village in weeks. Did Jianguo somehow find out Zuko’s plans or did he just decide he had been staying in one place too long?

“Damn it,” Zuko growled out furiously as he banged his fist on the desk, rattling the items on its surface. “Where the hell could they be?”

Not until Jianguo and the rest of the rebels were captured would he be at peace. He rubbed his temples in frustration before he stood up from his chair and turned toward the large window behind him. He stared at the sky angrily for a moment before he sighed as he took in the rest of the scenery.
He smiled when he made out the top of the trees above the wall that surrounded his private garden. A soft groan escaped him when he remembered how he had taken Katara among the flowers and beneath the light of the full moon on her birthday weeks ago. Could they do it again? And then in the privacy of their bedchamber, he had taken her all night because she could not sleep. Due to the power of the full moon, Katara had been more aggressive and insatiable than usual. He loved it. He could not wait for the next full moon.

Agni, he wanted her again, but he would have to wait a few hours for that to happen. Katara had gone to a village with his mother, Admiral Jee, and a large group of guards he had appointed to take care of them for the opening of a new school for the children of the lower class. He had wanted to go, but he had meetings with his governors. He even tried to convince Katara to wait until he could accompany her, but she had firmly said that she did not want to make the children wait.

He smiled. His wife was so kind and compassionate, and the common people had come to love her. And thanks to her, they were more accepting toward him. They no longer saw him as a traitor or a disgrace, but as their sovereign who wanted what was best for them. What would he do without her?

He was brought out of his musings when he heard a knock at his door. He quickly sat back down on his seat and pulled close to his desk in order to hide his semi-erect member. Damn.

“Enter,” he called out brusquely as he glowered at the door.

His glower quickly disappeared, however, and his eyes darkened with lust as he watched Katara enter the room with a bright smile. Just the woman he wanted to see.

“Zuko!” she exclaimed excitedly, “Everything was a success!”

“Lock the door, Katara,” he ordered her huskily.

She did so, without questioning why he told her to do such a thing, as she continued to talk about the opening of the school, how happy the people had been, and that Jiao and Kuo had returned from their honeymoon. She did not notice as Zuko began to move the things on his large desk aside in order to create an empty space in the middle. When Zuko continued not to say anything, Katara finally paused with a frown. Standing from her seat, she rounded the desk until she was standing next to him.

“Zuko, what’s wrong?” she asked worriedly.
Katara gasped loudly when Zuko suddenly grabbed her waist and pulled her down toward him so that she was straddling his lap. Then she was being kissed senseless. Heat instantly spread through her body at his touch and her stomach clenched in desire. She moaned when she felt his hardness pressing against her core as his hands roughly, yet reverently, caressed her every curve.

Zuko did not want to tell her about his disappointment and anger with the lack of information concerning Jianguo’s whereabouts, so he decided to distract both of them with something more pleasant. It had been hours since he last made love to her, after all. Running his hands down her back as he continued stroking his tongue insistently inside her mouth, he grabbed her firm rear and pressed her closer to his arousal, grinding slowly against her. She gasped breathlessly.

“I want you,” he growled out lowly.

“Can’t you wait until we retire for the night?” she asked even as she pressed closer to him and wound her arms more tightly around his neck.

“No,” he responded, “I need you now.”

Katara moaned when he captured her lips in another searing kiss and bucked his hips hard against her. When they pulled away to catch their breath, she smiled at him.

“What brought this on?” she asked breathlessly as she reached up a hand to caress his scarred cheek.

“I was remembering your birthday,” he told her with a smirk.

Having Katara’s soft, loving touch on his scar no longer fazed him—in fact, he sometimes forgot about his disfigurement when she touched him.

At his words, a deep red blush blossomed across Katara’s checks from both bashfulness and arousal before she moaned when he captured her mouth in a heady kiss. Electricity skittered down her spine when he gently tangled her tongue with his before sucking it into his mouth.

As he continued to make love to his wife’s mouth, Zuko slowly dragged his hands up her sides before cupping her breasts and squeezing lightly. Her breath hitched then accelerated when he just as slowly began to unbutton the top of her silver dress. Coiling his tongue around hers, he slipped his hands inside to touch the heating flesh of her chest before he pushed her clothes aside to expose her heaving breasts. Panting, Zuko pulled away to admire the view as he gently fondled the soft mounds. Moaning, Katara opened her eyes to see him smirking lustfully at her. She gasped when he suddenly lifted her from his lap and sat her down on his desk, parting her legs and scooting his face between them.

Holding her gaze, he reached below her dress and trailed his hands up her legs and thighs until he hooked his fingers on the hem of her satin undergarment. At the silent command of his gaze, she quickly raised her hips. Slowly, sensually, he began to slide the silky piece of cloth down her smooth legs. It was so damp with her juices that he practically had to peel it away. Panting softly, Katara watched as he brought the damp cloth up to his nose and inhaled deeply as he continued to look intently into her eyes. Exhaling loudly with a groan, Zuko placed the undergarment on the desk beside her before he buried his face on her covered womanhood to inhale even more deeply.

“Lift your dress for me, love,” he instructed throatily against her, “Expose your sweet, little pussy to me.”

Moaning softly, Katara found her legs trembling beneath him as he spoke, his warm breath heating her already molten core despite the cloth that separated them. Zuko pulled away and leaned against the back of his chair expectantly, his eyes dark with his arousal. Hesitating only a moment, the brunette reached over between her thighs to shyly lift the material from herself. She squirmed when he sat unmoving and stared intensely at her exposed flesh.

“Spread your legs more, Katara,” he ordered huskily as he brought his hand down to give his hardened confined cock a few squeezes and strokes. He grunted lowly in pleasure.

Katara mewled as she did what he ordered her and moaned when she felt her juices pour out of her as his black pupils dilated in desire and his nostrils flared. He shifted a little in order to pull the edge of his trousers down enough to pull out his turgid shaft, and Katara moaned as she watched him stroke his impressive length. She whined desperately as she lifted her hips out shamelessly toward his face.

“Zuko…” she whimpered desperately.

Zuko looked away from his heaven, from admiring his wife’s pink, wet, and swollen folds, and shifted his impassioned gaze to her needy one. Keeping his gaze locked with hers, he lifted his unoccupied hand and slid it up her inner thigh while with the other he continued to pump and squeeze his hard erection within his tight fist. He moved inwardly and began stroking her oversensitive flesh, making her tremble beneath his hand as he caressed her swollen folds. Then he slipped two fingers inside and stroked her gently, slowly building the fire within her, before he pressed his thumb against her nub and circled it firmly. She gasped loudly and her hips arched.

“Do you want me, my little waterbender?” he whispered huskily as he rose to his feet between her spread legs.

“Yes,” she moaned.

He groaned huskily as he stoked himself a few more times before he placed his hands on the hem of his dark trousers and swiftly pushed down until they pooled around his booted ankles. They both groaned when his turgid cock bobbed, a thin line of his arousal already trailing down from his tip down his length. Zuko’s amber eyes devoured the sight of his waterbender lying across his large desk with her exquisite breasts and wonderful womanly sex bare before him. Many times he had envisioned taking Katara in this room, his masculine domain. Moving forward with a growl, he placed his hips tightly between her thighs and slid his heavy cock slowly along her drenched feminine petals, causing her to drop her head back and moan. She shivered and sighed when he bent down to kiss her lips.

“If it were possible to never leave your tight, wet pussy, I’d remained impaled there forever,” he growled lowly against her lips as he stared ardently into her half-lidded eyes and pressed his shaft tighter to her swollen sex.

“Oh,” Katara moaned breathlessly. His words, uttered in all seriousness, made her center clench in need. “Zuko, please.”

“Do you want me take you with absolute abandon?” he asked with a low growl as he leaned over her shivering body with his erection still grinding brazenly against the folds of her slick core.

Katara moaned more loudly at both the sensations wreaking havoc on her body and at his heated words. She opened her mouth to respond, but the only sounds that came out where more moans and whimpers when he pressed his spongy head against her swollen clit.

“Do you want me to take you right here, right now, Katara?” Zuko continued as he pressed his lips to her ear as he spoke. He then kissed her cheek tenderly.

“Yes,” Katara finally managed to groan out.
Insane with need, the waterbender nuzzled her face into the neck of the panting Fire Lord hovering above her as she raised her hips to press herself tightly against him, urging him to enter her and give them what they both wanted.

“Yes what?” he asked teasingly as he rubbed against her entrance.

“Uuhh, take me,” the waterbender pleaded wantonly as she reached up to hold his body closer to her own, “I want you inside me. Please, Zuko.”

Groaning, Zuko allowed more of his weight to rest upon her gorgeous body, crushing her soft breasts against his hard chest, his length pressing tightly against her weeping opening endeavoring to swallow him entirely. Pressing his lips to her temple, he suppressed a needy groan at the sensation of her core quivering around his shaft. Her body trembled beneath his larger one as he savoring the sensation of her muscles convulsing around him as he went, until he was finally buried to the hilt.

“Oh, Zuko,” she sighed against him in pleasure.

Lifting his head, Zuko pressed his mouth against hers and kissed her softly. When she opened her mouth to him, he slipped his tongue inside and began to slowly dip it back and forth just as his erection slid in and out of her. Katara moved her tongue to tangle with his just as she moved her hips to the rhythm of his. Desire exploded within, between, and around them like the magic and power of flaring fireworks.

Zuko kept the slow pace for a long moment in order to gradually build their climax to the highest pinnacle. Katara sighed lovingly against his mouth as she felt her pleasure glow and simmer in her belly. The firebender pulled away from her delightful mouth so they could catch their breaths, but did not part from her skin as he trailed his lips down her neck to her chest. He cupped her breasts and squeezed before he pulled one nipple into his mouth and sucked gently. Katara’s breath hitched as she pushed her chest closer to his mouth and murmured her pleasure into the charged air. Zuko paid homage to her breasts for a moment longer before he captured her mouth in another passionate kiss. Their moans, heavy breathing, and the soft slapping of flesh rebounded in the Fire Lord’s study as they loved each other with a gentle passion.

Zuko panted as a moment later he heard Katara begin to moan loudly and felt her writhe wildly in his arms as he continued to slowly thrust inside her. He liked the way her body rocked against him as she loudly, fervently, moaned her pleasure, the way she thrashed beneath him without the slightest hint of shame. Her lack of inhibition was extremely arousing and he swiftly leaned down to kiss her deeply. When he felt the telltale pleasure begin to build at the bottom of his spine, Zuko leaned back to stand between her parted thighs. Grasping her hips tightly and pulling her firmly against him, he increased his pace and rammed into her, causing her breasts to bounce at his thrusts as she slid back and forth across his desk.

“Oh, gods, yes!” she cried out. “Yes, just like that!”

Katara raised her arms over her head in order to grab the edge of the desk to brace herself for her firebender’s rough plunges. Wrapping her legs tightly around his waist, she held him against her to make sure he would not leave her. Her heart pounded hard in her chest as her husband stared down at her with golden eyes glowing with a combination of passion, possessiveness, and love.

Gazing lustfully at his face, she smiled as she witnessed the excruciating desperation and pleasure that showed in the furrow of his brow and the clenching of his jaw as his movements became more erratic. The knowledge that she made him feel that way was overpowering and she thought that he was even more devastatingly handsome when he lost his iron control. A gasp escaped her when he reached a hand down to furiously rub her nub. A second later, her eyes rolled back and her mouth fell open in a silent scream as she reached that euphoric end. She felt like she was drowning in an ocean of intense ecstasy and she thrashed her head from side to side as a long moan was ripped from her throat.

Feeling the rush of her juices and the convulsing of her tight walls, Zuko gasped before he let out a low groan as he surrendered to his pleasure. He felt like fire had consumed his entire being as he released himself into her with hot jets of his seed and jerky thrusts.

With another groan, Zuko sat back down on his large chair, bringing her along with him so that he was still imbedded within her overflowing pussy. They panted hard against the other for a few long moments, just enjoying the other’s presence as their pleasure subsided. Katara mewed softly when he nuzzled her temple before she heard him sigh.

“I’ve always fantasized about making love to you on my desk,” he confessed in a husky whisper.

“First under the sunlight on the beach, then in the bathtub, then against the tree and the garden under the moonlight, and now your study,” Katara listed as she looked up at him with a raised eyebrow. “I wonder how many more fantasies you have, my lord.”

“Many, many more, love,” he purred throatily.
She flushed before she smiled.

“I can’t wait to see what they are,” she sighed against him.

Zuko groaned deeply. He would never have been able to find such a passionate woman as Katara in his entire life and he, not for the first time, thanked the gods for his fortune. He grasped her chin with his fingers and lifted her head up so he could kiss her affectionately. She sighed lovingly against his mouth and he wrapped his arms around her to pull her closer to him, not out of arousal—they were both sated at the moment—but out of a need to prolong their emotive connection.

They pull apart quickly when a soft knock interrupted them, immediately dispelling their delightful moment. They looked at each other in surprise before Zuko grasped her waist and lifted her off his lap. They moaned at the sensation from where they had been joined before they scrambled to fix their disheveled clothes and hair. Once they were presentable—or as much as they could be, given the circumstances—Katara sat on the chair opposite Zuko’s, while he quietly rushed to unlock the door before he raced back to his chair. Clearing his throat, he called out for whoever was outside to enter. They both watched as Jiao stepped in.

“What is it?” the Fire Lord asked.

If Jiao suspected anything about what they had been up to, she did not show it as she gave a bow before walking toward the desk.

“A letter just arrived for you a few minutes ago, my lord,” she said quietly as she handed the letter to him.

“Thank you,” he replied as he grabbed the letter.

Jiao bowed again as she smiled knowingly at both of them before she turned around and closed the door softly after her. The couple slumped in their seats before Katara laughed and Zuko chuckled.

“I will never find another servant as good as Jiao,” he commented after he quieted from his chuckles.

“Yeah,” Katara agreed as she continued to giggle. That was a close one.
Zuko smiled at her before he returned his attention to the scroll in his hand. He turned it over and raised an eyebrow in curiosity when he saw who it was from. He broke the seal and unfurled the paper. Katara watched as his happy mood quickly disappeared and was replaced by a grim expression.

“What’s wrong?” she asked in concern.

“It’s from King Bumi,” he began.

“What does he say?” she asked.

Zuko was silent for a moment after he finished reading before he rolled the scroll up again. He then glanced up at his worried wife with a deep frown on his face.

“We need to go to Omashu immediately,” he responded.

Katara would have been ecstatic at the thought of going back to the Earth Kingdom city, but his dark mood concerned her.

“Why?”

“The rebels haven’t been attacking any of the Fire Nation colonies because they are now attacking Earth Kingdom villages,” he growled out angrily, “An entire village was completely wiped out a few days ago.”

“Oh no!” Katara gasped in horror.

Zuko rose quickly from his chair and strode toward the door which he swung open, startling a few servants that were passing by.

“Have my things along with Fire Lady Katara’s packed and the airship ready to fly to Omashu in a few hours!” he barked out the orders.
His servants jumped at the fierce order before they bowed and hurriedly scurried to follow his command. Zuko closed the door before he made his way around his desk to slump in his chair.

“I knew something would happen eventually,” he growled as he ran a hand roughly down his face.

Katara stood up and rounded the desk to stand beside him, winding her arms around his shoulders. He turned toward her and rested his head on her chest just as he wrapped his arms around her waist. Removing his fire crown for the moment, she ran her fingers through his now loose hair in comfort.

“Even if things turn out very badly, you will always have me,” she told him gently yet firmly.

Zuko moved back and gently pulled her to him so she was sitting sideways on his lap. He hugged her tightly to him as he buried his face in her soft neck, inhaling her soothing, sweet scent deeply.

“Oh, Katara, I don’t know what I’d do without you,” he sighed against her skin as he tightened his hold of her possessively and protectively.

“I feel the same way,” she whispered back.

Zuko raised his head to look deep into her azure eyes before he leaned forward to kiss her. They kissed softly, angry that their good mood and what had happened a moment ago had to be ruined. When they pulled apart, Katara watched as Zuko’s golden eyes became ablaze with his anger.

“I will make Jianguo pay, if it’s the last thing I do,” he vowed darkly.

End of Part Six
The citizens of Omashu paused in their various activities and stared at the opulent Fire Nation carriage that passed them by. The group of guards mounted on intimidating komodo rhinos that surrounded it kept them at a distance. They wondered what the occasion for such a visit was. The Fire Lord had only visited their city a few times and this would be the first time he would do so with his new wife. They were all still surprised that the new Fire Lady was Waterbending Master Katara from the Southern Water Tribe, former girlfriend of the Avatar. It seemed some relationships were not meant to be while others are destined, they mused to one another. There were also rumors that Avatar Aang and Master Earthbender Toph Bei Fong were more than just traveling companions.

Looking out the carriage window, Katara watched the city go by her. They had arrived by airship, and despite the reason for this trip, she had been unable to help herself from admiring the view below. She noticed there were some changes to Omashu from what she last recalled. She had many memories of this city that made up part of her quest to save the world with her companions.

Who knew what would have become of it if Ozai had won? What would have happened if Zuko had not decided to turn his back on his own father to join them in their fight for freedom?

Well, I wouldn’t be married to him, that’s for sure, she mused with a small frown before she smiled,
And I wouldn’t be as happy as I am now.

She leaned away from the window and turned to look at her husband. He was silent as he read over the reports of the attacks that one of Bumi’s soldiers had handed to him as soon as they entered the city gates. Katara let her eyes roam his features and frowned. His expression was grim, his eyes hard, and his jaw tightly clenched. Even though he had not said anything, she knew that he was feeling guilty that more people were suffering because he was unable to capture Jianguo and the rebels.

Reaching out a hand, she gently settled it on his arm. Zuko glanced at her before he relaxed slightly as he reached over to squeeze her hand in assurance.

Before they could say anything, they felt the carriage come to halt. They let go and the firebender quickly folded the reports and placed them in a box that currently carried his important documents. He locked it before he settled it on his lap. They looked at each other again just as the carriage driver jumped down from his seat to open the door.

Zuko stepped down, the sun’s rays glinting off his fire crown, armor, and scabbard, before he turned to assist his wife. Once they were standing together, they looked up to stare at the wide door that led to the palace just as servants scurried out to gather their belongings. Zuko handed the box to Jee, who bowed as he took it before he went to stand beside Lady Ursa and Iroh. Zuko’s mother and uncle, as well as Jiao, had traveled in another carriage behind the royal couple.

A few minutes later they were shown to their rooms so they could refresh themselves from their long journey before dinner. Iroh instead went directly in search of Bumi. After refreshing herself by the stand that held a basin of water, Katara turned around to see Zuko pacing the elegant room with dark green as its main theme color.

“I don’t think I’ll be able to sit through dinner,” Zuko growled lowly.

Katara walked toward him and wrapped her arms around him from behind. She felt Zuko stop, but his body was still tense. She pressed her cheek against his back as she tightened her hold of him.

“Just remember that I’m here for you,” she reminded him gently.

Zuko let out a sigh before he relaxed against her warmth. What would he do without her? He turned around so that he could return the embrace and he buried his face in her soft hair.

“Thank you for being by my side.”

“I always will be,” she promised softly.

Zuko lifted his head to gaze into her blue eyes for a long, intense second, to see the truth of her words in their depths, before he slowly leaned down to softly press his lips against her plump ones. She sighed softly against his mouth and he felt his heart swell with emotions. Before their kiss could lead to something else, they were interrupted by a knock at the door. They pulled away just as Zuko called out a gruff ‘enter’ and the door was opened.

“Good afternoon, Your Majesty. King Bumi is awaiting you and your wife’s presence for dinner,” a young servant announced with a timid bow. He gulped when the Fire Lord’s golden eyes slanted his way.
“Yes, thank you,” Katara quickly spoke up with a smile to reassure the young man.

His brown eyes widened in appreciation at the lovely sight of the Fire Lady and he immediately smiled at the beautiful waterbender in admiration.

“Lead the way,” the Fire Lord ordered curtly as he narrowed his eyes at the man staring at his wife.

The servant stiffened at the menacing look and he squeaked out an affirmative before scurrying from the room. Katara turned to raise an eyebrow at her husband, who shrugged as he tucked her arm under his. She shook her head at his antics as they walked out of the room and followed the nervous servant to the great dining room. As they entered, they saw that they were the first ones there. Katara looked around as she remembered the last time she was in the room before the sound of footsteps interrupted her thoughts.

“Katara! Zuko!”

The royal couple turned at the sound of their names to see Aang and Toph walk into the room. They tensed slightly as they looked at the airbender, but relaxed when Aang genuinely smiled at them both. Momo flew away from Aang’s shoulder and landed on Katara’s, who giggled as she reached up to scratch under his chin. Momo purred before he jumped onto Zuko’s shoulder to rub his cheek against the tall firebender’s. Zuko frowned when the others laughed, but he still reached up to pat the small lemur’s head.

“What are you guys doing here?” Katara asked as she smiled at them.

“We received Bumi’s message,” Aang responded in a more serious tone.

“Do you know what has happened since?” Zuko asked with a frown.

Aang shook his head. “We just got here this morning.”

Zuko’s frown deepened and Katara again reached over to touch his arm. The firebender looked down to give her a small smile that did not reach his eyes and the brunette frowned.
“So how was your honeymoon?” Toph’s teasing voice interrupted them. “I’m surprised both of you are still walking.”

“Toph!” they both exclaimed. They glanced hesitantly at Aang, worried he might be feeling hurt, but they were surprised when he laughed as he nudged Toph with his elbow.

“Stop teasing them, Toph,” he told her and the married couple let out relieved breaths. Then a mischievous grin appeared on the young monk’s face as he continued, “They probably are having a difficult time walking right now as it is.”

Toph let out a loud laugh and slapped her knee as Katara and Zuko stared at the usually polite monk in shock. Zuko was the first to compose himself as he cleared his throat. He sure did not expect that coming from Aang, who even left the wedding early when the time approached for the wedding night. Had he perhaps really moved on?

“Do you know where King Bu—”

“Katara!” a masculine voice interrupted Zuko’s question and caused them all to look up.

Katara’s eyes widened and Zuko stiffened when Jet strutted into the grand room with a cocky grin on his tanned face.

“Jet?” the waterbender said in surprise as he stopped before her. Katara glanced quickly at Zuko to see him glaring at Jet.

“Ah, Katara, you’re as gorgeous as always,” the freedom fighter cooed, ignoring the firebender at her side. Before anybody could do anything, he quickly reached for the brunette’s hand and kissed it.

With an indignant gasp, Katara swiftly pulled her hand away from his grasp just as Zuko pulled her to him.

“I would appreciate it if you refrained from touching my wife,” the Fire Lord growled out darkly.
“What, afraid she’d leave you for me?” Jet tauntingly asked as he smirked.

Zuko raised a dark eyebrow as he replied, “No. My wife would never leave me, especially for someone like you.”

Jet stiffened at the insult and he balled his hands as he glared at the tall firebender. He opened his mouth to retort, but he paused when Katara tucked herself against Zuko’s side, placed a hand on his chest, and looked up to smile at him.

“You know me so well, dear husband,” she said softly.

Zuko smirked at Jet. Aang tried to suppress his grin behind his hand while Toph openly chortled in amusement at the obvious way Katara was showing her preference and loyalty to Zuko. Jet frowned deeply as he stared at Katara, but before he could say anything the loud cackle that could only be identified as King Bumi’s was heard. They looked up at the entrance to see the old earthbender walk into the room with General Iroh, Lady Ursa, and Admiral Jee.

“Ah, you’re all here!” Bumi exclaimed loudly. His bulging green eyes darted quickly between the Fire Lord and the waterbender. A wide grin stretched across his wrinkled face and he waggled his bushy eyebrow at the couple. “How’s the heir coming along? Haha!”

Katara felt her face heat up when Bumi, Iroh, Aang, and Toph openly laughed. Zuko stared at the mad king with a blank expression before he turned to give his blushing wife a smoldering look that only caused the reddish hue on her cheeks to deepen. The Fire Lord then glanced at the silent freedom fighter to see a dark expression cloud his tanned face. A small smirk appeared on the young firebender’s face before he scowled at his uncle’s next remark.

“With the way they keep shutting themselves in their rooms, I wouldn’t be surprised to hear news about the next heir one of these days,” Iroh piped in with a cheerful smile.

“Uncle Iroh!” Katara hissed as she narrowed her eyes at the old man.

Toph snickered and everybody else but Zuko and Jet laughed. The freedom fighter was glaring hatefully at the Fire Lord who raised an unperturbed eyebrow at him as he deliberately brought Katara closer to his side. He pretended not to notice Katara’s small glare at his possessive display.
“Good. Let’s eat!” Bumi boomed enthusiastically after he had calmed down from his cackles. He sure did love to tease the youngsters. They were just so easy to rile up.

The mad king either did not notice or completely ignored the tension coming from the Fire Lord and the freedom fighter as he walked past them to sit at the head of the table. Jet continued to glare at the Fire Lord, but Zuko ignored him as he tucked Katara’s hand under his arm and led her to her chair before sitting beside her once he helped her into her seat. The rest of his family sat on the chairs beside theirs. Sitting on Bumi’s right, Zuko watched as Aang sat across from him with Toph sitting next to the airbender. His eyes immediately narrowed, however, when Jet sat next to Toph and smiled roguishly across the table at Katara. As the servants moved around to serve their meal, Zuko turned to Bumi with a raised eyebrow.

“I’m curious to know why a…simple man is eating at your table,” he asked impassively as he glanced blandly at Jet.

Bumi continued to chew noisily as he loudly replied, “Jet was there to protect one of the villages. He has helped a lot.”

Jet, hearing what the old king said, turned to smirk at Zuko, who raised his eyebrow at him again before ignoring him completely as he again turned to Bumi.

“Is there more news about the attacks?” the Fire Lord asked with a frown.

“Patience!” Bumi exclaimed as he ripped a piece of pig-chicken with his teeth, “We’ll talk about that later. Now eat!”

Zuko frowned at the command, but he let it go as he looked down at his food. He did not have much of an appetite at the moment. He wanted to know what was going on. He was brought of his thoughts when he felt a small hand touch his knee. He glanced to his side to see Katara smile at him.

“The food is delicious, Zuko,” she said softly as she gave his knee an encouraging squeeze before subtly lifting her hand back on the table.

Zuko relaxed slightly at her care. She knew exactly how to comfort him without making it seem like he was weak. He picked up his chopsticks and slowly began to eat. He would wait until he could discuss the matter about the attacks later.
“The rebels have not made themselves known, but we are positive they are the same ones that were attacking the Fire Nation colonies months ago,” one of Bumi’s generals explained before he indicated to a large map of the Earth Kingdom. “They have attacked here, here, and here,” he continued as he pointed at each spot where there have been attacks.

“They are all around Omashu,” Iroh observed as he stroked his chin.

Zuko frowned as he stared at the map. After dinner, Bumi had led him, Aang, Iroh, and Jee to his study. Katara and Toph had insisted on being part of the discussion as well. Bumi allowed them to join because he was fond of both young women and he knew from the war that they were also seasoned warriors. Since Jee could not be with Ursa, Zuko had ordered Kuo and Shen to guard her while they were busy. Zuko was relieved when Jet was not invited. The freedom fighter was Bumi’s honored guest, but not a trusted friend or ally.

The study was cluttered with many objects, disarrayed scrolls, and papers piled up everywhere. Bumi sat at his large chair before his untidy desk while Zuko and Iroh sat on the only other chairs in the room. Katara, Toph, and Aang sat on cushions. Out of respect for Iroh’s age, Aang had given the chair to the old firebender despite being the Avatar. Jee stood slightly behind his lord as they listened to the general’s report.

“How do you know it’s the same rebels?” Zuko asked.

“The aftermath shows evidence of both firebending and earthbending attacks,” the general responded quickly.

“King Kuei and I are trying to keep the identity of the rebels a secret for now,” Bumi spoke up as he scratched behind his large ear.

“Why?” Aang asked.

“We don’t want the people to start blaming and hating Fire Lord Zuko and cause problems for both our countries,” the old king explained.

Katara frowned as she turned to look at Zuko whose jaw was tightly clenched as he glared down at his balled hands.
“We’ll have meetings to discuss this further before every party,” Bumi continued in his booming voice.

“Every party?” Katara asked with a confused frown.

“People will start wondering why the Fire Lord is here so soon after the attacks,” he explained loudly, his green bulging eyes darting around the people looking at him as he grinned. “So I planned a welcoming and congratulating celebration for the newly married Fire Lord and his wife as an excuse, haha! There’ll be three parties during the week. The other days will be used so you can see the damage to the villages and see if you can find any clues about the rebels’ whereabouts that we may have missed.”

The young Fire Lord frowned. He did not think it right to have parties while others were suffering. As if reading his thoughts, Bumi spoke up again.

“I already sent help to those in need,” he explained, his usual boisterous voice more quiet and subdued, “They are being taken care of.”

Zuko sighed before he inclined his head in acceptance.

“We’ll talk later. The first party starts tomorrow, so you should all rest!” the old man boomed again. “I’ll have no party-poopers at my parties, alright? Haha!”

All except for Zuko stood up and made their way to the door. Katara stopped and turned around to wait for her husband.

“I need to ask King Bumi something,” Zuko explained.

Katara nodded before she followed the rest out of the room and closed the door. Bumi’s general bowed to them before he walked away. Jee bid them good night as he also walked away in search of Lady Ursa. Katara watched as Toph smirked in her direction before she moved away from Aang’s side to go talk to Iroh. Katara watched her go with a frown as she was left alone with the airbender before she understood that the small earthbender wanted her and Aang to have a talk.

“How are you?” Aang’s voice made her look back at him. “Is Zuko treating you well?”
“Yes, I’m happy,” she replied softly, afraid to say just how happy Zuko made her in order not to hurt Aang.

“That’s good,” the airbender replied with an awkward chuckle as he rubbed the back of his neck.

“How…how have you been?” she hesitantly asked as she wrung her hands together in worry.

A comforting smile appeared on Aang’s face as he reached out to grab one of her hands and give it a soft squeeze.

“Zuko and you don’t need to worry about me anymore, so enjoy your life together,” he told her truthfully. “I…I’ve moved on.”

He let go of her hand as they both look at Toph who was grinning at something Iroh was telling her.

“Toph,” Katara stated with a smile.

“Yeah,” Aang replied as he continued to stare at the rough yet pretty earthbender. Then he returned his attention to Katara as he continued, “Even though it was hard at first, and I thought I would never forget you, Toph was there to prove me wrong. These past few months I’ve been able to see what kind of woman Toph is without…”

“Without me in the way,” Katara softly finished for him when he paused.

The airbender gave her a small smile.

“As time passed I was able to see that my love for you was centered on familiarity and safety,” he explained carefully. “You were the first person I saw when I woke up after being frozen in the iceberg and you were the only person that understood me in a world that was no longer my own. You were kind, and comforting, and beautiful that I couldn’t stop myself from wanting you to be mine forever.”
Aang paused as he again looked up at Toph to see her laughing and Katara watched as his gray eyes soften.

“But with Toph, I realized that there could be more than that,” he confessed quietly.

The waterbender’s eyes widened at the implication of his words.

“So does that mean…?”

“Yeah,” Aang continued with a pleased sigh, “Before I realized it I fell in love with Toph.”

Katara smiled happily as she exclaimed, “That’s great!”

The young airbender blushed and shuffled his feet, though his smile did not disappear.

“It’s not easy,” he admitted quietly. “Toph and I are different and we sometimes butt heads, but I find that I like the challenge.” His face flushed even more deeply as he more softly said, “But there are times when she is almost gentle and soft… I really like those times.”

Katara laughed quietly at the blushing monk. She understood what he meant for she acted differently around others and acted differently when with Zuko. Zuko also had such a side when he was with her.

“I’m really happy for you, Aang. For you both,” she told him earnestly.

“Thanks, Katara,” he responded with a smile. “Although we were not meant to be, just know that you’ll always have a special place in my heart.”

Katara returned the smile. Although she did not love Aang that way she loved Zuko, she still considered the airbender an important person in her life. After all, if hadn’t been for Aang, she would have never left her tribe in order to save the world. She was glad to know that he did not hate her for choosing to be with Zuko.
“Finally! The awkward air is gone,” Toph’s blunt words made the two benders turn to see her walk toward them with a grin.

Katara and Aang laughed. Iroh smiled at them before he turned around and headed down the corridor.

“So now I don’t have to worry about my boyfriend trying to steal his ex,” the earthbender said with a grin.

“As if I’d let him,” Katara replied with a mocking sniff.

“More like as if Sparky would let him,” Toph corrected with a chuckle.

“You’re right. Zuko would track him down in order to save me and bring me back home,” the waterbender said amusedly.

“After he kicks Twinkletoes’ ass,” the green-eyed earthbender added with another chuckle.

“You girls do know I’m standing right here, right?” Aang interrupted with a frown as he crossed his arms over his chest.

“Yeah, and?” Toph retorted with a raised eyebrow.

Aang opened his mouth before he closed it and shook his head. Well, at least they were having fun...even if it was at his expense.

“Do you wanna ride the mail slides?” Toph’s voice interrupted his thoughts.

“Yeah!” he replied excitedly before he grinned at the waterbender. “We’ll see you later, Katara.”

“You and Sparky have a good night,” Toph added before a wicked grin appeared on her porcelain face. “That’s if you and Zuko sleep at all.”
“Toph!” Katara exclaimed.

The earthbender laughed loudly at the embarrassed Fire Lady as she followed Aang down the hall.

Katara shook her head with a smile as she watched them go. Even if they had their differences, Aang and Toph were the same when it came to having fun. Her smile widened when she felt a warm and strong presence beside her and she glanced up to see Zuko also watching the other two leave.

“They seem happy,” he remarked coolly.

“They are,” Katara replied before she added with a grin, “They’re in love.”

Zuko looked down to smile at her.

“Much like us,” he said softly.

Katara smiled brightly at him.

“Yes,” she agreed before a small frown appeared on her face. “What did Bumi say?”

Zuko ran a hand over his hair and sighed.

“There hasn’t been another attack, but I’m not convinced that they have stopped or left,” he replied darkly.

“I hope they’re captured soon, so they won’t cause any more damage,” she said firmly.

“I hope so, too,” he replied, although he did not say that he thought it would not be that easy. He was not as optimistic or hopeful as his softhearted wife.
He reached for her hand and again tucked it under his arm to guide her to their guest room.

“We should head to our room, so we can be up for the party tomorrow,” he said in a blank tone.

“I’m not up for a party,” Katara replied with a sigh.

“Neither am I, but Bumi told me that the nobility of Omashu and the surrounding areas are eager to come tomorrow and celebrate our arrival,” he explained.

Katara sighed as they silently walked down the empty corridor.

---

The next day, King Bumi’s palace was flooded with noblemen and women who crowded around the Fire Lord, his Fire Lady, and the Avatar. Whenever there was talk about the attacks, Zuko came to realize that indeed they did not know who had done it and why. Zuko could not stop wondering why Jianguo was not revealing his identity and intentions. What could he be planning to do? The young Fire Lord mentally growled in frustration. He hated that he did not know what to expect and when.

He was distracted from his thoughts by his wife who leaned discreetly against him as if she could sense his anxiety. He responded by pressing back into her and he suppressed a smirk when he glanced down to see her lips curl into a small smile as she continued to listen to the group of women talking to her about idle things. With a mental sigh, Zuko returned his attention to the old nobleman who was trying to convince him that his products would be a good trade for the Fire Nation. Zuko was not interested, especially since he had more urgent things on his mind.

The nobleman finally seemed to sense the Fire Lord’s lack of interest and stopped talking. The old man took a sip of his wine and cleared his throat as he stood there awkwardly for a moment before he bowed and quickly scurried away.

Zuko did not even notice since his attention was once again caught by Jet. The freedom fighter, dressed in a more refined warrior outfit, was standing across the room from them surrounded by a large group of young women. Even though he was among so many coquettish females, his dark eyes kept fixing upon Katara, as they had been ever since she and Zuko had appeared for the banquet. Zuko did not fear that Katara would fall for Jet’s charms—after all, he made sure to keep her well satisfied—but he hated that the bastard was even trying to seduce his wife.

As if feeling his stare on him, Jet glanced away from watching Katara and looked at the firebender with a smirk. Raising a cool eyebrow, Zuko deliberately grazed his hand on his wife’s own. Katara looked up at him and Zuko glanced down at her to give her a small smile. Oblivious to the male posturing going on around her, Katara smiled gently at him as she wrapped her arm around his and continued her conversation with the women. Zuko looked back at Jet and was unable to curb his smug smirk. Jet narrowed his eyes as he gulped down his drink before storming away. The women giggled as they followed him.

“I can practically feel your smugness from here,” Toph’s amused voice reached his ears.

Zuko turned to see Toph and Aang, both dressed formally, grinning up at him. He gave a shrug as a response as he took a sip of his wine. Katara was still distracted by the women’s conversation.

“Hopefully he got the message that what he hopes for will never come true,” he replied coolly.

“I doubt it,” Toph snorted.

“Jet isn’t that bad of a guy,” Aang spoke up, as always trying to keep the peace. “He wouldn’t fool around with a married woman.”

“Unless that married woman is Sugar Queen,” the earthbender retorted with another snort.

Zuko narrowed his eyes as he ominously said, “I’ll break his neck if he even tries.”

Aang and Toph shivered at the darkness of his tone. They had no doubt that Zuko would do it if Jet ever tried to do anything to Katara.

“What are you guys talking about?” Katara’s voice made them stiffen.

“Nothing,” the three said in unison.

Zuko cleared his throat and Aang and Toph smiled innocently at the waterbender. Katara stared at them suspiciously, but she was distracted when she felt Zuko place his hand over hers.
“Would you like to dance, my lady?” he asked her with a small smile.

“I would love to, my lord,” she quickly responded. She knew Zuko did not like to dance if he could help it, so she took advantage whenever he was in the mood. She had a feeling he was trying to sidetrack her, but for the moment, she decided to let him try.

Excusing them from the group, Zuko led her to the dance floor where other couples were already dancing. Aang and Toph followed behind them with smiles. Katara noticed that Lady Ursa and Jee were already dancing. She grinned when she saw that Iroh was dancing with a pretty woman. Zuko brought her before him and they bowed at each other before he took her into his arms and led her in the dance. As they moved around the dance floor, they caught the low murmurs of how great an image they made and Katara looked up to smile happily at him. Although he had not said anything nor smiled, Katara knew he was pleased with the murmurs as he brought her closer to him and stared intensely into her eyes.

Once the second dance was finished, they paused and walked away even as a few people called for them to continue. Katara suppressed a laugh when Zuko cringed at the exaggerated praise. They walked back to the banquet table to grab something to drink. Katara smiled as Zuko handed her a cup. They stood by each other in comfortable silence as they watched the other dancers.

“Hello, Zuko,” they heard a low feminine voice greet from behind them.

The couple stiffened at the familiar voice. They turned around to see Mai and her family standing silently beside her. Katara tensed at the glares they were giving her before she relaxed slightly when Zuko touched her arm. They bowed to Zuko, but completely ignored the new Fire Lady.

“We hope you are enjoying your stay in Omashu, my lord,” Mai’s father, the ambassador to Omashu, began politely.

Zuko narrowed his eyes angrily at them. If it wasn’t because the nobleman was a good ambassador, he would have imprisoned him for the insult to his waterbender.

“Thanks to my wife I am enjoying myself very much,” the young Fire Lord deliberately replied.

He mentally smirked when they stiffened at his words. He grabbed Katara’s hand and placed it over his arm as he gently pulled her a bit forward.
“It seems you did not see her before,” he continued as he glared at them, “But now that you do, why don’t you properly greet your new Fire Lady?”

Katara glanced up briefly at Zuko to see him glaring at the arrogant family before she looked back at them to see them reluctantly give her a small bow. The waterbender narrowed her own eyes when she noticed that Mai had not taken her eyes off Zuko.

“We hope you enjoy your stay as well…Fire Lady Katara,” the ambassador said as he gave her a rigid smile.

“Thank you,” she replied graciously as she stared levelly at them. “As my husband just said, we are enjoying ourselves immensely.”

“I am greatly impressed,” Mai’s mother spoke up in a fake, sugary tone. “Even though you are a commoner from the Water Tribes, you really do act the part of a lady very well.”

Katara felt Zuko stiffen at the same time she did at the insult, but she squeezed his arm. She watched Mai smirk, but Katara ignored her as she returned the fake smile to the older noblewoman.

“A woman does not have to be a noblewoman to be a lady,” Katara replied sweetly before she glanced at Mai then back at the older woman as she continued, “I’m sure you’ve noticed that there are many noblewomen who are no ladies at all.”

The woman gasped at the veiled insult and Mai turned a hateful glare at the waterbender smiling innocently at them. Zuko mentally smiled in pride at Katara’s quick retort.

“Ah, yes, that may be true,” the nobleman spoke up as he grasped his angry wife’s arm to keep her silent when the Fire Lord narrowed his eyes at her. “We were just really surprised a Water Tribeswoman is able to handle Fire Nation responsibilities so well, but we still believe a Fire Nation noblewoman could have been better.”

Zuko stiffened again as his glare intensified. He knew the man meant Mai could have been better, but Zuko thought otherwise. Katara actually cared for the betterment of the people. He was tired at the insults they were throwing at his wife and he would make them regret their words. He moved a step forward with a low growl, but paused when he felt Katara again squeeze his arm as she also took another step forward.
“Although I am a Water Tribeswoman and a waterbender, the Fire Nation people seem to like me very much for everything I’ve done for them,” she replied coolly before she stared straight into Mai’s cold, dark eyes, “which I cannot say for other Fire Nation noblewomen.”

A smirk appeared on Zuko’s lips at their shocked and indignant expressions before he looked down at his waterbender.

“It is not only the people who love you, wife,” he began in a slightly softer tone, “You have pleased me well.”

Katara looked up to smile warmly at his words.

“How could I forget, husband?” she responded happily, “You remind me all the time.”

Mai, who had been silent the whole time as she enjoyed her parents insulting the water wench, looked at the couple angrily. The affectionate way they called each other wife and husband, the loving way the waterbender was looking at Zuko and the soft look in his eyes as he stared down at her made Mai feel sick. This was not how she had imagined it would go when she met Zuko again. She had been expecting to see Zuko regretting marrying the waterbender!

With a loud snap of her fan, Mai turned around and angrily walked away without saying a word. With an indignant sniff and a small bow, her mother hurried after her. Her father bowed stiffly before following behind them. Katara let out a sigh as she relaxed.

“That was pretty mean of us,” she mused.

“Not when it’s the truth,” Zuko replied with a shrug. “Besides, they started with the insults.”

“And it’s not like it’s anything I haven’t heard before,” she added with a smirk. “It’s kind of fun when I prove them wrong.”

“You defended yourself wonderfully,” he congratulated warmly. “I’m proud.”

Katara laughed softly as she took a sip of the drink Zuko had handed to her before they were interrupted. With a pleased sigh, she looked at him with a bright smile once she remembered something he said.

“You do realize you practically told them you love me, right?” she remarked.

Zuko smiled down at her as he replied, “I want everybody to know it.”

Katara smiled at him before she leaned closer to him. Zuko closed his eyes briefly as he inhaled her sweet scent.

“When you said I pleased you well, do you mean in every way?” she whispered with a soft purr.

“Oh, yes, you please me in every way,” he growled out huskily.

His lips curled into a smirk and his golden eyes darkened when Katara giggled and her cheeks flushed a soft red. His eyes darted to her smiling lips and he watched as she deliberately ran the tip of her tongue over her bottom lip. He again looked into her eyes to see the blue depths darken slightly in arousal. Another group of women suddenly surrounded them, breaking the electrifying spell between them, and he quickly straightened with a scowl. They began to coo over Katara’s ring and necklace and the wristband he wore. He was grateful when a minute later a servant appeared at his side to tell him King Bumi wished to speak to him.

“Take me to him now,” Zuko immediately ordered.

He turned to Katara to tell her he would see her later before he turned away and followed the servant. Katara suppressed an amused smirk as he escaped the flock of chattering women, though she did not appreciate that she was the one stuck with them. A few minutes passed as the women continued talking to her—mostly commenting on how lucky she was for having such an attractive man as the Fire Lord as her husband. Katara was just wondering what was taking Zuko so long to return to her when she suddenly felt someone stand close behind her.

“Good afternoon, Lady Katara,” she heard a masculine voice greet smoothly behind her.

The waterbender stiffened as she turned around to see Jet smirking rakishly at her. She took a step to the side in order not to be standing so close to him. The women stopped talking as they stared at the man and the Fire Lady in wonder.
“You look gorgeous,” he praised charmingly.

“Thank you,” she replied politely but tersely.

She did not want to speak to him, especially after what he tried to do to her the last time they were in Ba Sing Se. However, she could not be rude to him in front of everybody or else they would start suspecting that something was going on between them.

“How have you been?” he asked with the same smirk on his face.

“Fine, thank you,” she responded curtly.

Her aloof attitude did not seem to faze him, instead, it made his arrogant smirk widen. He was enjoying the challenge.

“Would you like to dance?” he asked as he raised his hand for her to take.

Katara did not even glance down at his hand as she declined his offer.

“I’m too tired after dancing so much with my husband,” she added pointedly.

“Just one dance,” he insisted as he took a step closer to her.

“Are you deaf?” the Fire Lord’s hard voice was heard and the women immediately parted to allow him to make his way to the waterbender. “My wife told you she doesn’t want to dance with you.”

Jet pulled back his arm as he glared at the firebender before his smirk reappeared. The wheat stalk he usually chewed on was not present at the moment.

“I’ll leave her alone…for now,” he said.
Zuko glowered heatedly at him before he looked down when he felt Katara grab his arm as she leaned against him.

“I suddenly feel energized. Can you take me to dance, my lord?” she intentionally asked with a bright smile she had denied Jet.

“Of course. Anything my lady desires,” Zuko responded as he turned them around and led them back to the dance floor without looking back at the freedom fighter.

As they again twirled around the dance floor, they could feel Jet staring at them. Zuko maneuvered them to the center so the other dancing couples could form a sort of cover. Once satisfied, he pulled Katara close to him.

“Thank you for standing with me, Katara,” he said quietly.

Katara looked up to gaze into his piercing, golden eyes.

“Where else would I be, Zuko, but at your side?” she replied softly.

Zuko smiled as he raised a hand and gently caressed her cheek before he pulled her closer.

“Promise me you will always be by my side,” he whispered fervently.

Raising her hand, Katara placed it over his and leaned into his warm touch.

“Always,” she promised ardently, “For as long as you want me.”

Sliding his hand from her cheek down to gently grasp her chin, Zuko leaned down and softly brushed his lips against hers before pulling away to stare intensely into her cobalt orbs.

“Forever,” he breathed, “I want you forever.”
“Then you will have me for forever,” she responded with a soft smile.

Katara felt him relaxed. They danced in comfortable silence for a moment, basking in each other’s presence, before Zuko spoke again.

“If I ripped his eyes out, Jet would finally stop staring at you,” he growled out.

“He can look, but it’s you who can touch,” she responded softly as she pressed herself closer to him.

“Hm, you’re right,” he agreed with a small smirk. “And I can do more than just touch you,” he added as he lifted her slightly so that her center was pressed tightly to his loins and spun them around in the dance.

Katara moaned softly before he brought her back down to her feet. She looked into his smoldering golden eyes and smiled.

“I wish you could do so at this moment,” she purred softly.

“And I will,” he stated as he brought them to a halt, tucked her hand under his arm, and quickly led them toward the doors.

“Zuko! It’s still too early to leave!” Katara whispered urgently. “People will wonder what we’re doing, if they can’t already guess!”

“So?” he asked with a raised eyebrow. “We’re married. If we want to indulge in each other we can and there’s nothing they can say or do about it.”

A small grin appeared on the brunette’s lips.

“Let’s go,” she said eagerly as she quickened her steps.
“Agni, how I love you,” he growled lowly into her ear.

She let out a soft laugh as they exited the banquet hall and hurriedly made their way to their guest room. They did not notice that two sets of eyes watched them leave.

With a frown, Jet looked away from the retreating royal couple and smiled charmingly at the group of young women who had gathered around him again. Mai, on the other hand, did not look away from the door as she clenched the fan in her hands so tightly that it snapped. She glanced down to see a thin red line run across her fingers before she clenched her bleeding hand.

With a grim expression on his face, the Fire Lord observed the destruction before him with sharp eyes. The last village that was attacked had been completely destroyed, and according to what Bumi told him, there were no survivors. The attack happened a few weeks ago and Bumi had ordered his soldiers to bury the dead and then held a burial ceremony for their souls.

Zuko’s soldiers, as well as Bumi’s, were searching more carefully to see if they could find any clues from the attackers. Jet and his freedom fighters were also there and Zuko would raise an irritated eyebrow every time Jet smirked in his direction.

Zuko felt his anger rise as he made his way through the ruined village. Every single structure and house had been burned to the ground, the fields where the villagers grew their crops were now a charred wasteland, and the rotting corpses of animals were still scattered about. Once in a while he would catch the sight of household items and children’s toys. He paused every time he saw a ripped article of clothing and his hands clenched tightly as his rage rose. Bumi’s general had told him that they found the bodies of many women lying everywhere, their clothes ripped open, their throats slit, and their legs spread apart to show the evidence of what their rapists had done to them.

These people had done nothing wrong, their homes were destroyed and their lives were taken from them just for the greed and revenge of a few men. It was a warning aimed toward Zuko. He felt his guilt rise once more and he closed his eyes to bear it before he snapped them open again and straightened himself. The villagers’ deaths were horrible and unfortunate, but he knew that he could not give in to Jianguo’s demands. He could not hand the throne over to Ozai for that would only lead to more pain and destruction. He would not let that happen.

I’ll make Jianguo and his men regret all the damage they have done, he vowed darkly as he balled his hands into tight fists.

He turned around and headed toward Bumi and Iroh, who were conversing quietly off to the side, as the rest of the men continued in their search. Both old men stopped talking when they sensed someone approaching, but they continued when they saw it was the young Fire Lord.

“I already sent messages of warning to the other members of the White Lotus,” the old king said, his expression unusually grim. “Hopefully someone can find the bastards.”

“I already did that when the rebels first attacked, remember?” Iroh reminded him with a frown, “They haven’t found anything. The rebels are just too cautious.”

“Maybe this time we’ll have luck,” Bumi remarked as he crossed his arms over his broad chest, his large bushy eyebrows bunched together. “They’re bound to make a mistake.”

“I hope so,” the old firebender responded with a sigh as he slipped his hands into his long sleeves, “But I have a feeling it won’t be that easy.”

Bumi grumbled under his breath, but nodded his head in acknowledgement.

“I’ll send help to rebuild the village,” Zuko spoke up after a moment of silence.

“No need, young Fire Lord,” Bumi spoke up as he waved his large wrinkly hand aside, “I have everything taken care of.”

“But—”

“I just want the bastards captured so they can pay for their crimes and before they cause even more damage,” the old man interrupted firmly, his large nostrils flaring.

Zuko frowned deeply before he inclined his head in acceptance.

“Very well,” he reluctantly said.

“We’ll look at the other villages in two days,” Bumi added in his usual loud voice.
The young firebender gave a nod before he looked at their surroundings. He watched as the men began to stack the charred piles of wood to one side to begin cleaning up. He saw the freedom fighters doing the same and he mentally agreed that they were of some help. He frowned, however, when he did not spot Jet and his eyes darted around. Now that he thought about it, he had not seen the insufferable freedom fighter in a while.

Feeling a sense of urgency, Zuko turned around and began walking away.

“Where are you going, Nephew?” Iroh called after him.

“I’m heading back to the palace,” was his only response as he strode to where their mounts were grazing together.

Zuko grabbed his komodo rhino’s reigns and led it away from the others before he swung onto the animal’s back. He pressed his heels into its sides and the animal quickly moved forward before it switched into a gallop when Zuko spurred it on. At the sound of pursuit, he glanced back with a flaming fist only to extinguish it when he saw that it was Shen and Kuo trying to catch up to him. He turned back around and narrowed his eyes. If he found Jet trying anything with Katara, he would make him regret it.

Katara laughed along with the other women as Toph finished telling them about a funny incident that occurred during her travels. The waterbender along with Ursa and Toph were in one of the sitting rooms of the Omashu Palace with a group of noblewomen. Unlike the fake flattery of the Fire Nation noblewomen, Katara found herself enjoying the carefree chatter of these women since they had nothing against her.

Her light mood ended, however, when Mai and her mother entered the room and sat down with them. The younger woman raised a thin hand and a servant immediately rushed over to serve the ambassador’s daughter and wife tea. Katara watched as Mai raised her teacup and took a small sip as she darkly stared at her over the rim.

The other women cleared their throats uncomfortably as they covertly looked between the ambassador’s daughter and the waterbender, one the Fire Lord’s former companion and the other his wife. Katara raised her own cup and took a delicate sip before she continued the conversation to indicate she was not intimidated. She felt confident of Zuko’s love for her and that was what mattered. Ursa and Toph immediately responded to Katara and soon the other women joined the conversation.

“I’ve never been to the Fire Nation, but I heard the palace is very beautiful. Is it more beautiful than “the Earth King’s palace?” one of the younger women asked the Fire Lady.

Before Katara could answer, Mai’s mother spoke up with a sweet laugh.

“Oh, it is!” she exclaimed before she tittered as she looked at her silent daughter. “Mai can attest to that. She was living in the Fire Lord’s palace after all.”

Katara clenched her hands around her teacup as she glared at the woman for bringing up that subject.

“Oh, but my daughter-in-law knows much more about the palace,” Ursa spoke with a smile as she glanced at the waterbender before she looked at the other women. “My son personally gave her a tour of the entire palace and the grounds so she could become more familiar of her new home.”

Toph let out a chortle and the other women laughed uncertainly at the small glare the older woman sent Lady Ursa, who ignored it as she took a small bite of a pastry. The conversation started again. When some of the women began to describe the gifts their husbands or suitors had given them, the ambassador’s wife spoke up again.

“The Fire Lord gave my daughter a beautiful bracelet last summer,” she said before she grabbed Mai’s arm and raised it to show everyone the golden piece of jewelry.

Katara again felt her irritation flare. Why were they still bringing up the past? It was not like it would change anything. She was still married to Zuko. The women murmured in confusion before Toph’s snort interrupted them.

“You still have that thing even though he broke up with you?” she asked bluntly as she tilted her head in Mai’s direction. “That’s kinda pathetic.”

Toph ignored the shocked gasp that came from Mai’s mother and smirked when she felt the younger woman’s heartbeat quicken in anger.

“And if you wanna compare, that thing is nothing compared to what Fire Lord Zuko has given to Fire Lady Katara,” the small earthbender added as she began to count on her fingers, “There’s that silver rose hairpin, and the wedding ring and betrothal necklace, and the waterskin to name a few.”
“Oh, and my son also modified the Royal Palace Garden and remodeled the Fire Lady’s bedchamber to resemble a Water Tribe room as wedding gifts for Lady Katara,” Ursa spoke up with another smile before she giggled as she nudged Katara in the arm, “Though the Fire Lady’s chamber is more of a recreational room since my son only allows Katara to sleep in the Fire Lord’s bedchambers with him.”

The waterbender would have blushed at the women’s giggles and suggestive remarks had she not noticed the shocked expression on Mai’s usually blank face. Katara knew it was mean, but she could not help but smirk smugly at the thought that she was the only woman Zuko had allowed to share his room and sleep in his bed—a bed where they have indulged in each other more than they could count. Mai’s shocked look vanished quickly to be replaced with a dark glare as she slowly opened her fan. Katara moved her hand to touch her new waterskin as she raised an eyebrow. Mai closed her fan with a snap and Katara calmly moved her hand from her waterskin.

The conversation again switched to other topics, but just as before Mai’s mother always found a way to bring up Mai’s past relationship with Zuko. Ursa and Toph, however, always had something to say to make them see that Zuko cared more for Katara and remind them it was she he was married to. After yet another remark from the older noblewoman, Toph finally had enough and loudly banged her teacup on the low table. Startled, the women jumped as they all turned to look at the blind earthbender.

“Zuko married the woman he wants and loves,” she bluntly stated, “He was with Lady Doom and Gloom over there for four years, but he never asked her to marry him. But then he was reunited with Katara and a few months later he was desperate to marry her. He was even willing to defy the Royal Council in order to have her! Do I have to keep bringing more things up to prove that Zuko is madly in love with Katara to get you to shut the hell up?”

Mai’s dark eyes widened at the earthbender’s frankness while her mother spluttered and gaped like a fish out of water. The other women suppressed snickers since they never got along well with the two haughty noblewomen. Ursa hid a smile behind her hand before she delicately cleared her throat.

“Well, now that Lady Toph has settled that matter, why don’t we talk about the upcoming party tomorrow?” she asked.

As the women immediately began to chatter about the upcoming event, Katara quietly excused herself and stood up. She ignored the glares coming from the two Fire Nation women as she walked toward the doors. She needed fresh air and some peace and quiet after having to listen to Mai’s mother bringing up Zuko’s past relationship. She was getting better at accepting his past, but that did not mean she wanted to keep being reminded about it. A few minutes later, she stepped into one of the gardens of the palace and let out a sigh at the soft breeze that greeted her.
She made her way through the garden, passing trees and flowers, before she spotted a stone bench. She sat down and rearranged her dress around her legs as she observed her surroundings. She was proud to admit that none of the gardens she had seen so far could compare to the splendor of the Royal Palace Garden that Zuko had renovated for her. She raised her head to look at the sky that was spotted with a few clouds and a group of birds flying by. She could see that the sun was already descending and she frowned slightly.

Zuko, King Bumi, and the rest had left early in the morning toward one of the destroyed villages. At first, she had been a bit upset that she was not able to accompany them, but as a proper Fire Lady she could not act as impulsively as she used to, or go around traipsing in the countryside. That was one of the negative sides of being Fire Lady. But she did not mind it as much as she thought she would, and although she could not give her opinion as freely as before because of the old advisors’ views on women participating in politics, Zuko always went to her for advice and opinions on certain matters. She appreciated that. As she stared at the sun again, she wondered how Zuko was doing at the moment and if they found anything.

“You and Zuko seem happy,” Mai’s monotonous voice interrupted her thoughts.

The waterbender glanced behind her to see the tall noblewoman staring blankly down at her. Katara stood up and turned around to face Mai with a suspicious frown.

“We are happy,” she responded simply.

“I wonder how long that will last,” the dark-haired woman coolly remarked.

“What do you mean?” Katara asked with a raised eyebrow.

Mai shrugged as she walked around the bench. Katara discreetly moved her hand toward her waterskin as Mai approached her, but the older woman only passed her by to cut a flower from a bush. Katara watched her warily as Mai twirled the small flower between her long fingers as she stared at it with a bored expression.

“Everything is great now because you are newly married,” Mai began as she began to slowly pluck the flower’s petals, “But after a few years, once both of you realize how different you are, you will only resent each other.”

After she said that, Mai crushed the flower in her hand before she opened her palm to let the destroyed flower fall to the ground. Katara did not allow the woman’s actions or words faze her.

When Mai turned around to see the waterbender’s reaction, she was disappointed at her unperturbed expression.

“Zuko and I aren’t as different as people think,” Katara replied smoothly, “And the differences we do have are what keep us interested in each other.”

Mai let out a quiet snort as she said, “Only time will tell.”

“And you’ll be there waiting?” Katara retorted.

“Yes,” Mai responded bluntly, “I still believe Zuko will come back to me.”

Katara almost felt bad for her delusion. Could she not see her hopes would never come true?

“A marriage once made cannot be so easily dissolved,” Katara reminded her.

“I know that,” the noblewoman snapped before she smirked, “But that doesn’t mean I can’t have Zuko again.”

The waterbender felt her temper flare at her insistence.

“Why can’t you leave Zuko alone?” Katara asked with an exasperated growl, “He’s married! To me! Why don’t you find an available man who does want you?”

Mai narrowed her eyes at the barb and clenched her hands.

“I will never give up on Zuko,” she hissed, “He was mine first!”

The blue-eyed woman scoffed.
“We all know that he was never yours,” the waterbender said firmly.

Mai took a step back as if she had been slapped.

“He’s mine,” Katara continued with a smug smirk.

The noblewoman balled her hands as she glared at the confident brunette.

“Enjoy your happiness for now, water peasant,” she hissed, “before Zuko begins to receive propositions for concubines.”

“Zuko would never take a concubine,” Katara responded confidently.

Mai interrupted her with a harsh laugh and Katara could only stare at her with a frown.

“Zuko is a man, and men can never remain faithful to one woman.”

“If you believe that’s true, then why do you want Zuko so badly?” Katara asked.

“I wanted to marry him for years and have the extra bonus of being Fire Lady,” Mai confessed as she stared down at her nails before she looked back at the waterbender, “My love for him would forgive him for any concubines he takes. After all, it is the way things are in Fire Nation culture.”

“That may be so, but Zuko respects me and my culture,” Katara responded firmly, “He would never dishonor me by taking other women.”

Another harsh laugh interrupted the waterbender.

“You’re so naïve,” Mai spat cruelly, “Stupid and naïve.”
The waterbender narrowed her eyes as she straightened herself out.

“You may have anticipated Zuko taking other lovers because he doesn’t love you,” Katara began and continued even when Mai gasped, “but I am confident in his love for me. I know he will never be unfaithful to me.”

Mai narrowed her dark eyes and again clenched her hands at her sides.

“We’ll just have to wait and see,” she hissed, “And once he gets bored of you, I will be there to take him back as his royal concubine. It will be me whom he will come to at night.”

“Just keep telling yourself that,” Katara irately responded, “It will never happen.”

Katara let go of her irritation as a thought sprang in her head. She knew what she could say to make the jealous noblewoman back off from Zuko as well as make her see she didn’t have the smallest chance of capturing his interest. She did not want to cruel, but she needed to do something to get it through Mai. Even if she didn’t like it.

Mai’s eyes narrowed when she watched a self-satisfied smirk curl the waterbender’s lips.

“After all, I make sure to keep Zuko well pleased and satisfied in bed,” Katara added, her tone confident. “You have no idea how often he comes to me, sometimes he can’t even wait for us to be in our room so he can have me. He’s like an insatiable animal in his quest to take me. Our lovemaking is so passionate and intense that it sometimes lasts long into the night and even continues early in the morning when we wake up. He can be both rough and dominating but he is also gentle and loving. And the way he groans or roars my name when he succumbs to the immense pleasure I give him...La, it makes my body warm up just thinking about it.”

Katara paused to see the dark expression on the noblewoman’s usually blank face and she raised an eyebrow almost mockingly. She no longer felt any sympathy for the woman.

“Can you say that was the case when you were together?” the waterbender asked.

Mai felt her body shake with her anger and she balled her hands into fists since they both knew the answer. If Katara asked such a question, Zuko must have told her about their sexual exploits. She hated the thought of Zuko being with the water wench in such a way. She had dreamed of him being that way with her, but when he wasn’t, she had assumed it was just his way. But now she was being told he was a passionate and incredible lover when he was with the simple waterbender. She wanted that for herself and she would get it one way or the other!

“We will see who is right,” Mai hissed. With a raised chin, she turned around and walked away.

Katara angrily watched her go. The audacity of these people! In her tribe, if a man or woman dared to get involved with a married person, they were shamed and made an outcast as much as the adulterer was. But in the Fire Nation, adultery was almost expected, at least in the noble class. But she was confident that Zuko would never disrespect or hurt her by taking concubines or having affairs with other women. He had promised her and he had too much honor to break his promise.

But more importantly, he loved her. And despite what Mai said, Katara would do anything to keep them as happy as they were now. She relaxed at her thoughts and let out a long sigh. She could not wait for Zuko to return so they could sneak into their room to indulge in each other and bask in the love they had for one another.

Mood uplifted, Katara smiled as she bent down to pluck one of the flowers from the same bush. She brought the flower to her nose and inhaled softly only to stiffen when she heard a low masculine voice whisper in her ear.

“Hello, gorgeous.”
Recurring Misfortunes

Chapter Notes

Warning: There is mention of violence in this chapter.

Quick footsteps echoed through the palace corridor as the Fire Lord went in search of his wife. A servant had led him to the sitting room where the women had been gathered, only to be told that Katara had gone to the garden. He had briefly noticed Mai’s mother, but he paid her no heed nor spared a thought to Mai as he left the room without another word and strode quickly toward the gardens. All he could think about was finding Katara. He had inquired about Jet’s whereabouts as soon as he arrived at the palace, but no one had seen him. He could not shake off the feeling that Jet might be trying to get close to Katara when Zuko was not there. If Jet tried anything, he would make the scoundrel regret it.

The raven-haired lord finally stepped outside into the garden and quickly began to search the place for his waterbender. Just when he was about to give up and go search another of the palace gardens, he spotted her standing alone beside a stone bench. He let out a relieved breath to see she was all right before he shook his head at his anxiety. It seemed being married had made him more paranoid when it came to her.

With a smirk, Zuko quietly hid behind some trees and bushes in order to observe her without her being aware of his perusal. In the shadows, his eyes roamed her entire body and caressed every curve before he glanced back to her lovely face. Ah, his enticing water nymph, how she continued to bewitch him.

He wondered what she was thinking since she seemed pensive and tense, making him frown slightly. But then she smiled as she bent down to pick up a flower and inhaled its scent. He was about to take a step forward only to stiffen at the same time she did when Jet stepped up behind her and whispered in her ear.

The firebender balled his hands in anger, but paused when he saw Katara quickly move away from Jet and turn around to glare at him.

“You can’t act so familiar with me, Jet,” Zuko heard her admonished him curtly.

“Why not?” Jet asked her unrepentantly. “We’ve known each other for years. We’re friends.”
“That’s it,” Katara said firmly. “We’re just friends. So you should treat me as such.”

Zuko smirked as he again made to step out of the shadows only to freeze at what Jet said next.

“What if I want to be more than just friends?” he asked her huskily.

The young Fire Lord growled as he prepared himself to defend Katara, but he decided to wait and see how Katara handled the situation before he made a scene with his overprotectiveness and possessiveness. He knew Katara could defend herself against the freedom fighter. Maybe she could finally put Jet in his place. Zuko watched as his waterbender crossed her arms over her chest and narrowed her blue eyes.

“If you keep acting like that, then we won’t even be friends,” she told him firmly.

“It doesn’t need to come to that,” Jet replied with a frown.

“If you keep propositioning me, then it will,” Katara responded with a raised eyebrow before she added, “Especially after what you tried to do in Ba Sing Se last fall.”

Jet winced at the reminder before he frowned again.

“You have no idea how sorry I am for acting like that,” he told her sincerely, “I just wanted you to want me. But I never would have hurt you. I swear!”

Zuko let out a mental snort.

“Well, I made sure of that,” the waterbender said bluntly.

She smirked when Jet winced and subtly covered his groin at the memory.

“Luckily Zuko arrived to stop you before I did any more damage,” Katara added.
Jet pressed his lips tightly together at the reminder and his dark brown eyes flashed.

“If the firebender hadn’t intervened, you would’ve been mine by now,” he growled out.

Hiding behind the cover of the trees, Zuko gritted his teeth at his words.

“That’s not likely,” Katara spoke up with a scoff before she asked, “Why do you keep bothering me? I saw the group of women that were following you during the party. Why don’t you bother one of them?”

“I don’t want them,” Jet replied frankly before he huskily added, “I want you.”

“But why?” Katara exasperatedly asked.

“How could I not want you?” he asked, “You’re smart and gentle and kind…”

A smile appeared on the young man’s face as he began to slowly circle the waterbender. Katara stiffened since she could feel his intense stare on her body.

Silently, Zuko watched Jet with wary eyes.

“And most of all you’re beautiful,” Jet continued throatily, “Why wouldn’t I want a woman like you?”

Katara let out a soft snort. Did he really think that she would fall into his arms and betray Zuko because of some flattery?

“You should accept that you will never have me,” she spoke up without acknowledging his words, “Not only am I not interested in you, but I’m married.”

“So?” Jet responded with a shrug before he smirked. “You could learn to love me once you give me a chance.”

Zuko clenched his jaw in anger at Jet’s audacity.

How dare he proposition my wife to have an affair with him?! Katara is mine! he mentally growled, but he paused when Katara stumped her foot in irritation.

“Are you even listening to me?!” she hissed. “I said I’m a married woman!”

“Is that supposed to stop me from wanting you?” Jet asked mockingly. “Besides, didn’t you hear Mai?”

Katara’s eyes widened before she narrowed them.

“You were listening?” she asked him angrily.

“Yeah,” the rogue confessed with a nonchalant shrug. “And I think she was right in what she said.”

Zuko wondered what Mai had told Katara as he saw his wife stiffen.

“If the firebender can take concubines, why can’t you have your own lovers?” Jet asked logically.

The Fire Lord’s eyes widened. What was going on?

“Zuko will never do that and I will never dishonor my marriage vows by taking lovers,” she told him definitely before she added icily, “especially you.”

Zuko felt himself relax and he smiled in approval at the fact that Katara knew him so well before he smirked triumphantly at her rejection of the annoying freedom fighter. Zuko tensed and growled lowly when the bastard took a step closer to Katara.
“You shouldn’t say that until you try it,” Jet told her smoothly, cajolingly, “Maybe you’d like being with me so much you’d never return to the firebender’s bed.”

“That won’t happen,” the blue-eyed woman replied bluntly before she turned to walk away, an obvious sign of dismissal.

She gasped angrily when she felt him grab her arm and pull her back to his chest.

“We should test that theory right now,” he whispered huskily in her ear.

Enraged, Zuko moved to throw the bastard away from his wife, but Katara beat him to it as she wrenched her herself away and slapped Jet across his face. Jet’s head snapped to the side before he slowly turned back to frown at her.

“Don’t touch me,” she gritted out angrily. “Stop harassing me, Jet. I will never be with you and I will never be unfaithful to Zuko.”

Jet touched his stinging cheek as his frown deepened.

“But why not?” he insisted.

“I’m no whore that eagerly jumps into any man’s bed,” she firmly stated, “But more importantly I love Zuko and he’s the only man I’ll ever want. He satisfies me greatly in everything. No man can compare to him.”

A smug smirk curled Zuko’s lips at his waterbender’s words. He was glad he had not intervened. Watching Jet being repeatedly rejected was more entertaining.

Jet clenched his jaw and balled his hands into fists. If that stupid, scarred firebender had not intervened between them in Ba Sing Se, Katara would have been his. She would be saying the same things as she was now, but it would be him she would be talking about and not the Fire Lord. He got so pissed off when he heard Katara tell Mai how much she and Zuko enjoyed each other in bed. The thought of the scarred Fire Lord touching and loving Katara made his blood boil. And the thought that Katara actually enjoyed it only increased his anger.
After all these years he could not stop thinking about and longing for her. Sure he had bedded many women during those years. He had even had a few trysts with a few noblewomen during the party the previous day. One of those noblewomen had been Lady Mai, who had enticed him into one of the empty guest rooms after asking him if he wanted to help her separate the royal couple. After discussing ways they could achieve what they both wanted, they had tumbled onto the bed. He had realized that she was desperate for sex and he indulged her twice, though he quickly found out why the firebender had gotten tired of her. He had wondered if after a few lessons, he could help Mai become a better bed partner. A few hours later, he was again crying his release with a different woman. But Katara was the only one he wanted as a lifelong companion, and if she wanted it, even a wife. Could she not see how much she meant to him? Why was she so loyal to such a cold bastard like the Fire Lord?

“You say that now,” he finally replied, “But you’ll change your mind once you see that your dear husband is like any other man.”

“I’m tired of listening to you, Jet,” Katara interrupted him coldly. “Leave me alone.”

She moved to turn away, but Jet’s arms shot out and he pulled her close to him just as he bent down to kiss her. With an indignant gasp, Katara turned her head sideways and raised an ice-covered hand to strike his face at the same time she felt him being pulled away from her. Confused, she looked back only to gasp again when she saw Zuko standing before her as he glared down at Jet, who was lying on the ground.

“Zuko,” she called his name in surprise.

“If you try to touch my wife again, I’ll kill you,” Zuko vowed with a growl.

Jet scoffed loudly as he picked himself off the ground and dusted his clothes as he glared at the Fire Lord standing protectively in front of the blue-eyed woman.

“I ain’t afraid of you,” he spat.

“You should be,” Zuko replied in a deceptively calm tone.

Katara shivered at the darkness of his threat. She hoped he was not angry with her at catching her and Jet in such a situation when it wasn’t her fault. If Zuko had not arrived, she could have put Jet in his place without her husband finding out. However, now that he was here, Zuko would do anything to protect her, especially since he greatly disliked the freedom fighter. Katara sighed as the ice around her hand melted and she threw the liquid into the bushes.

“Leave Katara alone or else,” the golden-eyed male warned.

“What? Are you afraid that she’ll finally decide to be with a real man?” Jet asked with a smirk.

Eyes flashing in indignation, Katara opened her mouth to retort, but Zuko beat her to it as he let out a mocking laugh. Jet glared angrily at him.

“Katara is an honorable woman,” Zuko told him firmly. “She will never betray me, especially for the likes of you.”

“We’ll see, firebender,” Jet responded confidently before he looked at Katara with a rakish smirk. “Keep Mai’s words in mind. Her prediction will come true, and once it does, I’ll be waiting for you to invite me into your bed and be your lover.”

With a growl, Zuko lashed out with a fire whip, but Jet quickly jumped out of the way with a curse. He glared at the enraged firebender before he again turned to smirk lustfully at the silently fuming brunette.

“I’ll see you soon, gorgeous,” he said smoothly before he turned around and walked away.

Katara quickly grabbed Zuko’s arm when he took a step forward with an angry growl. Zuko glared flaming daggers at Jet’s back as they watched him leave.

“I wish I could break his neck,” the firebender rumbled before he turned around to look down at his wife. The anger in his eyes burning down to a low simmer, he more softly asked, “Are you okay?”

“I’m fine,” she responded reassuringly before she quickly added, “You do know that what you saw was nothing, right? Even if you hadn’t arrived, I wouldn’t have let him kiss me. I—”

“I know,” he interrupted as he gently grabbed her upper arms to stop her rambling, “I saw and heard everything.”
“What?” Katara asked in confusion before she continued with a raised eyebrow, “You were hiding behind a tree, weren’t you?”

“Yes,” he replied bluntly.

She frowned before she let out a sigh at his unrepentant expression.

“It doesn’t matter. I will never betray you for Jet or anyone else,” she reminded him.

“I know,” he repeated with a smile, “I trust you.”

Then a frown appeared on his brow and he tightened his hold of her arms.

“What did Jet mean about keeping Mai’s words in mind?” he asked.

“Nothing,” she replied with a wave of her hand and a shrug.

“It can’t be ‘nothing’, Katara,” he insisted with narrowed eyes. “I want to know if Mai is bothering you again.”

The waterbender let out a long sigh. She knew that if it meant her safety, Zuko would keep asking until she finally relented. He was as stubborn as she was. Might as well get it over with. In a few sentences she told him what Mai had said when the older woman accosted her. When Zuko’s face hardened and his golden eyes blazed in anger as he let out a low growl, Katara wondered if it was such a good idea to tell him after all. Zuko let her go in order to run a hand over his pulled-back hair.

“She’s trying to ruin our marriage by making you doubt me,” he gritted out before he more softly asked, “But you trust me, right?”

“I, well…” Katara began hesitantly, “I admit there were times when I wondered since it is part of your culture…’
When he stiffened and narrowed his eyes at her as his jaw clenched, Katara wrapped her arms around him.

“But just like I told Mai and Jet, I trust you and I know you will never hurt me by having concubines or mistresses, especially Mai,” she continued soothingly.

Relaxing, Zuko returned her embrace as he looked intently down into her eyes.

“It may be part of my culture, but it doesn’t mean I agree with it,” he told her firmly, “I witnessed how it had hurt Mother to know Ozai slept with Azulon’s concubines. I don’t want you to go through the same thing and have you end up hating me.”

He paused to smirk down at her, wrapping her tightly in his arms, as he huskily added, “Besides, I already told you many times that you’re the only woman I desire.”

“I believe you,” Katara replied with a happy smile before she raised herself on her toes to kiss him.

With a groan, Zuko pressed her closer to his hard frame. He tilted her head back so he could kiss her deeply and roughly. She moaned into his mouth as her fingers fastened themselves into his clothes. When the need for air became great, they pulled away and panted against each other.

“I won’t feel at ease until we’ve left Omashu and Jet behind,” he said as he reached up a hand to caress her slightly swollen lips with his thumb.

“It’s your turn to believe me when I say that you’re the only one I want, Zuko,” she spoke up with a frown.

“I do trust you,” he replied sincerely before he growled out, “It’s just that I hate to see other men lusting after my wife.”

“It’s you whom I go to bed with every night,” she reminded him as she pressed herself closer to him, caressing him with her body, soothing him with her words.

“And that’s how it’ll be forever,” he stated firmly.
Then he bent down to bestow an astounding kiss on her lips that left her breathless. When he slipped his tongue inside her mouth, Katara moaned and fell against him. Smirking inwardly, Zuko wound his arms around her and brought her closer to his chest. She moaned softly when he curled his tongue around hers and smiled when Zuko let out a groan when she sucked on his wet tongue.

Too absorbed in each other to notice anything else, Zuko and Katara exchanged kisses of equally greedy and passionate violence until the flare of desire was stoked to a scorching fire. Pulling away slightly to catch their breaths, Zuko forged a blazing path of hungry, wet kisses down the soft skin of her exposed throat. Katara’s head fell back and she moaned loudly as his lips touched her sensitive flesh, her hands clutching his strong shoulders.

Panting, mind hazy with lust, Zuko spread his feet to enclose his wife’s curvy body more closely within his ardent embrace. Lifting his head to once again devour her mouth, Zuko bent his knees and pulled her tightly against him. Katara gasped softly into his mouth when she felt Zuko’s hardness against her and they groaned when she mindlessly rubbed herself against his thick erection.

The sound of someone softly clearing their throat interrupted them through their haze and they quickly pulled away to look at the intruder with wide, startled eyes. Jiao and one of King Bumi’s servants were respectfully standing a few feet away. Jiao seemed unperturbed by the scene, but the younger servant girl’s green eyes were wide with surprise.

Zuko cleared his throat as he moved behind his wife in order to hide the visible bulge in his trousers and Katara smiled sheepishly as she smoothed down her dress. How could they have forgotten they were in a place where anyone could have a chance of seeing them?

“King Bumi sent us to tell you everybody is waiting for you to join them for dinner, my lord, my lady,” Jiao formally informed them with a bow even as her lips twitched into a small smile.

“Ah, yes, we’ll be there soon, Jiao. Thank you,” Katara spoke up quickly.

Jiao bowed and turned around. The other girl, still astounded at the passionate display, quickly did the same before she followed after her.

Zuko pinched the bridge of his nose. What happened to his iron control? Apparently it flew out the window when he married Katara, just as his paranoia increased.
“Well, at least we were just kissing,” Katara’s amused words made him open his eyes to look at her.

“If we’re not careful, the next time we’ll be caught doing more than just kissing,” he retorted with a smirk.

“Zuko!” she exclaimed with a blush.

“Not that I’ll let anyone see you in such a ravishing state,” he growled as he again pulled her to him. When he tried to kiss her again, she placed her hand on his lips with a laugh.

“We have to go to dinner, remember?” she chuckled.

“Fine,” he consented with a huff before he grinned down at her. “We’ll continue this later.”

“I will be eagerly waiting,” she purred.

They waited until Zuko was presentable to appear in front of everybody without giving them a great shock before they made their way back to the palace. As they walked toward the dining room, Katara remembered that Zuko had left that morning to inspect the rebels’ damage.

“Did you find anything at the village?” she asked hopefully.

Zuko’s good mood soon shifted into a grim one as he shook his head.

“We didn’t find anything,” he informed her, his tone serious. “The rebels left evidence to let us know that it was them alright, but they didn’t leave enough evidence to show us why they attacked or where they went.”

“Do you think they are still around?” she asked. “Or maybe they left and are causing more destruction somewhere else.”

“I don’t know,” he responded truthfully before he growled out in frustration, “I don’t know what they’re up to.”
Katara leaned closer to him.

“They’ll be caught one of these days,” she reassured him, “They can’t hide forever.”

Zuko did not respond, but he hoped that it could be as she said. But he did not want to tell her that he had a bad feeling ever since he learned of the attacks. He just had to make sure Katara never got near Jianguo or the rebels again. If his overprotectiveness brought down her wrath on him, then so be it. He preferred to have her angry at him and safe than to have her taken away from him.

He brought her closer to his side.

---

Frowning, the young Fire Lord left Bumi’s study after having another meeting about the attacks. Zuko silently walked down the green corridor toward their guest room in order to collect Katara before the second party commenced. He did not feel like attending, but he had promised to follow Bumi’s instructions since this was his home. There had been no sign of the rebels after the last attack. They planned to head out again the next day to see if they could find any clues they may have missed, but Zuko had a feeling they were just wasting their time while Jianguo planned something. But what?

He was brought out of his thoughts when he noticed that someone had stepped in front of him to block his path. Stopping, he looked up with a glare only to frown when he saw that it was Mai. She was dressed in another elegant but dark gown and she was smiling softly at him. He remembered when she attacked Katara back in the Fire Nation Palace and what Mai said to her the previous day and he narrowed his eyes at her.

“I am positive I told you I didn’t want to see you again when I banished you from the palace,” he reminded her impassively.

“Are you still mad at me for what I did?” she asked him with a frown.

“How can I not be?” he asked her incredulously. “You tried to hurt the woman I love.”

The dark-haired woman stiffened before she clenched her thin hands. It angered her that Zuko was being so opened when it came to declaring his feelings for Katara.
“Do you still believe you love the waterbender?” she asked.

“I don’t,” he replied smoothly.

He raised a dark eyebrow when she looked at him hopefully.

“I know I love Katara,” he continued firmly.

Mai narrowed her dark eyes as she straightened herself out.

“Can’t you see that woman has changed you?” she hissed out angrily. “You’ve turned into a lovesick fool.”

“Katara loves me for who I really am,” he responded without taking offense to her words. “She understands me. If I have changed, I’d like to think I changed for the better. That’s why I love her.”

“You say that now,” she told him as her voice changed to its usual dull tone, “But in a few years, you’ll think otherwise.”

“I don’t like it when other people decide what my future or destiny will hold,” he growled out before he darkly warned her, “Stop telling my wife lies to make her doubt my loyalty. I will never cast her aside for another woman, especially for you. And unlike you or any other, Katara pleases me greatly. You can’t compare to her in any way, both in and outside of bed.”

Mai stepped back as if he had physically struck her since his words were further proof of what Katara had told her. Hurt flashed in her eyes, but Zuko did not care. He had tried to be understanding to her because of their past and her feelings for him, but he was tired of being nice since she was insistent in making trouble for Katara and him. Without another word, he stepped around her. What she said next made him pause.

“You may be honorable, but what about her?” she hissed.

Zuko turned around to glare at her.
“What do you mean by that?” he angrily asked her.

“Men aren’t the only ones who desire other lovers,” she spoke up as she casually inspected her nails.

“Are you accusing Katara of betraying me with another man?” he ground out.

“And why couldn’t she?” the noblewoman asked nonchalantly, “Especially if a handsome man like Jet pursues her. She can easily welcome any lover into her bed when you’re not around.”

She paused when Zuko angrily strode toward her until he stood towering over her. She tensed at the livid expression on his face and a shard of fear raced down her spine.

“If I hear you say such things against my wife again, I’ll make you regret it,” he threatened her darkly, “Katara would never betray me, especially for someone like Jet. If you find the bastard so attractive, why don’t you go to him instead and leave Katara and me alone?”

He missed the expression that appeared on her face at his mentioning of Jet as he turned away from her. He took a step forward, but she clutched onto his arm and stopped him.

“I will never give you up!” she exclaimed. “I love you!”

Zuko roughly wrenched his arm free and turned his head to glare at her.

“I already told you I don’t feel the same for you,” he reminded her firmly before he gruffly added, “Never touch me again.”

Without another word, he walked away from her.

“This isn’t over!” he heard her scream, “You’ll see what kind of woman you’re married to really is and then you’ll come back to me!”
Zuko scoffed at her words as he continued on his way without sparing her another glance. He quickened his pace as he neared the guest wing where he shared a room with his waterbender. He needed Katara. He needed her to soothe his frayed nerves and cool down his temper before they made their appearance with the other guests.

Katara stood perfectly straight as Jiao fixed her formal dress around her form. It was a dark blue that nicely complimented the silver rose hairpin with the rubies and sapphires that Zuko had given her for her previous birthday. She had not used it in a while and she wanted to please Zuko by wearing it for the party. She hoped she was finished getting ready by the time Zuko came back for her. He had gone to another private meeting with Bumi a few hours ago. She frowned as she wondered what the rebels could be up to since they had not made another move. Maybe they had run away when they heard the Fire Lord had arrived. Where could they be?

Why do they have to keep causing problems for Zuko? she angrily thought as she clenched her hands.

She was brought out of her thoughts when she felt Jiao step back and declare that she was ready.

“You look wonderful as always, my lady,” the older woman complimented with a smile.

“Thanks, Jiao,” Katara replied as she returned the smile only to gasp in alarm when she saw her sway. “Jiao!”

Katara quickly wound an arm around the woman to keep her up before she helped the maid sit on the edge of the bed. Jiao groaned softly as she touched her head. Katara walked toward the nightstand and poured a cup of water before she handed it to her. Jiao thanked her quietly as she took the cup and carefully drank the water.

“Are you all right?” the Fire Lady asked worriedly.

“I’m fine, my lady,” Jiao responded after a moment as she shook her head, “I just felt a bit dizzy for a moment, but I’m fine now.”

“Are you sure?” Katara asked.

“Yes,” the servant replied with a smile as she stood up. When nothing happened, her smile widened.
“It was just a dizzy spell.”

“You’ve been working too hard. Maybe you should see the physician,” Katara told her, unconvinced.

“I will,” Jiao replied reassuringly.

Before Katara could say anything else, there was a knock at the door before it was opened. They looked up to see the Fire Lord enter. Zuko froze as he caught sight of Katara. She watched as his eyes darkened as he hungrily perused her and she shivered pleasantly. He smiled in pleasure when he noticed she was wearing the rose hairpin.

“You can leave us, Jiao,” Zuko ordered absentmindedly without taking his eyes away from his wife. She became more beautiful with every day that passed. And she was all his.

With a knowing smile, Jiao bowed before she quickly walked out of the room, closing the door softly behind her.

“We should hurry before the banquet starts,” Katara spoke up as she made her way to the door as well.

A gasp escaped her when her back was suddenly pressed against the wall with Zuko pressed to her front and his mouth devouring hers. She moaned as she immediately melted against him.

“You’re too beautiful for your own good, woman,” he growled against her lips. “I want you.”

“Now?” Katara asked incredulously even as she felt a flare of heat go straight to her core.

“Now,” Zuko groaned before he smashed his lips to hers.

He kissed her frantically, sucking on her bottom lip and rubbing his tongue against hers, as he roughly squeezed her breasts and caressed her curves. She moaned when she felt the evidence of his arousal pressing against her stomach. When he began to hastily pull the hem of her dress up, Katara pulled away from his demanding mouth and grasped his hands to stop him. Panting, Zuko opened his eyes to frown at her for the interruption.

“You seem angry,” she observed breathlessly. “What happened?”

He was silent for a moment before he let out a deep sigh.

“I was accosted by Mai on my way over here and the encounter angered me,” he confessed.

Katara felt a twinge of jealousy at the thought that he had been alone with his former girlfriend before she shoved the ugly feeling away.

“What did she say?” she asked.

“The same thing she told you except that I should expect for you to be unfaithful to me,” he growled out angrily.

He captured his waterbender’s lips again before she could ask him any more questions. He pressed closer to her, eliciting a moan from her when he smashed her sensitive breasts with his hard chest, and producing a groan from him when his erection pressed even more tightly against her belly.

“I want you now,” he repeated huskily, “I want to reinstate the feeling that we belong only to each other.”

They kissed hungrily once more before Katara again tried to stop him, albeit halfheartedly.

“Jiao will have to help me put on my clothes again and we’re going to be late,” she panted out, “Can’t we wait until tonight so we can have more time?”

“No. I want you now,” he repeated before he throatily added, “You don’t need to take off your clothes for me to make love to you.”

He demonstrated by hurriedly untysing the ties that held his trousers up, reaching inside, and pulling out his painfully aroused shaft. Katara licked her lips as she stared down at his magnificently erect flesh. Zuko felt his cock throb at the hungry look his waterbender was bestowing on his arousal. He stroked himself a few times and smirked when she moaned at the sight before he released himself in order to reach for her.

Lifting her against the wall, Zuko raised her dress around her hips and pulled aside her already drenched, silky underwear to reveal her wet sex, and in one smooth move, impaled her onto his thick cock. Katara threw her head back with a cry as she clutched his shoulders.

Groaning as her wet heat surrounded him, Zuko allowed her to adjust to his sudden invasion for a moment before he roughly began to thrust into her with wild abandon. He pulled the top edge of her dress down so it cupped her breasts and he watched them jiggle and bounce as he repeatedly slammed his hips onto hers. Growling, his hands firmly came around and under her dress as he bent her knees over the crook of his arms. He suddenly pulled out of her, but before she could protest, he lifted her higher against the wall so that her weeping pussy came in level with his face, and with one hand, pulled her undergarment far to the side.

“Ahhh!” she cried out in pleasure when he buried his face between her thighs and began to furiously lap, lick, and suck on her drenched folds. “Zuko, mm!”

She placed a hand on the wall and another behind his head to find purchase at the elevated height. She could not help but appreciate his great strength as he lifted her over his shoulders. She panted and moaned as he pushed his tongue in and out of her before sucking her clit.

“Zukooo! Oh!” she groaned loudly and her eyes rolled back at the immense pleasure. She felt fire spread through her veins, her mind out of control.

Zuko groaned lustfully as the sound of her pleasure and her delicious taste made his cock ache for her warm depths once again. He swiftly leaned away before he brought her down and again impaled her onto his hard shaft with her legs still thrown over the crooks of his arms.

“Yes!” he growled at the amazing sensation and his waterbender’s cry.

Pushing away from the wall, he braced his legs as he grabbed both her rear cheeks and squeezed roughly as his hips surged upward into her at the same time he impaled her on him. Gasping, Katara could do nothing but cling to his neck at the pleasure and amazing sensations that came from the new position. Then she buried one of her hands into his long hair at the back of his head, using it to urgently press his face into hers so she could kiss him deeply. He grunted into her mouth, sucking on her lips with a renewed fervor as he kneaded her firm cheeks before he pressed her body closer to his, crushing the softness of her breasts to his chest, as he began to grind his pelvis into her. The move stimulated her clit as well and it startled a gasp of delight out of her.

“Yesss,” she hissed before she huskily groaned, “Oh gods!”

The fast and fierce rhythm he set washed away their troubled minds, taking over and blinding them both of everything and everyone except for each other. Zuko grunted in pleasure as he thrust more deeply inside her, bouncing her in the air to slide repetitively down his long, thick shaft. He groaned as he felt her cream coating him and dripping down his sac and he bent down to gently suck her neck.

Katara’s eyes closed as sensations exploded and heat grew within her. She gasped when his warm mouth suddenly devoured her right nipple and she dug her nails on his clothed shoulders just as her inner walls fluttered around his hardness. Zuko groaned as his knees weakened a bit at the pleasure and he again pressed her back against the wall.

He removed his arms from under her knees and wrapped her legs around his hips. He steadied himself with one forearm against the wall while his other hand grasped her ass to press her to him. He firmly thrust his hips forward, fiercely plunging his thickly engorged cock hard up inside of her that is caused his heavy balls to slap against her backside.

“Yes, yes, Z-Zuko!” she chanted inarticulately.

“Shit,” Zuko cursed when she rocked herself wildly against him, driving him so deeply inside her warm, silky depths that he saw stars. “That’s so good.”

A few seconds later, her wet pussy gripped him like a vise as she came with a cry, pulsing against his length, seeking to milk him of his seed. With a loud gasp of her name, he convulsed into her as he met his end, pouring himself inside her clenching passage. He stood pressed against her for a long moment, breathing and panting heavily just as she moaned and trembled against him.

Once their bodies relaxed from their amazing release, Zuko untangled her legs from around his hips and pulled out of her with a small groan. She mewed softly next to his ear. Carefully he settled her back to her feet as he looked down at her. Her face was flushed and her eyes dazed and half-lidded as she stared at him.

He gently grabbed a strand of her soft hair—that had loosened from her bun due to their vigorous activity—and tucked it behind her ear before he kissed her softly on her lips. With one last caress to her breasts, he raised the edge of her dress to cover them before he pulled away to place his now flaccid member, still slick with their combined fluids, back into his trousers. As he did, he watched as Katara raised the hem of her dress with one hand while with the other she made a motion he knew was to waterbend his semen out of her, as he had seen her do a couple of times when they had made love outside their rooms. His hand shot forward to stop her. With a frown, she looked up at him questioningly.

“Don’t clean or wash yourself off,” he told her hoarsely.

“What?” Katara asked him incredulously, her blue eyes wide. His expression was firm and intense and it made her stomach quiver with renewed heat.

He tugged her hand until she fell forward onto his chest while his other arm held her tightly against him. He nuzzled her cheek and breathed in her scent. He could almost make out his own scent mixed in with hers.

“I want to know you are filled with my seed when near other men, especially Jet,” he breathed hotly against her ear. “Every time I see you during the party I want to know you feel it leaking out from inside your wonderful, little pussy and running down your thighs.”

Katara moaned softly since she could feel their combined juices doing just that before she held them back with her waterbending.

“I also want you to know that I am covered with your essence when I’m approached by other women, especially Mai,” he whispered as he licked the shell of her ear.

“O-okay,” she moaned loudly in agreement.

He pulled away and stared intensely at her before he bent down to kiss her softly upon the mouth.

“We don’t even need to call Jiao to help you redress,” Zuko commented with a smirk.

Katara laughed softly as she raised herself to plant a swift kiss to his lips. They fixed their appearances until none could be the wiser as to what they had done a few moments ago before they left the room and headed to the banquet hall.
King Bumi’s guests were sitting on cushions surrounding low tables as they ate dessert and watched a comedy being enacted by a traveling group of actors. They could all hear the old king cackling loudly at the table he shared with Iroh and other older nobility. Next to their table sat the Fire Nation royal couple with their friends the Avatar and Lady Bei Fong. Lady Ursa sat with Admiral Jee at a table next to theirs with another group of nobility.

Momentarily distracted from the show, Katara noticed that while Ursa was oblivious, Jee sat protectively beside her and glared at any man who stared at the princess too long for his liking. Was he jealous? The waterbender again returned her attention to the entertainment before she glanced at Zuko to make a comment about the funniest character. She paused, however, when she saw Zuko reach over to grab another of the pastries and placed it on the plate in front of him.

Some of the frosting got on his fingers and she watched in rapt attention as he licked it off, his tongue darting out over his thumb. When he licked his index finger he looked over at her and paused when he caught her staring. A smile slowly spread across his face as they continued to stare at each other. With a wicked smirk, he licked the rest of the frosting the same way he did when he was savoring her essence. Katara felt herself blush as she remembered what they did a few hours ago and what Zuko had told her to do, but she did not look away even as she felt his seed seeping out of her along with her own juices. It was thanks to her waterbending that the fluids were not sliding down her legs. As if he could read her thoughts, his gaze shifted to her lap, to her concealed sex, before he looked at her again with smoldering, golden eyes.

They looked away when they heard Aang clear his throat.

“Cut it out, you two,” he said with a chuckle.

Katara looked down at her plate as she felt her entire face heat up. She sometimes forgot the rest of the world existed when Zuko looked at her like that. Zuko only glanced at the monk with an impassive expression.

“I’m blind and I can almost see you guys eat each other with your eyes,” Toph remarked with a smirk. She was glad that these two stubborn idiots were happy after all the misunderstandings and troubles they went through.

Zuko shrugged in response while Katara muttered a sheepish apology.

“We’re not the only ones to notice,” Aang quietly commented as he discreetly pointed to the table where the Fire Nation ambassador sat with his family and other guests.

Zuko and Katara looked and were surprised to see Mai and Jet sitting together at the same table. Mai looked longingly at Zuko when she realized his attention had turned toward them before she glared hatefully at the waterbender. Katara frowned at her, but Zuko ignored Mai as he saw Jet raise his wine cup mockingly at him before he stared leeringly at Katara.

The Fire Lord narrowed his eyes before he smirked as he placed a possessive arm around Katara as he remembered what they had done hours ago. He glanced down at his waterbender to see her blushing as she looked up at him. His smirk widened since he knew she was thinking about it too. Could she still feel his seed inside her? He suppressed a groan at the thought. Once they retired to their room he would definitely indulge them both many more times and for a much longer period than what happened against the wall a few hours ago.

The crowd laughed again at the actors and the royal couple returned their attention to the play, pointedly ignoring the other two sitting at the other table.

“It’s harder for some people to move on,” the young Avatar remarked softly.

“Only those who are delusional think they have a second chance with something that was never theirs in the first place,” the small earthbender retorted.

They did not say anything else as they watched the comedy, and an hour later, the entire room erupted into applause when it finished and the actors bowed. As the servants began to clean up the tables, the guests stood up and mingled amongst themselves while others made their way to the dance floor as the musicians began to play their instruments. Others decided to head to the gardens for fresh air just as Zuko, Katara, Aang, and Toph did.

As the four of them made their way to find a spot that was not overcrowded with people, Toph stomped her foot and a small stump of rock appeared before Aang, who easily jumped over it before he tripped. He stomped his own foot to do the same, and when Toph made to jump out of the way, he swept his staff to the side to throw a small ball of air at her. Caught off guard, the earthbender lost her balance, but the airbender was quickly there to catch her. He laughed when she grumbled at him. Katara and Zuko stared at them in surprise.

“Okay, you win this time,” Toph consented grudgingly as she crossed her arms over her small chest once Aang placed her back on her feet.
“You know you like to lose as much as to win,” Aang replied teasingly.

“Whatever,” she muttered even as a soft pink hue covered her cheeks.

Zuko and Katara glanced at each other with wide eyes.

“You don’t suppose they’re…” Zuko began to whisper to Katara before he dodged a small rock aimed at his head.

“It’s not as perverted as what you’re thinking, Sparky,” Toph growled out. “I see being married has made both of you big perverts.”

“We’re taking it slow,” Aang piped in with a grin.

“Aang!” the earthbender hissed as she punched his arm.

Aang laughed even as he rubbed his aching arm.

“What is it, Toph?” Katara spoke up with a smirk. “Don’t like it when you’re the one who’s being teased about such things?”

“Shut it, Sugar Queen,” the smaller woman said with a sniff.

The others laughed.

“Well, it makes me glad to know you two are happy with each other,” the waterbender commented sincerely as she smiled at them both.

“Me too,” Zuko agreed. He was also glad to know that he would never again have to worry that Aang might try to take Katara away from him.
Toph retorted to their teasing by making inquiries of their honeymoon, which caused both Zuko and Katara to snap at her to stop. Aang could only laugh at their antics before he changed the subject to something else.

None of them noticed the two individuals that watched them from the cover of some trees. Jet and Mai watched the group with narrowed eyes. The freedom fighter could not understand why such a kind woman as Katara could allow the harsh firebender to touch her. Jet would grit his teeth every time the Fire Lord caressed her or wound his arm around her lovely body.

As for Mai, the dark-eyed noblewoman could see that Zuko was clearly infatuated with his new wife. His golden eyes devoured the waterbender’s every smile, her every laugh, her every expression and movement, and every inquisitive glance. He answered Katara whenever she talked to him, asked her opinions whenever he wanted them, listened to her with captivated interest as he intertwined his long, lean fingers with her slender ones, laid an arm around her shoulders to bring her to close against his side, or pressed a quick kiss to her lips when he thought no one was looking. Neither of them seemed the least bit ashamed by their subtle yet fervent displays of affection.

If the waterbender had not intervened between them, would Zuko have acted the same way with her? Mai frowned. They were together for almost four years, but not even once did he touch or look at her the way he did the Water Tribe woman. If Mai even dared to touch him in public, he would give her a small glare or a sharp reprimand until she moved away. What did the waterbender do to make him allow her to act so familiar with him in public? Mai’s glare intensified when Katara giggled at something Zuko whispered in her ear before she whispered something back that made him chuckle.

During the party two days ago, Mai had approached Jet and asked him if he wanted to help her separate Zuko and the waterbender as she led him to an empty room. He agreed immediately and they decided that the best way to achieve what they wanted was by making the couple doubt the other’s fidelity by pointing out their cultural differences. Content with their plan, they celebrated by indulging in each other’s bodies. Ever since Zuko dumped her and sent her away, Mai had had a few lovers, but they either decided to stop their trysts or she turned them away because they could not satisfy her. She had to admit Jet was a good and attentive lover that knew how to bring a woman to pleasure, but it was Zuko she wanted, even though he never bothered to pleasure her the few times they were together. She supposed it was mostly her fault for not inspiring him to want to.

But she knew Zuko could be an exceptional lover from the rumors she had heard from the servants and the other guests alike. She heard that Zuko and Katara would often go to their room at any time of the day. One of the maidservants had even said that she had accidently caught the Fire Lord and his wife in a passionate embrace in one of the gardens. Mai had also heard that all through the night the palace residents could hear the muffled pleasured moans and screams of the waterbender and the muted groans and growls of the young Fire Lord. It seemed the couple had not realized that their guest room was not as soundproof as their room in the Fire Nation Palace. Mai clenched her teeth as she remembered Katara’s words the last time she confronted her. Why was Zuko so attentive in bringing the waterbender so much pleasure? Why did he bed her so often?
Glancing to her side, Mai clenched her hands when she noticed that Jet was staring longingly at the blue-eyed woman. What did men find so fascinating about the Water Tribe bitch?! She glanced back at the group of friends. She was angry yet not surprised when the royal couple excused themselves to retire early to their room. Katara had a smile on her face and Zuko a hungry gleam in his eyes Mai had never seen before as he quickly led them back inside the palace.

Smoothing her features into a pleasant one, Mai placed her hand on Jet’s arm and smiled softly when he turned to look at her.

“Why don’t we go to that empty room again?” she asked quietly.

“Can’t get enough, can you?” he asked with a smug smirk.

“I’ll wait for you in a few minutes,” she said instead as she turned around and walked away from the garden.

She made sure that nobody saw her as she entered the room and closed the door to wait for Jet. It would not do to have Zuko find out about her trysts with the freedom fighter. Jet was also careful since he did not want Katara to find out about Mai or any of the other women he was rutting with.

Mai had just removed her hidden weapons and let down her black hair when there were two soft raps at the door before Jet walked in and softly closed the door. Jet slowly removed his hook swords and armor and placed them aside before he walked toward her.

Without a word, they collided against each other and they began to quickly divest the other of their clothes as their mouths crashed together. Jet fell on top of her on the bed and she let out a moan as he roughly grabbed her small breasts. As he spread her legs apart to settle between them she imagined it was Zuko before the image was destroyed when she pictured him calling out the waterbender’s name. She narrowed her eyes before she harshly grabbed Jet’s coarse hair to pull his head away from her neck so she could smash her mouth to his.

It did not matter. Once Zuko got tired of the waterbender, Mai would be there to take him back even if it meant she had to be his concubine or mistress. She would make Zuko crave her like he never craved anyone else. She would make Katara suffer for daring to take him away.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

A loud pounding sound made Zuko snap his eyes open as he instinctively reached for his swords and crouched protectively over his sleeping wife. Once he realized that they were alone in their room and the frantic knocking was coming from the door, he frowned irritably as he noticed that it was a few hours before dawn. What was with the racket? Swinging his legs over the bed, he put on his robe to hide his nakedness before he grabbed one of his broadswords.

“What is it?” Katara’s sleepy yet alarmed voice reached his ears.

He looked up to see her sitting up on the bed, clutching the bed sheet up to her chest to cover her nude form as she looked at him in confusion and apprehension. Her long hair, disarrayed from their vigorous activities during the night, tumbled around her naked shoulders. He suppressed the sudden flare of arousal that surged through him at the sight of her before he returned his attention to the door.

“I don’t know,” he finally said as he quickly walked toward the door.

Still frowning, Katara watched her husband approach the door as she summoned a ribbon of water from the basin and wrapped it around her arm, ready to protect her firebender.

“Who is it?” Zuko asked suspiciously.

“It is Shen, my lord,” his oldest bodyguard called out anxiously from the other side. “I’m sorry to interrupt your sleep, but something urgent has come up.”

Alarmed now, Zuko quickly opened the door only enough so his guard could see him but would not see Katara’s state of undress. His frown deepened when he saw the older man’s grim expression.

“What’s wrong, Shen?” he asked.

“We just received news that another village is being attacked,” the guard informed him, pausing when he heard the Fire Lady’s loud gasp and his lord curse, “A few villagers, many of them injured, have arrived at the palace.”

Zuko cursed again. Worried, Katara quickly placed the water back in its place as she rose from the bed.
“Avatar Aang and Lady Bei Fong already left a few minutes ago to stop the attack. King Bumi is sending soldiers and is wondering what you would like to do,” Shen continued.

“Tell him my soldiers and I will join them immediately,” Zuko growled out. “Alert the men and tell them we will head out in a few minutes.”

“Yes, my lord,” Shen replied as he gave a bow before he raced down the hall in order to carry out the orders.

Slamming the door close, Zuko discarded his robe and swiftly began to dress. He paused briefly when he saw that Katara had already risen from the bed and was doing the same.

“What do you think you’re doing?” he demanded.

“I’m getting ready to go with you,” she responded with a look that said he must be dense for asking that.

“Oh no, you’re not,” he disagreed as he began searching for his armor. “You’re staying here.”

“Excuse me?!” Katara exclaimed angrily as she spread her legs and placed her hands akimbo in the universal sign of female indignation. “The hell I am! I’m going and that’s that.”

With a frown, Zuko placed his chest armor aside and walked up to her. Even as he loomed over her, she did not back down as she craned her head back to glare at him with flashing, sapphire eyes.

“Katara,” he said gruffly at her stubbornness, “listen to me and please wait here.”

“You can’t make me, Zuko,” she replied furiously. “Don’t treat me like a weak woman and have me hiding behind locked doors while you go out and fight.”

“I’m not,” he assured her with a frown.

He could not help but remember the letter that Jianguo sent Advisor Kang where he vowed that he would make the waterbender his sex slave if he ever caught her. Zuko felt his chest tightened in anxiety just as he felt his body stiffen in anger. He could not let Katara go near the bastard.

“I know you’re not weak,” he continued when she continued glaring at him, “I just want to keep you safe. Can you begrudge me that?”

“Well, no…” the waterbender began as she frowned, but she still held her ground, “I want to help.”

“You will be of more help to the injured,” he told her reassuringly, appealing to her healing nature.

Katara frowned deeply as she looked at him. She knew what he was trying to do and a part of her wanted to rebel and tell him that he could not stop her. But the healer inside of her told her that the injured needed her more than she needed to prove herself. She was no fourteen year old girl anymore; she had more important duties than to argue with her husband over his overprotectiveness.

“Fine,” she finally relented with obvious reluctance, “I’ll stay.”

The expression of immense relief that settled on his features made warmth spread through her chest despite herself.

“Let me help you with your armor,” she told him.

At his nod, she walked toward the chest armor he had put down earlier before she walked back to him. They were both silent as she helped him dress as their concern again went back to the attack. They hoped that the soldiers arrived in time to rescue the villagers. They fervently hoped that this time they would be able to capture the rebels. Zuko allowed her to place his dark cloak around his shoulders to ease her worry, even though the chilly morning air did not really affect him. As Zuko tied his broadswords’ sheath to his hip, Katara quickly finished getting dressed. She placed on one of her simpler light blue dresses and gathered her hair into a braid so she could be more comfortable when she healed the wounded. Once they were both ready, they left the room and swiftly strode down the corridor where servants were frantically running around. As the royal couple finally arrived at the courtyard, they saw that Zuko’s men and Bumi’s soldiers were already mounting their steeds.

Zuko took a step forward, but paused when he felt Katara grab his arm. He turned around to ask her what was wrong only to have his words get stuck in his throat. Her smooth brow was marred with a concerned frown and her blue eyes were wide in anxiety.
“Please be careful, Zuko,” she whispered.

Placing a hand over hers, the Fire Lord gave it a small squeeze as his eyes softened.

“I will,” he assured her before he bent down to give her a quick kiss on the lips.

When he straightened, Katara saw that he had placed his emotionless mask back in place. With another squeeze of her hand, he let her go. Placing his helmet on, he quickly made his way to his komodo rhino waiting next to Bumi’s general. Katara watched as Zuko made a signal and then they were all riding out of the protective doors.

Once her husband was out of sight, the waterbender turned away and rushed toward the infirmary. As she entered the large room, she saw that the place was in chaos as women hurried to attend the injured that were moaning and crying on the narrow cots.

“Katara!”

The waterbender turned at the sound of her name to see Ursa and Jiao rushing toward her. Although her outer appearance was calm and collected, Katara could see that her mother-in-law was distressed.

“How many injured are there?” Katara asked sharply as she spotted an apron and quickly tied it around herself.

“About thirty so far,” Ursa responded as she tucked a strand of her hair that had escaped her bun behind her ear.

“And more keep arriving,” Jiao added, “There aren’t enough cots for them all.”

Frowning, Katara began to walk down the aisle as she looked at the injured. She paused and gasped when she saw a little girl whose entire right arm was burned. The white blankets peeled away her bloody and charred skin whenever she writhed in pain. The waterbender immediately rushed to her side and began to murmur softly as the child continued to cry.

“Fire Lady Katara, what are doing here?!” the main physician asked as he spotted her, “This is no place for a lady. You should return to your room."

Katara looked up to glare at him.

“I am first and foremost a healer before I am Fire Lady,” she told him firmly. “I will not ignore those who are suffering and need my help.”

Ignoring his protests, she uncorked her waterskin and pulled out the water before she wrapped both her hands in liquid gloves. She ignored the physician’s surprised gasp when the water started to glow.

“There, there,” she cooed soothingly to the little girl who began crying even harder when she saw her move toward her, “Everything is going to be all right.”

Slowly, so as to not frighten the child more than she already had, Katara placed her healing hands on her arm. A few minutes later, the girl slowed her crying when the pain began to lessen before she stopped completely when she could feel no pain at all. The physician could only gape when he saw that the Fire Lady had completely healed the burn before he was snapped out of his thoughts when her sharp, blue eyes snapped to his again.

“I need more water, lots of it, so I can heal the rest,” she told him.

“O-of course,” he stuttered.

“And I want the more severely injured to be placed on the cots and be attended first,” she ordered, “You and your assistants can see to those who have minor wounds.”

“A-as you wish!” he replied quickly before he began giving out orders to his assistants and the guards that were bringing in the injured to do what the Fire Lady had said. None of them dared to refute her even though she was not their queen.

A few minutes later, Katara was seeing to the more severely wounded. They were either badly burned, had broken bones, or both. Some of them suffered from bruises and sword cuts. Jiao rushed back and forth to bring her bowls of clean water after emptying the dirty ones while Lady Ursa brewed calming tea to help the patients rest or fall unconscious as they waited to be healed. Admiral Jee helped move the patients onto the cots or grimly carried away those who died. As she encountered the tenth child with a broken arm and leg, Katara again cursed Jianguo and the rebels. She hoped Zuko and the other men captured them so they could pay for everything they had done.

A sense of dread rose in her chest and she took a shaky breath as she glanced down at the golden ring on her finger and rubbed it. She hoped Zuko was all right.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was an hour later when Zuko and the soldiers arrived at the village. They were greeted by burning huts and screaming people. Black smoke rose to the now dawning sky as heat and sparks flew in every direction. A few of the rebels were currently fighting Aang and Toph while others continue to attack the village and its people. With a roared command, Zuko charged forward with his dual swords flaming at his sides and was immediately followed by the soldiers. Hearing the thundering sound of pounding hooves and angry shouts, the rebels stopped what they were doing before they turned their attacks on the upcoming army.

Swinging his sword, Zuko severed one of the attacker’s head cleanly off his body before he stabbed his other sword through another’s chest as his komodo rhino charged through the village. Jumping down from his mount, the Fire Lord began to cut down every opponent that raced his way. He scanned his surrounding and was relieved to see Toph and Aang fighting back to back. With a growl, Zuko spun around with a flaming sword to cut down the rebel that had approached from behind. Dust and smoke was making it hard to see, but Zuko continued on his way as he searched for Jianguo. Where was the bastard?

A feminine wail coming from around the corner of a house caught his attention and he sprinted toward the sound to see a young woman fighting a man who had her legs spread as he tried to push his erect member into her while holding her clawing hands down. Zuko moved forward and stabbed the man in the back before he grabbed the surprised rebel by the hair and pulled him off the woman. Once he was sure the man was dead, Zuko turned back to the cowering woman who quickly covered her legs.

“I won’t hurt you,” he told her calmly. When she shrank away from him, he took off his helmet to show her he was the Fire Lord before he more softly said, “Make your way to Omashu Palace. My wife is a waterbender and she will heal your wounds. Have the other villagers follow you there.”

When he saw her give a shaky nod, Zuko replaced his helmet before he turned away and continued fighting, cutting down anyone who came at him in his anger. Why had Jianguo not made an appearance or attacked him?

It seemed like hours passed before the fighting stopped. The rebels had either fled or were dead. Zuko panted as he surveyed the scene before him. Once they were sure that they would not be attacked again, Bumi’s general ordered his men to take the injured to the palace while directing those who could still walk to follow. Zuko ordered his men to quickly extinguish the flames while he had others search the surrounding area to see if they could capture some of the runaway rebels. He was surprised to see that Jet and his freedom fighters were also there. He had not noticed them arrive.

There were dead villagers scattered on the ground as well as rebels, but Zuko could see that they were only a few from the many he knew were following Jianguo. Where were the rest? Where was Jianguo? What did he achieve by attacking this Earth Kingdom village?

As his soldiers finally controlled the fire, Zuko narrowed his eyes when he realized that the houses were not really as damaged as he had thought. He tensed when he felt someone approaching him and he spun around with a raised sword aimed at the person’s neck. His eyes widened when he saw it was Aang who was looking at him with equally wide eyes.

“Sorry,” he apologized as he brought down his bloody sword to his side.

“No, I shouldn’t have approached you from behind without saying anything,” Aang responded with a shrug before he sighed deeply as he took in their surroundings. “Something doesn’t seem right,” he commented quietly.

“I know,” the Fire Lord replied grimly.

It was some time later when Bumi’s general approached them.

“We didn’t find any interesting clues,” he began, “They didn’t take anything. They just started attacking for no reason.”

Zuko frowned as he remained silent. They looked up when Toph approached them with an irritated expression on her face.

“I can’t feel any suspicious vibrations,” she stated irately, “The rebels that escaped must be long gone.”

“Where do you think they went?” the general asked with a frown.

“What is their plan?” Aang questioned miserably as he bent down to close the unseeing eyes of a little boy who had a stab wound on his chest. “Those monsters,” he hissed angrily as he tightened his hands around his wooden staff.

The young Fire Lord did not say anything as the others continue to speculate about the current events. He was trying to ignore the sudden feeling that something was terribly wrong. He closed his eyes and tried to rein in his sudden anxiety before he snapped his eyes open as he began walking down one street. He felt the others quickly follow after him.

He had nothing to worry about. He was surrounded by people he trusted—well, with the exception of Jet, he mused. Katara, his mother and uncle were safe in the guarded palace. He dismissed the grim feeling as he turned his attention on giving his men orders, but he paused when the sound of cracking wood coming directly from above him reached his ears.

“Zuko, watch out!” Aang shouted.

Zuko looked up and his eyes widened when he saw part of the destroyed roof of a house fall toward him.
A few hours had passed since Katara started healing the wounded. There were so many of them and more kept arriving. Some of them died before she could reach them and she would feel her heart grow heavier with guilt when another villager passed away. She tried to tune out the wails of widows, the anguished screams of parents who had lost their young ones, and the cries and whimpers of orphaned children.

As much as she tried to stop it, she could not help but remember that day her village was attacked by the Southern Raiders and the pain and destruction they had wrought. She felt her heart again clench in grief as she remembered her mother’s death before she closed her eyes and calmed herself. She needed to be collected in order to help these people. And she did. She continued to treat their injuries without pausing for rest or food. She ignored her worried mother-in-law and maidservant as she determinedly healed the wounded. Soon only those with mild injuries were left.

“Fire Lady Katara,” a voice distracted her from her concentration as she healed a large cut on a man’s back. Once she sealed the wound, she turned toward the person addressing her.

“Yes?” she asked as she stared at the servant standing patiently next to her.

“Two soldiers wish to speak to you,” he informed her with a bow of his head.

“About what?” she asked with a frown.

“They said they have a message from the Fire Lord,” he told her.

“My husband?” Katara mused before her frown deepened in concern. Was something wrong?
Worried, she stood up and removed the apron from around her waist before she told the servant to take her to the soldiers. With a bow of his head, the man turned around and led her out of the infirmary. Katara looked back when she felt someone following them and smiled when she saw it was Jiao. Once the servant brought them to one of the palace sitting rooms, he bowed again before he continued down the hall after the waterbender dismissed him. Katara immediately walked into the room and spotted the two Fire Nation soldiers. When they saw her, they quickly bowed and greeted her. She frowned as she noticed their dirty and battered armor. Her frown deepened at the weary and anxious expressions on their faces.

“You have a message from my husband?” she asked.

The taller one of the two stepped forward with another bow before he straightened with a grim expression on his face.

“The Fire Lord has ordered that we escort you to the village, my lady,” he said in a raspy voice.

“Why? What’s wrong?” she asked.

“A group of children were trapped in one of the burning houses before we were able to extinguish the flames,” the soldier informed her, “They are badly injured. The Fire Lord is afraid to move them and hopes you could heal them.”

“Of course I’ll go!” Katara immediately said before she turned around, “Let me just get some things and inform my mother-in-law—”

“We don’t have much time, my lady,” he interrupted her anxiously, “If we don’t hurry the children… won’t survive.”

“Then we will hurry,” the Fire Lady replied as she indicated for them to lead the way.

The soldiers bowed their heads and quickly walked out of the room. Katara and Jiao hurried after them. Soon they stepped out of the palace and headed toward the stables to grab two ostrich-horses for the women. The two soldiers waited outside with their own komodo rhinos. As Katara and Jiao waited for the stable boy to saddle their mounts, Katara bit her lip in anxiety before she frowned as an odd feeling went through her. She shook her head to dismiss it as she thought of the children.
Luckily, her healing abilities were not needed as much in the palace now. The physician and his helpers could continue helping the rest of the injured while Lady Ursa brewed them calming tea and comforted them. As the stable boy walked toward her with the ostrich-horse, Katara grabbed the reins with a smile. The boy blushed and shuffled his feet. He reminded her of Aang when she first met him.

“Can you do me a favor?” she asked him sweetly.

“A-anything, Fire Lady Katara!” the young teen exclaimed quickly.

“Can you tell my mother-in-law that I received a message from Fire Lord Zuko asking for my help?” she asked. “I don’t want her to worry when she can’t find me.”

“O-of course!” he replied. He puffed out his chest as if he had been given a very important task.

Katara suppressed her smile.

“Thank you,” she said before she turned again to the ostrich-horse and swung herself onto its back. “Let’s go, Jiao.”

“Yes, my lady,” Jiao responded as she mounted the animal with the help of the stable boy.

They rode out of the stables to see the soldiers were silently waiting for them. Once they saw the women were ready, the men turned their mounts and led them toward the large door that led out of the palace. As they neared it, King Bumi’s guards eyed them curiously before they bowed respectfully at the Fire Lady as they passed through the gates. Once they were outside, the soldiers quickened their pace. Katara silently followed them as that uneasy feeling grew more intense as minutes passed.

“How far is the village?” she finally asked.

“Not too far,” the same soldier replied, “If we hurry we will be there in an hour or less. The Fire Lord will be relieved that you will look after the children.”
“Then maybe the Fire Lord would allow you to look at him,” the other soldier spoke up.

He felt silent when his partner shot him a disapproving look. Katara felt her worry increase at the man’s words.

“What do you mean? What’s wrong with my husband?” she asked anxiously.

“It is nothing, my lady,” the tall soldier immediately reassured her.

“Tell me what is wrong,” she ordered firmly.

She watched as they exchanged uncertain looks and she felt her heart constrict in anxiety.

“Fire Lord Zuko ordered us not to tell you,” the first soldier finally responded.

“And I order you to tell me,” she insisted.

Shooting another disapproving look at his partner, the tall one let out a resigned sigh.

“Fire Lord Zuko has been injured,” he said gravely.

Katara and Jiao gasped.

“What happened? How hurt is he?” Katara began to ask in a panic.

“It is nothing too serious,” the soldier immediately reassured her, “He is more concerned with the children.”

“We must hurry!” the waterbender exclaimed.
The soldiers nodded grimly before they spurred their mounts to go faster. With a press of her heels, Katara quickly followed after them as her chest began to ache in her apprehension. Was Zuko really all right or did the soldiers just say he was in order to keep her from being concerned? She knew Zuko would hide his pain in order not to worry her. She needed to see him for herself to see how badly hurt he was. She needed to get to him so she could comfort and heal him. She also needed to help the poor children.

Soon Omashu was out of sight and an hour later they were riding toward some rocky hills as the afternoon sun beat down on them. She barely paid attention to their surroundings as her anxiety grew. Katara slowed her ostrich-horse when she noticed that the soldiers had stopped before a path between two rocky hills and were dismounting.

“The animals can’t get through on this road,” the tall soldier told them when the waterbender frowned impatiently at them. “The village is on the other side of this path.”

With a nod, Katara dismounted from her ostrich-horse and Jiao quickly did the same.

“We will tend to the animals,” he added as he grabbed their reins.

Katara barely heard him as she turned around, her anxiety playing havoc to her mind. She prayed that they arrived in time as she and Jiao quickly walked along the uneven path between the hills. As they almost tripped for the third time, Katara wondered if this was a strategic plan to slow any invaders down from reaching the village.

Just as they arrived on the other side, Katara’s eyes widened and she froze in her tracks, causing Jiao to bump into her. The waterbender hardly noticed since she was taking in the sight before her with disbelieving eyes.

Instead of a destroyed village, they had stumbled upon a group of six men sitting around a campfire as they drank and ate. Once they spotted the women, the men sprang to their feet and turned toward them with grins.

What is going on? the waterbender thought as she stared at them in confusion. Where is the village? Where is Zuko? And the children?

An incredulous gasp escaped her mouth before she could stop it when she recognized Ping and three of the other rebels that had been there when Zuko and she had been captured months ago. Quickly, she grabbed Jiao’s wrist and turned them around so they could mount their ostrich-horses to escape and warn the soldiers, but their path was blocked by the two men whose once grim expressions now turned into leering grins.

“What is the meaning of this?!” she demanded angrily. “How dare you betray your lord!”

“That bastard isn’t our lord,” the tall one spat before he mockingly added, “But it wasn’t hard to make you believe so.”

“Especially after we stole the real soldiers’ uniforms and komodo rhinos,” the other one added with a laugh.

Katara gasped. She was duped and she fell for it! What did they do to the soldiers? She cursed herself for being too trusting and for ignoring her instincts that kept telling her something was not right. She felt Jiao move closer to her in uncertainty and fear.

“What is going on?” a new voice asked.

The waterbender spun around to see Chang, the former Dai Li agent, appear from around the bend of another hill and she tensed. He looked at the Fire Lady impassively before his eyes shifted toward Jiao who was partially hidden behind the waterbender with wide, frightened eyes. Katara watched as Chang’s green eyes widened and a stunned expression overcame his usually blank face. Sensing his perusal, Jiao stepped closer to her lady.

“Let us go,” Katara spoke up in order to direct Chang’s attention away from Jiao. “I’ll reward all of you greatly if you do.”

She narrowed her eyes when the men laughed. She scanned their surroundings carefully and knew that escape would be difficult since it seemed they were surrounded by rocky hills. Zuko could not rescue them because he did not know what had happened. At least she assured herself with the fact that Zuko and the children must be all right. She hoped. Now it was up to her to find a way for her and Jiao to escape.

Where was Jianguo? She prayed he was somewhere far away. She did not like the way he looked at her when he had captured them. She had a bad feeling whenever he was near.
Chang seemed to finally snap out of his stupor as his eyes moved away from the dark-haired woman to return his attention to the angry waterbender.

“Jianguo doesn’t want your money,” he said in a passive tone.

“What does he want then?” she asked with a frown before she narrowed her eyes as she firmly said, “I won’t help him capture Zuko and release Ozai from his prison.”

Before any of them could guess her actions, she quickly uncorked her new waterskin and lashed out at them with her waterbending. The men cursed as they tried to avoid her attacks while they retaliated. The earthbenders in the group tried to cuff her wrists to block her chi, but she made sure to keep them from doing so and attacked them fiercely. She would never allow herself to be beaten again and have her chi blocked. She never wanted to feel that emptiness again.

Keeping Jiao at her back, Katara shot a jet of water toward one of the men, causing him to fly and land hard on the ground a couple of feet away. She narrowed her eyes. Something was wrong. It seemed as if the men did not want to hurt them, but just subdue them. Why? But the most important question was how were they going to escape?

She was snapped out of her thoughts when she heard Jiao gasp behind her before she was swallowed into the ground.

“Jiao!” Katara screamed in fear as she spun around, but the woman was not there.

Katara jumped sideways and water whipped one of the rebels who had tried to grab her from behind. She then deflected two stone cuffs before they could chain her wrists. Panting in exhaustion, she narrowed her eyes in confusion when the men suddenly stopped attacking her.

“Why don’t you stop before you hurt yourself?” a familiar voice made Katara freeze in terror.

She pivoted toward the sound of the voice as she wrapped tendrils of water around her arms, her stance aggressive. Jianguo stood a few feet away, smiling at her, but the gleam in his eyes made fear skitter along her spine. She glared at him in order not to give him the satisfaction of knowing that his presence unnerved her.

“I will never allow you to capture me again,” she hissed.
The former Fire Nation general laughed at her words and his men laughed along with him.

“Oh, really?” he taunted with a raised eyebrow as he pointed to his left, “Even if it means the cost of your servant’s life?”

Katara glanced in the direction he was pointing to and tensed when she saw Jiao in Chang’s arms with a knife pressed lightly to her pale throat. The waterbender thought she saw Chang holding the woman gently against him, but Jiao’s eyes were wide with terror. A movement from one of the earthbenders caught her attention and Katara quickly deflected another pair of stone cuffs with her water whips. She looked up to glare at Jianguo.

“Then again, she is only a servant,” he said with a mocking sigh of pity.

“Let her go!” she demanded.

She growled under her breath when Jianguo and his men again laughed at her. If Jiao’s life wasn’t being threatened, Katara would have shown them not to mess with a waterbending master. But Jiao was in danger and Katara had to be careful and not act rashly. She had to think of a way to save them, but what?

“Stand down and allow your chi to be blocked,” Jianguo ordered more firmly when the waterbender refused to answer before he added, “If not, then the woman will die.”

Katara clenched her hands tightly as she glared hatefully at the arrogant firebender.

“Don’t do it, my lady!” Jiao screamed, “I’m not worth it”!

Jiao gasped when Chang pressed the cold knife closer to her neck, but it was not that that shocked her but the fact that he had pressed her closer against him so that she could feel every inch of him against her back. Jiao shivered in revulsion. She wished she was in Kuo’s arms, but she could not allow her lady to be hurt. Lady Katara had been so kind to her.

“What is your decision, waterbender?” Jianguo asked with a raised brow.
When the blue-eyed woman hesitated, the firebender narrowed his eyes before he glanced at Chang. The earthbender frowned, but obediently brought the knife closer to Jiao’s neck so that the sharp edge of it bit into her skin and turned her flesh paler.

“Let her go!” Katara shouted in alarm.

“Why, doesn’t this feel familiar?” Jianguo commented as a cruel smile stretched his lips.

Katara hissed at him as her hands clenched into tight fists. Was this what Zuko had to deal with when he had to choose to either fight or back down in order to keep her safe? She had later berated him for ignoring her pleas for him to run, but now she found that she could not fight back because she wanted to rescue Jiao. It seemed she took too long in deciding because Jianguo narrowed his golden eyes and growled impatiently.

“Kill the woman,” he brutally ordered the earthbender.

Even though he was frowning deeply, Chang moved the knife in order to slice the terrified Jiao’s neck.

“No! Stop!” Katara screamed, and without thinking about it twice, she let go of her hold on the water. She flinched when the water hit the ground at her feet, useless now.

“No! My lady, no!” Jiao exclaimed in dismay.

Katara did not look at her as she glared at a spot in the distance.

“A very smart decision,” the firebender assured pleasantly.

The Fire Lady looked up to glare at him. She knew that without her waterbending, they were in deep trouble and now they had no way to defend themselves or find a way to escape. It was times like these she wished she had mastered her bloodbending. She was scared, but she refused to show it as she stood perfectly straight with a defiantly raised chin.
Jianguo watched the waterbender with a gleeful smile. Even though she tried to act brave, he knew she was terrified, and he reveled in it. He wanted to break her spirit, he wanted that blue fire of hatred in her eyes to extinguish and be replaced by fear and awe of him. He wanted to corrupt her body, find pleasure in it as she screamed in both pain and pleasure. He wanted her to be dependent solely on him.

With a command from him, one of the earthbenders moved forward and shackled the silent waterbender’s wrists. His smile widened as his anticipation flared. Now he had her. Now he could finally satisfy his curiosity and obsession of her.

Katara clenched her eyes as that cold, empty feeling once again seeped into her soul as the connection with her element was blocked. She felt like a failure, she felt weak, but she could not let them kill Jiao because of her. What could she do now? What should she do?

With another command from Jianguo, Chang removed the knife from Jiao’s neck and reluctantly released her. As soon as the man’s arms loosened around her, Jiao broke free and raced toward the waterbender and desperately clasped her suddenly cold hands.

“You shouldn’t have, my lady,” she cried in a whisper.

“I couldn’t let them kill you, Jiao,” Katara whispered back as she squeezed the other woman’s hands.

“That’s better,” Jianguo spoke up with a pleased smile.

The waterbender looked up to glare icy daggers at him, even though she was inwardly quaking with fear. She hated the look of triumph in his expression. She wanted to wipe it off his face with a water whip.

“It’s over,” she told him. “Your plot to reinstate Ozai on the Fire Nation throne will never work. Your informant was found out and now he’s dead. There’s no one to help you and fund you. You should just give up.”

Jianguo growled angrily and the men began to murmur loudly. If their informant was dead who were they going to get information from? But most importantly how were they going to keep getting paid? As the men began to bicker and complain, their leader turned to give them a heated glare. They stiffened and immediately fell silent.
Sensing their agitation and discontent, Katara continued to mock them. Maybe she could make the men turn on Jianguo and she and Jiao could make an escape while they fought amongst themselves.

“Advisor Kang is dead and now there is nothing you can do,” she added with a smirk.

Something passed across Jianguo’s face, but it disappeared too quickly for Katara to determine what it was. Anger? Disappointment? Fear?

“It doesn’t matter,” he spoke up gruffly. “Ozai will return to the throne and we will receive our just reward.”

Katara raised a mocking eyebrow.

“Zuko will never release Ozai,” she hissed. “He will rescue us and he will kill you!”

Jianguo interrupted her as he threw his head back and let out a laugh, a deep and arrogant laugh. Once again his men laughed with him. With a scoff, the firebender returned his gaze to the angry brunette and smirked.

“Zuko won’t be rescuing you,” he taunted cruelly. “He’s too busy dealing with our little ruse at that dirty village.”

Katara gasped. The attack was just a trick to lure Zuko out? She narrowed her eyes at Jianguo. She should not be so surprised since they had also faked that illness in the colony those months ago. But why did they do it this time? What was their purpose?

“I knew Zuko would have left you behind in the palace to keep you protected while he went to fight,” Jianguo continued as he stared smugly at the woman. “So while he was away, all I had to do was lure you out. Zuko really did make this easy for me.”

He chuckled.

“By the time the insolent whelp notices you’re gone, it’ll be too late,” he continued, his smirk widening.
The waterbender raised her chin defiantly.

“And what do you plan do to?” she asked. “Ransom us for money or Ozai’s freedom?”

Her fear doubled when Jianguo raked his eyes along her body before he smirked leeringly at her when he again locked eyes with hers.

“Oh, no, my sweet,” he breathed out huskily, “Nothing like that.”

“What do you mean by that?” she asked with narrowed eyes.

She felt herself tense when Jianguo’s eyes darkened.

“You see,” he began as he started to walk slowly toward her, “I don’t plan to return you to your husband soon…if at all.”

Katara felt her blood freeze in her veins with fear.

Frowning deeply, Zuko surveyed what was left of the destroyed village. It would take a while before it was restored and the surviving villagers could return to their homes. He felt his hatred for Jianguo and his men grow.

“Are you sure you’re all right?” Aang’s worried voice brought him out of his thoughts.

“I’m fine,” he responded simply before he smiled slightly when the airbender continued to frown.

They had all gotten quite a scare when the roof almost fell on Zuko, but luckily his fast reflexes saved him as he quickly jumped away before he was crushed. Everybody had rushed toward him before they paused in relief when they saw him stand up and dust himself off as he began to give out more orders. Toph had punched him on the arm and said that he was fine if he was barking out orders already. He had only glared at her.
They had planned on going in search of the rebels, but he knew that it did not matter how much they searched. The rebels would not let themselves be caught so easily. They had left no clue as to where they had disappeared to. But why had they attacked the village? What was their game? That uneasy feeling he had felt since he arrived grew and he felt a pang in his chest. What did it mean? He turned to his guards and Bumi’s general.

“I need to return to Omashu,” he said impassively, his expression showing nothing of his agitation. “I will return shortly.”

Without waiting for them to respond, he strode toward his mount with Shen and Kuo quickly following behind. He needed to see Katara. He had an urge to be with her and make sure she was all right, which was ridiculous since she was safe in Omashu. But nonetheless, he would not feel at ease until he saw her. Once he did, he will return to the village and help his men.

“Sparky, wait for us!” Toph’s voice made him turned on his komodo rhino to see them run toward him.

“Is something wrong?” Aang asked. Momo landed on his shoulder with a chirp.

“I just have an uneasy feeling,” Zuko began with a frown as he looked in the direction of Omashu, “But after I reassure myself, we’ll continue with the search.”

He turned his mount around and pressed his heels into its side to make it walk forward. With another press, the komodo rhino changed into a fast gallop. His personal guards quickly followed. Aang and Toph raced to where Appa had been grazing, and soon, they were slowly flying over the three mounted figures. Soon they arrived at the courtyard of the palace. Appa groaned as he landed softly on the ground. Aang and Toph had barely dismounted when they realized Zuko was already entering the large building.

The first place Zuko went to was the infirmary where he knew he would find Katara healing the wounded. As he entered the room, he was greeted enthusiastically by the healed villagers. He barely acknowledged them as he inquired after his wife. The main physician told him she had stepped out and had not returned. Frowning, Zuko marched out of the infirmary without another word as he felt his anxiety rise. He searched the gardens and the library, but he did not find her.

“Zuko! When did you arrive?” Iroh’s voice made him pause as he rounded a corner.
The Fire Lord turned around to see his uncle and Bumi hurrying toward him with worried and expectant expressions.

“Did you catch the rebels?” Bumi asked with a growl, “Did they say why they are attacking my villages? Dammit, if I hadn’t gotten drunk last night, I could’ve been there.”

“You and me both,” Iroh added with a sigh as he rubbed his temple. He and Bumi had started a drinking game during the party to see who could outlast the other. To say the least, they both passed out.

Zuko hesitated since he wanted to continue searching for Katara, but he knew he needed to inform Bumi of what happened. Straightening himself, he quickly and concisely told them everything he knew. Once he finished he waited almost impatiently for them to say something.

“I will cancel the next party and immediately have people rebuild the village,” the old king said. “I will have more guards patrolling the area. If the rebels come back, they will not escape this time!” He boomed as he cracked his knuckles.

As Bumi and Iroh discussed between themselves about asking the Order for more help, Zuko interrupted them.

“Have you see Katara?” he asked with a frown.

“We saw her in the infirmary this morning,” Iroh replied. His bushy eyebrows bunched together in concern when he saw the subtle agitation of his nephew. “Why? Is something wrong?”

“I need to see her,” was his nephew’s quick response as he turned around and walked down the corridor without listening to their questions.

He ignored the servants he passed by as he strode toward the guest room he and Katara were sharing. He hoped she was waiting inside for him with a bright smile before opening her arms to comfort him when she noticed his anxiety. He arrived at the room and quickly stepped inside. He scanned the area quickly only to frown in disappointment when he saw it was empty.

“Where are you, Katara?” he asked quietly into the vacant room.
He felt his chest ache once more as he walked out of the room and again went in search of his waterbender. Where could she be? He spotted his mother and Jee heading toward the infirmary and he quickly approached them.

“Zuko,” Ursa greeted her son with a relieved smile and a hug. “I’m so happy to see you are all right. I—”

“I’m sorry, Mom,” he interrupted her as he grabbed onto her arms and leaned back, “but have you seen Katara?”

His dread rose when he saw his mother and Jee exchange a confused frown before they turned to look at him.

“I thought she was with you,” Ursa told him.

“What?” he asked as he frowned. Did Katara decide to follow him instead of waiting for him to return?

“You’re the one who summoned her to the village,” his mother continued as her confusion grew.

“What?” Zuko exclaimed. He felt as if his heart dropped to his stomach.

Greatly concerned now, Ursa glanced at Jee before she turned back to her son and began to wring her hands together.

“A stable boy gave me Katara’s message that she was leaving because you asked for her help,” she informed him.

“I never sent for her!” Zuko shouted as he ran a shaky hand over his pulled-back hair.

“What?” Jee exclaimed just as Ursa gave out a loud gasp.
“Jianguo! It has to be him!” Zuko whispered harshly to himself.

Feeling his chest constrict in panic, Zuko pivoted around and sprinted toward the stables. Ursa and Jee quickly ran after him. They raced past Toph, Aang, and Zuko’s personal guards who decided to follow when they saw the alarmed look on the Fire Lord’s usually stoic face.

“What’s wrong, Sparky?” Toph shouted, but she was ignored as Zuko stormed into the stables, startling the animals inside.

The stable hands jumped at the intimidating Fire Lord’s sudden appearance before they tried to calm the animals down. Zuko scanned the men with piercing, golden eyes and they shrunk back.

“Who was the one who gave my mother the message from my wife?” he barked out the question.

The men jumped at the harshness of his voice before they glanced at each other in confusion. Zuko gritted his teeth when no one responded. He opened his mouth to demand they answer him when he saw a young boy timidly step forward.

“I-it was m-me, my lord,” the preteen stammered as he wrung the hem of his dirty shirt in fear.

Zuko approached him in a few long strides before he took a deep breath to calm himself down when the boy flinched.

“How long ago did she leave?” he asked more calmly, even though he was feeling anything but.

“A-about less than an hour ago,” the boy said after he thought about it.

“Did she leave by herself?”

“I think there were two Fire Nation soldiers with her,” the boy began as he frowned in thought, “Oh, and a woman. I think she’s Fire Lady Katara’s maidservant.”

“Jiao!” Kuo gasped.
Zuko felt as if he could not breathe. Where had the soldiers taken Katara? And why?

“What did they ride on?” Zuko asked.

“The ladies took two ostrich-horses and the soldiers were on komodo rhinos,” the pubescent boy answered quickly.

Then they could not have gotten far, Zuko mused. Komodo rhinos were known for their strength and stamina, not their speed. He needed to ride something even faster than an ostrich-horse in order to catch up with them.

“Are there any eel-hounds?” Zuko asked.

“King Bumi has some of the best,” the boy answered proudly.

“Then ready some eel-hounds,” he ordered the boy and the stable men.

When he noticed they were looking at him curiously, he tried to calm himself.

“I need to speak to my wife about something important and I can’t wait for her to return,” he stated nonchalantly to the room, speaking to no one in particular. He did not want to raise any questions or rumors about why he was going after his wife after he had supposedly sent for her.

As the men quickly went about in saddling the animals, Zuko turned around and clenched his eyes shut as the pain in his chest increased. Where was his wife? If it was indeed Jianguo who had planned all of this, then Katara was in terrible danger! He needed to save her! He opened his eyes when he felt his mother touch his arm.

“Zuko, what is going on?” she asked worriedly as the others surrounded them.

“I think Katara is in trouble,” he growled out in a low tone so the stablemen would not overhear.
“You think Katara’s been kidnapped?” Aang asked in alarm.

“It’s the only possible conclusion,” Zuko told them as he clenched his hands. “I didn’t give my men orders to bring her to the village. They lied to her and she, not knowing they were lying, must have followed them without question.”

He knew something was not right. This was Jianguo’s plan all along! He tricked him into going to help the attacked village while he lured Katara away. But he will get her back!

“It’ll be faster finding them if we ride on Appa,” Aang interrupted the anxious firebender’s thoughts.

“I don’t want to risk Katara and Jiao’s safety if the men spot Appa,” Zuko told him. “There are no trees for cover.”

They became silent when they heard someone clear their throat. They turned to see the stable boy.

“The eel-hounds are ready, Fire Lord Zuko,” he said quickly.

“Thank you,” the firebender replied as he moved toward one of the animals.

Kuo immediately went to the other saddled animal, worry for his own wife twisting his face into a frighteningly grim expression. Shen followed after him.

“Wait, my lord, I wish to accompany you too,” Jee spoke up.

“I want you to stay with my mother,” Zuko told him with a frown.

“I want to help save Lady Katara,” Jee replied firmly. “Besides, you might need more help.”
Zuko thought about it before he gave a curt nod.

“Very well,” he said before he raised his voice so the stablemen could hear him, “Saddle another eel-hound and quickly.”

“Make it two more!” Toph piped in as she pointed at herself and at Aang. “We wanna help, too.”

The men quickly went to work when the Fire Lord told them to hurry up.

“Mother, go to Uncle and King Bumi and tell them what has happened,” he told her firmly, “Please stay with them until we return.”

“Be careful, my son,” Ursa said as she grasped his arm. “Bring Katara back safely to us.”

“I will,” Zuko responded with a firm growl.

A few minutes later, the six of them were headed out of Omashu and heading in the general direction the guards at the main doors saw the Fire Lady and the soldiers go. Since Toph could not see, she was riding behind Aang. As they continued to ride, Zuko scanned the ground beneath them. When something caught his eye a few miles later, he made a motion with his hand and they all stopped. Dismounting quickly, Zuko knelt on the dusty ground and examined it for a moment until he made out the prints of two ostrich-horses and two komodo rhinos. He let out a sigh and shut it eyes in relief for a moment. He was grateful for all of his time of tracking Aang, Katara, and Sokka.

“It must be them,” he whispered to himself as he felt a bit of hope rise within him.

It seemed the men had not thought he would follow since they did not bother to cover their tracks. They had not counted that he would want to return to Omashu so soon and find his wife missing. But when he found them, he would make them pay for daring to take her away.

Standing up, he swiftly swung onto his mount’s back and urged it to go faster. The others quickly followed after him. Zuko felt his dread increase until it was almost painful. He felt like an icy band was constricting his chest. He hoped he was not too late.

Katara forced herself not to back away in fear and disgust when Jianguo stepped closer to her.
“And what will that accomplish?” she finally asked with a mocking raised eyebrow.

She felt another shiver of terror run down her spine when the firebender smirked cruelly as he leaned close to her so that their faces were inches apart. Jianguo was silent for a moment before he pulled back, the smirk still in place. Katara let out the breath she’d been holding at his closeness.

“The thought that I have you and that he is unable to save you will eat at Zuko,” the former general finally explained, his tone full of satisfaction and malice. “The guilt he will feel because he was unable to protect you will fester until he wishes he were dead. And once he is weak and full of despair, I will propose to have Ozai released in exchange for you.”

“It won’t work,” Katara told him firmly though her voice shook a bit. “Zuko will never release Ozai.”

“Ah, but he will!” Jianguo assured as he smiled at her before he mockingly added when she gave him a skeptical look, “He will do anything for you. Isn’t that sweet?”

Katara ignored the men’s mocking laugh as she clenched her hands at her sides as her heart constricted in her chest. She could not find a retort because she knew it was true. She knew, just like Jianguo did, that Zuko would do anything to keep her save, even risk his own life. He had even told her that he would always choose her.

No, this could not be! She had vowed that she would never make Zuko choose between his country and her! She would rather die than give him such pain.

As if sensing her thoughts, Jianguo once again stepped close to her. This time, Katara took a step back when he glared at her.

“If you do not cooperate, I’ll have the servant girl raped and tortured before I slowly kill her,” he warned darkly.

Both women gasped. Jiao let out a soft sob as she pressed closer to the waterbender’s back. Katara glared at the firebender with all the hatred and loathing she felt toward him before she looked down.
“That’s better,” he said with satisfaction. “Women should know their place.”

Katara clenched her teeth in anger, but forced herself not to verbally lash out at him for his chauvinistic remark. She would pretend to be cooperative and obedient for now if it meant they were left alone. She would never forgive herself if she allowed Jiao to be hurt when she could have prevented it. She guessed that Jianguo would make them march through the terrain again until he found a suitable spot where he can make his trade to Zuko for their return. She would just have to find a way for them to escape when Jianguo was distracted.

“Now, in the meantime,” Jianguo spoke up again as he turned to his awaiting men, “Why don’t we have ourselves some fun before we head out?”

Katara’s head snapped up in alarm just as Jiao let out a terrified cry when the men howled in glee as they grinned lasciviously at them. The women clutched tightly onto each other.

“Jianguo,” Chang interrupted in his usual blank tone, “I think we should leave now before—”

“Relax, Chang,” the firebender interrupted unhurriedly as he smiled, “This will only take a few minutes. Enough time for us to leave and be far from here before they come searching for us.”

Chang frowned at their leader’s disregard, but remained silent. The men laughed as they approached the women slowly.

“Have fun with the serving wench, but the waterbender is mine,” Jianguo told them.

He stalked toward Katara and tightly seized her arm before she could move away. Both women screamed just as two men grabbed a hold of Jiao and pulled them apart.

“Jiao!” Katara screamed in panic as Jianguo began to pull her after him even as she struggled against his hold.

“Lady Katara!” Jiao shrieked in terror as the men dragged her away.

Katara turned around and slammed her fist against Jianguo’s side, effectively making him lose his hold of her from both the pain and surprise.

“No! Let her go!” the waterbender shouted as she raced after Jiao who was clawing at her attackers.

She cried out when she felt someone grab her braid and pull her back before an arm wound tightly around her waist. She gasped when she was pulled into a hard chest.

“You think you can escape me so easily, waterbender?” Jianguo growled into her ear. He ignored her struggles to free herself as he tightened his hold of her and again began to drag her away around the bend of a hill.

“Let me go, you bastard!” she shouted in both anger and fear as she looked back to where Jiao was struggling against the other men who had all gathered around her.

“No!” she cried out in horror as she saw the men begin to rip Jiao’s clothes from her body. That was the last thing she saw before Jianguo rounded the corner and her view was block by the rocky hill. “No! Jiao!”

With a crazed cry, Katara flung herself at Jianguo and began to punch, kick, and claw at him in order to get him to release her so she could save Jiao. With an angry growl, Jianguo raised his hand and slapped her hard across the face. Katara staggered to the side from the force of the blow, but before she could gather her bearings again, she felt the firebender grab her around the waist before he threw her over his shoulder. The sudden move and the pain from the blow made her head spin.

Once the spinning stopped, she began to hit at his back and kick at his front as she continued screaming at him to let her go, but to no avail. He was physically stronger than her and his tight hold was making breathing difficult. But she needed to escape! She could not let him rape her! She needed to save Jiao! She renewed her efforts with more vigor that this time the firebender had to really struggle to keep her from breaking his hold. He quickened his pace when he neared a group of boulders.

“Keep still unless you want me to tie you up while I take my pleasure of you,” he growled out warningly, yet Katara could detect anticipation and lust in his tone.

She felt her stomach churn in disgust and terror, but she did not stop her struggles. She would not give into him without a fight! She gasped when he suddenly dropped her onto the hard ground and she cried out at the painful impact. When he leaned toward her, she raised her legs and kicked him hard on his chest, knocking him back.

As he fell, Katara tried to scramble to her feet, but she was pulled back down when Jianguo grabbed her ankles. Gasping at the jarring impact, Katara then coughed when she felt him fall onto her back, his heavier body pinning her to the ground beneath him. Her eyes widened in shock and repugnance when she felt something hard poke her backside.

“You can’t escape me,” he tauntingly whispered in her ear before he stuck out his tongue and licked the shell just as he slipped his hands beneath her to roughly cup her breasts. “Oh, the things I’m going to do to you.”

“Don’t touch me!” she yelled furiously as she kicked her legs out and tried to push him off her.

She gasped when he suddenly flipped her onto her back and again crushed his body atop of hers. When she tried to kick him off and push against his chest, he grabbed onto her wrists and pinned them beside her head.

Jianguo groaned in pleasure as he felt her every soft curve mold into his frame. It was better than he ever imagined. And he hadn’t even started.

Katara saw him smirk down at her smugly and lustfully and she glared at him. Wanting to wipe that smirk off, she angrily spat at his face. She braced herself for his retaliation, but he only raised one eyebrow as he used one hand to wipe the spit from his face. She cried out when he brutally tightened his grip on her hands.

“There are other ways for you to use that nice, little mouth of yours, waterbender,” he growled at her, “But for now, I’m more interested in something that you have hidden beneath that dress.”

When he reached toward the bottom of her dress, Katara threw her head forward and hit him on his nose. The unexpected impact made him lose his hold of her wrists as he reached for his face with a howl of pain, but he still kept her pinned beneath him. With a furious hiss, Katara shot her hands forward and began to fiercely scratch his face like a crazed puma-cat. Growling angrily, the firebender grabbed her clawing hands and again pinned them on the ground once he realized his nose was not broken.

“Do you really think that a mere woman is going to win against me?” he told her mockingly.
“Why don’t you let me use my waterbending and we can find out, you coward!” she responded angrily as she bucked and twisted so she could break his hold.

He threw his head back and laughed.

“As if that would make any difference,” he retorted arrogantly before he smirked at her. “Besides, I prefer not to have to worry about you driving an ice spear through my chest as I take your lovely body.”

Having just said that, he again settled even more heavily on her, causing her to gasp for air.

“Get off of me!” she screamed in fear, anger, and revulsion as she thrashed against him.

Jianguo laughed at her attempts to escape.

“You don’t know how long I waited for this, waterbender,” he growled huskily as he leaned his head down and licked her neck. He smiled when she gasped in disgust. “You don’t know how many nights I dreamed of having you naked beneath me. I even began to imagine it was you whom I was thrusting into when I was fucking other women.”

“You’re disgusting!” she hissed at him as she tried to free one of her legs so she could kick him, but the only thing she succeeded in doing was give him the chance to slip between her thighs. She cringed in horror when she felt his arousal against her.

“No! Get off me!” she shouted as she tried to recoil away from his touch.

He chuckled before he pressed into her more firmly.

“Don’t touch me!” she cried out.

Ignoring her cries, Jianguo pressed himself against her again and groaned loudly. He then grabbed onto both her shackled wrists with one hand while with the other he tore her top open. The sound of ripping fabric was loud in Katara’s ears. She began to shout and struggle even more fiercely.
“What a nice view,” the firebender commented lustfully as he stared at the woman’s generous breasts covered in a silky, white cloth. Uncaring of her struggles, he grabbed one soft breast and squeezed hard.

“No! Stop!” Katara screamed in both pain and repugnance as she tried to break his hold of her wrists. If only she had her waterbending! She felt terrified and frustrated tears begin to gather in her eyes. This couldn’t be happening!

“I wonder if your husband would still want you once he finds out your body has been tainted. Or would he cast you aside like a common whore when he finds out I have taken my pleasure of your body many times before I get rid of you?” Jianguo mused cruelly as he watched tears of despair fall down her cheeks, “Or maybe I will keep you if you are good.”

Katara screamed in disgust when he bent his head down and licked her chest. He licked a path down the cleavage of her covered breasts before he wrapped his mouth around her clothed nipple while his free hand roamed her body. She renewed her struggles as her fear and panic grew.

“No! Please!” she shouted as her body bucked in order to push him off, but he only pressed his hips more tightly against her, making her choke with her tears at the unwanted feeling.

“I promise that if you let go, you will feel pleasure, too,” he told her throatily as he raised his head to look at her tear-stained face.

“Never, you bastard!” she cursed at him before she again spat at his face.

Jianguo wiped his face with his free hand as he glared at her before he grinned as he leaned down toward her mouth. Katara quickly turned her face away, disgusted at the thought of having him kiss her, but Jianguo tightly grabbed onto her chin and forcefully turned her back to him before he crashed his mouth against hers in a brutal kiss. Katara struggled against him, but when she felt him try to pry her mouth open with his tongue, she felt bile rise in her throat. With an enraged hiss, she bit his lip hard enough to cause him to bleed. He pulled back with an angry curse and she spat his disgusting blood from her mouth.

“Suit yourself!” he growled at her angrily.

He knelt back and reached for the hem of her dress. He ignored her terrified protests as he pulled it up until it bunched around her waist. He smirked as he was met with another silky, white cloth to cover her womanhood.

“I must thank your husband for making this easier for me,” he commented with a leering laugh as he reached down and pressed his hand against her.

“Don’t!” she screamed.

Chuckling, he rubbed against her a few times as he leaned over her again and closed his mouth around her other covered nipple. Katara cried out for him to stop.

“I’m going to enjoy this,” he groaned as he hooked a finger on the hem of her undergarment.

“No!” Katara shrieked in a wild terror. Her fear gave her enough strength to free one of her hands and punch him across the face.

She barely registered the pain in her hand at his roar of pain. He moved back a bit from the shock and pain and it gave her enough room to kick him hard between his legs. He cried out and curled on himself, but he did not loosen his hold of her as she had been expecting. Panicking, she raised her foot to kick him again, but he quickly grabbed her leg when he realized what she planned to do and pinned it down. The fuming glare he sent her made Katara’s heartbeat race in fear before her head snapped to the side when he struck her painfully across the face.

There was a cracking sound as his fist connected with her cheek before another one followed as he punched the other side of her face. Her face cracked against the hard ground. She cried out as pain exploded behind her eyes at the multiple blows. She opened her eyes a second later, but the painful strikes disoriented her so much she could not focus as black spots danced before her and the world spun around her.

“You little bitch!” she heard him growl angrily at her above the ringing in her ears.

She shook her head to refocus so she could renew her efforts to free herself, but her body did not obey any of her orders as she lay limply on the ground. Her eyes widened when she felt him rip away the cloth that covered her chest before she felt him harshly grab one of her breasts.

No!
She tried to recoil away, but her body felt sluggish and did not listen to her mental commands.

“I wanted this to be pleasant for both of us,” she again heard him growl, “but for what you did I will be rough with you as I take my pleasure of your body!”

He again settled between her legs and reached down to rip her underwear away.

No! No! she mentally cried out, but when she felt the cloth almost give way to his tug, she managed to open her mouth to scream.

“No!” she cried in anguish.

Chapter End Notes

Don't despair yet!
They had been riding hard and fast, but they still had not found any sign of Katara, Jiao, and the men who had taken them. Zuko and Kuo were in the lead as they desperately scanned ahead of them for any sign of their wives. Jee and Shen rode behind them with grim expressions. Following behind them, Aang held a worried expression as he grasped tightly onto Toph’s hand which she had laid around his waist. For once, Toph was silent since she knew that any sarcastic remark would make Zuko explode in anger.

“Don’t worry, my lord,” Jee spoke up quietly, “We will find them.”

Zuko gave a nod to show he had heard his admiral, but other than that he did not respond. Silent and anxious, Zuko continued to follow the animal’s tracks as he calmed himself with images of slowly killing the ones who had dared to take his wife away from him.

“There are some hills ahead of us, my lord,” Kuo’s voice brought him out of his thoughts, “Do you think they went through them?”

Zuko looked up and spotted the rocky hills his guard had mentioned. He frowned. It would be harder to track the footprints on rock. But perhaps they had gone around them since komodo rhinos had difficulty climbing over rocks.

A sharp pain went through his heart and Zuko grabbed at his chest with a silent gasp. His golden eyes widen. Katara was in danger! He did not know how he knew, but he was sure of it. He had to save her! He would kill whoever dared to hurt her!

With a sharp kick of his heel, he forced the eel-hound to run faster toward the craggy hills as he kept an eye on the animals’ tracks. They paused before the hills since there seemed to only be one narrow path through them. Zuko dismounted quickly and knelt toward the ground to inspect it. He saw that the animals had been led away in another direction and he almost got up to follow the tracks, but he paused when something else caught his attention. His hope rose and his heart picked up its speed when he noticed two pair of small feet follow the path into the hills. They had to belong to the women!

When he felt the others approached him, he stood up and turned to them with a sharp look. He brought his finger to his lips when they began to ask him questions. Understanding, they nodded their heads before they silently followed after the Fire Lord when he rapidly stepped into the rocky trail. They had barely walked a few steps when they heard angry shouts. They all glanced at each other before they stealthily approached the sounds. When they came upon the exit to the other side, Zuko made them pause before they carefully peered out from the shadows. What they saw made them tense.

“Jiao!” Kuo whispered in horror.

Trembling and crying softly, Jiao was sitting on the ground as she tried to cover her chest with the tattered clothes that hung from her body. But what surprised them even more was that one man stood protectively before her with a fierce expression on his face while facing off eight equally angry men who were shouting at him.

“Git out of da way, Chang!” one man growled, “Give us da woman. Ye can’t ‘ave ‘er all ta yerself!”

“Yeah!” another one shouted, “Ye can ‘ave her afta we all get a turn with ‘er!”

Zuko glared at them angrily before he frowned in anxiety when he could not see Katara. He turned to Kuo, but before he could stop him, his guard was already running toward the men with blazing hands and an incensed expression. Pulling out his dual broadswords, Zuko quickly followed after him while the others did the same.

“Get away from my wife!” Kuo bellowed furiously.

The men turned in surprise before they jumped out of the way when the angry firebender shot fire balls at them. They quickly assumed fighting stances when the Fire Lord, the Avatar, and three others attacked them.

“Kuo!” Jiao shouted in relief and joy.

Something passed across Chang’s face at her cry before he narrowed his eyes at Kuo as he blocked him from approaching the woman. Kuo growled at him before he threw a fiery punch at his face which Chang quickly avoided as he retaliated by hurling a boulder at the firebender. Kuo jumped out of the way before he attacked the earthbender fiercely as he tried to get to his wife.

Zuko avoided another weak attack from the two men he was fighting. He recognized Ping and regretted not ending his life when he had the chance.
“So we meet again, Fire Lord,” Ping mocked, “Dis time I’ll ‘ave me revenge!”

“So we meet again, Fire Lord,” Ping mocked, “Dis time I’ll ‘ave me revenge!”

“Where is my wife?” Zuko demanded to know with an impatient growl.

The men jeered at him.

“Ye should start lookin’ fer a new one,” the other man laughed.

Infuriated, Zuko was before him before the man could react and beheaded him with a flaming sword.

“Where is she?!” the Fire Lord thundered again as he turned to a wide-eyed Ping.

“My lord!” Zuko heard Jiao shout, “Jianguo took her with him!”

“Where?” he asked desperately.

“I-I d-don’t know!” Jiao sobbed, “He w-wants t-to…You have to save her!”

Feeling his heart constrict, Zuko turned to Toph who had just thrown one man a few feet away with the force of a pillar of rock she had summoned from the ground.

“Toph!” he shouted as he avoided Ping’s attack.

“She planted her feet on the ground and concentrated hard from distinguishing the vibrations in hopes that she could know where Katara was located. She screamed in pain when she felt fire lick at her feet and she fell on her back in agony.

“Toph!” Aang screamed in alarm before he growled as he attacked the firebender who had purposely burned her feet.
Punching Ping unconscious in his anger and frustration, Zuko raced to where Toph was cursing and moaning in pain. He panicked since Jianguo could have taken Katara in any direction and with Toph injured he did not know which way they could have gone. He bent down to tell the earthbender to hold on, but she grabbed onto his arms to get him to shut up and listen to her. Aang arrived to stand protectively over her.

“I felt something in that direction!” she said as she pointed to another hill. “Hurry and save Katara!”

The firebender hardly waited for her to finish her sentence as he jumped to his feet. Heart in his throat, Zuko raced in the general direction Toph had pointed to. He rounded the small mountain and continued to run. He remembered the words Jianguo had written in that letter to Advisor Kang and he felt fear grip his chest. He had to find Katara! He had to save her! He hoped he was not too late.

“No!” he heard Katara scream.

Katara!

He veered toward the sound of her pained and fearful voice.

“No!” he heard her shriek in terror and his heart constricted.

Katara!

He spotted a cluster of boulders and dashed toward them. As he finally neared them, he stopped dead in his tracks at the sight before him. Jianguo lay on top of a struggling, half-naked Katara whose face was streaked with tears. The rebel had her shackled wrists in one hand as he tried to rip her undergarments off. With an enraged roar, Zuko raced forward and harshly grabbed a surprised Jianguo by his shoulders before throwing him off Katara.

Feeling Jianguo’ heavy weight being lifted off her, Katara painfully lifted her head as new hope faintly rose in her heart. The sight of her husband’s imposing figure standing protectively before her made an aching relief surge through her that it forced a choked sob to escape her bleeding lips.

“Zuko!” Katara weakly cried in relief as she tried to sit up, but the movement made her lightheaded and she fell back onto the ground with a groan of pain as the world spun wildly around.

“I’ll kill you!” Zuko roared as he lunged himself at Jianguo before the older man could get up, “I’ll kill you for touching my wife!”

He struck Jianguo’s jaw hard, knocking him back and stunning him, before Zuko punched him two more times. Through his wrath, Zuko noticed that there were bruises and deep scratches on the older man’s face, and he felt pride at the thought that Katara had fought back. He dodged to the side when Jianguo finally retaliated with a flaming fist and then a kick. Avoiding the attacks, Zuko jumped back just as Jianguo rose to his feet to glare at him.

Jianguo spat blood onto the ground as he angrily seethed in his mind. He had waited so long for this moment and now his plan was ruined. His men had been unable to get close to the royal couple during their honeymoon on Ember Island. A chance for the men he had sent to capture the waterbender had presented itself when Zuko and the blue-eyed beauty had separated from their guards to stare out into the rising sun, but it seemed Zuko had sensed their presence because he became more alert and protective of his wife. His actions brought the attention of his guards, so Jianguo’s men had been forced to retreat. That was why Jianguo came up with another plan to kidnap the waterbender where it would be more difficult for Zuko to keep her protected. Leading her out of Omashu had been so easy that he could not help celebrate his victory early. But how did the infuriating whelp find them?! This was not part of his plan! Zuko was not supposed to notice the waterbender’s absence at least for a few more hours! By that time Jianguo had planned on being in one of their hideouts where he could continue indulging himself some more on the enticing Water Tribe woman and at the same time gloating at the thought of Zuko’s suffering.

“Couldn’t you have waited a few more minutes to intervene?” Jianguo sneered as he wiped at the blood pouring from the now two cuts on his lip.

With an angry growl, Zuko sprang at him again, but this time Jianguo was ready and blocked the younger man’s attack before he fiercely retaliated. Jianguo frowned. Why was Zuko not using the white fire Ping told him about? Had it perhaps been a fluke? They threw deadly punches at each other before they broke apart. Zuko panted with rage as he furiously glared at the older man, who smirked at him as he looked back at the waterbender.

“I can see why you fight so vehemently for her,” Jianguo began.

Zuko glanced briefly back to see Katara trying to cover her chest as she finally managed to painfully sit up before he quickly returned his attention to the man before him.
“After getting a feel of the waterbender’s lovely body, I only crave more,” the older firebender taunted with a leer.

“You bastard!” Zuko snarled as he sprang swiftly forward that he took Jianguo by surprise and tackled him to the floor.

Rage clouding his mind, Zuko began to repeatedly strike the older firebender’s face with his fists until Jianguo was completely covered in blood. Zuko withheld using his white fire because he wanted to prolong Jianguo’s suffering. He would kill the bastard painfully and slowly for daring to touch his wife.

“Zuko, look out!” he heard Katara scream.

Zuko barely had enough time to avoid the sharp rock spike that was aimed at his head. He landed before Katara with a growl as he glared a Chang who had suddenly appeared next to the bloody Jianguo who was sitting up slowly. Zuko took a few steps forward, but was quickly blocked by Ping who punched a rock at him. Zuko easily destroyed the boulder with a fire blast as he focused his attention back to the rebels’ leader. Jianguo spat blood before he wiped his mouth as he glared at the furious Fire Lord before his eyes shifted to the side.

“Get the woman!” he barked.

Alarmed, Zuko whirled around in time to see another man rush forward to grab Katara off the ground. With a distressed cry, he was about to sprint forward, but paused when he saw Jee run the man through with his sword before throwing the body aside as he took position in guarding the distraught Fire Lady. Seeing that his wife was safe, Zuko again spun around to face his enemy with an incensed expression on his face that made his scarred side seem more intimidating.

“This isn’t over, boy,” Jianguo growled from between Chang and Ping. “I will make you suffer and I will have the waterbender if it’s the last thing I do!”

Zuko snarled as he moved toward him with flaming fists, but Chang quickly submerged the three of them into the ground. With a vehement curse, Zuko took a step forward, wanting to chase after them, but he stopped himself. His wife was more important right now and she needed him. He turned and raced to her before he dropped to his knees beside her.

“Katara,” he cried out in relief as he opened his arms to her.
Katara threw herself at him and clutched at his clothes as she buried her face on his neck. Zuko wrapped his arms tightly around her and brought her closer to him when she began to tremble uncontrollably. They did not notice when Jee silently made his way back to the others to give them some privacy.

“Oh, Zuko, Zuko,” the waterbender chanted his name as if it were a blessing.

“Katara, are you all right?” he asked her softly as he nuzzled her tangled hair before he more quietly asked, “Did he…?” he choked. He could not finish the thought. It brought a physical pain to his chest.

She shook her head and clutched even more tightly to him. She wished he was not wearing his armor so she could feel more of his warmth.

“No,” she whispered with a shudder. “You arrived in time to save me.”

Zuko relaxed heavily as he pulled her closer to his chest.

“Thank Agni,” he breathed in immense relief. “I never would have forgiven myself if I had been late.”

Katara shuddered more strongly at the thought and Zuko ran a hand down her back to soothe her, wanting nothing more than to take her to their home in the Fire Nation where she could be safe. She pulled slightly away with a gasp and Zuko looked down at her in concern.

“Jiao!” she exclaimed in anxiety. “We have to save her!”

“Jiao’s fine,” he assured her, “Kuo saved her.”

The waterbender sagged against him and closed her eyes.

“Thank La,” she whispered.
She opened her eyes when Zuko pulled back and she watched him frown as he touched the stone cuffs around her wrists. She clenched her hands and looked away in shame.

“He said he wouldn’t hurt Jiao if I allowed my bending to be blocked,” she said quietly before she bitterly added, “I should have known he wouldn’t keep his promise.”

“He has no honor,” Zuko remarked angrily.

“Jianguo planned the attack on the village to keep you busy while he had his men, posing as your soldiers, make me follow them,” she explained, “They told me you and some children from the village needed my help.”

“I figured as much,” he growled out.

“He…he planned to use me against you so you could release Ozai,” she added quietly.

“I would have if it meant I could take you back,” he told her firmly.

“Zuko, no!” she exclaimed, “You can’t do that. I’m not—”

“Don’t you dare say you’re not that important or else I’ll get angry with you, Katara,” he warned darkly.

Katara opened her mouth to keep arguing, but decided to bite her lip to hold back her words instead. She knew nothing she said would change his mind. She looked down and gasped softly.

“You’re hurt!” she exclaimed as she gently grabbed his hands.

Zuko looked impassively down at his hands being cradled between Katara’s smaller ones. His knuckles were torn and bloody from striking Jianguo’s face so many times. Zuko had not felt the pain only the dark satisfaction of hitting the bastard’s skin and bones. He would have felt more gratification if he had used his firebending behind his strikes, but he had wanted to prolong Jianguo’s suffering. But for that selfish reason Jianguo had escaped. His face hardened in anger.

“It’s nothing,” he said gruffly when Katara continued to look worriedly at him. His injury was nothing compared to hers. He balled his wounded hands into fists as his fury once again resurfaced before he hugged her tightly close to him again.

“Toph was hurt when she tried to figure out your location,” he continued when it seemed she was about to argue.

“Take me to her,” she told him softly.

Zuko pulled away to looked at her beloved face to make sure she was indeed there with him. His heart was still pounding hard in his chest at the thought that he could have been late, that he could have lost her. His face darkened when he saw her bruised features. He touched one of her cheeks gently before he quickly pulled away when she flinched in pain. He cursed Jianguo.

“They’re just bruises,” Katara assured him as she gently grabbed his face between her hands. “I’ll heal them later, but first you need to take me to Toph.”

Zuko frowned since she was not acting like he thought she would be at almost being…He shook his head before he could finish the thought. Grabbing her arms gently, he helped her stand up, steadying her immediately when she swayed unsteadily on her feet. He frowned darkly when her arms immediately went to cover her exposed chest. The top of her dress lay in tatters around her and the cloth that had covered her breasts rested on the ground a few feet away, also ripped. His jaw clenched and he balled his hands into fists as his body trembled with his wrath before he ordered himself to calm down so he would not frighten her more than she was. Removing his short cloak, he draped it over her shoulders before tying it securely closed around her. He shot a small spark of fire at the ruined undergarment on the ground and watched it burn slowly as if to erase some evidence of what happened. He then turned back to her and bent to pick her up into his arms, but she moved away and shook her head.

“I can walk on my own,” she said when he frowned at her. “I don’t want to seem weak in front of the others.”

Zuko opened his mouth to argue before he decided to do what she wanted so he would not add more to her trauma. Wrapping an arm around her, he led her back to where he had left the others. He wondered what had happened after he had left. He was not really worried since Aang, Toph, and his men were more trained than any of Jianguo’s rebels. He remembered that Jee had come to Katara’s rescue and planned to thank his admiral profusely for the deed. Looking back down at his wife, he frowned in concern at her silence. There was a blankness in her eyes that he did not like. He would talk to her more calmly once they returned to Omashu. He clenched his hands. He should have killed Jianguo quickly, but he had let his anger control him in his goal to make the former general suffer greatly.

When they finally arrived to where the others were waiting for them, they saw that six men had been killed. One was still alive, however. He sat with his hands tied to his back and a hateful look on his dirty face. Katara looked away from the man and searched for Jiao. Once she spotted her, she smiled in relief. Wearing Kuo’s cloak, Jiao was safely nestled in the arms of her husband, who had her pressed tightly to him. Once the others saw the royal couple approach, they all exclaimed the Fire Lady’s name in relief. Before Kuo could stop her, Jiao broke away from him and ran toward the waterbender. She grasped her hands tightly.

“Are you all right, my lady?” she asked fearfully as she looked at the forming bruises on her face.

Katara smiled to reassure her and the others.

“I’m fine. My husband arrived in time to save me.”

They turned to Zuko for confirmation, and at his nod, they all relaxed.

“Thank the gods,” Jee said as he exhaled deeply, relieved at the news. Lady Ursa would also be glad to hear her daughter-in-law was safe.

“Men who prey on helpless women are monsters that need their dicks cut off with a rusty spoon,” Toph remarked with a snort.

“Toph!” Katara exclaimed as she moved away from Zuko and Jiao and raced toward her.

The short earthbender was sitting with her back against a worried Aang’s chest. Her burnt feet were propped upon a raised stump of rock.

“Does anyone have water?” Katara asked as Zuko moved to stand behind her.
Shen quickly handed her a water canteen he found among the rebels’ belongings. With a smile and a ‘thanks’, Katara took the canteen. She smiled at Zuko when she saw that he had picked up her empty waterskin before she returned her attention to Toph.

“Here,” Aang spoke up with a small, comforting smile.

With a flick of his wrist, the stone manacles around her wrists fell away. Katara exhaled deeply and closed her eyes as she savored the feeling of being reconnected with her element.

“Thanks, Aang,” she said gratefully.

She bent the water from the canteen and enveloped it around her hands until it glowed. She then began to heal Toph’s feet, which luckily were not as burned as she feared. She felt Jiao move close to her and she glanced up at her.

“Are you okay, Jiao?” she asked quietly, “Are you hurt anywhere?”

Jiao gave her a small smile to reassure her.

“I am well, my lady,” she responded sincerely, “Only some minor scratches and a few ripped parts of my clothes, but I’m fine.” She turned to smile reassuringly at her husband when Kuo growled.

“What happened?” the waterbender asked with a frown.

Jiao shuddered and Kuo immediately wrapped an arm around her.

“The men began fighting amongst themselves to see who could…” Jiao paused in disgust before she continued, “to see who could have me first, but then that tall earthbender shoved them away from me.”

Katara and Zuko exchanged a look since they remembered Chang said that even though he did not condone the violation of women, he did not bother with stepping in to stop it.

“Why did Chang stop them?” Katara asked curiously.
Color suffused Jiao’s cheeks and she trembled.

“He said that he was the only one who was to...have me,” she said in a quiet tone.

“I’ll kill the bastard if I ever see him again,” Kuo growled, “Too bad he escaped from me when another man attacked me. The coward.”

They were interrupted when their captive laughed. They turned to stare at him.

“Chang did dat cuz the woman looks a lot like his dead lover,” he said with a sneer as he leered at Jiao. “Yea, ‘cept dis one has gold eyes ’stead of green.”

When they glared at him, the man cringed. Katara glanced at the dark-haired woman. No wonder Chang had looked so stunned when he first saw her. He must have wanted to replace his dead lover with Jiao.

“Where are the rest of the rebels?” the Fire Lord asked the man roughly, “Where is your hideout?”

The man pressed his lips together and refused to respond to the questions. Irritated, Zuko stalked menacingly toward him, causing the rebel to cower from him.

“Answer me or else I’ll have the truth tortured out of you,” Zuko threatened darkly.

“Okay, okay, I’ll tell ya!” the man relented when the Fire Lord lit one of his hands, “I’ll tell ya everthin’ if ya promise ta ‘ave mercy on me!”

Zuko eyed him hard for a few seconds until the men squirmed in anxiety and terror before he gave a nod.

“Fine. I promise to be lenient on you if you tell me everything,” the Fire Lord agreed, though he would not let him go for fear he would warn the others.
The man opened his mouth only to gasp in pain.

Confused, they watched as blood trickled down one corner of his mouth before he fell forward. They gasped when they saw a rock spear imbedded in the man’s back, blood seeping into his clothes. Taking up defensive stances, they scanned their surroundings for more attacking rebels. Minutes passed in tense silence, before they slowly relaxed when nothing happened.

“Dammit!” Toph cursed after Aang told her what occurred, “I could’ve sensed them if my feet weren’t burnt.”

“Katara will have to finish healing you in the palace,” Zuko spoke up as he kept his eyes scanning the area, “It’s best we leave.”

Nodding, they all followed his directions. Shen checked on the man and informed Zuko he was dead. Without any remorse, Zuko told him to leave the body to the wilderness. Aang ignored Toph’s protests as he lifted her into his arms and followed after the others to where they had left their eel-hounds. Placing her on the back of the animal, he then climbed on behind her. Toph continued to grumble in order to hide her pain, but held tightly to his arms when he urged the animal forward.

Holding Katara tightly before him, Zuko quickly led the way back to Omashu with Kuo and Jiao riding the same way. Jee and Shen brought up the rear to make sure they were not attacked from behind. The ride was grim and silent, though they were all relieved that the two women were safe and back with them.

Night had fallen by the time they finally neared the gates of Omashu. Katara turned to look up at Zuko’s dark expression.

“Please be discreet about what happened,” she implored him quietly as she pulled down the hood of the cloak to hide her injured face, “I don’t want rumors to spread and have panic seize the people. I don’t think Jianguo will appear anytime soon.”

Zuko was silent for a moment before he reluctantly agreed. He remembered Katara telling him that the rebels had dressed in his soldiers’ uniforms. He wondered where his soldiers were, he needed to send men to look for them.

The sentinels at the gates immediately opened the doors when they recognized the Fire Lord and the Avatar. The streets were empty as the citizens got ready to turn in for the night. The small group rode in silence toward the courtyard of the palace before dismounting. The stablemen hastily rushed forward to take the animals. The stable boy from before quickly took the reins from the Fire Lord and looked curiously up at them. Katara smiled under the shadows of the cloak’s hood to reassure him and the boy smiled back with a blush. He puffed up his chest when the Fire Lord gave his thin shoulder a firm squeeze. As they all entered the palace, Kuo bade them good night before he quickly left with Jiao to their guest room in the servant quarters.

“Do you need anything else, my lord?” Jee asked as he and Shen waited for the answer.

“No,” Zuko responded, “Thank you for your help. You should go rest.”

His admiral and personal guard bowed at him and Katara before they turned around to find their way to their rooms.

“Aang, take Toph to her room so I can finish healing her,” the waterbender spoke up.

With a nod, Aang carried the still grumbling earthbender to her room with the royal couple following behind. They entered and Aang laid her on the bed where she crossed her arms and glared ahead of her. Ignoring her attitude, Aang sat on a chair beside the bed and held onto one of her hands. With a smile at their antics, Katara immediately set out to heal Toph’s injury. Zuko stood near her, not wanting to part from her side after the horrible fright he had experienced that day.

“There, all better,” Katara announced a few minutes later, “Your feet might be a bit sensitive for a while since the skin is new.”

“Eh, I’ll live,” was Toph’s nonchalant response as she gave a shrug. Then she smirked as she added, “Can you let me borrow Sparky so he can piggyback me until I’m better?”

“I only did that as repayment for accidentally burning your feet years ago,” Zuko replied with a sniff, “I won’t go through the humiliation as Fire Lord.”

“Fine,” Toph replied with a snort before she turned to grin at Aang. “I bet piggybacks from Twinkletoes will be more fun anyway.”

Aang and Katara laughed quietly when Zuko indignantly asked her if she was calling him boring. Despite his protest, Katara healed Zuko’s hands and they all fell into a grim silence. After Katara reassured them once again that she was fine, they left the younger couple to themselves before Zuko wrapped an arm around her and led her to their guest room. As they entered, Zuko went to the small bathing room to find the copper bathtub already filled with water for their regular bath time, but the water was cold now. Zuko moved toward the tub and dipped a hand inside to warm the water until it was steaming nicely before he went back to his wife. Again, he frowned at her silence and watched as she clutched his cloak tightly around her form.

“The bath is ready. I need to tell Mother, Uncle, and Bumi what happened,” he told her as he moved toward her.

“Do you have to?” she asked him quietly.

“I want to let them know that I want to return to the Fire Nation tomorrow,” he explained gently.

“We don’t have to leave,” she said with a small frown.

“You will be better protected in our home,” he replied firmly, “Besides, I don’t think Jianguo will cause any more problems here since his plan to capture you failed.”

Katara did not respond since she really wanted to return home and forget what happened. She shuddered at the memory of Jianguo hovering over her before she quickly shoved it away. Zuko moved forward to help her undress, but she flinched away before she could stop herself.

Zuko froze in surprise before he dropped his arms back to his sides.

“What’s wrong?” he asked with a concerned frown.

“You should go tell them what happened,” she said instead as she gave him a small smile. “They must be worried.”

Frown deepening, he said, “I don’t want to leave you…”

“I’m fine. I’m going to bathe while you’re gone,” she reassured him.
Hesitating, Zuko stared at her for a while before he relented.

“I promise I’ll return quickly,” he told her as he moved toward the door. “I’ll have a servant bring you food. I’ll be back soon.”

Closing the door behind him, the young firebender walked down the hall in worry. Passing a servant, he asked her to bring Katara dinner before he continued on his way when she bowed at him. He went to Jee’s guest room and found that the admiral was still awake. Zuko thanked him for saving his wife before telling him to have his men ready the airship so they could depart tomorrow toward the Fire Nation. Jee immediately went to follow his orders. Zuko continued toward Bumi’s study where a servant had told him he could find the old king with Iroh and Ursa.

Knocking once, Zuko opened the door and stepped inside. The three turned before they stood up and began shooting questions at him. He raised his hand to ask them to stop before he heaved a sigh when they anxiously waited for him to explain what happened. In a few minutes, he gave them a brief account of what had occurred since his departure. With a curse, Bumi stalked toward the door and bellowed for his guards to set up a perimeter around the palace before slamming the door shut.

“I plan on leaving to the Fire Nation tomorrow,” the Fire Lord added seriously as he looked at Bumi, “I wish I could stay and help, but—”

“You should take Lady Katara home,” Bumi interrupted firmly, quickly dismissing the young man’s guilt, “She’ll be better protected there. Who knows, maybe this Jianguo could plan to kidnap her again if you remain here any longer. And if he does succeed this time, we all know what will happen.”

Zuko balled his hands as he looked away, knowing Bumi was referring to the fact that he would agree to release Ozai in order to get Katara back. Zuko narrowed his eyes. He could not let that happen.

“I want to keep Katara’s kidnapping a secret,” Zuko told them grimly after a moment of silence, “I don’t want people to spread untrue rumors about her. I don’t want her to get hurt.”

“Of course, we’ll keep this a secret,” Bumi spoke up before he added with a frown that caused the wrinkles on his forehead to be more pronounced, “You should’ve killed the bastard when you had the chance.”
“I know,” Zuko growled out as he clenched his hands.

“How is Katara?” Ursa asked worriedly.

“She is a bit shaken up, but she seems fine,” Zuko answered after a second.

“Thank Agni,” Iroh breathed as he sat back heavily onto the chair and rubbed his forehead.

“I have to return to her,” the Fire Lord said as he turned toward the door. “We will leave tomorrow as soon as everything is ready.”

Without waiting for their response, he walked out of the room and quickly headed back to the guest room and Katara.

“Zuko, wait,” he heard his mother call after him.

Zuko turned around to see her hurrying after him. Once she stood before him, she glanced around them to make sure they were alone before she turned back to her son.

“Is Katara truly all right?” she asked grimly, her delicate features marred by an anxious frown.

Zuko hesitated for a moment before he sighed.

“She seems fine, but…” he trailed off with a frown.

“But what?” Ursa prompted.

“When I tried to touch her, she…flinched away from me,” he confessed quietly.
Ursa’s frown deepened.

“That’s a natural reaction to victims or would-be-victims of rape,” she clarified softly.

“What do you mean?” he asked her anxiously.

“Right now Katara might loathe the touch of any man, including yours, because it will remind her of what happened,” she explained gently to him.

Zuko balled his hands into tight fists and growled in anger at the memory of what Jianguo had been doing to Katara.

“I should have killed him quickly,” he hissed furiously.

“You have to be understanding and gentle with her as she tries to come to terms with what almost happened,” Ursa advised him. She paused before she grabbed her son’s clenched hand as she more softly added, “You also need to understand that Katara might abhor the thought of sexual intimacy at the moment.”

Zuko’s eyes widened in dismay. He could not live without making love to Katara! As if understanding his thoughts, Ursa gave him a frown and squeezed his hand tightly.

“You have to be patient and wait until she approaches you in order not to hurt her, Zuko,” she told him firmly.

At her reprimand, Zuko lowered his eyes in shame. He berated himself harshly. How selfish could he be? While Katara was hurting, all he could think about was his own discomfort? No, he would resist his urges and wait until Katara was ready. He would help her overcome this. But, what if he could not comfort her? What if he could not help her? Sensing his distressed thoughts, his mother squeezed his hand gently and smiled at him when he looked at her.

“Katara is a strong woman, she will surpass this,” she assured him confidently, “And it is your job to be there for her when she needs you.”
Zuko gave a firm nod.

“I will,” he said firmly.

Patting his hand, she smiled at him before she released him.

“Go to your wife, my son,” she told him.

Thanking her, Zuko bid her goodnight before turning back around and heading toward the guest room he shared with Katara. Once he stood before it, he paused to calm himself so he would not alarm her before he opened the door and entered. He frowned when he saw the room was empty, but he relaxed when he heard the sound of splashing water.

Katara must still be bathing, he thought in relief.

He saw the dinner plate the servant must have brought and frowned when he saw that his wife had barely touched it. He hurried to the bathing room only to freeze in shock at the sight that greeted him. Sitting in the copper tub, Katara was vigorously scrubbing her skin, causing it to turn red as tears ran down her cheeks and silent sobs racked her body. He could see that she had healed her bruises and cuts, but he feared that she would cause herself injury.

Oblivious, Katara continued scrubbing herself roughly with the sponge. She felt dirty. She could still feel Jianguo’s disgusting touch on her. She scrubbed her neck and then her breasts where he had placed his mouth and she shuddered in revulsion as tears continued to pour out of her eyes unchecked. She wished she could tear her skin off and replace it with new and clean skin.

Watching her actions in shock, Zuko’s first impulse was to run to her and gather her in his arms to make her stop hurting herself, but he remembered his mother’s words about Katara distrusting a man’s touch. He did not want to alarm her. Slowly, he made his way to her and knelt by her side. She was still busy tearing at her skin to notice him.

“Katara,” he called out softly to her.

Gasping in fear, Katara flung her hand forward and slapped the male intruder as she pressed herself against the side of the tub. Frightfully, she opened her eyes to see Zuko touch his cheek as he turned his head back to gaze apologetically at her. Why was he sorry? She was the one who slapped him!
“Zuko!” she cried out his name as she moved toward him and cradled his face in her hands. “I’m sorry!”

“It’s fine,” he reassured her gently as he resisted the urge to touch her wrists. “It was my fault for startling you.”

At his words, Katara’s face crumbled again and she brought her face to her hands and cried harder. She felt her heart clench in anger at herself for hurting him while he was so caring toward her. Zuko again reached for her before he stopped himself, clenching his hands tightly upon his thighs as he watched her cry. He cursed Jianguo with every possible painful death there was. Reaching for a towel, he spread it wide for her.

“Come to bed and rest, love,” he said gently.

Katara moved away from him and again picked up the sponge.

“I haven’t finished bathing,” she said hysterically as she again began scrubbing her skin raw.

Gathering courage, Zuko gently grabbed the sponge.

“Stop, Katara, before you hurt yourself,” he told her softly.

“I’m still dirty,” she muttered as she tried to pull the sponge away from his hold.

Zuko frowned in confusion at her words.

“You’re already clean,” he said.

Katara shook her head vehemently as she let go of the sponge and wrapped her arms around herself as she brought her knees close to her chest.
“I…I feel dirty,” she whispered as more tears fell from her eyes.

Understanding what she meant, Zuko clenched his jaw as rage against Jianguo once again consumed him before it was replaced by concern for Katara. Slowly, he touched her chin. She flinched but allowed him to raise her head toward him. He gazed unwaveringly into her distressed, blue eyes so she could see his sincerity.

“You are not dirty, Katara,” he told her firmly. “What happened was not your fault.”

Katara stared at him for a long moment before she threw herself at him and sobbed quietly against his chest. Zuko hugged her tightly to him, disregarding the fact that he was getting wet as he gently ran his hand through her wet hair while her body racked with her soft cries.

“Jianguo is to be blame here,” he growled lowly, “You did nothing wrong.”

“It is my fault,” she cried out as she clutched at his clothes. “I was too trusting. I was weak. I didn’t have the strength to stop him.”

“It’s Jianguo who did wrong for taking advantage of your lack of waterbending,” he told her. “It’s understandable that you couldn’t fight against his physical strength. But you are not weak. It takes great strength and courage to decide to put yourself at risk in order to save someone else. If you hadn’t, Jiao would be dead by now…or worse.”

He paused when she continued to cry silently before he continued, “Besides, you fought with everything you had to stop him from…You had courage to do that instead of giving up and letting him do what he wanted.”

He felt and heard Katara’s cries quiet down a little, but she did not say anything. He frowned since he knew he had been unable to convince her, but thought that maybe all she needed was time to overcome this and see that he was right and that nothing was her fault. When it seemed her tears had drained her energy, he pressed her closer to him. He mentally sighed in relief when she did not flinch away from him.

Silently, he stood up with her in his arms and lifted her out of the tub. Carefully and gently, he dried her hair and body without lingering too long before lifting her in his arms to carry her back to the room. He helped her into her nightclothes before he placed her on the bed, tucking the blankets around her. Then he took a quick bath, dressed in his sleeping pants, and slid into the bed beside her.
He moved close to her, but when he tried to wrap his arm around her waist to press her against him, she cringed and tensed. He immediately backed away.

“I’m sorry,” Katara whispered as she clenched the blanket tightly with her hands as she looked at him. She felt so selfish, but she could not help her fear.

“There’s nothing for you to feel sorry about,” he told her gently as he gazed at her. “Try to get some sleep. We will fly to the Fire Nation tomorrow.”

With a small nod, Katara sighed before she closed her eyes. She snapped them wide open a second later when she saw Jianguo hovering over her with that leering smirk on his face. Shaking her head fiercely, she scooted a bit closer to Zuko as she told herself that Jianguo did not succeed in violating her and that she was safe with Zuko, her husband. She relaxed a little at her thoughts and closed her eyes. A few minutes later, she was fast asleep. The terrifying events of the day had tired her out.

Hearing her breathing even out in sleep, Zuko let out a sigh and relaxed back into the pillow as he gazed into her sleeping face. He was glad to see that her lovely features were no longer marred by bruises, but he did not like the small frown that lingered on her brow even as she slept. He closed his eyes for a moment as he allowed his anger and guilt reign free. This was his fault. He should have protected her better. He should have never let her out of his sight. Opening his eyes, he again stared at his wife’s face.

“I promise I will catch Jianguo and make him pay for everything he has done,” he vowed silently into the room.

She was alive and safe in his arms, but Zuko knew recovering from all that had happened would take both of them some time. The trauma, the anguish, the fear, it had shaken both of them to their cores. Zuko was not sure how to take the next step. For himself, or for Katara.

The sound of Katara’s terrified scream woke Zuko up from a fretful sleep. He instinctively jumped from the bed with blazing hands, ready for an attack.

“No! Get away from me!” Katara’s cry made Zuko’s dazed mind immediately clear up.

Whirling back to the bed, his eyes widened when he saw Katara crying and thrashing about as she clawed at an invisible attacker. Realizing she was having a nightmare, he rushed to her side and clasped her hands. His hold only made her furiously renew her struggles.
“Katara, wake up! It’s just a nightmare!” he called to her worriedly as he tried to avoid her clawing hands.

“No! Don’t touch me!” she cried as tears poured out of her closed eyes. “Let me go! Please!”

Zuko felt his heart break at her pained and fearful plea.

“Katara, it’s me, Zuko! Your husband!” he called to her soothingly. “Please wake up. You’re safe now. You’re safe.”

Hearing his words, Katara finally snapped her eyes open, darting them wildly around as she tried to figure out where she was. She realized that she was not lying on the rocky ground in the wilderness, but on the bed in the guest room of Omashu, and Jianguo was not the one holding her, but Zuko. With a cry, she lunged herself at him and whimpered quietly. Why couldn’t she forget?

“Ssh, love, everything is fine,” Zuko crooned softly against her head as he stroked her long hair. “You’re safe. I’m here.”

Katara closed her eyes as she tried to take deep, calming breaths, but that only succeeded in making her remember her nightmare. It was a replay of what Jianguo did, but this time he had managed to have her completely undressed and he was about to… She shook her head to get rid of the horrible dream. She shuddered in disgust. Would the memory ever go away?

“It was Jianguo,” she whispered quietly, “He tried to… he a-almost…”

“It was just a nightmare,” he reminded her before he softly repeated, “You’re safe.”

When he felt Katara nod against his chest, Zuko tightened his embrace. He felt fury swell within him once more. He recalled how he had beaten Jianguo up until his face was a bloody mess as Zuko sought vengeance for what the dishonorable bastard tried to do to his waterbender. Zuko stiffened when all of the sudden he felt the need to possess her. He was not just shaking with suppressed rage, he was trembling with need. A need that he was so familiar with, but was somehow different. He could only assume that some primitive innate reaction had been sparked to life by his fight with Jianguo. It was completely ludicrous and yet he could not deny it.
What was wrong with him? He had to stop it. He loved this woman shivering in his arms. She had almost been violated by that bastard Jianguo, and here he was thinking such things. He was just as bad as that bastard, if not worse! He had to stay away from her until such outrageous feelings passed.

Grabbing her arms, he gently pulled her away from him, away from his traitorous body. Letting his arms fall to his sides, he turned away from her when she looked at him with wide, blue eyes. He closed his eyes and clenched his hands.

“It was just a nightmare,” he repeated through clenched teeth, “You should try and rest now.”

Katara frowned at his back before she felt her heart constrict in her chest as Jianguo’s words came to haunt her.

‘I wonder if your husband would still want you once he finds out your body has been tainted. Or would he cast you aside like a common whore when he finds out I have taken my pleasure of your body…?’

Was…was Zuko repulsed by her? Did he not want her anymore because of what almost happened to her?

“You are angry,” she whispered dejectedly as she wrapped her arms around herself. “Are you disgusted with me? I swear Jianguo didn’t succeed in raping me! Please, Zuko, don’t hate me. I—”

She gasped when Zuko whirled around to glare at her.

“I’m not disgusted with you, Katara!” he growled angrily at her, angry that she would think such things of him, of her. “Even if that bastard had succeeded, I would still love you since it wouldn’t be your fault!”

Katara felt her heart ease and her body relaxed slightly. Taking a deep breath to calm himself down, Zuko closed his eyes and turned his head away.

“It’s just that I…I’m having trouble controlling myself,” he tried to explained to her between gritted teeth, “It’s just that I…I want you so desperately right now that I can’t trust myself around you at the moment. If I so much as touch you, I fear I might go insane in my desire to possess you.”
He paused to look grimly into her wide eyes as he added, “And I won’t be gentle or tender, Katara, which is how I should treat you right now. If I take you, I would be driven by anger and fear. I don’t want to hurt you or scare you more than you are now. I’m trying to keep my distance from you. To keep you safe.”

Saying that, Zuko again turned away from her and stood up to leave, but he paused when he felt Katara clutched tightly onto his arm.

“Don’t leave me, Zuko,” she pleaded as she gazed up at him. “Please. Stay with me.”

“Katara, didn’t you hear me?” he asked her frantically as he tried to gently pull away from her. “I need to leave before I do something I will later regret.”

“Stay with me, please,” she repeated, ignoring his words as she pulled him so he could sit back down next to her. When he continued to refuse to look as her, she added, “It’s what I need. I need to be with you…” She paused briefly as she licked her suddenly dry lips before she continued more softly, “I…I want you to make love to me.”

Zuko turned to give her an incredulous look. He was shocked at the desperation he found in her blue depths.

“Katara, how can you…?”

“Please, Zuko!” she implored, desperately pleading him to understand. “I want you to erase…his touch and replace it with yours! I need to know I belong to you and only to you, Zuko! I want you to remind me that I am yours and no one else’s. Please.”

Zuko closed his eyes as he fought with himself for a long moment—his mind and heart waging a silent war—before he gave in to what they both wanted, what they both needed. Snapping his eyes open, he wrapped his arms around her and crushed her to him, smashing his lips on hers. He thought no more about it, or anything other than Katara, in reestablishing his claim on her body, in restoring her confidence in herself once again, and in showing her his love for her.

He pulled away and when he reached for her nightgown, he paused briefly when she immediately tensed before he continued to divest her of it after she gave him a shaky nod. Once he had her completely bare, he quickly got rid of his sleeping pants before he slowly laid her back onto the bed.
Looming over her as she lay beneath him, he watched as her arms moved to protect her modesty—to protect herself—before she paused and forced herself to remain still. Her eyes were wide with uncertainty and a bit of fear, and he hated it. There should only be desire and pleasure in her gaze during such intimate moments. But he was glad to also see her complete trust in him in not to actually harm her.

His hands reached out shakily before he gently pressed against the inside of her knees. She resisted for only a second before she allowed him to spread her legs wide for him. As he knelt there, staring at his possession, his treasure, his heaven, she began to tremble and her hands grasped the sheets tightly beneath her to stop their quaking. He silently admired her for enduring any impulse she might have had to cover herself as she forced herself to go through with this in order to heal. While he knew with absolute confidence that he would have respected her decision to keep him at a distance, the knowledge that she wanted him at that moment, that she consented to his actions, obstinately strengthened his need to have her.

Yet, he stopped himself from continuing, not wanting to hurt her, even if she wanted this. He wanted to be gentle with her, but he could feel his blood boiling in his veins with his rage, fear, and possessiveness and he knew that he could not be tender. It seemed she understood the war that was raging within him, for she gave him a small, trembling smile as she lay completely back and let her hands rest beside her head in a sign of undeniable submission, letting him know that she would only be thus with him and only him. A low growl of triumph left his mouth and he positioned himself between her legs.

His hand trailed up her thigh before he pressed against her center. She tensed again, but remained still as she gazed intensely at his face, as if to reassure herself that it was he who was touching her. He took delightful note of the moisture he felt, but frowned since he knew she was not nearly ready enough to receive him. Holding her gaze, he trailed his finger along her slit before slipping it inside her. She winced slightly and he paused in concern.

"Don’t stop. Please,” she begged in a small whisper.

Nodding, he began to pump his finger before pressing his thumb on her clit in order to get her wet enough for his intrusion. It only took a few strokes before he heard her moan softly and felt a rush of wetness coat his finger. He inserted another finger and increased his pace, glad that he was arousing her. When her moans increased in volume and her hips began to move with his thrusting fingers, he groaned. He continued in his slow caress for a long moment as he ushered her to that realm of pleasure. When he felt her muscles clench with her impending release, he lost what little reserve he had, and lowered his body over hers. She tensed immediately and he paused in concern.

"Look at me, Katara,” he told her, firmly yet softly. “It’s me, Zuko, your husband, who is going to take you, love you. Me and no one else.”
“Yes, only you,” she affirmed as she reached for his face with one hand and stroked his scar to again reassure herself it was him.

Holding her gaze, he slowly slid the tip of his shaft into her quivering entrance. Her eyes widened, but she held still. Zuko paused for a second as he continued to stare at her before he quickly thrust into her and buried himself inside her. Katara gasped and stiffened before she forced herself to relax once again and wrapped her legs around his hips. They stared at each other for another second before Zuko slammed his mouth on hers just as he began to thrust unrelentingly inside her.

“Ohhh, Zuko,” Katara moaned as the familiar fire sparked to life in her belly.

She clenched her eyes to savor it, overjoyed to know that both her body and her mind were welcoming the pleasure her husband was bestowing on her, even if he was being rough. She did not need gentle at the moment. She wanted Zuko to take her with everything he had, she wanted him to erase the memory of Jianguo’s disgusting touch, she wanted to only feel Zuko around, above, and inside her.

“Oh, gods!” she cried as his hips began to slam wildly against her, thrusting his iron length between her slick folds with astounding force.

She tightened her hold of her legs around his waist, making him sink deeper into her as he continued to slam into her. She moaned loudly as heat surged through her body. Yes, this is what she wanted! It was what she needed. Tears began to trickle from the corner of her eyes as many different emotions warred within her. Her hands slid up Zuko’s arms before she tightly gripped his strong shoulder blades in a fervent attempt to hold him to her, to reassure herself that he was there with her, needing her, wanting her, making love to her, and essentially healing her. She wanted to remind herself that Zuko was the only one who knew her body completely. He was the only one who would. She was his and no one else’s, just as much as he was hers.

“I love you, Zuko,” she cried softly into his ear.

At her words, Zuko’s eyes screwed shut and he groaned harshly as he captured her within his arms and crushed her to him to hold her steady for his driving assault.

“Mine!” he growled, ramming his hips against her, feeling his balls slap against her round cheeks as his cock plunged into her. “It is my cock that is inside you. It will be my seed that takes root in your womb.”
“Yes! Ahh!” Katara wailed as she threw her head back.

“You’re mine!” Zuko hissed as he panted in pleasure before he was consumed with fear and anger as he began to remember what happened.

What would he have done if she had been taken from him? If he had arrived late and not been able to find her, what could he have done? He could have followed their tracks, but knowing Jianguo he would have the earthbenders submerge them underground to lose him. And if Zuko lost track of them, he would never have been able to find Katara. He could have lost her forever…

“Only I do this to you, you hear?” he growled into her ear. “Only me! Do you understand, Katara?”

“Yes!” she moaned as she thrust her hips upward to welcome his onslaught.

Groaning severely, Zuko increased his speed and penetration, causing the bed to creak and shake violently. He gasped and closed his eyes tightly shut as terrifying images of what Jianguo would have been doing to her now if Zuko had not arrived in time bombarded his mind. Without her waterbending to defend herself, Jianguo could have easily held Katara down and taken his time to… If Zuko had been even a few minutes later than he was to rescue her, he would have arrived to see…

“No!” he roared angrily, “No, damn it!”

Katara’s eyes flew open at his anguished scream and she was struck by the fear and desperation in his gaze. She wrapped herself more tightly around him, knowing that he needed this as much as she did. Wrapping one of his arms around her shoulders, Zuko reached down with his other arm to put pressure on her bottom, bringing her up and against him harder as he reclaimed her body with his own. Lifting her ass up to meet his hips, he shifted and plunged deeper, harder, unable to fill her enough. Irrational as it may be, the desire to bury himself deeply inside her body, to entirely possess the woman beneath him assaulted his mind, his body, his being. As if she understood his painful need, his wife’s soft lips caught his mouth. She nibbled his lower lip before pulling his insistent tongue inside her moist hot mouth and curled her own against it until he was growling lustfully into her mouth.

“You’re mine, Katara,” he panted harshly against her lips, “He won’t touch you again…Never, ever again…I won’t let him or anyone…”
Her body was his and his alone to worship, and Jianguo’s disrespect would cost him his despicable life. Feeling his rage consume him once again, the Fire Lord pressed the waterbender back against the mattress and crushed himself atop her as he rammed into her in quick, short strokes as his hands swept frantically across her body, firmly cupping her breasts, running up and down her back, her firm backside, and desperately squeezed and grasped.

“Yes, Zuko!” Katara cried out, not just from the pleasure of his fervent thrusts, but from the reassurance in his possessive words. Somehow, Zuko knew what she needed, and he was giving himself completely to her, filling her with his body, his comfort, his confidence, his love. She wanted to reciprocate the feeling to him.

Zuko felt Katara’s arms coil lovingly around his neck and her legs wrap more tightly around his waist. Her fingers spread out over his shoulder blades, and then pressed down to hold him to her. He did not slow down in his relentless thrusts. He could feel his breath come out in pants from both the pleasure and exhaustion, but he ignored the slight discomfort in his pursuit to reclaim and love her. He nuzzled his face against her neck and he groaned as he touched the necklace he had given her. He was then aware of the sting of metal on his back as Katara gripped his slick skin with her fingers, reminding him of the gold ring on her finger. They were constant reminders that she was his and his alone.

And she would forever be so.

“You’re completely mine,” he growled again, fiercely and aggressively.

“Ohhh!” Katara wailed, “Mmm, uhh!”

With his every thrust, the blazes of passion sprang higher inside of her, twisting her stomach and causing her eyes to roll to the back of her head. Katara buried her face in Zuko’s perspiring neck as he continued to ram his thick length into her welcoming, wet passage, sending her further and further towards the edge, making her forget everything but this moment with the man she loved.

“Zuko! Oh, Zuko! Oh, Zuko!” she began chanting desperately as her pleasure heightened. Her firebender responded by pounding impossibly harder against her, burying himself again and again within her slick core. “I need you, Zuko! I need you!”

She gasped and moaned loudly when she felt Zuko’s hard shaft throb violently inside her at her desperate cries. Zuko groaned deeply before he raised his head to press his lips to his moaning waterbender’s ear.
“You’re mine, Katara,” he hissed possessively as he crushed her to him.

“Uuuuuh, yes!” she cried out.

Her entire body felt ablaze with desire and passion while her lower stomach began to coil tightly. As Zuko continued to ram into her, desperation surged through her veins, causing her need to flare within her until she was entirely consumed from the sensation. She had never needed anything so much, so completely, in her entire life, but even in the heat of such impassioned lust, she took a moment to thank the gods that she had Zuko. She would forever be grateful that they had given him to her and that he would always be here for her, willing to give himself to her, to complete her in every way she needed him to. She promised herself that she would always, always do everything she could to show him how much she loved and appreciated him. With an overwhelmed cry, her hands were suddenly all over him, grasping and squeezing as she raked her fingernails down his chest, his shoulders, his back, his backside while she began to nip and lick at his neck with wild abandon.

Zuko growl fiercely at her actions and he reached one hand down to clench one of her ass cheeks to impale her hard onto his cock. He grabbed her chin with his other hand and pulled her lips toward his. He nipped her lower lip before his mouth utterly devoured her, his tongue thrusting deeply into her mouth as he moaned and growled against her lips. She responded just as desperately, forcing her tongue roughly against his as her hands continued to curl around his body, clutching him tightly against her. Their movements were wild as they continued to grab each other blindly, wanting to be close, wanting to assure themselves and the other. Just wanting more.

“Mine,” Zuko rumbled as he thrust into her again, his possessive words keeping time with his plunges, “You’re mine… mine… Only mine… No other man… ever… ever touches you…”

“I’m yours, only yours,” Katara whimpered back as his possessive words not only fueled the flames within her, causing her stomach to begin to clench with her imminent climax, but also ease her fear from her trauma a little.

She gasped when she felt Zuko’s thumb press hard against her swollen nub as he murmured in her ear.

“Come for me, love,” he commanded.

Her eyes widened. Just as Zuko had responded to her every need, her body did the same for him as she suddenly blasted into her release. She dug her nails into his back as the white-hot pleasure exploded throughout her body and lights flashed before her eyes, sending her screaming his name into oblivion.

The feeling of her wet walls clenching around him triggered his own release. Zuko roared in pleasure as his cock pulsed wildly inside of his wife, bringing her once again to the height of ecstasy. He thrust his hips against hers a couple more times, filling her completely with his hot seed, before collapsing with a groan against her perspiring body with his lips against her throat.

Katara felt his hot breath blow out of his mouth in heavy pants on her skin and she was sure he felt her own heaving breaths against his. A long moment later, a moment where her mind was completely absorbed in bliss, she felt him hold her tightly against him as he began to nuzzle her neck while his body trembled.

“Gods, Katara, don’t hate me for that,” he whispered hoarsely against her skin, unable to look at her. “Agni, please don’t hate me, Katara.”

Katara frowned. How could he think she would ever hate him for making her feel secure and loved?

“I could never hate you, Zuko,” she told him firmly yet gently. “Not when you have been so good to me.” She gently combed her fingers through his dark hair as she shyly added, “I don’t think you realize that we both needed that. I needed to be with you as much as you wanted to be with me.”

Gathering courage, Zuko lifted himself up and stared down into Katara’s blue eyes. He searched her face, fearful of seeing repugnance or loathing. He saw nothing but love and gratitude reflecting in those cobalt depths and he felt his heart constrict almost painfully in his chest with his ardent feelings for her. He tightened his hold of her, this time not out of possessiveness but of protectiveness. He vowed that no one else would harm her ever again. He would not allow it.

“I love you, Katara,” he rasped passionately.

He leaned down and kissed her gently, this time not seeking to claim her body, but to express his hopeless devotion and love of her. She sighed softly against his mouth before quickly opening up to him when he requested permission. His tongue stroked hers sensually, tenderly, willing her to understand him. After a long moment of just kissing, one of his hands trailed the length of her side before slipping between their tightly pressed bodies to caress her breast and tease her nipple. She gasped into his mouth and tilted her hips forward towards his. Zuko groaned deeply since the sensation caused his cock to immediately harden.
He began to move within her with a different purpose now. He strove to bring her to fulfillment. He wanted to bring her closer to him, not only physically but emotionally as well. He needed to bring her to share in the euphoria he now felt and she so utterly deserved. Her moans and whimpers filled his mouth, her legs clamped tightly around his body, and her fingers grasped his back as silent tears began to fall down her eyes, and yet he did not release her or moved his ardent gaze from hers. He would not allow her to be alone now—or ever—when she needed him. He told her how wonderful she was, what she made him feel, and that she was his everything. He whispered against her lips his love for her as he again made her his. When he saw her eyes widened with a gasp before she shuddered against him, he pushed even deeper inside her. Only when she had experienced the greatness of her rapture did he let himself go, crushing her tightly against him.

Even through their powerful climaxes, they kept hold of one another, refusing to let go of each other as they rode the waves of pleasure. When they finally recovered from their overwhelming heights, they found themselves wrapped completely around each other. They sighed deeply as they crushed themselves even closer, both refusing to let the other go, just enjoying the afterglow. No more words were spoken. They were not needed at the moment.

When Katara finally fell into a restful sleep, Zuko continued to hold her protectively, still buried deeply within her, as he glared into the now dark room. He vowed to kill Jianguo. When he finally saw that bastard again, he would kill him for the harm he had done to his wife. He would not rest until the rebels’ leader was dead. And once Jianguo was dead, Katara would never have to live in fear again. That, Zuko vowed upon his honor.
Katara slowly opened her drowsy eyes, and noticed that Zuko was once again protectively wrapped around her. He was asleep with his head pillowed by her breasts, one of his strong legs thrown over and curved around both of hers. His left arm was wrapped around her, holding her close and tightly to him. He was very warm and slightly heavy, but that did not bother her. With a small smile, Katara lifted her hand and gently ran her fingers through his dark hair, longer now than before. With a soft sigh, she looked away from gazing at his dark head to look around the royal bedchamber. The light of dawn was spilling into the quiet room, casting it in a soft orangey hue.

A month had passed since the rebels’ attack on the Earth Kingdom villages. Ever since the morning after Jianguo had almost forced himself on her and Zuko had loved her both possessively and tenderly, she had woken up with her husband holding her tightly to him as if he were afraid she would be snatched from his side while he slept. But she did not mind. It made her feel safe and she had not had another nightmare of that horrible event.

Her smile faded.

However, only when she was near Zuko did she feel secure. She now tended to look over her shoulder as if expecting someone to jump out to grab her. And whenever there was another man present, she would feel her hands begin to sweat and her heart quicken in anxiety. If they came closer than she was comfortable, she would flinch and quickly move into a defensive stance before she could stop herself.

She had first noticed her reaction the day they left Omashu and Jet had approached her. He had tried to convince her to stay, and when she had firmly refused, he had moved to embrace her, leaning down and trying to kiss her as he had many times before. She had jumped away and backed herself against the wall as she stared at him in fear. Jet had frozen in shock at her reaction before he worriedly asked her what was wrong. She was saved from responding when Zuko had immediately rushed over to her side. He had curtly bid farewell to Jet before he wrapped his arm around her and led her away. Jet had seemed so stunned, then hurt and resigned as he called out a sad goodbye to her. She had only given him a tentative smile as she allowed Zuko to lead her away. She felt bad since it was not Jet’s fault that Jianguo attacked her and it wasn’t Jet’s fault that he did not know what happened. Yet, she could not help feeling relieved at the thought that Jet would no longer chase after her. At least she hoped he didn’t.

However, she also reacted the same way with Iroh, Jee, Shen and Kuo—men she knew would give up their lives before harming her. Although her logical side knew this, her body and mind acted as if she feared they would attack her out of nowhere. She could not help but remember her helplessness when Jianguo loomed over her and the fear and disgust that roiled through her. Zuko now tried to find time in his busy schedule to spend time with her and try to help her overcome her sudden fear of men, but so far nothing was working. She could barely concentrate on her lessons with Madam Fang.
Hua. Her condition was also affecting her duties as Fire Lady for she made excuses about postponing some of the charity works that required her leaving the safety of the palace and be amongst a crowd. She would feel herself get anxious at the thought that Jianguo could be there to kidnap her again and this time she would not be able to do anything to keep from being violated.

Screwing her eyes shut, Katara shook her head. Why could she not forget? She hated feeling weak. She hated that she was always in fear. She hated living this way. She blinked her eyes open when she felt Zuko stir above her as he tightened his hold of her slightly before relaxing.

“Good morning,” she greeted softly.

At the sound of his waterbender’s voice, Zuko looked up and gazed searchingly into her eyes before he smiled.

“Good morning,” he responded before he added with a frown, “You’re up early again.”

Katara gave him a tight smile since the thought of waking up alone after Zuko left made her apprehensive. Now she tended to wake up around dawn like Zuko did. She had to admit that it made her more tired than usual. She watched Zuko frown as if reading her thoughts before he leaned down to kiss her gently on her lips. He lingered for a second before he disentangled himself from around her and stood up from the large bed.

“We should get ready,” he said, “We both have busy schedules today.”

Katara sat up on the bed and nodded her head. Zuko was silent as he stared at her before he sighed and turned around to head toward the bathing chamber to wash up. Katara frowned as she hugged her knees to her chest. Zuko now treated her as if she were a fragile piece of glass that would shatter at any rough touch or harsh word. Whenever she irritated him, he would close his eyes and breathe deeply to calm himself down instead of arguing with her, with that fiery temper of his, as he would do before. Whenever he made to touch her, he would move slowly as if giving her the chance to move away if she wanted to. The worst part, however, was that he never initiated sexual intimacy anymore. She was the one who had to initiate it. And once they did finally come together, he loved her gently as if afraid if he was any rougher she would break down.

She appreciated everything he did to make her feel safe and comfortable, but it only made her realize how weak she had become, how much she had changed from the fearless woman she used to be.
Sighing, Katara lifted the covers away from her and stood up. She was just fixing her nightgown when Zuko walked back into the room and sat down to meditate before the small altar in the corner. Katara frowned at his silence, before she silently walked into the bathroom to bathe, closing the door softly behind her.

Out of the corner of his eye, Zuko watched his wife go before sighing when she disappeared. Everything was different now. He did not know what to do to make Katara feel better. She was so skittish now, so he tried to do everything in his power not to upset her and to help make her feel like her old self. He even tried to rein in his temper when she sometimes argued with him. He sought her out every chance he got, even if it upset his advisors for neglecting some of his duties. They had noticed a change in Katara and had begun asking what had happened to their lady, but Zuko always told them it was nothing for them to worry about.

He now tended to sleep wrapped around her body so he could make her feel safe. But it also comforted him at the thought that nothing could steal her away from him. And although he still wanted to make love to her at every moment, he curbed his urges and waited until she initiated their intimacy. And when she did, he took her slowly and tenderly. She sometimes withdrew to some place inside at such moments, and still he held her, loved her. Although the more passionate and wilder side of him wanted to take her fiercely, needed to touch her, taste her, melt into her slick and heated body, he knew she needed time to truly feel safe once again.

He did not like how things had become. And it was all Jianguo’s fault.

Zuko grit his teeth as rage once again consumed him as it did every time he thought of the bastard. The candles before him flared at his heated emotions. Because of Jianguo, Zuko had almost lost Katara. Twice. And what Katara was going through now was all Jianguo’s fault. A man who could harm a woman in such a way was no man in his opinion. He would make the former general pay with his life.

The firebender was brought out of his murderous thoughts when he heard Katara open the door. He blinked before he frowned because he had failed in his meditation exercises. He would just have to make it up the next morning. Extinguishing the candles, he gracefully stood up from the cushion and turned around. He saw that his wife was wrapped in a towel. Zuko swallowed hard before he looked away from her tempting body in order to rein in his desire to grab her to him, lay her back on the bed, and slip himself inside her. He gave her a strained smile before he turned away. They made small talk as they dressed themselves for the day. Once they were ready, Zuko gently took her hands and leaned down to kiss her cheek before letting her go.

“Mother and Uncle are probably already waiting for us to eat breakfast,” he said as he walked toward the door and opened it for her.
Katara thanked him as she went through before smiling when she spotted Iroh and Ursa already sitting in the antechamber. After a brief greeting, Zuko and Katara sat on their spots and the small family began to eat their breakfast. Ursa and Iroh started a light conversation and Katara soon joined in. Zuko ate in silence as he listened to them, while occasionally observing his wife eat.

“During lunch today, we have to meet a few of the noblewomen in the public garden,” Ursa told Katara with a sympathetic smile.

They laughed quietly when Katara groaned.

“Well, I’ll leave you to that,” Zuko spoke up with a chuckle as he wiped his mouth, “I have a very busy schedule today.”

“Okay, try not to let the advisors upset you,” Katara teased as she smiled at him.

Zuko returned the smile wryly. He reached his hand out to softly squeeze her hand before he stood up. Nodding at his older relatives, Zuko made his way to the doors and left. Katara watched him go with a sad smile. She knew how much their situation was affecting him even though he did not say anything.

“Come,” Ursa said, bringing the waterbender out of her thoughts, “We have to look into a few things before we meet the noblewomen.”

“I will see you ladies at dinner,” Iroh spoke up with a smile as he stood up before he added teasingly, “Good luck with the noblewomen.”

“Thanks, Uncle Iroh,” Katara muttered sarcastically.

Iroh chuckled as he left the room. Ursa and Katara gave each other a disgruntled look before they laughed and stood up. As they left the royal antechamber, they saw Shen and a female guard come to attention. With a smile aimed at them, the Fire Lady and her mother-in-law walked down the corridor with the guards following silently behind. Katara remembered Zuko telling her that Kuo had asked for a few days off because Jiao had not been feeling well for the past week. Katara hoped she was okay.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

With a grim expression, Zuko turned the lock of the heavy, steel door and opened it. He stepped inside the gloomy prison cell before closing the door firmly behind him. He took a second to adjust his eyesight to the darkness. The only light visible was from the torch hanging beside the door. Narrowing his eyes, he strode toward the cell bars that divided the cold room.

“My, what a pleasant surprise,” Ozai’s sarcastic voice echoed in the dark space. “I would have thought you wouldn’t want to see me again after your last visit.”

Zuko clenched his jaw as he remained silent. This time he would not allow his father to distract him from getting the answers he wanted.

He was brought out of his thoughts when Ozai spoke again.

“I heard from the guards you actually got married. How is that waterbender wife of yours?” Ozai asked as he glanced at his nails uninterestingly before he looked up to smirk at his silent son.

Zuko forced himself not to tense at Ozai’s question and remain impassive.

“I bet she satisfies you greatly in bed,” the older man continued with a leer. “Tell me, does she use her waterbending in the bedroom?”

“What my wife and I do is none of your business,” Zuko growled out angrily.

Ozai chuckled as he again looked down at his nails.

“I can’t believe you actually went through with it and married that tribe woman,” Ozai added derisively. He paused before he looked up and lewdly added, “I understand wanting to fuck her and wring out all the pleasure her body can give you, but I can’t understand wanting to actually marry her.”

“I thought I told you I’d cut off your tongue if you ever talked about her in that way,” Zuko growled out angrily as he threateningly lit one hand in fire. “Katara is my wife and she deserves to be respected.”

Ozai eyed his son’s blazing hand warily and with a bit of envy. He missed being able to firebend, he missed the feeling of immense power that coursed through his body as he created fire. He missed many things such as wine, exquisite food, and the pleasure of a woman’s body. He’d preferred if that woman was Ursa, but he also liked to have a bevy of women waiting for his pleasure. But because of Zuko and that child-Avatar, he was stuck to wile his days away in a dirty prison cell. He hated them. He could only hope a day would arrive soon when he could escape his prison and take revenge for what had been done to him. Coming out of his thoughts, Ozai looked away with a shrug and casually paced the length of his cell.

“Tell me what you know of Jianguo,” Zuko ordered firmly. He wanted to know what Jianguo’s plans were so he could keep Katara safe and away from the bastard. He also did not want Ozai to know that Katara was not herself at the moment or that Jianguo and the rebels were targeting Katara and him. He observed his sire’s reaction with deep scrutiny.

“Jianguo?” Ozai asked in confusion before he waved a dismissive hand. “Ah, you mean General Meng. The arrogant man is probably dead by now, which is too bad since he did give me some of the best concubines I ever had.”

Zuko sniffed derisively at the older man’s words.

“I know you are aware that Jianguo participated in the rebellion to overthrow me years ago,” Zuko continue in a harsh tone, “I want you to tell me everything you know about that and what he plans next.”

“Why do you assume I know anything?” Ozai asked with a sneer. “I haven’t set foot outside this wretched place in years,” he growled as he indicated the dirty prison cell he was locked in before he mockingly added, “And even if I did know anything, what makes you think I would tell you?”

The younger man narrowed his eyes and clenched his jaw since his sire made valid points.

“But I’m glad to know that there are still people loyal to the true Fire Lord,” Ozai continue with a smirk. “You just gave me a bit of hope.”

Zuko mentally growled at his slip. It would have been better if he had not told Ozai anything if his sire really did not know.

“I wouldn’t get my hopes up if I were you,” Zuko commented coolly before his tone became hard as he added, “I will not allow them to succeed. When I finally catch those opposing me, they will suffer the consequences, even if they swear their loyalty to me. Your former most trusted advisor will be the first to suffer my wrath.”

“Are you talking about Wei?” Ozai asked uninterestedly as he again inspected his nails before he sniffed, “That coward? If he really wanted to help me, he should’ve made himself useful during the rebellion, but instead he decided to remain an advisor so he could get fatter and richer.”

Zuko narrowed his eyes. He did not know what to make of all that Ozai had said. Was he lying or did he really not know anything about Jianguo? Zuko leaned more toward the idea that what Ozai said was a lie, yet how would his sire know about anything going outside the prison tower? He wanted to ask Ozai what he knew about Jianguo’s plan and the rebels, but he pressed his lips tightly together and remained silent. If for some reason Ozai was truly ignorant about the rebels’ plan in releasing him, then Zuko wanted to keep him as ignorant about it as possible. Besides, he knew that if Ozai really was aware of their plans, then he most assuredly would not divulge anything to his despised offspring. Zuko clenched his hands. He saw Ozai smirk calculately and he glared at his sire warily.

“Something must have happened for you to come to me with such questions,” Ozai mused as he shrewdly observed his now impassive son.

“Why do you say that?” Zuko asked tersely.

“You haven’t bothered to visit me for months now,” Ozai commented casually as he flicked a speck of dust from his shoulder. “So something tragic must have happened for you to come to me.”

He paused before he again looked up to observe his suddenly tense first born. Ozai was silent a moment before a knowing smirk appeared on his dry lips.

“It must be something that made you angry and scared…” he trailed off before he cruelly added, “Did something happen to your lovely wife?”

Zuko suppressed the urge to growl at him as he forced himself not to react violently as the memory hit him once again. He did not want to divulge anything that concerned Katara to Ozai.

“I see I wasted my time coming here,” the young lord finally replied in an expressionless voice.
Without another word, Zuko turned away and headed toward the door.

“Wait!” Ozai called out.

Zuko paused before he looked over his shoulder and lifted an expectant eyebrow.

“Tell me how Ursa is,” Ozai commanded.

Zuko was about to turn back around and ignore the question, but he decided to make his cruel sire suffer a little for all the pain he had caused his mother.

“Mother is doing very well,” Zuko replied coolly. “She is content, much better off than she ever was with you.”

The last thing he saw was Ozai’s pained expression before Zuko opened the steel door and walked out, already regretting wasting his time in visiting Ozai. Locking the door, the Fire Lord frowned as he strode down the long, gloomy hall. If only there was some way he could learn of Jianguo’s whereabouts so he could end the rebel’s life for the suffering Katara was going through. All he could do now for the moment was comfort his wife the best way he could.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After looking over some petition letters from the common people, Katara and Ursa decided to visit the infirmary and Yin-Min, Physician Toshiro’s assistant. Katara wanted to make sure the medicinal supplies she had ordered from Toshiro’s list had already arrived.

After returning to the Fire Nation, Katara had visited the young female assistant to shyly ask for more of the fertile blend, though she wondered how it would work if Zuko and she were barely intimate at the moment. Before the incident in Omashu, she and Zuko had been at each other like squirrel-rabbits, as something Toph would say, making love a couple times a day and almost every night. But now they only had sex a few times a week and sometimes even less than that.

Yin-Min had frowned, expressing her concern for the blend’s ineffectuality, before she agreed to make some more. Katara had visited the next few days and they made small talk since the assistant was still so timid with others. During one of those days, Katara almost had an anxiety attack when one of Physician Toshiro’s patients, suffering from a serious injury, had woken up and mistakenly took Katara as his wife in his delirium. He had jumped from his cot and stumbled toward the frozen waterbender before he collapsed in his weakness. Toshiro and a servant had apologized to their Fire Lady before they rushed to help the man back to the cot.
They had not noticed the waterbender’s fear, but Yin-Min had and she rushed to help her. She took the shaken woman to Toshiro’s office where she then gave the waterbender a soothing tea. Katara had thanked her and quietly drank the tea, ashamed by her reaction. She paused when Yin-Min hesitantly asked her if a man had hurt her. Katara stared at her in shock, but Yin-Min smiled sympathetically and said she understood what it felt like to be afraid of men. After a long hesitation, Katara confided in her what she had gone through in Omashu. Yin-Min had been sympathetic and offered words of comfort and understanding. She was the only one who seemed to understand what Katara was going through. It seemed their experiences, though different, had not only made Yin-Min less timid around Katara but also brought them closer.

The waterbender and her mother-in-law arrived in the infirmary and looked around the spacious room. Katara smiled when she spotted Yin-Min stocking supplies.

“Hello, Yin-Min,” Katara greeted as she approached the woman. “How are you?”

The small woman turned around and gave a small smile as she bowed to the Fire Lady.

“I am well, my lady,” she replied quietly before she worriedly asked, “How are you feeling today?”

“A bit better, thank you,” the waterbender replied vaguely.

Yin-Min smiled softly in understanding before she informed them that the new supplies had arrived and they were being brought in by the servants. For the next few minutes, the three women talked idly as they looked over the supplies that had already been brought in. Katara paused mid-sentence when she felt someone approach her from behind. She spun away as quickly as she had pulled out the water from her waterskin and formed a water whip, her stance aggressive. Her eyes widened as large as the servant’s who was carrying boxes and stopped mid-step at the threat. Ursa and Yin-Min froze in surprise.

“M-my l-lady?” the male servant squeaked.

“I-I…I’m sorry,” the waterbender stammered as she quickly replaced her water and moved away.

“Ah…why don’t you put those boxes over on that desk?” Yin-Min quickly spoke up as she directed the frightened servant to a table far away from the nervous Fire Lady.
The servant quickly set down the boxes before he swiftly walked out of the room.

Katara clenched her eyes shut and sighed deeply, berating herself for her reaction.

“Katara dear, are you all right?” Ursa asked softly as she approached her daughter-in-law and gently placed her hand on her back.

“I don’t know why I keep reacting that way,” Katara hissed between gritted teeth.

“Do not be too hard on yourself, my lady,” Yin-Min spoke up shyly before she painfully added, “At least you are not crying uncontrollably or quivering in fear in a corner whenever a man approaches you.”

Katara opened her eyes to stare wide-eyed at the woman.

“Yin-Min…” she began before she trailed off uncertainly, “Is that how you…reacted?”

The physician’s assistant fidgeted uncomfortably for a moment as she averted her eyes to the floor and cringed. Katara frowned before she opened her mouth to tell her she did not need to answer.

“Yes,” Yin-Min finally confessed and she clenched her trembling hands before her. She closed her eyes and swallowed thickly as she continued, “The constant years of being…raped by O-Ozai instilled a great fear in me at the mere thought of being near a man. I lived in such a state for many years, but fortunately, I am better now.”

“Oh, Yin-Min,” Ursa breathed sadly.

Yin-Min again fidgeted as she hugged herself before she took a deep breath and opened her eyes. She regarded the two women looking at her sympathetically for a long moment, as if debating with herself, before she continued.

“O-Ozai…was not a gentle lover,” she admitted with a shudder of revulsion. “Every time he…made use of my body, he was brutal and relentless. He also had very strange and perverse ways for rutting. And when he was angry, I suffered bruises and burns. He was a cruel man and only sought his own pleasure.”

Yin-Min again shuddered and grimaced as if she were remembering some of those horrible moments. For the next few minutes, she opened enough of herself to painfully recount her past as Ozai’s concubine. Katara and Ursa listened to her story with sadness and anger. Once Yin-Min finished her story, Katara turned to look worriedly at her mother-in-law. The noblewoman noticed the waterbender’s stare and shook her head.

“Ozai never hurt me when we…were together,” Ursa assured her softly before she added, “Perhaps he was afraid of the repercussions if he did so and that is why he sought to have his…more perverse desires satisfied by his concubines.”

After composing herself, Yin-Min shook her head. Ursa frowned confusedly at her.

“He never hurt you because he cared for you,” the young assistant confessed quietly.

“What?” Ursa asked incredulously.

“Sometimes,” Yin-Min continued as she licked her suddenly dry lips, “when Ozai was very drunk he would call your name and would almost be gentle before he…turned even more violent than usual when he realized it was not you he was with. Since we all thought you were dead, the other concubines and I thought he acted that way because he missed you. That or because he felt guilty for what he did to you.”

Clenching her hands to her sides, Ursa narrowed her eyes.

“As he should,” the noblewoman said heatedly, “However, I still believe he would have harmed me if he could. My banishment was both a blessing and a curse.”

The times that Ozai had bedded her in the early years of their marriage, he had only sought his own pleasure. He had not hurt her, but he had not been a gentle or caring lover either. If Ursa thought really hard about it, she could honestly say that she had experience pleasure perhaps a few times. At the time she had been young and inexperienced, and fancied herself to be in love with him so she had not minded his attentions—or inattention, as if were, when it came to herself and her pleasure.
This time it was Katara who laid a comforting hand on the older woman’s back.

“Both of you are lucky for not knowing the cruel touch of a man,” Yin-Min spoke up quietly.

Both Katara and Ursa frowned since they did not know how to respond without making Yin-Min feel worse for what happened to her. Katara felt even more horrible. Even though what Jianguo did to her had traumatized her, he had not succeeded in raping her, yet she was constantly afraid. But Yin-Min had actually suffered endless abuse for years and she was getting better, albeit slowly as was understandable. She was brought out of her thoughts when Yin-Min continued.

“That is why I am so grateful to Fire Lord Zuko for giving me a choice to live my own life,” the young woman confessed with a small smile and a slight blush, “And I vowed to be loyal to him because he is a kind and honorable lord.”

The Fire Lady caught her mother-in-law’s eyes and they smiled proudly before they looked back at the now calm Yin-Min.

It seems that Zuko was the one who started Yin-Min’s process of healing, Katara mused with a smile, And of course, he’s not even aware of what he did.

They were again interrupted when more servants arrived with the last of the medicinal supplies. For the next few minutes, Yin-Min stocked the medicine while Katara and Ursa inspected the boxes and noted down the items on Toshiro’s records. With a thoughtful expression, Katara watched as Yin-Min finished placing the last item on one of the many shelves around the room.

“Yin-Min,” Katara called out before she curiously added, “Have you ever thought of marrying or being in a relationship?”

The young assistant paused before she slowly turned around to face the curious Fire Lady. She again fidgeted with her hands as she tried to gather enough courage to open herself up.

“I…I hated the thought of being with another man for a long while,” Yin-Min admitted with a grimace before she softly added, “But I do want to have a healthy relationship and know what it feels like to be loved.”

Katara saw a small blush had appeared on Yin-Min’s cheeks and her curiosity rose.
“Is there a man you like?” Katara asked with a gentle smile.

Yin-Min’s blush intensified and she averted her eyes shyly as she fidgeted with her apron. After a moment, she raised her eyes to Katara and bashfully nodded her head.

“Yes,” she confessed quietly.

“Have you tried to have some kind of relationship with him yet?” Ursa asked kindly.

“No,” Yin-Min admitted with a grimace.

“Why not?” Katara asked with a frown.

The small woman averted her eyes again and her shoulders hunched a bit as she let out a sad sigh.

“He barely acknowledges my existence,” she muttered before she let out a pained sigh. “Besides, what man would want a woman who has been used and damaged?” she whispered brokenly.

With a small frown, Katara walked up to the dejected woman and laid a comforting hand on her shoulder. Yin-Min looked up in surprise to stare at the Fire Lady’s kind, blue eyes.

“What Ozai did to you was not your fault,” Katara told her softly. She paused since it seemed as if she were comforting herself as well. Shaking her head, the waterbender continued with a smile, “You are young, beautiful, smart, and gentle. If this man doesn’t appreciate it, I’m sure you’ll find that special man who will overlook what happened to you and love you for you.”

Katara watched as Yin-Min’s yellowish eyes began to glisten with tears. Smiling encouragingly, Katara gave her shoulder a soft squeeze as the woman began to cry quietly.

“You are so kind, my lady,” Yin-Min said gratefully, “Thank you for your words.”
Ursa smiled at her daughter-in-law as they waited for the physician assistant to compose herself. Once she did, they talked for a while longer before the Fire Lord’s wife and his mother left the infirmary. As they walked down the golden corridor, Katara again remembered the words she told Yin-Min and tried to apply them to herself. She wanted to get better. She wanted to be herself again.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Lunchtime arrived and Katara found herself surrounded by Fire Nation noblewomen once again. They were sitting on cushions in one of the clearings of the public garden, drinking tea and eating a light lunch as they enjoyed the warm weather. For the next two hours, the blue-eyed Fire Lady forced herself to sit through another session of gossip and fake flattery. Tuning out what the women were talking about, Katara wondered what Zuko was doing. Remembering her conversation with Yin-Min, Katara was grateful that she had such an understanding and honorable man as her husband. If Zuko had been like many other men, he could have cast her aside, if not for being actually raped at least for almost being violated. She thought her heart would have broken if Zuko had reacted in such a way.

She was brought out of her thoughts when her mother-in-law discreetly nudged her elbow. Katara refocused her attention and noticed that the women were expectantly looking at her.

“Uh, excuse me, would you mind repeating that again?” she asked politely.

“We were saying that it would be nice if you hosted a ball soon,” one of the younger women repeated excitedly, “Royal celebrations are the best!”

“Absolutely!” another woman enthused, “It has been a while since there had been a party at the palace!”

Katara mentally sighed as the women continued to chatter. She was not up to having any kind of celebration at the moment. Besides, she knew how much Zuko detested having their home invaded with nobles as much as he hated dancing in public. She almost smiled. Her husband’s taciturn personality was sometimes adorable. When she realized the women were waiting for her response, she cleared her throat to speak.

“I will ask my husband about a possible celebration in the palace,” she replied.

The women exclaimed their excitement with squeals and giggles. They were too busy thinking about what to wear to such an event that they did not realize their Fire Lady had not exactly promised to host a ball. Katara caught her mother-in-law’s amused look and she inwardly grinned. A few minutes later, the women bid their goodbyes with promises of another luncheon before departing. Katara almost sagged with relief. She did not think she will ever get used to them.
“Now we have to look over the list of things that need to be stocked for the kitchen,” Ursa spoke up as she daintily wiped her mouth before she smiled at Katara. “I suppose we can wait another day before we head out to the city for other business.”

Katara gave her a strained smile as they both stood up and walked back down one of the stone paths that led to the palace. Admiral Jee, Shen, and the female guard immediately step behind them. Halfway on their walk, Katara paused when she realized she had forgotten the waterskin Zuko had given her for her birthday. She had taken it off and placed it next to her cushion while she had lunch with the women.

“Is something wrong?” Ursa asked.

“I forgot my waterskin,” Katara told her with a sheepish smile, “I’ll be back.”

She turned around and motioned for the guards to wait for her when they moved to follow her. They frowned but bowed their heads in acquiescence. Walking quickly, Katara retraced her steps and sighed in relief when she saw that the servants had still not arrived to clean the table. She moved to the spot where she had been sitting and smiled when she found her waterskin where she had left it.

She bent down to pick it up only to freeze when the sound of male voices reached her ears. Her hand hovered over the waterskin’s opening before she ordered herself to calm down. She stood up and tied it to her hip as she warily strained her ears to figure out where the men were. She relaxed when she realized they were in the next clearing which was blocked by high, thick shrubberies. Satisfied, she began walking away only to pause when she heard Zuko’s name, but she could not really hear what the men were saying. Curious, she walked closer to the high wall of bushes and silently pressed close so she could make out what they were saying. She recognized the voices as two of Zuko’s advisors and she strained her ears to discern what they were saying.

“…know why Fire Lord Zuko bothers with meetings if he is just going to dismiss us a few minutes later so he could run to his wife,” one of the men said, disapproval heavy in his tone.

“I wonder what happened to Fire Lady Katara,” the other man, a younger one by the sound of his voice, said.

“I don’t know,” the first man replied gruffly before he added, “But she has changed our lord. Now he’s constantly worried about her. She’s a weakness to him. She doesn’t leave the palace and only stays in the western wing. She doesn’t even bother with the charity works like in the beginning.
Maybe she got bored of it.”

“I really believed Lady Katara would have made a fine Fire Lady,” the second man added with a sigh, “But I’m disappointed to see I was wrong.”

Katara bit her lip when she felt a fire of indignation flare within her before she stopped herself from tongue-lashing them. She could not refute their words since they were right. Carefully, she made her way back to where the others were waiting, deep in thought. She gave them a small smile when they turned to look at her.

“Are you okay?” Ursa asked her gently.

Wincing inwardly, Katara plastered a reassuring smile on her face.

“I’m fine,” she replied before she added, “But if you don’t mind, I’d like to rest a bit in the Fire Lady bedchamber before we continue.”

Ursa and Jee turned to frown at each other as they watched the young waterbender leave with her guards.

“Do you think she will ever return to herself?” Ursa asked quietly.

“Only time will tell,” Jee responded before he added reassuringly, “Fire Lady Katara is a strong woman. I have faith that she will surpass whatever is bothering her.”

Ursa smiled. “You are right.”

Entering the remodeled Fire Lady bedchamber, Katara softly closed the door before she slowly looked around one of her favorite rooms in the palace. Even though she had been in this room many times, she never got tired of it. For the past month, it had become her refuge. She smiled. She was so grateful that Zuko had given her such a gift, a way for her to stay connected with her origins and her family. The thought of her family made her smile sadly. She missed them and she wondered when she would be able to see them again.

With a sigh, Katara walked toward one of the plush pile of furs in the room and sat heavily down on it as she repeated the advisors’ words in her head.
Am I really a weakness to Zuko? she thought forlornly to herself.

Such a thought made her realize other things she had tried to avoid. She had been wallowing in fear and self-pity that she had not noticed how badly she was hurting her husband, the one person she wanted to make happy above anything in the world. Hurting him was the last thing she wanted.

Rising to her feet, Katara strode toward the mirror hanging on one wall and shrewdly studied her reflection. She looked at the timid woman before her, at the paler-than-normal tone of her brown skin, at the dark circles under her nervous, blue eyes. She narrowed her eyes and clenched her fists against her sides.

Enough.

She had lived in fear long enough. She had to overcome it so she could move on. If she continued the way she was, she would only allow Jianguo to win. And she refused to allow that to happen. She would try to forget what happened, learn from it, and put it behind her. She would become stronger from it. She would make Zuko stop holding himself back from her for fear of hurting her. She would make him proud. And most of all, she would prove to everybody that she was a strong woman and would be the best Fire Lady that ever was.

She would make those men regret their words.

New determination flared within her and she smiled as she felt she was once again becoming the strong woman she was—maybe one who was even stronger. With one last look at her reflection, Katara squared her shoulders and walked out of her sanctuary. Shen and the female guard immediately came to attention.

“Shen, where is my husband?” Katara asked him as she turned to face him expectantly.

Shen’s gray eyes widened a bit in surprise at his lady’s former strong-willed tone before he composed himself.

“I believe he is in his study before his next meeting commences,” he informed her quickly.
With a nod, Katara determinedly walked down the long corridor and made her way toward Zuko’s study. Shen followed bewilderingly behind her, though he was glad to see his lady’s former spirit return.

Sitting behind his large desk, Zuko carefully looked over a stack of documents before the upcoming meeting with his advisors. He knew some of them were upset with him and his behavior, but he did not let that bother him since he was not completely neglecting his duties. He still had Wei on watch, but the old advisor had not done anything suspicious. Zuko frowned. Perhaps he should stop laying the blame on the one advisor he disliked just because he had no other suspects in mind.

When he came upon the last scroll, Zuko eagerly broke the seal once he realized it was from his captain stationed in the colonies. As he finished reading it, he angrily pushed it away with an angry snarl. His captain reported that they still could not find any clues about Jianguo’s whereabouts or any of his rebels.

They are hiding again like the cowards they are, Zuko thought with a sneer before he growled and banged his fist on the desk.

A few days ago, Zuko had received a letter from Aang saying he and Toph were also looking for Jianguo whenever they had the chance, but they have not had any luck. Zuko appreciated their help. Iroh had informed him that the Order of the White Lotus had also not found any clues. Zuko sighed.

Where could Jianguo and the rebels be?

Zuko clenched his hands and smoke rose from them. If only he could track Jianguo down to beat him within an inch of his life before he slowly killed the bastard. But then that meant he would have to leave Katara behind and that was something he would not do, especially since it could give Jianguo an opportunity to kidnap her again. Zuko knew that the only reason Jianguo had failed in his first attempt to capture him and Katara and his second attempt to kidnap Katara was thanks to Jianguo’s overconfidence. But Zuko could not rely on that to keep Katara and his nation safe. But once his men found Jianguo, Zuko would make him pay with his life for all the harm he had done.

The Fire Lord was interrupted from his thoughts when he heard a knock at his door.

Frowning, he called out an impassive ‘enter’. When he heard the door open, he looked up and his eyes widened when he saw Katara enter the room. His cool mask fell and was replaced by a warm expression.

“Katara,” he called out softly as he stood up from his large chair as she approached.
He paused when he noticed that his now skittish wife had been replaced by the former strong woman he married. His eyebrows rose in surprise at the fire he saw in her once dull eyes. Snapping out of his stupor, he rounded the desk to meet her.

“What’s the matter?” he asked.

Katara stopped before her husband and looked determinedly up into his curious, golden eyes.

“I want you to train me to fight and defend myself,” she told him firmly without any hesitation.

“What?” Zuko asked in bewilderment.

“I can defeat anyone with my waterbending,” she continued resolutely before she frowned, “But twice now I have come to realize that without my waterbending, I’m weak.”

Zuko opened his mouth to argue, but he stopped when she held out a hand. He frowned.

“You know it’s true,” she told him.

The firebender’s frown deepened.

“You don’t need to worry anymore,” he spoke up comfortably, “You’re safe now.”

“You can’t guarantee that even if you really wish to,” she replied truthfully.

Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“You don’t believe I can keep you safe?” he growled out.
Frowning, Katara stepped closer to him and placed a gentle hand on his chest.

“That’s not what I meant,” she told him softly, “I know you can keep me safe. I feel protected when I’m with you, but we can never be sure of the future.”

When Zuko continued to frown, Katara ran soothing caresses on his chest as she stared up into his piercing, amber eyes.

“Even if we take all the precautions possible, something could happen when we least expect it,” she reasoned before she continued firmly, “I want to be prepared. I never want to feel vulnerable and weak again. I never want to find myself in a helpless position, waiting to be rescued.” She paused briefly before she softly added, “What if next time you don’t make it in time?”

A pained expression flashed across Zuko’s face at the thought. It was a fear that he now constantly carried with him.

“I don’t want to be a weakness and a liability to you, Zuko,” Katara continued as she stared sincerely into his eyes.

“You are not a weakness,” he replied with a frown.

“Many of your advisors think otherwise,” she replied with a grimace.

Growling, Zuko narrowed his eyes.

“Who told you that?” he asked angrily.

Katara shook her head and waved her hand dismissively.

“That doesn’t matter, what matters is that I refuse to be a timid and weak wife,” she told him firmly, “I refuse to continue living in fear. I want to be like how I was before. I want to be stronger.”

Zuko was silent as he thought over what his wife said before he finally acknowledged to himself that she was right. Even if he swore to himself that he would keep her safe, anything could happen. Life was unpredictable like that. And what if next time he did not make it in time to save her? He closed his eyes to bear the pain and fear at that possibility before he opened his eyes to look down at his wife patiently waiting for him to reply. He admired her determination. He could not begrudge her wish to become stronger and her desire to defend him from what his men thought of him. He would help her become stronger and he would help her get her confidence in herself back.

“I agree with everything you said, Katara,” he told her sincerely, “You have my complete assistance and support.”

Zuko saw Katara relax immediately at his words and she smiled brightly at him before she wrapped her arms around his waist and embraced him tightly. He quickly returned her embrace.

“Thank you, Zuko,” she sighed.

Zuko swallowed as he tried to rein in the sudden flare of arousal that sprang within him at the feeling of her in his arms. He wished he could ease her back onto his large desk, raise her dress over her hips and make love to her like he had done before. Zuko mentally shook his head. He should not get ahead of himself. Just because Katara was determined to become stronger did not necessarily mean she was ready for any wild trysts. With a sigh, he held her tenderly against him.

“I can’t prohibit your wish to better yourself,” he admitted to her softly.

He pulled away slowly and stared down into her cobalt eyes.

“What do you wish to learn?” he asked.

“Hand-to-hand combat,” Katara replied immediately, “In case I can’t waterbend and have no weapons, I want to know how to defend myself against a larger opponent.”

“That is a good choice,” Zuko replied with a nod.

Katara smiled. She was glad to know that Zuko wanted to help her better herself and become stronger instead of keeping her hidden in the palace to keep her safe from the outside world. She knew he would understand that she needed to do this.
“Thank you, Zuko,” she said as she snuggled into his warmth.

“What is there to thank?” he asked.

When Katara raised her head to look at him, Zuko leaned down to kiss her gently. With a soft sigh, Katara pressed herself closer to him and slowly parted her lips. She moaned happily when her firebender quickly slipped his tongue into her inviting mouth and deepened their kiss. When he crushed her to him so tightly that her breasts ached at the hard contact with his chest, she groaned in approval. Maybe this time Zuko would have no qualms in making love to her however and whenever he wished. She felt her body warm at the memory of Zuko taking her on his desk and she wondered if he would do so again right at the moment.

A knock at the door interrupted them and they quickly pulled apart. Cursing under his breath, Zuko growled frustratingly as he let go of his tempting wife before he moved back to sit on his chair. With a sigh, Katara sat on the chair across from him.

“Enter,” Zuko called out gruffly.

They watched as the door opened before they relaxed when they saw Kuo allow Jiao to go ahead of him before he entered and closed the door after him. They both bowed to their lord and lady before they approached closer.

“How are you feeling, Jiao?” Zuko inquired after Katara had greeted them.

“I’m feeling better, my lord,” Jiao responded with a small smile.

“I was worried when my husband told me you weren’t feeling well,” Katara spoke up as she smiled kindly at her maidservant, “But I’m glad to know that you are fine.”

Katara and Zuko watched curiously as a large, happy smile stretched Jiao’s lips.

“I am more than fine, my lady,” she assured them.
The royal couple looked at her wonderingly before they turned their attention to Kuo when he cleared his throat.

“My lord,” he began as he straightened himself, “I would like to ask for your permission for my wife to have a lighter workload for now.”

Zuko frowned at the request.

“Is something wrong?” Katara asked worriedly as she again turned to look at Jiao.

“No,” Kuo quickly assured them.

“Then what is the reason for your request?” the Fire Lord asked.

Zuko and Katara watched as a blush stained Jiao’s pale cheeks and Kuo puffed out his chest in pride.

“I’m pregnant,” Jiao announced with a shy smile before she added, “I’m three months along and we didn’t even know until a few days ago.”

“Oh, Jiao, congratulations!” Katara exclaimed as she rose from her seat to grasp the woman’s hands before she turned to smile at Kuo. “Congratulations, Kuo!”

“Thank you, my lady,” Kuo responded with a small, joyful smile.

The three turned their attention back to the Fire Lord when he congratulated them from his spot behind the large desk. When he caught his waterbender’s pointed look, he cleared his throat.

“Because of both your loyal services I will concede to your wishes,” Zuko told them before he looked at Jiao. “If you wish it you can focus on easy things before becoming my wife’s lady companion when it becomes more difficult later on in your pregnancy.”

“Thank you, my lord,” they both said in unison as they bowed respectfully before they smiled at the blue-eyed woman. They knew their Fire Lady was a large factor that helped convince the Fire Lord to grant their request.

After a few more congratulations and curious questions from Katara, the young couple once again bowed in gratitude before they departed. Once the door was closed behind them, the waterbender sat back down with a smile on her face.

“At least there are some good things among the bad,” she commented with a soft sigh as she looked at him.

Zuko nodded at her words before he stopped when a thought crossed his mind. He gazed at her for a short moment and watched as she looked at him wonderingly at his silence.

“Your sacrifice was worth it,” he spoke up quietly.

When she frowned at him incomprehensibly, he gave her a small, proud smile.

“If you had not listened to Jianguo’s demand, not only would Jiao have been harmed, but her unborn child, too,” he explained softly.

Katara’s eyes widened at the thought. If she had refused to follow Jianguo’s orders, the rebels would have raped and tortured Jiao. The abuse might have caused Jiao to lose her baby as well as her own life. Katara would not have been able to live with herself if she had been the cause of Jiao losing her child. The truth of such a thought made her make peace with what happened and brought her confidence back in herself. Jianguo might have hurt her, he might have almost succeeded in violating her, but she had been strong enough to save two innocent lives. And now she was more determined than ever to learn how to defend herself so she would not put others and herself at risk.

“You’re right,” she finally replied and she smiled brightly at him.

At the sight of her smile, a true one and not one that was forced, Zuko felt relief once again consume him. They may have gone through a tough time, Katara especially, but now he was convinced that everything would be better.

“Jiao and Kuo seem very happy with the news of their upcoming parenthood,” Zuko remarked as he smiled at her.
“They are,” Katara agreed.

Her genuine smile faded and was replaced with a frown. Kuo and Jiao’s news reminded her that her monthly bleeding had ended the previous week, signifying another month in which she had not gotten pregnant yet. Why? She had taken Yin-Min’s herbs regularly. Why had she still not gotten with child?

“What’s wrong, love?” Zuko asked worriedly when he noticed her happy mood suddenly change.

“It’s nothing,” Katara quickly assured him as she tried to give him a reassuring smile.

“Please don’t lie to me, Katara,” he told her with a frustrated frown.

Averting her eyes, Katara fidgeted with her hands before she let out a small sigh.

“Their news just reminded me that I haven’t given you an heir yet,” she confessed quietly.

The firebender was silent a moment as he stared at her.

“Come here, Katara,” Zuko commanded gently.

Katara looked at him and watched as he opened his arms for her. She quickly stood up and walked around the large desk before sitting sideways on his lap, winding her arms around his neck. Zuko wrapped his arm around her and pressed her close to him. He leaned his head down to touch his lips to her head before he tucked it under his chin.

“Maybe it is for the best,” he began softly, “Who knows what could have happened if you were pregnant when…everything happened.”

Katara was silent for a moment as his words sunk in before she relaxed into his comforting and warm embrace.
“You’re right, Zuko,” she responded.

She felt him lift his head and she looked up into his reassuring, golden eyes. He reached a hand up and caressed her cheek with the back of his fingers before he smiled at her.

“Besides, we’ve been married for a little over two months,” he reminded her, “We still have plenty of time to have a child.”

Katara felt her heart ease a little at his words and she smiled at him.

“That’s true,” she relented before she excitedly added, “I just can’t wait to have our child in my arms.”

“And we will one of these days,” he assured her with a smirk, which widened when Katara grinned at him.

Expression softening, Zuko leaned down and kissed her softly. Katara sighed into his mouth and wrapped her arms tighter around his neck as she pressed herself closer to him. They shared slow and tender kisses before the firebender pulled away. They gazed silently into each other’s eyes for a moment before Zuko broke the sudden comforting spell that had befallen them.

“We will start your training tomorrow,” he informed her, his expression turning serious.

Katara’s eyes blazed with determination.

“I’ll be ready,” she said firmly.

“Very good, Katara,” Zuko praised as Katara deflected his strike with an upright thrust of her arm. “Remember to strike back aggressively, quickly and with as much force as you can to defend yourself.”

When Katara moved her arm to strike his face, Zuko grasped her arm to stop her. However, Katara twisted out of his grip and struck out with a raised knee. Zuko had barely enough time to jump back before getting hit on his stomach. Panting, he nodded approvingly and Katara smiled even as she quickly assumed a fighting stance and awaited his next move.

A week had passed since Zuko began Katara’s lessons in hand-to-hand combat. It was early in the morning and they were currently training in the large arena. Off to the side, Iroh sat on a bench watching silently or occasionally pointing out things and giving advice. He was proud to see his nephew teaching Katara the way Iroh had taught Zuko when he was younger. The old man was also happy to see that his niece-in-law had bravely pulled herself out of her fear and was determined to become stronger.

Although Katara needed a lot of practice and time before she could become truly skillful in the art, Zuko was proud to admit that she was a fast and avid learner. Her waterbending skills leant much help in her agility. He was sure that in a couple of years she would reach his high level, but for now the basics will help her enough to keep her safe from anyone who tried to attack her if she were unable to use her waterbending. Although he admitted that Katara made a good point in arguing that they cannot be sure what the future might bring despite their precautions, Zuko was determined that he would do everything he could to protect her.

“Good,” Zuko called out a few minutes later before he straightened from his fighting stance.

Panting, Katara imitated his actions and waited to see what he would teach her next. She had never bothered in learning close combat nor had it appeal to her because she had emphasized much of her fighting power in her waterbending. But as Zuko continued to teach her, she found that it was exhilarating, though perhaps a little too violent for her. But it would help her greatly if she ever found herself unable to waterbend—though she hoped she would never find herself in such a situation again. To be able to defend herself another way would reassure her greatly.

“Now I’ll teach you some of the most familiar pressure points,” Zuko began as he walked forward to stand closer in front of her.

Katara nodded as she paid close attention.

“The human body has many different points that can cause a great deal of pain when hit appropriately,” Zuko instructed. “Hitting your opponent’s eyes is not only very painful, but it can temporarily damage his vision, giving you time to escape.” He demonstrated by grabbing her arm and showing her how to strike. “Landing a blow squarely on the forehead with sufficient pressure can knock your attacker’s head back and cause whiplash.” He again showed her how to move and where to hit. “Punching the nose with great strength can lead to a fracture and bleeding. Striking the collarbone with enough force can break it, thus incapacitating your opponent entirely. A hard kick to the knee or groin is usually enough to bring your attacker down.”
They spent a few more minutes practicing before Zuko finally called an end to it. Relaxing, Katara smiled at her husband confidently, already anticipating her next lesson. They walked back to the bench where Iroh was sitting and drank water from the cups the servants rushed forward to give them. As Katara quenched her thirst, her eyes again focused on Zuko’s profile. His hair, which was now long enough to reach his shoulders, was pulled up into a high ponytail at the moment. A light sheen of perspiration clung to his temples and neck, reminding her of the same sight when they were striving to achieve their pleasurable climaxes. Zuko caught her eye, and knowing what she was thinking, a small smirk curled his lips.

“You are doing wonderful, my dear,” Iroh praised as he smiled at Katara, effectively bringing the couple out of their naughty thoughts.

“Thank you, Uncle Iroh,” the waterbender replied happily.

“Have you given thought to learning how to wield a weapon?” the old man asked musingly. “Hand-to-hand combat will help you fight in a close range, which can become a problem if your attacker is stronger and more skillful. With a weapon you can defend yourself at a safer distance.”

Katara frowned at the thought as she hesitated to answer.

“I don’t know,” she replied with a grimace, “I can’t bring myself to use a weapon to harm or kill anyone.”

She looked up when Zuko laid a firm hand on her shoulder.

“You will have to, if it means your life against your attacker’s,” he told her grimly, “If you hesitate in bringing him down, he will hurt you and…kill you. He would surely not care in sparing your life.”

“I know,” Katara responded with a sigh.

Zuko frowned.

“You should take some time to think about it, my dear,” Iroh spoke up. He completely agreed with his nephew that Katara should learn to use a weapon so she could be better protected. “Perhaps you can discuss this with your husband later when you are more adept in close combat.”
Katara nodded since she knew both of them were right. She just needed time to get used to the idea. Her waterbending defeated many assailants, but it did not actually cause any great harm or threatened any lives. But if she actually used a weapon against anybody she would not only hurt them but would directly end their lives as well. It was not something she would be able to easily do considering she was a healer who fought to save lives. Yet, she also understood that if it came to protecting someone she cared for and herself, she would have no choice.

“I will think about it,” she replied.

“Good,” Iroh said with a smile. They both glanced toward Zuko when he cleared his throat.

“I may not be able to train you every day, Katara, so I asked Uncle if he could help you when I can’t,” Zuko informed her.

“I understand,” she told with a reassuring smile. “I trust Uncle will teach me many things.”

Zuko nodded before he carefully asked, “I also wanted to ask if you wouldn’t mind if Admiral Jee trained you in developing your strength. He is the only one I trust for such a job.”

Katara stiffened at the suggestion before she ordered herself to relax. She needed to get rid of this sudden fear of men. Jee was not a bad person and not all men were malevolent like Jianguo. She had promised herself that she would become stronger and she could not always depend on Zuko to come save her. She had been fine defending herself without him before and she would do so again. Besides, she did not want Zuko to ever be hurt because he was protecting her.

“Alright,” she agreed firmly.

If Zuko was surprised at her answer, he did not show it.

“Good. I’ll ask Jee when I see him today,” he said.

Katara nodded before she smiled at Zuko then at Iroh who reassured her that Jee would be a great instructor when Zuko was not around.
“How about a sparring match using our bending?” the Fire Lord challenged Katara with a smirk.

“You’re on,” the waterbender replied with a grin as she quickly grabbed the waterskin she had placed on the bench and tied it to her waist.

Smiling, Iroh watched as his nephew and his niece-in-law took on their stances. When it came to her waterbending, Katara was an admirable warrior, equally as skillful as her husband.

As Zuko evaded one of her attacks, Katara smiled confidently. She would become stronger. She knew Zuko vowed that he would kill Jianguo when he found him and she would not stop him. But if Jianguo ever tried to kidnap her again, he would realize his mistake for underestimating her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The loud crash of the wooden chair hitting the wall followed by vicious curses did not faze Chang while it made Ping flinch beside him as they watched their leader vent his anger at the room they had rented in an obscure tavern. They had stayed at the small lodgings with the money Jianguo had saved up from their informant and waited for Jianguo to heal from the wounds he had suffered in the hands of the enraged Fire Lord. They had made sure to keep to themselves so as not to raise any suspicions, but the wretched villagers barely paid them any mind. They had never seen Jianguo lose control of his temper so drastically before, it left them stunned. Ping took a step back when Jianguo flung the only small table in the room against the wall, but Chang remained still and emotionless as he waited for their leader to calm himself down.

Chang’s mind wandered, not for the first time, to the woman that had accompanied the blue-eyed Fire Lady. Jiao was what the waterbender called her and he could not stop thinking about her. She resembled his beloved Aiko so much that he was left speechless and astounded when he laid eyes on her. Three years had passed since Aiko passed away from a malady of the lungs, an illness that caused her much pain until her last dying breath, a sickness he was unable to save her from. He had loved her so much that her death had numbed him completely, so much so that no other woman had been able to arouse anything from him except for the occasional, mild lust. But then this Jiao suddenly appeared in his life and emotions he thought long dead were beginning to awaken. He knew Jiao was not Aiko, but that did not stop him from wanting her all for himself, so much so that he fought the other rebels from touching her. For some strange reason he had decided to woo her during their journey to their hideout and make her come to care for him.

But to his surprise and anger it seemed she was already spoken for when her husband appeared and attacked him. Even though Jiao was already married, Chang had refused to give her up and fiercely attacked the firebender, hoping to kill him, but the man was too skilled. It was only after he realized that they were losing that Chang decided it was best he found Jianguo and retreated. With one last longing look aimed at the golden-eyed beauty, Chang had submerged himself into the ground and disappeared only to emerge again in another location to see the Fire Lord brutally attacking Jianguo.
Chang and Ping rescued their leader before they again submerged themselves in the ground as their only route of escape. They would have succeeded in capturing the Fire Lady, have the Fire Lord meet their demands, and Jiao would have been his, if only Jianguo had not allowed his obsession and lust in having the waterbending woman take control of him.

“I was this close to getting my revenge and achieving our goal, but Zuko, that fucking bastard, had to ruin everything!” Jianguo growled as he kicked another chair out of his way.

“Da bastard was lucky,” Ping spoke up in hopes to restore his leader’s good humor, which he knew was not likely since Jianguo had been in a foul mood ever since the Fire Lord thwarted their attempts to kidnap the Fire Lady.

“We would have succeeded if you had heeded my advice to leave as soon as we had the waterbender,” Chang spoke up as if Ping had not spoken. Ignoring the annoyed glare the large-jawed earthbender sent him, Chang stared levelly at Jianguo when the firebender slowly turned to look at him.

“What?” Jianguo asked angrily.

“If you would have waited a few more hours instead of insisting on having the woman at that moment, Zuko would not have come upon us and ruined our plan,” Chang continued emotionlessly.

“Shut up!” the firebender growled.

“You know I am right,” the former Dai Li agent stated evenly, his green eyes hinting at nothing.

“Get out!” Jianguo snarled as he picked up a vase and hurled it at the wall next to the tall earthbender.

Ping jumped at the impact before he scrambled toward the door, but Chang remained unmoving as the ceramic vase shattered into pieces behind him.

“The waterbending woman has addled your mind,” Chang spoke up again, not at all afraid of the older man. “You would not have made such a mistake before.”
“I told you to shut the hell up, Chang,” Jianguo growled at him as his golden eyes narrowed into irritated slits.

Chang raised an eyebrow in challenge, but remained silent. Taking a deep breath, Jianguo tried to rein in his temper and regain his composure. He was glad that none of his other men were there to witness his rare display of temper. He, Chang, and Ping were the only ones to escape when Zuko and his companions had come upon them unexpectedly. One of his men would have survived if Jianguo had not ordered Ping to kill him before the man revealed anything to the Fire Lord. But dammit, he had been so close to achieving everything he wanted!

“Now we know what happened to our informant in the Fire Nation, so we must come up with a new plan,” Jianguo said as he straightened out his shirt.

“Will you give up on the waterbender?” the green-eyed earthbender asked.

“No,” was Jianguo’s simple and firm response.

Chang frowned, but before he could say anything Jianguo turned away from him.

“Make sure you and Ping rest for we leave to our hideout tomorrow at dawn,” he said dismissively.

“Very well,” Chang replied passively as he turned toward the door and closed it lightly behind him.

Jianguo walked across the room to pick up his bottle of liquor from the old bureau resting against the wall. He paused when he caught sight of his reflection on the dirty mirror that hung above it. He felt his anger spike once again as he saw the fading bruises on his pale skin, bruises that insolent whelp had inflicted on him when Jianguo was about to enjoy the waterbender. With a growl, he smashed his fist into the mirror, creating cracks on its surface. Ignoring the sting of the glass cutting his flesh, he walked to the other side of the room.

Jianguo stared out the window into the dark night. He took a drink of the sweet liquor as his thoughts once again became lost in the memory of having the woman he was obsessing over trapped beneath him. He vowed that he would make Zuko suffer and have his revenge, but most importantly he vowed that he would capture the beautiful waterbender again. Now that he knew how incredible she felt, how sweet she smelled, how utterly erotic everything about her was by just having held her, he could not wait to find out how much more incredible it would be once he took her completely. He vowed to capture Katara again one day and she would be his, Zuko would suffer greatly, their plan would succeed, and this time Zuko would not be able to take her back.
Zuko let out a low groan as the energy of the dawning sun stirred him into the waking world. His still drowsy mind registered the fact that at some time during the night Katara and he had changed positions and he was now curled behind her. His left arm enfolded her body, holding her closely against him, while his right hand that curved underneath her was cupping her breast. Her nightgown must have ridden up during the night because he had somehow managed to insert his shaft between her thighs, pressed against warm, soft, and invitingly moist female flesh. He groaned when his semi-erect cock rose and hardened fully.

Still not fully awake, his knee pushed against Katara’s, forcing hers to bend and her leg to shift upward. His cock sought entrance to his paradise, but somehow his still hazy mind wanted to ensure that Katara was ready for his invasion and would enjoy it.

His right hand slipped inside her nightgown and captured her naked breast more firmly, squeezing the tantalizing mound and teasing her nipple. His other hand caressed up and down her body before grasping her other bare breast to reward the other nipple the same attention. As he stroked her breasts to life, Zuko began to slowly rock his hips so his stiff cock massaged her feminine folds as well as to stimulate his own pleasure. He groaned, and his heart quickened its beat in his arousal before he moved his left hand down her belly and further south. Through his sleepy mind, he heard Katara gasp softly and then moan when his fingers touched the sensitive bud above her entrance.

When he felt her aroused cream coat the length of his cock, he again shifted her leg before he slowly buried himself inside her tight, wet pussy. They both moaned at the delicious sensation as his hard flesh stretched her slick, warm walls. His lips latched onto her slender neck and shoulder, kissing, sucking, and nipping while his hands continued to stroke her body. When Katara breathed out his name as she pressed her hips back against him, Zuko’s thrusting became more persistent. He continued to ram his hard shaft inside her over and over again, his movements interrupted by sporadic groans, growls, and grunts. He again grasped her breasts firmly and sucked the skin of her neck even harder.

Gasping, his wife lifted one of her hands over her head and placed it on his head for support. Her fingers clenched his hair at his every thrust. Zuko’s dazed mind instinctively interpreted her movement as a sign of complete surrender and a victorious growl escaped him as he crushed her closer to him. The dominance of the position, his control over her delicate body, and the feeling of her clenching, wet walls, excited him beyond measure. With a thunderous growl, he began to thrust ruthlessly inside her, the sound of their flesh slapping as his pelvis and balls smacked against her firm ass resounded loudly in the room.

A few moments later, he felt Katara suddenly tense before she cried out incoherently. The sensation of her wet passage quivering around his cock immediately brought forth his own orgasm and he groaned harshly as he spilled himself inside her. He licked and kissed her neck soothingly as he continued to thrust into her until he completely released his seed inside of her. Once he was completely spent, he slumped against her perspiring back. He could feel his wife panting equally as hard as him as sleep finally left him.

Increasing Power

His eyes snapped open in alarm.

Oh no. What had he done?

Having been awakened from a deep sleep by his own desires, he did not have the necessary degree of awareness to protect Katara from his baser instincts and urges he promised himself he would suppress so as not to harm her. He slowly pulled himself out of her and she mewed weakly. Lifting himself up a little, Zuko slowly moved her onto her back, worriedly searching her face for any sign of distress.

Two months had passed since Jianguo’s attack in Omashu, and although Katara was returning to her old self, he was still afraid that he would trigger her fear of sexual intercourse. Which was why he continued to allow Katara to initiate their intimacy and he was always gentle when they came together. But this morning he had forgotten his promise and he had taken her like a mindless beast. Could she forgive him?

Looking up from beneath her suddenly silent husband, Katara frowned at his concerned expression. She had been stirred awake by her body responding to her husband’s caresses, but had come fully to her senses when he entered her. Her heart and body had rejoiced at their passionate joining. She had been reveling at the fact that Zuko had finally let himself go and loved her as fiercely as he had before the incident, but seeing his anxiety now made the glow of what happened minutes before diminish a bit.

“What’s wrong?” she asked hesitantly.

“I’m sorry for taking you like that,” he apologized in a strained tone, “I—”

Katara quickly placed her fingers against his lips to stop him. Zuko’s frown deepened.

“You have to stop, Zuko,” she told him firmly.

Zuko’s heart sank at her words. Did she resent him?
“Stop what?” he whispered apprehensively.

“You treating me like glass that will shatter at the slightest touch,” she replied firmly yet softly as she caressed his cheek.

Zuko gently grasped her hand and brought it to his lips to kiss her knuckles.

“Yes, I was fragile before,” the waterbender continued, “but I’m better and I refused to be treated like a frail woman. I want to be and feel stronger, but I won’t if you continue to fear hurting me.”

When her husband continued to look at her silently and uncertainly, Katara decided to bring up something she knew would help her cause. Bringing her other hand between them, she placed it on his chest and slowly began to caress his smooth muscles as she stared seductively, intensely, into his golden eyes.

“I miss you loving me roughly, possessively, taking my body completely,” she whispered throatily before she purred, “Don’t you?”

“Gods yes,” Zuko groaned huskily.

He swiftly leaned his head down and kissed her deeply, wrapping an arm around her to pull her up against him. Katara moaned into his mouth as she wound her arms around his neck, but she whimpered in disappointment when he pulled away.

“I…I will to think about it,” he rasped before he moved away from her.

Katara opened her mouth to argue, but was interrupted when he shook his head and gave her a strained smile. Sighing, Katara nodded her head. She understood that Zuko was just trying to protect her and was having a hard time. He just needed time to see that there was nothing she could fear from him.

“We should hurry so we can train in the arena before I have to meet with the Earth Kingdom’s ambassadors,” he prompted her as he stood up from the large bed and walked toward their big wardrobe.
The blue-eyed brunette reluctantly got out of the bed. Smoothing her nightgown down, she went to wash up. When will Zuko be comfortable enough to let himself go and love her fiercely? It was not that she did not love the moments when he loved her tenderly because she truly did, but they were both passionate people and it was incredible, almost magical, when they came together in their ardent and frenzy need.

She almost laughed at the reversal of their roles. Now it was she who was trying to persuade Zuko into sex and he was the one who was being hesitant. But she would not pressure him too much. He had done more than enough for her these past months. She knew he was just trying to protect her, even from himself.

“Are you ready?” she heard Zuko ask a few minutes later.

“Yes,” she replied with a determined smile.

For the early part of the morning, they spent their time training in the arena. Katara found that she really was not that bad in hand-to-hand combat. Her waterbending had lent her dexterity and fast reflexes, but she still needed to work on her physical strength that would help her push or throw a heavier attacker away from her. That was what Jee was helping her with when Zuko could not train her. Jee had her lift light weights to build her strength; she had refused to lift heavier ones for fear of having unfeminine, bulging muscles. His lessons also included exercises to build up her endurance.

“I think that’s enough for today,” Zuko spoke up as he wiped the sweat from his forehead with his forearm.

Panting, Katara dropped her fighting stance and placed her hands on her hips as she waited for her breathing and heartbeat to slow down.

“You’re getting better and better,” the Fire Lord complimented proudly.

“I should be, having you as my instructor,” the waterbender replied with a grin.

“You do make a good point,” Zuko responded with a smirk.

Katara laughed as she shook her head at his arrogance before her expression turned serious. Zuko’s humor subsided at her change of mood and he frowned.

“What is it?” he asked.

“Zuko,” she began carefully before she continued more firmly, “I want to spar with you while you use your white fire.”

“What?” Zuko exclaimed with wide eyes before he quickly shook his head. “No.”

“Why not?” she asked exasperatedly. “You are able to control it now. Besides, going against such a high level firebender can only improve my waterbending skills.”

When her husband continued to shake his head, Katara placed her hands on her hips.

“We don’t have to go full on battle mode,” she said, “We can start slow with small fighting exercises.”

Zuko was silent a moment as he frowned at her before he sighed at her determined expression.

“What if…what if I hurt you?” he asked quietly, anxiously.

Katara’s expression softened and she stepped forward to cup his cheek.

“You won’t,” she said confidently.

When he remained skeptical, she gave him a small smile and wound her arms around him. The young lord immediately wrapped her in his arms and pulled her tightly against him.

“If you do accidentally hurt me, I can always heal myself,” she assured him.

Zuko remained silent for a long moment as he debated what Katara had said before he decided she was right. It would also be fun to be able to spar with someone using his white fire instead of practicing alone. Besides, he had to stop letting fear rule him.

“Allright,” he consented as he pulled her back slightly to look down at her. “We will start slow, but you have to promise me that you will not push yourself beyond your limit.”

“I promise,” Katara told him as she smiled happily at him, “Thank you, Zuko.”

They spent the next few minutes stretching and cooling down before they walked back to the side of the arena where servants rushed forward with water and towels. Idly talking about Zuko’s upcoming meeting with the ambassadors and Katara’s next duty as Fire Lady, they walked back to their bedchamber to bathe before they ate breakfast in the adjoining room.

“I’ll see you later,” the golden-eyed firebender said once they finished their meal.

“Okay,” Katara responded as they both stood up and walked toward the door.

Before Zuko opened it, he turned toward her. He gently grabbed her upper arms and pulled her closer to him before he bent his head to kiss her softly. Katara sighed as she pressed herself tightly to him and eagerly kissed him back.

“I really wish I could make love to you anytime I want to, just like before,” he whispered against her lips, “But I’m afraid you would regret it if I did. I don’t want to be selfish. I don’t want to hurt you.”

“I know,” Katara replied with a soft sigh. “I just wish you could have more faith in my mental and emotional strength.”

They pulled apart and stared intensely and silently into each other’s eyes. Reaching a hand up, he stroked her cheek and she leaned into his touch.

“I promise I will think about it,” he told her.

Katara nodded before she gave him an understanding smile. They were interrupted when they heard a soft knock at the door. Straightening himself, Zuko gave her one last smile before he opened the door. They watched as Jiao paused with a raised fist ready to knock a second time before she gave a shallow bow due to her condition.
“Good morning, my lord, my lady,” she greeted with a polite smile.

“Good morning, Jiao,” Zuko replied as he stepped around her to exit the room, but not before throwing his waterbender one last lingering look.

“Are you ready to meet with Lady Ursa, my lady?” Jiao asked once the Fire Lord left.

“Yes,” Katara replied with a smile as she observed the maidservant.

Jiao was already showing signs of her pregnancy. Her belly was more visible than it had been the month before and there was a glow in her golden eyes.

“How are you feeling, Jiao?” Katara asked as they walked out of the room and headed down the long corridor.

“A little tired,” Jiao admitted truthfully with a sheepish smile before she added fondly, “But I’m very happy.”

Katara watched Jiao place her hands on her growing stomach. Again the waterbender wondered when it would be her turn. She took a moment to fantasize about what her first child would look like. Would he or she have Zuko’s black hair or her brown locks, Zuko’s golden eyes or her blue ones? The possibilities made her smile in anticipation.

The two women walked in search of Lady Ursa so they could go over the Fire Lady’s new project; remodeling the city orphanage and supplying the children with much needed aid. Katara smiled when she spotted her mother-in-law talking to one of the youngest advisors, with Jee standing attentively at her side. Katara raised an eyebrow when she noticed the dark look Jee was sending the oblivious advisor. As she approached them, she watched Jee compose himself as they all turned to greet her. After requiring after her well-being, the advisor excused himself with a respectful bow before he retreated.

“Are you ready to go, Ursa?” Katara asked with a smile.

“Yes, of course, dear,” the older woman replied as she returned the smile.
The Fire Lady and her mother-in-law led the way down the corridor toward the palace courtyard. A few minutes later, the three women were sitting in a carriage. Jee, Shen, Kuo and a large group of guards surrounded it on komodo rhinos. As they reached the grounds of the orphanage, Jee dismounted before he quickly walked toward the carriage to help the women down.

Smoothing her royal dress—an elegant dark red robe with a thick black and gold sash—Katara looked at her surroundings before she glanced at the building. She frowned at its dilapidated state before she was distracted by movements coming from the building. She spotted the children looking curiously at her from behind windows and doors before her attention was caught by the approach of the elderly woman who ran the place.

“Fire Lady Katara, you honor us with your presence,” the gray-haired woman greeted as she gave a respectful bow. “I was both shocked and delighted at receiving your message that you wish to help the children.”

“I am glad that I can help,” Katara replied sincerely, “And as Fire Lady it is my duty.”

The older woman continued talking, but Katara was distracted as she caught sight of a little boy—no more than five years old—hiding behind the skirts of his caretaker. When he noticed that she had seen him, he blushed and hid again.

“Hello,” Katara called out gently as she leaned to the side so she could see him better.

The boy peeked up and again stared at her in curiosity and admiration. The older woman stopped talking as she watched their interaction.

“Your eyes are blue,” he said as he pointed at Katara’s eyes before he came out of his hiding place and smiled, “They’re pretty.”

“Thank you,” Katara replied with a smile, “I think your green eyes are amazing.”

The boy blushed bashfully as he kicked his foot on the ground.

“My mama said they are the color of my father’s eyes, but I’ve never met him,” he explained matter-
Katara suppressed her frown since she did not want to alarm the child and looked up inquiringly at the orphanage’s owner, who sighed sadly.

“His father is a wealthy, married Earth Kingdom merchant living somewhere on the great continent. His mother, who recently passed away due to an illness, was a poor and young servant working at the house the merchant was visiting. She was a naïve and unfortunate woman,” she explained vaguely.

Katara clenched her hands as she figured out the boy’s history, which apparently he did not understand due to his young age. His father must have been visiting the Fire Nation and seduced the young woman, who then became pregnant. The man must have denied the boy’s parentage and left the woman pregnant with their child and returned to his family in the Earth Kingdom. She hated such cold-hearted and irresponsible men. And now the boy was alone, just like many of the children in this place. Her anger was then replaced by sadness. Bending a little, Katara reached out a hand to caress the boy’s dark hair and smiled.

“What is your name?” she asked softly.

“Takeo,” the little boy quickly replied.

“Nice to meet you, Takeo. I have come to help you and all the other children,” she told him kindly.

“Really?” the boy asked with wide, green eyes. “Will you give us more food? And better clothes?”

“Yes, that and much more,” she assured him as she gently patted his head before she grinned, “But you have to promise me that you will grow big and strong.”

“I promise!” he enthused as he puffed out his small chest.

“Good!” Katara exclaimed as she straightened herself out before she added, “Now, why don’t you go tell your friends what I said?”
“Okay!” he yelled before he turned around and raced back to the large building, shouting excitedly at the top of his lungs.

Katara chuckled as she watched him go before she and the older woman followed in the boy’s wake. Urs, Jee, Jiao, Kuo and Shen followed after them. As news of the Fire Lady’s generosity reached their ears, the children eagerly fled their hiding places and swarmed the kind waterbender. Katara laughed delightedly as the children enthusiastically welcomed her into their current home and vied for her attention. Takeo held her hand throughout her visit. She felt compassion for the orphaned children, who either lost their parents through death or, more sadly, were abandoned. She knew what it felt to live without the warmth and love of parents. Luckily for her, she was able to get her father back, which unfortunately, would not be the case for many of these orphans.

She spent the next few hours listening to the children before she gently commanded them to heed their caretaker’s order for them to prepare for supper. Once the children left, Katara walked with the orphanage’s mistress to her office to discuss the details of Katara’s plan to better the orphanage. Once everything was settled, the older woman enthusiastically thanked the kind Fire Lady as they exited the place. Before Katara could leave, Takeo and the other children poured out of the building to bid her goodbye and made her promise to visit them again.

There was a pleased smile on Katara’s face as she finally settled in the carriage with Urs and Jia. It felt so good to be able to use her role as Fire Lady to help those less fortunate and to change things to something better. Of course, not everybody welcomed her help readily or agreed to her projects enthusiastically. There were some who still did not accept her as Zuko’s wife and Fire Lady, but she did not let any of that get to her. Instead she focused on the gratefulness and affection she received from those who did appreciate her efforts—which were mostly those from the lower class.

Her train of thought once again turned to how she had been pleasantly awakened that morning by her husband’s passionate lovemaking. She hoped Zuko realized soon that she was better and would not go back to the weak person she was two months ago so he could once again unleash his fierce and passionate side. She did not want him to keep suppressing what was in his nature.

Her thoughts shifted to Zuko’s insistence of her learning to wield a weapon. She had thought long and hard upon the issue before she finally decided that he and Iroh made a good point. She could not always depend on hand-to-hand combat to save her from an attacker. However, she still could not figure out what kind of weapon she wanted to use. Although swords fascinated her, especially when her husband used them, she could not see herself cutting someone down. The same went with daggers or any projectile of the same category—especially since she did not want to imitate Mai. Katara frowned at the thought before her face took on a pensive expression. She wanted a weapon that would not hinder her when she used her waterbending, one that would be easy to use and would not cause much damage.

“Thanks to you, the children of the orphanage will know a better way of living than they have for some time, and in some cases, since their births,” Ursa’s pleased voiced interrupted Katara’s thoughts.

“They will,” Jiao agreed with smile.

The blue-eyed Fire Lady turned to her poised and smiling mother-in-law. Katara smiled when inspiration struck her.

“Ursa, I just thought of something,” Katara began as she tried to think things through, “Can you teach me how to use a bow and arrows?”

“You want to learn archery?” Ursa asked with a surprised, raised eyebrow.

“Yes,” the waterbender replied determinedly. “It’s one weapon that might immobile an attacker but not kill him.”

A small frown appeared on the golden-eyed noblewoman’s face as she contemplated for a moment what her daughter-in-law had said before she smiled.

“If that is what you want, then I will gladly teach you archery,” she responded.

“Thank you,” Katara said as her smile widened.

“We can start tomorrow before your lessons with Jee,” Ursa told her.

“That’s fine,” the waterbender assured her enthusiastically.

She could not wait to tell Zuko.

“Remember to straighten your spine, but not too much,” Ursa instructed as she pressed her hand on her daughter-in-law’s back. “Good. Now nock your arrow like I taught you.”

With a nod, Katara placed the arrow nock onto the bowstring before she raised her arms into position. She remembered Ursa’s instructions as she tried to draw the arrow back, but again found it difficult to pull the tight bowstring. A few hours had passed since they started and Katara could already feel her fingers cramping. She had to admit that this was harder than she had originally thought, but if her mother-in-law could do it, then so could she. When she told Zuko about her choice in weapons the previous night, he had said it was a good idea. He told her that once she became adept in it, he would commission a personalized bow, quiver, and arrows for her that would not hinder her waterbending. Katara had only smiled, but the truth was that she had a different plan as to why she wanted Ursa to teach her archery.

“Good. Now focus on your target,” Ursa’s voice brought the waterbender out of her thoughts. “If you want to just wound your attacker then you need to aim at the limbs, preferably the legs to incapacitate them. In order to kill you have to aim your arrow at the head or preferably the heart.”

Katara swallowed before she nodded that she understood. Drawing the arrow close to her cheek, she closed one eye as she focused on the target ahead of her with her other eye. She took a deep breath to steady her arms before she released the arrow. To her embarrassment, it fell almost at her feet just like it had in her previous attempts. Blushing, she looked up with a grimace at her mother-in-law. Hearing a muffled chuckle, the waterbender glanced to the side to glare at Jee. Catching her glower, Jee composed himself and muttered an apology. Huffing, Katara turned back to Zuko’s mother. Ursa smiled reassuringly as she stepped forward to pick the arrow up from the ground and hand it back to Katara.

“Don’t be discouraged,” the older woman told her, “This is just your first day. It takes time and practice to get it right.”

“I know,” Katara sighed, but still it was embarrassing. She was glad Zuko was not present to witness her failures.

“Here, observe what I do,” Ursa said as she stepped into Katara’s spot after the waterbender moved aside.

Pulling an arrow from her quiver, Ursa took her stance before drawing the bowstring close her mouth. Taking a second to focus on her target, she released her fingers. The arrow shot straight forward and embedded itself on the target’s bulls-eye. Katara and Jee applauded. Curious, the waterbender glanced at the admiral out of the corner of her eye. She noticed that he had an awed look on his face as he stared at the dark-haired noblewoman as she relaxed in her stance. Katara was distracted from her observation when Ursa turned to her.

“Try again,” she encouraged as she stepped aside.
With a nod, Katara returned to the spot before the target and again tried to pull the bowstring taut.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was the same routine for the next month. Katara was proud to admit that she was becoming better in everything she was learning, although she still had a long way to go before she would become an expert. Zuko had also convinced her to carry a sheathed dagger for extra protection, which he had trained her to use. She strapped it on her waist belt on the opposite side of her waterskin for easy access. Now she would have nothing to fear if she found herself without her waterbending. She promised herself that she would never become a liability to Zuko.

Although he was now comfortable enough to initiate their sexual intimacy, he was always careful and gentle. She missed his fire and knew it affected him, too. She had tried many times to coax him into it, but with no avail. He feared she was just being insistent just to please him no matter how many times she told him otherwise. She just had to hope he would get over his fear soon.

“Strengthened your legs, my lady,” Jee instructed with an observant eye, “Match your breathing every time you lift the weights.”

Katara nodded as she exhaled and inhaled as she lifted one arm at a time. Strengthening her muscles was necessary if she ever needed to throw a heavier person away from her. Jee was a strict instructor, but a very good one. She could see why Zuko appreciated the older man’s skills as well as his loyalty.

“Good. I think that is enough for today,” Jee spoke up. “Now take a moment to stretch your muscles.”

After they were finished with their training, Katara silently drank water from a cup a servant gave her and observed Jee as he wiped the sweat from his brow as he again glance at the sun’s progress in the sky. She had a feeling he kept checking to see how close it was to the noon meal where they were to join Ursa and Iroh in the private garden’s veranda. Gathering her courage, Katara cleared her throat to gain his attention.

“Have you ever been married, Jee?” she asked casually as she placed the small towel around her neck and looked at him.

“No, my lady,” Jee responded frankly. He raised one eyebrow at her sudden curiosity.

“Really?” she said. “I can’t believe it.”
“There were women who were after me with hopes of marriage when I was younger,” he admitted after a while, “But once I joined the military, I did not have time for a wife, especially after leaving the Fire Nation with the then former Crown Prince Zuko and General Iroh.”

Katara hummed at his response, her curiosity getting the better of her.

“But now it’s different,” she spoke up. “You’re a respected admiral and still young enough to marry.”

Jee flushed before he cleared his throat.

“Perhaps,” was his simple reply.

“Has a woman caught your eye recently?” she asked innocently.

“Ah, if we do not hurry we will be late for the noon meal, my lady,” he said instead as he tried to usher her back into the palace.

“I can tell you have a woman in mind, Jee,” Katara told him, ignoring his attempts to distract her.

Jee frowned, then he hesitated, before he sighed in resignation. He knew their Fire Lady was too observant for him to think he could lie to her.

“I do,” he finally relented.

Katara suppressed a triumphant grin at his confession. Now she had to continue carefully if she wanted Jee to reveal to her what she had been suspecting for a while now.

“Do you plan on proposing to this woman soon?” she asked.

“No,” he immediately replied.
“Why not?” Katara asked with a frown.

“Because I can’t, it is impossible,” he responded grimly.

“Why?” the waterbender again questioned.

Jee hesitated before he continued.

“She is not a woman I can be with,” he explained somberly, “I’m not even supposed to have feelings for her.”

“Is she married?” Katara inquired with a raised brow.

Jee frowned.

“Not anymore,” he muttered.

“Does she have eyes for someone else?” she asked, determined to get him to confess his feelings.

Jee’s expression darkened at the thought.

“I don’t believe she does,” he answered gruffly.

“Well, if she’s not married nor has any kind of relationship with someone else, then why is it impossible?” Katara asked as she raised an eyebrow.

“It just is,” he replied, heavy resolution in his tone, “She does not see me as something more…”

“Jee,” Katara said as she stared into his eyes, “You love Lady Ursa, don’t you?”
She watched as his eyes widened in surprise before he quickly tried to deny her words.

“I’ve been observing your reactions when you’re near her for months,” she interrupted him, “I know it’s true. You love Ursa.”

Jee remained stiff and unyielding for a long moment, but when the blue-eyed Fire Lady continued to stare at him, challenging him to lie to her, he sighed and slumped his shoulders in defeat. Now he could understand why his Fire Lord sometimes found it so hard to deny his wife anything.

“I…I do,” he confessed sincerely.

A smile appeared on Katara’s face at his admission.

“Please, my lady, I ask that you don’t tell anyone,” he requested urgently.

Katara frowned before she nodded.

“You have my word that I will not reveal your secret,” she promised before she added more softly, “But you should let Lady Ursa know your feelings for her.”

Jee shook his head.

“She must never know,” he said resolutely.

“But why?” Katara asked.

“A noblewoman would never glance twice at a simple admiral, much less marry him,” Jee explained morosely.

“If the Fire Lord married a simple Water Tribeswoman, then a noblewoman can marry an extraordinary admiral,” Katara insisted, “One who has been at the Fire Lord’s side for years.”
Again, Jee stubbornly shook his head.

“I was assigned by Fire Lord Zuko as Lady Ursa’s guard,” he replied. “I can’t be anything else. Besides,” he paused briefly before he continued more quietly, “she does not return my feelings.”

“How do you know if you don’t ask her?” the waterbender told him gently.

Such a question and possibility seemed to perk Jee’s spirits up before he composed himself and shook his head.

“Even if that were true, which it isn’t,” he asserted before continuing more firmly, “Fire Lord Zuko might not like the idea of his mother remarrying and I will not do anything to distress him.”

Katara frowned since she could see that she would not be able to change his mind. Besides, she understood how he felt. They were the same fears she had when she thought Zuko could never return her feelings. But was there really no chance for Jee and Ursa?

“I understand,” she said before she added with a reassuring smile, “But don’t worry. I will not betray your confidence.”

“Thank you, my lady,” Jee replied gratefully with a bow of his head.

Silently, he escorted her back into the palace before they headed their separate ways to freshen up for the noon meal.

Bathed and dressed in her royal robes, Katara entered the Royal Palace Garden with Kuo and Shen following after her. As she neared the veranda, she smiled at Iroh and Ursa when they happily greeted her. She glanced at Jee, who was already sitting next to the noblewoman, and gave him another reassuring smile before sitting down at her place. The servants quickly moved forward to place their food before them. A few gray clouds had begun to cover the blue sky for the past hour or so, but the temperature was still nice and warm.

As Iroh questioned her about her progress in her training, her continued lessons with Madam Fang Hua, and her next projects as Fire Lady, Katara would surreptitiously observe Jee and Ursa. Now that she knew Jee’s real feelings, she could not help but notice the admiral’s reactions to the beautiful noblewoman. Why didn’t Ursa notice?

The small group was interrupted from their meal and conversation when Zuko arrived unexpectedly. Katara noticed Jee stiffen almost imperceptibly as he subtly glanced her way. She smiled slightly to show she would keep her promise to guard his secret.

“Zuko!” Iroh exclaimed enthusiastically as he lowered his teacup to beam at his nephew. “If we had known you were going to join us, we would’ve waited before eating.”

“It’s fine. The meeting ended early,” Zuko explained impassively as he sat down next to his wife who threw him a happy smile. He returned her smile before glancing down at the plate a short-haired servant had rushed to place before him. It had been a while since he had shared lunch with his family.

They spent the next few hours talking about idle things before the conversation shifted to the whereabouts of Jianguo and the rebels. Katara no longer felt terror grip her chest at the mention of the rebel, but a deep hatred for his despicable acts and a determination to help Zuko in whatever way to bring Jianguo down. When their speculations ended with nothing promising, they again changed the subject to Zuko’s duties and Katara’s charity cases. When they finally realized they had spent almost the entire day in the veranda, Iroh and Ursa decided to leave and give the royal couple some alone time that they were rarely able to enjoy lately. Once everybody was out of sight, Zuko let down his indifferent mask and smiled affectionately at his wife. Even with his other family around, he found it hard to show his true feelings.

“It’s been a while since we spent some time in the garden,” he spoke up smoothly.

“Yeah,” Katara agreed with a smile before she added, “Let’s feed the turtle-ducks and the koi fish!”

“Alright,” Zuko consented with a chuckle as they gathered pieces of leftover bread and placed them in napkins before they stood up.

They walked away from the veranda and made their way on one of the stone paths lined with grass and flowers that led to the pond. Once they reached the cherry blossom tree, they sat down under its cool shade and Katara began to croon at the turtle-ducks who waded close when they saw the couple. The Fire Lord and his waterbender began to throw crumbs into the calm water, which were immediately devoured by the little creatures and the surfacing koi fish. They were content in the comfortable silence that surrounded them even as they finished feeding the animals. Although barely visible due to the gray clouds that covered it, the sun continued its slow descent on the sky. In an hour or two, night would follow.

Inhaling deeply as a cool breeze swept by them, Katara exhaled softly before she turned to regard her husband with a pensive expression. His eyes were closed as he relaxed against the trunk of the tree, one arm resting on his bent knee, his other leg extended in front of him. The perfect picture of tranquility. She admired his handsome profile and his strong frame for a moment before she cleared her throat to gain his attention. Zuko opened his eyes and turned his head to look at her.

“Zuko,” she began casually as she pretended to arrange her formal robes around her legs, “have you ever given thought that Ursa could one day remarry?”

“No,” he replied bluntly.

Katara suppressed a frown at his quick response.

“Okay, well, would you be agreeable to it if she ever wanted to?” she asked.

This time Zuko took a moment to think over her words before he frowned.

“No,” he answered.

“What?” Katara asked, barely managing not to sound exasperated with his one-word negative answers.

She frowned when he shrugged and again closed his eyes. Licking her lips, Katara gathered her courage to continue, prepared if she evoked his temper with her questioning.

“Is it because you don’t want to share her affections with anyone else after being reunited with her?” she inquired carefully.

Zuko opened his eyes to stare at the now serene pond as he again mused over her words.

“Yes,” he sighed almost shamefully.
“Ursa has a right to love someone and be loved in return, Zuko,” she told him gently.

“I know,” he replied as he again turned to look at her, “It’s just that I don’t want her to be hurt again, the way she was hurt by Ozai.”

“I understand,” Katara agreed, “But maybe Ursa would find a man who would treasure her.”

Zuko did not comment on her words, but Katara refused to drop the subject now that she had brought it up. She wanted to know what Zuko thought and see how difficult Jee’s path would be when and if he ever decided to confess his feelings for Ursa.

“What would you do if your mother ever found such a man?” she asked quietly.

Zuko frowned deeply.

“I don’t know,” he told her truthfully before he added gruffly, “And I don’t want to think about it.”

Sensing that he was getting annoyed, Katara bit her lip before deciding to stop for now. Maybe she would bring up the subject again another day and little by little make him think about the possibility. With a smile, she changed the subject to Jiao and Kuo’s upcoming parenthood and Zuko relaxed as he listened to her talk. There was a lull in the conversation, the only sounds that could be heard were the quacks of the turtle-ducks and the rustling of leaves and branches, before Zuko heard Katara clear her throat again.

“Zuko,” she began before she continued more seriously, “I want to participate in the meetings with the Court Council.”

Zuko looked at her and noticed her determined expression. He was not at all surprised at her request, in fact, he had expected her to bring up the issue a long time ago.

“You know the advisors are against the idea of a woman participating in the sessions,” he reminded her.
He wondered what the advisors would have done if Azula had become Fire Lord. Suck it up because she would have set them on fire? Zuko suppressed an amused smirk at his thoughts before he shook his head.

“I know, and I’m not saying that I want to participate in all of them, just the ones that deal with the problems of the common people and the relations with the Water Tribes,” she explained before she firmly added, “I want to show them that I am a capable and strong Fire Lady.”

“You know I’d gladly accept your input on such matters, Katara, but it’ll be hard to change the minds of the old advisors,” he told her.

“Then I will prove myself before them,” she responded resolutely.

Zuko smiled and he reached out a hand to caress her cheek.

“Have I told you how grateful I am to have you as my wife?” he asked softly.

Katara placed her hand above his and smiled gently at him.

“You show me through your actions every day,” she responded.

Zuko bent down to bestow a soft kiss on her lips at her reply before leaning back to smile at her and ask what she had in mind that would convince his advisors. Katara frowned in thought as she speculated out loud. When she stopped talking a few minutes later, Zuko turned to look at her curiously. He watched as she fidgeted in her place and bit her lip uncertainly.

“What is it?” Zuko asked with a concerned frown.

He watched as she took a deep breath and straightened herself.

“I’ve been thinking about this for the past few months,” she began carefully before she continued more firmly, “Besides learning hand-to-hand combat and how to use a weapon, I want to perfect my bloodbending.”
Zuko’s amber eyes widened in surprise as he sat up straight and turned toward her.

“I thought you hated it,” he said in confusion.

“I do,” she replied with a nod before she continued, “but I have to stop being naïve and be realistic. Bloodbending will help me protect others as well as myself. I thought long and hard about it and came to the conclusion that there is no harm in it as long as I don’t abuse the power like Hama did.”

Zuko regarded her silently. Although he could see the determination in her expression, he also noticed the uncertainty in her blue eyes, as if she were afraid he would be disappointed in her. How could she think he would think less of her for such a decision when he was a ruthless man who did not hesitate to end someone’s life in order to protect those he cared for? It just went to show how kindhearted his wife really was.

“I think that is a great idea,” he assured her with a smile. “I know you will only use your bloodbending for a good reason.”

Katara sagged with relief and gave him a large, grateful smile.

“Thank you, for understanding,” she said.

Zuko nodded before he grinned.

“Besides, it always fascinates me to see you bloodbend,” he confessed, then with a lusty smirk he added, “It also makes me wonder what other things you can do with the human body.”

Katara’s eyes widened before she laughed.

“Oh, and would you be willing to volunteer for such an experiment?” she asked innocently.

“I sure as hell won’t allow you to experiment on someone else,” he retorted dryly.
Katara again laughed at his words, relieved to know that he did not judge her for her decision. They continued to tease each other as the koi fish swam gracefully in the pond and the turtle-ducks quacked and frolicked in the water.

Zuko enjoyed the return to normalcy in their relationship—well its almost return to normalcy since their sex life was still not the same as it had been before. He had to curb his need to take her wildly and hear her screams and moans of pleasure. But he could see that Katara was once again the strong and confident woman he married. She could now throw him off his feet in hand-to-hand combat and he was relieved at the thought that she could now hold her own, even when she could not defend herself with her waterbending. His mother had also told him that Katara had talent with the bow and arrows, though he wondered why Katara had not mentioned it to him so he could commission the equipment for her. And now her bending would be even more powerful if she honed her skills in bloodbending. He was interrupted from his thoughts when he felt a few drops of water fall upon his forehead and nose.

“It’s sprinkling!” Katara exclaimed in delight.

Zuko glanced up to the sky and finally noticed that the gray clouds had become darker before he blinked when the drops increased from a light sprinkling to pouring rain. He looked back down to Katara to tell her they should head back inside the palace only to have his words get stuck in his throat at the sight that greeted him. His wife’s lovely face was tilted upward as raindrops kissed her skin, a pleased smile curling her plump lips, cobalt eyes closed, arms spread wide as she welcomed the rain.

“I didn’t expect it to rain,” she spoke up softly.

“Neither did I, since it usually rains in winter in the Fire Nation and it’s barely the end of summer right now,” he explained just as quietly.

He watched as Katara opened her eyes and looked at him with a smile. She grabbed his hand and urged him to stand up with her. Silently, he obliged her and stepped out from the flimsy protection of the cherry blossom tree’s leaves. Not a second passed before their hair and formal robes were completely drenched, but Zuko found he did not care in the face of his waterbender’s delight. They silently enjoyed the cool rain, the soft breeze, and the fresh scent of the rain. Zuko looked away from his wife to watch as the turtle-ducks hurried to the protection of some bushes. He observed the way the rain created ripples in the pond while the koi fish continue to swim unperturbed. He turned to look back at Katara when she released his hand.

“I want to show you something,” she told him.
“Show me what?” he asked.

He watched curiously as she stepped away from him and gathered some water from the falling rain. Her face took on a concentrated expression as she moved into a stance as if she were holding a bow. His eyes widened in admiration when a liquid bow appeared in her hand followed by an arrow. He watched as she drew the arrow back before releasing it in a sigh. The liquid arrow turned into one made of sharp ice and it shot forward before it embedded itself in a tree trunk a few feet away. Zuko stared at it in amazement before he turned to his smug waterbender.

“Is this what you’ve been planning all along?” he asked with a quirked eyebrow.

“Yes,” she replied with a grin, “that is why I asked your mother to teach me archery. It will be faster with my waterbending. Of course, I still plan to use a regular bow and arrows in case I find myself unable to waterbend.”

“Well, it’s amazing,” Zuko told her with a smile.

“Thanks,” Katara responded happily before she grimaced, “I was horrible in the first few lessons and it took me weeks to master it with waterbending. I still have to work on the accuracy of my shots, though.”

“Even so, it’s still incredible,” he assured her.

Katara smiled before she again turned her face up to the cool rain.

“I love the rain!” she sighed happily before she looked back to her husband when she felt him step closer to her.

“And I love you,” Zuko said softly.

Katara felt her heart flutter at his words and she smiled. Mesmerized by the soft look in her eyes, Zuko leaned down toward her face. They stared at each other for a second before he kissed her softly, caressing her lips with his and slowly licking the seam of her bottom lip. She sighed delightedly at the taste of his kiss mixed with the rain water and pressed closer to him. They pulled apart and gazed intensely into each other’s eyes. When he reached for her, Katara stopped him as she splashed him with water. She laughed when he growled at her before she spun around and raced Grinning, Zuko quickly chased after her, determined to catch her, but she did not make it easy, especially since she would use the rain to her advantage to thwart his efforts. Leaves rustled softly in the swaying branches and water splashed everywhere as they raced over the drenched grass.

Zuko finally caught up to her and growled triumphantly as he wrapped an arm around her waist and spun his stunning water nymph around toward him. When she collided against his chest, he swooped down and claimed her mouth in a deep kiss that had her moaning and melting against him.

Zuko groaned loudly at the sensation of her wet, soft body pressed so tightly against his hard frame. Breathing harshly, he pulled away from her mouth and stepped back a bit to see strands of her chocolate hair curled along her cheeks and neck. His smoldering eyes trailed lower and took in the sight of her clothes plastered to her alluring, feminine curves, her hard nipples protruding against the wet cloth, before he again crushed her to him and kissed her passionately. His wife moaned and clung to him as she returned his kiss, battling fiercely with his tongue.

Agni, he wanted her. Tonight he would love her with a wild passion that would prevent her from walking properly for days! He had thought that by suppressing his possessive and rough side, he would help Katara, but he now realized that he was only hurting both of them and letting Jianguo come between them.

No more. Just like Katara was willing to forget what happened and put it in the past, so would he. Though he would never forgive and would continue seeking revenge. But now he would worship Katara, take her, and love her with all the fierce passion he possessed.

“You truly are an enchanting water nymph,” he rasped as he pulled back slightly in order to catch his breath.

“Water nymph?” Katara asked breathlessly with an amused smile.

“I’ve been mentally calling you a water nymph ever since you set out to seduce me at the waterfall that first night I gave you an orgasm,” he growled out lustfully.

He smiled smugly when Katara’s blush intensified. He ran his thumb across her rufescent cheek before he bent down to kiss her passionately so that they were straining against each other once again.
“My lovely, sensuous water nymph,” he said throatily against her lips.

“Oh,” Katara moaned as she clung to him. She could feel her nipples aching against her wet clothes from both the cold rain and Zuko’s warmth and words.

Gently pulling her head back, Zuko deepened the kiss as he touched every inch of her mouth before coiling his tongue around hers. When Katara moaned and sucked his tongue, he growled huskily before pulling away.

“I want you,” he rasped.

“Don’t you have more work to do?” she asked breathlessly even as she pressed herself enticingly against him. She wanted him, desperately, but she also did not want to come between him and his duties.

“There are only documents I need to look over, but I can do that tomorrow,” he explained before he throatily added, “I’m more concerned with pleasuring my wife at the moment and being pleasured in return.”

Oh, thank La, was the only thought that passed through Katara’s head as she pulled his head down and kissed him hard.

Zuko groaned as he returned her ardent kiss, pushing his tongue insistently, coaxingly, inside her mouth. He cupped her ass with one hand and pressed her tightly against him. She moaned when she felt his hardness press against her stomach before she began to rub herself against him. She smiled into their kiss when he groaned loudly and bucked his hips tightly against her.

“Let’s go to our room,” she panted against his mouth.

“I can’t wait that long,” he rasped huskily, “I need to have you now.”

Before Katara could do anything but moan, Zuko swiftly swept her into his arms and quickly made his way to the veranda. Katara’s eyes widened when she realized where he was heading before she looked up to smile sultrily at her husband. At her eager look, Zuko paused briefly to bestow a passionate, heady kiss on her lips before walking forward once again as the rain continued to fall steadily around them. Wrapping her arms around his neck, the waterbender began to kiss and lick his strong jaw. Zuko groaned at her actions and he increased his pace as he climbed the few steps that led to the veranda. Without setting her down, he hurriedly slid one of the shoji doors open before moving away from the rain as he closed it and walked inside the enclosed veranda. He only had enough time to shoot sparks at a few of the candles before Katara was kissing him breathless again.

“I want you, Zuko, please,” she moaned breathlessly as she rubbed herself against him.

Zuko captured her lips in another searing kiss before he settled her on her feet. He pulled away from her and Katara frowned when he walked away only to smile when she saw him quickly gather the cushions around the low table. Once he had created a comfortable pile of cushions, he quickly took off his heavy formal robes until he stood before her in only a thin tunic and dark trousers. He threw the garment aside before he turned and held out his hand invitingly to her. Heart beating rapidly and body tingling in anticipation and lust, Katara quickly stepped toward him and placed her hand in his larger one. She gasped when he roughly pulled her against his chest and kissed her. She wrapped her arms around his shoulders, hiked up one of her legs around his, and ground her belly insistently against his erection as she sucked on his tongue.

“Gods, Katara,” Zuko rasped as his arms tightened around her.

If he had wondered if this was what Katara really wanted, her fervent actions said it all. She wanted him, all of him, and he could not be happier. Or more aroused.

Desperate need coursed through the Fire Lord’s body as his wife rubbed herself against him enticingly, arousing him to no end until he thought he would go insane with lust. He could feel his hard cock throbbing in his trousers every time Katara pressed against it. With a groan, Zuko wrapped his arms tightly around her before he quickly brought them down upon the pile of cushions, uncaring that their wet clothes were drenching them.

They kissed for a moment before Zuko sat back on his knees between her legs. He was panting hard as he gazed down at his waterbender. By the minimal light of the candles he had lit, he admired the way the light danced on Katara’s brown skin and made her blue eyes sparkle. A few strands of her wet hair were plastered to her forehead and droplets of water kissed the skin of her face and neck. Her chest was heaving, and with an aroused growl, he quickly leaned down to bury his face on her breasts before he reached up to cup and squeeze them firmly in his hands.

“Zuko, oh,” the waterbender moaned as she pushed her chest closer to his amazing hands before she thrust her hips up.
She grinned when Zuko gasped as she pressed tightly against his cock. Her husband caught her grin and, with a wicked smirk that caused a flare of heat to spread throughout her body, he ground himself hard against her aching core at the same time he pinched one of her nipples through her wet clothes. Her head fell back onto one of the soft cushions and she moaned loudly as her hands grasped tightly onto his biceps.

Zuko leaned his head down to kiss her mouth before he trailed his lips across her soft cheek until he stopped at her ear. He nibbled at the lobe before he licked the shell of her dainty ear as he continued grinding against her center. He heard her moan and felt her arch against him. His breath hitched when she wrapped her legs around his waist and pressed her warm sex more tightly against his confined erection. He increased his pace and growled lustfully when she cried out his name. He wanted her desperately, needed to bury himself inside her, find comfort and ecstasy in her arms, but first he needed to taste her.

He nibbled on her earlobe one more time before he used the flat of his hot tongue to trail down her neck, tasting the fresh rain on her flesh. He licked her wildly beating pulse and felt her shiver against him as his hot breath touched her cool, wet skin. Heartened by her reaction, he placed a few open mouthed kisses on the soft column of her neck before sucking gently on her flesh just how he knew she liked. Her sharp intake of air followed by her soft moan was music to his ears. He bucked his hips more tightly against her at the same time he sucked more strongly and lapped more firmly on her skin, increasing her pleasure as well as his.

“Ohh,” she groaned. “Zuko…mmm…”

Zuko pulled away and leaned back on his knees as he swiftly pushed her dress over her hips and just as quickly removed her silky undergarment. Once her pussy was bared before him, he gazed at it hungrily for a moment before his eyes flicked upward to gaze at his wife with barely contained lust. The wanton gleam in her eyes as she stared back at him caused a groan to escape his throat. Scooting backward until he was lying on his stomach with his head between her thighs, Zuko reached one hand up to slowly caress her swollen folds, groaning when he found her already so wet for him. Her gasp of pleasure resonated in his ears and he smiled as her hips bucked into his touch. He slid his fingers along her slit before he circled them firmly on the swollen bud, causing her to moan and arch her back. Then he quickly slipped two fingers inside her drenched passage and began to thrust them frantically.

“Oh, gods!” Katara screamed as pleasure erupted in her stomach.

Zuko pumped his fingers inside her for a moment before he pulled them out and latched onto her slick folds with his mouth. She wailed as she brought her hands down to clench her fingers in his hair, urging him to pleasure her more. Zuko complied readily as he lapped, sucked, licked, and kissed her folds and engorged clit, then he plunged his tongue inside.
“Yes!” the waterbender mewled as she threw her head back on the cushion beneath her. “Yes, just like that, oohhh!”

Zuko groaned at the delicious taste of her and the feeling of her tight pussy clenching around his tongue. He panted hard as he insistently rubbed his tongue along the fluttering walls before he curled it upwards, causing her hips to jerk into his face like he knew they would. He pressed her hips down as he continued to devour her.

Katara’s eyes rolled back at the incredible pleasure and she could feel her stomach clenching and her core tightening with her upcoming orgasm. Then with a particular stroke of his tongue and the sensation of his fingers rubbing firmly on her clit, the dam of ecstasy broke.

“Ahhhh!” the waterbender wailed as her hips bucked and her head thrashed from side to side.

Zuko groaned in pleasure as he drank up her tangy juices and reveled at the feeling of his wife writhing beneath him. He could feel his cock throbbing painfully in his trousers. He loved it when he was able to pleasure his wife so well.

Lifting himself up, Zuko moved over his waterbender and watched as she trembled and moaned. He leaned forward and kissed her with all the passion in his heart, then he grasped her hips and lifted her up against him as he sat on his knees. Katara moaned as Zuko’s tongue entered her mouth and she mindlessly sucked on it and rubbed her sensitive breasts against his hard chest. Zuko growled in pleasure.

As they continued kissing, he hurriedly undid the ties that held his pants up and pushed them down enough to free his aching length. They pulled away to catch their breath and Katara looked down to admire his impressive shaft. Looking up to hold her husband’s intense gaze, the waterbender smiled sexily as she quickly reached for his cock and began to caress him with firm, quick strokes.

“Yesss,” Zuko hissed and his head fell back in immense pleasure. “So damn good…”

Katara smiled in satisfaction at his reaction and she began to stroke him faster and more roughly, just the way she knew he liked. Zuko’s breath hitched in his throat and he looked back down to watch his wife’s hand stroking him, but when she pressed her thumb on the bulbous head to spread the whitish liquid that had seep out from the opening, Zuko could not take it anymore.
He needed to bury himself inside her!

Sitting back on the cushions with his back pressing against the low table, Zuko grasped her hips and guided her down until she was straddling his lap. Katara stroked him a few more times before she moved her hand away as he lifted the hem of her dress around her hips. Before Zuko could urge her forward, Katara quickly spread her legs even further and shifted over his straining length, and then, with a seductive smile on her face, she sank down over his erection and took him deeply inside her.

“Oh, gods, Katara,” Zuko rasped huskily as he tightly gripped her hips, the sensation of her wet heat surrounding him almost causing him to go over the edge.

“Mm, yes,” Katara mewled softly as her eyes fluttered at the pleasurable feeling of having her walls stretched widely by his thick cock.

Then she opened her eyes to gaze deeply into his golden ones as she began to rock and grind her hips against his. Zuko roughly called her name as he drew her hips tightly against him. Katara gasped before she spread her knees even more and pressed her hips lower as she increased her speed and began to bounce rigorously atop his turgid shaft. Panting, she leaned forward, splaying her hands with greedy need across his chest, before she latched her mouth against his throat, wet from the rain and his sweat, and began to wildly lick and suck at his skin.

Zuko gasped at her actions before he bent his head and eagerly nudged hers up. Knowing what he wanted, Katara lifted her head and fiercely captured his lips in a deep kiss. Zuko growled lustfully against her sweet mouth as his hands tightened on her hips before he swiftly brought them down so that he was lying on top of her. At Katara’s murmured satisfaction, Zuko shifted his hands down to cup her firm ass. With a groan of her name, he began to thrust fiercely into her, going deep and hard until he was nudging her womb. He grunted in pleasure when she squeezed his backside in her hands, pressing him tightly to her as she undulated beneath him, rubbing her clit against his groin. Her pussy was a velvet vise, tight yet soft, wet and hot as it clenched around his aching shaft. He loved being buried in the blissful heat of her incredible body. He had missed taking her with all the passion and heat in his soul and vowed that he would always love her thusly.

“Zuko!” Katara gasped as her hands flew up to tangle in his hair at the back of his head as he began to thrust almost violently into her. Yes, this was what she wanted! Zuko’s passionate and fierce lovemaking as he took her with wild abandon—without restraint, without reservation.

Faster, harder, hotter, more intense and powerful did their lovemaking become as they strained, bucked, and rock against each other. Trying to catch their breaths, their hungry mouths detached for a moment and their eyes connected and locked in a desperate yet tender gaze as they gave themselves to the moment and to each other. A moment later, they both reached that glorious peak and tumbled into an abyss of excruciating ecstasy.
Katara gasped and her hips bucked wildly as her juices flowed out of her. Zuko groaned harshly as his hips thrust into her in erratic movements as her clenching walls milked him of his seed. With one final thrust, Zuko rasped her name before he slumped over her, panting and shuddering from his incredible release as he tightened his hold of her body. Katara wrapped her arms around him as she gasped and panted for breath, her heart beating rapidly in her chest.

It was a long moment later when Zuko finally had the strength to lift himself enough to look down at her. Her blue eyes were half-lidded, her lips swollen from his kisses, and her expression one of immense pleasure and satiation.

“Gods, I missed this,” he groaned throatily as he raised a hand to tuck her damp hair behind her ear before he caressed her flushed cheek.

“You won’t hold yourself back from me anymore?” she asked breathlessly as she reached up her own hand to brush a few strands of his long, black hair aside.

“Never. I promise,” he vowed firmly, his tone fierce, his eyes intense and affectionate. Then a smirk curled his lips as he added, “In fact, I planned on showing you how sincere I am by demonstrating it to you throughout the night.”

“You will need to demonstrate it to me many, many, more times before I’m convinced of your sincerity,” Katara quipped playfully yet seductively as she undulated her hips underneath him.

Zuko’s breath caught in his throat as his cock twitched inside her still wet core, but he instead pinned her hips down before she made him lose his mind again. A plan was forming in his head, a way to show her how much he desired and loved her and her body. But to also demonstrate how much her body craved him inside her, just as his craved to be buried within her. He bent down to kiss her deeply, and with a buck of his hips to make her gasp, he pulled away from her.

“Come. I want to show you something in the privacy of our rooms,” he told her huskily as he held out a hand toward her.

Katara eagerly grasped his hand and he pulled them up. Katara let her dress fall back down her legs as she watched Zuko tuck himself back into his pants. He then snatched up his robe and her undergarment from the floor and, with a wicked smirk on his lips, he brought it to his face and licked the spot damped with her aroused juices. Katara let out a breathless little moan and he chuckled as he stuffed the delicate article into his pocket. Placing his robe over his arm, Zuko held out his other hand... to her and Katara quickly took it, entwining their fingers together as they smiled at each other.

They walked toward the shoji door and Zuko quickly opened one and closed it behind them once they stepped out. The rain was still falling steadily and, with another amorous glance at each other, they stepped out of the protection of the veranda’s roof and swiftly headed into the garden, rain once again drenching their hair and clothes.

Once they entered the palace, they walked swiftly down the corridors, leaving a trail of rain water for the servants to clean up since Zuko was too impatient to have her in their rooms to wait for her to clean up the mess with her waterbending. Luckily, they did not encounter anyone as they made their way.

When they arrived in the seclusion of their bedchamber, they turned quickly to each other and gazed at one another in anticipation. The curtains before the balcony doors were closed to ward off the chill and rain. The fireplace was lit as well as a few candles and the light chased away the darkness. Water dripped from their drenched clothes and hair and puddled on the marble floor around their feet. Katara quickly used her waterbending to dry them off before Zuko pulled her to him and kissed her until she was breathless and limp with pleasure against his chest. After a few moments of slow, heated kisses, he slowly pulled away and stared down into her darkened azure eyes.

Agni, she was beautiful.

Without a word, he grabbed her hand and led her to their massive bed where he gently urged her to sit. He glanced at her briefly before he let go of her hand. Katara watched in silent curiosity as her husband went into the bathing room only to return with a thick towel. Her eyes hungrily followed his movements as he placed the large towel across the back and seat of one of the chairs resting before the warmly blazing fireplace before he again moved across the room to where their large full-length mirror rested.

The waterbender tilted her head in wonder as she watched Zuko pick up the mirror and walk back to place it before the chair. He stood back to critically analyze his work before he shifted both the chair and the mirror so that the light from the fireplace could illuminate the chair and make it visible through the mirror’s reflection. Then he turned back to his curious wife and smiled seductively. Katara felt her pulse quicken and she swallowed thickly as she fixedly stared at him as he approached her like a stalking predator.

Zuko stopped in front of her and, with a rakish curl of his lips, began to slowly divest himself of his clothing. Once he was completely naked, he stood still to allow his waterbender time to admire him. He smiled in both pride and eager expectation as he watched her eyes ravenously rake his entire musculature in blatant lust and anticipation. He felt his already erect cock twitch and throb when her blue eyes settled lustfully on it and she licked her lips. Even with the scars marring his face and abdomen, she gazed at him as if he were the handsomest man in the world. No other woman would be able to make him feel so empowered, desired, and loved like his Katara. She was the perfect mate for him.

He reached forward and quickly pushed her dress up to her hips. He slowly trailed his fingertips down the smooth and enthralling curves of her hips and thighs before he pushed her legs widely aside. He moved between his wife’s legs and leaned down to kiss her sensually, passionately, sucking gently on her full lower lip. Katara moaned and murmured against his mouth as she reached up her hands to grasp the back of his head.

Zuko slowly urged her back and Katara lay down upon the mattress as he gently settled on top of her heating body. They continued kissing as Zuko blindly unraveled the sash around her waist and pulled at the ties that held her elegant robe closed. Katara murmured incoherently as she struggled to free herself from the confines of her clothes, wanting desperately to feel that incredible sensation of her firebender’s hot skin touching, sliding against, and caressing hers.

Realizing his body was impeding them, Zuko lifted himself enough to drag the material up. Between the two of them, they finally managed to pull her robe away and Zuko threw it behind him. Before he could continue, Katara had already taken off the silky top that contained her breasts and tossed it away. Zuko did not care where it landed because his eyes were already engrossed on his wife’s delectable breasts. There was no better place to be, but there on their bed with his wife lying gloriously naked beneath him. With a husky groan, he buried his face between her soft mounds before he took one hard nipple into his mouth.

“Uhh,” Katara mewled and she pushed her chest closer to his mouth.

She hissed in pleasure when Zuko deliberately rubbed the rough texture of his scarred cheek against her neglected nipple the way she liked. He sucked on her pebbled nipple fervently, causing her to throw her head back and moan his name, before he moved up to cover her lips with his. He kissed her hungrily as he again settled himself completely between her thighs. They gasped and groaned as their naked loins touched before they began to rock against each other.

Katara felt like her entire body was on fire as Zuko’s hard shaft rubbed against her slick folds and pressed against her sensitive nub. She lifted her hips insistently, trying to angle them so that he could slip inside her, but he only chuckled at her struggles as he continued to grind and slide his cock against the lips of her pussy.

“Zuko,” she hissed both impatiently and pleadingly.
“Patience, my wanton goddess,” Zuko hushed throatily as he licked her bottom lip. “You’ll have me inside you soon enough.”

Before Katara could respond, a gasp escaped her lips when Zuko suddenly lifted them off the bed with his arms wrapped tightly around her. Katara wound her arms around his neck and her legs around his hips, thinking excitedly that he was going to enter her in this position like he had a few times before. The memory of their interlude in their guest room wall in Omashu caused her stomach to clench in arousal. She moaned and tightened her limbs around him as one of his hands grabbed her backside and pressed her center against his big length. They both moaned against each other’s mouths as his shaft once again massaged and glided against her wet pussy but still not penetrating her. Katara whined and writhed against him as she felt her empty core clench in need to be filled.

Why was he torturing her so?

She did not realize she had spoken out loud until she heard him chuckle sexily into her ear.

“Don’t worry, your torture will soon come to an end,” he growled huskily. He licked the shell of her ear and continued grinding slowly between her legs as he asked, “Do you want my cock inside you, Katara?”

“Gods, yes,” the waterbender mewled loudly as she felt more of her aroused juices seep out of her.

With a groan, Zuko tightened his hold of her as he swiftly walked to the chair before the fireplace and gently placed her on her feet. Mind dazed with arousal, Katara waited curiously as Zuko settled himself on the seat of his chair directly in front of the full-length mirror before he grasped her arms and pulled her toward him so that she sat on his lap with her back to his firm chest. Her heart beat faster and her stomach fluttered at the sensation of his hard length pressed against her lower back. She looked up and saw his handsome face staring over her shoulder at her reflection in the mirror with dark, golden eyes as he smoothed her long hair away from her front. The light from the fireplace cast a golden shower over their skin.

Grasping her hips, Zuko moved his powerful thighs between hers and urgently pressed his knees outward so that he had her legs spread. Not sufficient enough for what he wanted, he instead grabbed her legs and rested them across the high armrests, spreading her more widely.

“Look at yourself, my lovely waterbender,” he commanded softly. “I want you to see what I enjoy gazing at when I make love to you with my fingers, tongue, and cock.”
Katara’s eyes widened at his words before her eyes slowly shifted down her body through the reflection in the mirror, taking in her quivering breasts and her smooth stomach until her eyes landed on her exposed sex. She felt herself blush despite herself at the wanton image she presented, as if she were offering herself to a sex god—and in a way she was.

Zuko heard Katara moan at the same time he groaned as his eyes feasted on the sight of her swollen, glistening pussy. He would always find the contrast of her brown skin against her pink sex captivatingly arousing. He watched as her tiny hole clenched and unclenched before he swallowed hard as he watched her juices leak out of her and slide down the line of her ass. He almost came at the incredible, erotic sight.

Katara was panting hard as she looked away from her bare center to gaze at her suddenly silent husband. She felt her stomach tightened at the hungry expression on his face and the intense gleam in his amber eyes. At the sight of his delight, she felt her core spasm and she trembled when he groaned loudly. Her attention was diverted from his face when she saw his hand move between her legs. She gasped loudly and arched her back when his fingers began to play havoc on her oversensitive clit.

“Oh, gods,” she moaned. “Yes, yes…haaa…”

He stroked her a moment longer before he brought his other hand around her to cup her breast. She murmured his name as he kneaded and squeezed her mound at the same time he rubbed her nub. She watched his movements through the mirror as he caressed her a while longer before he reached his hand down to join his efforts in pleasuring her sex. Then to her shock and pleasure, he used the fingers of both his hands to spread her folds open, completely revealing her clenching pussy to their eyes.

“Mine,” he growled possessively.

“Yes, ohh,” the waterbender whimpered.

Zuko felt his heart swell and his shaft throb at her easy admittance. She belonged to him completely just as he belonged unreservedly to her. No other man had or would know the secrets of her body. No one but him. Just like no other woman could or would be able to touch his heart.

He moved his hands so that one of them was still spreading her open before he plunged two fingers of his other hand inside. Katara threw back her head and wailed in pleasure as her hips bucked up into his long fingers. He moved them rapidly inside, making her mind go insane with lust, before he pulled them out. Katara opened her eyes to see him smirk at her as he lifted his hand and brought his drenched fingers into his mouth. She heard him groan as he sucked his fingers clean of her essence. and she squirmed above him in anticipation.

“Zuko, please,” she pleaded breathlessly as she rubbed against him, massaging his shaft tightly between them.

Zuko pulled out his fingers from his mouth and groaned at her movements. He grasped her hips and lifted her higher against him. His twitching length reared proudly between both their legs.

“Please, what?” he teased gutturally.

Katara did not respond and instead rubbed her aching center against his cock, coating him heavily with her overflowing fluids. Zuko hissed out a breath before he pinned her hips down to stop her movements. She groaned in frustration.

“What do you want, my love?” he asked in a husky tone as he steadied her with one arm.

He reached his other hand between them and tightly grasped his hard erection before massaging his large mushroomed tip along her dripping sex.

“Please,” Katara hissed as one of her hands tightly grasped his to urge him into her.

“You want my cock, don’t you, Katara?” he asked heatedly. “Your tight pussy aches for me, doesn’t it?” he asked as he ran his tongue along the column of her slim throat to her ear which he nibbled gently, eliciting a soft whimper from her.

Oh, La, yes, Katara thought as she felt her core clench, seeking to be mollified and to banish the empty feeling. Her mind was completely dazed with lust and she could not seem to find her words.

When she nodded and moaned at his statement, Zuko smirked as he allowed the thick head of his erection to penetrate her slowly as he watched her reaction through their reflections. When he saw the relief and eagerness in her blue eyes, he just as slowly pulled his shaft out. He suppressed a chuckle at her frustrated growl since he was torturing himself as well, but he wanted to impart to her the full impact of their bond—body, heart, and soul.
“Only my cock can be inside you. Only I can bring you to ecstasy,” he rumbled throatily as he locked eyes with hers and nuzzled his cheek against her head. “Only with me can you find completion. Just like I can only find completion inside your wet pussy, only in your arms.”

It did not take Katara’s hazy mind long to comprehend what her husband was truly trying to communicate with her. He was not just being possessive, but he was conveying to her once again that they were only meant for each other. That their bodies belonged solely to each other just like their hearts, and that no one, especially not Jianguo nor Mai, would come between them.

“Yes, Zuko, only you,” she told him firmly, softly and lovingly as she turned and lifted her head to kiss his firm jaw.

Zuko groaned softly at the knowledge that she understood what he was truly saying and he bent his head down to tenderly kiss her sweet, upturned mouth before he moved back and nudged her to return her attention to their reflections. She had answered his unspoken meaning, but she had still not told him what she needed from him.

“Tell me what you want, Katara,” he asked roughly, this tone thick with desire.

Katara knew what he wanted to hear, but she decided not to give him the satisfaction of begging after teasing her so long. Suppressing her smirk, Katara did not reply immediately and instead squirmed more insistently against him. Her legs were starting to shake a little from having them spread so widely so long, but she ignored the discomfort.

“You know what I want,” she retorted teasingly, her blue eyes shining in the reflection by the light of the fireplace.

“Minx,” Zuko growled playfully at her stubbornness.

Deciding to tease her some more, he moved his hand wrapped around her and slid it up her stomach. He felt more than heard her breathing accelerate as he moved higher before he cupped her breast and squeezed tightly, pressing his palm tightly against her nipple.

She whined and arched against him, silently begging him to end her torture. Although she had not vocally pleaded, her whimpers and mewls sounded like pleading to his ears, so he decided to indulge her a little.
Katara gasped when she felt him press his tip inside her again, deliciously stretching her walls to accommodate his large length, only to moan in disappointment when he stopped. She could see her juices leaking down his shaft.

“Tell me what you need, love,” he rasped commandingly, he could not wait anymore as he felt her walls clench around his head, beseeching him to plunged into her, to take her. “Tell me and I’ll give us both what we want.”

Katara could hear the need and desire in his tone and she could not deny him any longer because she desperately needed it too. She locked eyes with him again in the mirror and smiled sultrily.

“Please, Zuko. I need your cock inside me,” she purred seductively as she slowly moved above him, wanting to talk dirty to him as well.

She watched as his eyes became hooded and he groaned.

“I need to feel your big, thick cock stretching me,” she continued throatily, “I need to feel it impaling me so deeply I might just pass out from the pleasure. I want to feel it throbbing and thrusting inside my wet and tight pussy.”

“Oh gods,” Zuko growled as he grabbed her hips in both of his hands and slowly moved another inch inside her. He loved it when Katara talked dirty to him. He paused when he saw Katara close her eyes and throw her head back against his shoulder with a satisfied gasp.

“Open your eyes,” he murmured in her ear. “Watch yourself. Watch as my cock enters you. Watch as your breasts bounce with my every thrust. Watch as pleasure ripples across your beautiful face.”

There was more power in her husband’s voice as he tightly grabbed her hips. His demand ignited a blaze of fire deep inside her. Katara forcefully opened her eyes and she quickly stared down at the spot where they were joined. She heard Zuko murmur his approval. He moved her legs from the armrests and placed them over his thighs before he again grabbed her curvy hips. She watched intensely as he slowly lowered her hips down, and her stomach clenched, as she watched her small hole open and stretch at the invasion of his large girth. She moaned and her stomach tightened when his erection completely disappeared so deeply inside her that his heavy sac—just as drenched with her cream—pressed tightly to her ass. The sight was extremely erotic. No wonder Zuko always stared between their bodies when they made love. She heard Zuko groan as he pressed his cheek to the side of her face as he also stared at the place where they were intimately connected.
“Agni, Katara, you feel so good,” he rasped in a low tone.

“So do you, my love,” she purred seductively as she smiled at him through the mirror. “Your huge cock feels so good inside me.”

Growling lustfully at her words, Zuko grasped her hips, lifted her slightly, and then lowered her slowly back down over him. She groaned. He set a leisurely, steady rhythm, rolling his hips up into hers in shallow yet forceful thrusts as he watched their movement in the mirror. The sight was almost enough to make him come, but he held himself back. Not yet.

Katara was mesmerized by the sight of her firebender’s turgid cock entering and leaving her body. Every time he pulled out—with only the tip remaining inside—she watched at his thick length glistened with her juices before disappearing once more, stretching her widely. She felt him scrape his teeth on the sensitive skin of her neck and her breath caught in her throat as her eyes once again connected with his. His strong, firm jaw was clenched tightly, the muscles of his cheeks flexed, as he surged into her.

“Do you feel how your wet walls clench and cling tightly around my cock?” he asked throatily.

He pulled her wavy tresses aside to bare her neck and Katara watched as he affectionately licked and kissed her from her ear to her shoulder and back again.

“Do you feel how your pussy eagerly welcomes me inside?” he continued.

“Uhhh, yesss,” she hissed as a thrill shot up her spine before she added huskily, “My tight pussy hungers for more of you cock.”

She paused briefly when she again heard him moan and she smiled at him lustfully as she held his intense gaze. She wanted to drive him completely over the edge, she wanted to drive him crazy with need and arousal, she wanted him to take her like the insatiable beast he was. She thought she knew how to do it, or better yet, which words to use. Her mind was solely focused on the pleasure that the explicit words she was about to utter would bring her and the anticipation caused a thrill to shoot up her spine.

“I need you to fuck me hard, Zuko.”
“Oh, gods,” Zuko rasped as his eyes widened in both shock and arousal at the dirty word his waterbender had never uttered before.

He lost it.

Growling loudly, Zuko grabbed her more forcefully and impaled her swiftly and hard onto his cock—over and over again, causing her breasts to bounce wildly about. He could feel her tight passage beginning to tighten and throb around him, signaling her approaching release. He was again fascinated by the sight of her juices seeping out of her and soaking his heavy balls and upper thighs, saturating the towel he had placed on the chair beneath him.

“Ahh, mm, yes!” Katara screamed her pleasure. “Haa…Zu-Zuko…so good…”

She lifted one hand back to grasp his hair, damp with perspiration. She wrapped her ankles and feet around his muscular calves, using that leverage to raise her hips, following his movements and gliding herself fiercely onto his erection. She heard him growl behind her as he shifted to a furious pace.

“Play with you breasts, Katara!” he ordered with a growl as he watched them bounce, “Pleasure your lovely breasts!”

Katara’s hands immediately flew to her bouncing mounds and she began to squeeze and knead them, pinching her hard nipples, causing her to cry out in pleasure. Yes, she missed this. Missed Zuko’s passionate fire and she wanted all of that above, beneath, around, and inside her. She licked her suddenly dry lips and she heard him groan huskily into her ear.

Forcefully wrenching her eyes from between their legs, Katara looked up to see that he was staring at her face. A wicked and utterly sensual smile curved his handsome lips, causing her to shudder against him and clench around his pounding length. He shifted beneath her and her eyes widened when the angle caused his shaft to slide and stroke across that sensitive spot inside her that seemed to generate electric sparks all over her body. The incredible pleasure was overwhelming her and she could not help closing her eyes in expectation of her imminent release. There was a sudden tightening of his hands on her hips as he growled.

“Watch,” he commanded. “Keep your eyes open!”

“Please…I can’t,” she moaned breathlessly, “I’m…so close…”
“I know, I am too,” he said in a more soothing tone as he nuzzled her head before he added in a more strained voice, “I can feel you tightening around me, but I want you to see yourself. I want you to see how beautiful you are when you come.”

Katara forced her eyes open and she looked back at the mirror to gaze at the place where they were joined. The sight was almost her undoing and her breath hitched.

“She begged wantonly as she writhed frantically against him. “Please. Ohh!”

“Say my name, Katara,” he growled as he sucked on her earlobe. His muscles flexed and strained with his movements, rippling under his skin as he tried to desperately hold his orgasm at bay long enough to usher hers.

“Zuko,” she moaned as she grasped her breasts more tightly.

“Louder!” he commanded.

“Zuko!” she cried more loudly as she felt him throb inside her.

Zuko loved it when she lost herself in her passion. His waterbender looked up and their eyes locked and connected, and he felt as if she pulled him into her soul. She really was perfect for him. Feeling his own end approaching, Zuko reached down between them and began to roughly rub his fingers on her clit at the same time he thrust his hips up almost violently into her.

“Scream my name, Katara!” he roared.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed piercingly as fire erupted within her and her toes curled in ecstasy as an intensely powerful euphoria ignited her entire body.

Zuko looked away from intensely admiring the pleasure on her face as she arched, and he gasped as he watched her juices squirt out of her in a rush, coating his thighs and hers, and spraying across the mirror standing before them as she bucked and writhed against him as she continued screaming. The visual and the sensation of her pussy rippling and clamping tightly, almost painfully so, around his throbbing cock heralded his own release.
“Katara!” Zuko roared as his hips surged deeply into her, his sensitive tip colliding with the opening of her womb, and he erupted inside her welcoming heat, shuddering violently against her back.

Katara moaned as she felt big, thick jets of his seed splash hotly and continuously inside her. His loud groans and growls and his heavy panting breaths near her ear only caused her pleasure to increase as his hips jerked erratically up into her.

Zuko gasped at the intensity and amazing pleasure of it all before he sagged against the back of the chair, totally spent and satiated. His body continued to spasm and his cock continued to twitch and pulse inside her still clenching walls as he gently brought her sweat-slick back against his chest. She was moaning and trembling as she slowly released her breasts from her rough grasp and rested trustingly against him.

He lifted his eyes and was glad to see that she still had hers opened, although they were half-lidded. Panting harshly, heart pounding wildly in his chest, Zuko reached his hand up to smooth her hair back from her flushed face. She was breathing equally as hard as him as she stared at him with a pleased smile on her lips.

“La, that was incredible,” she sighed, her voice a little huskier because of her last scream.

Zuko smiled, both content and smug, as he caressed her cheek.

“Agni, I love you, Katara,” he crooned huskily, “That was perfectly amazing.”

“I love you, too,” the waterbender murmured lovingly as her smile widened a little.

“I want you to see one final thing,” he purred amorously before he demanded softly, “Look back at the mirror.”

Curious, she looked back, but before she could ask what he meant, he grasped her hips gently in his big hands and slowly lifted her off him. Katara watched as his semi-flaccid shaft slipped out of her and rested beneath her bottom. Zuko again moved his thighs so he could spread her widely. Breath hitching in her chest, Katara watched as he reached between her legs and spread her entrance open with his fingers, stretching her still quivering pussy wide. Katara’s eyes widened in fascination when she saw his whitish seed flow steadily out of her, leaking down the cleft of her rear and down his sac to mingle with her juices that had already soaked the towel beneath him. Ever since they got married, she had noticed that after their lovemaking Zuko enjoyed watching his seed pour out of her core, dribble down from the corner of her mouth, or coat the skin of her stomach and chest. Now she could understand why he was captivated by the sight. It was tremendously erotic.

“Fascinating, isn’t it?” he rasped against her ear as he dipped two fingers inside her.

She gasped and bucked at the sensation. Zuko curled his fingers, urging more of his semen to seep out before he pulled away. Holding her gaze, he lifted his fingers up to his face and licked them. Katara’s heart pounded.

“Mm, delicious,” he murmured before he brought his fingers up to her mouth as he rasped, “Taste the combination of our love, Katara.”

Katara felt her stomach quiver at his words. Keeping her eyes locked with his, she grasped his wrist as she engulfed her mouth over his drenched fingers. She heard him let out a guttural, animalistic sound as he watched her suck his fingers clean of their tangy and salty flavor, putting on a show by using her tongue to curl around and lick his fingers.

“So hot,” he groaned before he rasped, “You’re going to be the death of me, Katara.”

Katara pulled his fingers away and laughed at his words. It wasn’t the first time he had told her that and it made her feel powerful and sexy to know she affected him that much. Suddenly a yawn slipped past her lips and she blushed in embarrassment. Zuko chuckled as he hugged her affectionately to him.

“Come. You need to rest,” he said before he added teasingly, “You earned it.”

“Damn right I did,” she quipped playfully, only causing him to chuckle again.

Gathering her gently in his arms, Zuko rose from the chair and walked away from the mirror toward their large bed. Katara decided that she would clean the chair and the mirror from any evidence of their activities later. Zuko turned down the cover of their bed with one hand before he deposited her on the mattress. With a pleased sigh, the Fire Lord lay down next to her and pulled her against him. She nuzzled against his still sweaty chest before she lifted her face to smile at him.

Her azure eyes showed her fatigue. He would let her rest for a little while before he woke her up again so they could eat something after missing dinner. Then he would make love to her again. He gave her a small smile in return as he brushed her slightly damp hair away from her face and lowered his head to press his lips on her temple.

Katara smiled sleepily at him and she raised her head so he could kiss her lips. She sighed softly against his caressing mouth before she pulled away to settled back against him and relaxed in his arms. It was always his arms that made her the feel safe, loved, and at home.

No words were said or needed to express their thoughts and feelings as they basked in the peaceful afterglow of their lovemaking, curled into each other and wrapped in each other’s arms. As she began to drift into a restful slumber, Katara was glad that they were both able to surpass this obstacle. Their bond was stronger and unbreakable, their love fierce and without compare. By helping each other and being there for each other, she was positive they would overcome anything that came their way.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Zuko sat silently on his throne as he watched his advisors murmur amongst themselves as they threw disapproving looks at Katara. His wife, dressed in elegant, formal red and golden robes, was sitting on an elaborate cushion embroidered with red, black, and gold designs he had custom made for her as her new throne. It was placed below the dais before the wall of fire next to the marble stairs that led to his throne and directly facing the advisors. Iroh was sitting next to Advisor Chao and they were frowning at the men. As soon as Zuko had helped Katara sit on her throne before he took his, he had voiced his opinion on having his Fire Lady participate in some of the meetings. The council members were not pleased to say the least.

“It is unheard of to have a woman participate in such discussions,” Wei spoke up gruffly.

Zuko glared at him.

“Besides, we all know that women do not have the capability to understand such difficult matters,” Wei added in a condescending tone as he eyed Katara with a patronizing look, “Especially women that come from uneducated and unsophisticated nations.”

Gritting his teeth in anger, Zuko was about to react in defense of his wife, but a look from his uncle made him pause. He remembered Iroh telling him that he should allow Katara to prove herself capable to withstand the advisors’ insults and rise above them if she was to convince them of her worth. Although it took everything in him to force himself not to immediately defend his wife, Zuko took a deep breath as he waited for Katara to respond.

Sitting on the large, elaborate cushion Zuko gifted her with, Katara inwardly seethed with anger and indignation at the men’s supercilious words. It was difficult to remain calm and not immediately react in fury to their insults, but she kept her composure. She would prove them wrong.

The advisors watched in surprise when their Fire Lady smiled serenely at them all, though they could detect the blazing gleam in her cobalt eyes.

“Uneducated and unsophisticated nations, you say?” the waterbender spoke up with a deceptively calm, sweet voice, “I assure you that we are a literate and intelligent people. We are not a land of primitives and savages as you always try to make us seem. It just shows how ignorant and egotistical you are.”

Wei and the other men spluttered in outrage at the offense. Zuko rubbed his hand against his mouth to hide his amused grin while Iroh cleared his throat to hide his chuckles.

“Even so, you are still a woman and a woman always lets her emotions control her,” one of the oldest advisors spoke up angrily, “Women don’t think rationally.”

“Oh, is that so?” Katara replied in the same honeyed tone even as she raised a mocking eyebrow, “And men don’t allow their pride and egos to get in the way when it comes to a compromise? The first solution men resort to when dealing with a problem is violence and war. Is that really more rational?”

A few men opened their mouths as if to retort before they stopped and frowned at her words. A few others murmured amongst themselves. They all paused when the advisor rose angrily to his feet and pointed an accusing finger at her.

“You sit there as if you have a right, but we’ve noticed how weak you’ve become,” he growled out, “You are only a weakness to our lord and this nation!”

The fire wall blazed almost to the ceiling as Zuko clenched his hands into fists as he angrily glared at the man. He paused, however, when he noticed the advisor’s eyes widened in shock as he stared at Katara and not at him. Zuko turned to observe his wife.

The men watched as the Fire Lady remained tranquil on her throne as she stared at them evenly as she reached down and splayed her fingers outward over the floor. They gasped and stared in awe as ice began to form around the cushion she was sitting on before it began to spread outward on the marble floor, slithering toward them in intricate patterns like a spider web. They watched as ice began to creep up the walls, quickly extinguishing the various torches that hung on them. The only fire that remained was the now calmly blazing fire wall before the Fire Lord’s throne as it threw ominous shadows around them. The men shivered when the air around them turned bitingly cold before they froze in fear as the ice slithering on the floor finally reached them and began to slowly crawl on the cushions they were sitting on. They could see their breath misting before them as their breath accelerated.

“Weak?” the blue-eyed waterbender spoke up in a calm, serene tone before she firmly added, “Not anymore.”

They stared at her with wide eyes filled with both fear and admiration. She stared at them steadily for a few more moments. With a flick of her wrist, the ice disappeared as quickly as it had formed and the temperature returned to normal. Placing her hands demurely on her lap, the Fire Lady gave them a warm, amiable smile and the men let out relieved breaths as they sagged in their spots. On his throne, Zuko mentally applauded his wife for her display. He could see that the men were beginning to take her more seriously.

“I only ask to participate in meetings regarding the problems of the common people as well as both Water Tribes,” she told them in a more congenial tone, “After all, I am more suited to understanding what both entail. I had vowed to help my husband in any way I can with his rule.”

The men quickly turned amongst themselves and began to discuss the matter with each other. Zuko smirked as he caught sight of the incredulous expression on Wei’s face as he watched his fellow advisors actually contemplate the Fire Lady’s request. Zuko looked away from his advisors and glanced down at his wife. As if sensing his intense gaze, Katara looked up at him and smiled triumphantly.

A long moment later—after much arguing—the men finally returned their attention to the royal couple.

“After much debate,” another of the oldest advisors spoke up, “we have decided to give Fire Lady Katara a chance to prove herself capable of handling such issues for a trial period of six months.”

Both Katara’s and Zuko’s eyes widened at the men’s decision before they looked at each other with smiles. Katara turned back to gift the men with a large, grateful smile that made them flush.

“Thank you,” she told them sincerely, “I swear that I will do my best.”

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Panting as heavily as the moaning woman beneath him, Jet rolled away from her and lay at her side, staring at the ceiling silently as he waited for his body to come down from his release. A moment later, he felt her place a hand on his sweaty chest and he turned to look at her. There was a sated smile on her thin lips, her long, black hair fell over her pale shoulder to partially cover her small breast, and her dark eyes glinted in satisfaction. But Jet hardly paid attention since his thoughts had already turned to smiling, plump lips, chocolate hair, tanned skin, and lively, blue eyes. Eyes that had look at him in fear the last time he had seen them.

“What are you thinking?” Mai’s voice interrupted his thoughts as she caressed his chest.

“Nothing,” he responded with a shrug before he smirked at her as he reached out to fondle her small, pale breast, hoping to distract her from asking any more questions. His male ego grew at the thought that thanks to his incredible skills in bed, he was able to teach Mai to be a better bed partner. She was almost as insatiable as him.

Mai let out a small groan even as she stared sharply into his eyes. She knew he was thinking of the waterbending wench and the thought angered her, not so much because she cared about Jet, but because the waterbender was receiving such attention. Yet, she did not say anything to upset him. She did not want to lose him and find herself searching for another lover while she bided her time until Zuko called her back.

Ever since Zuko and the waterbender had unexpectedly returned to the Fire Nation, Mai had continued her trysts with Jet since their interests ran the same way. Jet was a great lover who held nothing back. She especially enjoyed it when he spent himself inside her when he lost control. It was fortunate that she was knowledgeable of ways she could prevent pregnancy. It would not do to become pregnant with Jet’s bastard child.

It always made her wonder how it would feel if Zuko did the same. The few times Zuko had allowed them to be together, he was always in control of himself, his only goal was to achieve his end, not really interested in anything beyond that. He never lingered after, but hastened to redress and leave to attend to one duty or another. And that was why her hatred for Katara grew, because Mai knew that Zuko was treating the waterbender in a way he never did her in the entire four years they had been a couple. And now she was seething that her plan on seducing Zuko while Jet did the same to Katara had gone awry because of their sudden return to the Fire Nation. She inwardly scowled.

“Do you have any ideas what we can do to separate Zuko and the wench—Katara?” she asked, quickly stopping the insult so as to not upset him.

At her words, Jet stopped his fondling and frowned. He moved away from her and sat up on the edge of the bed as he got lost in his thoughts. For the past few months, he had begun to question his actions and his plan to take Katara for himself. Admittedly, he still wanted her like he had not wanted any other woman before, but his last encounter with her disquieted him. He had tried to convince her one last time to run away with him, but she had vehemently refused. Frustrated by her constant refusal, he had stepped forward to embrace and kiss her, but her reaction had shocked him. She had not angrily slapped him or shoved him away from her like he had thought she would, but she had backed away from him with wide, frightened eyes as if she thought he was going to maim and violate her. Before he could ask her what was wrong, her husband had arrived, wrapped her protectively in his arm, and ushered her away.

Katara’s expression and reaction to his approach had not only confused him, but it had pained him as well. Did she abhor his touch that badly? With a sigh, Jet ran his hand through his messy, dark hair. Silently, he stood up from the rumpled bed with the naked woman still on it and began picking up his discarded clothes.

“What are you doing?” Mai asked with a frown as she sat up, not bothering to cover herself up as she watched him get dressed. They were in her room, so they did not need to stop their tryst for fear of getting caught.

“I need to meet up with my friends,” he responded smoothly.

“You haven’t answered my question, Jet,” she said coldly.

Jet was silent a moment as he pulled on his trousers and tied them before he turned to look at her.

“I don’t have any ideas,” he began before he reluctantly added with a sigh, “because I don’t want to separate them anymore.”

“What?” Mai exclaimed in disbelief before she narrowed her dark eyes, “Why?”

“I’ve come to realize that Katara will never want to be with me,” Jet responded as he finished dressing before he added bitterly, “And I can see that she’s happy with her husband, though I can’t understand how she can stand him.”

“You promised to help me separate them,” she hissed at him.

“You shouldn’t trust everybody’s word, dearie,” he told her with a mocking grin as he turned to look at her. His eyes raked her naked form before he again looked into her angry eyes.
“You should give up on Zuko,” he advised as he scratched his stubbly chin, “Maybe find yourself a man who can care for you.”

“Oh, and are you such a man?” she asked sardonically.

“Me? Hell no,” Jet replied with an amused chuckle as he strapped his hook swords to his back.

His tone more serious, he added, “If I can’t have Katara, then I don’t want another woman. And since I can’t have her, I won’t sacrifice my freedom and bachelorhood for anyone else. I love the pleasures women can bring too much to tie myself to someone that’s not Katara.”

“My, such devotion,” Mai replied derisively.

Jet shrugged as he stared at her.

“You know the bastard’s not gonna run into your arms when he has a woman like Katara,” he told her frankly.

“Shut up!” she shrieked as she balled her hand into a fist. “I will take Zuko back!”

“You’re only wasting your time, Mai,” Jet drawled with a sigh, “It’s obvious the firebender’s madly in love with Katara, as she is with him. They’re not gonna throw each other away for somethin’ less.”

Even though he knew it was true, his heart hurt at the thought. He had spent all these years thinking of Katara, dreaming about her when he had been bedridden with pain after the fiasco in Ba Sing Se years ago, fantasizing about having her body, kindness, and love all to himself. It had angered him to know that she had married that damn scarred firebender and it killed him to think that the arrogant bastard was able to make love to her. But he had been determined to seduce her and take her away from Zuko nonetheless. However, he was done lying to himself, thinking he had a chance with her. It was time he let her go.

“Shut up!” Mai screamed again as she threw a pillow at him, which he easily evaded. “Zuko will be mine! And nothing, not even that stupid waterbending bitch, will stop me!”
Jet narrowed his eyes for her threat and insult to Katara and he growled. He was inwardly surprised that the usually calm and passive noblewoman was anything but at the moment.

“The Fire Lord will end you if you try to hurt Katara,” he warned before he added darkly, “And he won’t be the only one you’ll have to deal with.”

“Get out, you traitor!” she yelled as she again threw another pillow at him. “Get out!”

“You really should stop this obsession you have with the bastard,” Jet tried one more time to make her see reason. “Can’t you see he doesn’t care for you?”

“Shut up, shut up, shut up!” Mai growled. “He will be mine!”

Jet shook his head at her stubbornness before he shrugged.

“Don’t say I didn’t try to warn ya, darling,” he drawled as he strode to her window and opened it. Just as he climbed onto the windowsill, he turned his head to regard her with a smirk.

“Well, our little trysts were fun while it lasted. Thanks, Lady Mai,” he said rakishly. He gave her a casual salute before he dropped down the window and disappeared.

Mai stared angrily at the window before she closed her eyes to compose herself. The egotistical rogue really knew how to get a rise out of her, whether in bed or in conversations. Damn him.

Once she regained her usual composure, Mai rose from the bed and walked toward the window. Without looking out, she closed it and drew the curtains together. She turned around and glanced back at the untidy bed where she had found her pleasure just a moment ago. With a shrug, she turned away and headed to her bathroom to bathe.

“I don’t care what Jet says,” she spoke to herself as she flicked her long, dark hair over her shoulder. “I don’t care what I have to do. Zuko will be mine.”
End of Part Seven Amended Understandings

Before they knew it, one year had flown by since their wedding. Both the Fire Lord and his Fire Lady had grand birthday celebrations where all of Katara’s family and their friends had visited. Katara and Zuko had enjoyed an intimate dinner for their one year anniversary and reminisced about the pleasant times they had enjoyed together. Zuko had commissioned one of the best painters of the Fire Nation to create a portrait of the royal couple that now hung above the fireplace in their room and another of Katara standing under their cherry blossom tree which Zuko had placed in his study to admire.

After a long debate with himself, Iroh had decided to sell his shop in Ba Sing Se so he could permanently move back with his family, although he did open a new Jasmine Dragon in the Fire Nation capital. It became popular quickly and people from the Earth Kingdom even came all the way to visit because they missed his tea. They tried to convince him to come back to the Earth Kingdom, but he politely refused.

Despite her son’s protests, Ursa had visited Azula a few times, but she was welcomed with hostility from her daughter every time. After every failed attempt to get close to her daughter, Ursa would shut herself in her room for a few days and only came out when Katara or Jee finally persuaded her. Zuko tried to gently convince her to give up since he hated seeing his mother sad and in pain, but Ursa always retorted that she had hope that her daughter would one day forgive her and get better. Zuko did not have the heart to disabuse her hopes.

After a long and frustrating time, Katara was finally able to convince the Court Council members to allow her to fully participate in some of their meetings with the Fire Lord. She had proven how adept she was at giving suggestions and some reluctantly admired her skills. However, a few of the older advisors, such as Wei, always argued against any of her ideas. But she comforted herself with the knowledge that Zuko always agreed with her when he knew she was right. Unlike most of his advisors who only cared for power and prestige, Katara was compassionate and willing to make compromises, which made Zuko’s treaties with other nations run more smoothly. Zuko could not be more proud for having such a wife.

With much practice, Katara was now skillful in hand-to-hand combat and archery, both with the actual bow and arrow and with her waterbending, though it would take a few more years before she was truly proficient. She was also getting better at handling Zuko’s white fire and the sparring sessions always brought a sense of adrenaline and excitement to her at going against such high level firebending. Even though Zuko was still concerned he could accidentally hurt her, he looked forward to their sparring matches.

Although it still made her a bit apprehensive, Katara had mastered bloodbending—thanks to Zuko volunteering to be her test subject. Though she knew he enjoyed it when she used her bloodbending to manipulate him in the bedroom. She would use her bloodbending to hold him still while she took pleasure from his body or keep his hips at a certain angle when he stroked a particular, pleasurable spot. The thought always brought a blush and an amused smile to her face. Thanks to her training she no longer had to use a full moon to bloodbend.

It was a year which had brought some worries and problems, but also much happiness for the royal couple. Their love was still strong and passionate, but sometimes they needed their space to enjoy time to themselves. Zuko would go to his study or to the practice arena and Katara would spend her time in the Fire Lady chamber, the grand library, or visiting some of the noblewomen that she was able to tolerate. Even if they sometimes sought a respite from their constant need of one another, they always came back to each other in their room when night came.

And like any normal couple they argued, especially considering their stubborn and hot tempers. After an argument, Katara would angrily retreat to the Fire Lady bedchamber and Zuko just as angrily would shut himself in their room or his study. They would stay like that for a few hours until one of them surrendered and sought the other to apologize. And of course, he or she would immediately be forgiven, making up with fierce and passionate lovemaking, but never lacking in love. They even joked to themselves that they liked arguing because it led to hot make up sex.

However, there still had not been one sign of Jianguo and the rebels’ whereabouts which placed a damper on their complete happiness. But Zuko did not give up in finding them and ending Jianguo’s life. He had even visited his father once again to see if he could give him any clues, but Ozai would not answer his questions and only taunted him. He did, however, ask how Ursa was doing to which Zuko coolly replied that she was happier than ever and left as he watched Ozai’s pained frown.

Sitting on the throne behind the wall of fire in the meeting room, Zuko watched impassively as one of the governors from one of the villages situated miles away from the capital entered and bowed before him before kneeling on the cushion as he sought an audience with the Fire Lord.

“You said you have something important to bring to my attention,” Zuko spoke unemotionally as he regarded the man.

The governor was rather short and stocky with a protruding belly, his graying hair falling in frizzy strands around his shoulders, though his slightly aged face seemed open and unassuming.

“Yes, my lord,” the governor replied as he inclined his head in reverence before he looked up with a worried frown, “First, I must apologize for bringing such distressing news to you this late, but you see, Your Highness, I—”

“What news?” Zuko interrupted, ignoring the lengthy and flowering speech he assumed the man was
The governor paused with his mouth opened at the command as if he did not know how to proceed now that his rehearsed speech was cut short. Composing himself, he cleared his throat as his frown deepened.

“The peasants in the village I have the privilege of looking after are rebelling, my lord,” the man finally said when the Fire Lord raised an impatient eyebrow.

“Rebelling? How so?” Zuko asked with a frown.

“Not only are they refusing to pay their taxes, but they are refusing to work and they have attacked my home!” the governor explained indignantly. “I’m afraid their actions might cause the same thing to happen here in the capital. I ask that you send soldiers immediately to stop their foolishness.”

The advisors sitting in their respective places immediately began to speculate and murmur amongst themselves. Zuko frowned deeply at the news since everything had been peaceful in the Fire Nation since he married Katara, although he was not surprised that a problem had eventually sprang up. But still, what was the reason behind the villagers’ revolt? Life in the Fire Nation was better than it had been years before.

“Why are they rebelling?” Zuko asked the governor calculatingly.

“Pardon me, my lord, but how should I know what the dirty peasants are thinking?” the governor answered with contempt.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the man’s discriminatory words. They reminded him of how he used to refer to Katara as the “water peasant girl” when she was much more than that.

Sensing his disapproval, the governor lower his head and fidgeted nervously. The advisors also shifted in their spots as they waited to see what their lord decided to do.

“I will look into this situation immediately,” Zuko finally spoke up in his usual passive tone.
“Oh, thank you, Your Majesty,” the man exclaimed as he bowed once again. After a few more exaggerated praises, the governor was escorted out of the room.

As soon as the door was closed after him, the advisors began to demand Zuko immediately send soldiers to stop the revolts. Zuko tuned out what his advisors were saying as he frowned, deep in thought. Did Jianguo have anything to do with this? Though, it would be hard for Jianguo not to be spotted since there were wanted posters of him everywhere. However, there was something in the governor’s words, or perhaps his attitude, that made Zuko distrust him. He would have to investigate before he decided to take action or not.

Resting in one of the sitting rooms of the palace, Katara and her mother-in-law discussed a new project Katara had proposed a few days ago regarding a more profitable trade between the Fire Nation and the Water Tribes. After they had all the details ready, Katara would present it to Zuko and the Council members. Jee was sitting silently next to the older noblewoman as he gave them helpful tips.

Katara was once again distracted from what Ursa was saying as the sound of baby giggles reached her ears. The waterbender glanced to where Jiao was sitting, tickling her five-month-old son, Ichiro. Katara could not help staring enviously at Jiao and her child since she still had not gotten pregnant yet.

When would it be her turn?

Zuko had not mentioned anything about it, but she knew he was worried, too. Katara could not stop herself from sometimes feeling sad and depressed at the thought that it was her fault she was causing Zuko problems with his advisors. She was faithfully taking the blend Yin-Min gave her, but she was still not with child. However, she comforted herself with the fact that their marriage was still new and there were many more years to come.

The waterbender was distracted from her thoughts when she caught Jee looking wistfully at the dark-haired princess as Ursa gracefully took a sip from her cup of tea. Katara mentally shook her head in exasperation. She had tried once more to convince Jee to confess his feelings, but he stubbornly refused. She had even asked Zuko again what he thought about his mother finding a new love and he had reiterated that he disliked the idea, which was why she did not pressure Jee that much.

Maybe she had been going about it the wrong way and was talking to the wrong people. Men. They were so pigheaded. She would have to give hints to Ursa instead and see what the woman thought.

For the third time, Katara was interrupted from her thoughts when Zuko appeared in the doorway.
Her heart skipped a beat at the sight of him and a large smile appeared on her face when his gaze immediately landed on her. His dark, straight hair now reached down a little below his shoulder blades, his gold fire crown nestled regally on his head, and she could not stop herself from admiring the striking masculine image he made.

“Zuko,” she called out happily.

She watched as he gave her a small smile as he entered the room and approached them, but she frowned when she noticed his distracted expression.

“Is there something wrong?” she asked when he sat down next to her after he greeted his mother and Jee.

Zuko glanced at his wife, not at all surprised that she was able to detect his mood despite the cool expression he wore.

“One of the villages’ governors asked for an audience today,” Zuko began, “Apparently, the villagers are rebelling.”

“What?” Jee exclaimed gruffly just as Ursa gasped.

“Why?” Katara asked with a worried frown.

“I don’t know,” Zuko replied with a shake of his head, “The governor said that he didn’t know either and insisted I send soldiers to stop them.”

“But there has to be a reason why they’re revolting,” Katara said as her face took on a pensive expression. Then her eyes widened and she hesitantly asked, “Do you think it’s…Jianguo?”

A dark look appeared on Zuko’s face at the mention of the rebel’s name and the trepidation he could detect in Katara’s voice. Composing himself, he reached down to place his hand over her clenched fist that lay on her lap and squeezed comfortingy.

“I don’t know, but I will investigate,” he told her.
And if it is Jianguo, I will kill him, he growled mentally.

Giving her hand one last squeeze, Zuko released her and stood up. He glanced down to see his wife look up at him questioningly.

“There are some things I have to see to. I will see you later,” he told her before he shifted his attention to his admiral. “Jee, please follow me.”

“Yes, my lord,” the older firebender said as he stood up as well.

Frowning, the women watched them leave the room before they looked at each other. With a sigh, Ursa insisted they continue with what they’ve been doing and Katara reluctantly agreed even though her thoughts were on the news Zuko had brought.

Once they had the last details finished, Katara and Ursa relaxed and silently sipped their tea while Jiao quietly played with her son. Placing her teacup down, Katara regarded her serene mother-in-law with curious eyes and mused that this was the best opportunity to talk to her.

“I’ve been curious about something,” Katara began slowly as she pretended to choose a pastry from the plate on the table, “Have you ever thought of remarrying or finding another companion?”

Ursa frowned slightly at the question before she brought her cup down.

“No,” she replied without hesitation.

The waterbender suppressed a frown at the woman’s quick answer.

Like mother, like son, she mused with a mental sigh.

“Would you change your mind if you found a good man?” Katara asked carefully.
“Probably not,” the noblewoman responded just as assuredly as before.

“But why not?” the blue-eyed Fire Lady asked with a frown. “You’re still young. You don’t have to live alone.”

A gentle smile appeared on the dark-haired woman’s face as she stared at her frowning daughter-in-law.

“I’m not alone. I have Zuko, Iroh, and you to love,” she responded before she added with a smile,
“And any future grandchildren you and Zuko give me.”

Katara smiled at the last sentence before her frown reappeared.

“But that is not the same as having that one special person,” Katara insisted.

Ursa was silent a moment as she regarded the waterbender and processed her words before she let out a small sigh.

“I was sixteen when I was married to Ozai,” Ursa recounted in a soft voice, “One year later I gave birth to Zuko and I thought I’d never be happier. I was young and foolish, and Ozai was so handsome and charming, so I could not help but fall in love with him without realizing what kind of man he really was.”

Katara did not say anything as she listened to her mother-in-law tell her story. She could detect the pain and sorrow in Ursa’s voice and her heart went out to this kind woman who had suffered so much at the hands of a cruel man. She watched as Ursa took a deep breath before she let out a quivering sigh.

“I…I don’t want to be hurt in such a way by a man ever again,” Ursa confessed quietly. “I don’t want my heart to be broken a second time.”

“I understand what you must feel,” Katara told her gently before she added, “But you can’t constantly live in fear of getting hurt because it’ll only stop you from your happiness. Trust me, I know.”
A small frown marred Ursa’s delicate features as she thought over the waterbender’s words.

“You do make a good point, dear,” she said before she shook her head, “But I don’t think I will ever be able to love again.”

“You won’t if you refuse to believe you could,” Katara told her softly.

Ursa was once again silent as she contemplated her words and Katara’s hope rose when she saw that her mother-in-law was really thinking about the subject.

“Even if I was looking for a new relationship, no man has approached me with such intentions,” Ursa finally spoke up with a shake of her head.

“That’s because you haven’t been looking,” Katara replied with a tiny, mysterious smile, “If you did, you would’ve noticed you are wanted.”

Ursa’s golden eyes widened at such a possibility.

“And do you know by whom?” she asked curiously.

“No,” Katara lied.

She had promised not to reveal Jee’s feelings, but that did not mean she could not give hints to Ursa.

“But I’m sure there is someone,” she added, “After all, you are still a young, beautiful and wonderful woman. What man would not want you?”

Even Ozai still does, Katara added mentally. Zuko had told her Ozai would always ask about Ursa. It was obvious Ozai still cared for her, but that did not justify what he had done to her and their son.

Katara was silent as she let Ursa contemplate her words for a moment.
“If you don’t mind me asking,” the young brunette began carefully, “but would you prefer having a lover instead of a husband? I suppose a lover will be less complicated…”

Even before Katara finished her sentence, Ursa was already shaking her head.

“I will not disrespect my son by taking a lover so brazenly,” the noblewoman said firmly.

Katara suppressed a delighted smile. Jee would be so happy to know that. Now if only she could point Ursa his way without making it too obvious.

“Okay, so would you marry a man with a noble title?” Katara asked carefully. If Ursa said yes, then Jee would not have much of a chance.

“No,” Ursa responded firmly.

Katara could only gape at her quick and steady response.

“Truthfully, I would prefer a man with no noble title,” Ursa explained slowly as she twirled her teacup in her hands, “The noblemen only want to gain power and become family to the Fire Lord. I will be used much the same way Ozai used me.”

“I can see your point,” Katara agreed with a nod of her head.

Bringing her cup to her lips to take a small sip of the delicious tea, Katara brought it back down and cleared her throat softly.

“There are a lot of good men to choose from that don’t come from noble birth,” the waterbender spoke up casually, “Like physicians and scholars. And then those from the military like generals, admirals, guards…”

“Admirals?” Ursa whispered.

Katara paused and suppressed an excited smile. From all the others, Ursa focused on admirals? How “Yes, admirals,” Katara repeated and then nonchalantly added, “Oh, that reminds me, Jee’s an admiral. He must have lots of women flocking to him.”

Katara watched as a frown appeared on Ursa’s face before the woman shook her head.

“How can he, if he is always guarding me?” she asked.

“That’s true,” Katara pretended to muse. “Zuko has not found someone else to replace him, so Jee hasn’t had time to look for a woman to marry. Or maybe he hasn’t gotten married because he has a lover?”

“Admiral Jee would never dare!” Ursa exclaimed.

Both women’s eyes widened at her outburst before Ursa cleared her throat and more calmly took another sip of her tea.

“Why not?” Katara replied as she eyed her mother-in-law before she gave a casual shrug, “Jee’s a grown man. He’s probably lonely and needs a companion. If he doesn’t have a lover or an intended at the moment maybe he will one of these days.”

Ursa frowned at her daughter-in-law’s words before she felt herself flush at her reaction. What did it matter to her what Admiral Jee did or whose companionship he sought? She was brought out of her thoughts when Katara continued speaking.

“I think Jee will make a fine husband for any woman, don’t you think?” the waterbender said smoothly as she nibbled on a cookie, “Always protective and loyal. Not to mention he is a good-looking man.”

Katara subtly glanced up and saw Ursa looking down at her tea with a pensive expression. Katara suppressed a grin. She was rather good at this. Hopefully she was able to push Ursa’s attention in Jee’s direction. If not his, then someone else’s. Though she preferred Ursa give Jee a chance, Katara would support her if Ursa chose someone else as long as she was happy and not lonely anymore. Despite her claims, Katara could tell her mother-in-law was very lonely in the palace. After all, her grown son was married and that meant he spent most of his time with his wife.
Drinking the last of her tea, Katara stood up and smiled at Ursa.

“I’m going to visit Yin-Min for a while,” she said, “I’ll see you at dinner.”

“Uh, yes, dear,” Ursa replied distractedly as she again returned her attention to her cooling tea.

Smiling, Katara walked toward the exit and motioned for Jiao to follow her so Ursa could stay behind and mull over her words without any interruptions. As the two of them rounded the end of the corridor, Jiao let out a small giggle.

“I think you did an excellent job, my lady,” she congratulated as she rocked her gurgling son in her arms.

Katara laughed quietly.

“I can now understand why some people enjoy being matchmakers,” she said. She grinned when the thought reminded her of Iroh and how he had tried so hard to bring her and Zuko together. Then more seriously, she softly added, “I just want to see two people I care about happy.”

“Well, even if Lady Ursa doesn’t chose Admiral Jee, at least she’s giving the thought of finding love a second chance,” Jiao said kindly.

“That’s true,” Katara replied with a nod before she smiled as she tickled Ichiro under his chubby chin.

Ichiro giggled as he tried to grab her finger and the two women laughed. They stopped when they noticed Kuo making his way toward them.

“My lady,” the guard greeted as he bowed his head to Katara before he looked up to smile fondly at his wife and son. “I’ve come to take my family out to the city. Fire Lord Zuko has dismissed me for the day.”
“That’s nice,” Katara replied as she smiled at them, “Well, have fun.”

“Thank you, my lady,” they replied as they bowed their heads at her.

Katara continued down the corridor as Kuo greeted his family. Glancing over her shoulder, Katara watched as Kuo leaned down to swiftly kiss Jiao’s lips before he took his giggling son into his arms. The waterbender turned back around and continued walking as she again felt that pang of jealousy in her chest. She shook her head and shoved the feeling away.

Wanting to distract herself, she thought back to what Jiao had said about Ursa giving someone else a chance. Katara frowned slightly. If Ursa did end up choosing someone else, that would surely break Jee’s heart. She hoped she was able to steer Ursa’s thoughts toward Jee. He loved Ursa and would protect her with his life. However, if the two of them did end up reciprocating their feelings, Katara would have to employ all her feminine wiles to convince Zuko to allow Jee to court his mother.

She cringed. She just hoped Zuko did not get too mad.

A dark figure darted into the quiet village and hid behind a pile of wood. Carefully scanning his surroundings in the dark of night, the individual waited silently for a few seconds before jumping noiselessly onto the roof of a house. The light from the crescent moon glinted off the hilts of two swords strapped to his back and shone on his blue and white mask as he stealthily jumped from rooftop to rooftop in search of any disturbances. As the hours passed, however, nothing happened in the small village. The only sounds heard were the rustling of leaves as the wind caressed the trees and the occasional bark of a wolf-dog.

Landing on the roof of the governor’s home without being caught by the sleepy guards, Zuko frowned behind his Blue Spirit mask. For the past several nights, he had come to the village to investigate the revolt the governor complained about, but nothing had occurred since then. He could see the damage to one part of the governor’s house and that the crops were not doing as well as they should.

A large river ran alongside the village where the people gathered fish, but Zuko also knew they had stopped fishing. Such evidence showed that the governor had not been lying. Yet, there had to be a reason why the villagers refused to work and had attacked the governor’s home. Try as he might, Zuko had not been able to find much information from the conversations he had listened to behind the safety of the shadows. He did not want to make his presence known if indeed this was Jianguo’s doing. He did not want to alert the rebel and have him escape.

Frown deepening, Zuko continued to silently roam the streets for a few more hours then decided to return to the palace before Katara missed his presence if she woke up. Maybe he could rouse her and coax her into a quick round of lovemaking before they went back to sleep. Suppressing a grin at the thought, Zuko left the village and carefully entered the darkness of the forest, walking to the place he had left his ostrich-horse.

He had just spotted the animal grazing calmly beneath a tree when an arrow shot passed his head and struck a tree. Swiftly, Zuko pulled his swords from their sheaths and spun around in the direction the arrow had come from, his stance alert and defensive.

His eyes widened behind his mask and his stance almost faltered at the unexpected person that stood before him.

It was a woman. He could not miss the feminine curves hidden beneath the long, burgundy gown she was wearing. The gown was gathered at the center of her chest with some kind of brooch that resembled a seashell and silky cords, but it left her shoulders and upper arms bare under the moonlight. A red cloth covered her chest where the gown opened. His sharp eyes noticed painted lines on her arms and shoulders before his eyes darted to her face. He frowned since her features were hidden beneath a wide conical hat with a long, transparent white veil. A quiver of arrows was tied to her left hip. He took in her entire appearance in one second since his attention was caught mostly on the arrow she had pointed at him.

Who was she?

They both stood silent and tense, neither making a move as they observed each other. A cat-owl hooted somewhere in the forest and another night bird joined its song. A strong wind swept by and it plastered the gown against the woman’s body, clinging caressingly against her curves in a most enticing way.

Zuko’s eyes widened in disbelief when a shard of desire raced down his spine at the sight. How could that be? Katara was the only one who was able to quickly elicit such a response from him, and here this strange woman had done the same. For some reason, it made him angry.

With a silent growl, he sprang forward and brought the hilt of his sword down, but the woman easily jumped out of the way and spun to face him again, still pointing her arrow at him. Zuko paused as he eyed her warily. Why did she not shoot him?

He again lunged at her, but just like before, she quickly evaded him and resumed her previous stance. Confused and wary, Zuko slowly replaced his dual broadswords in their sheaths and was again surprised that she did not immediately shoot him now that he was left exposed. What was her game? What did she want? He cursed her hat and veil that continued to hide her features from him.

Slowly, he began to circle around her, but she countered his move and gilded in a circle as she continued pointing her arrow at him. Impatient, he ran toward her again. Already expecting her move to avoid him, Zuko swiftly swerved around her. Her bow fell to the ground when he pinned her arms down with one hand, while he grabbed her around her waist with his other arm. When she began to struggle, he pulled her roughly back against his chest and ignored the pain of her quiver of arrows digging into his thigh.

His eyes widened once again when the feeling of her soft body made heat flare down to his groin and he growled angrily. He was about to shove her away from him when he noticed two things simultaneously. She had stopped struggling and was not fighting him, but what really caught his attention was that the curve of her waist felt familiar. He inhaled sharply in confusion before freezing when he caught a whiff of her scent, sweet gardenia hidden beneath a spring rain.

“Katara?” he whispered incredulously.

“Hello, Zuko,” she said coolly.

He removed his arms from around her and took a step back. He watched as she turned around to face him, her face tilted up to look at him. His eyes widened as familiar blue eyes locked onto his. He noticed that she had paint on her face, too. There were two red, curving lines on both her cheeks. Her eyelids were also painted and on her chin ran another thick line of the red paint. On her forehead rested a yellow crescent moon. Her hair was hidden beneath the hood of her strange gown.

He scowled. He was angry that she had left the palace and was now roaming around the forest. Didn’t she know it was dangerous?!

“What are you doing here, Katara?” he growled, then a bit mockingly, he added, “Or should I say, the Painted Lady?”

Katara narrowed her eyes at his tone and crossed her arms beneath her breasts in defiance as she glared at the grinning demon mask looming before her.

“Did you really believe I’m so stupid as to not notice you sneak away at night and come back to our room to place your things away, Zuko? Or should I say, Blue Spirit?” she asked just as mockingly.
Zuko narrowed his own eyes at her, though he knew she couldn’t see him, before he let out a resigned sigh. Pulling his mask over his head, he frowned at her.

“Sometimes I wish you weren’t so observant,” he muttered.

Katara let a smirk appear on her lips at his disgruntled tone before she placed her hands on her hips and frowned.

“Why didn’t you tell me you were out running around as the Blue Spirit?” she asked heatedly.

“I didn’t want to put you in any danger,” he replied unrepentantly.

Katara glared at him and huffed.

“Really, Zuko, do you purposely like to make me angry?” she hissed. “You know I hate it when you coddle me and try to keep me behind locked doors.”

Zuko scowled at her.

“And do you think I like it when you put yourself in danger just to defy me?” he growled. “Would you prefer I didn’t care about your safety and let any harm befall you?”

“Oh, come on!” Katara exclaimed exasperatedly as she threw her hands in the air. “You make it sound like I’m some dimwitted fool that rushes blindly into danger!”

“You know that’s not what I mean!” Zuko argued irritably.

“Then what’s the point of me learning to protect myself if you’re just going to do it for me?!” Katara retorted back just as angrily.

Zuko again opened his mouth to retort, but Katara did not allow him to say anything as she interrupted him with another angry hiss.
“If you didn’t want me to go with you, you should’ve at least told me what you were doing, instead of hiding things from me!” she growled loudly.

“I don’t have to tell you everything!” Zuko rumbled as he loomed over her.

Katara did not let him intimate her as she stepped closer to him to jab a finger into his chest.

“I’m not saying you have to tell me everything!” she shouted exasperatedly, “Just things that concerns me, concerns us!” She paused before she firmly added, “Basically anything important.”

“I don’t see why you’re so angry since me investigating the village doesn’t concern us,” he retorted as he stubbornly crossed his arms over his chest.

“Are you serious?!” the waterbender shouted incredulously and furiously. “You lied to me, Zuko! When I asked you this morning if there was something going on that you’d like to talk to me about, you lied to me and said no and that there wasn’t anything for me to worry about!

“You didn’t let me know what you were up to, you allowed me to wake up alone in the middle of the night for the past several nights while you were off investigating! You didn’t bother to ask me if I’d like to help you! I won’t let you treat me like a fool!”

Zuko clenched his jaw since everything she said made sense, but he stubbornly refused to admit that what he did was wrong. He did everything to protect her, how could that be wrong?

Katara narrowed her eyes when Zuko didn’t say anything and she crossed her own arms over her chest.

“It makes me wonder what else you hide from me,” she added bitingly.

The firebender narrowed his eyes and his nostrils flared.

“What’s that supposed to mean?” he growled.
“You tell me,” she hissed.

“I don’t appreciate that you’re calling into question my honor,” he rumbled.

“Then don’t make me question it by lying to me,” she retorted.

Zuko let out a frustrated sound as he ran a hand over his pulled-back hair.

“Katara—”

“Don’t you ‘Katara’ me!” the waterbender snapped. “If you wanted a weak and fragile wife to protect and lie to make you feel more like a man, then you should’ve married a damn noblewoman!” she shouted.

Zuko stiffened at her accusation and Katara’s eyes widened at her own words.

“So you think the reason I want to keep you safe is to prove to myself that I’m a man,” he stated in a stiff tone. “Do you think I need to prove my manliness?”

“No,” Katara replied with a shake of her head before she sighed. “I’m sorry. That was uncalled for.”

She paused before she frowned again.

“But you have to see why I get angry that you always rush to my defense and that you keep things hidden from me. It makes me feel useless.” She paused before she added more sadly, “It makes me feel like you don’t trust me.”

Zuko’s eyes widened at her words, shocked that she would think he felt that way about her. Everything he did was for her safety and happiness. He would never purposefully hurt her. He had no idea that his actions would cause her to mistrust him.
“I don’t mean to make you feel useless or that you need my constant protection,” he replied quietly, “Nor was I keeping things secret to hurt you or because I didn’t trust you. You’re one of the few people I trust with my life.”

“I know, but you can’t keep me hidden from everything, Zuko,” Katara told him, her tone softening a little. “Don’t treat me like an inadequate wife that should be deceived in order to be kept safe.”

A deep frown marred Zuko’s brow at his wife’s accusations as his mind quickly evaluated everything she said and everything he had done and thought about their relationship.

“Do you know how I felt to wake up in the middle of the night to find you gone?” Katara continued in the same sad tone that caused an ache to form in the firebender’s chest. “I didn’t know where you were. When you would be back…If you would be back. How would it make you feel if you woke up and I was just missing?”

Zuko felt his heart clench at her words as it finally hit home why his highhandedness would upset her so much. He had not thought of his actions as dishonest, but he had to admit that she had a point. He had kept his actions secret from her as if she had no input whatsoever, as if she were only a possession to keep protected and not his partner in life who could make her own decisions. He was so focused on his concerns that he never thought that she would be worried because he was gone. He just never considered things from her point of view before.

“I know,” Zuko acknowledged as his defensive stance faltered before he sincerely added, “I’m sorry.”

He paused as he looked intensely into her eyes. Katara’s own aggressive stance wavered at the pleading and vulnerable expression on his face.

“I just don’t want you to get hurt,” he added quietly. “I don’t know what I’d do if…I were to lose you…You mean everything to me.”

Katara’s indignant mood quickly vanished at his quiet confession and she sighed. How could she begrudge him his feelings when she felt the same way about him? At least his actions were motivated by his love and his care for her. He had a reason for his actions and not because he wanted her out of his way like most noblemen did with their wives. Besides, she understood that what Jianguo tried to do to her had affected Zuko deeply and he did not wish for her to be harmed ever again.
“I know,” she relented softly.

She approached him silently and reached out a hand to cup his scarred cheek. Zuko let out a small sigh and leaned into her touch.

“I understand you want to keep me safe, Zuko, and I’m very grateful you care so much for me,” Katara began, “But you also have to see that I can take care of myself, that I’m not some weak person that needs others to look after her.”

Zuko frowned at her words and opened his mouth to refute, but she pressed her fingers against his lips and shook her head.

“I know that’s not what you’re trying to imply, but after what Jianguo tried to do in Omashu I can’t help but feel that way,” she continued as she pulled her hand away.

Zuko’s eyes blazed in anger at that horrible memory before he ordered himself to calm down so he could continue to listen to his wife. He watched as her blue eyes clouded with concern.

“Besides, do you know how it makes me feel to be the one left behind in the safety of the palace while you go into a dangerous situation?” she told him seriously yet anxiously. “Do you think I like it that you put yourself in harm’s way to keep me safe?”

The firebender frowned as he thought over her words. She was right. It was not fair that he should be the only one to believe himself capable of being a protector. Nor was it fair to behave as if Katara lacked the skills to do so herself. Of course, that is not what he intended to portray but he could understand why she would feel that way.

“I understand,” he replied quietly, sincerely. “I’m sorry for not seeing it sooner.”

Katara sighed silently before she gave him a small smile. She stepped closer to him and wound her arms around him. Zuko wrapped his own arms around her and held her tightly to him even though her straw hat got in his way.

“I want us to be equals, to be partners,” Katara said firmly yet softly, “and that means that you have to share important things with me, like what you’re doing tonight. I want to help you.”
“I know and I promise that starting tonight I will not keep such things secret from you,” Zuko vowed just as firmly.

“Thank you, Zuko,” the waterbender sighed as she tightened her hold of him.

They were silent for a long moment as each dwelled in their own thoughts. When they heard a cat-owl hoot again, they pulled apart to smile at each other in understanding. It might not be easy, but they both vowed silently that they would continue to make things work.

Zuko allowed his gaze to examine her attire once again and this time he was not disturbed when he again felt desire swell within him. It seemed his body had subconsciously known it was Katara even if his mind had not.

“You look like a beautiful spirit,” he remarked with a lusty grin.

Katara’s earlier irritation melted at his words, knowing that they were now on the same page. She smiled as she playful twirled before him so he could see her from all angles, the gown and veil floating gently around her form. Zuko’s eyes hungrily gazed at her bare shoulders and arms.

“Thank you,” Katara purred as she looked up at him with a coy smile, “I made the costume with cloth I bribed from the palace seamstress. And the paint, hat, and seashell I bought in one of my outings with Ursa and Uncle Iroh.”

“Very clever,” Zuko remarked.

“I figured that if you can run around as the Blue Spirit, then I can as the Painted Lady,” she replied.

Zuko smiled, but before he could reply she asked him why he was stalking the village and the forest. Zuko explained what he had been doing the past few nights and his lack of any information. Katara frowned as she glanced up into the night sky and spotted the moon.

“It’s late, maybe we should return to the palace,” she said.
She bent down to pick up her discarded bow and arrow. She placed the arrow back into the quiver at her hip. The bow she kept in her hand since the veil of her hat got in its way. The Painted Lady did not use such weapons, but Katara knew Zuko would have immediately recognized her if she had used her waterbending and she had wanted to deceive him for not telling her about his nightly exploits.

“We can come back tomorrow night and investigate some more,” she added.

“We?” Zuko asked with a frown.

“I’m coming with you whether you like it or not,” she told him firmly, “It’s your choice if we come together or I follow after you.”

Zuko opened his mouth to automatically refuse before he stopped as he reminded himself he had promised to include her in his plans, regardless of whether he thought he needed her aide. Part of him felt irritated at her persistence in putting herself in danger, yet another part of him felt pleased that she would always want to help him. Of course, there were some situations that he would have to deal with himself, but in others Katara’s skills would be a great benefit.

“Alright,” he relented.

When she smiled gratefully at him, he could not stop himself from returning her smile.

“Let’s go back home,” he said as he walked back toward his grazing ostrich-horse. He paused before turning back to Katara with a frown. “How did you get here?”

“I took another ostrich-horse and followed you at a distance,” she replied with a grin before she pointed to their left, “I left it tied to a tree a few feet away.”

A discontented frown appeared on Zuko’s face at her first sentence. He had let his guard down if he didn’t even notice he was being followed. That was unacceptable.

“Come, I’ll give you a ride to your ostrich-horse,” he told her.
Katara stepped up to him and Zuko quickly wrapped his hands around her waist and lifted her onto the saddle. Pulling his mask down to cover his face again, Zuko mounted behind her and reached around her to grab the reins, deliberately brushing his arms against her breasts. He heard her moan softly just as he expected. Grinning, he rested his hands between her thighs and brushed against her covered sex. She gasped before she leaned closer against his chest, tilting her head back a little to look at him.

“This reminds me of what we did on that ostrich-horse after Uncle Iroh and Jun found us,” she whispered breathlessly.

Zuko groaned at the memory. Katara gasped when Zuko swiftly lifted her and turned her around so that she was straddling his waist. She looked at him with wide, blue eyes.

“It seems a repeat performance is in order,” Zuko breathed huskily as he pulled her closer against his stiff erection, eliciting an excited and aroused moan from his wife.

Needless to say, that repeat performance from a different position was just as exciting if not more so than the previous one.

Two nights later, the Blue Spirit and the Painted Lady, like two wandering specters, once again arrived silently and unseen at the edge of the quiet village. Nothing suspicious had risen during their search and they wondered if perhaps the villagers had no plans of destroying anything again, although they still refused to work. The governor had again asked Zuko to send soldiers to apprehend the villagers for their actions, but Zuko had stalled. Not only did they not know which of the villagers had destroyed the governor’s home, but they also did not know the cause for their revolt. Zuko knew Katara agreed with him that there had to be a good reason why the villagers were rebelling because they had discussed it last night. A reason that they sensed the governor knew, but pretended he didn’t. Zuko had to find out before setting his soldiers on the people.

Beneath the veil of her hat, Katara glanced at her masked husband crouching attentively beside her. Her eyes traveled over his muscled form encased in the tight black suit before settling on the blue and white mask. She smiled since she was reminded of those nights she used to walk with the Blue Spirit in Ba Sing Se. She focused back to their task when Zuko stood up and turned toward her, his mask glinting in the moonlight, as he motioned for her to move forward. With a firm nod, she made her way to the river while Zuko walked the opposite way. They had agreed to search separately with the hopes that one of them could find something.

Zuko was about to enter the dark village when out of the corner of his eye, he noticed balls of light weaving between the trees a distance away to his right. He watched for a moment before he glanced back to see that Katara had already disappeared. He hesitated for a second before he stepped back into the shadow of the trees and circled around in the direction of the lights. He moved silently as he stuck to the shadows, keeping his sights on the lights and his senses trained for any noise or movement. As he neared, he realized the balls of light were torches and he frowned at what he came across as he took cover behind some bushes. If anyone had known where to look they would have noticed the face of a demon looming behind the foliage.

A group of men were gathered together near a bend of the river as they spoke in low voices. A few were carrying the torches while the others carried a variety of weapons from axes, pitchforks, knives, and hammers. Although the lower half of their faces was covered with black cloth, Zuko immediately identified them as villagers by their simple clothing and their accent.

“Da bastard took me woman!” one of the men growled out angrily, though Zuko was confused at the pain he could detect in his voice.

“Don’t ye worry, we’ll make ‘im pay fer it!” another man said as he laid a supportive hand on the first man’s shaking shoulder.

“Dat’s why we gotta do somet’ing to stop ‘im,” a third man spoke up and everybody immediately turned to him. Zuko surmised he was their leader. “We can’t let those coddled ar’stocrats treat us like shit an’ more!”

“Yah!” the others agreed vehemently.

Zuko frowned as he listened to them. He was fully aware that many of the common people despised the aristocracy for their power and wealth, but he could see that these villagers’ hatred ran deeper than that for some reason. A reason he was going to find out before they did any more damage.

The men began marching determinedly forward. Silence was heavy in the air except for the sound of their muffled footsteps. Their torches flickered wildly as a chilly breeze swept by, casting eerie shadows around them. Suddenly, something dropped down from a tree before them. They jumped and cursed in surprise, drawing their weapons before them. Quiet exclamations rose amongst them when they saw a masked individual blocking their path with swords drawn.

“Who ar’ ya?” the leader called out warily as he raised his sharp axe threateningly.

“Careful, Tai,” one of the men said as he moved one step back, “I think dat’s da Blue Spirit.”
The men again murmured in surprise and wariness as they stared at the silent man before them. Zuko could hear some of them wonder what he was doing and what he wanted. They fell silent when their leader stepped forward.

“I don’t care who ya ar’, but ya bett’r git out of me way if ya know w’ats good fer ya!” Tai growled.

Zuko tensed when the man suddenly launched at him with a raised axe. Zuko easily blocked his weapon and pushed him back. Tai cursed as he regained his balance before he attacked again. Zuko crouched low to evade the axe’s swing before he swept his leg forward and knocked the man onto his back.

Wanting to help their comrade, the other men jumped forward to join the fight. Zuko easily blocked their attacks. He did not want to hurt them since he could see they were no professional fighters, but men who seemed to want justice. A justice for what, he was still did not know.

Zuko had just thrown one of the men back when he felt someone behind him. He had barely turned around to block the axe aimed at his head when an ice arrow imbedded itself on Tai’s shoulder, effectively making him drop his weapon. Tai screamed in pain as he clutched at his bleeding arm and fell to his knees. The men paused in confusion as they stared at the ice arrow before they whipped around in apprehensiveness and warily scanned the area.

“Look!” one of the men exclaimed in horror as he pointed to the river.

The men spun around, their weapons held ready, before their eyes widened in disbelief when a thick fog began to crawl towards them from the riverbed, silently slithering to where they were standing. Fear skittered along their spines and the hair on their napes stood on end at the mysterious sight. They took a few steps back when the unnerving mist curled around their feet and tensed when they saw a silhouette hidden behind the fog move away from the river and head their way.

“W-what is i-it?” one of the youngest stammered as he backed away another step.

A loud gasp resounded around them as a woman in flowing robes stepped out of the fog with a bow made of water held in her hands. Her face was hidden beneath her wide hat and long veil, making them wonder what they would see underneath. They watched as the bow dissolved into ribbons of water that coiled around her arms. Seeing that she was weaponless and driven by fear of the unknown, the men sprang toward her with loud shouts.
Zuko had stood silent and still, and admittedly a bit in awe, as he watched Katara make her appearance, but when he saw the men move to attack her, he lunged forward to intercept them only to jump to the side when three men attacked him. Cursing, he raised his weapons in defense as he glanced back to his wife. He watched as Katara raised her arms, her delicate fingers spread, her gown and veil fluttering almost eerily around her. The men cried out in shock when their bodies were forcefully made to stop.

“W-what s-sorcery i-is tis?” an old man exclaimed fearfully as they all stared wide-eyed at the strange woman.

“Please, stop fighting,” she spoke, her voice soft and calm, “We mean no harm. We just want to help you and your village.”

Ignoring their incredulous words, Katara glided forward and almost smiled when they clamped their mouths shut. She walked silently to where the man she had injured sat cursing in pain as he grasped his bleeding shoulder. When he sensed her approach, his eyes widened in fear and he tried to scoot back on the ground to get away from her.

“What da ya want?” he growled.

Katara did not reply as she crouched gracefully beside him. Zuko immediately rushed to stand behind her in case Tai decided to attack her.

The men watched as the woman reached a hand out toward the ice arrow which melted into a bloody ball of water. She threw the dirty water aside before gathering one of the liquid ribbons on her arm onto her hand, forming a sort of glove. Tai gasped when the water on her hand began to glow before he flinched when she placed it on his bleeding wound. When she pulled her hand away a moment later, Tai looked down and gaped when he realized his wound was mended.

“It’s healed!” he exclaimed incredulously.

As the men murmured in awe and confusion, Katara released her hold of their blood. They breathed a sigh of relief, but stood tense and wary as they eyed the strange individuals with both fear and suspicion.

Katara glanced at her masked husband and smiled. The thought that it was now she who saved Zuko and not the other way around made her giddy with pride. Zuko caught her smile beneath her veil, immediately understanding the meaning behind it, and smirked.

“I know who ye are!” one of the men exclaimed.

Zuko and Katara stiffened as they turned cautiously to face the wide-eyed man who was staring at Katara. Their minds raced as they tried to come up with a way to diffuse the man’s suspicions.

“Yes da Painted Lady!” the man continued excitedly. “A river spirit! I’ve ‘eard ‘bout ye from a friend who said ye saved his village years ago durin’ da war.”

Speechless, Katara glanced at Zuko who shrugged minutely, subtly telling her to go along with it. Straightening herself out, the disguised Fire Lady placed her hands elegantly before her as she gracefully inclined her head. At her silent affirmation, the men murmured in surprise and curiosity as they bowed their heads in reverence.

“I see this village has gone through some hardships,” Katara spoke up in a gentle tone meant to calm the men, “So why are you causing more trouble?”

The men glanced at each other before they lowered the cloths hiding their faces. Katara and Zuko glanced at Tai when he stepped forward.

“With da Fire Lord raisin’ da taxes so much, many of us ar’ in debt dat we can barely survive,” he growled out angrily.

Zuko stiffened at the accusation. Katara barely had time to stop herself from gaping in disbelief. Zuko did not raise the taxes! In fact, ever since he became Fire Lord, the taxes have been lower since there wasn’t a war he needed to fund.

Oblivious to the disguised royal couple’s thoughts, the men angrily murmured in agreement to Tai’s words.

“Yah, and since we can’t pay off da money, that good fer nothin’ gov’nor began usin’ other methods to get us ta pay off,” the oldest of them continued gruffly.
“What kind of methods?” Katara asked softly.

“By makin’ us his slaves and givin’ ‘im all we work fer,” a young man growled out.

“If da family doesn’t ‘ave anythin’ ta give ‘im, he…” Tai spoke up before he paused as he gritted his teeth in rage, “he takes da young women and forces ‘em ta…service his needs.”

Katara raised a hand to her lips and gasped in horror while Zuko mentally cursed.

“Why have you not gone to the Fire Lord for help?” Katara asked as she frowned beneath the shadows of her wide hat.

“It’s da Fire Lord’s fault we’re sufferin’ like tis!” Tai spat out angrily as he grasped his axe tightly, “‘Cause of da raise in taxes I wasn’t able ta save me two daughters from bein’ violated by dat bastard of a governor!”

“And now he has me wife!” the man Zuko had first heard talking when he came upon the men cried out in pain and rage.

“And me granddaughter!” the oldest man shouted.

Zuko tensed as the men continued to cry out their sorrow and anger. Was it really his fault for not paying closer attention to what his governors were doing behind his back?

Katara listened in both fury and compassion for what these villagers were going through because of the abuse of power of one man and his greed. However, she felt herself stiffen in anger when the men continued to blame Zuko. She did not need to look at her silent husband to know he was starting to blame himself as well. She needed to put a stop to this.

With a flick of her wrist, Katara doused the men with a small wave of water from the river and effectively silenced them as they spluttered and looked at her in shock.

“Fire Lord Zuko is not at fault,” she said, her previous gentle tone taking a hint of steel.
Zuko glanced at her in surprise. He had forgotten he was currently the Blue Spirit as he was about to defend himself. He decided to allow Katara to deal with the men since he knew she would be better at making them see reason. With his luck, he would probably make things worse.

“How da ya know that?” Tai asked with a raised eyebrow.

Katara bit her lip. Did spirits participate in politics? She couldn’t really explain to them the truth without exposing Zuko and her. What could she say to convince them of her certainty in Zuko’s innocence?

“Fire Lord Zuko’s wife is a waterbender and I, being a river spirit, am in a way connected to her,” Katara explained calmly, although inwardly she was struggling to find the words, “I know she would never have married a tyrant.”

The men murmured uncertainly as they glanced at each other before they looked at Tai for guidance.

“Well, if it’s not da Fire Lord’s fault, then why do we ‘ave ta pay such high taxes?” Tai countered gruffly.

“The governor has taken advantage of his position,” Katara continued assuredly as if she could see through the man’s actions and thoughts, “He has lied to you.”

“Da bastard!” Tai shouted in rage.

“Let’s kill ‘im!” the others roared as they raised their improvised weapons and turned to march toward the village.

They paused in surprised when the Blue Spirit suddenly appeared before them to block their path.

“You cannot take matters into your own hands,” Katara spoke up serenely.

They turned at the sound of the woman’s voice and watched as she gracefully glided forward, her translucent veil and long robe floating gently behind her. They stepped aside to allow her to pass them before she stood next to the silent masked demon spirit.

“Violence will not solve anything,” she continued coaxingly, “You must go to the Fire Lord with this problem so he can deal punishment to the one who deserves it.”

The men looked at each other skeptically.

“I assure you the Fire Lord and his Fire Lady only want what is best for their people,” Katara reassured them softly, “But how can they help you if you do not ask?”

The men discussed the possibility for a few minutes, and although some of them were still skeptical that the Fire Lord would care about their problems, they agreed to ask for an audience with him to bring up the issue of the governor’s atrocities.

“You should return to your homes,” Katara told them gently, “Everything will resolve itself soon. Time will heal the wounds.”

“Thank you,” Tai spoke up after a moment, his gruff tone from before now sounding tired.

He bowed and the rest of the men did the same. With a nod, Katara made her way toward the river with Zuko walking silently at her side. Just as the fog swallowed their forms out of sight, they paused at the words that reached their ears.

“Hey, do ya think da Blue Spirit is really a spirit, too?” the youngest of them asked curiously. “He appears ever’where and hasn’t been caught.”

“‘Course he is!” another one said, “He was with da Painted Lady, wasn’t he?”

“Do ya think da Painted Lady has also chosen ta protect our village?” the man who had identified the Painted Lady asked.

“Maybe they’re lovers!” the youngest one spoke up again in a suggestive tone.
Zuko glanced at his wife and saw her grin at him. He quietly chuckled in amusement. People would always come up with romanticized stories to explain things they did not understand. Letting the fog Katara created cover them, they walked silently along the river’s edge. Once they knew they were a distance away from the village, they headed west to the place where they had tied their ostrich-horses.

“I can’t believe that governor had the audacity to go to you for help when he’s the one who’s causing so much pain,” Katara spoke up angrily before she let out a sympathetic sigh, “Those poor women.”

“Don’t worry, he will get his just reward for everything he has done,” Zuko assured her gravely.

“Do you think the villagers will come to ask for our help?” she asked with a frown.

“They will,” Zuko replied assuredly before he turned to look at her, “I’m sure they wouldn’t want to anger the Painted Lady, their new protector.”

Katara looked up to see the demonic mask staring at her. She could just hear the smirk in Zuko’s voice.

“Well, I didn’t expect them to recognize me and assume I’m a real spirit, that’s for sure,” she replied with a small grin.

“I couldn’t find a more perfect wife anywhere,” Zuko stated, his tone full of smugness.

“I’m glad you know it,” Katara responded with a pleased grin.

Zuko chuckled again before he suddenly reached for her and pulled her tightly against him, eliciting a surprised gasp from her. Wrapping one arm tightly around her waist, he gently grasped her chin with his gloved hand and lifted her head toward him.

Heart pounding in her chest, Katara stared wide-eyed at the fanged Blue Spirit mask, wondering what kind of expression lay beneath. She could feel the contours of her firebender’s muscled chest pressed tightly to her suddenly aching breasts as well as the warmth of his body wrapping around hers. She shivered pleasantly.

“You know, watching you in such a way turned me on so badly,” he whispered huskily as he pressed her closer to him.

A small moan escaped Katara at his words as well as the feeling of his hardening erection pressing against her stomach. Zuko watched as her cheeks flooded with color as she looked up at him with darkening, blue eyes. A breeze swept by and lifted her white veil around them. Zuko let go of her chin so he could move the flimsy cloth aside only to have her slip away from his grasp at his distraction. Frowning, he watched as she took a few steps back and smiled coyly at him.

“Catch me,” he heard her whisper before she whirled around and raced away, her clothes and veil flying almost gracefully behind her.

Growling in enjoyment, Zuko quickly sprinted forward in pursuit of his wife. The pain in his groin spurred him on even more as his need to bury his aching cock inside her wet warmth increased. Her soft laughter teased his ears and her sweet scent tantalized his nostrils whenever he got close to her before she nimbly evaded his capture.

Finally, he caught her and he eagerly brought them down on the soft grass. Soon they were joined in the most intimate of ways and their voices echoed through the dark forest, ringing with their cries of pleasure and passion, conveying their love for each other. It was if they grew closer with every day that passed and learned, respected, and cherished more of each other.

If anyone had come upon the couple, they would have seen a powerful demon ravishing a willing beautiful spirit.

A moment later, they were exclaiming their amazing release with loud moans and groans. They lay shuddering on the grass, wrapped in each other’s arms for a long moment, as they waited for their hearts and bodies to calm down. Panting heavily, Zuko sat back and brought his sated wife to sit on his lap, smoothing her disheveled hair down her back. Her hat had been knocked aside in their frenzied lovemaking.

Murmuring softly, Katara nuzzled against his throat before she kissed his jaw. He had hastily taken off his mask in order to suck her breasts and kiss her lips as he sought to pleasure her. She lifted her head and they gazed at each other silently, their emotions reflected in their eyes. Then their lips met softly and they kissed each other tenderly as they sat together in silence for a moment. They pulled apart slowly and Zuko pressed his lips against her hair before Katara heard him sigh as he gently shifted her off his lap.
“We must leave now and return to the palace,” he reminded her before his expression darkened, “I will send for that despicable governor.”

The bliss and peacefulness Katara was floating on immediately vanished as the serious situation once again settled on their shoulders. With a grim expression, she agreed with a nod.

“We should hurry,” she said.

Zuko helped her stand up and they silently fixed their attire. The firebender suppressed a smile at the now smudged paint on his wife’s arms and face from his caresses and kisses before he bent down to pick up her discarded hat and handed it to her. With a murmured ‘thanks’, Katara covered her head with the gown’s hood before she placed the wide hat on.

Zuko surprised her by wrapping an arm around her and pulling her against him before he bent his head down for one last, lingering kiss. Katara sighed when he pulled away and she watched as he pulled down the Blue Spirit mask over his face. Without another word, they resumed their walk to retrieve their mounts.

Sitting on his large chair in his study, Zuko was pleased as he read over the report that ordered for the governor’s properties to be seized, his title stripped from him, and his immediate imprisonment for his actions against the people he was supposed to protect. A few days after the villagers had encountered the Painted Lady and the Blue Spirit, they had traveled to the Fire Nation palace to bring the Fire Lord the charges against the governor.

The man had tried to deny everything he was being accused of, but with the testimony of the overworked village men and the women the governor had forced to service him, everything had been against him.

The women had been too frightened and ashamed at first to reveal what had happened to them, but thanks to Katara’s comforting presence and words, they had revealed all his twisted perversions. The man’s innocence was even more difficult to find plausible as more evidence was brought to Zuko by the men he had sent to inspect the governor’s activities. Along with all the atrocities the villagers accused him of, the governor had been keeping some of the tax money to himself and was even planning on killing a neighboring governor from a bigger village in order to take his place.

It had not been difficult for Zuko to find the man guilty and have him immediately thrown in prison. Now he had to find a new governor to take care of the village, but this time he was going to be more cautious in whom he chose. He even planned to have the other governors in both the Fire Nation and his colonies checked to see if any were doing things behind his back. For now Zuko promised to send aid to the village and Katara had assured the female victims that she would help them any way she could. The villagers had been extremely grateful and presented the royal couple with a gift.

Zuko smiled as he remembered all the escapades he and Katara had gone on as the Blue Spirit and the Painted Lady. They had again visited the village and, to their surprise, they found the villagers had built a small altar for their named protectors. There were rumors that both spirits were protecting the village because the Fire Lord had married a kind waterbender. The Blue Spirit, a Fire Nation spirit, and the Painted Lady, a river spirit, were lovers and with their union they approved of the Fire Lord’s marriage to a Water Tribe woman. Zuko could only chuckle at their imagination.

Zuko glanced to the wall at his left and smiled as he again admired the portrait of his wife. She was standing gracefully beneath the cherry blossom tree in an elegant formal robe of blue, black, and silver. Her long hair fell in soft waves around her while half of it was pulled back to hold her fire crown. The artist had captured her passionate spirit in her blue eyes, the kindness in her beautiful face, and the sweetness of her smile. Needless to say, the artist had been paid generously for his incredible work.

Turning back to his desk, the Fire Lord continued reading. As he finished reading over the report, Zuko placed it aside before he sighed deeply and leaned back in his seat as his current problem once again invaded his mind. He had begun to be pressured by his advisors because Katara had not yet conceived and given him an heir. He had not said anything to Katara so she would not worry, but they were becoming more and more insistent. Why was the council so adamant about it? They have only been married a year for Agni’s sake!

He understood their views and he knew it was his duty to sire an heir as soon as possible as a precaution, but there was a part of him that did not want to share Katara yet. He wanted to enjoy her all to himself for a while longer before their attention shifted to their child. And if he was completely honest with himself, he was a bit apprehensive at the thought of becoming a father, although he could not deny that the thought also brought a warm feeling to his chest. A knock at his door interrupted his thoughts and he frowned.

“Enter,” he called out absentmindedly as he shuffled through the piles of paper on his desk.

When the door opened he looked up to see a servant holding a tray with a teapot and cup bow her head respectfully and wait for his order.

“Place it on the desk,” Zuko told her as he again shifted his attention to the document before him.
The servant quickly walked forward and placed the cup down before pouring the steaming tea from the teapot before placing it down. Picking up the tray, she bowed her head again before leaving, closing the door quietly behind her.

Zuko let out a snort as he eyed the teacup. For the past few months, always at the same time before dinner, his uncle had insisted Zuko drink the tea. Although Iroh had not told him, Zuko had a feeling it was that aphrodisiac tea his uncle had tried to make Katara and him drink months after their wedding. He did not have the heart to tell his uncle it did not make a difference. With an indulgent sigh, Zuko reached for the teacup and took a sip. He frowned at the different taste, it was sweeter than before. What was his uncle trying to feed him this time?

With a shrug, Zuko finished the rest of the tea and grimaced at the excessive sweetness. The things he did for his witty yet beloved uncle. Placing the empty cup aside, Zuko resumed his work in silence.

Katara smiled as she stepped into the palace infirmary and spotted Yin-Min cleaning up. As she watched the silent woman working, Katara remembered how painfully shy the young woman had been before she opened herself up a little to the waterbender, eventually becoming friends. However, Katara felt she was not as close to Yin-Min as she was to Jiao especially since Ozai’s former concubine was still skittish and reserved.

“Hello, Yin-Min,” the Fire Lady called out pleasantly, “How are you?”

Yin-Min paused in her chores to turn toward the waterbender with a small smile.

“I’m fine, thank you, my lady,” she responded softly with a bow, “And yourself?”

“I’m well, thank you,” Katara responded before a small grin appeared on her face, “So have you had any progress with the man you like?”

A deep blush appeared on Yin-Min’s pale cheeks and she averted her eyes bashfully before she frowned sadly.

“He still doesn’t acknowledge me,” the yellow-eyed woman said dejectedly.

“Don’t give up hope, Yin-Min,” Katara encouraged her. “Maybe you should do something to catch his eye and make him interested in you.”

“Perhaps you are right. Thank you, my lady,” the physician’s assistant said with a small, grateful smile.

They talked idly for a few minutes as Yin-Min went back to fixing the room. The sound of footsteps reached their ears and Katara watched curiously as Yin-Min’s eyes sparked to life and a soft blush appeared on her pale cheeks. Katara turned around just in time to see Shen enter the room. She turned back to look at Yin-Min, but the blushing woman had turned around and was now fixing Physician Toshiro’s desk.

“My lady,” Shen greeted as he gave her a small bow before he said, “Do you still plan on visiting the city this afternoon?”

“Oh, I forgot about that,” Katara spoke up with a frown before she smiled as she added, “I think I’ll stay home and rest today, Shen.”

“As you wish, my lady,” the personal guard responded with a small smile.

He gave another respectful bow before he turned around and left. Katara watched him go before she turned back to observe the silent physician assistant. She watched as the pretty woman subtly glanced after the guard before looking away. Shen and Kuo sometimes accompanied Katara into the infirmary, and occasionally they did so with Zuko when he was looking for his wife. If she remembered correctly, Yin-Min would always stammer whenever the guards were present. Was Shen the man Yin-Min liked? Why had she not noticed Yin-Min’s reaction before? Shen was a few years older than the small woman, but he was a good-looking man nonetheless and he was loyal, although he did not speak much. No wonder Yin-Min sounded so sad whenever she mentioned the man she liked. Shen did not even spare her a glance!

Poor Yin-Min, Katara thought sadly.

“Is there anything else I can help you with, my lady?” the small woman asked.

Remembering why she had visited the infirmary in the first place, Katara suppressed a blush from forming on her cheeks.

“Yin-Min, I was wondering if you could give me more of that herb mix,” she said quietly. “I’m almost running out of the last batch you gave me.”

The dark-haired woman paused and turned to see the hesitant expression on the waterbender’s lovely face.

“You already finished the other bag I gave you?” Yin-Min asked softly.

“Yes,” Katara responded with a grimace.

“I’ll make more,” the woman promised helpfully.

“Thanks,” Katara said before she bit her lip anxiously as she gathered her courage to ask, “Do you know why I haven’t conceived yet? I’ve taken the blend of herbs regularly and…uh…my husband and I…indulge in each other…repeatedly…” Katara trailed off with an embarrassed blush before she continued with a frown, “Shouldn’t I have gotten pregnant already?”

A small frown appeared on Yin-Min’s brow.

“Every woman is different, my lady,” she explained kindly, “Some women become pregnant instantly and regularly while it takes years for others to have their first child and continue to conceive once in a long while. Don’t worry, my lady, you are still young and you’ve only been married a year.”

“I guess you’re right,” Katara said as she felt a bit of hope bloom in her chest.

“If you still want the mixed herbs, I can have them ready in a few days,” Yin-Min said softly.

“Thanks,” the waterbender replied with a smile.

A few minutes later, Katara, feeling more enthusiastic than a moment ago, headed to the royal bedchambers to get ready for dinner. She wondered what Zuko was doing at the moment and she smiled at her thoughts. Even after being married a year, she still craved his presence. She hoped it continued to be so even after many years passed.
On her way she came across Iroh, Ursa and Jee who were going to their rooms to freshen up before dinner. As Iroh talked to her, Katara noticed that Ursa kept glancing at Jee when the admiral was not looking. Katara was not sure but it seemed Ursa’s gaze was more adoring than before. Maybe Ursa would figure out Jee’s feelings soon and in the process realize her own. With a laugh at something Iroh said, they parted ways to continue to their rooms before they met again for dinner.

A frustrated frown appeared on Zuko’s smooth brow as the words on the scroll he was reading began to blur. He shook his head as he tried to focus once again, but instead he threw the paper on his desk when his head began to throb. He leaned back on his chair and closed his eyes when he felt the room spin a little. He pulled at the collar of his formal robes in discomfort since it seemed his body’s temperature was rising rapidly. Heat was coiling in his lower stomach and his flesh felt very sensitive.

Zuko struggled to form a coherent thought. He felt trapped in a cloudy fog, a red burning haze, and all he could feel was heat and a painful blazing inferno that heated and scorched his every nerve. It pulsed and throbbed through his body, leaving him aching. It was an ache he knew so well, yet it was so intense that it was painful. He squirmed before he gasped when the friction of cloth rubbing against his groin immediately hardened his cock.

Need, Zuko finally understood with a groan. It was an utter, striking, unadulterated need. It was an ache that craved completion and sought comfort in the body of another. His shaft pulsed and twitched and his sac tightened with a building heat. His entire body tensed as that heat left a scorching path through his veins to his groin. The feeling kept mounting and building and yet the relief of a climax eluded him. His body felt too restricted, too hot, in his clothes, his skin prickled as need beset his body. He longed for that bliss of satiation. He wanted, needed, the sensation of an orgasm so desperately it was practically killing him. His mind was so overwhelmed with lust everything else disappeared from his mind completely.

His mind hazy with desire, Zuko did not bother questioning why he was feeling such mindless need and lust as he surged away from his chair and unsteadily yet swiftly marched toward the door. Wrenching the door open, Zuko stepped out and quickly strode down the bright, golden corridor in a frenzied daze.

He paused when he saw a figure round the corner. Through his haze, he realized it was Physician Toshiro’s assistant and he watched as she walked timidly toward him. He vaguely remembered that Toshiro said he was going to send her with his ledgers. She was saying something, but Zuko could not focus on her words as more heat surged through his veins. He watched as she finally paused at his lack of response before she frowned in concern.

“My lord, are you feverish?” she asked worriedly as she shifted uncertainly, “Your face is flushed.”
She paused and swallowed as she nervously stammered, “I—if you follow me to the infirmary I can give you something to help your pain.”

Slowly, she reached her hand out to touch his arm. Zuko quickly avoided her touch and shook his head as he frowned impatiently at her. She was in the way of achieving his goal.

“All I need is my wife,” he rasped.

The thought of his waterbender only made his arousal flare to an impossible degree.

“Yes, Katara can help alleviate my condition right now,” he continued almost absentmindedly as he went around Yin-Min and left her behind, already forgetting about the woman.

As he rounded the corner and came upon another corridor, Zuko picked up his speed when his lower stomach clenched in need. Unable to withstand the pleasurable pain any longer, Zuko sprinted toward the western wing, uncaring if he came across anyone. Running with an erection was uncomfortable, but Zuko ignored it in his urgency to ravish Katara.

When he spotted the large, golden doors that led to their rooms, Zuko felt his heart lurch. He quickly opened the first set of doors, raced across the anteroom, before throwing the other doors open and slamming them close in his haste. Through his hazy mind, he watched his waterbender close her robe in alarm before relaxing when she realized it was him.

The blood in his veins seemed to boil at the sight of her and he felt his cock throb almost painfully. His breath was ragged and he swallowed thickly in lust.

“Zuko, you startled me,” she scolded lightly as she turned back around.

Katara had been about to take off her robe so she could take a bath before dinner. When Zuko did not respond, she turned back to him. Her eyes widened in concern at his flushed features and the slightly dazed look in his eyes.

“Zuko?” she asked in concern, “What—?”
She gasped in surprise when Zuko sprinted away from the door and lunged at her, wrapping her tightly in his arm and pulling her flush against him. Her breath was stolen when he crashed his lips on hers and immediately plunged his tongue inside her moist mouth. Gripping his arms to steady herself, she moaned in both pleasure and confusion at his frenzied assault.

He did not allow her to talk as his mouth pressed tightly against hers and his tongue plundered inside and roughly wrapped around hers. She gasped when he tore the robe from her body and swiftly lifted her into his arms. He quickly dropped her onto their bed and she watched in mounting lust as he hastily divested himself of his clothing, tossing them aside without a care to where they landed. His chest was heaving and he was breathing hard, but it was the dazed and almost wild look in his eyes that caused both concern and arousal within her.

“Zu…?” she began to ask, but she was interrupted when he pounced on her and again captured her mouth in a desperate kiss.

“Mmm,” she moaned and her hands immediately flew to the back of his head.

Another moan escaped her when her husband mindlessly began to rub his incredible hard body all over her heating one before she gasped when he grabbed her breasts and roughly squeezed them, causing her nipples to immediately harden at his touch.

“Zuko,” she groaned loudly against his mouth as liquid rushed from her clenching pussy.

Zuko felt his stomach clench and his painfully erect cock throb at the sound of his wife’s breathless voice. He attacked her lips with another needy kiss, sucking on her lips and plunging his tongue inside and sucking on her tongue, as his fingers pinched and pulled at her hardened nipples. With a growled murmur of her name, he dragged his lips away from her mouth and down to her slim neck, kissing and sucking on her smooth brown skin as he firmly rubbed his stiff shaft along her wet folds. He heard her murmur his name again and he pulled back slightly to look into her darkened, blue eyes as she panted beneath him.

“I need to be inside you,” he rasped deliriously against her lips, his words almost unintelligible with his guttural growls, “I need to fuck you.”

“Oh gods,” Katara gasped at his dirty words before moaning when he roughly pressed his weeping tip against her sensitive clit. “Yes…haaa…”
Panting, Zuko captured her mouth once again as he rubbed himself harder against her, loving the sensation of her wet folds sliding exquisitely along his hard shaft. He needed her, his body craved to be inside her so intensely, more powerfully than he had ever felt before, that he felt he would die if he didn’t take her soon. The fire was rapidly growing inside him, like a swift and fiery inferno, and he was delirious with need.

Without further warning, and with one particularly forceful thrust, he plunged his cock deeply inside her. Katara threw her head back and wailed her pleasure.

“Katara,” Zuko groaned, his eyes falling shut, his teeth tightly clenched, as his entire body shuddered with pleasure as her slick pussy clenched tightly around him. The pleasure was incredible, but it was not enough. His body and mind were clamoring for something more intense, for an orgasm.

He felt Katara’s legs wrap around his waist, and he growled when he sank deeper into her, his tip pressing tightly against the opening to her womb. Zuko reared back and roughly thrust forward, causing his waterbender to cry out and tightened her hold of him. Mind gone with his powerful lust, the firebender began to pound frantically into her, over and over again, grunts and growls the only sounds falling from his snarling lips.

Moaning and wailing, Katara thrashed her head from side to side as an intense orgasm erupted within her at her husband’s unrelenting, erotic assault. Part of her mind knew something about Zuko’s actions was a bit strange, but a bigger part was too focused on her pleasure to really care at the moment.

Her eyes flew open when she felt his hands grabbed her ankles from around his waist and spread her legs apart as he sat back. Her heart beat faster in her chest at the lustful expression on his face as he gazed at her. She had seen that look aimed at her many times before, but this time it was different, it was darker, merciless, and wild. Her stomach tightened in arousal and she clenched her inner muscles tightly around his plunging cock.

Zuko growled down at her in ecstasy before he spread her legs more widely apart, holding them straight out in the air as he impaled her ruthlessly, causing her eyes to roll back in her head.

“Ahh, yes, yes!” she screamed as his every thrust, “Oh gods, oh gods!”

Katara desperately grasped the sheets beneath her as immense pleasure burned every inch of her body. Her hips arched insistently as she felt him thrust deeply into her, stretching and caressing her walls satisfyingly. The forcefulness of his every plunge caused her toes to curl as she got closer to another glorifying end.
“Z-Zuko,” she gasped, pleadingly looking into his eyes, her pleasure robbing her of any more speech.

Luckily, she did not need to voice her desire because Zuko understood her need because it was what his body was craving as well. Growling, he increased his speed, causing her breasts to bounce and jiggle violently, and his attention was deliriously focused at the sight. His pelvis slapped loudly against her ass, and his cock pounding into her slick warmth produced loud squelching, wet sounds, increasing both their pleasure.

“That’s it, Katara,” he panted in a deep growl, “Come around my cock.”

Katara stared wide-eyed into his piercing, golden eyes as her passage began to tighten once again. She loved the sight of his clenched jaw and straining muscles as his pleasure consumed him. Zuko rolled his hips sharply and she gasped as he roughly pressed against that sensitive spot inside her.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed as she came for him once again.

Zuko hissed as her release shook her entire body and her pussy clutched almost painfully around his aching cock. He could feel his end approaching and he relished in it with a frantic anticipation as fire raced in his veins. He wrapped her legs around his waist once again and he brought his perspiring body on top of hers as he began to pound violently and mindlessly into her in a desperate attempt to fill her with his seed and end the mad need within him.

He thrust into her over and over again and then brought a hand down to firmly rub her clit, wanting to feel her tightening around him again. Katara threw her head back and screamed as another orgasm crashed into her, sending her to worlds of rapture.

Zuko’s breath hitched as her slick walls closed down on him almost ruthlessly as she wailed his name into the room. An almost painful fire raced down his spine and shot down his throbbing cock. A fierce roar tore from his throat as his seed erupted from him and spilled inside his wife’s shuddering pussy.

“That’s it, Katara,” he panted in a deep growl, “Come around my cock.”

Katara stared wide-eyed into his piercing, golden eyes as her passage began to tighten once again. She loved the sight of his clenched jaw and straining muscles as his pleasure consumed him. Zuko rolled his hips sharply and she gasped as he roughly pressed against that sensitive spot inside her.

“Zuko!” Katara screamed as she came for him once again.

Zuko hissed as her release shook her entire body and her pussy clenched almost painfully around his aching cock. He could feel his end approaching and he relished in it with a frantic anticipation as fire raced in his veins. He wrapped her legs around his waist once again and he brought his perspiring body on top of hers as he began to pound violently and mindlessly into her in a desperate attempt to fill her with his seed and end the mad need within him.

He thrust into her over and over again and then brought a hand down to firmly rub her clit, wanting to feel her tightening around him again. Katara threw her head back and screamed as another orgasm crashed into her, sending her to worlds of rapture.

Zuko’s breath hitched as her slick walls closed down on him almost ruthlessly as she wailed his name into the room. An almost painful fire raced down his spine and shot down his throbbing cock. A fierce roar tore from his throat as his seed erupted from him and spilled inside his wife’s shuddering pussy.

“Katara!”

His release was mind-blowing, staggering, and his vision blackened for a second. It felt as if he had ignited from the pure potency of his climax, his body shuddered uncontrollably, suspended in agonizing pleasure. Electrifying sparks racked his entire body at each delicious throb of his orgasm. Once his hips stops jerking and his cock stopped spurting his sticky seed, he slumped forward, panting hard. He could feel Katara moaning and panting beneath him and he sighed as he waited for his body and mind to return to normal.

But to his utter consternation, the potent need that had plagued him moments ago returned with the same powerful urgency, causing his mind to become hazy and wild with lust. He shook his head, trying to make sense of the desperate, almost savage, need coursing through him, but the immense need already took control of both his mind and body.

Moaning softly as her body came down from her incredible orgasms, Katara clung tightly to her husband’s amazing body. She was not given the chance to relax and wonder about his strange behavior when she felt Zuko’s cock harden fully inside her still quivering pussy and he began to thrust into her frantically once again. Gasping, all she could so was cling to him as pleasure ignited in her body.

“Zu-Zuko!” she cried out.

“I’m...going to fuck you, Katara,” he groaned throatily, panting heavily, “Over...and over... again...I need you...”

A moment later, she was screaming her release followed by Zuko’s groan as he emptied himself into her. But not a moment passed before Zuko was once again hard and ready and was driving into her again and again. Katara could only gasp and moan his name, clinging with both need and bewilderment onto his body, at his unrelenting lovemaking.

The massive bed came in handy once again as he made love to her in varying positions for hours upon hours, but all with the same pleasurable and passionate outcome. She moaned and shuddered with each spasmodic spill of Zuko’s scorching seed against her low cervix. Katara struggled as she tried to keep up with him, but her body was too tired and over-sensitized with the many orgasms he had ruthlessly pulled from her body. She could not even count the many times they had climaxed anymore, her mind was too overwhelmed with both exhaustion and pleasure. All she wanted was to curl against Zuko’s body as he held her to him and allowed her to relax after such intense sex.

A small part of Zuko’s mind knew his wife was exhausted from his persistent lovemaking, but he could not seem to stop. His mind and body were still plagued by that controlling need and powerful lust. All he could do was continue to sensually and erotically torture her as he thrust himself into her body, causing her to moan, cry, and scream his name. Another low wail ripped from her swollen lips as another staggering release beset her thoroughly pleased body.
With a strangled snarl, the Fire Lord pressed his hips tightly against her, impaling his throbbing cock as deeply as he could go, and then he rasped his waterbender’s name as he again spilled himself into her satisfied and tired body. Muscles tensed rigidly as he continued thrusting into her hot tight pussy already overflowing with his seed. Helpless in the face of one of the strongest orgasms he had ever experienced, Zuko clenched his eyes shut and held onto her body as his hips continued to jerk as her clenching core milked him of his seed, just enjoying the excruciating pleasure as they held onto each other.

Once utterly spent, he collapsed atop her trembling, sweaty body as his own shuddered convulsively. Heart pounding wildly in his chest, breath coming out in quick, loud pants, Zuko closed his eyes with a groan and waited for that mindless lust to consume him once again.

When a long moment passed and that mad need did not reappear, Zuko relaxed as he rested his head between his wife’s soft breasts and wrapped his arms tenderly around her. He felt his waterbender tiredly kiss his head.

Now that that bewildering need subsided, Zuko enjoyed his climax—or multiple climaxes in this case—gratefully. He felt so pleased, almost peaceful, but also very, very exhausted and confused.

What the hell was that?

His need and desire for his wife was always great, but never to this overwhelming and wild extent. He had acted like a mindless sex-driven beast.

When the incredible sensations subsided, Katara slowly opened her eyes, her mind still a bit hazy from the immense pleasure she had experienced. Once she found that Zuko was not going to start another round of lovemaking and she could think straight again, she kissed Zuko’s head resting on her chest and wrapped her arms around him. He was still breathing hard, but she could tell that his body was as lethargic as hers felt.

He lifted his head and he looked down at her. His black hair fell around them and a few long strands clung to his sweaty face. She reached up to smooth his hair back and she smiled when she realized he still had his fire crown on, though it was askew. She loved tangling her hands in his long hair which fell around them when he made love to her.

Zuko scrutinized her closely as he took in the emotions in her blue eyes, and was immeasurably comforted to find that he had not hurt her in his mindless pursuit to possess her. He leaned down to kiss her gently and he smiled with relief and satisfaction when she sighed and kissed him tenderly back.
Pulling away after a moment, Zuko carefully extracted his now flaccid member from her sensitive passage and slowly knelt back between her spread legs. His eyes eagerly fixated themselves on his paradise. The golden color of his eyes darkened as he watched his white seed leaking out excessively from Katara’s pussy to drench the sheets beneath her.

Biting her lip at his expression, Katara felt her passage spasm since she now had an idea what erotic sight he was seeing. She smiled.

Zuko watched as his wife slowly reached a hand down toward her swollen folds and dipped one of her slender fingers inside her before trailing it along her slit. Zuko swallowed hard at the sight and he knew if he was not so tired and spent, he would have taken her again.

“You really like to see your seed pouring out of me, don’t you?” she purred.

The firebender’s eyes darted back to her face and he watched as she gave him a fatigued yet seductive smile. Zuko returned her smile with a smug smirk as his hands began to slowly caress her thighs.

“Yes,” he said huskily, “It shows that you’re completely mine.”

Katara smiled before her eyes landed on his now resting shaft. She grinned at the evidence of her own juices glistening on his impressive flesh.

“Your cock shows evidence of my own mark on you,” she replied throatily.

Chuckling in delight, Zuko moved back over her and languidly kissed her swollen lips before he pulled back.

“Are you okay?” he asked, just to make sure.

“I’m fine,” she replied with a smile before she purred, “I’m more than fine.”
“Good. I’m glad,” he responded with a smile.

With one more kiss, he lay down beside her with his elbow propping him up. When she wearily turned to her side to face him, he reached out to caress her flushed cheek.

“So what was that about?” Katara finally asked and cleared her throat a little at the huskiness of her tone. She blushed as she remembered how much he had made her scream in pleasure. “Not that I didn’t enjoy it, quite the contrary, but I’m pretty sure it isn’t normal for a man to experience multiple climaxes repeatedly and so soon right after the others.”

Lying on his back tiredly, Zuko turned his head toward his curious wife with a sigh.

“It seems Uncle Iroh raised the dosage of that aphrodisiac tea he gave us before,” he told her wryly before he huskily added, “I felt like I was going to burn alive if I didn’t bury my aching cock inside your tight, wet pussy.”

Katara smiled before she let out a small giggle.

“Maybe we should thank him,” she teased.

“I will not let my uncle think that I need his tea to perform my husbandly duties,” he growled out with a disgruntled sniff.

With a small laugh, Katara shook her head before she lifted herself high enough to kiss him soothingly on his lips. She smiled when he expectedly deepened the kiss and tangled his hand in her hair. They kissed slowly, languidly, not so much for sexual satisfaction but more out of closeness and satiation. When Zuko pulled away to allow them some air, Katara licked her lips with a sigh.

“The others were probably wondering why we missed dinner,” she pointed out with a grin.

Zuko glanced at the opened balcony and guessed that dawn was fast approaching. They had missed dinner hours ago. With a shrug, he grabbed her to him with a smirk.

“Let them wonder,” he said throatily as he kissed her cheek.
Katara laughed. When Zuko kissed her mouth again, Katara easily relented as she melted against his firm and sweaty body. They pulled apart when the rumbling of their hungry stomachs caused them both to chuckle. Exhausted, feeling like his entire body was sapped of energy, Zuko reluctantly got out of bed and placed on a robe so he could find a servant to give him the order of bringing food to the royal bedchambers.

They ate a light snack before they spent a few more minutes whispering to each other as they caressed and kissed one another in tender affection before they succumbed to their exhaustion and fell into a deep and restful slumber. It was moments like these that they vowed would not vanish despite Jianguo’s greed and promise of revenge. It was moments like these that they vowed to cherish forever.
Rising Frustrations

Blue eyes drowsily fluttered open. Groggy, Katara glanced around the room and noticed by the moonlight that spilled into their bedchamber from the opened balcony that it was still night. Since the night was hot, the fireplace had been extinguished, casting the room into dark shadows except areas illuminated by the light of the moon. Feeling something heavy on her chest, she glanced down and her gaze settled on the dark head of her husband. He was once again sleeping with his head pillowed by her breasts, his left arm wrapped snugly around her waist, and his leg curled around one of hers. They were both naked, having fallen asleep after making love hours ago, and she could feel every inch of his warm skin and muscular body touching hers. She felt hot, however, that was not what had woken her up but the cramps that were forming on her lower abdomen.

Please, La, no, she pleaded mentally. Her heart pounded hard in her chest with anxiety.

Gently lifting her firebender’s arm from her, she tried to carefully slip away from underneath him, but the movement immediately awoke Zuko in alarm and he instinctively tightened his hold of her. He raised his head to look at her worriedly.

“What’s wrong, love?” he asked, his tone husky from sleep and rough with concern.

“I just need to use the bathroom,” Katara muttered before she pressed a quick kiss to his lips. “Go back to sleep.”

Yawning, Zuko nodded before he lifted himself from her to allow her to move from beneath him. With a sigh, he slumped back onto the soft mattress. Jumping from the bed, Katara gathered her nightgown and a clean pair of undergarments. After a moment, she decided to gather the absorbing strips of cloth Jiao had introduced her to as a precaution before she quickly made her way to the bathing chamber and closed the door.

A few minutes later, she was suppressing tears of frustration and disappointment when her suspicions were confirmed. Her monthly bleeding had arrived.

Letting her face fall into her hands, Katara clenched her eyes shut as sadness filled her and made her heart ache. Why had she not gotten pregnant? She continued to take the herbs Yin-Min gave her, and even if she didn’t, Zuko and she were constantly at each other. They just had to be alone before they were practically ripping off each other’s clothes in their haste to come together.
With a dejected sigh, she cleaned up and dressed before she opened the door and slowly made her way back into the darkened bedroom, hoping Zuko had gone back to sleep. She paused when she saw that he had not when he shot a small spark at the candle near his nightstand. He was sitting up on the bed and looking at her with a concerned frown.

“What’s wrong?” he asked again as he eyed her now clothed body.

“Nothing,” Katara replied with a shrug as she made her way to the opened balcony. Staring out into the darkness, Katara added with a calm she did not feel, “I just started my monthly time, it’s all.”

Zuko heard her let out a little sigh and he quickly stood up from the bed. Smoothly, he closed the distance between them. Katara felt him slide his arms around her, pulling her gently back against his hard naked frame, enfolding her in a protective embrace, his warmth surrounding her. Zuko leaned his chin on her head and simply held her as they both stared into the starry night sky. Katara felt herself relax when he began to rock her in a slow, gentle sway.

“Don’t feel discouraged,” he murmured, “We just got married. We just began.”

She felt Zuko cup her cheek before he gently nudged her to look at him. His golden eyes were soft and understanding as he gave her a reassuring smile.

“Don’t worry,” he told her softly before he bent down to give her a tender kiss.

Katara smiled at him when he pulled away. She leaned into his hand when his thumb began to caress her cheek and they stared silently into each other’s eyes. The waterbender closed her eyes as she relaxed back against him and he tightened his arms around her.

“Come, love. Let’s go back to bed,” he told her softly.

With a nod, Katara allowed him to lead her back to the comfort of their large bed. Once she was lying on it, Zuko laid back down beside her. He wrapped his arm around her and she cuddled close against his chest with a sigh. The feeling of him running his hand soothingly down her back, combined with his comforting warmth and masculine scent lulled her to a restful sleep.

Peering up from tending her rose bushes, Ursa surreptitiously glanced to her guard standing silently a few feet away. Jee was currently staring amusedly at a daring bird hopping and flapping on the ground near his boot in search of worms. Ursa suppressed a smile at the sight before a small frown marred her pale brow. She felt guilty that Jee had to leave his post as admiral of Zuko’s fleet in order to be her personal guard. Although he had not complained once since Zuko gave him the job to protect her, Ursa was sure he must be bored following her around all the day.

He must be longing to be out at sea, she mused for the hundredth time.

She had tried to convince both him and Zuko that she did not need a personal guard, but they had refused to listen to her. Zuko told her he could not trust anyone but the admiral, and Jee had assured her that he did not mind the assignment.

Ursa glanced back down to clean the deteriorating petals of one of the roses as another thought crossed her mind. There was a part of her that felt relieved Jee remained near her. After Katara had asked her if she ever thought of being in another relationship, Ursa could not stop thinking about it. She thought she had been firm in her decision to remain single for the rest of her life. She did not want to be hurt again. She refused to give another man power over her and her heart. Yet, the appearance of Jee in her life had begun to make her falter in her resolve.

Her heart did a strange little flip in her chest when Jee quickly stepped forward to hand her the small gardening shears she was searching for. Thanking him, she smiled and again her heart fluttered when he smiled in return. Without another word, she returned her attention to her roses.

She had thought she would never feel such things for a man after Ozai, but when she was near the admiral emotions she thought long dead began to awaken. Jee may be silent and stoic most of the time, but he was also kind and gentle. He was strong and he was protective of her. But most of all, he was a good companion that gave her comfort and made her feel safe and respected.

Not to mention how attractive he was. A small blush surfaced on her pale cheeks at her thoughts. It had been a while since she had felt any sort of attraction to a man that she almost felt shy and embarrassed at her reawakening desires. She glanced back up at him and her eyes widened when she saw he was looking at her curiously. Quickly bringing her attention to the aromatic flowers, Ursa pretended to be busy as her heart leapt in her chest before she frowned.

However, she was wary of her sudden infatuation with the admiral. She did not want such feelings to develop into something deeper that might eventually lead her to more pain. And then there was her son to think about. She did not think Zuko would be comfortable with the idea of his mother having another man in her life. Besides, Jee never gave any indication that he might feel anything for her, whether it was affection or attraction. Perhaps it was best that she put a stop to her growing feelings. Yet there was a part of her that did not want to.
With a sigh, Ursa caressed one of the soft petals with a wistful expression.

“Lady Ursa, are you feeling well?” Jee’s concerned voice reached her ears.

“Yes, Jee, I’m fine,” she responded serenely before she added with a smile, “I think I’m finished here. Why don’t we have tea with Iroh?”

She watched as a frown began to appear on Jee’s face, but he quickly schooled his features into a pleasant expression.

“Of course, Lady Ursa,” he replied softly.

A low groan resounded in the otherwise silent study of the Fire Lord. Pressing his head against the back of his large chair, Zuko closed his eyes and clenched his teeth as pleasure skittered up his spine. The hand that rested between his legs, hidden beneath the shadows of his large desk, tightened its hold as his cock throbbed with incredible pleasure. His left hand tightly grasped the wooden armrest of his chair as his hips surged forward at a particularly pleasurable stroke. He opened his eyes and stared dazedly at the high ceiling as he briefly thought that there was no time for this since the advisors had called for a meeting that was to commence in a few minutes. The thought quickly flew away, however, when he felt his end approaching. Just a few more strokes and he would be erupting in ecstasy! He closed his eyes and threw his head back with an almost inaudible groan as his cock pulsed with his impending release.

“Nephew!” the sound of his uncle’s voice interrupted Zuko from his goal as the old man burst into the room and walked toward the Fire Lord’s desk.

Cursing, Zuko jumped in shock before he quickly leaned closer to his desk in order to hide the lower half of his body as he shuffled papers and pretended to read them while trying to calm his erratic breathing.

Damn it, he thought the door was locked!

Iroh sat down on one of the chairs facing the impressive desk and continued to babble on about something, but Zuko could not focus on his words because all he could think about was that his still erect shaft was straining for release. He needed to get rid of his old uncle before he went insane!
“Uncle, I’m busy,” Zuko interrupted gruffly as he looked up to glare at him, “I’ll talk to you later.”

“Why of course!” Iroh said as he stood up from the chair with a smile before he added, “But you should hurry up, the meeting is soon and the advisors are adamant about you attending it.”

Zuko frowned at his uncle’s words since he wondered, not for the first time, why the old advisors were so insistent about this meeting. He was brought out of his thoughts as he watched his uncle make his way to the door. Iroh opened the door and walked out, but just as he was about to close it, he glanced back with a cheeky grin.

“You should really make sure the door is locked next time, Nephew,” he said amusedly before he added, “And you should have your wife see to your needs.”

Iroh chuckled as his nephew’s eyes widened in shock before he finally closed the door. Zuko slumped against his chair and closed his eyes with a mortified groan.

“You should listen to your uncle, my lord, and have your wife tend to your needs,” a feminine voice teased from the shadows under his large desk.

Zuko opened his eyes and looked down at the blue-eyed woman kneeling between his legs with his cock wedged between her soft breasts. Her lips were plump and rosy, her wavy hair was a little disarrayed from his clenching fingers, and her cheeks were painted with a soft red blush.

“Then take care of my needs, wife,” he demanded with a smirk as he thrust his hips forward so that the tip of his shaft touched her lips.

Katara giggled before she pursed her lips to kiss his weeping tip. She darted her tongue out to trail it down his shaft before coming back up to lick around the head, flicking across the small slit. Panting loudly, Zuko’s hips tried to follow her movements, needing her to once again take him into the wet warmth of her skillful mouth.

The little minx had surprised him with this impromptu tryst, but he sure wasn’t complaining. A week had passed since Katara woke up to find her monthly bleeding had arrived, and although she had been sad that night, she had quickly returned to her lively spirited self the next morning.

Zuko watched as she pulled away slightly to give him a seductive smile before she opened her mouth wide and engulfed his length with a moan. He rasped her name at the amazing sensation of her hot mouth surrounding him and he brought his hand down to grab the back of her head.
Katara began to move her head up and down, her tongue swirling around his tip, as she massaged the rest of his hard cock between her breasts.

“Katara,” he called out again in a throaty groan as his hips surged up. “Damn, that feels… incredible… uuuuh.”

The waterbender purred around his shaft as she continued to bob up and down. She moaned when she felt her husband tightened his hold of her head and heard him groan her name once again. She loved it when she reduced him to such a state of utter bliss. She grabbed her breasts more tightly, pinching her hard nipples, and pressed her thighs together to try to relieve some of her own arousal. She could feel her juices seeping out of her, coating the insides of her upper thighs.

Zuko groaned more loudly when his wife began to suck his cock more firmly. The heat building within him was overwhelming. He was so close, but he didn’t want to come just yet. He pulled her away and she released his turgid shaft with a loud ‘pop’. Panting, he glanced down at her to see her giving him an adorably confused look.

“My turn,” he uttered in a deep, low tone.

“Mmm, yes, please,” Katara moaned as her hands tightened on his thighs.

He didn’t say anything else as he stood up and helped her crawl out from under his desk. When she was standing before him, his eyes raked her body hungrily. Her robes were hanging around her hips and her delectable breasts were bared for his perusal. He reached up to cup them firmly in his hands and Katara’s head fell back with a pleased moan as he kneaded her mounds and rubbed her nipples. A small gasp escaped her when he pulled her tightly against him and kissed her deeply.

Katara moaned and clung to him as her tongue battled with his. She rubbed her naked stomach against his hard length and smiled against his mouth when he groaned and bucked his hips against her. She opened her eyes when Zuko suddenly pulled away and began to quickly divest her of her clothing. When her robes fell around her feet, Zuko swiftly spun her around and pressed himself against her back.

“Mm, Zuko,” the waterbender moaned when he rubbed his shaft between the line of her ass.

Zuko smirked when his wife pushed firmly back against him, but he grasped her hips to stop her when the amazing sensation of her flesh rubbing against his straining arousal threatened to usher his release sooner than he wanted. Before Katara could ask him why he had stopped, he lifted her and placed her on her knees on top of his desk.

“Get on your hands, Katara,” he ordered huskily.

Heart beating wildly in her chest, Katara quickly did what he demanded and pressed her hands against the wooden surface of the desk. She could feel Zuko’s intense gaze on her upturned backside and she shuddered in rising arousal, as well as the feeling of the chilly temperature in the room hitting against her wet folds.

“Don’t move, my little waterbender,” he ordered softly.

He walked around the desk and Katara watched as he moved toward the door and locked it before he slowly turned around. The blue-eyed woman watched with mounting lust as her firebender approached her with smoldering, amber eyes. Her eyes flicked down and she felt more of her juices seeping out of her aching core at the sight of his engorged cock bobbing almost mesmerizingly with his steps. She did not remove her eyes from him until he disappeared from her view when he rounded the desk. She felt him move behind her and her passage clench in need and anticipation. She could feel her juices sliding down her upper thighs at being left so exposed.

Zuko ran his hand slowly down her back and he watched with satisfaction as she shivered at his touch. He moved his chair closer to the desk and sat down on it. He smirked in delight to see that he was at the perfect height for what he planned to do.

“What a beautiful view,” the Fire Lord uttered in a deep baritone.

His eyes trailed down his wife’s smooth back and became riveted to that spot that he loved to touch, taste, and be buried in. It seemed he took too long in his appraisal because he heard Katara whimper his name in a desperate whisper.

“Touch me, Zuko,” she demanded throatily. She could not stand the wait any longer. She needed him! If he didn’t touch her soon, she was going to use her bloodbending to manipulate his body to give her the pleasure she craved.

Zuko grinned at her demanding tone. He loved it when she became desperate for him. The Fire Lord watched as his wife wiggled her bottom to entice him and his golden eyes darkened in lust. He firmly gripped her hips and pulled her back towards his face.

“Bend forward a little,” he ordered huskily.

Katara quickly followed his order and lowered her upper body until she was resting on her forearms with her palms flat against the wooden desk. Her heart was racing in her chest and her breathing was ragged. She shuddered and moaned when she felt Zuko’s hands caress her waist and hips.

Zuko leaned his face closer to her as his hands moved lower to caress her backside. His tongue slipped out to stroke the sensitive dimples just above her lovely ass and she moaned. He trailed his tongue lower before he playfully nipped at her right cheek. She gave a startled gasp of pleasure as his teeth gently scraped the delicate skin of her rear before he placed a soothing kiss over the stinging spot. He enjoyed the shiver that raked her body before he grasped both pert cheeks firmly in his hands. He spread them open so his eyes could feast upon his treasure. His waterbender’s clit and pink folds were swollen and glistening with her creamy essence as were her thighs. Her little pussy clenched and quivered with her need.

“Zuko, please,” Katara whimpered as she again wiggled her ass in his hold.

The firebender leaned forward and inhaled a deep breath of the delightful scent of her arousal, then he stuck out his tongue to lick up the folds of her center, taking in the taste of her honeyed juices. Katara moaned and her hips jerked as her nails scratched the hard surface of the desk.

Zuko reached down and pulled the lips of her sex open with his thumbs before he leaned forward for more. His tongue slid up between the drenched folds from her throbbing clit to her spasming entrance. He repeated the process a few times, making sure to lap up all the warm fluids that leaked out of her, before he dipped his tongue inside her. Zuko flicked and stroked his tongue along her inner walls. Katara threw her head back and groaned loudly as her hips rocked back against his face. Zuko groaned against her, loving the way her wet passage quivered and squeezed around him.

“Haaa…Z-Zuko,” she called out huskily, “Mmm…oooh…”

Encouraged by her throaty moans, Zuko thrust his tongue repeatedly inside her, occasionally using his lips and teeth to suck and gently tug at her folds. Her moans and gasps were music to his ears as he lapped, flicked, and stroked his tongue at her core. He pulled back slightly to catch his breath and his golden eyes gazed at the engorged bud above her entrance gleaming with her liquid arousal. He rubbed his fingers against it and smirked when she arched her back and wantonly tossed her head back, her long hair flying around her, as she again moaned his name. He played with her clit and folds until his fingers were drenched before he replaced them with his mouth, sucking firmly on her sensitive bud. He reached down to grasp his neglected, throbbing cock with his wet hand, smearing her juices along his length, and began to roughly stroke himself at the same time he pushed two fingers into her.

“Oh gods, yes!” Katara cried out as she rocked her hips back, spreading her legs a little more in order to angle her hips for a better penetration.

Groaning in pleasure, Zuko firmly stroked his cock, rubbing a thumb over his sensitive tip, at the same time he thrust his fingers rapidly into her pussy. He gently scraped his teeth on her clit just as he pressed against that spongy spot inside her that he knew made her go wild and he felt her stiffen before her walls tightened around his moving fingers.

“Zuko!” she shrieked as her legs tensed, her body arched, and her toes curled as her release shook her entire body. Her arousal gushed out of her and Zuko greedily lapped at it, causing her hips to jerk at the sensation.

Zuko pulled away when Katara slumped back onto the desk, panting and moaning. Licking his lips, he caressed her bottom soothingly with one hand, slowing down his strokes on his shaft with the other, as he waited for her to recuperate a little. His own chest was heaving with his arousal and his cock was straining for release. A few drops of his seed had leaked from his tip and had slid down his length. Unable to wait anymore, the Fire Lord stood up and pushed down his dark trousers so that they fell around his booted ankles. He moved forward but frowned when he realized that the desk was too high for him to enter her in the position she was in.

Katara’s dazed eyes opened and she moaned when her husband grasped her hips and helped move her legs over the desk so that her feet settled on the floor and her hands grabbed the edge. Then he settled against her back, grabbing her hips tightly in his large hands.

“Damn, I need to be inside your pussy so badly, Katara,” he rasped against her ear.

“Please,” the waterbender moaned.

“Mm, you need my cock, don’t you, my love?” he purred huskily.

“Yes…ohh…” she whined as she wiggled her ass against his groin before she throatily demanded, “I need your big cock inside me. Now.”
“Gods, I love you,” he groaned as he pressed himself tightly against her back.

Katara moaned throatily when he glided his erection against her slick womanhood before she gasped loudly when he slammed himself into her.

“Yesss!” Zuko hissed gutturally as her wet and warm walls embraced him tightly.

He pulled himself back, stroked the head of his cock along her walls, before he thrust himself back in and began to wildly pound into her. Katara arched her back and cried out his name. She lost herself in the erotic sensations as he plunged into her over and over again.

“Zuko, oh, Zuko!” she chanted with every pleasurable thrust. “Oh, yes, just…like that!”

Zuko growled at the sounds she uttered as he felt the pressure building in his balls which were slapping against her sensitive nub. His need for his wife had not dwindled in the slightest in all the months that he had taken her. He still craved and needed her with an intensity that would have frightened him if he did not enjoy it so much. He groaned harshly as he increased his pace. The pleasure was overwhelming but it wasn’t enough.

Katara’s eyes flew open when Zuko suddenly stopped, but before she could demand him to continue, she felt him lift her higher on the desk until the tips of her toes touched the floor and her breasts pressed against the cold surface of the furniture, then he continued his unrelenting thrusts. Katara threw her head back and wailed his name, her fingers gripping the other edge of the desk firmly, as he penetrated her more deeply and stroked that sensitive spot inside her.

Zuko growled loudly. She was so slick for him that his movements were almost effortless as the scorching heat between them increased. His movements grew more erratic and frantic as his climax began to simmer intensely.

Katara heard a low growl fall from his throat and her blood boiled in her veins. She ground against him, clenching her walls around his pounding shaft, with his every thrust, not caring that the edge of the desk was digging into her stomach and that her sensitive nipples were pressed too hard against its surface as her body prepared itself for another orgasm.

“Zuko, please,” she whimpered loudly as her hands clawed at the desk, “I’m close, I’m so close!”
At her words, Zuko growled her name and his hands grasped her hips tightly.

“Do it again, Katara,” he demanded hoarsely. “Come for me!”

His voice was loud and deep, suffused with need and desperation. He needed to have her moaning his name, throwing her head back and arching that luscious body of hers as she came for him, and he plunged himself faster and harder into her.

“Oh, oh, gods, yes!” she wailed her pleasure to the heavens as her orgasm came hard and fast, drowning her with its astounding intensity.

His wife was still in the throes of ecstasy when Zuko let out a roar as he thrust himself as deeply as he could inside her before he spilled himself into her, his shaft throbbing and hips jerking with every spray of his seed. Katara panted hard, their bodies tightly connected, as he held himself absolutely still above her. Zuko felt her body shudder beneath him in the aftershocks, against which he was as defenseless as she was before he finally relaxed against her back.

“Katara,” he breathed her name hoarsely as he buried his face in her hair and wrapped his arms around her.

With a satisfied groan, Zuko sat back on his chair, bringing his softly moaning waterbender down with him, his softening cock still embedded within Katara’s overfilled, warm core. Panting harshly, he kissed her head as he ran his hands soothingly up and down her arms as she softly panted and trembled against him. After a moment, he gave her a gentle squeeze before he cleared his throat.

“We don’t have time to clean up now. We must go to the meeting,” he told her.

With a sigh, Katara nodded her head. With his help, she moved off his lap, both moaning at the sensations of their flesh separating, before she stood up. Zuko followed after her and they quickly helped each other get redressed and presentable. Zuko could still smell her on his hands, taste her on his tongue, and he smiled at the memory of what they just did. Once they were ready, Katara slowly turned to face him and Zuko found himself enjoying the expression of utter satisfaction on her lovely features and in her ocean-blue eyes. They were dreamy, fatigued from their activities, and he smirked with male pride as he licked his lips to savor her lingering taste.

“We will definitely continue this later,” he said huskily.
“I’ll hold you to that promise,” Katara replied with a seductive smile as she ran her hand sensuously down her firebender’s chest.

With a shudder of desire, Zuko quickly grasped her hand when she teasingly moved it lower. He brought it up to his lips to kiss her knuckles as he playfully frowned at her.

“Stop teasing me, you minx,” the golden-eyed male groaned, “We’re already late to the meeting as it is.”

The brunette waterbender let out a small laugh. She loved it that she was able to distract her usually focused husband with just a light touch or an alluring smile, which she admittedly employed when he was stressed by too much work.

“Alright, let’s see what they want this time,” she said with a roll of her eyes.

Chuckling, Zuko tucked her hand under his elbow and led her toward the door. Pausing before it, he looked down at her with an intense stare and an amused grin on his lips as he deliberately played with the lock of the door. A small blush spread on Katara’s cheeks at the reminder that they were almost caught in an intimate situation. Thank La Iroh did not suspect it was she who was pleasing Zuko and not Zuko himself or she would never be able to look at her uncle-in-law in the eye ever again. She would definitely make sure the door was locked the next time they decided to use the study for their lovemaking.

Ushering his wife out of his study, Zuko closed the door before they quickly made their way to the throne room. They were a few minutes late, but Zuko was not concerned. As they neared the room, Katara smiled when she noticed Shen and Kuo waiting for them. After they bowed at them, they returned her smile with small ones of their own and escorted the royal couple down the long corridor.

When they finally arrived, they paused at the entrance when the old advisors turned to frown at them. With a neutral expression on his face, Zuko led Katara into the room while she smiled apologetically at the impatient men. Shen and Kuo stood at attention against the wall. Katara spotted Iroh sitting next to Chao and she almost blushed when the tea-loving old man smiled innocently at her.

Once he helped his waterbender sit on her elaborate cushion, Zuko turned around, and parting the wall of fire, walked up the marble steps to his throne on the dais. Once he was sitting down, Zuko gazed at his advisors with a cool expression. He noticed some of them returned his look hesitantly while others averted their eyes. He mentally frowned.
“Why have you called Fire Lady Katara and me to this meeting?” he asked.

The Fire Lord’s dark eyebrow rose on his forehead when the men floundered for a moment on how to proceed. Some murmured amongst themselves, while others nudged their neighbor to take courage and answer their volatile lord. Zuko searched for Chao, Enlai, and Jian, his three most trusted advisors, and saw that they were frowning at the men disapprovingly and glancing hesitantly at Katara.

What was going on?

Sitting on her elaborate cushion, Katara frowned as she watched the men stutter and squirm. Whatever the advisors wanted to bring to their attention was something they knew her husband was not going to like. A small twinge of apprehension began to fester in her chest. Glancing up, Katara noticed through the fire wall that Zuko was frowning impatiently at the men.

“Oh, just shut up, you cowards!” Wei’s hard voice made everybody pause.

The large, old advisor made a frustrated and disgusted sound as he glared at his fellow councilmen before he rose to his feet. Zuko narrowed his eyes at his hated advisor as he braced himself. He knew that whatever Wei had to say was not going to be good at all.

Wei glanced at the silent Fire Lady before he lifted his gaze to the darkly frowning Fire Lord.

“More than a year has passed since your wedding and there is still no sign of an heir,” the old man began.

Katara flinched as if the man’s words had physically struck her and she clenched her hands on her lap. Zuko frowned darkly as he glared at the haughty, old man.

“Fire Lady Katara and I have only been married recently,” Zuko replied in a deceptively calm tone.

“That is no excuse,” Wei countered severely, “It is obvious Fire Lady Katara will not be able to conceive soon. And we all know it is imperative that you have an heir immediately, especially with the threat of those dirty rebels and a possible plot against you. You are already twenty-two years old!”
“We know what our duties are,” Zuko responded in a dark tone, “My wife and I will eventually conceive a child and—”

“What if you don’t?” Wei interrupted with a raised bushy eyebrow before he grimly added, “Maybe fire and water are not meant to mix.”

Zuko grit his teeth at the man’s words. Katara’s apprehensive feeling began to grow and she clenched her dress tightly with her fingers.

“What is your point?” Zuko asked harshly.

Wei remained silent. The other advisors shifted in their places as they murmured in low tones and glanced apologetically at the quiet Fire Lady. Noticing their looks, Katara felt her heart begin to pound in trepidation. Zuko frowned as he also noticed the men looking ruefully at his wife and his stomach clenched in uneasiness.

“What is your point?” he repeated with a growl.

His attention shifted away from Wei’s simpering expression as another of his older advisors stood up and cleared his throat.

“My lord, with the exception of Advisors Chao, Enlai, and Jian,” he began then paused to clear his throat again before continuing, “We, the Royal Court Council, have come to the consensus that you, Fire Lord Zuko, must sire an heir with another woman and soon.”

Katara felt as if the air was stolen from her lungs and she gasped sharply, unable to believe what she just heard.

“No,” she breathed in dismay before she clenched her teeth in rage.

“What is the meaning of this?!” Iroh exclaimed in shock and anger.
The advisors stiffened when the wall of fire flared and their lord sprang to his feet in fury as he glared murderously at them all. The light and shadows the flames cast over his face made his features appear intimidating and harsh.

“I will never divorce Lady Katara and marry another woman!” Zuko growled out fiercely as sparks flew from his nostrils.

“We didn’t say anything about you divorcing Fire Lady Katara to marry someone else,” Wei spoke up again in a nonchalant tone as he stared unaffectedly at the enraged Fire Lord. “The common people love her and they would surely revolt at the mere thought. Not to mention we may have a war on our hands brought by both the Northern and Southern Water Tribes if you divorce her.”

Zuko faltered in his rage as he stared in confusion at his hated advisor.

“Then what are you suggesting?” he growled out.

“A royal concubine can do the job,” Wei responded indifferently with a shrug of his shoulders.

“No!” Katara exclaimed in horror and anger as she balled her hands on her lap. No!

“What?” Zuko roared wrathfully.

Some of the advisors cowered back when the flames flared so high that they almost touched the ceiling. The advisor that was still standing next to Wei cleared his throat. When Zuko turned his furious glare on him, the man shrank back for a second before he straightened himself out. Normally, the councilmen could not dictate rules without the Fire Lord’s consent, but when it came to the safety of the Fire Nation and the royal bloodline, they were able to combine their vote to override his. And since this was such an occasion, they knew their Fire Lord would have to see they were right. Eventually.

“We have decided to let the noblemen know that because of Fire Lady Katara’s…unfortunate condition, a royal concubine will be chosen to bear the Fire Lord’s heir,” he informed them, “We asked that they start sending their single, female relatives to the palace for your perusal.”

“I will not disgrace my wife by taking a concubine, much less to bear my heir,” Zuko growled out angrily as he loomed intimidatingly before them.
It is for the sake of the royal bloodline,” the old advisor insisted pleadingly before he added pleasantly, “Besides, Fire Lady Katara will still rule as your wife and consort. The royal concubine will only serve to give you children.”

Katara felt her anger spike at the men’s insistence and demands. How dare they?! How dare they treat the matter of Zuko taking a concubine as if there was nothing wrong with it? How could they be so callous to her feelings and her culture? How dare they assume there was something wrong with her! The temperature in the room began to drop to an icy chill in her fury and indignation, completely opposite from the sweltering heat of her husband’s rage. The men squirmed and glanced nervously at her, shivering from the cold and fear that raced down their spines at the fire blazing in her blue eyes. Even through his anger, Zuko found himself once again impressed by his wife’s impact on the advisors.

“You can’t expect us to agree to this,” Katara hissed angrily as her fingers convulsed on her lap, itching to use her bloodbending to scare them into retracting their decree.

“We understand what you must be feeling, Fire Lady Katara,” Wei spoke up.

He paused when the waterbender’s eyes quickly shifted toward him, her glare as fierce and scorching as the Fire Lord’s fire wall.

“You know nothing of my feelings,” the enraged Fire Lady snapped. “If you did, you wouldn’t assume I would be complacent at the thought of my husband having another woman to bear his child.”

“We wouldn’t be forced to such a decree if you had birthed his heir already!” the old man responded harshly.

Katara’s eyes widened at his accusation, but before she could retort Zuko’s angry growl resounded in the room as the fire wall once again blazed.

“Don’t you put the blame on her!” Zuko roared before he heatedly added, “She’s your Fire Lady and you shall speak to her respectfully, Wei!”

“I was merely stating the truth,” Wei responded indignantly as he looked up at the angry Fire Lord.
He paused and the royal couple, Iroh, and Chao glared at him as the old man turned to look at his fellow councilmen, who were silently watching the events unfold before them.

“Is it such an unreasonable request to have our Fire Lord sire an heir as soon as possible?” Wei asked conversationally. “Would not an heir secure the royal bloodline, thus ensuring the peace and prosperity of our nation?”

The men murmured their agreement.

Zuko narrowed his eyes at the men before he turned a piercing glare to Wei when the old man turned to look at him again.

“As I’ve stated before, Fire Lady Katara and I have only been married a short time,” Zuko growled. “It’s too early to rule out the possibility that we can conceive a child.”

“How long would we have to wait until she gives you an heir?” Wei asked with a raised eyebrow. “Months? Years? And what if she never conceives?”

Katara did not hear Zuko’s response because her mind was repeating Wei’s last words. What if he was right? What if she never gave Zuko an heir? A year had passed since their marriage and she still had not gotten pregnant. She was brought out of her thoughts when she heard Zuko growl.

“I will not be taking a concubine,” the Fire Lord stated firmly.

“What? Are you saying your wife’s feelings are more important than the wellbeing of the Fire Nation?” Wei asked gruffly.

Zuko clenched his jaw and balled his hands into tight fists at his sides. Katara’s feelings were more important to him, but he couldn’t admit that. She meant everything to him, he could never hurt her for he would only be hurting himself. But the advisors would never understand, their interest and concern were solely for the Fire Nation. And he understood that because his nation was important to him too.

“It is the only solution,” the old man added when the Fire Lord did not respond.
Katara licked her suddenly dry lips. Even if she argued and raved against the idea of Zuko taking a concubine until she was blue in the face, she knew she could not win. Zuko having an heir was more important to them than her or Zuko’s feelings. Her heart throbbed in her chest and she suppressed a scream of pain, impotence, and fury from escaping her lips. She felt as if she was suffocating. She needed to get out!

Zuko paused from cursing at the old man when he noticed Katara slowly stand up from her place. The men flinched when she looked at them all with pain-filled, angry eyes before she swiftly walked across the long room toward the doors. Zuko felt his heart clench as he watched her go. Although her shoulders were straight and her chin was raised high, he could detect the emotions raging inside her.

Katara, his heart called out to her.

Without a backward glance, the brunette waited until her personal guards opened the doors for her before she stepped out. Kuo and Shen turned back to angrily glare at the old advisors before they quickly followed after their departing lady. Zuko wanted to rush after her, but first he wanted to make things clear to the fools he called advisors. Returning his heated glare at the men, he straightened himself out to his full height.

“I will never take a concubine, especially to sire a child, when I have my wife,” he stated firmly and his amber eyes blazed in defiance.

His glare intensified as he shifted his eyes to Wei when the man scoffed.

“Fire Lady Katara may never give you an heir,” the rotund man sneered.

“It is still too early to come to such conclusions,” Zuko growled out between gritted teeth, “But my point is that I will not take a royal concubine!”

Before the men could continue arguing, the young firebender marched down the long flight of stairs and quickly parted the wall of fire. Stepping through, he firmly and swiftly strode toward the doors. He ignored the men’s exclamations for him to rethink his words and heed their suggestion as he left the meeting room.

Sitting next to Chao and another advisor, Iroh watched his nephew leave and he let out a sorrowful sigh. When would Zuko and Katara ever catch a break? He shook his head as he slipped his hands into his long sleeves. There had to be another solution to this problem.

Striding quickly down the golden corridors, Zuko headed toward the west wing; he had a feeling he would find his wife in their room. As he finally approached the huge golden doors, he saw that his personal guards were standing attentively on either side of them. When they noticed his approach, they bowed their heads before they looked at him with deep frowns.

“Is my wife all right?” Zuko asked them as his brow furrowed in concern.

“Fire Lady Katara has not said a word since she left the meeting room, my lord,” Shen replied in his grim voice.

Zuko’s frown deepened as he moved toward the doors and opened one.

“You won’t really listen to the advisors, will you, my lord?” Kuo’s voice made Zuko pause, “It will devastate Fire Lady Katara if you were to take another woman to your bed, much less to conceive your children.”

Zuko looked over his shoulder to frown darkly at his guard.

“Do you think me so cruel to hurt my wife in such a way?” he growled out.

Kuo bowed his head apologetically.

Zuko did not wait for them to say anything else as he entered the antechamber and closed the door firmly behind him. He quickly crossed the room to the other set of doors that led to the bedroom. He paused briefly as he reached for the handle before he opened the door and stepped in, closing the door softly behind him. His eyes immediately found her sitting on their bed, her hands tightly clenched on her lap, her shoulders slumping a little, as she gazed dejectedly out of the opened balcony. The sight of her silent distress made his heart clench painfully in his chest. Quietly, he made his way to her.

“Katara,” he called her name softly as he sat down beside her.
“Will you do what the advisors want?” she asked quietly without looking up at him as she continued staring at the scene beyond the balcony doors.

“No,” he firmly replied, “I will not dishonor or hurt you by taking another woman to bed.”

Katara felt her heart ease a little at his resolute words before apprehension and fear once again consumed her. She wrung her hands together as she took a few shaky breaths.

“What…what if they’re right?” she whispered in a strained tone, “What if I n-never give you a child?”

“It’s too early to think that,” Zuko responded quickly before he grimly added, “The advisors are just being overly cautious. Besides, I’m sure Wei brought up this issue as another ploy to make my life difficult. However, I will not bend to his whims.”

Zuko bent his head a little so he could see Katara’s averted eyes. He frowned when she lowered her head and seemed to withdraw into herself. He mentally cursed his advisors for the pain and uncertainty his wife was going through at the moment. He understood the council’s concern, but he would never do what they wanted if it meant he would hurt those he cared about. Especially if it hurt Katara. Besides, he did not want to bed and impregnate another woman.

“Katara,” he softly called out her name once again.

He placed his hand over her clenched, smaller ones while he placed his other hand under her chin. He gently nudged it until she finally relented and lifted her head to look at him. Again, he was struck by the sadness and doubt in her azure eyes and he vowed that he would do the impossible to get rid of such negative feelings for good.

“I will never take a concubine. I promise you that I will never place you aside for another woman,” he vowed firmly as he stared intensely into her eyes, “You are the only woman I want and need.”

“Zuko,” Katara breathed shakily as she stared into her husband’s determined, golden gaze.

Before she could utter another word, Zuko leaned down and pressed his lips gently to hers. Katara sighed softly against his mouth as he brushed their lips together while he let go of her chin in order to run his fingers through her hair before cupping her head to deepen their kiss as he gently brought her
He made slow, tender love to her that night and Katara held tightly onto him, relishing in the pleasure he was giving her and the emotions she could see in his eyes. Once they had found their pleasurable end, they lay back down, wrapped in each other’s arms as they stared silently into the other’s eyes. Katara snuggled deeper into her husband’s embrace as sleep began to invade her mind, secure in the thought that nothing would come between them.

One whole month passed and Katara’s anxiety once again resurfaced as her monthly bleeding arrived. Zuko had again reassured her not to worry, but Katara could not heed his words no matter how hard she tried. What if she really could not give Zuko a child? Would it be too selfish of her if she denied him the chance of being a father with another woman? The thought brought a painful, clenching pain to her chest. The problem wasn’t just about Zuko having a child, but an heir. If he were anyone but the Fire Lord, they wouldn’t be in this situation.

“Katara dear, can you hand me that basket?” Ursa’s gentle voice brought the waterbender out of her thoughts.

“Oh, of course,” Katara replied distractedly as she reached for the basket near her feet before she handed it back to her mother-in-law with a small smile.

Ursa returned the smile, though Katara could detect concern in her golden eyes as she grabbed the basket. They were currently in the Royal Palace Garden and Katara was helping Ursa tend to her rose bushes as they waited to meet Zuko and Iroh for dinner. The sound of a giggling baby caught Katara’s attention. She turned in the direction of the sound to see Jiao playing with her son, Ichiro. The boy was beginning to learn how to crawl and Jiao had to be alert whenever he got too close to the flowers. As she watched the interaction between mother and child, Katara again felt that small twinge of jealousy before she mentally chided herself for feeling such a way. Looking away, Katara let out a sad sigh as she returned her attention to the roses before her.

“Katara, are you all right?” Ursa’s concerned voice reached her ears.

“I’m fine,” Katara replied quickly as she plastered a smile on her face.

When Ursa frowned and opened her mouth to say more, Katara straightened and dusted her hands.

“I think I will visit Yin-Min for a while,” she quickly said before she turned around and began to down upon their bed.

walk on the stone path.

Ursa watched Katara leave with sympathetic eyes before she let out a sad sigh. Would her son and daughter-in-law ever have it easy?

When Jiao got up to retrieve her son in order to follow her, Katara kindly told her to remain with Ursa before she made her way back to the palace. The waterbender walked slowly down the many, long corridors as she again lost herself in her thoughts. Once she reached the hall where the infirmary was located, she quickened her pace until she stood outside the large room. Katara looked around and frowned when she noticed there was nobody in the room. She turned around to head back to the garden when she saw Yin-Min round the corner with scrolls in her arms.

“Fire Lady Katara?” Yin-Min called out with a smile as she quickened her pace to stand before the taller woman. “I just came back from the Fire Lord’s study so he could look over Physician Toshiro’s ledgers. Were you waiting long?”

“No, no, I just got here,” Katara replied assuredly.

Yin-Min smiled before she frowned when she finally noticed the waterbender’s distraught eyes. “Is there something you need?”

“Oh, well, yes,” Katara murmured as she looked around them.

“Why don’t you follow me inside where we can talk more privately?” the physician’s assistant said gently.

Katara nodded her head and she followed the short woman into the infirmary. Yin-Min walked into Physician Toshiro’s office to place the scrolls down before she turned around with a small smile.

“Why don’t you sit here and rest, my lady?” Yin-Min said as she indicated to the small chair that rested before Toshiro’s small desk.

Katara tiredly sat down on the wooden chair and let out a long sigh.
“I will get you some tea,” the yellow-eyed woman said.

“Don’t trouble yourself. I’m fine,” Katara quickly spoke up when the woman turned to walk out of the room.

Yin-Min paused before she turned around to face the Fire Lady.

“What can I help you with, my lady?” she asked with a concerned frown.

Katara hesitated for a moment before she squared her shoulders.

“I need more of that blend you make,” she said firmly, “That one that helps with fertility.”

Yin-Min’s frown deepened as she fidgeted in her spot.

“You have taken the blend since your wedding night…” she muttered tentatively.

“Yes, but it hasn’t work yet,” Katara spoke up in frustration.

“Uh, perhaps…it would be best…if you stop drinking it…since it seems not to be working,” Yin-Min stammered nervously as she wrung her hands before her.

Katara stubbornly shook her head.

“I’ll continue to drink it until I finally conceive a child,” she said obstinately as her frown deepened.

“I’m sorry, my lady, but I believe it is for the best that you stop drinking it,” Yin-Min spoke up firmly though with a slight tremor in her voice, as if she feared incurring the Fire Lady’s wrath.

“Why?” Katara asked desperately.
“Perhaps your body is not compatible with the blend of herbs and that is why it hasn’t worked,” Yin-Min tried to explain.

Katara was silent as she thought over the possibility. She focused back on the shorter woman when she noticed her shift uneasily on her feet as she averted her eyes.

“What is it?” the waterbender asked.

“I apologize if I overstep any lines, but…” Yin-Min began hesitantly before she continued. “Have you ever thought that maybe…you can’t conceive children…that you are barren?” she asked sympathetically.

Tears began to sting Katara’s eyes at the woman’s words. She bit her lip as she tried to keep the sudden tears at bay, but they poured out and ran down her cheeks before she could stop them. She brought her face down to her hands and cried quietly, an occasional whimper escaping from her throat as her body racked with her silent sobs.

“That’s what I’ve been thinking for the past few months,” Katara breathed out through her tears.

Yin-Min approached the distressed Fire Lady and timidly placed a gentle hand on her shaking shoulder.

“Do not give up hope, my lady,” she said softly, “You must have faith and wait patiently. Maybe one of these days you will be blessed with what you desire.”

Katara fought to control her emotions and regain her composure. Crying would not solve anything. Taking deep breaths to calm herself, she pulled out a beautifully embroidered handkerchief Zuko had gifted her with and quickly wiped her eyes and cheeks as she thought over the woman’s words. Yin-Min was right. She could not give up hope now. She had to stay strong in order to endure the disapproving looks the advisors aimed her way whenever she was present in a meeting.

“Thank you, Yin-Min,” she said as she looked up to smile thinly at the woman, “I’ll try to keep your words in mind.”
Yin-Min smiled before she moved away when the Fire Lady stood up.

“I believe it is almost time for me to meet my husband for dinner,” Katara said with a genuine, large smile at the thought of seeing Zuko.

“I wish you a good rest of the day, my lady,” the short woman said.

With a nod and another farewell, Katara left the infirmary feeling a bit more optimistic if not completely satisfied. The thought of her firebender, however, once again made her heart flutter and she quickened her pace to their rooms so she could be in his comforting presence.

Katara’s hopes once again suffered a blow as another month went by and she still had not gotten pregnant. She had never abhorred the thought and sight of her monthly bleeding as much as she did now, for it was only a constant reminder of her failure. However, her distress and worry were much greater this time since she was no longer taking the blend of herbs Yin-Min created.

What if…she really was barren?

The thought once again brought a pang of pain to her chest as it did every time she thought about the possibility. What was she to do if it were true? What could she do?

Katara was so lost in her thoughts that she did not pay any attention to the exciting event that was taking place around her. She and Zuko were currently in the city sitting in grand chairs above an elegantly decorated dais as a group of traditional dancers performed their art before the royal couple. The common people surrounded the dancers at a distance and the sound of their excited and awed exclamations blended with the lively and loud music. The delicious scent of various foods floated in the warm breeze of the last few days of summer.

Katara created the event as a way for Zuko and her to be closer to the common people. Zuko had protested at first, but she had reasoned with him that if the people saw that he was making an effort to participate in their lives - however minimally it might be - instead of ruling them from the walls of the palace, they would come to appreciate him more. She had been planning this event for months, but sadly she could not muster the strength to enjoy it as much as she had hoped. She did not feel like celebrating with the problems she and Zuko were facing at the moment, though she did manage to smile at the people who greeted them.

Ever since the advisors’ announcement, Zuko had received countless requests from the noblemen for him to choose their female relatives as royal concubines capable of giving him an heir. Despite their insistence, Zuko vehemently refused them all, though that did not stop them. News had spread that the Fire Lady was unable to conceive. Many had begun to believe the myth that fire and water could not mix and lamented the tragic story of the Fire Lord and his barren waterbending wife.

Katara tried to ignore the derisive and haughty looks of the older noblewomen that continued to visit her for tea or lunch. She endured the barely veiled, harsh taunts from the younger women and their shameless wish that the Fire Lord would choose one of them to take to his bed and sire his children. Now it wasn’t just an heir but children! Katara had fought down her anger, possessiveness, and despair and forced herself to tolerate this cruel trial life had thrown her way because she did not want to cause Zuko more problems. She would have continued the same way if Ursa had not had enough of the women’s cruelty and went to her son to tell him everything.

Zuko had been outraged at the noblewomen’s treatment of his wife and upset that she had not gone to him with the problem but instead decided to bear everything alone. He had ordered her not to meet with them again or to listen to their vicious words. Katara had been too glad to heed his orders, but still it did nothing to stop her from feeling like a failure as a woman. It depressed her that she might never bear Zuko a child and that she might never know what it was like to be a mother. She lived with fear and despair at the thought that one day she might lose Zuko to another woman. To make matters worse Zuko had been coming to their rooms late at night when she had already fallen asleep after staying up waiting for him. Worse of all, he had not touched her intimately since a few days ago.

Did he not want her anymore?

Granted, she was not helping matters by avoiding him either.

The warm feeling of Zuko’s hand touching hers immediately brought Katara out of her dark thoughts. Blinking rapidly, the brunette glanced up to see her husband’s worried eyes. The sound of music and laughter again reached her ears and she berated herself for losing focus. She decided to forget her concerns for the moment so she did not worry Zuko.

“Is something the matter, love?” he asked quietly.

“It’s nothing,” she replied with a smile before she looked away to stare at the dancers. “Aren’t they amazing?” she asked in order to distract them both.

Zuko’s frown deepened at his wife’s evasive answer. He had been sitting silently at her side as he observed her face. He had watched as sadness, anger, and fear flickered in her blue eyes, the emotions occasionally slipping onto her facial features despite her efforts to hide them. He knew what was worrying her and the knowledge made rage and helplessness settle in his chest. He narrowed his eyes in anger. Damn the advisors and their stupid quest for him to sire an heir with a concubine.

A few days after that disastrous meeting, Advisor Chao had told him that Wei had brought up the issue to his fellow councilmen a few weeks after the royal couple’s first anniversary. Chao admitted that the men had been skeptical and reluctant to agree with Wei at first, but as the months passed without any sign of an heir, they became concerned. When Wei brought up the issue again, arguing more strongly and persuasively at the urgency of Zuko siring an heir soon, the advisors began to waver until they agreed that something had to be done to correct the problem. The most obvious solution in their minds was finding a royal concubine for their lord to bear the next heir.

Chao had then explained that he and Advisors Enlai and Jian had tried to argue against such a plan, saying that they could not claim Fire Lady Katara as barren with such certainty without first seeking the opinion of a physician. But Wei had again emphasized the importance of having their lord produce an heir as soon as possible and that they could not wait for treatments to be given to the Fire Lady. He then proposed that they immediately send announcements to the nobility that the Fire Lord was in need of a royal concubine. The other men had agreed at Wei’s impassioned speech and letters were immediately sent out.

Zuko’s temper had only flared at Chao’s account. His suspicions that Wei was the one to blame for this situation were correct. He wanted so badly to punish all his advisors, Wei especially, for causing his beloved sorrow, but he could not as he also understood their point of view. Continuing the family line was extremely important in Fire Nation culture, most especially the royal bloodline. But, even though he did understand their concerns, he would never betray Katara in such a way. He had hope that one day they would have a child and would prove the advisors wrong.

However, he had decided to summon the best physicians to check on Katara, just in case. It was strange that he hadn’t gotten Katara pregnant with the way they were constantly at each other, but he was sure there was a logical explanation for that. He did not think, not even for a second, that they weren’t capable of having children. He just wanted to alleviate Katara’s doubts and fears.

When Katara genuinely cheered and clapped at a particular move the dancers made, Zuko’s eyes softened a little as he watched his wife’s previous saddened expression change into a delighted one. She had worked hard to plan this event and she deserved to enjoy it. He would help her along by enjoying it himself as well.

Zuko brought his attention back to the dancers before he allowed his eyes to observe his surroundings. He was pleased to see that Katara’s hard work had paid off as he noticed the excited and happy expressions of the people as they enjoyed the various entertainment and food. Although most of the nobility still did not treat Katara with the respect she deserved, it pleased him to know that the general population adored her. He just had to be patient and believe that the nobility will one day see her worth.

The sun was just setting, casting an enchanting atmosphere upon the scene. Katara’s eyes roamed the buildings surrounding the town square as she took in the decorations in satisfaction before a movement on one of the rooftops directly before them caught her attention. She squinted to make out what it was and frowned when she saw a man stand up near the edge. She wondered what he was doing up there before she glanced around herself to see if anyone else had noticed. Nobody seemed to be paying attention to the man, their sole focus was admiring the dancers before them. Katara quickly returned her attention to the stranger and saw him raise a bow with one hand while he pulled out an arrow from the quiver at his back. Katara’s eyes widened in horror as she watched the archer aim the arrow at Zuko.

“Zuko!” she screamed in horror as she quickly uncorked her waterskin and pulled out a long stream of water.

Zuko’s head snapped up at the sound of his wife’s scream only to see an ice shield suddenly appear before him a second before an arrow embedded itself into it with a sharp crackling sound. He looked at the sharp tip inches from his face in shock before the gravity of the situation took hold. Alarm and anger rose within him as he sprang to his feet with blazing hands. Who dared try to kill him?

He ignored the gasping crowd and the confusion of his guards as he scanned the area.

“He’s up there!” Katara yelled, pointing at the rooftop, as the ice wall melted and returned to wrap around her arms.

Zuko glanced up to where she was indicating only for his eyes to widen when he saw the archer already firing his arrow at Katara.

“No!” he roared in both anger and fear.

He threw himself at her and wrapped his arms tightly around her as he brought them to the ground, protecting her with his body just as the arrow embedded itself on the back of the chair where Katara’s head had been a second before. Katara’s heart pounding hard in her chest as she lay stunned beneath her husband’s larger body. She had been so concerned with protecting Zuko, she had not thought she could be in danger as well.
Gasps and screams were heard as the people exclaimed their shock at the near assassination attempt to their Fire Lord and Lady. Shen, Kuo, and more guards quickly rushed forward and surrounded the royal couple still lying on the floor as the Fire Lord still had his wife protectively pinned beneath him as he warily looked around them. The people again gasped and shouted when they saw the would-be assassin jumping to another rooftop before he swiftly climbed down the building in order to escape.

“Catch the traitor!” Zuko fiercely snarled the order at his guards.

A few guards quickly sprang forward while the rest remain behind to continue protecting their lord and his wife in case there were more attempts against their lives. To the Fire Lord’s amazement he watched as people were already chasing after the man. Dismissing the thought for the moment, Zuko looked down at Katara and worriedly searched her face for any sign of pain.

“Are you all right?” he asked frantically as he brushed her hair out of her face and caressed her cheek.

Katara shakily nodded her head as she took comfort in his voice and touch as she too ran her hand over his face.

“I’m fine,” she responded when he frowned in concern. “Are you all right?”

Zuko nodded, but he continued staring down at her in worry.

Trying to reassure him, she gave him a small teasing smile.

“Are you going to keep lying on top of me?” she quipped as she squirmed beneath him. “Or are you trying to give the crowd a show? I thought I made it clear that I’m not an exhibitionist.”

Zuko frowned but relaxed at her teasing. It showed she was more than okay despite the fact that she was almost killed. He sat back, and hauling her to him, he crushed her tightly to his chest.

“Thank Agni!” he exclaimed against her head. He inhaled her sweet scent and reveled in the feeling of her warm body in his arms.
He glanced up to look at her chair. The sight of the arrow protruding from the place where Katara’s head had been made his blood run cold. If he had been one second slower in reacting, he could have lost her! He would be at his moment holding her bleeding and dead body, just like he had done in that forest in the Earth Kingdom a year ago. He would be mourning his loss and losing his mind to despair! The thought made him shudder and he squeezed his eyes shut as a painful ache appeared in his chest.

He did not realize Katara was going through the same emotions and fears as she wrapped her arms tightly around him. Oh La, she almost lost him! If she had not noticed the archer, she would be at this moment crying hysterically over Zuko’s dead body. She shuddered at the thought and pressed closer against him.

“My lord, my lady,” Shen’s worried voice interrupted them from their anguishing thoughts. “Are you both all right?”

“We’re fine,” Katara spoke up when it seemed Zuko was unable to. She squeezed him in comfort. She could just hear Zuko tormenting himself and she could not let that continue. “Can you please help me up, Zuko? We should reassure the people.”

At her words, Zuko finally detected the worried voices of the crowd that was blocked from view by their guards. He was holding Katara tightly to him and he was sure his face was expressing his fear and worry, but he found that he did not care for his display of emotion. When Katara again asked him to let her up, he reluctantly let her go even though all he wanted was to keep her in the protection of his arms. He helped her stand up, and once he made sure that she was indeed uninjured, he ordered his guards to step aside.

“Fire Lord Zuko! Fire Lady Katara!” the crowd exclaimed their relief with cheers.

They were interrupted as the sound of a struggle and loud curses reached their ears. The crowd step aside to let the guards and a group of citizens passed by as they dragged a cursing and struggling man toward the angry Fire Lord. Zuko narrowed his eyes and his nostrils flared at the sight of him. He instinctively tried to push Katara behind him, but she did not budge and instead frowned at him. Zuko threw her a frustrated frown before he turned back to glare at the would-be assassin who was being roughly shoved to his knees by the guards. His old bow and worn quiver of arrows were being held by one of the guards as evidence.

“How dare you try to kill your Fire Lady and me?!” Zuko growled wrathfully as sparks flew from his mouth.
The middle aged man, whose worn clothes showed he was from the lower class, spat at the ground. Zuko’s nostrils flared at the crude action as he eyed the man. He was glad to know the man wasn’t a Yu Yan archer, for both Katara and he would be dead by now.

“She ain’t my Fire Lady!” the man sneered and his black eyes showed his contempt. “Unlike ye, I ain’t no lover of those Wa’er Tribe barbarians.”

Zuko’s angry growl was drowned by the indignant shouts of the crowd. Katara was equally angry and saddened at the disdain in the man’s voice, though it did not surprise her since she had seen the same look in some of the noblewomen’s eyes when they thought she was not looking. The golden-eyed lord raised a hand to silence the people as he leveled a livid glare at the man.

“Why did you try to take her life?” he again angrily asked. “She has done nothing against you, instead she has done much to help the Fire Nation.”

“Da Fire Nation has ta remain pure!” the man retorted stubbornly as he lifted his chin challengingly. “I don’t wish ta see it dirtied by such a woman!”

His last words were swallowed by the crowds’ outraged shouts.

“Luckily,” the man continued with a sneer as he ignored the angry people surrounding him, “she can’t even ‘ave children.”

Zuko heard Katara’s gasp at the same time his hands blazed with fire as he glared murderously at the cruel man. His face contorted into a fierce snarl, Zuko opened his mouth to respond, but he was interrupted by the deafening roar of the indignant crowd.

“How dare you talk about Fire Lady Katara in such a way?!” a woman shouted as she threw the pastry she had been holding in her hand at the man’s face.

The man was knocked sideways at the unexpected impact before he scrambled to stand up in rage. He did not make it to his feet for the guards harshly pushed him back down to his knees. Another projectile flew from the crowd and it struck the would-be assassin on his shoulder. He turned to glare at the shouting people.

“She is a kind and generous lady!” a man shouted.
“Thanks ta ‘er we are livin’ better lives!” someone else exclaimed.

“Yah, we no longer ‘ave ta worry ‘bout not bringin’ food fer our children!” another woman spoke up as she bent down to fling mud at him.

Katara’s eyes widened and her heart warmed in gratitude as she heard and watched the people defend her. Standing at her side, Zuko was both surprised and pleased at the way his people stood up for his wife so fiercely. He did not make a move to stop them when more people began to throw things at the man that was still kneeling at the ground before him. When someone threw a small rock at the man, striking his temple hard enough that it began to bleed, Zuko quickly restrained Katara when she instinctively moved forward to stop them. Zuko frowned at her before he sighed and grudgingly raised a hand to stop the angry crowd from harming the man further.

He did not even get angry when they did not immediately heed his command as they continued their assault for a few more minutes before they reluctantly stopped. The man was covered in various kinds of food, mud, and dirt and Zuko found a dark satisfaction at his state. Zuko returned his attention to his waterbender when she took a step forward as she looked down at the glaring man.

“I understand it must be difficult accepting a Water Tribe woman as your Fire Lady,” Katara began with a small frown, “But I am trying my best to help both the Fire Nation, my new home, and the Water Tribes, my homeland.”

“Ha! Ye ain’t no help to ta Fire Nation. Yer just trouble. Ye can’t even ‘ave children!” the middle aged man scoffed as he sneered at the blue-eyed woman.

“Silence!” Zuko roared as he took a menacing step forward with a raised, flaming fist.

The man turned to Zuko with another sneer on his thin lips as he again ignored the crowd’s shouts.

“And ye! Yer not worthy ta be Fire Lord!” he shouted, “Ye want ta dirty the great Fire Nation with this woman’s lowly blood! Ye deserve ta die!”

Swiftly, the man reached inside his boot and pulled out a dagger. The crowd gasped as he raised it, aiming at the Fire Lord. Before anybody could react, the man gasped in pain as his arm quivered in the air. The man looked up at his arm with wide, incredulous eyes as he again tried to move it.
“What’s goin’ on?!?” he shouted in fear.

They watched in amazement as his fingers twitched before the dagger fell from his grasp and dropped to the ground. Then his arm was painfully twisted behind his back in a grotesque, sharp angle. He howled in pain. The crowd erupted into confused and fearful murmurs.

Understanding immediately what was going on, Zuko turned to look at Katara. She had a raised hand and her wrist was twisted a little as her fingers trembled with her efforts. Her sapphire eyes were blazing with her anger and there was a fierce expression on her usually kind face. Again, he felt pride swell within him at his wife’s defense of him. She was as fiercely protective of him as he was of her. Everybody looked away from the groaning man and turned to look at their lady when she spoke.

“I will not forgive you for daring to harm my husband,” she told the man in an icy yet calm tone that sent shivers down the backs of all who heard her.

She curled her wrist a little more and the man cried out loudly in pain when his arm was twisted higher.

“He has been an honorable lord, more so than the past tyrants you’ve called Fire Lord,” she continued in that deceptively calm tone that caused fear to spread in the man’s chest more than if she had been screaming at him.

“P-please...m-mercy!” the man moaned in both pain and terror.

He cried out and clawed at the ground with his other hand, when his arm was raised higher, fearing it would be ripped from his body. Katara kept her hold of him, her rage clouding her mind at the thought that this man had almost killed her husband, that he had almost taken Zuko away from her. The soft touch of the Fire Lord’s hand on her shoulder brought her out of her murderous thoughts and she blinked. Zuko squeezed her shoulder, understanding her thoughts. Katara frowned and let out a sigh before she slowly let go of her hold on the man’s blood. She calmly placed her hand back to her side and the man fell to the ground, panting and moaning in lingering pain as he curled his arm against his chest.

“Take him to the prison tower to await his trial for treason,” Zuko ordered his guards in a cool tone.
The man’s eyes widened and the crowd murmured their approval. They all knew that the sentence for treason was a painful death and they thought it fitting for his attempt against the lives of their lord and lady. Two guards stepped forward to grasp the man’s arms so they could roughly haul him to his feet, but he quickly evaded their hands and lunged himself at the ground where his dagger had fallen.

Before anyone could guess his intent, he grasped the knife and placed the sharp tip to his throat. Zuko shouted for his guards to stop him, but they were not fast enough as the man slit his throat with the sharp dagger. Blood immediately spurted out from the deep cut and gushed down his chest. The crowd gasped in horror. The light in his dark eyes vanished before the man dropped to the ground. Dark blood quickly began to spread beneath him.

“Damn it,” Zuko growled under his breath.

The man must have quickly ended his life so he would not have to suffer a slow and painful death after his trial for treason was over. Zuko ignored the crowd as they continued to exclaim their shock. He turned to Katara to see her shake her head at the man’s actions before she lifted her head to look at him.

“I would like to go home,” she said softly.

“Of course,” he quickly acquiesced. He wanted to bring them home as soon as possible, though it upset him that all of Katara’s hard work had to be ruined because of one man’s prejudice.

Zuko turned back to his guards, who were attentively waiting his commands, and ordered them to remove the body. His guards bowed and quickly did his bidding. The Fire Lord then turned to the crowd who were now staring at the royal couple.

“It is a pity to see such a wonderful event end so quickly,” Zuko began in his usual cool tone, “but I wish to return to the palace with my wife.”

To their surprise, the people immediately expressed their understanding and promised that they would continue to enjoy the event their lady had created for them despite what happened. Katara could not stop the large, happy smile that spread on her lips at their sincere words.

“Thank you,” she told them sincerely, “For everything.”
She felt Zuko touch her back to guide her away from the dais, but her attention was caught when an old woman step forward.

“Don’t lose hope, my lady,” the woman spoke up in a confident tone, “I believe that soon you will give Fire Lord Zuko and the Fire Nation a strong, healthy heir.”

Katara again found herself smiling gratefully as she thanked the woman before she was ushered to the royal carriage by her husband. The short ride to the palace was silent and Katara frowned when she caught sight of her firebender’s cold, impassive features. She slowly reached for his hand and waited to see if he would reject her touch. She was a little unsure because he had not touched her in a while. She had been unsure of a lot of things lately. When he immediately grasped her hand, holding it tightly, she let out a small, relieved breath. She would wait until they were in their room to ask him what was wrong.

A few minutes later, the carriage stopped at the palace courtyard. Katara softly thanked Zuko when he helped her down. He placed her hand on the crook of his elbow before he led her toward the long flight of stairs that led into the palace. Kuo and Shen followed at a respectful distance. They were silent as they walked down the golden corridors before they finally arrived at the huge doors that led to their chambers. Zuko dismissed his guards with a curt word and they quickly left after they bowed at the couple. Zuko opened the door for Katara to go through first before he closed the door behind him. They crossed the antechamber before Zuko opened the second set of doors to let his waterbender in.

Katara walked into the room and made to remove her formal dress as she heard Zuko close the door behind him, but before she could complete the task, she felt her husband gently grasp her arm. He turned her around so she could face him before she found herself crushed tightly to his hard chest. He had removed his armor without her notice and she sighed as she wrapped her arms around him and melted against his warmth.

“Oh, Katara, Katara,” she heard him murmur huskily as he nuzzled against her hair, “I felt as if my heart stopped at the thought of that arrow hitting you. I would’ve gone mad with grief if I had lost you.”

Katara embraced him tightly.

“The same thing would’ve happened to me if I had lost you,” she told him gently.

“But what if this time I wasn’t able to save you?” he whispered agitatedly against her soft hair.
“But you did,” she reminded him as she ran her hands along his strong back, “I’m fine, so don’t worry.”

Zuko pulled back to give her a small smile as he caressed her soft cheek.

“And I’m fine because of you,” he said softly before he added, “Thank you for coming to my rescue.”

Katara smiled at his words.

“Always,” she replied as she snuggled against him and sighed when he tightened his hold of her.

Even though she said she was all right, truthfully she was still shaken with the knowledge that she had narrowly escaped death once again. She really hoped she did not have to go through a similar experience for it truly was frightening, though not as terrifying at the thought that she could have lost Zuko that day. Still, she knew it must be harder for Zuko since he had already held her dying body, and she did not want him to worry and suffer because of it.

Her thoughts again shifted to what that man had said and she bit her lip in distress. She was sure there were many other people who thought the same way he did. As if he could read her mind, Zuko leaned back to stare intensely into her eyes.

“Don’t let what that idiot said get to you, love,” he told her softly, “You saw how well loved you are by the people and the faith they have on you, though they don’t love you as much as I do or believe in you as much as I do.”

Katara smiled at his words before she reached up to place a soft kiss to his lips. Zuko bent down to capture her lips in a slow and gentle kiss as he tangled his fingers in her long, wavy hair before he again brought her close to his chest. Not a minute passed before he was divesting her of her clothes until she stood completely naked before him. He quickly stripped himself before he wrapped her in his arms, savoring the soft and warm feeling of her skin against his, as he swiftly brought them down upon their large bed. After a near death experience, his lovemaking was fierce, rough, and passionate, as if to affirm that she was there and his. Katara reciprocated in kind to his frantic lovemaking, overjoyed at the thought that he was making love to her again. She did not think to question why he had avoided her before as she held him tightly to her, pressing him deeper into her body as if she wished to fuse their bodies, their very souls, together.
All through the night, Zuko held her protectively to him as they slept and Katara was content. But no matter how much she wished to dismiss the thought, she could not help but wonder if more problems were headed their way.

Could this be a sign of more trouble to come?
Agonizing Uncertainties

In an unknown part of an Earth Kingdom forest, stood a small and insignificant mountain, mostly covered by huge trees and thick undergrowth. It was because of this heavy thicket that many travelers avoided that area, and for this same reason, a small gap in the mountainside went unnoticed. The small hole in the hill led into a long, dark tunnel. This tunnel led into a small cave made up of multiple tunnels that branched out into different dens of various sizes. In a few of the stone chambers, ragged tents were clustered together. The multiple lamps spread throughout the rooms revealed clothes, bedrolls, cooking items, crates, and other camping gear.

The sound of shouts and clashing of weapons echoed through the tunnels, emanating from another bigger cave where more lamps and torches surrounded the place to ward off the darkness and the permeating chill of the mountain.

Standing to the side with an unreadable expression, Jianguo silently watched as his men trained with their weapons. On other days he had the benders go outside to train with their elements.

Chang stood silent and still beside him, his hands hidden behind his long sleeves, his expression blank, his green eyes assessing his fellow Dai Li agents giving pointers to the other earthbenders. A moment later, his mind wandered, as was wont to do nowadays. He was once again thinking of the Fire Nation maid, Jiao, as he had been doing ever since she slipped from his grasp that day in Omashu. He wished he could see her again, touch her. Married or not, it did not matter to him. He wanted her. Besides, many women became widows during turbulent times. And he would help her obtain that status as long as he had her with him in the end.

Jianguo frowned as he continued to watch the training session and mentally cursed. They really were a pathetic bunch of fighters—as Zuko kept arrogantly pointing out. Many of them were former noblemen and commoners that had been banished from the Fire Nation when they had revolted against Zuko when he ascended the throne. Others were thieves and peasants from the Earth Kingdom that had joined him at the prospect of riches. They had never been trained as warriors before they joined him, so they lacked the skill to fight properly against an army of Fire Nation soldiers.

But Jianguo could not complain since they were willing to follow him in his quest for revenge and glory. Luckily, not all of them were hopeless, there were a few of his fellow military soldiers that rebelled alongside him against Zuko years ago. Then there were the Dai Li who had greatly helped in his plans, though none have worked so far. Jianguo narrowed his eyes in anger. He had to think of a new plan, a plan that wouldn’t fail this time. He was tired of waiting for what was due to him, but most of all, he wanted to bring Zuko down and take the waterbender for himself. Luckily, he had finally figured out what had happened to his informant in the capital after the Fire Lady told them—taunted them, to be more precise—so now they could move forward.
The firebender slanted his eyes to the side when he felt someone approach him with loud booted feet. He did not need to look directly at the man to know who it was. Hands clasped behind his back, Jianguo remained silent until Ping squirmed as he waited for his leader to acknowledge him. Chang did not glance toward the large earthbender, which only caused Ping to sneer at him.

“Well?” Jianguo finally asked in a cool tone. “What news did the men gather at the village?”

