What's in a Name?

by Garrae

Summary

Forgiveness isn't something you are only granted by others. Forgiveness is something that you also have to grant to yourself. An AU starting about six months earlier than canon did, and in part a Christmas story. Please see warning in A/N.

Notes

This is a warning before reading. This story is based around the consequences of dealing with an alcoholic parent, both then and once they are dry. As usual, it is not soft and fluffy. If the subject may upset you, please back away now.
“Kate. Hmmm. Kate.”

“Shut up, Castle.” It’s a bad day. It’s the middle of November and it’s pouring – well, sleet, which is worse, and it’s far too early to be this cold – and there’s nothing but paperwork on her desk and she has nothing interesting to do today at all. And it’s her birthday, and she has no plans.

“Kate,” he muses. What the hell this time? Surely Montgomery never meant her to have to put up with this jackass when there isn’t even a corpse? One case – one lousy case – that this smartass turned up on, and suddenly he claims inspiration – yeah, right – and talks Montgomery into letting him hang around and disrupt them. He’s been here ever since. She’d never had Montgomery down as a fan of murder mysteries. And she’d know. Oh yes. She’s read everything from Margery Allingham and Agatha Christie to Patterson and Baldacci. And Richard Castle. Though she doesn’t admit to that last. He might deduce it, but she doesn’t have to add to his smugness. Thinks he’s God’s gift to the reading public, as well as to women. Not to Gillette, though. Does he really think that stubbled look is sexy? Not in her house. Maybe Espo can teach him to handle a razor. (But it would feel so good against you, a little voice whispers.)

“Shut up. Some of us are working.” Her irritation boils over. “Why are you here anyway? There’s no body. Nothing for you to consult on.”

“You’re so cute when you’re irritated,” Castle oozes, smirking. Beckett emits a formlessly enraged growl and considers very seriously the advantages of re-arranging his teeth with the stapler. If nothing else, it would take him out the way while a dentist put his flashing, oh-so-practised, smile back together. And he wouldn’t be able to talk, which would be a very, very nice change.

“Why are you here?” she snaps.

“I need a name.”

“You’ve got a name. You splash your name around like beer at a frat party. But if you don’t like being known as Rick Castle we can find plenty names for you.” She smiles with no humour at all. “Starting with smartass.” Castle winces.

“Beckett, Beckett. If you’re going to find a nickname for me at least make it realistic.” His stubbly smirk widens. “Sex god will do.” He wiggles his eyebrows lasciviously. “I could show you, Beckett.”

“I told you. I need a name.” Just before she brains him with the stapler he carries on. “For my character.”

“And this has what to do with being here?”

“You’re my inspiration. My muse.” His eyes crinkle delightfully – no! She is not getting sucked into that discussion by a pair of big blue eyes. “So when I got bored I decided to come by and get some.” Her mouth opens. “Inspiration, of course. I couldn’t think of a name for my character. What else could I possibly mean?” His eyebrows wiggle some more. She glares even more fearsomely. It’s stopping her staring at his mouth.
“Kate,” he says for yet another time. Yes, that’s her name. But no-one in the precinct would want or dare to use it and she’s not breaking that rule for a sometime consultant who’s already offered to debrief her. “Short for Katherine, I presume?” She nods once, sharply. She doesn’t see where this is going yet, but she’s perfectly certain she won’t like it. Unfortunately she doesn’t see how to stop it, either. Well, apart from stopping his mouth. With a stapler. Emphatically not otherwise. Especially emphatically not with her own mouth.

“Katherine.” His voice lingers over it, as if he’s tasting it on his tongue, swirling it round his mouth like a fine wine. “Kath-er-ine. It means pure.”

“Don’t start” – Too late. Dammit!

“Especially at nearly forty,” Beckett snips. An instant later it’s clear that saying that was a mistake.

“You know my age? That’s so sweet. I knew you liked me better than you were letting on.” She splutters angrily. “Kath-er-ine.” This time it sounds as if he’s licking his lips on the th. Her eyes drop to his lips to make sure he isn’t. Said lips quirk up attractively – no. Not going there. And he can just stop saying her name like that, too. Stop his tongue slithering, slipping and sliding over it. She absolutely will not be seduced into liking him because of the way he says her name.

“That won’t do.” What? What’s wrong with her name? She bristles. “Too formal. She’s a cop. Feisty. Streetwise. Carries a gun. Katherine sounds like a saint, or a queen. It doesn’t fit the character.” She bristles further. “I need a short form.” Suddenly Beckett sees where this is going. Oh God. He’s going to start on nicknames and pretend it’s about the character. Because he cannot possibly call his character her name. Oh no. And if she stands up he’ll either follow her or shout. Oh God. She is dead. Deader than her last corpse, and if the boys hear him she’ll wish she were.

“There’s Kate, of course.” He catches her glare and leaves that one. “Or Katie. But that’s a bit… childish for a competent professional adult.” He looks carefully at her. There’s – something – there. A flash of embarrassment, but under it there’s something else. Hmm. Clearly her parents call her Katie, and no doubt still some hugely childish pet name too, just like he calls Alexis Pumpkin or baby bird. Let’s push a little, because she’s very nearly blushing and it’s cute. And unbearably sexy, and he’s wondered what she might feel like in his arms from the moment she arrested him. A plan to take her out for a drink (if he’s really lucky, dinner too) drops wholesale into his head.

She’s not blushing at all. Just because her dad still calls her Katie is no reason to blush. It could be worse. One of her friends was known as Tick all the way through high school because her mother was overhearing referring to her as Tickety-boo. Really, what was that all about?

“Though I can see my main male character calling her Katie. Kate-eee, in fact.” He grins wickedly. “Depending, of course, on what he – or she – is doing at the time.” The expression on his face makes it perfectly clear what he’s thinking that his characters might be doing. At least, she hopes he’s thinking about the characters. The way he’s suddenly looking her over – eyeing you up, Kate – leaves her in some doubt about that. That look shouldn’t be causing warmth to pool in her stomach.

She focuses fixedly on her screen, pretending to concentrate on the paperwork. Her eyes drop to the time in its corner. It’s – oh thank God for that. It’s quitting time. She starts to pack up. She’ll go home and investigate a nice takeout. Seeing as it’s her birthday and all.

“You’re not leaving, are you? We’re having such a nice discussion.”
“This is not a discussion. It’s a monologue.” He pouts. Which she does not find at all attractive. He’s not five. And she is absolutely not looking at those full lips.

“If you would contribute, then it would be a dialogue. It’s only a monologue because you won’t talk to me. That’s very unkind, Beckett.” He widens his eyes and manages to look pathetically puppyish. It’s quite ridiculously adorably attractive. She won’t be attracted. Nor will she adore it. She will not. Just as well he’s stopped it. Now he’s smiling again. Unfortunately he’s smiling in a way that indicates that he’s had an idea. He clearly thinks it’s a good idea. On principle, that means it’s a bad idea. In fact, his smile is one she’s seen on innumerable suspects who have tried to soft-soap her into releasing them. He thinks he’s got a winning suggestion. Well, that’s not likely. She hasn’t been soft-soaped in years, and she’s not letting it start again now. And she will certainly not think about any of the more physical ways that he could use soft soap on her. Not out of her shower, or, preferably, bath, anyway.

“Come on.” What? “We need to finish this discussion.” What on earth – “Unless you’d prefer to continue it tomorrow.” Yes. Tomorrow. When with any luck a body will drop and this discussion can be permanently parked. In Nevada. Preferably with Castle also in Nevada. Deep in the desert. The extremely dry desert. This is not a discussion she wants to have. She’s just about to nod enthusiastically when he carries on.

“Ryan and Esposito could contribute too. I’m sure they’ll have lots of ideas.” She can’t keep the look of absolute horror off her face. She has the same sinking feeling of Titanic-proportion disaster approaching that she acquired the moment Montgomery told her that she’d got a fan. “Or.” Or? There’s an alternative? That’s got to be better than years of ragging from the boys. “Or you could let me buy you a drink and we can have a nice chat.”

This is not attractive either. Devil, meet deep blue sea. Rock, similarly, meet hard place. It occurs to her that Rick pestilent playboy Castle has a brain. In fact, he’s far too clever for his own good. He’s sandbagged her. No-one’s done that in years. She winces, rather too obviously.

“If you don’t want to be seen in public with me we can always go to your place.”

“No!” She doesn’t have to think about that answer. Absolutely not. She is not having him cluttering up her apartment and poking into her possessions. (or poking into you, says her unhelpful little voice. It takes some effort not to blush.)

“Okay then,” Castle says amiably. “There’s a quiet bar not too far away.” Quiet? Castle? Quiet? Well, at least it means she isn’t likely to figure on page six tomorrow.

The bar is very quiet. Deserted, in fact. This is almost as bad as going to her apartment. In fact it’s worse, because at least in her apartment she’s paid the electricity bill and can guarantee that there is light. This bar seems to have forgotten that. She did not sign up for low lighting and cramped booths. She moves as far away from Castle as she can manage without actually falling off the seat. He notices. Amazingly, he doesn’t comment. Still, the crinkling round his eyes is very informative. Infuriatingly so.

“What would you like to drink, Beckett?” She considers briefly. Sharing wine is far too friendly. Beer – that’s a cop thing, and to tell the truth she isn’t that fond of beer. She’s never liked gin. Scotch – nah. This dive won’t have the single malt that she very occasionally likes to drink. Tequila – no. Far too college party. Slammers are for co-eds.

“Vodka tonic, please.” Anaesthetic. Amnesia. Of both of which she thinks she will be in considerable need, as if she isn’t already. Castle flicks a curious glance at her but declines to comment, possibly recognising her irritation at being finagled into something that she’s been avoiding since the day she met him. To wit, anything that might look in any way like a social meeting. She avoids thinking the word date too. It’s a very unhelpful word. All sorts of misplaced connotations.

A substantial volume of vodka disappears in one rapid movement. Castle notices that, too, and doesn’t comment. But he goes to the bar to replace it and brings another one back. And another one for him, though he’s only taken a couple of sips. Looks like he’s drinking Scotch. She supposes it’s his own liver he’ll ruin. But she’d better dial this back.

“So, Beckett. Kath-er-ine.” He’s licking over her name again. “Not Katie. That’s what your parents call you.” She says absolutely nothing. Not because she’s shocked by the accuracy of his guess. No. That’s an easy hit. No. It’s his casual, thoughtless assumption that she still has two parents. She buries her nose in her glass and sinks a third of what’s left in one go. This time Castle raises an eyebrow slightly.

“You okay, Beckett?” He puts an arm round her shoulder. That was a rather unexpected reaction. This isn’t embarrassment. This is pain. It’s very like her reaction when he told her his version of her own story. He wants to make it better, and he’s generally found that people in pain like comforting hugs. Unfortunately, in this as in so many things, Beckett doesn’t behave like most people. Back to banter and salaciousness. But he files this snippet of Beckett with the earlier one; for later assembly into a jigsaw puzzle, instead of a pile of disjointed pieces.

“Get off me.” She shrugs violently and the unhelpfully warm and comforting arm leaves. She doesn’t need comfort from Castle. He doesn’t need to know her story.

“That would have been a much more pleasant phrase if you’d rearranged the words just a little bit.” And thankfully the spoilt playboy is back. She can deal with that. It’s his occasional flashes of sincerity she can’t take.

“No.” That was rather blunter than she should have been. If she’d only found some smart, sarcastic remark it would have been more convincing.

“You sure you’re okay?” Back to sincerity. Damn.

“I’m fine.” He looks sceptical. She is not having this discussion. Not now. Not ever. Fortunately, he finally picks up the subtext and backs off that line of conversation. Unfortunately, he’s back to nicknames.

“Kathy. No. Too suburban. She’d be a teacher, with two kids and a white picket fence” –

“Cliché much?” Beckett snips. It would have been a snap but the vodka is softening her edges. Unfortunately, it’s also loosening her protection against inadvertent painful comments. It’s not – for once – entirely Castle’s fault. She hasn’t told him anything.

“ – and a dog. A spaniel. Though secretly she wants a Malamute.” Beckett chokes on an entirely inadvertent giggle. “She’s married to another teacher.” He digresses. “You ever noticed that, Beckett? How teachers are always married to teachers? Lawyers to lawyers?” He’s still talking. She’s stopped listening. She’s not usually this raw, but twice in two minutes he’s hit the sore spot she normally shields. Another slug of her glassful disappears. Anaesthetic and amnesia are definitely needed. Armour would help, too.

“Sorry. Missed that.”
“Who do cops date? Other cops? Feds? Spies?” His eyes are dancing. “Mystery writers?” She doesn’t consciously register that last suggestion, caught for the third time on the first few words. She’s standing before she’s even worked out that her legs are moving.

“Excuse me. I have to go.” She’s far more than halfway to the door, the second drink untouched on the table, before he’s realised she’s not visiting the restroom, she’s leaving. She needs to get out, now. Three strikes and she’s out. She is not going to break down under the influence of too-fast vodka and sincerity in a dark quiet bar. The alcohol hit her brain almost instantly, and getting home before she does something stupid (like telling Castle the truth, or losing her temper with him because he doesn’t know the story and just hit all her sore spots, or simply kissing him) would be a good plan. Downing the drink that fast, on the other hand, was not a good plan. She’s a long way out of practice – she doesn’t practice, for good reason – and she should have known it before she knocked it back like that. Just as well she hadn’t had the second one. On this evidence, she’d have had to have been carried home.

Castle had watched Beckett knock back her first vodka like there would be no tomorrow and noted the timing very carefully. First when they got here – and yes, he’d inveigled her here against her wishes but he very badly wants to find out what’s behind that odd reaction and he’s not going to manage that in the bullpen – then when he’d said her parents called her Katie, and finally when he’d been talking about lawyers marrying lawyers. And then he’d asked her who cops date and she hadn’t, actually, been a joke at all. And now she’s left, not, he thinks, coincidentally; hard upon that comment. It had taken him a minute to comprehend that she had gone straight for the exit. He leaves enough on the table to cover their drinks and a tip besides and goes after her at some speed.

When Beckett hits the street it’s starting to sleet again and no taxis are in view: an unsuspected disadvantage of dingy bars in dingy streets. She aims for the brighter lights of the nearest main road, knowing that as soon as she reaches it there will be as many taxis as there are cockroaches round a Dumpster. The biting wind sobers her up a great deal faster than she’d have liked. She could have used a lot longer under anaesthetic.

It’s her birthday. It’s her birthday, she’s twenty-nine years old, and she has as much life as the corpses she stands for. She didn’t mention the occasion in the precinct, because it’s not relevant. She’d have made arrangements with Lanie, if Lanie weren’t on the late shift tonight and she weren’t on shift tomorrow. Maybe they’ll go out Saturday. No boyfriend, no lover, no husband. Not up for a one-night stand, any more. Last serious relationship was with a Fed – total failure. Crush on her training officer before that – didn’t even make it to a point where success or failure might have been an option. She hasn’t met a likely prospect in months. Even when she had they’d not been… compatible. Compatible with her work schedule, that is. She hadn’t even got far enough to find out about other forms of compatible. (Castle’s compatible with your work schedule, says the annoying little voice. She considers lobotomy, to remove it, and her memories.)

The vodka’s made her maudlin, she realises. Self-pitying, and over-sensitive. She’s doing just fine without a boyfriend. Top Detective, here. Top team. Best in the NYPD. Best friend, in Lanie. Nothing to be maudlin about. She puts some swing into her steps and tries to rearrange her thoughts. Her mother may be dead but she’s still got a father. A lawyer who married a lawyer, and who calls her Katie. She hunches her shoulders against the sleet, and blinks, mouth twisted. It’s her twenty-ninth birthday, and instead of sharing cake and candles and wine and laughter she’s walking alone through the bleak November evening, looking for a cab to take her home to her solitary apartment.

She nearly makes it. With twenty yards to go, there’s a hand on her shoulder.
“What’s wrong?”

“My curfew,” Beckett says flippantly. The alternative is whimpering miserably. “I turn into a pumpkin at nine.”

“Thought that was midnight, Cinderella?” She winces.

“Only for Vice cops. The rest of us gotta to go to bed early.” She’s covering as best she can, but Castle hasn’t spent the last several weeks watching every move and flicker of expression that she makes without learning most of her tells. Right now, she’s lying through her teeth. Now he really wants some answers. No-one should react like that to normal conversational topics.

“Liar,” Castle says neutrally. It’s so unlike his normal irritatingly smooth, flirtatious tones that she stops walking and looks up. He leaves it hanging, and rapidly returns to annoyingly normal.

“We didn’t finish our conversation, Beckett. So I’ll just have to walk you home.” She splutters, forgetting her momentary misery.

“No way!”

“Yes way,” Castle pronounces smugly. “You’ve been drinking. It’s my duty to escort you home.” He pauses, portentously. “It’s your duty to help me think of my character’s name.”

“I don’t want to. You’re the writer, write. Use your over-active imagination.”

“I need inspiration.” He smiles sweetly, and falsely. “You’re my inspiration,” he sings, in a well-pitched baritone. A passer-by looks round, shakes his head in disgust, and puts his earphones in more firmly.

“At least get the lyrics right. After that, you can try to hit the notes.”

“I’m hurt, Beckett. Everyone says I’ve got a good voice.”

“Clearly they don’t have to listen to it,” Beckett mutters darkly.

“You could sing too. Then we’d be in perfect harmony. Wouldn’t that be nice?” He hums a few bars of I’d Like to Teach the World to Sing. In tune.

Beckett growls. It’s neither harmonious nor nice. Singing is strictly confined to her shower, and very rare karaoke nights with Lanie in out-of-the-way bars that no-one will find her in. Though when she does sing, she’s got a really great mezzo. Still, she is not going to be duetting with Castle. Totally inappropriate. She discovers with considerable irritation that she’s humming Up Where We Belong.

She discovers with rather less irritation – or at least a very different sort of irritation – that somehow Castle’s incessant, flirtatious triviality has dissipated some of her upset. Is it possible that this hyperactive man-toddler might actually have a good point? Just one, in the whole compass-round of ways he irritates her? She wriggles her shoulders in swift negation. Unfortunately, not only does that fail to dissipate the errant thought, but it’s clearly given Castle the wrong idea.

“You’re cold, Beckett.” She doesn’t need his faked concern. She really, really doesn’t need his arm around her shoulders. “I’ll heat you up.” She growls. “I mean I’ll keep you warm. Lots of people have said I’m hot.” She’s sure they have. She will not be one of them. Even if it’s true. “Though if you want I could heat you up too.” The growl she emits this time would terrify tyrannosaurs.
“Okay, too soon?” She doesn’t dignify that with an answer.

Not dignifying his suggestive comments with an answer does not, it appears, mean that he takes the hint and removes his arm. They’ve had this conversation already, in the bar. Time for more direct measures. “Castle, take your arm away.” This time she’s careful of her phrasing. He does. Well, that’s an improvement. He never usually does anything she asks him to. Like stay out the way.

“But you’ll get cold, Beckett. Then you’ll catch a cold and then you’ll give me it. My rugged good looks will be ruined if my nose is running and I sneeze all the time.”

“There’s a solution, Castle.”

“There is? You’ve found a cure for the common cold? You’ll be famous! Then I can date you for your high profile.”

“What?” Suddenly something she’d missed – or ignored – earlier knocks at her mind. He is definitely trying to wind her up. “I’m not dating you. That’s ridiculous.” He droops pathetically at her. She ignores him and signals a passing taxi. Castle slides in with her.

He knows he’s really pushing his luck now. There is every chance that he will be maimed or shot in the very near future. But his mind has started to work in a rather different direction from its normal concentration on getting Beckett out on a date, and if teasing her with nicknames and short forms of Katherine will extract some information – which it already has, if only he can put it together – then he’s going to carry on until he’s explicitly told to go home. First off, however, she’s upset and she’s thrown back a reasonable quantity of alcohol far too fast, although she’s looking surprisingly sober, so he is going to make sure she gets home in one piece. Even if she carries a gun. He’s not going to make it obvious that he’s indulging his mile-wide chivalrous streak, though. That wouldn’t do at all.
He’ll stick to innuendo and annoying-ness. Even if it’s mutating faster than a flu virus in February into something very different from mere sexual attraction.

“Why are you in my taxi?” Beckett asks petulantly.

“I said I’d escort you home.” He sounds as if she should have known that.

“I don’t need an escort. I have my gun.”

“You don’t get off that easy.”

“Why, Mr Castle, are you making me an indecent proposition?” That is surely the last remnants of the vodka talking. It’s certainly not she.

“Would you like one?” His voice has dropped. Now it’s prowling round the cab. He’s remarkably close, despite the fact that she’s firmly tucked into her corner and he’s rammed up against the edge of his. It only proves that he’s disgracefully oversized. Which is not at all attractive. Really. (Your previous boyfriend was tall and broad, the voice reminds her. Lobotomy. Tomorrow. Lanie will arrange it.)

“No.”

“Too bad. If you change your mind, let me know.” She can hear the wicked smile without needing to look. His voice hasn’t lost a jot of the predatory undertone. She ignores its effects on her hindbrain. She is a modern, civilised adult, six thousand years and more removed from the cavemen, and she is in control of her baser instincts. Remnants of vodka or not. She slides even further into the corner of the cab, and stares out at the now-driving sleet until they reach her building.

She pulls out a bill and is firmly forestalled. Castle is not only sneakily and unnecessarily paying for the cab but he’s also sneakily and irritatingly on the sidewalk side. She can’t get out the cab on her side without the door being taken off by some other passing traffic, or being squashed. It’s perfectly clear that he’s intending to see her right to her door. Well, if he wants to prove that he’s polite he can. It’s entirely unnecessary, because she didn’t doubt his manners. Irritating and suggestive he may be, but not rude.

When she gets to her door her own manners take over her brain before her intelligence finds its way out of the final drops of no-longer anaesthetizing vodka. “Would you like to come in for a minute?” exits her mouth without her permission. Castle looks depressingly enthusiastic.

“I knew you liked me,” he oozes. He bounds in, somewhat in the manner of an over-indulged Labrador, and comes to a halt in the middle of the room. For a few seconds he’s blessedly silent. When he opens his mouth again Beckett wishes she hadn’t let good manners overcome good sense.

“That’s a birthday card.” No shit, Sherlock. He picks it up, and reads it. “To Katie, from Dad.” He’s clearly about to make a flip comment when he abruptly seems to perceive that she isn’t in the mood for any of his thoughts on the salutation.

“When was your birthday?” She doesn’t answer, pretending not to have heard. “It’s today, isn’t it?” More silence. Letting Castle know that she didn’t even have plans on her birthday wasn’t in the playbook.

“You should have said earlier. I’d have got you a cupcake with a candle.” He’s appalled. It’s her birthday, she’s got precisely one birthday card, and she hasn’t made a single change to her normal working day except that he finagled her out to a bar, somehow upset her and has now followed her back to her apartment where she’s pretending that it doesn’t matter that she’s not celebrating. Birthdays do matter, and celebrating with friends matters more. She’s been cheated of a proper birthday.

Well, he’s sure of one thing now, and that is that she is quite definitely single. He’d been pretty positive anyway, from her reactions to him, but now he is certain. No harm in trying to alter that. He’s been hoping for this sort of chance for some time.

“That’s precisely why I didn’t say.”

Castle looks humorously shocked.

“Birthdays are for celebrating. Surely you know that? How old are you?” Beckett raises her eyebrows. “Oh, okay.” She waits for the next shoe to splash down. “Why aren’t you out on the town?”

“Work tomorrow.” She concocts an almost-truthful statement. “Can’t be out late when you’re on early shift.” While he’s been asking questions, Castle’s slowly meandered across the room to where Beckett, now, as always in her apartment, barefoot, is desultorily looking for her takeout menus and considering the virtues of strong coffee to provide her with something that will improve the evening. The vodka has worn off. How can she go from almost effectively anaesthetized to stone cold sober in an hour? It’s not fair.

“So, Beckett. Names. Especially appropriate on a birthday.” He’s practically on top of her. She jumps at his voice that close. Castle puts out a hand to steady her and fails to remove it. In fact, he adds another one, so that he’s now placed two large, warm hands round her waist. “You know what else is traditional on a birthday?” His voice has dropped into a low, rumbling register that’s talking to her nerves, not her ears.

“What?”

“A kiss.” Which he provides, lightly on her lips. And then, when out of sheer shock she doesn’t kill him at once or even step back, he bends and kisses her again, much more forcefully, big hands and long fingers drawing her inward, tongue running along the seam of her mouth and demanding – receiving – entrance. His hands shift on her back to hold her against him, one at the curve of her spine, one sliding upwards to her neck and into her hair, twisting into the short locks at her nape. She isn’t sure at all how her own hands came to be round his neck. She can’t even blame the vodka, because it’s worn off. So she has absolutely no idea why she isn’t killing him already, (it’s not as if she couldn’t) and even less idea than that as to why she’s joining in. Except that no-one’s held her tightly and kissed her like this for a very long time and everywhere his hands go they leave a little trail of desire and heat and it’s just so nice to be wanted.

She opens fully under his lips and lets him explore her mouth. He tastes of Scotch and heat and indefinably of big, hard male, and the more she responds the tighter he’s caught her and shit he feels good against her and this is why she likes big, broad men, because she can feel protected. Which is really very odd because she can take care of herself perfectly well and she has a gun and an average target score of over ninety-five.

She gives up thought in favour of sensation; drops the last vestiges of daytime hard, controlled shell and curves softly into Castle. His reaction is immediate and certainly doesn’t disappoint: his kiss turns hard and possessive, tongue requiring her concession to his demands, hand angling her head for full access; his other hand runs down from the small of her back to over the curve of her ass and pulls her firmly against hard weight and hot body, holding her in just the right place so that she can feel how much he wants her. She knows that she’s already soft and wet and open: not her usual daily self at all, and the more she softens the more he takes and the more she gives back and oh it’s just so easy to let him lead her further and further down this path.

It’s just so easy to be exactly who she isn’t in the precinct: to be Kat not-Kate-not-Beckett who likes soft t-shirts and sweets and flowing skirts and even occasional dresses, not sharply tailored pants and jackets; who can cook and (whisper it softly) play acoustic guitar and (never say it aloud) likes occasional slushy romance novels and baths with softly aromatic bubbles and scented candles; and who, just for once in a while, seems to be a possible, if temporary, outcome. Because the Castle who currently has both arms tightly round her and his mouth hard on hers doesn’t seem much like the one who turns up at the precinct either. Exactly who he isn’t in the precinct, in fact. He’s a lot less irritating, for a start. Not irritating at all. His kisses are as smooth, seductive and sinful as good moonshine whiskey, and slide down every sensitive synapse to gather moistly within her.

Castle, not being one to let an opportunity pass him by, had seized it and as swiftly found that, as he had hypothesised almost since moment one, Beckett is not nearly as unaffected by him as she’d pretended. He is somewhat surprised, however, that in more intimate circumstances she’s not at all like she is outside her door; but he is perfectly content to take control of the course of the evening and of this strangely yielding, soft Beckett. It’s clear that she doesn’t want to take charge; and from that he has rapidly deduced that – since she is not, as she could, maiming him – she wants him to. Which suits him just fine, because it’s only taken him a few weeks to be entirely enraptured by Detective Kate Beckett, who is currently not Detective Kate Beckett but some completely different woman – equally enrapturing – who’s pliant and responsive in his arms, where she fits just perfectly. Despite the height and the usual heels, currently and conveniently missing, there’s surprisingly little of her. Her wrists are delicate, her waist slim, her collarbones sharply defined. Must be her driving daytime public personality that makes her seem to occupy the whole of any space she’s in: the focal point, always in command of the room, wherever she is. Except, it seems, here.

He holds her closer, tastes more deeply: teasing and tantalising and taking and testing this new theory that the terse, tense Beckett might be someone quite different in her own home, her own private space; until finally he turns her round, rapidly surveys the room and lands his gaze on a large, full-cushioned couch. He walks them to it, where this carefully-judged exploration can be continued in comfort. Whilst he can, quite readily, hold her up, (and pick her up and carry her, but he’ll demonstrate that later if it seems appropriate) he’d rather it wasn’t necessary. It’s very odd, though. He’d expected, somehow, that the first time they kissed would grow out of rage and frustration and be hard and raw and angry. It’s not. It’s strangely soft and delicate and yes he’s taken her mouth hard and deep but there’s no rage about it. He wouldn’t have put them – this is a them – down for traditional roles in any capacity whatsoever, but right now it seems that Beckett’s being (this has just got to be wrong) feminine. His display of masculinity is less surprising. Metrosexuality only goes so far.

Beckett surrenders to being moved on to her couch and into Castle’s lap without the slightest semblance of a fight. Why fight what you want? No arguments, no problems, no complications. No commitments either, but who cares? It’s her birthday, and this is her present: a chance to be kittenish-Kat, not Kate, not Beckett. She’s so tired of being the strong one; the one in command. She can put it down for tonight, for the first time in years. She’ll pick it up again tomorrow, when she wakes. It’s just one evening.

But strangely, given the huge volume of suggestive, not to say heated, comments that Castle has produced since the day she stormed his book party to haul him in for questioning, he currently seems content with kissing. Hard, deep, and forceful kissing which she is very much appreciating – but nothing more, yet. Still, he’s very good at that, and hadn’t she thought earlier that she isn’t up for a one-night stand? She’s past that sort of casual behaviour, no matter what her body is telling her right now, which could be encapsulated in the three words jump his bones, pronounced in a very Lanie-esque twang. She is, after all, a mature adult, not an over-sexed, hormone-soaked adolescent. Really. Though if it came along she’s currently pretty certain she wouldn’t object, or stop it. It’s her birthday, and surely she can do what she wants on her birthday? God knows the rest of the day has been fairly crappy, and some pleasurable diversion would be good. This is currently a very pleasurable diversion.

Castle hasn’t moved off kissing largely because he has become instantly, hopelessly and incurably addicted to the taste of Beckett’s soft mouth under his and the way she feels simply held close against him. For now, it’s entirely unnecessary to push the point of this clearly mutual attraction. There’s no need to hurry. On the other hand, he could carefully explore a little further. Nothing too blatant. He’s not a sex-crazed teen. Even if it’s Beckett. He leaves kissing her mouth and feathers fingers over her jaw, tipping her face towards him and playing with the wisps of short hair round her ears. Interestingly, as her hair dries from the sleet that had accumulated on it, it’s acquired a soft wave. He wouldn’t have predicted that, he’d expected her hair to be as rigidly controlled as she normally is. Then again, he’s been wrong about the extent to which her personality is all about control, it seems. Lips follow fingers as Castle investigates the fine-boned outline of Beckett’s face, glides round her jawline and delves delicately into the curve of her ear, the recess behind it, finds a spot where she wriggles and breathes just a little harder, faster; so he kisses that again just to make sure he’ll be able to find it the next time. He has a very good memory for matters which interest him, and right now the contents of his arms interest him extremely. Not, of course, that this is new. Said contents have been the most interesting issue around him for weeks. Rather reluctantly, he stops kissing her.
“Isn’t this a better way to spend your birthday?” He tucks her into his arm a little more comfortably so that he can purr into her ear. “Traditions are always a good thing.” He doesn’t say, or do, anything further. It seems like he’s waiting for something: a word, or a signal:
Beckett is just a little discomposed that Castle has apparently left all the decisions up to her. She doesn’t want to make decisions, tonight, beyond the single vitally important one of consent. She thinks that her consent is relatively obvious, since she could have done him serious damage at any point and hasn’t.

“It’s okay, Castle. It’s good.” She thinks that’s enough, especially when she snuggles into his shoulder, relaxed against the firm muscle. Much to her disappointment, he doesn’t go back to kissing her, nor does he move on to anything else. Instead he holds her close-cuddled, and murmurs in her ear.

“Not Katherine, or Kate, or Kathy.” You what now? Surely he’s not back to names. She doesn’t want nicknames, or pet names. She just wants one evening when she can put everything down and not think. Just one evening to be soft Kat not hard-ass Beckett or kick-ass Kate, or Katie. To be Kat, but in her own mind, not in anyone else’s voice. “Mmmm. I don’t think any of those fit.” He’s nibbling gently at her earlobe. The voice and tone and action spread smooth sensuality down her skin, seeping in and soothing her slight disquiet at the direction of the conversation. A little less conversation, please, Castle.

“Fit what?” Beckett asks distractedly, far more focused on the wide frame surrounding her and the gentle, rhythmic movement of fingers at her shoulder and waist than on his words.

“Fit my character. Can’t call her Kate.” Beckett sighs in considerable and not at all concealed relief. “Katherine and Kathy just don’t work. Not badass at all.” He pauses, and considers. “Nor are they quiet, soft and relaxed, like you suddenly are now.” He leaves that hanging, too. Beckett’s not sure that she likes him picking up on her current state. But it’s just this evening. Back to Beckett-normal in the morning. She curls in and lets the slight scent of cologne and male settle around her. It’s... reassuring. Comforting. And rather too arousing for her own good. She wiggles into a thoroughly comforting alignment. Hard fingers flex against her, then release slightly and keep circling, stroking, far away from any intimate areas. It really doesn’t make the slightest difference to her reactions. She doesn’t realise that she’s emitting a contented little unformed noise.

“Kat.” What the hell? Contented noises cease instantly, as does soft relaxation. No. No. She’s only Kat inside her own head, inside her own apartment, and alone. No-one else gets to see Kat. No-one. “You’re purring. That makes you Kat.”

She didn’t want this. She’s returning to being Beckett faster by the minute and all she’d wanted was one freaking evening where she didn’t have to be Beckett, or Kate, or Katie. But she doesn’t want Castle to work out that she just wanted to be Kat. She certainly doesn’t want him to call her that. He might ask why.

“Don’t be ridiculous. I’m not purring.”

“It’s a perfectly acceptable short form. Or would you prefer Kitty? It’s a bit old-fashioned now but – ow! Let go of my ear, Beckett!” She lets go as he looks wounded. “That wasn’t nice. Just when we were getting on so well, too.”

He catches her wrist just before she takes another run at removing his ear. Clearly he’s hit another sore spot. He’s remarkably good at that. He’d rather be remarkably good at hitting – er – sensitive spots. So to speak. He’d better steer clear of this too. But in the near future he’s going to find out why Kat is such a sore point. He suddenly foresees a reasonable amount of hard thinking – no, deducing – in his future. Shortly before an entirely unreasonably large amount of kissing Beckett.

Back to lightening the atmosphere, before she realises that she’s still in his lap and stops being there.

“I know,” he says happily. “Split the difference. KitKat.”

“I’m not a candy bar!” She just has time to contemplate the magnitude of her mistake in engaging with this idiotic discussion before a grin splits his face in two.

“There are certain similarities,” he smirks. Then his expression changes subtly: the smirk becomes more of a lazy, sexy grin, his hand slips from her waist to her hipbone, the arm around her shoulder grips just a little more tightly. He carries on before she has a chance to stop him.

“It’s long and slim, with a smooth, attractive covering and substance within.” She opens and closes her mouth without producing words. “It tastes rich and sweet.” His eyes are intent. “I like to take the covering off. Sometimes” – his voice is lubricious – “I just can’t stop eating it.”

If he is actually talking about chocolate she will dine on her best Ferragamos, without sauce. But she can’t call him out on it because he is ostensibly referring to candy bars and if she admits by one single look or word that she knows perfectly well that he is referring to what they might do she’ll never be allowed to forget it.

“Better go find some, then. There’s a Seven-Eleven round the corner.” That sounds perilously close to a dismissal. Castle doesn’t want to be dismissed: it wouldn’t be any fun at all. Nor does he like the very standard sharp, sardonic tone in her voice. It’s far too similar to how she is normally, and he’d just been starting to enjoy the softer version. Hmmm. Maybe not talking would be a good plan, especially as she’s tensing up and any moment now she’s going to work out…

Dammit. She has.

Beckett stands up. And it is, clearly, Beckett who stands up. Whoever that softer woman was, she’s gone. But emphatically not forgotten. “Thank you for seeing me home,” she says, and moves significantly in the direction of the door and, more importantly, away from him. Castle receives the distinct impression that it’s not just a physical separation but an emotional and mental distancing as well. Hell. That was entirely not the plan.

“My pleasure, Detective.” His devious brain provides him with a new plan. All Beckett’s tells inform him that she’s not happy about something. All her previous tells and reactions inform him that she probably wasn’t unhappy about being kissed. All he needs is a few minutes to assemble his thoughts. “Could I just borrow your bathroom a moment?” He picks up his jacket and drapes it over his arm.

Beckett nods, once, sharply, and points him briskly in the right direction. Castle has no need of the bathroom, strictly, though he avails himself of the facilities in order to create the right impression. Then he swiftly removes some of the bills from his wallet: enough to buy himself coffee and a pastry, (he’s hungry) and meet a cab fare home if this doesn’t work; and puts it carefully on the floor (to avoid noise) where it’s not obvious to the casual viewer but could easily have fallen out of his pocket.

When he returns to the main room there is a noticeable atmosphere of hurry up and leave already which is more than slightly tinged – in fact soaked with – a colouring of because I’m upset and want time to myself. Nothing like living in a houseful of women to teach you about emotional undercurrents. Well, if he’s got his timing right he should return, having done some thinking, just at the point her upset might actually be on display; and while he really doesn’t want Beckett upset he does think that some comforting support, coming from a shoulder currently located around three inches from his chin, might get him some answers and kissable, kitten-like, not-Beckett. Or alternatively, if he hasn’t arranged all these disparate thoughts into a coherent whole, he can go home and pretend he didn’t notice his missing wallet till tomorrow in the precinct. Everyone carries enough change in their pants pockets to get the subway, and he is no exception, so the explanation will still stack up.

Beckett politely shows Castle out and repairs to her bedroom, feeling stale, flat and very unprofitably miserable. Why can’t she have even one night where no-one wants anything complicated, or wants support, or answers, or justice, or seeing inside her head, or anything? She’s just so tired of carrying the weight of it all. It’s been so long, and she’s so exhausted by it. She’s not hungry any more, and she doesn’t want to start tomorrow tired. She washes, lost in thought and oblivious to her surroundings, and changes into her favourite heavy, silky robe, wondering why she hadn’t just followed her instincts and dragged Castle into her bedroom when she had the chance. Probably because you’re too controlled, Kate. Her mouth twists unhappily. She finds a book and curls up in among her pillows and comforter, just like always.

Castle enlists the aid of his phone to find the nearest open coffee bar or similar place where he can sit and think with the aid of some caffeine. It’s a little further away than he’d like, and it’s still sleeting, which is rather unkind when it’s not even December, but the coffee is good and they have some very acceptable carrot cake. He finds a quiet chair well away from the whining draught biting from under the door and settles down to ponder.

On the basis of the pattern of vodka drinking, he hit a sore point when he suggested that her parents called her Katie. Start there. Why on earth would that be a sore… oh. Oh. He knows this. Or at least, she not only didn’t deny it when he told her his deductions of her story, she more or less confirmed it. Someone close to you. Oh fuck. And since her birthday card was signed by her dad it must have been her mother. Oh fuck. Because the second belt of vodka went down wholesale when he’d said that lawyers marry lawyers. Which would be her parents. Which implies a very happy home life, until it all went wrong.

So what flicked the third switch, then? Ah yes. He’d asked who cops date. Right now, she isn’t dating anyone – conclusion: bad break up, not too long ago. Which given Beckett’s work ethic and general level of seriousness could be anytime in the last couple of years, or even a bit more. Well, this cop ought to be dating him. He’d be a cure for bad break ups, he thinks smugly. She’d certainly appreciated him earlier. But then he goes back to pondering why she’d suddenly tensed up and realised what she was doing and called it off.

She didn’t like Katie. Okay, that’s not a surprise. She didn’t like Kathy. Also unsurprising, given how he’d described a Kathy. He suspects, based on his own parental experiences (of his parent and as a parent both) that she was only referred to as Katherine when she was in trouble. That is a bit of a shame, because he could really get used to the sound and feel of Katherine in his mouth. Not to mention the taste.

It was Kat that sent it plummeting into all sorts of wrong. Kitty and KitKat were simply amusement value and didn’t provoke the same reaction. Kat, on the other hand, stopped her purring and raised her tension level back to normal. So, something’s up with Kat. Okay, leave that for the moment. He takes another healthy draught of coffee and savours the cake.

What else? What else, he thinks, is the enormous difference between Beckett-normal and Beckett-at-home. Or, possibly, Beckett-in-his-arms. Beckett-normal is sharp, sardonic, wholly in command and barred higher than the Hoover Dam. Beckett-in-his-arms – well, wasn’t. That Beckett wasn’t a Beckett at all: she was soft and probably strokable and pettable; she cuddled into him like a contented cat would, boneless and utterly relaxed; and she clearly didn’t want to take the lead at all.
Oh. Two insights there that he could have used a lot earlier this evening. One, that she didn’t want to take the lead. Is it possible that the wholly-in-charge Beckett occasionally gets tired of being wholly in charge? It seems a tad unlikely, but then the events of the entire evening have been a tad unlikely. Even more unlikely, is it just faintly possible that curled-like-a-cat-and-purring-not-Beckett is in fact Kat, inside her own front door? That’s not something she’d want to have known outside said door. Including, naturally, known by him. She doesn’t trust him to keep that quiet, and to be fair he hasn’t exactly given her any reason to believe that he’s in any way discreet.

So if he hadn’t flicked the raw edge, where might he be? Well, if he hadn’t called her Kat, she’d still be tucked into his lap and in a very kissable position. More, she’d quite explicitly said it was all okay, all good; which is consent. So maybe they’d currently be exploring a little further round the baseball diamond than simply kissing. Kissing was good, though. Kissing Beckett is something of which he should do a lot more. An awful lot more.

And all this thinking has conveniently occupied a length of time sufficient for him to have waited for a cab, put his hand in his pocket to check, automatically as one does, that he had his wallet, found he didn’t, looked frantically around him, and then made his way back to Beckett’s building; on which mission, when he arrives, he does not forget to set the scene by asking the doorman if he’d picked it up.

The doorman is sympathetic but definite: no wallet dropped or handed in here. Castle fakes considerable annoyance at his own stupidity and a serious dose of worry; blesses the talent that he inherited from his mother and tells the doorman that he’d just like to check that he didn’t drop it at Detective Beckett’s, or in the elevator. The doorman sizes Castle up – a little protective, a little intimidating: Castle hopes that his own doorman would behave similarly if stray boys came round wanting to see Alexis on a feeble excuse like this – and, evidently satisfied of Castle’s sincerity, passes him on up. The wallet, though he looks to left and right as if searching, is naturally nowhere to be seen, since he left it in Beckett’s bathroom, and (he hopes) it’s still there.

He taps on the door. For a long moment, nothing happens: no movement is audible from within. Then the door opens, accompanied by an exasperated sigh emanating from an exasperated Beckett, wearing a garment that his fingers itch to stroke.

“What is it, Castle?”

“I can’t find my wallet,” he says apologetically, demonstrating its absence. He certainly doesn’t want her to know he’d staged this. “I definitely had it when we got here because I had it when I paid for the cab. It must have fallen out my jacket. Have you seen it?”

“No.” Beckett shakes her head, disarmed by the credible cause for him to have returned. “But I wasn’t looking.” She makes an expansive gesture around the room. “Feel free to look round here.” Swift thought flicks across her face, the Detective building the picture of what he had done. “You were in here – oh, and in the bathroom. I’ll look there. You can look in here. Don’t break anything.”

He skims a glance around the room, wanders to the window and checks under a side table, makes sure he doesn’t knock it and damage the small amethyst bird which is sitting on it. It looks rather fragile. Like Beckett. She’d had that certain glimmer in her eye that argues upset, but it had been a controlled upset, rather than emotional storms. As controlled as Beckett always is. He’s never seen her otherwise.

She needs something to cheer her up. A present, perhaps, for her birthday, dressed up as a reward for finding his wallet. When she finds the wallet, they can discuss rewards. Dinner, he thinks. A belated birthday dinner, somewhere classy and discreet: he can arrange that for tomorrow. But for tonight, reward might well equal kiss. On which thought there’s a triumphant squawk from the direction of the bathroom.

“It’s here, Castle.” Beckett reappears, on a cloud of you idiot how did you not notice you’d dropped it? He manufactures an expression of considerable relief.

“Thanks. Losing it would have been disastrous.”

“What, you’d have had to get the subway like us mere mortals?”

“No, I’d have had to notify fifteen different card companies. And I’d have lost all my coffee loyalty points.” Beckett looks slightly more impressed, and a lot more horrified, by the last sentence than by the first.

“I can see that the last might have been a problem,” she says sardonically.

“Are you telling me that wouldn’t have been a problem for you? You mainline coffee. Where do you keep your IV line?” She grins in a rather you-got-me-there way, and shrugs, just exactly the same way as she’d have done at the precinct. The remaining small hints of upset are covered almost perfectly – but, as she’s walked across the room, brandishing the wallet, to where he’s standing, still by the window, the signs are not quite wholly concealed. Three more steps… two more… one more – range.

“Here you are,” she says, and holds out the wallet, expecting him to take it. He does indeed reach out. It’s simply that he’s not reaching for the wallet.

“Here you are,” Castle says with considerable satisfaction, which in hindsight, Beckett feels, should have tipped her off, and instead of reaching for the wallet reaches for Beckett, puts both arms round her, and draws her in. He is, she finds, ridiculously snuggly. Far more so than her pillows. A little while ago she’d been wishing she’d just dragged him into her bedroom (assuming, of course, he wanted to, but it was pretty obvious earlier that he wanted to) and now here he is back again, and still indicating that he’s interested. Well, she’s clearly not going to be able to stop taking charge of events, but if she wants it, she can definitely have it. She stands still in his embrace, leaning against him, neither starting anything nor definitively stopping, considering whether she can bear to shoulder any further decisions other than yes.

And then the decision is taken out of her hands.

Castle had waited a moment or two to see what Beckett might do: top of the probability list being telling him to let go. However, he thinks that there is a faint chance that she might go back to being the soft not-Beckett of whom he’d quite like to see a little more, and a slightly higher chance that she might at least be receptive to some more kisses. So when she leans against him – though disappointingly it couldn’t be described as curving in – he thinks back to his deduction that she might not want to be in charge all the time, (he’s still not at all sure about this idea) waits to see; and, when she doesn’t take any decisive action, reasons that he can take some mildly decisive action without being on the wrong end of a harassment suit or, much more likely, a hard knee to the testicles.

He curls his hand round Beckett’s chin to raise her face to his, leans down slowly and inexorably and takes her mouth, gently searching for entrance. Her hands come up to his shoulders: one sliding into his hair; he wraps one arm round her back to keep her body close and sets the other on her neck. And abruptly she lets him in and her stance alters from the previous marginal leaning in to curving close and all the hard, controlled lines have softened and flowed and he’s not sure how this transformation has occurred but it seems like he’s got something right.
So, much like earlier, he repatriates them to Beckett’s overstuffed couch and carries on exploring her addictive lips and mouth with Beckett suitably and comfortably – and addictively – arranged in his grasp. And, again just like earlier, Beckett seems to be perfectly happy not to make any further decisions at all. Which Castle still finds very odd, because if he’d been asked to bet on it he’d have placed a substantial amount on Beckett being very vocal about her wants and not-wants, and more than that on her driving the course of events. Except she isn’t. It’s not that she’s passive or unresponsive, but she doesn’t seem inclined to push for anything more. He pauses, trying to think of a way to ask the questions he wants to ask without spooking her.

Beckett is currently of the opinion that not having to take any decisions would be really good. Maybe she can simply wait and see how this plays out for a while, though she might need to be decisive at some stage. Oh. That would be now. He’s stopped everything: he isn’t even petting her. He’s not going to give her what she wants most: a chance to lean on someone else and let them take the strain for a little while, it seems, so she might as well have something she’ll like instead. Up to her, again. She drives her tongue into his mouth, and takes the lead before he’s realised it. She clearly isn’t going to get what she really wanted: a chance to put all her burdens down and be soft Kat who wants something different; but if she can’t have that then she’ll settle for a different form of relief. It’ll be good, she’s sure of that.

It’s just not what she really wanted.
Whisky in the jar

She pulls Beckett back around her, shrugging into it like a comfortable coat. Back to Beckett, who can have slick, practised, perfectly enjoyable sex without ever revealing that sometimes she’d rather not be Beckett at all. Exactly as she could have predicted had she thought about it, taking the initiative ignites hot lust and very little in the way of soft cosseting. Gentle strokes, yes, but only in the context of winding each other higher and tighter and hotter and harder and wetter and yes he’s really, really good at this. So is she. As a physical connection it’s the best she’s had. She screams out her pleasure and comes hard around his own explosion and then rolls away to recover.

She’s surprised to be rolled back, and more surprised to be tucked in.

Castle is not wholly happy, despite the absolutely spectacular sex. Beckett has been exactly what he would have expected of Beckett, but he had wanted to be closer to her and all he feels is that he’s been – well, fobbed off with a treat. He doesn’t like the uncomfortable feeling that Beckett settled for this, rather than receiving what she really wanted, but not, unfortunately, being telepathic he currently has no idea what it was that she might really have wanted.

“Don’t do that,” he murmurs. “C ’mere.” He tugs gently, overcoming the slight resistance. “It’s not nice to roll over and go to sleep.”

“ ‘M tired. Lemme sleep.” She really is bone-wrenchingly tired: her eyes are closing themselves and she can’t rouse her mind to anything more. Disappointment in the day and the unpleasant feeling that she settled for second-best because she didn’t want to expose herself and her history, even if that second-best was very, very good, has left her wrung out and strained. She wants to sleep, knit up her ravelled cares, emotions and feelings and face tomorrow as she faces every other day, a burden to be shouldered.

Castle kisses the only available spot: the top of her head. “ ‘kay.” She’s apparently asleep before he can say more. He detaches himself carefully, cleans up, dresses and leaves. With his wallet, this time. Without, however, proper answers having been supplied. He’d previously thought, and then at least partly pretended, that shadowing Beckett is all about flirting to the top of his bent and hoping that the smart, sassy, whip crack Beckett will flirt back and then they could turn it into something a little more physical, in a mutually acceptable manner.

He’s not sure what happened tonight. He mulls it over all the way home, but when he gets in he’s no more informed than he’d been the moment he shut Beckett’s door behind him. It had, for sure, been excellent. But he still has the nagging feeling that in some way Beckett had settled for second best. He doesn’t like that feeling at all. He’s not used to being second best. Additionally, he’s pretty certain that being second best had nothing whatsoever to do with the physical connection. He might previously have had no idea, but now that he’s got plenty of idea he’s convinced that there’s something really pretty special there. He’s equally certain that Beckett felt the same. Physically.

He replays the second half of the evening. He’d had another chance, taken it, cuddled her in and kissed her and they’d spent some time in relatively gentle making out on her couch, during the whole of which period Beckett – no. Not Beckett, then. Possibly Kat, though he’s still trying to work out whether there really is a Kat – was perfectly happy, content, and not making any moves at all to be in charge or to lead or to be her normal driving alpha female self. And then almost without a warning she flipped back to exactly who she normally is and dragged him down with her. Not that he’d been protesting.

So. What happened to flip that switch? He hadn’t made the mistake of mentioning names, or nicknames, he hadn’t tried to push her. Oh. A-ha. He had stopped, because he’d wanted answers but hadn’t formulated the questions to which he wants the answers. And very shortly after that, Beckett-back-to-Beckett had made a swift decision and taken charge, just as he would have predicted. Maybe… maybe she’d just wanted not to take the lead? He finds that very strange, and not very Beckett-like at all.

It’s all far too difficult. Interpreting Beckett is complicated enough when she’s in the precinct and definitely Beckett. Interpreting Beckett when she isn’t Beckett is like interpreting Stalinist Russia: a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma. It’s certainly too complicated for tonight.

He’ll consider it all in the morning, when his brain might work. Right now, his brain is mostly occupied with the exceedingly pleasurable memories of Beckett in his arms, under his mouth and tucked against him.

When Castle has left Beckett sleeps for a time, then, exhausted as she still is, wakes with her mind churning. She tries futilely to let her mind relax back into sleep. Disappointment, though, fuels the memories, the reasons she’s so tired of it all.

She’s always been the strong one, a support for her friends. A strong-willed child, a rebellious and strong-willed teen, and then a fully focused college student. She wanted to be Chief Justice, and all her strong will had been turned on that. But then her mother had been stabbed in a dark, dank alley on a freezing January night, and everything changed.

Then, immediately, she had to be strong for her father. She couldn’t show weakness, or be weak, or even, after the funeral, cry anywhere near him. He careened down the slope far faster than she, and by the time she’d looked downward he was already at the bottom, sinking in the quicksand.

For two years she’d tried to save him from drowning, from diving over the edge hand in hand with his new best friend Jack Daniels. Then she’d gone to Al-Anon, as suggested by her then-therapist, and learned that – devastating blow – she couldn’t save him. For three more years she’d watched from a distance – never a safe distance; there was no safety; if she had reached out to try to pull him to some mythical safety he would have pulled her under with him – as he sank. Every day, every ring of her phone, every call from another precinct, floated on the surface of a toxic slurry of fear: fear of the news that call might bring; and under that a sludgy, poisonous underlay of knowledge that if it were the worst, then that at least might bring relief. At least then she wouldn’t continue to suffer the tyranny of hope: need not grieve each day for both the parent lost and the parent remaining. Instead, one parent gone, she watched and feared as the other tried to follow, and failed.

Every day, from the day she’d had to walk away, she’d shouldered her guilt that she’d deserted her father when he needed her most. Every minute since he’d checked himself into rehab she’s been sharply, painfully aware of the fragility of his sobriety, as delicate as a spider’s web and as dependent on a complex network of connections. Should any of those break, so might well he. And she, she knows, is the mainstay of that web. He’d told her so, short weeks after their shared tragedy: already deep-drowned in soft amber whisky to nullify the hard edge of pain, undiluted liquor to better dilute his agony; slurring and tearful and desperately clinging to her: you’re so like her, you’re so strong, Katie, I couldn’t bear to lose you too. You’re the only thing I’ve got left. Don’t ever leave me. But he had already abandoned her. Alcohol was a warmer companion than his devastated, grieving daughter.

Two years after that, she had forsaken him. She had to, or drown with him. And then she joined the Academy, to salt the wound she’d dealt him. Every day, she’d taken up her burden of abandonment with the dawn and only put it down with sleep. Every day, she’d found that only pushing herself harder, faster, for longer kept her clawing, heart-ripping guilt at bay, for a while.
She’d graduated top. It hadn’t helped.

So she’d done the same, pushed herself past all limits, when she started in uniform; and consequently become the youngest female detective in NYPD history. That hadn’t helped, either; not with her father still drowning, still reaching for the next bottle, looking at her in uncomprehending and incomprehensible misery, pouring from bloodshot eyes and a slack face. She couldn’t stand to see it, and couldn’t save him. Survivor’s guilt, perhaps. A venomous resentment, that she resented herself more for being unable to put behind her, and still more for feeling at all. Didn’t she deserve some support from him? And under that, from whence neither therapy nor self-knowledge has excavated it: Didn’t you love me enough to stay away from the pit?

Finally, he saved himself: claimed it was the thought of her and gave her his old watch to prove it, to show her. But still she carries an Atlas-burden of guilt that she forsook him; and a further Sisyphean boulder that she has to be his mainstay. She sets her shoulder to that stone daily, too.

Her last – her only – serious relationship had foundered on the rocks of his never-articulated-in-sobriety, unasked but desperate, need for her to be her father’s safety-line; his belay. Sorenson had been a decent man, but he hadn’t understood – how could he, no-one who hasn’t been there could ever understand the depths of degradation of her alcoholic – say it, it’s the truth – father: the unconsciousness, the vile explosions, the tears, the vomit; and she had never talked about it – how fragile her father was, and is; how her departure would have destroyed him as casually and callously as a child destroying the spider’s webs for pleasure with one swipe of its stick. She couldn’t abandon him to the avaricious avidity of alcohol again, when he’d worked so hard to become, and stay, dry. His dryness, though, had become her arid Atacama, the desert of her life; her atonement for abandoning him. And still she pushes herself to do better every day, in order to forget for some few hours her personal burdens.

But then in the precinct there are other burdens. The burden of command: in charge of the team, standing for the dead. Always the raking claws, the scratched-bloody need to solve it better, faster; to chase down every lead and follow every trail. Always the decisions: this lead over that, this trail over that. Always knowing that failure, or error, falls on her shoulders; standing between her team and the brass, pinned by the spotlight. Tall poppies are the first to be scythed. But more than that, failure means another family with no answer, and only continuing, uncertain misery and the same tyranny of hope that she has borne; the same waiting, in dread, for the phone to ring – or not to ring. She’s still not sure which is worse.

At least she chose that burden for herself, not had it forced upon her. She supposes that she’d accepted the load willingly, hoping for it to displace that other weight; but today she would have given almost anything to lay it down for a night. If only putting it down didn’t mean explaining why. Why, just very occasionally, she wants to be Kat. If only it didn’t mean exposing her father.

It’s her birthday, and she is twenty-nine years old. Her only present has been spectacular, superficial sex with a smart-mouthed playboy, but at least that will not have repercussions. She can’t cut down her twin burdens without the hydra of her guilt growing back triple-headed. She’d never liked Kipling, the colonial attitudes and racism leaving her disgusted, but she understands the sentiment behind his poetry, however unpleasantly and appallingly expressed. Making the right choice, not the easy one, for the common good. Her father’s good; her victims’ families’ good. Her very own Birkenhead drill.

On this, as on so many nights before, she doesn’t cry herself to sleep. She has been done with crying long since.

She’s the same Beckett as ever, the next day in the bullpen. And just in time, a body drops and she can lose herself in the necessary discipline of the investigation: prowling the precinct and the crime scene and the morgue for hours until it’s done, solved. And then again, and again, and again: no respite; a spate of murders that pushes all of them to their limits for the next month. Even had she wanted to repeat, or allowed herself to care about repeating, her encounter with Castle, there’s no time. She can continue like this indefinitely, as long as she doesn’t stop. When it does, she knows, she’ll crash over the adrenaline cliff-edge. When it does, Montgomery will force her – them all – to take a break and recharge. She’ll have nothing to stop the memories, and her burdens will be no lighter.

Their next case is a young man, Peter Berowitz, dead in an alley, an apparently random drive-by shooting. It’s not their normal run of murder – it seems relatively simple. CCTV records are obtained, while Beckett goes, Castle following her, to talk to the family: their address an expensive apartment in a good area.

She recognises the signs instantly, rams down her automatic, unthinking reaction before the grieving relatives spot anything other than her calm, cool, practised sincerity for their loss. Emotion does not, she has found, assist; either in solving the case or managing grief. The interview proceeds precisely as she intends it to: Castle interjecting at intervals in his usual fashion. She’s learning to allow for that, and to accept that it has some value.

“What happened there?” Castle asks, when they’re safely back in her cruiser and on the way to the precinct to regroup and consider.

“How’d you know that?”

“You spotted something, or something occurred to you. Right at the very beginning before we even sat down. What was it?” She says nothing, for a cold moment. “C’mon, Beckett, you gotta share.”

She bites the bullet.

“He’s an alcoholic. A functioning one, perhaps, but still an alcoholic.”

“How’d you know that?”

“Eyes, hand tremors, the marks on the table where a glass would be, the way his wife was watching him. Breath mints, at 10am.” She doesn’t mention the other signs: the lack of clear comprehension, the slight delay in understanding what had happened, the whiskey bottle in very easy reach. She doesn’t mention the way in which she recognises the look on the wife’s face: that same look which she had seen every morning in her own mirror for five years.

“That wasn’t what I meant.” She raises her eyebrows. It’s hiding a certain degree of panic. “How do you know what an alcoholic looks like.”

“I wasn’t always a Homicide detective, you know. You have to put in the time in uniform. You see a lot there, before you ever get to murder. All the problems of the underbelly of life. Some things you don’t forget, and drunken people and the carnage they cause is one of them.”

When Beckett isn’t looking, Castle peers at her sidelong. He’s not wholly convinced by her explanation, but he has no idea why he shouldn’t be. Anyway, he thinks, while parking that point, he has another goal in mind. He certainly has not forgotten his evening with Beckett, now almost a month ago, and while it may not have been wholly satisfactory emotionally he is quite definite that its repetition would improve matters. In short, he wants to do it again. And again. And again, and each time learn a little more, move a little closer, find out and then provide whatever it is that she needs but won’t admit or ask for. Astoundingly, he doesn’t actually mean the sex, though he certainly wouldn’t be averse to more of that either. Mostly, he means his meeting with not-Beckett, who might turn out to be Kat. He concocts another plan.

“Have you done your Christmas shopping, Beckett?” He bounces happily at the thought of Christmas. Castle loves Christmas, in all its infinite varieties. He’s not put off by the commercial aspects, because little makes him happier than giving his family presents – proper, well thought through ones, and silly ones; stocking presents and under-the-tree presents. Any sort of presents, really. He just likes giving. He likes the food and drink, as many decorations as one can fit on a very large, and always real, tree, and all the Christmas films. Most of all, he likes the possibilities of magic and redemption inherent in the whole festival.

“No.”

“No? When will you do it? There’s only a week or so to go.”

“Christmas Eve,” says Beckett, casually. It’s not as if she has many people to buy for. Small gifts for Lanie, maybe Ryan and Esposito; something for her father. It’s more difficult when you can’t give liquor. That’s it. Then she’ll spend Christmas Day at work, and when her shift is over go to her father’s place for a dinner in which they won’t talk about Banquo’s ghost, there at the table with them; won’t mention anything about their shared family history or indeed anything about family at all, and will toast each other and the coming year in Coca-Cola. Afterwards, she’ll go home to her apartment and eventually go to bed and not cry herself to sleep.

“What! You can’t do that!”

“No. That’s not how you do it. You plan, and then you take one evening and do everything. It’s fun: you have wine and get all wrapped up against the cold and enjoy yourselves.”

“So you’ve done all yours?” She’s trying to head off the light she can see coming through the tunnel: to wit, Castle inviting her to join him for a happy evening of shopping.

“Of course. Well, apart from stocking presents, and maybe something silly for Alexis, and something to annoy my mother – wrinkle cream, maybe – or if I see something that would be just perfect for one of them that I haven’t already got…”

“Okay, I get it. You are – despite all appearances to the contrary – Mr Organised.” Castle evidently has a thought.

“Should I get presents for people in the precinct?”

“If you want. It’s not compulsory, but we can always use more doughnuts.” Castle looks a little dejected.

“Really? Doughnuts? That’s all?”

“Unless you want to be known as the rich boy trying to bribe us to be friends. Stick to doughnuts, Castle. It’s traditional.”

“What sort of doughnuts do you like, Beckett?”

“I don’t know what the rest of the bullpen likes, though.” He widens his eyes enormously and looks pleadingly at her. “You need to come and help me choose. I wouldn’t want to get something everyone hated.” He smiles, very like a small boy who’s thought of something that he’s sure his mother will like, such as a pet frog, or a snake. “And then I can help you with your Christmas shopping. It’ll be fun.”

“I don’t think I need any help, thank you,” Beckett raps out briskly. “In, buy, out. All done.” Castle looks at her pathetically.

“Beckett, that’s not how it works. It’s supposed to be fun. Sociable. C’mon. You should do it properly.” He keeps talking, but Beckett simply lets it wash over her and ignores it. She might, if pressed, help him select doughnuts, but that’s it. She pulls the cruiser into a parking slot and switches off the engine. “Okay, so that’s settled.” Hang on, what’s settled? “You come to mine tomorrow evening after work, we’ll have a drink and some snacks and then you and I will go and do your Christmas shopping.” He hops out the car while she’s still spluttering.

“I didn’t agree to that,” she says. But she knows she’s already lost the argument. And truthfully, it sounds like a pleasant, easy way of spending the early part of an evening. Down time. His daughter and mother are probably perfectly nice, even if his mother is supposed to be hopelessly theatrical, and anyway, they’re not coming shopping. She doesn’t have to spend much time with them. It’s okay. She can deal with the short time.

“Please, Beckett?” Oh, God. Big blue puppy dog eyes. Saying no would be like kicking a kitten. She just can’t do it.

“Okay. Just this once.” His grin lights up the dingy garage.

“It’ll be great. You’ll see.”

What has she done?
Red, red wine

Upstairs in the bullpen the floor is bustling with bag-laden detectives who have clearly spent their lunch hours shopping. The amount of tinsel around is giving Beckett a headache, as it reflects the precinct strip lights at strange, jittery angles. Fortunately for her temples, Ryan has delved into the CCTV records and found a whole lot of usefulness – such as the registration of the car that the shooting almost certainly came from. For once – and as a huge contrast to every case in the previous month – it’s looking like this one is easy.

The unaccustomed run of good luck continues the following day: the car is located early on, the owner is brought in, and under the twin intimidations also known as Beckett and Esposito (it’s too early in the morning for Castle, who normally rolls in around 10.30) he points them to the shooter. He’ll go down as well: two low lives for the price of one. Espo and Ryan go to pick up the guilty party and by mid-afternoon it’s all wrapped up.

The final act before they can complete the ridiculously high number of complicated forms (more than one form, requiring more than one box to be completed, qualifies as ridiculously high and complicated) that they need to supply to 1PP is to tell the Berowitz family they got the guy. Eventually, it might help them to work through their grief. Eventually.

Beckett raps on the door in her normal forceful manner and, when it’s opened by the mother, clocks instantly that she has spent most of the last two days weeping. This is not unusual. What is unusual is that she doesn’t want to let them in. (Castle is, naturally, right next to her.) Beckett insists, very gently but persistently, and reluctantly they are admitted.

It takes Beckett less than a tenth of a second – and one breath – to understand why. The father is nowhere to be seen. The smell of whiskey is everywhere, the knocked over glass and the remains of spillage on the table and dripping into the tasteful, woollen rug. It’ll need dry cleaned, by a specialist, Beckett thinks. She could recommend one, if asked. She listens very carefully and hears stertorous breathing from a room she is shortly sure is a bathroom. She recognises the following noise, too. At least this man is still capable of vomiting into a toilet. If he continues down this path, soon he won’t bother with that. She finishes her message of sorrow quickly, and sends Castle out ahead of her, tossing him the keys to the car and asking him to wait in it for her: she’ll only be a moment. When he’s gone she turns back to the mother.

“If you need anything,” she says quietly, handing over a card, “this is where to find me.” She swallows. “I’ve… been through this.” Her flicked glance to the bathroom is sufficient. “Just call.” The drive back to the precinct is very quiet. Castle has no idea why Beckett took an extra moment – can’t have been a bathroom break, too short even for Beckett’s focused efficiency – but she’s wrapped in thought so for once he thinks he’d better not pry.

He’d noticed the mess and the smell too, but not being attuned to the sights and sounds of an alcoholic family member he completely misses their significance. Over indulgence belongs to his pre-Alexis days, and college parties. He’s never been exposed to the late middle-aged, upper-middle class alcoholic, functioning or otherwise; has only seen or thought of it in relation to street sleepers and pan handlers and hobos. For all his other research, his consequently vast knowledge and experience, this particular form of degradation has wholly passed him by.

Castle spends the remaining hour or so while the paperwork is completed staring (creepily, she insists) at Beckett in an expectantly hopeful manner and, when she finally switches off and tidies her desk, is out his chair with his coat on faster than a speeding bullet.
“Can we go now?” he enquires.

“Yes, okay, we can go,” Beckett replies, not expectantly at all. Castle pouts.

“Come on. I’ve got all sorts of lovely food and drink to ensure that you’re properly fuelled for shopping.”

“Could you tell my mother that? I don’t think she’s ever heard anyone say that. Ever. Even better, could you convert her? You have no idea how much she can spend in Saks.” He pauses. “You won’t hate shopping with me.”

“Why not?”

“Because it is with me.” Beckett humphs disgustedly, wholly and obviously unconvinced.

“Do you need a backpack to carry your ego, or a truck?”

“Ouch, Beckett. No fair. You’ve never been shopping with me so how do you know you won’t like it? You’re being biased. You’re not keeping an open mind.” He sounds ridiculously, petulantly, childishly offended – and all of it is wholly faked. She grins up at him, Beckett to the hilt.

“I have a theory,” she smirks, and watches as Castle’s faked poutiness dissolves into laughter.

“I never thought I’d ever hear you say that.” He assumes an expression of blinding realisation. “You listen to me!”

“I can’t not listen to you. You talk all the time. It doesn’t mean I pay any attention.”

“Oh no, you don’t get away with that. You do so pay attention. If you didn’t you wouldn’t bother arguing. I think you like me, Beckett.” She throws her hands up in a gesture of disgust and turns to the elevator door that they’ve mysteriously reached. “We’ll get a cab,” he says as they exit the precinct. “There will be wine involved. Ordinary or mulled – do you like mulled wine, Beckett? Some has been mulling since much earlier. It’s always best if you give it as much time as possible for the flavours to meld.”

Oh fuck. She can’t bear the smell of mulled wine. She remembers coming home one dark, cold winter evening to find her father passed out in a puddle of spilt mulled wine and sour vomit. He’d made it for both of them, but couldn’t stop himself from drinking it all, no doubt on top of whatever he’d already had. It had barely been February: not four weeks afterward. It was then that she’d had to realise that he was sinking, drowning in the riptide and undertow of his devastating grief. She’d thought she could save him, then. She’d continued in that misconception for some time. She unknowingly winces at the memory; the stab of old, thin pain in her chest sufficient to cover her physical reaction from herself.

“It’s not my favourite,” she says, mechanically continuing to move forward, not seeing the street ahead, concentrating on not betraying herself.

“That’s okay. I’ve plenty normal wine.”

She can do this. For a short hour or even two, she can do this. She just needs to breathe shallowly, as she would at a crime scene, in through her mouth and out through her nose. Just like a crime scene. She’s survived much worse, for longer. By the time she saw her first corpse she was already inured to the sights and smells and degradation: the effects on bladder and bowels of death or of drinking to the point of loss of all bodily control and then unconsciousness are not so very different in result. She’s never thrown up at a crime scene, no matter how gruesome. She’d done all of that in the two years before she entered the Academy, as well as all her weeping. Nothing she has seen in all her years of Homicide has ever been as bad as the scenes she’d dealt with at home, till she walked away. Nothing.

She’s faintly aware that a cab has pulled up and Castle’s holding the door for her. She slides in, turns her face to the window and, cold both without and within, huddles into her thick winter coat. She can be Beckett, till the evening’s over. She has to be, because Kat only exists behind her own door, in her own head, and anyway Castle won’t or can’t let her be Kat. Her burdens can’t be shared, her father mustn’t be exposed, and Castle wants slick, sarcastic Beckett, not cuddlesome Kat. He seems to want her to make all the decisions. Well, she can do that, but there won’t be very many of them. She supposes, rather bleakly, that he was quite good enough in bed for it to be a pleasant diversion, every so often, for a while. When neither of them have anything better to do. Just like this evening will be – once they’re out of his loft – a pleasant diversion.

She turns away from the window and smiles at Castle: her normal cool professional smile, sardonically amused at the foibles of the world around her; setting her at a slight distance from her surroundings, and wholly uninformative. She’ll cope with the short time at his apartment, she’ll cope with the shopping, and then she’ll go home. She might even take Castle with her, if he wants to come. It’s sure to be up to her to make the first move. He won’t. It seems that he’s sure that she’ll want to take the lead herself – and why should he not be? She’s hardly shown him any other personality. Can’t blame him for believing her.

And yet, deep inside where she doesn’t notice it, she does. She unconsciously blames him for apparently being able to read every last twitch of her face and posture in the precinct and then not being able to do so that evening a month ago in her apartment. She unconsciously blames him for starting down the road of providing comfort and cosseting and then stopping, leaving her to take the initiative. And she unconsciously feels guilty for blaming him, because after all every decent man knows that you have to receive consent and yes, she did tell him it was okay, but maybe that simply wasn’t clear enough. So because she can’t work out why she’s feeling slightly uncomfortable around him, why she’s a little more easily irritated: she hides in her cool professional demeanour and a bright, breezy, sociable shell, and reveals even less than usual, returning to staring out the cab window at nothing in particular.

Castle, after a night in which he didn’t actively think about it, but nevertheless mulled below the surface of his mind, the slightly odd feeling he’d had that there was more to Beckett’s reaction to the alcoholic father than he knew, had also not missed the slight hitch in her gait when he mentioned mulled wine. He’s also slightly discomforted by the way in which she’s been wholly, completely Beckett ever since that extremely confusing evening at hers, when at first he’d thought that she wanted cuddled and petted and then she’d suddenly done exactly what he would have expected from the outset and simply been wholly definitive about what she did and didn’t want and like. (All of it. She’d liked all of it. Even when they’d… Do not go there, Castle. Not in a cab.) But there hasn’t been so much as the tiniest, most fragmentary hint at any instant since that softer not-Beckett exists at all, and had he not seen that person he’d never have believed that she’s there.

He scents a mystery. He likes mysteries. He likes solving them even better, and come to think of it he hasn’t found out Beckett’s story either. He’s guessed a big chunk of it – and she didn’t correct him, so he must have been right – but he doesn’t know. Furthermore, he doesn’t know whether his thinking in between the two encounters in her apartment was correct. It’s all the same mystery, all the same story. His insatiable curiosity is roused, and, like the Elephant’s Child, he has no intention of reining it in. In fact, he intends to let it rampage. He’d liked his glimpse of softer not-Beckett. He’d appreciate a few more glimpses: not all the time, and certainly not in the precinct, but sometimes. As he’d thought previously, metrosexuality only takes him so far, and while he has no desire for submission from his partners, he equally has no desire to be submissive.

They’ve reached the loft, and neither of them has said a word to each other, letting the emery-rough, abrating discomfort of the silence surround them.

Beckett looks around as Castle waves her forward to precede him through the door. As she might have guessed, his loft is full of Christmas cheer and decorations: hugely festive and exuding comfortable warmth and the atmosphere of convivially chubby merry gentlemen. She almost expects that figgy pudding will figure in the snacks. For now, she readjusts her breathing to minimise the sickly, clinging smell of mulled wine and settles down on the couch to which Castle has directed her. It’s sufficiently far away from the kitchen that she needn’t look at the liquid and remember it puddling stickily on the floor. It had taken some time to clean the mess up.

Snacks are, in fact, well-judged, tasty and plentiful; and Beckett makes a fairly substantial meal from them, watched – approvingly, it seems – by Castle. She washes it down with a single slow-sipped glass of a very good Bordeaux, which has the happy effect of keeping the smell of mulled wine out her nostrils and the smell of good Bordeaux in them. His mother is missing – a Christmas party for distressed actors, Castle explains, indicating without words that he thinks that any distress will be inflicted by his mother upon other members of the theatre fraternity – but Alexis is there: happily chirping about Christmas plans and outings.

Beckett watches her with her father and preserves a very blandly friendly face; making all the right responses to Alexis’s genuine happiness and sincerity. She remembers when she was equally comfortable with her father: certain sure that she was loved and the apple of his eye. She had been a little younger, then. By fourteen, she’d been starting to rebel, push the boundaries; but she’d always been perfectly definite that her parents loved her without limitation. Maybe her father still does, but he’d loved Jack Daniels more. She could have coped with his devastating grief – he had loved her mother with everything he had – if he hadn’t made it clear that she wasn’t enough, wasn’t a consolation – was, in fact, a reminder. He’d said that too, deep in the bottle. You’re so like her. Why are you so like her? I can’t bear it. And he’d turned away from her and sunk another measure, until he couldn’t see her, or anything, at all. Even then, still she’d fought to save him. Even then, she’d taken him at his other, earlier, word: don’t leave me, Katie. I need you.

So many of the small things that go to make up the unbreakable love for a parent for his child are blindingly obvious to Beckett. The look in Castle’s eye, the slight protective curve of his body when he’s near Alexis, leaning in to listen and clearly paying total attention to what she’s saying: shared jokes and catchphrases; a brief reminder of sense and safety with her friends and Alexis’s slight huff and rolled eyes at the lack of necessity for that at the great age of fourteen; a note that her allowance is not, despite her grandmother’s suggestions, infinite – though the look behind that suggests that Castle gives Alexis a pretty sizeable amount. He’s proud of her achievements, too: they’re talking about her day and it sounds like Castle is pretty switched on to what she’s doing, and how.

That was Katie and her father, once upon a time long ago.

She drains her wine, excuses herself for a moment, locks herself in the bathroom and lets the memories wash through her and past her and away. She blots her eyes and rapidly reapplies her makeup to hide any trace; returns to the main room and continues her bright social answers and contribution to the conversation. Her history is no reason to depress Alexis, who is, it seems on further acquaintance, an unusually nice example of the variety of human race known as teen. Given her father’s general love of far-out theories, conspiracies and unlikely happenings, she’s also unusually sensible. Beckett supposes that one of the family has to be. Though that’s a little unfair.
Castle must have applied some common sense and childrearing discipline, otherwise Alexis would be just another spoilt rich brat.

That was Katie and her father – and mother – too, once upon a time long ago.

She makes a small noise, which attracts Castle’s attention. He flicks a look at her, grins widely.

“Ready to go shopping, Beckett?”

“Yep,” she says, social mask and the similitude of pleasure at the prospect in place. Castle reaches for her coat, stands to help her into it – and while she’s organising herself runs an assessing, curious gaze over her that she doesn’t appreciate at all. She raises an eyebrow in a way that makes it perfectly plain that she has both noticed and been unimpressed by the look. “Let’s go,” she says, with her practical precinct briskness. Let’s just get this over with.

“Where do you want to start, Beckett?” Castle asks, when they get downstairs, pursued by Alexis’s seasonal good wishes. She isn’t sure. Wine and chocolate for Lanie, which needs only a good store. Her father is… a little more difficult. What does she get her father? She’s not reduced to tie-and-handkerchief sets, or scarves, or, God forbid, socks. Not yet, anyway. Her father can’t think of anything to tell her; he doesn’t share her literary tastes. That had been her mother. Maybe a heavyweight political biography, or a historical tome. She sighs audibly.

“What’s the matter, Beckett?”

“I don’t know what to get my dad,” she admits.

Castle looks momentarily blank. Then he smiles. “You’ll have thought of all the obvious things, so no point in repeating those. Anyway, they’re boring.” He scrunches his face in thought. Clearly he wants to be helpful. Beckett had expected a series of outrageous suggestions, but he’s actually taking the problem seriously. “Does he like chess? Or board games?”

“Chess, but I got him a really beautiful set years ago” – she’d got it in Kiev – “and he uses it. He’s got a small travel set, too.”

“Your father’s a lawyer?”

“Yes. Anti-trust.” Her tone, though perfectly even and friendly, somehow manages to make it clear that that’s the end of that line of conversation. It’s decidedly discouraging.

Castle leaves it, but he thinks the more. He deduces that since her father is clearly very much alive, it must be her mother who is dead, just as he had thought at her apartment. Not least because she hasn’t mentioned a present for her. He has the good sense to keep his mouth firmly shut on that point. From Beckett, though she’s been bright, polite and sociable all evening so far, he’s strongly detecting a sense of underlying fragility that he’s not used to. It’s rather reminiscent of the way she’d been in the bar, now he comes to think of it. Hmm. Actually, there’s been an air of fragility since the very start of the latest case.

Now, if her father is a lawyer, then, going back to the conversation in the bar a month ago, not one word of which has he forgotten, that means that likely her mother was too, again, as he had previously thought. Ah. One mystery solved, on the basis of a lot of circumstantial, but corroborating, evidence.
That only leaves the other concatenation of small things. The instant recognition of an alcoholic. The dislike of mulled wine – how can anyone dislike something so redolent of Christmas and evenings round an open fire; of chestnuts roasting and sleigh bells ringing? Still, that’s a reach too far. Some people just don’t like it. It’s just the way she’d paused for an infinitesimal period, just the way her step had faltered, just that once. He’d wanted to take her hand, or arm, then; or put his arm around her shoulders and tell her it would all be okay. Smart, slick Beckett, always ready with a dismissive quip or flip retort, wouldn’t have put up with that for a moment. So he hadn’t tried. But he’d wanted to. He really had. He still does.

“So, not Monopoly. Clue?”

“No thanks. I solve crimes all day. I don’t need to do it when I’m seeing my dad.” They walk another few paces, both thinking, suddenly companionable in the shared issue.

“I know!” Castle ejaculates.
“What?” Beckett’s got no further, so any insane idea is better than the nothing that she’s got.

“It’s really old-fashioned. I mean really old-fashioned. But I know a guy who runs a shop” – he’s flagging a taxi as his words spill out, falling over themselves to escape from his throat – “that specialises in really old board games, and he reminded me about this one which was really good fun and I always meant to get that one for Alexis but I never did though I’d played it a lot and it might be just perfect and even if not there might be something else you liked and”-

“Castle, stop just for a second. Slow down. What are you talking about?”

A taxi draws up and he hustles her into it with a hand on her back. When they’re underway he starts again, looking slightly sheepish. “It’s a board game. It’s called Sorry.”

“Sorry?”

“Yes, that’s its name. It’s a bit like a complicated version of Parcheesi. Instead of dice you draw cards, and different numbers let you do different things. It’s quite strategic. You can get it new but this guy has a shop with really old versions rather than Phineas & Ferb…” Somehow it’s not a surprise that Castle has watched Phineas & Ferb. She imagines that the psychedelically insane (or chemically-induced: whatever the writers are on, every so often she would love some) inventions, humour and music would be right up his alley.

“So why didn’t you get it?” Castle goes a little red.

“Well, by that time Alexis was already beating me at enough games that I didn’t want to add another one to my extensive list of defeats. The owner taught me to play, though.”

Beckett is stabbed by a memory of her father teaching her to play first Uno, then gin rummy, then poker, over summer vacations in the cabin on the days it rained too hard for them to go fishing together.

“I never let her win – well, not once she would notice,” Castle continues, “but it didn’t seem to matter. And she was disgustingly triumphant when she won, egged on by my mother. I’m sure my mother helped her.”

“Or, of course, she’s simply a whole lot brighter than you,” Beckett says without most of her usual snark. Castle only grins.

“That’s possible, too. She’s certainly more mature.” He doesn’t comment on Beckett’s sudden lack of focus. He files it for later. “Almost there,” he says happily.

The cab draws up at a very small, dark looking store front with a variety of old boxes and decks of cards in old-fashioned designs. Castle bounces out the taxi as enthusiastically as he’d bounced into it and offers his hand as Beckett steps out. The sidewalks in this mess of small streets are not nearly as clear as in more populous shopping areas. In fact, it looks like no-one’s walked down here all day. When Beckett feels the slide of slush under her boot she decides that she prefers Castle’s proffered hand to falling on her ass, and takes it. His grip is surprisingly firm. She remembers vividly how he’d felt, not in bed, but sitting on her couch, holding her close in. He doesn’t let go when she’s straightened up and caught her balance. She doesn’t ask him to, nor does she pull away, until they enter the gloomy store.
There’s a wheezy cough from somewhere in the back, and a shuffling of feet. Despite these foreboding portents, when the person arrives it proves to be a rather elderly man, white-haired and gently balding in a tonsure pattern, and wearing – carpet slippers? – and a velvet smoking jacket in a distressingly bright violet with a paisley pattern in red and gold. He falls on Castle’s neck with trilling enthusiasm.

“Richard! Dear boy, where have you been? You haven’t come by for months.” he flutes. He notices Beckett. “And who is this lovely young lady?” He regards her with an artist’s appreciation.

“This is Detective Kate Beckett, NYPD, Julian.” Julian takes her hand and kisses it. “She needs a Christmas present for her father,” Castle says emphatically, regarding Julian with a very strange expression. Beckett thinks that it looks rather like confusion at the kiss. “So I thought of you. And here we are.” Castle gestures widely, only just missing an ivory chess set and a delicate model of a WWII fighter plane. Julian looks flustered and not a little nervous, much as if a large, bouncy dog had bounded into the store.

Beckett looks around. She can’t see a single electronic toy or game. She smiles vaguely at Julian and starts to wander around the shelves. Most of the boxes look older than Beckett – though they all seem to be in perfect condition. She peers at them, picking one or another off a shelf to examine. She’s never seen a lot of these games: she’s far better than competent at many forms of card game, (she turns hard away from the pang of memory) but there had really only been chess and checkers; Monopoly and Clue at home. She turns back to the two men.

“I don’t know what to get my dad,” she directs toward Julian. “He likes chess, and checkers, so Castle suggested a game called Sorry.” She sounds rather uncertain of its acceptability.

“Sorry,” hums Julian. “Hmmm. Now where did I put that?”

“The one you tried to get me to buy,” Castle points out, attempting to be helpful.

“Oh yes, that.” Julian turns without any further hesitation to a small shelf towards the back of the shop and picks up a box. “Now, Miss Beckett” – Castle winces slightly, but Beckett is intrigued by this elderly, old-fashioned courteous man and doesn’t correct him as she normally would – “let me show you.” He sets the box on a small octagonal table with a marquetry inlay of a chessboard in birch and mahogany, a rim of mother-of-pearl around the edge, and opens it carefully; first taking out a board and laying it precisely on the table. There are four different colours, each having a place to start, a little tower of squares with a top – Home, it says – and some interesting looking arrows in a slide configuration. Julian takes out three of the four small boxes and extracts some pawn-shaped, coloured wooden pieces, setting them in the relevant Start points. Beckett looks at him sharply.

“It’s pretty,” she says, still intrigued, “but what are you doing?”

“Oh, my dear” – Castle winces even more obviously, but Beckett simply lets that wash over her – “the best way to discover whether you think the game will suit your father is to play it. Sit down here” – he presents her with a chair, and there seems no option but to consent. Besides which, the game looks interesting – “and let us all play the game. Richard, my boy, please will you shuffle the cards while I explain the rules to Miss Beckett?”

“Please, call me Kate.”

“Kate? Short for Katherine, I presume?” Julian’s bright, birdlike eyes meet hers. She nods.

“I do not like abbreviations. May I call you Katherine, instead? Such a beautiful name.” She has no idea why she assents to that. No-one calls her Katherine, now. However, the old-fashioned atmosphere in the slightly dusty shop, giving her the feeling that she’s stepped into Miss Haversham’s parlour, and Julian’s decorous courtesy in asking no doubt had much to do with it.

“Of course. May I call you Julian?” Her courtesy in return is entirely unforced. The manners of a slower, more formal age seep over her, and here in this peculiar little shop, with this peculiar little gentleman, extraordinarily, she feels less tense and more at peace than in years.

“It would be my pleasure if you would do so.”

While they have been exchanging formalities, Castle has quietly brought two chairs for Julian and himself, and considered with some surprise Beckett’s alteration from her earlier stressed unhappiness to this unaffectedly courteous, poised – well, lady. This trip, he thinks with considerable satisfaction, had inadvertently been an excellent idea.

Julian finishes setting up the game. “Now, Katherine, you will already have discerned that the aim is to bring all your men safely home. We will cut to establish who shall begin, but we will defer that for a moment whilst I explain the cards. You may only start a man if you draw a one or two. A two will provide you with the opportunity to draw a second card. A four requires you to move backwards four places. A seven may be split into two moves, by two of your men, adding up to seven. Both must move forward. An eleven allows you to exchange places with any other man on the board.” He taps a finger on the coloured squares making up the tower. “This is a place of safety. Here, you are not at risk. Anywhere else on the board, should another player draw a card which would allow him to land upon the same square which you occupy, your man may be sent back to its start.”

He smiles beautifully. “It is customary and mannerly to apologise when you send another player’s man back to start, hence the title.” Beckett smiles in return. This sounds interesting. She’s already beginning to think that even if, once they have played, she doesn’t believe that her father would like it – she certainly might. “There are two final points to note. Should you draw a Sorry card, you may start one of your men by removing any other man upon the board, except those in Safety; and apart from those cards which I have already mentioned, all moves must go forward in the direction of the arrows. Should you land here, on a slide of a colour which is not your own, you may slide to the end. Any other men on the slide will be sent back to their start, accompanied by your apology for the necessity.” He pauses for a few instants. “Shall we begin, Katherine? If Richard believes that the cards are sufficiently shuffled, that is?”

Castle smiles affectionately at Julian. “Of course they are, Julian. Didn’t you teach me how?” Beckett blinks. How long has Castle known this man? But it’s time to begin. It takes her a little while to become familiar with the pattern of play, and, much to her relief, neither man is patronising enough to make any concession to her lack of knowledge. She loses the first game, naturally. Julian, who appears to be hiding a razor-sharp tactical mind behind his fluttering personality, wins, and offers another game. Beckett accepts instantly. She likes this game. It’s far more strategic than Parcheesi, but less complex than chess.

This time, although she still loses, she has a far better grasp of the potential strategies, and the game is far closer. When they’re done, with Julian winning again, she’s decided. She smiles contentedly.

“My father will very much like this game,” she says formally, her words chosen for her by the atmosphere of a bygone age. “Would it be possible to take two, though?”

“Naturally. May I ask why two?”

“One set for my father,” Beckett replies, “and one for me. I’ve really enjoyed this game. Thank you.” Julian clears away the pieces and the board, and then reaches for another box.
“Would you like one gift-wrapped?” he asks.

“Yes, thank you. This one.” She indicates the one which they hadn’t used. Julian turns to the important business of precise wrapping in a heavy, brocade-print paper redolent of Victorian Christmases long past. Beckett feels as if the time she has spent in here – she drops a glance to her watch and realises that it’s been two hours and more – has been spent in a Dickensian setting: a slower, gentler age. She turns to Castle.

“Thank you,” she says with sincerity. “This was the perfect place to get a present for my dad.” Castle smiles down at her in return, a little ruefully.

“I suppose now you’re going to insist that I play Sorry with you until you’ve learned to beat me soundly every game, aren’t you?” Beckett grins a little wickedly.

“I hadn’t quite thought of that, but now that you mention it... Or we could take it to the precinct and annoy Esposito and Ryan with it.” She looks down at the box. “Or not. They might spoil it.” For some reason, which she can’t quite put her finger on, she doesn’t want this box damaged, or any of the delicate little wooden men lost. Maybe she simply wants it to be perfect, to be a perfect aide-memoire of an evening where her burdens have not intruded on her once; where she hasn’t been Beckett and hasn’t been Kate or Katie. She’s been Katherine: a woman of old-fashioned courtesy and grace in a small, dusty, old-fashioned shop with a proprietor straight out of Dickens. It’s not being Kat, but it’s had almost the same soothing effect. And it’s been Castle who’s allowed her to achieve this benefice.

She won’t be taking this game to the precinct, or anywhere else. She can’t take the risk of it being damaged.

Castle has observed Beckett with interest as she played. The fragile air surrounding her had dispersed as she turned her intelligence and a considerable strategic mind on the game, and while naturally she had lost (he and Julian have played relatively frequently before) she’d caught up pretty quickly. Julian likes her, Castle can tell. That’s interesting, too. Julian normally takes a little while to decide about people, with Castle having been a rare exception. Then again, Castle had been a young teenager when he’d first stumbled upon this shop, and even then he’d understood that this was a place of tranquillity and an earlier age.

Julian had taught him to shuffle well, and to deal; to play backgammon and other strategic games, and then to play chess, though Castle had never once beaten him. When he’d complained, a little petulantly, about that, Julian had admitted to International Master status, and Castle had resigned himself to the fact that he would never win. He doesn’t have the patience to learn and analyse the strategies, and occasional instinctive brilliantly brave and creative moves are not sufficient. He still enjoys playing, though. At times this shop had been his refuge, and entering its portal still soothes his soul.

However, it’s well after nine, and they ought to be letting Julian close up. Fare-thee-wells are exchanged – it always seems the appropriate phrase for Julian: so much more apposite than a mere goodbye – and Castle ushers Beckett out into the street where he discovers with delight that it’s snowing hard. He discovers with marginally less delight that it’s clearly been snowing hard for some time, as they continue to fail to find a free cab. He becomes aware that Beckett is speaking.

“How did I not know about that shop? It’s only a few streets away from my block. I never knew it existed.” She peers up at Castle, snow sparkling her dark hair. “If we just take a right here we’ll be practically at mine.” She peers a little more uncertainly. “D’you want a coffee? Maybe there’ll be more taxis after that.”
“Coffee would be great, and I could call my car service from yours.” He grins. “We could have another game, Beckett. I like winning over you.”

“Don’t get used to it, Castle. It’s not gonna happen that often.” She returns her attention to her footing. It’s rather slippery on the sidewalk and she really does not want to be planting her backside on the snow. Goodness only knows what nastiness is hidden under it.

They reach her door without mishap but with a thick frosting of snow on coats and scarves and hair.

Castle, entering politely behind Beckett, whips one comprehensive and unseen glance around her apartment and realises that not only does she not have a Christmas tree up, even the abomination of a plastic one, there isn’t so much as one solitary Christmas card or twinkling piece of tinsel. The contrast with his own festively decorated loft is chilling. Beckett appears to be fully subscribed to In the Bleak Midwinter, as opposed to his philosophy of God Rest Ye Merry, Gentlemen. It’s as bad as her appalling attitude to her own birthday. She doesn’t seem to notice anything wrong or think anything of it. With considerable self-control, he doesn’t comment. On the lack of decoration, anyway.

“What will you do for Christmas, Beckett?”

Beckett hadn’t particularly wanted that question raised, though she had been expecting it, but she has in any event a ready, conversation-stopping answer. That answer will not, however, include the significant matter of her voluntary assumption of the Christmas Day shift.

“I’ll go to my dad’s and we’ll spend Christmas together,” she answers. “Christmas with family.” She smiles, apparently perfectly happily. She has no intention of describing what that means. Castle smiles back, apparently perfectly – what? Reassured? That’s not an appropriate reaction. He hardly knows her (even if they have been to bed. That doesn’t count.) What’s it to him what she does for Christmas? Anyway, it doesn’t matter. If he’s reassured then he won’t be asking further.

And he doesn’t. But unbeknownst to Beckett, he’s picked up the hint of brittleness in her words. There’s more to this, he is sure. But now is very much not the time. He wants to find softer Beckett-Kat, not spook her. And asking Beckett questions about her personal life is a very fast way indeed to spook her.

Castle, domestically, offers to shake the snow off the clothes over the bath if Beckett will put the kettle on because, he says plaintively, he is freezing and may never be warm again.

“But, of course, you could warm me up,” he smirks, and realises that that was a mistake just as soon as he does.

“Really? And how might I do that?” It’s not that she’s irritated, or angry, or even glaring at him; but suddenly, with the quizzical lift of her eyebrow, Detective Beckett’s coolly amused, sardonic air of slight distance is right back. He disappears to shake the snow off their coats before he can add his right foot to the left foot sticking out his mouth.

She rapidly concocts a pot of coffee, sets it and two mugs on a tray, and adds two jugs: one containing plain and one containing vanilla flavoured creamer. She regards the tray for an instant, and then picks up and sets on it one jar of powdered cinnamon and one of ground nutmeg. The complete ensemble arrives on the coffee table and Beckett sits down at one end of the couch.

When Castle emerges from his sartorial ministrations, Beckett is quite obviously expecting him to sit at the other end of the couch, at a socially acceptable distance from her. He doesn’t like that expectation. His expectation is that he will sit next to Beckett-who-is-being-Beckett and see if he can’t move just a tiny bit closer to Kat-who-he-thinks-Beckett-wants-to-be. So he does.
Play the game

He sits, in fact, almost as close as he can get without actually picking Beckett up and putting her on his knee, and the only reason he doesn’t do that is that Beckett, despite the immense improvement in her levels of stress-induced reserve since they left the store, is not precisely radiating receptivity. He compromises by laying his arm along the back of the couch without quite touching her, but managing to make it clear that, should she lean in only the smallest fraction, his arm will be very content to curl around her. He has, in fact, developed yet another plan. This plan is intended to deal with his ever-stronger suspicion (though he still finds it very strange) that behind her own closed door – or possibly confined to the even more limited and inaccessible area behind her eyelids – the only decision that she wants to make is whether to say yes or no to any suggestion he might make.

He continues to find that very odd indeed. A rum go, as Julian might say. His extensive experience and exploration of the highways and byways of sexual practice does not incline him to think that any usual form of Beckett has any bent at all towards submission. His very short meeting with the aspect of Beckett to which he is very privately referring as Kat does not give him that impression either. But she isn’t pushing for anything. But she is – was – soft and yielding against him. But she seemed to be perfectly content to allow him to choose what happened: almost passive, though thankfully not passive but perfectly, gloriously responsive to him. And then he’d – big mistake – stopped to think and a switch had flipped and soft, yielding Kat had instantly become hard-edged, alpha, driving Beckett and everything had ignited into one searing firestorm of – ah. Of sex without closeness or emotion or, really, affection.

Light dawns. Kat wants affection. How had he not seen that earlier? He knows that Beckett doesn’t do casual (or even not-casual) touching: never bumps fists or high-fives or claps anyone on the shoulder, no matter how merited. Up till a month ago, and with the exception of that evening and this, she had never touched him, even accidentally. It’s as if she’d had a force field around her that prevented her touching anyone, or anyone touching her. Under the social shell, the Snow Queen.

But that is all very odd too. Normally, from all the variegated research that he has done – largely into child-rearing, so he could do the best possible job with and for Alexis – that sort of lack of desire for contact and lack of contact implies a cold, unaffectionate (and sometimes abusive) household. Yet when he’d told her his conclusions about her history, he’d got the very clear impression that, up till what he is now absolutely bone-deep certain was her mother’s murder, she had grown up in a happy, loving household. Maybe he’d been misled about that, but he simply cannot see how she could be as empathetic with the families of the victims as she is, had she not had that loving background. Maybe the trauma of the untimely death had done it. Maybe there was something else, though right now he has no idea what that might be. (It never occurs to him to remember, still less connect, Beckett’s instant recognition of alcoholism or that, at the time, he had been less than wholly convinced by her explanation of that recognition with his current train of thought.)

Anyway, enough thinking. There is coffee, to warm his chilly blood, and Beckett, to warm him generally. And if he, much bulkier, is chilled right through, how much more must she be? And, he thinks, she wants affection. Possibly. Right then. Time to test the theory – very carefully. He likes living, and he wants to continue to do so with all appendages attached. He’d look most peculiar with only one ear, or no nose.

He drops his hand very slightly to rest around, not on, Beckett’s shoulder, where the implicit suggestion that it carries is that it would be nicest to curl in against him; which suggestion is backed up, after a second or two in which he does not become maimed, dying or actually dead, by the lightest possible pressure of his fingers to encourage her in.
He’s less surprised than he would have been a month ago when she does lean in. It lasts for all of five seconds, until she leans forward, adds what appears to be half-a-pound of cinnamon, at least a half-pint of creamer, (vanilla, by the smell) and then a sizeable dash of nutmeg to her coffee. Her mug must be a Tardis, he thinks, and wonders where he can buy, beg, borrow or steal one. He then repatriates his arm and himself adds creamer and a small dose of cinnamon to his own coffee. (He’d used to like nutmeg in it, till his first marriage collapsed.)

“How much spice did you put in there, Beckett?”

“I like spice.” She only realises what she’s said on Castle’s indrawn breath and suddenly sparkling eyes. He never can – and he clearly isn’t even trying to – resist temptation, and she’s left him a gateway the size of the Brooklyn Bridge – lengthways – to be tempted. It wasn’t even deliberate. A delicate line of pink draws itself over her pale cheeks.

“You like it spicy?”

“Coffee,” she says discouragingly.

“Nothing else?” His arm has sneaked back around her. His fingers are insinuating tiny patterns on her shoulder, which are encouraging her to lean in against his chest again. The gesture doesn’t match his words, which are Castle-normal flirtation and innuendo, whereas the fingers are soft and gently persuasive. She succumbs to the possibility of affection inherent in his fingers, and leans back against his arm and slightly inward to his chest.

“Wouldn’t you like to know?” she ripostes: normal shut-it-down technique in action. It usually works.

“Yes,” states Castle extremely baldly. Beckett’s mouth drops open in shock. That is not how the game is played between them. He is not supposed to be transparently and blatantly clear about what he wants. She becomes aware that he hasn’t finished talking. “but I’m sure I’ll find out eventually anyway. So it’s fine that you don’t want to tell me now.” The very strong implication is You will. Possibly suffixed by soon. And he’s still talking. “I’ve got a much better idea for right now.”

Really, Castle? That line is so lame it requires a wheelchair. It’s perfectly clear what he’s about to try. She leans away from him again.

“Sure you do,” she drawls disbelievingly, edged by annoyance.

“You’ll like it,” Castle grins.

“Sure I won’t.” The border of annoyance on her words widens.

“You liked it plenty last time.” Oh, for heaven’s sake. Could he be any more obvious without starting to take his clothes off? She’s amazed that he isn’t already undoing the buttons on his shirt. Or on hers, for that matter. Or dragging her back to his cave. Some of these lines need carbon dating to establish their age.

“So will you set it up or shall I?”

“You might as well,” Beckett says crossly. “Seeing as you’re the one who’s making such a big fuss about it. Let me know when you’re ready.” The next thing she’s expecting is an attempt to kiss her, which will result in his ears being amputated without benefit of scalp or anaesthetic.

She is therefore completely blindsided when he looks about him, spots his prey, extricates her lovely new game and efficiently sets it up on the coffee table in front of them.
“There we are,” he says happily and innocently. His uncontrollable, wicked smirk makes it absolutely and infuriatingly obvious that he had quite deliberately misled her. She glares, and when that has no effect, growls. The smirk grows wider.

“One colour each, or two?” Castle grins, the underlay of evil mirth still wholly apparent.

“One. I’m still getting used to this game.”

Okay, so he thoroughly mischievously led her down a false trail, but actually, here, now, tonight, she likes this idea better. It’s another matter that doesn’t match his words but is very congruent with his fingers; which, she notes, are still around her shoulder and still encouraging her inward. It occurs to her that if she ignores the over-heated nature of his conversation and simply believes the message contained in his actions, then she can continue the calming serenity of the earlier part of the evening. She leans back in, and this time Castle repositions his arm so that she is, gently, a little more wrapped in. Hmmm.

Castle still wins. However, Beckett gives him a considerable run for his money, and although she doesn’t forget to say Sorry! every time she succeeds in squishing one of his men and sending it back to the start, the tone of satisfied triumphalism tells a very different story. Each time she does, Castle pouts; each time it’s her piece returned, she grumbles and he grins.

By the end of the game, they’re on the third pot of coffee and Beckett is firmly snuggled up to Castle. It makes moving the men a touch awkward, but that slight disadvantage is firmly counterbalanced and indeed substantially outweighed by the major advantages that the position brings: chief amongst which is that she feels warm, comfortable and cosseted: of all of which this winter season has left her much in need. She emits a tiny, contented noise and curls closer, which act is swiftly followed by Castle clasping her more tightly. It feels good, even if she did lose the game.

She looks up and smiles. Castle smiles back.

“That was fun,” she says. “I’ll beat you next time, though.” Castle shrugs, unbothered.

“Bring it on. At your disposal, any time you want to try again.” He acquires an expression of realisation. Beckett is instantly suspicious. “I won. Don’t I get a prize for winning?” he asks hopefully. She rolls her eyes in resignation.

“What are you, five? Do you really want a prize for winning when I’ve only played three times and you’ve played – what? – three hundred?” Castle looks plaintively at her and produces a sad little-boy face that goes straight to some previously undiscovered area of Beckett’s brain, which promptly makes a land-grab for the well-travelled areas of her brain previously responsible for common sense.

“But I won,” he points out, as if that’s a clinching argument all on its own. It’s not. She’ll shut this down, too.

“Okay, I’ll buy you a packet of M&Ms tomorrow. There. Happy now you’ll have your prize?” Her tone is rather substantially less snarky than her words. She’s too comfortable to be wholly snarky. Beckett is snarky. Right now she feels warmly not-quite-Beckett.

“Well,” Castle murmurs in a low, growly voice that does very strange things to her stomach, “it wasn’t quite the prize I was thinking of, but it sounds good.” This time, having been comprehensively fooled earlier, Beckett refuses to rise to the bait he is casting in front of her. Instead, she drinks her coffee, makes a horrible face as she discovers it to be nastily tepid, and puts the mug down with a noise of disgust, enhanced when she notices Castle’s empty mug already there. She entirely fails to realise that putting the mug on the tray next to Castle’s means not only that Castle currently has both arms free but that she has just laid down her defences: being the risk that her coffee might spill.

When she looks back up at Castle, he’s already leaning down slowly, intent written in every line of his face and his darkened eyes. His arm has tightened around her, though she’s sure that if she makes the slightest movement of discontent he will stop. All she needs to do is not stop him. No further decisions needed. Maybe this evening she’ll receive what she really wanted, the comfort and soft consolation of being able to lay her load down and be cared for by someone else. Who’d have thought that it would be irritating, sexy, smart-mouthed, jackass Castle who might be able to give her what she wants most? Even if it’s only once, that’s a whole lot better than the last couple of years. The whole evening since they left Castle’s loft has made her more relaxed and soothed than at any time since she broke up with Will.

She nibbles automatically on her lower lip. She might as well, she thinks stupidly, have stripped naked. Castle swoops down on her mouth and sets about claiming what he clearly perceives to be the correct variety of prize. And since this time he’s not only made a decision but, clearly and thankfully, doesn’t seem to expect her to do anything more complicated than consent and respond, she lets the hard gloss shell of Beckett fall away and becomes, at least in her own head, not-quite-Kat but certainly someone who’s a lot closer to Kat than to Beckett. She rearranges herself into a more comfortable and, not incidentally, accessible alignment and ensures that she is a full participant in proceedings. She can do that excellently well without needing to take any decisions beyond Yes or No.

For this one evening, she dimly realises, since the start of her shopping trip, she has been able to lay – and more, has laid – her burden aside.

Castle, having provided himself with considerable amusement from the unusual success of his mischievous misleading of Beckett, had then spent the game with three-quarters of his attention on the board (with an occasional increase to full concentration any time at which it looked like Beckett might win) and the other quarter on unobtrusively bringing her closer and closer, mainly physically but also, as the game had progressed, emotionally. In fact, he hasn’t ever seen her like this: even a month ago she’d been quiet and miserable. Tonight, she seems happy. As happy as he’s ever seen her, that is. Beckett’s life seems to be remarkably and distressingly devoid of joy. He thinks that he can, and should, try to solve that: certainly temporarily and then more permanently. Well, for a while, anyway. Permanence is a long way ahead of where he’s at, right now. (But it sits at the back of his head and niggles at him, rather than disappearing as such ridiculous ideas should.) It’s hardly as if Beckett’s throwing herself into his arms, either. In fact, the only way she’d got there is because he pulled her there. So it’s fine.

He deliberately exaggerates his dismay when she sends his men back to their start, and his triumph when he returns the favour, and gradually the Beckett he knows thins and melts somewhat and she relaxes and smiles and laughs. (and once he’d swear there was a giggle) It’s all thoroughly satisfactory, and becomes even more so when he wins. He likes winning against (his mind insists on trying to replace against with over) Beckett. Who is currently not-Beckett. It occurs to him that he deserves a prize for winning – well, he doesn’t exactly deserve it because she’s barely played and he’s been playing it for years but suddenly he wants to tease her and make her smile some more. It’s good for her, smiling. She should do it more often: not her precinct sardonic version but a genuinely happy smile.

So he winds her up about wanting a prize and she snarks but not nearly as edgily as he’d expect her to, and then promises to buy him M&Ms the next day. Well, he’ll hold her to that, but right now he’d much rather hold her to him. He’s ready and moving when she finally puts that damn coffee cup, which has been the last obstacle for ten minutes, down. And rather as he had already surmised, granted that she’s given consent, she lets him lead the way and kiss her as he chooses. Still not passive, though. Definitely not. It’s just that once again she isn’t leading, isn’t driving. Once again, she’s curled in and soft and open and very definitely not Beckett. Possibly not yet Kat either, but a lot closer.

He keeps on kissing her, demanding her response to that but not making further advances for now. Kat, he is sure, wants affection. Affection doesn’t preclude excellent sex, of course – but right here now he wants Kat to come back, and his best chance to find her is to major on affection. Besides which, and most unusually, he’s enjoying it as it is, rather than planning the move to the next base. How odd. It was the same the first time. That was odd, too. Not his usual style at all. He shrugs that thought away and goes back to kissing, exploring her mouth and discovering that he’s addicted to it. Or possibly addicted to her.

Beckett is rapidly falling into the comfort of being simply Kat, even if Castle will never know that. Her confidence that she can be Kat tonight, though, has suddenly been dented, since Castle has unaccountably and unfairly stopped. Oh. Oh, okay. Not stopped. Instead he’s moved round to – ooh – just the right spot on her neck which always makes her wriggle and that’s an interestingly determined reaction to a wriggle. She moves slightly to open the curve of her neck, which has the useful side-effect of widening the gap at the top of her shirt. She likes this, even though she could also stand him returning to the more forceful kisses of the previous occasion, before they’d gone to bed. That’s better, he has. It’s as if he’d heard her thought. Beckett-wanting-to-be-Kat wants petted. Cosseted. And very conveniently, that’s what’s happening. No hard-edged lust, finally no need to take charge or control or command. Unconsciously, she cuddles closer and emits a soft, happy purring noise.

Castle hears the purr with delight. Beckett’s back to soft and relaxed and pettable and this time he is not going to spoil it by mentioning Kat. Kats, cats, and all forms of feline, strokable, purring kittenish-Becketts by whatever name are much better dealt with by actions rather than words. Certainly for now. Words, maybe, later. Much later.

His eye, and very shortly thereafter his mouth, is drawn to the gap at the neckline of Beckett’s shirt. It could, he thinks, be usefully made just a little larger. He undoes one single button to achieve this. Tonight is now about slow, gentle affection and definitely not about flaring hard-edged sex. He thinks that he might just enjoy that too. Well. No might about it. He is enjoying it. So, clearly, is Kat. This is Kat. His Kat.

He kisses her deeply and she purrs some more. That’s addictive, too. He could become addicted to his Kat making that noise very, very quickly. Or maybe he is already.

It occurs to him that calling her Kat out loud will be fatal, quite possibly literally. He’ll keep that pet name to himself, certainly for now. Maybe in due course he’ll call her it, when he’s discovered why she’s so very closed-off normally and can be sure that it won’t upset her; but even then he’ll keep it quite private between them, a name that only he uses, that only he can use.
Eventually, half-drunk on the intoxicating effects of kissing Kat, (definitely Kat. His Kat.) Castle realises that it is almost midnight and he should have gone home hours ago. He reluctantly peels himself away from their mutually enjoyable make-out session and explains.

“I have to go home.” But he doesn’t move: instead he cuddles her close again. She feels so very right tucked against him; she fits. It’s surprising: okay, so the very first moment he’d seen her he’d wanted her; but however much he hides it under thick layers of double-edged comments, blatant innuendo, sheer irritating-ness and barely leashed flaming desire; he is, now (it had taken around ten days, till he worked out part of her story and raw lust changed to something else) deeply intrigued by the woman behind the cop; and, though he hasn’t quite realised it himself yet, is already feeling considerably more for her than simple sexual attraction, however heated.

Here in his arms, she fits. The right size, the right mind: fitting into him as neatly as the two halves of an old indenture would match. But some of the zigzags are still folded back, not yet matched. Her secrets. Her story. His story has largely (at least as an adult) been played out in the bright lights of the paparazzi flashguns and the columns of page six: all PR is good PR, from his viewpoint, when it comes to selling books. She’s a fan: she’ll probably know it all. Some of it is even true. But here, now, that’s not relevant, because she fits.

Still, as little as he likes it, he has to go. Reluctantly, he releases his grip, his hands attempting to delay the point of separation, lingering on her slim waist. Her legs swing away: he has unwanted freedom to stand, to fetch and assume his coat, to leave. He doesn’t want to leave her: leave her alone in this smart, joyless apartment, a living space with little sign of life, a residence that’s not a home. But yet she said that she’d spend Christmas with her father, so surely there will be light and life and laughter then. Surely it will be so.

He shakes off the moment of depression, the Ghost of Christmas Yet To Come, retrieves his outerwear from where he’d hung it, and notes with disfavour that his cheery Christmas scarf, decorated with fat Santas and drunken red-nosed reindeer, is still damp, clammy as he wraps it round his neck. Nearly-Kat has risen to see him out, and with stunning self-control he confines himself to a dropped kiss on her hair, and refrains from telling – not asking – her to get her coat and come home with him, to somewhere that can – he can – bring comfort and joy to her bleak life.

Her door closes behind him with a hollow sound by which, he muses fancifully, like Cinderella’s midnight chimes, Kat turns back into Beckett as soon as it closes behind her as she leaves.

He’s far closer to the truth than he realises.

Beckett readies herself for bed in a state of unusual contentment, buoyed on the almost-unique sensation of having spent an evening freed of the weight of her cares and culminating in the strangely reassuring position of being held close without expectations: where she need not be the driver; desire, oh very much so, but softly, slowly. Affection, not simply lust. She falls asleep with a smile still on her lips.

Even when Beckett wakes, the unaccustomed atmosphere of happiness hasn’t dissipated. She even – finally – purchases an small pack of tasteful Christmas cards and spends a few moments scrawling suitable messages in them: her father, Lanie, the boys. Not the Captain – that’s brown-nosing and it’s not the tradition. She looks at the remaining two cards, and considers, chewing her lip. Finally she scribbles a banal message of seasonal good wishes, conveying no personal sentiments.
whatever, heads it generically to The Castle Family, and signs it with an indecipherable squiggle in which only a B can be discerned as a recognisable letter.

She addresses the envelope neatly in printed capitals and leaves it, with the others, in her desk drawer for later. She is not entirely comfortable with this idea, though she feels she ought to make an effort. After all, Castle’s intervention had allowed her to purchase a gift for her father that she’s sure he’ll like, and then have a peaceful evening.

Her indecisiveness is disturbed by a new case. She shoves all the envelopes in her coat pocket and gets moving in the general direction of Alphabet City. In a dingy walk-up bedsit is a twenty-something, who’s been stabbed and then left to bleed out. The driver’s licence provides a name, Josiah Carver, and his unlocked phone gives them a variety of friends and – ah ha! – family and best guess for a girlfriend.

Castle rolls up to Alphabet City and, soon bored with this banal death, wanders round the bedsit as annoyingly as a fretful five-year old, and almost as usefully. By the fourth occasion of him fiddling with things Beckett is thoroughly fed up and has stopped trying to call him to order. If he misses the ride back to the precinct it will be his own fault. However, just as Lanie issues orders for the corpse to be taken back to the morgue, turns to Beckett and repeats her mantra (always the same words): I need to get him on the slab; just as Beckett turns to Lanie and speaks, he bounds back up to them.

“You off your head? No, not now. Wait till I’m cleaned up and got you some results. Anyway, I got yours back at the morgue.”

Beckett looks a little chagrined at her own poor timing. “When will you have some results?”

“Dunno yet. Call me at the end of the day if I haven’t called you already. We can have a Christmas drink after.” The boys wander up as soon as someone mentions having a drink, looking hopeful. Castle looks equally excited. “Girls only,” Lanie says firmly. Their faces fall. Beckett takes pity – well, sort of pity – upon them.

“You can have something else instead.” It’s like feeding baby birds. They all turn to her with shiny-bright expectant faces. She produces the envelopes and distributes them: interestingly awaiting the results.

Esposito is first to rip his envelope open and discover the card. His shocked face is really quite amusing.

“What the hell, Beckett?” Ryan is merely silently dumbfounded. Oddly, Castle is suddenly saying nothing at all. She’d thought he was about to speak, before Espo got in first. He is, however, now listening very intently.

“It’s a Christmas card, Espo. Surely you’ve had one before?” Esposito glares.

“A ‘course I have. But I ain’t never had one from you, Beckett.”

“Nor have I,” interjects Ryan.

“I have,” Lanie says smugly. “Every year.”

Castle still says nothing at all. Beckett can feel him looming behind her. She has the sinking feeling that this is going to raise more questions than she wants to answer. (So that would be more than no questions at all, then. She asks questions. She doesn’t answer them.)

“So why this year?” Espo asks aggressively.

“Five-year anniversary of the team,” says Beckett lightly. “Thought we should celebrate.” Espo looks dyspeptically at her, and turns his glare up a notch. It has no effect at all. It never does.

“If you don’t want it, Espo, there’s a trashcan over there,” points out Beckett.

“I never said that.” Esposito takes a firmer grip on the card, as if he might be deprived of it. “I’m gonna frame it. Written proof that you do know what Christmas is.” Beckett sees the abyss opening right under her feet. Espo carries straight on dropping her into it. “Bet you’re still taking the Christmas Day shift though.”

“So?” says Beckett. “Someone has to.”

“Someone don’t gotta do it every single year,” Espo says very firmly. “When did you last not take it? Huh?”

Beckett becomes painfully aware that Castle is now looming even more obviously. He still hasn’t said a word, nor has he opened his card. She firmly cuts this discussion off, from the bottom of the hole she’s got herself into.

“Okay. We got work to do.”

“You always got work to do,” Espo mutters, almost under his breath. It is, regrettably, painfully obvious that Castle has heard it. “The rest of us got lives to lead.”

“Lanie, call me as soon as you’ve got anything,” Beckett says briskly. “Ryan, you see if you can get any camera footage. Espo, you start canvassing. Ryan can join you when he’s done. Get the uniforms on it, and get that beat cop to give us all the story too.”

“What are you going to do?” Ryan asks.

“I’m going to talk to the family, then the girlfriend.” She doesn’t need to assign Castle. He’ll follow her whether she wants it or not.

Unsurprisingly, he’s right on her tail as she goes to her cruiser. She can feel his questions burning holes in her coat. He barely waits for her to get in and close the car door – she certainly hasn’t got her seat belt done – before he starts.

“You didn’t say you were working Christmas Day.” It’s not – quite – an accusation. Beckett’s hackles rise as she starts the car.

“Someone has to,” she repeats wearily.

“You volunteered.” How’d he work that out? “You volunteer for it every year.” This is all entirely irrelevant. She steers in the direction of 2nd Avenue.

“So?”

“So you said you were going to your father’s for Christmas.” And that is definitely an accusation.

“I am.” Her voice is cold and remote. It doesn’t invite any further interrogation. It is entirely and distressingly ineffective.
“When?”

“What possible business is that of yours? But straight after shift, since you’re so interested.” She is furiously, bitterly angry that he’s questioning – and none too subtly disagreeing – with her choices as to how she spends her Christmas. She buries her fury in her hard, icy shell and doesn’t let it out. Emotions don’t help, and she doesn’t need to waste them on Castle when he’s in this mood. She doesn’t owe him any explanations of that choice at all. And, she remembers, he’s here for research. She doesn’t want her past, or her father, researched.

“So, this case,” she starts.

“Forget the case, Beckett.” Castle sounds annoyed. Too bad. This is simply not his business. She pulls over. “What?” he says, shocked.

“Out.”

“What?”

“Out. I have work to do. You’re not helping with the case, which is what you’re supposed to be here for. So go home. Come back when you’re ready to think about the real issue rather than irrelevant diversions.” Castle stays sitting like a stump in the passenger seat.

“No.”

“Okay, sit there, then.” She switches off the engine, undoes her seatbelt and opens her door. She has completely lost her temper, and she really does not care that she’s acting like a five-year old by storming off in a cloud of fury.

“Where are you going?”

“To tell the family.” She steps out the cruiser and slams her door shut behind her. Then she reopens it, briefly: throws the keys in his lap. “You can drive it now. You always wanted to.” She’s summoned a cab and is gone before he’s untangled himself.

He has no idea where the family can be found, because he was bored and not paying attention in the walk-up. That had been a mistake. He takes the driver’s seat, makes major readjustments to the seat and mirrors, (crashing Beckett’s cruiser is not a good plan) drives it back round to the Twelfth and parks it neatly. It’s not nearly as much fun as he’d thought driving her car would be. Then again, he’d rather thought that she’d be in the car with him when he did. When he takes the keys up to her desk she’s not there, nor does it look as if she’s been there. She must have gone straight to the family. He’d have thought she’d have gone back to the Twelfth first. He considers waiting, and then considers that he’s overstepped enough today.

In the short drive back it has become borne upon him that he had no right whatsoever to question Beckett’s shift pattern or Christmas Day choices, and also that – for once – she’d been quite justified in handing him his ass for doing so. He’d simply been so appalled by her – well, not lie, but he’d thought she’d lied and that had flicked his switches – and utter disregard of the holiday that he hadn’t thought before he opened his mouth.

He decides that discretion is by far the better part of valour for the rest of the day, and though he would have liked to follow Beckett around to the interviews and ask his own questions and generally assist, he doesn’t trust himself not to say something stupid. More stupid. So he goes home, uncomfortably conscious that he’s lost every inch and more of ground that he might have gained yesterday.
“Who the hell are you?”

“Detective Kate Beckett, NYPD”

“Nuthin’ to say to you.” The door starts to shut in her face. Mr and Mrs Carver are not reacting well to a cop showing up on their doorstep. If she wasn’t bearing such bad news, she’d leave and pass that information on to the beat cops. Just in case it might be relevant.

“It’s about Josiah.” The door stops moving.

“Joe? What ‘bout Joe? What’s that boy done now?”

“I’m sorry to tell you” – she sees them get it before she’s said anything more – “that Joe was stabbed earlier today.”

“Guess you’d better come in, then.”

Beckett’s trained eyes assess the small apartment in a single comprehensive glance as she starts down her questioning. She doesn’t get much out the parents: no enemies (she doesn’t believe that); no misbehaviour (she comprehensively disbelieves that); no knowledge of what he might be doing to get stabbed. (She does believe that. This pair may know a lot about a lot of things, but it doesn’t seem like they know much about their son since he moved out. She’ll get more from the girlfriend.)

She’s no more than an easy ten minute walk from the precinct. Still fuelled on fury, it takes her six. She isn’t going to be questioned about her choices, still less her reasoning, by a ride-along nuisance.

She reaches her desk in a still-unshed flurry of annoyance, clacking heels warning off any smart comments, and drops the victim’s mobile on her desk, noticing the presence of her car keys and the absence of Castle. By the time she’s got a cup of horrible but caffeinated hot liquid that claims, in defiance of truth-in-advertising laws, to be coffee, she’s refocused on the crime. She puts the numbers through the database herself and gets the call list. Just because Ryan normally does it doesn’t mean she’s forgotten how. Then she drops a note to the local uniforms. When she’s done that she decides that she’s given it enough time to be relatively calm and takes herself off to interview the girlfriend.

The girlfriend lives back over on the other side of the precinct. She turns out to be a bleached-highlight blonde, whose attributes are only too obvious in her skin-tight t-shirt and painted-on jeans. She is predictably and volubly emotional. Beckett thinks extremely cynically that they’ve probably been together a month. Her assumptions take a sideways knock that she admits she entirely deserves when it turns out that she’s been with Joe for two years and they were planning to get engaged soon – “At Christmas, we were going to have a big family dinner: we wanted to do it at Thanksgiving but Joe hadn’t had the overtime so he wanted to wait so he could rack up the hours and the pay in the run up to Christmas. He said he wanted to get me the ring I deserved…” Her voice dissolves into snuffling tears.

“What was his job?”

“He managed a warehouse in Brooklyn. It shipped machine parts. He just got more hours this summer so we could get married…” She dissolves again.

“Do you know why he’d be in a walk-up in Alphabet City?”

“That’s where Mick lives.”

“Mick?”
“Joe’s pal. They would’ve been going to watch the game together, prob’ly meeting there before they went to a bar.”

Beckett takes Mick’s full name and address, which indeed matches the address where the corpse was found, and leaves the girlfriend to her unhappiness.

After Beckett’s finished with cross-matching Mick to the phone records, and having sent Ryan and Espo to interview him while she does, it’s the end of the day. Well, technically it had been the end of the day an hour ago and she should have called Lanie. Oh well, Lanie doesn’t clock-watch either. She taps the number and sure enough Lanie is still in the morgue.

“What do we got, Lanie?”

“Not a whole awful lot, Kate. You wanna come over and have a look?”

“Sure. I’ll be there in twenty.”

She shows up in the morgue in short order, and perches on a clean steel autopsy table. There is indeed little to see. Beckett harrumphs disgruntledly, and turns to happier thoughts than the lack of clues.

“D’you still want a drink now we’re done?”

“Yes. I want cold drinks and hot men, not cold men and hot drinks.” Beckett refrains from any comment. It doesn’t stop Lanie. “What about you?”

“Cold drinks sounds good.” There’s an expectant silence. “Lanie…” Lanie mutters, just below audible level. “What was that?”

“You could do with a hot man too.”

“No thanks. Seen you weeping into your wine enough. Romance is dead.”

“Sez you,” Lanie says bluntly. “Just ‘cause you ain’t looking doesn’t mean it’s not out there.” She pauses. “Or sitting right by your desk.”

Beckett shrugs. “Maybe Santa Claus will drop one off on Christmas morning.”

“The effort you don’t put in to finding a live one, he might as well drop off a multipack of batteries.” Beckett chokes. Lanie is outrageous.

“Let’s go get a drink,” she says hurriedly, before Lanie can carry on. She wouldn’t put it past Lanie to give her a very inappropriate present, at this rate.

“Sure. And while we’re drinking, you can tell me all about working with Writer-Boy. That man is cute. You should take advantage of him.” She grins lasciviously. “All sorts of advantages. I’m sure he’d like to take advantage of you.” Her grin widens. “I’ve seen him eyeing up your handcuffs.” It becomes a snigger. “And your skinny ass.”

“Drink, Lanie,” Beckett says very firmly. It’s wholly ruined by her scarlet cheeks. She really doesn’t want to think about all the ways Castle could – did – appreciate her body. Nor does she want to think about how he went and spoiled it just when she was thinking that he could at least provide the chance to lay her load down occasionally. She doesn’t need criticism of her choices. That doesn’t help her cope. Fortunately Lanie attributes Beckett’s blushes to her outspoken commentary and doesn’t ask difficult questions. Well, no more than usual, anyway.
When they’ve found a bar and a bottle of wine, Lanie takes another tack. “How come you’re distributing Christmas cards like confetti?”

“What, four cards is confetti these days?”

“It is for you. You never do cards. Well, one for me and one for your dad doesn’t count. What’s changed this year?”

“Told you, five year anniversary.”

“Castle hasn’t been around for five months let alone five years, but you gave him a card.”

“Couldn’t leave him out once I’d given the boys one. That would have been rude.”

“Since when have you worried about upsetting Writer-Boy? You shove him away all the time. You should pull him in and kiss him. That’d solve your Saturday night problem. Though so would a skirt and some lipstick.”

“Lanie, I’m fine. I’m not looking for some Saturday-night stand.” Lanie growls at her, much to Beckett’s surprise.

“You are an idiot, girl. You should be out having fun, not sitting around fretting and thinking about murder. You should kiss Castle under the mistletoe.” That’s a remarkably restrained comment, for Lanie. “And then you should drag him home by his hair and jump his bones.” Ah. That’s not restrained at all.

“Don’t wanna.” She doesn’t. She’s not spending time with someone who can’t respect her decisions. That won’t lighten her load. She doesn’t need to be made to feel guilty. More guilty. Sometimes there are no good choices, and all you can do is live with the choices you’ve made. She turns conversation to the perennial topics of films, clothes and holidays and keeps it there till the wine is done – Lanie, as ever, has the bulk of the bottle – and the evening is over.
Mistletoe and wine

Saturday morning finds Beckett in the precinct, studying the limited information on her murder board and considering the best leads to follow. Esposito and Ryan had discovered that Joe had got into an argument in front of a Canal Street stall, but camera footage shows it isn’t Mick with whom he was arguing. The boys have gone back out to bring the stallholder in. Rather them than she: it’s snowing again.

Interrogation throws up that the stall holder had been suffering a spate of shoplifting and is professionally pissed off with all Christmas shoppers, teenagers, and indeed every person under Heaven, no doubt including Santa Claus. When he tries to apply his attitude to Beckett she hits straight back and instead of collecting in Christmas takings the man will spend his afternoon with a police sketch artist describing the other man who had been with Joe. By the time the sketch is done and she’s chased through every possible line of thought it’s well past dark, it’s still snowing, and it is very definitely time to go home. It had been time to go home hours ago, but there’s nothing to do in her apartment except solitary reading.

She picks up a ready meal on the way and some soda. She doesn’t often have alcohol at home: only if she’s expecting Lanie. She almost never drinks alone: twice only, in ten years. That way lies disaster, and the memories. She doesn’t need either of those. She makes her solitary dinner and drinks her solitary soda and watches a solitary movie in preference to reading a solitary book.

Around about nine there’s a knock on the door. When she opens the door there is Castle, with a box in his hands and a sheepish expression.

“I’m sorry. About yesterday, I mean. I shouldn’t have questioned your decisions.”

Beckett’s look is not inviting. It says very clearly no, you shouldn’t have.

“So I brought you something to make up for it.” She raises an eyebrow. “Mince pies. And brandy butter. Home-made. Well, the brandy butter. Not the mince pies. They came from Myers of Keswick.” He becomes aware that he is babbling and forcibly stops. She steps out of the doorway and gestures him in.

“What is a mince pie, Castle? And why on earth would I want to put brandy or butter on meat?”

Castle puts the box down on her kitchen counter and starts peering at her oven and pressing buttons. “Have you got a baking tray?”

“Huh?”

“A baking tray. They need warmed up. They’re not nearly as nice if you don’t heat them up.”

“Castle, what are these?” Oh. That didn’t sound like cuddly soft Kat. That sounds like irritated Beckett.

“Mince pies.” She looks wholly blank. “A British thing. They’re full of fruit – raisins and mixed peel and a sweet sauce – and a little bit of alcohol. Sweet pies. No meat at all. There used to be when they were invented but not now. You have them with brandy butter – butter sweetened and whipped with brandy. Or rum. Or I suppose you could use any sort of spirits.” Beckett looks slightly more receptive.

“Okay, so now that you’ve invaded my kitchen and kidnapped my oven in order to roast pies that sound as if they’re meat but aren’t, with a sauce that sounds rather like heart-failure-in-a-dish, when I’ve already had dinner, how about explaining?” But she’s smiling.

“They’re a Christmas tradition in Britain. I had them on a book tour once. No-one likes them here.” He pouts. “Alexis won’t have them anywhere near her, and my mother claims they go straight to her liver, though I can’t imagine that her liver would be hurt by anything short of weapons-grade plutonium.” He pauses and regroups. “Anyway. I thought that you might like them, so I brought them over.”

“And the butter?”

“Brandy butter. Oh. Well.” He colours very slightly. “I made it. It’s traditional, too. It’s really easy. I could give you the recipe, or make some for you to take to your father’s.”

There’s an infinitesimal stiffening in Beckett’s shoulders. “That’s sweet of you, Castle, but we’ve got it covered, thanks.” She hands him a baking tray. “I guess I’d better try one.”

Castle files the small reaction for later and looks around Beckett’s apartment. It’s no more Christmas-decorated than it had been two days ago. He doesn’t have the impression that it’s going to become decorated between now and Christmas Day.

“Don’t you have a tree?”

“Nope.” She looks at him. “No point, when I won’t be here.” Castle ignores that bait – the challenge in her eyes is obvious – and slides two pies on to the tray and into the oven with smooth efficiency.

And then he turns round to Beckett, who is standing far too closely behind him for resistance to his urges to be anything other than useless, looking curiously at the remaining pies and clearly planning to poke one to see what happens, and with the same smooth efficiency draws her into his arms and kisses her. She gives in to it without a single protest by word or deed and when there is no resistance he takes charge of proceedings and starts to explore and investigate and take her mouth more deeply, holds her closer until she drops the shell and softens into him and accepts his lead. He thinks she needs to relax, and he knows how to achieve it. He wants to find Kat again: to work out what triggers the need to be Kat, who simply wants comfort and affection and not to be in charge. Curiosity has always been his besetting sin.

He runs a firm hand over her back to encourage her to curve closer, settling it in the small of her back, and continues to provide the searching, forceful kisses that she had liked so much. Eventually he stops kissing and simply holds her, stroking her hair and still keeping her close.

“That’s more like it,” he says with satisfaction. “You taste even better than the mince pies.” There’s an indignant squawk below his chin. “What?” He tips her face upward and kisses her deeply again. “Definitely. Conclusive proof.”

He tows her towards the couch and notes with some interest that she still isn’t arguing. Seems he’s forgiven. Next time, he thinks, he’ll be more careful. Something that he simply does not understand is behind all this: the occasional odd reaction, the solitary life, the lack of celebration, the change to her personality that takes place in her own space. Being careful, however, does not preclude providing kisses, affection, and generally taking the lead. It’s particularly convenient that what Beckett, in this interestingly different guise, may like matches rather well with what he likes to provide. Not that he didn’t also enjoy the fast, hard results of Beckett taking charge, but he didn’t like the feeling of being second-best it left him with and he is determined that he will not be regarded as in some way second-best or being settled for again.
Beckett is confused. It’s not a feeling she particularly appreciates, especially at home. Nothing at home confuses her. She eats, she sleeps, she reads or watches TV or a movie, she surfs the net. Insofar as she ever does, she relaxes: sometimes she plays her guitar quietly, she does yoga. This apartment is her still centre, a place where there are no distractions and no memories. She has no photos, and her pictures are abstract: soothing swirls of colour that calm the mind and demand little. The only memories are in the dedications pages of the books that line the walls, and she doesn’t look at those.

This is her sanctuary and her haven: her hiding place; few people come here. Her father, though she prefers to visit his home; Lanie, though she prefers that they go out. And now spoilt, sexy Rick Castle, who turns out to be interestingly capable of providing something she needs. If only he can do so without researching, without asking any difficult questions about her history, without asking about her choices, without ever asking Why?

Here he is, bouncing into her quiet apartment with some peculiar form of food that he’s insisting she tries, forcing Christmas spirit on to her, and now simply pulling her into his arms and under his lips and kissing her as if there’s no question at all but that she’ll allow it; not asking for decisions or demands, but only that she consent and enjoy where he takes her. A chance to forget is on offer: an evening where she can lay down the cases and lay down the memories and rest from the road. Think of it as a Christmas present.

Her soft contentment is disturbed by the oven timer chiming. Castle makes a noise that’s an interesting combination of happy expectation and irritation and lets go of Beckett in favour of dealing with his pies.

“Where do you keep plates and cutlery, Beckett?” She unfolds herself and rapidly sets out two plates, two forks and a spoon to deal with this brandy butter stuff.

“This better be worth it, Castle.” Castle smiles wickedly at her.

“If you don’t like the taste I’m sure I can find something else that tastes good.”

“I’ve only got water, or soda,” she deflects.

“Water will be fine.” But he wonders the more. She’s perfectly happy to have a social drink, but she has none at home?

He slides the pies on to the plates and offers her the butter: she looks very suspiciously at it but takes a dollop and sits at the table. Castle looks mildly unimpressed by that – clearly he’d been hoping for some snuggling on the couch, but she has the feeling that these little pies will collapse into a pile of crumbs as soon as she puts a fork into them and picking pastry out the cushions isn’t her preferred form of entertainment.

The pie oozes unctuously over her tongue, the brandy butter that slathered it oiling its path. It’s delicious. Delightful.

And abruptly familiar. She falls off the seat away from the table and into her bathroom without a word of explanation or apology. She feels as if she’s going to throw up. She presses her forehead to the cold tiles around the mirror and can’t stop the memory slicing through her.

A year after. Christmas time, and they were trying to pretend everything was normal, everything was fine, even though it hadn’t been normal or fine for almost a year, even though her father was already slurried at noon, even though she was tense and unhappy and waiting for the real misery to start. But families are together at Christmas, so that’s what they did. Pretending everything was fine: a small tree, lopsidedly decorated; tinsel, hung drunkenly from pictures, a holly wreath lurching from the door. But pretending everything was fine. After all, it’s Christmas time: there’s no need to be afraid; at Christmas time, they let in light and they banish shade. If only.

They’d eaten Christmas dinner. Well. She had eaten, though the food was all from a good store: she’d had no time to cook and her father neither ability nor sobriety: everything was ready-made and required only reheating. Her father had drunk most of his meal, and by dessert was on the verge of maudlin weeping over memories of times past, already starting on the road of Do you remember? Do you remember how your mom made chestnut stuffing? Do you remember when we got your first bicycle? Do you remember last year when your mom was here? Why isn’t she here now? Who did this to us, Katie? Why haven’t they found them? Why? Why?

So many whys, and no answers. Only more wine, and then – oh God. And then brandy, and he’d brought out those little pies and said – oh God – he’d got them in some little Brit-owned shop and he’d doused them in the brandy but she’d had to try one to stop the dinner becoming a total disaster even though it already was and then the day had gone the way it always did and she ended up putting her father to bed and cleaning up the spilt booze and vomit. No wonder she’d forgotten them. She’s tried so hard to forget all of those days, and anyway he’d been too drunk to tell her what they were.

She scrubs her teeth frantically, trying to wipe away the vision in mint toothpaste and then mouthwash, holding back the tears and the memories. It’s not like that any more: her father is sober and Christmas will be dry and as long as she’s near him or he can call her whenever he has to then he’ll stay dry. She’s his mainstay and his strength. But she can’t face those pies. For a moment or two she stands, leaning, still, against the cold tiles, re-establishing control, pulling Beckett who can cope with anything back over herself, the shell that will get her through this. She can get through this. She’d got through everything else. This is simply a memory, and she is stronger than her memories.

She walks back out.

“You okay, Beckett?” Castle sounds genuinely concerned. She doesn’t look at the table, keeps her eyes on his face.

“Yeah,” she lies. “Must have eaten something at lunchtime. My stomach…” She lets him take an implication she hasn’t stated. “D’you mind… I don’t think the pies will agree with me.”

Castle looks at Beckett, armoured to the nth degree, and wonders what she’s hiding. She does, though, look greenish, and it’s fairly clear that she’s upset. He just doesn’t believe it’s only an upset stomach. He helps her clear away the plates, noticing that she is not looking at the remaining food on hers.

Then he tows her back to the couch and arranges her next to him, pulls her legs up over his lap and cuddles her in without asking permission or indeed waiting for consent.

“What’s really up, Beckett?” He doesn’t want to call her Beckett, but there’s no other name he can use and get away with. She doesn’t answer, only curls into him in an inviting way against which he isn’t proof. His arms tighten without any conscious decision. “Tell me what’s wrong.” His tone is firmer, building on the knowledge that sometimes she doesn’t want to take the lead. So he’ll try now, he’ll try to lead her to… oh. Beckett is quite definitely back.

She’s dragged his head down and his mouth to hers and right now she’s invading him in a way that strongly suggests the next stop is her bed. This isn’t anything to do with an upset stomach at all. This is a very deliberate move to stop him asking questions and to forget whatever it is that has disturbed her. Maalox for memories, he thinks alliteratively – and stops on that thought. Memories. Taste and smell invoke memories. She tastes of peppermint mouthwash. He’s wrenched away from thought because her hands are already opening his belt, the button and the zipper. No. If they are going to do this – and they are going to do this – they’re going to do it his way. He catches her hands to stop her.

“No.” She looks up, a flick of abandoned hurt through her hazel eyes. “Not like that. That’s not what you really want. Leave it to me. You don’t want it like that; you want someone else to lead.” There’s an uncertainty behind her expression. “Not lead like that.” She relaxes very slightly. “Nothing you don’t want, no pushing, no questions.” Another degree of relaxation. Ah. That’s what she’s hiding from. Questions. “All you have to do is agree, or not. Nothing else. We’ll take it from there.” He’s projecting conscious confidence; reassurance that she can rely on him to give her what she really wants. He’ll work out why she might want it, and what is really going on, later. For now, though he really hadn’t planned this, matters seem to have fallen – well, into his lap. Curiosity may be his besetting sin, but he’s pretty keen on lust too, even when this isn’t just lust any more.

He tucks her in more accessibly, and slides a gentle palm around the curve of her jaw, the line of her sharp-cut cheek; his other arm behind her, supporting her, dropping diagonally to his hand on her hip, softly stroking, intent in the control in his fingers, restraint in the gesture. Affection, assertion, but no need for aggression, from either of them. For a moment he thinks that she’s going to object to his assumption of the lead, but then her hands fall lax on his shoulders and she lets him position her as he pleases and suddenly, almost unexpectedly, Kat is back, pliant and pettable and perfectly placed and pleased to be kissed. It would be a terrible shame not to indulge her, and Castle tries very hard never to disappoint when it comes to indulgence.

He starts slowly: a delicate nudge of his lips to hers, a soft request for entrance, not denied; and then a more forceful press of his tongue, a swooping raid to take possession and show her that in this he has every intention of leading the way. His hand on her hip shifts to turn her into him, then slides up her back and into her hair and keeps her there, freeing his other hand to drift along the lean line of her leg as his mouth drifts along the base of her cheek and round to her ear and that small spot that he found the first time and hasn’t forgotten since. He hears her soft mew with satisfaction and kisses it again to produce that same noise, which this time is accompanied by a wriggle.

“Like that?” he rumbles deeply. She makes a soft murmur of agreement, without distinguishable words, and cuddles closer. A slim hand runs round his neck to lodge in his hair. He drops to her shoulder, opens a button to give himself better access to the smooth skin covering her clavicles, draws a wet line along and back again and hears her gasp and feels the immediately tighter grip with pleasure. When he lifts, traces a finger over her lips and her tongue flickers out to twist over it, runs the finger down again to the opening of her button-down, she leans back against his arm to provide access: heavy, sleepy, darker eyes allowing him his way. Another button opens, an edge of white lace peeps out, and Castle’s lips follow his finger downward to the creamy curve of skin. There’s no haste to his movements, no need to hurry, just slow assertion of intent and desire, leading without pressure.

Beckett curls in and gives herself over to sensation and firm, steady, controlled touch of hands and mouth, happily responsive to the growing heat between them. She essays some unbuttoning on her own account, discovering warm skin and nicely firm muscle under the smooth cotton, and as she strokes over it is rewarded by a deep growl and a return to hard, deep kisses and a firm hand palming over the edge of lace. She arches into it, pressing peaked nipples against the resistance and using her grip on Castle’s wide shoulders to try to pull him over her.

He doesn’t move.
We're doing splendidly

“No need to hurry, Beckett. Just let it happen. I told you I’d give you what you wanted. You don’t want to decide, or be in charge. So don’t. I’ll make the decisions. You just have to say if it’s not what you want.”

“No decisions?” Really no decisions? Really just let herself be swept up in the moment and not have to think or decide or be strong? Really have someone else be strong instead: be stronger than she?

“No decisions,” Castle says firmly. “No decisions, no questions. Whatever it is, lay it down for now. Let go, Beckett.” He enforces his point with a hard fingertip across her lips. “Do you want this? That’s the only decision you need to make.”

“Yes.” It’s the last word she needs to say. Castle lays her back and slides out from under her legs, kneeling beside her.

“We’ll start here,” he purrs, and just for a second Beckett wonders if this had really been a good idea: if letting herself be Kat with Castle isn’t going too far, letting him into parts of her mind that she doesn’t want to share. He sounds more dangerous, suddenly, more predatory; and for the first time she realises something she hasn’t previously: that Castle always gets his own way. It’s not obvious, and that happy-go-lucky playboy sexy charm hides it extremely well, but still, when it comes down to it, it’s Castle who ends up with the prize, whether that’s interfering in the original case or following her around or getting her to go Christmas shopping with him.

And then he kisses her again and sweeps a hand over her stomach and she gives up that and indeed any other line of thought in favour of running one hand into his hair to ensure he doesn’t stop or move away and stroking the other hand over his revealed chest. He’s assertive but not aggressive, forceful enough for her to be wholly sure that he’ll do it right, and Beckett simply slides away into Kat-who-likes-strong-men and enjoys it.

Just like the previous time, she doesn’t get the option to roll away afterwards. It appears that Castle likes cuddling. Cuddling hasn’t really formed part of her love life; too much of an admission of weakness, too much of an insight into the world behind her eyes and her walls. She has to remember that she has other commitments, that she’s made other choices, that the only option left to her is strength. The occasional evening where someone else makes decisions doesn’t change that the only person she can rely on is herself, and anyway she doesn’t need to compare Castle-as-father to her own father, which right now will only remind her of what she’s lost. It’s very nice to be cuddled and cosseted but it doesn’t change what her life has become.

Eventually Castle has to go. He can’t take her with him, and she still isn’t telling him what was up with the pies, but he’d promised no questions and that’s where he’ll stay. He’s got more of what he wanted, anyway: soft Kat in his arms, and soon it’ll be soft Kat in his bed not just in hers. And Badass Beckett too, of course. He likes them both. Oh yes. As long as Badass Beckett doesn’t give him that unpleasant feeling of being second-best, or settled for, or that he’s missing the point somehow. He doesn’t like that at all.

He wanders home a little less happy than he had been.

Back in the bullpen on Monday, some progress has been made. The sketch the stallholder had reluctantly produced has thrown up another suspect, who’s on his way to Interrogation now. Just in time for the interview to begin, Castle shows up full of the joys of Christmas and – much more usefully – with a large box full of the joy of doughnuts and other forms of pastry. He looks a little blue when he discovers that the bullpen is certain to have finished every last crumb before the interview is done.

“You can always buy more, Castle,” Beckett points out, not enormously sympathetic. “Or miss the interview, if you like?” That’s accompanied by a rather evil grin. She’s perfectly well aware that Castle will sacrifice any quantity of food (and sleep) as long as he gets to do the interesting bits. She wonders whether she could bribe him with food to do some of the uninteresting bits, such as paperwork, and decides that there probably aren’t that many doughnuts in the world.

“No. I’ll just have to buy more,” he grumbles. He doesn’t say that he’s disappointed; that he’d wanted to share them with Beckett in particular, since the mince pies had been a washout.

The interview, however, is not a washout. This friend of Joe’s is maybe – on a good day, with platform shoes – five-ten tall and around six-ten wide, and definitely not in need of any more doughnuts. He may not have much of a physique, but despite the thick Bronx cadence he has a reasonable mind and, it seems, a gift for observation. He also turns out to have remarkably dextrous fingers. CCTV shows him neatly nipping small valuables as he wobbles past each stall. When confronted, he’s not exactly repentant.

“Gotta make my rent somehow, and ‘s not ‘s if they’ll miss it. ‘S all knock-off anyhow.” He grins, and his four chins roll in harmony. “Doin’ the tourists a favour, stoppin’ them gettin’ fleeced.”

“Stealing, Benny. You were stealing.”

“Naw. Just…” he thinks for a moment… “recirculating.” There’s a muffled snort by Beckett’s side. She kicks Castle in rebuke. He winces.

“While you were… recirculating… did you see Joe getting into any arguments? Anyone getting in his face?”

Benny shakes his head, setting up a small wave pattern over his cheeks and jowls. He’s sweating. Beckett clocks it with considerable and concealed satisfaction and starts to go in for the kill.

“You sure about that, Benny? You’re looking a little nervous there.” More rivulets baste his face. “Your pal is dead, Benny. Don’t you worry that whoever killed him might be after you next? It’s not like you’re anonymous. They’ll pick you out no problem, the way you look.” She lets that sink in. Castle preserves a mildly menacing silence beside her. He’s not bad at that, for a non-cop: he must have picked it up from Espo. She can’t imagine that he really needs it for his writing: laptops are not known for picking up on atmosphere.

“Your best chance to stay safe is to tell me everything you know, Benny. I can’t help you if I don’t know the truth.” She stops there. She knows she’s got him. She only needs to let him realise it for himself. Fortunately Castle knows enough – works well enough with her – by now to recognise when to keep his mouth shut. Gaping, ominous silence stretches across the interrogation table.

“Okay,” Benny blurs. Beckett doesn’t twitch a muscle though she’s thoroughly pleased to have bluffed him. “So Joe was with me, but he don’t like it when I lift stuff so I don’t let him see. But the guy”-

“The stallholder guy – he was gettin’ in Joe’s face about things disappearin’.” He looks sulky. “It wasn’t Joe’s fault. He shouldn’t have had them at the front. Just askin’ for them to walk.”
“Right into your pockets, Benny.”

“Like I said, recirculation.”

“So what happened next?” Castle asks.

“Stallholder started yellin’, Joe yelled back, suddenly there’s fists flyin’ an’ I dragged Joe outta there before he got in trouble. He got a temper, Joe.” Realisation dawns. “Had a temper.” His moon face slumps into discomfort. “Stallholder was still yellin’ he’d take it outta Joe when we were round the corner.”

They continue for a while, but fat Benny doesn’t know anything more than that. Now, though, the stallholder is looking a lot more interesting. Beckett sends Ryan and Espo to pick him up again. While she’s waiting, she examines the empty box where the pastries used to be, and thinks that a doughnut is just what she needs. Shame there aren’t any left. She becomes aware that Castle is peering plaintively at the space where pastries once were too, and shares a mutually sympathetic – and hungry – look.

“I could get some more,” Castle suggests. Beckett looks at her watch.

“No time. Boys’l be back with our suspect” –

“Suspect?”

“Yeah, suspect. He didn’t tell us about much of that, did he? Gotta wonder why not.”

“Oh.”

“Anyway, they’ll be back in a few minutes. So no time for doughnut runs.” But she looks a little regretful.

“I’ll buy you a meal later,” falls out of Castle’s mouth. “Or come to dinner, and I’ll cook.”

Beckett considers. She’s still thinking when the boys roll back in a few minutes later with the irritated stallholder between them and she doesn’t have to think about difficult questions like going to dinner with Castle any more.

“So, Jake,” she opens up, best menacing tone on show, “how come you didn’t tell us the full story last time you were here?”

“I told ya enough. Rest din’t matter.”

“I’ll decide what matters,” Beckett snaps. “Not you. I think it matters a lot that you were throwing punches at Joe.”

“Never hit him. Din’t matter.”

“Really. So it didn’t matter that you were the last person to have an argument with him and next thing he winds up dead? Because I think that matters a lot.”

“Never touched him.”

“That’s not what the witnesses say.”

“So I took a swing. So what. He was liftin’. Deserved everythin’ he got.”
“I don’t think he deserved to be dead,” Beckett observes, coldly.

“Stupid lowlife’s no loss.” He evidently realises that this line of conversation is not improving Beckett’s view of him. “Din’t know where he lived. So it wasn’t me.”

And no matter how much Beckett pushes, aided by sharp interventions from Castle, they get no further. She has to let him go, but she is perfectly certain that there’s more to it than Jake-the-dubious-stallholder has admitted. She sets Ryan to investigating camera footage and Espo to arranging another canvass – this time with photos of both Jake and Benny. Then she spends some time glaring at the murder board and running scenarios in her head. Jake is looking more and more like her killer with every moment. This is not a Beckett-flavoured case. This is extremely mundane and does not require any of her team’s normal jaw-dropping brilliance. She humphs. It’s not that she wants to re-run The Silence of The Lambs, but… she could do with something that would give her an excuse to be spending hours in the precinct.

Beckett becomes aware that Castle is regarding her with an air of expectation.

“Yeah?” she says, pulling her head out of the pack of options and possibilities that she’s shuffling.

“Boys are back.”

“Oh?”

“Camera footage.”

“Yeah?”

“Guess who was caught on Candid Camera with a switchblade?”

“Jake.” Castle looks very disappointed.

“You guessed. That’s no fun. I had this amazing theory to astound you with…”

“Save it, Sherlock. Sounds like we got the guy.”

They have got the guy. Jake caves under the evidence and is taken away, only an hour after shift should have ended.

Castle acquires an air of happy resolution and a wide, Christmas-flavoured grin.

“Dinner time, Beckett.” She looks bemused. “I said I’d get us dinner. Or cook it.”

Oh. Yeah. She’d accidentally-on-purpose forgotten that. Why couldn’t Castle have forgotten it too?

“I…” She can’t think of an excuse that might actually be believable. I don’t want to is both rude and requires an explanation, which latter is an even less desirable outcome than being rude. She really does not want to be either rude or provide explanations.

But she doesn’t want to go to the loft for dinner. She doesn’t want to watch Castle be a doting father, supporting his daughter; rather than his daughter supporting him. She doesn’t want to see all the trappings of Christmas around a bright, cheerful loft; or to eat festive food, or to drink festive drinks. She doesn’t want to take the risk that some other inadvertent action or item will trigger the memories and leave her sickened and reeling. And especially strongly, she doesn’t want Castle to know her father’s weakness and pity him, or still worse pity her, or use it to inform his book. It’s sheer luck that he hasn’t yet put it all together, but she can’t go on relying on luck. He’s beginning to look curiously at her. Hell.

“Okay,” she says, almost hiding her reluctance. “Where shall we go?” Please not the loft please not the loft please.

“I’ve got some nice food at home – and some very good wine, Beckett. I saw how much you liked that Bordeaux the other night, and though we finished it” – he looks momentarily regretful – “I’ve got something very similar that I think you’ll like.” He smiles happily, clearly thoroughly enthusiastic at the thought of feeding her at the loft. “Let’s go.”

Oh no. She should have been rude. Or suggested somewhere. Even McDonalds would have been better than this. She turns around to pull on her coat and not incidentally hide her face for long enough to reinstate a brightly, blandly, socially acceptable expression.

“The wine’s sorted, Castle, but what do you mean when you say ‘nice food’? Should I worry that this is a foray into molecular gastronomy?” He stares at her, open-mouthed. “Close your mouth, Castle. You’re catching flies.”

“That is so hot,” he breathes. “Foray. Molecular. Gastronomy. Three wonderful words in one sentence. If I didn’t think you’d shoot me I’d kiss you on the spot.”

“I will shoot you if you try.” Castle looks mischievous and Beckett takes a prudent step out of range. She wouldn’t put it past him to have a bunch of mistletoe in his pocket just on the off-chance that he could use it to annoy otherwise calm detectives. Or something like that. Fortunately the elevator arrives, full of cops and noise, before he can do anything outrageous. She’s sure that the skim of his hand over her coat-covered hip is only because the elevator is busy and crowded.

On the way to the loft, she’s not nearly as sure. He’s an inch closer than discretion or work relationship might indicate, as if their – associations – have given him a right to brush hands with her, to trail fingers discreetly across her hip. He always seems to get what he wants, she thinks again, and the thought doesn’t make her entirely happy.

Castle is happy. Beckett’s coming home with him, and he can feed her, produce some excellent wine, and generally provide her with Christmas cheer, warmth and sociability. A few kisses probably won’t hurt either, though not in public. He’s carefully pinned some mistletoe over his study door. On the inside. Contentedly thinking of the possibilities which it offers, it takes him several minutes to realise that Beckett isn’t exactly exuding enthusiasm. She’s not unenthusiastic, precisely, but there isn’t any wholesale forward momentum either.

“What’s up, Beckett?”

“Nothing.” She almost sounds truthful. “I’m fine.” And then she deflects. “What’s for dinner, Castle?”

“Slow cooked beef in red wine. Good for winter evenings. It’ll stick to your ribs, Beckett.”

“What?”

“Stick to your ribs. It’s a British phrase.” He smirks at his own cleverness. Beckett rolls her eyes at his pretension.

“American not good enough for you, Castle? Translate, for those of us who lack your particularly well-honed ability to show off.”

Castle looks artificially wounded. “You have no appreciation of the finer points of vocabulary,” he says teasingly. He knows perfectly well that Beckett has and uses an extensive vocabulary. Usually to chop him off at the knees, it’s true, but still…

“Actually, I took a short course in etymology once.” Castle chokes.

“College,” Beckett says un informatively. She hadn’t wanted to get into a discussion about it, but his statement had pricked her over-developed pride and she’d bitten back without thinking. “Dinner sounds nice.” She doesn’t pursue the phrase he’s used. She doesn’t want to talk about Stanford.

“Bread and butter pudding, too. My special recipe, with orange and lemon.”

“That’s a very old-fashioned meal for Mr Latest-Tech. I’d have expected nouvelle cuisine.”

“Age has its benefits,” Castle oozes, waggling his eyebrows meaningfully. “All that experience, just waiting to be put to good use. Tried and tested over a long period. Satisfaction is always guaranteed.” His flirtatious words and eyebrows are not matched by the look in his eyes, which is considerably darker and more intense. Still, he isn’t doing anything about it. She rolls her eyes, because it’s expected of her. She has to be normal.

“Anyway, Alexis likes it.” His expression alters to the – always slightly disconcerting – look of parental pride cut with some surprise that he has such a wonderful child. It scratches along Beckett’s nerves. She knew Alexis would be there. But she’s going to have to maintain her bright social exterior, all the while feeling guilty that she feels resentful. She shouldn’t feel resentful, and she shouldn’t have the knot in her gut that she suddenly does about sitting through a pleasant meal in good company. It’s a childishly unpleasant reaction and she is a better woman than that.

But she doesn’t want to go. She knows what she’ll see: she saw it when Castle dragged her out shopping. Happy families, supportive, loving, interested parents. Silly comments and shared experiences. Her step falters.

“You okay there, Beckett? Slipping on the snow in those heels of yours?” It’s a good excuse, and she seizes on it without considering the implications.

“Yeah. Don’t they clear these sidewalks?” She hasn’t even finished the last word when Castle takes her arm in a very Victorian fashion.

“There. Can’t let you fall. How would you chase down criminals with a sprained ankle?”

“You could do it for me. Get some exercise, do something socially useful, and best of all you’d need all your breath for running so you wouldn’t talk. Win-win.”

“Unkind,” smirks Castle. “Very unkind. You won’t get your pudding if you’re nasty to me.”

“If I’ve got a sprained ankle I wouldn’t be wanting to gallivant around anyway.” Castle mutters something under his breath. “What was that?”

“Coming to dinner is hardly gallivanting, Beckett. It’s a normal social interaction.” But he’s turning the word over on his tongue again and again, as if he’s tasting its flavour. “We could gallivant.” His eyes sparkle. “We should gallivant. We’d have fun. We could” – he thinks for a moment – “go to Coney Island. Or the Sea, Air and Space Museum. Or the top of the Empire State Building. Or the Statue of Liberty. Or” –

“Or not,” says Beckett decisively. “It’s winter, it’s freezing, and I am not gallivanting anywhere except home after the dinner you’ve dragooned me into.”

“That’s not gallivanting,” Castle grumbles. “That’s no fun. And I didn’t dragoon you into dinner, either.”

Uh-oh. There’s a thought arriving in Castle’s annoyingly excellent and perceptive mind. She can see it.

“You don’t want to come for dinner,” he says, surprised and hurt all at once.

“I’m here, aren’t I? Walking towards your loft. If I didn’t want to come to dinner I’d have said No much earlier.” She infuses it with all the considerable sincerity she can muster, and conceals any hint of fakery. Castle makes a suspiciously disbelieving noise, but seems to be convinced by the direction her feet are taking.
Wish I was at home

The loft is as brightly Christmassy as ever, and in fact Beckett is convinced that there are even more presents piled under the excessively large – but beautifully decorated – tree. She wanders over to it, and finds that it’s hung with an eclectic combination of bought and made ornaments: some clearly made by a very small Alexis, some that look as if – she would never have expected that – that Castle made them. There is a particularly delicate wire snowflake that catches and reflects the light, which she’s just reaching out to when Castle reappears behind her with two glasses of wine. Beckett jumps, and snatches her hand away guiltily.

“It’s okay, Beckett. It’s not nearly as fragile as it looks.” Unlike, Castle thinks, Beckett: who currently seems to be far more fragile than she looks. He is not at all sure, despite her denial, that she wants to be here, and her normally expressive eyes are dully shuttered. But she’s never shy of making her point, so he can only assume that whatever is wrong is not being made worse – and may be made better – by her being here.

Beckett reaches back to it, and runs her fingers carefully over the silver-gilt wire. “It’s lovely,” she says, without a hint of a quaver in her voice. “Did you make it? It doesn’t look bought.” She’d had two little wooden Christmas trees to hang on the ends of the real one they’d always had, once. One her mother had made. One her dad had. They’d been lost, and she’s had no time nor inclination to make one of her own.

“Yeah… for Alexis,” Castle replies, with a hint of embarrassment. Beckett turns round, and finds him almost on top of her. He steps back, hastily. “Have some wine.” She takes it from him, and repairs to the couch, settling herself in a corner, the wine held in front of her like a shield. Castle doesn’t follow her.

“What are you doing there, Beckett?” he asks.

“Drinking my wine?”

“No, no, no. You need to be over here.” She raises a quizzical eyebrow. “I have to make the dessert. So you need to come and sit at the counter so you can admire my skill.” Her eyebrow rises a little higher, connoting complete disbelief. Castle’s voice drops into a tone that shouldn’t be permitted. “Skill is critical, Beckett. Precise movements, careful control, the perfect quantity to leave you wanting more.” He smiles wickedly. “You can’t possibly appreciate it if you’re all the way over there. How would you join in?”

“I’m quite happy to watch you do all the work. Just like you watch me do all the work in the precinct.”

“C’mon, Beckett.” Castle wheedles. “I can’t talk to you if you’re all the way over there.” He acquires a wholly faked look of horror. “You won’t get any more wine if you’re there. Disaster!” A very odd flicker runs across her face and as swiftly away again, before Castle can place it. He’s about to employ some more persuasive words – and possibly gestures – when she appears to give in to his entreaties and comes over to sit at the counter. A very discreet flick of glance shows him that her wine is, if not untouched, barely started. In the back of his brain, neurons start to spark.

Spark is damped down as he concentrates half on his bread-and-butter pudding and half on a light, sociable, and bantering conversation in which he absolutely does not mention the Christmas Day shift, mince pies, Christmas decorations and parties, or the fact that Beckett is barely sipping her wine. He’s a little unamused that Beckett has come to dinner but doesn’t actually seem to be wholly happy about it. He’d rather she’d simply declined. Fortunately, at that point Alexis comes bouncing down the stairs, full of the joy of the season, and likewise full of conversation. Beckett is perfectly nice to Alexis, interested in her chatter and fully attentive to her, so Castle really has no reason at all to think that there is some constraint in the air.

But there is. He can’t put a single finger on what is wrong, but something is very wrong. Beckett’s being sociable and friendly, Alexis is enthusiastic and happy, and he ought to be pleased and reassured. It’s just that whatever Beckett’s voice and expression is saying, her eyes aren’t saying anything at all. Which is a little upsetting, and a very little annoying, made more so because there isn’t anything tangible to be upset or annoyed about. She still isn’t drinking her wine, either. Maybe he’ll find out what’s going on now dinner’s done.

Beckett has consented to coffee – if she’d declined he’d have been considering committal proceedings, or possibly a referral to the ER – but though she’s still producing bright, bantering, and above all normal conversation he has the strangest feeling that she’s thoroughly miserable. He takes their coffee through to the study in the faint, lingering hope that he can find out what’s wrong. He ushers her in, shuts the door, and pulls her quite firmly into his arms.

It very nearly works. There’s a hint of a melt into him… and then it’s very clearly Badass Beckett, not Kat. She stands straight and absolutely unyielding for a second, then steps back. Castle lets go of her without an argument.

“What’s wrong, Beckett?” There’s more than a hint of irritation in his voice. “You’ve been off all evening.”

“Sorry,” she says apologetically. “I’m tired. I didn’t mean to spoil dinner with you.” Which she hadn’t. She’d only come because she couldn’t think of a way to refuse without upsetting him. She’s rapidly deciding that that had been a very bad idea. She’d have done better to upset him a little bit much earlier and then gone home and let them both get over her refusal than come, try her hardest to make nice while all the time battling furious resentment and – say it, Kate – jealousy at a proper father-daughter relationship, and clearly not quite succeed. She wants to go home and let out all her misery and resentment and try to get over her stupid, selfish, pathetic feelings on her own.

“I’d better go home and get some rest.” She smothers a yawn. She is, now that she has stopped and solved the case, actually, genuinely, weary. Not just tired, which a good night’s sleep might solve, but weary in body and soul. She needs a break from the relentless round of cases they’ve had. Maybe it’ll be quiet for the next few days.

Castle is still looking at her with a certain amount of aggravation, though her apology seems to have lowered the previous tension, and disbelief. It really doesn’t help her mood.

“Thank you for dinner,” she says politely. “If there’s spare dessert, could I get a doggy bag?” It’s exactly what she would say if she wasn’t feeling so raw. Castle smiles, but it doesn’t really reach his eyes.

“Sure, Beckett. Let me put it in a box.” And he does, all the time sure that something is wrong that she won’t tell him. It never crosses his mind that she might find the homely, warm and welcoming atmosphere of his loft and family difficult to deal with. Why should it? She’s never mentioned anything that might give him the impression that she would. She’s still got her father and she’s sharing a family Christmas with him. The earlier spark of neurons has been quite quenched by his annoyance at the constraint and tension, and, he discovers, he’s actually quite glad to see her go, not least because he still cannot put a finger on why he thinks something is wrong, and seeing her here is merely accentuating the problem. Anyway, it’s not like she seems to want to stay. Which aggravates him more, which he knows perfectly well is because he’s frustrated. He doesn’t like either frustration or aggravation, especially when he neither wants Beckett to stay nor wants her to go.

When the door closes behind her he pours himself another large glassful of his excellent wine – and that’s another annoyance, she’d hardly drunk any of it and he’d been sure she’d love it – and relieves his confusion by playing shoot-’em-up games till he’s killed enough monsters to be relatively sanguine again. He wanders out to find Alexis raiding the fruit bowl – can’t she raid chocolate, or his alcohol, like any normal teen? – and decides to probe a little.

“Did you think Beckett was a bit off, pumpkin?”

Alexis looks at him with some confusion. “No. She was just like normal.”

Oh. “Not tired, or upset?”

“No, dad. Just like normal. She’s more interested in what I’m doing than your other friends. Why?”

“Nothing. I just thought…” Clearly he’d been wrong about what he just thought. Alexis would be quick to notice if there were an atmosphere. She’d always noticed when it was Gina. And now he’s been a little short with Beckett, who will certainly have noticed, and who will let it pass her by, never ask about it, and generally give him the impression that she has no desire to talk about anything at all which might possibly involve real emotions. Whether she has any desire to talk or not. Which irritates him all over again.

Beckett has gone home, changed into leggings and a t-shirt, and is going through her yoga forms with perfect muscular control and immense self-discipline. Her body is totally obedient to her commands. It’s doing nothing for her roiling mind at all. Normally she finds that the effort involved to control the poses forces her to concentrate on something other than whatever has wound her up, but even when she moves from backbend to tree she can’t stop thinking about how petty, selfish and nasty her feelings are.

She also can’t stop the feeling of squirming unpleasantness that Castle, who is not short of intelligence or perception, either has, or is just about to, work out how mean-minded she is. Then she feels even worse.

She goes to bed on a black cloud of unhappiness, guilt and resentment, and when her alarm sounds to start the day she is no better off. She hopes that Castle won’t show up today. Then she hopes he will, and they can just be normal. Then she hopes he won’t again, because he’s sure to ask questions and want to talk about it. She doesn’t want to talk about it when she can’t even work out what she thinks about it.

The precinct is full of bonhomie and everyone discussing their Christmas plans, Christmas shopping, Christmas visitors and Christmas meals. Except Beckett, who is pretending to concentrate on her paperwork and putting in a few comments every so often to make it appear that she’s listening and happy that everyone’s having a good time. She can already sense that half her bad mood is because of the imminence of her own flat, trying-too-hard, ignoring-history Christmas.

She does love her father. She really, really does. But she doesn’t like that she can never rely on him; that despite his twice weekly AA meetings she’s always a little tense around him, always a little suspicious that it won’t last. Five years, he’s been dry, without a single lapse, and yet she can’t quite make herself believe that it’s all better. She knows it’s never cured, only controlled. Therefore, she can’t talk to him about anything difficult, and sometimes she would really like a father’s advice, not just her friends’ thoughts. Sometimes she would like just to be unconditionally loved and to have someone that she could lean on without a shadow of a doubt about their view of her weakness.

But there’s no point being maudlin or grieving or resentful. She’s not going to have a parent, so there’s no point wishing for it. She’s had her bed made for her, and there’s no other choice but to lie on it. Alcoholism as Procrustes, in fact, fitting you into its frame whether you like it or not. She distracts herself with another pointless form. It doesn’t work. She mulls over the coming Christmas dinner: all bought from a good store, all easy to prepare. Her father will do that. He can do that. He can’t cook, though. Not like – she turns her mind away from that thought, because if she starts down that line she will lock herself in the restroom to cry with the memories of when home was like that, and crying hadn’t solved anything for five years while her father had his head stuck down a bottle and it won’t solve anything now.

“Beckett? Beckett!” It’s Ryan and Esposito, in stereo. “We’re all goin’ out after shift. You comin’? Lanie’s comin’ too.” Why not?

“ ‘Kay,” she says, and thinks nothing more of it.

At end of shift she’s done nothing but paperwork all day and is certainly ready for a change. Castle hasn’t shown up, which has allowed her to try to get past her unworthy envy, and a drink with the team sounds like a good plan. At least, she doesn’t have a better plan. She doesn’t, in fact, have a plan at all, except takeout and TV and her yoga mat. If she doesn’t sort her head out soon, she thinks bitterly, she’ll be so adept that she can take a second job as a yoga instructor.

She should have expected this. Castle’s sitting guarding a batch of beers and clearly waiting for them all. The boys are wholly delighted. Lanie is wholly delighted. Beckett is not wholly delighted. She’d only just managed to bring herself back to calm, and now she’s going to have to watch every word she says, all evening. Though she notices that Castle doesn’t exactly look overwhelmingly pleased to see her, either. There’s a distinct shadow behind his eyes.

At least, she thinks, some time later, Castle hasn’t asked any questions. He’s his usual self, and that means that Beckett can be her usual self, and everything is back to normal. She slowly sips her beer, and gradually sense comes to her. If the problem is her, which it is, when she’s at the loft, which it also is, then the simple answer is not to go to the loft. Easy. How had she not seen that earlier? Because you were too busy being pathetically envious and resentful, her mind answers. Well, now she won’t be. No triggers.

And if that’s childish running away from the situation, rather than dealing with it, well, she doesn’t let herself know it. She can’t possibly admit that seeing Castle and Alexis reminds her, as if it were at knifepoint, of everything she’s lost. She can’t possibly admit to her shamefully petty feelings, especially to someone that can’t understand them. She also doesn’t want to upset either of them by being unable to control her feelings – her control may be legendary, but testing it to destruction is plain stupid. She’ll be adult and friendly and just stay away from the loft till she can cope.

“I’m outta here,” Esposito says.

“Me too,” Ryan admits. “Tomorrow’s gonna be paperwork all day again. Least it means I can finish my Christmas shopping.” Esposito makes a disparaging noise.

“You still shoppin’? You bought up half the city, lookin’ at all the stuff you got every lunch break for a week. How’d you need more?”

“You’re gonna tell me it’s crackers an’ party hats and bad jokes, ain’tcha?”

“Nothin’ wrong with that,” Ryan says defensively. “’S traditional. Family’s important.”

“Sure is,” Lanie interjects. “I’m having the big family Christmas as well. Course,” she says very smugly, “I did all my shopping weeks ago.” There’s a chorus of disgust and Lanie how could you’s. “I’m just naturally organised.”

“Helps that none of your clients care about speed,” Esposito grumps. “You get to go any time you like. We gotta deal with all these real people, who – ya know – want answers.”

“I’ve got you guys always wanting answers,” Lanie squawks indignantly. “Always hassling, even when you know how long the tests take to run. They don’t get quicker for you asking.”

Castle sneaks a peek at Beckett under his eyelids and, when he finds she’s not looking at him, pokes her to attract her attention.

“Beckett, watch the floor show,” he whispers mischievously. “Better than the Comedy Club. Wanna bet that Lanie comes out on top?”

“Watch, Beckett. Don’t you think that Espo and Lanie are arguing a bit obviously?” Beckett looks at him, dumbfounded.

“No.” Then she smiles, very, very evilly. “But you could test your theory…” She leaves an inviting gap for Castle to fall into, which he duly does.

“How?”

“Well, since I’m perfectly certain that you can find some mistletoe somewhere nearby” – Castle’s eyes begin to crinkle in mirth – “if you dangled it above them you might find out…” He snorts.

“You don’t love me, Beckett,” he says mock-pathetically.

“Nope. But I’m sure you’re about to tell me why.”

“You’re putting me in the line of fire.” Her eyebrow lifts. “Winding up Espo is one thing. Winding up Lanie is another. She must know all sorts of untraceable poisons and fatal implements. She’ll use them on me if I pull out mistletoe over her head.” He suddenly grins very, very evilly himself. “But she’ll forgive me if I put it over your head.” Beckett chokes on her drink and squawks on her own account.

“You do that and I will turn you into a colander and strain soup through you.”

Castle smirks in a gotcha fashion and sneaks a hand, conveniently under the table, on to her knee. It lasts a second before Beckett removes it by bending the thumb till his options seem to be limited to movement away or dislocation.

“No fair, Beckett. So now you owe me some other form of amusement.” Her jaw drops. Castle smirks some more. “I haven’t played Sorry for at least four days,” he says insinuatingly. She flaps her jaw a couple of times, to no effect. “Scared to lose?”

“You have got to be kidding.”
“You are scared. You know I’ll win.”

Castle had spent his day, which had not started precisely early courtesy of his shooting monsters until the small hours, fretting around the constraints he thought he’d sensed, Beckett’s lack of affection, and Alexis’s complete denial that there had been any problem at all. In the end, he goes with Alexis’s view, and concludes that since Beckett had spotted his irritation she’d been understandably reluctant to stay. He’d not gone to the precinct because he hates paperwork with a passion, and it bores him silly. And when he’s bored, he has a tendency to get into trouble, and some last vestige of self-preservation had told him that trouble, in this instance, would likely mean trying to wrench some answers out of Beckett, even though he’s no longer sure that there are any answers to have.

So instead, he’s come out with the gang, exchanged happy conversation with Ryan and Espo, bantered with Lanie, and watched Beckett sip her beer so slowly that it’s probably three years more aged when she finished the bottle than when she started. It could have petrified in that time. She’s been half-disconnected all evening, and she looks tired. Maybe that’s all that was wrong – and she’d said that she was tired, so that’s it. He’s been an ass, but she’ll let it go, because if she’s tired she might want to be soft, affectionate Kat later.

His opportunity arises after he declines to be murdered by Lanie for everyone’s entertainment. If he just prods at Beckett’s overweening pride a little, he’ll be able to go home with her. And sure enough…

“I am not scared you’ll win. Bring it on.”

And since the party’s breaking up anyway, it’s very easy for Castle to leave when the others do and to point out that since they’re going in the same direction they should share a cab. Even if Lanie does look thoroughly sceptical, she doesn’t open her mouth.
The cab is quiet: largely companionably so, though every so often Castle opens his mouth, stops, and shuts it again. The words what was wrong last night are trying to cough themselves out of his throat, no matter how much he knows that this would be a very bad idea. It’s a particularly bad idea because Alexis hadn’t noticed anything wrong at all. And, of course, because Beckett is not precisely keen on having her actions questioned by someone who has only been around her for three months or so. Affection, sex, food, wine or silly games provided or not.

Fortunately they reach Beckett’s block before Castle’s impulses to achieve suicide-by-Beckett can overtake his survival instinct. He bounces out behind her, pays the driver before she can and gets growled at, moderately gently, for his pains, and follows her upstairs.

“Coffee? Soda?” Beckett asks. Still no alcohol, this close to Christmas? Doesn’t she ever have anyone round for a drink?

“Coffee, please.” At least it’s hot. It’s freezing outside and although Beckett’s apartment is at a comfortable air temperature the lack of any decoration or festive adornment gives it a chill atmosphere.

“Okay. You set up the game, then. It’s on the shelf over there.” She gestures in the direction of the bottom bookshelves, where Castle can spot the box – and the wrapped box for her father. So she hasn’t taken that over to put under their tree yet either?

“Don’t you put presents under the tree in advance?”

There is a half-second hitch before she answers, and Castle, looking round at her, notices a sudden rigidity in her back and a pause in the process of coffee-making.

“No. Always at the last moment,” Beckett says lightly. “Stops people cheating by trying to look through the paper or get an idea of the shape.” Her words are casual. Her shoulders and back are stiff. The coffee continues to be made, although a sprinkling of grounds is on the counter not in the pot.

They had done so, once: put presents under the tree as and when they were bought; an ever-growing pile of multi-coloured wrapping and strange shapes. She had done, the second year, not that there were many for only the two of them.

There had been even fewer by Christmas Eve: her father having fallen into them, drunk; and, still drunk and incapable of realising the significance of the wrapped parcels, tearing the paper and leaving them scattered: too wasted to understand that it was Christmastide. The vomit hadn’t improved any of the presents, either. The next year she’d taken them round on Christmas Day, and the tradition had stuck. She doesn’t know if any of the first five years’ presents had survived the twelve days until the Epiphany. She had never asked, or commented. Since then, each present has survived, and been displayed, or worn, or used, with pride: another way in which her father proves that – with her unstinting support – he controls his demons.

She finishes making the coffee and brings it over to where the game is set up and ready.

“You can be blue, Beckett. Matches the uniform I’ve never seen you wear.” He looks salaciously hopeful.

“Uniforms do it for you, do they? I’ll remember that, so I don’t raise your temperature by wearing “Who’s starting?” says Castle, instead of how about I buy you a pure silk version and then take it off you very slowly, which would not be good for his continued existence. Still, Beckett seems to have got over her constraint of the other evening (he is still sure she was off-form, despite all intelligence telling him he’s an idiot) and she’s a little more relaxed than she was earlier, and whatever had spooked her is gone again.

“I thought your friend said that you cut to decide who goes first? Are you trying to sneak an advantage, Castle?”

“Curses,” he cries dramatically. “Foiled again.” Beckett rolls her eyes, and cuts. Castle follows, and is unreasonably triumphant when he gets to begin. It doesn’t actually help him, as Beckett points out, since if he doesn’t get the right cards he still won’t be starting a man. She is considerably underwhelmed when he does.

“Are you sure you didn’t stack the deck, Castle,” she humphs as, yet again, the card she draws is useless.

“I’m wounded. How can you think that I would cheat?” His eyes twinkle and crinkle as he grins at her. “I’m just lucky. You know what they say, Beckett. Lucky at cards and lucky in love.” His grin gets even wider. Beckett humphs again. She really does not like losing, does she? He starts a second man and advances his first a little further. There’s a very small noise of considerable displeasure, swiftly suppressed, next to him. It occurs to Castle that Beckett hasn’t disagreed with his deliberately misquoted thesis on luck. He decides to push his luck, and slides closer, putting an arm round her.

“What’s this, Castle?” She taps the hand on her shoulder, surprisingly gently.

“Well, Beckett, I believe that technically it’s called a hug. Have you heard of them? Usually provided between friends when one of them seems to need it. You’re tired, and tired people need hugs. Well-known fact.” He grins some more, and doesn’t move his arm. There’s another tiny humph – this one conveys a certain amount of disbelief – but no movement away. More surprisingly, there’s no denial. So she is tired.

The moment is broken by a squeak of satisfaction. “Sorry!” says Beckett with no apology at all, and sends his furthest advanced man back to the beginning. Castle returns his attention to the game, and is still winning that several minutes later. Beckett is also still within his arm. Win-win, in fact. And thinking of winning, the best thing he can do is win this game as quickly as possible and then proceed to claim a prize, just like last time. The same prize will do very well.

So that’s what he does. Beckett is – well, trounced would be a good word. He’d expected more of a battle, but luck seems to have deserted her today, and now she’s looking down at the remnants of the game without any particular annoyance at having lost. He would have expected it, given her general competitiveness. (He’s competitive too. He just hides it an awful lot better. Or indeed, unlike she, hides it at all.)

He turns her round towards him. “I won,” he points out.

“Yes. And?”

“I get my prize.”
“More M&M’s, Castle? You’ll get fat if you eat all those sweets.” Castle smirks.

“Not likely, Beckett. I take good care of myself. A healthy mind in a healthy body.” His smirk becomes more of a lazy smile. “But you needn’t worry. I don’t want M&M’s.” He leans down. “I want a kiss.” And he takes it, and when she doesn’t protest, takes another: slower, longer; and when she doesn’t protest that either, simply carries on kissing her in an entirely possessive fashion. She’s still far too much Beckett for him to think that she’s truly relaxed, but kisses can be very relaxing, if properly delivered.

He brings her firmly closer, pulling her on to his lap where she can be more readily accessible, holds her against him when she shivers slightly and then bends to her full mouth once more. This time she opens for him before he’s done more than barely touch his lips to her. He nibbles her lip delicately and then kisses her slowly and surely. Affection is high on the agenda, suddenly. Tired Beckett might, he hopes, want to be Kat, or at least less Beckett than she’d been last night.

Beckett had known that this was a possibility from the minute Castle had dropped his arm around her, and decided to let the chips – or the Sorry cards – fall as they might. When he kissed her, gently and yet with a definite note of intent, it went a long way to reducing the tension that permanently inhabits her at this time of year consequent upon her hatred of the season. When he carried on kissing her, and hoisted her into him without any effort, she was reminded that he’s big, strong, and perfectly capable of taking care of himself. And, of course, his family. She shivers slightly, likewise reminded of the way in which her father is the opposite, and finds herself tucked in and kissed with rather more determination.

She eases into his clasp a little, settles against him more comfortably, and opens to his demands. It doesn’t take long to succumb to them, to let the heat build between them, to press into him and bring her hands to his neck, and then, having consented to his invasion, give herself up to whatever he might do.

What Castle might do is vexing him extremely. He might pick not-quite-yet Kat up and take her to her bedroom and make love to her in all the ways he wants to and that he already knows she would enjoy. He might indulge in some heated petting on this couch (and then, perhaps, take her to bed). Or he might continue this as a relatively gentle make-out session, much as had been so very effective a few days ago, with nothing further. Right now, the last seems the best idea – at least for the moment – as it’s his best chance of relaxing Beckett into Kat. And after the last couple of days, he wants to know that he can turn her into Kat again. She’s been far too Beckett, and far too tense, and far too not his.

So that’s what he does. He doesn’t make the mistake of stopping to think, which has only ever led to being right back to hard-shelled Beckett and that very unpleasant and peculiar feeling that the incredibly good sex is in some way – or he is in some way – second-best. Which is another unsubstantiated but persistent nagging feeling in his mind. He’ll just enjoy himself – and whichever version of Beckett, Kate, Kat or whatever personality appears – for now. Hard upon the thought, he kisses her again, never having stopped stroking her gently – affectionately – across her back.

She’s nicely responsive, but it’s disappointingly clear – from an…er…affectionate point of view – that she’s also very weary. The niggle that has been plaguing him recedes somewhat. He cuddles her in, encourages her head to fall neatly upon his shoulder where he can, if so inclined, (and he is) drop occasional kisses on her hair or cheek, and simply snuggles. Affectionately. Beckett – or possibly nearly-Kat – is yawning and otherwise quietly soft in his arms: quite different to how she had been yesterday in his loft.

Maybe a day of quiet paperwork has soothed her. It’s been pretty full on for the last month, and while he’s stayed as late as the case demanded or the team could stand, Beckett’s hours have been – from the number of used coffee cups on her desk when he gets in – maybe double his? She’s never left before him, and from snippets of overheard gossip she gets in before the boys and leaves after them too. No wonder she’s exhausted. Now it’s all stopped, just in time for Christmas, and all the team spirit and adrenaline that has kept them going has been flushed away. It’s probably much like his feelings when he’s written frantically – either while inspiration lasts or because his deadline is approaching – and when he’s finally done, crashes.

In that case, he hopes that Christmas will be corpse-free, to give her – all the team – a break; and after that, she won’t be weary or tired and – surely? – that odd constraint will not reappear. She’ll come to his loft, and be content there. It’s likely that her family Christmas will help, too: time with her father. He plops another undemanding buss on her hair, and is instantly rewarded by a snuggle closer. Beckett’s slim hand has curled itself into the front of his shirt, and her head has tucked itself into the angle between his shoulder and neck. Very nice. He ensures that she is completely wrapped into his arms, leans his cheek on the top of her head, and idly surveys the décor of her apartment.
He’s not looked closely at it, before, being more concerned by its occupant and their… interactions.

So to speak.

It’s very clean and tidy. It’s also – he searches for a word, and finds only vague. Nothing is definite:
it doesn’t have a clear personality – at least, not one he would ever associate with Beckett. The furniture is curved, and plump; the few knick-knacks are largely abstract or impressionistic, with the exception of the little amethyst bird he’d seen last time. The pictures are all abstract: soft, swirling patterns in soothing, peaceful colours: greens and blues; a creamy, buttery yellow; a hint of chestnut brown. Organic colours, somehow. The pictures might have been landscapes, or seascapes; but they’re unclear, an illusion of meaning that fades and dissipates as he looks at the picture again. He doesn’t remember much about her bedroom: he’d been… distracted. Still, soft furniture and soft pictures and colours not withstanding – there are no photos, he realises abruptly – the lack of festivity leaves it chill. He shivers slightly, and pulls Beckett even tighter in.

She squeaks, and Castle realises that he’s holding her too tightly for her to breathe properly. He loosens his grip a little: enough so that she doesn’t actually suffocate, and returns to his musings.
Beckett has, he notices, kicked her shoes off. She has pale pink nail polish on her toes. It’s not very Beckett. Far too girly – but very cute. It doesn’t fit Beckett, still in her sharply tailored precinct garb. It might fit Kat, but he has no idea what Kat might wear. He has no idea who Kat might be, except that she wants soft affection and not to be in charge.

He certainly has no idea why there might be a Kat at all.

Before he can pursue that thought, though, Beckett (or whoever she is), shifts in his lap, glances at her watch, and sighs.

“It’s after eleven, Castle. Shift starts at eight thirty. I need to get some sleep.”

Castle smiles lazily at her. “I could help you sleep, Beckett.”

“Yeah, you could read me a story. That’ll send me to sleep.”

“That wasn’t quite what” –

“Sleep, Castle. Alone. Not with. I’m too tired.” She slams her mouth closed on that admission.

“See, I knew you liked me,” he smirks smugly. But he cuddles her closer, and strokes her hair, and gradually she eases again. Too tired? That implies – which is undoubtedly why she cut the words off short – that if she weren’t tired she’d be happy to indulge in rather more than soft making out and cuddles. He indulges in a small amount of both, and then reluctantly untangles himself to go home.

Beckett takes herself to bed in short order and falls asleep on the thought that everything’s okay – as long as she doesn’t go to the loft for the moment. It’ll all be much easier – everything will be less raw and she won’t be so pathetically, pettily resentful – after Christmas. Well. After mid-January, anyway.

Castle takes himself home and, not being exhausted and being something of a night owl anyway, repairs to his study and tries to think. Specifically, he tries to put together a number of disparate niggles that he has accumulated. Chief among them are the odd pauses and hitches in Beckett’s normally smoothly polished façade: when to put presents under the tree; mulled wine; brandy butter; mince pies; a slightly odd reaction to the alcoholic; a complete lack of festive cheer; and volunteering for the Christmas Day shift every year and then losing her temper with him in a completely wholesale fashion. And, of course, her constraint at his loft and lack of constraint in her own apartment.

None of it makes sense as a whole, and each individual item – mostly – has had a perfectly logical explanation. He shouldn’t be second-guessing her behaviour, and he shouldn’t be imagining phantoms and fancies where none exist. His imagination is – not for the first time – running away with him, he concludes. But he’s still indefinably dissatisfied when he sleeps, and when he wakes. It’s very irritating.

Irritation is somewhat relieved by the provision of another substantial box of doughnuts and pastries, of which Beckett eats rather more than her fair share by dint of a crowd-scattering scowl and the use of the ripped off box lid as a tray. She wrestles her prey back to her desk, puts her arms around it protectively and further defends the doughnuts by placing her Glock very obviously next to them. Then she eats them with an air of considerable pleasure, a very satisfied smirk of triumph, and – to Castle’s mind, at least – a wholly unnecessary amount of happy noises, lip-licking, and finger sucking. Purely, of course, to remove the frosting and sprinkles from her hands. Fortunately she finishes that game just before he is forced to make either a sharp exit or to kiss her.

“Those were good,” she smiles happily. Castle wonders where she put them. She’s so slim he’d have thought that so many doughnuts would have caused her stomach to protrude, much as if a snake had swallowed a pig. Fortunately, he stops that thought before it exits his mouth and shortly thereafter life exits his body. He surreptitiously flicks a glance over her. Nope. No protrusions.

“Creepy, Castle. Quit staring.” He shrugs.

“Never seen doughnuts disappear so fast. Is that a cop thing?”

“Yeah. You snooze, you lose round the bullpen, especially where doughnuts are concerned. Gotta be quick.”

“I noticed,” Castle grumbles. “I brought lots and they’re all gone. I barely got one, and you had several. You’ll get fat. Or you’ll have an upset stomach.”

“Nope,” grins Beckett smugly. “Cast iron stomach, here.” She pats it. “Never had an upset stomach in my life.”

There’s a very disconcerting flicker across Castle’s face. Beckett thinks it’s either disbelief or realisation, which is very confusing. Oh. Oh shit. She suddenly remembers that she’d claimed an upset stomach after the first bite of mince pie. Even more disconcertingly, Castle doesn’t follow up with the obvious question. But all through the rest of the morning Beckett can see his sharp mind working. She’s only too relieved when he wanders off, claiming that he’s bored of watching paperwork and is going off to do some more Christmas shopping.
Castle is also extremely relieved to wander off. Not hauling Beckett into Interrogation and forcing some answers out of her – especially when he isn’t quite sure of the questions he wants answers to – is definitely the best plan but equally definitely forcing some answers is the plan which he wants to implement. So he removes himself from temptation and from a situation in which his rising irritation is likely to pre-empt common sense.

He is, in fact, quite seriously annoyed with Beckett. The proximate cause is that he’s caught her in an outright lie. If she’s never had an upset stomach then she was quite definitely lying to him when he brought the mince pies round. The secondary, tertiary and quaternary causes are all the other little niggles that he’d thought about last night and that are back in full force. He doesn’t like being lied to, for any reason. He also doesn’t like unsolved mysteries and unanswered questions. And finally, he especially does not like Beckett being a liar, a mystery, or a question. It gives him that same squirmingly unpleasant sense in the pit of his stomach that he’s not important enough to her for her to tell him the truth: that he’s still second-best.

He trudges home, unamused and unhappy, with none of his normal ability to see the bright side of life. By the time he gets there, some twenty minutes later, his annoyance has hardened into determination that Beckett will tell him the truth. A last sliver of sense tells him not to pursue that tack today, or tomorrow. After Christmas. It’s not as if he was intending to be in the Twelfth before then, anyway. He’s got plenty to do before Christmas Day. (And if there isn’t enough to do to keep him away, he’s perfectly sure he can find things to do which will.)

The loft is empty, which probably means that his credit card limit is rapidly getting full. At least the card his mother knows about. Castle looks around at the comfortable, cheerful, Christmassy loft and is himself comforted and cheered. He really does love Christmas-tide, he thinks. All the good things in life are summed up in it. However tough his early life had been, Christmas had always been full of laughter and love and happiness, and he’s done his very best to ensure that his family have the same now. He’s sure Beckett will have a good time with her father, he thinks – and rapidly pushes the thought of Beckett away. He doesn’t need to think about her till after Christmas. He doesn’t want to, either.

On Christmas Eve Castle wraps his way through another pile of amusing, silly, or just plain mischievous stocking presents, and then concentrates happily on pre-preparing a Christmas dinner that would feed not just the three of them but thirty-three. And every time he catches a stray thought of Beckett peeping round his mind, he shuts it off, no matter how attractive it might be to think about her snuggled up to him. He mashes some sweet potato, and concentrates harder on the food, and resolutely does not think that he could just pop over to the precinct and say Merry Christmas to everyone. It’s more difficult than he would have expected, had he thought about it, which is unconsciously even more irritating. The sweet potato is mashed smooth before he’s even noticed he’s started.

Beckett notices that Castle doesn’t drop by on Christmas Eve and doesn’t think twice about it. He’s sure to be busy at home. She blocks off the stab of pain that she won’t have nearly such a pleasant time. There’s no new body, there is a lot of very tedious paperwork, and it will be Christmas tomorrow and she is not looking forward to anything after her shift is over. It’s worse, because she has the following days off and she has no plans. She doesn’t want to have plans. She certainly doesn’t want to have any conversations with Castle in which he might ask difficult questions that have answers which she doesn’t want to give. She’s too brittle, at this time of year, to answer, and she can’t stand the pity she knows she’ll see if she did.

She buries her head in her paperwork and resolutely does not think that it would be nice if Castle did drop by. It’s surprisingly difficult, and the feeling of impending trouble and the squirmingly unpleasant knowledge that not only has she lied flat out to him but she’s been caught – and at some point pretty soon she’s going to either need to explain why or feel uncomfortable every time she sees him – does not help. By the end of the day she has a tension headache that is, for once, not entirely caused by the thought of tomorrow. It’s a familiar companion, this time of year.

The bullpen is very quiet, on Christmas Day shift. Minimum staffing to cover the day, and those that are there aren’t happy about it. Except Beckett, who’d rather be there than in her solitary apartment or exchanging strained conversation with her father for any longer than she has to. There are so many things that they don’t talk about: the past, the family, the season, the memories. So many triggers to avoid. If he ever does fall again, it won’t be her doing: she’ll have been the safety line that holds him. No-one will ever be able to say that she should have done more, done it differently. She’ll be strong for him, because he needs all his own strength for himself. And part of that is sharing Christmas dinner, however hard it might be.

The time passes all too quickly, and there is no reason to delay departure. No bodies have dropped: even criminals and killers, it seems, celebrate the joy of Christmas Day. Beckett forces her dragging feet to their normal swinging stride and makes her way to her father’s apartment on the Upper East Side. There will be no problem parking, today. Plenty of people are out of town with their families. It also means that she can leave and be home as soon as she wants to. No hanging around in dingy subway stations waiting for a train packed with drunken revellers. Or even sober revellers. She doesn’t want to meet any revellers of any sort.

She’s so very tired of doing this. So very, very tired of pretending that they’re normal. She’d just like one Christmas where she went away, alone, and didn’t have to try. She’d take an oil rig in Alaska, if it meant she didn’t have to try. And then she feels bitterly unhappy and guilty that she doesn’t want to spend time with her father, who she loves, and who loves her.

She pulls up and parks close by, blows her nose and checks that her make-up is still presentable, puts her bright, sociable, love-you-Dad face on and rings his doorbell with absolutely no hint that anything at all might be preferable to Christmas dinner with her five year sober father. Nothing is, because nothing else would be any better.

Dinner is delicious. Naturally. It has no hint of Beckett’s own generally un-traditional cooking and consequent flaws in any attempt to cook a traditional Christmas dinner. It also has no hint whatsoever of alcohol. She had, as always, chosen the food with intense attention to detail and a wrenchingly painful conversation with the suppliers. She and her father manage comfortable conversation about her job, the precinct, his work, and the ridiculously snowy weather, and don’t mention anything important. Until her father smiles at her and starts down a new line.

“So, Katie, is the Rick Castle you keep mentioning the same Castle as writes books?”

“Yeah,” she answers, not particularly enthusiastically.

“How on earth did that happen?”

“He probably bribed the Mayor,” she grumps. “I don’t know. I’ve got to put up with him following me around whether I like it or not. He’s a pain in the ass.”

“You went Christmas shopping with him, Katie. That doesn’t sound like a pain in the ass to me.” Her father’s eyes crinkle. Beckett realises that actually he suddenly sounds more engaged with her life than for some time. “And I really like the look of this game you’ve got me, so if Rick Castle can write books that you like and find games that I like I think I really ought to meet him.”

Beckett spits out her Coke. “Dad!” Her father grins happily.

“Joking, Katie. Joking.” She splutters some more. Just for a moment it’s all going well and it’s Katie and her dad, just as it should be. Just as it used to be.

“Let’s play this game of mine, then.” And for another hour, it’s still just as it should be. Beckett wins – by a short head, since neither of them are precisely experienced at the tactics and strategies, and makes them both coffee, and it’s been the most relaxed Christmas in years, so far. But gradually they run out of things to say, and the game – third time takes all, and Beckett edges it – can’t make up for it entirely.

“Time for me to go, Dad,” Beckett says, mid-evening.

“Sure, Katie. See you soon. Come and play this game again. I’ll beat you next time.”

“You can try. I won’t make it easy on you.”

Some impulse she doesn’t understand sends her to hug him, in a way she hasn’t managed for a while. And just for a moment he hugs her back and he’s her father, there for her to lean on.

She makes it all the way into her car before the feeling fades; but fade it does. It’s been a good Christmas, relatively speaking: for the first time she thinks that her own Dad might be still there, somewhere underneath the fragility. But she still knows, however good today has unexpectedly been, that his fragility still binds her to being strong.

She drives home, enters her chill, undecorated apartment, picks up her little amethyst bird and sits on the couch, stroking the cool stone mindlessly. Her parents had brought her it from Quito: they’d been while she was in college, and surprised her with it that Christmas. Before. She keeps it, because she loves it, and it’s the only memento in her home. Something about the cock of its head and the little black stone eyes reminds her of her mother’s quick intelligence. She couldn’t bear to have photos, but this… is okay. More than okay.

Eventually, she goes to bed, dry-eyed.

Castle wakes up on Christmas morning in a mood of joyous expectation. He really does love Christmas, he loves giving people presents, and he loves the happy family atmosphere around him. He’d been to the Christmas Eve service with Alexis last night, though he prefers the old-fashioned name Watchnight service, so redolent of the Magi, the shepherds, the Host above, and the world waiting for the Child to come, sung full-voiced and full-hearted the carols and the hymns, and gone home soothed and eased.

It’s Christmas morning, and Castle is blissfully happy.

He’s still blissfully happy at the end of the day. Christmas dinner was perfect – even his mother’s parts of it – his presents had been received with appropriate reactions – the wrinkle cream he’d given his mother as a silly, annoying stocking present had induced a very satisfying squawk and purple hue to her face, though the jade bead necklace he’d spent considerable time locating had made up for it. He sits happily among the detritus of presents and wrapping paper and food and wine, half-watching It’s a Wonderful Life for the twenty-fourth time, and thinks that his life is really pretty much perfect. He’ll have a lovely Christmas, and after Christmas he’ll go back to following Beckett around, get her to tell him what’s wrong and why she lied to him, and then spend some quality time reassuring her that whatever it is it’s not a problem. Christmas is a season of goodwill and forgiveness, after all.

Beckett is back at her desk Monday morning, not particularly refreshed but rested. She’s not done a lot, these last few days: slept, read, cooked reasonable if simple meals, watched TV that requires no thought and involves no triggers.

It starts again immediately. Whatever peace there might have been over Christmas and the subsequent weekend, it doesn’t continue into January. They are frantically busy. The still-lingering effects of the financial crash, the global downturn and the general inability of people to control their tempers and their guns, knives or fists, has upped the homicide rate noticeably. It’s as busy as it had been before Christmas: a conveyor belt of relatively simple murders. It wouldn’t give her team any problem at all, except for the volume. They’re not the only ones. Every team is overloaded, and since Beckett and her boys are the best, and the fastest, they end up taking the brunt, helping out with everyone else’s workload as well as meeting their own.

There’s no time for anything, for a week and more. Beckett barely goes home, the boys are little better. Castle brings them lunches and doughnuts and makes endless cups of coffee, but his particular brand of thinking isn’t required and there isn’t any opening for him to talk to Beckett alone. Even if there were, she’s focused on the task and nothing else.

Castle turns up on Friday next, looking for inspiration, Beckett, and something a little more interesting than the banal, petty, domestic murders that are all there have been so far, nine days into the New Year. He finds none of these things.

“Hey, Ryan, Espo. Where’s Beckett?”

“Personal day. Won’t be in.” That’s very strange. Personal day? Not a sick day? That, he might have understood. Though he wouldn’t have put it past Beckett to struggle in anyway. They’re absolutely flat out and Beckett, workaholic, obsessive Beckett has taken a personal day? This is beyond weird. His curiosity is triggered.

“No-one for you to annoy, Castle.” Esposito grins companionably at him. “Need some help, though. We’re as busy as ever. C’mom. Take a look at this one. You’ll like it. Wife caught her husband cheating and shot him.”

“So? That’s boring.”

“So after she shot him she cut off his dick and posted it to the other woman.”

Castle’s eyes open wide. “Really?”

“Really,” Ryan says, black humour on full display. “Added a note, too. Suggested the girlfriend should have it stuffed and motorised” – Castle sniggers – “and that with a couple of AA batteries in place it would be better than the real thing.” Snigger turns to full on laughter.

“The lady had style,” Castle says, eventually.

“Sure she did. What she didn’t have was sense. She left her fingerprints all over it and wrote the note in her own handwriting.” Ryan shakes his head at the idiocy of murderers. Castle stops sniggering and has a thought.

“How come if you’re so busy Beckett took a personal day? She never goes home. None of you do, when it’s this way. Never seen her take a break.”
The boys’ faces turn identically blank. Castle’s instincts trip on to high alert. They don’t know? He doesn’t believe that for an instant.

“She always does,” Esposito says. Castle waits. “Doesn’t matter how busy we are. Montgomery always gives it.” That all sounds true. “She never says why.” That’s true too. It’s also entirely misleading. Castle, who is extremely good himself at misleading through the careful use of absolute truth, spots the evasion without any effort.

“Do you know why?” Esposito’s previously friendly face closes off. Even Ryan manages a degree of coldness.

“He’d never tell you. She don’t talk about it. We don’t ask.” They turn identically cool shoulders to him. It’s very clear that there is nothing to be gained – and much to be lost – from pushing further. The boys have been pretty welcoming, to date, but their loyalty is to Beckett. He’s not going to get any answers here.

“Okay,” he concedes, gesturing apologetically. “Sorry. What else have you got?” The moment passes as they hunker down to another round of very tedious murders. Castle sticks it out till lunchtime, when peering at indistinct CCTV footage has left his eyes metaphorically bleeding, buys lunch for everyone, and then slinks away to the catcalls and friendly hazing of the boys.

He sends Beckett a text on his way out. Came to the precinct for inspiration. Where can I find some? RC. There’s no answer by the time he gets home. There’s no answer an hour later. There’s still no answer after dinner, six hours later, nor by bedtime. The needle on Castle’s internal meter for detecting oddities and mysteries is now firmly in the red zone.

Beckett has spent the day with her father. They’ve done this each year since he got sober: making sure he’s not alone. If he were alone, he might be tempted, and if he were tempted, he might so easily fall. He’d said spend the day with me, Katie. Keep me strong, the first year. He hadn’t needed to ask twice, or the following year, or ever again. Beckett had explained, only once, to Montgomery, and he’s never quibbled, no matter how busy they may be. He knows Beckett will cover the time.

She never has her phone on, on this one day. She gives her father her full attention. It’s the least he deserves: no distractions. This year, they go out for lunch (burger and shake for her, burger and soda for her father) and then return to his apartment through the icy, biting wind and occasional flakes of snow to play Sorry and cards for the afternoon, and then after dinner to share coffee – but not memories – and play some more games.

Despite the improvement of Christmas, on this anniversary of their loss her father is withdrawn and quiet: the games, the lunch, the dinner not really helping. Conversation is strained and full of pauses: Beckett proof-reading every sentence before she says it in case it should cause pain. But she can’t make her excuses and leave, not when every miserable look tells her that he needs her to stay. She can’t take the chance that leaving will send him over the edge, when he’s so clearly hanging by a thread.

She goes home late in the evening, still carrying the burden of holding her father to sobriety. When she switches her phone back on, and finds the text from Castle, it’s too late to answer. She’ll see him tomorrow, no doubt.

Strung out on the high-tension wire of the day, of locking down her own feelings to keep her father safe, it doesn’t occur to her that Castle might still be looking for some answers as to why she lied – he’s not asked about it yet – and certainly not that he might be curious why she wasn’t at work today. She’s far too tired to worry about might-bes for the next day. They’re already horribly busy, and she needs sleep to recover from today and to be ready for tomorrow.

She wakes to her alarm – thankfully not Dispatch calling – and drags herself through the shower and dressing, finding it harder than she should to motivate herself. It’s always the same, the following day. When they’ve been quiet, she’s taken a second day, but that’s not possible this year. Work will help. Or at least help her forget her father’s quiet desperation, his clinging to her.

She’s so very tired of being strong.
The bullpen is just as busy as it had been two days ago, and the pile of paper on Beckett’s desk just as high. She gets straight down to it, flips a casual Hey when Ryan, and shortly after him Esposito, get in, and concentrates fiercely on making up for her day’s absence.

By ten, she’s made a noticeable dent in the paper skyscraper – maybe ten storeys removed out of the twenty or so. There may be a way still to go, but it’s substantial progress. She’s reaching for the next file when her phone rings. She doesn’t recognise the number.

“Beckett.”

“Detective Beckett?” She doesn’t recognise the voice, either. It’s a woman, and she sounds upset. “It’s Mrs Berowitz.” Uh? Berowitz, Berowitz… Oh. Oh God. The alcoholic husband. “You said…” she can barely force the words out through her embarrassment and misery… “if there was anything. Please – could I see you?”

“Yes. Can we make it lunchtime, Mrs Berowitz? Come to the precinct around twelve-thirty, and we’ll go somewhere to talk.”

“Thank you. Thank you so much.”

“Mrs Berowitz?” comes from behind her. Oh, hell. Now she’ll have to make some excuse to keep Castle away. “Wasn’t that the case just before Christmas, with the alcoholic husband?”

“Yes.” Her tone is very definitely discouraging.

“What did she want?”

“To meet me. Today.”

“Oooh. Why? Has there been something new? Did we get the wrong guy?” Beckett rolls her eyes without a trace of humour.

“No. And it’s not we. She just wants to see me. It’s not about the case.”

“But I’m your partner. Your shadow. Wherever you go, I get to go.”

“If I catch you in the women’s restroom, you’ll find out just how wrong you are,” Beckett deflects.

“C’mon. It’s got to be about the case. Why else would she want to see you?” Beckett can’t answer that without explaining about her father, and she isn’t going to do that.

“She wants to see me. Not you, not both of us. Just me. It’s not about the case, so you’re not joining in, Castle. Get it?”

Castle is very unimpressed by this. He’s perfectly certain there’s more to it than Beckett’s just said, and shutting him out of interviews is not the deal that he arranged. A plan begins to unfold in his brain, largely connected with weaselling himself into this interview. It’s entirely unreasonable of Beckett to have case-related interviews without him – and no matter what she’s just said, he’s sure that this is related to the case: how could it not be? It’s not as if Beckett has any real life outside her job. Anyway, she’s already lied to him once, so she could easily be doing it again.

He doesn’t admit to himself that this is as much driven by his still-prickling irritation over his discovery of her original lie about the mince pies, and his still-raging curiosity about her absence the day before, neither of which have yet been explained, as the actual issue at hand. It’s a work related interview, and he should be there, he thinks aggrievedly. She has no right to shut him out.

He doesn’t notice the warning sign right there at the front of his head. He hasn’t put a limit on she has no right to shut him out. Even if he’s technically thinking about work matters, he’s actually letting the lack of information about other areas of her life infect his current thinking.

He spends the remainder of the morning evolving a plan and “helping” with the run of mundane cases. Beckett looks tired, he notices, and justifies his plan to himself as taking some of the weight from her shoulders. She knows his insights can be helpful. It’s not as if she hasn’t been working really hard this morning: he’s never seen paperwork so ruthlessly demolished. She’s hardly stopped to drink her coffee, even.

“Do you want me to pick you up some lunch, Beckett?” Castle asks, shortly before twelve thirty.
She looks up at his question.

“Yeah. Thanks, Castle. I don’t think I’ll have time to go out, what with everything.” She waves wearily at the remaining pile on her desk, which is rapidly growing smaller, in the hope that he’ll infer that she means the workload on top of the meeting. “Chicken salad and a soda, please.” She reaches for her wallet, and hands over some bills. “And something sweet. Looks like I’ll need the sugar high to get through this lot.”

“Okay. You don’t need something sweet though. You’ve got me.” Beckett growls and then rolls her eyes.

“Not the same, Castle. I need energy.” She does. She’s been flat all day and it’s a real struggle to keep her concentration, not least because she keeps expecting Castle to open up a discussion about why she lied. She really does not need what is bound to be an emotionally intense discussion with a woman who clearly needs help, but she simply cannot let Mrs Berowitz suffer alone once she’s asked Beckett for that help.

Castle bounces off to pick up lunch, much to Beckett’s relief. He’d been a bit odd about not being able to join in, but he seems to have got over that, and she is very grateful that he’ll get her something to eat. She can feel her blood sugar dropping by the minute. By the time he gets back she’ll be done.

Mrs Berowitz is a little late, and when she calls Beckett her voice is already breaking. Beckett steers her in the direction of a nearby coffee bar, and supplies them both with caffeine. She doesn’t notice Castle wandering past the window on his way back from buying lunch. Castle, on the other hand, certainly does notice Beckett.

“Thank you for seeing me,” Mrs Berowitz chokes. “I’m sorry to disturb you, but you said” – she sniffs, and tries to pull herself together – “you’d been through this.” Beckett nods. “He’s getting worse and I don’t know what to do.”

Beckett winces internally. Mrs Berowitz isn’t going to like this conversation, she knows that already. Mrs Berowitz still thinks that she can save her husband. Mrs Berowitz is dead wrong.

“Mrs Berowitz,” she begins, gently.

“Julia, please.”

“Julia. I went through this with my father, when my mother died.” She takes a slow breath, and tries to keep calm. “I tried everything.” Another slow breath. Mrs Berowitz – Julia – is watching her as if she’s the Oracle. “And nothing worked. I couldn’t save him.” Julia’s face crumples, and she reaches for a tissue in her purse. “I spent two years trying, until I started listening to what Al-Anon was telling me.” Julia’s crying. Beckett reaches for her hand, clasps it firmly, lets it go. “It nearly killed me to step back and leave him be, but he’d have dragged me down with him. You have to step away or” –

The door to the coffee bar opens behind her as she’s saying “or it’ll bring you down too.”

“I brought your lunch over, Beckett.”

Beckett spins round and pierces Castle with a look that should have killed him stone dead on the spot. “Excuse me a moment,” she says, without a hint of her incandescent fury showing in her voice. She rises from her table, walks out of the café, and explodes.

“What are you doing, Castle? I told you that only I would be talking to Mrs Berowitz. It’s nothing to do with the case. Now stay the hell out. You’re intruding into a private conversation and you’ve done enough damage by interrupting. You knew perfectly well you weren’t included.” She spins hard on her heel, goes back into the café, through the window of which Castle can see Mrs Berowitz weeping, and returns to her discussion.

Beckett remains with Julia Berowitz for another hour, by which time she’s completely wrung out and fighting off a severe headache. She’s had to share her own experience, which is gruelling, and try to sympathise with this unfortunate woman, who doesn’t want to hear the grim reality that she can’t save her husband; all she can do is save herself. Julia only leaves on Beckett’s promise that Julia can always call her.

Beckett knows she should go back up to the bullpen, but her head hurts so much that she can’t see straight and she’s beginning to feel nauseous. She recognises the symptoms of an absolute monster of a headache (it’s not a migraine, she never gets migraines, a migraine would involve strange smells or visual disturbances: it’s only a very bad headache that two Advil will cure. She’ll be fine later on if she lies down for a while) calls Montgomery, and catches a cab home. Shortly thereafter she’s flat out on her bed, trying to find a cool patch of pillow to ease the pain.

Montgomery is not at all surprised that Beckett calls. If they hadn’t been so appallingly busy he’d have sent her home anyway. She’s never at her best on January 10, and though he’s never found a problem with her work she’s always quiet and withdrawn. He is a little surprised that she was out at lunchtime and more so that Castle’s put a lunch bag down on her desk. Some miscommunication there, surely? Especially since Castle’s looking at the elevator doors and clearly expecting her back.

“Castle?” Montgomery wanders out into his bullpen. Everybody except Castle becomes very busy and exudes look-how-hard-I’m-working from every pore.

“Yeah?”

“Beckett’s not coming back today.” That’s a rather odd expression on the writer’s face. Montgomery’s instincts twitch.

“Oh. Okay. Guess she won’t be wanting her lunch, then.”

“Do you know where she was at lunchtime? It’s not like her to ask for a lunch and then not eat it.” Montgomery is none-too-subtly fishing. Castle’s face flickers. Montgomery waits, quietly, inviting Castle to speak.
“She said she had to meet Mrs Berowitz, from that case before Christmas where her son got murdered. I remember it because Beckett said the husband was an alcoholic. She asked me to get her lunch so I thought she’d be back.”

Montgomery only just controls his face. No wonder Beckett’s called him sounding like death warmed over. It’s just as well he’d told her she could go. He nearly hadn’t, what with the pile of work they’re dealing with, and only his knowledge that Beckett would move heaven and earth not to let the team down had changed his mind. He knows what she’s done. She’s poured out compassion on someone she’s only met once and left herself empty. It makes her a brilliant detective, but some days Montgomery wishes that she’d be a little less generous to the bereaved. She works far too hard as it is.

“Okay,” is all Montgomery says, without emphasis. Castle casts him a suspicious glance. “She’ll be back tomorrow.”

Castle is sure that Montgomery knows more than he’s saying, but he doesn’t know him well enough to ask any of the questions boiling in his mind. Starting with why isn’t Beckett here? And since there is nothing for him to do, he might as well go home himself.

The loft is quiet, and empty. This suits Castle fine. He makes a drink, retires to his office, and sketches out some plans for Nikki Heat. When that palls, he plays with his latest computer game, and thinks about a pleasant dinner for himself and Alexis. Then he remembers that Alexis is out tonight, at Paige’s. In fact, she’s been out all day. It’s another irritation. He would have liked some company this evening. A peaceful afternoon was what he wanted, but now he’d like someone to talk to.

He rummages in the fridge and finds the makings of a decent dinner. That, some ice-cream, and a glass of a white wine that has somehow escaped his mother’s notice, improves his mood somewhat. He’s bored, though, and just a little lonely, and he has no inspiration to write.

When Castle is bored his mind starts to work, not always in helpful directions. This evening’s direction, however, is definitely helpful. Not, initially, pleasant, but helpful.

He’s – well, pissed – with Beckett. Beckett didn’t come back after lunch. Beckett’s lying to him, and keeping secrets from him, and not letting him shadow her properly.

He also, though, has the unpleasant feeling that he let himself down earlier, by quite deliberately ignoring Beckett’s instruction because he didn’t like it. Ow. He doesn’t like that feeling. It pursues him for a few moments, and by the time that’s passed he’s realised that he owes Beckett an apology, just as much as she owes him one. The absolute fury in her eyes should have told him he’d got it wrong right there and then. She wasn’t lying to him about that being a private meeting, and he’d interrupted. Ow. So now he just needs to find out why she lied about something as trivial as not liking mince pies. It wouldn’t have been a problem, she only needed to say she didn’t like them.

Hmmm. Time, Castle thinks, for a discussion with Beckett. Get it all out in the open, like two adults are supposed to do. And since impulse control is not one of his strengths, and, now that he thinks about it, he would very much like to clear the air and then indulge in a nicely cuddlesome Kat – or a nicely naked Beckett, depending on her preference – in his arms, he collects his coat, scarf and a hat – it’s freezing – and bounces off to her apartment, happily thinking that they will sort it all out, just like he’d thought they should on Christmas Day, and it’ll all be fine.

He’s knocking at her door, a little snow-dusted, not long later. Beckett peers round it, blearily.
“Oh,” she says. “It’s you. What do you want?” She doesn’t sound enthusiastic or, he suddenly works out, awake.

“I came to talk to you.” Beckett manages a look of confusion.

“Why? I’ll see you tomorrow. Couldn’t it wait?” Her attempt at snark is ruined by a jaw-breaking yawn followed by a wince. Castle steps inside and, in a Pavlovian reaction to pain on female faces, cuddles her in very gently. It’s about that moment that he realises she’s wearing a robe, with bare feet, and it’s none too warm. So he pushes the door closed carefully and walks over to the couch, which, since he hasn’t let go, means that Beckett ends up on the couch too.

“Can’t this wait, Castle?” she repeats, wearily. “I’m not in the mood.” Castle thinks about sweeping her up into his lap, and then looks at the furrows in her brow and the tight stress lines at her mouth and eyes. He recognises the signs. Instead of sweeping her up, he very carefully moves her on to his knee and even more carefully massages her temples with the tips of his fingers.

“Headache, Beckett?” There’s a dispirited hum of assent. “Just stay still.” The broad pads circle very gently over the lingering traces of pain. She stays quite still for a moment, and then leans limply into him. Castle, suffering an unusual and severe attack of common sense, drops the idea of a detailed conversation for the moment in favour of the idea of a comforting cuddle, and continues to rub Beckett’s temples. Gradually the furrows smooth out, though she doesn’t evince any signs of life or enthusiasm beyond the slight rise and fall of her ribs as she breathes.

“Is that better?” he asks softly.

“Mm.” She clearly makes some effort to speak. “Yes. Thanks, Castle.”

There’s a question in her face that she’s too tired to articulate. Castle, who likes helping people and likes more having soft Beckett (even if it’s not softer, and in search of affection, Kat, unfortunately) in his arms, slips her hair back behind her ears, tuts when it won’t stay put, and very gently tips her face up.

“I learned ages ago. People in the theatre were always stressed, and you can’t just not go on stage – at least if you want to have a job tomorrow. So I saw people doing this, and it worked on Mother – along with Bloody Marys,” he grins, and there’s almost a hint of a smile, “and it comes in handy sometimes.” He has a sudden awful thought. “But I’m not trying it on Ryan or Esposito. No way.”

“I don’t think you’ll ever be asked, Castle,” Beckett manages to say, though the snark it should carry is noticeably lacking.

“Phew.”

That seems to be it, as far as Beckett talking is concerned. On the other hand, life is seeping slowly back into her expression and the creases of pain have disappeared. Unfortunately, this means that she slips off his lap. Disappointment is mitigated when she stays leaning on his shoulder instead, caught in the crook of his arm. It’s beautifully comfortable.

“Want a drink, Castle?” Beckett asks, after a few moments. Castle considers. He does indeed want a drink, if only because it gives him an excuse to stay longer and snuggle up with Beckett some more, with a possible opportunity for kisses if her headache has gone. What he emphatically does not want, though, is his ill-regulated mind and mouth asking questions that will probably kick off an argument. He considers for another moment. Surely he, wordsmith extraordinaire, can phrase his questions carefully enough not to mess this evening up? He answers himself in the affirmative. His words and word craft have made him millions, after all.
“Yes please.”

In a short time coffee arrives. Castle re-envelops Beckett with no difficulty at all and not even a hint of resistance. He’s just plotting what to say when Beckett opens her mouth.

“About the mince pies.” Castle nearly drops his coffee in surprise. “I didn’t want to upset you when you’d gone to all that trouble to bring them and make that butter stuff.”

Beckett is not speaking one word that isn’t absolutely true – she’d swear to it all in court. That doesn’t mean that her words aren’t very carefully chosen. But she’s uncomfortable with her original lie and she wants to clear that up. She doesn’t like feeling that she’s let herself down – in both her own eyes and Castle’s. She carefully doesn’t consider which one makes her feel worse. She wouldn’t like the answer.

“I’m sorry,” she continues. “I should just have said I couldn’t eat them.”

“Oh,” Castle says, rather blankly. He hadn’t expected this, and he’s rather wrong-footed and certainly confounded by her apology. Oh, however, isn’t really an adequate response. Beckett’s already shrinking away from him. He eases her back towards him again. “Next time, just tell me, okay? I’m not going to get upset if you don’t like eating something. Unless it’s ice-cream, of course. If you don’t like ice-cream that’s a deal-breaker. It’ll prove you’re a pod person. Some alien in human shape, here to invade the earth and turn us all into algae-eating mind-wiped cattle that other aliens will prey on and” –

“Castle! Stop. I like ice-cream, okay?”

“Oh. Okay, then.” He sounds almost unhappy that his doomsday scenario has been defeated.

Beckett seems to have livened up marginally, from walking dead to merely half-dead, under the effects of head massage, apologising (still astounding!), and Castle’s general variety of verbal insanity. Castle notices that her robe is soft and satiny, and that its dull deep green shade brings out the hints of green in her eyes. He pats her shoulder, still gently, and discovers that the robe is very strokable. So he does.

Then he remembers that he needs to apologise too.
Someone who'll take care of me

“I’m sorry I interrupted your meeting, Beckett.”

“That’s okay.” She doesn’t say anything more. Specifically, she doesn’t explain what the meeting was about. Castle clamps down on the words cramming his throat and just manages not to ask. Beckett looks wanly at him. Clearly she’s not entirely with it.

“Did you want anything more, Castle? Because I really just want to go back to sleep. Can everything else wait till tomorrow?”

“Sure.” He has a thought. “I know. Come round for dinner tomorrow. I wanna talk to you without being interrupted every five minutes.”

“Tomorrow’s Sunday, Castle.”

“So?”

“So I can’t come round. I always have dinner with my Dad on Sunday evening if I’m not working.” She does. It’s part of the way she supports him. It’s also very convenient, however. “How about I meet you somewhere for coffee instead? There’s sure to be somewhere halfway.”

“Why not come round for coffee instead?”

There’s a sudden tension in the air, and as suddenly it’s gone. Beckett shakes her head firmly and then winces. “Ow,” she says, pauses and regroups. “Your loft is as full of interruptions as the precinct, it just has fewer corpses. Actual corpses, that is. I’m sure it’s got lots of fictional ones.” She breathes in, out, slowly, as if she’s trying to dull more pain. “Let’s go somewhere we won’t be interrupted.”

This sounds like a very good idea. The last thing Castle wants or needs is his daughter or mother either listening in (if he and Beckett are in his office) or joining in (if they’re in his family room). It’s just that he is also sure that there’s an underlying meaning to it that he’s not understanding.

“Okay. Let’s go to Ferrara’s.” Beckett looks at him. “It’s on Grand Street.” Intelligent life is no longer apparent in her face. “I’ll write it down for you.” He’d wanted answers, but he’s obviously not going to get anything more coherent than a mutter now. She’s now pale and wan again. He scribbles the address on a handy notepad he’s found on her desk, adds a time, writes another copy so he himself doesn’t forget (which would be fatal), looks at Beckett, who is drooped on her couch and whose eyes are trying to shut, and kisses her briefly on the top of her head without causing any painful movement at all.

“Till tomorrow, Beckett,” and he’s gone.

Beckett takes herself very cautiously back to bed to avoid moving her head in any half-way sudden manner at all, and is shortly out cold again. She doesn’t awaken until after nine the next morning, and still feels a little fragile as a result of the doozy of a headache from yesterday. A shower, some breakfast, and a coffee help, though she’s still not quite at her best when she leaves to make her way to Ferrara’s. Still, if Castle’s chosen it it’ll have good – or excellent – coffee – actually, she knows it does. Her brain is really slow, this morning: she’s been there, and it’s great coffee – which will improve matters, and as soon as her stomach realises she’s eaten the shaky feeling will depart. Or she can have more food. There are always nice things to eat in Ferrara’s. The thought of lemon cannoli, or sfogliatella, cheers her up immensely. The realisation that she can provide Castle with an explanation – which will not involve a single lie, but will keep him away from her father’s …er… issues – which will keep him happy and stop him asking questions, is even better.

She gets there first, which is moderately surprising, and is halfway through the first of two cannoli and two-thirds down the excellent coffee before Castle shows up.

“Sorry,” he says. “Alexis needed to talk.” Not something Beckett will challenge, but also not something she really wants to think about. She doesn’t like the reminder that her father isn’t there when she wants to talk.

“No problem. Are you going to get some coffee?” She grins, and drains her cup, offering it to him. “C’n I have some more, please?”

“Sure, Oliver.” It takes her a second to catch on, and smile.

“No gruel, thanks. I’ve plenty to eat here.” Castle looks at the remains of the cannoli, stretches towards them…

“Ow!” Beckett’s smacked his fingers.

“Paws off my breakfast, Castle. I’ll buy you your own, if you want some, but you’re not having mine.”

“Oh, Beckett. Of course I want some.” He leers. She removes the leer by passing over a bill, and Castle retires, defeated, returning with two large cups of coffee and a cannolo of his own. His momentary absence in search of caffeine and sugar-laden breakfast has given Beckett the instant she needed to organise her thoughts. She decides to begin before Castle can direct the conversation in ways she doesn’t want.

“About Mrs Berowitz,” she starts.

“Mmmm?” Castle hums hopefully.

“She wanted to talk about her husband. See if I knew anywhere that might help.” The question is obvious on Castle’s face. “I told you that you see a lot of – that – when you’re a beat cop. She was hoping for something more than AA.”

Castle winces. It really hadn’t been about the case, had it? He’d interrupted a really difficult conversation, and no wonder Beckett had been mad at him. “I’m sorry. Could you help her?”

“Not really. AA’s the best bet for her husband, unless they can afford rehab. A lot of people go to Al-Anon for support.” She doesn’t mention anything else that she’d tried. She doesn’t want this to become personalised. Her father is not a spectator sport.

Castle is, for once, quite satisfied with Beckett’s explanation. Coffee passes off pleasantly, the short distance in the same direction before Beckett peels off to her own devices is spent comfortably discussing nothing in particular, and Castle reaches home nicely contented.

Right up till the moment he remembers what he’d inadvertently overheard when he crashed the meeting. It’ll bring you down too. That had sounded like rather more than beat cop experience. Then again, he’s seen Beckett’s ability to empathise with her witnesses and the families of the victim. He’s sure she hadn’t been lying in the coffee bar, so it must simply have been that. He forgets it, almost instantly.
It takes him a fortnight to realise she hasn’t been to his loft once since before Christmas. Not only that, but he hasn’t had a single glimpse of soft Kat since…well. Since before Christmas, too, as the night she had a headache really doesn’t count. There’s always been some reason for her not to come, but now that he thinks about it, it looks like a deliberate pattern of avoidance. It’s always on her terms, on her territory, and because he hadn’t noticed it he’s gone along with it. It’s easy, and her apartment is always private – but he wants her to come to his home and be part of his life.

Oh. He doesn’t feel like he’s part of her life, never mind her being part of his. Spending time with her - no, that’s not true either. He doesn’t spend time with her. They have sex. Spectacularly good sex, but it’s always smooth, slick, sardonic Beckett and she never just wants to cuddle, or only play with the game she’d bought. She doesn’t share, either. They discuss books, or films, or current affairs. She never mentions anything personal, and while she asks how Alexis is, or his mother, and seems interested in the answers, he somehow feels the constraint and tension rising every time, and cuts it short.

Okay then. He is going to invite Beckett over and this time he will not accept any excuses. The next time he sees her outside the precinct it will be at his. He feels much better, now he’s decided that. He doesn’t want a friends-with-benefits arrangement, although he’s not even sure this qualifies as that – especially as his definition of friends involves some knowledge of each other’s lives – in fact, this is worryingly close to a booty call. If this is going to go anywhere – and he has some very firm ideas about where it should be going, starting with discovering Kat again – then it needs to be a lot better balanced.

So when the day is done and the paperwork – it’s been paperwork for two full days, which is astonishingly boring – is put away, he begins.

“Time to go, Beckett.”

“Go where? I was going home.”

“Come home with me. I’ve got a really great recipe that I want to try out.”

“I…” He can see the search for an excuse rising in her eyes as they step into the elevator. She still hasn’t thought of one when they step out of the precinct.

“No excuses. Come on.” He tucks an arm into hers and ignores her splutter, marching them determinedly towards a free cab. When they’re safely settled in, he gives his address to the driver and stops Beckett complaining by the simple tactic of pretending to settle her scarf more firmly round her face.

Beckett does not want to do this, but she doesn’t want to explain why, either. Surely she can manage one evening? She’d managed not to have to go to Castle’s for a while now, and she’s past the worst period for dealing with – or propping up – her father, so maybe it’s time to have another go. Even if it’s upsetting, she’s an adult and she can keep her unworthy, petty, jealous feelings out of this. It’s hardly the collective Castles’ fault that she’s envious of their close family life, and she has got to get over this. Better start now.

She slips a fine hand under Castle’s broad palm, and is ridiculously reassured when he closes fingers round it. Even through each of their gloves she can feel the warmth and strength of his grip. She can do this. But deep inside, unnoticed, she wishes that she needn’t do this. She doesn’t consciously think it, but a tiny niggle says Castle always gets his own way, and he’s got his own way now. Discomfort and irritation lurk unnoticed in the back of her brain, where she doesn’t spot them.

The cab drops them at the base of Castle’s building, and she shivers. Castle wraps her in, automatically – he’s developed that habit in the last couple of weeks, and it is also very reassuring. It’s so unusual that someone takes care of her – the boys wouldn’t dare, and she’d never really noticed that Will did, seeing as they were both so busy with their respective jobs that it didn’t register – that she hasn’t quite worked out why she’s letting it happen. She’s just enjoying it.

Castle has not wrapped Beckett in simply to keep her warm, but also to be able to read her reactions. She may have an excellent poker face, but she doesn’t have total body control, and small twitches and tells will inform him of far more than her expression. Right now, it’s the lack of small tells that is giving rise to some concern. She’s very slightly stiffening up, as if she’s bracing herself for something mildly unpleasant. He’s seen her like this if she’s interrogating the nastier versions of low-life. He saw her like this another time, or more than once, but he can’t quite chase down the memory. It’ll come, if he ignores it. But he doesn’t see why Beckett should be uncomfortable here, and it leaves him with a small subconscious niggle.

The niggle is by no means subconscious by the time dinner’s over. Beckett’s being nice and friendly and civil and interested in Alexis’s conversation – and it’s all entirely artificial and forced. A further month of shadowing her has given him considerable confidence in his ability to read her, and he is absolutely positive that she is tense, tending to actively uncomfortable. In a sudden blinding leap of instinct he realises that she is very, very uncomfortable with Alexis. Hiding it well, but now that he looks he can see it. He really doesn’t understand that. How could anyone be uncomfortable with his amazing daughter?

Alexis doesn’t seem to have noticed anything, which is some consolation. And as Castle watches, he also realises that Beckett may be forced and artificial but she’s putting an awful lot of effort into hiding it from Alexis, which argues that she doesn’t dislike Alexis. So something else is wrong. Something about being here. He doesn’t like that at all, and he’s not in the mood to hide it. In fact, he’s downright annoyed by it. He makes coffee, Alexis disappears, and he settles them down in his office. At least there, there is an illusion of privacy.

“Did you enjoy dinner, Beckett?” There’s more of an edge on that than he’d meant.

“Sure,” she says, a little uncertainly. “Why wouldn’t I?”

“Oh, I don’t know,” Castle says sarcastically. “Maybe because you didn’t want to come here in the first place and you’ve been faking it all evening?” There’s a flick of hurt over her face, gone almost too quickly for him to see it. Her face turns into her interrogation shell.

“What are you talking about?” Big Bad Beckett is suddenly much in evidence.

“You only came because I didn’t let you make excuses like you’ve been doing for weeks. You’re perfectly happy never to come here. All you seem to want is a booty call in your apartment on your terms. Well, that’s not what I want. I’m not doing this any more.” He pauses to take a breath, having emptied his lungs on pushing the words out.

Beckett’s entire face and body locks down cold. “Really,” she says frigidly. “Funny, I would never have realised that you didn’t want it when it seemed you were having so much fun with me. Guess I made a mistake.” She stands up smoothly. “See you around, Castle.”

She’s most of the way across the loft before he’s even worked out that she’s leaving. She’s gone before he’s realised what she said. Well, he’s not going after her. She didn’t let him finish what he was trying to say, so she can just stew. Time enough to see her at the precinct when a body drops. She’s had it all her own way so far and he’s rather had enough of that. If all she wants are booty calls he’s not up for that.
No body drops, and he spends the day writing on and off, not particularly well, but it might be useful some other time or spark some inspiration, and in between surfing the net, the fan sites, and playing his latest shoot-'em-up. He has a very pleasant dinner with Alexis, too. Up until dessert. He’s just getting the ice-cream out and teasing her about the plainness and limitation of her toppings when she opens up.

“Dad, why didn’t you go to the precinct today?”

“No body, pumpkin.”

“That doesn’t usually stop you,” Alexis says, regarding him with an unusually beady eye clearly borrowed from her grandmother.

“I was writing,” Castle points out. “I go to the precinct for inspiration, then I write. Paperwork is very uninspiring.” Alexis looks sufficiently sceptical for him to think that she has a future as a House of Representatives Committee chairman grilling investment bankers. They’d cave in an instant. He, however, is still her parent, and – he hopes – immune to it.

“Is it because you had an argument with Detective Beckett last night?”

“What?”

“You had an argument with her, didn’t you?”

“No,” Castle says, truthfully. They didn’t have an argument, because Beckett left before it got that far. Typical Beckett, shutting down and shutting out without even trying to talk about anything. She didn’t even let him talk, never mind talk herself.

Alexis raises an eyebrow in a gesture that looks horribly like she’s picked it up from Beckett. It doesn’t improve Castle’s mood, or view of Beckett’s behaviour, at all.

“Alexis, I don’t answer to you,” he says, slight sternness tinging his tones. It increases notably on his next thought and words. “And eavesdropping on my conversations is something I thought you’d grown out of age seven.” Alexis flushes. “Don’t do it again. I don’t listen in to your conversations and I won’t tolerate you listening in to mine.” She droops apologetically.

“I couldn’t hear the words, anyway. Just the tone. You were loud.” Castle looks fixedly at her. “Sorry, Dad. I just…” she trails off. Castle hugs her forgivingly.

“Just what, pumpkin?”

“What do you mean ‘really’, Dad? She talks to me as if I’m an adult. She’s got a real job and a real life.” It’s just as well Alexis can’t see Castle’s face. Every word Alexis is saying shows that her view of Beckett is so different from what Castle currently thinks that he can’t believe it. “She’s totally different from Mom and Gina.”

“Oh,” Castle says rather confusedly. “Okay. I’m sure Beckett will talk to you if you want it. So long as you’re not disturbing her when she’s working.”

“I wouldn’t do that!” Alexis is offended. Castle looks hard at her. “I won’t!”
“Okay.” Alexis finishes her ice-cream and then bounces off to her room, apparently perfectly pleased with life. Castle makes himself a coffee and repairs to his study, contemplating with equal shares of irritation Beckett’s behaviour, the lack of solid, soundproof walls in his study, and his lack of inspiration so far this evening. He’s rather rocked that Alexis is so keen on Beckett, when all he can see is Beckett’s complete discomfort at being anywhere near this loft. Since it’s not Castle with whom she had a problem, it has to be Alexis. She was only hiding it to be polite.

He doesn’t tie up Beckett’s discomfort in his loft with her strenuous previous efforts not to come here in any logical way for some further hours. In fact, it takes him till the next day to see that if she isn’t comfortable here, of course she’ll make sure that she doesn’t show up. Cause and effect.

The next morning there still hasn’t been a body, and he’s still irritated, with a heavy coating of outright annoyed. He turns his irritation into focus on his chapter and begins to write. For quite a long time, it works. Unfortunately, his stomach tells him it’s lunchtime very forcefully, pulling him out of his imaginary world and returning him to reality. Reality, in this case, being that there is no body, no excuse to go to the precinct, and therefore no excuse to pin Beckett to an interrogation room wall and shake some answers out her. He isn’t going to go until there is an external reason. If she wants to mend matters, she can put some effort in. If she doesn’t, well, he’ll know she never meant it. Pain bites at him, but he ignores it.

He goes back to writing, for the rest of the day, waiting for his phone to ring. It doesn’t.
So far away from me

Beckett had gone home, looked at the cans of soda in her fridge, wished passionately that she had a bottle of vodka to mix with them, and finally cast herself down on her couch and been miserable. She doesn’t understand at all why Castle had invited her round to dinner just to ditch her, and she’s too upset to try to work it out. Eventually she stops herself crying, changes into soft leggings and t-shirt, and goes through her yoga forms, trying to calm her mind. Needing to stop to blow her nose and blot her eyes every so often does nothing to assist in regaining her composure.

It had all been going so well, too. She’d been getting over her stupid jealousy of Castle’s relationship with his daughter – okay, so she still wasn’t wholly comfortable, but she’d been getting there – and all she’d needed was a little longer to be sorted out. Just a little longer, so that she could relax out of that hideous strength that she needs to get through Christmas and New Year, past the anniversary; past the need to hold on for her father, and the risk that she’d let something slip. And he had been better, this year. They’d played the game she’d bought him and it had been good…

She dissolves into tears again. She’d bought the game at a shop Castle had shown her and they’d played it too. Now she won’t. She’s hardly going to take it to work, is she? It’ll just sit there on the shelf, as lonely as she. Another wasted effort, another waste of time. She sits on her yoga mat, head on her knees, and wonders if she’ll ever find another opportunity to have someone who would have let her be Kat. She doesn’t think so, and right now she doesn’t even want to try. The universe obviously doesn’t think it’s in the cosmic scheme of matters.

Eventually, she goes to bed, in her quiet, cool sheets and coverlet, her muted, soothing colours and pretty, abstract patterns. And in the morning she wakens, washes, and dresses in her formal, Beckett armour of sharply tailored pants and jackets, stiffly collared and cuffed button-downs; her gun and shield in place. If she’s not allowed to be weak sometimes, she might as well prove that she’s strong.

There’s no new body, and no reason to call Castle. Only paperwork, and plenty of it. A diktat’s come down from 1PP: the cold case rate is too high: there’s to be a concerted effort to solve them. Beckett’s team hardly have any, but wider team spirit leaves them as busy as anyone as they help where they’re needed.

It’s what Beckett needs. Too busy to think, too busy to care, too busy for more than a few hours’ sleep a night. Too busy to miss Castle.

And then a new body drops a couple of days in and she has no choice but to ring him. So she hammers her voice and her feelings into complete submission to her will and calls him, though she’d have paid a small fortune to pass it off to Ryan.

“Rick Castle.”

“It’s Beckett. We got a body. Sara D Roosevelt Park, at Hester Street. We’re on our way.” Click.

When Castle gets to the crime scene Beckett, Ryan, Esposito and – oh Lord, Perlmutter, why couldn’t it have been Lanie? – are all staring at the corpse. Castle muscles his way into the group next to Beckett, who flicks a glance at him.

“Hey, Castle.” She doesn’t sound anything other than neutral. Right back to how she used to sound, in fact, last November. He suddenly wonders, for the first time, what she’d heard him say the other night. Because right now, he’s not at all sure that she heard what he thinks he said. If she had let him finish she’d have understood, he thinks, still irritated. Anyway, this is hardly the place to open a discussion about it.

“What happened?”

Perlmutter looks up with his trademark snide stare and speaks with his trademark snide tone.

“She got murdered. Have you thought up a theory yet, Mr Castle?” The word farfetched – it’s the nicest word that occurs to Castle’s thesaurical brain – is clearly intended to be inserted in that sentence.

“Perlmutter,” Esposito snaps, “how about you do your job so we can do ours? Stop flappin’ your jaw and get choppin’ her up.” Castle looks at Espo, mouth open. Espo winks at him when Perlmutter – and Beckett – aren’t looking, and makes a feed-the-birds gesture. Ryan follows up with a small grin. Perlmutter harrumphs and huffs and shortly loads the corpse into the morgue wagon, telling Beckett that he’ll have something for her shortly. It doesn’t seem to make her any happier with the day.

“Okay. This is Susan Godley. 29, not married – at least, her driver’s licence still says Miss, not even Ms – lives in the East Village, works at Canobank.” Beckett turns to Ryan and Esposito. “You two take her workplace. Anything you can find out, but I don’t suppose you’ll get much this time round.” She makes a face. “All those financial types are either close-mouthed or bragging. Either way they never say anything useful first off.”

She flicks back to Castle. “I’m going to go back to the bullpen, find out next of kin, then go see the family.” She waits a beat. “You coming, Castle?”

“Sure.” For an instant he’d thought she wasn’t even going to ask him. That would be a whole other level of neutrality. He slides into the passenger seat of the cruiser, but Beckett doesn’t hurry to get in, looking around the scene again. Finally she takes the driver’s seat, fires the engine, and starts for the precinct.

“What were you looking for, Beckett?”

“Anything unusual or off,” she replies. It’s not exactly informative.

“And?”

“And what?”

“And was there anything unusual or off?” There’s a lace of irritation through his words.

“No...” There’s a note in that which suggests very strongly that Beckett had hoped, or thinks, that there would be something, and hasn’t found it. There’s another note which suggests that the conversation is firmly over, and so it proves. Beckett has an air of furrowed-brow thinking, and there’s a strong sense of her shuffling options and considerations in her head, amplified by the twitching and tapping of her fingers on the steering wheel. Not a single syllable of her thoughts exits her mouth. This is hardly unusual, but it’s not making Castle any happier.

Back in the precinct Beckett spends a few moments hunting down next of kin information, emerging from a fog of computer data triumphantly waving a scrawled name and address. At least, Castle assumes that this is what the chicken-scratchings convey.

“Got it,” she says. “Parents.” Her look of triumph as she’s beaten the IT into submission has faded rapidly in the face of the unpleasant, necessary, task ahead of her. She looks at her watch. “It’s late.
You don’t have to come if you don’t want to.”

What? Beckett’s never asked him that before. Never. Not once. He’s never deserted a live investigation. Why on earth would she think he would now? He’s just chewing on that gristy thought when her phone rings, diverting her reach from her coat to the device.

“Beckett.”

“Okay.”

“Nothing on tox?”

“Anything else?”

“Oh. Right.”

“Prints? DNA? Anything?”

“Okay. Let me know as soon as you do.”

She looks crossly at her phone and then at Castle. “That was Perlmutter. Susan Godley was hit with a blunt instrument – we knew that right from the moment we showed up, but he can’t be more precise yet – no tox, no alcohol, no drugs, no sex” –

“Was there rock and roll?” Beckett glares.

“No prints, and no DNA. No murder weapon, either.” She mutters bitterly under her breath. It sounds very much like useless man why isn’t Lanie on this? Castle certainly sympathises with that. Perlmutter is unprepossessing in looks, intelligence and personality. He has all the charm and sparkling wit of a brain-damaged cockroach. Just as well he’s in the morgue and not allowed to practice on real live people.

Beckett is drawing a timeline. In the middle is a window for time of death, centred round five a.m. She glares at that, too.

“What’s up? You’ll set the board on fire if you stare at it much harder.” The glare is turned back on him.

“She wasn’t dressed for clubbing. So what’s an unmarried twenty-nine year old doing in a park at five a.m?”

Castle doesn’t engage brain before opening mouth. “Why don’t you tell me? You’re a hot unmarried twenty-nine year old. You don’t go clubbing. What would you be doing in a park at five a.m.?”

Beckett acquires a very strange look indeed. If he’d been asked to define it, he’d have plumped for the word agonised. But then it’s gone again, as if it had never been.

Or alternatively, trying to talk her father into going home rather than finishing the bottle. He’d come rather too close to street drunkenness on one too many occasions, before she’d abandoned him, and then past it. But he isn’t like that any more, she reminds herself. He hasn’t been for five years. She flicks another glance at her watch, face twisting almost unnoticeably, and shrugs into her coat and scarf.

“Time to go tell the parents.”
Castle follows her out to her cruiser.

“Our victim couldn’t have been looking at corpses,” he points out.

“No. Last I heard Canobank was a bank, not an outpost of the NYPD’s Homicide division,” Beckett snips.

“So why else would a single” –

“We don’t know she was single.”

“attractive, twenty-nine year old be in the park? She wasn’t in running kit, she wasn’t in clubbing gear, she wasn’t dressed up.” His eyes widen. “I know! She was meeting her CIA handler. Espionage. Working in a bank was her cover story.”

“I don’t think so,” Beckett says discouragingly. “Most likely she was going home after pulling an all-nighter.” She frowns. “It’s off.”

“What’s off?”

“I don’t know yet. Something.” She frowns even more ferociously. But that’s where it stays.

The parents are devastated, clinging to each other for support, world shattered in one sentence, breaking around them. All Beckett’s empathy is wasted on the barrier of their shared grief. They try to be useful, though, despite their agony: maybe it’s the only way they can make something better of this hour. Between boyfriends, they think. A good girl: came by every week for family dinner. Doing well at work: hoping for a promotion soon. Never really spoke about what she actually did, or knew: confidentiality was key. Didn’t want there to be any chance any of them could ever be accused of insider dealing. Apparently it had happened to one of her co-workers, and he’d been sacked out of hand, after a brief investigation.

Beckett keeps her poker face, at that last. There’s a thought. She carries on, but no more apples fall no matter how hard she shakes the tree. She leaves on a cloud of soft, sympathetic thanks and farewells, echoed by Castle.

“I’m going back to the precinct,” she says as she pulls away from the kerb. “Can I drop you off somewhere?”

“Why? Aren’t I coming back too?”

“There won’t be anything more tonight. Perlmutter’s off-duty” – she makes an annoyed noise at the fortunately absent ME – “and I’ve got other work to do. 1PP’s put a purge on old cases, and we’re all busy.”

“I could help.”

“Paperwork, Castle. Not your strong point.” And, of course, she doesn’t want him there. She wants peace and quiet and solitude and definitely not the man who ditched her two nights ago. Still, she’s been strong all day. It’s not as if she had let him get under her skin. Not at all.

Castle makes a mutinous face. “I can help,” he grumbles. Beckett is unmoved. “You’re supposed to let me shadow you. How’m I supposed to know how the precinct ticks if I don’t see all of it?”

“Use your imagination, Castle. You’ve got plenty of it.”
She’d have said that right back at the beginning, too. In exactly that get-lost-playboy tone. She’s shutting him out. First she wouldn’t come to his loft, then she walked out on him, and now she’s behaving just like she did in the beginning. He’d wanted something better than a series of booty calls, and she’d blown him off without even letting him finish or explaining why. Now she’s acting like it’s all his fault. Well, it’s not his fault and he’s not going to behave like it is. Nor is he going to allow her to shut him out. He’s got a book – likely a series – to write, and he’s not going to let that be spoilt just because Beckett’s played him for a fool.

He retreats into silence and thought. He’d really thought that she might be up for a proper relationship, and she’d simply walked away. Her loss. It doesn’t bite any less today than it had two days ago, and telling himself he’s well rid doesn’t help either. He will at least extract an explanation from her, but not now.

“We’re here,” Beckett’s cool, clear tones interrupt his thinking. Here is Broome Street, and specifically his building. “See you tomorrow. Maybe Perlmutter will have got his finger out his ass and found something useful by then. Wish it were Lanie.”

Castle is left with no option but to get out the car – at least, unless he’s willing to start an argument. He isn’t, and he’s also not willing to take the chance that Beckett really meant that she was going back to do paperwork and old cases. Regardless of what he had said, that provides him with neither background nor inspiration.

Beckett makes her way back to the Twelfth in welcome solitude punctuated by the irritated tapping of her fingers on the wheel. For as long as she can be irritated by the case she won’t be made miserable by the rest of her life. Even if “that’s not what I want. I’m not doing this any more” is on repeat loop in her head. She’s got far too much to do to think about that.

The bullpen is quiet and gloomy, and the pile of cold cases casts shadows across Beckett’s desk. By some quirk of lighting and the alignment of the pile of files, the shadows look as if they’re reaching out to claw at her. She shivers, and shakes off the momentary chill. There are no ghosts here. Only the job and the case and a way to forget. She’s a success: everybody knows it. But here and now, the ravenous maw of 1PP needs fed and satiated: or she won’t be a success for long. She stands between the living and the dead; between her team and the brass. And between her father and perdition.

She pulls the first file from the pile, and begins.

In between the cold case files, and occasionally during, as questions or points occur to her on the live case, Beckett scrawls her thoughts on a separate piece of paper, or on her murder board. The man sacked for insider trading keeps pressing on the front of her head. After four old cases, and with the clock rounding on midnight, she’s too tired to continue. She’ll go home, and return early. The murder board, now bespattered with her thoughts, blindly watches her leave, somehow reproachful: as if she should stay longer, press on further, work harder. She still has to push herself to do more, do better, to push away the burdens of her life. After all, she hasn’t found any other way to do so, and her previous hope that she might have found a way had been broken on the wheel of Castle’s words and her inability to be comfortable seeing him with his family. Nothing else, but to work and forget.

Dawn slithers greyly through her curtains, and brings her to wakefulness. Tired as she is, once her eyes have opened she can’t find sleep again, shrugs on her daytime self and begins again.

She’s sipping a second cup of coffee and scowling at the latest cold file when Esposito saunters in.
“Yo, Beckett.”

“Hey, Espo.” Esposito casts a darkling glance at the murder board.

“Get somewhere? Gotta lot of stuff up there, wasn’t there last night. You been home?”

“Yep. Had some thoughts, wrote them up. D’you want to add what you got? Anything from the co-workers? Has Ryan started on cameras, cell phone records? How’d she get to the park anyway? Do we know?”

Espo looks unimpressed at the memory of talking to the bank staff. “Not much. Shut their mouths as soon as we flashed the badges.” Beckett scowls even more blackly.

“Nothing?”

“Didn’t say that,” Espo smirks. Scowl changes to outright glare.

“What do we got, Espo?”

“We got the name of the guy who got fired for being suspected of insider trading.” Beckett’s glare changes to a feral smile.

“Do we now? Make me happy, Espo. Tell me that Ryan or uniforms are picking him up.” Esposito grins in return.

“Guess I’m makin’ you happy, Beckett. ‘Cause that’s what’s happenin’ right now.” Her smile acquires fangs.

By the time that Ryan and a couple of sizeably burly uniforms have returned, Beckett’s had sufficient time to sharpen her smile, fangs and mood into razor-edged focus. The reason for a couple of big uniforms becomes obvious as soon as she looks into Interrogation from Observation – this man is himself big, and fit, and in a very, very bad mood. That suits Beckett just fine. She’s not at all impressed by the greed-is-good, big swinging dicks of Wall Street, and she’s not in the best of moods herself. This guy looks as if he’s up for a fight and to try to intimidate her. Boy, is he in for a nasty surprise.

“Espo, Ryan, I’m going to take this one alone,” she says. “He’s just the type to think he can outthink or outmuscle a woman, so we’re going to use his stupidity against him.” The boys grin back at her, nastily. They’ve watched this game before, and it’s always entertaining. For them. It’s very rarely any fun for the one on the other side of the table.

Beckett delays for a psychologically significant time precisely calculated to let the suspect wind himself up to fury at being treated like an ordinary person. After all, he’s wearing a designer suit that probably cost 3,000 dollars or more, his watch looks like a Breitling, and he’s wearing a very obvious signet ring. He clearly thinks he’s the top of the tree.

She walks in.

“What am I doing here? You’ve no right to hold me. Do you know who I am?”

“Yes. You’re James Cardon, lately fired from Canobank for insider dealing. You’re lucky you’re not in an orange jumpsuit.” Beckett’s voice is cold and contemptuous, designed to reduce arrogant fools to a small pile of waste inside three sentences.

“That was a mistake. I’m suing. That bitch lied.”
“Who lied?” This is almost too easy.

“Susan. Susan Godley. The uber-bitch of compliance. She invented the whole thing to have me out. She hated me. She just wanted to get back at me for having the job she wanted and making megabucks while she was pulling down peanuts.”

“So she was in compliance? Hardly likely to want your job as a trader. Looks like her job trumped yours, though. After all, you got fired.”

“So? I’ll get a better deal. No skin off my nose.” Beckett raises a cynical eyebrow.

“This day and age? You’ll be lucky to get a job sweeping the streets. She’s screwed your life up, and you’re trying to tell me you’re not bothered? Guess what, Cardon, I don’t believe you. You’ve been out of work for three weeks already because of her.” There’s fury blazing in his face, now, but sweat on his lip. Beckett starts to go in hard.

“I bet when we run your financials we’ll find that you’re living way beyond your means, Cardon. You’ll have to sell that pretty watch.” She’s taunting, pushing. Because he hasn’t asked the obvious question – Why am I here? And he’s so convinced he’s the smartest person in the room that he hasn’t asked for a lawyer either. Perfect. Just what she likes. Stupidity all dressed up in self-importance.

“Fuck that, cop. I’ve done nothing wrong.”

“I’ll decide that.” She waits a beat. “Where were you between four and six this morning?” It suddenly, obviously, dawns on him that he’s in serious trouble.
I'm not in love

“What the hell is this about?”

“Where were you?”

“In bed.” Beckett raises a nastily sceptical eyebrow.

“Really? Whose bed?”

“My own bed.”

“Really. You sure about that?”

At that point there’s a knock on the door. It’s Ryan.

“A moment, please, Detective Beckett,” he says, in the formal way they use when they want to prove to a suspect that she is quite unquestionably and unmistakably the one in charge. (She’s always in charge.)

“I’ll be back,” she says ominously.

“What is it, Ryan?” He grins boyishly at her.

“Well, Beckett, I got building security footage from the vic’s building, her work, and this asshole’s building too, and while you’ve been fretting him and sweating him, I’ve been running it. Guess what?”

Beckett acquires the edged, predatory expression of a starved tiger looking at a tethered goat.

“You found something.”

“I sure did. Two somethings.”

“Spill it, then.”

“Spill what,” comes from behind her. It’s Castle.

“Hey, man,” chirps Ryan. He turns back to Beckett. “Cardon went to her building late last night. Hung around for a while, then left. ‘Bout four thirty, she left. Colleagues told us she liked to start really early: she was often talking to Europe, sometimes even Hong Kong or Dubai. Time zones.”

“Time zones are a pain,” Castle interjects. “When I’m on book tours I’m always trying to work out what time it is so I’m not calling Alexis to say goodnight in the middle of class.” Beckett ignores the irrelevancy.

“So what was the other something?”

“Well, Cardon went back to his building and never left again, so his alibi checks out.” Beckett winces. Sending down a rich, arrogant asshole would have been highly satisfying. “But come and look at this.”

They make their way to the tech room and Ryan loads up the footage. “This is the view from the street cams from her building towards the park. Lookee here.” He points to a figure. “That’s Susan.” He runs a few frames forward, and points again. “That’s someone falling into step behind her, and if I go back” – he does – “you can see them waiting for her.”

“Someone who knew her habits,” Castle points out.

“Even if Cardon could have slipped out again, that’s not him.” Her voice holds a tinge of regret. “Far too small, and female.”

Espo joins them. “Looks like someone really wanted to talk to our vic.” He peers at the screen. “Looks like an argument.”

“Okay. Let’s see if we can get a better view, or anything that might help us identify her. Can we track them any further? Ryan, you get more footage, closer to the park and the crime scene. See if we can pick the suspect up catching a cab or in the subway, or at an ATM. It’s a long shot. While Ryan’s doing that, Espo, you go back and ask her co-workers who she’d had a row with recently. Get uniforms canvassing for witnesses on that walk. At four-thirty in the morning, we’ll be lucky even to get the pan handlers, but they might as well try.”

“What are you going to do?” Castle asks, not entirely innocently.

“Let Cardon out,” Beckett growls, “then try to think about what was off at that scene. Shake some info out of Perlmutter, too.”

While Beckett clacks off, with annoyance in every tap of her heels, to release Cardon, Castle reviews her murder board, and is considerably more irritated than he has any right to be when he realises that it contains an awful lot of thinking that clearly took more time than just this morning. And he missed the interrogation, which would have provided him with a substantial quantity of inspiration and fixed Nikki Heat’s demeanour firmly in his head again. It takes him a few moments to realise that Beckett hasn’t returned.

Castle slides into Observation, and notes with gathering annoyance that Beckett is still interrogating Cardon. She’s taken the cuffs off him, though, and her expression and demeanour is less hostile and more focused than if he were still a suspect. But Castle should be in there, not out here watching. Still, he can’t interrupt. He’ll simply have to wait, shut out of the action again.

Shut out her life, shut out the case. She’s put up all her walls again, and he hasn’t the faintest idea why. She’s the one who walked out, and yet she’s behaving like he’s the bad guy.

He watches and listens, and a few minutes later Beckett exits, with Cardon.

“We might want to talk to you again, Mr Cardon. Don’t leave town.”

“You can’t say that.”

“Yes she can,” says Castle, helpfully. Cardon looks bitterly at the two of them and leaves.

“Why didn’t you let me sit in?” Castle asks as the elevator door closes behind Cardon.

“Because he was a misogynistic jackass who thought he could out-think me. If you had been in there he wouldn’t have reacted the way I wanted.”

Oh. Okay then. That makes sense, he supposes. He just doesn’t like it, which reminds him of his earlier grievance.

“And what about all the extra points on your murder board? I thought you said you were working on old cases?”

“I was. But just because I’m working on an old case doesn’t mean I don’t have ideas on the new one. So when I did I wrote it down.” She looks coldly at him. “Would you prefer I forgot them? Lost a possible lead?”

“Don’t be ridiculous. Of course not.” He can’t argue with that either. It’s all so very sensible and reasonable and he still feels as if she’s shutting him out. “So what did he tell you?”

“Nothing useful. She got him fired – and I’m sure he deserved it – but he didn’t know if anyone else had been fired, if anyone disliked her, or anything outside his fat arrogant greedy head. Useless.” Her face contorts into a grimace. “And thinking of useless,” she carries on, “now I need to call Perlmutter.”

Calling Perlmutter only gets them summoned to the morgue. Perlmutter, it appears, wants to show them something. Well, he wants to show Beckett something. But Castle isn’t going to be shut out any more, and besides which, him showing up will irritate Perlmutter immensely.

It does. Perlmutter is extremely irritated, and doesn’t scruple to show it. Rather stupidly, though, he ignores Beckett’s obvious desire for answers in favour of sniping at Castle. It takes – oooohhh, around three seconds? – for that to backfire.

“Doctor Perlmutter! Are you going to say anything useful or are you going to behave like a playground toddler some more? Quit trying to rile Castle and do your job. We’re not here to listen to you making an ass of yourself.”

Castle stares at the back of Beckett’s head. She’s defending him. Well, standing in the way of Perlmutter’s nastiness, anyway. What on earth is going on here?

Perlmutter sulkily coughs up the limited information he’s found: mainly that the blow was struck with limited force, probably by someone slightly shorter than Susan Godley, but through sheer misfortune had connected at the right angle to kill her.

“That’s it?” Beckett says. “Nothing more?”

“That, Detective, is it. There is no more information. You and your pet Malamute can leave now. Stop distracting me and let me get on with some real work.”

It is quite possible that Beckett is going to shoot Perlmutter. Her hand has even dropped to her hip. Castle, while appreciating her sentiment, is strongly of the opinion that if she’s going to go down for murder it should at least be in a good cause, not for squishing a cockroach. He very cautiously – he doesn’t need shot, either – taps his fingers over the hand on her gun, and puts his other hand very gently on her shoulder to turn her to leave. The fact that he would like to punch Perlmutter’s lights out isn’t really doing much for his mood, either; but at least he and Beckett are back on something approaching the same page.

Beckett fulminates high and wide about Perlmutter all the way back to the precinct. She doesn’t draw breath till they’re halfway there, when Castle jumps in.

“Beckett, your insults are no doubt heartfelt, but they’re very clichéd.” There’s a growl from the driver’s seat. “I’ve got some much better ones for you. Alexis gave me a book a couple of Christmases ago called Shakespeare’s Insults and it’s got some wonderful ones.”

“Like what?” Her words are brisk, but he can hear that he’s caught her interest.
“Well, there was ‘thou deboshed fish thou’.”

“I get the fish bit. But deboshed?”

Castle shrugs. “Debauched, apparently. I looked it up.” He grins happily. “Then there was ‘Thou art like a toad; ugly and venomous’, and ‘Thou cream faced loon’ which I really liked.” Beckett is already sniggering before he’s finished the second insult.

“And finally: ‘Some report a sea-maid spawn’d him; some that he was begot between two stock-fishes. But it is certain that when he makes water his urine is congealed ice.’” Castle smirks.

“C’mon, Beckett. You can’t say that this doesn’t describe Perlmutter precisely.”

By then she’s laughing almost too hard to drive safely.

“Stop, Castle. At least till I get us back. I don’t want to crash.” She splutters again as she mutters “cream faced loon”. They’re closer to normal than in weeks, as the journey passes with muffled snickers and sniggers and snorts, every time one of them thinks about the insults.

Ryan has been reviewing camera footage from around the park. There’s not enough of it, and it’s significantly impaired by the number of blown bulbs in the streetlamps, but there’s some. And that some has the same shadowy figure within it, leaving via East Houston. And while there aren’t that many street cameras at the exit, there are street cameras at the subway station and there are cameras in the subway station and suddenly they have a clear view of their shadow-perp as it pushes its hood back and is revealed to be female (as suspected), with short dark hair and a curvaceous figure.

“I’ll see if the techs can enhance the picture,” he says.

“Can we get that to Espo anyway for the canvass? Might help.”

“She’s little,” Castle says, incredulously. “How does anyone that small hit hard enough to kill someone?”

“You’d be amazed,” Ryan says. “Tap the right point and it’s all over.”

“And you can’t tell in that coat how fit she is,” Beckett points out. “For all we know she’s the state weightlifting champion for Illinois.”

“Doesn’t look likely,” Castle notes.

“That doesn’t mean it isn’t true.”

“One case we got, Perlmutter told us the hit was by someone six-foot eight. We went looking for a basketball player. Turned out to be someone five-foot three, an’ shaped more like the basket ball.”

“Huh?”

“He was standing on a table when he coshed the vic.” Castle sniggers at Ryan’s tale.

“Are you saying I shouldn’t make assumptions?” There’s a very tiny tension starting to become apparent.

“Yes. Cop work needs an open mind. So she might be the weightlifting champion of Illinois. It’s not very likely, though. What is possible is that she goes to a gym somewhere and does some training, from the way she moves. Or she could just be a yoga nut and do it at home. Point is, we don’t know. Till we find her, we don’t know anything. Till we get the footage enhanced, we don’t know anything more than a guess at her height – and she could be wearing flat boots or heeled boots so we could be up to four inches off either way – and that she’s got dark hair. She could go to a salon this morning and be blonde or red or brunette or blue.”

Beckett stops for breath.

“So we need someone to recognise the photo, or get the sketch artist to do a new one?”

“Yes. Till then, assumptions just lead us down the wrong track.”

Castle can’t help his pointed look at her following that comment.

“Yeah?” she says.

“You never make assumptions?”

“No. I rely on what the evidence and the witnesses tell me and follow the leads and then we cross-check them. That’s what we do.”

“Is it?” Castle mutters bitterly. It’s not what she’d done in his loft. She’s never checked her thinking about that. She just walked out.

Beckett and Ryan are discussing how fast the footage can be enhanced and don’t hear him.

Matters might have been superficially lightened by the back-and-forth in the car, but nothing’s actually fixed. Castle goes and makes himself a coffee and then, when the caffeine hit has soothed him slightly, makes another, and one for Beckett. He might be irritated, but he won’t be rude.

Nor, it seems, will Beckett. “Thanks, Castle,” she says with a small smile. “I need it. I hate those Wall Street traders. Best way to deal with them is to reduce them to nothing.” Her teeth flash white and sharp. “Works every time.”

“Sure does,” Ryan says from behind Castle. “Makes great watching.”

“Watching? You weren’t in there?”

“Naw. No way. It only works if Beckett’s in on her own. They either try ‘n come on to her or they try to treat her like a fluffy-headed idiot. Then – bam! And they’re looking for their balls in the trash.”

Ryan and Beckett exchange a satisfied smile. Castle’s mood has improved immensely. Not just not him, but not anyone. That’s…very bearable. Very.

“Wish I’d seen it,” Castle droops, theatrically.

“Get here a bit earlier, then,” Ryan suggests, grinning. “We brought him in not much after eight.”

“Ugh,” Castle says. “That’s still night-time.” Beckett rolls her eyes. Castle grins, relaxed for the first time this morning. “I wouldn’t have been able to learn anything. Too busy yawning.”

“He went to pick up the footage.”
“What footage?” Beckett raps out.

“The footage from Canobank’s reception area. Seems our girl had a very angry visitor, couple of days ago. Day before we found her.”

“Ooohhh,” Castle says happily. He can hardly wait till Esposito returns, bouncing in his chair and far more fidgety even than normal. Fortunately Espo is not long. Beckett is beginning to look as if she’s going to shoot him if he doesn’t calm down.

“It’s her!” comes in quadruple stereo. It is, indeed, the woman from the subway footage.

“She wasn’t happy, was she?”

“Screaming mad.”

“Espo,” Beckett says coolly, “tell me you got a name out of the receptionist.”

“And what else, Espo?”

“She was Cardon’s girlfriend.”

“What are we waiting for? Go pick her up.”

“Uniforms are already on it, Beckett. Thought I’d come an’ give you the good news. Might cheer you up. You’ve looked like someone pissed on your parade all week.”

Castle pricks up his ears. Beckett’s been miserable? Good, he thinks, unworthily. That makes two of them. His thought is swiftly followed by why? He wonders again what she thinks he said. Then he stops wondering, because he knows. He said he wasn’t doing it any more. And she walked out before he could say I don’t just want booty calls. Well, if she’d waited for an explanation she wouldn’t be miserable. Of course, nor would he. He takes a proper look at Beckett. Miserable appears to be an understatement.

“C’mon, Castle. Carrie Franks is here.”

Interrogation matters are back to normal, it seems.

“Yeah, that was me. So what? That bitch got my fiancé fired.”

“Fiancé?” Castle says, surprised.

“Yeah. She wanted him for herself. Couldn’t stand it when we got engaged.” Beckett strongly doubts that, from the picture of the victim she’s built up. Still, if it keeps this woman talking… Carrie Franks is as arrogant and stupid as her boyfriend – fiancé – and is making much the same mistakes. Beckett lets sympathy seep into her voice and picks up the thread that Castle’s tugged.

“When did you get engaged?”

“Month ago.” Ah. But…

“Can I see your ring?” Castle asks. “I’m a bit of a connoisseur of fine jewellery.” Beckett only just stops herself shaking her head, but it works.

“Haven’t got one.”
“That’s unusual,” Beckett says, concerned interest in her voice. The rhythm and flow of their joint interrogation is sweeping Carrie up. Beckett is extremely interested, but concern isn’t her primary feeling. Suddenly she realises what was off at the scene. If Susan Godley was on her way to work, why wasn’t she wearing the right number of accessories? She had make-up on, so why not more jewellery? It’s Rule 101 of professional female work – if you’re not a cop, of course. She should have had earrings, a necklace and at least one ring – most likely. Maybe a bracelet, as well. She’d had earrings and a slim pendant – but nothing else. “Why not?”

“We had one all picked out. Jamie” – Jamie? Pet name, clearly – “showed me it in Van Cleef & Arpels. It was beautiful…” Her face twists. “And then that bitch Godley started the investigation and he was fired and couldn’t put the deposit down. When his name’s cleared, we’ll go back.”

Beckett’s mind is racing through the implications. From the focused aura beside her, so is Castle’s.

“I’d like you to write out your statement, please, Ms Franks.” And don’t scare the horses here. “We’ll leave you to do that.” She passes over pen and paper, and they exit, back to the murder board.

“That’s what was off.”

“What?”

“No ring. She should have had one. We need to ask her mother what she normally wore. Ryan!”

“Yo?”

“Get that reception footage enhanced as far as you can. I wanna know what jewellery our victim was wearing that day – necklace, rings, bracelets.”

“On it.”

“You think she did it.”

“I do. I think she did it and took the ring. Espo!”

“Yo, boss?”

“You get down to the morgue – if I have to go see Perlmutter I’ll likely punch him if he doesn’t quit with the snide remarks – and see if he can get any traces of wearing a ring and any prints from Susan’s hands. I know it’s a long shot. When you’ve done that, get Cardon back and ask him about this ring and engagement.”

“I think she did it too,” Castle says. “It fits the story.”

“C’mon, then. We need to go see her parents again.”

Beckett is not talkative, in the car. Castle recognises her running thoughts and leads and evidence trails, and doesn’t interrupt. Building theory together this morning, and sharing the interrogation, has returned him to some equanimity. It’s also returned him to some ability to reason and think. Mostly, what he’s thinking is that he needs to do some thinking. He could usefully start at I rely on what the witnesses tell me. Oh. Ooops. He told her he wasn’t doing it any more and she took him at his word. Relied on what he told her. No assumptions required. And Kate Beckett would never bother with anything within a hundred miles of begging for a second chance.

But. That’s all very well, but. She wouldn’t even dip a toe in the water of a relationship, let alone dive in. And if that’s how she feels, there’s not much point hoping for more. Better to cut his losses and stop now. Except that there had been soft, affectionate Kat. Until suddenly there wasn’t.
Under pressure

They’ve pulled up at the parents’ block. Beckett leads the way with her normal swinging step, strength and purpose in every pace. Just as they’re about to knock, though, her phone rings. She holds a hand up to pause Castle, and takes the call.

“Beckett.”

Castle observes closely as the colour drains from her face.

“Okay. Lunchtime. One o’clock. Same place. I’ll be there.” She clicks the phone shut. There is no explanation. “Sorry about that.” She raps on the door before anything can be asked.

“Mr Godley, I’m sorry to bother you again, but could we ask you and your wife a few more questions?”

“Yes,” he says heavily, grief weighting the words. “But be quick, please. We… we need peace.” He lets them in and ushers them through.

“Mrs Godley,” Beckett says gently, “did Susan normally wear jewellery to work? A necklace, or a ring?”

“Oh yes. Both a necklace and ring. She was always very smart. She said it helped remind people that she was a serious professional in a serious job. Some of the people she met were inclined to forget that, just because they made millions in bonuses.”

Beckett exchanges a swift look with Castle. “Could you describe her jewellery, especially her ring? Or would you work with a sketch artist to have a picture?”

“If it helps, sure. Anything to help you find her…” she starts to tear up. Mr Godley puts an arm round his wife, and she leans into him. Leans on his strength, Beckett thinks, sadly, and doesn’t show it by a single flicker. Not like the Berowitzes. No evidence of that, here.

“What do you need?” Mr Godley says. “We’ll do it.”

“If you could come down to the Twelfth Precinct this afternoon, I’ll arrange for you to sit with a sketch artist who’ll draw a picture of the jewellery that we can circulate.”

“It’s missing?”

“Yes.”

“That was my grandmother’s ring,” Mrs Godley is now in full-blown tears. Her husband gathers her in. Beckett watches, and a tiny stiffness enters her spine.

“It wasn’t valuable,” he says. “But it meant a lot. The necklace she bought herself, with her first paycheck.”

“What does the ring look like?”

“A pearl, with tiny diamonds round it. Looked a bit like a flower. A daisy. She wore it on her right hand, fourth finger.” He embraces his wife. “Could you…” He throws a glance at the door. “We’ll come down at two-thirty.”
“Thank you,” Beckett and Castle say in unison, already rising. The last thing Beckett hears as the door closes is soft words of comfort and consolation. Her shoulders tighten further.

Castle is confused. Beckett, he knows, pours out compassion on the victim’s family. And so she has. But now she’s all tensed up and it started halfway through that interview. Not to mention the phone call beforehand, which she isn’t mentioning. Beckett has far too many odd pauses and hitches in her conduct, he suddenly realises. The problem is, there doesn’t seem to be any reason for them. Hm. Maybe that would repay some thought. Later.

“Lunch, Beckett,” he says thoughtlessly.

“Can’t, sorry. I’ll pick something up on the way back.”

“Can’t?”

“I’ve got things to do. Do you want to come back to the precinct or shall I drop you off somewhere and see you later? I’ll be back by two for the Godleys.”

“Okay.” What else can he say? “Precinct, please.” But… Beckett had said same place. Not usual place, which implies it’s not a person she meets often. Hm. Castle makes a huge leap of logic which is totally unsupported by any minor little props such as facts or evidence, and concludes that this is Mrs Berowitz and that means that Beckett will be in the same coffee bar as last time. Hm. It won’t hurt to check it out. This time, though, he definitely won’t go in and interrupt. He’ll just pass by, and observe.

And then he’s going to go home tonight and do some serious thinking, because nothing he is seeing makes any sense at all.

Castle’s line of thought is somewhat supported when Beckett turns in the direction of the previous café in which she’d met Mrs Berowitz. He locks down the desire to follow her and goes up into the bullpen to see what the boys are doing.

Eating lunch, is the answer. The footage is still with the techs, and Perlmutter is trying to find more prints, so there’s not a lot to be done except for Castle to report what they found.

“So where’s Beckett?”

“Don’t know.” He doesn’t know. He suspects. Strongly suspects. “She said she had things to do and she’d see us at two.” He changes the subject. “I need lunch. I’d offer to get you some, but you started without me.”

“If you’d been in earlier you’d have been hungry too.”

“Yeah, well. Sure I can’t get you anything?”

“We’re good.”

Castle wanders out and wanders in the general direction of the café in which he’s surer by the moment Beckett is sitting. He’s equally sure that she’s with the unhappy Mrs Berowitz, and as he casually detours by the café he has that confirmed. One swift and penetrating glance through the windows shows him Beckett with her arm round her. He deduces that there are tears, wonders why Mrs Berowitz is leaning on Beckett, whom she wouldn’t have known from Adam – or Eve – two months ago, and adds it to his list of matters for later. His sharp mind is now very busy indeed, and remains very busy all the way through lunch.
Mrs Berowitz is married to an alcoholic. Last time, Beckett was talking to her about Al-Anon. Last time, Beckett had claimed that as a beat cop you see a lot of that. Last time, he’d forgotten that Beckett had said it’ll bring you down too. A beat cop doesn’t know that. Not, at least, from being on the beat.

Stop. Stop right there. He needs to tuck this away and not forget it. But right now, he needs to concentrate on the case, and not on maybees and might-bes and wannabes, because…

Because Beckett’s just come back, and she looks like hell. Not that it stops her tearing into the case again, wanting to know where everything has got to.

“Footage due back any minute.”

“Put the fear of God” – shouldn’t that be the fear of Beckett, Espo? It’s worse – “into Perlmutter. He promised me results before four.”

“Good. The Godleys are coming in shortly to work with the sketch artist. Susan should have had a pretty distinctive ring on. She didn’t. I’m liking Carrie Franks more and more.”

“Makes a good story,” Castle points out. “You deprive me of my ring, I’ll deprive you of yours. It fits.”

And on that highly positive note the Godleys arrive.

Once they’re settled comfortably, Castle follows Beckett to the break room where she’s making her coffee in a way which suggests that it’s all that’s holding her in one piece.

“You okay, Beckett?”

“Fine,” she says. Castle hums sceptically, and receives only a filthy look in return. “I am fine.” She stalks back to her desk. Shutting him down and out, again. He’s good enough to contribute to the case but not good enough for her to talk to? Nothing new there, but he doesn’t have to like it.

Beckett would rather be anywhere than here. Her preference would be her own apartment, on her own, with two Advil and – though this would astonish all who know her – a cup of herbal tea. Camomile, for preference, though peppermint would also do. Julia had been… difficult. She, too, had been just that difficult, once; that disbelieving. And so, when someone else needs her strength to lean against, to rage and rail and fight against reality – she couldn’t refuse. She can’t be weak, when someone else needs her to be strong.

The Godleys need her to be strong. To fight for their dead daughter, find the culprit and find them justice. They need her to be strong, and leaving for her own peace would be weakness. This case is almost broken, and she’ll see it out before she takes her rest. She can be strong: for them, for Julia Berowitz, and for her own self-respect. She can be strong for as long as she has to be. After all, she’s managed it for the last ten years. Why change the habit of an adult lifetime?

Enhanced footage shows Susan Godley wearing the ring during the argument. The sketch artist produces a picture in short order, which matches up.

“Oh hay. Let’s get uniforms canvassing pawnshops and jewellers round about where she was found with the picture of the ring and a shot of Carrie.”

“Oh it,” Ryan says, and decamps to start it going. “We don’t have a lot of the day left to get to them.”
“I know,” Beckett says. “But get them started, so they can carry on first thing. Perlmutter come up with anything yet?”

“Just called me,” Espo says, sidling up to the group at the murder board. “Smears, but no clear prints. No help.”

“No change there,” Beckett mutters darkly. “I’m going to see Montgomery. See if he thinks I’ve got enough for a warrant to search Carrie’s apartment.” She’s halfway across the floor before Castle gets round to reacting, and by the time he does the door is shutting.

“Sir?”

“Mmm?” Beckett runs through the evidence and the case to date. “Okay, Beckett. I think you’ve got enough for a warrant.”

“Thank you, sir.” She starts to turn to leave.

“A moment, Detective.” Montgomery is formal.

“Sir?”

“I don’t want you in here after seven tonight. Understand? I know you saw Mrs Berowitz today” –

“How?”

“Saw you,” Montgomery says laconically – “and I can see you’re exhausted. I’d send you home now but you’re on a case. If you’re not out of here before seven, I will order you to leave. The cold cases will wait. Got it?”

“Sir.”

Beckett exits before Montgomery can confound her any further.

“Did we get it?” Castle asks, the boys listening hopefully.

“I have enough for a warrant,” Beckett says, with a strong emphasis on I. “So if you can all contain your enthusiasm, I’ve got to type it up stat and get it into a judge before they all go home.” She’s already opening up the form, staring at the screen as if glaring will hurry up the document loading slowly.

“Why didn’t you let me come too?”

“I didn’t stop you. It’s only a warrant request. Nothing new. You know all about the case, and you’ve seen me get warrants before.”

“I’m here to shadow you.”

“Better luck next time, then.” She looks at her watch, winces, and starts to type. She hasn’t much time to get this done. “Gotta get this together. I’m running out of day.”

When she next looks up, Castle is gone. She hadn’t noticed him say goodnight. Maybe he hadn’t. It wouldn’t surprise her, really. It’s not as if there’s any reason he should say goodnight specially to her. She finishes her request for a search warrant and prints it out to sign. That’ll go into the system now, and then she’ll go home, since she’s been ordered to.

So that’s what she does, one short step ahead of Montgomery’s looming wrath. Home is quiet, and cool, and soothing. She has some dinner, two Advil, and tea; and doesn’t look at the game on the shelf or the row of Richard Castle books in the book case. Instead, she spends half an hour on slow yoga forms, and then loses herself in re-reading Chekov’s short stories, in Russian. It takes all her concentration, which was the idea. No-one rings her, and she doesn’t ring anyone except her father. She calls him every week. See him Sunday for dinner, ring him during the week – she’s later than usual this week, they’ve been so busy – and he goes to AA two or three times every week, first thing in the morning. He never misses.

Which thought brings her back to Julia Berowitz, crying in the café for the life she doesn’t have any more. It’ll never be the same. She might save the marriage, but Julia can’t save her husband, just like Beckett couldn’t save her father. Only he could change himself. He had. But it had taken five years of hell for him to realise it, and even now it’s fragile. They’re so careful of each other: they never talk about it now. He’d apologised, and made amends, and done everything that AA recommends; but still, she’s never been able to listen to it again and she’s never, ever told him how much he hurt her, how the scars still pull and ache and all her memories of her mother are in some strange way soiled and tainted. Why are you so like her? I can’t stand it. Go away. And in the next breath – the next gulp of whiskey – You’re so like her. You’re so strong. Don’t leave me, Katie. She’s had to be strong, because she never had the chance to be weak. She’s not sure she knows how to stop being strong, any more. She’s not sure she knows how to share her burdens.

Not that it matters. There’s no-one to share them with. She couldn’t get over her petty, pathetic, disgusting jealousy of Castle’s happy family life and unsurprisingly he’d ditched her because she couldn’t hide her discomfort at being exposed to it. If she’d been stronger… if she hadn’t shown her weakness: been as strong as she is any other time… hidden her history better… He might not have known how she felt but that doesn’t really matter. He’d have done it earlier if he’d realised how unpleasantly envious she was. No point crying about it. None at all. It doesn’t stop the tears dripping.

She’ll just have to go back to the one place that’s always provided some surcease, some mercy for her guilt, the one place she’s always a success. Her job. She’ll find her strength in her work: those burdens lighter beside the crushing weight of her personal load.

She always has found strength in her work. It’s just as well. There’s nowhere else to find it.

Castle had gone home with a generic farewell to the bullpen which, he noted with some irritation, Beckett hadn’t seemed to hear. She’d been wholly focused on her warrant. He cheers himself up with preparing and eating dinner with his family, and then retires to his study with a small glass of good Scotch and a large mug of excellent coffee. He is going to solve this mystery of Beckett for his own self-satisfaction. And then he’s going to twist it, change it, and use it to inform Nikki Heat, because Beckett is supposed to be his inspiration and he is supposed to be allowed to shadow her and she is not providing him with any help at all to do either.

And if all of this is actually driven by pricked pride and a large measure of hurt that she simply walked out and wouldn’t listen to him or even try paddling in the shallows of a relationship or show him anything at all about who she is, ever since Christmas – well, he can’t force her to be friends, or lovers, and he isn’t going to try. Her loss. She didn’t like his loft and his family, and he’s never going to be happy about that.

He has a gulp of his coffee, and a sip of whisky. Reversing the quantities is not good for clear and focused thinking. So. Start with the Berowitzes. She’d identified Mr Berowitz as an alcoholic and said it was because of being a beat cop. She’d – he’d forgotten, till now – sent him off and taken a moment before she followed. She’d refused to let him come with her to see Mrs Berowitz – both times – and the first time he’d overheard it’ll bring you down too and the second time Beckett, touch-me-not Beckett, had had an arm around her. The first time Beckett hadn’t even come back to the bullpen, and the second time she had but she’d looked like hell.

And then there are the other discontinuities. No booze in her apartment. Lying about the mince pies and brandy butter, and then the taste of mint toothpaste. A tiny pause when he’d offered mulled wine. She drinks, but barely – the only time he’s seen her drink was on her birthday. And she’s entirely uncomfortable in his loft with his family: right from the very first time before Christmas, in fact, now he thinks about it. Every time she’s been faced with Alexis. She doesn’t believe in Christmas, though she had Christmas dinner with her father, and she takes – volunteers for – the Christmas Day shift every year. She doesn’t do presents under the tree. She took a day off when they were flat-out busy, and Montgomery approved it, and the boys wouldn’t tell him why but he’s sure that they know. And, of course, her mother is dead. And most of the time she’s cool, slick, sardonic Beckett; but just occasionally she’s been soft, cuddly and affectionate Kat. When she isn’t Kat, he’s always felt that it, or he, is in some way second best. Settled for.

He writes it all down, in neat, organised bullet points, as if he were planning a story. (He is.) Then he looks at it for a while, letting his mind absorb each point without trying to fit them together. Then he does something he usually does, when researching, he interrogates the internet – specifically, press databases.

Ah-ha. Johanna Beckett, criminal attorney, murdered 9 January 1999, leaving a husband, Jim, and daughter, Katherine, age 19. Well, that explains the personal day, he supposes. That’s a history and a half. It explains the boys’ reactions to him asking, too. That’s not something they’d simply throw out there. It’ll make a superb back story for his character, changed around a little. He opens his laptop and starts to sketch it out, lost in the words.

Some time later, coffee cold, whisky untouched, Castle re-emerges from the depths of his tale. As so often, whilst he’s been buried in explosive, unstoppable creation; the recesses of his brain have been chewing over the rest of the story – in this case, the rest of the Beckett story. And what it all adds up to is that she is considerably more familiar with alcoholism than merely observation as a beat cop would provide.

His first thought is that it was her. Teenager hit with massive trauma – not unheard of. But he swiftly rejects that, since if it had been her, she wouldn’t touch a drop. She does. So, not Beckett. He investigates the internet some more, and finds that Jim Beckett is listed as a practising attorney – and indeed partner – at a very respectable firm. So, unlikely to be her father. Not impossible, though. He makes more coffee, and drinks it and his whisky, and thinks some more.

He hasn’t reached any more conclusions by the time he goes to sleep, and he’s not exactly satisfied with those he has reached. She might be familiar with alcoholism on a personal level, but that doesn’t explain the whole anti-Christmas feeling. Her mother might have been murdered in January, but that doesn’t explain the familiarity with alcoholism, unless it provoked it, for which he has no evidence at all. There is no obvious reason why any of it should make her uncomfortable with Alexis, because Alexis has effectively lost her mother too, so there should be a connection. And none of it explains the dual personality of slick, sardonic Beckett and soft, cuddlesome Kat.
Talk to me, don't talk to me

Chapter Notes

This will be the last chapter I'm able to post for a few weeks: apologies for the unavoidable delay. If you are interested, the same story, considerably further ahead, is on Fanfiction.net under Garrae, and you may read it there if you prefer (or are that interested).

When Castle arrives in the bullpen the next morning it’s empty of the team. When he looks at his phone there’s a message that he hadn’t heard arrive. R & E on the search warrant. Unis picking up CF. Interrogation. It was sent thirty minutes ago. He looks around, and spots Beckett coming back to her desk.

“Is she here yet?”

“No.”

“Coffee?”

“No. She’ll be here any moment.” It’s perfectly sensible, but it still feels like a rejection. Beckett’s desk is, he notices, bestrewn with coffee cups. Three coffee cups.

“How long have you been here?”

“Shift started at eight.” It takes Castle a moment to realise that that wasn’t actually an answer.

“When did you get here?”

“What does that matter? Before shift began, so I’m always ready to go.”

“How am I supposed to shadow you if I don’t know when you start?” Beckett looks briefly exasperated, and then blank.

“Okay. I was in at seven. We don’t just have this case. We’re helping out to reduce the cold cases. So I came in to get a start on those. Then we got the warrant. Those don’t wait. Espo and Ryan had to go straight away, and they found the ring. Stupid woman had put it with her own jewellery. It doesn’t even fit her.”

“You didn’t call.”

“I texted you as soon as they went to pick her up.” There’s a distinct air of what more do you want? The potential for argument is instantly removed as Beckett is informed that Carrie Franks is back in Interrogation. “C’mon.” There’s fire in Beckett’s eyes. “Let’s go get her.”

Half an hour later it’s all over. Carrie has been reduced to bitter, vitriolic confession by a combination of Castle sympathising with the story and Beckett’s cold contempt. The boys have the evidence, and Carrie Franks is taken away.

“Now what?” Castle asks hopefully, in the break room where they’re all partaking of celebratory “Back to cold cases,” Beckett says. The boys make faces.

“What’s it about?”

“Twenty-seven year old man, found dead, stabbed, in December. Tox said he was fuelled up on cheap booze. Looked like he’d been on the streets, first off, but he hadn’t been there for long.”

Castle makes a disappointed face. “We don’t just do the weird ones. Everyone deserves justice. See if you can spot anything.”

Castle notices a small tightness at the corner of Beckett’s mouth, and a small stress line between her eyebrows, and decides to probe a little.

“Why this one?”

“Top of the pile.”

Castle dutifully begins. Beckett is buried in the next folder. The boys have picked up one each. The team is quiet and thoughtful.

Beckett, alongside her focus on her own cold case, is only too glad that the top one off the pile was that one. She doesn’t want to deal with cold cases which involve anything more than the normal run of mundane murder, and right now she really doesn’t want to deal with anything involving alcohol. Who knows, maybe Castle will spot something. She doesn’t care where justice comes from, only that it comes. Her team is successful, and it’s staying successful. If Castle helps it stay successful, that’s fine. But she needn’t go out of her way to invite him in. It’s up to him how much shadowing he needs to do.

And then her phone rings. It’s her dad. This is something of a shock. He doesn’t normally ring in the daytime.

“Dad?” she says, with a hint of panic that causes Castle to flick a sharp glance upward as she rises to move to a less public place. He hears Is something wrong? before she’s shut the conference room door behind her. That’s…odd. Off. He’d thought it wasn’t her father. He’s very rapidly rethinking that conclusion.

The story makes sense, if it’s her father. It all makes much better sense that way. How hadn’t he seen it? It’s the only narrative that makes the story coherent. But how’s he a lawyer now, if he’s an alcoholic? And why, if he’s an alcoholic, is Beckett not supporting him by spending the whole of Christmas Day with him? She’s got plenty of compassion for people she doesn’t know and isn’t related to, but none for her family? He can’t imagine that he wouldn’t spend the time on his family, and thinks less of Beckett for her apparent choice.
Filled with satisfaction at having worked out the issue, and a certain amount of displeasure and indeed discomfort at discovering Beckett’s feet of clay, Castle turns his attention on to the cold case. He pokes it and prods at it and makes up innumerable theories to explain why a twenty-seven year old would suddenly be on the streets. None of them fit even the scanty evidence which is on file. On the other hand… he’d not been on the streets for long. Castle looks at the photos. The corpse hadn’t been wearing much, when he considers how cold it had been when the man died. A new theory evolves itself. What if… he’d been trying to get warm? What if, tanked to the gills on cheap booze, he’d tried to snuggle down in a doorway that was already occupied, and got a little too snuggly with the occupant? What if… the occupant didn’t take kindly to it, and – accidentally or otherwise – poked a knife into him?

It’s very boring. Not a fun case at all. But it might actually be the answer. Not that they’re ever going to be able to prove it. He tries the theory out on Ryan, who is intrigued, and Espo, who is moderately disgusted.

“That’s sick, man.”

“But plausible. Is there footage of that doorway?”

“Not now, there won’t be. ‘Bout a week is the best we can hope for. This one’s over a month. No chance.”

“Later, Dad. Bye,” comes from Beckett, returning to her desk. Castle interprets her brisk tone as brushing off her father because she’s too busy with work. He doesn’t see how cold cases can prevail over helping one’s family. His opinion of her behaviour drops a little lower.

Beckett had gone into the conference room to talk to her father in privacy. Privacy from Castle, that would be. He doesn’t need to be handed any more ammunition.

“Is something wrong? Are you okay, Dad?”

There’s always the heart-clenching fear that it’ll be the slurred, incoherent speech of years ago: pleas and tears and anger; and then her leaving to collect him from whichever bar or dingy dive or cell he’d ended up in. The image of him sprawled on the grass in Central Park: dirty, incontinent and paralysed by alcohol, has never quite left her: tears streaming down his face as spittle or vomit and urine soaked his clothes. Until she’d had to stop: had left him there – wherever there was – to lie, or die, in his own filth and degradation: when she didn’t take his calls, and watched her phone ring out, or go to voicemail, hearing his drunken, pathetic begging for her to come. Every time, it shredded her soul. She wanted to save him, but she couldn’t.

Later, she learned that walking away was the only way she might have saved him: that only when an alcoholic hits rock-bottom can he realise that only he can save himself. She knows it, intellectually, and at times repeating it, a mantra, was the only thing that had stopped her going to try, and fail again, to save him. But she can’t, deep down, heart and soul, believe it.

So she pours herself out to the families and the victims and the search for justice, and pours yet more of herself into holding her father to his fragile sobriety, always trying to make amends for abandoning him in his hour of need, always trying to prove that she can provide the support and help to others that she hadn’t given her father then. Trying to fill the unfillable void in her heart that walking away from him had left, that has never healed. No matter how often her father tells her that she did the right thing, that he would never have gone to rehab if she hadn’t walked away, that she saved him by leaving him – she can’t escape her guilt.
“I’m okay, Katie. But… I have to go to Miami for a week. Tomorrow.”

“Miami? Uh? Why?”

“Conference. Bill pulled out last night when his big deal didn’t close, but mine did so I’ve got to substitute for him. The firm doesn’t want to waste the money.”

“Do you have to present?”

“No, not this time.” Beckett sits down hard and breathes an inaudible sigh of relief. One trigger fewer. “You’ll be there?” She knows he doesn’t mean physically. She, and his sponsor, whom she has never met – doesn’t want to meet. She’s afraid of what she might see in his eyes – will be on the end of the phone, whenever, whatever, her father needs.

“Yeah. Always there for you, Dad,” she says softly, determination behind the velvet. She quickly changes the tone: they never get too close to the emotional areas. Too dangerous. She might reveal too much – she might let slip her own anger and pain. He can’t take that: it’s too much for him. So she’s always walled it up and walled it off. Now, she’s really, really good at walling her feelings off. Though not quite good enough, it seems. Castle saw the truth. Saw the ugly truth and didn’t like it.

She has to be cheerful and teasing and make sure her father never, ever, knows she’s pretending. “Will you bring me back a present?” she says, as if she were still four, and sniggers at her father’s snort.

“Sure I will, Katie. Would you like a purple dinosaur or a Barbie doll?” She laughs out loud. Another danger point safely rounded. There are always danger points. So far, she’s always rounded them.

“Seeing as I won’t see you Sunday, do you want to come round for dinner tonight?”

“That’d be nice.”

“Okay, come about seven. Better get back to the files. Cold cases. Ugh.”

“See you later, Katie.” She opens the door and starts back into the bullpen.

“Later, Dad. Bye,” she says briskly, and sits down. Castle flicks her a look of reproach tinged with contempt. She ignores both the look and the pain it causes her. It’s no more than she expects. She concentrates on her files and reminds herself, several times, that her father has been dry for five years and that there’s no reason he’ll break that record now. It’s just that conferences make her nervous. All that networking is all too often fuelled on drinking.

“I’ve got a theory on this case,” Castle says.

“Yeah?” She can’t deal with insane theories.

“I think he tried to get warm and got a bit too close to someone else, who stabbed him.” Oh. Not such an insane theory.

“Okay, that’s plausible. Why don’t you run with it? Your chance to do real cop work.” He looks surprised. Still, she doesn’t have time to help him right now. She needs to make arrangements for next week. They have a process for this, but she needs to make it happen straight away. Normally she has more notice. She stands up and aims for the Captain’s office.
Castle’s left behind, annoyed, again. He’s been in a state of almost permanent irritation and ire since Beckett walked out his loft, firstly because he really didn’t want to find out that she’s not on the pedestal he’d been trying to put her on, and secondly because he feels (not that he’ll acknowledge it) that if he’d been a little more careful with his wording she might not have walked. It has absolutely nothing to do with the fact that he’d wanted her to stay, and he’d wanted her to like his family, and he’d wanted to discover her. Absolutely nothing at all. And he is not going to go running after someone who doesn’t even care properly for their own family, let alone someone who doesn’t like his.

The door closes behind Beckett. Montgomery looks up, surprised.

“Yes, Beckett?”

“Sir…” She swallows. She’s done this before, and every time it’s as embarrassing and painful as the first: guilt that she’s not giving her all to the job, guilt that she’s not giving her all to her father. “My dad,” she forces out. “It’s another conference. He only told me just now but he’s going tomorrow, for a week.”

Montgomery looks at her sympathetically. She hates that look: the mingled pity and respect.

“Oh, Beckett. You team up with Esposito, as usual. Ryan can babysit Castle. Won’t do either of them any harm, though I’ll be on the lookout for any reports of aliens and CIA agents. I’ll have a word with Ryan and Esposito.” Neither of them mention telling Castle. Montgomery assumes Beckett will. Beckett assumes that Montgomery, Esposito or Ryan will. She certainly won’t. Can’t. Only Montgomery, Ryan and Esposito know, inside the bullpen, and Lanie. She doesn’t show off her scars, and her father is not a circus freak to be pointed out and stared at.

Beckett comes out of Montgomery’s office, and doesn’t offer Castle an explanation. Shortly, Ryan and then Esposito enter, exit a few moments later, and don’t offer Castle an explanation. They do, however, offer him coffee and chit-chat – oops, exchange of information and leads – in the break room. Beckett declines to participate. She has a tight furrow between her brows and if she clutches her pen any more tightly it will snap.

“What’s up?” Castle asks.

“Shifts for next week,” Esposito says casually. “Always a few changes. People get sick, that sort of thing.” Castle casts him a somewhat jaundiced look, but there’s no evidence that any of that’s untrue.

“Why not all three of you?”

“Dunno. Just the way it is.” He smiles evilly. “Maybe it’s because Beckett’s taken too much time off.” Ryan snorts his coffee out. Castle smiles tightly, without much mirth.

Conversation turns to Castle’s theory, and any way at all of finding any evidence. Short of interviewing every panhandler within four streets each way, there doesn’t seem to be much of a chance. On the other hand, as Esposito points out gleefully, that’s why uniforms were invented. The three men grin at each other, and Esposito goes off to exercise his inner dictator and start uniforms on the canvass.

Beckett is buried in the next cold case when Castle returns, the furrow in her brow deeper than ever. She’s even less conversational than usual, and doesn’t seem nearly as interested as she should be that the boys thought it was worth a canvass: she just accepts that Esposito’s organised one and doesn’t ask about anything more. Lunch comes and goes, the cold case files come and go, and Castle gets steadily more bored. At four, he’s had enough, makes his excuses and leaves. Beckett’s soft, neutral goodbye is the first word she’s said since two. She’s been quiet ever since her father rang. Maybe, he thinks, she’s feeling bad about her father.

He’s right about how she feels. It’s just that he’s right for all the wrong reasons.

Being at home does not improve Castle’s mood. Alexis is at an extra music lesson and then orchestral practice. His mother is out, for which he is thankful. The last thing he needs is her particular brand of – quote – keeping his feet on the ground. It’s not necessary – he has never forgotten his childhood – and it’s certainly not welcome. Normally he succeeds in letting it wash over him, but not today.

He tries to write, but keeps stalling on pieces of police procedure that he simply doesn’t yet know. He’d know them if Beckett would simply let him shadow her like she’s supposed to and been ordered to, he thinks acidly; leaves an almost-blank space on the page between square brackets with a short note of the matter to be checked, and moves on.

Four similarly empty spaces later, two coffees downed and ninety minutes passed in barely acceptable writing, Castle’s patience has expired. He hates not being able to write continuously. His frustration expresses itself in an ever-growing desire to explain the facts of life to Beckett: to wit that if she doesn’t let him shadow her properly and start to play nice, he’ll go back to Montgomery or Bob and make damn sure that she does. Whether she likes it or not. He needs to write this book. The characters are screaming to be let out and he can’t not write them. But he has to be able to do it properly: have the details right and the story realistic. He has to see what Beckett sees and feel what Beckett feels and absorb every tiny detail of her work and life into his mind and out through his fingers and into his words.

It doesn’t occur to him, while he’s fretting, that at least half his frustration is that he doesn’t know Beckett: what makes her tick, why she reacts the way she does, why she won’t open up to him – and why she won’t be his. And while he doesn’t understand her, Nikki won’t come out right: a little off in tiny ways, but enough to annoy him.

Frustration fuelling him, he abruptly decides that it’s time to tell Beckett how it’s going to be. He’s allowed to follow her around, and she has been ordered to let him. So that’s what’s going to happen. No more shutting him out and hiding inside her own head and not telling him what’s going on or letting him participate. No more expecting him to know what Ryan and Esposito know and not caring that he doesn’t. There are going to be some ground rules, starting now.

Beckett is surprised by the harsh knocking on the door. Can’t be a bailiff, she’s paid all her bills and rent on the nail. She is horrified to find Castle on the other side when she opens it. She doesn’t want him in her apartment. Her father is due in less than half an hour and she doesn’t want him exposed to Castle’s censorious, penetrating gaze. She blocks the doorway and is unceremoniously shunted out of the way.

“I’m coming in.” He shoves in, and shuts the door hard behind him. “We are going to talk about you shutting me out in the precinct. You’re supposed to let me shadow you and you aren’t. You barely tell me anything – I’m surprised you even call when a body drops.”

“I’m not a babysitter and you’re not deaf. It’s up to you to keep up. Everyone else manages. If you need to research – there’s a vitriolic emphasis on that – “then listen and learn. We have real work to do, dealing with real people with real losses. Your fictional” – that same emphasis – “characters come a long way behind.”
“You just won’t admit I’m useful, will you, in case it makes you look bad.”

“You’re not a cop. You’re not here for altruistic motives. You’re here so that you can write more best-sellers. Well, writing books comes a long way second to getting justice for the victims.”

Castle loses his temper in one infuriated burst of rage.

“How would you know what my motives are? You barely speak to me. Ever since Christmas you’ve treated me like a flesh-and-blood sex toy.”

“Is that what this is all about? Your hurt pride? Who was whose sex toy? You ditched me, not the other way round.”

“You didn’t bother to let me finish what I was saying. I wasn’t ditching you. You walked out.”

“I’m not doing this any more” doesn’t leave much room for misinterpretation. Anyway, it doesn’t matter. You were making it pretty clear that I didn’t measure up to your high standards.” The twist of her mouth and acidulated tone makes it clear what she really thinks of his standards.

“You made it pretty clear” – he’s equally vicious – “that you couldn’t bear seeing my family.” The colour drains from her face and lips. “So it’s true. I couldn’t believe it.” Hearing himself, seeing the truth in her pallid visage, the last small traces of control that he had maintained are lost. “You can’t bear any family at all. I suppose it’s not surprising, since you don’t do much to keep what’s left of yours together. You won’t even spend the whole day with your father at Christmas.”

“You know nothing about my family.”

“On the contrary, I know enough. Murdered mother, alcoholic father. You don’t support him through Christmas: you’d rather be at work. Some family you’ve got.”

Her hand rises, then falls before any contact is made. Her face is frozen.

“Get out,” she spits. “Take your sanctimonious ignorance back to your precious perfect little family in your perfect little life. You know nothing about living with an alcoholic. You know nothing about my life and my family. Nothing. You’re not wanted here and you’re not needed or wanted in the precinct.” She opens the door. “Goodbye.”

“Am I interrupting something, Katie?”

“Dad?”
“Dad, you’re early.”

“Who’s this, Katie?” Jim Beckett looks worriedly from one to the other, not missing the tension sparking across the doorway.

“This is Rick Castle and he is leaving.”

“Castle? Rick Castle? The writer? The one who’s shadowing you?”

“That’s me,” Castle says tightly. This is Beckett’s father? This small, slightly uncertain man with deep cut lines around his eyes and an indefinably fearful look, as though the world is a dangerous place, like to break him? He looks from father to daughter, who is now standing between Castle and her father in a manner that strongly suggests that she’s making sure Castle can’t approach him. The arrival of Jim Beckett has not lessened the strain around them one iota. In fact, it’s risen.

“Nice to meet you.” Jim wriggles round Beckett to extend his hand to Castle, who automatically shakes it. “You helped Katie find my Christmas present, didn’t you? She said you did. It’s a great game, thank you. We’ve played it a lot already.”

The floor falls out of Castle’s world on the final sentence. It’s barely a month after Christmas, and they’ve played it a lot. Jim is still talking. “I don’t know what I’d do without Katie.” Pride shines from his face. Castle recognises that same pride as that which he takes in Alexis, and feels the punch landing in his gut. “She’s always there when I need her.” Another punch.

“Dad,” Beckett says, “I’m sure Castle doesn’t want to know this. He’s leaving.” Jim is undeterred. “But he’s your friend, Katie. You told me so much about him at Christmas” – Beckett’s wince is missed by Jim but not by Castle, and Jim carries on quite happily – “so he should know. She pulled me through,” he says, turning to Castle. “Keeps me sober. She saved me. It’s why I gave her my watch.” Castle is now as ash-pale as Beckett. His edifice of assumptions is crumbling around him. “I’d never have stayed sober without her.”

“Dad!” Beckett’s command voice whiplashes through the air, and everything stops dead. “Castle needs to leave. He’ll be late for his family.” Another crippling gut-punch lands with the accent on the last word. “Goodbye, Castle.”

“Nice to meet you,” Jim smiles.

As the door closes he catches a glimpse of the protective posture that Beckett has assumed for her father, as if he, Castle, was a danger to him. No more punches, he’s punch-drunk. That last vision was the knockout blow: putting him down and out on the canvas.

The story isn’t what he thought it was. He’s got everything wrong. Everything. He’d mentally criticised her for making assumptions. She’d relied on his spoken words. It was he who’d made all the assumptions, and every single one of them – except that she couldn’t bear his family – seems to have been wrong.

“So that’s your Rick Castle. Not quite what I expected,” Jim says meditatively.
“Don’t worry, Dad. You won’t be seeing him again. I don’t think he’ll be shadowing us for long.” She smiles brightly and entirely falsely, and forcibly dismisses Castle’s cutting comments from her mind. They’re simply untrue, and he doesn’t understand. He’ll never – lucky him – understand. Now if only she can think of a way to ensure that he doesn’t try writing about it...

“Now, what about this conference? Jet setting again?” It’s deliberately distracting.

Her dad starts to expound on the niceties of anti-trust law and international regulation and the importance of the conference and the speakers, and in trying to follow the jargon and concepts Beckett has no headspace for anything else. She keeps her father well away from the subject of Castle all evening, and fortunately he seems to be happy to follow her lead.

Still, late in the night in her solitary bed, the knowledge of what Castle really thinks of her bites hard. Of course he’s wrong. He knows nothing. But that doesn’t help.

For the next week, Castle barely sees Beckett at all. The boys have closed ranks around her and somehow he’s always with them, never with her. With Ryan, in fact. Esposito partners Beckett, and even when a body drops it’s Ryan who calls him. Nobody explains why. Espo and Beckett are on the trail and out the bullpen as often as possible, though when Castle arrives in the morning – early, to fit with Ryan’s hours – the murder board is ever more extensively decorated. He has no idea when that is happening and by now is too uncomfortable – fuelled almost entirely by guilt and disgust at his own behaviour – even to ask. He hasn’t seen her for long enough even to try to apologise, and the longer he can’t, the worse he feels.

At the end of the week, he’s had enough.

“What’s up with Beckett?” he asks, concealing both annoyance that no-one is telling him what’s going on and fear of finding out that she’s decided to call his – well. Not bluff. But if he does take the nuclear option, then so might she. She hasn’t yet told Montgomery what had happened, has she? Surely not. He’d have been kicked to the kerb. She certainly hasn’t told the boys: he’s still alive. But if he tries to force matters back to where they were, she will. Oh, shit, he has so totally fucked this up.

“Nothing.”

“C’mon, Ryan. Don’t give me that bullshit. Why’s she out with Espo this week rather than you and Espo paired up?”

“That’s what Montgomery wants.”

“Why?”

“Not our business.” But Ryan’s clearly uncomfortable, and equally clearly knows more than he’s saying. Castle decides to take a chance.

“I know about her mom and dad.”

“You know? She told you?”

“I met her dad,” Castle says, and nothing more. It's not lying. He did meet her father.

“Okay then. It’s nothing to do with you. Her dad’s away. Some high-powered legal conference in Miami. She worries, in case he slips up, even after all this time. So Montgomery pairs her with Espo.”
“Why?”

“Otherwise she’d go out alone” – Castle only just doesn’t wince: clearly he doesn’t count at all – “with me ‘n Espo paired up. Montgomery doesn’t want her on her own if her dad needs her.”

“Huh?”

“If he needs to ring her, he does. She only doesn’t take it if it’s a takedown or an interrogation.” Castle has the same gut-punched feeling he’d had the other night. “Sees him every week. With him all day on the anniversary. Day after, sometimes, too, if we’re not so busy.” Oh, shit. How did he get this so badly wrong?

“Why Espo?”

“He can make her stop. Only he and Montgomery can. I can’t. Never could. Montgomery can order her, and Espo… Espo’s tough. Tough as Beckett, and if he really has to, he can march her home.” Ryan stares out the break room window past the horizon. “If they don’t do something, when he’s outta town, she never stops. Always here. If there’s a live case, she works it. If not, she picks up a cold case.” He stares some more. Castle barely breathes. “I think she’s always done it. Did anyone tell you her history?” Castle only makes a soft negative noise. “Stanford. Transferred to NYU after her mom. Top from the Academy. Fastest woman ever to Detective. Might just be fastest person ever. All while he was…ill.”

“Yeah,” Castle murmurs, but Ryan isn’t paying him any attention at all.

“Her dad fell apart after her mom… passed. Five years. Then he went into rehab. He’s been clean five years, but she still doesn’t like it when he’s not here. So we worked out a system. If he’s away, we work it so she can always take his call.”

“Oh.” Oh fuck. Five years?

Ryan turns and gives him a very straight look. “That why you’ve been sulking? Because she wouldn’t let you follow her this week?” Ryan-the-detective takes over. “What’s going on between you and Beckett?”

“Nothing.” And that is the stone cold truth. Absolutely nothing at all. She wouldn’t explain why she doesn’t like his family and he made assumptions about hers. So nothing at all is going on, and nothing at all will be going on, and both of them are just fine with that. Not.

“Really? You expect me to believe that? Man, you’re full of shit. You’ve been glaring at Beckett for a week, an’ before that you were all goo-goo eyes. Man up. If she turned you down, at least pretend to be cool with it.”

It’s like being savaged by a sheep. Unfortunately Castle is feeling more like a wolf than a blade of grass, and bites back just as hard.

“It’s got nothing to do with that. I’m here to shadow Beckett and not one of you bothered to tell me that this week she’s going off with Espo and I’m following you. Sure, following you is interesting, but don’t you think one of you might have clued me in to the change?”

Ryan looks a little embarrassed. “No-one told you?”

“Not till you did now,” Castle snaps. “Far as I knew, I’d been left for dead. You treat your corpses with more respect than that.” And now Ryan is wholly embarrassed.
“Hey, look, sorry, man. I thought you knew that Espo was partnering up with Beckett for the week, even if we never told you why. We don’t talk about her shit to people who don’t already know, and we’re not starting now. She keeps it private.”

Castle is disarmed. Mostly. It’s perfectly reasonable that the boys won’t spill Beckett’s personal life to him unless they thought Beckett had let him know already. Not that he feels in the least guilty for letting Ryan tell him all of that. Still, nothing that Ryan has said has relieved him of any of his feelings that he has acted very badly and let himself down. On the other hand, neither has it relieved him of any of his feelings that Beckett could have at least told him something. And he still has no idea why she doesn’t like seeing his family and she doesn’t like visiting his loft.

He leaves as soon as departure is possible, without any questions being asked as to why. He doesn’t want to see Beckett till he’s cleared his own head. At this point, seeing her only makes him angrier— at both of them. He is not the only one at fault here. Absolutely not. But when he’s cleared his head and thoughts— then he is certainly going to see her.

She could have told him. She could have told him something. But she didn’t. She didn’t tell him anything at all. Locked it all down and wouldn’t share. She could have… she could have leaned on him. She could have.

It never occurs to him that she had tried to lean on him, and that she’d failed to get past her own barriers, broken like a wave against the wall of the very strength and protectiveness that he applies to his daughter, that could have supported her.

Beckett has spent the week trying to avoid, evade or escape Esposito’s watchful eye. It hasn’t worked. He’s seen her home— in an entirely unromantic and indeed distinctly perp-walk fashion— and made sure that she gets coffee— frequently— and eats. Her dad has called a couple of times: he’s likely called his sponsor a bit more often than that. But now it’s Friday, and he’s on a plane home, and she can relax.

At least about her dad.

Next week— oh, thank God, she has this weekend off— Espo will go back to partnering Ryan and she will have to put up with Castle’s judgements and misconceptions and assumptions. Or worse, he’ll have reset his thinking thanks to her father’s appalling openness— and she’ll have to put up with apologies and seeing the pity in his eyes. She cringes at the thought. She can’t stand pity. It doesn’t help her at all. Pity implies weakness, and she can’t afford to be weak.

It’s one reason why she’d never told him anything. She can’t stand pity. It’s not her story to tell anyway: it’s for her father to decide who and when to tell, but she cannot cope with the look in people’s eyes once they know. And now he knows, and she cannot bear to see the way he’ll look at her. She has to stop that. However she can, whatever it takes. She can’t bear for him to put the rest of the pieces together, and to realise how weak Kat really is. Worse, he’ll use it in his book. It’s just too good a background for him not to do so. She can’t allow that, either.

But she has the weekend off. She’ll see her dad on Sunday for dinner, and they’ll play Sorry, and she won’t let on for an instant that she wishes she’d never met Castle, never gone Christmas shopping with him, and never so much as heard of the game of Sorry. And for the rest of the weekend she will not be Badass Beckett, and she will not be in the precinct, and she will not be on call, and she will not see anyone at all. She is weary. Bone-deep weary, both in body and mind. All she wants to do is sleep, and rest, and not think, and not need to be strong. Just for two days, she can stop.
But still, she can’t switch her phone off, in case her father should need to talk to her. So she can’t really, truly, wholly, stop.

She sleeps heavily and wakes late, logy and still exhausted on Saturday morning: catching up from the fractured sleep she’d barely managed through the week, when she’d been unwilling to go to bed early in case her father rang at the end of the long conference evening events and might be upset if he thought he’d woken her. Not that going to bed early would have helped: she couldn’t sleep in any case. She’d managed to avoid Esposito’s beady eye in the mornings, and evaded his questions about when she’d got into the bullpen. She knows he knows. They just don’t talk about it.

Espo, in fact, is the only person who knows who has never regarded her with pity, never pressed her – even inadvertently; Ryan, once only, made that mistake – and never asked about it. He knows, and because he never, ever asks, he’s the only person she can bear to work with on those weeks. She had had to explain it to Montgomery, stuttering out her pain-edged request, but because their little triangle is so effective, he let it run rather than handing her her ass for interfering in his management of the team.

She just wishes she could have put aside her bitter envy of Castle’s happy family home. Telling herself that she could never have lived up to his standards of how a family should be, or how she should feel on seeing a proper father-daughter relationship, doesn’t help. It would all have come crashing down at some point, so it’s probably best that it was before either of them got any further into it. That doesn’t help, either. Why is doing the right thing so very, very painful?

She does her chores unenthusiastically, gets some easy food in for the weekend, stocks up on sodas, curls up on her couch and reads, desultorily, an undemanding book. Lunchtime comes and goes, her food pleasant enough. She can’t raise the energy to do anything. The weather isn’t helping, either: cold and snowy. She hates winter: she’s never truly warm, however many layers she wears. She thinks that it’s maybe more of a mental chill than physical. She carefully doesn’t think that she’d been warm before Christmas, curled into Castle. No point in maybes or might-have-beens.

She’s still on the couch, barely having moved since lunch, not quite sleepy, not at all awake, and wholly weary even now, when her door sounds. She drags herself off the seat, and stumbles to the door. She doesn’t want to see anyone.

She especially doesn’t want to see Castle, who – this time – she has identified through the peephole before she opens up. She doesn’t open the door, instead she shuffles back to the couch and ignores him. The door is quite heavy enough that – in warmly socked feet – the sound of her movement is inaudible through it. If she pretends she isn’t here he’ll go away. She really, really, doesn’t want to see anyone. She just wants to be on her own and not have to be anything for anyone; not have to pretend or assume a brave face, not have to be strong. Not to be Detective Kate Beckett, best of the best; not to be Katie, always supportive; not to be anyone’s muse or inspiration or partner; or, of course, not to be anyone’s disappointment or object of pity or contempt.

Not, in fact, to be anyone. If only she could simply… disappear.

Well, it’s her weekend off, and she can pretend that she has disappeared. She ignores the repeated rap on the door and pulls herself into herself, just like a taciturn tortoise. The rapping stops. She relaxes, and returns to her undemanding afternoon. She remains undisturbed for another couple of hours, when her phone cheeps with a text. Since her father never texts, and no message of any importance (that is, one which told her that her father needed her) would come by text, she ignores that too. An hour later, the phone cheeps again. It’s beginning to annoy her. She only wants to stop, and someone’s stopping her.

But duty causes her to swipe on, and read down. Both texts are from Castle. The first says are you around? Want to talk. The second says where are you? Can I come see you? Want to talk. Neither, to Beckett’s mind, requires a response. She’s too tired to see anyone. Even Lanie would be too much. She’s just… not here. Not anywhere that she might see anyone. Detective Beckett is not at home, frivolously floats through her mind. That would be nice. A butler or a footman to lie about her whereabouts whenever she didn’t want to be disturbed. She decides that she’s not going anywhere more today, and slides herself into a loose, comfortable t-shirt and sweat pants, with a warm hooded sweatshirt to keep herself cosy.

An hour later Castle texts again. And then another hour after that. And then her door sounds, about as long after that, she thinks annoyedly, as it would take not to have an answer, find a cab, and arrive. Why can’t he just leave her alone? Most people would assume she was busy, or out of range, or just plain didn’t want to talk to them. Especially people who have made it very clear she’s not their cup of tea. She doesn’t need him rubbing his perfect life in her face.

She is not at home. Therefore, she doesn’t answer the door.

And then her phone rings. Loudly.

Castle had spent the majority of Friday evening and Saturday morning in intense contemplation of the current position. He faces the nasty truth, blunt and unpleasant, that Beckett unfailingly supports her father. No wonder she’d almost slapped him. He’s only surprised she didn’t hit him full force. Having faced up to that, he thinks about the rest. Works her ass off, right from the beginning. But Ryan had said her father had been sober five years – and drunk for five years before that. So how was she managing both? Surely there aren’t enough hours in the day?

His mind flits to something else. Not only has she supported her father, but Mrs Berowitz. And then, every victim’s family member with whom he’s seen her. She’s lavished support on people she barely knows – and, ow, he’d mentally marked her down for it, because he’d assumed it was instead of supporting her father. Instead, it had been as well as.

So who supports her? Well, there’s a question. He doesn’t really have an answer to it, because he’s never noticed that Beckett actually needs or wants support. Anything but. She’s the most self-reliant, downright prickly person he’s ever met. Except those couple of early encounters, when the prickly shell had fallen away, and that strange soft Kat had been revealed, but still, that hadn’t been support, and she certainly hadn’t asked for anything. In fact, he slowly realises, the closer Christmas had drawn, and the more he’d tried to bring her round to him and his life, the less she’d asked for or wanted and then after Christmas she’d never come to his at all until he’d forced it. That hadn’t precisely worked out well, either.

He’d expect support to come from her team, or friends, but from what Ryan said she relies on working ever harder in place of anything else, and always has. He doesn’t get that. Yet another thing he doesn’t get about Beckett. Maybe he should write a different book: The Hundred Enigmatic Faces of Kate Beckett. The only problem is that he really doesn’t understand the story.

It should be simple. Murdered mother, ten years previously. Alcoholic father, five years drunk, five years dry: supporting him every step of the way. Best cop in town: whether that’s solve rate or victim support. And so tightly wrapped that she seems to survive on coffee and work and needs nothing and no-one else. Except that there had been Kat.

He puts it away to fester. It’s not simple at all, and he is still missing something: the link that tells him why she won’t come near his family, why she doesn’t like seeing his daughter. Till that’s worked out, he’s not going to be comfortable. But. But he can remove one source of discomfort.
Face facts, Rick. You were wrong about her. You said a lot of things, and you were wrong. Man up and apologise for that. Maybe then you can both have an adult conversation. It’s not as if he’s likely to have anything else. He’d called her out on disliking his family, and she hadn’t denied it. He hadn’t been wrong about that. Anyway. He needs to apologise for what he’d said. Then he’ll feel better: his conscience will stop pricking at him.
The scars that won't heal

He starts by going round, though he isn’t exactly fond of the idea. He needs to apologise, and he’ll do it face to face. Apart from any considerations of manners, he needs to see the small tells and reactions to try and decipher this mystery; to find his missing link. There is no answer when he knocks. He leaves, disappointed, but not concerned. It’s Saturday, after all, and plenty of people go out. He waits for a while, attending to the normal activities of the weekend, and then sends a neutral text: are you around? Want to talk, hoping that she’ll take it in the spirit that he means. There is no answer to that, either. That’s a little more concerning, though it’s still only five. For all he knows, she went to a matinee or a movie.

He gives it another hour, and texts again. Having made the decision to apologise, he simply wants to get it over with and move on. She’ll have to work with him next week, and he really does not want this hanging over them in the bullpen. It’s all difficult enough without adding that, and the chance of a private discussion in the precinct is not so much limited as non-existent, whether that transpires accidentally or on purpose. Still no answer.

After another two hours and two more unanswered texts, he goes back over again. There is no answer when he raps on her door. So this time, he calls her cell.

And hears it ringing, inside.

She’s there, he thinks. She’s in there, and she’s not answering the door. He knocks again.

Beckett listens to her phone ring and realises that she has been caught out. She never goes anywhere without her phone. She should have switched it off, but she can’t switch it off, because she can’t ever take the risk that she lets her father down. Never again. And now that provision of support has betrayed her. Not opening the door, when it’s obvious she’s here, would be childish, silly, and above all weak.

“What do you want?” She stands foursquare in the doorway. Unwanted pity scrolls through his face. “I’m busy.” Busy trying to disappear. Busy trying to stop, trying to forget. Seeing Castle only makes her remember his cutting, hurtful words – he’s so very, very good at memorable words – and her inability to rely on her father. “You made your point, so what are you doing here? Surely you should be with your family.” She is hatefully satisfied to see him flinch.

Castle’s flinch, unfortunately, is followed by a step forward. Beckett has the choice of staying put and being walked into, which would entail him touching her, which is bitterly undesirable, or stepping back, which will entail him being inside her apartment. Also bitterly undesirable, but likely to be marginally less painful and certainly shorter. Let him say what he likes and then leave. No point in provoking an immediate fight. Let him say his uninformed sayings and let them all wash past and away. He knows nothing, and understands less, and so nothing he can say will make any difference at all. Besides which, she now knows exactly what to do to ensure he leaves and never looks into her life again. It’s the least worst outcome of the ones which seem to be available.

She steps back, and away, turning her back on him and returning to her nest on the couch. Every line of her posture connotes indifference; every inch of her face is cold. Her apartment is as vague, empty and chilly as every other time he’s seen it.

“What is it?” she says again, with a snap.

“I came to apologise. For what I said.”
“Accepted,” she says politely, and nothing more. Not even goodbye. She’s perfectly still, perfectly calm, perfectly untouchable. Slick, sardonic Beckett, barriered to the max.

“Don’t you even care?”

“Why should I? You have no idea about any of it, so your thoughts don’t matter. It makes no difference to me what you think.”

Castle looks down at her. “You almost slapped me. You cared then.”

“I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have.” It’s entirely unclear whether she means the almost-slap or the caring. “I have a lot to do.” So go away and let me do it is very clear. Castle looks around. There’s a coffee cup on the table, and a book. The television is off. The apartment is perfectly tidy. Beckett is wrapped up in unlovely sweats and woolly socks. There’s a certain pinched tightness in her face which suggests she might be cold, though the apartment’s temperature is pleasant enough.

“Sure looks like it,” he says sarcastically. “You aren’t dressed for going out, your apartment’s perfectly tidy, and you’ve been doing nothing all afternoon. Except ignoring me.”

“I don’t have to answer you outside of the precinct. I don’t answer to you anywhere. What I do with my days off is my business and mine alone. Your research doesn’t extend to my personal life or my father’s. Now please go back to your family. We have nothing to say to each other. You said everything you needed to.”

“I got it wrong.”

“It’s not important. You didn’t know.” Her indifferent tone is the final nail in his coffin.

“I didn’t know because you didn’t tell me. Just like you didn’t tell me why you were upset by mulled wine or by Christmas or why you were seeing Mrs Berowitz.”

“Why should I tell you? Our life is not your business. It’s private. I’m not putting it up for you to use in your book. It’s bad enough you follow me around.” She swallows, convulsively, and begins. “I wish I’d never met you.”

Castle is rocked back by the force of her statement. “You wish you’d never met me?” He stands stunned. She clearly means every word of it. There’s bleak silence in the room.

“Yes. I wish you’d never appeared in my life. I wish I’d never agreed to go for a drink with you, and never agreed to going Christmas shopping with you, and never gone to your loft. I should never have got involved with you. It was never going to work.”

“You’re wrong.”

“No. I was wrong to get involved. Go back to your family, Castle.”

“You keep saying that. Go back to your family. What’s your problem with my family?”

She stiffens, almost infinitesimally. Almost. He’s hit something. “What’s your problem with my family, Beckett? That’s what this is all about, isn’t it? You can’t deal with my family.”

It’s the perfect opportunity to end all this for ever, just as she’d planned.

She spins to face him, skin dead white and eyes blazing. “No. I can’t deal with your family.” He hears the echo of his own words in hers, and the knife stabs through his gut. She holds his gaze.
“So let’s call it quits now. It’s never going to work.” But then her eyes drop away, just that betraying fraction of a second before she turns from him.

“What aren’t you saying, Beckett?” He will force the truth from her. There’s more to this story. “Tell me the truth about why you don’t want anything more.”

“You want the truth? Fine. Have the truth. I can’t deal with seeing you with Alexis.” The colour drains from his face. “Happy now?”

Castle turns and leaves without another word, the door closing quietly behind him.

He’s all the way home and putting his key in the lock of the door when the whole mess comes crashing down on him. She can’t deal with seeing him with Alexis. It’s the one thing he couldn’t have dealt with: the one blow this can’t survive. She was right. It’s never going to work. If she can’t deal with them together, it’s never going to work. Better keep to the precinct, and the bullpen, and the cases. He sits alone in his study, mourning what might have been. He’d really thought that they could have something, but not if she can’t deal with him and his daughter.

He admits to himself that he’d been flailing for ways not to lose her, to try to find an excuse for her behaviour. It’s not just about the book. He’d wanted more. He’d wanted soft, affection-seeking Kat just as much as he’d wanted Detective Kate-hard-ass-Beckett. It occurs to him that she’d stopped being Kat with him after the first time he’d persuaded her to dinner at his loft, with Alexis. She’d never quite softened into Kat-ishness with him, after that. So why’s she trying to drive him away, rather than look for ways they could make it work? That’s easy. She doesn’t think it can work. She said so. He wonders why, if she feels so strongly, she’d bothered to try and hide it from him and Alexis until now. He sits, solitary, as time passes, seconds falling as coldly as the snow, as icy as Beckett’s words.

Misery doesn’t stop his mind working, looking for a story he likes better, an explanation that fits. This feels all wrong. The sympathetic, supportive, compassionate Beckett of the precinct, pouring out support and her arm around a crying Mrs Berowitz, the Beckett who’s always there for her father, the one who’d hidden her feelings so well that empathetic, sensitive Alexis hadn’t noticed a thing, doesn’t fit this hard, cruel conversation. Beckett had put her comments in the bluntest, most unpleasant way possible: hadn’t softened the blow at all.

She’s done everything possible to look like the bad guy. In fact, she has done everything she could to make him think the worst of her, right the way along since he’d said he wasn’t doing it any more, and the only thing that had got in the way of that perception was her own father, who had let him know enough of the truth to show that she might not be as bad as she’s painted herself. No explanations, no excuses, no wasted words. She’d hit the one point guaranteed to make him walk away, no questions asked, no reasons wanted.

But it doesn’t feel right. None of it feels right.

She’s made sure she looks bad enough that he won’t come near her, or her history, or her father, ever again. He’s kept asking questions and looking for the story and she’s kept hiding. He should just accept that it’s all a total bust, and walk away.

She’d accepted affection from him for just as long as he didn’t get too close to the real story. He’d even said it: no questions, after the mince pie fiasco, and she’d relaxed and been with him. As long as he was there without really being there. She didn’t want to lead, but she didn’t want to reveal anything to him that might show him why. And every time he paused and it seemed that he might ask something that would uncover the past, she reverted to slick-shelled, sexy Beckett and took charge herself. Which, he now realises, is why he felt it was second-best every time she did it.
Because it was. She was doing it to shut down his questions. To move him away from areas she didn’t want to deal with.

Oh. Oh, oh, oh. She was only Kat when she wasn’t thinking about – or being reminded of – her history. He takes a leap of intuition – it certainly can’t be justified logically – and decides that she could only be comforted and relax when she could forget.

But she’d said that he should stay away from her father and his life – not just hers, his too – and she’d tried very hard to shut her father down, as well, when he’d been talking about it. And then she’d been in that strange, protective posture, as if she’d been shielding her father from him. She’s never told him anything about her family, or her history: he’d had it all from Ryan, or worked it out from tiny clues, or from her father’s words.

But why has she done any of it? – oh God. He knows the final reason why, abruptly. He’s writing a whole book based on her, and he’d even been angry because he didn’t know her story and couldn’t make Nikki right because of it: he’d used her mother’s murder to write a whole backstory but it hadn’t been enough. Oh God. She thinks – and she is right because that’s exactly what he just did with her mother – that he’ll use her history in his books. Oh God. She’s protecting herself from him, but mostly she’s protecting her father.

So she had told him, Castle, something sure to make him walk away and not ask any more questions at all. Okay, it’s also the absolute truth. But it isn’t the truth in the way she’d ensured that he’d interpret it. She pushed him away to protect her father… and didn’t hesitate to do it. Ryan had said it, without knowing it. Ryan had told him that Beckett was always there for her father.

Hold on. She supports her father. All the time. Oh, hell. She can’t bear seeing a normal father-daughter relationship, because she doesn’t have one. And he’d gone and shoved her into situations where she had to watch a normal, supportive, parent-child relationship, and then he’d been angry and upset because she was so uncomfortable.

She has, in fact, played him. She’d told him the truth in exactly the way most likely – dead certain – to ensure he never came near her again. And she’d been right. He’d been planning, all the way home and right up till five minutes ago, to tell Montgomery that he was done. He’s got enough for a single book, and he’d have found a new inspiration.

He wonders, far too late, what had happened after she walked out his loft. He wonders what he’d find, if he went back over to her apartment now, and whether it would be anything other than the barrel of a Glock pointed at his head.

And he wonders what’s going to happen when he makes it clear that he’s not leaving the precinct, and he’s not letting her be a martyr at his expense when she hasn’t even asked him if he’ll use her dad, and he is not giving up on her.

Beckett is still sitting on the couch, not caring about anything. Stopped, in fact: disappeared from view. She’s done what she had to do to support her father and keep his suffering private, except as he chooses to disclose it. She won’t have him gawped at by a horrified public; ruin his reconstructed life because it won’t take the gossip rags five minutes to find him and splash his past around, destroy his career and profession and send him right back down into the depths.

She would love to put her burdens down, but doing so always seems to mean explaining, and she will not drag it all up from behind her walls where it’s safely imprisoned. She could only lay down her load when people (she doesn’t think Castle) weren’t aware that she had the load to lay down. She’d rather anything than be looked upon with pity; anything rather than have to abandon her father...
Anyway. She’s dealt with the instant problem. She won’t have to deal with Castle any more. He’ll get what he needs to from the precinct, leave in the near future, and he can make up the rest. It’s all fiction, after all. No need for hard reality.

Later, dinner eaten and book finished, she goes to bed, curls into her comforter and isn’t really warm, and doesn’t cry: just as she hasn’t cried over her father in years, just as she doesn’t cry over the choices she’s made.

She never uses the word sacrifice.

She doesn’t do much on Sunday, either, sleeps late, again, does little, again; until she has to go to her father’s for dinner. She steels herself to that, as well. He’ll want to play games: because that’s how they always cover the difficult gaps in conversation.

So they do play games. But Jim also wants to talk.

“Is everything okay, Katie?”

“Fine, Dad.”

“It’s just not like you to be having a row with your co-workers.”

“Castle is not a co-worker. He’s following us around for research. He wants to write about the NYPD.”

“I know he’s following you. But at Christmas you said he was quite useful, and it sounded like you were friends. He looked nice enough, the other night. Bit quiet, though. I thought you said he never stopped talking.”

“He was leaving. He’d been talking.” Oh yes, he’d been talking. Just as well her father hadn’t heard it.

“You mean you were having a fight, Katie.”

“What? No.”

Jim looks penetratingly at her.

“Katie, I couldn’t hear the words, but the tone was audible from the moment I got out the elevator, and the two of you were squared up like you were in the ring at Madison Square Gardens. So don’t give me that look.”

Beckett concentrates on her move, and sends one of Jim’s men back to home. She doesn’t say Sorry.

“He’d come to complain that he wasn’t seeing enough of the work. It got a little heated. He followed Ryan around last week and that seemed to sort it out.”

Jim looks at her again, in a way she hasn’t seen for many years. Parental disbelief is a large part of it. I-know-you’re-lying is most of the rest. Just for good measure, there’s some amusement.

“Katie, I may be old, but I’m not stupid. That argument had nothing to do with the precinct. That sounded like the way your mother and I fought, before we… got together.”

“It’s your go, Dad,” Beckett diverts. Jim draws his card, glances swiftly at the board and manages to send two of Beckett’s men back to home by sliding.

“No need to gloat.”

Jim grins. “I like this game. Where did you say you got it?”

“I’ll take you. Next Saturday. I don’t remember the store name, but it’s only a couple of streets away from my apartment. I’m sure I can find it again.”

“That would be nice.”

Beckett grins happily as she manages to start a man off again. “There,” she says. “Catching up with you. I’m not having you winning every time.”

“So what’s really going on, Katie?”

“Nothing. Everything’s fine.” Just as long as Rick Castle stays out of her life.

“Hmm,” Jim mutters, sceptically. “Katie… you don’t have to put your life on hold. Have some fun. Patch things up with your Rick Castle. You don’t fight like that with someone you don’t care about. Go fix it.”

She can’t fix it. She doesn’t even want to try to fix it. And she can’t ever tell her dad why she won’t be fixing it. So she smiles happily and agreeably and finishes the game, and demands another one because she lost, and then another to settle who’s the champion this evening.

And afterwards she goes home and reads for a while and then she goes to bed and not for one single moment of any of that time can she forget her father saying patch things up. Go fix it. But she can’t patch it up. There is no patch which will fix this rip.
Where can I be safe?

Monday morning Beckett is ensconced in a pile of cold case files and apparently oblivious to the world around her. Esposito arrives not long after she had, casually greets her, receives a vague wave of fingers and leaves her to it. Ryan rushes in a little later, complaining about the subway, and receives the same vague wave of fingers and a brief and unsympathetic look up.

For the next hour Beckett doesn’t look up from her desk, and when she does do so it’s only to take a brief break, make herself another cup of coffee, and sit back down again without spilling it. The boys don’t disturb her. They’ve enough work of their own to do without the risk that she might add more. Besides which, it’s fairly clear that she doesn’t want disturbed. Ryan tips Espo the wink that Castle wasn’t exactly on form last week either, and both of them draw perfectly accurate conclusions from that. Materially incomplete conclusions, but accurate. They are detectives, after all.

Castle shows up around ten, announcing his arrival by dropping a bag containing a bear claw and more carefully placing a large coffee in front of Beckett, who produces a neutral statement of thanks and manages not to look him in the eye while doing so. The death-grip on her pen belies her apparent calm.

“Morning, Beckett,” he says brightly. Under the brightness there is a certain firmness of tone. “What are we investigating today?”

“Cold cases.”

“Oh good,” he says. The boys look at him with astonishment. Beckett notably fails to look at him at all.

“You don’t have to stay and be bored.”

“It’ll be a nice quiet day.”

“Hiding from your publisher again?”

“That too.”

Too does not sound good. Too sounds as if there is another reason for Castle to be glad the day is quiet. Beckett takes a swift, all-encompassing glance at him. He looks as happy-go-lucky as ever, which is all wrong. He should be cold and angry and withdrawing: as reproachfully contemptuous and sure that she’s the bitch she made herself appear to be as he was on Saturday a week ago, and Saturday just past, when she’d thrown the ugly truth at him. But he isn’t. Is he dumb, or what? Doesn’t he have the intelligence to despise her and leave her alone? Doesn’t he have the sense to walk away from her toxic life?

Surely he couldn’t work out what she was doing? Surely it’s not a case of he’s got so much intelligence he’s worked out that she was deliberately making herself out to be the bad guy? Not that that was hard. She is. She is pettily and pathetically and disgustingly jealous of Alexis’s relationship with Castle, and every time she sees it in action, it hurts. So it fitted very nicely with the need to keep her dad safe. She hadn’t said a single word that wasn’t true. He can’t be that clever. He just can’t.

She passes him the next file from the top of the pile and goes back to her own file. She is frantically compartmentalising the harsh words of Saturday and her desperate desire to have him leave into a spare portion of her brain; to be cool and reserved and to ignore him and pretend that he’s just the annoying writer who showed up one day and pushed in and who she doesn’t need to care about at all.

“Don’t you want to know why I’m happy about a nice quiet day?”

“No. Cold cases do not make me happy.”

“Why not?” Castle asks, momentarily distracted.

“It means we didn’t solve them first time round.” She looks back down at the file in front of her, and makes a face at it. “Not that these came from our team. Maybe a fresh eye will spot something they missed.”

Castle makes a choked noise and pretends to have swallowed his own coffee the wrong way. That’s all too close to what he’s intending to point out to Beckett, later. Specifically, his fresh eye, pointing out something she’s missed: to wit, that he is not letting her get away with her tactics. He wants her back and he’s not going to walk away without a fight. He doesn’t need to use her dad in his book, he’s decided, he just needs to know how it affected Beckett to get Nikki’s reactions right. He could even remove – though it will pain him: it’s brilliant writing even if he says so himself – enough of the backstory based on her mother, or change it a little more, to make sure it isn’t too close to reality.

He’s still not entirely sure why he’s bothering making all these adjustments simply to try to catch a woman who hasn’t exactly evidenced an overwhelming desire to be with him – except that she’d become soft Kat in his arms and he is sure that that meant more than just I want a booty call affair. He wants much more than a booty call affair. Deep down, he is sure that they would be great together, and he’s sure that he wants to write more than one book in this Nikki Heat universe so he needs her for that too, and he’s sure that she needs more life than she’s got. He’s got plenty of life to share.

And that’s where he pauses. His life involves his family. And while Beckett had put it, quite deliberately, in the worst possible way: she hadn’t been lying. Seeing him with Alexis is something she has a very hard time dealing with. This is still a major, major, problem. Still, if they can – if she will – only talk about it, then they can work something out. Can’t they? He thinks they probably can, because Beckett had taken such care to hide her feelings from Alexis, and from him, which argues that she was trying to resolve or get over them. Whether she will talk is an entirely different matter. Well, he’s going to try. If it doesn’t work, then that’s fine. At least he’ll have tried. He ignores the pang of conscience at his own lie.

Lunchtime, where Castle had hoped to begin, is a total washout. Beckett informs them all that she’s got a lunch date with Lanie, and disappears on the word. Castle is left having lunch with Ryan and Esposito, which, while pleasant enough, was not the plan.

“Lanie, want some lunch?”

“Huh?” Lanie says, blindsided by the completely unexpected request.

“I’ve done nothing but cold cases all morning, and it’ll be the same all afternoon. My eyes are bleeding and my brain is mush. Do you want to get some lunch with me?”

“Sure.”

Arrangements are swiftly made, and when Lanie walks into the diner Kate is already there, sipping a soda and tapping her fingers impatiently.
“What’s up? You look as if you’re ready to shoot people.”

“No…” Kate says slowly. “Not really. I just hate cold cases, and that’s all we’ve got.”

“So you’ve got no Writer-Boy staring at you? Or improving the view from your desk?”

“Oh, he showed up. Nothing for him to do, but he showed up anyway.”

“Awww,” drawls Lanie, in the most irritating voice she can manage. “That’s nice for you. He must be sweet on you.”

“I don’t think so,” Kate says. Lanie looks disappointedly at her. “I don’t think he’ll be around much longer.” Lanie looks even more disappointed. Then she drills a glare into Kate.

“What have you done, Kate? You’ve done something to make sure he leaves, haven’t you?”

“No. It’s up to him if he stays or goes.”

“Don’t you lie to me, girlfriend. You’ve got that look you get when you’ve done something that you think is right but hate anyway. What have you done?”

“Nothing.”

Lanie stares fixedly at her. Kate can’t hold her gaze. “What. Have. You. Done?”

“Told him the truth, okay? Told him the truth, that I can’t bear watching him with his daughter. Happy now?”

Lanie gapes at her, utterly appalled. “You did what?”

“I can’t. I can’t look at them being so happy and all the way it should be. I used to have that. And then my dad jammed his head down a bottle of whiskey and nothing was ever the same again.” Lanie winces. “Every time I see them it reminds me. I can’t deal with it at this time of year. I can’t deal with any family” – she spits the word – “at this time of year, but I can’t stop dealing with my dad, can I? I have to keep my dad safe.”

Her eyes are wide and glistening. She hasn’t touched her sandwich. Lanie reaches out a hand to her. Kate draws back sharply.

“So there you have it,” she says flatly. “Not pretty. Jealous of a perfectly normal family and sick-scared that my dad will get caught in the cross-fire. I’m in no place for any sort of relationship. Better to end it.”

Lanie’s never heard Kate say anything like this. She’d never realised that it ran so deep. Then again, she’s never seen Kate anywhere near anyone with a kid before, either. Will had been solo. Commitment free. Not that Kate had let him share in her commitments. Oh no. Half the reason they’d broken up was because Kate wouldn’t show him her fractured father. She hasn’t had anything other than casual relationships since.

“D’you want one?”

“Oh, sure I want one, but it’s not gonna happen here. No point trying.”

“You seemed pretty into him. What aren’t you telling me now?” Lanie fillets Kate with a dissecting glare. “You got it on. Didn’t you? You got it on and the minute he tried to get any closer than a booty call you started backing off as fast as you could find reverse. An’ I bet he called you on it.”
The flinch tells Lanie everything she needs to know about that. “You are so dumb.”

“And he’s writing his book,” Kate continues, baldly and bitterly, ignoring Lanie’s words. “Using me as his inspiration” – another venomous twist on the word – “and how long d’you think it’ll be before he uses my dad as a character? Bad enough that he’s using me. As soon as he puts a drunken father in, everyone in the world will know who it’s based on and it won’t take the gossip rags and the legal gossips ten seconds to dig up all that past and ruin Dad again. And it’ll be me who pulls him out the mire. I can’t do that again. I can’t watch my dad fall into the booze. It nearly killed me to walk away and accept I couldn’t fix it last time. I just can’t do it. I can’t bear his calls coming up and having to ignore them.” She pauses, blinks, blinks again, and her face shuts down completely.

“I’m not letting my dad down again,” Kate says, terrifyingly determined. “I can’t let him down.” She looks at her watch, and her face contorts. “I have to go. Lunch hour’s over. See you.” She’s out the diner before what? has left Lanie’s lips. Lunch hour is not over. They’ve barely been there half an hour, and on cold-case days, if they do meet up, it’s a good opportunity to take most of an hour. Kate’s left her sandwich, too. She hasn’t taken a single bite out of it. That’s not good either. Kate is normally quite good at eating when it’s in front of her. It’s when it’s not in front of her she tends to forget. Lanie finishes her own wrap, pondering. She is pondering whether to risk life and limb by intervening, or let it run for a time.

Because Lanie is absolutely dead certain sure that Kate Beckett likes Rick Castle an awful lot more than she’s admitting. She is also dead certain sure that Kate has not discussed her father with Castle at all, still less checked any of her assumptions about what he might write. And finally, Lanie is also absolutely dead certain sure that Mr Beckett would be quite seriously upset if he knew that his daughter was sacrificing herself to protect him. Lanie, in fact, wonders if Mr Beckett knows anything at all about how his daughter behaves. Still, she’s not going to get between Kate Beckett and her dad. Nor is she going to get in between Kate and Castle. That is a very, very bad plan. And possibly fatal. She’s just not sure for whom.

She looks at her watch and realises with annoyance that she has to get back to her lab and slab. She wouldn’t have minded another half hour to think about what she might do. It’ll wait. Fools may rush in where angels fear to tread, but Lanie Parrish, MD, is neither fool nor angel.

Beckett just had to get out. She’s said far more than she should have, even to Lanie, and she needed to leave before her emotions got any more the better of her sense and control. She shouldn’t have said any of that. Ever. She aims for Tompkins Square Park, which at lunchtime on a dank February day is unlikely to be populated by anyone who might disturb her. She’s got twenty minutes, tops, to get herself back under control. Compartmentalise, Kate. Get it together.

Snow, wet flakes only a step above sleet, is falling on her: leaving her soft beret and scarf speckled white on the dark red, staining her shoulders. The damp flakes weigh her down, and her whitening shoulders slump. The snow greys the ends of her hair, not covered by her hat. The burden of her choices hunches her back, and she feels old and defeated. She stares unseeingly at the falling snow adding to the dirty covering of the ground. So has the weight of her choices accumulated, covering the frozen earth of her walled off life.

The advantage of sitting here, huddled in her warm coat and hat and scarf; feet in boots, is that the raw, damp air chills her emotions as it does her body; the creeping frigidity of the Snow Queen’s icy kiss, with her being cast in the role of Kay. No Gerda here, to melt her icy heart and shell through loving warmth. She doesn’t look for that.

She doesn’t look for comfort, either. Comfort comes with questions, and she’d rather not have any of those. She’d rather simply be slick, sardonic, and largely solitary Beckett. It’s so much safer that way. Look what’s happened today. She’d lost control, admitted how she feels to Lanie – and she’d seen Lanie’s reaction. Appalled horror. She’d be even more horrified if she knew that occasionally, on the worst and darkest days back then, Beckett had wished for it all to be over, for that one final, fatal call that begins I’m sorry for your loss. And it’s all because Castle had showed up on Saturday and rocked her right out of her normal composure and control and she hasn’t got it back yet.

She shivers. It’s time to get back. She pulls her shell around her and re-asserts her precinct personality, radiating her confidence in her ability to do her job and be the best. At least she has that. She can always rely on that. Professional success, tangibly measured by clear-up rate. No-one can argue with or judge her poorly or condemn her for her work. No-one.

Whatever condemnation might otherwise arrive.

Back in the bullpen, there is light and noise and warmth and bustle. None of it warms her at all, nor does she expect it to, nor will it, nor does she want it to. Unfortunately, there are cold cases still: no new body; and even more unfortunately there is still the too-perceptive, too-discerning gaze of Castle. She really thought – hoped – that he would have gone home.

“You’re covered in snow, Beckett. Have you been secretly making snow angels without me?” She musters an eye-roll. “That’s not fair. We could make snowmen. Have a snowball fight.” She doesn’t think so. Why can’t he just take the brick she’d applied to his head and go away?

“No. It’s snowing. I was out. In the snow. So I’m snowy.”

Castle looks at the melting snow on her coat and beret, raises his eyebrows in a sceptical fashion that blazes in neon lights that is more snow than a short brisk walk would leave, and doesn’t comment further.

“How’s Lanie?” he says instead. That is also not a helpful topic. Compartments. This is the precinct compartment.

“Fine,” she replies, in a way designed to shut that line down, and opens the cold case file in front of her in an I’m busy don’t interrupt way. “Ugh,” exits her lungs as she begins. The file is not inspiring. It’s obvious who committed the murder. The problem is that there isn’t enough evidence to prove it. She closes that file. No-one is going to authorise the overtime for a canvass of the neighbourhood in the detail needed. Not that there’s time. The diktat to close cases has left uniforms at a premium. She leaves a scribbled list of suggestions for progressing the case when time and budgets allow – so that would be the day after never, then. Sometimes, you simply have to accept reality. She winces, snaps the files shut with an assertive crack, and pulls the next one towards her likewise assertively.

Castle quietly pads off to the break room and meditatively makes himself a coffee. Some thinking seems indicated, and he isn’t going to do it while sitting next to Beckett, who might read his thoughts in his face. Currently, she’s as wholly barriered as he’s ever seen her. If she did see Lanie for lunch – and he is not presently inclined to believe that without question, given that she’s misled him a few times recently – then it was a pretty short and unhappy meal. Her eyes are tired and there are tiny lines of tension all around them; her mouth is tightly pinched and not kissable at all. There was too much snow on her outer garments for a brisk walk back from lunch, and, he realises, she looked (and still looks) cold, as she had done in her apartment on Saturday.

He sips his coffee and contemplates the position. Beckett looks no happier than she has at any time since she pushed his buttons and he walked out. He hasn’t seen a single trace of Kat since before Christmas – he’s decided that her debilitating headache doesn’t count – and right now she’s nearly as warm as an ice sculpture. This time, he recognises it as a defence mechanism. Don’t get involved, don’t explain. Don’t ask, don’t tell. And if you manage all that, then you won’t get hurt. Of course, there will be no joy, either. He thinks of her smart, cheerless, joyless, vague apartment: its abstract pictures and lack of souvenirs or mementoes or photographs. There had been no photographs at all. No memories. Nothing to be attached to. He wonders, if he asked her, what she’d save if her apartment went up in flames. Maybe he should ask her; maybe that way he’d learn something about her. He drains his cup and returns to his chair. Beckett doesn’t look up.

“I’m bored, Beckett,” he whines theatrically. “Amuse me.” From the annoyed expression on her face, laced with frustration and tinged with terror, he thinks that she might be beginning to work out that her underhand tactics are not going to pay off.

“I have a job. I have work to do. I am not a circus clown or a children’s party entertainer.”

“No, no. You don’t need to be a clown.” Beckett looks very like she’s about to add No, because you are, in a tone with no humour at all. “I had a thought.”

“So have I got a thought. My thought is that I should get on with my work without any distractions.”

“A little distraction would be good for you,” Castle drawls, and lets just enough heat appear in his gaze to make his meaning – and memories – obvious. It has no apparent melting effect on Beckett. If anything, the touch me not exclusion zone deepens further. “I’m not expecting a song-and-dance show. It’s just a game. Ryan and Espo could play too.”

“We all have plenty of work to do.”

“C’mon. It’ll take two minutes at most. Six if the boys join in.”

“No. Since you won’t shut up till this is done” – Castle whoops, mentally – “then get on with it.”

“It’s easy. I ask one question and you have to answer truthfully straight back.” He sees the anger rising. “Nothing inappropriate. All questions and answers suitable for a first-grade audience.”

“Get on with it.” She sounds really irritated, now.

“I’d rather you’d said Get it on, you know,” Castle says soulfully, improving the shining hour not at all, and scoots his chair back. Unexpectedly, nothing happens that he would have needed to avoid. “Never mind.”

“Just ask already. Maybe then I can get on with important matters rather than pandering to your inadequate attention span.”

Castle looks wounded. “Okay,” he grumps. “No need to be nasty.” His attention span is perfectly fine: it’s just that it’s not on cop work right now. It is, on the other hand, quite firmly on Beckett’s massive irritation that he’s still around. She really does want him gone, doesn’t she? The funny thing is, that she doesn’t look at all happy about anything. Castle’s firm conviction that she’s trying to get rid of him to protect her father strengthens. “If your apartment went up in flames, and you could only save one single item apart from what you were wearing, what would it be?”
“Won’t you please, please help me?”

“My bird,” Beckett says instantly, to Castle’s utter astonishment, and then immediately turns to her file.

“One question. One answer. One minute. All of which are now over. Either be some help, be quiet, or be gone.” Her voice is wholly uncompromising. It’s pretty clear that she expects him to go home. He considers, briefly, whether staying or going is more likely to get him what he wants: being a discussion with Beckett where he explains to her some of the facts of life which she doesn’t appear to understand. Or, much more likely, that she doesn’t want to understand and is therefore ignoring. Well, she isn’t going to get to ignore them. Starting with not ignoring him. Over the course of the day he’s become entirely convinced that he’s correct in his assumptions and that Beckett is pursuing an entirely ridiculous course of martyrdom and self-sacrifice for no good reason at all. In fact, all she had to do was tell… him… about… it. Oh. Like bear-trap closed-off Beckett would tell anyone anything about anything. Good call, Rick. Of course she wouldn’t. She barely knows you. Bed or not.

He returns to the break room – he will be swimming in coffee at this rate – and ponders a little further. He has a sharp-horned dilemma. He has to push her in order to break this deadlock, but pushing her has not exactly brought him unqualified success. Ah. Yes. Pushing her into visiting his loft and seeing his family (trying to bring her into his family) has been – and will for some time continue to be – spectacularly unsuccessful. Pushing her by detailed – or any – questioning, likewise. Being invited to hers, partially successful, if he counts booty calls as in any way successful. Arriving at hers and providing undemanding – as in no questions – affection and/or sex – the two are emphatically not the same – universally successful. The only problem is that since Christmas it might as well have been a series of paid-for escort service calls, and he is not prepared to be a live action sex toy. But… and but. He smiles very slowly and very dangerously, in a way which would terrify Beckett.

But… she wants and needs affection and to be Kat… and if he doesn’t ask any questions he might – or – persuade her back to Kat-ness. Slick, sarcastic, sexy Beckett does slick, sexy booty calls. Kat didn’t. Kat did soft making-out and cuddling and someone else taking the lead. (But not taking charge. A careful and fine, but very necessary, distinction.) He slips back into memory and tries to remember how he had managed it previously.

That’s it. He’d gently – but definitively – made the first move; gently and then more forcefully (she’d liked that) kissed her and held her comfortably tightly against him; and she’d let it happen, fallen into it with him and become softer, purring and contented Kat. He returns his focus to the world around him, moves to the door and peruses Beckett’s tight, tense face and posture, and abruptly wonders when she was last able to be Kat; when she last relaxed and let go. He doesn’t expect that her fragile, failed father can provide her with any respite, rather the reverse. She supports him, he’d finally, far too late, worked out.

Quite the reverse: she gives her father respite. It is, he recognises, quite possible that the last time she truly relaxed (because she is surely not relaxed now) was… well. Was when? Not since Christmas. Not even when he went home with her from the bar before Christmas, though that was close. He hasn’t seen her relaxed since after the mince pie fiasco, and that had been more luck than judgment. That time, he’d promised not to ask questions, and she’d relaxed and then they’d made love and she’d been softer Kat, whom he’d been able to keep close and hold tucked in his arms. So, no questions. Not yet. And a reassurance that he won’t write her father into Nikki. If she weren’t so fretful about her father, then maybe she wouldn’t be so fretful about coming to his and seeing him with Alexis.

Right. He has a plan. Show up, explain some of the realities of life, keep showing up, and then take – very carefully, he doesn’t want shot or otherwise incapacitated – the lead, to show that he can support her. That means, therefore, staying around until she leaves – or maybe a better option would be leaving now and returning shortly before shift ends.

He wanders back out of the break room, bids everyone a cheerily collective farewell, receives some colourful commentary from the boys and a nondescript mutter from Beckett, and departs with a thoroughly satisfied, predatory smile that, had she seen it, would have told Beckett instantly that her worst fears are about to be realised: Castle is indeed far too intelligent and hasn’t bought her actions at all. He’s still smiling dangerously when he gets home.

Beckett is unimpressed by both Castle’s boredom – he didn’t need to show up today – and his desire to play Twenty Questions. She wants him simply to go – where is entirely irrelevant as long as it’s elsewhere – and his comment about distraction and the scorching glance which accompanied it merely induces a feeling of dread that she hasn’t achieved her aim of driving him away. She tells herself firmly that it’s only an instinctive reaction of Castle’s which means less than nothing and would be applied to any female in his line of sight who was not actually in a coffin. Even then he’d probably try to find out if it were a vampire and thus ripe for flirtation. That sensible thought doesn’t prevent the sinking feeling in her gut, and telling herself that she’s done quite enough to show him that she’s toxic and he should quit the game isn’t helping either. She has put him off. Permanently.

His question is stupid. Her apartment is not likely to catch fire. However, her answer exits her mouth without the involvement – and certainly without the permission – of her brain. That’s it. Question time is over. Castle disappears again, thankfully, and Beckett is left thinking about her small quartz bird: its bright black stone eyes, its cheerfully orange bill and lavender tail. It’s her only tangible memento, only bearable because it isn’t obviously a reminder. There are a few photos, in a box, at the back of a closet. It’s all she managed to save. She looks back down at the case file and concentrates very hard on it. There is no clear missed lead here either, but she has to review the whole file. Castle returns, and she mentally braces for the next assault on her hard-won control. She needs him to go. She needs time in the undemanding company of the boys, who don’t ask anything of her except that she leads their team to the best of her ability. That burden, she can bear. That burden, though, she chose for herself, rather than it being forced upon her, and it comes with teamwork, which helps. It never removes the majority of the weight, but even a little lightening of her load gives her strength to carry on.

Astoundingly, Castle leaves. Finally he’s taken the hint. Beckett’s biting tension eases marginally, and she manages a solid hour of concentration with no distractions. Her smooth, superficially settled shell hardens and deepens. It’s all going to be just fine. He’ll leave, her dad will be safe, and it will all be just fine. As long as she clings to the knowledge that she’s made the right choice. The easy choice would have been to pretend and lie and then secretly, hiddenly resent the position, simply to hang on to a half-assed, uncommitted affair with no trappings of a relationship at all, with none ever arising. That, she couldn’t have borne. She can bear the lack of any support.

Another hour passes in intense focus, sadly to no further effect. Beckett is beginning to contemplate the end of shift, and, rather unusually, the idea that she might go home at shift-end and lose herself in the quiet peace there: maybe strum her guitar a little, maybe cook her dinner. She could have blinis, she thinks. Yes. Warmed blinis, with a little smoked salmon, and a little sour cream; and then a winter-weight chicken dish, slightly fiery – no. Shashlik. She hasn’t made shashlik in a very long time. She’ll have some lace potatoes, and some green beans, and some flat bread. Planning her dinner improves her mood, and remembering that she has some Russian tea as well makes her more content. She’s plotting her exit time and route home to collect all the necessary ingredients in a cloud of general satisfaction when, simultaneously, her phone rings and Lanie appears from the elevator.

“Beckett.”

“Kate…” She’s already moving to the stairwell. “Kate… I… I… I didn’t know who to call. Just…
Kate, please?”

“What’s wrong? Where are you?”

“Home. I need help. He’s… he went out and he’s not home and he wasn’t really warmly dressed” – it sounds trivial, but it’s not: it’s so easy simply to fall asleep and freeze, especially when drunk –
“And I can’t reach him on his cell.”

“Was he at work?”

“He called in sick.” Definitely drunk, that means. At the beginning of the day, or still so from the night before.

“When did he go out?”

“Eleven.” When bars start to open. She knows the timings: the terrifying clock-watching. And it’s after five now. “He said he’d only be a few minutes.” They always do say that. There’s the sound of uncomprehending tears. “It’s been so much worse, since…” That would be a trigger. But he’d already been on the downward path. If not this, then another thing. The words have trailed off: that sentence not needing to be completed. She’s moving out of the stairwell, back to her desk, shrugging on her coat and scarf as she powers down her computer, puts her papers away, picks up purse and beret.

“I’m on my way.” She swipes off.

“Kate.”

“Not now, Lanie. I gotta go.” She can’t stop for Lanie, and anyway she’s really not interested in continuing their earlier conversation in any way. Lanie’s expression had been very revealing. Said it all, really. Astonishment, tinged quite heavily with horrified disgust. Another good reason she shouldn’t get too close to – other people. She is simply not a nice person, and she’s tired of pretending to herself that she is. It’s not that she doesn’t want pity because it implies weakness, though that’s a large part of it: it’s that she doesn’t deserve it when, if people knew the truth of what she had felt and what she had done, they wouldn’t offer it. She’s run out of pretence.

“Kate, wait!” Lanie lays a hand on her arm Beckett doesn’t have time for this. She shakes Lanie’s hand away, not gently.

“Lanie, let go. I gotta go. Out the way.” She pushes past and calls the elevator. Lanie’s on her heels. “I’ve no time for whatever it is you want.”

Lanie is left staring at Kate’s chilly, blank face and get-out-my-way demeanour as the doors close.
That is not what she came here for. She’s been brushed off like an annoying horsefly.
“Where’s she going?” she asks the boys. They look almost as befuddled as she does.

“Dunno. Got a call, rushed out.”

“Now you know as much as we do. Nothin’.”

“Didn’t you have lunch with her?”

“Yep.” Lanie doesn’t add to that.

“You did?”

“Hey, Castle,” arrives in resigned surround-sound.

“Yes, I did,” Lanie affirms. “Not that it lasted long. What’s it to you? And what’s wrong with Kate?”

“You tell me,” Lanie says bitterly. “According to the two stooges here” –

“We got three now,” Esposito puts in, “seein’ as Castle’s showed up again.” It’s Castle’s turn to growl.

“ – she got a call and left. Shoved past me and as good as told me she didn’t want to talk to me.”

“ ‘S right,” says Ryan.

“A body dropped and you didn’t call me?”

“Don’t be dumb. If a body dropped we’d all be there.” Castle knows that, but he’d rather look dumb than reveal what he thinks has happened. Two options: Beckett’s father or Mrs Berowitz. On balance… he’d bet on Mrs Berowitz, if only because if it were her father there would have been some noticeable consternation, not just a bit of pushing past.

“Oh,” he says, pretending befuddlement. “Okay. Who wants to come for a drink, then?”

This idea finds more favour than most which he suggests, and the entire gang decamps to a comfortably unpretentious bar in the vicinity. As Lanie puts it, no point in walking further in the snow than you have to. Nobody mentions Beckett’s abrupt departure again, though Castle catches Lanie casting him peculiar glances throughout the next couple of hours. She doesn’t ask anything, though, and nor does he. If Beckett and Lanie are at odds, then the safest place to be is a galaxy far, far away.

Beckett resists any temptation – however slight – to use the lights and sirens, and proceeds at a strictly legal pace to Mrs Berowitz’s smart, expensive apartment in a smart, expensive location. They’d lived in one of those, once, until she’d moved out and gone to Stanford, and then her father had drunk the equity and then the bank had strongly suggested that he downsize. When she’d come back, she’d found somewhere else to live. She’d tried to live with her father, but it didn’t work. She wasn’t a child and he… he wasn’t sober. It had taken six months for her to realise that it wouldn’t work. It hadn’t stopped her spending a lot of time there. She simply hadn’t kept her possessions there, or had a room. There’s a lot of value in this apartment. She wonders, cynically, how long it will last.
Julia is only too relieved to see her. Beckett recognises the signs of desperation and knows that, unless she can bear to have the woman hanging on her neck all the time – just as she, Beckett, had done with her training officer, and before that with her guidance counsellor – she will need to persuade her to seek and then accept professional help. She can’t give the support Julia needs, never mind the help she wants. She can’t even help herself, most of the time. She couldn’t help her father then.

But she can help Julia now, and she does, and she will.

“He still isn’t answering. Thank you so much for coming.” She’s almost hysterical. This needs calmed down, or it will be useless.

“Okay,” Beckett says soothingly. “Tell me everything. Could I maybe have a coffee, please? It’s cold out.” Something to do, to occupy Julia’s fidgeting hands, to bring her down a little. She’s the sort of woman who needs to be doing.

“Oh… yes, of course. Sorry. I should have offered.”

“No, of course not. You can talk to me while you make it, if you like?”

Beckett’s cool, gentle tones are already having an effect. Julia is less frantic, though naturally no less worried. She’s beginning to think, Beckett can see. She automatically starts the kettle and finds delicate china cups; puts them on a pretty, fragile tray with cream and sugar in jug and bowl; and sets it out as if this were a meeting of the Temperance Movement in 1880. While she does that, she talks, just as Beckett had wanted. Well. Not wanted. But she can’t fail to help.

“He wasn’t well, last night. Stomach bug.” No, Julia. He was so drunk he was throwing up. “He’s lost so much weight.” Yeah. That’s how it goes. Not much nutrition in alcohol, and they don’t eat when they’re passed out drunk. “So he called in sick this morning, and I let him sleep so he got some rest,” or came out his coma, more likely, “and then he got up and we had breakfast and he ate properly – I made waffles” – Beckett recognises the focus on small details of normality to hide the reality of living with alcoholism – “and had some coffee and then when it got to eleven or so he said he’d go out to the drugstore because he needed some shaving cream. He should only have been a quarter-hour.” That’s how it goes. He’s in a bar. Beckett thinks about this end of town.

“Where’s the drugstore?”

“Two blocks west and south. The Duane Reade.” There’s a bar just another block down. Beckett would bet most of Julia’s expensive jewellery that she’ll find him there. She hopes she’ll find him there. The alternatives are not pretty. “He said he’d only need a lighter jacket because he’d only be ten minutes. He never gets cold. My hands are always cold but his never are…” Julia is very close to crying.

“Oh. I’ll go and have a quick look round. Whatever I find, in about half an hour, I’ll come back. Okay? But before I go” – this is not going to be easy – “I want you to think about exactly what he’s wearing and maybe find me a photo so that if I can’t find him quickly we can do something about it easily.” Beckett doesn’t say – so we can search the hospitals and morgue. That won’t help. It may be necessary and it may already be true, but it will certainly not help.

When she gets back, too, she’s going to have to tell Julia all over again that she can’t save her husband. She can only save herself. She has to get professional help.

It doesn’t occur to Beckett that she’s laying out her soul to help Julia, where she need not and will only suffer by so doing. It doesn’t occur to her that she’s compensating for not saving her father.
when he needed her by trying to save Julia and her husband. It certainly doesn’t occur to her that this is hardly congruent with being the ball-breaking bitch she believes she’s been since Christmas, culminating in the discussions of Saturday and today. In fact, she thinks that if she were a better person she’d not be trying to escape the pressure of Julia’s desperation and belief that Beckett can help; she’d not be hoping that Julia will let go of her and take professional help instead; and she’d not be hoping that she can find Mr Berowitz in the first bar so that she can go home, where there’s no-one wanting or needing her and she can disappear; because in all those cases she should be happy and willing to help, not wishing she wasn’t here, that she’d never caught the Berowitz body at all. Just another way in which she’s selfish and unkind.

She puts her coat, scarf and beret back on and goes out into the gathering dark and the cold.
Everybody's looking for something

Beckett finds the relevant Duane Reade easily enough. This isn’t her patch, but she’s lived in Manhattan all her life and it’s not too difficult to work it out. She shows her shield to a passing store worker and swiftly finds that, as she had suspected, Mr Berowitz had never entered the store. She starts to look around for bars immediately. They aren’t far to seek. She’s rapid and focused: half an hour is not very long and there’s a reasonable amount of ground to cover.

She doesn’t think, as she searches for Mr Berowitz, that she’s hiding from herself, Lanie, and above all Castle by doing this: using her detective skills, in which she has total and wholly justified confidence, to help someone else where she can’t see a way – hasn’t even looked for a way – to help herself.

The first two bars – it’s just as well she hadn’t bet the jewellery – are a bust. No-one remembers the man, or recognises the picture. The third is a little more useful.

“Sure, lady. He came in just after opening. Started on the beer. ‘Bout lunchtime, had a whiskey chaser with a couple more beers. I stopped serving him after the third whiskey, told him to go home an’ sober up. Can’t afford for there to be trouble here. You never know when a quiet drunk like that will snap. I don’t need the beat cops takin’ an interest every night. Bad for business.” He stops suddenly, remembering that he’s talking to a cop. “Not that there’s anythin’ that wouldn’t stand bein’ looked at,” he says hurriedly. “Just the customers don’t like it.”

Beckett thanks him and leaves, and makes a little mental note that she should suggest – in a friendly, I-heard-something-that-might-be-useful way – to the local precinct that this bar might repay a random visit. Co-operation, that’s the game. You never know what might be important to another precinct, so it’s always best to pass it on.

She’s running out of the half-hour she said she’d be. She retraces her steps to the Berowitz apartment, heavily, trudging through the snow and slush. She can see the pattern of her evening already, and it doesn’t involve blinis or shashlik. It involves memories, and pain, and the death of hope. She wishes she could simply turn tail and run away from all these people who lean on her, or who want more of her than she’s able to give.

The hope on Julia’s face dissolves instantly. “You didn’t find him?” she says hopelessly, and in it Beckett hears a tinge of you failed me.

“No. Julia… he was in a bar. He was there till lunchtime, then he left.” No point telling her that he’d been thrown out. Not yet. “Is there anywhere he might have gone? Any places he went often, or friends he might go and see?”

“No.” Oh, hell. This is really not going to be pretty, is it? “Julia, I think we should see if he’s been picked up. Can I use this photo?” Julia is crying now. Beckett understands that. She’d done it so often herself, before and after she walked away, until the tears had run dry. She pats Julia awkwardly on the back. “I’ll need to go back to my precinct to do it.” The abandonment on Julia’s face stabs sharply on her conscience. “I’ll let you know as soon as there’s anything.”

All the way back to the Twelfth she relives the guilt and shame of abandoning someone who needs her: saving herself at the expense of another’s peace of mind. She can’t do what is needed from Mrs Berowitz’s home – but she could have stayed, and asked another to do it for her. She was drowning in her grief, and had to swim for shore. Alone. Carrying another would have sent them both under. Will send them both under.
But it hurts. Seeing the raw pain of abandonment in another set of eyes hurts.

She parks up at the precinct, notes without surprise that it’s coming up for seven pm, and attains her desk without needing to do more than wave briskly at the desk sergeant on her way past. She’ll order takeout in a while, when she’s hungry. It doesn’t occur to her that she should be hungry now. She hadn’t eaten her lunch, after all.

She starts the process of trying to find Mr Berowitz and, once she’s called each precinct – no point expecting it to be possible to run searches against the database this early in proceedings: it won’t yet have been updated reliably for anyone picked up this afternoon– makes herself a coffee and ponders pizza. She can’t be bothered with anything more complicated. She calls up a delivery service, accepts that she’ll have to share the pizza with the desk sergeant, and promptly forgets about it. She starts down the darker line of making enquiries of the morgue, thankful that Lanie had left for the day. Some helpful – her mouth twists – person would undoubtedly let Lanie know she was calling, otherwise.

Since she’s here anyway, she might as well have a look at some more cold cases while she waits for her results. She ought to call Julia, too. Presumably Mr Berowitz – what’s his first name? She isn’t sure, offhand – hasn’t turned up at home, or Beckett would have got a call. She pulls a file into the small puddle of light from the lamp on her desk. Then she recognises that as her putting off the necessary but unpleasant act of calling Julia, and forces herself to dial.

“Julia? Kate Beckett.”

“Have you found him?”

“Not yet. All the enquiries are out, and I’m waiting for the results. I’ll let you know as soon as I’ve heard anything.”

“Thank you,” Julia says faintly. It’s fairly clear that she isn’t holding out much hope. She wouldn’t find any in the databases, either. They’ve returned nothing, as yet. Beckett’ll try again in a few hours.

When her phone buzzes, Beckett suddenly remembers about her pizza, and expects it’s the desk sergeant. She doesn’t look at the screen as she answers. “Sergeant Baker? Is that the pizza? Wanna take what you want, and I’ll be down in a moment for the rest.”

“Beckett? Are you in the precinct?” Oh, fuck. What the hell is Castle calling her for?

“Yes.” No point denying it. She’s given it away. Compartmentalise. Again.

“Good. I’m coming over.”

“I’m busy.”

“New body? Can’t be. You’d have called Ryan or Espo.” No point denying that either, and from the smug, self-satisfied tone of Castle’s voice he’s been with them for the last couple of hours.

“Listen very carefully.”

“I vill say this only vonce?”

“What?”

“Bad UK TV show I saw once, on a book tour.”
“Castle, listen to me. Do not come to the precinct. I am busy. I do not have time to talk to you.” There’s a click as the call is cut. By Castle. Good. Maybe he has finally got the point.

When her phone rings again it’s the desk sergeant. This time, she checks the screen before she answers, though. With the way her luck’s running, it would be Lanie if she didn’t do that.

“Pizza here, Detective. Thanks for sharing.” She goes down, retrieves the third that’s left – enough for her: Tony Baker knows how much he can take for dinner from every detective in the precinct – and wanders back up to her desk, starting on the first slice in the elevator. It might not be blinis, or shashlik, but it’s fine. If there were only some results on the search for Mr Berowitz, everything would be perfectly fine. She disappears into the break room for some water and to start another coffee brewing, and returns to her comfort-food pizza.

She’s wiping her fingers on a handy Kleenex and finishing the coffee when there’s the first ping on her search. It’s come from the Tenth, over in Chelsea. She takes the call. White forty-something male found dead drunk outside a cheap bar. Half frozen. He’s in the cells, sobering up. No wallet, no ID. Looks like he’s been rolled.

“If I send you a photo, could you tell me if that’s your guy?”

“Sure. Would be good to get rid of him if it is. He’s a mess. Cell’s a mess. We’ll need to hose it out.” It’s worse when it’s your kitchen, Officer. Trust me, that’s worse. She snaps the photo into being a photo on her phone and e-mails it off. A few minutes later she gets the reply. No. Sorry.

Dammit. Of course it couldn’t be that easy or quick. But it’s still snowing, and now she’s really beginning to worry. If he hadn’t really been dressed for the weather, and he’d been thrown out one bar for being too wasted to be served, then he might well have wandered. Might have fallen asleep, on a bench. Might have frozen, and so died. Every year, some do. It’s only luck her father hadn’t. Her next calls come from Midtown North, and South. Nothing there, either.

“What are you doing?”

Beckett’s head whips round. For one swift moment Castle sees absolute horror in her face, before she locks it all away. Ah. She still thinks she’d got rid of him.

“Working a case. Good night.”

“Uh-uh. I shadow you. So I am shadowing you.” He smiles sunnily. “I’m staying till you leave.”

“You’ll be very bored. Go home.”

“Nope. If I’m bored, I’ll find a distraction.” The smile is even sunnier. Beckett looks as if she’s about to launch into a tirade of incandescent and – she would think – hurtful fury. It won’t hurt him at all, because she’s trying to push him away, so he doesn’t believe a word she’s about to say. Her mouth opens – and her phone rings.

“Beckett.”

“Yes?”

“Okay. I’ll be there as fast as I can. Thanks. I owe you, O’Leary. I’m sure you’ll collect pretty soon.”

“Bye.”
She starts to pack up her desk and then put on her coat. No explanation is offered.

“What’s going on? Where are we going?”

“Nothing you need to know about. Favour for a friend. I thought I’d made it perfectly clear where I stood, and you certainly made it clear where you stand. This is not your business. Go home.”

“No.” Beckett freezes. “I’m coming with you and then we are going to have a talk about what you said on Saturday.”

“Nothing more to say.”

“You might not have anything more to say, but you are damn well going to listen to me. You’re not going to stop me shadowing you, either.” He’s not – yet – angry. He is, though, determined. He follows a silent Beckett to the elevator and out to her car, and gets in without a further word from her.

“Where are we going?”

“Central Park Precinct.” That’s bitten off.

“Why?”

“Nothing to do with you.”

“What’s happened to Mrs Berowitz?”

Beckett nearly runs the light. “How did you know?” she emits, utterly horrified. She stares at him in the harsh red glare of the stop light under the streetlamps. “This is nothing to do with you.”

“It’s nothing to do with you either, but here you are, running round the city in order to help out someone you don’t even know.”

“What I do off-duty is none of your business.”

“It’s not off-duty, though. You’re doing it as an NYPD Detective. Aren’t you?”

He’s got her there. She is. If she weren’t, she shouldn’t be using the systems, and if Montgomery found out, she’d be the wrong end of disciplinary proceedings. But this is going to be difficult enough without Castle there observing every twitch of her face and hitch in her gait. She had done this so often…

“Yes,” she growls.

“Then I’m shadowing you.” There is an extremely chilly silence. “Are you going to tell me anything?”

“It’s not mine to tell.”

Castle decides to wait until after they’ve got to the Central Park Precinct. And then he’s going to go home with Beckett and shake some answers out of her. Or stroke them out of her. Whichever works fastest. The journey is completed in the same chilly silence with which it began.

It doesn’t dawn on Castle till he steps out the car to enter the unfamiliar precinct that Beckett might be locked down because finding Mr Berowitz will raise the ghouls of sharp-clawed memory. How often, he wonders, had she done this to retrieve her father? He unobtrusively moves a little closer.
Beckett doesn’t react at all. Beckett, in fact, hasn’t even noticed. Mainly because she’s staring at the desk sergeant.

“Sergeant Hardon? You’re still here?”

“Officer – sorry, Detective Beckett. Haven’t seen you in a long time. What brings you here? It’s not your dad again, so what is it this time?”

“No. He’s still dry.” She smiles, chopped off short. “Five years.” The smile disappears. “Detective O’Leary told me you’d picked up a Mr Berowitz in the Park? He’s involved in one of my cases, so I’ve come to take him off your hands.”

“Well, no-one better than you to deal with him, Beckett. He’s a mess.” Castle detects a wince.

“While you’re catching up, I’ll get the guy up. You got something to keep your unit clean? You might want it.”

“Yeah. Sheet in the trunk.”

“Beckett!” joyfully rumbles around the room. Shortly thereafter Beckett disappears into the embrace of something that appears to be a Bigfoot without fur. He’s huge. At least – Castle estimates – sixteen, broad in proportion, and clearly in top condition. And he’s hugging Beckett – he’s lifted her off her feet – and isn’t dead. “When’re you coming to spar with me again? You don’t call, you don’t write…” Castle is not used to feeling undersized, but he’s feeling very small right now. And very unreasonably jealous. Beckett’s relaxed and is smiling and he should be the one who can make her so, not this overgrown mass of masculinity with a badge.

“I don’t send you flowers either, O’Leary, but that’s ‘cause you ate the last lot.” She smirks at him. “You were supposed to wear them in your hair.” O’Leary has a buzz cut.

“Not my colour, Beckett. You sent pink. You know I only like orange.” She laughs. Laughs. She’s been ignoring him all day – all week – and she’s laughing with this genetic mutation? “Who’s your friend?”

“Really?” He sounds amazed. Castle is gearing up for a round of sarcastic and unpleasant comments about annoying tag-alongs. Bit like a lot of the Twelfth had managed in the first day or two, in fact. “He’s nicer looking than his picture, Beckett. How come you scored the pretty boy and I didn’t?”

“Hold on a moment, what? ‘I never get the good ones. Can’t you send him our way for a while?’”

“O’Leary, you’re taken. Stop hitting on the man.” What?

“Shhhhh, Beckett. Don’t tell everyone.”

“They all know. Ever since you brought Pete to the NYPD Christmas party.” Castle’s jaw drops.

“Yeah, but you got a celebrity. Think how much kudos I’d get with him on my arm. I’d be on page six. You don’t really need him. You’re pretty enough without adding the pretty man. C’mon. Lend me him just for a day or two.” The man is practically pleading to be allowed to play with him. Castle contemplates how nice it is to be appreciated. Then he contemplates the likely effects of this tectonic plate-sized cop knocking him over. He thinks he’ll stick with Beckett. He’s rather less likely to suffer serious injury if she falls on top of him.

“Nothing doing, O’Leary. If he wants to come and hang out here that’s his lookout. Up to him.”

Teeth the size of tusks appear as O’Leary grins widely.

“Beckett, you are no fun at all. If you won’t lend me him, d’you think he’ll sign my book?”

“Ask him yourself. He’s right there, and as far as I know he’s not deaf or stupid. Though if he’s not stupid he should really start running right now.”

The mountain turns to Castle, who produces a bright celebrity smile.

“If I go get my book, will you sign it? It’s Storm Fall. Couldn’t come to the signing.”

“Sure,” Castle says, burying his bemusement at the whole situation under the exigencies of being a best-selling author. O’Leary rumbles away, and shortly rumbles back again. Castle has never seen a mobile mountain before. The book looks tiny in O’Leary’s enormous hands.

“What’cha writing now, Mr Castle?”

“About the NYPD. That’s why I’m shadowing Beckett and her team.” O’Leary makes a noise like an avalanche. Eventually Castle realises he’s laughing.

“Well, Mr Castle, if you want some stories you come by. I remember when Beckett wasn’t a hotshot Detective.”

“O’Leary…” Beckett says dangerously.

“Really?” Castle says, with a sidelong glance at Beckett.

“Oh yes. You’d never think such a tiny little thing could be so scary, would you?” Tiny little thing? Beckett? Tiny?

“O’Leary, it’s not me who’s little, it’s you who’s a giant.”

“You’re little,” he says happily. “Bet’cha if you took your heels off Mr Castle would think you’re little too.” Beckett growls at him. “Aw, c’mon. If I can’t tease you in front of your boyfriend when can I?”

“What?”

“Aw, c’mon,” O’Leary says again. “Way he was looking at me hugging you? If he’s not your boyfriend, you really need to have a chat.” He grins mischievously. “But if he isn’t please can I have him?”

Beckett has lost her smile and is clearly on the verge of bursting. Possibly into flames. Very fortunately for both Castle and O’Leary, who Castle is now thinking is a really, really good guy with whom he should have a long and detailed discussion involving much beer, at that point Sergeant Hardon reappears with something that looks like a panhandler who’s found the stock room of a really good tailor.

“Here he is, Detective.” Necessary paperwork is completed. Castle spends the couple of minutes Beckett takes to complete the papers in observing Mr Berowitz, while trying not to inhale any air that’s been too close to him. It’s fortunate, he reflects, that it is late, and the roads will not be too busy. The close confines of Beckett’s car are, bluntly, going to reek, even with the windows down and the air-con running on full, both of which he really hopes he can arrange. Now he understands why the sergeant had asked about keeping her car clean.

Beckett appears entirely unaffected by the state of Mr Berowitz. Clearly, however, both the sergeant and Detective O’Leary are expecting that she is affected by it, because they are now both regarding her as if she were a primed grenade.

“Thanks,” is all she says. “I’ll take him away now.”

It appears that Mr Berowitz is currently too drunk to care that Beckett is removing him. She guides him out with a hand on his shoulder, which gesture Castle would not have made for the entire total of his last Derrick Storm royalties, and steers him to her car.

“Make sure he doesn’t wander, Castle,” she says. Her voice is empty, and he wonders what her memories are. She pops the trunk and extracts a plasticised sheet, which she rapidly, efficiently and in a thoroughly practiced fashion drapes over the back seats. “Bring him here.” She puts Mr Berowitz into the back seat in standard cop fashion, hand pressing down on his head. Then she brings a plastic bowl out the trunk and puts it on his lap. “I won’t make you sit with him, Castle. You’re not a beat cop. Get in.” Her voice is just as dead as a moment ago. He doesn’t query anything. Making Beckett’s life harder at this point is not sensible.

Mr Berowitz survives the journey without further inconvenience to anyone except the stink of stale vomit and alcohol. Castle rolls his window down before he’s even fastened his seatbelt and makes absolutely no comment or conversation at all. Not soon enough they’re parking at the Berowitzes’ block.

Beckett extricates Mr Berowitz – she doesn’t ask Castle for help and something about the experienced way she brings him out the car lets him know that this is not her first rodeo, nor yet her thousand-and-first, but he props him up as Beckett shuts the car, and then takes quite a proportion of his weight. His coat can be cleaned.
Mrs Berowitz is far happier to see her husband than Beckett remembers that she was when seeing her father at any stage after the first month or so. Perhaps that’s marital love. Perhaps it’s just relief.

“Thank you, Kate. You brought him back. He’ll be so upset tomorrow.”

“Julia… Julia, he needs help. You need help.”

“But… but he’ll be fine.” Beckett’s face twists before she can stop it.

“Julia, he won’t be. You can’t save him. You can only save yourself. Trust me on this. You cannot save him unless he wants to save himself.” She’s entirely forgotten that Castle is in the room. He’s very carefully behind her, out of sight and out of mind, listening hard.

“I can,” Julia weeps. “I can. It’ll be different. He won’t do it again.”

“I have to go,” Beckett says. Her voice is empty again.

“Thank you.”

Beckett escapes without further laceration of her feelings on her razor edged memories, wanting only to go home and hide herself away now that the crisis is over: now that she’s poured herself out and left herself emptied; now that her memories have swooped upon her. It’s not till she’s at the door to the building that she remembers that Castle had been in the Berowitzes’ apartment with her and had heard every word she said.

“Are you okay?”

“Yeah.” He recognises that there is no point asking really? Or are you sure? Or even saying Come here and let me hold you till it’s better. So instead he decides to try to force some truth out of her, because after all she’s trying her best to convince him that he shouldn’t want to be here so he might as well use that to his advantage.

“You don’t normally do Missing Persons.”

“No.”

“Why’d you do this one?”

“He had been a witness. We might still need him to testify.” It’s totally unbelievable, and she knows it. An alcoholic is never going to be called if there’s any alternative. Castle doesn’t comment, but his scepticism is palpable. He sits in the passenger seat, window still down to allow the freezing February wind to clear the toxic air and atmosphere, and waits for her to move off. Then he starts again.

“Are you going to carry on lying to me?”

“This is none of your business. I didn’t ask you to come with me. I told you not to.”

“You needed the help. You need some company now.”

“No. I don’t. I’m fine.”
“If you were fine, you’d tell me why you did it. But you’re not fine. You need to talk about it, but you won’t.”

“I don’t want to talk about it.” But if she doesn’t talk about it, he knows, she’ll fall apart. She’s already halfway there. The stress fractures in her voice are evident.

“So I’ll tell you. I think that Mr Berowitz had gone out and gone missing, and then his wife called you to help because she’s been talking to you about how to cope. You gave her your card, didn’t you? The very first time, you gave her your number because you knew exactly what she was going through, because you already had. And then she called and you went to have lunch with her the day after the anniversary of your mom’s… death” – he doesn’t, can’t, say murder – “even though you were half-dead yourself from dealing with your father the day before. And you did it again two – not even two – weeks ago. And you’ve been doing it all evening since – when? Five? Half-past? It’s nearly nine now. You’d been out looking for him. You’d called every precinct in Manhattan. You called the morgue. Like you used to do.” He hears her breathing change, rasping across her throat.

“Shut up. This is not your book. This isn’t your story. You have no right to dig into anyone’s life. You’ll only use it in your books.”

“I will promise you that I will never use your dad’s story in my books. Never. That’s what you’re doing. You’re protecting him. You could simply have asked me to leave it out and told me why. I would have done. If you’d asked me.”

“You had no right to know. It’s his story. Not mine. You’re shadowing me for the story. So why should I believe you when you say you won’t use my dad’s?”

“I’ve never lied to you. Can you say you’ve never lied to me?”

There’s a silence. Castle returns to the main point. Beckett’s knuckles are white on the wheel, her eyes locked on the road and her mirrors.

“You did it all because you know what she’s going through. You can’t not support her, even though you don’t know her at all. You went out of your way to help her. You go out of your way to solve crimes to help strangers. You do everything and beyond to help your dad. Why don’t you want anyone to know that, Beckett? Why are you trying to make me believe the worst of you?” Tell me the truth, Beckett. Talk to me. Let me in.

“Shut up!” Her voice has cracked.

“I will not. You deliberately tried to drive me off by pretending you’re a ball-breaking bitch who hates my daughter. You’ve managed to get into a fight and push away your best friend and I bet it’s exactly the same thing. Well, I don’t believe you. I don’t believe any of it. You’re martyring yourself supporting your father and any stray who comes along at the expense of making any other life for yourself.”

“You have no say in how I live my life. You know nothing about it.”

“Yeah, because you don’t tell anyone. Now you don’t want friends? You leaned on me. Right up till Christmas, you leaned on me. What’s changed?”

“This conversation is done.” But she isn’t denying or answering those last statements. “This is your block. Good night.”

“And if I don’t get out? If I just stay here? What’ll you do then? Storm off like you did last time?”
“If you don’t get out, I will take you back to the precinct, have you removed from my unit, and put you in a cell.” The flat, dead tone indicates that Beckett will do precisely that. Castle removes himself from the car. The tyres scream as Beckett takes off at pace. Castle goes up to his loft, spends a precisely calibrated hour and a half in concentrated thought, and then takes himself out to find a cab. He had never had the slightest intention of leaving that conversation there. He is going to break through this wall whatever it takes. She needs something, and he is going to provide it. At this point, that might include a conversation with Roy Montgomery which would result in mandatory suspension till she gets some serious therapy. It’s perfectly obvious that Beckett is right on the edge, and he doesn’t at all understand how the others haven’t seen it already.

Beckett takes off in a screech of tyres and probably leaves rubber on the road. She can only just see clearly. Castle’s ripped her protective layers right open at the worst possible time, and she’s about to take a route that she’s only taken twice in ten years to put everything back together again: once when she finally realised she couldn’t fix her father and declined to take his call for the first time, and once when she killed her first man. Humpty Dumpty, she thinks bitterly. Every time she falls she glues her shell back together again, but there’s no substance left within it. She’s used it all up now.

She stops at a late-night store and makes a single purchase. As soon as she’s in her door she puts it in the freezer. Then she showers, changes into warm nightwear, soft woolly socks, a heavy towelling robe. She’s so cold. Everything’s cold, and dark. There’s only a tiny puddle of sulky light from her table lamp, a small bedside light left on in her bedroom. She sets her alarm to loud. She’ll need it: she’s on shift tomorrow.

And then she curls up on her couch and systematically begins.

Castle raps assertively on Beckett’s door some time after ten. He’s not expecting it to be answered the first time, and probably not the second or third either. But he has to try. He doesn’t know quite what he’ll do after that, but he’ll think of something. At this stage he might well use blackmail. He is therefore absolutely astonished when he hears the lock turn over and the door start to open without a second knock being required.

When he steps in she isn’t the first thing he sees. She’s behind the door. He has a crystal clear view of a shot glass, dregs in the bottom, finger prints in the condensation still dripping down it; a cold bottle of vodka open on the table, ice on the outside; a noticeably large volume already gone. Barely a light on, no food apparent. Beckett still hasn’t appeared from behind the door and he is already terrified by what he’s seeing. Beckett drinking? Beckett drinking alone? Two vodkas is the most he’s ever seen her have and that was the first time he ever saw her off-duty in any way at all. Come to think of it, she didn’t drink the second of those. Now it looks like she’s put down several in a lot less than two hours.

“Cassle? What you doin’ here?” she slurs. Oh, fuck. This is the very last thing he’d expected. She’s drunk. Or if not drunk yet, sufficiently close already that the alcohol hitting her bloodstream will do it for her even if she doesn’t drink anything more. “Have a drink.” She moves to the kitchen with only a modicum of stagger, and reaches for another shot glass. She proffers it to him. “Drink with me.”

“Beckett? What are you doing?”

“Drinking. Works f’r everyone else. Why shouldn’t it work f’r me? Don’ I get t’ forget?” Castle simply stares at her. “‘S easy. Ev’ryone else gets wasted, forgets, gets help. Why not me?”

“Beckett…” He has absolutely no idea what to say.

“Couldn’t do what?” He doesn’t get an answer. She splashes vodka messily into her own glass and then, clearly remembering her party manners, into his. Some of it hits the floor. She doesn’t seem to notice, slaps the bottle back on the table.

“Nazd’rovie,” she toasts, and downs it in one. Castle doesn’t follow. He desperately decides on a risky play.

“Kat?”

“I’m not going home.”

“Then drink. Drink or go home.”

“No.” He picks up the bottle, and puts the top on. Then he takes it over to the kitchen and puts it in the highest place he can reach.

“What’re you doin’? That’s mine. Give it back.” She weaves towards him.

“You’ve had enough.” She’s a petulant drunk, but not – yet? – aggressive or belligerent.

“I wan’ it.”

“Can’t have it.” He catches her on the way to the cupboard. “Stay here.” She flops against him, then pulls away, weaving back to the couch.

“No point.” Uh? “You won’t support me. I’ll have to s’pport you, just like always.” What?

“No. I can.”

She looks disbelievingly, blearily, at him.

“You won’t. No-one does. Doesn’ matter if I wan’ them to.” Suddenly she’s singing, in a full and excellent, if slurred, mezzo. “Nobody’s on nobody’s side. Better learn to go it alone, recognise you’re out on your own, nobody’s on nobody’s side. Never make a promise or plan, take a little love where you can…” She trails off. “ ‘F you won’t drink with me, take me to bed.” Her expression is a lot more sloppy than seductive.

Oh no. That is an even worse plan than matching shots with her would be. This is just wrong on so many levels that he doesn’t know where to start. Suddenly he has an idea. He turns back to her kitchen and pours her a large glass of water, with a smaller one for himself. Then he returns to the couch.

“Okay. We’ll both drink and we’ll play a game.”

“Don’t wanna play a game. Wish I’d never got the game. It was just another stupid mistake. Shoulda known. Nobody’s on nobody’s side,” she sings again.

He’ll think about that later. “Different game. Every time you answer a question, you get a kiss.”

“What do you want?” He carefully avoids any name.

“Wanna disappear. No-one wanting anything.” She shivers, and doesn’t realise through the fog of neat vodka that she’s answered.

“Drink.” She does so. When she shivers again Castle gathers her into his lap. He doesn’t kiss her. “I don’t want anything.”

It’s going to be a really sore head, Castle thinks.

“‘F you saw inside my head you’d run away.” She looks at him, unfocused. “You were s’posed to run away. Why’re you here?”

Ah. So she did mean to drive him off. “To see you.”

“Don’t believe you. You got angry. Din’t wanna see me here. Din’t want me at all. ‘S fine. You c’n go home.”

“I’m not going home. I’m drinking with you.” Even if it’s only water. She makes a sloppy attempt to stand up, and doesn’t make it. Castle declines to help her one way or another, and when she lands back on him puts his arms back round her. For all the reaction he gets to that he might as well have been a stranger.

“Why don’t you want to be Beckett?” In vino, veritas. As long as he takes this carefully, he should be able to interrogate enough words out of her to work out what on earth is going on here.

“It is now.” Strangely, the firm tone works. She downs around half of it.

“No Beckett. She’s disappeared.” She keeps using that word. Disappeared. As though she wasn’t Beckett at all. “Gone away.”

“Where’s she gone?”

“Just gone. Back again another day. Who cares, ‘s long as she’s back tomorrow?”

“I care.”

“No you don’t.” It’s utterly matter of fact, and strikes him like a wrecking ball. “You wan’ the stories. Not people.” There’s a stunned silence. Castle has absolutely no idea what to say. Again. “Beckett – me – I’m not a story.”

“Who are you?”

“I’m the mist on the moor,” she says, abruptly mocking, “I’m the footprints in the sand.” She tries to stand up again. This time she makes it, for a moment, then flumps back down next to Castle.
“Why’s Beckett gone?” If he can’t have where, (into the vodka bottle, he reckons) or who, (though this is not Beckett, Kate or Kat) he’ll have why.

“Too many people needing her. All of you wan’ a piece of Detective Kate Beckett.” There’s a vitriolic twist on that. “Big bad Beckett. She huffed and she puffed and she blew her dad’s house down. Din’t see him. Din’t speak to him.” Her face crumples into messy tears, tracking darkly down her face. “Din’t take his calls.”

Castle tries to turn that into something that makes sense. The only immediate answer is that she’d not supported her father in his early hours of need. His arms drop from her in instant recoil. Her dad needed her and she wasn’t there? How could she not be there for her father, her only family? He stands up, uncaring of her distress as she had ignored, by her own admission, her father’s.

“Told you you wouldn’ stay.”

He is stopped short, three strides from the door with his coat half on.

“You were s’posed to leave. Now you are. All sorted.”

He turns around, slowly. He’s made a whole bunch of assumptions in the last two minutes – and he’s been dead wrong every time he’s done that so far. Every assumption he’s ever made about Beckett has been wrong.

He’s missing something.

“Go home t’ your family.”

He looks at her, huddled in the corner of her couch where she’d landed up when he stood up, recoiling from her rejection of her father: dead eyes, dead still, dead drunk. Fat tears are still crawling down her cheeks, smearing make-up behind them. She’s not a pretty drunk. She’s also not asking him to stay.

Something else is going on here. He hasn’t uncovered nearly enough of the story.

“My family doesn’t need me tonight.” He so nearly says but you do.

“It’s on the table.”

“No. My proper drink. You took it away. You had no righ’ t’ take it. Gimme it back.” She heaves herself out of her corner, and stumbles towards the kitchen, on average aiming for the cupboard into which he’d put the vodka. He intercepts her halfway there, and steers her back to the couch. As before, when he’s definitive, she doesn’t argue, though she’s muttering sloshily about her drink all the way. He gently pushes her back down, and puts the water back in her hand. She drinks most of what’s left.

While she’s drinking, Castle is thinking. She keeps talking as if Beckett is someone else, someone who isn’t here. It’s almost as if Beckett doesn’t exist in reality, and yet he knows she does, every minute of every day. Beckett’s disappeared. Beckett – Beckett said she couldn’t. Couldn’t help. Beckett said – Beckett said You cannot save him unless he wants to save himself. To Julia, and Castle hadn’t understood. Then. He’d thought she meant that she’d kept trying. She’d meant that she had to stop trying. You can only save yourself.
You can’t save him. You can only save yourself.
Castle’s normally sharp mind finally kicks into gear and he begins to chew on the information which he now has. Beckett – or whoever is currently sitting next to him – has passed into a half-asleep, comatose state; not exactly – not at all – curling towards him. She is, in fact, leaning away from him, and, oddly, her consumption of alcohol may have elicited a few answers but it’s raised the barriers between them higher than before. They’d been mile high earlier: now they’re stratospheric. He won’t, yet, try to change that. Whether it worked or not, she’s in no state to agree, or indeed remember.

So, what does he know? Not assume, which has so far been a total failure, but know.

He knows that she pours herself out for her father and to strangers. He knows that she’s deliberately tried to push him away. He knows that she’s had a disagreement with Lanie, but he doesn’t actually know what it was about. He knows that she thinks that he should stay away because she thinks that he’d run for the hills anyway if he knew what was inside her head. No questions, she keeps saying. Stay away: from her father and his story; stay away from her past.

Stay away from her.

Not exactly, though. Stay away from her history, her personality, her heart, her soul. He could have her body, as long as he didn’t have her. So he only got to see Kat by accident, when she was already stressed and wrung out; he’s only had answers tonight, when she’s drunk.

Oh. He’d seen Kat by accident, and then more by his design when they’d played Sorry. But then he’d made it clear he disapproved of her choices around Christmas, and then (worse in her eyes) asked questions, and tried to push her into his life which – oh fuck, he knew this a week ago – triggered memories.

He’s still missing something, but when he flicks a brief glance at his watch it’s after midnight. He discovers that Beckett is asleep, curled tightly in a corner of the couch. He needs to go home because of Alexis, but if he goes home, will Beckett simply wake, retrieve her vodka, and carry on? He could prevent that, but should he? That thought is parked as he looks at her. She seems to be out cold. One thing he can do is ensure that she’s on her bed, not on the couch: she’s going to suffer enough tomorrow.

He sighs, stands, and picks her up. There is no reaction at all: she’s dead weight in his arms. The thin trickle of illumination from the sidelight and creeping from the bedroom is only just sufficient for him to arrive there unscathed and lay her on her bed. He gazes down for a moment, wishing he could see into her mind; wishing he had extracted more information; wishing he knew how to move her needle back to normality; wishing that she’d believe that he could and would support her. Wishing he understood. But that’s one thing which he can, perhaps, achieve: understanding. Tomorrow, when he’s slept on it: when the story’s roamed his dreams and knit up its ravellment into orderly links.

Beckett wakes to her screeching alarm with a foul taste in her mouth, a foul pain in her head, and a foul feeling of disgust with herself. She takes two Advil, drinks a pint of water to chase the Advil, scrubs her teeth and tongue till her gums ache and steps into a scalding shower. Once she’s washed and sufficiently steam-cleaned that the stink of stale alcohol is no longer in her nostrils, she has another pint of water and a double strength black coffee. Then she is capable of dressing, applying her make-up, adjusted to try to hide how tired, miserable and hung-over she really is, and leaving to get the subway to the precinct. She doesn’t remember much about last night, and in particular she doesn’t remember how many she’d had to achieve that desirable amnesia. She certainly won’t risk driving when she may well still be over the limit. She makes it to her desk comfortably before shift starts and any of the team are in. Temporally comfortably, that is. Physically she is not comfortable at all. She concocts another extra-strong coffee, returns to her desk, winces at the brightness of the screen and strip-lights and, by the time Espo has arrived twenty minutes later, is deep in the pile of cold case files.

“Yo, Beckett.”

“Hey, Espo.” She’s not conversational. Espo doesn’t care. He and Beckett have been tight for years and she obviously isn’t right, now or last night. He’s got a sure-fire cure for that, though.

“C’mon, Beckett. Ain’t seen you in the gym for weeks. You need to spar, or you’ll lose your edge. I’ll hold the bag for you, or give you a workout.”

Beckett looks up, slowly. Espo clocks the lack of expression on her face and the lack of brightness in her eyes. “Nah. Maybe later.”

“Now,” he says firmly.

“No,” she says equally firmly, and drinks her coffee. “Leave it, Espo.”

“No. You look like shit. So you can come punch it out or you can tell me what went down last night that you didn’t need us for. Lanie wants to talk to you, too.”

Beckett’s face betrays nothing. “Or option three: none of the above. I’m not wasting time sparring when I’m on shift with work to do. Go do your own work, and leave me to get on with mine before we’re both in trouble.”

Espo would argue, but Beckett’s turned her eyes and attention to her papers and is radiating do not disturb at laser intensity. That in itself still wouldn’t stop him, but Montgomery coming in certainly does.

“Morning, detectives,” Montgomery says cheerily.

“Sir,” comes in tandem from Beckett and Espo. Montgomery wanders into his office. Espo makes himself a coffee and starts on his work. Beckett remains firmly focused on her file. After a while Espo watches her go into the break room and make herself more coffee, and then observes the pitch of her shoulders and tension in her spine as she returns. She’s just seated herself again when Montgomery peers out of his office, surveys his domain, and spots his prey.

“Detective Beckett? A word, please.”

“Sir.”

The door shuts behind her. Fifteen minutes later it reopens. Beckett, two spots of high colour gracing her cheekbones, returns to her desk. Ryan, who has appeared in the interim, glances at Espo, who shrugs. He has no idea. Both of them glance at Beckett, who doesn’t even notice, let alone react. The pages of her file continue to turn in a measured manner. Some several many moments later, she departs in the direction of the restrooms. When she re-emerges, she looks no different at all. Ryan and Esposito shrug at each other again. Beckett continues her work, and doesn’t talk.
Montgomery’s summons is not unexpected, merely unwelcome. She’d hoped, clearly in vain, that Sergeant Hardon would have kept quiet. No such luck.

“Beckett, you were up at Central Park precinct last night.”

“Yessir.”

“Picking up one Mr Berowitz.”

“Yessir.”

“Who was piss-drunk and in no state to be any help to anyone in any investigations.” Beckett says nothing. There isn’t really anything to say. “Wasn’t he?”

“Yessir.”

“And Castle went with you.”

“Yessir.”

Montgomery puts his elbows on the desk and rests his chin on his hands, dark eyes focused on Beckett, who hasn’t shifted from parade attention since she shut the door. “At ease, Beckett. I didn’t get you in here to rip you a new one.”

“Sir.” So why am I in here?

“Ten days ago, you were having lunch with Mrs Berowitz. Then your father was off on a conference for a week. And last night for no apparent reason you quit the precinct like your tail was on fire and then the next thing that happens is you picked up Mr Berowitz.” He pauses, clearly expecting commentary. Beckett declines the trap.

“Have you had any time off since Christmas except January 9th?”

“I wasn’t on shift at the weekend, sir.”

“I have here your overtime reports. According to these” – he taps the sheet – “you’re due some days.” He looks at her expressionless face. “I could make you take them.” A flush of colour creeps along her face. She says nothing. “I won’t. Yet. But I’m paying attention, Beckett, and I’m not liking what I’m seeing. You need to ease off. You’re trying to save people, one drunk at a time. You can’t do it. Stick to the victims and your dad and let AA take the rest.”

“Sir.” It’s not agreement, nor disagreement. Montgomery doesn’t press the point. He doesn’t think that he needs to. He changes the subject.

“How are you getting on with Castle?”

“Fine, sir. He’ll be done soon, I think.” Montgomery looks sharply at her.

“He’ll stay as long as he needs to, Detective.”

“Of course, sir.” Montgomery raises an eyebrow. Disbelief is obvious. Again, though, he doesn’t think that he needs to press the point.

“If I think you need time off, because you’re not taking proper breaks, I will enforce it, Detective. I suggest you start planning how best to take your days. I expect your leave request to be filed by the end of the week.”
“Sir.”

“Dismissed, Beckett.”

“Sir.”

Her miserable irritation touches her face with renewed hot colour as she returns to her desk. She won’t let on to the boys that there’s anything wrong. She doesn’t need time off. She doesn’t need Montgomery telling her not to help Julia Berowitz. She just needs a nice complicated case to take her mind off everything. Especially, to take her mind off the nagging feeling that she’s forgotten something important, which is not improving her hang-over. She goes back to her file. Ten minutes later, a hazy memory coalesces into unpleasantly solid reality. Castle was there last night. In her apartment. She feels sick, and it has nothing to do with her lingering hang-over. She makes for the restrooms with her purse, desperately controlling her desire to run out of the bullpen.

The cool ceramic tiles of the restroom wall soothe her hot skin. She can’t remember what happened last night. She doesn’t know what she might have said, or done. She tries to pull her stampeding thoughts into order. She’d woken up in the same clothes she’d been wearing when she started throwing back shots. Therefore she had done nothing… really stupid. What she might have said, though – oh God. What might she have said? She bolts for a cubicle, locking herself in until she’s sure she has control of her stomach. When she’s certain she’s not going to turn inside out, she exits the cubicle, and then washes her face and hands in cold water, re-applies her make-up, picture-perfect, breathes deeply and slowly several times, and goes back to her desk, praying frantically for Castle not to come to the precinct today.

For a good long time, prayer seems to have worked. At eleven a.m., her prayers are definitively rejected. Castle arrives with an expression that would suit a cat stalking a broken-winged bird, deposits coffee and a bear-claw in front of her, and sits down in an unpleasantly permanent fashion.

Castle had slept through uncomfortable dreams, largely figuring Beckett walking around in a high-tech exoskeletal covering: transparent but utterly impermeable to sound or emotion. It’s not difficult to work out where that one came from. Knowing, however, doesn’t improve his view of it, and he’d really hoped for a bit more insight from his subconscious. Could do better, he tells himself. A shower, a shave, and good coffee don’t really help him.

He knows as much as he’s going to know without some serious assistance, which he isn’t going to get from Beckett. He won’t get it from the boys, who’ve made it pretty clear that they won’t talk about their colleague unless he already knows everything, and he’s unlikely to get anything from Lanie, who barely knows him except as Beckett’s shadow. A few beers and some chit-chat over corpses is hardly a foundation for a conversation that would have been difficult even if he and Lanie had been BFFs since high school. He wonders if the appropriate course is, as he had thought earlier last night, to have a detailed conversation with Roy. It seems rather… nuclear, as options go.

He makes more coffee, and wonders idly how much Beckett must have needed to get going this morning. He’s been in that state (though not for a long time) and he didn’t have to turn up at work the next day. She doesn’t have that option: the demands on her are unceasing…

That’s what he was missing. She’d said it, and he’d missed it because he’d been focused on the drinking, the disappeared and the assumption that she’d ducked supporting her dad. She’d said several variations on Beckett helps everyone, everyone needs Beckett, I’ll have to support you just like always. That’s hardly flattering, he thinks, displeased. She’d also said no-one wants Kat. And finally, and possibly most importantly couldn’t do it before. I couldn’t.

Couldn’t what, Beckett? Couldn’t save your father? And then, slowly, it becomes clear, monster rising from the swamp: she had to walk away to save herself. What has that cost her?

The story falls into place. She’s... over-compensating. Saving everyone now because she couldn’t save him then: had to walk away. If you saw inside my head you’d run away. Yeah. No wonder she said that. He’d made it perfectly obvious what he thought of her actions – only the ones he’d seen, such as the Christmas Day shift – based on his own happy family life and his own smug, self-satisfied assumptions about what he’d do – based on no knowledge at all. It’s very easy to think you could do it, when you’ve never had to. Very easy to judge and condemn. He thinks about the revolting, degraded sight of Mr Berowitz. Beckett had dealt with that same revolting object in her own father, for – he guesses – some considerable time. And then she had to walk away… and no matter how much her father says she saved him, she either doesn’t believe it or is still drowning under the weight of that decision.

Not the boys. Not Lanie. Not Roy. Jim Beckett. That’s where he’ll find his answers. That, and some very specific research. Okay. Research first. Jim Beckett later, because he knows where to find him. He turns to his laptop and starts to hunt down alcoholism, and then, a little after nine, takes himself off to talk to some of the support groups available. In return for a nice donation, he’s pretty certain they’ll be happy to answer everything he asks.

After two meetings and an hour and a half, Castle wishes he’d never, ever asked. He’s learned far more than he ever wanted to know, and he doesn’t think he’ll ever be able to scrub the caustic knowledge from his head and imagination. For all the disgusting physical manifestations of the alcoholic, worse by far were the stories of their families. The one continuous narrative is that the family takes far too long to recognise that they can’t save their black sheep until it wants to be saved. And usually, that means that the alcoholic has to hit rock bottom first, and stay there till the family stops trying to fix it for them. By that time, he learns, all too often the family has fallen apart, individually or together.

He leaves a good deal more sobered (not an accidental word choice) and disillusioned. He is also a good deal ashamed of his judgemental assumptions. And finally, he is a good deal more understanding of why Beckett didn’t want to come near his apartment or watch him with Alexis. It’s more important than ever that he talks to Jim Beckett: that small, half-broken man who’s braver and more determined than Castle could ever have imagined or believed until this morning; in contrast to his daughter, who had originally appeared wholly strong and unbreakably hard, but who now seems to have been more broken and damaged by her father’s previous actions than Castle had ever realised.

He makes his way to the precinct, collecting coffees and a bear claw on the way, which he places neatly in front of Beckett, who appears as ravaged, under some truly artistically deceptive make up, as he might have expected from her state last night. She doesn’t look at all happy to see him. This is not news. Every time he shows up it proves to her that her efforts to get rid of him have failed.

“Morning, Beckett,” he says neutrally.

“Hey,” she mutters. She flicks a half-glance his way, and then goes back to her file.

“More cold cases?”

“Yes.” She chops the word short.

“Good. We can go out to lunch, since you wouldn’t come out yesterday.”

“No. I’m busy.”
Castle looks at her. Beckett does not look at him in return. “You’re not lunching with Lanie. Surely you’re not going to work through lunch on cold cases?”

“Yes.”

“You’d rather work on cold cases than have a nice lunch?”

“Yes. I’m not hungry and I don’t want lunch.” Castle notes the line between her brows and the slight redness of her eyes. She hasn’t touched the bear claw. The coffee, however, is gripped between her hands. His voice is quiet.

“You don’t have to eat. Just come out of the bullpen with me. I wanna talk to you about last night.”

“I don’t want to talk about it.”

“We can talk about it here or we can talk about it somewhere else.”

“Or not talk about it at all. I choose the last.”

“We’re going to talk about it.”

She doesn’t answer. She simply turns back to her file. She’s too tired to have this fight and he can’t drag her out the bullpen at lunchtime. Her stomach will invert if she tries to eat: as much from tension as the remnants of the hang-over. She just wants to finish the day and take her emptied self home to rest.

“Not now, but later, Beckett, we are going to talk about this.” His voice drops further. “You need to know what you said.” He looks her straight in the eye. “You were wrong about me. I was wrong about you. Let’s talk, and make it right.” He reverts to his normal tone and normal volume. “If you won’t come to lunch, I’m not watching you review cold cases all day. That’s boring. Maybe there’ll be a new murder tomorrow. Call me if a body drops?”

“Yes,” she says, dispiritedly. She doesn’t have a choice about that, Montgomery’s made it clear that she has to.

Castle stands up, not coincidentally blocking Beckett from the view of Espo and Ryan. He rapidly slides both hands over hers where they are still locked round the coffee cup, and squeezes gently.

“It’ll be okay. Trust me.” He lets go of her cold hands, and wanders off. Beckett watches him leave, tries not to think about the potential for disaster that he represents, and tries harder not to think about the warmth in his enclosing palms.

Castle hadn’t really expected Beckett to come out for lunch with him, and therefore is not disappointed. The conversation he intends to have with her will be much better held in her apartment, with no audience, in any event. He intends that this particular discussion will include a substantial amount of holding her close and keeping her warm and showing her that he’s a support, not a millstone. He hopes that she’ll let him in. In the door, that is. Into her heart and mind… well, that’s a big ask right now. They’ve both screwed this up finely, and right now he’s the only one who seems to think it’s fixable.

He pulls out his phone and looks at the new contact he’d put there this morning. He doesn’t want to do this. But he has to. How hard can it be, to deal with Beckett’s father? He takes a deep breath, and dials Jim Beckett.
“Jim Beckett,” a firm, professional tone answers. Castle had half-hoped for a PA, but his luck hasn’t been in for weeks and it looks like that’s not changing now.

“Mr Beckett? This is Rick Castle.” There’s a short, surprised silence on the line.

“Mr Castle. This is a surprise.” Jim Beckett does not sound like the small, nervous man he’d met. Jim Beckett sounds like the partner in a respectable firm should do: assertive and composed.

“I wondered if you had some time to see me,” Castle says, rather more formally than he’d anticipated.

There’s a soft clicking which Castle accurately identifies as the checking of an Outlook calendar.

“I could see you at five. I don’t expect this is about a need for a new attorney, is it?”

“No.”

“Hm. Okay. I can’t say I’m surprised, after meeting you the other week. You didn’t strike me as a man who was shy about getting what he wanted. Come to these offices at five and we’ll take it from there.”

Castle hadn’t wanted to wait till five. Castle had wanted to take Jim Beckett somewhere for lunch and thoroughly cross-question him about Kate Beckett. Castle had thought, based on how Jim had looked on his previous meeting, that Jim Beckett would be an easy pushover.

Castle thinks he might have been dead wrong. And since he has been dead wrong about most things, he starts to wonder why Jim Beckett today is so different from the man he’d met ten days ago in… difficult… circumstances. Was he wrong then, or is he wrong now, or has he been wrong both times? These Becketts… never who or what he thinks them. But because one of them really matters, he’d better try to understand.

He frets his way through the day till it’s time to leave.

Beckett struggles through the day until shift ends at five, and without Montgomery needing to so much as twitch in his chair is gone before anyone can say anything at all. In fact, it takes Ryan and Esposito a few minutes to notice that she’s left.

“Beckett’s gone!” Ryan notes in amazement.

“Ha ha. Good joke, bro.”

“No joke. She really is. Desk clear, purse gone, coat gone.”

Espo makes a big play of looking at the calendar, and then out of the window. “Nah. Can’t have. Moon’s not blue. No national holidays. ‘S not her birthday.”

“Maybe she’s got a date?”

“Huh?”

“Beckett was looking pretty green this morning. I’d say she was hung-over but we all know she never drinks that much. If she’s not ill, I’ll eat my service cuffs, no ketchup.”

“Kate was ill?”

“Hey, Lanie.” Lanie ignores all normal conversational niceties.

“Kate is ill?”

“Sure looked like it,” Espo says casually. “She’s gone already. Best thing for her.”

Lanie is nonplussed. Kate had shown no signs of illness yesterday. Massive emotional stress yes, physical illness no. She’s a doctor, dammit, even if she only doctors the dead, and she’s pretty sure she would have noticed the imminent signs of an illness bad enough to send Kate home immediately at the end of shift on only the following day.

“Well, now. What is Lanie’s girl doing? Lanie supposes it’s marginally better than the complete shut-out that Kate had applied yesterday, but she doesn’t get the feeling that Kate’s really planning a full-on girls’ night with civilised drinks (not many), good food, and a proper conversation about how she is. She’d force her way round, but she’d feel a complete dumbass if Kate’s in PJs and she wakes her up – and Kate’s not exactly going to be pleased if Lanie does disturb her.
Beckett has gone home to investigate the headache-curing properties of Tylenol and some bland food. Toast. Or maybe grilled cheese, or mac ‘n’ cheese. Something very simple and undemanding. She’s trying very hard not to think about anything that happened since this time two days ago.

She takes her Tylenol – no need for the heavy-duty Advil now – and changes out her tailored work garb into soft, warmer yoga pants, t-shirt and sweat top, puts some Kraft packet mac ‘n’ cheese on, adding butter and some black pepper to improve it slightly, and pours a large glass of water. She’ll get to coffee, later. It won’t stop her sleeping. It never does. And she will go to bed early. She will get herself back on track. She’s had her meltdown moment for the year. Time to get straightened out and fly right.

She mops the floor and, despite the freezing February air and flurries of snow, opens the window to remove the slight but sickening smell of the spilt – she assumes she spilt it – vodka. Then she finds the bottle, on a higher shelf than she could have reached in the state she was in, tips the remnants down the sink and runs the water for long enough to rinse all the odour away, and throws it into the recycling chute. She has a gut-wrenching knowledge of how it reached that shelf. Another thing that she really didn’t want to remember. Goes right along with the memory of his warm hands round hers this morning.

She eats her dinner at her table, closes the window. Then she puts on a Dobie Gray album, and pulls out her yoga mat, and begins on the slow, smooth forms that need all her muscle control and concentration. She hasn’t worked through them for – oh. Weeks. No wonder she’s stressed and stiff and unhappy. It’s too cold and slippery underfoot to run, and Espo was right, she hasn’t been in the gym for weeks either. She needs to get herself together. If she’d been paying attention to what she should have been doing to keep herself grounded then she wouldn’t be in this state, she tells herself, and ignores the stab of conscience that tries to tell her she’s lying. She’ll be fine by Friday, and go out with Lanie, and everything will be back to normal.

But a still, small voice keeps talking in her head. It sounds exactly like Castle had earlier. You need to know what you said. Let’s talk, and make it right. Later. Yoga doesn’t overcome or silence the words. She keeps working through the forms, perfecting them, but all the time the words are there.

Castle ensures he is smartly put together and in business mode when he leaves to meet Jim Beckett. He is not at all sure of what to expect, or indeed what he wants to say, or ask. It doesn’t seem to matter which Beckett he encounters, every single one of them confounds him.

Reception put him in a clean, corporately decorated boardroom, supply him with coffee and leave him to wait for Jim. They don’t seem surprised to see him: presumably that’s professional practicality. A few moments later Jim enters, dapper in a well-cut suit, wearing a tie. Castle feels nervously underdressed without a tie of his own, even though he hates them, and is glad he’d put on a smart jacket and dress pants, at least. Jim extends his hand and shakes firmly. Castle takes a good look and notes again the harsh-cut lines around his eyes, and a slight air of uncertainty, well covered by a professional poker face. He hides that well on the phone.

“Thank you for seeing me,” Castle opens, hiding his own considerable uncertainty as to the wisdom of this meeting under formality and a steady voice. Earlier, it had all seemed so easy, fuelled on his desire to fix matters and (not that he’s admitting it) some shame-fuelled annoyance with Beckett’s inability to tell him anything or to trust him. Trust me all in all, or not at all. She’s aiming for door number two.

“Nice to see you again, Mr Castle.” Jim produces a surprisingly gamin smile, making him look instantly ten years younger and giving him a considerable resemblance to his daughter.
“Rick, please.”

“Rick. But only if you call me Jim.”

“Okay.”

“So, why did you want to see me?”

Castle swallows, as Jim waits quietly. The air in the room is still. “You know I’m shadowing Be – your daughter.” Jim nods. “For my next book. Likely it’ll be a series.” He stops. That’s not relevant. “This was a bad idea. I shouldn’t have come.” He shifts in his chair, preparatory to standing. “I’m sorry to have wasted your time.”

“To do it right I need to understand Beckett – Kate, so my character is based on her but isn’t her. She won’t let me because she thinks it’ll hurt you. I promised her I wouldn’t use you – and I don’t want to use you – but she doesn’t believe me. So I need to tell you that whatever she tells me won’t go in any book.”

“Why?”

“Because then she might believe it.”

“Would it be true?” Castle’s temper incinerates at the question. One damn mistrustful Beckett after another. He bites out his answer.

“It would be. But since you have to ask me to my face if I’m a liar, I think we’re probably done here. I can’t make either of you trust me, all I could do was tell you that. Now I have. Thanks for your time.”

Castle stands up, infuriated with himself. He should never have tried this: it’s likely made matters worse. Why he thought that speaking to Jim Beckett would improve the position escapes him. He really should have learned not to act on his impulses by now. It’s the same Beckett brick wall all over again. Must be inherited. Or genetic.

“Sit down,” Jim says firmly. Castle doesn’t. “Sit back down, son. Katie protects. It’s what she is. She thinks she’s protecting me, and maybe that’s true, but I heard you pair arguing all the way down the hall and it didn’t sound like it had much to do with writing any book to me.” He acquires that gamin look again. “Sounded to me like her mother and me used to be…” Castle gulps. What if he’s triggered Jim’s memories? “Don’t worry. I’ve come to terms with that. The meetings help.” He pours himself some water, and gestures at the coffee. Castle shakes his head, still standing, hand on his jacket. “I told Katie to patch it up with you. She needs a friend.” There’s a rather knowing glint in Jim’s eye, for an instant, swiftly altered. He drops his eyes to his water glass, and suddenly slumps a little, becomes the smaller, uncertain man Castle had first met.

“So, because… because I met you already and I liked you, and if you were lying to me you’d not be walking away without trying to get the story… If you were lying you’d be wanting the story from me, but you’re not. So sit back down, and I’ll tell you it.” Castle sits, finally, waits while Jim gathers himself, slips into listening mode: creating the atmosphere where people simply talk.

“You know the bare bones. I told you, the other day. Thought you were her friend, from what she’d said.” He breathes slowly. “For two years she tried to pull me out it, and then she walked away. After that, I bumped along the bottom, but it took a long while to realise, and then I tried to fix it myself. Didn’t work. Finally I went to AA. If she hadn’t stopped trying to save me, I’d never have come out it. I’d be dead. I couldn’t lose Katie too, and that’s what pulled me through: knowing that if I didn’t fix myself I’d never see her again. After three months dry, I called her. She’s been there for me ever since. Gives me the strength to carry on, because she had the strength to walk away.” Castle thinks that Jim’s told this tale before, probably at his meetings, maybe to others. “The craving doesn’t go away, but every day I don’t give in is another win. I just keep putting one foot in front of another, and if keeping the mask on is too much, Katie’s always there. She keeps me strong. I only have to talk to her, or see her, to remember why I stay sober.”

He looks up, his expression raw. “She saved me, by walking away. She saves me every day, just by existing. She carried me, when I couldn’t stand. I tell her so, and she should know it.” There’s silence, emotion heavy in the bland, corporate room. Jim looks down again. Castle has no words. This is not a conversation that’s to be repeated, ever. Remembered, but never repeated, except perhaps in summary, to Beckett. “But I worry about her, now. She should have a life of her own. She should be telling me about friends, not just her team. I thought when she talked about you she might…” he trails off.

“She might,” Castle says, unbidden, and manages to stop before he reveals to Jim that Beckett is drowning in guilt. Jim doesn’t know that: so much is clear, and Jim ever knowing that is likely to be a very, very bad idea. Castle is still surprised that Jim said anything, never mind as much as he has.

“She should,” Jim says, and stops. Suddenly he smiles. “You’ve got a daughter, too. Bet she doesn’t listen to you as much as you think she should.”

Castle grins in return. “Nope. But then I don’t listen to her as much as she thinks I should, either.” There’s a moment of fatherly solidarity.

“She always does what she thinks is right. Even if people get hurt along the way. It’s fine when she’s at work: that’s her job. She’s not so good at seeing that it’s not always the best way outside work. It can be a little tricky to convince her that she’s wrong.” The gamin smile peeps out again. “Good luck, Rick. I hope I’ll be seeing more of you with Katie.” It turns to a mischievous grin. “Preferably at a slightly lower volume.”

“Thanks,” Castle says very sincerely. “I think the second part might depend on your daughter, though.”

Jim sniggers. Positively sniggers. “I think you might be good for her. She could do with a friend who won’t be pushed around.” He extends his hand to Castle, shakes firmly. “Thanks for coming by. Brave step, son. Now, one more thing.” Castle looks down at him, bemused. “That game shop where Katie got my Christmas present – what’s the address?”

Castle gives up and laughs. “Got a piece of paper?”

He goes home in a better mood than for weeks, changes out his constrictingly formal clothes, and manages a civilised dinner with his family without mentioning anything much about the day except a lengthy complaint about the boring nature of cold cases and paperwork. Then he collects himself together and departs for Beckett’s apartment.

He can hear music faintly through her door: an older style that he doesn’t recognise. He knocks firmly to be heard over the music, and is astonished that the door opens. Beckett is (yet again) in sweats, with her hair messily tied back, and is gazing wearily at him, as if she knows that he’d just keep knocking till she let him in. There’s a yoga mat on the floor and a used plate by the sink. He steps inside, closing the door behind him. Beckett’s already turned away from him: all he can see is her hunched shoulders, her defensive posture. Shutting everything out, or away. Shutting him out, just like she’s done since Christmas, just like she’s doing with Lanie, just like she’s doing in the precinct.

And suddenly he can’t bear it any more. He takes two fast steps and spins her round, into his arms: holding her tight against him and turning her face up so she can’t avoid his eyes. “We are going to talk about this. You’re not going to avoid it any more.”

“Because that’s what you want. And you always get what you want, don’t you, Castle? Fame, fortune, family. Fucking me, literally and metaphorically. The story, whatever it takes. What about what I want? Or doesn’t that count?”

Castle doesn’t move, and doesn’t let go. He had expected this outpouring of vitriol, this last-ditch defence.

“You want someone you can rely on. Someone who’ll support you. You just never said so, till yesterday.” The fight and anger and stiffness is all sucked out of her. Abruptly, he’s holding her up. “Don’t you need to know what happened yesterday? What you said?” He’s almost coaxing, softness in his voice, walking her backwards to her couch, never letting go, nestling her into him, petting gently: enough determination to show her that he’s not going to be put off as easily as before.

“It doesn’t matter,” comes defeated from her lips. “You’re going to keep pushing till you get what you want. What’s the point in fighting it?”

“Why fight, if you want it too? I told you’d got me wrong, just like I got you wrong.” She doesn’t say anything; she doesn’t fight; she doesn’t try to move closer or further away.

“Just remember that I told you I couldn’t bear seeing your family. When you start to hate me because I can’t be what you think you want. When you walk away again because you need something I can’t provide. You want someone who doesn’t exist. I’ve used me all up, Castle. There isn’t anything left for anyone else.” She pulls herself out his arms and stands up. “When someone tells you who they are, you should listen. I’ve told you who I am, over and over. Why won’t you just listen, and leave?”

“Because that’s not who you are.” The calm tones don’t reach her. She’s backing away from him towards the window. “I’ve been listening to your actions, not your words. And they don’t match.”

She laughs, once, with no humour at all. Bitterness pours through her voice. “Don’t match? Don’t match? Let me put it simply for you. I walked away from my own father when he needed me most. I’ll do the same to you. Save us both the trouble, Castle. Walk away now.”

“No.”
Never gonna give you up

She’s arrested in her movement.

“No. You don’t walk away from anyone who needs you. Not till it’s the only way to save them.” He pauses, and takes a breath. “Nor will I. You need me, and I’m not walking away from you because that won’t save you.”

“You can’t save someone who doesn’t want to be saved. Don’t you get that?”

“Sure I do.”

“So why are you here?” I don’t want saved hangs loud from the end of her words. The lie in that clangs louder still.

“Because last night you told me you wanted someone to support you. Someone to save you. Since you were too wasted to lie, I’m going to listen to the truth. In vino veritas, Beckett. Or in your case, in vodka. Your actions don’t lie. You’ve spent yourself not walking away from anyone who needs you ever since you once – once, Beckett, in your whole life – had to. And that saved him.”

“Don’t. Don’t make me out to be something I’m not. You’ll only be disappointed.”

“And when are you going to stop making yourself out to be something you’re not? Huh? You doth protest too much, Beckett. Every time you make yourself out to be some ball-breaking bitch who abandoned your father, every time you try to convince me that I should run as fast as I can in the other direction, all I hear is someone trying to convince themselves they don’t deserve any help. If you were that woman you wouldn’t have tried to hide your discomfort from Alexis so she wasn’t hurt, you just wouldn’t have cared. If you didn’t care about how I feel, you wouldn’t be trying to push me away so I don’t get hurt more later, you’d have an affair with me and you just wouldn’t care. If you didn’t care you wouldn’t be trying to save both Berowitzes, but you are.”

He stands up from the couch and paces the five slow steps that’s the distance between them. He doesn’t hurry, but Beckett doesn’t move.

“You care, Beckett. If you didn’t you’d have never gone back to your father, never been there for him. If you didn’t care you’d have pretended everything was fine with me and lied about it. If you didn’t care you wouldn’t have been crying about it last night.” He reaches her, and stops. “I thought you were doing what you tried to make me think you were doing. You almost made me believe it. But you’re not that woman – and I’m not that stupid.” He stretches out, and places two hands firmly on her waist to draw her back in and cosset her close against his shoulder. “Lean on me. You know you can. You know you want to. Come here, Beckett.”

And suddenly she does, dropping the physical resistance, letting herself be brought in and held against the broad chest and wide shoulders, caught in strong arms; letting herself be warmed. So Castle thinks, anyway. Physically, he’s reached her, which he supposes is a step forward. Mentally… that might be more of an issue. She’s been soft in his clasp before, but it hasn’t reached her brain. He wonders, briefly, if she might have been right: that this will never work because she’ll never be able to get past her own demons and guilt; she’s empty, she’ll never be able to give him anything because she’ll use it all for her father and the victims.

And then he pushes that all away. He can fix this. All of this. He can fix her, or bring her to a place where fixing might be possible, given time. He can. Because all she needs is someone to lean on when she can’t stand up any longer, someone to hold her up when she’s emptied out, and he can be that.

He brings them back to the couch, and cuddles her in. Affection had been right, way back when. It’ll still be right now. Assertive affection, and no questions. Questions can wait, explanations can wait. Judgement – can wait forever. He has no right to judge when he wasn’t there.

Beckett had known that there was no point in refusing to open the door. Castle will simply stand there and keep knocking until he’s let in. Always gets his own way, she thinks bitterly, and if at least three-quarters of the bitterness is because she knows that he’ll leave when he finds out she simply isn’t, now, capable of being who, or what, he wants and he won’t listen when she tries to pre-empt that whole can of worms being opened, well, she can live with that too. She’ll just have to keep trying. Maybe this time she can get through to him that she’s a bad deal, and he’ll take the message. She has to try. She’s not going to let him carry on with his rose tinted spectacles and happy optimism that everyone has some good in them somewhere. She can’t afford to be soft and comforted in his arms or leaning on his strength, because it won’t be there for long.

So she lets herself spill out all the anger and bitterness and hatred of the choices – choices? There were no choices: it’s the path her father’s disease forced her down – that she’s made and puts it all out there in the bluntest, nastiest terms she can manage.

It doesn’t work at all.

It doesn’t matter what she says, how she says it or the vitriolic truth in her tone: all he says is that her words now don’t match her actions at any time, don’t match her words last night, holds her close and then comes after her when she’s pulled away and tried again to convince him that this can never work: to hold her close again and tell her that she can lean on him.

And suddenly it’s just easier to give in. Let him have what he thinks he wants. He’ll find out he was wrong soon enough. It’ll only end in tears, when she walks away to support her father because that’s the one thing she absolutely, definitely, for ever and ever, cannot put second. It’ll only end in tears, but he won’t accept that till it happens: he won’t listen when she tells him who she is. He thinks he can live with that, but truth is, he’ll only put up with it for a short time. He’ll ask questions, and want answers, and then he’ll be bored, and leave, when no answers are given. He’ll give her a little space of peace, and then he’ll want more. Not just answers, but he’ll want the story, he’ll want her in his loft, he’ll want her to spend time with his family. But none of that is going to happen fast enough for Castle. He wants quick answers, speedy solutions; he’s bored by the slow grind of basic work.

They’ll be over in a month. It won’t even be long enough for him to be upset. She… well, that’s likely to be a rather different story. But a month’s peace… priceless, right now, and she’ll take the possibility of peace now in return for the crippling pain later.

She doesn’t realise that she’s weeping until the slow, hot tears crawl down her face; and then she dashes them away and scrubs her cheeks dry on a sleeve; turns her head from view and doesn’t make a sound. Crying has never helped anything, and it’s not going to help matters now. She made her choices long ago, and she’s been done with weeping over them long, long since.

She hadn’t reckoned on Castle actually paying attention.

“You’re crying,” he says. He doesn’t sound nearly as surprised as he should do.

“I’m not.” She’s perfected the tone on her father, in those first dreadful months. He could never tell that she was weeping. After a while, she’d learned how not to weep at all.
“You are.” Castle takes hold of her chin and turns her face towards him and up. “Why are you crying?” It’s a question she chooses to treat as rhetorical, assisted by his musing intonation. He cossets her face into the crook of his neck and pets her hair, soothingly. “Could it be because you’re cold and miserable? Snuggle in, and get warm. Or maybe you’re upset about the Berowitzes. Or could it just possibly be because you don’t think there’s any chance of this lasting?” She doesn’t answer, though she colours. “I guess we’ll just have to see.”

Castle is not at all surprised by Beckett’s lack of confidence in the situation, nor by her unhappiness. But she’s cuddled in his arms – where she ought to be – and he’s got enough confidence for both of them, that they can work it out. She’ll be ready to talk, eventually. Not now, probably not soon, but eventually. He continues the undemanding, unquestioning affection that’s the only thing that is likely to work. She’s not arguing, or pushing for anything else, or switching to the slick sex that was only a distraction from the real story. Here, for her, he isn’t second best, and he won’t be second best. He’s the one she needs; the one who can hold her up if she needs it.

He drops a few casual, gentle kisses on her hair, drinks in the scent of her shampoo and nuzzles his nose into the top of her head. “He’s so tired, he thinks, and if she’d only stay curled in and let him take care of her again then she’d feel better. Or fall asleep, which might be a more desirable option. He hugs her more closely, and doesn’t try for more, and gradually the air of tense misery and bitterness begins to dissipate. Still, he couldn’t exactly describe this as leaning on him. Not yet.

After a further while of undemanding contact and peaceful embrace, Castle thinks that Beckett is calm enough to be reminded of her words of last night. After that, he’ll have to tell her that he’s been to see her father, and after that – if he is still alive – well, he’ll just have to take that as it comes.

“Beckett? Are you awake?”

“Huh? Yeah.”

“We need to talk.” She’s instantly not relaxed, pulling away from him and out his embrace for the furthest corner of the couch, eyes guarded, shoulders rigid. Braced, he thinks. “About what happened last night.”

“No, we don’t.” It’s flat.

“You can listen, then, and I’ll talk.” He casts a sidelong glance. “Nothing happened except that you actually talked about what you felt.” The relaxation he’d half-expected is non-existent. He alters tack. “Do you want to know what you said?”

“No.”

“Really?”

“No. I don’t need to know any of this. I was” – there’s a hitch in her words – “drunk. Nothing I said means anything.”

Castle disbelieves that instantly and on principle. He also wishes that getting Beckett drunk again wasn’t wholly unethical. Or alternatively, that he didn’t care about whether it was ethical or not.

“He always does,” Beckett says bleakly. “Maybe he even believes it. It’s not true, though. He saved himself. I had nothing to do with it. Everyone has to save themselves. You can’t do it for them, or “Doesn’t mean you had nothing to do with it. He says that you walking away was the thing that made him try.” She shrugs, as if she’s heard it all before, as if it means nothing, but deep in her hazel eyes there’s a green flare, as swiftly gone. Ah. Not nothing, then. “He said that you save him just because you’re there.” Another flare, and an odd reflection, as if there’s a second surface to her eyes.

“I abandoned him,” she grits out, and the odd reflection resolves itself into a sheen of moisture that doesn’t gather and doesn’t fall. “I walked away and did my own thing. Never went near him.”

“That’s not what he says.”

“He was drunk. He doesn’t remember.” Castle abruptly realises that Beckett is, in fact, talking, and only just manages to conceal his surprise.

“He says that’s what saved him. You walking away. He says it showed him that he’d never see you again if he didn’t get dry.”

“I watched him drown for three more years,” she cries. “Three more years when I didn’t go to him, didn’t take the calls, waited for a cop to show up on my doorstep. Again.”

“Why is that any different from what you told Mrs Berowitz to do?”

“I told her to get help. I didn’t get my dad help, I just walked away and let him drown.”

“Did you? Or did you leave him the pamphlets; the numbers; the adverts?”

“No good, if he wouldn’t read them.”

“Now, how about answering the question I asked,” Castle says. “Did you?” He’s half-turned towards her, blue eyes focused on her face, pinning her to the truth.

“For a while. Then I stopped.” The gleam in her eyes ripples and pools. Castle reaches for her and catches her back into him just as the first drop trickles down, heedless of whether she’d had any intention of moving towards him or not.

“Don’t. Don’t say that.”

“Come here, then.” He wonders what’s wrong with the rest of it. Then he realises that, inadvertently, he’s sounded like he’s soothing a child. Beckett is not a child, though she may need soothed, and memories of childhood are definitely not required. He kisses the top of her head, being the only accessible point, instead, and runs a hand over her back. It’s not a gesture he would ever use on a child. He thinks he’s got this, suddenly. Adult affection, not bonbons for a small child. She doesn’t need – or want – babied. She does need to know that she will receive support and comfort appropriate to an adult. It’s always been (very) adult affection that he’s offered, and to which she’s responded.

Castle considers for a reasonable space of time. Normally, he has two main modes of operation – at least since he divorced Gina. Childlike enthusiasm (or childishly irritating) and adorably charming; or parental. The third mode, which hasn’t come out to play much recently, except before Christmas with Beckett, is the one he needs here: smooth, suave and above all adult, whether that’s dinner or drinks or sexuality. That’s what had worked originally: a certain degree of assertiveness (but always and only with consent); a certain degree of simply sweeping her into the moment. Kat – the Kat who hasn’t reappeared, really, since he questioned her Christmas choices – liked not leading.

So if Beckett doesn’t want anything that might remind her of her childhood, and Kat doesn’t want to have to take the lead… logically that means –

He puts both hands round her face, turns it up, and kisses first both cheeks, where the tears have trailed, and then, slowly and firmly, her lips, tracing the seam. One hand drops back to her hip, to hold her in; the other stays curved around her head, fingers twining into her hair, thumb stroking the edge of her cheek. He doesn’t press for entry, but sticks with a small tease of tongue along her mouth. He’s waiting for a response before taking this any further: waiting for her to react as she had done the first times, to curve in and open up and let him taste and explore and take her mouth and turn her soft and purring and close-in.

And she does. Finally, a small re-connection, as her lips part and her hand rises to his shoulder. Permission granted, he deepens his kiss, explores, and then possesses: leading but not driving, turning her into him, angling her head, sensing her relax against his body: softening. As she softens, he becomes more forceful, more demanding, invading; more overtly masculine and assertive. A firm hand holds her against his hardness, and suddenly she wriggles into a better position and her hands come around his neck to hold him tightly and she makes a quiet little noise and is pleasingly pliant and pettable and purring. Yes, purring. He’s found his Kat again. Cuddlesome, kissable Kat. He strokes over her leg, her hip, her back: long soothing, drugging strokes that keep her soft and eased and his; never stopping kissing her, assertive and forceful and possessive, but never tipping over into roughness, or domination, or hard-edged lust. Support through strength, which she can draw on if she’ll let herself.

He’s got what he wanted. Well. Maybe. He’s found his Kat again, and that’s good. On the other hand, she’s as like to spook, run and hide, shut him out or turn on him as any untamed wildcat. So he’d better decide if he can live with that, because if not then this is a truly dreadful idea. For both of them. He’s not done so well with dealing with it so far. Then again, she hadn’t exactly told him enough for him to understand why she behaves as she does. Now he understands.

He looks down the likely road ahead. If she’s prepared to give it a go – and he’s not too sure about that – then even with goodwill and understanding and…and... it’s going to be rocky. He’s never needed to worry about that before, and he’s never been bothered enough to fight his way through. His previous affairs, and relationships, haven’t involved any problems that either party cared enough to work on and surmount.

And yet. He’s already fought harder for this than for anyone else (except his daughter, but that’s not at all the same) without even knowing why he was fighting. Even when he told himself he was going to walk away he couldn’t stay away. Even when she’s told him flatly where she’s at he couldn’t walk away and stay away. This is not hopeful. This may be insanity.

This might be love.

Her dad talked to Castle? So Castle really meant it: that their history won’t be the foundations of his book. But even so, Beckett can’t bear to be pitied or felt sorry for. And she still doesn’t, deep down, believe that she didn’t abandon her father. She still doesn’t, below that from where she hasn’t excavated it, believe that anyone can care enough for her – betrayer, abandoner – to stay with her, when there are so many more attractions out there to take them from her. She’s spent the last eight years trying to make up for her betrayal by supporting her father and in the work that’s brought her complete professional success, but because her father loved Jack Daniels more than he loved her, when she needed him most, nothing since has truly healed that wound.

No-one’s been there for her: why should this be different? And yet Castle just keeps coming back, in contrast to everything and everyone else. It doesn’t seem to matter what she says or does or what he says or does – he told her it was over and she told him she couldn’t stand seeing his family, after all, and yet he’s here, and she’s here, tucked up in his arms – they just keep spinning back to each other, gravitationally attracted without intelligence or thought entering into it. Every time he shows up she eventually lets him in, as unable to deny him as he seems unable to walk away; every time he pulls her in and wraps her up and holds her, every time she’s brought close in to his strength, she falls all over again; she lets herself believe that this time it could all be different; that he might really get it; that he really might be able to be there for her. It’s insanity. And yet she’s here in his arms, safe and warm and comforted and eased, and she feels better for the first time since before Christmas. It might be… something more.

Time to step up, Kate. Time to try. Because a ghost of a chance that Castle will care enough to stay is better than no chance at all.

“Will you play a game with me, Castle?”
Sorry seems to be the hardest word

His hand stops moving abruptly, surprise in the jerk of his arm, in the flash through his dark blue eyes.

“A game?”

“Yeah.” She doesn’t quite meet his gaze. “Play Sorry with me?” She can feel colour along her cheekbones, rising with his penetrating look.

Castle is surprised. He’d rather thought that Beckett-who-had-almost-become-Kat would want to stick with the deep, forceful kisses that he knows she likes. Then he parses the sentence, and examines her face. The streaks of red limning her cheeks and her inability to meet his eye argue a certain embarrassment. Ah. A way to apologise? They haven’t played Sorry since… before Christmas. She’d said, deep down drunk in the vodka, that she wished that she’d never got the game, that it had just been a mistake. That it had been her mistake had been heavily implied. So offering up the game now… is a peace-offering. Taking them back to a point where they were… comfortable. Before she started stepping back and pushing him away; before he started asking questions and, those questions left unanswered, making assumptions.

“Sure.” And time for his own step. “If I set it up, could I have a coffee, please?” Because the last time they’d played, they’d managed coffee and cuddles and soft Kat and both of them comfortable with each other.

“Sure.” She slides off his lap and aims for the kettle. He aims for the game, slightly dusty on the same spot of the shelf that it had occupied last time, and concludes that it hasn’t been touched since before Christmas either. He brings it back and opens up the board, shuffles the cards, and puts the little blue men out for Beckett and green ones out for him. The soothing scent of good coffee permeates the room, and somehow warms it. Shortly a tray appears bearing large mugs full of coffee, with creamer, nutmeg and cinnamon. Shortly after that, Beckett appears beside him, a slight air of uncertainty around her. Well, he can solve that. He remembers how to do that, at least.

He slips an arm around her, encouraging her to move closer, and this time, as last time, she does. As last time, too, she adds enough creamer and spices to her coffee to obliterate the original taste. Odd, that. In the precinct, and indeed most of the time, she puts only a dash of milk in; in the mornings she likes latte; but here, in her own soft, vague, undemanding space where sometimes he’s found a Kat not a Beckett, she likes her coffee softened as well. He takes that as a sign that she’s relaxed again, and doctors his own coffee with a pinch of cinnamon and a moderate dose of creamer.

“Who’ll cut first?” he asks.

“You can.”

Beckett wins the cut. Then she manages to get three men started while Castle is still staring disconsolately at a succession of useless cards. She’s brought one of them home while he’s still locked out the board, and the other two are moving smoothly round. She only needs one more to start, and he’ll have no hope of winning at all. He doesn’t like that. He wanted a game, not a procession. But he is gradually cuddling Beckett closer and closer and…. And finally he’s got a start.

“Sorry!” he bounces, and not apologetically at all sends one of her little blue men back home.
“Humph,” she mutters, and immediately draws a one to restart it.

After that it gets a lot more even, and every time Beckett says Sorry Castle hears an apology for more than simply sending his piece back to the start. His luck is not quite so unrelentingly bad, and his tactical acumen and far greater experience allows him to catch up. Almost. Beckett gets the rub of the green and plops her final blue piece home just ahead of him.

“I won,” she exults. “I beat you even though you’ve played this for years.”

Castle doesn’t hesitate.

“You get the prize, then.” And he leans slowly down and in, and smoothly takes her mouth. He doesn’t hurry: explores thoroughly and when she’s perfectly responsive keeps kissing her until she’s lax, only then lifting off.

“How’s that my prize?” Beckett grumps. “That’s the prize you insisted on when you won. How do you get a prize when I won?”

“Would you have preferred M&Ms?”

“Might have.”

“I don’t have any sweets. You’ll have to have me instead. I’m sweet.” And he kisses her again.

“See? Very sweet. Much better than M&Ms.” He picks her up and nestles her neatly into him.

“There. Your prize, Beckett, is a Castle-heater. Individually tailored to your needs to keep you warm and cozy whatever the temperature.”

Beckett rolls her eyes at him, but stays where she is, her hand creeping on to his midriff and then her head pillowing itself on his shoulder. He’s warm, and large, and indefinably stable. Not like she is. She feels more like she’s endlessly balancing on a wobble-board. Here and now, though, she can be still. No questions, no decisions, no need to be. She shifts a little to tuck herself in more tidily, and Castle’s arms reflexively tighten to keep her there. It’s a very odd feeling, to be enclosed like this. Will hadn’t been much for cuddles… well, no. That’s not true. She hadn’t been much for cuddles, and Will had taken the hint. This is different. Castle is not only into cuddles, but appears to be convinced that she should be, and she doesn’t seem to be arguing. For now, all her tension and bitterness and need to fill the void in her soul are quiescent. For now.

Until her conscience, fueled on history and unacknowledged hurt, steps in.

“This won’t work,” she murmurs sadly.

“Why not?” Castle asks softly.

“I can’t do it. I don’t know how. You’ll want more and I haven’t anything left.”

It’s the opening he’s been, unknowingly, waiting for, and he doesn’t hesitate to seize it now it’s there.

“You don’t need to know how,” he says, confidently. “All you need to know is that I do. No decisions, except whether you want to try. No need to lead or worry about it. I’ll do that. All you have to do is let me lead, and say no when you don’t want something.” He stops, thinks for a moment, and starts again. “But if something’s upsetting you, at least tell me that you need space, or need a hug, or even just that you’re not in a good mood. You don’t even have to tell me what it is if you don’t feel you can.” No questions. He doesn’t like unanswered questions, but there will be a pattern if she will tell him when she’s upset, and that pattern will answer the questions without her ever saying a word. Besides which, he has the main answer. Over-compensating.

“But you’ll want more. You already did.” And it didn’t work, he hears. You ditched me. He hadn’t meant it to be so. He’d wanted to shift it up.

“Don’t you want more?” and he answers his own question. “You do, don’t you? You want someone who’ll let you stand down for a while.” His voice softens. “If you could only stand down for a little bit, then all the rest would be okay. You’ll not be empty: you’ll fill up again. Stand down here, with me, and then stand up again.” His hand gently, firmly, slides around her waist and over her back, landing between her shoulder blades and holding her close. “Come here. Let’s not worry about anything else now. Come here, and be easy.”

“I’m not easy,” she snarks, but gently.

“Eased, then.”

Eased. Eased is good. Eased is very good. She curls in, bringing her knees up and around his hip, her face pressed into the muscle over his shoulder, her arm around his neck: chest to chest. She’s wrapped in, kept warm, held just tightly enough that she can feel his strength being applied. That’s not accidental, she thinks. He’s rather delicately making a point. She essays a move away, just an inch or two, and discovers that, though she is able to separate, there is a very slight delay. She nestles back in, and finds to her complete non-surprise that the same tightness reappears, without any delay. She stays there, breathing in the mixed scent of cologne, Castle, and comfort, eyes closed.

Castle cossets his armful of soft, lax, stood down Beckett, holding her tightly enough that she can absorb the leashed power that’s around her: protecting her. For a while there’s silence, and peace. Occasionally she moves a little within his grasp: a small wriggle to stay close. It’s thankfully similar to the second time he’d been here, when they’d played their game and then gently made out. A little more similarity wouldn’t hurt…

He kisses the top of her head, and then down a little to her hairline at the edge of her cheek. Beckett-who-still-isn’t-quite-anyone-else-yet turns her face a fraction to expose the cream skin to his lips. It’s not an invitation he intends to refuse. He drops tiny, barely-there touches down the outline of her visage, encouraging her to turn further towards him, and, when she does turn, moves across to taste the full lips and soft mouth and suggest that more is on offer if she should want to play. She opens for him and brings a hand into his hair to pull him closer and suddenly it’s all lit up: she’s right there with him and he’s dived in and taken her mouth hard and deep and forceful and she’s totally, wholly responsive. His fingers slip under her sweats, untuck the t-shirt beneath and connect with soft, satiny skin, gliding over the small of her back, not exploring under the edge of her yoga pants now, but upward to spread his span wide, warm palm taking the slight weight as he turns them both and scoops her up to lay her out between him and the back of the couch.

“What to do?” he muses. “I could keep kissing you” – he demonstrates, and nibbles briefly at her neck where she’ll wriggle and purr – “for as long as you want. Or you could tell me you wanted more… or I could carry on until you told me to stop.” He smiles lazily. “You don’t have to decide anything at all. Nothing you don’t want, nothing you don’t like. Just yes or no, any time.”

“Kiss me, Castle.” Kisses are good. Kisses are…easing. Kisses are the place to start. “You choose, after that.”

“As you wish,” and he bends down, which most conveniently allows her to undo several buttons of his shirt and slide her own hands over his warm, muscled, torso. She’s lifted and pressed in. There’s a slight noise indicating lack of male appreciation. “Are you still cold?”
“No.”

“So you don’t really need this.”

“Not if you’ll keep me warm.”

Her sweatshirt promptly decorates the floor. Castle’s hand returns to her back, under her t-shirt, and his broad chest does, indeed, keep her warm. He spends some time kissing her, which also keeps her warm, then moves to nibble softly at her ear, run a tongue tip over the small nerve behind it to make her squirm slightly and then mew quietly, and then slide down to the curve of her neck and the jut of her clavicle. Her breathing rises in time with his, and the gentle making out begins to become more heated, movement more rapid, less controlled. Her hands start to roam over his chest, one of his moves round to start to tease at the edge of her bra, then slips upward to cup the small mound and rub over her. It sends heat and sparking desire flashing through her, the connection between them snapping into place instantly, and she stops worrying about anything under the leashed power and forceful, drugging hands and mouth that take her higher, hotter, wilder in his grip. The t-shirt joins the sweatshirt, and both are shortly joined by Castle’s shirt.

Castle emits a satisfied, predatory growl which slinks straight down every nerve Beckett possesses and lands up in the liquid heat building between her legs. “More?” he asks, but somehow it isn’t really a question, it’s reading the need from inside her head. She pulls him back down to her and kisses him. It’s not the slick, practised preludes to slick, practised, sex that they’d had almost every time; it’s not, though, the surrender which wholly lets him lead and leaves herself swept up. It’s something new: a wanton desire that’s taken over; something that she hasn’t felt before. She claws into the hard muscle over his back, and fires the short fuse. Castle simply scoops her up, half carries her to the bedroom without ever stopping kissing, touching and lighting her up, and then strips them both without any further ado. They’re both so desperately hot for each other that there’s no more foreplay, no more teasing, only a completely primal coupling that leaves her limp under him, totally possessed as he in his turn bears the marks that she’s inflicted.

Eventually he rolls off, but doesn’t let go. Primal or not, cuddling doesn’t seem optional. She’s held in, and it’s stupidly protective because she doesn’t need protected. She does that: it’s her job. It’s her life. But it’s stupidly comforting, too. She simply stays put. It’s possible that her legs won’t hold her up yet. It’s also possible that she likes the feeling too much to move away from it.

Castle is as much intrigued as satisfied – and he is currently very satisfied. Still, even though Beckett isn’t making any effort to move away, he’s not inclined to let her escape. That’s a whole new facet of her kaleidoscopically variable off-duty personality, and it’s very, very interesting. He hadn’t expected it. He also hadn’t expected that it would have such an inflammatory effect on him. He’d intended to indulge in the same gently assertive leading that had produced Kat, but instead she’d tugged his head down to meet her mouth and suddenly they’d melded into one explosive, unthinking reaction.

He strokes unconsciously over her skin, not asking or demanding anything by word, look or touch. For now, for her, a little closeness, a little peace, a little space simply to be, without needing to be something to somebody. She only needs to be here, standing down for a little time, forgetting everything except that he’s here with her and holding her close and giving her respite. In this one thing, he’s far stronger than she, and she can and should draw on his strength. If only he were sure that she knows that, and knowing that, would rely upon it. But that’s a niggie for another time.

It dawns upon him, there naked in her bed with her naked against him, that neither of them really has much reason to trust each other, yet. Sex isn’t love and love isn’t trust until they’ve each earned it. He shivers, a little chilled, and Beckett moves slightly to pull a coverlet across them. He’d thought she was asleep.

“Thought it was me who was cold,” she murmurs, and he realises that she is pretty much out of it.

“I’ll keep you warm,” he answers.

“ ‘Kay.” She curls up into him, and he strokes over her waist till her breathing deepens and slows and she is certainly asleep. In true sleep, in which he hasn’t seen her until now, she’s relaxed, her face smoothed out and emptied of its usual drive and force. She looks younger, but there are tiny stress lines around her mouth and eyes which are disguised by her on-duty shell. He does a small amount of mental math, and works out that from age nineteen to twenty four she’d been dealing with her father. Or forcing herself not to deal with her father. That’s an impressionable age. A bad age for bad things to happen.

An especially bad age to find that your parent is… unreliable. He pursues that thought. Unreliable… which in the context means never there when you need him. Always off with something else. Something being the bottle. Something… he loves more than you.

Ah. Over-compensating for her own so-called betrayal and hiding the feeling of being betrayed. His mind wanders back to the idea of serious therapy. He wonders if she’d had any, because if she did, it didn’t work. She whistles into his chest, naked and slightly sticky and sweaty, as he thinks further, plotting the story from the clues he has. All the odd little hitches and pauses and starts and stops – must have been from fanged, clawed memory of some disaster.

It’s Christmas time, there’s no need to be afraid. At Christmas time, we let in light and we banish shade… Or not. Especially not if you’re running up to a traumatic anniversary. How much booze does an alcoholic need to forget the triggering event, and how long beforehand might they really tie it on? More than a couple of days? More than the two-plus weeks that would take it back before Christmas Day? That’s a lot of bad memories all tied up into society’s Christmas expectations of life, love and happiness; all wrapped in shiny paper and a big red bow. Christmas with your family. Everyone sharing presents and love. Everyone enjoying themselves, laughing and joking and playing around; and under all of it the story of the season, of redemption. For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given: and the Child came with Love to redeem the world. It’s the whole centre and meaning of Christmas: the power to redeem and the forgiveness of sins. Castle’s faith is well-hidden and rarely noticed, even by himself, but he believes very strongly in the power of love and forgiveness.

But what if you can’t forgive yourself? What if you think you’ve forgiven those who have trespassed against you… what if maybe you haven’t really managed that either? That’s a lot of unacknowledged guilt to carry. Can’t forgive your own actions, and then can’t accept that you haven’t forgiven the other’s actions. Because you’ve tried so hard to forgive, convince yourself you’ve forgiven, and do what’s expected of you.

Definitely therapy. The only question is how. This is far too deep-rooted for Castle to even think about fixing. In fact, it’s buried so deeply that Beckett probably hasn’t realised it yet. The abandonment and that she can’t forgive herself, sure she knows that. She’d vomited it all out on a tide of vodka. The rest… not so much. Ten years of pain, five of believing she’s forgiven her father and never being quite sure why she’s still uncomfortable, still unhappy; and all the time pouring herself out in every possible direction to fill the void in her soul; all the time her guilt deepening the abyss.

He holds her close, and, dry-eyed, weeps for her.
Moving on up

Castle, some dark time later, squints at a clock and finds it to be after eleven. He should go home. He should go home and be there for his daughter. Family first, family before anything. Oh. Ohhhh. He’d never put that together with his reactions to Beckett’s actions. Pushed one of his nuclear buttons, she had. Anything that looked like abandoning family… his non-present, one night stand sperm donor non-father had abandoned them, Meredith had abandoned Alexis… Oh, oh, oh. No wonder he’d reacted so very, very badly. Unspoken assumptions… triggered by his own past.

But he’s identified them now, so he can pull them out into the disinfecting sunlight of knowledge and watch them shrivel up and die. He snuggles down again, content, and finds comfort of his own in the lax warmth of her form against his chest.

“Beckett,” he says into her ear, after a longer time. “Beckett, I’ve got to go home soon.” He follows it up with a slight shake of her shoulder, and when that doesn’t work, a slightly harder shake. She doesn’t stir. Well, that’s not quite true. She curls up closer into him and wraps her arm more tightly round his ribs. This is very pleasant and very unhelpful. He can’t go anywhere with Beckett clinging like a limpet to his middle. He has an idea, and strokes around her face. An eyelid rises, an eye glares at him, and the eyelid falls again. It’s like trying to wake the Cyclops.

“Wakey, wakey,” he entices.

“No.” She burrows into his chest and pulls the coverlet over her head.

“Don’t, then. But I have to get home.” He rolls a little, and detaches her. At least, that was the plan. Rolling a little has settled him on top of naked Beckett, neatly placed exactly where all sorts of deliciously pleasurable naughtiness might occur. That was… not a good idea. She is definitely not asleep now. Which is not to say that her eyes aren’t large, and hazy, and very sexily sleepy. She blinks, slowly.

“You seem to be pretty pleased to see me awake, Castle,” she drawls. It’s his turn to blink, and then to smile, lazily.

“If you’d woken up a little more quickly, I’d have been even more pleased. Never mind. You’re awake now.” He looks down at her, and moves a little. Her sleepy eyes turn dark and widen. He leans down, slowly, brings his hands around her face and then kisses her deeply. “If you’re awake, then I can kiss you properly. Can’t I?”

“Mmmmm.”

That sounds like agreement. It feels like it too, since her hands are sliding into his hair and bringing him down to her. So he kisses her again, tasting her lips, slipping his tongue between them, quick raids to entice her to pursue him and open up, but she’s not being caught in that trap, so he nips her lip to tease her and she tries to retaliate but he takes advantage and steals her mouth and isn’t possession nine points of the law?

Once he’s taken her mouth, he’s found soft, open Kat who likes him to be sure, and searching, and certain of where he wants to take her; sure of how he wants to make love to her. Her certainty – at work – is diamond hard, has to be, so off-duty, having someone else’s certainty to lean on… is restful. He stays exploring her mouth for a time, stroking a hand down over her smooth, silky skin, not pushing, not hurrying; no forcing the pace. He carries on with the same slow seduction until Kat is loose-limbed and moving under his touch, then, assured of his welcome, begins to stroke into more dangerous areas, palming her breasts so she arches into his hands, slipping downward over the flat abs, the jut of her hipbone, the neat curls, the heat and moisture of her sensitive core. She twists under his experienced, erotic ministrations, moaning quietly and then more loudly as he slithers down to lick and suck and taste her nipples; descends further and she writhes as his mouth meets the damp folds and his tongue laps over them and flicks over-stimulated nerves and then pushes in, slides out, over nerves again; repeated and repeated so that she arches and writhes and cries his name and comes.

And then he slides into her body as his tongue retakes her mouth and she’s kissing him as if the world will end tonight, legs wrapped around him to pull him deeper and she’s just as responsive, as gorgeously hot, as lost in him as he’d wanted and needed; as he is, once more, lost in her.

They’re wrapped in post-coital quiet when Castle remembers that he needs to go home. This time he achieves it, not without regret that he simply can’t stay. Then again, he’s never been able to stay. The first couple of times were too early, and then it was the slick sex that didn’t take them anywhere. But now, he wants to stay; to keep her close and, most importantly, be there when she wakes so that she doesn’t simply revert to walled-up, closed-off Beckett without knowing that he’ll be there when she wants to stand down.

Beckett is woken by her phone. It’s Dispatch, with a new body for her. She’s up and out in quick time, fully focused on the case and dialling Castle as she goes. By the time she’s reached Hamilton Fish Park, the team is there. She’s not sure whether it’s a good thing or a bad that it’s Lanie on the case, not Perlmutter. Perlmutter is a pain in the ass, but he won’t ask her any questions. Lanie’s a far better ME, but it comes with the Inquisition.

“What have we got?” she inquires, looking down at a twenty-something-not-a-lot African-American man, in winter weight sports gear. As she does, Castle arrives and peers at it. He’s standing an unnoticeable fraction closer than normal, concealed from the others by his heavy coat and by his brandishing a large cup of coffee at her. She takes it without even thinking. It’s cold, it’s undoubtedly about to snow, again, and standing around is very chilling even wrapped up in warm clothes. And, of course, Lanie is regarding her with an ominously penetrating glance. The chill in her body is joined by a chill in her soul.

“The hole in his shoulder is a single GSW, but that shouldn’t have killed him. My bet is that he drowned in the pool, but I’ll need to get him back to the morgue to find out. Gimme till this afternoon. I’ll call you soon as I know.”

Lanie gives her team of cleaner-uppers instructions and the body disappears towards the morgue. Unfortunately, and predictably, Lanie does not. Beckett wishes that hiding behind Espo would not be a complete giveaway that she really does not want to talk to Lanie at all, and finds herself deserted as Ryan and Esposito rapidly depart at Lanie’s glare, taking a reluctant Castle with them. She locks down, the more relaxed mood with which she had woken, which had started to drain when she’d seen Lanie, and which had then been somewhat reinstated by the coffee Castle had brought, wholly evaporating. She doesn’t want to talk to Lanie. Still, she’d managed to avoid conversation last night and she can avoid it now.

“Time of death, Lanie?”

“Gave it to Espo already.”

“Okay, I’d better get back to it. Call me when you get something.”

“Kate, what was up Monday?”
“I was busy.”

Lanie looks at her. Beckett looks back, with a degree of cool challenge.

“You weren’t busy at lunchtime. You dashed off like someone bit your butt, girlfriend. So what was up?”

“I had things to do.”

“Kate, you need to talk about this.” Beckett’s face locks down even more tightly. “You really do.”

“I really don’t. It’s all done.” She turns. “I need to get back and get started. See you Friday?”

“What’s all done?” Lanie says to Beckett’s departing back, and gets no answer. “Tonight, not Friday. And you had better be ready to talk to me,” she adds, unheard.

Beckett’s better mood on waking is thoroughly ruined, thanks to Lanie. She returns to the bullpen and glares at her already-decorated murder board. Esposito has started the timeline, and Ryan is interrogating databases to get an ID. Castle is fiddling with a piece of paper and staring at the picture of their victim.

“Hey,” he says happily, and, as the boys aren’t looking, smiles with a very male edge of appreciation and memory.

“Hey.”

“Lanie have anything more?”

“No.” That’s snipped off. Castle deduces that Lanie had tried to pick up where – he presumes – she had left off on Monday.

“Shame,” he says blandly, and doesn’t comment further. “Coffee?”

“Please. I’m cold. Standing around the park looking at a dead runner really didn’t help.”

“Runner?”

“Runner. Thought you’d have noticed that, Mr Observation.” Castle can’t exactly say that actually he was paying much more attention to Beckett, whose adrenaline and tension had been high when he got there and who had been regarding Lanie much as if she were a small bomb. He’d have been paying more attention to Beckett anyway, to see if she had rebuilt her walls against him, but that hadn’t been obvious in the face of the threat from Lanie’s beadily interrogative stare.

“Okay, Ms Supercop, what’d I miss?” Beckett follows him to the break room, which is good.

“The shoes. Those weren’t bought for show: those were serious gear. Expensive. His clothes were the real deal too. This wasn’t some joe who runs to look good, this was a serious athlete.” She frowns. “I’d have expected a college logo somewhere, but I don’t remember one.” She moves to the door. “Hey, Espo?”

“Yo?”

“You remember any sort of logo on our vic’s gear?”

“Naw. I can call the morgue, if you want?”
“Yeah.”

“On it.” She stalks back toward the coffee machine where the aroma is tickling the air. Castle watches the way she walks and accurately concludes that the case is the only thing on her mind. He also accurately concludes that this is an entirely deliberate focus to avoid thinking about anything else, such as Lanie’s questions, or last night. Detective Beckett, on the job. Murderers, beware.

“Why would someone shoot a runner?”

“Envy.”

She raises a brow. “Okay, let’s tug on that. Competitors? I’d like that better if there was a logo on his pants or top.”

“Did he die of the shot or something else?”

“Shot. Even though it wasn’t fatal the shock would have laid him out for long enough to freeze – hypothermia – or he drowned because he breathed in the snow and slush. So the shot killed him, even though it wasn’t cause of death.”

Castle finishes preparing the coffee and hands a mug over. Beckett wraps her fingers round it in a way which suggests that they are still cold, despite her gloves having been on outside, and smiles a brisk precinct smile.

“No theories yet?”

“Plenty of theories. If it wasn’t a rival, maybe it was a distraught girlfriend.”

“That’s unusually normal for you.”

“Or he was a CIA messenger who was shot by a Chinese spy before he could reach his drop point.”

“And… back to the usual insanity.”

“Or he was that speedy runner from Men In Black. You know, the alien that Will Smith nearly catches before he’s a Man In Black?” He looks at her quivering lips. “You do know, don’t you? You watch sci-fi films.” He grins widely. “You’re a fan. Who’d have thought it? Buttoned-up Beckett likes sci-fi movies.” He smiles soulfully. “I have a huge collection. We could watch them together.” His voice drops. “I’ll bring them all round to yours.” It’s added fast enough to remove the instant stiffening in her back.

“Beckett,” Ryan says from the doorway, “I got something.”

“What’ve you got?”

“His name’s Asher Washington. Lives off Avenue D. Got the address.”

“Field trip?” says Castle hopefully.

“Yes. Let’s go. Ryan, see what else you can dig up. Next of kin would be good.”

“On it.”

Asher Washington’s apartment is, unsurprisingly, locked. The building superintendent produces a key, after some persuasion and the application of the most ferociously vicious stare Castle can ever remember Beckett emitting. It’s on the sixth floor but at least there is an elevator. The Stairmaster at the gym is one thing. Panting geriatically after Beckett’s no doubt Olympic standard stair-sprinting would be quite another. Which tweaks a memory.

“How did you know about the serious gear?”

“I thought you did yoga.”

“It is possible to enjoy more than one sport, Castle.”

“I could think of another sport you’d enjoy,” he leers. There’s a disgusted noise. It’s reassuringly normal. Under the influence of a nice new case, Beckett is apparently perfectly contented, and in the absence of Lanie, beginning to relax again. He determines to keep it that way.

They look around the small studio. It’s relatively tidy, only a mug on the side. A bowl, cereal and a spoon are out, but unused. On further exploration, the bed is semi-made, and the towel in the bathroom is dry. A button-down and dress pants are over a narrow chair.

“Looks like he went out for a morning run before breakfast, and meant to come back to shower and eat.” She pokes around a little. “You see any phone, laptop, anything like that?”

“Laptop’s here,” Castle says, pointing at the nightstand drawer. “Got any gloves?”

“Sure.” She tosses him a pair and puts one on herself. “Okay. If he’d had a phone on him at the scene Espo or Ryan would have found it. Bit weird to go out without one in this weather, but if he was on a short run he might not have bothered. So it ought to be here.”

Castle looks around hopefully, in a random fashion. Beckett starts at one side and works methodically through each area and drawer.

“A-ha!” they say together, spotting an edge of phone peeking out from under a cushion. Beckett pulls it out, and swipes it. Naturally, it needs a passcode. She taps in a sequence. It opens up.

“How’d you know the code?” Castle says with astonishment. She smirks, happy as always to have pulled off a trick that he hadn’t.

“Magic,” she says, and wiggles her fingers. Castle pouts. Behind the childish expression, he notes again that Beckett has now become more relaxed than she has been for some considerable time. He wonders how much of that is the case and how much last night – and how long it will last, either way.

“C’mon,” he whines.

Beckett sighs. “Most people never change the initial code. I always try it first. Seven times out of ten, it works.”

“Oh. That simple?”

“Yep.” She’s glaring at the contacts list. “Where’re his parents?” She scrolls down, muttering darkly. “They should be here.”

“Maybe he doesn’t have any.”

“Huh?”
“Maybe he doesn’t have any. An orphan. Little Orphan Asher.” Her brow creases as she thinks, tapping her phone already.

“What did Ryan have?”

“You’re not gonna believe this.”

“He really is an orphan? I knew it!”

“Yeah. Your crazy theory was right.”

“Say that again, Beckett. I don’t think I heard it.” She glares.

“You heard.”

He slides up to her. “Didn’t. Temporary deafness.”

“You did.” A hand sneaks over her waist and away. “Don’t.” He opens his mouth. “Just… don’t. Please. Not when I’m working.” Stress creeps into her voice. Oh. Fine while she’s on the case. Not fine as soon as she’s distracted. What had Ryan said? If they don’t do something, she never stops. Oh.

“Okay.”

She nods, once, in thanks. “Let’s get back and see what the boys have.” The stress has – almost – disappeared from her tone. “We can get lunch on the way.”

Beckett’s lunch consists of a small sandwich, an anaemic salad and a fruit salad. Castle quirks an eyebrow, and gets a scowl in return. He subsides, before he can put his foot in it. Although putting his foot in the salad might improve it. Even slush would have more nutrition than that salad. His lunch consists of a much more substantial Mexican wrap. Beckett doesn’t seem to notice. She’s eased off again, now she’s back in the bullpen.

“Beckett, we got next of kin. An aunt and uncle. Placed with them when his parents got dead in a motor accident. Parents were pretty well off, well insured” – Ryan smirks: it’s clear that’s all come from his digging even if Espo’s doing the whole of the talking – “so that’s likely how he could afford to live in Manhattan now. Works at Schickoff & Schultz.”

“Who?”

“Attorneys, based in Midtown.”

“That’s where Dad’s firm is.” Beckett wrinkles her brow. “Wonder if he knows anything about them? I might see what the gossip is. Lawyers gossip like a knitting circle – except about their clients, when it might actually be useful to us.” Castle blinks at her disgruntled tone. “What? They never give us any useful information on a case. Professional ethics.” She scowls. “I do get it. Brought up with it. It’s just sometimes…”

“Unhelpful?”

“Yeah.” She glares at the innocent desk, then breathes out and smiles nastily. “Still, there might be some non-client gossip.”
Beckett has had an idea. It is extremely unlikely that her father will know anything about Asher Washington, though he might be able to give her some background on the firm and if she’s really lucky, some gossip. It is, however, very likely that he will be free for dinner tonight, which means that she will be able to avoid Lanie. Perfect. Of course, she will have to deal with her father, but since Christmas that’s been slightly easier, mostly. Slightly easier. Her father has been more… fatherly. Relaxed. Less… fragile. And it had all started at Christmas, with the game, and she’d talked about Castle, and somewhere her father seems to have got the idea that there’s more to it than she’d told him, and… and it seems that in thinking about Katie with a… a… something… sort-of-not-quite-maybe-relationship, he’s rediscovered something of himself.

“Beckett!”

“Uh?”

“Did you even hear me?”

“No. What was it?”

“Are you and Castle going to go talk to the relatives?”

“Oh. Yeah. Sure.” She snaps back into focus. “Ryan, are you waiting for street cams?” He nods. “Okay. Espo, you start tracing bank, purchases, anything that might tell us what he was into that might get him killed. If Lanie calls, ask her to text me and we’ll swing by the morgue on the way back. Castle, give me five and we’ll get going.” She disappears in the direction of the restroom, and on the way back calls her father.

“Dad?”

“Katie? Is something wrong?” He sounds concerned.

“No, nothing. I need some help on a case, and you might be able to help.”

“Me? I’m not a criminal attorney.”

“No. I need some gossip.” Her father squawks.

“I don’t gossip.”

“C’mon, Dad, you all chatter like the Sewing Circle. I need you to tell me about Schickoff & Schultz. Can I meet you for dinner?”

“Sure, come over and I’ll cook. I don’t know a lot about them, though.”

“Anything’s more than the nothing I’ve got. See you about six-thirty?”

“Sure.” There’s a pregnant pause. “Katie… if this is a case, shouldn’t you be bringing your Castle-fellow with you?” Her father sounds – mischievous. “After I’ve unloaded the information, we could all eat and then have a nice evening.”

“Dad! No, I wasn’t going to bring him.”

“I think you should,” Jim says. “If you don’t, I guess I’ll just come by the precinct after work and tell you there. That way you’re doing what you’re supposed to: letting him shadow you.”

Oh God. Now her father’s turned matchmaker. How the hell did that happen? She’d been pleased that he was being a little more fatherly… but this is not pleasing at all. Her father is still talking.
“So that’s agreed. You’ll both come by around six-thirty. See you later.” And he dials off before she has a chance to argue. She’s left there with her jaw hanging open. Her own father has just sandbagged her. She walks out, shell-shocked.
“What did you say to my dad?”

“Uh?” Castle says articulately. Say what, Beckett? She sounds equal parts shocked and pissed at him. Or maybe at her dad. “What do you mean?” They’re just getting into her car.

“I asked if we could have dinner and he could tell me about the law firm and he insisted you came too.”

Castle sits there with his jaw on his lap. Her father did what? “Uh?” he says again. All his normal words and brain function appear to have run away. If he had any sense, he’d be following them.

“Did you give him that idea?”

“No!” Absolutely not. Never. Oh, hi Jim, will you help me get your daughter into my arms even though she’s doing her best to drive me away? That’s a really likely way to help his cause. “I went to tell him that I wouldn’t put him in my book. I told you that. He told me his story and asked me where the game store was. Nothing else.”

There is a strange noise permeating the car. It sounds as if Beckett is growling. When he glances over at her, she’s clamped her teeth into her lip and looks like she’s about to scream.

“I do not need this,” she mutters blackly. “I can’t deal with this.” Suddenly, all her tension is back. She’s obviously had a very unpleasant thought. Castle worms a hand over to hers, and skates over her fingers, aiming for reassurance. She doesn’t react. “I don’t need another thing to worry about.”

“Worry about what?”

There’s a pause. He’s still rubbing lightly over the back of her hand where it rests on her leg. “Dad,” she says, and stops that short. Castle waits, unusually quietly. Nothing more arrives. They pull out into the traffic, which gives Beckett an excuse to concentrate on something else.

“So what do we do?”

“Go,” she says. She doesn’t sound exactly overjoyed. “I need that gossip.” There’s something else there, but he isn’t entirely sure what it is. It almost sounds like she’s picking the better of two bad options. He’d pick at that thought till he’d uncovered the meat of it, but they’re almost to the right spot, and, under the shadow of the case, Beckett’s pulled herself back to normality.

The relatives are cool and collected. At least, they are right up to the point Beckett asks if Asher had any enemies. The aunt dissolves into tears.

“No. No-one. He had a nice girlfriend, a good job, friends. He had everything. Everyone loved him.”

“What about his running? Did he have a club?”

“No. He said it calmed him down. Work was really demanding. All those targets. So he always ran the same route so he didn’t have to worry.”

“What sort of attorney was he?”

“Corporate. He didn’t” – her husband breaks in –
“He hadn’t had a chance to specialise yet. He was only twenty four. He had everything in front of him.” Beckett freezes for the tiniest fraction of a second, and then recovers.

“Could you give me the names and addresses of his girlfriend and his close friends?”

“Yes. As much as we can.” Castle knows that this will be for cross-checking with the phone.

“Thank you. Was there anyone at work that he talked about a lot – good or bad?”

They look identically blank. Beckett lets the silence stretch out.

“He mentioned his boss occasionally, but I don’t remember anyone else.”

Beckett takes meticulous notes of the names and addresses. While she’s doing that, her phone chirps with a text, but she doesn’t look at it until they’ve left the Washingtons’ apartment.

“Is that Lanie?” Castle asks hopefully.

“Yes. We’d better go by the morgue. She’s got results for me.”

Beckett doesn’t sound as excited by that as she normally would. Castle thinks back to the earlier thought that she was choosing dinner with her dad as a least-worst option, and rapidly concludes that Beckett is still at odds with Lanie and is ensuring that Lanie can’t make anything of it – for now. He wonders whether to don his vest, and then decides that this would be a little provocative. He’ll just have to dodge the flying subtext. Though this is Lanie. Subtext is far too subtle if she’s decided she wants to make a point.

Asher Washington is laid out on a slab, opened up. Beckett gazes down at the corpse, and then at Lanie. “What’ve you got for me?”

Lanie regards Beckett beadily. “Single GSW to the shoulder. .308 calibre. Shattered the bone, but didn’t kill him. Shock probably knocked him down.”

“So what did kill him?”

“Drowned. Slush in his lungs. But I think he had a little help with that. See these bruises?” Castle and Beckett nod in unison. “Someone held him down.”

“Held him down?”

“Yup. Long enough for him to drown, then left him there.” Lanie continues with technical detail for a few moments. “Tox was clean. Hadn’t had so much as a Tylenol.”

“Anything else?”

“Nope. No tattoos, no notable marks. Clean as a whistle.”

“Okay. Thanks, Lanie.” Beckett starts for the door.

“Where are you going?”

“Back to the bullpen.”

Lanie puts herself between Beckett and the door. “In that case I’ll see you later.”

“I’m busy. Seeing my dad.”
“She is,” Castle says helpfully.

“I am,” Beckett says bluntly. “So I need to get back. I said I’d see you Friday.”

“Yeah,” Lanie says very sarcastically. “You did. Right about the point you wouldn’t say anything about anything. You need to talk to someone.”

“I am not having this discussion. I’m certainly not having it on work time and in public.” Beckett has developed an icy anger which Castle has not previously seen directed at Lanie. She stalks out. Castle turns to follow and is stopped by Lanie.

“What’s going on? She’s been weird since Monday.” Castle looks convincingly and stupidly blank, and shrugs.

“No idea. See you later,” he says hurriedly, and escapes, quickly enough for it to be clear he’s not swapping secrets with Lanie.

Beckett is not looking forward to Friday. She’s not looking forward to this evening, either. When Castle exits the morgue at some speed and slides into the car, she’s staring at the sidewalk, thinking that her life would be massively easier if her father wasn’t matchmaking and her so-called best friend wasn’t trying to play psychiatrist. They’ll both be disappointed in her; and she’ll end up picking up the pieces for her father and trying to avoid seeing the disgust in Lanie’s face.

A large, warm hand lands over hers and completely envelops it. “You okay?” Castle asks.

“Yeah. I’m fine.” But his hand is very comforting. She doesn’t shake him off, as she had earlier: for a brief moment lets his strength flow into her. “Let’s go.”

Back in the hubbub of the bullpen progress is being made. Espo and Ryan have split up the friends between them, and are cross-referencing at near-light speed. Beckett’s got the girlfriend and is running her down. Social media is such a wonderful help to cops. She’s fairly sure it wasn’t why Facebook was invented, but she’s not complaining. In fact, Asher’s Facebook is also a good place to look…

“What the hell?” she emits. “Guys, get a load of this.”

“Wow.”

Asher had been wearing a GoPro. That’s…quite unusual. Especially since it hadn’t been on the body. “Did unis pick it up on the search?”

“No.”

“Hmm.”

Not only had he been wearing it, but he must have been a bit of a geek, because he’d been sending a series of shots to his Facebook page. The final clear photo is timed at 5.03a.m. After that it’s shots of slush, up close and not personal, every five minutes. The same slush. There are three slushy photos. Then there’s nothing more.

“Well, that gives us time of death,” Ryan says. “5.03 to 5.08. That’s a lot better than Lanie can do.”

“Not quite. It gives us time of shot, within a five minute window. Time of death will be around 5.18 to 5.23, plus a few minutes."

“Oh. When the camera stopped transmitting.”

“Yes. It’s pretty dark around then.”

Espo jumps in. This is his specialist subject.

“Need to be a pretty good shot to hit a running man in the dark when it’s winter, even if it’s not a kill shot. We need to cross-check who Asher knew who could shoot.”

“What’s your odds, Espo?”

“If he didn’t slip on the snow, an’ if I had my rifle, at up to 600 yards ten outta ten, even in the dark. Wouldn’t want night vision. Spoils it. But there ain’t many like me,” he finishes smugly. Beckett lets the arrogance pass. Espo earned that arrogance long since, out in the desert.

“So we’re talking about a pretty good shot, then,” Castle says.

“Yeah. We oughta check ranges, that sorta thing. Someone who can shoot that well is gonna be practicing somewhere and he’ll have been noticed.”

“Might be a woman, Espo,” Beckett says dryly.

“Ain’t many like you out there, either.” Castle flicks a surprised glance at Esposito. “Beckett can shoot straight. Can’t beat me, but she don’t do badly.” She grins ferally at Espo, who grins back, and just for a moment it’s two predators together against the world. “Second best in the bullpen.”

“I’ll beat you one day,” she says, bravado sparking. “And I’ll publish it in every paper in New York State.”

“Su-ure you will, Beckett. Only if I’m shooting from a sickbed.” Beckett laughs. This is an old, familiar argument that they’ve been having since the day they teamed up and Espo told her that girls can’t shoot. She’d taken him up on the competition, and though she’s never beaten him and never will, their comradely vying had improved her scores and marksmanship to be second-best to him in every case. Some days, that’s all she’d had to cling to: going to the range with Espo to give her something that required total concentration on the days after her father had needed her, once he got dry.

“I’d like to see that,” Castle says. “Can I try too?”

“You?” comes in stereo.

“Me. I’ve done a bit of shooting.” Beckett and Espo exchange glances, and another of those predatory smiles.

“Okay. Maybe when this case is over.” She looks up at her board. “Let’s see what we’ve got. Corporate attorney and runner, shot with a rifle, then drowned when that didn’t quite work. Head cam missing. Shooter was pretty good but nothing like Espo.”

“Prob’ly not ex-Forces, then.”

“Guess it’s time for the grunt work. We’d better get on with it.”

And they do. For the next couple of hours it’s heads down. Even Castle appears to have caught the bug, although it mostly manifests in the provision of coffee and intense concentration on his phone.
Beckett is, he knows, using the need to chase leads to forget about all the other issues surrounding her.

“Beckett.”

“Uh?”

“We ought to be going. You said you’d be at your dad’s at six-thirty. It’s after six already.”

Oh. Is it? How did that happen? “Thanks.” She looks at her pile of papers, picks it up wholesale, and stuffs it in the drawer. The computer is equally condignly dealt with. “There. Done.”

“You goin’ home, Beckett?”

“No, to see my dad. Remember? Legal gossip.”

“Oh, yeah. See you tomorrow.”

“Night, boys.”

“Night,” Castle echoes her.

The drive up to the Upper West Side becomes increasingly quiet as the cross-street numbers rise. Castle tries to make conversation, but after the third completely non-relevant response from Beckett he stops bothering and simply observes. Beckett is retreating back into a brightly polished, smiling, superficially attractive shell which most people would think was entirely appropriate for seeing their family. Castle recognises it instantly as the same one he had seen when he’d dragooned her round for dinner at his, recalls her wish that no-one would need her, and switches his observation skills to high.

“Hi, Dad.”

“Jim.”

“Hello, Katie. Rick.” Beckett’s eyes widen momentarily at the informal addresses between her father and Castle. That is… not necessarily a good thing. She doesn’t need them teaming up. It’s just…squicky. Which is an absolutely horrible word which doesn’t belong in any adult’s vocabulary but is the only one she can think of which fits. As if seeing her father wasn’t a fragile enough construct, now she has to worry about what Castle’s undisciplined mouth might give away, and worse, what he might spot.

She doesn’t remember that she’d told him, deep dissolved in vodka, that she’s tired of being needed, of everyone wanting to lean on her; that she wants to disappear. Therefore, she isn’t aware that he’s already on alert.

“I made us all dinner,” Jim says cheerily. “Chicken and salad. I got us an apple tart and cream for dessert.”

“From Fairway?” Beckett says hopefully, regarding the tart on the counter hungrily.

“Yes, Katie. From Fairway.”

“Good. I love their tarts.” Castle resolves to feed her one, every so often. He watches Beckett with her father, and detects a tiny brittleness in her voice. She’s trying very hard to show her father she’s delighted.
“Dinner will be ready in a moment. You can ask your questions over the meal, Katie.” Jim grins. “Do you want to read me my rights first?”

“Dad!” Beckett sounds deeply offended. Jim grins even more widely. Castle moves around the small apartment, as neat as his daughter’s, but more decorated. There’s a photo of Beckett in dress uniform. More surprisingly, there’s a wedding photo. Beckett is really very like her mother. Another reason for Jim to dissolve into alcohol. She must have been a constant reminder of what he’d lost. While he’s been thinking, the table has been set, water glasses and jug put out, and Jim is placidly tossing salad.

“Which firm did you say it was?”

“Schickoff & Schultz.”

“Mm. Can’t say as I’ve really come across them. I haven’t heard anything bad about them, either. Sorry, Katie. No gossip.”

“Nothing?”

“Nothing.”

Castle watches with appalled interest as Beckett turns slightly and is clearly struggling not to say why didn’t you tell me that at lunchtime? She swallows it down, clears her face of ire, and says lightly, “Shall I put the salad out?” If it had been anyone except her father, Castle thinks, they’d have been cut off at the knees for pulling that trick. Or at the neck.

“Can I help?”

“I think we’re good, thanks. You could pour.” Castle does as he’s told, as Jim puts chicken on plates and Beckett distributes them about the table.

Conversation is stilted. Castle can’t think of a topic that he’s comfortable introducing, and Beckett, having received no useful information at all, is trying to talk about the lousy weather and how much she hates the snow because she can’t run without falling over.

“It’ll be gone soon,” Jim points out. “Then you can go running as much as you like. Take care, though.” Castle would have said the same to Alexis, in much the same tone.

“You say that every time,” Beckett says, with that same brittleness as earlier, covered by a cheerful grin. “I’m not six, you know. Not even sixteen.”

“You’re not. But you’re still my daughter and I’m allowed to nag you.” Beckett’s hand is below the table, finger twisted into the belt loop of her pants.

“I carry a gun,” she points out. “I even know how to use it.”

“Not the point, Katie. I’m your dad and I have nagging rights.”

“Isn’t that supposed to be bragging rights?” It’s perfectly Beckett, if you can’t see her hand.

“So, Rick,” Jim grins. Castle abruptly starts to worry. “That game you convinced Katie to buy for me…”
“Yes?” he says suspiciously. Beckett has tensed up even more.

“Fancy a game now? We’ve only played it with two.”

“Castle’s had lots of experience,” Beckett says quellingly. “It wouldn’t be fair.” That sounds like Beckett wants to leave, but can’t or won’t simply say so, likely for fear of upsetting her father.

“Scared you’ll lose, Beckett?” Castle says automatically.

“I beat you last time,” she snaps back.

“You have this game too, Rick?”

“Oh, that was Beckett’s set.” He realises what he’s said when Jim raises an eyebrow and Beckett pins him with an absolutely appalled glare.

“When was that, Katie?”

“I bought it the same time I got yours. I liked it enough that I thought I’d have it too.”

“And when did you beat Rick?” Castle is reminded that Jim is a lawyer.

“That’s nice. You took my advice.” He fusses around finding his own set and setting it up, thereby missing – though Castle certainly does not – Beckett’s frown. It seems very like Beckett is not happy about whatever the advice was, which Castle surmises is related to her dealings with him. Castle’s feeling that Jim is broadly supportive – at least unless his daughter gets hurt – takes firm root.

The game covers a multitude of sins of omission, Castle discovers. Omission of a huge number of conversational topics, starting but emphatically not finishing with family, friends, social occasions, work, and what Beckett (whom he simply cannot think of as Katie) does in her time off. The last is hardly surprising. Beckett doesn’t seem to have time off. Unfortunately, he also notices that Beckett is resolutely cheerful. Nothing comes out of her mouth – nothing has come out of her mouth since they came in the door – that isn’t positive, bright, cheery and designed to ensure that her father knows absolutely nothing about how she really feels. As far as her conversation with her father goes, she’s living a Mary Poppins life, practically perfect in every way. No-one ever helps Beckett, she had slurred. But she’s not letting her father see that she might need help.

Her father’s easily explained: that’s because she supports him, and doesn’t think that he can support her – or thinks that putting any strain on him will have bad results. So she doesn’t tell him anything. She lets the boys see a little – just the tiniest crack, because she’s had to, to make the team function around her need to support her father at all times. For the same reason, Montgomery knows, and maybe a bit more because he was there before, when Jim was drowning in rye whiskey and Beckett was burying her pain in work. Maybe Lanie knows a little more than the boys – and again Castle wonders what had gone down at that aborted lunch. And he, Castle, knows a lot more than any of them but only as a story. He hasn’t lived any of it.

But now her father’s beginning to suspect that his bright, blazing, beautiful daughter isn’t as brightly burning as she should be; as she’s trying to make him believe.
Please forgive me

“Come on,” Jim encourages his pieces as they progress around the board.

“I told you Castle would win,” Beckett notes.

Castle is indeed winning, though not as easily as he would have liked. Jim’s sharp legal mind is clearly as quick to absorb game strategies as his daughter’s, and Castle is having to put in some effort to stay definitively ahead. Beckett, on the other hand, seems to be almost entirely indifferent to whether she wins or loses. Sure, she’s making all the right noises of disgust or delight, but it’s the same smooth superficial shell which she had assumed as they arrived, and it’s all an act. She is, very subtly and very surprisingly, ensuring that she loses – and therefore that one of he or Jim wins – as quickly as possible without it being spotted. Castle’s conviction that Beckett really, really wants to go home – or leave here – is strengthened. He considers his options, and decides that the general discomfort of the evening and Beckett’s underlying tension should not be increased or prolonged. It then doesn’t take him long to win.

He looks at his watch and fakes startlement at the time. “I’m sorry,” he apologises, “but I need to get home. Sorry to break up the party – and deprive Beckett of her chance for revenge. Thank you for dinner.”

Jim looks a little rueful. “I forgot you would have to get home.”

Beckett bestows a hug on her father, which Castle notices is not precisely the sort of bear hug he’d expect or deliver with Alexis, in either direction. It seems that just as Beckett is constrained around her father, he is likewise constrained around her. “See you Sunday, Dad,” she says. No-one would believe that she wasn’t entirely enthusiastic about the idea. No-one, that is, except Castle. The same brittle stress fractures are in her voice as have been there all evening. He wonders how it can be that Jim doesn’t notice, and then chides himself for stupidity. Jim will never have heard any other type of voice from her since Beckett left Stanford.

Castle expects Beckett to slump, or breathe a sigh of relief, or in some way relax, as soon as they leave. That simply does not happen. He does not, however, expect talking or explanations, and receives neither. They get into Beckett’s car; she maintains her smooth shell; she drives him home and drops him off.

He doesn’t ask where she’s going. He knows.

Beckett parks at the Twelfth, waves casually as she passes through the entrance and gets into the elevator, and attains her desk; where she takes out her papers and switches her computer on. A pile of new papers are skulking on her desk. Only once the accoutrements of her wholly successful career are assembled around her does she allow herself to breathe deeply, dissolve the shell, hunch her shoulders for a moment and then straighten them again – and then go to brew herself a coffee.

She examines her murder board, which has acquired some new decoration which she regards appreciatively, fitting this new information into the murder-map in her head. Ballistics is still awaited – she growls: she wants those results run through the databases as soon as possible – but time of death is confirmed at 5.30 a.m., stomach contents are consistent with not having eaten breakfast – dinner, yes, pasta with a healthy quantity of green vegetables and fruit – and there are some interesting new photos of the friends and relatives. What there is not is any indication of who might have shot Asher Washington, or why. She sips slowly and, as if she were brewing good coffee, allows the information to percolate through her mind.

Back at her desk with another cup of coffee and a dog-eared packet of M&M’s which she had found at the back of her drawer (she is carefully not looking at the sell-by-date, although it is extraordinarily unusual that these have hidden from her for more than a day or so: candy is normally gone in a flash), Beckett begins to review the new papers. They include the results of the phone contacts cross-checking, which throws up nothing untoward – unis can do a first follow up of all of them except the girlfriend, with whom Beckett will deal tomorrow. It’s too late now.

She works her way down the pile, processing and fitting more and more tiles into the mosaic of her thoughts to build a picture. Right at the bottom of the papers, some time later, are the results of the call records. Pay dirt!, she thinks, and also makes a mental note to chew Ryan out for not making sure this was on the top of the pile where she would see it at once. She’s not inclined to give him leeway for not expecting her to see it tonight: since she’s always in before him she would still have had to fight through the rest of the pile to find it before he rolled in. After that, however, she’ll praise him lavishly for his work – as he also deserves – in finding this series of calls. The same number had called Asher three times the previous evening, and been answered all three times, and then at 5a.m. this morning.

Beckett thinks rapidly. If Asher’s phone had been with him while he was running, it’s most likely that he would have stopped running to answer it – everyone does, and lawyers more than most. And that would have given his killer a shot at a stationary target. But Asher didn’t have the phone with him and so the shot was – well, taken on the run, as it were. Her lips twitch with the black humour. So, a much harder shot, and a semi-miss, necessitating the next step, suffocating or drowning Asher in the snow and slush of Hamilton Fish Park.

She riffles back through the papers for the ME’s report. The bruising pattern on the shoulders – ooohhh, and on the back: that was apparently a knee – indicates a reasonably – so she thinks – wide hand span. She puts her own hand on a convenient ruler to try to get an idea of scale. Hmm. Her span is actually not too much smaller. The photo shows that the finger-markings are not unusually widely spaced, which militates against her searching for a tiny keyboard player with a multi-octave stretch. She won’t rule it out – no assumptions at this stage of a homicide investigation – but it’s not a hot prospect. She thinks some more. Castle has large hands, she thinks abruptly, and taps out a text. What’s your hand span if you were pushing someone down?

She’s scowling blackly at the lack of a ballistics report and the complete absence of fingerprints on the body, when her phone rings. This time she looks at it before answering.

“My hands are seven inches wide, without really stretching, if I were pressing down on someone’s shoulders. Why?”

“Checking up,” Beckett says un informatively.

“You’re working the case without me. That’s not fair.”

“I had a thought. Don’t make me regret asking for your input.”

“You should let me” – but the electronic scream of a call waiting interrupts that statement.

“I have to get this,” Beckett says. “Night.”

The call is from O’Leary.
“Beckett, you know that guy – Berowitz – you picked up the other night?”

“Yeah?” Her heart plummets.

“Beat cops picked him up again. D’you need him before I call his wife?”

“No,” she says, forcing her voice not to shake. “No. Call his wife. I don’t need him any more.”

Don’t call me. He’s not my problem. Orders. (But it isn’t quite orders. She’s just choosing to interpret it that way.) He’s Julia’s problem. But she knows that in the very near future her phone will ring and it will be Julia, failing to cope, needing support, needing someone to cling to; she knows that she’ll listen, repeat all her advice; she knows Julia won’t listen to her.

And she knows that, in consequence, tonight she’ll keep on working until she buries her guilt that she can’t or won’t go over to the Berowitzes.

So it transpires, exactly as she had expected. She eventually falls into bed at well past midnight, though at least this time she had gone home. She had considered the break room couch, being nearer, but remembered just in time that she doesn’t have a full change of clothes here. She has no desire for another discussion with Montgomery.

Her late night had enabled her to reach the bottom of the cold case pile. Those hadn’t gone away simply because a new body had dropped. No such luck. However, she thinks smugly, the whole pile is sitting in the out-tray waiting to be returned to whichever unlucky cops were originally responsible. Not only that, but she has prepared the leave request upon which Montgomery had insisted, albeit with gritted teeth. Still, she’s done it. She’s requested to take all her days at Easter, carefully avoiding spring break week, just when he’ll also have to balance all the other non-parental requests. Serve him right. On those satisfying notes, she finally finds sleep.

In the morning, she’s not exactly in bright and early. Early, yes. Bright is not precisely the word. She’s still tired and consequently a little fuzzy-headed, and she aims straight for the coffee machine. The first cup doesn’t touch the sides. The second is a little less desperate. The third actually contains some milk. She heads for her murder board and spends some quality time sitting on the edge of her desk contemplating her evidence and swinging her feet thoughtfully. Then she starts to scribble on a handy pad of paper. When Esposito appears, she’s ready.

“Yo, Beckett.”

“Hey, Espo,” she grins. Espo instantly looks nervous. “I was thinking.” And now he looks downright scared. “Did you get anything from ranges, shooters, that sort of thing?”

“No yet. I put calls out all over, but no-one bit.”

“Keep pushing. That number Ryan found – and why’d he hide it at the bottom of the pile? – did we start tracing it?”

“Started. No result last night, but maybe he’ll get a hit this morning. He was waiting for the triangulation off the towers, to try to get a location.”

Beckett explains her theory about the 5a.m. call. Espo hums as he works through it.

“Makes more sense, that’s for sure. Don’t know anyone who’d set up to shoot a running target.”

“Unless they were skeet shooting,” Castle says happily from behind them. Beckett jumps. Esposito starts. Castle proffers coffee to Beckett, and is impervious to Espo’s half-scowl.
“Skeet shooting?”

“It’s possible,” Esposito says. “But then he might have hit clean.”

“Who is this guy, anyway?” Beckett says with irritation. “Where’s Ryan? I want that number run down.”

Fortuitously, Ryan appears almost upon the word. Less fortuitously, so does Montgomery, who casts an all-encompassing glance around, notes the cold case files with a raised eyebrow, and more pertinently their location piled high in the out-tray; enters his office and clearly discovers the leave request right at the top of his in-tray.

“Detective Beckett, what is this?” he says, dangling it between a finger and thumb tip in case it should explode.

“My leave request. The one which you asked for, sir.”

“ Denied,” Montgomery snaps. “Resubmit, taking at least four of your ten days within the next two weeks.” Beckett’s mouth opens. “If you argue, Detective, you’ll be taking them starting right now, followed by another four unpaid and a write-up for dissent.” Her mouth snaps closed. Nobody around her dares to say a word as she stalks to her chair and begins to stab at her keyboard.

Ryan and Espo decamp to their desks and Ryan, at least, starts to run down the number Beckett wants. Castle plops down into his normal chair and discreetly inspects Beckett as she glares a pair of scorched holes into the screen. Five minutes later she collects a sheet from the printer, slashes an infuriated signature across it, and stalks across the room to deliver it to Montgomery. On the way back, she stops at Ryan’s desk.

“You got that number yet?”

“I’m on it. Soon as I get it, you’ll know.”

She turns to Esposito, with a sharp swish and flick of the tail of her jacket.

“Anything popped on shooters?”

“Not yet. Still running down ranges.”

Beckett makes a noise whose overtone and pitch might be equalled by an F-15 at full after-burn. Fortunately it’s not at the same volume. The precinct windows wouldn’t survive. She turns on her heel and removes herself from the vicinity of the bullpen with a machine-gun rattle of clacking heels.

Castle looks at her form poised in the break room doorway and decides to give her a moment. It would all have worked out beautifully, if Ryan hadn’t high-fived Esposito and bounced up from his desk to go chasing after her.

“Beckett! I got it!”

“The number?”

“Yeah. Dumbass didn’t use a burner phone.”

“What are you waiting for? Go pick him up.”

“Don’t you want to know who was calling?”
“Who?”

“His uncle.”

“What?”

Ryan shrugs. “That’s who the phone’s registered to.”

“What’re you gonna do?”

“I’m going to see if I can find out if Asher had a will, and what his parents’ wills said.” She’s dialling as she finishes the sentence.

Ten minutes later, she’s smiling ferally at the phone as she swipes off. Ten minutes later, by which time the tapping of her fingernails has dug small crescents in her desk, her e-mail pings. She opens the attachments, curses under her breath, and flicks back to the e-mail.

“Thank God. There’s a Cliffs Notes summary.”

Castle springs out the chair to come round and read over her shoulder, leaning on the desk and only just preventing himself touching Beckett. She’s working. Later, however, he’s going to see when she requested that leave. He’s got a plan or two.

“Asher inherited from his parents – but it was on trust till he was twenty-five. We didn’t get that from the earlier search. He was paid a certain amount per month – explains how he could afford the rent – but he wouldn’t get the rest till his birthday. Trustees were – ah. The aunt and uncle. Hmm. Wonder if they were skimming?”

“And if Asher died, all the cash went to them,” Castle says, reading down the rest. “Pretty standard clause.”

“Ryan needs to run their financials. He can do that while I’m talking to them.”

“While we’re talking to them.” Beckett rolls her eyes at him. “What? I know about wills.”

The interview is nasty, brutish, and very short – all on the part of the aunt and uncle. They lawyer up in five minutes flat.

“There’s nothing at all to be done about that,” Beckett growls, as the Washingtons depart.

“Mungojerrie and Rumpelteaser,” Castle says.

“Uh?” Beckett’s mind has already moved on to how to break them.

“Cats. TS Eliot’s Practical Cats, to be precise. Notorious cat burglars.”

“Is this relevant to anything at all?”

“You quoted it.”

“If I did it was accidental. Burglarious fictional felines have nothing to do with this case. Focus, Castle.”
At that point Espo breaks in before the discussion turns into an – er – catfight.

“Beckett, they both shoot. Membership at the Westside Rifle and Pistol Range at 20 West 20th.”

“Yeah?” A little crease forms between her brows. “Both?” In the single word there’s the note that means she’s running shifts of possibilities and variants. “But that means” –

“that either of them” –

“could have shot him,” they say together. Esposito muffles a snigger.

“Right,” she raps. “Ryan!”

“Yo, boss?”

“Financials. Fast as you can. Espo, get down to that range and find out how good this pair are.” She bares her teeth in something that is definitely not a smile. “Castle, later on we’re going to get them back and sucker them. If they double teamed, then we’re going to find that Uncle Carson’s got a perfect alibi, and Aunt Estelle doesn’t. No-one ever expects that the woman’s the better shot. Once we’ve got financials and the range’s story, we’ll have enough for a warrant. That can be executed while we’re interviewing them.” Another tigerish flash of teeth. “Got them.”

“Got who?”

“The Washingtons, sir.”

“Good work. Explain.” Beckett does. Montgomery matches her shark-like smile. “Okay, Beckett. Get the warrant typed up as soon as you can and make it happen.” He pauses and regards her in his most Captainly fashion. Beckett has a single instant in which the smile starts to slide off her face and realisation replaces it like snow turning to slush and flowing into a drain. “As soon as this case is done, you take your first days, and don’t be here till Monday. The rest of your leave request is granted.”

He smiles seraphically at the assembled team and wanders off to his office, leaving the Beckett bombshell to tick-tock down to detonation. At least, that’s what Castle expects.

She can’t react. She can’t explode. Standing and screaming obscenities in the middle of the bullpen is not who she is. She’s coped with all the rest of her life by locking down and never letting her feelings show and she can and will do it now. She pulls all her emotions back down inside her head and looks round at the three men.

“Right. I want my days off,” she says. “So let’s get this done.” Before anyone can say anything, she disappears in the direction of the one place none of them can follow.

The restroom is cool and quiet. Beckett breathes deeply and runs the water till it’s cold, then soaks her hands to the wrists in it: using the chill to cool her own hot-running anger. She stands there, still and silent, for several moments, until she’s calm enough to go back. She doesn’t want time off. She doesn’t want to be at home: prey to the possibilities that Julia will call; that Lanie will force her way in; that her father will make his expectations clear – clearer; that Castle might use it as an opportunity to push her further and faster than she’s capable of dealing with. He always pushes, and whatever he might have said the other night about – in summary – accepting the situation, she doesn’t believe that he won’t push the pace. He’ll want more, he’ll want too much, and she has very little left to give. And yet the warmth of his hand over hers in the car yesterday, and the warmth of his big body around her on other occasions, had helped: had let her find her own still centre and start to refill her
She dries her hands, and walks back out into the bullpen, perfectly composed.
Hanging on the telephone

Two hours later Ryan has produced financials, Esposito has extracted vast quantities of information and shooting statistics from the range – and from the smug grin he’s displaying has done it by spending some time showing off to the range officer – and between them all they are moving matters around the murder board like pieces in a chess game. White Queen to move and mate in two. Two perpetrators in Interrogation, that will be. All Beckett needs now is the signed warrant, and she’s typing at machinegun pace to finish it off and find a handy judge. With a final decisive tap of the Enter key, she stretches up and sighs.

“That’s it sent. I’ll give it a few minutes and then call the court to finish it off. As soon as it’s e-mailed back, we’ll start. Castle, uniforms’ll go pick them up. When we get them in I want to look at handspans. Ryan, Espo, you two supervise the search. We’re looking for the GoPro in particular.” She stands up and stretches again. “We’ll hit them with the money first.” Pause. “I need a coffee.” She aims for the break room, Castle following.

He watches her quick, competent hands creating two cups of coffee and pushing one in his direction while already drinking her own, noticing more today the tell-tale small callouses from shooting practice, as the current case is all about shooting. There’s no indication at all of what she may feel about her enforced vacation days, no indication of anything other than her desire to wrap up the case.

“If we break them,” Castle opens, “before dinner time,” – Beckett turns a gaze on him which says louder than words What do you mean if? When – “then d’you want to go get a burger after?”

There’s an uncomfortable silence, not at all disguised by Beckett continuing to swallow down her coffee. Castle thinks she’s about to refuse.

“I don’t know. Leave it,” she says, before he can start to persuade her. “Leave it till later.” The fractures are back in her tone. Castle slides a little closer and brushes a finger over her waist, swift enough to be undemanding, slow enough to make a point.

“Later, then.” His finger traces over her hand as she puts the emptied cup down. His voice drops. “Or we could simply go to yours and get takeout.” He quits the break room before she can answer, leaving his silky words to work on her.

The warrant has come through while they’ve been drinking coffee, and suddenly it’s all speed and bustle and uniforms going off and Ryan and Espo following with identically happily predatory smiles at the prospect of closing this case down and not needing to do any more overtime. Beckett doesn’t look nearly as happy at that idea as would relieve Castle of a nagging worry that Montgomery’s pushed Beckett the wrong way. She might have said she wanted her vacation days but he doesn’t believe that.

“Why have my clients been arrested?” a sharp-suited attorney demands.

“Because your clients have been skimming money from Asher Washington’s trust fund, and he would have found out next month, after his twenty-fifth birthday.” Beckett is short, forceful, and absolutely certain.

“We did not!”

“Don’t say a word,” the lawyer says.

“I can prove you did. Here” – Beckett tosses a bundle of statements across the table – “are the withdrawals you made from the trust fund account and the corresponding amounts arriving in your bank account.”

“Asher knew all about them and agreed.”

“Did he? That’s not what he told his colleague, when he asked him for some advice.” She’s bluffing, but she hasn’t told a lie. Castle may be a wordsmith, but in the interrogation room she’s as brilliant with words as he. Estelle has paled to corpse-like grey. Her hands are flat on the table. Beckett looks at the span. Her hands aren’t unusually large, but they’re wider than Beckett’s.

“We’re searching your apartment now. If we find Asher’s GoPro there…” she lets the implication hang in the air. “Even if we don’t we’ve enough to send you down for grand larceny, and then I’ll take your hand span and I’ll prove that you held Asher down after you shot him so he drowned in the slush.”

“What did you do, Estelle?”

Beckett turns on Carson Washington. “Don’t start down that line. You called Asher just at the time he passed the pool. You knew he’d stop to take a call.” She drills a hard stare at both of them.

“You told me he always took the same route. So you knew just when to ring so your wife could take the shot. But he didn’t have his phone so she took the shot anyway.”

“This is all conjecture. You have no evidence.”

“We have the financials, the phone records, and enough to send your clients down already.” She shoves back from the table and stands. “You’ll be taken down for processing and then into Holding.”

At that point Ryan knocks. Beckett exits, Castle on her heels. “We got it. In the trash in their building.”

“Good work.” Beckett re-enters Interrogation.

“We found Asher’s camera when we searched your apartment.”

“That doesn’t prove anything,” the lawyer says contemptuously.

“Really? Because that camera was on Asher’s head when he was running – and when he was shot.”

“You can’t possibly make that statement, Detective.”

“It was transmitting to his Facebook account.” Castle says, with a nasty gotcha expression.

“Every five minutes,” Beckett adds. “Right up until it stopped. We have timed photo evidence. The only way that camera got from Asher to your apartment is if one of you took it.”

Estelle crumples. Carson lets out a defeated sigh. The lawyer looks bleak. “May I have a minute with my clients, please?” he says. Beckett nods once, sharply, and stands again.

Outside Interrogation Castle turns to her, carefully maintaining a sensible separation. “Looks like you got them, Beckett.”

“We got them. All of us.” Well. Well now. Castle didn’t exactly think that he’d contributed a lot to this case, unlike some others. But he’s not going to turn down being in Beckett’s good books either, and if she thinks he helped he’ll take that. Her expression is a strange mixture of deep satisfaction at the win and unhappiness that now she’ll have to take her two days of vacation.
The lawyer pokes his head out the door. “My clients would like to make a statement.”

And state they do. Anything and everything that they think will exculpate them from Murder One. Castle listens with ever-increasing disgust as they whine about their poverty (their apartment alone is worth way over a million dollars) and how much they’d done for Asher (very little: he was already in the first year of college when his parents died) and… and… but Beckett’s switched off next to him. She hadn’t – they hadn’t – known that. Suddenly she re-focuses. No-one who didn’t know her would have noticed the instant’s blankness; the biting tension that scraped across her back and whitened her knuckles and that she then put away. He will be leaving with her, and spending the evening with her, and letting her dissolve that stress in whatever way she chooses to refill her reserves. Whatever she chooses: whether that’s food, or soda – not vodka – or games – board or adult – or simply affection and soothing silence.

He says nothing about her momentary pause when it’s all over and the Washingtons, still making excuses for their greed-induced murder, are taken away. Beckett’s writing up the report as tidily and efficiently as always: clearing the paperwork before she has to leave.

“So, Detective. Dinner at Remy’s or takeout for two?” he murmurs mischievously: eyes twinkling within the laughter lines. She taps out a few more words, finishing a section, presses Save, and looks up, briefly.

“Takeout,” she says tiredly, distracted, he thinks, by the need to finish the report and the unwanted prospect of her enforced leave. His mischief hasn’t registered at all.

“Sure. Thai?”

“Okay.”

And so when she finally slashes her signature across the report and files it, tidies her desk and shuts her computer down so that she can leave, Castle pads along and out beside her, not drawing attention to himself. He’s settled in the passenger seat before Beckett even notices properly, and then she doesn’t object: simply sighs a quietly exhausted sigh.

“Time for you to go home. What do you want to eat?”

“Pad Thai. Shrimp.”

Castle taps out an order, puts in Beckett’s address, assesses the traffic and the likely delivery time, and puts a thirty minute delay on delivery. Beckett is clearly using all her remaining concentration to drive: and she’s aiming for hers, not Broome Street, which means that either she doesn’t object to his having invited himself for dinner or (more likely) she’s too tired to have realised. He wonders vaguely when – or if – she slept last night. He wonders much more intensely what triggered such tiredness. Okay, he knows she went back to the precinct, but she called him relatively early in the evening… Oh yes, that call she took that cut his call short. Hmm. How to find out what that was all about?

An answer hasn’t occurred to him by the time they reach Beckett’s, but then he isn’t being politely requested to leave either. Since they’re now inside, and there will be a short delay before dinner arrives, that leaves a number of options. He goes with the easy one: sitting on the couch next to Beckett, who has disposed of her gun, badge and heels and slumped down into the corner; putting an arm round her – and not asking what’s tired her out.

Astoundingly, it works. She nestles in a little more closely – not nearly closely enough for Castle’s taste, but it’s a start – and then lays her head on his shoulder, which is definitely to his taste. He pats “Dinner should be here in about twenty minutes.”

“Good,” she replies, and leaves it at that. Strangely, the silence isn’t chill, or intimidating, or even blocking the possibility of questions or answers. More astoundingly, after another moment, she speaks. It’s as if she’s too tired to filter her thoughts, too exhausted to hold her barriers against him. Against everyone.

“O’Leary called last night. Picked up Mr Berowitz again.” Her words are slow, forced out against remembered pain; memories of taking those calls. “Wanted to know if I needed him.” Her voice trails dismally through the silence. “I said no.” Misery begins to tinge the previously comfortable silence. “He was Julia’s problem. Not mine.” She gulps in air. “She needed to go get him. Not me.”

“Not you?”

“Julia called me. Wanted me to be there. Wanted help. I listened.” She stops. “Told her where to get help.” Castle’s hand tightens around her upper arm. “I wouldn’t go to her.” Another gulp. “She cried. Dad… Dad used to cry.” She pulls right away. “I wouldn’t go,” she says again, bitter agony laced through each word. She stands, and walks to the kitchen, stiff-backed, pulls plates from a cupboard and cutlery from a drawer; two glasses and a jug from another cupboard; fills the jug with water, sets the whole lot at the table. Opposite each other, not side by side. All the brief openness is gone.

The door sounds at that point, and Castle stands up to answer it and bring in the takeout. Setting it out covers the silence, and eating more so. Eventually, though, it’s done, the table is cleared, and there are no longer any ordinary courtesies, offers to share sides or to try each other’s dishes, to break the suffocating weight of memories and guilt.

Castle looks at Beckett’s rigid spine as she fusses with the kettle and coffee, waits until she’s put everything down on the table in front of the couch, and then steps up to her, places both hands on her waist and smoothly draws her into him. He doesn’t yet kiss her, simply holds her close and waits till she should soften and curve and lean on him.

Except that isn’t happening. She’s held rigid by unhappiness, instead of softly in his arms, and it seems that holding is not enough to change that. So, as before, as every time, he smooths his hand over her back to end by tipping her head up, bends the few inches to kiss her, takes and keeps possession of her mouth and shows his strength not by muscular grip but with soft, sure assertion that draws her in – and draws her tension out. Slowly she eases, stands down, leans into him and on him; but her hands are still at her sides, limp and lax. He ceases kissing, but doesn’t move his hands, keeping her against him, foreheads touching, and then he shifts her head so it’s lying on his shoulder, tucked into his neck; turns and seats them both, she on his lap and still leaning in.

“He would cry, and beg me to come and get him. I wouldn’t go. I wouldn’t answer. He’d cry and beg until my voicemail was full. I never went to him. I just let him cry.”

Castle abruptly realises that Beckett had never blocked her father’s number; and worse, that she’d heard each desperate, drunken plea. She had forced herself to listen and not to answer, or go. That must have taken inordinate self-control – and fed her inordinate guilt. She’d made herself suffer: self-flagellation to punish herself for leaving her father alone – and she may not know it but she’s still doing exactly that. She owes the Berowitzes nothing now she’s found them justice, but still she pours out help and then feels guilty when she said no more. She won’t show her father anything that isn’t bright success and cheerfulness – and won’t disagree, get irritated, get angry, or be upset however much it might be justified. However much he might need to hear it. Over-compensating.

He thinks, again, that Beckett really needs some external help. He just doesn’t know how to suggest it. So he doesn’t, just sits with her in his arms and exudes solid comfort and affection, giving her a chance to stabilise, petting her hair gently and – well, she is right here and he is only human and male – watching for another chance to kiss her. Kisses seem to help.

Talking to Jim will not help, and he shouldn’t even be thinking that he might. It’s not up to him to interfere. It really isn’t, and she’ll run like a rabbit if he does. Beckett needs to talk to her father – which is almost as likely as her taking the leading role in an outdoor production of Lady Godiva in Central Park. But… for as long as she won’t understand that she’s burying her guilt and unhappiness, for as long as she doesn’t understand that she hasn’t forgiven herself and probably hasn’t really forgiven her father… that’s not going to happen.

He kisses the top of her ear, peeking through her hair. She wriggles a fraction, not away from him, more to make herself comfortable; her hair falls away and reveals some more of the edge of her ear. Castle kisses that, too, and when there’s a tiny little hum, barely audible, drops butterfly kisses down it. Comfort is his main aim, though he won’t say no to providing anything more.

He has an idea. “Would your dad talk to Mrs Berowitz?”

“Oh? What?” Beckett wakes up from her miserable stupor and stares at him. “Why?”

“Well…” Castle’s thinking hadn’t got past the initial idea. He rapidly assembles his thoughts into some vague semblance of order. “I just thought that maybe he could tell her that she can’t make it work. From the perspective of Mr Berowitz. I thought if she heard it from someone who’s been there and done that and come out the other side, she might believe it.” Beckett’s face is flabbergasted. “I know she heard it from you, but if she heard it from your dad it might have more impact.” He stops. Beckett is utterly still.

“My dad?” she says, dumbfounded. “My dad?” But she hasn’t dismissed the idea out of hand, she isn’t crying, and she hasn’t shot him. Yet.

Beckett’s brain is fried. She would never, ever have thought of that. Never. She’s so used to thinking of her father as a man who needs help and support, that she’d never have turned her head round the idea that he could give it. (He certainly hadn’t given it to her – but that was then, and this is now, and she hasn’t asked him in five years.) At first blush it sounds like a way out Castle theory on a par with CIA spies and Men in Black aliens… but in among Castle’s way out theories there are often some workable ideas. This… might just be one of them. She eases down from her shocked stillness, and starts to think.

Pro: it might actually bring the truth home to Julia. That’s a huge advantage. Con: her dad has never met Julia and this is going to come out of nowhere. He might spook, and spooking might be fatal. Pro: she could be there to stop him spooking. Con: Julia might start to cling to her dad, which would not be helpful. (A nasty little voice says at least it wouldn’t be you. She squashes it, with venom.) Um. Pros seem to outweigh the cons, here. Probably. Enough to talk to her dad. Yes. Okay.

“Okay.” She nestles back in. “Let’s talk to Dad about it. See what he says.” She lays her head back on Castle’s ample shoulder, tired simply from making the decision. He’s nice and cosy and comforting. She likes being cosy and she likes being petted and finally Castle seems to be back in a place where he will do both and take a gentle lead and not ask any questions at all. She wriggles into a perfectly comfortable alignment, curls herself up against him and finds with a complete lack of surprise that she is gathered in and held close.
It’s even less of a surprise when Castle, after a particularly short pause, encourages her to look up at him by carefully moving her head off his shoulder, and starts again where he left off before his idea, dropping little kisses round her face and finally ending up on her lips. She opens to the first touch of his tongue asking for entrance, and lets herself fall into the sensuality that surrounds her: firm mouth, firm hands, firm muscle in the chest and arms between which she is held. Assertion, affection, and no pressure to do or be or answer or support.

It’s everything she needs, right now.
In the darkness

Castle is unsurprised to find that Beckett has dissolved into soft Kat, open to being kissed and petted and possibly more. He’s dropped one major bombshell idea on her, and that’s definitely enough. Beckett is not fond of surprises. If she’s fallen into being Kat, it’s because she’s finally relaxed and feels – well, safe with him. For now. So don’t spoil it, Rick. You know what to do – and what not to do. And what to do is to kiss her firmly and deeply and to let her responses tell him where to take her after that. It’s already late, and she’s already exhausted, and even if she needn’t go to work tomorrow he’s not an oafish boor.

She makes a small, contented noise: not quite a purr, not merely a hum; and stays open to kisses and cosseting and petting without taking any action herself that would indicate a desire for anything more. She’s as cuddlesome as she’s ever been, and he is not inclined to refuse her the affection she so clearly wants – and more clearly needs. Anyway, he’s missed this easeful closeness, the lack of any need to move further or to do more: he doesn’t need to be anything more than her lover; he doesn’t need to perform or show off or prove himself. In fact, those are all tied up with the feeling of being second-best that had plagued him following the spectacularly good, but slick and meaningless, sex. He’s always felt much happier after gentle making out and letting that take them where they will.

He concentrates on kissing her some more, deep and possessive, but not rough, not demanding, not overwhelming. Enough to show her how much she should be his, how much he wants her, how deeply he cares; enough to prove that this is – must be – more than physical. She still fits. Even now he knows her story – most of her story, maybe not all but enough – she fits in his arms and his mind and, he hopes, will fit into his life. Eventually. For now, he needs to be easy and take this easy. There are enough difficulties already in their way without creating more.

Beckett is happy simply to be kissed. She’s run out of energy, and of the ability to maintain her barriers, so it’s just as well that it’s only Castle here: Castle who’s heard the worst already and hasn’t – yet – run. She still can’t really believe that she’ll ever be enough, but for now this is enough. She doesn’t need more. Only rest, respite, and being moored in the haven of his protective embrace. Worrying about everything else can wait till tomorrow, when she has the vast empty void of the dank February day, stretching greyly before her: the only break in the void being the unwelcome memory that she will have to see Lanie tomorrow night.

Seeing Lanie is not appealing. Not seeing Lanie, however, is likely to be momentarily satisfying and then productive only of more trouble. Lanie is already making far too many ill-tempered enquiries and Beckett has already given away far too much. She shudders, despite her best efforts not to, and when Castle stops kissing her in consequence, buries her head in his shirt and shrinks back into herself.

“You okay?” he asks. Beckett can hear him not asking anything else, and even through her re-asserted bleakness, appreciates the effort. Still, she doesn’t look up at him.

“Yeah,” she drags out. “Just… Lanie.”

Castle understands far more from that than he expects Beckett knows or would want. Lanie had been discomposed and somewhat annoyed on Monday, never mind that pointed exchange in the morgue yesterday. Their lunch had not gone well and Beckett’s been skittish around her ever since. Castle concludes from the accumulation of small clues that Beckett had said something on Monday lunchtime that either she hadn’t meant to, or that Lanie hadn’t liked, or that Beckett thinks Lanie hadn’t liked. Which of those options, singly or in combination, it might be is anybody’s guess.
“Leave Lanie be. Come back here instead.” Castle’s tone has dropped into a deeper register, a little more assertive, a little more seductive, a little more insistent that she should simply stop thinking and start relaxing into him. It becomes apparent to Beckett that he would be perfectly prepared to help her stop thinking. She curls back in and lets him take hold of her again, her head back on his shoulder and all her exhaustion breaking over her. It’s been a long day, and even if it’s not late, she should be seeking her bed. Alone. Even if she’d like nothing more than simply to be held, cuddled and cosseted and close; breathing in the indefinably soothing scent of wide, warm male – well, no. Of Castle – and falling asleep on the tendrils of his cologne winding through the air.

But that is not a good plan. It really is not a good plan. It’s too much, when she’s so empty. He could fill up not just her body but her mind and her soul: take over her life and personality. She’s a flat grey canvas, where he’s in Technicolor 3-D. It’s too tempting, and too easy, and she can’t.

She can’t even watch him with his family. She has a brief vision of how he is with his daughter, in the welcoming warmth of his loft, and still cannot face watching it for real. Even now. It’s too much like what she once had and doesn’t have and even if now that her father’s a touch more fatherly she can’t get past the last ten years just like that.

None of her thoughts show on her face. “I need to sleep,” she half-yawns. Castle cuddles her in and does precisely nothing to help her with moving away from her nest in his lap. Rather the reverse, in fact. Moving means effort, and effort means that she’ll have to sit up straight, and unfold her legs, and stand up, and walk. Even making the first movement involves pushing against the static resistance of Castle’s clasp.

Oh. Castle is moving. Well, that saves her the trouble. He rearranges himself to the edge of the couch, although strangely she’s still on his knee, and then stands her up as he himself does. He manages this feat without ever letting go of her, and when they are both standing, he’s caught her against him in a smoothly powerful grip which is swiftly followed by a smoothly possessive kiss, both of which, she is sure, are designed to show her just how much strength he can apply at times when she wants – or is it needs? – it. And she does want it (him), and she does need it (him) – but it’s still a very bad plan, though it’s difficult to remember why that should be so when his tongue is in her mouth and his hands are keeping her pulled into him and his hard body is pressing into hers. Everything’s on offer, but she doesn’t have the emotional capital to purchase it. Her self-view that she’s simply no longer capable of giving any emotions back is stopping her moving forward. She’s been locked into her own frozen world for so long that she doesn’t know how to get out. She doesn’t even know that she needs to find a way out.

She pulls away, diminished and slumped. “Stop.” He does, immediately, loosens his grip and looks down at her, concern sliding through his eyes.

“It’s okay, Beckett,” he says.

“It’s not okay. You shouldn’t be wasting your time here. I can’t even face going to yours. Can’t bear seeing your happy family. It’ll never be enough. I’ll never be enough.” She steps away from him, white and drawn, pain in her eyes; forgetting her resolution to try.

“You’re doing it again. Trying to make me run away. I told you that you don’t need to worry about this. You don’t need to worry about anything about this. If I think you’re enough that’s up to me. If you don’t want to do this, that’s different, but that’s not what you’re saying or doing. I’m all grown up and I know what I want and what I’m doing. And what I want is you.” He takes the single long stride that’s all he needs to reach her again. “Now come back here and stop being unhappy,” he says firmly, tucks her right back in and kisses her without a hint of doubt. She yields under his certainty: cedes control and lets him take as he pleases. She doesn’t want to fight it: wants to slip under the radar and be soft Kat who can stop supporting everyone, only for a little while. Only for now, while he still thinks he wants her. So she sinks into his kisses and curves into his body and lets her mind dissolve into sensation.

Castle wants to kiss Beckett or Kat right into her bed and then move on from kissing to considerably more intimate connections: trying to find her under the layers of icy unhappiness, trying to find her, find where she’s hiding from him. He’s not sure she knows that she’s hiding at all: everything she says indicates that she thinks this shell is who she now is: poured out till she’s empty.

But life’s not like that: people don’t stay empty, they refill, restart. Love is endless, infinitely replenished. It’s a river, not a pool, flowing continuously. It’s only that Beckett pours out too much, too fast, and has nothing – so she thinks – poured back in. Drawing too much from her aquifer, and not waiting for it to refill. Not letting it refill, because she’s not letting herself absorb anything from anyone. Love may be infinite, but if it’s only going one way the flow will fade to a trickle.

He wants to kiss her right into her bed and make love to her. He’s going to do the right thing, the hard choice, kiss her the way he wants to but then step back and leave. It wouldn’t be making love: he’s not sure it ever has been making love, and he is no longer going to be satisfied with anything less. So tonight he is going to go home, and think, and tomorrow, not too early, he is going to come back round and they are going to talk through his plan to detach Beckett from Julia Berowitz by use of Jim Beckett.

Still, he kisses her smoothly, deep, sure and still wholly possessive as she’s painted over his body, all his confident stability and strength at her disposal. For all her trained muscles and honed fitness, she’s very soft right now. Slow strokes slide over her back, firm mouth takes hers until he has to stop, because more will mean they won’t stop.

“Time for me to go,” he murmurs.

“Yeah,” she says. “See you Monday.” She’s completely neutral: not asking for anything. Clearly, she’s not expecting anything. It’s all up to him and she isn’t going to ask.

“No. I’ll be by tomorrow, around eleven.” She looks up, quickly, down again. “We’re going to talk about Mrs Berowitz talking to your dad, a bit more, when we’ve both slept on it. Make sure that it’s still a good idea in the morning. And,” he smiles, “I wanna see you tomorrow. Off duty. See what my Beckett does in the daytime when she’s not detecting.”

She’s gaping at him. He takes advantage of her befuddlement, kisses the tip of her nose and escapes before she realises that he’s completely contradicted her suggestion – and more importantly before she realises what he has just said. That had just… slipped out. His Beckett? Ooops. Even if it had felt totally natural and amazingly good on his tongue. He’s most of the way to the elevator before he hears what sounds like a muffled – that’ll be the door muffling it – squawk. Best to be out of here. He can’t outrun a bullet, unlike he can a squawk.

His loft is quiet and peaceful: comfortingly happy and cheerful even without the noise and bustle of his eclectic family, all bouncing around and off each other like affectionate pinballs. He pours himself a glass of wine and repairs to the couch to ponder his idea. The more he ponders, the better he likes it. Jim and his daughter may be completely uncomfortable around each other – and both hiding it – but Jim hadn’t hesitated to push him, Castle, very hard indeed and clearly isn’t nearly the clinging vine that his daughter thinks he might be. Neither, too, is Beckett the strong-rooted oak her father believes her to be. Hm. This idea might have more advantages than simply showing Beckett that her father is stronger than she thinks. It might just show Jim that Beckett is in trouble of her own. He doesn’t think he’ll mention that, though.
Beckett doesn’t think at all. She puts herself to bed and is instantly asleep, exhaustion overtaking her. She doesn’t wake, and if she dreams she doesn’t remember that either.

She wakes slowly, unwilling to leave her cocoon of bedclothes for the empty stretch of the day and the extremely unpleasant thought that one way or another she’ll have to put up with Lanie’s unspoken but obvious condemnation and intrusive questioning. Still, it’ll be the only time. By the end of their evening Lanie’ll never come near her outside work again. Lanie’s going to try to force her to talk about it, and she isn’t going to, and after about an hour Lanie’ll lose it, and she’ll go home, and that will be that.

She drifts in and out of sleep for a while, until she realises it’s after nine and remembers that Castle promised – or threatened – to arrive at eleven. She lurches out of bed and into the shower and then into jeans and a soft, warm green jumper of which she’s particularly fond. Coffee helps. Coffee always helps. She texts Lanie a time and a place – at least that way she’s in control of the timing and Lanie will not come barrelling round to force a fight here where the only option will be throwing her out bodily. Not discreet, quiet or controlled, that. Not at all. She can get through this without being anything other than cool, calm and polite. She forcibly puts it out of her mind.

When Castle shows up, she’s quietly reading and sipping a third cup of coffee; not thinking about anything else at all. The rap on her door is somehow happy and bouncy, very much like Castle used to be right up until Christmas, has been since a little after he’d met her father on her doorstep. She opens the door with her normal sardonic personality firmly in place.

It doesn’t last past the first minute. Castle tidily closes the door behind him, hangs up his coat and scarf, and almost in the same movement grasps Beckett by the waist, tugs her inexorably towards him, and when she lands up where he wanted her runs his hand up into her hair, angles her head for easy access, and takes silky possession of her mouth before he’s even said hey.

“You taste of coffee,” he smiles. “I could get used to that.”

“Really?” she says cynically. “You can get coffee on every street corner. Or if that’s not enough for you, you could move to Seattle, where it’s every second shop.”

“This is much nicer. Shop bought coffee doesn’t taste like this.” He bends a little and takes her mouth again before she can complain further. Far too late for her composure he stops. “That’s much better.” He strokes her hair down where he’s ruffled it up, and continues down to the soft green angora of her jumper. “That’s nice, too.” He grins happily. “Very strokable.”

“I didn’t put it on just so you could compensate for not having a pet rabbit when you were a child.”

“Aw. You should have.” He strokes over her shoulder and down her back. “You’d be ample compensation.”

“I am not a pet.”

“No,” he says amiably. “Pets are small, soft and fluffy. You’re tall.”

“And not soft or fluffy.”

“That too.” He carefully doesn’t point out that under his kisses and hands she can be very soft indeed, and that the jumper is the closest thing to fluffy that she could be wearing except for live angora rabbits. Which would be silly. They’d probably run away, and then she wouldn’t be wearing anything at all... This is not a good line of thought. He pulls his errant mind back on to a track where it won’t get him committed or arrested, and where they won’t be ending up in bed in around…ooohhh… five minutes or so.

“Did you think about what I said?”

“Do you want coffee?” Beckett says, completely ignoring his words.

“Please.” He gives her that concession, but once they’ve sat down with the mugs, he begins again. “I thought about it some more, and the more I thought the more I think your dad could really help Mrs Berowitz.”

“Why?” It’s her work tone, not quite interrogative, more the one she applies to any moderately recalcitrant witness.

“Well, she’s not listening to you, even though you’ve” – he hopes this isn’t about to go horribly wrong – “been where she is, so maybe she’ll listen to someone who’s been where her husband is and who’s come through it. See that it can be done – and how.”

Beckett stares into her coffee mug. It had seemed like a possible idea last night. But in the cold light of morning, she wonders if this isn’t just shirking her duty to help: passing it off to someone else because she doesn’t want to carry on. She’s already said no to Julia once, and it’s still squirming guiltily in her gut that she did.

“She’s not Dad’s problem,” she says. “It’s not fair to drag him into it.”

“She’s not your problem either,” Castle points out very bluntly. “You shouldn’t be dragged into it either.”

“She needs me.”

“No, she needs help. It doesn’t have to be you who gives it to her. You’re helping her try to find the right help, but that isn’t you. She’s not listening to your experience so you’re not the right help. Besides which, I think your dad might be happy to help you out.”

“He shouldn’t have to.”

“How d’you know he wouldn’t want to if you don’t even ask? He can always say no.”

“Yeah, right,” she says bitterly. “Because his history of saying no is so good.”

“That’s not fair. He’s said no for five years to his addiction. If he can say no to that every hour of every day, he can certainly say no to this.”

Beckett subsides. Put like that, she is being unfair to her dad. She winces. She’s just let slip that she really doesn’t quite trust him, still, after five years’ sober and counting. She hunches around her coffee cup. After a moment, Castle’s arm arrives around her shoulders. She retreats further into herself.

“So what do you think?”

She shrugs. Castle clearly has every intention of getting his own way again. But it’s she who will have to pick up the pieces if it doesn’t work. Though she’s the one who’s picking up the pieces of Julia Berowitz anyway.

“I don’t know. It’s not Dad’s problem.”

“Let’s not do it, then.” Perversely, Castle’s caving in to her objections sends her down the path of thinking why not?

“But… you just said it was a good idea.”

“Yeah, but he’s your dad. If you don’t think he can handle it, you know him best.”

She stops on that. Does she really know what her father can handle? He can handle those conferences, albeit he calls his sponsor and he calls her every time he needs to. But he’s a thousand miles away, and calling isn’t the same as someone taking the glass away from him. He has to do that himself, every time. Maybe… maybe he’s stronger than she thinks.

“Let’s ask him,” she says, still uncertainty in her voice. “Tomorrow. He’s at work today.”

“We could go ask him tonight.”

“Can’t. I’m busy.”

“Busy?” Castle is shocked. He’d had plans for the rest of the day and the evening, and it hadn’t involved Beckett being busy.

“Lanie.” Beckett doesn’t sound precisely enthusiastic. Castle remembers that she’d said to Lanie that she’d see her Friday, in the morgue. He’d rather thought that it wasn’t going to happen, but it seems like it is.

“Oh. Well, let’s go do something fun.”

“Like what?”

“I’ll buy lunch and then we’ll work it out. C’mon. I can hear a pizza calling to me.”
Ensconced in a comfortably informal pizza joint with satisfyingly large quantities of pizza – separately: Castle declares that pizza requires anchovies and Beckett declares that no anchovy will ever pass her lips – in front of them, the question of how to fill the remains of the day stays unanswered for some time while the consumption of pizza takes precedence.

“So what shall we do?”

Beckett munches her pizza and doesn’t answer.

“When are you meeting Lanie?”

“Six.” That’s bitten off.

“Can I come too?” Castle says annoyingly.

“No.” He pouts. “No. Women only.”

“What can we do between now and six?” Castle muses. “I mean, I can think of lots of things” – he leers – “but you’ll only say that they’re inappropriate and then I’ll be upset and we won’t have any fun at all if I’m upset.”

Beckett looks remarkably unimpressed. “I think I can occupy myself if you start sulking,” she points out.

“I don’t sulk.”

“You’re pouting right now.”

“I am not.” Beckett flips on her phone and takes a picture.

“See?”

“That is not a pout.” Beckett raises a disbelieving eyebrow. “It’s an expression of dismay.”

“Otherwise known as a pout.”

“Let’s have coffee,” Castle diverts. “We still haven’t worked out what we’re going to do.”

“We?”

“We,” he says firmly, and before she can quibble carries on. “What would you normally do on your days off?”

“Chores,” Beckett says. His face falls.

“Really? Nothing interesting?”

“Nope. We don’t all have cleaning services and personal shoppers.”

“I don’t have a personal shopper. I do all my own shopping.” He doesn’t comment on the cleaning service. Of course he has one. Wouldn’t everyone, if they could afford it? He has memories of his mother cleaning to keep their bodies and souls together, in between parts – and sometimes during.
He remembers the reddened hands and callouses; the way she’d stretched up and breathed deeply, painfully. He’d rather use a trusted agency with the latest equipment and safety standards – and never have to do it himself.

“Today’s a vacation day. No chores. C’mon. Think of something you’d like to do and haven’t done. I’m completely at your disposal, handsome face, rugged body and all.” He waggles his eyebrows. Beckett acquires a wholly bored expression which is only redeemed by the fact that she quite deliberately assumed it and she knows that he knows that she did. She says nothing. “There must be something you want to do?”

“No.”

“Are you sure you want me to choose? I might suggest something you hate. Like a Brussels sprout tasting extravaganza.”

She makes an absolutely disgusted face. “No Brussels sprouts. Ugh.”

Castle thinks for a moment. “I know. Let’s go to the Paris/New York design exhibition. It’ll be interesting.”

They get the subway to 103rd Street. It’s easiest and fastest, Beckett points out, and ignores Castle’s grumbling. Castle would have preferred a cab, in which he could readily have indulged in some mild hugging and general cuddling-in. The subway is not conducive to either, and he is quite sure that Beckett will not need his help to balance herself.

Indeed she doesn’t, and the subway isn’t nearly busy enough for him to be able to find a good excuse to press against her. Where are the crowds when you need them? Crowds do not happen, tourists are not present on a cold Friday in February, and there is no more excuse to be cuddlesome at the end of the journey than at the beginning.

The exhibition is actually interesting. Naturally, they disagree about what’s interesting, and disagree more about the relative merits of Art Deco over neo-romanticism – surprisingly, it’s Castle who argues for Art Deco and Beckett who prefers neo-romantics. Most people who knew them both would have thought it would be the other way round. Castle thinks about the swirling, inchoate abstracts in Beckett’s apartment and understands why she wouldn’t want the clean lines and curves of Art Deco. Too precise for the soft, rarely-seen Kat who sometimes, only sometimes and only at home, inhabits the otherwise commanding, decisive, rigid-certaintied Beckett.

For the first time in several weeks, indeed almost a couple of months, they’re wandering around in reasonable harmony, quarrelling gently about their respective preferences and artistic or architectural merits of each display. Castle’s extensive travelling gives him a broader appreciation, Beckett deeper and rather narrower. The afternoon passes almost without them noticing, punctuated by a short visit to the café where Beckett insists on paying for the coffee and Castle humphs disgustedly at her for so doing. He takes his revenge for that by unobtrusively taking her hand as they return to the main museum and not letting go. She essays a little tug, Castle declines to let go, and her hand relaxes into his. A little assertiveness, just to see what happens, and what happens is that she lets him have his way.

As the afternoon draws to a close, Beckett’s hand in his develops a certain tension, and her conversation starts to become less engaged. Castle tries to shift in closer, but she’s entirely un receptive and indeed her hand is withdrawing from his, not actively; but her grasp has dropped completely and if he weren’t holding on her hand would fall away, much like she’s putting space between their bodies. Chill is drifting over her as six o’clock approaches, frosting her eyes and cooling her voice: even the skin of her limp fingers seems to be cold.
“I need to go,” she says quietly, neutrally.

“I’ll walk you there,” Castle replies, mildly metaphorically since it’s far too far to walk in a reasonable time. Beckett merely shrugs, and turns for the exit. He recognises the same unemotional shell locking into place as she’d had on the way to her father’s, not yet covered by the polished cheerfulness that she’d assumed then. Possibly not at all intended to be covered by cheerfulness, or the slick sardonic cynicism of the precinct. This feels more like… armour. Undisguised armour. Beckett, he realises, is not only expecting a fight, she’s already put up her defences.

At Astor Place Beckett bids Castle farewell – he objects, but she doesn’t need him there at all: this is going to be unpleasant all ways round and an audience for even the opening skirmishes is not needed – and huddles into her full-length coat and scarf, beret covering her head and gloves on. It’s still close to freezing, and anyway she is cold no matter the external temperature.

To her relief, she’s beaten Lanie to the bar. She finds a corner table out of the way and as far from the bar as possible – this discussion will not be improved by publicity – and orders a soda. She’s not hungry, and doubts that she will be later. She doesn’t want to drink anything alcoholic. Her emotions were far too close to the surface on Monday and adding any mood altering substances now isn’t going to help her stay calm.

“Hey, Kate. You got a drink?”

“Yeah, thanks.”

Lanie returns with a glass of wine and clicks it down in a determined fashion. Beckett takes a sip of her soda and lets Lanie begin. She has no intention of doing so. Lanie is not proof against the technique.

“So what’s up with you, girl? You’ve been off all week. Are you okay?”

“How do you mean?” Kate says smoothly. “Everything’s fine. Solved the case, no problem.”

Lanie’s stress-measuring speedometer goes from nought to sixty in less than two seconds at Kate’s evasion.

“Don’t give me that crap, Kate. You ran out on me Monday lunchtime, you ran out on all of us Monday evening, and you’ve been avoiding me ever since. Now what the hell is going on?”

“I told you, nothing. I was really tired Tuesday. I told you so. Then we had a case. I said I’d see you tonight, and here I am.”

“Don’t give me that. You said plenty Monday lunchtime till you spooked and fled. Not one word of it was fine. You got so many issues you could stock the library. Now, girlfriend, you start spilling them instead of hiding them.”

“Lanie, I thought we were here for a nice evening with a drink and maybe some food. I didn’t come out so you could practice psychiatry or boost your application to be a CIA interrogator. I don’t need all this questioning from you. Everything’s fine.”

“You need something. You could start with not disappearing off and shoving me out the way. I still got bruises.”

“I had things to do.”

“More important than us?”
“Yes,” Kate says flatly, in a way that admits no disagreement. Lanie does not appreciate the bluntness.

“So it wasn’t a case. It was an excuse so you didn’t have to talk to me.”

“It wasn’t about you and it wasn’t an excuse. I had to go. Nothing to do with any of you at all.”

“You might have had to go then but you could’ve made up for it later. So you’re gonna talk to me now. Let’s start at the beginning with what you said on Monday. Why did you say that to Writer-Boy?”

“Not going there, Lanie. You made it pretty clear what you thought on Monday. We don’t need to talk about it any more.”

“You’ve got no idea what I thought.” Lanie is thoroughly frustrated and wishing that she wasn’t so much shorter than Kate, especially when Kate adds a cynical look and raised eyebrow to the mix. Slapping Kate would be hugely satisfying and might let some light through the rocks in her mule-stubborn stupid head. “You never gave me a chance to say what I thought.”

“You didn’t need to say anything. Now, are we going to have a nice evening or are you gonna carry on?”

“You know what I thought? I thought that you were talking so much bullshit.” Lanie has utterly lost it. Any last remnants of control are gone from her voice under Kate’s calm gaze and deflections. “Your life is a freaking disaster and you won’t do anything about it. Look at you. All you do is work and run away from everything and everyone that might knock some sense into you. You won’t even try to sort yourself out.”

“I don’t need sorting out. I’m just fine as I am.”

“Crap. You’re using your dad as an excuse not to fix your life and I think you’ve been doing it for years. Your dad doesn’t need you smothering him and I bet he’d hate it if he knew how you were behaving. You went all out to make sure you said something to make you look so bad to Castle he’d never come near you again just so you didn’t have to fix your life.”

“Shut up, Lanie,” Kate says warningly.

“I won’t. Someone’s gotta tell you the truth sometime. You need help, Kate. I don’t know what’s wrong with you but you are fucked right up. The Kate I used to know would never have deliberately gone out to drive someone off like you did. The Kate I used to know wouldn’t be shutting me out like this. You need to get some help before you crash big-time.”

Kate stands up, drops a couple of bills on the table, and gazes coldly at Lanie. “So much for a nice evening with my friend. Guess that’s me told,” she says, without any discernible emotion. “Good to know where we stand and what you think of me. No doubt I’ll see you when you’re next on duty, Dr Parrish.”

Lanie clamps a hand on her wrist. “No, you don’t. You’re trying to do just the same to me as you did to Castle. Well, you’ve just overdone it. You’re trying to manoeuvre this fight and me somewhere I can’t call you on your bullshit. Epic fail, girlfriend. If you think I’m that dumb you thought wrong. So you can sit back down or I can get you sent to mandatory therapy. You just watch me do it.”

“I don’t think you’re my doctor or my boss.”
Kate hasn’t shifted to sit down at all. Lanie doesn’t give a single inch. Over the last few days she’s been thinking, and what she’s been thinking is that Kate is spiralling downward with nothing and no-one to stop her. She’s also been thinking that best friend or no best friend she’s going to have a little chat (or something like that) with Writer-Boy, who may or may not have been stupid enough to believe Kate, but hadn’t exactly looked driven off on Wednesday. In fact, he’d looked rather more entrenched than for weeks.

“I think I’m the only person who’s giving you it straight. Sit down, Kate.” Lanie stands up and pushes Kate into the seat, who, not expecting it, sits down hard and inelegantly. Lanie shove the cash back into her hand.

“What the hell, Lanie?”

“Sit there, shut up and listen. You’re heading straight for a breakdown if you don’t stop all this.”

“That’s ridiculous.”

“So what was with you Monday? And Tuesday? Espo said you were sick, but you weren’t. So what was really up Tuesday?”

“I told you, I was tired. Late night Monday. So I went to bed early.”

“Yeah, right. More of your crap. You’re never tired. You’re never hung-over because you never drink. You’re never upset because you never let yourself be upset by anything. You’re locked into your own little world where you can pretend you don’t need anything. Who’s there when you do need help?”

“Lanie, enough. I don’t need help. I did need a nice night out. Since I’m not going to get it, let’s just go home now.”

“No. You’re not going home. You’re staying right here” – and Kate’s phone starts to ring.

“Beckett.” Lanie watches her face go taut and her mouth pinch white-lipped around the next words.

“Yes. I’ll be there shortly.”

She shrugs her coat on, still on the phone, and picks up her scarf and beret, dropping the crumpled dollar bills on the table. “Julia, I’m on my way,” she says tightly. She cuts the call and looks at Lanie. “Got to go.”

“What?”

“Got to go. This was a washout anyway. I’ll see you around.”

She’s gone before Lanie can close her mouth.

Left to her own devices and most of a glass of wine, Lanie swipes the money Kate had left from the table before it blows away under the air conditioning, and ponders. That had not precisely gone well. Lanie had intended to be briskly sympathetic and tease the whole story out of Kate, and then suggest with some earthy humour that she at least find someone to keep her bed warm. Instead she’d been suckered into losing her temper in less than five minutes, and even if Kate needs to hear the truth Lanie’s screwed up any chance of that by the way she’s put things. And why’s Kate walked out like that anyway? It can’t have been a body, she’d have got her own call as the ME. Can’t have been an acquaintance of Kate’s dad, she’s never mentioned him having a lady friend. So who’s Julia, and why is Kate dancing to her tune? Apart, of course, from the perfect excuse it gave Kate to leave. Bit like Monday, really… A bit like? A lot like. Right down to the expression on Kate’s face.

Lanie takes a mouthful of wine and wonders what to do next. She remembers that she wanted a little talk with Castle, who himself had been remarkably evasive on Wednesday. Unfortunately, she doesn’t have Castle’s cell number. That’s a major oversight which she intends to rectify sometime in the next thirty seconds. She calls Esposito, instead.

“Espo.”

“Yeah, Lanie? Why you calling on a Friday night? You missing my handsome face?”

“No. I want Castle’s number. You got it?”

Espo makes a disgusted noise. “Lanie, are you tellin’ me you’d rather spend time with him?”

“Javi, quit it. I’m not in the mood for your ego. You got his number or not?”

“Why d’you want it?”

“That’s my business. You got it, or do I need to call Ryan?”

Espo reels off the number.

“Thanks.” Lanie rings off, and contemplates the wisdom of her next move. Still, it doesn’t sound like Kate’s going to be talking to her any time soon, so she can’t get into more trouble than she’s already got herself into.

“Rick Castle,” oozes down the phone.

“Castle, it’s Lanie.” Oozing stops.

“Lanie? Why are you calling? I thought you and Beckett were having a night out. Do you want my handsome company to join you?”

“Kate just left.” There’s a stunned silence from the phone. “I wanna talk to you. Can you get round here?”

“Why?” Castle doesn’t sound nearly as humorously acquiescent as usual. “I’m not getting in between you and Beckett.”

Lanie declines the bait. “Who’s Julia?” she asks instead. “And why is Kate running off as soon as she calls?” Castle starts to swear, not particularly under his breath. “Castle, what’s going on?” But she’s talking to a dead line.

“What the hell is going on here?” Lanie asks her wine. It doesn’t answer.

Castle is rapidly dialling Beckett. He’s more relieved than he’d like when she answers.

“Beckett.”

“Beckett, Lanie just called me. What’s going on? Why are you going after Mrs Berowitz?”

“He’s disappeared again. I can’t not.”
Castle recognises that trying to stop Beckett at this point will be counterproductive, to say the least. Later, however… later, he needs to know why she’s gone off like this. He suspects, from the mere fact that Lanie called him wanting to talk – much the same as in the morgue, with added emphasis – that the evening hadn’t been going well. Mrs Berowitz’s call might have been very convenient. However, the fact remains that Beckett is once again pouring herself out where she really cannot help. This is not good, and in fact, infuriating.

“I’ll come and help. Where are you?”

“It’s okay. I’m fine.” She is damn well not fine and he is not having this. It’s going to stop. One way or another.

“Beckett, stop arguing. I’m coming. Where are you? If you don’t tell me I’ll simply go to the Berowitzes’.” He’s bluffing. He can’t remember exactly where they live, though he thinks he’d get the street right. Grudgingly, she gives him the address. She is at the Berowitzes’ apartment. “Did you drive or do I need to bring a car?”

“Car, please. I don’t have mine.” Ah: straight from the bar to the Berowitzes’. Not good.

“On the way.” He departs at some speed.

When he arrives Beckett is trying to get details of where and when Mr Berowitz was last seen. Mrs Berowitz is crying as she opens the door. Beckett looks as if she’s about to scream.

“Julia, you have to help me here. I can’t do anything if you can’t tell me when he went out and where he said he was going."

“Hello, Mrs Berowitz. I’ve come to join my partner. Rick Castle. Hey, Beckett.”

“Castle.”

He sits down next to Beckett. Mrs Berowitz looks tearfully at him. Beckett’s tension is sky-high. Castle unobtrusively taps a finger on her hand to catch her glance, when Mrs Berowitz isn’t paying attention. “Lemme,” he murmurs. Beckett shrugs doubtfully, but then nods.
Help me if you can Castle smiles sympathetically at Julia. She visibly calms under his practiced charm and engaging attention. “Julia,” he says gently, “I know this is really hard for you. We just wanna help you. Tell me all about it, so we can.” He sounds – and probably is, Beckett thinks – utterly sincere. Julia is wholly drawn in and focused on Castle. Beckett pulls in her personality and stays completely unobtrusive. This is Castle’s show now, and the best way to get this done is to let him run it. She watches him create the only-focused-on-you atmosphere which, with only a minimal shift of tone from kindness to heat, would seduce anything female, and not a few males, within hearing distance. Julia is emphatically not proof against it.

“He didn’t come home from work. When I called him” – she looks piteously at Castle – “his PA said he hadn’t been there since lunchtime. She said he hadn’t any meetings after lunch but he was meeting a client for lunch. But he hadn’t come back.”

“Where was lunch?” Castle asks. Beckett is caught up by the bitter familiarity of the tale, fighting back her memories.

“Le Rivage, on West 46th Street.”

“Oh,” Castle says happily. “I know it. They do lovely salmon.” Beckett jabs him, and he gets back on task. “Okay. If it was with a client, he’d have been wearing a suit, yeah? He takes his work seriously, doesn’t he?” Beckett suppresses a wince, and thinks cynically that he probably won’t have a job in a week. So had her father fallen, as soon as he had started failing to return from lunch.

“That’s really good, Julia. Did he have a coat or scarf? It’s still pretty cold out.”

Beckett bleakly admires the application of Castle’s full, focused attention, warmth, charm and personality on an unhappy, upset and overstressed woman. Certain similarities are not lost on her. But there is a difference, and it’s in the look in his eyes. This isn’t personal. He’s sympathetic, but he’s not invested. It’s probably why it’s working so well for him – for them: getting them everything they’re going to need. In another ten minutes they have every scrap of information Julia can remember and a number of pieces that she probably hadn’t known she knew. Castle turns his very best appreciative smile up to full, bulb-blowing wattage and directs it straight at her.

“Julia,” he says very sincerely, “Beckett – Kate – and I are going to go and get started on finding David. If he comes home before we call you, will you call us?”

“Yes,” she agrees, unhappily. “But… can’t one of you stay? Please?”

Castle forestalls Beckett’s words. “No,” he says, somehow making it a regrettable matter. “We can’t do what we have to from here. It’ll need both of us to search. Have you got a friend, or someone who’d come round to spend some time with you?”

Julia sniffs miserably, but consents to phone a friend who – they wait while she does – comes over straight away. The friend turns out to be a rather motherly type who gathers her in and shoos Castle and Beckett out the door. It’s barely shut behind them when Castle grabs Beckett by the shoulders and glares at her.
“What are you doing? You were going to step back, not right into it. We were going to ask your dad to talk to her, not go running after her and searching for her husband all over again.”

“He’s missing. It’s not like I got a call from another precinct or O’Leary to say they’ve picked him up again. He’s gone. People die if they go to sleep drunk outside in this weather. Are you saying I should leave him to die?”

“No! Of course not. But why you?”

“Because I’m the one who can. You don’t know how it feels to be waiting for someone who doesn’t come home.”

“I do. I lost Alexis in a shop once, took me half an hour to find her. I was desperate.”

“Half an hour? Try two days. Try finding your father sprawled like a wino in the park, covered in vomit and urine, at dawn.” So that’s what she’d have been doing in a park at 5 a.m. He understands that hitch in her speech now. “Try doing that for two years. Try listening to him beg you to pick him up for the next three.” It’s the same agonised bitterness and old, cold fury that she’d had on Tuesday. “How can I not help her? I’ve been there.”

“You’re still there,” Castle spits back at her. “You’ll never not be there until you stop trying to save everyone else because you didn’t save your father. That’s the bottom of all of this. Nothing to do with family at all.”

There is a horrible silence. Finally Beckett breaks it.

“You too?” She deliberately blanks her face and voice. “I should have known.” Acid sarcasm coats her words. “You and Lanie. Should I expect this from Ryan and Esposito too? Or have you already gone tattling to Montgomery? When did you cook this up? Yesterday? Or Wednesday? Didn’t I give you the right answers on Tuesday?” She’s backing away. “Guess I know what you think too.”

Castle takes one stride and catches her shoulders again, only just not shaking her. “I have never discussed you with Lanie. Nor with the boys, nor with Montgomery. I’m quite capable of drawing my own conclusions about what’s wrong with you.”

“What’s wrong with me? Nothing’s wrong with me.”

“Yeah, right. You’re still compensating for walking away from your father and you still can’t forgive yourself for doing it.” Her eyes dart past him, hunted, searching for an escape route. “You can’t forgive him either. You think you have, but you haven’t really. You’re all closed up because you feel guilty about that and every time you see me with Alexis that bites. It’s not your past, it’s your present.”

“Well, well,” she says sharply. “If it isn’t Herr Freud. I hardly think this is the place for a psychiatric consultation.” Every word is razor-edged. “They’re usually confidential.”

“You’re right, it’s not,” Castle says, tightening his grip on her. “Which is why I’m taking you back to yours and we are going to talk.”

“I don’t think so.”

“Just try stopping me, Beckett. Just you try it.” At this point, he’d welcome the chance to prove that whatever she thinks, he’s much bigger, much stronger, and, regardless of all her training, at close quarters weight and muscle will defeat her.
“I am going back to the precinct and starting to search for David Berowitz. You can do whatever the fuck you like as long as you’re nowhere near me.”

He stops. He’d forgotten the whole reason they were here in the first place.

“I’m searching too. You dragged me into this” –

“I dragged you? You wouldn’t stay away.”

He ignores that.

“And I’m staying. I’m starting at Le Rivage, if you’re going back to the bullpen.” His tone hardens. “I’m not letting you avoid this any more. You’re going to crash. If you carry on without me, I will go straight to Montgomery. You won’t help yourself, and you won’t let anyone else help, so maybe being ordered to do it will work.”

He lets go of her and steps back, no softness in face or tone or words. “With me or without me, Beckett. It’s up to you what happens next. Me, or Montgomery. I’ll call you when I’ve talked to the maitre d’ at Le Rivage and we’ll decide what to do next with the Berowitzes. But one way or another we are having this conversation tonight or I am going to Montgomery first thing on Monday morning.”

He leaves her there, staring at him, white faced. He hates what he’s just done, but he’s too angry with her really to regret it. Something needs done, and when he analyses what she’d just said it sounds like Lanie gave her the same talk. Maybe he should have talked to Lanie, but that simply seems like inviting absolute disaster and worse, breaching such trust as he has won, all the way round. Although at this point there isn’t much that isn’t a disaster.

It’s not until he’s halfway to Le Rivage that he remembers that Beckett didn’t have her car, and by that time it’s too late to go back. On any of it.

As a result, when he manages to reach the restaurant and talk to the staff, he’s rather more intimidating and less socially charming than usual. Answers are rapid, but not terribly helpful. Mr Berowitz had eaten with a companion – Castle is really not that interested in their food – shared a bottle of wine though the other man had drunk almost none of it, and when the other man had left had finished the bottle, paid, and left in relatively good order. No, he hadn’t seemed inebriated. No, he was perfectly steady on his feet. Yes, he had his coat and scarf. No, he hadn’t wanted a cab. Is Mr Castle likely to visit them any time soon?

Castle returns a pleasant, vaguely positive response, thanks them tangibly for their time and departs. That was a complete washout. Now what? He ought to call Beckett and tell her that there are no clues here, but he’s still annoyed with her (and with himself, but he’s not listening to that). He finds a café, purchases a double espresso, not his usual, but he needs the hit of caffeine and he needs the bitter taste to clean that other bitter taste, induced by Beckett’s self-destructive idiocy, from his mouth.

Coffee helps. Coffee usually does help, he finds, to clear his thoughts. He’s annoyed that Beckett ran straight off as soon as Julia Berowitz called her. But… if Alexis or his mother went missing, no matter where it might be, he’d call Beckett, because he could… oh. Because he could depend on her to do everything to find them, and it wouldn’t just be because she’s met them, or because he’s her partner, but because it’s who she has become. So how’s that different from Mrs Berowitz? He’d do exactly the same, and he’d be furious if she wouldn’t help…

But there is a discontinuity, and it’s not about whether she helps, it’s about why she helps. It’s her avoidance technique. Avoidance of getting a life, that would be. Avoidance of listening to the truth. He wonders again what Lanie had said to her. And she really does need to hear the truth. Not that anyone can force her to.

Oh. He’s trying to force her to see it, and Lanie’s trying to force her to see it, and that is having exactly the effect he should have expected. She’s slammed down the shutters and she’s backing away from both of them as fast as she can hit reverse. Hell. He’s let emotion – specifically, anger – overcome good sense again. He drains his coffee, doesn’t call Beckett, retrieves his car and drives off to the Twelfth.

Beckett is not at her desk. There is no evidence that Beckett has been at her desk. He has no text or voicemail indicating where she is. He looks around, briefly, sees absolutely no evidence that Beckett is or has been in the bullpen since yesterday, and returns to his car, utterly at a loss. He can’t believe that she would abandon the search for David Berowitz, not after she’d promised Julia. But if she’s not here, how can she be searching? She can’t access the databases from home, and she surely won’t be randomly checking bars all over Manhattan. She couldn’t be searching any other way: this isn’t on the books and Montgomery will not be happy if he finds out. Ah. That’s why she’s not in the Twelfth. Well, that primarily. Avoiding him, Castle, might well be a close second.

So what’s she doing, and why’s she risking serious trouble? The second is easy. She won’t let someone die, and even Montgomery will have to cave in the face of protecting life. He’ll do something, though, if he finds out. This wouldn’t be consequence-free. Beckett’s leave might be accelerated. As might her next scheduled medical. Neither of which tell him what she’s doing. He leaves again: no point in sitting in the bullpen with no Beckett and no inspiration. Reluctantly, he takes out his phone. He’d wanted to get the drop on her: to arrive with no warning. That’s not going to happen.

“Beckett.”

“It’s Castle. I’ve finished at the restaurant. Nothing useful. He went out in his coat and scarf: that’s all they could tell me.”

“Okay. You might as well go home, then.” It’s cool and sensible. It’s also exactly not what’s going to happen. “Nothing more you can do.”

“Uh-uh. I said we were going to decide what to do next with the Berowitzes and that’s what’s going to happen. So where are you?”

“I’ve got all the help I need. I don’t need you here too.”

“Where’s here?” He can hear familiar sounds in the background, but he knows she’s not in the Twelfth. If he hadn’t known that, he’d have thought she was. So...

“Precinct,” she says briskly, unemotionally. He notes the extremely careful wording. She hasn’t said which precinct. Technically, she isn’t lying. In which case, he knows precisely where she is, and with whom. There’s only one person she could prevail upon to help her, and it’s the man-mountain O’Leary. If O’Leary weren’t gay, Castle would already be furiously jealous, and even though he is gay, Castle is still having a very hard time controlling his bitter feelings that she’s partnering up with anyone else.

“I’m at the Twelfth,” he says bluntly. “You are not.”

“And?” It’s equally uncompromising.
“And I’ll be at the Central Park Precinct shortly.” There’s an indrawn breath. It might be surprise, or it might be annoyance, or it might be upset. He really does not care.

“I don’t need you here. We got it. Go home.”

“No. I’m on my way.” He slices the call closed without compunction, and when the phone rings and Beckett’s number comes up on display, ignores it. He’s pulling up at Central Park Precinct less than twenty minutes later – the advantage of the time of night.

The desk sergeant, a different, much younger man than Sergeant Hardon, calls Detective O’Leary on Castle’s polite request, and shortly Everest rumbles towards him.

“Mr Castle,” he says happily. “Come to pick up Beckett?” Uh? “She don’t look so good. I think she’s sick. Don’t know why she came up here to do this search, but she said since we picked him up – well, not me, I’m Homicide, but the uniforms – it was more likely we’d have something sooner. And it’s good to see her. She don’t come round half often enough.”

He droops a little, reducing himself to a mere six-nine. “She never comes to see us much any more. First time in a couple of months was when you were there too. She wouldn’t come over on Wednesday to pick that man up again. Just said she didn’t need him an’ to call his wife. But now she’s here an’ asking me to run the searches to see if she can find him. It doesn’t add up.” He shakes his head sadly. “She shouldn’t be here if she’s sick. I don’t wanna catch the flu. I got things to do. You gonna take her home, Mr Castle?”

“Call me Castle, Detective. Or Rick. But the Twelfth just call me Castle, and you’re a friend of Beckett’s, so…”

“Really?” The man is star-struck. It’s insane. Any moment now he’ll be asking for a PR shot. It’s ridiculous.

“Shall we go and find Beckett, O’Leary?”

“Sure. C’mon up. I left her with my computer running searches.” He turns round, causing a small vortex in the elevator. “D’you know why she’s looking for this guy again?”

“He went missing.”

“So? She doesn’t need him as a witness.” The elevator doors open on the bullpen. Beckett isn’t visible. “Where’d she go?”

“Restroom?”

“She was right here. See, there’s her purse.” The mountain bends over and prods it.

“What are you doing to my purse, O’Leary? Get your own.” Beckett hasn’t yet noticed Castle, because he’s sneakily concealing himself.

“Brought your boyfriend, Beckett.”

“What?” She pales. Castle steps out from behind O’Leary and smiles blandly, with an edge of told-you.

“I said I’d help find him. Did you forget that?” She’s silenced. “What have we got?” Beckett doesn’t answer.
“Nothing,” O’Leary says. “There aren’t any hits in the system. He’s not there. No-one’s rung to say he’s picked up. Our unis haven’t found him in the Park. Yet.”

Beckett is slumped in O’Leary’s chair, looking a little like a child in an adult seat. Her feet don’t touch the floor. Castle suspects that it had to be ordered specially, in extra-wide. If it wasn’t for the expression of frustrated annoyance on her face, she’d look wholly childish. And, of course, the pallid crawl of pain. Castle can see exactly why O’Leary thinks she’s sick.

“Beckett,” O’Leary says, “you don’t look good. I think you should go home. I’ll let you know if anything comes up. Pete’s outta town, so I got nothing better to do tonight.” He grins. “‘Less you wanna lend me Castle.”

“Have him,” Beckett says. “If you can persuade him to stay.” O’Leary misses the edge. Castle doesn’t. He subtly moves out of arm’s reach of O’Leary, which in practice means about ten feet. She casts a bitter glance at him, and a more resigned one at O’Leary. “I need to make a call,” she says, and slides off the chair towards the break room. Castle follows, and whips into the room before the door can be shut.

“I need to call Julia,” Beckett says wearily. “Tell her there’s nothing yet.”

“Then you need to stop.” He takes a step towards her. “You won’t get anywhere if you’re too tired to think. And if you’re still here when someone who knows you turns up, other than O’Leary, it’ll get back to Montgomery in a heartbeat and you’ll be up the creek without a canoe.”

“Paddle,” she says automatically.

“That too. Do you want suspended?” She shakes her head. “Then call Julia and then I’m taking you home.” There’s rather more of an edge of threat on that than he’d really like, but he can’t stop it and truth to tell he doesn’t want to. Shaking sense into Beckett’s idiocy would be enormously desirable if only it weren’t for the fact that he’s never laid rough hands on a woman (without some very explicit consents) and he’s not starting now whatever the provocation.

Beckett dials. The call is short and unhappy – on both ends of the line. When she swipes off she sits down, a little hard. She’s still pallid.

“Okay. We’re going. C’mon.” Castle exits the break room without bothering to check that Beckett is following and aims for O’Leary, who is occupying every last inch of his adapted chair and whistling a tune – probably – at the screen and his papers. He looks blissfully happy.

“O’Leary,” Castle smiles, “I’m going to take Beckett home so she doesn’t give you the flu.” O’Leary grins right back.

“Sure, Castle. Lemme know if she’s trying not to leave. I’ll give you a hand.” Castle grins too. The thought of O’Leary simply removing Beckett bodily is quite amusing. “If anything pops, I’ll call her.”

“Don’t. Call Mrs Berowitz instead,” Castle says. “She can come and get her own husband.”

“Okay,” O’Leary says amiably, and then goes off at a tangent. “Will you bring Beckett out for a beer or two? Like I said, she hardly comes to see me any more.”

Castle spots a different opportunity: to wit, getting O’Leary out for much beer without Beckett. Extracting a little more of her history from someone without emotional involvement might help. Well, without family or romantic (huh? Romantic? That’s not quite the word he would use, yet) involvement.
At that point Beckett emerges and the moment to ask O’Leary is lost. He’ll do that some other time.

“Come on, Beckett. Home time.”

“Thanks, O’Leary,” she yawns. “Owe you.”

“You can buy me a beer sometime soon. Bring him with you. I like him.”
“I can get the subway home,” Beckett says, as soon as they exit the building.

“I’m taking you.” Castle replies inflexibly. He follows up with a hand on her shoulder that doesn’t give the impression it’s likely to let go.

“I don’t need a babysitter.”

“No,” Castle says amiably. Clearly that wasn’t what Beckett was expecting. She looks like a stunned codfish. “You don’t. But you do need company, so I’m taking you home. Or I’ll meet you there, but it’s cold out and my car is warm and right here, so why would you want to walk to the subway, wait for a train, and walk from the subway home, getting cold, when you could be chauffeured home in cosy comfort?”

While he’s talking he’s walking them to his car, opens the passenger door for Beckett, and gives her a gentle prod to encourage her to get in. When that isn’t effective – or possibly isn’t noticed through her coat – he encourages a bit more forcefully, and as is becoming common when he’s assertive, she goes along with it, sitting down and automatically doing up her seatbelt. He shuts the door, gets in himself and pulls away, heading for Beckett’s apartment. She doesn’t talk, all the way there. Nor does Castle. Talking will wait till they’re inside. Preceded by some very physical comfort.

Inside, Castle doesn’t hesitate for an instant before wrapping Beckett into his body and cuddling her in. His hand cradling her head into his shoulder has the happy side-effect that she can’t complain at him. Yet. He aims them both at the couch and sits them down comfortably. Well, he’s comfortable. Beckett is rather more tense than he’d like. He pets gently, not making his earlier mistake of forcing hard truth upon her when she’s already unreceptive and angry. Challenging her in that upfront way when she’s trying to save someone – however undeserving that someone might be, however much she’s reinforcing all her self-destructive patterns of pouring out herself instead of working out what the basic problem is – was stupid. Not that he was alone in his stupidity: Lanie seems to have made the same mistake, probably repeatedly, this week. He might want to force her to confront her issues, but it isn’t actually going to fix them.

She had said it, after all. You can’t save them unless they want to save themselves. You can only save yourself. Right now, she doesn’t see that she needs to save herself, still less that she should want to.

“Now, Beckett, just stay here and snuggle in.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. You should go home. I’m sure your family would like to see you.” She tries to unfold from him.

“Stop wriggling. They’ve seen me at dinner and I’m not needed. Mother’s out and Alexis is at a friend’s for the night. Come back here.” He tucks her back in, and hangs on. “Now,” he says again, “are we still going to talk to your dad tomorrow about seeing Julia?”

Beckett’s surprise at that turn in the conversation is shown through her sudden loss of rigidity. It’s obvious she was expecting him to go back to the earlier fight. He takes advantage and snuggles her in further, tips up her face and drops a teasing peck on her nose.

“Are we?” he asks again.

“Stop it.”
“Stop what?” Castle asks innocently.

“Stop pretending you care about anything other than fixing me. You only came back to force me into talking—she might as well have said torturing small animals—“so stop pretending there’s anything else. Go home. I’m fine. You can try tattling on me to Montgomery if you want. It won’t work, and I’m not going to be blackmailed by you. We have nothing to talk about.” She tries to break out his hold again.

“I was angry with you. You just went running straight back into the pain, and we’d only just agreed that there was a different way.” He stops. He doesn’t want to say I hate seeing you hurt. I hate it that you suffer. And I hate that you could fix all this if you’d just listen to why you’re doing it and then get help, but you don’t.

“So what should I do? Let him be lost, maybe let him die of hypothermia, because I might get a bit upset? You don’t get it, do you? We sign up to protect people, not give up when the going gets a bit tough.”

“No. I know. I’m still angry, though, even though you couldn’t do anything else, could you?” He sighs. “I don’t know if I’m angry with you or the situation or both. But you can’t keep on like this. Right now you need to stop and stand down.” He shakes her gently. “You’re supposed to be off-duty. Come here, and stop. For now. Later, we’ll see about everything else. O’Leary can manage perfectly well without you.” He’s gradually pulling her closer and closer. “He seems like a pretty competent guy.” He’s managed to pull her up on to his lap, where he likes her; where he can cosset her in and try to retrieve the situation.

If he wants to retrieve the situation, that is. He considers whether actually he should precipitate the explosion and then try to sort it out. It would be very easy. All he has to do is repeat his conclusions as to why she’s using herself up and trying to push everyone away, and watch the bomb go off. But there’s another huge assumption, right there. He’s assuming that she’d allow him to be anywhere near her afterwards. That’s a mistake. She wouldn’t. So it wouldn’t sort anything out at all, and he’d be in an even worse position than he is now. And so would she.

He keeps her embraced, and leans his head on her hair, a softly affectionate gesture. “Stand down, Beckett,” he murmurs again. He pets her a little, nothing sexual, coaxing her to relax and forget the failure of their search. He can feel the tension still coursing through her, her gaze still skittering around her soulless apartment, as if she’s still searching frantically for an escape route: but her body isn’t pulling away from him. Her body never has, when she’s like this, only her mind.

“Did you call your dad?”

“When?” she snips. “Never got a chance.”

“You could do it now. It’s not so late.”

“Suppose so.” She doesn’t move. Castle hands her the phone. She stares at it as if it’s alien tech that she’s never seen and can’t operate. He curves her fingers around it so that it doesn’t fall to the floor.

“Beckett? You don’t have to.”

“We decided,” she says emptily. “No point putting it off.” She swipes her phone on, and taps a speed dial key. Terrifyingly, as she does she recovers full Beckettness and when the call connects is bright, breezy and cheerful. It’s possibly a good thing that it isn’t a video-link, though.

“Hey, Dad. I got something and I thought you could help me out with it.”
“What, Katie?”

“Well… it was Castle’s idea really…”

“Oh, yes? Should I expect surprises?”

“Er…” she runs out of words.

“I’m intrigued, Katie.”

“Dad, can I come over tomorrow and talk to you?”

“Sure, but why can’t you give me a hint now?”

“It’s a bit delicate.”

“Do I need a shotgun?” Castle splutters very loudly. “Is Rick there with you?”

“Yes, Dad,” Beckett says resignedly, casting Castle a sulphurous glare. “Well, he can tell me, then. Pass me over.” Beckett doesn’t, not amenable to parental pressure, and also unwilling to let Castle have a free hand with suggestions. The whole situation is far too near the knuckle right now.

“No, it’s fine.” Castle glares in his turn. She puts the phone on speaker. “There’s this couple. Their son was murdered before Christmas. He’s… he’s drinking too much. She needs help, and she won’t listen to me. Castle thought” – she’s basely putting all the responsibility on him – “that maybe you could talk to her.” She stops. There is dead silence on the end of the phone. “Dad?”

Terror rises in her gut. “Dad? Talk to me?” There’s a strangled breath on the end of the phone. Castle’s grip has tightened on her, nervousness apparent in his fingers.

“Really?” her father wheezes. “You want me to talk to her?” He pauses. “I think you’d both better come round tomorrow. I’ll see you at ten. Night.”

“Dad?” But he’s gone.

“What just happened?”

“I don’t know,” she says slowly. She stands up. “I think you should go home. I’ll see you at Dad’s at five to ten. You remember where it is?” She moves to her desk and scrawls the address on a scrap of paper. “There you are.” She comes back to give him it.

Castle doesn’t stand up, doesn’t take the scrap of paper, and doesn’t answer the point about going home. Instead he reaches out, places his large hands round Beckett’s slim waist, and tugs sharply once to land her back in his lap.

“I don’t think I should go home. You’ll fret yourself into flinders. Then you’ll stay up too late and sleep in and I’ll be left at your dad’s all on my own and unprotected. He said he had a shotgun, and if you’re not there he’ll aim it at me. You can’t do that to me.”

Beckett looks almost familiarly irritated at his nonsense. He tucks her in more closely. “See? Human shield.”

“My dad is not going to shoot you,” she points out. “But I might.”

“Then who’ll protect you from your dad? I won’t be able to.” He pauses the flow of persiflage and pets some more, warmth and affection in each stroke. “You know,” he says slowly, “it’s funny, but if I had to guess I’d have said your dad was trying not to laugh at you.”

“Laugh?”

“Yeah.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.”

Beckett doesn’t probe further. Her father’s behaviour has left her scared and shaky, regardless of Castle’s thoughts. She’s not at all convinced that she hasn’t just made a major tactical error and pushed him beyond his comfort zone. What if tomorrow he’s hung-over, or worse, wasted? She’s held him together for so long, what if she’s shattered him? He’s been so very fragile. If he falls, it will be her fault, her responsibility: she’ll have pushed him past his limits.

Castle notes Beckett’s tension rapidly overwhelming her and wonders why she’s so ready to assume her father’s weakness, when it’s so obvious that to resist his resident evil, his addiction, he must be incredibly strong. He’d said it: he’s said no every hour of every day and she’d – it’s clear, now – not believed it then. She doesn’t believe it currently, either. He decides on distraction, not a small amount influenced by his own wants. Petting, which had not actually stopped at any time since he pulled her back down on to his lap, becomes a little more intent, less of a pat and more of a stroke. Still providing affection, but rapidly being coloured by seduction. His soothing strokes become longer and slower; lingering as his fingers drift down the edge of her face, slipping over her shoulder to caress her arm and, not incidentally, encouraging her to relax into him.

It takes a long time to ease her down. Beckett seems to have been frozen by the risk she thinks she’s taken. He wouldn’t quite say she was shivering, but she feels in his arms as if the absence of motion is through sheer force of will. He tries to infuse his warmth into her, but it doesn’t seem to have any effect until he’s wrapped her in so tightly that he can sense each shallow breath that she takes.

“Stand down,” he murmurs in her ear. “Leave it all up to me. You know I can give you what you want. All you need to do is decide yes or no. After that you don’t need to think any more.” He drops a tiny, teasing, insinuating peck on the sharp-cut side of her face, and she turns into it. He takes it as an invitation. The next kiss lands on her jawbone, then he tracks across her cheek to land at her lips. “Yes or no,” he entices.

“Yes,” she breathes, and he replies immediately, wordlessly. This communication needs very few words. Yes, and please, and more, and mine, and yours: that should be plenty. His mouth can communicate very nicely without words. Very active lips and tongue, and possibly even teeth, but no words.

He kisses her deeply, forcefully: soft lips under his already surrendering to his leadership, yielding and easing and then ceding to him. He easily takes charge, readily asserts a little authority and lets her fall into his sensual web. His hand runs into her hair, re-angles her skull for perfectly slanted access not only to her full mouth but to the curve of her neck and the nerve that will complete her accession to his will; his other hand drops from her arm to her leg.

Castle’s fingers are still on her thigh, stalking her surrender to desire, little points of heat blossoming under her skin and skittering along her nerves. She opens a little under his soft pressure, and shifts to curve into his hand more fully.

He teases lightly: tip-tapping barely-there touches, a little frivolity, playfulness rather than hot intent or focused desire, shifting the mood towards pleasure and pleasing, mutual give and take instead of anger or dark unhappy undercurrents of sadness and unspoken, unrecognised resentment. A space of light and happiness, harbinger of warmth in her chilly life.

He has no illusions that this will last.

Beckett allows herself to give in to the promise of warmth and strength implicit in Castle’s body, curls a little further inward and strokes into the soft short hair at the back of his neck. She seeks the heat in his body to dissipate the ice in her own; the temporary passion and promise in his lips to defeat the knowledge of the future. She might as well have something good, while it lasts. While he lasts. He’s already trying to make this more, ignoring her warnings, trying to force her into the mould of his assumptions about families and happiness and how things should be. It can’t last, it can’t work; and soon enough he’ll make one assumption too many, and go. He’s wrong, anyway. She has forgiven her father. She has.

At least he knows – oh, he really, really knows – how to do this, just as she likes, just as she wants. He wants her, and if she can’t have love she’ll settle for his lust. He’s smoothing delicately powerful strokes over her spine, encouraging her to stand down and be soft Kat (not that he knows about Kat, she thinks) who simply likes peace, serenity and calm, vague colours with no hard edges: Kat who doesn’t have to shoulder any burdens and can forget about steel-strong Detective Kate Beckett who is all hard edges. Only for a small space of time, only here under the passion and power and potency of the hands and mouth and body of another.

She only needs this one night, she thinks, forgetting that this week alone he’s been there with her some part of every evening, starting with the night she spent with a solo shot glass and deep-chilled vodka till she could glue her eggshell personality back together again. No need for the King’s soldiers or the King’s men here.

She forgets all of that, that it’s become not just a series of nights but every night; forgets the looming visit to her father yet to come; forgets it all in Castle’s broad hands on her back and leg, soothing and then warming, trailing little ripples of desire across her. She emits a contented little noise and he keeps stroking to bring her ease and relaxation; to leave her boneless and lax against him and surrounded by his scent and indefinable sense of masculinity. She’s never been feminine, except here where he makes her so. She is, now, quite definitely purring.

“Like that?” he entices. “Let’s do some more of what you like.” His deep sable baritone surrounds her and seeps into her skin, heating her from the inside out. He opens a button, and another: all the way down, eases her shirt from her pants to settle his broad palm under the silky fabric. His fingers search and find the catch of her bra; opening it confidently to slide around and over her ribs. He removes her shirt in one polished move, her bra with a second. This is sheer seduction, and she is surely seduced. She presses into his palm, and he moulds gently, flicks a thumb softly over the peaked nipple, kisses her mouth hard and then bends to flutter down her neck and over the curve. She’s breathing harder, making sexy little noises of encouragement as he plays mobile lips over her and then draws her into his mouth and it feels so good. She pushes more demandingly, and pulls his head closer. He turns to the other side and repeats his attentions and oh, she could be taken all the way just from this: more Castle. And he does give her more: plays and presses, licks and sucks, strokes and nips and she’s sky-high, writhing and moaning and not caring how she sounds, how desperate she is, as long as he doesn’t stop.

He doesn’t stop. She loses all sense of time and place, only aware of him and how he makes her feel, and then loses all awareness entirely.

“There,” Castle growls, “that’s better. Now, let’s try even more things you like.” He simply stands with her still held against him and carries her through to her bedroom. He strips her pants from her, disposes of the majority of his own clothes with alacrity, and leaves her watching him as he prowls towards her. She expects him to remove her plain cotton panties, but he doesn’t. Instead he uses the fabric to slide over her, the friction driving her up again. She reaches for the hard length against her hip, to try to drive him wild as he is her, grips and slides and suddenly it’s hot and frantic and she’s naked and he’s over her and inside her and three hard thrusts and she’s all gone.
Can't face my life

Afterwards, though, she’s tense again, her relaxation only temporary. When Castle returns from his brief excuse-me she’s curled around a pillow, spine turned to the centre of the bed, eyes shut. It’s perfectly plain that talking to him is not on her to-do list. Unfortunately, talking to Beckett is on Castle’s to-do list. Proper talking, not an escalating argument. At least, that’s the plan.

He decides to wrap himself around her where, even if she doesn’t talk, the changes in her body will provide him with some clue as to her thoughts. Maybe. “Come here,” he murmurs. “Lemme hold you.” She shuffles back a little, and he spoons her gently, but in a carefully judged way which will, if required, allow him to keep her there. “You’re all tensed up again, and after I spent all that time convincing you to relax.” His voice has dropped into a velvety purr. “What’s wrong? Do I need to massage all the knots out your back?”

“That is not my back, Castle.”

“Ooops,” he says unrepentantly. “My hand must have slipped. Now, what’s wrong? Tell me all about it.”

“I’m fine. Nothing’s wrong except you’re stopping me sleeping.”

“Flattering. Not.”

He digs strong fingers into her back, and works the tense spots. After a little time she starts to hum softly, almost a purr of her own. “What’s up? Worried about your dad?” All the knots instantly retie themselves. “Yes, then.” He goes back to untangling them, pressing firmly. “He’s stronger than you think.”

“How would you know? You weren’t there, you weren’t picking him out the gutter, you weren’t leaving him behind and listening to his drunken crying.”

“No. But he faced me down.”

“So? I do that all the time.”

“So, your father is pretty tough. I’d back him against my publisher, who eats live grizzlies for breakfast. He’ll be fine. I know you’ve spent all this time protecting him from everything you can, but he’s strong. He doesn’t need as much protection as you want to give him.” She jerks under his hands, instinctive negation. “I know how you feel.”

“You don’t.”

“I do. I’m a parent, Beckett. Don’t you think I wanted to protect Alexis from every bruise or skinned knee, every failure and heartache? But I couldn’t. She had to grow and experience and learn for herself. I’ll be there for her, but I can’t smother her.” She wrenches herself away from him on the words and is out the bed, the bathroom door locking behind her, before he has even realised she’s moving.

He has no idea what happened there.

He rolls on to his back and stares into the dark ceiling. They really need to talk, but he has no idea what triggered that disappearance. So he simply lies quietly, doesn’t try to think, and listens carefully for anything that might indicate what Beckett is doing. Not that it will make a lot of difference, since she locked the door against him. He can’t hear anything, either.

He slips out of the bed, pads soundlessly across the room, puts his ear to the door, and waits, breathing silently. Just as he’s about to give up he detects a small rustle, which might well be a towel pressed to someone’s face. Good for muffling noises. (Also good for suffocation, though he hasn’t yet used that piece of knowledge in a book. It was a little too pettily domestic for Storm.) After another moment, there’s a slightly more accentuated breath, with a cadence that he identifies as locked-down misery. Okay then. He gives it a moment or two more, hears nothing else useful, and then taps on the bathroom door.

“Beckett?” he says, when there’s no answer.

“Go home.” Well, that’s not helpful. Nor is it a comment to which he’s intending to pay any attention.

“You can’t sleep in a bathroom.”

“Go home.”

“Come out.”

“Go home.”

“Going.” As far as the next room. He rustles his clothes in a putting-them-on fashion, picks them all up, slips his shoes on, and walks across the floor, out the bedroom, through the apartment and then opens and closes the front door. Sneaky, and possibly doomed to failure, but it’s got to be worth a try. Then he drops his clothes out of immediate sight, takes his shoes off very, very quietly and waits in her living room. After a few seconds the silent air is moved by a sound which is quite definitely misery. The noise emerges from the bathroom and, by the sounds of rustling bedclothes, sits itself in bed. He continues to wait. After much too long the noises drift into the slow soft breaths of near-sleep, at which point Castle silently pads back into the bedroom, notes that Beckett is curled up into a tight, defensive ball barely occupying a third of her bed – and placed nowhere near the slight dent that his weight had left – and slips back into his space to pull her firmly over his chest and tuck her into his arm.

“Stop hiding. Just tell me what’s upsetting you. Or at least tell me you are upset, rather than running off.”

“I’m upset. Now go home.”

“No. I’m going to cuddle you till you’re not upset any more.”

“I don’t want you to. I want you all to stop trying to fix me and stop trying to make me be who you think I should be and stop pretending any of you have a single fucking clue about living with alcoholics and how you cope with it.” She heaves in a breath. “I’ve done my time in therapy.” It sounds unpleasantly similar in tone and view to I served my sentence. “I’ve dealt with all of this. I don’t need to go through it again and I’m not going to discuss it any more.”

Castle – for once – does not lose his temper at Beckett’s stubborn refusal to accept that there is the slightest problem. He wants to. He wants to pick her up and shake her and then drive her to the nearest therapist and have her committed until she recognises that there is an issue and she does need to deal with it. He’s sure Lanie would help him.
Instead, he says placidly, “Okay then. We won’t talk about it. I’ll still cuddle you, though. Cuddles are good. Hugs make everything better.” Whatever she’s just said, she hasn’t actually tried to move. If she had, he would have let go. If she tries now, he’ll let go: not that he’ll like it, but he will. Besides which, sitting waiting for her to emerge from the bathroom, he’s evolved a plan, which depends on Beckett still being prepared to speak to him at ten a.m. tomorrow morning, or at the very least not having shot him. So instead he maintains amiability, kisses her hair softly, and drops into sleep still hugging her.

He wakes up far too early for a Saturday morning: the harsh buzz of what must be Beckett’s alarm scraping his ears raw. There’s a muttered curse from the far side of the bed, and the buzz is switched off. Some time during the night Beckett has detached herself from him and stayed detached. He’s not impressed. He’s less impressed when she vacates the bed and occupies the bathroom. Door locked, again. He could have improved her shower enormously, given the chance. Castle is still here. This is not at all helpful. He’d been far too ready to drop the conversation last night despite all his suggestions about how far he would push it, (and she really does not want to call his bluff about Montgomery knowing) and consequently Beckett is still thoroughly suspicious of his motives for staying over. Her nice hot shower doesn’t wholly help. Setting her hair and make-up and general demeanour to Detective-Beckett-normal, however, and then ignoring Castle’s hopefully lecherous leer as she dresses in her assertively tailored shirt and dress pants, does. Camouflage is not only for the military.

“Bathroom’s there, if you want to wash. Spare toothbrush in the cabinet. I’ll put coffee on.” She’s entirely brisk, precinct-normal Beckett. And why does she have a spare toothbrush? She shouldn’t need to have a spare toothbrush.

The toothbrush is still in its wrapping. Being a curious soul, he looks at it as he unwraps. It looks like it was bought about two years ago. He feels happier immediately, which is entirely ridiculous because he only met Beckett six months ago. He showers and brushes his teeth, hunts around for a few moments and, slightly guiltily, borrows a handy and very feminine razor (he is not meeting Jim looking like a panhandler) and shaves rather uncomfortably. He just wishes he didn’t have to get dressed in yesterday’s clothes. There isn’t quite time to get home and change, and it makes him feel indefinably dirty.

Or maybe that’s just how his plan makes him feel. Soiled, tarnished, and grubby. But this cannot go on. It really cannot go on. He’d rather feel smudged and dirty now than watch Beckett continue as she has been. He can’t fix her. Therefore, he needs to push her towards a situation where someone else will help her fix herself. He’s going to use her guilt about her father to make that happen, and it makes him feel smirched and dishonest, but it’s the only way.

Beckett inhales her first coffee as she does every day, scalding, strong and barely touching the sides as it goes down. She’s refilling her mug as Castle appears, and diverts to fill his too. Her look as he approaches is her normal professional, civil demeanour. She’s going to treat this as just another way of dealing with a witness. As long as she hangs on to that concept, this will pass off perfectly well. Nothing to worry about. But the coffee hasn’t eased the sick nervousness in her gut. She can’t call her dad: that would prove to him that she doesn’t trust him and she absolutely can’t do that. She sips her coffee and lets it salve – but not cure – her fears: coating herself in the cool shell of command and the confidence she has at work.

Castle is inching closer to her, presumably hoping she either won’t notice or won’t object. She doesn’t know why he bothers sneaking, when he’s so very bad at it. He’s about as inconspicuous as an elephant, and makes the same amount of noise. She’s expecting the arm to arrive around her, and is not surprised at all when it does. She is rather surprised at how comforting it feels. She’d been rather surprised by how familiar it had felt to wake up next to Castle, too. Untangling herself had been a necessity, though. Snuggling in would only have led to trouble. Trouble, in this case, meaning being late for her dad.

Her dad is quite suspicious enough – and far too busy trying to match-make them as a consequence. When it all goes wrong, he’ll be upset if he thinks he’s contributed to the failure. He’d made it fairly clear that he thought she should have some fun with Castle, and now he’s trying to make that happen. More assumptions about who she should be and how she should behave. And when this all goes wrong, her father will expect her to be upset, no matter how she hides it, then try to shoulder some of a blame that isn’t his, and she’ll be watching to make sure he doesn’t try to drown it: all the time knowing that the blame is hers.

Therefore, she makes no attempt to move closer or snuggle into Castle’s embrace. Instead, she projects calm confidence and nothing more. She can’t afford not to. She has to get through this morning by herself.

“More coffee?” she asks. “We’ll need to go soon.”

“No thanks.” He wants to say stop pretending, stop acting, lean on me; because you need something or someone. Instead he forces himself to stick to neutrality and his plan. “Any breakfast?” He looks plaintive. “Breakfast is a very important meal, Beckett.”

“Dad’ll have something,” she says. “He usually does.” She gives a social smile. “He thinks I should eat more. I’m sure he’ll have catered for you too.”

“Okay,” he pouts. “But it’s very unfair of you not to have any breakfast.”

“Stop pouting, Castle. You’re supposed to be an adult.”

“Nah. Acting like a nine-year old is much more fun.” Beckett rolls her eyes and sighs. Castle leers. “Except in certain circumstances, of course.” She sighs again.

“Time to go.”

Castle grins happily. “We’ll go in my car. I get to drive.”

“Huh?”

“Well, I drove you home last night. So my car is here. So we might as well use it.” Beckett just knows she’s looking fairly nonplussed. Castle improves the moment. “Come on. Time I did some chauffeuring and paid for the gas. You always drive. My turn.” She opens her mouth to argue and then realises that they really do have to get going.

“Okay.” The stunned look on Castle’s face is almost enough to remove the worry from her gut. Almost. Maybe it’s as well he’s driving. Her concentration is a little shot right now, and it’s not only because of her father. How did Castle stay all night? How did she not realise – and why has she taken two cups of coffee and almost an hour to work it out? Where the hell is her brain? She needs to pull herself together and get on top of the day, stat. She can’t afford to make slip-ups with her dad – and what with Castle staying the night (seriously? How?) there are a whole new set of danger points to be negotiated.

Traffic is light, and they’re pulling up outside her dad’s at the right time. Castle is a remarkably smooth driver, but when she distracts herself by asking about it, he mutters something embarrassed about how it put a constantly-crying baby Alexis to sleep and changes the subject hurriedly to the excellence of the milkshakes at Remy’s. Beckett has never seen Castle drink or order a milkshake, at Remy’s or anywhere else. However, she does appreciate the change of subject. She really does not need to know about parental interactions. Her worry returns full-force, and by the time they’re knocking on the door she’s close to chewing her fingernails off. Mentally, of course. To the uninitiated eye she’s bright and cheerful.

Castle is waiting for disaster to ensue. He just isn’t quite sure what sort of disaster to prepare for, on what sort of scale. This could be anything from the relatively mild issue of knocking over the milk, through an alien invasion, right up to the ultimate disaster of drinking Beckett’s coffee. He recognises his frivolity as a cover for his nervousness that Jim has fallen back down his alcoholic rabbit-hole, and – since Beckett hasn’t – knocks on Jim’s door.

Beckett notes with thoroughgoing relief, which she only just manages to hide, that her father is bright, bouncy and stone-cold sober. One problem down. In fact, he is sporting a very mischievous expression that she last saw over the Christmas dinner table when he informed Beckett that he, her father, ought to meet Castle. It very belatedly occurs to Beckett that her dad has achieved this on more than one occasion. Hard upon that thought she wonders if her dad is messing with her deliberately. Surely not? Now she’s really losing it.

“Breakfast, Katie?”

“Sure, Dad.”

“Please,” Castle adds. He can feel his stomach shrinking by the second. Doesn’t Beckett eat? She must eat. He ought to pay more attention. He’s sure he’d notice if she was much thinner, though. After all, certain areas would be smaller – he had better stop that line of thought in her father’s house. It’s unlikely to be good for his health.

Jim produces enough breakfast to feed a pride of hungry lions. Castle makes substantial inroads, Jim puts away at least twice what Castle would expect, and Beckett has one waffle with fruit and four more cups of coffee.

“Katie, you should eat more,” Jim says.

Beckett winces. “Dad, it’s lovely but I’ve had all I want. If I have any more maple syrup I’ll grow leaves.”

“Okay. If you’re finished, then” – he looks at Castle, who unconcernedly acquires another mouthful of bacon, grinning as he swallows – “you can explain this idea that you’ve cooked up.”

“He cooked up.”

Castle’s grin turns to a seraphic smile.

“You said you wanted me to talk to some woman you collected on a case because her husband is drinking too much.” Castle notes with some amusement that Jim is winding his daughter up, and Beckett hasn’t yet realised it.

“Yeah…” she drags out.

“You don’t sound too convinced.”

“I… didn’t think you’d want to get involved.”

“Hm. Why ever not?” He fixes Beckett with a beady eye. “I think it might be interesting.” Her jaw drops. “My sponsor’s been telling me I ought to do a little more for others. Part of the program. This might be a good way to start. Tell me a bit more.”

Beckett outlines some of the details. Castle observes a series of carefully concealed omissions from the history, starting with lunches with Julia and definitely including going chasing round Manhattan looking for David Berowitz – come to think of which, they haven’t heard from O’Leary about that. To the best of his knowledge, Beckett hasn’t checked her phone either. He is definitely not reminding her about it. She doesn’t need dragged into that and the whole point of being here is that she starts getting dragged out of that. Oh yeah – he’d told O’Leary not to call Beckett, but Julia.

Jim smiles. Castle’s instincts all go on full alert. Something’s up here. He doesn’t know what, but as a sneaky father himself, he’s sure that something is up. At that point he remembers that he had a plan too.

“Okay,” Jim says. “Let me think about it for a few minutes. We can talk about something else. Rick and I can discuss daughters – didn’t you say you had a teen, Rick? If she’s anything like Katie was, you’ll have your hands full.” Beckett squawks.

“A Alexis is pretty sensible,” Castle says, ignoring Beckett’s disgruntled mutters. “I don’t know quite what I did to deserve that.”

“Good luck,” Jim says with feeling. “You got a picture?” And now Castle is absolutely sure that something is going on here, because Jim has inadvertently – or is it inadvertent? He looks oddly satisfied – just played into his plan. He extricates a relatively recent photo which he has on his phone and passes the device over. “She’s pretty,” Jim says. “Doesn’t look much like you, except around the eyes.”

“Just as well,” Beckett mutters blackly.

“She hated her hair when she was a pre-teen, but now she’s really proud of it.”

Jim looks at the picture again. “I’ve got some photos of Katie as a child,” he starts.

“Dad!”

“I’d love to see them,” Castle says simultaneously.

Jim looks at Beckett, who appears to Castle to be close to explosion. And then she looks back at her father and pulls it all into herself and simply says, “Fine,” with a cheery smile.

Photos? He still has photos? She’d thought they had all been… lost. Her father is bustling around to some purpose, and rapidly produces several albums. Castle is full of bright-eyed enthusiasm. She is not. She doesn’t need reminded how it used to be. She hardens her shell. She can get through this. She wonders what her dad is doing, though. It’s not like he and Castle are best buddies. At least he hasn’t been freaked out by the suggestion of talking to Julia Berowitz.

She slips into a detached reverie of her own, not paying any real attention to what’s going on, until the sound of chortling Castle breaks through. “She did?”

“Did what?” she snaps, coming to full attention.

“Walked out of ballet class and refused to go back because the teacher was picking on someone.”

“Dad, how about we leave my past misdeeds out of this? I don’t need them revisited.”
“I didn’t think that was a misdeed, Katie. Your mother was very proud of you.”

Beckett flashes back to that day. Now, she merely wonders if that action hadn’t simply been pre-teen manipulation under the guise of helping someone. She’d been looking for a way out of ballet in any event. This way she had been able to claim a principled reason. Bit like her reasoning for not collecting David Berowitz, really. Or her reasoning for abandoning her dad. She curls into herself a little more, and loses herself in her dark thoughts.

“Katie,” her dad is saying. “Wake up.”

“I’m not asleep. Have you finished with the ancient history?”

“Rick was very impressed,” her dad says, grinning mischievously. “He’s offered to show me all his photos in return.”

“He’ll need a truck to bring them here, I should think,” Beckett responds absently – and suddenly wakes up. Unfortunately it’s too late.

“Oh no. He invited us over to see them.”

“What?”

“Rick’s invited us over for dinner tonight.”

Beckett glances once at Castle, and then back to her father. Both of them, after a slightly flummoxed expression on Castle’s face, now look oddly and similarly determined that this should happen. This is clearly the other shoe that didn’t drop last night. Catch-22. She can do what she wants to do, which is say No, and then have to explain to her father why; or she can sit it out and try to get through it without giving anything away. Or, of course, she could shoot both Castle and her father. The last would solve more problems than it caused, though on the downside she’d have plenty of time to contemplate her problem-free life in Bedford Hills Correctional. Or maybe she could make it to a non-extradition territory in time. She could go straight from here to JFK and leave for … Guatemala, say.

“Really?” she says calmly. “How nice.” She doesn’t notice her father’s sharp glance at her tone, since she’s regarding Castle’s bland expression. It says more clearly than words ever could Who’s calling whose bluff now, Beckett?
Castle doesn’t think that this Valentine’s Day is likely to hold anything other than a massacre, now. Sure, he’d had a plan. But it seems like Jim had also had a plan, which was a lot more far reaching than Castle’s plan – and Jim has managed not only to execute his plan but drag Castle right into the middle of it too. Jim, Castle reflects bitterly, is a very clever man indeed. Not to mention Machiavellian. Castle had only planned to let Jim see Beckett’s inability to participate in any family memories of her own, and let him draw his own conclusions. Jim, on the other hand, had very expertly manoeuvred Castle into inviting both Becketts for dinner. He hadn’t even realised that was what was happening until Jim had said That’ll be great, Rick. Oh, fuck. He is so dead. He is deader than dead. No-one will ever find his body. He’s about to be incinerated. Cremated. Torched. There won’t even be ash left.

Jim, Castle thinks, is about as weak as a tsunami, and he’s just been drowned in a combination of his own and Beckett’s assumptions about her father’s stability and strength. On the other hand, since Jim’s lit the fuse, he might as well take advantage of it. He returns Beckett’s fulminating stare with a bland look.

“It will be nice,” her father says happily. “Someone else’s cooking – you told me Rick was a good cook over Christmas lunch – and good company. What time shall we arrive?”

“Oh” – Castle is slightly flustered by the turn of events – “seven. Don’t bring anything.” He colours. “But…”

“Soda’s fine for me,” Jim says without any embarrassment. “You don’t need to stay dry.” He produces that same gamin smile he’d had in his own offices. “I’m looking forward to it already.”

And if that isn’t a hint to leave, Castle will eat every single book of Patterson’s last, excessively large, print run without ketchup. “I’d better go get started,” he says. “Want a ride, Beckett?”

“I’d rather you stayed, Katie. Tell me a bit more about Mrs Berowitz. I think I should have a chat with my sponsor before I make any promises, but I’d like all the facts first.”

“See you tonight,” Castle produces through a rictus grin, and makes for the door in a rapid scuttle. He can’t help feeling that he’s just dodged a Beckett bullet – though he’s not sure from which Beckett – and that Beckett is not about to dodge a Jim Beckett bullet.

The door closes behind Castle. Beckett can’t decide whether that’s good, because it removes the temptation to pull out her gun (which she hasn’t actually put on this morning, not that this lack is presently impinging on her violent thoughts) or bad, because now she’s being questioned by her father.

“So, Katie. Now tell me a bit more about Mrs Berowitz.” Jim fixes her with a parentally interrogative stare. “You can start with why you’re helping her out at all.”

“Her son was murdered.”

“How many murders do you deal with every year? Every month? Katie, why did you get so involved with her?”

Beckett doesn’t answer. There is no good answer. All her answers start and end with because I know what she’s going to go through and I couldn’t leave her to it all alone. Like I was alone.
“Katie, I get that you feel sorry for her. Fellow feeling. You’ve been there.” She stares at him, wide-eyed and appalled. This is a matter they simply never discuss. “You don’t need to dance around it,” Jim says gently. “It’s not going to upset me if you say so.” It won’t upset you. Really? In that case why have you avoided this topic for years? It never occurs to her that he might not have wanted to upset her. “Anyway, she’s not your friend or family. Why haven’t you simply sent her to Al-Anon or therapy and let her go? It worked for you.” Beckett conceals a violent shudder.

“I…” she starts, and can’t find a following word.

“Katie, I’m worried about you.” Oh fuck, not you too, Dad. Will you all just stop worrying about me!

“I’m fine.” Jim raises an extremely sceptical pair of eyebrows at her. “You don’t need to worry about me. Work’s fine, I’m fine, and I even took your advice and patched things up with Castle.” The sceptical look doesn’t diminish.

“Hm,” Jim hums, with an inflection that brings back an unpleasant memory of being grilled about teenage misdeeds. “Why don’t I believe you? Except for the patched up piece. I notice you didn’t say fixed.”

“Dad, this is not a cross-examination and I’m not a witness. You’re chopping semantics. Castle and I are good.” More sceptical eyebrows.

“That’s nice,” Jim says blandly. “Because it looked to me like you weren’t too keen on dinner at Rick’s. Bit surprising, if you’re all good. Just like it was surprising that you didn’t even look at the photos – if only to stop Rick seeing all the ones of you as a cute toddler.”

Beckett casts up silent and bitter imprecations to the unresponsive skies. When did her dad suddenly start being interested in her life again? This is not helpful. Everything is fine. Everything is just fine. As long as everyone stops asking questions, worrying, and generally interfering.

Jim unobtrusively surveys his Katie. He’s not at all satisfied by her explanations. True, she’s seemed fine for all of the five years he’s been sober, but now he’s worried about her, and it really got going right about the moment he overheard her arguing with Rick. He’s relied on her to be there for him for the last five years because she’s always been right there for him, and he’s only recently realised both that and that it’s become something of a habit. One he thinks he ought to cut down. He remembers his own words to Rick, talking to cover the clear fight and everyone’s embarrassment. Always there when I need her. But he doesn’t need her nearly as much as he likes seeing her or speaking to her, or nearly as much as she thinks he does.

This morning has all been rather peculiar, he thinks with lawyerly understatement. As had been the collective Sorry game. Katie had been oddly uncompetitive, for someone who’d been playing to win since she was old enough to hang on to her toys. Katie, Jim thinks, is hiding an awful lot of somethings. How fortunate that he had met Rick. Now, about this broken bird of Katie’s...

“Well, anyway,” he says, leaving it for now till he can do a little self-analysis, (and a lot of Katie-analysis) “about this Julia Berowitz. Sounds interesting. I’ll talk to Ed, and let you both know tonight, if I can get hold of him. I’ll meet you at Rick’s. You’d better tell me where it is and, just in case there’s some problem on the subway, give me his cell number so I can call.”

“You could call me, and I’d tell him.”

“I taught you better manners than that, Katie. Always make your own apologies.”

Beckett provides the address and, with well-concealed suspicion, Castle’s number. She is not at all happy about any of this. However. It’s one evening. She’s had time to get over herself and her stupid, petty, selfish resentments. She’s past the danger point of early January by some way. She can deal with this in a civil, grown-up fashion. And she will. She has to. If she can get through this evening, then clearly there’s nothing that needs fixing. She’s just fine. It was just a temporary blip. Lanie and Castle are wrong.

“Anything else, Dad? If not, I’d better go do my chores. I’ll see you later on.”

Jim moves across to give his daughter a hug, and doesn’t miss the slight stiffness before she returns the gesture.

“See you later, Bug.”

He watches her depart with an aggravated click of heels that, as her dad, he is fairly certain equates to her four-year old pout, and pours himself another cup of coffee, since it’s there. Then he settles down to do a little hard thinking. He may be in his late fifties, but he is neither old nor stupid, and over the last month or so it’s become apparent, courtesy of the rather large personality of one Rick Castle and Katie’s wildly varying reactions to said Rick Castle over the previous couple of months, that Katie is not as happy as she’s been making out.

He frowns gently. At Christmas, Katie had been – for her – quite loquacious on the subject of “Castle”. Then she hadn’t mentioned him again. Then he’d walked into that row. Then Rick had come to see him, clearly annoyed with Katie (Jim can understand that. Katie’s stubbornness was annoying when she was a teen. It hasn’t improved any with age.) but perfectly capable of putting up a fight of his own. Jim thinks that Rick would be good for Katie, and is certainly not above some well-designed parental interference, starting with the Sorry game and continuing with both today’s breakfast and suckering Rick into inviting them both for dinner tonight.

He leans back in his comfortable chair and smiles angelically at the ceiling. Now to call Ed and discuss whether this way-out idea of Katie’s would be a good plan. He really thinks that it might. Ed’s been suggesting for a while that he should consider being a sponsor. He’s always declined. But… maybe he should reconsider. He’ll park that. He can’t be available all the time. Being an attorney tends to occupy quite a lot of his time.

He picks up his phone and stores Rick’s number in it. He wants a little discussion with Rick when Katie is not present. A father should get to know his daughter’s male acquaintances, after all. One never knows when a shotgun might be appropriate. Though in this case, he might need to apply it to Katie.

He taps a speed dial. “Hi, Ed. It’s Jim. No, no problems. Quite the opposite, in fact.”

---

Castle spends the remainder of the morning in several excellent food stores plotting a meal suitable for anywhere between three and five people, though he’s rather hoping that his mother will not form part of the group. He’s not really convinced that she will be a mollifying presence at what is absolutely certain to be an uncomfortable meal. He still has no idea how Jim suckered him into issuing an invitation. He’s not even sure that he actually did issue an invitation.

It is going to be difficult, to say the least. Beckett – Kate Beckett, that is – hasn’t been near the loft since he told her he wasn’t doing it any more and she assumed they were over. He doesn’t imagine that she’s going to be any more comfortable here than she was then, and he hates seeing her locked down and pretending to enjoy anything with artificially social manners. Jim Beckett is definitely stirring the pot, but if his mother is there then that’s a fight waiting to happen. His mother’s over-exuberant alcohol-fuelled diva-ness is hardly likely to mesh well with a dry, dry-humoured attorney.
And then, of course, there’s the fact that Beckett is likely to believe that he was in on Jim’s shenanigans, so that’s Castle’s chance of a pleasant evening gone west, and then there’s Alexis. Alexis will no doubt be delighted to see Beckett, who in her turn will not be delighted to see Alexis at home with Castle and therefore will be contrasting her own relationship with Jim in every second of the whole fiasco.

He considers, in no particular order, screaming, fainting, and emigrating, both now and, quite possibly, later. He is so dead.

He’s been home a while, morosely playing shoot-em-ups (and imagining Jim’s face on every victim) until he can expel his frustration by chopping vegetables and ripping lettuce for the salad. The dressing won’t need vinegar, he thinks, all it’ll need is Beckett glaring at it to sour it. He returns to shooting aliens and enemies.

His cell phone chirps with, when he checks, an unknown number displayed. “Rick Castle,” he says suavely. It might, after all, be a good unknown caller, such as a seller of dubious blue pills of which he has no need, or an insurance salesman. Surely he’s due for something to go right today.

“It’s Jim Beckett.” Nope, nothing is going to go right at all. He just left Jim’s. He shouldn’t hear from Jim till he turns up around seven tonight. “Rick” – he pauses, and Castle suddenly realises that Jim is a touch embarrassed – “I…er… don’t exactly want you to tattle out of school, but…um…” Castles sees that the light at the end of the tunnel is the oncoming, flaming asteroid aiming straight for his head. He knows what Jim is going to say next even before he utters the words. “…is there something up with Katie?” Oh fuck fuck fuck. Why me?

“Shouldn’t you be asking her that?” he retorts, and as rapidly realises his error.

“So there is. I knew it.”

Castle returns to the relative merits of screaming, fainting and then emigrating. He’s heard that Belize is quite pretty.

“Why ask me, then, if you knew?”

“To see what you’d say.” Castle can’t stop his irritated growl. “Now I know that you’re worried too.”

“How?”

“If you weren’t, you’d have denied it.”

Castle decides, not for the first or indeed fifty-first time today, that he cordially detests clever, Machiavellian attorneys in general and Jim in particular. He might as well start on the cyanide now, since he’s never going to survive dinner.

“What’s Katie not telling me, Rick?”

Castle’s patience expires without a whimper. “Ask her yourself. I’m not telling tales on a grown adult.”

“Oh, I will. But right now I’m asking you to tell me straight what’s up.”

“No.”

“I’m Katie’s father. You can’t tell me you wouldn’t be interrogating your daughter’s boyfriend in similar circumstances."

“No, I can’t. But just because you’re Beckett’s father doesn’t mean I have to answer you. If you want to know what’s wrong, ask her. I’m not telling you her business.”

“So you do know?”

“That is none of your business. It’s between Beckett and me and no-one else. This friendly chat” – the acid in Castle’s tone could dissolve rock – “is done. See you at seven. Bye.”

“Bye,” says Jim to an empty line, and grins widely into thin air. He knew Rick was the right sort of man for Katie. He’d have thought a lot less of him if he’d actually answered. Still, he will have to find out what’s wrong somehow. Maybe he’ll manage to find out more over dinner. Katie really hadn’t been too keen on going. He begins to arrange his thoughts, much in the manner he would for a work meeting at which he might not be too sure that his client was telling him the whole story. Legal analysis can be so useful, Jim thinks a little cynically, for taking the emotion out of a situation which is bound to result in strong emotions.

Less cynically, and more worryingly, he wonders how long he’s been missing the signs that his daughter has been hiding her thoughts and feelings from him – and why she’s doing it. He considers the need to take inventory of the situation, and whether, although he thought that he had made amends to Katie, there is work still to be done.

That thought leads him to wonder whether Katie thinks he’s made sufficient amends. She’s always said so… but then, she never raises the subject. He’d always thought that meant that they’d made it right. Now he wonders if they really have. He lapses into some serious thought about how cheerful Katie always seems to be when she sees him. Of course, that’s on a schedule. She hadn’t been cheerful at all when he’d walked in on that row. Come to think of it, Rick had looked like he’d seen a ghost when he, Jim, had started talking, and Katie had shut that whole conversation down right quick, and then packed Rick off in short order and distracted him on to talking about the conference all evening. Jim wonders exactly what that row had been about. He’d assumed it was the equivalent of a lovers’ tiff, and Katie hadn’t said anything the next time he saw her to cause him to disagree, but… now he’s realised something’s off, he is not nearly as convinced. Sure, lovers’ tiff was likely part of it, but there’s more.

He should have applied some intelligence to this a couple of weeks back, he thinks. Dammit, what’s the point of the twelve steps – and in particular the tenth step – if he doesn’t do it? Rick hadn’t come to talk to him about the book, in fact, though Jim had only really heard Rick’s promise not to use his history. He’d actually said that Katie wouldn’t let Rick in because she thought it would hurt him, her father.

Oh, Katie. What the hell are you doing? What the hell are you hiding?

Jim acquires a nastily sinking feeling that Katie’s view of what he needs from her is entirely different from what he thought he was asking of her. He thought that he was asking for sociable family time – except when he was forced to attend conferences, of course – she seems to think that she’s protecting him from every last breath of wind. Oh, God. Not for the first time, Jim wishes that Johanna was still there. She had always been much better at understanding Katie than he had. Well, he’s all there is. He’d better get on and deal with this. Be parental. Or paternal.

If Katie was locking Rick out (Jim is sure that Katie is considerably more fond of Rick than she’s letting on) in case Jim got hurt… what else is she locking out? And… could she be doing so to keep protecting him? Rick had certainly thought that, and Jim had been rather impressed by Rick. Okay, dinner tonight just got a lot more important.
He settles back in his chair, flicks idly through the family photos, and remembers Johanna and Katie, as they all used to be, until it’s time to go. For all the sadness of the drifting memories, he’s not in the slightest tempted to seek out oblivion.

Beckett is staring morosely at the appalling weather and wishing she could go and punch the bag for a while. Since that’s not possible, thanks to her enforced leave, she settles for some soothing music and a high level yoga workout which takes all her concentration if she is not to knot herself into a painful state of pretzel-ness. (It would stop her being able to go to dinner, but the ER isn’t that much fun.) She may be flexible, but she is not a contortionist. After a long session, she is around half-way soothed, and certainly capable of preserving her composure all the way through dinner. She showers, dresses again in clothes which reinforce her daytime, confident, Detective Kate Beckett persona, determines to pick up a box of chocolates on the way as an appropriate gift for a guest to bring, and departs.
I'm someone's child

Castle spends the latter part of the afternoon cooking, with intense attention to detail. Never have vegetables been so precisely and evenly chopped to join such perfectly and precisely chopped meat within a casserole dish. Neither has lettuce ever been shredded with quite such ferocity, or radishes topped and tailed so harshly.

Many things have contributed to his lack of harmony. He is still annoyed with Jim. His mother is present, and has taken the opportunity to make several digs about the lack of alcohol (at four p.m.?) available before people get here, and about the lack of Beckett for some time. She had strongly implied that Castle should have invited Beckett over far sooner and that if she wouldn’t come it was Castle’s fault. Alexis was delighted that Beckett was coming, but had compounded Castle’s bad temper by agreeing with her Grams. Castle is not notably keen on being dressed down by his family, especially when it’s based on unfounded assumptions, and had, as a result, been rather sharper than he normally is with Alexis, who has retreated to her own room and resolutely refused to assist with anything, claiming that homework takes priority. His mother had not, unfortunately, taken sufficient umbrage to retreat from the loft. Neither of them have really registered that Beckett’s father is coming. And, of course, Beckett is going to be in an appalling state of tension from the get-go, and he can do nothing at all about it.

This evening is shaping up to be a disaster comparable only to the 1906 San Francisco earthquake, with a rather lower probability of survival.

However, dinner is cooking, everything is in readiness, and the loft is full of the delicious aroma of a wonderfully tasty winter beef stew, with dumplings, and an apple and blackberry pie for dessert. There will be warm bread rolls, and the salad is appealingly green and red. The table is cheerfully green and red too: he’s used a tablecloth with a holly pattern. Maybe a cheerful atmosphere will induce a more cheerful evening.

The door sounds at seven, and despite Castle’s best efforts Alexis flings herself down the stairs and gets to it before he does. There goes his last chance to have even a moment’s private conversation and reassurance with Beckett – if it is Beckett – before the first circle of hell opens up to swallow him.

At seven p.m. Beckett knocks on Castle’s door, an expensive box of chocolates in hand, and her social face painted on. She wouldn’t admit out loud to the usefulness of a Mission Impossible false face, but if one had appeared in her apartment she’d certainly have considered applying it. Naturally, the door is opened by Alexis, who is chirpily and sincerely delighted to see her. Beckett is suitably civil and happy to see her too, aided immensely by the need to hand over the chocolates, enquire about the tantalising aromas, and come inside and take her coat off. She has left her gun at home. No point in making it easy to be tempted. There will be quite enough flashpoints over dinner, she is sure.

Surprisingly, she’s arrived ahead of her dad, who turns up – also bearing chocolates – just as she’s being encouraged to sit down with a drink. This time Castle makes it to the door first, though that’s probably because Alexis is peppering Beckett with questions about how being an ME works.

“Jim, come in.” Jim sniffs, and acquires a blissful expression.

“I haven’t smelt cooking that good in years.”

“I thought Beckett” – Jim starts – “Kate, sorry, I get used to hearing her called Beckett so…” he trails off that line and restarts – “was a reasonable cook.”

There’s a not-too-muffled snigger. “Katie? Cook? Sure Katie can cook. But she doesn’t cook like this. We never have casseroles or anything like that. She only cooks that Georgian food she likes or pasta. Or salads.” His nose scrunches up in mild disgust, with which expression he closely resembles Beckett.

“Georgian food? That doesn’t sound too bad, though I never liked grits. I like peaches, though.”

Jim is looking pityingly at him, shaking his greying head. “Not the state of Georgia. The country. Katie never told you she was in Kiev for a while?”

“No.” Kiev? Kiev, Ukraine?

“She speaks some Russian. Actually, a lot of Russian.” Castle hadn’t noticed that, either. “Likes Russian literature.” He’d seen that she had a lot of books, but he’d never got close enough to her bookshelf really to register what they were.

“Are you telling stories again, Dad?” Beckett says sardonically.

“How did you guess?”

“Detective.”

“Oh yes.” He grins at her.

Alexis comes up, and extends a hand. “Mr Beckett?” she says brightly, “I’m Alexis.”

“I know,” Jim grins. “Your father told me about you.”

Alexis smiles back. “He does that,” she says. “I’m really quite normal. Don’t pay any attention to him.”

“Don’t be like that, young lady. Everybody’s daughter is the most wonderful daughter ever. It’s the rule. I’m fairly sure there must have been a case about it back in the day.”

“You’re a lawyer?”

“Yes.”

“Great!” Jim looks completely flabbergasted. No-one is ever pleased to meet a lawyer. “You can tell me all about it. Next year we’re supposed to start thinking about internships and I really want to be a bit ahead of the game…” She drags Jim to a chair, sits next to him and starts to grill him. Beckett watches from a safe distance, somewhat confounded by the turn of events and the amusement on her father’s face.

“Pumpkin,” Castle says, and has to repeat it, more sharply. “I think Mr Beckett would like something to drink. We have a choice of soft drinks and sodas.” Alexis is recalled to some semblance of party manners and Jim is shortly provided with a soda to wet his throat as Alexis returns to cross-examining him, in the nicest possible way. It doesn’t appear to Beckett that her dad has any objection at all to spilling out answers to all her questions. They’re getting on beautifully. This is good. One less danger point, or tension. It really is good, how comfortable her father is here, in a family environment.

But deep down in the nasty little dark corner of her soul where she puts all her pathetic bitterness and envy of Alexis’s relationship with Alexis’s father, a little seed of guilt and resentment that Beckett’s dad can so easily be sincerely comfortable with Castle and his daughter starts to germinate. Maybe, its rootlets imply, maybe it’s just that your father isn’t wholly comfortable with you. Maybe your façade isn’t quite good enough. Or maybe he hasn’t really forgiven you for walking away, whatever he’s said.* None of that makes it to her conscious mind. She sips her wine, and tries to ignore her vague, unpleasant feelings of discomfort, forcing herself to happiness that her father is welcomed in so warmly.

Castle is presently pleasantly surprised at how well the beginning of the evening is going. Alexis has clearly taken to Jim – she’s never had a grand*father,* and it’s not as if his mother is ever going to be described as grandmotherly – and he’s equally clearly enjoying being grilled. Now, if only introducing his mother could go as well… and here she is.

Martha arrives at the top of the stairs and – well – makes an entrance, in one of her usual eye-scorchingly colourful outfits. Neon fuchsia-pink, with fringing.

“Darlings,” she emotes, stage charm on full power. “How lovely to see you. Her eye falls on Beckett. “Detective Beckett – surely I can call you Katherine – I’m so glad that my son had the sense to invite you back again. He’s been so sulky without you.” Both Castle and Beckett wince.
“And you must be Katherine’s father.” Martha looks him up and down appraisingly and then produces a blindingly attractive smile. “I can see you in her.” Jim melts under the statement. He’d been so used to everyone saying how much Katie resembled her mother, that when someone points out that there’s a resemblance to him, he’s powerless against it. “Come and talk to me, while these young fry do things to our dinner. I’m sure we’ll have lots in common.”

Castle watches his mother annex Jim from Alexis without pause for breath and simply hopes that she’s not sizing him up for her next conquest. He has to say that he had not expected his mother to take a liking to him. Broadway diva meets buttoned-up corporate lawyer is not normally a happy mix. Especially when one is dry and the other is emphatically not. He flicks a glance at Beckett, who is now back to being cross-examined by Alexis, and notes with relief that she seems to be perfectly okay too. Somewhat flabbergasted by the effect of Hurricane Martha, but that’s pretty much the reaction of any normal person to his mother. He breathes a silent sigh of considerable relief, and relaxes into the evening.

Everything still appears to be going just beautifully partway through the meal. His cooking is excellent – certainly it’s disappearing rapidly – and conversation is flowing. His mother and Jim have, of all things, bonded over Samuel Beckett plays.

“You know how it is, you look up famous people with the same surname to see if you’re related way back - we weren’t, but it was fun finding out – and go see a play, and I found I liked it.” Jim is self-deprecating. Martha becomes enthusiastic.

“I’ve never acted in a Beckett play,” she admits, “but I do enjoy them. Such a contrast to the simplicity of Broadway musicals and popular culture.”

“That’s what made you famous, Mother,” Castle points out. “Popular, simplistic culture.”

“Pshaw. Just because I act in it doesn’t mean that my range is limited to it, Richard. If that were true, you’d only read mysteries, since that’s all you write.”

Castle is silenced. Beckett sniggers, and Alexis outright laughs. Castle retires to his casserole, defeated, and consoles himself with his wine.

Over dessert, he continues to observe Beckett. He’s becoming less and less sure of her mood as time goes on. Not that she’s ever chatty, but though she’s playing her part in conversation with aplomb, he has the strangest impression that she’s more firmly retreated into herself than even that previous, disastrous occasion. It’s the same tense air of constraint, hidden behind the same cheerful social shell and conversation. What worries him is that he’s not clear about why. He’d expected her to be uncomfortable with Alexis, again – or still. It doesn’t seem to be wholly that, though there is a certain amount of reserve there, and the funny thing is that if he’d been asked to bet his life on it he’d have plumped for the major source of constraint being her father. It’s very odd. This time, after all, everybody’s absorbed her family into theirs. Sure, it’s no doubt disconcerting how readily Jim has been assimilated, but that should ease matters, not make them worse. Probably, he thinks, it’s a hangover of memories from the previous visit, and he can cure that soon enough.

Castle carries on his monitoring as he makes coffee. Jim, Alexis and his mother are still all happily arguing, with Beckett adding occasional sardonic stirs to the pot. It’s not till he catches a sidelong glance from Jim to his daughter that he puts it all together and realises that Beckett’s bright social manners are primarily for Jim, not for the collective Castles. Ah. Jim had been very politely definite about removing Castle and keeping Beckett, earlier. That would have been an interesting conversation to overhear. If Jim is working out that something is wrong – and his earlier call to Castle indicates that he certainly is – then Jim’s glances at his daughter aren’t simply the normal round of dinner party discussion. He’s watching her almost as carefully as Castle is, without the comfort – comfort? It’s hardly comfortable – of knowledge. Castle’s earlier tension and worry ratchets back up as he follows the undercurrents around the table, thanking his stars that his mother and daughter are wholly oblivious to anything other than the surface conversations.

Over coffee, it becomes clear that Beckett is beginning to look for an exit. She’s very subtly drooping, not quite yawning but not quite not, tiny indications of tiredness from a woman who never seems to tire in ordinary conditions. It’s all very clever and very careful: even his mother hasn’t spotted that it’s not completely real, and of course at after ten it’s quite believable that anyone would be tired. The interesting question is whether Jim has noticed the play. If he has, he’s not giving a single sign of it. It’s all very irritating. Castle had wanted Beckett to stay on after Jim left, for some gentle cosseting and more coffee, to make sure she was okay. She’s put that out of court.

Beckett can tell that she’s beginning to lose her ability to stay calm and civilised and appreciative of the efforts the Castles have made to welcome her dad in. She does appreciate it. It’s just that she’s watching her dad effortlessly relate to Alexis, who has an effortless relationship with her own father. It’s really good. It’s just that she doesn’t have that sort of relationship with her dad, and it’s pretty painful to watch him slot in and get on better – perhaps not better, but more easily – with a relative stranger in a family situation than he does with her. Painful, that is, because the only reason for it is clearly that she’s doing something wrong. It can’t be her father: that’s been amply demonstrated over this evening.

She’ll just have to try harder.

But not now. She needs to go home and regroup, not least because her unworthy feelings are beginning to get the better of her and there is no justification at all for them. Everybody’s been warm and welcoming and she simply needs – in a phrase Esposito often uses – to sort her own shit out. It’s barely acting for her to reveal tiredness: she is genuinely tired, and it’s well after ten. It doesn’t take long for her to have laid the groundwork to say, “I’m really sorry to break up the party, but I’m going to have to go.”

“I suppose it’s time I went too,” Jim puts in.

“You don’t have to go just because I do,” Beckett points out. “You can stay as long as the Castles like. I haven’t given you a curfew.” She smiles, mischievously. “Not like you used to try on me.”
“Not that it worked. No, Katie, it’s time for me to get home. These old bones”—Martha coughs—“I’m sorry, Martha, but I don’t have a fascinating job to keep me limber—need a good night’s sleep.”

Coats are assembled and the formalities of leave-taking exchanged. Finally the door closes and Beckett can escape. Unfortunately before that can occur her father needs to be disposed of, and he is disposed to talk.

“That was a really nice evening, Katie. Your Rick sure can cook. I like his family, too, though it must get a bit lively at times.”

“It was great,” she says. Her father glances sharply at her.

“Sure? I thought you were a bit quiet there at the end.”

“Just tired. Work’s been pretty busy since before Christmas.”

“I thought you’d had a couple of days off?”

“You know how that goes, Dad. Takes two days to work out how tired you really are, and then it lands on you.” She smiles, and changes the subject as they walk out past the doorman. “I didn’t know you liked Samuel Beckett?” Surely she should have done?

“I was dragged along when a colleague had a spare ticket. I didn’t expect to enjoy it—I’d rather have been at a baseball game—but I did. Guess you can teach an old dog new tricks.”

“You’re not that old. Look, there’s a cab. You’d better take it—there’s one right behind for me.”

“Okay. Night, Katie-bug.” He hugs her, and they depart to their separate cabs.

Beckett is barely halfway home before her phone tings with a text. You okay? Naturally, it’s from Castle. Fine, she sends back, and ignores the fact that actually she doesn’t really feel fine at all. She has not enjoyed this week at all. It’s left her with the unpleasant squirming in her stomach that makes her feel that however much she gives it isn’t ever enough.

She has a nice hot soothing shower and a nice hot soothing cup of hot chocolate and reads a nice soothing book of no literary merit whatsoever (but some hotness), and then she goes to her nice soothing bed, whose sheets are cool. Absolutely none of which soothes the twisting in her gut at all, which is still there in the morning, when she also remembers that she doesn’t know what happened with David Berowitz and she doesn’t know what her father decided about Julia, and she’d totally forgotten both matters. (not giving enough, her subconscious growls)

Jim occupies his cab and contemplates the evening with less than perfect happiness. He had very much enjoyed the collective Castle family, though he thinks that if he lived in that sort of chaotically emotional, theatrical atmosphere he would collapse into insanity within a week. Though maybe that’s just Martha. Certainly Rick has an aura of solid stability about him. Now, there’s a point. Why should he, Jim, think that that’s an advantage in dealing with Katie? Katie’s been a point of stability all through his troubles, and since. So why on earth is he suddenly thinking that Katie needs some stability of her own? He knows he’s not been stable for her, but he’d thought that her team, and that Lanie friend of hers, and her professional success (of which he is incredibly proud) had bolstered her: and she’s always been so down-to-earth and capable. He’s never felt that she’s looking for support.

Which of course doesn’t mean that she doesn’t need it, from somewhere. And like it or not, his alcoholism—he faces that squarely—has meant that she doesn’t look to him. Question is, is she looking for it from anyone, because he’s not at all sure that she is. Rick clearly wants to provide it, but equally if he is being allowed to, about which Jim is not at all sure, there’s nothing in public to clue anyone in. Rather the reverse, in fact. She’d been subtly out of sorts all evening, despite the welcoming atmosphere and despite the fact that Katie had done and said everything right to make it seem as if she’d been having a perfectly pleasant evening in perfectly pleasant company. He wonders if Rick had picked up that Katie had brought the evening to a close by pretending tiredness, though the set of her eyes had indicated that it wasn’t entirely put on. She’d used to do that as a child, when something was wrong. Jim’s only problem is that he isn’t sure what had been wrong, except that it had all started when he’d manoeuvred Rick into the dinner invitation.

Well, it’s too late to think now. He’ll think in the morning, and then he’ll use the excuse of calling Katie to tell her that Ed had thought him talking to this Mrs Berowitz a very fine idea to try and work out what’s really up. Maybe she’ll open up over that nice game she’d bought him. He falls asleep relatively content.
Castle had fallen asleep without further thinking, and on waking is distracted by the need to make breakfast and listen to his redheads dissect the previous evening.

“Mr Beckett was fun, Dad. Do you think Detective Beckett would let me see him again? I didn’t get to ask everything I wanted to.”

“I suppose so.”

“A very charming and cultured man,” Martha declares. “So nice to have someone who appreciates intelligent drama and can discuss it. That was the most interesting conversation I’ve had in months. Do try not to upset Katherine again, kiddo.”

“Thank you, Mother,” Castle says dryly. “What does the day hold for you?”

“Don’t try to change the subject.” Castle conceals his horror remarkably well. “I really enjoyed seeing Katherine again. You should make this a regular thing. She and her father were having a simply marvellous time.”

Castle wonders whether his mother is blind, stupid, or had merely had one glass of wine too many. Beckett had not had a simply marvellous time, and her one word reply to his concern didn’t help. Jim might have had a simply marvellous time, and certainly a much better time than his daughter, but Castle’s main concern is Beckett, and he is by no means reassured this morning.

When breakfast is done and cleared away, Castle retreats to his study and taps out a text to Beckett. Coming over. See you in half an hour. He is quite deliberately not making it a request. Since he doesn’t phrase it to require or expect an answer, he is not worried when he doesn’t get one.

Beckett’s morning coffee is disturbed by her phone.

“Beckett,” she clips, not caffeinated enough to soften it.

“Katie, it’s me. I forgot to say yesterday, that I spoke to Ed and he thought that it would be an excellent idea if I spoke to your Julia Berowitz. Now, how do you want to do this? She doesn’t know me from Adam.”

Beckett pulls her thoughts into order. “I’d better introduce you,” she says decisively. “Otherwise she won’t have a clue.”

“Okay, when? Today? No point waiting. We’ll both go.” He wants to see Katie with Julia. Of course, Ed had suggested he have someone with him too, just in case it was all more difficult than he expects.

Beckett stares at the phone. That’s a little more pushy than her dad usually is. Still, if he’s in, he’s in. He always used to want to get on and deal with things. No point waiting, he’d said about everything other than fishing. Get it done and have time for other things. She must have learned it from him.

“I’ll call her in a moment, then I’ll call you back.”

“Not yet.” He pauses for a beat. “Katie, what was really wrong last night?”
“Nothing. I told you, I was tired.”

“Mm. Like you used to be ‘tired’” – she can hear the quotation marks – “whenever we went to see your grandmother?” Oh, no. No, no, no. She is not going there. “You might really be tired, but I know you and you were putting some of that on to get out. You did just the same when you were small and something was wrong. So what’s wrong, Katie?”

“Nothing is wrong, Dad. Stop fussing. You’re turning into a mother hen. I was tired and I wasn’t going to spoil the evening by falling asleep in Castle’s coffee.”

“I’m sure he wouldn’t have minded,” Jim says mischievously, and on her aggrieved squawk returns to seriousness. “You didn’t want to go in the first place, and you were a little on edge all night. So if you’ve ‘patched things up’ with Rick, what’s the problem with his place?”

“Dad, there is nothing wrong. You’re imagining things. Now, do you want me to call Julia or not?”

“Sure I do. And then call me back.”

“Yes, Dad,” Beckett says, in a tone that belongs to her stroppy teenaged self.

She swipes the phone off, annoyed already with the day, then notices Castle’s text and further notices that he’ll be here in about ten minutes. This does not improve her mood one iota. She wanted peace, quiet and above all solitude to pull herself together and grow up. She does not need parental interference, medical interference, or pseudo-psychiatric interference. She had her therapy and she’s done Al-Anon and she has dealt with everything. She just needs to sort her shit out. Which does not require Castle, Lanie, her father, or anyone else. If she wants her father off her back, though, she can best achieve it by calling Julia Berowitz right now. She dials.

“Julia? It’s Kate Beckett.”

“Hello,” comes miserably down the line.

“Julia,” she dives straight in, “do you remember I said I’d been where you are?”

“Yes,” drips down the phone.

“Well, I’d like to introduce you to my dad,” she blurts out, and doesn’t stop for breath or objection. “I think he could really help you. Are you free this afternoon?” And breathe.

“Ye…es,” Julia says. “David should be home too…” She doesn’t sound entirely convinced of that, to Beckett’s sensitised ears. On the other hand, O’Leary clearly found him and got him collected. A rill of relief runs through her. “Come over about two-thirty. Will your partner, Castle?” –

“That’s right,” Beckett agrees, and doesn’t argue with the designation –

“come too?”

“I can ask him.” This is turning into a three-ring circus, she thinks acidly, but can’t see a way out.

“Thank you, Kate. Thank you.” Don’t thank me, Julia. I’m not doing this because I want to. I’m doing it in the hope you stop clinging to me and just leave me alone.

“See you later.”

She cuts the call and dials her dad.
“‘Kay, dad. I spoke to Julia, and we’ll all go see her at half past two. She wants Castle there as well. That okay with you? Let’s meet just outside her building and go in together.” She gives her dad the address.

“Fine. See you later, Katie.”

“See you, Dad.” She swipes off, ignoring a noise that might have been her dad trying to start a different line of conversation.

She might as well put the kettle on. Castle will no doubt show up any moment, and she needs something to take the edge off the day. She’s just filled it and switched it on when the door sounds. She ignores the ridiculous ripple of relief that he’s here.

“Hey, Beckett,” he smiles.

“Hey.”

Castle pushes the door shut without looking at anything other than Beckett and catches her before she has taken another step. “C’mere,” he says, unnecessarily, and wraps her in. Having caught her, he doesn’t give her time to protest before angling her head and kissing her deeply.

“What was that about?” Beckett huffs.

“Saying hello.” He kisses her again, keeping her tucked in. “Seeing as I didn’t get a single kiss last night because you sneaked off early despite my amazing cooking skills and five-star hospitality.” Another kiss. “And because you want kissed just as much as I want to kiss you. Win-win.”

“Says who?” she grumps.

“Well… you haven’t shot me, and you were kissing me back, so I guess you do. You can say you don’t want kissed if you want, though.” There is a considerable absence of any sort of comment, so he kisses her yet again, taking his time, nibbling provocatively on her lip, exploring and possessing until she’s relaxed and responsive. “There. That’s better. All caught up.”

“Huh?”

“You deprived me last night, so you need to make up for it now.”

“No, I don’t think it works like that. Unless you want a harassment suit?” But she’s smiling at him, and wrinkling her nose, and looks a whole lot happier than five minutes ago. Still wired up, though. Hmm. The slight relaxation is unlikely to last once he embarks on a dissection of last night, but he might as well start on a good note.

“I’d rather have coffee.”

“How’d you know there might be coffee?”

Castle simply gazes down at her pitifully. “Beckett, this is you I’m looking at. There is always coffee. The day there isn’t I’m taking you to the ER because you will be almost dead. Besides which, I heard your kettle go off.”

“Hmph.”

Coffee arrives. Beckett arrives on the couch and Castle’s arm arrives around her before she can do anything he doesn’t want her to do, such as move away. Here we go.
“I rang Julia,” she says, and all his plans are abruptly deferred. There is no point at all precipitating a likely-to-be-shattering argument if there’s going to be a full-on emotional meeting in the very near future. “She’ll see Dad. She wants both of us there, too.”

“When?”

“Two thirty.”

Castle smiles lazily down at her, deciding that some relaxed fun is indicated to defuse the Beckett stress-bomb. “That gives us” – he checks his watch – “three hours. We could have a lot of fun in three hours. We might even get lunch. I’m sure we’ll both be hungry.”

“Dim sum.”

“What?”

“Dim sum. For lunch. RedFarm, on Hudson. It opens in about half an hour.”

“Too early. And I wouldn’t get a chance to do this.” He removes her coffee cup, gives up any plans to force the issue of last night until later, and turns to the far more pleasant pastime of turning Beckett into a melting mess of Kat-ness in his lap.

He starts with the hard, forceful kisses that she likes more every time he provides them, and uses the cover of invading her mouth to bring her closer in where he can slide a hand up under her soft v-neck sweater and find – oohhh – warm skin and not a lot else. Her skin is so infinitely strokable, and he’s never been able to resist temptation, and since – how did that happen? – it appears that his button-down is not, in fact, buttoned down or indeed up, it would be ungenerous not to do the same. Her sweater is shortly decorating the cushions, and Beckett’s beautiful body is decorating his, skin sliding against skin, his shirt being slipped from his broad shoulders and her hands gripping as he leaves her mouth and wanders down her neck, past her clavicles, to turn and lay her back and tease her through the pretty, lacy cotton bra.

If only they didn’t have to go anywhere, Castle thinks, they could spend a delightful afternoon in a combination of leisurely exploration and very satisfying conquest. Still, he can certainly make Beckett turn into a very happily purring Kat. He loves her firm breasts, so perfectly sized for him to play with, whether with hands or mouth. Right now, it’s mouth. He’s got other plans, for which his hands will be required. Although he is perfectly capable of undoing zips (and indeed buttons) with his teeth, he doesn’t actually like the metallic taste it leaves, though that will swiftly be forgotten in the delicious taste below.

Anyway, he’s having far too much fun tantalising Beckett-now-just-about-Kat, who is half-purring, half-growling a commentary that seems to include a substantial number of naughty words and who is lax and responsive below him. He teases more, and takes the opportunity to open her jeans and insinuate a questing finger into the damp heat within. She writhes against him and whimpers a little, trying to bring her own hands down from where they’re clasped around his neck to undo his belt and pants, but he won’t let her. He doesn’t want this to be fast and hot and over: a quickie before lunch, he wants to take it more slowly and leave her wholly relaxed and eased. Stood down. This is so much nicer than having the talk.

He catches her wicked hands and repatriates them to above her head where they can’t interfere with his plan to leave her breathless, then looms up over her and begins to slide her cotton panties back and forth until she’s moving with the friction, murmuring in her ear and telling her what he’s doing, what he’s going to do, how hot and wet and just plain gorgeous she is when she’s like this, how later on he’ll have more time and he’ll touch her and taste her and tease her and take her and all the time...
his growling, dangerous baritone keeps driving her up, leaving her desperate until his large fingers dip beneath the cotton and delve into the slick heat and tight flesh and rub over the hard knot of nerves and she is not purring but there are definitely claws digging into his hand. He lets go so that he can lean down and take her mouth hard and thrust with his tongue as he does with his fingers and now she’s clawing at his back to drag him down closer, heavy on her and he worries that he’s too heavy but she doesn’t seem to care as she moans once and comes around his hand.

He snuggles her in and wraps around her, turning so she’s atop him and pillowing her head on his shoulder. If they had more time, he’d simply pick her up and carry her – very macho – to her bed and then make love to her all afternoon. Unfortunately, they don’t. Still, there’s always later. If they aren’t in the middle of a blazing row, which is quite likely, especially since he’s still intending to have the talk. Last night has not removed his conviction that Beckett needs an intervention. Rather the reverse.

He lies there, holding her close, keeping her warm and softly petting her back in long slow strokes, till she’s humming contentedly, comforted, soothed and relaxed. Sprawled across him, she’s soft and satisfied in almost the way she has only been once before: way back when, almost at the beginning, when she’d been able to be Kat with him because he knew nothing. She’s still not quite wholly Kat:
he still hasn’t seen that soft side of her outside his arms, though he’s sure it must exist simply from the décor of her apartment and the way she has sometimes curved into him: as then, as now, as she will again.

“I’m hungry,” she says prosaically.

“So’m I,” Castle discovers. “Dim sum?”

“Yeah…” Beckett drawls, and wriggles over him to – he thinks – stand up. Then she smiles evilly.
“In a moment. You seem a little…uncomfortable. We’ll sort that out first,” she murmers, slips off the couch on to her knees, and…well, that’s not dim sum she’s eating. He’s gone in no time at all.
She’s really very good at that. He just wishes he didn’t have the slight feeling that she’s distracting him. He doesn’t like that feeling. He doesn’t like it all. It’s too close to the feeling of being second best that he’d had straight after Christmas.

“I want lunch,” Beckett says, smirking evilly as she tugs on her sweater. “Let’s go.”

Castle doesn’t want to go anywhere except to Beckett’s bed, where he can undress her slowly and return the favour with interest, and turn his slight discomfort into something better and more honest.
However, he’ll need to pull himself together so they can have some lunch before seeing Mrs (and maybe Mr?) Berowitz.

RedFarm produces delicious dim sum and a couple of noodle courses of which Beckett steals far more than her fair share. It reminds Castle of her approach to doughnuts. He’s surprised she hasn’t rapped his fingers with her chopsticks. However, time to go comes round all too quickly, and as he refuses to let Beckett contribute and pays, she’s already retreated into her precinct persona.

“We’ll meet Dad there,” she says briskly, and leads Castle out of the restaurant.

The Berowitzes’ apartment is perfectly clean, when Julia lets them in. Perfectly clean, with that tinge of lemon cleaner and slightly antiseptic smell that indicates very recent cleaning. A swift glance at Julia’s hands indicates tiny chips in her nail polish, a slight redness which Beckett recognises as the result of a scrubbing pad. She mentions none of that to the others, and notes that there is still a sheen of dampness across the kitchen floor. She would bet that the same sheen is present in the bathroom.
Keeping up appearances, or putting on a brave face, it’s all the same.
“Julia, this is my father, Jim. He…”

“I’m an alcoholic,” Jim says, as if it were an AA meeting. He doesn’t flinch, and his voice is quietly confident. Julia does flinch. Reality is not what she’d wanted, clearly, but here it is in her living room. “I’ve been dry for five years now.”

“Oh,” Julia turns to something that she can deal with. “Would you all like coffee?”

“Yes please,” comes from all three of them.

“I’ll just get it started. David will be here in a moment. He…” Beckett sees the moment she realises that was working late isn’t going to cut it on a Sunday afternoon. “…didn’t sleep well, so he went out for a walk to clear his head.”

Jim looks at Beckett as Julia disappears into the kitchen, and raises his eyebrows. Beckett shrugs, indicating that it’s up to Jim. Castle stands up and follows Julia, from where Beckett can hear him offering help and comparing the relative merits of types of coffee and flavours of creamer. It occurs to both Beckettts simultaneously that Castle is applying his particular brand of charm and domesticity to reduce Julia’s tension and nervousness, and when he re-emerges carrying the tray for her and expounding on the excellence of a particular type of Brazilian coffee of which even Beckett has never heard, Julia is much less frightened.

“Julia,” Beckett says softly, “we’ve talked a lot about what’s going on. I’ve tried to help, but I think you need more than I can give. I don’t know if you’ve gone to any of the groups I suggested yet?”

Castle can see Beckett’s white knuckles pressing down hard on the cushions of the elegantly old-fashioned couch. Their harshly knotted tension is not reflected in her calm voice.

“I don’t need to. David’s not… that. He’s just a bit stressed. He’ll be fine.”

“I used to say that,” Jim points out. “So did Katie here. It wasn’t true. Every time I said it I really meant it – at that moment. But then… then I would need a little help, and then a little more, and then I needed to block out the past.”

“The past?”

“Didn’t Katie say? My wife – her mother – was murdered.”

“She didn’t say. You didn’t tell me that,” Julia accuses, looking for a reason not to listen.

“No,” Beckett says. “I didn’t.” Something in her voice catches on Julia’s confected annoyance. Castle throws a quick glance at her, and returns his attention to Julia. Unobtrusively, his finger sweeps over Beckett’s tight knuckles. It makes no difference at all.

“It might all be okay now, Julia. But you’ve been calling Katie because you need some support, so you know it isn’t really okay. When she asked you, you said you would talk to me. I’ve not done this before” – he smiles nervously – “so I don’t really know what happens now. Why don’t I tell you about how it was for me?”

Julia nods. Beckett’s fingers bite into the couch. Castle wishes that Beckett were absolutely not here, because this is going to be hard. Jim takes a breath, and a mouthful of coffee, and begins.
Can't hold it back any more

“The police came, and told us. Katie and me. And for a few days I couldn’t believe it: I kept waiting for her to come back, for it all to be a mistake. I knew it wasn’t, of course. But I pretended. I found that having a drink helped me pretend. Helped blur the edges. That was how I began. I’d always liked a drink, but I never wanted more than one when my wife was there. She made up for it.”

Castle looks at Beckett’s tight jaw and doesn’t dare to touch her again. From the set of her lips, that last is something she hadn’t known.

“But she wasn’t there anymore. For a while, I got through work, but… but everything reminded me of my wife. I had to block it all out. Katie had to go back to college, so I could hide it for a time, but then when she came home – saved all her money and came home for a visit after a month – it all came out.”

Beckett remembers. She remembers all of it: the alcohol and the depression and the tears and the accusations and the desperation. Oh, she remembers. She’s never been able to forget.

“After that it all spiralled. Katie tried everything she could. She poured the bottles down the sink, but I hid them and bought more. She tried to talk to me, she tried to get me to AA. She cleaned me up and listened to me promise I wouldn’t do it again. I always did do it again. I always lied, to everyone. You do. You lie to your loved ones. I lost my job. One long lunch too many, one time too often I didn’t show up. Katie cried, and came back home for good, and changed to NYU, and I promised, but I still lied. It didn’t matter. Nothing mattered but getting another drink. I cleaned out my bank account.”

He looks very straight at Julia. “If Katie had been a minor still, I’d likely have cleaned out hers.” Julia flinches.

“Then I started drinking in public. Got picked up a few times, and a few times more than that. Katie would come get me, take me home. Guess you’ve done that?”

“Kate went and found him. She brought him home the first time.” Jim draws in a breath. “She went and looked for him for me. I didn’t know who to call.”

“How often?”

“Twice. But once in the middle you wouldn’t,” she says, accusing again. “You didn’t help that time.”

“David wasn’t lost that time, he was already at Central Park Precinct,” Beckett reminds her. “You could go get him from there. He was safe.” She is not meeting her father’s gaze. She doesn’t want to see his disgust that she wouldn’t help Julia then. Destroy his last illusion about who she is.

“Well, anyway,” Jim continues, though it’s obvious to Castle that he is intending to have a father-daughter discussion in the very near future and it is not going to be a happy one, “it didn’t matter what Katie did or said or tried, I wasn’t listening. As long as she was there to bring me home.” He pauses.

“And then she didn’t. They called her, and she said she wouldn’t come. Said she couldn’t help me. I spent the night in the tank. Not for the last time. But she walked away from me.” Beckett is resolutely not looking at anyone. She can’t bear to hear the break that’s in her father’s voice: the break she’d put there; she can’t bear the memories of him crying and begging till her voicemail was full. She knows what she’ll see in Julia’s face. She’s seen it in her own mirror, often enough, she saw it in Castle’s face and she doesn’t need to see it again. She needs out of here. This is too much. Too many memories. She’d worried about the effect on her father. She should have worried more about the effect on her.

“She knows what she’ll see in Julia’s face. She’s seen it in her own mirror, often enough, she saw it in Castle’s face and she doesn’t need to see it again. She needs out of here. This is too much. Too many memories. She’d worried about the effect on her father. She should have worried more about the effect on her.

“I could never do that,” Julia gasps, horrified. “I couldn’t let David…” Jim looks sadly at her.

“It took me a while. Nearly three years. But one day I realised that the only way I’d ever see Katie again was if I got dry. I needed her, but she wouldn’t come if I wasn’t sober. I couldn’t lose her, too.”

He takes a long breath, and downs the rest of his coffee.

“What I’m saying, is that you have to hit bottom. You have to want something more than you want to drink. For me, it was my daughter. But until you decide that, no-one else can really help you.”

He stops. Julia is silent, liquid at the corners of her eyes. Beckett is frozen-faced and only just hanging on to control, and Castle still and quiet in his corner of the couch next to her.

“But… but… but David’s not like that. He’s not. It’s just a blip.” It’s the last straw. Beckett can’t do this any more. Julia is wilfully not getting it, and she can’t stand watching this car crash any longer.

“Stop fooling yourself, Julia,” Beckett says harshly. “He was drunk when I came to tell you we’d got the guy who did it. You called me after Christmas because you couldn’t cope. You called me again a couple of weeks later, because you couldn’t cope. Because he was drinking. He went out to get a drink when you called me because he’d gone out without warm clothing and told you he was just going to the drugstore – and I brought him home dead drunk from Central Park Precinct. It’s not a blip. He has a real problem. You keep calling me because you don’t know what to do. I’ve told you, and told you, and you don’t believe me. My dad’s telling you now. You cannot save him by yourself, Julia!”

She stands up, wounded and furious, close to weeping. “You can’t save him at all. He needs to save himself. All you can do is protect yourself so that you come out the other side in one piece. It’s up to you, Julia. I can’t help you because you won’t listen to me. Maybe you’ll listen to my dad. I couldn’t save my dad. It didn’t matter what I did until he decided to save himself. I couldn’t save him and neither can you. You’ll just have to live with it, whatever you decide.”

She takes two swift, slicing strides to the door and is gone. Julia starts to cry. Jim and Castle exchange glances. Beckett will have to wait, though Castle’s first, almost overpowering instinct is to go after her, because Castle can’t leave Jim to drown. That would finish Beckett. Hard choices, where every answer is wrong.

It’s Castle who starts, sympathy in every syllable.

“Julia, I know it’s hard. But Beckett’s right. You need to take care of yourself too. Now, where’s David? Jim needs to talk to both of you.”

“I don’t know,” Julia wails. “He promised he’d be back for lunch and he wasn’t and I thought Kate would help me find him again. But she won’t, she’s gone.”

“Kate can’t help you any more, Julia. She’s not in Missing Persons, she’s in Homicide. She’s been risking her career already to help you, and if her boss finds out she’ll be in real trouble.” Jim flicks Castle a sharp glance. “Her boss told her not to. Orders.” Castle is pretty sure that’s true, because otherwise she’d have gone to get David Berowitz the second time, and she’d never have left O’Leary to it the third. “You need to call it in to your precinct. They’ll help you. Kate can’t, Julia. No matter how much she wants to, she can’t.”

I am going to get this through your head, because otherwise you’ll just keep leaning on her and she’s breaking under it: she’s snapping like a dry stick. He only hopes he won’t find Beckett dead drunk in her own chill apartment. Again.

Jim picks up the tag. “Katie put it harshly, Julia, but however you cut it, she was right. If David’s gone missing again then you need to call it in.”

“They won’t help. He’s not been gone for long enough.”

“You can still call it in so that if they do pick him up they’ll know to call you. At least then you’ll know he’s safe.”

“Then what? You’re telling me to abandon him. I can’t do that. He’s my husband.” She sniffs, messy tears bleeding down her face. “I love him,” she mumbles. “I can’t…”

“Katie loves me,” Jim says firmly. “Maybe too much. If she’d walked away earlier… let me hit rock bottom… maybe I’d have got cleaned up sooner. I would never, ever have stopped if she hadn’t walked away. It was the only thing that did stop me.” In Jim’s tired, older gaze Castle sees maybe I wouldn’t have damaged her so if she’d walked away sooner. Because whatever else this meeting has achieved, there is no way that Jim can now think that his Katie is in any way okay. She’s proven that quite spectacularly.

“What should I do?” Julia asks brokenly.

“Call Al-Anon,” Jim answers. “Call Al-Anon like Katie told you to and listen to what they say. You’ve got to have someone for you to lean on, because you’ll never survive without it.” You’re nothing like as strong as Katie, and even Katie’s broken. And I never realised. Jim keeps his voice calm, sure and positive. It takes all his remaining calmness. “We’ll stay while you call Missing Persons, and if you want, we’ll stay till you’ve called Al-Anon.”

“Your friend,” Castle says. “The one who came over Friday night. Would she come over again?”

“Elaine? Probably.”

“Call her too, then. You need friends.”

Under the unwavering gaze of Castle and Jim, Julia does what they ask. When she’s done, she looks piteously at them. “Really? Really like that?”

“Yes,” Jim says gently. “Really like that.” But somehow Castle doesn’t think he’s just talking about himself.

It takes another half hour for Elaine to show up, during which time every footstep in the hallway leaves Julia whipping desperately hopeful glances to the door and turning away, desolate, when no key turns, no knock sounds. By the time there is a knock, everyone’s on edge. Castle is desperate to go after Beckett, and Jim just looks desperate. They are only too glad to be shooed out.

“We need to talk,” Jim says. “But not now. I can’t do it. I need” – he stops. He’d been going to say I need to see Katie, but actually he needs to talk to Ed, because for the first time in a long time he isn’t sure that he can say no.
“I’ll stay with you, if you like.” Jim looks at Castle.

“Stay?”

“Till you’ve got a hold of your sponsor.” Jim’s jaw drops.

“Uh?”

“I saw a lot of” – Castle stops, and inelegantly continues – “stuff. When I first went mega. You think I don’t know what you feel like right now? I’ve got a daughter too. You want to blot it out till you can deal with it. Let me deal with it for now. You make sure you’re okay, and then we’ll see. If… Jim, if you fall because she’s upset, she’ll never forgive herself. You’ve got to talk to your sponsor, you’ve got to hang on. You’re all she’s got.”

Castle’s never been less smooth with his words – but he might never have been more serious, either. He has no compunction about making sure that Jim gets what he needs, because there would be no way back from the other option. Not for Jim and not for Beckett. He knows that Jim’s view of his Katie has just fallen to pieces around him and, so much more like his daughter than he knows, Jim is drowning in guilt for not seeing it.

This hadn’t been anyone’s plan. But it’s where they all are. It looks like Castle might be the last man standing, the last bulwark against the surging tide.

Jim is already dialling when Castle looks back down at his lined, suddenly age-slackened face.

“Sure,” he says. “I’ll get a cab from wherever you’re going to.”

“Then you go find her, Castle. Someone has to. She needs help.”

There isn’t any talking in Jim’s car, a perfectly adequate if spartan Chrysler, until they’re pulling up at what must be Ed’s place. Castle meditates on how similarly Jim behaves, when hurt, to Beckett: drawing in and closing up. Jim and Katie: two peas in a Beckett pod. Hiding how they feel from each other so as not to hurt each other, and ending up with both of them worse hurt than if they’d never tried not to hurt each other in the first place.

There is one key difference between them, though. Jim, however painfully, has learned to ask for help. Beckett has not.

Castle sees Jim into Ed’s small apartment and then turns his footsteps towards the street and a cab back to Beckett’s. He hopes she’s there, because he can’t think of anywhere else to start looking if she’s not.

Beckett had simply had to escape before she fucked up any further and turned on her father. Every lacerating memory of five years of agony had been dragged back up and surrounded her in high definition. Every last vision and sound of her father falling apart had reasserted itself with appalling clarity; every time she had abandoned and betrayed him. She can only hear the break and the pain in his voice when he’d said But she walked away from me. And under that, her own old unhealed wounds: it had taken him five years to love her more than whiskey: she still can’t forgive him for that; still can’t believe that he won’t relapse, that he won’t abandon her as she did him.
She goes home. Where else is there to go but her chill, joyless, lonely apartment with its abstract patterns and interior-designed lifelessness? She can’t go to the precinct, she can’t ring O’Leary and ask him to search for David Berowitz. She can’t go anywhere. She’s not hungry, and her stomach cramps at the thought of food. She has some water, and for a minute thinks that even that will come back up. She curls up on her cool bed until the nausea passes, and only then realises that she’s crying: ugly mascara tainted tears staining her pristine pillowcase: black smudges on her linen matching those on her heart.

She doesn’t respond to the knocking, later, nor to the ringing of her phone, nor yet to the message Castle leaves: I know you’re there. I can hear the phone. Open the door and let me in.

She can’t bear to see anyone: she’s broken in public and she can’t face another seeing her own weakness. She couldn’t give compassion to Julia and she deserves none herself. So, later, after one single text: leave me alone. Please give me space. I can’t see anyone, she ignores Castle’s two forceful messages on the theme of if you need anything you call me, okay? in exactly the same way, and at the same personal cost, as she had ignored her father’s, all those years ago. Then, she’d saved herself and let him drown. Now, she’ll let herself drown. There’s no reason not to. She’d seen her father’s horrified face as she’d rounded on Julia. He hasn’t called, and she knows why: he can’t believe that she doesn’t feel the same way about him. She sends him one message: Are you ok? Dad, please answer me. There is no answer.

All this time she’s been there for him, been his mainstay, and the one time she asked him to do something that she couldn’t do she couldn’t bear to see it through: couldn’t even hold herself together through his story and then ran out on him.

Abandoned him, just like she had then, and now he’s not answering her.

She drags herself through cleansing her face and body, and finds an unstained pillowcase: forces herself to set her alarm, though she’d rather go nowhere. There have been no more messages or calls. She deletes the earlier ones, and sends Castle one further text. *I'm sorry, I couldn't face seeing anyone tonight. Was my dad okay? He's not answering me.

The answer is swift. He was okay. Are you okay?

I don't know, she thinks. I don't know, and doesn’t answer.

Alone in the unforgiving dark, she pushes herself into chill, unemotional quiet, and thence to sleep. She wakes long before her alarm, and, freed from Montgomery’s dictated leave, simply goes to work. It’s the one place she can still feel that everything is under her control and that what she does is worth something.

In her enforced absence, another pile of cold case files have grown, fungus-like, on her desk. Without enthusiasm, she begins. After a while, she makes herself coffee, more for a break than any desire to have anything in her stomach. Some time after that, the boys roll in, separately but not far apart. Montgomery appears, and as swiftly disappears to a meeting at 1PP. It stops him asking questions. It does not stop Esposito, however.

“Yo, Beckett. Why was Lanie lookin’ for Castle’s number Friday night?”

“Don’t know. Why was Lanie looking for Castle’s number Friday night?”

“Don’t give me that. She was out with you.”

“Oh, that was a question? I thought you were practising for your stand-up routine.”
“Me?” Espo puffs out his chest and strikes a macho pose. “Yeah, sure. Headliner at the Comedy Club, that’s me.”

“Target for rotting fruit, more like,” Ryan snips.

“Like you could do it,” Espo flashes back. “You couldn’t find a punchline at a boxing match.”

“Better than you, then. You couldn’t even find the ring.”

The boys descend into bickering and Beckett tunes them out. It takes them some time to realise.

“Beckett?”

“Hmm? Have you stopped fighting yet, or do I need to referee?”

“Never mind that. Why’d Lanie want Castle’s number?”

“No idea. Hey, here’s a thought – why don’t you ask her?” There’s enough of a Beckett bite on her words for the boys to back off.

Beckett returns to the paperwork. Her phone remains entirely silent. She still hasn’t heard anything from her father, and that terrifies her. As soon as it’s even faintly civilised to do so, she texts him again. She doesn’t call, in case – so she tells herself – he’s in an early meeting. In truth, it’s in case he doesn’t pick up. But she doesn’t let herself think about that.

A short while later, her phone rings. It’s her dad. She swipes on with trepidation, praying he’s sober.

“Katie.” He is. Oh, thank God for that.

“Dad,” she answers, already aiming for the quiet, private space of the back stairwell. “Are you okay?” No-one – certainly not Ryan and Esposito, whose interestedly flapping ears have pricked up – would have guessed at her inner turmoil. “You didn’t answer me last night.” She doesn’t show how terrified she’s been.

“I’m sorry, Katie. I spent some time talking to Ed last night, but I’m okay. Rick made sure I got there.” His words pierce her. Her actions, her decisions – his suffering. If he’d talked to Ed, he’d been close to the edge. Close to falling, and all because of her choice to involve him. “More to the point, how are you?”

“I’m fine,” she says, putting mildly exasperated affection into her tone, as if he were reminding her to be sure to wear a scarf in the cold weather.

“I’m sorry, Katie. I spent some time talking to Ed last night, but I’m okay. Rick made sure I got there.” His words pierce her. Her actions, her decisions – his suffering. If he’d talked to Ed, he’d been close to the edge. Close to falling, and all because of her choice to involve him. “More to the point, how are you?”

“I’m fine,” she says, putting mildly exasperated affection into her tone, as if he were reminding her to be sure to wear a scarf in the cold weather.

“Katie…” The exasperation in her father’s voice is not mild. “Katie, that is a flat-out lie. You were really angry with Mrs Berowitz yesterday and I’m” – but she doesn’t let him finish, his tone flicking her on the raw edge of her unacknowledged insecurities and lack of forgiveness: tiredness making old grief and memories sharp, removing her hard-won, years-old control and concealment of all her feelings.

“Yeah. I was harsh with her and it was unjustified and I should have done better and you’re ashamed of me for it. Well, I’m not sorry. She needed to hear the truth. Maybe if someone had told me the hard truth earlier I wouldn’t have wasted so much time trying to save you when I never could. Maybe I wouldn’t have thought I could be enough if I just tried harder. Maybe I’d have known that while I was still picking you up when you fell I’d always come second to whiskey. Maybe I’d have known all of that. Maybe I wouldn’t still be trying” – she stops dead. Trying to make sure you never do it again. Trying to make sure you love me.

“Trying what, Katie?”

“I have to get back to work.”

She cuts the call and crashes down to sitting on the cold concrete stairwell, head on her knees. Her phone rings, and she doesn’t even look at it when she declines the call and turns the phone off for good measure. In the chill silence, a floor below the bullpen, she simply… goes away, thinking of nothing at all.

All her choices have led her here. She’d tried so hard, and in the end it’s all been just as useless as trying to save him had been, ten years ago. He saved himself, and she saved herself at his expense, and now both of them know it.
Nothing left to lose

In the bullpen, Ryan and Esposito are still squabbling over who can tell the best jokes, when Montgomery returns from 1PP with a Cheshire-Cat grin. He fixes them with a beady-eyed glare, whereupon they discover that cold case files are really excessively interesting.

“Where is Detective Beckett?”

“She was here a moment ago, sir, but she took a call,” Ryan shrugs.

“Hmm.”

“Should we tell her to come see you?”

“No. Just keeping an eye on you all.” Montgomery smiles in a very I’m-the-boss way. “Castle shown up yet?”

“No, sir. It’s a bit early for him. It’s barely ten.”

Montgomery harrumphs at the laziness of best-selling authors and retires to his office well-satisfied with his morning so far.

Half an hour later, as he’s perusing the precinct solve statistics with a warm, smug glow of happiness that they are still the best by a mile – top again, that’ll show Stannard at the Twenty-Third – he becomes aware of a noisy disturbance. This is not the way he runs his bullpen. No sirree. If he’d wanted noisy disturbances he’d have joined a Vice team. Corpses are his preference. Nice and quiet with no noisy disturbances.

He emerges from his office wrapped in Captainly authority and stands ominously silent as he takes in the scene before him. Detectives Ryan and Esposito, together with Castle, appear to be starting a free fight with Medical Examiner Dr Parrish, who has no business being here at all. The one small consolation is that Detective Beckett is sitting at her desk getting on with her caseload and appears to be playing no part in this kerfuffle at all, despite the fact that it is practically on top of her. At least one of his detectives knows how to behave. She looks up, notices him, calmly caps her pen and waits for Armageddon to descend. He notices in passing that she’s pale and looks unwell, but that can wait for a few moments. She hadn’t looked too well last week either. He’ll deal with that when he’s dealt with the rest of this ungodly mess.

“What is going on here?” he enquires dangerously quietly. There is instant silence. The four protagonists look shamefaced. Well. Three of them do. Castle does not. “Explain.” No explanations are forthcoming. Montgomery decides to divide and conquer.

“Dr Parrish. What are you doing here?” Dr Parrish says nothing. “No reason. I see. In that case, get back to your morgue and stop distracting my detectives.” There’s an instant in which her eyes flash. “Now.” She goes, though for a moment he’d thought she was going to say something useful. No such luck. She hisses something at Beckett as she passes her.

“Castle. What is going on?” Castle looks blandly at him.

“Nothing. I just got here.” Montgomery glares at him. He recognises a complete evasion when he hears one – he’s had twenty-five years of practice in Interrogation. A flicked gaze past Castle reveals that Beckett has returned to her case file.
“So why are you arguing with my Detectives?”

“Arguing is such a harsh word. We were having a lively discussion.” Montgomery growls, but recognises that swapping semantics with Castle is very unlikely to get him anywhere. He’ll deal with him later.

“Ryan, Esposito, my office. Now.” They are there faster than light speed. Einstein would have invented a whole new theory had he ever met Montgomery in this mode.

By the time Montgomery has finished his words Castle is at Beckett’s desk, talking in a low-toned, urgent voice that, regrettably, means that Montgomery can’t overhear without moving much closer. That would be a little too obvious.

As is Beckett getting up and running for the women’s restroom. Okay, Castle can be very irritating, but that’s a bit of an overreaction. He ignores Ryan and Esposito cowering in his office, and marches back to Beckett’s desk.

“What is wrong with Beckett?”

“She went green and ran for the restroom,” Castle says.

“When she’s back, both of you come see me.”

Montgomery goes to demolish Ryan and Esposito, from whom he obtains no more sensible answers than he had from Castle. He doesn’t believe for a moment that it was an argument about baseball, but when Ryan starts insulting the Mets and Espo retaliates by dissing the Yankees and it gets heated in no time, he’s left with nowhere to go except a comment that he prefers football, which gets him a disgusted look from both of them. He packs them off with a few well-chosen words about appropriate behaviour in the precinct, as opposed to that which he might expect from sugar-hyped toddlers at a play centre, and then waits for Beckett and Castle to show up, passing the time by clearing forms from his in tray.

Ten minutes and five forms later he is still waiting, and none too happy about it. He looks out into the bullpen, and sees Castle sitting in his usual chair and no Beckett. He returns to his forms. Another ten minutes later he looks out again, to find them both missing. He stalks out.

“Ryan!”

“Sir?”

“Where are Beckett and Castle?”

“Castle went to find her. He hasn’t come back.”

Castle had known it was going to be a bad morning from the moment he woke up an appalling two hours later than he’d meant to, with no communication from Beckett. He’d hoped that she’d let him in, but by the time he’d got there he suspects she’d been so deep in her own guilt she wouldn’t have even if she’d wanted to: punishing herself for breaking under intolerable strain. But she’d answered the text…and she’d asked for space, and he’d said at least tell me – and she did. But she didn’t answer the later text, and he knows that’s because she wasn’t okay at all. He should have gone after her immediately so that she didn’t have to be alone, but then he’d not been able to leave Jim. If Jim had been left alone, he might have…relapsed. Choose your poison. Leave Jim to fall, and watch Beckett fall apart. Leave Beckett to run, and watch Beckett fall apart.
This had not been the plan at all.

As if that had not been bad enough, as he’s getting into the elevator Lanie rushes in.

“I was looking for you,” she says. “Don’t you answer your phone?”

“Oh?”

“Been texting you.” Oh. Yes. Those would be the texts he’s been ignoring in the hope his unconscious would work out what to do with them.

“I’ve been busy.”

“What’s up with Kate? What happened Friday? Why didn’t she call me? Why didn’t you call me?”

Fortunately they reach the bullpen before Lanie stops firing questions at him long enough to wait for an answer. Castle sees Beckett’s head flick up at the elevator’s ting, note both of them, turn an unpleasantly sickly, pallid shade of white, and drop her head again. Had she really thought he wouldn’t be here today?

Lanie whips across the floor to Beckett’s desk. Castle could have told her that would be a bad plan, but at that point his phone rings, and he stops to answer it.

“Rick.” Oh, hell. Disaster number three, arriving on track two. “Rick, did you manage to talk to Katie last night? Because she wasn’t making any sense this morning and she lost her temper with me.” Jim sounds outright scared. “She never loses her temper.” Castle chokes. That’s not precisely his experience. “Not with me. I thought she’d grown out of it. She used to have a temper. She said she wasn’t enough… She’s always been more than enough. She could never let me down: I’m her dad.”

Castle ignores the question and answers one that wasn’t asked, instead. “I’m at the precinct with her.” It’s true. Not quite as Jim will take it, but it’s true.

“Good. I… should I come by?”

Castle casts a glance at Beckett’s desk, where Lanie has now been joined by Ryan and Esposito. “I don’t think so. I’ll…” He doesn’t know what to say. “I’ll let you know. Not now. I’ll make sure she’s okay.”

He joins the others, who are already some way into an argument.

“I want to know where you ran off to on Friday.”

“None of your business.”

“You stood me up.”

“You could have had me instead,” Espo flirts. Lanie looks him up and down assessingly.

“I’d rather have a puppy. Better looking and more fun.”

“What? I’m much more fun than a puppy.”

“You’re a macho idiot. I want someone who knows the difference between Merlot and Malbec.”

“Both machine guns, aren’t they?”
Ryan laughs. Lanie doesn’t. Castle notices that Beckett is pretending to deal with her case file and playing no part in the argument.

“Girl! Where’d you go on Friday?”

Ryan looks at Beckett’s tight face and thinks it might be his turn to take a hit for the team. Whatever’s up, Beckett’s theirs, and he and Espo have swapped two glances that say keep Lanie off her. They’ll ask their own questions later.

“I went to the theatre,” he says. Esposito splutters disgustedly.

“Wuss. Why weren’t you in a bar like a real man?”

Ryan smirks. “Because she was really cute. I can put up with a lot of bad acting when I get to cuddle up to a cute girl.”

“That’s disgusting.” Lanie’s been effectively distracted. Unfortunately it only lasts for a moment. “I wanna know where you ran off to.” She looks round, and spots Castle. “And you. Why’d you put the phone down on me? You know what was goin’ on. Start talking.”

“You called at a bad time,” Castle smirks.

“Don’t you give me that shit, Castle.” She jabs him in the chest. “You ran off faster than Usain Bolt. Why?”

Tempers and voices have risen spectacularly. Maybe that’s why nobody notices Montgomery prowling up until he speaks.

“What is going on here?”

Oh, Lordy. Now they are all deep into shit bayou (which lies some way past shit creek) without paddles. Castle watches Lanie being despatched condignly, and takes mental notes for later use. As Lanie passes Beckett, she hisses, “This conversation is not done. You need help, girl,” in tones promising pain and suffering. Beckett doesn’t even look up.

He exchanges compliments with Montgomery, who is clearly thoroughly displeased with them all, and as he watches the boys being sent to the principal’s office, slides up to Beckett, to balance on her desk. He hasn’t heard her say a word, and she’s doing a really, really excellent job of ignoring everything and everyone around her.

“Beckett.”

“Please, Castle. Not now. Let me… Can we not do this right now?”

“Beckett, you’re not right. Your dad called me. He’s worried about you.”

“He needn’t. I’m fine.” But her eyes say something entirely different. They say: tell him I’m fine. Lie for me.

“Beckett, you know you’re not fine. You lost it at Julia’s, you’ve lost it with your dad this morning. He went straight to his sponsor yesterday after you left. I went with him.”

On balance, saying that was a mistake. Beckett turns a horrible shade of greenish-white and flees precipitately for the restroom. Half a second later Montgomery arrives, no doubt to demand answers with menaces. Great. This is all about to collapse around their ears.
This was still not the plan.

He waits for a few minutes, but Beckett doesn’t return. Castle gathers up his courage and decides to break all the societal taboos that have been ground into him for the best part of forty years. He follows Beckett and taps on the restroom door. There’s no answer. He squirms uncomfortably – and goes in. Somewhat to his relief, since he really does not want to explain this action, there is no-one else inside. He can hear shuddering breaths.

“Beckett?” he says quietly. “Beckett, Montgomery wants to see you. Us.” He waits. “You’ve been in here nearly a quarter of an hour. If you don’t come out, likely Montgomery will start asking why.”

The stall unlocks. Beckett does not look good at all. She’s still green, and her brow is damp, tendrils of her hair straggling across it. There is dust on the knees of her dark pants. When she turns to rinse her mouth and wash her hands, there’s a slight tremor in her movement. Castle extends a hand to touch her stiff shoulder, and while she doesn’t shy away (which he had expected) she doesn’t curve into it either. Her face in the mirror is terrifyingly blank, her eyes still empty. Hollowed out. He’s seen her hurt, upset, smiling or angry: sometimes two or three at once. He’s never seen her… null.

She looks as if she’s a dead woman walking.

He claps her close, and it makes no difference at all. She’s so tightly wound together that he doesn’t think she’s noticing anything beyond the inside of her head.

“We have to go see Montgomery.” She opens the door, turns in the direction of her Captain’s office, forcing her feet across the floor. Ryan looks up, opens his mouth, catches Castle’s negating stare, and looks down again.

It’s Castle who taps on Montgomery’s door, and Castle who pushes Beckett inside, and Castle who closes the door behind them. But it’s Montgomery who takes one short look at Beckett and pulls a hipflask out his drawer.

“Drink, Detective. That’s an order.” He thrusts the opened flask into her hand and watches her carefully to be sure she swallows. She grimaces and coughs, but a little colour comes back to her face. Montgomery repossesses his flask. “Now. Sit down before you fall down. You look like shit, Beckett.” His Captaincy has fallen away in the shock of apparently ill Beckett. She’s never ill. She only ever looks this bad on… oh, shit. On 9 or 10 January. Not that he’s seen her on 9 January more than once.

Montgomery is not stupid. He’s also not got to the position he holds without being able to pull a lot of half-hints and clues together very fast indeed. Clue one: Beckett’s ghost-white, ghastly expression. Clue two: Castle’s half-protective lean. Clue three: ME Parrish and this morning’s argument, put together with last Monday’s rapid exit that had left ME Parrish looking very irritated indeed. And clue four, bringing it all together, Sergeant Hardon’s report, a week ago. Looks like something in Beckett’s locked down private life has risen up to bite her, and he is rapidly coming to the conclusion it’s to do with her dad. He can’t think of any other reason for her to look like that.

“Now that you look as if you might live, Beckett, how about you explain what’s wrong?”

“Nothing, sir. Just a bit under the weather.” Montgomery isn’t watching her face – that’s a waste of time. He’s watching Castle, who has just failed to control the rapid flicker of an expression of extreme worry. So. Beckett is evading, if not quite outright lying. There’s a surprise. She rarely reveals anything that isn’t directly relevant to her work.
“Why didn’t you call in sick?”

“I felt okay when I woke up.” Castle’s expression flickers again, but this time it looks more like puzzlement, cut with a fair helping of disbelief. So that might be half true.

“Well, now,” he says, to give himself some time to think. “Where were you at ten? You weren’t at your desk then either.”

“I…took a few moments.” Now Castle looks bewildered – and then suddenly realises something. Ah. That’s interesting. That statement is all true, but he’s missing something. Oh yes. Ryan had said…

“That when you got a call? Who called you, Beckett?”

“My dad.” And that wasn’t a surprise to Castle, either. Which – Castle’s lack of surprise, that is – is quite a surprise to Montgomery. Several blocks fall into a pattern. Element one: Castle has got closer to Beckett than expected. Element two: he’s met Beckett’s dad. Hmm. Hardon had said there’d been a civilian with Beckett. He’d known then that the civilian was Castle. He should have asked a couple more questions at the time.

“He okay?” he says casually.

“Yeah.” Another wince. Another – if not a lie, certainly not the whole truth. Beckett’s looking sick-white again – as soon as he got on to the topic of her father.

“If you need some time to take care of him,” he starts. He never gets to finish. Beckett turns as green as a Louisiana tree frog and hightails it for the restroom again. Montgomery looks directly at Castle, who is now not even trying to conceal that he is looking very worried indeed. “What in hell’s name is going on here, Castle?”

Castle smiles weakly. “Stomach flu?” Montgomery’s face darkens into a scowl, and he pushes the door mostly shut and returns to his desk.

“Don’t. Don’t give me that crap. You think I don’t know Beckett’s hiding something? Tell me straight. Is her dad still sober?” It’s the one question Castle can answer truthfully, at least as of ten o’clock this morning.

“Yes.” Montgomery relaxes infinitesimally.

“Good.” He looks beadily at Castle. “I know there’s a lot more to this. I’m not going to ask you because I don’t think you’ll tell me and anyway it’s not your place to. When Beckett comes back, send her in. You stay out.”

Castle leaves, dismissed, and returns to his chair, to fiddle fretfully with paperclips and pens and his phone. No-one says anything. Eventually Beckett reappears, face and lips still bloodless, eyes dull.

“Montgomery wants to see you,” Castle says, before she can sit down.

“I suppose you told him everything?”

“He didn’t ask. I didn’t tell. Maybe I should have. Maybe he’ll see there’s a problem anyway. Throwing up in the restroom isn’t exactly normal.”

She says nothing. Then she walks away, a heaviness in her spine and step. Castle returns to his fretful fiddling as she passes through Montgomery’s door. All it needs to complete the scene is “Shut the door, Beckett.” She does. Montgomery doesn’t speak, making it very obvious he’s examining her. “You don’t look any better. Do you need another shot of whiskey?”

“No. No, sir.” Her face twists at the thought. She doesn’t want any alcohol at all.

“Now. Sit down. I told you Tuesday you should be easing off. Either you’re sick, or something else is wrong. Either way, I’m not having someone out on the job who’s not at full performance. I’m benching you for two days because I don’t want the rest of us catching your stomach bug, if that’s what it is. After that, you need to decide how you’re going to pull yourself together, because you’re not going out on a case till I’m sure you’re fit for it, and right now I don’t think you’re fit for duty.”

Beckett stares at him, aghast. “But sir…”

“No. You’re not right and I’m not taking the chance that you or anyone else gets hurt because of it.” He gives her a very straight look.

“But sir, my work is fine. No-one’s complained. You haven’t criticised anything I’ve done. I’ve done nothing wrong and you’re benching me.”

“I’m benching you because you’ve thrown up twice this morning and you’re not recognising that you’re not fit for duty. If you can’t recognise that, you can’t do the job. Your judgement is impaired, Detective. I know you’ve got problems at home, too.”

“I…” she can’t say don’t under Montgomery’s minatory stare.

“The minute I mentioned your father you ran for the restroom for the second time this morning. Don’t tell me there isn’t something wrong there. You need to get yourself sorted out, Detective Beckett, and if that means benching then that’s what will happen. I want you out of here in fifteen minutes, and on Wednesday morning you will report to me to discuss what is wrong and what you are going to do about it, after which I’ll decide what will happen next.” He peers at her, and drops the hardass Captain for a moment. “Beckett, we’ve managed to work around your dad’s…issues…for a while now. No shame in asking for some help now if that’s what you need. But you need to work out what you need. Take the time.” He leaves it there. She says nothing. For a moment, Montgomery thinks she’ll break and tell him something. And then she stands.

“Dismissed.”

She looks as if he’d fired her. “Yes, sir,” she says, and leaves.
Beckett walks past Esposito, Ryan, and finally Castle as if none of them were there. She doesn’t stop at her desk, but enters the break room, downs a glass of ice-cold water, and stands utterly still. She’s been benched. Montgomery’s benched her. She can’t comprehend it. She’s done everything right, at work. Always. She’s not let a single ball drop. She’s given it her all. And now, suddenly – it’s not enough.

Nothing’s been enough. She is not enough. Not for her father, not for the job she loves. Not for her friends, and not for anything else. Ever since her father got drunk, nothing’s ever been enough. He’d destroyed her life then, and now all the choices she’s made since had only rebuilt it on shifting sand. Just like the house built on sand in the parable: the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell.

She puts the empty glass in the sink, walks out, shuts down, and leaves without a word, with only one single, agonised, desperately pleading glance at Castle.

Castle watches Beckett, who’s moving on autopilot, completely switched off. “What happened?” he says, but doesn’t get an answer. He doesn’t think she hears him, or sees him, lost in her own world. He follows her down in the elevator, towards her car, into the passenger seat. “What happened?” he asks again, more sharply, but puts a hand over hers. Her fingers are chilled under his warmth.

“I’m to go home till I’m not throwing up.” There’s almost as much emotion in her words as there is on the face of a porcelain doll. She’s almost as pale, too.

“I’ll come with you.” She shrugs, a minimal movement, and neither objects nor approves, but there is still that same agony in her eyes. There is no more talking as she drives precisely through the Manhattan streets. He doesn’t try to start a discussion then, nor when he goes up with her to her apartment, nor when he enters. She slumps on her couch, cold hands lying still, inactive in her lap. All her fire has gone out.

“What did Montgomery say to you, Beckett?”

She turns to him where he’s standing, turns so slowly, an ungreased spindle, spinning without purpose.

“I’m benched.” She might as well have been saying that the sky is grey, so little does her voice change.

“How long for?” She doesn’t answer that, looking through him with those empty, lifeless eyes.

“He sent me home. I’ve done everything I could do for the job, I’m the best in the precinct, and he’s still benched me.” Her breath catches. “Nothing I’ve done was enough. Nothing I could do has ever been enough,” she whispers, but Castle hears her anyway, and his heart breaks for her.

Breaking heart or not, this is his last chance: now, when she’s probably hit bottom. It’s going to be hard. She’s probably going to hate him. But maybe, just maybe, she’s in a place where one last push will tip her into realising that she has to do something.

Only Beckett can save herself. He can’t. He can only walk away, and hope she saves herself. He takes a breath – and before he begins, Beckett says, “It’s all fallen apart.”

_Say what?_ He can’t have said that out loud. She’s still speaking, almost to herself.
“Everything I’ve done for my dad, and I still couldn’t be there yesterday when it mattered. What’s wrong with me, that I can’t listen to his story?” She looks up, straight at Castle, pain scarred across her face and agony blazoned in her eyes. “Why can’t I even do that?”

Castle sits down hard, next to her. He’d psyched himself up to tell her hard truth in the faint, last hope that doing so would bring her to realise that she needed something more than her empty life, but there’s finally a chink in the armour and she’s broken, about one minute before he was going to do his damnedest to break her. He is unimaginably relieved. Breaking Beckett would have broken something deep in his soul.

“Because you haven’t ever talked to him properly about it, have you?” He draws a shot at a venture, though he’s noticed that open and honest conversations about how they feel have not exactly figured in the Beckett family dynamic, or indeed in any form of the Beckett personal dynamic. She winces. He drops an arm around her. “In fact,” he says slowly, hoping that his timing is better than he usually manages, “you haven’t ever talked to anyone properly about it, have you? You thought you had, but...maybe you didn’t.”

“I went to counselling. Therapy. Al-Anon. I did everything you’re supposed to do. I went through all of it. Forgave him. Listened to him as he went through his twelve steps. He made his amends and I forgave him.”

“Did you?” Castle asks calmly.

“Of course I did! It wasn’t him. It was the booze. It’s a disease.” Her voice rises, a little frantically. “It wasn’t his fault.”

“So why’d you never get angry with him now? After all, he wasted your time by dragging you over when he knew nothing about Schickoff & Schultz. Anybody else trying that on you would have been turned into ground beef. Or when he suckered me into inviting you both to the loft. Why didn’t you tell him the truth, Beckett? Why didn’t you tell him that you weren’t up to going because it upsets you?”

“It’s not his fault,” she says miserably. “It’s not his fault.”

“What’s not his fault?”

She doesn’t answer, leaning forward on to her knees with her face hidden. Castle lifts her face with his hand under her chin. “Talk to me, Beckett. Why’s it not his fault?”

“It never worked. He just drank more till he couldn’t hear me.”

Uh-oh. If she upset him... Jim had said she never loses her temper. I thought she’d grown out of it. She’d merely rammed it down because he drank more whenever she did.

“If I upset him...” She trails off. “I did forgive him.” But she sounds like she’s trying to convince herself.

“Beckett, at least stop lying to yourself. I mean, I’d quite like it if you stopped lying about this to me too, but listen to yourself.” She’s not hearing him.

“I can’t do this. I can’t lose it like this. I have to be there for them but I’m so tired of always being there.”

This time, she’s sober when she says it, and she shivers under his arm around her shoulders. He slides closer, hoping to warm her.
“Why does it have to be you? Why can’t you lose it?”

Suddenly she turns away from him.

“I let him drown. I walked away and for three years more he drowned. Every knock, every phone call, he could have been dead. And I did nothing to stop him. I can’t bear it happening again. I couldn’t watch him kill himself and I couldn’t stop him.” She stops.

“But now I can.”

In that, he hears all the full-force determination of Detective Kate Beckett, who can’t ever be Kat with anyone else. The reasons for Kat are beginning to become clear – and the reasons for Kat never being there in anyone else’s company are equally emerging, because she’s been shielding his past from the whole wide world. If you are always hiding history, and always waiting for the call… whether for support or to tell you about failure… you can never be off-duty. Not, at least, if you’re still compensating for walking away. Not if you can’t forgive yourself, and consequently also believe you’ve never been forgiven. Not if you can’t believe that you can be loved, because of the decisions you’ve made… because your father loved alcohol more than he loved you right at the point where you needed him most.

Castle pulls Beckett back round, a little more forcefully than her physical non-resistance would warrant. “Not when you’re like this, you can’t.” He holds her gaze. “You need to stand down, stop, and work out why you’ve finally started to lose it. You need to talk to someone who knows what they’re doing.” Incipient argument rises in her face. “No, listen to me. You could talk to me – you can talk to me, but I don’t understand enough to help properly. You won’t talk to Lanie. If you don’t sort this out in your own head it’ll just keep happening.” He has a flash of inspiration. “If you don’t talk to someone, you’ll upset your dad more. He’s already sure there’s something wrong, so if you don’t get it sorted he’ll start trying to find out about it. That’s not what you want, is it?”

“He can’t do that.”

“So head it off. Go talk to someone. It’ll get Montgomery off your back, too.”

He picks her up and resettles her against him, tucked in his lap. Her face is buried in his neck. “I did all of it. And now I have to do it all again?” She’s not talking to him, though: she’s talking to herself. He strokes down her back, slow, gentle and completely non-sexual; affection inherent in the movement and touch.

“Stand down, for now. Take some time, stay here. Lean on me.” Be eased, be soothed. Be mine. “You just need time to think it through.”

He doesn’t suggest that he should help further: though he’ll hold her close and listen to her for as long as she wants or needs, he can’t solve this. Far too many risks in trying that: he knows nothing about what she went through except for his recent research, and under the Detective’s shield and gun she’s as fragile as spun sugar. His general confidence in his ability to make things right does not extend to a complicated psychological issue rooted as deeply as this. For once, he recognises his limitations. He can be supportive, and comforting, and there to make her stand down, he can provide the assertively physical sexuality that she both likes and needs, he can potentially (if she lets him) allow her to be the softer woman that sometimes she has to be to balance her day-to-day command, but he can’t cure this. Instead, he simply cuddles her.

“I don’t want to do it all again. I did it. It was bad enough then when it had a purpose. When I needed to do it. I really worked through it, so I was ready…”
Castle startles, and then has to soothe Beckett back into her curled-in position. He has a horrible premonition that Beckett doesn’t mean excavated all my feelings but did it as fast as possible to be done with it.

“I got through it. My therapist was really pleased with how fast I sorted myself out.”

He knew it. He also wonders what sort of therapist would have let Beckett get away with that sort of superficial analysis. Though… if she’d been at college, or just starting out, likely she couldn’t afford a really good therapist. He wonders, though, if she couldn’t afford decent therapy, how she’d managed this apartment? It doesn’t fit, because if she can live on Manhattan she can afford a competent practitioner. If she’d bothered really to look for one. Much more likely that she took the first available NYPD therapist, or one on the NYU list if it was that early, who missed her completely overdriven personality. Beckett is very good at deception. Self-deception, which is of course a particularly effective way to deceive everyone else. No doubt she really thought she’d done it right. It’s her whole history: be the best, the fastest, the first to the finish.

It’s just a shame that she tried that for therapy too, where it really does not work. So he’s read, anyway.

He hums, non-committally, and strokes some more. Gradually the biting tension in her spine smooths out. She’s still buried in his chest, though. Words are occasionally emerging, and while that happens he’s not going to do anything to change it. Not while there’s still a very decent chance that she’s talking herself into going back to therapy. He really does not want to take the nuclear option.

He’s still softly cuddling her a few minutes later, no further words having escaped but a suspicious amount of slight sniff having eventuated, when, much to his annoyance, his phone starts to ring. One look at the number leaves him not so much annoyed as terrified.

“Rick Castle,” he says, and disentangles Beckett to move her slightly away from the phone.

“Rick, how is Katie? She’s not at the precinct. I called but she isn’t picking up…”

Jim sounds very worried indeed – but sober.

“She’s with me.” Beckett looks up, working out to whom he’s speaking, and tenses up immediately. “She’s fine.” She eases very slightly on finding that Castle will lie to her father without compunction to stop him worrying about her. “Are you okay?” Pause. “That’s good. Yeah, she’ll call later. We’re a little” – he develops a smug, very male, pleased tone – “busy right now.”

“What the hell, Castle?” Beckett’s indignant tone adds veracity to his inducement of Jim’s misinterpretation.

“Really?” Jim says. “This sounds like something I do not want to know about my daughter, Rick.”

“Okay,” Castle says amiably. “Do you want to talk to her? She’s right here next to me.”

There’s an embarrassed silence from Jim’s end of the phone. “No,” he says eventually. “I’ll catch her later. Bye.”

“Bye, Jim.” Castle swipes his phone off and smirks at Beckett, who, in the rush of aggravated annoyance at his insinuations to her father, has more colour and life than at any time since yesterday morning.

“What the hell are you doing? That was my dad! And you made him think… you… you oversexed arrogant brain-dead idiot.”
“And it worked,” Castle says smugly. “He’s not worrying about you right now. He might be polishing his shotgun, but he’s stopped worrying.”

Beckett flaps wordlessly at him. He brings her back close in and tucks his arm around her irritated frame. “You look better, too. I like you when you’re cross. It’s very cute.”

She growls. Actually, positively growls. He hears it with a wash of relief. Growls mean that Beckett is starting to recover some normality.

“Now, we can sit here and you can stop fretting and stand down and be easy and not think, or we can sit here and you can think about what you want to do, or we can get some food, because everything’s better on a full stomach and it’s lunchtime.”

“I’m not hungry.”

Castle shrugs. “Okay.” It was worth a try, and a single missed meal won’t hurt him. Much. He draws a little pattern on her arm. “We can just stay here then.” He smiles sleepily. “Come here and be easy, Beckett. Just take some time to think it through.” He pulls her closer, and nuzzles her hair. “I know what you need. You just need some space. Time to stop. Time out.” He nuzzles some more, easing around her as he does. “We can have time out.” He has an idea. “Let’s play your game. Think about that, and not think about anything else.” He smirks. “I’ll beat you, though.”

“You think?” Beckett’s voice is sharp. Appealing to her competitive spirit has pulled her out of her slough of despond, he thinks.

She sets up in quick time. Anything so that she doesn’t have to face going through her memories all over again. The first time had been bad enough. And if she plays, Castle’s strong arm will remain around her and his confident presence will still be here to keep her safe, and maybe it’ll be enough for now: enough to calm her down and ameliorate her corrosive fear that she’s damaged her father by saying too much and hurt where she should be helping.

Castle calmed her father. In the most annoying possible fashion, but he made it believable. For her father, at least. Her dad believes that she’s fine. Of course, he now also believes that she and Castle are having an affair, but… that’s a problem for another day.

What she does about it all… that’s a problem for later, too. For now, don’t think about it, Kate. Play the game, and concentrate on that. Ignore the twisting that hasn’t left your gut since yesterday afternoon, and that you don’t want food because your stomach won’t keep it down. Just… play the game.

Which game, of course, is an open question. Sorry is not the only game in town. The game of regrets and apologies is also in play, though whose are to be made to whom is also an open question. Still. She needs to draw the cards, and let them take her where they may.

Beckett scrapes the first game, fuelled on most of a pot of coffee. Liquid, at least, seems to stay where she should. Castle wins the second.

“Third time’s the charm, Beckett. Winner takes all.”

“Last game, then.” The afternoon is slipping by, and it’s time to wrap this up. Time, too, to face up to reality. She needs to think. She’s had her little space of time out. She sets the board up once more, and when they begin finds that luck is not with her. It seems like an omen. Castle wins, again, without even needing to try hard.

“There,” he says happily. “I win.” Beckett is busily tidying the pieces and board away. He catches her hands in their restless motion. “Leave that a minute.”

She shakes her head. “No. I need to put it away.” There’s an odd tone in her voice, as if she means more than the game. He drops his grip from her, and waits as she places it carefully on the lowest bookshelf. She stays there, not returning to the couch but moving to the window, picking up her little stone bird from the side table and cradling it in her palm, stroking its head as if it were real.

Castle comes towards her, intent, focused and sure of himself, and draws her in, strong and smooth. “I won,” he says suavely, and takes her little bird from her, setting it down delicately on its table. “I won, and I’m claiming my prize.” He runs one hand into her hair and angles her head precisely. “Traditionally, my prize is a kiss.” He lowers his head to hers, slowly, giving her time to object. She doesn’t. When his lips touch hers she opens for him, and he kisses her deeply, firmly; holding her to him and perfectly certain of his aim. His Beckett is broken, but maybe from the pieces he’ll recover both Kat and Beckett.

“You don’t need to decide anything now,” he murmurs, “but you need to think about what you want.” He kisses her again, slowly and decisively. “I had the definite impression that you wanted me,” he whispers into her ear.

She’s instantly rigid, tense. “Is that the deal, then? Fix myself because that’s the only way you’re going to stay?”

“No.” She relaxes back against him at the instant, reflexive denial: so fast that it could never be taken for a lie. “I said I knew what I want and what I’m doing.” He smirks evilly against her cheek. “You.” There’s a disgusted mutter. He returns to serious. “I don’t say I wouldn’t prefer that you weren’t unhappy or upset or overstressed, though. But that’s up to you.” He kisses the top of her head. “I’m here, and you’re here, and that’s what matters right now. Everything else can wait till you’re ready. It’s all up to you, now.”
Threatened by shadows

“It’s not, though. There’s no choice. Montgomery won’t let me back without knowing what’s wrong and what I’m doing about it, my dad’s asking questions and if I don’t have some sort of plan he’ll get upset and then he might… I can’t bear it if he does. I can’t let that happen.”

Castle clasps her closer, and encourages her head to pillow itself on his wide shoulder. Then he smoothly walks them back to the couch and seats himself with Beckett still clasped in beside him. After a while in which nothing is said and less done, she speaks again.

“First I went through it for real. Then I went through it in therapy, and Al-Anon. Then I went through it when Dad got dry and was doing his twelve steps. He worked so hard to get dry.” She gulps in air. “I couldn’t tell him I didn’t want to hear it again. Not when he was so fragile. I couldn’t let him fall again when I could hold him up. They have to make amends, you know.” He knows that, now. “And he did. How could I throw it back in his face?” She’s drifting in unhappy memory. Castle continues simply to hold her, and for once refrains from any comment at all except an encouraging hum.

“I couldn’t stand to remember it all. He doesn’t remember what he said, or did. I wasn’t going to remind him.” Frustration and furious grief lace her words, tumbling from her in a cataract of old pain and a mess of unhealed, bleeding wounds. “What good would it do him to know that first he said don’t leave and then he told me he couldn’t stand to see me: he couldn’t bear it? How does that help him? He never meant it.” The next breath is close to a sob. “He never meant any of it. So how could I reopen it? I couldn’t let it happen again.”

Her father had said don’t leave? Uh-oh. Because she had. She walked away. Left. And then he got sober and she’s never left him, or anyone else who’s asked for her help, ever again. But, too, her father had said he couldn’t bear to see her. At nineteen, maybe twenty, that’s going to cut deep, and the total contradiction means she would never be sure of the right path to follow. And now, she’s making sure she never does anything that makes him not want to see her. Such as – not at all at random – lose her temper with him. Or indeed anywhere near him. Or tell him anything that isn’t bright and cheerful. Or reopen old wounds. Or bring up old memories.

Or think that anyone else could really care for her.

“I could just work. No need to think about anything else, unless Dad called.”

And now her hard focus and intensity, why she wouldn’t accept his touch in Asher Washington’s apartment, the reasons she goes running back into the (or any) precinct when she’s upset, are also frighteningly clear.

“I couldn’t bear to be reminded, so I made sure when I came home nothing did. Only my bird. So I could stop and not think and not worry. Unless Dad called.”

Oh. No mementoes. No personality. Nothing that might be solid enough to fix on – and nothing that would need her to be strong, or focused, or give anyone anything. Only soft vagueness and no demands. No more need to care for anything or anyone than… than a cat. Or a Kat.

Kat is suddenly totally clear. Semi-schizophrenic, and terrifying, but totally clear. He cossets her in, and still says nothing. Anything he says now will likely be wrong, in some way he won’t understand till it’s all too late and they’re ripping each other apart with lacerating words again. If he’d known this before Christmas, maybe… Well. Maybe don’t mean anything, and any regrets are a waste of time now.

No wonder, too, why she’d thought she could push him away so easily. She thought she’d abandoned her father… but before that, her father had not just abandoned her but effectively told her he couldn’t bear her. So of course she thought that all she’d have to do was show him her true feelings for him to run as fast as he could in the other direction. After all, her own father had, without even knowing how she felt, and if he could, everyone else should. His arms tighten around her without conscious input, instinctively wanting to provide the strength that she hasn’t been able to lean on from her own family.

She’s drawn into herself, tight-wound and cramped, leaning away at any opportunity until he brings her back: knots in her shoulders and misery written on her face.

“Come here,” he says softly. “Come here, and forget for a little while. Sure it’s all up to you, but you’ve got all evening, and all tomorrow, and plenty of time to think about what you want.”

“What I want?” she says bitterly. “I wanted my dad not to be stuck down a bottle. I wanted not to be pulling him out the pit. I wanted to have Christmases that weren’t all either spoilt or wracked with memories of how they were spoilt. Mulled wine vomit. Meals drunk not eaten. Ruined presents. Being told I wasn’t her. Nothing I could do could ever make it better. At least on Christmas shift I could be making something better for someone, even if it wasn’t what I wanted.”

Castle manages not to wince.

Beckett wrenches herself away and stands up. “Two years in,” she spits out acidly, “I wanted it all to be over. Just so I’d never hear him again, begging drunkenly for me to save him, and in the next breath blaming me for being so like her that all he could do was blot it out.” Her fists are clenched. “So tell me, family man, when do you stop being part of a family? When’s it okay to decide you don’t have one any more? Because that’s what doing what I want would mean. He saved himself and wanted to be a family again. He needed me. So don’t tell me I can have what I want. I can’t. That was all lost ten years ago.”

She turns away from him. “You don’t get it. You’ve never had to. If you’re lucky, you never will have to. You make your choices and then you have to live with them.”

“Yeah,” Castle says heavily, though he doesn’t mean agreement by it. “But… things change, Beckett. Matters move on. Maybe there are more choices now than there used to be.”

Her shoulders hunch. “There are no choices. Keep him sober or watch him die. Those are the choices. I can’t have what I want because he took it all away from me. He can be happy and think he’s got a family because he doesn’t remember any of it.” Her voice spikes. “I can’t deal with anyone’s happy family because he ruined ours.” Castle is already on his feet and moving fast to her as she realises what she said. “I didn’t mean that,” she sobs. “It wasn’t his fault.” Castle cradles her against his shoulder and clasps her tightly: his body hard about her and his hands strong, enveloping her.

Truth hurts. Truth is currently being sobbed out into his chest. Because she had meant it, and she knows it, and this might be the first time she’s ever admitted it.

“It wasn’t your fault either.”

“But I’m the one who has to deal with it.”

“Beckett… it wasn’t your dad who couldn’t deal with Julia. It’s not your dad who can’t deal with family. It’s you. You’re not dealing with it any more.” He stops her pulling away. “I can make you happy, but – you know, it’s very disappointing, because I specialise in making people happy – you don’t stay happy. So short of keeping you in bed all the time… which I really wouldn’t mind because we’d both be very happy – maybe it’s time to try and find a way round it?” He deliberately makes his voice a little frivolous, a little teasing; but under that the point is iron hard.

She stays still against him.

“You can’t go on like this. Eventually, you’ll crash.”

There’s a sobbed, indrawn breath, and another, more serious, attempt to pull away. This time, again, Castle doesn’t let her go. The indistinct noises against his chest might, with a little imagination, become something like Lanie said that.

“Lanie said it, Montgomery said it, I’ve said it. Even your dad said it – didn’t he? If everyone’s telling you you’re crashing, isn’t it time to change course?”

He tows her back to sitting down, never letting go of her. The dam’s broken and the floods have come; and the fortress of her control is washed away. She’s diminished and broken, and for a moment he’s furious and disgusted that her father’s conduct and weakness has made her so: has ruined the life she should have had. But that won’t help now, and it’s not to Castle that her father has made, or may make, his amends. It’s not for Castle to judge Jim Beckett.

It’s not for Castle to judge anyone who’s been part of this mess. He’s never been there, and God willing he never will be. He can see clearly now how everything has always been part of the whole. Family is just a burden to be borne, always hiding the real issues – stay away from families. Other people only want you when you’re strong – never reveal weakness. Don’t reveal your feelings, don’t explain, and don’t ever talk about anything difficult, or confrontational, or that might cause disagreements. Don’t let anyone close. They’ll only let you down. Love is conditional and readily withdrawn – don’t fall in love, don’t even look for it. All of it’s a weakness, and everyone needs you to be strong.

And if someone will give you momentary ease – take a little love where you can, because it won’t be there as soon as they discover who you really are, and what you really think. So don’t tell them. Or, because despite everything your integrity is iron hard and ice cold – tell them who you think you are and watch them run. Or never let them close enough to need to know.

Don’t, in fact, let anyone know anything.

But now she’s going to have to, or lose everything, and that must be terrifying. One way or the other, she’s going to have to tear herself apart and stick herself back together. The only question is – will she take the hard choice to build herself up or will she take the easier route, give up and stay in her empty, joyless life? She’s always made the hard choice before…

Maybe she’s tired of the hard choice. Maybe she’s tired of the battle. Maybe she’s simply tired. But he can’t bear the thought that she might not fight for them, for everything they might be. He shivers, because she hasn’t fought for them much to date – rather the reverse. She’s done everything possible to push them apart, most of the time, and then it’s been resigned acceptance and flat statements that he’ll leave when he realises she’ll never be enough: bitter comments about her own inadequacy.

Oh. Why fight for a relationship that you want (he hopes she wants it) when that doesn’t get you it. Fighting for her father failed. Walking away – in the end, succeeded. It’s not even playing hard to get. It’s… another learned response. She’d walked away from Julia Berowitz, too, in the end. She’s had to walk away from everything she wanted. So, however inadvertently, in the end going after her had been the only thing that would work. But it isn’t working, now.

But… she might still walk away from everything. She might still walk away from being a cop, she might still walk away from him, she might still walk away. She’s so tired. She’s so tired of everything, and she still won’t lean on him unless he brings her in and makes her do so, because she still doesn’t believe that she won’t have to prop him up just like everyone else around her.

And, of course, she’s flat out said that she isn’t enough. To him, to her father.

He holds her close, and waits. He’s said and done enough, and more will be counter-productive. He’ll simply keep her tight-clasped in his arms, and be that still point of stability around which she can spin: the axis of her world.

Time passes, and with each sad, silent minute Castle becomes ever more convinced that Beckett will simply give up. He’s fairly sure she no longer knows or cares that he is there: she isn’t leaning on him, she isn’t curling in, or away. She’s static, barely breathing, and, most frighteningly, her eyes are dry and empty. She should be crying. She should be upset by the choice before her.

But of course, crying didn’t help. So she doesn’t cry, doesn’t show upset. Doesn’t show anything.

She’s so very, very good at not showing anything.

Just before he’s about to consider giving up on waiting for her to take the final step; just before he’s about to consider leaving: anything to break this fatal spell where she doesn’t seem able to reach out to anyone and he can’t reach her; just before he has to take the nuclear step and walk away, as she had done: last resort to show her that she’s hit bottom – she comes out of her stasis.

“I don’t want to,” she says emptily. “I don’t want to do this all over again. I shouldn’t have to.” She stops. Castle’s gut twists.

“But I can only save myself,” she says, and bursts into tears.

Castle is no stranger to comforting crying women, or, more often, daughters. He is almost a complete stranger to comforting a hopelessly sobbing Beckett. The only other time she’d been crying, she’d tried to hide it, and shut it down. This time she’s doing neither. He applies the same basic principles as he would do for any weeping female, (well, not really. There are some significant differences in approach and attitude) firmly lifts Beckett into his lap and embrace, pillows her head into the space between muscled shoulder and neck, and pets her hair undemandingly. Eventually words make themselves faintly distinguishable through the tears.

“I have to do it,” she sobs desolately. “All over again. It’s not fair.” In her voice and words is the note of the devastated teen, still grieving for her mother’s loss as the next disaster overwhelmed her, not the voice of the confident adult. “Everybody needs me to do something.” Castle cossets her, and says nothing. “I need to do something.” She rasps in a breath. “I don’t want to do anything. Why’s it me who needs to do anything?” She stops, and breathes again. It sounds defeated. “But I have to.”

She slumps, not so much in body, which is already bent as if broken, but in spirit; then tries to pull away again. “Let go,” she says dully. “I need to think.”

“Nope,” Castle says, cheerfully contradictory and completely resistant. “Stay right here.”

“I don’t w…”

“Don’t tell fibs, Beckett. You do want to. You just want to be eased. You don’t have to do anything, here with me.”

“I need to think.”

“No, you don’t. You need to stop. Don’t think, for a while.” He colours, unseen. “Trust your feelings, not your brains.” Trust that I can give you this, whenever you need it. Trust in me. Stay with me. “You know you’re safe for now.” Safe in your Castle. He continues stroking her hair, a little less softly, a little more assertion that she should simply stand down and follow his lead. There will be nothing more than affection, for now.

He has a sudden thought. “All you’ve ever needed to do with me is say yes or no. All you need to do about this is say yes or no to seeing someone who can help. That’s all. Just yes or no: one decision, and then you don’t need to decide anything more. You can just stay right here with me and be eased, whatever you decide.”

One decision? Only one, simple, decision? Yes or no. No need to decide anything more. Just stay right here in his arms and forget: let him be stronger than she, let him support her. He’s not asking her to do anything, or be anything, she realises, he’s only asking her to decide whether to let someone else help. That doesn’t force her to be anything at all. It may, however, mean that she will have to talk. But not to someone who can be hurt, or upset, or filter it through their own assumptions. To someone who doesn’t care.

That, she slowly works out, means someone who won’t know and won’t care whether she’s weak or strong, who won’t pity her, who won’t use it against her or make it public or ever think about it again. Maybe…maybe it would all go away? She curls up into herself. She’s never made it go away. No matter how hard she tried, how much therapy she’d had, how hard she worked, how quiet and unmemorable her apartment, how much her father told her she’d saved him.

She’s never believed that. He saved himself. She had nothing to do with it. She could only save herself.

Except she didn’t.

If everyone around you thinks you’re crashing… maybe you already did, and just hid it. Maybe you crashed long ago, and never…noticed. Maybe you’re…broken. Never stuck yourself back together. Just held the fragments together because you put yourself under so much pressure they couldn’t fly apart.

And then Castle came along and let her stop. Let her stand down, lifted the pressure outside that stopped the pressures inside exploding her. So it all came crashing to a stop. She’s come crashing to a stop. No precinct to keep her together – none of the pressure that she chose to deal with the pressure that she didn’t choose.

She’s always been the best, the fastest, the strongest. And none of it has helped. The man who’s surrounding her now, though… a restful evening in a quaint shop, soft fingers against crippling headache, a silly game, strong arms and a firm body, and the ability that no-one else has ever had to let her be soft, stood down Kat. To cosset her and protect her and cherish her. She only needs to let him. He’s made it clear that he can; he’s made it clear that he will.

But here and now, just for once, it’s all up to her. Castle isn’t pushing. He isn’t trying to get what he wants, though it’s clear what he wants. It’s entirely in her hands. Live, or exist. Forward, or static.

Love, or guilt.
Yes, or no.

“Yes.”
Pay the price

She’s crying again, or maybe that should be still. She hasn’t stopped crying since she said, “Yes,” half an hour ago. The box of Kleenex is rapidly diminishing, and she’s no prettier weeping when sober than she had been weeping when drunk, only a week ago. Only a week, since Julia and David Berowitz had triggered disaster. But no. This was inevitable from the moment Beckett met the Berowitzes. The last straw, when her back was already breaking.

He keeps his arms around her, keeps her tight against his chest, keeps passing her Kleenex and stroking her hair, keeps dropping tiny kisses on her head, keeps silent. When she stops crying (should that be if? So many tears.) then he’ll think about anything else.

Finally, she snuffles damply to a halt. Her eyes are swollen and red, her nose is also red, and there are mascara trails down her cheeks. Castle has never seen her objectively less attractive, except when she was also drunk. Subjectively, he’s never seen her more attractive. At last: true emotion, true feelings.

She sniffs soggily, and blows her nose, and slumps back into him, still coiled into herself, muscles knotted and tense, face hidden, buried in his shoulder. He takes the option of least difficulty and begins to work at the stiff muscles and tension, pressing firmly to untangle them; not making the mistake of murmuring soothing nothings. She’s not a child, and she’s not looking for a parent. Anything but. It was his being a parent that began the trouble, and that’s still not resolved. She doesn’t even really want to think of him being a parent. But under his strong fingers she’s relaxing: soft against him and letting him make this stress better.

But she’s agreed to see someone. Possibly under some duress – from Montgomery, not from him (though he’s just as glad that the point was taken away from him by Montgomery, because he’d been psyching himself up to make the same point with an equally my-way-or-the-highway choice, and he is not at all sure that she’d have accepted it) – but it’s been her decision and he didn’t press her one way or the other. Of course, he’s nearly bitten through his tongue so that he didn’t, but it’s paid off, because she hasn’t run away, told him to leave, or shot him.

On the other hand, she hasn’t called her father yet, and she’s going to have to do that before the awkward silence when they next meet becomes even more awkward, and possibly then becomes full of loud noise and flying buckshot. (That’s – the buckshot, that is – entirely unnecessary. He has no intention of fighting this hard and then walking away. That’s not his trick. He doesn’t do that.) The day has worn on: it’s late afternoon and the light is gone. He sighs. She’s only just become peaceful, and it’s about to be broken again.

“Beckett?”

There’s a noise that might be urgh.

“Beckett, your dad might just be starting to worry. About your stamina, if nothing else.”

“Wha’?”

“Well, the last thing he knew is that you’d call him later because we were busy. Which we have been.”

“What?”

“Beckett, wake up!”
“Ugh,” she says, but intelligence returns to her face, slowly. “What did you say?”

“We told your dad you’d call later because we were busy.” That slowly percolates. Then it meets memory.

“No,” she says, crossly, “that’s what you told him.”

“By now he’ll really have polished his shotgun. And loaded it.”

Beckett doesn’t appreciate the humour. Nor does she want to call her dad, especially since the last call had…er, not exactly gone well. She doesn’t say anything one way or the other.

“He was really worried. He called – must have been pretty soon after he called you this morning, and then that was the second call when we were back here. He isn’t upset, he just wants to talk to you.” Castle pauses. “I think he wants to make sure you’re okay.”

She says nothing, again. Her father had certainly sounded annoyed with her first thing this morning. Then again, she’d got pretty annoyed right back at him. She supposes that she ought to call him. It would be the proper thing to do. The adult thing. The responsible thing.

She doesn’t want to be proper, adult, or responsible. She doesn’t want to make her dad feel better by lying to him about being fine. If she has to talk to him, she wants to spill out all her years-long hurt and bitterness and then simply dissolve into an ugly puddle of acid and venom. He got to say anything, under the cover of Jack Daniels. At first it was Jack Daniels… by the end it was anything which was 40% proof or more. Anything to give him oblivion. He doesn’t remember any of it.

She hasn’t forgotten a single word.

She hasn’t forgotten a single word that destroyed their family, but somehow he gets to be accepted into Castle’s happy family sociability and doesn’t feel a single pang that he’s no longer a father; he can help Julia Berowitz where she can’t; he caused all the problems and yet he is forgiven and she… well. She has never been able to say anything. Words, or tears, didn’t help.

His suffering has brought him redemption. Hers – only Gethsemane, re-sited to a dank alley, and then an endless Golgotha. Christmas has never meant love, or forgiveness, or redemption. Only harsh and bleeding memories.

But still she can’t do that. She can’t descend to that level. She just… can’t. Mustn’t. Because the only thing she has left to cling to from this whole horrible situation is that she has unfailingly supported him since the day he got dry and never, ever done anything to screw that up.

Until she nearly had, this morning. She absolutely cannot do that ever again. She can’t live with herself if she screws up her dad. She takes a few deep, slow breaths, trying to calm her pulse and be able to speak in her normal voice; trying to find her usual control and bright, cheerful tone. Castle’s fingers are still loosening the knots in her shoulders and back: warm and strong on her skin, but as fast as he untangles each hard nodule another appears.

“Okay,” she says, but it’s not an acceptance, nor yet agreement. “I’d better do this.” Castle looks at her, listens to the adamantine tone, watches the stress rise in her shoulders again, sees pain flicker in her otherwise empty eyes. She stands up, searches out her phone, doesn’t return to sit next to him. She stares out the window, takes another shallow, hurting breath, then swipes on her phone and dials.

“Dad.”
“Yeah. Are you okay?” She sounds totally chipper. Her face, however, is pinched and her lips tight. “Good. Yeah, I’m fine.” Her voice has a grin in it. Her mouth does not. “Yes, he’s still here.” She squawks, and it’s the first genuine sound she’s made since she picked up the phone. “Dad! No! And if you bring your gun round I will arrest you for threatening behaviour. That’s totally unnecessary.” There’s a pause in which Castle expects there is a certain amount of paternal commentary. He would do so. Forcefully. “No, Dad. Absolutely not.” Now it’s Beckett being forceful. “No. Not at all.” Another pause, into which many words emanate – Castle assumes – from Jim. “No, Dad. I’m sorry. Don’t worry about it. I’m fine. We’re good.”

She’s lying. She’s not fine, she and her dad are not good, and nothing is likely to be fine until she stops lying to her father about how she feels. It’s her dad who controls himself, it’s he who is strong enough to resist every temptation, every day. It’s not up to Beckett, and all this self-censorship isn’t helping either of them. Her face is closed and white, and yet not one single note of stress beyond her normal level of tension – that would be the stress fractures in her voice every moment she talks to her father – is evident. It brings a whole new, appalling meaning to poker-faced. She has as much life in her as the fireplace implement.

“Yes, see you Sunday. Love you, Dad. Bye.”

She swipes off, puts the phone down very gently next to her stone bird, and disappears into her bedroom. Castle is left looking at the space where she had been a second ago, until his brain starts to operate and he realises that she’s probably run for cover. He pads after her.

She’s sitting on the side of her bed, staring hopelessly into thin air. “I have to do this,” she says. “I can’t go on like this.” Castle drops down next to her. “I can’t screw him up. I can’t.” His arm steals round her waist.

“You’re not doing it for him, Beckett. You’re doing it for you. If it’s good for your dad that’s just a bonus. It’s not about him any more. It’s your life.”

“Life’s not like that. I can’t just ignore what it does to him.”

“No, that’s not what I mean.” He hopes this will come out right. “You’ve given him ten years when one way or another you’ve put your life away so he can have his. But Beckett, right now he’s not just stronger than you think, he’s stronger than you. Time for you to let him be strong. I think… I think he might need to be strong for you, now? He wants to be your dad, not your burden. I think you should let him.”

There’s silence. There’s been a lot of silence, since eleven this morning.

Beckett is thinking. Thinking about her dad is marginally less painful than thinking about therapy. She’d thought, at Christmas, that there had been something of her father re-appearing, but then it had been buried in the pain of Julia Berowitz’s following in her footsteps, through the bitter weather of the winter of alcoholism. He’d made it through Miami on two calls to her – a year ago, it had been every evening. She’d not considered the reduction properly: he’d needed to lean on her much less. He’d pushed her at Castle and pushed at her about having a life. And, of course, he’d been able to cope with Julia, and with her own subsequent loss of temper at him. But still… habits are hard to break.

“And if you’re wrong?” she says, eventually.

“I’m not suggesting you cut him loose. Just that you… I don’t know, Beckett. I don’t know how you let him be your dad.”
Strangely, Castle’s sudden uncertainty is actually almost reassuring. He doesn’t have all the answers either. It’s not a test, or a demand, or an ultimatum. It’s a thought. She doesn’t have to do it, and she doesn’t have to decide now. She wriggles into a more comfortable alignment, and tucks herself in.

“Okay,” she says uncertainly, and then more strongly, “okay. But… not now. I can’t do it right now.”

“You don’t have to. Stay here” – he brings his arm a little tighter round her – “with me.” He thinks for a second. “Well. This is your apartment. You live here. It’s me who’ll have to stay with you. If you want me to.”

“It is I.”

“Uh?”

“You said, ‘it’s me’. It is I. Thought you were a writer? Shouldn’t you be better at grammar than that?”

Castle looks at her, aghast. “You are criticising my grammar? You? When I have with my own ears heard you say ‘What do we got?’ That’s… that’s…”

“Reprehensible?”

“You are not going to win me over with ten-dollar words.” Beckett smirks at him, but under it her eyes are still bleeding pain. “You could win me over in other ways…”

“And what might those be?” An eyebrow quirks in counterpoint. She’s trying so very hard to be normal…

“You could stop pretending you’re okay. I know you aren’t, and you don’t need to pretend. I said a minute ago you should think about letting your dad be your dad. How about letting me hold you up for a while? You don’t have to be strong all the time.” His eyes go far away, and return hot. “Though I really like it when you do the badass bit in interrogation. You don’t need to do it here, though. Just be whoever you want to be when you’re at home.” He pauses. But some more blunt honesty is required. “I want you to stop hiding how you feel. You do it all the time, and I get that you didn’t want to spook your dad, but I don’t want you to do it with me. I’m not that fragile, and if you’d only talked to me – even a little bit – earlier we wouldn’t have had nearly as many upsets.”

He tips her chin up and smiles softly down. “It’s a bit late, but how about a New Year’s resolution? Two. One each. You tell me the truth about how you’re feeling instead of hiding it, and I won’t push you to do anything you’re not ready to do, like come to the loft, or make assumptions about why. Deal?”

She puts her hand over his knee, where his other hand slips over it, engulfing her in his broad span.

“Deal. Just… sometimes I need space. If you don’t push me then, I’ll tell you as soon as I can.” She looks him in the eye. “I might not be able to.”

“As long as you try.” He wraps her in. “As long as we both try, we’ll be okay.” He kisses her forehead, gently. “It’ll all be okay.” It sounds like a promise, and when he kisses her brow again, a vow.

The smile turns sleepy when she bites her lip uncertainly: his arm tightens around her and she draws in a sharp breath. She’s suddenly very aware that they are sitting on her bed. She is also very aware that Castle is extremely likely to become assertive, so to speak, if she shows the slightest hint of interest or desire. It doesn’t exactly take much to make him so. Privacy and her not objecting. Nothing else appears to be needed. Only a single, simple decision. Yes, or no. But…

“You’re thinking too loud. Stop thinking so loudly. It’s not peaceable at all.” She nestles in, under a slight encouragement from his arm. “In fact, stop thinking unhappy thoughts. It’ll disturb you. Worse” – he grins – “it might disturb me. Who knows what might happen if you disturb me? I might turn into a monster.”

“I will remind you that I have a gun.”

“Killing monsters needs silver bullets.”

“Only if you’re a werewolf. Vampires need to be staked.”

“It’s disturbing how hot it is that you know that. Just as well I’m not a supernatural being.”

“I might still shoot you.”

“Let’s not have any shooting bullets,” Castle drawls lazily. Somehow Beckett has become completely wrapped in. “Let’s think of something else to do. Any suggestions?”

“No-o.” But she deliberately doesn’t sound convincing. “You’re the one with the crazy ideas.”

“I have a crazy idea,” Castle says, picking up his cue. She quirks an eyebrow at him. He pouts insincerely. “But you don’t like my crazy ideas.”

“Doesn’t stop you producing them in the precinct.”

“I don’t think I’ll be suggesting this one in the precinct,” he murmurs. “You’d shoot me.” and he dips his head and kisses her, at first softly, teasing gently at her lips until she’s turned into him and opened a little under his mouth and then he stoops to conquer without quarter: firm, sure and insistent that she should soften and then melt into him. He’ll hold her up, hold her in: strong and stable no matter what; he’ll be the eye of her particular storm, no matter how it rages around them. The kiss deepens and strengthens, fire licking down his skin and searing his veins, the instant reaction to her being there in his arms tightening his clasp and shifting her on to his lap to have her closer where he can pillage and plunder as he pleases and know that she wants it, needs it… maybe loves it.

Certainly, she trusts it. Him. She must do, to have cried all down him and not hidden it and told him some truth. He kisses her more searchingly, still deeper, a hand behind her head and knotted in her hair, holding her in place: his assertiveness turning her softer and lax, receptive. Not passive. Never passive, neither is she submissive, but receptive and responsive. No leading required: no burden of command. Only her, and him, and nothing else, here and now.

His hands grasp possessively, his mouth moves round, flickers over the tendon in her neck, the tiny nerve behind her ear, and she mews very softly and then, while he continues his teasing nibbling and her hands come to his shoulders to lock into the soft, thick cotton of his shirt, it becomes the unformed, contented noises that might finally mean that he’s found, or resurrected, soft, strokable Kat.

Soft, strokable Kat whose hands are currently under the yoke of his shirt and stroking over his chest, unbuttoning as they go. This is… this is the time to stop worrying and thinking and act.

“Is this what you want?” he rumbles, sliding one hand down over her waist, hip, thigh, pulling her ever closer.
“Yes,” she breathes. “You.”

She curves into him as he reaches down to push off her shoes and then returns to her collar and starts on the fastenings of her formal, work button-down. He goes back to kissing her as his fingers slide the buttons and placket apart, revealing a cream, minimally adorned bra which despite its lack of ornamentation is astonishingly sexy. That’s probably because it’s framing Beckett’s beautiful breasts, which are a sight at which Castle will happily spend a very long time staring without ever getting bored. He doesn’t think he’ll ever be accustomed to them. He traces a finger over the thin line of lace edging and then follows it with his mouth, leaning Beckett back against his arm for convenient access. She doesn’t entirely approve, since it’s meant that she has to stretch a little to continue touching him. That was a definite, if muted, growl of discontent. He’ll just deal with that. He much prefers her purring and pettable.

He toes his own shoes off, lays her down against her plump pillows with her shirt spread open, and joins her: his arm under her neck. This gives her the chance – of which she instantly takes full advantage – to undo the remaining buttons and push his shirt off his shoulders.

“Do you want this, or me?”

“Can’t I have both?”

“Only with me. Only with me, Beckett.”

“Both.”
He doesn’t hesitate. He dips down, occupies her mouth without a hint of hesitation, and pulls her tightly against him, naked chest to mostly bare skin. His hand slips down to unfasten her bra, runs around under it to loosen it from her ribs, plays a little under the fabric with the soft flesh and then removes it. She murmurs wordlessly in pleasure as his hand slips over the revealed curves, palming and then gently shaping and moulding; pushes into his searching hand and holds his head to hers as if she’s never going to let him go. She’s never held him so before, as if he’s the spar to which she’s clinging: even when she has been soft she’s never been – oh. Trusting. Trusting that she can hold on to him and take from his strength, just like she’s done since she threw him that utterly desperate, wordless plea in the precinct.

So he’ll give her it. All his strength and all his stability, there for her. He presses power and passion into the kiss, possession into the hands around her, showing her in every point of touch how much he has to give, how easy it is for him to support her, how easy it should be for her to rely on it, and on him.

He segues smoothly into firm masculinity and stops thinking about anything other than making Beckett-who-is-now-Kat feel very, very good, which will make him feel very, very good, and then when they are both feeling very, very good he’ll cuddle her in and cosset her comfortably and both of them will be much happier for the rest of the evening.

His palm returns to moulding her breast, fingertips gently teasing at her nipple till it hardens and peaks; repeats on the other side. His kiss is deep and sure, and she’s tucked close enough to be kept warmed from the heat of his body. His hand wanders downward, skimming over her not-quite-prominent ribs, settling briefly on her waist to turn her against him, then lay her back again as he reaches the edge of her pants and flitters to the button and zip. Shortly, her pants are gone, and his follow.

He turns her into him again, and one long leg curls around him to hold herself close. He presses into her, and she shifts a little against the pressure and opens a little more. One hand keeps her tight, stretched over the fine skin of her back so that her naked breasts are rubbing against his own bare chest; one slips down to stroke her slim rear and then through and into the heated, damp cleft between her legs, covered only by the thin pale cotton of her panties. She moans softly, and moves to the rhythm of his hand as he works her up.

He stops kissing her lips to turn on to his back and slide her over him, nipping teasingly behind her ear and no longer needing to hold her to him. Conveniently, this leaves both his hands free to pet and stroke, and so he does: one hand sweeps the length of her back to as far down the silk of her inner thigh as he can reach, the other continues to wander lazily over her ass and the damp fabric, sliding and pulling it; her small sexy noises captured by his mouth on hers, and then the panties are lost.

He doesn’t stop kissing her as he rolls them to put her beneath him, where he can transfer his tantalising little kisses from lips to neck to shoulders and collarbones; no marks on her translucent skin, that’s not what this is all about. He moves lower, smiling against her, and finally puts his mouth to her breasts again. This time she arches up into him, soft murmurs of encouragement becoming less soft and more breathless: he tugs a little and nips very carefully and sucks harder and she likes that, oh yes. She may not be marked: her skin pale and perfect, but he will have half-moon bruising on his back, a finger-length below his shoulders. Her words, such as they were, have degenerated into ohhh, occasionally cut with Castle!

He’s deliberately slow. He could have brought her off already, but the slick, fast, repetitive sex hadn’t ever been in any way fulfilling: he wants her to enjoy it and he wants to enjoy her without feeling ever so slightly second-best afterwards. It’s going to be different now, and slow, easy, and satisfying is so much better than anything else. Her stomach muscles tighten under the trail of his tongue; her hands are clamped around his head and she knows where he’s going with this, twisting under him as he smiles lazily up at her.

“Lie back and enjoy it,” he says happily. “I will, and I’ll make sure you will.” He prevents any commentary on that piece of deliberate smuggercy by taking one slow, forceful lick across her. She definitely enjoyed that. His hands light tightly – for the moment – on her legs; he wriggles into the most effective alignment, and begins his second most favourite pastime: teasing and taking her with his wicked, mobile, flexible mouth, with a twist of his tongue around her over-stimulated nerves which makes her cry out, with slow licks and circlings and sucking and a little penetration which causes her to writhe and then arch and then shatter completely.

Castle slithers up the bed and cuddles Beckett in firmly. She’s not going to need to roll away or wriggle off or shut herself away, this time. She’s going to be able to stay safely in his arms and then when she’s ready (he is so very ready) he’ll please and tease her some more. She wriggles a little to fit more comfortably against him, her head on his pectoral, a leg thrown over his, an arm draped over his ribs; the whole of his Beckett snuggled against him in the way he’d wanted right back at the beginning. He returns to slow, swooping strokes over her back, running over the sharp protrusions of her vertebrae and then the soft satin of her translucent skin. She’s just a little thinner than she should be, her skin a little more drawn, her face a little more tired.

Shortly, she starts to curve into his easy stroking. She shifts a smidgeon over him, and the hand that used to be around his ribs essays some stroking of its own: first of pecs and the flat nipple to be found there; then towards his hip, and then inward until her clever fingers close around him. She emits a satisfied, sexy little noise and he can feel her smiling ferally against his skin. And then he very definitely feels a sharp nip on his chest and a tongue soothing it and he might have been slipping into the comforting pattern of stroking and snuggling but he certainly isn’t any more. He is very much wide awake.

He becomes even more awake as her wicked hands slide up and down, gripping just tightly enough to hint at that tighter, hotter grip to come. She plays a little, teasing over and then under to stroke full, heavy weight, and his breathing deepens and turns harsher; his grip on her tighter, stronger. The soft tips of her fingers contrast with the scrape of her fingernails: the contrast driving him up, firing his blood.

He flips them over, for her to be spread out beneath him, desire in her face and seduction in her touch, and there’s no more comforting, simply hard hot motion. He pushes into her as she arches into him; a tight glove squeezing around him, and it’s perfect. She pulls his head down to her lips and kisses him, till he reverses the polarities and takes her mouth in time with his stroking into her body, and she opens completely and takes him home; digs her fingers into the firm muscle of his back as he thrusts and he groans and she moans and his fingertips find the bundle of nerves so that it changes to a cry and she clenches about him and it’s all gone in the white-heat rush of her and him and them together.

Afterwards, she’s cosily cuddled into him, wrapped up close and held firmly. Finally, the stiff tension that she’s suffered throughout the two previous months has released. He amuses himself by dropping little kisses on her hair and intermittently trailing his fingers over a mildly ticklish point on her waist, which makes her wriggle and squeak. Otherwise, she’s utterly boneless and still.

“Did you know you purr when you’re happy? Just like a cat,” he says, not entirely innocently.
“Purr?”

“Mmmm. Yes. You should let me stroke you till you purr a lot more often.” He demonstrates with a soft trace over her breasts and back again. She makes an inadvertent small noise that is quite close to a purr, so he continues until it’s quite definitely a contented purr. “See? You like it, so you’re happy, so you purr. Which I like, so I’m happy too.” He carries on. So does the purring. He manages to keep his mouth closed on the words You’re Kat again. My Kat. He just hopes he isn’t thinking them loudly enough to be heard anyway.

The stroking becomes a little more determined, and reaches a little further down, and the purring stops being purring and starts to become panting and then gasping and then writhing against his wicked touch and then becomes a long sigh of release.

She’s fallen asleep, still in his arms. When she wakes, he’ll still be there. So will her issues, but he’ll still be there to hold her up as she makes her decisions. He curls around her: large and solid, enveloping her slighter form; protecting her even as he falls into sleep himself.

Beckett wakes because she’s hot. Roasting, in fact. It takes her a moment to understand that the oven is actually Castle, and that extracting herself will not be simple. Simplicity is not aided by the realisation that if she weren’t being broiled alive she would be perfectly happy to stay exactly where she is, curled in and largely covered. Hmmm. There is a solution here. She shuffles the coverlet backwards a distance, and uncovers one of her arms and half a leg. That helps immensely. A small further wiggle allows her neck and collarbones to emerge. Perfect. She allows her eyelids to droop shut again.

When she wakes up again, it’s full morning. Castle is still there, but the cadence of his breathing doesn’t sound like sleep to her, and when she stretches and turns slightly his eyes are open: bright and appreciative.

“Hey,” he says softly, and kisses the end of her nose.

“Hey,” she mumbles, through another stretch and yawn. “Coffee.” She practically falls out of bed and stumbles out to the kitchen, automatically grabbing a robe on the way and donning it on autopilot. As normal, filling and switching on the kettle requires no neural input whatsoever. Castle pads after her, yesterday’s shirt on over boxers, looking ridiculously alert for only just awake and no coffee ingested. Beckett is sure there is a place in the world for morning people. It’s simply that their place is not forcing their shiny happy morning personality on her. Fortunately Castle is not talking. Yet. It’s rare for him not to talk, but clearly he has instantly recognised her inability to function before coffee. She manages to find a single firing neuron and therefore puts out two mugs not one. She regards this as success.

Coffee restores her brain, from the first mouthful. Unfortunately, it reminds her of why Castle is here, what happened yesterday, and what she now needs to do. She slumps under the weight of necessity, and drains her mug without a pause, only to put the kettle on immediately to make another one. Chain-caffeinating. It’ll be chain-chocolate to add to it as soon as she can muster the intelligence to shower and dress. The frivolous thought doesn’t lighten her mood for more than an instant.

It’s not the likely cost of therapy. She has savings, and a good health-care plan. It’s having to do it all over again. It’s having to accept that she can’t have done it right the first time.

It’s having to accept that the last five years have been a lie. That all her efforts with her father have been built on an untruth – unknown, but that doesn’t help her now. Now, she wonders why she bothered, if she couldn’t do it honestly. What’s her dad going to think, when he finds out that their whole fragile relationship was a lie? What’s he going to do? How’s he going to feel when he learns that all his so-painfully, painstakingly made amends were falling on stony ground?

What’s going to happen when her dad discovers she’s been, however inadvertently, lying to him all this time? He’s not going to be happy. There’s an understatement. He was annoyed with her behaviour with Julia, he was suspicious about her behaviour at Castle’s, and their brief call yesterday evening didn’t touch on any matter of any importance at all even if they’d both said sorry. Everything passed over, covered up. This, though…this can’t be covered up. Even if she could for a time, at some point the therapist – she remembers this from last time – will point out that she has to listen to her father’s explanations and amends and respond to them.

Last time, she’d thought she had responded honestly. Mostly. She’d been so relieved he was really sober that she’d been happy and forgiving and loving. She’d thought that that was enough. So anything that might point to a different answer was… ignored. Buried. She ought to be happy, and she had to make sure he never sank again, and so anything that might cast either in question was ignored. Locked away, hidden from her dad, and then she pretended it didn’t exist and shouldered her burdens and kept him safe.

But all of it was lies.

She’d taken the – the easy route. And taking the easy route, letting her father think it was all better, pretending to herself it was all about supporting him when it was also all about not having to do it properly, has led to her a place where she’s let herself down and let her father down.

He’s not going to be proud of her now. She never had saved him: he did that himself. But her support wasn’t even honest: it was just a way to pretend she’s the daughter he wanted to have, not the one he’d told I can’t stand it. Go away. I can’t bear it. To be the one to whom he’d said You’re so strong, don’t leave me.

She drinks her coffee and thinks her bitter, lacerating thoughts; lost in her own head. It’s not until a Kleenex arrives in her hand that she realises she’s crying. Again. The Kleenex is followed up by her now-empty coffee mug being removed and her whole self being collected in and cuddled close. There’s been a remarkable amount of cuddled close, recently. If only it meant that everything got better. Hugs make everything better. If only that were true. Nothing ever gets better.

“What’s wrong?”

Where does she start with that? A shorter conversation would cover what’s right. That wouldn’t take five minutes. Or five seconds. Nothing’s right. Well. One thing is right: the big frame around her and the broad hand swooping up and down her spine and the whole of him enveloping her and protecting her. She leans into him and lets him hold her up.

“What’s wrong?” he asks again, soft deep tones swirling around her, as supportive as his arms.

“Everything,” she mutters defeatedly. “Everything except you.” His grip tightens on her, then releases somewhat. “Can’t work, can’t face my dad, can’t face families.”

Castle notices that she doesn’t mention friends, presumably because the last she’d seen of Lanie was yesterday morning’s argument.

“And I need to find a shrink” – she might have said torturer – “and rake it all up again.” She sniffs, and then blows her nose. “And at some point I’m going to have to tell Dad that everything he’s thought about me is wrong.”
“Like what?” Beckett doesn’t answer. She’s still silently crying. Castle only needs a moment to work it out. “You think he’s going to be upset with you. You think he’ll think you’ve let him down. It doesn’t work like that. It really doesn’t.”

“You mean that you don’t work like that. You wouldn’t know what he might do, because you’d never do that to your family. He did. He…” she dissolves, and can’t say it again. He ruined ours echoes in Castle’s mind. “Why should he, anyway. I couldn’t get over myself, could I? Couldn’t forgive him.” Her body is tightening unpleasantly. “Probably he never really forgave me for walking away. This’ll just prove he was right.Didn’t matter how hard I pretended, I’m not enough for him.” He can see the next words rising in her throat and seizes her mouth before she can articulate I’m not enough for anyone. He won’t let her say that. It’s not true. She’s enough for her dad. She’s enough for her job and the victims and her team.

She’s enough for him.

He stops kissing her. “You’re mine. You’re enough for me. I told you I knew what I was doing and what – who – I want. Stop disbelieving me.” He smirks evilly. “It’s bad for me. Upsetting. You wouldn’t want to upset me.” The smirk falls away. “Your father doesn’t think that. He said so, when he called me yesterday.”

“That was then. He doesn’t know this.”

“Stop it.” Castle’s voice is hard, to cut through her idiocy. “Stop talking yourself down. That is not true and if you stopped to think you’d know it.” He shakes her, very gently. “Your dad loves you and he’s worried about you and you need to start believing he means it.” He tugs her back in.

“It’s… I did everything I thought would be right. And none of it was. He manages to be normal and accepted and forgiven and play happy families and fit into yours and it doesn’t worry him at all because he doesn’t remember any of it.” She’s nearly shouting. “And I – can’t,” she drops her voice and tries to turn away. Castle doesn’t know if can’t means can’t fit in or can’t play happy families or can’t forget – or can’t be forgiven. Still, all of them are just plain wrong.

“You’re going round the same loop you were yesterday. Stop. You decided what to do. Stop thinking about this. It won’t help till you get help, and doing this to yourself isn’t helping.” He forces her chin up till she’s looking at him. “Stop. Find someone who’s going to help you or do something to take your mind off it” – he leers cheerfully – “but stop. Anyway, you have to have a plan before tomorrow morning or you’ll be kept out the precinct for longer, and since Manhattan’s homicide victims want you to be back at work, Detective Beckett, that isn’t really a good option.” She winces. “Yes, they do. You catch killers and get justice for them better than anyone else. It’s that which really makes you happy – even happier than being with me, which is really quite unflattering if you think about it because I can make you really, really happy and if you just stop and be Kat once in a way and purr at me you’ll be even happier…” – oh, shit. His mouth has just run approximately a light-year ahead of his brain. He is about to die. He’s sure she knows fifteen different ways to kill him with her bare hands and without leaving a mark and anyway the boys will cover up for her.

“Kat?”
“You told me about Kat when you were halfway down the vodka bottle,” Castle says, which stops her in her tracks, since it’s so very likely to be true. She hasn’t managed to recover from that particular shock when he carries on.

It’s not a lie, Castle thinks. Of course, it’s not precisely the whole truth either. “You said that no-one wanted Kat. Well, I do. Along with Detective Badass Beckett. Everyone needs someone to catch them occasionally.” He closes his arms around her again, more forcefully. “I’ve caught you,” he says, provocatively and distracting. “You should fall right into my clutches.” He dips her back over his arm and bends over her, waggling his eyebrows lasciviously and leering.

“If I wanted a pantomime villain I’d go to Disneyworld,” Beckett says tartly, distracted just as he’d intended. He doesn’t want her exploring that statement right now. It’s too early – in the morning, and in their rekindled relationship.

“I’m no pantomime. I’m right here.” He kisses her hard. “So are you.” Dipping her has caused her robe to fall away and expose the full length of those excellent legs. He strokes a hand over one of them, and then straightens her up again. “I’m starving. Is there anything to eat or shall we go out for breakfast?” Beckett gapes at the switch in conversational direction. “Out, then.” He walks her back towards her bathroom. “Why do you never have any food? It’s not good for you. Or me, if I’m here.”

“Because I buy fresh food, cook and eat it immediately. Which is good for me.”

“You do? When?”

“When I’m home.”

Ah. So that would be the one evening in – oohhh, five? – that she actually gets home at a reasonable hour and isn’t running round Manhattan chasing killers or alcoholics or after her father, then. Castle is not quite stupid enough to say that.

“In that case,” he says provocatively, “you ought to cook me dinner.”

“What?”

“Well, okay you didn’t exactly have much fun, but I’ve made you dinner several times and you’ve never cooked for me. That’s not fair. It’s inequitable. I feel so used,” he says soulfully. “Ow! That was my stomach you just punched. Which is completely empty because you didn’t want lunch and then we missed dinner” – the leer reappears – “because we were busy, but now it’s definitely breakfast time. Or brunch.”

“It’s eight o’clock. That’s breakfast.”

“So you agree we should have breakfast then? Real food? Bacon, waffles, eggs, maple syrup, pancakes, fruit?”

“I don’t need the menu to be recited, thanks. I can read.”

“Good. Let’s go read menus.”

“I need to shower.”
“We can” –

“I can. Then you can.” Castle pouts. “Showers. Separately. Then food. Otherwise there will be no food.”

This may be true. More likely, the food would merely be delayed. It would be a very pleasurable delay, though. Unfortunately Beckett has detached herself, whipped through the bathroom door and locked it before he could protest. So unfair. On the other hand, she’s not arguing about Kat.

Breakfast is delicious, substantial, and eaten with gusto on both sides of the table. Beckett puts away almost as much as Castle does, which he finds to be a great relief. Beckett’s got enough issues in her personal library without adding not eating to the mix.

Finally they’re comfortably sipping a final cup of coffee, with a few last scraps of waffle which can’t possibly be fitted into either stomach lying plaintively on the plate.

“I need to get some clean clothes.”

“Okay.” There’s a lot of unspoken commentary behind that okay.

“I’ll come round a bit later. After lunch.”

“Okay.”

“You can make me dinner.”

“Okay – what? Make you dinner?”

“Yes.” He grins. “You said you could cook. Prove it.”

Suddenly, and very worryingly, she smiles sharply. “Okay. I’ll cook dinner. Don’t bring wine. Don’t arrive before six.”

Castle acquires the feeling that he’s about to be on the wrong end of some very Beckett-flavoured revenge. On the other hand, it’s closer to how she used to be than at any time since early December, so he’ll sacrifice his stomach lining to a good cause.

“Oh,” he agrees. “No wine, no appearing before six. Unless you ask me to.” She rolls her eyes at him. He retaliates by paying the bill and refusing to let her contribute, which causes an irritated hrrnph, compounds his sins by taking her hand on the way out and not letting go, and then completes his likely descent into the circles of hell as invented by Beckett by, as soon as they’re out the doorway, tugging her in and kissing her searchingly.

“See you later,” he says happily, and scuttles into a passing cab before she can do anything about him. Or, more likely, to him. He’s sure he heard a growl as the door shut.

Beckett diverts her footsteps to the subway and takes herself off to a specialist store, the owner of which is the daughter of an immigrant from Tblisi, with whom Beckett practices her Russian and sometimes exchanges recipes. She knows exactly what she needs. Good lean lamb, some more spices, a little fiery; mushrooms, green beans, eggplant and walnuts; a khachapuri bread. Actually, two khachapuris. One and a half for her, and half for Castle. He can have more of the rest of the food. Oh – and a bottle of heavy, slightly sweet Georgian red. He’ll never have had that. She doesn’t know quite what she’ll do if he doesn’t like it, because she’ll only want a single glass. Pour it away, she supposes.
Beckett turns firmly away from that thought and its accompanying baggage. She’ll get the rest of the ingredients at any grocery store, and given that it’s still only nine-thirty if she gets a move on the meat will be marinating before eleven. Mmmm, delicious.

And then she’ll find a shrink. Not delicious. Not at all. But she can’t bear this whole situation any longer and if she isn’t allowed to work – Montgomery has made perfectly clear without actually saying anything out loud that he will enforce her absence if she doesn’t have a plan – she’ll implode in a week. As if she hasn’t already. She turns firmly away from that thought too, and instead turns for a grocery store, and then for home.

Once the lamb is cubed and safely marinating, her gaze falls to her laptop and the unhappy and unwanted necessity to seek out a therapist. Again. No point putting it off any more – and anyway, there’s no time. Not if she’s to look her Captain in the eye and tell him she has a plan. Work is the one place she’s always been enough – till she was benched, anyway. So if she’s got a plan she won’t be benched and that’ll help. It will.

She tries very hard not to think that Castle will help just as much. She knows he can. She even knows that he’s said and shown that he will. But… she has to save herself. He can’t do it for her. No-one can do it for her.

Only you can save yourself.

She opens the laptop, and begins.

---

Castle goes home via an extremely expensive and excellent chocolatier from which he purchases an oversize box of specifically non-alcoholic truffles to take to Beckett’s later on. He likes chocolate, and he’s pretty sure Beckett really likes chocolate, from the contents of her desk, and he’s not going to take wine when he’s been told clearly that he shouldn’t. He’s not inclined to screw this up again.

Once home, he considers another coffee, rejects it on the grounds of having had three already and jitting hasn’t been a good look since, well, forever; and pours himself a glass of water instead. He wants, very badly, to go back to Beckett’s apartment and simply be there for her while she searches out a shrink, but this time he thinks it might be sensible to give her the space she’s told him she wants.

He’s just settling down to his laptop to write, procrastinate or review his sales figures (smugly) when his phone sounds. He regards the device with mild irritation and then severe horror when he realises that it’s Jim Beckett. (after last time, he’d programmed him in, so at least he had some warning) This is not fair. He’s not a college boy, to be harassed by his girlfriend’s father. Especially since she’s barely his girlfriend.

“Castle,” he says briskly.

“Rick, it’s Jim Beckett. Is Katie okay?”

“Yes,” Castle says, without the slightest twinge of conscience that he’s probably outright lying. “Why are you calling me, though? Why not call her?” We had this conversation three days ago. I told you then I wasn’t telling tales out of school.

“You might tell me the truth about how she is.” You mean you’ve worked out that she won’t tell you.

“Just like you weren’t her story to tell, she’s not mine.”

“You’re writing a whole damn book based on my daughter and you’re telling me she’s not your story to tell?"

“My character isn’t your daughter. My character is inspired by your daughter and that’s a whole different ball game. Ask her yourself.” He fails to stop the next, irritated, sentence emerging. “If you two actually spoke to each other about anything that mattered” – he cuts that off before he can slit his own throat any further. These damn Becketts have destroyed all his self-preserving instincts and filters.

There is a short, painful silence.

“Er...” Jim sounds deeply uncertain, and Castle’s fellow-feeling for another father kicks in despite the sure and certain knowledge that he will only get himself into more trouble the more he listens.

“Yeah?” he says less combatively.

“I’m not sure... I don’t know what to say to her any more. I don’t know what she’s thinking. She’s my daughter” – Castle recognises the pained emphasis on the noun – “and I don’t know what to do to help her. It was all so much easier when all I needed was Disney Band-aids and a kiss better to fix everything.”

“Yeah,” Castle says feelingly. “It sure was.” He runs through his options at near light-speed, and finds only one: the same as yesterday. “Jim, don’t worry about it now. Don’t try and push it today. Take some time. Wait till she calls you. Let me take care of it for now.” He swallows nervously. “She’ll be safe with me.” That’s a lot closer to a declaration of intent than he’d like to make right now – not because he doesn’t want to declare his intent, nor because he isn’t sure of what it is (he so is), but because he has a somewhat old-fashioned idea that one’s – er – girlfriend ought to be at least vaguely on board with the plan before telling anyone else.

Jim is silent. Thankfully, it only sounds thoughtful, not threatening. “Okay,” he eventually says. “Okay, son.” And somehow that son seems to mean more than simply an older man’s casual term for a twenty-year younger one.

Castle returns to his laptop and forces himself to the discipline of planning his next few chapters, putting in odd pieces of narrative as they occur to him during the planning process. This occupies him perfectly contentedly for the rest of the morning and, after a break for a light lunch, the afternoon; until he showers, shaves and generally expends considerable time and effort on looking (and smelling) exceptionally good. He doesn’t neglect to pick up the chocolates on the way out.

When Castle raps on the door, box in hand, Beckett opens it looking perfectly made up, without a hint of what may come – or what she has been doing – on her face. Castle is instantly suspicious of both possibilities, because there are tiny traces around her careful eye make-up that indicate that this afternoon hasn’t been a bunch of roses, but the smirk playing in the corners of her mouth indicates that the dinner she has planned will be… interesting.

He doesn’t comment. Time enough to die later. If, of course, dinner itself isn’t liberally laced with some obscure poison to which Beckett is naturally immune, or to which she has made herself immune through repeated tiny doses, or painted his plate or cutlery with ipecac, or… He becomes aware that Beckett is regarding him with sardonic-edged mild confusion, since he is still standing in the doorway.

“Come in,” she says, and breaks into his morbid imaginings. He does. His first act is to present her with the chocolates, at which her eyes light up delightedly. His second, as soon as she’s put them down safely, is to draw her in and kiss her thoroughly. His third is to notice, belatedly, that she’s not wearing formal pants and button-down or sweater, but a mid-calf, bias cut, dark green wool skirt which drapes and flows softly around her, with a heavy cream silky top. Both the skirt and the top resemble nothing he has ever seen Beckett wear. Not ever. They positively plead with him to pet them. He doesn’t resist their pleadings in the slightest.

In the background of his rather blown mind, it dimly occurs to him that this might well be Kat from the get-go, rather than Beckett who only becomes Kat much later in proceedings. He parks that thought for later in favour of petting probably-Kat, who is soft and cuddlesome and curved into him, where he can tuck her in and hold her and protect her and cherish her. And kiss her, of course. And kiss her, and kiss her, and pet her, and kiss her, and kiss her, and… and he does. Extensively. And she melts against him and then she purrs. Extensively.

Beckett had spent the morning looking up therapists and the afternoon reducing the extensive and unpleasant list to those who specialise in alcohol-related trauma and who are on the NYPD approved list. Every time it becomes too intense, she prepares another part of her well-planned dinner; even if that’s as simple as flipping the lamb chunks in their marinade. By four, however, that’s all there is left to do, though her list of potential shrinks has – er – shrunk – to two. She quailingly rings both and discovers that only one will offer appointments in the evening, after her shifts normally – or ought to - finish. She doesn’t feel that early morning appointments followed by having to go to work are the best idea she could have. Therapy will be quite bad enough without having to put on a brave face immediately afterward.

Decision made.

Yet more fearfully, she also books an initial appointment for the next day – no point in putting it off – and having done so puts the whole thing out of her mind. Well, she tries to. It keeps sneaking back in and poking at her eyes. That’s the only reason they’re watering. No other reason at all.

She goes to shower, and spends a little time afterwards ensuring that all her make-up is waterproof. Then she considers her wardrobe, considers Castle’s words of much earlier this morning, and dresses to please herself. She doesn’t need to be anyone in particular, and if she’s at home, cooking, and waiting for the one person who doesn’t seem to need her support, she’ll be her quiet homebody self: Kat who doesn’t hold anybody up and is peaceful and content and for a brief space unburdened. She hides her total lack of certainty about anything in setting the table and lighting an aromatically pleasing candle to scent the air, in just the way her mother had shown her when she was much smaller. She looks at the table with some satisfaction. She hasn’t set it out formally for… for eight years. Since she walked away.

She blinks hard, and rams that thought down. This is not then, and her father is not here. She sips a glass of water, and calms herself back down. Castle will be arriving shortly, and she is not going to be a weeping mess when he does. That wouldn’t improve dinner. His reactions to Georgian food, however, probably will. She goes and checks all her dishes again to ensure that they haven’t run away, turned pink or mixed themselves up with each other. They haven’t. She returns to sitting on the couch and tries to read. She is only too relieved when the door sounds.

Castle’s unique style of greeting her momentarily paused, Beckett manages to turn her head sufficiently that her mouth is available for speaking.

“Don’t you want dinner?” This was not good phrasing. His eyes sparkle.

“I do. But I want you too. I can’t decide which to do first. Eat dinner, or eat” – “Shut up, Castle.” She is positive that she’s blushing luridly.

Castle tucks her in a little more tightly and strokes smoothly and seductively over her back and her rear. His intentions are unmistakable. However, she hasn’t gone to all the trouble of cooking for it to be ruined by indigestion from eating too late, and Castle’s obvious intentions would make dinner very late indeed. She wriggles a little to free herself. The relaxation of Castle’s grip is rather slower than good manners would dictate.

“Dinner,” she says decisively.

A number of side-dishes appear on the table. Following that, Beckett-who-is-almost-certainly-Kat produces a deep dish full of cubes of meat, and a smaller dish full of pieces of green and red peppers, and onion. She also produces four skewers. Castle waits to see what might happen next, though he thinks he knows the synopsis, at least.

Sure enough, the skewers become full of meat divided by peppers or onion. So far, so not surprising. What is surprising is how fast Beckett does it, and how precisely. The second surprise is the production of a griddle pan on which to achieve a fair imitation of an open fire grill. The third, and biggest, surprise, is Beckett handing him a bottle – he presumes it’s wine: at least it’s red and fluid, and as far as he knows Beckett doesn’t drink blood and isn’t a vampire – and a corkscrew and instructing him to open it. It’s labelled in – oh. That must be Cyrillic lettering, which he doesn’t understand at all.

“What does this say, Beckett?”

“Kindzmarauli,” she says without a single stutter.

“What is it?”

“Red wine, from Georgia. Goes with the food.” She smiles, with an edge. “You’ve never tasted anything like it before. Food or wine.”

The lamb sizzles on the griddle, and Beckett turns it expertly. Castle is astonished, but manages to preserve life and limb by hiding it.

“So that’s kebabs…” Beckett makes an absolutely disgusted noise at his description of the food.

“Kebabs?” she says indignantly. “This is not kebabs” –

“These are” –

“Uh?”

“These are. Not “this is”. Your kebabs are plural.” Castle smirks nastily. He’s been waiting for a chance to wreak his revenge for Beckett’s previous correction of his grammar, and now he’s got it.
Beckett splutters crossly at him and glares.

“These are not kebabs.” Castle looks very smug. “This dish is” – he looks less smug – “called shashlik.”

“So what are the rest of the dishes?” He’s wandered over to the table and is surveying all the items on it, which look interesting. He stretches out a finger, and Beckett growls warningly.

“Paws off, Castle. Wait till the shashlik is ready.” She doesn’t mention the khachapuris warming gently in the oven. If she doesn’t mention them, he might not want to eat any of them.

“But I wanna know what everything is,” he whines. “I might not like it.”
“You’ve been at the Twelfth for nearly six months. You eat everything, including salmonella bacteria. Stop whining. I’ll tell you after dinner.”

Castle subsides. “Can I pour this, then?”

“Please. Half a glass for me.” She flips the shashlik again as Castle brings the wine over and sets her glass at a safe distance. He then spoils this careful consideration by standing very close to her and exuding I-am-going-to-cuddle-you. “A little space, please. I don’t want to get burnt. It’s almost ready.”

A couple of minutes later the shashlik sizzles its way on to a serving dish and the khachapuris ooze cheesily on to a plate, neatly quartered. Castle politely carries one unnamed dish and then even more politely seats Beckett before sitting himself. It’s pretty obvious that she’s gone to some effort tonight, and he appreciates it deeply. Later, he intends to appreciate Beckett, equally deeply but in a rather different manner.

He takes a little bit of everything – following Beckett’s example – but at the first mouthful of something vaguely purple of which he had been considerably suspicious his eyes go wide. “This is gorgeous! What is it?”

“Baklazhan’i s’ orekhami.”

“Uh?” She repeats it. “Okay, what is it made of – in English this time?”

“Eggplant, walnuts, spices, garlic, some other bits and pieces.”

He follows up by trying a green dish, which is equally delicious, and equally unknown to him; the mushrooms (at least it’s obvious what they are), which are somewhat spicy; and the cheese-infused bread, for which he instantly decides he would happily pay its weight in gold. Beckett is regarding him with a slightly disgruntled expression.

“What’s wrong?”

She mutters something which he can’t quite decode.

“Sorry?”

“You like my” – the name is a strangled noise which sounds like she’s breaking rocks in her larynx. He doesn’t ask her to repeat it, because that won’t help him. His throat doesn’t make that sound.

“‘S mine,” she mutters. Ah. Clearly Beckett had rather hoped she wouldn’t have to share. Too bad. It’s far too good to miss out on. He takes another blissful bite and dissolves into a cloud of cheese-flavoured marvelousness.

His sip of the wine before dinner had been – interesting. Used to top quality wine, from the US, Europe and occasionally the Antipodes, the slightly sweet, heavy red hadn’t delighted his palate at all. In fact, he’d disliked it. With the food, however, it works surprisingly well, and he’s developing an appreciation for it more with every mouthful of the shashlik and the spicy mushrooms.

“You really can cook,” he says. “This is great. Can I have the recipe?”

Beckett looks mischievous. “Maybe. I’ll think about it.” He pouts, and turns big blue eyes on her “I’ll persuade you. Somehow. You’re not immune to all my wiles.” He smiles lazily, and the air suddenly sizzles as the shashlik had.

Dinner proceeds extremely successfully, apart from a minor fight over the last piece of khachapuri, which is technically Castle’s but upon which Beckett essays a forceful raid and almost succeeds in capturing it. “You’ll pay for that, Beckett,” he threatens direfully. She smirks, and at that point he notices that she’s been sufficiently happy and relaxed to drink not only the half glass she started with but most of another glass on top. This, though, isn’t the desperate downing – or drowning – of vodka: it’s the normal, sociable sharing of a good meal and good wine.

After dinner Beckett produces not coffee, but milkless, aromatic tea in glass cups in metal holders, and, with the addition of the chocolates and occasional happy noises through their truffled unctuousness, condescends to explain what everything was.

“Okay, I told you about shashlik and the baklazhan’i. The bread is” – it’s still a noise of crashing rocks – “which is the best food I ever had. The green dish was zelenaya fasol’i – mostly green beans – and then the mushrooms – greeb’i. You recognised them. The rest was pickled vegetables.”

Castle snuggles her in at an opportune moment but contents himself with that while the tea is still being drunk. No point tipping tea over them both, and he doesn’t want either of them to be scalded. He has a much better idea, and it does not involve any of scalding, asking about her day or in any way ruining this amazing appearance of Kat-not-Kate-and-definitely-not-Beckett. It does, however, involve taking advantage, in the old-fashioned parlance, of her. With her complete consent, of course. He somehow doesn’t think that that will be an issue.

The tea is finally finished, the dishes have been put in the dishwasher, but there isn’t a scrap of food left to be eaten tomorrow. Castle looks at Beckett, replete, relaxed and resting in the crook of his arm, and smiles lazily down.

“That was delicious, thank you.” His smile acquires a wolfish edge. “So now that we’ve had dinner, I should thank you in the traditional way.”

She doesn’t have a chance to query the statement. Castle leans over and invades her mouth without so much as a by-your-leave: completely possessive and thoroughly sure of himself, nipping gently on her lower lip and then sucking lightly to soothe it, bringing her up on to his lap to have her close and in the perfect position to plunder. Once more, she’s relaxed into him and beautifully responsive and her shirt is infinitely strokable, so he does, and the curves under it are infinitely seductive, so since they’ve seduced him he seduces them right back, and the wool of her skirt is soft under his fingers and it’s really not his fault at all that it seems to have slid right up to expose her satin-skinned legs which are equally soft under his hands. His hand drifts down over her hip and then thigh as hers comes up around his shoulder and neck to turn herself into him and open to his kisses and press against him.

He slides a hand around her back, untucking the silk top and pressing fingers to flesh, and suddenly it all gets hot and messy in a hurry as she opens his own button-down and he flicks her top over her head and flips her to straddle him so that his hard arousal is pressed into her and she must know what she does to him, she must know how she affects him, just as he knows what he does for her. Sitting astride him, rocking fractionally as he smooths over her back, arching as his mouth moves down over her throat, her clavicles, and then on to her silk-and-lace covered breast; she’s hot and beautiful and aroused and all his: just as he’s all hers. He shifts the fabric over proud nipples and firm, neat mounds, and she sighs and leans back against his arm to give him better access to her.

He holds her there, supporting her easily against his strength, standing her down by winding her up and up and up: touching and tasting and teasing until all she sees and feels and knows is him – and then he stands and her legs lock around him, and he takes her to bed.

Her skirt is undone before he lays her down, slipped from her before she’s fully noticed that she’s lying in only her pretty underwear; but before she can protest the disparity his shirt and pants have hit the floor and he’s beside her: large and predatory, eyes gleaming, and intent in every inch of his posture. She smiles up, no uncertainty, no misery – and as fast as a striking rattlesnake reaches up and pulls him over her.

“Something you want, Beckett?” he smirks. Smirk is removed when an elegantly evil hand performs elegantly evil deeds somewhere below his waist. The smirk is replaced by hot focus and shortly by hot mouth on hers, venturing downward to return to her sensitive breasts; her hands are tangling in his hair and tugging. He doesn’t want tugged. He takes her hands away, linking their fingers by her head and effectively stopping her playing with them as he wishes. It doesn’t stop her making her views clear by pushing up into him and emitting encouraging noises, which, in turn, doesn’t stop him ignoring her views and passing on down the flat planes of her stomach to settle himself comfortably to a second feast. She writhes frantically against his demanding mouth before he’s even touching her skin: sliding the fabric to and fro against her before he accedes to her commands and strips them from her and she’s trying to move and he’s holding her in place and she’s crying out and he’s smiling ferally against her as he works her higher with tongue and fingers and then she explodes.

Castle collects up his bundle of blissed-out Beckett and amuses himself with some non-specific petting while she recovers. How nice that what he likes doing, she likes receiving. Win-win. She rubs against him like a cat and increases the similarity by purring contentedly. He’s not at all sure she knows she’s doing it.

She knows she’s doing that, though. Back to her evil, elegant hands doing evil, elegant deeds. She seems to know just exactly where to touch him to best effect. And then she slithers down his body, trailing kisses as she goes which leave little darts of heat piercing his skin, and adds her evil, beautiful, wicked mouth to the mix and his hands are in her hair and no matter how he tries he can’t stop himself thrusting into her hot mouth and then she does something with tongue that’s matched by her fingers and he’s lost.

When he’s recovered he finds that Beckett is peaceably curled against him, facing the other way but snuggled into his arm. He runs a delicate fingertip down her flank, and she shivers slightly and tucks in tighter. A minor alteration in position, so that he’s on his side, later and she’s been spooned in and totally enveloped.

“Mine,” he murmurs happily. “Stay tucked up to me, all soft and cuddly.” She wriggles slightly, the net effect of which is to bring her closer. He thinks she might even have meant to end up closer. He summons a little effort, and nibbles provocatively on her ear, which makes her wriggle enticingly. Recovery time appears to have reduced to almost nothing. Who needs di-lithium crystals? He certainly doesn’t.

He shifts a little behind her, and glides a broad palm down her front to cup her so that she wriggles some more, and opens for him, and he slides slowly into the exposed wet heat: forward and back, over but not in. She tries to move, and his arms clamp her close, keeping her still for exquisite teasing, leading to (he hopes) infinite pleasure. She begins to purr long before he expects it, stretching and rubbing over his body in an effort to convince him to let her have her way, but he keeps her there until he’s finally ready to push into her instead, and then has freedom to move within her and simultaneously circle the nub of nerves and it’s so good, so incredibly good and she clenches and he’s still holding her and moving in her and together they ignite.
“Don’t you have to go?” she breathes, around a century later.

“No need. Mother will be home. Staying right here.”

“Work tomorrow. You have to go sometime.”

“Yes, but not now.” Later. He just wants to hold her, now. Just for a little while. She needs to be held: she needs to know that cossetting and cherishing and care for her are as readily available as her coffee.

Her eyelids drop. Shortly, Castle’s eyelids follow Beckett’s down. He wakes briefly in the night, finds her still against him, and sleeps again, reassured. No more second-best. She’s shown him Kat.

When she wakes in the middle of the night, Beckett finds that she’s still close, though no longer wrapped in. She appears to be clinging to Castle’s hand. This is surprising. Nice, but surprising. She luxuriates in the sensation for a moment as she falls back to sleep.

Castle wakes again, before dawn, and this time realises he really does have to leave, since he should have done so hours ago. Reluctantly, he dresses and slips out, leaving a neat note explaining his reasons anchored very firmly to Beckett’s nightstand. There will be no miscommunications or abandonment issues here.

Beckett drags herself into wakefulness with an odd feeling that something – someone – is missing. Then her eyes snap open as the alarm goes off. She sits bolt upright and slams into work mode, falling out of bed and into the bathroom in one movement, the practiced efficiency that has her washed, made-up and dressed in half an hour. Breakfast – well, coffee – from the café, at her desk with said coffee in hand in good order in the shortest possible time. She grabs the note, flicks her eyes down it, acquires a lovely warm feeling in her chest, and whisks herself off to work in the most positive state she’s been in since November.

It lasts right up until she sees Montgomery’s not-happy, not-smiling face, at which point she remembers about the other matter.

“Reporting, sir.”

“My office,” he snaps. Ryan and Esposito acquire expressions of sympathy. Their Monday visit to Montgomery’s office is not far from their minds.

The door shuts behind the Captain with an ominous crack.

“Report, Beckett.”

“I have an appointment with a therapist tonight,” she says baldly, and takes considerable satisfaction from Montgomery’s flabbergasted face. It almost draws the sting from the need to say it. Almost.

But not quite.

“Dismissed,” Montgomery says weakly. He watches her leave, too surprised to work out – until she’s out of sight – that he’s completely failed to require her to report on her plan. On the other hand, it’s a start. He will be monitoring this development. In fact, although he can’t and won’t ask what she covers in therapy – and the chances of Beckett telling him are marginally slimmer than the chances of him becoming President – this will go through the NYPD health plan and he will be able to monitor whether this is a one-off to appease him (and pretend to obey orders while actually not doing so at all) or a proper attempt to sort herself out. Still, he might well spend a moment or two working out what to do with Beckett – and what to ask her. He’s not going to let a Detective outinterrogate her Captain. No sirree.

However, he still mentally curses the Berowitzes and then, on an instant’s thought, blesses his decision to allow Castle in. That had been looking pretty shaky a couple of weeks ago, but based on Monday it’s looking pretty sound right now.

Beckett retreats in apparent good order, and not until she’s fully out of sight of the Captain’s office does she flee to the restrooms, to lean her head on the cool tiles once more, and try to calm her roiling stomach. All her history, to be dragged up and examined, interrogated and evidenced until its truth or falsity should prove her guilt. The warmth in her chest has been replaced by a cold, coiling ache.

She exits, makes herself a scalding coffee, and returns to her desk. It’s barely eight-thirty, and the day is already chilled. Worse, she can’t hope for a new case to distract herself. If a new case arrives, she’ll have to break off to attend her appointment, and that will raise the very questions that she is hoping to avoid by scheduling it for after shift. Not only that, but she can’t postpone or cancel. Montgomery may have been rocked back on his Captain’s heels, but she certainly won’t count on him dropping the subject. She can see another summons to his office arriving in the near future, when he realises that she hasn’t given him a plan.

She pulls a cold case and her hot coffee towards her, puts her head down, and starts.

It takes approximately four minutes – that is, as soon as they think she’s finished the coffee – for Ryan and Esposito to disturb her. They are, after all, her team, and they are definitely not happy at the way things have been happening for the last week and a half. Ever since Beckett went rushing off and brushing them all off last Monday, in fact. And then Montgomery benched her this Monday. Time for some – um, help. Thanks to Montgomery, neither of them had a chance to investigate before she was out the door. At least Castle had gone after her, though since they haven’t seen him since he may be dead. On the other hand, that would have made the news, so maybe not.

“Yo, Beckett.”

“Hey.” She manages a smile. It slithers from her face as she absorbs Esposito’s expression. He’s aiming for his big brother mode, and finding it.

“What’s goin’ on?”

“Huh?”

“What’s up? You got sent home Monday and you were weird with Lanie the week before. You were ill on Tuesday” – Beckett conceals any reaction to that – “and Montgomery made you take leave Thursday and Friday. So what’s goin’ on, Beckett?”

“Stomach upset,” she says blandly. “Thought I was over it, but I wasn’t. Montgomery didn’t like my overtime. Guess there isn’t room to pay it in the budget, so he made me take time in lieu.”

It’s all terribly plausible. Espo doesn’t buy it for a second. He also doesn’t buy the conversation-ending way that Beckett’s picked up her pen and flipped over a page in the case file.

“Okay,” he says, surprisingly mildly. “That’s the case, you’ll have some time to come sparring with me.” Mildness disappears. “Now. Ryan’ll come and make sure your bug don’t join us.”

“I’m working.”

“So’m I. I’m workin’ on getting you fit again. You’re not running, ‘cause it’s been too slippery, an’ yoga just don’t cut it. You haven’t been in the gym in weeks, have you? So c’mon. Now, or lunchtime?”

“Lunchtime.”

“Deal. An’ no goin’ an’ callin’ Lanie to get outta sparring.”

_That’s not going to happen, Espo. No way am I calling Lanie. No way._

Espo struts off, radiating satisfaction. Ryan doesn’t.

“What’s really up, Beckett?” he asks quietly. “We all know that was so much bullshit. I don’t think it’s Castle that’s upsetting you – but if it is,” he says steely, “then we’ll be having a little chat with him.”

“Not required.”

“‘Kay. ‘S not your dad, ‘cause you’d have done the usual.” Ryan watches Beckett’s eyes shut down. “Or… is it?”

“No,” she says tightly. “Everything’s fine.”

Ryan regards her unusually cynically. “Sure it is. Suddenly you’re ill just when you’re brushing off us and your best friend? Sure you’re fine. We’re not buying your bullshit, Beckett. If it isn’t Castle – an’ that I do believe – it’s something else.”

“Ryan, leave it.”

“Nah. Like it or not, we’re a team. Means you got to play as a team. So tell me what’s up.”

“Nothing to do with work. Nothing to do with my dad. Nothing to do with Castle.” She looks up, eyes cold and dead. “Nothing to do with you boys.”

Ryan glares back at her. “You don’t get to pull that crap with us. You don’t put us off that easily. We know there’s something up, an’ if you don’t tell us we’ll work it out ourselves.” He lowers his rising voice. “We’ll help. Whether you want us to or not. So you can spill the beans now or later but we’re not leaving you to fuck yourself up on your own. We don’t work like that.”

She can’t bear the disappointment in his tone, but she won’t show it and can’t talk about it. “Nothing’s wrong. I’m not going to mess up the team.” Dismissal edges her next words. “I’ll see you in the gym at lunchtime.”

Ryan doesn’t look satisfied with that, but at that point a coffee cup arrives in front of her, followed by Castle arriving beside her, and the conversation drops as Ryan moves away.

It’s possibly very fortunate that Beckett didn’t spot the fulminating scowl Castle directed at Ryan in order to shift him away. He could see the stress in her shoulders from the moment he stepped out the elevator, and though right now he can think of a dozen reasons for that, starting with Montgomery and finishing with murder, the expression Ryan’s wearing and Esposito’s interested attention from his own desk make him think that the first reason is Ryan. (And it really isn’t a little revenge for Ryan calling him out a couple of weeks ago. Really not. Much.) So when he gets closer he fixes Ryan with a truly filthy look and a jerk of the head which is completely unmistakable.

Any man would recognise it as _leave her alone_. Any man would also recognise that the gesture carries a number of connotations which are not normally common between co-workers, however. Chief among them is a definite layer of _you hurt my girl and I’ll hurt you_. Ryan is a man who’s had a few girlfriends of his own about whom he’d cared and is a veteran of a number of emotional scenes, and he recognises that a few harsh words between Castle, Espo and himself are approaching.

“Hey,” Castle says softly. Beckett glances up and achieves a smile of moderate sincerity. It doesn’t wholly disguise the small stresses around her eyes.

“Hey, Castle. Thanks for the coffee.”

“Can’t have you suffering caffeine withdrawal. That would be dangerous.” He waits a beat. “You might shoot Espo.”

“More likely Ryan,” Beckett mutters darkly. “When I need a mother hen I’ll go to a farm.”

“Oh?”

“Never mind. It’s not important. Now, what’s brought you here when there’s no new body to investigate?”

Castle makes sure his back is to the boys and then casts her a look that curls her toes. “This and that.
Soaking up the atmosphere. Making sure the story runs smoothly.” If it weren’t for the look, it would be trivial. “Checking my understanding. Confirming I’m on the right track. Every story needs a supporting framework.”

“Good to know,” Beckett says dryly. “My apartment windows need to be cleaned. You can lend me the scaffolding.”

“You wound me,” Castle declaims, pressing his hands to his heart dramatically. Beckett quirks an eyebrow.

“I think you’ll live.”

Castle humphs sulkily. “Just for that, Detective, I shall repair to the break room to suture my psychological wounds. I’m sure someone will be sympathetic.”

“Only if you fix the coffee for them.”

Castle retires to the break room, punctured.
The break room contains the coffee machine, clean mugs, and, approximately ten milliseconds after it contains Castle, also contains Ryan and Esposito. Both of them are now in Big Brother mode. It would be extremely effective, except that Castle retaliates by looming over them by some three or four inches and giving back a similarly intimidating attitude.

“What’s up with Beckett?”

“You tell me.”

“C’mon. Montgomery don’t bench any of us for nothin’. Somethin’s up.”

“She won’t tell me,” Ryan says morosely. “We’re her team, and we’ve made it all work round her… issue… for years. And now she won’t say squat.”

“She ain’t talking. I ain’t surprised. But she’s ours.” There is a note of definite warning in Esposito’s tone. Castle raises his eyebrows.

“Yours? Didn’t think she belonged to anyone.”

“Our team. You gonna mess that up?”

“No.”

“So what gives?”

“Nothing that’ll mess up the team.” It’s flat, not inviting further comment. Ryan and Esposito exchange quick, flicked glances which say everything to each other, and drop the idea of interrogation 101.

“You got this, Castle?”

“I got this.”

The tone doesn’t permit disagreement. The boys are not inclined to disagree. They’ve got what they wanted: an answer; though they’re not entirely sure Castle knew that they were asking a question. The answer is the right answer. The man’s part of the team. More to the point, he’s got Beckett’s back. And finally, whatever he just said, it looks like he’s got Beckett as well. About time, too.

They exchange brief looks of satisfaction, collect their coffees and leave.

Castle is also well satisfied with that conversation. The boys will back off Beckett, which is likely what she needs today, from her earlier tells, and they won’t get in his way, which he needs. This is all – Beckett is all – very fragile, and Ryan and Esposito blundering around trying to interrogate her will not help at all. God knows, he’s done enough blundering around and getting that wrong to recognise the problems that might bring. Later, though – later, but not very much later, Ryan and Espo will be vital. They’ve been her support for years, even if she never let them into her private life: they made it possible for her to work as she does and support her father. They know the history. As, he suddenly thinks, might the resident mountain of Central Park Precinct, O’Leary.

Mm. Yes. O’Leary. Castle’s done his research, but there’s not a lot of emotion in research. He’s talked to Jim, which had a lot of emotion, but that hasn’t shown him Beckett’s experiences, it’s shown him Jim’s. It’s only shown him Beckett, or Katie, as reflected by Jim, which is very partial and very fractured. Beckett may have spilled out the truth about her feelings with her tears, but she’s stayed a long, long way away from what actually happened. In mystery writing, he remembers from a book he read years ago, when you know how, you know who. So if he finds out how it went down, he’ll know more about Beckett. Maybe then he’ll be able to support her better, or at least avoid obvious mistakes. O’Leary. Yes. Just as well he, Castle, is a multimillionaire, though. O’Leary’s likely beer consumption would put a noticeable dent in the output of Coors, Budweiser and Miller, without putting a dent in O’Leary’s sobriety.

He crafts an extra-careful coffee for Beckett, another for himself, and wanders back out to see what’s going on. Nothing much is. He finds it difficult to believe that it’s another cold case day: after all, this is Manhattan, where the city never sleeps and the murders never stop. The other teams seem to be reasonably busy… Oh. Oh wow. Montgomery really is on top of his precinct, isn’t he? This team’s been overloaded for a month, and Beckett, who in some strange way holds it together by force of personality, is broken…so Montgomery is very subtly giving them a break. Clever. Very, very clever. Castle’s respect for Montgomery’s sneakiness takes an upward leap. The downtime can’t and won’t last, but Montgomery’s seen an opportunity and he’s taken it.

“Can I have a case?” he says hopefully.

“You want a cold case?”

“Yes. I’m bored. It’ll amuse me. And I came up with a good solution on the last one.”

“Okay, have the next one up. But no way-out theories. We do not need aliens, invisible men, or unknown poisons. We do need facts and evidence.”

“That’s no fun.”

“That’s cop work.”

The morning passes without incident and without a new murder to play with. Castle pester Beckett, who has become distressingly quiet and unsnarky, until she agrees to come out of the precinct for lunch, squares it with Esposito, who reschedules the gym for the next day, and stuffs her with burger and milkshake – he has Coke: he finds milkshakes to be neither close enough to ice-cream to be satisfying nor liquid enough to be thirst quenching – until she looks a little less strained.

“What do you want me to come over tonight?” he asks. Asks, because she’s stressed and she might want space. That thought doesn’t stop him sneaking his fingers over hers, which are cold, and staying there, to warm them up. He wishes they were in a booth, where he could hug her.

“Not tonight, Castle, thanks. I’ve got a health check straight after shift.” She manages to quirk an eyebrow in a way that strongly implies that the appointment will include areas to which she wouldn’t refer for fear of embarrassing Castle and/or the boys. “Takes a while.” Which is only a little bit untrue. The therapy session is certainly going to take a while, and is going to be bad enough without letting anyone know about it beforehand. She doesn’t need people stressing her out even further by worrying about her. She’ll see how she feels afterwards, though appalling is the first word that springs to mind. Peace, quiet and most likely Kleenex are the most likely companions she’ll want around her.

Castle sneaks a surreptitious glance at Beckett, notes the strain lines around her eyes, and concludes that whatever the appointment is, she’s not looking forward to it. It only takes him half a second to wonder if this is not a medical doctor she’s seeing, but a therapist, despite the impression she’s giving off. She hasn’t lied, but her truth could be very misleading. He wishes she’d told him, but the middle of a busy diner, with, no doubt, plenty of cops dashing in and out, isn’t exactly the time or place and, he works out an instant before he opens his mouth, she may not want anyone metaphorically peeking over her shoulder. Still, he would have supported her… oh. Only you can save yourself. Hm. Support doesn’t necessarily mean talking about it to him. It might just mean that he should be there afterwards. Without mentioning why he’s there, and without asking her anything. But not today. Not this soon. He’ll stalk her pattern, and then be there for her – support for her, for which she won’t need to ask.

“Oh. Ice-cream?”

Beckett looks at her watch and makes a disappointed face. “No time. We have to get back.” She draws in a breath as Castle’s fingers close over her hand and cover it: his thumb stroking slowly over it, trying to infuse warmth and comfort into her chilly flesh.

“Pity. I wanted ice-cream.” He smiles slowly. “Something sweet on my tongue.”

“You could, you know.” His voice has turned molten and seductive. “But maybe not right now.” He runs the tip of his tongue over his own lips, and grins as Beckett blushes. “Salt,” he says. She glares. “C’mon. Time to get back.” He stands, and pulls her with him, only just managing not to pull her into his arms. That wouldn’t exactly be discreet, or sensible. Holding her hand isn’t, either, but she’s not objecting to that and while she’s not objecting he’s not letting go. In fact, once they’re out of the door he tucks both their hands into his coat pocket and carries on the soft stroking of his thumb. She sighs quietly and walks just a little closer to him, so that their shoulders rub and occasionally their hips slide together. Inside his fleecy pocket, her fingers twine into his.

Of course, ten yards from the precinct door her hand removes itself and a narrow quarantine zone springs up between them, but he can cope with that.

The afternoon progresses slowly and with immense tedium. Castle can’t find a single theory on his file that won’t get him shot, has drunk enough coffee for his hands to start to shake, and has almost bitten through his tongue in order not to start either an entirely inappropriate conversation, which would be amusing for the few seconds it took Beckett to despatch him to the morgue – as a subject – or a much more serious conversation, which would be neither amusing nor allow him to escape the morgue.

He contemplates the empty evening ahead of him and recalls that he’d meant to have a drink or few with Detective O’Leary. Today seems good. He claims utter boredom, to an equally utter lack of anyone’s surprise, wanders off home, digs up the number of the Central Park Precinct, and asks for O’Leary. He’s actually there, somewhat to Castle’s surprise.

“Detective O’Leary.”

“O’Leary, it’s Castle.” He leaves off the Rick. This is a cop to whom he’s speaking, after all.

“Mr Castle? Castle?” There’s a silence which is full of enthusiasm. Then it dulls. “Why’re you calling, Castle? Have you lost Beckett again? She’s not here.”

“No, I know where she is. I called to see if you wanted to go for a few beers. You know I said I was writing about the NYPD and you said you had some stories…?”

“You wanna talk to me? Sure. I got lots of stories.” Castle can hear the wide smile on the Mississippi delta of O’Leary’s mouth. “Guess you’ll want the earlier ones. When d’you wanna meet? There’s a so-called Southwestern restaurant – Cilantro – on Columbus: does good beer and good food. I don’t usually go there, prefer the Irish bars, but it’s nice to have a change. I finish around six.”

“I’ll be there around six then, unless you call to say you’ve caught a body.”

“See you there, Castle. Are you bringing Beckett?”

“Not this time. I want the stories, not the bullets.”

There’s a bass rumble which sounds like a volcano considering its options and which is probably shuddering the walls of the Central Park precinct. “You got me there. I don’t want her shooting me either. She’s scary when she gets mad.” The subwoofer stops pumping out bass vibrations.

“Yeah,” Castle agrees fervently. “She sure can be.” She can be anything she likes, but she doesn’t scare me. No. What she’s done to herself, and what she’s done to me, terrifies me.

Beckett uses complete concentration on her cold cases to try to forget about her early evening appointment, and mostly succeeds. It doesn’t do much for her temper, though, and by the second time she’s been a little sharper than she needs to be with Ryan the boys are leaving her a wide berth, though Espósito produces a warning scowl which wards her off. She rams her nervousness back down, prays devoutly that Montgomery doesn’t try another run at her today, and focuses firmly on the cases. She’d really love a new body to drop now. Right now. Any time before shift ends, in fact. A headache starts to gather behind her temples.

No body drops. Beckett tidies her desk as slowly as she can and still no body drops. As she files her papers in her desk she notices Espósito and Ryan observing her with some confusion.

“Going home. See you tomorrow.” Neither of them say anything. She trudges to the elevator and out.

“She don’t look too good.”

“You gonna call her on it? After today?”

“Nah. But if she don’t look better tomorrow I’ll set Castle on it.” Espósito smiles sharply. “Safer for both of us, bro.” Ryan sniggers.

“Yeah.” He turns serious. “You trust him to make it right?”

“More chance than we got,” shrugs Espo.

Beckett stands outside a clean, unmarked building, headache – surely it’s the headache, or the chill wind – prickling at her eyelids and watering her eyes. She doesn’t want to go in. But she has to.

Only you can save yourself. She has to do this.

She walks in.

Come six o’clock, Castle bounces into Cilantro on Columbus, orders himself a beer and one for O’Leary, who is very evidently not there – there are no mobile mountains on view – and acquires a table. He watches the early evening crowd come and go, taking mental notes of anything particularly interesting or suitable for inspiring him as he does, and occasionally scribbling in a small notebook. It doesn’t stop him noticing when O’Leary strides in. It is, after all, difficult to miss anything that size, such as – say – Amtrak engines, or a 747, rolling up beside you.

“Hey, O’Leary. Want a beer?”

“Sure.”

Castle companionably pushes the bottle across the table, indicates that the bartender should bring some more, and grins.

“So,” he says. “How’d you meet Beckett?”

O’Leary smiles, iceberg-sized teeth gleaming.

“You really wanna know?” he grins back.

“Yeah.” Castle scents a story.

“Well…” O’Leary almost blushes. “I was a uniform, only a little bit past bein’ a rookie… and I arrested her,” he rushes out. Castle chokes on his beer.

O’Leary’s blush manifests itself, but his laugh rumbles out. “You know Beckett’s pretty hot – wasted on me, but she sure is pretty, so there you go” – Castle shifts, a little uncomfortable – “so they picked her up for Vice ops any time there was a need, right from the beginning.”

Castle begins to smirk. He can see this story unfolding.

“Anyway, I was with the Sixth then, been there a year or so. Tended to get sent out when they thought there might be trouble. When you’re a uniform, you do what you’re told.” He shifts uncomfortably in his turn, causing a small gale to flap the napkins. “So we got told to pick up all the hookers down in the Meatpacking District to support some bigger operation.”

Castle’s eyes sparkle.

“No,” he breathes, on a ripple of laughter. “You didn’t.”

O’Leary droops a little. “Yeah. We did. Brass forgot to tell us that the tip came in from Vice and they had some eyes on the ground. I go in to haul in this Russian brunette who’d got a little feisty…”

“Feisty?”

“She’d taken down a couple of guys already. Lieutenant reckoned I was big enough that she couldn’t take me down.” Castle looks at him.

“I’d say your Lieutenant got that right,” he says dryly. “So what’d you do?” He can’t repress his ever-widening grin. O’Leary’s grinning, too.

“You have to get that she looked like any other hooker. Tight tube top, ton of make-up, skirt that barely covered her ass, six inch heels… I thought the two guys had… got distracted. I wasn’t out then, so I didn’t say anything ‘bout that.” He squirms a little. “You won’t get upset, Mr Castle? She’s your girlfriend.”

“Castle, O’Leary. And no, I won’t be upset.” He’s far too involved in the story, and in trying not to die of laughter. “What did you do?”
“Um… she tried to kick me in the balls – only just missed” – Castle winces in considerable male sympathy – “how anyone can kick like that in a tight miniskirt I still dunno even though she showed me it later, sparring – an’ while I was still – er – protecting myself she landed a real haymaker in my chest. Only thing was, she hadn’t quite allowed for my size, so it din’t do much ‘cept hurt her hand.”

“She missed?”

“Nah. She didn’t know how much I worked out. She’d have needed to be Mike Tyson to hurt me.”

“And?” Castle asks, completely fascinated.

“She had another go” – that doesn’t surprise Castle: Beckett never seems to give up – “so I caught her arm, an’ then” – he blushes – “I picked her up, put her over my shoulder” – he stops dead, and blush turns to searing red – “Are you sure you won’t be upset?”

“I won’t be.” Castle reassures, chortling outright at the thought of Beckett over anyone’s shoulder – and then having some thoroughly lustful thoughts at the thought of Beckett over his. O’Leary looks a little uncertain: the tectonics of his face pulling his smile sideways.

“Anyways, she kept tryin’ to punch me in the kidneys, an’ though it wasn’t getting her anywhere it got a bit annoyin’ after the sixth time, an’ I needed both hands to stop her kicking me, an’ all the time she was cussing me in English and Russian… anyways, I got a bit fed up of it all.”

Castle suddenly realiseis exactly where this is going and utterly fails to control his face, laughter or imagination.

“Yeah,” he says, embarrassed. “I swatted her ass an’ told her to quit it or I’d do it again.”

“And you’re alive? How are you still alive?”

“I put the cuffs on her, got her into my cruiser, took a few more bruises doin’ it – Beckett fights dirty, an’ she just wouldn’t stop – but soon as I got into the car she dropped the accent an’ came clean. Man, I was so embarrassed.”

“Not as embarrassed as the two she took down, I bet.”

“Nah. They got ragged round the whole of the Sixth for months. Serve ‘em right.”

“What’d she say to you?”

“She said sorry for beating on me, said she didn’t know what to do, so she thought she had to keep cover till she was outta sight of everyone. Told me it was a Vice op, but she’d only been around a coupla months. Lot more of a rookie than me. She’d thought she really had to make it convincing, and boy, did she try – I had bruises an’ scratches for a week – and she hoped she hadn’t hurt me. So I stopped soon as we were round a few corners, an’ took the cuffs off, an’ I said I was sorry for swatting her, an’ we got chatting. She got a way about her, makes you wanna tell her the truth.”

Castle signals for another round. “Want some food, O’Leary? Soak up the beer? On me. Anyone who lives after doing that deserves a medal, but all I can do is buy you dinner and beer.”

“Sure.” A few minutes are spent in pleasant contemplation of the menu and then ordering a container-load of nachos and quesadillas, plus enough tacos to feed the Marines; with several more beers. Saves time, the men agree.

“She pegged me for gay soon as we got talking, before we got back to the Sixth.” Castle gapes.

“How? I thought I was pretty switched on, what with all the book conventions, but I didn’t notice a thing till you and Beckett let on.”

O’Leary rumbles happily, which two octaves higher might have been a laugh.

“You were too busy giving me the stink-eye for flirting with your girlfriend.” It’s Castle’s turn to colour up. “She said she knew I was gay from moment one.”

“Yeah, but how? It’s not the first thing you think of.”

“Didn’t try to cop a feel,” O’Leary mutters. “Everyone else did.”

“Oh,” Castle says blackly. “Did they?”

“Cool it. They were the two she put on the floor. I heard tell,” he says conspiratorially, “that she went looking for them, when she was outta Vice and into Homicide, and suggested some sparring. I did hear as how she said she needed some practice.” He smirks as nastily as Esposito might, across a face as wide as Alaska. “Set it up on the phone. Invited me along to see fair play. Or somethin’ like that. That was a fun evening. They looked a little blue when she showed up with a badge. They looked a little black and blue when playtime was over.”

“You wouldn’t have had a little to do with that, would you?” Castle remembers that O’Leary’s first comment to Beckett had been when’re you coming to spar with me again?

“Mebbe,” O’Leary mutters. “Might have been her sparring partner for a while.” Castle considers relative sizes, and decides not to ask about it. He also decides that he’s very glad O’Leary is gay.

“So you said you got chatting, and I guess you got to be pals pretty fast?”

“Yeah,” the mountain rumbles happily. “Like I said, she’s easy to talk to. An’ she don’t blab, either. An’...”

“And she was a good disguise, wasn’t she?”

“Yeah. For a while. Then she met that Fed. I didn’t like him much, but she seemed fine with him, till one day it was all over. She didn’t say why.”

Castle contains his interest in that Fed, whoever he was, with consummate ease. He’s not interested in past boyfriends: all he cares about is that there aren’t any future boyfriends except him. O’Leary disposes of another bottle of beer and a shovelful of nachos without appearing to open his mouth beyond a small amount.
“So you were pals, you said.” Everest nods. “Bet you got into a bit of trouble together. Beckett said you ate the flowers she gave you?”

There’s a snigger. It reverberates through the wood of the table.

“I was gettin’ on her case about her diet. Never saw her eat anything but takeout or burgers.” He looks dreamy for a moment. “Those burgers at that Remy’s place she found, though…” Castle didn’t think that Remy’s served up elephant burgers. Not that he’s looked. “She got a bit riled with me. I bet her twenty that she couldn’t cook a decent meal.” Remembered embarrassment flicks across his face, making him look like an oversize little boy. “She suckered me,” he says indignantly.

“She cooked a great meal, and at the end she gave me this bunch of crystallised pink rose petals and dared me to eat them.”

Castle sniggers.

“So I did. But I got my own back. I made her eat my chili. My mom’s recipe. It’s pretty fiery. Thought her head would fall off.” He shakes his own head wonderingly. A small quake rattles the table. “But she did it, an’ took another twenty off me. It wasn’t fair.” The Ross ice-shelf appears, in the protruding persona of his lower lip. “Mind, she put down a bucket of soda straight after.”

Castle is entranced by this enormous cop’s relationship with Beckett. Suddenly he sees a side of her that he’s never seen: a little frivolous, a lot humorous. But surely even then she was dealing with her father?

“So she was someone you could talk to?”

“Yeah. Now she mostly interrogates, but when she’s listening to you” – Castle thinks about how Beckett had listened to Julia, and to the Godleys – “it’s like you’re the only thing that matters. But…” he stops, and looks guiltily as if he had been about to say too much. “She never gossips. Didn’t say squat about me. Times were a bit different then: wouldn’t have wanted it goin’ around.”

The oil tanker turns to a different tack, of considerably less sensitivity but still of much interest.

“So anyways, we did a bit of sparring, when she needed a real work-out – this was mostly before she got paired up with Detective Esposito when he got moved out the 54th – an’ we went out occasionally – did wonders for my street cred, that – but after a while I noticed that I told her a bit about my family, or what I was doin’ for Thanksgiving or Christmas, but she never said anything much. Still, didn’t matter to me. Leastways she wasn’t askin’ me to go shopping with her or anything like that.” He pauses, and rumbles happily. “I hate shopping. All those tiny little aisles with fragile little bits and pieces just waitin’ to fall over and break.”

“I think they’re called ordinary size people,” Castle says with a smirk.

“I try to be careful,” O’Leary says faux-aggrievedly. “‘S just without my telescope I can’t see my feet.”

Castle roars with laughter.

“Beckett’s not much for shopping,” he says when he recovers breath.

“Naw. She might be a bit uptown, but she ain’t much for things. ‘Cept coats and shoes. I used to rag on her about the shoes. Told her she was only getting them so she could reach my shoulder. She offered to buy me a pair."

“Can you get high heels in size fifteen?”

“ ‘Parently so. Said she thought I’d look cute in purple sparkles, with a matching vest.” Castle’s beer exits his mouth via his nose, which he feels is probably not a flattering look. “I didn’t think so. So I patted her on the head” –

“You what? You patted her head and lived to tell? You just get better and better. You’re heading for legendary.”

“ – and told her I was sure her mom would get her a pair from the dress-up shop if that’s what she liked.” O’Leary’s face droops. “She went a bit pale, and just walked off to the restroom. Came back a bit later, said her mom had passed. Gave her a hug, an’ she never mentioned it again.”

This doesn’t surprise Castle at all. Except the hug, which he would have expected to get O’Leary shot.

“Sounds like you guys had a lot of fun. Did you ever work cases together?”

“For a few months, when we were both uniforms. She made Detective faster than I did – faster than anyone did – and she’d been taken up by the Twelfth before that. Captain Montgomery took a shine to her, an’ though there was a bit of grumbling about it, everyone who was fair knew she was just that good. I moved from the Sixth to Central Park. We still hung around a bit, but it got harder. An’…” he trails off.

“Mmmm?” Castle pricks up his ears, and very consciously engages his own ability to create the atmosphere where the only thing that matters is the story and the person telling it.

“We pulled in a wino one night, just after I got there. Bit of a mess. Sergeant Hardon – he was on the desk the first time you came by – booked him, shoved him in a cell, gave him a bucket, the usual. Couldn’t understand anything he said. Kept asking for some KT guy, an’ a bucket even though he’d got one, but he was so drunk likely he couldn’t see the bucket he’d been given. So that didn’t mean nothin’ to anyone.”

The spare description is more evocative than a thesaurus of adjectives would have been. O’Leary’s sunny disposition has clouded over.

“We pulled in a wino one night, just after I got there. Bit of a mess. Sergeant Hardon – he was on the desk the first time you came by – booked him, shoved him in a cell, gave him a bucket, the usual. Couldn’t understand anything he said. Kept asking for some KT guy, an’ a bucket even though he’d got one, but he was so drunk likely he couldn’t see the bucket he’d been given. So that didn’t mean nothin’ to anyone.”

The spare description is more evocative than a thesaurus of adjectives would have been. O’Leary’s sunny disposition has clouded over.

“Couple of hours later he got coherent enough to speak clearly. Started asking for Katie. It didn’t click. I sorta knew she was Kate, but we ain’t much on first names. You know we don’t roll that way in the NYPD. Sergeant got his name, an’ got a number off him. Wasn’t me who called her, didn’t hear the name. If it had been, mighta been a bit different. I’d have recognised the number back then. Didn’t mean nothin’ to the Sergeant.”

Castle is pretty sure where this is going, after he’d insisted on shadowing Beckett right into the Central Park Precinct. He doesn’t let on by so much as a twitch of an eyelash that he’s rapidly drawing conclusions. He’s not smiling any more, either.

“So she came in, an’ like an idiot I called out to her. Thought she’d come in to see me, even though she was in uniform. She looked round. She – I thought she was gonna shoot me. Or herself. ‘Stead, she turned away. Only talked to the Sergeant. Sounded like she knew the drill. Got him out. Never looked at me, the whole time, ‘s if I wasn’t there.” Even now, Castle can see the pain of the memory. Beckett blocking out anything that might indicate that someone knew about her. Even O’Leary, who was evidently a pretty close friend. Then. “Coupla days later we’d got a drink scheduled, an’” –

“She bailed?”

“Naw. She showed, but she never mentioned it. Like it never happened. I tried to work the talk around, but she wasn’t having it.” Again, totally unsurprising. “She got a bit busier for a while after that: didn’t see as much of her off duty for a few weeks. She was shooting for Detective, an’ racking up the hours.” And blocking out the pain, too, by racking up the hours. “But he got brought in again, and she came to get him. I think he’d maybe been brought in a couple of times in between, ’cause Sergeant Hardon seemed to know her pretty well by then, like he was used to seeing her. This time I pretended not to notice. We were still pals, an’ I wasn’t gonna hurt her. We still went for drinks, and swapped stories, and I still went out with her any time either of us needed a plus-one, you know?”

“Yeah,” Castle says softly, not wanting to break the now-confidential mood.

“And then less than a month after that he was in again. So the Sergeant called her. She wouldn’t come. Sergeant Hardon musta tried everything to make her come. She just… he couldn’t do anything to change her mind.”

The mass of muscle droops miserably. “I called her, when my shift was done. She was in a bar down in the East Village. I went over to join her – she didn’t ask me to, I just went. Figured that she couldn’t push me out.”

Castle recognises the shape of that long-ago evening. Beckett alone with alcohol…

“She didn’t even try to. I guess she wanted someone to keep the barflies off, ’cause when I got there a few guys were eyin’ her up.” This is not at all a surprise: any red-blooded male would be eyeing up a solo Kate Beckett. “I got the drinks in and she poured them down. She never said why, but I knew. So I helped her blot it out. It was the only thing I could do for her. When she couldn’t sit up straight I got her home – helps that she’s little” – Castle blinks: he still has some problems with anyone considering Beckett little – “put her to bed” – he scowls: O’Leary may be gay but the only person that isn’t Castle that he wants to know has put Kate Beckett to bed is Jim Beckett. Twenty five years ago – “an’ stayed on her couch. Man, that was uncomfortable.” Castle believes that. He’d be uncomfortable on Beckett’s couch, at eight inches shorter. “Called her in sick the next morning, left her a note, Advil and a gallon of water. She called me later, said thank you.”

Castle thinks that the next bit is going to be bitterly familiar, too.

“Week later, she called me, suggested a bar. Course I went. I’d half-wondered if I’d ever see her again. She drank soda all night. Talked about cases, what she needed to do to make Detective, asked about my cases. Never mentioned her dad once. Even then, it already wasn’t like it was. She didn’t say anythin’, and I didn’t know how to ask. It wasn’t like she gave me the opening.”

Memory rises in his face, a high tide of hurt. “We stayed pals. But she got busy, and made Detective faster ’n anyone, and got busier. Didn’t see her as much. Drifted. She told me when her dad got dry. She was really pleased about it. But she still never talked about any of it. She met that Fed. I met Pete. I made Detective, and she bought me so much beer I nearly drowned in it. It was just like it used to be. So I reckoned we were good. She even came sparring again, especially after she ditched the Fed.”

O’Leary grins mischievously. “I think she was a bit pissed at him. She beat hell out the bag and tried to beat hell outta me. If I was him, I wouldn’t come back to Manhattan in a hurry. Anyways, we were good. Then she calls up looking for this Berowitz guy, first time in a coupla months I’d heard from her, and you came in with her, and then you stopped her givin’ me the flu, an’ here we are.”

He lifts his bottle in a toast. Castle automatically responds, his busy brain processing this already-familiar story. Seems like he’s not the only one who has been blocked out. O’Leary, of course, didn’t want the option he, Castle, had taken. He supposes he should be glad that Beckett had O’Leary as a friend, because it sure sounds like she’d needed one. He really shouldn’t be jealous of their history and O’Leary’s close friendship with Beckett at all. It’s ridiculous and stupid and he’d better get his head out his ass, because eight years ago he was married, for Christ’s sake, and he’s never cheated on anyone; and O’Leary is gay, and in a long-term relationship. He shakes his idiot ideas out his brain, swigs his beer, and grins widely at the hugely (in so many ways) impressive O’Leary.

“So what other stories have you got?”

“Well, there was this time when I was a uniform we got a report of a wild animal in the Park, terrorising little kids… turned out to be a Newfoundland dog the size of a horse, and by the time we got there all the toddlers were bein’ given rides on its back. Some idiot who couldn’t tell the difference between a dog an’ a bear, so we gave ‘em a scare for wasting our time and told ‘em to visit the zoo till they knew what a real wild animal looked like…”

The rest of the evening passes with O’Leary, who is a man who can turn a tale, keeping Castle in stitches while Castle keeps O’Leary in beer. Castle wavers notably on exit as a result of the beer he has consumed. O’Leary is approximately as wavery as the mountain he resembles. They part the best of friends.

“We should do this again,” O’Leary rumbles. “Bring Beckett with you next time.” He squirms a little, which doesn’t appear to come naturally and could probably cause a small tsunami. “But…”

“But let’s not tell her that you told me all about how you arrested her?” Because that would go down so well.

“Yeah. Don’t think she’d like that.”

“No. I don’t think she would either.” Castle returns to the main point. “But yeah, let’s do it again. With Beckett.”

“One last thing, Castle.”

“Huh?” That had sounded a touch more ominous than he’d like from a man who has eight inches and likely fifty, sixty pounds of muscle on him.

“She’s still my pal. ‘Kay?” In other words, Castle, O’Leary will not be a happy giant bunny if Beckett gets hurt.

“Yep.” But since Castle is not a coward and not susceptible to intimidation even when it arrives in oil-tanker sized containers, he doesn’t leave it there. “But she’s my girlfriend. ‘Kay?” In other words, O’Leary, Castle will not be a happy smaller bunny if O’Leary interferes in their sort-of-if-you-squint romance.

Honour is satisfied, and they bump fists and go their separate ways.

Castle consults his phone and finds no missed calls, no messages, and nothing to indicate whether Beckett is okay or not. He ponders over whether to text her for the whole of the cab ride home: neither wanting to appear to push her into talking through what she may well take as unwarranted interference, nor wanting her to think he doesn’t care. In the end he decides not to. Anything else would be claustrophobic, or worse, come across as vaguely parental monitoring. Not a good plan.

Beckett hadn’t had to wait for long before seeing the therapist, which was perhaps fortunate. Even in the short period of delay, she could feel the weight of her history burdening her shoulders.

The session had hurt, even though she’d barely got past the basics. My father is an alcoholic. When? How long? Have you had therapy before? The shrink had taken a history. It had all been very sympathetic. Very gentle. A short introductory session. He’d been calm, and formal: a little pedantic in his speech. He hadn’t gone near any sensitive areas. And even though they hadn’t even begun to start on the real story, it had sent her right back to being that scared nineteen year-old, watching her father collapse and drown in the bottle. She’d only just held back her tears, but she’s sure the therapist, Dr Burke, had seen the strain. A half-hour later, the whole dreadful timeline established, she re-emerges and returns home as quickly as is possible. That… had not been fun. And she will have to do it all again, twice weekly for now, till she’s fixed. It’s not the way she’d planned to spend this Friday night, that’s for sure.

Only you can save yourself. But why does it have to hurt so?

She preserves her countenance until she’s inside her door, and then, white and exhausted, stands under the hottest shower she can bear until she thinks that she might finally be warm again. She can’t be bothered to eat, or watch TV. She’s utterly drained. She huddles into her bed with an undemanding book, her thick towelling robe swathed around her shoulders but still not keeping her wholly warm, and is obscurely comforted by the faint remaining scent of Castle’s cologne on the pillows.

When she tries to sleep, it’s with the most clearly scented pillow under her cheek, and another clutched in her grasp. It’s not precisely effective, but it’s more comforting than anything else she might do. She hadn’t even said anything… difficult. Hadn’t been asked anything difficult. And therefore it is utterly ridiculous that she’s still on the verge of tears three hours later and chilled to her core despite the scalding shower, thick robe, and thick comforter. She can’t bear to see anyone, or talk to anyone: not even Castle. She’s glad that she hadn’t mentioned this, because the thought of having to explain or talk or do anything, even sit with him and be hugged, is one thing too many in her overstressed state. She can’t even cope with that non-burden, let alone any hint of a silent expectation that she might talk.

She packs the pillows more closely around her and finally finds a fractured, unrefreshing sleep from which she wakes too early, pursued by the nightmare vision of her father perching parasitically on her shoulder, hearing every word of her therapy sessions, swigging from a bottle as he does.

It takes another scalding shower to chase that horror away, and all the way through her morning routine she has the uncomfortable, nagging sense that she ought to call her father. She doesn’t want to. But… it would reassure him. She could tell him that Castle came to dinner, which would make him happy.

She tries not to think the phrase keep him off my back.

Beckett can’t call her father at this hour. Far too early. She’ll simply go to work, collect some nice coffee and a pastry on the way, and get started on the day. Especially as Esposito’s insisting on a gym workout at lunchtime. Actually, that’s likely not such a bad idea. Punch her frustrations and tension out on the bag, and then do a bruising round or three of sparring with Espo, where she won’t need to hold back. Violence may not be the answer to most things, but it’s looking like a damn good answer to her stress.
As she leaves her building, Beckett notices that the sidewalks are largely clear of any snow. It occurs to her that she could start running again, without risking breaking a leg. That would help, too. That would help a lot. She chides herself mildly for failing to realise yesterday about the improvement in the weather, and then thinks with less mild chiding that she could have soothed herself somewhat by indulging in an hour’s worth of complex yoga forms last night, followed by a hot bath containing relaxing lotions and potions.

Right. That’s her plan for tonight. Running or yoga, followed by a lovely long, hot bath. She nods firmly and strides to her cruiser. Shortly, she is at the precinct with coffee and pastry in hand.

Straighten up and fly right, Kate. You can get through this, too. And she doesn’t mean the cold case file that she’s pulling towards her in the grey early light skulking through the grimy bullpen windows. She can get through this. She can, and she need never, ever, mention it to her father ever at all. Never, ever mention any of it. She buries her head in the file and buries her nightmares under the case.
Can you bob, can you weave

She has a perfectly peaceful hour in the perfectly quiet bullpen, right up until Montgomery saunters in with a smug smirk – clearly they’re top of the stats again – notices her lurking behind her desk, and stops smirking very abruptly. Then he acquires a rather dangerously I’m-in-charge-here smile – at least, his teeth are showing, so it must be a smile.

“Ah, Detective Beckett,” he says smoothly. “Just the person I wanted to see.”

It had been a good day. Mostly. Now it certainly isn’t.

“Come into my office, so that you can brief me.”

“Sir,” she says resignedly, and stands to follow him.

“Now, Beckett,” Montgomery says, once they are behind the closed door of his office. “You reported yesterday that you had an appointment booked with a therapist last night.”

“Sir.”

“I have no intention of asking about it.” Montgomery notes the sag of relief, swiftly followed by the return to parade rest. “Ease down, Beckett. In fact, sit down.” She does. There is more than a hint of collapse about it. “However, I told you to provide me with your plan for dealing with this situation. So, Detective, report.”

Beckett grits her teeth, stiffens her spine, and begins.

“Twice weekly therapy sessions. Sir. Until the therapist is happy that we’re done.”

“Okay. I expect you to attend every one, whether or not you have a new case. I assume you are scheduling them out of working hours, so that should be no problem.” He pauses. “How is your dad?”

“My dad is fine. This won’t affect my work, sir.” Loud on the air is don’t bench me again.

Montgomery considers, briefly. “Okay, Beckett. But I’m adding a stipulation to that. You don’t do anything more to assist Mrs Berowitz – or Mr Berowitz.”

“But sir, my dad is” – she scrabbles to find an appropriate word, without success – “helping Mrs and Mr Berowitz.”

Montgomery is, yet again, blindsided. “What? Whose idea was that?”

Beckett looks around for some source of inspiration that doesn’t involve the word Castle, and fails to find it.

“Castle, and Dad.”

“O-kay,” says Montgomery, weakly. It’s by no means assent to the position. “Okay,” he says more briskly. “You don’t do anything more with the Berowitzes than listen to your Dad. No searching round Manhattan to find him, no liaison with other precincts so they find him for you. No meeting up with them if your Dad doesn’t ask you to go with him – and no sneaking round so you get him to ask you. You need to step back from all this. If there are cases involving alcohol abuse, you will recuse yourself from them. There are plenty of other homicides for you to take.” He stops.
Beckett’s looking fairly white and miserable. “At this time, I won’t mention this to your team or to Castle. It’s up to you if you do. You will keep Castle as your unofficial partner, though.” He doesn’t say because he’ll keep you out of trouble. “At the first hint that you’re not obeying orders, though, that will change. If you can’t stick to this, you’ll be benched till you can, unpaid, and your record will reflect why. Neither of us want that.”

He peers at her again, and drops the Captain. “Beckett, you’re still the best detective I’ve got. I want you to stay that way. You have to work with me on this, or you’ll burn out. That won’t help anyone at all.” He returns to brisk command. “So that’s settled. Dismissed, Detective.”

Beckett trails gloomily out of the Captain’s office and back to her desk, then changes her mind and trails gloomily to the break room where the construction of an extremely large mug of coffee does not lift the gloom by any noticeable margin. At least now there will be a target face on the punch bag. Several, in fact. Everybody, she decides. Absolutely everybody. She trails gloomily back to her desk again and picks up the case file. Gloomily.

Her mood is marginally improved when Ryan doesn’t start getting on her case again. It improves a little further when Esposito merely reminds her that he’s going to kick her ass on the sparring mat at lunchtime, and therefore absolutely no-one is pitying her or treating her differently or trying to talk about it. Now, if she can only manage to speak to her father and keep clear of Montgomery, everything will be okay.

When Castle wanders in, later, he’s oddly pale and shaky. However, since he’s also brandishing coffees for both of them, she’s not inclined to question him. (Besides which, if she asks him anything he might ask her something. Not desirable. Not now. Not yet.)

Castle notices that Beckett is pallid under her make-up, and she’s exuding a kind of miserable irritation, undoubtedly enhanced by her lack of sleep. He’s certain that she didn’t sleep well, and he’s equally certain that it’s all down to her having had a therapy session. His general idea that he shouldn’t ask, but should quietly find out and then magically appear – hey presto! – at her door at approximately the point she finishes a session and gets home, solidifies. Now, yesterday she’d gone at the end of shift, so she’d said, so that’s around six, so say an hour, and then half an hour to get home, that’s seven-thirty… okay, eightish is about right. So all (all?) he has to do is work out when she’s going.

But for now, he’d far rather soothe his hangover with coffee and have a very, very quiet morning, or what’s left of it. He sits down very gently and tries not to wince every time Beckett turns a page or taps her pen.

At lunchtime, instead of going out for food – Castle doesn’t want any food that isn’t a nice bland starch based recipe, such as, say, plain toast – the four of them trample upstairs to the gym. Espo and Beckett disappear to change, Ryan loosens his tie, and Castle plumps down on the nearest cleanish piece of floor and tries to decide if his head is sufficiently securely attached to his body to attempt to turn it. It proves possible, but painful.

He forgets about his head when Beckett reappears in a close-fitting sports tank and shorts, hair tied back. In fact, he forgets about absolutely anything and everything. She’s limber, lithe – and lethal. Gorgeous, sexy – and deadly. He hadn’t put together the potential for her to wreak havoc on unsuspecting suspects with the comments O’Leary had made about sparring. It must have been the fuzzing effect of the beer. Esposito’s ripped body is a lot less interesting. Ryan flops down beside Castle and metaphorically offers him the popcorn.

“This should be good,” Ryan notes idly. “Beckett needs a workout.”
For the first while, it's interesting, if you're into the technicalities of punching and kicking a bag. Sure, the speed and only marginally controlled venom is impressive – and terrifying – but it doesn’t really tell Castle anything, though it’s all grist to his writer’s mill. He does pick up, after a bit, that Espo is exerting some effort to hold the bag, and concludes that Beckett packs a punch.

Beckett and Espo take a brief break, tip down some water over on the other side of the gym, and have a discussion which involves low but forceful tones, quite a number of evocative gestures, and finally, on Beckett’s “No, Espo. No holding back,” a gesture of resignation on Espo’s part and some satisfaction on Beckett’s. They put out the mats in the empty space in the middle of the gym in a well-practiced fashion, and begin.

Now this is interesting. Fascinating. He can’t take his eyes off it – not least because if he so much as thinks about blinking he will miss something crucial. It’s fast, focused – and certainly on Beckett’s part, furious. She’s going for broke: ramming in hard strikes and breath-stealing kicks; but somehow Espo’s never quite where they would really hurt him. Espo’s playing defence: putting out hits of his own, but mostly allowing Beckett to vent all her stress and frustration out there on the mat. Castle watches in sheer admiration of Espo’s skill and courage, because he is damn sure he wouldn’t want to be sparring with Beckett in this mood. He can see why she spars with O’Leary occasionally, too.

“Espo,” Beckett snaps, “I thought I said no holding back?”

“Have it your way, then. Don’t blame me if you ache later.”

“My problem. I need a workout, not a game of pat-a-cake.”

Castle doesn’t follow what happens after that. It’s a blinding whirl of flying fists and feet and hard cracks and harder falls. Mostly, it’s Beckett falling, though somewhere she’s learned how; but Espo hits the mat a couple of times. Finally, she taps out.

“Okay, I’m done.”

Espo pulls her up to sitting, and she drops her head on to her knees and breathes hard. He hands her the water-bottle, and she drains it: sweat running down between her scapulae, sweat dripping on her face, her complexion now red, beginning to fade down back to her normal tones at the edges. She scrubs an arm over her face and flops back to lie on the mat, exhausted but smiling.

“That’s better,” she says. “Needed that.”

“Shoulda done it when I first said, Beckett. It ain’t good for you to get outta condition. You’re slow.”

Slow? That was slow? Castle looks at Ryan.

“Yeah,” Ryan whispers. “When she’s with it, Espo goes down a bit more often. He still wins, though. He doesn’t give her concessions – she’d not like that. He’s been holding back a little today, because she’s been sick, an’ because she hasn’t been in the gym for weeks.”

Castle looks back at Beckett, who is slowly standing up to go through a series of warm-down stretches, wincing slightly already.

“Yeah, yeah, Espo. I know.” She finishes her set of exercises by touching her toes and then stretching right the way up from tiptoes to fingertips. “Okay, I’ll be down when I’m cleaned up. I need some lunch after that match.” She disappears in the direction of the showers.

Castle heaves himself up, carefully not wobbling his head, and leans on the wall.
“Not coming downstairs?” Ryan asks from the doorway.

“Waiting for Beckett. Least I can do is buy lunch in return for the entertainment. I’ve never seen anything like it.”

“Fun, isn’t it,” Ryan says happily. “I don’t do that. Sparring, sure, but not like that.”

“I prefer the endurance machines and weights. Rowing’s good. I don’t really spar. I need my hands working. I can’t write with no functional fingers.”

“If you change your mind, let us know,” Espo says on the way to his own clean-up. “We’ll be happy to teach you. Never know when you might need it.”

When they all spill down the stairs, none of them notice Montgomery observing from his office, nor his satisfied smirk. That’s a step closer to normal. He’ll pretend he hasn’t seen them sneaking off for lunch – huh? Ryan and Esposito pulling out sandwiches? What’s that all about? Montgomery shifts a few behavioural calculations through his man-management filters and comes to the rapid and entirely correct conclusion that Ryan and Esposito approve of Castle sweeping Beckett out to lunch without them to play lemons. Hm. That reassures him enormously.

Castle ushers Beckett into the elevator and simply says “Remy’s.”

“Okay. I’m starving.”

The booth at Remy’s is cool and quiet, which is good for Castle. He orders the largest soda available, and adds a very small, totally unadorned burger with a very small salad. Beckett orders a middle-sized milkshake and a middle-sized burger with lots of extras and fries. Castle tries not to look at it. Not looking at it isn’t actually too difficult. One moment it’s there, the next Beckett is delicately wiping her mouth and her plate is scraped clean. It’s amazing. He forces his own food down, and finds that he feels a lot better, after the first uncomfortable moment when the burger hits his stomach.

“Better?” they say in tandem, and both look a little surprised.

“Fine,” Beckett says, and flexes her shoulders carefully to make sure.

“Me too.”

“You sure you’re not coming down with something? You’ve been a bit white all morning. If you’ve got flu, go home. We don’t want your germs.” But she’s grinning, and there might even be an undertone of affection there.

“You wouldn’t mop my fevered brow?”

“Nope. I don’t want the flu.”

Castle pouts, and gives her huge, pathetic, puppy-dog eyes. “Really?”

“Nope.” She smiles evilly. “I’ll send Espo round instead.”

Castle cringes theatrically and retreats into his soda. Beckett drains the last dregs of milkshake. “Time to get back.” She stands up, winces, and stretches from top to toes, cautiously. “Ow,” she says. “I’m out of practice.”

“I could give you a massage,” Castle leers. “Smooth out all those sore points.”

Beckett makes an unappreciative noise and precedes him to the door. Clearly that’s going to be ignored. He tucks the thought away for later – if she’s wincing now, she’ll be really sore by the evening – and follows.

Back in the bullpen, Beckett gazes morosely at the cold cases pile, and then remembers that she was going to call her father. She thinks about that for a while. It’s the middle of the working day, and he’s undoubtedly busy. Not a good idea. Not… normal. He’ll think that there is something wrong, which is a consummation decidedly not to be wished. He’s suspicious enough already. It can wait till the end of the day. Yes. She’ll leave at shift end, and call then, once she’s home.

It nags at her all afternoon: the knowledge that she’ll have to field some undoubtedly difficult questions. She’s not spoken to him since Monday, and this is Thursday already, and he’ll be expecting her to come for dinner on Sunday as usual, because she said she would, and she doesn’t want to go, not that this is entirely new, and…and…and. So many ands, but only one Kate. She sighs. Castle looks over at her from his file. She avoids his glance, and so the afternoon passes.

Case files packed up, computer off, coat on – all consequent upon Montgomery’s piercing stare and clear implication that she should be gone already – Beckett departs the precinct trailed by Castle, who doesn’t seem inclined to let her be.

“When I get home,” she says casually, “I’m going to go out running. Stretch out the kinks.”

“I could help you with your kinks,” he says suggestively, just as Beckett had hoped.

“Maybe a bit later. I’ll call you if I need you, okay?”

“Sure. Always up for some kink-removal.”

“I’m sure you can get an app for that,” Beckett says very dryly, “or possibly therapy.”

Castle snickers, and departs. As soon as he’s out of sight, Beckett lets her shoulders slump, emits the deep sigh she’s been repressing for some time, winces at the bruises she knows she’ll have from hitting the mat as often as she did, and betakes herself home to have another hot shower. After either a run, which is not looking astoundingly attractive on a gloomy, dank February evening, or her yoga, which has the benefit of being in her nice cosy apartment and close to her nice cosy bed, she’ll have the hot bath full of lotions and potions that she’d promised herself last night.

But first, she needs to call her father.

She puts it off till after her shower, justifying it by reasoning that if she draws too sharp a breath – her ribs hurt where she didn’t fall right, and she knows there will be bruises splashed across her skin tomorrow, but if it shows the boys that everything’s fine she’ll take that – her father might notice and worry that she’s been injured in the line of duty, and then she’ll need to explain. Explaining is a complication that it would be better to avoid.

She soothes herself under the jets of the shower, bundles her hair in a towel and her moisturised self in a robe, and then slowly combs out the shortish locks, not bothering with a hairdryer. When it’s tucked back into a handy scrunchie, and she’s put on a t-shirt and shorts, she reluctantly picks up her phone.

“Hi, Dad,” she says brightly.

“Katie? I didn’t expect you to call.”

“Just catching up. What have you been doing?”
Jim produces a few sentences about work, new clients, and anti-trust law. “What about you, Katie?”

“Castle came for dinner Tuesday night.” It’s a distraction, though given her father’s clear approval of Castle she thinks that it’ll work nicely to convince him everything’s fine.

“That’s nice. You’re seeing a lot of him, suddenly.”

“He’s shadowing us. Of course I see a lot of him.”

“Anything you want to tell me, Katie? After Monday? That sounded like he’s been seeing a lot of you.” Humour dances in his words.

“Dad!” Maybe that wasn’t such a good distraction after all. She doesn’t need her Dad (ugh) making insinuations.

“Well, if you don’t want to talk about Castle, how about telling me how you are?” Oh God. Stop worrying, Dad. I don’t want to talk about this. Ever. She can’t upset him. She just needs to work it through with the therapist and deal with it later. If ever. Maybe there’s a way to deal with it without ever letting on to her dad. Dr Burke will know.

“I’m fine, Dad. Everything’s good. I could do with some more interesting work: all we’ve got are cold cases. It’s not like I want anyone murdered,” she says lightly, “but it’s all a bit boring.”

“You didn’t sound fine on Sunday or Monday. Are you sure you’re okay?”

“Yes. I had a bit of a stomach upset Monday. It must have been that making me tetchy on Sunday, too. I’m fine now.”

On the other end of the call, Jim’s face has the same expression as if he’d bitten a lemon. Castle, had he been there, would have recognised the expression instantly as the same one Beckett uses when she’s trying to think through the best way to break a recalcitrant witness. He is dead sure Katie is lying to him, but he can’t force the issue down the phone. He needs to see her, to be able to call her out on it. She’d never backed down easily, even as a child. If he could see her, he’d know which bit of her statement was a lie. And he can’t go into the rest of the conversation he wants to have on the phone at any stage. Tetchy his ass.

“Glad to hear it. You take care of yourself, Katie. A bit more healthy eating and a bit less takeout or food trucks, if you’re not busy.”

“Yes, Dad,” Beckett says with mock attitude.

“You listen to your dad, now. I’m still your dad and I still have nagging rights.”

“I’ll buy you a magnet for your fridge that says that, if you don’t stop it.”

Jim laughs, which Beckett hears with considerable relief. She’s got away with it.

“Okay, Katie. But you take care, you hear?”

“Stop fretting, Dad. I’m fine. No need to worry.”

“I’m your dad. It’s part of the job description.” It’s just as well that’s humorous. She really doesn’t need that sort of statement. One more reason to get fixed. “So I’ll see you Sunday, then?”

“Yep. Looking forward to it – but only if you get another Fairway tart.”
“Cupboard love?”

“Night, Katie.”

Phew. Done. Another disaster averted.
You're my best friend

Beckett bends herself into another simple asana on her mat and hisses as her muscles stretch out. Maybe it hadn’t been such a bright idea to take on Espo at full force. Still, she does feel better for it, even if she aches. She holds the posture for a slow count of ten, glances at the clock, and notes that she’s spent over half an hour doing yoga. That’s enough. She’ll stop there, and draw herself a lovely hot, scented bath. Mmmmm.

Her lovely hot, scented bath is delightful, for all of five minutes. After that, she starts to worry about the remarkable lack of contact since Monday from Lanie, who is not normally backwards in coming forwards; Sunday’s impending dinner of doom; and therapy generally and tomorrow in particular. Her relatively contented mood cools with the bathwater, and when she steps out to wrap herself in a very large and fluffy bath sheet, although her body is soothed and peaceful (tomorrow might be different) her mind is roiling.

Naturally, that’s when her phone rings.

“Beckett.”

“Kate, it’s me.”

There is a short silence. She shouldn’t even have thought about Lanie. Like some evil telepathic connection from a schlock-horror story, it’s brought Lanie’s not-so-dulcet tones right to her ear.

“Yes?” she says calmly. She is really not in the mood for Lanie’s efforts at psychiatry. The real thing is quite enough. She doesn’t need cheap imitations. Irritation is already growing from her generally unhappy state. Beckett rams it down. “What do you want, Lanie?” She just about manages cordiality.

“I wanna see you, seeing as our Friday night was interrupted. Thought you might want to go out this Friday?”

“Sorry, I’m busy already. Maybe another day?” Maybe therapy has a single, solitary advantage after all. A ready-made excuse to avoid Lanie in inquisitorial mode. Still, she’s trying to be nice. She doesn’t want to, though. Lanie’s words and the bitter sting they had brought have definitely not faded, and Lanie’s actions of Monday morning and her attempt to open matters up in front of Beckett’s team hadn’t exactly improved their relationship. She would have thought that a doctor would understand confidentiality. She would certainly have expected it from her friend.

“I wanna talk to you.” Lanie sounds just as determined and annoyed as she had on Monday. “You didn’t call me so here I am calling you.”

Beckett knew it. She couldn’t catch a break in a bucket, could she? “Yeah, well, I’m sorry, but like I said, I’m busy Friday. Another time. When’re you around?”

“Busy? Really?” Lanie’s disbelief is patent. “Like you’ve been busy all the time already? I wanna talk to you, face to face, like friends do. You need to talk to someone.”

Beckett wasn’t aware that friends used terms such as you are fucked right up. “Oh? Like you talked on Friday and Monday? If that’s what you want, no, thank you. You made your point, and I don’t want to hear it again. I’ll see you at work.”

“Kate, you need to listen” – And that just does it. Beckett doesn’t even try to stop her loss of temper.

“No, I don’t need to listen to you. I don’t need you trying your half-assed analysis on me and I don’t need your half-assed judgements either. Save them for your corpses and your friends. I’ll see you when you’re next assigned to one of my cases, when we can both forget any of this ever happened.”

Click.

Beckett throws her phone at the couch and wishes it was at Lanie’s head. Any last traces of content have vanished. She pulls on sweats, yanks out her iPod, sets it to the heaviest bass beat rock she can find, grabs her abused phone and exits her apartment before she starts breaking things. Pounding the streets is a less expensive pastime than pounding plates into the floor.

Some way across town Lanie stares at her phone, considers the words save it for your friends and wonders just when Kate had decided to give up on ten years of friendship. She’d been there for her in NYU, and since. Surely she’s earned the right to tell Kate the truth without her blowing up like that? It’s not as if they haven’t had some pretty direct conversations before.

It doesn’t occur to Lanie that Kate might no longer have been in a place to listen to truth put as bluntly as Lanie had, it certainly doesn’t occur to her that Kate is now firmly of the opinion that Lanie has judged her and found her wanting, and still less does it occur to her that Kate might think that Lanie’s the one who’s dropped the friendship.

Now in a very much less than pleasant mood, Lanie considers Kate’s behaviour and remembers that she had been going to have a detailed conversation with Castle, who is undoubtedly mixed up in this mess. Kate is not getting away with tossing their friendship in the trash like she just tried to. No way, sister. At least, not before Lanie’s put her side of the story. Kate never used to behave like this, and it’s all started since just before Christmas. It somehow doesn’t seem co-incidental. Secure in her conviction that she’s doing the right thing for Kate, Lanie dials Castle.

“Rick Castle,” slides smoothly from the phone.

“Castle, it’s Lanie.”

“Hey, Lanie. New body? It’s usually Beckett who calls.”

“No, I wanna talk to you.”

There’s a surprised, and suspicious, silence.

“Really?” Castle asks, not precisely receptively. “Why?”

“Because Kate told me what she said to you but somehow you’re still around, so that means you know why Kate’s done her best to shove you out.”

“And?”

“And you might just be the only person on the whole damn East Coast who’s managed to change her mind about anything. So what’s going on? Why’s Kate shoving everyone away now?”

Castle doesn’t feel shoved away, as it happens, but he’s not discussing that with Lanie. “You’re her friend. Why aren’t you talking to her?” He manages not to put any inflection on that. Inside, he wants to shout why the hell are you all asking me and not speaking to her?
“She won’t talk to me. I called up to invite her out tomorrow and she simply said she was busy. I don’t believe her. She’s found an excuse every time for a fortnight. So what’s up with her?”

Castle is not having this. Nor is he having cosy confidential chats with Lanie. He goes on the offensive.

“What’s up with you?” There’s a strangled noise down the phone. “You’re the one who had lunch with her Monday last, and then you were pissed with her Monday night. You’re the one who was trying to make something of it in the morgue on Wednesday. You’re the one who was complaining Friday when she got called away from your girls’ night. You’re the one who was leaning over telling her off on Monday morning in the middle of the bullpen. So what’s up with you, because from where I’m standing it looks like you’ve shown her you don’t want to play nice, not the other way round.”

Lanie gibbers and gobbles and fails utterly to find any coherent speech or thought in the face of this unexpected attack. Castle waits, and says nothing more for a moment, until it becomes blatantly obvious that Lanie isn’t able to say anything.

“What did you say to Beckett on Friday night, Lanie?” Castle asks coolly. There is more silence. “Look, I know you said a lot. I know you told her she needed help. What exactly did you say?”

“That’s between her and me.”

“But it’s okay for you to try and get me to tell you what’s private between her and me? Double standards, Lanie.”

An infuriated growl emanates from the phone. “You’ve been around ten minutes. I’ve been her friend for ten years. Don’t you guilt me.”

“Doesn’t sound like you’re very good friends right now,” he says with no small degree of malice.

Lanie loses her temper, just as Castle had hoped. Lanie’s filters aren’t great when she’s angry, and she is certainly very, very angry right now. “You arrogant asshole, I just want Kate to get back to normal. She’s all fucked up and she needs help to fix her life.”

“So that’s what you said to her?”

“Sure I did,” Lanie yells at him. “Someone had to tell her! You think I was going to let my best friend keep killing herself without trying to help? She wasn’t listening to anything else I said. She spilled for a whole half hour Monday last and then she ran off and hasn’t said three useful words since. What do you do for your friends?”

Castle is silenced in his turn – but not for long. “I don’t push them further under the surface just because I think I know best.”

“Yeah? Who d’you think you’re kidding? You’re the one who started all this off.”

Castle loses his own temper. “Think what you like. I’m not getting in between you and Beckett. You two screwed it up, you two fix it. Bye.”

Click.

Lanie stares at her phone and then indulges herself in what would, were she still three, be described as a screaming tantrum. She’s been cut off by first Kate and then Castle and she hasn’t learned a damn thing that would help. Well, she is not fucking having it. Kate Beckett is going to listen to her. She needs help and Lanie Parrish is damned well going to make sure she gets it. She doesn’t stop swearing for some time, and after that she spends some high-quality time planning painful and complete revenge on Castle and everything up to committal for Kate. It doesn’t soothe her temper in the slightest.

Beckett, having run for some distance, is marginally calmer. Or doesn’t have breath under which to continue swearing, more like. The further she runs, the more anger is squeezed sluggishly out of her, and the calmer she gets. After a mile or three, she’s almost back to normal.

She stops to stretch a little, and realises that she’s reached Spring Street subway station and beginning to creak where she’d hit the mats earlier. At that point she also realises that she didn’t bring her wallet. She turns the air blue around her, and is fortunate that nobody takes offence. Still. She growls viciously under her breath. Then she has a thought. She has her phone. She is only five minutes’ run from Castle’s loft, and there is a good coffee bar between there and here. (She knows every good coffee bar on Manhattan. She could answer quiz questions on them.) She could call him, he would lend her the subway fare, and she could get home easily. She dials.

“Beckett?” he answers.

“Yes, it’s me.”

“What can I do for you this fine February evening?”

That’s a little odd. He sounds marginally stressed.

“Are you okay?”

“Yeah, sure. I wasn’t expecting you to call this late.”

“It’s only – oh. Sorry. I didn’t realise it was nearly ten.”

“So what would you like? Bedtime stories? A different style of coffee in the morning? Some de-kinking? My wish is your command.”

“Isn’t that your wish is my command?”

“Well, we could talk about my wishes if that’s what you want.”

Beckett groans, and then remembers she wants a favour.

“Castle,” she stutters slightly, “I need your help.”

“Sure. Anything.” He sounds surprised – and sincere.

“I’m at Spring Street subway, and I forgot to bring my wallet out.” She forestalls the question. “I was running. Can you meet me at the Cupping Room Café on West Broadway, and lend me enough to get me home?”

“That’s disappointingly simple, but okay. I’ll be about ten minutes.”

Beckett breathes a very audible sigh of relief. “Thanks. See you there.” She picks up her feet and keeps running. Standing around even for those few moments had chilled her.

Castle looks rather blankly at his phone and wonders how normally sensible, (except where alcohol and her father are concerned) safety-conscious Beckett managed to land up down this end of town without a wallet. It seems unusually stupid, which is not an adjective he normally associates with her. Still, since no-one else is in tonight: Alexis staying at a friend’s to study and his mother God-knows-where, there’s no problem about going out. There will also be no problem about driving Beckett home. She won’t – undoubtedly won’t – come into the loft, and he’s not even going to ask her, but she won’t have to. He bounces out happily, without forgetting his wallet, keys, or coat.
She’s actually asked him to help fix a problem.

When he reaches the café Beckett is tucked into – or, given that it’s February and technically still winter, has fought her way into – a corner by an old-fashioned iron stove. She looks very cold and very cross. Neither surprises Castle, who manoeuvres himself between the tables towards her, unwraps his scarf, and announces his presence by snuggling it round Beckett’s neck and then compounding his mischief by kissing the top of her head.

“Hey,” he says, superfluously. “Want a coffee?”

Beckett looks a little uncertain, and then shivers. “Something hot, please. Really hot.”

“Hot chocolate. You look really chilled. Come here.” He sits beside her instead of opposite and tucks her in. “How far did you run?”

“From home.”

Castle gapes. “Why?” He stops. “Actually, never mind why for a moment while we get hot chocolate. They have white hot chocolate too, if you like it. I do. They’ll even put cream on it if you want – do you? Whipped cream? Nothing succeeds like excess, Beckett.”

“Please.”

Castle orders rapidly and then returns to tucking Beckett in and keeping her warm. “What is this, Iron Man training? You were sparring with Espo all lunchtime, and you’re out running this evening” – his hand skates over her back – “and I deduce from the tank top that you were stretching through your yoga forms earlier.” Beckett wriggles as his hand slides more seductively down her spine. His deduction is right, but for entirely the wrong reason. However, that’s going to be a pretty pointless discussion.

“What was up with you?” she asks, as an alternative to answering.

“Me? Nothing’s up with me.”

Beckett fixes him with a piercing glare. “Something was.”

“And something was or is up with you. I won’t share if you don’t. That wouldn’t be fair.”

“What is this, kindergarten?”

“Fair’s fair.” He pouts. Under the pout is some suspicion of Beckett’s motive for both running and forgetting her wallet. The motive has a distinctively Dr Lanie Parrish induced loss of temper feel about it. He can surely sympathise with that.

The hot chocolate arrives, and Beckett dives in. This is deeply unfortunate. The last thing Castle needed with Beckett curled into his arm as if she belonged there (but she does) was the tip of her pink tongue protruding from her lips and delicately lapping the cream from the edge of her mug. It’s bringing back some very, very pleasurable memories of Kat. He retaliates in kind. Purely in self-defence, of course. Well. Impurely in self-defence. His arm tightens around her until she’s squished against him in a very pleasing fashion and not going anywhere at all. Not that she’s trying. She’s wriggling very slightly to snuggle in. She’s still wearing his scarf, too.

“That’s good,” she murmurs.

“You need to warm up. Hot chocolate is the best, especially with cream.” He grins wolfishly. “I like cream.”

“I’ll buy you a Jersey cow. You could call it Clarabelle, like the cartoon.” Her eyes glint warningly.

“Or not. I don’t think there’s room in the loft for a cow. Even if I managed to evict Mother, I don’t think cows can climb stairs and I don’t think Clarabelle would fit in the elevator.” He pauses, and smirks wickedly. “And I wouldn’t want to upset Horace or Goofy.”

Beckett splutters. Castle removes the hot chocolate to safety and pats her on the back till she stops.

“No, Castle. I’m sure you wouldn’t. For all I know they’re your best friends.”

Castle acquires an entirely evil expression. “Espo and Ryan are my friends,” he says slowly.

“Surely, Detective Beckett, you aren’t accusing your own team of being a horse and a dog of limited intelligence?” She turns purple and starts to splutter again. “I wonder what they’d think of that?”

“You know perfectly well that’s rubbish,” Beckett squawk-stutters (squutters? Castle wonders unhelpfully) indignantly. “You’re just being annoying.”

Castle looks saintly. “It’s cheered you up, though. You’re all nice and warm now, aren’t you? Even if it is hot temper.”

“I was never hot-tempered till you muscled in on my life,” Beckett grumps.

Castle considers telling her that he knows that’s simply not true, and then decides that bringing Jim into this discussion is not going to improve the evening in any way at all. He changes tack.

“So how come you forgot your wallet? That’s not like you.”

“I was…” Beckett starts, and then stops. “Snap decision.”

Castle raises a rather quizzically sceptical eyebrow. “That wouldn’t be” – he takes his life in his hands – “the snap of Lanie Parrish, hm?”

Beckett regards him beadily. “Now, why would you think that?” Realisation dawns across her face. “Could it be because that’s the reason you sounded stressed too? Lanie’s been calling you, hasn’t she?”

“She tried. Probably as soon as she’d finished calling you. If she was as bull-headed as she tried on me, why haven’t you shot her yet?”

“Because if I do shoot someone, I need an ME to help me dispose of the body.”

Castle snickers. “Anyway, yes, Lanie called me. I don’t think she loves me any more.”

“Newsflash, Castle: I don’t think she ever did.”

He pouts. “Everybody loves me. I’m adorable.”

“And conceited.”

“You’re not denying the adorable part, though.” He turns huge pathetic eyes on her. “So what did Lanie say to you?"

“Same as before. Talk to her. Like I’m going to do that when all she does is tell me what she thinks I should do.” Beckett sounds distinctly annoyed.

“Did you actually tell her you were going to start therapy?”

“No. It’s private. And since she can’t keep her mouth shut and tried to call me out in front of the team in the middle of the goddamn bullpen, I’m not telling her anything that I don’t want on the front page of the New York Times.” There’s a nasty silence, and Beckett tenses against him. “You… didn’t tell her anything, did you?”

“No. So she yelled at me too.”

Beckett relaxes against his arm. “Didn’t think you would.” She retrieves her hot chocolate and buries herself in it, emerging with a small smudge of cream on the tip of her nose. Her hand is already moving to clean it off when Castle dips his head and kisses it away instead. Her eyes flare wide. “What was that?”

“You were all messy. All over cream. So I couldn’t resist licking” –

“Shut up, Castle.”

“But” –

“Shut up.”

“You’re no fun,” he sulks. “And after I came out to save you, too.”

Beckett smirks. “Anyway. What did Lanie say to you?”

“She wanted to know what was with you. Then she started yelling when I wouldn’t tell her. Then I told her I wasn’t getting in between you and put the phone down on her.”

“Funny that,” Beckett says nastily. “I put the phone down on her too. Oh dear,” she says insincerely.

“She did say one thing though. She’s really worried about you.”

“Yeah, right. If she was that worried she’d stop yelling at me.”

Castle declines the bait. He thinks Lanie’s intentions are good. Her execution, on the other hand, is horrible.

“Okay, Beckett. Let’s get you home. C’mon.” He tugs her up and pulls her out, then tucks her back into his encircling arm and starts off towards Broome Street.
“This isn’t the way home.”

“Yes, it is. My home. Where my car is.”

“What? I thought you’d lend me the subway fare till tomorrow.”

“It’s cold, late, and you don’t have a proper coat, so I’ll drive you home.”

“But…”

“No buts, Beckett. You don’t have to come up to the loft, just as far as the garage.” He’s mildly assertive. “No-one’s home, so it doesn’t matter if I go out.”

“Oh,” she says, confused. “Okay. Thanks.”

She has to admit that being taken home in a nice cosy car in nice cosy comfort – heated seats, mmmm – is a huge improvement on the subway and the late-evening – er – personalities. It doesn’t take long before Castle is pulling up at her door.

“Thanks, Castle. Um…do you want a coffee?”

Castle blinks a couple of times. “Sure,” he says amiably, and follows Beckett to her apartment.

Inside, the yoga mat is still on the floor, there is no evidence of dinner, and Beckett’s wallet is in the middle of the table. Beckett hangs Castle’s scarf up and then disappears to put the kettle on, Castle extracts himself from his coat while she does, and then prowls after her to the kitchen.

When Beckett has finished fussing with coffee, kettles and cups, he takes the path of non-resistance to his urges, leans on the counter edge and pulls her back against him, where he can cuddle her in. And since she’s comfortably cuddled in, it’s but the work of an instant to kiss the top of her head, conveniently at a perfectly kissable height. He’s about to embark on kisses down the edge of her face, when – inconveniently – the kettle boils. This is unfair. From the tiny little noise she’s just made, Beckett may very well think so too.

“Coffee or kisses?” he says provocatively. “Coffee with kisses? Coffee then kisses?”

“Coffee.” She pauses for just long enough for Castle’s face to drop. “Then kisses.” He grins, and as soon as they’re seated drops his arm round her shoulders. She snuggles in without a pause. The contrast between Castle’s lack of any questions, quarrelling, or attempts to psycho-analyse her and Lanie’s commentary is very obvious. Still… hang on a moment.

“Castle?”

“Uh?”

“Why is everyone suddenly calling you when they want to know where I’m at?”

“Uh?” Castle says articulately.

“Lanie rang you. Lanie tried to ask you in the morgue, too. You said my dad had called you. Montgomery – didn’t ask you, but I bet he thought about it. The boys probably asked you. What is going on?”
“I haven’t said anything to anyone.”

“I know that,” Beckett says exasperatedly. “If I didn’t know that you wouldn’t be here. You’d be in a pine box. That’s not the point. Why does everyone suddenly think that you’re the one to ask? I’m not invisible.”

Castle can see the oncoming disaster. Oh well. Evasion is only going to prolong the agony.

“No, but you are silent.”

“Huh?”

“They know something’s not right, they ask you, and you don’t tell them anything.”

“Yeah, so they should stop asking.”

“Yes, but actually what they do is worry, and then they start asking other people because they’re worried.”

“And how is asking you going to help anything? You’re not telling them anything either.”

Castle shrugs. Since he’d asked himself almost precisely that question when Lanie called him, he doesn’t have a good answer that won’t get him into hot—boiling—water. Saying they think I’m keeping you sane is unlikely to be well received. “No idea.” He tips her chin up. “Why are you worrying about this now?”

It’s Beckett’s turn to shrug.

“Ah,” Castle suddenly realises. “It’s not just Lanie, is it? It’s because you’ll be seeing your dad on Sunday.” Beckett humphs unhappily. “It is. Why don’t you just tell him the truth? That dealing with Mrs Berowitz dragged up old memories and it hit you a bit harder than you expected.”

“Dad is an attorney. Saying that will only lead to more questions, and more questions, and then I’ll say something he doesn’t need to hear.” She’s tightened up, and her eyes are bleak again. “I suppose I’ll get through it. Just like usual.”

Castle doesn’t say anything. He can see the catastrophe already looming, but he’s not going to insert himself into that situation without a very specific and clear invitation. Instead he smooths over Beckett’s hair and pets a little. She shifts under the caress, in a very inviting fashion.

“I’ve finished my coffee,” she purrs.

“Yes?”

“You promised me kisses,” she says seductively, and wiggles into a conveniently kissable alignment.

“You’re avoiding the issue,” he points out. Beckett abruptly stops wiggling, and glares.

“So? I don’t want to discuss it any more.”

Tell me something I don’t know, Castle thinks. “So say so.” His tone alters. “Stop suborning me with sensuality,” he murmurs. He doesn’t sound very sincere.

“Stop channelling Dolly Levi. ‘Why, Mr. Sullivan, whatever put such a preposterous” – “idea into my head – your head!” Beckett caps the quote.

Castle sniggers, and then breaks into song in an orotund baritone at an impressive volume and with absolutely no embarrassment. “Out there, there's a world outside of Yonkers; way out there beyond this hick town, Barnaby” – he pauses – “this hick town, Beckettteeeeee” – she groans – “there's a slick town, Beckettteeeeee. Out there, full of shine and full of sparkle; close your eyes and see it glisten, Beckettteeeeee; listen, Beckettteeeeee...”

Beckett gives in to temptation and comes in, in her full mezzo – not slurred, this time, and Castle raises his brows in some appreciation – to join him.

“Put on your Sunday clothes, there's lots of world out there…”

They finish on a full-throated flourish.

“You didn’t sing last time. You implied you didn’t sing. Or couldn’t.” He manufactures a semblance of offence. “You lied to me. By omission, but you still lied. That wasn’t fair.”

“Don’t sing. Not can’t sing. I don’t do performances.” She stops, and her face twists. “I took a class in Musical Theatre, at Stanford. Then I didn’t carry on, here. I couldn’t commit,” she bites out. No, she couldn’t. She realised it after the third time she had to bail at short notice, and quit. “You can’t let people down if you’re doing a show.”

“Just – never, ever mention this to Mother.”

“Huh? Why?”

“You’ll be centre stage – well, actually, downstage left so you’re not upstaging Mother – before you’ve blinked twice. Mezzo and you know lots of musical songs” –

“How’d you get to that?”

“You were singing Chess.”

“I was singing Hello Dolly, not Chess.”

“No, the other night. When you were – er…”

“Drunk,” she says flatly.

“Anyway. Chess wasn’t exactly a global 20-year extravaganza, and yet, Detective Beckett, you know the words. My mother would love it. You’d be in one of her productions in no time, like it or not.” He pauses. “On the other hand, we’d be a stunning leading lady and her charming, ruggedly handsome leading man, so…”

“No. I am not getting on any stage, anywhere, ever.”

“Okay, you can save the singing for the shower. Bathroom duets.”

“Duets? Duets? You think you’ll be sharing my shower?”

Castle smiles very slowly and rakishly and slips one finger under Beckett’s sweatshirt and on to her skin. “Frankly, my dear, I’m surprised you’re not in it already. Yoga, running… you must be really… dirty.” The twist on the final word would seduce a seraph.

Beckett peeps up from under her eyelashes, which nearly incinerates Castle’s self-control. “Really?
I’d better go wash myself clean.”

“I seem to recall promising to massage you to take all the kinks out,” Castle husks, leaning over her and slowly descending.

“But you’re complaining about my personal hygiene. I thought masseurs liked clean clients.”

“How do you know that?”

Beckett smirks knowingly, which is a remarkable achievement considering that she is generalising from a single spa day after which she had threatened her friends with cattle branding, racks and the tortures of the damned if they ever forced her on one of those ever again. Castle growls in a very satisfying, sexy fashion. This is all so much nicer than the thought of therapy or her father or Lanie. Or spa days, for that matter.

“That’s for me to know, and you not to find out.”

“I’ll weasel it out of you.”

“Hm,” says Beckett sceptically, and tries to stand up. It doesn’t seem to be working. Very shortly, it’s not working because her sweatshirt is being removed. A thick finger traces a line from neck to sternum, and carries on down to hook into the waist of her sweatpants. Then it stops for a moment, to consider. Beckett finds herself to be standing in front of Castle without actually having done anything to achieve this. The finger takes a circuit around her waist. She wriggles. A finger from the other hand joins the first. With a similar lack of any input from Beckett, the sweatpants meet the sweatshirt on the floor. Castle’s lips meet her now-bare clavicles, and then travel downwards to investigate her stomach. His tongue swirls lasciviously around her navel, draws a hot, wet line back up between her breasts without doing anything useful, and kisses her hard and possessively as he stands up.

And then he sweeps her up, carries her through to her bathroom, deposits her in the shower, and is only stopped from switching it on by Beckett’s taloned grip on his wrist and a threat of death if he does. So he undoes her bra instead, with his free hand, and then his shirt, and his belt and pants, a little awkwardly, and returns to his earlier possession of her soft, full mouth: open and receptive under his, until she’s lax against him and her hands are round his neck and he slips off her panties and then his boxers, presses her against the shower wall and then turns on the shower.

“Aaaargghhhhhhh!” he yells, rather louder than Beckett’s appalled squeak since he’s in the direct line of fire and she is largely shielded by him. It’s cold. “What the hell?” His – er – interest in proceedings has abruptly deflated. He did not need frostbite. Especially not there.

“Ah. Um. I must have used up all the hot water earlier.”

Beckett nips out of the shower with alacrity and basely leaves Castle to freeze. No doubt because the freezing water has frozen his brain, it takes him a moment to follow. By the time he does, she’s flipping a switch.

“Immersion heater. Give it a few minutes.”

Castle stalks towards her. “I’m freezing.” She runs a long, slow, glance up and down him.

“I can see that.” She sniggers as her gaze passes through halfway down, and halfway up again. “You’re blue.”

Beckett is already wrapped in an enormous fluffy towel. Castle feels this to be entirely unfair. He looks about, and fails to spot anything other than a hand towel, which will be no more use than a handkerchief. Drastic measures are clearly required.

He grabs Beckett, who is still sniggering, untucks the towel from her, wraps it round both of them, (maybe it’s a misplaced comforter, he thinks. It’s the size of a bed sheet) and smiles ferally. His interest in proceedings makes itself re-apparent.

“I guess we’ll just have to find a way to pass the time,” he rumbles in a deep, furry baritone that could heat the entire building’s water supply all on its own. He easily hoists her up and presses her against him with a firm hand on her rear. Her arms slide back round his neck, her legs twine around his waist. She essays a small wiggle and Castle groans. “Wait, Beckett. It’ll be worth it.”

“Promise?” She wiggles again. The hard weight against her feels _good_. If she only manoeuvres just a tiny little bit, it won’t be _against_ her. More… inside. She tries to move in an appropriate direction.

“Uh-uh,” he chides, “no cheating. Wait.” He forestalls complaint by kissing her again, and while she’s still trying to fight back and take possession of his mouth bends down and lays her out, stark naked, across the bed. “That’s better. Now, I promised you kisses, after coffee.” He lies down beside her, idly tracing a hand over her flat stomach, and then props himself up on an elbow to survey her lithe body, turning her over.

“Wow,” he says, concerned. “You really took some hits earlier. Don’t they hurt? How didn’t I notice?”

“Well,” she smirks, “your eyes didn’t really seem to be on my back. I’ve had a lot worse.”

Castle rolls her towards him again, cautiously. “At least your front’s okay. Though…”

“Mmmm?”

“Bruises should be kissed better.” The words are childish. The tone and expression are certainly not. He turns her over again, and drops little, delicate kisses on every bruise, as well as quite a number of places where she is fairly sure there are no bruises. She melts into the mattress, and enjoys it. Eventually, Castle has covered every inch of her back, and quite a lot of her legs, and gently flips her again.

“I guess now we’ll just have to make sure that any _potential_ bruises are kissed better.” He slips an arm under her neck. “But first…”

He falls on her mouth and takes complete, immediate and searching possession. His hands roam freely: gently forceful, asserting his right to touch and stroke, to tease and wind her up; she responds in kind and it turns hotter, wilder. She’s not paying any attention to her aches and bruises now, only to his mouth and hands, the hard thigh between hers pressing against her and demanding she open to him; her leg curling round his hip in reply. His lips slither down over her throat, and her back arches to present her breasts to best advantage. Castle doesn’t hesitate to enjoy the advantage presented. He takes one pink tip into his mouth and she twists under the delicate suction and teasing nips; then he repeats on the other side and he has to take her hands into his and hold them beside her head to stop her clawing at his shoulders.

She falls into the blowtorch blue of his hot eyes as he takes her in one smooth, powerful thrust and captures her mouth once more; moving in her as she moves around him and then he slides fingers between them and flicks over her and she shatters an eye blink ahead of him.

He rolls over and off, holding her to him so that Beckett remains firmly in his arms and spread across him, right where she belongs: together with him. She squirms into a more comfortable position, and settles peaceably, arm around his chest, head tucked into his neck.

A while later, she tries to escape. This is not the plan.

“Don’t move, Beckett. Stay here.”

“I want a shower.”

“Do you?” He smiles, sleepy and sexy. “I guess you might need some help to wash your back.”

“I can wash myself,” she says, not particularly emphatically. The invitation is obvious.

“You can, but why would you want to?” The sleepy smile is still much in evidence. “Much nicer if I do it.” Suddenly his eyes grow wide. “But only if there’s hot water.”

“There should be now.”

There is. There is hot water, and then there is hot, wet, slippery Beckett, and then there is them. And finally there is slipping into bed with Beckett, and cuddling up, and falling asleep with the best bedtime companion ever.

Castle wakes slowly with the extremely pleasant addition of a curled-in Beckett to his general morning happiness. Since she is sound asleep, and a brief glance at the clock tells him that he is a few moments ahead of the alarm, he indulges in some focused viewing of her relaxed face, so that he knows what it looks like. It’s not something he normally sees. Then he snuggles back down and simply enjoys having her there. This time, she hasn’t detached herself.

His blissful state is shattered by Beckett’s nuclear-attack-warning volume alarm, which jerks him to sitting up and sheer terror. Beckett emits a semi-groan, pulls a pillow over her ear, tries to hide under the comforter, and eventually, after a full twenty seconds of the horrible earsplitting noise, forces her eyes open.

“Ugh,” she says, hits the alarm, and flops back. The eyes droop, and are eased open. Castle mischievously improves the moment by tracing fingers over a sensitive area. Beckett squawks and is instantly fully awake. “Ugh,” she says generally to the world at large.

“Good morning,” Castle says happily.

She staggers out of bed before Castle can make any of the considerable number of better suggestions playing in his hindbrain, and aims approximately for the bathroom. He runs hands over his face, grimaces at the stubble (it might be good for his PR but it itches), and sets out to discover where his clothes might be so that he can go home, shower, shave, and clean his teeth – and thereby not be trailing Beckett into the precinct at far-too-early-o’clock in the morning and letting everyone know that there’s more than merely shadowing going on.

His clothes turn out to be in the bathroom, where they’d been – ahem – forgotten. He reluctantly dresses, spending far more time watching Beckett do her make-up – it’s a lot faster than stage make-up – than getting dressed, then watches her get dressed, which will provide him with daydreaming material all day regardless of what else happens, manages to stop her morning autopilot for long enough to kiss her very thoroughly, get his ass swatted for ruining her lip gloss, kiss her again with considerable seduction and technique (if he’s going to be uncomfortable, so is she) and the precaution of hanging on to her hands since the lip gloss will need redone anyway, and leaves just before she shoots him for delaying her. Though Castle thinks that early-morning Beckett couldn’t hit a barn door before the first gallon of coffee, whatever Esposito says about her ability when she’s fully engaged with the day.

He goes home, reasonably content with the way in which matters seem to be progressing. Beckett at least believes that he’s firmly in her camp. Something will evidently need to be done about Lanie, but that is emphatically not Castle’s problem unless invited; something will need to give between Jim and Beckett, ditto. Both of those are issues for another day. He pulls himself together, undertakes his own morning routine which, once the absence of make-up is accounted for, is surprisingly similar to Beckett’s (men should be groomed, after all), and has his first cup of coffee while pondering Beckett’s likely therapy schedule. More research is clearly required.

Coffee done, he bounces off to the precinct to see what the day might hold. When the answer turns out to be cold cases (come on, Roy, surely it’s time to let Beckett have a nice new homicide) he bounces out the precinct again, pregnant with the information that Beckett is busy this evening. Her words and tone had been entirely bland and uninformative. The tiny, acid twist to her mouth as she told him, and the small creases around her expressionless eyes, had told him everything. Therapy tonight, Beckett. Followed by some considerable provision of comfort.
Don't send me no doctor

Beckett gets through the day only by relying on immense quantities of coffee, even more candy, and a vicious, laser-concentrated focus on the cold cases. She’s now fairly certain that Montgomery is giving the team a brief break – he’s been known to do so in the past – but she’s bored rigid by it. Still, it’s Friday. She has the weekend off. She only has to get through tonight’s session.

Tonight rolls around all too soon. Funny how each individual minute took an hour, but collectively her eight-hour shift (plus the overtime before it began) took a total of five minutes. Where’s relativity theory, and in particular time distortion, when you need it? At least the boys have been normal. Normal for when they’re bored, anyway. They’ve been playing pickup basketball hoops with scrunched up paper balls. Espo is currently one hundred points ahead, which according to him translates to ten beers. Ryan is objecting to the ratio, and to the likely cost. Beckett had hit the makeshift basket five out of five times and then declined to play any more, to Ryan’s rather too obvious relief. Just as well he didn’t know it was sheer luck.

She clears her desk and decamps without ado but with depression at the thought of the hour-long session ahead. It is perhaps very lucky that she is gone fifteen minutes before Lanie arrives in search of her, exhibiting the tenacious aspect of a determined and annoyed Rottweiler on the scent of its prey.

“Where’s Kate?” she asks. Well, it’s more of a demand. The boys exchange looks.

“Hey, Lanie,” Ryan says dryly. “How are you? Nice to see you too.”

Lanie growls. “I was looking for Kate. Where is she?”

“Gone already.” The boys are not inclined to be helpful.

“Oh.” Lanie deflates, and scowls blackly at Beckett’s empty desk and chair. Unsurprisingly, the furniture does not react. “Where’d she go?”

“Dunno.” Though they had speculated wildly, and come down on going out with Castle. “Didn’t say.” Espo has a good idea. “Thought she might be meeting you.”

“But tonight.” Lanie manages not to say that’s why I’m hunting her down. She won’t come out with me. The boys look identically uninformed. Lanie sighs in frustration.

“Seein’ as you’re here,” Espo says, in a further, and potentially pleasant if Lanie gets the stick out her ass, effort to distract her from Beckett-hunting, “wanna go for a beer?”

“Might as well,” Lanie grumps.

“Don’t trip over in your hurry,” Ryan snips. “You don’t have to come.”

Lanie doesn’t reply, another thought having hit her mind. “Castle been in?”

“Not since before lunch. No new body, he’s not interested. I think he was a ghoul in a past life.”

“I think you spend too much time with him. Past lives? Get real, bro. No such thing.”

They all depart in a cloud of muttering in search of some clarifying beer, which search is considerably more successful than Lanie’s search for Beckett.
Beckett halts outside Dr Burke’s office, gathers herself, and enters. It’s no easier today than on Wednesday. It’s the same half-smiling, blonde, groomed receptionist, pulling up the details of her appointment with neatly painted hot-pink nails matching her lipstick, and pouting pleasantries to fill the silence; calm and collected behind her screen. There is no delay in which to fret further or calm down.

Dr Burke’s room is painted in a carefully chosen shade of delicately serene pale blue. He’s not behind his desk, but in an armchair in a slightly darker toning blue, opposite another matching armchair and couch. The general effect is undoubtedly intended to be soothing. Beckett would rather have walked naked into the fiery furnace in place of Daniel with Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego than walk in here. She is not soothed at all, and has the squirmingly unpleasant feeling that Dr Burke knows it.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett,” he says: formal and precise.

“Hello.”

Dr Burke pushes his glasses up his nose in a habitual gesture which he knows to appear slightly fussy. “The last session was, as you know, simply an introductory meeting, so that I could understand your history and the issue which you wish to resolve.” He pauses, expecting Detective Beckett to make some comment. She does not. He continues, without emphasis. “You provided me with permission to speak to your previous therapist, and to obtain copies of their records. I have been able to do both, prior to this meeting.” He waits again, in case his patient should make a comment on this occasion. Again, she does not. “The discussion and the review of your notes which I have conducted were helpful, to a degree.”

Dr Burke’s discernment of matters which might be helpful to him in this course of treatment had not arisen from the quality of the therapy which Detective Beckett had received. He considers that to have been mediocre, at best. No, the assistance he had acquired had been from the insight into the personality of Detective Beckett with which his conversation with the therapist had provided him. He is already inclined to describe it as complex. The previous practitioner had not, it is clear, fully appreciated the difficulties associated with treatment of an uber-alpha personality; which is used to and expects success, and is consequently highly motivated to believe that they have achieved it in all circumstances.

Even had the previous therapist appreciated that issue, it seems extremely unlikely from the quality of the notes, treatment and indeed discussion, that they had possessed the experience or strength of character to treat Detective Beckett successfully, and indeed it is already Dr Burke’s view that they had not done so. Dr Burke had, albeit with some difficulty, refrained from pointing out his professional colleague’s misconceptions concerning the speed of Detective Beckett’s apparent resolution of her issues. Such rapidity should have been a warning signal, not a matter for self-congratulation, and had the therapist taken the time to become familiar with current practice, as detailed in Dr Burke’s own ground-breaking, regularly cited, paper, they would have known that the position was by no means resolved.

“So. Let us begin, Detective Beckett, with you telling me about the precipitating event: your mother’s murder.”

Detective Beckett relates the tale. Dr Burke notices almost immediately that she is reporting it as if she were reporting to her superior officer. Her rendition is wholly factual: almost evidential, and contains no emotion whatsoever. He does not consider this a good sign. Repressed grief is very unhealthy, and frequently, he has found, is productive only of resentment. Yet Detective Beckett believes – or has said that she believes, which Dr Burke does not consider to be at all the same – that she has wholly forgiven her father. Dr Burke is wholeheartedly sceptical about this conclusion.

He steeples his fingers beneath his chin and surveys Detective Beckett. “And now, please tell me again what happened following your mother’s death.”

Again, the story is related in emotionless, factual terms.

“You underwent grief counselling at the time, and then therapy several years ago, whilst you were not in contact with your father.”

“That’s right.”

“Your father has since undergone treatment and has become, and remained, sober for a full five years.”

“Yes.”

“I see. Detective Beckett, what has prompted you to seek counselling at this juncture?” Dr Burke does not quite understand the factors which have precipitated the current need. Five years of sobriety is substantial progress. Detective Beckett has yet to mention any immediate trigger for this appointment.

There is a silence. Dr Burke detests hyperbole, but Detective Beckett’s face is deathly pale and it is clear to Dr Burke that he has already asked the critical question. He would have preferred to lead up to that more gradually, but in his experience it is unusual for the precipitating factor also to be the key question. Normally his patients are quite content to relate their ostensible reasons for attending therapy. This patient, however, is not. His professional instincts are aroused.

The silence continues. Detective Beckett appears to be upon the verge of emotional upheaval. Dr Burke waits, without breaking the silence. He has found this to be a technique which normally results in his patient becoming obliged to fill the emptiness. Strangely, it does not appear to be working in this session. He delays for a further period, until it appears that an answer is unlikely to be forthcoming in the near future. Shortly before he determines to change the direction of his enquiries, however, Detective Beckett speaks.

“I caught a case before Christmas.”

There is an accent on Christmas which does not go unnoticed by Dr Burke. He will consider that later. He makes a minor note, and attends once more to Detective Beckett.

“Young man, killed in a drive-by shooting. His father was an alcoholic. It brought back memories. His mother wanted to cling to me. So I tried to tell her where to get help, but she wasn’t listening.”

Detective Beckett’s eyes and voice are quite lacking in expression.

“I… got irritated with her. She wouldn’t help herself at all.”

“I see. Quite understandable,” Dr Burke says sympathetically.

“She wouldn’t accept that she couldn’t do anything and she’d kill herself trying. She wasn’t listening to anything we said.”

“We?”

There is another lengthy pause. We is clearly a part of this issue. The woman who could not be helped is also a part of the issue. Both are undoubtedly small, and less significant than the real triggers. However, it is a start.

“Dad and I.”

That is something of a surprise. Dr Burke allows a small tinge of that surprise to reach his face.

“Why was your father involved? I had thought you said that this was a homicide case?” He couches his question in delicately inquiring tones. It seems to him most unusual that a detective’s father would be involved in a case. He is entirely unsurprised, already, by the silence that results.

“The case was closed. But she kept ringing me for help. Her husband went missing and I had to find him. After that we asked Dad to talk to her.”

Hm. A different we. “Who was with you when you asked your father?”

“Castle.”

“Who is ‘Castle’?”

“Richard Castle. Author.”

Ah, yes. Dr Burke is aware of the celebrity author. He has never read one of his books, as he dislikes both murder mysteries and thrillers. Neither, he has found, are normally written with sufficient care or indeed intelligence to deal with the complex psychology which would usually be found to underlie the protagonists. In any event, he prefers non-fiction, and when not pleasurably engaged with the latest research in his field, is most partial to history.

“And Mr Castle’s involvement?” Really, had he known that homicides were being followed up by completely unqualified people he might have objected more strongly to his tax bill.

“Castle shadows me. Research for his next book. So he follows me around to see how a real Homicide team works.”

“But you have just said that the case was closed. Please would you explain Mr Castle’s involvement in a closed case?” This time the silence is expected. The very slight colouration of Detective Beckett’s cheeks is not. Hm. Mr Castle’s involvement is, obviously, not solely confined to homicides. Dr Burke decides not to pursue that avenue until it should become obvious that it is necessary.

“I went out to find the husband. Castle insisted on shadowing me when I went to pick him up and take him back to his wife.”

As yet Detective Beckett has not provided any clarity to Dr Burke as to Mr Castle’s involvement in her father’s discussions with the bereaved woman.

“After that” – Dr Burke detects that there has been a considerable evasion in that term of timing – “Castle suggested that since she wasn’t listening to me she might listen to Dad. Seeing as Dad is an alcoholic.”

Detective Beckett’s verb tense is very revealing. Most relatives of alcoholics who have controlled their addiction refer to it in the past tense. Detective Beckett has used the present tense. Hm. How exceedingly interesting. The broad outlines of at least one of Detective Beckett’s issues become partially clearer. Detective Beckett is not wholly convinced of her father’s sobriety. Dr Burke makes no mention of that deduction. It is not likely to be helpful at this early stage. A little more “Let me be sure that I have understood. The wife of an alcoholic, whom you had encountered on a case which you have solved, later contacted you for advice and assistance in dealing with her husband. You provided her with appropriate advice on the potential sources of assistance, did you not?” Beckett nods. “She continued to seek emotional and practical support from you, which you continued to provide, including searching out her husband when he went missing. How often did she ask you?”

“Three times.”

Dr Burke decides that the risk of upsetting Detective Beckett by probing a little more deeply is justified. “How often did you search for him?”

There is a silence which Dr Burke accurately identifies as containing guilt, pain and embarrassment.

“Twice.”

Dr Burke awaits expansion and thereby enlightenment.

“The middle time he was already safe at a precinct. She could go get him herself. She didn’t need me to.”

“How did she take this refusal?”

“She went and got him.” Dr Burke is perfectly certain that this is not the whole story. “Then she called me looking for more help.” Interestingly, Detective Beckett’s voice is beginning to show some emotion. He considers that it is irritation, rather than any fellow-feeling. “I couldn’t tell her anything more than I had, but she just kept looking for a better answer. There wasn’t a better answer. There’s never a better answer. She couldn’t save him because he didn’t want to save himself.”

“Did you say that to her?”

“No.” Detective Beckett’s tight-pinched lips indicate that there is more to that, too. Dr Burke makes another note.

“And when did your father talk to this woman? Was it before you searched for her husband the second time?”

“After.”

“Who was present?”

“It was supposed to be her and her husband, but he wasn’t there. He’d have been in a bar somewhere. She tried to lie about it. Anyway. She was there, me, Dad and Castle.” How particularly peculiar. This is really a very unusual situation.

“Dad told her what it was like for him. I...” she stops. Dr Burke observes her effort to maintain control of her face and voice with some interest. Detective Beckett had clearly found the experience to be painful. The question is, why? If her father has been sober for five years, then it should follow that he has made amends to her, and explained his actions. Detective Beckett, therefore, should not have found the repetition of his history to be as uncomfortable as it is evident that it had been. Another issue is emerging from her commentary, which is very much more complex and deep rooted. Dr Burke suspects that all is not well between Detective Beckett and her father, and further suspects that Detective Beckett is either not fully aware of this disconnect, or, more troublingly, that she is aware and is trying to deny it.

However, there is not time now to pursue that path. He will let Detective Beckett finish, and then the session will draw to a close. He has, already, much about which to think.

“Mmm?” he emits, to encourage her to continue.

“It was ridiculous. She wasn’t listening at all. It was all pointless. I went home.”

Dr Burke wonders very privately in what state and with whom, if anyone, Detective Beckett had left. It seems entirely possible that she had left alone, and in a state of some perturbation. He considers that this will be an effective place to begin at their next session.

“I see,” he says, steepling and unsteeping his fingers. “Thank you. That is very helpful. Please make your next appointment with my assistant. I think that it would be best if it were Tuesday, not Wednesday, to provide a sufficient time gap until Friday.”

“Okay. Thanks. Goodnight.”

Were Dr Burke prone to similes, which he is not, or to exaggeration, which he is also not, he might have thought that Detective Beckett had run like a rabbit as soon as she were able.

Beckett removes herself from Dr Burke’s room, then office, then building as fast as courtesy and the necessity to make her next appointment allows. She makes it for Tuesday, and wishes she could find some way to avoid it. She might have resolved that she needs to fix this – but she devoutly wishes that she could quit already. But then Montgomery would know, and she’d be benched again, and… oh hell.

She goes home and rolls out her yoga mat, changes and returns to it. Maybe that’ll clear her head. The alternative might be the liquor shelves at the all-night store, and she is – she has to be – better than that. Still, she doesn’t begin yet: standing at the window, staring at the city lights against the night, the stars blotted out by the grimy yellow-orange of the street lights. Her stone bird is in her hands, nestled between her palms, held as gently as a real bird would be: she’s mindlessly stroking its head, between its wings, over its tail. Memory is not her friend, tonight. She sets the small sculpture down on the table, just as a knock rattles the door.

“Castle?”

“Hey.”

Next thing she knows, she’s in his arms, head pillowed on his shoulder; inhaling large, muscular male. She simply stands still; slowly dissolving into his strength, letting him hold her up; too tired to move or care as long as he’ll be there with her.

Castle had timed his arrival extremely carefully to ensure that it was safely after Beckett got home. Leaning on her door awaiting her might just give her the wrong impression and/or get him arrested. Instead, he’d planted himself in a café and forced himself to be patient.

When she’d opened the door she’d looked utterly miserable, and Castle’s hardwired reaction to misery is to try to make it go away by whatever method works: wine, chocolate or physical presence. This misery doesn’t need a choice. Physical comfort is the correct, instant and instinctive choice. He doesn’t ask her anything, he doesn’t say anything. He holds her close, and strokes over her back; and then, after a moment in which she softens and sighs, brings her up and half-lifts her to the couch.
and firmly into him. He stays like that for a time: her face hidden and her breath shallow against his neck.

“Still sore from Espo’s workout yesterday?” he asks eventually: a neutral subject that they can both pretend is a good reason to be tired and upset.

“Mhm.”

“Come here, then, and I’ll make it better.” His tone involves suave seduction and absolutely no soothing at all. He points up his intentions by feathering across her back, and then slowly beginning to massage her shoulders, carefully avoiding the worst of the bruises.

She sighs again, and eases into the pressure.
Take me away

Castle’s strong fingers are very comforting as they work the stress out of Beckett’s muscles without hurting at all. It’s hypnotic, and he is not doing anything to pull her out of the cloud of cossetting which is surrounding her. It dimly dawns on her that the surrounding atmosphere of large, powerful and slightly dangerously sexual masculinity is extremely soothing. Just what she needs, in fact: someone to keep her safe from the shoals and rocks over which she’s sailing, with the tide going out and no charts or rutters to guide her home. She’s so tired, and it’s not even late evening: it’s barely after eight. She should eat, but she’s not hungry; she should probably go to bed, but she’s unable to muster the energy to move. Truth to tell, she doesn’t want to. Sitting cuddled into Castle’s broad frame is more reassuring than anything else she might do, and is providing her with some ability to pull herself together. Therapy, she thinks acidly, is about as soothing and easy as having one’s skin removed with a cheese-grater.

“That’s better. Stand down for a while. You’ve got the weekend off, haven’t you?”

“Mhm,” she assents.

“Let’s go do something tomorrow.”

“Like what?” she mutters, unwilling to do anything that requires more effort than opening her eyes.

“Something fun. Coney Island?”

“In February?”

“Okay, not Coney Island. How about a trip?”

“Where?” she asks, unenthused.

“Well, anywhere, really, but I suppose you want to be back by Sunday night for work. Niagara? DC? Boston?”

Beckett’s lack of enthusiasm is palpable.

“Newport?” There is a small spark of interest, swiftly doused.

“Bit far for a day.”

“A day? How about the Hamptons? That’s not too far.”

“The Hamptons?”

“Sure. I’ve got a house there, and if we left early we’d have most of the day. We could walk along the beach” –

“It’s February. It’ll be freezing.”

“– wrapped up warmly – you look really cute in those berets you like – and then we could sit round the fire and have hot chocolate and toast marshmallows and there’s this really good seafood restaurant that I think you’d love so we could stay and have dinner – we could even stay overnight: Mother will stay with Alexis: she’s always complaining they get no girl time with me around though I think what she really means is that they don’t get to go shopping on my platinum card which is just not true, so it wouldn’t be a problem if we left again reasonably early and all I’d have to do is call the caretaker and get him to set it up for tomorrow morning and it would be really great.”

He runs out of breath. Beckett is quiet against him. “What do you think?”

“I think I’m exhausted just listening to you.” He droops. “I’d need to be back by mid-afternoon Sunday,” she says slowly, thinking aloud. He doesn’t quite understand the shiver as she mentions Sunday, but he definitely likes the direction of her thinking.

“We can manage that. If we leave after brunch we’ll be here in time, easily.” He pauses. “So shall we do that? Please, please? Please play hooky with me, Beckett?”

“Okay.”

“Yessss!” He hugs her tightly. He’d never expected assent.

“Ow,” Beckett says.

“Sorry, sorry,” Castle says distractedly. “You need to pack. We ought to leave around seven.” Beckett makes a deeply unhappy noise. “Okay, eight.” The noise becomes less unhappy. “You’re in before it’s even sun-up most days. Why are you objecting to getting up to do something fun?”

“ ‘S my days off,” emerges in a disgruntled mutter.

“You don’t take days off.”

“Do too.”

“Only when you’re ordered to.” Beckett humphs. “You can sleep in the car. It’s really comfy. I’ll wake you up when we get there.”

And just maybe, Castle thinks, just maybe being out of Manhattan and completely away from here will clear her head and cheer her up and maybe even relax her enough that she talks a little. That thought is swiftly chased away. It’s too early for that. She hasn’t even admitted to having the therapy sessions yet, and he has to wait for her to say that she’s doing it. He can’t push, and he won’t push, because she is attending, and that is really and truly all that he needs to know. Unless and until she asks him for something or tells him something, all he can do is be here and be strong enough for her. Right now, he’s here, and he’s enough. She’s curled bonelessly into him, slightly sleepy, certainly soft, but still disturbingly pale and devoid of spark.

“Do I need anything except a change of clothes and my washbag?”

“You might want a nice outfit for dinner.” He leers happily at the top of her head, which is pointless since she can’t see it. “I’ve not seen you in a dress.”

“Really?”

“Really do you need one? No. Really have I not seen you in a dress? No, I have never seen you in a dress.” He grins lazily at her. “I’ve seen you in undress, though.” She growls. He pets her, in the hope that she’ll stop growling, and maybe purr a little. “Anyway. Washbag, change of clothes, something pretty for dinner. That’s all you need.”

“ ‘Kay.” She curls in closer. Castle pets a little more, until she seems happier.

“Are you cold now?”

“No. I wasn’t cold.”
“Oh. You were shivering. I thought you might be cold.”

“No.” She doesn’t explain the shiver, simply nestles in. “But you’re nice and warm anyway.” She tugs on his hands till his arms have become wrapped around her in an evidently more satisfactory fashion, and drops her head back on his shoulder. “There,” she decides. “That’s better.”

Castle thinks it’s better, too, but then he currently thinks that almost any situation in which Beckett decides by herself that she should be snuggled up to him (with, or preferably without, clothes) is an improvement on a situation where she is not. His fingers stroke very gently at her waist, encouraging her to stay close, and he discovers that her cheek is in a very kissable location. Naturally, he kisses it. What else should he do? She hums. So he kisses her again, knowing that hums are likely to turn into purrs and her head is likely to turn up so that he can kiss her full lips and investigate her beautiful mouth and then she’ll purr and be Kat and be eased. He falls into a blissful reverie during which his kissing Kat gently produces something that moves closer and closer to a purr and moves her inexorably into his lap, where she is much more pettable and much more kissable and very much easier to hold close and protect.

Eventually he has to leave. He was out all night last night, and he can’t do it again tonight. Alexis deserves his attention too: he can’t neglect one adored responsibility for a new one. That’s not fair and won’t help. It also won’t help anything when (please let it be when) Beckett feels able to come back to the loft. Family is still very, very important to Castle, and he won’t damage that for anything or anyone. Beckett doesn’t question, quibble or argue about it: and he realises that it’s never been about his love for Alexis, it’s always been about her father’s feelings for her, and how seeing how he is with Alexis shows her what she doesn’t have with Jim. It’s a fine distinction, and a difficult one to spot, but it makes an enormous difference.

Oh. Jim. Oh. Beckett goes to see her dad for dinner every Sunday she can. So… oh, he knows this: she’ll be going this Sunday, which is why she needs to be back by mid-afternoon. Ah. The shiver is explained. Beckett hasn’t seen her dad since – oh shit – since she walked out of Julia Berowitz’s apartment. In between, there’s been at least one very emotional phone call which left Jim scared silly for his daughter, three calls from Jim to him, and one call about which he knows between Beckett and Jim in which Beckett lied through her teeth all the way, covered or buried every hint of truth about how she felt, and said that she’d go over on Sunday. There might have been another, he guesses, in which Beckett would have confirmed going over on Sunday, and he would bet his next month’s royalties that she lied through her teeth throughout all of that call, if it happened, too.

If Beckett weren’t at least going to therapy, he thinks bleakly, he’d be on the phone to Jim right now. Since she is, he won’t.

His mother is, as predicted, delighted to have a weekend with both Alexis and free run of the better boutiques, on Castle’s dime.

Beckett feels a lot better for Castle having shown up, cuddled her, cosseted her and generally provided her with a most unusual and very reassuring sense that someone’s looking out for her. She hadn’t felt able to ring anyone on her way home, but he’d turned up at just the right moment and held her in just the right way and then made a really good suggestion (even if she will have to get up on a day-off morning). She performs her bedtime routine, packs swiftly and includes a rather pretty soft crimson cashmere-mix dress which is both extremely flattering and – vitally – warm, and sets her alarm. She snuggles up to her pillow, which still retains a very faint scent of Castle, and is asleep far more swiftly and deeply than she had expected to be.

She wakes unexpectedly well-rested, and with the view that a trip away would be really very nice, even if it does start a little too early. It’ll give her something else to think about. She puts on jeans, flat boots and, over a t-shirt, the green angora jumper that Castle had definitely liked, digs her warmest coat out of the closet and adds a dark emerald wool scarf and matching beret and gloves. Just before eight (ugh, ugh) Castle arrives and declines coffee, at which she humphs unhappily, having had none herself.

“We’ll get some on the way, Beckett. If you’re awake.” She harrumphs, being one decibelic (he is sure this is not a word but he likes it) step beyond a humph. “C’mon. You won’t need your coat in the car. It’s lovely and warm. If we go now we’ll be there in less than two hours.”

“I am not bailing you out if the traffic cops stop you,” she grumps.

“You won’t have to. I’m a very careful driver.”

“Hmph.” Beckett rolls her eyes.

Castle grins at her, unintimidated, and hugs her. “I really like this jumper,” he says.  “C’mon, let’s go! The Hamptons await us. Walks on the beach, toasted marshmallows, roaring fire, fur rug” –

“You wear a wig?”

He splutters disgustedly. “No!  Fur rug in front of the fire, perfect for lying on na” –

“Shut up, Castle.”

“Let’s go. Time is fleeting.”

“Madness has clearly taken control,” Beckett says dryly, but consents to take his hand and be tugged enthusiastically along to the elevator, out the door, and into a very luxurious Mercedes.

Shortly after that, they’re rolling smoothly out to the Williamsburg Bridge and then on to the I-495 eastbound. There are no traffic cops. This is fortunate. Castle’s definition of I’m a very careful driver stopped at the start of the I-495, after which he’d opened up the engine and the car had moved. Beckett, no respecter of interstate speed limits herself, simply snuggles into the exceedingly comfortable seat and starts to plot the best way to ensure that she gets to drive back. They are slowing down at the Hamptons in considerably less than the time that the journey should have taken, and Castle returns to being careful. He is grinning like a loon, however.

The reason for the mile-wide grin becomes apparent as the big car pulls round and Castle’s – quote – house is… is… hell, it’s a mansion. Beckett is speechless.

“Here we are,” Castle bounces; and further bounces out of the car, round to the passenger side, and tugs Beckett out. “C’mon. It’s sunny.”

“And cold.”

“Bring your coat. The beach is the other side of the house. Let’s get your stuff out.” He’s rootling in the trunk to get the bags out. Beckett manages to overcome her amazement for long enough to close the car door (and her mouth) and then simply stares for a while. Castle finally puts his bag down, pokes her in the ribs, and starts her moving to the door. He puts the bags down again, unlocks the door, swings it wide – and swings Beckett up into his arms and inside.

“What was that?”

“Fun.” He smirks. “I’ve convinced you to come to my isolated abode, where I shall have my wicked way with you and” – “I thought you wrote thrillers and murder mysteries, not bodice-rippers? And if there are no marshmallows there won’t be any wicked ways, either. You promised me marshmallows.” She peeps up flirtatiously.

Castle smirks some more. “So as long as there are marshmallows I can have my wicked way? Good to know.” He is not disappointed in the eye roll he receives.

He whisks the bags out of the way, whisks into his own coat, scarf and hat, checks his pocket for gloves and then turns, intending to induct Beckett into her own coat. He’s unreasonably disappointed that she’s standing like a stump in the middle of the hallway. “C’mon, let’s go to the beach.”

“Yeah,” she says slowly. “Okay…”

“You need a coat.”

“Oh. Yeah. Right.”

“Beckett, what’s up with you? You’re acting like someone hit you over the head with a pry bar.” Suddenly enlightenment hits. “You’re not overwhelmed by the house, are you? It’s just a house.”

“Castle, it’s a freaking mansion. Practically a castle.”

Castle splutters with laughter. “Castle’s castle?” Beckett humphs, and seems to shrink a little. He pulls her back to him, firmly, and kisses the top of her head. “It’s just my house, Beckett. Nothing to worry about.” (It might be our house, a little voice tells him. Sometime.) “Let’s go. I’ll show you round later. Prove there are no monsters under the bed.”

“Only in it?” Her usual snark has suddenly returned, but she’s still a little uncertain in his clasp.

“Grrr,” he ripostes, and makes a dreadful face. She sniggers, and appears to return to normal.

It’s – enormous. Gigantic. She could lose the Twelfth’s entire Homicide squad in here. Hell, she could lose the entire Twelfth in here. Of course she’d known Castle was wealthy, but this is… this is well past wealthy and heading for super-rich. It’s too much. It’s – scary. He can have anything he wants, up to and possibly including buying medium-sized Caribbean islands. And he wants her? Walks on the beach and marshmallows? Shouldn’t he want supermodels and Nobu and the high life? Not someone who’s in therapy and just a cop and who can’t even be honest with her family – what family? An alcoholic father in remission and she, that’s all: duty visits on a Sunday when she’s not on shift; duty phone calls where they don’t talk about anything. At that point Castle interrupts and she answers without thinking. Castle? That has to be the worst word choice ever, and sure enough Castle seizes on it. At least it lets her get herself back together.

Castle holds her coat for her in a very gentlemanly fashion and she slips into it, wraps her scarf round her neck, and makes sure she has her beret and gloves. They embark on what seems to Beckett to be a half-hour trek through an ever-more intimidating series of beautiful rooms: perfectly decorated but still somehow warm and welcoming. There are no fur rugs in evidence, which rather than reassuring her only convinces her that there are yet more rooms that she hasn’t seen. She preserves a bravely cheerful countenance and marches on. Eventually they exit the rear of the house almost directly on to the beach.

“Here we are. A beach all to ourselves.”

“It’s a bit cold for paddling.” She shivers. The wind coming off the Atlantic is biting. Castle automatically slings an arm around her. “Even if there’s no-one else around.” There is a rather embarrassed silence. “This is yours too, isn’t it?”
“Er… yes.”

“Oh.”

“It’s still me, though. The one who brings you coffee and hugs you and lets you stand down. Don’t make this a problem. It’s only stuff. It’s… it’s like you having a shoe collection that would restock Saks. It’s not you. It’s just stuff. This is just my stuff.”

“Yeah, but you could fit the Saks building into your stuff.”

“Now you’re being silly.” It’s affectionate. He turns her round and into him, tips her face up to his and brings his head down to kiss her possessively. “Still me, Beckett. Still you. Stand down and stop worrying. How many times do I have to say that I know what I want and it’s you? All your little foibles included.”

He kisses her some more, till she’s breathless beneath it: nipping her lip and then soothing, taking possessively and keeping her tightly against him, shielding her from the chill wind blowing off the sea, and the chill wind blowing through her soul. Gradually she eases. He thinks idly that were there a watcher, in some small boat out in the whipping white waves, they’d see a big man protecting a slim woman from the wind, and never guess that actually she’s the one who normally does the protecting: the hard-ass cop with the gun and the shield. Here and now, it’s reversed, but it’s still them. Cop and writer, writer and cop; protector and protected both ways round.

“Shall we go on, or are you cold?” he asks. She curls closer, cheeks whipped rose-red by the raw wind, scarf an emerald contrast, the green blazing against her dark coat and dark hair.

“A little further,” she replies, and stays within his arm as they begin to move, falling into step as easily as if they did this every day, sliding her arm around his waist. The flat boots make the height difference apparent: fitting her neatly into the firm grasp around her.

They walk along for maybe a quarter-mile, up to a smart little boundary post for the next oversize property; turn around, and walk back. The tide is rising, and the wind has not dropped. Storms ahead, Beckett thinks, and doesn’t necessarily mean either the weather or indeed Castle.

“Let’s get inside. It’s chilly, and we can always come out again after lunch, if you want. We could go shell hunting, or skim stones.”

“Okay. Coffee?” she asks hopefully. There hasn’t been any coffee, and she’s feeling the lack.

“Oh my golly gosh!” Castle says theatrically and ridiculously, making her laugh. “How could I forget to caffeinate you? Are you okay? Do you need the ER? Will you faint, or fibrillate, or otherwise flatline? More to the point, will you explode and kill me along the way?”

“No,” Beckett says firmly, to stem the tide of silliness. “None of the above. But coffee would be really nice, please.”

Castle rustles up excellent coffee, pokes around for a moment, and also produces with a congratulatory ha! some Danishes. “I knew Joe would come through,” he says happily. He leads Beckett to an as-yet undiscovered family room with a fireplace which is sized to roast rhinoceroses (definitely plural) and in which the fire is already laid. There is a fur rug, on which Texas would fit quite nicely with room to spare for a pretty border to surround it. There is a plump couch, on which four giants would sit comfortably, some large armchairs, perfect for reading, and a coffee table. Castle puts the tray of coffee down on the table, wanders to the fire and competently lights it. A few moments later, it’s blazing cheerfully, and Castle and Beckett are comfortably ensconced on the
“This is nice.”

“So my stuff has some advantages?”

“Mmm, suppose so,” Beckett murmurs. Her socked feet are curled up on the couch with the rest of her, blissfully comfortable and warm. The fire warms her more deeply than she’d expected, and the house – or at least this room – carries the same faint aroma of cologne that Castle’s loft does. She drains her mug, and shifts to snuggle into Castle’s broad body. It’s all beautifully cozy.

“This was a really good idea of yours.”

Castle smiles affectionately at her, and in his warm blue eyes, here where there are no memories of any sort, she thinks she sees more than she has before: nothing distorting her view.

“I’m full of good ideas.” And this, he thinks, was definitely a good idea. After that initial shock – maybe he should have prepared her, but he’d (childishly) wanted to surprise her – she’s all snuggly and soft and definitely Kat-ish. He loves this peaceful togetherness, casual conversation about what to have for lunch, maybe another walk before dinner, the discussion opening out into books and movies and simply finding out about each other. He doesn’t ask about anything triggering, and the remains of the morning pass by in undemanding, unassuming closeness.
Lunch is a thick soup, grilled cheese, and – of course – ice cream. Castle banks the fire very carefully, before Beckett is persuaded into another walk along the beach, and, during their perambulation, is also persuaded to accept the small, perfect piece of dark red quartz, eroded smooth by the sea, that Castle spots and picks up before Beckett’s even noticed it’s there.

“You could get it set into a bracelet, or a ring, or something,” he says happily. He doesn’t suggest a necklace. She wears one already, and unlike his mother, Beckett doesn’t appear to believe in the more is more principle of jewellery.

“I could.” She’s turning it in her fingers, stroking over it, looking at it as if no-one has ever given her a present before. He thinks that if he’d given her rubies, she’d have given them back, but a beach stone that cost nothing but a keen eye and a swoop to pick it up: not even a malicious Atlantic wave to defeat in order to collect it (Just as well. His toes would be frostbitten before he ever got home to take off his soaking socks.) has delighted her.

“Shall we go back?”

“You promised me hot chocolate.” She smiles happily. “And marshmallows.” The smile acquires a tinge of mischief. “And wicked ways.” She laughs. “But you’ll have to catch me first.”

And she takes off running, back towards the house. Castle hesitates for only a millisecond before going after her, but doesn’t catch her until she’s only feet away from the door, laughing at him. He grabs her, swings her up in his arms and round and round till he’s laughing too, and then he can’t help but kiss her, and then he puts her back on her feet and the kiss becomes hard, and deep, and passionate: pinning her between his hard body and the door, pressing into her and taking her with him, her hands in their gloves on the back of his neck, gripping tightly. He’s chased her and caught her and somewhere deep inside that’s fired a deep need to possess her; from her reaction a need in her to be possessed.

He struggles to insert the key into the door, has to take his own gloves off to do it, and they fall inside, still locked together as she tears hers off to run hands into his hair, as he rips the buttons of her coat open and reaches inside and under the angora jumper and t-shirt below to the heated silk of her bare skin and she squeaks as his cold fingers touch her but he swallows the squeak and contains her wriggle and runs hands firmly up and down her back till one stops at the base of her skull and one over her ass and she’s trapped between him and the door again, on the inside.

His wide hand span lets him pull the coat down by its collar and, when she drops her hands, the coat falls from her to the floor. She undoes Castle’s coat, skimming elegant hands over his pecs; down and then up to push it, too, away. Her hands move back down to his firm ass, bringing him in to give her strength and force and pressure where she wants it. Somehow here, with nothing to remind her of anything, she’s free of her own memories: free to act as she pleases, free to be confident and happy and able to give back, not just take from his strength.

She slides one hand round to his front and undoes his belt, the button of his jeans, slips that same hand up under his t-shirt and detaches it so that her fingers are free to roam his skin and that lights him up: her own jeans suddenly around her ankles, his hand cupping her and she can’t think, she can’t speak: she can only feel and react and he’s sliding thick fingers into her and a thumb over her and she knows she’s soaked, knows she’s so close and he’s stopping just before she can explode: heat building in her core and she yanks his mouth down over hers and lets him drive her up and up even while she has just enough mind left to bring her own hand back round and down and inside to find him hard and she touches him and grips and slides and rubs her thumb over the damp tip and that’s it: he loses all control and her panties are gone and he’s so big inside her and Castle don’t stop Castle! and he takes her scream as she takes all of him and he flicks his thumb across her and she clenches and throbs around his thrusts and they’re gone, lost together.

He holds her close and keeps her warm, opens his eyes and suddenly laughs.

“Uh?” she says.

“You’ve still got your beret on,” he grins. “Sexy.”

She reaches up. She does. “Ooops,” she – giggles? She doesn’t giggle. She really doesn’t – but that was absolutely a giggle. Castle’s smiling down, still merged with her, and his eyes are warm and affectionate and she simply snuggles against him for a moment.

She’s not expecting simply to be hoisted up and conveyed to the – the? There will be more than one. A – bathroom, swiftly stripped, and then pushed into a double size shower where Castle displays unusual focus on the correct way to wash. To wash her, that would be. He smooths shower gel – so that’s where his slightly spicy scent comes from – over her shoulders, tutting slightly at the still-lurid bruising, down her arms and up again, and massages it into her firm breasts with considerably more attention to detail and the correct angle of fingers and thumbs than she might use, leaving her panting and arching into his naughty, addictive hands.

He moves those hands away to rub shower gel into her legs from the feet up, kneeling at her feet and reaching higher and higher. Then he smiles like a cherub and moves his hands like an incubus – she hadn’t even noticed him rinse the remains of the gel off them – and she opens for his fingers slipping through slickness that doesn’t come from soap and then he leans forward and licks and has to hold her hips and then push her back against the shower wall and carry on and on and on. She’s writhing under the water as his tongue moves over and over and in and out and his fingers join in: she’s screaming for more and just before it’s all too much he stands up and lifts her slightly and takes her with one hard, fast movement. She lifts her legs so he’s supporting her and then he moves within her and that’s all it takes.

Castle props Beckett up against the wall until her eyes open again, sleepy, hazy and fogged with sex. She reaches up and pulls his head down to kiss him as possessively as ever he’s kissed her, wraps her long fingers around him and begins to play. He’s instantly regenerated. She slithers down his neck, throat, chest, folds elegantly to descend past his sternum, navel, and ends on her knees with her mouth around him and he could almost explode right there but controls himself until she does something that’s so filthy co-ordinated between her fingers and her mouth and tongue and Christ teeth Beckett fuck Beckett! that he’s utterly mind blown. Or just blown.

He sinks down beside her and lets the hot water beat on his head till his brain works again, holding her hand like two school kids in the playground, with her head on his shoulder.

When they’re dry, and dressed again, Beckett peeps up at him through thick lashes. “I didn’t get my marshmallows,” she pouts, playfully sulky in a way he’s never seen.

“I got my wicked way,” Castle smirks, “so I suppose it’s only fair that you should get hot chocolate and toast your marshmallows in the fire.”

Beckett flicks a quick, insinuating glance over him, stopping midway. “I could toast your… marshmallows,” she murmurs.

“Maybe later,” Castle purrs lazily, as he presents Beckett with a toasting fork and the largest packet of marshmallows she’s ever seen. “Now, do you want marshmallows in your hot chocolate?”

“Mmm, yes please. It wouldn’t be hot chocolate without marshmallows.”

Rich, luxurious hot chocolate duly appears, rife with marshmallows and – Beckett thinks – possibly flavoured with a tiny dash of orange syrup. It’s delicious. Almost as delicious as being snuggled into Castle’s sweater and warm embrace in a place with no memories whatsoever: in which she has, unexpectedly, found a little piece of Kate-before-it-all-went-wrong. Here, she thinks, she can be a combination of that much younger, happy Kate and her well-hidden Kat persona: softly sensual and strangely feminine, able to relax and rely on the man beside her and stand down. While she’s here. Time out from her normal burdens. She finishes the truly excellent hot chocolate and nestles as closely as she can manage, which turns out to be very close indeed. By the time she’s finished nestling she’s on his lap with her head on one shoulder (such a usefully wide shoulder) and her hand draped over the other. Conveniently, that lets Castle wrap his arms around her and stroke very gently over her fluffy jumper.

Castle surveys his lapful of Beckett with considerable delight and not a little bemusement. He is delighted that Beckett arrived in his lap without his input – every other time, he’s either put or encouraged her there – but he is rather bemused by this happy, flirtatious, fluffy Beckett. Half Kate, half Kat, and not Beckett at all. Katwoman? He rapidly decides that saying that would not be a good plan, and compromises with stroking that oh-so-pettable jumper. It dawns on him that she chose it quite deliberately to appeal to his instincts, and allows said instincts freedom to stroke.

With an unusual exertion of moderation, he decides that too much stroking at this juncture of the day would mean that they were late for the dinner reservation he has made at the Plaza Café, and he really, really thinks that Beckett will like it. The fur rug can wait till later. Petting will have to do right now. He might not pout at the constraints of time – but he thinks about pouting.

When Beckett sashays out of a – not his, which is unfair – bedroom dressed in a clinging crimson dress that shows off every curve and is cut beautifully to swirl around and emphasise her incredible legs, Castle nearly swallows his tongue. He manages to conceal his visceral reaction, which involves two fast steps followed by crushing Beckett into his chest and then sweeping her into his bed and damn the dinner, and produces his best suave tones.

“You look lovely, Beckett.”

“Thank you. Where are we going?”

“It’s a surprise. You’ll see when we get there. But I’m sure you’ll like it.”

“Mm,” she murmurs seductively. “How were you going to make sure it’s a surprise? Blindfold me?”

She can’t say things like that and bite her lip like that and peep seductively through her lashes like that if she wants him to eat dinner with her. It’s unfair and unkind. On the other hand, later, he will be as assertively masculine as she wants him to be. Two can play this game. Two will play this game. He holds her coat for her and as she slips into it smooths it down over her back, lingering on her rear; offers his arm for her to take and escorts her to the car service.

Dinner is, as expected, fabulous. It’s the most normal meal they’ve ever had together – just like a real date should be. Conversation is light, witty and charming; the food is incredible; the wine well-chosen and excellent. Beckett is so amazingly relaxed that she even consents to a second glass. They share tastes of each other’s dishes, though Beckett, regarding her dessert with predatory delight, ensures that Castle’s taste would barely suffice as a bite for an anorexic mouse. By the time dessert is done and coffee on the table, Castle’s large hand is lying over Beckett’s, and much to his surprise (but maybe it’s not so surprising from this – well, romantic, relaxed Kat-Kate-definitely-not-Beckett) she turns her hand upward under his so that they’re palm to palm and fingers wrapped around the heel of each hand.

“That was great,” Beckett says happily, licking coffee off her lips. Castle’s sure that gesture wasn’t meant to be as openly provocative as it actually was. “Really delicious.” Her eyes are dreamy. “This was a really good idea.” She smiles wholly openly, in a contentedly satisfied fashion.

He’s never seen her like this – he didn’t realise she could be like this. It dawns on him that this is how Kat-Kate might have been if she’d never been ripped apart by her father’s alcoholism, and for a moment he wishes that Jim could see the damage he’s done. He pulls his anger back. Jim has seen the damage he’s done, and it’s Castle who told him to let Beckett have a few days, to let Beckett come to Jim. He refocuses on beautifully relaxed Beckett, and idly wonders whether the dress is as gorgeous to touch as to look at. He intends to find out, once they’re home.

He doesn’t manage (again) to touch the enticingly crimson dress when he holds her coat for her, but sitting in the luxurious car from the service he does what he hadn’t done earlier (because if he had they’d never have made it out the house to dinner) and slides a broad hand on to her knee. The dress is delectably soft. Almost as soft and strokable as Beckett when she’s Kat. Tonight – today – she’s not quite been Kat, but she’s definitely not Beckett, and bringing her out here was equally definitely the best idea he’d had in months. Removing her from her normal habitat has completely changed the game. He could – he will – take her right out of the USA on to some deserted tropical island where they can spend a lot of time together. Naked. He doesn’t just mean in flesh, either. Somewhere he can see her mind, without her barriers, just like today; somewhere they can talk about nothing, and everything; about now, and forever; about them, and love.

For now, he’ll take her home, and make love to her, and when she’s fixed herself, there will be time to talk of all the rest. Maybe not even when she’s fixed, maybe as soon as when she’s able to tell him she is fixing herself.

“You awake, Castle?”

“Sure,” he says lazily, coming out of his reverie and realising that his hand is still on her knee, and that her dress is definitely strokable, and that her hand has slipped over his. The short journey home seems very, very long.

“We’re home,” he says with some relief, and hands her out of the car.

“Home?”

“Home. Where I live, in the summer, and some weekends.”

Her hand stays twined in his, which makes opening the door a little troublesome but is far too pleasant to break off. He has to let go to take his, and her, coat off, but then he’s free to run curious hands up and down the dress, to wrap his arm around her waist and steer her gently to the same family room as earlier, to draw her smoothly into his embrace and kiss her delicately, insinuatingly: the kiss in counterpoint to the controlled force in his clasp. He teases the seam of her lips, pressing a little, sensing that she’s slipped into the strange space of femininity where she’s happy for him to take the lead, to assert his potency and passion and for her to respond: to be soft to his hard.

He pulls them both gently down on to the rug, in front of the banked fire, the only light in the room; kneeling with his hands cupping her face, then further down, till they’re lying together, still clothed, in the flickering light and the dancing shadows. For a while, they simply kiss, learning once more each other’s mouths and faces, then Castle becomes more forceful, little nips on her lip, a more possessive thrust of tongue, bringing her tighter against him and one hand over her ass, rucking up the skirt of her dress so that soon he’s spanning bare skin and silky panties; his other hand cradling her skull so that she’s wholly open to his inexorably questing mouth. She feels so right in his grasp, so perfectly fitted to him. He doesn’t believe that he could ever have enough of her against him.

He moves his fingers from her deliciously curved backside up over the rucked up skirt to the fastening at the top of the dress, undoes it and slowly unzips, the susurrus of the metal interspersed with the quiet hiss of the fire and occasional sparks, and with their slightly deeper breathing. Desire hangs heavily in the air, sensuality surrounds them, the promise of passion potent and portending pleasure. The tips of his fingers dance down the point of each vertebra, leave the catch of her bra untouched as the dress falls to each side of his touch. She rubs herself against him, a little restless, a little demanding, and he takes her mouth again and slides the dress away from her lithe form.

She retaliates by undoing his button-down, leaving them skin-to-skin, heat building where they touch; but Castle rolls her off and pushes himself up on an elbow and then to sitting, gazing at his Kat stretched out on the fur rug in the firelight, intriguing shadows in the contours of her body and the glow of the fire reflected in her eyes and streaking her hair. She’s wearing deep coloured silk, almost-revealing and sexier for it, designed to please the eye and, he has no doubt, chosen with extreme care. He traces around its edges and she purrs contentedly as she arches a fraction into his firm touch, searching for his petting and finding it.

Petting soon changes up to be stroking, then palming and rolling, then his mouth gets to play and she’s mewling now, wanting more, her leg curled around his middle and keeping him pressed to her body – he has no intention of leaving – her nails in his neck and the more he nips and suckles and soothes the more she wants and the harder she holds him to her. He could, he knows, take her right up and over the edge like this, right here and now – and why should he not? They’ve all night, here, and in his enormous bed, and he loves being able to do this, knowing he can undo her so easily, as she can and no doubt will with him. So he continues to play with her breasts and the mewls turn to moans turn to more turn to a long soft sigh of release and she’s lax in his arms, cuddling him.
Cuddles in front of the fire or not, his Kat is beginning to shiver. In addition, fur or no fur rug burn is a serious possibility and would be really quite uncomfortable. By contrast, his bed is just through that doorway right there and is soft, comfortable and will not induce burns of any sort. He sits up, keeping his cuddled up Kat on his lap – she’s still wearing her bra, now somewhat disarranged and noticeably damp, and her panties, which are also noticeably damp – and then brings them both to standing without letting go. Kat letting go is, it seems, almost as likely as a magnet letting go of iron.

“Bedtime,” he rumbles into her ear, and adds a wet lick along the nerve. She stays still, so he simply picks her up, sweeping her into his arms, and aims for his bedroom. She doesn’t fight it in the slightest, only nestles into him with her own arms round his neck and a sated smile on her face. He drops her in the middle of the bed, shucks his shirt and pants before she’s worked out where she is, and leans over her in a dangerously predatory fashion.

“My Kat,” he says definitively, sure that here she both is, and will accept being called, Kat. “Let’s see if you purr.”

“Miaow,” she giggles. Really, truly giggles, and then scrapes nails down his chest. “Let’s see if you purr.”

“I don’t purr,” Castle growls. “I make you purr. And then I’m going to make you scream.”

“You think?” definitely-Kat, who didn’t even try to kill him for calling her so, smirks. “I think you’ll be shouting my name.”

“You first, Kat. You’ll be first.”

This is not fair. He’s using all his size and weight to make sure she can’t find freedom to play. She can’t even move her astonishingly flexible legs to tickle him with her toes – her hands are currently firmly held at her sides by his, and his mischievously mobile mouth is nibbling its way southward from her sternum and she knows what he’s going to do and just for once maybe she doesn’t care that she’s losing a game and oh oh oh he’s drawn a warm wet circle in her navel and it tickles and teases and tantalises and she’s squeaking and squirming and soaking and he’s still moving south and whiffling the neat curls and he is so close to where she wants him and so close to what he should be doing and it’s not fair that he isn’t.

And then he does. His tongue circles firmly and she doesn’t even try to stop the high-pitched cry. Okay. Scream. But he’s not satisfied with just the one scream, or with just the one lick. His tongue is wickedly talented and he’s using all that talent on her: tracing through the folds, flicking lightly over nerves and then sliding in a little way but not far enough more Castle! and he’s still holding her hands in his so she can’t direct his head and his shoulders are holding her apart and oh god oh god oh fuck his mouth and teeth and Castle now Castle! but he stops and grins.

“You screamed,” he says smugly. She can’t say anything at all. “I liked it.” He leans back down, and starts again. This time, when she cries out, he doesn’t stop, and she shatters on his name.

Castle is cuddling her in a very smug fashion. Okay, so he won, but so did she, she supposes rather blurrily. Still, in a moment she’ll prove that this Kat has claws. Metaphorically speaking. She rearranges herself to be suitably draped across his lovely warm chest, and is not disappointed in the lovely warm cuddle that follows her. She snuggles in, and luxuriates in the strength and comfort surrounding her in her post-orgasmic glow.
After a while, Beckett’s brain and unfamiliar sense of happy mischievousness reassert themselves. Castle has been idly petting her, twisting little locks of hair and playing with her fingers while she lies across him, but now it’s time to wreak a little good-natured and pleasurable revenge. Payback can be so sweet… She wiggles downward, ignoring the mild complaint this provokes, and spends some quality time applying both her lips and her fingernails to Castle’s flat nipples and broad pecs. He wriggles very pleasingly, and his breathing is already faster, heavier. She squirms downward, twining her legs over a solidly muscular thigh, listening to his breaths come harder and acquire a tinge of groan; tracing her tongue over the line of dark hair below his navel, and then moving to the side. There is a disappointed noise.

Beckett tuts. How unfortunate that to do so she has to turn her head back towards the – er – central column, and even more so that the tip of her tongue flicks out and touches it. There is an extremely pleasing jerk and noise. It sounds very like tease. Damn right she is. She tuts again at his comment, with the same effect. Then she drops a couple of carefully placed kisses just out of range of anywhere interesting, and then moves back to amuse herself some more.

By the time she’s finished unfulfilling flicks and tiny touches of her fingers, Castle’s commentary has reached an interestingly falsetto pitch and his hands are clamped round her head – but he’s just managing not to move her where he wants her. It’s pretty clear where he wants her. She’ll get there in her own good time. Anticipation will improve matters, and besides which, he teased her excessively and with relish. Sauce for the Castle goose, and all that. She curves her fingers around his base and flickers the tips of her nails over the sensitive skin. He groans. She slides firmly up and down. More groans, interspersed, as she continues, with some very naughty words.

Finally she does what she’s been hinting at for some time, and dips her head to take him in her mouth and that’s what drags her name from him, over and over and over again until he’s devoid of words and explodes.

Castle pulls his Kat up over him again and tucks her in. Later, they can play some more. Later. He loves this – yes, playful Kat. He drifts off with her curled into him, on a cloud of happiness and affection.

Beckett wakes with a slight feeling of unreality as a result of the completely unfamiliar room. Sometime in the night she’s rolled out of Castle’s arms, but there’s a hand on her hip which is anchoring her to the one familiar presence here: Castle’s wide body and spicy male scent. She feels great. She’s slept like a stone, for the first time in a long time, not worried by anything, not fretting about anyone. She turns over and finds that she’s being observed by a pair of warm blue eyes.

“You’re awake,” he says superfluously.

“Mmm.”

“It’s nine o’clock.”

“What?”

“I’ve been awake for a while.” Beckett peers out of still-sleepy eyes and notices a mug on Castle’s nightstand. “You didn’t even twitch when I got out of bed. You must really have needed the break.”

She flops back. Castle leans over her. “But we’ve still got plenty of time before we need to leave.” His smile turns lazy. “I can think of at least one way to pass the time.”

Beckett smiles back up at him. “Give me a minute, and then let’s see what your … pastimes… might be.” She slips out of bed, naked as Eve, and shortly returns with no embarrassment and a slinky sashay for good measure, as confident in her own skin as a Persian cat. Castle, sitting on the bed waiting for her, clearly appreciates her. She slides on to the bed and then on to his lap.

“God, you feel good,” he rumbles, and moves slightly to slide through her. She hums, and nips at his neck. He turns her head, and kisses her hard and deeply, and when she’s clinging to his shoulders and wholly responsive lifts her to bring her down around him, slowly, and she’s perfect and tight and hot and wet and she’s gripping him and he slides her up and down on him, and then they’re moving in rhythm and then they’re gone.

“I need a shower,” Beckett says, “and then we’ll need to go. I have to be home for later.” She doesn’t look happy about it.

“Shower, then. I’ll follow you.” He’d like to join her, but she’s right: they do have to leave, and if he joins her they’ll not be out of the shower till the hot water runs out. With the size of his hot water tank, that would be tomorrow.

“Thanks, Castle,” Beckett says as he pulls up at her block. “That was” – she pauses – “just what I needed.” But now it’s over.

“Any time, Beckett. Any time.”

“See you tomorrow.” She even drops a light-hearted kiss on him, and swiftly pulls away before it turns into more.

“Till tomorrow.” He’s grinning happily at her.

She watches him pull away into the traffic, and goes up to her apartment, the weight of seeing her father in a few hours re-descending on her shoulders. She spends that time attending to her chores and definitely not second-guessing what her dad’s going to say. She reinstates her bright, sociable, loving shell and pushes down the worry and terror that he’s going to start down a line that she doesn’t want to talk about. Whenever it tries to pop back up, she picks up the stone Castle had given her on the beach and turns it over and over between her fingers, forcing herself to think only of how much she’d enjoyed the weekend, how much it had provided ease and respite. How much he had provided ease and respite.

But this evening she’ll have to do it on her own. She couldn’t ask Castle to come with her, just like she couldn’t ask him to be there when the therapy session was over. Only she can save herself, and she has to save herself. Somehow, she has to keep her dad saved while she saves herself. And on that thought it’s time to go.

The little red stone is in her pocket as she leaves; her hand in her pocket, turning it and turning it. She’s turning it again when she’s going up to her father’s apartment.

“Hi, Dad,” she says.

“Katie. Good to see you.” He hugs her. She manages to hug him back. “I got a pie from Fairway, like you wanted.”

“Yum,” she says, with a well-counterfeited semblance of happiness.

Dinner, and especially the pie, is delicious: the pie warmed and slathered with whipped cream. Beckett demolishes her portion in short order. Dinner has been accompanied by light conversation in which her dad hasn’t asked anything difficult, and Beckett is consequently less tense and rather less
They set it up and begin.

“So, I guess you’re over your stomach bug?” Jim asks.

“Yeah. It was nasty,” she says, with emphasis. “Had to take a couple of days off.”

“Really? That sounds pretty serious, if you had to take time off. Why didn’t you tell me?” The question is silk-smooth, stiletto-sharp.

“It was just an upset stomach, Dad. Couple of days at home sorted it out. It’s not like you can do anything except wait it out.”

“You sounded pretty upset Monday morning. If you weren’t feeling good, why’d you go to work?”

She shrugs, and moves a piece.

“Katie.” She flicks a glance at him. “You didn’t have a stomach upset. You had a temper upset. Why were you so upset at Julia Berowitz?” He is determined to get to the bottom of this. He might not have been much of a parent for ten years, but something’s wrong with Katie and he’s going to find out what.

“I must’ve already been sick. She wasn’t listening to you and she should’ve. Normally it wouldn’t bother me, but I guess I just wasn’t on my game.”

Jim raises a very disbelieving eyebrow. “You didn’t look sick to me, and you didn’t sound sick on Monday morning. You lost your temper, both times. You haven’t done that in years. Why were you so upset, Katie? You’ve heard the story before. I told you it, when I got dry, when I asked for forgiveness, when I made amends. Why did you get so angry last Sunday?”

Beckett says nothing.

“I’m your dad, Katie. I just want you to be okay. But you weren’t okay, and I don’t think you’re really okay now. Tell me what’s wrong, Bug.” He’s almost pleading.

“Nothing’s wrong, Dad.”

Jim looks exasperatedly at his daughter, who is as downright infuriating and obdurate as she was aged fifteen and all teen attitude and negativity. “Do I have to remind you of what you said on Monday? You said you were still trying. What are you still trying to do? You saved me. There’s nothing more you need to do.”

She’s still silent. Then she speaks. “There’s nothing wrong, Dad. Stop worrying.”

“You’re worrying me, Katie. You lose your temper, you don’t take my call, and now you’re telling me there’s nothing wrong when it’s clear that there is. It all started because of the Berowitzes, didn’t it? Why’d you get so involved with them?”

“They needed help. Their son was murdered, and I caught it.”

“That’s not what I mean. Why did you search Manhattan for her husband? That wasn’t your job.”
“She called me. Protect and serve, Dad. That’s the job.”

Jim barely restrains a sharp answer. Katie is evading everything he asks and he is becoming quite seriously annoyed with her. He is also quite certain that there is something much more important that she isn’t telling him.

“Yep, it is,” he says innocuously. “Suppose you can’t help it.” He has an idea, and completely changes tack. “So you said you had Rick round to dinner on Tuesday?”

“Yes,” Beckett says, with some relief. This subject, she feels she can handle. “He’d never had Georgian cooking or wine before.” She expounds happily on her dishes and the dinner for a few minutes.

“Sounds lovely,” Jim says, and smiles. He’s just had a really good idea. “Now that we’ve been for dinner at theirs, they should all come for dinner at one of our places. Reciprocity. That would be really nice. I had a great time with them all – even if Martha Rodgers’s dress colours would stop the traffic in Times Square. Do you think I should get sunglasses?”

“I think that might be a little obvious, Dad,” Beckett says, utterly without thought. Invite them all back? She barely made it through the first dinner, what with both Castle’s happy family setup and her own dad being so comfortable with the Castle family.

“Maybe. So, what do you think? Invite them all round? I’ll help you cook.” He looks at his daughter. She’s turned a little white. His concern that she had been off at Rick’s reasserts itself. He is going to push this, though. “Next Saturday, if they’re all free?” Katie’s face has tightened up. “After all, you said there was nothing wrong and you’ve clearly fixed things with Rick, so there should be no problem. I’ll be delighted to see them again. It was great, the way they welcomed me in. Martha’s clearly had an interesting life, and I’d love to hear more about the theatre from a backstage perspective. Alexis was really cute, as well. Totally different from you, though.”

“Yeah. Not exactly a rebel type,” Beckett manages to force out in a relatively cheerful tone.

“Not if she wants to know about being a lawyer before age eighteen. Anyway, I’d really like to have them over. They’re so easy to get on with. It’s great being around them. It’s just like being part of a family again,” he says thoughtlessly.

“Is it?” Beckett can’t stop the hurt snap.

“What do you mean?” She almost stops breathing, stone-still. “What do you mean, Katie?” Jim hesitates, suddenly realising that he’s fallen over something serious.

“Nothing. It’s really nice you got on with them so well.”

“That implies that you don’t get on with them,” Jim says, legal ability to analyse the slightest textual nuance to the fore. “Don’t you like Rick’s family?”

There’s an unpleasant pause. Beckett can see the void opening under her feet. Say no, and her father will question. Say yes – because she does like them, it’s just the easy, happy relationships that catch her on the raw and make her feel guilty and unhappy and not good enough – and her father will force her into this dinner. She is not hosting the dinner. She just can’t. She just can’t bear seeing her father being part of their family when he’s just said that they’re a better family than she is. She barely made it through the dinner at Castle’s, where she could leave. She can’t do it at hers, where she couldn’t leave.

And then the void swallows her anyway.
“Why don’t you like being there? They’re a nice family, and it was great to be part of that again. They were nothing but nice to you, and you’re involved with Rick, so what’s up, Katie? We taught you better than that.”

It’s all too much: the implied telling-off, the accusatory tone. Her father shouldn’t force her like this. He’s been picking and pushing and forcing the issue for a week and she’s been hiding the truth from him for years to keep him safe and all she gets in return is told off because she’s not behaving properly and the chance to watch him fit right into someone else’s family when he’d ruined it all for her and doesn’t even remember that he did. And now he’s outright told her that being with her isn’t being a family. All her previously unacknowledged pain, all the hurt she’s never dealt with, comes to the fore.

“Yeah, you did. When you were still able to set an example. When Mom was still here. Before you got drunk for five years and I had to walk away because I wasn’t enough for you to want to live.”

Jim goes white. “Katie…” But she runs right over him.

“I don’t want them in my apartment and if you invite them here I won’t come. You can play happy families with a happy family all you want, Dad, if I’m not enough of one for you. I wasn’t enough to save you and it looks like I’m still not enough now. It doesn’t matter what I’ve done to try and keep you safe because it’s only you who keeps yourself sober. Nothing to do with me. I’m done trying. I’m done.”

She’s crying as she stands up and walks out, Jim static, frozen and white behind her, calling Katie, Katie come back too late as the door shuts. He’s dialling her phone frantically, over and over, but she doesn’t pick up. He’s her father, and she won’t even take his calls – just like years ago. She won’t take his calls: it just rings straight through to voicemail, over and over.

He dials another number.

“Ed? Ed, can I talk to you awhile? I think I’ve really screwed up. Katie… I knew there was something wrong and I wanted her to tell me about it. I thought… I thought… I’m her dad, and I just wanted to help. But she lost it and she said… she said she wasn’t enough and she’s done trying. I really thought she understood that she was everything that saved me, but she’s just walked out on me and she thinks she doesn’t matter to me. Ed, what do I do now?”
Tearing you apart

Beckett can barely see the road through blurred eyes, and wipes her nose at every cross-street. She’s finally smashed her last taboo in temper and hurt, because her father wants a happier family than she can ever be. She wants, very badly, to stop at a store and buy booze, but she doesn’t. She won’t go down like he did. Pride keeps her driving till she gets to her alcohol free home; pride keeps her upright as she closes her door; pride moves her through her night-time routine and into bed.

Pride is all she’s got to keep her going. And if her father’s finally broken her, she who had never broken in these ten years of saving him and now having it all thrown away because he wants to be part of a family, then she’ll cling to her pride to glue herself back together. Clearly she doesn’t count as family. Clearly he’s never really forgiven her for walking away, and all his talk that she saved him was a lie. A lie for a lie. All the last five years, all a lie. She’d sacrificed everything to make them a family for five whole years, and it had all been for nothing. She’d done it all because she’d thought that he wanted a family again, that he needed her. But she’s not enough family for him and he didn’t need her. She’s wasted her life on him: spent all this time protecting him from her feelings – feelings she’d kept rammed down and hidden away so well she hadn’t realised she had them – and it’s all been utterly pointless because he never wanted or needed her anyway. She should have known. Only he could save himself.

She hasn’t answered her phone once. She’s stayed as resolutely uncontactable as the first time, at the same immense cost. But she can’t do it. She can’t pretend any more, if her father doesn’t think they’re a family. She can only try to save herself from the wreckage.

She cries herself to sleep, no matter how much pride tries to stop the tears, and in the morning is extra-careful with her make-up. Emergency eye-drops take most of the red puffiness away, and blending covers the shadows beneath. Work has always been her solace and salvation, and today is no exception. It’s the one place she’s safe. Ryan and Esposito don’t ask questions, and it’s only paperwork unless a new body drops so likely Castle won’t come in.

She’s dealing with yet another cold case file, pretending to be placid, when the next body drops. While she is desperate for the distraction: work in which she can lose herself and simply be the best, be enough, she really doesn’t want to see Castle while she’s still scraped raw on her father’s decision that Castle’s family is where he’d rather be. It reminds her far too much of how her father has just abandoned her. However much she appreciates the peace Castle can bring her, she’d rather have had a day to cover it all over. She’s not going to get it, though. She takes a deep breath, and dials.

“Beckett,” Castle says happily. “We got a new body? Please tell me we’ve got a new body.”

“We’ve got a new body. Meet me at East River Bikeway opposite East 6th. All I know is it’s female, so far. See you there.”

“Be there in a few moments.” He sounds utterly enthusiastic as the call ends.

Beckett gets to the bikeway to find Ryan and Esposito standing by a corpse in the tree-spattered verge outside the fencing of the East River Park Track. Naturally, Lanie is the attending ME. Just what she didn’t need. At least she knows that Perlmutter wouldn’t pry.

“What do we got?” she says, and takes some pleasure in the ungrammatical construction.

“Female. Delaine Roberts, age 29, from her licence.”
“Blunt force trauma to the head and chest,” Lanie says, very professionally and very coolly. “Might have been a baseball bat, but there’s a lot of blood. I need to get her back to the morgue to see if there’s more to it. Time of death looks like around three, four hours ago.”

There is indeed a lot of blood. And brains, and mess. Beckett pulls on gloves and delicately checks the inside of the woman’s purse, lying beside her body. “No wallet, no cash. No phone.”

“Phone was in her pocket, Beckett,” Espo says. “I got it already.”

“Good.” She extends a hand, and the bag containing the phone passes between them. “Looks like a standard mugging, at first glance.”

“But you think it wasn’t,” comes Castle’s voice from behind her. Beckett jumps, and nearly plants her ass in the earth.

“I’m sure it wasn’t. Too much violence for a mugging, and why kill her? Look at her. She’s tiny. If she’s 5’2” I’ll eat my hat – and they’ve left a rather pretty necklace, bracelet and rings – so she’s married – and her phone. If they were muggers they’d have taken the lot.” She straightens up. “Okay. Dr Parrish, you can take her away. Can I have a better time of death as soon as you know it, please?” She turns away from Lanie, whose expression indicates that she’s not impressed by Beckett’s formality and dismissal of her as just another part of the scene-of-crime team. “Get the sweepers to see if they can pick up blood trail or footprints or anything. Any cameras round here?”

“No,” Ryan says, with some annoyance. “Nearest are on 8th and 9th, other side of FDR Drive.”

“Get them anyway. Maybe there’ll be something on them. Let’s get back and start running her – Espo!”

“Yo?”

“Get uniforms to start canvassing, see if anyone saw anything, even if it’s street people. ‘Kay?”

“On it.” He disappears to start handing out orders.

“Ryan, see you back at the precinct with any footage, okay?”

“On it,” he also says, and disappears.

“Castle, c’mon. We’ll start finding out who she is.”

“Okay.” He pauses, and looks closely at her. She thinks he’s about to say something, when he obviously decides against it. “Let’s go.”

Castle could tell from the moment he arrived at the scene that something is very wrong with Beckett, and it’s not only Lanie’s presence. The stress fractures are back in her voice, lurking under her normal on-the-job command tones, and her shoulders are tight. When she stands up, packs off the rest of the gang to an assortment of necessary actions and finally turns so he can see her face, it’s clear to him that her make-up is hiding a distressed night about which she didn’t call him. He almost says so, but shuts his mouth in time. Saying did you have a row with your dad isn’t a conversation to be had over a new corpse. Nor is why didn’t you call me. Anyway, he knows exactly why she didn’t call: it’s the same reason she wouldn’t let him in after last Sunday’s fiasco. She feels that she’s let herself down, or she can’t bear the contrast with her own father, and she can’t stand anyone else seeing either matter.

Still, in her cruiser, before she moves off, he skates fingers softly over her hand and then grips it, just once. I’m here, I’m here for you. He doesn’t expect a response, and is therefore not surprised when she doesn’t press in return.

“Not now. Please,” she says, and the rest of the journey proceeds in silence, during which time Castle worries more and more. He is already plotting how to call Jim, and when – as soon as he can plead a need for a break, he thinks.

Back at her murder board Beckett is absolutely her normal precinct self, terrifyingly focused on Delaine Roberts. She hands the phone off to a tech to extract the number and contacts, and starts to draw her timeline.

“Okay,” she says, “she’s married, and she was beaten to death – probably – between seven and noon this morning.”

“That’s a bit wider than Lanie thought?”

“When Dr Parrish” – Castle winces at the evidence of the damage to Beckett and Lanie’s friendship, though fortunately she can’t see it – “firms up, we’ll narrow it down. Weather’s been so variable, we need to be careful. Let’s start running her.”

Mrs Roberts turns out to live in Stuyvesant Town. Shortly after that, they’re knocking on her door. It’s opened by a dishevelled-looking man, yawning widely. He looks as if he’s hurriedly got out of bed and thrown on jeans and a t-shirt, run his hands through his light brown hair. He’s wearing a wedding ring which matches the one on Mrs Roberts’ finger.

“Mr Roberts?”

“That’s me.” His expression is confused. “Dr Trey Roberts. What d’you want?”

“Detective Kate Beckett, NYPD. I’m sorry to tell you that your wife has been killed.”

“No!”

He falls apart in front of them. Beckett walks in, followed by Castle, who shuts the door. Beckett’s hands are fully occupied steering Dr Roberts to a chair and sitting him down in it. Fat, ugly tears are on his chiselled cheeks. Castle looks around and spots a box of Kleenex, passes it to Beckett, who hands it to Mr Roberts.

“Dr Roberts, I know this is hard for you. Could you tell me about your wife?”

Through tears and sniffing, he does. “Della was a physiotherapist. Had a good practice. Doing really well.”

“What do you do?”

“I’m a doctor. A resident at Bellevue. Trauma – I was on nights this week, so I only got in early afternoon, maybe at two, when I got done with my surgery list. Della usually went out around seven, so I didn’t see her.”

“Did you see her last night?”

“Yeah. We had dinner, chicken and salad, nothing fussy, then I had to go to work.”

“Why would Della be down at the East River Park this morning?”

His mouth drops open. “What? Della? She wouldn’t.”
“I’m afraid she did. She was found on the East River Bikeway.” Beckett spares him the details. It’s going to be bad enough later, and his whereabouts will be easy to check. She needn’t say that now.

“Dr Roberts, is there someone who can come and be with you?”

He starts to well up again. “No. My family’s in Wisconsin. Della was from Indiana. We met at NYU. I just wanna be on my own.”

“I’ll need to talk to you again, Dr Roberts, but not today. I’m sorry for your loss.”

Castle has stayed completely quiet, unusually. He’s thought that the best thing for this morning is to let Beckett do what she does best, empathise with the grieving husband and do her job. She needs her work. (She needs him, too, but not now.)

“We’ll check with Bellevue, but I don’t think it’s him.” She scrunches up her nose and chews her lip thoughtfully. “Who’d want to beat a physiotherapist to death?”

“Anyone who didn’t like the pain,” Castle says. “Physio hurts.”

She turns to look at Castle. “Yeah, I know. But murder is a bit extreme. What’s the story here?”

“If I were writing it,” Castle muses, “I’d make it look like professional jealousy. She sounds quite successful, and she’s still quite young. Bit like you, really. But it could be a patient.”

“If it was a patient, though, how are they going to be strong enough to beat her to death? Physio is usually about people who aren’t physically fit. That took muscle, and fury.”

The conversation has taken them back to the Twelfth. Beckett scribbles on her board until the boys show up. There is no useful camera footage, which is annoying. On the other hand, the phone has been persuaded to spill its guts out to the techs, and there is a list of contacts and a list of numbers which Della called, together with numbers who’d called her, already. Beckett smiles with feral satisfaction.

“Ryan?”

“Yo?”

“Get these numbers identified. And this time if you find something good leave it on the top of the pile, not the bottom.” Colour taints his cheeks.

Before she can set Espo off on checking out Mr Roberts, her phone rings.

“Beckett.”

“Kate, I got your lab results.”

“Thank you, Dr Parrish. I’ll send Detective Esposito to see you.”

“You what?”

“You heard. Detective Esposito will be over shortly. Thanks.” She cuts the call. “Espo, you’re on morgue duty.”

“Uh? You don’t wanna hear it first hand?”

“No. I wanna try and get the patient list, and check out Dr Roberts’ alibi. So Bellevue for me, and then her wellness centre. You go to the morgue.”

Espo looks as if he’s about to argue, then does as he’s told. Beckett is fairly certain that he’ll be wanting a chat later, but she won’t be there. She doesn’t need Dr Parrish’s patent brand of intrusiveness today. She doesn’t need it any day. She doesn’t, in fact, need Dr Parrish outside the job at all. Not if she can’t be a friend rather than a pseudo-psychiatrist. And since twice she’s shown that she can’t, there’s no point. Beckett’s done trying with her too.

The thought twists her face and her gut, and she excuses herself to the restrooms, missing Espo’s piercing stare after her, missing Castle’s concerned look.

“What’s goin’ on?” Espo asks. “Beckett never hands off seein’ the corpse and the lab results.”

“I don’t know,” Castle lies. He knows perfectly well. Beckett doesn’t want to see Lanie, but it’s not just that. If it had only been Lanie’s fight with Beckett, she’d have done it, just like previous times. It’s the cumulative effect of Lanie’s – as Beckett sees it – calling her out and not being her friend at all and whatever has gone down with her father. In fact, now might be a good time to call Jim.

“Better get to the morgue,” Espo decides, which will certainly save him a world of hurt if he’s still in the bullpen when Beckett reappears.

Castle gives Espo a few minutes’ clearance and then slips out of the bullpen. He wanders around the corner into Beckett’s favourite coffee bar (he’ll bring her back one), orders, seats himself in a quiet table and stares at Jim’s number in the list on his phone. With a sense of considerable trepidation, he taps it and listens to it ring.

“Jim Beckett.” It’s the professional voice, and it’s sober. Even though Jim must know it’s Castle who’s calling, he’s answered as if it were work. He probably is at work, Castle thinks, and relief descends over him.

“Jim, it’s Rick.”

“Rick? Rick, how’s Katie?” Castle hears a door close, and the frantic note rising in Jim’s words. “Is she okay?” He can’t say that she is, because it’s clear Jim already knows she isn’t.

“She’s… not so good, but she’s at work and doing okay.” Castle evades, without any compunction. He won’t be the one who breaks Jim by telling him that Beckett’s broken, though it sounds as if that may already have happened. “She’s off her game, though, and I wondered if you knew what was wrong?”

There’s a silence, which stretches into pain. “Jim?”

“She walked out. She won’t take my calls. She” – there’s a gulp – “she said she was done trying to be enough. She just left.”

“I wanted to know what was wrong. I thought maybe if I invited all of you over to dinner but she said she wouldn’t have it…” Jim stops talking. Castle thinks that probably Jim can’t force any more words out. But Jim has made exactly the same mistake that he, Castle, did, weeks ago; trying to force Beckett into a mould she isn’t ready to fit.

Castle has no idea what to say to Jim. He tries to imagine how he’d feel if it were Alexis, what he’d want to do, and the thought sears his heart. Finally he finds some inadequate words.
“Jim. Don’t give up. You’re her only family” –

Jim makes an agonised noise. “She said I could play happy families with all of you, if she wasn’t enough.”

Oh fuck, fuck, fuck. Jim had slipped right into their happy family. Beckett had said it: he wanted to be a family again, so I couldn’t have what I wanted. But if Jim’s given her the impression that Castle’s family was more of a family than he and his Katie are, however wrong that impression is… oh, fuck.

“Jim, are you okay? Are you talking to Ed?”

“Yes.”

“Okay. Keep talking to Ed. Will you trust me to keep Beckett safe? I can’t tell you what she tells me, but will you trust me?”

“Got no choice, have I? If she won’t take my calls. I can’t bear her walking away again. She’s everything. She’s my daughter, Rick. She’s my daughter.” The phone goes dead.

Castle studies the table with intense focus until the unnecessary blurring of his eyes has cleared. The pain in Jim’s voice had been overwhelming – and yet the man was sober. His strength is extraordinary – so like his daughter. Both of them utterly broken by the other, and both of them putting it aside, burying it, ignoring it.

He buys two coffees, and some pastries each for good measure, and goes back up to the bullpen. Beckett is sitting scowling at the murder board.

“Where’ve you been?”

“Getting coffee and pastries. I thought you might need some food.”

She smiles wearily. “Guess so. We missed lunch. What did you get?”

“Muffins and bear claws. I thought about doughnuts, but everyone else would try and steal them and I didn’t want to be responsible for you shooting your co-workers because your blood sugar is low.”

She manages a slightly less weary smile. “Guess Bedford Hills wouldn’t suit me?”

“I’d visit you. I’d even try to break you out.”

“How? Disguise me as an alien or make up something about me being an undercover agent?”

Castle humphs. “I’d think of something. Anyway, eat up. I brought all these lovely pastries and I can’t eat them all myself.”

She takes a bear claw and then a bite, and discovers that she really is hungry. It’s gone, and the other following it, in no time. The coffee washes them down, and she sighs tiredly. “That’s better. I needed that.”

He props himself against the desk next to where she’s swinging her feet and no longer – quite – scowling at the board, unobtrusively and briefly covering her hand with his.

“So now what?”

“The centre she worked at won’t give me names without a warrant, and I can’t get a warrant without cause, and I don’t have cause unless one of those phone numbers pops, which will be hours. I can go to Bellevue and check out Dr Roberts’ alibi next, but after that there’s not a lot more to do till the phone records or canvassing give us a lead. Guess I’ll go home, get an early night, start again in the morning.”

“Good plan, Beckett,” Montgomery says from where he’s sneaked up behind her. She jumps.

“Sir?”

“Get an early night and then start fresh. Good plan.” He smiles as toothily as an alligator. “Saves me having to tell you to do it.”

“Sir,” she says. “C’mon, Castle. Let’s go check out this alibi.” She packs up her desk, conscious that Montgomery is watching, and powers down her computer.

The staff at Bellevue confirm Dr Roberts’ presence at all times. It must have been a pretty busy night, because he didn’t seem to be out of anyone’s sight for a moment, still less long enough to get down to East River Bikeway and beat his wife to death. Beckett crosses him off her list as a suspect, and determines to go to see him again tomorrow afternoon to discuss who might have hated his wife.

She drives smoothly round to drop Castle off at Broome Street.

“Do you want anything, Beckett?” Castle asks, far more in his voice than the words alone say. “I’ll come back with you, if you like.”

“Not tonight, thanks. Night.”

“Till tomorrow,” he says, leans over and swiftly kisses her. He’s out the car before she can react. When he looks through the windshield, though, she’s almost smiling as she waves. He’d believe in the smile more if he hadn’t seen her eyes brimming when he kissed her.
Beckett realises that she hadn’t switched her phone back on when she left the hospital, and does so. Her father has called twice. She deletes both messages, unheard. Lanie has called. She listens briefly, grimaces, and deletes that, too. Espo has called. She listens carefully to that one.

Yo, Beckett. Got the TOD, around ten thirty. Punched, and probably beaten with a branch, which I reckon is in the river. Someone took a helluva risk. Uniforms’ll have another go about that time tomorrow. So far, so good. Lanie’s not happy you didn’t come down yourself. Too bad, Beckett thinks. Lanie Parrish can go swivel. The vulgarity doesn’t help her mood, and nor does her phone ringing. Since it’s Lanie again, Beckett ignores it. She doesn’t even swipe it to reject. That’s only going to let Lanie know that she’s noticed. She makes her coffee and picks up a book and tries not to think about her father or the therapy session. When her phone rings again, she switches it to vibrate and continues to ignore it. She doesn’t need to be told that she’s not enough, either by Lanie or by her father. She just wants to be left alone.

She does yoga till her muscles scream, fails to bother with dinner, takes a long hot bath and goes to bed with her eyes completely dry. Crying won’t help. Crying never helps. Never had helped. She just needs to put it behind her, and she can do that by throwing herself into work, and when work’s done, maybe there will still be Castle.

As long as she doesn’t have to be with his family. She really can’t deal right now with knowing that his family is so much more, so much better, than she is. Not that it’s too surprising. They welcomed her father in as if he was already one of them, no hesitation, no reservations, no history to get hung up on. Nothing to be forgiven. No wonder he likes them better.

She’d considered cancelling therapy, but Montgomery will know. So she’ll go often enough for it to appear she’s done it right and then quit. No point. No one to fix herself for, and no need to protect her father. She needn’t ever have bothered. He was either strong enough by himself, or he wasn’t. Either way, she couldn’t change it. She wonders if she can confine it to fixing her issues with Castle’s family, and then she wonders what the point of that is if she doesn’t have a family of her own. Still, it might mean that Castle stayed around a little longer. It might cure this feeling of inadequacy, and the petty nastiness she hates in herself. Though he’d said she didn’t need to fix herself for him… but did he really mean that?

She tries to sort out her confused, confusing thoughts, and then to fall asleep, and finally succeeds in finding sleep, at least.

When she gets in the next day, the phone list is taped to her screen, with a note saying This way you can’t miss it. She smirks, briefly. There’s going to be a lot more canvassing today, once they’ve wiped out calls to Dr Roberts, and out of state calls. That’s what God invented uniforms for, and she’d done her share of it when she was in uniform. She starts slimming the list of numbers. It keeps her mind off everything else. Her father hasn’t rung again, yet, and that’s been eating at her since she woke up. But it wasn’t she who saved him, it was he himself. It’s always been he, himself. So he’ll do it, or he won’t do it, but she isn’t the reason or the cause.

But telling herself that doesn’t help, and all the time the guilt claws at her, and just like the last time she simply throws herself into work for the whole day to blot it out, knowing that at the end of the day it’s her second full therapy session and now she has no reason to make it work. The day is not improved by a series of messages from Lanie, none of which pertain to the case. She ignores their increasingly aggravated tone and demands for answers. She also manages to avoid Esposito’s beady-eyed stare by ensuring that he has enough to do with the canvass that he can’t corner her. She knows that’s simply deferring Nemesis, but that’s a better outcome than anything else. And she ignores her father.

She and Castle make another visit to Dr Roberts, but he can’t think of anyone who really disliked his wife: no professional jealousy, no disgruntled patients of whom he knows, no relatives who are named on her life insurance. Sure, he’ll be better off by the amount of her life insurance, but he’s totally devastated. He promises to tell them if anything at all occurs to him, offers them anything they need, searches, details, finances, anything at all that will find her killer, and then they leave him to his grief.

The day ends without any concrete results from the canvass, but the list is narrowing down. She leaves Ryan to the phone numbers and Espo to the canvass results, and departs. Castle had left some time ago, claiming that his eyes were bleeding and he was no good at fine detail anyway. He’s a big picture man, he had said. Espo had pointed out that Castle’s big picture is normally full of crazy stories, and Castle had retreated in some disarray.

And so she wends her weary way to Dr Burke’s office and therapy, in no mood to speak or explain or try. It’s the same perfectly groomed receptionist, the same blue painted room, as unsoothing as the last time.

“Good evening.”

“Hello.”

Dr Burke is sitting in his armchair, again, as dapper and as fussily formal as before; the same sharp intelligence sparking in his eyes. Beckett raises her defences further.

“In our previous session, Detective Beckett, you said that Mrs Berowitz was not listening to your father, and so you left.” She nods once, sharply. “But you, presumably, had heard his story before? It cannot have come as a surprise to you, given that you have informed me that he has undertaken the twelve-step program and that he has remained sober for slightly over five years. He must have told you his thoughts, and apologised to you for the hurt he caused you?”

“Yes. Of course he did.”

“And what did you do?”

“I forgave him.”

Her answer is, to Dr Burke’s well-practised ear, too quick, and too definite. Ah. “Naturally you did,” he says smoothly. There is no point in beginning that argument now. “But you were displeased with Mrs Berowitz.”

“Yeah. Dad was there to help her and she wouldn’t be helped.”

“Do you know what happened after you left?”

“Dad stayed for a while. Castle stayed with him.” Dr Burke forces himself not to react. He would have expected Mr Castle to leave with Detective Beckett but, as he had surmised in the previous session, she had left alone. “I suppose Dad told her a bit more.”

“Why did Mr Castle stay?”

Detective Beckett shrugs. “He’d managed to calm Julia down a couple of times. He probably stayed to make sure she wasn’t getting hysterical on Dad.”
“Did you see either of them following this intervention?”

“No. I was tired. Castle texted me, and I told him I wanted a quiet evening. He said Dad was fine, so I didn’t worry.”

Detective Beckett is quite clearly skirting the edges of the truth. Dr Burke is sure that she has not told a direct lie, but she has skated over something quite crucial. He makes a small note.

“So I went to work the next day, but I’d picked up a stomach bug and kept throwing up, and I had to go home till it was cleared.”

“How unfortunate.” Dr Burke does not believe that Detective Beckett had any form of physical illness at all. He believes, in fact, that she has just told him a lie. “You are very devoted to your career, are you not? You have been highly successful.”

Detective Beckett seizes upon the diversion.

“I enjoy my job.” That is clearly wholly sincere.

“Tell me again how you reached your current role.”

“When I had to come back here because of Dad, I finished at NYU and went to the Academy. It was a goal I could achieve. I couldn’t make Dad sober, but I could do that. Then, when I wasn’t trying to help him, I always had work. I found I really enjoyed it, and then I got put on a case and somehow I impressed Captain Montgomery, so I was transferred to the Twelfth and made detective. There’s always plenty to do when you’re working Homicide.”

“So when you were not at home, you always had your job to do?”

“Yes.”

Dr Burke is not at all satisfied by that answer. Detective Beckett should have had more to her life than her father and her job.

“Was there anyone in whom you could confide?”

“I…” Detective Beckett stops, for a second. “Dr Parrish knew.” Dr Burke cocks his head, indicating that she should continue. “But I didn’t need everyone knowing and thinking it was an excuse or feeling sorry for me. I didn’t need special treatment.”

“Who is Dr Parrish?”

“Lanie Parrish. She’s one of the MEs that I work with. I met her at NYU. We were friends.”

“Were?”

“We’ve grown apart.”

“Who is aware now?”

“My team, and my boss. Castle.”

“Mm. Do they treat it as an excuse?”

“No. We work around it. We sort the shifts out so it works out fairly.”
“They know the history, of course.” Detective Beckett nods again. “So I presume that they are sympathetic when you need to discuss it.” There is silence. Dr Burke leaves the silence unbroken.

“We work around it,” Detective Beckett eventually repeats. Dr Burke translates that to mean that she does not discuss it with her co-workers.

“How much working around is necessary?”

“Only when Dad is away. He’s been away once since Christmas.” A flash of unpleasant memory passes over Detective Beckett’s face. “Since Christmas he’d been more interested in what I’ve been doing.” An interesting choice of verb tense.

“More fatherly?”

“Yeah.”

“Was that pleasant?”

“Yes.”

“Would you characterise your relationship with your father as improving?” Dr Burke is exceedingly careful not to state a starting point for that improvement.

“Yes.”

“When did this improvement begin?”

“About six months after he got dry. We started having dinner every week, as long as I didn’t catch a new case.” Ah. That is not at all consistent with Detective Beckett’s statement about Christmas.

“I see. And when did you last see him?”

“Sunday.” That is clipped off. Dr Burke deduces that the meeting had not gone well.

“Thank you. Please make your next appointment for Friday.”

“Okay. Good night.”

Dr Burke would be prepared to swear in any courtroom that he had heard a sigh of relief as Detective Beckett left. He would also be prepared to give his professional opinion that her relief is at having evaded any matter that might have been relevant to her issues or might have given rise to Dr Burke learning anything of use. He is highly dissatisfied with the session, and with Detective Beckett. It had achieved almost nothing.

Beckett reaches home and starts to make herself coffee. She can’t think of anything else to do except go back to the precinct, and she can’t do that because someone will tattle to Montgomery and she’ll be deep in the shit straight away. She can’t face being benched again, for no reason at all. Her work is top class. She only needs to be left to get on with it. She looks at her phone, deletes the calls from Lanie unheard, deletes the messages from her father likewise – she doesn’t need to hear his lies and promises that he didn’t mean it; that he needs her, that she saved him. He did, and he doesn’t, and she didn’t. No point listening. They always lie. He’d said it himself: I always lied. Lying can become a habit, if it gives you an easy life. She can only save herself, and for her own sanity she can’t get sucked back into believing the lies. Better to accept reality, deal with the pain, and walk away from it. Save yourself. Protect yourself.
She sips her coffee and picks up a book, decides she can’t be bothered to read and switches on the TV, doesn’t like the choice of shows and switches it off, thinks about going out to run and doesn’t want to make that effort either. Nothing appeals to her at all. She looks at the little red beach stone, smooth in her white-edged grip, and wonders why she can’t just have some happiness.

She twists and turns the small crystal, thinking about the weekend just gone and how good it had been; contrasting that with the fiasco of Sunday evening, the stress of trying to get through Monday without simply collapsing and the unpleasantness of therapy. She resolutely does not sniff. It’s too late to call Castle and drag him out just because she’s miserable. She could call him, but then he’ll hear the upset in her voice no matter how she tries to hide it – he always does, even when no-one else can – and he’ll come round anyway, and it’s after eight and that’s not fair. He’s got a family to look after. She sniffs, and forces her eyes to dryness, and keeps forcing the tears back. She won’t cry. She never has and won’t now.

Naturally, there is a loud rap on the door just at the point she’s desperately trying not to dissolve into a puddle of unhappiness. She pads over quietly, so that if it’s anyone she doesn’t want to see – such as Lanie, or her father – she can pretend she’s not at home.

It’s Castle.

He’s the one and only person in the whole wide world that she might be able to cope with seeing. She opens the door – and buries her face in his coat as he enters. He toes the door shut and simply holds on to her.

Castle had gone home from the precinct early, firstly because he couldn’t help while everyone was following up police and other databases to which he has no access, and after they’d seen Dr Roberts there were no interesting things happening such as further interviews with witnesses or (more happily) suspects; and secondly because watching Beckett ignoring her phone, her father, and Lanie and pretending nothing at all is wrong, all the while expecting that she’ll be at therapy tonight, (it’s a guess, but the way she’s pushing for everything to be with her before five-thirty is quite a clue) is leaving him with a deep desire to remove her from the bullpen by any means available up to and including picking her up and carrying her. Since doing so will entail being shot, being shot is likely to be painful if not fatal, and he dislikes the thought of both pain and death, he takes the path of discretion and quietly departs.

He writes, somewhat less productively than he’d like, for a while, hoping that the distraction will clarify his thoughts as to what to do. No question but that he’ll turn up on Beckett’s doorstep shortly after eight, but whether beforehand he should talk to Lanie (a dangerous prospect) or to Jim (a worrying one) is vexing him substantially.

He thinks for a little longer. Lanie, Castle considers, is quite capable of looking after herself and is about as fragile as an allosaurus. Lanie needs to sort her own issues with Beckett: he is not getting into the middle of the clash of those titans. (He might sell tickets, though.) Jim... is very fragile indeed. He grits his teeth and prepares to lie through them for the next – however long he needs to.

“Jim, it’s Rick. Are you okay?” Are you sober? Please be sober, even though you’re being ripped apart.

“Yes. No.” A sucked-in breath, but sobriety. “Katie still won’t answer my calls.”

Castle thinks extremely quickly. Jim trusts him, and has done – God knows why: he wouldn’t trust any boy going out with Alexis, but presumably Jim is used to sizing people up immediately – from the get-go. Time to use it.
“Jim, what exactly did you say to Beck – Kate? There must have been something. This is just plain weird. She was perfectly happy with you right up to” – he coughs horribly to avoid saying Sunday afternoon and thereby having to explain their weekend to Jim. Somehow explaining to her father that he’d taken Beckett to the Hamptons for what could undoubtedly – but very wrongly – be characterised as a dirty weekend is all sorts of wrong. Very fortunately Jim is too upset to notice. “She’s spent years not walking away from you, making sure she’s there when you need her. She loves you, Jim. I’d have bet my loft she wouldn’t do this. So what did you say, and maybe we can fix it?”

Castle has no idea why Jim merely suggesting that he and his family should come for dinner would explode Beckett like it has done. They’d all got through the dinner the other night, after all, and Beckett hadn’t blown up there or after. Much. Not with her father, anyway. It had been Julia who’d triggered that, and even then she’d covered it all up in short order – at least with her father. He concludes that Jim has, surely inadvertently, said something that hit Beckett’s manifold insecurities head on, but for the life of him he can’t see how.

“I don’t know,” Jim says, as exasperated as his daughter might be. “Don’t you think I haven’t tried to work it out? I don’t get it.”

“Sure you’ve tried, but let’s work it out together. Tell me what you said – the exact words. It’s got to be in the words.”

“You think you know my daughter better than me?” Castle doesn’t answer that. After a few seconds, Jim sighs, defeated, weary and old. “Maybe you do, at that. Seems like I don’t know her at all.”

Jim pauses, and thinks back. “I was asking about you being round to dinner on Tuesday last, and she told me what she’d cooked. Sounded nice” –

“It was.”

“ – and then I suggested you should all come round, and said I’d help her cook. Said I wanted to hear a bit more about the theatre, said Alexis was cute but not like Katie, and she was fine with all that.” Castle rather doubts that, but it’s not that which has triggered a complete cluster bomb. “Then I said you were all really easy to get on with, and it was great, just like being part of a family again.” Uh-oh no. The full horror is still hitting Castle as Jim carries on. “And then she lost it.”

Oh shit oh shit oh shit. Oh God. Everything dawns on Castle. He’d guessed right. Jim couldn’t have phrased that worse if the city’s low lives had paid the Devil to whisper the right words in his ear to break Beckett. It’s frighteningly clear. Beckett heard that as you’re not enough of a family for me. She’d spent five years doing everything to keep her dad together, she’d said that if she’d done what she wanted then she wouldn’t have had to be family for him but he’d wanted to be a family and needed her – oh God - and one ill-considered sentence has blown that whole belief apart. The whole of the last five years, everything she’s sacrificed – and all she’s heard is that she isn’t enough of a family for Jim. Her whole life, wasted – for nothing.

“She just lost it and said she didn’t want you all in her apartment and she wouldn’t come if I invited you and I could play happy families all I wanted if she wasn’t enough. And then she said she was done.” Castle can hear Jim’s heart break all over again. “She left. She was crying. I haven’t seen her cry for years. She won’t take my calls and I don’t dare go see her in case she won’t open the door. What’ll I do without her? She’s my only family. She walked away before and it saved me, and she knows it. I don’t understand why she’s done it now, Rick. All I meant was that it looked like we were being part of your family. I thought… well, I thought you…” He dries up.
Oh, fuck. Oh, Jim. What have you done? Castle has absolutely no idea what Jim will do, but he certainly knows what Beckett is doing. She’s walking away from her father, who loves something else – so she thinks – far more than he loves her.

Again.
“Jim, I think I know what’s wrong.” Castle is about to tap dance his way across a very narrow safe path of misdirection and, if necessary, downright lies, through a minefield. “Beck- Kate’s been off her game because of Julia, who was so downright dumb about wanting Kate to help her that she really stressed her out. Then Julia wouldn’t listen to you or Kate and Kate was upset by it. She thought Julia should have listened. Kate can’t help Julia – orders – but Julia didn’t get that either. So Kate just saw Julia not even trying to help herself and trying to guilt-trip her. I think she’s been succeeding in that, too,” he says meditatively. Jim hisses. “So I think she – Kate – isn’t actually hearing what you were really saying. She just needs time.” And an ocean of therapy, but let’s not mention that. “She’ll come round when she realises that whatever she thinks she heard, it wasn’t what you said. You’re her family, and she knows it. She just needs time to clear her head.” He summons up a grin for his voice. “She’s pig-stubborn, your Katie. But she’ll get there.”

He just wishes he believes that she will. Pig-stubborn is the understatement of the last two millennia.

“You think so?” Jim sounds as if he’s seen the only oasis in a thousand miles of Sahara desert.

“I do,” Castle says with utter confidence. If his mother had seen him, she’d have known he’d inherited her talent. He can’t let Jim fall, so he’ll lie as much as he needs to in order to keep him on the right side of the line.

“You take care of her, Rick. She won’t let me, so you have to.”

“Okay,” Castle agrees, and manages not to say any of well you sure can’t, or what the hell do you think I’m doing or I intend to be taking care of Beckett for the rest of our lives.

After he’s finished talking – lying – to Jim, he frets his way through the time until he can expect Beckett to have returned home from the therapy session. He has a strong suspicion, amounting almost to certainty, that she didn’t bother co-operating. She was, whatever she said, only doing it because she thought it was the only way to save her father from knowing the truth. And now that’s not an issue.

Oh, fuck, what a mess.

He taps on Beckett’s door shortly after eight. Once it’s opened, an utterly beleaguered Beckett takes one look at him, falls into his arms (and not in the good way) and positively clings to him: her spar in a stormy sea. He kicks the door gently in order to shut it and closes his arms around her.

“Beckett, what’s up?” No answer. He thinks she might be crying, but since he can’t actually prise her off his chest to find out he couldn’t guarantee it. Eventually she looks up, eyes dry and blazingly, furiously, agonised.

“What’s been the point? What’s ever been the fucking point? He wants a different family. A better family. I gave up all my chance of having a family because I had to be his family and it was all wasted.”

Will was that serious? No wonder after they broke up Beckett punched hell out the bag and O’Leary. O’Leary got that reasoning wrong. But she hasn’t lost her chance of a family. He’ll see to that: but now is not the time to open that discussion.

“He never wanted it. I’m done. He’s never needed me. He saved himself – once I left. Couldn’t bear to see me. Drowned it in cheap booze. Stopped once I was gone. What's been the point?” She breathes deeply. “I should have stayed away from him.”

She rips herself out of Castle’s arms. “Well, he can have his wish. He can have some substitute family. Just don’t expect me to be a part of it.” Oh fuck. As if getting her to be comfortable in his loft, never mind with his family, wasn’t difficult enough already. “He ruined everything else and now he’s spoilt this too.”

“No. If I have to choose – there is no choice. I’ll stand with you. You, not him.”

“Me?” she says bleakly. “Yeah, right. Like I’m such a prize. Even my father likes another family better.”

“I like you better.” He rises to catch her in her tempestuous pacing, forcing her to halt. “Stand down, Beckett. Stop. Come here, and lean on me. I’m not letting you go.”

“You should.” She tries to tug away. Castle doesn’t let go.

“I won’t. You’re mine. Stay right here. Whatever’s wrong, I’ll be here.”

She collapses back into his strong embrace.

“I can’t do this. There’s no point. I can’t deal with it.”

“Kate.” She stops, shocked into silence by his use of her first name. “Kate. It’s up to you. It’s always up to you. But you’re really unhappy and I hate it when you’re this upset. Come and sit down.” There’s a slight resistance, which he ignores. “C’mon.” He pretty much sits her down by main force and then keeps a very heavy arm round her so that she can’t stand up again. After a second she eases under it and tucks closer. He pets, and doesn’t ask her any questions, and pets some more.

“No decisions. Not now. Stay here.” He wants to say he didn’t mean it; what you think you heard isn’t what he thinks he said. That’s going to be pointless. She’s too hurt and angry to listen or care, and trying to mend matters is going to fail, spectacularly. This is not the time to try. It’s also not the time to let on that he knows she’s at therapy, nor is it a good time to suggest that she should open this subject with the unfortunate therapist. This is a good time to keep his mouth firmly shut, his ears and heart open, and to stick to affection and – if indicated and accepted – physical comfort. Anything else will simply lead to arguments and then he’ll be as locked out as Lanie and Jim.

He has a thought. He parks it for a while, continuing to cosset Beckett close and let her recover herself. He doesn’t leave it too long, though. Beckett drowning in her own unshed tears should not be allowed to continue for any great length of time, so after a few moments he gently kisses the top of her head.

“C’mon, snuggle in. No thoughts, no decisions. There’s nothing you have to do about your father now. It’s all up to you what you do and when you do it, but don’t worry about it now. I’ve got a better idea.”

“What?” she mutters. There isn’t even a hint of snark in that, still less a sharp retort shutting down – or starting up – innuendo.

“O’Leary complained that you never go see him any more, and he said we should all go for a beer together.”

“He did?”
“Yeah. You were still in the break room.”

“Oh.” Beckett doesn’t exactly sound enthusiastic.

“So why don’t we see if he’s free for a drink tomorrow? Do something different. Cheer you up.” He grins mischievously, which is entirely wasted on Beckett, who isn’t looking up at his face. “He can tell me all about Officer Beckett and the trouble you got into as a rookie.”

“Why not? Did you bribe him to keep them quiet?” Castle says teasingly.

“There are none,” she replies quellingly.

“I don’t believe you,” Castle singsongs, childishly.

“I don’t care,” Beckett replies equally childishly, and glares. This involves her turning her face up so that Castle is treated to the full benefit of her pitch-black scowl. He is also, therefore, treated to the ability to kiss her, and does, assertively. She’s momentarily receptive, but then, unhappily, retreats. Another glare evidences itself.

“You’re trying to make me forget that you’re going to try to winkle information out of O’Leary, aren’t you?”

Well, no, actually. Castle is trying to make Beckett forget that she is absolutely distraught over her father. But if she’s jumping to that conclusion… it’s not so bad.

“Caught me,” he says penitently. And falsely. “But I think it would be nice to go for a beer with O’Leary, even if you won’t tell me any stories of Uniformed Officer Beckett.” His mind butterflies away. “Do you still have a uniform?” he asks very hopefully. “I’d really like to see you in uniform.”

“Dress uniform. And I’m not wearing it just for you to leer at.”

Castle arranges his face into an expression of extreme disappointment. “How unkind,” he pouts.

“It means something, that uniform; it means something when you put it on. It’s not there so you can ogle.”

Castle doesn’t tease further. “Okay, no uniform. Drinks with O’Leary, though.”

“Why are you so keen on O’Leary? Trying to replace Pete? You haven’t a hope in hell,” Beckett says peevishly.

“I liked him. He’s a fabulous beast, like a gryphon or a Sphinx.”

“The Sphinx was female, Castle.”

“Okay, not a Sphinx, a… a Minotaur. A good-tempered one, though. He was funny.”

“And he was a fan,” she says snarkily. “That was really why you liked him.”

Phew. Some return to normality. “That certainly helps. Maybe he’d like to be a character. I’m always looking for minor characters. Shall I ask him?” Castle bounces. “Think he’d like it?” He’d better like it. He’s been written in for a week already.
“Up to him,” Beckett shrugs. “If he doesn’t like what you write he’ll be able to turn you into pulp and juice you.”

“He won’t.”

Beckett quirks an eyebrow, and shifts a little to nestle closer. She still looks pallid, her muscles are still knotted and her hands tight-twined and white-knuckled – but it’s better than the arid agony of half an hour ago.

“It’ll be a very sympathetic character.”

“Huh.” Beckett stiffens abruptly. “What about the one you’re basing on me? What’s she like?”

This is probably not a good moment to make jokes about it.

“Beautiful, brilliant, sexy and driven,” he says truthfully.

There’s silence. Her head is dipped so that he can’t see her face. Castle tips Beckett’s chin up against dogged, but futile, resistance and finds her blinking desperately to clear her brimming eyes.

“Hey, hey. None of that. It’s an insult to my deathless prose.” She’s still quiet. “Okay, enough. False modesty is very unbecoming. You know just how sexy you are.” He leans down and kisses her in a way that’s designed to prove it, hard and searching, his free hand roaming down to pull her round and swing her legs up across his. The best way he can think of to distract Beckett from her misery is to drown her in desire: smooth and strong and forceful in the way she needs. It’s only temporary, but for now it’s a way to ease her, to give her a break.

His voice drops into the velvety baritone that coats her nerves and strokes her skin and leaves her – without a single second of resistance – turning to Kat who is hopelessly addicted to this strong man and enjoys it. Him. Her Castle who keeps her petted and protected and cherished, even when her whole world, everything she’s done and everything she’s stood for in the last five years, has broken around her. She knows she’s clinging to him, and that she can’t let herself make the same mistake as she had with Royce, but she recognises the possibility and she’s trying really hard not to think of Castle as the only way out. He’s not. He’s not responsible for her. She is.

It’s all up to you, he had said. It’s always up to you. He’s making sure she knows he won’t try and force her any more. She needs to make sure that – while he’ll be there for her – she decides what’s right for her. Maybe that’s the point. Making sure that she’s not inadvertently making Castle her only hope. That’s a burden she’d suffered herself. That she thought she’d suffered, anyway, she thinks bitterly. But she hasn’t, yet. She hasn’t tried to second-guess her therapy with him – she hasn’t even told him she’s already attending. She isn’t involving him in her fight with Dr Parrish or expecting him to intervene or asking him to talk to her father – hell, no.

Only you can save yourself. Other people can’t save you. But she’s not asking him to. And it’s not like she’s going to be in therapy for long, now. If her father doesn’t need her and doesn’t want her then she doesn’t need to worry about how he might feel because she won’t be seeing him.

Here and now Castle’s offering her what she wants, needs and likes (and maybe far more than likes) and she only needs to say yes to that. She falls into his grasp and his kiss and finds that both are more than enough to stop her thinking about anything else.

Annoyingly, he stops kissing her, and doesn’t let her carry on kissing him. Not the idea. She emits a pettish little noise.

“So,” Castle says happily, “I’ll give O’Leary a call and we can see if he’s free tomorrow or Thursday.” He is very sneakily trying to find out if Beckett is at therapy on either day. Tomorrow seems unlikely, and in fact he expects it to be Friday to allow some downtime in between, but confirmation wouldn’t hurt.

“Okay,” Beckett says, less unenthusiastically than he might have expected. A moment’s thought tells him that if she’s out with O’Leary she has a good excuse to avoid Lanie, who has left him a couple of blisteringly expressed messages which he has entirely ignored. “When?”

“Let’s call him now.” He stops. “Oh. I don’t have a number. Have you got it?”

Beckett scrolls through her contact list and finds the number to dial.

“Hey, O’Leary.”

“Beckett!”

“O’Leary, you wanna go for a beer with me” – Castle squawks – “and Castle tomorrow? Or Thursday, if not tomorrow?”

“Sure,” he rumbles delightedly. “Great. When are you off-shift tomorrow?”

“Sixish. You?”

“Same. Let’s go to Hell’s Kitchen. Lots of bars.”

“You trying to find your Irish roots again?”

“Sure. Molloy’s.”

“You like their burgers just as much as I do, Beckett. C’mon.”

“Okay,” she says in a falsely put-upon tone. “Molloy’s, after shift-end. Mine’s a soda, if you get there first. Castle can fend for himself.”

“Coors for me, if you beat me there. See you tomorrow.”

“Bye.”

“So?” Castle asks hopefully.

“We’ll meet him tomorrow, after work.” Castle grins broadly. Beckett rolls her eyes. “No stories. None.” The grin does not diminish. She sighs.

“And now that you’ve done that,” Castle murmurs, “where were we?”

“Here,” Beckett says definitively, and tugs his head back down to hers. Castle’s reaction is itself pleasingly definite, and she slides away into his sure touch and possessive, assertive desire.

Afterwards, though, he has to go. She knows he has to go; he knows he has to go, and neither fact stops them holding each other for just one more moment, and another, and another, until Castle pulls himself away much more slowly than he ought to and, as he dresses, watches Beckett curl herself around the pillow on which he’d been lying, burying her face in it. He steps back to the bed, and strokes over her hair, leans down to drop a kiss on the back of her head.
And then he leaves.

When she gets in, burying the fact that she has no family left in a focus on solving her case as soon as possible, there’s another list of numbers taped to her screen, with highlighting, and a Post-It note saying Beckett, got a hit. This one x-ref with patients and canvass. Mrs Donbass. There’s an address, too. However, homicide or no homicide, and no matter how much she wants to get going and get it solved, calling on a witness or suspect at seven-thirty a.m. is extremely unlikely to receive a co-operative or indeed pleasant response. She will just have to wait. She doesn’t like waiting.

To distract herself until it’s a reasonable hour at which she can expect this prospective witness (or suspect) to be finished with the morning chaos of, most likely, breakfast and chores or possibly school runs, she reads through the rest of the phone list to see if anything pops out, cross-referencing with Espo’s canvass.

At least, that’s what she intended to do. Only eight numbers in, Espo has slipped in unnoticed – clearly she didn’t notice, because his jacket is off and his desk as lived-in as normal once he gets going – and is looming over her desk, scowling at her.

“Yo,” he says.

“Hey.”

“Want a word.”

Here we go. “Okay.” She leads off to a handily empty conference room, though Espo looks as if he’s contemplating one of the interrogation rooms instead. She has a sinking feeling – as if her feelings weren’t sunk enough already for external reasons – that this is the chat she was hoping that she’d avoided. She turns to him, no expression other than the norm. “What is it?”

“What’s up with you? You don’t go to the morgue, you don’t return Lanie’s calls, you look like shit. Again.”

“Best use of resources,” Beckett says briskly. “It shouldn’t always be me who goes to the morgue, you and Ryan need to go too. Broaden your experience – and stop Ryan fainting at the sight of a Y-cut.” Espo snickers. “Dr Parrish hasn’t called me about anything to do with the case.” She manufactures a really nasty grin. “And if your best chat-up line is you look like shit, it’s no wonder you haven’t had a date in months.”

“I had a date Saturday,” Espo growls indignantly.

Beckett raises both eyebrows. “What with, an M-16?” He splutters in a very satisfying way.

“No! She was a hot” – he notices Beckett’s interested expression and stumbles to a halt, which is also very satisfying. She starts to move to the door. Espo leans on it with no subtlety at all to hold it shut. “You’re weaselling out. What’s up?”

“Nothing. I’ve got work to do. Excuse me.”

“Nah. You still cross with Lanie for Monday?”

“No. If she wants to fight with you three that’s not my problem. Just don’t do it over my desk. There’s a perfectly good gym upstairs.”

“She was fighting with you.”
“Takes two to fight. I wasn’t fighting. Dr Parrish can do as she pleases.”

“She came lookin’ for you Friday.”

“Bit stupid. I told her I was busy. Offered her another night and she didn’t want to know. So butt out, Espo, because it’s not me who’s causing a problem here.” She looks at him. “Move away from the door. I’m going back to work.”

Espo does. Beckett’s voice and posture don’t incline him to believe that he’ll get any answers at all. Maybe Lanie will be a bit more talkative.

“You wanna hit the mats at lunchtime?” he says, extending an olive branch.

“Let’s see where I get to. I want to interview this Mrs Donbass that popped on the phone list and the canvass. What’s she like?”

“Mid-height, maybe five-five, blonde, got a kid – baby. Baby was crying all the time I was tryin’ to talk to her. Gave up after five minutes. Thought my head would explode.”

Beckett can sympathise with that. Not necessarily the reason, but certainly the exploding head. She can already feel the beginnings of tension in her temples. She might have put Espo back in his box, but she doesn’t really think that she’s managed to get Lanie – Dr Parrish, dammit – off her case. Still, the longer she ignores her the more likely it is that she won’t try again. She goes back to the list.

At eight-thirty she calls Castle to meet her at 12-18 East 1st Street. She’ll walk: it’s only a couple of hundred yards and the fresh late-February air will clear her head of its irritation with Esposito. Baby, huh? That doesn’t exactly indicate a likely candidate for her killer, but she’ll keep an open mind.
Beckett is unreasonably comforted to see Castle striding across the sidewalk to the building. A considerable part of it is because she has absolutely no desire or idea how to deal with a parent with a constantly crying baby, but at least if there are both of them there is some hope that Castle can talk the same language as the mother. He’d said that Alexis had gone through a period of crying all the time. The thought of Castle-being-father bites nastily at her gut, but she pushes it off and covers it with the thought that she needs this for a case. Nothing to do with anything else. Nothing at all.

The Donbasses clearly have cash. This is an expensive apartment and even Castle looks as if it’s better than he’d expected, though it doesn’t compare to his loft.

“Mrs Donbass, we’d like to talk to you about Delaine Roberts.”

Mrs Donbass is, as Esposito had said, around five-five or a little less, naturally blonde (or she has an excellent hairdresser and goes weekly) and what Beckett would describe rather unkindly as chocolate-box pretty: big light blue eyes, a cute slightly snub nose, curvy. She also has black rings under her eyes that her makeup does not disguise, and looks tired, harried and very stressed. The reason is obvious: in a swinging cot arrangement in the smart living room is a crying baby. Well, crying is an understatement. Screaming. Loudly and very unhappily. Beckett wanders over and finds that the baby is red-faced, with its tiny fists clenched. She has an unexpected wave of fellow-feeling for it. Since it’s dressed in a pink onesie, she assumes that it’s a girl.

Mrs Donbass casts a hopeless glance at the cot. “She just doesn’t stop crying. I’ve no idea what to do. My husband doesn’t know what to do, and now he’s staying at work all hours and it’s because I can’t settle her.”

Castle comes over and looks at the noisy scrap. “She’s cute,” he says softly, and extends a broad finger to touch the tiny hand. “How old is she?”

“Four months.”

Castle gently taps at the clenched fist. The baby looks up at him and emits another shriek. “There, there,” he rumbles. “That’s not nice.” She looks hugely unimpressed. He takes the little fist in two fingers and wobbles it delicately. The shriek changes to a squawk.

“That’s the quietest she’s been for a week.” Beckett wonders how anyone within a mile has survived. Earplugs? Valium? Moving out?

“Can I cuddle her? My daughter’s fifteen, and I haven’t cuddled a baby in forever. Please?”

Castle looks massively hopeful. Beckett is open-mouthed. It’s only a case. It’s only a case and she can cope with this. Besides which, it’s a baby. She has no problems with a baby. It’s when they’re much bigger she gets edgy and the memories bite. Babies are just fine. Just so long as she doesn’t have to cuddle it. Her.

“Well…”

“I’ll be really careful.” Beckett suddenly recognises the Castle technique of calming stressed women. He’s very good at it: the big, pleading eyes, the air of come-on-it’ll-be-fine, the intense focus on the one thing sure to make them comfortable. But as with Mrs Berowitz, this isn’t personal. He looks at Beckett, where it is personal, completely differently.
Castle reaches into the cot-contraption and lifts the baby out: one broad hand cradling her head, one under her chubby, diapered bottom. It – she – is still squawking, but the noise has changed from tempestuous unhappiness at brass-band volume to confusion at a lesser volume. It is almost possible to hear oneself think, now. Mrs Donbass glances at Castle, is clearly content that he is not breaking her precious baby, and acquires an expression of enormous relief as the decibel count continues to drop. Castle jiggles the child gently, crooning nonsense in a soothing baritone and cuddling the baby against his wide chest. “There we are, poppet. Shhh, shhhh, pretty girl. Let mommy have a minute…”

Beckett tunes it out, along with the astonishingly disconcerting sight of Castle with a tiny baby against him. Castle’s amazing ability to soothe upset females clearly begins at their birth. She can let him cope with that, since it’s given her an open run at Mrs Donbass.

“So, Mrs Donbass, how did you know Mrs Roberts?”

“Mrs Roberts?”

“Delaine Roberts. She was a physiotherapist at the clinic on East Fourteenth.”

“Della? Della Roberts?”

“Yes. How did you know her?”

“She treated me for a while. Before I had Callie.”

“You called her six or seven times in the last week. What was that all about?” Beckett is soothingly sympathetic.

“I wanted her to see Callie. One of my friends at baby group said I should try cranial osteopathy.” Beckett looks entirely blank. Castle turns round from where he’s been talking non-stop to the baby: pointing out all sorts of things out the window, like clouds, and buildings, and pigeons; all of which have two huge advantages over said baby, being silent and elsewhere. However, he has kept it – her – quietish for at least the last few minutes, and in fact the baby has now been muted to a general level of gurgle with occasional happy – and loud – squeaks.

“Like skull massage?” he says. Somehow it’s not a surprise that Castle’s heard the term.

“Yes. It was recommended by my friend and I wanted to ask Della if she would do it.” Her face turns annoyed. “She wouldn’t. She said it had no basis in science and could actually harm my baby.” Her voice rises indignantly. “I’d never harm my Callie.” Callie starts to whimper, and Castle returns to jiggling and crooning.

“Of course not,” Beckett soothes.

“I just wanted her to stop crying and be happy. But Della wouldn’t help me. She said I should be making sure my husband gave me more support. That was all she ever said. Get Cal to help out more. It’s his baby too. But when I asked him he got cross and said he had to work to support us both and I had to deal with the baby while he made the money.”

“You last called her on Monday morning.”

“Callie cried all night. I called her to make her listen to the noise so she understood. She said I could come to the clinic.”
“Did that help?”

“Sure. I went at nine-thirty.” Beckett doesn’t react to the timing. “She saw Callie but she still wouldn’t stop crying. Sometimes taking Callie for a walk helps, so that’s what I said I was going to do. Then I went to Cal’s office. And Callie was still crying so it didn’t work.”

Callie is not, in fact, crying at the moment. Callie is staring at Castle, who is pulling faces at her and tickling her tummy. Beckett wouldn’t like to speculate as to which of them is more mature, though she’s betting on the baby.

“Okay. Thank you, Mrs Donbass. That’s been very helpful.” She turns round. Castle is blowing raspberries against Callie’s cheek. Honestly, what age is he?

“She’s gorgeous,” he says sincerely. “So cute.” Slightly reluctantly, he gives the baby back to Mrs Donbass. Callie doesn’t, rather surprisingly, protest. In fact, she – now she’s not red-faced and screaming – is really quite nice. As long as she’s with someone else.

“You coming, Castle?”

“Yeah. Thanks, Mrs Donbass.” He looks a little wistful as they go back down to the street.

“You okay there, Castle?” She won’t get wound up about him petting babies. It let her interview Mrs Donbass, and her instincts are twitching.

“Yes.” More wistfulness. “Babies are so cute.” She’s about to sigh at his sappiness. “As long as you can give them back. It’s really hard when they’re always crying. Torture.” Ah, that’s better. If he’d been sappy for any longer she’d have been forced to shoot him.

“Let’s get back,” she says briskly. “I want to check that out. Something’s off, but I don’t know what yet.”

They’re just coming up to the Twelfth when Beckett’s phone rings. She looks at it, tuts, and with no hesitation declines the call. Castle’s glance asks the question. “Dr Parrish. If it’s important or to do with the case she’ll leave a message.”

“You… don’t think it might be easier just to speak to her?”

“If I want my head bitten off I’ll jump into the grizzly bear enclosure at the Zoo.”

That does not sound to Castle as if anything’s likely to get better between Beckett and Lanie in the immediate future.

“You could simply have the fight she’s spoiling for, and then it would be done.”

Beckett sags. Droops. “No,” she says, and it sounds defeated. Castle looks down at her, and doesn’t press. Strangely, she starts again. “Not now. She’s one thing too many. Anyway, she’s not important.” It sounds as if she’s trying to convince herself. Castle manages a quick half-hug before the elevator doors open and the momentary sag has gone. It has not, however, been forgotten.

Ryan has, without needing to be prompted, obtained the CCTV footage from the clinic entrance, and, sure enough, Della Roberts had walked out with Mrs Donbass and the perpetually screaming Callie. What is rather strange, however, is that there is no footage of her walking back in. None. And the time of walking out is strangely coincident with the likely time of death. Which is not proof, but is certainly very suspicious.
“I don’t see how or why she could have done it,” Beckett says crossly, “but I’m sure she had something to do with it.”

“Bit difficult, with a screaming baby. More likely to snap at home and go for her husband… or the baby.”

“Uh?”

“Well, her husband isn’t helping her with the baby, and she’s exhausted, and trust me, Beckett, when your baby cries all the time you’ll do anything to make it stop.”

“You’re the one who’d know,” she says neutrally.

“I would. That was Alexis, for two weeks. Only two weeks. It was hell.”

Somehow, that almost makes this case bearable: to know that even to the most devoted father children aren’t always perfect, or perfectly loved. Just so long as she doesn’t think about the point that most fathers still love their children even after they have grown up.

“Huh,” she says again, as more of a conversation-ending punctuation point.

A few more interesting elements are added to the timeline, but Beckett’s glare and Castle’s commentary don’t pull anything into sharp focus.

“Hold on,” Castle suddenly says. “What about the husband?”

“Dr Roberts?”

“No, Donbass. How’s he play into this?” He starts to speak faster. “It’s old-fashioned. Maybe he’s old-fashioned. Maybe he’s just an ass. Dumbass – hey, that nearly rhymes: Donbass dumbass” –

“Focus, Castle!”

“Yeah, right, okay. So he’s got his wife at home – he must be really pulling it down – and she’s pregnant and he’s going to have a family, be the patriarch, head of the house: pretty wife, beautiful baby, everything just the way his dad had it, just the way life should be. It’s gonna be great.”

“So?”

“So the baby arrives, and it’s not like he thinks. His wife’s exhausted. Really exhausted – you saw. Not so pretty, and too tired to care. Too tired for him, too. Only thing she’s focused on is the baby, little Callie. And little Callie’s not what he expected, either. Babies are a lot of work even if they’re sleeping well, and little Callie isn’t sleeping well, and she’s crying all the time. He’s not going home, not helping out, it’s all her fault, all her responsibility. After all, he’s the daddy.”

“Yeah, but why would he kill Della? He’s got no reason. He’s doing just fine.”

“I think he did.”

“What? How?”

“I think we’ll find that Mrs Donbass called Cal to say she was going to the clinic, and begged him to meet her there. I think Cal said no. I think Mrs Donbass asked Della to talk to Cal, and Della said she would, and Cal feels like just the sort of idiot not to take it well and lash out.”

“But…” she stops. “Okay. If your theory” – she doesn’t say crazy, but it’s there on the air – “has any validity at all, we need to dig into Cal. Still, it seems a serious over-reaction to being told you’re a jerk.”

“Never underestimate the size of the male ego.”

“How can I? You’re here.”

Castle fakes a wound to the heart, Beckett rolls her eyes, and Esposito and Ryan, who have slunk up to see what’s going on, snigger.

“ ‘S lunchtime, Beckett.”

“And?”

“And,” says Espo menacingly, “you were too slow on Thursday, and it’s Wednesday now and you haven’t been in the gym since, so time for another round.”

“Okay. Give me five minutes.”

Fifty minutes later another brutal round of sparring is over, and Beckett is, again, tapped out on the mat. Espo hadn’t gone down noticeably more, but Beckett had gone down noticeably less. Amazingly, Castle thinks it was even faster than last time. He waits for her as Ryan waits for Espo, and the four of them go downstairs.

Shift end comes, and Cal Donbass is being taken apart, metaphorically. Everything they can find out about him is splattered on the murder board like blood round the corpse. He’s a good looking man, bulky in a weight-trained way; another Wall Street winner. Beckett takes an instant dislike to his smug, I’m-in-charge face. Or maybe that’s just because he couldn’t lower himself to help his wife. He’s pulling down megabucks from a Midtown-based hedge fund, which also doesn’t endear him to Beckett.

“Right. We need footage from his building, and we need to haul him in.”

“Not tonight, Detectives.” Montgomery has sidled up behind them all. “Enough for today. You don’t have enough to bring him in yet, and you certainly won’t get a warrant on Castle’s theories.” He smiles benevolently on them all. “Home time, Detectives. Scoot.”

All three detectives, and their pet writer, look at him as if he’s crazy.

“Scoot. We’re so far out of sight at the top of the stats we can afford you four to go home at shift end today. You can close the case tomorrow.”

“Beer?” says Ryan hopefully.

“You betcha.” Espo’s on it at near-light speed.

“Mountain-man?”

“Yeah. O’Leary.”

“Huh. Castle?”

“I’m going with Beckett. I want to see this mountain.”
“We’ll come too.”

“No, you won’t.” Beckett states flatly. “This isn’t a party. I’m seeing an old pal. I don’t need you glaring at him.”

“We wouldn’t.”

“You so would, Espo. You can’t stand that he could take you down sparring. Last time you sulked for a week. I’m not having you spoiling my evening.”

“I could take him.”

“Guys, no. My evening. You are not invited. Shoo.”

“How’s Castle going?”

“You sayin’ you’re bored with us?”

“Never,” he says hurriedly. “But I need some minor characters.”

“We’re major characters?” Ryan asks.

“Sure you are.”

“Okaaayyy. But he’d better not be a big character. That’s us, bro.”

Beckett snickers. “He couldn’t be little,” she says, and exits before anyone has stopped groaning at the descriptor. Castle ambles after her, not hurrying at all. Ryan exchanges a glance with Espo.

“You let that go easy, man.”

“Not planning to get into it. Just wanted to rag a bit. She ’n’ O’Leary go way back. Like, way back. Before she was ever a detective, or in the Twelfth. Not buttin’ in on that.”

“So how’s Castle got in?”

Esposito casts Ryan a pained glance. “Bro, when’s Castle not trailed after Beckett? She don’t even bother tellin’ him to quit. Waste of breath.”

“Specially when they’re together.”

“Yeah.”

Castle summons a cab, rather than fighting it out in the rush hour subway. It also has the huge advantage that he can sling an arm round Beckett, who, now that the rush of work-induced adrenaline has stopped, is again a little tired and pale. She needs a hug, and he is very good at delivering hugs. She wriggles closer. Far too soon – whatever happened to rush-hour traffic? – they’re at Molloys.

“What was that about O’Leary trying to find his Irish roots?”

“Oh, he’s always going on about his great-grandmother coming from Ireland. He’s never been nearer Ireland than East Harlem. Don’t think he’s ever been out of state.”
“I been outta state, Beckett. I went to the Bronx once.”

Beckett laughs at the joke. “Hey, O’Leary,” she grins, and turns into his bear hug. Castle watches her disappear into his massive form and is hard put to it not to snatch her back out again. He’s the one who hugs her. Not Kodiak bears. O’Leary puts her back down on her feet and extends a hand to Castle.

“Hey, Castle. Nice to see you again. You still hanging around the Twelfth? You should come see us at Central Park. Much more fun.” He grins widely. “An’ I’m much prettier than Beckett here.” She splutters.

Castle laughs. “There’s certainly more of you to observe.” There is a low-toned growl behind him. It might contain there’d better be.

They find a table with enough space for O’Leary to stretch his legs without tripping everyone up. Castle manoeuvres matters so that Beckett ends up in between the two men – and notes without too much surprise not only O’Leary’s approving glance but his unobtrusive co-operation. Seems like he’s noticed Beckett’s off-duty fragility too. Beers for the men and soda for Beckett appear, and everyone more or less relaxes. Conversation swiftly turns to case-work. O’Leary is deeply unimpressed by Cal Donbass.

“Asshole like that shouldn’t get to have a wife, never mind a cute little baby.”

“Yeah,” Castle agrees. “Can’t wait to see you rip into him in Interrogation, Beckett.”

“You still the terror you used to be?”

“Uh?” Castle queries.

“Used to be” –

“O’Leary,” Beckett says warningly, which has no effect on the mountainous hulk next to her or on his mischievous smile.

“Used to be, that if we got a witness who might be a suspect – this was when she was in uniform with me, we were in the Sixth together for a bit – they’d send us in for a little time. Mix things up some. So this one time, we picked up a lowlife” –

“He was a pimp, O’Leary.”

“Yeah – an’ the detective thought he needed a little bit of – er – warming up. So – wasn’t exactly procedure, but… I got told to look scary” –

“They meant stop smiling that sappy grin you’d always got on,” Beckett interjects, grinning herself.

“ – an’ Beckett here got told to look cute.” Castle snickers at the thought. “So we did. But the lowlife didn’t have much in the way of smarts,” he digresses for a moment, “so how he was running girls I don’t know – an’ he took a look at Beckett an’ decided he’d hit on her.” Castle’s eyes fly open wide. Beckett nods, and lets O’Leary carry on. “So he – er – made a few comments” –

“He suggested I’d quadruple my take-home if I was turning tricks for him,” Beckett puts in dryly.

“Yep – but he hadn’t banked on Beckett an’ me payin’ attention to the Detectives and their work. So Beckett started playin’ along a bit, an’ I stood there behind her like I’d heard it all before an’ I was inclined to go with it for some of the take” –
“You pair pretended you were both corrupt and would go along with the arrangement? And this guy had seen you and believed that? In a recorded interrogation room?”

“I said he was dumb.”

“You got that right. It sounds like if he were any dumber he’d have forgotten how to breathe if someone didn’t remind him.”

O’Leary carries on. “So anyways, we played along for a bit, an’ I thought that we were being left with him for a pretty long time but it’s not uniforms’ place to argue with the detective’s strategy, so we carried on, an’ suddenly the detective came in with this shit-eating grin an’ says ‘Palermo, you’re under arrest for the murder of Cara O’Flynn and for compelling and promoting prostitution.’ Takes him away, an’ we dunno what to do so we go back to the bullpen. Ten minutes later the detective’s back an’ thanking us for getting the story outta him.” He stops for a second, and the iceberg range of his teeth appears. “First time she brought someone down.”

“She is sitting right here,” Beckett says indignantly. O’Leary ignores her.

“Not the last. We had a lotta fun, didn’t we?”

“Yeah. Then I got posted to the Twelfth and you went to Central Park and we couldn’t do it any more.” She smiles a little wistfully. “Good times. Everyone used to expect that O’Leary would be the scary cop and I’d be all sweet and nice. When they found it was the other way round they were usually so surprised that they admitted things before they’d even realised they’d opened their mouths. Of course, the detectives never let us loose on anyone important, but it was good fun and good practice.”

“Sounds like it. I’ll get another round in. Same again?”

Everyone agrees, and Castle goes to get more drinks.
“So you didn’t meet at the Academy?” Castle asks.

“No. O’Leary was a class or two ahead of me. I heard about him, though.”

“You did?” O’Leary says, clearly surprised.

“Oh, yes. Everyone was still talking about the Bigfoot who barely fitted through the doors and had to get his uniform made specially.” She pauses, but Castle can tell there’s more to it, not least because O’Leary is trying to prove that a tectonic plate can cower.

“Don’t, Beckett. That’s not fair.”

“They were talking more about the night someone challenged you to lift weights.” That doesn’t sound terribly interesting, but O’Leary is quite definitely cringing.

“Please, Beckett. Just stop now.”

“Weights?”

“That would have been fine. It was just that some bright spark suggested that some of the other rookies would do as weights.”

Castle snorts with laughter. “Are there pictures? Please tell me there are pictures.”

“No pictures.” O’Leary is trying to hide behind a very inadequate bottle of beer. “But his name is legend.”

O’Leary acquires an evil glint in his eye. “Beckett, how about I tell Castle here about how we met?” She squawks and threatens, but between O’Leary’s desire for revenge and Castle’s enthusiasm for hearing the tale (again) – and between the two men exchanging a mischievous glance of complete agreement and then making sure that she can’t maim, vivisect or shoot either of them by holding her hands (Castle approves of O’Leary doing that, when it saves him a world of pain) – the whole tale comes out. It’s just as hilarious the second time around, which is possibly fortunate as it disguises the fact that Castle’s already heard it.

“I’ll get you for this, O’Leary,” Beckett threatens.

“Aww, sure you’ll try. I can still out spar you.” Beckett descends into a grumpy cloud of blackly ominous mutterings. O’Leary, whose bravery clearly knows no bounds, pats her on the head. “Fair’s fair. You’re so cute when you’re sulking.” She punches him in the ribs, which appears to have the same effect on O’Leary as punching the chair cushion would have. None. The ominous mutterings reappear, not noticeably diminished even when Castle finally stops laughing.

Some dinner restores moderate harmony – or at least Beckett has stopped scowling. O’Leary and Beckett trade stories and shared memories, and Castle understands that though they may have “drifted”, as O’Leary put it, they were very close. Not close enough, though, for Beckett to confide in O’Leary. Another round is collected, and conversation restarts.

“You’re looking a bit better,” O’Leary says, peering at Beckett much in the manner – and size – that one of the faces from Mount Rushmore might do. “You looked sick when I got here. Something wrong, Beckett? If you give me a bug I’ll be pissed at you.”
“I’m fine. No bugs.”

“Hm,” O’Leary says sceptically. Castle admires his courage but not his discretion, and starts trying to come up with a way to change the direction of the impending conversation. “So if you don’t have a sick bug, what’s the bug up your ass?” O’Leary’s innate intelligence and investigative nous is clearly heading to the surface faster than Jaws when killing Quint. “Something bothering you at work?”

“Okay, so not work.” With Beckett carefully placed in between them, Castle can’t nudge him to divert the oil-tanker. “Is your dad okay?”

“Fine.”

“Not fine, then,” O’Leary says equably. “C’mon, this is me you’re talkin’ to.”

“Nothing’s wrong, O’Leary. Leave it.”

Castle manages to meet O’Leary’s eyes over the top of Beckett’s head, and is surprised by the resolve in them.

“You never could lie to me,” he says. “Don’t try now. You looked sick fed up when you were dealin’ with Mr Berowitz a couple of weeks back, an’ I still don’t know what you were doin’ playing Missing Persons. You sounded shook up when I called you about him, even if you were tryin’ to hide it. An’ then you turned up searchin’ for him again to hang out with us rather than your own bullpen, which was weird, looking like hell, and you weren’t too keen on leaving with Castle here either. Didn’t call you on it then, but you still look sick now.”

O’Leary puts a meaty arm around Beckett, which looks like more of an arrest than a provision of comfort. “I never asked you about it before, years ago. Might’ve been a mistake, that. But you’ve looked off every time I’ve seen you in three weeks and if it’s not work it must be home.” He looks at her. “So since it’s not Castle here – seein’ as he’s alive and with you – must be your dad. An’ I know what fine means when it’s you sayin’ it. It means it’s not fine at all.”

Castle stays extremely quiet. It is faintly possible that O’Leary might achieve the generally impossible, and get out of the next five minutes alive.

“Not your problem, O’Leary. Let’s stick to the beer and stories.”

“If you don’t wanna talk, we won’t.” This sounds familiar. “Just don’t not talk till you make yourself sick, ‘kay?” Bit late for that one. “An’ whatever’s wrong with you and your dad, try’n sort it out.” Oh shit. Not the best thing to say. Beckett says precisely nothing, for an instant.

“Since my father just made it pretty clear I’m not enough family for him, I won’t be trying to sort anything out.” Her tone would cut glass. Her face is by no means as smooth.

“Oh, Beckett,” O’Leary says gently. “What’s he done this time?” He’s still got an arm round her. His eyes meet Castle’s again. Castle takes the message entirely accurately and places a very tentative hand on Beckett’s knee. She doesn’t react.

“It doesn’t matter.” She takes a drink of her soda, and says nothing more.

“‘Kay,” O’Leary says. “If you wanna come out, lemme know. Let’s have another drink and talk about something else.”

She briefly turns into him, turns away again as his arm lifts. It’s instantly replaced by Castle’s arm. He notes with some interest that Beckett doesn’t hesitate to lean into him much more than she had with her pet mountain, and notes further the stress in her shoulders. He’s learned an awful lot in the last couple of hours, mostly in the last twenty minutes. O’Leary was obviously the best friend Beckett had, maybe outside Lanie, but unlike Lanie knows when to back off. A good enough friend to be able to touch Beckett without being brushed off or shot – and indeed for her to take some swift reassurance from it. But – she still hadn’t confided in him.

“Excuse me a moment,” Beckett says. Castle shifts slightly to let her out and is relieved to note that she doesn’t pick up anything that might indicate her leaving without farewells.

“She’s not right, is she?” O’Leary asks, or states.

“No really. But she’s doing something about it. Least, she was till her dad screwed up.”

“As much as I can.”

Conversation turns as Beckett approaches the table. Shortly, it’s a lively three-way discussion about baseball, which continues until the end of the evening. Beckett collects herself into her coat, picks up her purse and automatically checks her phone. She makes a noise of considerable displeasure and deletes a number of messages without even listening to them. This is followed by another noise of displeasure as she looks at the remains, and she puts the phone to her ear. By the time she’s finished listening she has acquired an expression that would clear forests without a single woodchip being left to tell the tale. She swipes at the screen to delete all remaining messages and doesn’t say a single word about why.

O’Leary glances over her unsuspecting head and scowl at her phone to meet Castle’s eyes. “Who?” he mouths.

Castle shrugs, likewise unseen by Beckett. “Her dad, or Lanie, or both,” he mouths back. O’Leary lifts his squirrel-tail sized eyebrows. He looks almost pensive.

“Up to you, Castle,” he says silently.

“G’night,” O’Leary rumbles. The door vibrates a tad in sympathetic resonance.

Castle maintains a friendly (or something like that) arm round Beckett all the way back to her apartment, interspersed with undemanding commentary on O’Leary’s massive size and how the two of them (O’Leckett?) must have terrified lowlifes all over the Sixth’s patch. He goes up with her, without asking and without complaints about it, and wanders through her apartment as she concocts coffee. Her phone is still making occasional whining noises as new messages arrive. He’s counted three since they left the bar.

“Someone’s keen to talk to you.”

“It’s Dr Parrish, and I don’t want to talk to her. She hasn’t any new evidence for me and I don’t need her telling me off.”
“Fair enough.” He pads towards the kitchen, the coffee, and Beckett, who has shucked her shoes and coat and is fussing with a French press and grounds. He waits till the hot water is poured, and then wraps an arm round her waist. “Got you,” he says happily. “Turn round?”

“Why?”

“I want you to.” When she doesn't, though he can see the smile flirting with the corners of her mouth, he places big hands round her middle and turns her bodily. She squawks.

“What are you doing?”

“Turning you round. I like you this way round.” He bends down and kisses her before she can protest his manhandling, and she softens and cedes to him as he does, opening to his searching tongue and over a hard thigh, curving into him as he exerts a drop of force, a smidgeon of strength and asserts firm masculinity as she melts. He explores and seeks and finally conquers, heat building between them as his hands roam her back and hers slide round his neck to hold him to her. He untucks her shirt to allow him to stroke smooth skin –

And the door sounds.

This is unexpected, and very unwelcome. Beckett looks as confused as Castle does.

“Who’s that?” they say together. Beckett detaches herself, with an expression that suggests that whoever that is, they are not Beckett’s best friend right now, and tiptoes to the door. She looks through the peephole, emits a muffled noise of absolute fury, and turns on her heel to return to Castle.

“It’s Lanie, isn’t it?” he says.

“Yep. She can stay standing in the hall till kingdom come, for all I care.” The knock sounds again. “We’re not here.” Beckett repatriates herself to Castle’s very willing arms. Then his phone rings, shatteringly loud in the quiet apartment and – Beckett knows this because he had caught her out like that weeks ago – shatteringly audible through the front door.

“Why do you think my phone’s on vibrate? After you sandbagged me” –

“And aren’t you glad I did?” Castle murmurs –

“I’ve kept it on vibrate.” Castle considers saying I’d like to keep you on vibrate and rejects it as inviting fatalty. His. “Now what?” she says crossly.

“Well, she knows I’m here” – he frantically tries to smooth his hair down. Beckett tucks her shirt in – “so she’s going to keep knocking till you open.” Suddenly he acquires a truly evil expression. “Or…” he says insinuatingly.

“Or?”

“Or we could really give her a show.”

“What?”

“If I opened my shirt, and you looked a bit ruffled and seriously kissed and untucked, then” –

“No.”
There’s another forceful, angry rap on the door.

“It would put her off.”

“No, it wouldn’t. All it would do is raise more questions, as if she doesn’t pry enough. I don’t need Dr Parrish prying any more.”

Castle looks just a little disappointed that she won’t play along with his idea, but eventually nods, in time with another fusillade on the door. Beckett’s patience snaps on the sound, and she stalks to the door.

“You’re disturbing the peace,” she says coldly. “Isn’t it obvious I don’t want to see you tonight? I’m busy.”

Castle has never actually seen someone explode with fury before. It’s quite fascinating. Lanie’s face is suffused with blood and she can’t form coherent words. Unfortunately, it hasn’t stopped her jamming a foot in the door so that Beckett can’t close it in her face.

“Go home. I didn’t invite you here, and I don’t want you here.”

Lanie finds her voice.

“You need an intervention. I’m not leaving till you listen to me and agree to get help – and I don’t mean Writer-Boy there. Proper help, not some amateur.”

Beckett has suddenly drawn on a more frightening aspect than Castle has ever seen on her. She is icily, glacially furious. Lanie abruptly appears to realise that she has truly fucked up.

“Kate? Kate… I didn’t…”

“Remind me of your psychiatric qualifications, Dr Parrish?” There’s a half-beat pause. “Ah yes. You don’t have any. And your authority over me?” Another half-beat. “Ah yes. None. Likewise your right to storm into my building, disturb my neighbours, insult my invited guest” – Castle startles at the defence – “and ruin my evening. Give me one reason why I shouldn’t arrest you right now and take you to the nearest holding cell for breach of the peace? Or should that be drunk and disorderly, since clearly you are not in your senses?”

Castle holds his breath and stays very silent and still, out of Beckett’s view. In this mood, she could as easily turn on him as on Lanie.

“Kate, we’ve been friends” –

“My friends don’t tell me I’m a fuck-up. My friends don’t broadcast my affairs across the entire bullpen and try to weasel information out of my other friends. My friends don’t make judgemental assumptions about situations they don’t understand. And my friends don’t come round making demands and shoving their way into my apartment to tell me how much of a fuck-up they think I am all over again. So explain to me exactly how you think you’re my friend, because I don’t see it any more.”

There is a very unpleasant silence. Lanie is shocked silent.

“I see. You can’t. Shut the door as you leave, please. And don’t bother coming back here. You’re not welcome.”

Castle watches, astounded, as Lanie retreats in disorder. The door slams as Beckett shoves it shut behind her.

“Who the hell does she think she is?” Beckett yells. “Coming here and disturbing the whole block and trying to tell me what to do like she’s my mother and I’m fifteen again? My mom was never that stupid. Even my dad wasn’t that stupid. She can fuck right off and never come back.”

“Now who’s waking the neighbours?” Castle asks calmly.

Beckett whirls round to turn on him and finds herself wrapped in against him. She draws in breath to rend him limb from limb and he forestalls all of it by bending to kiss her hard with complete possessiveness. She fights back, though, possibly the first time she’s not yielded to him; invading his mouth and he can taste the hot anger sparking from her tongue, the fury in her lips and the grip of her hands. She’s wresting herself away from him to free her hands and rips his shirt open, tears her mouth from his and bites down on his shoulder, licks hotly over the nerve in his neck and nips again, fire blazing in every move and it lights him up; he hauls her against him and forces her head back to his so he can take her mouth again and then march her backwards to the bedroom: she fights for dominance all the way but each time she finds it Castle fights back, drinking down her anger till he can drop her on the bed and land over her, pinning her down and still devouring her mouth: her struggle to take command pushing him to conquer her.

He fights to find room to strip her shirt and pants: she pulls one hand from his grip above her head and opens his zip and belt, dives inside to grip him and slide hard and hotly from base to tip, aggressively working him as he divests her of bra and then panties and there’s nothing soft or gentle about her, she’s fuelled on fury and primed with sheer rage and in this mood there’s no stopping her. All he can do is match her, and she’s opened his after-burners. He drags her hand away and surges into her in one hard, fast movement so she cries out loud and he’s pinned her hands beside her head again: it’s rougher than they’ve ever been together as he grips and she claws and he takes her in total possession and she writhes beneath him and arches to him and cries out again and goes limp as he comes in a hot rush.

Another facet of Kate Beckett. That’s the incendiary temper she’s never shown him before: the virago of fury after Lanie left. The icy rage – that, he’s seen, though not quite in such depth: directed at him a month ago, but not that explosive fury. That’s the temper that she’s been locking down ever since her dad got sober, ever since she found it didn’t help.

There’s a huge amount of locked down Kate Beckett that’s only now rising to the surface. Castle is sure that this is not the end of the fallout from her five years of self-imprisonment. Everything’s shifting, like the plates that stick below the San Andreas Fault, and suddenly unlock and shift, leaving chaos and disaster behind them. He hopes, suddenly chilled, that whoever her therapist is can guide her through a more controlled release of pressure. Lanie can cope. An explosion like that with Jim… might just be fatal.

She’s trying to move, and Castle realises that he’s still lying over Beckett, caging her against the sheets and probably too heavy for her. He rolls off, the sheets soothing on his lacerated shoulders – she’ll have finger-marks where he’d held her wrists – but keeps hold so that she has to roll with him and ends up lying on top. She is not at all relaxed or eased by a bout of angry sex, and all he can do is be there with her and provide stability.

She is still muttering imprecations blackly into his chest, the exact nature of which he thinks it much better not to know. When she slides off, he lets her go: unsure how to deal with the aftermath of her blazing rage, where he’d have known what to do with the chill anger which he’s always seen before.

“Who does she think she is?” cuts the air. Your best friend, Castle thinks, and reflects that for her best friend, Lanie’s Beckett-reading skills are sorely lacking. There’s a short pause, which may or may not be Beckett chewing the pillow in still-flaming fury. Oh. It’s not. “I needed a friend, and all she did was make me feel like shit.” That’s not fury any more. It’s misery.

“I think she might have realised,” Castle notes dryly. “That wasn’t exactly subtle.”

Beckett doesn’t answer. Castle props himself up so he can see her and finds only her back.

“She used to be my friend,” Beckett says unhappily. It sounds like a disturbingly permanent change in her view. “Guess she isn’t now.”

Castle considers the likely result of saying you shut her out too and decides that death is also a disturbingly permanent change. It’s true, though. He thinks a little more.

“She said – when she called me after she called you – that she wasn’t going to let her best friend kill herself without trying to help. She wants to help.”

“She isn’t helping, though. She just makes it worse.” Beckett buries herself in the pillows. “I don’t need her making it worse. I don’t wanna see her. All she does is make me feel even more of a fucked-up failure than I already did. I tried to play nice on Thursday and she wouldn’t, and ever since she’s been on my case.”

So. Despite the fury and the hard words and the ignoring of calls, Beckett is actually really, truly hurt by Lanie’s behaviour, and – as usual – hiding it as hard as she can manage. Seems to be the Beckett way. Get hurt, lock down, lock out, carry on minus the hurtful influence. She’s not very good at giving second chances – except her father, where the only outcome of second chances was more hurt. Another learned response.

He wraps her into his arms, and makes a nondescript noise which Beckett could take as agreement.

“Sleep on it, Beckett. Everything will be better in the morning. I have to go home, but I’ll see you in the bullpen tomorrow.”

He has to go, eventually, when he thinks that she’s asleep, and in his wrong assumption he’s necessarily gone when Beckett’s later tears fall. No family, one fewer friend, one more fuck-up.
Always in command

Thursday passes in some more tearing apart of the Donbass’s lives, with the addition of the CCTV footage of the hedge fund where Cal-the-chauvinist (as Castle none-too-harshly dubs him, though the boys are hardly behind in using the term) works. Esposito insists on another round of lunchtime sparring, to keep Beckett in shape. So he says in public. In the break room, with Ryan and Castle, it’s a little more pointed.

“She’s off her game. What’s goin’ on?”

“She had a run-in with Lanie,” Castle says laconically, and leaves it at that. Everyone understands, and cop-like, no-one says anything more about it.

The sparring match is as brutal as before, but Espo hits the floor a little more often and rises with a satisfied, dangerous smile.

“Range tomorrow, Beckett. We’ll even let Castle have a turn.”

“You’re on.”

And so Thursday evening rolls around. The boys leave, and Beckett insists that Castle leaves too. She wants some time alone, to consider the case and consider how to exit therapy with some dignity. Her father has stopped calling as often. Dr Parrish (not, not, Lanie) has largely left her in peace. Time to rebuild. And the best way to rebuild is to focus on the positive.

Positive one: her job. She’s still the best in the business.

Positive two: her team. Ryan and Esposito. They’re there. A little pushy about her best interests, but not – usually – intrusive.

Positive three: Castle. Which would be positive one if only she could get past the whole family bit. Of course, since she can pretty much write off any chance of her having any family of her own there’s nothing to compare it to. So if she simply harnesses the power of positive thinking she’ll manage to reset her expectations so that Castle’s relationship with Alexis is no skin off Beckett’s nose, because she has nothing with which to compare it. It’s a beautiful thing, and one which she never had and never will have. This is no reason to be upset, envious, or stressed, just like she’s not upset, envious, or stressed that some photographed celebrity owns a five-million dollar diamond pendant. It simply doesn’t affect Beckett’s life, and the sooner she internalises that the better.

Right. Done. Settled. She might wish that she had a relationship like that with her father, but she doesn’t and she isn’t ever going to, because he doesn’t want one. So, time to grow up. Accept that Castle’s relationship with his daughter is a good thing, and move on. Accept that her own father doesn’t want to be a family, and move on.

Blow her nose, dry her eyes, and move on.

“What’s this?” Ryan wails woefully.

“Your daily dose of square eyes,” Beckett replies. “I want you to go over these times. Cal came out his hedge fund, you traced him through Midtown from cameras and a cash withdrawal, and he was last picked up on a street cam heading down East Houston between Avenue A and B. I think we’ve got enough to bring him in.” She smiles very nastily. “Let’s see how much of a big shot he thinks he is.”

“Like Cardon?”

“Just like Cardon.” She stops for a moment. “No. Not just like Cardon. This time, I want Castle in there too.”

“Why?”

“Because he’s been a single parent, been there and done it, on his own, and managed to write best-sellers and make millions while he did. If I need it, I’m going to use that to piss Donbass off big-time.” The smile becomes – hard as this is to believe – even nastier. “Faced with someone who actually did it, all his poor-little-me won’t wash.” She picks up her phone. “Better get Castle in here. I need to warn him. It wouldn’t do for this to be messed up because I forgot to prep the other player.”

Ryan wanders off to tidy up the timeline and tie up the canvassing results down on the Bikeway. While he’s at it, he works out to his mild consternation that Beckett must have been through several hours of footage, and even on fast-forward that’s a long time after shift-end. However, she’s done it in the past and she looks pretty fired up, so they’d all better roll with it. He finishes off and produces the results to general approval.

“Okay. Thanks, Ryan. Espo?”

“Yo?”

“Canvass results? Anyone see this guy around?”

“Yeah, but it’s not exactly reliable. Couple of hobos, couple of joggers think they might have seen him but none of them are sure. If it is him, he got really lucky.”

“Every murderer needs a little luck,” Beckett says mordantly, on which note Castle arrives.

“You wanted me, Beckett? Finally my rugged handsomeness has prevailed to sweep you off your feet.” A trademark eye roll appears.

“I want you to do something useful in interrogation. We’re bringing Donbass in shortly, and I want you to show him what a good father is supposed to be like, if it goes that way. I want him to get really angry that he can’t do it and you can – and make a fortune into the bargain. I’m guessing he’s all about the money and appearances.”

“Okay,” Castle says. He is – well, surprised really doesn’t cut it. Utterly flabbergasted, dumbfounded, and amazed might just about cover the ground. He looks more closely at Beckett. Hmm. Less sleep and more stress. Just what was she doing last night after she sent them all home?

“Ryan, Esposito, get Cal Donbass in here. Politely, like he’s a witness. I want him to be all fat and happy right up till we start hitting him with the facts.”

Cal Donbass has a certain similarity of outlook to James Cardon. This does not endear him to Beckett in the slightest, but at least Cardon hadn’t looked her up and down like she was street meat.

“Cal Donbass,” she says coolly. “Your wife was the last person to see Della Roberts alive.”

“Petra? Last to see her? You think Petra had anything to do with this? Dumb cop. Petra couldn’t.”
“Petra went to see Della at nine-thirty that morning. Della walked out with Petra. That’s the last time she was seen alive. Now, did you have any contact with your wife that morning?”

“What’s that gotta do with anything?”

“Answer the question.”

“She might have called. I don’t remember. Wouldn’t have been important.”

Castle comes in right on cue. “Wouldn’t have been important? With a tiny baby? I’d have thought you’d have assumed every call was important.”

“Callie’s Petra’s problem.”

“Problem?” Castle says. “Your child is a problem?”

“What the fuck do you know about it? Who are you anyway?”

“This is Richard Castle. You likely read his books.”

Donbass’s jaw drops. “Richard Castle? Derrick Storm?” Castle nods. “There was a man. No-one got in his way. No wailing babies, and women just fell open for him. Boy, was he something.”

“Yeah, I’m that Richard Castle.” Castle’s tone doesn’t change.

“You’ll get it, then. Man needs peace to bring home the mammoth” – it’s just as well Donbass can’t see Beckett’s expression of disgust – “and wants his home nice when he does. So I brought the money home and Petra was supposed to deal with the baby. Every time I came home the damn baby was screaming.”

“What did you do?”

“Went out again. Couldn’t think with that noise. No use talking to Petra, either. All she could think about was Callie Callie Callie. No time for me. She just bitched that I didn’t do anything. That wasn’t the deal.” He’s talking exclusively to Castle, who is managing to preserve an interested and even sympathetic expression. Beckett can just see the line of a tightly clenched fist under the table. “So I got fed up of it and told her to get it sorted. Even looked up ideas for her.” He looks like this should have won him Father of the Year award. “Found out about this cranial osteopathy. Petra rang Della and Della told her it was nonsense. Bitch. Could at least have tried it. I told Petra to keep trying. Put some effort in.”

“Is that why Petra went to see Della?”

“Course it is. If you had brains to match your looks you might be clever.” He looks back to Castle. “I can see why you’re down here. Need a man to add some intelligence.”

“But Petra called you,” Beckett says very coldly. “Phone records show you answered. Nine-fifty. All your calls are recorded. I have the recording of that call. Let’s just listen to it, shall we?”

Cal, she wouldn’t see us. I really tried, Cal.

*Try harder. Make the bitch listen.

Cal, she wants to talk to both of us. She’ll come over and explain. Cal, please. Maybe she’ll listen to you.
For Chrissake, Petra, what use are you? Can’t keep the baby happy, can’t make this woman do the right thing.

[crying]

Okay, I’ll come down. I gotta do everything myself.

“Camera footage shows you leaving your fund at ten. Where did you go to meet them?” Beckett carries on. She doesn’t think that Castle has much more tolerance left for Cal Donbass.

“Met them at East Houston. Had to walk from Essex Street subway.”

“Then?”

“Baby was screaming. Petra said walking would make it better. It didn’t. You’d have thought she’d have known that.”

“You ever spend any time with your own child?” Castle enquires dangerously softly.

“That’s Petra’s job. I earn, she looks after the baby.”

Beckett kicks Castle gently before he explodes.

“So you walked down to East River Bikeway. That’s where we found Della’s body.” She shoves the pictures across. “Messy, isn’t it? What’d she say to you?”

“Stupid bitch didn’t know how it works. She said I should be doing more. Changing diapers and feeding. No freaking way. That’s a woman’s job.”

“Do I look like a woman?” Castle says, frigidly furious and projecting a substantial amount of infuriated large masculinity.

“What?”

“I changed my daughter’s diapers and fed her. I managed to do that and still make a shedload of money. None of it made me less of a man.” He surveys Donbass with a completely unfaked look of absolute contempt. “You’re not a man, you’re a waste of space.”

Completely as hoped and planned, Donbass loses his temper at Castle’s disgust with him.

“You just write about it. I did it. I got rid of that whining bitch, making Petra think I was useless.”

“Did you indeed?” Beckett interjects. Realisation dawns. “Cal Donbass, you are under arrest for the murder of Delaine Roberts.”

Donbass is removed by two big uniforms. Beckett still appears to have swallowed something particularly nasty-tasting. “What a jerk,” she says.

“Yeah. They’ll be better off without him. If you can’t be a good father, be involved, you shouldn’t do it.”

“Right,” Beckett says tightly, and controls the reflexive wince by walking into the bullpen. She’d wanted to play it this way, and it had worked. No point in getting upset by the inevitable memories. No point at all.

“So now what?”
“We write it up, just like always, and then we go home.”

“First, Beckett, you’re coming to the range. Remember?” Espo looks cheerfully competitive.

“I’m coming too,” Castle puts in happily. “You said I could shoot with both of you.”

“Have you ever shot?”

“A bit. Learned when I was trailing round the theatres of the Midwest behind Mother.”

Espo casts a disbelieving glance at Beckett, who simply shrugs. She is not prepared to bet that Castle won’t pull some ridiculous ability out of his back pocket, but she’s also not prepared to believe that he’s up to their standard. Anyway, going and shooting targets will clear her mind so that she’s upped her game for therapy tonight. Total concentration on something outside of her woes.

She certainly has total concentration. And total amazement. Castle can shoot. Not as well as Esposito – she’d be really worried if he were as good as an ex-Special Forces sniper – but she’s having to put effort in to stay ahead. Truth be told, she’s having to put effort in to stay level, and from Castle’s wide grin, he knows it. When Espo calls time and the scores are tallied up she’s scraped ahead, but not by much at all. Castle simply smiles cheerily and says next time, Beckett.

On the other hand she feels a lot better simply for putting bullets through targets, and it’s not as if she needs to mention that she’s been working off her angry misery at her father and Lanie. She feels that she can make it through the therapy session, now, and when shift end comes, departs towards Dr Burke’s office with less of a feeling of impending doom than on Tuesday. If nothing else, she remembers, she’d initially thought about therapy as a way to spill out her feelings to a non-judgemental listener. She should have remembered that on Tuesday.

Dr Burke is not content with the way in which the sessions with Detective Beckett have progressed. The third substantive session will be this evening, and he has not in any previous session induced Detective Beckett to reveal the true reason she is attending. She has admitted to the stress caused by the Berowitzes and in particular Mrs Berowitz’s refusal to believe Detective Beckett’s own experience, and also to the emotional upset that her father’s story had produced. He has, therefore, set aside an hour in which, with the aid of a full pot of his preferred Orange Pekoe tea, he intends to consider the conclusions and deductions which he has drawn in the previous sessions and to evolve a path down which, he expects, Detective Beckett will then be taken forward. It is pointless to continue an unproductive method of therapy, and he has no need to do so.

He draws a pen and paper towards him. He has always found that the act of writing by hand allows him to see clearly the matters which he needs to consider. He has also found that, unlike typescript, it is entirely illegible to any patient, many of whom have a well-developed facility for reading typescript upside down. He is certain that Detective Beckett is skilled in the art of reading upside down, and that this is likely to extend to neat handwriting.

From the first substantive session, he knows that Detective Beckett is uncomfortable with Christmas. This is unsurprising, given the timing of her mother’s murder and her father’s alcoholism. Dr Burke expects that Christmas whilst her father was suffering with alcoholism was an extremely unpleasant experience, and quite opposite to the expectations of society. He will ask Detective Beckett about Christmas.

He also knows that Detective Beckett is not convinced of her father’s continued sobriety. He will probe that further. She had not assisted Mrs Berowitz – in Detective Beckett’s own mind – twice. Her feelings around that have remained unclear and consequently unexpressed, although Dr Burke... considers that they include guilt and self-reproach. Neither is unexpected, though both are unjustified.

From the first half of the second session, very little more had become apparent. It was really a most unproductive session, by Dr Burke’s standards. Detective Beckett had revealed that she had thrown herself into work to deal with her father’s troubles; which Dr Burke would characterise not as dealing but as concealing their effect on her, and provided Dr Burke thereby with considerable insight into her personality. Motherless at nineteen, and effectively abandoned by her father by twenty. Detective Beckett, instead of grieving or retreating into any of the myriad methods by which young people conceal hurt, simply set her mind and soul on succeeding as a police officer, and, being both highly motivated and highly capable, did so. Dr Burke strongly suspects that she has found that her success, while bringing her substantial professional satisfaction, does not bring her satisfaction in her personal life. He has also formed the impression that, although Detective Beckett’s co-workers and superiors have been thoroughly supportive of her need to be available for her father, they are largely unaware of the strain she is under at all other times. Dr Burke had had the unpleasant feeling that Detective Beckett was concealing a major matter which had occurred after their previous session, but she had been sufficiently guarded not to give him the slightest opportunity to probe. Quite why she is coming to therapy if she is unwilling to talk escapes Dr Burke. That is not how he treats his patients, and he is not inclined to continue in that mode.

The second half of that session had been slightly more enlightening. Dr Burke had asked about the support on which Detective Beckett can rely. The answer had been disappointingly sparse. Her co-workers, which Dr Burke considers an inadequate form of support, owing entirely to Detective Beckett’s own inability or lack of desire to confide in them; her friend Dr Parrish, with whom there appears to have been a complete breach of trust and of communication; and Mr Castle, with whom Detective Beckett appears to be in a romantic relationship. Detective Beckett’s father had not figured in the list, which is unsurprising, although Detective Beckett had stated that her father had been more interested in her daily life and more parental since Christmas-time. There had been some hints of very substantial stress in that disclosure, which on reflection Dr Burke considers may be connected to the concealment of her emotions in the earlier part of the session.

Dr Burke considers his notes and uncaps his fountain pen to begin on an orderly, bullet point list of matters to explore. For now, he will simply make the points as they occur to him. He will consider the appropriate order in which to raise them after that is done. He begins by sketching a timeline of the critical events.

Half an hour later he is done. As he had expected, the mere act of taking time to consider the information which he has, evaluating it in a logical and orderly fashion, and writing out his deductions and the points which it will be necessary to cover, has provided him with an appropriate course to follow. He caps his pen and puts away the paper with a sense of considerable professional satisfaction.

Castle, Ryan and Esposito find themselves – no-one admits to knowing how – in a comfortably shabby bar with a decent volume of beer and basketball on the screen. Perfect for a Friday night to celebrate closing the case and the weekend to come. It’s all beautifully comfortable.

Right up until Lanie appears, that is.

“Who told her where we are?” Castle hisses.

“I did,” Ryan admits.

“Why?”

Raw texts were not provided for this page.
“Stop her trying to find Beckett. You’ll just have to take your licks.”

Castle considers a sharp exit, but then considers that this will only ensure that Lanie hunts him down like a fugitive. Besides which, she’s already arrived at their little group.

“Is Kate here?” she says, without pausing for breath or indeed greeting.

“No,” the three men chorus.

Lanie droops. “Where is she? I wanna talk to her.”

“No idea,” they chorus again. Well, Castle has a very good idea where she is, judging from the time she left and her expression as she did, but he has no idea where her therapist might have their practice and so he is not lying.

“Okay. See you.”

Lanie turns to depart.

“Don’t you want a drink?” Ryan asks. She turns back, briefly.

“Nah. Not if Kate isn’t here. Too much testosterone.”

Castle looks at Lanie. She’s a lot less combative than she has been. In fact, she looks almost unhappy. Hmm. Seems like she might have realised that she’s overstepped, albeit with the best possible motives.

“C’mon, Lanie,” he says, “stay for one. You can sit between Ryan and me. We’ll protect you from the testosterone overload from Espo here.”

Espo preens. Ryan mutters blackly into his beer bottle. Castle stands and pulls out a chair for Lanie, who – rather surprisingly – sits down. While Ryan and Esposito are discussing technical issues arising from the basketball referee’s decisions – otherwise known as disagreeing vehemently and questioning his eyesight and parentage – Lanie says quietly, “Is Kate okay?”

“Yes,” Castle lies outright.

“I wanna see her. Talk to her properly.”

Oh God here we go again, Castle thinks. “That’s between you and her. I keep telling you this. I’m not getting between you. You two broke it, you two fix it.”

“She won’t take my calls, she won’t talk to me when I go round. How’m I supposed to fix it?”

“I don’t know,” Castle says. “I really don’t know, Lanie.”
“Good evening, Detective Beckett.”

“Hello.”

Detective Beckett appears perfectly calm. This does not improve Dr Burke’s view of the coming session. At this early stage, Detective Beckett should be evincing some signs of upset, tension, or unhappiness. None is apparent. Dr Burke is concerned. There are two possible reasons for this lack of tension. The first is that Detective Beckett has not thought about the situation at all. This seems vanishingly unlikely. The second is that she does not intend to participate fully, or at all, in any of these sessions. That is entirely possible, and quite intolerable. Dr Burke has no intention of being used to validate an entirely incorrect worldview, nor will he confirm Detective Beckett’s release from therapy until he is satisfied that she has addressed her issues. He cannot, of course, force her to seek or accept treatment. He can, however, ensure that his views on the efficacy of that treatment are recorded.

It would be wholly incorrect to suggest that Dr Burke’s professional pride is pricked. His professional pride is engaged. Detective Beckett requires assistance, and he will provide it. He determines upon a course of action which is much more direct than he would normally employ. It is, he knows, a highly risky strategy. However, he does not believe that subtlety is likely to succeed.

“Detective Beckett,” he begins, steepling his fingers beneath his chin, “on Tuesday you informed me that your relationship with your father had steadily improved since he became sober, and that since Christmas he had been more paternal, is that not so?”

“Yes.” Detective Beckett says nothing more. The silence that follows is not at all inviting. Dr Burke, however, is impervious to the lack of invitation.

“You mentioned that you saw him every week, on Sundays. Did you see him last Sunday?”

“Yes.”

“Tell me how your evening went, please.”

“It was fine. We had dinner, we talked, I went home.”

“What did you discuss?”

“He was making sure I was okay after the stomach bug, and asking about the dinner I had with Castle.”

“Did you discuss anything else? In particular, do you ever talk about the past?”

“No.”

“Why not?” He contrives to sound interested, rather than accusing.

“We’re through all that. It’s not relevant now.”

“If the past is not relevant, why are you here? What do you hope to achieve?”

Beckett is finding, despite her intentions to use this session to relieve her feelings, that it’s far harder than she had thought actually to begin doing so. She doesn’t know where to start, and into the bargain she now has no idea at all what therapy might achieve. And, of course, therapist or not she is deeply uncertain that anyone could listen to her bitterness and unpleasant feelings without judging her, and finding her wanting. Everyone else has, after all. Well. Everyone except Castle.

Detective Beckett appears to be lost in thought. Dr Burke cannot believe that such an intelligent woman did not have an outcome in mind. It is, of course, possible that she had previously had an outcome in mind which has now become irrelevant. He changes tack, slightly.

“While you are considering that, let us also explore a different matter. You have unstintingly supported your father.” How very interesting. Detective Beckett quite plainly winced. “However, it does not appear that you have required support yourself. It must have been very difficult for you, especially at Christmas time.” He is genuinely sympathetic. “How did you cope?”

“I worked.” Dr Burke raises his eyebrows in an inquiring fashion. “Took the Christmas Day shift.”

“How do you still do that?”

“Yes. Other people have children and family commitments.” Dr Burke does not react to that inadvertent admission. Why should Detective Beckett not consider that she has family commitments, given her weekly visits to her father?

“This year, you said that you had encountered a case before Christmas which had involved an alcoholic. Did that not cause you some difficult moments?”

“No.” On Dr Burke’s look, another few words emerge. “No. She needed justice, and I found it.”

“And afterward? She continued to lean on you, looking for support, but she would not accept that the support she sought was not the correct solution.”

Ah. That has touched a nerve, too. How very interesting, again. Her father, lack of family commitments, and the wrong answer. Dr Burke is beginning to perceive a pattern here.

“My father told her the truth. She didn’t like it.”

Dr Burke draws his bow at a venture, so to speak. “How did you feel about what your father told her?”

“I…” Detective Beckett’s control of her expression has faltered. Her face has contorted. It is difficult to tell whether that is disgust or distress, as she has ducked her head, presumably to hide her visage.

“Detective Beckett?” She looks up for a brief instant. It is enough for Dr Burke to observe that Detective Beckett is exhibiting a considerable level of distress. “What did your father say that distressed you?” He infuses concern and understanding into his voice. Clearly there is a genuine issue here, and Detective Beckett is not deliberately evading him, as she had done on Tuesday, but is unable to overcome her reticence immediately. He waits patiently, until she should be ready to say more. While he waits, he considers that he had been too hasty in considering that Detective Beckett was not approaching therapy in the correct spirit. He should have considered that on Tuesday she was simply unready to speak. He will need to ensure that he curbs this tendency to draw conclusions too quickly.

“He said I walked away. He says that saved him.” Dr Burke cannot see why this should be so upsetting. “That he had to realise that he wanted his daughter more than he wanted to drink.” The growing note of hard, contemptuous anger in Detective Beckett’s voice is most concerning. “It’s why I did everything the first time. Why I kept seeing him.” Dr Burke will need to return to that, but not at this juncture. “But he lied. Lied when he was drunk and lied when he wasn’t.” Dr Burke is extremely surprised by that. Extremely surprised.

“In what way has he lied?”

Detective Beckett’s reticence dissolves. From the spate of words flooding out on a tide of barely coherent anger, it appears that her father has – or Detective Beckett believes he has, which for present purposes amounts to the same issue – informed her that he no longer regards her as family. It is quite unsurprising that she is very badly upset.

“He said walking away saved him. Sure it did. He didn’t have to look at me any more. I was too like her. He said he needed me, needed to be a family again, but it’s not true. Never was true, likely. He’d rather have a different family. I’m not enough.” Detective Beckett’s voice has returned to being cold, hard and completely controlled throughout the last few sentences. “I might as well never have bothered. I didn’t cause it, couldn’t control it and couldn’t cure it. I thought being family for him, being there if he needed me, kept him safe. It had nothing to do with me. He ruined my life for five years, two when I was there and three when I wasn’t, and I tried so hard to show him I’d forgiven him, and I was there for five years more but it’s all been a complete waste. He’s ruined the last five years too, and he’s spoiling my life now.”

“Now?”

“He wants to be part of Castle’s family. They’re more fun than me. More like a real family.”

Dr Burke absorbs this information. The situation is certainly complicated. He starts with the most obvious question.

“Mr Castle has a family?”

“Mother. Daughter. They just loved Dad.” The bitterness with which Detective Beckett infuses that statement is really quite extraordinary. Dr Burke extracts the key fact.

“Mr Castle has a daughter?” Much has become clear.

“Yeah.”

“You have met her?”

“How often?”

“Twice before Christmas. Then once after, and then a couple of weeks ago.”

“I see. How did your father meet Mr Castle’s family?”

“Dad and Castle forced me into a dinner at Castle’s. I had to go, so as not to upset Dad. Wish I hadn’t bothered.”

“Why is that?” Dr Burke asks softly.

“Because if I hadn’t gone I wouldn’t have had to watch Castle being the sort of dad I don’t have, and I wouldn’t have had to watch my dad being everyone’s new best pal. I can’t bear seeing either. I used to have a dad like that and now I don’t and I can’t stand seeing how it should have been.”

Detective Beckett is close to weeping. Dr Burke ensures that a box of Kleenex is in close proximity to her chair, and finds, to his mild surprise, that his much earlier irritation has been completely replaced by sympathy.

“He used to be like that. Then Mom died. Then he found Jack Daniels because I wasn’t enough for him. And then I did everything right and I still can’t be enough for him.” Her voice drops. “Still can’t really forgive him. He did everything he was supposed to do and I can’t be good enough to forgive him. So he found people that he likes better. People who didn’t walk away from him. Maybe he never forgave me.”

Dr Burke perceives the entire picture. Detective Beckett has blamed herself for being insufficient to save her father from his descent into alcoholism. She has then proceeded to blame herself for walking away. She has laboured under the misconception, undoubtedly, although possibly inadvertently, about which he will keep an open mind, assisted by her father, that her presence is necessary for his continued sobriety. Then, telling herself that she has done it all for love of her father, rather than out of misplaced guilt, Detective Beckett has endeavoured to assuage that guilt by being, effectively, constantly at her father’s beck and call.

When Mr Castle had appeared on the scene, his relationship with his own daughter has provided Detective Beckett with the stark contrast that she had, Dr Burke expects, avoided. To add biting insult to already crippling injury, her father, untrammelled by guilt or any understanding that his relationship with his daughter was damaged and fragile, has been able to spend time in the company of Mr Castle and his family without the slightest qualm or feeling of discomfort.

“Not that it’s surprising,” Detective Beckett continues. “I can’t deal with any family. I’m pathetically jealous of them and I can’t forgive my dad. He probably realised it long ago.” She halts. “I originally came to therapy so I could deal with Castle’s family and sort my feelings out and not upset Dad by letting him know I hadn’t managed to forgive him. Now it doesn’t matter. He doesn’t need me so there’s no point in any of it. He’s going to fit right into the Castles’ happy little family. I’m not sitting through it again. So all I need to do now is make sure I’m not going to be fazed if I run into some alcoholic on the job.”

Dr Burke is not at all content with that idea. Firstly, Detective Beckett is settling for a severely restricted existence; secondly, Dr Burke already considers that Mr Castle may have strong views on Detective Beckett’s mode of existence based merely upon his presence at the discussion with Mrs Berowitz, which is hardly the action of a man who is only mildly attracted; and thirdly Detective Beckett’s ideas are wholly misconceived. Dr Burke does not consider it to be consistent with his professional ethics to allow Detective Beckett to continue to suffer under such misapprehensions, when he is perfectly confident that, with time, he can assist her to overcome them.

It is, however, entirely consistent with his professional ethics to allow Detective Beckett to think that he will assist her with her stated desire, as long as he does not say so. He would have preferred to continue this session for longer, but Detective Beckett appears quite exhausted, and it is unlikely that she will be able to focus correctly.

“Detective Beckett,” he says gently, “our session has ended. Would you prefer that someone came to collect you?”

Detective Beckett shakes her head. “I’ve got my car. I just want to go home.”

“Please make your appointment for Tuesday, when we can talk about what you have said you hope to achieve.”

When Detective Beckett has left, Dr Burke considers for a while, meditating on the correct way to use Detective Beckett’s desire not to be perturbed by any subsequent encounter with an alcoholic in order to guide her gently to resolution of her issues with her father. Were those issues to be resolved, then it is very likely that there will be little to no remaining difficulty with Mr Castle’s family, and in particular with his daughter. He would greatly appreciate a confidential discussion with Mr Castle, but the time is by no means right to ask Detective Beckett’s permission for that.

Beckett sits in her car for a moment, thinking about whether to call Castle, before inserting the keys and starting the engine. She’ll just calm down on the way home. When she’s parked, then she’ll call him without dissolving into pathetic tears all over him and second-guessing the whole of the therapy session on him. That’s not a good plan. Not good at all. Best to use the journey time to advantage.

She drives very carefully, conscious that her mind is not wholly on the road or indeed wholly together, and that her normally twenty-twenty vision is somewhat blurred. She squeezes into a space, breathes slowly for a few seconds, until she can steady her voice, and pulls out her phone. She ignores the messages on it, and brings up Castle’s number. Another two breaths, and she dials.

“Rick Castle.”

“Hey, Castle.”

“Beckett,” he says happily. “Have we got a nice new body?”

“No, no dead bodies.”

“Oh,” he says disappointedly. “How about I come by and introduce you to a nice live body instead?”

It’s exactly what she needs to keep her composure. “Whose body would that be, then?”

“Mine, Beckett.” The deep tones trickle over her, suave seduction slinking over her. “Mine.” Somehow it sounds as if he’s claiming something other than his own body.

“Mm,” she hums, non-committally. “I suppose that would be an acceptable substitute. I’ll put the kettle on.”

“See you shortly.”

Beckett swipes off, breathes very deeply, and attains the safety of her couch before she allows herself to release the hold she’s maintaining on her fragmented, fragile control. Castle will be here in a few moments, and he’ll cuddle her into that big, warm body, and it will all be okay. It will all be okay.

Castle had been perfectly well aware that the call was from Beckett: that’s what caller ID is for. He was merely extremely surprised that she had called, and therefore assumed a body. Maybe he’d been wrong about her attending a therapy session tonight? When she says no dead bodies, though, his heart leaps. (Clearly his heart deals in clichés.) Attuned as he now is to her voice, he’s fairly certain that she’s stressed, which implies therapy – and she’s called him afterwards? That is new. However, he can’t ask till she tells, so he makes a quick decision and falls into the familiar flirting that will mean that she doesn’t need to decide whether or not to tell him anything, but needs only to say yes or no. Simple, easy choices.

When he reaches her apartment one look confirms his theory. She looks utterly miserable, and, as before, the cure for misery is to cuddle her in and not ask questions.

“That was awful,” she mumbles into his shoulder. He’s not entirely sure he was supposed to hear that. He’s also not entirely sure she meant to say that out loud. Common sense tells him not to say anything until she says more. “Thanks for coming over. Do you want coffee?” Not the more he had been hoping for.

“Sure. Thanks.” He pats her gently and drops a kiss on the dark hair before he lets go to amble after her to the kitchen and the coffee.

Coffee made and repatriated to the table in front of the couch, Beckett further amazes Castle by quite definitively nestling into his side and clearly expecting his arm to surround her. He’s quite happy with that idea, and complies, even though she’s now buried her unhappy nose in her coffee and isn’t exactly communicative. His fingers tap out tiny rhythms on her shoulder as she drinks. The coffee disappears in short order, but when she’s done she sits back into his clasp and leans on him. She looks, observing her, exhausted.

“Are you okay?” he asks carefully.

“Tired.” There is a pause. “I…” she stops again.

“What’s wrong?”

Oh, what the hell. He knows she was going to go, so why she’s backing off telling him escapes her completely.

“I hate therapy,” she says bitterly. Castle draws her in and hugs her tightly.

“Don’t blame you,” he rumbles softly. “That why you’re upset? C’mere and just let me hold you. Nothing else.” He gathers her yet closer, pulling her on to his lap and encouraging her head to lie on his shoulder. Her harsh breaths scratch along his neck. “You don’t need to do anything, just stay here and snuggle in.” His voice changes from soothing rumble to joyful mischief. “You know that it’s the universe’s plan that you sit on my knee, don’t you? It must be. You fit just perfectly. You’re exactly the right height to sit there and plop your head on my shoulder and stay all neatly tucked in.” He continues burbling blissfully, soothing her with an incessant flow of nonsense and silliness, giving her something to listen to which isn’t her roiling, miserable thoughts or Dr Burke’s focused formality. “So you should sit here all the time. Apart from anything else, it’s convenient.”

She musters up a glare: a poor feeble thing compared to normal, but still, it’s a glare. “Convenient?” she says, in the same tone in which Lady Bracknell disapproved of handbags.

“Sure,” says Castle, unfazed. “Convenient for hugs, conveniently keeping me warm, and possibly convenient for you.”

“How is it convenient for me? Beckett growls.

“Well, you like being hugged – at least you’re not killing me so I guess you do – and you like being able to stand down and lean on my shoulder, and when you’re in the right mood you like this.” He drops a tiny little kiss on the end of her nose, and smiles happily at her. She growls again, but there’s no force behind it, so he kisses her nose again, and she turns her face up, still tired and strained, but her eyes are darker and he knows what she wants. Knowing is assisted by her hand gripping his neck and pulling his head down. It’s not terribly subtle, that.

Nor, of course, is kissing him.
The more than hint of desperation in her mouth is a little worrying. Okay, so she called him, and she’s told him she’s going to therapy, but this isn’t affection, it’s closer to fear. He accepts the kiss, but envelops her in comforting affection even as he takes back the lead. As she softens into him, he begins to assert his position, gently owning her soft lips, the cavern of her mouth, claiming with small nips and forceful tongue; with firm hands and enclosing arms.

Slowly, the unexpected terror in her body abates, and she relaxes, eased. He keeps kissing, less possessive now, slow and deep and sure, showing her that he’s enough, he’s everything she needs; that she’s enough, and everything he needs. She makes a soft, half-snuffly little noise, and curls in close again, still under his stroking. He kisses her hair once again, and lays his cheek on her head, her breathing slowed, her limbs lax.

“‘S okay,” he mumbles. “‘S all okay.”

The reply sounds like ‘slong as you’re here.

“I’m here.” I’ll always be here for you. “You’re here. It’s all okay.” He kisses some more, softly, not demanding anything.

“I hate it,” she says, a little later. “Dragging up everything I don’t want to remember. But I have to. I can’t do my job if I freak out every time I meet an alcoholic.”

Castle very consciously conceals his stunned reaction to that statement. That… does not sound at all good. That does not sound like Beckett addressing her issues with her father. That, in fact, sounds like she’s just written her father off, and out of her life. And if she doesn’t deal with her issues with her father, is she ever going to be able to deal, really, honestly deal, with the fact that he is a father too? This is really not at all good.

“No,” he says slowly. “You can’t.” Behind his speech he’s frantically trying to think of what he might want to say, and more frantically biting back the words he doesn’t want to say, such as but if you can’t deal with fathers will you be able to deal with me?

“I have to be able to deal with that. And somewhere…” she trails off, and then restarts, “somehow I need to cope with…” another trailing off, and she bites down nervously on her lip, tense again, her hands knotted in her lap, white-knuckled, “with your family.” She drops her head and gaze.

Castle stares at the top of her head, being all he can see. Of all the things she might have said, that was the last thing he expected to hear. Absolutely the last. “Uh?” he manages. Nothing more arrives. It belatedly dawns on him that she thinks he’ll be upset that she needs help to be able to cope with his family. “Beckett?” No response. “Kate? Kate, look at me.” He turns her face up to his. Hers is white, and tired, and expecting hurt. “Kate, it’s okay. I said I wouldn’t push you to do anything you weren’t ready for. You’re not ready for the loft, let alone my family. Though most of the world isn’t ready for my mother.” There’s a very tiny hint of a smile. “Don’t push yourself into it. We’ve got plenty of time. It’s all up to you.”

She doesn’t say anything at all, merely snuggles back into him and leans once more upon his shoulder, closing her eyes. This only gives Castle a perfect view of the dark rings that have developed under her eyes despite the early hour, and the way in which her skin is thin and transparent, pale under the remnants of her make-up. He doesn’t try to kiss her again, simply continues to hold her safely in the strength that gives her surcease.
She doesn’t need to try, with him, he thinks. She doesn’t need to try because she is trying, or at least she recognises that she needs to solve her issues with his family. And that means that she recognises that she’ll see them, which implies that she will come to his loft. It’ll just take time, and he has plenty of that if she’s safe in his arms. If she knows she’s safe in his arms. He smiles beautifully, unseen, and contents himself with cuddling for now.

The peaceful atmosphere is abruptly broken by a distinct rumble from Castle’s stomach. Hardly conducive to romance, or indeed comfort, that. Beckett starts and comes out of her semi-conscious state.

“I’m hungry. Can we get some takeout?”

“If you want,” she says, “menus are on the counter there.”

“What do you like?”

“Pretty much anything, but pizza’s easy and they’re quick. Pepperoni and mushroom, please.”

Castle attends to the key business of pizza ordering and, when he surfaces, finds that Beckett has changed into soft sweats and removed her make-up. He feels this is likely a good thing, and when she curls up next to him again and lets him sneak his hand round her waist and under the sweatshirt and tee to the soft skin beneath, is convinced of it. She yawns, widely.

“If you wanna talk,” Castle murmurs, “you can. If you don’t wanna, you don’t have to. Up to you.”

Beckett lets that soak into her mind, without any real effort to think through what he means. She’s too tired for that, and too tired to talk: her emotional outpourings at the shrink having been quite enough for one day, or indeed enough for an eternity. But… she needs to fix herself, and that means being able to do her job properly without worrying about needing to recuse herself, or being forcibly recused by Montgomery; and it means being able to cope with the loft and Castle’s family. Only his family, though. They’re innocent in all this.

By the time the pizza has arrived, been eaten, the detritus cleared up and sodas finished, Beckett’s yawns are almost continual and it is possible that the only thing keeping her eyes open are invisible matchsticks. Castle runs an assessing gaze over her when she isn’t paying attention (even an exhausted Beckett is likely to complain or take strong measures if she sees him sizing her up like that) and then throws caution and common sense to the wind by simply picking her up and carrying her through to her bedroom.

“Bedtime, Beckett. You need your beauty sleep.”

“Not as much as you,” she snarks.

Castle grins down at her. “I’m not the one who’s narcolepsing” – she glares – “so I don’t think so. C’mon. Bedtime.” She pulls a pair of soft pyjamas from under her pillow, which are surprisingly demure, and disappears to the bathroom. Shortly there are noises of teeth being brushed. Castle wanders off to leave her privacy and to consider his options. There are two, basically, go home or stay. He could stay. Arrangements have been made for Alexis’s company tonight – which do not involve his mother, who has been entirely too interested in how often he’s seeing Beckett and staying out late or all night.

He wanders back into the bedroom and finds Beckett tucked up in her bed, upon which discovery he sits down on its edge and traces the delineation of her cheekbones, and then her lips.

“I could stay,” he says, “if you wanted.” There’s a sleepy mutter, followed by the extreme effort of opening an eye no more than halfway.

“You can?” she slurs, sounding as if she didn’t expect that. “Thought you’d need to go home.”

“Not tonight.”

“Stay, then. Please?”

He’ll never need that invitation to be issued twice. He hustles through the bathroom, strips in short order, and arrives beside her in bed in a few instants. Less than a few instants after that, she’s spooned into his broad, bare chest and, from the tenor of her breathing, only an inch from sleep. He’ll go find a book when she’s deeply asleep, and read for a while. He’s not sleepy. Some parts of him are far less sleepy than others. One part is very definitely wide awake, and it’s not his brain.

In the morning Beckett winches her eyelids open, stretches extensively, and is greeted by a loud ouch as she inadvertently thumps Castle in the solar plexus. She feels much better, probably aided by the solid night’s sleep that she’s had. Castle for real is a lot more useful for sound sleep than remnants of his cologne on her pillows. Of course, Castle for real has some other advantages. She turns over and finds bright blue eyes regarding her happily.

“Awake at last?” It’s not that late, surely? “It’s after eight.” That’s not at last. That’s about – ooohh – an hour too early for Saturday off-shift.

“Too early,” she humphs, and curls into the crook of his arm, intending to close her eyes again.

“No it’s not. I’m going to have to go soon, and I want to” –

“Yes?” she says dangerously.

“ – say hello before I go.”

“Hello,” Beckett says, and shuts her eyes. Castle pokes her in the ribs, and they fly open again, with a suspicious squeak and wriggle. He scents an advantage.

“Stoppit!” she squeals. “Stop it stop it stop it.”

“You’re ticklish,” Castle smirks. “You’re really, really ticklish. Detective Beckett has a secret weakness. How have I not discovered this before?” He tickles her some more, until she’s ruffled and breathless and squeaking crossly and incapable of killing him, and then leans down and kisses her slowly. “There. That’s my Kat.”

Beckett draws her fingernails dangerously delicately over his shoulder, not – quite – scratching.

“Kat?” she says ominously.

“In private. Independent, walk-alone, and when you want to be, soft, purring and affectionate. Kat.” He doesn’t mention the apartment empty of any reminders, or her belief that she has no family. “Kat who likes being stroked,” he murmurs, dripping insinuation down her, and does. She arches her back and pushes into his fingertips and if he wanted to die right now he could simply point out just how much that resembles a cat enjoying their human’s stroking. A cat, or a Kat, is not a pet. It’s an independently-minded companion. He’d better not take that comparison too far. He might not like it.

“Kat?” she says again, with less of an ominous note. Pet names aren’t really her thing, but while Castle’s stroking her like this it adds a certain frisson to affairs. She’s never let anyone else call her Kat. Too close to too many things, too like opening up. But somehow it feels right, as it had in the Hamptons.

“Kat,” he says definitively. “Between us, though. Not anywhere else.” His flexible fingers stroke very acceptably down her spine and then wander further. There seems no reason not to curve into them and to purr. Castle turns her over and strokes in a way that definitely keeps her purring, and then takes her mouth assertively and rises over her and smoothly possesses her. He feels so good: all his bulk and weight and strength surrounding her and within her and over her immensely reassuring; protection from the harsh reality of the world outside her door. She moves in rhythm with him, climbing together and then soaring into the void.

A while of peaceful snuggling later, Castle detaches himself gently. “I have to go home,” he says. “Do you want to do something later?”

Beckett gazes at him sleepily. “That’s sweet, Castle, but I think I need some time on my own. I need to think.” He raises a brow. “Therapy,” she says, with an edge. He should probably have realised that.

“Okay. But if there’s anything you need – food, drink, stories, my scorching hot body” – she snorts – “anything, Beckett – just call.”

She turns to him, now dressed and perched on the bed beside her, sits up and hugs him hard. She doesn’t say anything, but everything she might have said is in her clasp around him. He kisses her swiftly yet deeply, and then tears himself away. He just knows that she’s going to spend the rest of the day – the rest of the weekend – brooding. He holds on very hard to the fact that she actually called him last night because she was upset and wanted his particular brand of comfort, and manages to leave without saying anything inflammatory. He’d deeply love to have a confidential chat with the therapist, but that’s not a conversation he wishes to open at this stage and nor is it a matter that could ever be progressed without Beckett’s explicit consent.

But, but but but, she called him, because she needed him and wanted him and she told him she was going to therapy. Progress. Serious, serious progress.

He bounces home very happily, and even manages to deal with his mother’s later prurient enquiries without exploding.

Beckett resurfaces quite a lot later, and rather later than she would have preferred. There are a certain number of household chores to get through, and some food shopping wouldn’t hurt either. Before she starts, though, she buries her face in a Castle-scented pillow and luxuriates.

She throws her washing into the machine and sets it off, tidies and vacuums while it’s running, and then starts the dryer before she goes shopping. None of this requires any thought, so rather than thinking about therapy she thinks about lunch and dinner. She’s not going to go through the elaborate recipes of last week, but she could have chicken shashlik with rice, and there’s no reason she couldn’t get herself a nice dessert either. Her shopping conforms to her thinking, in sufficient quantity to have some left over for tomorrow’s dinner too.

In a further effort to avoid any prospect of having time to think about therapy, or Lanie, or her father; she spends some quality time considering her extensive shoe collection and selecting out those which are old and damaged, or which – that would be a whole one pair – she never wears. Then she goes and buys some new ones to replace them. Retail therapy. Much better than psychotherapy. Much. That occupies the whole of the afternoon very pleasantly. Her wallet is complaining, but she’s not listening.
At the end of the afternoon, with the dusk falling, she’s successfully managed not to think about anything serious at all. She hasn’t answered the call from her father, she hasn’t answered the call from Lanie. She hasn’t listened to either message. Maybe later. Maybe not at all. She doesn’t need her father’s lies and she doesn’t need Lanie’s criticism. What she does need is a run, so she does that. It occupies another hour, by which time she can make her dinner, which occupies another half hour, and then she eats it, slowly.

And then it’s seven o’clock and she has nothing to help her procrastinate any longer. She makes coffee – a large pot of best Javan blend, with creamer and cinnamon on the tray – and takes it over to the couch, and realises that she can’t put anything off any longer. She starts with her phone.

Katie, it’s your dad. I need to talk to you. I didn’t mean to upset you. Just like he hadn’t meant it when he’d said go away, I can’t bear to see you, or you’re so like her, I can’t stand it, or why aren’t you her. Just like he hadn’t meant it when he’d said Katie I need you, you’re what saved me, or if you hadn’t walked away, I’d never have got dry. They always lie. Always. It’s the one constant in her relationship with her father: he always lied. She deletes the message, and stares dry-eyed out of the window, seeing nothing.

After a while she drinks her coffee, and forces the message and the hurt in her father’s voice away. He’d always sounded like that: drunk or sober. Always sounded hurt and saddened that she wouldn’t come to him, that she wouldn’t pick up the pieces for him, that she wasn’t her mother. Nothing has changed.

She didn’t cause it. She can’t – couldn’t – control it. And she couldn’t cure it. But then he’d cured himself – stabilised, sobered up, saved himself – and he’d said he’d needed her. But, she thinks, that had simply been her thinking she could control it. Thinking that being there for him would stop him relapsing, that being a family would keep him safe, that his sobriety depended on her forgiveness. He’d said it, after all: the only way I’d ever see Katie again was if I got dry. I needed her, but she wouldn’t come if I wasn’t sober. Of course she’d thought that she was a necessary part of his sobriety and his recovery. He’d said so. But he’d lied, and she’d believed him, so relieved to have her father sober and alive that she’d have done anything, and did; said she’d forgiven him as he told his story and made amends, and believed it. Up till now, believed it, until all her repressed hurt and jealousy and resentments started to appear under the harsh light of Castle’s family, and showed her that her relationship with her father was all sorts of wrong.

She should have walked away and stayed away: lived her life not subsumed herself in her father.

She has some more coffee, breathes deeply and slowly, folds up her washing and puts it away: numb domesticity swaddling her brain.

She might as well listen to Lanie’s message now. It can’t get worse.

Kate, please call me. I wanna help. Not, notably, anything that might translate to I’m sorry for making you feel like shit. The tone is mildly apologetic: as if Lanie had been late for dinner, or had to bail out on meeting her for work. Clearly Lanie doesn’t feel that she has done anything majorly wrong. Fine.

She deletes both messages, and has a third cup of coffee. It’s probably one too many, but she doesn’t really care. She puts her i-Pod earbuds in and finds a book of no literary merit whatsoever, involving kick-ass women and paranormal men. No brain required, but it passes the time perfectly pleasantly. Then again, it’s not meant to appeal to the brain. Rather lower down, she thinks. When she gets bored with the story, she has a long hot bath and pays particular attention to her moisturiser afterwards. It’s ten o’clock, and she can legitimately go to bed.
She’s avoided, evaded and procrastinated all day to avoid doing the thinking she really ought to do, but as she curls into the clean, fresh pillows, devoid of the comfort that Castle’s cologne’s lingering scent would have provided, Dr Burke’s face comes back into her mind. It’s not conducive to sleep. She’d had the clear impression – Dr Burke’s professional poker face is no match for a top-notch detective’s skills – that at the start of the session he’d been, if not annoyed, certainly close to irritated. That had changed, though. He’d become patient and almost sympathetic quite soon. He doesn’t care, though. He isn’t affected and it doesn’t matter and he won’t care how she feels – which is just what she wants. She just needs to work out what she needs to talk about (she cringes) to sort out being back to full force at work. And, of course, how to get over her petty pathetic envy of Castle’s family. She doesn’t like feeling petty, pathetic or envious.

Tomorrow, she won’t procrastinate. Tomorrow, she’ll think it through.

As if her mind were waiting for her to make the decision, as soon as she has, she drops into sleep.
Is it me you're looking for?

She really tries to think it through: in the shower, through her morning coffee, through a long run, through a convoluted set of yoga forms, and through lunch. All she achieves is a mind as twisted as her most complex asana. Eventually, she shrugs, goes out for the afternoon to an exhibition that proves to be considerably more interesting than she’d thought, and tries to ignore the unhappy thoughts nibbling at the corners of her brain. They’re still munching on her mind as she falls into bed, and gnawing on her neurons when she wakes in the morning. She has no idea where to start.

Monday comes and goes: a new body drops but since it was a simple shooting over a cheating husband and a cheating wife, it takes them approximately three hours with the aggrieved spouses of the husband and wife respectively to have the charges signed, sealed, delivered and the DA’s problem. It might have occupied more time if either spouse had had the brains to hide the gun, or even wipe the prints off it. Honestly, no class and no brains either. They can’t even watch cop shows, or they’d know how to do it.

Castle is volubly bored by mundane murder, and makes up for it by all sorts of ridiculous theories and, where the boys can’t see, scorching flirting and stolen touches. The new case hasn’t seemed to make Beckett any happier, and if she chews her lip any harder it’ll bleed. It’s already swollen and almost bruised, which is not good. He tries to show support in more practical ways: buying her lunch, making her coffee, making her more coffee, producing some candies, making her more coffee, and eventually simply producing a constant supply of coffee which appears to have less effect than pure filtered water would have. If he’d drunk that much coffee he’d be dancing on the ceiling. Beckett doesn’t even twitch, and at the end of the day simply says to him that she needs time to think about tomorrow’s therapy session on her own, with a pained, forced smile that he doesn’t believe in for one instant.

He’s shrugging his own coat on when Ryan and Esposito skulk up to him and suggest, rather forcefully, that they would like a little chat. Not this again? He thought that they were all past that. Still…

“Sure. Where shall we go?”

They settle on yet another sports bar.

“Ryan,” Espo says, with a smile that has too many teeth in it for friendliness.

“Yeah?”

“If you tell Lanie where we are I’ll have you hitting the mats for the next month, okay?”

Ryan squirms guiltily and puts his phone away. Castle watches with some interest. Clearly Ryan thinks that Beckett and Lanie should patch things up, and is prepared to interfere. Espo’s game, however, is entirely unclear.

“What’s up with Beckett this time?” Espo opens, as soon as they’re seated in the bar. “Leaving at shift end twice a week for the last two weeks, looks like she got run over by a truck, an’ every time her phone rings she acts like someone slugged her. Thought you said you’d got this?”

“I have,” Castle says mildly. “If I didn’t she’d likely still be benched.”

Esposito’s jaw drops. “What the fuck is goin’ on here, Castle?”
Castle finds himself somewhat between a rock and a hard place, or the devil – in the form of Esposito – and the deep blue sea, the bottom of which is where his relationship with Beckett will be if he isn’t very careful. On the other hand, Beckett needs her team. The best she’d been in days had been at the end of sparring with Espo, and whilst he absolutely hates seeing her taking the hits and the bruises afterwards he has to admit that it had worked. He’d thought last week that the boys would be vital to holding all this together for long enough for Beckett to fix herself, and he’s seen nothing to change that thought. However, he can’t give away private information. Hm. Tricky. Very tricky. He takes a long pull at his beer, and hopes for inspiration. It doesn’t really arrive.

“Look, guys, is Beckett screwing up the team?” Two heads shake. “Is she messing up on the job?” Definitive shakes, again. “Is she pulling sick days when she isn’t sick, or messing you around?” More shakes. “Okay then. She needs to know you have her back, just like you always do.” Equally definitive nods. “She needs to be part of the team. She doesn’t need picked over and hassled.”

“Told you so, Ryan,” Espo says firmly. Castle ignores the interjection.

“She’s having a rough time but she’s not gonna thank any of us for pushing her when she doesn’t wanna talk – not that she ever wants to talk, but you get my drift. She’s got to work it out herself.” He makes a face. “Lanie tried pushing, and look where that’s got her. Beckett needs you just like she always did.”

“Yeah, but what’s wrong?” Ryan asks, and then emits an “Ow!” as Espo punches him in the shoulder in a less than brotherly fashion.

“Shut up, bro. Don’t you get it? It’s not our business till she tells us. Stop flapping your nose. It don’t help. If it’s her dad she won’t wanna talk about it, an’ if it’s not she still won’t wanna talk about it.”

“Okay, man. I won’t. But…”

“Yes?”

“But will she be okay?”

There is a short, pointed, silence.

“If we let her get on with it, and just make sure we’re there if she needs us, then yeah,” Espo says. Castle nods, and hopes that it will be that simple. Espo smiles evilly. “But it won’t let her off sparring.” He clearly has a thought. “What’re we gonna do about Lanie? She’s been harassing us like a panhandler on speed.”

Castle shrugs. “Dunno,” he says bluntly. “I’m not getting in between those two. I like living, with all my arms and legs.”

“Why won’t she talk to Lanie?”

“Ask Lanie. I don’t know.”

Castle firmly turns the conversation away from the problem of Lanie and away from Beckett and fortunately everybody follows the hint.

Beckett waves the boys off, notices Montgomery’s interested look, and takes herself off before he can make it an order or, worse, ask questions. More running, more yoga, more not-listening to her Tuesday passes with equally mundane murder. Come six p.m., Beckett departs in the direction of Dr Burke’s office, without explaining to anyone where she’s going. She has noticed a reduction in the quotient of concerned looks from Ryan, which is a relief, though there has been no reduction in the number of times Espo’s put her on the mat at lunchtime. Lanie has mostly stopped ringing her. Her father has not, but it’s just the same thing over and over again, and she simply doesn’t believe him.

Dr Burke has undertaken some focused contemplation of the correct way in which to encourage Detective Beckett to talk, which is a necessary precursor to being able to consider the correct way to assist her in overcoming her issues. He has arrived at the slightly unexpected conclusion that the blunter style of questioning which he had employed, granted that he had done so out of mild irritation, had been surprisingly effective. He considers further, in order to be sure that he has understood his proposed strategy from all viewpoints, and then nods his head positively. He has determined that when Detective Beckett has been questioned previously, it is most likely to have been in a court room. It is therefore also probable that, being accustomed to and comfortable with a judicial and direct mode of questioning, she will continue to respond more effectively to such a form. He sets his strategy accordingly, and awaits Detective Beckett.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett.”

“You said on Friday that you wanted to be able to deal with encountering alcoholics at work. Is there anything you wish to add to that statement?” Strangely, Beckett finds that Dr Burke’s quasi-judicial, cool style is very helpful. She’s used to this. It’s oddly… well, comforting.

“I don’t want to get drawn into their problems again. It’s not helpful.” Dr Burke nods, approvingly. It would indeed not be helpful. “And…”

“Mm?”

“I want to be able to get through seeing Castle’s family. Without being upset.”

Dr Burke allows himself to raise his eyebrows. This is not an addition that he had expected. He had expected to have to lead Detective Beckett to that issue. Of course, it does not assist with her father, unlike the opposite direction, where resolving the issue of her father would have resolved the issue with Castle’s family. However, the issue of her father can be pursued at a later time. He rapidly reorganises his thinking, and smiles professionally at Detective Beckett.

“Where would you like to begin?”

“My job.”

This is no surprise to Dr Burke. The vast majority of his patients start with the easiest – or apparently easiest – area. It is quite possibly also the case that, if this is not the most important outcome for Detective Beckett, it is only secondary by a very small margin. He continues on in the judicial style upon which he has determined.

“Please tell me the circumstances in which you met the Berowitzes, in more detail than at our previous sessions.”

Detective Beckett describes the meetings in rather more detail, with a wealth of completely professional commentary on the case. However, she is unusually reticent about the evidence which had led her to the conclusion that Mr Berowitz was an alcoholic.
“Mm.” Dr Burke regards Detective Beckett somewhat beadily. “You say that you recognised Mr Berowitz as an alcoholic immediately you attended their apartment to advise them of their son’s murder. On what grounds did you conclude that?”

“His eyes were a little unfocused and bloodshot. He had hand tremors. There were marks on the table where a glass would be placed. The whiskey bottle was in very easy reach. He’d been sucking breath mints, at ten a.m.” Detective Beckett stops there.

“Was there anything else, perhaps in Mrs Berowitz’s behaviour?” Dr Burke is endeavouring to work his way towards Detective Beckett’s own experiences by investigating the symbols and symptoms which she had recognised.

“She… the way his wife was watching him. He didn’t get it, first off – not like the relatives usually do, but more than that, like it took time for the words to soak in.” She winces at her own phrase, much to Dr Burke’s interest. “And…” there is a significant silence during which Dr Burke makes no sound or movement, “I recognised the look on the wife’s face. She was worried, and scared we’d know, and sorry for him, and trying to cover it all up. Just like I used to,” Detective Beckett finishes bitterly. “Just like I did.”

“How did that affect you?”

“I was okay. It brought back memories, sure, but I was fine. I could deal with them.”

“Please describe the memories which this meeting occasioned.”

Detective Beckett shrinks into herself. Clearly this is an area she would prefer not to have to explore, which tends to indicate, in Dr Burke’s experience, that it is an area which is important. He waits.

“It started very small. Before I went back to college, he’d have a drink at night. Maybe a couple, but he never got drunk. Maudlin, maybe.” That is a very interesting word choice. “Like it helped him grieve. So I went back to Stanford. At first he was sober when I called – I called a lot. But then it got more, and it started not to sound right. So I saved up and came back.” Her voice and face constrict. “He was drunk when I got there. I wanted to surprise him.” She looks guilty. “And I wanted to see how he was when I wasn’t there and he didn’t know I was coming.”

She stops, face furrowed in recollected pain, lost behind her eyes in the suffering of ten years past. Dr Burke thinks, a little fancifully, that she is now that shattered nineteen-year old.

“He was a mess. But he looked so happy to see me – and then he said Johanna!”

Even Dr Burke’s professional calm is dented by that statement.

“He thought I was Mom. The whisky was right there in front of him. Spilt. There was a puddle on the table. Not on the floor. That came later, when he’d drunk so much he couldn’t control his body.” Dr Burke manages to control his revulsion at the thought. Detective Beckett stops again, for longer. The corner of her mouth is twisted. Silence stretches out between them. Detective Beckett’s eyes are blindly staring back into the past. “Then he worked out it was me.” The sentence is ejected from Detective Beckett’s mouth.

Dr Burke, not a man given to the use of overly descriptive language, thinks that each word has fallen between them as did the bombs on Pearl Harbour, or the nuclear devices on Hiroshima and Nagasaki; all to the same devastating effect. Here, he realises, is the beginning of all Detective Beckett’s issues; the initial trauma.

“He said I thought you were her. I wanted her. Go away. I don’t want you, I want Johanna. And he downed the glass and started to cry.”

Detective Beckett looks, momentarily, as if she might cry. However, she does not. This concerns Dr Burke.

“What did you do?” he asks. First, he will explore Detective Beckett’s actions. Only then will he progress to her emotions. They still have some time in this session, though he is not at all sure that he will not have to overrun for a few moments.

“I went upstairs. Unpacked.” There is a small hitch apparent in her speech. “Came back down,” she says tightly. “Took the bottle and poured it all away.” Another hitch. “He wasn’t happy. I told him to go to bed and pushed him in the direction of his room.”

Dr Burke resists, with considerable difficulty, his temptation to ask how Detective Beckett had felt through this sequence of events.

“He went. He still hadn’t said he was glad to see me or used my name. He just staggered off to bed. He was wasted.” And yet another pause. “Then I went through everywhere I could think of and poured every drop of alcohol down the sink. Everything I could find.” Detective Beckett breathes in, slowly. “I didn’t know then that they always hide it. Always lie that there’s no more. Just lie. I thought if I poured it away he wouldn’t be tempted and we could fix it.” She draws another breath. “I didn’t know I couldn’t fix it.” Her voice hardens and becomes bitter again. “I only found that out a week ago, really. Water under the bridge now.”

Dr Burke allows Detective Beckett to gather herself. He is treading very carefully. She is not, he had immediately discerned, a person who enjoys discussing emotions, nor, he thinks, is she a person who is swift to reveal them. Gaining her trust is crucial, and he is certain that he does not possess it yet.

“After you had cleared your home of alcohol, what did you do next?”

“Went to bed myself.”

“Mm?”

“When I woke up” – Ah. Detective Beckett has avoided any description of her actions after going to bed, presumably because that would involve revealing her feelings – “I had breakfast, and Dad woke up. He was sober. Hung over, but sober. I think he was sober. Then he was – seemed – pleased to see me. He said he’d been lonely, and it was a one-off, and he was sorry and wouldn’t do it again. He said he needed me, I was the only thing he had left. So I said I’d call more often, and we were good. So I thought. I didn’t know then that they always lie. Always. I went back to college and I phoned more often and for a while he seemed better.” Detective Beckett pauses again. “He was just hiding it.”

A very strange expression passes over Detective Beckett’s face, and she stops speaking for a moment. “I never talked about it. I couldn’t talk about Mom with him. It upset him so and I couldn’t deal with that. If he started it he just got upset. I never started it.”

“Is it possible,” Dr Burke asks cautiously, “that you wished to talk about your mother’s death with him?” He is certain that Detective Beckett had so wished, but had already started to avoid subjects which she thought might trigger an unpleasant outcome. In some ways, this is a response that he has seen in cases of domestic abuse. Avoid the triggers. Detective Beckett appears to have developed it remarkably quickly. Then again, Dr Burke considers, she had received an utterly devastating blow.

“I…” Detective Beckett trails off. She does not appear to have an answer to that question. Instead, “Only if you wish it to be. We can continue for a few moments.” Detective Beckett shakes her head. “In that case, I will see you on Friday. Before we meet again, however, I should like you to try to consider whether you would have wished to talk about your mother with your father, and why. I should also like you to start to consider how you felt about these events.” He watches irritated confusion bloom in her face. “In order to ensure that you can deal with encountering alcoholics in the course of your work, you need to understand your own feelings, which stem from these early experiences.” The irritation dies away.

“Okay. I get that. Thank you.” She leaves. Dr Burke considers that his statement had been entirely true, if partial. He is relatively content with the manner in which that session had progressed. Friday’s session, however, may be considerably more difficult. He puts it out of his mind and turns to the relatively simpler matter of shooting-related PTSD.

Beckett removes herself to home at some speed, unconsciously hoping that distance from Dr Burke’s office will provide some distance from the absolute horror with which his suggestion has filled her. Intellectually, she can see, understand and even agree with his reasoning. Emotionally, it’s appalling. The slightest thought of going through it all again is terrifying. She hates the very idea of it. But Dr Burke had hit the one point that could have made her consider it. To be able to do her job right. And he hadn’t said it… but maybe working out her feelings will make her pathetic, petty envy of families (Castle’s family) go away.

She’s dealt with plenty of things she didn’t want to do in the past. At least this one might have a positive outcome. God knows the others generally haven’t.

Lost in her own head, she doesn’t realise that someone is knocking on her door for some time. She pads across, and is less surprised than she should be when she recognises Castle through the peephole. She opens the door with immense relief.

“Hey, I brought dinner,” he says. Beckett just looks at him, apparently too tired to comprehend the concept of food. He puts the takeout bag down and hugs her, which seems like a good start. “C’mon. I’m starving. Well, not literally, obviously, but I’m really hungry and you look like you need a meal but I didn’t think you’d want to go out so I brought your favourite Thai and ice cream which will melt if you don’t put it in the freezer so let’s do that.”

“Did you actually breathe at any point in that sentence?” Beckett snarks, as he moves them toward the kitchen and freezer. Then she catches sight of the ice cream. “How did you know that was my favourite?”

“This?” He waves the Ben & Jerry’s carton of Coffee Coffee BuzzBuzzBuzz around. “I didn’t – but now I do. Besides, it was coffee. It was bound to be one you liked.”

“What do you like?”

“New York Super Fudge Chunk.” He pulls a carton of that out too. “I don’t mainline caffeine.”

Both ice cream cartons arrive in the freezer.

“You’re quite hyper enough without that,” Beckett mutters. Castle pouts for the sake of it, and mentally cheers that Beckett has managed an attempt at normality.

“You should take advantage of my energy, not complain,” he smirks, and smiles suavely. His arm stays firmly around her, hand on her hip, even while the takeout migrates into the oven to heat up.
Dinner happens. Hugs happen. Speech does not happen. Beckett hiding in Castle’s large shoulder happens, and still no informative conversation happens. Castle is more than a little concerned that Beckett didn’t call, but he’s not sure if he’s worried because she’s not that upset or because she is that upset. He can’t actually tell how upset she is over the session, but whichever it is, she needs his company whether she asks or not.

“You know you can talk if you want to,” Castle tries.

“Yeah,” says Beckett, which finishes that line of discussion before it’s even begun. He continues to cuddle, and wonders (she’s right there in his arms, which always goes straight to his hindbrain) if assertiveness is what she’d like, right now. No decisions, no thinking, just yes or no.

His arm around her strokes smoothly down her back, and finishes up over the curve of her ass. She presses into his hand. It’s almost like a week ago, thankfully not the angry, furious, scalding sex of Wednesday, nor the complete exhaustion of Friday. He moves a little more firmly, intent in the pressure and placement of his fingers, seduction in his strokes. He still hasn’t come up with a better way to ease her after therapy, though he wishes he could, because he’s fairly certain that sex – or even lovemaking – isn’t a complete solution. On the other hand, it seems to work for Beckett, and it’s damn sure that it works for him. Well. Beckett works for him. Messed up or not messed up. She’s so deep under his skin she’s never going to come out.

He lifts her face to lean in slowly and descend on her mouth, taking his time, exploring, stroking and then retreating to suck her lower lip in, a gentle nip to convince her of his authority, and she murmurs yes and softens into contented compliance to his lead, responds and opens and cedes and eases for him; turns into him and swings her legs up to be tucked in his lap so that he can take more, and while taking, give.

He kisses round her sharp jaw: a fraction finer, a tad tighter than last week; nibbles on the nerve in her neck to make her squirm and when she does moves downward as her head drops back to expose her neck and clavicles. Thick fingers delicately undo her buttons and whisper across her cleavage, lips follow as he lays her back and leans down over her; her hands slide into his hair to hold his head to her chest to tease and taste, sliding thin fabric and narrow lace over hard peaks and softer curves, twining his tongue till she’s breathing harder and arching up into him. He undoes her bra, slides her shirt from her shoulders and off to who cares where, runs fingertips under the rim and over the malleable flesh to cause her to shiver, not with cold, and sigh, not sadly.

Castle considers, with the very tiny portion of brain which is not utterly lust-fuzzed and concentrating on making his Beckett-Kat feel very, very good, whether he should carry on here, or pick her up and carry her to bed. Carrying her to bed has the huge advantage that it reinforces the assertive masculinity that always turns her on and that she seems to need to relax her more often than not. It suddenly occurs to him that the people she’s normally most comfortable with are big, or tough, men. There’s Lanie, or there was, and there’s Ryan – but it’s O’Leary, and Espo, and now him, who seem to help her most, in very different ways. He parks that thought for later digestion: now not being the time for stopping to think, and decides to split the sexual difference.

His hand wanders from breast downward to the button and zip of her dark dress pants, opens both, and slides over the smooth cotton, cupping briefly and then carrying on down to take the pants away. It’s enormously erotic to have her half-naked, only in her underwear, responsive to his touch and caught in his clasp; and when he returns a hard palm to cup her again she writhes against him and he can feel dampness through the fabric. He puts his mouth back to her breasts and leaves his hand where it is, pressing, moving very slightly above the cotton, stimulating sensitive nerves and bringing a whimper from her. It only winds him higher, harder: knowing that he, only he, elicits these desperate noises, that only he sees this side to her; his hands and mouth become possessive, predatory as he takes her full lips again and slips fingers beneath her panties and slides his thumb across her: owning her reactions and now the whimper is a moan and she wants him, wants more, emitting his name on a high breath and lost in him. All thoughts of waiting to reach her bed flee. She’s here and she’s his and so wet and hot and tight around his fingers and there will be time later for more but right now he needs her to shatter just where she’s caught against him because she’s his, only his, and only he can give her this, only he will give her this; forever. He moves his fingers in her and his thumb on her and she’s crying out and writhing and he sends her flying and breaking and spent.

When she opens her eyes, dark, hazy and sleepy, still lax and limp across him; he smiles lazily, consciously projecting comfortably forceful maleness. “That’s better, isn’t it?” he growls dangerously. “Let’s make it better still.” He stands, sweeps her up into his arms, looks down at her hotly and pulls her tightly into his chest, carries her to the bedroom and places her on the bed, peels her bra from her and returns to laying long, leisurely strokes over her curves.

How does he always know what she needs? He’s surrounded her and enfolded her and let her cede control and the lead and it’s exactly, perfectly, the antidote to therapy. No need to decide, barely a need to ask. Only to say yes, to accede, and then to allow Castle to take her away, to let her be Kat in whatever way she wants: now, as so often, to be lost under his big frame and the bulk and hard strength of his body, to feel his muscle holding her safe. She stretches and arches into his slow, intent petting; not troubling even to try to prevent herself emitting the soft, contented purring that will show him that Kat’s come out to play.

She’d been scared, she vaguely remembers, way back before Christmas, that being Kat with Castle would be going too far, sharing things she didn’t want to share: simply letting him get his own way like he always seemed to. Now, that seems ridiculous: she’d been so wrong about that. Being Kat with Castle is… everything she didn’t know she needed.

“You’re purring,” he says, in the velvet-smooth baritone that promises sin and delightful wickedness. “I like making you purr.” His hand slips from her hip to her thigh, fingers lying as still as a stalking leopard. She mews quietly, and tries to move so that his seductive hand slides to her soft centre. “Here you are,” he says into her ear, “wearing nothing but your panties, soaking wet, tousled and sexy and spread out; thinking about undoing my shirt and pants” – how did he know that?, although she supposes it’s not exactly a difficult deduction – “wondering what I’ll do with you next” – she is wondering, but not about whether she’ll enjoy it – “and watching me watching you.” The voice slithers into her ears and down her nerves and slinks into her core, where it swirls sensuously.

“What should I do with you? I could do lots of things” – his fingers draw a little pattern – “that you’d like. Question is, what would you like most tonight?” Beckett doesn’t think that’s anything other than a rhetorical question, especially when Castle leans down and kisses her before she can open her mouth on an answer. On the other hand, it does allow her to open his button-down and run her hands under it to reach warm skin over firm muscle and grip his broad back, and then to tug him down to cover her, flesh to flesh. Well. She tries to tug. Castle declines to be tuggable.

“Naughty, naughty,” he husks. “Just wait. We’ll get to that. Just let me lead.” He acquires the expression of a well-fed lion, who nevertheless could still manage dessert. “But you can certainly undress me, if it makes you happier?” Stupid man. Of course it will improve her mood. Castle is a very nice thing to look at. Nice and large (in so many ways), well-defined without being too body-builder. Mmmm. She eases his shirt off and essays some focused stroking of her own, ending up at his waist, where her practised fingers find his belt buckle and then no resistance at all to her fingers opening it, his fly, and sliding his pants from his extremely pattable ass (she pats it, mischievously, as she’s passing it) to leave him in silk boxers (really, does he have any other kind?) and – er – assertively present, so to speak. She purrs happily, all her troubles put away for now, and curves up against Castle. He kisses her hard, conquering without resistance, and then starts to travel southward, pinning her hands with his until he’s reached his goal and is looking up at her with a hungry, wolfish expression that leaves her soaked and mewling without a touch.

And then he holds her wide and settles down and her hands hit his head and she can’t get breath to make a noise as he feasts. He is so good at it. She dissolves into the sea of sheer sexual satisfaction and lets the deep waters close over her head, drowning as his mouth and tongue work her deeper and deeper and take her there all over again.

When she recovers, Castle is lying beside her with an arm under her neck. She rolls towards him, and before he’s fully registered that she’s awake she’s astride him, wriggling into a placement that slides over his undiminished erection. He pulls her down to his mouth, shifts on his own account and then thrusts once to be fully and very satisfyingly within her. It hadn’t quite been the idea, but she’s not going to complain. And then he rolls them over and covers her and it’s only the man and the motion and magnificence.

“How do you know?” she says, curled into him, half sprawled over him.

“Know what?” Castle asks lazily, playing with little wisps of her hair where they’re floating over his shoulder.

She blushes. “What I…” – there’s a pause, which Castle doesn’t fill – “…need.” He stiffens under her in surprise, and then clearly has to think about it.

“Observation?” he says hopefully. “I know when you’re unhappy.” She cuddles down against him. “You just need someone to lean on occasionally. That’s what” – there’s a very odd hitch in his voice – “friends are for.”

Beckett notices the hitch, and its placement in the sentence, and doesn’t press the immediate point. She isn’t entirely sure that friends is the word he’d first thought of. Still, it’s not wholly right.

“Partners, Castle. Partners.” That’s not wholly right either, but she’s not – yet – in a place where she can go further and be able to make good on the word.

His arms tighten round her. “Partners?” he repeats, almost sounding shocked. “Really?”

“Yes.” She has a sudden horrible thought. “But you don’t get a badge or a gun and you still can’t be a cop.” She knows Castle is pouting without even having to look.

“But what if the bad guys come?” he says, humorously plaintive. “How am I going to defend you?”

“Uh-uh. I defend you if the bad guys come.” She stops abruptly, and continues in a very different, much more serious tone. “You… do this for me. It’s… more than enough. You’re more than enough.” She buries her face in his chest and refuses to look at him.

Castle stares open-mouthed at the ceiling, and then when he’s recovered from that stunning statement enough to move his head stares open-mouthed at the top of Beckett’s dark head, which is all he can see. For possibly the first time in his adult life, he has absolutely no idea at all what to say. All his armies of words have flown out of his head.

“Me?” he eventually squeaks. He doesn’t sound like himself at all. Beckett tries to worm her way into some form of hiding. No no no. She doesn’t get to say that and hide. No hiding. He gently, but inexorably, pulls her up till he can see her face – blushing crimson and she won’t look him in the eye – and then kisses her, equally gently and inexorably. If he’s what she needs – if he’s her partner, and it’s just occurred to him that she has never named him so before: he’s said it, but she has not – if he is more than enough, then…then that’s huge. Life-changing. Because if she can say that, with that expression, then there is more. Much more.

But right now, what she needs is him to hold her close, and kiss her, and take the lead and let her be Kat, and show her that he’s hers, in every possible way; that he’ll take care of her when she needs it and have her back when she needs that. He’ll be her rock, her stability, her firm ground. And she…
well, she’s already everything to him. She’s fixing herself, and that is more than enough for him.

And so he cossets her close, and pulls her in, and makes love to her in the smoothly assertive fashion that she enjoys most, and she responds with the soft openness that he loves best, and finally they fall wrapped together into sleep.

Life is frantic next day in the precinct. The first bloomings of spring have brought out the crazy in people, and the workload has spiked. None of it is tricky, or clever, or Beckett-flavoured, but all of it needs dealt with. The team hunkers down to hard work, with Castle providing fewer insane theories and more coffee. As so often happens, they work their collective asses off for twenty-four hours, and then they have to wait. Lab results, camera footage, phone records, bank records, all seem to be on a go-slow. Beckett fusses and frets and threatens, but nothing gets her any information any faster, and at five p.m. on Thursday they are stuck. Nothing will arrive before tomorrow.

At that point Beckett’s phone rings. She looks at it with considerable irritation, expecting that it will be – in no particular order of annoying/infuriating/upsetting-ness – Dr Parrish or her father, who have each taken to attempting to call her once a day. She’s not interested in speaking to either of them.
Really not.

It’s not either of them. Her irritation drops away as soon as she recognises – it takes a moment – the number.

“Hey, O’Leary, what’s up?”

“Beckett,” he says cheerfully, “I hear that you’re all waiting for data. I beat you Twelfths to the punch, but the lab an’ everyone tells me that the guys in the Thirty-Second take so long to solve their cases that they have to get the results a second time cause they’ve died of old age, so I can’t get mine either.”

Beckett laughs. The entire bullpen flips round to look at this lately unusual sight.

“So I thought you and Castle might have time for a beer?”

“Sure I do,” she says, “let me just ask him.” She lowers the phone for a second. “Want a beer with O’Leary, Castle?”

“Sure.”

“Yeah, that’s all good. Where – not Molloy’s again, huh? I’m tired of green. How about Esperanto, Avenue C? ‘S near here.”

“You’re gonna make me come all that way down there, Beckett?”

“Yep,” she says briskly. “Anything to avoid the Irish bar again. See you around seven.”
Esposito wanders over. “Out with O’Leary again, Beckett? Don’tcha love us any more?” He attempts to bat his eyelashes, and looks entirely ridiculous.

“Never did,” Beckett sniggers unkindly.

“C’mon. We wanna come too.”

“Nope,” Beckett says firmly. “Had lunch with you.”

“We were all in the bullpen for lunch, Beckett,” Ryan pipes up. “I wanna meet your mountain. C’mon.”

“Nope,” she says more firmly. “Not happening. Not today.” Espo scowls, and Ryan pouts. Clearly he’s been taking lessons from Castle on the side. Unfortunately Beckett is immune. Castle’s pout doesn’t work on her, so Ryan’s certainly won’t.

The boys are still muttering blackly under their breaths when Beckett starts to pack up, though they also take it as their signal to leave and find their own bar. Castle, having only to put on his coat and ensure he doesn’t forget his phone, is perfectly ready in seconds.

O’Leary hasn’t made it to Esperanto before they do.

“Drink, Beckett?”

“Yeah. Can I get a beer, please? Breckenridge.” Castle conceals any hint of surprise and instead tells himself that if Beckett’s having a beer, she must be in a rather more relaxed mood than earlier in the week.

Standing at the bar, he also recollects the errant and escaped thought that he’d had on Tuesday: that Beckett is surrounded by big or tough men. Or both, of course. O’Leary is both. He, Castle, doesn’t pretend to be tough in the way that the cops around her are tough, but he’s not little, and he’s not a wimp either. And Espo is seriously tough. Even Ryan is pretty tough, though he hides it well. He looks around, soaking up the atmosphere and the large butterfly decorated screen above the bar, and for a moment wishes that he hadn’t placed Nikki’s fictional precinct up near West 75th.

“Hey, Castle,” rumbles behind him. How does a man that size sneak like that? “Mine’s a Mexicali.” Castle adds it to the order. O’Leary’s looking at the butterfly screen with a sneaky smile.

“Food? I was going to get us some snacks, or we can get real food in a minute.”

“Let’s get some chips and guacamole. And salsa.”

“Oh, and pico de gallo.”

A container-load of chips is ordered along with the beers, and the two men return to flank Beckett, who’s beginning to look as if they might have had to brew the beer rather than buy it. The quizzical semi-glare diminishes when she finds that there will shortly be chips, and then casts her vote for dinner too.

“So why are you all so busy?” Castle asks, by way of conversation opener. Beckett looks at O’Leary, O’Leary looks at Beckett, and they grin happily at each other. Beckett makes a you-go gesture at O’Leary.

“Spring is sprung,” he says, and Castle is infected by the joint grin to grin too at the familiar words, “the grass is riz.”
“I wonder where the killers is,” Beckett chimes in, and Castle snorts.

“We never did find a good next line, did we?”

“No. But I’m quite keen on them being in jail.”

“Sure you are, butterfly.”

“Butterfly?” Castle squawks.
Love is like a butterfly

“Butterfly,” O’Leary says, grinning as widely as the Rio Grande delta and simultaneously defending himself from Beckett’s outraged screech and attempts to silence him.

“O’Leary, I will kill you!”

“Nah, you love me really. Besides which, that’s what we called you. When we weren’t calling you hard-ass, or ball-breaker, or” –

“Shut up, O’Leary. This is not fair.”

“You told Castle about the weightlifting,” he says. Castle watches happily as they fall into the cop-flavoured banter of old friends.

“You told him how we met.”

“I’m bigger than you.”

“You’re bigger than a Bigfoot. Still not fair.”

“Might makes right, Beckett,” O’Leary says provocatively. She squawks crossly, but under it all there’s a smile quirking at the corners of her eyes and lips.

“You wouldn’t. You can’t tell Castle that. It’s not fair,” she pouts, looking around five.

“You’re so cute when you’re cross,” O’Leary smirks – and then grabs her hands to prevent mayhem and possibly murder.

“Butterfly?” Castle says. “How did Beckett get to be called butterfly? Aren’t butterflies beautiful and fragile? I’ll give you the beautiful – oof! Don’t do that, Beckett! It hurts – but I really don’t get the fragile piece. Even compared to Mount Rushmore here.”

“I hate you,” Beckett grumbles into her beer bottle. “That’s entirely unfair.”

Castle chortles happily into his own beer, and makes sure he’s guarding himself against Beckett’s likely revenge on both of them. He toasts O’Leary when Beckett can’t see, and they trade a whole world of understanding in that single exchanged glance.

Which is undoubtedly why, after they’ve ordered some dinner, O’Leary takes point again.

“You look a lot better today, Beckett. Things clearing up?”

“Yeah.”

“Good. You call me if you need a pal and Castle’s not around, ‘kay?”

“Okay,”

O’Leary drops a quick hug round Beckett’s shoulders, lasting no more than half an instant, and that, it seems, is that. No more apparently needs to be said, but Castle feels that a lot more was said than was vocalised.

Dinner arrives, and Castle watches with interest the familiar ability of cops of all shapes and sizes to dispose of their dinners in double-quick time. Since conversation is not possible – these two cops having evidently absorbed table manners at their parents’ knees in the form of never speaking with their mouths full – he returns to tugging on the mental thread that he’d caught earlier: to wit, Beckett’s penchant for being surrounded by big, tough men. In fact, with the sole exception of Lanie, currently cast into the outer darkness, he’s never noticed or heard about a female friend. It’s not Castle’s previous experience of women. He’s generally found that women have lots of women friends and very few true male friends. Whether, of course, that’s because sex gets in the way is an open question but not the present point. Beckett is unusually devoid of female friends, and unusually well supplied with male ones.

He finds that very odd. Women, again in his fairly wide experience, (he doesn’t just mean as an adult, nor yet his playboy encounters, but everything he had seen while trailing round the country to a hundred repertory theatres) have women friends with whom they socialise, shop and – oh. Oh.

With whom they talk. Beckett does not talk. She is quite famous – or more accurately notorious – for not talking. And if she’s not comfortable talking, then it’s perfectly logical that all her friends are male. It’s her circle of protection, from so many things, but first of all it’s her protection from ever being forced to talk. Men, in general, are not big on talking about feelings or emotions, and Beckett’s boys still less so – Ryan’s clumsy attempts notwithstanding. So she needn’t ever talk, and needn’t ever deal – and he’s just watched O’Leary play along with that, again. Gave her the nod that he’s there for her if she needs it, but didn’t push. Same for Esposito: made her go sparring and bounced her all over the mats – but didn’t push, and she looked far better for it.

Conversely, when Ryan did try to ask her anything he got precisely nowhere, and she’s been just a little reserved with him since; nothing unpleasant, nothing to shut him out, but there’s a tiny touch of coolness there, as if she’s expecting something and preparing to close it off.

Still, he can’t imagine that being totally female-friendless is a good thing. Surely there are matters about which she wants to talk to another woman? A small niggle starts to form in his mind: that really Beckett does need to patch things up with Lanie. Somehow. She’d been upset that Lanie hadn’t behaved the way she, Beckett, needed – though he’ll bet the farm that she never asked Lanie to back off, simply shut her out, so Lanie kept shouting till it all blew up – and she was really miserable that night. She hasn’t mentioned Lanie since, except in a work context as Dr Parrish, and she hasn’t seen her either.

Castle acquires the extremely uncomfortable feeling that he ought to talk to Lanie. Not about Beckett, though. That’s a short, excruciating route to death: his own. He’s no martyr. No, about her own behaviour. Why does he suddenly feel like the only adult in a world of squabbling children? Fortunately, before he verbalises that thought, which will certainly lead to a whole universe of commentary about his own maturity and general disposition, he realises that conversation is restarting, and that Beckett and O’Leary are bitching companionably about 1PP’s latest insanity and ass-backwards idiocy, which is a conversation to which he has nothing to contribute but more drinks – he checks, and to his surprise Beckett accepts a second beer – and the dessert menu.

Shortly, three lots of churros appear, and the level of bitching drops to nil. It’s supposed to be one portion each. Castle clocks the predatory look in Beckett’s eye and mentally resigns himself to losing out. He remembers, a little too late, how she’d dealt with the doughnuts and her possessive grip on them – and her grip on her Glock. O’Leary has no such scruples.

“Beckett, you remember what happened the last time you stole my dessert?”
She blushes. Actually, positively blushes, and cringes, and pouts. “Yes,” she sulks. “But you should’ve shared.”

“You eat your dessert and I’ll eat mine and don’t you dare lay a finger on my churros. Or I’ll do the same again.”

“What did you do?” asks Castle, fascinated by the big-brotherly tone that – amazing! – seems to work on Beckett. Beckett growls threateningly.

“What about my dessert?” Castle says plaintively.

“Your dessert, your problem.” He rumbles, which would be a laugh if it weren’t wobbling the table. “I’d hold her hands, if I was you.” Beckett grumps her way through her churros and then spends the next few minutes glaring impartially at both of them. Castle takes O’Leary’s advice and hangs on to her hands while he finishes. Her fingers are twitching in a very ready-to-be-thieving fashion.

“I’m not bringing you next time,” she grumbles. “Teaming up like that. You’re supposed to be my pal, O’Leary.”

“I am. I just like my desserts in my belly, not yours.”

Beckett hrrumphs, and subsides.

The dinner concludes with everybody happy and nobody dead. This is good, and reassuring. As earlier, O’Leary gives Beckett a brief, enveloping hug, then clasps hands with Castle in a not-quite-threateningly muscular way. Farewells are said, and then Castle steers Beckett off in one direction with an arm round her, pursued by O’Leary’s amused grin. “Night, Butterfly,” follows them down the street.

“Still can’t see you as a butterfly,” Castle says incautiously. “Ow! Stop that.”

“Don’t call me a butterfly, then.”

“I didn’t. It’s totally incongruous. I mean” – he makes sure he has hold of her hands – “falcon, or leopard, or some other sort of sleekly gorgeous deadly predator. Not a butterfly.” He muses for a moment. “Maybe a steel butterfly. With razor-edged wings and laser eyes. A prettier version of the spy insects in Transformers.”

Beckett emits a strangled squeal at a pitch Castle would have thought only a castrato could achieve. He belatedly shuts his mouth before he can commit suicide-by-speech.

“Shut up. No more animal comparisons. None. And if anyone ever calls me butterfly in anyone’s hearing ever I will remove their balls with a rusty razor blade.” Castle reflexively winces and covers his groin, hoping that she only means O’Leary. As a consequence he barely hears her next words. “I’m not fragile.”

Oh. Ah. Okay, then. He gets it. “No, you surely aren’t. Not the way Espo threw you round the mat.” He smiles very slightly downward at his Beckett-butterfly. (ha! She can’t read his mind – can she?) “Shall I come and massage your bruises?”

Beckett considers for a minute. She would very much like Castle to massage her bruises. And then her not-bruised areas. She might even massage his. It would be a delightful way to distract herself from the homework she hasn’t managed to do for Dr Burke.

And wrong.

She has to do the work. She has to sort this out. If she wants Castle… if she cares about him (and she does)… then she has to be able to cope with the loft, and his family. So she needs to do the homework. Maybe he’ll be her reward after.

“Not tonight.” But she can’t quite say why; can’t force the explanation out. Even if he knows about the therapy, she can’t say why. “Maybe tomorrow? Come round about eight. I’ll be done with the session” – she can say that, even if she winces – “by then.”

Castle listens very carefully to the intonations and hitches in her voice, closes his arm around her and hugs tightly. “Okay. But I’ll walk you to the subway first.”

“I’d like that,” she says, almost shyly, and glances up through her lashes and away.

Beckett really does not want to try and excavate her feelings about her original grief. She went through it for real, and she went through it in counselling, and it hurt just as much every time. It never stopped hurting, and it’s going to hurt again now. She forces herself to think back. No. That’s wrong. She simply allows herself finally, eight years after she first started trying to shut it out, to open the floodgates to the memories and let them take her away. No force required. The force has only ever been required to keep the floodgates shut.

The funeral. That’s where this all began.

The memory is pinpoint sharp, the snow lying white on the ground around the grave, the black she wore, the black her father wore: the raven shades around them of friends and family – little enough of that – the polished oak and the brown earth, the grey clouds lowering overhead, heavy with more snow. Every detail is etched into the mirror-glass of her memory. Her father, tears icy on his white, drawn face; the minister in his cassock. O death, where is thy sting, O grave, where is thy victory? And then, a little further on, the ghastly sound of the first clods of earth falling on the lowered coffin: earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. She supposes she must have wept, but all she remembers is her father’s cold white deathly face, and the tears rolling down his cheeks, falling from his chin. He’d stood straight, until it was all over. He’d reached out to her as she blindly sought to take his hand. It might have been the last time he’d done so, for five long years.

His misery had ripped into her. Her father, her parent, the person who should be strong so that she could lean on him, was devastated: incapable of taking any decisions, incapable of listening to her. So she tried to make it better for him: dealt with practicalities, and told herself that she was working out her grief by dealing with the administrative matters. She couldn’t bear to see her father so upset, and it didn’t take a genius to work out that mentioning her mother upset him more, so she didn’t mention it. Not after the first time, when his face crumpled like a child’s and the tears fell and he got up from the table and walked away: and then the sound of the bottle clinking on the glass.

She’d gone to the counsellor, once she was back at college: the sun bright on the campus, flowers blooming. She’d talked about it. But the counsellor couldn’t provide the shared memories and connections, the remembrance of family trips or in-jokes, do-you-remember-when? No-one could, except her father: there wasn’t much else in the way of family and she disliked Aunt Theresa with a passion. And her father couldn’t, or wouldn’t, talk.

She remembers the growing queasiness before each call home: the discomfort as she realised that she had to censor each sentence to avoid upsetting her father, the growing panic that each time she called he sounded a little more disconnected, a little less sober. So she talked about neutral subjects and generalities and tried to quash her terror. She’d felt that if she could go home and see him, then she’d prove to herself that her fears were groundless. Everything would be fine, if she went home.

She had ignored the twisting in her gut, the ever-present nervousness; bought a cheap flight on a budget airline for speed and not told her father she was coming. She’d told herself that it would be a lovely surprise for him, and almost been convinced, until she stepped on the plane and fastened her seatbelt and realised that one way or another, this was it.

It had been now, in fact. Exactly today, ten years past.

With every mile on the train and every stop on the subway, as she neared her father’s Upper East Side apartment, her fear had writhed and grown; expanding until she could barely breathe with terror. But when she opened the door and he turned round and his face lit up with dazzling joy, all her fears and worries vanished. She didn’t even notice the bottle and glass as she stepped towards him. Everything was fine. Everything was just fine.

And then he cried joyfully “Johanna!” and she realised that it wasn’t her, would never be her, who put joy on his face. She could have sworn that she felt her heart snap when he realised that it was his daughter, not his wife. I thought you were her. I wanted her, he had said, and the utter disappointment in his voice and face had broken her again. He’d downed the half full glass in one gulp and started to cry; the glass had fallen from his hand, rolling through the spilt amber whiskey, and clinked to a halt against the bottle. He’d turned away from her. You’re not her, he’d wept. You aren’t her. Why aren’t you her? Go away. I don’t want you.

She’d gone to her room and unpacked, weeping all the way. She’d brought him a small, silly present; but she’d put it back in her carry-on bag. Then she’d dried her eyes and blown her nose and done what she did best: take action. Stalked back to the main room, wrapping herself in her own anger that he could degrade himself so, so degraded that he didn’t know his own daughter; and taken the already-refilled glass from his shaking, fumbling hands; poured that and the bottle down the sink. He’d cursed her. Her own father, and he had cursed her as foully as a stevedore on the docks. She hadn’t, till then, realised the full extent of his drunkenness.

She couldn’t bear to see him at the table any more, where they had used to be a family: hauled him up, his pitiful, wasted flailings at her no match for fury and fitness. She couldn’t bear to see his slack, shocked face: everything she’d lost – she’d lost it all too, but he didn’t seem to care about that – reflected in his eyes. He wanted her mother, and she was a poor substitute.

She shoved him along to his bedroom, not gently: (but not rough, she couldn’t do that to him. Then, or ever. She wanted to, sometimes: wanted to lash out and hurt him as he hurt her, over and over again. She never had. She’d given up on bitter, tempestuous words too, after a while. Losing her temper wouldn’t help, didn’t help.) furious with him and more so with herself for coming home unannounced when she had, did she but admit it, known all along that it would mean disaster.

She’d thought, then, that she could make it all better by removing temptation. Surely if there were no alcohol, when her father sobered up and realised what he’d said and done he’d be sorry? Surely? And so she’d slipped through every public room of the apartment and emptied every last bottle – and there had been many – down the sink. She’d thought, with a sigh of relief, that she’d solved the problem. How naïve could she get? Still, she had only been nineteen.

Finally, she’d gone back to her own bedroom. This time, not blinded by tears, she’d looked around. Every memento and photo that might have reminded her of her mother was gone. She had a moment of blinding anger, and then relief that she’d taken her little stone bird to college with her.
She had cried herself dry, that night. Not for the first time, nor yet the last. That had come later, when she’d eventually worked out that rage, or grief, or tears solved nothing. It was the first time, but not the last, that she thought her father had broken her.

The first time, but not the last, that she’d clung to faint hope in the darkness, only to be betrayed.

In the morning he’d been pleased to see her. In the morning, it had become clear that he remembered nothing of the previous evening. In the morning, he’d excused himself somehow, and promised it was just a one-time error: he’d not do it again. In the morning, she’d booked an appointment and had her hair cut and coloured that same day, so that she didn’t resemble her mother.

She had believed him, then. Wanted so much to believe him that she’d convinced herself in no time that it would all be fine.

But it wasn’t fine, and it wouldn’t be fine, and it has never been fine again.
Tears on my pillow

Beckett finds that her cheeks are soaking and there is a damp trail on her shirt. She blows her nose, but can’t stop the tears and consequent sniffing at all, no matter how hard she tries. Once she’s started crying, she simply cannot stop at all. She’s still crying as she cleans off her ruined make-up, still crying under a scalding shower that doesn’t warm her up in the slightest, still crying as she slides into bed, still crying as she shivers with the weight of her memories, and still crying as she sleeps.

Her sleep is heavy and unrefreshing, and for once she makes generous use of the snooze button on the alarm, only rising when she has to. She isn’t sick, and she won’t call in sick when she isn’t, but she doesn’t want to go in. She dresses to shore up her fragile emotions, and reaches her desk only minutes ahead of start of shift. Ryan and Espo are already there, but don’t seem to notice her sneaking in. She gets everything running, and goes to make herself an extra strong coffee. She needs the caffeine hit.

While she’s waiting for it to brew, breathing in the familiar, consoling aroma, the thought worms its way into her head that she would have loved to have been able to talk about her mother, without every possibility and every memory being tainted by a covering of whisky, grief and alcoholism.

Behind her, Esposito considers his phone and considers Castle’s number, sitting there just waiting to be dialled. Beckett arriving after him is unusual. Beckett arriving after Ryan is almost unheard of. Beckett leaving it till two minutes to shift start to arrive at her desk is a surprise comparable only to having no new bodies for a month, or him, Special Forces Sniper Esposito, missing the bulls-eye more than once a year. She looks ill, and without a new body or some developments in the cases Castle isn’t going to turn up. This is a problem. He watches Beckett emerge with a steaming coffee mug and decides to leave the problem to fester for a while. Self-preservation has a lot to do with that choice. He does notice that the coffee improves her, and puts off the decision for longer.

A trickle of results from the footage requests enlivens the morning. Ryan is set running through them – if he has square eyes already he might as well use them – and then phone records arrive. Beckett takes those herself, and details Espo to harass the lab. Phone records don’t require her to interact with anyone else for a while, and she has a headache which two Tylenol with her shower this morning have failed to cure.

Esposito is not hugely impressed at being left with harassing the lab. He’d rather be out bringing in suspects and then interrogating them with a main course of intimidation and a side order of scary. On the other hand, it would get him out the bullpen, which is winding him up right now, what with Ryan sucking air through his teeth every five minutes as he stares at the footage and Beckett looking like someone broke her favourite doll. On the downside, he’ll have to deal with Lanie Parrish, and dealing with Lanie Parrish is not currently at the pleasant end of his to-do list. He weighs up the options, and decides that being out the bullpen is the best of a bad lot.

The morgue and the labs are cool and quiet. Espo finds them deeply tedious and (though he understands all the words and technical terms just fine) long-winded. Although, he thinks with a small amount of relief, at least it’s not Perlmutter. Perlmutter doesn’t even have the advantage of being in any way good to look at. Lanie certainly does. Twice over, between neck and waist.

“Espo?” arrives from behind him, just as he’s considering Lanie’s looks. “What’re you doing down here?”

“Hopin’ for some results, an’ avoiding staring at camera footage. You got anythin’ for us?”
“No. Still dealing with all the corpses that came in before yours. We’re pushing them through as fast as we can but there’s only so much we can do.”

“How long?”

“Another day, anyway.” Lanie looks at Espo slightly sidelong.

“Okay. I gotta get back.”

“Not so fast, Espo.” Esposito’s heart sinks into his boots. He’s faced war, dammit, and terrorists, out in the desert – and Lanie Parrish is more terrifying than both, and more pertinently she’s right in his face. “What’s up with Kate?”

“No idea,” Espo blanks the question.

“Don’t give me that. You’re there in the bullpen seeing her every day. Is she okay?” Fatally, Espo hesitates. “She’s not okay. Why didn’t someone tell me?” Lanie’s voice is rising. “I’d have helped.”

Espo really doesn’t want to be here. This is about to become a complete clusterfuck and he’s the one standing on the cluster bomb.

“If Beckett wanted to tell you she would’ve,” he equivocates.

“Kate’s not telling me anything,” Lanie says bitterly. “Nor are any of you. What am I, chopped liver?”

“She’s your pal,” Espo points out bluntly. “Maybe you shouldn’t’ve yelled at her in the bullpen. Bet she didn’t like it.”

Lanie glares at him. “You tell Kate that she can’t keep hiding from me. I wanna help. Just because she’s running round with Writer-Boy doesn’t mean she needs to drop all her friends.”

“You want me to tell her that? You really think that’s gonna make things better? You’re outta your mind. You want to tell her anything, do it yourself. I ain’t your messenger boy.”

He turns to leave, and then turns back for a parting shot. “Maybe if you wanna be pals you oughta stop acting like a flat track bully an’ try listenin’ to her, not yellin’. An’ maybe think why Castle’s her best pal now an’ not you.”

He leaves Lanie gobbling like a Thanksgiving turkey as the chopper approaches its neck, and thinks that he’s just screwed any chance of getting friendly with Lanie himself. He shrugs. Plenty of other fish in the sea, and he’s never had a problem with catching them.

When he gets back he says absolutely nothing about Lanie’s comments on Beckett, listens while Beckett casts vile imprecations on every other precinct’s queue-jumping corpses until she dissolves into a mud swamp of grumbles, and notes with some discomfort that she still doesn’t look good at all. On the other hand…

“C’mon, Beckett, sparring time.”

“Okay.”

She’s not really on her game, though. It’s all too easy for him to drop her every other move, and he quits trying after twenty minutes.
“You ain’t got your head in the game, Beckett. Not throwin’ you round the mats if you’re not with it. ‘S not a fair fight.”

“It’s never a fair fight with you, Espo.”

“I’m just that good,” he preens. “Anyway, I’m not sparrin’ with you when you’re not up to it. Time to tap out ‘n’ get some lunch.”

He struts to the showers and considers, again, whether to tag Castle. In the end he doesn’t, being quite keen on living his current life with a full set of limbs and other items. If Castle hasn’t turned up it’s because Beckett hasn’t called him, so if he does turn up Beckett will clock that one of them has called him, and while shoving all the blame on to Ryan would be funny, and suitable revenge for Ryan having given Lanie the nod the other night, he’d be found out pretty sharply and then he’ll be dead. And that’s not necessarily a figure of speech. Still, by the end of shift he’s wondering if he’s made the right call.

His conscience gets the better of him as Beckett leaves, and he’s calling Castle as she’s going down in the elevator.

“Castle, you seein’ Beckett later?”

“Maybe.”

“Think you should make that definitely. She ain’t been right all day.”

“Okay.”

And that’s that. His twinging conscience fully appeased, Esposito takes himself off to his own gym and spends a pleasant evening working out, capped when he beats his personal best with the weightlifting bar.

Castle is not happy to receive Espo’s call. Mostly, this is because he’d wanted to go to the Twelfth and forced himself not to, because he really needs to get some writing done before the wrath of Gina (which is worse than the wrath of God) descends upon his head. However, he wasn’t exactly happy about doing so, and he’s worried about the gaps and hitches in Beckett’s non-explanation of why she hadn’t wanted him to come with her last night because he is absolutely, totally certain it was to do some thinking prior to therapy, which he knows is going to have upset her because every single therapy session has upset her. He stops his brain running on in that ill-disciplined fashion, and looks at his watch. It’s shift end. He has already been invited round tonight, and he has no intention of missing that, but she’s got therapy first so she’ll already be packing up, if not leaving.

Still, he’s deeply unhappy that Beckett’s been miserable all day and not got in touch. Then again, how was she going to deal with an undoubtedly emotion-provoking call in the bullpen? Answer, naturally, she wasn’t – certainly not under Espo’s beady eye. But he wishes that she had, even though she’s seeing him (at her request) later.

Beckett had thought about calling Castle more or less from the moment she’d finished her first coffee. Then she’d remembered that he was coming tonight, which is one big ask, she now thinks, because it’s going to be a rough session and she is hardly going to be fluffy and fun after it. (How often is she ever fluffy and fun anyway? It’s not her nature to be anything other than hard shelled and brushing off the important things with snark and snippiness. Deep feelings get you hurt.) And there’s the second reason. She couldn’t stop crying last night and she is not, emphatically not, going to get into that in the bullpen. If she calls, she’ll have to say what’s wrong, and while being wrapped up in Castle’s broad bulk is very comforting, it’s not possible in the precinct and into the bargain it’ll take him half an hour to get here. She can’t spend that long in the restroom without Montgomery asking some very awkward questions all over again. She can’t bear to be benched, all over again.

So she grits it out. She sends Espo to the lab, and Dr Parrish, praying that he’ll be impervious to Dr Parrish’s probing and prying. He looks pretty ruffled when he gets back, and not a little cross, but there’s an undertone of told-her-so into which Beckett does not enquire. She does, however, notice his sideways glances and his fingers fidgeting and tapping at his phone. Since he doesn’t appear to dial, and Castle doesn’t appear, she doesn’t make anything of it, even when she epically fails to spar properly. She just can’t get into it. Every time she tries to get her head focused on anything, she sees Dr Burke’s door, and has to force back the tide of memories. She’s almost glad when it’s time to go. Anticipation of the guillotine is so much worse than facing the reality.

Dr Burke’s door is almost overwhelmingly terrifying. She does not want to do this. She really doesn’t want to do this.

She plasters on a poker face and does it.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett.”

“Hello.”

Dr Burke surveys Detective Beckett. She appears to have had significantly less sleep than required. The signs of stress and upset are evident to his experienced eye. He concludes, quite correctly, that she has undertaken at least a proportion of the work that he had requested that she do, and had been profoundly distressed by her thoughts.

“Detective Beckett, where would you like to begin?” The flash of expression across her face suggests that her first response to that question might well be nowhere.

“I would have liked to talk about Mom,” she says flatly, and snaps her mouth shut. Dr Burke allows the silence to extend for a few seconds.

“Why did you not?”

There is a much more extended silence.

“He cried,” comes harshly from her throat. “I couldn’t stand to see him cry. I couldn’t make him cry more. So I just left it.”

“Your father was overwhelmed by his grief?”

“Yes.” Another bitten off word.

“To whom did you talk, at the time?”

“The counsellor, back at college.”

“Not to family?”

“There wasn’t any other family to talk to.”

“None?” Detective Beckett is completely devoid of other family? Had she no other relatives? That is very unusual, even in these days of smaller families.
“The only one was Aunt Theresa. We…didn’t get on. And my cousin Sophia, but we’re not close. She’s much younger.”

“So you could only talk to the counsellor. Mm.” That is profoundly unsatisfactory. “Did you talk about your mother to anyone at a later time?” He is not hopeful of a positive answer.

“No.” How disappointingly predictable.

“Why not?”

Detective Beckett fails to answer. Her mouth opens, but then closes. It appears, for a moment, that she had not thought further than the simple concept that she would have liked to be able to talk about her mother with her father.

“Everything was spoiled,” she says bleakly. “No-one would have understood anyway: it was all family jokes and memories. No-one would have got them.” Her voice is frighteningly controlled. “No point. It wouldn’t have been the same.”

Dr Burke considers this response. “Mm,” he says non-committally. “Did no-one ask?” He acquires the very strange impression that the first answer that should have been given was not more than once.

“Not really.”

There is a slight pause, in which Detective Beckett’s normal extreme reticence is on full display. Dr Burke deduces without the slightest difficulty that her reticence is linked to the fact that she had been unable to talk about her mother without her father reacting badly, and that Detective Beckett had dealt with this simply by taking the lesson that to discuss anything which might be painful should be avoided. This is not a helpful trait.

Dr Burke remembers something.

“Detective Beckett, you have just said that everything was spoiled. In a previous session, you have said that you take the Christmas Day shifts each year. In what way was Christmas spoiled for you?”

“My mother was murdered,” Detective Beckett bites out. “What more do you need to know? It’s hardly a happy memory.”

Dr Burke simply gazes at her until she drops her eyes. “How did your father behave at Christmas after your mother died?” Ah. He has uncovered a point of conflict. Detective Beckett has flinched. Really, this would be so much easier if Detective Beckett were not so rigidly controlled and so incapable of voicing her thoughts. He supposes that this is yet another symptom of her particular issues.

“He got drunk. Every year. Got drunk and stayed drunk until it was all over.” She hesitates, stands up sharply and paces, not looking at Dr Burke. “The first year, he drank Christmas lunch, starting Christmas morning. I cleaned up and put him to bed. Then we did it again, the next year. He vomited in the presents. I stopped bringing them before the day. He couldn’t talk about was Mom, and how much he missed her. Couldn’t decide if he wanted me to leave ‘cause he couldn’t bear to see me, or stay because I looked like her.” She looks ready to snap, or weep. “You want a short description? Badly.” She picks up a Kleenex and blows her nose.

“And has he made amends for any of those Christmas Days?”

“He apologised. Once he got dry.”
Dr Burke raises an eyebrow. “That is not quite the same thing. Have you ever told him how he behaved.” There is yet another silence. “Detective Beckett?”

“No. There was no point. He didn’t remember and I didn’t want to hurt him. Don’t know why I bothered,” she adds bitterly. “He didn’t care about hurting me.”

Detective Beckett begins, finally, to weep. Almost immediately upon the first tear, she turns away to the window of Dr Burke’s consultation room. It takes less time than he would have preferred for her to turn back, dry eyed once more. It is unhealthy for her to repress her emotions in this way and to this extent, and whilst he has no doubt that this has stemmed from a learned response to her father’s alcoholism, he also has no doubt that Detective Beckett prefers never to show weakness and that therefore this response was partly driven by her own reserved personality.

“So when you said your father had made amends,” Dr Burke asks, “had you at any time told him for what he needed to make amends?”

“I didn’t tell him the details. What would have been the point? He was so fragile and so hurt and how could I push him back to the bottle? He’s only ever one drink away. He barely managed to stop himself after Julia Berowitz. He went straight to his sponsor because he thought he was going to fall. How could I do that to him?”

Dr Burke is appalled. Detective Beckett’s previous therapy has been utterly pointless. He is severely unimpressed with the previous practitioner, who has failed in their duty to their patient on, it would appear, every possible count. Detective Beckett should have been told clearly that, for both her and her father’s recovery, she must tell the whole truth. That omission has led to this result: a serious breach between Detective Beckett and her father; five years of repression of her quite natural and justifiable feelings of hurt and resentment; and all of those issues becoming buried under a perceived – and wholly wrongly perceived – obligation to protect her father and keep him sober.

“Detective Beckett. You are fully aware of, and indeed you quoted to me, the so-called Three Cs of dealing with alcoholic family members. You did not cause it; you cannot control it; and you cannot cure it.” She nods, once. Her face is stony. “I should like you to consider, please, the second of these Cs.” Dr Burke may as well take advantage of Detective Beckett’s painful silences in order to achieve a point at which the session can end on a positive note. The end of the session is approaching, and whilst Dr Burke has scope to extend it, he is certain that Detective Beckett will, again, refuse. It will not prevent him asking if she wishes to prolong the session, should that appear necessary.

Detective Beckett considers briefly.

“And?” she says.

“Please now consider whether your behaviour towards your father both whilst he was drinking and since he became sober is consistent with the second C.”

Detective Beckett considers, this time, for some moments. Dr Burke observes her expressions as she does.

She acquires a look of bitter – how odd, that is not realisation, but familiarity – which Dr Burke notes with an uncomfortable mixture of concern and satisfaction. She does not, naturally, say anything.

“Now, before we meet again, I should like you to reflect upon, in the light of those considerations, why you reacted as you did to Mr and Mrs Berowitz.” Dr Burke is quite clear that Detective Beckett had gone out of her way to help Mrs Berowitz in order to assuage her guilt at walking away from her father. Detective Beckett has not realised this. She must do so, in order to move past it.

“Okay.”

“Unless you would like to continue?”

“No. Thank you.”

Detective Beckett leaves at some speed. Dr Burke smiles in a satisfied manner. His last request to her should allow her to believe that the point of this evening’s session was to allow her to explore her responses to meeting an alcoholic in the course of her work.

Of course, that was one of the points. However, it was not by any means the main point.
Beckett is sitting staring into space when her door is firmly rapped by Castle. She manages to stand up, open the door, and meet his eyes. After that she doesn’t need to do anything but let him take care of her. He simply soothes her by being there.

“Wanna talk about it?” he says softly after a minute. She can’t answer, and Castle doesn’t – thank God – press. He wanders off, and shortly the kettle is boiling and coffee appears, including creamer, nutmeg and cinnamon on the tray.

“Thanks,” she says dully. She hasn’t even asked how he knows, or why he remembers, how she takes her coffee at home. She should have thought harder about can’t control. She’d known it, and forgotten it as soon as he got dry, till now.

Castle watches her doctor her coffee with the spices and creamer and privately wonders if a couple of Valium, or sleeping tablets, wouldn’t be a better idea. She wraps her hands around the mug and he realises that she’s changed into a heavy roll-necked sweater and sweatpants. She looks weighed down, somehow: tired (no surprise there), strained (nor there) and dull; her alpha personality gone out, and not replaced by feminine Kat. Simply squeezed out, and replaced by nothing. She’s cold, he realises, and drops a warm arm around her.

“You can’t control it,” she mumbles.

“Huh?” Castle says. “Can’t control what?”

“Them,” she mumbles further. This makes no sense to Castle.

“Who, Beckett? Who can’t you control?”

“Don’t cause, can’t control, can’t cure.”

He’s heard that somewhere, quite recently, but not recently enough to be at the front of his mind. He’s trying to recover it, but as ever, the more he tries to catch it, the faster it runs away. He lets it run, in the hope that it will run all the way round the fractals of his frontal lobes and reappear, exhausted, so that he can identify it. In the meantime, he’ll cuddle Beckett and finish his coffee and let her mumble as miserably as she needs to until she says something that she actually wants him to answer.

“I really hate therapy,” she says very unhappily. “Dragging up the past. I don’t wanna think about the past. It’s past. Gone. It doesn’t matter any more.”

That’s not true, Beckett. We’re all products of our past, and you are definitely a product of yours. He doesn’t say that. “C’mere,” he murmurs suavely, and pulls her in to be properly tucked into his side; his arm closing tightly around her. “You don’t need to think about it.”

“Yeah, I do,” she spits out. “As if therapy wasn’t bad enough, I get homework.”

“Homework? That seems a bit unfair.”

“Damn straight,” she says, in a phrase that would suit Esposito better but at least shows a sudden flash of spirit. Unfortunately it doesn’t last beyond the full stop. “At least this time it’s not about the past.”
“Mmm?” Castle hums encouragingly, hoping she’ll say more and talk out her pain.

“I had to” – she stops, takes a breath, and another – “remember,” she forces out. “Before tonight’s session.”

Well, that explains Espo’s cryptic call. He strokes smoothly down her arm and doesn’t ask what she had to remember. He knows. She’ll tell him in her own good time, but he’s not going to precipitate tears when she’s only just recovered some game.

“This time’s a bit better. I only have to work out why I was so irritated with Julia in the context of the can’t control piece. I can do that.”

Castle suddenly remembers where he’d heard that phrase. It had been all over the alcoholism support groups. Ah. Sounds like Beckett’s been realising that she’s been thinking all this time that she’d been helping her father but that actually she’d fallen into the trap of thinking she could control it by constantly being there for him. That’s going to hurt.

“And?” he says encouragingly.

“And she was just denying that there was any problem at all. She thought she could control it by ignoring it and letting me deal with him every time he did something she couldn’t cope with. She was pushing her problem on to me.”

“No wonder you got cross with her,” Castle says, though he doesn’t think that’s the whole reason by any means. He wonders if Beckett’s going to continue her line of thought out loud, if he can simply manage to make noises that indicate agreement and if he resists any temptation to lead the witness.

“Yeah.” She nestles in, in a rather more satisfied way. “Still…” she mutters.

“Mmmm?”

“That seems too easy.”

“Uh?” Castle says, in default of saying yes, Beckett, it is too easy, you’re missing the point of therapy. He is pretty certain that the therapist wants Beckett to recognise that she was irritated by Julia not taking any responsibility, where Beckett had taken far too much. In addition, he wonders whether Beckett was, subconsciously, angry that Julia could get help from her, but she couldn’t get help from anyone.

He’s pretty certain that Beckett hasn’t made the second step yet, but he doesn’t say anything. It’s not for him to second-guess Beckett’s therapist or Beckett’s thinking. And, of course, he likes being alive. He likes snuggly Beckett too, and neither will continue if he opens his big mouth. On the other hand, snuggly Beckett has just kissed his neck, which he really hopes makes her feel far better and happier than thinking about therapy. He leans down a little and kisses her in return.

Unfortunately, that’s where it stops. She emits a tiny, dissatisfied hrrmph, and relapses into thought. Castle takes the opportunity to play with her hair, until Beckett realises that he’s winding it into tiny braids and starts to object.

“Stop fidgeting, Castle, please? I don’t want braids. They don’t suit me.”

Castle obligingly untwists each tiny tail. “You’re thinking, though. Very quietly so I can’t hear what you’re thinking.”

Beckett makes a face at him. “The point of thinking, rather than talking, is that you can’t hear it.”
Castle makes a face right back. “Anyway, me thinking isn’t helping. I don’t want to think about it any more right now.”

“Don’t you?” Castle, who recognises a hint when he’s hit in the face with it, purrs darkly, dropping into the deep seductive baritone that he knows will seep under her skin and leave her… relaxing, let’s say. Relaxing right into his lap. On which thought, he puts her there. Assertively. And then he slips his hands under the heavy sweater, also assertively; and then slides them smoothly up and down, assertively, which asserts the sweater upwards and the sweatpants downwards and leaves an expanse of beautiful satin skin for him to play with. Assertively, naturally. And equally naturally, it works.

Beckett hums contentedly and curls into his chest and then curves into his hands, and very soon she’s purring. Once she’s started to purr she should be induced to stay that way, which is becoming easier and easier as she opens to him – not only her body, but her mind. Right now, she wants distraction, but he thinks that maybe after that she’ll want to think some more, and she might just emit some words. That she’s emitted any words at all about what she has to do in therapy is quite a step. He concentrates on distracting her, which is very distracting for him, and very pleasurable for both of them together (she is wickedly naughty) and they end up wrapped up together in her bed.

He thinks she’s more-or-less asleep, utterly lax and spooned against him. He thinks back, unexpectedly, to the very first time, when it had been spectacular – but superficial – sex, and she’d rolled away and been just a little resistant to being cuddled in afterwards. Not like now, when it’s no longer simply sex, but making love, and she makes it very clear that cuddling is desired, and desirable.

“You could have, Castle thinks bleakly, if you’d ever asked. O’Leary, Lanie, Espo or Ryan would have been there. But maybe by then it was already too late.

“There wasn’t any family and there wasn’t anyone at Stanford. And Dad was no help. He just cried every time I mentioned it. So I didn’t.” There’s a suspicious sniff. “Julia just unloaded all over me.”

Castle strokes her arm with the one that’s draped around her.

“How can I be angry about that?” she says despairingly. “She needed help, but it annoyed me.”

“Maybe that’s what your therapist wants you to work out?” says Castle, rather than saying because you’re only human, Beckett. There’s an unhappy mutter in response, and she tries to burrow deeper into his clasp.

“It’s all past. I’ve moved on.”

Like hell you have.

“The only reason I’m doing this at all is to be okay if I see your family and get Montgomery off my back.”

At least that’s in the right order. But what about your Dad?

“I don’t need to go over all that past to do that. I just need to get my head round your family not being like mine. Like” – she considers for a second – “like I’m a cop so I can appreciate a movie star but I don’t need to be one.”

You’re trying to convince yourself, Beckett. Don’t you see the trap you’re falling into? Castle clenches his teeth closed. He’s happy that she’s wanting to do something that will enable her to spend time at his, with his family. He’s entirely unhappy because this is the wrong route to achieve that. She’s got to sort out her issues with her own father. But she hasn’t mentioned him for over a week in any context at all and as far as Castle knows she’s decided he simply doesn’t exist. It’s faintly surprising that Jim hasn’t called him, Castle. After all, Lanie keeps trying. Almost immediately he has a pang of guilt that he hasn’t at least told Jim that his Katie is okay. For a given value of okay: mainly meaning not okay at all but leaning on me when she can’t stand straight any more.

He cuddles her in as closely as she evidently wants, nuzzling her hair and surrounding her with warmth and comfort. She’s not ready to hear the rest, and he’s not really ready to say it out loud. But it’s there, either way, and he thinks that she pretty much is too.

Castle wakes up, regrettably, alone, mainly because he’s in his own bedroom in his own loft. Noises off indicate that Alexis is up. Non-noises off indicate that his mother is not, or not here. Either is perfectly acceptable.

He ambles out to discover Alexis on her way out in search of spring wear and her friends, and then discovers the coffee machine is in perfect working order. He makes himself a large mugful and sits down to survey his immediate future, which is, curate’s eggily, mixed. Kat-Kate-Beckett wants, needs and probably loves him, which is excellent. She is going to therapy to deal with (among other matters) being able to see his family, also excellent. She’s re-established relations with O’Leary, mostly excellent as long as O’Leary doesn’t manage to trip some past problem, which he – mostly – hasn’t yet. On the other hand, she has cut Lanie out and is thoroughly upset about Lanie’s overbearing efforts to help: not good. She isn’t – yet, it has to be yet – using therapy to deal with the real issues; also not good. And, of course, there’s the whole situation with her father, which is on the bad side of appalling.

Castle still considers very strongly that he should be pointing out to Lanie how she isn’t helping Beckett; but far more importantly he is becoming more and more squirmingly unpleasantly aware that he needs to give Jim something. Just in case. Just in case of what, he really doesn’t want to think about. He looks at a clock and discovers that it’s barely nine a.m. Time to pull himself together and then do all the things he really doesn’t want to do. He’d rather experiment with home-grown colonic self-irrigation, using sulphuric acid.

“Jim?”

“Rick? Rick, what’s been going on? I keep trying to ring Katie and all I get is voicemail.”

“Jim, she’s okay. That’s what I called to tell you. She’s fine. I said I’d look after her and I am.”

There’s a silence that radiates unhappiness.

“If she’s so fine,” Jim says, unsurprisingly bitterly, “then why won’t she take my calls?”

Castle had known that this would arrive almost immediately.

“Because she’s as pigheaded as you are,” he says bluntly, to a shocked gasp. “She’s upset and angry and she’s not in a place to see past it, so she’s simply not talking to you. You want to apologise, but Jim, she is not ready to hear it and the more you try the more pigheaded she’ll get. Just trust me to take care of her for now. She’ll come round.” Probably.

“And what am I supposed to do? Leave her to it?”
“Up to you. What’s Ed suggest?”

“Leave her to it,” Jim says quietly. “Wait till she’s ready.”

Castle says nothing, very loudly. Eventually, he opens his mouth again. “You take care of yourself, Jim. Kate’ll come round.”

“Last time it took her three years,” Jim spits out. “You going to keep her away from me that long?”

“I’m not a fool and don’t you dare suggest I’m some sort of Svengali. I’m not stopping her seeing you or talking to you or to anyone else. But if I say a single solitary word to her that makes her think I’m taking your side in this – and I’m not, be really clear on that – she won’t be speaking to me either and if that happens then there’s no way on God’s earth that anyone will get through to her. If you really wanna mess this up, then that’s the way to do it.”

More silence.

“All I wanted was to be her Dad,” Jim mumbles. I think you’re long past being able to do that, Jim. I think you might have lost that ten years ago.

“Now I can’t even get to talk to her.”

“Did pushing at her ever work when… before? When she was younger?”

There is the inaudible sound of mental cogs whirring.

“No-o.”

“Well, then.” Castle lets that sink in.

“I don’t like it. There’s more going on than you’re saying but you wouldn’t tell me anything last time and I don’t guess you’re going to change that now. You better know what you’re doing.”

“I do,” says Castle confidently. Fuck, I hope I do, he thinks.

“You better.” The bravery bleeds out of Jim’s voice. “I should say thanks for telling me Katie’s okay, but…”

“I get it. Take care, Jim.”

“Yeah. Bye.”

“Bye.”

Phew. That was just as unpleasant as he’d thought it might be. He’s lying to Jim. By implication, he’s potentially deceiving Beckett, and that gripes his guts. But… lesser of two evils. Jim absolutely has to stay sober, because the only route out of this labyrinth is that Beckett sees that Jim can do it himself, and stops trying to do it all for him.

Buoyed up by having managed one difficult-tending-to-ghastly call, he ponders how best to approach the allosaurus formerly known as Dr Lanie Parrish, ME. Let’s see now, the last time Beckett saw Lanie, Beckett metaphorically ripped her to bloody, salted shreds with Castle as witness; and the last time he saw Lanie off duty was a week ago, when she wasn’t happy. So what can he say to her that isn’t a betrayal of Beckett?

He’s not got any further down that line of thinking when his mother crashes in, full of the joys – and champagne – of after-show parties. Maybe this show will last a little longer than most? He retreats to his study, being keen neither on being cross-examined about Beckett nor about when Jim and Beckett might next be invited over. Since the current answer to that is a cold day in hell and he doesn’t want to explain that either, it’s best to be out the way.

He messes around with fragments and shards of possible stories, not to any great effect, for a while; puts in an online shopping order for food for the week, messes around some more, and eventually puts his feet up on the desk and thinks very hard about Lanie. It gets him nowhere, because he keeps falling over the point that to get through to Lanie he would have to explain about Beckett’s dad, and that’s a non-starter for a million different reasons.

Which point, absolutely naturally because his luck is so far out this morning that he’d need the Hubble Telescope to find it, is interrupted by his phone, which turns out not to be anything interesting or attractive (such as Beckett) but Lanie, in full hunting cry, no doubt.

“Castle?”

“Is Kate there?”

“No,” he says, and waits to see what will happen next.

“Good. I wanna talk to you about her.”

Castle’s heart falls out through his toes.

“Lanie, I told you I’m not getting into this. You gotta sort it out yourselves.”

“I want you to get her someplace I can talk to her.”

“You have got to be joking. Tell me you’re joking, Lanie?”

“No. You’re the only one she’s listening to.”

“How long’s that going to last if I sucker her into turning up somewhere just so you can yell at her again? No.”

“I wanna talk to her.”

“Sure you do. Like every other time?”

“If she wasn’t so freaking pig-ass stubborn…”

“If you didn’t yell maybe she wouldn’t be so freaking pig-ass stubborn, did you think of that?”

“You ‘n’ Espo are about as much freaking use as a” –

“Espo?”

“He said the same. Neither of you know Kate like I do so how the hell would you know what works.”

Castle, who has been getting steadily more irritated, decides that he’s really had quite enough of pig-ass stubborn Lanie (he likes the descriptor, though).

“Better than you, since she’s still fine with us. If everyone’s got a problem with you maybe it’s you who’s the problem?”
Lanie cuts the call on him. If she’d been on a landline, his eardrums would have burst from the slam. Still, Espo? What’s that been all about?

Castle, for whom curiosity is not so much a besetting sin but a hitherto undiscovered by science component of his DNA, takes no more than a second or so to dial Esposito’s number.

“Castle? What you doin’ callin’ me? Beckett okay?”

“Yeah, she’s fine.” Esposito makes a very rude noise which Castle ignores. “No, Lanie just called trying to bully me into siccing her on Beckett – which I didn’t, before you get started on that,” he says quickly, “and she said that you said that she shouldn’t yell. So…” he lets that trail off enticingly.

“Lanie wanted me to tell Beckett to listen to her. Told her to do it herself. An’ then I told her if she stopped yellin’ she might have better luck.” Castle hesitates for a moment. “You there, bro?”

“Yeah. Espo, I’ve got an idea.” Esposito’s sigh is audible and would destroy houses. “No, really. If we can get Ryan to play along. And play patsy, but we don’t need to tell him that.”

Esposito sniggers. “Okay, so what’s this crazy idea?”

“How about you and Ryan get Lanie out, and tell her to wind her neck in and do something to patch it all up, and I’ll take Beckett somewhere else, and tell her Lanie’s wanting to patch it up; and then we can try and put them in the same place without them blowing up?”

“No so crazy. Thought you were gonna suggest us all goin’ somewhere together, with that mountain O’Leary to keep the peace.”

“That’s a good idea,” Castle enthuses. “He’s big enough to keep them apart. I’ll get him with us, and bring him along if it all works out. But you still have to get Lanie on side. I’m not going to be the target in a firing range.”

“Me neither, bro. Me neither.” Espo pauses. “So how’s Ryan gonna be the patsy?” He sounds deeply satisfied with that idea.

“Well, it’s pretty clear he’s wanting to get Beckett and Lanie in the same place, which is what we want, so it shouldn’t be too hard to make him think that Beckett, O’Leary and I are going to be where you’re going, and then he’ll tell Lanie, and we’ll be done.”

“See you,” Castle says, more cheerfully.
Afraid of losing my way

Beckett, some way refreshed by Castle’s patent blend of comfort, care and excellent sex, wakes up in a better mood and certainly better rested than she had expected; even if Castle isn’t there beside her. (Where he ought to be, nags a little voice in her head. She knows that, but she can’t have it till she’s fixed. Or closer to fixed. So maybe she should put some serious effort into fixing herself just now, while she’s on her own and no-one’s there to see if she cries. Or when she does.)*

She makes herself a pot of coffee, grimaces at the thought of the necessity for any thinking on a Saturday morning if she doesn’t have a new body to deal with, and settles down to apply her ferocious intelligence to herself. Dr Burke had made two points: one, has she remembered that she can’t control it, apropos of her father; and two, how did that play into her reactions to Julia Berowitz.

Okay. What had she thought yesterday. Start there, and then, with a distancing night (and a comforting Castle) to take the edge off, detect, Detective. Follow the evidence and investigate. Sure, it’s going to hurt like hell. But it’s time to rip the scabs off the wounds, lance the poison and clean it all out. The alternative is letting this gangrene fester and spread, until the only option left would be amputation.

She sits alone, lost in her thoughts, as the hands of her watch move round, unnoticed. Unfortunately, the more she thinks, the less effective is the distance that her night’s sleep and her Castle had provided. It doesn’t take long before both are entirely ineffective. Still, she forces herself to remember all the things she had done, after he (she very consciously doesn’t think her father, or Dad) got dry. All the ways she’d acted; all the things she’d lost, or given up. Time sweeps on, and her thinking continues, centring around, and starting from, her view that her father had never needed her to do it anyway. So why had she ever thought he did?

Point one. She can’t control it. She never could control it. She’d realised that when he was drunk. But then he’d got sober, and…and. Oh fuck. She suddenly sees something she’d never noticed before. When he got sober, he’d looked at her as if she was the only thing that mattered in the world. Every time he’d seen her, he’d seemed to be delighted. And…and she’d needed it, because it almost made up for the way he’d written her off because she wasn’t her mother, whenever he was drunk. And…and when he was happy, he wasn’t crying, and when he wasn’t crying, he wasn’t reaching for a bottle; wasn’t tempted to be reaching for a bottle. And seeing her seemed to make him happy.

Oh God. And so she’d been there for him. And then…and then he’d been quite explicit that he’d only got dry because she walked away. But she’d thought that if she didn’t walk away again, he’d stay dry. Mistake number one. It should have been the other way round. He would stay dry, and therefore she wouldn’t walk away.

Then he’d said he needed her. Hit her squarely with the blade of her guilt that she’d left him to drown. He’d said that he needed her before he drowned himself in whiskey; don’t leave me. But then he’d told her to go: he couldn’t stand to see her, for two years before she went. Then he’d called her and cried for her to come home, not to leave him – and she had left him to it. Left him. It had almost destroyed her. Then he’d got sober and said he needed her – and she’d believed it because she had to believe it because otherwise everything would have fallen in on her: everything she’d done would have been for no reason. She’d walked away to save him – but she walked back because he said he needed her, needed a family, and she had to believe that he wanted to be a family again. Mistake number two. It was she who needed a family. She’d thought that it would fill the void.
Mistake number three. Nothing had really filled the abyss of her guilt. So, just like she’d worked herself into the ground to be the best in the business at work, she’d worked herself into the ground to be there for her father, jumped when he called, always, always been there for him, no matter what; put her whole life on hold so that she never, ever had to see him drunk again. It hadn’t helped, ultimately. But she’d never wanted to be that devastated nineteen-year old again, the one whose own father had looked at her and simply said you're not her.

She doesn’t realise she’s crying: slow, heavy tears.

And finally, mistake number four. She’d believed that he loved her enough to save himself. It had been the only thing that had covered her bitter resentment that he’d abandoned her in the first place. For five years she’s believed it.

But now she knows it isn’t true.

It should have been lunchtime, hours ago. Time has slipped past her, and now the light is fading. Despite that, she can see clearly now. She’d thought, wrongly, that her presence held her dad to sobriety. Thought that what she was doing could keep things right. Thought that she could control his behaviour. All wrong.

She’d thought that he loved her. That was wrong too.

Drained dry, and completely incapable of moving her thoughts on to where they need to go: to wit sorting out why Castle’s family disturbs her so, she goes to curl up in her bed, taking her phone with her: the warmest place she can manage, clad in heavy pyjamas and buried in extra blankets. She reads, for a while, thinks vaguely that she should have eaten and rejects the idea when her stomach tries to invert at the thought, looks at her phone again. She’s done that every five minutes or two pages, for the last hour. She’s managed not to dial, every five minutes or two pages, for the last hour. Every time it’s taken longer to stop herself.

This time, she’s wondering why she’s bothering. Pathetically, she’s been hugging a pillow that smells of his cologne and him for the last hour, when all she’d have to do is call. And paradoxically, that’s what’s been stopping her. It’s feeling all too close to how she used to jump whenever her father called, and she can’t stand the feeling that she might be doing to Castle what her father did to her.

Only you can save yourself.

It’s not Castle’s job to save her. That’s unhealthy. But she could ask for support, which isn’t. Her problem is that she has no idea where healthy stops and dependency begins.

And then there’s the next problem. She’d thought her father loved her. Except he doesn’t. She’d been more than beginning to think that Castle might – but what if she’s misinterpreting that too? What if it’s just the incredible physical connection, covering up everything that won’t work? How long’s he going to wait for someone who’s this broken; why should he wait for someone who’s so unlovable that her own father would prefer the company of strangers?

She dissolves into tears again, and doesn’t dial. Her thoughts cycle round and round inside her head. Call, don’t call; ask, don’t ask. Where does help transmute into dependency?

Eventually, she stops sniffling and tries to think. She has to think. Thinking’s the only way out. What has she asked for? He’s always seemed to be there, but how often has she actually asked, and how often has he simply chosen to show up uninvited? Not that she has any objection to him showing up, invited or not. Invited once, with merely a look, which he could have ignored. Twice, because she’d left her wallet behind. Three times, after a Friday therapy session, although even then he’d offered before she’d asked. But she’d meant to ask, so that counts. And four, being asking him to come round after last Friday’s session.

Four times, in a month. Maybe this is not excessive, if Castle’s inviting himself around pretty close to every two days. But still she doesn’t dial, because Castle’s not asking her to prop him up: he’s not this close to clinging to her like some parasitic plant, bleeding her strength and feeding from her vitality. She’s been there before, and it didn’t end well. Then again, she’s been on the other side too, and that didn’t end well either. Problem is, she doesn’t know where right is, because everything’s always been wrong, and it’s wrong now. She doesn’t know what right looks like, because in the previous ten years she’s never had it.

She looks at her phone again, stares at the contacts list. He can always say no. He keeps saying that he knows what he’s doing. He can always say no. And if it’s all going to crash and burn, she might as well know now.

She dials, and as soon as it starts to ring wishes she hadn’t. Castle picks up far too quickly, too, before she can ring off.

“Hey, Beckett.”

“Castle, hey.” She manages a reasonable facsimile of her everyday voice.

“What can I do for you, Detective?” Castle says suavely. She hits the buffers.

“I’m sorry… I didn’t mean to call. This was a stupid mistake. Night, Castle. I’ll see you Monday.”

“Don’t hang up!”

But she’s already cut the call. She just couldn’t go through with it. Asking in plain words without having been given some sort of half-invitation first is too far. She can’t bear to hear no. She’d heard no so often before. Whenever she’d asked – begged – her father to stop. So many nos. After Royce, she’d stopped asking anyone else. Even O’Leary, even Lanie. Asking didn’t get her anywhere, saying she needed help didn’t get her anywhere. Only being strong kept her afloat. If people came of their own volition, that was fine. Their choice, then, to help. But she couldn’t ask, because every time she asked the answer was, inevitably, no.

So very many nos.

Her phone rings, but she doesn’t answer it. She doesn’t even hear it, buried face down in her pillows and not crying. She’s been here before, and crying has never been the answer.

Nor, of course, has cowardice. She needs to ask. She needs to know if this has all been one more huge mistake, before she can’t get herself out.

She takes a very deep breath, calms herself, and redials.

“Beckett. Beckett! Kate, are you okay?”

“I don’t think so,” she says. “Can you come over?” and as if that’s the switch, starts to cry again, desperately keeping the tears out of her voice.

“Sure. There in a few minutes.”
Castle’s afternoon had been more peaceful than his morning, though he’d spent quite a lot of it deliberately allowing Beckett the space he thought she might need and fretting about the need not to call her. He can’t suffocate her, and she has to do her thinking, and she’s perfectly capable of not thinking as soon as something nicer (such as him) appears instead. Funny that: it’s he who is a champion procrastinator and yet it’s Beckett who is putting off the unpleasant necessity of serious thinking. So although his fingers frequently wander in the direction of his phone, he forcibly redirect them to his keyboard.

He has some dinner and goes back to his laptop, sketching out a plan for the casework which Nikki will solve. He’s just getting into it when his phone rings, and he growls with irritation that it’s disturbed him. Irritation dissolves in microseconds when he sees that it’s Beckett. Just what – who – he wanted.

She sounds a little stressed when she greets him, but then it turns into all sorts of wrong when she starts to apologise for calling and says it was a mistake – calling him is never going to be a mistake – and hangs up. And then she doesn’t pick up when he rings her straight back. Something’s spooked her and he has no idea what. He’s already halfway out the door when his phone rings again and – thank God – it’s Beckett, but he’s sure that she’s crying and that’s not right and then she admits she’s not okay and he’s frantically bribing the cab driver to get him to her address in no time flat, chewing his nails to the elbows at every stop light and only just not hammering on her door.

He doesn’t pause for thought when the door opens, simply sweeps her up off her feet and into his arms, kicking the door shut behind him, hoping that he can talk her down off the ledge.

“Kate, what’s wrong?” he says, dropping them both on the couch and never letting go of her. “I’m here now. Come here.”

“You came,” she almost whimpers. Of course he came. What part of I’ll be there for you hasn’t she understood?

“Partners, remember? You said it.” He really didn’t expect her to burst into hopeless, devastated tears. If there are any words in her flooding misery, they’re completely unintelligible. He holds on while the storm pours down, and waits.

“Asking too much,” emerges relatively clearly.

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Castle says, shocked into exasperation. “How’s asking me to come over because you’re upset asking too much? That’s insane.”

“Was before.”

“What? Who said that?”

“Doesn’t matter. What’s the point in asking? Doesn’t get you anything.”

Castle gapes at the top of her bent head. “You can ask me. Anything, Kate. Partners. Means you get to ask. In fact, it means you have to ask. That’s the rules. You want me to come over, you just need to say so. No hiding because you’re scared to ask.” He hugs her in tightly. “Now, do you want to tell me what’s got you upset, or do you just want to cuddle?” He expects no answer, or at least not one in words. He expects her to cuddle in more tightly: where she can take comfort, where he’ll keep her safe.

He does not expect the sudden stream of sobbed-out words. All her past, spilling out in full spate. The bare, bitter facts of her father’s disease; the disaster of her training officer, skipped over but he can read the story; the equal but opposite disaster of her Fed, again, skipped over. It’s hard for him to hear, but it’s clearly much harder for her to remember. The dam has broken, though, and however she might want to stop, it doesn’t seem like she can.

By the time she finally runs down, Castle is ready to weep too. First she was let down by her father, then by her first therapist (though he doesn’t think she’s worked that one out), then by her training officer, who should have directed her to someone who could help. By the time she had met O’Leary, it was already too late for her to be able to open up. He remembers O’Leary saying she didn’t ask me to, I just went.

She’s still sobbing, exhausted tears crawling down her face, all her control washed away: just like the night three weeks ago when she’d first admitted out loud that her father had ruined her life and agreed to go to therapy. Looks like therapy’s uncovering a whole bunch of memories that are tearing her apart.

“All I ever did was just to make myself feel better. None of it had any effect on him. I never realised. I thought I mattered to him. Nothing mattered to him but the whiskey when he was drinking, and nothing mattered to him but staying dry when he got dry.”

Castle winces, unseen. Clearly Beckett isn’t in a mood to forgive her father right now. In fact, it sounds like she’s talking – has talked? – herself into believing that her father has lied to her right down the line.

“I should’ve known. They always lie. It’s nothing to do with family. It’s because he’s an alcoholic. I thought I was helping him. All I was doing was trying to stop feeling guilty and make myself feel better. I needn’t have felt guilty at all. Needn’t have protected him. He only ever wanted Mom. She was his family. I was just… an adjunct.”

She runs out of words, and is still. Castle simply holds her close; disturbingly limp at his side. He wants to say you could be part of my family, but that’s not going to help right now.

“Why don’t you talk that through with the therapist? If that’s the issue, then there’ll be ways of getting past it so it doesn’t affect you so much. If you didn’t feel guilty about your dad any more, then you couldn’t be guilted by people like Julia.”

No point, Castle thinks, in talking about her dad. She won’t listen when she’s this overwrought. Better to tie it to something he knows she really cares about: doing her job. He suspects, very strongly, that Beckett is, once again, one very short step away from quitting therapy altogether.

“That’s a good idea,” she says, unexpectedly. Oh. Maybe she’s not?

Beckett doesn’t exactly feel happy about it, but she’s not giving up on fixing herself. She’s got this far, and she will not be held hostage by her own past. Her work means too much to her. Castle means too much to her.

“Thanks for coming,” she murmurs, and nestles in further. “‘M sorry.”

“Sorry for what?”

“Dragging you out. Dripping all over you.”

“Partners, Beckett. I’m sure you’ll return the favour.” Oddly, she shifts away from him, retreating into herself again. “What’s up?”

“I don’t think you’ll be begging me to come over and mop your eyes,” she says bitterly. “You’re not the one with the fucked-up head here. Everyone loves you. Sure, you don’t have a dad and that’s really got to hurt, but you’ve got the rest of your family and it works. They love you. I’ve got a dried-out drunk who couldn’t care less and a corpse rotting in Cypress Hills; and I still can’t even look at your family without hurting.”

Everyone loves you? Does that mean Beckett too? But then the rest of what she’s just said hits his brain and romantic thoughts fly out of the window.

“I thought you said that you were going to therapy to sort out both the job and being able to see my family?” Castle says neutrally.

“Yes, but…”

“But what? You’ve been going for what? Three weeks? Not even that long. You’ve barely begun and you’re beating yourself up because it hasn’t worked yet? The whole reason it didn’t work the first time round is because you thought you had to do it faster than anyone.” He hauls his rising voice back under some sort of control. “It takes time. I said you didn’t have to come until you were ready and anyway I’m not going to invite you till I think you’re ready because I’m not watching you pretend that everything’s okay when it isn’t. You can’t do this in three weeks, Beckett. You can’t do it without being able to ask for help either.”

“That’s why I’m going to therapy. He’s paid to listen and help.” If you ever manage to talk to him like you just have to me, Castle thinks. “Who else is going to?” Me, but you should know that. “Everyone else didn’t. He didn’t. I wanted to talk about Mom and all he did was cry and get drunk again. So I couldn’t. No-one else would’ve been interested.” I’m interested, but if I say that you’ll think it’s all about the books again. It’s not. “I hate it,” she says, again, familiar cascara-bitter mantra.

“It’s up to you,” Castle soothes. “You can give it up any time you like.”

“Can’t.”

“Why not?”
Beckett opens her mouth and sharply closes it again; jerks to standing and stalks to the window by her small table with the little stone bird. She picks up something – not her bird, but Castle can’t see what it is – and plays with it: her fingers twisting around it. There’s a small glint of blood-red; crimson spilling through her long digits, and for a moment he thinks that she’s cut herself, till he realises it’s light, not fluid. It dawns on him that it’s the small red quartz crystal he’d picked up on the beach and given to her; it must have been sitting next to the bird. She’s still turning it as he comes to her, looms up behind her and gathers her into his broad frame, crosses his arms over her torso and leaves hers free so that her fingers aren’t stayed from their incessant twisting.

“Why not, Kate?” he asks again, softly, but he’s beginning to think that he knows, because after all, she asked him for help.

Suddenly she drops the stone on the table, spins in his grasp, drags his head down to hers and kisses him: hot and ravaging, passionate and demanding; by reflex his right hand knots in her hair, his left spanning her back, together holding her for his avid mouth and touch; and she fires up and blazes with him: two pyromaniacs in a firework factory.

“Because…” but she doesn’t say, maybe can’t say; takes his mouth again. He lifts off, before he – they – can be lost again.

“You asked me to come. You can always ask me. Asking me to come over isn’t asking too much.” She looks hopelessly confused at the statement, as if it doesn’t make sense. “Kate. Just stop thinking. Sit down and stop.”

She acquiesces to being moved back to the couch and to sitting down.

“That’s better,” Castle says. “Now, why can’t you stop going to therapy?”

“I can’t live like this any more. If I don’t fix it I’ll be benched again and…” she stops again.

“And?” Castle asks gently. If she could only articulate this point – and he is sure of what she’s going to say but she has to say it – then probably everything will follow from it.

There is a very long silence.

“And you’ll go,” eventually dribbles into the air. Beckett’s head is in her hands, her shoulders hunched over. “I don’t want you to go.”

Castle’s first, fortunately unarticulated, thought is Yes! He manages to alter that to, “I’m not going anywhere,” before he can get himself into serious trouble.

Beckett’s words have expired again. This is okay. The important ones are out there. I don’t want you to go. He tightens his arm round her to pull her closer and nuzzles the top of her bent head. It doesn’t seem to make much difference.

“Beckett – Kate, come here. It’s okay. I’ll be here if you need me. It’s okay to ask.”

“No, it’s not. Every time my father asked, I went. I thought I could fix him and I’m not making the mistakes he did. It wouldn’t help. It’s not your job to fix me. It’s up to me.”

Castle forces her chin up so she has to look at him. “Yeah, it’s up to you. But you don’t have to do it all on your own again. Asking isn’t forcing, and you are not your dad. You thought you had to keep him safe, and you did whatever you thought you had to so you could. I’ve no intention of trying to keep you safe. Bit pointless, when you’re the cop and you’ve got the gun – and there is no way I’m getting on a sparring mat with Esposito. You can do that if you like. I like myself unbruised.” He returns to the main point that she needs to understand. “I don’t feel any need to fix you” – well, not if she’s doing it herself, and she is – “and I’m not scared to say no to you.”

When there’s no comprehension in her dazed eyes, he shakes her shoulders, not quite hard. “Listen to me, Kate. Only you can save yourself. But you can yell to me to throw the lifebelt if you’re too tired to swim.”

“He would have drowned me with him, if I hadn’t walked away.”

“I can swim quite well,” Castle says, not quite inconsequentially.

“And then he drowned me anyway. Killed myself with kindness. I should have stayed away.” Her eyes flare, then go dull. “I used to be able to swim.”

“I’ve got the floaties, if you need them.” Beckett doesn’t appear to appreciate the comment. Nor, however, is she killing him. This is actually very worrying. He drops the attempts at humour: it really isn’t working, and brings her in closer until she’s tight against his side. “Listen to me,” he says again. “Asking isn’t too much. You’re so desperate not to lean on anyone like your father leaned on you that you don’t ask at all. Too little’s as bad as too much.” He looks down at her, sympathy liquid in his eyes. “I won’t let you be your father, Kate. I don’t think you would ever be like that, but you’ve got to lean on me sometimes. I’ll let you stand down. I” – his breath hitches – “I’ll take care of you, when you need it.”

No-one’s offered that since Will. And deep down she hadn’t believed him, because he couldn’t understand about her father, and never went near him. Not that she’d encouraged him to, or indeed done anything at all to suggest it. Castle, somehow, has shoved himself into her father’s orbit. He gets the picture, but he isn’t telling her to forgive because it’s family, or forgive just because she ought to and that’s what good people do, or to ignore her dad, or to do anything at all. He doesn’t push, and right now that’s what she needs. She’s trying to fix herself, and pushing is not helpful. She needs to do her thinking in her own good time... oh. That’s what Castle meant. Take the time she needs, not hurry through it to be done. She made that mistake last time round. She tucks herself more closely in.

“But you keep coming round.”

“Yeah, so? It’s not because you ask me. I could count those times on my thumbs. If I waited for you to ask me round I’d never see you.” His fingers draw a little squiggle on her arm. “I like seeing you,” he murmurs in an insinuating baritone, and draws another squiggle. He goes back to briskness. “So here’s the deal. You promise to ask when you need me – or even if you think you might – and I’ll promise that I’ll only come if I want to and can. If I think it’s too much, I’ll tell you. You only have to decide yes or no. Deal?”

Back to simple decisions. Yes or no. Rely on Castle to tell her the truth. He has so far. But… ask? He seems to think she’s got a right to ask him – then again, he’s also just pointed out that he’s got the right to say no.

“You’ll say if it’s too much?”

Of course I will. Because there are going to be times when Alexis needs me, and she comes first. No matter what, while she’s living with me. After that... by then it’ll all be different. Permanent. I hope “Yes,” he says simply.

“Yes.”

“Deal,” he says, and tips her chin up to kiss her lightly to seal it. “Now,” he says mischievously, “what shall we do?”

He perceives from her unfocused look that she hadn’t expected him to want to stay now. She’s exhausted, and therefore indecisive. Therefore, he should be decisive. And decisive in his book involves doing what he wants to do, which is take that emptiness out of her eyes, and the way to do that is to kiss her. So he does. Strong hands curve around her face, then one arm drops behind her and encourages her to turn a fraction into him, not pulling her up on to his lap, not now, not yet. Here, he can capture her lush mouth and take away her ability to think too much; or indeed take away her ability to think at all. He’ll stand her down, and the fastest, easiest way to do that is still to work her up. Afterwards, they can talk some more, when she’s eased.

Upon the thought, his arm behind her curves itself around her middle and the fingers at its end insert themselves between her waistband and her top, tugging gently. Magically, this results in the top ruffling up far enough for his fingers to loiter on bare skin, sketching seductive symbols; enough pressure to show what he wants. Just as always, she responds, just as always, it ignites. This time, though, she’s not soft and receptive and giving: she’s demanding, hot and feral and it’s changing to hard and fast; his hands gripping and hers digging in; his mouth fighting for dominance and hers fighting back; her top off and his shirt open. He stands up, hauls her up with him, swings her up into his arms and carries her to the bedroom, showing off his strength and ability to take the lead; drops her on her bed and strips the pyjama pants from her, leaving her naked to his hot gaze and hard hands; falls over her and takes her mouth all over again. He licks a scalding line over the nerve in her neck, inducing the movement that that touch brings to open the curve of her throat so he can carry on downward and nip sharply in the join of her shoulder to neck, carefully placed so the mark it will leave won’t be visible to anyone. She squirms, and her hands open his pants and shove them and his boxers away, stripping him with desperate rapidity so that he’s as naked as she, swelling and rigid under her questing fingers and grip.

She emits a high-pitched noise as he moves to her breasts: a little forceful, a little rough as she’s been just a little rougher with him, tugging and pulling, suckling to soothe the erect nipples; but she drags him up again and flips them so she’s on top. He’s not having that, she needs him to be assertive and tonight she’s looking for a fight, so he continues the flip till she’s under him again and pins her hands by her head and parts her legs to settle his hips between them, hard against her slick softness, poised to enter her, but he makes her wait for that, kissing her hard till she lets him conquer her mouth and then he conquers her body, wholly within her and bringing one hand down between them to tease and press and stroke and she cries out, he groans and they’re locked together as close as lovers can be, soaring together and falling into each other’s ecstasy.

He holds her close, blanketed over him, and keeps his fidgety fingers still. He likes to touch, and pet, and play: his fingers are never still, but now he forces them to peace. Only in peace will she relax and maybe, maybe talk. She didn’t exactly talk, earlier. More… offloaded. Now, if she would only do that in therapy where the poor benighted bastard she landed on as therapist would sort it into its constituent strands, she might get somewhere. Castle doesn’t envy the unlucky shrink.

“Anyway,” she says, out of nowhere at all, “I have to go to therapy.”

“Okay,” Castle rumbles.
Beckett pillows her head on his chest, where she can hear his heart beat, now at resting rate, slow and calming.

“So what are you doing to do?” he asks.

“Use it,” she says wearily. “Sort out how I feel. Work through it, move on.” She lifts her head and peeps up at him, nervousness on her face. “Be able to deal with your family like they deserve.” Her head drops back down. “Twice a week, Tuesday and Friday.” She sighs. “Montgomery’s monitoring that I go.”

“Seriously? He gets reports?”

“Just whether I show up or not. Nothing else.”

“Huh. So what do you want, then?”

“Not to go to therapy would be a good start.” Ouch. “Since I’ve got to, I want not to freak out if I run up against another drunk on the job. Montgomery ordered me not to work on any cases involving alcoholics, and banned me from seeing the Berowitzes. And I want to not be pathetically envious about your family.”

There are a couple of very large crevasses in that landscape, Castle thinks. Her dad, and Lanie Parrish, for a start.

“ ‘Kay,” he rumbles again. Now is not the time for either crevasse to be investigated. He’s got a better plan, being the one which he discussed with Esposito. He cuddles and strokes for a while, until she’s soft and relaxed and just a little aroused. “I wanna see O’Leary again. Let’s get him out for another beer.”

“You’re thinking about O’Leary now?” Beckett growls.

Castle’s hand on her back slips smoothly southward. “No,” he murmurs, and glides his fingers teasingly to some advantage. “Not right now.” A grin becomes apparent in his voice. “Why? Are you?”

“Might be – ohhh. I could easily be distracted, though.”

“Could you? Maybe if I did this” – big fingers explore and slide – “that might distract you?” A well-placed stroke makes her gasp. Another causes a wriggle. Castle rolls them and props himself up on his elbow to give himself freedom to play, which allows Beckett freedom to play too, which fairly swiftly results in the playpen being very untidy indeed. Sharing playtime with Beckett is definitely far more fun than with any other playmate.

“So shall we go out with O’Leary, then?” Castle says, as he’s reluctantly getting dressed.

“Who?” Beckett says with a sleepy, naughty smile, tucked under a pile of coverings and smothered in her pillows.

“Oh, him. If you like.”

“I’d like to explore Beckett – Rookie or not – a bit further,” he leers. His face falls. “But I’ve got to go home.” He plops himself down on the edge of the bed and puts a warm hand on the approximate location of Beckett’s shoulder. “I meant it. You think you might need me, you call me. If I think you’re asking too much, I’ll tell you straight. Trust me to know what’s best for me, Beckett, and we can make it work.” He pauses, pats, decides that it’s probably worth laying out one very important point. “But me coming round Tuesday and Friday isn’t up for discussion. That’s going to happen anyway, whether you call me or not. The only difference is if you want me to come get you from therapy, you call, otherwise I’ll be here.”

Beckett acquires an expression remarkably and unattractively reminiscent of the wide-mouthed frog about to croak. Castle kisses her swiftly to remove the undoubtedly arriving imprecations and makes a dash for the door before objections – in the form of flying pillows, or possibly bullets – can be raised.

“Night, Beckett.”

“See you Monday,” she manages, in a what-did-you-just-say? voice. Just before he’s made his escape from her likely wrath and her bedroom her tones scorch across the space. “Castle!”

“Uh… yeah?”

“Thanks,” she says with a soft smile.

“Partners,” he replies, and leaves.

Left alone, much comforted by Castle’s visit, Beckett slowly turns out the lights and drifts towards slumber. On Tuesday, her sleepy mind decides, on Tuesday she will talk to Dr Burke about fixing her issues with Castle’s family. Sort out that mess. Start to sort it out, anyway.

If she can do that, then she won’t feel nearly as bad that she doesn’t have any real family of her own to love her. She’ll get past that, move on. Plenty of people have no family left, and they manage to cope. So will she. She’ll work through her issues, and then she’ll have saved herself from the mess her life has been till now.

Only you can save yourself. True. And the truth will set her free. Once she’s free of her past, then she can move forward. Forward, she hopes, with Castle.

She falls asleep surrounded by his smell and the warmth he’s left behind him.

On Sunday, she unearths her slow cooker, throws in a healthy quantity of vegetables and joints of chicken, adds enough stock for the putative stew to be perfect; and then goes out for a long, muscle stretching run. For a change, there’s a little warmth in the air, and a feeling of spring.

On her return, she showers and changes into a soft, favourite skirt and top, curls up on her couch with her toes tucked under her and begins to consider Castle’s family, as if she were assessing them as witnesses. It provides her with a certain degree of necessary distance. She’s good at witness assessment. She’s good at her job. And she is absolutely good at sussing out motivations and relationships when it comes to murders. So she can do it now. Treat it like a case.

First, her protagonists. Castle. He can be a suspect. He’d love that, as long as it wasn’t really he who’d done the murder. Witness one, his theatrically over-exuberant, centre stage mother. Witness two, his studious, sensible, but still enthusiastic, daughter. Beckett wonders where she got that from. The sensible bit, that is. She’s never doubted Castle’s intelligence.

Right. Stop procrastinating, Kate. She has to do this. She didn’t do it yesterday because she never got that far. Today, she is going to face it. If nothing else, look at the mess and be ready to confess to Dr Burke. It’s the only way. But still she cringes internally.

So. Alexis. Fourteen? – no, fifteen? Castle adores her. Beckett supposes that’s because they’ve always been all in all to each other. She, quite deliberately, recalls how he had been with little Callie Donbass. Not his child, but he’d been amazingly, disconcertingly careful and gentle with the baby. How much more so, with his own baby? He’d have been awash with love for Alexis, bathed her in it. Still managed to bring her up right, even though he must have been able to give her absolutely anything she would have wanted. And Castle still adores her, and is still proud of her, and would still do anything to protect her. If you want to get to Castle, she thinks, threaten Alexis, or their bond. It had almost worked for her…

Oh. She’d always been able to go to her dad. Right up until she couldn’t. She hadn’t wanted to look at the photos because half of them are Katie and her dad doing things together. Whistles, or hiking, or fishing; up in the Catskills. Moments of pride and triumph. Moments of disagreement, too. There’s a photo of her glaring up at her dad… she must have been four or five.

So, point one. Alexis can lean on her father and she, Kate, can’t.

And oh, again. Castle adores Alexis. Absolutely nothing gets in the way of that. But her dad has stopped loving her. She’d walked away to save him and he clearly never forgave her. Well, she thinks harshly, plenty of people have never forgiven her for plenty of things. Usually, putting them in jail. She’s got past that.

Point two, then. If she can’t be a family with her father, it doesn’t matter. It doesn’t stop her wincing.

And from that, point three. She was uncomfortable with Martha getting on so well with her dad because it reminded her of the family chat over the dinner table, before. But she’s not had that for ten years, and she doesn’t have a family to have it with, and she can deal with that.

Right. Three things to discuss with Dr Burke. She can handle that. It’s really all quite simple, now she’s thought about it sensibly. Quite simple and logical. So there is no reason at all to be sad. No reason at all.
My best friend

“Espo,” Castle hisses at an appropriate moment on Monday, being one when neither Ryan nor Beckett are around. “Espo, when d’you think you can get Ryan and Lanie in a bar?”

“Any time, bro. Not like either of them have anything to be doing, ‘s far ‘s I know.”

“Okay. I’m going to try for O’Leary. Soon as I’ve got that nailed, I’ll tell you, and you can tell Ryan, and sucker him into letting on to Lanie.”

Castle raids Beckett’s phone – she really should change her passcode because he’s watched her tap it in often enough that he knows it – for O’Leary’s number, stores it in his own list of contacts as a far better alternative to calling O’Leary’s precinct, and then wanders off before Beckett can return and catch him. Wandering off also allows him to call O’Leary, who is flatteringly pleased to hear from him, even more pleased to hear about drinks, and positively ecstatic to hear about Castle and Esposito’s machinations to get Beckett and Lanie in the same place at the same time.

“So why’d you want me?” he rumbles cheerfully. The phone resonates.

“Because between you and me we can stop Beckett killing everyone? Esposito and Ryan can deal with Lanie, but Beckett can fight.”

O’Leary snickers evilly. Then he turns serious. “Castle, I get that she needs friends, but are you sure about this?”

“No,” Castle says honestly. “But Lanie’s bugging her – and me, which is a pain, and Beckett’s not happy about the situation, and this way they can either have a big fight or they can kiss and make up. Besides which, we’ll tell her first that Lanie wants to apologise. And if it’s a fight, well, I’m sure the city can find another ME, and we’ll all just have to help Beckett hide the body.”

“It’s not as if Perlmutter’ll help find it, is it?” sniggers O’Leary. “Useless, he is.”

“Ryan told me about the six-six suspect who turned out to be five-five…” Castle trails in front of O’Leary. “Have you got more stories like that?”

“Sure I do. But you’ll have to wait till tonight. Okay, where are we meeting?”

“Back at Esperanto? It was quite good, and Espo won’t want to go far from here.”

“Detective Esposito,” O’Leary says pontifically, “has no imagination.”

“Says the man who allegedly never leaves Molloys.”

“Oh, that’s just to wind up Beckett. I go lots of places, though they’re mostly Irish bars, but I let her think it’s only that one. It’s near enough to her apartment that I didn’t worry about her getting home okay.”

“My mom would kill me if I didn’t mind my manners,” the mountain rumbles embarrassedly, and then perks up. “Don’t tell me you don’t worry ‘bout her too.”

Castle is reasonably glad he’s on the phone. He knows he’s blushing. Of course he worries. But he’s entitled to worry. Beckett is his girlfriend – and O’Leary’s long ago partner in mischief.
O’Leary was entitled to worry then. He simply doesn’t need to worry now. Castle will do that.

“So anyway,” he says quickly, “Esperanto, tonight, soon as you finish your shift? Will that be six, six thirty again?”

“Yeah. See you later. Mine’s a Mexicali, if you’re there first.”

“Okay. Bye.”

So that’s one side of the game sorted. He tips Espo the wink in another moment when Ryan’s missing, and returns to his chair at Beckett’s desk.

“I got O’Leary,” he says happily. “We’ll meet him at Esperanto at six or so.”

“If there’s no body.”

“Yeah, okay. Don’t jinx it. I liked their food. At least when you weren’t trying to steal my churros.”

“I didn’t steal any of them.”

“You thought about it.”

“I did not. I don’t steal.”

“Yes, you do.”

“I don’t. Name one thing I’ve stolen.”

“My heart, Beckett,” Castle says in a theatrical tone designed to be wholly irritating and insincere. Except he’s totally sincere, she just doesn’t quite know it yet. Beckett makes a disgusted noise and returns to her paperwork. Castle smirks, even more irritatingly, and decamps to a safe distance.

Esposito is setting up Ryan.

“So, we’re all going to Croxleys.” Ryan raises his brows. “Castle said he wanted craft beer. I’d go to Ace, but he nixed it. Anyway, drinks on him. They’re bringing that oversize pal of Beckett’s too. You in?”

“Sure.”

“Beckett’s a bit down ‘bout Lanie, Castle said.” Esposito delivers the lie without a wince or flicker of an eyelid. “Still, a night with us’ll sort that.” He watches deviousness slide through Ryan’s eyes and away again. “Now, what’cha got on that camera footage?”

Some time later, Esposito watches with considerable hidden satisfaction as Ryan wanders casually off with his phone, and returns shortly afterwards with a rather guilty air.

End of day, end of shift, and, Beckett thinks, time for a nice drink with the very comforting mass of Castle and the bulk of O’Leary. Castle barely waits for them to be out of the precinct before he’s wrapped an arm round her shoulders with a happy smile and tucked her in to his side.

“There,” he bounces. “Nice and cosy.”

Beckett wriggles into a more comfortable arrangement, thinks about snarking, and can’t find a snark to activate. “C’mon, then. Let’s go get this drink.”
Tonight, she wants soda. Not beer. She finds a table, Castle finds the drinks, and shortly O’Leary finds all of them. Some gentle chit-chat, occupying quite a while during which Castle surreptitiously reads a text and keeps conversation flowing, over the inadequacies of ME Perlmutter later, O’Leary grins happily. Beckett has totally missed Castle’s nod to him.

“Just as well we’ve got ME Parrish, isn’t it? You two’ve been friends for years.”

“Yeah. She’s a really good ME.”

“And your friend. I haven’t seen her in ages, outside the morgue. It’d be good to see her again.”

“So give her a call. I’m sure she’d be happy to see you.”

“I’m sure she would. Everyone always is. Anyways, I hear she wants to see you. Heard you two had an argument, and I heard she wants to apologise.”

Beckett casts Castle a fulminating and completely comprehending glare. You tattle-tale, possibly with some other pungent adjectives interspersed, is written all over her face.

“She does,” Castle says.

“I don’t want to see her,” Beckett says flatly.

“Beckett, she wants to make it right.”

“I don’t care. When I needed a friend she wasn’t one. I don’t need her making me feel shit. She hasn’t bothered apologising for butting in the other night, either.” For some strange reason Castle hears or insulting you in that statement, and presses just a little closer.

“Beckett,” O’Leary’s bass reverberates around the table. “Beckett, Lanie was your friend way back when, you told me. She was there then. Just like I was – before I was. Ten years, Beckett. Don’t write her off for one screw-up. She’s tryin’ to do what she thought was right. So it wasn’t right, but so what? She meant well. Now if she’s gonna apologise and try to square things off, don’t you go throwing it back at her, ‘kay? You’re better than that.”

“She doesn’t get it,” Beckett says. “She made it pretty clear that she thought I was a complete fuck-up. She even said so. That’s not one screw-up, that’s a month’s worth of commentary. According to her, everything I’ve done since Christmas is wrong and I should go see a shrink or she’ll get me committed. That how your friends talk to you, O’Leary? ‘Cause it’s not how my friends talk to me. It’s her who doesn’t want to be friends, not me. I tried. She didn’t.”

Castle stays quiet. He wasn’t there ten years ago, and he can’t help now. He’s in enough trouble already. O’Leary, immovable massive object that he is, might just be able to pull off enough big-brotherness that he can coax, cozen or carry Beckett into seeing Lanie again. He wouldn’t bet against the last, though he thinks that O’Leary had better make sure that Beckett’s Glock is somewhere else before he tries it.

“If I dumped every friend I’d had a fight with, I’d have none left. C’mon, Beckett. I can see that you’re miserable. You don’t really wanna be on the outs with her.” If Castle had said that, he’d be searching for his testicles in the gutter. “Give it a go. Say you’re sorry. I can see you wanna make up, so stop trying to pretend you don’t. We’ll both come with you. Moral support.” O’Leary strikes a muscular pose. “If she’s still nasty to you I’ll remove her. Pick her up and carry her outside. At least I know she won’t be punching me in the kidneys.”

“Low blow, O’Leary. What did you expect me to do?”
“Respect the badge, Beckett. Respect the badge.”

She laughs, though it’s horribly brittle. “Didn’t notice you respecting my badge.”

“Couldn’t see it. You never did tell me where you hid it.”

“No. I didn’t.” Castle’s eyes are wide. “I’m not telling you, either.” He pulls on a dramatically disappointed expression.

“C’mon, Beckett. Time to kiss and make up. It’s one meeting, less than an hour, an’ I promise if it don’t go well we’ll go. We can leave Castle to deal with the fallout.”

“Hey!” Castle squawks. “That’s not fair.”

“Your plan. You take the rap if it fails.”

Castle mutters and grumps, all of it for effect and none of it sincere. It looks to him as if O’Leary’s worked some magic, and while he, Castle, may have all the words it’s O’Leary who’s kissed tonight’s Blarney Stone. Maybe there’s some truth in the Irish lineage after all.

“Finish your soda, Beckett, and let’s go,” O’Leary says, and fixes her with a stare until she drinks up. Castle wonders if he could achieve that, and then realises, rather slowly, that in an odd way this is a non-sexual counterpart of his technique (that sounds too studied, too manipulative, but he can’t currently think of any better word) of simply applying assertive masculinity and finding that she falls into it. He reckons that it wouldn’t work for a second if they were in work. Any of them.

The thought nibbles at his neurons, though. In work, alpha-Beckett is absolutely, definitively, totally on top. Once they get out, she isn’t, necessarily. And either way, Beckett is either surrounded by men who are as tough as she, or on her own, more or less. Something’s there, but he can’t quite catch it –

“You coming, Castle?” breaks into his thoughts. He scrambles after Beckett and the rolling hill that she’s reluctantly following. Even in her heels, when he catches up and moves to one side of her, it looks a little like she’s under arrest. He slides a hand into hers and is vastly reassured when she curls fingers round his, though her fingers are chill and her grip only a whisper away from limp. He curls his own fingers more tightly so that she doesn’t slip away.

“You ready for a beer, Espo?”

“Hell, yeah. All this paperwork makes my eyes bleed. Let’s get outta here.”

Shortly, they’re sitting in Croxleys with some beer. Espo watches Ryan looking around for Castle and Beckett and evilly wonders when he’s going to tell him what’s going on. Not just yet, he decides. He’ll wait till Lanie shows up. He’s got some words for Ryan and Lanie. And… here she is.

“Hey, Lanie,” Ryan says, not really managing to make it sound as if he wasn’t expecting her.

“Least Ryan here still lets me know what’s going on. Seeing as the rest of you shut me out.”

“Wind your neck in, Lanie. What’d you expect, yellin’ at Beckett like that? She’s not one of your rookie interns who’s screwing up.” Esposito fixes Lanie with a hard stare. “Thought you were her friend?”

“I am,” Lanie says, combatively. Ryan shifts a little away from the looming fight. “You haven’t done anything to help her.”

Ryan moves a lot further away.

“I’ve done more than you have. All you did was yell. Least I know how to treat my friends.”

“You didn’t do anything. Bet you just let her get away with saying nothing.”

“Worked better than your yellin’. All you got was your ass handed to you an’ now she won’t talk to you ‘cause you couldn’t keep your tongue between your teeth. Way to go, best friend. You wanna sort your shit out. You been yellin’ at Beckett, an’ you been yellin’ at Castle ‘cause he’s there for her an’ you ain’t. Jealousy ain’t attractive, Lanie.”

“I wouldn’t want Writer-Boy if you paid me in gold,” Lanie snaps. “He’s not my type. I’ve known Kate for years and I know what’s wrong with her a lot better than some smart-ass blow-in with a big mouth and a cute ass.”

“Don’t look like you do to me,” Esposito says bluntly. Ryan is nearly at the other end of the bar by now. “Looks to me like he’s got Beckett down cold. It’s you who’s messing up here. So stop yellin’ at me an’ talking shit about Castle, ‘cause you’re only doin’ it because you know you screwed up. Why’d you come here tonight?”

“Because Ryan told me you’d all be here. Kate’s been avoiding me and she can’t run away like she has been. I wanna talk to her.” Light dawns. “She’s not here, is she?” Ryan groans, as light dawns on him too.

“Nah. I knew Ryan would spill to you, an’ you’d show up. Di’n’t think it would be so’s you could do some more yellin’, though. Thought you wanted to patch things up, but it don’t sound like it to me, so ain’t gonna put money on it bein’ all happy when Castle does bring Beckett round here. If he does, ‘cause she prob’ly don’t wanna see you, an’ he prob’ly can’t make her come. Fact, I prob’ly oughta call him and tell them not to bother, it ain’t gonna work.”

Lanie opens and closes her mouth a few times, without anything coherent emerging. Esposito continues his cool stare at her.

“Don’t do that,” she eventually manages.

“You gonna keep your cool?” He taps out a text. “I’m tellin’ Castle to hold off.”

“Who died and made you king? You don’t have the right to do that.”

“Yeah, I do. Me ‘n’ Castle thought this up to try an’ fix you two, but we ain’t doin’ that if all you’re gonna do is bitch and start a fight.”

“I didn’t start this. Kate did. She’s the one shut me out.”

“An’ you’re the one getting’ in her face about it as often as you can. I don’t care which of you started it. This ain’t kindergarten, though the way you’re both behavin’ it might as well be. But if you want this fixed, you gotta change the attitude. Beatin’ up on her ain’t gonna work. Telling her she’s screwin’ up ain’t gonna work. An’ tryin’ to get between her an’ Castle really ain’t gonna work, because you couldn’t get a piece of paper between them right now.” He pauses. “You oughta be grateful for that, if you’re really her friend. He’s the only thing between Beckett an’ a medical suspension.”

“What? Why didn’t someone tell me?”

“Because you were so busy yelling you weren’t listening,” Ryan says quietly. “Beckett got sent home an hour after you were pitching a fit over her desk and Montgomery ordered you out. I thought you and Beckett ought to be patched up, so I called you ‘bout tonight, but right now I’m thinking that might have been a mistake.” Lanie looks ill. “She was out for two days. She’s not been really right since ‘cept when we’ve had a new body. An’ all you’ve done is shouted at all of us and left nasty voicemails when we don’t answer. If you’ve been doing that with Beckett too” – Lanie colours up – “So you have? You dumbass – then I don’t think there’s much reason to patch you two up.”

Esposito nods. It’s always good to watch Ryan laying down the law. Doesn’t happen often – Esposito can’t play good cop, his face doesn’t bend that way – but when Ryan decides where the bright side of the line lies, he’s as good as anyone at standing his ground. He lets Ryan take point for a while and sees that Castle’s sent him a reply. Let me know if you get to a good place. We’re good here for a long time yet.

“She needs fixed,” Lanie says with a fair amount of defiance. “She needs fixed and you weren’t sorting that out.”

“Not up to us to sort Beckett. She’s grown up, she knows what she needs to do. Pushing her never works, an’ trying to force her to do what you think she needs to do was never going to work either.” Ryan looks very straight at Lanie. “Weaselling round trying to get all of us to tattle on her wasn’t your best plan. Trying it on Castle was downright dumb. No-one’s going to roll on her.”

Esposito manages to keep a straight face. He strongly suspects that Castle and Beckett have been spending quite a lot of time rolling. It’s in their eyes. Sniggering will not improve this clusterfuck, though. Aren’t doctors supposed to have a bedside manner? Lanie doesn’t.

“She still needs fixed, and she’s not doing it. She’s running round with Writer-Boy rather than sorting herself out.”

Castle,” Ryan says with some emphasis, “has been keeping Beckett grounded. Unlike you.”

Where did Ryan get the shrink-speak from? Night school?

“So wind your neck in, Lanie, because we’re not watching you try’n bully Beckett any more. Either sort your shit out an’ apologise, or go home. Don’t really care which.”

Espo nods firmly. “Shit or get off the pot, Lanie. Make up or don’t, but stop messin’ with us.”

“I have to apologise and Kate just sits there?” Lanie doesn’t sound co-operative.

“Naw. She’s gotta do her share. But that ain’t your problem or mine,” Espo returns to the conversation. “If she’s gonna try, she’ll turn up. If she ain’t, she won’t. Guess we’ll all find out.”

“Okay,” Lanie says. She doesn’t sound exactly full of sweetness and light, but it’s agreement.

Espo taps out a text to Castle. Lanie’ll play nice. Probably.
With a little help from my friends

Beckett’s steps slow as Croxley’s approaches. All that this results in is Castle and O’Leary flanking her in a posture that strongly suggests to her that if she stops moving forward of her own volition she will be moved forward through theirs. This is not fair. Pair of big bullies. Accent firmly on the big part of that. Either of them is, regrettably, quite capable of lifting her up and moving her on. Together, she’s got no chance. And while she doesn’t know how fast Castle can run on sidewalks, (he only just caught her over sand) she does know that O’Leary’s reaction time and arm length is very likely to stop her before she’s really had a chance to escape.

She has no desire to see Lanie’s condemnatory, accusatory face at all. She isn’t even sure how she got talked into this, because Lanie’s many messages haven’t given her the idea that Lanie wants to play nice. But something about O’Leary’s wide face and sincere eyes – and the years she’s known and trusted him – has walked her right over here. She grips Castle’s hand, large and warm around hers, and tries to find her calm surface. It’s only Lanie, and it’s only as long as she wants to. She doesn’t have to stay. She doesn’t have to take any crap. Castle will stand with her – he’s said so, though he was talking about her father – and O’Leary’s promised that if it doesn’t go well they’ll all leave. She’s got her friends beside her. She can get through this.

She tosses back her hair, lets go of Castle’s hand, and strides out; hits the bar door without hesitation and steps in. The two men behind her exchange glances but not words, and stay half a pace behind.

“Hey,” Beckett says coolly to the three in the bar. Castle and O’Leary come to a stop behind her. It looks, to Espo’s well-trained and suspicious eyes, like they’re the flanking guard. He acquires a feeling of some nervousness. Beckett doesn’t look precisely receptive. Lanie’s hackles are already rising. He raises eyebrows at Ryan, who taps Lanie’s foot. Strangely, Lanie looks more nervous, not to say downright scared, than pissed. She eases down.

Beckett sits down with a swish, Castle and O’Leary still flanking her. There is a remarkable lack of space around the table, suddenly. Castle has the rather uncomfortable feeling that the lack of space is not only physical. The atmosphere has become close-confined and stuffy.

“Beer, Beckett?”

“Coke, thanks.”

“There’s a tab running,” Esposito says. “It’s in Castle’s name.”

Castle shrugs. “I expected that.”

“Is this where you demonstrate how to carry five beer bottles and a soda at one go?” Beckett snarks at him.

“Yes. It’s a good party trick.”

“Show me?” says Castle happily. “Maybe I can do it. That would be good at my parties. Everyone would be really impressed. Patterson can’t do that.”

“S’easy. All you need are long enough fingers. Put your hand out.” Castle does. “Hm. Small hands. Maybe you couldn’t do it.” O’Leary puts his immense hand flat on the table.
“Small? My hands are not small.” Castle looks around, horrified. “All of you put your hands on the table too. Ryan, Espo, put your hands out.” Everyone does. “See, not small.”

It’s true. Castle’s hands are certainly bigger than Ryan and Espo’s. Beckett manages not to wriggle or blush at the thought of his hands. They’re amazingly skilled. But next to O’Leary’s frying pans masquerading as hands, they are small.

Castle goes up to the bar with O’Leary and comes back with five beer bottles, but not the Coke. He smiles a little sheepishly. “Couldn’t manage the glass too.” Beckett quirks a cynical eyebrow. Castle waits a half-beat, till the beers are deposited, then favours her with a scorching glance that should have curled her toes. He drops back into his seat next to her and presses a knee against hers, where it’s not obvious. Shortly O’Leary descends back into his, somewhat in the manner of an iceberg calving, and deposits the Coke.

“Isn’t this cosy,” he rumbles cheerfully. “All pals together.” Esposito shoots him a glare. “Hear you’re good at sparring. Beckett said it. Wanna try a few rounds sometime? I could use a tough workout.”

“Bring it on, mountain-man.” But Espo manages a comradely grin, reflected in Ryan and Castle’s faces. It’s just as well that the men are all so content with each other, because Beckett and Lanie are as tense as a Siamese cat facing a terrier. Castle knows which is which, but is not yet either beered-up enough or stupid enough to say so. Gradually a silence descends on the whole table. Nobody seems inclined to break it. Each of the men are looking between the women, who are watching each other and not saying anything at all. It’s all about to go horribly wrong.

“So when does the naked mud-wrestling start?” Castle asks. There’s an instant of shocked silence.

“You sex-crazed jackass,” Beckett and Lanie yell in unison – and then look at each other, astonished. Beckett’s lips quirk. Lanie produces a half-smile.

“Give us some space, boys,” Beckett says. “Lanie and I need to talk.” When they don’t instantly move, the snap of day-to-day command enters her voice. “Leave. Now. Find another table.” She thinks for a second. “Out of earshot.”

The men depart. Quickly.

“That worked,” Castle says happily. “Beers on me? Just in case we need to break up the mud-wrestling?”

The other three can agree on that.

Back at the now-vacated table, Beckett and Lanie have fallen back into uncomfortable silence. Beckett’s swirling the straw in her soda. Lanie’s picking at her beer mat. Both of them are sneaking sidelong peeks at the other. Beckett swallows. Lanie gulps.

“You made me feel like shit,” Beckett says bluntly. “I don’t need that.”

“You were diving straight down the rabbit hole. You don’t need that, either,” Lanie says, equally harshly.

“Wasn’t up to you to tell me I’m a fuckup.”

“I’m your friend. If I don’t, who would?”

Voices are beginning to acquire annoyance. Tempers have risen, rapidly.
“Are you saying I’m fucked up?”

“I’m saying” –

“Is there a problem?” O’Leary rumbles from over Beckett’s shoulder. Lanie stops talking.

“Butt out, O’Leary,” Beckett snaps. “This isn’t your business.” Lanie follows it up with a glare that promises scalpels, without anaesthetic.

“I’m saying that I wanted to make sure you were getting help,” Lanie says more temperately, as O’Leary departs.

“What you said was that I was fucked right up. What you did was try to start a fight in the bullpen, in public, in front of my team. What you’ve done is try and make me do what you think I should do and tried to drag in pretty much everyone who knows me. You don’t know anything about my situation now and you only made it worse.” Beckett is not temperate. Nor is she quiet.

“You girls okay?”

“Jackass,” Lanie says bitterly.

“Too right,” Beckett agrees. There’s a short pause. Beckett twiddles her straw and sips the soda. Lanie swigs at her beer and shreds the beer mat some more.

“I didn’t mean to make you feel like shit.”

Beckett, already opening her mouth on a further grievance, closes it. “I… okay.”

There is another pause. The straw snaps. The beer mat is a small pile of scraps. Castle approaches and is greeted by a twin-track, vicious glare. He retreats before he gets within five feet.

“ ‘M” – they each start.

“You go.”

“No, you.”

“ ‘M sorry,” Beckett mutters.

“Me too,” Lanie mumbles.

They peek at each other through their respective eyelashes.

“Didn’t mean to yell at you. I just wanted to help.”

“Should’ve known that. I… just wasn’t in the right place.”

“ ‘M sorry,” Lanie mutters.

“Me too,” Beckett mumbles.

Banished to the other side of the bar, the four men squeeze themselves around a table that isn’t quite out of earshot. They don’t at all believe that Beckett and Lanie are going to kiss and make up that easily.
“So who’s gonna break up the fight?” Espo asks cynically.

“Take it in turns. O’Leary first.”

“Hey!” O’Leary protests.

“Beckett’s not your boss, neither of them are your girlfriend, and you’re the only one who can get both of them out of here in one go,” Ryan points out smugly. “All you have to do is pick them both up by the scruff of the neck and take ‘em out.”

“And then run like hell,” Castle points out. “Beckett’s still got her Glock.”

“Does Lanie know that?” Esposito asks. “Shouldn’t someone have told her?”

“Didn’t you?” Castle and O’Leary ask in unison.

“Oooops,” Espo says unrepentantly. “Musta forgotten that.”

“Like you forgot to tell me that Beckett wasn’t gonna be here?” Ryan mutters blackly. “You set me up.”

“Yep. An’ you deserved it, tattling to Lanie like you did. So stop bitchin’.”

“Looks like someone needs to interfere,” Castle says. “Voices rising, posture spoiling for a fight – this is all about to go wrong. O’Leary, you’re up.”

O’Leary casts him a volcanically fiery glance. Clearly, Mauna Loa sized or not, breaking up the fight isn’t in his game plan for the evening. “You owe me, Castle. This is not what I signed up for. I thought we were friends,” he says pathetically, and then sniggers. “I’m the one person who isn’t looking for the naked mud-wrestling. Not from those two, anyway.” He runs a deliberately mischievous look over Ryan and Esposito.

“Not cool, bro. Not cool at all.”

O’Leary rises to full skyscraper height and grins down. “Couple of pretty boys like you? Very cool.” He’s distracted by Castle’s sharp whistle and gesture to the other table, where tempers have risen dramatically. He ambles over, rumbles inaudibly – then suddenly winces and retreats in a way that in a less enormous man would be described as a fast scuttle.

“What, big guy? Scared off by two girls?” Espo is very nearly taunting.

“Your turn next.” O’Leary looks across. “’Bout now, I’d say.”

Espo returns much faster than O’Leary had.

“Now who’s scared by two girls?”

Espo glares, bitterly.

“Just for that, it’s you next, Castle.” Castle winces. “Like right now. They’ve stopped talking again.”

Castle gets to within ten feet, takes one look at Beckett’s face, takes another two steps with quailing courage but in the hope that he’ll get away with it if he makes her very happy later, sees the promise of pain, suffering and evisceration in Lanie’s expression, and abruptly decides that his happiness will be more likely if he is not in the ER. He reverses direction, rapidly.
“Not so brave now, are you?”

“Never claimed to be. You three are cops. I’m not.”

“What’s going on?”

“Huh?”

Beckett and Lanie are standing up, putting on coats, and clearly preparing to leave. The four men look at them, worriedly.

“Where’re you goin’?” Espo blocks their exit.

“Somewhere civilised.”

“Women only,” Lanie states.

“But… but…” Castle stutters.

“Butt out. Lanie and I need time without you lot butting in.”

“We know what you’re doing. We don’t need you doing it.”

“What?”

But Beckett and Lanie are out the door.

The men look at each other and shrug.

“Guess it worked,” O’Leary rumbles.

“Suppose so,” Castle agrees, a little miffed that Beckett’s disappeared rather than snuggling up to him. He’d wanted to take her home, after. Still, he’d thought that she needed to be pals with Lanie again, and it seems like they’ve sorted it out. Probably.

Another round of beers appears, and they settle in for the evening.

Beckett and Lanie don’t say much on the way to Matilda’s. Some harmony might have been restored, but it’s still not entirely comfortable. Both of them feel they’ve behaved rather… well, childishly.

They find a table, order polenta crostini with mushrooms so they’ve got something to nibble, Beckett has another soda and Lanie a glass of white wine.

“That’s better,” Beckett says with some satisfaction, looking round. “Lost them.”

Lanie nods in vigorous agreement.

“So,” she says, “you wanna talk, or you wanna eat and have the civilised evening we were gonna have a month ago?”

Beckett appreciates the way Lanie’s put that. “Let’s start with food and civilised. It’s not… I don’t wanna talk much.”

“Okay. But…” – Lanie looks like a mischievous sprite – “you gotta share one thing, Kate.”

“Are you dating Writer-Boy?”

Beckett splutters out her soda. “Lanie!”

“So you are.”

“Not your business.”

Lanie smirks evilly. “Well, that evening a month ago I was going to tell you that you should find someone who’d keep you warm – or keep your sheets hot” – Beckett nearly chokes – “but since you’ve done it all yourself how about we talk about something else?”

“Yeah. Something else.” Lanie looks questioningly at her. “Movies. Or make-up. Or…”

“Or men.”

“Not men. Weren’t the Banana Splits that we left behind enough for you?”

Lanie choking on her wine and goes purple as she tries to stop laughing.

“O’Leary’s still cute.”

“Yeah, and still with Pete. Stick to the attainable. You could try Espo. He’s single.”

“When I want someone whose only conversation is guns I’ll try Espo.”

“So the next week after never, then?”

“Yup. And don’t suggest Ryan either. If I want pathetic blue eyes I’ll get a puppy.”

Beckett snickers. “Wasn’t going to. You’d walk right over him. If you want that, go down the ten-cent store and buy a doormat.”

“You didn’t get a doormat,” Lanie says with a slight edge. “Wouldn’t tell me a damn thing.”

“Anyone. What’d you do, sew their lips shut?” Beckett smirks. “Or threaten them?”

“Nothing you wouldn’t have done, Doctor Moreau.”

Lanie splutters, and pours herself some more wine. “Mean, Kate. Very mean.”

Beckett sips her soda. There is a pause.

“Are we good, Kate?”

“Yeah. We’re good.”

“Okay. Shall we get some more food?”

“Yeah. I’m hungry.”

Nobody says anything in the bullpen the next day, apart from a few comments about the unkindness of Beckett and Lanie going off without the others. The team is easier than it has been in quite a while. To Ryan and Espo, Beckett seems some way calmer. To Castle, ambling in at lunchtime to see if there is anything interesting happening and disappointed to find that there is nothing, she is certainly calmer, but nothing like as peaceful as she should be. He doesn’t say anything, though, simply ambles off again, knowing that he’ll be round at her apartment later on tonight.

Beckett simply makes it through the day. She’d not slept particularly well, despite sorting things out with Lanie. Every time she’d dropped off, she’d been woken by unsubtle nightmares involving stripping naked in public. She doesn’t need Freud to explain those to her. She’d resolved to talk to Dr Burke, but that doesn’t mean she has to like it. She drags off to his office at the end of the day.

“Good evening.”

“Hey.”

“In the previous session, I asked you to reflect upon your reactions to the Berowitzes. Have you had an opportunity so to do?”

“Yeah. But…”

“Mm?”

“Can we talk about something else?”

Dr Burke is surprised. Mainly, he is surprised that Detective Beckett wishes to talk about any matter, unprompted. This should, however, be encouraged. “Certainly.”

“I want” – Detective Beckett hesitates, and Dr Burke emits an encouraging noise – “to-talk-about-Castle’s-family,” she blurs out in one breath.

Dr Burke’s surprise is only indicated by a slight raising of his brows. He is quite astonished by that statement.

“Certainly,” he says again, in default of being able to find any other words. “Please begin.”

“Uhm…” Detective Beckett does not appear to know where to begin. Dr Burke rapidly assembles his own thoughts.

“Please start by explaining Mr Castle.”

Detective Beckett manages a skewed smile. “Explaining Castle? That would take a while. He showed up as a person of interest on a case, round about September last. He tried to chat me up” – this does not, in fact, surprise Dr Burke – “and when I wouldn’t play he weaselled his way into the precinct by leaning on the Mayor. The Mayor – and my boss – play poker with him. He claimed that I’d inspired his latest character. So after that they let him shadow me.”

“And he has a family, I believe you have mentioned?”

“A daughter. And his mother lives with them. Martha Rogers – she’s an actress.”

Martha Rogers? Dr Burke recognises the name. Off-Broadway theatre is not his preference, but he has been forced to sit through it with friends on occasion. He calls up a very vague memory of an overly-flamboyant redhead.

“So Mr Castle has a daughter of – how old?”
“Fifteen, I think.”

“And you have met his family, you informed me. You told me that you and your father had attended a dinner at Mr Castle’s home.”

“Yeah. But I’ve been there before. And…”

“And?”

“And I’m really unhappy seeing him and his family because it reminds me of how my family used to be and I hate that I can’t just get over myself. So I wanna sort that.”

Detective Beckett looks thoroughly unhappy and ashamed. Dr Burke finds this unsurprising, but also unwarranted. It is, in his experience, normal to be envious and unhappy of people who are enjoying a happy existence which a patient has previously experienced, but which the patient has lost through no fault of their own.

“I see.”

Dr Burke is, paradoxically, extremely satisfied that Detective Beckett has raised this issue, even though normally he would not permit a patient to divert from his carefully structured course of treatment. He is a firm believer in the efficacy of his methods, and is disinclined to depart from them without a very good reason. However, Detective Beckett has been ill-served by her previous therapist, and is proving a very complex patient indeed. Therefore, it is wise to allow a certain degree of deviation, if it will encourage her to talk freely. As well, her introduction of this subject means that he does not need to do so. He recalls their previous discussion of this point, which had been triggered by Detective Beckett’s father’s ill-considered words. Detective Beckett had, at that point, not mentioned any desire to be able to see Mr Castle’s family. Dr Burke deduces without difficulty that his earlier conclusion that Detective Beckett is enjoying a romantic relationship with Mr Castle had been entirely correct.

“Please tell me, chronologically, about your meetings with Mr Castle’s family. It would be preferable, and more efficient,” Dr Burke notes, a little acerbically, “if you were to include your feelings during each meeting as you describe them.” He has little hope that this will occur without some further, detailed, questioning. It is really a great pity that the use of scopolamine is both unethical and, for psychiatry at least, ineffective.
"A couple of weeks before Christmas, Castle insisted I go Christmas shopping with him, and invited me round beforehand. His daughter was there. Alexis. She wasn’t coming with us. It was nothing, really. Just normal family stuff."

"Such as?" Dr Burke is somewhat confused as to why Mr Castle would invite Detective Beckett Christmas shopping, but he is unwilling to reopen the subject of Christmas at this juncture when he is sure from previous sessions that it will divert this session into areas which will, presently, be unhelpful.

Detective Beckett winces. “School stuff, reminders to take care. The usual.”

"You have said the usual. Why do you think that that was usual?"

"Doesn’t every decent parent do that?" Dr Burke regards her with a beady gaze. “My parents were like that.”

Dr Burke wonders if he should have become a dentist, instead of a psychiatrist. Pulling teeth must surely be easier than extracting feelings from Detective Beckett.

“Detective Beckett, please include how you felt at the time in your descriptions,” he says, only just succeeding in preventing irritation from colouring his tone. Even though he is aware of how difficult it is for Detective Beckett to reveal her emotions, her inability to do so is quite hard for him to manage. He supposes that a truly testing patient is an excellent challenge for his professional skills.

“I… didn’t want to see it. Too many memories. It… upset me.”

"Alexis upset you?"

"The memories upset me. Not Alexis.”

“But if you had not seen Mr Castle with his daughter, you would not have been upset, would you? So would you not say that it was her fault that you were upset?”

“No, I wouldn’t. It’s not her fault.”

“Really?” Dr Burke is deliberately pressing on an evident sore spot. Detective Beckett refuses to take his bait, which is mildly surprising. In most cases, his patients are only too eager to place the blame elsewhere. Detective Beckett appears to have resisted that temptation.

“Let us move on, then, to the next occasion.”

“Just before Christmas. Castle invited me for dinner. I didn’t want to go, but I couldn’t get out it without upsetting him. I should just have said no. I spent all evening trying to be nice and hiding how I felt.”

Dr Burke waits, watching her with sharp intelligent eyes.

“I was jealous,” she spits bitterly. “Happy now? Pathetically jealous. I didn’t need to come here to work that out. I knew that.” So too did Dr Burke. Detective Beckett had mentioned that previously.

“Why do you think you should not be upset by watching Mr Castle with his daughter?”
“It’s pathetic. Jealous of a normal family? It’s stupid and childish.”

“It is also wholly understandable. You had previously had such a relationship with both your parents, did you not?”

“Yeah…”

“Which was taken away from you. Did you previously consider that point?”

“No…”

“You have not, in fact, grieved for either the loss of your father or the loss of your previously stable family. Tell me, Detective Beckett, have you any acquaintances, except for Mr Castle, who have teenage children?”

“No.”

“Do you have any other acquaintances who have children of any age?”

“No.”

Dr Burke pauses for a second. “Would you say that you avoid children?”

Detective Beckett simply stares at him, transfixed. “What?”

“Would you say that you avoid children?”

“No.” Dr Burke continues to regard her calmly.

“But you will not go to Mr Castle’s apartment, will you? If you are not avoiding his daughter, why is that?”

Dr Burke notes with satisfaction that he has given Detective Beckett considerable pause for thought. Of course she is avoiding children and adolescents. Or, more precisely, she is avoiding the memories which they induce in her.

“This isn’t what I wanted to talk about,” Detective Beckett suddenly emits. “I did some thinking. Three points that I need to get over. Castle’s always there for his daughter, and my dad isn’t for me. They’re a family, and I don’t have one. And I didn’t like watching the dinner a few weeks ago because it was just like we used to be. I just want to sort that out and be fixed.”

Dr Burke perceives another avoidance strategy. Detective Beckett appears to have a substantial quantity of those, but she will need to face her issues at some stage. On the other hand, compared to the session in which she had managed to avoid discussing any matter at all, this could be considered to be progress. A crab, he recalls, also progresses by moving sideways.

“Mm,” he emits, in order to acknowledge that he has heard her. He thinks for a moment or two, and considers that taking a risk is justified. “Detective Beckett, your three points appear to be linked to your avoidance of situations where you might be forced to watch a normal family relationship occur.”

Detective Beckett simply looks at Dr Burke, without comment.

“It is entirely reasonable, as I have already noted, that you should be uncomfortable in such situations. However, avoiding them will not, in the long run, be helpful.”
Detective Beckett appears to be about to comment. Dr Burke forestalls her. “I do not consider that you should necessarily seek out a family situation now. That would be unhelpful and counterproductive. However, you need to consider the entirety of your situation. None of the issues you have raised exist in isolation, and you will not be able to overcome them without considering them both individually and in the overall context.”

He pauses, and considers the risks inherent in his next statement, if he makes it. He decides, with no qualms, that the blunt truth will be better for Detective Beckett than any softening. If only her previous therapist had taken a similar approach. “The matters you have raised are quite inextricably linked to your father’s alcoholism and his behaviour whilst drinking. If you wish to address these issues, you will also have to address the earlier issues.” He steels his fingers under his chin, and considers Detective Beckett, who has lost most of her colour. “I should like to start with your father’s actions, and your reactions to them. Allow me to summarise these, so that you may point out areas with which you disagree as we proceed.”

Detective Beckett’s hands are entwined in her lap, and her mouth is pinched closed. It is self-evident that she does not wish to proceed in this way. However, she has not to date wished to proceed in any other more effective way, and so Dr Burke considers that his strategy will be no less efficacious than any other.

“You have told me that your father became an alcoholic consequent upon your mother’s death. Almost immediately after you returned to college, and during a surprise visit home, he was sufficiently drunk that he mistook you for your mother and, on discovering his error, made it clear that you were an inadequate replacement.” Dr Burke pauses. “Detective Beckett, did this happen again?”

“Yes,” she says very shortly, without explaining which point had occurred again.

“Frequently?”

“Often enough.”

“How did you deal with it?” Dr Burke returns to hard facts and actions, for the time being.

“Got my hair cut. Got it coloured. Made sure I didn’t look like Mom.” Her voice spikes. “It worked.”

“In what way did it work?”

“He stopped mistaking me for Mom.”

“Did that help him to accept your presence?” Dr Burke is determined to force Detective Beckett to confront the root cause of all her issues. He had hoped that she would be able to open the necessary discussions herself, but he has come to the conclusion in the course of this session that she is quite unable to open up to him without being forced to. It is really quite antithetical to his usual principles, in which he encourages his patients to talk freely. Normally, of course, his patients wish to talk, and indeed are quite frequently difficult to prevent from talking. Detective Beckett may or may not wish to talk, and indeed he believes that she does wish to talk, but she does not do so. He surmises that she does not wholly trust him. This is normal. He recalls that he had concluded that she did not confide in her friends or speak to her co-workers.

“No.”

“No? What happened?”
“All that happened was that every time he got drunk he told me I wasn’t her and I should go because he couldn’t bear to see me. All he wanted was Mom. He didn’t… I wasn’t enough for him.” She stops.

“So, your father consistently rejected you, when drunk, because you were not your mother. You changed your appearance and behaviour from that which you would have otherwise preferred, in the hope that he would thereby accept you.” Dr Burke allows that statement to lie unadorned, and moves on. “How did he react to you when he was sober?”

“Then he said he couldn’t do without me. Begged me to stay, begged me to be strong for him. Told me how like Mom I was. Told me he loved me and he’d stop, do better. He lied. He never did. Not then. Not for years.”

“How did you initially deal with your father?”

“Cleaned him up. Hauled him out of the tank when he was arrested. Picked him up when he was in public, when he was close to passed out drunk in the Park. Even when he was telling me I wasn’t her.” Detective Beckett’s tone is hard. Her bitterness is not reassuring.

“For how long did you continue to do this?”

“Two years.”

“And then?”

“I stopped.” Dr Burke remembers that. It had been a major part of the first session in which Detective Beckett had actually talked. A memorable moment. “Walked away and left him to it.”

Dr Burke waits.

“Didn’t answer his calls. Didn’t go get him from the cells. Left him to die, or not. Every time someone knocked on the door it could have been another cop. At least then it would have been over.” Dr Burke does not wince. He has heard that before. “He called and called but I wouldn’t go. No matter how much he cried.”

Detective Beckett had listened to her father? That is unusual, and very disturbing.

“Finally he stopped calling. No-one told me he’d been picked up dead” – the flat tone is really quite horrible to hear – “so I guessed he’d given up.” She stops, and the jaws of the ensuing silence gape. “It was a relief,” she says, and buries her face in a Kleenex. “It was a relief.”

It is wholly evident that Detective Beckett is weeping.

“I didn’t hear from him for nearly a year. Then he got the rehab centre to call me, and his sponsor. They said he’d been there nine months, wholly dry for three. He’d wanted to prove he could do it before he called. He knew I wouldn’t take his call. He wanted someone else to prove it. Something to believe in, after all the lies. They had to do a lot of talking to convince me.” She blows her nose, dully dabs at her eyes. “So I went, eventually.”

Dr Burke consciously exudes an air of intelligent sympathy, and, despite the advancing clock, waits for Detective Beckett to continue. He will not end this session until Detective Beckett herself does.

“He was so pleased to see me. It was great. He was my Dad again. I knew he’d have to do the Twelve Steps, and make amends, but he was back. Every time he looked at me he lit up.”

Detective Beckett looks straight at Dr Burke, her eyes flooded. “I didn’t realise then. Only when I was thinking it through after last time I saw you. I needed him to look at me as if he loved me.”

Dr Burke’s own heart sinks. He can predict the next words with considerable accuracy.

“I wanted him to be my Dad again. I just wanted it to be like it used to be. When he was pleased to see me. Before… if something was wrong, after Mom passed, he’d cry, and then he’d drink, and tell me to go. So if he was happy, he wouldn’t be crying, and then he wouldn’t be drinking, and I thought he loved me. And I needed him to want to see me. So I did everything to keep him happy. I wanted our family back. I thought we had our family back.”

Dr Burke sees it all perfectly clearly. It had occurred precisely as he had surmised. Detective Beckett has not said, however, that if he were not crying, and if he were not drinking, her father would also not be telling her to leave.

Detective Beckett stops, hard. “But we don’t. I spent all that time trying to keep him happy and trying to be a family and hoping he still loved me. I did everything to try and make him love me. What a waste of time.”

She looks at her watch. “I’m sorry. I’ve overrun. Thank you.” She stands up.

“Detective Beckett, you do not have to leave now. There is no other patient after you. You may continue.” He continues, swiftly, before she can open the door to which she is moving. “I should like to summarise your actions once more. You changed your appearance when your father reacted badly to your similarity to your mother. When that failed to return him to sobriety, and he continued to express his desire for your mother to return and for you to leave, you tried to protect him, and prevent that discussion, by never opening any topic of conversation which might upset him. When that also failed, you tried to save him from the consequences of his behaviour by doing everything in your power to ensure that you were there whenever he called for you. And yet, in the end, none of it stopped him hurting you.”

Detective Beckett stares at him, colour draining from her face as appalled knowledge begins to inhabit her eyes. Her hand drops from the door. “No…” she says, but Dr Burke is certain that she is not denying that she has now seen the truth. She is, after all, a very intelligent woman. “No…” She turns blindly back to the chair and collapses into it. “It wasn’t like that. It wasn’t like that.”

There is another gaping silence. Detective Beckett is bloodless and seemingly incapable of speech, thought or movement. It is entirely apparent that this thought has never before occurred to her. Dr Burke resolves to ensure that her previous therapist is censured. Surely that should have been explored?

“Has it not previously occurred to you that the way you have behaved with your father exhibits similarities with the way in which victims of emotional abuse react to their abuser?”

“My father never abused me,” Detective Beckett spits out. “Never.”

“And yet you have avoided provoking any situations in which he would potentially hurt you, emotionally.” This is far blunter than Dr Burke would wish to be, but the truth must come out. “Can you honestly say that you have not observed that phenomenon in others, in the course of your work?”

There is another ghastly silence.

“I want to go home,” she finally says. She sounds like a shocked, injured high-schooler, and Dr Burke is reminded that the original trauma took place when she was only nineteen.
“You may leave at any time, Detective Beckett, but I counsel that you only do so once you are a little calmer.”

“Now. I want to go home.” Detective Beckett murmurs something almost inaudible, following that. Dr Burke has no idea what she might have said. He is, however, concerned.

“Detective Beckett, you might find this evening less… difficult if you were to spend it with a friend.”

“I’m going home. I need to go home.”

She fumbles with the door before she can manage to open it.

“Detective Beckett, if there is no-one who will be with you then at least allow me to contact someone to collect you.”

“There will be someone. I just want to go home.”

She leaves Dr Burke contemplating his empty office with considerable concern. The next session is unlikely to be any more pleasant, for either Detective Beckett or Dr Burke.

It takes Beckett fifteen minutes before she can even start the car. It’s not true. It wasn’t like that. It was the disease, it wasn’t her father. It’s not true.

Castle wanders round to Beckett’s apartment at his nearly-usual post therapy time, knocks, waits, knocks again, waits some more, and then following a third, not hopeful, knock moves straight from mild concern as to what he might find to full-scale worry as to why she isn’t there. He dials her cell, and gets voicemail. This doesn’t appease his twisting stomach, even as he leaves a message. He contemplates whether to wait here, or to go and get a coffee and return in a short while. Deciding on the latter, he tears a page out his notebook and scrawls on it, tucks it into the doorframe and starts to leave.

The elevator arrives to take him down and, lost in fearful worries, he’s practically stepping into it before he realises that Beckett is stepping out. To be fair, it’s not as if she’s realised he’s there either. She has exactly the same empty, exhausted, pallid look as when Montgomery benched her. Castle puts a gentle, careful arm around her shoulders, detects immediately that she is shivering, and doesn’t let go until they are safely inside. Even then, it’s only for as long as it takes for Beckett to shed her coat, after which he returns her to the crook of his arm and the warmth in his body. She hasn’t yet said a single word.

“Kate, what’s wrong?”

“It’s not true,” she whispers, which makes no sense at all, and then buries her face in his chest and flings her arms round him, gripping painfully hard.

“What’s not true?” Castle asks, scrambling to try to make sense of anything at all that isn’t the single very obvious truth that therapy tonight has not gone well, to put it mildly.

“He didn’t.”

Which is no help at all. Who didn’t? Didn’t what?

“It wasn’t him. It was the alcohol.”

Okay, so one part becomes clearer. Whatever it was, it’s to do with her father. He sits them down, which is a little awkward since Beckett is absolutely not letting go of him and is trying to burrow through his sweater.

“Kate, stop trying to do anything,” he says softly. “Just stop. Stay here.” Her grip eases slightly, and the burrowing ceases. He finds himself with a bundle of beleaguered Beckett, which happens immediately after therapy sessions far, far too often. Therapy, it appears, is one of those necessary evils which turns out to be the right thing in retrospect but is devastatingly hard to get through at the time.
Walk right by me

“He’s wrong,” is the next thing Castle hears. It has disturbingly forceful overtones. “He’s wrong and it’s not true.” Anger is beginning to replace misery in her voice.

“Who’s wrong?”

“Dr Burke. He’s talking absolute crap.”

“About what?” Castle is, and sounds, wholly confused. Not so confused, however, that he hasn’t noted the name of the therapist. It can’t be anyone else.

“It wasn’t like that. Dad wasn’t like that. He’s talking crap,” she says again.

“Beckett, what are you talking about?” Castle shakes her very gently to try and restore her normal organisation and lucidity, neither of which is in any way in evidence.

“He said that Dad was an abuser and it’s just not true. Dad never did.”

Castle freezes around her. This adds a whole new layer of complications. His sharp mind begins to work, while he stops talking and simply cossets her close to keep her warm. He very much doubts that Jim Beckett actually hit his daughter, simply because he is sure that if that had happened she would accept that he had abused her. So, emotional abuse? He doesn’t know anything much about that. It’s not figured in any of his research, since macabre mysteries and thrillers tend to focus on rather more tangible matters. He might need to do some researching, in the near future.

“Do you want to tell me about it, or do you just want some dinner and to talk about movies, or books, or something else?” Tell me something, Beckett. Sometime, tell me something, for Chrissake.

There’s an unhappy silence before words start to arrive.

“All I wanted was to fix the job and fix seeing your family. He made me go right back to the beginning. I didn’t want to go back to the beginning. Past’s past.”

Ah. Dr Burke has decided to rip open all Beckett’s unhealed wounds, clean them out thoroughly and stitch them together properly. Oh, hell. As therapy, Castle is sure that this is the right thing to do. It’s just that he hates seeing the effect it has on his badass Beckett, who’s broken by it. Then again, way back a few weeks ago he’d been preparing himself effectively to break Beckett, in the hope that she’d heal straight, and only her acceptance that it was all wrong had stopped him. So wanting to punch the daylights out of this Dr Burke, then encase his feet in concrete and drop him in the Hudson, is really a bit of an overreaction. Except that he’s made Castle’s Beckett cry, so he deserves it. This is not exactly helpful thinking. Helpful thinking might involve thinking about cuddling Beckett close to him, letting her calm herself down, and then finding out what she wants to do, whether that’s talking or not.

“He made me tell him about the time I went home from college to see him.”

Beckett’s normally precise pronouns have mixed themselves up, but Castle thinks he follows. He doesn’t remember Beckett ever telling him that she’d come home from college – she must mean Stanford – to see her father. All he remembers is Ryan telling him that she’d transferred. He makes a carry-on noise.

She does. Oh God. Oh God oh God oh God. He hadn’t realised this on Saturday. Her father had told her to go away, he didn’t want her because she wasn’t her mother. Oh God oh God oh fuck. And she’d said... oh fuck... he doesn’t remember... he said don’t leave then he couldn’t stand to see me – but she hadn’t said this: she hadn’t included this critical information. She’d said I wouldn’t remind him, how could I reopen it? So... oh fuck, Kate, oh Kate... Jim doesn’t know what he said. Jim doesn’t know why his Katie absolutely freaked out when he said just like being part of a family again because Jim doesn’t know that he told his Katie to get out because she wasn’t her mother.

Oh, fuck. There really isn’t any other phrase. He holds Beckett tighter, and strokes her back soothingly. Annoyance taking over from misery or not, she's still shivering convulsively.

“He said that because I avoided anything that might start him off that it was abuse but it’s not true. He didn’t. It was all the disease. It wasn’t him. He couldn’t stop himself.”

Still denying, minimising – still trying to protect her father from the truth that should have been told in therapy the first time, that should have been repeated in his twelve step program. Someone should have told her back then that she had to tell the whole, horrible truth, and let the chips fall where they might. And now they’ll have to lance this suppurating wound five years too late.

Now what?

What, first, is that Beckett, whatever she’s been doing and saying for the last two and a half weeks about never wanting to bother with her father again, is still trying to hide from the ghastly truth, and still trying to believe the best of her father. She’s still pretending she doesn’t care, but she’s still pretending she can protect him - and she’s still wrong on both counts.

What, second, is don’t for God’s sake open your big mouth, Rick. This is absolutely not the time for him to spill his thoughts. This is a really good time for him to exercise some self-control and sew his lips together.

And what, third, is don’t let go of Beckett, because she’s relying on him. Well. She should be. Whether she is or not is a more difficult question, because her commentary on how it’s not his job to fix her, while true, and while she’d agreed she would ask if she thought she needed him, may mean that her definition of when she might need him could be a very long way from his.

He can’t baby her. He won’t (ugh) treat her as if she needs guidance. He can’t help unless she talks to him. Maybe, though, he can ask one, very careful, question.

“Why did he think that?” he says confusedly. The confusion is not entirely sincere.

“I don’t know,” Beckett says. That sounds entirely false. Castle deduces that she knows perfectly well, and more, that she likely agrees with it and doesn’t want to admit it, or can’t admit it. He also thinks that she’s exhibiting most of the symptoms of being in shock. He supposes that being told in plain language that you were being abused would be a horrible shock.

After a moment, though, she carries on. “He said that because I changed my hair and avoided talking about it and went and collected him but it didn’t stop him telling me he didn’t want me and telling me to leave it was the same as if it was abuse.”

Castle replays that particularly incoherent piece of explanation at half-speed and just about manages to extract the key point. “Oh,” he says, pointless. Tumblers fall into place. He may not know about emotional abuse but he’s beginning to see the outline of the therapist’s thinking. Basically, Beckett avoided anything that might trigger her father and did everything to try and regain her father’s love and stop him hurting her. Oh, God.
Castle mechanically pets Beckett, who’s gone back to her burrowing, and slots that idea into the way Beckett behaves. Avoided talking about it – well, that’s easy. Kept trying to save him in the hope he’d love her – and then walked away, having failed. Now, she never tolerates failure – neither in the precinct, nor the risk that a failure to do everything her father wanted would cause another failure. And from before, doesn’t lose her temper (didn’t lose her temper) because he only ever drank more when she did.

What a horrible, horrible mess, and it all goes back to Beckett never telling her father the truth, because she couldn’t bear to let him fall – because she couldn’t bear that he might not love her, when she was trying so hard to believe that he really did. The truth then might have set her free: the truth now is imprisoning her.

“I’m here, Beckett. Just relax and let me hold on to you. You don’t need to think for now. Stand down for a little while, and worry about it later.”

Standing down sounds good. Dr Burke is wrong. Just plain downright wrong. She’s not an abuse victim. She’s not. She’s not a victim at all. She just wanted her father to love her… oh God. She’s seen it before. She has seen it, over again in uniform, in Vice. Mostly women, and some men, doing anything they thought would stop their spouse or partner or parent or child hurting them, refusing to accept dysfunctional reality, refusing to accept it would never stop till they left.

But she had left. She’d walked away and not put up with it. She hadn’t been a victim. She’d left him to sort himself out and she’d only gone back when he was dry – and others had verified it. She’d had evidence that he was dry. She made herself more, stopped being a victim.

She shivers, and Castle’s arms close around her: the heat in his body not quite sufficient to warm her.

She wasn’t a victim, and she wasn’t abused, and Dr Burke is just plain wrong. And yet her gut is twisting in the way that it does when she’s on the wrong path at work, when she knows that the evidence is starting to point her down a route that’s different from the one she had believed was right, when she’s trying to convince herself that the suspect is the right suspect, but she knows that there’s something wrong in her logic.

She doesn’t like where logic is taking her. She’d denied it outright in the therapist’s office, denied it all the way home, denied it now – but she can’t stop her brain working. She tries to curl deeper into Castle’s wide frame, but short of surgery she can’t get closer.

She might have behaved like a victim before she walked away, but she didn’t do so after she returned. She didn’t.

Except that she still never told him anything that might upset him: told herself she couldn’t let him fall, and never realised till now that actually she was trying to make sure she was behaving in a way that would give her the family she wanted back.

She was still fighting the same battle, just that after he got dry she did it to keep her resurrected family and keep her guilt at bay. Just the same behaviour pattern, pretending it’s for a different reason, pretending it’s to keep him safe and dry. But all she’d ever wanted was the love of her remaining family, and she’d used the same methods to keep it when – she had thought – it returned as she had to try to win it back when it had gone.

“He didn’t,” she says desolately. “But it was the same pattern.”

Nothing shows in her voice, but Castle knows that the silent tears are trailing down her cheeks.
“Stay here, Kate. Whatever it is, whatever you decide, it’s up to you. You don’t have to talk. Just… don’t shut me out, okay? I know you’re crying, you don’t have to hide it. Stop hiding what you feel.”

“I thought I’d done it right. I thought we were good. But I never realised I was avoiding all the triggers so we never had to talk about it. I never told him what he’d said, because he might have told me he meant it.” Her voice changes, hard and bitter as bile. “After all, he did.”

Castle knows that Beckett is wrong about that. He just doesn’t know how to open that conversation. She’s had dozens of messages from her father and she hasn’t believed a single one of them. She’s walked away from him, again. One hurt too many, one ill-chosen sentence that’s taken her right back to all the reasons they’re in this mess in the first place. One last push, just like there must have been one final breaking point the first time. Just like last time, it’s breaking her heart, and she’s hiding it. Just like she did with Lanie, though they’ve fixed that breach, he thinks.

It’s all an appalling repetition of the past, he recognises. Just as eight, seven, six years ago; the countdown of grief and pain; she’s listened to his anguish and refused to answer it. He’d cried for her to come then, and she’d refused to go: stayed clear to save herself from drowning with him. One hurt too many, and she’d walked away to save herself. Now, it’s the same: Jim’s crying for her to come, but it’s one hurt too many and she’s walked away to save herself from the same acid heartbreak as he inflicted on her the first time. The first time he’d told her he didn’t want her, she wasn’t enough family for him. This time – he hadn’t meant it, but he’d said the same thing. You’re not enough family for me. Those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it – but Jim doesn’t even know the history from which he needed to have learned.

Castle knows how to solve this. Get Jim and Beckett in the same place, moderated by Dr Burke. Dr Burke’s methods, however painful, appear to be working. There is only one major problem, which is that he has no idea how to get them in the same place.

While he’s been thinking, Beckett has curled herself into a defensive position in which he can’t see her face, and the rest of her is sufficiently closely tucked into him that he can’t tell anything from that either.

“Want some coffee, Beckett?” he says mundanely, trying to bring this back to some sort of normality, trying to bring her back to some sort of normality. There’s something that might be a nod of the head: at least, the ends of her hair bob up and down. Castle untangles himself and pads over to her kitchen counter to assemble coffee and additives.

When he returns Beckett absorbs the aroma of coffee, and acquires a small amount of colour. She’s still horribly pale, but some of the dull horror has left her eyes. “Thanks,” she says. Castle wriggles himself back into a comfortable alignment and wraps his free arm back round Beckett’s shoulders.

“There. That’s better. Coffee and hugs make everything better. Well, and chocolate. It’s endorphins, you know. Feel good hormones. Apparently the same ones as you get from good sex.” Beckett manages a quirk of an eyebrow. “Not that I was suggesting sex right now but it’s always an option if you want it.” He forcibly shuts his mouth before he really screws this up.

“I don’t think I’m quite in the mood,” Beckett says, tiredly.

“Whatever you decide. It’s up to you. I’d quite like to keep cuddling you, though. Are you in the mood for cuddles?”

“Yes,” she yawns, and leans in.
“Sounds like you need sleep,” he soothes.

“No. I don’t want to sleep. I need to think. I need to work this out.” Her face is pale again. “I don’t want him to be right. I need to prove him wrong.”

Castle spots an opportunity.

“Why?”

“What?”

“Why? You’ve cut ties with your dad, so why should this matter? You don’t need to go through this. You can just leave it and work through what you wanted to with the therapist.”

He’s deliberately trailing a bait that he doesn’t think she can resist. If she’d really truly given up on her father, she wouldn’t have been so utterly furious and disbelieving, or so angry with the therapist. Somewhere very deep inside her, there is still a small hope that it can all be made right. He hadn’t been at all sure, before tonight, that Beckett could ever be convinced to make any move towards her father. Now, he thinks, it’s possible.

Beckett is not answering.

“Just leave it, Beckett. It’s not your problem. Come here.” He drops a kiss on the top of her head, and closes his arm round her. She was happy with cuddles, so cuddles are what she shall have.

“It is my problem. It’s my dad. He’s not like that. It was the alcohol.”

Castle clamps his lips shut so that he doesn’t say if it was the alcohol how come you think he’s still telling you he doesn’t want you as a family now? Pointing out Beckett’s massive inconsistency in this regard is not going to help. He kisses her hair again. It’s soft and shiny and it smells nice. Kissing it is a good thing to do. Simple pleasures, to keep him from simply screwing up. He nuzzles in and keeps her tucked close. She’s all tensed up again, and the only thing he can do is provide strength and quiet to allow her space in which to think.

Beckett is rocked back on her mental heels by the question. What does Castle mean why? Isn’t it obvious? It’s not true. Not the way Dr Burke put it. She’s going to prove Dr Burke wrong. And then Castle carries on. Why bother? You’ve cut ties. So she should just ignore it? Let Dr Burke tell lies? But her gut twists at that thought too. Dr Burke isn’t lying. She’s lying. But it’s still not true. Not as Dr Burke meant it. If he’s going to try to point out hard truth it should be the truth.

So she’s going to think it through properly and then she’s going to show Dr Burke that he’s just plain downright totally absolutely wrong. She’s going to find the right truth.

Beckett straightens in a very badass-Beckett way in Castle’s embrace, with a very badass-Beckett-beating-up-bad-guys look on her face, just as if she was on the trail in the precinct. Castle is not reassured.

“I’m going to prove he’s wrong. And then I’m going to rub his clever-clever shrink nose in it. And you’re going to help.”
"Me? How? Why?"

What is Beckett doing? On the other hand, this might just be the way to get her and her dad back on the same page.

"You are going to convince my dad to see Dr Burke and then he’ll see he was wrong. I bet Dad’s tried to talk to you" – Castle looks guilty – “and I know you won’t have told him anything so you can stop trying to hide behind the couch cushions, so now you’re going to use it. Okay?"

“Okay,” Castle squeaks, utterly intimidated. Juggernaut-Beckett is clearly on a mission, and has reverted to Detective Beckett, terror of Manhattan’s murderers. He still doesn’t understand why she’s seized on this as her crusade, if she’s still pretending she doesn’t care, but actually why doesn’t matter because with a little bit of effort this is all going to come out right. “But Beckett, to do that I’m going to need to talk to your dad openly, and I might need to speak to Dr Burke.”

“Fine. Do whatever you need to.” Yes! “He thinks he’s so clever, dragging up everything and putting his spin on it. Well, he’s wrong, and I’m going to prove it.”

“I thought he was helping you?”

“He is.”

Castle leaves it there. Beckett has obviously channelled the Red Queen, and is believing six contradictory things at once. He’s not going to go there. He’s got a free hand to try to help fix Jim and his Katie, and he’s got permission to talk to Dr Burke, which he thinks will be extremely helpful, for both of them. He could use the chance to offload his thoughts to somewhere that talking won’t invite disaster. He also needs to be able to talk to someone who isn’t Beckett about Beckett, and at this point there are precious few of those around. On balance, this is working out just as he’d like. Beckett is back to being Beckett, rather than the shocked ghost of earlier, and he’s got the freedom to act which he’s been hoping to have for some time.

“Okay,” he says, positively. “I’ll help. It’ll be just like solving a case.”

She turns in his grasp. Her eyes are brightly burning with the same thrill as when she has a mystery to chase down. She’s ablaze, and it’s beautiful. She downs the remains of her coffee in one gulp and smiles with the gleam of a cut-throat razor. Then her eyes flare and she swoops and conquers in one swift movement.

She’s invaded his mouth before he’s really caught up with her intent, plundering as she pleases and overwhelming all his unprepared defences. He surrenders his mouth without even starting to fight her but turns her again and hoists her so that she’s in his lap, trapped in his grip, and while she may have won the battle for his mouth he’s definitely winning the battle for her body. Her shirt falls open and his hard hands raid and ravage her breasts, plucking through the silky bra, commanding her nipples to stand to attention so that each time he palms across them she gasps and shifts; the enfilading strokes sweeping away the line of her control and allowing him to regain command of the front she’d thought she’d won. He takes rapid advantage of the position and sweeps into her mouth, gaining ground with every thrust of his tongue, each small nip on her lower lip, holding the position with the hand in her hair that keeps her open to his attack on her warm, willing mouth.
He completely misses the guerrilla attack on his own button-down until he realises that there’s smooth skin sliding against his stomach. He’s been ambushed, and it feels so good that he almost doesn’t care, until he works out that he could use her own tactics on her by simply sapping under the zip of her pants. As his fingers reach hot, damp fabric over flesh, she sighs and concedes to his conquest and brings one hand to curl around his neck and one to continue her stroking over his pecs: now soft and enticing rather than raiding. Clearly _not in the mood_ has been burnt off in the blaze of a course to follow.

Their kiss deepens and slows, Castle’s clever fingers gliding and sliding, pressing delicately and pushing the fabric to slither over her and rub oh-so-gently on stimulated nerves, never enough to satisfy as her nails bite against hard muscle. She’s in the wrong position to be able to return the favour, quite deliberately. Castle appreciates Beckett in any incarnation: badass, or Kate, or Kat; but he’s every intention of ensuring that whichever she is tonight, pretty shortly the only incarnation that will be present is the one which is screaming out her pleasure under his hands and mouth and body.

He stops teasing, but keeps kissing, braces himself and stands with her in his arms, carries her to the bedroom and stops before the bed. “Is this what you want?” he growls. “You said you weren’t in the mood.”

“I changed my mind.” She smiles sensually. “You didn’t seem to object.” She peeps up through her lashes with smoky, sleepy eyes. “But if you do…”

“Mmm?” Castle hums, playing along with her game.

“I guess I’ll just put on my pyjamas and go to sleep,” she purrs.

“Really? How boring. I’m sure I could overcome any objections.”

“Objections?”

“Yeah. Like I object to you still having your shirt on.” He plops Beckett down on the bed, and strips her shirt in one movement.

“That was only one objection. You implied you had more of them.” Her tone drips sultry sexuality into his ears and straight to his groin.

“I object to you having pants on,” and they’re gone in a flash. “I object to you not kissing me,” and his lips cover hers for a moment. “I object to you not undressing me.” On balance that may have been one objection too many. Beckett sits up, produces a variant on a judo throw which he might last have seen Espo evading on the mats and which leaves him face down on the bed, whips off his shirt, pants and boxers almost before he’s drawn breath, and then stretches out and smirks.

“Any more objections?” she husks.

Castle smiles lazily as he turns over. “Yeah,” he drawls dangerously. “You’re not screaming my name yet.”

He doesn’t take her bra off. He doesn’t take her panties off. Instead he leans down, at his own pace rather than allowing her tugging to pull him down, and slowly teases his tongue along the seam of her lips. When they open in wanton invitation, he doesn’t accept it, simply licks slowly over them again, and nips gently. Her breathing elevates, and her hands grip on his shoulders. He acquires a slow, feral smile, and does it all again, and again, till she’s panting. Only then does he remove bra and panties.

“Castle,” she half-whines. “Kiss me properly.”
He kisses her once, hard and sure, and then peppers little dabs and nips down her throat and across her collarbones until he’s landed in the valley between her small, tight breasts. “Now, let’s see what you like today,” he rasps, and sucks her nipple into his mouth. She gasps as the suction bites along every nerve between her nipple and her core. When he repeats on the other side, her nails start to dig into his back. He continues, switching from side to side, until gasps have become a high keening and she’s twisting under his talented mouth. He sucks and rolls, presses and palms, small bites and swift soothing strokes, winding her up and up and up. She can’t think through the sea of sensation, drowning in him, desperate for more and so searingly hot she’d be surprised she isn’t burning him if she had room in her brain for anything other than the feel of his mouth on her skin and the electricity sparking down her veins.

He stops, takes her mouth again, searchingly possessive with his bulk above her, pressing her down into the mattress and one hard thigh between her legs, holding her still and rubbing through scalding liquid heat. She tries to arch and curve against him, wanting his mass above her and around her, but he stays just that fraction above her to leave her needy. “Not yet. I haven’t finished.” She whimpers, a little crossly. “It’s all about what you like.” He kisses his way back down her body and stops at her navel. “I know what you like.” The soft-as-sin baritone tickles erotically across her stomach. Impossibly, she thinks she’s wetter. She does like it. She loves it. His tongue circles her navel and she wriggles frantically, trying to manoeuvre him further down, opening for him and making wanting, desperate noises that are becoming closer and closer to his name as he trails firm fingers through the soft folds, not quite touching where she wants him, and then he leans in and licks one broad, firm stroke right through her centre and she cries out his name; he does it again and twists his tongue around her and this time she screams for him.

“No objections now, Kat. None at all.” He licks some more, his tongue twining at one end, entering her at the other, of each strong stroke. Her noise is continuous, her hips bucking against his hands, hers in his hair and she’s right on the edge, frantic for more, and then he thrusts two hard fingers into her and it’s just what she needed and she screams again and shatters and slumps.

“Mmm,” she agrees. “What about what you like?”

“I like you,” he drawls. “I like you over me, and around me, but best of all I like you right here under me.” He rolls to be over her: happily predatory and looming assertively large, settling into the welcoming cradle of her hips. “Mm. Yes. Perfect.” She wiggles a little, trying to align him properly. “Don’t wriggle. I’ll get there. When I’m ready.”

“You’re not ready?” Beckett’s syrupy, sexy tone and quirked eyebrow – plus the sudden movement of her hand to close around him – indicates that she thinks he might be.

“Anticipation, Beckett. Anticipation makes everything so much more intense.” Hot blue eyes bore into hers. “Don’t you think? Isn’t that first taste of chocolate sooo much better if you’ve been thinking about it all day? Or that delicious steak?” She squirms, arching up to rub against him. He smiles, and detaches her questing hand, returning it to lie around his neck. “Or the touch of my tongue when I taste you? The scrape of five-o’clock shadow on your thighs? My fingers on you, or in you?” His face is intent, his eyes dark. “Isn’t it better when you’ve imagined it for a while?”

His voice is deep and dark and seductive; falling down the octave and resonating through her body; drawing her into his picture, into his desire and the cage of his frame over her; the hard weight poised between her legs but not yet filling her; she’s soaked again and mewls as he doesn’t simply move, take her and fill her and possess her. “Is that something you like?” He focuses only on her.
“Because I can make sure that you… anticipate… beforehand.” She quite definitely whimpers. This is unfair.

“Castle, stop teasing.” He slides a little back and forward. She whimpers again. “Stop that. I’ve had enough anticipation. How about reality?”

“Reality? If you wish.”

He shifts very slightly, and then moves very slowly, regardless of her fingers digging into his ass to try to speed him up. “This much reality?”

“More.”

He moves a little further. “This much?”

She hisses, and digs nails and heels in.

“More,” she gasps out.

By the time he’s sunk fully into her she’s teetering right on the edge and all she can do is moan more. He slides slowly back, forward; in, out: savouring the tight heat around him, the slight edge of the scratch of her nails, the noises she makes when she’s ready to fall. Some assertion, plenty of strength, and keeping her safe with, and within, him. But for now, it’s time to give her what she wants. He brings a hand between them, takes her mouth with complete ownership, thrusts once, twice, thrice in time with his fingers over the tight cluster of nerves and she releases his name into his mouth as her body shudders around him and releases his.

After, she curls into him, soft and satiated, happy to be held and petted as he’s very happy indeed to hold her close and pet her. She’s so rarely soft and pettable: only with him, only trusts him to see this side of her, and so it means more than just the after-sex cuddles.

Beckett nestles herself into Castle, as close as she can manage without actually sliding under his skin. He’s so good for her. He makes her whole: has held her up when she couldn’t stand. He’s had her back, and now they’ll solve this one last problem and she’ll find her way through. Then, anything will be possible. Everything will be possible.

Castle contemplates his study, his desk, his laptop and his phone on Wednesday morning, none too early, without any great enthusiasm or indeed intelligence. His extremely enjoyable evening had been followed by the extremely unenjoyable need to get a cab home slightly after midnight, after which a sudden burst of inspiration (case-related, for a wonder) had left him typing frantically until dawn. He’d managed breakfast with Alexis, who had regarded him with a sardonic mix of pity and I-know-where-you-were-last-night-dad which was rather disconcerting, but less than four hours’ sleep since then hasn’t exactly left him on top of his game. He considers another dose of concentrated caffeine and decides that it would be simpler to inject it than drink more coffee. Since he doesn’t have a little vial of extracted caffeine, that’s not going to happen, and besides which needle-marks in one’s arms give entirely the wrong impression.

He leans back to review his likely day. He intends – if he can force his brain into gear – to think about how to talk to Jim and how to talk to Dr Burke. Dr Burke is probably easier, but they’ve missed something last night. Beckett will have to tell Dr Burke that Castle will call and – much more importantly – that she has consented to Dr Burke talking to Castle. He persuades his poor tired fingers and brain to send Beckett a text setting that out. Ten minutes later he receives a reply: I thought of that too. Already done. Good to go. Beckett’s investigative efficiency is clearly in full spate. Castle wonders vaguely if Dr Burke has any idea what’s about to happen to him, fails to find much in the way of sympathy for him since it’s Castle who ends up with a miserable Beckett whom Dr Burke has caused rather than a sexy, happy Kat, and finally succeeds in getting his brain into first gear.

Dr Burke first. At least that has no emotional overtones.

Castle’s decision is initially thwarted by his complete ignorance of Dr Burke’s phone number. His neuron-deficient brain eventually prods him into a Google search which remedies the lack of a phone number. It does not remedy Castle’s strong suspicion that he is completely unprepared for the impending conversation. He tries to remedy that by researching emotional abuse for a while, and concludes that it is – one – very complicated and – two – potentially correct.

In his soothingly decorated Midtown office, early on Wednesday morning, Dr Burke sips his tea, savouring the delicate flavours, and regards the e-mail which has arrived only a moment ago with an expression which in a lesser man would best be described as consternation. Since he is not such a man, he would describe his view of the e-mail as mildly surprised. He re-reads the short, brusque text.

Dr Burke. I authorise you to discuss any matter and aspect of my treatment with Richard Castle. Detective Kate Beckett.

Dr Burke does not understand this development at all, but he is quite certain that it may readily be turned to advantage. He had wished to speak with Mr Castle, and now it appears that he will be able so to do. He hopes, however, that Mr Castle does not prove to be a typical celebrity: brash and overly convinced of his own worth. He sips his tea slowly, and ponders how best to extract information from Mr Castle. He has a free session in today’s appointment list, at three. It will probably be most productive if Mr Castle attends at that time.

He steeps his fingers beneath his chin in his habitual gesture, and considers whether Detective Beckett had intended him to attempt to contact Mr Castle, or whether Mr Castle is to contact him. Since Dr Burke does not have Mr Castle’s telephone number, and has no intention of wasting his, or his excellent receptionist’s, time searching for it when it is sure to be unlisted, and since Detective Beckett has not provided it, he assumes that Mr Castle will call him. This seems entirely appropriate. Dr Burke is a busy man, and in fact his first patient will be arriving shortly.

At noon, just as Dr Burke is contemplating with pleasure a refreshing pot of fresh tea and a few moments’ peace in which to restore his equilibrium from a trying patient who is prone to – Dr Burke winces at his own phrase – verbal vomiting without the slightest interest in applying the knowledge thus revealed to improving their life, his receptionist puts through a call. Dr Burke sighs, before picking up.

“Dr Burke, I have a Mr Richard Castle who wishes to speak to you.”

Dr Burke’s irritation at being disturbed is curbed. He is interested in hearing from Mr Castle, and he is a little impressed that Mr Castle has contacted him within a short time of Detective Beckett forewarning him that such would be the case.

“Please put him through.” There is a short click.

“Dr Burke?”

“Indeed. Good afternoon, Mr Castle.”

“Hey. Thanks for speaking to me.” This is a good start. Celebrity or not, the man appears to have at least basic good manners, even if his use of slang is regrettable. That is a step better than Dr Burke had expected.

“Certainly. Detective Beckett has informed me that you might call, and given me permission to speak to you.”

“She said I could talk to you, too. I wouldn’t have called if she hadn’t.”

“I think it would be best if you attended here, so that we may have a conversation without external distractions.” Dr Burke can hear female tones in the background. From the repetition of Darling, where is my script, he surmises that the voice belongs to Mr Castle’s mother. Dr Burke cannot imagine that this distraction will assist with any discussion.

“Sure. When? Today? What’s your address?”

“I have a session available at three, if that will suit.”

“Yeah. That would be great. Where?”

Dr Burke gives the address, and Mr Castle rings off. This afternoon, Dr Burke thinks, will be interesting.
Say what you gotta say

Castle is well satisfied with an appointment with Dr Burke at three today. It’s rather earlier than he had expected. He is a little bemused by Dr Burke, however. Even on the phone his fussy, slightly pompous formality had come through, and Castle finds it very difficult to see how that meshes well with brisk, badass Beckett, for whom brusqueness is natural. Still, Dr Burke obviously has a great deal of intelligence and has, in a pretty short time, acquired a good deal of insight into Beckett. Castle resolves not to underestimate him. Dr Burke is very unlikely to be a fool, or indeed to be fooled. He makes himself a nice lunch and writes quite steadily until it’s time to go.

Dr Burke, unusually, is not entirely certain of the path he wishes to follow. He is not convinced that starting with inquiring into why Detective Beckett wishes him to talk to Mr Castle is appropriate, although he would very much appreciate some explanation. This is all highly irregular, as is practically everything to do with Detective Beckett’s therapy. It is quite disconcerting. However, he refuses to allow such minor difficulties as her inability to talk and the presence of celebrities to prevent him treating her effectively. If talking to Mr Castle will assist, then talk to Mr Castle he will, as often as required.

Mr Castle is on time. Dr Burke is relieved. Casual rudeness is one of his bêtes noires.

“Good afternoon,” he says formally.

“Hey,” Mr Castle responds.

Castle looks at Dr Burke, and his consulting room, with considerable and not at all concealed interest. Beckett’s shrink is a man of around Castle’s own height, coffee-skinned and with sharp, intelligent eyes. His expression is cool and calm. The room is soothingly blue and designed to relax the mind; Dr Burke’s voice is even, cool and calming. It’s all exactly how Castle would have written a psychiatrist, although he wouldn’t have included the formality or, necessarily, the reasonably impressive physique.

His surroundings and demeanour are far too much like a psychiatrist ought to be, in fact.

Castle fixes Dr Burke with a much more speculative, sardonic gaze. He can’t imagine that Beckett would stick with a standard shrink for more than ten minutes. Clearly Dr Burke has much more to him than is apparent at first glance. Dr Burke meets his gaze and raises it by a few degrees. Ah. Whether Beckett knew it or not, (Castle strongly suspects not, because he also strongly suspects that Dr Burke is as clever as Beckett and furthermore that Beckett didn’t want a shrink who might well be as clever as she) Dr Burke falls foursquare into the category of big/tough. Mentally tough.

“Mr Castle,” Dr Burke says, taking a deep blue armchair and gesturing Castle to do the same, “please explain your involvement in this situation, from the beginning of your acquaintance with Detective Beckett.”

“She arrested me,” Castle says happily. “Of course I’d been arrested before” – he looks sheepish – “for – er – youthful misdemeanours” – Dr Burke raises his eyebrows, but declines to ask further – “but not by someone like that. She was inspiring. She hauled me into the Twelfth Precinct, interrogated me, and then decided it wasn’t me after all.” He takes a breath. “Anyway. I needed a new character and she was it. So I got myself into the Twelfth to shadow her, about September.”

So far, so congruent with Detective Beckett’s story. Mr Castle has paused. Some encouragement is required. “You appear to me to be in a romantic relationship with Detective Beckett. How did this eventuate?"

Castle wriggles. “Um…” Dr Burke pins him in his chair with a focused look. “Around about mid-November, I finally convinced her to come out for a drink. Then I found out it was her birthday. And she wasn’t doing anything at all. No cake, no celebration, no nothing. It didn’t seem right.”

Dr Burke adds this piece of information to his general impression of Detective Beckett’s life, arriving at the conclusion that she had entirely opted out of anything that might normally have been an opportunity for celebration.

“Anyway. We – er – got together.” Mr Castle sits back in the chair and stops. Dr Burke deduces that a considerable volume of explanation has been omitted.

“Mm. I see. And how did you find out about her father’s alcoholism?” How odd. Mr Castle has quite definitely winced. “In detail, please. I cannot help Detective Beckett effectively if I do not understand the whole story.” Ah. The suggestion that this is necessary to Detective Beckett’s welfare has produced a reaction. That is clearly the driving force behind Mr Castle’s presence.

“She was a bit weird about Christmas. No tree, no celebration, no joy. I – er – interrupted her talking to Julia Berowitz.” Dr Burke, unlike Mr Castle, conceals his reaction. That cannot have gone well. “And then she was weird about Alexis, and wouldn’t come to my place, and Alexis didn’t notice anything but I did. We argued about it. So I did some research and found out about her mother. And then her dad rang her about going to Miami and I… I thought she was just brushing him off. She wasn’t. I worked out it was her dad who was the alcoholic and we – er – had another argument, and right in the middle of it he walked in.”

Dr Burke cannot conceal his reaction. “That must have been a difficult moment?” is all he says, however.

“You bet. It – er – wasn’t exactly my finest hour.” Dr Burke makes a small note, in order to return to this topic. Detective Beckett’s reactions might be extremely interesting. “He… he made it pretty clear that Beckett supported him all the time, all the way. Said she saved him. I didn’t exactly feel good after that. I went to apologise” – Dr Burke considers Detective Beckett and then concludes that Mr Castle is both very brave and very stupid – “and she told me that she couldn’t deal with my family. My daughter. So I left. I wasn’t going to carry on seeing someone who can’t cope with my family.”

“Your family is important to you.”

“Yes. Very. Mother brought me up on her own, Alexis’s mother left.”

Dr Burke sees why Detective Beckett wishes to be able to cope with Mr Castle’s family. Part of her reasoning is undoubtedly concerned with her own relationship with her father. Until now, however, it had not been entirely clear that Mr Castle and his family come as a unit. If she cannot deal with Mr Castle’s daughter, her relationship with Mr Castle will fail.

“Anyway. She meant it to push me away. It didn’t work. I wanted to go round and talk to her about it but Julia Berowitz rang Beckett to find her husband. So we picked him up from Central Park Precinct and then Beckett and I had another argument because I told her she needed to talk about it and she told me to get out or she’d put me in jail.”

“Did you?” Another evasion of a very important nexus. Another note is made.

“Yes. But then I went round later because I thought she really needed help and she was totally wasted. It meant she actually talked. About everyone leaning on her and there was no-one for her to lean on. She said she wanted to disappear, which was pretty worrying. She was crying because she didn’t take her dad’s calls, back when.”

That is interesting. Dr Burke would not have expected Detective Beckett to drink to excess. On the other hand, he is far more interested in her desire to disappear and the fact that very recently she was still exhibiting substantial guilt and unhappiness over leaving her father to solve his alcoholism himself. Much of his earlier thinking is confirmed. Detective Beckett has failed to deal with her feelings at any previous time. He further considers that Detective Beckett’s emotions around her father are unlikely to have been converted into disinterest following the events of three weeks ago. She is merely repressing them, once more.

“We managed to straighten things out.” Another evasion of the details of a discussion which ought to have been extremely difficult. Mr Castle is clearly not simply the happy-go-lucky playboy which Dr Burke had uncovered by means of a swift internet search. Detective Beckett is not precisely easy to persuade or manipulate. Not that Dr Burke would recommend the latter course. Still, it appears that Mr Castle has persuaded her to accept him as a romantic partner. Slightly frivolously, Dr Burke wonders whether he had hypnotised her. However, this is entirely irrelevant. Dr Burke is certainly not practising in the field of relationship counselling and is only interested in Mr Castle as he can provide information pertaining to Detective Beckett’s relationships with her father, Julia Berowitz, and potentially with Mr Castle’s family.

“Mr Castle, please describe your impressions of Julia Berowitz.”

“Thirties, blonde, quite pretty. She was tense. She wouldn’t listen to Beckett. Beckett tried to tell her that she needed help, and that she – Julia – couldn’t save her husband. Beckett was quite forceful about it, but Julia had that sort of stubbornness that weak people sometimes have: where they make a stand on exactly the wrong point. Anyway, she called Beckett again, but her husband was already in lock-up so Beckett wouldn’t go. She told me about it. Said Julia cried, like her dad used to cry. So I suggested that maybe her dad should talk to Julia. Julia might listen to him. We all agreed it was a good plan, so we all went along.”

Detective Beckett had, Dr Burke recalls, rather evaded any discussion of this particular event. Mr Castle has also avoided a substantial proportion of the detail.

“Julia was pretty stressed out. Her husband had gone walkabout – he was supposed to be there – and she had been cleaning. When she was making us coffee I noticed her nail polish was chipped, and she wasn’t the sort of woman to have chipped nails. It all smelt a little of cleaner: lemony.”

Detective Beckett must also have noticed that aroma, and the small signs. It would, Dr Burke deduces, have increased her discomfort from the point at which she entered the Berowitz apartment. Of course, Detective Beckett might not have realised the full effect of the situation in which she had placed herself.

“So Jim” – Dr Burke raises eyebrows in query – “Jim Beckett. Beckett’s father.” Mr Castle refers to him as Jim? That argues that they have more than minimal acquaintance. Another complication. Really, he should have allowed far longer for this discussion. Unlike Detective Beckett, Mr Castle appears to be prepared to talk, and, if correctly prompted, is likely to expand in detail on areas which Dr Burke considers important. For now, however, Dr Burke requires the broad outlines of the whole story.

“Jim introduced himself as an alcoholic. He told his story. Beckett wasn’t doing so well with it – though Julia wouldn’t have noticed – actually, I didn’t really think about it then, but that was weird too. She should have heard it all before, but it was as if she hadn’t. Or as if it hadn’t sunk in, the previous times. Then Jim suggested that Julia must have gone to pick her husband up from the tank, and Julia said that Beckett had got him for her. Jim wasn’t that happy with that, and Beckett was so wired I could have lit a lamp from her. And then Jim said that he only got dry because he wanted his daughter – Beckett – more than drink; and then Julia tried to say that her husband’s drinking was just a blip, and then Beckett lost it and told her that she couldn’t save him. And then she walked out.”

That rendition was certainly far more informative than Detective Beckett’s version. However, it is still materially incomplete.

“You said that Detective Beckett lost it. Do you mean that Detective Beckett lost her temper?”

“Not exactly. Not like she did” – Mr Castle stops.

“Mm?”

“Not like she did with Lanie. Dr Parrish, the ME. They’re friends. Were. Are. It’s a bit fragile but I think they’re fixed.”

Ah. Another point for later. Dr Burke allows that to pass, for now, merely making another small note. He observes, this time, that Mr Castle has noted his action.

“In what way did Detective Beckett lose her temper, then?”

“She told Julia some pretty harsh truth. It’s the angriest I’d seen her, up till then. Well, no, that’s not true. When we argued she was probably much angrier, but she was cold about it. This time she was more emotional. I thought she might cry, but Beckett doesn’t do that much.”

Or indeed at all, thinks Dr Burke rather cynically.

“Julia started to cry, and Jim was absolutely shocked that Beckett had gone, and I couldn’t leave Jim. I think it might have been the first time he’d seen Beckett upset since he got dry. Every other time I’d seen them together or she’d been talking to him she was really upbeat, whether it was true or not. This time she – well, like I said, I thought she was about to cry.”

“But you did not follow her?”

Mr Castle bridles. “I didn’t have a good choice,” he snaps. “If I went after Beckett then I was leaving Jim, who was already pretty upset, and God knows what he’d have done. When we did finally get out of there he went straight to his sponsor. I could see him cracking. I couldn’t let him fall. Beckett would never have recovered. She’d have blamed herself even more and never come out of the guilt. She’s carrying far too much guilt as it is. More would have killed her. I wanted to go after her, but I couldn’t leave Jim, and by the time I got him to his sponsor and got round to Beckett’s apartment she wouldn’t answer the door and wouldn’t answer the phone. She sent me one text to ask for space, and another asking about her dad. When I asked if she was okay she didn’t answer.”

“Hm. Mr Castle” – Dr Burke steeples his fingers beneath his chin, and begins to utilise Detective Beckett’s permission to speak freely with Mr Castle – “if I were to inform you that Detective Beckett described that same evening as being one where she was tired, she informed you that she wished for a quiet evening, and that since you had told her that her father was” – Castle can hear the quotes – “fine, she was unworried and did not see you, what would you say?”

“Bullshit. Complete and utter bullshit,” Mr Castle ejects from behind his teeth. He looks extremely annoyed. “She wasn’t fine at all. She was so not fine that she was ill the next morning and got sent home from the precinct; and she had a row with her father.”
At last, someone who will tell Dr Burke the unvarnished truth. Dr Burke sighs in considerable, and entirely unfeigned, relief. Mr Castle’s annoyance has dissipated, to be replaced by a look of resignation, without any surprise.

“When did Beckett tell you that?” he asks.

“Just over three weeks ago.”

Enlightenment descends over Mr Castle’s features.

“Is the timing significant, Mr Castle?”

“Yeah. Beckett didn’t tell me, but Jim called me, absolutely broken up. He’d told Beckett that seeing us for dinner – they came to dinner at my loft, though I still don’t know how Jim managed that because I’m sure I never actually invited him but somehow it was arranged” – Mr Castle stops, and appears to take time to reorder his thoughts, which are somewhat chaotically emerging – “anyway, Jim told Beckett that being at mine was just like being part of a family again. And that happened Sunday three weeks ago, so I guess she saw you on Tuesday afterwards and it was all completely locked down and pointless, yeah?”

Dr Burke regards Mr Castle with a certain degree of admiration. It appears that Mr Castle might have a functioning brain, which is not something that Dr Burke has previously associated with the concept of celebrity thriller writers.

“Yes. Exactly so.”

“He couldn’t really have said anything worse. He really couldn’t. But he doesn’t know why it went so wrong, because Beckett’s never actually told him what he was like, and now she isn’t taking his calls and he’s devastated. If that were Alexis… I’m not sure I’d be sober, but he still is.”

Mr Castle pauses, and draws breath, slowly. “Beckett only came to therapy at all because her Captain benched her and she wanted not to upset her father by telling him that their relationship was all sorts of wrong because she hadn’t sorted herself out and didn’t think she’d forgiven him. She didn’t want to come. She felt she’d done it all before. So she found you” – he blinks – “and I have to say you are exactly not what I’d expected” – Dr Burke blinks in his turn – “and just before the third session her dad pulled the rug from under her. She was really upset after it. And since then all she’s said is that she wants to carry on so she can do the job and – er – cope with my family. She hadn’t mentioned her dad at all until yesterday.”

“Detective Beckett had not? And she has not spoken to him since? She was, naturally and understandably, very upset.”

“She hasn’t spoken to him. He keeps calling her.” Mr Castle looks mildly embarrassed. “I’ve spoken to him. He called me, a couple of times, and then I told him she’s okay. I lied to him, flat out. He needs to stay sober so I lied so he would. It’s not ideal, but there didn’t seem to be any good choices at all.”

“Mm.” Dr Burke flicks a glance at his watch. They are running out of time. “Mr Castle, I have a patient at four. I consider that it would be extremely valuable to continue this conversation.” He brings up his schedule. “Are you free at six? If not, are you free tomorrow, between ten and eleven? I have no patients at either time.”

“Whenever. I don’t really have a fixed schedule. I can come back at six.”

“That would be helpful.” Dr Burke smiles at Mr Castle for the first time. “I consider that your input will be most helpful in assisting Detective Beckett.”

“She wants me to talk to her dad, you know.”

“Really? Let us discuss that, too.” Dr Burke’s smile turns almost mischievous. “You have chosen a difficult path, Mr Castle. Let us see if we can make it somewhat easier.”

Castle departs, considerably comforted by Dr Burke. Fussy and formal he may be, but Castle is completely convinced that he is the right shrink for Beckett. He won’t let her get away with evasions, avoidance and downright lies. He doesn’t want to go all the way back to the loft, so he finds a coffee bar, orders a small barrel of coffee and some cake, and then amuses himself in observing the people around him and concocting backstories for them.
This is the story so far

Dr Burke had managed to escort Mr Castle out in good time before his next patient arrives. This efficiency allows him a few moments to contemplate what he has learned. He starts with Mr Castle himself. He is not what Dr Burke had expected. It is possible that he is quite intelligent. Not, of course, as intelligent as Dr Burke, whose doctoral thesis is still a reference work. However, he appears to be both intelligent and wholly devoted to ensuring that Detective Beckett is made better. Or, more succinctly, devoted to Detective Beckett.

Also surprisingly for a completely untrained person, (so Dr Burke assumes) Mr Castle has so far been remarkably accurate in his deductions as to Detective Beckett’s state of mind. Much more importantly, he is prepared to tell the truth, and is in a position to fill in the areas which have been subject to Detective Beckett’s evasions. Finally, there will be some progress in this matter.

Dr Burke considers his notes and Mr Castle’s words. One: what has caused Detective Beckett to allow Mr Castle to speak to him, and he to speak to Mr Castle, completely openly. Two: the argument about Detective Beckett’s father’s alcoholism and Mr Castle’s views of Detective Beckett’s reactions. Three: how, and far more importantly why, Mr Castle had decided that Detective Beckett was not to be permitted to evade him, and what his views of her reasoning were. Four: Detective Beckett’s commentary whilst under the influence of alcohol. Five: Dr Lanie Parrish. Six: (he looks at the list almost despairingly) Detective Beckett’s relentlessly upbeat behaviour with her father. Seven: Detective Beckett’s request that Mr Castle speaks with her father. And eight, purely for his own information, why did Mr Castle believe that he, Dr Burke, is not what he would have expected?

Dr Burke sighs heavily, and turns to the much simpler matter of his present patient, who exhibits signs of paranoia and agoraphobia.

Castle finishes his cake, and discovers that he would far rather consider Dr Burke, including in the light of a potential character, than the mass of regular Manhattanites around him. Dr Burke is a very interesting character, now that Castle’s out of his territory and not having to focus on the discussion. He absolutely was not what Castle expected. He’s also hiding considerable intelligence, albeit with a slightly peppery temper and a monumental dose of self-satisfaction, under the fussy formality and the treatment room which is just what the patient would expect to see. Dr Burke, in fact, is running the psychiatrist’s equivalent of a con. He is providing a persona and situation that lulls the poor patient into thinking they’ve walked into a classic psych session, as seen on a hundred TV shows. By the time that they’ve walked out, undoubtedly cured, they’re too turned inside out to realise what happened.

On the other hand, Beckett’s clearly had a good go at snowing Dr Burke, and while he’s realised it, it’s not entirely clear which of them is winning. Castle will put a dollar on Dr Burke, but only because Beckett has decided that she wants fixed. On the other hand, he’ll put his other dollar on Beckett proving Dr Burke wrong about Jim, because that’s coming straight from her excellent detective instincts. Hmmmm. He can’t lose.

He starts to scribble in his notebook. Yet another character is forming in his head. He orders more coffee and loses himself till his phone pings with the reminder that he needs to return to Dr Burke’s office. (He sets those whenever he needs to be somewhere and is about to waste some time. If not, it can get embarrassing if he gets lost in his head while writing. He’s been late for more than a few appointments like that.)

When he returns to Dr Burke’s office the pretty receptionist asks him to wait in a side room. Castle thinks nothing of it, fails to appreciate the receptionist’s once-over of his appearance because he doesn’t actually realise she’s doing it, and happily returns to his scribbling without the slightest resentment.

“I apologise for the delay, Mr Castle. My prior patient required a little extra time.”

“No problem. Did you want to start where we left off?”

“No, I think not. I have assembled some questions arising from our earlier conversation, and I should like to address some of these.” Dr Burke steeps his fingers, and Castle has a hard time not copying him. “I would like to start in the middle, as it were. I am sure that Detective Beckett has told you about her initial experiences with her father, whilst he was inebriated, but although I will be seeking your views of that I would prefer to start with a little more detail on your discovery of her father’s alcoholism and how Detective Beckett reacted to that discovery, as well as your thoughts as to the manner of her reactions at the time during which she was reacting. I appreciate that you have said that this was not” – again the quotation marks are tangible – “your finest hour, however, if you can bring yourself to discuss it I should be very grateful.”

Castle winces. “Why?” he asks, a little irritably. “I thought we were discussing Beckett, not me.”

“We are. However, you have observed her reactions with clarity, and so I wish to know how she reacted both to your discovery and to your impressions at the time, albeit that you are aware that these were mistaken. In such a way I may analyse her coping mechanisms and her concealment strategies.”

“Okay. That makes sense.” Castle gathers breath and logical thought, without hurrying. “So first, it was the Berowitzes. Beckett nailed him as an alcoholic right off the bat, but when I asked why she said that when she was in uniform she’d seen lots of it, which was pretty plausible. But then she practically vomited when I took her mince pies with brandy butter. Now, I guess that she must have had them one Christmas with her father when he was still drinking, but then she blamed it on a stomach bug. She was lying. She said so, later, and said sorry. She said she hadn’t wanted to upset me.”

“Mm,” Dr Burke interjects. “She did not want to upset you? Did Detective Beckett take some action that she would have preferred not to take in order not to upset you on any other occasion?”

“She came to dinner. Three times, actually. The first time I thought something was wrong, but she said she was tired – and she likely was, because there had been so many cases and she works far too many hours – and Alexis didn’t think there was anything wrong so I just let it go. But I was sure she hadn’t wanted to come to the loft, but she did. Then the second time it was clear that she was off. I was annoyed with her because she wouldn’t come to mine. Everything was at hers, and it felt like she was avoiding the loft, like she didn’t want to be part of anything. But she really, really didn’t want to be there, and though Alexis still didn’t notice anything I certainly did.” He stops. He doesn’t like the memory of the few moments following that. “We argued, and she walked out, but she didn’t explain anything about why she wasn’t happy about coming to the loft. And then the third time was when Jim finagled me into a family dinner at mine. But Beckett came because she didn’t want to upset…her…dad – oh. That’s what you mean, isn’t it? A pattern of doing things she might not want to in order not to show that she’s upset.”

“Or in order not to upset those she might care for. It is quite likely that it might be for both reasons.
Please carry on.”

“It all added up, eventually, to her knowing about it personally, but I can’t – oh, I forgot. The way she was talking to Julia Berowitz.”
“What happened?”

“I think that when we went to see them to tell them we’d caught the killer, or maybe even when we went to tell them their son had been murdered, Beckett gave Julia her card. Anyway. Julia called Beckett just after Christmas” –

“Do you remember the date?”

“Um… oh yes. The 10th of January, because Beckett was off the day before. I found out later that was the day her mother had been killed. The 9th. So Beckett went out to meet Julia. She wouldn’t tell me why, and I was annoyed because she wouldn’t let me shadow her, so I – er – followed her and – er – butted in. She was really angry, which was fair enough, but the point is that she was telling Julia that it would bring her down too. I didn’t work it out for a while, but she – Beckett – meant that she’d been there.”

“Tell me about the interactions with Julia.”

“I think” – Castle looks a little guilty and embarrassed - “that Julia battened off Beckett. Fed off her strength. Beckett saw her the time I just mentioned, but after that she did it again, and then Julia called her because her husband had gone missing, and Beckett just went. Spent – I think – half the evening searching, because I called her and she thought I was her takeout pizza arriving, and then went to Central Park Precinct to get him – I went too – and take him home. It was…” he searches for a word “…difficult. The desk sergeant knew her and her dad, but she wasn’t talking about her father. So they brought Mr Berowitz up and he was a mess. Beckett never turned a hair, but the cops treated her like she was a primed grenade. She didn’t let a thing show. No emotion, nothing. Then we took him home. I think Beckett forgot I was there, when she got him in. She kept telling Julia that she needed help. Then she said you can only save yourself. And then she got really furious with me when I said that it was just like she used to have to do. She said I’d use it in my books, but I wouldn’t, by then. She was desperate to protect him. Make sure nobody knew. She spends – spent – all her time protecting him.”

“Let us leave Julia for a moment. Is it your impression that Detective Beckett’s father needs her protection?”

Castle pauses. “No. Not nearly as much as she thinks he does, anyway. He’s a lot tougher than she realises, and a lot braver and stronger. He told me his story, briefly.”

“But Detective Beckett has never told him the truth of what he did or said when intoxicated.”

“No. But I don’t think she can face the truth of what she did either. She can’t get over walking away.”

“That was also my impression. Detective Beckett still appears to feel guilt over her actions.”

Castle laughs, shortly and without any humour at all. “That would be a slight understatement. She’s drowning in guilt.”

“And that, of course, is why she was helping Julia, and why she has been so over-protective of her father.” Dr Burke regards Castle with a sharp-edged glance. “Was her father aware of her reasons?”

“No. He was absolutely horrified when he started to realise. He didn’t realise anything was wrong until after Beckett walked out of Julia’s, but then I think he got on Beckett’s case a bit, which he should have known was a really bad idea, and then he went and told her he wanted to be part of my family.”
“Yes. Detective Beckett mentioned that. How did her father actually mean that sentence to be interpreted?”

Castle blushes. “Er-um… I think he was hoping that we’d be – um-er – permanent.”

“I see.”

Castle blushes some more.

“To summarise, then, Detective Beckett still feels unhappy and guilty about leaving her father, was trying to deal with it by protecting him from any worry or danger, was unwilling to upset him by showing him that she might be upset or uncomfortable, and has informed you that she was tired of having to bear the weight of everyone around her.” Dr Burke pauses. “And she applied the same reluctance to upset her father to you.”

“Yes… but…”

“Mm?”

“But then when she lost her temper she did her absolute best to hurt me as much as possible and to make sure I never came near her again.”

“Which she has now done with her father.”

“Oh,” Castle says weakly. A thought occurs to him. “She did it to Lanie, too.”

“Mm?”

“Yes. Lanie got on Beckett’s case big-time and wouldn’t step back. Though Lanie was pretty blunt and rude. She told Beckett she was – er – all fucked-up” –

“In those words?”

“Yeah. Word for word. Beckett didn’t like it and when Lanie turned up at the door Beckett lost her temper spectacularly. Lanie scuttled off as fast as her feet would carry her and Beckett didn’t say a word to her until we intervened. Even that was pretty fraught, though I think they’re okay now.”

“Do you see the pattern here, Mr Castle?”

Castle nods. “She lets it all build up till it’s too much and then it explodes. And then she does her best to make sure that whoever’s hurt her never gets the chance ever again.”

“Indeed. Which makes me wonder, Mr Castle, why she made an exception for you.” Dr Burke regards Mr Castle carefully. “And why you have continued to associate with Detective Beckett. After all, she seems to have treated you with considerable cruelty. She would not go to your apartment, she did not wish to be a part of your family, and she informed you flatly that she could not cope with your family. You, conversely, treated her with equivalent cruelty. You did not believe that she was supporting her father, and I strongly suspect that you said so in the course of the argument which her father interrupted. That misconception must have hurt her as much as she hurt you. I surmise that you have had a number of arguments, although I also expect that both of you are equally responsible.” Castle winces. “Yet you appear to be together, you appear to care deeply for Detective Beckett, and she has made it transparently clear that she wishes to be able to deal with your family, which implies very strongly that she has similar feelings.”

Castle squirms uncomfortably. The idea that Beckett cares is very pleasant. The scalpel-sharp dissection of their failings is not.

“So, Mr Castle, would you like to explain why you did not simply cease to associate with Detective Beckett?”

Castle feels unpleasantly as if he is being interrogated.

“What has that got to do with anything? I didn’t come here for relationship counselling.”

“How fortunate,” Dr Burke says dryly. “I am not offering it. I am, however, interested in how you managed to persuade Detective Beckett to change her mind. It might enable me to do the same.” He smiles. “I do not imagine it was, or will be, easy.”

Castle grins back at him. “Not exactly,” he says, equally dryly. “After she was so uncomfortable at the loft, we argued, she misunderstood me, though I get why, now, and she walked out. Well, I wasn’t going to go running after her. But she didn’t call, and I didn’t call her. Until a new body dropped and she had to call me. So I went. I needed to see how it all worked so I had it right for the story.”

“Mm?” Dr Burke hums, questioningly.

“I always do the detailed research. Follow someone who actually does it. That way I get the details right.”

“I see.” How very… dedicated. Maybe he should try one of Mr Castle’s books.

“Beckett wasn’t particularly pleased. But she just stayed neutral. She stopped ME Perlmutter being his usual snide self. Ryan said she’d been a bit miserable, though. And then I worked out that her dad was the alcoholic, but I knew she’d taken the Christmas Day shift, so I thought that she didn’t care about him, which wound me up because – I worked out later – my family’s everything to me and we do proper family Christmas. Beckett doesn’t do Christmas, because of her dad. Jim doesn’t know that, either. So I was pretty unimpressed by the whole thing, and I was only staying around because she was supposed to let me shadow her properly and I had to know for the book. So I went round to tell her so.”

Dr Burke revises his view of Mr Castle from brave but stupid to suicidal.

“We had a really bad row. She said I was only following her because of the books and I lost my temper” –

“But you were, were you not?” Mr Castle looks blankly at him. “You have just said so.”

“Er…”

“Or that is what you told yourself, at the time. So you lost your temper.”

“Yes. She said I’d ditched her, and wouldn’t let me explain, and I said she couldn’t bear my family, and then” – he winces – “I said she didn’t look after hers. And then she was about to throw me out and Jim walked into the middle of it. He thought we were friends. He said enough that I realised that I’d got it all wrong. Not that Beckett had told me the truth.”

“In the same way, in fact, as she has not told her father the truth about the manner in which he hurt her. This is profoundly interesting.”

Castle stops dead. “What?”
“Mr Castle, I have learned more about Detective Beckett in the hour and a half in which you have been here than in her three weeks of therapy. Everything I have heard about her reactions to you, and to Dr Parrish, has mirrored the way in which she has reacted to her father. It confirms me in my view that she must deal with her father before she will be able to deal with anything else.” He stops, and steepled his fingers. “I am still very interested in how you persuaded her to reassociate with you. Please continue.”

“Well, after Jim had finished I was shell-shocked, and I just went home. Even though I was there in the precinct, I hardly saw her. She paired up with Espo” – Dr Burke raises an eyebrow – “Detective Esposito – and Detective Ryan stuck with me. No-one explained. I couldn’t get a chance to apologise, and it just got worse and worse. So at the end of the week I got Ryan to talk and he explained.”

“But Detective Beckett did not?”

“She wasn’t there. Ryan told me her dad was away, and her history, and that if her dad was away the Captain teamed her up with Esposito. Normally it’s Ryan and Espo together.”

“Why would that be necessary?”

“Ryan said that Espo was tough enough to make her stop. March her home.”

Dr Burke imagines this Detective Esposito must be constructed of tungsten steel, and has an errant vision of a RoboCop. Not, of course, that he has ever watched or read such a frivolous mass-appeal idea, but one does notice the advertising around oneself, however distasteful.

“She’s surrounded by tough guys. None of them except you make her talk.”

Dr Burke blinks. “Excuse me?”

“Well, I’m sure you weren’t what she wanted in a therapist, but you fit the pattern.”

“Please explain?”
“Beckett’s surrounded by big and/or tough men. The only girlfriend she’s got is Lanie, and that’s a bit shaky, like I said. I think it’s because that way she never gets asked to talk about anything.”

“Does she ever try to talk about any subject?”

“She sometimes talks to me. But that’s only when she’s really upset. Even then, she doesn’t say much. She only started doing that when I stopped asking questions. Any questions. Any time anyone does, she shuts down.”

Dr Burke nods, slowly. “However, she is talking to me.”

“Because she’s really upset and because she’s decided to fix this. Even if she isn’t deciding to fix all of it.”

Dr Burke decides, in the few minutes which remain, to ask the question which is perturbing him rather than return to the question of how Mr Castle persuaded Detective Beckett to interact with him.

“Mr Castle, given Detective Beckett’s discomfort with talking about her issues with anyone, which I must presume extends to anyone else discussing them, or her, especially given her reaction to the concept that you might have used her father in one of your books; please would you explain to me why Detective Beckett has instructed me to be open with you, and why you are here?”

How strange. Mr Castle does not like that question at all. He is quite clearly trying to find a way to avoid answering it. Dr Burke waits.

“You asked,” Mr Castle eventually says, resignedly. “You told Beckett that her father had been abusing her. I guess you must mean emotionally, since if someone physically abused Beckett – even at nineteen or twenty – I reckon she’d have ground them up like raw beef. She didn’t exactly take well to that idea. Actually, she was downright mad. So” – he hesitates – “she’s decided to prove you wrong.”

Dr Burke’s eyes widen. “Hm,” is all he emits, however. Detective Beckett has missed the subtlety that he had not, in fact, said that. He had said that her behaviour exhibited similarities. However, that is not relevant to Mr Castle at this time.

“And she’s enlisted me. But that worked out really well because she’s said I can talk to you and to her dad. I can do anything I need to. What I actually want to do is get Jim and Beckett in the same place, with you” – Dr Burke feels that his eye sockets may shortly fracture, if his eyes become any wider – “so that someone can clear this whole mess up properly. I can’t do it, but after today I’m pretty sure you can.”

“Oh,” Dr Burke mumbles. This is really wholly irregular. Most peculiar. On the other hand, he is not aware of any case where a psychiatrist has successfully treated alcohol induced trauma in this way. It would be a considerable feather in his professional cap. He collects himself. “And what might your honest view be?”

Mr Castle is again very uncomfortable. “I don’t know anything about it, except what I looked up earlier, which wasn’t really very coherent. But it’s possible. A lot of it sounded like Beckett, except she’s anything but a victim.”

“So. What do you intend to do?”
“Fix Beckett and Jim. Well. Try to.” Mr Castle looks directly at Dr Burke. “Are you going to help?”

“Of course. As I have already said, the only way in which Detective Beckett will recover is by resolving her issues with her father. I presume that you intend to speak to Mr Beckett in the near future?”

“Yeah. That’s not going to be any fun.”

“I strongly suggest that after you do that, you ensure that he speaks with his sponsor, preferably face to face.” Mr Castle acquires an air of I-had-already-thought-of that which Dr Burke appreciates. “I shall be at your disposal should you wish to discuss any part of this situation. The authority Detective Beckett has given will continue until she revokes it.”

“Thanks. I expect we’ll be talking soon.”

“We will be. I still wish to know how you and Detective Beckett reassociated, but I have an appointment this evening. We will reconvene in the near future, although I suggest that you make an appointment for a time after you have met with Mr Beckett. Your help is welcome, Mr Castle. I wish you good fortune with Mr Beckett.”

Mr Castle takes his leave, and Dr Burke sighs. To cut the Gordian Knot may be the only way forward, but it is quite likely, and indeed almost certain, that there will be a number of highly emotional scenes in the course of resolution.

Castle exits Dr Burke’s office with a feeling of some satisfaction that at last there might be a way through this mess that doesn’t involve him getting shot, mutilated or having a full-scale nervous breakdown. It’s faintly possible that he might get Beckett through this mess without her having a full-scale breakdown too, now. Dr Burke seems to have her number, and more importantly had struck Castle as emphatically not being the sort of person who will let her slide through this without actually opening up.

Unfortunately his satisfaction is short-lived. He will have to talk to Jim. He doesn’t actually want to talk to Jim right now, because he wants to digest his meetings with Dr Burke and the conclusions that Dr Burke had rapidly drawn. He turns towards home, at which point his phone rings.

“Rick Castle,” he says relatively cheerfully.

“Castle?”

“You.”

It occurs to Castle that Beckett is not bouncing happily. “What’s up?”

“I just want to find out how you got on with everything today,” she says, in a good facsimile of normal briskness. Castle is not deceived.

“Okay,” he says. “I’m not far away. Will you put the kettle on?” he entices. “I’ve not had any coffee for hours. If I don’t get some soon, I might fall asleep on you.”

“I’m not a pillow.”
“Oh, I don’t know. Some bits of you are very pillowy” –

“Stop that thought right there.”

“Really? I thought you liked it when I plumped up your pi” –

“Shut up. Now.”

Castle smiles widely to himself, startling a passing panhandler, as he cuts the call. Back to Beckett-normal snark, at least until he gets there and discovers what’s really going on. He’s sure that she will want to know every last detail of his discussion with Dr Burke, but he intends to censor that slightly. It’s not going to be good for his health for Beckett to discover that Dr Burke knows her game plan. Anyway, since something unspecified isn’t entirely right, it’s quite possible that Beckett can be distracted from her pursuit of Dr Burke’s head on a stick into being Kat. In fact… mmmm. Yes. Indeed. Distraction. In a very particular fashion, which he spends the short cab journey developing. How lucky that it is a short journey.

When Beckett opens the door, Castle doesn’t bother with pleasantries. He shoves it shut behind him, catches Beckett before she can take more than a half-step towards the kitchen, and smoothly draws her into him to bend and kiss her with considerable authority and only a modicum of softness: owning her mouth and taking everything he wants. She softens and curves under the demands of his hands that she be closer, pressed into him and knowing how much he wants her; under the demands of his mouth that she simply give up and give in to him. And she does. His hands are untucking her shirt, sliding up over smooth skin: forceful pressure to keep her against his body, caged in his clasp. She flows into the mould of his frame, melting under his possession, and finally mews softly into his kiss.

When he hears the soft noise that means she’s definitely Kat-not-fretful-Beckett Castle relaxes his grip just enough to hoist her up and walk them over to the couch where he can sit her down and stroke her into soft compliance with his assertive, possessive touch. Gradually he shifts his movements to delve into the knots in her back and untwist the stress nodules in her muscles: she pushes back into his strong fingers and eases down, left lax in his lap. In all this time neither of them has said a word. Castle kisses Beckett-now-destressed-Kat again, still assertive, but no longer the controlled possessive passion of moments ago, now gentler.

“Hello,” he says suavely.

“Hey.” She wriggles into a comfortably snuggled-in position and rests her head on his shoulder.

“That better?”

“Mm,” she assents, and a hand creeps up round his neck.

“Wanna talk now?”

“Mm,” but she doesn’t say anything more, for a moment. “I just can’t get past it. Every time I tried to think about something else it crept back in. He’s wrong.”

And yet it’s eating at her mind, Castle notes. If she were that sure Dr Burke was wrong she’d have dismissed it without a thought. Even Beckett secretly thinks Dr Burke is right, or at least partially right.

“You need a nice new messy murder.”

“You shouldn’t wish people dead, Castle,” she chides gently.
“It would still take your mind off it.”

“Yeah…” she sighs.

“I could take your mind off it,” he murmurs deeply, and traces small circles at her waist, under her untucked shirt. Very unkindly, she bats at his fingers.

“What did you manage today?”

“I wrote two whole chapters,” Castle says provocingly.

“You know what I mean. Did you persuade Dad to see Dr Burke?”

“Not yet. But I went to see Dr Burke. He wasn’t what I expected.”

“And?”

“He’ll see Jim.” Castle doesn’t mention that Dr Burke will see Jim with Beckett. That might be part of a second or third meeting. Since Beckett isn’t grilling him about the meeting, he’s not going to spill the beans, either. He has no confidence that this will last.

“Great. Thanks. Does Dad know?”

“No. I’ll call him tomorrow. I’ll see if I can meet him after work.”

“Will you come round after?”

“Only if it’s not too late. Otherwise I’ll call, and I’ll be round on Friday anyway.”

Castle thinks that, strangely, it might be good for Beckett if he says he won’t come round tomorrow. That way, she might realise that he’s perfectly able to say no if he wants to, or needs to. She needs him, he realises, to be clear about his boundaries… oh. Because she never set any with her father, and never set any with Julia till Montgomery set them for her backed up with threats of suspension… and she doesn’t believe that she isn’t asking too much and he’ll resent it silently rather than simply say a breezy no, not today, Beckett. Okay. And, helpfully, she’s not tensed up. She’s snuggled back into his shoulder and is nicely wrapped around him. He wonders idly if a Beckett-scarf would suit him. Unfortunately that leads him rapidly to thinking of several parts of Beckett which could be wrapped around his neck – in a very good way – which leads her to realise that he’s – er – springing into life, and then she wiggles against him in a come-hither fashion and shortly after that he’s devouring her mouth.

Beckett’s couch, however comfortable, is probably not the place for this. Which thought is possibly a bit late when his mouth is otherwise occupied and his hands are busily undoing her buttons so that his mouth can be occupied all over her, as her hands are wickedly occupied all over him oh fuck don’t do that Beckett!

Enough. He executes a manoeuvre that only his thrice weekly gym sessions and his overwhelming desire to have Beckett somewhere he can ravish her thoroughly allow him to manage, and drops her flat on her back on her bed. She is not co-operating. She’s supposed to let him retain enough brain function and physical control to make her feel very, very good; and she isn’t. She’s evil. If he doesn’t hang on to her hands this will end shortly, messily and not well. He’s supposed to be smooth, suave and sophisticated, and she likes him assertive, possessive and forceful – and she’s destroying him stop that Beckett!

She’s giggling. Giggling! No. He will not be giggled at. He wrenches her button-down up her arms and traps them together in the sleeves, over her head. This reveals a rather pretty cream bra and, now that she is not driving him insane and he can remove her pants, matching very brief panties, their centre somewhat darker than the bra. The giggle mutates to a smirking purr as she tugs against his grip.

“Got you,” he growls. “Think you can pull that trick? No way. You’ve done enough mischief for one evening.” She flexes, and the wordless purr drips desire. “Let’s find out what you like today.”

“I like you,” she drawls, and flexes again, not really trying to break his grip, more to test his hold.

“That’s good. I like you too. Today, I like you all stretched out and purring when I stroke you.” He runs a finger lightly straight down her centre from neck to just above her core. “I like this pretty bra, too. Especially the lacy bits.” He slides the very tip of his finger over the lace. The lace is about an inch above where his fingers ought to be playing. Her noise could only loosely be described as a purr. More of a slightly irritated growl. She tugs harder against the encircling hand. Castle tugs back. Since he’s bigger and in a position to exert rather more leverage, he wins. He rubs over the lace again, straying slightly. The purr returns, only slightly edged with that’s better in a very do-as-you’re-told intonation, somehow managed without a single word. Castle has no intention of doing as he’s told. He’s also pretty damn certain from Beckett’s darkened eyes that she knows this, and is perfectly happy with it. Of course, the note of satisfaction in her purring helps, too.

“I like the contents, too.” He occupies his mouth with the contents, nudging the fabric out of the way. The satisfaction quotient in her noises increases. Unfortunately, Castle has made the rookie mistake of letting go of her hands. Beckett-nearly-Kat has wriggled out of the shirt sleeves which were keeping her from wreaking havoc and is endeavouring to prove that ears can be used for steering. “Stop that, Beckett.”

“Make me,” she snickers.

She wants to play that game? Okay then. He stops suckling, which is unpopular, and very swiftly detaches her far-too-clever hands from his ears, only making pained noises once. Having caught her hands, though, he now has a problem: he can’t do what he wants, either with hands or mouth, if he lets go, because she’s made it very clear that she’s going to be mischievously playful in any way she sees fit in order to try to tease him into pleading for her to stop. But if she wants him to make her stop… this is a step further than smooth assertion. He pauses.

“You sure?”

She looks up at him, still mostly clothed, looming over her – and trust blooms in her eyes. “I’m sure,” she says softly.

And then she takes unfair and instant advantage of his stunned shock and wrestles him flat on his back on the bed as if she were sparring on the mats and while he’s still trying to recover breath strips his shirt and then t-shirt and leaves his arms tangled in both garments. While he’s trying to extricate himself, she finishes denuding him and acquires a ferally predatory expression as she regards the picture before her.

“Mmm,” she emits. “Verrry prrrrrrrrettty.” She drags the words over her tongue, rolling the Rs lasciviously. Castle redoubles his efforts to escape, before she traps him again. He hasn’t quite succeeded when she starts to amuse herself. Fortunately, she doesn’t head straight southward. She starts with his pecs, and draws some sensual squiggles with her nails and then with her tongue. Then she nips a little: sharp stings followed by a soothing slip of her mouth. Castle makes a noise of mingled delight, desire and displeasure, and tries much harder to untangle his wrists before Beckett can reduce him to an incoherent, incapable puddle on the pillows. He has no intention of being her plaything, delightful as it might be, nor of being exhausted and emptied. It’s been an interesting, but difficult, day, and he needs Beckett as much as she needs him. He needs, rather badly, to be allowed to take her beautiful body, to be allowed to soothe her and ease her and so doing, soothe and ease himself. And she’s told him where tonight’s limits lie.

On that thought, he finally frees his hands. He hauls her up from her wicked trail southward and flips her on to her back, stretching her out again, returning her hands to above her head and holding them there, propped up on his elbow to peruse the long, lithe lines of her legs, the hills and valleys of her hips, her chest, the plains of her stomach. His gaze is hot, hard; and she flexes in his grip again, displaying the effects without the slightest embarrassment.

“Like what you see?”

“Mmm. Yes. Very pretty. Even prettier if I do this,” and he peels away her bra, slowly and with firm strokes over the naked skin revealed. “But you stopped me, earlier.” She smirks. He pins her with that same hot hard gaze. “So now I’ll stop you.”

She smirks more wickedly. “You can try. Catch me if you can.” She bends and snaps her wrists from his grip – and then discovers that while she’s been doing that, Castle – who is not that stupid and had been expecting her to try that any time in the previous five minutes – has trapped her with his other arm around her waist and has just slid one thick thigh between hers.

“Try? No, no. I don’t try. I succeed.” He takes full advantage of the size difference and some sixty pounds in weight, and transfers all his bulk to be above her. “Now what?” He takes one slim hand in each of his far bigger ones, brings them together and catches them into one firm clasp. She lifts her head and licks a wet line over his chest where it’s above her mouth. Castle groans deeply, but is not deterred. “I’ve caught you. So that means I can stop you stopping me.” His free hand threads his shirt through the spindles of the headboard: he leans down and kisses her deeply till she’s eliciting little moans and she’s not paying any attention to the cotton wrapping round her wrists until he tugs it tight enough to hold her for – oh, no more than a second or two if she wanted to escape. It’s an illusion of assertion, a daydream of desire, a smokescreen for seduction.

And in her eyes all he sees is heat and trust and something more than partners, and he hopes she sees the same in his.

He kisses her again, and starts to move downward.
Castle kisses gently across Beckett’s gorgeously naked torso and pays slow and detailed attention to the proud nipples. She fits easily in his hands, neat and perfect and designed by some deity to match him exactly. She pushes up and he draws her into his mouth, gentle teeth and hard suction and she starts to breathe harder, brings one leg up around tight him to encourage him to press against her, but without arms she can’t quite exert the same directional control she was trying earlier. Castle’s ears are very glad of it, even though the cotton of his shirt is loosely tied and wouldn’t stop her doing anything. It’s all in her head. He has no objection to a little bondage play if that’s what Beckett wants, but he doesn’t need it.

He plays for longer with those beautiful, edible breasts, eliciting happy, sexy noises, gasps and occasional pants of Castle, again! Gradually he slides down her body, hearing the change in the cadence of her breathing as he approaches the jut of her hips, sketching a careful path which promises much… and then bypasses her soaked core to kiss and nibble down her leg to her ankle and then kiss and nibble back up the other leg. This results, very smoothly, in Castle being perfectly settled in the vee of her legs and Beckett devoid of words that aren’t approximating to stop teasing please.

“I caught you,” he drawls lazily. “So I get to do what I like.” He traces the veins through the translucent skin, and she shivers. “I like teasing you. I like making you anticipate what I might do. I like you naked and wet because I’ve slowly peeled your clothes away and touched and kissed you all the time I did. I like you badass at work; or soft and purring under my hands; or when you’re lithe and sexy and making me groan. But I like you very best,” he purrs darkly from his vantage point between her legs, “when you’re writhing and desperate and so high up you’ll feel that you’ll never come down.”

He licks a wet stroke through her folds and she bucks against his firm hands on her hips, holding her for the attack of his mouth. Two more strokes and she’s trying to twist, moaning; a featherlight twining of his tongue over the knot of nerves and she’s whimpering because she’s got no breath left to make any louder noise; a furl of the tongue and a slow entry, then another twist and she’s desperate, just like he’d promised; sky-high and right on the edge and he holds her there, keeping her higher than she’s ever been and finally he can’t hold her any longer and she brings him up and into her and cries his name and comes hard around him, and he can too.

“I like you like this, too,” he murmurs in her ear. “Totally loved-up and cuddled up to me and in my arms, all soft and sleepy.” She makes an indeterminately happy little noise and nestles in more closely.

“Like it too,” she mumbles. “Safe.”

Castle nuzzles into her hair. “Got your back.”

“I know.” Her eyes are shut, her limbs lax. She’s on the verge of sleep.

“I gotta go.”

“I know.” He’s starting to detach himself when he realises she’s still speaking. “When ‘m fixed, I can come to the loft. You won’t go then.”

“No. I won’t go then,” he says softly, and kisses her.
All the way home he thinks about Beckett being there all night, and when he wakes in the morning.
All the way home he’s exhibiting a sloppy, sappy smile, warmth settled around his heart. He’s still wearing the same smile as he drops into sleep.

When he wakes, though, he remembers that he needs to talk to Jim. This rather deflates his sunny mood. However, Alexis is bright and happy at breakfast, and a little gentle probing reassures him that she is not feeling abandoned, neglected or otherwise ignored. All is well in his domestic world.

Over another cup of coffee, with no nice or interesting or gruesome (or any or all of the foregoing) murders to distract him, Castle tries to work out what he’s going to say to Jim. Somehow Beckett asked (well, told, but that certainly isn’t a good start) me to talk to you doesn’t seem to be the right beginning. He also doesn’t feel that it’s his place to say anything of the order of did you know what you actually did and said when you were drunk? That’s a discussion Beckett has to have.

I’m going to marry your daughter is extremely premature. As is as soon as she’s ready I want her to move in with me. It would probably be a really, really good idea to discuss those with Beckett first.
He daydreams about them for a while, though, until he tries to turn his mind to Jim again.

After far too much unproductive time Castle bites the bullet and simply calls.

“Jim Beckett.”

“Jim, it’s Rick. Beck-Kate’s okay,” he adds hurriedly. “Can I come see you after work?”

“Sure,” Jim says, and then, much more suspiciously, “why?”

“Beck-Kate wants me to talk to you.”

“Really?” Jim says, hope dancing in his voice. “But she won’t talk to me herself,” he says flatly, all hope draining.

“No. But if you’ll talk to me I think there’s a way to fix all this. Up to you.”

“Okay. Seven. My apartment. I’ll call you if I’m running late.”

“See you then.”

Castle breathes a sigh of relief that he’s got this underway and considers his options. He doesn’t much like any of them, but no-one else is trying to fix this so he needs to. He needs to have a coherent strategy for Jim. He needs to have another session with Dr Burke, after he’s seen Jim. He needs to show Beckett that he’s perfectly capable of setting any boundaries he needs to, so that however wrongly and dumbly she might think it, she’s clear that he isn’t saying how high when she says jump. She doesn’t ask for half enough, emotionally, and he can’t even give her that today: he has to show her that he can say no to her. At least he doesn’t have to talk to Lanie. Small mercies.

He sends Beckett a quick text: Seeing your dad tonight. Will be too late to come by after. I’ll call.

The bullpen is boring. The paperwork is boring. The cold cases are stone cold and boring. Espo and Ryan are thoroughly – well, bored. Montgomery is in his office, being Captainly, so they can’t get up to much mischief, and there are no new homicides. Beckett is paying no attention to anything outside a bubble about a foot around her desk, and they’re not sure she’s paying much attention to anything outside her skull. She’d been out of it yesterday too. Hadn’t even noticed them playing Hangman on her murder board. Well, not till they were four games in, anyway. Funny thing is, she looks as if she’s working on a case. Same inward turned gaze, same wrinkle of concentration between her brows. Every so often she scrawls something down. Every so often she makes a face as if she’s tasted something disgusting.

Ryan and Esposito exchange glances and simultaneously stand up and wander to Beckett’s tidy desk, flanking her. They look down, and try to decipher the ink-track roamings of the drunken spider which Beckett’s writing most resembles. Unfortunately, she realises they are there, and without any subtlety at all pulls a blank sheet over the writing.

“Private.”

“We’re bored,” they whine in tandem.

“How is this my problem?”

“You’re supposed to produce weird cases. We haven’t had one for weeks. Dumbass didn’t count. So tell us what you’re working on that’s keeping you so busy the last two days. You gotta share, Beckett.”

“I told you, it’s private. None of your business.” Her voice is harsh. The boys look at each other over her head. “Leave me to it.” She appears to take a breath and reset her attitude. “Give me till lunchtime. I could use some sparring practice, Espo.” He nods.

The boys, thankfully, disappear. Beckett is also thankful that her writing is, quite deliberately, completely illegible to anyone but herself. She can’t get Dr Burke’s words out of her head. Victims of emotional abuse. She is not a victim. She’s made herself a success. Her father might not love her – her face twists – but he didn’t abuse her. Dr Burke is wrong.

And yet. Since there are only cold cases to look at, there is nothing to stop her brain stewing over the session, and stew it does.

She’d only done what any normally sympathetic person had done. You don’t push on the sore points when you can see it’s hurting. No-one does. That’s not avoiding triggers, it’s basic courtesy. But, a nagging little voice says, but they don’t all get their hair cut and coloured, do they? She had loved having longer hair, had loved being able to style it when and how she wanted, had loved the way her boyfriends could stroke through it. And she’d cut it. She’d cut it because her mother had had a style that hadn’t been too different, if more controlled, more professional, more appropriate to a lawyer. She’d cut it because… because it set her father off. Because it set her father off down the path of why aren’t you her, I don’t want you, I want Johanna. Like a toddler crying for his mother, she thinks bitterly and cruelly, and instantly regrets it. She too cried for her mother, as passionately as a child. But she’d cut her hair. It’s still short now.

So maybe she’d over-reacted. She didn’t have to cut her hair. Her father would have stopped crying for her mom. Except he didn’t, did he? Stop shirking the truth. He didn’t, and he wouldn’t. It just stopped him thinking you were she. So why had she cut her hair? That same nagging little voice says so you didn’t set him off. She rams it down, and tries to focus on the cold case file, and for an hour or so she manages it. Then the voice returns.

What would you say to a woman who changed her appearance so she didn’t annoy her boyfriend, the little voice niggles. You know what you’d say, don’t you? It’s a warning sign. She tries to squash that, too. The cold case only works for half an hour, this time, and then the voice squiggles back to the front of her mind. You didn’t talk about anything that upset him. That’s another red flag.

He didn’t do it deliberately. He never meant to do it. And that’s the difference. That’s why Dr Burke is wrong. But he still did it. You still need to deal with it. Whether he meant it or not. She can’t deal with the nagging niggle any more. She shoves it away, notices the boys looking at her chicken-scratch scrawl, quite deliberately hides it and decides that a hard round of sparring at lunchtime is just what she needs to shake her brain up. She claws back her temper and suggests it.

By lunchtime Beckett is suffering from severe frustration at the cold case and severely irritated frustration at the naggings of the voice in the back of her head. She changes and stalks out on to the mats with the sole intention of taking Esposito apart. She doesn’t even contemplate a warm up round with Ryan: he’s no match for her at his best, and she wants to lose herself in the harsh physical exertion and total concentration that trying to beat Espo will provide.

Espo looks at the way Beckett has arrived on the mats and the posture she’s adopted and prepares for mayhem. He’s still perfectly confident that she won’t beat him – she never has – but she’s clearly out for blood. He wishes that Castle had been around this morning to take some of the edge off, because Beckett in this mood is a recipe for disaster. He doesn’t want anything broken because he can’t pull it back fast enough. It happened once before, a few years back, when Beckett was in this same mood, and he ended up with a sprained wrist and Beckett with a dislocated shoulder. Montgomery had wiped the floor with the pair of them. She’d never said why she’d been so pissed, but he’d assumed a bad break-up. The odd thing was, she’d been bruised already, as if she’d been sparring the day before, but it hadn’t been with him. He supposes it could have been with that mountain O’Leary. Still, she hadn’t been doing that this week. No bruises. If he gets out of this mostly alive he’ll get O’Leary over for a round or two. He could use a sparring partner he’s not sure he’ll beat.

Ryan looks at the pair on the mats and considers running for the MTs now. He also considers calling Castle. Then he remembers what the gang had done to him the last time he tried interfering for their own good, and decides not to call anyone. It doesn’t stop him having his phone close at hand.

For the first few minutes Ryan’s fears are not realised. It’s rough stuff, but Espo’s well in control and playing defensively. Beckett is a tornado of offence, but it’s nothing that Espo can’t manage. Then Beckett manages to connect, clearly much harder than she or Espo expected, with a kick, and Espo starts to go on the offensive himself. After that it’s not exactly clear what’s going on, except that it’s brutal. Ryan is only too glad he’s not on the mat: he likes all his limbs and head attached and undamaged, and the way these two are flinging each other about it’s not guaranteed that either will be in one piece in five minutes’ time. He winces as Beckett hits the floor hard, rolls and takes Esposito down equally hard. It’s all getting a little hardcore for him, and both of them are going all out.

“What the hell is going on here?” Oh, shit. Coming right now to a fan near Ryan. “Stand down!”

There is a truly terrifying silence as everything stops. Beckett’s flat on her back, struggling for breath; Espo’s got his head on his knees.

“What is this?” Montgomery snaps. No-one answers. “Detective Ryan!”

“Sir?”

“Explain.”

“Beckett and Esposito were having a workout, sir,” Ryan stammers. How’s this his fault suddenly? He was only watching.

“A workout?” Montgomery would have sounded less disbelieving if he’d been told he was to be taken to Area 51 to meet an alien. “That’s what you” – Ryan is sure the word idiots was meant to be inserted here – “call a workout? Are all three of you crazy? Get cleaned up and be in my office in less than ten minutes.”
Montgomery marches off, stiff-spined and clearly very annoyed. Esposito stretches painfully.

“What the fuck, Beckett? You trying to kill me ‘cause we got no corpses?”

Beckett slides an eyelid open from her tapped-out position. “Ow,” she says, as she tries to stretch her arm. “Needed the exercise.”

“Yeah, and now we all need a good story. Captain ain’t looking too pleased.”

“Any ideas?” Beckett tries another stretch, more slowly, and winces before she’s moved her arm more than an inch. “Ow,” she says again.

“You okay?”

Beckett rolls on to her stomach, and tries a stretch from there. “Ow, ow. Give me a minute.”

Espo stands up and looks down at her. “What’ve you done?”

“Hurt my arm,” she says through gritted teeth.

“Shit. If you’ve dislocated it again Montgomery’ll have our asses in a sling.”

“No. I know what that feels like. Just give me a hand to get up.” Espo reaches out and Beckett lurches to her feet, wincing. “I think I landed on it.” She rotates her wrist – or starts to. “Ow!”

“Can you manage?” Ryan asks. “ ‘Cause it’s not like we’re gonna help you clean up.”

Beckett glares at him. “I’ll manage just fine. Cover for me if I take an extra minute, huh?” She lurches off in the direction of the women’s showers. Espo dashes in the direction of the men’s. Ryan sits on a handy bench and, not for the first time, wonders how he’s always in the firing line when everyone else is responsible for the trouble.

With a minute to spare, Ryan and Esposito present themselves to Captain Montgomery. With half a second to spare, Beckett joins them, not exactly looking her normal polished self. Not at all, in fact. Montgomery looks the three of them up and down, slowly and disapprovingly. It’s unpleasantly reminiscent, to Ryan, of being inspected by the nuns at the end of recess in grade school. Espo is reminded of a particularly strict drill sergeant.

Beckett is not reminded of anything, being too busy trying to deal with the really quite severe pain in her wrist without letting on to anyone else just how much it hurts. Even brushing her hair had proved impossible. Make up – well, she didn’t even try. She’s sure it’s not broken. She is entirely unsure that it’s not sprained or badly twisted.

“So, Detectives. Would you care to explain just why it was that I discover two of you apparently trying to murder each other and the third spectating rather than stopping your idiocy?”

Er, no. They would not care to explain. There is a silence, in which Montgomery’s dark face turns darker.

“I needed the sparring practice,” Beckett says, as it becomes clear that no-one else will. And she is the senior detective, so she gets to take the licks. “So I asked Esposito to give me a match. He’s the only one who’ll really make me work hard.”

“Work hard? You call that working hard? Sparring practice is not supposed to be about injuring each other. That was not a practice. That was a full on fight. If I catch any of you doing that again in working time I’ll ensure that you regret it. Understood?”

“Yessir,” comes bedraggled from all three miscreants.

“Now go and do some real work.”

“Yessir.”

“And at the next inter-precinct championship I want to see you two tag-teaming up so we can turn the others into ground beef.”

“Yessir – What?”

“You two are as dumb as they come fighting like that, but you sure can spar,” Montgomery grins. “This year, I’m gonna win big.”

His best team trails out of his office muttering darkly, which their Captain chooses to ignore for the sake of his wallet. He notices Beckett’s relatively ungroomed state and concludes that she’d spent too long in the shower to get properly tidied up.

Espo and Ryan notice Beckett’s relatively ungroomed state too.

“Yo, Beckett?”

“Uh?”

“Forget your lipstick?”

“And your comb?”

“Since when did you pair become the fashion police? Montgomery gave us ten minutes. It took me that long to shower and get dressed again.” She sits down.

“Not using your right hand there, Beckett.”

“I said I landed on it. It’ll be fine later. I’ll get it checked out after shift. Lanie’ll take a look.” The boys look rather too obviously relieved. “If I need a babysitter I’ll let you know.”

“’S not that. ’S that you’re goin’ to see Lanie. You all patched up?”

By five p.m. it is entirely obvious that Beckett will not be getting to the morgue by driving. She can’t bend her wrist at all and she’s had as many Aleve as she can take without poisoning herself. She departs immediately shift is over, and hails a cab. She could walk it, but every movement sends claws through her wrist. She’s beginning to think she’s done more damage than she knew. Still, Lanie will sort her out.
Lanie is pleased to see her, if a little twitchy. Then again, so is Beckett. Not everything is entirely fixed, though it will be in time. Both of them are a touch wary.

“Hey, Kate.”

Three months ago, that would have been Hey, girl, what’cha doing here when there’s no corpse for me?

“Hey, Lanie. Got a minute?”

“Yeah, what’s up? Bored of the boys?”

“Bored of cold cases. But that’s not why I’m here.”

“You want to borrow my lip gloss?”

“No.”

“Oh.”

Beckett regards Lanie suspiciously. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

“You have no make up on. You never wear no make up. You probably got born wearing eyeliner. You got no lip gloss on. Now, not that you aren’t far too hot without it, but what’s up?”

“I was sparring at lunchtime, and I’ve hurt my wrist.” Beckett holds it up so Lanie can see.

“Hurt bad enough not to brush your hair? Ouch. Okay, let’s take a look.”

Lanie delicately presses on Beckett’s wrist.

“Ow! Shit, Lanie, that hurt.”

“I think we need to take a better look. C’mon, girl. I think we need an X-ray.”

“Really? It’s just a sprain.”

“Who’s the doctor here?”

“You are,” Beckett grumps.

“I am. Now, is there any reason you shouldn’t have an X-ray?”

“What?”

Lanie glints extremely mischievously. “Is there any chance you could be” –

“No!”

“Don’t scowl at me. You know I’ve gotta ask.”

Beckett hates X-ray machines. And they hate her. They never give her good news. She’s sure, somewhere in the back of her mind, that they tell the doctors that bones are broken when they aren’t, just to annoy her. She knows this is ridiculous, but so is the way her wrist hurts.

Lanie arranges her to Lanie’s satisfaction, retreats behind the plexiglass screen and takes her X-rays.

“Well?” Beckett asks impatiently.

“Well, girlfriend, you won’t be pleased to know” – Beckett groans – “that I think you’ll have to wear a compression bandage for a bit.” She sighs in relief. “For once, you haven’t broken it. So come back to my office and I’ll find you a temporary one, and then you go see your own doctor to get properly checked out, something a bit better and a physio schedule.” She rumbles in a drawer and finds one. “What were you doing to get hurt like this anyway?”

“Sparring with Esposito.”

“You don’t normally do that much damage with Espo. Thought he was quite careful – thought you were careful – not to go full on.”

“I was a bit irritated.”

Lanie quirks an eyebrow. “Have you taken too many painkillers to go for a drink? Good cure for irritation.”

“I’ll stick to sodas, but yeah.”

Beckett thinks that a drink with Lanie – even if it’s soda – would be good. Try and repair them a bit more. She hasn’t missed – pain or not – that Lanie hasn’t asked why she’s irritated. So she’s trying, and Lanie’s trying, and she’ll try some more. She’s missed Lanie, she realises. Even if she was trying to pretend she didn’t.

“Okay, let’s go.”

They settle at a nice, relatively quiet bar suitable for a conversation, and order drinks and, after some discussion, food which can be eaten without needing two hands.

“I landed on my wrist,” Beckett says, out of nowhere. “Caught Espo but good, though. He’ll ache tomorrow too.”

“Work the irritation out?”

“Helped. Wish it had been the shrink I was hitting.”

“Mmm?”

“I don’t like him,” Beckett says crossly. “He thinks he’s so clever.”

“Mmmm?” emerges sympathetically from Lanie.

“He keeps asking me questions. Wants me to talk about the past. I didn’t go see him to deal with the freaking past, I went to deal with now.” She drinks her soda defiantly.

“Now?”

“Sorting out things.”

Lanie does not jump up from her chair and dance around the restaurant cheering loudly. She manages to confine her delight at Kate’s admission to a high-pitched squeak, and then manages not to ask three dozen questions in one breath. She is not Motor-mouth-Writer-Boy, after all. She manages not to say that, too.

“Dealing with families. Dealing with alcoholics. Captain benched me. I’m not having that again.”

Lanie makes some sympathetically encouraging noises, and makes sure her wine and Kate’s soda are replenished. Kate emits more words, Lanie makes more sympathetic noises, and so the evening progresses, until it’s time to go home, not late. Just like how it was.

Castle makes his way to Jim’s apartment with a combination of trepidation and sympathy. Jim opens the door almost before he’s finished knocking, a ghastly desperation in his eyes. He looks old and tired: the lines around his eyes etched deeply. But on the table is an open can of Coke, not an open bottle of whisky; a folder of notes with his law firm’s logo on the cover; the room tidy, the same photos still there. Jim is coping, though also on the table is a very creased AA booklet: obviously much read, splayed open.

“Drink?” Jim asks.

“Coke, if you’ve got one.” Jim finds a can in his fridge and hands it over. “Thanks.”

“Why’re you here?”

“Because Beckett needs you.”

Jim makes a hurt, angry noise. “Don’t lie to me, Rick. If she needed me she’d take my calls.”

“Don’t be as pigheaded as your daughter,” Castle fires straight back, blowing any chance of sticking to his vague plan to be tactful and gentle. “Honestly, the pair of you are two dumb peas in a stupid pod. First she won’t talk to you because she’s hurt and now you’re doing just the same.”

“What the hell? Did you just come here to rub salt in?”

“No, I came here because I’ve got a way to sort this out. If you’ll climb down off your high horse long enough to listen. If you actually want Kate ever to see you again. If not, just say. I’ll leave.
She’ll be safe with me.”

“You bastard,” Jim says bitterly. “You’ve got a daughter. How’d you feel if she didn’t take your calls? Of course I want to see her. She’s the only reason I ever crawled back out the whiskey bottle. Now she won’t even speak to me. Walked away, just like the last time. I haven’t fallen off the wagon and she’s still walked away. I thought we were a family again. I thought…” his voice cracks. Castle realises that Jim’s eyes are red and slightly sheened. “I thought she still loved me,” he says brokenly.

It’s all so frighteningly reminiscent of what Beckett herself had said. Castle stays silent, and pulls his normally ebullient personality inward, letting Jim talk.

“I thought I’d done everything to make amends. Told her the story, begged her forgiveness for all the hurt I caused her. And I thought she gave me it. She listened, and we cried, and I thought it was all better, because she was always there if I needed her. It was… we were just like family again. And now Katie doesn’t want to be a family any more.”

“She never talked about it?”

“She let me spill out everything, and I asked if there was more, and she said no, that it was enough.”
Jim pauses. “You can’t imagine what it felt like when she came to rehab. I didn’t call her till I’d been there nine months. First six I dried out. Fell off, but I kept trying: a minute, an hour, a day at a time. Every day, it’s one day at a time. I promised myself if I could stay dry more than three months I’d call her. I had a picture of her… Finally I made it. When I saw her come in, it was like God switched the world back on. She was so bright, so real. I haven’t had a drink since, either. I couldn’t let her down again.”

Castle blinks to clear his eyes.

“She looked so happy to see me.” He stops, tears bright in his eyes. “And now she’s gone.”

“I think I can fix this,” Castle says, very gently. “I think I can help you and Kate fix this.”

“Why should I believe you?”

Castle shrugs. “Up to you. Trust me, or don’t trust me.”

“Do I got a choice?” Jim says, with that same revolting misbegotten grammatical construct that his daughter uses.

“Yeah. Trust me and we can try and fix it. Don’t trust me and it won’t get fixed.”

“Hobson’s choice, then.” He sounds more defeated than hopeful. “What do I need to do?”

“I want you to come see a shrink with me. He’s treating Kate” –

“Katie’s seeing a shrink? Why? What’s wrong with her?”

“She’s got some stuff to work through. Anyway, the shrink wants to talk to you – he’s already talked to me – to help Kate.” Castle looks straight at Jim. “Will you?” he asks simply.

“Yes. But…”

“Right.” Castle really does not want Jim enquiring into what’s wrong with Beckett. He doesn’t think that he’s in any way equipped to explain, and anyway that’s what Dr Burke is paid for. And if there’s a very well-hidden sense that Dr Burke deserves the pain of explanation in payment for hurting Castle’s Beckett, it’s not making itself known to Castle’s conscious mind. “I’ll arrange for you to see Dr Burke – I’ll come if you want me to, but I expect you’d prefer Ed? – and let you know. He does out-of-hours sessions.” Castle manages a rather pained smile. “It’s not much fun, but if it’s going to sort things out…” he leaves the bait trailing.

“It’ll help Katie?”

“Yeah. You’ll help Kate.”

“Do it,” Jim says, decisively. “She did everything to save me.” How can I do less hangs between them in the air.

Castle drains his Coke can. “Thanks,” he says. “I’d better be going.”

“Rick… how is Katie?”

“She’s doing all the right things,” Castle says carefully. “She’s got her friends, and if we get this right, she’s got you.”

“And you.”
“That too.” Castle shies away from that discussion, as well. “Will you be okay?”

“Yes. I’ll call Ed. I’ve been doing a lot of that.”

Castle makes to leave. Just before he does, Jim’s voice comes once more. “Will this work, Rick?”

“Yes,” Castle says confidently. “It’ll work.”

As he shuts the door, he hopes he hasn’t made a promise that he can’t keep.

He doesn’t call Beckett till later. It takes some time for the phone to be answered.

“You okay, Beckett?”

“Yeah. Went for a drink with Lanie. I was just having a shower,” she says provocatively. Castle draws in breath.

“Tease,” he says. He can hear the wicked smile down the phone. “I saw your dad.”

“Oh.”

Just as well he wasn’t going over tonight. That’s killed any chance of a mood stone dead. “He’ll see Dr Burke.”

“Okay.” There’s a silence. “Thanks, Castle. You didn’t have to get involved in all this.”

“I told you, partners.”

“Partners?” There’s another pause. “You’re the best partner I’ve ever had. Night, Castle. See you tomorrow.”

“Till tomorrow,” he says automatically, and stares at the phone as the call ends. A better partner than Espo, or O’Leary? Did she really mean that? But Beckett would never say that if she didn’t mean it. He sits with a coffee and contemplates that statement for some time, perfectly happy.

Beckett wakes up next morning with her wrist somewhat swollen, Lanie’s ministrations notwithstanding, and very sore. She pops a couple more Aleve, which helps, and hies herself to the bullpen well in advance of Montgomery, so that she can – and she does – call her doctor to make an appointment for her lunch break without interested ears.

“Detective Beckett!”

Oh, shit. Just what she doesn’t need. She’s been carefully hunt-and-pecking at her keyboard to fill in yet another of 1PP’s ridiculous forms, and Montgomery has sneaked up behind her – they should bell him, like a pet cat – and spotted the bandage where her sleeve has slipped back.

“What is that?”

“I tripped, and landed on my wrist.” It’s entirely true. The fact that she’d tripped over Espo’s outstretched leg as he was trying for a sweep-kick is a minor detail. “I’m going to see my doctor at lunchtime.”

Montgomery looks at Beckett, glares at her wrist, scowls on generally disbelieving principles and, being unwilling to call her on a lie when he is sure she wasn’t lying, departs. Captains do not stomp. That’s the only reason his gait couldn’t be described as stomping off. Beckett breathes a little sigh of relief, unheard, and goes back to pecking at her keyboard. She wishes Castle would show up, but he’d said he’d see her tonight, and she’ll respect that. But she’s sure he would have taken her mind off her wrist.

The pain in her wrist doesn’t stop her thinking about Dr Burke’s – mistaken, they are definitely mistaken – ideas, unfortunately. So she’d changed her hair. So she’d avoided certain topics. So she’d evaded the truth so he’d love her. It doesn’t mean she’d been abused.

It does. But Dr Burke is still wrong. He’s wrong, because it wasn’t deliberate. She has to hold on to that, because otherwise everything is a lie. Abuse is deliberate. She saw enough of it on the beat to know that. And that’s the difference. Her father hurt her, but it wasn’t deliberate.

And having decided that, she puts it all out of her mind and concentrates on the cases till she has to see her doctor, who prescribes a slightly different bandage, suggests a sling and is firmly told it’s not required, informs Beckett that the sling was not an optional piece of decoration but necessary for two days to stop her using the hand and stressing the wrist further so that she has to wear it for a week instead, writes her a prescription for some stronger painkillers for night time, and provides her with an exercise schedule that she can start as soon as her wrist doesn’t hurt. Beckett grumps all the way back to her desk, and is not notably impressed by the boys’ unsympathetic teasing.

“Is that so you get out the paperwork?”

“Nah, it’s so she’s got an excuse for when I outshoot her.”

“It’s gonna cramp your style, Beckett.”

“What?”

“Cramp your style. No wheels, no shooting, no sparring, no take-downs.”

Beckett scowls at the innocent paperwork, desk, and keyboard, none of which burst into flame.

“Castle won’t be too impressed either.”

“What? What’s that got to do with anything?”

“Don’t think books about paperwork will sell.”

“He’s got an imagination. He can use that. And when this comes off you boys are dead meat. But” – she acquires a truly evil smile – “since I can’t do anything with this arm, you’ll have to do more of it.” She picks up a pile of files with her left hand and drops them between them. “Enjoy,” she snarks.

Ryan and Espo look at her edged smile and admit defeat. Beckett’s satisfaction carries her through the afternoon, albeit floating on the next dose of Aleve.

The combination of satisfaction and Aleve (and Montgomery not appearing from his office to look disapprovingly at her more than twice) lasts all the way until she sits down in Dr Burke’s consulting room and meets his inquiring gaze.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett.”

“Hey.”

“What happened?” He gestures to the sling.
“I sprained my wrist sparring.”

“Does this happen often?”

“No.” Dr Burke waits. “We were working out harder than usual.”

“Why was that?”

Detective Beckett regards him with an air of irritation. “I was frustrated with the cold cases.” She pauses. “And with what you said about Dad. It’s not true.”

Dr Burke declines both the bait and Detective Beckett’s evident desire to provoke an argument. He does not argue with his patients. Once they have listened to his indubitably correct conclusions, they do not need to argue. They only need some time to process, and to come to terms with them.

“We will not pursue that further, then. Let us return to your issues with Mr Castle’s family.” He does not miss Detective Beckett’s air of relief. “They are all linked. In short, Mr Castle behaves as a father to his daughter, and has strong, stable family relationships and behaviours with both his daughter and mother. Is that correct?”

“Yes.”

“You simply want to be able to deal with this without being – as you put it – pathetically jealous.”

“Yes.”

“Why?” Detective Beckett gapes at him. “It appears, from what you have said, that Mr Castle is perfectly prepared to have a romantic relationship with you without you meeting his family. So why do you think you need to resolve any of these issues?”

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Detective Beckett snaps. “Castle doesn’t come without his family. If I can’t deal with them there won’t be a proper relationship.”

“Define proper, then, please.”

“Give and take. One where I’m not just leaning on him all the time. Where if he wanted to talk about his family – Alexis is a teen girl – I might actually be able to listen and say what I did, or felt, or what Mom and Dad did. Up till it all went wrong. One where I could actually go to his place.”

“So you would like to be able to be involved with his family.”

There is a noticeably embarrassed pause. “Suppose so.”

“But – forgive me for stating the obvious, Detective Beckett – why do you feel you cannot be?”

“We went through this. How many times do I need to say it? Every time I see them I’m pathetically jealous and upset.”

“Upset?”

“Yes, upset.”

“So why did you go more than once?”

“Because I didn’t want to upset Castle. And then I didn’t want to upset Dad.”
“Why not? Presumably both of them would have understood if you had explained.”

“What? Hurt someone else because I can’t get over myself?”

“Why do you feel the potential that someone else may be upset outweighs your upset?”

“Because they’d have a reason. I don’t.”

“You have a valid reason,” he says. “It is perfectly normal to be upset and unhappy in these circumstances.”

“Ten years later?” Detective Beckett replies bitterly.

“Five. Your father has only been dry for five years. Why do you persist in minimising the issue, Detective Beckett?” Dr Burke’s tone is intended to sting a modicum of truth from her.

“Because it’s a pathetic little teenage reaction that I should grow up and get over. It didn’t need a therapist, it just needed me to behave like an adult. And now that we’ve established that that’s my problem, I think we’re done. It was all that the therapist told me was wrong last time and clearly it’s all that’s wrong now. I don’t need to see you, I just need to grow the fuck up. This is a waste of your time and mine.”

Detective Beckett stands up, clearly intending to leave and not return.

“Sit down, Detective Beckett. Whatever your previous therapist may have told you, they were wrong. This is not a pathetic little teenage reaction, and it is not something that you can simply grow up and get over.” This had certainly not been apparent from his conversations with the previous practitioner. Dr Burke thinks bitterly that he will not just have the therapist sanctioned, he will have them struck off. By the time he is done with them, they will be unable to find a post on the checkouts at a mom-and-pop store in the back woods of Montana. This is appalling. How can Detective Beckett have been allowed to believe that her perfectly valid feelings of unhappiness are of no importance? Worse, how could she possibly have been told that all that was required was to grow up and get over it?

Detective Beckett is looking at him completely blankly.

“Detective Beckett, you have been ill-served. Your upset has equal value to that of your father, or Mr Castle, or any other person. But because you have been led to believe that it does not, you have consistently lied either by word or actions in order to continue minimising your own feelings in order to protect those of others. When, understandably, the pressure of repressing your feelings has become too much, you have done your utmost to ensure that the source of that pressure has been permanently removed from your life. Is that not so?”

Detective Beckett does not answer. Detective Beckett is, in fact, apparently incapable of speech or thought.

“Let us start again, Detective Beckett.”
“No. I can’t deal with this. I can’t deal with any of it. I’m going home. I don’t want to talk about this any more. I only came because I was ordered to.”

“You are free to leave whenever you wish. I suggest that you take the time you need and return when you are able. I will keep the sessions on Tuesday and Friday open, whether you attend or not. Treatment must always be your choice, Detective Beckett.”

“First you tell me I’ve been abused and then you tell me all the therapy I put myself through was not just pointless but completely wrong? Why should I believe you? Why should I come back? Every other choice I’ve made has been wrong, so it’s just as likely that you are too. Therapy is completely pointless and you’re no better than the last guy.”

“And there is the reaction to which I have just referred. By questioning my professional competence, you are endeavouring to remove a source of pressure permanently. No doubt you expect that I will remove you from my list of patients. I shall not do so.”

Detective Beckett looks at him, utterly horrified, and collapses back into the chair from which she had risen, which then results in her stifling a cry of pain and cradling her maltreated wrist. She is quite clearly swearing sulphurously under her breath and in some considerable discomfort.

“Have you hurt yourself further?” Dr Burke inquires anxiously. He is really most concerned about Detective Beckett. For a moment she doesn’t answer him. She looks surprisingly small and piteous, pain scratched across her face, holding her wrist tightly through its sling. She breathes out, very slowly, a long exhale of suffering.

“I can’t do this,” she says, exhaustion leaching the words from her mouth. “Ten years of disappointment. Ten years of it being wrong. I should just cut my losses. Accept I’ve got no family. Accept I can’t deal with other people’s families. And get on with my life.”

“That would be cowardice, Detective Beckett, and I do not believe you to be a coward. You have come this far. You have said, repeatedly, that you wish to be able to deal with Mr Castle’s family. You have not said, but I have surmised, that you care very deeply for Mr Castle. And yet, having taken all the right steps, you are now scared to follow through?”

“The only thing in my life that I haven’t screwed up is my job. Everyone around me gets hurt. Mom died. Dad got drunk. Royce shoved me away because I needed too much. Will left because I couldn’t give him anything. I can’t do people. I can only catch killers. So why should I screw up Castle’s life too? He’d be better off out of it. I told him so.”

“How very arrogant of you, Detective Beckett.” Dr Burke has resolved on brutal honesty. Subtext will not work with Detective Beckett. “You are the reason why others around you are destroyed? That is a ridiculous assumption. You are not to blame for others’ actions. You are only responsible for your own. I recall to you the second C. You cannot control it. Nor can you control others. You can only control yourself.” He stops, and regards her closely. “For ten years you have failed utterly to deal with your own grief, because you have wrongly considered that you should deal with that of others before your own. You have put your father before yourself” –

“For two years you altered your behaviour and suppressed your grief to try to appease your father. In the following three years, when you maintain that you had walked away, you let his behaviour, for example in calling you, affect your emotions. Had you truly walked away, you would have blocked his number or changed your own. You did neither. You did not save yourself, and you could not and did not fully walk away.”

He pauses again. Detective Beckett is now completely white.

“Nothing you did could save your father. He had to save himself, and decide what he cared most about. It is time for you to save yourself.” He looks at Detective Beckett again. “Your feelings are as valid as those of any other person. You had, and have, the right to be unhappy. You have, and had, the right to grieve. It is time for you to grieve for your mother as you should have done ten years ago, and it is time for you to release your unjustified guilt that your father descended into alcoholism. You did not cause any of this pain, you cannot control the pain of others, and you can only cure yourself. You will only be able to do that once you talk openly with your father and tell him about his actions.”

“I can’t. He’ll go back to the bottle.”

“That will be his choice. However, prior to you deciding whether such a discussion is to take place, I will be happy to interview your father and provide my professional opinion on his state of mind, if he will permit me so to do. I may need to advise him of some of your feelings.”

Detective Beckett nods. “Whatever. It won’t make any difference.”

Dr Burke is relieved. That consent removes his last concern over seeing Mr Beckett.

He continues. “Detective Beckett, if you do not tell your father the whole truth, your relationship with him will never be healthy.” He realises his error almost instantly.

“Since he doesn’t want a relationship with me, that’s not a problem.”

“Has your father contacted you since your quarrel?”

“Oh, yes. More lies. He didn’t mean it. I misunderstood him. He needs me. I’m his only family. I heard it all the last time, and it was all lies then too. There’s nothing to salvage here.”

“And yet you will not accept that his treatment of you produced the same results as emotional abuse. Can you not see the discontinuity here? If there were nothing to salvage, you would have no reason to try to deny that. If there were nothing to salvage, why are you concerned that telling your father the truth will send him back to alcoholism? You may lie to yourself that you no longer care, but that is patently not the truth.”

Detective Beckett bursts into tears. Dr Burke waits for her to re-establish her so-far terrifying control, and is completely astonished when she fails to do so. When she is still crying some moments later, seemingly without any sign of stopping, he speaks once more.

“Detective Beckett, do you wish to continue?” She shakes her head. “Do you wish for someone to collect you? I will have them contacted. You cannot go home alone like this.”

“Castle,” she sobs, and fumbles to unlock her phone. She holds it out to Dr Burke.

Dr Burke takes the phone and leaves his treatment room. Detective Beckett will not notice his momentary absence.
“Beckett?”

“Dr Burke, Mr Castle.”

“What are you doing with Beckett’s phone? What’s wrong with her?”

“I think you should come to my office, Mr Castle. Detective Beckett is in need of assistance.”

“What have you done?”

“I would prefer that you were here, Mr Castle, rather than pursuing an argument. Can I expect you to arrive shortly?”

“Yes.”

Mr Castle sounds somewhat irritated with Dr Burke. This is not unexpected. Dr Burke confidently expects that Mr Castle will be considerably more irritated, not to say angered, when he finds Detective Beckett to be so upset. Dr Burke returns to his room, taking the precaution of collecting a further box of Kleenex as he goes. He considers that the extra may be required, and finds himself, as ever, to be quite correct in his conclusions.

Mr Castle arrives extremely swiftly. Dr Burke’s excellent receptionist escorts him in directly, but as instructed has indicated his arrival. Dr Burke is extremely interested to observe his behaviour, and wishes for a few seconds’ warning before Mr Castle enters, so that he may take full cognisance from the beginning. He is not disappointed in events.

Mr Castle enters, absently thanks the receptionist as he shuts the door, and then observes Detective Beckett’s condition. She is still crying quietly but unstoppably, and has not noticed Mr Castle’s arrival. Mr Castle takes precisely two long strides to reach her, positively plucks her out the chair, and collects Detective Beckett against him, murmuring inaudibly to her. Having attained his immediate goal, in a wholly protective manner which confirms every deduction Dr Burke had made about Mr Castle’s depth of feeling for Detective Beckett, he turns around to face Dr Burke, Detective Beckett still cradled in his grasp.

“What the hell did you do to her?” he inquires, ice-cold rage in every syllable. Dr Burke raises his eyebrows.

“I have done nothing except show Detective Beckett the truth.” Really, Mr Castle would be quite frightening when he is in full protective mode, if it were not for the fact that he, Dr Burke, is perfectly certain that he has taken the correct course of action. “Would you prefer that I mismanaged her therapy in the way that the previous practitioner had done?”

Mr Castle closes his lips tightly on a riposte that would undoubtedly contain distressingly vulgar language. “No,” he eventually grits out, still with Detective Beckett cradled against him. “But this session is over. I’m taking Beckett home.” He fixes Dr Burke with a vicious glare. “We’ll be discussing this.”

As the door closes behind Mr Castle and Detective Beckett, Dr Burke smiles gently to himself. He expects that Mr Castle and Detective Beckett will indeed be discussing this, precisely as they should do. Detective Beckett will need Mr Castle’s support, and Mr Castle needs to understand the full extent of the commitment which he, and indeed she, is making. None of this is likely to be easy, for either of them. He will make that clear, when Mr Castle opens the discussion with him which Dr Burke is sure that he also wishes to have.
Castle walks Beckett out of the door and out of the building and into his own car without at any stage letting go of her. She’s stopped crying, but there’s nothing there; and he is severely tempted to go back into the building and take Dr Burke apart. The only thing stopping him is the way in which Beckett is leaning on him. Right now, she needs him – and she must have asked Dr Burke to call him – more than he needs to hit something. Or, more accurately, someone.

And why is her arm in a sling? He’ll have answers to that, too.

He drives her home, parks tidily, and walks her into the elevator, out of the elevator, and then removes her keys from her purse, unlocks her door, and walks her into her apartment, closes the door without looking and walks her straight over to the couch, where he can finally, finally put her on his lap and cosset her into his warmth and simply make it all better for her.

Except he can’t.

He can’t make it all better for her. She has to do that. Only she can save herself, he thinks bitterly. He just wishes that it didn’t have to hurt her so much. Salvation always comes at a high price. Jim’s salvation has come at the price of Beckett’s whole adult life, it seems. He wonders, chilled, whether the price of Beckett’s salvation might be Jim’s sobriety, and, shivering, whether that’s a price that Beckett would accept might have to be paid.

He starts with the easy question. “What happened here, Beckett?” he asks, running his hand cautiously across the sling. She lifts from off his shoulder, and meets his eyes for the first time since he’d taken hold of her in the therapist’s office.

“Sparring got a little rough. I fell on it.”

“So I don’t have to risk life and limb trying to beat up Espo for breaking you?”

“Not today. Lanie took a look at it yesterday, and I got it properly seen to today.” She achieves a very watery smile. “Montgomery is not happy with the three of us.”

“Yesterday? You didn’t say.”

“No. I did what Lanie told me, had a drink with her after, and took the painkillers. It didn’t hurt that much till this morning.”

“You could have said.”

“I… yeah. Um… yeah.” Which is a concession Castle wouldn’t have expected.

“I would have come by and put your hair in its night time braids,” he says, in lieu of anything sympathetic.

“No braids, Castle.” She tucks her head back on to his shoulder. Something registers.

“You had a drink with Lanie?” Voluntarily?

“Yeah. It was nice.” Looks like that’s back to normal, then. Or as normal as it’s going to get in the near future. “We had a chat.” Good grief. It worked. “Thanks.”

Castle is returned to reality from the comfortable knowledge that he’s fixed at least one problem when Beckett shifts warily and emits a noise indicating some pain.

“Seeing as you’re temporarily one-armed, and if I can’t kill Espo for you, can I slay Dr Burke instead?" There’s rather more annoyance in that than Castle had intended. Beckett hides more deeply in the crook of his neck, and doesn’t say anything. He becomes aware that she is shuddering. “Beckett?”

“Why can’t I just walk away from him? He’s ruined everything and I still keep hoping it’ll all be better again. I still keep hoping that he’ll be there no matter how often he proves he isn’t.”

Ah. Dr Burke has pointed out that Beckett is still hoping for her father to be a family again, whatever she says and does. Castle lets her cry into his wide, now damp, shoulder for a while. The few words that do emerge largely consist of why can’t I give him up?

“Beckett,” Castle says gently, and pats her back, “Beckett, let me tell you a story.”

“Uh?” she says, but she doesn’t say no.

“You know I don’t know who my dad was.”

“Yeah?”

“Well, when we were… when I was growing up, we were touring the small towns in the Mid-West. It was just Mother and I. And the rest of the cast, obviously, but that’s not important. I started to notice that the other little boys in the schools I went to had two parents, not one. I kept pestering Mother about it, and she kept deflecting and distracting. Eventually I gave up asking. By the time I got to high school, though, I really resented it. Not knowing, and not having a father. It wasn’t helpful. So I decided to try to do some investigating of my own.” He smiles ruefully. “Always looking for the answer to the mystery: the story behind the actions. Of course I didn’t get anywhere. But…”

Beckett hums expectantly, and much less damply. Her hand slips up around his neck, out of the sling.

“I didn’t exactly give up. Once I’d made some money, and made it big, I tried again.” There’s an intake of breath against him. “That’s how my first advance disappeared. The PR said I spent it on wine, women and song, but actually it was PIs, false leads and false hope. Eventually, I gave up looking. But I’ve always wanted to know, to meet him, to ask why.”

Castle turns Beckett so that he’s looking down into her wide, beautiful eyes. All he sees in them is sympathy, and complete understanding.

“I guess what I’m saying is no matter how much they hurt you by being there or not being there, you always want to have a family. A father.”

Her eyes spill over again, but she hugs him hard. “Thanks,” she breathes. “You telling me that… that means a lot. You’ve never said anything much about your past before.”

“I don’t much like thinking about it,” Castle confesses. “It seems a bit dumb, when I’m a father myself.” Beckett hugs him again, and nestles in to achieve a better angle to do so. She is, he realises, trying to comfort him.

“You’ve been a really good father, though. The exact opposite of yours. And it’s not dumb. Normal.”

She stops there, and sniffs. “Dad was like that, you know. Up till…” she sniffs again, and reverts to silence. “‘S why it was too much. But it could have been so much worse. He might never have been there at all.” She hugs Castle again, strangely lopsided as only one hand is gripping.
Castle doesn’t pursue that line of conversation. Castle intends to pursue a line of conversation with Dr Burke that involves – after some discussion of the reasons for using any form of therapy which leaves Beckett in the state she had been – Jim appearing at Dr Burke’s office in very short order. Tomorrow, for preference, even if it is Saturday. If not, then Monday. They remain cuddled together, peacefully, for a little time.

“Dr Burke said I had to tell Dad the truth,” Beckett emits. “Before anything else would go right. He said I should do that and not care about whether Dad went back to the bottle. He said that was up to Dad.” She stops for a beat, remembers something. “He said he’d see Dad first. Assess him.”

How very clever of Dr Burke, Castle thinks, with only a minor dose of acid.

“You know, Beckett,” Castle says, not at all lightly or inconsequentially, “if I’d been your Dad and you’d been Alexis, I’d have crawled back into the bottle the moment I realised I’d said something to push you away like that. Your Dad hasn’t. I think he’s stronger than you think. Let Dr Burke see him. Then decide. Up to you. Always up to you.”

There’s another long pause, while Beckett considers that. She’s still cuddling him. That may, of course, be because she’s unwilling to move her hand and tweak her injured wrist. She shouldn’t be cuddling him like that with an injured wrist, either. She should have it in the sling and be resting it… oh. Except that when has Beckett ever let anything stop her doing what she considers important… and right now hugging him is more important than her wrist. He very gently repatriates her arm to its sling, and replaces the hug that Beckett was providing to him with an encirclement of his own. Her head is back on his shoulder, her chest against his.

“Okay,” she finally says. “Let Dr Burke deal with it. I can’t.”
Much as Castle would like to take Beckett to bed and make love to her for some time, the problem of her wrist prevents it. He compromises by snuggling her in and then kissing her smoothly and searchingly until she’s relaxed into him and is nicely responsive. Which would have been fine if she hadn’t retaliated in kind, which leaves him very ready to be responsive and definitely not relaxed at all. For someone who can’t really employ their arm, she’s doing a lot of damage. He was sure she wasn’t ambidextrous. He may have been wrong.

He stops her by tugging her usable arm out of dangerously intimate places and putting it where he can see it. Beckett pouts at him, clearly unimpressed.

“You’re no fun,” she grumps.

“I’m plenty of fun,” he contradicts her, “but I’m not damaging you further. Cuddle in and be content with some gentle making out. Like this,” and he kisses her teasingly, and then harder, and then she kisses him back and presses in. He holds her tightly. “Are you going to be okay tonight?”

“Yeah,” she drags out. “I’ll be fine, now you’ve been here. Makes it all better.” Her gaze drops away. “I couldn’t do this without you.”

Castle embraces her more tightly still. “Any time, Beckett. Every time. Promise.”

“Me too.” He raises eyebrows in question. “If you want to talk. Or search. Any time. I… have resources.”

“You would use NYPD resources?” He’s astonished.

“Better use than for finding Mr Berowitz.”

“Yeah…” He shouldn’t really say the next bit. Technically – well, not so technically – it’s a breach of his undertaking. “When I was writing Storm, I shadowed someone in the CIA. They poked about for me.” He holds his breath.

“The NYPD can’t compete with that,” Beckett says, disappointedly, and leaves it there. She doesn’t seem to be interested in whom he shadowed. “But if you want me to take another look…”

“Maybe. But the NYPD has other advantages,” Castle drawls lazily.

“Oh?”

“This one right here.” He tucks her firmly back against him and runs a big hand over her back. “You’re a definite advantage.”

Beckett curls into him. “I am?” she husks, clearly very ready to take any opportunity to move away from her earlier unhappiness. “Are you trying to take advantage?”

Castle kisses her in response. “I thought I already had. If you hadn’t hurt yourself, I might let you take advantage of me. Seeing as you can’t, you’ll just have to settle for this.” He invades again, finding not the slightest resistance, and when he’s had his fill of making out, Beckett is tidily settled back on his shoulder and very soft and Kat-ish. His hand runs up and down her back without any intelligent input from his brain. Her eyes are half-closed, her breathing gentle, and all in all she seems to have become calm.
“Castle?” arrives sleepily at his ear.

“Mm?” He was perfectly happy nestled warmly together. Thinking is an effort that isn’t required.

“Castle,” Beckett says again, very uncertainly, “could we…”

“Mm?”

“…could we maybe go back to the Hamptons?”

Castle jerks into life, which was a mistake, because he’s jarred Beckett’s sore wrist and she is muttering vile words at it. Not at him, though that clause may be missing the word yet.

“The Hamptons?”

Beckett instantly retreats into herself. “Not if you don’t want to.” He gapes at her. “Okay, it was a dumb idea. Never mind.”

“I think it’s a good idea.”

“You do?” She sounds surprised.

“But we can’t go this weekend. Next weekend. I’ve got to make arrangements.” He peers down at the scarlet tip of her ear which is all he can see. “Why?” The embarrassment level of the atmosphere increases markedly. “Why, Beckett?” An indistinct murmur rises. “Didn’t get that.”

“Everything was easier there,” she rushes out. “Nothing to worry about. Just…”

“Mmm?”

“Just you and me.”

Castle has a sudden rush of blood to the head as he considers the implications of that statement. It sounds very like Beckett hoping for a reprise of that extremely pleasurable and very successful weekend almost three weeks ago. It also sounds like Beckett hoping for a little bubble in which she need not think about anything but them.

Castle is only a little bit wrong. Beckett is hoping for a space of peace in which she can try to admit just how much she feels. She can’t do it in Manhattan. There are too many upsets: too much therapy; too many cases and people and everything pressing at her mind; too many of her problems getting in the way. Out in the Hamptons, the first time, none of that had been there. It had been – well, happy. Easeful and happy. Nothing in the way. Maybe if there were nothing in the way again, she’d be able to say something more than partners. She squirms closer, and curses her sprained wrist, and the advanced hour.

Sure enough, a couple of minutes later, Castle realises the time.

“I have to go.”

“Yeah.” She really wishes he didn’t, but he can’t stay. Not without planning. She closes her throat firmly on a pathetic plea of will I see you tomorrow?

“I’ve got stuff to do tomorrow, but…um…” Castle sounds almost as hopelessly uncertain as she had a moment ago, “…um, would you like to go for brunch somewhere on Sunday, but… oh, you might not want to because Mother and Alexis would be there too” – he droops – “so it would be too much. I get it. You don’t have to because it wouldn’t be just us. My family would be there and that “wouldn’t work at all and” –

“Uh? Sunday brunch?”

“Er… yeah?”

“Uh?” Beckett emits again, completely flabbergasted. “Brunch?”

“A meal between breakfast and lunch.”

“I know what it is, Castle.” And more to the point, she had already thought through, at the beginning of this week, the three reasons Castle’s family make her uncomfortable, and she’d decided that she really ought to be able to deal with all of them, so maybe she should try to cope? If they’re not in the loft… And besides which, she will prove Dr Burke wrong about something else. She can cope with Castle’s family without having to deal with her issues with her father. They’re not connected. “Where?”

“How about Balthazar?” Castle says, clearly surprised that she said yes even after finding out that his mother and daughter would be there.

“Okay. When?”

“Ten. I’ll make a reservation.”

“Okay. See you then.” She turns slightly in his clasp and kisses his neck, being the only reachable part of him. “But…” – she has to force the words out – “but you won’t be upset if it’s all too much and I need to…”

“It’ll be okay. I get it. Nothing more than you can deal with. It’s always up to you to decide.” He smiles happily. “I can always hold your hand to infuse you with courage.”

“Infuse? Am I a tea bag?”

Castle regards Beckett with admiration. “So hot,” he murmurs. “That deserves a kiss. To prove you’re not a tea bag.” Which leads to another round of making out which does nothing at all to induce Castle to leave. Finally he manages to tear himself away, put on his coat, and exit, not without considerable regrets from both parties.

Left to herself, Beckett makes herself not coffee, but a very soothing cup of camomile tea, and tries not to think that she’s made a really big mistake in accepting the invitation to brunch. She can do it. She can. And she will show Dr Burke that she can handle a family situation now, not on his timetable. On hers. She will do this and it will work.

And on that note she finishes her tea and puts herself to bed, where she doesn’t dream at all.

Castle barely makes it past nine o’clock before phoning Dr Burke’s office. If he’d thought that there would be anyone there, he’d have done so at eight. Or seven. Or as soon as he woke up. The necessity to wait has not improved his mood, even if on reflection Dr Burke had only pointed out what Castle himself had been thinking. Fortunately, there is an answer. If Dr Burke’s practice had been shut across the whole weekend Castle might have used some rather less respectable methods to find him.

“Dr Burke, please,” Castle says, coolly. The receptionist is entirely guiltless, and deserves courtesy.
“Certainly. Who shall I say is calling?”

“Mr Castle.”

There are a few beeps as he is put on hold.

“Ah, good morning, Mr Castle. I have been expecting your call. Do you wish to start by venting your understandable emotions relating to Detective Beckett, or by discussing your progress with Mr Beckett?”

Castle is left speechless and gulping. It takes him a moment to recover from Dr Burke’s cool commentary.

“We can start with me telling you that if you upset Beckett like that again I will have your head.”

“Mr Castle, you do not wholly understand the position.” Castle makes a noise reminiscent of an angry eagle. “Detective Beckett’s previous therapist appears to have been utterly incompetent, and indeed harmful. With the assistance of your comments, I have been able to uncover this fact. However, that incompetence has left Detective Beckett with the ingrained behaviours which we discussed, which she is only now understanding: her reluctance to upset those for whom she might care, followed by, when the repressed anger becomes unbearable, a permanent breach which she has herself initiated. She has followed this route with you, with Dr Parrish, and with her father, and no doubt with others beforehand. It is of some note, as I had discussed with you, that the breach with you was not permanent. It may be equally important that Detective Beckett appears to have mended relations with Dr Parrish.” Dr Burke pauses. Castle allows the pause to extend.

“However, Detective Beckett will not be able to overcome her patterns until she confronts her past. To do so, she needs to face her own misapprehensions. This is unlikely to be painless. It appears to me that Detective Beckett does not like to own her weaknesses, nor is it easy for her to admit that she may have been wrong.”

“For sure,” Castle agrees before his brain can stop him.

“Therefore, it is extremely likely that Detective Beckett will be upset, possibly greatly upset, again. Having my head, as you so colourfully put it, will not prevent that. It would be more productive if you merely made yourself available should she need you, as was the case yesterday.”

Castle growls in frustration. Dr Burke has just cut his argument off at the knees. He had been looking forward to tearing him apart, metaphorically, and now he can’t.

“If it is any consolation to you, Detective Beckett did not hesitate to ask for you to be contacted.”

“Oh.”

“Now, Mr Castle, do I infer correctly that you have spoken to Mr Beckett?”

“Yes.”

“And?”

“He’ll see you. I expect he’ll want his sponsor about. I think it would be a good plan if you saw him very soon. He’s breaking up. He has no idea why Beckett won’t speak to him. But he’s still dry.”

“I see.” There is a soft tapping sound. “Please let Mr Beckett know that I could see him on Monday, at six.”
“Okay.”

“Before you go, Mr Castle, I would be remiss if I did not point out that resolving Detective Beckett’s issues is likely to be painful for you. She will need your support, but although I hope that her evident feelings for you will prevent major conflict between you both, I certainly cannot guarantee that. She may well be very angry with the situation, and it is not unknown for such anger to be displaced on to an innocent party, or indeed to a party for whom the subject of therapy has deep feelings. Are you prepared for that? If not, please take some time to think through how best you might deal with it.” Castle swallows. He had not thought of that. “I would also still like to understand the way in which you and Detective Beckett reassociated. I have an earlier session free on Monday, if you are available at eleven?”

“Yeah.”

“Thank you. Your assistance is quite invaluable. Good morning, Mr Castle.”

Castle is left staring at the phone, wondering just how he’d been so effectively neutralised when he’d intended to turn Dr Burke into a small pile of ash and scraps.

Then he realises that he’d better tell Jim that he’s seeing Dr Burke at six on Monday. Another unpleasant call. Still, no point in putting it off. It won’t improve with keeping. Not that it’s going to be pleasant at any time. Castle makes a very unhappy face, which worsens as soon as he realises that he can’t call Beckett immediately afterwards and take the bitter taste away by seeing her, picks up his phone, and dials.

“Jim Beckett.”

“Jim, it’s Rick. Dr Burke – Kate’s psychiatrist – well, he’ll see you at six Monday if you can make it?”

“Yes.”

“Okay.” Castle reels off the number for Jim to confirm the appointment. “He’s pretty…er…thorough. It’s a bit rough. You might want Ed somewhere close by.”

“Thanks.” Jim doesn’t sound particularly thankful. It sounds more like he’s resigned.

There is a short silence which doesn’t sound as if the call is finished. It sounds very much as if there are dammed up words behind Jim’s certainly-gritted teeth.

“Rick,” Jim says, with an undertone of resolution, “why are you doing this?”

“Doing what?” Castle says in an attempt to buy time.

“Getting involved. Pushing me to therapy. Fixing Katie. Every time I ask you something you just say trust you. Why should I?”

“You don’t have to.”

“Stop evading. What’s your interest in all of this – and don’t say it’s the writing. I don’t believe you.”

“Are you asking me my intentions?”

“If that’s what it takes to get a straight answer from you, yes, I am.”
“How is that your business?”

“Whether she talks to me or not I’m Katie’s father.”

“Beckett is twenty-nine years old and it’s up to her what she does with whom.” Castle is sufficiently riled to revert to referring to her as Beckett. “You don’t have any right to ask me my intentions. The only person who can ask me that is Beckett. We don’t need you or anyone else interfering.”

“But you’re quite happy to interfere between me and Katie? How’d you square that circle?” The implication of hypocrisy does nothing to improve Castle’s rapidly worsening mood.

“Believe me, I’d rather not. If it wasn’t something Beckett needed I’d never have spoken to you. She might need you. I don’t. So stop pushing me to tell you stuff. It’s not gonna happen. Are you going to go see Dr Burke or not?”

“Yes. Seeing as there’s nothing else I can do,” Jim adds acidly.

“You could try remembering that I’ve told you Beckett’s okay a couple of times now. That’s a hell of a lot better than you’d have got from her.” Jim’s wince is palpable down the phone. “I can stop that too, if you’d rather not hear from me.”

“You really know how to play dirty, don’t you? Got me right over a barrel. Well, I sure hope you know what you’re doing, because if you don’t I’ll come after you with a gun. You said this would work, so you’d better make it work.”

“All I can do is put the pieces in play. It’s up to you and Beckett to make it work. I’ve got further in getting you back in than you could. I can’t do any more. Enjoy Dr Burke. I don’t.”

Castle cuts the call, irritated and worried in equal measure. Jim’s temper is varying from desperate clinging to Castle-as-last-hope to regarding Castle as the enemy. Although Castle is sympathetic to Jim’s plight, he’s not keen on being used as a punching bag and he is especially not keen on being grilled as to his intentions when he hasn’t discussed them with the object of said intentions. Maybe in the Hamptons…

And on that note he starts to make arrangements so that he can be out of town from Friday night till Sunday evening next weekend without Alexis being worried or unaccompanied. It takes a little time, and involves calling in a few favours to achieve a double sleepover. Alexis is, however, enthusiastic about the prospect of sleepovers, and more enthusiastic about the prospect of seeing Beckett at brunch on Sunday. Castle rapidly makes the reservations, before there are no tables left.

Alexis skips off, perfectly happy with life, to be replaced by Castle’s mother.

“Did I hear mention of brunch, darling?” she carols.

“Yes, Mother. Ten, at Balthazar. I’m sure their hangover drinks will suit you.”

“Pfft! I have never required a hangover cure.”

Castle makes a very disbelieving noise. “Should I remind you that I learned to make Bloody Marys before I left elementary school?”

“Don’t exaggerate, kiddo. You were almost finished junior high.”

“Before that I couldn’t reach the vodka.”
“That growth spurt of yours was certainly well-timed.”

“Mother…”

“Oh, whatever, Richard. Anyway, brunch? To what do we owe this unusual pleasure?”

“Beckett’s coming.”

“Oh?” his mother says, very inquisitively. “I must say, I’d been wondering when she’d be invited back. Is that nice father of hers coming too?”

“No. And I don’t want you to mention him. Beckett and her father had a bit of a disagreement and it’s a sore point. So don’t do anything to poke it.”

“As if I would be so rude,” Martha says, offended.

“I’m sure I can count on you never to be rude. Can’t I?”

“Of course. I’m offended you even asked.”

Castle raises an eyebrow. “In that case I’m sure we’ll all have a really good time. Without questions.”

“Whatever, darling,” floats back to him as Martha exits with a flourish. This makes Castle very nervous. His mother has a nasty tendency to try and “improve” matters. Improvement is rarely the result of her efforts. This has all the hallmarks of a potential disaster, but he can’t head it off. He can’t tell Beckett he doesn’t think she can do it, because that’ll destroy any chance of her having any confidence in her own reactions – or in his – for weeks. He can’t tell his mother anything more without breaking Beckett’s privacy. This is going to be horrible. Even if it goes well, it’s going to be horrible. And just to add to the general quantity of horror, he’s got to see Dr Burke on Monday.

In an effort to avoid all this horror, he turns to his laptop. Unfortunately, all he manages to think of are scenes of utter disaster in which Nikki shoots Rook, Rook’s mother, Rook’s editor, and then goes off on an Uzi-fuelled rampage through the streets of New York ending on the top of the Empire State building with biplanes surrounding her…

He jerks awake. His laptop is complaining that it has no power. He has a sudden fellow-feeling for it. He also feels entirely powerless. He puts it on to charge and then calls Joe, in the Hamptons, to arrange matters for next weekend. At least that’s under some sort of control.
Beckett wakes up on Sunday with a sensation of visceral dread and wondering why on earth she had thought that this was any sort of a good idea. However, she can’t cancel now. She can do this. All she has to do is be Detective Beckett of the Twelfth Precinct. That’s how she’d realised that she can cope with Castle’s family: think of them as witnesses. She dresses accordingly: pristine make-up, formal white button down, navy dress pants, a tailored navy blazer under her coat. When she looks in the mirror she is outwardly perfectly composed. She ignores the sling. It’s been two days, so she can leave it off. Detective Beckett does not wear a sling.

When she arrives at Balthazar, a carefully calculated five minutes after ten, Castle and family are already seated. She can see Alexis laughing at Castle, and Castle’s look and posture of absolute parental adoration towards Alexis. She nearly turns and runs out the door.

She can do this, she tells herself again, and tries to calm the gnarly twist of envy in her gut. She is Detective Beckett, scourge of criminals and murderers, top cop, and she can do this. The thought of proving Dr Burke wrong helps enormously. Getting one over on that far-too-clever shrink would be immensely satisfying. She walks over to their table without a hitch.

“Hey,” she says generally. Castle notices her style of dress instantly, and adjusts his mental assessment of her tension level to suit. That would be high.

“Beckett.”

“Detective Beckett, hi!”

“Hello, Katherine darling,” all come simultaneously. The last causes Beckett to elevate her eyebrows and Castle to stare dropped-jaw at his mother. Darling? His stomach drops to his toes. Oh God. His mother has a plan. Oh, God.

“It’s so nice to see you. Richard barely mentions you.” Good. She does not want to think about being picked over and discussed by the collective Castles.

“I expect it’s all going into his writing,” Beckett says, apparently completely unflustered. She looks at Castle, and grins. Only he would notice the tension below it. “I hope I get to see an advance copy. After all, as your inspiration I think I should be able to edit any parts that are inappropriate.”

“What? No, no, no. No spoilers for you. It would ruin the surprise.”

Beckett slips into the seat next to Castle, carefully left vacant for her.

“Hm,” she emits sceptically. “Is that just a way of ensuring that I can’t object?”

“Oh, Dad’s always like this with his books. No-one gets to see them in full beforehand. He won’t show me any of this one,” Alexis says aggrievedly. “Says it’s not ready.”

Beckett catches Martha’s interestedly inquiring glance at Castle, and internally cringes at her flash of envy that Alexis has clearly been privy to Castle’s previous efforts. Just like family ought to be: involved in each other’s lives. But – it’s okay. It’s how families should be. Treat it like a case, Kate. Watch the interactions and don’t get involved. She breathes slowly and lets the feeling wash through her. She’s got this. Plenty of people don’t have families, and they cope. She can too.

“I never reveal my genius,” Castle says pompously, to noises of disgust. “Unlike the menu, which is a work of revealed genius. Shall we order?” Much to his amazement, the deflection works. Everyone turns to the menu and pretty soon orders have been given, orange juice and coffee have arrived, and small satisfied noises are heard around the table as caffeine – and in his mother’s case, champagne – have done their work. Castle manages to press a reassuring knee against Beckett without anyone being able to detect it, and is much comforted when she presses back. Everything is proceeding nicely.

“Dad said he was going up to the Hamptons at the weekend,” Alexis says happily. “He must need to concentrate. He only ever goes on his own when he’s got a deadline. Well, when he’s past a deadline and Gina’s threatening to shoot him.”

“You must have missed a lot of deadlines, kiddo,” Martha says sardonically. “You were up there three weeks ago, claiming you needed to write.”

“You know Gina,” Castle points out acerbically.

“You should see Richard’s beach house, Katherine. Far be it from me to brag” – “Really?” Castle interjects, and receives a glare.

“– but it’s quite impressive. Of course it doesn’t compare to really successful writers” – Castle winces – “but it’s not bad.”

“Thank you, Mother, for that contribution.”

“Oh, no trouble, darling. I think you should show Katherine the house and the beach. After all, she’s already seen the loft” – Castle has a premonition of her next words just too late – “and Katherine, it would be just lovely if you came back. It was so nice having you for dinner. We should make it a regular occurrence.”

Beckett takes a mouthful of French toast before she answers. Her voice is surprisingly – to Castle – serene. “I’m afraid I really can’t predict when I’m free. We’re so busy that the shift patterns and on-call rota is very heavy right now. Maybe when it’s all calmed down again?”

Martha looks a tad thwarted. It dawns on Beckett that she is trying to matchmake. Bit late. “But surely you have some time off?” It further dawns on Beckett that Martha is trying to press her into coming to the loft. Soon. She’s not ready for that. This morning’s brunch is about as far as she thinks she can go, and she’s rapidly revising that opinion as Martha keeps pressing her point.

“It would be great if you came again,” Alexis chimes in. “You can tell me all about what you do as a cop.” She smiles mischievously. “And about all the trouble Dad gets into.” Beckett hears Castle choke on his eggs. Maybe not all the trouble. Only the printable trouble. But she can’t face the loft, and she certainly has no intention of attempting to watch Alexis with Castle in their home in the near future. She’s already stressed, just from this meeting. The thought of seeing Alexis’s reactions and the way in which she’ll undoubtedly tease her father does nothing for Beckett’s composure or stress levels.

“The next time you have time off, even if you’re on call, you really should come by,” Martha says, rather more forcefully than Beckett appreciates.

“I’m afraid that the job comes first,” she says flatly. “I have to do my share of the work. If I’m on call I have to be ready.”

“But” –
“But no.” Beckett just about manages not to snap. “It’s not possible till we’re not so busy.” Castle’s hand finds her knee under the table. It doesn’t really help. She doesn’t need pushed.

Martha harrumphs. “Well, really”—

“Mother, enough. Beckett has a job to do. Unlike you, she doesn’t rely on someone else to provide her with a home. She’ll come when she’s able to, and you nagging her isn’t going to change that.”

“I do not nag, Richard.” Martha pronounces. “I do wonder why, if there are so many murders suddenly, they haven’t made the news and you haven’t been called to the precinct to shadow Katherine.” She regards them both beadily. It’s clear that she’s still planning to push the point.

Castle fixes his mother with an ominous stare. Before matters – that is to say, her temper – deteriorate further, Beckett puts her cutlery neatly together on her empty plate, drains her coffee, folds her napkin and manages something that bears a vague resemblance to a contented smile.

“Thank you very much for brunch,” she says politely. “It’s been really nice seeing you all, but I have to get home and get ready to go on-shift.” Castle’s hand clenches on her knee. He knows that she isn’t on shift today – but that’s not what Beckett said. She hasn’t, technically, lied, but she’s given a very misleading impression. He also knows that Beckett has reached her limit, and is sensibly leaving before it all goes wrong.

“Ridiculous,” she mutters. “Can’t the city afford more police? Oh, if you have to go I suppose you have to go. It’s a crying shame.”

“Bye, Beckett,” Castle says.

Beckett escapes without – quite – fleeing. As soon as she’s outside she takes a series of very deep breaths, and then goes straight home. When she gets there she collapses on her couch and tries very hard not to scream. That… had been far more difficult than she expected.

But she did it. Take that, Dr Burke. She did it. Mostly. She still found it very difficult to look at their happy family. She definitely felt envious of that. But Dr Burke had said she’s allowed to feel like that. It’s okay to be upset by it. Just as well. She is. She really is. She grabs a handful of Kleenex just in time.

Some time later, the tear-smudged remains of her make up removed, changed into shorts and a tank top, she unrolls her yoga mat and goes through her forms, still sniffing occasionally. The forms help. Yoga has always helped, if not cured. She bends and flexes, ensuring that she only works through asanas in which she doesn’t place any weight on her right wrist, and when she’s done she’s calmer.

She does not want to think about Martha’s extremely unsubtle efforts to convince her to come to the loft. She does not need matchmade or interfered with: the state of her probably-relationship with Castle is far too fragile to be poked and prodded at – and until she’s able to say the words and make good on the implied promise it’ll remain that way. But, she thinks, but that’s why she wants to go to the Hamptons again: somewhere that she might be able to speak.

Somewhere that she might be free of her demons long enough to say I love you.

Castle is not best pleased with his mother’s meddling. He manages not to say anything that might really let the cat out of the bag, but it’s quite difficult. Fortunately, Alexis chatters happily about school, her friends, her sleepovers, her extra-curriculars and life in general without requiring much input other than an occasional question and hums of encouragement. His mother reposes herself in a second glass of champagne, which keeps her content. At least, so he’d thought.

“So, kiddo, why won’t Katherine come to dinner? Have you upset her?”

“No, she’s busy.”

“You don’t expect me to believe that, do you? What have you done?”

“I never expect anything of you, Mother, and am rarely disappointed. This time, though, I expect you to believe the truth. Unless you want to call Beckett a liar to her face. That’ll be sure to keep her away from the loft.”

“I still don’t believe it,” Martha mutters. “Something’s up.”

“I stopped telling you anything when I discovered you were using it in your off-off-Broadway improv works, at around age fourteen. Why would I change that now?”

“Dad, I wanna see Detective Beckett’s dad again. He was really interesting.”

“Yes, kiddo. He was. Cultured and mature. So different from most of the people I spend my time with.” Castle glares at his mother. “What? If the cap fits, darling…”

“If you’ve finished insulting me, I think brunch is done.”

“But Dad, can’t you invite Mr Beckett back again?” That’s a discussion Castle has no intention of having with Alexis.

“Not till he and Beckett have time, pumpkin. Have patience. They’ve got lives of their own, and Mr Beckett is a senior attorney, so he’s pretty busy.”

Alexis makes a face and then sticks the tip of her tongue out as Castle retaliates with an equally ridiculous grimace. At that inopportune moment the server comes with the check and is not quite able to conceal her amusement at the byplay. Castle settles the bill with a minimum of embarrassment at being caught mid-moue, and the family depart before – from Castle’s point of view – the day can go any further downhill.

Alexis disappears as soon as they’ve reached the loft, but unfortunately Castle’s mother does not. Two glasses of champagne before noon appear to have loosened her tongue and emboldened her. She’s already far too bold for Castle’s liking.

“So, darling” – she’s back to darling? Oh, God. This is not going to go well. “I understand that you might not want to talk in front of Alexis, but what is going on with you and dear Katherine?”

“Nothing is going on that you need to know about, Mother. Leave Beckett alone.”

“So there is something going on. I knew it.” Castle barely restrains a groan, and considers the benefits of matricide. “Why won’t she come to the loft?”

“Probably because you’d grill her as if she were a burger, Mother.”

Martha tosses her head. “I would not,” she says indignantly. “But it’s clear something is wrong with her and if she’d only come here I’m sure I could give her some maternal advice.”

Castle loses his patience.
“Mother, Beckett’s mother was murdered. The last thing she likely wants is you trying to be maternal. It’s not your natural demeanour. And Beckett certainly doesn’t need your advice.”

“I’m sure I could help. Every girl needs a mother.”

“Mother, no. Just for once, leave it.”

“Well, kiddo, in that case I’ll give you some maternal advice.”

“Yeah?” Castle says cynically.

“Don’t blow it.”

Beckett’s phone beeps some time later.

You okay?

Fine, she sends back, and thinks no more of it. She’s not weeping any more. She got through this morning. She can do this. She should be very pleased with herself. Small steps forward – but the important word there is forward.

About half an hour after that, her door sounds. On opening it, she’s mildly surprised to find Castle on the other side.

“Hey.”

“You didn’t have much brunch, so I thought I’d bring you some more,” Castle says, producing a box.

“What’s that?”

“You’ll see,” Castle says mischievously. Beckett makes a grab for the box, fails to reach it as Castle raises it above his head, and realises slightly too late that the net effect is that she’s less than an inch from Castle’s chest and she is still in shorts and a tank.

Castle, it is clear, did realise. Something about the way his other arm has snaked around her waist tells Beckett that she’s been suckered.

“There,” he says, happily smug. “Didn’t think you’d fall for that, Beckett.”

“Didn’t think you were still using high school tricks to try to get the girl.”

“Try? Succeeded, Beckett.” She tugs hopefully, and doesn’t move either herself or Castle’s encircling arm. “See? Got you. Right where I want you,” he leers, “and I must say I like this style of nearly dressed.”

“Did that line work in high school too?”

“No,” Castle says, “but this did,” and he leans down and kisses her. It’s all very satisfactory… until Beckett swipes the box and disappears with it to put the couch between them. “Hey!”

“Gotcha,” Beckett says, and opens the box with alacrity. Her face falls. “What the hell is this?”

“You didn’t have any fruit or vegetables this morning. Not good for you, Beckett. So I brought you a kale smoothie. Home made by my own fair hand.”
“Kale smoothie?”

“Yeah. All the vitamins you could possibly need.”

“You’re kidding me, right?”

“Yeah. Look properly. Lift the lid on the other side of the box.”

Beckett’s face changes instantly. “Cupcakes!”

“Is that better?”

“Yep. You can have the smoothie and I’ll eat the cupcakes.”

“What? No. No, no, no. Neither of us drink the smoothie and we both eat the cupcakes.”

“Okay.” Beckett turns to find plates, not letting go of the box. Castle prowls up behind her and takes it away. “Hey! My cupcakes.”

“Our cupcakes.” He emphasises the point by swiping his finger across the top of one cake’s tower of frosting.

He does not expect Beckett to turn with the speed of a preying panther, grab his hand and lick the frosting from his finger with a wicked, sensual twirl of her tongue, then meet his eyes with a challenge which almost covers the shadow of pain. The box is put down, rapidly. Beckett is pulled away from it, very rapidly. And Castle descends upon her mouth, hauls her hard against him and keeps her there with a firm hand spread over her ass where she can feel just what her action has done. Beckett doesn’t seem to be objecting to any of it at all. In fact, she’s melted into him and has brought one long leg up around his middle and is moving over him in a very seductive fashion indeed. Challenge accepted, Beckett.

His tongue takes possession of her lush lips, keeping her head to his; his hand on her rear pressing her tightly against hard hot weight and not letting her escape him. She’s soft and giving and receptive and his, and he will take that hint of pain away.

“You’re very provoking, Beckett,” he growls darkly into her ear, and nips the lobe. “And very provocative.” His fingers skate across the bare skin at her midriff, then dip fractionally below the waistband of her shorts. She wriggles.

“Is this what you do when you’re provoked?” she husks. “Maybe I should provoke you more often.” She runs a naughty hand down his stomach and somehow manages to insinuate it between them, where it curls over the thick outline. Ohhhh. More… around it.

“If you provoke me, I’ll have to respond appropriately. Like this.” He detaches her fingers and keeps close hold of both hands, behind her back, dipping her so that he can trace down her throat and into the valley between her breasts, nudging her tank out of the way. Just before he takes her nipple into his mouth, he stops. “Or like this.” His other hand runs down over her spine, past the hand imprisoning hers, over her ass and cups between her legs, not quite pressing on her. She emits a thin noise of need and desire, and tries to force the touch. “Not yet,” Castle rasps. “You provoked me. You’re going to get what your provocation deserves.”

“What?” she half-gasps.

“Me.” His fingers find the edge of her shorts and slither underneath, dancing along the edge of her folds, slicking through damp heat. Wriggle turns to writhe under his touch. “Provoking you.” It’s turned to a deep, velvety whisper, straight from her ears to her core. Just his words hold the promise of heat and hardness, waiting to fill her. She curves into his frame, and lets his strength envelop her: her hands free to bite into his shoulders, her mouth hot against his. With his arms around her and his hands on her, she’s safe from everything but him. It’s far too late for her to be safe from him.

Castle’s fingers tempt and tease and entice her body to surrender to him, to let him take her anywhere he wants to go – everywhere she wants to go. She gives in and allows him to play her as he chooses, owning her mouth and then sliding fingers over her until he’s breathing in her soft moans; slipping thick digits in and out till she’s repeating his name, over and over because he’s all that there is.
“Cupcakes.”
“Uh?”
“I want cupcakes. And coffee. And then you can tell me how you felt about my mother pushing you this morning.”
“I don’t wanna.”
“No talk, no cupcakes. You’ll get kale smoothie instead.” Beckett tries to show her displeasure at that idea, and realises that she’s currently stuck, nestled tightly against him on the couch. “Not much talking. Just why you did it at all.”
“To show Dr Burke that he’s not half as clever as he thinks he is. He said I couldn’t do it. But I did.”
Castle isn’t actually convinced of that. He thinks that Dr Burke might be even more clever than he thinks he is. Castle thinks that Dr Burke might have trailed a challenge in front of Beckett by telling her that she wasn’t ready to be put in a family situation.
“You did,” he says happily. He has a sudden thought. “Your wrist? I didn’t hurt it, did I?” Beckett tentatively flexes it. “No. It’s fine.”
“Be careful of it. I don’t like my Beckett being hurt.”
“I noticed,” she murmurs. “I thought you were going to save me the trouble of shooting Dr Burke.” The shading of painful emotion is back in her voice. Suddenly she stops. “My Beckett?” she says ominously.
“Yes,” Castle replies, very definitively. “Mine.”
“Says who?”
“Me. You’re my Beckett. My Kate. And when I pet you and you purr, sometimes you’re even my Kat. Right now, you’re just mine, though.” He smooths over her hair and down her back. She curves into the stroke.
“Your mother” –
“is trying to get you to the loft. I know,” he says ruefully. “Stopping her is like standing in front of an eighteen-wheeler.”
“I’ll get there,” Beckett says. It sounds like a vow.
“When you’re ready. Anyway, I haven’t invited you.” Beckett splutters. “You have to wait for an invitation,” Castle says primly, intending to replace pain with snark.
“Like you do?”
“That’s totally different.”
“How?”

“If I waited for an invitation I wouldn’t be able to do this,” and he kisses her, “or this,” and his hand slides over her waist and palms her breast, “or this,” and his other hand traces intimate patterns on her shorts.

“If you waited for an invitation, I might do this,” and Beckett slips the buttons of his shirt apart and inserts a delicate hand to play with his nipples, “or this,” and the hand glides down and opens his pants, “or this,” and it curls around him again to leave him instantly hard in her grip. She slides down, and up. “But you didn’t wait,” and her hand disappears. She looks up at his hot blue gaze and smirks. “So I guess I won’t do that.” She skips a beat. “Cupcakes and coffee?” She tries to stand up, and finds it impossible.

“I don’t want coffee or cupcakes any more. I want you,” Castle growls. He stands with Beckett still tucked against him, picks her up bodily, and carries her to her bedroom. “You’re provoking me again. And you know what happens if you provoke me.”

Beckett smirks. “Do I? Show me again. I think I’ve forgotten.” Saying that may have been a small mistake. Seconds later she finds herself naked and pinned down by a very aroused and equally naked Castle. He reaches down to stroke through her, circling the nerves and not quite pressing. “Castle…”

“Yes?”

“Castle… ohhhh… that’s not fair.”

“Provoking me wasn’t fair,” he says lazily, and circles a little harder. She gasps. “Something you want, Beckett?” She reaches for him, and is forestalled. He slides down a little, and rubs hard flesh against wetness. “Uh-uh. Just let me. Stop making decisions, and leave it to me. You know you’ll like it.” His voice has dropped to sinful seductiveness, stroking her synapses from the inside out, hypnotic. She lets him take the lead and dissolves into the sensation of him sliding slowly into her: filling her full and wholly possessive as he takes her higher, takes her further, and then simply takes her over with him.

Castle wraps his Beckett into his arms and snuggles her in. The stress and hint of pain in her eyes have left her once more, and she’s comfortable – or comforted – beside him. Next weekend, he thinks, out of Manhattan, away from all her cares and troubles: next weekend, they’ll have time to be themselves.

“Cupcakes,” Beckett mumbles, some little time later.

“Coffee,” Castle mumbles in return.

“ ‘Kay.” Beckett stumbles out of her bed and into the bathroom. Castle watches her, and silently whistles at the bruising which he hadn’t earlier noticed. Shortly there is the sound of cleaning up. She emerges damp and tousled around the edges, to don a soft t-shirt and skirt. By the time Castle has tidied himself and dressed, there is coffee and the cupcakes are neatly divided into halves.

“Your father will see Dr Burke,” Castle says awkwardly.

“Okay. Thanks.” Beckett says nothing more about that, but her knuckles are white on the coffee mug. Castle declines to mention his own appointment, or her bruising. Nothing further of any importance is said, and Castle leaves, reluctantly, accompanied by a soft kiss and hug which does nothing to decrease his reluctance.
At five to eleven Castle presents himself at Dr Burke’s office. This time the receptionist doesn’t bother with an appreciative up-and-down. No point, if there’s no reaction, and it was pretty clear on Friday that she wasn’t going to get one.

“Mr Castle.” Dr Burke greets him with a professional smile.

“How is Detective Beckett?”

“Okay.” Dr Burke waits. Castle falls into the silence. “She came out to brunch at Balthazar with us yesterday.”

“Us?”

“My family.”

“Ahh.”

“You planned that, didn’t you? You told her she shouldn’t try knowing that she would.”

“It seemed a reasonable conclusion to draw.” Dr Burke is sporting a very satisfied expression. “If she did not, there was no harm done. If she did, either it would be successful or you would be there to assist.”

“Has anyone told you that you’re a manipulative bastard?” Castle says with considerable fury.

“Frequently. I consider it to be a compliment,” Dr Burke says dryly. “How did your brunch progress?”

“She was stressed, but she got through. My mother pushed her pretty hard, but she dealt.”

“And did she stay long?”

Castle is trapped into truth. “Not as long as I’d have liked. She left not long after Mother started pushing.”

“Would she have agreed to brunch at your home?”

Castle sighs. “No.”

“I see. Some progress, but not as much as we might have hoped. However, that is not the main reason why you are here. I wish to understand how you convinced Detective Beckett to re-associate with you, and why. After all, she could not have made herself less attractive to you than she did by telling you that she could not bear your family. So why did you continue to associate with her?”

“She did it to protect her father. I worked it out, after I got home. I’d never have got it if Jim hadn’t walked into the middle of it, though. She was doing it deliberately to make me think it was all totally pointless. She wanted me to think the worst of her and if I hadn’t heard Jim’s version I’d have believed it. She was very convincing.”

“Because it was true. Detective Beckett could not bear to see you with your family.”

“Yeah. I know.” Dr Burke is, again, surprised. Mr Castle’s intelligence is quite substantial. “So I decided I wasn’t going to let her get away with it. Misleading me.”
“Why not?”

“Because” – Mr Castle stops. “The story wasn’t right. It didn’t fit the character.”

“That is not the only reason. The whole truth, please.”

“Because there was a different person. Not just Beckett, but someone who was softer and who just needed affection and to stand down. I didn’t think she let anyone see that side of her. But she let me. So I reckoned there was something more there.”

“Mm. Very astute.”

“So then Mrs Berowitz called Beckett and she just went. But I called her later and she was at the precinct so I showed up. She didn’t want me to. But I wasn’t letting her walk away without listening to me, so she just had to suck it up.”

“You said that she threatened to arrest you, but that you went to her apartment and found her intoxicated. Why did she threaten to arrest you?”

“I told her the story of what she was doing. She didn’t like being called on the truth.”

“I see. Please continue.”

“She was sodden drunk. Kept saying that she had to support everyone, that everyone needed her. She didn’t want anyone wanting anything any more.”

“Ah.”

“So anyway, it was clear that she was still drowning in guilt for walking away from her father, and over-compensating by trying to help everyone else – Mrs Berowitz. I showed up the next day, and then evening, and didn’t ask any questions at all. And…er…”

“Physical consolation proved effective,” Dr Burke states, based on his observations from Friday. How irritating. That is not a method that would be effective for any other person besides Mr Castle.

“Yeah.”

Hmm. Dr Burke considers for a moment, rapidly reorganising a number of data points: Mr Castle’s behaviour on Friday evening, Mr Beckett’s prolonged – in Detective Beckett’s eyes – weakness, Detective Beckett’s desire that no-one should need her or want anything from her, Mr Castle’s comment on Thursday evening that Detective Beckett is surrounded by tough guys, and finally the mention of “intervention” to solve the issue of Dr Parrish.

“Mr Castle, please would you explain how the intervention to which you referred, in order to resolve Detective Beckett’s quarrel with Dr Parrish, took place?”

“Lanie kept ringing everyone and yelling. Eventually we got a bit fed up, so Espo and I cooked up a plan to get Lanie in one bar with Ryan and Espo, so they could talk to her, and I’d take Beckett to another bar with O’Leary and we’d talk to her.”

“Who is O’Leary?” Dr Burke interjects.

“Detective O’Leary.” Mr Castle’s eyes sparkle. “He’s a mobile mountain. He’s about six-ten, and just about as wide. He and Beckett go way back, right to when she was a rookie.”

“Their relationship?”
“Oh, he’s gay. They’re pals. Paired up for work for a while when in uniform, but nothing else. He’s great. He had all sorts of stories. He’s…um… like her big brother. He’s pretty much the only person I’ve seen who can convince her to do anything at all. He told her to try to patch it up with Lanie and she did.”

“Mm. How very interesting. Am I correct in thinking that you and Detective O’Leary dealt with Detective Beckett while Detectives Ryan and Esposito dealt with Dr Parrish, and that you then collectively allowed Detective Beckett and Dr Parrish to talk?”

“Well, mostly. It took a bit more intervention. We got told to get lost, but each time it looked as if it was falling apart one of us went up to step in. All we got was told to butt out, but by the time they’d finished yelling at us they were pretty much on the same page.”

“Hm.” Dr Burke is beginning to understand. “Mr Castle, do you not detect a pattern here?” Mr Castle looks entirely blank. “Detective Beckett has responded to you and to Detective O’Leary. Neither of you need her to support you.”

“Oh. I thought it was about not talking. But it’s about protecting. She doesn’t have to. Protect us, I mean.” Mr Castle pauses. Dr Burke mentally applauds. “But she doesn’t need to protect Ryan or Espo but she doesn’t let them tell her anything – oh. Of course. She’s their boss. Same idea.”

“Exactly, Mr Castle.” Dr Burke waits expectantly.

“You think there’s something more.” Mr Castle acquires an unfocused gaze which Dr Burke assumes denotes thinking. “Oh – I see. No-one around her – none of the tough guys – needs protected – it’s she who needs time away from protecting people. Or she needs protected. Well. Very occasionally. And she doesn’t exactly ask for it…” he trails off. “I get it. She doesn’t ask because it wasn’t there. She even said that asking never helped. And she can’t ask for help from her subordinates – not that they formally are subordinates, but she’s the senior detective in the team.”

“Indeed. Her father has fundamentally failed in providing protection, at a time when it was most needed.” Dr Burke steeples his fingers. “Detective O’Leary seems to have managed it, and it is clear that in some manner you have made it clear, and far more importantly made Detective Beckett believe, that you will protect her when necessary. Therefore you managed to re-associate.” He hesitates. “This does not assist me in finding a way to help Detective Beckett re-establish a relationship with her father. She does not believe that her father will be able to support her, and it is extremely unlikely that she would attempt to find out.”

“But… but can’t you at least get them on good terms?”

“Naturally. However, you are hoping for a “happy ending”, Mr Castle, and I have to inform you that the ending is unlikely to be as conclusive as you would like. Real life is rarely as tidy as a book can be, and I would, if I were you, temper your hopes for Detective Beckett’s relationship with her father. You have already achieved much in attaining a relationship of your own with Detective Beckett. Do not over-reach and damage that.”

“I thought you said you didn’t do relationship counselling?”

“I do not. You are important to Detective Beckett’s recovery and happiness. That is my only interest.”

Castle shrugs unhappily. “She won’t be properly happy till she’s fixed matters with her father.”

“Fixing matters, as you put it, does not always entail the re-establishment of the original relationship.
Sometimes the best that you can hope for is to establish a different, but effective, pattern of interaction.”

“Oh,” Castle says disappointedly.

“Concentrate on your own relationship with Detective Beckett, and leave that with her father to me. It will be much more profitable.” Dr Burke looks at the clock. “We are almost at the end of the session. Is there anything more for today?”

“No. Thank you.”

Castle returns home, somewhat bruised. He had, he realises, very much wanted to give Beckett the perfect happy ending, mending all her issues with her father. Only you can save yourself. He can’t. He can save them, because Beckett’s putting all her considerable will behind that, but not her relationships with others. She needs to decide to do that, and she still isn’t there.

He turns his mind to the other deeply interesting lesson from today. Beckett needs protected. Or… or wants to know that someone will protect her if need be? Castle isn’t even sure that wants is the right word – Beckett is only too likely to deny it if asked. But it fits. Even right back at the very start, on her joyless birthday, she’d cuddled in and let him lead and been soft and not at all wanting to take charge. And since then it’s been all about… hm. Not asking questions – protecting her privacy. Mildly assertive lovemaking – letting her know that he’ll make the decisions and let her not be in charge: let her stand down in safety. And latterly, coming when she needed him, to gather her in and protect her from the world.

Ah. It’s not what he’d imagined: romantically, swashbucklingly slaying dragons for a fair maiden. Beckett is perfectly capable of slaying her own dragons – at work. But outside work, she needs a safe haven, somewhere she’s protected and petted and cossetted close and doesn’t need to slay dragons. And he can give her that, because he’s secure enough, strong enough to let her shoot the bad guys, so long as he’s the only one with whom she stands down later. He has his own successes, his own reputation, his stable life; and Beckett needs someone who doesn’t need to rely on her for support or validation.

Dr Burke has carefully ensured that his schedule is clear for half an hour after Mr Castle’s session should end. Partly, this was to allow for over-running. Partly, it was to allow him to take account of any new insights or information which might become apparent. Dr Burke is not sure that he has learned anything completely new about Detective Beckett’s issues, but he has certainly been able to put another set of matters into their correct context.

Detective Beckett was stable for as long as she thought she was protecting her father and that he needed her. It appears that Detective O’Leary may have provided some respite, of a platonic nature. Then she came into the ambit of Mr Castle, who was instantly attracted and more importantly very much inclined to act upon that attraction. Mr Castle, Dr Burke surmises, is, or was, not used to resistance to his charms. Cynically, money, fame, good looks and a certain air of forceful masculinity would probably remove most objections. Detective Beckett, however, did resist, for some time. Dr Burke further surmises that Mr Castle had first wormed his way into Detective Beckett’s affections by applying that same forceful masculinity. It seems the only possible way in which two such apparently different characters would come together.

Unfortunately, a series of misunderstandings, undoubtedly caused by Detective Beckett’s inability to ask for help or indeed to reveal any weakness, and then compounded by Mr Castle’s fundamental belief in the sanctity of family bonds, led to a major breach. On the other hand, had the breach not occurred, it is extremely unlikely that Detective Beckett and Mr Castle would have formed such a strong bond. Mr Castle is considerably tougher, mentally and emotionally, than Dr Burke would have expected. He is certainly, in Dr Burke’s expert opinion, capable of providing Detective Beckett with the stability she will need. He is also intelligent enough, both in raw IQ and emotionally, to understand her issues.

Now, about her father. Mr Beckett has no idea how he had behaved while drunk. Detective Beckett has not told him of his words or actions. Mr Castle evidently does know, and has, wisely, declined to interfere. An amateur becoming involved – such as Mr Castle, or indeed Detective Beckett’s previous therapist – would be profoundly unhelpful. He makes a small note in his diary to contact an equally well-respected colleague, to discuss what should be done in regard to the previous therapist.

Returning to Mr Beckett, the first priority is to understand what he knows about how he behaved, and what he had thought about the way in which Detective Beckett had treated him once he became dry. After that, Dr Burke will need to consider how, or indeed whether, to undertake the exceedingly delicate task of enlightening him as to the effects of the actions Mr Beckett does not yet know he took. Intertwined with these two difficult items is the potential for Mr Beckett to introduce a new complication to this matter, as if there were not quite sufficient complexities already, if he should resent Mr Castle’s relationship with Detective Beckett or indeed Mr Castle’s interference in his relationship with his daughter.

Really, it is just as well that Detective Beckett had come to him, Dr Burke. No lesser practitioner – as has been seen – would be capable of unravelling this tangle. However, he does admit to some relief that the majority of his patients are much less complex and more easily assisted.

On that thought, he turns to one such patient.
At six p.m. Dr Burke is advised that Mr Beckett has arrived. He stands to greet him. Mr Beckett, he immediately notes, bears little physical resemblance to his daughter. Dr Burke concludes that Detective Beckett is, as she had implied, of very similar physical type to her mother. Mr Beckett is only of moderate height, and more wiry than muscular. Interestingly, he bears no physical resemblance whatsoever to Mr Castle. A minor complication: that Detective Beckett might unknowingly have been seeking out a man who physically resembles her father, but with the strength she thinks that her father lacks, is negated, much to Dr Burke’s relief. Further complexity is emphatically not required in this situation.

Dr Burke notes Mr Beckett’s slight air of unconscious hostility, and a more evident air of discomfort and wariness.

“Good evening, Mr Beckett. Thank you for agreeing to meet with me.”

“You’re welcome.” Mr Beckett does not sound welcoming at all.

“Mr Beckett, please explain why you agreed to see me.”

“Because if I don’t, Rick Castle will ensure that I never see or talk to my daughter again,” Mr Beckett spits out.

Oh, dear, Dr Burke thinks, in the strongest imprecation he allows himself within his treatment room. Here is the next complication.

“And you wish to resume contact with Detective Beckett?”

“Are you insane? Of course I do. I thought you were supposed to be a good shrink, not some quack charlatan.” Dr Burke begins to discern some considerable similarity of temperament between Mr Beckett and Detective Beckett.

“However, that does not require seeing me. How exactly do you think Mr Castle will know if you simply walk out of here now? I certainly would not disclose that to him. Moreover, how do you think he will stop you contacting your daughter? He can hardly confiscate your cell phone, or hers.”

“She won’t answer. She won’t see me. The only way I’ve found out that she’s okay at all is Rick Castle.”

“It is very hard,” Dr Burke says gently, from his standpoint as a man slightly older than Mr Beckett, “to watch one’s children decide that another means more to them than their parent does, and to see them form other emotional bonds. Even as they grow up under normal circumstances, that is a difficult separation.”

Mr Beckett winces. “I thought she loved me,” he whispers. “But right now it seems like she never did, ever since…”

Dr Burke is already certain that Mr Beckett requires a totally different technique from the blunt, harsh truths which have been effective with Detective Beckett. This man is close to broken, and needs empathy and gentleness. It is as well that he, Dr Burke, is older than Mr Beckett. This would be far more difficult were he younger, and did he not have a grown family himself. Mr Beckett will respond well to Dr Burke’s experience and age. Too, Detective Beckett can rely on Mr Castle’s gentle but unstinting strength. Mr Beckett has no such option, although he will, of course, have his “Mr Beckett, Mr Castle believes that your daughter needs you. He has struck me as an intelligent man, and therefore he must have some reason for that belief. I, too, believe that it is necessary for you and Detective Beckett to repair your relationship. It is unlikely that it will be as it was before your wife passed. That, however, is perfectly normal and expected. It is inevitable that as your daughter grew to adulthood, your relationship would change. I have certainly discovered that as my children have matured, our relationships have constantly changed, sometimes with some violence and difficulty. I too am a parent, and therefore I believe that we have some common ground.”

Dr Burke smiles, ruefully and parentally, remembering – and allowing Mr Beckett to see him remembering – occasions on which such change had occurred. He decides that the most effective way to help Mr Beckett, who clearly needs such help, is to treat him as a man of experience and depth, and as a parent who has shared some of the same challenges as has Dr Burke.

“Mr Beckett, given that you are here of your own volition, and may depart at any time you wish, would you prefer to be addressed, and to address me, with first names? As I said, we have some common ground. You are not a patient, but here as a parent and as someone whose insights will help your daughter heal. I do not wish you to feel that you are being treated,” Dr Burke is, here, skirting the edges of truth, “but that you are assisting in treatment.” He pauses, until Mr Beckett inclines his head. “My name is Carter.”

“Call me Jim.”

“Shall we begin again, Jim?”

“Yeah. I’m sorry for being so tetchy. But… I thought everything was fine, and then she met Rick Castle and suddenly everything started falling apart. I thought he’d be good for her, and all that happened was that half the time she was with him and the other half either she fought with him or she wasn’t happy at his place and then she just told me that if she wasn’t enough family for me she was done. And she hasn’t spoken to me since. I just keep calling, and she doesn’t pick up. If it wasn’t for Rick I wouldn’t know anything.”

“That must be exceedingly irritating, as well as reassuring.”

“How do you – oh. One of yours did it, didn’t they?”

“Yes. My eldest daughter – I have two daughters, and a son – took offence at my – as she put it – practising on her. She refused to speak to me for some time. Her then-boyfriend, however, did. I did not appreciate the gatekeeping.”

Mr Beckett relaxes somewhat. “Yes, nor do I. I know he has Katie’s interests at heart – in fact, I thought he’d be good for her almost as soon as I met him: he’s got guts and he doesn’t let Katie push him around – but it doesn’t make it easier. Especially since he never actually tells me anything. I’m sure he knows what’s really wrong, but he’s as close-mouthed as an oyster. Just keeps saying to let him take care of Katie and trust that it’ll all be okay in the end.”

Dr Burke thinks idly that Mr Beckett will, rather soon, be escorting his daughter up the aisle, and remembers with a tiny pang how he had felt, doing the same.

“Jim, I appreciate that this is very uncomfortable for you, but would you please tell me about the immediate aftermath of your wife’s death, and include how you interacted with your daughter at the time? If it is too painful, please stop, and we will talk of other things.”
“Shoes and ships and sealing wax?”

“Or cabbages and kings,” Dr Burke caps, and the two older men exchange a smile that contains tentative tendrils of mutual appreciation.

“Nicely done, Carter. We used to play that game at home.”

“We did too.” Dr Burke steeples his fingers, and waits for Mr Beckett to continue.

“I ought to go back a little further. Johanna – my wife – and I, well, we met at college. Not quite childhood sweethearts, but near enough. Never really looked at anyone else, not after I met her. Still, it wasn’t all wine and roses, we argued some, pretty harshly at times, but she was it for me. Me for her, too, which was a bit more surprising. We were both aiming for the top: she wanted to be the best defence attorney in Manhattan, I was into commercial law. Both ambitious, both hard-working. We wanted a family, but that… well. That was a bit harder. Didn’t come easily. Johanna had wanted several, and I sure didn’t object, but we only ever had Katie, and that took a long time. So when Katie came along, everything was pretty much perfect. As much as it ever is with a child, anyway.” Dr Burke smiles in sympathy. Children are hard work, no matter how much they are loved and wanted.

“Katie was bright, and mule-headed stubborn. Wanted to be the best at everything. Stuyvesant, scholarships, Stanford, that sort of thing. She was just like her mother had been. Even looked a lot like her, as she got through her teens.”

Dr Burke files that away. Detective Beckett had been like her mother in both looks and personality. That explains some more of Mr Beckett’s behaviour.

“And then Johanna was murdered. Stabbed in an alley. Katie was home for Christmas from Stanford. It was dreadful. I couldn’t believe she was gone. I had a drink, and it softened the blow. Got the funeral arranged. After that, I just couldn’t cope with anything. Katie… well, Katie just took over. Just like her mother would have done. And I couldn’t deal with the resemblance, so I drank more until I didn’t see it any more. Katie didn’t talk about her, and that helped. Then she went back to Stanford, but by that time I was already too far in to stop. Didn’t want to stop. Katie didn’t seem to need me… didn’t ask me for anything, didn’t talk about anything. She called a lot, though. She had the same voice, the same turns of speech. On the phone, it could have been her mother. So I drank some more, to blot the memories out.”

Mr Beckett stops. “I know now that I let Katie down then. She needed her mother and she needed to grieve too. But I didn’t see it at the time. All I saw was the bottle, and oblivion. It wiped out the memories, and it wiped out how alike they were.”

Mr Beckett’s emotions are raw, still. He is, however, not shying away from the first key point: that he failed his daughter.

“And then she turned up at home. She was there when I woke up. Said she’d got in the previous evening – I didn’t – I don’t – remember that at all, even now. She said I’d been drunk, and she was right. I don’t know what happened. I was so sorry. I promised I’d never do it again, and I meant it. But of course I did. She’d cleared out all the booze, but I just bought more. She came home more often – God knows how she funded it – and then she transferred to NYU, and even then I couldn’t or wouldn’t stop, even when she gave up Stanford. It was always her dream. She quit her dream to try to save me and I wouldn’t be saved.”

“Jim, do you remember anything at all about how you reacted to your daughter while you were still drinking?
“I was drunk so much... when I was sober, she was the only thing I had left. I asked her not to go, not to leave me. She was my only good thing. And then she left. Stopped getting me out the tank, stopped taking my calls, cut me off completely.”

“But you remember nothing of how she, and you, behaved when you were not sober?”

“No. When I went through AA, and the twelve steps – I spent nine months in rehab first – I told her everything I remembered, and asked if there was more I should know, and she cried, and said no, that it was enough. Ever since then, she’s been there.”

Dr Burke passes Mr Beckett the Kleenex. “Your daughter had unstintingly supported you since you became sober, had she not?”

“Yes. She couldn’t have done more. If I called, she’d always answer; if I needed to go to a conference – that’s always hard – she’s on the end of a phone. We had dinner every week, she takes the early shift and we have our meal in the evening. She says it’s so the guys with young children can have the early part off, be with their families. I get that. We brought her up to do the right thing. Sometimes I wish we’d have the morning too: the whole day together, but Christmas is most important to kids.”

“I see. And does she ever refer to the time before you became sober?”

“No.”

“Mm.” Dr Burke pauses. So far, so good, and informative. As Mr Castle had surmised, Mr Beckett knows of no reason why his daughter should have given up on him. However, Detective Beckett had comprehensively avoided the issue of talking to her father about his behaviour when drunk, of which Mr Beckett has no memory. Dr Burke does not condemn him. He understands what it is to love one’s spouse that much. “What made you begin to worry that all was not well?”

Mr Beckett takes some time to collect his thoughts. “Well, it was pretty recent. First off it was fine. Really good, in fact. Katie bought me a game for Christmas, called Sorry, and she had been mentioning Rick for a few weeks, and it sounded like they were getting well-acquainted.” He smiles fondly. “So I teased her a little, like you do” – Dr Burke nods, and smiles reminiscently, equally fondly – “and it all sounded rather hopeful. But then I had to go to a conference, so Katie invited me round for dinner before I went and when I showed up I could hear them rowing from before the elevator doors opened. It was pretty clear they were furious with each other, but Katie was shut down mad, and Rick was yelling. I didn’t know what to do, so I just filibustered. He’s a big guy, Rick, and he’s a bit scary when he’s mad – though Katie’s just as scary, so I guess they cancelled out. Anyway, I said whatever came into my head, that Katie’d talked about him, that we’d played the game a lot, and suddenly he went sheet white and then Katie said he was leaving but I just kept talking, don’t know why, said he was her friend and told him she’d saved me. He went even paler, and then Katie used a voice that God Himself wouldn’t say no to and Rick went. Her mother used to have a voice a bit like that, but never quite as harsh. Suppose she needs to be harsh, as a cop.”

“She is a remarkable woman,” Dr Burke says, without actually specifying what he regards as remarkable. Disconcerting Mr Beckett will be unhelpful. He will have quite enough to process.

“I tried to find out what was going on, but Katie wasn’t talking about it. Anyway, a few days later, I got a call from Rick.”

“That must have been surprising.”

“I’ll say. So he showed up, as nervous as any teen meeting his girlfriend’s dad, and then he told me he wasn’t going to use me in a book, which I didn’t exactly expect to hear. He’s using Katie as his inspiration, though he does seem to understand the difference between her and his character. Well” – Mr Beckett smiles rather mischievously – “I pushed him a bit, to see what he was made of, and he got mad and bit back, so I thought he was likely able to stand up to Katie, and I told him my story. I believed him. He’s not the sort of guy to stab you in the back.”

“No,” Dr Burke agrees.

“And… well, I liked him. And it was clear that whether he knew it or not he was head over heels for Katie. What she felt… well, that I wasn’t sure about. Still not sure, though if I believe Rick then likely she’s just as gone on him.”

“I believe that to be the case,” Dr Burke says, dryly.

“Good,” Mr Beckett says. “I think.” He pulls his thoughts back on track. “So then Katie wanted some background for a case and I thought I’d like a look at both of them together so I suckerd them into coming for dinner. I didn’t notice anything that wasn’t like usual, that evening. Then they called me up and suggested I talk to some woman whose husband was an alcoholic. Berger, Barrow, something like that.”

“Berowitz.”

“That’s it. Fluffy blonde, couldn’t have argued her way out of a wet paper bag. My sponsor thought it was a pretty good plan. Rick’s idea, though.” This does not surprise Dr Burke. He finds it unlikely in the extreme that Detective Beckett would ever have asked her father to undertake an action which she felt would be too much for him. She would have been wrong, as is evident. She would also, unconsciously, be protecting herself from the situation, whilst pretending that she was only protecting her father. Dr Burke will need to hear Mr Beckett’s view of that meeting. Detective Beckett’s had been spare in the extreme, and had then only been mentioned in the context of her father’s highly unfortunate comment about Mr Castle’s family; and Mr Castle’s expansion had, naturally, not been able to enlighten Dr Burke as to Detective Beckett’s emotions.

“So I thought I’d have another little look at Rick with Katie, and told them to come round for breakfast. Katie wasn’t happy with me. Dad’s privilege, though. Anyway, they came, and then I showed Rick all the family photos, and Katie was just completely zoned out. I thought she’d at least complain, but she just wasn’t there at all. I was a bit worried about that. So – er – I finagled Rick into having us over for dinner, and that’s when it all started to go really wrong. Katie wasn’t happy. Wasn’t happy about me questioning why she was running round after the Berowitzes, and sure wasn’t happy about going to dinner. So when I actually thought about it, it finally struck me that Katie was always cheery when I saw her or spoke to her, which didn’t seem right. Then I realised that Rick had said that Katie wouldn’t talk to him because he was going to upset me. And then I started to wonder what Katie thought she was doing, because it wasn’t what I thought she was doing. I thought we were being a family, but I began to think that she might think she was protecting me. So I started to worry.”

“How did the dinner go?” Mr Beckett had arranged a dinner with Mr Castle’s family? It is astonishing, given Detective Beckett’s commentary and issues, that she had gone at all, still more so that she had completed the evening without an emotional breakdown. Mr Castle had mentioned this, he recalls, in the context of Detective Beckett not upsetting her father.

“It was great. Rick’s family were really good fun. It was the first time I’d been around a family since… since Johanna died.”

Dr Burke raises an eyebrow. “I thought you had said that your daughter came round frequently.”
“Yes, of course. But that’s my family. I hadn’t been around any other family for – well, years.”

Ah, a classic miscommunication, which would readily have been resolved were it not for the history of which Mr Beckett is not aware.

“But Katie was out of sorts. She was playing tired, just like she did when she didn’t want to stay at her grandmother’s.” Mr Beckett grins. “Neither did I want to stay at her grandmother’s. That woman could glare down a grizzly, and she never thought I was good enough for her daughter. Guess that’s where Katie got her toughness from.”

“What did you think was wrong?”

“I hadn’t the faintest idea. Rick’s family were really nice to us. Couldn’t have been more welcoming. Clearly loved Katie, and extended it to me.”

“Have you had any further thoughts?”

“No. I thought we should have them back to dinner, and Katie wouldn’t have any of it. She just completely lost her temper like she hasn’t done since she was a teen, and told me that she didn’t want them in her apartment and if I invited them she wouldn’t come. Then she said she wasn’t enough and she was done and she walked out and I haven’t heard from her or seen her since. All I’ve got is from Rick. So why’d she do it, Carter? What am I missing?”
“Before we get to that, Jim, could we go back to your meeting with Mrs Berowitz? I am exceedingly interested in your thoughts on that occasion. I have the impression that that was the first time in which you became quite certain that there was something wrong with your daughter.”

“Yeah. Up till then it was all circumstantial, and it could just have been that Katie really was tired, or that she and Rick were having a row. God knows, I had a few with Johanna that sounded just as bad as the one I walked into, and we got through it.”

“Surmounting rows is the sign of a healthy relationship,” Dr Burke agrees. “And it is certainly my impression that they have done so.”

Mr Beckett smiles, a little wryly.

“I’d rather find out what I’m missing, than go back over things.”

“I know. Unfortunately, I need to know what you have concluded, before I can decide what is best for your daughter. Your perceptions are as important as hers, and I do not wish to taint your perceptions with my conclusions to date, nor with your daughter’s views. We cannot afford misunderstandings here, Jim. It is very important that I understand your observations.”

Dr Burke is deliberately appealing to Mr Beckett’s desperation to help Detective Beckett. He is certain that this will work, despite Mr Beckett’s clear desire to know what the real issue is. Dr Burke does not yet wish to discuss that.

“Okay, then,” Mr Beckett concedes. “I get that. Untainted evidence. So. Mrs Berowitz. Katie was tense from the off, and Rick knew it. He was leaning into her as if he was ready to grab her and take her out, but I didn’t see him lay a finger on her. Katie was as stiff as the fireplace poker. Anyway, I went through my story, same as Katie had heard before, but she – it was as if she’d never heard it. Found out that Katie had been running round trying to find Mr Berowitz, pulling him out the tank. Mrs Berowitz said she’d done it twice, took a shot at Katie not doing it another time, when he’d already been found. I couldn’t believe Mrs Berowitz was that selfish about it. She could go get her own husband, she didn’t need Katie for that. Then the stupid woman said she could never give up her husband, when I said that Katie had walked away. Katie was white. Cold, as if she’d been hit.”

Now that is interesting. Mr Castle had said that he had thought Detective Beckett to be stressed. Wired had been the word he had used. Mr Beckett regards her as having been cold.

“Damn woman had made her feel guilty. She never needed to feel guilty. She was the only reason I ever got dry. I was going to talk to her about why she did it…”

Mr Beckett stops, to compose himself. Dr Burke stays calm, and silent, to allow him to reveal his thoughts in his own way.

“Then Mrs Berowitz just wrote off everything I’d told her and Katie got mad. Really mad. I thought she’d grown out of her temper – when she was a teen she oftentimes let rip, but this was right back to that, except it was still cold.” Likewise, Mr Castle had regarded this as emotional, to the point almost of tears. It is extremely interesting that Mr Beckett, who knew Detective Beckett before tragedy had struck, believes her to have been unemotional, while Mr Castle, who has only seen her some time afterwards, regards her behaviour to have been – for her – extremely emotional. Hm. The depth of repressed emotion that Dr Burke suspects to be present is substantial.
“She laid into Mrs Berowitz and then walked out. She said she couldn’t save me, and that Mrs Berowitz would just have to live with whatever decision she made.”

Mr Beckett blows his nose.

“Mrs Berowitz burst into tears, and I was just shocked. It sounded like Katie had never come to terms with any of it, but I’d always thought she had. I couldn’t believe it. We had to wait for someone to turn up, and I had time to think. Katie sounded like she still felt guilty for walking away, but she’d never let on. Sounded like she couldn’t deal with not being able to save me. It’s been five years, and I’d never seen a hint of that before. Rick made sure I got to my sponsor, and then he went to see Katie.”

Dr Burke does not mention that Detective Beckett had refused to see Mr Castle.

“I spent a long time with Ed.” Dr Burke produces a questioning look. “My sponsor. By the time I was okay again, Katie had texted, but it was too late to answer. I…” he looks shamefaced “…I wasn’t in a place where I could have the conversation we needed to have. She texted again before eight the next morning. Soon as I could, I called her. She said she was fine. Like I’d believe her. How she could think I would believe that, after how upset she was… I don’t know. And… I guess I was still a bit worked up from the whole thing, and I was a little, well, exasperated with her trying to shrug it off, so I told her that telling me she was fine was a lie. She didn’t let me finish. I was going to say that I was worried about her, but she lost her temper again and said…said…”

“Said what, Jim?” Dr Burke asks very carefully and gently.

“Said that I was ashamed of her, said that she could never have been enough. She said she was still trying – but then she wouldn’t say what and she cut the call and I couldn’t get through. I kept trying. Finally I called Rick, and he said leave it to him.”

“What did you think then?”

“I didn’t know what to think. It didn’t make any sense at all. So I called later. Rick hadn’t called me either. Her phone still wasn’t on, so I called Rick, and” – Mr Beckett winces, and colour flares in his face – “he said they were a bit busy.”

The uncomfortable tone tells Dr Burke everything he needs to know about Mr Beckett’s thoughts on that matter. Dr Burke is more inclined to believe that Mr Castle had not, in fact, been engaged in intimate congress; but in a much more protective position, much as he had been on Friday evening in this room.

“A lot later she called back. She sounded absolutely fine: even happy. I assumed that Rick had managed to get her to talk about it and – er – cheered her up. So we apologised to each other, and it was all fine. That day. But then I started putting the pieces together and I wasn’t nearly as sure that she was fine at all, but I didn’t think she’d talk to me – after all, if she wasn’t telling me the whole truth then she wasn’t going to start later.”

“Why did you think she wasn’t going to tell the whole truth?”

“Everything. She never got upset or cross, she never told me anything was wrong – not about work, or a bad movie. Nothing was ever wrong. It couldn’t possibly be true, when I actually thought about it. And now she was saying that she was fine again, but it wasn’t realistic that she was better. She was” – he searches out a word – “sanitising. Censoring. Never telling me about anything unpleasant or unhappy. As if I wouldn’t cope.” He stops. “Or maybe she thought I wouldn’t care. If she meant it when she said that she was never enough for me, then maybe she thought I didn’t care enough to listen if she was upset. Anyway. Rick told me nothing, as usual” – that is bitter – “and Katie finally called and pretended she had an upset stomach and that was the whole problem. But she was lying. And then the next time I saw her I tried to get the truth out her and she wasn’t having it and then it all went to hell. Now she won’t take my calls and all Rick says is leave it to him.”

Dr Burke recognises a similarity from Mr Castle’s version of events. Detective Beckett had reacted to someone forcing her to see the truth by pushing them away. Indeed, she has tried the same tactic on him. It has failed with Mr Castle, who was strong enough – and emotionally involved enough – to evolve a strategy to manoeuvre around it, and it has failed with Dr Burke, who is professionally capable of withstanding all such tactics.

“I see.” Dr Burke does indeed see. Among other things, he sees that Mr Beckett had been deceived by his daughter into believing for some years that all was well. However, he has an outstanding concern.

“Jim, you have said a number of times that your daughter has said that she couldn’t save you. How do you interpret that?”

“It’s nonsense. She saved me by walking away, and then she saved me by being there after I got dry.”

“But you were the one who chose to stop drinking, were you not? You still do, every day.”

“Yes, but I needed a reason. Katie was the reason. If she hadn’t been there, I’d have had no reason.”

“She was your original reason for choosing to stop. But – forgive me – she has rejected you, and yet you have remained sober in the face of very considerable adversity.”

“Oh. I see. I didn’t explain very well. She was the reason to start, but after I’d been going to AA for a while I realised I couldn’t put my burden on her. It’s not up to her to keep me sober, it’s up to me. I’m the only one who can control myself. She can’t.”

At least Mr Beckett has a proper sense of the second C. Dr Burke swiftly considers his options. Gentle direction ought to be appropriate here.

“Jim, this conversation has been very helpful indeed in understanding your view of events and in understanding your daughter. I should like to ask a few further questions, which will not take long, and then we can discuss how best to help you reconnect with her.”

“Okay.” Mr Beckett looks determined, but nervous. “Whatever it takes.”

“Jim, your daughter chose to go into a profession, one of whose mottos is protect and serve. Do you think that your daughter was trying to protect Mrs Berowitz, and if so, from what?”

Mr Beckett is obviously thinking about that. “Mm,” he says slowly. “It wouldn’t surprise me. She’d be trying to stop her going through the same upset that Katie did.”

“That concurs with my thinking. Now, you have entirely correctly noted that it is you who is solely responsible for your sobriety. In the light of your daughter’s wish to protect strangers, do you consider that she may regard it as her job to protect you, and again, if so, from what?”

The pause as Mr Beckett thinks is much shorter, this time. “I can’t say it hadn’t occurred to me, recently. I said it, earlier, that I was beginning to wonder, but you making me lay it all out like this, and thinking about how she was always cheerful and everything was always fine, I think she was.” He pauses again. “You think she’s been trying to keep me away from anything that might upset me… and send me back down the bottle.” It is not a question. Dr Burke watches as Mr Beckett, displaying the same fierce intelligence as his daughter, takes the next step. “What else has Katie been hiding from me?” And then the next, colour and life draining from his face, leaving him abruptly old. “What did I do when I was drunk? What did I say to her?” There is a further, ghastly, silence.

“Why did she never tell me? She should have told me. It wasn’t her job to protect me from the truth.” He stops, hard. “Did I tell her something that made her think she wasn’t enough? Wasn’t family?” His face crumples greyly. “I did. I must have.”

Dr Burke shifts the box of Kleenex slightly, and decides that a modicum of truth of his own is necessary.

“Jim, I believe that without you in any way knowing it, or meaning to do so, your daughter has gained that impression. We could discuss it now, and we will if you wish to, but I believe that the best way to help you and your daughter through this is for a discussion to take place between you and your daughter as to what your precise words and actions were, and why she did not speak of them. I only know what she believes, and I would only be relating second hand information, without a proper context, which I consider would be very partial and potentially very damaging for both you and your daughter. I suggest that such a discussion takes place here, where I can assist. I strongly recommend that you do not try to open it otherwise, if you wish it to be fruitful.”

“Not much chance, if she won’t see me. So you think I should wait?”

“I do,” Dr Burke says gently. “However, I will tell you that your daughter had therapy some time ago. The therapist was, to say the least, incompetent. As a consequence, she has been labouring under considerable misapprehensions for some time, including relating to how she has dealt with you. Understandably, this has caused her unhappiness and discomfort. Under my guidance, she is uncovering and correcting these, but it has been uncomfortable.” Mr Beckett looks as if he might say something. “The therapist will be dealt with. I have already set the appropriate procedures in motion.” A relaxation.

“So what do we do, Carter?”

“I will contact you as soon as I think that a discussion can be profitable. It may take a little time. I suggest you stay in touch with Mr Castle, despite your understandably mixed feelings about his role, as he is a strong supporter of you re-establishing a family relationship with your daughter. It will be likely to ease your mind.”

Dr Burke applies a sympathetic expression, entirely sincere, to his face. “I counsel you to talk this over with your sponsor. You are naturally wondering what more you might have done, and how to resolve this, and it will be most upsetting for you until your daughter is ready to speak freely to you. Of your willingness to speak freely, I have no doubt. You are also most welcome to contact me at any time, if you wish for a further opinion. My receptionist will have instructions to make space for you. You are a strong man, Jim, but as you know, sometimes a little help is required to stay strong.”

“Appreciate it,” Mr Beckett says.

“Jim, if it is any consolation, I believe that your daughter is as distressed as you are at this breach between you. I should like to see it mended in the shortest possible time. However, it will not be the same as it was when she was nineteen. Do not expect that. She is older, and her experiences have changed her, as yours have changed you. Your interactions need not be better, or worse, but they will be different.”
“I guess.”

Dr Burke wishes that he could reassure Mr Beckett, but he cannot in good conscience do so. On the balance of probabilities, matters will be satisfactorily resolved, but he is unwilling to guarantee that. On the other hand, if he cannot do so, then no other psychiatrist in Manhattan could resolve this conflict either.

“Jim, may I make one final suggestion?”

“Mm?”

“Please would you see your sponsor, after you leave this session? Even if it is only for a few minutes, I profoundly believe it will be comforting.”

“I was going to,” Mr Beckett says. “It’s all arranged. He’s expecting me. Funny thing is, Rick said the same thing. Even offered to be here, if I wanted. Guess he’s all in. Who else would put up with us Becketts?”

Only the very strong and the very brave, Dr Burke thinks, and bids Mr Beckett farewell.

Before leaving, Dr Burke considers his next meeting with Detective Beckett. He hopes that she will present herself for her scheduled appointment tomorrow. He is not at all sure that she will. However, he now considers that he has all the main components of the information which he is likely to need, and if she should not attend he will use the time to consider how best to manage the extremely difficult meeting between Detective Beckett and Mr Beckett.

Beckett is sitting staring at a cold case file in the bullpen, not thinking exclusively about the file in front of her. She is, in fact, thinking about the file and therapy in approximately a sixty-forty ratio, and coming down on the side of just giving up on both for today and going home immediately shift ends, possibly by way of a store selling chocolate and/or ice-cream. Comfort food, especially with coffee. Maybe coffee chocolates? Coffee chocolate ice-cream? Both, with added coffee?

She’s getting as bubble-brained as the latest celebrity reality TV star, and she knows why. She doesn’t want to go to therapy tonight. She doesn’t want to deal with Dr Burke and his hard truths about her and her father. Friday had been an absolute disaster and she can’t face having what little skin she has left peeled back and the flesh salted. She can’t bear the thought that she’s still looking for her father to love her when he patently does not.

Castle hadn’t shown up yesterday, since cold cases are not his thing, and unless there’s a new case shortly it’s likely to be the same for the short time that remains of today. Although she’d prefer him in his accustomed chair next to her desk, in an odd sort of way it had been rather reassuring that he hadn’t turned up yesterday or now: it assuages her nervousness that he feels he has to be there all the time. At which point, her phone rings.

“Beckett.”

“It’s me.”

“Hey, Castle.”

“I forgot to tell you that I sorted everything out for next weekend. We can go Friday, come back late Sunday.”

“Thanks.” She sounds distracted.
“What’s the matter? Wrist sore?”

“No, just aches a bit. Too much writing.”

“I’ll kiss it better, later.”

“Yeah.”

There’s a pause. Beckett hadn’t exactly sounded enthusiastic.

“Do you want me to pick you up tonight? Or just see you at yours as usual?”

“I’m not going,” Beckett says combatively.

“Uh – what?”

Castle hears a short silence punctuated by the closing of a door.

“I’m not going.” Beckett says again. Castle picks up, underneath her normal precinct decisiveness, considerable unhappiness. What he doesn’t know is whether she is unhappy because she is remembering Friday’s fiasco or whether she’s unhappy because she knows she ought to go tonight.

“When were you supposed to be there?”

“Six.”

It’s only five now. Formally, shift ends in thirty minutes.

“Have you called to cancel?”

“No.”

This may be an improvement. If she hasn’t actually called to cancel, yet…

“When are you going to?”

“Huh?”

“Well, if you’re not going to go you ought to tell them. And since you’re not going how about we go for dinner somewhere?”

There is a nonplussed silence down the phone.

“I thought…”

“That I’d object? Not my decision. Not up to me.”

The last time he’d tried reverse psychology tactics they had worked. He hopes they will work again this time.

“But…”

“But?”

“But I thought you wanted me to go.” She sounds confused, which is already a lot better than combative.
“Only if it’s helping you and you decide to go. Otherwise, what’s the point? It’s up to you what you do.”

“But I thought you wanted me to come to the loft?” she stutters. “Don’t you?”

“Yeah, but that’s up to you too. When you’re ready.” He’s not going to issue ultimatums here. That would be fatal. “Anyway, you saw my family on Sunday morning and nothing went wrong, if you discount my mother’s presence. So you’ll get there. Up to you how long it takes.”

“But… but what if I can’t?”

“Then you can’t.”

“But I want to.” There’s a long pause. “If I go will you meet me there after, and then if I’m okay we could go for dinner?”

“Sure,” says Castle, without betraying by a single misplaced breath his enormous relief. “What time?”

“Seven.”

“Okay. We can go to Remy’s. See you later, Beckett.”
It would be exaggerating to say that Dr Burke is surprised to be informed that Detective Beckett has arrived for her appointment. It would be more accurate to say that he is mildly perplexed. Similarly, he is not relieved. It is for his patient to decide whether or not to attend. He is not a truant officer. It is true to say, however, that he had not necessarily expected Detective Beckett this evening. It is also true to say that he is mildly impressed that she has attended. Friday’s session, while the truths revealed had been entirely necessary, had been gruelling, and Dr Burke would have been entirely unsurprised had Detective Beckett decided to take an intermission while considering the matters that had been discussed.

However, she is here.

There are four matters which concern Dr Burke: that Detective Beckett has never told Mr Beckett the whole truth about his behaviour whilst inebriated; Detective Beckett’s guilt at having, as she sees it, walked away from her father when he needed her; Detective Beckett’s propensity to remove entirely from her ambit those who have hurt her; and Detective Beckett’s equal, and related, propensity to remove entirely from her ambit those who have attempted to point out the truth.

Dr Burke wishes most earnestly for her previous therapist to be cast out of the profession. Had they done their job properly, Dr Burke would not be trying to show Detective Beckett that she has believed and acted upon a false premise for at least five years. Given that she had been informed that all she needed to do was grow up and get over it, and having thought that she had done so, being told that in fact her actions have not allowed her to grow out of her issues must be a crushing blow. It is hard to take the actions you have been told by a trusted professional are correct, and then find that they are utterly wrong. It is hardly surprising that one does not wish to discuss the true position in those circumstances.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett.”

“Good evening.”

Dr Burke is not particularly reassured by the unusual formality.

“With what do you wish to begin?”

There is an entirely predictable silence. Dr Burke lets it draw out.

“I don’t like you,” Detective Beckett says angrily. “I don’t like your commentary and I don’t like your conclusions. You haven’t shown me any evidence or proof, you’ve just thrown out unsupported theories.”

Dr Burke regards Detective Beckett calmly. “If you believe that you can disprove my theories, then let us by all means explore that. I am very content to explore the evidence for and against each, and, as you are a detective, I assume that this will be acceptable to you. If your evidence is better than mine, then I will accept that. I have never claimed to be omniscient. Which theory would you like to attempt to disprove first? Perhaps you should list them, and then begin.”

“Fine. One. My father did not abuse me. Two. My father doesn’t care, and I don’t care about him. Three. Dealing with Castle’s family has nothing to do with dealing with my father.” Detective Beckett glares at Dr Burke. “We can start with the third. I know you’re wrong because I had brunch with Castle and his family on Sunday and it was just fine.”
“Did you go to Mr Castle’s home for this brunch?”

“No, but that doesn’t matter. I spent Sunday morning with his family and we got on just fine.”

“That sounds remarkably promising, Detective. Do tell me more.” Detective Beckett entirely misses the subtlety behind that question. Dr Burke steeps his fingers under his chin, and watches her carefully.

“Castle invited me for brunch and I went.” Dr Burke does not, himself, partake of brunch. He controls his waistline vigorously, and brunch would damage it.

“Where did you go?”

“Balthazar. Spring Street. Typically Castle. Packed out. I don’t know how he got a table. It’s really popular.”

“What time?”

“Ten.”

“What did you wear?”

“You’re a fashion consultant as well as a shrink?” Detective Beckett says unpleasantly. Dr Burke ignores her attempt to anger him. It is merely another way of trying to push away the truth.

“I am interested in all of the evidence. What did you wear?”

“Shirt, pants, blazer.”

“And the others?”

“Castle was in a dark blue sweater over a cream button down and navy slacks. His mother” – she grimaces – “was wearing a multi-coloured kaftan, mid-length, probably silk. Orange and green, in an abstract pattern. Not easy on the eye – you could spot it a mile off and you’d still need sunglasses. Alexis had on a pretty cream top and black leggings, with a black bolero style cardigan.”

“So they were all relatively casually dressed, as you would expect for brunch.”

“Yeah.”

The need for a description has taken Detective Beckett into her professional zone, and removed some of the more obvious anger. Dr Burke does not think that this will survive his next few words.

“If you expected them to be casually dressed, why were you dressed more formally? Your description of your clothes sounds as if you were wearing similar garments to those which you wear to work.”

“Are you criticising my dress sense now?” Detective Beckett emits in incredulous fury.

“I am sure you looked perfectly stylish. I am merely pointing out the incongruity between your style of dress and theirs.” Dr Burke decides to point his moral. “Why did you feel it necessary to dress as if you were at work?”

“What?” How did you” - Detective Beckett stops very hard on that sentence, but she has already given away the key point.
“So you agree that you were dressing as if you were at work?”

Detective Beckett looks as if she is about to deny it.

“The truth, please.”

“Yes,” she bites out. “So what?”

“That doesn’t imply that you were treating this as a normal, casual brunch. Why were you approaching it with a work mentality?”

“I… I…”

“Were you treating this casual brunch as if it were an investigation?”

“No.” Dr Burke produces a gaze that, from her expression, Detective Beckett last saw in her own mirror, practising her interrogation stare. “Fine. Yes. I can deal with families at work, so I guessed it would make it easier.” Dr Burke notes that the word is not easy.

“It does not appear to me that you were able to take it entirely in your stride, nor that it was, as you described it, fine? But, as I said, I shall be happy to be proved wrong. Please provide more of your evidence. For example, what were the subjects of conversation at this brunch?”

Detective Beckett is quite clearly gritting her teeth. Dr Burke takes that as a sign that she is realising that she is losing the argument on this area.

“Castle’s writing. His house in the Hamptons.” She stops.

“And?”

“His family wanted me to come back to the loft.” Detective Beckett’s teeth are clamped together.

“How kind of them. And of course, since you now have no issues with seeing his family, you accepted?”

Detective Beckett regards him as a cornered wolverine regards a hunter. “No,” she says bitterly.

Dr Burke does not place any undue stress on his next words. “That does not sound as if this issue is wholly solved. Substantially progressed, undoubtedly, but not solved. So, while you have made progress in coping with Mr Castle’s family, you have not yet shown that you have wholly resolved that issue. You may wish to consider why you still feel unable to go to the loft.”

He pauses. No answer eventuates. Dr Burke had not expected one. “Perhaps we should consider a different issue? Which would you prefer?”

“My father did not abuse me.”

“Your evidence for that?”

“I’m not a victim. I walked away from it and didn’t come back till I had independent evidence that he was dry.”

“Suggestive, certainly, but simply walking away does not prove that abuse did not occur, it simply proves that you were strong enough to leave a situation producing similar results to an abusive situation.”
“And he didn’t mean any of it. It was the alcohol, not him. Abuse is deliberate. This wasn’t.”

“An interesting distinction. Please expand.” Dr Burke perceives once more Detective Beckett’s desire to believe that her father was not deliberately cruel to her while apparently simultaneously believing that he does not care about her.

“When he was sober, he didn’t tell me he didn’t want me, he said he wanted to be a family. So since he only did it when he was drunk, it was part of his alcoholism.”

“Let us look at that more closely, then. Which of those statements did you believe to be true?”

“Huh?”

“When sober, your father wished you to be a family. When drunk, he told you to leave because you were not your mother. Which of those did you believe?”

There is a protracted silence. It appears that Detective Beckett has not considered the inconsistency of these positions. This is hardly surprising: it is well known that the pattern of deliberate emotional abuse involves enough apparent kindness to balance the unpleasant reality, until the victim’s behaviour adapts. As it happens, Dr Burke is quite certain that Mr Beckett was not deliberately abusing Detective Beckett, however it is necessary to disentangle the behavioural patterns in much the same way as if he had been.

“Mm. You seem to me to be more inclined to believe that he did not want to be a family.”

“Yeah. Well. He’s said so now.”

“Before he said so, what would you have believed?”

“Family.”

“Why?”

“That’s what he said when he made amends. He was sorry and he wanted to be a family again.”

“But you did not tell him that he had said the opposite when he was drunk.”

“No.”

“That implies that you believed that he did want to be a family. Until the recent statement, how did your father behave?”

“Like he wanted to be a family.”

“You are a detective of considerable ability. Would your father have been able to conceal his feelings from you for five years?”

“He did, though, didn’t he?” Detective Beckett says acidly. “So clearly I didn’t treat him like a suspect.”

“Detective Beckett, it seems that you yourself cannot decide what your father meant. We therefore have no conclusive evidence one way or the other as to whether he cared or not – we have moved from the question of abuse to the question of caring,” Dr Burke points out. “The two are very closely linked, so this is not at all surprising.” There is, of course, a way to resolve this, but Dr Burke wishes to extract any further evidence or assumptions before introducing that suggestion. “However, I should like to return to the question of abuse, or not.”

He steeples his fingers. “Allow me to describe to you the pattern of deliberate emotional abuse, and then we can consider the evidence for or against your father’s behaviour. Note that I am not, in doing this, drawing any conclusion as to whether it was abuse, or whether it was deliberate.”

“Okay,” Detective Beckett mutters resentfully. Dr Burke observes her dislike of being proven wrong, and sympathises.

“Emotional abuse, at its core, is a pattern of behaviour which is designed to lead the victim into behaving in a way which affords the abuser gratification. In its simplest form, the perpetrator conditions the victim into reacting in a specific way. This may be by informing the victim that they are behaving unreasonably, unlike other people, or stupidly – when in fact they are not; or by becoming angry or tearful when the victim wishes to take some action which the perpetrator does not wish them to; and, most importantly, by rewarding the victim with kindness and/or the similitude of love when they behave as the perpetrator wishes. The outcome which the perpetrator desires is that the victim will behave exactly in accordance with their wishes, which generally involves subordinating the victim’s own needs and desires to theirs. That tends to result in the victim going out of their way to please the perpetrator and ensuring that any behaviour which might trigger the reaction of the perpetrator is minimised or absent.”

“Bullying.”

“There are considerable similarities, but one substantial difference. In bullying, the unpleasantness is generally not masked, and may or may not involve a situation where strong emotional bonds are expected to exist. In emotional abuse, it is more subtle and insidious, and takes place over a longer period. It will often present within a family unit – parent to child, or child to child, or spouse to spouse – or in a situation where close friendship is assumed.”

“Oh.” Dr Burke allows Detective Beckett to consider his words. “But that’s still deliberate. My father wasn’t acting deliberately. So it can’t be abuse.”

“If a perpetrator commits manslaughter, not murder, does that not produce the same outcome?”

Detective Beckett fails to find an answer to that thesis.

“You said he abused me.”

“No, I said that the way you have behaved with him exhibited similarities with the way in which victims of emotional abuse react to their abuser. I have not said that your father was, or was not, an abuser.”

“Is it painful sitting on that fence?” Detective Beckett jibes. Dr Burke ignores that.

“There is, of course, a relatively simple way to deal with all of these evidential requirements, and for you to prove your case.”

“Yeah?” Detective Beckett says, extremely sceptically.

“This Gordian Knot would rapidly be cut were you to conduct an interview with your father, here, under my supervision.”

“What? You can’t possibly be serious.”
“I am perfectly serious. Witness evidence is always better than circumstantial evidence, is it not?”

“My father couldn’t cope with it.”

“I have interviewed your father and I am content that he will be able to withstand the truth. If I am there, if it is apparent that he is struggling, I will step in and pause or stop the interview.”

“When did you speak to my father?”

“Yesterday. You will recall that you gave me permission.”

“And I know you’ve spoken to Castle too,” Detective Beckett says bitterly. Dr Burke wonders whether Mr Castle will still be capable of speech after he sees Detective Beckett again. It does not presently appear likely.

“You do not have to decide now, Detective Beckett. I am perfectly content to continue treating you without such an interview taking place. I merely suggest that it would accelerate your healing. If, or when, you consider you are ready, then we can arrange it.” He considers briefly. “It might be best to wait until you have considered matters for a little longer, with my guidance.”

“No. We are going to deal with this once and for all and you’ll see that you were wrong.” Precisely as predicted, Dr Burke thinks, Detective Beckett has taken the bait. He considers that this meeting must take place sooner, rather than later. Detective Beckett’s state is not notably stable. “But I’m going to ask Castle to be there too.” This is not a surprise to Dr Burke either.

“Then shall we attempt to arrange this meeting for your normal time on Friday?”

“Fine.”

“Is there anything else you would like to discuss?”

“No.” Detective Beckett glances at her watch. “Castle will be waiting for me.”

Dr Burke notices something. “That is an unusual watch for a woman to wear.”

“It was Dad’s. He gave me it when he got dry.”

Dr Burke says absolutely nothing further. He considers that if Detective Beckett is still wearing that particular watch it is proof positive that she cares about her father.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett. I shall inform you about Friday.”

“Thank you.” Detective Beckett grits out. Dr Burke does not consider her to be thankful at all. He, on the other hand, is. It may have been a little manipulative, but reverse psychology works extremely effectively on Detective Beckett. He will need to have a further conversation with Mr Castle, and preferably with Mr Beckett, in order to ensure that all proceeds smoothly in a proper direction on Friday. He makes a note for his receptionist to contact both of them, and smiles in a satisfied manner as he prepares to leave.

Beckett finds Castle planted in the reception area, scribbling in his notebook and then, inspiration clearly failing, he sucks the end of his stubby pencil and humphs.

“Hey, Castle.”

“Beckett!” he bounces. “Just in time. Stand there for a minute.” He runs eyes up and down her appreciatively. “Got it.” He scribbles some more.

“Care to explain?” Her voice is a little sharp.

“I ran out of inspiration,” Castle says simply, “and you showed up at just the right moment to supply some.” He smiles beautifully. “Dinner?”

“Yeah. Let’s get out of here.”

Castle slings an arm around her shoulders and snugs her in. This has the happy effect that she’s comfortably close and the less happy effect that he can detect every last tension knot in her back, of which there are many. He walks her down to his car, settles her into the passenger seat, and pulls out smoothly. As soon as they’re in the flow of traffic in the direction of Remy’s, he puts a large hand over her knee and squeezes. Automatics are so convenient.

“Rough session?” he rumbles.

“I don’t like him,” Beckett complains. “He’s a smug jerk who thinks he knows it all. He can’t prove anything. He thinks he’s a better investigator than me.” Her voice is rising.

“That’s dumb,” Castle manages to insert. “No-one’s a better investigator than you.”

“He said I should prove him wrong,” she growls. “He has to prove his dumbass theories. I don’t have to prove anything.”

“Okay,” Castle says, more to sound supportive than anything else.

“He wanted me to prove I was right.”

“So you did.”

There is a very uncomfortable silence, followed by a very embarrassed and completely inaudible mutter.

“Beckett?”

“Couldn’t.”

Castle nearly fails to stop at the intersection because he’s too busy trying to retrieve his dropped jaw from the footwell.

“Uh?” he manages, while trying to avoid causing an accident. What has Dr Burke done this time? He’d privately bet money – okay, a single dollar with himself, but still, money, that Beckett could have proved Dr Burke wrong.

“He had a smartass answer for everything.” This time the growl has fangs. “But I’ve got him. On Friday he’s going to have my dad there for me to talk to and then he’ll see he’s wrong.” She descends into blackly furious muttering. “Thinks he can prove me wrong? Witness evidence? He’ll eat his unsupported theories without ketchup.”

“Friday?” squawks Castle. “I thought we were going to the Hamptons on Friday night.”

Beckett stops muttering. “I’d have to go to therapy first anyway, or face Montgomery.”

“But… if you’ve been talking to your dad…” or interrogating, Beckett, and which will it be?
“Don’t you want to go?” she says. “I still want to. Don’t you?” She suddenly sounds painfully uncertain again. “I don’t have to go. If you need peace to write… I shouldn’t come. Friday isn’t going to be peaceful.”

“You’re coming,” Castle says very decisively and very firmly. “You don’t get to wriggle out it and hunker down in your apartment being miserable on your own.”

“So we can both be miserable? That’s dumb.”

“No, because you won’t be miserable with me. I’m a guaranteed cure for misery.” His hand creeps north of her knee. “I know just how to make you happy,” he purrs seductively.

“We can’t spend all the time in bed, Castle.”

“Bed? Bed? No, no, no. Walks on the beach, followed by hot chocolate and toasted marshmallows, make you happy. That’s what we’re going to do.”

“You won’t want to, after Friday’s session.”

“Why not?”

“I… I… please would you be there on Friday?”

When Castle flicks a glance across Beckett is hunched in the corner of the passenger seat. Asking clearly cost her something, and it’s equally apparent that there’s more to her concern than simply interrogating her father.

“Sure,” he says, in a comfortably reassuring rumble.
Castle finds a space relatively close to Remy’s and parks tidily. Beckett hasn’t said a word since she asked about the Hamptons, and remains cramped into her corner, about as far away from relaxed as she could get. Castle, being well brought up, politely opens her door for her and extends a hand. Admittedly, this has almost as much to do with Beckett’s lack of any impetus to move as politeness. Beckett’s fingers are cold in his.

“We can get it to go,” he says.

“No. The shakes never taste the same from a go-cup.”

Way to minimise, Beckett. Her hand is still in his as they walk in, and Castle is pretty sure she hasn’t noticed. It makes it easy to steer her into a booth which tucks her between Castle and the wall. Beckett’s responses to Castle have been about as useful as her non-reaction to being tucked beside the wall, which she normally doesn’t like. Still, at this stage, her hand is still contained within his.

The provision of a menu and the necessity to order brings Beckett back to some attentiveness. Castle despatches the server with the orders and then turns to the more important issue.

“What do you want me to do on Friday, Beckett?”

“Be there.”

This is not particularly helpful or informative, but it is totally achievable.

“I can do that. Anything else?”

“I don’t know. I don’t want to think about it.” She sounds tired, or maybe defeated.

“You need fed,” Castle distracts. “Not eating causes low blood sugar and destroys thinking.”

“And do you have any scientific evidence for this?”

“No,” he admits. “But it woke you up.” He rubs his thumb softly over her hand. “It’ll be okay. I’ll be there.”

“I just want it all to be over. Done. You told me that therapy takes time, but why is it so hard?”

Castle takes a chokingly large bite of his burger to avoid answering that immediately and truthfully. Because your first therapist fucked up is not exactly going to help anyone’s cause here, and it’s right at the front of his mouth. He splutters on the crumbs, and is promptly patted on the back. Even that is oddly indefinite, and her touch is swiftly withdrawn.

“All I wanted was to be able to deal with your family and work.” Nothing else arrives to expand on that statement. She pushes her burger around her plate, crumbles the edge of the bun, picks it up, puts it down unbitten; nibbles a fry without any apparent desire or enthusiasm. Castle steals one, his own being almost finished, and succeeds in carrying it off without Beckett raising the slightest protest.

He summons a server, speaks briefly to him, and fairly shortly Beckett’s burger and shake are residing in a doggy bag – again, without any comment, protest or objection.

“I’m taking you home,” he says. “If we’re there, then you can simply stand down.”
“Okay.”

Beckett obediently follows Castle out, sits in his car without the slightest move to try to take the driver’s seat, and remains wrapped in her cloud of gloomy non-communication all the way to her building, all the way up in the elevator, all the way into her apartment, and all the way, apparently on autopilot, to her kettle and the cupboard with the coffee mugs. At that point she appears to realise that there is life outside her skull.

“Coffee?”

“Please,” Castle assents, and shifts up to her to put an undemandingly warm hand on her waist. She stiffens, and for an instant he thinks, appalled and almost frightened, that she’s going to move away, until she leans into him.

“What’ll I do when he says flat out he doesn’t care?” she says hopelessly.

What’ll you do if he says he does care? Castle wonders. At this point both outcomes are equally traumatic.

“You don’t need to think about it now. Let it all settle for tonight, then think about how you want to handle the whole situation tomorrow. You never go into Interrogation without having a plan, and all your thoughts in order with a list of questions, so why change now? Treat it like a witness interview.”

“You think that’ll help?” she says quietly.

“Letting it settle always works when I’m not sure where my plot is going.”

“This isn’t a book, Castle,” she says bitterly. “This is my life.”

He hugs, carefully, as she spoons coffee into the French press. “All the more reason to take time and think.”

“If it’s wrong – if Dr Burke is wrong, and since he’s wrong about everything else he’ll be wrong about this too” – she’s back to combative: Dr Burke clearly pushes all her confrontational buttons – “then whatever I do Dad’ll be back in the bottle. Not that it’ll matter to me: since he doesn’t care, why should I?” She stops. “Why can’t I just not care?”

Castle turns her into his clasp and gathers her close. There’s no sound, but he’s pretty sure she’s weeping: silently, so that nobody knows. He’s momentarily exasperated that she still won’t show him her feelings until he actually pressures her into it, but that’s a discussion for later. Or possibly Dr Burke. He makes a little mental note to contact Dr Burke, considerably prior to Friday’s session. (His brain insists on inserting the word torture into that sentence, right before session. Certainly for Beckett. Now if only he wasn’t certain that it will be torture for him too…) He thinks that he and Dr Burke need to have a very frank discussion about what is going to happen, and how they intend it to play out – and what Castle will do to Dr Burke if Beckett is as upset as she was last Friday. He will start with the Viking blood eagle. Then he’ll move on to drawing and quartering. Hanging would, he feels, be otiose. And unsatisfyingly quick.

He smooths up and down her back, consoling. “Stop hiding, Kate. C’mere.” He holds her closer, but tips her chin up, rather against her will, so that he can see her face. Tears are glimmering unshed in her eyes. “Stop hiding. You don’t need to hide from me.”

She doesn’t answer that, and Castle’s heart sinks a little. Instead she prepares the coffee tray, an almost indiscernible tremor in her tense fingers. Castle forestalls her by picking it up and transporting it to the table before she tries. He feels that if she tries, and drops it, a lot more than just two mugs and a French press will break. Beckett is suddenly, terrifyingly, fragile. The image of a decorated blown egg flits through his mind, and he shivers. More is resting on Friday than even he had thought. Their weekend in the Hamptons suddenly seems like a very good idea, but not necessarily for the reasons he, or Beckett, might first have believed.

Beckett, apparently impervious to normal human concerns such as being scalded, or pain, takes a mouthful of extremely hot coffee, completely undiluted by creamer and spices despite them being right there in front of her, and then leans forward to put her mug back down and doesn’t rise from her hunched, concealing position, elbows on knees, hair obscuring part of her face.

“It didn’t help,” she says. A moment’s thought reveals that this is a belated answer to his last sentence.

“Mm?”

“Crying didn’t work.”

Castle is abruptly recalled to Beckett’s comment on getting angry. _It never worked_, she had said. _He just drank more till he couldn’t hear me_.

“Nothing worked. Why bother getting mad or upset? It didn’t stop him getting drunk. It didn’t make him care.”

He says nothing, merely projecting an air of comforting there-ness should she look to him for anything. It seems unlikely. Beckett’s back inside her own head and if she’s remembered he’s there, it’s not obvious.

“I just need to treat him like any witness. He’s not my concern.” _But you lay yourself bare for the victims, and all of it is your concern._ “All I need to do is plan it out. Then it’ll all be done.” _It won’t. It really won’t, Beckett._ “Nothing left to worry about.” Her voice drops almost to inaudibility. “Nothing in our way.” _But there will be, because you’re never going to get out of the guilt you’re drowning in if you don’t talk to your father properly._

Castle decides in that instant that he will be seeking a meeting with Dr Burke first thing tomorrow morning. He is quite seriously worried about Beckett’s so-called ‘plan’ for this Friday.

He slides an arm around her, and is not much reassured when she doesn’t actively move away, since she also doesn’t lean into it. He couldn’t say that she’s exactly relaxed, there in the crook of his arm; but she is there. For an instant, again, he’d thought that she would resist, or worse remove herself. It seems not.

“How are you going to do it?” he asks. His motives for asking are certainly mixed. He intends to ensure that Dr Burke is briefed. He doesn’t want to be blindsided on Friday himself. He _hopes_ that he can help Beckett to develop her plan in a way that will cause least trauma to everyone – though that’s up to her.

The one thing he is _not_ going to do is to mention any of her plan to Jim.

“Don’t know yet. I need to think about it.” Castle ignores any ghost of a hint in that statement that might mean he should leave. He has no desire to leave, and no intention of suggesting it. In preference, he tugs a little to indicate that Beckett should be a good deal closer than she currently is. She doesn’t react, seemingly lost in her head once more.

Castle doesn’t like that non-reaction. He doesn’t like this – or any – unhappy Beckett; he doesn’t like her fluctuating emotional states (and they worry him, because he can’t help feeling that the zigzagging high-to-lows are simply the warning signals for a major earthquake or eruption). He hasn’t forgotten that Beckett’s temper has been on a hair-trigger ever since her past began to be uncovered and her therapy began; ever since her locked-down control started to fail.

He wonders, suddenly, how exactly she had wound up with a damaged wrist. He’d – albeit through his monstrous hangover – had the distinct impression, on watching that first sparring session, that Beckett and Espo had been quite careful not to damage each other: punches and kicks had been pulled. On Sunday, though, she’d been bruised up and down her back. It doesn’t seem that they’d been pulling any blows. He makes a mental note to call Espo in the near future, or maybe to go to the Twelfth tomorrow.

He also doesn’t like how, every time Beckett’s upset, he seems to end up using sex, or at the very least sensuality, to calm and soothe her; because she doesn’t seem to be able to express emotions early enough to avoid a storm. He knows it works, and he knows she appreciates it, oh yes, but… it’s not entirely healthy. Dr Burke’s words swim into his mind: do you see the pattern here, and his, Castle’s, own response: she lets it all build up till it’s too much and then it explodes. There has to be a less physical way: a more emotional, more intelligent route than the physical explosion of orgasm. Maybe when they’re in the Hamptons, where previously they had, so very briefly, found it: found talk and laughter and happiness as well as spectacular sex; maybe there they can find that again.

Thinking paused, he notices that Beckett has still not nestled into him. He tugs once more, and when that fails to produce voluntary movement or attention, and regardless of his thoughts a moment ago, he hoists her up and simply plops her down where he wants her: in his lap and enclosing arms.

“You’re thinking too loud,” he says. “Stop thinking so loudly. I can’t hear what you’re thinking with all that noise going on in your head.”

“You’re not supposed to hear what’s going on in my head.”

Castle pouts at that same head. “Yes, I am. How’m I going to help you plan if I don’t know what’s in your head?”

There is a short, unhappy silence. “I don’t know what’s in my head any more.”

“Treat it like a case, then. Like I said a minute ago. Just like one of your Beckett-flavoured cases. They’re all a mess until you start pulling them apart.”

“A case?”

Beckett considers. She had got through brunch by pretending they were witnesses… maybe she should do that again. Witness – or suspect. But not now.

“Not now. Tomorrow.”

She has a sudden burst of Castle-like insanity which surely causes her mouth to speak before her brain has operated.

“Tomorrow night. O’Leary can help. He knows the history of what he said in the tank. I need to know what he was saying when I wasn’t there to hear it. Independent evidence. You know what my father is thinking. I know he’s lying. So all three of us can do it.”

“What?” Castle emits. “O’Leary too?”

“Why not? Practically the whole world knows, but I’m not bringing Ryan and Espo into this. Or Ah-oh. Lanie is not entirely fixed. That doesn’t indicate perfect trust, perfectly restored. Castle is still choking on the extraordinary inclusion of O’Leary when Beckett stands up before he can stop her and starts to pace.

“Right. Evidence. What he did when he was drunk. What he said. How he behaved when I pulled him out the tank. What O’Leary heard, or saw, or thought. What I remember from his rehab – and all the lies he’s told since. What he’s told you.” She takes a breath. “What I remember from before rehab.”

“How you feel?” Castle tentatively mentions.

“No. Feelings aren’t evidence.”

Castle starts to acquire a very bad feeling of his own as Beckett continues to pace and speak. She isn’t evincing the slightest interest in how she or her father feel or felt about anything. She’s completely focused on the tangible evidence: actions, words, timings. Gradually he realises that she’s assuming her father’s guilt – i.e., that his misconceived and miscommunicated statement about family was true in exactly the way she took it – and that she’s intent on proving that. She hasn’t even noticed it.

“I thought you were trying to prove Dr Burke wrong?”

“I will. All I need to do is show that it wasn’t deliberate. Abuse is deliberate. All I have to do is show that he was wasted to the point of blackout when he said it and doesn’t remember. Then it won’t be deliberate, and Dr Burke will see he’s wrong. And then I show that Dad doesn’t care, and we’re done. It doesn’t matter if he doesn’t care, I just need to know that’s the truth. When I know it, then I’ll get past it and it’ll be so unlike your family that I’ll be just fine with them.”

Beckett appears not to care that her plan will rip her father apart. Castle wonders if she’s, even for a second, considered that she may think that she can get through this without any emotion, but that it’s vanishingly unlikely that she will, and downright impossible that her father will. He also wonders if, down in some subconscious oubliette full of poisonous wyrms and venomous phantasms, this isn’t being driven by an unsuspected, unconscious desire to ensure that her father is made as miserable as he’s made her. He absolutely has to see Dr Burke. Beckett is, consciously or, far more likely, not, aiming for scorched earth, mutually assured destruction of her father and herself; and, like an overtired, over-emotional child breaking a treasured possession, will regret it bitterly as soon as it can’t be undone.

“Okay,” she says, the snap of cold command and this-is-how-it-will-be underlying the word. She takes her phone and stabs at the screen.

“O’Leary? Yeah, it’s me. Beckett.”

“I need you to come out for a beer. I’m buying.”

“I wanna go through what happened back when.”

“When my dad was being picked up drunk in the Park.”

“Yeah. I mean it. I’ll explain tomorrow.”

“Okay, now, then. Shrink says all my issues” – sharks bite less hard than that emphasis – “are down to my dad abusing me.” You’re admitting that to O’Leary? Christ, Beckett.
“No, I don’t get that. Anyway. I don’t agree. Dad didn’t abuse me.” I notice you’re not mentioning anything about your Dad not caring, Beckett. “I’m going to prove it. But I need to know what you saw when you were there and I wasn’t. Evidence. I’m not having that shrink saying Dad abused me. It’s not true.”

“So I’ll see you tomorrow? Molloys?”

“Yeah, Castle’ll be there too.”

“See you. Bye.”

Castle also notices that Beckett hasn’t mentioned that Jim will be there when she does prove it. Or doesn’t. That’s a lot of evasion. He has a nasty feeling that he should have a word with O’Leary before tomorrow night too. Soon. Very, very soon. Mutually assured destruction, he thinks again. He can almost hear the ominous scraping of the missile silos opening.

Beckett is still pacing, the aggressive clack of her heels landing on the wooden floor, the hiss of her breath as she moves, the calculations running over her face and the hard look in her eyes: the one he’s seen in interrogation, most lately applied to Cal Donbass, and before that to James Cardon. Fear of Friday becomes outright terror. Scorch the earth and salt the fields. Detective Beckett is going in for the kill, and it’s quite obvious that she doesn’t care who goes down with her any more.

Castle has the sudden blinding realisation that Beckett has decided that since her father doesn’t care, and she thinks she wants not to care either, she’s forcibly ensuring that neither she nor her father will ever be in a position to even think about caring ever again. It’s the logical next step on from and then she does her best to make sure that whoever’s hurt her never gets the chance ever again. And Dr Burke has just handed her that chance.

The exceedingly clever Dr Burke may just have made an exceedingly large mistake. It appears that he has underestimated Beckett’s capacity for self-destruction. Perhaps this is not surprising. Everybody has underestimated Beckett’s capacity for self-destruction.
All alone with the memory

Beckett is still pacing, still ramrod straight and iron-faced. Castle, unusually, has no idea what to do. If she were in any way looking upset, as she had been earlier, he would take her in his arms; if she were infuriated he would do the same; if she were – miraculously – talking he would listen, and respond. But she is doing none of those things, and he is quite seriously scared that touching her will spill her pent-up need – ten years of pent-up need – into a disaster that will ensure that it’s not just Jim who never comes near her again. Dr Burke had said it is not unknown for such anger to be displaced on to…a party for whom the subject of therapy has deep feelings. This is precisely the moment in which that just might happen, and he hasn’t thought about how he will deal with it at all.

He stays extremely quiet and doesn’t draw attention to himself in any way: thinking frantically. When Beckett had lost her rag with Lanie, he’d got away with sheer assertiveness and angry, rough, wholly dominant sex. Which is all – he winces at the phrase – fucked up, but will work, because they’re so combustible together that the heat… is redirected. But he doesn’t want to take the chance. He also doesn’t want to leave while he’s so unsure of what to do. Instead, he finds his notebook and stub of pencil, flips the leaves to a clean, removable page, and starts to make notes.

He’s covered two sides in bullet points before Beckett stops route marching through her apartment, and he hasn’t been hurrying. He puts his pencil down on a third page.

“What’re you doing?” she asks. It is not, Castle notes, her interrogation tone, nor yet a snap. It’s curious.

“Well, you were thinking, so I started writing down my thoughts for tomorrow till you stopped. If you’d been any longer, I’d have left you a note and gone home. I didn’t want to disturb you.” He shows her a following page, on which is already written Beckett, gone home, don’t think too late. C. He doesn’t mention that he’d written that first, so he could say that whenever she returned to Planet Earth. It all helps to create the impression he’ll say no to her.

Beckett flicks a glance at her watch and winces. “I was thinking.” She changes tack. “Do you want some more coffee? That’s got to be cold by now.”

“Okay,” Castle says, agreeably.

Hot coffee appears. Beckett doctors hers with massive cream and spice infusions, which is probably a good sign, and then snuggles into Castle’s side, which is definitely a very good sign. He drops his arm around her shoulders, where it clearly ought to be. She puts her cup down, leans her head on his wide shoulder, and, rather to Castle’s surprise, nuzzles his neck. It’s so unusual for Beckett to be simply affectionate that he doesn’t really think, simply lifts her legs over his lap, strokes her hair and down over her shoulder; eliciting a tiny soft noise and a definite snuggle in.

“Mmmmm,” she hums, and nuzzles in some more. Her hand creeps round on to his other shoulder, sneakily, as if he might not notice her cuddling him. (There is no universe in which he wouldn’t notice Kate Beckett cuddling him.) She’s quietly, subtly trying to offer up, yes, affection, without him quite noticing it – is that in case he might reject it? Surely not. But maybe this is not an evening where they should end up in bed. This might be an evening where they are snuggly-close with a little intermittent kissing. Who knows, they might even…

“Let’s watch a movie, Beckett.”

“Mmm?”

“Why am I not surprised?” she says dryly. “Okay.”

Castle, since he’s there and Beckett doesn’t look inclined to move from her curled up position on the couch, works out her system and puts the movie on. When he returns he is less surprised than earlier that Beckett, who is rapidly softening into certainly-Kate and maybe-Kat, nestles back into him so that they’re back to snuggly-close again.

It’s…comfortable, Castle thinks. Almost like when they were in the Hamptons. They discuss – argue – about the film; they’re physically close but it’s not the scorching, spectacular sex (good as that is); they’re not emotionally (Beckett’s not emotionally) all over the place. Beckett, in fact, is not in evidence at all. Kate-Kat is. Despite the fact that she’s clearly seen the movie a lot, each time there’s an exciting bit she yips and wriggles and even clutches his knee. That tickles, which is something he’d rather she hadn’t discovered, because he can see the possibilities for mischief and mayhem rising in her eyes. Which gives him a good excuse to hold her, and both her mischievous hands, more tightly.

In fact, it’s just plain nice. Kat’s laid her head back on his shoulder and he’s leaning on her and despite the point that he hasn’t actually so much as kissed her since… wow. Since Sunday. Castle decides that this is just plain unacceptable, rather than nice, and since the closing credits are starting to roll it’s a good time to restore the situation to acceptability. He nuzzles his nose into her hair to find her ear and then kisses its edge. She turns a little towards him, which makes it much easier to bring her legs back over his and cosset her into his frame, and then to drop a line of tiny peck-kisses along the line of her cheek and then jaw and then to arrive at her lips, which are already a fraction parted to meet him.

After that he doesn’t bother thinking any more. Kissing Kate-Kat is far too good to spoil it with thoughts, and she seems to be as happy with soft, affectionate, undemanding making out as he is. Unfortunately it has to come to an end, which is signalled by an enormous yawn from Kat followed by an embarrassed flush of colour.

“I think it’s your bedtime,” Castle says, only a little annoyingly. Surprisingly, this is not followed by mutilation of his ears or nose.

“Yeah.”

But Kat, who is curled up disturbingly pettably in his lap, doesn’t move. Castle has a rush of roguishness with an added dose of rakishness and exhibits it by grasping her bridal-style, standing up (no-one mentions the wobble that nearly tips him down again) and transporting her to her bedroom to drop her gently on the bed. She sits back up and tugs him to sitting on the edge, and then kisses him.

“Thanks,” she says. “The movie was a good idea. Just what I needed.” She peeps, a little uncertainly, through her lashes at his face. “Did you...”

“I had fun too,” Castle says, not making a joke out of it. “I’ve got Mission Impossible II and III. Shall I pack them on Friday?”

“Mmm, yes.” She yawns again.

“Bedtime.” He grins. “Where’s your teddy bear?”
Kat casts him a searing scowl which gradually morphs into a sly, seductive smirk. “I grew out of teddy bears when I discovered men,” she purrs. “I hope you’re not suggesting I need to go backwards?”

“No,” Castle says happily. “Only for the nights you don’t have me.” He drops a swift kiss on her nose, which is scrunching up cutely, and a slower one on her mouth. And then he slips out of her arms, before he doesn’t slip anywhere at all except into her bed and then her body. “I have to go home.”

“I know.”

“I’ll see you tomorrow. I’ll come by the precinct. I need some observation time.” And I want a chat with Expo. Or Ryan. Maybe Ryan first. Get the story about that sparring match.

It’s not until Beckett is dropping into sleep that she realises that Castle had left with his notes. She’d been so intent on making coffee and being affectionate, hoping that she’d made up for her lapse into pacing and thinking, that she’d forgotten to ask about Castle’s thoughts. Maybe when she’s sorted her own thoughts out, which will not be tonight because her thoughts are still not ordered. She needs to sleep on it, and let that straighten them out. She’ll go in early, and in the familiar environment of evidence, clues, witnesses and simply cop work, she’ll be able to apply Detective Beckett rather than drowning in Katie.

She isn’t going to be her father’s Katie any more. But she might yet manage to be Castle’s Kat.

Beckett slides into her chair in the bullpen far too early, and almost instantly slides out again to make herself coffee. Espresso. Lots of espresso. The caffeine hits her brain almost instantly, too. She looks at the paper in front of her and picks up her pen. So. Evidence. The details of the funeral, its aftermath, and her return to NYU are noted down. Each occasion on which her father had told her to go is added. It looks appallingly similar to her homicide timelines, only there are far more data points. Dates she’d gone to haul him out the tank.

A memory takes her: years ago. The beginning of the end, in fact. She’d been called, again, by Sergeant Hardon, up at Central Park Precinct, not long after she’d been moved to the Twelfth. By that time she’d been called many times, from many precincts. She could see the unwanted pity in every Sergeant’s eyes, in every precinct, each time she came. And so she’d gone to Central Park, still in uniform, as soon as shift was over. She’d forgotten that O’Leary had been moved there, or maybe she’d mistaken the dates and thought he hadn’t transferred yet.

Every time she’d gone, every time before that when Hardon had called, he’d pretended it was the first time. Pretended that he didn’t know Officer Beckett, to save her pride. Small mercy, to help her pretend in front of the NYPD. She’d wondered, later, if perhaps he’d had more personal experience than she knew, but never asked. She had enough to cope with, without the problems of others.

Anyway, she’d gone. Turned up and been ready to bail him out, take his filthy self home, the plastic sheet already over the back seat of her car, a bowl there, ready; all to avoid the vomit and urine staining her vehicle. She’d learned that trick fast. She’d been prepared for her father. By then, she’d been used to it: the filth and the tears and the begging. And the rejection for not being her mother.

She had not been prepared for O’Leary’s happy cry of “Beckett! You here to see me in my new shop?” She’d turned, and seen him, and turned away. He had no place in that scene. It had been shaming enough when it was cops who didn’t know her, with whom she’d never worked. And so she’d blocked him out, as if he weren’t there, as if she’d never met him, and taken her father home.
Two days later she’d been due to have a drink with O’Leary, to celebrate his transfer, talk about how she was getting on at the Twelfth. She’d seen the questions and the worry and concern on O’Leary’s massive visage, and avoided ever getting close to allowing him an opening. As if he’d never seen anything. He’d taken the hint. She’d still made sure she was too busy to see him for a while, until she could be sure that he wouldn’t pry. He hadn’t: small light in a dark world. He’d done better than that, because the next times she was called he wasn’t there, and then… then there had been the final time she had, when he’d clearly seen her and pretended not to; and she’d known then that O’Leary was the sort of friend she really needed – one who would let her pretend that none of it was happening and not ask any questions, one who’d simply go out for beers and talk shop and – because he was gay and not complicated at all – give her a brief hug if she needed it, and sparring practice when, far more often, she wanted that, and be a plus one if required – and she for him – and never ask anything at all, ever.

And then she’d decided that she couldn’t do it any more. She couldn’t keep pretending it was the first time, or the second. Couldn’t hide it from herself any more. By being there for him, she was a guaranteed safety net. An enabler, a co-dependent. So the next time Sergeant Hardon called, she said No. She wasn’t going. Hardon had argued, and guilt-tripped, and damn close to ordered – though he knew he had no right to give that order and if he tried she’d disobey – but she hadn’t gone. And then she’d gone to a bar in the East Village and begun. O’Leary had called, and she’d already had enough to tell him where she was. Not why. Never, ever why. Not long after, he’d shown up. She hadn’t cared if he was there or not, but he’d kept a line of drinks in front of her and matched her glass for glass and taken her home at the end. He’d made sure she was safe, but all she could force out were thanks, through the bitter taste of betrayal of her father and the gritted teeth holding back her hurt and pain and shame.

So she’d forced herself to invite him out, but it had never quite been the same again, even though he’d followed her lead and never mentioned it. She’d buried herself in work to be able to claim she was too busy to come out, when the truth was that seeing O’Leary was a jagged-sharp reminder of the day she’d walked away. She hadn’t seen him much, buried herself in work to dull the pain and exhaust her so that she could sleep, until her dad called her from rehab, until O’Leary made Detective too. And when Will had left, he’d been there to let her spar the pain away; the hurt that she’d never have a family outside her father because she couldn’t ever abandon him again.

Not that her father would have cared about that.

She marks those dates in too, and looks down at the black staining pool on the page, blotting it, and takes herself to the restroom to repair the damage before anyone else should arrive and might notice. When she returns she’s dry-eyed and cold.

For five long years she’s supported her father and they’ve talked about nothing. She’s been too scared to open any subject that might expose the cracks, and he’s never tried. She’d thought it was enough, for both of them. But it seems like he’s been hiding just as much as she has, for darker reasons. She forcibly tells herself that this is just another case, in which she’ll interview the prime suspect. Just another interview, just another day.

She starts to construct her questions, which, compared to her timeline, are scanty: why did you tell me to go? Why then reverse it to stay? and after an hour’s concentrated effort in which she doesn’t let a single breath or look betray her feelings, is done till tonight. As she folds up the two sheets of paper and puts them safely in her purse, Montgomery arrives, and seeing her, stops by her desk.

“Beckett.”

“Sir.”
“You’re in early.”

“Sir. Wanted to get a head start before Ryan and Espo start disturbing the peace.” She forces a grin.

“Okay. How are things going?”

“Fine, sir. Wrist’s better.” She wiggles and then circles it, to prove it.

“And your appointments?” Montgomery says meaningfully.

“Fine too. I think Friday will be the last one.”

Montgomery casts her a very sharp glance indeed. “Really, Detective? I will require a clearance from your practitioner.”

“That’s fine, sir. I’m sure he’ll be quite happy to sign one.”

Beckett is absolutely certain that Dr Burke will not wish to treat her again as soon as she proves him to have been totally wrong. She hasn’t missed his belief in his own methods, and she can’t imagine that he’ll enjoy his oversized ego being spectacularly punctured.

Montgomery departs for his own office, wondering vaguely why Detective Beckett is so sure that she’ll be cleared by the shrink. It certainly doesn’t seem long enough to him, especially with that bullshit about the sparring last week. However, he’s not a shrink and doesn’t want to be. Managing his precinct is quite enough for him. On the other hand, managing his precinct includes making sure his star detective (and the reason that they’re top of the stats every month) is okay. Better than okay. He needs her to stay on top form. He flips over a few folders and finds the leave requests, and gently peruses Beckett’s. She took the four days. Hm. She’s still got six to take. She’d asked for them to be after spring break week, which kept her from conflicting with the family-style requests, but is in the mix with all the non-family requests. He can’t have all his non-family requests in that week, and anyway, that’s still a month and more away: spring break’s not over till April 20.

Beckett could use a break, he thinks impishly. He’ll see how today and tomorrow go, and make a decision on Friday. Come to think of it, even for Beckett today must have started early. Her to-go-cup had been in the trash can, and the mug on her desk only had black dregs in it. That’s not a good sign. He may be a desk-driving Captain these days, but he can still pick up a clue if he needs to. These clues tell him that Beckett’s stressed. Not very obviously, and certainly not at a level for which he needs to take action, but there’s a thread there. However, she’s not on shift and not on call this weekend, so even if nothing more is needed she’ll have a break. In fact, he’ll just make certain of it. She will not be sneaking into the bullpen to work. He marches back out of his office.

“Beckett.”

“Sir?”

“You are off this weekend, aren’t you?”

“Yes.”

“Any plans?”

“Going out of town for the weekend. Change of scene.”

“Good.”
Montgomery leaves again, with Beckett’s confused stare following him. She has absolutely no idea what that was about. Actually, she really doesn’t care. As long as he doesn’t bench her again for no reason then it’s all okay.

Shortly Ryan, and then Espo, turn up and she completely forgets about Montgomery as the day gets going.
Fight the battle, save the girl

Castle is woken by his buzzing alarm at his usual time, which allows him to share breakfast with Alexis and frequently also allows him to watch his mother’s all-too-common walks of shame. Today, thankfully, is not one of those days. Shortly, however, he wishes it were.

“Dad?”

“Yes?”

“Dad, why doesn’t Detective Beckett come here? You’re spending lots of time with her, but never here. Why not?”

“She said on Sunday, it’s been very busy at the precinct.”

“I don’t believe you,” Alexis says very firmly. “If it was cases you’d mention it. You always mention the cases even if you won’t tell me all the gory details, which is totally unfair.”

Castle’s heart sinks. This is not a conversation he wants to have.

“Grams and me” –

“Grams and I, pumpkin.”

“Stop trying to change the subject, Dad. Grams and I think something’s up. We thought maybe she doesn’t like us, but she doesn’t behave like she doesn’t like us, so why won’t she come here?”

“Alexis, Detective Beckett has other responsibilities. She can’t just do exactly what she likes when she’s off duty.” He looks very straight at his normally delightful daughter. “I don’t want you – or Grams – asking about it, or interfering, or trying to investigate. When it’s dealt with, she’ll be able to come round if we invite her. Until then, you just have to accept that she can’t come as often as anyone would like.”

Which last sentence is carefully constructed to give the impression that it’s also Beckett who can’t come as often as she’d like. Alexis looks back, speculation blooming in her face, and then looks at Castle’s serious expression.

“Okay, Dad. But she does know we like her, doesn’t she? She’s good for you. You haven’t been half as childish since Christmas. And I really don’t mind if you spend lots of evenings with her.” She smirks evilly. “I like the freedom, you know.”

“You like the quiet, you mean. No helicopter toys buzzing your homework.”

“Yes. So you have my permission to be out as often as you like. Even sleepovers.”

Castle splutters and Alexis makes a swift escape before he wreaks revenge on her.

After she’s gone, however, Castle recalls that he has to call Dr Burke, and probably O’Leary. Dr Burke is easiest, because that’s simply arranging an appointment time for before Friday lunchtime – he thinks that Burke will need a little time to consider this looming catastrophe. He’ll call after he’s tidied up breakfast and it’s got to office hours.

Castle manages the tidying up of breakfast, but then he’s distracted by a tendril of inspiration. He’s hauled out of his writing reverie by the ring of his phone, which turns out to be Dr Burke’s receptionist, asking whether he could see Dr Burke this afternoon, at four. He agrees. Inspiration having fled, he texts O’Leary, asking what time he’s showing up at Molloy’s, and then asking if they can meet half an hour before that. Beckett hasn’t actually told him the timings, though he imagines that she’ll say when he shows up at the precinct. Anyway, it won’t be earlier than six-thirty.

All that done, he collects his coat and leaves for the Twelfth.

The bullpen is full of the depressed and bored air of detectives who are poring over old cases, and that’s just from Beckett, Espo and Ryan. The others all seem to be a little busier, and a lot cheerier. Castle wonders if Montgomery is still gerrymandering the caseload, and bounces up to Beckett’s desk brandishing coffee and good humour.

“Hey, Beckett,” he says happily.

“Hey, Castle,” she says, and smiles back. Castle notices an underlying unhappiness but is forestalled from asking by the arrival of both boys.

“Where you been, Castle? Haven’t seen you for a week. Don’tcha love us any more?” Ryan asks, faux-plaintively.

“Got tired of you following him around,” Espo says derisively.

“Neither,” Castle says amiably, before it can get nasty. “Gina threatened me with fire-ants, honey and excision of my liver if I didn’t turn in at least three chapters before the weekend and two more by tonight. I managed it, so here I am. Unhoneyed, uneaten” – Beckett hides her expression – “and still in possession of my liver.”

“Does she threaten you like that often?”

“Usually she’s a bit more expansive about it. She must have been in a hurry.”

Castle perches on Beckett’s desk rather than in his chair, and precisely as expected is grumbled and growled at.

“Move, Castle. You’re sitting on my files.”

He doesn’t. Beckett taps him firmly and when he still doesn’t stand up shoves, only moderately gently.

“Castle, move. Go get coffee and get off my files.”

He stands up, acting as if he’s been put upon. “C’mon, Ryan. Beckett loves her cold case file more than she loves me” –

“It’s certainly quieter,” Beckett quips, to a snigger from Espo.

“ – so let’s go get some doughnuts.” He pouts at Beckett. “And you’re not going to steal them all.”

“Sprinkles, please,” is all she says.

Ryan and Castle exit, leaving Beckett and Espo discussing whether it’s worth trying a fingerprint match on a smudge.

“How many doughnuts should we get?”

“Twice as many as you think, and an extra three for Beckett,” Ryan says lightly. “Might sweeten her disposition next time she goes sparring.”

“Yeah?” Castle says. “What’s that about?”

“Beckett was in a bad mood on Thursday an’ took it out on the mats. Glad it wasn’t me. Even Espo was having some trouble with her. It got a bit lively, and then it all went full out, an’ then Montgomery turned up and ripped us all a new one. But Espo took her down an’ she landed badly on her wrist. Couldn’t even brush her hair.”

“What?” Castle had certainly not realised it was that bad. And yet she’d taken it out the sling to try to console him.

“An’ no make up.”

“Wow. And it’s not broken?” Castle whistles.

“Yeah. But somehow it was all my fault that they were trying to kill each other. I was just watching.”

“Sounds like the best place to be. So why was Beckett so mad?”

“Dunno. She was thinking really hard, like when she’s working a difficult case. We thought she had something that she wasn’t letting us in on, but she wouldn’t talk. She just snapped at us. Then she took a breath and eased off and said she’d come sparring at lunchtime. So we left her to it.”

“Best thing for you. Death’s pretty permanent.”

“Think that’s what Espo was thinking. Beckett doesn’t usually get pissed at us.” Ryan shrugs.

“Whatever it was, she came out looking for a fight an’ Espo gave her one.”

“Oh,” Castle says, and turns to the vital business of ordering doughnuts in bulk. He’s learned what he needed to from Ryan. Next up, a chat with Espo.

The doughnuts are appreciated by the bullpen. Castle can tell this by the way that they are all gone in sixty milliseconds. Beckett receives her separate box first, affords him a dazzling smile and then refuses absolutely to share. Castle humphs for the sake of appearances and then produces his own doughnuts – chocolate, naturally – with a smug grin.

“You don’t think I expected you to share, do you?”

“You’d have been disappointed. It’s doughnuts. No cop shares doughnuts.”

“And I didn’t expect to be able to beat the bullpen to the box – anyway, they’ve all got guns and even doughnuts aren’t worth being shot over – so I got my own.” He smiles widely and takes a large bite while watching the flurry of doughnut-fuelled activity around the main box, where Ryan seems to be losing out. It reminds him of sharks around a bleeding whale.

“You’re everyone’s favourite guy right now,” Beckett says, with a grin. “If there’s any research you want to do that might involve annoying people, now’s your chance. They’ll all be on a sugar high.” The grin turns evil. “Try not to break anything while you’re playing, okay?”

“I’m not a child,” Castle murmurs. “Happy to prove it. Again.”

He departs at speed so that he retains the last word, and winds up, wholly not coincidentally, at Espo’s desk, where Espo is just dealing with the last few crumbs of doughnut.
“Hey.”

“Yo, Castle. What d’you want?”

“A chat,” Castle says, with no humour at all. Espo’s expression darkens. “I wanna know what you thought you were doing sparring with Beckett till she got hurt.”

“Coffee,” Espo says laconically, not noticeably intimidated, but equally serious.

They attain the break room, Espo’s ferocious scowl and Castle’s air of annoyance preventing anyone else joining them.

“Beckett came out lookin’ for a fight. Dunno why.”

“Thought you could pull your punches?”

“I was doin’. Right up till she kicked me in the gut. I can’t pull everything when I gotta focus on not bein’ badly hurt myself. Ask her why she was so mad. Takes two to keep it clean, an’ Beckett sure wasn’t tryin’.” Esposito drills Castle with a glare. “Wasn’t you, was it?”

“No.”

Espo looks very sceptical. “You ain’t been in for a week.”

“Doesn’t mean I didn’t see Beckett,” Castle says, unspecifically. The boys know there’s more going on than they see. So much was made clear back when he told them he’d got this, a month ago.

“But you know why.” It’s not a question.

“Mm,” Castle hums non-committally, and changes the subject. “How come you couldn’t hold back? Thought you were better than Beckett.”

“I am. But she’s prob’ly the best woman around right now, an’ like I said, she wasn’t holdin’ back. Came down to a choice between holdin’ back and bein’ in the ER or not holdin’ back an’ hopin’ both of us weren’t in the ER. Then Montgomery walked in.” Espo winces at the memory. “He wasn’t pleased. Reamed us all out. Just as well he di’n’t know about Beckett’s wrist, an’ we weren’t gonna let on. She fell on it, an’ messed it up. Went to see Lanie about it, but that’s about all I know.”

“She do this often?” Castle asks, falling into Espo’s laconic style.

“Naw. Once before. ‘S why we’re careful. Last time it was my wrist got sprained but Beckett got her shoulder dislocated. We got used as the floor mops by Montgomery. After that we watched it.”

“When was that?”

“’Bout – erm – maybe three years ago. She was out for blood. Funny thing was, I thought she’d been hitting the mats with someone else, ‘cause she had a whole set of bruises already. Got the feelin’ she’d had a break-up, but she don’t talk an’ I don’t ask.”

“Probably wise,” Castle murmurs sotto voce. Something is nagging at his mind. It’ll come, if he ignores it.

“Wondered if she’d been sparrin’ with O’Leary. She used to do that a bit,” Espo says, and that’s all it takes for the whole story to fall complete into Castle’s head.
Beckett had last been out for blood when she’d broken up with that Fed. O’Leary had thought – still thinks – that it was because of the Fed, but Castle knows that it’s because she’d wanted a family of her own but her dad’s issues had meant that it hadn’t worked out. This time… this time it’s still because of her dad’s issues, or more truthfully in both cases it’s because of Beckett’s reactions to her dad’s issues. Which is the same, really, as saying Beckett’s issues. And on Tuesday last Dr Burke had told Beckett that she was being abused, and she’d not taken it well (understatement is part of his writer’s craft) and on Wednesday she’d been brooding over it all day, and if he puts together Ryan’s comments about how she was behaving and Espo’s comments now he just bets that Beckett was brooding worse on Thursday and then took her entire fury and unhappiness on to the mats.

He’d thought about Beckett’s potential capacity for self-destruction last night. He might have been a day or two – or seven – late. If he’d known this when he’d spoken to Dr Burke at the weekend, he’d have mentioned it then. Instead he’ll need to mention it tonight. It’s the physical version of the emotional suicide – sparring so hard there’s no option but that she’ll get hurt. This is seriously fucked up. He supposes, very bitterly, that it could have been worse if it had been self-harming, not sparring, though he’s fairly certain that if Espo is the opposition that’s a distinction without much of a practical difference.

“You okay, bro? You look a bit zoned out there.”

“Yeah, it’s okay,” he says vaguely. “I’ll just make another coffee. Must be all the sugar in those doughnuts.”

“Yeah.” Espo clearly doesn’t believe him and equally isn’t going to pry. He wanders out as Castle fiddles with the machine.

Messing with the espresso machine is interrupted by the chirp of a text. It’s O’Leary, who says… what? Off-shift today. What’s up? Told Beckett seven, so a bit of time. Castle texts back straight away how about five thirty? We need to talk. Barely more of a gap later comes back Sure. Molloys.

The day progresses with a general lack of conversation and surfeit of case files. Beckett isn’t chatty – not that this is ever news – but Castle notices a rather heavier presence of Montgomery than normal. He seems to have an awful lot of matters to which he needs to attend which require walking past Beckett’s desk. Shortly after three, Castle makes his excuses and leaves: claiming that he’s bored for the boys’ benefit and that he’ll see her later for Beckett’s. She raises a cynical eyebrow but doesn’t interrogate him. A few minutes of a niggling guilty feeling into the cab journey, he texts her: Burke wanted to see me @ 4pm. Later. C. It doesn’t really improve the niggle. Not for the first time, there seem to be no good choices where Beckett is concerned. He broods all the way to Dr Burke’s office.

“Good afternoon, Mr Castle.”

“Hey.”

“I wished to talk with you, and with Mr Beckett separately, about Friday’s meeting. I have some concerns that, without proper support and planning, that it will be unproductive.”

“Unproductive?” says Castle incredulously. “Unproductive? Is that how you normally describe an absolute disaster?”

Dr Burke raises his eyebrows. “Would you care to explain?”

“Beckett is planning to interrogate her father to prove you wrong. She doesn’t care how much it hurts – her or him – because she thinks he doesn’t care. In fact, she’s planning to blow their relationship up so spectacularly that there’s no chance they ever speak to each other again. She thinks that’ll finish things and she’ll be fine afterwards, because she still thinks her father doesn’t care and wants to ensure that she doesn’t either. I think that ten seconds after she does that and discovers her father does care she’ll be sorry but it won’t ever be fixable again, and then she’ll drown in guilt and never come out.” He draws a breath. “Did you ask how she hurt her wrist?”

“Of course. She said that she had been sparring harder than usual, because she was frustrated with both her work and my comment that her behaviours were similar to those of an abuse victim.”

“Similar to? Beckett’s convinced you said her father abused her.”

“I have not. I have pointed that out on several occasions."

“Anyway,” says Castle impatiently, “according to Espo, she was looking for blood from the moment she walked on the mats. And I think it’s the same thing. She doesn’t care any more how much she gets hurt as long as she gets rid of the thing hurting her. So sparring in a way that’s going to get her hurt – and it wasn’t the first time – stops her hurting from the other stuff; and blowing everything up with her father is just what we talked about before.”

“Hm,” Dr Burke emits. “An interesting analysis, Mr Castle. Given that you will be here on Friday, have you had any other thoughts about the likely progress of that meeting?”

“Beckett’s planning out her interrogation. She’s enlisted O’Leary, to go right back to when her father was being picked up drunk in Central Park. She wants me to add in what I know about what her father’s currently thinking. She’s not going to like that. We’re all supposed to be meeting tonight to work it out.” He pauses. Letting all of this out is actually very cathartic. “She isn’t mentioning her feelings at all. She’s only talking about getting facts. And” –

“And?”

“And I think actually she hasn’t realised that it’s going to blow up in her face. I just keep thinking that really deep down she’s doing this because he’s hurt her so much, for so long – without meaning to or even knowing that he did – to hurt him right back. But I’m sure she doesn’t know that.”

“Very astute, Mr Castle. Your analysis marches with mine.”

“You expected this?”

“I am a psychiatrist. I believe, however, that we can direct events so that catastrophe is avoided. As a first point, Detective Beckett is not aware that Mr Beckett has now realised that he has never been apprised of the full extent of his words and actions while drunk. She is also not aware that I will be seeing Mr Beckett tomorrow, and if necessary again prior to Friday’s meeting. Part of that discussion will cover Detective Beckett’s likely behaviour, so that he is prepared for it. I trust, too, that she is not aware of your deductions?”

“No.”

“Good.”

Castle bristles. “I don’t like going behind her back.”

“Mr Castle,” reproves Dr Burke, “we do not wish to go behind Detective Beckett’s back. However, I do not wish her to start down another misconceived line of thought. How do you think she will react if you mention any of your conclusions?”
Castle is brought up short. “Badly,” he has to admit.

“Precisely. Every time that Detective Beckett has been faced with an unpleasant truth about her actions and emotions, she has first denied and then sought to discredit the point. If you mention these conclusions now, she will undoubtedly refuse to deal with you, and if there is one point that is simple in this highly complex matter, it is that Detective Beckett refusing to maintain contact with you will be very likely to cause catastrophe.”

Dr Burke gazes sympathetically at Castle. “I appreciate that this is a highly unpleasant position for you. Quite naturally, you would prefer immediate honesty. I would also prefer that this were unnecessary. However, it is only two days, and the results will justify the delay. Honesty will be required, in any event, so you need not worry that you will be deceiving your beloved.” He smiles, gently, as Castle chokes, splutters, and generally fails to recover his composure. “Now, could we perhaps discuss your role in Friday’s session, and the potential directions that it might take?”
“Urrg?” Castle manages, still shell-shocked by Dr Burke’s comment.

“Friday’s session,” Dr Burke says briskly. “You have an important role to play, and it is essential that you are properly prepared.”

Dr Burke is, in fact, quite impressed by Mr Castle’s thinking, if not by his evident surprise that Dr Burke has identified his feelings. It would, by now, have been very hard to miss them. Mr Castle’s heart is quite blatantly on his sleeve where Detective Beckett is concerned. However, since this has resulted in Mr Castle turning his intelligence and empathy on Detective Beckett, it is to be welcomed. Still, it would be entirely unhelpful if Detective Beckett were to manufacture a quarrel with Mr Castle, such as would be entirely likely to occur were Mr Castle to outline his deductions to her outside the relatively controlled environment of Dr Burke’s treatment room.

“I’m on Beckett’s side,” Mr Castle says coldly.

“Was that in doubt?”

Mr Castle subsides, muttering. Dr Burke is sure he does not want to know what is being enunciated.

“That you are, as you put it, on Beckett’s side, is precisely why you are here. Detective Beckett both wholly trusts you and is prepared to rely on you. She has no doubt that you have her, and only her, interests at heart.”

“Oh,” Mr Castle emits. He sounds a little shocked.

“Surely you were aware of this?”

“It’s a little different when you hear it from a shr- psychiatrist,” Mr Castle stutters. Dr Burke is mildly surprised. Mr Castle’s behaviour with Detective Beckett had not led Dr Burke to consider that Mr Castle might be unsure of her feelings. Behaviour such as Mr Castle had exhibited is generally only acceptable when one is quite certain that the other person will not object.

“Mr Castle, we have only half an hour. Please can we now focus on Friday?”

“Yeah…okay.”

“You have told me Detective Beckett intends to interrogate her father. Are you aware of the direction that interrogation might take?”

“Not yet. I will be tomorrow, though. If I had to guess now, I’d guess she’s intending to push hard about what he remembers, backed up by whatever O’Leary tells her tonight. Then – if it’s like the way she does it at work – she’ll start picking up the inconsistencies between what he said drunk and what he said sober, and pushing on them. When he’s so confused he doesn’t know which way is up, she’ll hit him with the killer blow.”

“What is that?”

“If I were writing it, it would be what he said to her a month ago. She’ll hit him with all the ways he used to tell her she wasn’t enough, then she’ll put in all the ways he made her think he wanted to be a family – and then she’ll tell him she knows he was lying for the last five years, because he said she wasn’t his family a month ago, stone cold sober. He’ll be so upset he won’t be able to argue. She’ll take it as proof, and then she’ll turn round and tell you she was right and you were wrong.”

“Fascinating. How will she show I was wrong?”

“Well, she’ll say that since he lied about caring for her, that he doesn’t, and that since he doesn’t care he wouldn’t have bothered to abuse her deliberately.”

“And your view of this sequence?”

“Utter bullshit.”

Vulgar, but pungent.

“Why?”

“First, because none of this is proof either way. Second, because Beckett’s not taking feelings into account. Hers or her dad’s. I think that as soon as she’s actually facing her father she’ll start to lose it.”

“I agree. And that, Mr Castle, is where you come in. Think of yourself as security. Every time tempers rise, it will be your job to deal with Detective Beckett.” Mr Castle looks appalled. “I will remove Mr Beckett from the situation. You merely need to take care of Detective Beckett. You already know how. I need not tell you what to do.”

“But… but…”

“Mr Castle,” Dr Burke says with some exasperation, “given Mr Beckett’s realisations, and Detective Beckett’s psychological fragility and the consequent risk of either or both of them precipitating some exceedingly unhelpful action – they can be remarkably similar – I have no choice but to ensure that this meeting takes place at the earliest possible time. While Mr Beckett may revert to alcohol, Detective Beckett is already taking risks with her physical wellbeing: witness her sparring match. I am really quite deeply concerned about her.”

“Okay. So if it all gets… emotional, you want me to what? Do what we did with Lanie?”

“Not precisely,” says Dr Burke, a touch uncomfortably. “I would prefer you behaved similarly to last Friday.”

Castle simply stares at him.

“What?”

“Detective Beckett finds psychological safety in your physical presence and actions, as demonstrated on Friday. That is what I need you to do. In short” –

“In short, hold on to her.”

“Yes,” Dr Burke says, a little flustered, steepling and unsteepling his fingers. “I would really very much prefer not to have to undertake this meeting so soon. However, we can only work with the situation we have. Simply be ready, Mr Castle.”

“We’re going out to the Hamptons straight after,” Castle says, apparently inconsequentially. “That was the plan, anyway. Beckett asked me if we could go. It sounded like she wanted some time out.”

“I think that would be an excellent plan, no matter how Friday goes. Whatever Detective Beckett does or says, on Friday, before or after, to you or to others; it is not you with whom she has issues, nor will it be in any way your fault. Without you, Friday will be most unlikely to be successful. If it is not, then you could not have done more to resolve the position. You will be blameless.” Dr Burke shifts his hands. “I consider that it would be well to be ready to leave from here.”

“If I hadn’t pushed, none of this would have happened,” Castle says bitterly.

“You are wrong,” Dr Burke says sharply. “Detective Beckett would eventually have failed to control her feelings towards her father in any case. The unresolved issues between her and her father would have come to the fore. You may have accelerated the realisation, but you did not cause it. Furthermore, you have assisted in resolving it. As I said, you are blameless. Blaming yourself is pointless and self-indulgent.”

Castle growls unpleasantly. Dr Burke has no hesitation in meeting his eyes. “Do not introduce yet more complications to this situation, Mr Castle. We have enough with which to contend. There is no need to make your position more difficult.”

Castle retreats from his annoyance. “Now what? Beckett’s going to ask me what I think of her father’s actions, and I know he didn’t mean any of it. But if I say that she’ll think I’m on his side.”

“Tell her the truth as you see it, but make it clear that this is what Mr Beckett has shown you. It is most likely that Detective Beckett will then believe that he is attempting to deceive you too. That will be her assumption, but you will not have been in any way deceitful yourself. You must be honest, as you wish to be. If you are not honest with Detective Beckett then she will simply discard you, however much that might pain her.”

“Great,” Castle mutters. He can see at least a dozen ways that this can all go horribly wrong tonight, never mind waiting for Friday.

“Mr Castle, all you can do is ‘tell the truth and shame the Devil’ as the old saying would have it. You have no other choice. You cannot control Detective Beckett’s reactions. For what it is worth, however, I think that regardless of any immediate emotional reaction, in the end she will only respond to honesty.”

“You can put that on my tombstone,” Castle quips acidly. “Nice to know we’ve sorted out my epitaph in advance, even if it is at the last minute.”

Dr Burke does not answer that piece of silliness. “I will continue to consider the correct course of action on Friday. I also intend to speak to Mr Beckett in advance. Should you have any more insights, I would be very pleased if you would share them. They have to date been profoundly helpful. I would also appreciate it if you felt able to advise me of any notable information arising from your meeting tonight or any other time prior to Friday’s session.”

“Okay.”

“Further avoidable surprises are not to be welcomed,” Dr Burke says dryly. “It is my expectation that we will have a number of unavoidable surprises.”

“You can say that again,” Castle agrees. He glances at his watch. “I need to get going. I need to talk to O’Leary before Beckett shows up.”

“A wise move.” To Castle’s surprise, Dr Burke rises and accompanies him out of his office to the outer door. “Thank you, Mr Castle. It is extremely helpful to have you involved. Do not hesitate to call if you think it necessary.” He pauses. “Trust your instincts. They have so far served you very O’Leary is not in Molloy’s when Castle gets there, a few moments early despite his fears. The bribe he’d offered the cab driver might have something to do with that, of course. He orders a beer and takes possession of a table which has just about enough space around it to fit the O’Leary mountain. Shortly, said mountain ambles through the door, spots Castle, waves, collects a beer of his own and descends.

“What’s this all about?” he rumbles. “What’s Beckett up to this time?”

“Breaking her dad and probably herself,” Castle growls, not troubling to contain his feelings and Dr Burke-induced irritation.

“Huh?”

“Thought you’d got the download from her last night?”

“Well, it was more info than I used to get, but it wasn’t very useful.” O’Leary casts a slow, gee-folks-what’s-up falsely innocent look at Castle. “Hey, Castle, how come you know what she said? You been seeing my Beckett behind my back?”

Castle grins, tightly and briefly, at O’Leary’s down-home folksiness and accent, more pronounced than usual. “Thought you were seeing your Pete. I’m seeing my Beckett.”

“Who’s doin’ something dumb. What’s goin’ on, Castle?”

“You know she’s seeing a shrink. She told you. She thinks the shrink’s talking bullshit and we’re supposed to help her prove it.”

“Shrink said her pa abused her?”

“Apparently so.”

“And she don’t like it.”

“You can say that again.”

“So why’d you wanna talk before she shows up?” Castle stares hard at O’Leary. “I don’t guess that look works on Beckett an’ it sure don’t work on me. What’s goin’ on? An’ what d’you mean breaking her dad an’ herself? What dumbass idea has she got into her head?”

“She says she wants to prove the shrink wrong. We’re going to provide evidence.”

O’Leary’s massive frame winces, and the table wobbles. “And?” he says, folksy accent entirely gone and Detective suddenly, shockingly in place.

“And I reckon it’s going to be an absolute disaster.”

“What are we going to do?”

“Tell the truth, and then try to divert her plan into something that’ll do what she says she wants to do.”
“Being?”

“Burke – the shrink – said she was acting as if her dad had been an abuser – emotional, not physical. Beckett heard your dad emotionally abused you. She doesn’t agree, but in the same breath she’s saying he doesn’t care so it doesn’t matter – and she doesn’t care in return. You heard her say that.”

“Yeah.”

“I guess she wants you to tell the truth about anything you saw or heard when he was in the tank and she didn’t come to get him.”

“That’s simple,” O’Leary says bluntly. “Most of the time he was so drunk he couldn’t speak. Rest of the time he was drunk he cried for Katie to come and get him.”

“Nothing else?”

“Not unless you count the piss and vomit on the floor.”

“And sober?”

“Cried for Katie to come and get him, and said he was sorry, and phoned her, and wailed until the phone cut out.” O’Leary’s normally placidly amiable face is set and stern; his tone harsh. “Cried when she didn’t come and begged us to tell her he’d change, he’d ditch the booze, he’d be a family again. And a few days later he’d be back in our tank, and it would all be the same again. Sergeant called her, her pa called her, and she never came. Don’t blame her. When she did pick him up it didn’t stop him. Dunno how she put up with it.”

“That was it?”

“You were expecting something else,” O’Leary states. “What were you expecting me to say?”

“I thought Jim” – O’Leary raises fur stole sized brows at the familiar address – “might have mentioned another name.”

“Yeah?”

“Johanna.”

“Joanna?”

Castle pronounces the h more definitively. “Johanna.”

“Not Jo?”

“S’pose,” Castle says. “He’s never referred to her as Jo when I’ve heard him. Did he never mention a Johanna?”

O’Leary wrinkles up his brow in evident imitation of the Grand Canyon. “Can’t say I really listened to him. We’d got better things to do. And…well… it seemed like prying into Beckett’s life an’ I knew she didn’t want that. If she wanted me to know she’d’ve told me. If she’d wanted to explain why she wasn’t collecting her pa she’d’ve told me that.” He relapses into further thought, mechanically swigging his beer.

“Not then,” he eventually says. “Before. While she was still collecting him.” He searches back through dim memory. “Might have been the last time she did. Last time I saw it, anyway. She came, and the Sarge brought him up – he was filthy and still drunk, an’ he stank – and he looked at Beckett and said ‘I don’t want you. I want my Johanna.’ And Beckett just didn’t say a word an’ I pretended I hadn’t seen her or heard anything.”

“But?” Castle asks.

“But she flinched, as if he’d taken a stick to her, an’ then she manhandled him out an’ that was the last time I saw her collect her pa.”

“Ah.”

“You don’t sound surprised.”

“I’m not.”

“So what’s goin’ on that I don’t know about?”

“I think Beckett’s going to throw everything her dad said when he was drunk back in his face now, and then tell him that since he said she wasn’t family then, when he was too drunk to lie, and said it again a few weeks back – remember she told you when we were all in here last time – he’s been lying to her all the time he’s been dry.”

“That’s downright dumb,” O’Leary states flatly. “She really thinks that’s going to work?”

“She’s not thinking. She thinks she’s thinking, but she’s just reacting. It’s all going to go horribly wrong. She’s looking for an excuse to pick a fight that’ll mean she can justify walking away – but it isn’t going to work. She still can’t justify walking away the first time, when it really was the right thing to do.”

“Shit,” O’Leary mouths, and drains his beer, summons more, and drains most of a second bottle into the bargain.

“I have no clue what to do. I’m taking her out of Manhattan as soon as Friday’s over till Sunday night but I’ve been round this loop with myself, with her shrink, and with you, and I have absolutely no fucking clue what to do any more. I wish I could just shake some sense into her,” Castle finishes with venom.

“You can try it, an’ I can try it, but it ain’t either of us that she’s upset with, so it ain’t goin’ to work.”

“That’s not the point,” Castle spits. “How did I end up trying to fix this total mess anyway? All I get is grief from the shrink, grief from Jim and grief from my own family. I wish I’d never got involved.”

“The one thing you didn’t say there is that you’re getting grief from Beckett,” O’Leary points out.

“I’m not.”

O’Leary allows a silence to develop, and allows his face to develop a rather impish smile. Not that imps are that size.

“O-kay,” Castle says frustratedly. “Stop with the work-it-out-dumbo look. I know she didn’t ask me to get involved, and she’s the one person in all this fucking mess who doesn’t expect me to fix it. Any-fucking-thing but, right up till last week. Now she just wants to fix it so it’s not in her way.”

O’Leary casts him a well-then look, which doesn’t do much to ameliorate Castle’s generally spilling over irritation.
“You’re the one who’s dating her,” O’Leary points out patiently. “You knew there was a problem with her pa. You didn’t have to get involved any further than dating but you did. So quit bitching about your own choices and let’s work out how to get you an’ Beckett out of this alive.”

“You don’t pull your punches, do you?”

“We-ell,” O’Leary drawls, “mostly I do, otherwise I think I’d be inside Rikers by now. NYPD doesn’t appreciate dead suspects litterin’ the sidewalks.”

Castle grins, a touch wryly. “Okay. Try and avoid turning me into a corpse, huh?”

“Beckett wouldn’t like it, an’ I’m scared of her. So how’re we going to do this?”

“Very, very carefully,” Castle says.

“I got that bit. Anything a bit more helpful?”

“Nope. Except the shrink said stick to the truth. I think he wants me to get shot.”

“What, there’s someone out there who hasn’t responded to your charm, wit and personality?”

“He responded all right. Told me off like I was still in kindergarten.” O’Leary splutters around his mouthful of beer. “I don’t like him,” Castle says. “I really don’t. He’s so far up his own pompous ass he could eat his dinner twice.” O’Leary snickers. “But he’s the only person in the whole world who’s made Beckett stop and think, so I guess he knows what he’s doing. Up till now, anyway. Now, he’s pissed her off.”

“Mistake,” O’Leary drawls.

“I don’t know. He’s clever enough that it might have been his plan all along. Upset or annoy her enough that she actually does something about the situation just to prove him wrong. If so, it’s working. I just really, really think that this one might be a step too far.”

Castle drains his own beer and relapses into a general attitude of resentful annoyance. Dr Burke has riled him, even if it’s been softened by flattery. Then again, Dr Burke invariably riles him. Every time he thinks he’s got a good way to reduce Dr Burke to rubble, Dr Burke manages to put him either in the wrong or at the very least in confusion. It’s not fair. Castle understands precisely why Beckett doesn’t like Dr Burke, and is entirely in agreement with her.

“What do you wanna happen, Castle?”

“I’ll settle for being alive at the other end of Friday.”

“Best outcome?”

“Beckett and her dad are actually talking to each other honestly, and not shouting or worse not talking at all. And I’m still alive.”

“Mm. Well, here she is. She don’t look terribly happy.”

Castle looks up. Arriving on track one is Badass Beckett, in full beat-em-up mode. Great.
“Hey, O’Leary, Castle.”

“Hey, Beckett,” comes in stereo.

“Beer?”

“Please,” says O’Leary, heaving into standing.

“I can manage two bottles and a soda.”

“You can’t manage four bottles and a soda. Your teeny little hands don’t do that.”

“Watch me.”

O’Leary follows Beckett. She turns round and glares at such intensity that Castle is surprised that two holes do not form in his forehead.

“I can manage, O’Leary.”

He sits back down, and looks unhappily at Castle.

“This is not gonna go well.”

“Nope.”

Beckett lands in a chair with a decisive thump, sets down four bottles and a soda for herself, and as swiftly produces a notebook. “Right,” she says. “What do we got?”

The men look at each other with you-go, no, you go expressions. The silence lasts around ten seconds.

“What d’you want? You ain’t told me anything, so why don’t you explain first an’ then I can tell you somethin’ useful rather than a ton of nothin’ that won’t help.”

“Castle didn’t explain?”

“Nope. An’ even if he had I wanna hear it from you, not your boyfriend.”

“Dumb shrink says my dad was an abuser. He’s wrong. He thinks my dad didn’t mean it when he said I wasn’t enough family for him. He’s wrong there too.”

“Don’t you think the shrink might know a thing or two?”

“I’m sure he knows lots of things,” Beckett spits out, “but he’s wrong about this.”

“So why’d he think it?”

Beckett briefly relates the reasoning behind the mention of abuse. Castle watches O’Leary, rather than Beckett, as she does. O’Leary has a very fine poker face, but the restless tapping of his sausage-sized fingers on his knee tell their own tale.
“Mm. Now how about this business of not being enough family?”

Another very sketchy explanation. O’Leary’s fingers are now tapping faster than a virtuoso on a piano keyboard.

“Mm,” O’Leary emits again. Beckett runs out of explanation, or (more likely) doesn’t see any need to explain further, coupled with considerable disinclination to explain further. There is an ominous pause. Castle considers O’Leary’s tense, tapping fingers, and the set of his mountainous shoulders. “So what do you wanna know?” O’Leary says mildly. Castle is instantly both suspicious and very, very worried.

O’Leary repeats the unadorned facts that he’d told Castle a few moments ago.

“What were you expecting?”

Beckett shrugs, frustratedly. “Something. Anything. I know all that. There has to be more. There has to be something to prove he didn’t care then and pretended he did till now. Had me on a string, till he slipped up.” She shuts her mouth very fast. Castle thinks that she might have been about to go back to I missed my chance to have a family.

“Had you on a string?” O’Leary rumbles.

“Yeah. He called, I went. Every single time. He rang, I answered. Soon as he got out of rehab. He kept saying I was the reason he got sober.” Her mouth pinches. “He was still lying about that right up till last month. Made me think he needed me. Made me think he was making up for never wanting me when he was drunk.”

Castle is watching O’Leary, still. Beckett isn’t paying attention to either of them, staring at the inside of her head, but O’Leary’s mass appears to be gathering itself into a state of readiness. Castle is developing the clear impression that O’Leary is considering taking some unspecified action. He also has the clear impression that matters are shortly going to get messy.

“Sounds to me like your pa really did a number on you, Beckett.”

O’Leary’s choosing now to actually force Beckett into talking? He’s never made her talk before. Why now? Where’s a nuclear bunker when Castle needs it?

“What d’you mean?” Beckett snaps.

“Well,” he drags it out so it sounds more like waaaalll, “I know what I call it when someone says how high whenever someone else says hop, frog.”

“What do you call it?” Another snap. Beckett’s extremely limited patience has already expired, and Castle can see the tight line of her mouth and the crease in her brow. He can also see O’Leary’s small movements, which appear to be leaving him in a position of combat readiness. Castle shifts very marginally to be closer to Beckett on the other side from O’Leary. He’s developed an inkling of O’Leary’s next plan.

“I call it bein’ too nice. Lettin’ someone else tell you what to do. Iffen you get into the habit” – O’Leary’s folksiness is suddenly back, and Castle has to wonder why – “cause you don’t wanna upset someone, I call that bein’ messed around. Messed up. Abused.”
“My dad did not abuse me.”

O’Leary magnificently ignores Beckett’s infuriated words. “I watched you pick him up a dozen times an’ every time you let him say whatever he wanted and do whatever he wanted an’ you just put up with it. An’ then you stopped an’ you drank yourself unconscious ’cause you were so upset you let him suffer for his own sins, rather than you sufferin’ for him. So I’m reckonin’ he did abuse you. Did he hit you?”

“No!”

“Hit you in the emotions, though.”

“He was drunk. He never meant it.”

“If he never meant it when he was drunk, he must’ve meant what he said when he was sober.”

Castle is fascinated. O’Leary’s slow, drawling accent makes him sound like a talking haybarn in the Mid-West, but Castle can see where this is going – strangely, Beckett doesn’t seem to, or maybe doesn’t want to – and it’s clear that O’Leary is a very intelligent haybarn indeed.

“Oh, he meant what he said when he was drunk. He just didn’t mean me to know it.”

“So he didn’t mean what he said when he was sober?”

“Exactly.”

“So he’s been takin’ advantage of you for five years by makin’ you think he wanted to be a family?”

“Yeah.”

“So how’s that not abusin’ you?”

Beckett flaps like a goldfish out of water and entirely fails to find words. Every muscle in her body gathers itself to flee. O’Leary drops a redwood-sized arm round her shoulders.

“You’re not goin’ anywhere, Beckett. You want my help to deal with what’s goin’ on, you got it. But I ain’t lettin’ you go into interrogation – an’ I know that’s what you’re plannin’ on – without bein’ properly prepared. An’ right now you’re not. You haven’t even got the story straight in your own head, so how’d you think you were gonna get any sense outta anyone else? Huh?”

Castle is open-mouthed in shock. He’d had O’Leary pegged as a great guy, a bit big-brotherly, but basically someone who’d let Beckett ride on through. This is not what he’d expected. From the stunned expression on Beckett’s face, neither had she.

“You need to straighten up your thinkin’. If you’re gonna claim your pa didn’t mess you up, then you better have some good reasonin’, because all the facts I got point me to he did. Either he did when he was drunk or he did when he got dry, or both.”

Or neither is patently not an option, Castle thinks, and stays very quiet.

“So what’ve you got, Beckett?”

Beckett pulls two smudged sheets out of her purse and lays them on the table. Castle shuffles round to see them – really, Beckett’s scrawl is practically illiterate: he’d almost suspect her of having skipped school every time that particular one of the three Rs came up – and works out that it’s a detailed timeline, with supporting points of fact, and a not-detailed list of questions. Hardly any questions, actually.

“Okay,” O’Leary is saying. “You got the same facts I got.”

“Yeah. Let’s start there. Castle’s facts come a lot later. Park them for now.”

Beckett and O’Leary go through the facts without anything more, or anything new, coming to light.

“So them’s the facts. What about motive?”

“Motive?”

“Your pa must have had some motive. Feelin’s. They all do, ‘less it’s a serial killer. So if you’re sayin’ that he didn’t abuse you even though all these facts say he did, it’s gotta be in the feelin’s.”

“Uh?” Beckett says inelegantly.

“All your facts,” O’Leary says very patiently, “say that he either abused you when he was drunk by sayin’ he didn’t want you till you did everything you could to try and stop him drinkin’ so he didn’t say it any more; or they say that he abused you when he was sober by playin’ on sayin’ he wanted to be a family an’ you saved him, so you never went off with someone else an’ left him to look after himself like a normal adult does. So why’re you still sayin’ that it wasn’t abuse? ‘Cause I just don’t get it, Beckett. The facts are starin’ you in the face, an’ you’re ignoring them.”

“He didn’t.” She’s locked down. It’s a statement that doesn’t admit dissent.

“That ain’t an argument. You don’t take that from your suspects an’ I don’t take it from you. C’mon. Can’t you do better than that?”

“Feelings aren’t your concern, O’Leary,” Beckett says, but under the half-rebuke, and the glance he casts her in return, she’s already pale; the crease in her brow deeper, her eyes puddling in pain.

“You screwin’ up is my concern. We’re pals. How’re you goin’ to prove the shrink wrong if you can’t even prove me wrong? He’s going to be clever.”

“Still pretending you’re a hayseed just off the farm, O’Leary?”

“Works for me,” he says happily, but isn’t diverted. “So, feelings. Motive.”

“Simple. When he was drunk he thought I was Mom. He was so upset she was dead that he couldn’t control his mouth. He missed her so much. Then it wasn’t Mom and he drank to forget she was gone. Wasn’t about me. It was about his memories. Mom kept him together. So he wanted her and didn’t want me, and when he was drunk he said so. Like I said, simple.”

O’Leary nods, Castle has the strangest impression that it’s anything but agreement. Beckett is still completely locked down: not the slightest hint of a reaction. “And then he got dry.”

“He wanted to remember Mom. I was the only person with any connection. So he wanted to see me so he had his memories. Like a living photo. ‘S not that he cares about me, it’s that he wants to keep his memories fresh.”

O’Leary nods again, with as little agreement.

“So that’s that bit,” Beckett says briskly, in a very let’s-move-right-along-here fashion. O’Leary looks as if he wants to argue, and then stops. His arm is still holding Beckett in place, and then drops away. “Castle. What’s my dad been saying to you?”
Castle swallows asking me my intentions like this is still 1890 and takes a breath. “He asks if you’re okay, and then he says you don’t take his calls. He says he wants to see you. That he misses you and you’re his family.”

Beckett’s face remains completely closed down: now white and frozen like the Alaskan winter ice. “So he’s telling you the same bullshit he’s telling me. At least he’s consistent.” Castle winces. “He sounded really upset.”

“Sure he did. He used to sound really upset to me too. He’s good at it. Really convincing. Guess we’ll see on Friday.” She shrugs, and shrugs off the subject, as if it’s snow sliding off her icy cover. “Want another?”

O’Leary shakes his head. Castle does too. “I’ve had enough,” Castle says. Beckett doesn’t see him tap O’Leary’s knee, or the exchange of glances.

“Me too,” O’Leary says. “Pete’s cookin’. He’ll be upset if I’m not there to eat it.”

“This ain’t right.”

“Tell me about it. I need the restroom. Can you hang around a moment or two longer?”

“Sure. ‘Nother beer?”

“No thanks.”

Castle disappears. O’Leary meditatively raises his beer to his mouth, waves a casual farewell as Beckett exits the bar, and awaits developments.

“I get what you mean,” O’Leary rumbles when Castle returns. “None so blind…”

“Especially when they really don’t want to see. Any helpful thoughts?”

“Naw. She ain’t thinking at all, never mind straight. Never heard so much crap in my life, and she don’t even see that none of it makes sense. ‘S not like her. It’s as if she just won’t hear anything that doesn’t fit her theory. If she was like that she’d never have been a detective. I don’t get it. What’s she playin’ at?”

“If she accepts the shrink’s right, she’s got to rethink her whole life. Everything about her father. If she accepts that it looked like abuse, then she’s got to accept that for a while she was a victim. If she accepts that he does care, then she’s got to accept that she should have told him the whole truth back when.”

“Hang on,” O’Leary whistles. “She never told him what he said? Oh boy. Oh Lordy. He doesn’t know? You never said he didn’t know what he said.”

“No. He doesn’t remember any of it.”

“Oh, boy. If I were you I’d be running for Ohio. Or Texas. Or out the country. I hear Iraq’s nice this time of year, an’ it might be safer.”

“Thanks.”

“But since you aren’t gonna run out on her – an’ if you do, I’ll find you – all you can do is be there an’ pick up the pieces.”

“Great.”

“Tell you somethin’, though.”

“Yeah? Am I going to like it any better than the rest of what’s happened tonight?”

“Oh, I guess you will,” O’Leary says happily.

“Go on, then.”

“Saw Beckett’s face when she came in, just before she sat down. Stopped scowlin’ at the world for a moment, just when she looked at you.” He blushes, sunset over the vast expanse of a prairie. “Pete looks at me that way,” he mumbles. “Don’t let her get away.”

Castle doesn’t say a word. From the look O’Leary’s giving him, he doesn’t have to.

“Notice you didn’t say that you were goin’ home.”

“No,” Castle fends off the impending question.

“Good.” He drains his beer. “See you, Castle.”

“Night.”

Castle exits the bar and decides on a mind-clearing, longish walk. In the direction of Beckett’s apartment, naturally. He can always pick up a cab if it starts to rain or his feet get tired, but for now he wants the physical rhythm of walking and movement. Later, he wants a different physical rhythm. In between, he wants to know what Beckett’s thinking and planning – if she knows. And it would be extremely pleasant if that took place in conjunction with the same soft affection that she’d been applying to him yesterday.

The chill evening air clears his head a little, but not enough to work out any more reasons why Beckett’s so pig-headedly stupid and so determined not to see reality beyond the thoughts he’d outlined.

Dr Burke, having politely escorted Mr Castle to the door, returns to his office and then, reconsidering, enters the small kitchen to prepare a pot of delicate Orange Pekoe tea. He carefully assembles a fine porcelain cup and saucer, measures the tea leaves with exactitude, ensures that the fine porcelain teapot which he keeps solely for this tea is gently warmed prior to infusing his tea, and conveys the result to his desk. He is, by now, extremely concerned by the potential ramifications of the proposed meeting on Friday, but as he had said to Mr Castle, he is also intensely concerned that failing to have the meeting at the earliest opportunity will result in either Detective Beckett or Mr Beckett taking precipitous and catastrophic action. Therefore, in addition to ensuring that Mr Beckett has been contacted and has agreed to attend, he wishes to take some time to think logically about this most illogical of situations. Too, he has failed to consume sufficient fluid as yet today, and his tea will correct that deficiency before he should suffer a headache arising from that lack. He gently congratulates himself on having researched the science behind the oft-made claim that one should drink eight or more cups of water per day, and having found that it has never been properly tested. It appears, from the scant research available, that any fluid will suffice, and that in any event the purpose of one’s body indicating thirst is to indicate that one should drink.

If only minds were as well-regulated as the thirst reflex, Dr Burke laments. Detective Beckett is wilfully blinding herself to the facts, in order not to confront her misconceptions. Mr Castle, having found himself at the centre of the maelstrom, is desperately trying to stay above the surface while still ensuring that Detective Beckett knows that he is always and only there for her. Dr Burke thinks, with a detached fondness which he would never show in sessions with either Detective Beckett or Mr Castle, that deep and abiding love for another can move mountains. Or Detective Beckett, which requires much the same strength. It is indeed fortunate that Detective Beckett appears to be equally enamoured, although she is far less inclined, or indeed able, to reveal her feelings. However, they are now perfectly obvious to Dr Burke’s skilled observation. Mr Castle should have no doubts that his emotions are wholly reciprocated.

He summons his receptionist, and is informed that Mr Beckett has accepted the invitation to the session on Friday. All participants’ presence ensured, Dr Burke considers his notes. Detective Beckett may think that she will be controlling the session, but she will not be. Dr Burke has no intention of allowing the meeting to descend into over-emotional accusations. There will be truth, there will undoubtedly be painful revelations, but to the best of Dr Burke’s considerable abilities as a psychiatrist there will, in the end, be resolution.

He turns to his notes and his papers, and applies a formidable mind to the problems ahead.
Castle knocks on Beckett’s door, and waits. And waits. And waits some more. And knocks again, and waits. And knocks much harder, and waits mere seconds before pulling out his phone and dialling. He can hear it ringing in the apartment.

“Beckett?”

“It’s Castle. Are you okay? Why aren’t you answering the door?”

The door opens. Beckett is wrapped in a towel and her hair is dripping lather soggily round her head.

“I was in the shower,” she says unnecessarily. “I didn’t expect you. I didn’t hear the door.” She shivers. “Can you make yourself a coffee, while I finish up?”

“I could” –

“No.” She shivers again. The room is not at all cold, even if you’re only wrapped in a towel.

“Okay.”

Beckett disappears back to her neglected shower.

It appears to Castle, not a man ignorant of the stages of women’s showering, that Beckett was less than halfway through washing her hair, at best. That implies that she’s been in the shower for only a few moments. He hadn’t exactly walked at Olympic pace, and for once had obeyed every Don’t Walk sign. Hm. What’s Beckett been doing for the last hour?

He mechanically makes coffee, only realising halfway through that he hadn’t had to think about finding anything; that he hadn’t even had a momentary hesitation in obtaining a mug. The shower is still running in the background, and he prowls around Beckett’s apartment, not allowing minor little details, such as preserving her privacy, to stop him investigating the top layer of papers on her desk. It’s the notes she’d had in the bar, plus a few added extras of generally little import. Except for one matter. He peers more closely, and shakes his head. The smudges had generally not been present earlier. He prods very carefully at the paper and, as he had surmised, finds it to be very slightly damp.

He returns to the couch, borrows a book and makes himself comfortable, and waits for Beckett to reappear, at which time he intends to turn her into cuddlesome soft Kat, snuggled warmly in his clasp and just where she ought to be and he wants her. Questioning her about why she’s been upset over her papers can wait for a little while, and anyway if he cuddles her close and cossets her into warmth then she’s far more likely to talk.

When Beckett finally reappears she’s put on soft, cosy sweats and her hair is damp. A hairdryer doesn’t appear to have figured, which is mildly surprising. She pads over and sits next to Castle, who instinctively slides an arm round her to tuck her in. There’s a small but very definite snuggle in return, and then her head slips on to Castle’s shoulder and her arm slips round his middle. Nothing is said. Beckett’s hand stays softly resting on Castle’s hipbone even as he turns her and lifts her into his lap, whereupon she hums contentedly and snuggles in more positively. Her face is buried almost into the yoke of his shirt, where he can’t see her face. He is not convinced that this is down to either affection or accident. On the other hand, it allows him to smooth firmly up and down her back, all the way from nape to the curve of her backside, in the assertive fashion that she generally likes best and has the best results. When he gets tired of Beckett-petting, he runs his hand up into the wisps of short hair at the base of her skull and lifts her head. There’s a small, cross noise and she tries to nuzzle in again.

“Out you come, Beckett,” Castle says mischievously. “You can’t use my shirt as a towel any more: it’s already damp.”

The answer – if he could call it that – sounds much like a growl.

“That’s not nice,” he says reprovingly – and then notices that in fact his shirt is very damp. He ceases trying to lift her head to kiss her and instead kisses the available option of her hair, wrapping his other arm around her. “It’ll be okay. C’mere.” His tone is smoothly possessive; his grip firm, pressing her into him. Her arms tighten around him in response, though her head doesn’t yet rise. “C’mon. I want to kiss you, and I can’t if you’re hiding in my shirt.”

Her face appears. Castle says nothing at all about the slight redness of her eyes. He doesn’t get the opportunity. His smooth assertion is entirely overwhelmed by Beckett taking hard possession of his mouth and backing it up with a sudden iron grip that would be better applied to taking down criminals than intimate relations. This is entirely not the plan. He does the asserting here. Beckett does the becoming cuddlesome Kat. Unfortunately, though his brain thinks that, his body thinks that Beckett being assertive is very arousing indeed, and right now his body is in full control. Well. Actually, Beckett is in full control of his body. He isn’t in any sort of control at all, which is no doubt why he’s already devoid of shirt, belt, and thought. Beckett’s still invading his mouth, and there’s little room for him to manœuvre…unless… he surges into action, flips them over and ends up above her on the couch, pressing into her, pushing down to trap her hands in his and taking her mouth to reverse her assault and raid on his own account.

She’s still fighting for control of the kiss as he drives into her lush lips and searches the hot depths to find passionate response, nips on her lip and then sucks it gently into his own mouth to soothe the small sting, and she stops fighting and the edge of frantic desperation eases. As it does, as she does, Castle pulls away and sits back up and brings her up to be held against him, tucked into his warm, bare chest, dropping small kisses on her nose and forehead.

“It won’t help, you know.”

There’s a long silence.

“You’re the only clear thing I’ve got,” Beckett eventually says, dropping her eyes and trying very hard to hide. “I can’t… I wish we were in the Hamptons right now,” she says miserably. “It was all so much easier there.”

“Mmm?” Castle hums.

“Everything’s right on top of me here. No space. No space to think. I know what the facts look like but I know there’s more and I just can’t work it out here.”

Wishful thinking, Beckett. There isn’t more.

“You don’t have to do everything on Friday. It’s not time-limited. You can do some of it and then think about it over the weekend. Can’t you?”

“I just want it done. Answers. I want to move on. I don’t want him messing up my life any more. I put it on hold for him for years and look where it got me. I’m not doing it again. Don’t I get a life?”

“Sure you do,” Castle says, and doesn’t add right here with me. “But, you know, it doesn’t have to be black and white. You could just let the past lie. It’s gone. Just accept that the facts are what they... are and not worry about it, fix what your dad said and then move on.” He strokes her dark hair softly. “Couldn’t you?”

“I can’t. If I don’t fix it it’ll be there poisoning everything. Just like it is already.”

“Oh?”

“Still can’t deal with your family, can I?” she says bitterly. “How’s that supposed to work? ‘Hey, Alexis, I’m dating Beckett but she can’t stand seeing us together so she won’t come here.’ Like that’s going to go down well. I couldn’t even sit through Sunday brunch. You come as a team. Team Castle Family. So it’s fix it or watch it fail. Eventually, you’d walk.”

Castle can’t truthfully deny that. After all, it’s why he’d tried to walk away the first time.

“But…” he says, “why can’t you just accept the facts? Everyone agrees what they are.”

“I wasn’t abused. If I’d been abused the first therapist would have said so.”

“The first therapist who fucked it all up?” Castle emits furiously. “That’s who you’re going to believe? Someone who was wrong about everything and you’re taking that as gospel? Wake up and smell the coffee, Beckett. You’ve been working on a false premise for years. You have to go back to the beginning and rip that therapy apart. It was wrong, and until you get through that nothing’s going to be on a firm footing.” He forces her face up to look at him. “Everyone who’s got half a brain who’s seen the facts – me, O’Leary, Dr Burke even if he is a pompous arrogant jerk – can see that even if it wasn’t abuse because your dad never meant it it’s had the same result. You can’t have it both ways. Either it was like abuse when he was drunk or it was like abuse when he was sober. You just don’t want to believe it. Whether he meant to or not your dad hurt you, and trying to pretend he didn’t won’t help.”

He takes an infuriated breath, completely devoid of filter or control. “If you’d only tell your dad the truth about what he said then you might fix this. If you’re going to mess around trying to pretend it’s something different and hiding the truth you never will. It’s up to you, Beckett.”

She wrenches herself away from him, halfway across the room. “Mess around? Is that what you think this is? If I’d told my dad the truth he’d have gone straight back to the bottle and then he’d be dead. I lost my mom. I thought I’d lost my dad. Some days I wished I had. At least then it would all have been over. Instead he crawled out and I thought it was because he loved me. So how could I kill him? I might as well have put my Glock to his head and fired.”

“And that’s not what you’ve done now? You haven’t even told him why you won’t talk to him. How’s it going to make it any worse? If he isn’t head down in a bottle right now why’d you think he will be? He’ll already be thinking the worst. So you might as well tell him it because I can absolutely guarantee it won’t be any worse than what he’s thinking. Anyway, since he’s seen Dr Burke he’s probably already worked out that it’s all down to when he was drunk and since your dad isn’t dumb chances are he’s nearly got it anyway.”

“So what’re you saying? I’ve killed him anyway?”

“No. Listen, Beckett. He’s not drunk even though he thinks you’ve given up on him. He’s strong enough to take this.” Castle takes a breath and prays. “And it’s not your fault whatever he does. You can’t control him. You never could. Say what you have to say and move on.”

Her little bird is in her hands, twisting and twisting over it. Castle’s terrified that her restless hands will snap its fragile beak, or a leg: she keeps turning it until she realises what she’s doing and puts it down; only to pick up the little red stone and start again. She says nothing, just keeps turning and twisting and staring sightlessly at her hands.

Castle rises to cross the room to her, standing behind her and then wrapping her into his arms. “Just for a change, think about what you want.”

“I know what I want. I just don’t get what I want. Why bother asking? I can’t have it till I get over my dad.” She sounds hopeless, and defeated. “It would have been better if he’d never got dry and never come back. At least then I’d never have thought he cared.”

“What do you want?”

“I want you,” she whispers, after a long silence in which Castle has plenty of time to reflect that he shouldn’t have asked.

“Good,” he murmurs into her ear, “because I want you too.” His arms tighten around her. “We can talk about that in the Hamptons. But you need to tell your dad the truth. It’s the only way you’ll move on, Kate.” He stops. She’s cold in his grip: shivering. “I’ll be there. I’m on your side, whatever it is.” Her hand comes up to cover his, and it’s cold, too: the red stone hard against the back of his fingers. “You only have to decide if you’re ready. If it’s too soon, it’s okay. I’ll wait. Just so long as you tell me that you need time. It’s up to you. Yes, or no, Kate: ready to talk to him, or not yet.”

He stops. She’s still trembling: chilled and still and silent; her hand has dropped limply away.

“Only yes, or no. Nothing else.”

He holds on to her, and doesn’t say more. Simple choices, simple decisions, and no pressure. He’s said far more than he should have, far more than he meant to, and his only hope now is that he hasn’t pushed too hard. He’s surprised that she hasn’t told him to leave. Even short weeks ago, she’d have thrown him out for this overstepping, and yet here he is, still holding her as she thinks. Dr Burke had thought that there was a chance she’d explode at him, but it hasn’t happened. Perhaps that should be yet.

Here she is, letting him support her.

“I’ll try. Friday. But you have to promise that you’ll get me out if I ask you to.” It sounds childish, asking for a promise, but Castle isn’t at all sure that it is. What she is really asking of him is to be on her side whatever Dr Burke, or her father, try and persuade her to do, but that’s simple. He is, and he will be.

“Promise,” he says, with barely a pause, and she slumps into him, as if that’s all she needs to fall apart. He takes her back to the couch, and curls her into his side: not, now, on his lap. Nothing is said. Nothing happens. When he turns to her, her long lashes are down, and her body lax and dead weight against him. He ponders for a few moments, considering whether to leave or not. Finally he extricates his phone and calls home. His mother is there, and intending to be there all night. He exchanges a few words with Alexis, who is supportive, and swipes off. Beckett hasn’t so much as twitched.

First things first. He repositions himself so that he can lift her without crippling injury, and manages to stand and then pick her up to convey her to her bedroom. He lays her down gently, folds back the comforter, removes her sweatpants very carefully and tries not to swallow his tongue at the pretty, lacy panties beneath, and slips her beneath the covers. He takes off her top equally delicately and is only too glad that he hadn’t known she was braless under it. Finally, he covers her up and retreats silently. In all that, she hasn’t woken, or stirred.
Halfway across the room it occurs to him that he should close the drapes. When he turns, his gaze snags on Beckett’s white face, sleep taking the animation from it and leaving only dragging tiredness and a disturbingly pinched, sharp outline. He’s seen the waking emotion, but he has only occasionally stayed all night with her since her father’s ill-worded comments and so he hasn’t really seen the full toll she’s paying. This really cannot continue. While she may find rest and respite in the Hamptons with him this weekend, much more of this and she will snap. Friday is going to be excruciatingly, exquisitely painful – but this cannot continue.

It’s no consolation at all for Castle to realise that this is precisely the position that Dr Burke had observed. He doesn’t like Dr Burke one little bit, and he doesn’t like crediting him with considerable understanding and intelligence. Unfortunately, Dr Burke has both. Along with an ego a mile high and two miles wide, of course. When this is all done, he will wave goodbye to Dr Burke with intense relief.

He closes the drapes and exits the bedroom, finds a book and then returns. Suddenly, he wants to be close to Beckett, so that even in her heavy sleep she’ll somehow sense him there. He prepares for bed, very quietly, and angles the sidelight so that it falls away from her face. She still hasn’t moved when he slides under the comforter.

He’s been reading for some time, and is thinking about stopping to go to sleep, when Beckett makes an odd little noise and then turns towards him, her sleeping hand landing on his leg. Castle lays the book aside and decides that this is a good time to turn out the light and cuddle down. Almost as soon as he does, Beckett wriggles, still asleep, into him and brings her arm across him. Another small noise exits her mouth, and then resolves into words. You’re here. She wraps herself into him more closely and is again wholly lax.

Castle falls into sleep still wondering how often Beckett has turned over in her sleep looking for him, and not finding him there. That he knows she understands the necessity doesn’t really help. No wonder that she’d said that he wouldn’t leave if she could only come to the loft. He embraces her, and slumbers.

Deep in the night, Beckett wakes, and is shocked into full wakefulness, rather than the half-waking that would take her to the bathroom and back, by the large, warm, comforting presence – snoring softly, till she elbows him and he turns over – of Castle in her bed. She attends to necessity, and returns to curl into him, an arm across his midriff and spooned into his broad back. He turns over, deeply asleep still, and pulls her in, emitting a rumble that resolves itself into my Kat, c’mere. Beckett falls back into comforted sleep, as close to Castle as she can manage.
I tried to touch

When Beckett wakes she’s sprawled out across the bed, not across Castle. For a second she thinks she dreamt it, but then there’s a whiffle tickling her neck and a large hand swamping hers and since she doesn’t think there’s been a Bigfoot coming out her closets she guesses that it really is Castle. Still here, still keeping her safe, and still very, very sexy: all tousled and sleepy and… and suddenly very much exuding just fell into bed-ness. Sleepy turns into sleepy-eyed and lazy, predatory smile; the hand over hers has become the hand sliding under her neck, propping him up to gaze down at her; his other hand spreading over her stomach.

“This is nice,” he purrs, and extends his fingers to flirt at the bottom of her ribcage. “I like you all warm and tousled and in bed with me.” His hand slides upward, slowly and intently. Beckett’s hand slides over his flank. “All soft and snuggly” – his head descends – “and right here” – and his mouth meets hers: sure and slow and searchingly seductive. Beckett opens for him and lets him take and explore as he chooses, softly receptive and perfectly content that Castle should take the lead right now.

And so he does. Firm hands skate over her side, glide across her breast, slither back downwards to her hip and then grip and turn her into him, so that she can feel his hard need pressing into her. She curls her leg up around his middle and gasps as he instantly accepts the open invitation, slipping a hand over her ass to cup her and stroke, shifting the light cotton panties she’s still wearing to rub them over slick skin. Her own hands bite into the span of his back to hold him to her.

“Mmmm,” Castle rumbles. “I know what you want.” She can feel him smiling against her lips. “Me. Let’s do some things that you want me to do.”

He unfurls her and pushes her on to her back on the bed, dark hair spilling across the pillows and dark eyes hazy. His mouth explores her jaw, her throat, round to a place by her ear that makes her gasp and wriggle and grip hard; and then he shifts down again and nibbles delicately along each collarbone; morning stubble scraping gently. Beckett reaches for him, and finds her hands replaced around Castle’s neck. “Uh-uh. We don’t have that much time.” Huh? Oh. Work. Ugh. “I got this.” He kisses lower. “I got you.” His mouth closes on her breast and the stubble scrapes and she stops thinking about anything in favour of pulling his head closer. He spends less time than she’d like there, but since the next movement is also downward, with a wicked twirl of tongue to bid farewell to her breasts and hello to her navel, she forgets to complain. Then she forgets everything including her name as he slips her panties away and opens her up and kisses the inner face of her thighs once, twice, and then begins to work her up with firm tongue and wicked fingers and the friction from the stubble and oh Castle more there please there Castle and she’s almost there, so close it would only take a touch and instead he rises over her and then thrusts in fully in one hard movement and his hand flickers between them and she’s gone.

A fortunate three minutes later her alarm goes off. Castle, previously lying peacefully playing with her hair, is electric-shocked into sitting up. Beckett groans, reaches out without looking and slaps it off.

“Why do you have a nuclear attack warning level alarm?”

“It puts me to sleep,” Beckett says flippantly.

“Ow. My ears are ringing.”

“Time to get going,” she says, and struggles out of bed.
“Don’t you like mornings?”

“Ugh.”

“But Beckett, how can you not like mornings? All the promise and potential of a beautiful day” –

“It’s raining.”

“Still, a lovely new day.”

“It’ll still be a lovely new day later. Except I have to go to work, you know, the thing that pays me, so the only promise and potential I’ve got is clapping killers in clink.”

“Have I told you how hot you are when you alliterate? Especially with non-standard terms?”

Beckett smiles. “No, but I’m sure you’ll be thinking about it.” The smile drains from her face.

“Work.” She turns to the bathroom.

“I could help you shower,” Castle says with an equal mix of mischief and seductiveness.

“I have a start time,” Beckett points out tartly.

Castle pouts, insincerely.

“You don’t like the optimism of a new day and you don’t like me helping you shower. You fall asleep on me when I come round.” he grumps. “You’ve had your wicked way with me and now you’re casting me aside until you need me to come to your session on Friday. How unkind you are.”

He smirks at her back, and awaits a smart reply.

The bathroom door clicks shut in lieu of an answer.

Behind the closed door, Beckett draws a pained breath. Surely Castle had meant that as humorous? He must have done. She stands under the heat of the shower and tries to let it soak the hornet sting of biting truth away. Surely he doesn’t think she’s unkind or ungrateful? Or… or does he? After all, it’s not like she’s been kind to her father, is it? But it’s Castle, who’s been unfailingly supportive. He’s had to put up with everything, including her father. And it’s she who has dragged him into all this mess. He didn’t have to get involved. He certainly doesn’t have to go on Friday, or pull her out if she needs it, or listen to all that history. All it’ll prove is that she’s a screwed up mess. He doesn’t need to see any more of the worst of her, and she’s been unreasonable to ask him to sit through it. Ungrateful, asking him to do ever more to support her. All it’s done is put him in unpleasant situations.

She has an agonising memory of her mother telling her never to be ungrateful, when she’d been complaining about some perceived unfairness. She knows how bruised and furious she is that her father had conned her into doing everything for him, out of guilt; and it’s Castle who triggered this whole change and mess – and he knows it, and likely he feels guilty about that, and now she’s doing just what her father did and she can’t stand it. She deals with the remainder of her morning routine as quickly as she can and exits the bathroom.

“Castle?”

“Mhm?” He takes a step towards her. Beckett steps back. She’ll never be able to give him an out if he touches her. He’s just too much. He means too much. She needs him too much – and that thought pushes her into it.
“Castle… I… You don’t have to come on Friday. I… Just come to the precinct instead.”

“What?”

“It’s not your family. You shouldn’t be involved. It’s not fair to put you through it.”

“What?”

She inadvertently steps back again from the force of his word.

“You shouldn’t be put between me and my Dad. That’s Burke’s job. Not yours. You shouldn’t be dragged into a family fight that’s nothing to do with you.”

“You don’t want me there?”

“I… You’re only going because I pushed you into it and it’s clear you think I’m just leaning on you without giving you anything back. You don’t need to be there. It’s the precinct you want to be in, for inspiration. You don’t have to wait till Friday for that.”

He stands silent, staring at her. Beckett can’t meet his eyes. She had asked too much. Otherwise he’d be arguing.

“Can…” she stops. Castle still hasn’t said a word more. “I have to get to work,” she hurries out. “I can’t be late.”

“No.”

Beckett collects a jacket from the closet, not incidentally hiding her face. She’s doing the right thing. Not Castle’s circus, not his clowns. He’d have done it for her, but he shouldn’t have to and she should never have asked. “Okay,” she says without a hint of her misery escaping. “Will I see you later at the precinct?”

“No.”

“Okay,” she repeats, and makes sure she’s still hiding her face.

“No, I will not be missing on Friday. No, you are not pulling that piece of stupidity on me. I said I’d tell you if I wouldn’t or couldn’t do something and you don’t get to make that decision for me.”

Beckett finds herself being hauled out of her space, flipped round, and shaken by Castle’s hard grip on her shoulders. “No, you are not going in there on your own. What do you think I’ll see that I don’t know already? Huh? I know it’s going to be a mess – for you. The only thing I care about is getting you back out of there in one piece and taking you out of Manhattan. You can’t show me anything I don’t know already.” He shakes her shoulders again. “I’m not flattered that you think I can be bullied by you. I can’t. I’m really not happy that you’re hiding again. Stop it. Look at me and tell me you don’t want me there.” She can’t. “See? You do want me there, you just don’t want to ask for it. Or you don’t want me to see it. Well, newsflash, Beckett, I’m going to be there and I’m going to see through whatever happens. Whatever you try.” She finds her shoulders shaken, for a third time, and then her chin is grasped and tipped up and she is ruthlessly kissed and pressed in until she doesn’t know which way is up. “You are not wriggling out of this by making stupid statements.” He crashes down on her mouth again, brooking no resistance.

“Now you have to be at work.” Castle pushes her towards the door with rather more force than she expects.

“But…but…”
“But I’m going to wash up and go home and then I’m going to see you in the precinct later – I’ll have to, because you’ll need to leave me your key to lock up behind me. You can come out to lunch with me, when we are going to discuss this piece of idiocy properly – and if you try to come up with any excuse to wriggle out of lunch that isn’t a verified new corpse I’ll perp-walk you out of the bullpen myself.”

“Uh? Lunch?”

“Yep, lunch. And discussion, before you come up with another dumb idea like this one,” Castle says with considerable irritation.

“Uh?” Beckett finds further words forestalled by the sharp click of the bathroom door in her face. “Key on the nightstand,” she calls through the door. It’s easier than arguing, and doesn’t make her late. She’s cutting it fine as it is.

“Later, Beckett.”

Beckett attains the precinct and her desk at her normal time. The first cup of coffee doesn’t touch the sides. Nor does the second. Nor the third. After the third, she stops. None of it is really dealing with the cold ache in her middle or the worry that she’s truly mis-stepped with Castle. He’d been really annoyed with her, and now he wants to talk. She can’t face another lacerating row fuelled on her own insecurity and misconceptions and issues. She buries her head in the first file she finds and barely raises it to greet Ryan and Espo when they arrive, a short time later. Fortunately, they respect the Keep Off signs.

By late morning Beckett still hasn’t worked out what to say to Castle, and into the bargain she is now too worried and tense to be hungry anyway. She can’t go to the gym because Espo won’t spar with her this week after the damage of last week; and she can’t wreak havoc on a homicide because yet again there are no murders on her rota. In short, she has nothing to focus her thoughts upon, and as a direct result they are roiling around her head.

“I’ll be back in a few minutes,” she says generally, and escapes from the claustrophobic clutch of unproductive thoughts, aiming out of the precinct and over to Tompkins Square Park, where the trees are just beginning to put out leaves and indicate spring is probably here. It’s stopped raining, though the grey sky is pregnant with the possibility of further drizzle and unpleasantness. Spring is sprung, Beckett thinks miserably, but unlike the grass, her hopes are not rising. She plops down on a handy bench, and stares at the green grass, completely unable to put two thoughts together sensibly. Nothing makes sense at all.

After a while, which achieves nothing in the way of conclusions and less in the way of relieving her worry and stress, she gets up and starts to pace through the park. It doesn’t help her thinking, but it keeps her in motion, which has always helped. Till now. She’s stressed by the thought of Friday. She’s stressed by Castle’s infuriated reaction to being given an out from the whole damn mess. She’s stressed by the thought of the weekend, now: she’d intended it to allow her a space to say what she felt, but she’s been rocked by her own failure to deal with a flippant statement that had nevertheless stung hard enough to contain a very unpleasant truth, after Dr Burke had ripped the scabs off her wounds. Suddenly, she just wants to stop; to run far, far away, where there are no people and no problems and no need to deal with anything or anyone. She could, in fact, just go home and pack a bag and leave. Right now. The logistics of leaving roll through her mind. Credit card, passport, washbag, clothes until she could hit a cheap store. Car, or plane ticket? Car. Cash. Disappear without a trace.

But then she wouldn’t have Castle. Who, for some completely inconceivable reason, still seems to want to have her. Maybe she could take him too.
Or maybe not. He, after all, has a family, with whom he has to, and more importantly wants to, stay. That’s where this whole mess began, and ends. Her inability to deal with anyone’s family. Castle’s or her own. Castle doesn’t come without his family, however much she needs and wants and – say it – loves him: if she can’t deal with his family she won’t have him. Then again, if she can’t be grateful for what he does she won’t have him either.

Well, after tomorrow evening she’ll be finally shot of her millstone father and able to move on without caring that he doesn’t care; without trying to make him love her when he hasn’t since the moment her mother was buried. In vino, veritas. All the rest was simply a lie. Actually, who cares if he abused her or not? Why’s she worrying about his exoneration? They’re all right: he did abuse her. If she’s going to get shot of him, it simply doesn’t matter, just like absolutely everyone’s been telling her. So she needn’t bother with it. Anyway. After tomorrow her father won’t be a problem any more. Not her problem, anyway.

She slumps back down on a different bench, heedless that she should have returned to work long since. It’s not as if there’s a new murder, just the endless list of cold cases. She ought to work them: those victims deserve justice too. But for the first time ever she can’t find solace in the thought of doing her job. In fact, she doesn’t want to go back to the bullpen. She doesn’t want to do anything. Her hands fall still between her knees. Shortly, it begins to drizzle. She doesn’t notice, and doesn’t care, and the time passes imperceptibly and inexorably.

Castle had picked up Beckett’s key following a swift clean up, and, still more than somewhat irritated by Beckett’s mistaken assumptions, taken himself home where, he hopes, he can soothe himself into serenity with a hot shower, smooth shave and clean, fresh clothes. He lets himself into his own home, only to be greeted by his mother. This is exactly not what he needs in his irritated state.

“Well, darling?”

“Good morning, Mother.”

Castle attempts to move past her.

“Hang on, kiddo. Where were you last night?”

“Out.”

“Out?” Martha repeats, with heavy disbelief. “Was that another murder that wasn’t on the news?”

“Mother, this is none of your business. Stop interfering.”

“Ah, so you were with Katherine.”

“Mother…” Castle says, annoyance tinging his tone.

“Now, darling, there’s nothing wrong with spending time with your girlfriend. But I do think you should bring her home occasionally.”

“Mother, you have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Well, it doesn’t say much for either of you if you won’t even bring her home.”

“Thank you for that extremely flattering comment. Has it occurred to you that insulting Beckett and me isn’t exactly going to encourage me to ask her over?”
“Well, why won’t she come here then? Surely you’ve asked her over already?”

“No,” Castle says baldly.

“What? Richard, have you no manners?”

“I have quite enough manners not to inflict you on Beckett.”

“Richard, that was uncalled for.”

“No, Mother, it was quite justified. Butt out of our business. You were meddling on Sunday and you’re trying to meddle now. Don’t. I’m certainly not asking Beckett over for you to interrogate her.”

“But Richard” –

“Mother, listen very carefully. Don’t do anything at all that interferes in any way between me and Beckett.” He smiles, not at all filially.

“Don’t give me that look. You’re still my child.”

“Right now, I’m your landlord.”

“You wouldn’t,” Martha says, horrified.

“Care to take the chance? You don’t know what’s going on so don’t meddle.”

“There’s an easy answer, kiddo. Tell me what’s going on.”

“Not your business. Just for once, stay out of it.” He glares at his mother. “Now, I’d like to have a shower. Without any of your maternal machinations.” He stalks off, annoyance in every sinew, and only just stops himself slamming the door. His shower, shave and clean, fresh clothes don’t improve his mood one iota, and when he’s ready to leave for the precinct, quite some time later since cold cases continue to bore him stupid, he’s still not calmed down.

When he gets in, he initially thinks Beckett must have stepped out for a moment. He drops his umbrella by her desk and wanders over to exchange compliments with the boys.

“Hey, guys.”

“Castle, what’cha doin’ here?”

“Came to see you all.”

Esposito makes a disbelieving noise. “Yeah, right, bro. That’s why you’re looking at Beckett’s desk. She ain’t here.”

“Huh?”

“Went out” – he looks at his watch – “Huh. Over an hour ago.”

“Thought she’d gone out to get a coffee,” Ryan pipes up. Castle casts a quick scan over the Beckett desk and observes two used mugs and, poking out of the trash can, a familiarly logoed go-cup. She would have been in by eight; it’s now almost noon. Hm. Three cups in three hours – if she went out at eleven, which is what Espo seems to be saying – is very plausible, as is going for a vanilla latte if she’s in need of the flavour hit. That’s normal. Taking an hour about it is not, and she knew that he was coming in to take her for lunch.

“For an hour? Not likely,” Esposito says derisively. “Ten minutes to get a Danish, yeah.”

“Maybe she went to the morgue,” Ryan suggests, very doubtfully.

And maybe she’s avoiding me, Castle thinks. The thought does not please him. “I said I’d buy her lunch,” he actually says. “How could anyone skip out on that?”

Esposito and Ryan look cynically at each other.

“Guess she forgot.”

“Or got a better offer.”

“Movin’ up the scale from writers to movie stars.”

“Yeah. Prob’ly we’ll see a pap shot on page six of her and Keanu Reeves. Hear he’s in town.”

“Ha. Ha,” Castle says flatly. “Where is she?”

“No idea.”

“And that doesn’t worry you? Beckett went out for a short break more than an hour ago and hasn’t come back? Can’t you track her phone or something?”

“What? She’s a grown woman. She’s got a gun. Call her. Don’t you think you’re totally over-reacting?”

Castle finds himself in a very nasty dilemma. He’s let his mouth run away with his worries instead of simply calling Beckett, and now he can’t explain to the boys without explaining considerably more than he wants to about Beckett’s issues and, more importantly, this morning’s… um… exchange, which he feels has triggered a completely disproportionate reaction with which he will nevertheless need to deal. He isn’t dealing with it very well so far.

In the two seconds of thought he’s taken, Esposito is already regarding him with a grim glare that promises pain and suffering.

“Why d’you think we should be worried, Castle?”

Oh, shit.
Chapter 98: Come in, come out of the rain

“Er… I’m totally over-reacting?” he backtracks. This is clearly not sufficient.

“Really? Bit odd that your first reaction is to try to track her. That’s a really big over-reaction. Most people just call a phone.” Ryan scowls, which doesn’t really fit his face. He should leave the scowling to Esposito, who is demonstrating exactly how to do it.

“What do you know that we don’t? Why haven’t you just called her?”

“What have you screwed up this time? Isn’t she taking your calls?”

“Have you upset Beckett?”

“No!” Castle eventually manages to fit an answer into the machine-gun barrage of questions. “Nothing. I was just watching re-runs of the X-files and everyone knows alien abduction is real.”

Both detectives regard him with sceptical cynicism and identically black looks.

“D’you really think we’ll swallow that crap? You only come out with that stuff when you’re trying to hide something.”

“Why haven’t you called her?” Ryan, again.

“Because… Look, calling her now.”

Castle attains the break room without the other men, dials and waits for Beckett to pick up.

She doesn’t.

He waits a couple of minutes, and dials again.

“Beckett.”

Castle is unreasonably relieved that she has taken the call. He is not relieved by her uninflected, dead voice.

“Where are you? I thought we were having lunch?”

“It’s not lunchtime yet. I’m fine. I’ll see you later.”

“It’s twelve-thirty.”

There is a pause. It seems to Castle that Beckett hadn’t known how late it was. This is also not a relief.

“I’m not hungry.” This, now, comes as no surprise at all.

“Then don’t eat. Tell me where you are, and I’ll meet you.”

“I…” Castle thinks that that statement might have ended don’t want to, but somewhat to his surprise it takes a U-turn and finishes up “Okay. I’m in Tompkins Square Park.” He manages not to say why are you outside in the cold and the rain? which is unlikely to help anyone right now. “Near the playground.”

“Okay. See you in a few minutes.”

Castle slides out of the bullpen without attracting Espósito or Ryan’s attention. He’s not very keen on exacerbating his errors. He is very keen on talking to Beckett, whose behaviour has been deeply weird ever since she closed the bathroom door this morning. Yesterday evening she was desperate for him to be with her at Dr Burke’s tomorrow; this morning she’s trying to tell him he shouldn’t go even though she wants him there. And then when he tells her that’s not going to happen she disappears from the one place he’d have thought she always ran to, not from: her work, and no-one had a single solitary clue where she’s gone or why.

He reflects rather ruefully that while Dr Burke had warned him that Beckett might displace irritation or anger on to others, he had entirely failed to warn Castle that he, Castle, might find himself more easily annoyed than usual. Then again, if Beckett weren’t acting so mule-headed, he wouldn’t be so annoyed. How does she think he’d not come to the session tomorrow?

His thoughts wander. If he hadn’t called her, it didn’t sound like she would have called him. It certainly didn’t sound like she was planning to come back to the bullpen, though it also didn’t sound like she’d had the faintest idea of the time. He wonders just how long she’s been out in the rain, currently falling quietly on his umbrella. He has no idea where to start the conversation any more. Earlier, when he’d been vaguely considering Remy’s, it had all been relatively simple. Tell Beckett he was attending, reassure her that it was his choice, and remind her that they’ll be leaving for the Hamptons the minute it’s over and don’t forget to pack that very tactile crimson dress please Beckett? Now, he’s splashing through ever deepening puddles in rain which seems to be getting heavier without a clue what’s going on or indeed whether Beckett has any intention of going to therapy, the Hamptons, or even out of the rain. He splashes on, depressed.

Finally he spots a dark-headed figure, bedraggledly slumped on a damp bench under a tree. She looks up only when his feet stop in front of her.

“Hey,” she emits. It has as much life as the sodden piece of litter swirling round the park in the March wind.

Castle looks at the damp bench and even damper Beckett and internally concedes that his coat will need dried later. He sits down and aligns the umbrella to cover both of them. Not that it will improve Beckett, who is currently dripping gently from each draggled lock of hair. She doesn’t seem to have noticed that, either.

“Why are you out here?”

She shrugs. “Needed space.”

“You’ve been out here for nearly two hours.”

She shrugs again. “So? It’s not like there’s been a body drop.”

Castle stares at the side of her head. Beckett not caring about closing cases?

“It’s raining. You’re soaked.”

Another shrug. “Hadn’t noticed.”
“We were supposed to have lunch.”

“Didn’t notice the time.”

She hasn’t looked at him since he sat down. Her voice has all the intonation and emotion of a brick. She isn’t even annoyed. She just isn’t there. The lights aren’t on and there’s clearly nobody home.

“I’m coming to your session tomorrow.”

“Okay. Up to you. You don’t have to.”

“You wanted me there,” Castle emits, already frustrated and moving rapidly towards furious. “What’s changed? You know I’m on your side. You asked me to promise I’d be there to get you out.”

“I shouldn’t have. Anyway, it doesn’t matter. You were all right. Burke, O’Leary, you. Drunk or sober it was abuse. So all I have to do is tell him so and walk away for good. You don’t need to be there for that. You don’t need to be there at all. It’ll all be over in five minutes. It’s been staring me in the face for a week and I’ve been trying to deny it. Well, you were right. Burke was right. I’m sure he’ll be very happy about that.” Her voice is that same dead, defeated tone as she’d had last night. “I’m sure you’re all very happy that I’ve seen the light. Dad abused me and Q.E.D. he didn’t care and won’t care. I can deal with the rest myself. I don’t need you there because there’s no reason for you to be there. Go in, say my piece, and leave. Burke can deal with my dad. I’m done dealing with my dad.”

“Then what?”

Beckett shrugs. “Get on with my life.” There’s a half beat pause. “Get a life.”

“Will you still come to the Hamptons with me?”

She looks at him for the first time. There’s nothing in her eyes. “If you want.”

“What about what you want?”

“It takes two, Castle,” she says wearily. “See whether you still even want to go after tomorrow.”

Castle loses his already frayed control.

“You stop this pig-assed stupid behaviour right now. I don’t give a flying fuck what happens tomorrow and it certainly won’t stop me taking you to the Hamptons, but you have to want to go. You’re the one who suggested it and you’re the one who kept saying you wanted time together and now you’re backtracking? I know what I want but you just keep hiding and now you’re hoping that somehow it’ll all go away if you just sit in the rain till you dissolve?”

“It’ll all go away tomorrow night,” Beckett flashes back, now angry herself. “Come if you want to. Just remember it was all your idea to make it a spectator sport. I’m sure there’s a TV show in there somewhere. Wrangling Relatives, you could call it. Or Feuding Families. Or just The Becketts. You could run it against The Waltons, for the contrast value. Planning to move into script writing, Castle?” Her tone would have riled the Archangel Michael. Castle, who is no angel never mind archangel, is instantly riled.

“That’s ridiculous. I thought you’d got past this. I told you months ago I wouldn’t use your father in”
“In a book.”

“You really think I’d split hairs like that? You think that? The hell with that. The” – his mouth snaps shut on hell with you. Dr Burke’s words hit his brain just in time. Such anger to be displaced…are you prepared? “You’re doing just what he said would happen,” he says slowly. “I thought it would happen last night, but it’s now. He said you might lose it with me but it would really be the situation. I guess it’s in his damn textbook somewhere.”

“What?”

“Dr Burke said you’d get angry with me but it wouldn’t really be at me. And it’s not me, is it? It’s your dad. It’s the crap your first therapist fed you. It’s the whole thing. You’re yelling at me because I’m here.”

“I’m yelling at you? You’ve been yelling at me since early this morning,” Beckett bites back. “The hell with you. That’s what you were about to say, so why don’t I just say it for you? I’ve seen the error of my ways thanks to you and O’Leary” – the edge on that would cut rock – “so now that you’ve indulged your saviour complex you can fuck off back to your perfect life where you don’t have to deal with any of my issues and ungratefulness and leave me alone just like you were just about to say. I don’t want you there tomorrow and I’m not coming to the Hamptons either. Just leave me alone.”

She stands up and is five steps away and still moving before Castle reacts. A handful of long strides later and he’s caught up and locked a hand over her arm to stop her moving.

“The only way to make you listen is to yell. Didn’t you hear a single word I said? I’m going to be there and then we are going to the Hamptons because this has nothing to do with you and me at all and everything to do with you being scared to tell your father the truth in case” –

“In case he kills himself. Is that what you were going to say? Well, go right ahead. I don’t care what he does any more. He’s not my problem. I can’t change the past but I can damn well not make the same mistake in future. I can’t control him and I’m not going to.” She draws a harried, scarifying breath. “But I can control what happens next.” Her voice locks down to cold and clear. “You are not coming to tomorrow’s session. This is still my therapy, whatever you seem to think, and I have the right to say who is there. You’ve done enough. If you wanted gratitude, you can have it. Thank you.” Bitter, vicious sarcasm inflects each word. “Go find someone who’ll appreciate you like you deserve. Someone else. I wouldn’t be in this mess if you hadn’t shoved your way into my life. Pardon me if I’m not grateful enough for that.”

She pulls her arm away with a sharp movement and begins to walk again, in the opposite direction from where he’d come in, leaving him standing in the rain under his umbrella with absolutely no idea what to do. Dr Burke had predicted this but, now that it’s all exploded in a public park, Castle can’t use the only answer he knows will work, and he doesn’t have a Plan B. He doesn’t, in fact, have a Plan A.

But he does have one, nuclear, option.

Beckett just keeps walking, out of the park, along the streets, under the now-driving rain. She is not going to get into another situation where she feels she has to behave in a certain way, go where she’s told, be grateful or happy or nice just to keep people happy. Just to try to make them love her. She’s not grateful and she’s not happy and she certainly isn’t nice, or kind, or lovable; and she is not going to pretend she is or try to be. It didn’t work last time and it won’t work this time and she is not going to repeat her mistakes.
She walks on. She doesn’t weep. It didn’t help for ten years and it hasn’t helped for the last two months and it won’t help now. Cut her losses. Last time she wasted ten years of her life in an abusive relationship that she didn’t even recognise, till they all forced her into it. This time she’s wasted ten weeks. She supposes that’s an improvement. The shorter time doesn’t make it hurt any less, though. Her feet keep walking. The rain keeps soaking her cheeks.

Shortly, she pulls out her phone and prepares to lie through her teeth to her Captain. She has never, ever, requested personal time when not sick. She is about to tap dance her way through not explaining why she needs it.

“Sir, Beckett.”

“Beckett?” Montgomery sounds dumbfounded. “Why aren’t you in the bullpen? You’re supposed to be at work. Where are you, Detective?”

“Sir… I need to take the rest of the day. Personal reasons. There isn’t anything on my desk that can’t wait.” She pauses. “Sir, please… actually could I take leave tomorrow?”

“Why?”

“Personal reasons,” Beckett says again.

In his office, Montgomery is staring fixedly at the phone, which is making noises that he just does not get. He understands all the words. He completely does not understand the sum total of the sentences.

“That’s not good enough, Beckett. You’re supposed to be on shift and working. I need a better reason.”

There is a very uncomfortable pause, during which Montgomery looks out of his office and observes that Beckett’s desk appears to have been abandoned precipitately. He doesn’t like the conclusions that he’s drawing.

“It’s about my dad,” comes eventually. “I need some time to deal with it.”

Montgomery doesn’t believe that this is anything like the whole truth. On the other hand, Beckett voluntarily requesting leave without being too sick to stand up is an unprecedented occurrence, which behoves him to tread extremely carefully. The stress overtones in Beckett’s voice do not lead him to the conclusion that she is thinking logically or indeed sanely. It is quite possible that if he pushes she will say something irrevocable. There is an edge of desperation to her words which is becoming more obvious by the moment.

“Okay, Detective. You can take this afternoon and tomorrow. But this had better be sorted out soon. Report to me first thing on Monday and if you haven’t got a solution that enables you to do your scheduled shifts then you’ll need to use up your accumulated leave from Monday till you sort it out.”

“Sir.”

Montgomery puts the phone down and thinks hard. He can’t afford to give Beckett obviously preferential treatment – that way lies disaster for the bullpen. He has to treat her like he’d treat any other cop in the same circumstances. But he is absolutely sure that the problems she’s got are related to her father, therapy, that round of so-called stomach flu and her consequent benching. He just hasn’t got any way at all of sorting it out for her. No-one does. Until she is prepared to tell him exactly what is going on, there is nothing he can do to help, and she is quite clearly not prepared to tell him more than the absolute bare minimum. But he is intensely worried that his best detective is wobbling on the edge of a cliff, and he doesn’t want the next call to be I resign effective immediately. To his credit, his first concern is that Beckett is a cop to the core and resigning would break her. His second is that his stats would plummet. Fortunately being human and being the Captain point in the same direction, which isn’t always the case. Also fortunately, he had already been thinking about forcing her to take leave next week.

Montgomery prowls out into the bullpen and lurks menacingly behind Esposito, who appears to be checking the sports results instead of lab results.

“Detective Esposito. Detective Ryan.”

“Sir!” They jump. Montgomery experiences a flash of satisfaction. He’s still got the knack. “Detective Beckett is unwell. She expects to be back Monday.”

“Uh?” his supposedly intelligent detectives blurt.

“Was I not clear? Detective Beckett is unwell. You’ll need to do without her till Monday.” He marches off, leaving two dumbfounded detectives behind him.

“What’s that all about?”

“Dunno. Where’s Castle?”

“Dunno. Musta sneaked out.”

They trade confused faces, and identical shrugs. “Guess I know where he is,” Ryan says. “With Beckett.”

“That’s okay then.”

Ryan nods. Both of them go back to the sports – oops, lab or canvass – results.

Beckett has reached her car and, without entering the precinct for any reason at all, starts it up and turns it towards home. When she gets there, she’ll decide what to do. Except she needn’t go home at all, if she doesn’t want to. Nor does she need to have her phone on. She switches it off. It’s still raining. Instead of homeward, she diverts towards the Holland Tunnel, and out of Manhattan. After that, she aims for the Liberty State Park, in default of any other matter. It’s exactly the opposite direction from home.

She only wants to be alone. Nothing else. Too many people wanting too much of her; too many people needing her; too many people expecting her to fit their mould; too many people trying to force her to accept their thinking. Simply… too many people, and she’s suddenly drowning in all their needs and wants and attitudes. She only wants to be herself. She can’t find herself and she’s run out.

So now Detective Beckett has disappeared. Gone away. Who cares? Not she.

Castle, still standing in Tompkins Square Park in the pouring rain, pulls out his phone and searches out Dr Burke’s number. Shortly he is speaking to the efficient receptionist.

“I need to speak to Dr Burke urgently, please.” He can hear his own desperation and haste to beat the clock. There is clicking. He imagines the polished nails on the keys.

“He will be free at four.”
“That’s too late. I need to talk to him now.” Before Beckett withdraws consent for Dr Burke to talk to him, Castle.

“He is with a patient, and can’t be interrupted. However, I could ask him to call you immediately afterwards, at two. Would that do?”

Castle checks his watch. It’s one-fifteen.

“It’ll have to do. It’s really important I speak to him as soon as he’s done.”

“Certainly. Who shall I say has called?”

“Rick Castle.” He gives his cell and home numbers. “Tell him… tell him it’s about Detective Beckett. Thank you.”

Having no other place to go, he goes home. The loft is empty. This is very fortunate, as Castle is not in the mood for company and is quite sufficiently angry with himself, Beckett, and the day till now to evict his mother if she should so much as blink sideways, never mind actually speak. He goes straight to his study, shuts the door, makes sure his cell phone is charging, and waits.

At two-oh-two his phone rings. He snatches it up and swipes on.

“Rick Castle.”

“Mr Castle.” Dr Burke’s smooth, soothing tones are, for once, an immense relief. “What is the matter?”

“Beckett won’t let me come tomorrow and she’s bailed on our weekend and I just bet she’s going to ring you to withdraw consent to talk to me but maybe she hasn’t yet?”

“What?” Dr Burke says sharply. “How has this arisen?” Castle would almost say that he sounded flustered.

Dr Burke is more than merely flustered. He is appalled. If there had been one external data point on which he had thought that he could rely, it would have been that Detective Beckett would not engineer another breach with Mr Castle. That she has is profoundly disturbing.

“If I knew that I could fix it,” Castle says forcefully.

“Tell me what happened, in as much, and the most accurate, detail as you can.”

“Last night she got O’Leary and me in a bar and cross-questioned him about her dad’s behaviour back in the day. O’Leary effectively read her the riot act about not seeing what was under her nose. Then she kept insisting she wasn’t abused and we both got angry and then she said she wanted me there and she wanted to go to the Hamptons and made me promise I’d get her out tomorrow’s session if she asked me.”

“You both got angry? What could you say to her that would make her angry?”

“She said that if she’d been abused the first therapist would have picked it up and I said he was wrong about everything and told her that one way or another her dad hurt her and she had to tell him the truth. And she said she might as well have killed him and I said he’s already thinking the worst and whatever happened it wasn’t her fault and she should think about what she wanted.” He gulps in a breath. “And then she made me promise to come tomorrow. But now she’s completely flipped.”
“Flipped?” Dr Burke queries. “Please explain.”

“Flipped one-eighty. This morning she said she didn’t want me there.”

“What, precisely, was said? From the beginning.”

Castle relates his words – leaving out exactly where he and Beckett had been, and their relative states of undress – but being precise about his words. “And then she came out and said I didn’t need to come like she shouldn’t have asked me. And she was just going to go off to work like nothing was wrong at all. I was – er – a bit irritated.”

“Mm?”

Castle relates, not without some pauses and a lot of wincing, the next part, with considerable accuracy.

“And so you went to find Detective Beckett in time for lunch?”

“Yes. But she wasn’t there. I mean, she wasn’t in the precinct. She’d been gone for an hour when I got there, and nobody knew where she’d gone.”

“Where was she?”

“Sitting in the park in the rain. No umbrella, no hat, nothing. She was dripping wet,” Castle adds, irrelevantly. “She didn’t seem to notice.”

“Mm. Was she pleased to see you?”

“Not obviously. She was completely flat. She didn’t even care about work. She always cares about murder, even if it’s only cold cases. I can’t think when she didn’t use work to deal with everything. She didn’t seem to care at all.”

Dr Burke is entirely unreassured by this comment.

“When Montgomery benched her she was absolutely devastated. I’d have said work was the most important thing in her whole life and she walked out and didn’t care that she’d been missing for hours.”

“What happened next?”

“I said I was coming to the session, and she said it was up to me, and when I said she’d wanted me there she said she shouldn’t have made me promise.” He stops, and pulls his voice under control again. “Then she said that we’d all been right and it was abuse and she didn’t need me there because you could deal with her dad and she was done with it.”

Dr Burke, safely in his office, winces, where no-one can see him.

“And then I asked if she’d still come to the Hamptons and she just said to see if I still wanted to tomorrow and – er – I sort of lost my temper a bit and then she did and then she got really nasty and just before I was about to bite back I remembered what you said.”

“Ah.”
“But I think I made a mistake.”

“Oh?”

“I said that she was yelling because I was there, but it was everything else she was really yelling about. And then she said I’d been yelling and told me I was just indulging my saviour complex” – Dr Burke draws in breath. Detective Beckett knows exactly how to hurt Mr Castle. He does have a saviour complex, but up until now this has been channelled into reasonably safe directions – “and I should leave her alone. She didn’t want me at tomorrow’s session and she wouldn’t come to the Hamptons. So I said I was going to come and she was coming to the Hamptons and then she said if I wanted gratitude” – much becomes instantly clear to Dr Burke – “I could have it, but that she wouldn’t be in this mess if it weren’t for me. And then she just walked off, and I didn’t know what to do.”

“Because you could not use the assertive physicality which you might have done in private?”

“Yeah. Being arrested isn’t that much fun.”

“Mm.” Dr Burke considers, briefly. “This is a very unhelpful development, Mr Castle.”

“Tell me something I don’t know.”

“However, I can see exactly how the situation has arisen.”

“Uh?”

“Mr Castle, with the best of motives and at Detective Beckett’s request, you and Detective O’Leary have led her to understand that the effects of her father’s behaviour are equivalent to being abused. Understandably, this realisation has made her very unhappy. You then took the correct option in staying with her.” Dr Burke pauses, to consider how he should describe the outcomes.

“Yeah, so? Why’d she suddenly blow up like that? I didn’t do anything.”

“I am afraid that is an incorrect assumption. Last night, you and Detective O’Leary – I quote – read her the riot act. In effect, in her mind, you told her what she should think about her father, forced her to realise that she was wrong, and you then compounded that by telling her what she should do in Friday’s session, being to tell him the truth.”

“But then she said she wanted me there,” Castle almost wails.

“Indeed. But that is the foundation for this morning’s disagreement. You made a jest that she was casting you aside till she needed you. That was… ill-judged.” There is mild rebuke in Dr Burke’s voice.

“Firstly, that is just the action which Detective Beckett currently believes her father took in relation to her, which has hurt her inordinately badly. She is hardly likely to react well to the suggestion, which you made in terms, that she is behaving as her father did. It is not in the slightest surprising that she promptly offered you the ability to walk away from her therapy session. She could hardly do otherwise, when faced with the statement that she was relying on you for support only when she needed or wanted it, and without considering your feelings.”

“But…”

“Secondly, Detective Beckett does not believe that she will be or indeed deserves supported, because her father did not or could not do so, and because of her guilt at walking away. You have proceeded, again in her mind, both earlier and later this morning, to tell Detective Beckett that she must behave in a certain way, being one of which you approve, in order to support her.”

“What? I wouldn’t. I didn’t.”

“But she thinks you have. It is up to Detective Beckett how her therapy progresses. You and Detective O’Leary have insisted that she recognise the abuse. You have attempted to insist that she tells her father the truth, and then that you should attend the session. Were I Detective Beckett, I might, in her already fragile state and in a situation where she has finally realised that everything she has believed to be true may be wrong, regard that as you wishing to ensure that she follows your script as to how the session should go. You have then informed her that regardless of her wishes she will be visiting the Hamptons with you. All of this has been conducted with anger and high emotions from both of you.”

Dr Burke pauses. There is silence on Mr Castle’s part.

“I am certain you did not intend this, Mr Castle, but can you not see how your behaviour this morning could be taken to be equivalent to that of Mr Beckett’s?”

“What? No. It wasn’t.”

“Unfortunately, it was taken as such. You have, so Detective Beckett thinks, effectively informed her of the way in which you expect her to behave: to wit, to be grateful for your assistance and to conduct her therapy in the way in which you have suggested: when she objects you have become angry and insisted that she should behave as you wish. In what way does that appear to her to differ from her father’s manipulations?”

There is a particularly horrible silence.

“But… but…” Dr Burke waits. “But she only had to say she didn’t want me there.”

“According to your own narrative, Detective Beckett did say that, and you ignored it.”

Another very unpleasant silence.

“But… but I never meant” –

“No. You did not mean to. I have no doubt of that,” Dr Burke says soothingly. “However, Detective Beckett is currently particularly emotionally fragile. There were only two options: that she allowed you to have your way, and potentially would come to resent it if she later considered that there were a similarity with her father’s behaviour, which we might well have avoided by careful management of Friday’s session; or that she considered that you were behaving in a way similar to her father and took immediate steps to ensure that she was not subject to it. It appears that you have triggered the second alternative. You have done so from the best of motives: to support Detective Beckett; and with the best of intentions; but having been pushed into seeing her father’s behaviour as abusive, and in a situation where everything she thought that she had been correct in doing was in fact wrong, she was then in a state of mind where even ordinarily supportive actions would readily be misinterpreted. She has fundamentally misinterpreted what you meant, but that does not change the outcome.”

“But I need to be there. You said so.” He sounds like a child appealing to higher authority.

“You cannot be there. Detective Beckett has said she does not want you there. Therefore you will not be there.”

“What? But…” No! He has to be there. He’s the one who holds her up, who lets her stand down.
“Mr Castle, this is Detective Beckett’s treatment. Regardless of what you or I might wish, you have no right at all to be a part of it unless she so requests. She has withdrawn her consent and you have told me this. It would be a disgraceful breach of my duty to my patient to allow you to be present without her explicit consent, which she will have to give to me herself. The most that I can now do is ask her to confirm whether she wishes you to be present. I shall not do so until as late as possible tomorrow. Perhaps she will have reconsidered by then.”

“But… but how… It won’t work unless I’m there.”

“There will be other ways to manage the session. There will have to be.” Dr Burke pauses. “I have another patient, Mr Castle, for whom I am now late. I must go. Thank you. Goodbye.”

Castle puts the phone down, absolutely distraught. Dr Burke’s comment that Beckett has fundamentally misinterpreted what he meant – which she has – is no consolation at all. He didn’t mean anything like that. He’s been so careful to leave it up to Beckett: to tell her – and mean – that it’s always her decision.

Right up till last night and this morning, in fact. Oh, fuck. She’s got it all wrong but there’s no way she’ll listen to him now. He doesn’t even know where she is, though he assumes that she went back to the precinct. He hopes that she went back to the precinct.

She hadn’t walked out the park in the direction of the precinct. Oh God. But surely she went back. Didn’t she? He can’t even get in touch with Ryan or Esposito to ask: he’s started enough hares running this morning. But surely she would have gone back to work? She’s a cop to the core, and work has always been her refuge.

Maybe later, maybe he should go to her apartment. Not to apologise. She misunderstood, and he’s not going to apologise for wanting to support her. To explain. To explain what he really meant and to reassure her that he won’t go if she doesn’t want him there. That she needn’t go to the Hamptons if she doesn’t want to. But he does want to: he wanted her there to tell her… to tell her… But he can’t bear to think that, right now.

Surely she will be at her apartment later?

Dr Burke disposes of his patient in good order, and then turns to the patient-free time which he has at four. He is quite considerably more worried than he had allowed Mr Castle to know. Detective Beckett should not have reacted to Mr Castle in that way. Dr Burke had been quite certain that she was well aware of Mr Castle’s feelings and, while he would have understood and indeed had expected that there might be some emotional outpourings of anger, he cannot immediately see a good reason for the instant shut down and removal of Mr Castle from the equation.

However, he is quite certain that if he reconsiders everything he has learned about Detective Beckett from herself, Mr Castle, and Mr Beckett, he will find the clue he needs. He procures a pot of tea, steeps his fingers beneath his chin, and slips into profound concentration.

Some moments later his eyes spring open. He has, naturally, found his clue. All it required was his focused attention. It had been Mr Castle who had said it. She was sodden drunk. Kept saying that she had to support everyone, that everyone needed her. She didn’t want anyone wanting anything any more. Mr Castle and Detective O’Leary had gone from unquestioning, unstinting support to demanding something of Detective Beckett. The only two people who had not, from Dr Burke’s knowledge, asked anything more of her than that she be herself, had made demands. They had, in fact, wanted something.
Ah. He rapidly dials Mr Castle. This must be followed up.

“Rick Castle.”

Mr Castle sounds extremely distressed. Dr Burke regrets this, but cannot do anything about it.

“Dr Burke, Mr Castle. I wish to ask you a question about the time when you called upon Detective Beckett and she was drunk. You told me that she had said that she did not want anyone to want anything from her. Is that correct?”

“Yes. Why?”

“Did Detective Beckett say anything more on that subject?”

“Yes. She said that Beckett had disappeared. Gone away.”

“Ah. Thank you.” Of course. Mr Castle had said that too, in a previous appointment.

“Is that it?” Mr Castle now sounds both distressed and irritated. Dr Burke regrets that he is now precluded from comforting Mr Castle with information.

“I require to think, Mr Castle. I must reconsider the way in which tomorrow might go. I may have further questions as my thoughts develop. Your insights remain profoundly helpful, but I cannot give you answers which I neither yet have, nor which I have consent to discuss with you.”

“Screwed all ways up,” Mr Castle says, profanely and bitterly.

“Mr Castle,” Dr Burke says, painedly, “what would you have me do? Betray all professional ethics, patient confidentiality and Detective Beckett’s trust; or leave you angered? I do not have a choice here. You do. I thank you for your answer, which will assist, and may, if you agree, have further questions.”

“What else can I do?” Mr Castle says miserably.

“Thank you. Goodbye.”

Dr Burke returns to his thinking. He is concerned that Detective Beckett may have finally broken under the pressure of her own repressed guilt and unhappiness, and the pressure of being needed. He is quite deeply concerned that she had abandoned her work, which she herself had described to him in highly positive terms. It seems worryingly likely that she has detached herself from almost everything to which she might have felt an attachment. Dr Burke recalls to the front of his mind another concern which Mr Castle had raised: that he believes that Detective Beckett is unconsciously planning to hurt her father so badly that there is no hope of a reconciliation. Dr Burke thinks that Mr Castle has failed to take the next step. Detective Beckett is unwittingly also planning to cause herself significant pain because she unconsciously believes that she deserves it for abandoning her father.

Detective Beckett, in fact, is unknowingly aiming for emotional, though certainly not physical, suicide. Dr Burke thinks with considerable irritation that Mr Castle’s mistake could not have been more badly timed, and with very much more self-recrimination that he should not have assumed that Mr Castle’s apparently innate ability to achieve the right method of dealing with Detective Beckett would continue. Without Mr Castle to ground her, there is no-one to stop her to whom she might listen. The best that Dr Burke can hope for is that Friday passes without an irrevocable breach between Detective Beckett and her father. It appears extremely unlikely that any amicable resolution can be achieved without the ability to rely on Mr Castle to calm Detective Beckett while Dr Burke temporarily extracts Mr Beckett from the situation.
Dr Burke rapidly reformats his plans for seeing Mr Beckett, which session is due very shortly. Indeed, Mr Beckett will be here any moment. How fortunate that Dr Burke is a very flexible thinker.

“Good afternoon, Jim.”

“Carter.”

“As we discussed when I asked you to come in, Detective Beckett has agreed to meet with you under my guidance tomorrow. I wished to have a short discussion with you before that to prepare you for the likely way in which this will progress, and to reiterate my strong suggestion that your sponsor should be within easy reach. On that note, I can, if you wish, provide him with a quiet space here.”

Mr Beckett nods, looking relieved. “I’ll tell him.”

“Now, concerning tomorrow. As a result of the incompetence of her earlier therapist, your daughter is, probably unknowingly, carrying considerable anger and resentment of the way in which she considers her life to have been spent. It can be expected that she will release all of that, most likely in a highly emotional manner.”

“Oh.”

“I am led to believe, by Mr Castle” – Mr Beckett raises his eyebrows – “who has kept me informed, that your daughter intends to treat this as if it were a police interview. I do not believe that this will last for very long. I do believe that she will endeavour to surprise admissions from you, and probably also endeavour to push you into reacting without thought. I counsel you to try not to react immediately, no matter how far you are provoked. Listen, and think. If you should consider at any time that the situation is too much for you, no matter how trivial it seems, you must signal and I will arrange for a time-out.”

“Oh.”

“From what Mr Castle has said, Jim, your daughter is on the edge of committing irrevocable actions. I do not wish to see that happen. There have been developments which mean that it is presently unlikely that Mr Castle will be present” –

“What? She’s had a fight with Rick?” Mr Beckett looks horrified.

“Yes, and it is still entirely possible that tomorrow’s session will not take place. If it does, at present, a good outcome might merely be that there is scope for another session at a later time. A bad outcome might well mean that you and your daughter make statements and counter-statements which lead to a permanent breach.”

Mr Beckett looks daunted and frightened by Dr Burke’s words.

“She’s really that close?”

“She is. I appreciate that I am asking you to do something extremely difficult. You will naturally wish to defend yourself and to show her that she is wrong. Do not. With input from me, and caution from you, Detective Beckett may yet talk herself round.”

Dr Burke pauses. His next statement will not go down well.

“Your daughter will accuse you of abusing her.”
“What the hell! That’s nonsense. I never did. I never would have.” Mr Beckett leaps immediately to anger. “How can she say that?”

“And there, Jim, is the reason why we are having this discussion now.”

Mr Beckett is stopped in his tracks. “Oh. Oh God. That’s exactly what you meant, isn’t it?”

Dr Burke nods. “Jim, you need to understand that abuse is not only physical. The way in which Detective Beckett has reacted to your alcoholism, both during and after, bears substantial similarities to the way in which victims of emotional abuse react. Allow me to explain.”

“You’d better.”

Dr Burke lays out the pathology, watching with concern as Mr Beckett becomes more and more strained and upset.

“So you see, Jim, all these matters are likely to be raised tomorrow. You have to be prepared.”

Mr Beckett nods, brokenly.

“Let us now take some time to discuss possible strategies, both without and with Mr Castle’s presence.”
Losing all you've ever known

Castle is even less happy when Dr Burke says Goodbye than he was before the psychiatrist rang. Beckett’s drunken meanderings on the subject of disappearance had been quite terrifying enough when she had been too drunk to do anything about them and he had been there to stop her. The thought that she might be thinking the same thing stone cold sober and with no limits whatsoever on her ability to act on her thinking is spine-chilling. He’d thought that she’d go back to the precinct. Now he’s sure she hasn’t. She could be anywhere.

But surely she will go home, tonight? Won’t she? He can still go round and explain. Can’t he?

Suddenly he has to check. He dials her phone. Straight to voicemail. He doesn’t leave a message.

When he’s tried twice more, and it’s gone straight to voicemail every time, he’s on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Even having his call declined would be better than this. Even being blocked would be better than this. At least that way he’d know she’s still there.

A troubling thought enters his head. He does have a way to try to find her. He could… he could ask O’Leary. But if her phone’s switched off… or dead… that won’t work. O’Leary could try to track her car. It’s… that would be nuclear. If she wants to disappear – he doesn’t have the right to stop her, or to find her, or to do anything.

Anything he does to find her will only prove that he’s trying to make her do what he wants. Trying to fit her to his mould. Making demands. He can’t do anything, he can’t try to find her, he can only try to call and try to go to her apartment.

He has a sudden, blinding realisation of how Jim Beckett must feel, and is bitterly sorry for his hard words to him. He’s now equally in the dark. Except he, at least, knows why. Jim doesn’t even have that. Not that it’s any consolation at all. Six hours of this is already killing him. Jim’s had weeks of it.

It’s nearly six thirty. He’s wasted the whole latter part of the afternoon worrying and fretting and chewing his fingernails to the elbow. Beckett would tut at him for that, he thinks, and a stab of instant agony pierces his chest. She wouldn’t, and she won’t. Because she isn’t here. Because she won’t be here.

Because she’s checked out.

Beckett is sitting in the Light Rail Café outside the park, drinking as much coffee as her stomach lining will stand and thinking about nothing except the speed of the raindrops rolling down the café windows. She’s as out of it as she had been in Tompkins Square Park. She doesn’t need to do anything, be anywhere, answer anything. Detective Beckett… who’s she?

It occurs to her that she’s only twenty minutes from the airport. She could buy a last minute ticket: go anywhere in the USA. It’s a shame her passport’s at home. She could have gone anywhere in the world. Just step on a plane and be gone. She watches the raindrops, and lets the time roll by. When it starts to get dark she vaguely thinks she ought to leave. She visits the restroom, and then dawdles out to her car; sits in the driver’s seat, and wonders what to do now.

She doesn’t have to do anything. She doesn’t have to go home, where the pressure of expectation is there in her little stone bird, in the smooth red quartz beside it; she doesn’t have to go to the precinct, where every file reminds her that the victims demand justice. Detective Beckett, Katie, Kate… she’s none of them. All those names come with neediness and demands and expectations that she can’t meet.

What’s in a name? Everything. Everything she can no longer deal with. She stares at her driver’s licence in the dim light of the car’s internal bulbs. Katherine Houghton Beckett. Detective Kate Beckett of the Twelfth Precinct.

Katie Beckett who walked away from the father who didn’t love her.

What’s in a name? Memories; clawing through her; pain and tears. Why are you Katie, why aren’t you Johanna? Her father, drunk. Detective Beckett? Kate, please Kate, I didn’t know who to call. Julia Berowitz, demanding she find her drunkard missing husband. Wake up and smell the coffee, Beckett. You can’t have it both ways. Castle, demanding she see it his way and be grateful for it. My Kat. Just as long as she did therapy his way.

What’s in a name? Only a history of heartache.

She puts her licence away, and takes her car key out, intending to start the car, still with no idea where she’ll go next. It occurs to her that something’s wrong: the keys aren’t right – the key to her apartment isn’t there. Oh, shit. She’s shocked into reality. She doesn’t have her apartment key because she left it so Castle could lock up. He hadn’t given her it back and she’d totally forgotten about it.

Well, that makes her decision for her. She can’t go home. Call it cowardice – there’s another name to add to her total; goes right along with betrayer, abandoner, and victim – but there is no way she’s going near Castle or his loft to pick it up. She’d rather rent an SRO for a few days. He can drop it at the precinct, and she’ll pick it up from Ryan – no, Esposito, who won’t ask questions – on Monday. But she can’t bear to deal with it tonight.

She starts a search on her phone, passing over the missed calls as irrelevant. More expectations which she can’t meet. There’s a cheap chain hotel less than three miles away. That’ll do for tonight. As long as it has a hot shower and she can stop at a pharmacy on the way to buy some bath products, it’ll be fine. She locates a Walgreens that isn’t too much of a detour and, not too much later, is pulling up at the hotel. The receptionist looks at her somewhat askance until she spots the shield and gun, and, clearly assuming some cop reason for needing to be here, asks no questions whatsoever but provides a basic room for the night in short order. She’ll decide what to do about the next few nights tomorrow. Apart from anything else, she’ll need some clean underwear and t-shirts. She doesn’t much like the thought of not having clean underwear first thing tomorrow, but now that she’s here she’s abruptly utterly exhausted, and going out to the Newport Mall to find some tonight is too much. She showers briefly and collapses on to the bed to watch bubble-gum TV till she falls asleep.

Watching a third half-baked, barely plotted soap, it occurs to her that actually she’d be better off telling O’Leary to get the key from Castle. O’Leary, after all, already knows the situation and therefore she won’t have to watch her team speculating and casting sidelong glances and probably tattling to Lanie. She doesn’t want Lanie to know. They aren’t back on those terms yet. Maybe they never will be. She taps out a text to O’Leary: short and to the point. Castle has my apartment key. Please get it from him. I’ll get it from you Monday. That done, her exhaustion overtakes her and she collapses into sleeping like the dead.

Castle finally gathers up his courage to go to Beckett’s apartment at slightly after eight. He goes down to the garage to use his relatively discreet Mercedes rather than the flashy Ferrari, and as he’s extracting his car key from his pants pocket he finds to his annoyance that one of the keys on his ring must have come loose, because it’s wormed its way down to the bottom of said pocket where it will undoubtedly cause a rip. He tugs it out to put it back where it belongs and realises, appalled, that it’s Beckett’s apartment key. He’d locked up behind him this morning, dropped it in his pocket and completely forgotten to give it back. Right. He’d better return it. And, he thinks, it gives him an excuse to go. Of course she’ll have a spare with a neighbour – his doorman has a spare – but he shouldn’t keep her key.

Not when she’s made it perfectly clear that she wants to be left alone.

He’s just stepped out of the parked car close by Beckett’s block when his phone rings.

“Rick Castle.”

“Castle. What the hell is going on?”

“O’Leary? Uh?”

“I’ve just had a text from Beckett telling me to get her key from you. What the fuck, Castle?”

“Where are you? You’ve heard from her? Where is she? Is she with you?”

“Molloy’s with Pete, yes, no idea, no. Now tell me what’s happening.”

“It’s… complicated.”

“You don’t say. S’pose you’d better come over.” O’Leary reels off Molloys’ address, as if Castle mightn’t know it, and Castle sets off.

“So,” O’Leary says as Castle arrives by his table. “What’s goin’ on?”

Castle had entered the bar to find a relatively normal-sized man sitting with O’Leary. That is to say, he’s only a fraction shorter than Castle, but somewhat less broad-framed, dark hair, blue-grey eyes. He looks up, smiles, and waves his beer bottle.

“So you’re Beckett’s boyfriend,” he says amiably, with a down-home Alabama drawl.

“I wish,” Castle mutters.

“This is Pete,” O’Leary says, rather unnecessarily. Castle had rather guessed that.

“Nice to meet you, Pete,” Castle manages. Pete grins.

“Hear y’all have a little problem,” he says slowly. “Guess I’ll just find myself sumthin’ to do while you’re makin’ plans.”

“Thanks,” O’Leary says, and gives Pete a look that Castle recognises from his own mirror, when thinking about Beckett.

Pete wanders off to play a round of pool. O’Leary pushes Castle in the direction of the bar and a bottle of beer. “Look like you need a drink. Pete, you wanna beer to go with that game?”

“Naw,” slithers round the pool table.

The men crack their beers.

“Okay. What’s up?”
Castle explains. It’s no easier the second time, even massively abbreviated from Dr Burke’s drawing out of every grisly entrail.

“So,” O’Leary rumbles, “she was weird last night, and then you thought she’d fixed the problem. And then you made a dumb joke, Beckett didn’t get the joke, and then you had a fight ‘stead of makin’ up. An’ now you’re banned from the shrink an’ she won’t go with you this weekend.”

Castle nods, miserably.

“An’ you have no idea where she is because she’s told me to get her key from you. So that means she ain’t home. This is a fine mess you got us into.”

“Yeah,” Castle drags.

“So why’re you so worried? So she’s had a spat with you an’ walked off. Happens. Likely she’s found a room somewhere for the night.”

“I don’t think she went back to the bullpen.”

“She went off in the wrong direction.”

“Prob’ly just to get away as fast as possible. D’you check?”

“No. Didn’t want to set Espo or Ryan thinking.”

“Hey, Esposito?”

“Yeah, look, you know you offered me a match, well, I’m feelin’ a bit unchallenged, an’ I got some spare time next week, an’ I thought if you had a bit of time we could test each other out a bit.”

“Yeah, sounds good. No cheatin’ though. No warmin’ up with Beckett beforehand. She c’n watch. Learn somethin’.”

“Really? Montgomery told you? Wow. Musta caught the flu. No usin’ that as an excuse, Esposito. I hear you’re too mean to get the flu.”

“Seeya next week. Settle it then. Bye.”

O’Leary turns back to Castle. “You were right. She called in sick, musta been straight after she walked off. Esposito don’t expect to see her till Monday.” The San Andreas Fault appears in O’Leary’s brow. “This ain’t good.”

“She wasn’t sick. She just shut down.” Castle looks full at O’Leary, who is looming over the back of a chair. “She told me – she got absolutely wasted like she did once with you – she just wanted to disappear. A while ago. But I think that’s what she’s done. Gone away. I don’t even know if she’ll turn up tomorrow but I can’t be there. I can’t do anything till I get to explain.”

“This really ain’t good.”

“Can you call her?”
O’Leary acquires an expression of confusion of a size which a worried whale might display. “I could, but what’m I gonna say when she asks why I’m callin’?”

“Don’t know.” Castle drains his beer without really noticing. “Espo said she was ill and you wanted to bring her chicken soup? I don’t know.”

O’Leary regards Castle with some interest. “You’d better give me her key, anyway.” His massive visage lights up. “That’ll do it.”

“What?” Castle asks, dully, handing the key over.

“I’ll call her to tell her I’ve got the key. Then we’ll have a bit of a chat.”

“’Kay.”

O’Leary pats him on the head. “We can fix this. Want another beer?”

“Can’t. Got the car.” Castle makes a face. “If I didn’t I’d have had the bourbon.”

“Sit there, an’ stay quiet. If Beckett thinks you’re with me she’ll have my guts.”

Beckett is dragged up from the bottom of the ocean of her sleep by her phone. Automatically, she swipes on: forgetting that she’s not on call and Dispatch won’t be ringing her. The habit of always answering is too ingrained to be overcome.

“Beckett.”

“Hey, Beckett. O’Leary here.”

“What do you want, O’Leary?”

“I got your keys. You wanna come by and collect ’em?”

“No.” O’Leary hears a yawn.

“You sleeping?”

“No. The phone woke me.”

“Bit early to be asleep. You okay? If you’re ill you should be at home.”

“I’m settled for now. I’ll get them Monday.”

“You got a spare, then? You never used to have a spare set.”

“I’m fine. Stop fussing.” She yawns again. She just wants to sleep, quiet and undisturbed and alone.

“If you’re ill,” O’Leary says patiently but inexorably, “you should be home in your own bed, not sleepin’ on someone’s floor.”

“I’m fine, if someone would just let me sleep.” Please just let her sleep.

“I’ll let you sleep if you tell me where you are. You’ve worried me now. An’ you know it’s not good for my blood pressure for you to worry me.”

“In a hotel. Okay? Stop babysitting me, O’Leary.”
“You need it. You shouldn’t be in a hotel if you’re ill. I think,” he drawls, to Beckett’s astonishment, “I think I should come get you and take you home.”

Beckett stares tiredly at her phone. “Just let me sleep, O’Leary. I” – “Naw. You sound horrible. I’m going to come get you.”

“Go away, O’Leary. I’ll get the key from you tomorrow if it’ll get you off my back. I just wanna” –

“You just wanna be home in your own place. Not infecting a whole hotel. Not polite, Beckett. C’mon. Where are you an’ I’ll make sure you get home okay. I’m only at Molloy’s. Not as if it’s far from you.”

“I don’t wanna move,” she says. “Just leave me alone.”

“I’ll leave you alone when you’re safe in your own bed, Beckett. Don’t make me trace your phone to find you.”

“O’Leary, if you do that I’ll report you,” Beckett says, icy anger momentarily overcoming her exhaustion. “You’re not my boss and you’re way out of line here. I’ve told you to leave me alone and I meant it. We are done here. Just leave me alone.”

She swipes off, switches the phone off, and tries to seek sleep again. Some time later, she finds it, by which time all her limited peace has evaporated, to be replaced by inchoate but vaguely unpleasant dreams.

“That didn’t go so good,” O’Leary rumbles dispiritedly. “Beckett threatened to report me an’ I still don’t know where she is. Says she’s in a hotel.”

“Like there aren’t thousands of those in Manhattan.”

“Yeah. I think you have to leave it, Castle. She said she’d pick the key up from me tomorrow. Least you know she’ll do that.”

“You think? I don’t. I think she just said that to shut you up.”

“Yeah, well. If she don’t come by the precinct… we’ll see. Anyway, time I went home.”

O’Leary’s bulk rises from the chair and he moves to find Pete. Castle looks at the surrounding bar and the table and doesn’t find any comfort in it whatsoever. Today, it’s fair to conclude, has not been a good day. Today, in fact, has been a total disaster.

He quietly gets up and exits. No point sitting here, when sitting won’t achieve anything. No point seeking, when there’s no chance of finding. No point to anything, tonight.

He arrives home, avoids socialising with consummate ease, and settles into the comfort of his study and the burn of bourbon, until he’s dulled the edges of the day.

Beckett does not wake early, or easily, falling back into the cotton-wool comfort of a warm bed and sleep more than once before her eyes remain open. Nothing to do, nowhere to go, no-one to be. She doesn’t need to do anything she doesn’t want to. And she doesn’t want to do anything. She manages to check out, but only because she isn’t sure she wants to stay another night.

It’s not raining, today. She goes back to the park, sitting where she can see out into the Hudson, the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island. Her phone remains off. Her mind remains blank. The decisive Detective Beckett, always on the move, always doing something, always in charge – has disappeared, and a dead-eyed woman sitting on a park bench in yesterday’s creased clothes and with still hands and empty mind is all that remains.

Presently, she stands and wanders off. Despite her desire to do nothing, she has a nagging feeling that she should at least recover her key. That way, she’ll have options. Starting with clean clothes and her passport.

She starts the car and proceeds calmly through the Holland Park Tunnel and up to the Central Park precinct. She has deliberately not called O’Leary. During the drive, she has acquired some reservations about his behaviour. She has every intention of taking her key and leaving in as few moments as possible. He’d been far too pushy, and she doesn’t want to talk. He never used to make her talk, and she doesn’t like the change. He’s never expected anything from her, and she doesn’t like that change either.
Hopes and betrayals

She pulls up at the precinct, parks tidily with her police ID on display, and walks in. Sergeant Hardon is on the desk.

“Detective Beckett, hello,” he says, and continues before she can even open her mouth on a greeting. “Have you come to pick up that Berowitz guy? He’s in the tank again. We called his wife: did she ask you to come by?”

“No. No,” Beckett says, trying not to let her voice rise in horror. “I dropped by to see O’Leary. He’d picked up some stuff for me.” She starts for the elevator.

“Detective Beckett? Kate?” comes from behind her.

Oh fuck no. Nooooooo!

“Kate, please? I need your help. Please?” It’s Julia Berowitz. Beckett turns, pulling on her professional persona as she does.

“I…”

“He’s worse.”

“That’s” –

“Looks like you two have some things to talk about,” Sergeant Hardon interrupts happily. “Take your time, Beckett. Don’t worry, I’ll call O’Leary and get him down here.” Sergeant Hardon is dialling before she can say no.

“Kate, you have to help me. David’s not well. I really need your help.”

It’s horribly familiar. She’s been there already. Julia leaning on her and needing her and making demands and forcing her to get involved.

“I can’t,” she says. “Orders.”

“But Kate, what will I do?”

Beckett can’t deal with this.

“Do what I told you,” she snaps. “Go to Al-Anon. Get therapy. I told you, you can only save yourself. Your husband is an alcoholic. He’ll pull you down with him. God knows, my Dad did.”

“I can help him. I can.”

“I said that, once. I can’t help you.”

Beckett doesn’t notice O’Leary coming out the elevator.

“You,” Julia spits viciously, “walked away from your own father and wouldn’t help him. You don’t help anyone, do you? Just dump them and carry on. You were supposed to help me and you won’t. How do you live with yourself? How can you just leave your own family like that?”

“I went back to my dad when he got dry and it was the biggest mistake I’ve ever made,” Beckett cries, pushed right over the edge. “You don’t get it, Julia. You never have. You will, though. Oh God, you will. He’ll abuse you when he’s drunk – no, he won’t hit you, but you’ll be cleaning up his mess until you can’t bear it any more, and then you’ll try and walk and you’ll feel guilty till he gets dry. If he gets dry. Maybe you’ll be lucky. Luckier than I was. Maybe he’ll kill himself first.”

Julia is standing, mouth open, wordless, white-faced in the path of Beckett’s fury.

“But then if he gets dry there’ll be different abuse. You’ll do anything to keep him sober. Because you think you love him. He’ll keep you dancing on a string, and you won’t even know it, until you get round to paying for therapy all over again. So get used to it, Julia, because you’ve just signed your life away. I didn’t believe any of it but it’s true. You might as well let him die now, because that way you’ll be able to have a life. Maybe.”

She turns away, fury and tears mixed on her face, then turns back.

“You haven’t been there yet. When you have, then ask me how I’ve lived with it. Because I haven’t. I put my whole life aside to support my father and I’ve wasted it. Ten years, Julia. Did you want a family? I did. You won’t have one. At least you managed the husband, but you won’t be able to care for a child and a drunk. Better give that dream up now.”

Julia is weeping.

“You’ll have to give up everything. I did. And at the end of it all you’ll have is nothing. Your friends’ll slip away. Or you will. Too embarrassing. But you think you can help him. You can save him. Because you love him. I loved my dad. But he didn’t love me and David doesn’t love you. The only thing he loves is the bottle. Good luck, Julia. You’re going to need it. Because one day you’ll wake up and walk out and you’ll wish he’d died. And then you’ll spend the rest of your life feeling guilty until you realise that he’s ruined your life and you’ll still feel guilty.”

She draws a shuddering breath, oblivious to O’Leary’s massive presence almost at her shoulder.

“You’re so shocked,” Beckett says bitterly. “You’d never walk away. Well, I’m no saint. I walked away to save myself and it still didn’t work. I’d have been better off if I’d shot him myself the first time I found him drunk. Not that you’ll believe me. But when you find he’s been abusing you, you’ll remember this and wish you’d listened. Enjoy your saintly martyrdom, Julia. It’s all you’ll have.”

She turns again, and finds her vitriolic fury wrapped into O’Leary’s giant chest and redwood-sized arms.

She doesn’t see his signal to the Sergeant, who nods. She’s shaking in his restraining arms as the flood-tide of her fury swallows her up; drowned in the wash of adrenaline-fuelled anger.

She doesn’t see Julia weeping unstoppably behind her as she sees her shambling, drunken husband brought up from the cells.

“Keys, Beckett.” O’Leary’s bass doesn’t register. He takes her small purse and roots through it, finding them. He hasn’t lost contact with her for a second. “Where’s your car?”

“Front.”

“C’mon. Home time. You ain’t right.”

“Leave me alone.”
“Nope. You can’t drive like that. I’ll get you home and then you can do what you like.”

Beckett doesn’t object further. It’s not going to work, and O’Leary’s so big that she can’t stop him doing whatever he’s going to do. She slumps into the passenger seat and closes her eyes. O’Leary knows where she lives: she doesn’t have to tell him. Slow, silent tears refuse to stay behind her eyelids, and she turns her face to the window. She’s cold, and she’s tired, and she should have stayed gone: that way she’d never have seen Julia Berowitz again.

When O’Leary pulls up and parks she’s superficially composed. He walks her up, produces her key, follows her in, and steers her to the couch. “C’n I have a coffee, Beckett?”

“Oh.” She rises from the couch and aims for her bathroom. O’Leary doesn’t ask any questions at all. As soon as she’s out the way and the kettle filled and on he pulls out his phone and taps out a text to Castle.

Beckett back. Problem at precinct with some woman picking up same drunk when I met you first. B lost it. Brought her home.

He presses Send and puts the phone away just in time for Beckett reappearing. She pulls down two mugs and instant coffee. O’Leary receives a normal strength dose. Beckett’s has double that. Again, he doesn’t say a word. Beckett doesn’t offer an explanation, only creamer for his coffee. Since inside his deceptively bulky frame, drawling accent and general hayseed persona O’Leary is actually pretty bright, he has taken the lesson (and a great many conclusions that he’s fairly sure Castle would have preferred O’Leary hadn’t drawn) from Castle’s truncated tale, and has decided that the best offense is quite definitely not to ask anything and not to push any further at all. He sits down next to her, cramping her into the corner without at all meaning to (these tiny little couches are no good. His is much bigger) and pats her shoulder, wordlessly.

Beckett drinks her coffee and neither accepts nor rejects O’Leary’s presence. Her day went to hell the moment Julia reappeared, so it can’t really get any worse. She maintains rigid control of her expression and her tear ducts. O’Leary’ll be gone shortly, and she can wash, change, and decide what to do. Alone. She can pack, and leave. Go away. Somewhere. Somewhere no-one wants anything from her.

She finishes her coffee. “You done, O’Leary?” she asks.

“Not quite. Don’t have your asbestos throat.” He pauses. “You sure you’re okay? Sounded pretty worked up, back at Central Park. I can sit a spell longer, if you want some comp’ny for a minute.”

“I’m fine.”

“If you wanna talk…”

Beckett’s eyes flare into furious life. “What, so you can tell me what I ought to do all over again? Like Thursday? Tell me I’m missing the point? No thanks. Tell me I’m screwing up? You already did that. Not your problem. Not your business.”

“You tryin’ to pick a fight with me, Beckett? ‘Cause it ain’t gonna work. Iffen you think I can’t tell that you were cryin’ all the way home an’ you’re just waitin’ for me to leave so you can start again you’re wrong. You need a pal.” He stops for a half-beat. “Or two. An’ I think the other one just arrived.”

“Get out of here,” Beckett says, very quietly and very intensely. “Leave. Now. You had no right. Just because we were pals back in the day.”

“No. Sometimes bein’ pals means doin’ things you won’t like. Like now.” O’Leary gets up and opens the door to admit Castle.

“This is my apartment, and I want you both to leave.”

Castle and O’Leary look at each other, with almost identical expressions, and O’Leary shuts the door behind them.

“No-one’s going to make you do anything, Beckett. Whatever you want to do is up to you. You can go to Dr Burke or not go, or go to the Hamptons or not go: whatever you decide. But right now you need a friend – or two – and we’re here. No-one here wants anything from you. Needs anything from you.” Castle takes a careful breath. “I was wrong yesterday, but you misunderstood me too. It’s still up to you. It’s always up to you.” Castle moves further inside, closer. O’Leary stays back. “C’mon. You don’t need to say anything now.” He sits down, careful not to touch her.

Beckett stands up, walks to her bedroom, and closes the door behind her. Castle and O’Leary exchange glances. Both of them hear a single choked off noise.

“Thanks. See you. If I’m not dead.”

O’Leary grins widely. “Neither of us is dead yet. We’re already on the good side.” He departs, quietly.

Castle makes himself coffee and settles in for a long wait in which he intends to do precisely nothing for now except read one of Beckett’s books until she reappears and he can work out what she wants. Assertive sexuality is not going to figure in this discussion. It simply won’t work. Well. It would work, but it won’t solve anything for more than a short while and then they’ll be right back here in the same disaster all over again. He casts a glance at his watch. He’s got about four hours before Beckett’s due at Dr Burke’s, and at the moment he’ll be metaphorically sitting on the kerb outside. If an hour passes with nothing, then he’ll consider taking her in a coffee.

Beckett has closed the door on the world. Less than an hour back in Manhattan and everyone wants something. Julia-you’ve-got-to-help-me-Berowitz. O’Leary insisting he takes her home and tattling to Castle that she’s back. Oh yes, she sees that plain as day. O’Leary wants her to be home. She emits a choked-off, furious half-sob, and buries the rest and her face in her pillow. Castle turning up at all. Castle wants her to… what?

Who cares? He wants. They all want. Everybody wants something from her and she has nothing to give. She’s tired: bone-deep weary from supporting her father, waste as that has been; her team; the victims and their families. It’s only in the last few weeks that anyone, apart from occasional times with O’Leary, has supported her, and that’s been rocked by Castle’s insistence that she do it his way. She emits another miserable noise, this time muffled by the pillow. She’d only wanted to be able to stand down and stop with someone who didn’t seem to make any demands on her. Until he did, and it had all been too much for her and she’d lost her temper and lost all her ability to see the other side of the argument. Too many people wanted too much from her, and now she’s run out: Castle had simply been the last straw.

Castle reads without enthusiasm, punctuated by frequent glances at his watch and an inordinate amount of self-control to stop himself walking in on Beckett and pulling her into his arms for some of what Dr Burke had described as physical consolation and/or psychological safety. After an hour, he puts the kettle on, and constructs a trayful of one mug, creamer and spices; together with the French press. He has no idea how she might want to drink her coffee, today. It’ll be up to her. If, of course, she drinks it at all.
Once the coffee has brewed, he pours a mugful for himself, and takes the rest through to Beckett’s bedroom. She’s lying on her bed on her side, face pressed into a pillow. He puts the tray down on the nightstand, and retreats. As he exits, he says softly, “Coffee,” and then re-closes the door behind him.

Beckett doesn’t move when Castle enters. She expects nothing other than his usual behaviour: assertive physicality; and she isn’t going to invite that. She is vaguely surprised when there is a click on the nightstand, the single word coffee, and retreat. The aroma writhes around her head and into her nostrils.

She sits up, tucking the pillow behind her, and discovers that coffee is actually a tray which provides all known options for how she takes her coffee. It is, in fact, a caffeinated version of up to you, Beckett. The sight kicks her brain into some sort of life and actions. Mostly, the action is downing the first half mugful neat, without pause for breath. The second half is also black. Then she looks at the French press, and discovers that it contains only half the coffee that there should be. Conclusion: Castle has been drinking some of it. Conclusion two: he’s drinking it elsewhere. Her frazzled mind puts that together with his failure to use assertive physicality and, now penetrating, his words when he came in: I was wrong, but you misunderstood. It’s still up to you, it’s always up to you. And his conduct since he arrived here backs that up.

She drinks the rest of the coffee. Maybe it’ll help. Finishing the pot doesn’t help. She’s still too tired and too empty to think of an answer. She flops back on her pillows and fails to find any thought that isn’t I want to go away.

Then her phone rings. She doesn’t recognise the number, which right now is a good start. She doesn’t want to talk to anyone she knows. She supposes she ought to answer, but before she does the ringing stops. There is a short gap, and then it rings again.

“Beckett.”

“Detective Beckett. This is Dr Burke. Please would you confirm who will be present at tonight’s session?”

“Me.”

“Thank you,” Dr Burke says without a pause. In fact, he has said that before Beckett has really considered whether she has finished her sentence. “Previously, you had told me that Mr Castle would be attending. I will be perfectly happy, however, if he is not there.” There is a very slight emphasis on not. “This, after all, is your therapy and your family. Outsiders may be unhelpful. Perhaps you should inform him that he should not attend, or I shall do it for you if you so wish.”

“But…”

“Mm?”

“I thought he had seen you?”

“Yes, but that does not entitle him to attend your sessions. They are private. I will not permit anyone to attend without your consent. That would be entirely unethical, and damaging. It is entirely up to you as to whether any person, including yourself, attends. The only compulsory attendee, of course, would be me, and even then should you ask me to remove myself for a few moments I would do so. In short, Detective Beckett, Mr Castle’s presence is dependent on your consent. As I have said, I will be content if he is not there.”
In his Midtown office, Dr Burke is trying a very risky strategy; although since at this point the alternative is no Mr Castle, which Dr Burke considers will court catastrophe, he believes it justified. He is trying, once more, to use reverse psychology on Detective Beckett. He has very little hope that it will work. If Detective Beckett is still angry, it will fail. If, as he hopes, she is now merely exhausted, there is the slimmest of chances that it might work.

“But…”

“The presence of amateurs is not generally recommended,” Dr Burke says in his most arrogant tones. “They are far more likely to do harm than good.”

Beckett’s temper flashes into searing life. “He’s better for me than you are,” she bites out. “At least he cares. You don’t, it’s just your job to open all the wounds back up. When you were a child you probably pulled the wings off flies. I’ll decide if he’s going to do more harm than good.”

In Beckett’s main room, Castle jerks into shocked alertness as her voice rises to audibility.

“As your psychiatrist, I consider that I would be failing in my duty to you if I did not point out the disadvantages” –

“If you’d really thought there were disadvantages you’d have pointed them out last time when I said I was bringing him.”

Dr Burke’s heart sinks.

“You just don’t want him there. In case he shows you up as the arrogant bastard you are. Well, he’s coming.” She swipes off, viciously.

On the other side of the door, Castle is slack-jawed with shock.

In his Midtown room, Dr Burke gives heartfelt thanks, wholly swamped by relief. He drinks his tea, and indulges himself in a stress-relieving chocolate cookie. Just one. He will need the rest of the packet for the period after Detective Beckett leaves.

In her bedroom, Detective Beckett surges off the bed, spends a precise and focused ten minutes in the shower and a further three minutes putting on her make-up perfectly; dresses for Interrogation, and stalks out. She is entirely unsurprised to find Castle still sitting on her couch, though she is marginally surprised – or would be, had she any attention to spare for it – to find him reading Naked in Death.

She stands straight and steel-stiff in front of him.

“Did you mean it?”

“Mean what?”

“That it’s up to me.”

“Yes.”

“But you said you were going to be there whatever. How’s that up to me?”

“I was wrong, okay?” Castle pauses, and then jumps straight in. “But you were wrong too. I never meant that you just picked me up when you needed me. You don’t call half enough even when you do need me. We had this discussion. We agreed you ask, and I come if I want to or can. It was a bad joke yesterday, but it was a joke. I wasn’t trying to make a point.”
“So why were you telling me you wouldn’t let me keep you out of therapy and wouldn’t let me not go to the Hamptons?”

“Because I lost my temper, okay? You were desperate for me to go with you and then the next morning you turned straight round and said you didn’t want me there and I hadn’t a clue why. What did you expect? Then you wouldn’t tell me if you wanted to come to the Hamptons. It was your idea, and you wouldn’t say yes or no.”

“You might not even want to go after tonight.”

“That’s up to me. You weren’t giving me any clues. I thought you were backing out. Ditching me.”

“No. You weren’t listening and I… was scared, and everything about this makes me angry. Being scared makes me angry. You kept pushing me to see that Dad abused me and… and you wouldn’t give me time to think and I can’t stand being a victim. I’m not a victim.”

“No. You’re not. But… everything makes you angry? Including me?”

“Not you. You were there and pushing and pushing and… and you’d said I was using you and” –

“We were both wrong,” Castle states flatly. “Yeah?”

“Yeah.”

“What do you want? Actually want, for you?”

“I want you to come with me,” Beckett says, and her stance softens, “please?”

“Sure. I always said I would if you wanted me there.”

“I want you there.” She stops. “I want… if you want…” All the harsh posture is gone, replaced by that same unhappy insecurity and inability to say what she wants. Castle doesn’t force her to the words. Not now. There will be enough words, only a little later than now, between her and her father.

“I want. Come here, Beckett.”
Poison in your head

Castle stands up and wraps her in. She half-falls against him, which is not wholly reassuring. On the other hand, he manages to sit them both down comfortably, with Beckett safely on his knee and in his arms. But this is still not the time for sex: even were there the temporal space, which there isn’t; she’s tired, and there’s been enough trouble yesterday and today already. He surrounds her, and doesn’t pet, and doesn’t ask any questions.

“Julia was there,” Beckett drags out.

“Mm-uh?”

“At Central Park precinct. Collecting her husband.” Beckett stops, and breathes slowly, the pace of each inhaled molecule rigidly regulated. “She said she needed me and then got mad when I said no. I told her what she should do, all over again, but she hasn’t done it and she won’t do it. She still thinks there’s a better outcome.” Bitter knowledge taints the still air. “She’ll learn. Just like I did.”

“Her problem.”

“She told me I walked away. It’s true. But if I’d done it properly back then I wouldn’t be doing it again tonight. It would never have happened again. He’d be gone.”

Castle very deliberately doesn’t react at all. He’s been expecting that since she opened her mouth.

“He will be soon, anyway.”

But she’s tensed up as soon as she says it. Hardly the attitude of someone who’s desperate to walk away, and for whom cutting out her father from her life will be as easy as she says it will be.

“He’s just another witness, Beckett, and when you’ve finished we’ll go. D’you still want to go to the Hamptons?”

“Yeah,” Beckett says slowly, as if she can’t quite believe it’s still on offer.

“Okay. Your car or mine?”

“Yours. I… I’m not sure I’m going to want to drive, after. Dr Burke annoys me, and that’s not a good start to a journey.”

Castle thinks that that’s a very minor component of a much larger reason Beckett shouldn’t drive, but since it’s the right answer he doesn’t explore it.

“Okay,” he says again. “If you want to go, then you need to pack, and we can go straight away.” He forces a grin on to his mouth and hopes that it appears in his voice. “Please will you bring that lovely crimson dress? The strokable one? It’s soft and swirly and very pettable.”

“Is that a word?”

“Swirly? Of course it is. So is pettable. Pleeasse?”

Beckett emits a half-hearted growl and doesn’t say no. On the other hand she isn’t exactly leaping out of his lap to pack either.

“When do we need to be at Dr Burke’s?”
“Usual time. Six thirty.”

“It’s nearly five now.”

“Oh.”

Beckett sounds very tired indeed.

“I could help you pack. Ensure everything is suitable.”

“You just want an excuse to rootle through my underwear.”

“I like doing that much better when you’re wearing it.” Castle murmurs. The resulting growl is not half-hearted at all.

“You are not helping me pack.” She thinks of a diversion. “If we’re going straight from Dr Burke’s, then don’t you need a car?”

“Downstairs already. I was going to leave it here, but we can take it if you like. I guess we’d get out of Manhattan faster, if we did. But you still need to pack.”

“Okay.” Beckett aims for her bedroom, stalked by Castle. “No. You are not helping, okay?”

Castle pouts. “But Beckett, I need to make sure you’ve got the right dress.”

“If I promise to pack that same dress will you go and sit down and stop acting like creepy stalker-guy?”

“Yes,” says Castle, perfectly happily now that he’s got what he wants. Which want was not, in fact, the dress; but a more alive Beckett than the previous ghostly version.

Beckett carefully considers not packing the crimson dress. Then she thinks that, given that the crimson dress induces soft petting and cuddles and stroking, she does want to pack it; and therefore does. With appropriate underwear. And nightwear.

Shortly her bag is packed. Unfortunately this means that there is now nothing at all standing between Beckett, Dr Burke, and her father. She sits on her bed and tries to recreate Detective Beckett. She’s not Katie, that victim of abuse. She’s Detective Kate Beckett of the Twelfth Precinct, who can deal with unpleasantness, hostile witnesses, and liars without turning a perfectly groomed hair.

What’s in a name? An entire personality, that’s what. The personality she needs now to be done with this whole charade and pretence.

When she walks back out of the bedroom with her weekend bag she is perfectly, totally, and entirely Detective Kate Beckett.

She is still perfectly, totally, and entirely Detective Kate Beckett when she slips into the passenger seat of Castle’s very luxurious but discreet Mercedes, her notes in her purse; still perfectly, totally, and entirely Detective Kate Beckett when she teases Castle about letting her drive it and is firmly told no, it’s his toy; still perfectly, totally, and entirely Detective Kate Beckett when Castle parks at Dr Burke’s; and still perfectly, totally, and entirely Detective Kate Beckett when she walks into reception and then into the consulting room.

Her father is not there.

“Good evening, Detective Beckett. Mr Castle.” Dr Burke manages to infuse a trace of disapproval. into the last two words. “Please be seated.”

“Where’s my father?” Detective Beckett raps.

“He is in another room. Is there anything you wish to discuss before he joins us?”

“No. Let’s get this done. It won’t take long.”

Detective Beckett’s tone would have been better used to sound the advance at Omaha Beach. Dr Burke hears its clarion call with misgivings. From his expression, Mr Castle not only recognises the tone but regards it with outright terror.

“Nothing? Very well. There is one procedural matter to explain before we begin. You, or your father, may at any time request a short recess for any reason. You need not state the reason. If such is requested, all parties must accept it. When it occurs, it is usual for the parties to occupy separate rooms for the duration. I may suggest a recess, if I consider that the situation warrants it. Mr Castle may not.”

“Understood,” Detective Beckett says, crisply. She takes two pieces of paper from her purse, smoothing them out. Mr Castle clearly recognises those, too.

Dr Burke fetches Mr Beckett, with considerable trepidation. When he returns, he observes that Detective Beckett is completely impassive.

“Dad,” she says coolly. There is no particular emotion apparent. The same is not true of Mr Beckett.

“Katie,” he says desperately. “Katie, what did I do?”

“Don’t you remember?” she says, still cool and collected. “Why don’t you tell me what you think happened?”

Dr Burke admires Detective Beckett’s ability to command the room. Every eye is fixed on her.

“Katie, you’ve heard it all before. I don’t know anything more. I don’t remember.”

“Don’t you mean I was too drunk to remember?”

“Yes,” Mr Beckett says desolately. “But I don’t know what I did now, either. We were just talking and you lost your temper and walked out.”

“And when you got dry?” Still nothing but dispassion. Detective Beckett might never have met her father before.

“We were a family again. I don’t know why you don’t see that.”

“We hadn’t been a family for five years, because the only family you wanted was a whiskey bottle. Why were you so keen on being a family again?”

“You were all I had. If it wasn’t for you I’d never have got dry. You know this. Why are we going through it? That hasn’t changed.”

Dr Burke considers intervening, and does not.

“I was all you had?”

“Yes. You were all that was left of our family.”
“Mm,” Detective Beckett says. “All that was left?”

“You were all I had left. All I had to remind me.”

Dr Burke winces. Detective Beckett does not. Interestingly, Mr Castle does.

“So you got dry because I was all you had left to remind you of Mom. You said I saved you. Wasn’t it your job to save yourself?”

“I did. But I needed to start. You were the start.”

“Because I reminded you of Mom.” Her voice is still terrifyingly dispassionate.

“I said that. You were my only family.”

“Because I reminded you of Mom.”

“Yes. What don’t you get about that?”

“I understand it perfectly.”

“Katie, what is this? I don’t get why you’re so upset with me. What happened?”

Detective Beckett ignores that.

“So I saved you. I was the reason you crawled out of a bottle.”

Dr Burke would have preferred anger, or contempt, to this cool analysis. Mr Beckett is already looking confused.

“Yes.”

“And I’m your only family.”

“Yes.”

“So why did you crawl into the bottle in the first place? If I mean so much to you. If I’m your family.”

“Because I couldn’t deal with how much you were like your mother. You were so like her so I drank to wipe out all the memories. Every time I saw you I saw her. Every time you spoke. You sound so much like her. And then I couldn’t stop.”

“But you don’t remember anything?” Still cool and calm, though there is an edge on the question that Mr Beckett clearly senses. Dr Burke notices that Detective Beckett’s knuckles are white in her lap.

“No. Katie, why are you behaving like this? I don’t remember. I never did remember. I don’t remember any of it.”

“So you really don’t remember me coming home,” she bites, ice on each word, “and you telling me I should go away because you didn’t want me, you wanted Mom.”

Mr Beckett turns sheet white. “I said what?”

“Go away. I don’t want you. I want Johanna.” Each word, cold and clear, strikes like steel. “In vino, veritas.”
“I…” Mr Beckett clearly remembers Dr Burke’s earlier admonitions. “I don’t… I can’t remember, Katie.” It sounds like a plea for mercy. Mercy is not in evidence. “Why did you never say?”

“You really don’t remember saying that every time you got wasted? Every time I came to get you out the tank.”

“Katie, no! I never would have meant it. I don’t remember any of it. I meant what I said when I was dry again.”

“So when you were so drunk you were vomiting, you could still lie, but when you were sober, you always told the truth?” An elegant eyebrow lifts sceptically. Disbelief hangs heavy in the claustrophobic atmosphere of the interrogation room. “Usually when people are that drunk, they haven’t the coherence to lie consistently.”

Mr Beckett clearly thinks that there is a chink of light at the end of this tunnel.

“Yes, I told the truth when I was sober. You meant everything. You – just the thought of you saved me, and then I could do it. Every day, one day at a time.”

“You kept telling me that. That you did it because of me. That seeing me was really important. That it was really important to you to be a family.”

“It is.”

“So I’ve been there for you. Been your family. Never let you down. Saved you. Did whatever you wanted and whatever was needed.”

“Yes. Katie, why are you questioning this? That… I just wanted to be a family. Didn’t you?”

Detective Beckett ignores that question too.

“In fact, I did exactly what you wanted me to.” She changes topic. “I cut and dyed my hair, you know,” she says conversationally, “so I didn’t look so much like Mom. At least it stopped you making that mistake again.” That stiletto is still sinking in when Detective Beckett carries on. “For two years I tried to make you better, but nothing I did worked. I didn’t talk about Mom, because it made you cry, and then you drank. I wanted to talk about Mom. I wanted to remember her. But I couldn’t, because you just cried and got drunk again. So I stopped. I cleaned you up and picked you up and listened to you promise you wouldn’t do it again if only I’d be there. I was there, but you didn’t stop.”

She pauses: breathes out, breathes in. Dr Burke watches her control and waits, poised to step in at any moment. This cold dissection surely cannot last?

“But then you got dry, and you were – we were – happy again. Just as long as I was there to be a family with you. Just as long as we didn’t talk about it. After all, there was no point dragging up old scores. You were happy and as long as you were happy you didn’t drink. And I had my dad back.”

“So why aren’t you talking to me now? Why did you stop taking my calls?”

“But Dr Burke here” – that has a fine edge on it too – “showed me that it wasn’t all bluebirds and roses. I wouldn’t believe him, until I went back through all of it. I changed my behaviour and my appearance and didn’t do things I wanted to do because you were drunk, or because on the rare occasions you were sober you pleaded with me, or because you might have gone back to the bottle. I changed me to try to keep you happy. Dr Burke thinks that’s emotional abuse. I argued with him. I was sure that it wasn’t, because you were so drunk you didn’t know you were doing it. Because I thought that you needed me because you wanted to be a family. Because I thought that when you got dry, under it all, you still loved me.”

“Katie…”

“And then you met Castle.”

Dr Burke sees the sucker punch a fraction too late to stop it.

“And he had a much nicer family. They weren’t harsh to poor dear Julia Berowitz. They were kind and friendly and sociable. They liked you, instantly. You liked them. When you saw them, you didn’t have to worry about what they remembered or what they might think of you, because they didn’t know your past. They never needed to forgive you for anything. In fact” – she pauses slightly – “it was just like being part of a family again.”

Dr Burke emits a strangled gasp. Castle doesn’t manage the strangulation part.

“That wasn’t” –

“So,” Beckett says over her father’s half-emitted speech, “if you meant what you said when you were sober, if that was always the truth, that must have been the truth too. That you weren’t part of a family. You liked being family with me right up until a better offer came along. As long as I was your well-behaved, compliant daughter who was always there for you when you needed me.”

Beckett’s control is beginning to slip. “And then it looked like I wouldn’t be because I’d finally met someone else.”

“No, it wasn’t” –

“You abused me overtly when you were drunk, but I used to think you didn’t mean it because you pretended you loved me once you got dry. And then you proved you didn’t. So. If you don’t remember what you said when you were drunk, then you couldn’t have been deliberately abusing me. You couldn’t have been trying to make me behave how you wanted. But I did, anyway.” She throws a take-that glance at Dr Burke. “But then you must have been doing so when you were sober.”

There’s a tiny silence. Jim opens his mouth and Beckett runs right over him: no filter, no care, no calm any more.

“So which is it, Dad? Abuse because you were too drunk to tell the truth and never cared about me anyway because everything was about you and Mom, and I was only important because I reminded you of her; or abuse because you wanted someone at your beck and call once you were sober and I was stupid enough to give up my life to do it? You didn’t care, either way. I gave up all my chances to look after you and it was all a lie. I came back from Stanford; I went to be a cop; I broke up with Will; I spent weekends and Christmas with you; I had to admit to my team and my Captain that they needed to babysit me so I could be there for you if you were away – all because I thought that you needed me.” She’s in full spate now. “And it was all a complete waste of time and effort because actually you never cared at all.”

“That’s not true, Katie,” Jim cries.

“I don’t believe you. You ruined my life the first time with whisky and you didn’t even notice. Then you couldn’t stand that I’d found someone else and might not come running whenever you called, so you tried to ruin that too. Of course you manipulated Castle into inviting you for dinner. That way you could weasel your way into his family and be everyone’s best friend because you don’t remember any of what you did. It’s just me who can’t stand seeing a happy family, thanks to you. You got forgiveness, and all I got was hurt.”

“I wasn’t. Katie, please stop. Let me explain.”

But Beckett can’t stop, now. Her voice has risen.

“You wanted to be best pals with Castle’s family because I’m not enough. You wanted Mom, and I’m not Mom. Fine. I’m done with trying to make you love me. Keep your memories. I’m done. You never loved me and you never will. I wish I’d let you kill yourself. Don’t call me Katie. I’m not Katie. My name is Kate.”

Both Becketts are white and crying, but it doesn’t look like Detective Beckett is going to stop any time soon.

“I think a recess is indicated,” Dr Burke says, before Mr Beckett can turn this outpouring of emotion into an absolute catastrophe by trying to argue. Dr Burke signals to Castle, and whisks Mr Beckett out of the room.

Castle doesn’t hesitate to pull Beckett into his arms and simply let her sob hopelessly into his shoulder. He’s pretty certain that Beckett hadn’t meant to lose control like that, but she has. All he can do right now is hold her while she weeps and wait. Ten years of agony, and everything she should have said five years ago, plus a very large dose of hurt and hurtful misunderstanding and misbegotten nightmare, spilling out over her shattered, devastated father.

“He never cared,” she sobs.

“He hasn’t answered, yet,” Castle points out, very gently. “If you don’t let him answer you’ll always wonder what he said.” He hugs her, carefully. He doesn’t ask about Will. He doesn’t want to know how close he’d come to never meeting an unmarried Beckett at all.

“What’s the point? He’ll just justify himself and come up with all sorts of bullshit reasons and it’ll all be just the same as it ever was.”

“Beckett… Kate, those weren’t crocodile tears he was crying. He’s really shocked. I don’t think he knew anything about it.”

“Whose side are you on? I thought you were on my side.”

Castle holds on to her, before she can try to run. “I am. I always am. That doesn’t mean that I can’t disagree with you, but what happens is always up to you. I just think you could do this all once, get it all out, and then it’s done. You’ll never have to do it again. We can go off to the Hamptons tonight with it all behind you and we can start clean.” He smirks into her hair. “Or dirty, if you prefer.” She doesn’t react.

“Let him answer. Maybe he’ll say something useful. Maybe he won’t. But listen to him, just for now, and then we’ll go.”

“I want to go now,” Beckett says, miserably. “I want to go away and never come back.”
Past does have its say

Castle cuddles and delicately soothes Beckett into sitting down next to him, without losing contact with her. She’s shivering: white and chilled; no fire left in her eyes and no strength in her body or hands. She’s laid the whole maggot-ridden rotting mess bare, as she should have been made to do five years ago, and the reaction is already hitting her. He knows that next door, Dr Burke will be trying to calm Jim. That’s not his problem or concern. His sole concern is right here, slow bitter tears on her cheeks, pinched white lips ready to spit out more venomous history. She needs to step back from the brink.

“Come here,” he says softly. “Stand down now. You’ve said your piece. Just stand down with me.” He stops talking, and lets his strength enfold her.

“I didn’t want to say all that. I never lose it like that in interrogation. I meant just to ask the questions and get the answers and prove it and it all went wrong and none of that was relevant at all. I just wanted this all to be over and to walk away.” She stops, and swipes violently at her eyes. “And then it all came out and I never wanted to say any of that because even though he doesn’t care at all I’m still scared to hurt him because he might get drunk again and die and it’ll all be my fault.” She can’t continue. Castle hands her a Kleenex from a handy box and keeps hold, trying to persuade her, wordlessly, to lean on him.

Instead, she leans forward, elbows on her knees, shoulders hunched under his still-encircling arm, so that he has to slide forward to stay touching her; to keep trying to force strength into her.

“Now he knows. Now we’ll never be a family again. He’ll never want to see me,” she sobs, completely contradicting everything she’s said in the last half hour and indeed in the last month. Castle does not say I thought that was what you wanted. Just as he, O’Leary and Dr Burke had thought, when it came to the point that it all broke apart Beckett did too. And now it’s up to Dr Burke and he to pick up the pieces and try to put the broken Becketts – definitely plural Becketts – back together: singularly and collectively. He wonders, idly, uselessly and certainly as a diversion from the appalling mess in the crook of his arm, what the collective noun for Becketts might be. A fight? A torture? Anything but a family.

“He’ll never believe I wanted to forgive him. I did forgive him until he said he didn’t want to be a family and then it all went wrong. He didn’t forgive me for leaving and now he won’t.” She dissolves into incoherent tears again. Castle continues to cuddle her in, bending around her to shield her from the empty room.

“I want to go away,” is all that he can hear.

Dr Burke steers Mr Beckett into another room where his sponsor is waiting. Mr Beckett is quite clearly completely devastated by his daughter’s statements and by the truth that she had withheld from him for all the time he had been sober.

Mr Beckett is persuaded into sitting down, and Dr Burke provides a glass of water and then busies himself making a pot of tea for all concerned. He does not feel that coffee will help. Tea is very soothing, he finds. While he is occupied, Mr Beckett’s sponsor is very gently calming him down, although Mr Beckett is still highly distressed and emotional, with considerable justification.

Dr Burke thinks that, highly emotional as it had been, in fact the session is proceeding very much as predicted. While Detective Beckett had opened with interrogation, as Mr Castle had predicted, she had lost control, feelings had been exposed, and the truth had been revealed. It had been intensely painful, but Dr Burke had not imposed a recess earlier in order that Detective Beckett’s entire position was laid out before calling a temporary halt to allow both Becketts to restore some small equilibrium. By allowing a continuation, Detective Beckett had had no chance to stop and think, nor to close down her outpouring of the past before everything had been uncovered.

On balance, that had not been a bad first part of the session, despite the emotion and raised voices which might leave less experienced practitioners, or non-practitioners, thinking otherwise. However, managing the second part appropriately will be complex. Dr Burke will have to rely on Mr Castle’s protective instincts and will himself need to deal with Mr Beckett before the two protagonists can be allowed to be in the same room. It would be useful to have a short conversation with Mr Castle. Mr Beckett can safely be left with his sponsor. Dr Burke wishes that he need not detach Mr Castle from Detective Beckett, but he has no option.

He knocks tentatively – he has no desire to interrupt if physical consolation is ongoing – and on hearing a rumble peers round the door. Mr Castle looks up, clearly irritated by the interruption: Detective Beckett does not, and indeed would have some difficulty in so doing given that she is completely swamped by Mr Castle’s bulk. It is really most peculiar. Dr Burke has never thought of Detective Beckett as small, and indeed even when Mr Castle had collected her she had not seemed so, but she presently appears unexpectedly delicate.

Dr Burke indicates without words that he wishes Mr Castle to come out of the room. Mr Castle murmurs something inaudible and – Dr Burke is already looking away – drops a soft kiss on Detective Beckett’s hair. He arrives outside the door at some speed and closes it very carefully.

“What is it?” he snaps.

“That went quite well,” Dr Burke opens.

“What?”

“All the truth that should have been told in the past is now on the table. Of course, it has been very painful on both parts, but, unless you are aware of any other issues, there are now no secrets poisoning the relationship between Detective Beckett and her father.”

“No. Hurry up, will you. I want to get back to Beckett before she starts running. Again,” he adds bitterly.

“Yes,” Dr Burke assents. “Mr Beckett should have an opportunity to make his points before Detective Beckett leaves.”

“I said that. But she says she wants to go now.”

“Has she explicitly asked you to take her out of Manhattan?”

“Not quite, if you want to chop logic here.”

“Has Detective Beckett said anything else?”

“Oh, only that she never meant to say all that, and now they’ll never be family.”

“Good. We have a chance to set this on the right footing, Mr Castle.” Dr Burke smiles, a little tiredly. “Please keep Detective Beckett with you. It will take me a little time to calm Mr Beckett. If you feel the need to go out for a short walk with her, that may not be unhelpful. Please try to bring her back, but not at the expense of her becoming upset with you. I expect that I shall need at least a further quarter of an hour, and it will not hurt if you should be a little delayed beyond that.”

Dr Burke returns to Mr Beckett.

Castle returns to his Beckett. She doesn’t appear to have shifted position in the slightest since he went out and came back. He sits back down and hugs her.

“Beckett,” he murmurs, “let’s go for a walk. We can go and come back, and Dr Burke even suggested it. I need a coffee, and you always need coffee, and I think some fresh air would be good.” He surveys her closely. “But you might want to go to the restroom first and tidy up. Your mascara’s run, and you’d hate to go out like that.”

“Run?” She looks pathetically at him. “Run?”

“Yep. Black smudges, here.” He runs a very gentle finger just below her eyes.

“I pay $20 a tube and it’s supposed to be waterproof,” she wails. It would be funny that she’s focusing on the totally trivial, if she weren’t so very upset by everything. It’s just one thing too many for her.

“You can go fix it, and then let’s go get coffee.” He stands up, and pulls her with him, catching her in and holding her tightly against him. “C’mon, Beckett. You’ll feel better with coffee.” He keeps an arm around her and steers her out of the door and towards the restroom. When she reappears, looking less like a raccoon but no less miserable, Castle puts his arm round her shoulders, tucks her in neatly, and takes the shortest possible route to the building exit and the nearest coffee bar.

Fortunately a coffee bar is readily found, this being Manhattan, and equally fortunately the short walk and biting March wind has stung colour into Beckett’s white face, so that it doesn’t look as if she’s about to collapse. Of course that doesn’t mean that she isn’t about to collapse, but anything is an improvement at this point. He installs her in a quiet corner and orders the usual precinct concoctions. Something normal. Something that says Detective Kate Beckett, even if he’d rather say sweetheart. Or my love.

For a while, they simply sit. Castle keeps a warm, undemandingly affectionate arm around Beckett, says nothing, and sips his coffee without any hurry at all. Gradually Beckett eases very slightly under his quietly peaceful contact, and the high tension air around her loosens. When she finally moves very slightly to be closer to him, Castle breathes a soundless sigh of relief and tightens his arm round her. Now that they’re out of Dr Burke’s rooms, some of the claustrophobia and worry which had been plaguing him has dissipated, and in addition Beckett’s shattering outflow of emotion had, as the excessively clever Dr Burke had noted, at least laid everything on the table.

By the time both coffees are finished, Castle is half-propping Beckett up. Catharsis is exhausting, but she’s not done yet: it’s her father’s turn.

“C’mon, Beckett. Time to go.”

“I don’t want to.”

“Nor do I,” Castle says with complete honesty, “but don’t you think you should just get it over with and then we’ll go away and not have it hanging over you?” He squeezes her gently against him. “I’d rather be in the Hamptons right now, with you. Let’s do this, and go. Just us, for the rest of the weekend. I even told Joe to leave me an extra-large bag of marshmallows, for the hot chocolate.”

Beckett leans her head on his shoulder. “I just want to go,” she says, “and never come back here again.”
She stands, reluctantly, but consents to have her hand taken and be led out of the café, too broken on her own pain to argue or protest. Even Castle’s firm arm around her back fails to impart any life into her dead eyes and slumped body.

“Why didn’t she tell me? I thought we’d dealt with everything and now I find that I never knew most of what I did.”

“Jim, your daughter thought she was protecting you. She thought that she had” – Dr Burke’s tone hardens – “grown up and got over it because that is what her earlier therapist told her she had to do. She also wished to ensure that you had no reason to return to alcohol. That decision had several roots: the guilt that she felt, and feels, about walking away from you; a strong inclination to protect, currently funnelled into her work as a detective; and most importantly her desperate need to be loved and forgiven by you.”

“Forgiven? What do I have to forgive?”

“In your mind, nothing. In hers – everything. I do not think you understand just how difficult it was for her to stop enabling you. Just as she is the last memory of your wife for you, you represent the last link with her mother for your daughter.” Dr Burke pauses. “Has your daughter ever mentioned your wife to you, since you became sober?”

Mr Beckett thinks for a long, painful time. “No,” he says eventually. “I don’t remember it. But she wouldn’t look at the family photos, when I showed them to Rick.”

“Why do you now think that is?”

“I… but she could have spoken to me about Johanna.”

“She did not know that. Your commentary when drunk had affected her behaviour to such an extent that she was thoroughly conditioned to avoid that subject. Either you had declared that she should leave because she was not your wife, or mourned, wept, and sought solace in alcohol. Jim, it is absolutely unsurprising that she did not try. Had she been properly treated the first time, she would have been told that she had to disclose the full truth, and we would not be here. However, she was led to believe that her grief was less important than others, and so she has subjugated it for years.”

“But… but she sounded as if she hated me,” Mr Beckett whispers, close to weeping again. “How will she ever believe me? She… I don’t know how to make it better. How do I make it better?”

“Jim,” his sponsor says, “you know how to make it better. Go back to basics. You’ve listened, and it’s really hurt. Now you have to try to make amends. Katie thinks you don’t care about her, and that’s going to take time to cure, but you can start now. You did it before, all the way. You can do it again now. If she didn’t care, she wouldn’t have spilt out all that rage and pain. Start with that.”

Dr Burke stays quiet. Mr Beckett’s sponsor may not be a psychiatrist, but his prescription is accurate. Later, he and the sponsor will have to have a conversation about Mr Beckett receiving more formal counselling, but for now it is sufficient.

“You think she still cares?”

“I do,” Dr Burke says with authority. “She may have tried to hide it from you and from herself, but Mr Castle and I both believe that she does. As you have just been told, if she did not care, she would not have lost control. That is an extremely sound foundation on which to build.”
Mr Beckett sniffs, and blows his nose, and drinks his tea. There is a short space of quiet, in which Mr Beckett slowly recovers some composure, though he is still badly shocked and clearly very unhappy. No-one tries to hurry him. Dr Burke had heard Mr Castle and Detective Beckett go out, and he is quite certain that the elevator bell has not rung to indicate that they have returned. He is not yet worried by that. He has faith in Mr Castle.

Mr Beckett is slowly recovering more colour, though there is a tremor in his hands, and his face is creased and old. In the background, Dr Burke hears the quiet noise of the elevator, and footsteps, and concludes that Mr Castle and Detective Beckett have returned.

“Would you like to begin again?” he asks neutrally. “It is up to you.”

“I have to start somewhere,” Mr Beckett says wearily. “Might as well be now.”

“Allow me to have a short conversation with your daughter first, then,” Dr Burke says. “You have listened to her. She must now listen to you. I will return in a few moments.”

Dr Burke leaves Mr Beckett to his sponsor and, safely outside the closed doors of both rooms, refreshes himself and considers. Mr Beckett had listened and largely not reacted. Detective Beckett might well be considerably less compliant. This would be normal. She is the one who has suffered most, and while it is not wholly Mr Beckett’s fault, that is where it all began.

“Detective Beckett?”

She is sitting close to Mr Castle, who is once again cradling her protectively. Unsurprisingly, she is still pale and tired-looking. The formidable woman with whom the session had opened is not in evidence.

“Yeah?”

“If you wish to continue, your father is ready to do so. If we are to continue, then I counsel that you should listen to your father without interruption.” She looks ready to protest. “Listening does not imply acceptance. It merely means that he should be able to speak his piece.” Detective Beckett’s hand closes on Mr Castle’s, tightly enough that her knuckles whiten. Mr Castle lays his other hand over it, and, though it must surely hurt, shows nothing.

“Up to you, Beckett,” he says. There is a short silence.

“Okay,” she says resignedly. As Dr Burke goes to fetch Mr Beckett he thinks he hears her say I want to go.

Everyone is sitting down again. Castle has Beckett close to him, a slightly defiant arm around her; Dr Burke is a little removed from the group; Jim is on a chair facing his daughter: tense, and drawn, and terrifyingly fragile. It seems to Castle that none of the main characters know quite where to start, but it’s not his place to interfere.

“Katie” – Jim winces – “Kate” – Castle winces – “I…I don’t know what to say to you. I don’t even know what to call you, now. I’m so sorry. I…” His speech falls into dead air. Beckett hasn’t looked at him since he came in. “Can’t we start again?” he tries hopelessly.

“I don’t know.” Jim looks as if he’s been stabbed. “You’re the one who wanted someone different.” Beckett doesn’t sound accusatory or condemnatory, only exhausted: flat words lying lifelessly between them.

“I don’t know what I said,” Jim says. “I don’t remember any of it. I don’t remember anything once the whisky hit my throat and that’s down to me. I loved her so much,” he says brokenly, “and she was gone, and I couldn’t cope with that. So I drank till I couldn’t remember anything. You were the only reminder. We wanted you so badly and it was so difficult” – Castle draws in breath: he hadn’t realised that Beckett wasn’t an only child through her parents’ choice – “and then you were her all over again and it hurt so much that I didn’t have both of you…” Jim has started to weep. Beckett is, Castle thinks, too exhausted to react. “I couldn’t bear her to be gone. That’s why I clung on to you when I was sober, but then you looked like her and you sounded like her and you behaved like her and it all got too much and I had to forget.”

Castle’s hand hurts. Beckett’s nails are digging in and her grip is vice-like, but there’s no emotion coming off her at all. He’s not actually sure that she’s taking any of this in.

“I don’t know why I would tell you to leave. I don’t remember it. I can’t believe that I did and I don’t know why it happened. You were all I had: the only thing left to love.”

Beckett makes a strangled, agonised sound in her throat.
I'm empty and aching

“When you walked away I finally got it. And when you came back – you know, I didn’t think you would. I never thought that you’d come back: I thought I’d have to find you but you came. It was… it was like the sun came out. It wasn’t that… if I thought I was slipping, I thought of that day.”

“You told me I saved you. You told me I was the only thing that kept you sober.”

“I didn’t realise what you thought I meant. It was up to me not to drink. I only needed to know that… that you had let me have another chance. I never meant you to give up your life. I never meant to stop you having Will, or Rick.” Tears are spilling down his face, pooling in the wrinkles at the corners of his eyes, the grooves by his mouth. Opposite, his daughter is blank-faced and still. Castle is watching Dr Burke, who appears unwilling to intervene. Castle has to trust that this is the right thing to do.

“I just meant that Rick’s family was the first family we’d had anything to do with. I didn’t mean his was a better family, or that we weren’t a family. I guess I hoped…” he trails off. Castle meets Dr Burke’s eyes, and is granted an infinitesimal shake of the head.

Beckett still says, does, nothing. Castle thinks that she can’t speak, or react.

“I can’t give you the time back, Katie. I’m just so sorry…”

Dr Burke finally intervenes, murmuring in Jim’s ear. Jim rises and leaves. Beckett doesn’t even seem to notice.

“C’mon, Kate. Let’s go,” Castle says. “I’ll go tell Burke we’re leaving. We can be there in a couple of hours. Do you need anything before we leave?”

She shakes her head. “I just want to go,” she forces out, tears held back behind the words. “Can’t we go?”

Castle taps on the door of the other room, and when Dr Burke pokes his head out explains.

“I think that would be best,” Dr Burke says. “There is nothing more to be gained from continuing. Detective Beckett has exhausted herself, and needs time to recover. Take Detective Beckett away as you had planned, Mr Castle, but be careful of her. Today’s revelations may readily come back to hurt her later.”

Castle withdraws, sombrely. “C’mon, Beckett. School’s out.” He has no option but to pull her up and keep an arm round her, since she is making no effort at all to move. He expects that she’ll be out cold as soon as he starts the car.

Beckett installed in the passenger seat, Castle starts to roll out towards the Midtown Tunnel and out on to the I-495. He puts on a relatively soothing playlist which he used to use to calm himself whenever Gina had been particularly annoying, and doesn’t try to talk. Occasionally he slips a hand on to Beckett’s knee, just to let her know that he’s there for her. She isn’t responding, and she isn’t there.

By the time they’re passing Flushing Meadow a quick glance shows that Beckett’s eyes are shut and her breathing has smoothed out. It hasn’t cured the pinched, white cast to her face, nor the sharp edges to her shoulders. However, sleep is probably the best thing right now. The alternatives are all much, much worse, and when he has her safely in his Hamptons home they can both relax.
The big car purrs through the miles and the dimming evening light. They’ve missed the worst of the weekend exit traffic, and Castle doesn’t scruple to ignore the speed limits. The sooner they’re there, the sooner he can feed Beckett, provide good wine, and simply cosset her close and show her how much he wants to make it all better for her. And later, he’ll be able to hold her to him all night and when she wakes she’ll be there; when she wakes he’ll be there; as if they were totally, properly, together. Maybe now, now that the whole mess is out there, maybe now they can be.

“We’re here, Beckett,” he says, and gently wobbles her shoulder.

“‘M asleep.” She tries to turn over, and wakes as she realises that this is not a bed. “Urg?”

“We’re home. Well, the Hamptons. Come on, let’s get you inside.”

Beckett exits the car slightly clumsily, and finds Castle already at her side with her bag in his other hand.

“Food,” he says enthusiastically. “We should have plenty and it won’t take long to fix dinner. Do you want some wine, or… or soda?” The last is added as it belatedly occurs to him that Beckett may not like the idea of alcohol, having just gone through a very painful therapy session which arose from the effects of alcohol.

“Whatever.”

They’ve walked up to the door. Castle puts down Beckett’s bag, which is remarkably light (Gina used to carry half a ton in baggage. Meredith had two tons, at least half of which was makeup) to open the door. He looks at Beckett, smiles lazily – and sweeps her up into his arms to carry her inside, just like the first time.

“There,” he says. “Home. Just us.” He bends a little, and kisses her gently: stands her back on her feet. “Just you and me.” And he kisses her much harder, forceful and definite, knowing without knowing how he knows that she needs him to be sure, and strong – and to show that she’s still his regardless of the pain that had gone down in that therapy room. Her arms come round his neck, her body softens and curves into him, and suddenly all her pain and stress slips away for now and she’s simply soft, pettable Kat.

He has no expectation that this will last.

On the other hand he’s going to make sure that they both enjoy it while it does. He explores her mouth smoothly, holding her tightly and not giving so much as a hint that he might let go (he’s never going to let go) until she’s as relaxed as he thinks she’ll get.

“Dinner?”

Beckett manages a genuine, if still exhausted, smile. “Please. Something easy?”

Castle rummages in the fridge. “Pasta, or grilled cheese, or – no, that takes too long – salad – Joe, why did you get broccoli? You know I hate it” –

“I like broccoli,” Beckett points out. Castle ignores this ridiculously provocative statement, since no-one he knows likes broccoli and he is sure Beckett is just being annoying.

He emerges from the fridge. “Pasta?” he semi-asks.

“Okay.”
“Pasta with carbonara sauce, garlic bread and salad.” He looks a touch embarrassed. “Ready-made sauce and garlic bread.” Beckett nods. “And then ice-cream, if you want. It shouldn’t take more than about fifteen minutes.”

“Sounds good. Can I help?”

“No need. You could unpack.” There’s a little hitch. “Um… you remember where my room is?”

Beckett flicks a glance up through her lashes at his slight uncertainty. “Yes,” she says, tiredly, and wanders off in the correct direction. Castle converts his desire to follow her and damn the dinner into brisk efficiency, as a result of which dinner is almost ready when Beckett returns, changed into a softly draped green top and a calf-length rich brown skirt, with flats. Not a trace of icy Detective Beckett, nor of the furious, devastated Katie, remains. Unless, of course, Castle looks down into the very furthest depths of her hazel eyes, where tiny smears of chill agony remain: little raindrops of bitterness.

He dishes up dinner, Beckett conveys salad and garlic bread to the table, and only then does he realise that there’s nothing on the table to drink.

“Wine, soda, water?”

Beckett doesn’t hesitate. “Wine, please.”

Castle rustles up two glasses and a good white in short order. There is a small clink as they raise them to each other.

“That’s better,” Beckett says, after a mouthful of wine and some of the pasta. It’s not clear whether she means the food and wine, or the totality of being out of Manhattan. At this point, Castle is merely glad that she is not still in that ghastly state in which she’d left Dr Burke’s, nor is she spilling out anger and/or hurt on him. She polishes off a substantial quantity of pasta, though only one glass of wine, and then an equally substantial quantity of ice-cream.

“When did you last eat?” Castle abruptly wonders, unfortunately allowing the thought that should have stayed in his head to escape from his mouth. Beckett doesn’t answer, reserve descending around her. “Coffee?” he asks, rather than ruin the mood further.

“Please.” She looks tired, again.

Beckett hadn’t realised how hungry she was until dinner appeared, at which time she had great difficulty not falling upon it like a starving predator on the first deer it had killed for a week. With extreme self-restraint she maintains her table manners. The wine is not nearly as troublesome. She doesn’t want much of that. She is enormously comforted and, though she wishes she had more faith, reassured by Castle’s searching kisses: the memory of three hours ago still sharp and cutting. Castle’s well-meant question about how long it’s been since she ate triggers thought – Thursday? She doesn’t remember even getting breakfast on Thursday, and after that she wasn’t hungry. Wednesday dinner? That’s worrying.

“Please.” She says in answer to the question of coffee. Maybe it’ll wake her up a bit. Long enough to snuggle into her nice big warm Castle, anyway. She could do with some snuggling. She pads over to the couch with her coffee, and curls up in the corner with her now unshod feet tucked under her skirt. Castle sits down next to her and very unsubtly lays his arm along the back of the couch. Equally unsubtly, Beckett puts her coffee mug down and wriggles herself into that particularly Beckett-shaped space between Castle’s hip and shoulder. Perfectly sized for her to lay her head on his shoulder and be nestled in. In fact, just plain perfect. Well, not quite. She recovers her coffee.
Now it’s perfect. Castle is cuddling her in and being outside Manhattan is the best idea she could have had.

She’s too tired to think about anything that’s happened in the last couple of days, and truth to tell she doesn’t want to, especially this evening. She just wants peace, and quiet, and no demands. She snuggles in more closely, taking comfort from her large, cosy Castle, who brings his arm round her to wrap her in with just the right amount of strength. Without meaning to, or even really noticing, she emits a quiet little mew-murmur.

Next thing she knows, she’s being carried to Castle’s excessively large and comfortable bed. This time, her noise is questioning. He’s stolen her coffee cup, which is not fair.

“You fell asleep, Beckett. C’mon. Bedtime. It’s too dark to go for a walk on the beach now, and you’d only fall asleep in my exceptional hot chocolate which would be a total waste of marshmallows and cream.”

“Bed?”

“Sleep. You’ve been asleep, you’re mostly asleep now; therefore sleep in comfort.”

Beckett manages to focus on the important matters: teeth, cleaning off her make-up, and so forth, before investigating her unpacking for just long enough to find her nightwear and fall into bed. She’s asleep before she’s breathed twice.

As a result she entirely misses Castle’s strangulated reaction to her choice of nightwear. She would have been very disappointed by missing it, if only she’d known. She’d picked it specially to ensure that he’d be speechless. Though she had hoped when she selected it that he would not be tongue-tied.

Castle stares at the astonishing sight of one knocked-out Beckett in an amazingly tiny emerald-green baby-doll and matching tiny briefs which are just not quite see-through enough. Why does she have to be asleep? The universe hates him, he is sure. He covers her up in self-defence and pads softly back to the main room, to think over the evening without the immense distraction that a snuggly Beckett-Kat provides.

Much as it pains him to agree with Dr Burke, the evening could have gone massively worse than it did. Beckett’s complete shut-down doesn’t worry him half as much as a screamingly emotional fight would have done, because the shut-down meant that no irrevocable words could be said. There is, however tentatively, hope. On which note he discovers that he, too, is wrung out by – in his case – the second-hand emotions of tonight, and quietly prepares himself for bed.

It is, Castle thinks sleepily, the best bedtime present ever to be cuddling up to a sleeping Beckett in his bed and know that he needn’t rise – well, wake – early to leave, nor need she. He drapes a possessive arm over her waist and tucks his Beckett in against him and falls blissfully into dreams.

Beckett slowly surfaces to find herself half-buried under a very warm mound of Castle, who is snuffling into his pillow – oh. That’s her pillow. And her. He’s lying with one arm and one leg across her, as well as half his chest. And even in his sleep he’s clearly very happy to have her there. Possibly the final word of that thought is unnecessary. However, breathing is necessary, and she is being slowly squashed into suffocation. She shoves Castle’s sleep-sodden self and achieves enough movement to allow her lungs to expand. Then she closes her eyes again.

When she next opens them, she’s in empty space, with a warm dent where there ought to be a warm Castle. Or a hot one. She humphs, and turns her back on the space. It’s not supposed to be a space.
It’s supposed to be a cosy Castle. Or more usefully, a concupiscent Castle. She’d packed this nightwear especially to appeal to him, and he’s not here to be appealed to. She humphs, again.

“What’s that noise for, Beckett?”

“You’re here.”

“Where else would I be?”

“You weren’t here when I woke up,” Beckett points out.

“Did you miss me, Beckett?” Castle purrs insinuatingly.

“No,” she lies, not convincingly. To cover her untruthfulness, she pushes the covers off herself. After that, Castle wouldn’t have noticed if she’d claimed that she was Elektra. He seems to have lost the power of speech. And thought. He’s staring at her so hard that the fabric ought to disintegrate. It doesn’t. This doesn’t seem to faze Castle in the slightest. On the other hand, he’s still frozen in place, which is not the plan. She stretches, which reveals the top edge of the very brief briefs, and a slash of toned stomach. Castle gulps, and then seems to recover himself.

“Pretty,” he growls. “My pretty Kat.”

And then he falls on her, devouring her mouth and pinning her under him: demanding access and receiving it; taking and raiding and plundering and then conquering. She doesn’t put up any resistance at all, welcoming him in and encouraging him to take more: to take everything. In his arms is the single place that – here in the Hamptons – she can be, and admit to being, safe; can feel – and can admit to herself – that she is loved and wanted: petted and protected and cherished.

“Mine,” she gasps out: the first time she’s ever claimed him with the same possession as he does her. This is why she wanted to be here: a place where she can be free of all the clinging restrictions of her everyday life; a place where she can open up and reveal herself. That first step now taken, maybe… maybe the next will be easier, later, when she’s more relaxed, eased by the fresh Atlantic air.

Beckett reaches up and pulls Castle down to her lips again, gripping hard into the firm muscle of his back. For a moment, he lets her, and then reasserts himself, lifting off and propping himself up on one elbow to examine Beckett with lazily predatory eyes and smile; darkness and desire bleeding into his gaze.

“I like this,” he says darkly, and strokes down over the silk-chiffon. “Very pretty. Now I know why you wouldn’t let me help pack. You didn’t want to spoil the surprise. I like surprises like this. The only question is” – he pauses, and twitches the fabric back and forth – “should I leave it on, or take it off?” He twitches it across her chest again. “What do you think?”

Thinking is not the first thing on what is left of Beckett’s mind. In fact, thinking is positively not on her mind. Castle shouldn’t be thinking either. She runs a hand over his naked chest and carries on down, which has exactly the effect that she expects. He promptly decides that the fabric can be moved, does so, and then applies an excellently practised and mobile mouth to her thoroughly receptive breasts. She squirms under it, and retaliates with some well-judged stroking of the weight in her hands, which produces stroking across her, which very shortly results in Castle’s rising above her and oh-so-slowly slipping into her and, when he’s fully home, filling her almost too full, leaning down and taking back her mouth and then his body and mouth move in time and he’s stealing the noise from her lips and she’s purloining his and then it changes to be harder, faster: his solid strength covering her softness and she cedes all else to the sensation and soars and shatters around him.
She finds herself cuddled in and happily relaxes into the soft mattress and smooth sheets. She’ll just stay here for a while. It’s warm and cosy and safe and home. Her eyes drift shut, her hand slips over Castle’s and pulls it up to lie safely over her heart, where it ought to be. She doesn’t mean to become so, but in instants she’s asleep again: all the exhaustion caused by the stress and pain of the last month catching up with her and overwhelming her.

Castle finds himself in a minor, and very pleasant, dilemma. He can continue to cosset his sleeping Beckett-beauty (and she is beautiful in anything, but the tiny little teeny-weeny baby-doll is particularly attractive) and close his eyes again; or he could give her a few moments and then go and wash and consider the options for breakfast. Her ribs are disturbingly evident, though the curves over them are still delightfully strokable. On balance, he thinks breakfast. Beckett’s grip has fallen away and her breathing has slowed to the cadence of deep sleep. He’ll leave her to it. She needs the rest.
The weather outside is frightful

Beckett wakes to the presence of the smell of coffee and the absence of Castle, who, from the tapping noises, has found inspiration. She cleans up, doesn't bother with more than a swift slick of mascara, and puts on jeans and a warm cable-knit sweater over a soft t-shirt. Then she looks around, which she hadn't really done with Castle’s bedroom last time, being far more concerned with looking (et cetera) at Castle. There appears to be a door out to the rear of the house, with some decking which must be nice in the summer, and a variety of other landscape features for which the weather is far too chilly. Pools are very nice – but only when the water temperature is a long way north of ten degrees and the air temperature above twenty. She throws on a jacket, opens the door and quietly goes out, shutting it tidily behind her so as not to disturb him.

Out leads her, after a short walk, to the beach, and the Atlantic tide. Lowish tide, she thinks, and watches for a while. She thinks it might be coming in. There’s feeble sun struggling through smudged grey clouds; the occasional smear of its light on the water; small white horses on the surface in the thin, lazy wind. She’s glad of the heavy jumper, though the wind is still cool, promising spring but not bringing it.

She carries on, down to the edge of the water on the firm, damp sand, where the waves ripple in and retreat, ripple in and retreat. She watches those for another while, counting to see if every seventh wave is bigger, as superstition would have it. If it is, she can’t tell. She’s a big city girl: heart and soul, summer trips to the Adirondacks as a child aside. She turns, and starts to walk parallel to the sea, face to the wind: it can blow her back, later. For now, she needs to move: moving helps her think, and thinking is a necessity. The gleams through the grey sky and the foam on the waves and the wind on her cheeks might ground her.

Behind her, a silhouette on the decking of the rear of his house, Castle watches the slim figure walking away. He doesn’t call out, or go after her; simply sits, warm in a thick wool coat, and watches her go. It’s up to her. It’s always up to her, and he’s expected her to seek solitude from the moment he stopped writing, found the bed empty and the door unlocked. He’ll be waiting for her, when she returns.

Beckett shies from the thought of the previous evening as does a horse from a rattlesnake, and for much the same reason: the amount of poison unleashed. She’d meant to stay calm, and cool, and find the truth, and leave. Her boots leave footprints on the sand behind her, washing out with the incoming tide, just like she’d meant to leave the memories of her father, drunk, behind her to wash out with her incoming life. Instead she’s still enmeshed in the seine net of guilt and obligation, now woven with the memories of his devastation as she’d told the truth; his tears; his stumbling speech carrying agony and apology that she couldn’t cope with, emotionally exhausted as she had already been. And so it had been left unfinished.

Her truth was laid out on the table, and her father had eaten a bitter meal from it, but she remains unfed.

She walks on, curving a little up the sand from the curling waves now lapping too close to her feet, trying to gain mental distance from the Manhattan treatment room as she has gained physical distance. It’s far more difficult to leave her thoughts and pain and memories behind her, to let the wind and waves wash them all away like her footprints; blur them, like the light mist out on the water blurring the horizon. Vanishing point, she thinks, and stops, and stares out into the horizon over Gardiners Bay. Vanishing would have been so easy – would be so easy. All she would have to do is keep travelling eastwards, always eastwards, into the morning sun. Or take the weekend, one last opportunity for joy, and then go from the city to leave westward, into the setting sun.

And yet she can’t escape her past. She never has. Even now, now when she’s awoken and not distracted by Castle’s infinitely reassuring, solid, stable strength, her rage and pain still eat at her. Laying it out has merely put it in a place to be acknowledged: it hasn’t helped her work through it. She’s still trying not to own it, to believe that it will leave of its own accord. Except it won’t. It will no more leave than the vast waters leading into the Atlantic will part for her. She has to work through it.

She’s walked so far that she’s found some rocks of a size to sit on, and does, pulling her feet up and wrapping her arms around her bent knees, made small and still by the weight of care and the distance still to travel. She sits, and stares out, and tries to make sense of yesterday evening, there on the cold grey stone under a cold grey sky next to the cold grey water; lost in cold grey thoughts.

__________________________________________________________________________

Castle is not precisely worried. Not yet, anyway. More… a little perturbed. Beckett’s walk he could understand, and her need for time and solitude to clear (he hopes) her head. But it’s not that warm, and the grey skies promise at least rain, and possibly a spring storm. He goes back inside, meditatively nibbles at a Danish, puts the rest of the pastries away again, sips his coffee and wonders how long Beckett will be. A little time later, he pours more coffee, and finds a book.

A long while later, he is distracted from his book by the sound of footsteps and the opening door. He looks up to find, as expected, Beckett, who is looking rather windswept and a little damp at the edges. She stands on the mat and then shivers. Castle scowls theatrically.

“You’re cold,” he points out, and then grins. “Good excuse to light the fire.” But before he does he divests her of her coat, also slightly damp, and hugs her. “There. A little warming up while the fire gets going.” He turns away, messes with a firefighter for a moment, and shortly there are cheerful flames and a pleasant smell of burning pinewood. Heat will take a little longer.

While he’s been lighting fires, Beckett has produced more coffee and found the Danishes, some of which are now reposing on a plate in front of her, and one of which is already disappearing down her throat. She shivers again, and wraps her palms round her coffee cup. Castle, never one to miss an opportunity, cuddles her in. The cable knit is not nearly as strokable as the pretty green angora sweater, he finds.

“I needed to think,” Beckett says, bleakly. “But it didn’t help. Just the same old thoughts. Nothing new. Me upset, Dad upset, he’s hurt because I told the truth and I don’t know if he’s still lying to me. Nothing’s fixed.”

Castle hums, encouraging her to continue, without actually saying anything.

“I just wanted it all to be over. Done. Then I could put it all behind me and…” she trails off, breathes, “…and start fresh. Finally be able to try for what I wanted.” She stops again. “I hoped… I wanted to come here so we could just be us. Have time to be us. Not having everything interfering and always getting in the way because it’s all around me. Us. A chance… no cases and no Dr Burke and no-one else and no issues. But it’s still all trailing round behind me.”

Like one who on a lonesome road, Castle thinks, and carries on the quote, doth walk in fear and dread, because they know a frightful fiend doth close behind them tread.

“I thought I’d be free of it all. Free to tell you…” her voice starts to drop away, and Castle doesn’t ask her to speak up. Abruptly she hides her face in his shoulder. He doesn’t press. He thinks he knows what she wants to say, and pushing her to it really won’t help. A forced admission has no value. So he merely holds her close, everything he wants to say confined to his hand around her shoulder.

A gravelling noise on the window makes him look up, to find that the ominous clouds have brought the storm. It’s pouring and the sky is dark: it looks like the foul weather has set in for the next few hours, at least. He’d hoped for a walk, but it’s warm here, the fire is colouring the room with comfortably orange-red hues; and all in all it’s not actually the worst thing in the world to be stormbound in a warm house with Beckett and no-one else, especially when they have food, drink, and a fire. And thinking of food…

“It’s lunchtime, Beckett,” he bounces.

Beckett regards the plateful of remaining Danishes. “I only just got breakfast,” she says.

“They’ll still be there later. Or tomorrow. I’ll put them in a box. Lunch. I have a nice soup, or there’s grilled cheese” –

“We had that last time we were here.”

“So? I like grilled cheese sandwiches.”

“I didn’t say I didn’t.”

“Or both, or…” he tugs her up and tows her to the kitchen with unwarranted enthusiasm, “… let’s see what’s in the fridge. We could have a picnic in front of the fire.”

The fridge is clearly nicknamed Legion, as it contains many. Different foodstuffs, that is. This deduction is forced upon Beckett by the small fridge magnet with that name across a small demon. She is not impressed by the punning reference.

“We’ve got tomatoes, salad, fruit, cheese, crackers, quiche, pies, pate, Danishes” –

“You wouldn’t let me eat my Danishes,” Beckett points out.

Castle emerges from the fridge. “That was when I thought we were having soup and grilled cheese sandwiches. A picnic is much more fun.” He buries his head in the fridge again. “Sodas…” And out again. It’s like watching a happy jack-in-the-box. He moves to a bread bin. “Here we are. Bread. Look, baguettes!” As if she’s never seen a baguette before. And back to the fridge, again. “Butter. Better take that out or it won’t spread.” He does so.

There is now a pile of food that used to be in the fridge on the counter. Beckett looks at the potential feeding of the five thousand rather than the two who are actually here, and despairs. Then she spots a cold game pie with cranberry topping, stops despairing and starts trying to find plates and a knife to cut it with. A couple of slices of that will be just wonderful. Suddenly a picnic seems like a stunningly good idea, especially with the lashing rain hammering the windows; the frivolity just what she needs, right here, right now; the simple pleasure of a sunny carefree day reincarnated on a rug in front of a pinewood fire.

Shortly there are plates and cutlery; trays arranged with salad segregated from soda, pies parted from pate; glasses and paper napkins. It’s hugely, massively excessive for two people, and would have been excessive for twelve – and it’s wonderful. She’s warmed up by the fire, sufficiently so to remove her sweater. The food is, naturally, top quality and delicious, the atmosphere is relaxed and happy; everything combines in that delightful lightness of being that she had felt here previously. All her tension and worries drain away, unnoticed and unmourned.
Beckett is reaching for a third slice of game pie (well, they weren’t very big, she justifies, and good food should be enjoyed and savoured) when Castle taps her fingers. She growls intimidatorily, and when that fails to have any effect whatsoever and he has the temerity to trap her fingers, she tries a pout.

“Uh-uh. You won’t want your dinner.”

“Will too,” Beckett says faux-crossly, and pouts some more, deliberately sulky-adorably. She tugs hopefully to retrieve her hand and resume her assault on the pie. The sharp tang of the cranberries set against the meltingly rich meat jelly and the tender, luscious venison and duck is quite irresistible. Resistance, in Beckett’s case, is futile.

Unfortunately Castle is imposing resistance on her, which is very unfair. He won’t let go of her hand, and he’s tugging at her again, instead of her tugging at him. In fact, it’s a sharp tug which overbalances her, and somehow she’s ended up with her head in his lap looking up at a very smug grin.

“I thought we could go back to the Plaza Café, since you liked it so much. You wouldn’t want to go and then not have an appetite.”

Beckett supposes not. It doesn’t remove the full-lipped pout.

“But,” adds Castle silkily, “you could have a treat.”

“Oh?”

“Open your mouth and close your eyes and you will have a big surprise,” he singsongs childishly.

“Last time someone said that and I believed them it was medicine and I was six,” Beckett retorts.

Castle merely dangles a strawberry (where did he get strawberries from in March, Beckett wonders) above her nose and then gradually lowers it to her parting lips for her to taste. Her tongue swirls round it, and Castle’s eyes darken with intent. He leans down, and down… and Beckett swipes the strawberry into her mouth and chomps happily on it, while Castle finds that actually he doesn’t bend that far.

“No fair, Beckett. I was going to share it with you and you’ve eaten it all.”

“Not my fault you’re inflexible,” she says smugly. “I could have eaten my half if the position were reversed. Maybe you should do some yoga? I’m sure that would improve your positioning.”

Castle splutters, and then smiles slowly. “I know what would improve my positioning,” he rasps, and simply lifts Beckett up to him, kisses her soundly, and puts her back down in his lap again. She smiles up. His hand strokes around the curve of her face, fingertips delicately delineating the fine bone structure. She turns her cheek into his caress with a soft sound of contentment.

“That’s better. Let’s put everything away and then just stay here for a while. We could keep the strawberries,” Castle entices.

“Okay,” Beckett says lazily, and makes no move to sit up at all.

“That’s not helping.”

Beckett humphs and sits up. Castle acquires an expression of sheer mischief and grabs hold of her waist, stands her up and then, instead of clearing up, pulls her against him and takes suave possession of her mouth, sliding one hand over her ass and keeping her pressed very tightly against him. Smooth assertiveness is firmly on the cards. He’s exploring her mouth and Beckett happily sinks into sensuality: exploring on her own account and adding a seductive wiggle against him.

“We should clear up,” Castle murmurs.

“Mm?”

“We should.”

“Why?” Beckett wiggles more seductively. She thinks the clearing up could wait.

“Because it’s covering the rug.”

“Mm?”

“And I have every intention of snuggling up on that rug in front of the fire and spending the rest of the afternoon exploring all the lovely possibilities of a wet day in the Hamptons.” The slight emphasis on wet says it all, really.

“Such a hard choice.”

Castle flings her a scorching look, lets go in a severe hurry, and is halfway to the kitchen with a high stacked tray before Beckett has blinked. She picks up the plates, cutlery and glasses, and follows.

Two minutes later the rug is clear. The kitchen, however, looks like a bomb has hit it. Neither Castle nor Beckett care at all. They are back in the living room, with Beckett flat on her back on the rug and Castle next to her, hand in hand. There’s a peaceful, quiet interlude.

It lasts approximately a tenth of a second. Then Castle reaches over, Beckett leans up on one arm and is as swiftly pulled down on top of him. She kisses him, hard and demanding – and is swiftly dispossessed of the idea that she should be hard and demanding. Castle is very hard. And demanding, though that’s rather secondary. She melts into him, spreading across him and squirming into a perfect alignment. He’s more comfortable than the floor.

Somewhat surprisingly, matters are confined to kissing. Very hot, passionate, extensive kissing, but kissing. After a while even that ceases, and Beckett finds herself simply cuddled in with her head neatly tucked on Castle’s shoulder.

“Nice as this is, Beckett, I think we should move to the couch.”

“Uh?”

“Couch. I brought the Mission Impossibles like we agreed. The couch is more comfortable for snuggling, anyway. I think the rug is overrated. It’s not thick enough to make up for the floor.”

“I didn’t mind,” she says mischievously.

“You would’ve if you’d been the one on your back on the floor. Ow.”

Castle rolls them over and hoists himself up. Beckett casts him a speculative glance, followed up with a languorous lick of her lips. His eyes spark, but all he does is lean down and haul her up to him, to tow her to the couch. He bounces off to put the DVD in and returns with the remote.

Shortly the familiar theme music plays, the movie starts, and Castle snuggles Beckett into him. Against all his instincts, wishes and desires; and the insistent thrumming of his blood, largely concentrated below his belt, he thinks that a cuddlesome daytime not involving scorching sex would be a good idea. They need to be comfortable, not carnal; serene, not salacious.

Beckett likes Mission Impossible II as much as the original, and is soon quite engrossed. Castle, who can more or less recite it word for word, pays only a modicum of attention to the film but considerably more to all the possible ways to ease Beckett down and bring her to a place where important admissions might follow. He is dead certain of her feelings, but hearing the actual words out loud would be really nice.

The movie finishes, Ethan Hunt saves the world again, and Beckett emerges from action-movie heaven. She does not emerge from Castle’s close embrace. It’s far too cozy even to try.

“When’s dinner?” she asks.

“Seven. Car at quarter to. Why? D’you need hours to primp?”

“That’s you, Castle. Shower, make-up, dress, good to go. I can do it in twenty minutes.”

Castle half-turns and peers out the window, realising that it’s stopped raining. “Look,” he says happily. “It’s sunny now. Let’s go for that walk. Skim stones. Build sandcastles. Paddle in the surf.”

“Paddle? It’ll be freezing.”

“Okay, maybe not paddle. C’mon. Let’s go now.” He lolllops off to find outerwear.

Beckett locates boots, sweater and jacket, and swathes herself in all of them; achieving the door just as Castle does. He is carrying two buckets and spades.
“That’s not fair,” Beckett says indignantly, when they’ve gone down on to the sand and are building sandcastles under a surprisingly warm afternoon sun. She doesn’t know how Castle managed to persuade her to build sandcastles. She hasn’t built a sandcastle since she was a child on Coney Island and starting now seemed ridiculous. But somehow she is doing it, under the pressure of Castle’s best big blue puppy dog eyes and stream of burbling brainless frivolity. She has no idea why he wants to build sandcastles either, but he’d looked so hopeful that she hadn’t been able to refuse. “Your bucket’s twice as big as mine. And how come I got the girly pink one? Do I look girly?”

“No,” Castle says quickly. “But I only have two buckets, and this one’s mine. That one was Alexis’s.”

“Still not fair. You’ve got an advantage.”

“Yes,” he smirks. “I do.”

“You’re cheating.”

“No, you just didn’t think of it first and ask me to swap.” He smirks more widely.

Building sandcastles is a natural human instinct, Castle thinks, and Beckett could certainly do to be recalled to some fun activities that don’t require thought and do keep her occupied in the sunshine. She’s still a bit pale. He has, however, pulled a fast one. Beckett, being insanely competitive, had eventually agreed to a sandcastle building competition. Castle’s is currently twice the height of hers. He does, however, have a motive to win, by cheating or otherwise. The winner gets the first three toasted marshmallows, and he adores marshmallows. He knows this is very shallow. He piles up his sand as fast as he can.

He doesn’t notice Beckett sneakily digging a drainage system and moat that undermines all his work, until his beautiful sandcastle slumps into a sloppy heap.

“I win,” Beckett says happily, and then follows it up with a pious look and even more piously smug comment, “Cheating doesn’t pay, Castle.”

“I didn’t cheat. You cheated.”

“I didn’t. But even if I had you didn’t say cheating wasn’t allowed. All I did was install a moat. Every castle needs a moat, to keep it safe from raiders.”

“How appropriate.”

“Huh?”

“Clearly I should have a moat to keep me safe from raiders. Seeing how you’ve got a gun and shield, that would be you. Tell me your middle name means moat.”

“No. It doesn’t.”

“The universe has no sense of what’s fitting,” Castle grumps, and very carefully doesn’t mention that Beckett’s just tacitly agreed that she should be all his. Moats, after all, surround castles. Or Castles.

He looks at his watch and squeaks. “It’s after five! We should get back. Otherwise there won’t be time for hot chocolate and roasted marshmallows. And the fire might go out.”

“We could have the hot chocolate later,” Beckett says mischievously. “Hot chocolate and marshmallows now will spoil your dinner.”

Castle looks disgruntled at this intrusion of reality. “I suppose so,” he says, and suddenly smirks evily. “I wouldn’t like anything to spoil my chances of eating well.”

Beckett raises a very well-bred eyebrow. “Naturally,” she drawls. “Though I think you should work up an appetite.”

“Oh?”

“Catch me if you can, Castle,” and just like the last time she takes off running, at full stretch over the damp sand. This time, though, he’s prepared. He jogs after her, not exerting himself, and reaches the house a minute or two after she does. She’s sitting on the decking, tapping her fingers ostentatiously.

“Very slow,” she says.

“I have stamina,” Castle leers. “Why hurry, when long, slow exertion is just as good?”

Beckett mutters under her breath. A thin line of scarlet limns her cheekbone. Castle smiles, sleepy.

“Let’s get ready, Beckett. Wouldn’t want to be late for dinner, or too late home.” He extends a hand to her, and when she takes it tugs gently to bring her against him, shielding her from the gathering winds. She looks far better than even this morning, which itself was a vast improvement on last night: there is sparkle in her eyes and a quirk at her lips, which deserves acknowledged with a kiss. So he does, and then finds it remarkably difficult to stop. This is undoubtedly Beckett’s fault. It’s not his fault that she’s softened and curved and fallen into purring Kat-Beckett who is utterly irresistibly pettable and kissable. It’s not his fault that she’s responsive and pressing close and kissing him back. And it is definitely not his fault that he’s addicted to her. He’s blaming all known and unknown deities for that one. Or genetics. Yeah. Genetics. It’s genetics that produced Beckett. They’ll have beautiful children… what the hell? No no no. Not the plan. But a little voice in the back of his head says yes the plan, just not now.

The hard shock of the thought has had one useful outcome, he supposes. He’s stopped kissing Beckett. This is probably a good thing, since they are supposed to go out for dinner. He unlocks the door and they go in. Beckett aims straight for the bedroom and when he follows her he finds that she’s shedding outerwear, innerwear and underwear in a straight line from the bedroom door to the en-suite door which she shuts, wearing only what looked like a very tiny pair of black lacy panties, as the black lacy bra which he really wishes he’d known about hits the floor in front of it. The lock clicks over.

Castle sits down on the bed and divests himself of everything down to boxers and t-shirt, ready for his own chance at the shower. He thinks that he might have got sand in his socks, though he really doesn’t know how. He humphs sulkily to himself that Beckett has locked the door. The humph has barely finished the ph when the lock unclicks. Then the shower starts. Castle draws the obvious conclusion, smiles widely, and waits. He thinks about joining her, but that would absolutely ensure that they don’t go out for dinner.

A few moments later Beckett emerges, sleekly damp around the hair and wrapped in a towel. Well. Wrapped might be a bit of an overstatement. The towel is maybe an inch above the tips of her breasts and maybe three inches below her ass. There is an awful lot of Beckett that is not wrapped in a towel, and all of it is sashaying out of the bathroom and towards the closet. The sway as she moves is definitely studied. Castle is studying it extremely attentively, especially when Beckett bends slightly to collect something from the lower shelf.

And then she straightens up, turns round with a splash of scarlet silk in her hands, regards Castle with a sly, seductive gaze from under swept lashes accompanied by a nibble and lick of her lips, and drops the towel. Castle freezes in place. Beckett smirks.

“See something you like?” she husks.

“Oh, yes.”

“Just stay there,” Beckett orders. Castle pouts. He doesn’t want to stay there. He wants to collect his Beckett and turn her into his Kat, who rubs against him and purrs pleasurably when stroked.

Beckett stretches in a leisurely, languorous fashion all the way from head to toes, producing some rather interesting ripple effects around the level of her ribs, and then shakes out the scarlet scraps of silk to reveal them to be (as Castle had hoped and expected) some minimalist pieces of underwear, clearly purchased from the shop for sin and sexuality.

Beckett stretches out one leg, points her toes, and slowly – very slowly – inserts one foot into one of the scraps. It becomes evident that there is a small amount of lace involved, at the front. The second foot enters. Castle would very much like to enter something else, right now. The slice of scarlet proceeds, slowly, to rise up the skyscraper length of Beckett’s legs and eventually makes it to the top. By this time Castle is nearly dead with the effort of self-control, and astonishingly aroused. Beckett is now quite definitely the Kat who got the cream. She puts on her bra with a completely unnecessary amount of stretching, thrusting forward, and adjustment of the cups. Then she straightens up, and smirks. Castle does not straighten up. He can’t move.

The silk scraps, once on, are extremely classy. They are also utterly erotic. And that unbelievably sexy witch – no, not witch, succubus – is now undulating gently back to the closet. The back view is just as sexy as the front.

“I can feel the creepy staring, Castle.” Beckett’s voice entwines itself into his ears and slinks into his head. It doesn’t at all sound like she’s objecting to his focused vision. “Aren’t you going to get ready?” He is so ready it hurts. “It’ll still be there after dinner.” Not for long it won’t be. After dinner there is going to be some more than mild assertion of his feelings. She pulls out the dress. “Do the zip up for me?” He knows she can do it herself. She did last time. This is just unfair. She’s torturing him. He stands up (part of him has been standing for some time) and zips her up, being exceedingly careful not to touch her with anything more than his fingertips.

Until he changes his mind. He spins her round, hauls her against him and grinds into her. She gasps, and her fingers close on his ass, and he takes her mouth hard and deep, flattens his hand over her ass and presses her in, then whisks the skirt of that very nice red dress up to her waist so he can cup her, then stroke her through the silk, then slip under it to tease the nerves until it’s she who’s hopelessly aroused and panting and rubbing against him and then he slides fingers in and out and swallows her moan and then… stops.

“Now we’re both wound up,” he says hoarsely. “We’ll both need to wait, because there isn’t time. When we get back, though…” He dives for the shower, and turns it to cold. Beckett will have to find her own solution.

Both of them are ready, if somewhat flushed in Beckett’s case and constricted in Castle’s, when the car arrives. They sit very primly in the back, excruciatingly careful not to bump shoulders or knees. They are only one ill-judged touch away from some decidedly improper behaviour. Beckett’s fingers steal towards Castle’s, and retreat; his toward her knee, and retire. The restaurant can’t come soon enough for either of them.

Good food and good wine – Beckett starts with only half a glass – help. Being on opposite sides of the table helps more. Talking about whatever takes their fancy – politics or travel or movies or books – also helps. By the time their entrees arrive they have both conquered the urge to haul the other out back and find a handy wall. Mostly. The dark in Castle’s eyes and the sparking gold in Beckett’s are undiminished. However, the food is as good as the previous time, the desserts are excellent, and coffee cannot be neglected.

It can, however, be hurried. And it is.

In the car back, it becomes obvious to Beckett that Castle has had a short word with the driver. It was probably of the order of Every minute off the journey is ten dollars in your pocket. Fortunately, on this journey they’ve scrapped the no-touching policy and Castle has a firm arm round her shoulders which protects her from the worst of the Indy 500 racing line turns. So she wriggles into a very acceptable position which allows her to nibble mischievously at his neck and lay an elegantly long fingered hand on his thigh. He can – and she hopes he will – be assertive when they get home, but right now she wants to play. She squeezes, gently. There is an inhalation of breath, and an – er – thickening not far away. The arm around her tightens. She flexes her fingertips, and draws a wicked little pattern. This time it’s a muffled groan. Her hand moves an inch northward – and Castle’s other hand clamps over it.

“Stop,” he hisses in her ear. “No more, till we get inside.” She smirks, and tries to move her hand. Castle brings it to his lips and nibbles gently on her fingers, then turns it over and licks across her palm, then turns it back and sucks lewdly on her forefinger. His other hand has dropped down from her shoulder to flirt lazily with the top of her breast. He smirks just as wickedly as Beckett had, and proceeds to amuse himself by winding her tighter and higher till she grabs his hand and, in default of brute strength, indents the back of his hand with her nails.

When she thinks about it later, she’ll be astonished that they escaped the traffic cops or indeed alive. The driver makes it home in half the time they made it there, is amply rewarded by Castle, whose thanks are profuse but very rapid, and departs.

The door is flung open, Beckett arrives inside at speed with Castle crashing in behind her, and after that it all becomes an X-rated Fast and Furious. Her coat skids across the floor, though she doesn’t notice where it lands because by that time Castle is ravaging her mouth and hoisting up her dress and finding her already hot and wet and oh-so-ready for him and her hands have parted his belt and zip and found him hot and hard and oh-so-ready for her and then he’s pushed the silk aside and surged into her: thick and long and perfect and that fast it’s all over.

He doesn’t slide out of her, simply picks her up and she wraps legs round his waist and arms round his neck as he carries her to the bedroom. She is lifted slightly, and whimpers at his leaving her body, then is stood in front of him, when she realises the zip in the back of the dress is undone. The look in his eyes burns down every sensitised nerve and sends electricity dancing over her skin. There’s an instant’s silence, a fractional pause, while he looks, and then he reaches out and pushes the dress off her shoulders so that it pools about her strappy heels on the floor and looks her up and down again, slow appreciation of her in two scraps of scarlet silk and black stiletto heels, the lower scrap soaked, the upper doing nothing at all to disguise the proud jut of her nipples and then emphasising the lush curves of cream skin. Flaming scarlet silk, lace fronted panties; lace as the upper half of the cups of the bra. Nearly but not quite revealing, and utterly erotic.

Castle unbuttons his shirt and lets it slide to the floor, following it with his dress pants. Beckett’s hot gaze slithers over him as he does, and he grows and hardens again. He simply reaches out and takes possession of her once more, forcefully assertive as he owns her mouth, smoothly so as he presses into her, definitive as he walks her to the bed and lowers her on to it, gazing hotly at his Kat in his bed in his home. It means more, somehow, because she can’t come to the loft – yet, that has to be yet – and so this is the only time and place that he can feel that she’s in his home.

He sits down by her, spreading his hand out over her middle, his thumb flirting at the underside of her breast, his little finger teasing at the edge of her panties. She reaches up to pull him down, and finds that Castle is not inclined to be pulled. Instead he leans down slowly, bypasses her parted lips and licks delicately along the shell of her ear, finishing with a soft nip and a slide over the nerve to make her squirm.

“Let me,” he whispers insinuatingly into her ear. “I know what you like. I’ll lead now. No need for you to decide. I’ll give you everything you need. Everything you want. Just us, Kat. Just you and me and nothing else.”

She sighs contentedly and completely relaxes, tacit consent to wherever he will take her. He’ll do it right: he always has, right from the very first kiss months ago, perfectly and instinctively attuned to her desires and her body, and here, outside Manhattan and inside a peaceful Castle-bubble, she can finally stand down and be part of a them. Kat who doesn’t need to hold anybody up at all, but who can rely on Castle to hold her up when she needs to stand down. Her hands soften on his shoulders, touching but no longer tugging, waiting for him to begin.

Begin he does, flicking over the nerve by her ear some more, trailing deliciously over the sharp line of her jaw, kissing her deeply but not for long enough, and she mews a little crossly as he leaves her mouth and nibbles gently over each clavicle and works his way into the valley of her cleavage. Once there, he seems to have stopped to enjoy the scenery. A wolfish, predatory expression has crept into his eyes as he sits up, replaces her in the centre of the gigantic bed, and unbuckles each thin ankle strap of the high-heel black shoes she’s still wearing, dropping them carelessly over the edge of the bed.

“Gorgeous,” he growls, “but let’s not literally tear up the sheets.” He kisses each ankle, careful not to tickle her, places each back down more widely and looms over her to place himself between her legs, his face below her chin, and shifts to return to his brief contemplation of the landscape, leaning on his elbows either side of her. “Mmm,” he hums deeply, and flicks out his tongue to taste. He slides the fabric of the bra across her taut nipples and swollen breasts, and she gasps and writhes under the delightful friction. He carries on, winding her higher, changing gasp to moan only by his playing with the fabric: he leans left, licks and sucks wetly for a moment; repeats to the right; drags the damp fabric across her and has to wriggle a little lower so that he can lower a little weight to keep her under his mouth and fingers.

His hands sneak beneath her (he thinks of his hands under her under him) to unclasp her bra: he doesn’t need it in the way now, and slips it from her so that he has unhindered access to roll and tease and play: tiny pinches that don’t hurt but send her upward; kisses and then hard suction, nips soothed by tantalising tongue; never letting her come down and he knows it won’t take much, wants her sky high and screaming and shattering all because of, all for, him. He touches more firmly, slides one hand down between them and twitches the soaked silk between her legs across her and that’s it: she screams out his name and shatters for him.
Life is life

Castle takes full advantage of Kat’s blissed out state to wriggle down a little further and lay his head on her stomach without putting much weight on her. When she’s ready, they’ll play some more: everything he wants to do with her and to her and for her; to be everything she needs, here and everywhere else, always and forever and ever. When he can get her out of Manhattan (he shivers at how close she came to cutting him off, lost in her own insecurity and pain and pushing everyone away) she’s so different: playful and sparky and wholly adorable; her heart in her eyes even if it’s not (yet) on her tongue.

He feels a hand smoothing through his hair, lazily, as if it can’t help itself, twining slowly. It’s soothing, this petting, and he understands suddenly why it works on Beckett, or Kat, so very often. He emits a deep, contented rumble, and stretches a hand above his head to meet hers. He misses her hand, but finds a pleasantly soft curve and point instead, which is fair trade, and essays some petting of his own, not particularly trying to arouse, yet. Her hands become more intent, more purposeful, and skate around the jut of his jaw, trying to reach further down. She can’t move far with him blocking her, and if she’s ready for more he is definitely so. He stops playing with her breast and strokes down her side to her hip, lifts his head and slips further down, trailing his mouth across her navel, stopping at the lace panel of the panties.

“I know you like this,” he purrs darkly, vibrating the lace. “Don’t you?”

“Mmmm. Kiss me, Castle.”

“Soon,” he promises. “Soon, Kat.” Before he tastes, he intends to touch. He settles into a more comfortable position and lets his fingers loose: feather light strokes on the satin skin of her inner thigh, smooth pale cream against the scarlet silk. As he had with the bra, he slides the fabric across her, and then lengthwise to press and pull on the knot of nerves, and she writhes, already wet again and making occasional soft moans and whimpers of desire and need. His finger slips beneath the material, stroking through hot slick folds and playing teasingly at her entrance, a little in, a little out: one finger, two; never deep enough or full enough for his Kat who’s pleading for more, harder, more please Castle more and twisting to bring him to her desire, but this is his game, this time: she can have her way later or tomorrow or another day, but now he’s going to hold her on the edge of ecstasy until he’s had his fill of showing her stars.

His fingers stroke harder, and then he lifts her slightly and peels away the panties, all the way down her legs and then parts her again and strokes some more: dipping in and feeling the muscles flutter and twitch; sliding to the nerve endings and she’s bucking and twisting: her hands in his hair, and then he finally leans in, breathes over her to tease, and puts his mouth on her and she cries out wordlessly, losing speech. He has to hold her hips still to carry on, and takes her with his tongue and then withdraws to lick firmly straight along her, end to end and she screams, bucks and writhes and tries to escape the exquisite torture of absolute ecstasy, but he won’t let that happen, takes her again and again until the pre-orgasmic flutter is constant and at last he stops, surges up and thrusts into her open, willing, desperate body; seats himself fully, wrapped in her tight heat and then withdraws, thrusts; withdraws, thrusts; takes her mouth with his without a pause and it’s all about possession then: she just has to be his; he already is hers, like it or not; and he thrusts harder, faster and she comes screaming as he groans out her name and collapses atop her, rolling over and taking her with him to hold her close and keep her.

“Mine,” he murmurs into her hair. “Whatever happens, mine.” She makes a soft mew-murmur of assent and snuggles into his shoulder, a leg flung over his, an arm over his chest, idly sketching fence-posts on his shoulder. He turns the lights off, starlight from the clear night, drifting through the window, the only illumination. Here in the covering, concealing darkness she might speak plainly. Sometimes, darkness can reveal secrets, not hide them.

“Whatever happens?” she questions.

“Whatever it is.” He listens carefully to the quality of her silence and the intonation of her breathing. “What’s wrong?”

“Noth… everything. Nothing’s fixed and I still can’t face your family. Out here it’s good: it’s like there’s no-one else. No drunk father, no loving daughter; just an island. Every time I think about doing this in Manhattan, going to your loft, I just can’t see it. I spook.” Self-contempt colours the words. “Worst thing is, I know why, now. Dr Burke” – the name is bitten out – “explained it all. But understanding it doesn’t mean I’ve got over it. I thought by the time we got here I’d be able to make it work but it doesn’t matter what I understand, I can’t feel anything but stupid pathetic envy and what’s the point of being in love with you if I can’t even face your family?’

She only realises what she’s admitted when Castle gasps and his arm clamps tightly round her. By that time it’s far too late to escape.

“Plenty of point, Kat. Plenty. See, being in love lets me say I can wait as long as it takes, till you’re ready. You’re still trying. You faced your father. I’m here for you. That’s all we need, for now.” He stops. “Love’s all we need.”

A damp patch spreads on his chest. He holds her, deep in the covering night, and blinks the dampness in his own eyes away. After tonight, anything has become possible. “Come here, sweetheart,” falls out his mouth, and he pulls her up so that he can kiss her: first the top of her head and then, raising her further, her forehead, and then her lips, gently and sweetly. And then he simply cuddles her until the silent tears dry.

“I need a shower,” she says eventually, tiredness lining each short word.

She rolls off Castle and sits up, slowly, not really making it to straightened up. Castle crawls over to unfold beside her, and looks down at their collective toes in the moonlight. He wiggles his, and nudges hers.

“C’mon. Let’s go shower. Will you wash my back?”

Kat yawns. “Yeah,” she says, “if you wash mine.”

“Sure. But no funny stuff. You wore me out.”

“Kay,” she yawns again. “Me too.” She pauses, and then seems to realise that she’s on the wrong end of the snark-score. “No funny stuff from you, either. Shower only.”

“You’re about to fall asleep in the shower. C’mon.”

The shower is short and involves only washing. The sheets are changed swiftly, the two of them working in tandem. Beckett then collapses into them, pulls the comforter over her, closes her eyes, and from the change in her breathing is asleep before Castle has really tucked his toes in. He lies there, staring into the night, and hugging close the warm new knowledge that Beckett-Kate-Kat loves him. Shortly, he turns over, spoons into her, and hugs both Kat and knowledge to his overflowing heart.
Beckett wakes cosily cuddled, snuggled against the wide warm wall of Castle’s chest, and doesn’t see the point of moving anywhere. She’s also still completely naked. She closes her eyes again, and dozes, feeling safe, and secure, and loved. Coming here had been the right thing to do. Absolutely the right thing. Doze swiftly turns to deep sleep.

Castle wakes a little after, and leaves himself and his arm exactly where they are, curled around Beckett, who is curled like a cat into him. She’s completely naked, which is excellent, and deeply asleep, which isn’t. But – but she loves him, and she said so. Coming here had been absolutely the right thing to do. He closes his eyes again, and dozes lightly, never quite losing awareness of Beckett tucked beside him.

After another stretch of time, in which it has become clear that Beckett is not going to wake any time soon, Castle succumbs to the nagging of his body, pads to the bathroom, and then, wrapped in a dark blue robe, to the kitchen. He sets the percolator to make his favourite brew of coffee, and inhales the aroma. He needs to do some thinking. Beckett undoubtedly does too, but that’s a different matter.

Thought one: Admissions have been made that can’t be unsaid, and the greatest of these is love, he thinks, not whimsically at all. They – that mysterious, tangled, intertwined mess that is now a they – are good. Better than good.

Thought two: against that is the problem of Jim, and Beckett’s still-unmended bitterness and guilt. There’s a long road still ahead there.

Thought three: Manhattan beckons, late tonight. In Manhattan, that crushing emotional claustrophobia sets in, and all issues reassert themselves. They can’t stay up here: the weekend was fine but he has other responsibilities.

Thought four: well, that comes full circle round to thought one. Love conquers all. Knowing what he knows, they can get through this, with care, and attention.

He wanders back into the bedroom and into bed, swiping his laptop on the way and only just not spilling his refilled coffee. He becomes aware that his bare feet are cold, and the sheets are very likely warm, and that the bed, and in particular the bed full of Beckett, who is still curled up on her side far into the arms of Morpheus, is a far better place to be on a bright but chill early March morning. He studies her dark hair spread out over the pillows, her hand half-hidden beneath her chin, her dark lashes sweeping her cheeks and the slight curve of her full lips: a tiny hint of a smile. Happy dreams, maybe: she deserves some of those. Inspired by the sight of her relaxed, he begins to tap quietly over his keyboard, and soon his neglected coffee is cold.

He’s disturbed from free-flowing inspiration by a half-stretch and movement beside him, which, it transpires, is Beckett turning over and murmuring you’re here, as she had done before; reaching out for him and finding him there. Since Castle is sitting up, propped against the headboard, what her grasping hands find is his legs. Specifically, his upper thigh.

Beckett’s eyes peel open, still hazy with sleep and somewhat confused.

“Why’re you up there,” she slurs. “C’m back down here.”

Castle puts his laptop safely out the way, ensures he can’t knock over the coffee, and complies. Beckett wriggles over him.

“S better,” she says, and closes her eyes, hugging him close and – really? – breathing him in. He wraps his arms round her and enjoys the affection. He also very much enjoys naked Beckett draped over him, and from the slight wiggle that has just taken place, she’s noticed and is not objecting.
Very much not objecting. In fact – oh oh oh – it seems that sleepiness is now sexiness and she is on a route southward – oohhhh – which involves detailed attention to his nipples, his navel, and now… ohhhhhh her mouth is hot and wet and her tongue flicking and the suction and he’s utterly helpless when she does that to him and his hands are fisted in her hair but there’s only one person in control here and it surely is not him. He surrenders to her glorious mouth and comes hard.

Kat wriggles back up his body with an I drank the cream feline smile and sprawls back across his heaving chest. “Mmmm,” she hums, and licks her lips. Castle will deal with that self-satisfied smile. He will. Just as soon as he’s recovered from her actions. For now, he’s going to hold on to her. Post-coital snuggling is very important.

“What now?” Kat purrs. “You’re awake.”

“I’ve been awake for ages. It’s you who’s been fast asleep. I did write half a chapter, though. Your sleeping was very inspiring.” Purr shifts to semi-growl. Castle doesn’t like the growl, and whilst parts of him will still need a little recovery time, there is absolutely nothing wrong with his hands. He strokes all the way down Kat’s back, over her beautiful ass, and then wanders further to stroke between her legs, where he finds that she’s already wet and ready for his touch. Touch he does, dancing fingers and then firmer strokes, tiny circles and then gentle pinches, slow and sure and searchingly assertive: stating his intent through his hands until he’s ready to replace fingers with hard length and oh-so-slowly taking her; not rolling them, leaving her atop him and she sits up, her breasts proud for him to taste and palm and lavish caresses upon. This will not be hard and fast, primal and primitive and possessive: this will be slow, and sensual, and loving.

So it is. He brings her down to kiss her deeply: giving and taking, and gradually they fall into harmonised rhythm and then to stronger, harder motion and then nothing is left but them and the movement and the glory.

Quite a lot later they’re sitting out on the decking under a surprisingly warm March sun, eating the remains of the Danishes and drinking Castle’s excellent coffee. Beckett licks her fingers clean, at which Castle’s eyes flare hotly, wipes them on her jeans, and then lays her hand over his and intertwines their fingers.

“I wish we could stay here,” she says pensively. “Just until everything was cleared up. It’s all so much easier, here.” She looks uncertain. “There’s still so much to work through.” Her voice falls away, quiet and tired and fading. “I know why I’m doing it, but why do you? I get mad when I’m scared and all of this scares me. My dad, your family, everything. Everyone wants something, and that’s scary too.”

Castle untwines his fingers, turns his hand up under Beckett’s, and re-clasps hers. He doesn’t say anything, but actively projects a confidential, talk-to-me atmosphere.

“Even you and O’Leary seemed to want something. Do it this way. See the truth we see. Change your mind. Listen to us.” Her hand clenches. “All of you. No-one’s happy with just me.” She stops. “Not even me.”

Castle replaces one hand with the other, and curls the freed arm around her consolingly. He still doesn’t say anything.

“I thought that Friday would be the end. Instead Dad’s still crying that I’m all he’s got and I don’t know what to believe. It’s not even my word against his. It’s his word against his, and how am I meant to find out what’s true then? He doesn’t even know. He doesn’t remember any of it, he only remembers when he was sober, and now he says I misunderstood that too. He never meant that we weren’t a family.”
Castle can hear the agony clawing through her controlled voice. Tears are not far away, he thinks; the promise of pain potent.

“Maybe he didn’t. But maybe he did and he’s just screwing with my head now. I looked it all up, you know. After you and O’Leary forced me to see. How can I trust anything he says? He might mean it, but he might just be trying to get me back to being his patsy. How do I know?”

“You don’t,” Castle says, soothingly, “and that’s okay. You need time. Never mind your dad, he’s got other people to talk to if he needs to. You need time to think through what you want to think about. You’ve got Dr Burke to talk to” –

“I don’t like him,” she says crossly.

“Nor do I, but every time I have to talk to him he seems to talk sense. Anyway, you’ve got him to talk to, O’Leary to drink with – he won’t be pushing you, he just doesn’t want you hurt any more. He’s still your best pal.

“No, he’s not,” Beckett mutters.

“Uh? He is. Don’t push him away.”

“He’s not. You are,” emerges in a deeply embarrassed flush of crimson and indistinct mumble.

“Different,” Castle murmurs. “I’m…” he-swallows “…your lover. He’s your friend.”

“You’re my best friend,” she insists.

Castle leaves it. “Anyway, you need time. It’s all come to a head now, and it’s up to you how long you take and what you do. It’s nobody else’s decision.”

She’s silent for a long while, clutching his hand.

“C’mon, Beckett,” Castle says eventually. “Let’s go for a walk along the beach. Blow the cobwebs away.” She quirks an eyebrow. “Then we’ll come back and have hot chocolate.”

“Okay,” she says.

Castle fetches jackets and reappears, politely holding Beckett’s for her to slip into and then donning his own. The wisdom of jackets becomes evident as they move down on to the beach, where the wind is much more noticeable than the sheltered nook at the back of Castle’s house. Beckett shivers slightly, and is instantly wrapped into Castle’s broad frame. It doesn’t really stop the wind, but she appreciates the care he’s giving her. She winds her arm around his waist in return. The fresh air and smell of ozone help, surprisingly. She’s here, she doesn’t need to think about anything, she only needs to relax and stand down, safe with Castle, who she loves, who loves her; and both of them said it. She said it.

Her mind wanders, far away from her feet crunching on the damp sand, to last night, a place where she’d been brave enough to say the truth; brave enough to say what she really feels. She holds Castle tighter. But love… is love enough? It’s why she started, but Dr Burke’s methods have stripped her raw and right now she feels that she’s as far from her goal as she ever was, love or no love.

“What if I never manage it?” she says.

“You will manage it.” Castle’s tone doesn’t admit disagreement. That’s a tone Beckett normally hears from her own mouth. “When have you ever not managed something you set your mind to?”
“Couldn’t save my dad,” comes bitterly.

“Not the same. You couldn’t control that. Now, answer the question. When have you ever not managed something you really set your mind to? Something you really wanted, that you could control?”

“Never,” she eventually admits.

“Thought so,” Castle says smugly. “So why break the habit now?”

He leaves that hanging, and smoothly turns them round. “I’m cold,” he says. “Let’s go home and have hot chocolate.”
I'm still standing

Hot chocolate does not take long. Lighting the fire to toast the marshmallows takes a little longer, but shortly they’re both ensconced in front of the fire with the large bag of marshmallows, the toasting forks, and nothing much else. Beckett is lying on her stomach idly twirling her marshmallow and kicking her feet; Castle has his elbows on his knees and is practically twitching with impatience for his treat to be ready. As soon as it’s turned even faintly coloured he’s pulling his fork back and snatching it off the end.

He pops the marshmallow into his mouth with a look of blissful happiness and then squeaks in pain and fans his tongue.

“Was it hot, Castle?” Beckett says evilly, twirling hers round to even up the toasting.

“Ow ow ow,” he whines. “Hurts.”

“Awwww, poor baby,” she drawls, very unsympathetically, and twirls her perfectly roasted marshmallow out of the fire, letting it cool before sliding it into her mouth.

“You should kiss it better, not be mean to me.”

“I’m not being mean. Mean would be stealing your marshmallows.” Her fingers steal closer to the bag.

Castle’s hand arrives on her back, progresses to her side, and (having checked her drink was out the way on the hearth) rolls her over.

“Uh?” Beckett emits indignantly. “What’re you doing?”

Castle has unfolded, and is looming over her. “Asserting myself,” he says suavely, and leans down very slowly and kisses her thoroughly. “There will be no stealing of marshmallows here, Detective Beckett. Theft will be regarded very severely.” He kisses her again, and imprisons her hands within his, beside her head. She laughs up at him, entirely uncowed by his fake severity. This is probably because it would take her a mere thousandth of a second to have him crying uncle and totally incapacitated. He’s seen her sparring.

“I’m not stealing anything. You offered me the marshmallows and I accepted.”

“You had designs on the bag. It was clear that you were planning a major heist.”

He kisses her again, deeply, and then rolls away, swipes the marshmallow bag and stabs three on to his toasting fork.

“Hey!” Beckett squawks. “Leave some for me.” She sits up and starts searching for the bag. Castle protects it. Beckett scoots past him and tries to recover it, and then casts Castle a scathing glance as he holds it above his head. “I’m not falling for that trick twice,” she says.

“You already did,” Castle smirks, drops the bag, (marshmallows scatter everywhere) and grabs her. “Gotcha, Beckett,” and he hauls her into his lap and kisses her again, much harder and more possessively, his hand in her hair to hold her in place. Eventually he lifts off. “That’s better. You belong here,” he says, provocatively. “Right here with me.”

Beckett opens her mouth. Castle kisses it again. “My Kat,” he murmurs into her mouth. “You know, real cats never do anything they don’t want to. They go their own way, and can’t be driven. I always wanted a cat, but Mother wouldn’t let me have one. So unfair. But there are always cats in theatres – they’re all called Gus, after Eliot’s theatre cat whose name was really Asparagus, but that’s such a fuss” –

“Is there a point to this, Castle, or are you about to break into song?”

He pouts.

“Cats – or indeed Kats” – the revised spelling is audible – “shouldn’t be herded. It doesn’t work.
They should be enticed. Cosseted. Persuaded.” His voice moves to a deep, gravelled growl. “Petted and stroked.”

His words hold her more tightly than his arms. She curves in, turning her face up to him, and he accepts her open invitation and brushes lips across hers.

The romantic moment is shattered by the growling of his stomach, swiftly joined by an answering complaint from Beckett’s.

“And fed,” she points out. “I’m hungry. Can we get another picnic?”

“Sure.”

So that’s what they do. This time, though, it’s preceded by finding the marshmallows and post-scripted by roasting them, with a considerable quantity of lusciously creamy hot chocolate and (since there will have to be driving) no alcohol. This time, too, they take the time to tidy up, although Castle assures Beckett that the excellent Joe will deal with the usual cleaning service.

After lunch, the mood is more pensive than romantic. Beckett, snuggled into Castle, is thinking, again. It takes a few minutes for her to emerge from thought.

“What do I do about Dad?” she asks miserably. “How do I know if he’s telling the truth, or messing me up?”

Castle finds himself in a dilemma. He’s pretty sure that Jim is absolutely telling the truth about his love for his daughter, but it is possible that Jim is simply a really excellent liar. However, he has a thought.

“Um…” he says hesitantly, “there might be… well…”

