Summary

Self-Insert. Gregor Clegane was one of the worst people to have ever existed. But what if someone else lived his life? What if a modern person of sound mind and honorable character was reborn as The Mountain? How would his rational and reasonable mind impact the ultimate outcome of Westeros? He just might be able to change the world for the better... Feedback is appreciated.

Notes

Disclaimer: I do not own A Song of Ice and Fire or Game of Thrones. I am aware that George R. R. Martin himself is an avid opponent of all types of fanfiction, but that does not discourage me in any way whatsoever. Besides, he's the one who feels the need to address a "what if" scenario in literally every chapter of his books. So at least some of the blame for all the ASoIaF and GoT fanfiction must be placed on his shoulders!

Plot: A young American federal agent is killed in the line of duty. He is reborn into his favorite fantasy world... as one of its most feared, most hated, and most notorious characters. He quickly discovers that he can make that work to his favor, and to the favor of many others.

Note: These first few chapters will go by very quickly. Say, the first ten or eleven chapters will take place between the prologue in "A Game of Thrones." After that, the story will begin to follow some of the events in the beginning of the first book, but many things will happen differently or be avoided altogether.
Renewal

He did not know what went wrong.

One moment, he and his partner had cornered the suspect into a one-way alley. The next, the sound of a gunshot filled the air. After that, all he felt was a rush of pain in his back. He had dropped his gun and collapsed onto his chest.

He vaguely registered the image of his partner turning around and firing at the source of the first shot. A shout of anguish was heard as the assailant crumpled lifelessly to the ground.

After securing the first suspect, his partner rushed to his side. He just barely discerned the words "Oh, God…"

He did not know how badly he had been wounded, but evidently, it was bad. Really bad.

His partner contacted HQ and hastily reported "This is Special Agent Vincent Moreno. We have an agent down. Repeat, agent down!"

After giving their location, his partner turned him onto his stomach. He supported him gently and beseeched him "Come on, Greg! Stay with me!"

Greg. That was his name. Special Agent Gregory Welch of the Central Intelligence Agency. That had been his job for the last five years. He and Vincent had been working together for two months. This was their first major case together. It would also be their last.

Greg struggled to respond via speech or movement to Vincent, but he found himself unable to do much of anything at that moment. He could not even catch his breath.

His senses gradually began to fade. All he could make out was a strange humming noise that blocked out all other sounds. Then, his vision became impaired. Everything around him seemed to get brighter and brighter. It was as though he was staring directly at a quasar.

Suddenly, all the pain vanished. It was replaced by a very peculiar sensation. Gregory felt as though he was immersed in liquid, yet he was not drowning. He also felt as though he was encased in an odd container, and its only opening was the bright light in front of him.

He had a strange inclination to rush towards that light. Alas, he found himself unable to move. However, that did not keep him within the container. Somehow, he was moving, anyway. He felt as though he was being propelled towards the light by some unseen, unexplained force. Progress was very gradual, but it was consistent.

Finally, he reached the light and exited the container. Upon his departure, he noticed he had been holding his breath. He let out a sharp gasp to take in some oxygen, and an ear-piercing wail emerged from his lips.

He abruptly felt large hands take ahold of him, and he was lifted into the air. There was a momentary lapse of pain on his navel – or where his navel should have been. But it quickly faded away.

He soon realized he was naked. Luckily, he did not stay that way. He was swiftly wrapped up in a blanket by the hands that had picked him up. Once he was securely wrapped up, he heard a feminine voice announce "You have a son, milord."
He was then transferred to another pair of hands. That brought him face-to-face with a middle-aged man. The man was tall, strapping, and gruff, but he held a warm countenance. He appeared to be bristling with pride.

"Hello, my boy," the man said happily.

Apparently, he was a baby. That alone was remarkable. But the fact that he was aware of it… that was rather unique. Was he supposed to remember this? If not, somebody had some explaining to do.

As his new father held him, he took note of his surroundings. There were three other people in the room. One of them was a young woman lying on a bed. Obviously his new mother. Another man and another woman were tending to her. The woman must have been the midwife. The man may have been a doctor, but since when did doctors dress in black and wear large chains around their necks?

"He's quite a large babe," the father remarked.

"You need not tell me that, Husband," the mother mumbled. She was clearly exhausted.

The father looked to the man with the large chain, as though he was expecting some news from him. The man grinned and proclaimed "Your wife is doing well, milord."

The father nodded and declared "Ryna, Maester Velix, you may go."

He assumed Ryna was the midwife. So Maester Velix had to be the man with the chain. Odd first name, that one. Then again, maybe it was a title. But had had never known anyone who had such a title. At least not in real life.

"Yes, milord," Velix said obediently. He and Ryna took a bow and left the room. The father carried his son over to the bed and sat down next to his wife. She moved closer to her husband and smiled down at their newborn child.

"Welcome to the family, little one," the mother cooed softly.

Greg had never believed in reincarnation. Then again, he had never been a strong opponent of it, either. He had admitted that reincarnation may have been possible, but he never would have thought he would experience it firsthand.

However, he soon realized this was something even bigger than reincarnation.

His mother turned his father and asked "Have you decided on a name, my love?"

"Yes," his father replied, still gazing down at his son, "He shall be Gregor. Gregor of House Clegane."

The fact that he had almost the same first name in this life would have been bizarre enough. But when he heard his new last name… he was downright flabbergasted.

He knew that name, Gregor Clegane. It was one of the most universally despised names in the whole of the fantasy genre. It belonged to a man… who was more a monster in human skin.

This particular man was from Greg’s favorite fantasy franchise. It had started as a book series, but it had been made into a TV show, as well. He had read all the novels and seen all the episodes respectively. There were so many characters that it was nearly impossible to keep track of them all.
But Gregor Clegane was unforgettable. For all the wrong reasons.

Greg was beyond stunned. This had to be a dream. A very long, very graphic, highly realistic dream, but a dream nonetheless. He must have gone into a coma after he was shot. This was just a fantasy he was going through until he recovered.

That was what he told himself at first. As time went on, he began to feel less and less sure of that. Before too long, he decided that even if this was a dream, he may as well see how it played out.

Life as a newborn and infant was far from eventful and glamorous. The soiling, the messes, the feedings, the teething, the endless cajoling, the feeling of total helplessness… it was no wonder the human mind was not supposed to form memories until the age of three. Nothing that occurred before his third name day was something he had any desire to remember.

Fortunately, Greg (or Gregor, he supposed) was asleep for around half of that time. So he was spared a number of degrading experiences.

His third day came around soon enough. Once it did, things started to improve. His mother and father began to treat him with a little more dignity. So did his father's soldiers and servants. Even at that age, they showed proper respect to his independence and his authority. He began to believe that he might actually be able to get by in this world.

Nothing very notable happened over the next twelve months. However, a little over a year later, his mother got with child again. Gregor was elated when his parents gave him that news. They assumed it was because he was looking forward to being a brother. Unbeknownst to them, the true reason for his joy was because he knew what – or rather who – was coming.

A few months after his fifth name day, Gregor became an older sibling. His little brother, Sandor, was born after a lengthy labor. Gregor was not allowed to witness the birthing process. But as soon as his mother's screams were replaced by a babe's wails, his father let him into the room.

Even as a babe, Sandor Clegane was large. Not as large as Gregor himself had been, but large all the same. Gregor noted that their father stood taller than any other man at Clegane's Keep. He had long ago come to the conclusion that all the members – or at least the men – of House Clegane were inherently big-boned.

Ryna and Maester Velix assisted with this birth, as well. They were soon dismissed by Gregor's father, but Gregor was allowed to stay with his parents and his newborn brother.

He gave his parents a few moments to fawn over their second child. After that, he asked their permission to hold Sandor. Even at the age of five, Gregor was abnormally big. His parents had no reason to worry that Sandor would be too heavy for his brother or that he would drop him.

Gregor's parents beckoned him over to the bed. After he was seated between them, his mother carefully placed Sandor in his arms.

Gregor held his brother tenderly. He could not imagine the original Gregor Clegane ever doing such a thing. Nevertheless, he had an even harder time fathoming a reason why Gregor had so deliberately and cruelly harmed this boy. He vowed on that spot that he would never do such a thing to Sandor.

He stayed true to that vow. He played an active role in Sandor's upbringing. His mother was delighted by her elder boy's willingness to help with her younger's rearing.

Although he spent a fair amount of time with his mother and brother, he spent just as much time in the training yard with his father. He spent many hours each day watching the master-at-arms drill the soldiers of Clegane's Keep at various exercises and combat techniques. But he only observed from afar whilst he was young. The moment he was deemed mature enough to wield a sword, he joined his father and his father's guards in the training yard.

By the time he was eight name days old, Gregor was convinced that this was not a dream, a hallucination, a fantasy, or any other figment of his imagination. There was no point in denying it any longer. Somehow, he really was in Westeros, and he would not be leaving it anytime soon.

Before he knew it, Gregor reached his eleventh name day. But at a glance, one would think it was his fifteenth. All his time in the training yard – as well as his 'Clegane genetics,' as he called them – really paid off. He was over five feet tall, and his arms, legs, and chest were bound with muscle. People were already starting to refer to him as "The Mountain."

Still, Gregor had been dreading his eleventh name day. After all, that year coincided with one of Sandor's most traumatic life experiences. The moment he received that toy knight from that travelling merchant, he knew it was coming.

Naturally, Gregor was not going to burn his little brother. Even so, he was not going to avoid that encounter altogether. While the experience had been one of the worst moments of Sandor's life, it had left him with a very somber and advanced viewpoint of the world. That mindset was one of the things that kept Sandor alive where so many others had fallen. Gregor wanted him to have that mindset, but he wished to spare him the physical scar that would have accompanied it.

One day after training with his father, Gregor headed up to his bedchamber. There he found Sandor playing with his toy knight. He was so mesmerized with the toy that he did not even notice Gregor entering the room.

Feeling a little devious, Gregor crept up on his little brother and shouted "Boo!"

Sandor jumped in alarm and turned around. Gregor could not help but chuckle at the expression on his brother's face.

As for Sandor, he looked horrified. But not because his brother had snuck up on him. He dropped the toy knight, backed away, and told him uneasily "Gregor, I… I was just borrowing it. I was going to take it, I swear! I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry!"

Gregor held up his hand, knelt next to his brother, and told him in assurance "It's alright, Sandor. I'm not mad you took the toy. I don't really care about that stupid thing. If you want it, it is yours."

"Really?" Sandor asked, looking both relieved and joyful.

"Of course," Gregor stated. He picked the toy knight up and handed it out to the younger Clegane boy. As Sandor received it in his hands, his older brother stated "But Sandor, next time, I would prefer it if you ask me first."

"I will," Sandor insisted, "I promise I won't ever take anything that doesn't belong to me."

"Oh, you don't have to promise that much," Gregor debated with a smirk, "Just don't take anything that belongs to a friend or family member. Or anything you couldn't get away with taking. Only take that which no one would miss."

Sandor looked confused. "Are you asking me to steal, Gregor?"

"No, I am not telling you to be a thief," Gregor simplified, "It's a hostile world we live in, little brother. One might call it 'survival of the fittest.' We're from a small House. We have the means to seize power, but we need the strength to hold onto it."

"How do we do that?" Sandor asked in interest.

"It will not be easy," Gregor contended, "There are few people we can call our friends. There are even fewer we can trust. Anyone – I mean, anyone – could turn against us at any time. We must choose our allies and our goals with care. Otherwise, we will fall."

Sandor absorbed his brothers' words. He looked off to the side and muttered "You're... you're scaring me, Gregor. Do you mean we'll never be safe? Everyone might be an enemy?"

"Not everyone," Gregor proclaimed. He knelt down, turned his brother's eyes towards his own, and told him "Even if every other person in the world turns against you, I never will. No matter how bad things get, you can count on me to stay by your side. I'll be there for you, Sandor."

That seemed to put the younger boy's mind at ease. He smiled at his brother and stepped forward to embrace him. Gregor happily returned the gesture. He was very pleased with himself. He had gotten Sandor to learn the truth about the harshness of reality, and he had learned that lesson without suffering a deformation.
The Inevitable

A few days later, Gregor's mother informed him, Sandor, and their father that she was with child again. Initially, Gregor was surprised. Then he remembered; in the first book, there was a chapter that mentioned that the Clegane brothers had a sister. So this must have been her.

From what Gregor recalled, the sister had died under "mysterious" circumstances. Just as his father had died turning a hunt "accident." Come to think of it, a number of servants and residents of Clegane's Keep vanished "suspiciously" during the original Gregor's tenure. He was not about to let those rumors take root. As long as he was around, even the dogs in the Keep would all remain accounted for.

While Gregor's greatest strengths involved a sword and a suit of armor, he had not spent all of his childhood in the training yard. Often, he took private lessons with Maester Velix. He had a bit of an innate desire to learn anything that could be useful. Perhaps that was a trait that had lingered from his previous life. The original Gregor Clegane certainly never gave much thought to education, after all.

Velix was relatively young for a maester, but he was full of wisdom and eagerness to teach his young charge.

Gregor already knew that his house had been created when his grandfather Alyver – the kennelmaster of Casterly Rock – saved Lord Tytos Lannister from a lioness. Three of his grandfather's dogs had died fighting alongside their master; those were the same three dogs in the Clegane family's sigil.

House Clegane was not run by a lord. It had attained knightly status, but not masterly or lordly. Basically, it was a house of landed knights. All the "milords" Gregor and his father received were mere courtesies.

Clegane's Keep was not very large or alluring. It had already been in a sorry state when Ser Alyver and his wife had settled into it. So far, the Keep had not fared much better under the command of Gregor's father, Ser Tarrence. If anything, it had gotten even more unpleasant to look at. Gregor hoped that whenever he became the lord of the Keep, he would be able to refurbish it or make it look less foreboding. He had proposed the idea to his father, but Ser Tarrence seemed to care very little for the building's cleanliness or appearance.

At the very least, Ser Tarrence had a better marriage than his own father. Ser Alyver's wife, Lady Tessia, was not a lady by birth. She had been one of the kitchen wenches of Casterly Rock who simply had the fortune to be wed to Lord Tytos' one-time savior.

As for Ser Tarrence, his wife – Lady Daliah – was born a Lydden of Deep Den. She was the youngest daughter of Lord Lewys Lydden. That was something of a special privilege for House Clegane. It was not often that lords of noble houses married their children into newly-formed knightly houses.

Strangely enough, even though that had been an arranged marriage, there was now more love between Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah than there had ever been between Ser Alyver and Lady Tessia. That was demonstrated quite well by how Alyver and Tessia only had one child, yet Tarrence and Daliah had two, soon to be three.

Lady Daliah's third pregnancy went by without incident. Maester Velix tended to her every need, and her husband and sons were very mindful of her well-being.

Throughout the nine months leading up to his sister's birth, Gregor was fearful that Lady Daliah might die in childbirth. Neither the books nor the show ever specified how Gregor and Sandor's mother died, and the miracle of birth was not without risk. Gregor had actually come to love Daliah as much as he loved his mother from his previous life.

His worries turned out to be unfounded. In fact, this time, the birthing process for was much more straightforward than Gregor's or Sandor's had been. As before, Maester Velix oversaw the procedure. Ryna, sadly, had perished during the last winter. The role of midwife went to Gregor and Sandor's wet nurse, Bernice.

After two hours of labor, Ellyn Clegane came into the world. She was rather small, compared to the sizes her brothers had been. But she was by no means frail or weak. Maester Velix declared that she would grow up to be strong. Her parents and her brothers were elated by that news.

Gregor had a fairly decent family in this world. However, he knew that he would not be able to stay within them in Clegane's Keep forever. It would have been naive and foolish to have assumed so. Also, if he never went anywhere, his new life would be full of nothing but wasted opportunity.

He spent the first dozen years of his life contemplating what he would do when he left the Keep and saw more of the world. So far, he did not even know if this universe followed the events of the books, the show, or if it was a combination of both. As a precaution, he made plans for all three. Of course, things rarely ever went according to plan in any of the franchise's worlds. Luckily, he got around this by having a backup plan to almost any possible scenario.

On his thirteenth name day, Gregor decided he had spent enough time planning. It was time for him to get out and start making a name for himself. After all, if he was to get anywhere, he had to have a reputation.

A month after he turned thirteen, Gregor rode to Casterly Rock and offered his sword to Tywin Lannister. He had forecasted that his first encounter with Lord Tywin would not be a pleasant one. It was not. Tywin was every bit as cold, calculating, and wary as he had been in any medium. He was less than receptive of Gregor, despite knowing that his grandfather had rescued his lord father. Or maybe that was why he was so unwelcoming. Lord Tytos' eldest son had held little affection for him, after all.

Still, had he not stood a whole foot higher than Lord Tywin, and had he not been aware of Lord Tywin's ultimate fate, Gregor probably would have been intimidated by their first meeting. But he was careful not to let his apprehension show. That would have been seen as weakness, and the last thing he needed was to be seen as weak.

Tywin Lannister was impressed by Gregor's prowess, swordsmanship, and resilience. However, he was never one to render a judgment from appearance alone. So Lord Tywin gave Gregor an assignment to prove his usefulness.

A couple days earlier, three of the Rock's servants had stolen a hundred golden dragons from the vault's treasury and killed two of the guards in their escape from the city. Gregor's job was to go after the thieves and bring back the gold.

Gregor left Casterly Rock with a promise that he would return. Less than twenty-four hours later, he did. He presented Lord Tywin with two chests. The first one held all one hundred golden dragons. The other one contained the heads of the three thieves.
Those were the first men Gregor had killed in this universe. But they were not the first ones he had ever killed. He had been forced to use his firearm on several occasions in his previous life. Killing brought him no personal pleasure in either of his lives. But at least in this world, whenever he killed someone, he would not have to fill out an excessive amount of paperwork to explain why.

At any rate, Tywin Lannister was satisfied with Gregor's performance. He granted him the right to function as a keeper of his peace, and he tasked him with maintaining order in the Westerlands.

The next four years of Gregor's life witnessed a fair amount of excitement. Many times, Lord Tywin Lannister called on him to bring renegade criminals to justice. Every time, Gregor delivered.

It did not take long for his name to be recognized beyond the Westerlands. He had successfully developed a reputation. It was not stained as heavily with blood as the original Gregor Clegane's, but it was still fearsome.

Gregor was ruthless in his dispensing of the King's justice. Thieves lost their hands. Rapists lost their cocks. Murderers lost their heads. He did not allow any guilty party to sway him. Anytime a crime was committed in the Westerlands, the perpetrator was punished severely and harshly. Oftentimes, Gregor saw to the chastisement personally. He made it quite clear that no breaches of law would be tolerated.

Gregor did, however, have standards. For instance, he went out of his way to ensure that all innocent parties were left unmolested. He would not have guiltless blood be spilt on his account. He also gave every criminal he captured alive the option to take the black. Anyone who accepted that option was sent unharmed to the Wall.

When he worked for the CIA, regulations required him to give a suspect the chance to yield. In this world, offering mercy was viewed as a weakness. Instead, the suspect had to voluntarily surrender, or his life was forfeit.

Most of them lived in the towns adjoining Clegane's Keep. The majority of them were natives of the Westerlands. All of them were at least a few years older than Gregor. Yet they all looked up to him (both literally and figuratively), and they respected his authority and his orders without question.

Their biggest defect was their notable lack of intelligence. By himself, Gregor was smarter than the lot of them combined. But interestingly, being so stupid also made them rather impressionable. It turned out that most of the Mountain's men were not actually cruel and sadistic by nature. Almost all of them must have been that way because they had so devoutly followed the original Gregor's actions and temperament by example.

Never one to waste a resource, Gregor decided to take advantage of how dim-witted his men-at-arms were. He laid out the fundamental guidelines of his squad. Mainly, they could be summarized in four points: no harming the innocent, no using excessive force, no showing too much leniency, and no allowing crimes to go unpunished. To his good fortune, nearly all of his men seemed to understand and accept those rules without question. Anyone who could not comply with them was dismissed from the unit.

Normally, Gregor would have felt guilty for being so manipulative. Then he remembered what these men could have been capable of under less favorable guidance. So he quickly set his mind at Amazingly, a few of The Mountain's Men were actually capable of exhibiting compassion and empathy. Like Gregor, they could be merciless towards the guilty, but tender towards the innocent. That gave Gregor hope that he really could instill some form of positive change in Westeros.

During his travels throughout the Westerlands, Gregor had the opportunity to become acquainted with members of many of the region's noble houses. He actually managed to make a few friends along the way. Chiefly among them were Forley Prester, Flement Brax, Addam Marbrand, Lyle Crakehall, and Jaime Lannister himself. The six of them became a tight circle of friends. Whenever Gregor was not with his men-at-arms, he was almost always in the company of one or more of those men.

Gregor was unable to prevent Jaime from entering the Kingsguard. As Gregor knew, the only reason Jaime ever wished to join the Kingsguard was because Lord Tywin was so certain that Mad King Aerys would choose Cersei as Rhaegar's bride. Even after Aerys refused the betrothal, the idea of naming Jaime to the Kingsguard had not died. This time, the Mad King planned to appoint Jaime to that position with the sole intention of depriving Tywin Lannister of his heir. In response, Tywin had resigned his office as Hand of the King.

Gregor had his fifteenth name day in 280 A.C. That was the year before the infamous tourney at Harrenhal. It was also the year the tourney was announced. Rhaegar Targaryen had gone to Casterly Rock to invite Lord Tywin personally. Frustrated by the upcoming loss of his heir, Tywin refused. Jaime, however, was looking forward to go. It was at the tourney that he would be knighted and added to the Kingsguard.

Gregor had been at Casterly Rock when Rhaegar arrived. He had the pleasure of meeting the Crown Prince in person. As a reward for all his hard work with keeping the peace in the Westerlands, Rhaegar himself knighted the Mountain, making him Ser Gregor Clegane of Clegane's Keep.

Although Lord Walter Whent was hosting the tourney at Harrenhal, Gregor knew that the tourney was actually Rhaegar's idea. He also knew that Rhaegar was plotting to remove his insane father from power, and that the tourney was just an excuse for him to speak privately with the great lords in the realm. What really concerned Gregor was the scandal that would result from the tourney. He doubted he would be able to prevent it, but he had to try, all the same.

Gregor was not about to invite himself to the tourney at Harrenhal. One did not request an invitation from a royal. So this may have been his only opportunity to speak with Rhaegar. He used his time and chose his words carefully.

Basically, he advised the prince to be careful, and to consider all the possible repercussions of all his actions. He subtly suggested to Rhaegar that he not do anything impulsive before, during, or after – especially after – the tourney.

Unlike his paranoid father, the Crown Prince was not one to ignore words of caution. He willingly listened to the Mountain's counsel. However, Gregor's anxiety was not hard to notice. During their conversation, Rhaegar ask the younger man if there was a reason why he seemed so restless. Gregor claimed he was merely concerned for the prince's welfare. He pointed out that anything could happen at the tourney, especially since all the great houses would be represented.

Ultimately, Rhaegar just gave Gregor his assurance that he would be mindful of his actions, and that he would do nothing hasty or irrational. Gregor saw no reason to mistrust the Crown Prince, so he took him at his word.
Alas, Rhaegar's word turned out to be insufficient.

Soon enough, the year 281 A.C. arrived. The weather of that year was erratic. At first, it appeared as though the current winter would end. But just when the snows seemed to completely recede, the temperature dropped substantially. For that reason, it was known as the Year of the False Spring.

The tourney of Harrenhal was held, and it happened exactly as it was supposed to. Rhaegar Targaryen ended up naming Lady Lyanna Stark his Queen of Love and Beauty over his wife, Princess Elia Martell.

Everyone in the Seven Kingdoms was reveling in that bit of gossip for months after the tourney ended.

The year after the Year of the False Spring, the already fragile balance of Westeros was finally shattered by a tragic chain of events:

Lyanna Stark being supposedly abducted from Winterfell by Prince Rhaegar Targaryen and three of the Kingsguard. Brandon Stark riding all the way to King's Landing, publicly demanding for Rhaegar's head. Brandon's arrest and subsequent murder (or execution, as some called it), along with that of his father, Lord Rickard Stark. The Mad King demanding the heads of Eddard Stark and Robert Baratheon from their mentor, Lord Jon Arryn. Lord Arryn's refusal to comply and calling of his banners.

The country was officially at war then.

The Vale, the North, the Riverlans, and the Stormlands (save for House Connington) were all in open rebellion against the crown. The Crownlands could only rely on support from the Reach and Dorne. The Iron Islands and the Westerlands stayed out of the fighting.

The Iron Islands' neutrality was no surprise; the Ironborn cared little for the politics of the Seven Kingdoms. The Westerlords' refusal to choose a side was a little more astonishing.

The Westerlords knew that their liege lord was merely bidding his time and waiting for the opportune mount to call his banners. He would not do so until he could determine with absolutely certainty which side would be the victorious one.

Some may have called that a craven's tactic. Lord Tywin Lannister cared not; this course of action would ensure his peoples' survival.

So while the rest of the realm bled, the Westerlands stayed whole. There were some houses who would have been content to join either side, but out of fear for what Lord Tywin would do to them, they stayed home. If it had been up to him, Gregor would have sided with the rebels without question. Still, he was hoping to avoid losing favor with Lord Tywin.

Lord Tywin kept the Westerlands neutral throughout almost the entire Rebellion.

It was not until the Battle of the Trident, when Robert Baratheon killed Rhaegar Targaryen in single combat, that he finally called his own banners.

The Westerlords were quickly and deftly assembled. In his father's place, Gregor himself commanded the soldiers of House Clegane. Including his contingent of men-at-arms, there were less than a hundred men, but each and every one of them was fierce, hardened, and loyal to the bone.

As the Westerlords began the long march to King's Landing, Gregor became increasingly worried.
The most atrocious thing the original Gregor had ever done took place during the Sack of King's Landing. Even though Gregor would never do that horrible thing now, he had no reassurance that someone else would not do it in his stead. His own men, he could trust not to harm Princess Elia and her children. But they were less than a hundred men among twelve thousand. Their numbers were far too few to protect the royal family.

This was the first occasion where all of Gregor's planning paid off. The solution to this dilemma could be found through a means other than fighting. All he had to do was search for a certain spider.

If the spider proved to be elusive or stubborn, Gregor would just have to rely on himself to rescue Princess Elia and her children. One way or another, he was determined to get them out of that shithole of a city.
On the road to King's Landing, Tywin Lannister had informed his officers that there would be no need for a siege. The gates to the city would already be opened for them. Gregor knew that was because Grand Maester Pycelle was a Lannister spy. Pycelle would get the Westerlords access to King's Landing by misinforming King Aerys Targaryen that Tywin's forces were coming to support the throne. While there were few that Aerys would actually believe, he still heeded the counsel of the Grand Maester.

Although Tywin had not mentioned the fact that Pycelle was a double agent to his soldiers, Gregor knew full well that entering the city would not be an issue for the Westerlords. What really bothered Gregor was what would come after.

Gregor could not recall the exact number of people that had died when Tywin's forces took King's Landing, but he knew it had to be thousands. While he had no intention of abandoning Elia and her children, they were still just three people. Before he could focus on rescuing them, he would have to take measures to minimalize the damage of the Sack of King's Landing.

The day before the Westerlords reached King's Landing, Lord Tywin assembled his officers in the lords' tent. He explained that their forces would be divided into ten different contingents, each with a different objective. One would monitor Blackwater Bay, one would patrol the outskirts of the city, seven would enter the city through the seven gates, and one would guard the gates after those seven passed through them.

Lord Leo Lefford and his units would monitor Blackwater Bay and ensure that no one in the city got out through the harbor. Lord Regenard Estren and his units would guard the gates and ensure that no one used them to exit King's Landing. Lord Garrison Prester and his units would enter through the Old Gate. Lord Roland Crakehall and his units would enter through the Lion Gate. Lord Lewys Lydden and his units would enter through the Iron Gate. Lord Andros Brax and his units would enter through the River Gate. Lord Damon Marbrand and his units would enter through King's Gate. Ser Harys Swyft and his units would enter through the Mud Gate. Lord Quenten Banefort and his units would enter through the Gate of the Gods.

Lord Tywin Lannister himself would lead the units that would remain on the outskirts. Some may have thought it quaint that Lord Tywin was staying at a distance during the whole affair, but none of his bannermen dared to suggest he was a craven.

Although he was not tasked with leading any of the ten divisions of the Westerland forces, Gregor managed to put himself in a position to control the level of damage inflicted during the Sack of King's Landing. After the other officers left the lords' tent, he approached Lord Tywin and requested to speak with him alone. Since they were pressed for time, Lord Tywin allowed him a ten-minute audience.

Those ten minutes were all Gregor needed to convince Tywin that when the Westerlords seized King's Landing, they would need someone to supervise their forces within the city. He pointed out that if the city was to be taken properly, they would have to limit the number of civilian casualties and the amount of destruction. He contended that if they took those precautions, the smallfolk would more apt to cooperate with the Westerlanders.

Gregor spent five of his ten minutes convincing Lord Tywin that one of his generals should be charged with keeping track of all the activities of their forces within King's Landing. He spent the other five convincing Tywin that HE should be that person.
Gregor was easily the youngest of the officers in the Westerlander army, but based on his service record, Lord Tywin knew that he was competent, qualified, and capable of doing this job. So he charged Gregor with overseeing the actions of their soldiers once they were inside the city.

When Gregor stepped out of the lords’ tent, he came face-to-face with a portly man of average height. This man also had a pale face, and he bore a queer resemblance to a pig.

"Ser Amory," Gregor greeted him with a feigned grin.

"Gregor," the older man said dismissively, sauntering past the Mountain and into the tent.

Gregor had taken note of the conspicuous absence of Ser Amory Lorch during the officers’ meeting. But he did not linger around to find out why he was speaking with Lord Tywin now. It would not be worth the risk if he was caught eavesdropping. Aside from that, it was not hard to imagine what Lord Tywin was discussing with Ser Amory.

While he had never failed any of his assignments from Lord Tywin, his policy of always getting the job done through the course that involved doing no harm to the innocent had not gone unnoticed. Evidently, even if Gregor had not made that proposal, Lord Tywin only entrusted someone who was willing to kill indiscriminately with "taking care" of Rhaegar's wife and children.

Like Polliver and the rest of Gregor's men-at-arms, Amory Lorch could be classified as simple and dim-witted. Unlike the Mountain's Men, though, Amory Lorch truly was a monster. Gregor had only seen him thrice, but that was enough to persuade him that the plump knight was cruel and murderous by nature. Reasoning with a man like him was impossible.

Fortunately, Gregor was prepared to deal with him.

When the Westerlords were within sight of King's Landing, Gregor assembled the commanders and informed them that Lord Tywin had charged him with heading the invasion force. He laid out the guidelines for how they would seize the city:

Their units would only attack anyone who raised arms against them, which meant the Gold Cloaks, the Targaryen soldiers, and any Crownlander militias within the city. No harm was to come to anyone who threw down their weapons voluntarily, or to anyone who brandished no weapon at all. Most of all, the injuring or slaying of women and children was strictly prohibited. Anyone who violated those guidelines would be punished in accordance with his crime. He claimed that these orders came directly from Lord Tywin himself.

Some of the generals assumed Gregor was jesting; civilian casualties were practically unavoidable, especially under these circumstances. To prove that he meant business, Gregor conducted a public display of what would await anyone who defied these guidelines.

For the duration of their march, the westermen army had amassed quite a few camp followers. The day before, a particularly attractive camp follower had been raped by three of the men from House Serrett, and when she tried to flee, one of the rapists killed her.

Gregor had already had the other two rapists gelded. The murderer he kept alive until that moment. He was brought forward in chains, pleading for his life. Eggon placed a block of wood in the clearing, and Chiswyck forced the murderer to kneel over the block. There, in front of all the officers, Gregor Clegane cleaved the man's head off with a single blow of his longsword.

His exhibition must have been rather effective. When the westermen entered King's Landing, the vast majority of them stayed away from the smallfolk and concentrated solely on eliminating and subjugating the city's armed defenders.

As a precaution, Gregor had tasked his own soldiers with keeping an eye out for anyone who broke the aforementioned rules. If anyone did, they were to make a note of who, and then report the offenders to the Mountain later on.

Once the city had been secured, Gregor concentrated his efforts on preventing the original Mountain's most infamous act of barbarism.

Even when lightly clad, Amory Lorch was a very slow-moving person, and Gregor had seen him clad in armor that morning. With that in mind, Gregor doubted Ser Amory was even halfway to Aegon's High Hill by that point in time.

Still, given what was at stake, Gregor was taking no chances. He and a dozen of his best men-at-arms swiftly made their way to Maegor's Holdfast. Since the drawbridge was up, they had to gain entry by scaling the walls. After subduing the guards at the top, they entered the Red Keep and navigated their way to the royal apartments.

As they got closer to Rhaegar and Elia's bedroom, Dunsen thought aloud "Do you hear that?"

"Hear what?" Tobbot queried, looking to his colleague.

Dunsen gestured for the others to stop and beckoned them "Listen."

The thirteen men stood by and pricked up their ears.

"I don't hear anythin'," Eggon remarked after a few seconds.

"Yeah, your buggin' ears is playing buggin' tricks on you, bugger," Shitmouth claimed.

"No, wait," Raff stated, placing a hand to his ear, "Sounds like... gruntin'."

"And slashin'," Chiswyck observed.

Gregor also heard both those noises. It sounded as though someone was hacking a sword at a wooden door. The group continued on their current route. The further they went into the holdfast, the louder the noises got.

Soon, they reached the corridor that housed the royal apartments. As they walked around the corner, they spotted the source of the commotion.

Ser Amory Lorch was standing with his sword drawn in front of Rhaegar and Elia's bedroom. He was hacking incessantly at the door with his blade. He must have been at it awhile; his breathing was somewhat labored. Even so, the door looked as though it would give at any moment.

"Oh, fuck," Gregor drily mumbled. He promptly drew his sword and sprinted down the hallway. Unfortunately, due to his size and the weight of his armor, he was not able to run very fast.

When he was almost halfway there, Amory finally broke the door down. Gregor heard a high-pitched scream, which must have been Princess Elia.

"Stay away!" she yelled in fright.

The only response she got from Ser Amory was a malicious chuckle.

"Where's the girl?" he demanded.
"She… she's not here," was all Elia could sputter.

It was a pitiful response, but it was the best response she could think up in her desperation. In any case, Ser Amory did not believe her.

When Gregor was two-thirds of the way there, he heard the sound of a cat meowing. That had to be Rhaenys' kitten, Balerion. He then heard the sounds of Amory Lorch's armored kneecap striking the ground as he knelt down, and Rhaenys' scream as he dragged her out from underneath her parents' bed.

"Father, help us!" the small princess shrieked.

"No, no, please!" Elia begged the plump knight.

Then there came the sound of a gauntleted hand making contact with flesh, which must have been Amory striking Elia in the face. Elia's subsequent moan of pain and distress seemed to substantiate that.

Right then, Gregor reached the entrance of the bedroom. Princess Elia was propped against the wall. One arm was wrapped protectively around Prince Aegon; the other was pressed against a fresh bruise on her cheek.

In the center of the room, Ser Amory Lorch had Princess Rhaenys pinned down with one hand. In the other, he held his sword high over his head.

Before Ser Amory could thrust his blade into the little girl's body, Gregor lifted his own sword and gave a mighty swing.

Amory Lorch's sword went flying through the air. His right forearm was still clasped around its hilt.

Immediately, Amory shrieked at the new stump on his right arm. Gregor wondered what was more overwhelming: the pain or the shock.

At any rate, Gregor was not finished with him yet. He roughly shoved the portly man away from Princess Rhaenys. Amory groaned as he collided with the wall. Before he had a chance to get up, Gregor approached him and grimaced down at him. Then he gripped his sword in both hands and raised it high into the air.

Amory feebly lifted his remaining hand as though it would shield him. He pleaded pathetically "No… Gregor, don't! Please, don't!"

Gregor did not even acknowledge the portly man's pleas. Without hesitating, he plunged his sword into the older knight's chest. He stabbed him directly in the heart. As blood began to seep through the new opening in his armor, more appeared at the corners of his mouth. Gregor twisted his sword around and muttered angrily "Just fucking die already, you worthless pile of shit."

Amory Lorch slowly moved his left hand to the blade, as though he was thinking of pulling out the blade. Just before he could wrap his fingers around the cold steel, his endurance gave out. His left hand dropped to his side, and his eyes stared into oblivion.

Gregor withdrew his sword from the false knight's chest. He continued staring down at Amory Lorch's remains, breathing in and out rapidly.

By then, Gregor's men-at-arms had reached the bedroom, too. Polliver, Dunsen, and Tobbot stepped through the threshold; the others remained out in the hallway.

"Ser, what's going on?" Dunsen asked in confusion.

Gregor elected not to answer him straightaway. He focused his attention instead on Princess Elia. Princess Rhaenys had picked up Balerion and rushed over to her mother. The Dornish princess now had one arm wrapped around each of her children. Her gaze, however, was fixed on the massive figure in front of her. She did not know whether to be afraid or relieved.

Gregor slowly approached Elia. When he was within a meter of her, he placed his sword on the ground between them, fell to one knee before her, bowed his head, and said solemnly "I am sorry you had to be a witness that, Your Grace."

"My daughter lives because of it, Ser," Princess Elia told him, suddenly seeming less terrified, "You have no reason to repent. Might I know your name?"

Gregor looked up at her and removed his helm. Holding it under one arm, he replied "I am Ser Gregor of House Clegane. I once had the honor of making your husband's acquaintance."

"Yes, Rhaegar did mention you," Elia recounted "He spoke highly of your principles. He even referred to you as a 'guardian of the innocent.'"

Gregor momentarily grinned at that and gave a light nod of his head. Then he stated "For that reason and others, I am here."

He then adorned his helm again and picked his sword up with his right hand. He extended his left hand to Princess Elia and told her "You must come with me. You and your children are still in danger."

Both of Elia's arms were full at the moment. She briefly let go of Rhaenys long enough to take Gregor's hand so he could pull her to her feet. Then she picked Rhaenys back up.

"Do you have a travelling cloak, Your Grace?" Gregor inquired.

"Yes, in my wardrobe," the Dornish princess replied.

Gregor looked over his shoulder and called out "Eggon, get the princess's cloak."

The bald man nodded in acknowledgment and made his way over to the wardrobe. He opened it up and searched through the contents. While most of his men-at-arms had little to no sense of fashion, Eggon at least could tell a cloak from a dress.

When he found the cloak, he fished it out and brought it over to Princess Elia, saying "Here you are, Your Grace."

Once more, Elia had to set her daughter down. That enabled her to take the cloak from Eggon and fasten it around her shoulders.

As she reached down to pick Rhaenys back up, Gregor interceded and observed "This is not going to work. You are going to need one hand free, Your Grace."

He looked over his shoulder again and called out "Rafford, get over here."

The Sweetling approached the Mountain and asked him "Yes, ser?"

"Look after Princess Rhaenys," Gregor ordered him.
Raff saluted the massive knight, turned to the little girl, and lowered himself to her level. Initially, Rhaenys hid warily behind her mother's skirts.

Gregor could not fault her for being cautious. After all, children felt an innate mistrust of all strangers. Some would say they were wiser than adults in that regard. Even so, that mistrust would be an obstacle in this situation.

Gregor turned to Elia and claimed "I would trust this man with my own child. If I had one. So, if you have no objection…?"

Princess Elia thought it over, and she lightly shook her head, meaning she had none. She looked down at her daughter and gestured for her to come out of hiding.

Rhaenys tentatively emerged from behind her mother and hesitantly approached Rafford. When she reached him, he gently picked her up in her left arm and told her softly "Don't be afraid, dear one. I'll keep you safe."

Somehow, Rhaenys brought herself to trust this man. She still held her kitten Balerion in her small hands. The little tom stretched out one of his paws and lightly patted Raff's shoulder. Rhaenys giggled and proclaimed "He likes you."

"So he does," Raff concurred, scoffing a little.

Gregor could not help but smile at the scene. This would never have happened in the original universe.

Here, the Sweetling was not an entirely inaccurate or scornful moniker for Rafford. Certainly, at times, Raff could be as vicious and hardhearted as anyone else who served under Gregor Clegane. At other times, he could be surprisingly gentle and affectionate. Gregor actually found it hard to believe that under different circumstances, this very same man could casually stab a child in the throat.

"I have a task for you, gentlemen," the Mountain told his men-at-arms, "You must escort the princess and her children to safety. Kill anyone who tries to stop you or harm them. Anyone. Do not stop until you are out of the city. Is that clear?"

"Aye, Ser," Rafford declared, "We won't let anyone lay a finger on them."

Everyone else gave murmurs of agreement.

The massive knight, the princess, and the twelve men-at-arms exited the bedroom. Gregor murmured in a candid tone to "Here, we must part ways."

That made Chiswyck ask "Where will you be, Ser?"

"I have some business here I must attend to first," Gregor notified them, "When it's over, I'll rejoin you all. Polliver, you will be in command until we regroup."

The black-bearded man nodded and muttered "As you say, Ser."

All twelve of the men-at-arms drew their swords.

Polliver went over to Elia and softly placed a hand on her shoulder. She turned to him, and he used his sword to gesture down the corridor. He beckoned her "This way, Your Grace."
Elia nodded her head and let the tall man lead her down the hallway. Dunsen, Chiswyck, Rafford, and the others all followed close behind.

Gregor was not concerned that his men would fail him; he knew they would not. They had a talent of slipping unnoticed through enemy and ally lines alike, and each of them was worth ten soldiers from any other house in the Westerlands. Plus, he had already informed his men of the secret passageway that led out of the Red Keep by way of the sewers. That was how they would be getting the princess out of the city. Even Lords Lefford and Lannister would not have sighted them during their getaway.

Gregor was not worried that Elia and her children would be in jeopardy outside of the city, either. He had seen to it that the soldiers of House Clegane set up their camp a little way away from all the other houses. That would guarantee that Elia and her children would not be exposed, as it was very unlikely that anyone would go wandering through the camp of a knightly house when its commander was away.

Of course, Lord Tywin would expect Ser Amory Lorch to have the bodies of Elia Martell and her children on hand when he entered the city. Now that Ser Amory was… indisposed, Gregor had to see to that matter himself. Luckily, he had a plan to make the Old Lion believe that Rhaegar's line had been wiped out successfully, but for the moment, that could wait.

While his men were preoccupied with moving Elia, Aegon, and Rhaenys to safety, Ser Gregor Clegane busied himself with other matters. It turned out he did not need the aid of a certain spider to rescue the Princess and her children. However, this spider could still be of use to him.

He was fairly certain that this spider would be willing to cooperate with him. That was not just because of the five-foot piece of steel in his right hand. It was also because he could be equally useful to the spider. After all, the spider was never one to squander potential resources, and at the risk of seeming vain, Gregor felt he was the greatest resource of all.
"Dragonspawn."

That was the only word Robert Baratheon, the new King of Westeros, had for the two small corpses that had been placed before the Iron Throne. The bodies were ruined almost beyond recognition, but there was little doubt for almost everyone present that they were all that remained of Prince Rhaegar Targaryen.

There were a couple people there who happened to know better.

Be that as it may, several of the others were horrified or appalled by the sight of the two tiny children wrapped up in a red sheet. Lord Eddard Stark was the most shocked of all.

"Robert, you cannot tell me this does not unsettle you," the Lord of Winterfell barked furiously, "This was an atrocity."

"It had to be done, Ned," Robert Baratheon said facetiously.

"Then could it not have done more in a more civil manner?" Ned Stark debated, "Such as a pillow pressed against their faces, or poison? Even cutting their throats would have been more humane."

"I must agree with Lord Eddard," Ser Jaime Lannister pronounced, "The children should have been granted a merciful death."

Gregor was surprised to see the young lion knight backing up the wolf lord. Especially since the latter had been the first one to daub the former "Kingslayer." Then again, Jaime had come to care for most of the Targaryen royal family. If he had not been preoccupied with putting down Mad King Aerys, he probably would have attempted to save Elia and her children, just as Gregor had.

"If you seek justice for this, Lord Stark, you need not bother," Tywin Lannister declared, "The culprit has already paid for his actions."

"Yes," Eddard shiftily agreed, "By the hand of one of your own bannermen, if what I've heard is to be believed, Lord Tywin."

"It is, Lord Eddard," Gregor Clegane professed.

When Lord Tywin arrived in the city, Gregor had shamelessly admitted to killing Amory Lorch.

He had given Lord Tywin two very understandable and logical reasons to justify that deed. The first reason was that when he saw how Ser Amory had butchered the royal children, Gregor had felt his blood boil, and he had taken his rage out on Ser Amory for his misdeeds. The other reason was that Ser Amory had been on the verge of doing the same abominable thing to Princess Elia, and unlike her children, the Dornishwoman was no danger to the throne.

He was asked to explain those reasons in further detail to King Robert and the other men present.

"Before we entered the city, I declared that the harming of innocent lives would not be tolerated," Gregor revealed, "I made it clear that anyone who disobeyed my orders would be severely punished. Depending on the crime, they would face penalties as great as death as the consequence. When I saw what Ser Amory did, I did nothing more than keep my word."

"That may be," Lord Jon Arryn conceded, "But Ser Amory was not the only one who violated your commands, Ser Gregor. There are over thirty other westermen that are being held on charges of thievery, rape, murder, or other crimes."

"They will be chastised soon enough," Gregor asserted, "Ser Amory is the only one who already has been simply because he was the only one I caught in the act."

"Even so, Ser Amory was simply following my orders," Tywin Lannister pointed out, "Any order I give supersedes any order you give, Ser Gregor. You all but prevented Amory Lorch from carrying his out."

"It was not my intent to countermand your authority, Lord Tywin," Gregor Clegane claimed, "If you were led to believe that, then I beseech your forgiveness. However, I was not informed of Ser Amory's assignment."

The lion lord folded his arms and stated inquisitively "If you had been informed, would you still have intervened?"

Gregor was spared the burden of answering that question. Robert Baratheon sat up in the Iron Throne and remarked "That is not important, Tywin. Whatever his motives, Ser Gregor has done his duty. He has helped us take King's Landing, and he did it without endangering most of the smallfolk."

Gregor felt the urge to smirk. Robert Baratheon may have been a fool, but even he comprehended the benefits of minimizing civilian casualties in wartime.

"I thank you for your recognition, Your Grace," Gregor said humbly, bowing his head a bit.

"Spare me your thanks, Mountain," Robert Baratheon spat, suddenly tense, "I still have reservations about your decision to spare Princess Elia."

"As do I," Tywin Lannister muttered, "Enlighten us, Gregor. What motivated you to extract the princess from the city?"

Even before he rode for King's Landing, Gregor had prepared an explanation for that question. He informed those assembled "I was being strictly diplomatic. If Princess Elia was murdered at our hand, her brothers would be outraged. That outrage could have sparked a wave of disobedience and hostility against both the Westerlands and the throne. I was hoping to avoid creating any more political turmoil with Dorne."

"Very sensible of you, Ser Gregor," Jon Arryn muttered in approval.

"Maybe," Robert Baratheon uttered with a light shrug, "In the meantime, what should be done with Elia Martell?"
"Perhaps she should remain in King's Landing," Tywin Lannister suggested, "Her presence here would secure Dorne's fealty."

"I must advise against that, Your Grace," Jon Arryn proposed, "Princess Elia was used as a hostage by the Mad King to prevent Dorne from rising against him. While the Dornishmen remained loyal to Aerys, that decision made him quite unpopular with them. If we appear to treat her as your predecessor did, Prince Doran will not hesitate to show the full extent of his protest."

"I asked what should be done, not what shouldn't," Robert grumbled, leaning on his hand.

"There is no need to keep her here any longer, Your Grace," Eddard Stark told his best friend, "If you ask my counsel, the best course of action would be to let her go home."

"I would have to agree with Lord Eddard," Gregor declared, "Princess Elia has already lost her husband and both of her children. She has endured enough grief for one lifetime. The least we could do is permit her to live out the rest of her days peacefully."

"Indeed," Varys professed, "Princess Elia should be allowed to return to Sunspear. Her safe return would guarantee Dorne's loyalty to the crown far more than keeping her captive would."

"But is it possible that she is with child?" Robert hypothesized, "What if Rhaegar managed to plant his seed in her cunt one last time before he rode off to war?"

"That is entirely unlikely, Your Grace," Varys countered, "Even for a Dornishwoman, Elia Martell is small of frame. Princess Rhaenys's birth devastated her. Prince Aegon's practically killed her. After that, she was deemed incapable of bearing any more children."

"Lord Varys speaks the truth," Jaime Lannister coincided, "Princess Elia is barren now. Were the Grand Maester here, he would be able to confirm that."

Alas, Pycelle was unaccounted for. Gregor had seen to that.

Not long after the Mountain separated from Princess Elia and his men-at-arms, he had gone off to search for Vays. Before he got to the eunuch's chambers, he made a slight detour. He found Grand Maester Pycelle in his quarters underneath the rookery.

He told Pycelle that Lord Tywin Lannister was on the outskirts of the city, and he wished to be informed the instant the Red Keep was secured. That was a lie, but the Grand Maester bought it, and it was sufficient to coax him out of his chambers.

Gregor had then bidden Pycelle to come with him up to the rookery so that they could send a raven to Lord Tywin. He claimed that he needed the maester to compose the message, as he could not read or write (also a lie).

The massive knight and the elderly maester had made their way up the staircase to the rookery together. They ascended in that order.

When they got to the top of the staircase, Gregor had opened the door and stepped to the side, as though he was holding it for Pycelle.

Just before the Grand Maester entered the room, Gregor grabbed his shoulder and gave him a slight push backwards. That soft nudge was all it took to send the elderly maester tumbling down the steps. Gregor stood idly by and waited until the sounds of Pycelle's groaning and falling ceased. Then he made his descent.
When Gregor reached the base of the stairs, he found Pycelle sprawled on the ground with his head turned at an unnatural angle in relation to his body. In other words, he had broken his neck. That was precisely what Gregor had hoped would happen.

The original Gregor Clegane had been the primary suspect in a series of accidents that concerned his family and servants. Of course, those had only been referred to as accidents because no one had been brave enough to accuse Gregor of foul play.

Still, if HE could get away with those actions, Gregor was confident he could, as well. Because of his experience as an agent of the Central Intelligence Agency, he was an expert at covering up his tracks.

So far, it appeared as though he had managed to do so. Pycelle's death had already been written off as an accident. Even at the beginning of Robert's reign, he was old and feeble. In addition to that, his lengthy maester's chain would not have been difficult to trip over.

Gregor noted that nobody seemed particularly distraught by the Grand Maester's sudden demise. Not even Tywin Lannister was moved by the loss of his spy. That gave Gregor some relief; it implied that no one would bother with an investigation.

Pycelle was far from the most despicable character in the franchise, but Gregor had disliked him ever since the first book. He had known the truth of the parentage of Cersei Lannister's children, yet he had looked the other way when Eddard Stark had confronted Cersei. Worse yet, he had the gall to call Lord Eddard a traitor.

Gregor would lose no sleep over what he had done to Pycelle. The entire realm would be better off without him. His only problem was that he had no way of knowing whom the next Grand Maester would be or where his loyalties would lie. In any case, he would have been content so long as the Conclave picked someone less cowardly, dishonorable, and lecherous than Pycelle.

At any rate, Robert spent a minute reflecting on everything he had heard. Then he let out a sigh and bluntly proclaimed "Rhaegar's heirs are dead. His wife has no claim to the throne, so I suppose there is no need for her to share their fate. Very well. I will allow Elia Martell to return to Dorne."

Eddard Stark, Gregor Clegane, Varys, Jaime Lannister, Jon Arryn, and nearly everyone else in that room were pleased with that decree. Tywin Lannister was the only one who was somewhat opposed to it, but he held his tongue.

"Where might we find the princess, Ser Gregor?" Varys inquired, "I only ask out of concern for her well-being."

Gregor gave a nod and announced "After my men-at-arms took her out of the city, they brought her to House Clegane's camp. She is still there, and she's currently under my protection. My men have standing orders to cut down anyone who tries to harm her."

"That won't be necessary for much longer, Ser Gregor," Robert Baratheon declared, "I will commission a ship to transport her to Dorne tomorrow. Since you seem to be so invested in her welfare, I am charging you with bringing her home."

"As you command, Your Grace," Gregor conceded, taking a bow. And thanks for making it a command. You saved me the trouble of asking.

Lord Tywin then looked to Gregor and stated "As 'content' as Princess Elia must be in your camp, she may be more comfortable back here in King's Landing."
"Lord Tywin makes a good point," Jon Arryn agreed, "Perhaps you should send a raven or a rider to invite her back in, Ser Gregor."

"There's no need for either, my lord," Gregor claimed, "When I saw her last, the princess mentioned that she has no desire to set foot in this city ever again. After what happened to her children, I cannot blame her."

"None of us can," Eddard commented.

Robert leaned back in the Iron Throne and muttered "In any case, tell her she's going home. And to show her I mean well, I'll send her a wee peace offering."

I'm not even going to ask what.

Gregor gave a nod of acknowledgement and requested "Have I your leave to depart, Your Grace?"

"Yes, yes, you do," King Robert responded, rather disinterestedly.

The massive knight bowed his head and left the throne room. He waited until he was all the way through the threshold to smile.

His ploy had worked beautifully.

Despite the stern orders he had given to attack no unarmed persons, the Sack of King's Landing still had not been without some innocent bloodshed.

In all fairness, Gregor had been expecting that. As far as he knew, no city had ever been seized by force without incurring at least a few civilian casualties. That was how it had been both in reality and in fantasy since the days of Troy.

While Gregor was disappointed and upset by this needless loss of life, the victims managed to serve some useful purpose. Albeit a posthumous purpose.

After King's Landing fell, Gregor had all the casualties gathered in one large pile near the Red Keep. There were a few infants and toddlers amongst the casualties. Gregor had searched through the pile until he found a male babe and a female toddler. They did not look very much like Aegon and Rhaenys, but only those who had seen the prince and the princess up close could tell the differences. Still, Gregor had to make a few… alterations.

He was not proud of what he did next. First he took his dagger and stabbed the toddler girl's body over and over until it was a mess of red. Then he took the babe and dashed his head against a wall until the skull and brains were visible. The bodies were still warm enough that the blood was fresh. So only a maester would be able to tell that the wounds had been inflicted after death.

Desecrating the dead made Gregor feel nauseous at first. Then he reminded himself that he was doing it to ensure that two children who still were living would continue to live. That made the process a little easier to stomach. Only a little though.

Unbeknownst to almost everyone in King's Landing, Elia Martell was not the only guest in Gregor Clegane's camp. Rhaenys and Aegon were there with their mother, as well.

Luckily, Gregor had succeeded in faking their deaths. He knew Tywin would have killed them to eliminate future contenders for the throne, and for personal reasons, Robert was determined to wipe out the entire Targaryen line. Gregor had appeased and fooled both of them with a mummer's farce.
Interventions

Chapter Notes

Note: For those of you who are wondering, the subject of Gregor and Varys' private, unseen conversation will be addressed in two more chapters.

The Diligence was a magnificent vessel. It was originally from the Stormlands, specifically House Estermont of Greenstone. It was made of ironwood and cedar, and it had three decks. It was relatively small, as it was not meant to accommodate more than fifty individuals. In spite of its size, it was swift and lithe when at sea.

For his most recent assignment, Gregor had requested the quickest ship that was currently docked in King's Landing. King Robert had granted his request. He had assumed that Ser Gregor only wished to return Princess Elia to Dorne as quickly as possible.

While that was true, the Mountain had another reason for wanting the fastest ship available. Princess Elia Martell and her children were not the only people whose deaths he could prevent. He had a window of opportunity to save a number of knights, noblemen, and a noble lady in Dorne. But he had to move with haste; otherwise he would miss this window.

The previous night, Gregor had sent word to his men that they were leaving the Crownlands. He informed them that they would be sailing for Sunspear in the early morning. As such, they had to be ready to travel at first light.

Sure enough, at daybreak, the Diligence sailed out of Blackwater Bay. After exiting the harbor through the east, it headed due south. Gregor was the only Westerlander onboard; every member of the crew was of the Stormlands. All the same, he had command of the vessel for the duration of this voyage.

Gregor had notified the crew that they would be making only one stop until they reached Dorne. The purpose of that stop would be for them to pick up their passengers.

House Clegane's camp was located on the shoreline southeast of King's Landing. The servants and most of the soldiers would be staying there until Gregor returned. However, Elia, her children, and Gregor's men-at-arms would all be brought aboard.

Gregor had the crew to go below deck when Elia and the others came on-board. That way, none of them would see Princess Rhaenys or Prince Aegon. He also had the crew cleared out of the corridors in the lower decks so that Elia and her children could be moved to their quarters. For lodgings, the three of them were give a private cabin; the crew had strict orders not to disturb Elia under any circumstances.

Two of Elia's ladies-in-waiting had been in King's Landing when it fell. Gregor had opted to bring both of them aboard, as both of them were Dornish, and their first loyalty was to the princess. They were two of only three people who were permitted to enter Elia's cabin.

Gregor was the third.
Despite his enormous stature and his intimidating stride, Gregor Clegane did not frighten Elia Martell. That was not solely because he had saved her and her children from a terrible fate. Even though her opinion of the Westerlords was not especially high due to recent events, he was kind, patient, and sympathetic. He was able to convince her that at least some of the westermen had honor.

Their only unpleasant encounter occurred when Gregor presented her with Robert's "peace offering." Before Gregor left the city, the stag king had given him a locked chest; Gregor was given the key, but he had instructions not to open the chest until he gave it to Elia.

When Elia opened the chest, she and Gregor found Ser Amory Lorch's head inside. The Princess appeared to accept the chest gratefully, but she was clearly disgusted. Gregor was just glad Rhaenys and Aegon had not been nearby at the time. He apologized for causing her discomfort, but she did not blame him for that.

There were approximately 800 miles between King's Landing and Sunspear. Unfortunately, the straightest route was composed neither entirely of land nor entirely of water. Going by boat was the more popular and preferred method of travel.

Once out of Blackwater Bay, the Diligence headed south by southwest. It remained in the Narrow Sea for the majority of the voyage. The crew had to alter course a few times to avoid a number of obstacles, such as Driftmark, Tarth, and Greenstone.

When they passed Shipbreaker Bay, Gregor and the crew spotted an armada to the west. That was the Redwyne fleet; the Reachmen were maintaining the blockade of Storm's End. Luckily, none of Lord Paxter's ships spotted the Diligence.

Gregor was aware that Lord Eddard Stark was currently on his way to lift the siege of Storm's End. He did not know how long that would take, but Gregor was hoping it would not be done quickly. After all, he knew where Eddard would be going after he liberated Stannis, and if Gregor really was going to save the aforementioned lives, he had to get there first.

The Diligence had a maximum sustainable speed of 16 knots. To avoid exhausting the crew or overstressing the vessel, Gregor had the ship keep an average speed of 13.5 knots. That meant it went approximately 15.53 miles per hour.

Due to the various impedients the Diligence had to evade – as well as abrupt changes in wind or weather – the original distance of 800 miles between King's Landing and Sunspear was nearly doubled in this voyage. Luckily, the vessel never had to halt. In the end, it only required slightly more than nine days to reach Sunspear.

Gregor took full advantage of those nine days. He spent a lot of that time with Elia in her cabin. Her ladies-in-waiting remained wary of the Mountain, but her children became comfortable around him. Aegon never cried when Elia let Gregor hold him, and Rhaenys started to call him "Uncle Gweg."

At first, Gregor's conversations with Elia were casual. They talked about their homelands, their upbringings, and their families. Both of them spent a fair amount of time divulging information about their families.

The day before they reached Sunspear, Gregor and Elia were in the latter's cabin. Her ladies-in-waiting were elsewhere; Elia suspected they were getting "acquainted with Chiswyck and Tobbot. Aegon was asleep on the bed, and Rhaenys was playing in the corner. The Mountain and the Princess were having another of their amiable conversations. Like the others, it started out as casual, but by the end, it would be anything but.

"Wait until your first meeting with my brothers," Elia remarked, "Doran will wish to shake hands with you personally."

Gregor smiled at that. Then an odd thought entered into his head. "And Oberyn?"

"Oh…" Elia muttered with a devious smirk, "He'll want to give you much more than a handshake."

"I see…" Gregor commented, gazing awkwardly off to the side. He then turned back to the princess and asked "Will he?"

"Only if you permit him to," Elia assured the massive knight.

"But how does one decline an offer such as that?" Gregor thought aloud.

"Cordially and with a lot of bluntness," Elia advised him.

Gregor Clegane nodded in acknowledgment, folded his arms, and said presumptively "So it's true that your younger brother does not… discriminate on basis of gender in anything?"

"Indeed not," the princess affirmed, "He never has."

The Mountain scoffed a bit at that. That caused Elia to raise an eyebrow and inquire "Do you, Ser Gregor?"

Gregor chose his words carefully: "Generally, I do not. I would argue men are no greater than women, nor women than men. Both are capable of ruling a house, and both should be allowed to train in the ways of war."

"The whole of Dorne shares that perspective," Elia proclaimed. She leaned forward and queried "What about your personal interests?"

"If you must know, I respect my fellow man," Gregor revealed, "But I have no desire to share my bed with him."

"Oberyn would call that ignorance," Elia said cheekily, "All the same, he and I both think every person is entitled to choose their own tastes."

"I must concede there, as well," Ser Gregor declared.

There was a moment of silence. It ended when Elia stated "I assume you like women?"

"You assume correctly, Your Grace," Gregor replied, seemingly nonchalant, despite the strangeness of that question.

"Have you ever lain with one?" Elia enquired abruptly.

Gregor could not fathom what prompted that question. He was not very certain how to answer it, either. As Gregory Welch, he had been intimate with a few women on more than a few occasions. As the Mountain, he had yet to do so even once. He was certain that Elia Martell had not been the original Gregor's first, though.

Ultimately, he admitted to the princess "Alas, I have not. Yet, I mean."

"Most men who enter Dorne as virgins do not leave as such," Elia informed him, "If you are not heedful, that may be the case with you, Ser Gregor."

"I will take your warning seriously, Your Grace," Gregor pronounced, "After all, I have heard tell that the most beautiful women in the realm are from Dorne."

Elia grinned in a sly manner and asked "What do you say to that?"

"Well, pardon my forwardness, Your Grace," Gregor contended, "But if the rest of the Dornishwomen look anything like you…"

He stopped himself there. Up until this point, he and the princess had simply been engaging in friendly banter. Even the remarks about Gregor's… personal life had been relatively informal. But he had inadvertently begun to flirt with Elia. That was a very unwise idea for several reasons. For one thing, Elia was twenty-six years old; he was only seventeen. Furthermore, she was a princess of Dorne and the former Crown Princess of Westeros. He was just the heir to a third-generation knightly house in the Westerlands. It would not do well for him to seek such companionship so far above his station in this life. Aside from that, even if Elia ever did remarry, she would never be able to give her second husband children, and the continuation of one's line was the primary concern of every lord.

Fortunately, Elia did not seem offended in any way. She merely giggled at the expression across the massive knight's countenance and told him "Thank you, Ser Gregor."

"I only speak the truth, Your Grace," Gregor assured her. He had been meaning to address a certain topic with Elia ever since she came aboard. He had not gotten around to it yet, as he had never found the right opportunity. He realized that due to the nature of this conversation, this was perhaps the perfect opportunity. So he decided to address that topic. He spoke very cautiously with "On that subject… I've also heard that in Dorne, marriage is not as strict as it is everywhere else."

"That is true," Elia professed, "Husbands and wives often take paramours, but doing so is not regarded as unfaithfulness."

"Do you agree with that sentiment?" Gregor said inquisitively.

Now it was Elia's turn to look stunned. Raising an eyebrow, she inquired "Why do you ask?"

"There is something occupying my mind, Your Grace," Gregor informed her, "Does the phrase 'the dragon has three heads' hold any familiarity with you?"

Elia seemed taken aback by that question. She enquired anxiously "Where did you hear that?"

"Your husband told me it when I met him," Gregor claimed. That was not true, but only Rhaegar could prove it false. "He never explained it. But I'm beginning to understand what he meant."

"What do you believe he meant?" Princess Elia asked, definitely interested.

Gregor did not give a clear answer right away. Instead, he started his explanation with: "As I recall from my history lessons, several of the Targaryen Kings had two wives. That includes Aegon the Conqueror himself, who wed his sisters Visenya and Rhaenys."

"This is true," Elia Martell coincided with a sigh, "Two of those three people were my children's namesakes. If Rhaegar and I managed to have a third child, we would have named her Visenya."

"I'm sorry that you will never have a third child," Gregor stated sincerely
Based on his emphasis of that word, Elia could tell that he was not referring to both her and Rhaegar. Even so, she did not think much of what he was insinuating. She pointed out "Rhaegar never will either."

"Unless…" Gregor said in response. He had no intention of finishing that sentence; he just wanted to ensure that Elia would listen to him closely and take him totally seriously. That single word had that intended effect.

"Speak your mind, Ser Gregor," she bade him.

The massive knight debated 'By combining the Targaryens' polygamous relationships with your… Dornish tolerance, as you might call it, you and Rhaegar would in theory have the most open relationship in the entire country."

Elia shrugged and supposed "One could make that argument."

She may have seemed calm, but Gregor could see that she was becoming a little tense. He remarked bluntly "I must ask you a personal question, Your Grace."

Princess Elia nodded in approval, and Gregor inquired in a very straightforward tone "Was your husband the only one who took an interest in Lyanna Stark?"

Elia's eyes widened in astonishment. She looked as though her voice was caught in her throat.

Her silence was enough for Gregor. That and Rhaenys' reaction to that question. The little girl had looked up from her toys when she heard Lyanna Stark's name. Evidently, she recognized it, but she seemed giddy.

"You do not have to answer that question, Your Grace," Gregor hastily declared, "Just tell me this: am I getting somewhere?"

"Yes, you are," Elia proclaimed.

"That's all I need to know," Gregor murmured. There came another long pause, and at the end of it, he stated "As soon as we dock in Sunspear, I must go somewhere, Your Grace. I would like you and your brothers to accompany me. And your children, as well; if at all possible."

"Ser Gregor, we continue to draw breath because of you," Elia contended, "If you wish it, we'll go with you all the way to the Wall."

"We needn't go that far," Gregor told her, snickering, "We do not even have to leave Dorne. I only ask for you to ride with me to the Red Mountains."

"Very well," Elia conceded, "Might I ask why, though?"

"Because the lives of several good people are at stake," Gregor replied, "Including someone whom I believe you care deeply about, and who cares deeply for you in turn."

Despite the vague nature of Gregor's statements, Elia could fully understand the true meaning behind them. In response to it, she merely nodded her head in both acceptance and confirmation.

Shortly before noon the following day, the Diligence pulled into the docks of Sunspear. Once more, the Stormlander crew was summoned below deck. Then Princess Elia and her children disembarked, along with her ladies-in-waiting, Ser Gregor Clegane, and his men-at-arms.
They were received rather warmly by Elia's brothers. They had already been informed of what the Mountain had done for her sister. A raven from King's Landing had arrived a couple days beforehand. It had contained details of how Elia's children had been savagely murdered by Ser Amory Lorch, but Ser Gregor Clegane had saved Elia by slaying his own ally.

Elia's brothers were delighted to see that Rhaenys and Aegon lived after all. They were also impressed by how Gregor had gone to great length to ensure their survival. Especially since in the process, he had knowingly defied his liege lord at his own risk.

Just as Elia had foretold, Prince Doran had approached him and shaken his hand. He was already in his mid-thirties, but it would be over a decade before his affliction with gout. At this age had a very firm, vigorous handshake.

Elia's other presumption about her other brother proved true, as well. While Oberyn also shook Gregor's hand, he looked as though he wanted to show his appreciation even further by kissing him on the lips. Gregor was just glad he stood a foot and a-half taller than the Red Viper.

At any rate, once pleasantries were exchanged between the Martells and the Mountain, Prince Doran offered to hold a small feast in Gregor's honor. The Mountain claimed that while he was grateful for the offer, celebrating would have to wait. He and Elia jointly explained that it was urgent that they all ride for the Red Mountains.

Fortunately, it took little convincing to win Doran and Oberyn over in this proposal. They agreed to leave at once.

Doran hurriedly assembled a small company of knights and servants. At the head of the company was his captain of the guard, Areo Hotah. Between Gregor's men-at-arms and Doran's retainers, there were about fifty people in their party. Each one had his or her own horse.

Gregor made sure that Maester Caleotte joined them. That was critical, as a maester's services would most certainly be needed when they reached their destination.

Rhaenys and Aegon were brought along, as well. Elia bundled up Aegon and carried him close to her chest as she rode. As for Rhaenys, her Uncle Oberyn shared his saddle with her.

The party rode across the vast deserts of Dorne for thirteen days. They generally restricted their movements to the late morning and the early evening, as it was usually too hot to travel in the middle of the day and too cold to travel by night.

Finally, at the end of an exhausting 400-mile trek, the party came within sight of a majestic stronghold. There were three figures standing watch at the base of the building. They were clad in the white armor of the Kingsguard. They were Ser Oswell Whent, Ser Gerold Hightower, and Ser Arthur Dayne.

Gregor had his men-at-arms remain behind. Doran did the same with his soldiers and servants.

While everyone else set up camp five miles away, Ser Gregor Clegane, Prince Doran Martell, Princess Elia Martell, Princess Oberyn Martell, and Maester Caleotte galloped on to the Tower of Joy.

When they reached the top of the hill that overlooked the Tower, they brought their horses to a halt. By then, the three Kingsguard knights had noticed them, as well.

Elia proceeded onward by herself. Her brothers, the maester, and Gregor watched as she galloped down the hill and approached the Tower of Joy. They observed her as she spoke with Ser Arthur, Ser Gerold, and Ser Oswell.

Gregor could not discern anything they said, but he could imagine it was a fairly heated discussion. More than a few times, one of the four of them raised his or her voice. Evidently, a lot of personal feelings and thoughts were being brought into the matter.

Elia did pull through in the end, however. After nearly an hour of trying and failing to reason with the three Kingsguard knights, they yielded to her logic. Subsequently, Elia turned back to the others and waved them over.

Gregor noticed the look of skepticism and disdain the Kingsguard gave him as he neared the Tower of Joy. He did not believe that was due to anything he personally had done. He assumed that the three of them were simply mistrustful by nature. After all, he had done nothing to warrant their antagonism.

Still, Gregor was hoping he would not have to fight them. He himself was a very adept swordsman, but the skills of these three were well-known, particularly Ser Arthur.

Once Gregor, Doran, Oberyn, and Maester Caleotte caught up to Elia, the Princess and Maester Caleotte went up the stairs to the Tower of Joy. Elia brought Aegon and Rhaenys with them. Gregor would have liked to have gone with them, but he was not about to interfere in what could be regarded as a family affair.

For several days, Gregor waited anxiously as Elia Martell and Maester Caleotte tended to Lyanna Stark. The wolf girl's screams could be heard for over a mile in any direction. Gregor wished he could have done something to relieve her suffering, but he had no idea how to ease the process of childbirth. He could only stand by and hope for the best.

For once, the best actually came about. Eventually, Lyanna's screams subsided. They were replaced with the wailing of an infant. That was when Maester Caleotte allowed the others to enter the Tower. Doran and Oberyn accepted the offer to enter, but Gregor decided to wait. Another prominent group was about to arrive, and Gregor was not going to be absent when they turned up.

Just a few hours later, he spotted seven riders approaching from the north. Quite appropriate, considering their origins. One-by-one, he identified them all. Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell. Martyn Cassel, his captain of the guard. Ethan Glover of Deepwood Motte, the only member of Brandon Stark's party to survive the Black Cells. Lord Willam Dustin of Barrowtown. Theo Wull of the Mountain Clans. Ser Mark Ryswell of the Rills. Lord Howland Reed of Greywater Watch. Only two of them were originally destined to survive. Gregor was determined for all seven of them to.

As the Northmen trotted closer to the Tower of Joy, Gregor stayed out of sight. He did not wish to give them the wrong impression by appearing to be on the side of the three Kingsguard. So he went up to fetch Elia. The Dornish princess was able to pry herself from Lyanna's side long enough to avert this needless loss of life.

Soon enough, the Northmen dismounted their horses and approached the Tower very slowly. Gregor and Elia stood at the top of the steps and witnessed the confrontation between them and the Kingsguard.

"I looked for you on the Trident," Ned said to them.

"We were not there," Ser Gerold answered.
"Woe to the Usurper if we had been," said Ser Oswell.

"When King's Landing fell, Ser Jaime slew your king with a golden sword, and I wondered where you were."

"Far away," Ser Gerold said, "or Aerys would yet sit the Iron Throne, and our false brother would burn in seven hells."

"I came down on Storm's End to lift the siege," Ned told them, "And the Lords Tyrell and Redwyne dipped their banners, and all their knights bent the knee to pledge us fealty. I was certain you would be among them."

"Our knees do not bend easily," said Ser Arthur Dayne.

"Ser Willem Darry is fled to Dragonstone, with your queen and Prince Viserys. I thought you might have sailed with him."

"Ser Willem is a good man and true," said Ser Oswell.

"But not of the Kingsguard," Ser Gerold pointed out. "The Kingsguard does not flee."

"Then or now," said Ser Arthur.

"We swore a vow," explained old Ser Gerold.

Ned's vassals moved up beside him, with swords in hand. They were seven against three.

"Now it ends," Ned said with sadness in his voice.

"No," said Ser Arthur Dayne, the Sword of the Morning, with a grin that was wholly uncharacteristic of him, "Now it begins, my lord."

With that, he gestured to the top of the stairs. The wolf lord and his retainers gazed upward, and there Gregor and Elia were, smiling as well.

"Welcome, Lord Eddard," Gregor said cordially, "Your sister awaits you."

Ned Stark and his six companions were notably confused by this sudden development. The seven of them had come, fully expecting a skirmish. Instead, they were being greeted peacefully.

Fortunately, Eddard chose to have faith in Ser Gregor's words. He and his men sheathed their weapons, and they made for the staircase.

"Just you, Lord Eddard," Elia requested, "Lyanna is still recovering."

"Recovering from what?" Eddard asked, perplexed.

"See for yourself, my lord," Gregor proposed in good humor.

Ned kept one hand on the hilt of his sword as a precaution. He swiftly made the ascent up the staircase to the Tower of Joy. There, Gregor held the door open for him, and the Lord of Winterfell passed through.

He found his sister on a bed.

She looked the vision of health. That was all thanks to the persistent efforts of Maester Caleotte.
She did not just look healthy; Lyanna was definitely going to live.

Gregor felt a little annoyed. Lyanna's life could have been saved all along if Rhaegar had been smart enough to leave a maester with her. Did he think childbirth was effortless or something?

There were three people there that Eddard had not expected to see at all. They were not Maester Caleotte, Prince Doran, and Prince Oberyn. Instead, they were the small girl sitting on Doran's lap, the tiny babe in Oberyn's arm, and the newborn babe Lyanna was cradling close to her breast.

"Lya…" Eddard whispered, amazed.

He rushed to his sister's bed and embraced her warmly. The wolf girl began to cry tears of joy as she hugged her brother with her one free arm.

When they came apart, Eddard gazed down at the babe in his sister's arms. He asked with a smile "Who is this?"

"The third head," Gregor remarked.

"I beg your pardon, Ser Gregor?" Ned stated.

"I shall explain in time, Lord Eddard," the Mountain asserted.

Eddard Stark was content with that answer for now. When he turned back to his sister, Lyanna informed him "Ned, this is your nephew, Jon. Jon Targaryen."
While Eddard Stark was elated to be reunited with his sister at long last, he was stricken with confusion, as well. That confusion was only heightened when he heard the full name of his newborn nephew.

Ned turned from baby Jon to his mother, and he repeated "Targaryen?"

Lyanna merely nodded her head twice. Her momentary joy had disappeared alongside his.

"I know this raises a lot of questions," Lyanna admitted, "All I ask is that you give me a chance to answer them."

Eddard had not ridden hundreds of miles to find his sister just to judge her prematurely. He agreed to allow her the opportunity to explain herself. To her good fortune, she did not have to do so alone. Elia was there to assist her.

Five minutes later, Lord Eddard Stark, Lady Lyanna Stark, Ned's six companions, the three knights of the Kingsguard, Prince Doran Martell, Princess Elia Martell, Prince Oberyn Martell, and Ser Gregor Clegane were gathered in the main chamber of the Tower of Joy.

Jon, Aegon, and Rhaenys were being tended to by Maester Caleotte and Wylla, the midwife Rhaegar had afforded Lyanna.

Lyanna was still too weak from childbirth to rise, so she remained in bed. She did manage to sit up straight with Elia's help.

Once she had the attention of everyone in the room, she proceeded to provide an explanation. "First of all, you should know that I was not kidnapped."

Eddard had already surmised that much, but he and his companions were still astonished to hear it from the wolf girl's lips.

"After Rhaegar crowned me at Harrenhal, I sought out Elia," Lyanna revealed, "My aim was to give her the crown of roses and beg for her forgiveness. At the time, all I could think of was of how much shame I must have caused her. Yet when I found her, she greeted me with kindness instead of hostility."

"I did not fault her for my husband's decision to give her the crown," Elia took over, "I was touched by Lyanna's bravery and empathy; not many women would have done what she did. I bade her to stay with me in my tent for the night. We talked well into the late hours. By daybreak, we were sharing our most intimate secrets with each other."

I'll believe that. Gregor had done the same with Elia aboard the Diligence.

"We each assumed that Rhaegar had a different reason for naming me his Queen of Love and Beauty," Lyanna stated, "Both our reasons turned out to be correct. My reason was the lesser, but it seemed the more obvious at the time."

"What was it?" Eddard Stark queried.
"Do you remember the Knight of the Laughing Tree?" Lyanna asked rhetorically.

Ned gave a light nod, and Lyanna announced "When Lord Howland Reed arrived at the tourney, he was harassed and beaten by three ruffians. Those ruffians were squires to knights from Houses Blount, Frey, and Haigh. I stepped in and chased them off."

Eddard Stark turned to Howland Reed, and the crannogman proclaimed "It's true, Lord Eddard. At her own risk, Lady Lyanna fought to protect my honor. I am indebted to her for that."

"Although I had given the squires a taste of Northern justice, I was determined to teach them humility, too," Lyanna continued, "With Lord Howland's help, I acquired some armor and weapons, and I entered the tourney lists under a false name."

Realization quickly dawned on those who did not already know the truth.

"You were the Knight of the Laughing Tree?" Eddard presumed.

"Yes," Lyanna Stark confirmed, "As you know, I succeeded in my goal. I unhorsed the knights of Blount, Frey, and Haigh, and I encouraged them to guide their squires to be better people. Even after, I considered continuing to compete in the joust. Unfortunately, I had to cut my act short. You all know why."

"The Mad King had another of his many delusions," Oberyn Martell recounted in a dry undertone, "He was led to believe that the Knight of the Laughing Tree was plotting to murder him."

"When Aerys commanded the Knight to be brought before him, I fled," Lyanna went on, "Rhaegar was sent by his father to find me. He stumbled upon me whilst I was removing my armor. Seeing no other way out, I explained my actions to him. To my relief, he found no wrong in them. He promised he would not deliver me to his father… on the condition that I attend the rest of the joust. As a spectator only, of course."

"Then Princess Elia was not the only admirer of your 'bravery and empathy,'" Eddard noted, smirking. He was quite amused by this discovery. Brandon may have been known as "The Wild Wolf," but Lyanna had always been the uncontrollable one. It was just like his sister to do something as rash and reckless as partake in a tourney.

"So Prince Rhaegar crowned you for your heroics in the joust, my lady?" Martyn Cassel conjectured.

"That was what I assumed at first," Lyanna contended, "Then Elia told me her reason."

At that, everyone's focus shifted from Lyanna Stark to the older woman at her side. Elia Martell thusly stated "In his youth, Rhaegar became obsessed with a prophecy. To explain it would take more time than we can spare. It can be abridged to five words: 'The dragon has three heads.'"

Gregor could guess what was coming next. Even so, he listened as intently as everyone else.

Elia illuminated further "The prophecy forecasts the ending of the world itself. It will come in the form of coldness, darkness, and death. Only fire, light, and life can repel this terrible threat. The three-headed dragon will provide all three."

"But what does that have to do with Lady Lyanna?" Gregor inquired, hoping to confirm an old fan theory.

"The three heads of the dragon are supposed to represent three Targaryen children," Elia elaborated, "At least, that was what Rhaegar believed. He also believed that sometime after those three children are grown, actual dragons would return to the known world."

"Dragons have been extinct for over a century," Ser Mark Ryswell pointed out.

"Well, who's to say they cannot come back?" debated Theo Wull, ever the superstitious one.

Paying no mind to those comments, Elia revealed "Rhaegar saw all the signs leading up to the prophecy. Overtime, he became more and more convinced that the end would soon be upon us. As the heir to the Iron Throne, he made it his duty to prevent it. He even tasked himself with being the father of the three heads of the dragon."

After a brief pause, she muttered despairingly "Alas, I was only able to give him two. After Aegon, my womb would never quicken again."

"Even so, Rhaegar did not relent in his efforts to conceive a third child," Lyanna disclosed, "Hence, what happened at Harrenhal."

Eddard Stark's eyes widened in astonishment, as did those of his companions.

"I know how this sounds," Lyanna claimed, "When Elia told me of the prophecy, I assumed she was jesting. Even so, I let her take me to see Rhaegar the following morning. He confirmed everything she said, and I found out that his crowning of me was merely a pretext to his true intention. He told me that he wished me to be the mother of his third child."

Lyanna scoffed and mumbled ruefully "I thought he was mad as his father. I was tempted to leave him and Elia without another word."

"Why didn't you, my lady?" Lord Willam Dustin queried.

"Elia persuaded me to hear them out," Lyanna explicated, "So I did. By the end of that conversation, I must have been a little mad myself. Because I began to believe in the prophecy's validity, as well."

"After just one conversation?" Eddard remarked, clearly amazed, "What did they say to you?"

"Words can leave a great impact on people, Ned," was all Lyanna told her brother in response.

"What came next?" asked Howland Reed.

Lyanna continued with: "Rhaegar only asked me to be his third child's mother. The decision was mine to make. He did not force me to choose on the spot, either. He allotted me a full month to decide. He said that at the end of one month, he would come for my answer. Whatever it was, he would accept it."

Lyanna gazed at the wall languorously and muttered "For a full moon's turn after Harrenhal, I considered my options. For a while, staying in the North seemed preferable to going south. I also felt I was too young to be a mother."

"There we can agree," Eddard conceded, chuckling.

Lyanna chuckled with him, but then she became a little sterner and pronounced "To help me make my decision, I did some research. I spent a lot of time in the library at Winterfell. Probably more than I ever did in the rest of my life. I found some northern legends that bear tremendous similarity to the prophecy of the three-headed dragon. The accounts varied, but they all declared that the
"The world would eventually cease to be through otherworldly means."

"Those were legends, Lya," Eddard argued, "I'd take no more stock in them than I would in Old Nan's stories."

"Some of Old Nan's stories might have actually been history lessons, Ned," Lyanna contended, "The more I read, the more ground I found to believe Rhaegar's prophecy. Soon I was split between going and staying. A week before my reply was due, I concluded I could not make the decision on my own. I elected to seek someone's counsel. Unfortunately, you were already back at the Eyrie with Robert and Lord Jon, Brandon was down in Riverrun, and I was too afraid to approach Father. That just left Benjen."

Eddard's brow furrowed at that. He loved Benjen as much as Lyanna did, but Ben was still a child. Between the four Starks of their generation, Benjen was the one who would not lose interest in Old Nan's stories. He may even retain some belief in them. Ned beckoned his sister "Go on."

"I told Ben all about the prophecy," Lyanna reminisced, "When I was finished, he gave me but one piece of advice. He counseled me to do what I thought to be right."

She let out a slow sigh and murmured "Of course, only I could decide what I thought was right. Running off with a prince might have been irresponsible and silly, but letting the world end when I could have helped save it was far worse. Either way, I knew I would be taking a risk, but the risk of the prophecy being true was just too great to ignore."

"So you willingly chose to go with Rhaegar Targaryen," Eddard Stark concluded.

"Which was no easy task," Lyanna continued, "My betrothal to Robert complicated matters. I did not wish to disgrace our family or his. The only way we could accomplish Rhaegar's plan was if it was done quietly. I swore Benjen to secrecy, and in the middle of the night, I snuck out of Winterfell. Since Rhaegar wanted his third child to be a legitimate one, he and I were wed in front of a heart tree near Castle Cerwyn. Ser Arthur, Ser Gerold, Ser Oswell, and Elia stood as witnesses."

"Didn't Prince Rhaegar's first marriage come into question?" enquired Howland Reed.

"Targaryens have had two wives before, Lord Howland," Gerold Hightower disclosed.

"Indeed," Arthur Dayne concurred, "Furthermore, Prince Rhaegar's marriage to Princess Elia was done in a sept for the New Gods. His marriage to Princess Lyanna was done in front of the Old Gods. Neither nullifies the other."

"That may be," Eddard Stark declared, suddenly a little rigid, "But there's something I must know, Lyanna."

"What, Ned?" the wolf girl asked.

"Why didn't you say anything?" Eddard all but demanded, "To just up and leave without a word… that's reckless, even for you. You could have at least left a note."

Lyanna looked flabbergasted. "But I did leave a note, Ned."

Eddard's aggravation was rapidly replaced with bewilderment. "You did?"

"Yes, I wrote messages for you, Father, and Brandon," Lyanna asserted, "To ensure that they got to you, we sent out three riders and three ravens. Two were destined for Winterfell, two for Riverrun, two for the Eyrie."

"We never received any of them," Eddard countered.

"I sent them, Ned!" Lyanna insisted, "I was so certain they would reach you in time. I was just as shocked as you were when Brandon rode to King's Landing and demanded Rhaegar's head."

"Now look where we are," Eddard mumbled through gritted teeth, "Father… Brandon… Rhaegar… so many others, gone. The fact that you weren't abducted changes everything. I am somewhat comforted by the knowledge that you tried to inform us of your activities. But it makes little difference in the long run. Everyone who died in the rebellion died for nothing."

"No," Ser Oswell Whent disputed, "Not for nothing, Lord Eddard."

"Because of some prophecy…?" Eddard began.

"Ser Oswell is not referring to the prophecy," Gerold Hightower interrupted him, "Prince Rhaegar was conspiring to remove his father from power. That was the true purpose of the tourney at Harrenhal. It was Rhaegar's way of sorting out those loyal to the crown and those loyal to the realm."

"As one who was subjected to the Mad King's 'hospitality,' I can say with certainty that the realm is the obvious choice," Ethan Glover claimed irately, still bearing his wounds from his time in the black cells.

"War was unavoidable in any case," Arthur Dayne debated, "Within two years, the realm would have bled. It was merely a grim misfortune that it did so before we were ready."

"Well, I should congratulate you; you succeeded anyhow," Eddard snapped in anger, "Aerys is no longer on the throne. But neither is his son. Worse yet, before the rebellion, I was third in line to Winterfell. Now, all because of carless negligence, I'm its lord."

"We all sincerely regret that your father and brother were the first of the war's casualties, Lord Eddard," Elia professed, "But please do not place all the guilt for their deaths at Lyanna's feet. I am just as much to blame for your sister's flight as she or my husband is."

"I can accept that, Your Grace," Eddard uttered, still quite furious, "But my father and brother might still live if you had not been so hasty."

"Enough!" Gregor Clegane bellowed, causing everyone present to jump. When all eyes were on him, he pronounced "What's done is done and cannot be undone. There is no use lamenting over it. I understand your frustration, Lord Eddard, but you just waged a war to rescue your sister. I would do the same for mine. I would not care whether or not she was the reason for all the fighting. I would thank the gods if they just kept her alive and reunited me with her."

There came an interval of silence as everyone absorbed the Mountain's point. Eddard let out a slow breath and commented "You've an excellent point, Ser Gregor. I am happy to be with Lya again, I assure you. I could never hate her for this or anything. But even so…"

He did not finish his sentence. He just sighed and leaned against the wall, brushing his long dark brown hair out of his eyes.

"Ned, when I heard about Father and Brandon, I was devastated," Lyanna apprised her brother, not wanting him to think her heartless or thoughtless, "I was so overcome with guilt that I wanted to kill myself at one point. Luckily, Elia and Rhaegar talked me out of that. Later on, I thought about coming out of hiding, but they talked me out of that, too. My reappearance would not have been enough to cease the fighting; it would have only made things worse. Also, I was already with child by then. There would have been no way to explain that without telling the truth. The only solution was for me to go somewhere untouched by the war. So Elia and Rhaegar sent me here for the duration of my pregnancy. Ser Arthur, Ser Oswell, and Ser Gerold have not been holding me prisoner. They've been protecting me."

"They performed their job admirably," Doran Martell noted.

The three Kingsguard knights appeared indifferent to the prince's remark, but they were evidently pleased to have their obedience acknowledged.

"So, where do we go from here?" Oberyn Martell asked curiously.

Gregor stepped forward and announced "For now… I'd recommend doing nothing."

At least Doran will approve of that strategy.

Few others there did, though.

"Nothing?" Gerold Hightower murmured, as though he was disgusted.

"What would you do?" Gregor firmly debated, "The rebellion is over. The realm has been torn apart by war. Most of those who were loyal to the Targaryens have sworn fealty to the Baratheons.
There is no point to start the fighting up again. Not when the Seven Kingdoms have been weakened so. Tomorrow you can plan a counterrevolution. Tomorrow you can scheme to restore the Targaryens to the throne. Tomorrow you can plan another war. For today, we should cut our losses and focus on repairing Westeros."

Once again, the Mountain had everyone at a loss for words. They could all agree on at least one of his points. None of them wanted another war so soon after the last one.

"Ser Gregor is correct," Prince Doran contended, "The best course is the gradual one. After all, was it not Rhaegar's impulsiveness that incited the rebellion?"

"Does anyone have anything to say against that?" Arthur Dayne inquired in interest.

When no one spoke, Ser Arthur observed "Then we're all in agreement. Much as the concept of the Usurper on the Iron Throne may repulse some of us, there is little we can do to protest."

"Then for now, we'll allow Robert Baratheon to keep his crown," Doran Martell proclaimed.

"But only for now," Oberyn Martell added in.

Gregor was positive that the Martells were already plotting to put the Targaryens. Needless to say, they would do it in a way that would benefit Dorne heavily. While he doubted he had the capacity to talk them out of this venture, he figured he could at least attempt to get them to consider alternate different approaches.

"I have a proposal," Gregor declared. Once he had everyone's attention, he went on with: "Give Robert Baratheon a chance. He may be a Usurper, but his grandmother was a Targaryen. He does have some claim to the Iron Throne, small though it is. Aside from that, he was the one the rebels selected as their king. They could have chosen Lord Eddard, Lord Tywin, or even Lord Jon. They picked Robert. I would like to believe they did not pick him without reason. They have faith in him. That's more than anyone ever had in Aerys."
"Well, he could hardly be worse than Aerys, either," Elia argued.

"Anyone is better than that fucking madman," Lyanna said flatly.

Except maybe for that shitstain Walder Frey.

"Very well," Gerold Hightower proclaimed, "We'll give your proposal some consideration, Ser Gregor. The wisest course of action would be for some of us to remain in hiding. The children in particular."

"You will provoke no argument from anyone there, Ser Gerold," Gregor proclaimed, "As long as the children are alive, they are not safe. When I placed those decoys in front of the throne, Robert smirked and called them 'dragonspawn.'"

"Yet you would still have us support his reign," Oswell Whent pointed out, grimacing.

"I am holding out hope that he may eventually overcome his prejudice," Gregor claimed, "Until then, the survival of Rhaegar's heirs must be assured."

"Indeed," Doran Martell concurred. A few seconds later, he proposed "Perhaps the surest way to guarantee their safety would be if they were not all kept in the same location."

"I agree," Arthur Dayne coincided, "The children should be kept separate for their own protection."

"I refuse to part with Aegon," Elia declared straightaway. An answer to her concern was devised almost as quickly.

"It would not be difficult for us to keep him in Sunspear," Doran told his sister, "Oberyn could claim him as one of his bastards."

"Certainly," Oberyn stated approvingly, "I already have four daughters. Some would say I was overdue for a son."

"Fair point," Elia stated, amused at her other brother's logic.

"I can shelter Princess Rhaenys in Greywater Watch," Howland Reed offered, "I can ascertain that she will be happy and comfortable there. She would not even have to go under a false name. As long as she is under my protection, no one will ever find her in the Neck."

"Are you absolutely certain of that, Lord Howland?" Elia enquired out of concern for her daughter.

"Quite, Your Grace," the crannogman asserted, "Even little birds can get lost and drown in swamps."

Varys won't like that.

"There is just one aspect that bothers me," Elia pronounced, "She won't have anyone she knows with her."

"Not so, Elia," Lyanna refuted, sitting up a little more, "I'll go with Rhaenys. In what time I've spent with her, I've come to think of her as my own daughter."

Elia was notably pleased by that revelation. She placed her hand on Lyanna's shoulder and remarked "As long as you're with her, I know Rhaenys will be in good hands, Lya."

Lyanna placed her own hand on her friend's hand "Thank you."
Gerold Hightower then stepped forward and observed "But, my princess, that implies that you will have to disappear, as well."

"You assume rightly, Ser Gerold," Lyanna affirmed, "It may be best for all of us if I remain in hiding, as well."

"What of Prince Jon?" Oswell Whent inquired.

"He should be with his family," Lyanna declared, gazing to her brother.

Eddard Stark nodded and stated "I'll take him back to Winterfell and raise him alongside my own son."

"How will you explain him?" Doran Martell asked.

"I'll claim him as my own," Ned stated decisively.

"That would be unwise, Lord Eddard," Gregor immediately disputed, "If you say he is yours, your wife will hold ill will towards both you and Jon. Jon more than you."

"How can you be certain of that, Ser Gregor?" Eddard queried.

"You must trust me, my lord," Gregor contended, "Princess Elia may have been willing to share her husband with your sister, but not all women are as open-minded as she. Furthermore, the Riverlands are full of inherently unforgiving families. The Blackwoods, the Brackens, the Darrys, the Freys... the Tullys are no exception. Catelyn Tully may tolerate Jon if he was your bastard, but she would never accept him."

"Then what would you do, Ser Gregor?" Eddard inquired.

"Would it not be more practical to claim he was Brandon's?" Gregor advised, "From what I've heard of your late brother, he was quite popular with the fair sex."

"He was," Eddard and Lyanna replied in unison.

"In that case, I might have a solution," Ser Arthur Dayne interjected, "My sister Ashara was quite taken with your brother during the tourney at Harrenhal. Recently, she gave birth to a stillborn daughter whom she claimed was his. We could use that situation to our advantage."

"You want me to tell everyone that Jon is the product of Brandon and Ashara's free union?" Eddard assumed.

"If you've a better proposal, I am listening, Lord Eddard," Arthur retorted bluntly.

"No, I think that one may actually work," Eddard thought aloud, "Yes, it could... the timing works out, the concept is fairly plausible, no one could challenge its legitimacy... yes, it would work."

"Then it's settled," Prince Doran announced, "Aegon will grow up in Sunspear, Rhaenys in Greywater Watch, Jon in Winterfell. Does anyone have any objections?"

Only Eddard did. He had just one. He muttered "Robert planned to make Lyanna his queen, as she is still his betrothed. Since that is not to happen, my only other option is to tell him that Lyanna is dead. I worry about how he will handle that news."

"Truthfully, so do I," Lyanna proclaimed, "I do not love Robert, but I certainly do not hate him, either. I already shamed him once when I disregarded our betrothal. I don't wish to be the cause of any further suffering on his part."

"You needn't worry about that, my lady," Gregor stated, "When we get back to King's Landing, Lord Eddard and I are supposed to have a private audience with Robert Baratheon. There I will talk to him."

"Talk to him?" Eddard muttered in disbelief, "Ser Gregor, Robert's a man of action, not a man of words."

"Oh, don't be too certain, Lord Eddard," Ser Gregor Clegane contended, "It's as your sister said; one should never underestimate the influence words can have on people."

Chapter End Notes

Note: Some people will probably make the observation that Eddard is strangely forgiving of Lyanna's rash behavior. I would like to clarify right now; he has NOT fully accepted her reasons for eloping with Rhaegar. That will be discussed in further detail in future chapters. Also, some people seemed heavily against the theory that Lyanna went with Rhaegar willingly; their reason being that all the casualties of Robert's Rebellion essentially died simply because of a very bad idea. I would ask those same people to consider this: The War of the Five Kings started simply because Ned was stupid enough to trust Littlefinger. I call that a far poorer decision than Lyanna choosing to go with Rhaegar voluntarily, and that one's canon. Oh, and some people will find it odd that I did not go through with the idea of making Lyanna Robert's queen. The answer is simple; I found that in the wars to come, that arrangement would generate too many conflicting loyalties for the Starks and the Northmen alike. So Cersei will still be Robert's queen, but their marriage MIGHT not be as strained as it was in the books and show. Just wait for Gregor's talk with Robert. Lastly, Lyanna may seem strangely indifferent to the idea of parting with Jon. Believe me; she is NOT. That will be made evident in the next chapter.
The Power Of Speech

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A large company had assembled at the Tower of Joy. However, no one in it lingered for long.

It was decided that one of the Kingsguard would each travel with Rhaenys, Aegon, and Jon. Aside from their inborn obligation to protect Rhaegar's heirs, Ser Oswell, Ser Arthur, and Ser Gerold were adamant in their refusal to bend the knee to Robert. So the three of them would have to go into hiding, as well.

Lord Eddard Stark declared that when he returned to King's Landing, he would tell Robert that there had been a skirmish at the Tower of Joy, and all three of the Kingsguard had been slain. Then there would be no inquiries as to their whereabouts.

Ser Arthur Dayne, Ser Oswell Whent, and Ser Gerold Hightower were all brothers to the current lords of Starfall, Harrenhal, and Oldtown respectively. Their families were from Dorne, the Riverlands, and the Reach.

Ser Arthur was the only one who had the option to stay in his homeland. Furthermore, even if he was not famous for his swordsmanship, Dornishmen were fairly easy to recognize in the other regions of Westeros. So Arthur would be the one to remain in Sunspear with Aegon.

Ser Oswell and Ser Gerold would both be going to the North. Lady Minisa Tully – the mother of Lord Eddard's new wife Catelyn – had been a Whent by birth. Thus, if one was to look close enough between Ser Oswell and Lady Catelyn, they would eventually notice a number of similarities.

As a result, it was deemed safer if Ser Oswell accompanied Rhaenys to Greywater Watch. That left Ser Gerold to go to Winterfell with Jon.

Naturally, the White Bull and the Sword of the Morning would have to assume a new identity where they were going. They would have to change their names and their facades, but they would worry on that later. They had bigger issues to worry on than their appearances.

Eddard knew it would have been ludicrous to claim that the three knights had fallen without taking some of his party with them. With that in mind, a few of Ned's companions would have to disappear alongside the Kingsguard. For a while, at any rate.

Obviously, Eddard Stark and Howland Reed would have to be among the survivors, otherwise the plans to protect Jon and Rhaenys would fail. Additionally, neither man had any desire whatsoever to feign his death, and the North and the Neck relied heavily on both of them. So the casualties would have to be selected from the other five Northmen.

Martyn Cassel did not wish to leave his son Jory fatherless, and Willam Dustin was the last of his house. They were omitted as potential casualties thusly.

Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, and Theo Wull had no children of their own, and they all came from relatively large families. For those reasons – along with a few person ones – the three of them agreed to play the victim. Lord Howland would give them asylum at Greywater Watch, too.

Gregor was impressed by just how much those men were willing to sacrifice. They were leaving behind everything in their own lives all for the sakes of three small children they hardly knew. Then he remembered; the chief characteristic of the North – the one that distinguished it from the rest of Westeros – was that almost every house was indisputably loyal to its liege lord, so long as he was a Stark. They must have been doing this more for Eddard than for Jon and his half-siblings. In any case, their actions were honorable.

Two days later, Lyanna was well enough to travel. That was when the company at the Tower of Joy broke off into the three smaller groups and made ready to depart.

Elia tearfully said good-bye to Rhaenys. The little girl wept, but she promised her mother that she would be good and that she would stay strong. She did find some comfort in her kitten Balerion, and she was overjoyed when she was told that Lyanna would be going with her.

Lyanna assured Elia that she would raise Rhaenys as though she was her own child. That seemed to reassure the older woman, who embraced the wolf girl the way she would a sister.

Gregor knew that Lyanna meant well by her pledge. Even so, it could have been interpreted in a good or bad light, seeing as how Lyanna was not even bringing her own child with her. Instead, she had charged someone else with the care of her son, much like Elia had.

Lyanna may have seemed indifferent to the concept of parting with Jon when the idea was first put forth. But now, when she was on the verge of going through with it, her maternal instincts fully rose to the surface. When Wylla asked for Jon, his mother held her newborn very close to her, as though she would never let him go. Gregor found her protectiveness somewhat reminiscent of Lysa Arryn. Only not as possessive, far less unstable, and not immune to reason.

So strong was Lyanna's reluctance to relinquish custody of her son that it threatened to ruin all their plans then and there. Fortunately, Eddard Stark stepped in and reminded his sister that this would not be the last time she would ever see her son. Someday, when it was deemed safe, the two of them would reunite. Until then, Eddard swore he would do right by his nephew.

Lyanna had not forgotten how the realm had already bled because of her carelessness. She had no desire to be the cause of any more trouble in the world so soon after. Plus, she knew she could trust her brother. He had always been the responsible one. He was also one of the few truly good men in Westeros. So she forced herself to give Jon over to Wylla. However, just before they parted, Lyanna went to Eddard and whispered into his ear "Promise me, Ned. Promise me..."

Gregor was the only one close enough to hear her. I can almost taste the irony.

Just as in the franchise, those had been the last words Lyanna shared with her brother at the Tower of Joy. The difference was that in this universe, they would not be the last words she ever had with him.

After Ned gave his sister his vow to protect Jon, the three groups split up.

Prince Doran Martell, Prince Oberyn Martell, Princess Elia Martell, Prince Aegon Targaryen, Areo Hotah, Maester Caleotte, and the entirety of Doran's procession went east by southeast. They rode straight back to Sunspear through the vast deserts of Dorne.

Ashara Dayne had been Elia Martell's lady-in-waiting and her closest friend. As the rumors suggested, she had indeed been involved with Brandon Stark during the tourney at Harrenhal. He may have meant their affair to be nothing more than a fling at first, but Brandon secretly remained in contact with Ashara afterwards. He had died before she could inform him that she was carrying his bastard. Then the bastard herself died during birth.

In the weeks that followed, Ashara had been extremely depressed over the loss of both her one-time lover and their unborn daughter. There were even some concerns that her life might end by her own hand. That day when her brother returned home, he restored her will to live.

Ashara was surprisingly eager to go along with Gregor Clegane's plan. She was willing to enforce the claim that she and Brandon were Jon's parents. In fact, she went so far as to offer to accompany Lord Howland's party north. When questioned on her motives, she just said that helping Brandon's sister and Elia's daughter would give her a renewed sense of purpose.

Lyanna happily accepted the Dornish beauty's offer for aid. At Harrenhal, she had gotten very close to Ashara. That was due in large part to their relationships with Brandon and Elia.

To account for Ashara's disappearance, it would be said that she had flung herself from a cliff. It was not a dignified fate for her to have, but what mattered was that it was a believable one. Given how much tragedy Ashara had witnessed recently, including the supposed loss of her brother at the Tower of Joy, one could not blame her for finally breaking and taking her own life. In his first life, Gregor would have classified it as an instance of post-traumatic stress.

Ser Arthur Dayne kept a very profile whilst he was in Starfall. He managed to commission a ship to take his sister and the others north. After watching the ship sail into the horizon, he swiftly mounted his horse and rode for Sunspear.

Lord Eddard Stark, Ser Gregor Clegane, Prince Jon Targaryen, Wylla, Ser Gerold Hightower, Lord Willam Dustin, Martyn Cassel, and Gregor's men-at-arms went directly northeast. They were headed for King's Landing.

While all of Gregor's men-at-arms knew that Aegon and Rhaenys were still alive, none of them were even aware of Jon's existence yet. For Jon's safety as well as theirs, both Gregor and Eddard were hoping to delay them finding out for a while. So they had Wylla and Ser Gerold ride at the front of their column, and the men-at-arms brought up the rear. That way Jon was hidden at all times.

The march to King's Landing took about three weeks.

In the early phase of their journey, Gregor noticed Eddard was very morose. It was not difficult for Gregor to guess why. His father, his brother, and many of his friends had died in the last year. That by itself was something he could cope with. But to discover that all those deaths were actually the result of a misunderstanding concerning his ister… that was incomprehensible to him.

Gregor could not fault Eddard for harboring some feelings of resentment towards his sister. If Sandor died because of a reckless thing Ellyn had done, he would probably be cross with her, too. But he would love her no less.

Personally, Gregor thought Lyanna had made the right decision to go with Rhaegar. Considering what was going to happen north of the Wall in about twenty years, his belief in the apocalypse might not been wholly irrational.

All the same, Eddard had no way of knowing that. As such, he was inwardly fuming over his sister's actions. Eddard was not as easy to provoke as his late hot-tempered brother, but he was equally capable of being enraged. Gregor decided to do something about that. He felt the wolf lord had enough worry about without harboring a lasting grudge towards his sister.

Five days after their departure from the Tower of Joy, Gregor made a solemn effort to open Lord Eddard's mind.

He waited until nightfall, when the group made camp. Polliver and Chiswyck were guarding the horses, and Wylla was tending to Jon in her tent. Eddard was sitting alone in front of the camp's fire. Nearly everyone else had settled down for the night.

Gregor walked over to the fire and sat down opposite the wolf lord. Eddard was staring intently into the flames, as though he was a red priest. Gregor could tell he was not really trying to look into the future; he was simply lost in thought.

The Mountain gazed at the radiant embers, as well, and the two men sat in almost total silence. Finally, Gregor remarked softly "I would ask you not to be so hasty to judge your sister, Lord Eddard."

Eddard did not look up, but Gregor did not doubt that he was listening. He asked "Why is that?"

Gregor leaned back, folded his arms, and firmly stated "For all we know, there may very well be some stock in that prophecy."

That made Ned shift his gaze upwards. He bore the countenance of one who is stunned. "I did not take you for the superstitious type, Ser Gregor."

"Because I am not," Gregor claimed. As he fed a log to the fire, he muttered "What are your house's words? 'Winter is coming'?"

"They are," Ned affirmed.

"Have you ever pondered on their meaning?" Gregor inquired, "Or why they are your words?"

"Of course I have," Eddard professed, "I believe they serve as a reminder. A reminder that no matter how prosperous and beautiful life can be, there will always be suffering and hardship in this world. Like or not, we must all face our own trials and tribulations in time. Attempting to avoid them would be futile. The proper course is to face them as they come."

"You've a wise and heedful interpretation, my lord," Gregor admitted, "But it could mean something more. Perhaps they are a premonition."

"A premonition of what?" Eddard enquired, suddenly more interested in the conversation.

Gregor blew on the flames thrice to feed some air into them. After that, he spoke bluntly "I assume you are familiar with the Long Night?"

"I am," Ned responded, "It happened long ago, during the era of the First Men. It brought about a seemingly endless winter, which in turn threatened the demise of sunlight and the end of all life. There was no hope of it ending until the Night's Watch chose to ally with the children of the forest. Together, they repelled the Others and defeated the Night's King."

Gregor could not recall if Eddard's version of how the Long Night ended was in accordance with the widely-believed version of its resolution, but that was not what was really important. What really mattered was that Eddard was willing to talk on it.
"So you do not think the Long Night is a myth?" Gregor presumed.

"No," Eddard contended, "The world was young then. Momentous wonders and unspeakable horrors alike were commonplace in those days."

The fact that Eddard was not denying the Long Night as a historical event helped Gregor considerably here. He tossed some dried leaves into the bottom of the fire pit, and he commented "According to Rhaegar's prophecy, when the apocalypse comes, it will bring with it coldness, darkness, and death. What does that remind you of?"

Eddard quickly caught on to what Gregor was implying. For a moment, he appeared to be aghast. Then he eased down and said dismissively "The Long Night is centuries over, Ser Gregor."

"Who's to say it cannot happen again?" Gregor countered, "The Night's King was not destroyed; he was simply banished beyond the Wall. Eight thousand years would give him plenty of time to regain his strength and build up his forces. Think of all the watchmen and wildlings that have died in that timeframe. There must be millions, and every one of them could rise again."

By now, Eddard was at full attention. He sat up straight and murmured inquiringly "That's why you're willing to consider the validity of that prophecy? You believe 'winter is coming' is actually a warning that the Long Night will relapse?"

"Your ancestor Brandon the Builder erected the Wall," Gregor replied for emphasis, "If he made it solely to keep out the wildlings, he could have stopped at seventy feet. He stopped at seven hundred. No one builds an obstruction that massive unless the thing they wish to keep out is an absolute monstrosity. So I say he knew that the Long Night never actually ended. It merely went on hiatus."

Ned gradually returned his gaze to the flames. He stared longingly into them, as though they had become the world's last rays of hope. He mumbled in a chillingly calm voice "If that's true, then the war we just fought is nothing against what's to come."

"Do not lose faith, my lord," Gregor beckoned him. Throughout the conversation, the fire had gotten larger, warmer, and brighter. The Mountain used his sword to prod the branches around and replenish the kindling. He then pronounced "Westeros survived the Long Night once. It can do so once more."

"Aye, it can," Eddard conceded. He rested his chin on his hands and muttered "But suppose it returns during our lifetime. Will we be ready when winter finally comes?"

"That is entirely up to us," was Gregor's brief yet straightforward answer.

_Us, and a trio of airborne, fire-breathing reptiles. Rhaegar was right about that much, at least._

Gregor was certain that by the following morning, Eddard would regard the second Long Night as little more than a probable occurrence. Within a month, he would most likely shove his newfound anxiety over it to the back of his mind. For now, Gregor was content with that.

He was just pleased that he had lessened Ned's feelings of resentment and fury towards his sister, and that he had succeeded in opening Ned's eyes up to the biggest threat Westeros would imminently face. He now knew he possessed the capacity to gain Ned's trust. That was imperative, as he would need men like Eddard Stark on his side in the days to come.

Slightly over a fortnight later, Eddard Stark, Gregor Clegane, and the rest of their party reached the capital city of Westeros. The outskirts of the city were far less crowded than they had been upon their departure. Evidently, most of the Westerlords and their forces had gone home.

House Clegane's camp still stood along the southeastern shore of King's Landing. Gregor sent his men-at-arms to inform the soldiers and servants that they too would be leaving for the Westerlands soon. Until he could don a disguise, Ser Gerold Hightower was bidden to stay with Gregor's men-at-arms. Only Lord Eddard, Ser Gregor, Jon, Wylla, Willam Dustin, and Martyn Cassel entered the city.

Eddard and Gregor were immediately summoned to the King's solar. They were informed that Robert wished to have a private audience with them.

Thankfully, it really was a private audience. When they arrived at the solar, they found two Baratheon knights standing guard outside it, but their liege lord was the only person inside it. He was seated at his desk; a goblet of wine in one hand, a stack of papers in the other. He seemed to be favoring the one over the other.

The stag king beckoned the wolf lord and the Mountain to take the seats before his desk. Once they both were seated, Robert asked them a single question: "How did it go?"

That was his way of demanding a report for how they had accomplished the tasks they had set out to do. In Gregor's case, it was escorting Princess Elia to Sunspear. In Eddard's case, it was lifting the siege of Storm's End and rescuing Lyanna.

Gregor could tell by the tone of Robert's voice that he had not lost hope that Lyanna would return to him. The Mountain was not looking forward to crushing Robert's spirits. He was not very comfortable with lying to him so prodigiously either. Even so, he knew it had to be done. He had to convince Robert that Lyanna was dead. Not only that, but Gregor also had to cure him of his infatuation of her.

Right before they had gotten to the solar, Gregor had asked Eddard to let him to handle the explanation of what had happened at the Tower of Joy. Eddard gave his consent to that arrangement, though he was suspicious as to what the massive knight was going to say.

After briefly going over the liberation of Storm's End and Elia's return to Dorne (with certain details removed from the latter account), Gregor told Robert a much-altered version of what had transpired at the Tower of Joy.

He claimed that he and his men-at-arms had arrived on the scene in the midst of the combat between Rhaegar's Kingsguard and Ned's company. Ser Oswell Whent had already fallen, but so had Theo Wull and Ethan Glover. Ser Gerold Hightower would have slain Martyn Cassel, but Gregor was able to join the fray and stop the Lord Commander before Jory Cassel lost his father. Gregor himself eliminated Ser Gerold, but Ser Arthur Dayne killed Ser Mark Ryswell only seconds later. After that, Lords Eddard Stark, Howland Reed, and Willam Dustin all fought Ser Arthur. Lord Willam was injured, but Gregor managed to get him to safety. Martyn managed to distract Arthur long enough for Lord Howland to wound him, and Lord Eddard delivered the killing blow.

While Lord Howland attended to Martyn and Willam, Eddard rushed into the Tower. Ser Gregor accompanied him as backup.

When they entered the Tower, they found Lyanna abed. She was in the final stages of a fever. Ned knelt by her side and pleaded with her to hold on for him. She struggled to obey her brother's wishes, but she was too weak to cling to life for very long. Her fever had not made her delirious, however. She was able to think and speak coherently right up to the moment of her death. She had not wasted her last minutes on Earth; she had used them to share her personal thoughts with the two Ned had been too immersed in his grief to remember his sister's exact words. However, Gregor had committed everything she had said to memory.

By this point in the explanation, Robert had become notably distraught over the loss of his beloved. He had lifted his goblet of wine to his mouth several times. However, when Gregor claimed that he could perfectly recall Lyanna's final words, the King's curiosity heightened. He leaned closer and asked expectedly "Were her last words… about me?"

Putting on his best mummer's face, Gregor gave a nod and proclaimed "I shall never forget them, Your Grace. She said 'When you go back to Robert, tell him I'm sorry. I'm sorry he couldn't be my husband. I'm sorry I never got to be his wife. Most of all, I'm sorry I'll never see him on the throne. I know he'll be a great king. I also know he'll miss me terribly. But tell him not to mourn me forever. I could not bear to be the cause of his grief. His grief could ruin him. If it does, he could ruin the realm. The realm has paid enough because of me. The only way he and the realm can thrive is if he finds happiness elsewhere. Our betrothal ends with my death. Now he is free to love another woman. I want him to love another woman. After everything he's done, he deserves to have a queen who will make him happy. I know he'll find someone like that. He's a good man. But if he can love another, he can be a better man. I want him to be the best man he can be. Promise me you'll tell him that. If you tell him that, I can die in peace, knowing that he and the realm will be in good hands.'"

Gregor had spent the past twenty days composing and rehearsing that monologue. It had to be outlined in such a way that Lyanna would actually say every one of those sentences, and they were all things one would be capable of saying even when on the verge of death. He had no writing mediums on him, so making notes was not an option. He had to rely entirely on his own memory.

He also paid careful attention to how he delivered that soliloquy. He spoke in a sorrowful tone, he paused frequently for emphasis, and he made his voice crack occasionally. He even forced himself to produce a few tears. Amazingly, Lord Eddard shed a tear of his own, even though he was fully aware that the entire monologue was false. That was how convincing Gregor was.

When Gregor finished, he paused so that Robert could absorb the words. The King looked as though he was going to drown in his own tears. Gregor did not relish in the older man's misery. Part of him felt genuinely guilty about deceiving Robert, but for the good of everyone in Westeros, he had to continue this charade.

After about two minutes of uncomfortable silence, Robert turned his gaze to the goblet in his right hand. He slowly set it down on the table and pushed it out of his reach. Then he looked around at the two men on the other side of his desk and proclaimed "If Lyanna's dying wish was for me to find happiness and strive to be a better man… then I shall endeavor to honor her wish."

Eddard was flabbergasted by this sight. This was the first time he had ever seen his best friend push away a wine goblet that wasn't empty. If he could pick sobriety over drunkenness once, he could certainly make of it a routine. That implied that he might have actually meant what he said, and that he could change.

Gregor looked over at Eddard out of the corner of his eye. The wolf lord was staring at him. His expression was one of awe. Gregor just smiled at him.

Words, Ned. Words.
In canon, Jon Arryn, Stannis Baratheon, and Eddard Stark had failed to change Robert through speech. That was because they never played on his greatest weakness: Lyanna. Gregor had, and already, he was seeing promise in Robert's ability to change. At the very least, he had ensured that Robert would not be drunk at his wedding to Cersei Lannister. Because of that, Robert would not say the wrong name during the bedding.

Of course, there was still no guarantee that Robert and Cersei's marriage would be a happy one. But at least the incident that drove them apart in the first place would be averted. Now Robert would not give Cersei grounds to seek comfort in the arms of another man. Especially not her brother's.

Chapter End Notes

Note: I know I said that I would explain Gregor's conversation with Varys (the one which took place in between chapters 3 and 4). However, this chapter turned out to be a lot longer than I planned it to be. Plus, I lost about half of it last night when my hard drive crashed, and I had to reconstruct it from memory. So I hope you'll forgive me this delay. The next chapter will fully explain the details of Gregor and Varys' secret discussion.

By the way, I'm going to go ahead and ask this now – who would you prefer to sit the Iron Throne at the end of this story? Here are the options:

Robert/Cersei
Robert's heir/Sansa
Robert's heir/Arya
Robb/Margaery
Aegon/his consort
Rhaenys/her consort
Jon/Daenerys (my personal choice. They may be nephew and aunt, but in my mind, they form perhaps the most ideal pair to rule Westeros together.)
Jon/other woman
Daenerys/other man

Choose any of the nine pairings above. If you cannot decide on a favorite, just pick your top three. If you have another pairing (one that's at least somewhat plausible and practical), feel free to share it with me, and I'll consider it. I'll keep a tally of how many votes all the pairings get. The vote won't be the sole deciding factor on which couple will ultimately be in power, but it will be a significant variable.
The Games Begin

Chapter Notes

Note: Someone pointed out that it would be odd for Jon to still have that name, as the name was mostly liked bestowed on him by Eddard in canon. Here's my justification for him retaining that name: originally, Rhaegar intended to name his third child Visenya if a girl and Jaehaerys if a boy. Lyanna preferred to call their child by a shorter, more common name, so Rhaegar offered an alternate name for either case. For the male one, he suggested to call their son Jon after his best friend, Lord Jon Connington. Lyanna agreed, as she could also name Jon after Lord Jon Arryn, whom she had come to respect for fostering Eddard and protecting him from the Mad King. So his real name is actually Jaehaerys Targaryen; Jon is essentially his – for lack of a better term – nickname.

By the way, Lyanna's messages aren't just going to be a load of McGuffin. In time, the fate of the ravens and riders she dispatched to Winterfell, Riverrun, and the Eyrie will be explained. And no, Littlefinger won't be responsible for any of them. Some people were concerned that I'd make him the guilty party. I have no intention of that. While I personally hold no love for Petyr Baelish, enough people already blame Littlefinger for everything, including things that were clearly not his fault. He's like the Donald Trump of Westeros.

One more thing. I have gotten some remarks about how Gregor is only doing things that benefit others, essentially making him seem little more than a servant. From this chapter onward, he continues to do so, but he also seeks to benefit himself. Here we begin to see just how ambitious he really is.

"I'm truly sorry for your loss, Your Grace," Gregor told Robert sincerely, "Lord Eddard has told me how much Lady Lyanna meant to you."

"You have nothing to repent for, Ser Gregor," Robert Baratheon murmured, "I thank you for going to such trouble as to memorize her last words on my behalf."

"It was no bother," Gregor asserted. He then folded his arms and asked "For my curiosity's sake, have you any suitable prospects for queen, Your Grace?"

The stag king shrugged and mumbled "Lord Tywin Lannister has put forth the idea of wedding his daughter to me in passing many a time. I have been avoiding giving him a response, as I held out some hope that Lyanna would be rescued. Now that she is gone, and now that I have her blessing to seek another woman… I suppose I may as well accept Tywin's offer."

"It's still your prerogative to choose your own bride, Your Grace," Eddard Stark pointed out.

"Lord Eddard is correct," Gregor conceded, "However, I doubt you'll find a more advantageous marriage than the one Lord Tywin is presenting you with. Lady Cersei is a rather comely woman. She is also very politically astute, and she can be loving to people close to her. I emphasize 'can,' because she truly is a lioness. So be careful not to spite her. Otherwise, you'll live in fear of your safety. And your manhood."
Robert and Eddard gave a hearty chuckle at that statement. They could not tell if Gregor was japing or speaking seriously, but they heeded his words all the same.

"I will remember that," Robert proclaimed, supporting his head on his arm, "I'll take Cersei Lannister as my bride. I may not know her all that well, but a king must make sacrifices for the good of the realm. And you needn't be concerned for Lady Cersei, either. I'll be good to her. Just as good as I would have been to Lyanna, if I can manage such."

Eddard and Gregor were pleased to hear that. Especially Gregor. It had made him additionally certain that Cersei's children would also be Robert's in this universe.

Robert gradually leaned back in his chair and queried "So, what happened after Lyanna died?"

"First we took her remains – along with those of Ethan, Mark, Theo, and Ser Arthur – all the way to Starfall," Eddard disclosed, "Lady Ashara was less than pleased to receive us, even though I returned her brother's bones and sword to her. Of course, I did take something from her in turn."

"What might that be?" Robert inquired.

"I discovered that she recently bore a bastard," Eddard replied.

Robert's eyes widened, and he said in astonishment "Not yours, Ned?"

"Brandon's," Eddard enlightened him.

Raising an eyebrow, the stag king commented "I thought you were the one Ashara favored at Harrenhal."

"So did I," Eddard contended, "It would seem Bran got to her first."

Robert gave a nod in acknowledgment, and he enquired "What did you do about the bastard?"

"I did the only thing I could do," Ned revealed, "I claimed him as my own family, and I brought him back with me."

"You mean Ashara let you take away her child, just like that?" Robert assumed, seeming a little dubious.

"No, she protested strongly," Eddard recounted, adopting a gloomy undertone, "But I ultimately won over. Alas, my victory came at a price. Lady Ashara committed suicide shortly before we left."

Robert was visibly stunned. He said apologetically "How unfortunate. I'm so sorry it came to that, Ned."

Ned smiled gratefully at his friend and wrapped up his recollection with "Whilst in Starfall, Howland boarded a ship with the bodies of Lyanna and our fallen comrades. After he set sail for the North, Ser Gregor, Martyn, Willam, and I rode back here with all due haste."

"That brings us to where we are now," Robert noted. There was an interval of quietness that immersed the whole room, and then the King gradually shifted his gaze to the massive knight. He uttered inquiringly "Tell me something, Ser Gregor. Why did you not return to King's Landing aboard the Diligence? Would it not have been quicker to travel by sea than by land? Furthermore, what led you to the Tower of Joy?"
"I have my reasons, Your Grace," Gregor asserted, "Firstly, most of my men had never been aboard a ship before. That was my first time on one myself. I am not saying that maritime travel did not wholly agree with us, but after we docked at Sunspear, we were keen to remain on land."

"I can understand having an adversity to sailing," Robert murmured, "My own parents were lost at sea. Within sight of Storm's End, if you can imagine. But even though the road from Sunspear to King's Landing goes all the way through Dorne, you could have bypassed the Red Mountains altogether. What business did you have at the Tower of Joy?"

"Strictly speaking, it was Lord Eddard's business," Gregor proclaimed, "I was aware that he was out to rescue his sister. So I made it my objective to assist him."

Robert was astonished. He remarked "You hardly even knew him at the time."

"Makes no difference," Gregor debated, "If somebody has a problem, I feel obligated to help them remedy their predicament. Lord Eddard sought to recover his sister. I merely assumed he'd appreciate some aid. I certainly would, had it been my sister who was abducted."

Robert could comprehend that logic. He rubbed his chin, as though in deep thought, and he asked "Would you have done this for anyone?"

"Indeed I would," Gregor pronounced firmly, "The world has enough wrong in it already. If I see an opportunity to right one of those wrongs, I do not ignore it. So long as it's in my power to make a positive difference, I'd always strive to make one."

A wide grin crossed Robert's face. He declared "That mentality will get you far, Ser Gregor. In fact, it's precisely why I called you here."

Gregor had been waiting for the stag king to say something such as that. Feigning bewilderment, he sat up and asked expectantly "How so, Your Grace?"

Robert elaborated with an observation: "Before the war, you already had a great reputation in the Westerlands. Of course, that can be attributed to your being a native of that region. However, in the past couple months, your fame has extended beyond there. Because of your actions in King's Landing, you helped secure the throne for the Stormlands, and you earned the gratitude of Dorne. Now three of the Seven Kingdoms are in awe of you and your principles."

"Four," Eddard amended. When the other two men looked to him, he provided some clarity: "After everything he did here and at the Tower of Joy, Ser Gregor's deeds have gained him the recognition and appreciation of the North, as well."

Robert gave a slight nod, and he smirked, saying "That's high praise, coming from you, Ned."

He then turned back to Gregor Clegane, and he apprised him with "Getting back on topic, the realm is broken. I have the unenviable task of mending it. Alas, there is only so much I can do from King's Landing. I still have yet to fill in all the vacancies on the Small Council. Since I first sat on the throne, Lord Varys, Lord Jon Arryn, and Lord Tywin Lannister have been my only source of guidance. All three men have given me very different counsel, but there is one point that they all agree on: while I myself can accomplish much in this city, what I really need are people who can travel throughout the Seven Kingdoms and fix their problems at the source. People… such as you."

Gregor pricked up his ears in interest, folded his hands together, and stated excitedly "You have my undivided attention, Your Grace."

Robert went on: "Lord Varys has proposed that I establish a new position on the Small Council:
"May I ask what it would involve, Your Grace?" Gregor asked rhetorically. Assuming that Varys had followed his instructions, the Mountain already knew the entire answer to that question.

Robert informed him "Like the other positions on the Small Council, the holder of this office is not required to remain in King's Landing. He is free to roam Westeros to his heart's content. However, his travels are supposed to coincide with the interests of the realm. In essence, Ser Gregor, if you take this position, you'll be tasked with policing the Seven Kingdoms. Should any disputes, crises, or disagreements arise between houses, you would mediate in them and resolve them as an impartial third party. You will also be in charge of crime control from the North to Dorne. If any criminals evade justice, your job is to capture them. Furthermore, this position gives you authority that overrules that of all others, save the crown's. Even the Lords Paramount would answer to you."

Gregor certainly had no difficulty getting his intent across to Varys. Robert had described the position of Master of Order almost exactly as the Mountain had envisioned it to be. Of course, he had to seem overwhelmed by the prospect of being handed so much power and responsibility. Otherwise, Eddard and Robert would suspect that he had known about this offer in advance.

He took a deep breath, let it out slowly to suggest he was astounded, and uttered in mock awe "I would be honored by this appointment, Your Grace. Please… excuse me if I seem shocked. I… I just think this is a tremendous proposition to receive. Particularly at my age. I mean… it was not long ago that I witnessed my eighteenth name day."

"Don't let age discourage you," Robert advised him with a smirk, "Ned here just began his third decade in this world. Even before that, he became Lord Paramount and Warden of the largest of the Seven Kingdoms. I myself am in the midst of my twenty-first year. Never be the less, I am by no means the youngest man to ever sit the Iron Throne."

"You… you raise a very valid counterargument, Your Grace," Gregor admitted, "Still, maintaining stability and peace throughout Westeros… that is hardly a job for one lone man."

Robert snickered at the apparent misunderstanding and told the knight "I do not wish to give you the impression that you will take on this burden all by yourself. No one can be expected to keep the peace of this country singlehandedly. You'll have leave to form your own company to assist you in your duties. You may assemble this company however you wish."

Gregor had hoped for the freedom to create a private legion of soldiers that served under him. Evidently, Varys had not neglected that part, either. Better yet, Robert had not given Gregor any restrictions on recruiting his soldiers.

"This is all very appealing," Gregor commented, "Is there anything more to the position?"

"Just one additional detail," Robert responded, "Call it a change of surroundings."

"I'm listening," Gregor avowed.

Robert had a map of Westeros in front of him. He smoothed it out and gazed down at it, saying "It occurred to me – actually, it occurred to Varys first, and then me – that Clegane's Keep is not found in a very strategic location in the Westerlands. Study this map, and you can see why. The Vale, the Stormlands, and the Crownlands are over a month's travel away. The North isn't too far, but it would still take a long time to reach the Neck. The Reach and Dorne are acceptably close, but the Riverlands and the Iron Islands are the only regions that are conveniently close."

Gregor had already been aware of Clegane's Keep's problematic location (relative to the rest of Westeros), but Varys had provided those reasons for why it was an unsuitable base of operations. He would have to relocate, preferably outside the Westerlands. Right then, Gregor shrugged and mildly proposed "Perhaps I would be better able to carry out my duties if I was stationed elsewhere?"

"Precisely," Robert agreed. He looked back and forth between Gregor and Eddard, and added in "That's why I wished for an audience with both of you at once."

"Robert?" said Eddard, somewhat perplexed.

"I could have spoken with you about Storm's End and the Tower of Joy first and Ser Gregor about Princess Elia later," Robert pointed out to his friend, "Of course, at the time, I was unaware that both of you had a hand in recovering Lyanna. Be that as it may, you may be able to help us with finding a new stronghold for the Master of Order."

"Help in what manner?" the wolf lord enquired.

Robert Baratheon rose and gestured for Eddard Stark and Gregor Clegane to approach him. When all three men were standing and gathered around the desk, Robert drew their attention to the map. He placed his right index finger on a certain marking in the Neck. He professed "There is a fortress along the southern border of the North. It is currently abandoned; it serves mostly as a barricade now."

"Moat Cailin," Ned recognized the marking on the map. He frowned and remarked "The moat is a ruin, Robert."

"Ruins can be restored, Ned," the stag king argued dismissively, "Aside from that, Moat Cailin is quite formidable. It has never been captured."

"Not from the south, at least," Eddard pointed out, "It is still vulnerable from the north."

"Then fortify its northern defenses," Robert proposed, a little annoyed, "Think on this, Ned. Next to Harrenhal and the Twins, Moat Cailin has better overall location than any other holdfast in the country. The North and the Riverlands are within spitting distance. It is equally far from the Westerlands and the Vale, as well as equally far from the Reach and the Stormlands. Only Dorne is more than a fortnight away. One would have fast access to the entire realm from the moat."

There are a lot more advantages to setting up base in Moat Cailin. But I'll keep those to myself. Distance is the only one that you should be concerned with for now.

Eddard studied the map intently, and ultimately, he released a deep sigh and murmured "I would be a fool to dispute any of that. Very well. If you command it, Your Grace, I am willing to give Ser Gregor charge of Moat Cailin and the adjoining lands."

"Good," Robert stated approvingly. He looked up and asked "What say you, Ser Gregor?"

"I must agree with Your Grace," the Mountain replied straightforwardly, "Moat Cailin would be the most ideal place for your new Master of Order."

"Then you will accept the office?" Robert presumed.
"I cannot think of a single reason not to," Gregor contended slyly. A sudden thought intruded on his mind. He inquired "Would I be named the lord of Moat Cailin?"

"Certainly," Robert affirmed, "You will even be given the title of Lord."

Gregor grinned and observed "You present a fine bargain, Your Grace. Am I to understand that I'll have two holdfasts to my name; one in the North, one in the Westerlands?"

At that, Robert's gleeful expression faltered. He said in an uneasy tone of voice "Well…"

"Is something amiss, Your Grace?" Gregor queried. This time, he was genuinely concerned.

Robert stared at the wall and slowly sat down in his chair. Then he proclaimed "Before I grant you the position, there is one minor issue that must be addressed, Ser Gregor. Then again, it is almost certainly not minor on your part. You may wish to sit back down for this."

Gregor and Eddard returned to their chairs. Once they were settled, Robert illuminated the situation: "When Varys suggested moving you outside the Westerlands, Lord Tywin Lannister was none too pleased. From what he's told me, he sees you as one of his most valuable assets. Unsurprisingly, he is reluctant to part with any of his assets. But he is even more reluctant to share them. He argues that by relocating you to Moat Cailin, your loyalties may be split between him and Lord Eddard."

"Sounds like a typical Lannister worry," Eddard commented sardonically.

"Lord Tywin's qualms are not entirely unwarranted," Gregor debated, "He knows I am always obligated to do the honorable thing. Honor means much more in the North than it does in the Westerlands. For that reason, if blows were ever exchanged between the North and the Westerlands, I may be more inclined to side with the Northmen."

"He made such the same argument," Robert disclosed, "So he told me to give you an ultimatum."

"An ultimatum?" Gregor did not like where this was headed.

Robert gravely nodded and stated "Lord Tywin will allow you to receive lordship over Moat Cailin and to move to the moat without objection. But only on the sole condition that you renounce your claim to Clegane's Keep."

For the first time since that meeting began, Gregor was dumbfounded. He had suspected that Tywin would not be willing to part with him easily, but he never would have thought that the lion lord would result to this. He was all but cutting him off from the Westerlands.

Judging by his countenance, Eddard was shocked, too. He spat angrily "That is outrageous. Clegane's Keep is Ser Gregor's birthright. How could he expect him to give up his birthright?"

Gregor had already conjured up a few ideas for Tywin's motives. He thought aloud "This must be his way of chastising me for the incident with Ser Amory Lorch. Clearly, he doesn't trust me as he used to. Now he's testing me to see if I really would choose the North over the Westerlands."

"But in this matter, if you did pick the North, it would only be to serve the crown," Eddard pointed out.

"I know that, Lord Eddard," Gregor uttered plainly. "Lord Tywin must know that, too. He knows I cannot refuse the appointment King Robert just offered me. That's why he's forcing this decision upon me. He expects me to voluntarily give up my domain in the Westerlands."
"You honestly believe he's that eager to be rid of you?" Eddard assumed.

"He must be," Gregor disputed, "He could have exiled me from the Westerlands instead, but that action would have made him unpopular with a lot of people. The King's offer saves Tywin the trouble of having to exile me. Since the choice of my removal from Clegane's Keep rests solely on my shoulders, so does the fallout."

Robert and Eddard could not deny that Gregor made a very excellent analysis of Tywin's possible motivations for wanting the Mountain out of the Westerlands. It was as cunning as it was ruthless. Two primary characteristics of the lion lord.

"Why didn't you protest against this ultimatum?" Eddard almost demanded of his friend.

"How could I, Ned?" Robert countered, "Tywin won the city. His son killed Aerys. His daughter is to be my queen. I am indebted to Ser Gregor for ensuring the least amount of bloodshed in the taking of King's Landing, but I cannot afford to favor him over Lord Tywin."

"I understand, Your Grace," Gregor assured the older man, "I do not wish to put you in such a difficult position, either."

Robert was thankful to be relieved of that burden. He stated "All this aside, I still wish to put you in a position, Ser Gregor. The position of Master of Order is yours for the taking. However, I will not ask you to make any sacrifices you are unwilling to make. If you wish to refuse the appointment for the sake of your birthright, I will not object."

Gregor needed a minute to contemplate his options.

Clegane's Keep was hardly a structure to be proud of, but it had been his home for the last eighteen years. That was the entirety of his second life. Plus, how could he leave behind his family? How could he turn away from his father, his mother, his brother, and his sister? What would the Westerlords think if he left them so willingly?

Then Gregor viewed this scenario from the other side. Just because he had to remove himself from Clegane's Keep's line of succession, there was no reason to presume that he was forbidden to enter the Westerlands ever again. Additionally, both he and Sandor would have a castle to their names. That seemed to be a fair trade.

He could still execute his duties as Master of Order from Clegane's Keep, but the keep was too small, too rundown, and too out-of-the-way to house an army. He intended to create his own army.

That was one of the reasons why Moat Cailin was critical to his plans. It was abundant in unharnessed resources, it could garrison an entire legion of soldiers, and it was almost in the very center of Westeros. For those and other reasons, Gregor had to gain lordship over the moat. Otherwise, all his plans for the future of Westeros would be in jeopardy of failing.

Besides, if his plans succeeded as he envisioned, he could always regain his influence in the Westerlands at a later date. If Sandor did not want lordship of Clegane's Keep, he could regain that, as well. He was hoping Sandor would take it; his brother deserved a castle just as much as he did.

After a lengthy period of considering his options, Gregor pronounced "I can accept Lord Tywin's condition."

"You are certain?" Robert enquired, wanting to leave no room for doubt.

"Yes, Your Grace," Gregor confirmed, "This is for the good of the realm. If I am unwilling to make sacrifices such as this for the realm, I am unworthy of the office of Master of Order."

"So be it," Robert said, nodding in acknowledgement. He then picked up the stack of papers on his desk, shuffled through them, and extracted three near the bottom. He slid them towards the end of his desk, along with a quill pen and an inkwell. He instructed the Mountain "Sign these documents.
The first relieves you of your right as the heir to Clegane's Keep. The second makes you lord of Moat Cailin. The third puts you on the Small Council as Master of Order."

Gregor gradually stood up, stepped up to the desk, and took the quill pen. After briefly skimming over the content of the documents, he signed each one at the bottom. Following that, Robert took back the documents and stamped them with the royal seal.

To make the process seem more official, the massive knight declared "I, Gregor of House Clegane, do hereby renounce my claim to Clegane's Keep. I pass my right as the heir to the title and all its incomes to my brother, Sandor of House Clegane."

Robert was pleased by the taller man's fondness for ceremony. Deciding to humor him, he rose and announced "Then I, Robert Baratheon, First of my Name, do hereby on this day bestow upon you, Ser Gregor Clegane, lordship over Moat Cailin. Furthermore, I entitle you to create a new house: the Cleganes of the North. This new house shall be given lordly status upon its creation. Lastly, I name you, Ser Gregor Clegane, to the position of Master of Order, and I charge you with upholding and assuring the peace and endurance of all Westeros."

"I accept these decrees, Your Grace," Gregor conceded, speaking in a formal tone.

Robert nodded in acknowledgment. He then picked up a fourth slip of paper and handed it to Ser Gregor. It was a bank note signed in his name. He disclosed "As a further sign of gratitude, I grant you 20,000 golden dragons from the royal treasury. I shall not order you to spend it on anything.
You may give it to your family or use it to better your new stronghold. You can give it to the faith or the poor, if that be your desire. In any case, it is yours to do with as you wish."

"I assure you it shall be handled wisely, Your Grace," Gregor proclaimed. He was pleasantly surprised by this gift. Money had not been part of his discussion with Varys. Originally, Gregor had intended to finance his operations in the North through different means. Still, he could hardly complain. 20,000 dragons would definitely get him off the ground.

As Gregor tucked the bank note into his doublet, Eddard rose from his chair and held out his hand to the Mountain, saying "I must congratulate you… Lord Gregor."

Gregor smiled and shook the wolf lord's hand, shaking it vigorously.

I'm shaking hands with Lord Eddard Stark himself. Not many people can say that, even in this world.

Soon after, Gregor was given leave to exit Robert's solar. Eddard and the King still had other items of business to discuss, but they did not concern the Mountain. Plus, Gregor intended to leave King's Landing soon. Among other things, he had to return to his old home and move into his new home.

As Gregor made his way through the Red Keep, his ear caught the sound of slippers shuffling across the floor. His nose also caught the scent of Lyseni perfumes. That was a telltale sign on who (or what) was in the vicinity.

Gregor quickly went to nearby darkened hallway and lingered there. Soon enough, the shuffling steps and the perfumes were upon him. The silhouette of a short, bald, round figure clad in a full-body robe was standing before him.

Gregor smiled softly and remarked "It appears I owe you quite a few favors, my lord,"

"You can repay them by keeping you word, Ser Gregor," Varys softly contended, "Lord Gregor, I should say."

"Believe me, I will," the Mountain asserted, "My word means everything to me. When I told you that I plan to guarantee the security of the realm through my new position, I meant it."

"Your position certainly gives you the ability to do so," the eunuch admitted, "But tell me; what motivates you to be a keeper of the peace in all of Westeros? Aside from the feelings of pride and accomplishment, what do you get out of all this?"

Gregor just smirked and inquired "Isn't it obvious?"

Varys tittered and speculated "Well, you could become a very rich, powerful, respected, and loved man through your new position. But you could have acquired any of those qualities through alternate means. Simpler means, at that. So why shoulder a burden as immense as this one?"

Gregor explained himself: "The King is the one who governs the realm. We are sworn to follow and obey him by default. But those who actively strive to ensure the safety of the realm are the ones who are recognized and remembered. I anticipate to be recognized and remembered by everyone."

"So it is fame and adoration you are after?" the Master of Whisperers conjectured.

"Oh, no," Gregor refuted, a wide grin across his face, "I don't just plan to be an idol for the smallfolk. I am going to unite Westeros. That's what everyone truly wants; a country that is not just a single nation in name only. That's how I intend to be remembered. As the man who finally and truthfully brought the Seven Kingdoms together."

"Then you would succeed where the Targaryen Kings of the last three hundred years failed," Varys observed, skepticism evident in his voice.

"Do you doubt my ability, Spider?" Gregor stated, trying to come off as humorous rather than mocking.

"I believe your intentions and your objective are true," Varys contended, "They are only missing one key aspect: realism. Ever since the era of the First Man, Westeros has been stricken with conflict. The level of conflict can be lowered, but it can never be purged entirely."

"My goal is not to do away with conflict altogether," Gregor clarified, "I would never attempt that or any other impossible task. Trying to eliminate suffering from this world would be a hopeless endeavor. Be that as it may, I can still do much to lessen all the suffering. I will not force anyone to give up any of their rights, nor will I request any of the Great Houses to surrender their domain over their respective lands. But I will purge all the old feuds, even the ones that are centuries old. I shall start by mending the wounds from those disputes a little at a time. Progress will be gradual but definite. It would be foolhardy to think that the unification process can be done overnight. But twenty years from now, Westeros might actually be truly united for the first time in its long and bloodstained history."

Varys cocked his head and remarked "You and I clearly share a similar aim, Lord Gregor. Both of us want what is best for the realm. I believe you are genuinely sincere and convinced that your plans will be successful. So I will not impede upon your plans. Even so, I must mention that twenty years still strikes me as something of an overestimate. Two decades to undo all the grudges, quarrels, and hatred of the past eight millennia? You should be careful not to overreach your bounds."

"Twenty years is what I'm aiming for," Gregor insisted.

After all, two decades from now, the peoples of Westeros will be faced with a threat far larger and far greater than any of their current worries.

It suddenly dawned on Gregor. That moment right there marked the moment when he officially entered the game of thrones as a player.

My only option is to play the game. If I play it just right, by the time the Long Night arrives, the Westerosi will have put their petty squabbles aside and opted to stand together.
A Promise And A Forecast

On the day of his meetings with Robert Baratheon and Varys, the Mountain had arrived in King's Landing as Ser Gregor Clegane. The following day, he departed the city as Lord Gregor Clegane. He also left 20,000 golden dragons richer than when he entered.

When he arrived at the site of House Clegane's camp, his vassals had already disassembled the tents, saddled the horses, and packed the supply carts. They were ready to set out. All they were waiting on was their master. Then again, because of what happened the previous day, it was debatable as to whether Gregor still was their master.

It was there that Ser Gerold Hightower left Gregor's company. The Lord Commander of the Targaryen Kingsguard had dawned a full-body cloak, and his hair was much shorter than it had been when the Mountain last saw him. As part of the knight's disguise, the Tickler had given Ser Gerold a close haircut. It turned out the interrogator had more than one special talent with regards to blades. He was quite crafty with a pair of shears.

Ser Gerold's white armor was in the safekeeping of Lord Eddard Stark. The Reachman instead wore a doublet of boiled leather and a pair of thick woolen breeches which the Northlord had lent him. The two men would return their belongings to each other when they were safely back in Winterfell. This was no concern of Gregor's, though.

With his servants, soldiers, and men-at-arms alongside him, Lord Gregor Clegane began the march back to Clegane's Keep.

On the way there, he prepared himself for his reunion with his family. He would soon face the unappealing task of explaining his business with Robert to his family. He knew he could have sent a raven from King's Landing, but that would have been largely ineffective. After all, this was the type of news that should ideally be delivered and discussed face-to-face.

The loss of his birthright to Clegane's Keep was no longer any major concern to Gregor. He would miss the keep, certainly, but he could see it again in the future. Aside from that, Moat Cailin was vital to his long-term goals. The moat may have been rundown, but he had great plans for it.

What really unsettled him was his family's reaction. He could imagine that he would be greeted with mixed emotions once they learned that he had been all but disowned from Clegane's Keep. They would probably be even more displeased when they learned that he had given up that right by choice.

He tried not to be too pessimistic when thinking about how his parents and siblings would take the news of his relocation to the North. He just concentrated on how best to avoid upsetting them or giving them the wrong impression. After how well he had mollified Robert's infatuation with Lyanna, Gregor was very confident in his ability to get his family to understand his reasons.

On the morning of the sixteenth day after his company set out from King's Landing, Gregor reached Clegane's Keep at last. He was accustomed to the experience of coming back to it upon completion of an assignment that had been given to him by Lord Tywin. All those times, he had taken his returning home for granted. This time, when he passed beneath the raised portcullis, he enjoyed the feeling of riding into the main yard of the Keep. He needed to savor this sensation, knowing it would be a long time before he would do so again.

The courtyard of the keep was small, but it was packed with many of the smallfolk. All of them were occupied with their various daily duties. Many of them paused long enough to salute Gregor or give him a courteous "milord" as he passed.

Soon Gregor and his companions arrived at the stables, where they all swiftly dismounted. While the horses were being taken by the stableboys, Gregor was approached by a middle-aged man with a head of red hair and a thin red beard that covered his cheeks and his chin. He was the keep's steward, Sylas Vikary.

"Welcome home, my lord," the steward said cordially with a genuine smile.

"Good day to you, Sylas," Gregor rejoined. After collecting his armor and weapons, the Mountain looked down at the older man and stated "I must speak with my family. Are you aware of everyone's current whereabouts?"

"I suspect they will gather in the Main Hall soon," Sylas replied, "It is very early, my lord. They have yet to break their fast. Perhaps you'll join them?"

"I would be delighted," Gregor proclaimed happily, "Tell the cooks to serve the meal in my father's solar."

The steward appeared perplexed. "May I ask why, Ser?"

"I have news to share," Gregor revealed, "Currently, this news is too private for discussion in the Main Hall. The solar would be a more discreet place. I would like you and the rest of my father's council to break your fast with us. In a way, the news concerns all of us."

"Very well, my lord," Sylas Vikary conceded.

The ginger man went to carry out this command. Gregor remained out in the courtyard long enough to assist with unloading the provisions and armaments he had taken to King's Landing. Once everything was sorted out and accounted for, Gregor bade his men to get some food and rest. Some had a mind to get a woman, as well. All that riding could really tire a man. But not enough to dissuade him from that OTHER form of riding.

Gregor was certain that no less than a third of his men would try to get laid within the next hour. As Sylas noted, it was quite early in the morning. Then again, some of Gregor's men would argue that it was never too early for a fuck.

Apart from his armor and weapons, the only things Gregor took from the supply carts were three locked chests. Those chests contained the twenty thousand golden dragons Robert had awarded him. Any other man would have needed some help with carrying the chests. Luckily, Gregor's unnatural strength allowed him to hold all three in one arm.

By the time Gregor arrived in his father's solar, everyone he wished to speak to had gathered there, as well. His mother Daliah, his father Tarrence, his brother Sandor, and his sister Ellyn were all seated at his father's desk. In other parts of the room four more men were seated. Sylas Vikary and Maester Velix were two of them. The other two were the master-at-arms Ser Wallis Peckledon and the castellan Erryk Ruttiger.

The instant Gregor entered the room, he felt a tightness around his waist. It was as though someone had lassoed him with an invisible rope. He looked down and saw Ellyn standing before him. His little sister was embracing him warmly.

Gregor chuckled and set aside the contents of his arms so he could hug his sister back. He knelt so that they were more level with each other. Interestingly, when he knelt, his sister was the one looking down.

Long ago, Gregor had suspected that all Cleganes were genetically big-boned. Ellyn provided some fine proof for his theory. She had only just celebrated her seventh name day, but she was already over four feet tall. At this rate, she and Brienne of Tarth would be of a height when they were both grown.

"Missed you, Greg," Ellyn told her massive brother.

Gregor placed a loving kiss on the girl's forehead and said affectionately "I missed you, too, Ell."

A firm hand was then placed on Gregor's right shoulder. He turned and saw that it belonged to Sandor. When he got his brother's attention, the thirteen-year-old boy then removed his hand from his shoulder and held it out to him. Gregor smirked, clasped Sandor's hand in his own, and squeezed it slightly. Sandor brightly smiled back.

"The training yard, later?" he suggested.

"Absolutely, San," the Mountain affirmed.

After this exchange with his siblings, Gregor went to properly greet his parents. He kissed his mother on the cheek, and he gave his father a firm handshake. He also shook Ser Wallis Peckledon and Erryk Ruttiger's hands, and he gave Maester Velix and Sylas Vikary a courteous nod of acknowledgment.

When he was done distributing his greetings, Ser Tarrence proposed "Shall we eat?"

"Let's," Gregor contended, pulling up a chair near his father's desk, "I'm famished."

The morning meal came in the form of boiled potatoes, fried eggs, blood sausage, bread fresh from the ovens, an assortment of fruit, and iced lemon water. Clegane's Keep may have looked impoverished, but food was never a scarcity for Gregor's family. Maybe that was another reason why they were all so big.

The nine people in the solar spent about five minutes eating in almost complete silence. In the sixth minute, Daliah looked to her firstborn and asked "So, Gregor, how went the siege?"

Gregor's mouth was full of potato at that moment. After taking a few seconds to swallow, he answered her with "Wasn't really a siege, Mother. The Mad King opened the gates of King's Landing to us. So we pretty much just rode right into the city."

"We've heard a rumor that King Aerys was slain by Ser Jaime Lannister," Maester Velix pronounced, biting a sausage in half.

"Not a rumor," Gregor bluntly revealed. That statement produced a number of gasps.

"It was Ser Jaime killed the Mad King?" Erryk Ruttiger presumed.

"That's correct," Gregor confirmed with a grimace, "Bastard deserved it, though."

That remark stunned most of the others a bit. Not that any of them would disagree with it. The frankness of the remark was actually more alarming than the remark itself.

Sandor appeared unfazed. He drily perceived "If you say he deserved to die, he must've."

Gregor flashed a grin at his younger brother. Sandor must have believed very strongly in his concept of right and wrong.

"We expected you back a month ago," Ser Tarrence uttered abruptly. He spoke in a tone one might use when making an accusation.

"I was busy," was all Gregor said at first.

"With what, my lord?" Ser Wallis Peckledon inquired.

Gregor stuffed a large strawberry into his mouth. As he chewed, he commented "Just a few errands, Ser Wallis. Errands the king himself sent me on."

There he succeeded in gaining the full attention of his family members and the men on his father's council.

"Tell us more, Gregor," Ser Tarrence bade his son.

Gregor briefly went over everything he had done since the Westerlords marched for King's Landing.

He first described how the capital city had been seized with barely any bloodshed, thanks in large part to his instructions not to harm any unarmed civilians. In the heat of battle, some soldiers had deliberately violated Gregor's orders. All those soldiers had already been either severely chastised or sent to the Wall. Gregor then recalled how he had saved Princess Elia Martell from Ser Amory Lorch. Naturally, he left out the part about Rhaenys and Aegon surviving, but he kept the part about how he had escorted Elia home to Dorne personally. Ser Wallis and Ser Tarrence were amused when Gregor mentioned how Prince Oberyn Martell wished to show the Mountain his appreciation for bringing back his sister.

He also recounted the events of the Tower of Joy. Of course, his account of those events was much different from what had actually transpired. In accordance with the false story he and Lord Eddard Stark had told Robert, Gregor told his household that Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, Theo Wull, Oswell Whent, Arthur Dayne, and Gerold Hightower had all perished. He also claimed that Lyanna Stark had died of a fever, and Howland Reed was charged with taking her body and the other Northmen's back home. At the same time, Gregor had gone back to King's Landing with Eddard Stark, Willam Dustin, Martyn Cassel, and all of his men-at-arms. Immediately upon their return, Gregor and Eddard were summoned to King Robert's solar for a private meeting.

"That was a very interesting meeting," Gregor proclaimed cheekily, "As Sylas has told you all, I wish to share some news. The subject of my meeting with the king is the source of that news."

"What did you and King Robert talk about?" Daliah queried, captivated already.

By now, everyone had more or less finished eating. Gregor concluded the meal right then when he drained his mug of lemon water, wiped his mouth, and set the mug aside. He looked around at the solar's other occupants and informed them "The King was impressed with how I helped to capture King's Landing, how I saved Princess Elia, how I secured diplomatic relations with Dorne, how I aided Lord Eddard Stark with recovering his sister, and how I gained the respect of the North because of it. He has even acknowledged the full extent of my abilities, as he claimed that his reign will need men like me to repair and improve the realm. In fact… he has a very special part for me to play."

At that, Gregor reached into the inner pocket of his doublet and pulled out three folded documents. These were copies of the three documents Gregor had signed and Robert had stamped at their meeting. He held onto the first one for the moment, and he handed the other two to his parents.

Gregor wordlessly gestured for the four men on his father's council to approach the desk. They all stood behind his parents and read the documents over Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah's shoulders. By the time they finished reading, all six adults bore a facial expression that indicated they were astounded, but in a pleasant way.

"You've been given a spot on the Small Council?" Ser Wallis Peckledon muttered in amazement.

"And a fortress to complement it?" Maester Velix added in, astounded.

"Yes, and yes," Gregor said, trying and failing not to sound smug, "I'll be King Robert's Master of Order. That office was founded specifically for me, believe or no. I am tasked with the supervision of the entire realm. I will carry out my duties from Moat Cailin. I have also been named Lord of the moat."

"You're a lord now?" Daliah asked, agog in amazement.

"Indeed," Gregor avowed.

Ser Tarrence remained staring at the two documents for a few seconds. Then he grinned and remarked proudly "I'm the father of a lord. Who would have thought?"

"I'd be the first to congratulate you, young master Gregor," Maester Velix stated giddily, "But your father or mother should be given that privilege."

"This is cause for rejoicing," Erryk Ruttiger contended.

"Quite so," Ser Wallis Peckledon concurred.

"There's more," Gregor proclaimed. He then went to retrieve the three chests. He placed one of them on his father's desk and gestured for everyone to gather around. Once they were all crowded around the desk, Gregor removed the lock and opened the lid. A collective gasp circulated the room when the inside of the chest was revealed. As the other eight people stared in shock at the glittering pieces of metal, Gregor announced "The King allowed me the use of twenty thousand golden dragons. I'd like you to have seven thousand."

He then pushed the chest farther so that it was directly in front of his father and mother. His parents kept their gaze fixed on the chest. They looked almost mesmerized by its contents.

"Gregor... I don't think we could accept this," Lady Daliah uttered quietly, though her voice suggested they could.

"It's mine to give away," Gregor countered bluntly, "I expect you to get plenty out of this gold. You could refurbish the keep, increase the number of soldiers, build another small town... the possibilities are many in number."

"Then we must thank you, Gregor," Ser Tarrence decided, smiling once more. As he closed the lid to the chest on his desk, he noticed the other two chests in his son's arm. Curious, he inquired "What will you do with the remaining thirteen thousand dragons?"

"They'll be coming with me," Gregor responded. He spoke a little more hastily than he intended, but there was no point in being vague about his future whereabouts. He knew he could not put off the part of this conversation that he had been dreading.
"Are you going back to King's Landing?" Sylas Vikary assumed.

"No…" Gregor said tentatively.

At that, everybody's awe turned to bewilderment. Daliah asked in concern "Gregor, is there something more you wish to tell us?"

Gregor was still clutching the first document from his meeting with Robert in his right hand. He stole a momentary glimpse at it, and then he released a heavy sigh and declared "There's a setback to all this."

He then held the document out to his father. Ser Tarrence took the document swiftly, but he read it slowly. Gregor's mother stood by his side and read the document alongside him. All the while, the solar was immersed in absolute silence.

Gregor stood by, as he anxiously waited for his parents' reaction. Overtime, his father's eyes narrowed, and his mother's mouth slowly dropped open. That was not a promising sign. Even so, it was simply a preview of what was to come.

Finally, Ser Tarrence shifted his gaze upward, looked his firstborn in the eye, and muttered tensely "Gregor… this is a decree removing you as my heir."

"Yes, Father," Gregor affirmed, not bothering to hide his gloom, "My signature is at the bottom."

"You agreed to this?!!" Daliah mumbled. She sounded more distraught than angered.

"I had to," Gregor debated, managing to stay calm, "It was the only way I could make everyone content."

"Certainly," Tarrence spat heatedly, throwing down the document, "If 'everyone' does not extend to us!"

His parents were not the only ones unsettled by this development. The other four men were obviously outraged, Ellyn seemed on the verge of sobbing, and Sandor just stood still without any display of emotion.

"Who does Robert Baratheon think he is?" Ser Wallis snapped furiously.

"How could he force you to give up your right to Clegane's Keep?" Sylas Vikary murmured.

"This was not the King's idea," Gregor firmly disclosed, "He was forced just as I was. This deed was the doing of Lord Tywin Lannister."

Once more, everyone in the room was greatly baffled by the Mountain's information.

"Why would Lord Tywin want you to give up your footing in the Westerlands?" Erryk Ruttiger muttered in confusion, "You're one of his most prestigious generals."

"I was," Gregor Clegane disputed, "I can fathom his reasons. I believe Lord Tywin harbors some feelings of resentment towards me for the episode with Ser Amory Lorch. It was not the fact that I personally killed Ser Amory that displeased him. It was more the fact that I interfered with Ser Amory's assignment. By doing that, I almost directly challenged Lord Tywin's authority. That's one thing he'll never forgive or forget."

"I must agree, my lord," Sylas Vikary coincided, "For as long as he's lived, Tywin Lannister has never tolerated any act of defiance."

"True, just recall the fates of the Reynes and the Tarbecks," Erryk Ruttiger observed.

"By comparison, I'd say this outcome is far more fortunate and desirable," Gregor debated. He picked up the first document, held it up, and looked around at the other eight people. He solemnly declared "I know you all must be furious about this. I certainly am. Please understand; I did not do this without hesitancy. Nor did I do it simply to serve my own purpose. I had your interests at heart, as well."

Everyone had eased down a bit by this point, but Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah were still somewhat cross. Daliah asked in a patient yet upset voice "How is this in our best interests, Gregor?"

The Mountain illuminated "This was the only way I could protect the rest of you from Lord Tywin's wrath. He has no conflict with you; only me. By cutting myself off, I have ensured that he will let you be."

"Ser Gregor makes a very valid point," Maester Velix proclaimed. With his gaze locked on the first document, he added in "This is perhaps the most prudent course of action available to him now. It keeps him in favor with the crown, and it guarantees the survival of this family."

"I would have to agree with the maester," Erryk Ruttiger contended, "Lord Tywin is a ruthless man, but so long as Ser Tarrence remains loyal to him, there should be peace between Clegane's Keep and Casterly Rock."

"Exactly," Gregor professed, "Anyway, although I'm being evicted, I have not disowned my family. I will not be severing my ties to you or any other part of the Westerlands. My travels will take me all over Westeros. If I have an opportunity, I could come to visit you, or you could visit me."

"My lord, Moat Cailin is all the way up in the Neck," Ser Wallis Peckledon pointed out, "You'd actually have to enter the North to reach it."

"Think of how much distance that is," Sylas Vikary proposed.

"I've been farther than that," Gregor claimed casually, "Besides, the moat was established there because of the location. Its location makes it a key stronghold that separates the North from the rest of the Seven Kingdoms. It also offers quick access to the other regions of Westeros. Those are just a couple of the advantages I'd have as the Lord of Moat Cailin."

Those points were enough to convince Ser Wallis and Sylas that Gregor had the situation in hand. Now the only people who needed some assurances were Ser Tarrence, Lady Daliah, Sandor, and Ellyn.

Gregor needed an additional fifteen minutes to sway his parents and siblings. Logical reasoning was not as effective here, given how his relationships with them were based on much more emotion. So he had to appeal to their sense of obligation and familial bonds. What ultimately swayed them were the points he made about how his deeds would gain greater respect and appreciation for the Cleganes, and that he would be able to better secure their position in the Westerlands. He also emphasized strongly that he was not turning his back on his family. He argued that he would not really be leaving home; he would just be away on business for prolonged periods of time.
By mid-morning, all eight of those people had submitted to Gregor's decision. They were still not pleased with his long-term relocation to Moat Cailin, but they were not vehemently against it, either. Whatever he did next, they decided to support him in it.

"How much longer can you stay?" Daliah queried.

Gregor had already worked that out in advance. He announced "I plan to be at the moat within a moon's turn. It generally takes a fortnight to get there by horse. But since I'll be traversing unfamiliar terrain with, it could take longer. Perhaps a week and a-half longer. So I'll be riding in three days."

"So soon?" Ellyn noted sadly.

"Yeah," Gregor stated, gazing down at his sister, "But if we make the most of these next few days, my departure won't be as hard."

Ellyn seemed to brighten up at that prospect. She stepped up to her brother and embraced him again. He wrapped one of his arms around her tenderly.

He then turned to Sandor and opened his other arm to him. Gregor's brother stared at him in contemplative silence. Then he began to walk towards him. Sandor gradually approached him, one step at a time. Right before he could enter the embrace, Sandor scowled and bolted towards the entrance of the solar. In just a few seconds, he yanked open the door and sprinted out.

"Sandor!" Daliah called out. Her younger son did not respond. The sounds of his hurried footsteps soon faded down the corridor.

"Poor lad must be taking this hard," Erryk Ruttiger supposed.

"You can hardly fault him," Sylas Vikary proclaimed.

Gregor released his grip on Ellyn and declared "I'll talk to him."

The Mountain proceeded to gather up his armor, weapons, and the other two chests of golden dragons. He made a slight detour and stopped by his bedchamber first. There he deposited most of those materials. He kept his longsword, as well as the belt that accompanied it. After strapping the five-foot piece of steel around his waist, Gregor went off to find his brother.

He did not have to look for long. He already knew where to go. Ever since he was old enough to swing a sword, there was one place Sandor always retreated to whenever he got upset or frustrated.

Sure enough, Gregor found Sandor in the training yard. He was by himself, and he was armed with his favorite sword. At the moment, he practicing his offensive tactics on a wooden dummy near the far wall. Based on how he was hacking viciously and grunting loudly, he was quite agitated.

Thinking of Benjen Stark's introduction in the first episode, Gregor climbed down to the yard, smirked, and shouted jokingly "Is he dead yet?"

Sandor promptly whipped around and came face-to-face with his brother. Unlike Jon Snow, he did not adorn a welcoming grin for his relative or spread his arms to embrace him. Sandor was undeniably aggravated by something. Gregor did not know what, but he knew he had to be responsible for it.

"Leave me alone," Sandor mumbled angrily.
"I will not," Gregor refuted sternly. As he continuously neared his brother, he pronounced "Taking your fury out on a dummy is pitiful. Not to mention ineffectual."

He then drew his longsword in one swift motion. He balanced it effortlessly in his right hand and suggested stoically "Try using a live opponent instead."

At that, Sandor's demeanor shifted from irate to maliciously gleeful. He grinned wickedly and murmured in a somewhat menacing tone "Why not? You agreed to 'later.' May as well be now."

Gregor moved to a spot in the center of the yard. Sandor moved to a place ten feet in front of his massive brother. He lifted his sword and pointed it towards Gregor in an offensive stand. Gregor held his sword up vertically to assume a defensive stand. After he and his brother spent a minute staring each other down, he told Sandor "You first."

Immediately, Sandor raised his sword and charged forward. Even before the blow was delivered, Gregor could see where it would land. He almost listlessly moved to deflect the blow.

Sandor quickly rebounded and slashed at Gregor's legs. The Mountain's blade intercepted his brother's sword when it was still over a foot away.

Sandor hastily prepared to strike a third time. He thought he spotted an opening on Gregor's shoulder, and he focused on that. But before his blade was halfway up, Gregor's blade came at him from out of nowhere. Gregor timed the thrust very carefully. The point of his sword was pressed against Sandor's Adam's apple. Another centimeter and Gregor would have drawn blood.

Luckily, Gregor did not bleed his brother. He just commented drily "You're dead."

Sandor groaned in frustration and lowered his blade. He and Gregor then returned to their original positions.

Now it was Gregor's turn to make the first move. He examined Sandor's defense position for any exploitable weaknesses, and he spotted one within seconds. He lunged forward with his sword in midair.

The Mountain issued a volley of blows in rapid succession. Sandor managed to parry the first four, but the fifth one got through. Gregor struck Sandor in the chest with the flat of his blade. As the younger boy stumbled and groaned, Gregor cockily declared "Dead again."

The two Clegane brothers went four more rounds. Each one had a very similar outcome to the first two.

The third round ended when Gregor delivered a blow that caught Sandor in his right side. "Dead."

The fourth round ended when one of Gregor's blows made contact with Sandor's left side. "Dead."

The fifth round ended when Gregor seized Sandor by his left arm, pulled him close, turned him around, and brought his blade up to his throat. "So fucking dead."

Those last three rounds involved a cumulative total of less than twenty blows.

Sandor was generally much better at sword fighting than this. His current form suggested a substantial lack of discipline, Gregor noted. That was almost definitely attributed to the anger he felt. Anger was the bane of discipline, and discipline was the most important aspect of swordsmanship.
Alas, the dueling was doing nothing to lessen Sandor's anger. Ever the same, Gregor had no intention of going easy on him. Ever since his brother had been old enough to spar with him, Gregor had never gone easy on Sandor.

Gregor had always looked out for Sandor. He had guided him, protected him, supported him, and encouraged him in nearly everything. However, he knew that if his brother was to become the Hound, he would have to toughen Sandor up. So he figured, what better way to do that than with steel in hand?

Outside the training yard, Gregor had never laid a hand on his brother. In the training yard… anything went.

Gregor became an entirely different person when he and his brother dueled. That was probably the closest he would ever get to the original Gregor Clegane. He was brutal, merciless, and even a little cruel when he and his brother faced off.

Gregor never let Sandor gain the upper hand, never let him see his weaknesses, never let him win if he could help it. On a couple occasions, he had even gone so far as to humiliate Sandor.

He derived no joy or pleasure from those experiences. He did all that simply so Sandor would take their lessons seriously and remember that a true opponent would be just as ferocious, if not more so.

Oftentimes, Sandor became furious or resentful of his brother for treating him so harshly, but he always reminded himself afterward that his brother just wanted to sculpt him into an ideal warrior.

Up until now, Gregor was fairly confident that he had managed to do just that. Now he was having some doubts, as Sandor was demonstrating a near-total disregard for his teachings.

The sixth and final round began. This one lasted longer than any of the previous five, but it had the most unpleasant ending. For Sandor, that is.

First, Gregor struck his brother behind the knees with the flat of his sword. Then he kicked his legs out from under him and shoved him onto the ground. Once Sandor was on the ground, Gregor grabbed him by the throat and forced him to stay there. Then he slowly brought his sword into the air and plunged it downwards.

He stopped when the tip of the blade was less than an inch away from Sandor's eye. Anyone else would have shrieked, squirmed, or fainted out of fear. Sandor did nothing more than blink. In fact, he looked as though he could not care less about losing. That was very uncharacteristic of him; he was usually very competitive about winning.

Gregor sneered, withdrew his sword, and rose to his feet. Then he held his hand out to his brother. After a moment's hesitation, Sandor grudgingly accepted it. Once he was back on his feet, the Mountain muttered bleakly "Sandor, in the past three minutes, I killed you six times. Had this been a real battle, you would not have lasted the first thirty seconds."

"So this was not one of my better days," Sandor said in a very sarcastic voice, picking up his own blade.

As the two brothers sheathed their swords, Gregor glared down at Sandor and stated critically "Did you forget everything I taught you while I was gone?"

"No," Sandor mumbled in annoyance, "But would it have mattered if I did? 'Cause I wouldn't have been the only one who forgot something important."
Now Gregor was confused. "What in the Seven Hells are you talking about?"

"Don't you remember?" Sandor responded crossly, "Nearly eight years ago, you opened my eyes up to the harshness of the world. You startled me at first. But then you comforted me and shared with me words of kindness. Words that have stayed with me ever since."

"Any specific words?" Gregor inquired.

"Yes, five in particular," Sandor informed him, "'I'll be there for you.' Those were your own words, and I'll never forget them. It seems you have, though."

"I have not," Gregor asserted, "I meant them then and I still do. Don't think I'm going back on them simply because I'm going away for a while. You can be there for someone without being there physically."

Sandor scoffed and spat angrily "Oh, don't give me that 'being there in spirit' shit."

"I won't," Gregor contended, "I'll still be there for you, Sandor. For you and everyone we loved. I'll be building a legacy for House Clegane. A legacy that you can be a part of."

"I don't care about any godsdamn legacy," Sandor claimed. His anger began to fade at this point. He let out a faint sigh and mumbled "Why did you have to kill Amory Lorch?"

"Because he would have killed Princess Elia," Gregor answered bluntly, "In that one act, he would have made us an enemy of Dorne. Instead, I've made them our ally."

"Was it worth making a potential enemy of Tywin Lannister?" Sandor snappily retorted.

"Yes," Gregor replied without any pause, "Lord Tywin may be the Lord Paramount of the Westerlands and the Warden of the West, but he is not infallible. He may see what I did as disobedience. I see it as the prevention of a huge mistake. He's just too pompous to admit it."

Sandor then looked around the area, and he cautioned his brother "Gregor, you should be careful about saying things like that out in the open. Lord Tywin's spies could be listening."

"What do I care?" Gregor said nonchalantly, "He's no longer my liege lord."

Sandor chuckled at that. By now, his anger appeared to have subsided. He gazed up at the Mountain and suggested hopefully "Can't I go with you?"

"Believe me; I'd love to take you with me," Gregor proclaimed, "If I could, I would. But it would be irresponsible of both of us. With me dispossessed, you're now Father's heir. You represent the future of this house. Aside from that, you're practically a man now. You must choose your own road in life."

Sandor spent a minute pondering on those statements. There was both wisdom and advice to be found in them. Both of which could be very useful if he heeded them. After a minute, he lightly shrugged and admitted "I suppose you're right."

"Of course I am," Gregor conceded, grinning. He placed a hand on his brother's shoulder and told him "I'm counting on you to manage the keep well in my absence. I expect it to be in a far better state when I come back."

"What if you never come back?" Sandor supposed.
"I will," Gregor proclaimed sternly.

"You don't know that," Sandor theorized, "For all we know, this could be goodbye."

"Yes, it could," Gregor acknowledged, "But goodbye doesn't mean forever."

As David Gates would say.

Although he had quoted a popular song from the late 1970s, that sentence seemed to have a soothing effect on Sandor. He finally yielded to his brother's logic, and he stated "You're right, Greg. I guess I spoke to soon. I'm probably just being negative."

"No, you're considering the worst," Gregor pointed out, "There's nothing wrong with having low expectations, but you'd do better to have high hopes while I'm away."

"I'll try," Sandor assured him, "Anything else I should keep in mind?"

"Yes," Gregor disclosed, "I want you to find a good marriage match for yourself. More importantly, find a good marriage match for Ellyn, too."

Sandor scoffed and bluntly remarked "Our sister is seven, Gregor."

"Our mother was seven once, too," Gregor reminded him.

Sandor scoffed again and rolled his eyes, saying "Somehow, I doubt Grandfather Lewys was already planning on marrying her off at that age."

"You know what I mean," Gregor sardonically stated, "Just find a decent husband for Ell when she's of age. You get a decent wife for yourself, too. Now that you're the future of this household, you'll need heirs of your own."

"I suppose I will," Sandor admitted. After a brief lapse of silence, he murmured "Alright, I will. So long as you do, too."

"Hmmm?" Gregor uttered, uncertain what his brother was implying.

"If you're starting another house up in the North, you'll need heirs, too," Sandor apprised him, "You shouldn't have any trouble finding someone to give you some. I hear women in the North fight alongside the men. You might end up wedding and bedding one of them."

"It's possible," Gregor alleged, "But let's not rush ahead of ourselves. I'll be all over Westeros these next several years. I'll meet many houses and their members. I'll become acquainted with plenty of highborn ladies. Whoever my bride turns out to be, she could come from anywhere in the Seven Kingdoms."

"No, I'd bet you your other thirteen thousand dragons that she'll be a Northwoman," Sandor hypothesized.

Sandor did not have the gold to match Gregor's, so that wager was meaningless. Besides, he was mostly just making a jape when he said that.

Still, unbeknownst to Gregor, Sandor's jape would turn out to be somewhat prophetic; the Mountain's future wife would indeed be from the North.
Chapter Notes

Note: For all you non-American readers, prepare for a short lesson on United States geography. By the way, this chapter and a few of the ones after it are going to witness a number of time-jumps. But it won't just be a summarization of events, I assure you.

By the way, I've got a lot going on with graduate school this week. I've got a midterm in two of my classes on Thursday and Friday, and I've got a project report in the third one due on Monday. I'll be fairly busy with all that, so it's possible I will not be able to update for a week.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Gregory Welch was born in Seattle; the eldest of five children. He and all his siblings had been raised there for the entirety of childhood.

Neither of his parents was a native of Washington. They had moved there shortly before Gregory was born. Most of his father's family was from Michigan, and most of his mother's family was from New York. A couple times each year, he and his family had gone out-of-state to visit some of those relatives.

Despite those traditional semi-annual vacations, Gregory had never been anywhere south of Nebraska until after he turned eighteen. In all that time, Seattle had been his only true home.

Similarly, Gregor Clegane had rarely ever left the Westerlands before his eighteenth name day. His first notable exceptions were his recent journeys through the Crownlands and Dorne.

That reflected one of the events of his previous life in more than one way. For his college education, Gregory earned a full scholarship to the University of Texas at Austin. He subsequently moved to central Texas and lived there for the next four years.

As for his studies, his major was in Criminal Justice – Law Enforcement, and he minored in Psychology.

For all his life, he had been driven by a strong sense of morality and a desire to work for the greater good. Growing up, he had always imagined himself holding a job that involved upholding harmony and security in the country. That was what primarily led him to apply to the CIA. He had sent in his application the year before he graduated college.

The process of applying to the CIA was a long, exhaustive, and somewhat tedious one. The interviews, background check, and personality tests proved to be especially trying. But Gregory felt they all paid off when he finally received a phone call from a CIA recruiter, informing him that his application had been approved. After he earned his Bachelor's Degree at UT Austin, Gregory moved once more. This time he relocated to Virginia, where the CIA headquarters was situated.

The shortest route from Austin to Fairfax went almost directly northeast. It took less than two hours to get there by airplane.
The route between Clegane's Keep and Moat Cailin also went northeast. Interestingly, the distance between those holdfasts was substantially smaller than the distance between Austin and Fairfax. Unfortunately, travelling by air was not an option.

Plus, the straightest path went directly through a swamp. There was no telling what could happen in there, even if the crannogmen offered safe passage.

The best method of travel was to go by horse. So getting from the keep to the moat was actually much more time-consuming.

The move to Moat Cailin took the Mountain and his company nearly a month to accomplish. The easiest part of the journey was definitely the first stage, when they rode through the Westerlands. They knew those lands, after all. Once they entered the Riverlands, the going was considerably slower.

As Gregor recalled, relations between the Westerlords and the Riverlords were fragile, even before the War of the Five Kings. As such, Gregor saw the most ideal course as the one that involved as little contact as possible with the locals. So he and his convoy steered clear of all villages, holdfasts, and castles in the Riverlands.

Gregor was especially careful to avoid the Crossing. He had no desire to go anywhere near the Twins, if he could help it. Instead, he searched for the narrowest, shallowest part of the Green Fork. Once he did, he and his company forded the river. That took much longer than it would have to simply use a bridge, but to Gregor, the extra effort was worth it. Just being that close to Walder Frey and his den of weasels made him feel unclean.

Anyway, once Gregor and his men were assembled on the eastern shores of the Green Fork, they went almost directly northward. The terrain was just as alien to them, but there were fewer settlements in the northern part of the Riverlands. So they did not have to alter their course as often.

What none of them – not even Gregor – had anticipated was the sudden drop in temperature.

Having grown up in the northern half of the United States, Gregor was accustomed to cold weather. However, Seattle was a relatively temperate city. Winters and summers were both typically bearable. It had generally been the same in Austin and Fairfax.

The moment he crossed over into the Neck, Gregor could literally feel the change in climate. His companions could, as well.

"Gods, it's fookin' cold," Dunsen mumbled, tightening his cloak.

"Oh, it gets better," Rafford muttered sarcastically, "From what I hear, this is normal for summer."

"So that's why the Starks' words are 'winter is coming,'" Tobbot muttered.

That's ONE of the reasons. What are they complaining about, anyway? It can't be less than fifty-five degrees right now.

"Get used to it, boys," Gregor advised his men, "Remember we're here on the King's business."

"That's all well and good, Ser," Chiswyck proclaimed, "So long as the King don't mean for us to freeze our balls off."

"Well, don't take 'em out as often," Gregor cheekily proposed, "If you can help yourself, that is."
The other men-at-arms got a good laugh at the jest. Chiswyck laughed with them, even though it was made at his expense. After that, no one said anything else about the frigid weather for the duration of the trek.

All of Gregor's men-at-arms had accompanied him on his march north. They had never officially sworn to serve House Clegane; they had sworn to serve Gregor. Wherever he went, they would follow. They composed half of his retinue.

The other half was composed of former retainers of House Clegane. Ser Tarrence had ordered fifty of his servants to join Gregor. Among them were Sylas Vikary and Erryk Ruttiger. They would be serving as the new steward and castellan of Moat Cailin respectively.

The Citadel would later assign a maester to Moat Cailin, and Gregor would worry about finding a master-at-arms once the moat had been restored. Apart from the fact that they were longtime friends of his father, that was the foremost reason why Maester Velix and Ser Wallis Peckledon were not going with Gregor.

Ser Tarrence Clegane would be able to replace all his lost servants easily, now that he had seven thousand golden dragons reserved for the benefit of Clegane's Keep.

The last stage of the journey was spent traversing the Neck. Gregor's entourage was surrounded by the swamps on the east and the west for that entire interval. They had to be mindful of their step and their fresh water supply; the bogs began on both edges of the Kingsroad.

Due to the lack of dry land, they were forced to camp on the Causeway every night that week. To their good fortune, they encountered no other parties from either north or south. At the very least, they were spared the burdens of traffic.

At long last, the company made it through the Neck. Once they reached the end of the Causeway, they saw Moat Cailin for the first time.

Gregor felt a number of mixed emotions at that moment. While he was awestruck by the moat's size and structure, he was shocked by its current state of decay. It was not hard to believe that the moat had not been steadily inhabited for over a century.

Still, Moat Cailin was a magnificent fortress to behold. Or rather, it would be, once it was restored. There was no telling how long that would take, but Gregor was confident it could be done.

His companions did not seem to share his optimism. They took one look at the shabby condition of the moat and frowned.

"That's it?" Polliver murmured, as though he was disgusted.

"A shithole if I ever saw one," Shitmouth eloquently observed.

"No wonder the King gave you all that money, my lord," Erryk Ruttiger contended, "He knew he'd have to pay you to take this fortress."

"Maybe, Erryk," said Gregor, humoring his associate, "Or, one could argue, he gave me the money to improve it. Like or not, gentlemen, this is our new home. Don't be so quick to judge it. It's kept the North safe for thousands of years. Now, under our care, it will be used to protect the whole of the realm."

"Careful not to set your expectations too high, my lord," Sylas Vikary cautioned the massive knight.
Gregor slowly turned to the older man and gazed down at him. He spoke calmly "I am going to say this once, Sylas: I would never strive to complete a goal that I knew to be impossible. If I declare that this fortress will be used for the good of all Westeros, it will be."

Sylas Vikary meekly nodded his head and stared at the ground. He uttered quietly "Indeed. I beseech your pardon."

"You needn't my forgiveness," Gregor asserted, "I have need of your faith, however. In the years to come, I will need you and Erryk and everyone else who came north with me."

"And you shall have us, Ser," Polliver declared, suddenly brightening up.

"All of us," Erryk Ruttiger conceded. All along the column, there were strong mutters of agreement. Even the most dubious of them were convinced that Gregor knew what he was doing. The Mountain had to grin at how willing his companions were to trust in him. Soon enough, he would prove that their trust was well-founded.

"Let's press on," Gregor firmly pronounced, "We've got work to do."

And we've only got twenty years to do it.

According to legend, there had once been as many as twenty towers in Moat Cailin. Although the Children's Tower, the Gatehouse Tower, and the Drunkard's Tower were the only three remaining, they were still sufficient to ascertain that the moat was impenetrable from the south.

However, Gregor wanted the defenses to be more than "sufficient," and he wanted to guarantee that the moat would be impregnable from the north, as well. Not that he mistrusted the Northmen or the Free Folk. The greatest danger to ever befall Westeros would originate from the North, but it would not be posed by either of them.

The first six months of Gregor's occupation of Moat Cailin were mostly devoted to making long-term preparations. His thirteen thousand gold dragons saw a lot of usage in that time frame.

Their first use was an investment. After settling into the moat, Gregor commissioned a team of Essosi architects to sail across the Narrow Sea and rebuild it. Of course, it took time for them to arrive. Gregor spent that time devising a comprehensive outline of the refurbishments he had in mind.

He also took that time to organize his plans to carry out his duties as Master of Order.

His goal to unite Westeros would be a difficult one. Back home, such an objective would have been attained through negotiation and diplomacy. Here, in this hazardous and unpredictable world, they were inadequate. Even if Gregor somehow managed to get the Lords Paramount to sit down at a table and parley, none of them – not even the Starks – could speak for all of their vassals. In this world, peace could never be reached without bloodshed.

Be that as it may, this was not entirely a disadvantage. There was one thing that every house in the realm desired: safety. They were all willing to fight to ensure the survival of their families. If the situation called for it, they would go so far as to ally with their enemies to purge a common danger. Even if the alliance was only temporary, it was still legitimate.

Gregor could use that to bring everyone together. He would not be able to tell the realm about the Long Night (at least not yet), but he could inspire in its people the notion of fighting for a higher cause. One that transcended any of their old rivalries. If he could do that, he would have the opportunity to create one of the grandest fighting forces in the known world.
That was his plan. Gregor was going to build an army. An army comprised of warriors from all over Westeros. Its composition would include Northmen, Riverlords, Valemen, Ironborn, Stormlords, Westerlords, Reachmen, Dornishmen, and Crownlords alike. In time, perhaps it would also receive some members from Essos, or even the Free Folk.

He would begin the formation of that army very soon. Westeros was currently in a volatile state. Its inhabitants were still recovering from Robert's Rebellion. At this time, they would be willing to consider anything to avoid further loss. In other words, this would be the optimal time for Gregor to reach out to the Westerosi and start recruiting.

Unfortunately, when he first came to Moat Cailin, he lacked the items needed to communicate with the whole realm. Thankfully, that problem remedied itself a fortnight and a-half later. That was when the maester assigned to the moat arrived.

The maester was in his early thirties. His first name was Kennick. Before he gave up his family name, he had been a Hersy of the Vale. He was a first cousin to the current Lord of Newkeep. He became an acolyte of the Citadel at the age of fourteen. Now his maester's chain contained links of over a dozen different metals. He was more than amply qualified to counsel Gregor Clegane.

Gregor had requested enough ravens so that one could be dispatched to each stronghold in the country all at once. To some, that would seem rather unusual. Only King’s Landing ever had that many ravens, but even so, Robert granted his request.

When Maester Kennick arrived in Moat Cailin, he brought with him hundreds of ravens; one for every house in the Seven Kingdoms.

The journey from Oldtown to Moat Cailin had been an exhausting one. It was nearly twice the distance from Clegane's Keep to the moat. As such, Gregor allowed Maester Kennick a few hours to recuperate and become acquainted with the other residents of the moat. After that, the maester's services and his ravens' were put to use.

Maester Kennick had already been informed of Gregor's status on Robert's Small Council, as well as the responsibilities that went with it. Gregor summoned Kennick to his solar (which was located in the Gatehouse Tower), and he briefly explained his plan to create the most diverse army in the history of Westeros. The maester found his plan to be a risky one, but a credible one all the same.

Gregor had Maester Kennick draft a letter that would be sent out to every house in the realm. He dictated to him the following:

"Our King, Robert Baratheon, First of His Name, has named me, Gregor of House Clegane, as his Master of Order.

Those of who wonder on that title's meaning have a right to. The office was founded very recently.

Simply put, I am now the foremost upholder of armistice, enforcement, and justice in Westeros. The King has charged me with ensuring peace, security, and tranquility throughout his reign.

In these troubled times, I believe I am right to assume that there are others who wish for no further tragedy to fall on this country. There are even those who would do anything to protect their own. Those are the ones this message is meant for.

I ask you: what is more peaceful, secure, and tranquil than a country whose inhabitants cooperate to guarantee its endurance?

I say there is no such thing. As Master of Order, I aim to prove that."
I shall see to the establishment of a private legion of soldiers. This legion will not be founded on any bias. Rivalries and prejudices of all types will be set aside for the well-being of Westeros. Its units will fight alongside each other to rid Westeros of its afflictions.

This company will be known as the Legion without Banners.

Whether you are of the North, the Vale, the Iron Islands, the Stormlands, Dorne, the Westerlands, the Reach, the Crownlands, or the Riverlands, you have the option to join the Legion. It will be akin to the Night's Watch in that respect.

But whereas the Night's Watch guards the realms of men, this army shall protect those realms more directly. Furthermore, any person who joins the Legion will not be expected to serve for life; only as long as they wish to.

Any person who desires to join the Legion need only come to Moat Cailin and enlist. It matters not whether you are highborn or lowborn; whether you are a bastard or legitimate; whether you are green or hardened. So long as you can prove your usefulness somehow, you are welcome here.

Anyone who has committed a crime or intends to, do not think of the Legion as an alternative to taking the black. The whole purpose of its existence is to hunt down and capture people like you. Unless you have been pardoned by the King or the individual you have wronged, no criminals will be granted quarter or entry.

For the ambitious ones who require more of an incentive, there is more to be gained in the Legion than the fulfillment of one's sense of duty. Those of you in pursuit of money have the ability to become rich. Those of you who desire glory have the option to become famous. Those of you who yearn for adventure have the chance to become great.

Whatever your case, once you join the Legion, your first and only true responsibility is to make this country better. So I appeal to your love for your homeland and your obligation to do what is just. Fight with me so that future generations will be spared further conflict.

Gregor Clegane, Lord of Moat Cailin, Master of Order.

None of that was thought up on the spot. Not wanting to make any revisions, Gregor had decided what he was going to say well in advance. All the same, it took Kennick over five minutes to write that letter.

Once the maester was finished, Gregor took up the letter and examined it. He tried to imagine how it would appear to the lords and knights of the Seven Kingdoms. It was meant as a summons, albeit an optional one. He could actually see himself answering this summons of his own free will. After all, he had joined the CIA without any encouragement. The Legion without Banners would have a lot more freedoms than the CIA ever did, and the people of Westeros has simpler needs to satisfy.

Given how many houses there were in the Seven Kingdoms, it would take Kennick days to compose a letter to all of them. So Gregor ordered every one of his retainers who could write to assist him. That only accounted for about forty of them out of a hundred. Still, the process went by forty times faster. By twilight that same day, all the letters had been written.

Immediately after, the ravens were dispatched. There was nothing more to do at that point but wait for responses.

He thought the "Legion without Banners" was a clever designation. He thought about sticking with "Brotherhood," but that term did not effectively emphasize the full scope of his intended army.
Plus, it would be a little TOO ironic when considering the reason why the original Brotherhood without Banners had been formed.

While waiting for the Essosi architects and replies to the ravens, Gregor received news on various events. These were events that had occurred in canon.

Near the start of the next year, Queen Rhaella Targaryen had died birthing her last child, Daenerys Targaryen. Not long after, Stannis Baratheon launched an assault on Dragonstone. He succeeded in seizing the island fortress, but Ser Willem Darry managed to flee across the Narrow Sea with Prince Viserys and Princess Daenerys in his custody.

Gregor had not forgotten about any of those affairs. Even so, he had done nothing to alter or prevent them. Then again, he was never in a position to effect much change. Although Dragonstone was relatively close to King's Landing, the ships loyal to the Targaryens would never have allowed him near the fortress.

Aside from that, Gregor was inclined not to interfere in Dany's storyline for the present. He did not wish to subject Dany to the torment of her brother, but he had to ensure that the dragons would be born. After all, the dragons would be instrumental in the Long Night. Maybe Khal Drogo would not have to die in order for their eggs to hatch. Maybe Dany would not even have to meet Khal Drogo. Still, Gregor had no way of knowing where Illyrio Mopatis was storing the eggs, or if he even had them at this time. Until Gregor found out where they were, he would have to wait until the Magister presented the eggs to Dany at her wedding.

Still, if he found a way to aid Daenerys in some minor capacity, he would do so. The dragons would be quintessential to his plan. Perhaps once Jon, Rhaenys, and Aegon were of age, they would be able to go after Daenerys.

There was also Robert Baratheon's wedding to Cersei Lannister. Gregor had been given an invitation to attend that event, but he respectfully declined, claiming that he was far too busy with other matters. To his good fortune, Robert was very understanding, and he accepted Gregor's reasons for refusal.

According to what he heard of the royal wedding, King Robert had remained surprisingly sober throughout the ceremony and the feast. By the bedding, he had only had two cups of wine. One of which he had not even emptied.

The bedding ceremony was particularly memorable. The unfortunate guards posted outside the bedchamber could hear everything that went on inside.

In fact, Robert Baratheon could be heard yelling "Cersei" all the way from the Tower of the Hand. Lord Jon Arryn could attest to that.

If what Gregor heard was true, King Robert and Queen Cersei were smitten with each other.

That could have been interpreted as merely the elation typically experienced by newlyweds, but it was a hopeful sign. Maybe the marriage between Robert and Cersei would actually work out. They were already showing more affection to each other than they ever had in canon.

Not long after the Royal Wedding, the first volunteer for the Legion without Banners appeared in Moat Cailin. Interestingly, it was Gerion Lannister, youngest brother to Lord Tywin.

That came as a pleasant surprise to Gregor. He greeted Gerion warmly. He was glad to know that he had not lost face with all the Lannisters. Based on the books, he had been Jaime and Tyrion's favorite uncle, and by far the most equitable of Tytos Lannister's brood.

A few days after Gerion arrived, the Essosi architects got to Moat Cailin, as well. Gregor presented them with the outline he had drawn up for the moat's renovations.

The architects followed his outline almost flawlessly.

They drained part of the swamp and built a canal so that passage between Moat Cailin and the Narrow Sea was possible. They also built a harbor just outside the moat. The canal began in that harbor, and it ran all the way to the Bite, just a few leagues southwest of White Harbor. The primary purposes of the canal would be to transport supplies and provisions to the moat, and to enable the Legion to travel by sea when they had to.

The harbor was large enough to station over a score vessels. In order to uphold the moat's defensive capabilities, the canal was made very thin; even if an entire armada tried to lay siege to Moat Cailin, they would have to enter the canal one at a time. There was also an iron gate at the entrance of the canal that could only be opened from the inside. Those precautions and the swamp's exploitable surroundings would make sinking invading ships fairly easy to do.

The architects also built an aqueduct so that fresh water was more readily available. That would be critical, based on how large he expected the Legion would ultimately become.

Additionally, the walls were reinforced, the towers were strengthened, and the gates were reconstructed. By the end of those six months, Moat Cailin truly was a magnificent sight to behold.

Even after Moat Cailin was restored, Gregor had the architects stay on for future developments he had planned. They were willing to remain in Westeros, so long as he had work for them.

Gregor's forces had also gotten larger in that time. The Legion without Banners was up to eighty recruits.

So far, no one from the Iron Islands or the Crownlands had signed up. Apart from Gerion, only a couple Westerlanders had showed up. A handful of people from the Vale, the Riverlands, and the Stormlands had enlisted. The Reach and Dorne had a slightly larger turnout. More volunteers came from the North than any other region by far. That was probably due to how Eddard Stark had vouched for Gregor.

There was one other change Gregor made: his sigil.

His father and the future Cleganes of Clegane's Keep would keep the original sigil of the three hounds. Gregor needed a new sigil for the Cleganes of Moat Cailin.

For the new sigil, Gregor adapted the illustration of a mountain with nine small figures at its base. The mountain, obviously, represented him. The nine small figures were supposed to represent one person from each of the regions of Westeros. They were a symbol of what was to come. He did not explain that bit to anyone else, but they were free to guess.

The first two years of Gregor's tenure as lord of Moat Cailin were mostly uneventful. The Legion without Banners was called upon often enough, but their errands were generally composed of little more than hunting down bandits, rogue lawbreakers, and the occasional band of outlaws.

Overtime, however, the crime rate in Westeros steadily rose. Gregor saw that as a sign that things would get worse before he and his soldiers could make them better. Strangely, he felt relieved. That implied he would have plenty of opportunities to demonstrate the Legion's aptitude. The more opportunities he used, the greater impact he would leave on Westeros.
In the third year after Gregor assumed lordship of Moat Cailin, a lone rider approached the moat from the north. The rider was hooded and cloaked. When the rider reached the gate, the guardsman called out "Who goes there?"

The rider declared in a deceptively deep voice "I would have words with your lord."

"Whatever message you have, I can relay to him," the guardsman claimed.

"I would prefer to speak to him face-to-face," the rider rejoined, "I will not waste his time, I promise you."

The guardsman stood thinking on what to do for a moment. Then he told the rider "I will send for him. I cannot guarantee he will come straightaway, though."

"I can wait," the rider asserted.

At that time, Gregor had been conversing with his council, which was composed of Sylas Vikary, Maester Kennick, Erryk Ruttiger, and Rodrik Cassel.

Since Rodrik's brother had not perished in Dorne in this universe, Martyn now served as Winterfell's master-at-arms instead. That gave Rodrik the freedom to join the Legion without Banners. Now he also served as Moat Cailin's master-at-arms.

The council was just finishing a meeting when the guardsman sent a servant to find Gregor. Right before they exited Gregor's solar, the servant entered the room and informed the Mountain that a rider with a concealed face was at the northern gate, and this rider desired to speak with him directly.

Gregor had nothing of immediate precedence on his agenda, so he decided he could spare a few minutes to interact with this mysterious rider. The members of his council accompanied him.

By the time they reached the northern gate, the doors had been opened and the portcullis had been raised. Gregor gradually passed the threshold of the gate. He did not stop walking until he was less than ten feet from the rider.

He noticed very quickly that the rider's head was higher than his. That did not happen often, even when the other party was mounted. He also noticed that the figure had a very slender figure, although the chest was exceptionally pronounced.

Gregor folded his arms and asked rhetorically "You asked for me?"

"Yes, my lord," the rider replied in the same false, deep voice, "I'm here to offer you my services."

Gregor lightly shrugged and stated "There's plenty of work to be found here. But might I see your face first?"

The rider promptly took ahold of the hood and threw it back.

Immediately, Gregor discovered why the figure was so slender. Behind that hood was not a man's face, but a woman's. Actually, "woman" may have been a stretch. The rider was more a girl. Judging by her countenance, she had to be in her teens.

Then again, she may have been a girl, but she did have a womanly figure. She was tall, she was strapping, and her form was rather curvaceous. She had black hair that went down to her shoulders. Her face was a little long, but it complemented her physique nicely.

"You've come a long way to serve as a kitchen wench," Erryk Ruttiger japed.

Sylas Vikary snickered at that. Maester Kennick lightly rolled his eyes and Rodrik Cassel glared at the castellan. Gregor simply ignored him.

"I'm not here to work in the kitchens, ser," the female rider stated bluntly, "I'm here to enlist in the Legion."

That surprised everyone there except Ser Rodrik Cassel and Gregor Clegane. As a Northman, Ser Rodrik was used to the concept of warrior women. The Mountain had been looking forward to having some women enlist in his army.

He was actually surprised that it had not happened sooner. Especially when considering that a larger percentage of his numbers came from the North than anywhere else in the Seven Kingdoms.

Although no women had joined the Legion yet, Gregor had never doubted for a moment that some eventually would. Now, one finally had.

After a bit of silence, Gregor stepped forward, gave a nod of his head, and stated "Very well, my lady."

While the expression on the rider's face suggested that she had fully expected to be welcomed into Gregor's army, she seemed a little stunned by how readily accepting he was. She cocked her head and said assumingly "You have no objections to a woman serving in the Legion?"

"Of course not," Gregor professed, "It is well known that the Legion does not discriminate on basis of status, age, reputation, birth, or religious beliefs. There is no reason why we should discriminate on basis of gender, either."

"Fine argument, my lord," the rider admitted, giving a shrug of her shoulders.

Gregor smiled at her, held his hand out to the gate, and bade her "Come, please."

The rider grinned back and urged her horse forward. She followed the Mountain back through the gate. After the portcullis was lowered and the doors were shut, Gregor led her over to the stables.

As the stableboys took charge of her horse, she dismounted. When she was on her feet, Gregor realized just how tall she really was.

He had initially supposed that she simply appeared that tall whilst mounted. Perhaps she had been sitting on a blanket or two.

As it turned out, she had not. There was nothing on her horse's back other than its saddle. So her height had not been embellished. It was all her.

On foot, she still had to look up at Gregor. Of course, everyone else did. But they would probably have to look up at this girl, as well. She was over six feet tall. She had to be the tallest female he had ever seen, and one of the five tallest people he had ever seen.

He was surprised even further when the girl opened her cloak, revealing her surcoat. Emblazoned on it was her sigil: a bear standing on its hind legs with its teeth and fangs bared. Furthermore, the girl's cloak and clothes were predominantly green.
Right then, Gregor knew who was standing before him. He stated assumingly "You're from Bear Island?"

"Yes, ser," the tall girl answered, turning back to Gregor, "My name is Dacey Mormont."

She then extended her hand to the Mountain. He grasped it, shook it firmly, and told her warmly "Welcome to the Legion, Lady Dacey."

Chapter End Notes

Note: So, any guesses on who the future Lady Clegane of Moat Cailin will be? Heh heh heh...

I've gotten a lot of remarks about the possibility of a romance between Sandor and Sansa developing in this story. Some people are highly for it; some are firmly against it. Truth be told, I'm pretty indifferent to that pairing. I don't particularly adore it, but I certainly don't detest it, either. I know I can never appease everyone, but I try to appease as many people as possible. So I'm going to ask; how many of you would prefer it if I incorporated San/San, and how many of you would prefer if I avoided using it? I'll keep another tally, and regardless of the vote, I'm alright with either option.
Gregory Welch had gone back to his hometown of Seattle a few times after he joined the CIA, but for the last six years of his first life, his officially town of residence was Fairfax.

Then again, he had only spent about twenty-three months of that time in Virginia. For the remaining forty-nine he was elsewhere.

During his days as a Special Agent, Gregory had been all over the United States. At some point or other, he had visited all fifty of them, including Alaska and Hawaii. He had also been in Mexico, Canada, and several countries in Europe and Asia. He rarely stayed in any one place for very long. Oftentimes he felt like a nomad. Even so, he enjoyed the lifestyle. Although the main reason for the traveling was to solve the problems of others, they did not come without recompense. He got to see more of the world and have his own adventures on the sideline.

That was why he formed the Legion without Banners as he did. His frequent travels around Westeros had the same purpose as his operations in the CIA, and they came with the same benefits. He was able to protect the realm and fulfill his thirst for adventure simultaneously.

Reading about Westeros was one thing. It was entirely another to see it firsthand. In the span of its 2,000-plus miles, there were glaciers, mountains, swamps, grasslands, forests, and deserts. All those landscapes could be found in the United States, too, of course, but not all in such a small distance.

Gregor was aware that the terrain of the Seven Kingdoms was supposed to be modelled after that of Ireland, and that the terrain of the Free Cities and Slaver's Bay was modelled after England and Scotland. He had been to all three countries as Gregory Welch, and he could verify firsthand that the sizes and shapes were the only things they really had in common with Westeros and Essos.

Still, despite the other dissimilarities, he had to appreciate this world. It was huge, it was exhilarating, it was gorgeous, and it was breathtaking.

The same could be said for the first female member of the Legion without Banners.

Dacey Mormont became accustomed to the Legion with little difficulty. That was not to say Gregor's decision to recruit her had faced no disapproval. Of course, he had anticipated that.

In this male-dominated society, the concept of a person wielding a sword without having been born with one did not sit well with many men. That did not bother Dacey in the slightest. After all, Gregor himself authorized her entry. With his approval, no one could reject her. That did not prevent them from voicing their opinions, though.
The Northmen and the Dornishmen presented no opposition whatsoever to Dacey's enrollment. The Valemen, the Ironborn, the Stormlords, and the Riverlords only put up a little protest. The Westerlords, the Crownlords, and the Reachmen were the most vocally opposed. Some went so far as to challenge her competency with a blade. That was a grave error on their part.

They did not provoke Dacey into lashing out, but they did encourage her to challenge their skills in turn. She managed to defeat Robert Brax, Godry Farring, and Axel Florent in a three-on-one duel. After that, overall opinion of Dacey's participation in the Legion was strongly directed in her favor.

There were still some men who did not acquiesce with her being among them. At the very least, all the men respected her now. Dacey and Gregor were pleased by that.

That was the beginning of something grand.

Dacey demonstrated her abilities many times over in the Legion. She was deadly with any weapon, be it axe, sword, or any blunt object. She could kill a man as easily as charm him, and she was a superb rider. After just three months of service, she became one of Gregor's top lieutenants.

Through her actions, Dacey became an inspiration to women all over Westeros. Her involvement in the Legion incited many other women to enter in the Legion, as well.

Two of them were Obara Sand and Nymeria Sand, Oberyn Martell's eldest bastards. Interestingly, the Red Viper himself enlisted alongside his daughters.

Given how daring, venturesome, and infamously impulsive Oberyn was, Gregor was hardly surprised that the Dornish prince opted to partake in the largest free company west of the Narrow Sea. Gregor vaguely recalled reading somewhere that Oberyn had once served in one of the free companies of Essos. Most likely the Second Sons, seeing as how he was a second son by birth. The Red Viper was always one to add a touch of irony in things.

On the subject of irony, Gregor formed a quite unexpected friendship with Doran Martell's younger brother whilst the latter was in the Legion.

In the original universe, Oberyn Martell would have died (and did) for the chance to slaughter the Mountain. Of course, he had done that because the original Gregor Clegane had brutally assaulted and murdered Elia Martell and her children. Since the Gregor Clegane who had once been Gregory Welch had risked everything to save Oberyn's sister, niece, and nephew, Oberyn harbored no hostile feelings towards the massive knight. They would not be fighting a skirmish to the death anytime soon.

Still, Gregor wondered who would actually win in a fight: him or Oberyn? He was the younger by seven years, and he was also far larger and stronger. All the same, Oberyn was quicker, more agile, and adept with just about any weapon. All factors considered, both men stood an equal chance of besting the other.

Gregor decided not to risk finding out the hard way who was the better warrior. Not if he could help it, at any rate. If Oberyn offered to spar with him, Gregor would not refuse him. But only out of courtesy and to test his own skills. However, he partly hoped that Oberyn would not suggest a duel. Much of Gregor's influence was attributed to the belief that he was unbeatable. So long as that was the established norm, he would be recognized as a symbol of might and awe.

With that in mind, it would not do well if the soldiers of the Legion discovered that their reportedly indestructible leader could be knocked on his back by an older man who stood two feet shorter than him.
To Gregor's good fortune, aside from their friendly bouts in Moat Cailin's training yard, Oberyn never asked to spar with him. However, the Red Viper did express some interest in getting Gregor on his back in another sense of the term.

By this point in time, Ellaria Sand had already become Oberyn's paramour. She had accompanied the Red Viper on his journey north. When she arrived at Moat Cailin, she was riding near the front of Oberyn's company. She was ahorse at the time, but she only held her gelding's reins in one hand. In the other, she had been cradling an infant girl close to her chest. That was her and Oberyn's first daughter, Elia Sand.

Ellaria had not come to sign up in the Legion; she was just there in "service" to the prince. She tended to provide those services to him quite often. Several times a day, matter of fact.

It was worth noting that apart from the canal and the harbor, several new buildings had been built around Moat Cailin. They included a sept for those in the Legion that worshipped the New Gods, a vault for all the revenue the Legion had earned from their endeavors, a library for those who desired to further their knowledge of the world, a couple inns for anyone passing through the area, a small village for those of the Legion whose families had come with them, and a brothel... for those who needed some respite after an assignment.

Oberyn and Ellaria tended to spend much of their leisure time in the brothel. Within a month of their arrival, Gregor was certain they had sampled every gigolo and whore in that establishment. After that, they broadened their horizons.

There were plenty of soldiers in the Legion that were willing to bed Oberyn's paramour. However, Ellaria only accepted those of them that would accept Oberyn, as well. While that criterion severely limited their options, the two of them managed to find at least one man from each of the nine regions of Westeros who enjoyed intimate company with both sexes.

There were even a few whose interests were exclusively in Oberyn. One of them was Ser Lyn Corbray. Despite the fact that Ser Lyn had killed Oberyn's uncle, Ser Lewyn Martell of Aerys' Kingsguard, at the Battle of the Trident, the Valeman and the Dornishman got along famously. It appeared as though the Red Viper did not hold a grudge without justifiable foundation.

At any rate, while Gregor and Oberyn had a great friendship with each other, there were times when the latter vied for it to become more than that. Oberyn still did not propose a duel between them. However, every now and then, when they were alone together, Oberyn put forth the idea that he and Gregor could test each other's prowess in a less physical but equally invigorating manner.

Oberyn assured him the affair would be behind closed doors. The level of secrecy did little to sway Gregor's mind, but Oberyn was persistent. He was subtle about it at first. Then his motto may as well have been "subtlety be damned."

Gregor tried to decline his proposition as gently as possible, but Oberyn did not seem willing to accept refusal. Oberyn argued that it would simply be a new type of experience. Gregor countered by claiming that he had never been stabbed in his life, but if he ever had to get stabbed, he preferred that it would be with a knife first.

Ultimately, Oberyn agreed to respect Gregor's wishes, and he ceased his efforts to seduce the massive knight. All the same, he informed Gregor that should he ever change his mind, the Red Viper would be more than pleased to acquaint him with a form of pleasure he had not yet experienced.

Then again, Gregor Clegane's experiences with the traditional form of pleasure were not many, either.

He did not even know whether or not he was a virgin.

Gregory Welch had not been a ladies' man, but he had slept with half a dozen women. He actually lost his virginity when he was in his freshman year of college. He was not even nineteen when that happened.

Gregor Clegane was now past his twenty-first name day. He had yet to caress a woman's bosom.

It was not as though he was blind to the charms and appeal of the opposite sex. He was too busy upholding law and order to get laid.

Or that was he told himself at least. It was probably just an excuse he had invented.

Still, all the talk about intimacy with Oberyn got Gregor to thinking about the future of his own romance life.

He wondered if he should begin to search for a wife. Most lords and their heirs at least had a marriage contract arranged for them by the time they reached his age.

His parents had considered betrothing him to Lady Alysanne Lefford. They never broached the subject with Lord Leo, though. He and his daughter belonged to the second wealthiest house in the Westerlands, as well as the holder of the largest portion of the Westerlords' fleet. An offer of marriage from a very young knightly house could have been viewed as an insult.

Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah had investigated other prospective marriage contracts for their eldest child, but they rarely discussed them with him. That was primarily because he had been away from Clegane's Keep so often. Typically, he was out administering Lord Tywin Lannister's justice instead.

Now that Gregor had been cut off from his parents, the duty of finding a bride was left solely up to him.

Due in large part to his newfound fame and his noble reputation, he had a number of prospective candidates. Some would say he had too many. Be that as it may, picking one might not have been as hard as it seemed.

Gregor had noticed something peculiar. Beauty and strength were almost inversely proportional to each other with regards to Westerosi women. Nearly all of the most attractive and beautiful women in Westeros – such as Sansa, Cersei, and Daenerys – had no combat prowess whatsoever. Whereas all the tomboyish and strong warrior women – such as Arya, Brienne, Meera, and Asha – had absolutely no sex appeal.

There were some exceptions, of course. The first female member of the Legion was one.

Dacey Mormont was neither the most beautiful nor the strongest woman in the Seven Kingdoms. But she possessed a wondrous combination of both qualities.

Gregor was not so shallow as to believe that splendor and vigor were the only things that mattered in a woman. His parents in both of his lives had raised him better than that.

Strength and beauty were not Dacey's only positive attributes. She was also very quick-witted, and she was a brilliant tactician. She also had a broad sense of humor, which everyone enjoyed.
Gregor found that the more time he spent with the warrior woman, the more he appreciated her company. From what he could tell, she seemed to reciprocate those feelings.

After a while, he wondered if those feelings would develop into something more intimate.

Gregor knew he would have to marry someone at some point in time. In this world, the sooner he got wed, the better.

The main reason for all the haste was because every lord wished to ensure that his family line would endure. Considering how dangerous Westeros could be, they were obligated to begin making trueborn heirs as soon as possible. After all, they ran the risk of not being around long enough to do so.

While Gregor could understand the wish to continue one's lineage, he could have done without the ever-present demand to further it. Gregory Welch's parents had never pressured him for grandchildren. He had never been married or engaged. He did not even have time for a girlfriend during his years in the CIA.

Then again, he had grown up in a country that had almost never practiced arranged marriage. The only exceptions were when the ceremony coincided with one's religious beliefs. Here in Westeros, he would have to find a wife whether he wished to or not.

He knew that few arranged marriages involved love at the beginning, but all the same, Gregor would have preferred it if he and his future bride actually had some feelings of affection toward each other before they were bound together. Eddard Stark and Catelyn Tully had come to love each other. Under the right circumstances, Robert Baratheon and Cersei Lannister could, as well.

Currently, Gregor's relationship with Dacey was nothing more than a friendship. But it could certainly grow into something more.

From a political viewpoint, Dacey presented his best option. She could garner great respect and love from the other members of the Legion, she was capable of defending herself unaided, and she was very astute in matters of war and diplomacy.

Plus, House Mormont was one of Winterfell's most devoted vassals. A marriage between Gregor and Dacey could strengthen the bond between him and the Starks. That would be especially useful when the Long Night finally arrived.

Their most notable dissimilarity was the difference in age. At the time of their first meeting, Gregor was twenty-one, and Dacey was sixteen. In his first life, Gregory would never have dared to lay a hand on any female younger than eighteen. Not only because it was illegal, but also because it was immoral.

Whereas in Westeros, age of consent laws were practically nonexistent. Having lived in the country for two decades had somewhat lessened Gregor's rigid twenty-first century American views on the topic. He still thought it was disturbing that girls were deemed of eligible as soon as they had their moon's blood for the first time. One of his sisters had gotten her first period when she was only eleven.

In any case, Gregor would take his time in his pursuit of finding a bride. He would also keep his options open until he was more certain about his relationship with Dacey. He would wait a while before he even mentioned the concept of marriage to her. He would hate to address it too soon. He could handle rejection, but not when it ruined a perfectly healthy friendship.
Furthermore, Gregor had greater concerns than getting hitched. His top priority was still his objective to unite Westeros.

By this point, he had already done a fair job of bringing the Seven Kingdoms together. The process was still in its preliminary stages, but he was witnessing some progress with every passing week.

As he anticipated, Gregor did encounter some setbacks. For instance, some in Westeros were more willing to bond than others. That was reflected in the ratios of the peoples who came to Moat Cailin.

Of the nine regions of Westeros, the Ironborn composed the smallest percentage of the Legion without Banners. So far, no one especially prominent from the Iron Islands had entered the organization. Most of them were bastards, peasants, and former thralls. There were some retainers from Houses Harlaw, Botley, and Goodbrother that had signed up, as well.

At first, Gregor was unfazed by the low turnout of the Ironborn. After all, based off the canon content in the franchise, they were basically a civilization (if you could call them civil) of people who thought themselves too good to enter an alliance. Robb had approached Balon Greyjoy with the offer of a coalition, and how did he reply? He all but said "fuck you" and attacked the North.

Gregor had often wondered why the rest of Westeros had not banded together to wipe out the Iron Islands. More to the point, how had the Ironborn even survived this long? They lived on a cluster of desolate rocks, they resorted to raiding rather than trade, and they were too proud to form a friendship with any of the other cultures in Westeros. Even the masters of Slaver's Bay were not so reprehensible. While he did not condone genocide, Gregor personally believed that the Ironborn were a nuisance that the rest of Westeros could do without.

All the same, the Iron Islands could be useful in their own way. He was holding out hope that at least some of the Ironborn were wise enough to see the benefits of a united Westeros. Surely some of them had that much sense. Some of them must have been with honor.

It turned out they did. In the third year after the Legion without Banners was founded, there was an incident that even Gregor had not forecasted.

During the eighth month of that year, a lone ship sailed up the Cut (that was the name that had been given to the canal). When the on-duty lookout spotted the ship from afar, Gregor was promptly summoned to the gate.

From the top of the gate, the Mountain peered down the canal through a far-eye (that was what telescopes were called in this world), and he focused on the vessel as it approached.

Straightaway, he recognized it as an Ironborn ship. That was rather quaint. The Iron Islands were located off the western shores of Westeros. The Cut opened up onto one of the eastern banks. Any Ironman who wished to get to the canal would have had to either travel through the Riverlands or go all the way around the southern end of the continent.

Either route would have expended a great amount of time and resources. Whoever was currently traversing up the Cut must have been determined to reach Moat Cailin.

Gregor's eyes widened when they fell across the name printed on the side of the ship. It was the Iron Victory.

Victarion Greyjoy was coming. For what reason, Gregor could not fathom.
Gregor's council and the top officers of the Legion had joined him at the gate. They concentrated on the large vessel apprehensively, as well.

"What are your orders, my lord?" Ser Rodrik Cassel inquired.

Gregor stood thinking for a minute. Then he lowered the far-eye and proclaimed "When the ship nears… open the gate."

That command stunned several of the people present.

"My lord?" Gerion Lannister remarked, perplexed.

"Trust me, Gerion," Gregor asserted, "If Victarion intends to storm the moat, we can easily overpower him."

"Why even give him the opportunity?" Allard Seaworth, second son to Ser Davos, debated.

"Because I do not believe seizing Moat Cailin is his objective," Gregor observed, "If it was, he would have brought more than one vessel. However, as a precaution, we should account for the whereabouts of all the Legionnaires from the Iron Islands. Make a note of where they are, but do nothing to give the impression that something is aloof."

"It will be done, Ser," Polliver pronounced.

The Mountain's men-at-arms still tended to refer to him as "Ser," even though he had been a lord for over two years, and lords generally outranked knights in terms of status. There were some landed knights who stood higher than minor lords, but Gregor certainly was not a minor lord. Still, he allowed his men to continue addressing him by the title of "Ser."

Most of Gregor's companions went to locate their Ironborn colleagues and keep track of their movements. Oberyn Martell, Rodrik Cassel, Sylas Vikary, and Dacey Mormont were among those who remained with the Mountain.

When the Iron Victory reached the end of the canal, the gates were opened and it was granted entrance. Every person on the waterfront eyed the vessel warily as it came into the harbor. The entirety of the ship's crew was armed, but most of them did not have their weapons brandished.

The dockhands guided the ship into port. Once a gangplank was set up between the bridge of the Iron Victory and the closest dock, the vessel's captain and his senior officers swiftly disembarked onto the waterfront.

Gregor and his associates had already climbed down from the gate. They arrived on the dock at approximately the same moment as Victarion and his men. That was when he and Gregor met face-to-face for the first time.

Back when he was just a fan of the series, Gregor had thought of Victarion as the one Greyjoy who was even remotely likeable. Asha and Theon had their own redeeming characteristics, but apart from his traditional Ironborn ideals and the ruthless murder of his third wife, Victarion had nothing he had to redeem. He was only marginally more intelligent than Gregor's men-at-arms, but he commanded more authority and respect from his men than almost any other military leader in Westeros.

In terms of stature, Victarion was a brute of a man, just as the books entailed. He still stood nearly a head shorter than Gregor, but even Dacey had to tilt her head upwards at him.
One of the men standing next to Victarion had a gash in his face. It had opened his lips, rendering his front teeth visible, even when he closed his mouth. That must have been Dagmer Cleftjaw.

Gregor knew that Dagmer had served the Greyjoys for most of his life in the original universe, but he could not recall if the Cleftjaw had ever served under Victarion directly.

If he had not, then what reason could he have for being there with Victarion now?

Whatever Dagmer's reason, it must have been the same as Victarion's reason for coming in the first place.

The only way to find out the reason was to ask.

After an interval of intense silence, Gregor cordially declared "On behalf of Robert Baratheon and the Seven Kingdoms, I bid you welcome, Captain Victarion."

"Iron Captain Victarion," Dagmer Cleftjaw corrected him.

Victarion gestured for the Cleftjaw to hold his tongue, and then he turned to Gregor and pronounced "Your greetings are noted, but needless."

Evidently, Victarion was not one for Smalltalk. Gregor decided to cut right to the point. He folded his arms and inquired "What brings you to Moat Cailin? You're not here for conquest, I gather."

"If I was, you and I would be clashing steel right now," Victarion bluntly remarked, "As for why I'm here... why does anyone come here?"

Gregor could not tell if that was a rhetorical question or if it was an actual query. He raised an eyebrow and muttered "I beg your pardon?"

"You heard me, Mountain," Victarion grimly mumbled. He looked around at Dacey, Oberyn, and Ser Rodrik, and he murmured "What reason do they have for being here?"

"They're members of the Legion without Banners," Gregor responded straightforwardly

"There you have it," Victarion said drily, "My men and I will soon join their ranks."

It was then that Gregor knew what was going on. "You plan to enlist in the Legion?"

"We're going to enlist in the Legion," Victarion contended.

"Lord Gregor has the final say on who enters this company," Dacey Mormont interjected.

"He would be a fool to reject us," Dagmer Cleftjaw gruffly observed, "Then again, he may be one already, if a woman must speak for him."

Oberyn looked disgusted by that slight, and Ser Rodrik grimaced angrily. Dacey merely scoffed. She had put up with sexism long enough that it no longer bothered her. Especially when it came from maritime savages like Dagmer Cleftjaw.

Gregor retained a calm facial expression, but he sternly stated "This 'woman' is one of my most trusted officers. She has fought by my side for months and never once has she let me down. On any given day, I would pick her over the lot of you."

"Then you are a fool," Victarion commented.
Gregor abruptly stepped forward, gripped Victarion by the clasp of his cloak, and pulled him closer. Dagmer and the other Ironborn reached for their swords, but before they could be drawn, they were surrounded on all sides by armed Legionnaires.

The Ironborn tentatively stood down, but they kept their hands around the hilts of their blades.

Gregor stared Victarion down intently. Then he mumbled crossly "I've heard it said that you'd beat a man to death for calling you a fool. I do not tolerate that sort of insolence here. But unlike you, I do not reassert my authority through killing. I am not one to hold a grudge, either. So I will allow you that one slight. But so long as you are here, you will treat me and your future colleagues with due respect. Understood?"

Although Victarion retained his scowl, he lightly nodded his head. Gregor then released him and stated wryly "Good. We just may get along, Iron Captain."

Gregor and his companions then led Victarion and his crew back to the moat. On their way there, Gregor came up with a few possible hypotheses on why the Iron Captain had chosen to enlist in the Legion without Banners. He was fairly certain it was not out of conscience. He doubted any Ironborn had ever done anything out of conscience.

He may have been drawn by the incentives Gregor had included in the first advertisement he had used to promote the Legion. Among them were wealth, fame, glory, and universal adoration. Those were practically the Ironmen's calling in life.

When Gregor, Victarion, and their associates got to the Mountain's solar, he discovered the Iron Captain's true motive.

Despite how dim-witted he was, Victarion was not blind to how the world saw him and his people. He was very much aware that most Westerosi hated the Ironborn. He saw the Legion as a unique opportunity for him to begin repairing his people's reputation.

Of course, there was no telling how much damage the Ironborn had inflicted over the ages. Some would say they had caused too much suffering. But Gregor was willing to give them a chance. After all, if he was going to unify Westeros, he would need others who shared similar interests.

So on that day, Victarion Greyjoy, Dagmer Cleftjaw, Nute the Barber, Longwater Pyke, Burton Humble, Rymolf Stormdrunk, Wulfe One-Ear, Tom Tidewood, Ragnor Pyke, Steffar Stammerer, and the rest of the crew of the Iron Victory became official members of the Legion without Banners.

At long last, the Iron Islands were adequately represented in the Legion.

Shortly after Victarion and his men became Legionnaires, Gregor began concentrating on some of his long-term plans.

So far, the primary reason he had been able to improve Westeros was because he had an advantage no one else possessed: he knew the actual timeline of the world.

Of course, his meddling in the affairs of the realm complicated matters. Gregor was not blind to the repercussions of his actions. He was well-aware that every change he inflicted – even the smallest – would yield vastly different changes in the outcome of the future.

Luckily, Gregor had the means to compensate for those changes. Those means could be found in his mind.
Gregory Welch's job at the Central Intelligence Agency had heavily involved scenario analysis. In other words, he was tasked with determining all the possible ways a situation might end, as well as subsequently devising appropriate strategies to counter or follow up on each outcome.

He was very proficient in that line of work. He could look at any dilemma – any dilemma – and envision all its possible endings in his head. If any unforeseen hindrances cropped up along the way, he could easily account for them as well and compensate for them.

Thanks to Gregor's interference thus far, Westeros was already turning into a better place. For the present, it was more or less at peace. But that peace would not be permanent. Sooner or later, some individuals who would shatter it for their own personal gain.

One of Gregor's top priorities was to deal with those individuals accordingly.

Like Arya Stark, the Mountain had compiled his own hit list (or shit list, considering the people on it). Several times a day, he thought the following:

Petyr Baelish... Roose Bolton... Euron Greyjoy... Walder (and almost any other) Frey... Tywin Lannister... Janos Slynt... Ramsey Snow... Ludd Whitehill...

He could handle Euron during the Ironborn Rebellion. He had planned on that, even before Victarion joined the Legion. Now that Victarion was on his side, his goal to kill the Crow's-Eye would be all the easier.

Ramsey, he could put down before he was even grown. That would be the only time in his life when he would have no qualms about killing a child. Once Ramsey was dead and Domeric Bolton's survival was guaranteed, Roose Bolton might remain loyal to the Starks. If not, his death would be easy enough to stage as an accident. If Domeric proved more loyal than his douchebag father, Gregor might not even have to contend with Ludd Whitehill.

Littlefinger and Janos Slynt could be eliminated quietly and discreetly. Slynt would have to be taken out in case Gregor ever needed to seize King's Landing. But overall, he was the least of Gregor's worries.

Baelish, however, was a class-A risk. Littlefinger had yet to gain any influence in King Robert's court. In the long run, he was primarily responsible for the downfall of the Starks. Gregor was determined to make him suffer for that.

He would have to be careful about Walder Frey; that ancient weasel had a habit of outliving far more honorable men. Plus, staging his death without drawing attention would be complex. Then again, he had more of a personal hatred towards the Late Lord Frey. He would not allow his personal feelings to cloud his judgment, but if at all possible, he was going to ensure that Walder Frey did not live to see the Long Night.

The only true problem was posed by Tywin Lannister. He was King Robert's goodfather and the liege lord of the Westerlands. There was also a strong possibility that the Targaryens would be endeavoring to return to power sometime in the future. As long as his daughter was Queen, Lord Tywin would never consent to that.

Regardless of who needed to be eliminated, Gregor knew that time was a luxury he could not afford. As such, he figured that he may as well begin narrowing down his list while he was still ahead in the game.

Gregor realized he could never share the full extent of his knowledge of Westeros with anyone.
Even so, he knew he could never accomplish his objectives without aid. He would undoubtedly need some assistance.

Consequently, Gregor formed his own inner circle. It was composed of nine Legionnaires; one from each of the nine regions of Westeros.

Specifically, they were Dacey Mormont of the Northmen, Brynden Tully of the Riverlords, Victarion Greyjoy of the Ironborn, Osmund Kettleback of the Crownlords, Lyn Corbray of the Valemen, Allard Seaworth of the Stormlords, Gerion Lannister of the Westerlords, Garth Hightower of the Reachmen, and Oberyn Martell of the Dornishmen.

Other than Ser Brynden, none of those people were more than ten years Gregor's elder. They had all been in the Legion for various amounts of time, but Gregor had come to trust all of them. All of them brought something special to the table. They all had principles, but they were willing to go to great length to preserve the people they loved and the values they believed in.

In the tenth month of the 286th year after Aegon's Conquest, Gregor summoned all nine of those people to the council chambers. He arrived about fifteen minutes after the rest of them. All of them were already seated around the large circular table.

After taking up the main seat at the head of the table, Gregor gazed around at the others. Then he asked them "Did you tell anyone you were coming here?"

"No, my lord," the nine of them chorused in unison.

"Good," Gregor muttered in approval, "After we leave this room, you will not address anything that was discussed here with anyone else. Not even each other. These meetings will be kept strictly confidential."

"There will be other meetings, Lord Gregor?" Dacey Mormont assumed.

"Yes, Dacey," the Mountain affirmed, "This is just the first of many."

"Well, why all the secrecy, my lord?" Allard Seaworth enquired.

"You're about to find out, Allard," Gregor said ambiguously.

Gregor sat up straight in his chair and professed "As you all know well, the primary function of the Legion without Banners is to uphold the peace and security of Westeros. We do this in a variety of manners. Our most prominent method involves rounding up all the country's criminals and subjecting them to the King's justice. That is a fairly straightforward operation. A crime is a crime. However… suppose we encounter someone who has not committed a crime, but will in the future?"

"The answer to that is simple, my lord," Garth Hightower debated, "Conspiracy to commit a crime is almost always just as grave as committing the crime itself."

"I'm not talking about conspiracy, Garth," Gregor disclosed, "I'm talking about people who have the capacity to do horrible things. These people may seem harmless or passive at a glance. But underneath their façade, they are striving to make their own lives better. If given the opportunity, they would do just about anything to fulfill their ambitions. Even if their prosperity comes at the misery of others."

"There are several people I know who meet that description," Brynden Tully commented slyly.
"I fancy I know some of them as well, Ser Brynden," Gregor told the Blackfish frankly.

"Does this conversation have a point, Lord Gregor?" Victarion Greyjoy mumbled impatiently. His mood had not improved much since he joined the Legion but at least he did not talk down to the Mountain anymore.

"Nothing I do is pointless, Victarion," Gregor asserted. "That includes this. So I will make my point now. In my time as Master of Order, I have investigated the entirety of the realm. In my searches, I have discovered that there are more than a few people who – when presented with the chance – would go so far as to see the whole realm suffer for their own gain."

"That sounds like mere speculation," Lyn Corbray noted.

"At times, speculation is all we have to guide us," Gregor contended. He looked around at his colleagues again and professed "I have never harmed an innocent in my life. The people I speak of are by no means innocent. They are amoral, unscrupulous, selfish, and borderline inhumane. Some of them may not have done any wrong in their life before, but they would have no qualms about doing so in the future."

"Do these individuals have names, or are they purely theoretical?" Gerion Lannister asked rhetorically.

"Oh, they're real," Gregor declared, "I have assembled a short list of them."

"Who are these supposed individuals?" Osmund Kettleback inquired.

"To preserve the integrity of this procedure, I will not divulge all of them at the same time," Gregor disclosed, "Instead, I will share with you one name at each meeting. The name will be given at the very beginning of the meeting. After that, the remainder of the meeting will be devoted to discussing what should be done with that particular individual."

"And by 'what should be done,' you mean...?" Oberyn Martell began.

Gregor Clegane announced in a solemn tone "We will exterminate them. One at a time."

The others were alarmed at how serene and stoic Gregor sounded when he made that statement. Had he been a lesser man, most of them would have walked out on the meeting right then. But they had been following Gregor long enough to know that he was a just and honorable man. He was a man they could all respect and follow through any trials or tribulations.

It did not take long for Gregor to ascertain that he had the full support of the nine people before him.

Once he did, Dacey Mormont inquired in interest "Who will be the first target?"

The eight other men leaned forward and waited eagerly for a reply. After ten seconds of absolute quietness, Gregor gave them one. He said firmly "Petyr Baelish."
"Who?" Osmund Kettleback asked in confusion. He was not the only one who seemed unfamiliar with that name. Victarion Greyjoy, Garth Hightower, and Allard Seaworth appeared just as perplexed.

"He's the Lord of the Fingers," Lyn Corbray revealed, "A very minor lord, at that,"

"That's why he's called 'Littlefinger,'" Dacey Mormont added in.

Oberyn Martell smirked deviously and commented "Oh, I thought it was because-

"Yes, thank you, Oberyn," Gregor Clegane hastily interrupted the Red Viper.

"Petyr can't be older than eighteen, my lord," Brynden Tully pointed out, "What possible reason would you have for wanting him dead?"

"I have several reasons, Ser Brynden," Gregor claimed, "Before I present them, I wish to make one thing clear. I am not forcing you to assassinate anyone. I will authorize this operation – and any future ones we plan – if an only if all nine of you consent to it. After I give my reasons for going after Lord Baelish, you will decide for yourselves whether or not they are sufficient to warrant his death. If you all agree, we go through with my plan. Otherwise, the plan dies here and now."

The other nine people looked back and forth between each other, as if they were wordlessly conversing. Ultimately, they all turned back to Gregor and nodded their agreement to his proposal.

Gregor then gazed over at the oldest person at the table and stated "Ironic how you of all the people present would ask for a reason first, Ser Brynden. After what Baelish did to your family…"

Raising an eyebrow, the Blackfish muttered "What are you talking about, my lord?"

Gregor elucidated with "Are you aware that not long before the Rebellion, your niece Lysa fell with child? Or that your brother Lord Hoster forced her to drink moon tea as a result?"

Brynden cocked his head and inquired skeptically "How do you know that?"

"I'll get to that soon," Gregor stated, "Tell me; who do you suppose fathered that bastard?"

The implication was enough to tip the Blackfish off. He mumbled "I knew Lysa and Petyr were close… but I never would have thought he'd dishonor her so. Apart from that, he seemed fonder of Catelyn. He fought a duel for her hand, after all."

"And lost," Gregor conceded, "But that does not keep him from fantasizing that he won. I've heard Littlefinger has often claimed to have taken the maidenheads of both of your nieces."

At that, Brynden jumped to his feet and snapped "That is outrageous."

"I know it's a lie, Ser," Gregor disclosed, "Baelish bedded Lysa twice, but he was drunk the second time and merely assumed she was Catelyn."

Ser Brynden was no longer the only one who was astonished by the scope of Gregor's insight.

"Where did you receive this information, my lord?" Garth Hightower queried.
"From the mouth of Lady Lysa herself," Gregor claimed. He sat up in his chair and elaborated with "Ever since I was appointed as Robert Baratheon's Master of Order, I have remained in contact with him and the rest of the Small Council. Particularly the Master of Whisperers. Lord Varys keeps me up to date on the affairs of the King's court. As well as what is said and done on the sidelines. That includes things that are not meant to be made public. Apparently, the Hand's wife recently confided in her maids that Petyr Baelish bedded her twice. Furthermore, she continues to keep correspondence with him behind Lord Jon's back."

Brynden scowled, sat back down roughly, and mumbled "That's enough to sway me. I say the worm dies."

"As am I," Osmund Kettleback pronounced, "Baelish insults the King and his Hand just by continuing to draw breath."

Gregor was pleased. He had already convinced two of his companions to go along with his plan. The other seven would evidently need more and better reasons before they conceded, though. Luckily, he had prepared some. But he had to be mindful of his presentation from his point onward. While the first reason had been entirely true, every subsequent reason had been embellished or fabricated in some way.

Gregor declared "By 'correspondence,' I do not mean Lady Lysa and Lord Peytr are simply exchanging letters with each other. According to the Spider, she is infatuated with him. So much so that when given the opportunity, Varys believes she would willingly have adulterous relations with him."

Brynden sighed and murmured "Lysa always did have the weakest restraint of all my brother's children."

Gregor nodded in acknowledgment and continued with "There is no doubt Lady Arryn still loves Baelish. He, however, does not reciprocate her feelings. But he is aware of them. Because of that, he's able to manipulate her to his will."

"Manipulate her how?" Lyn Corbray enquired.

"After the Rebellion, Lady Lysa persuaded Lord Jon to make Littlefinger the head of customs at Gulltown," Gregor Clegane revealed, "It was Lord Baelish's influence that made her do that. But that's only the beginning of his ambitions. The Spider discovered some very interesting things about him. Eventually, he intends to use Lysa to become the Master of Coin on the Small Council. Once he's secured his position in King's Landing, it's very well possible he will go so far as to con Lady Lysa into poisoning her husband."

"The lady adores him; yet he treats her like scum," Oberyn uttered angrily, "Any man who exploits women like that deserves to be put down."

"Do you honestly believe Petyr will try to kill Lord Jon?" Lyn Corbray queried.

"Lord Varys believes there's a very strong possibility," Gregor contended.

"Then I call for his head, too," Lyn pronounced, "Petyr and I were friends once, but my first duty is to my liege lord."

"I'm in, as well," Allard Seaworth said firmly, "My father serves Lord Stannis Baratheon. If there's one thing I've learned from them both, it's that anyone who routinely lies and cheats to make a living is a scoundrel. Baelish must atone for his crimes."
"Let's imagine for a minute that Baelish actually did orchestrate the Hand's murder," Garth Hightower conjectured, "Would that be the end of his aspirations?"

"No, he'd still be closer to the beginning of them than the end," Gregor proclaimed, "Lord Varys and I arrived at the same conclusion about Baelish. We both believe he will not be satisfied until he has everything he could ever want. And there is little he does not want. If he had the chance, he would seize the Iron Throne for himself. He would even kill Lord Eddard Stark just so he could take Lady Catelyn as his bride."

"Normally, I would commend a man for being ambitious," Victarion Greyjoy commented, "But Baelish goes too far. Even the Ironborn do not reach beyond what is realistically in their grasp. He is a danger to us all, and he must be stopped."

"If he dares to endanger my liege lord's life and lust after his wife, then Littlefinger's life is as good as forfeit," Dacey sternly declared.

"My niece's husband sits the Iron Throne," Gerion remarked, "So far, they've ruled this country far better than the Mad King ever did. I'll kill anyone who threatens their reign."

The vote was nearly unanimous. Only one person had yet to give a verdict.

Gregor turned to that person and muttered "That leaves you, Garth. How we proceed is up to you now. Give me your approval, and we will eliminate Baelish. Otherwise, this plot dies right now."

The Reachman sat thinking in silence for a while. He did not like being put on the spot, but that was his own fault for speaking last. He avoided looking around the room, as all eyes were on him.

Ultimately, he let out a deep sigh and professed "Other than the words of a spider, we've no concrete evidence that Baelish actually will make a grab for power. Still, no good can come of a man like Baelish. So even if this is all a theory, Westeros would be better off without him."

Gregor Clegane grinned and gave a light nod. He announced "Then we're all in agreement. Petyr Baelish must die."

The Mountain spent the remainder of the meeting telling the others of his plan to deal with Littlefinger. They were there for nearly an hour, as he needed to be absolutely thorough and comprehensible.

When that meeting ended, he dispatched a raven to King's Landing. The letter was addressed to Varys.

Gregor knew better than to rely on the Spider too heavily, but in matters that concerned the safety of the realm, he knew he could trust Varys to assist him. They both knew what Littlefinger could be capable of, and they agreed that the realm would burn if he was left unchecked.

Aside from that, the Spider was already implicated in this scheme of Gregor's. As such, Gregor saw no reason not to involve Varys in a more direct fashion.

In the letter was a comprehensive outline of Gregor's plan to assassinate Littlefinger. In case anyone saw the letter before Varys disposed of it, Gregor composed the outline in the form of a passage of riddles.

The letter contained both a description of the plan to kill Petyr Baelish and a set of instructions for how Varys could play his part in the affair. All the Spider really had to do was whisper something into the King’s ear.

On that he came through. Soon after Gregor wrote to Varys, Moat Cailin received a raven from King's Landing. The letter was pressed with the seal of the Royal House of Baratheon.

Gregor promptly opened the letter and read it. It was a royal order from King Robert.

Apparently, Robert had noticed that House Whent was in danger of facing extinction. Because of that, he would need someone else to assume the lordship of Harrenhal, in the event that the last of the Whents died out. Among the list of prospects, he was considering Petyr Baelish for the title.

That idea was not Robert's originally. It had been given to him by Lord Jon Arryn, who had received it from his wife Lady Lysa, who had heard it from Lord Varys. Varys himself had been told of the idea by Gregor.

When Gregor read Robert's order, he was essentially being told the premise of his own plan.

The details of how Robert expected him to carry out the order had been Gregor's, as well. As he reviewed them, he felt as though someone was commanding him to execute one of his own brainstorm.

Since Harrenhal was in the Riverlands, Lord Hoster Tully had to give his approval before any new lands were granted to someone from outside his domain. Due to the strained relationship between Lord Hoster and Lord Petyr, the matter of succession would require some mediation from an impartial third party. Having already gained a splendid reputation for its diplomacy, the Legion without Banners would act as that third party.

The Legion would also be responsible for ensuring that Baelish arrived at Riverrun safely. They would be with Littlefinger for every step of his journey. Gregor was to assign two platoons of Legionnaires to serve as Baelish's chaperone.

One platoon would travel to the Vale by land; the other by sea. The one that went by sea would pick him up at Gulltown, where he was serving as Lord Gerold Grafton's customs officer. Those units would escort him all the way to the Bloody Gate.

At the same time, the platoon that went by land would enter the Vale from the west on horseback. They would clear away any mountain clansmen that were camped near the path. Once the clansmen were successfully repelled, they would ride for the Bloody Gate. There they would rendezvous with Baelish and the first platoon. Altogether, they would head back through the mountains and make straight for Riverrun.

Naturally, the Legion would fail in their task of protecting Baelish, but Gregor was not concerned about backlash. It would not be the first time the Legion was unable to pull through. Plus, Gregor was already in the process of composing half a dozen different explanations for their failure. Whichever one he presented to Robert would depend on how the scenario played out.

A few days after receiving that raven from Robert, Gregor put his assassination plot into motion.

Victarion and his crew set sail from Moat Cailin on the Iron Victory. Allard, Garth, Osmund, and a handful of Legionnaires were also on board. They plotted a course directly for Gulltown. After they arrived, they would stay there for a single night. Then they would escort Baelish to the Bloody Gate as early as the following morning.

Based on Robert's letter, Lord Grafton and Littlefinger had already been informed of the latter's possible lordship of Harrenhal. So he would be ready to leave Gulltown whenever the first platoon of Legionnaires was ready.

As the Iron Victory navigated its way down the Cut, Gregor and his men-at-arms made their way down the Causeway. Dacey, Oberyn, Lyn, Brynden, and Gerion rode with them. They brought along the usual amount of provisions, weapons, and armor for a company that size.

However, Gregor had brought along an extra cart of steel-based weapons and armor. That intrigued some of his men, as most of them carried far superior chainmail and armaments. All the same, that cart was pivotal to Gregor's plan. Only his nine trustees knew that its contents would not be coming back. To some, that may have seemed a waste. But with all the revenue the Legion had earned lately, they could easily spare a cart of steel weapons and armors.

The march down the Neck was relatively quick and straightforward. Gregor and his company followed the Kingsroad south until they reached the crossroads with Masha Heddle's inn. They stayed there for the night, and then they continued their journey on the eastern road.

As soon as they passed into the Vale, Gregor had everyone in his party on full alert. It would not do for them to be caught by mountain clansmen unawares. But that was not to say he intended to avoid the mountain clans altogether.

In his youth, Gregor had done plenty of research on each of the nine regions of Westeros. For the Vale, one of the books he read was Archmaester Arnel's Mountain and Vale. The tome had included a thorough account of what Arnel regarded as the most notorious mountain clans in the region.

Alphabetically, he regarded the ten most infamous clans as the Black Ears, the Burned Men, the Howlers, the Milk Snakes, the Moon Brothers, the Painted Dogs, the Redsmiths, the Sons of the Mist, the Sons of the Tree, and the Stone Crows.

Of those ten, only four had been notably represented by the clansmen whom had entered Tyrion's services. Those were the Burned Men, the Stone Crows, the Moon Brothers, and the Black Ears.

Part of Gregor's plan involved making contact with one of those clans. After weighing the pros and cons of them all, he decided that the Black Ears were too extreme, the Moon Brothers were too few in number, and the Burned Men were too unpopular with the other clans.

The Stone Crows presented the best option. They were somewhat reasonable, their members were many, and they had the respect of most of the other mountain clans. Plus, they possessed the most named members out of all the mountain clans of the Vale.

According to Archmaester Arnel, the Stoned Crows' largest settlement was located fairly close to the road that led to the Bloody Gate. It could be found two miles north of the pathway and five miles east of the border to the Riverlands.

When they were three miles into the Vale, Gregor ordered his company to halt. Then he had them take inventory of their provisions, weapons, and armor. After that, he had everyone take what they would need for a short hike through the region. Everything else was hidden directly south of the road.

The spare cart of steel weapons and armor was kept separate from the other carts. Gregor and his units brought it with them on their hike. When they were about a mile north of the road, they hid the cart in a quarry. Like the other carts, no guards were posted around that cart; guards would only draw attention. It may have seemed risky and foolish to leave their baggage unattended, but Gregor was confident that their belongings would not be stolen whilst they were away.

As the only Valeman in the company, Lyn Corbray knew the landscape better than anyone else there. He rode at the head of the group as they made their way through the mountains.

After another three-quarters of a mile, he gestured for everyone to stop. He announced that he spotted some movement a few hundred feet up ahead.

He soon verified that the source of the commotion was a small group of mountain clansman. Given their location and garbs, they could only be Storm Crows. They were coming down the mountain, right towards the Legionnaires.

Gregor had already discussed with his party what they would do once they were noticed by the Storm Crows. He and a couple others would face the clansmen alone. Everyone else would hide, and they would come out when Gregor gave the signal. His hope was that it would be an effective display of force to get the Storm Crows to cooperate.

Right there, Gregor ordered the majority of his companions to vanish. They – along with their horses – rushed to find hiding spots in the immediate area.

Before long, everyone except Gregor, Dacey, and Polliver was out of sight. The three of them remained mounted, and they patiently yet anxiously waited for the Storm Crows to reach them.

Not five minutes later, twenty men entered the vicinity. They were armed with a variety of makeshift weapons, and they wore mismatched suits of mail. All of them were unshaven, unbathed, and appeared profusely inhospitable.

Gregor knew it was too late to have second thoughts about this part of his plan. He banished his fear to the back of his mind, and he stoically called out "Who approaches us?"

"Dolf, son of Holger," the man at the head of the group said brusquely, "Who trespasses on Storm Crow lands?"

"Gregor, son of Tarrence," the massive knight declared.

"Along with Dacey, daughter of Maege," his female colleague added in.

"And Polliver, son of… someone," his top man-at-arms finished. Sadly for him, Polliver's father had died when he was very young. He barely remembered anything about him, including his name.

Gregor and Dacey would have laughed, but they did not, as they were mindful of Polliver's feelings, and laughing seemed inappropriate at the time. The clansman laughed plenty, though.

"A giant, a woman, and one whose father was nameless," another Storm Crow perceived.

"We get lot of use out of you," a third Storm Crow muttered. Based on how he and his clanmates were eyeing Gregor, Dacey, and Polliver in bloodlust, longing, and curiosity respectively, he did not intend for each of them to serve the same form of "use."

"How quaint," Gregor drily commented, "We came here to get some use out of you."

That produced a wave of bafflement amongst all of the Storm Crows. Dolf queried "What meaning have you, giant?"

Gregor urged his horse forward a couple paces, and he said "You are native to this part of the Vale.
The mountains are your domain, no?"

Dolf nodded and claimed "All mountains fall to us."

"Not all the mountains," Gregor cheekily countered. He pointed to himself and uttered "I have not bowed to you."

At that, the Storm Crows burst out laughing once more. As he chortled loudly, Dolf spat "You are mad. No mountain Dolf sees."

"I must disagree with Dolf," Gregor bluntly stated, "I am known far and wide as 'The Mountain That Rides.'"

The clansmen guffawed when they heard that. Gregor found himself in an interesting fix. A moment ago, his biggest, most immediate worry was surviving this encounter with the Storm Crows. Now, it was being taken seriously by them.

"There are no mountains that ride," a fourth Storm Crow debated.

"There is one now," Dacey Mormont heatedly refuted, "This mountain could ride all of you over."

The clansmen swiftly shifted their attention to the tall girl from Bear Island.

"Come down from that horse," a fifth Storm Crow suggested derisively, "Coratt son of Curtt will ride you all over."

Gregor grimaced and barked "Watch your tongue. Or you may find it parted from you."

Noting Gregor's reaction, Dolf commented "This man-mountain likes his mate overmuch, methinks,"

At first, Gregor was bewildered by that statement. "Excuse me?"

Then he realized what was meant by it. He vigorously shook his head and murmured hastily "No, no, no. NO. She is NOT my mate. I mean, my wife. She's not either. She and I are unrelated."

Dacey and Polliver seemed amused by how Gregor was fumbling for words. The Storm Crows gave less heed to his stammering.

A few seconds later, Gregor composed himself and shouted "Enough! We are not here to discuss who's fucking whom!"

That outburst was enough to get everyone back on track. Dolf leaned on his longaxe and inquired "Then why are you here, man-mountain?"

Gregor had taken a couple knives from the cart of steel. He got them out of his saddlebag and tossed them at Dolf's feet. Two of Dolf's men stepped forward to pick the blades up and examine them.

As they did that, Gregor announced "That's reinforced steel. Capable of cutting through bone as easily as lard. Those two knives by themselves are deadlier than all of the cheap iron all of you currently possess. They're yours now."

Dolf seemed intrigued, but Coratt, not so much. He made an observation that strangely mirrored the one his son Conn presented to Tyrion Lannister and Bronn. He murmured "They became ours the moment you stepped onto mountain. Everything we see on you is ours. Those are our horses. Those are our swords. That is our armor. She is our woman."

"Only in your most depraved fantasies, clansman," Dacey sharply retorted.

Gregor drew his own dagger and muttered threateningly "First man who touches her, I'll cut off his manhood and feed it to the goats."

Based on the books, that was one of the Storm Crows' favorite pastimes. Or maybe they were just overly fond of using that phrase. In any case, they appeared to be impressed with Gregor's candor. Especially since he had made that threat before they could.

"Ser… we don't have any goats," Polliver whispered to him.

"I can find one," Gregor said humorously. He then turned back to the Storm Crows and told them "Somewhere on this mountain, there is a whole cartload of steel weapons and armor. You work with us, and it's yours. You attack us, and you get nothing."

"We know all of mountain," Dolf contended, "We would find steel on our own if search long enough. No need you tell us where."

Gregor had expected something like that. But he was undeterred. He shrugged a bit and uttered "Let me explain what I mean by 'nothing'."

He gave a sharp whistle that echoed all over the area. Immediately, Oberyn, Brynden, Gerion, Lyn, Rafford, Dunsen, Eggon, and the rest of Gregor's men-at-arms emerged from their hiding places. At least half of them were armed with longbows or crossbows. All such individuals had their weapons pointed directly at Dolf, Coratt, and the other Storm Crows.

Now Gregor and the mountain clansmen had switched places. Rather than launching an ambush, they had walked into one.

Many of the Storm Crows were itching to attack, but Dolf and Coratt managed to hold them back.

Gregor sternly warned them "One word from me, and they will fill you full of holes."

Finally, the clansmen were taking him seriously. Dolf glared at the massive knight and mumbled "What you want now, man-mountain?"

"Just one simple request, really," Gregor disclosed, "We need you to stage a raid."

"Stage?" Coratt enquired, seeming unfamiliar with that term.

Gregor briefly illuminated on what he meant. He wanted them to be part of what was basically a mummer's farce.

"There is nothing to be gained in this false raid," Dolf pointed out.

"Perhaps not," Gregor contented, "But there is a reward to be earned from it. You work with us, and that entire cart of steel is yours. Refuse, and we'll merely part ways. Engage us in combat, and you all die."

Dolf needed only a few seconds to respond. He stood up straight and pronounced "Come with us, man-mountain. You shall speak with Gurn, son of Gorik, chief of Storm Crows."

Gregor nodded in acknowledgment. Then he gestured for his soldiers to stand down, and he affirmed "We will follow."

Another quarter-mile higher, they came to the main Storm Crow settlement. It was larger (and much better organized) than Gregor had envisioned it would be. There they met with Gurn.

There were a trio of young boys in the settlement who spent a lot of time around Gurn, Dolf, and Coratt. Those must have been younger versions of Gunthor, Shagga, and Conn respectively.

For a hardened clan chief, Gurn was surprisingly receptive of Gregor and his company. That was probably just because of the steel that had been offered. But at least Gregor had some assurance that the clansmen could actually be reasoned with.

Gurn agreed to assist Gregor. But he claimed that before he and his clansmen could fight (or pretend to fight) for the Mountain, he wished to see how the Legionaries were in combat. They needed to prove their ability in an actual battle.

Gurn had the perfect opportunity for them to do so.

Recently, the Storm Crows had been in the midst of a power struggle with the Milk Snakes. The conflict had started out as a simple territorial dispute, but it had practically elevated into a full-out blood feud.

Gurn made a proposition of his own to Gregor: if the Mountain and his men helped the Storm Crows push back the invading Milk Snakes, not only would they go through with the false raid, but they would also come to his aid again if ever he needed them in the future.

Gregor found this to be an acceptable arrangement. Lately, the Milk Snakes had been making a lot of trouble for the Valemen, anyway. By resolving this conflict, this would also be the chance to neutralize yet one more threat to the realm.

Gurn offered Gregor and the other Legionnaires shelter for the night. While they were still wary of the Storm Crows, they did not wish to jeopardize their new temporary alliance. Since they would risk insulting Gurn by turning down his generous offer, they decided to accept it.

The Legionnaires set up camp close to the Stone Crows settlement. That night, they shared meat and mead, as well as tales of their deeds and exploits. No one on either side ever forgot how different they were from the other side, but for a while, it actually seemed to them that they were one people united together. That was a good sign in Gregor's mind.

In the middle of the night, Gregor was sitting at the campfire by himself. Rafford, Tobbot, and Ser Brynden were on guard duty. Just about everyone else was asleep.

Or so Gregor thought. As he kept warm, he heard the sound of footsteps coming up behind him. With one hand clasped around the hilt of his dagger, he gazed over his shoulder.

To his relief, it was only Dacey Mormont. The Mountain eased down and moved over to make room for the Bear Girl.

"Thank you," Dacey said appreciatively, sitting down next to Gregor.

"Anytime," he assured her.

The two of them sat in quietness for a couple minutes as they warmed themselves by the fire. The only sound that could be heard was the crackling of the embers.
Finally, she looked to him and stated suddenly "Gregor, may I speak to you on a personal subject?"

He glimpsed at her and answered with "Of course, Dacey."

The girl from Bear Island sat up and stated "Earlier, when we first encountered Dolf's party, do you remember what they said about me?"

"Yes, I do," Gregor recounted, "I think I know what you're about to say. You're going to insist that you could have handled yourself, and that you didn't need me to speak on your behalf."

"No, that's not what I was going to say," Dacey frankly pronounced, "When Dolf referred to me as your mate, you were very quick to contradict him."

Gregor merely shrugged and admitted "I suppose that's true."

Dacey folded her arms and uttered "Why was that? Is there something wrong with me? Am I not good enough for you?"

Gregor was stunned by the abrupt change in Dacey's tone. He hastily told her "No, absolutely not. I…I just did not wish to have any misunderstandings between us and the Storm Crows."

Dacey then eased down a little, nodded her head, and said "I can believe that."

Gregor was relieved to see her less aggravated. He then commented "Though, I will admit, I would have been content with that misunderstanding."

"Because if the clansmen believed I was spoken for, they would not have harassed me as much?" Dacey presumed.

"Well, that, and any decent man should feel honored even to be mistaken as your husband," Gregor clarified.

Almost immediately, Gregor realized that he had probably said too much. The expression on Dacey's face seemed to confirm that.

She proclaimed "Gregor, you do know I was just teasing you, right? I didn't really think you were repulsed by the idea of me being your wife."

"You're right; I'm not," Gregor confirmed, becoming a bit more emboldened, "Even if everything you just said was a jape, nothing I've said is."

For a while following that revelation, Dacey was speechless. She needed some time to reflect on what Gregor just told her. Then she settled down and muttered in interest "Tell me, Gregor. If you had any say over what your future bride will be like, what are the ideal qualities she'd have?"

Gregor considering not answering that question. Not only had it come out of nowhere, but he also felt there were so many ways it could produce an unpleasant response from Dacey if he was too direct. But then he reminded himself that Dacey had tremendous respect for honesty. If he was truthful with her, his answer should theoretically be enough to appease her.

Gregor thought on his response for a minute. Then he thought aloud "Unlike most lords, I'd prefer someone who is capable of independent thought. I would like her to be comely, and hopefully she'd have a womanly figure. It would be nice if she can fight and defend herself, as well. It'd like her to be intelligent and wise. I want her to have an open mind. I would expect her to be loyal, but not submissive. I'd wish for her to rule beside me, not behind me. Most of all…"
Dacey leaned closer, and she said inquiringly "What? What do you think is the most important aspect in a woman?"

Gregor was sorely tempted not to reply there. But he was in no position to back out. So he slowly turned to Dacey, looked her in the eye, and disclosed "I'd want her to like me."

The beautiful girl from Bear Island was visibly astonished when she was informed of that. That was the type of reply she would have expected from a lovesick teenager, a wandering singer, or an overly-sentimental poet. But to hear it from the mouth of the strongest and largest man in the entirety of Westeros… she was at a loss for words.

"Is that really what matters most to you in marriage?" Dacey queried, wanting to be certain.

"Marriage is a binding of two people," Gregor contended, "What good is that binding if there is no love involved? In the long run, does anything else truly matter?"

"Those are fine points," Dacey professed, "Given how popular you've become lately, it's perfectly realistic for you to want a bride who has feelings for you. After everything you've done as Master of Order, there are a whole lot of women in this country that like you. Including me."

"I'd call that a step in the right direction," Gregor wryly stated.

After that, the two Legionnaires sat in silence for a while. They gave more of their focus to the campfire than to each other.

Finally, Gregor rose from his seat, stretched, and declared "I'm going to turn in."

"Alright," Dacey avowed, "Hope you sleep well."

"Thanks," Gregor told her, "You, too. Assuming you actually go to sleep, that is."

"Oh, I intend to sleep," Dacey insisted, "But before I do, I'd like to have some alone. I've got some thoughts I'd like to get in order."

"I bet you do," was Gregor's candid response.

Gregor then retreated to his tent, where he undressed down to his tunic and breeches. He kept his longsword nearby, just in case anything happened in the night.

As he gradually drifted away to into a somewhat uneasy slumber, Gregor reflected on the conversation he just had with his female colleague.

She's not the only one who has some thinking to do. This was the first time she and I really opened up to each other.

Maybe Sandor was right about the possibility that I will marry a Northwoman. If so… I suppose I needn't look any further. Because I honestly can't imagine a better option than Dacey. Even if I account for all the highborn girls that were just born or will be born soon.

Who knows? She could very well feel just the same about me. Maybe next time we sit around the campfire together, I can ask what her ideal husband would be like. If I'm anything like him, then I'm in luck. Even if by some chance I'm not, at least I'll know enough to form the groundwork of a meaningful and lasting relationship with Dacey.
Note: Some people have questioned the validity of how Gregor's nine companions were so readily willing to go along with his plans to exterminate the more deplorable characters in Westeros without hard evidence. Looking back on it, I realize that the whole matter was put together a little flimsily, and it was not as coherent as I had envisioned it to be. I've already revised my outline for that part of this fanfic. The previous chapters will remain as they are, but the future chapters should be much more believable.

By the way, I'm going to be busy for the following week. In addition to work and graduate school, this weekend, I'll be attending the Nightmare Nights convention in Dallas. So there probably won't be another update for at least a week. But things will be getting good, I assure you.

Gregor crept quietly up the hill, clutching his shield in his left hand. Oberyn Martell and Rafford the Sweetling moved stealthily alongside him. Both men were armed with spears, their signature weapon of choice.

They were being led to higher ground by Dolf and two of his men. Like his son Shagga, the son of Holger was a dual-wielder. He carried a battleaxe in either hand. Despite his barbaric appearance and mannerisms, he moved with the silence and subtlety of a professional assassin.

When they reached the top of the hill, the six men crouched down and peered cautiously over the edge.

Just as Gurn had forecasted, there was a Milk Snakes camp in the valley below. The camp was bustling with activity.

There had to be at least sixty Milk Snakes in this one camp. There were no women or children, from what Gregor could see. That was fortunate; he still tried to avoid incurring those types of casualties, even if they belonged to savage cultures.

The Milk Snakes certainly were savage. However uncivilized the Stone Crows seemed, the Milk Snakes were even less well-mannered. The Stone Crows at least had some form of communal unity that kept them together. Gregor witnessed a general lack of cooperation between the Milk Snakes.

Even so, they did appear to be rather formidable warriors. The average Milk Snake was a little larger and stronger than the average Storm Crow, and they appeared far less capable of being reasoned with.

It was very early in the morning. Most of the Milk Snakes were just waking up. Those that had were in the process of disassembling tents, sharpening swords, and saddling their mounts (what few there were, anyway). Strangely, none of them was making the time to break his fast.

"Looks like they're getting ready to move," Rafford observed.
"They seem in a hurry," Oberyn noted.

"Milk Snakes plan to attack Storm Crow camp," Dolf proclaimed.

"How can you be sure?" Gregor inquired.

"Because Dolf knows Milk Snakes," the clansman remarked.

"Good enough for me," Gregor muttered drily.

They remained kneeling for a few minutes. In that time, they constantly shifted their gaze between the dell and the hills around it. If they squinted close enough, they could see the heads of their comrades peeking over the tops of those hills. The Legionnaires and the Stone Crows had the Milk Snake camp surrounded on all sides.

"We should still have the element of surprise," Rafford contended.

"For now," Oberyn commented. He pointed out the eastern mountains. There was a faint haze of natural light forming in the distance. "The Sun's starting to rise over the horizon."

"We attack now or not at all," Dolf declared.

The five men turned to Gregor. Gurn had given the Mountain full command over this operation. The others were waiting for his signal to engage the enemy.

After a few seconds, Gregor lowered the visor on his helm, drew his longsword from its sheath, and told his companions "Make them bleed."

He then rose to his full height, held his sword high in the air, and let out a terrifying battle cry.

Immediately, Gregor and everyone in his company emerged from their cover and charged down into the dell. Most of them let out a battle cry of their own as they sprinted downwards. The Milk Snakes were still trying to pinpoint the source of Gregor's shout when the Legionnaires and the Stone Crows were upon them.

The area was filled with the sounds of steel against iron. More often than not, steel triumphed over iron.

Gregor caught a glimpse of Oberyn running his spear through an armored Milk Snake warrior. A few meters away, Brynden Tully was fending off three more Milk Snakes by himself.

Before long, any of the Milk Snakes that had been asleep no longer were. They grabbed for their weapons, emerged from their tents, and rushed into the fray. They were very quick to respond to this sudden threat.

One of the new arrivals spotted Gregor and ran towards him, swinging a cleaver. Gregor quickly lifted his weapon to intercept the blow. He parried with the Milk Snake for ten seconds as he studied his opponent for an opening. Then he noticed a weak spot in the center of the Milk Snake’s breastplate. When the warrior took another swing at him, Gregor caught his weapon with his shield, pushed the blade aside, and shoved his sword into the center of the Milk Snake’s chest.

Gregor had already withdrawn his sword and moved on to his next opponent before the first one had even collapsed onto the ground.

He was quickly approached by a Milk Snake with a longaxe. Gregor was able to counter his blows easily. This Milk Snake's fighting style was too sloppy to be regarded as much of a challenge. When the warrior leaned back to strike Gregor from above, the Mountain rammed his shield into his face and slashed at his upper body with his sword. The Milk Snake's shoulder was practically severed from his neck. He sputtered noisily and fell onto his chest.

Not five seconds later, Gregor faced a third opponent. This one brandished a spear. Gregor had spent enough time training with Prince Oberyn to learn how to evade a charge with a spear. When this Milk Snake reached Gregor, he thrust his weapon at the massive knight. Gregor dodged the stab and hacked at the assailant's neck. Almost right away, blood started leaking from the slit in the Milk Snake's throat. He dropped his spear, grasped his throat with both hands, and dropped onto his back.

Gregor had killed three men in under a minute. None of them was the camp leader, though. As disorganized as the Milk Snakes were, so long as their chiefs lived, they had some order. Once the leaders fell, their subordinates would lose all discipline.

Gregor brought it upon himself to seek out the chief of this camp. All around him, people were fighting and dying. As he made his way through the camp, Gregor traded blows with two more Milk Snakes, and he cut down all of them swiftly.

However, he was so preoccupied with his search for the leader of the camp that he did not notice another of the Milk Snakes sneaking up behind him. This one wielded a greatsword. He was smaller, more agile, and faster than most of his fellow clansmen. He stealthily approached Gregor whilst his back was turned, and he raised his greatsword into the air. He was about to hack at the small visible bit of skin between Gregor's helm and shoulder plates.

Gregor managed to glimpse the assailant out of the corner of his eye, and he hastily maneuvered to meet the new foe. Right before the Milk Snake could deliver a blow, a crunching sound emanated from the immediate vicinity.

The mountain clansman was frozen in his attack stance with his greatsword in midair. Gregor positioned his shield in front of his torso defensively, but in this situation, his shield was unneeded. As it turned out, so was his sword.

A moment later, the clansman dropped to his knees, and then he fell flat on his face. Gregor realized an axe was imbedded in the Milk Snake's skull.

When he looked up, he saw the owner of that axe. It was Dacey. She was standing over the Milk Snake with her left arm outstretched. She held her sword in her right hand.

Gregor smiled at the tall girl and said appreciatively "Thanks."

"Don't mention it," Dacey asserted. She leaned down and yanked her axe free from the Milk Snake's head.

Gregor and Dacey cautiously made their way through the camp. Before long, they encountered the leader of the camp. He was a fearsome, gigantic man armed with two bastard swords. He also carried a dagger in his teeth, which he was just as deft with.

He had just killed two Stone Crows singlehandedly when Gregor and Dacey stumbled upon him. He shifted his focus to the Mountain and the girl from Bear Island. He snarled wickedly and rushed at them. Two of the chief's warriors rushed to reinforce before either Gregor or Dacey could engage him.
Dacey busied herself with the new underlings whilst Gregor took on the chief. The chief turned out to be a formidable adversary, but he was no match for the discipline and brute strength of The Mountain That Rides.

The fight was over almost before it began. Less than ten seconds into the duel, Gregor managed to disarm the Milk Snake leader long enough to jump behind him and slash at his neck. As a result, the back of his throat was sliced open. Another two inches and he would have decapitated him.

His head remained attached to his body. But it made no matter. The Milk Snake chief groaned in agony and sank to the ground.

After the Milk Snake leader fell, the battle was resolved very quickly. It was an overwhelming victory on the part of the Legion and the Stone Crows. Every one of the Milk Snakes had fallen in battle.

Of course, Gregor's forces had not been without losses. Three of his men-at-arms were lost in the skirmish. Gurn, Dolf, and Coratt all survived, luckily. But eight of the Stone Crows had perished, including Jaggot.

Still, a total of eleven casualties was not devastating, considering the seventy-plus enemies they had faced.

As the Tickler and some of the other men-at-arms tended to the wounded, everyone else checked to ensure that all of the Milk Snakes were indeed dead.

At one point, Gregor came across a Milk Snake with a particular helm. He recognized it quickly. It was the standard helm worn by a standard Northman soldier. Its structure indicated that it was the most modern version of the helm. It could not have been forged more than five years ago.

That struck Gregor's curiosity. He removed the helm from the dead Milk Snake and looked around for the sole female in his party. When he sighted her, he called out "Hey, Dacey."

The tall girl turned to the massive knight, walked over to him, and asked "Yes, Gregor?"

"Look what I found," he stated, showing her the helm.

Dacey took the headgear in both her hands and examined it closely. She raised an eyebrow and remarked "Interesting…"

"Tell me," Gregor bade her, "When was the last time a Northman was lost in the Vale?"

She rubbed her chin and thought aloud "Well, Lord Eddard was fostered by Lord Jon Arryn at the Eyrie. But he always travelled to the Vale by sea from White Harbor. As far as I know, no one from the North has used the road to the Bloody Gate in at least fifty years."

"Then how could this have gotten here?" Gregor wondered.

"I don't know," Dacey confessed, gazing down at the helm, "Let's see if we can find the set of armor this thing went with."

None of the fallen Milk Snakes wore any armor of Northern design. However, Gregor and Dacey managed to locate a tent that had been utilized by the Milk Snakes as their arsenal. They found a wide variety of armaments and protective garments in there. Among them were a breastplate, gauntlets, boots, a shirt of mail, and a doublet; all Northern in origin. The breastplate and shirt of mail were lightly stained with blood; the stain appeared to be over three years old.
Obviously, whoever wore this armor had been ambushed and killed by the Milk Snakes. The armor must have been subsequently stolen by them.

But if that happened approximately four years ago…

This couldn't be…?

Gregor tentatively picked up the doublet and searched through its pockets. The outer pockets were empty, but when he frisked the inner pockets, he heard what sounded like the rustling of paper.

Gregor reached into the deepest pocket, and he pulled out an old piece of paper. It appeared to be a letter. The seal had yet to be broken, but the wax was marked by the gray direwolf of House Stark.

So that's what became of the rider that was dispatched to the Vale.

Gregor made a note to bring this up to Oberyn later when the two of them were alone. He would also have to inform everyone else who had been at the Tower of Joy, including the woman who sent it.

Dacey was standing a meter directly behind Gregor, so she had yet to see the letter. She asked him "Did you find anything?"

Gregor hastily tucked Lyanna's unopened letter into his hauberk, and then he pronounced "No, the Milk Snakes must have taken everything of value."

At that, Dacey merely nodded in acknowledgment and said "We should get back to the others."

"Right," was all Gregor said in response.

Gregor and Dacey regrouped with the other Legionnaires and the Stone Crows. There they discussed the rest of Gregor's plan. Gregor went over it three times, just to ensure that there was no confusion.

Dolf and his warriors remained at the camp. After disposing of the corpses, they dressed themselves in the trademark attire of the Milk Snakes, and they passed themselves off as the original inhabitants. Essentially, the Stone Crows were supposed to fool anyone who came by – especially other mountain clansmen – into thinking that they were the Milk Snakes.

At the same time, Gregor and his men continued on to the Bloody Gate. It took less than a day to get there.

Before he joined the Legion without Banners, Brynden Tully had served as Knight of the Gate for a time. When he left, he was replaced by Ser Gilwood Hunter.

Ser Gilwood still held that position, and he manned the Gate diligently.

Victarion's platoon was already there. They had been there for a couple days, and they had impatiently waited for Gregor's platoon to arrive.

When they finally rendezvoused, Victarion and his crewmates vocally expressed their dissatisfaction about having to traverse over land. Gregor had anticipated those complaints, but he simply disregarded them. In a united Westeros, the Ironborn would have to get accustomed to sometimes riding instead of boating.

On the plus side, Victarion had come through in his primary objective. He had efficaciously escorted Petyr Baelish all the way from Gulltown to the Bloody Gate.

That was the first – and only – time Gregor actually met Littlefinger. He was a shorter than the average man. He looked to Gregor the way Tyrion would look to an average-sized person. He had already grown his signature pointed beard. Other than that, he had a distinct lack of facial hair.

Unlike the Ironmen, Baelish had not complained about anything. However, he had a pair of very wary and mistrustful eyes. That alone spoke volumes of his persona. The eyes watched Gregor closely with obvious skepticism.

Gregor casually approached the younger man and told him in a tone of false courtesy "Greetings, Lord Petyr."

"Hello, Lord Gregor," Baelish uttered plainly, his arms folded.

"I hope we have not kept you waiting for too long," Gregor commented.

"You did not," Baelish claimed, "But I would like to take to the road as soon as possible."

"Just as soon as we're refreshed," Gregor asserted.

To Gregor's good fortune, no one outside of the Legion had accompanied Baelish to the Bloody Gate. He had been concerned that some of the soldiers sworn to House Baelish or a few of Lord Grafton's knights might have joined the company.

It could not have been an easy task to convince Littlefinger to forgo the protection of the people in his own employ or House Grafton's. Somehow, Allard, Garth, and Osmund had pulled through in that regard, just as they had assured Gregor they would. It had fueled Baelish's suspicions even further than before, though.

Gregor had allowed for Petyr's bodyguard, Ser Bertom Lynderly, to join them. He felt that one man would not make any negative difference. Plus, if Gregor's plan was to be executed correctly, it would need a detached witness.

After taking a couple hours to eat and rest, Gregor gave the order to set off again. He, Baelish, and all the present Legionnaires stepped back through the Bloody Gate and headed back down the main road.

The ride back to the west was relatively calm. On their first pass, Gregor's platoon had taken the time to ensure that no other mountain clans were camped near the road. They had confirmed that no one other than the Stone Crows and the Milk Snakes (or "Milk Snakes") were within reach of the road. As such, Gregor knew his company would not face any delays. No unexpected ones, at any rate.

When they were halfway to the border of the Riverlands, Petyr brought his horse alongside Gregor's. He requested "A word, my lord?"

Gregor turned to the short man and asked rhetorically "How can I help, my lord?"

"There's one thing I find curious about this adventure," Baelish disclosed, "Why are we travelling the whole way to Riverrun by a land route? It would have taken just as much time – probably less – if Victarion Greyjoy picked me up at Gulltown and then delivered me to another maritime town. Couldn't his crew have sailed me to Saltpans or Maidenpool? In fact, the Iron Victory could have gone north towards the mouth of the Green Fork and followed the Trident all the way to Riverrun. So why was land travel even necessary?"
Given how observant and astute Baelish had been in the original universe, Gregor had already considered the likelihood that Petyr would question their method of travel. His theory was well-founded, seeing as how Petyr had become suspicious as to why they were trekking to Riverrun by horse alone.

Gregor did not have to conjure up an elaborate explanation. He simply told Littlefinger "The method of travel was per the King's orders. He was very specific about how we were supposed to carry out this mission. For whatever reason, he puts far more trust in horses than in ships."

Gregor suspected that successfully lying to Littlefinger would be a chore in itself, but Baelish seemed to swallow that one. He lightly shrugged and uttered "I'm honestly not surprised. The King's parents died at sea, after all. And he's well-renowned as a warrior. Other than the Ironborn, what warrior doesn't love horses?"

"Precisely, my lord," Gregor conceded, "Personally, I think we could have afforded to pick you up somewhere along the northeastern coast in the Crownlands. A port in the Riverlands would have been even better. But it is not my place to protest the King's commands. You needn't worry, though. I personally believe horses are far more reliable than ships."

"We can agree on that much, my lord," Bertom Lynderly proclaimed from behind Petyr Baelish.

"At least the sights on land are far more breathtaking," Oberyn Martell interjected, adding his own thoughts to the conversation.

"Very true," Brynden Tully concurred.

The dialogue more or less ceased there. A few miles further down the road, Gregor raised his hand in the air. Straightaway, everyone brought their horses to a halt.

"Something wrong, my lord?" Dunsen inquired. He had been practicing that line all day, but luckily, it did not sound as though it had been rehearsed.

"It's too quiet," Gregor claimed, gazing around the vicinity, "Yesterday, this area was teeming with the noises of wildlife. Now… I hear nothing. It's as though all the animals have suddenly vanished."

"They may have migrated," Allard Seaworth offered.

"Or… they were hunted," Garth Hightower nervously supposed.

Both men sounded quite believable. Their delivery was sufficient to get Petyr Baelish and Bertom Lynderly to become restless.

"But no one hunts in these mountains," Lyn Corbray debated. He paused for emphasis, and then he added in "Except…"

Gregor turned to his front and shouted "Swords!"

In the span of the next ten seconds, everyone in that company – excluding Baelish – drew a blade. Petyr did not have a dagger. Of course, he never had a dagger, contrary to what he told Catelyn in another universe.

Baelish did seem a little comforted when he was surrounded by armed soldiers. However, unbeknownst to him, all those brandished weapons would not guarantee his safety. As a matter of fact, they played a part in Littlefinger's downfall.
Gregor and the Stone Crows had decided to use this area to stage the false raid. The Mountain had instructed the clansmen to wait for a signal before they launched their attack. The sight and sound of the Legionnaires collectively unsheathing their weapons was that signal.

The moment after all that steel was exposed, the Stone Crows jumped from their hiding spots and charged down to the road.

Gregor quickly turned his gaze upward, feigning alarm. He shouted in mock surprise "Milk Snakes!"

Dolf and the other Stone Crows were still disguised as Milk Snakes, so that accusation was very credible. Gregor looked over his shoulder at Bertom Lynderly. The knight was staring in shock at the clansmen. Gregor had to resist the desire to smile. Whenever he was questioned later on, Ser Bertom would tell everyone it was the Milk Snakes that had ambushed Gregor's party.

In less than a minute, the "Milk Snakes" reached the Legionnaires. Gregor and his associates remained mounted while they parried the blows of the clansmen. They had to be quickly with their weapons, in order for their routine to appear realistic.

It certainly felt realistic to Gregor. It was just as exhilarating as a real battle, and it kept him ever vigilant and cautious.

Petyr Baelish made a desperate attempt to retreat from all the conflict. Bertom Lynderly tried to guide his charge away from all the scuffles.

But their efforts were wasted. Soon enough, Baelish and Ser Bertom were seized by the clansmen and pulled down from their horses.

The clansmen were rough with Ser Bertom, but all they really did was knock him unconscious. They managed that without inflicting any permanent damage on the knight.

Baelish was not as lucky. After he was flung onto the ground, he was surrounded by Coratt and several other Stone Crows. They each proceeded to stab him in every conceivable part of his body multiple times. Gregor heard an ear-piercing shriek as Baelish was knifed to death by the mountain clansmen.

When the shriek finally subsided, Gregor yelled over all the commotion "All clear!"

At that, the Legionnaires and the Stone Crows alike broke off their attacks. Apart from Ser Bertom, no one else was injured. The only additional casualty was Baelish.

Gregor had his horse trot over to the spot where Littlefinger had fallen. His remains had been mangled almost beyond recognition. But anyone who knew Baelish would not confuse his body for anyone else's.

The Mountain smiled at the clansmen and told them "Superbly done, my friends."

"Friends are we, man-mountain?" Dolf said sharply.

Gregor shrugged and commented "Partners in justice, instead, perhaps."

"I could get used to this form of justice," Osmund Kettleback stated wryly.

"We do our part, man-mountain," Coratt interjected, "We expect cart of steel now."
"You shall have it," Gregor assured him.

Gregor had Baelish's body loaded onto one of the supplies carts. He had Ser Bertom's unconscious form placed on another one. After that, the Stone Crows and the Legionnaires resumed heading westward.

They stayed together until they reached the spot where Gregor had hidden the cart of steel-based armor and weapons. After the cart was unloaded of all its contents, the Stone Crows were quick to take possession of them. After that, they gave their farewells and headed back to their settlement. Once again, the Legionnaires had the same numbers they had when they left the Bloody Gate. The only difference was that two of their company were in an alternate state of being.

The Legion managed to get through the Vale without any more incidents with the mountain clans. Even after they crossed over into the Riverlands, they did not look back until the mountains were far off in the distance. Even then, they did not stop.

Gregor did not allow the company to rest until they were well past the Twins. When they were nearly in sight of the Neck, they finally stopped to make camp.

Gregor planned to turn in early that night. It would be the most pleasant night's sleep he had gotten in a long while.

However, before he went to bed, he decided to talk to someone. For the past couple days, an issue of a far more personal nature had been occupying a large part of Gregor's mind. He had resolved to push it aside until the problem of Littlefinger was settled. Now that it was, he could focus on the personal affair.

In the late evening, shortly after supper, Gregor went to Dacey Mormont's tent. He lightly tapped on the front of it.

A moment later, Dacey responded with "Yes?"

"Are you decent?" Gregor queried.

" Depends on what you mean by 'decent,'" she cockily rejoined.

"Are you presentable?" he clarified with a scoff, "Specifically, presentable enough that you would face me?"

"Yeah, I suppose so," she declared, "Come on inside."

Gregor pulled open the flap and stepped into the tent.

As an officer of the Legion without Banners, Dacey had a respectably large tent. A table, a couple of chairs, and a small bed could fit in there, and it was so tall that even Gregor could stand in it without crouching. It was also big enough to accommodate two people. Not that its size would give Gregor any impure ideas.

But Dacey's current apparel might have done so.

The Bear Island girl had been in the process of undressing for bed. She was clad only in a loose pair of breeches and a corset. This corset was very different from the type women generally wore with dresses. It had been designed specifically for Dacey to enhance her form in combat situations.

The corset was tied securely around her chest, but it was also low-cut. It accentuated her full, round breasts very nicely, and it emphasized her womanly curves. Had it ended two inches lower, Dacey's nipples would have been on display.

"This is 'presentable?" Gregor uttered, trying not to snicker. Or to stare.

Dacey smirked and pointed out "You just said presentable enough that I'd be able to face you."

Gregor chuckled at that and mumbled humorously "Clearly, 'shame' is not in your vocabulary."

As it happened, all Gregor wore at that time was a leather doublet and a pair as trousers. So it was not as though he was clad in much more than Dacey. But at least he wore enough that he could go outside without turning any heads.

Dacey sat down at one of the chairs at the table. She gestured for Gregor to take the other chair. Once he did, he gazed off to the side, as though lost in contemplation.

He just sat and wondered how to open up the conversation. For once, he was not coming to Dacey to discuss strategies, battle plans, or training schedules. Instead, he would be conversing on a more intimate topic.

Flirting had never been one of Gregor's strong suits. He was well-acquainted with the opposite sex, but he was not very good at coming up with pickup lines.

Ultimately, Gregor decided to open the discussion by speaking of a totally unrelated topic. He clasped his hands together and stated candidly "So… that business with Littlefinger… it went well, did it not?"

"I'll say it did," Dacey conceded with a smile.

Gregor looked to her and murmured "Tell me truthfully; do you think we did right?"

"Do you?" she countered.

"Yes, I do," Gregor revealed, "But I care about your thoughts, as well."

Dacey gave a nod and proclaimed "Baelish dishonored a Great Lord's daughter, he manipulated her into boosting his status in the world, he would have continued to do so at the expense of those around them, and there is every possibility that the realm would have suffered because of his greed. We may have spared the realm a great amount of agony. So, yes. Killing Baelish was the right thing to do."

Gregor was pleased to know that she agreed with him. The opinions of his colleagues were very meaningful and important to him. He enquired in interest "Anything you would have done differently?"

Dacey answered him with "Well, the only way the outcome would have been better is if it produced no casualties on our part. I know our losses were minimal, but they were still incurred. You lost three of your men-at-arms."

Gregor frowned slightly and muttered "True, I'm afraid. None of them were among my top officers, but they were good men. They had something that made each of them unique. Umrich was always making people laugh, Abbert was a fantastic archer, and Mylo never hesitated to comfort a hurt friend."

"All desirable qualities," Dacey commented, "Too bad they had to fall in battle."
Gregor nodded his head. Right then, he spotted an opportunity to transition into a more sensual topic. He looked to Dacey and stated "On the subject of the battle… I didn't get a chance to properly show my appreciation to you for saving my life."

"You did say 'thanks,'" Dacey humorously recounted.

"Actually, I wanted to show my appreciation with more than words," Gregor informed her.

She rested against her arm and queried "How so?"

Gregor then leaned forward, gently took ahold of Dacey's shoulders, and kissed her softly on both cheeks.

The Bear Island girl was stunned by this display of affection, but she did not reject Gregor's advances.

"I wouldn't mind that form of appreciation from you, Gregor," Dacey told him with a smile, "But isn't that behavior usually reserved for married or betrothed couples?"

"That's another thing I wanted to talk to you about," he enlightened her. He sat back in his chair and said inquiringly "Are you… involved in any potential marriage contracts?"

Normally, people did not ask questions of such a personal nature, but Dacey had never been one to shy away from matters that were generally private.

She informed the Mountain "I'm not in any haste to get wed. Even so, my mother has suggested a few possible matches for me."

"Any that really stood out?" Gregor queried in interest.

Dacey thought about that, and then she recounted "First, she proposed Lord Rickard Karstark's eldest son, Harrion. The idea of being Lady of Karhold did sound appealing, but nothing was made definite. My mother also proposed Robett Glover, Robin Flint, and Wendel Manderly. For a while, she even considered Benjen Stark. Then he went off and joined the Night's Watch. Oh, well. A Stark is probably too high above in status for a Mormont, anyway."

"Bullshit," Gregor debated, "The Starks may be the great house of the North, but your house is just as honorable and praiseworthy. Saying you're not good enough for a Stark or anyone else is ludicrous."

"Well, thank you for saying that," Dacey told him gratefully.

Gregor smiled at her again. Then he enquired "Did your mother ever consider anyone from outside the North?"

"No," the bear girl disclosed, "Not yet, that is."

"What about you?" Gregor proposed, "Did the thought of marrying outside the North ever enter your mind?"

"For most of my life, no," Dacey claimed, "But recently, I got the idea to do so."

"When was this?" Gregor inquired.

"Shortly after I enlisted in the Legion," Dacey illuminated.
It was not difficult for Gregor to imagine what – or who – had planted that thought in Dacey’s mind. So far, they had spoken with some degree of subtlety. But neither Gregor nor Dacey was fooling themselves or each other.

Gregor let out a slow breath and remarked "The other night, I told you what I would view as the ideal characteristics for my future bride to have. Now, I'd like you to do the same. If you had any say over what your future groom will be like, what would he be like?"

Dacey took a minute to think about that. Then she professed "I'd want him to be strong and firm. But he wouldn't have to resort to violence or threats in order to get people to follow and respect him. Hopefully, he'd also be rational, sensible, and smart. I'd deem myself especially lucky if he allowed me to continue training and fighting alongside him and his soldiers. I wouldn't want him to be in any rush to have children, but I'd definitely want him to be open to having them, too. However, to me, the most important feature is… is…"

"Go on," Gregor beckoned her.

Dacey released a soft sigh and admitted "It's the same as yours. What matters to me most is not his status or his strength, but whether or not he likes me. I'd hate to get caught in a loveless marriage."

Then it appears we're at an advantage.

Gregor smirked and uttered slyly "It just so happens that I like you. Very much, in fact."

"I know you do," Dacey muttered drily, "And I like you. But, of course, I already told you that. Even so, I thought that'd be obvious. I mean, we're already on a first name basis, are we not, Gregor?"

"Yes, we are," the Mountain affirmed. There came a lengthy pause in the tent. Gregor spent most of it staring at the wall. Finally, he turned back to the tall girl and told her "Dacey, I'm going to ask you a very personal question. I want you to answer it with total honesty."

"Alright," Dacey conceded.

There was another short interval of quietness, and then Gregor turned to Dacey, looked her in the eye, and asked without blinking "Could you… see yourself with me?"

Dacey did not give a verbal response right away. She must have seen that question coming. Even so, she appeared surprised by it. After an uncomfortable silence, she gently placed her hands on top of Gregor's and gave him her answer: "Truthfully, I… I can, Gregor. In fact… I can see myself better with you than just about any other man in Westeros."

A wide smile extended across the Mountain's face. He took Dacey's hands in his own and revealed "I feel much the same about you, Dacey. Most lords may be content with having a wife that will be faithful and give them heirs. But what I'd like to have is a wife that's capable of joining her husband on the battlefield and fighting alongside him. I would also like one who is not afraid to speak her mind."

"I always speak my mind," Dacey pointed out.

"I know you do," Gregor contended. "From what I gather, I am very close to your ideal preference for a husband. Meanwhile, you are very close to my ideal preference for a wife. You could say that you and I seem perfect for each other. So much so that I say we should do something about it."

Dacey cocked her head and asked attentively "Are you asking me to wed you, Gregor?"
"You could say that," Gregor alleged, "But I only want you to accept my offer if you truly desire to."

It only took Dacey a few seconds to make a decision. She looked Gregor in the eye and told him "When we return to Moat Cailin, I'm going to write to my mother. I'll ask her to give us her blessing."

Gregor grinned at her and stated "I shall count the days until I meet her."

He then leaned forward, gently took ahold of the back of Dacey's head, and softly pressed his lips against hers. In response, she closed her eyes, placed her hands on Gregor's shoulders, and returned the kiss with the true passion of the Northwoman she was.
Familial Diplomacy

Aside from that one kiss, Gregor and Dacey did nothing unusual. Nothing an unmarried highborn couple living by Westerosi standards would have done, at any rate. Had this been his first life, Gregor might have suggested going a little further. But he did not wish to ruin the moment. So after he parted his lips from Dacey’s, he bade her a good night and returned to his own tent. He fell asleep that night with a wide grin across his face.

It took the two platoons of Legionnaires a little more than a week to reach Moat Cailin.

Some of Victarion’s crew had remained behind on the Iron Victory. After their Captain and most of his Ironborn had escorted Littlefinger out of Gulltown, the rest of them began the long voyage back to the moat. They had sailed up the Cut and into the harbor of Moat Cailin just two days before its lord and his entourage rode up the Causeway.

Once the Legion had fully reassembled, Gregor retreated to his solar and summoned both Dacey and Maester Kennick to it. He informed the maester that he would be sending out two letters. The first one would be dispatched to King’s Landing; the other to Bear Island.

Gregor dictated what he wanted to say; Maester Kennick copied his speech thusly. In the letter to Bear Island, Dacey assisted heavily with the dictation. Both Gregor and Dacey could read and write very well. They could have composed the letters all on their own, but ever since Gregor achieved his lordship, he had found it was easier to have someone else handle his messages for him.

The letter to King’s Landing was addressed to Robert Baratheon. In it, Gregor notified the king of the Legion’s "failure" to safely chaperon Petry Baelish through the wild regions of the Vale. He included a full report of how they had been ambushed by the Milk Snakes. He mentioned that three of his own men had died in that raid alongside Littlefinger, and he emphasized that Ser Bertom Lynderly had fought courageously. He also included his deepest regrets and apologies (none of which were very truthful) about having let the King down. Gregor was not concerned that Robert or anyone else would be very displeased with the Legion's performance. This was not the first time that had been unable to carry out a task, after all. Aside from that, Baelish was only being considered for lordship of Harrenhal. It would have been another story entirely if he had already been granted the title.

The letter to Bear Island was shorter, but far more important to Gregor and Dacey for a variety of reasons. He addressed it to Maeg Mormont. He knew that in a discussion, Mormonts – like most Northerners – preferred to not beat around the bush and instead get straight to the point. His association with Dacey was proof of that. So rather than opening the letter with an awkward introduction and a description of what had motivated him to write in the first place, Gregor opened it with the extension of an invitation for Lady Maege to travel to Moat Cailin and stay as his honored guest. He directly admitted that he planned to take her daughter's hand. Dacey made sure to mention that she was already willing to marry him, and she was very happy about the prospect; she just wanted her mother’s approval before they went ahead.

During the dictation of the latter letter, Gregor noticed a light smirk spread across Maester Kennick’s face when the Mountain first declared that he intended to marry Dacey. Gregor could easily imagine why. Ever since he first arrived at Moat Cailin, the members of his council had been urging him to seek out possible candidates for a bride. As one might expect, the maester had been the most emphatic and persistent. Now that his lord was in the process of arranging a marriage contract, it appeared as though his constant berating had finally pulled through.

After reading the letters over to ensure that they had been formatted exactly as he envisioned them, Gregor had them sent out to King's Landing and Bear Island. Then he eagerly (and somewhat impatiently) awaited a response to both.

The capital was the first to send a raven back. In his follow-up letter, the king expressed his disappointment over Littlefinger's untimely death. Luckily, Robert did not appear very cross or dissatisfied with the Legion's performance in the Vale. That implied that Gregor and his private army had not lost face with the crown. Since the supposed perpetrators of Baelish's murder (the Milk Snakes), had already been dealt with, Robert was not going to penalize any of the involved parties.

Ser Bertom Lynderly had already verified that the Milk Snakes were responsible for his master's death. His testimony as a non-member of the Legionnaire proved extremely useful in authenticating the story Gregor told to Robert.

Petyr Baelish was the last of his line, so his castle on the Fingers was left without a lord. Robert mentioned that his Hand was in the process remediying that issue. Lord Jon Arryn had already listed a number of ideal prospects for the new Lord of the Fingers. So far, the most promising contenders were Lord Yohn Royce's second son, Robar and Lady Anya Waynwood's second son, Donnel. Even Ser Lyn Corbray was being considered for the position.

There was no mention of Lord Jon's wife, but Gregor could imagine that she was devastated by the loss of her childhood "friend." Gregor was not heartless, but he was not feeling particularly sympathetic to Lysa Arryn's woes.

Gregor was hopeful that Lady Lysa would eventually get over Baelish's death. After all, he had only been manipulating her for a couple years, as compared to the couple decades in the original universe. There was a strong chance that she was not as damaged as she would have ultimately been. Perhaps she was even capable of being reasoned with.

If she did not recover from the shock of Petyr's murder, Gregor would not make it his trouble. Lysa's grief was strictly her problem. The mental and emotional well-being of Lord Hoster Tully's fanatical younger daughter was far from the top of Gregor's list of worries. As long as she did not poison her husband this time – and it was unlikely she would, given that there was no one around to persuade her now – Gregor would simply keep her out of his mind.

The letter from Robert arrived about ten days after Gregor dispatched a raven to King's Landing.

It took only four days for the raven sent to Bear Island to receive a response. This one was very brief; it only contained two sentences:

I ride for the moat. Expect me within half a moon's turn.

It was written in the hand of the maester at Bear Island, but it was not challenge for Gregor and Dacey to guess who had dictated that letter.

Gregor did not know precisely what to make of the message. All he knew for certain was that the mother of the woman he wished to marry was coming to Moat Cailin. Since there were no additional details (such as the nature of her visit), that could have been either good news or bad news. He found himself oddly perplexed.

As for Dacey, she was amused. It was just like her mother to be so forward, concise, and ambiguous in something as important as this. Since she did not seem worried, Gregor decided not to fret over Maege Mormont's impending arrival.

Gregor knew that by this point in time, Lord Jeor Mormont had already joined the Night's Watch. So Jorah was currently serving as the Lord of Bear Island. Normally, the duty of arranging marriage contracts for the other members of his family would have fallen primarily on Jorah's shoulders. But House Mormont had always been something of an oddball in the North; it was similar to Dorne in that men and women were equal in everything. Lady Maege had taken it upon herself to organize betrothals for all of her daughters. Which, naturally, included her firstborn. She had not involved her nephew in any of the negotiations.

Eight days later, a small group of riders was spotted approaching from the north. The on-duty watchman was able to identify them by their banners. They were House Mormont retainers. At the front of the short column was Lady Maege herself.

As soon as he was notified of their approach, Gregor gave the order for the northern gate to be opened. The doors were fully parted and the portcullis fully raised by the time the company from Bear Island reached the moat. They all swiftly galloped into the holdfast. Once they were all in, they were guided over to the stables. After dismounting, they gave the stableboys charge of their horses.

By the time the party from Bear Island finished unloading their possessions, Gregor Clegane, Dacey Mormont, and a few top-ranking Legionnaires had entered the vicinity. They proceeded to approach the stables together.

As they got closer to the new arrivals, Gregor urged himself to remain calm, cool, and collected. First impressions meant everything in Westeros, especially in the North. And especially when dealing with a woman who would most likely become his goodmother soon.

This would not be the first time Gregor ever met one of the parents of a woman he was courting. Be that as it may, it would be the first time in this life.

Gregory Welch had had five girlfriends, three of which were among the six women he had slept with (the other three were just flings). The two he had not slept with were the ones he had been involved with during high school. He had only met the parents of two of his ex-girlfriends. Fortunately, both pairs had taken a liking to him almost straightaway.

That was one of Gregor's best qualities; he had an innate ability to get on the good side of just about everyone he met. He had never had much trouble getting people to like him in his first life; Gregory Welch had been a very charismatic person.

Gregor Clegane was certainly charismatic by Westerosi standards. Through his deeds, he had gained the love and respect of many people from all nine of the major regions of the country. He was still far from being universally adored, but he was well on his way to that objective. Even so, his popularity meant little and less if he could not win over Jeor Mormont's younger sister.

When Gregor and his companions reached the Bear Island retinue, the Mountain stepped in front of Maege Mormont. She gave him her full attention, but she did not say a word. He folded his hands behind his back, lightly bowed his head, and declared "On behalf of the Legion without Banners, I officially welcome you to Moat Cailin, my lady."

Lady Maege seemed pleased by the sincerity and cordiality in the introduction. She smirked and stated wryly "I'd have thought you'd welcome me on someone else's behalf, as well, Lord Gregor."
"Mother!" Dacey whispered sternly. She sounded a little aghast, but in actuality, she was trying not to snicker.

Maege Mormont was a gruff, strapping woman. She did not share Dacey's voluptuous curves, but her arms and chest were well bound with muscle. She was quite tall, too. She stood just an inch or two shorter than her daughter.

She was past her fortieth name day. Her hair was already beginning to turn a shade of light grey, there were bags under her eyes, and there were a couple wrinkles along her cheeks.

Despite the obvious signs of age, her countenance suggested that in her youth, she had been quite comely.

Like her daughter and her soldiers, Maege Mormont carried plenty of steel. She wore a sword at her hip, three daggers on her waist, and an axe on her back.

After a bit of relative quietness, Gregor offered "Would you care to see the moat, my lady?"

"I'm of the North, my lord," Lady Maege stated slyly, "I've seen Moat Cailin before. However, I have not seen it in this condition. So, yes; show me what you've done to it."

Gregor nodded in acknowledgment.

Quarters had already been arranged for Lady Maege's party. Gregor had Sylas Vikary show her soldiers to their rooms. While they went to get settled, Gregor and Dacey gave her mother a tour of Moat Cailin. She never made any comments about the various upgrades and renovations that had been made to the moat, but she definitely seemed impressed by them.

After the tour, Maege asked to make use of the training yard. She also asked Gregor if he would spar with her. Seeing no good reason to refuse her, he consented to her request.

Maege Mormont proved to be as adept a warrior as her daughter. She was twice Gregor's age and a foot shorter than him, but her slightly smaller stature made her much quicker and more agile. Nevertheless, Gregor's skills with weapons were superior, and while size and strength were not everything, he proved once more that they could indeed make a difference.

Gregor and Maege went nine rounds with each other. He won the first eight, and the last round ultimately came out as a draw. That was mostly because he was secretly getting bored. Other than Dacey, they had no audience to their dueling. Given the circumstances, Dacey was uncertain who to cheer for; so she remained silent throughout the bouts.

When they put up their blades, Maege disclosed "I thank you for the exercise, my lord. It's been a while since I faced a worthy opponent in the ring."

She had paid him a compliment. That alone gave Gregor a modicum of hope.

Gregor spent most of the rest of the day with Dacey and Maege. He kept looking for the right moment to address the possibility of a betrothal between him and Dacey. He expected Maege to be the first one to bring it up.

Strangely, the topic never came up that day. Maege appeared far more interested in the activities of the Legion without Banners, as well as Gregor's future plans for expanding and enhancing the Legion.

She never said a word about marriage or anything similar to it. It was as though the concept was the absolute last thing on her mind. By the end of the day, Gregor was beginning to wonder if Maege intended to speak on that issue at all.

The following morning, he discovered that she did.

Gregor broke his fast in the Top Hall with his council and his top officers like he always did.
Maege Mormont and her soldiers had joined them at Gregor's behest.

Right after breakfast ended, Lady Maege came to Gregor and requested a private audience with him. He agreed, and she asked Dacey to accompany them. The massive knight led the two Bear Islanders to his solar. There, Maege bade her daughter to wait outside whilst she spoke with the Mountain inside. She claimed she needed to speak with Gregor separately beforehand. Dacey did not protest.

Gregor held the door open to allow Maege to enter the room first. Once she was through the threshold, he followed her in. He looked back at Dacey as he entered. She lightly smiled and mouthed the words "take care of yourself" to him.

After closing the door to the solar, Gregor saw that Maege was already seated at one of the chairs in front of his desk. As he approached his own chair behind the desk, he amiably proposed "Would you care for wine, my lady?"

"Normally, I'd never turn down an after-breakfast drink," Maege replied, "But it would be better if I'm sober for this."

"Very well," Gregor commented. In his experience, many Northmen were actually more agreeable and pleasant when they were drunk. But they were also less subject to sense and rationale. This situation would require using logic over courtesy.

Once he was settled in his chair, Gregor looked to Lady Maege. After five seconds of absolute silence, she bluntly stated "So, Lord Gregor, you wish to marry my daughter?"

"Indeed, I do, my lady," the Mountain said in response.

Maege gave a nod and inquired "May I ask why?"

"Many reasons," Gregor professed, "Firstly, there's politics. I may be a vassal to the North now, but no one will ever forget I was originally from the Westerlands. Despite my relocation, I will never truly be recognized as a Northman until I take a Northern bride. Then there's the matter that I actually need a bride anyway. Every lord needs heirs, after all. Your daughter is strong, resilient, compassionate, intelligent, and she is as loyal to House Stark as you are. I believe she is my finest prospect."

Maege rubbed her chin as she thought about those observations. Then she remarked "From a political and social viewpoint, I would agree. The marriage would be advantageous to my house, as well. Your titles as the Lord of Moat Cailin, King Robert's Master of Order, and the commander of the Legion without Banners carry a lot of prestige. But you are not searching for a sword or a horse, my lord. You are searching for a bride. I don't like the idea of you thinking of my daughter as merely being a choice, even if she's your 'best choice.'"

"That is not how I view her, my lady," Gregor assured her, "I care very deeply for your daughter.
Ever since she enlisted in the Legion, I have developed a close bond with her. She's invaluable as a warrior and as a leader. Before long, I came to regard her as one of my dearest friends. Recently, I started seeing her as more than even that."
"So Dacey told me true when she claimed you and she have feelings for each other?" Maege asked rhetorically.

"She did," Gregor affirmed.

"Have you acted upon those feelings yet?" Maege enquired, narrowing her eyes, "Tell me truthfully. I'll know if you are being insincere."

Gregor straightforwardly admitted "A fortnight ago, we shared a kiss. One single kiss. Nothing more."

"I've no qualms on that," Maege muttered, "There is such thing as a chaste kiss, after all."

"It was just that, I promise you," Gregor stated.

Maege nodded again. Then she leaned back in her chair and queried "What kind of bride would you wish to have? More to the point, what kind of bride do you expect Dacey to be?"

"The only thing I truly desire from her is devotion," Gregor disclosed, "I only expect her to be faithful to me. Just as I would be faithful to her in turn. Some lords may cast aside their marriage vows in a moment of weakness, but I am stronger than that. When I make a vow, I honor to the end."

"So fidelity is all you want?" Maege assumed.

"No, I want our marriage to be illustrious and successful, too," Gregor contended, "I do not expect Dacey to obey my every command without question. I know that she is by no means submissive, and I do not expect her to be. In fact, it's her free-spirited nature that drew me to her."

Maege scoffed and mumbled "Yes, Dacey always was a bit wild. Even I could not control her at times. But make no mistake; she loves and respects me just as much as I do her."

"I know she does," Gregor murmured softly.

After another interval of uninterrupted silence, Maege stated "Alright, my lord. You've convinced me that you have compelling reasons, excellent reasons, and legitimate reasons for wanting to marry my daughter. Now say I gave my consent for the marriage to happen. Let us speculate on what you would do to make the union last.

"Speculate how, Lady Maege?" Gregor enquired.

"Suppose that the costs of the wedding are quite high," Maege hypothesized, "Or suppose other circumstances prevented it from taking place. Perhaps you would have to sacrifice a great deal of money or power in the process. Just how much would you be willing to give up so that the wedding could take place?"

"I cannot imagine how a single wedding could cause such extreme difficulties," Gregor remarked, "But I will go along with your theory. If we were faced with such hardships… we would simply delay the wedding until we either found a way to recover those losses or compensate for them. But I plan to limit how much I invest into the wedding. After all, if I sacrificed too much of my wealth or power for my own wedding, I would risk losing my credibility, as well. My integrity means much more to me than money or influence. By utilizing so much of all three in a wedding, I would risk damaging my reputation, too. That would not bode well for me or any house I married into."

Maege seemed pleased by that argument. She proclaimed "Very good answer, my lord. In the North, weddings are casual affairs. Since you are not of the North, we could excuse a little extravagance for yours. But you would still do well to keep it simple.

"I plan to," Gregor told her.

"Good," Maege murmured, "Now, let us say the marriage comes with minimum expense, but afterwards, Dacey becomes deeply involved in managing your house's finances. She is generally responsible with money, but she may propose some questionable or seemingly selfish ventures. How much coin would you be willing to spend to make her happy?"

"You and I both know that marriages are not about keeping one's spouse content," Gregor cautiously responded, "Of course, I would want Dacey to be happy, but she does not strike me as the type of woman who relies greatly on material goods for pleasure. Besides, if I gave up too much for her, it would imply that Dacey is the true head of the house, and not everyone believes in gender equality as I do."

"Another prudent response, my lord," Maege stated approvingly, "After you are wed, will Dacey continue serving alongside you in the Legion? Or do you intend to have her stay in Moat Cailin for the rest of her life?"

"She will still be free to go where she likes," Gregor pronounced firmly, "Anytime she wishes to go riding, her horse will be available. I will never deny her the right to wield a sword, either. Except, perhaps, when she is heavily pregnant. I would be quite averse to her fighting if ever she is seven months with child or more. But even then, I would not demand of her to sheath her sword. I would simply suggest that she put it away until after the child's birth. Hopefully, she will not protest. Once she has regained her strength, I'll give her back her sword myself."

Maege was very satisfied with that response. It was just what she was hoping to hear, and Gregor meant every word of it. After a moment, she gazed off to the side and muttered "It appears you have accounted for everything, Lord Gregor. Obviously you know what you are doing. Your feelings for my daughter are true, as are your reasons for wanting to wed her. This union would indeed be beneficial to both my house and yours. The two of you have the capacity to make the marriage a joyful and successful one. With all that in mind, I have every reason to give you my blessing."

At that, Gregor leaned forward expectantly.

A few seconds later, Maege continued with "However… before I do, there is one last factor that must be acknowledged."

"What is that?" Gregor inquired.

"I need to know just how far you would go for my daughter," Maege declared, "All this talk about sacrifices has not been mere conjecture. It is directly related to the issue at hand."

"How so?" Gregor asked.

"In a married couple, both partners often have to give some things up," Maege contended, "That's the way it is with every union. Even if their marriage is happy and without difficulties, they have to compromise at times. Whenever they compromise, they have to make sacrifices of their own."

"I… cannot dispute that," Gregor uttered, shrugging a bit, "But how is this relevant? Is there a sacrifice you would have me make?"

Maege sternly nodded her head. She then drew one of her daggers, gripped it by the blade, and held it out to Gregor. As he slowly took the weapon by the hilt, Maege instructed him "Take that dagger… and cut off one of your fingers."

Gregor felt himself overcome with shock and alarm. He gazed at her as though he was certain he had misheard her. He said uneasily "Come again?"

"The oldest bonds were formed with blood sacrifices," Maege enlightened him, "Typically, one would open up one's hand or face with a blade, and offer the spilt blood as a sign of one's compliance. But these days, you can hardly go three miles without someone else taking a slash at you. Cutting open yourself does not mean as much as it used to. As such, a more permanent sacrifice is often given instead."

Gregor was speechless. Up until now, he had spoken to and treated Lady Maege with nothing less than the utmost courtesy. Now, he felt much less amenable. He looked to the Bear Island woman and grumbled irately "What would this even prove?"

"It would prove how serious you are about this match," Maege uttered bluntly, "You wish to show me how much you wish to wed my daughter? Then do so. Give up a little piece of yourself so that you can have all of her."

"Dacey never mentioned anything like this," Gregor hastily pointed out.

"Probably because she was hoping to avoid it," Maege theorized, "Alas, I will not. This is a basic matter of principle, my lord. Now make your choice. Will you choose your hand or Dacey's?"

Gregor was already startled by the very concept of amputating his own finger. Now he was not even being allotted any time to think on this proposal. Maege was forcing him to make a choice right then.

The Mountain anxiously gazed at the dagger. It was very sharp, and it held a very fine edge. With one swift slash, it could slice clean through bone, skin, and muscle alike. Furthermore, Gregor was very handy with a knife. He could make a very clean and precise cut.

Still, that did not make the idea of losing an appendage any easier to bear.

He desperately thought of ways around this predicament. Maybe he would not have to sever an entire finger. Maybe Maege would be content with just one segment of his smallest digit. But he could not ask her that; it would be a sign of weakness.

He then recalled that there were such things as prosthetics in this world. Perhaps he could replace whichever finger he lost with a small rod of metal. Then again, even if the prosthetic was shaped like an actual finger and moved like one, it would just be a substitute for the real thing.

He even considered asking Maege to use the dagger for him. But he swiftly banished that thought from his mind. If he begged someone else to do a gruesome task that he himself was unwilling to do, it would be a huge blow to his honor and his decency.

From the look of things, there was no easy way around this dilemma. He only had two real options: sever one of his digits, or plead with Maege not to make him go through with the operation.

After a minute of tense silence, Gregor finally made his decision.

He slowly raised the dagger… and plunged its tip onto the surface of his desk. It landed nowhere near his other hand.
Gregor then looked up at Lady Maege Mormont and proclaimed unsteadily "I'm sorry, I… I can't do it. I can't… mutilate myself."

Maege seemed indifferent to that statement. She folded her arms and assumed "So you're refusing to make the sacrifice?"

"Yes, I'm refusing!" Gregor snapped heatedly, "But I'm not giving up on Dacey. I will do anything else – I mean, anything else – to appease you. I beg you to let me demonstrate the truth of that claim through some other means. Please do not doubt me when I say I love your daughter."

Maege did not respond to that proclamation straightaway. Over two minutes of unpleasant, intense silence elapsed before she finally opened her mouth. But when she did, speaking was not the first thing she did with it. Instead, she broke into a wide smile.

Then she declared "I know you do, Lord Gregor. I knew that ten minutes after I first met you. I also know that she loves you, as well. The way you two look at each other… there is genuine love there. And I would be a fool to come between you and her."

Gregor cocked his head and uttered "I'm afraid I don't understand."

"For that, I cannot fault you," Maege commented. She extracted her dagger from the desk and sheathed it. Then she revealed "This was all a trial. I was testing you to see if you could be driven to cut off your finger without any objections."

"It appears as though I failed," Gregor mumbled grimly.

"Oh, no," Maege asserted, still smiling, "You passed."

Now Gregor was very confused. "I did?"

Maege provided an explanation: "If you actually had cut off your finger, you would have singled yourself out as an obsessive who would do anything to get what he wants, even at the needless expense of his own well-being. Little good comes out of a person with such a mindset. For instance, some would argue Robert Baratheon's true motive for starting the Rebellion was a result of that type of fixation. That was how much he yearned for my liege lord's sister. Had the King not found happiness with Cersei Lannister, I would fear for the realm. Then again, having a Lannister Queen is not very ideal, either."

"That is a fair assessment," Gregor conceded, "In every aspect."

Maege nodded again, and she went on with "I believe you would do everything you could – within reason – to protect my daughter. If the situation called for it, I am certain you would lay your life down for her. But if you would voluntarily inflict damage onto yourself to win her over, you would have crossed the line between love and infatuation. It would only have been a finger now, but it could have been a hand or worse later on. Your physical well-being may not be all that was at stake. Your mental well-being would ultimately suffer, as well. Once that happened, you would soon be just as much a danger to Dacey as yourself. I would never allow her to be bound to such an individual."

Lady Maege would have made a great interrogator at the Agency.

Indeed, Gregor was impressed by how much thought and effort Maege Mormont had put in this test. She had applied a lesson in advanced psychology – or what would have been known as advanced psychology in his first life – to determine the nature of Gregor's relationship with Dacey. She meant a great deal to him, but he was not unhealthily besotted with her.
Evidently, Maege only wanted what was best for her daughter, and she would go to great length to ensure that Dacey had nothing less.

Gregor did feel a little annoyed at being misled, but he had to face facts; he could not stay ahead of everyone in Westeros. In any case, at least his encounter with Lady Maege produced a favorable outcome.

"I hope you hold no ill will towards me for deceiving you, my lord," Maege uttered, a little worriedly.

"Not at all," Gregor reassured her, "I wish I could say I saw right through this charade. Alas, I cannot. For the first time in ever, I've been caught totally off my guard. As such, I salute you, my lady."

Maege smirked again and pronounced "I know it must have been grueling; forcing you to choose between Dacey's hand and part of yours. Had you flat-out refused and claimed that no woman was worth losing a digit for, Dacey and I would have left within the hour. What matters is that you hesitated before you decided. Had you actually swung that dagger, I would have stopped your hand before the blade made contact with your skin. You would still have kept your hand, but you would have lost Dacey's. But now that rationale and instinct have triumphed over desire, you shall have both, instead."

That last remark piqued Gregor's interest. He leaned forward and said anxiously "So, does that mean you…?"

Before he could finish, Maege nodded once more and professed "There is no need for you to prove yourself anymore. I now know that Dacey could do no better than the man before me. For that, I give you my congratulations… as well as my blessing."

Gregor smiled brightly, rose to his feet, walked around his desk, and held his hand out to the Bear Island woman. She took it, and he shook her hand vigorously. He said elatedly yet in a somewhat professional tone "I thank you, Lady Maege. I swear to you, you will never come to regret this."

"I'll hold you to your word," the Bear Island woman remarked. She rose to her own feet, grinned back at the Mountain, and informed him "I look forward to calling you my son."

He chuckled at that, thought the concept of being Maege Mormont's son-by-law did sound appealing. Gregor then pointed out the door and commented "On that note…?"

"Go right ahead," Maege bade him, "If there's to be a wedding, the bride should definitely know of it."

Gregor promptly sauntered to the door and opened it. As he anticipated, Dacey had lingered in the hallway. If she had overheard any of the conversation between her mother and Gregor, she gave no indication of such. Gregor was fairly certain she had avoided the temptation to eavesdrop.

When the massive knight stepped out into the hallway, the Bear Island girl turned her attention to him. She seemed equal parts excited and apprehensive.

"Well?" she inquired in interest.

"Come on in," he urged her.

Gregor reentered the solar with Dacey right behind him. She went to Maege, held her right hand in both of hers, and asked eagerly "What have you decided, Mother?"
Lady Maege Mormont smiled gently at her daughter, caressed her cheek with her free hand, and told her "I deeply approve of Lord Gregor, my darling. You have my blessing to marry him."

Dacey was delighted. She turned back to Gregor, rushed over to him, and embraced him affectionately. As Gregor held her, he looked to his intended's mother and gestured for her to approach them. Maege grinned, walked over to the couple, and joined in the hug.

When they finally pulled apart, Maege questioned curiously "When do you intend to wed?"

"As soon as possible," Dacey answered.

Gregor had much the same in mind, but there were certain factors he had to account for first. He thought aloud "I'd like to have at least some of my family present for the ceremony. It'll take about a fortnight for them to travel from Clegane's Keep to Moat Cailin. We'll need even more time to plan the ceremony itself. I know Northmen prefer their nuptials modest, but, as you are no doubt aware, Moat Cailin is inhabited by more than just Northmen. The tastes and penchants of the other Westerosi should be acknowledged, as well."

"I agree," Dacey claimed, "Even if we wanted to keep everything simple, our fellow Legionnaires will probably make a far bigger issue of this affair than we shall."

"That can't be helped," Maege proclaimed. She rubbed her temple and suggested "With all that considered… do you suppose the wedding could occur within a moon's turn at the most?"

Gregor thought a moment, and then he nodded and professed "That is definitely doable."

"A moon's turn is fine by me," Dacey concurred.

Maege clapped her hands together and announced "So be it. The ceremony will be held thirty days from today. I'll remain here to help you prepare for it. Expect to see very much of me over the coming weeks."

I don't know whether to be grateful or petrified by that.

Either way, Gregor was overjoyed. Now that he had Lady Maege's blessing, there was nothing else keeping him and Dacey apart. In a single moon's turn, the Bear would climb the Mountain.
Naturally, Gregor and Dacey were both ecstatic about their upcoming nuptials. Be that as it might, they did not wish to overly sensationalize the matter. They would have preferred things to be simple. In fact, had it been their decision, they would have just held a small, private ceremony with only their families, their dearest friends, and their most trusted allies in attendance.

Alas, for a variety of reasons, a modest ceremony was quite impossible. It could only be done if they somehow withheld the knowledge of their engagement from everyone else in Moat Cailin. If only the two of them knew of it, that may have been possible. However, Lady Maege Mormont had no intention of keeping quiet about the affair, much to her daughter and soon-to-be goodson's dismay.

Fortunately, before long, Dacey and Gregor decided they could put up with a lavish wedding, and that such an event might actually be beneficial to all persons involved. They figured they may as well give their fellow Legionnaires a chance to share in their joy, as well as an opportunity to celebrate. Gods knew there were few enough of those already.

An hour after Lady Maege gave her blessing, Gregor had the staff of Moat Cailin and the top officers of the Legion without Banners assemble in the main courtyard of the moat. There he and Dacey stood on a platform overlooking the area, and they officially announced their engagement.

Unsurprisingly, this news was met with energetic cheering and applause. Once Gregor and Dacey came down from the platform, they took the time to shake the hands of everyone who wished to personally congratulate them. Once again, Oberyn Martell wanted to offer more than a simple handshake. He argued that if the two of them were going to be bound together and no other for life, they may as well have a little "enjoyment" beforehand. As politely yet directly as possible, Gregor and Dacey turned down the Dornishman's offer. "Tempting" though it was, they claimed.

Many times throughout that day, Gregor and Dacey were approached by soldiers of the Legion and people in the towns adjoining the moat who also wished to congratulate them. That involved plenty more handshakes. As well as some raising of flagons and claps on the back. Gregor was used to receiving this much attention, but Dacey was quite unaccustomed to it. To her, it was all a little overwhelming. Luckily, he was able to help her endure it.

In the early evening, Gregor had Maester Kennick compose three letters; one to Winterfell, one to King's Landing, and one to Clegane's Keep. He intended to notify Eddard Stark, Robert Baratheon, and Tarrence Clegane respectively of his wedding.

Eddard was now Gregor's liege lord, and Dacey's family had been a loyal vassal of the Starks for eons. Logically, the wolf lord should be aware of what marriage contracts his bannermen were involved in.

Robert needed to be informed for a similar reason. Not only was he the King, but Gregor also held a very prominent spot on the Small Council. By marrying into the North, Gregor would be strengthening the domain of the crown.

Most of all, Gregor's own family had to be told of the engagement. Dacey's family would know soon enough, as would every other Northern house. But unless Robert decided to tell the whole of the realm (which was unlikely), it was uncertain that any houses south of the Neck would be apprised of the wedding without Gregor's notice. Nevertheless, Gregor was determined to have some of his relations present at the ceremony. So he dispatched his fastest, most resilient raven to his father's keep.

Within the next week, Gregor received a reply from all three parties. Eddard Stark and Robert Baratheon merely acknowledged the union of House Clegane of Moat Cailin with House Mormont of Bear Island. They also bade him congratulations, along with many years of happiness and good health.

The letter from Clegane's Keep was sent by Gregor's mother, Lady Dalish Clegane. She expressed her utmost delight on her son's engagement. Apparently, she could not properly convey on paper just how enthusiastic and proud she truly was.

That aside, Dalish told her son that his father was too preoccupied with other matters to appear at the wedding, but since she was available, she would make every effort to be there. She claimed that by the time he received her letter, she would already be riding north for Moat Cailin. She also mentioned that she would be bringing Sandor and Ellyn along.

Gregor was enraptured by that development. He had not seen any member of his family in almost three years. He had written to them at least thrice a month, and they had always written back, but other than that, they had kept very little correspondence. He found that he missed them dreadfully.

It soon occurred to Gregor that since his mother and siblings were travelling by land, they would have to cross the Green Fork at some point. He could not imagine why they might choose to ford the river as he and his company had done when he first relocated to Moat Cailin. With that in mind, the only way they would get across in time for the wedding was if they used a certain bridge. This particular bridge happened to be infested with weasels.

Gregor hoped Walder Frey would not hinder his mother and siblings. If the Late Lord knew what was good for him, he would let them pass without incident.

The Cleganes of Clegane's Keep were still relatively minor in terms of status. Thus, it was unlikely that Walder Frey would attempt to extort a marriage contract out of Lady Dalish. Despite the fact that her eldest son was one of the most influential people in Westeros, the Cleganes of Moat Cailin had no exclusive connections with the Westerlands outside of blood.

As much as Gregor hated Walder Frey and his overpopulated house, he did not wish to give the old weasel grounds to unduly harbor a grudge or resentment towards him. Lord Walder had always given the Legionnaires free passage whenever their services were required anywhere west of the Trident. But that was mostly just because the Legion were acting in the king’s interests, as well as the interests of the realm. Anyone outside of the Legion was usually still forced to pay a toll for access to the bridge.

Apart from that, Gregor Clegane had not been spared Walder's ongoing ambitions to expand the reach of his house. In the three years he had been Lord of Moat Cailin and Master of Order, Gregor had received offers for a number of potential marriage contracts from all over Westeros. Walder Frey had sent more than anyone else. Gregor had assured everyone else that he would give their offers some consideration. He had made that claim to Walder, too, but in actuality, he had burned all the messages from Lord Frey in his fireplace. Of course, Walder never knew that, but Gregor could imagine he was very displeased that the Mountain had chosen a Northern beauty over his homely daughters.

As luck would have it, when Lady Dalish arrived at the Twins, Walder Frey had decided (for maybe the first time in his overlong life) to be chivalrous, and he allowed her and her company to cross without tolling them. Gregor would find that out later, and afterwards, he made sure to write a short message to Lord Walder, thanking him for being so "courteous" to his family. He did that mostly out of obligation instead of genuine gratitude.

A fortnight after the marriage pact was broadcasted, a small band of riders was spotted coming up the Kingsroad. Their banners bore the image of three hounds on a yellow field. The sigil of the Cleganes of Clegane's Keep. Gregor was promptly summoned to the southern gate, along with his intended and her mother. They observed the approaching company from afar.

Lady Daliah Clegane herself led them. She had never been very fond of horseback riding, but to properly portray the strength of her house, she opted to ride a horse all the way up the Causeway rather than sit in a carriage or a wagon. As it happened, she rode her courser with considerable grace.

Sandor and Ellyn rode on either side of her. Ellyn was mounted on an average-sized palfrey. She enjoyed horseback riding substantially more than her mother, but she still lacked the confidence to ride anything bigger or wilder than a palfrey.

Sandor, on the other hand, had already become an expert rider. He was astride a large, fierce-looking black destrier. That stallion must have been a young Stranger If not, he had to be either his father or brother. Gregor made a note to inform the stableboys to be mindful of that beast.

As the Clegane procession was granted entrance into the moat, Gregor, Dacey, and Maege made their way down to the courtyard. They met up with his family at the stables. Gregor was able to warn the stableboys in time. His timing was perfect; the stableboys were tasked with handling the unruly animal just a few seconds later.

Dacey and her mother were almost as eager to see Gregor's family as he was. They were hardly surprising, given that they would all soon be related by law. At any rate, Gregor was all too pleased to oblige them.

Gregor gave his family a warm greeting. He kissed his mother on the cheek, patted his brother on the back, and hugged his sister affectionately. A few words were exchanged, mostly along the lines of "I missed you so much."

After this reunion, he introduced the Mormonts and the other Cleganes to one another. The six of them spent the entire day together.

Gregor's fiancée took a quick liking to his younger brother and sister, and they to her. Interestingly, Sandor and Dacey were approximately the same age. They were roughly the same height, as well. Gregor wondered which of them would make the better warrior.

They must have wondered the same. Around midday, the two of them went a few rounds in the training yard with each other. Gregor knew what to expect from Dacey, but he had not seen Sandor fight in three years.

Evidently, the younger Clegane boy had not neglected his brother's teachings. He had practiced them and improved upon them greatly. It appeared Ser Wallis Peckledon had taught him a few more advanced techniques, as well.

It turned out Sandor and Dacey were equally proficient combatants, just as Gregor and Lady Maege were. That was an intriguing outcome. If either of them sparred with his future mother-by-law, Gregor would technically know if their skills were superior, inferior, or equal to his.

Sandor was not the only one who had changed. Ellyn had grown more than either of her brothers had in the last three years. She had to be the tallest girl of ten Gregor had ever seen. Six more inches, and she would have towered over Lady Daliah. Her feminine features were starting to come in, as well. She still bore a child's face, but she would not have a child's body for much longer.

While he was happy for his sister's forthcoming transition into womanhood, Gregor was a little stunned that it was happening so early in her life. It could have just been a product of her Clegane genetics, but still…

Why is everyone so damn precocious in this universe?

He could not be blamed for thinking that. Ever since the first book, he had noticed that the children in the franchise grew up very quickly. Dany married at thirteen, pregnant at fourteen. Jon joining the Night's Watch at fourteen. Robb being crowned King of the North at fifteen. Sansa having her moon's blood at twelve. Arya killing a boy at nine. Bran able to climb a tower at seven.

Then again, in order to survive in a world like this, children would have to mature faster than they would in Gregor's first life. So maybe there was more realism in their early rise into adulthood than there initially appeared to be. As it happened, Dacey was not yet seventeen. But in every aspect other than age, she was a woman already.

In the fortnight before Gregor's family reached Moat Cailin, Lady Maege Mormont had been primarily responsible for making all the preparations for the wedding. In the fortnight after, Lady Daliah assisted her greatly. The two women shouldered the burden in equal amounts.

Food and drink were not major concerns. Moat Cailin was stocked well enough to feed an army on a regular basis (and did). Of course, they would need more than the Legion's standard rations to satisfy the wedding guests. Luckily, the moat was stored with enough provisions to last the current occupants an entire decade. Furthermore, many of the guests would be bringing dishes of their own to the feast.

Providing accommodations for all the guests was a little more challenging. By this point, eleven of the moat's towers had been rebuilt, bringing the total up to fourteen. Even so, most of the new rooms were currently occupied by the Legionnaires. Either some of would have to share lodgings, or the guests would have to take up residence in the towns or camp outside the walls. It was considered rude to force a guest to sleep outside, so Maege and Daliah were leaned towards the former option.

The decorations and entertainment were relatively modest. The banners of House Mormont and House Clegane (both of them) would be hung from many of the walls. A few elaborate tapestries would be put up, too. Additionally, a score of singers had offered to provide musical accompaniment for the feast. After interviewing them, Daliah and Maege selected the five most talented among the twenty and hired them for the occasion.

The hardest detail was the ceremony itself. Specifically, which faith it would be done in. Like all Northern families (except House Manderly of White Harbor), the Mormonts were devout followers of the Old Gods. Gregor Clegane, however, had been raised to believe in the New Gods. Despite the Mountain's relocation to the North, he still practiced his faith of the Seven. Publically, at least. Privately… he had never really followed them.

Although Gregor was a recognized practitioner of that faith, he had never really admitted any belief in it to himself. To him, the hardest thing to grasp about this world was all the different religions. Of course, he was aware that religion would always been a sensitive subject in every world.
In his previous life, Gregory Welch had been a Catholic, but he had still accepted and respected all other religions and those who practiced them, as well as atheists. All throughout elementary, middle, and high school, he had been a firm believer in his family's religion. After he left home to start college, his beliefs had begun to diminish. Being in a new environment certainly had that effect on people.

During the final years of his life, Gregory had considered himself more of an agnostic. He still liked to entertain the idea of a higher power, but he had put more conviction in science and discovery. Even so, in the back of his mind, he never lost his faith.

Gregor was unsure if he still believed in God in this life. In any case, some divine being must have been responsible for bringing him to this universe. Because if not that, who or what else could have been responsible?

Strictly speaking, if there was a god of this world, it would most likely be George R.R. Martin himself. With that in mind, David Benioff and D.B. Weiss may have been lesser gods.

Regardless of who the real god or gods may have been, Gregor was just glad they had allowed him to form a union with someone as marvelous as Dacey Mormont.

After discussing the issue with their mothers, Gregor and Dacey decided to have a ceremony that mixed both of their faiths. It would be conducted by a septon, but it would take place before a heart tree. That way, the marriage would be legitimate in the eyes of both the Old Gods and the New.

During the first year of his occupation of Moat Cailin, Gregor had planned to give the moat a godswood. Growing one naturally would have been impossible. So Gregor had a group of Northern Legionnaires go to the Isle of Faces and uproot a cluster of weirwood trees. The trees were then replanted in the eastern section of the moat. One of them was a fully grown heart tree.

In order to conduct the ceremony properly, Gregor would need a cloak bearing the sigil and colors of his House. Obviously, he could not use the cloak Ser Tarrence had draped over Lady Daliah's shoulders at their own wedding. That cloak belonged to the Cleganes of Clegane's Keep.

Daliah Clegane took the time to make a new cloak for her firstborn son. He could have commissioned a team of seamstresses for the job, but his mother insisted on doing it herself.

Lady Daliah started with a large piece of purple cloth (Purple was the color that represented prosperity. For that reason, Gregor had adapted it as the official color of his own house). After fashioning the material into a cloak, Daliah had sewn the image of a large mountain on the back of it. She reproduced the image exactly as it appeared on Gregor's banners, right down to the nine small figures at the base of the mountain.

The final product was absolutely stunning. He spent ten whole minutes praising his mother's handiwork. The sight of the cloak made Gregor long for the moment when he would wrap it around Dacey's shoulders.

At last, the much-awaited day arrived.

Five hundred guests had come for the wedding. The godswood of Moat Cailin was large enough to hold eighty of them. So the only ones who witnessed the actual ceremony were family members, close friends, and highest-ranking Legionnaires. Which was what Gregor and Dacey would have desired in the first place.

In the early evening, those eighty individuals were packed into the moat's godswood. There was no room for chairs, so everyone had to remain standing. No one seemed bothered to do so, thankfully.

The guests stood in two groups composed of eight rows of five. All of them were facing the heart tree.

Gregor stood immediately before the heart tree. He looked very much the lord he was.

He was freshly-bathed and clean-shaven. His usual odor of sweat had been replaced by the scent of soap.

He was clad in a doublet of boiled leather, which he wore over a plain white tunic. They were complemented by a pair starched woolen breeches and his most formal pair of boots. All of his apparel was tinted slightly purple. Over his shoulders, he loosely wore the cloak his mother had made. The cloak of House Clegane of Moat Cailin.

Two other men were standing nearby Gregor. One of them was the septon of Moat Cailin, Septon Norvin. He was the minister of the ceremony. He stood in front and a little to the right of Gregor.

The other man stood opposite the Mountain. This man was almost as tall as Gregor and eleven years older than him. He was clad mainly in green, and he wore the sigil of his house on his own doublet. The sigil was a bear standing on its hind legs with its claws and fangs bared. He was Lord Jorah Mormont of Bear Island.

As the head of House Mormont, Jorah would be the one to give Dacey away.

He was not the only new Bear Islander in attendance. Lady Maege had brought her other daughters – Alysane, Lyra, and Jorelle – to the ceremony. They were all in the very first row on the left side. Likewise, Lady Daliah, Sandor, and Ellyn were in the first row on the right side.

Jorah's first wife, Lady Blinda of House Glover, was still living, but she had been too ill to travel. As such, she had remained behind at Bear Island. Gregor was very understanding. After all, he knew that Blinda Mormont's days were numbered.

Gregor stood in place, tapping his fingertips together anxiously. Anyone could plainly see that he was very eager for the ceremony to begin.

In his previous life, some of Gregor's married friends had gotten cold feet on the day of their weddings. He knew that men in this world could suffer the same apprehension. Some of them seemed pleased with the unity of marriage at first, but when they actually got to the altar, the magnitude of their commitment fully sank in.

Gregor had avoided experiencing any such qualms so far. Even so, he did feel the same worries every conscientious bridegroom felt. Would he make Dacey happy? Would he be happy? Would they raise a strong, healthy family together? Would their marriage survive the trials to come?

When he thought on that closely, Gregor could not help but scoff. Ever since he first came into this world, his foremost concern had been to preserve the realm and save as many people as possible. Now he was fretting on his ability to be a good husband. He really was a full-fledged resident of Westeros now.

Although there were eighty other people present, the groom felt strangely alone.

That feeling was expunged ten minutes later, when the bride finally arrived.

Dacey entered the godswood alongside her mother. When Gregor first set his eyes on her, he could actually feel them widen. She was a vision of beauty.

The Bear Island girl rarely wore dresses. She made an exception for the wedding. And what an exception it was.

Dacey's gown had been designed by three of the best seamstresses in Westeros. It was made of exquisite Myrish lace and Lyseni silk. The hemline went all the way down to her ankles. A small pattern of brown bears was embroidered along the bodice. The dress's hue was a blend of many shades of green. Dacey wore the green cloak of House Mormont around her own shoulders.

Her long black hair was done up in the traditional Northern style. It was braided in some places; smooth in others. There was not a blemish to be seen anywhere on her normally pale face.

As she walked down the aisle, all eyes were on Dacey, particularly Gregor's.

She looks just as amazing in a dress as she does in armor.

Lady Maege Mormont accompanied her eldest daughter all the way to the heart tree. Then she lightly kissed Dacey on the forehead and went to join her other daughters in the congregation.

Gregor flashed a small smile at Dacey as she approached him. She smiled back as she moved to stand beside Jorah.

Once all heads were turned towards Norvin, the septon cleared his throat and pronounced "Who comes before the gods?"

Dacey took a step forward, folded her hands beneath her cloak, and responded with "I, Dacey of House Mormont, Lady of Bear Island."

Septon Norvin then glanced over at the tallest person there and stated "Who comes to claim her?"

Gregor gazed down at the older man and declared "I, Gregor of House Clegane, Lord of Moat Cailin and Master of Order."

The septon then looked back to the bride and questioned "Who gives her?"

Jorah firmly announced "I, Jorah of House Mormont, Lord of Bear Island."

Septon Norvin nodded and told Gregor "You may now cloak the Lady Dacey and take her under your protection."

Dacey looked over at Jorah. The bear lord grinned at his cousin and swiftly removed the House Mormont cloak from around her shoulders. That marked the moment she was officially released from the protection of her house.

With her back turned to Gregor, the Mountain approached his intended, slid the cloak of House Clegane off his shoulders, and carefully draped it over Dacey's. After that, he took her hand in his, and the two of them stepped up to Septon Norvin.

Norvin got out a long ribbon dyed green and purple. He wrapped it around the couple's interconnected hands. After that, he held their hands in his own, and he proclaimed "In the sight of the Old Gods and the New, I hereby seal these two souls, binding them as one. Now and for eternity."

After untying the ribbon, Septon Norvin backed away and instructed them "Look upon one another and say the words."

Gregor and Dacey turned to face each other, and they took each other's hands softly. With the lightest trace of a smile on her lips, she solemnly swore "I am his and he is mine, from this day until the end of my days."

He grinned gently down at her, and he declared with every bit of confidence he could muster: "I am hers and she is mine, from this day until the end of my days."

At that, the Septon raised his arms and announced "Let it be known that Dacey of House Mormont and Gregor of House Clegane are one flesh, one heart, one soul, now and forever. Cursed be he who would seek to tear them asunder."

Norvin lowered his arms and wordlessly gestured for the couple to complete their vows. Neither of them needed any more encouragement.

"With this kiss, I pledge my love," Gregor avowed. He slowly leaned forward, closed his eyes, and pressed his lips against Dacey's. In that kiss he put every bit of love he had. She shut her own eyes and kissed him back with just as much love.

All around them, the congregation erupted into enthusiastic applause. The cheering in the godswood was so loud, it was almost deafening.

When Gregor and Dacey finally came apart, they turned to face the attendees and smiled down on them. Gregor held Dacey's left hand in his right, and together, they proceeded back up the aisle towards the entrance of the godswood. All the while, they kept their interconnected hands high in the air.

Straight after the ceremony came the wedding feast.

None of the moat's towers had any rooms large enough to hold all five hundred guests. The courtyard was insufficient in size, as well. So the feast was held just outside the northern gate of the fortress. There was no shortage of space there. Guards were posted on all sides of the camp, so there would be no threat of unwanted company or interruptions.

A dais had been erected in the center of the feasting grounds. Gregor and Dacey stood in the seats of honor. His family sat to the immediate right of them; hers to the immediate left. The other seats were occupied by their close friends and the top officers of the Legion without Banners, such as Gerion Lannister and Oberyn Martell.

Four courses were served at the feast. All of them were composed primarily of dishes that were Northern or Western in origin. However, each course included some smaller dishes from the other seven regions of Westeros. So there was food that everyone would find appealing.

Even so, a lot of the attendees were inclined to sample some cuisine from outside their homelands. There was a great deal of sharing of tastes that night. Lord Gregor was pleased by that; it was a sign that the unification of Westeros was underway. He was just changing the people's eating habits now, but it was still a step in the right direction.

Many toasts were raised, more of them to Gregor and Dacey than anyone or anything else.

Plenty of songs were sung, as well. Among them was The Bear and the Maiden Fair. When played at a wedding, the title characters were generally supposed to be the groom and the bride respectively. Ironically, the bride was both characters in this scenario.
That song and several other classics were played at the feast. There were a few original pieces, too. Hamish the Harper performed a work he entitled The Flood That Never Was.

From what Gregor could gather, this song was about the Sack of King's Landing, and how he had singlehandedly prevented it from becoming a slaughter. One could almost classify it as a follow-up to the Rains of Castamere. But whereas that song was based around dismay and fear, The Flood That Never Was had a much more uplifting theme. It was essentially a type of praise meant to cherish Gregor's deeds at the end of Robert's Rebellion.

Later on, Bethany Fair-Fingers and Aemon Costayne performed a duet they had composed together. It was called The Bear That Roamed The Mountain. It was a song about how Gregor had formed the most effective fighting force in recent Westerosi history, but he himself had been incomplete until Dacey enlisted in the Legion. At the same time, it implied that Dacey had gained a similar type of fulfillment from working alongside Gregor. In his mind (as well as hers), that was a fairly accurate assessment.

Some of the lyrics about certain events were exaggerated, but Gregor, Dacey, and all those present found them touching and enjoyable all the same. Bethany and Aemon had their personal thanks for writing that number, and they would ultimately leave Moat Cailin with a great deal more coin than when they arrived.

After the fourth and final course was served, Greatjon Umber rose from his chair, lifted his goblet into the air, and shouted boisterously "Shall we bed them?"

The grounds fell totally silent at that. Everyone collectively turned to the dais. Gregor and Dacey had been the center of attention all night, and up until now, it had been pleasant. Now they both felt some desire to vanish into thin air.

Bedding ceremonies were not a custom in the North. However, Gregor was from the south, and the wedding ceremony had been done in a way that it would honor the New Gods as much as the Old Gods. So the option of a bedding ceremony was not out of the question.

Gregor had not officially announced whether or not there would be a bedding ceremony before the feast. Now, he would have to make up his mind.

The Mountain turned to his new wife and whispered "If you want, we can forgo the bedding ceremony. I would hate to make you so uncomfortable."

Dacey sat thinking for a few seconds. Then she shrugged and muttered "Everyone's in a good mood. I find there're a lot more agreeable that way. So we may as well give them something to liven up their spirits."

"Are you sure?" Gregor enquired.

"Yes," Dacey responded. Then she grinned wickedly, reached behind her chair, and pulled out one of her daggers. She balanced it in her hand and proposed "But, just to be safe, we can 'manage' their actions."

Gregor smirked at that idea. He drew one of his own daggers, stood up, and proclaimed "I give my consent for the bedding ceremony to commence."

There came a round of applause and cheers from the assemblage. Several of the guests started rising from their seats.

"But…” Gregor hastily put in. That got everyone to halt in place. The Mountain then held up his dagger and pronounced "If there is any groping, caressing, or grabbing of private areas, I can assure you that whoever does it will not do it again."

At that, a few of the guests sat back down. But only a few. The vast majority of the people who planned to be involved in the bedding ceremony continued making their way over to the dais.

At that moment, Lady Maege Mormont escorted her other daughters away from the scene, as did Lady Daliah Clegane with her daughter Ellyn. Sandor was permitted to linger, but he was only there to ensure that the male participants did not mishandle his new sister-by-law.

Gregor and Dacey were taller than just about everyone there. But by working together, a dozen of the guests were able to lift each of them off their feet. Once that happened, the newlyweds were carried back into the moat.

On the way to the Lord's Tower (one of the eleven that had been rebuilt), they were stripped out of their garments.

This experience was certainly a unique one. Being mobbed and undressed by friends and strangers in anticipation of him making love to his new wife… that never happened in his first life. Then again, he had never been married as Gregory Welch, either.

Gregor and Dacey kept their knives brandished to remind the participants what would happen if they got too frisky. That helped to lessen the awkwardness. It also made the experience less unpleasant. The ceremony was still far from enjoyable, and it still felt degrading, but at least it was not as licentious as Gregor had envisioned it would be.

Soon enough, the crowd arrived outside Gregor's bedchamber in the Lord's Tower. The door was pushed open and Dacey was deposited inside first. Gregor went in shortly after. Both of them were clad in only their smallclothes.

Dacey held her free arm over her exposed breasts. Her other hand was still clasped firmly around her dagger.

Gregor held on to his own dagger, as well. He turned back to the door, placed his hand on it, and told the people on the other side "Thank you. Your services are no longer needed. In other words, 'get the fuck out, if you please.'"

Then he slammed the door shut and locked it. He was certain at least some of them would stay behind to eavesdrop on what happened next, but that mattered not to Gregor.

The Mountain then turned to the Bear Islander. She was no longer trying to cover up her breasts. She shamelessly displayed them for her new husband. All the while, she retained a mischievous smirk.

For the first time, Gregor got to admire her whole body. He took full advantage of that opportunity. The longer he gazed at Dacey, the more he could feel his manhood rising beneath his smallclothes.

The sight of Dacey naked – complemented by the knowledge that she was now joined with him – was enough to purge any desire Gregor had to remain abstinent.

"Shall we, my lady?" Gregor suggested cheekily, gesturing to the bed.

"We shall, my lord," Dacey replied teasingly.

They tossed their daggers onto the adjoining nightstand. Then they approached the bed. Before they laid down, Gregor took Dacey in his arms and kissed her passionately. She wrapped her own arms around him and kissed him back.

They both remaining standing at the foot of the bed for nearly five minutes. For the first two, all they did was kiss. In the third minute, they allowed their hands to begin exploring each other. Gregor caressed Dacey's cheek and neck at once, touching her as gently as he would a fragile object. At the same time, she squeezed his arms, allowing her hands to brush the length of his large biceps.

Before very long, Gregor allowed his hands to wander below the waist. He slipped one beneath Dacey's smallclothes, and he pressed it against her womanhood. She gasped softly, but her surprise turned to arousal right away.

Gregor continued rubbing her clitoris for twenty seconds; he rubbed very slowly, letting the pleasure gradually increase. Then, he extended one of his fingers and inserted it into her moist opening. Dacey moaned in even greater enjoyment.

Gregor slid his index finger back and forth inside of Dacey. He elicited a series of erratic moans from her.

Soon, he inserted another finger. Her moans became louder and more frequent.

A third finger quickly followed the first two. By then, Dacey was moaning so hard and so much that she almost could not catch her breath.

Gregor kept the pleasure going for seven whole minutes. He could have gone much longer than that, but he figured Dacey was getting tired of mere teasing. So he stuck his fingers into her as far as they could go. Seconds later, Dacey let out a yell of relief as she hit her climax. Gregor felt the three middle fingers of his already moist right hand get soaked by her juices.

Dacey's knees were buckling, as though she was going to collapse. Gregor held her close to ensure that she would not. As she struggled to catch her breath, he withdrew his hand from his wife's smallclothes and found it covered in her secretion. Out of deviousness and curiosity, he licked his fingers.

She tasted like honey. Rather appropriate for a Bear Islander.

Within a minute, Dacey regained her composure. It was then that she decided to return the favor. She lowered her hand below Gregor's smallclothes and grasped his manhood.

Now it was Gregor's turn to moan in arousal.

When Gregor entered the bedchamber, his cock had been about six inches long. But it had been growing ever since he saw his wife naked for the first time. Currently, it was ten inches in length, and it was steadily getting bigger.

Dacey continued stroking his member for two minutes. It was pressed firmly against his smallclothes, as though it was struggling to get free.

Very soon, Gregor decided that they had had enough foreplay.

He reached down, took ahold of Dacey's wrist, and told her sternly "No more playing."

She grinned and fondled his cock a little more. Then she removed her hand and said cheekily "Alright, time to get serious."
Gregor and Dacey hastily got out of their smallclothes and tossed them aside. Then they laid onto the bed together. First they were just cuddling and kissing. Then their activities became much less innocent.

Dacey crawled on top of her husband and embraced him tightly again. She gazed lovingly into his eyes and placed an elongated kiss on his lips.

After that, Dacey giggled a bit and observed "Now the Bear conquers the Mountain."

Gregor chuckled at the jape, and he made one of his own: "This bear is welcome to go anywhere she pleases on this mountain."

Dacey smirked at that. She peered down at her husband's lower body, and she noticed his erect cock. She looked back at his eyes, grinned wickedly, and proclaimed slyly "In that case, I think I'll settle on this summit."

Oh, please do. I left my sword there. It needs a sheath.

Dacey positioned her body so that her cunt was directly over Gregor's cock. She slowly lowered herself onto it. As he entered her, he could feel the tip of his manhood making contact with her intact maidenhead. In one swift movement, he broke through it. She groaned in pain, but only for a moment. Once he was all the way in, he began to thrust.

Dacey was no longer groaning or moaning. Now she was flat-out screeching in primal excitement. The pleasure she had experienced from Gregor's fingers was trivial in comparison to this new sensation. She started bucking her hips in response to her husband's thrusting. Soon enough, their hip movements were synchronized to each other's perfectly.

They continued this pace for over twenty minutes. Every minute felt more blissful and delightful than the one before it. In that interval, Dacey experienced no fewer than three more orgasms. Gregor still had yet to hit his peak, but it was coming up on him rapidly.

Finally, Gregor gripped Dacey by her backside and shoved the full weight of his lower body up against hers. That was when she had her last orgasm. This time, he came with her. When he did, he let out a roar of triumph; a roar that sounded eerily like a battle cry. Indeed, this was like a victory, only a different type of battleground had been used.

Gregor remained inside his wife for a minute longer. He could actually feel his seed being spilt inside of her. She must have too; when her husband pulled out, she snickered playfully and scratched her abdomen.

Despite all the energy they had expended, Gregor and Dacey were only a little fatigued. They were large people; they both had an immense libido to match their stature. So they were not even close to calling it a night.

It was well after midnight when they finally exhausted themselves. They managed to go five more rounds. Somehow, each one had ended more spectacularly than the one before it. That really said something about Gregor and Dacey's prowess. They were just as strong and resilient in the bedroom as they were on the battlefield.

Needless to say, the marriage had been consummated.

When they were spent, Gregor pulled some blankets over them. He held Dacey close to him. She nuzzled him affectionately and kept one arm around his body.
Gregor pecked her on the top of her head and commented "Now the Bear settles down on the Mountain."

Dacey smiled up at him again, and she remarked "Yes, and I'm sure the Bear can rely on the Mountain to keep her warm."

He smiled back and kissed her again.

Yes, she can. He always will.

Soon after that, Lord Gregor Clegane and Lady Dacey Clegane drifted off into a peaceful slumber.
Planning Ahead

Chapter Notes

Note: Some of you may find this chapter short or uneventful. If so, I apologize. This last week has been very hectic for me. I had a project report due in one of my graduate school classes, and I had to study for a quiz in another one. I assure you that the next chapter will be more engaging. This one will mostly be a "morning after" update.

Gregor and Dacey slept until well past daybreak. They could have remained asleep even longer. But around mid-morning, there was a heavy knock on the door to the bedchamber.

The Mountain and the Bear Islander gradually started to stir. They were still a little fatigued from the activities of the previous night. After taking a minute to gain their bearings, the newlyweds looked to the door. Gregor yelled tiredly "Yes?"

"Good morning, my lord," Erryk Ruttiger's voice came from the other side. "Am I disturbing you?"

"Yes, but we can forgive you that," Gregor responded. He propped himself up in the bed and stated "After all, you must've a reason for doing so."

"I do, my lord," Erryk proclaimed, "Your family and Lady Dacey's are about to break their fast together. They were wondering if you'd join them."

Gregor was in the mood for a meal, but he could not speak for Dacey. So he turned to his new wife and waited for her input. She sat thinking for a moment, and then she shrugged and said "I suppose I can be coaxed out of this room. For a short while, at least."

She had flashed a lusty smile at her husband when she made that last statement. Gregor was amused by that response. Truthfully, he was thinking much the same as his wife. He too would have been content to just stay in the bedchamber for that whole day. Alas, that was an impossibility.

It's a shame there are no honeymoons in this universe. No conventional ones, at any rate. Oh, well. Dacey and I are already too busy to afford any time for a honeymoon, anyway.

The Mountain called out to his castellan "Alright, we'll join them."

"Aye, ser," Erryk acknowledged, "Shall I send in the maids?"

"Give us a moment first," Gregor requested.

"As you wish," Erryk conceded.

Gregor slowly rose to his feet and strode naked to the closed window. He opened the shutters, and daylight poured in, momentarily blinding the new couple. When his eyesight returned, Gregor peered outside. He noticed that the Sun was well over the eastern horizon. Curious, he looked over his shoulder and inquired "Have you the time, Erryk?"

"It's shortly after nine o'clock, my lord," the castellan informed him.
Gregor was a little surprised. He typically broke his fast an hour earlier. On any other day, he would be conversing with his council and the Legion's top officers.

Then again, he normally did not have the luxury of oversleeping. Neither did Dacey. Erryk Ruttiger would have woken them sooner, but he figured that his lord and his new lady deserved a few more hours of rest.

That was a prudent decision on his part. Because of it, Gregor and Dacey had slept very soundly that night. At the end of it, they were both fully rested. As such, they would begin their first day as husband and wife at full energy.

From that height, Gregor could spy the feasting grounds. They had not yet been disassembled. Or vacated.

Apparently, many of the guests had had too much to drink at the feast, and a number of them had not even reached their rooms or their tents before passing out. Several of them were lying unconscious around, on top of, or underneath the tables. They would be waking up before too long. They would all have a very unpleasant hangover, though.

Gregor and Dacey had avoided consuming too much wine, so they were spared the hangover. But they did have a number of aches and bruises, all of which could be attributed to the consummation of their marriage. Gregor discovered that the bear girl really had claws and fangs of her own after all.

Dacey slowly got to her feet. She was just as naked as Gregor, so she picked up one of the blankets and tied it around her waist. After that, she made her way across the room. She tried to walk steadily, but she moved with a pronounced limp. That limp would subside after a couple days, but until then, it would be a telltale sign of what she and her husband had done last night. Or rather, "who" they had done.

Dacey stood next to her husband and gazed out the window with him. She spent a minute admiring the sight of the surrounding structures and landscapes with him. It was a spectacular vantage point.

"What a view," Dacey commented.

"Indeed," Gregor conceded, wrapping his arm around his wife's waist, "Everything you see has been mine alone from the past three years. Now it's mine and yours."

Dacey smiled at that and placed a hand on Gregor's chest. He leaned down and pressed a soft kiss against his wife's lips.

When he pulled apart, he noticed that Dacey's breasts were uncovered. He deftly untied the blanket around her hips and lifted it to a position directly below her shoulders.

Dacey did not protest, but she was a little bewildered. "What are you doing?"

"Being cautious," Gregor replied as he began to retie the blanket around his wife's breasts, "If anyone down there has a far-eyes, they'll be getting an even better view than us."

Dacey snickered at that. She placed her hands over Gregor's to stop him, and she observed "From what I see, everyone down there is either unconscious or preoccupied with a task. I doubt any of them will be tilting their heads up."

Gregor took another look, and it appeared as though Dacey was correct. No one on the ground seemed to possess any interest in anything taking place above them.
Upon realizing that, Gregor scoffed and admitted Dacey had a point. As such, he let the blanket drop to the ground. Now he and Dacey were totally exposed.

Gregor pulled her close and traced her left breast with his hand. The movement was slight, but he produced the intended reaction out of her; she giggled in more than one type of pleasure.

As her husband fondled her bosom, Dacey casually allowed her own hand to drift down to his groin. She slid her fingers along the shaft of his manhood. Gregor's morning wood had passed, but Dacey's mere touch was enough to incite a hefty twitch from his member. Gregor smirked at the risqué action, and he caressed his wife's breasts a little more firmly in response.

At that, Dacey looked up at the Mountain and deviously suggested "Maybe we've time for one more round?"

As tempting as that offer was, Gregor had not forgotten that certain people were waiting on them. Reluctantly, he ceased his stroking of his wife's breasts and told her "Later, my love. Our families are expecting us to arrive soon."

"Very well, my lord," Dacey coincided, somewhat grudgingly. Despite her tense tone of voice, she understood that family affairs came before... family affairs.

The Mountain and the Bear Islander proceeded to get dressed. He slipped into a fresh tunic and a leather jerkin, along with a pair of riding boots and a pair of breeches. She dressed much the same. The only difference was she tied a green cloak around her neck. That was the only article of clothing she wore that indicated her birth house.

Dacey's wedding dress had not gotten too badly damaged in the bedding ceremony, but she chose to put it away for the time being. Gregor was hardly surprised. After all, Dacey generally preferred the typical attire of men over the customary attire of her own gender.

As they got dressed, the newlyweds surveyed the bedchamber. It honestly looked as though a tornado or an earthquake had struck it. Many objects had fallen over or gotten misplaced.

Gregor and Dacey had not confined their activities to the bed. The desk, the table, and even part of a wall were in poor condition. Even so, the bed was easily in the sorriest state. It was essentially a ruin. The sheets were covered in sweat, blood, and... other particular fluids. The supports had given out, as well. The slightest nudge could have caused the foundation to collapse. The mattress was in danger of splitting open.

"We'll be needing a new bed," Dacey noted cheekily.

"Quite so," Gregor concurred, smirking, "We'll worry on that later."

"Right," she said bluntly.

Once they were dressed, Gregor walked to the door and unlocked it. He opened the door to allow the maids entrance to the chamber. Other than the occasional murmuring of "milord," they said nothing. But their facial expressions spoke plenty. When they saw what their lord and his wife had done, they blushed furiously.

Gregor and Dacey were somewhat mortified to have the results of their intimate deeds on display. But they tried not to let their discomfort show; it would not have been "professional." So as their servants worked on cleaning the room up, the Lord and Lady of Moat Cailin headed down the stairs of the Lord's Tower.
They made their way to the Banquet Tower (another of the eleven that had been reconstructed). On their way there, every person they encountered bowed their heads to them and muttered "milord" and "milady." They also received many more congratulations on their marriage.

When they arrived in the Great Hall, they saw that the Cleganes and the Mormonts were all there. They were seated on the dais. The seats of honor were empty. Lord Jorah, Lady Maege, and her three youngest daughter sat to the left of them; Lady Daliah and her two youngest children to the right.

"Look who finally woke up," Sandor commented drily when his brother and sister-by-law approached the dais.

Gregor and Dacey chuckled and took their places at the center of the dais.

As breakfast was served, Ellyn let out a loud yawn. Even after that, she seemed very fatigued. Gregor looked over to his sister and noted "You look tired, Ell."

"Well, I didn't get a lot of sleep last night, Greg," Ellyn wearily revealed.

"Why not?" Dacey inquired.

"Probably because somebody was making a lot of noise," Ellyn mumbled irately.

Gregor and Dacey flushed at that and looked away. Daliah tapped her daughter on the shoulder and murmured crossly "Ellie!"

"She's got a point, my lady," Alysane Mormont stated, looking to her elder sister and her brother-by-law. She said jokingly "Have either of you heard of volume control by any chance?"

"We have, Aly," Dacey insisted, "It's just… well, from higher ground, it's easier for sound to carry in this fortress."

"Yes, and the bedchamber of the Lord's Tower is the highest point in all the moat," Gregor claimed, going along with his wife's argument.

"Whatever you say," Sandor murmured. Clearly, he was not buying that story. "I envy the drunk guests, though. They're the only ones who found sleep easily last night."

"Okay, enough!" Gregor shouted, starting to become impatient, "We're about to break our fast. This is hardly an appropriate topic to discuss at the table."

"Indeed," Jorah Mormont agreed.

No more was spoken on anyone's sex life. Everyone opted to focus more on eating instead. But they did not break their fast in silence. They spoke on family affairs and similar matters.

Jorah Mormont, his aunt, and his cousins would return to Bear Island in a few days. Daliah Clegane and her children would be travelling back to Clegane's Keep in about a week. Lady Daliah privately mentioned to her son that she expected to be informed within the next three months that she would soon be a grandmother. Gregor assured her that he would "endeavor" to fulfill her "wish."

Gregor's mother had been so preoccupied with wedding preparations that she hardly had any time to speak to her son of what had gone on back home. Luckily, this meal provided an opportunity for them to converse on the subject.
Gregor was aware of recent events in the Westerlands, but apart from the letters he exchanged with them, his knowledge of his family's activities was very limited. The only Legionnaires who had once been retainers of Clegane's Keep were the ones that had accompanied Gregor north.

Ever since Gregor left, House Clegane of Clegane's Keep had thrived. Ser Tarrence had not wasted those seven thousand golden dragons. Through them, the Keep had been refurbished, the household had been expanded, and their knights had multiplied in number.

They had also succeeded in gaining favor with Lord Tywin Lannister. Apparently, Sandor had been taken on as a squire by the liege lord of the Westerlands. Lord Tywin had plans to knight Sandor soon. Furthermore, during his time at Casterly Rock, Sandor got along very well with Tyrion Lannister. That was what really caught Gregor's interest.

Sandor claimed that recently, he and Ser Jaime had helped Tyrion save a young girl from a group of rapists. That must have been Tysha.

Sandor recounted how he had prevented Lord Tywin or Ser Jaime from discovering Tyrion's relationship with Tysha. He had also talked Tyrion out of his idea to marry Tysha. He had argued to the dwarf that if the marriage was discovered, not only would Lord Tywin have it annulled, but he would have his own men treat Tysha like a common whore just to teach his younger son a lesson.

Gregor was impressed that his brother had given such superb advice. However, Sandor admitted that it was mostly Gregor's advice that he had given to Tyrion. Thanks to his brother's guidance, Sandor had developed a more practical and realistic view of the world. So indirectly, Gregor had spared Tyrion a dreadful instance of his father's cruelty.

There was even talk of raising House Clegane of Clegane's Keep to lordly status.

Gregor was surprised that he had not heard any of this yet. He also found himself more than a little concerned. Before he moved to Moat Cailin, Lord Tywin had forced the Mountain to sever all his familial connections to the Westerlands. Tywin was infamous for judging an entire family on the actions of each member. Gregor had lost Lord Tywin's trust, and maybe his respect, too. As such, his sudden interest in Gregor's family was as startling as it was unsettling.

Perhaps Tywin was merely using them as insurance against Gregor in case the Mountain became too powerful. Maybe if the Legion without Banners clashed with Casterly Rock for whatever reason, Tywin would order Sandor to be killed. The lion lord certainly had the means to execute his brother. He also had the means to wipe out the occupants of Clegane's Keep if he wished. He had brought about the downfall of House Reyne and House Tarbeck without any hesitation or remorse, and both of those houses had been much larger than House Clegane.

In any case, Gregor decided to push all his qualms about Tywin Lannister's motivations to the back of his mind. Instead of preaching worries, he expressed his happiness for his family's endurance and prosperity.

Gregor also learned that his parents were trying to forge marriage contracts for Sandor and Ellyn. Currently, Lady Daliah was considering making a match between her daughter and Raynald Westerling. Gregor was very displeased by that idea, and he let his mother know it. He pointed out that House Westerling was one of the smallest houses in the Westerlands, and its power and influence was lesser than House Clegane's had ever been. Gregor contended that his parents could do much better for his sister than the heir of the Crag.
When Gregor asked Sandor if he was involved in any potential betrothals, all the younger Clegane boy told his brother was "Not as of now." He actually seemed unwilling to speak on the subject. That made Gregor suspicious. The way he saw it, there could only be one of two reasons for his brother's avoidance of the topic. Either Sandor did not wish to talk about marriage in general, or he was secretly considering a match for himself but did not wish to talk about it for fear of rejection.

Whatever his motive, Gregor agreed to drop the issue.

Sandor was the first one to finish his meal. Once his plate was clean and his goblet empty, he rose from his chair, climbed down from the dais, and remarked "If you'll excuse me."

"Where you off to?" Gregor queried.

"The training yard," Sandor answered him.

Gregor nodded at that and offered "I can join you, if you need a partner."

"Thanks, Greg," Sandor said appreciatively, "But I already have one. Two, actually."

The younger Clegane boy then left the Great Hall without another word spoken. There was a smirk on Sandor's face which did not go unnoticed by Gregor. Dacey had worn a similar expression last night, just before the bedding.

Gregor watched his brother leave, and then he asked no one in particular "What did he mean?"

"Not long after the bedding ceremony, I saw Sandor with a couple of girls," Ellyn explained, "I think they were Dornishwomen."

"Is that right?" Gregor asked his mother.

Lady Daliah nodded and apprised her firstborn "He talked with them for the better part of an hour. When he finally rejoined us, he said that he and those girls would be meeting in the training yard after breakfast today. Evidently, they share a fondness for combat. Isn't that quaint?"

"Well, in Dorne, men and women are equals in everything," Dacey disclosed, "Including the ways of war. That's one thing the North has in common with the Dornish."

"I already knew the Legion accepted women," Daliah stated, "But these Dornishwomen must be quite proficient if they're willing to spar with Sandor."

"Did he say who they were?" Dacey inquired.

"No, but they looked like sisters," Ellyn recounted, "Half-sisters, at least. They were a little younger than Sandor, but a few years older than me."

That information was enough for Dacey and Gregor to figure out who Ellyn had seen with Sandor. The Mountain pronounced "I know them both. Their names are Obara and Nymeria Sand."

Ellyn simply nodded at that, but Daliah frowned. She assumed "You mean they're baseborn?"

"Yes," Gregor professed, "But as it happens, they're the two eldest daughters of Prince Oberyn Martell."

"His two eldest bastard daughters," Daliah remarked with a grimace.

While Daliah Clegane was normally a very tolerant person, she held the typical Westerosi disdain for children born out of wedlock. Especially when such individuals interacted with her unwed teenage son. Gregor could forgive her that bias; everyone had at least one flaw.

Still, he did not need that form of prejudice in Moat Cailin. Gregor sighed and stated quietly "Mother, a person's birth may denote their place in this world, but it should not influence how they are judged or treated. It certainly does not matter in the Legion without Banners. Bastards are just as valuable and useful here as people of legitimate birth. Besides, Sandor is just clashing steel with Obara and Nymeria. Just because he's exchanging blows with them, that doesn't mean he'll want to exchange vows, too."

Daliah reflected on her son's words. After a few seconds of silence, she murmured "I suppose you're right, Gregor. If I offended anyone, please know I am sorry."

"You needn't apologize, Mother," Gregor asserted, "I cannot fault you for your speaking your mind, or for believing what you were raised to believe. All I ask is that you respect what I believe. And I believe everyone – baseborn and trueborn – should be given a chance to prove themselves."

Daliah smiled at her elder son. Even if she did not share his ideals on the issue of one's birth, she was proud of Gregor for having them.

When breakfast was finished, the Cleganes and the Mormonts headed downstairs as a single group. By this time, all the drunken guests had regained consciousness. Many could be seen clutching their foreheads or retching on bare patches of grass. The Mountain, his wife, and their families made sure to avoid any such individuals.

Ser Jorah went to check up on those of his men that had accompanied him to the wedding. Lady Maege led Alysane, Lyra, and Jorelle back to their quarters. Lady Daliah and Ellyn got the idea to explore the fortress. Gregor offered them a guide, but they assured him that they could find their own way around the moat.

So Gregor and Dacey were on their own once more. Or alone as they could have been whilst outside and surrounded by scores of guests and fellow Legionnaires.

They had nothing on their immediate agenda. They decided to go on a short walk around the moat. They passed a number of different areas, including the kitchens, the arsenal, the barracks, and the harbor.

About twenty minutes in, they stopped by the training yard. Gregor expected to find his brother there.

Sure enough, Sandor was still in the training yard. He was armed with a longsword. Obara Sand and Nymeria Sand were there with him. They carried their trademark spear and whip respectively.

Obara and Nymeria were too young to be fully inducted into the Legion without Banners. Obara was fourteen; Nymeria thirteen. In a sense, they were mostly Legionnaires-in-training. So for the time-being, Gregor had them serve as squires to the other top officers of the Legion. Sometimes they even squired under their father.

Despite their youth, both girls were very adept in combat situations. Gregor and Dacey said nothing as they entered the training yard. They merely stood by and observed the skirmish between the heir to Clegane's Keep and the two eldest Sand Snakes.

Sandor was more dexterous with his bastard sword than either of the Sand Snakes were with her weapon. He dueled each of them separately. He was able to defeat Obara in five minutes. Nymeria, he defeated in three. Alone, neither girl stood a chance. Then he dueled both of them at once. That was when they made a comeback.

After parrying Obara and Nymeria's simultaneous attacks for four minutes, Sandor rammed his weight against Obara. She fell to the ground and laid still. He appeared to have subdued her.

Sandor focused his attention exclusively on Nymeria for the next two minutes. Just when he was about to best her, Obara reentered the fray. She thrust her spear underneath Sandor's legs. He stumbled over it and nearly tripped. Before he could regain his balance, Nymeria coiled her whip around the wrist of his free hand and yanked with all her might.

As a result, Sandor ended up flat on his back. When he attempted to get back up, Obara stood over him. She held the tip of her spear directly above his chin, as though she meant to plunge it into his throat. Nymeria slowly went over to her half-sister and stood beside her. The two of them gazed down at their opponent, expecting some form of response from him.

Sandor remained on the ground for about fifteen seconds. Then he let out a deep sigh and muttered adversely "I yield."

Obara smirked and withdrew her spear. Then she and Nymeria helped Sandor back to his feet.

Gregor was impressed. Working together, the two Sand Snakes had managed to bring down the boy who would be the Hound. Whereas alone, they would not have stood a chance.

Although he was annoyed about having lost, Sandor's grimace was quickly replaced with an amiable grin. He eagerly proposed "Again?"

"Anytime you wish," Obara declared happily

"Yeah, we could kick your ass all day," Nymeria stated slyly.

"Kick it or kiss it?" Sandor cheekily countered.

"Whichever you'd prefer," Obara leered.

"Either one's fine with us," Nymeria claimed jokingly.

"It'd be fine with me, too," Sandor disclosed.

Gregor was amused by this exchange of dialogue. He was also a little intrigued. There was clearly some type of chemistry between Sandor and the two Sand Snakes.

Of course, he was used to seeing that type of benign interaction between the Legionnaires. However, Sandor was not a member of the Legion, and Obara and Nymeria were still pending members.

In other words, Gregor was witnessing firsthand proof that even total strangers from outside the Legion could find some way to coexist with each other. They could have seemingly little in common, but whatever facets they did share could be used to unite them.

In the case of Sandor, Obara, and Nymeria, it was their fondness for armed combat and their competitive nature that brought them together. That was the most fascinating aspects. Those were two subjects that normally drove people apart. But not here.

That made Gregor wonder…
He turned to his wife and proposed "Dacey, what say we have another meeting?"

The Bear Islander looked up at her husband and asked "What about?"

"Well…” Gregor did not really wish to discuss what was on his mind until the other eight members of his secret council were present. Instead, he pointed out the three people in the training yard and stated "This, I suppose."

Dacey raised an eyebrow and presumed "You want to tell the others how your brother got his ass handed to him by Obara and Nymeria?"

"No, no, no," Gregor bluntly disclosed, shaking his head and scoffing, "I want to tell them that in spite of how they beat him, the three of them are getting along famously."

"Alright…” Dacey was still a little perplexed, "If you do not mind my asking, Gregor, how is that noteworthy?"

"I don't intend for this relationship between Sandor and the Sand Snakes to be the sole talking point," Gregor enlightened her, "It'll just be buildup to the true topic of discussion. You see, there's a certain issue I've been planning to address for a while now. I figure today would be as good a time as any."

"Why today?" Dacey inquired.

He smiled down at her and stated "Because it also has to do with our relationship."

Dacey assumed that remark was meant to be flattering. While she did find it so, she was hoping for a little more clarity.

She did not even have to ask for any before Gregor elaborated with: "Specifically, the political advantages of our marriage. There won't be any discussion on the personal or intimate aspects of our relationship, if you were wondering."

"That's a relief," Dacey commented. After a bit of silence, she scoffed and observed "Of course, I doubt we'd have to tell anyone about our personal or intimate life, anyway. Given the number of people who heard us last night…"

Gregor chuckled and said wryly "The whole damn moat probably knows that by now."

Dacey gave a nod of agreement. Then she gazed back up at the Mountain and told him "Very well, Gregor. Let's see if we can find the others."

"Yes, let's," Gregor conceded. At that, he and his wife went to locate the eight men who had assisted them in the assassination of Petyr Baelish.

As they exited the training yard, Gregor heard Obara make some sly remark about Sandor's sword, and how she was "drawn" to it. Based on the context of her statement, the sword she was referring to was not the blade in his hand.
It took around an hour for Gregor and Dacey to assemble the secret council. However, only half of that time was spent searching for the other members. The other half was spent adding a new one.

Before they went to gather the others, Dacey pointed out how Gregor intended for the secret council to be represented by the nine regions of Westeros equally. Gregor was the only one of the ten who could be totally impartial; the other nine spoke exclusively for his or her homeland.

Although Dacey was a Northerner through and through, she argued that her new relationship with Gregor might cause her to develop a bias in his favor. That would certainly complicate the integrity of the council's decision-making process.

Truthfully, Gregor had thought much the same. Thankfully, he already had plans to rectify that problem. The solution to the dilemma was quite simple; he elected to bring another Northerner into the fold.

Dacey would remain on the secret council. From then on, she would speak for both the Legion without Banners and the North. However, she would not be the official spokesperson for the North. That duty would go to the new recruit.

Gregor had already chosen who that person would be. The individual in question was Smalljon Umber, eldest son of Greatjon Umber, Lord of Last Hearth.

Smalljon had joined the Legion a few months beforehand. When first he came, he implied that he would only be there for a short time. His original motive was that he just wanted to experience the lifestyle of a Legionnaire. Overtime, however, he found the lifestyle to be very rewarding and honorable. So he elected to stay on. He even claimed that he would be content to serve in the Legion until his father died. Which, he added, would hopefully not be for a long time.

Gregor and Dacey found Smalljon out in the camps that adjoined the feasting grounds. He was breaking his fast with his father and their retainers. Most of the men seemed very hungover. However, neither the Greatjon nor his son were. To some, that may have been strange. Both of them had drunk plenty at the feast, yet they were as sober as a septon.

Gregor was not surprised. As he recalled, Umbers were infamous for holding their alcohol. That was fortunate; he needed Smalljon to have a clear head right then.

When Gregor and Dacey approached the table, Greatjon stood up and greeted them exuberantly. Smalljon also greeted them, though not as boisterously. Words of congratulations were given to the new couple, and the words were accepted by the new couple graciously.

Before the pleasantries evolved into an actual conversation, Gregor singled out Smalljon and asked if he would accompany him and Dacey someplace. They were very vague in their request, but luckily for them, the heir to Last Hearth did not seem particularly curious as to their reasons for wanting to speak with him. He did not ask them any questions or for any specifics.

He simply needed a minute to clean his plate and drain his flagon of ale. Then he rose from his chair and followed the newlyweds back into Moat Cailin.

Once back inside the moat, Gregor and Dacey took Smalljon to a private room. There they apprised him of what was going on. They explained to him that Gregor had formed a clandestine task force. The task force's primary goal was the same as that of the Legion without Banners: to ensure the survival and ultimate unification of all Westeros. The difference was that the task force would accomplish this objective through more extreme methods.

When he asked for an example of the "methods," they filled Smalljon in on their recent business in the Vale.

They informed him that Lord Petyr Baelish's death had not been an accident. They confessed to Smalljon that their whole reason for going to the Vale was to assassinate Littlefinger. In fact, with the aid of Lord Varys, the task force had orchestrated the events leading up to the mockingbird's demise.

When they finished with their recollection, Smalljon appeared a little alarmed. But if he was, it was because he was intrigued, not because he was repulsed. He actually admired all the effort and care that was put into the operation to kill Baelish.

From a moral standpoint, Smalljon was relatively unfazed. He had heard the tale of how Baelish had fought a duel with Brandon Stark and lost badly. He felt the Wild Wolf had been too merciful. Smalljon was also aware of the false claims Littlefinger had made about taking the maidenheads of both of Hoster Tully's girls. That was enough to make him dislike Baelish. When he learned that the mockingbird had exploited Lysa Arryn and intended to seize power at the expense of those around him, that gave Smalljon assurances that Littlefinger had gotten what he deserved.

Gregor and Dacey were pleased by Smalljon's conviction. He seemed to share their ideals. That convinced them that he was the right person for the job.

It was there that Gregor and Dacey told Smalljon of a spot that had opened up on the secret council. With Dacey's marriage to Gregor, they argued that the North needed another representative. As such, they wished for Smalljon to occupy that position. Almost immediately, he accepted the proposition.

The trio subsequently travelled around the moat and located Lyn Corbray, Victarion Greyjoy, Garth Hightower, Osmund Kettleback, Gerion Lannister, Oberyn Martell, Allard Seaworth, and Brynden Tully. At the end of the hour, all eleven of them were assembled in the council chambers.

Gregor waited for his companions to sit down at the circular table. Once they were all seated, he took his place in the largest chair.

Victarion started the dialogue with a question: "So, who dies next?"

"That's not the subject of this meeting," Gregor replied candidly.

Allard Seaworth cocked his head and muttered "It's not?"

"No," Gregor disclosed, "Littlefinger was the only immediate threat to the security of Westeros. But I promise you; there will be others. In time, we will conspire to eliminate all of the most callous people in this country. Today, however, we will devote to unifying the country through a more passive method."

Gerion Lannister leaned forward and stated "What method would that be, my lord?"

Gregor did not reply right away. Instead, he slowly looked around at his colleagues. He studied each of their faces closely. All of them shared Gerion's curiosity and interest. That was a clear indication that he had their full attention.

Gregor folded his arms and declared "I believe that family is the strongest form of unity. It should be, in any case. I know there are some who would disagree. They'd be the ones who have persistent domestic problems. But they're a minority. The majority of the people in this country would agree that family should always come first. For that reason, the best alliances are those that are formed through marriage."

He paused for a moment, and then he drily commented "Of course, you already know that.
Throughout the Seven Kingdoms, it's common knowledge that marriage is the start of many an alliance. But the scope and longevity of the alliance can vary, depending on the origins of the bride and groom."

At that, Gregor turned to Dacey and reached his hand out to her. Even she was uncertain what Gregor was doing, but she went along with her husband's act. So she tentatively took his hand in hers. As she did this, she smiled at him amorously. He smiled back, and then he looked around at the others nine men. As unprofessional as this display of affection may have been, they said nothing about it.

Gregor continued holding Dacey's hand, and he announced "For centuries, marriage has been used to strengthen all the houses in all nine regions of the realm. The majority of the marriages typically occur within each region; between the Great Houses and their vassals. There have been exceptions, though. Several of which were quite recent. Robert Baratheon wed Cersei Lannister. Eddard Stark and Jon Arryn wed Catelyn and Lysa Tully respectively. Stannis Baratheon wed Selyse Florent.
Gregor Forrester wed Elissa Branfield. Doran Martell even wed Mellario of Norvos. And I, a Westerlander by birth, wed Dacey Mormont just last night."

Prince Rhaegar Targaryen also wed both Princess Elia Martell and Lady Lyanna Stark. But it's best not to mention that for… a multitude of reasons.

Dacey beamed with pride when Gregor made that last point. No one could blame her for looking so smug. After all, her marriage to the Mountain had solidified his status as a Northman, and it emphasized the range of House Mormont.

"Pardon my forwardness, my lord," Osmund Kettleback remarked, "But where are you going with this?"

Gregor gave a smug smirk and elucidated "Consider this: between the eleven of us, we have connections to all nine of the Great Families. All of those connections exist through blood, through marriage, or through both. I propose that we endeavor to establish similar connections between the Great Houses."

Dacey and the men seemed intrigued by that idea. Lyn Corbray stated assumingly "I believe I know where you are heading with this, my lord. You plan to use our connections to convince the Great Houses to join together. Ideally, this will be done by marrying their children to each other."

"Correct," Gregor affirmed. He then let go of Dacey's hand and pronounced "House Arryn and House Baratheon of Storm's End currently have no heirs to speak of. Not by their current lords, at any rate. Until recently, the same detriment applied to the Royal House Baratheon. Although King Robert now has a son, it is not our place to decide whom the crown prince will marry. That is the king's prerogative. So we shall disregard those three houses for now."

Half the people in the room gave a mere nod of acknowledgment to that point. The other half just sat still and listened.

Gregor continued with "Meanwhile, House Greyjoy, House Lannister, House Martell, House Stark, House Tully, and House Tyrell all have heirs of their own. Most of the heirs are relatively young. It is likely that their parents have yet to consider any marriage contracts for them. We should take advantage of that."

"What would you suggest?" Smalljon Umber inquired.

"Could we have an example?" Oberyn Martell questioned.

At that, Gregor turned to the Reachman in the room and called out to him "Garth."

"Yes, my lord?" Garth Hightower queried, leaning forward.

"How close are you to your second eldest sister?" Gregor asked.

Garth was a little stunned that such a personal question had been presented to him. Even so, he shrugged, smiled softly, and proclaimed "Truthfully, Alerie is probably my favorite sibling. Which says something; I have nine."

"That's fortunate," Gregor commented, also smiling, "As it happens, your favorite sibling is wed to your liege lord."

"That's true," Garth admitted, a note of perplexity in his tone.

Gregor then pointed out "As you're well-aware, Lord Mace and Lady Alerie have four children together."

"Indeed," Garth avowed, "Willas is ten, Garlan is nine, Loras is four, and Margaery is three."

Gregor gave another nod of acknowledgment and declared "Meanwhile, Lord Eddard Stark and his wife Lady Catelyn have a son and a daughter. Robb is three and Sansa was born just this year. Notice that Lord Robb is roughly the same age as Lady Margaery."

Immediately, Garth – and most of the others – knew where this was going. The Reachman presumed "So you suggest forging a betrothal between them?"

Gregor solemnly nodded in confirmation. He debated "Apart from the Legion without Banners, what do the North and the Reach have in common? The answer is almost nothing. All the same, they have much to offer each other. The North is easily the largest and hardiest of the Seven Kingdoms, but much of it is empty and desolate. At the same time, the Reach is the most productive – and probably most affluent – of the Seven Kingdoms, but outside its borders, it has very little standing or domain. A union between Winterfell and Highgarden could remedy both of their problems."

Garth sat thinking on those points for a minute. After that, he thought aloud "There is still some tension between the North and the Reach from Robert's Rebellion. The joining of House Stark and House Tyrell could extinguish that tension. Apart from that… I can see the rewards of such a union. It would be quite practical for a betrothal to be formed between Robb and Margaery."

"Would your sister consent to the match?" Gregor queried.

"If I suggested it to her, she would be open to it," Garth asserted, "However, I cannot guarantee she will agree to it."

"But you can convince her to at least consider it?" Gregor assumed.

"Certainly," Garth stated, "Alerie is not the one you should worry about, my lord. That would be Lord Mace Tyrell. My sister's husband is quite ambitious."

"I know," Gregor remarked, "It is no secret that Lord Mace would lunge at the chance to wed his daughter to the crown prince, just so his grandson would be king. Luckily, there is a factor that is outside of his control."

"What would that be?" Smalljon Umber asked.

"I've heard tell Alerie Tyrell's goodmother is just as ambitious as her husband," Gregor disclosed,
"But unlike Lord Mace, Lady Olenna Tyrell has a better understanding of what is realistically within her grasp. And if what I've heard is true, she is the actual head of her house. So if we approach her instead of her son, there is a much greater likelihood that the betrothal will be taken seriously."

Garth thought on that, and then he rubbed his temple, saying "I cannot deny Lady Olenna's hold over Lord Mace. Even when her husband Lord Luthor was alive, she was the primary voice of authority in Highgarden. It is not without just cause that she is called the Queen of Thorns."

"A prickly woman," Oberyn Martell noted.

That earned a few scoffs from the others. Gregor paid the jibe no mind. He simply kept his gaze on the Reachman and proposed "As politically ruthless as Olenna Tyrell is, do you believe she can be swayed to consider the match between her granddaughter and Lord Stark's firstborn son?"

"Definitely," Garth Hightower pronounced, "My word may not carry much weight with her, but my experiences in the Legion would give credence to the matter. During my time at Moat Cailin, I have come to greatly respect the North and its inhabitants. Lord Eddard is an honorable man; a much better liege lord than the one I have. His son and my niece would make an excellent couple."

"Then what say we try to make the betrothal happen?" Gregor suggested.

Garth nodded once more, and he declared "After this meeting, I'll send a raven to Highgarden, detailing everything we discussed. Lord Mace may wish to refuse the proposal, but his mother and my sister are reasonable people. Again, I cannot promise the betrothal will be made, but it will be heavily considered."

"That is all I ask," Gregor asserted.

"Just a moment," Brynden Tully interjected, "Even if Highgarden agrees to the match, what assurance do you have Winterfell will, too?"

Gregor smirked and dryly responded "For that, I look to you, Ser Brynden."

The Blackfish raised an eyebrow and said "I'm afraid I do not understand."

Gregor leaned closer to the oldest man at the table and told him "I believe you are the most influential person in this room. You are the only one here who has a direct relation to three of the Great Houses."

"I am?" Brynden murmured, clearly bewildered.

Gregor elaborated with "Your nieces married into House Stark and House Arryn; your nephew is the heir of House Tully. Your brother's children tie you to the North, the Vale, and the Riverlands.
Furthermore, you are on fair terms with all three of them. That implies you may have some amount of sway over them. So long as you do not abuse that sway, you have a voice in Winterfell, the Eyrie, and Riverrun. So there; you have three connections. No one else here can claim that."

That was a very accurate statement. As it turned out, Allard Seaworth, Osmund Kettleback, Lyn Corbray, Smalljon Umber, Dacey Mormont, and Gregor Clegane had no blood or marital ties to any of the Great Houses. Oberyn Martell, Garth Hightower, and Victarion Greyjoy each had ties to one Great House (House Martell, House Tyrell, and House Greyjoy respectively).

Technically, Ser Gerion Lannister had some degree of relation to three Great Houses, but only two of them – House Lannister and the Royal House Baratheon – were by blood. His connection to House Baratheon of Storm's End only existed because of his niece's marriage to the King. The connection was a very weak one, and not just because of how distant it was. Stannis Baratheon was not known for being very fond of his own family, so it was unlikely that he would bother listening to or negotiating with his family-by-law, either. Especially when said family-by-law were Lannisters.

If anything, of all the people in the council chambers, Allard Seaworth had the closest connection to the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands, as his father Ser Davos Seaworth was one of Stannis Baratheon's most trusted vassals. All the same, Gregor knew it would be unwise to ask Stannis for too many favors, even if done through the Onion Knight's second son.

So Brynden Tully was the only one who had direct ties to three Great Houses. Additionally, his nieces and nephew had idolized him in their youth; they continued to adore and respect him in their adulthood.

Brynden rested his chin on his hand and remarked "I suppose I could be of assistance to you, Lord Gregor. Catelyn will listen to any wise counsel I give her. While Lord Eddard only wed her out of obligation, they have come to care for each other deeply. He even had a sept built in Winterfell for her. If I passed along the idea of a betrothal between my great nephew and Mace Tyrell's daughter to Catelyn, she can convince her husband to consider it, too. After all, Eddard married outside of the North. No reason his son cannot do the same."

"Would you mind sending a raven to Winterfell after we adjourn?" Gregor asked hopefully.

"I will do so," Brynden proclaimed, "But like Ser Garth, I cannot promise you that Lord or Lady Stark will agree to the match."

"I understand," Gregor asserted, "Worry not; all I ask if that you present the idea of the match to them. That by itself is acceptable."

At that moment, Gregor stood up and sternly announced "With that said, I must be clear on one point. There will be no forcing of betrothals upon the Great Families. None whatsoever. All we can do is give them recommendations and hope that they will agree to them. Other than bits of neighborly advice, we have no say in the contracts they actually make for their children."

"I very much agree with the notion," Gerion Lannister remarked.

"As do I," Garth Hightower declared, "It would do us no good to overstep our authority."

"Or our family bonds," Dacey Mormont added in.

Gregor was pleased that everyone understood the boundaries of their activities. What they were essentially doing was playing at matchmaker for the realm. They would contemplate ideal matches between the heirs of the Great Families based on political, economic, and social benefits to all involved parties, and then they would deliver those suggestions to the heads of the respective Great Houses. Once the suggestions were given, they would just wait for the Great Lords to make their decision.

The rest of the meeting was spent discussing various possible marriage contracts between the highborn children of the current generation in Westeros.

Gregor made the majority of the recommendations. Among the matches he proposed were ones between Quentyn Martell and Sansa Stark, between Garlan Tyrell and Arianne Martell, between Edmure Tully and Cerenna Lannister, and between Tyrion Lannister and Asha Greyjoy.

The match he had the most hope for was still the one between Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell. In his mind, they were perhaps the couple best-suited to govern the realm when neither the man nor the woman was Targaryen. All the same, he was certain that by the time the Long Night arrived, the Targaryens would be back on the throne. As long as Robb and Margaery could unite the North and the Reach, Gregor was content with that.

There were a couple matches Gregor thought to be appealing, but due to certain circumstances, he chose not to mention them. For instance, he contemplated a marriage contract between Willas Tyrell and Rhaenys Targaryen. Of course, other than Prince Oberyn, no one there knew that Princess Rhaenys was still alive. She and Lyanna Stark were still being hosted at Greywater Watch, and they would remain there until it was deemed safe to emerge from the Neck.

Unlike her brother and half-brother, Rhaenys was not being raised to believe she was someone else. While Aegon and Jon would be brought up thinking they were bastards, Lyanna would feed no such lies to Rhaegar Targaryen's eldest child.

Because of that, when Rhaenys was of age, Gregor could risk sending a messenger to Greywater Watch. Since her father was dead and her mother had no more part in her upbringing, Rhaenys had full say over whom she would wed. Even so, she would never forget her duty to her family and the realm. So she would be more than willing to consider wedding the heir to Highgarden.

Of course, Willas would have to wait a great deal longer to learn of this possible contract. Gregor believed he would be a good man. Still, there would be no safe way to present it to him without tipping off his father, his mother, or his grandmother. Although the Tyrells had supported the Targaryens during Robert's Rebellion, Gregor could not yet ascertain that they would support the dragons' return to Westeros. Until he knew where the Reach stood on that issue, he would keep the concept of a betrothal between Willas and Rhaenys to himself.

Near the end of the meeting, Lyn Corbray brought up a point that probably should have been addressed early on. When all eyes were on him, he contended "There is one severe limitation to all this scheming. Between all the Great Houses, there are at least two males to every female."

That captured everyone's interest. Smalljon Umber appeared baffled. He inquired "What does that mean?"

"What I mean is there are not enough female heirs to go around," Lyn clarified, "Even if you account for first and second cousins of the immediate heirs, there are still far more males."

"I'm not surprised that you were the one to notice that," Victarion Greyjoy scathingly murmured.

That incited a number of scoffs from the others. Lyn did not mind the slight. He just smirked and wryly retorted "An advantage of my 'preference.'"

"Actually, Ser Lyn is correct," Brynden Tully pointed out, "House Greyjoy and House Tyrell both have three male heirs and one female. House Stark and House Martell both currently have one apiece. House Tully's only available heir is male. House Lannister has more heirs than I care to count, most of them male. No offense, Ser Gerion."

"None taken, Ser Brynden," Gerion Lannister assured the older knight, grinning.

"This could be a problem," Osmund Kettleback muttered, "It may be the sons who inherit. But without the daughters, the sons are stuck with the inheritance."

"I'm assuming these 'sons' and 'daughters' you speak of are from different families," Oberyn Martell cockily remarked.

That drew a short round of laughter from around the table.

"Unless they're Targaryen," Smalljon Umber cheekily added in.

More laughter. After the last snicker faded away, Gregor declared "Luckily, there is still a potential solution to this dilemma."

He turned to the Dornishman and told him "A solution which you have the capacity to provide, Prince Oberyn."

"How might I do that?" Oberyn enquired curiously.

"You have five female bastards and counting," Gregor explicated, "If need be, we could petition the king to legitimize a few of your daughters. Then they would be just as suitable for marriage contracts as any trueborn children. It would not even out the ratio of free male to female heirs in the Great Houses straightaway, but it would go a long way to improving it."

"Yes, this a feasible approach," Oberyn admitted. He then grew a wicked grin and wittily claimed "However... there's a chance that only three of my daughters will be available for certain. It would appear your brother is already quite taken with my two eldest."

Most everyone there seemed either stunned or bewildered by that revelation. Gregor himself was a little surprised, but only because he did not entirely expect Oberyn to be aware of Sandor's interaction with Obara and Nymeria. As far as Gregor knew, only Ellyn and Lady Daliah had seen them together.

After a little silence, Gregor scoffed and muttered assumingly "So, you saw them together last night, too?"

"Oh, it did not start last night," Oberyn disclosed. When he saw the look of bafflement on the Mountain's face, the prince's grin lengthened and he proclaimed "You've been so preoccupied with arranging your wedding that you were blind to what other people have been up to, my lord. In the fortnight since your family arrived at Moat Cailin, Sandor has spent most of his waking hours with Obara and Nymeria, as have they with him."

"Is that right?" Gregor asked rhetorically.

Oberyn nodded his head, and Gregor rubbed his temple, evidently intrigued. He thought aloud "Peculiar. The first time I saw them all together was this morning in the training yard. They were having a friendly bout. Or what could pass as a friendly bout."

"Who was winning?" Oberyn queried eagerly.
"Hard to say," Gregor recounted, "He beat each of them separately, but when they teamed up, they managed to knock him on his ass. In any case, the fighting never became too heated between them. You may be interested to learn that that's the reason I called this meeting."

"You called this meeting because your brother and Prince Oberyn's daughters were having a swordfight?" Osmund Kettleback supposed.

"No, I called it because even in the midst of combat, my brother and the Sand Snakes clearly admired and respected each other," Gregor clarified, "Outside of the North and Dorne, women are not generally permitted to brandish weapons or adorn armor. Nor are they taken seriously as soldiers. The Westerlands in particular clings to that outdated view of women. Yet my brother Sandor has overcome that prejudice. Furthermore, Sandor is very competitive by nature, as are Obara and Nymeria Sand. One would think that facet would drive them apart. Instead, it has brought them together. That led me to think… if three quick-tempered non-Legionnaire strangers can find common ground through sparring, it is reasonable to assume that the rest of the realm can come together through more peaceable means."

"There is logic in that observation, my lord," Allard Seaworth admitted.

"Quite so," Garth Hightower concurred.

Victarion Greyjoy appeared somewhat dubious. He furrowed his brow and presumed skeptically "Do you mean to tell us that all the probable marriage contracts that were discussed at this meeting were conceived by you today?"

"No, I actually thought them up a long while ago," Gregor expounded, "I was simply waiting for the most opportune moment to share them with the rest of you. The sight of my brother Sandor dueling with Obara and Nymeria merely convinced me that now was the proper time to proceed."

"I can see how you would be led to believe that, my lord," Brynden Tully pronounced, "But dueling is one thing. Marriage contracts are another entirely. Are you certain you should take the skirmish between your brother and the Sand Snakes as a sign that betrothals between houses belonging to different regions are liable to happen?"

"Well, I would interpret it as such," Oberyn Martell debated, brandishing his trademark devious smirk, "In Dorne, boys and girls fighting each other is a common occurrence. Outside my homeland, Dornishmen are willing to fight anyone they encounter. Dornishwomen are just as willing, but it is more difficult for them to find willing opponents. Sandor is not only willing to fight with my girls; he is visibly delighted to do so."

"Maybe it's just the thrill of battle that draws him to them," Lyn Corbray conjectured, "It could be he's not really interested in Obara or Nymeria; he's just interested in triumphing over them."

"Oh, what would you know of bonding with the fair sex?" Gerion Lannister refuted. Lyn shot Gerion a hostile glare, to which the blonde man sniggered in response.

"Taking Ser Lyn's… unique perspective into account, I do not believe Sandor only sees Obara and Nymeria as a pair of challenges," Oberyn Martell proclaimed, "I believe there is some type of attraction between him and them."

"Gregor and I arrived at the same conclusion," Dacey disclosed.

"And we only saw the three of them together once," Gregor reminded the others, "Obara in particular seems to have taken an interest in something other than Sandor's combat prowess."
Oberyn was intrigued by that last statement. He rubbed his chin and murmured "That's quite remarkable. Maybe we can use that to our advantage, too. While we're still on the subject of betrothals and such…"

Gregor had not considered the likelihood of a marriage contract between Sandor and one of the Sand Snakes. That was not just because the Mountain had no real voice in whom his brother's bride would be. It was also because of the circumstances of Obara's birth. Still, he would be a fool not to recognize the advantages in such a union.

"I appreciate the idea," Gregor disclosed, "But unfortunately, my mother is not as tolerant of bastards as you or I, my prince. She would spit at the very concept of my brother wedding a baseborn girl."

Oberyn did not seem surprised by that statement. Nor did he seem bothered. He contended "Just minutes ago, you suggested that I legitimize my daughters. Let us say King Robert agrees to make them Martells. Would your mother be so adverse then?"

"No," Gregor replied, "Neither would my father. But if that was to happen, wouldn't Obara be marrying too far below her station?"

"In Dorne, there is no such thing as marrying above or below one's station," Oberyn argued, "Besides, from what I've heard, your house in the south has flourished these past three years. Clegane's Keep would be as good a place for my daughter as it would be for your family."

Gregor sat reflecting on those points. After a minute of contemplative quietness, he coincided with "Very well, Oberyn. I am willing to indulge the possibility of a marriage contract between Sandor and Obara. But before we tell them, my mother, or anyone else about a betrothal, we should write a letter to King's Landing. If the request to legitimize your daughters comes from both of us, that should be enough to persuade the king to grant it. Once your firstborn is recognized as a Martell, we can broach the subject of betrothal to her and my brother. If both of them agree to it and my parents give them their blessing, we can make it official."

Oberyn nodded his head, folded his arms, and stated "That is more than acceptable."

The meeting ended ten minutes later. Immediately after leaving the council chambers, Gregor Clegane, Oberyn Martell, Brynden Tully, and Garth Hightower went straight to the rookery. There the Mountain and the Red Viper composed a letter to King's Landing. At the same time, the Blackfish wrote a letter to Winterfell and the second son of Lord Leyton Hightower wrote a letter to Highgarden.

As soon as each letter was complete, a raven was dispatched to its intended destination.

Although over three dozen potential marriage contracts had been proposed at the meeting, the one between Robb and Margaery was the only one Gregor wished to follow up on right away. The sooner the idea reached Winterfell and Highgarden, the more chances it had to happen.

After the ravens were sent out, there was nothing more Gregor or his ten companions could do but wait for answers.

Three days later, Lord Jorah Mormont, Lady Maege Mormont, and her three youngest daughters left for Bear Island. Four more days later, Sandor Clegane, Ellyn Clegane, and Daliah Clegane set out for Clegane's Keep.

Just before he left, Sandor shared a rather affectionate good-bye with the two eldest Sand Snakes.
He embraced Nymeria warmly and kissed her on either cheek. He embraced Obara, as well, but when he tried to peck her on the cheeks, she went one step further and kissed him full on the mouth. After a single instant of shock, Sandor eased down and kissed her back. For a burly young man with aggressive tendencies, he was a very tender kisser.

Now that was what Gregor called a sign.

The next month was relatively uneventful. Apart from quelling a few groups of bandits and tracking down the occasional runaway criminal, nothing especially noteworthy happened for the Legion without Banners. Gregor still had yet to hear back from King Robert, Lord Eddard, or Lord Mace. But he was holding out hope that they (and the people around them) would come through for him.

Halfway through the first month of the 287th year after Aegon's Conquest, something very significant took place.

One day, in the late morning, Lord Gregor Clegane was alone in his solar. He was seated at his desk, reviewing a number of reports from his officers (The closest thing they have to paperwork here). He had a tankard of cranberry juice by his side. Most other lords would have preferred a mug of ale or beer, but Gregor had never been much of a drinker in either of his lives. He allowed himself a goblet or two of wine at feasts, but other than that, he tried to stay sober as often as possible.

He was in the middle of examining the roster of the Legion's newest recruits when he heard a loud thumping outside the door.

He promptly looked up and called out "Come in."

It was Dunsen who stepped inside the room. He entered very hastily, and he was breathing very rapidly, as though he was struggling to catch his breath. In fact, he was; he had sprinted all the way up to the solar from somewhere on the ground.

Concerned, Gregor rose from his chair and asked "Dunsen, is something wrong?"

"It's… it's Milady, Ser," Dunsen spoke through uneven breaths.

Although Dacey was not the only highborn woman at Moat Cailin, Gregor knew that whenever his men-at-arms mentioned "Milady," they were referring to his wife.

"What is it?" Gregor queried worriedly.

"Well, Ser, she…" Dunsen haltingly began. This time when he paused, it was not because of fatigue. Instead, it was due to apprehension. Then he took a deep breath and finished with "She fainted."

Gregor suddenly felt himself a little short of breath, too. He rose to his feet, walked around his desk and said demandingly "When? Where? Why?"

"Just now, in the training yard, and I don't know," Dunsen answered correspondingly, "The Smalljon and Prince Oberyn are taking her to Maester Kennick as we speak. They sent me to fetch you, if you're not too busy."

"Of course I'm not," Gregor solemnly declared. He retrieved his cloak from a hook on the wall and draped it around his shoulders. After tying it securely around his throat, he descended the Lord's Tower with Dunsen.
As they made their way back down to the ground, Gregor asked his man-at-arms "Can you tell me what happened?"

"Afraid not, Ser," Dunsen said apologetically, "I only arrived on the scene after Milady collapsed. By the time I found out what all the fuss was about, they were already moving her."

"Well, I'm grateful that you came straight to me," Gregor asserted.

"Glad to know, Ser," Dunsen muttered sincerely.

Ten minutes later, the Mountain and his retainer reached the maester's office. Oberyn Martell, Smalljon Umber, Rodrik Cassel, and quite a few others were standing outside the door. But only Gregor was allowed entrance to the room.

Inside the chamber, Maester Kennick was tending to Dacey. She had already regained consciousness, but she did not look well.

Her face glistened with perspiration, and many of her black locks were drenched in sweat. Her breathing was as unsteady as Dunsen's had been when he reached Gregor's solar.

One may have attributed that to the fact that Dacey had been in the training yard when she collapsed. She had been sparring with Ser Rodrik for twenty whole minutes beforehand. But Ser Rodrik – as well as everyone else who had been present – had noted that even before their duel began, Dacey had seemed fatigued or distracted. Every additional minute the duel lasted, her condition had worsened.

Despite how hot Dacey looked, her upper body was wrapped in a blanket.

At a glance, Gregor would have guessed she had a fever. But as the weather indicated, Westeros was in the process of switching from summer to winter. As far as Gregor knew, autumn fever was not a thing in any part of the country, including the North.

Gregor went to his wife's side, knelt beside her, and took her hands in his. He asked worriedly "Are you alright?"

She slowly turned to face her husband. She did not look alright. All the same, she managed to nod her head a bit, and she insisted "Yeah, I'm just... just a little dizzy."

Then she balked and clasped her hand over her mouth, which suggested she was about to vomit.

Gregor spotted a chamber pot across the room. He hurriedly went over to it, picked it up, and brought it over to his wife. He held it near her, just in case.

Fortunately for Dacey, she managed to avoid throwing up. Unfortunately for Gregor, he had not realized that the chamber pot was not empty. Either Maester Kennick had used it that morning or the servants had not yet cleaned it out. Gregor smelt the contents of the chamber pot before he saw them, and when he saw them, he gagged. He quickly returned the chamber pot to its original spot, but his disgust lingered.

Dacey was amused by her husband's actions. She commented drily "I wonder who's more likely to retch now: you or me."

Gregor was not as entertained. He murmured sardonically "Is now really the best time for jokes?"

"It might actually be, my lord," Maester Kennick perceived, "We'll probably laughing about this before long."

"I'd rather you wait until you finish examining my wife to make that declaration," Gregor muttered sternly.

"As you wish, my lord," Kennick conceded, "I'll be done soon. I just need to ask her a question. A personal one. So, if you would not mind…?"

At that, Gregor nodded and took a few steps back so that Kennick could talk to Dacey in relative privacy. He whispered something into her ear. In response, her eyes widened and she looked at him in astonishment. A few seconds later, she stared at her feet and uttered softly "Well… six weeks ago, I suppose."

Six weeks ago? The hells does that mean? What happened six weeks ago?

Before he could ask anyone that question, Kennick turned to the Mountain and gestured for him to come back over. Gregor gradually walked back over to the maester and his wife. Both of them were grinning now.

"Lord Gregor, I'm pleased to tell you there is nothing wrong with Lady Dacey," Maester Kennick informed him.

Gregor let out a sigh of relief and knelt by Dacey's side again. As he held her hands in his right one again, he assumed "So she's perfectly healthy?"

"Yes," Kennick affirmed. He knelt on Dacey's other side and slyly added in "Both of them are, in fact."

Before, Gregor had simply been confused. Now he was dumbfounded. "Both?"

"Yes, Lady Dacey and…" Maester Kennick took Gregor's free hand and brought it to Dacey's abdomen. He had the Mountain rest his hand there for a few seconds.

The truth dawned on Gregor very suddenly. He stared at his hand on his wife's lower body for a few more seconds, and then he gradually looked up at her and the maester. He said very quietly "You mean…?"

Maester Kennick nodded his head and announced "Lady Dacey is with child, my lord."

Upon hearing the confirmation to what he had already begun to suspect, Gregor seemed to freeze in his position. He gave no immediate reaction to that statement. Dacey and Maester Kennick watched him closely, eager for his response.

Then Kennick's theory came true; Gregor did laugh. Dacey and the maester soon joined in. They laughed in relief for how they had been needlessly worried, they laughed in amusement for how worked up they had been over this matter, and they laughed in joy for how a child would be born at Moat Cailin later that year.
Dacey required about five minutes to compose herself. After that, she and her husband left the maester's chambers.

Word spread quickly through the moat that its lady was with child. Luckily, Gregor and Dacey were able to partly control how the news travelled. The ten members of the secret council were told first. Then the top officers of the Legion without Banners. After that, the common soldiers, the retainers of House Clegane, and the residents of the adjoining towns were informed.

The overall response to the news was one of ecstasy. Gregor and Dacey wrote to their families, apprising them of the news. Lady Maege Mormont and Lady Daliah Clegane were both delighted that they would soon be grandmothers. Ser Tarrence Clegane was proud of his son for starting his line of succession so soon after his marriage. Sandor was happy that he would be an uncle, as were Ellyn, Alysane, Lyra, and Jorelle happy that they would become aunts.

At the behest of his fellow Legionnaires, a small feast was held to celebrate the looming arrival of Gregor's heir.

Gregor made sure to keep it a small feast. He had no desire to needlessly waste food, even on a joyous occasion such as this one. Proper management of provisions was critical to maintaining the integrity of the Legion. Aside from that, Westeros would soon face another winter, and no one could afford to have insufficient stores then.

This last summer had been a short one. Hopefully, the subsequent winter would be no longer.

Gregor had seen about six or seven winters throughout his childhood in the Westerlands. All of those had been relatively mild, and House Clegane of Clegane's Keep had gotten through them without any substantial loss.

But these last two winters in the North… they had been something else entirely.

Although he had never entered the southern half of the United States until he started college, Gregory Welch's childhood had not been confined to the northern half of the country. He had an aunt and an uncle who lived in Canada. On several occasions, Gregory, his parents, and his siblings had paid them a visit. As it happened, his aunt and uncle liked to travel. Every time Gregory's family visited them, they met up in a different city. Among the cities they had seen were Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Montreal, and Toronto.

Whichever town he went to, Gregory had always enjoyed his vacations in Canada.

With one minor exception.

When he was thirteen, he and his family had travelled to Winnipeg. There had been no wrong with the city itself or its occupants. The true problem was the climate, as they had gone there in the middle of January.

During winter, Winnipeg was supposedly the coldest perpetually inhabitable point on Earth in the Western Hemisphere. Gregory had discovered firsthand that that allegation was quite true.

His family had stayed there for a week, but they spent a total of eleven hours of that interval outside. The temperature rarely rose above zero, and there was always at least eighteen inches of snow on the ground. Often the roads were too icy for vehicular transportation, so they were usually forced to walk whenever they went somewhere.

That had to be the roughest winter of Gregory's first life.

But in spite of how lousy that experience had been, Gregor felt that winter in Winnipeg was still preferable to winter in the North. At least in Winnipeg, snowstorms generally only lasted a few hours, and there were days when no fresh snow fell at all.

This reprieve was not to be found anywhere in the North. There seemed to be a blizzard every day. On a merciful day, there was two feet of snow on the ground. On a harsh day (and those outnumbered merciful ones three times over), there was four feet. The average temperature was usually five to fifteen degrees colder than that of what the average had been in Winnipeg.

Gregor had already survived two winters in the North, but that did not make the prospect of facing a third one any more appealing.

There was also the painful reminder that the Legion had not emerged unscathed from either of the first two winters.

During the first winter, the renovations to Moat Cailin were still underway. There was too little room in the towers that had been built to house all of the Legion's members. Even when every inch of free indoor space was allocated, many of them were forced to sleep outside. To keep warm, they camped around large bonfires which were refueled with ironwood every hour. Despite these efforts, fifty-eight Legionnaires had perished in the snows.

The second winter had been even more catastrophic. Although Moat Cailin was by then large enough for the entire Legion, it was not large enough to include the smallfolk in the newly-built adjoining towns. The houses in those villages were strong and firm in the summer, but against the full fury of Northern snows in wintertime, they provided inadequate shelter. Only eleven Legionnaires had died, but nearly a hundred smallfolk had been lost, as well. In Gregor's mind, civilian casualties were always far worse than martial casualties.

Naturally, he would not allow the people of Moat Cailin to suffer these hardships a third time. He would take measures to ensure they did not.

Nearly all of the losses on both occasions were attributed to poor or insufficient housing. Gregor had noticed that, and he had taken steps to rectify that predicament. The houses in the villages were reinforced, and more towers had been erected in the moat.

Now, every house in the villages could withstand even the fiercest of blizzards. And even if they could not, the fourteen towers of the provided enough rooms so that the Legionnaires and the townspeople could live together comfortably. Interestingly, they would still have enough space that the living conditions would not be overcrowded.

Gregor was pleased by these breakthroughs. Not only would he guarantee the well-being of all the people staying at Moat Cailin, but there would also be no need to seek a safer haven elsewhere. Gregor would not have forced his people to brave another brutal winter at Moat Cailin unprepared. If he had been unable to give his people suitable living quarters when the winter snows came, the only option would have been for the Legion and the smallfolk to relocate south until summer returned.

Gregor was determined to keep the Legion without Banners in the North as much as possible. That was one of the main reasons why the Mountain had chosen Moat Cailin as its base of operations: its location.
Actually, the location of the moat accounted for two of the reasons for picking Moat Cailin as his new stronghold and the headquarters for the Legion without Banners.

The first reason was because of its surroundings. From the south, it was protected by miles of marshland and bog. They formed a natural barrier from anything that came up the Kingsroad.

Of course, the true threats would come from the north. However, from that direction, the moat had no barricades, natural or otherwise.

To be precise, it had nothing of the sort before Gregor came along. That was another of the amendments he had imposed upon the moat.

After the villages and the new towers had been raised, Gregor had seen to the construction of a wall that bordered the lands immediately north of Moat Cailin.

The wall was not made of stone, wood, metal, or any traditional type of foundation. It was made of something that had not even existed in the world before Gregor came along.

When the Essosi architects first arrived at Moat Cailin, Gregor had presented them with a compound he had put together himself. The compound was a batch of homemade concrete.

The architects were greatly impressed by the concrete and its uses. They asked to know how this compound had been created, and Gregor obliged them with a summary of the smelting process.

In order to make concrete, Gregor needed cement, which also had yet to be invented. Luckily, he had the means to create that, as well. He had put together large amounts of clay and calcite-rich limestone, and he combined them with equal portions of water and sand. His blacksmiths heated the ingredients together in the forges of Moat Cailin.

The resulting mixture was a little crude, but it was sturdy and malleable enough to accomplish its intended use.

Gregor and the architects had a steady arrangement. The Mountain's blacksmiths smelted the concrete; the architects used it to build a thirty-foot wall along the northern border of Moat Cailin. They also used it to reinforce the houses in the villages and the moat's towers.

Although Gregor had told the architects how concrete was created, he had not given them a demonstration of the process. So while they knew how the compound was made, they did not know how to make it themselves.

During their stay at Moat Cailin, the architects proposed that Gregor give them the recipe for smelting concrete. That way, they argued, they could make the compound themselves without relying on his blacksmiths or overworking them.

Gregor was tempted to share the recipe. However, his blacksmiths assured him that smelting concrete was no chore for them.

Moreover, Gregor saw a business opportunity. While there was no such thing as copyright in this world, so long as Moat Cailin alone held the recipe for concrete, the ability to manufacture and sell it would be exclusively Gregor's.

So he declined to share the recipe with the architects. They were disappointed, but they accepted his choice.

Concrete and cement were the first objects from his first life that Gregor had introduced to the Known World. Through his connections, he had sold massive quantities of both of those substances on the markets of the Seven Kingdoms, the Nine Free Cities, and Slaver's Bay. They had brought in a tremendous amount of income for House Clegane of Clegane's Keep.

Gregor still owned the patents to cement and concrete. As long as they remained his, the treasury at Moat Cailin would continue to grow fuller. All he had to do was ensure that the required materials were always in abundance.

Water could be provided by the Cut or the moat's aqueduct, sand could be imported from Dorne, and clay could be dug up from the lands surrounding the moat.

The only material that proved a bit of a challenge to locate was the calcite-rich limestone. Fortunately, Gregor had ways of acquiring that mineral.

If there was one thing the Westerlands were known for (other than having the vainest and proudest Great House), it was that they produced the greatest miners in all the realm. Many of the Westerlander Legionnaires had at least some experience with mining. Gregor opted to put those skills to use.

After getting special permission from Lord Eddard Stark, Gregor had tasked those Legionnaires with locating and digging up any valuable caches of limestone or other precious metals in the southern half of the North. This past year had yielded very fruitful results. So far, they had found veins of limestone, moonstone, zinc, iron, ebony, silver, malachite, quicksilver, and even an occasional gold one.

The mining operations were even more lucrative than the concrete and cement marketing. The profits generated from these operations were around ten times greater than the expenses incurred.

If this enterprise became successful enough, Gregor would probably push to continue their mining operations throughout the rest of the North, all the way to the wall.

At any rate, now that a wall of solid concrete had been erected along the northern border of Moat Cailin, the fortress was protected from both directions now. There were only three gates in the wall, and each of them could be sealed off with concrete doors if need be.

Once the Long Night occurred, the concrete wall would provide a formidable obstacle against the Others. Gregor knew it would not hold them off forever, but it would greatly delay their advance south. The Legion without Banners would even be given some time to push the Others back or evacuate the moat.

Furthermore, once the Others were past the concrete wall, their hardships would not stop at Moat Cailin. Even if they managed to obliterate the Legion, they would still have to face the hazards of the Neck. Gregor did not know how deep the swamps were, but he believed they would be able to swallow up a huge proportion of the White Walkers before they reached the Riverlands.

That was one of the two reasons why Moat Cailin's location made it the optimal choice for the Legion without Banners.

The other reason was due to the moat's position relative to the rest of Westeros. It was just barely in the North. It could actually be rather humid at times. Even so, it shared the same climate of the rest of the region.

As Gregor knew well, the landscape of the North was frigid and inhospitable year-round. The temperature never rose about seventy degrees, and there were snows even in the summer.
Only the Northmen were accustomed to such everlasting cold. Gregor hoped to familiarize everyone else in the Legion without Banners with that climate, too.

That was why Gregor had selected a northern holdfast as the Legion's base of operations. It would be as a precautionary measure.

After the Ironborn Rebellion, the Great Summer would come, and it would last about a decade. While the rest of the realm would bask in sunlight and heat, the North would stay somewhat chilly.

In Gregor's mind, by indefinitely stationing a significant percentage of Westeros' fighting force in the North, every member of that company would become well-acquainted with the chill during the Great Summer. Therefore, once the Long Night came about, the Legionsaires would not be strangers to winter. That would give them a greater chance of surviving the extreme weather.

It would do the Legionsaires no good if they forgot how hazardous winter could be. They would have enough burdens to contend with without having to adapt to a steep drop in climate.

Even before he first went north, Gregor knew that life at Moat Cailin would be difficult. But in the long run, the extra difficulty would be worth it.

A few weeks after Gregor learned that his wife was in the process of making their first heir, Westeros was touched by winter again.

This winter was no more pleasant than the two before it. But at the very least, Moat Cailin was better equipped to endure this one. The Legionsaires and the smallfolk all found ample shelter from the blizzards within the confines of the moat.

Remaining indoors did not block out the cold completely, but everyone was able to find a way to stay warm.

For instance, at night, Gregor and Dacey were able to keep each other warm. Very effectively, one might say.

Although she was with child, Dacey was not opposed to engaging in intimate activities with her husband. In fact, her pregnancy seemed to exacerbate her libido. Gregor was all too happy to feed her appetites. Every night for the first two months following Maester Kennick's diagnosis, the Bear Islander and the Mountain made love at least three times.

That had been a rather exhilarating experience. It actually made Gregor think of a joke he had heard in his first life:

What do you get when you combine the Lord of the Rings with porn? You get A Song of Ice and Fire.

While not especially clever, he always thought that joke was hilarious. Partly because it was undeniably true. He and Dacey could attest to its authenticity. Apart from that, the Legion without Banners now had enough female members that the Legionsaires could establish a city of their own. Gregor had not been the only one to notice that. Some were taking advantage of it, as a matter of fact. It was not hard to determine which ones. At Moat Cailin, there were hardly any secrets about who was fucking who.

Whenever they were in bed, Gregor made sure his wife was always on top. That was how they usually did it even before she became pregnant. Before, they had done it primarily so that he would not smother her. Now he did it so that he would not put too much pressure on her abdomen. He would risk no hurt to his unborn child, especially not whilst doing the act in which he or she had been conceived.

Gregor had sworn to himself and to Lady Maege that he would not treat Dacey like an invalid or a weakling when she was with child. While he stayed true to that promise, he did become a little more protective of his wife.

Once a week, Dacey stopped by Maester Kennick's chambers for a checkup on her condition. Without fail, Gregor accompanied her to each of these appointments. He wished to know everything: the growth of the fetus, the details of what Dacey could expect, the recommended alterations to her diet and exercise routine, and everything else.

One would thing that Gregor was absorbed with his wife. Of course, even a fool could plainly see that Gregor loved and cared for Dacey deeply. Be that as it may, his true enthusiasm was driven by the bear girl's slightly protruding lower belly.

That fixation was simple enough to comprehend. Gregor was not obsessed; he was merely undergoing the sensation of euphoria, just as any eager young man soon to be a father did.

Dacey did not mind Gregor's newfound captivation with her lower torso. By extension, it was a newfound captivation with the rest of her, too. In other words, it was just one more thing about her that her husband adored. Plus, since the baby was his, he had a right to be so concerned. Additionally, she enjoyed all the attention he gave her.

Gregor and Maester Kennick were not the only ones who spent a lot more time around Dacey after her pregnancy was announced. Oberyn Martell and Ellaria Sand tended to be there for her quite often. In fact, they seemed to make Dacey's well-being one of their foremost concerns. For what reason, neither Dacey nor her husband could fathom at first.

When asked, Oberyn explained that he and Ellaria had several reasons for their sudden interest in Dacey. Firstly, they respected the Bear Islander and everything she stood for. She had been the very first female Legionnaire, and she had inspired many women across the realm to follow her example. In addition to that, Ellaria had been pregnant once, as well. As such, he was one of the very few highborn ladies in Moat Cailin who were in a position to help Dacey cope with her own pregnancy and prepare for her impending transition into motherhood.

There was also the fact that Oberyn and Ellaria held her husband in equally high regard. Oberyn had not forgotten how Gregor had saved his sister, and by all accounts, he never would (just as he would never have forgotten if the Mountain had been the one who murdered her). Additionally, Oberyn was grateful that Gregor counted him among his greatest friends and his most trusted allies.

Oddly enough, Ellaria fell with child again a couple months after Dacey. From what Gregor recalled of the Sand Snakes, since Elia had already been born, Obella had to be the next one on the way. Dacey congratulated the older woman on her own bundle, and Ellaria, while grateful and thrilled, insisted that Dacey's pregnancy was still the truly momentous event at Moat Cailin.

The most prominent reason of all was due to something even Gregor himself had not yet considered. Oberyn pointed out to him that the Legion without Banners had begun as a company of men and women from all over the realm who were fighting alongside each other. Now, it was becoming more than that. The degree of tolerance and understanding between the members of the Legion without Banners was almost unheard of, even in the Night's Watch. Because of that factor and many others, the Legion was starting to become like a family.

When he thought on this, Gregor realized the prince was indeed correct. He was quite pleased to confirm this discovery. He could scarcely recall the last time any form of bias had caused an issue at Moat Cailin. Even those individuals who had come to the moat with the most extreme of prejudices had cast them aside in favor of respect and broadmindedness. That could only mean one thing: the Legionnaires were not just comrades anymore. They were now brothers and sisters in arms.

Oberyn was also keen to mention the possibility that the Cleganes and Martells would be related as more than even that. If all went well, they would be family through marriage, and eventually blood, too.

Gregor was still very open to the prospect of a marriage contract between Sandor and Obara. But he was curious as to what the exact nature of his relationship with the Oberyn would be. He thought on that for a while.

If Sandor and Obara ended up together, then Gregor's brother would be wed to Oberyn's firstborn daughter.

So what would that make the Mountain and the Red Viper? Gregor would be the brother of Oberyn's son-by-law, and Oberyn would be the father-by-law of Gregor's brother. What they would be to each other, Gregor was not entirely certain.

In any case, they would be family in both the physical sense and the spiritual then. That would mean a plethora of benefits to all parties involved. Chief among them was the fact that the Cleganes would be the very first house from the Westerlands to marry into Dorne. Quite an accomplishment, particularly for a house as young as theirs.

Of course, with Gregor's marriage to Dacey, the Cleganes had already been the very first family from the Westerlands to marry into the North. They had already set one precedent; why not another?

Some japed that with the joining of House Clegane and House Mormont, giants would soon return to the world.

It was not hard to imagine how that rumor had taken root.

Gregor was twenty-two years old in 287 A.C. He was now fully grown. His ultimate height came out as seven feet, nine inches. During her first pregnancy, Dacey saw her seventeenth nameday. She was a little over a foot shorter than her husband at six feet, seven inches. But she was still growing, albeit gradually.

With all that in mind, it was reasonable to assume that all of Gregor and Dacey's children would be a little taller than average. They would probably even be the tallest members of their generation. Gregor certainly could not think of anyone who would come close.

Sandor and Dacey were approximately the same height, but given the accelerated growth rate of men, that would probably change.

As far as Gregor knew, there were only three people in Westeros who stood taller than Dacey, and all of them were native to the North. They were Greatjon Umber at seven feet, three inches, Smalljon Umber at six feet, ten inches, and… a certain single-minded stableboy in Winterfell at six feet, eleven inches.

In any case, the Mountain was the tallest man in the Seven Kingdoms, and his wife was the tallest woman. Logically, they would have taller children than any other couple in the realm. Just how tall, they could not say for certain. But they would find out soon enough.

Nine weeks after Gregor and Dacey were married (and five after they found out about the latter's pregnancy), a raven flew in from the south. It brought with it a letter which Maester Kennick promptly brought to his lord. The wax held the form of a crowned stag, which indicated that it had been sent from King's Landing.

The letter brought glad tidings.

Robert Baratheon and the rest of the Small Council had gone over Gregor and Oberyn's case to legitimize the latter's daughters, and after much debate, the King had chosen to give them his approval.

The letter contained a royal decree signed by Robert himself, formally legitimizing Obara Sand and Nymeria Sand as trueborn daughters of Prince Oberyn Nymeros Martell. It declared that from that day forward, the girls were to be recognized as Obara Martell and Nymeria Martell.

According to the letter, only Obara and Nymeria had been legitimized. That was primarily because they were the only two of Oberyn's daughters whom he had specifically referred to by name in the petition he and Gregor had sent to the King. Robert had not legitimized the other Sand Snakes merely because he did not know their names. Varys could have told him, of course. But the Spider was hoping to avoid saying anything about Oberyn's "bastard son." Aside from that, the King had not asked.

Robert said in his letter that if Oberyn wished to legitimize the rest of his daughters, all he had to do was write the Small Council again, and they would make Martells of the other Sand Snakes, as well as any other baseborn children the Red Viper might have had in the future.

Robert even offered to legitimize Oberyn's paramour. Everyone who heard that proposal was greatly surprised by it, Ellaria herself most of all.

Ellaria Sand was the only child of Lord Harmen Uller. If she was given his name, she would become the rightful heir to Hellholt.

That concept might have seemed very appealing to most baseborn children. However, Ellaria actually preferred the lifestyle of a bastard. With no name of her own, she had freedom to do whatever she pleased in the world. She had no responsibilities, duties, or obligations. Other than Oberyn and the Sand Snakes, she was not bound to anyone or anything.

Some may have thought it selfish of Ellaria to choose the indulgent lifestyle of a bastard over the privilege to continue the legacy of her father's family. Luckily, Lord Harmen had a younger brother, Ser Ulwyck Uller. From what Gregor heard, Ser Ulwyck was still unmarried, but he was much less opposed to commitment than his elder brother, so the line of succession of House Uller was guaranteed in any case.

Even with all that said, Ellaria would not simply disregard King Robert's proposal. Perhaps there would come a day when it would be more ideal for her to be trueborn. She could not suppose a reason as to why that would be. Nonetheless, she would keep the King's offer in mind, and she would wait until such a day came. Perhaps she actually would be Lady Ellaria Uller of Hellholt sometime in the future.

What really mattered was that Obara and Nymeria now had their father's name. When this winter ended, Oberyn would discuss the idea of betrothal with his eldest, and Gregor would send a raven to Clegane's Keep to proposition his brother. Then they would finally know whether or not a marriage contract between Obara and Sandor was truly on the table.

Robert Baratheon was not the only highborn who wrote to Moat Cailin during that winter.

Two weeks after the king's letter arrived, two more ravens arrived from Winterfell and Highgarden. Lady Catelyn Stark and Lady Alerie Tyrell had finally answered the missives sent to them by her uncle and her brother respectively.

The reason they had taken so long to respond was not due to lack of interest. Quite the contrary; the idea of uniting the North and the Reach through marriage had caught their fancy. They had spent the last eleven weeks going over that concept with their husbands (and goodmother in Alerie's case).

After discussing this topic amongst themselves, the two Great Families decided to exchange some correspondence with each other, as well. Recently, a number of ravens had flown back and forth from Winterfell and Highgarden. More letters had been sent between those two fortresses in the last three months than they ever had in history.

Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell were still too young to speak for themselves, but their parents were raising them to be dutiful children. When they were old enough, they would consent to whatever matches their parents chose for them, and they would fulfill their obligations without protest.

After a great deal of deliberation, Lord Eddard Stark and Lord Mace Tyrell agreed to entertain the notion of a betrothal between the former's son and the latter's daughter. No marriage contracts had been drawn up just yet, but one was being heavily considered.

So for the present, it appeared as though the wolf and the rose just might be joined together in the near future.

Now that the issues of Obara's legitimation and Robb and Margaery's betrothal had been resolved, Gregor was able to better focus on problems closer to home. Mainly getting his people through winter and caring for Dacey for the duration of her pregnancy.

Incredibly, not one person at Moat Cailin died during this winter. The improved housing arrangements ensured that everyone stayed warm and comfortable.

In spite of the unfriendly weather conditions, many of the moat's residents could often be found frolicking out in the snow. That crowd was not limited to the children at the moat. There were grown men and women who partook in activities typically reserved by a younger group. These activities included snowball fights, making impressions in the snow, and snowmen building.

When he had a bit of leisure time, Gregor would join his fellow Legionnaires out in the courtyard for a bit of amusement in the snow. He packed a decent snowball and designed a fair snow angel, but his snowmen were larger than anyone else's.

Whenever he built one, Gregor liked to whistle the melody to "Let's Build a Snowman" from Cannibal: The Musical.

Every now and then, one of his men would look at him in astonishment. That was not too surprising; they had never heard that tune or anything like it before. Even so, Gregor never told anyone the lyrics to that song. That was mostly because of how goofy and ridiculous the song was (just like the musical it was from). All the same, he rather liked that song (and the musical itself).

Dacey was able to accompany her husband in the snow for the first half of her pregnancy. She even joined in some of the activities.

The Bear Islander proved to be much better at snowball fights than the Mountain. Whenever two teams were designated, Dacey often commanded one of them, and her team was usually the one that won.

Then again, many of the people on the opposing team were reluctant to chuck snowballs at her. Not only was she the lady of Moat Cailin, but she also carried the heir to the moat inside her.

Dacey was quick to notice this, and she adamantly asserted that neither she nor her babe was a weakling, and that she could take a few blows. Not wishing to displease their lady, the other combatants agreed not to treat her any differently in a snowball fight.

This went on until the fifth month of Dacey's pregnancy. At that time, in the midst of a particularly heated battle, Dacey took a snowball to her lower chest. It had not struck anyplace close to her abdomen, but the force had been enough to knock the wind out of her. After she collapsed, Gregor promptly came to his wife's aid and carried her inside. Maester Kennick confirmed that she was merely short of breath. Gregor suspected that the other team had been hiding rocks in their snowballs, but he never found any evidence substantiating that theory.

At any rate, after much insistence (and begging) on the part of her husband, Dacey agreed to withdraw from the snowball wars until after their child was born.

One thing Gregor really admired about Dacey was how gracefully she handled her pregnancy.

Gregor could vividly recall his first mother's last two pregnancies. Gregory Welch's mother had been a very kind and compassionate woman by nature, but whenever she was expecting, she could become very impatient, irritable, and sometimes unpleasant to be around.

Dacey was nothing like that. She was susceptible to mood swings, but those never lasted long. They actually seemed to be under her control. She had impressive discipline over her mind and emotions. Gregor wondered how she came to possess that feat. Maybe it was because the residents of Bear Island were accustomed to hardship, even more so than most of the other Northern houses.

Dacey still experienced many of the other symptoms that traditionally complemented pregnancy. The first three months were plagued morning sickness. She was more susceptible to changes in temperature, and she rose from bed at least once a night to use the privy.

She tried not to allow the symptoms to impact her everyday life. Still, in the seventh month, she voluntarily agreed to stop sparring in the training yard. By then, her reflexes and her range of motion had been severely reduced by the swell in her abdomen. Even so, she did not relinquish her duties as the Lady of Moat Cailin.

Finally, the day came.

In the early morning near the start of the ninth month of 287 A.C., Gregor was awoken very abruptly by his wife. As the Mountain regained his senses, Dacey complained about a sharp pain in her lower body. She appeared to be having contractions. They quickly discovered that her water had broken.

Gregor jumped out of bed and got dressed as quickly as he could. Dacey could not be bothered to dress. That was a bit of a problem; she was clad only in her smallclothes. So Gregor wrapped her in a thick robe of wolfskin, and he placed soft sheepskin slippers on her feet.

After that, Gregor carried Dacey down the stairs of the Lord's Tower, and he brought her all the way to Maester Kennick's chambers. To their good fortune, the maester was an early riser. He had already eaten his breakfast and he was preparing for the day.

When his lord arrived with his wife in arms, Kennick snapped to attention. One glance at Dacey was enough for Kennick to understand what was going on. He had already assembled a birthing chamber in the adjoining room. He had Gregor bring Dacey to that room. The Mountain took Dacey over to the bed and set her down gently.

As the maester tended to Dacey, Gregor went to fetch the midwife. He found her in one of the villages north of the moat. It took a few minutes to get her out of bed, but once she was apprised of the situation, she hastily and compliantly followed her lord back to the moat.

The midwife was a middle-aged woman named Vera. She and her family had been among the first of the smallfolk to move into the towns north of Moat Cailin. Vera had three children of her own, and she had assisted dozens of other women with the delivery of their babes.

Shortly after Dacey's pregnancy became known, Vera had offered her services in the birthing chamber. Since she had ample qualifications for the part, Gregor was quick to grant her that request.

When they returned to the birthing chamber, they found that Dacey and Maester Kennick were not alone. Oberyn Martell and Ellaria Sand had joined them. Somehow, the Red Viper and his paramour had caught word of what was happening. They must have seen Gregor carrying Dacey to the maester's quarters. That was the only reasonable explanation.

How they knew mattered little to Gregor. What was important was that they were there to help. Ellaria wished to assist Vera with the delivery, and Oberyn planned to provide moral support for Gregor.

Once Dacey was comfortably settled, Gregor and Oberyn were shooed out of the room by Vera and Ellaria. They claimed that other than maesters, men had no place in the birthing chamber. Gregor tried to protest, but Vera was deaf to his pleas and demands. For his wife's sake, he did not make a scene. Reluctantly, he joined Oberyn out in the corridor.

Dacey was already dilated ten centimeters, so the birthing process began straightaway. Even so, the process itself lasted a grueling four hours.

That was more than enough time for the magnitude of what was taking place to sink in mentally. Gregor sat outside the door to the chamber with Oberyn, and he lamented on the situation.

For these past eight months, Gregor had been greatly looking forward to this moment. Now that it had finally arrived, he found himself very apprehensive.

Every now and then, his wife let out a shriek of agony. Every one of those screams was like a knife in his heart. The worst part was that he could do nothing to relieve Dacey's pain.

Gregor prayed to the gods – the Old, the New, and the God he had worshipped in his first life – that Dacey and their child would survive the ordeal. Dacey was a strong woman; any child with their genes would be equally tough and resilient.

What really troubled Gregor was what would happen after his first child arrived. Publically, Gregor was supposed to hope for a male child. Secretly, Gregor did not care if his child was a boy or a girl. Whatever it was, he would love and care for his child just the same.

He just hoped he would be a good father. In both his lives, he had looked after his younger siblings quite often, but he had not actually raised them. His parents had raised them alongside him.

Gregor tried to assure himself that he could handle fatherhood. After all, he was the commanding officer of over three thousand men and women. If he could see to the well-being of that many individuals, surely he could do the same for an infant.

Of course, every one of the Legionnaires had come to Moat Cailin grown or mostly grown. They had all been sired and raised by someone else. This child, however, had been conceived by him, and he would be responsible for its upbringing until it came of age.

Gregor voiced none of his qualms, but one look at his face was enough to tell Oberyn that the Mountain was inwardly freaking out. Fortunately, the Red Viper was able to reassure his massive friend that his worries were unfounded.

Oberyn stated that he knew Gregor would be a great parent. He debated that if Gregor was half as good a father as he was a battle commander, his child would have one of the best fathers in the realm. In the little time he had known them, Rhaenys and Aegon had taken a liking to Gregor. Oberyn was convinced that that was a surefire sign of how good Gregor really was with children.

By the end of the fourth hour, Oberyn had succeeded in comforting Gregor and assuaging his doubts about fatherhood. Gregor admitted that his fretting was needless.

Less than five minutes later, Dacey's screams finally ceased. They were replaced by the wailing of a newborn child.

Gregor slowly turned to the door and stared at it intently.

A minute later, Maester Kennick gradually pushed open the door, smiled down at the younger man, and announced "You have a son, my lord."

Gregor and Oberyn swiftly got up off the ground and stepped inside.

Ellaria was taking small sips from a glass of wine. Vera was helping Dacey sit up in bed. Dacey herself was obviously exhausted. But she was smiling wider than Gregor had ever seen her smile. When she saw her husband, her smile grew even bigger.

In her arms was a bundle. A very large bundle. Gregor tentatively approached the bed. Despite how tired she was, Dacey managed to scoot over enough to make room for her husband. He sat down beside her and gazed at the contents of her arms.

Their infant son was indeed quite big. Two whole blankets were needed to swaddle him. His wails had subsided to light coos, and he had yet to open his eyes.

Dacey carefully passed the newborn over to Gregor, and the Mountain gently took their boy in his arms. He held him against his chest and delicately stroked his soft cheek.

A few seconds later, the boy gradually opened his eyes. He stared upward at his father, babbling incoherently.

Gregor broke into an even bigger grin than his wife. He turned to Dacey and placed a soft kiss against her lips. After that, he told her "You did beautifully."

"I'd like to think so," Dacey remarked with a note of smugness, "How many other women catch a prize this grand in the birthing chamber?"
"Just how big is he?" Gregor queried, curious.

"He weighed about seventeen pounds at birth, m'lord," Vera informed the Mountain.

Oberyn whistled and commented "Even a pair of regular-sized twins does not normally weigh that much."

Ellaria scoffed at her lover's blunt statement. She then looked to the Mountain and asked him "What will you call him, Gregor?"

Gregor and Dacey had discussed many possible names beforehand, but they had never settled on any one. Ultimately, they simply decided that if they had a boy, Gregor would chose the name, and Dacey would chose the name if they had a girl.

"I thought about naming the boy after my father or grandfather," Gregor disclosed, "I also thought of naming him after one of my old friends in the Westerlands. But he's a Northern child. He should have a Northern name."

"What name have you in mind, my lord?" Maester Kennick enquired.

Gregor looked back down at his newborn son and proudly declared "Rickard."

Dacey contemplated that name for a few seconds, and she nodded in approval. "Rickard Clegane. It seems quaintly fitting."

By then, Ellaria had emptied her glass of wine. She was quick to refill it. She also filled up four other glasses and gave them to Gregor, Kennick, Oberyn, and Vera. Then she filled a sixth glass with water, topped it with a bit of wine, and gave it to Dacey.

Once everyone had a goblet, Ellaria Sand held hers in the air and pronounced "To Rickard Clegane, firstborn son of the Bear and the Mountain, heir to Moat Cailin."

The others raised their glasses and repeated "To Rickard!"

They drained their cups in one long gulp.

Soon after that, the room was emptied of everyone except Gregor, Dacey, and little Rickard. The two new parents wished to have some private, personal time with their son before they resumed their responsibilities to Moat Cailin and the Legion without Banners. Vera and Maester Kennick would remain in the latter's office in case Dacey or her son needed attention. Oberyn and Ellaria would stay close-by, but they would not tell anyone of Rickard's birth. That privilege belonged to Gregor and Dacey.

For a whole hour, the three Cleganes were left all on their own without any interruptions or anxieties. To Gregor and Dacey, that had to be the most blissful sixty minutes of any winter they had ever seen.
Mixed Feelings

Chapter Notes

Note: I'd like to thank TheWumpus (an author on Fanfiction) for giving me the idea for this chapter. As you have undoubtedly noticed, nearly all of the previous chapters have taken place exclusively from Gregor's perspective. This chapter will hardly even include him (as an active character, I mean). This is where news of Rickard Clegane's birth reaches the rest of Westeros, particularly how the news effects four of the most prominent characters in this story, all of which have a son of their own. So the chapter will be a collection of five short vignettes, each one chronicling the reactions of one of those four individuals. This will essentially be my way of showing what is going on in the minds of other people throughout the rest of Westeros, as well as how they each feel about the changes Gregor is instilling.

From this point on, many of the chapters will be told through the third-person point of view of someone other than Gregor. For instance, the chapter after this one will go back to Moat Cailin and Gregor, but it will take place entirely from Dacey's point of view. Oh, and yes; we'll be getting to the Ironborn Rebellion very soon.

One last point. Originally, I was going to have a fifth vignette from Robert's point of view, but I decided to omit it, as I did not wish to make this chapter overlong. This will still be the longest chapter to date, but I'm going to try not to make any future chapters this long. Also, you'll be seeing a Robert chapter sometime during or immediately after the Ironborn Rebellion; rest assured.

After that previous hour ended, Gregor let Dacey and Rickard alone so they could rest. He left his wife and their child in the trusted care of Vera and Maester Kennick.

Gregor then went out, gathered his people, and announced the arrival of his son. The proclamation was met with much delight and enthusiastic cheers.

For the remainder of the day, the residents of Moat Cailin – Legionnaires, servants, and villagers alike – celebrated the birth of their lord's heir. Toasts were raised, congratulations were given, and good luck was bidden.

As excited and anxious as he was about the future, Gregor still had work aplenty to do.

Mainly, there were a number of people who had to be informed of his son's birth. So in the early afternoon, he made his way to the rookery and set his mind to composing seven letters.

Two of them were rather casual in nature. They were meant for his family and Dacey's. After they were finished, they were dispatched by raven to Clegane's Keep and Bear Island. No doubt they would be received with great zeal.

The other five letters were composed in a much more formal rhetoric.

Each of those messages contained the exact same words as the other four, but Gregor predicted that each of the recipients would react very differently to reading them.
He was quite correct.

...

Whenever a child was born into a house, it was customary for the liege lord of that respective house to be notified very soon after. Especially if that child was the house's intended heir. As such, the first message was sent to Winterfell.

The raven reached the fortress in the early evening. At the time, Lord Eddard Stark had just supped with his family. He was making his way to the godswood to say an evening prayer when Maester Luwin intercepted him outside.

After he was given the piece of parchment, Ned Stark continued on to the godswood. There he sat against the trunk of the heart tree, opened the letter, and read it.

Dacey's pregnancy had been common knowledge throughout the North for the past several months. Naturally, the news of her delivery came as no surprise to Lord Eddard; he had already expected to hear of it sometime that month. Even so, he was pleased that the birth had been performed successfully and without any complications.

He was also intrigued by how Gregor Clegane had given his son the name of Rickard. Not only was it a Northern name; it was the name of Eddard's late lord father. He supposed he should be flattered by the Mountain's decision. Lord Karstark would certainly be.

Although it was not required of him, Ned planned to send a follow-up raven to congratulate Lord Gregor on the birth of his heir. He did this routine with all of his bannermen, but it was more than just obligation that motivated him to write the lord of Moat Cailin. For a number of personal reasons, he wished to maintain a level of regular correspondence with Gregor Clegane.

Secretly, the Mountain fascinated him. He who was generally very difficult to fascinate.

Years ago, when Eddard had merely been the second son of a great lord, he had heard tales of the Mountain That Rides.

Ned had been fostered in the Eyrie, so he had been as far away from Gregor as possible during the years of the latter's rise to prominence in the Westerlands.

Back then, Eddard found it remarkable how the son of the youngest and probably most insignificant house in the Westerlands had become one of the most beloved warriors in his region. With his size and his strength, he could have done whatever he wished and gotten away with it.

Eddard knew that just because one had opportunity to gain at the expense of others, one would not necessarily go through with it, even if one was very selfish. However, even in the North and the Vale, it was no secret that Tywin Lannister cared less for civilian loss of life than the other Lords Paramount of Westeros. With that in mind, Gregor would have had freedom to do as he liked, so long as his actions did not displease Lord Tywin.

Instead, he had gone out of his way to protect the innocent and uphold the law at the same time.

Eddard felt there was an interesting contrast to Gregor.

To the guilty, he was harsh, callous, pitiless, and even somewhat terrifying. To the innocent, he was gentle, empathetic, compassionate, and understanding.

During Robert's Rebellion, Gregor had demonstrated those qualities outside of his homeland.
Firstly, he had minimized the casualties during the Sacking of King's Landing, and he had severely punished those who had done deliberate harm to the smallfolk of the city. He himself had personally slain his own ally, Ser Amory Lorch, for the (supposed) murder of Rhaegar's children.

Then there were the events that had transpired in Dorne.

Eddard would never forget Dorne.

He had ridden to the Red Mountains, planning to find his sister and bring her home or die in the attempt. When he and his six companions encountered the Kingsguard at the Tower of Joy, he had expected a fight to the death.

But there was no skirmish. Neither he nor his friends nor the Kingsguard had perished that day. His sister had lived, as well. Thus, a great deal of loss had been averted.

Lord Willam Dustin was now a father. A year earlier, his wife, Lady Barbrey of House Ryswell, had birthed a hale baby girl, whom they had named Klara. Recently, Eddard had heard that Lady Barbrey was with child again. Had Willam died at the Tower of Joy, his house would have faded into oblivion. Now, due largely to Gregor Clegane's intercession, House Dustin would endure. For that same reason, Martyn Cassel now served as Winterfell's master-at-arms, and he had been around to watch as his son Jory finished growing up.

Of course, as far as the rest of the country knew, everyone else who had been at the Tower of Joy (save Howland Reed) was dead. Furthermore, Eddard was now involved in a dangerous conspiracy that – if exposed – could cost him his life. And the lives of everyone involved, including his nephew. What annoyed him was that he had been insinuated in this conspiracy partly against his will.

Gregor had assured him that the risk would be worth taking. The Mountain had contended that as long as everyone who knew the identities of Rhaegar's children did and said nothing that would compromise their safety, they would all get by without suffering any further tragedy.

It had been four years since then. The dragons were still living as exiles and the stag still laid claim to their throne.

The day would come when the wolf would have to choose between the two factions. Eddard had no doubt of that.

He would have to make a decision, no matter how much he dreaded it.

Either he would break the oath of fealty he had sworn to Robert, or he would break the promise he had sworn to Lyanna to keep her son safe.

He prayed often for a solution to this predicament that would allow him to remain true to both his friend and his family.

Such a solution may have seemed impossible. Even so, part of Eddard Stark honestly believed that such a solution was indeed possible, and if there was one person who could find one, it would be his newest vassal.

Eddard Stark had only known Gregor Clegane for four years, but the wolf lord believed he could trust the Mountain.

The man was not even born a Northman. Yet he has done more for the North and the rest of the realm than any of my bannermen have in recent history.
"Ned?" a soft voice interrupted his broodings.

Eddard turned to the entrance of the godswood. His lady wife Catelyn was standing before him, a bundle in her arms and a gentle smile on her face.

Ned Stark returned the smile and gestured for Catelyn to approach. She swiftly made her way over to her husband and sat down beside him.

The bundle turned out to be their one-year-old daughter, Sansa. She was soundly asleep.

Ned's smile remained as he reached his arm out and stroked the tuft of auburn hair on his daughter's forehead. She cooed quietly, but did not wake up.

Catelyn asked "Are you well?"

"Yes," Eddard replied, looking to his wife, "I've news from Moat Cailin."

"Has Lady Dacey given birth?" Catelyn presumed.

Eddard nodded and stated "To a son. Named Rickard."

Catelyn's smile became a smirk and she commented "Perhaps Lord Gregor is trying to carry favor with you."

"I think not," Eddard countered, "My father's name is fairly common in the North."

Catelyn then frowned a bit and murmured "Do you suppose…?"

At that, she slowly gazed down at Sansa. No other words were added to that sentence, but Eddard understood what his wife was implying.

He scoffed and assured her "Lord Gregor is not the kind of man to seek a contract between his child and the child of his liege lord, Cat. Particularly so soon after their births."

"Perhaps not," Catelyn conceded, "But he is the type to seek contracts between the children of others."

"No contracts have been created yet," Eddard reminded his wife, "The match between Robb and Lord Tyrell's daughter was merely suggested. Apart from that, your own uncle advocates the match."

"I know," Catelyn claimed, "I approve of it, as well. What truly gives me pause is why Lord Gregor recommended the match in the first place."

"His reason was that it would bring the North and the Reach together," Eddard recounted.

"Why should he care for the relationship between them?" Catelyn queried.

That is a question I'd like an answer to myself.

So far, Varys was the only person who knew that Gregor's ultimate goal was to unify all of Westeros. He had not shared it without anyone else to maintain the integrity of his plans.

Everyone else believed he was just trying to establish lasting peace throughout the Seven Kingdoms. That theory explained the actions of the Legion without Banners. But it did not explain why he had touched on the subject of betrothals between the children of the Great Houses.
Whatever his motive, Eddard had elected to put his faith in Gregor's counsel. So long as the Mountain acted honorably and in the interests of the realm, Eddard would support and listen to him.

"I cannot say," Eddard answered his wife's question, "But we can guarantee that a match between Robb and Lady Margaery would be beneficial for the North?"

"How can you be certain?" Catelyn inquired.

"Well, I married outside the North," Eddard debated happily, "Look at all the good it has done me thus far."

Catelyn's grin quickly returned, and she placed an affectionate kiss on her husband's bearded cheek. That lone remark was enough to both pacify her qualms and conclude the discussion.

Catelyn then rose back to her feet and declared "I'm going to put Sansa to bed. After that, I'll be in library. Robb and Jon wish to show me something there."

"Show you what?" Eddard asked in interest.

"They did not say," Catelyn candidly responded, "They claimed it was a surprise."

Eddard merely nodded in acknowledgement and muttered wryly "Very well. Enjoy your surprise."

"I'm certain I will," Catelyn contended, smiling again, "Those boys are always a joy to be around."

After that, she departed from the godswood.

Eddard lingered by the heart tree for another half-hour. He stayed to pray and to reflect on the letter from Moat Cailin.

Gregor Clegane was now a father. That was something he and Lord Eddard Stark had in common. Soon enough, the Mountain would know what having a child truly meant to a man.

Eddard believe fatherhood would suit Gregor well. He had already done an excellent job of ensuring the survival of other people's children. He had also ensured the happiness of those same children.

When Lyanna had entrusted him with her son, Eddard had thought to claim Jon as his own bastard. It had been Gregor Clegane who had proposed that Eddard present Jon as the product of a free union between Brandon Stark and Ashara Dayne instead.

Eddard had been hesitant to use that story at first, but he had ultimately chosen to go with it.

Now, he was certain that had been the right decision. Catelyn Stark absolutely adored her nephew. She treated him no differently than Robb or Sansa. The fact that he was a bastard did not matter to her. What mattered was that he was family. For that alone, she loved and accepted Jon. She would never have loved or accepted him if he had been passed off as the stepson who resulted from an adulterous fling on her husband's part.

…

A couple days later, another of Gregor's messages reached Sunspear. Maester Caleotte brought it to Prince Doran and Princess Elia immediately. They went over the contents of the letter together in Doran's council chambers. As always, Areo Hotah stood guard over his liege lord, but said and heard nothing.

"Seventeen pounds?" Doran noted, raising an eyebrow.

"That could very well be a record," Caleotte hypothesized, "In Westeros, at least."

"Rhaenys and Aegon weighed half that," Elia recalled.

And even that was almost too much for me.

"Do you really think Oberyn was there for moral support?" Elia inquired.

"It does not sound like Prince Oberyn," Caleotte perceived.

"Oh, I disagree," Doran refuted, "Oberyn does as he likes. Based on the letters he's sent us from the moat, he and Lord Gregor have become very well-acquainted."

"That, I cannot contest," Maester Caleotte remarked, "On that note, Lady Ellaria is certainly the type to aid another woman in the birthing chamber. Seeing as she's had that experience herself."

"How fortunate for Lady Dacey that she and Oberyn were there," Doran commented.

Yes, and lucky them. They're up there protecting the country and befriending the Mountain. And we're down here... waiting. All this pointless waiting...

"Indeed; Lady Dacey appears to be doing quite well," Maester Caleotte observed, "According to this, she actually tried to get back up on her feet just hours after birthing her son."

"She must be quite robust," Elia conjectured.

"She'd have to be," Doran contended, "I imagine Lord Gregor would need and want a woman as hardy and stout as her to be his wife. And to bear his children."

Yes, he would. Elia grimaced slightly.

Ever since the Sack of King's Landing, the Mountain's name had been a highly esteemed one all throughout Dorne. Many of the Dornishmen had actually come to admire Gregor Clegane. Elia Martell in particular revered him.

At first, she thought that was merely because he had saved her and her children from Amory Lorch. What she felt was probably just a heightened sense of gratitude.

She soon discovered it was more than that. On the voyage back to Sunspear, she had bonded with Gregor. He had looked after her, Rhaenys, and Aegon as though they were family.

They had talked for much of the trip. They had shared intimate secrets. They had spoken casually on serious matters. They had reminisced on memorable events from their youth.

He had called her beautiful. Even Rhaegar had not called her that.

By the time she was back in her homeland, Elia had begun to wonder if she was developing romantic feelings for Gregor. Or if he was for her.

At the time, she hoped not. There were too many extenuating circumstances that would have obfuscated that type of relationship.
For one thing, Gregor was nine years younger than Elia, as well as two feet taller. Back then, he was only the heir to a knightly house in the Westerlands. His countrymen had just laid siege to the city which had been her late husband's home. Most of all, her children had been proclaimed deceased, so she was supposed to be in mourning. If she looked for comfort in the arms of a man so soon after losing her husband, her son, and her daughter, she would draw a tremendous amount of suspicion and unwelcomed attention. Even if that man was the one who avenged her children's murders. In addition to that, Elia was not forbidden to leave Dorne, but in the eyes of the public, she had no legitimate reason to ever want to leave it again. Plus, there was no way she would have ever abandoned Aegon, and Sunspear was the only place in Westeros where she believed her son would be out of danger.

So Elia did not act on her new feelings for the Mountain. She kept them to herself, and she parted from him as nothing more than a friend. When they went their own ways, she assumed her feelings would subside eventually.

Things had changed quite a bit since then.

The age difference did not matter as much as it had. Gregor was now a high lord in the North. Because of the Legion without Banners, tensions between the Westerlands and Dorne and the Crownlands were starting to lessen. Gregor had gone out of his way to ensure that Elia and her children were protected from those who wished harm upon them. Because of the Legion, Westeros was starting to become a better place. Elia honestly felt as though she could go almost anywhere in the Seven Kingdoms without fear of being attacked.

This made her wonder on what could have been.

Perhaps under a different set of circumstances, a match between Elia and Gregor could have been devised.

Alas, that could never happen. This was not only because Gregor was now married. There was also the matter of Elia's womb. Rhaenys had wrecked it, and Aegon had all but destroyed it. Now she would never carry another child. No matter how many assets she had to offer, a barren woman was useless in the world of political marriages.

Elia had long ago accepted the truth that there would never have been any chance that she and Gregor would be a couple in this life. She was not one to mope on lost opportunities. She embraced that knowledge without undergoing any form of denial or disbelief.

All the same, she found herself somewhat jealous of Dacey Mormont. From what she heard, the Bear Island girl had claimed the Mountain without even trying. The marriage contract between them had originally been Gregor's idea, not hers. Furthermore, this marriage had not been created simply for political advantages. Gregor Clegane and his wife were deeply enamored with each other. Now that they had a child, their union was both secure and official.

Luckily, Princess Elia had been raised better than to allow her envy to fester. She would not sulk or pout like some rejected one-time lover. She would move on.

Even if she had the opportunity to meddle in the Mountain's marriage, she would never dare to come between him and Dacey. The thought of doing such an atrocious thing disgusted her. She owed Gregor so much; the least she could do to repay him was let him have his happiness with the woman he loved.

Aside from that… Elia knew what it was like to have a husband who was more drawn to another woman than his actual wife. That was precisely what happened with her, Rhaegar, and Lyanna.
Although Elia loved Lyanna just as much as Rhaegar had, she had felt somewhat ignored and unwanted by her husband after the Tourney at Harrenhal. Elia would not wish that on Dacey or any other woman.

After sitting in silence for a few seconds, Elia let out a long sigh, got up from her chair, and uttered "If there's nothing else, I'm going to check on Egg."

Doran nodded his consent, and his sister swiftly exited the chamber. Areo Hotah bowed to her as she left.

Princess Elia Martell calmly made her way to the building's nursery, where most of her nieces and nephews were supposedly gathered.

While Obara and Nymeria were in the North, the rest of the Sand Snakes were currently in that room.

Ever since she returned to Sunspear, Elia had taken a great interest in her brothers' children, particularly Oberyn's. This was for two reasons: she adored all children (especially those in her immediate family), and one of them was actually hers (but not actually his, thankfully).

When she got to the nursery, there were two guards posted at the door. They allowed their princess entrance to the room.

Inside the room, another guard was standing by the door. Like the two without, he wore the standard armor of the soldiers of House Martell. The only difference was that he wore a half-helm which covered most of his face. His mouth and nose were totally concealed, and there were only two small holes in the middle so that his eyes would see.

This man was known by many at Sunspear as Ihtos, a freerider from the western province of Dorne who had sworn his services to House Martell a few years earlier. To most, he was a very mysterious figure.

He spoke only to Prince Doran and those closest to the prince, and he never took off his half-helm; not even to sleep. The sword that hung at his side had seen years of use, and the hand that wielded it was just as deadly.

Elia was one of the few who knew Ihtos' actual identity.

"Good morrow, my princess," came the voice of Ser Arthur Dayne from behind the half-helm.

"Thank you, Ihtos," she returned the greeting.

She then turned her focus on the other occupants in the room. Her sister-by-law Mellario was sitting in a chair, nursing her youngest child, Trystane. Ever since her other son Quentyn had been sent to be fostered at Yronwood, Mellario had been quite protective of her other children. A few meters away, her daughter Arianne was dressing up her cousins Tyene and Sarella. Their game of dress-up was a rather unconventional one. Instead of elegant or elaborate gowns, Tyene wore the garments of a septa, and Sarella was clad in the robes of a maester. That may have been symbolic for the roads the two girls would take later in their lives.

In the corner of the room, a young four-year old boy was building a tower out of blocks of ironwood.

Elia slowly made her way over to the boy and waited until she had his attention. When he noticed her, he put down his blocks, toddled over to her, and hugged her, saying excitedly "Auntie!"
I'm not your aunt. I'm your mother.

How she longed to say those words. But she did not. Instead she picked up the boy and said "Hi, Egg."

This boy was known as Edgar Sand, the only male of Oberyn Martell's bastards. No one knew who his mother had been, but no one seemed to care, either. What Oberyn did in his spare time was his business.

Elia could imagine that Oberyn had gotten that from the late Lord Edgar Yronwood. That was a little surprising, considering that Oberyn had killed him in a duel. With poison, nonetheless. Hence his moniker "The Red Viper."

That infamous episode had strained relations between House Martell and House Yronwood. That was why Elia's nephew Quentyn was now being fostered by Lord Anders Yronwood. Unfortunately, Doran's decision to send his son off had also generated some friction between himself and Lady Mellario.

On the positive end of the spectrum, no one seemed interested about Edgar Sand's origins. As long as no one's curiosity got the better of them, Elia could ascertain that her boy would be safe. She could still call him "Egg" in public. But she could not tell him who his mother was.

Elia remembered a letter that had come from King's Landing several months earlier. It contained a proclamation saying that Obara and Nymeria were to be recognized as Martells. Furthermore, the rest of the Sand Snakes had the option to be legitimized as well.

So far, Tyene and Sarella showed no desire to become legitimized. Elia was glad for that. Because if all of Oberyn's daughters were legitimized, people would expect Edgar Sand to become legitimized as well.

While Elia had no disdain for bastards, she was disgusted by the idea of him being legitimized. He had no real reason to be given a name. He already had a name of his own. He was a trueborn son. He was a prince. He was the rightful heir to the Seven Kingdoms.

And he did not even know that. Not yet. Until then, she would continue to nurture and raise him as she would have in King's Landing.

Elia held Aegon close to her chest and kissed him on the top of his head.

"Someday, sweetling, you will be king," she whispered. She spoke so quietly that only she could make out her words. "Then you'll be able to protect the realm."

Just as Lord Gregor and the Legion protect it now.

...

Hundreds of miles north of Dorne, Rhaegar Targaryen's other wife was looking after some children, as well.

These three children were a seven-year-old girl, a four-year-old girl, and a one-year-old boy.

None of them was hers. But she wished her own boy could have been among them.

There were two other women in the room. One of them was the mother of the younger girl and the boy. The other was a native of Dorne who had come north with the elder girl.
There was also a man standing against the wall. He was clad all in white armor, his helm under his left arm, his sword in its sheath attached to his belt.

They were all in the lounge of Greywater Watch.

This migratory castle had been a safe haven for Lyanna Stark for the past few years, and the people in this room had been a sort of comfort for her. Especially the older of the girls.

In the absence of her son, Lyanna had personally charged herself with the upbringing of Princess Rhaenys Targaryen. Before they parted ways, she had promised Elia she would raise the Dornishwoman's daughter properly, and she would never go back on her word.

Lyanna had come to love Rhaenys as her own daughter, and the wolf woman was like a second mother to the young princess. Sometimes she called her "Lya" or "Lyanna," but more often than not, she called her "Mother."

Lyanna was young enough to be Rhaenys' sister, but she enjoyed being addressed as that. She found there was definitely some form of closeness between them.

Right now, the castle was on the move. The floating island it was built on was gradually cruising throughout the bogs.

Anyone inside the castle would not have realized that they were moving. But anyone who looked or stood outside would be well-aware, as they would see that their surroundings were constantly changing.

Yet another "glamorous" voyage. Oh, well. At least it's not humid.

Greywater Watch frequently glided through the swamps of the Neck in effort to maintain the confidentiality of its whereabouts. It never stayed in any one location for more than a week at a time. In the time since Lyanna had first come to the castle, Greywater Watch had changed its position no less than 250 times.

Lyanna had become accustomed to being constantly on the move. Despite being in a vast marshland, the Neck had many exotic sights to offer, and it helped to appease her sense of adventure.

But no matter where she went, she still felt an empty place in her heart. There was a void that could only be filled by one person, but that person was always more than a hundred miles away.

Just then, there was a heavy knock at the door. Lyanna Stark looked over at it and called out "Enter!"

The door opened and Lord Howland Reed, Ser Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, and Theo Wull stepped inside.

Lady Jyanna Reed smiled at her husband and uttered "Hello, my love."

Howland stopped to kiss his wife's lips and the heads of his daughter Meera and his son Jojen. He also gave a nod of acknowledgment to Lady Ashara Dayne, who returned the kind gesture thusly. Howland then approached Lyanna, bowed his head, and said "My princess."

_Princess._

Even after five years, she had not become accustomed to that title. In spite of the fact that all the people around her addressed her as such every single day. But, of course, she had married a prince, so her official status in the world had risen accordingly. All the same, it sounded queer to her.

"I've news to share," Lord Howland pronounced, holding a rolled up piece of parchment in his right hand. It was marked with the seal of the Northern branch of House Clegane.

None of the crannogmen had joined the Legion without Banners. But some of the other Northmen – primarily the Flints of Flint’s Fingers – knew how to track down Greywater Watch throughout the Neck. As it happened, Robin Flint and some of his knights were Legionnaires. A few of them were expert horseback riders, as well. This was fortunate; riders were the only means one could use to communicate with Greywater Watch.

"Just before we got underway, we encountered a rider," Ethan Glover announced, pointing out the parchment in Lord Howland's hand, "It's a message from Moat Cailin."

Howland Reed stepped up to Lyanna and held out the letter, saying "We believe you are its intended recipient, Princess."

Lyanna raised an eyebrow and tentatively took the letter. She enquired "Why do you think that, my lord?"

"Intuition, I suppose," Theo Wull conjectured.

"That, and the letter is addressed to 'The lodger at Greywater Watch,'" Mark Ryswell slyly remarked.

Lyanna chuckled at that blunt statement and broke the seal on the letter. Then she unrolled it and began to examine its contents.

"What does it say, my princess?" Ser Oswell Whent inquired from his place against the wall.

"I'll read it aloud," Lyanna declared.

So she did. Every person present listened on in great interest. Except Meera and Jojen. They were too young to understand, and they were still engrossed with their toys. Everyone else was quite interested in learning of the contents of the letter, though.

When Lyanna was finished divulging the information in the letter, Rhaenys was the first to speak. Balerion was sitting in her lap. He had grown into a strong tomcat in four years. His mistress scratched him behind the ears, giggled, and said "So Uncle Gregor's a papa now?"

Rhaenys had only been three when she first met Gregor Clegane, but she vividly remembered every moment of that event. She could still recall the sensation of Amory Lorch pulling her out from under her father's bed, the sheer terror she had felt when Ser Amory rose his blade over his head, and the immense relief that had come afterwards when Gregor had gutted Amory like the pig he was.

On the trip back to Dorne, she had even taken to calling him "Uncle Greg" (Or "Gweg"). She continued to refer to him as that to this day.

Rhaenys was old and wise enough to know that Gregor Clegane was not really a sibling to either of her parents. Even so, she still called him "Uncle" out of habit.

To justify that, she had once pointed out that Gregor and her real uncle Oberyn were good friends (if the infrequent messages Greywater Watch received from Moat Cailin were any indication). In a way, they were almost like brothers. So, by that same logic, Gregor technically was a kind of uncle to Rhaenys. If not by blood, then he was in spirit.

Lyanna had been impressed by her stepdaughter's argument. It was a very prudent observation for Rhaenys to make at such a young age. Then again, in Greywater Watch, many people seemed wise beyond their years.

"Lady Dacey produced a seventeen-pound babe and wanted to leave the birthing chamber straight after?" Ashara Dayne asked rhetorically, clearly dumbfounded, "I'm amazed she even had the strength to remain conscious."

"The Mormonts are a tenacious lot, my lady," Ethan Glover disclosed, "Their strength and height give them great resilience, as well."

"Still, this is the first time one of them has had a child with a Clegane," Mark Ryswell remarked, "I'm not surprised the child was born so large. Nor am I surprised that Lady Dacey and her boy survived the ordeal. Only a Northwoman could carry such a child to terms."

"And one has," Theo Wull murmured, "Now the giants are returning to Westeros."

Had anyone else made that remark, it would have been viewed as a jape or a jest. But Theo Wull was from one of the mountain clans of the North. While his people were not nearly as barbaric and uncivilized as the clans from the Vale, they were more open to believing in the unnatural than the lords and ladies of Westeros.

Theo Wull had always been a firm believer in the unnatural. When Lyanna had told him and the others about the prophecy of the Three-Headed Dragon, he had been the first one to trust the validity of the prophecy. Howland Reed, Jyanna Reed, and Ashara Dayne had gradually decided to put their faith in it, as well. Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, and Oswell Whent were still quite skeptical, but regardless of how true the prophecy turned out to be, they were determined to remain with Lyanna and protect her for as long as she would have them.

"Pray tell, Buckets," Ethan Glover commented drily, "What else is returning? The Others?"

Mark Ryswell was the only one to laugh. Lyanna glared at Brandon Stark's former squire and mumbled "That could very well be the case. Should I repeat the prophecy to you, Ethan?"

"You needn't bother, Princess," Ethan assured her. He clearly did not wish to bring the Long Night into discussion again.

Mark Ryswell found this an ideal moment to return to the original subject of the conversation. He stated jokingly "It's rather fortunate that the Mountain did not name his son Rodrik. Otherwise he and Lord Forrester would have had more in common than their own first names."

"Yes, two Northern lords named Gregor having two heirs named Rodrik would have made a mess," Jyanna Reed concurred with a smirk.

"I must admire his actual choice of name," Howland Reed thought aloud.

Lyanna and a few others nodded in agreement.

"Wasn't your lord father a Rickard, Princess?" Ashara queried.

"He was, Ash," the wolf woman affirmed.
"Could that be why Lord Gregor named his son so?" the Dornishwoman supposed.

"I don't think that would be the only reason," Lyanna debated, "I believe there's much more to it than that."

"How so, Your Grace?" Oswell Whent questioned.

Lyanna explained "That name is one of the few that is entirely indigenous to the North. By giving his heir that name, I believe Gregor Clegane aims to prove that he officially regards himself and those of his bloodline as Northmen. He is publically declaring the North as his new place in the world. I think it's commendable of him."

"If that is indeed his reason, then I quite agree," Howland Reed stated.

"Well, how about that?" Mark Ryswell cockily uttered, "Gregor Clegane is a Westerlander by birth. Now he's living in the North as a Northman with a Northern wife and a Northern child."

"Must be little of the Westerlands left in him," Ethan Glover commented.

"Well, I'm partly inclined to think of him as a Northerner through and through," Howland Reed remarked, "But we cannot make any presumptions. We'll have to wait and see if he can raise his child in the fashion of the North."

At least he has the opportunity to raise his own child.

For every day since Lyanna Stark and her company left the Tower of Joy, her son had been the primary focus of her thoughts.

Eddard wrote to her as often as he deemed safe to. From her brother's missives, Lyanna learned that Jon was doing very well in Winterfell.

Lyanna never doubted that Ned would be a good father figure to Jon. What really troubled her was how her sister-by-law would treat him.

To her vast relief, her worries were unwarranted. Catelyn Stark was very loving and caring towards her nephew. She was every bit the mother figure Lyanna would have hoped to have been.

Like Eddard, Lyanna knew Gregor Clegane was to thank for that. He had been the one to propose the false account of how Jon had come into the world. It was their good fortune that the story that he was Brandon Stark and Ashara Dayne's bastard son was both believable and consistent.

Neither Lyanna nor Eddard enjoyed tarnishing their late elder brother's memory so, but if it meant ensuring Jon's survivial, they could live with that lie.

They were lucky that Ashara had been so willing to go along with that story, as well.

At first, Lyanna wondered why it was necessary for Ashara's "suicide" to be part of it. Then Ashara had given her a simple but logical reason: Jon would not be compelled to seek his alleged birth mother out if she was presumed dead. Even if she travelled across the Narrow Sea to Essos, he might still go after her when he came of age.

So it actually had been necessary for Ashara to fake her death. In addition to that, anything other than a suicide would have drawn unwelcome attention.

Even though Jon would have excellent parenting, she still worried for his safety.
Ser Gerold Hightower had come to the North with Eddard and his bannermen after the Rebellion. He had new clothes, a new haircut, and a new name: Ser Marvyn of the Reach. As for his background, he was a travelling knight who had chosen to come north in the aftermath of Robert's Rebellion. He had elected to serve the Stars of Winterfell as a symbol of goodwill between his homeland and the North. Such a benign gesture was very much needed after Lord Eddard had defeated Lord Mace at Storm's End. So it was easy enough to buy.

In any case, Ser Gerold would be able to guard Jon without compromising himself or the boy. Lyanna knew the Reachman would be capable of protecting her son. He had been the Lord Commander of Aerys' Kingsguard, and he had kept her safe in Dorne for weeks.

But even with all her anxieties put to rest, Lyanna was not content with the knowledge that her son was loved and sheltered. She would have given anything just to hold her son in her own arms.

She never expressed that desire to any other person vocally, as she did not wish to make anyone else share in her misery.

Unbeknownst to her, though, Ashara Dayne had caught on to Lyanna's unhappiness. As someone who had lost her own child at birth, she knew the look of a grieving mother all too well.

Lyanna had that very look right then.

"Are you alright, Princess?" Ashara asked in concern.

Lyanna softly nodded her head, but her countenance suggested she wished to shake it instead.

"Can we have a moment?" Ashara requested of the others.

The lounge was promptly cleared of everyone except the Dornishwoman and the wolf woman. Once they were alone, Ashara sat down next to the younger woman and assumed "Jon?"

Lyanna merely nodded her head and confirmed "Always Jon."

A tear had begun to form at the corner of her eye.

Ashara swiftly reached out to Lyanna and pulled her into an embrace, which the other female openly accepted. That was one thing the Northwoman loved about the Dornishwoman; she was always so sympathetic to the anguish of others. That must have been one of the things that attracted Brandon to her in the first place.

This was one instance where her sympathetic nature would really come through.

She told Lyanna hopefully "I have been doing some thinking about your situation. Some very deep thinking. I believe there may be a way to bring you and your son together."

That immediately grabbed the wolf woman's attention. She looked the older woman in the eye and asked eagerly "What?"

Ashara revealed "Well, I have an idea. It is a risky one, but if executed properly, it could work. It could reunite you with Jon without posing any threat to either of you."

"I'm listening," Lyanna Stark proclaimed, leaning in closer.
One of the last two messages was sent by raven to King's Landing.

As king of Westeros, Robert Baratheon had a right to know that the Master of Order on the Small Council now had an heir.

Of the five people Gregor had written, Robert had the most positive reaction to the message. He had sent a follow-up letter back almost immediately, expressing his joy for the arrival of Gregor and Dacey's firstborn child. He had also given Rickard Clegane his royal blessing.

By contrast, the receiver of the final message had the most negative reaction. But considering who it was, that was hardly shocking.

The last letter had been delivered by raven to Casterly Rock.

Even though Gregor had been cut off from the Westerlands, Tywin Lannister seemed to have developed a keen interest in the Mountain's affairs. As such, Lord Tywin would have taken it as a slight if he was not given the news of Rickard's birth (or any similar type of news) straightaway. Gregor was well-aware of that.

While he personally cared little for the lion lord's feelings (if he actually had any), he knew that any wrong he had done Tywin would reflect badly on his family in the Westerlands. Plus, he needed to maintain good relations with the Westerlands so that its residents would continue to serve in the Leigon without Banners. So for the time being, Gregor strove to avoid giving Tywin any more reasons to dislike him or suspect him of foul play.

Even with all that said, Tywin Lannister was still not pleased by the news of how Gregor Clegane had fathered a son.

The raven carrying the message had arrived in the middle of the afternoon. After the letter was brought to Lord Tywin, he and his brother Kevan reviewed it together in the lord's solar.

In those days, Kevan was the only person Tywin could fully trust. Their brother Tygett had already died, their brother Gerion was serving in the Legion without Banners, and their sister Genna had a Frey husband. For those reasons, Kevan was the only one of Tywin's siblings that he could turn to for reliable advice.

After they thoroughly read the letter, the two men sat in awkward silence for a couple minutes

Kevan was the one who broke it. "I suppose we should write to Lord Gregor and congratulate him for siring his first son."

"The man should be congratulated for far more than just that," Tywin debated, "But I will not be the one to congratulate him."

"Nor shall I ever be."

"I wouldn't expect you to be, Tywin," Kevan bluntly remarked.

"And why is that?" Tywin asked, genuinely interested.

"Clearly, this news doesn't please you," Kevan observed, "Nothing the Mountain has done in the last four years has pleased you."

"Perhaps not," Tywin admitted, "If so, the fault is his own."
"I will agree some of the fault is his," Kevan countered, "But you should share some of it. You're the one who allowed this… grudge to endure."

How quickly he rises to defend the Mountain. Against his own brother.

"Kevan, are arguing for Gregor Clegane over me?" Tywin mumbled, accusation evident in his voice.

"No, I'd never do that," Kevan reassured his elder brother, "I'm merely making a point. Amory Lorch was just one knight. He was easily replaceable. He has been replaced. Why can you not forgive the Mountain for killing him?"

"This is not about Amory Lorch," Tywin apprised his younger brother, "I cared nothing for him. He would have been executed or sent to the Wall for what he did in any case. It was also fortunate that Clegane stopped him before he could slay Princess Elia. He spared us a great amount of political turmoil with Dorne."

"Then why does the fact that he killed Ser Amory continue to upset you?" Kevan said inquisitively.

Tywin looked his brother in the eye and responded with "Because he should not have been anywhere near Amory Lorch during the Sack of King's Landing."

Now Kevan was baffled. "What do you mean?"

"I never told Clegane or anyone else about Lorch's assignment," Tywin revealed, "Lorch alone knew that I had sent him after Prince Rhaegar's wife and children. I know that because he was not the type to share his special orders with others, and I gave him the assignment when he and I were alone in the lords' tent."

Kevan thought on that for a moment, and he theorized "Could it be possible Gregor overheard your conversation with Lorch?"

"Unless he had the hearing of an actual lion, I'm certain he did not eavesdrop on us," Tywin refuted, "No, he must have known of Lorch's task through some other means. If he did not know, he would have stayed out in the city until we had taken it. I had arranged beforehand for a number of our units to infiltrate and seize the Red Keep, but the Mountain was not one of the intended units."

Kevan lightly nodded his head in acknowledgment of those statements, and he muttered quietly "So what could he have been doing in there? Have you any theory as to why?"

"I have considered many," Tywin disclosed, "Most of them, I have rejected. But there is one that I believe is both conceivable and feasible."

"What might that be?" Kevan questioned curiously.

Tywin paused for a few seconds. He gazed around the room, as though he was checking for holes or openings in the walls or doors. After he was wholly certain no one was listening, Tywin shared his hypothesis with his brother.

He told him: "Gregor Clegane must possess a secret knowledge."

Kevan was still bewildered. "A secret knowledge of what?"

"The world at large," Kevan clarified, "Think on all he has done. He stopped Amory Lorch just in time to save Princess Elia, but too late to save her children. He encountered Lord Eddard Stark at the Tower of Joy right when Stark and his men engaged Aerys' Kingsguard in battle. Through simple words, he convinced Robert Baratheon to set aside his feelings for Lady Lyanna Stark; something the King's brothers and closest friends could never do. He formed the largest and most diverse fighting force in the Seven Kingdoms, and he knew how to appeal to all of his potential recruits. He has created and produced two new compounds which could revolutionize modern architecture. He married a woman from one of House Stark's most loyal vassals; he wed her after only knowing her a few months. Most of all... he and that woman now have a son together."

Kevan reflected carefully on everything Tywin just told him. He was being to comprehend the argument his brother was making.

"So you see, Kevan; my scorn for the Mountain is not the result of a simple grudge," Tywin illuminated. "Nor is it due to anything the Mountain has done wrong. Instead, it is the result of everything he has done right."

_He has done too much right. Under certain circumstances, that can be just as undesirable as too much wrong._

Once more, the two eldest sons of Tytos Lannister sat together in quietness. Finally, Kevan "I cannot blame you for being wary, Tywin. But you should give the Mountain some credit. He has brought some measure of unity to Westeros. Never in the history of the Seven Kingdoms have Westerlords, Northmen, Valemen, Dornishmen, Riverlords, Reachmen, Crownlords, Stormlords, and Ironborn fought together for the good of the realm."

Kevan smirked and claimed "That is a different scenario entirely. Most who take the black do so because their only alternative is to lose their freedom, their hands, their cocks, or their heads. Every member of the Legion without Banners joined that organization by their own volition.
Furthermore, men _and_ women are allowed entrance, and trueborn children and baseborn children are treated the same. It's only unappealing aspect is its location in the North. But winter has touched all of Westeros, so I very much doubt the Legionnaires feel much colder than we do just now."

Tywin raised an eyebrow and mumbled scathingly "If you are so impressed by the Legion without Banners, Kevan, why do you not enlist?"

"I will not lie to you; I have been tempted to do so," Kevan revealed, "But I am certain Dorna and Lancel would not be comfortable in the North. I will not force them to go there, and I cannot leave them behind, either. It is for their sakes that I remain here."

_As well as mine, I'm sure._

Kevan then grinned lightly and muttered "While we're on this topic, Tyrion mentioned to me the other day that he was thinking of joining the Legion when he is older."

Tywin was a little stunned at first, but then he rolled his eyes and murmured "Of course he would thought that. He'll think anything, even that which goes beyond the borders of sanity."

Kevan frowned and remarked "Tywin, you've told me yourself that you have no intention of letting Tyrion inherit the Rock."

"Indeed, I do not," Tywin confirmed flatly.
"Then why does the concept of him joining the Legion disagree with you?" Kevan inquired.

"The Legion has already absorbed our little brother," Tywin pointed out, "From the letters Gerion has sent us, he has become one of the company's top officers. Worse yet, he and the Mountain have become fast friends. And Gerion possesses little more than average intelligence. Tyrion, for all his flaws, is very intelligent and cunning. Think of what he could do for the Legion without Banners. It could mean good things for a great many people. But not good things for everyone. Particularly those that have had quarrels with both Tyrion and the Mountain."

Once more, Kevan seemed stunned by his brother's words. "You sound as though Lord Gregor is out to get us."

"I assure you I do not believe he is," Tywin pronounced, "But I'm concerned."

"Concerned about what?" Kevan asked.

Tywin elucidated "The Cleganes in the North are becoming too powerful. Thousands of people from all over Westeros follow Gregor Clegane. They never question his orders or his competence. The fact that he was just the son of a landed knight five years ago matters nothing to them. As long as he maintains his values, he'll never lose the loyalty of his soldiers. Moreover, he's respected throughout the Seven Kingdoms. They praise his name and his deeds everywhere, especially in the North. He has all but become a Northman himself, now that he has taken a Northern bride and fathered a Northern child."

"Your concern is not unfounded," Kevan declared, "But in a way, it is still the result of your own hasty actions, Tywin. Do you ever wonder if perhaps you should not have released Gregor Clegane from his right to Clegane's Keep?"

"I wonder that often," Tywin expounded, "But it is no use lamenting on what is done and cannot be undone. Even though he forfeited his claim to his father's lands, the Mountain still cares very deeply for the family here in the Westerlands."

"If you're so anxious about the possibility that he will one day move against us, you could always use them to ensure his passivity," Kevan proposed.

"Oh, I intend to," Tywin asserted, "Why do you think I took Sandor Clegane on as my squire? The boy is very qualified and capable, but his main function is to serve as leverage against his brother."

"That does not surprise me," Kevan murmured frankly, "But as I'm sure you know, Sandor cannot remain your squire forever."

"Of course I know that," Tywin avowed, "To our good fortune, plenty more can be done to guarantee House Clegane's cooperation."

"Is that why you've entertained the idea of raising the Clegane's Keep Cleganes to lordly status?" Kevan presumed.

"It is," Tywin replied, "I have not decided whether or not to go through with that arrangement. I do know that Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah will be extremely grateful for the honor, and that kind of gratitude is not easily earned or lost."

"True, but it would still not be enough to bind the Cleganes to House Lannister," Kevan noted. He rubbed his chin and contended "Perhaps you could arrange a marriage between Sandor and a member of one of the chief noble houses in the Westerlands."
"That might not be an option," Tywin debated, "I have heard rumors that there could soon be a marriage contract between Sandor Clegane and Oberyn Martell's eldest daughter."

"I thought Prince Oberyn only had bastards," Kevan recalled.

"Until recently, he did," Tywin disclosed, "A number of months ago, the King issued a decree, legitimizing Obara and Nymeria Sand. Now, both of them are as suitable for marriage as any other highborn lady in Westeros."

"Intriguing," Kevan commented, "But since no betrothals have been announced just yet, we still have time to intervene and propose a contract of our own design to Sandor's family."

"No," Tywin refuted, "A marriage between Sandor Clegane and Obara Martell would mean excellent things for relations between the Westerlands and Dorne. Even I would not dare to meddle in that affair."

"Fair enough," Kevan conceded, "So Sandor Clegane's days as a hostage are limited."

"Quite so," Tywin stated, "But Ellyn Clegane might still be useful in that respect."

Kevan did not appear to find that proposal a favorable one. He shrugged somewhat dismissively and muttered "We might find some work for her here at Casterly Rock. She could serve as a handmaiden to Genna or Dorna for a few years. But once she flowers, her parents will wish to marry her off."

"I do not believe her parents have any prospective matches for her just yet," Tywin supposed, "We have time to present them with a few of our own."

"Whom do you have in mind?" Kevan asked in interest.

Tywin did not reply right away. He would have to think on this matter for a while.

No matter who he recommended for Ellyn Clegane, this man would not be a resident of Casterly Rock. That could be a problem. In his mind, the closer Ellyn was to Casterly Rock (and the longer she was there), the more valuable she would be as a political hostage. If he could somehow get her to remain at Casterly Rock indefinitely, his control over the Cleganes would be reasonably failsafe.

But how could he accomplish that?

They were interrupted by a light tapping sound against the door to the solar.

Tywin turned towards the door and shouted "Come in!"

The door swung open and in came a short boy with short blond hair, stunted legs, and a pair of mismatched eyes. In his hand he held a rolled-up piece of parchment. He waved the parchment in the air and walked towards the desk quickly. He called out gleefully "Father! Uncle Kevan!"

"What is it, Tyrion?" Kevan questioned his nephew patiently. Tywin just grimaced, as he always did when his youngest child was nearby.

"A letter just arrived from Moat Cailin," the short boy announced excitedly, "It's from Uncle Gerion."

Kevan smiled at that and pulled up another chair. He gestured for Tyrion to sit down. The dwarf climbed onto the chair. He did not move gracefully, but at least he sat in a dignified manner.
Normally, Tywin Lannister would have been appalled by anything Tyrion did, regardless of his intentions. On any other day, he would have been annoyed and cross for interrupting their conversation.

This time, however, when he observed his son's actions, a thought passed through the lion lord's mind. A shrewd but conniving thought.

Could it be? Could this actually be what could…?

For the first time ever, Tywin Lannister smiled at his youngest child. Tyrion was taken aback when he saw his father grin at him, and he tentatively returned the smile back.

But the smile was not out of love or affection. It was a rather wicked smile, if truths be told.

Tywin had this smile because when he saw Tyrion, he knew precisely what he could do to bring Ellyn Clegane to Casterly Rock. And keep her there.

I may have found the perfect match…
Changes And Control

Chapter Notes

Note: Hey, guys; sorry for taking a little longer than usual to update. I've been extraordinarily busy this past week. In the last few days, I had two graduate school finals (one of which was just this morning), and I had to make studying for them my top priority. Fortunately, those are out of the way, and all I have left of my third class is a presentation on Wednesday. After that, I'm free for the rest of the semester.

By the way, some people found Tywin's conclusion about Gregor's "secret knowledge" of Westeros to be a little far-fetched. I'd like to clarify: Tywin isn't beginning to suspect that Gregor's from another world. NO ONE is ever going to wonder that about him, I assure you. By "secret knowledge," I really meant for Tywin to insinuate that he believed Gregor may have had his own network of spies, or some other unconventional means of acquiring information from all over the country. In other words, he DOES suspect Gregor of knowing much more than he lets on, but he is at a loss as to how Gregor knows so much in the first place.

Throughout Westeros' lengthy history, a babe of seventeen pounds being born alive was unheard of. The Citadel had records of babes who weighed slightly less than that who had lived, but they had weakened, crippled, or killed their mothers when they emerged from the womb. Most women in the modern Seven Kingdoms still would not have survived birthing one as large as Rickard Clegane.

As she had already proven many times over, Dacey Mormont was not "most women." Her son's birth had greatly fatigued her, but it had not rendered her helpless, comatose, or on the verge of death. Quite the contrary, she recovered at an alarmingly fast rate. By midafternoon, she had all but regained her strength.

Gregor's letters had told true. Mere hours after bringing Rickard into the world, Dacey had attempted to get up and move about. Vera and Maester Kennick both vehemently protested, as expected.

That was not enough to sway Dacey. Then, to her dismay, Gregor took their side. She did not have the option to ignore or disregard his advice.

Her husband beseeched (or "requested," as he called it) her to get some rest. She claimed that she had already been quite inactive for the last four months, and she had no intention of "slacking off" any longer.

Stubborn as Dacey was, Gregor ultimately won the argument. She agreed to remain abed for the rest of the day so that Maester Kennick could do some tests to ensure that she and Rickard were doing well. After that, she could do as she pleased. Gregor assured her that once the next daybreak was upon them, he would not even object if she wished to go riding.

While Dacey agreed to that arrangement, she was somewhat annoyed that her husband had confined her to her bed, even if it was only temporary.
Oh, well. I should count myself lucky that Gregor can listen to reason.

Dacey never voiced that thought, and if she had, few would have agreed with her. From the point of view of most others, Dacey had been the unreasonable one. Even so, in the long run, she was no deaf to reason than her husband.

Dacey spent the rest of the day tending to Rickard.

When he got hungry, Vera had offered to find a wet nurse for him. Dacey had firmly declined. She insisted on feeding her son from her own breast. When Vera mentioned that it was highly irregular for highborn ladies to feed their children that way, Dacey shamelessly informed the midwife that her own mother had done so. Indeed, Lady Maege had nursed Dacey and all her sisters.

Vera agreed to that logic. Subsequently, she showed Dacey the proper "technique" to nurse Rickard. That proved to be awkward and uncomfortable.

Learning the proper technique to wield a blade was almost easier.

Be that as it may, Dacey found that breastfeeding was much more relaxing than swordplay. It was also a wonderful bonding experience between her and her son. She noted that Rickard had a large appetite to match his size, but she had more than enough milk to quell his hunger at each meal.

Gregor stopped by the birthing chamber half a dozen times that day to check up on the two of them. Twice he walked in whilst Dacey was nursing Rickard. She did not mind; nothing he had not already seen was exposed. Gregor actually seemed somewhat intrigued by the nursing process. Dacey suspected it was because her breasts had doubled in size throughout the duration of her pregnancy. Given how often his gaze drifted to her chest, she believed that was indeed the case.

The next morning at first light, Maester Kennick released Dacey from his care. Gregor was there when she exited the birthing chamber with their son.

Big as Rickard was, she was able to cradle him in one arm, so her other arm was left free. That was fortunate; Gregor had brought her sword. He meant to return it to her right there, just as he promised he would. Dacey was quite pleased by the gesture, and she happily took her sword in her free hand.

Less than an hour later, Rickard Clegane was publically presented to the residents of Moat Cailin. The smallfolk, the servants, and the soldiers alike cheered for the debut appearance of their lord's heir. Dacey made sure to keep the presentation brief, as she did not wish to make an exhibit of her son. Shortly after, she reassumed her duties as Lady of Moat Cailin and a senior officer of the Legion without Banners.

Later that day, Dacey paid a visit to the training yard. It had been a long while since she had last brandished a weapon, but she was quick to make up for lost time. Ser Rodrik Cassel, Prince Oberyn Martell, and some of the other expert swordsmen were able to help her get back into shape. After four days of vigorous exercises, one would never have guessed that Dacey had been absent from the training yard for the last four months.

Ironically, when Dacey returned to the optimal condition she had been in immediately before her pregnancy, the country did, as well.

As it happened, Rickard Clegane's birth coincided with the changing of the seasons. Three days after he came into the world, the blizzards stopped everywhere, including the North. Four days later, the white raven arrived from the Citadel. That marked the ending of winter and the beginning of spring.

Some people at Moat Cailin speculated that the concurrent arrival of both Lord Gregor's heir and spring was a sign of good things to come. Dacey was willing to entertain such a notion. Although she was not one to believe in superstitions, she knew that Rickard would certainly bring about plenty of good things for her and Gregor. Primarily the guarantee that their house's line would continue, as well as their happiness.

Within the next fortnight, the snows of Westeros had almost completely melted. A few inches remained in the North, but compared to the intense whiteouts of the past year, those inches seemed little more than the dew of a brisk morning.

The different climate was quite welcomed by the occupants of Moat Cailin. Many of the smallfolk had chosen to take up residence in the moat's towers, but now they were able to return to their homes in the villages. Furthermore, no one had to struggle to keep warm anymore.

Even so, Gregor and Dacey were content to continue doing what they had done to stay warm.

For the first three weeks following Rickard's birth, Dacey was still too sore to have intercourse. Luckily, she and Gregor had ways of satisfying each other's... urges.

For instance, whenever they got intimate, Gregor frequently kissed Dacey on her lips. Both pairs of her lips. He tended to pay more attention to the lower pair. Not that Dacey could complain. She enjoyed the traditional form of kissing as much as any woman, but every time her husband inserted his tongue into her pussy, he always brought her waves of overwhelming pleasure. Even when she hit her release, Gregor did not withdraw. Instead, he opted to lick her clean.

Dacey thought about the scenario, and she noticed something amusing. Rickard was nourished many times a day by her milk. But at night, Gregor was the one who got a taste of her "honey."

In addition to that, she would never share either of those with anyone other than her son and her husband respectively.

I'd better be sure never to confuse the two, she had thought jokingly. Then she reflected on that jape, and she realized just how depraved the concept behind it truly was.

Oh, gods; wouldn't THAT be disgusting? Even the Targaryens would be appalled.

Gregor had seen to the construction of a nursery in the room immediately below his and Dacey's bedchamber. However, for the first couple months, they had Rickard sleep with them. Most nights, they tucked him safely between them, and they slept a few feet apart so that there would be no risk of overcrowding him. On nights when they got intimate, they placed him in a cradle, and they waited until he was sound asleep before they engaged in any sexual acts.

Their son turned out to be a very heavy sleeper. Once they put him down for the night, nothing could wake him up. Other than himself, of course.

Half the time, Rickard did not wake up until one or both of his parents did. The other half, his sleeping schedule greatly deviated from theirs. Sometimes Rickard woke in the middle of the night for various reasons, all of which were traditional infant needs. Even if he was not sleeping in between his parents or five feet away from them, his wails were loud enough to rouse everyone in the Lord's Tower.

Fortunately, his parents were very light sleepers by contrast. Whenever he started crying, they would be up and out of bed almost straightaway.
Before long, Dacey and Gregor devised a system where they took turns tending to their infant boy. Normally, she handled the feedings, and he handled everything else. Gregor argued that since Dacey had done most of the work to bring Rickard into the world, he should do more of the work that had to be done after. Dacey had no quarrel with that. It meant more rest for her, after all.

Sometimes Gregor would sing Rickard to sleep. To Dacey's astonishment (and delight), her husband had a rather pleasant singing voice. His vocal range was very broad; he could sing in a high, middle, or low tone, depending on the mood of the song. However, some of the songs Gregor sang… Dacey had never heard them or their like before. She enjoyed them, but she was curious as to where they had originated. She could have asked Gregor, but for various reasons, she decided not to. She ultimately concluded that either he had written the songs himself, or he had heard them from somewhere outside the North.

Throughout the day, Gregor and Dacey were usually preoccupied with their duties as lord and lady of Moat Cailin, as well as their high-ranking positions in the Legion without Banners. So for most of the hours of sunlight, Rickard was left in the care of Vera and some of the moat's servants. At night, his parents reassumed full responsibility of him. Regardless of the time of day, Dacey insisted on being the only one who fed her son. Normally, whenever he was hungry, she would stop whatever she was doing and tend to him. Even if she was drilling in the training yard or discussing strategies with the other officers of the Legion, her first priority was Rickard's well-being.

Dacey and Gregor had suspected that parenthood would be a challenge. In that, they were correct; it was probably the biggest of any challenge they had encountered so far. That included their experience with the mountain clans of the Vale and the winters in the North.

All the same, the challenge was totally worth it. It was a life-altering experience for both Dacey and Gregor. It taught them more about patience, compassion, empathy, and, most importantly, love. Both of them had already been very capable of love; they loved their families, friends, allies, and neighbors greatly, but neither of them had ever loved anyone the way they loved Rickard. He seemed to bring out the greatest aspects in them. In a way, he made both of his parents even better people than they had been before. Most of all, before he came into the world, the Cleganes in the North had only been a married couple. Now, with the addition of Rickard, House Clegane of Moat Cailin had become a full-fledged family. That realization brought Gregor and Dacey into a state of bliss.

This state of bliss lasted a couple months. Then Moat Cailin received a raven from Bear Island. It carried a letter addressed to Dacey. Maester Kennick brought it to her, and she took it from him. She seemed a little reluctant to accept it. For some reason, she could not help but think that the raven had brought her sad news. Usually, her family only wrote when they had news of that sort to share.

As they say: dark wings, dark words.

And dark words they were.

Lady Blinda Mormont had died earlier that week. The cause of death had been attributed to illness. That was hardly surprising; Blinda Glover had always been a sickly woman. Even so, her ailments had never before been fatal.

In any case, Dacey was saddened to learn that her cousin's wife had perished.

Lord Jorah Mormont was now a widower. A childless widower, at that. While he mourned his wife, it was his responsibility to find another one. Ideally, he would need someone young who was capable of giving him heirs. Since he was already a grown man and the head of his house, the task of finding a new bride fell solely on his shoulders.

Dacey wished she could have provided some form of comfort to her cousin. But she did not know what she could say that might improve his demeanor. Gregor noticed his wife's concern, and he ensured her that Jorah would overcome this tragedy. He seemed queerly confident that Jorah would be able to move on and find another wife soon enough. He claimed that what they really needed to be worried about was what happened after he found her. Dacey did not know how her husband could have been so certain of that, but she chose to trust in his prediction.

In the meantime, Gregor focused on another marriage contract; one that involved a member of his own family.

Not long after the white raven appeared, Gregor wrote a letter to Clegane's Keep. He informed his parents that he and Oberyn Martell had gotten the idea to forge a betrothal between Sandor and the Red Viper's oldest daughter. Truthfully, the idea was more Oberyn's in origin, but Gregor had agreed to it, and he had the influence to make it happen.

Gregor made certain to mention that Obara was no longer a bastard. That was a critical part, as his parents had no way of knowing that she had been legitimized by the King. Had he left it out, his mother would have burned the letter immediately after reading it.

After sending off the raven, Gregor and Oberyn approached Obara and told her of their plans. The Red Viper assured his daughter that they would not force her to partake in the pact. She had the option to accept or refuse. As before, nothing would be predetermined for her without her consent.

Obara actually seemed quite open to the concept of entering a marriage contract with Sandor Clegane. With the exception of the Legionnaires, she claimed had never seen a man who respected her as an equal. Sandor had treated her as such, both in and out the training yard. She did not love him, and she was certain he did not love her. But she believed that they could come to love each other in time.

Plus, Obara knew that since she now had her father's name, she had all the privileges that came with it. She was required to accept all the responsibilities of it, as well. That included the obligation to spread the reach of her family through marriage. She debated that she may as well do that with someone she liked. That was an outlook that Gregor, Dacey, and Oberyn could all understand and relate to.

A few weeks later, a letter arrived from Clegane's Keep. It was a follow-up to the one Gregor had sent to his parents.

Ser Tarrence and Lady Daliah had spent some time seriously contemplating the marriage contract. Since Obara was now trueborn, they were quite open to the match; they found it rather appealing, in fact. They had gone over the matter with their younger son, too. After all, it was his future they had been discussing. As luck would have it, Sandor was just as open to the match as they were. He had made much the same argument as Obara, only his was a little less centered on duty and inspired more by affection.

Dacey had read the follow-up letter with Gregor, and both of them had been entertained by the description of Sandor's reasons for fancying the match.

_Who would have thought my brother-by-law was a bit of a romantic? I suppose he's like his brother in more than just stature._
What mattered was that a marriage contract between Obara Martell and Sandor Clegane was definitely possible. At this point, Obara and Sandor were both willing to go along with the match. Oberyn Martell and Tarrence and Daliah Clegane had no direct opposition to the betrothal, either.

However, while Oberyn and Daliah had become acquainted with Sandor and Obara respectively at Gregor and Dacey's wedding, Tarrence had not been present at that event. So he and Obara had never been in the same place.

Near the end of the missive, Ser Tarrence expressed a desire to meet Obara before he agreed to wed his heir to her. That request was a reasonable one, as every father had a right to know his future daughter-by-law before she became so. Nonetheless, in order to grant that request, one of them would have to travel to where the other was.

Tarrence was still unwilling to come north to Moat Cailin. After the last winter, he wished to have a long respite from cold weather. Aside from that, as the master of Clegane's Keep, he had other matters to attend to apart from seeking out a bride for his son. After all, the ride to Moat Cailin and back was roughly a two-month-round trip, and being away from the keep for even a week would have complicated his affairs.

Three years ago, he could have afforded such a trek. Now that House Clegane of Clegane's Keep had grown so greatly in status, Ser Tarrence was a busier man. He was constantly working tirelessly to maintain and further his house's growth.

In any case, the more practical course of action was for Obara to go to Clegane's Keep instead. That was never explicitly stated anywhere in Tarrence Clegane's letter, but it had been heavily implied, and Dacey, Gregor, and Oberyn had arrived at that conclusion all on their own.

Right after they finished reading the letter, the three of them sought out Obara. They apprised her of everything that had been discussed in the letter, including the subtle proposal that she visit Clegane's Keep.

Obara appeared only mildly stunned by that proposition. Truthfully, she had expected that Ser Tarrence would desire to make her acquaintance before she and Sandor decided to swear any vows.

Fortunately, she had no issue with relocating to the Westerlands for a while. If anything, she felt she would enjoy a change of scenery. Even if said scenery was located in the domain of Lord Tywin Lannister. Plus, she would get to see the holdfast whose lady she might one day be. That was just as important to Obara as meeting her was to Ser Tarrence. She did not think she would be appalled by the holdfast or anything of the sort; she merely wished to see it before she bound herself to it.

For the sake of efficiency and haste, it was decided that Obara should meet Tarrence as soon as humanly possible. So immediately after she agreed to the meeting, preparations were made to arrange her transportation to Clegane's Keep.

To ensure that his daughter passed through the Westerlands safely, Oberyn assigned half a dozen Legionnaires – all of them Dornish – to escort Obara to Clegane's Keep. All six of them had been longtime friends and trusted allies of the prince. They swore to him that they would protect and guard Obara with their lives.

Dacey was there when Obara departed from the moat. She had opted to see the former Sand Snake off. Obara was very appreciative of that. She embraced Dacey affectionately and told her that she looked forward to having her as her sister-by-law. Dacey claimed much the same.
Both of us already have plenty of sisters. But there's no wrong in having one more.

Obara also shared a tender moment with Nymeria, Oberyn, and Ellaria at the southern gates of Moat Cailin. They bade her the best of luck (not that she had any need of it), and she promised them she would be careful and that she would wait until they were available to get wed.

After the good-byes were given, Obara and her six Dornish companions exited Moat Cailin through the southern gate. They solemnly made their way down the Causeway, riding in silence. Dacey was certain Obara was ready; she did not look back even once.

Straight after she left, Gregor dispatched another raven to Clegane's Keep, notifying his parents that they could expect Obara Martell to arrive within a moon's turn.

Whatever happened next was left in the hands of the gods.

Over the next few months, Dacey developed a type of daily routine.

In the early morning, she woke up, readied herself, and fed Rickard. After entrusting her son to the servants, she broke her fast with her husband and his council in the Banquet Tower. Then she spent an hour sparring in the training yard. Sometimes she helped Ser Rodrik Cassel break in the new recruits or test the more experienced combatants in the Legion.

In the late morning and early afternoon, she executed her role as Lady of Moat Cailin. She oversaw the affairs of the moat alongside Erryk Ruttiger and Sylas Vikary. She fed Rickard again, and then she went to feed herself. After lunching with the top memembers of the Legion without Banners, she and Gregor reviewed all the materials they had which pertained to the Legion. Most of those materials were status updates on the Legion's growth and the spread of its influence or missives from all over the country requesting the Legion's services. Whenever the latter came up, she, Gregor, and the other officers assigned a carefully-assembled team of Legionnaires to seek out the problem and settle it. The goal was to settle the conflict peacefully and with minimum bloodshed. That was almost always how things turned out.

In the later afternoon and early evening, Dacey fed Rickard once more. Then she and Gregor took some time to mingle with their colleagues and retainers. That was the one time of the day when she was actually able to relax and interact with peers. After supper, she and Gregor briefly went around the moat one last time to ensure that everything was in order. Then they retired to their chambers at the top of the Lord's Tower and stopped by their son's room.

In the late evening, Dacey fed Rickard one last time. After that, she and Gregor usually spent at least another hour with him before they turned for the night.

Although Rickard had now been moved to the nursery below his parents' bedroom, Dacey and Gregor had given the servants explicit instructions to come to them if their son woke up in the middle of the night. Since they were so busy during the day, they felt they could at least see to his needs at night.

So that was generally Dacey Clegane's everyday agenda. On the whole, it was very productive and rewarding.

Occasionally, there were some discrepancies in it.

Four months after Obara left for Clegane's Keep, Ellaria gave birth to her second child (and Oberyn's sixth). They had another girl; this one they named Obella. Since the Dornishwoman had been there during Rickard's birth, Dacey was with Ellaria when she bore her second daughter.
Ellaria was very grateful for the Bear Islander's concern.

Dacey had come to enter a type of close friendship with Ellaria; very similar to the friendship that had blossomed between her husband and the Dornishwoman's lover. Some people whispered that perhaps there was more than just friendship that connected the four of them. She had been outraged at first, but Ellaria and Oberyn convinced her that she should not let rumors bother her. So she agreed to simply ignore that form of gossip.

Sometimes, the Legion received what Gregor called a "priority-one" assignment. Every time that happened, the Mountain had to go out and resolve the dilemma himself. Dacey would have liked to go with him (just as he would have liked to have had her come along), but it was irresponsible to deprive Moat Cailin of both its lord and lady in times of peace. So whenever Gregor was needed elsewhere, Dacey was left in charge of Moat Cailin.

Gregor was never gone for more than a few days at a time, and Dacey ruled the moat well in his absence, but she missed him and yearned to have him back all the same. Thankfully, Rickard was always around to keep her company. She took comfort in the lack of her husband's company by spending more time in her son's. Those precious experiences were what prevented Dacey from ever thinking that her husband might not come back from one of his "priority-one" assignments. Her son was strong; his father was the strongest man she knew.

Such strength cannot be defeated easily.

In the seventh month of that year, there was a minor change in Gregor's behavior. The change was slight, but not so slight that Dacey did not notice it.

The change was in the way Gregor acted around the Legionnaires from the Iron Islands. He continued treating them with the same courtesies and respect he treated all the other Legionnaires. But now he gazed at the Ironborn with prying eyes, as though he was scrutinizing them or wondering intently on what they were thinking.

Dacey speculated that her husband was probably beginning to suspect the Ironmen Legionnaires of planning some wicked deed. If that was the case, she could not fault him for believing so. Despite having served with them for nearly two years, she was still somewhat mistrustful of the Ironborn.

Bear Island had often been a frequent site for plundering by the Ironborn raiders. House Mormont usually managed to repel the raiders when they came, but victory tended to come at a price. The iron price, was what they called it.

As far as Dacey was aware, Bear Island had never been raided in her lifetime. During the days when Lord Quellon Greyjoy ruled the Iron Islands, the Ironborn had made an honest effort to mend relations with the rest of Westeros. Under Lord Quellon's direction, the taking of thralls had been outlawed, maesters had been introduced to the Islands, and reaving had been all but forbidden. For a while, it actually appeared as though the Iron Islands would be fully incorporated into the Seven Kingdoms.

There were many who doubted that such a thing could come to pass. One of those nonbelievers was Dacey's lady mother, Maege Mormont.

Lady Maege vividly remembered the days before Lord Quellon was in power. Back then, the entire western coast of the country lived in fear of being attacked by Ironborn raiders. Bear Island was one of their favorite places to reap.

Maege had been younger than Dacey when she first helped her family fight off the Ironborn invaders. She once told Dacey of an occasion when one of the raiders had attempted to take her as a salt wife. She had responded by hacking off his manhood and feeding the rest of him to a bear that lived on the island. She even claimed that that same bear became Dacey's father.

Dacey never knew if her mother was joking about that last part. There was a myth on Bear Island that sometimes, the women lay with bears to produce trueborn children. Dacey had never really known her father, but she decided she would rather not know who (or what) he was.

Lord Quellon Greyjoy had succeeded in initiating a ceasefire between the Ironborn and the rest of Westeros. After he died at the Battle of the Mander, near the end of Robert's Rebellion, his son Balon had become the lord of the Iron Islands.

There had been little to no contact with Pyke since then. In fact, other than the Ironborn that had joined the Legion without Banners, the peoples of the Iron Islands had practically cut themselves off from the rest of the world. Although the seas were considerably safer to traverse in modern times, no one dared to feel too secure. The last thing they needed was to be caught unaware by pirates, especially pirates native to the Iron Islands.

The Ironborn have nothing to gain by living as hermits on those rocks. Maybe they really are planning something.

Ten days later, Dacey discovered that they were. In the early afternoon, Gregor assembled the secret council. He gathered them discreetly, as he always did. But he was even more cautious than usual this time. He almost seemed under the impression that if he made the slightest misstep, someone would immediately catch on to what the secret council was doing. No one wanted that; it would ruin all their covert operations.

Dacey and the others had all gone into the meeting with no inkling of what it would be about. They had congregated several times since Rickard's birth. Most of those meetings had merely involved discussions. They had not launched any more conspiracies to kill anyone else, but Gregor had mentioned the names of a few people they should keep close tabs on. Chief among them were Roose Bolton and Walder Frey. Many more potential marriage contracts between the Great Families and their chief vassals had been addressed, but the one between Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell was still the only one that was currently in the making.

At this council meeting, they did not converse on people who should be monitored or eliminated. Nor did they discuss any betrothals. Instead, the topic was far grimmer and much more unsettling: the impending threat of war.

"I'm sorry; please, forgive me," Allard Seaworth said anxiously, shaking his head a bit. The meeting was already well underway at this point. The Stormlander gazed at the largest person in the room and queried "What did you just say, my lord?"

"You heard me, Allard," Gregor Clegane told the younger man, "In less than a year, the Iron Islands will be at war with the rest of Westeros."

Allard and everyone else there who thought they had misheard the Mountain were now convinced that they had not. Even so, that verification did not make his words any easier to absorb or swallow.

Victarion Greyjoy did not try to avoid making eye contact with any of the others, but he was in no rush to look any of them in the eye, either.

"How can you be so certain, my lord?" Lyn Corbray enquired.
"Other than those of them that are here, we've hardly seen any trace of the Ironborn in five years," Garth Hightower pointed out.

"Because they've been biding their time," Gregor proclaimed, "They do not plan to stay on the islands indefinitely. To prove it, I ask you to consider how productive they've been these past five years."

"Productive in what manner?" asked Osmund Kettleback.

"They've vastly increased their supply of ships and weapons," Gregor elaborated, "In addition to that, they've been training children as young as twelve to fight and sail. Now they have the most soldiers they've ever had since the days before Lord Quellon Greyjoy reigned. The majority of those soldiers are equally capable as raiders. So put all that together."

The ten other Legionnaires thought on those points for a minute. After that, Smalljon Umber queried "What outcome are you drawing from this, my lord?"

"It should be obvious," Gregor disclosed, "The Ironborn have spent the last five years preparing an invasion force."

A wave of silence passed over the room. A very tense, uncomfortable silence.

Victarion Greyjoy broke it with a sigh. He pronounced "You could be right, Lord Gregor. I have not set foot on Pyke in over a year, but while I was there, Balon was constantly at work. Every day, he was constructing more ships, forging more weapons, and training more soldiers. There's no reason to think he has halted his operations since then. But even with all that said… I never suspected he was planning an invasion."

"Are you saying you never asked him his intentions?" Oberyn Martell presumed, clearly skeptical.

"It is not my place to question my brother's actions," Victarion debated firmly, "I simply assumed he was striving to make the Islands stronger."

"He was," Gregor contended, "And he still is. It's how he means to make them stronger that should perturb us."

Most of the others were still struggling to grasp the concept of a forthcoming Ironborn invasion, but Dacey, Smalljon, and Brynden Tully were starting to admit the likelihood of its credibility.

"What does Balon Greyjoy hope to accomplish, my lord?" Brynden Tully queried.

"He plans to launch a rebellion similar to King Robert's," Gregor elucidated, "He'll start by burning the fleet at Lannisport. Then he'll progress along the western shores of the North, the Riverlands, the Westerlands, and the Reach, reaping and raping as he pleases. He plans to have raided a great many of the coastal holdfasts before we are even able to launch a counterattack."

"He must be mad if he believes he can challenge the Seven Kingdoms by himself," Allard Seaworth debated.

"My brother was never the sanest of men," Victarion professed, "Whereas our father sought to build rich and lasting connections with those who live on the mainland of Westeros, Balon deems himself above the idea of establishing an alliance with greenlanders."

"And people say my family is too proud," Gerion Lannister mumbled heatedly, "Just who does he think he is?"
"He thinks himself a king," Gregor declared.

Dacey Mormont raised an eyebrow and commented "Really?"

Gregor nodded at his wife and stated "That's his true goal. Once Balon Greyjoy begins his rebellion, he'll crown himself the King of the Iron Islands."

"How could you possibly know that, my lord?" queried Osmund Kettleback.

"Not just that," Allard Seaworth interjected, "How did you know about any of Lord Balon's objectives?"

"I have my resources," was all Gregor said at first.

Normally, that would have been a sufficient response. Alas, this time, it was not.

"Lord Gregor, there has been almost no communication with the Iron Islands since the end of Robert's Rebellion," Lyn Corbray pointed out, "Other than the ravens you sent out when you founded the Legion without Banners, there has been no word to or from Pyke."

"Ser Lyn is correct," Garth Hightower corrected, "Even the Master of Whisperers' birds don't fly that far. The only way anyone in the Seven Kingdoms could have acquired this information was if they heard it from the Ironborn themselves."

"And the only Ironborn we've encountered recently are those of them who are serving in the Legion," Oberyn Martell added in.

"My men and I don't know of any rebellion, I promise you," Victarion Greyjoy insisted, "If my brother was planning to revolt, I would have known of it. I'd like to think he would have tried to stop me from coming here."

"Maybe he didn't care," Osmund Kettleback hypothesized with a smirk, "Maybe he thought you had gone soft."

Victarion scowled and mumbled irately "Do the finger dance with me, Kettleback, and then we'll see if I've gone soft."

Dacey quickly gestured for quietness, and when it came, she turned to her husband and told him "I think what they mean to say, my lord, is that you seem to be very well-aware of an affair that no one here should be well-aware of."

"Lady Dacey speaks it true," Brynden Tully conceded, looking to the Mountain, "I would normally heed your counsel without questioning where it came from, but this is one occasion where I must make an exception."

"I must, as well," Oberyn Martell remarked, "It is one thing to claim that a minor lord will conspire to seize power for his own selfish purposes. But this is the possible emergence of war we are talking about now. We cannot act upon it without being absolutely certain."

"Well, I am absolutely certain," Gregor avowed.

"But we're not," Smalljon Umber countered, "I'd like to know how you can be, my lord. Just what aren't you telling us?"

For three minutes, Gregor Clegane did not answer that question. He just sat in his chair, gazing around the room at the other ten seated people. He appeared almost speechless.

Dacey knew her husband to be a very calm and organized man. Regardless of how desperate the scenario, he never lost his composure. Now… he actually appeared apprehensive, as though he had been backed into a corner by his enemies. But even his true enemies had never sparked that sort of reaction from him. Instead, his closest allies had been the ones to do so.

Ultimately, Gregor took a deep breath, let it out gradually, and announced "I have… a source."

"What kind of source?" Dacey inquired.

"I cannot say," Gregor declared, "All you need to know is this: this source is what gives me the opportunity to effect positive changes in Westeros. I have been using it since before I founded the Legion without Banners. This source was what enabled me to save Princess Elia Martell from Ser Amory Lorch. It was also how I knew that Lord Petyr Baelish would exploit Lady Lysa Arryn for his own gain. Now, thanks entirely to the source, I have learned of Lord Balon Greyjoy's ambitious plans to have his people embrace the Old Way."

Now Dacey and the other nine men had their turn to be speechless. None of them had known what to expect as Gregor's explanation for how he knew the Ironborn would rebel, but none of them could have foreseen this explanation. Even so, it seemed bizarrely plausible.

"Why can you not share this source with us, my lord?" Allard Seaworth inquired.

"If I name my source, it could compromise all of the Legion's activities." Gregor proclaimed, "In the wrong hands, the source can be used to effect negative changes, as well. But as long as it remains solely in my possession, it will only be used with pure intentions."

"That sounds like a great deal of power for one man," Smalljon Umber noted.

"I know what you mean, Jon," Gregor asserted, "But the right man can wield this power responsibly."

"You fancy yourself the right man, my lord?" Oberyn Martell asked rhetorically.

"Yes, I do," Gregor solemnly declared, "If I could, I'd share it with the rest of you. But I cannot. I do not believe you to be unworthy or anything of the sort. I am merely withholding the source for your own protection."

"Our protection?" Gerion Lannister repeated in perplexity.

"That's right," the Mountain confirmed, "This source is dangerous. It took me years to bring it under my control. Even if I wanted to, I couldn't share it with you. All I can do is tell you what I know, and beseech you to trust in me and have faith in me, just as you've been doing."

Lyn Corbray, Victarion Greyjoy, Garth Hightower, Osmund Kettleback, Gerion Lannister, Oberyn Martell, Dacey Mormont, Allard Seaworth, Brynden Tully, and Smalljon Umber gazed around the room at each other, as though they were having a conversation with their eyes. No actual words were exchanged; only glances. They were trying to decide for themselves whether Gregor's vague yet dramatic account was enough information to go by, or if it was still inadequate to appease their curiosities.

Eventually, each of them gave in and accepted Gregor's reasoning. For the time present at least, Dacey and the other nine men would continue to put their faith in the Mountain.
"You've gotten us this far, my lord," Brynden Tully declared, "We can trust you are not misleading or deceiving us. But I hope to know more about this 'source' of yours someday."

"So do I," Allard Seaworth put in. There came strong murmurs of agreement from around the room.

"Perhaps I will," Gregor contended, "But until then, I would ask you not mention the source to anyone. Like everything we've discussed at this table, my source only exists in this room."

"We understand, Gregor," Dacey assured her husband. The other nine men gave their word, as well.

The rest of the meeting was spent discussing the future rebellion by the Ironborn.

Gregor revealed that it would be at least five months before the rebellion began, but no more than seven. They had that long to prepare themselves against it.

Gerion Lannister proposed that they notify the throne of the upcoming rebellion. Gregor quickly struck that proposal down. He claimed that bringing this matter before the King would do them no good. Even if he exposed his source, he would have no concrete evidence to support his claim. It would seem little more than an elaborate rumor. Essentially, he would be making an accusation without proof. Such an action was profusely unadvisable, especially for someone in Gregor's position. All Gregor would have to back him was his word, and even his word had limits on the Small Council.

So telling the crown was out of the question. All the same, there was plenty they could do to prepare the Seven Kingdoms against Balon's raiders.

It was decided that they would write an urgent missive to every holdfast located on the shores of Westeros (both the west and the east costs, to be safe). They would alert the inhabitants of those fortresses that the Legion had learned of the strong possibility of an impending Ironborn incursion. They knew that most of the lords of those holdfasts would not curious as to how the Legion became aware of this information. They would simply chose to follow up on that information and build up their defenses against anything that could emerge from the sea.

Osmund Kettleback, Lyn Corbray, and Brynden Tully were somewhat skeptical about what Victarion Greyjoy and the other Ironborn Legionnaires would do once the rebellion began. Lyn even suggested that perhaps joining the Legion had not been Victarion's idea after all. Perhaps Balon had sent him to spy on the true members.

Victarion was quick to answer that accusation. He adamantly asserted that he was no man's errand boy, not even his brother's. Enlisting in the Legion had been his decision and his alone. Furthermore, he still believed far more in his father's ideals for what was best for the Iron Islands than he did in Balon's.

The Iron Captain vowed that if war broke out between his people and the rest of Westeros, he and his men would stand with the Mountain. He claimed that he would not allow his brother to undo everything their lord father had done to ensure the prosperity of the Ironborn.

It was fortunate that Victarion had looked up to and admired his father as much as he did. Otherwise, he would almost certainly have chosen to side with Balon instead.

When Gregor asked him if he could speak for all the Legionnaires from the Iron Islands, Victarion admitted he could not. Gregor instructed him to go around the moat later and ask each of their Ironborn colleagues if his or her first duty was to the Iron Islands or to the Legion. He wished to be informed which of them picked the former and which the latter. Victarion agreed to do just that.

Despite how loyal Victarion seemed to be to the Legion, he was very clear on one point: if and when the rebellion happened, he would be willing to fight and kill other Ironborn, but he would not engage his brother or any other member of his family in battle. He firmly declared that he would never become a kinslayer, not for Gregor or anyone.

Gregor found that fair. He assured Victarion (and everyone else there) that he would never ask any of them to kill a member of their own families. If need be, he would have them bring them to justice, but he would never order them to commit the most dreadful crime of kinslaying.

By midafternoon, the meeting ending. But Dacey and the ten men stayed together for a little while after. They headed as a group to the rookery, and as soon as they got there, they set to writing letters. These were the aforementioned warnings meant for the seaside holdfasts and fortresses in Westeros. It turned out more highborn families lived along the shores of the country than they had originally thought.

Around half of all Westerosi houses were found within ten miles of the sea or a river that led out to the sea. Not wishing to take chances, a notice was dispatched to each of them. The notice was brief but explicit; it mentioned the very probable likelihood of a maritime incursion in the near future, and the recipient was cautioned to prepare themselves against that threat.

Since the warning came from the Legion without Banners, nearly everyone who received it chose to heed its counsel. The only ones who did not were those who were confident that the Ironborn would not dare to attack them or even dare to attack anyone at all. Those were individuals such as Stannis Baratheon of Dragonstone and Walder Frey of the Twins.

After that meeting where her husband first mentioned his "source," Dacey resumed her typical day-to-day routine from before. Her routine more or less remained the same over the course of the next six months. She took care of Rickard, honed her skills in the training yard, carried out her role as Lady of Moat Cailin, served as an officer of the Legion without Banners, and spent much of her leisure time with her friends and her husband. That was the bulk of her everyday schedule for the second half of that year. Some might find it monotonous after a while, but Dacey did not. It was a very enjoyable way of living to her; she had nothing to complain about. Nor would she have changed anything about it.

Then the new year arrived. With it came change.

One night in the first week of the 289th year after Aegon's Conquest, Dacey was in bed with Gregor. They had just finished a particularly vigorous love-making session and were about to drift off to sleep. But just before they could fall into a slumber, there was a knock on the door to their bedchamber.

Gregor lifted himself up and barked impatiently "What?!!"

"I apologize for disturbing you, my lord," Erryk Ruttiger called out. He sounded distressed. "But a raven just arrived from King's Landing. Its marked with the King's seal."

Gregor promptly jumped out of bed, pulled on a pair of woolen breeches, and rushed to the door. Dacey had just enough time to grab a robe, throw it around her naked body and tie it in the front. Not two seconds after she fastened the knot, her husband opened the door to reveal the moat's castellan.
Erryk Ruttiger stepped inside with a piece of parchment in his hand, which he held out to Gregor straight away. The Mountain took it, opened it, and proceeded to read it. Dacey eyed him anxiously. She made note of how his face changed as he read. When he began, he was curious and nervous. By the end, he seemed extremely troubled.

Something's amiss, no question.

When Gregor finally gazed up from the paper, Dacey inquired "What is it, my love?"

"The Iron Fleet has set sail," Gregor announced, "They've just attacked Lannisport."

He paused for a moment to let that knowledge sink in. Erryk Ruttiger was the only one who was genuinely shocked by that news. Dacey and Gregor had somewhat expected to receive it sooner or later. That did not make hearing the news any easier for them, though.

"Anything else, my lord?" Erryk Ruttiger queried.

Gregor nodded and pronounced "King Robert is determined not to let this go unanswered. He's calling the banners."

"As it happens, we have none," Erryk pointed out.

"Makes no matter," Gregor said solemnly, "A threat has been made against Westeros. We will respond thusly."

"So we will answer the King's summons, my lord?" Erryk asked rhetorically.

"Yes," Gregor confirmed, "Gather the top Legionnaires in the courtyard, Erryk. Tell them… we're at war."

The castellan bowed and exited the bedchamber, leaving Gregor and Dacey along once more. The Mountain and the Bear Islander just gazed at each other silently. They were still trying to come to terms with this latest development on the balance of Westeros. But they both knew what they were going to do to help rectify it.

War. I wasn't even old enough to fight in the last war. And if Gregor thinks I'll sit out this one, he is mistaken. I'm going to show those Ironborn scumbags that this bear has claws.

So she would.
Bonds

Chapter Notes

Note: You may find that nothing of precedence occurs in this chapter; that it's nothing more than buildup. But trust me; everything in this chapter will be just as critical to the storyline and plot as everything in the previous chapters. So for those of you who are thirsty for action, bear with me just a little longer. Oh, and from now on, there will be about two or three alternating POV sections per chapter. I'm going to try to use as many different characters as possible. If there's anyone in particular whose perspective you'd like to see, feel free to mention it, and I'll see if I can write a section from his or her point of view.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Prince Oberyn Martell had resided in the North for over two years. In that time, he had noted many similarities the Northmen shared with the Dornish. One was how quick they both were to respond to any threats to their homelands.

There was little of the Westerlands left in Lord Gregor Clegane. The only way he could have been any more a Northerner was if he had been born in the North. Indeed; he demonstrated their typical hastiness when he replied to Robert Baratheon's summons immediately after he received it.

Gregor Clegane had the entire Legion without Banners assembled within a day after the King's raven arrived. He informed them of the King's declaration of war against the Ironborn, and how he intended to answer it thusly.

He announced that he would be splitting the Legion's numbers. Half the Legionnaires would join the King's army in the south. The other half would remain garrisoned at Moat Cailin and continue executing the usual duties of the Legion.

They would not march south just yet. It would take Lord Eddard Stark at least a fortnight to amass the strength of the North. They would wait to receive Lord Stark and his bannermen before they headed down the Causeway.

Gregor and his top officers spent that time deliberating on who among them would go and who would stay.

Brynden Tully had been Gregor's second-in-command ever since he enlisted in the Legion. As such, the Mountain decided that he would be left in command of the company that remained at the moat. The Blackfish accepted the appointment gladly.

Under normal circumstances, Ser Brynden would have demanded to join the forces that went to war, and he would have accompanied them even without permission. Furthermore, one could argue it to be foolish to leave him behind, as he was a better swordsman than any other Legionnaire (including Oberyn and Gregor).

Even so, Gregor debated that he would need someone he could trust to direct the other half of the Legion. After all, that half would be no more inactive than the half that joined the King's forces. Many of Westeros' lords and their soldiers would be off at war. As such, much of the country's law-enforcement entities would be absent for a while.

There were some people in Westeros who would probably see that as an opportunity to engage in criminal activities without fear of being caught. Ser Brynden Blackfish's Legionnaires would ascertain that these deviants were kept under control.

Additionally, the Ironborn had ways of traversing the swamps of the Neck. If they wished to, they could besiege Moat Cailin and seize it. The integrity of the Legion and the defense of the North were both critical to maintaining the defense of Moat Cailin. As a Riverlord, Brynden Tully knew how to prepare against maritime attacks.

With all that said, his experience, his skills, and his expertise made the Blackfish the ideal person to lead the Legion without Banners in Gregor's absence.

Lyn Corbray and Osmund Kettleback were the only other members of Gregor Clegane's inner circle that would stay at Moat Cailin.

Oberyn Martell, Dacey Mormont, Smalljon Umber, Victarion Greyjoy, Allard Seaworth, Gerion Lannister, and Garth Hightower would all join the Mountain. In fact, Gregor had appointed Oberyn as his top general and right hand man.

Oberyn was not at all surprised that Gregor had agreed to bring his wife along. Although Lady Dacey had insisted that she partake in the fighting, her husband would have included her in their ranks anyway. The Ironborn had never attacked Bear Island in her lifetime, but she was well-versed in fighting off wilding attacks. Furthermore, she was as much a figure of authority and respect as her lord husband. It was she that had brought about the inclusion of women in the Legion without Banners.

If Dacey rode by her husband's side to war in the other parts of Westeros, she might inspire more strong-willed females to take up arms, as well.

There was also the simple truth that Dacey wanted to be with her husband, just as he wished to remain with her.

Nothing like mixing business with pleasure.

Gregor and Dacey had opted to bring Rickard with them, too. Oberyn could understand their wish to have their son nearby. For similar reasons, he had chosen to bring Ellaria, Nymeria, Elia, and Obella south, as well. They would provide the prince some company on the march.

Different forms of company, of course.

The Northern army arrived at Moat Cailin about a week after Gregor Clegane finished dividing up the Legion's numbers. Lord Eddard and his generals spent a night conferring with Lord Gregor and his officers. At first light the following morning, the two men and their combined forces proceeded down the kingsroad.

The long march down the Neck was rather quiet and uneventful. That was very unusual; normally the swamps were rife with sounds and movement of the indigenous fauna.

Either crannogmen had hunted everything in that region, or the wildlife had gone into hiding. The latter was more likely. But they would only hide from something they were afraid of. Given the hazardous conditions of the bogs, whatever was fueling their fear must have been truly horrible.

The Ironborn may be closer than we thought.
The non-Legionnaire Northmen seemed skeptical of the presence of the Ironborn Legionnaires. Fortunately, the Northern members of the Legion convinced their countrymen that all the assembled Ironmen could be trusted. Indeed, months ago, Victarion Greyjoy had sorted out which of his men were loyal to him and Gregor Clegane and which were loyal to Balon Greyjoy. Less than a quarter had selected his brother, and those who had had been left behind at Moat Cailin. Ser Brynden would keep them under tight scrutiny until the rebellion ended. If need be, he would have them all confined to the dungeons at the first sign of mutiny.

Progress down the Neck was very slow and gradual. Only so many soldiers could walk or ride abreast at any one time. When the units made the most of their space, they had to be very careful with their feet. One step off the path could land them in a pit of quicksand or a pool of murky water.

On a dozen occasions, a man slipped and fell into the marshes. Three of them had been consumed by the bogs before their allies could rescue them. After the third man was lost, the length of the column was decreased.

The entire journey was really a struggle of choosing between speed and safety.

After three days of moving at a plodding pace, the Northern army and the Legion without Banners were finally clear of the Neck. Once they emerged from the marshlands, they were able to quicken their stride.

A few days later, they arrived at the Crossing.

Oberyn was riding alongside Gregor and Dacey when they did. He noted that Gregor seemed to bristle when the Twins came within their field of vision. It was as though the mere sight of the Frey holdfast was enough to disgust the Mountain.

Not that Oberyn could blame him. The Red Viper was less than fond of House Frey, as well.

When he first came north, Oberyn and his entourage were unfamiliar with the Riverlands. They had been told by the locals that the quickest way through the region was along the Trident. Unfortunately, in order to ford the river, a toll had to be paid. As such, they had to make use of Lord Walder Frey's bridge.

Luckily, Oberyn had plenty of coin on him. He was able to use that to pay for passage. That was fortunate, as the only other option would have been to forge a marriage contract between a member of his family and one of Lord Walder's. In that field, Oberyn had had nothing of interest for the Late Lord Frey.

Lord Walder did not try to push for any betrothals between one of his descendants and the prince. The Red Viper was known for fucking any man and woman who was willing, and he would likely continue doing so even after he married (assuming he ever would). While Lord Walder had never been the most faithful husband to any of his own wives, he would not have any of his daughters or granddaughters disgraced in that way.

So instead, he had accepted the Dornishman's gold. Lord Walder had allowed Oberyn and his company to rest in his fortress for a night.

He had not been a gracious host, as Oberyn could recall very well. The prince had been treated fairly enough, but the Freys had been very cold to his companions, especially Ellaria, Obara, and Nymeria. The women's status as bastards was the primary reason for that. The Freys barely even tolerated their own baseborn kin. So naturally, they looked down on all other bastards as degenerate lowlifes.

Ellaria was spared the worst of the Freys' mistreatment, seeing as she was sharing a bed with Prince Oberyn at the time. Obara and Nymeria were not so fortunate. Their appreciation and knowledge of combat was another target of ridicule for many of Lord Walder's brood. Nearly every one of them thought the idea of a woman carrying and training with weapons ludicrous. A few of the less tactful Freys had even suggested that the girls try out one of their "swords." In response, Obara and Nymeria declared that if the first man who tried anything of the sort would lose his sword.

Although the Freys had been the worst hosts they had ever had, Obara and Nymeria did not let their crude treatment bother them. They had been raised to embrace their position in the world and accept themselves as they were. So they did not allow the Freys to provoke or hurt them in any way. Even so, Oberyn was not as tolerant or forgiving of slights made toward his family. But at his daughters' insistence, he had done and said nothing to aggravate Lord Walder or his relations.

As they approached the Crossing, Oberyn inwardly hoped that the Freys would be a little more courteous to Nymeria this time. There was a fair chance that they would be, now that she had been legitimized and that fighting women were more commonplace in Westeros.

Whenever the Legion's services were required in the western half of Westeros, they often had to make use of the bridge at the Crossing, as well. Lord Walder had grudgingly allowed them to pass without a toll, as the Legion's activities were regarded as "king's business," and even he dared not interfere with the affairs of the crown.

For that reason, Gregor Clegane was holding out hope that Lord Walder would let his and Lord Eddard's forces use his bridge free of charge, too. Otherwise, they would probably reach the Westerlands well behind schedule.

When they were a hundred meters from the Twins, they spotted a small group of riders coming their way. When the group was within earshot, Oberyn called out "Who approaches?"

The riders remained silent until they were ten feet from Gregor, Eddard, Oberyn, and Dacey. Then the man at the very front of the group separated from the others. His horse trotted forward a few paces, and he announced "Ser Stevron Frey, heir to the Twins."

"Ser Stevron," Gregor said in acknowledgment with a slight nod, "Please convey our respects to your lord father, and inform him we have need of his bridge."

Most Freys would have demanded an explanation or something more than that. Luckily for the Mountain and his colleagues, Ser Stevron was content with that much. He bowed his head slightly and declared "I shall do so, my lord. Follow us back, if you please."

Ten minutes later, the group of Frey retainers, the Legionnaires, and the Northern Army were at the eastern gate of the Twins. Ser Stevron and his men escorted Gregor Clegane, Oberyn Martell, and Eddard Stark inside the building. They brought them straight to the main hall.

Walder Frey was already seated in the lord's chair. His sons, grandsons, and bastards were assembled all around him.

The weasel lord adapted his trademark conniving sneer and muttered "Well, my lords… what business have you in these parts?"

"None in these parts, my lord," Gregor clarified, "West of these parts."
"Oh?" Walder Frey remarked, cocking his head.

"You may have heard," Oberyn remarked cheekily, "The Ironborn have rebelled. We're on our way to put down their insurrection."

"Ah, yes," Walder murmured drily, "Of this, I am aware. Earlier this week, the King's forces crossed the Trident at a place south of here. Why did you not do the same?"

"The Crownlords and the Stormlords were already closer to the Trident than to here," Eddard Stark pronounced, "If we had the time, we would have followed them. Alas, we don't have that luxury."

"So you chose to come to me instead," Walder Frey remarked.

"That is correct, my lord," Gregor Clegane affirmed. He stepped forward and said patiently "We… request the privilege to cross your bridge."

"Request or demand?" Walder countered.

"We are not in a position to demand anything of you," Gregor pointed out.

"You have numbers ten times that of mine," Walder noted.

"But this is your home," Oberyn stated, "No man knows better how to defend his house than he himself does."

"That does not mean you will not attempt to seize my home through force," Walder debated.

Why would we? There's nothing here that's even worth seizing.

"You have the option to simply deny us passage," Eddard Stark proclaimed, "But if you do so, you will be preventing us from carrying out our duty to the King. You will also be refusing to do your own duty to him."

"Ah, that is where you are mistaken, Lord Stark," Walder Frey refuted, "I assure you that I shall do my duty. I am sending a host of my own to complement the king's."

"Then why not have our forces march with yours?" Oberyn proposed.

"Because there is no need," Walder murmured, "The combined forces of the Stormlands, the Crownlands, the Riverlands, the Westerlands, and the Reach are more than sufficient to defeat the Ironborn. They can manage without your forces."

Then they can definitely do without YOURS.

Gregor stepped forward, folded his arms, and decreed "We all swore an oath to go to the King whenever he summoned us. If we are unable to fulfill that oath, he will be gravely displeased. He will demand an explanation, and when we give him one, we will be certain to mention who was responsible for our detainment."

Walder sat up in his chair and snapped "Is that a threat?"

"It's a promise," Gregor sternly declared.

The next hour was comprised of similar dialogue. Arguments and counterarguments were given out by both parties. The discussion became very heated at certain points, but they never resulted to switching blows instead of words.
Ultimately, Gregor, Oberyn, and Eddard won the discussion. Walder Frey agreed to let the Legionnaires and the Northern army cross. The following day, his own host would ride with them all the way to the Westerlands.

Walder Frey insisted that the Northern lords and the top officers of the Legion dine with him that night. He claimed it was to solidify their temporary alliance. But he was fooling nobody. Oberyn knew that the true reason for the meal was Walder's ambitious nature. Obviously, the Late Lord Frey was seeking to further the influence of his house.

Indeed, at dinner, the Freys were much friendlier than they had been when Oberyn first supped beneath their roof. Their father's sway over them was evident; they had tried to create some marriage contracts of their own. Most of them knew how to approach the topic from a subtle angle.

Many of them were still far from chivalrous, but at least they behaved themselves. Most of them, at any rate.

Now that Nymeria was a Martell, the Freys seemed to have a newfound interest in her. Some of them came to her and asked her (for their curiosity, they claimed) if she had any plans for the future. She casually informed them that she planned to serve in the Legion for several years. When they questioned if she had plans to ever settle down, all she told them was "perhaps."

Whenever they propositioned themselves for her, Nymeria got out her whip and sharply cracked it against the ground once. The smart ones took that as their cue to end the conversation and leave the former Sand Snake alone. The foolish ones… they needed a more direct answer.

At one point that night, an inebriated Ryman Frey stumbled by Nymera's table. She hoped he was just passing by. Then he halted in front of her, and she realized he was not.

"Ser Ryman," Nymeria mumbled bluntly.

"My lady," Ryman rejoined. The scent of alcohol was heavy on his breath. The odor emanating from the rest of his body was even more unpleasant.

From the next table, Oberyn observed this exchange. He would only intervene if the situation got ugly. He was confident it would not; he knew Nymeria could handle herself. Especially against a half-wit like Walder Frey's eldest grandson.

"Is there something I can do for you?" Nymeria inquired disinterestedly.

"Yes, matter of fact," Ryman Frey stammered, "My son Edwyn is looking to get married. After my father and myself, he will inherit the Twins. He will need an heir of his own."

"Well, I bid him luck in his search," Nymeria said impartially.

"He needn't luck," Ryman contended, leaning forward a little, "I may have found a bride for him."

At that, Nymeria reached for her whip and brought it out. That gesture would have convinced most other men to move along. In his drunken stupor, Ryman Frey hardly even recognized the warning.

Evidently, Nymeria would have to be more direct with him.

"I appreciate the offer," Nymeria claimed, though her voice indicated she did not, "But I cannot accept it."

"Why not?" Ryman queried, apparently bewildered.
"I am needed in the North," Nymeria told him, "I intend to serve in the Legion without Banners alongside my father and Lord Gregor Clegane. I cannot do that if I am the lady of a noble house."

Oberyn smiled at that. Although Nymeria was as appalled by Ser Ryman's behavior as he was, she had not lost her composure or forgotten her courtesies.

Even so, Ryman proved to be quite stubborn.

"I would urge you to rethink your plans," he suggested, "The North is no place for someone as lovely as you."

Nymeria feigned a blush and uttered in a slightly sardonic tone "Thank you, ser. But tell me; have you ever been in the North?"

"No," Ryman professed, "But what could the North possibly have to offer that's better than what's here?"

It could take all night to give the full answer to that question.

"Plenty," Nymeria debated, "The Northmen believe in a sense of community and obligation. I have yet to see either of those qualities here. And I am fairly certain that if I ever do take a husband outside of Dorne, he will be of the North. At least there, women are not mocked and scorned."

Had he been sober, Ryman would have detected the slight meant by those words. Instead, he dimly countered it with "The only thing they know how to do is freeze their arses off. Go ahead and stay in the North… if you want to be cold for the rest of your life."

He would know much about being cold. So would his family, for that matter.

Nymeria swiftly returned her attention to the food on her plate. She avoided making eye contact with Ser Ryman. Maybe she thought that if she ignored him, he would let her be. But evading him was not so easy.

Ryman placed his hand on the table, leaned closer, and said softly "I'll let you in on a secret, my lady. There is one thing Rivermen can do that Northmen cannot."

He waited for her to ask what that was. When she did not, he told her anyway: "We can swim."

As little as she cared for this talk, Nymeria raised an eyebrow at that. "What makes you think a Northman cannot?"

"Oh, I've seen Northmen swim," Ryman disclosed, "Or try to. They're not very good at it. I say, what good is a man who cannot conquer water?"

Paying no mind to that last statement, Nymeria queried "When have you ever seen a Northman swim?"

"I'd say six or seven years ago," Ryman revealed, "Shortly before we rebelled against the Targaryens."

Although Oberyn had been listening in on that conversation, he did not become genuinely interested in it until that moment.

Ryman continued with "A month or two before the war began, there was this one fool that came from the North. He wasn't a knight, a lord, or anyone important. Anyway, he got the idea to ford the river on his own. He was not even halfway across before he and his horse fell beneath the surface. His body washed up on the shore a few days later."

Nymeria grimaced and muttered "That's horrible. Why didn't you help him?"

"It would have been pointless to do so," Ryman pronounced, "Besides, he got himself into trouble. There was no reason for us to get him out of it."

It was then that Oberyn decided to intercede. He sauntered over to the table and said in a deceptively cordial voice "Ser Ryman, may I have a word?"

The drunken Frey turned his attention to the Red Viper and nodded his head shakily. Oberyn coolly led him off to the side. Once they were out of sight from most of the others, Oberyn delivered a solid punch to Ryman Frey's head. Ser Ryman was knocked unconscious almost immediately.

Oberyn carefully placed Ryman against the wall as if he had passed out whilst sitting against it. After that, the prince returned to the celebration.

"Thank you, Papa," Nymeria said gratefully.

"Of course, dearest," Oberyn assured her, placing a hand on her shoulder, "Now you must excuse me. I have another matter to attend to."

Nymeria nodded and went back to eating her meal. Her father went off to find the father of the man he had just rendered unconscious.

Despite being the oldest of Walder Frey's many sons and his heir, Stevron was less like his father than most of his other descendants. He was actually a thoughtful and reasonable man.

It's a shame HE is not the Lord of the Twins.

Stevron Frey was mingling with his youngest son, a lackwit called Aegon. He was known better as Jingebell, due to the motley hat of bells he always wore on his head.

Oberyn came to Stevron Frey and Jingebell Frey and bade the former "I would speak with you, Ser Stevron."

The older man looked to the Red Viper and said "Certainly, my prince."

There was no one else around, and it was very unlikely that Jingebell would develop a legitimate interest in anything that was said there. For that reason, Oberyn deemed it safe to talk with Ser Stevron then and there.

He apprised the middle-aged knight of the conversation that had just transpired between Nymeria and Ryman. Twice, Stevron apologized for his son's crass behavior. Oberyn assured the knight that he did not blame him for Ryman's drunkenness or rudeness. He was past the age when the parent can be blamed for the child's upbringing. So he was old enough to know better.

Stevron privately admitted that at times, even he could not abide his eldest son. Oberyn did not blame him for that, either. Stevron mentioned that if he could place Edwyn ahead of Ryman in the line of succession, he would do it. Edwyn was young, but unlike his father and great-grandfather, he had the capacity to be a good man.

When Oberyn got to the part about the Northman that had drowned south of the Crossing right before Robert's Rebellion, Stevron became a little tense. That led Oberyn to believing that Ryman really had been speaking truly on that affair.

Ser Stevron did not try to deny the episode. In fact, he remembered it well.

He recounted that a few months before Lord Jon Arryn called his banners, a man on a gelding had come from the North. The rider had been alone. He carried nothing but his weapons, the armor on his back, and a little baggage. He did not give his name, but he appeared to be a Stark man.

The rider had asked Lord Walder to allow him to cross his bridge. Since the rider had nothing of substance to use as a toll, he was initially turned away. The rider was persistent, though; he had tried incessantly to change Walder Frey's mind. At one point, the rider mentioned that he had an important message to deliver. Lord Walder actually seemed interested in that. However, when he requested to know who the message was for and what it was about, the rider claimed he was not permitted to divulge that information.

Stevron and some of his more rational half-brothers had tried to convince their father to simply let the rider pass without taxing him. Lord Walder was adamant in his refusal. All he did was repeat their house words: We Take Our Tolls.

Eventually, the rider realized that he was wasting his time at the Twins. So he left on his gelding and rode off to the south. He found a narrow part of the Green Fork a hundred feet away from the Crossing. Stevron and some of his kin had watched the rider as he boldly attempted to get himself and his horse across the river.

Just when it appeared he would succeed, the horse lost its balance. It and its master struggled to get to either of the Green Fork's shores. But the current was too strong for them. They ended up drifting all the way downstream.

Against his father's wishes, Stevron had sent out a search party to locate the horse and the rider. They found both at the mouth of the Trident. The gelding had been entangled in a bed of reeds. The rider was lying face down on the western shore. His helmet had fallen off; his baggage was lost. All signs of life had disappeared from him.

The horse was left for the wolves. The search party brought the man's body and equipment back. Stevron wished to send his bones back north, but Walder persuaded him not to bother. He claimed that no one would miss a nameless rider who had been no more talkative when alive than when dead.

Ultimately, the Northman was simply buried a thousand yards east of the Twins. His grave was unmarked, and his weapons and armor had been appropriated by the Frey household.

When he finished recalling that event, Stevron let out a sigh and muttered "If you tell Lord Eddard of this, please let him know that had it been my decision, the rider would have been allowed to cross as soon as he came."

"I believe you, ser," Oberyn asserted.

I also believe that if you had been Lord of the Twins, the message would have gotten delivered. Things would be much different then.

Later that night, after nearly everyone had settled down for bed, Oberyn sought out Gregor Clegane and Eddard Stark. He enlightened them on everything he had learnt during the evening meal. They were stunned to say the least.

"So that's why the rider Lyanna sent to Riverrun never reached its destination," Eddard thought.
"I cannot say I'm surprised," Gregor mumbled, "Walder Frey has never been very compliant or mindful of other people's worries. In fact, we probably should have expected something like this."

"It's certainly characteristic of him," Oberyn conceded.

Eddard placed his hand against his forehead and remarked uneasily "Why did he have to turn that rider away? I mean… if he let the rider cross, Brandon would have gotten the letter in time. He would have known the truth, and he would not have rushed to King’s Landing when he heard the rumor that Rhaegar had abducted Lyanna."

Gregor placed a hand on the wolf lord's back and told him "The only one at fault here is Lord Walder, my lord. We will see that he answers for this."

"How?" Eddard snapped irately, "There is no way for you to confront him without making the true reason for Lyanna's disappearance known."

"That is true," Gregor admitted, "But there are other ways we can achieve justice for the wrong that Lord Walder has done."

"What ways?" Ned Stark queried in interest.

The Mountain did not reply right away. He just stood where he was and gazed off to the side, as though deep in thought. After a short while, he released a sigh and proposed "We can rid this country of him."

Eddard Stark's eyes widened at that. Oberyn Martell stayed quiet, but he watched the larger man closely.

What is he doing?

"Lord Gregor, are you suggesting that we kill the head of a noble house?" Eddard Stark presumed, shocked.

"I never said that," Gregor countered, "I merely said we need to be rid of him. For that, he does not have to die. All we have to do is remove Lord Walder from power."

"Can that be done without his death?" Eddard enquired.

"Of course it can be done," Oberyn debated, "The father does not have to die for the son to succeed him."

"Precisely," Gregor concurred, "In the final years of his life, Prince Rhaegar schemed to dethrone his father. His insurrection may have worked, had he and Lady Lyanna not run off together."

"That may be," Eddard pronounced, "But what guarantee do you have that his heir will be any better?"

"The guarantee of my word," Oberyn responded, "I have spoken with Ser Stevron Frey. He is a good man. He is as different from his father as Balon Greyjoy was from his. Under his direction, House Frey can regain its honor."

Assuming it ever had any.

Eddard thought on this for a few minutes. At the end of his pondering, he looked around at the other two men and stated "Perhaps this idea does deserve some consideration. But let us speak no more on it for now. It is ignoble to speak of overthrowing a lord beneath his own roof. Especially when that lord has already given us guest right."

"I mean no offense, Lord Eddard," Gregor uttered slyly, "But I urge you not to be so complacent. I know for a fact that the Freys do not care much for guest right, either."

And just how does he know that?

"And just how do you know that?" Eddard asked suspiciously.

Wow. Lord Eddard and I really do think alike.

"I've… heard things," Gregor claimed meekly. Then he stated in assurance "We and our men are safe right now, I promise you. But under different circumstances… we would need more than bread and salt to protect us here."

"Thankfully, I always sleep with a spear in my reach," Oberyn commented wryly.

"Perhaps we should do the same," Gregor suggested, only half-joking.

"Perhaps," Eddard bluntly muttered. After a bit of silence, he stood up and told the other two men "I'll be turning in for the night. I'd advise you to do the same. We will continue the march at break of day."

Gregor and Oberyn nodded in agreement. After Ned Stark left the room, Gregor looked to the Red Viper and told him "When we return to Moat Cailin, we're going to have another meeting."

Oberyn smirked wickedly and asked rhetorically "Have you determined our next target, my lord?"

"Yes, I have," Gregor firmly proclaimed.

…

Tarrence Clegane had been the son of a kennelmaster, Alyver Clegane. The first decade of his life had been spent helping his father tend to the dogs of Casterly Rock. It was not glamorous, but he always believed he could do much worse.

All the same, he never thought he would do much better.

Then Alyver Clegane had saved Lord Tytos Lannister from a lion on the outskirts of Casterly Rock. He lost a leg and three of his best dogs in the process, but he gained a knighthood and the right to form his own house, as well. In addition to that, Tarrence had been taken on as Lord Tytos' squire.

Ser Alyver had died only a few years after Lord Tytos. All he left to his son was an impoverished keep on an unproductive patch of land and a small handful of incapable servants. For a time, Tarrence believed that life had been much more preferable as a kennelmaster's son, and he would have traded that lifestyle back for anything.

Tarrence Clegane had come a long way since then. The gods had given him a knighthood, a wife of high birth, and three strong children.

His firstborn was a member of King Robert Baratheon's Small Council and the head of a house of his own. His elder son had also helped extend the influence of the Cleganes to the North, and he was one of the most respected and beloved men in Westeros.
One might suppose that Tarrence Clegane was jealous of his son's widespread popularity and success. As it happened, he was not even marginally envious. Tarrence Clegane had never yearned for fame or fortune. He was proud just to have been the father of the Mountain That Rides.

Be that as it may, Tarrence would never turn down an opportunity to spread his family's domain. That was just what he had been doing for the past five years.

Just before Gregor went north, he had given his father a gift of seven thousand gold dragons. The Mountain said that he wished for them to be used for the betterment of the Cleganes of Clegane's Keep. They had served that very purpose. Clegane's Keep had been rebuilt and augmented tremendously. It was now three times larger than it had first been, and ten times as grand. Villages has been constructed on the adjoining lands, which were now capable of growing crops, as well.

Before long, the Cleganes were able to mine the land and harvest its natural resources just as their fellow Westerlords did. That was what truly heightened their prosperity and gained them recognition amongst the highborn houses of the west.

After five years, Tarrence Clegane had taken those seven thousand golden dragons and turned them into seventy thousand. House Clegane was now just a step below the main noble houses of the Westerlands. All that was missing was the title of lord for its master. Based on what his younger son told him, there was indeed a possibility that Tarrence Clegane would receive a lordship sometime in the near future.

But that would have to wait. Right now, there were more pressing issues that needed to be handled first. Mainly, there was the threat of invasion.

Near the start of the year, the Iron Islands had launched the full strength of their fleet. Most of their ships had sailed to Lannisport. There they attempted to ambush and burn the Westerlander fleet. They had assumed that the element of surprise was on their side. It was not.

Unbeknownst to Balon Greyjoy, all of Westeros had been alerted to the probability of an impending attack by sea. Thanks to a warning from Moat Cailin, Lannisport had been prepared for this assault months in advance.

The Ironborn only managed to set fire to a third of the Westerlords' ships. Of those, only half were destroyed or damaged beyond hope of repair. The surviving vessels managed to sink several of the Iron Fleet's vessels in retaliation. Before very long, the Ironmen turned their masts around and sailed away.

Despite the proximity to water, it took hours to put out the fires of that battle. For a while, the flames could be seen all the way from Clegane's Keep. It was dusk at the time; Tarrence could vividly recall seeing an immense blinding light in the horizon. The sight had been quite unnerving.

The Sun goes down in the west. Our fleet almost went with it.

Before the Sun reappeared in the east the following day, Lord Tywin Lannister had sent out a raven to each of his vassals. Ser Tarrence did not even have to open the letter to deduce that the lion lord was calling his banners.

Although Clegane's Keep was very close in proximity to Lannisport and Casterly Rock, Tarrence Clegane had wasted no time in assembling his soldiers. However, he would not march just yet.

A few days later, Tarrence found out that King Robert Baratheon had been informed of the Ironborn's violent uprising, and he had subsequently declared war on them. Needless to say, he would be on the side of the Westerlords.

Within a week, the other Westerlords had arrived with their forces. They set up camp in the vast empty space of land between Casterly Rock and Clegane's Keep.

Soon, it became known that the King was coming to the Westerlands. With him, he was bringing reinforcements from the North, the Riverlands, the Reach, the Crownlands, and the Stormlands. They would all be gathering at Casterly Rock in preparation for war.

The Reachmen were the first to come. Half came by ship; the other half by horse. Lord Paxter Redwyne headed the former half. He brought a significant portion of the Reach's fleet to strength the Westerlands' depleted numbers. The other half came by land, led by Lord Mace Tyrell himself.

The Riverlords arrived next. Lord Hoster Tully and his forces rode down from the Golden Tooth and came from the northeast. The Freys were notably absent from this procession.

The Stormlords and Crownlords appeared soon after. Lord Stannis Baratheon of Dragonstone supplied another formidable company of ships, and King Robert Baratheon rode at the head of a large column of gallant knights and hardened soldiers.

Terrance saw the King when his forces came from the east. Robert did not stop by Clegane's Keep, but he came very close when he passed it by. Tarrence managed to catch a glimpse of him. He thought the King looked both regal and magnificent. He had been clad in a full suit of armor with his warhammer in hand.

The Northmen and the Legion without Banners were the last to show. The Freys finally appeared, as well. They came from the same direction, but there was a notable amount of space between them and the Northmen and Legionnaires.

Whereas the other armies had merely gone around Clegane's Keep as though it was an obstacle, the Legionnaires had ridden directly towards the keep.

When Ser Tarrence Clegane was informed by the on-duty guard that the Legion was approaching, he had his household assemble in the courtyard. His lady wife Daliah was by his side, as always. On his other side was his second son and heir Sandor and his intended, Obara Martell. His daughter and youngest child Ellyn stood beside his wife.

Maester Velix, Ser Wallis Peckledon, and the rest of House Clegane's retainers stood in a straight line behind the landed knight and his family. In the distance, they could see a host of about fifteen hundred men coming towards them. Ser Tarrence and his company stood in relative silence as they waited for the host to reach them. There were no banners that anyone could see, so there was no question as to which company those units belonged to.

Indeed, at the very front of the column was a very tall man astride a huge black destrier. By his size, he could only be Lord Gregor Clegane himself.

Tarrence had not seen Gregor since he was Sandor's current age. He was even bigger than he remembered him to be. Of course, all three of his children had grown in that time. He now had to gaze slightly upward to look Sandor in the eye, and Ellyn stood an inch taller than her mother.

Maybe someday, all of Westeros will look up to my children.
That was very well possible. In more than one way.

Soon the Legionnaires reached Clegane's Keep. The majority of them remained outside. Only their commander and his officers trotted through the gates.

The commander was fully dressed in a suit of plate-and-mail. It covered him from head to heel. The only visible opening was a thin slit in the visor of his helm. He wore a bastard sword on his left side and a longsword on his right. Attached to his back was a shield of solid metal. Ser Tarrence would have quivered in uneasiness, had he not known who was beneath all that steel.

Gregor Clegane dismounted his destrier and landed on his feet with a loud Thump. The ground seemed to shake when he touched it. He gradually turned to face the household of Clegane's Keep, and slowly, he began to walk towards them.

After a minute of unbroken silence, Gregor stood directly before Ser Tarrence Clegane. At a glance, he appeared to be staring the older man down.

Finally, he reached his arms up, took ahold of his helm, and pulled it off his head. Once the helm was off, Gregor grinned kindly at his father.

Despite the friendly gesture, Tarrence was oddly inclined to be professional towards his son.

He's changed. He's now a person to be both feared and admired. I cannot greet him as my own blood. I must greet him as someone deserving of his station.

Ser Tarrence promptly returned the grin. He dipped his head slightly and declared "Welcome, my lord, to Clegane's Keep."

Gregor Clegane chuckled, placed his hands on his father's biceps, and stood him up straight. He remarked informally "Come now, Father. None of that."

Tarrence was a little taken aback. He hastily muttered "Forgive me; I simply assumed it was required of me. After all, you are a noble lord and a member of the King's Small Council."

Gregor lightly shook his head and proclaimed "You are still the master of the keep, and even the King must show proper respect to a man in his own home."

Tarrence just nodded, scoffed, and stated "If you insist, Gregor."

Suddenly, he felt very relieved.

In spite of everything else that is new about him, he is still every bit my son.

Gregor looked back at his officers and waved at them once. All at once, they proceeded to climb down from their horses. Most of them tended to their horses, but there were two that instead walked over to where their commander was.

One of them was short but thickset. And rather handsome, Tarrence had to admit. Over his shoulder he balanced a long spear. By his façade and his leather armor, he had to be a Dornishman. One look at Obara Martell, and Tarrence could already tell who he was.

The other… was a woman. She was as tall as Sandor, but as beautiful as a gold mine. Most women would appear odd in boiled leather and chainmail, but in the case of this woman, the armor she wore suited her well. Almost straightaway, Tarrence deduced her identity, as well.
When the two individuals were upon them, Gregor announced "Father, may I present my captains: Prince Oberyn of House Nymeros Martell, younger brother to Prince Doran and the father of Obara, and Lady Dacey of House Mormont, eldest daughter of Lady Maege… and my lady wife."

This was the very first time when Tarrence Clegane came face-to-face with his gooddaughter. He had been somewhat frustrated that he could not meet her before the wedding. But he had not protested, as his elder son had been free to wed whomever he pleased.

At least now, he finally got to see Dacey Mormont in person. He smiled and extended his hand to her. She smiled back and shook it firmly. Tarrence shook hands with Oberyn, too, and he stated cordially "My lady, my prince, I bide you welcome."

"Thank you, Ser Tarrence," Oberyn affably told him in response.

"I am honored to finally meet you, goodfather," Dacey proclaimed gleefully.

Ser Tarrence took a step back, and then he looked around the vicinity and asked eagerly "So… where is my first grandchild?"

"Further back in the caravan," Gregor informed him, "We thought it best if he was kept with the civilian part of the convoy."

"Only when we were on the move, though," Dacey added in, "He's typically with us whenever we halt."

"You needn't worry, ser," Oberyn assured Ser Tarrence, "My paramour is watching over your grandson. I'm about to ride out and find her."

"Well, tell your paramour I am grateful," Tarrence told the prince, "And tell her she is invited to enter the keep, as well."

"As you wish, my good ser," Oberyn avowed. He swiftly returned to his garron, mounted it again, and rode back out the gate.

While the prince was gone, Ser Tarrence and his retainers escorted Gregor, his wife, and his officers inside the keep. Quarters had already been arranged for Gregor and his lieutenants. After they were shown to their rooms, the Legionnaires took some time to rest and recover from their journey.

Gregor and his officers joined Ser Tarrence and his household for the midday meal in the Main Hall. Gregor, Dacey, Rickard, Oberyn, Ellaria, and Nymeria sat on the dais with the Cleganes of Clegane's Keep. Elia and Obella were being tended to by Oberyn and Ellaria's personal servants.

After luncheon was served and eaten, Ser Tarrence Clegane was formally introduced to his grandson. When he had the chance to hold Rickard Clegane in his arms, he broke into a wide smile, and the feeling of pride was almost inexpressible.

Rickard was about eighteen months old, but he was the size of a child that has seen three or four name days. He had a full head of dark hair (which he obviously got from his mother), he could walk straight without stumbling, and he could talk in complete sentences.

As he cradled his grandson in his arms, Ser Tarrence looked over at Gregor and Dacey, and he inquired "Did he truly weigh seventeen pounds at birth?"

"He did," Dacey revealed with a proud smile, "I can attest to that."
Gregor then asked his parents "Do you recall how much I weighed?"

"About thirteen and one-half pounds," Daliah recounted, "However, Rickard is not quite as large as you were at this age."

"Really?" Gregor said in interest.

Daliah nodded and observed "So there's no reason to assume he'll be even taller than you."

"He'll still be a giant, no question of that," Gregor contended.

"Quite so," Tarrence conceded. He carefully handed his grandson back to his son, and then he said inquiringly "How long will you be in the Westerlands?"

"Just until the Ironborn rebellion is put down," Oberyn Martell

"And for the duration of the ensuing celebration of their defeat," Gregor commented. He quickly added in "Provided that there is one, that is."

"I'm fairly certain there will be," Daliah debated, "The King is said to love tourneys. He threw one for his brother's wedding, one for his heir's birth, and for one his first anniversary."

"Then he'll definitely throw one to celebrate his victory against the Ironborn," Gregor pronounced.

"First he has to beat them, Gregor," Sandor muttered, as if the Mountain needed reminding that the war had only just begun.

"Oh, he will," Gregor confidently pronounced.

With your assistance, no doubt.

Daliah Clegane hastily brought everyone's attention back to the subject her husband had addressed a minute earlier. She announced "We're hoping that after the Ironborn are defeated and after the resulting merriment, you might stay here a little while longer."

Gregor rubbed his chin and muttered "While I am here, Ser Brynden Tully is overseeing the affairs of Moat Cailin and the other half of the Legion without Banners. I believe he is the most qualified person to lead in my stead. Because of that, we are not in any rush to return to the moat. As such, there is no reason we cannot lengthen our visit."

Tarrence smiled once more and declared "You do not know how delighted we are to hear that."

"Well, I can imagine," Gregor cockily remarked, "Believe me, I share your glee, Father. I hope we can make up for lost time, too."

Tarrence chuckled and professed gladly "Oh, I do not want you to stay just to make up for lost time, Gregor."

"We have something much greater planned," Daliah Clegane revealed.

"What would that be, my lady?" Dacey queried.

Tarrence grinned and answered her with "A certain upcoming ceremony."

At that, he directed everyone to look towards the end of the dais. There Sandor and Obara were seated by each other. They rose from their seats so that they were now standing at each other's side, and he took her right hand in his left. They held their interlocked fingers in the air, and they both smiled widely.

It did not take Gregor, Dace, Oberyn, and the others very long to catch on.

The Mountain looked to his father and presumed excitedly "Does this mean…?"

Tarrence nodded his head and proclaimed "After much deliberation, I have given Sandor and Obara my blessing. They will wed soon after the war ends."

Obara Martell has been at Clegane's Keep for nearly a year, and Ser Tarrence Clegane have come to know her very well. She cared not for wealth or power, and she cared greatly for family and security. She was strong in both mind and body, and she was as good a leader as she was a fighter. In his opinion, Sandor could not hope to find a better bride.

Gregor turned back to his younger brother and raised his tankard, saying "Then I hope to be the first to congratulate you, Sandor. You, too, Obara."

"I'll drink to that, my lord," Obara declared, raising her own goblet, "I suppose I should call you 'brother' now."

"Call me whatever you like," Gregor proposed, sipping his ale, "As long as it's appropriate for our family's ears, of course."

"Of course," Obara knowingly conceded, smiling a bit, "You needn't worry on that, Gregor. I know better than to say spiteful things about my allies and relatives."

Sandor gave a nod and stated humorously "We can be certain of that, Princess,"

At that, Obara's grin shifted to a grimace. She glared at her betrothed and groaned "Sandor…"

Sandor smirked and murmured cheekily "What's the matter, Princess?"

"You know I hate that," Obara mumbled in annoyance.

"But it's true, is it not?" Sandor contended, "Your father's a prince, and you're now his trueborn daughter. That makes you a princess in every sense."

"He makes a point, sweetling," Oberyn told his eldest daughter.

Obara opened her mouth, but nothing came out at first.

Nymeria was the one who spoke first instead. She rose from her seat and interjected "Hold on. Papa, if that's the case, then does that mean that I too…?"

Oberyn merely smirked and nodded his head.

Nymeria grumbled and sank back into her chair.

"I wish to be disowned," she muttered, her voice laden with sarcasm.

"Wish declined," Oberyn drolly said in response.

It was here that Obara found her voice again. She also found a comeback. She grinned deviously and told her fiancée "Well, think on this, Sandor: whenever someone highborn marries someone of lesser rank, the latter rises in rank, as well. So after you and I are wed, going by your logic, you'll be a prince."
Sandor looked to be at a loss for words when he heard that statement. He stared down at his hands and muttered "I hadn't thought of that…"

"Now I've made you think of it," Obara slyly rejoined, "So tell me, how does it sound?"
Sandor slowly let out a sigh and remarked sardonically "Fine. If it bothers you so greatly, I won't call you 'princess' without your permission."

If he's wise, he won't call her that even with her permission.

"Thank you," Obara said appreciatively. She lightly pecked Sandor on the cheek, and his grin swiftly returned.

Shortly after the meal ended, Tarrence asked to speak with Gregor in private. The Mountain decided he could afford his father a few minutes. While Dacey went to their chambers with Rickard, Gregor headed to his father's solar.

"What is this about, Father?" Gregor asked in interest.
Ser Tarrence opened his mouth to speak, but he hesitated for a moment. He tapped the fingers of his right hand against the surface of his desk.

Ever since Gregor arrived, Tarrence Clegane had been careful to keep his left hand out of sight as much as possible. He wondered if his son had noticed that.

Even if he hasn't, he'll have to know eventually.

Finally, Tarrence looked up at Gregor and stated inquiringly "Do you know when your forces will be going off to battle?"

Gregor shrugged and commented "We're the last to arrive, so the King must plan to get underway soon."

Tarrence nodded his head in acknowledgment, and he muttered "In any case, I want to wish you the best of luck."

Gregor raised an eyebrow and presumed "You won't be going with us?"

His father solemnly shook his head. He needs to see.

It was here that Ser Tarrence brought out his left arm and held it in the air. His hand was shaking uncontrollably.

"What…?" Gregor began uneasily.

"Maester Velix believes it is the early stages of palsy," Tarrence grimly informed his son.

"Palsy?" Gregor whispered in shock.

Tarrence merely nodded.

"He could be wrong," Gregor suggested hopefully.

"He could," Tarrence admitted, "But whatever it is, one thing is certain. I am unfit to fight or sail."
Our units must not be seen being led by a man who cannot even keep his own hand steady. What would the other lords say?"

"You shouldn't care what they'd say," Gregor debated.

"It happens that I do care," Tarrence Clegane proclaimed, "I will not be a liability to my house or my men. I beseech you not to try to change my mind; it is already made up."

Tarrence knew that normally, Gregor would have made a persistent effort to convince his father that he had too little faith in himself. But since he had pleaded with him, Gregor agreed not to argue this point any further.

"Very well, Father," Gregor coincided, a little diffidently.

Tarrence was notably relieved that his son had chosen not to resist his decision. He sat back in his chair and commented "Now because I cannot go, Sandor will lead our soldiers in my place."

"Wasn't Sandor already going as Lord Tywin's squire?" Gregor recollected.

"Yes," Tarrence verified, "But now he must go as the leader of House Clegane's units, too. I assume you know what that entails."

"It means that he and his forces will be entering the fray alongside Lord Tywin," Gregor conjectured.

"Precisely," Tarrence affirmed, "Lord Tywin will witness firsthand what our men are capable of. If he likes what he sees… it could mean great things for us. This could be what finally convinces Lord Tywin to raise this house to lordly status."

Gregor raised an eyebrow and remarked "If they serve and fight well, that could certainly happen."

"That's the other reason I wished to speak with you," Tarrence revealed, "I have a favor to ask."

"Anything," Gregor consented.

Tarrence looked him in the eye and said "If possible, try to keep a close eye on Sandor. I'd like you to ensure that he fulfills his duties to both his house and his liege lord. At the same time, I need you to ensure his safety. Do you understand?"

Straightaway, Gregor nodded his head and pronounced "Yes, Father. I won't let any harm come to him."

_ I know you want. But it is comforting just to hear those words from your mouth. _

Chapter End Notes

Note: There's one thing I'd like to clarify. Eddard is NOT on board with the plan to overthrow Walder Frey and install Stevron as the head of House Frey. If I gave you the impression that he was, I beseech your pardon.
Chapter Notes

Note: I intend for the Ironborn Rebellion and the subsequent tourney at Lannisport to last about five chapters; maybe six. This will be the first one, but it will mostly depict the Royalist army's preparation for war. The next chapter will involve the battles at Segard and Faircastle, and the chapter after, the siege of Pyke.

By the way, my mother, father, sister, and I will be going to Rome for New Year's, and I'll be really busy with work this week. That said, I may not have time to work on my writing. I'll try to have the next update by Christmas Eve. If not, the day after Christmas.

The Legion without Banners were hosted by Ser Tarrence Clegane that night. The infantrymen camped outside the walls of Clegane's Keep. Gregor and his lieutenants slept in the guest chambers of the keep.

Everyone who resided in or near the keep managed to catch a fairly peaceful rest. They all awoke quite early the following morning. The top officers of the Legion broke their fast with the Cleganes and their retainers in the Main Hall.

After breakfast, a rider arrived in the keep's courtyard. He had come from Robert Baratheon's forces. He claimed the King had called for a meeting between the leaders of the Royal Army. That included the foremost members of the Legion without Banners.

The meeting was to take place at high noon in Casterly Rock that day. So there was no time for the Legionnaires to waste. As soon as they heard the message, they prepared to head out straightaway.

Lord Gregor and Sandor bade a fond farewell to Ser Tarrence, Lady Daliah, and Lady Ellyn. Their parents and sister were reluctant to say good-bye, but they did, all the same. They were confident that both of them would overcome the encroaching struggles.

Dacey Mormont would be joining her lord husband in the field, so she and Gregor left their son Rickard in the care of Lady Daliah Clegane. She did not wish to part from her son, but the only way she could avoid doing so was if she parted from her husband. Either way, the separation was supposed to be temporary. Still, at least if she separated from Rickard, she could ascertain that he would be safe.

Dacey was not the only woman who intended to fight in the Greyjoy Rebellion.

Obara Martell insisted on travelling with the units of House Clegane of Clegane's Keep. Sandor put up no opposition to his intended's request, and his soldiers seemed to respect both of them for that. They all believed she would make an excellent lady for their future master. Furthermore, Nymeria Martell would remain with her father Prince Oberyn as his squire. Ellaria Sand, however, had chosen to remain behind.

While the baseborn daughter of Lord Uller could handle herself well in a combat situation, she had no taste for direct warfare. Instead, she would take care of Elia and Obella whilst their father was
She also planned to assist Lady Daliah in any way she could. Namely, she would help her tend to Rickard and the other children at Clegane's Keep. These specific children were not just Elia and Obella. They included all the children that had come south in the Legion's convoy. They were the children of the Legionnaires who had come to the Westerlands.

Ser Gerion Lannister's natural daughter, Joy Hill, was among that group of children. She had lived at Moat Cailin almost as long as her father. Gerion had sent for her when he officially decided to join the Legion.

Gerion recalled when King Robert had legitimized Prince Oberyn Martell's two eldest bastard daughters. At the time, that had been done primarily as a measure to ensure that the total number of female heirs in the Great Houses would be closer in number to the total number of male heirs. Yet now, one of his former baseborn girls would be marrying into a knightly house in the Westerlands, instead.

Gerion had often considered doing the same for Joy. He felt she deserved to have a name of her own. Ideally, he could use the same excuse as Oberyn; she would be a prospect for marriage for the other Great Houses.

In actuality, he cared little for the concept of using his own daughter as one-half of a marriage contract. Aside from that, Joy was already perfectly happy at Moat Cailin. Bastards were treated kindly there, just as they were in Dorne. Plus, Joy had made plenty of friends, baseborn and trueborn alike. The fact that she was a bastard did not seem to perturb her in the slightest.

She may not even want a name of her own. She's certainly never shown any interest in one.

All the same, Gerion would keep the idea of legitimizing Joy in mind. For all he knew, there could come a day when it would be advantageous, practical, and idyllic to make her a Lannister. Her mother Briony had been a common woman, so Lord Tywin Lannister would probably not approve of the concept. But Gerion had never bothered very much with pleasing his brother. What truly mattered to him was his capacity to please himself and his daughter.

And his commander.

Growing up the youngest of five, Gerion had never been a stranger to authority. Despite that, he did not blindly follow any order his siblings or anyone else gave him. As a self-imposed rule, he only accepted commands from people he could understand, admire, and relate to. Gregor Clegane was the first and only person he had encountered who met all three of those criteria.

Gerion had been the very first person to enlist in the Legion without Banners. As such, he had been fighting alongside Gregor Clegane longer than anyone else in their ranks. That included Dacey Mormont and Prince Oberyn. Additionally, Gerion had known the Mountain when he had still been his elder brother's vassal. He had both feared and respected him back then. He did not fear him as much in modern times, but he respected him a fair deal more.

Some of Gregor's commands had been vague and questionable, but they had all been honorable in purpose so far. As long as they continued to be (and there was no reason to suggest they would not), Gerion would stay by the Mountain's side.

I may remain the Legion's longest-serving member for many years to come. Imagine what Tywin will think of that.
The thought amused him somewhat. While Gerion would never intentionally aggravate his eldest brother, he looked forward to seeing the expression on Tywin's face when the latter discovered just how close he and Lord Gregor Clegane had become.

Gerion was one of the Legionnaires who rode with Gregor to Casterly Rock that morning. As before, Oberyn Martell and Dacey Mormont rode on either side of the Mountain.

Gerion had been asked to ride on the other side of Oberyn. It was arranged in that fashion so that the other Lannisters would see that one of their own was viewed and treated as the Mountain's equal. That would at least do the Legionnaires some good in the eyes of the Rock.

For a very similar reason, Victarion Greyjoy had been assigned to ride on the other side of Dacey. It would be imperative that everyone (not just the Lannisters) notice that the Iron Captain was at the very front of the Legionnaire column. That would signify that he was one of Gregor Clegane's most esteemed and trusted allies. It would also be an indication that not all Ironborn were dishonorable.

The Riverlords, Northmen, Crownlords, Stormlords, Reachmen, and Westerlords were still spread out in the vast space between Clegane's Keep and Casterly Rock. Going around that massive host would have taken too long; so the Legionnaires and the units from Clegane's Keep galloped through it. Throughout that trek, they gained a number of stares, many of which were of wonder and awe.

Evidently, they were amazed to see such a varied company travelling through their ranks. Most of them had only heard of the Legion without Banners and its universal understanding. This was the very first time the majority of those soldiers saw the extent of the Legion's cultural and regional diversity firsthand. Gerion noted their dumbfounded expressions, and he resisted the urge to smirk.

They may gape at us, but it's our tolerance that confuses them. They can't grasp the idea of all nine types of Westerosi working together. Oh, well; maybe one day, we will cure them of their ignorance.

From the time they entered the Royal Army's camp to the time they exited it, the Legionnaires never paused or halted for even a second. Neither did Sandor and his company. Soon enough, both troops reached the base of Casterly Rock.

Although they had arrived their destination, they still had a very long way to go to get to it.

At its highest point, Casterly Rock was around three times taller than the Wall or the Hightower of Oldtown. Thankfully, they would not have to climb all the way to the top. But they would have to go most of the way.

Fortunately, height and distance were their only challenges. The main entry to the Rock came in the form of a cavern known as the Lion's Mouth. Despite being a natural landmark, the Lion's Mouth had been amended several times ever since the Casterlys had been expelled by King Lann the Clever. Now it was large enough for twenty riders to trot abreast. So the Legionnaires were able to maintain their formation as they made their way up the wide passageway. Once they were through the Lion's Mouth, they had to traverse a network of steep manmade roads.

The ascent took the rest of the morning to accomplish. It was due to Gerion's familiarity with the Rock that they did not get lost or misdirected. Sandor was somewhat acquainted with the layout, as well, given the time he had spent there as Lord Tywin's squire. Still, even with his guidance and Gerion's, it was a wonder the Legionnaires and the Clegane retainers did not exhaust their horses by the end of it.
During the ride, Gerion could have sworn he heard Gregor talk to himself. The Mountain did not speak above a whisper, but Gerion clearly heard him say something along the lines of "This is just like climbing the steps to High Hrothgar."

That perplexed him. Whoever heard of such a place?

Whatever this High Hrothgar was, Gerion supposed that it was located at a very high altitude above the ground. If so, the analogy Gregor made was fitting. Even natives of the Rock were not fond of the arduous journey from top to bottom and vice versa.

What mattered was that Gregor, Sandor, and their parties were not late to the meeting.

Shortly before noon, they reached the summit of the Rock. There they were swiftly dismounted, and their horses were attended to by the stableboys. As all the garrons, coursers, palfreys, destriers, and geldings were led away, their owners were escorted to the council chambers by the Rock’s master-at-arms, Ser Benedict Broom.

The most prominent leaders of the Royal Army had already gathered there. Among them were Eddard Stark, Mace Tyrell, Paxter Redwyne, Stannis Baratheon, Davos Seaworth, Hoster Tully, Tywin Lannister, Kevan Lannister, and Robert Baratheon. They were all assembled around a large table. Two knights of the Kingsguard – Ser Barristan Selmy and Ser Boros Blount – stood vigil against the walls.

Gregor Clegane stepped inside with Dacey Mormont, Oberyn Martell, Gerion Lannister, Victarion Greyjoy, Allard Seaworth, Garth Hightower, and Smalljon Umber. Sandor Clegane stepped inside alone. Ser Wallis Peckledon, Obara Martell, and the other Clegane’s Keep units stayed outside the room, as did Nymeria Martell.

When the Clegane brothers and the Legionnaires entered the chamber, the other men gazed towards them. None of them moved from where he stood, except the one closest to the entrance. This man turned out to be the King himself.

It had been five years since anyone in the Legion without Banners had seen Robert Baratheon. Apparently, the years had been good to him. Although he sat the Iron Throne, he clearly spent plenty of time on his feet, too. His physique was as durable and formidable as ever. He had gained a little weight, but the majority of it was muscle. Most notably, Robert was said to be fond of drink, but Gerion had never seen a man more sober.

As the King approached, Gregor, Sandor, and the other Legionnaires – with the notable exception of Victarion – lightly bowed their heads toward him.

"Your Grace," Gregor Clegane muttered as he returned to his full height.

"Welcome, Lord Gregor," the stag king said in response, grinning, "It is a pleasure to have you here."

He then looked around at the other individuals who had just entered the room. He stopped when his eyes landed on Victarion. He frowned, and his gaze lingered on the Ironborn warrior. He mumbled "I cannot say the same for the entirety of your present company, though."

Victarion Greyjoy grunted at that, but said nothing. Beforehand, he had assured his colleagues that he would not let any derogatory remarks made by the King or the King's generals to provoke him. He would let Gregor do all the talking.

"I do not blame you for having suspicions, Your Grace," Gregor stated candidly.
"Suspicions you'd be wise to share," Robert professed, "Not ten leagues from here, the Iron Fleet attempted to burn the Westerlands Fleet last month. Yet even after that, you have come to this meeting with an Ironborn."

"An Ironborn who happens to be the brother of the very man who started this war, no less," Tywin Lannister pointed out.

Count on Tywin to state the obvious. Especially when the obvious is very unhelpful.

"Lord Victarion is on our side," Gregor uttered firmly.

"And you can be sure of that?" Mace Tyrell asked dubiously.

"Yes," Gregor replied simply.

"Would you care to tell us how?" Tywin queried.

"Because I have served with him," Gregor debated, "Neither you nor anyone at that table can claim that, Lord Tywin. I alone have the right to speak for him, and speak for him, I shall. So hear this: Lord Captain Victarion is a decent and honorable man. He joined the Legion without Banners by his own volition. He is the only one of Quellon Greyjoy's surviving sons who shares his father's ideals. He strongly believes in my cause. Above all... I trust him."

Robert and the leaders of the Royal Army were stunned by all those points. Truth be told, the other Legionnaires were quite stunned, as well. Victarion was the most stunned of all.

"With your life?" Tywin presumed.

Gregor hesitated, but only for a moment. After that, he slowly peered over his shoulder to look at the Iron Captain, and then he turned back to his front and pronounced sternly "Yes, with my life."

At that, Kevan Lannister moved away from the table and started walking towards the Mountain. In one of his hands, he clutched an unfolded piece of paper. When he was within reach of the tallest man in the room, he held the paper out to Gregor and proposed "Say that once more after you read this, Lord Gregor."

Gerion raised an eyebrow as his commander took the parchment from his second oldest brother.

"What is this?" Gregor inquired, looking down at the paper.

"It arrived just this morning," Tywin informed him, "The raven was sent from Moat Cailin."

Gerion and his companions watched Gregor as he read the contents of the letter. The more he read, his eyes appeared to gradually widen.

"My lord?" Gerion queried in concern, placing a hand on Gregor's back.

"There was an insurrection in the Legion," Gregor grimly announced.

"What?" Dacey Mormont asked quietly.

Gregor revealed "According to this, a number of the Ironborn Legionnaires attempted to seize Moat Cailin in Lord Balon's name."

"When did this happen?" Oberyn Martell enquired.
Kevan Lannister illuminated "This letter is dated very recently. Assuming it was written immediately after the conflict was resolved, the rebels must have waited until after you crossed Lord Frey's bridge."

Less than a week ago.

"How bad is it?" Smalljon Umber anxiously asked the Mountain, "What's the damage?"

"To our good fortune, the Blackfish put the rebellion down quickly," Gregor disclosed, "Under his direction, the rest of the Legionnaires managed to overwhelm the dissidents within an hour. They've all been killed or imprisoned."

"What of the losses on our side?" Gerion queried apprehensively.

"None of the smallfolk perished," Gregor proclaimed, "However, around a score of loyal Legionnaires were lost. Ser Brynden provided a list of casualties."

Gregor proceeded to pass the letter around to his fellow Legionnaires. They each took a minute to review it, and then they passed it along.

When Gerion received the letter, he only skimmed the casualty list briefly. Most of the names, he did not recognize or he was only slightly acquainted with. Unfortunately, there were also some fine knights on that list. Ser Osmund Kettleblack was one of them.

Gerion was stunned when he discovered this. He had seen Osmund in action. While he was not one of the best swordsmen Gerion had ever seen, he was still a very capable and formidable warrior. He had also been a member of Gregor Clegane's inner circle. Gerion may not have been as close to Osmund as he had been to the other members, but he still thought of Kettleblack as a reliable ally.

"Oswell Kettleblack needs to be informed that his heir has perished," Gerion recommended as he handed the letter back to Gregor.

"He shall be notified," the Mountain asserted, "Worry not, Gerion. Ser Oswell has two other sons, and he will know that his eldest died in the line of duty. That should give him some amount of comfort."

"Indeed," Paxter Redwyne coincided, "There is no better way to go,"

"I concur," Tywin Lannister declared, "But be that as it may, this issue poses a serious problem. One Ironborn insurrection has already occurred on dry land. Who's to say another will not?"

"I can ensure it will not," Gregor insisted, "And allow me to explain my confidence. Months ago, I received some dependable information of the possibility that Balon Greyjoy would incite an uprising. As a precaution, I had Lord Victarion cross-examine the Ironborn Legionnaires. After reviewing each of them thoroughly, he determined which were loyal to us, and which were loyal to his brother. Anyone who fell into the latter category was left behind at Moat Cailin. When I gave command of the moat to Ser Brynden Tully, he assured me he would be heedful of the Ironborn. That was how he was able to put the rebellion down so quickly."

"Well, my brother is a competent man," Hoster Tully admitted, "Even so, this fiasco could have been avoided altogether if the treacherous Ironborn were confined to quarters as soon as the King declared war."

"That would have set an impossible precedent in the Legion without Banners," Gregor contended.
Yes, it would have. The strong bonds of trust and companionship we’ve worked so hard to develop would have been in danger of collapsing.

"Sometimes a precedent must be set," Robert Baratheon professed.

"Moreover, what guarantee do you have that Lord Victarion's word can be believed?" Tywin Lannister pointed out, "You asked an Ironborn captain to render judgment on his compatriots. His heritage makes him biased. A far more practical solution would have been to remove all the Ironborn from your ranks."

Gregor sighed and mumbled angrily "I thought we were past the days when a man's entire family was judged on his actions."

"Perhaps you are," Stannis Baratheon supposed, "The rest of us are not so imprudent."

It was here that Victarion Greyjoy finally entered the discussion. He stepped forward and uttered softly yet forcefully "My lords."

Every head turned to the Iron Captain. As he maintained his normal grimace, he declared "You cannot be faulted for assuming all Ironborn are scheming, conniving liars. There was once a time when I myself believed all greenlanders were weak, pitiful, and powerless. After serving in the Legion without Banners, I have overcome my prejudice. Allow me to help you overcome yours."

Gerion noticed a smirk break out across Gregor's face. It was laden with pride and satisfaction.

By this point, most of the leaders of the Royal Army were starting to believe the Mountain was right about Victarion's integrity. Even the King himself was having second thoughts.

"You wish a chance to prove your loyalty?" Robert Baratheon assumed.

Victarion lightly nodded his head.

Robert folded his arms and commanded him "Kneel."

Victarion was a little alarmed by the abruptness of that order. Gerion knew that he had never knelt to any man in his life. Not even to Gregor or his elder brothers. Gerion prayed he would make the right decision.

Don't be stubborn. This situation could get unpleasant.

To his good fortune, it did not. Slowly, Victarion dropped to one knee in front of the stag king, and he bowed his head to him. From that position, he proclaimed "I, Victarion of House Greyjoy, swear my oath of fealty to you, Robert of House Baratheon. I swear it by salt, I swear it by the sea, I swear it by the Drowned God."

Robert was pleased by that. He smiled and placed a hand on the Iron Captain's shoulder, saying "You may rise."

Victarion was quick to obey that command. When he was back up on his feet, Robert looked him in the eye and stated "I appreciate your oath, and I believe you mean well, but saying those words is not enough. First, you must prove to me that you can be trusted, too."

He led Victarion over to the table. Kevan gestured for Gregor and the others to approach, as well. Gerion followed his brother eagerly.
A detailed map of Westeros had been spread out across the surface of the table. A number of tiny figurines were spread along the western half of the map. These figurines represented the current known whereabouts of the Iron Fleet and the Royal Army.

Robert placed a finger on the Sunset Sea and pronounced "As you know, the Ironborn attempted to launch a sneak attack on Lannisport. Their goal, obviously, was to burn the Westerlands' fleet. Luckily, before too many ships were lost, we managed to push the Iron Fleet back."

"Thanks in large part to the information Lord Gregor supplied us," Davos Seaworth added in.

"Quite so," Robert Baratheon acknowledged, "Alas, this defeat will not be enough to discourage Balon Greyjoy. Am I correct?"

"You are, Your Grace," Victorion affirmed, "My brother attacked Lannisport because he saw their fleet as the Westerlands' greatest line of defense. Burning those vessels would have given him absolute freedom to raid the western half of this country's coast. Since he only partially succeeded, he will have to adapt a more cautious approach. But this rebellion is far from over. For now, we have only managed to delay his movements."

"I believe that," Eddard Stark murmured, "You say 'we.' Does that mean you will indeed help us stop your brother?"

"It does, my lord," Victorion responded.

Robert Baratheon nodded and stated "Then, tell us, Lord Victorion; what will be his next move?"

Victorion gazed down at the map and studied it intently. After a minute of uninterrupted silence, he pointed to two spots along the west coast. As he did this, he declared "His forces will make for Seagard and Faircastle. The first is all that stands between them and the rest of the Riverlands. The second is a fortified stronghold surrounded by water. Both are prime targets for the Iron Fleet to assault."

The other lords made a note of everything they just heard. Paxter Redwyne looked to the Iron Captain and inquired "Can we be certain of this?"

"Very certain," Gregor Clegane declared, "I can confirm everything Lord Victorion just said."

"And why is that, Lord Gregor?" Kevan asked in interest.

Gregor looked around the room and explicated "Long ago, I picked up some information about Lord Balon's schedule. After burning the fleet at Lannisport, he planned to attack Seagard and Faircastle right after. Although we saved most of the fleet, I can assure you that he still intends to carry out this campaign."

"I would not be surprised," Hoster Tully contended, "Seagard and Fair Isle are practically within spitting distance of the Iron Islands."

Eddard rubbed his chin, and then he queried "Where did this information come from?"

"I cannot say," Gregor bluntly replied, "Nor can I explain why I cannot say. All I can tell you is this: I've acquired this information through a very reliable source of my own."

Ah, yes. The "source" again.
It had been almost seven months since Gregor had first informed his inner circle of his secret source. In the time since then, he had not mentioned it again even once. But Gerion had often wondered on what this source actually was. It was only by Gregor's request that he and his colleagues had not asked for any clarity.

Nonetheless, the King and his affiliates were not content with this vague description.

"How can we trust in this 'source' if we do not know what it is?" Robert Baratheon asked rhetorically.

"Do you question Lord Varys about how his little birds sing their songs?" Gregor astutely countered.

"No, but at least we know of his birds," Tywin Lannister disputed, "Have you birds of your own, Lord Gregor?"

"I use no birds," Gregor claimed frankly, "Incidentally, you may be interested to know that this source was what saved your fleet, my lord."

Gerion tried not to scoff at the expression across his oldest brother's countenance.

It appears even the great Tywin Lannister can be puzzled.

Gregor continued with "A man of your intellect must realize that it was not mere happy coincidence that you were prepared for the attack on Lannisport months in advance. You already know that my word of caution was what prevented a greater tragedy. The intelligence which led to that warning was provided by my source. Think on that. Because of my source, hundreds of Westerlander sailors are still alive."

"That… that is true," Tywin Lannistered grudgingly admitted, "But if you were aware – or even suspected – that the Iron Islands would rebel, why did you not inform the crown directly?"

"At the time, I had no hard evidence," Gregor disclosed, "My word was all I had then."

"It seems to be all you have now, as well," Stannis Baratheon noted.

"That may be," Gregor alleged, "But given the circumstances that brought us here, I'd like to think that my word carries a little more merit today."

"We shall see if it does," Robert Baratheon muttered. He looked back down at the map, and he thought aloud "Since we have no conclusive way of predicting Balon's actual movements, we shall assume Lord Gregor and Lord Victarion's claims are correct. With that said, we must also assume that the Iron Fleet will sail for Seagard and Faircastle in the very near future."

"What shall we do to stop them, Your Grace?" Eddard Stark asked the question that was on everyone else's mind.

"Ordinarily, I would propose we eliminate the problem at the source," King Robert announced, placing his finger on Pyke, "But by the time our ships reach the Iron Islands, Balon's could already be over halfway to their destinations. As such, we need to concentrate on the defense of Seagard and Faircastle for now."

"How shall we proceed?" Paxter Redwyne questioned.

"We have two options: to reinforce the strongholds, or to prevent the siege altogether," Robert Baratheon pronounced, "Again, because Balon's exact timetable is unknown, we may not have time to set up reinforcements at Seagard and Fairycastle, or even get them there on time. Therefore, our only alternative is to intercept the Ironborn before they get there."

That last statement brought a wave of disquiet over the room.

Just when things were starting to look up…

"Are you suggesting we face the Ironborn on the open sea?" Stannis Baratheon incredulously asked his brother.

"Yes," Robert uttered in a somewhat mocking tone, "In war, one generally encounters his foe on the field of battle."

"In war, one generally fights those battles on actual fields," Eddard Stark debated, "Robert, while the mainland of Westeros is ours, the Ironborn all but live on the sea. Engaging them there would be folly."

"I must agree with Lord Eddard," Mace Tyrell remarked, "On the deck of a ship, the Ironborn are unmatched. They've been known to vanquish forces three times theirs. And even when Lord Paxter, Lord Stannis, and Lord Tywin combine their fleets, the Iron Fleet still greatly outnumbers ours."

"Our only choice is to meet them at sea," Robert maintained, "If we do not, Seagard and Fairycastle will be lost. And with them, the safety of the Riverlands and the Westerlands."

"Then we shall all reside in a watery grave," Davos Seaworth murmured quietly.

Nearly everyone there was thinking much the same, but the Onion Knight was the only one who dared to voice that thought. Robert seemed disappointed or irate that his associates were so displeased with his proposition. That was not a good sign.

When the leader starts to have doubts, that's when the followers should begin to panic.

Luckily, there was no panicking. Just then, Gregor Clegane placed his hands on the table, leaned forward, and mumbled crossly "Have you no faith in yourselves?"

"This is not a matter of faith, Lord Gregor," Kevan Lannister debated, "The Iron Fleet is capable of wreaking havoc along the coasts of Westeros. They can do worse – far worse – on open water. Any sane man would not wish to face them at sea."

Gregor thought on that for a moment, and he meekly nodded his head. Then he broke into a smile and slyly proposed "What if I told you we may have the means to even the odds in our favor?"

That drew everyone's attention.

"What means?" Robert Baratheon inquired keenly.

"I've something to show you all," Gregor Clegane ambiguously proclaimed, "But first, we must go somewhere else."

"Where?" inquired Mace Tyrell.

"Somewhere outside," Gregor muttered plainly, "Preferably somewhere open."

"This time of day, the training yard should be clear," Gerion Lannister disclosed. That was the first time he had spoken since the meeting began. He was used to speaking last. But it was not often that he had the last word.

"That will do," Gregor said in approval. He made his way over to the door of the chamber and bade the others, "Follow me, if you would. We shall continue the meeting in the training yard."

That was more a request than a command. All the same, every person in that chamber voluntarily chose to accompany Lord Gregor outside. That just had to know what he had that could possibly give them an advantage over the Ironborn in maritime warfare.

…

As everyone left the room, Allard Seaworth caught up with his father, Ser Davos. They had only exchanged a glance and a smile during the meeting; no actual words were spoken. When they were both out of the council chamber, they finally had a chance to talk. The Onion Knight was elated to see his second son.

That's to be expected.

Other than the occasional letter, they had not corresponded with each other in over three years. The walk to the courtyard would only take a few minutes, but that was enough time for them to mingle.

Their liege lord, Lord Stannis Baratheon, observed this interaction between father and son. Strangely, he found himself somewhat envious of them. He had never bonded with his own father that way, and he had no sons of his own. While Stannis had never been a sentimental man, he had always appreciated the sacredness of family unity.

It is a pity there are not more who appreciate that sacredness these days.

His wife, Lady Selyse of House Florent, was carrying his first child. She was scheduled to give birth very soon. According to Maester Cressen, Stannis' firstborn would almost certainly be a girl. Stannis was not pleased, but he was accustomed to disappointment. Even so, he never voiced his displeasure. He was never one to complain about what he did not have. He was keener to focus on what could be his.

Selyse and I will have more children. One is bound to be male.

As the Legionnaires and the leaders of the Royal Army exited the council chamber, they were joined up by the soldiers from Clegane's Keep and a number of the Lannister household guard.

The group was composed of over fifty people by this point. Davos and Allard were the only ones in that entire company who uttered a single word on the walk to the courtyard. The others followed Lord Gregor Clegane in silence.

When they reached the courtyard, they found it empty, just as Gerion Lannister had forecasted. Gregor requested for a sturdy wicker basket, a wooden pallet, and a slab of solid stone to be brought out. Lord Tywin sent for those items, and the Rock's servants were quick to go in search of them.

Five minutes later, those three items were sitting in the courtyard. The stone slab was standing in the very center of the clearing. The wicker basket was set atop the slab. The wooden pallet was leaned against the slab at a steep angle.

Gregor had everyone stand in the courtyard so that the stone slab and the wicker basket were totally concealed by the wooden pallet. He also made certain that they kept a certain amount of distance between themselves and those three objects.

This should prove most... intriguing.

Once the Mountain was content with where everyone was standing, he reached into his doublet and pulled out a small leather pouch. After untying and widening the mouth of the pouch, he outstretched his left hand. Then he upended the pouch over his left hand, and its contents poured out.

The contents turned out to be a coarse powder. The powder gave off a strange odor, like the ash left over in a hearth after the fire has gone out. The hue of the powder was predominantly black, but there were spots of grey here and there.

Gregor looked around at the assembled crowd and announced "What I hold here is a mixture of three minerals: coal, sulfur, and a creation of my own which I call saltpeter. Alone, each of these ingredients serves plenty of useful purposes, such as a type of fuel or oxidizer. Together… they form a very dangerous compound. I call this compound 'black powder.'"

Stannis noted the curious expression on his elder brother's face.

He was always easily fascinated.

However, Robert was not the only one who was taken in by the Mountain's sermon. Most of the leaders of the Royal Army, Sandor's men-at-arms, and even Gregor's fellow Legionnaires were deeply interested, as well. Apparently, even those closest to the Lord of Moat Cailin had been wholly unaware of the existence of this black powder.

If he took the effort to create this mixture in total secrecy, it must be remarkable, indeed. Then again, if he created it without anyone noticing, it may turn out to be underwhelming.

"What does this 'black powder' do, my lord?" Eddard Stark enquired.

"It would be difficult to describe in words," Gregor disclosed, "So I shall provide a demonstration."

Gregor returned the black powder to the pouch. Then he took out a short piece of thick twine which had been soaked in oil. He stuffed half of the piece of twine into the pouch, and then he pulled on the pouch's strings until the mouth of it was almost totally closed. There was just enough room for the other half of the twine to poke out.

He then gave the pouch a few good shakes so that the hidden half of the twine would be buried in the pile of black powder. As he did this, he asked no one in particular "Could I have a candle that's been lit?"

Again, his request was rather perplexing.

He wants a lit candle right now? It's broad daylight.

Lord Tywin had another of his servants fetch a candle and light it. When the servant returned with the candle, he gave it to Gregor straightaway.

Gregor took a moment to guarantee that everyone was at least ten meters away from the center of the courtyard. After making sure of that, he held the flame of the candle against the oil-soaked twine. It took less than a second for the twine to catch fire. As the flame slowly began to spread along the twine, Gregor looked around at his company and instructed them "Watch very closely. And I'd advise you to cover your ears."
Sandor Clegane and the seven Legionnaires chose to heed that second statement, and they brought their hands close to the sides of their heads. Everyone else kept their hands at their sides. Even so, Gregor went ahead with the demonstration.

When the flame on the twine reached the mouth of the pouch, Gregor turned around and flung it at wooden pallet. Immediately after he threw the pouch, he ducked down and pressed his hands against his ears. His brother and colleagues did the same. Stannis and everyone else merely watched on, hardly ever moving a muscle.

The instant the pouch landed against the pallet, there was a deafening explosion.

The explosion was so loud and so powerful that those standing closest to it were nearly thrown off their feet. It was thanks to the people standing directly behind them that they did not.

In the five seconds immediately following the explosion, bits of gravel, slivers of wood, and chunks of stone flew all over the courtyard. They were all tiny in size but abundant in number.

Sandor noticed that the smell of ash had returned. Not only that; it had increased exponentially. By the potency of the odor, it was as though there really was a pile of ash nearby.

In addition to that, a huge cloud of smoke had been left by the explosion. It covered much of the courtyard, and it gradually spread out until the entire vicinity was covered in it. King Robert and many of the others looked away to avoid getting it in their eyes. Some of them developed a bit of a cough. Luckily, the cough only lasted as long as the smoke did.

A couple minutes later, the smoke subsided, and the results of the explosion were on full display.

There was nothing left of the wicker basket, the wooden pallet, or the stone slab. They had all been reduced to rubble.

Gregor smiled at the sight, and he turned back to everyone else. He folded his arms and proudly announced "As you can see, black powder is as deadly and destructive as wildfire. However, it also works much more quickly, and it is far easier to control."

"So it would seem," Robert Baratheon murmured drily. He broke into a small grin and remarked "That was… quite impressive, my lord."

Gregor nodded lightly in acknowledgment and stated "Thank you, Your Grace. Shall we see if it will impress the Iron Fleet, as well?"

"Perhaps we shall," Robert conceded, "Tell me; how did you make this compound?"

"The same way anything is made: constant trial and error," Gregor answered simply.

Oberyn Martell stepped forward and professed "I'm certain we would have noticed if you were experimenting with this substance. The noise alone would have been a giveaway. Yet we never caught on. Just when did you find the opportunity to test your creation, Gregor?"

"I never did, Oberyn," Gregor revealed, "In fact, I myself did not know it would actually work until this very moment. For all I knew, the black powder might have done nothing at all."

The Red Viper chuckled at that. Dacey Mormont, Robert Baratheon, Sandor Clegane, and a number of the other individuals present snickered a bit, as well.

Unsurprisingly, Stannis was not one to laugh. There were some who claimed he had never even learned to smile.

Does Lord Gregor not realize he just ran the risk of making himself look like an ass? In front of his KING?

Robert clearly did not share his younger brother's mindset. He kept his focus on the residue in the center of the courtyard, and he queried "How much black powder do you have?"

"Another hundred pouches of equal strength to this one are currently in my camp," Gregor enlightened him, "I also have enough coal, sulfur, and saltpeter to make a thousand more. They just need to be mixed."

Stannis Baratheon moved beside his brother and asked "If you were to guess, Lord Gregor, how many pouches would be required to sink a single Ironborn ship?"

The Mountain thought on that for about a minute, and then he conjectured "That would depend on the size of the vessel and the responsiveness of the crew. But if you'd prefer a rough estimate… I'd say nine or ten pouches."

"That sounds fairly accurate," Victarion Greyjoy coincided.

"If that's the case, we should have enough black powder to destroy over half of the Iron Fleet," Paxter Redwyne noted.

"It would seem that way, Lord Paxter," Gregor stated in agreement, "However, before we use the black powder in a combat situation, I will need some assurances."

"What assurances, my lord?" Davos Seaworth inquired.

Gregor firmly declared: "Firstly, I and I alone will determine how the black powder is distributed, as well as who it is distributed to. It is paramount that everyone who is charged with handling black powder is able to do so properly and responsibly. The slightest misstep could yield devastating repercussions to our own forces. Furthermore, having too much black powder on any of our vessels could be quite hazardous, so I must limit how much is stored on each ship. If, after the war, any of our current supply of black powder is still left over, whatever remains will be turned over to me and the Legion without Banners. Lastly… the knowledge of how to make black powder shall not be passed on to anyone."

Everyone had paid close attention to Gregor's short sermon, and they had no issue with the majority of his points. The last one, however, struck many of them as rather demanding.

"That is a very strict condition, Lord Gregor," Kevan Lannister remarked.

"I realize that," Gregor Clegane mumbled, "But it is nonnegotiable. I will not have black powder created by anyone other than myself."

"Why?" Tywin muttered dubiously, "So you can own the exclusive rights to manufacture it, just as you do with those construction materials of yours?"

The Mountain slowly shook his head and proclaimed, "Oh, no, Lord Tywin. Unlike concrete and cement, I am not going to sell black powder. It is an extremely volatile and unsafe substance. In wrong or incapable hands, it could cause untold damage. I will not be a party to such reckless destruction."

Now he is starting to contradict himself. Does he even realize that?
"If black powder is so unstable, why would you have us use it in the first place?" Stannis Baratheon said inquisitively.

"I never said it was unstable; I said it needed proper handling," Gregor contended, "Keep in mind, Lord Stannis; it is essentially the dry equivalent of wildfire. As such, it needs to be managed like wildfire, too. The pyromancers of King’s Landing do not share their formula for wildfire with anyone outside their order. In that same fashion, I intend to monitor the crafting and circulation of all black powder just as thoroughly. For the duration of this war, I will allow the Royal Army to use it. But once the war ends, I expect any remaining black powder to be returned to me."

"What shall be done with the leftover black powder?" Garth Hightower queried.

_I'd like to know that myself._

"It will be placed in storage at Moat Cailin until the next war," Gregor solemnly decreed.

_Acceptable solution. In any case, it is unlikely that the "next war" will happen for many years. After all, once it becomes known that Robert's Master of Order has a weapon as catastrophic as wildfire, anyone with the sanity of Patchface will know better than to rebel against the crown again._

"Very well, Lord Gregor," Robert Baratheon claimed, "I will ensure that our forces understand that the black powder is handled with care, and that none of them try to keep any for themselves."

"I am grateful for that, Your Grace," Gregor Clegane stated appreciatively.

"You needn't worry about any of my men taking some without your consent," Eddard Stark bluntly muttered.

"Or any of mine," Mace Tyrell conceded.

Tywin Lannister and Hoster Tully swore the same vow, and Stannis Baratheon was the last to agree.

Once all the great lords agreed to Gregor's conditions, Robert Baratheon turned to face the crowd and announced "Now that it is established that we have this edge over the Ironborn, I submit that we go ahead with my proposal to intercept the Iron Fleet before they reach Seagard and Fair Isle."

This time, Robert's suggestion received no resistance or rejections from anyone else.

"So be it," the stag king murmured after a period of quietness, "Now we must decide how these countermeasures will be devised and executed."

"Shall we return to the council chamber, Your Grace?" Eddard Stark presumed.

Robert answered his best friend's question with a nod.

Everyone in the group departed from the courtyard and began to head back the way they came. On the way there, Stannis heard what sounded like a low-pitched groan.

It turned out to be his brother's stomach. Soon, others noticed the groan, and they gazed in the king's direction.

When he noticed the stares, Robert flushed and commented "Excuse me. I have not eaten since sunrise."
"None of us have, Your Grace," Eddard humorously informed his best friend.

"It might do us some good to have a bite of luncheon," Robert suggested.

"I will have meat and mead brought to the council chamber, Your Grace," Tywin Lannister offered.

"Very well, Lord Tywin," Robert gladly acknowledged his father-by-law's proposal.

Soon enough, the large group arrived back at the council chamber. Once the Legionnaires and the leaders of the Royal Army were reassembled, Tywin sent for food and drink. Robert proposed that they wait until the meal arrived to resume their battle plans, and no one protested.

While they waited for luncheon, everyone in the room passed the time by conversing with someone else. Garth Hightower talked with Mace Tyrell and Paxter Redwyne, Allard Seaworth talked with Davos Seaworth, Eddard Stark talked with Robert Baratheon, and so on.

Stannis was pretty much the only person who was uninvolved in any of those conversations. He simply stood off to the side and observed the others as they mingled.

Then, at one point, Gregor Clegane walked over to him and requested "May I have a word, Lord Stannis?"

"That would depend on the subject of your word," Stannis Baratheon stoically replied.

"It has to do with the security of your family," Gregor informed him.

That succeeded in earning the stag lord's attention. He looked the Mountain in the eye and told him "I'm listening."

Gregor first checked to ensure that they were not being overhead, and then he stated "I have heard tell Lady Selyse is with child."

"You've heard correctly," Stannis affirmed, "Of course, the rest of the country has heard that, as well. My wife's pregnancy is common knowledge."

"Yes, my lord," Gregor conceded, "But what I have to tell you is not."

"Go on," Stannis beckoned him.

Gregor illuminated him with "Early last year, the Legion uncovered the existence of a group of fanatic Targaryen loyalists somewhere in the country. We are actively working to snuff these traitors out, but until, we are treating them as a genuine threat to the crown."

"Are they a confirmed threat to Robert and his family?" Stannis asked.

"Yes," Gregor claimed, "However, they are an even greater threat to you and yours."

"How so?" Stannis questioned uneasily.

"According to our intelligence reports, once your heir is born, they will try to kill her soon after," Gregor apprised him.

How does he know I am having a daughter?

While that was an excellent question, it was not the one Stannis put into words. Instead, he asked
"Do you know how they will attempt this?"

"Before she is even a year old, she will be given an anonymous gift," Gregor revealed, "The gift will be a doll. The loyalists are hoping that the doll will be placed in your daughter's cradle."

"What harm could a simple doll do to her?" Stannis wondered aloud.

"It will be tainted with greyscale," Gregor responded.

Stannis was flabbergasted by that. "Greyscale?"

"Yes," Gregor validated, "Fortunately, the loyalists are unaware that I know of this scheme of theirs. So it is completely avoidable."

"What would you have me do?" Stannis inquired attentively.

Gregor urged him "Any time your daughter receives a doll from an unknown party, do not bring it anywhere near her. You must burn it right away."

"I will do so," Stannis asserted.

Normally, Stannis Baratheon questioned the authenticity of anything he heard, even if it was from someone he respected and trusted. But when his family's security was at stake, he took the news very seriously.

"A question, my lord," Stannis enquiringly commented, "If you learnt about this plot a year ago, why are you only telling me of it now?"

"I was waiting for the right opportunity," Gregor insisted, "I could not risk sending a raven. It may have gotten lost on the way to Dragonstone, or worse yet, intercepted by the Targaryen loyalists. I ultimately realized that the only safe option was to tell you in person. I've been trying to arrange a meeting between you and myself for months. It was simply our good fortunate that your brother the King called this meeting."

"What if the Ironborn not rebelled?" Stannis hypothesized.

"Then I would have found some other way to meet with you," Gregor claimed.

Stannis nodded his head, seeing the logic in that argument.

Now I am finally beginning to understand him.

"In any case, I am indebted to you, Lord Gregor," Stannis debated, "Know that you have my most profound appreciation."

"You have no need to thank me, my lord," Gregor assured the older man, "I am merely carrying out my duties to the throne and the country."

Yes, you are. Now I see why Robert charged you with maintaining the integrity of Westeros. Evidently, you overlook nothing.
Chapter Notes

Note: What's up, guys? Hope you enjoyed the holidays. I know I said this chapter would have both the assault on Seagard and the sea-battle off Fair Isle in it, but the content detailing both skirmishes turned out to be longer than I planned. Plus, I started writing this chapter later than I planned to. As such, I was unable to write everything before my vacation to Rome began. So this chapter will just have the Seagard account. I have not yet completed the Fair Isle segment.

Right now I'm with my family in England (we had a layover flight in London), and we'll be arriving in Rome in a few hours. I'll be in Italy for the next week, but I'm going to try to have the Fair Isle account posted before New Year's.

Now, some people expressed concern over the introduction of gunpowder in the last chapter. Allow me to put your qualms to rest; I have no intention of making black powder a recurring item in this story. In fact, after the Greyjoy Rebellion, I plan to put it away for good. Some of you will probably be keen to point out that Gregor told the leaders of the Royal Army what black powder is made of, so it might be possible that one of them will attempt to manufacture it on his own. However, while coal and sulfur are abundant in Westeros, Gregor is the only person in the Known World who knows how to create saltpeter, and he will be controlling the output of that mineral. So, no; no one else will have the opportunity to craft black powder. Oh, and some readers are becoming a little irate or impatient that Gregor only gives a "source" as his explanation for knowing the possible future. Shortly after the Greyjoy Rebellion, Gregor will explain his source in detail to certain individuals. He will also explain why he only gave a vague description (i.e. just called it a "source") at first.

BOOM! BOOM!

The explosions were loud. Uncomfortably loud to those who heard them for the first time.

Lord Jorah Mormont had heard enough of them that the noise did not bother him as they once had. In any case, he was more interested in what the source of the explosion accomplished than the sound it made.

A small handful of three certain minerals, mixed together and stored in a pouch. With a single flame, they are capable of demolishing wood and stone alike. When he first heard of black powder and its capabilities, Jorah had doubted it. Then he witnessed a demonstration, and his doubt vanished.

Only the leaders of the Royal Army had been aware of the existence of black powder before the King announced that the Army would be divided into three companies. The first would sail for Seagard to defend House Mallister's seat from an impending Ironborn assault. The second would sail for Fair Isle and protect House Farman in the same fashion. The third would sail for Pyke immediately after the first two triumphed.

Jorah had been assigned to the first company. That one would be led by Lord Stannis Baratheon of Dragonstone. Jorah would have preferred to be in the third company. That wish was fueled by a personal yearning for retribution.

Jorah was old enough to remember the days before Quellon Greyjoy's rule. As a lad, he had fended off Bear Island from Ironborn raiders on more than a few occasions. Loyal retainers of House Mormont had died pushing back the invaders. Now he would have a chance to bring the fight to them. But only a chance.

He took some comfort in the knowledge that the first and second company were supposed to rendezvous with the third once their preliminary tasks were accomplished.

If the gods are good, the King will not land his units on the shores of Pyke until after they are joined with his brother's.

Of course, that would depend on how quickly the Ironborn were repelled at Seagard and Fair Isle. Jorah had some control over that, at the very least. That he knew for a fact, due to a new tactic of warfare that had been introduced by Gregor Clegane.

The King and the leaders of the Royal Army had spent a whole day determining which units would compose each of the three companies. The day after, each unit of the Army was informed where he or she would be going.

After the soldiers received their assignments, King Robert had ordered their leaders to determine who among them were both strong of arm and sharp of eye. Over a quarter of their forces — including Jorah — met that description. Nevertheless, every one of them was ordered to report to the camp of the Legion without Banners.

At the head of that camp, Lord Gregor Clegane – The Mountain That Rides, Robert's Master of Order, Lord of Moat Cailin, Commanding Officer of the Legion without Banners, and the husband of Jorah's first cousin – had addressed those units. Once he secured their attention, he claimed to have created a weapon that would all but ensure their victory against the Ironborn.

Jorah – and many, many others – had been intrigued by that declaration. Lord Gregor had then proceeded to tell them of his black powder and its destructive uses. Some had been unsettled by the analogy he made of it to wildfire, but their anxiety had been alleviated when he assured them that black powder was far easier to manage than wildfire.

The Mountain then took a pouch with a piece of string hanging out of the opening. After lighting the piece of string and waiting for the flame to slink into the pouch, Lord Gregor had chucked it at a block of marble that had been placed in an empty clearing. There was a powerful noise and a cloud of smoke. When the smoke evaporated, Jorah saw that the block had been reduced to rubble.

What sorcery is this?

He soon learned that no sorcery was at work; only science.

Gregor Clegane revealed that he intended for the Royal Army to use more of these black powder pouches against the Ironborn fleet. He explained that he would select certain individuals to brandish the pouches in the upcoming battles. Whoever wielded the pouches would need to possess superb aim and a great throwing arm. That was why he called for all those in the Royal Army who were both strong of arm and sharp of eye.

Before anyone there was given authorization to carry black powder, Lord Gregor Clegane had insisted that each of them go through a "screening process," whatever that was.
The screening process was designed to test how well they handled black powder.

For the test, the candidates were given small pouches that weighed the same as a pouch of black powder. In actuality, these pouches were filled with dirt, but they still had makeshift wicks sticking out of them. Gregor had the candidates practice lighting the wicks and throwing the pouches as certain targets in a wide-open field. He judged and eliminated the contenders on a variety of factors.

Anyone who dropped a pouch or failed to throw it soon enough after lighting its wick was disqualified. All those who threw too far or too close were dismissed, as well. So was anyone who did not wait until the flame went beneath the mouth of the pouch. Gregor explained that that was especially critical. If the flame was still visible when it was thrown, it was likely to go out whilst in midair. And even if it did not, when the pouch landed on the deck of an Ironborn ship, one of the crew might have had time enough to scoop the pouch up off the ground and toss it back at its point of origin.

After hours upon hours of systematic tryouts, Lord Gregor had finally narrowed down thousands of hopeful prospects to a choice fifty. To his satisfaction, Lord Jorah was among those fifty.

_I will show those Ironmen rapists that when they play with the bear, they also play with fire._

A number of his compatriots would be making a similar point, except theirs would involve the animal or object that represented their own houses. Regardless of who made that point, a great percentage of the Iron Fleet would soon sink or burn.

Apart from the leaders of the Royal Army, those fifty people were the only ones to whom Gregor disclosed what black powder was made of. However, all he told them was that it was composed of coal, sulfur, and saltpeter. He did not reveal the powder's chemical composition. In other words, the ratio of coal to sulfur to saltpeter was still a mystery. Only Lord Gregor himself knew that.

The Mountain claimed to have brought enough black powder for eleven hundred pouches. That claim turned out to be true; he supplied just that many to the fifty throwers. He had actually taken the time to mix and prepare each and every one of them alone.

Each of the fifty was given twenty-two pouches. Gregor gave them thorough instructions on how to properly transport the pouches. The throwers were advised not to keep the pouches in damp or open areas. Moreover, the pouches should not be kept in any room with a lit torch or brazier, or any other open flame. Furthermore, in the event that any of the pouches did come in contact with fire, to minimize the fallout, Gregor recommended that each of the pouches be stored in a separate compartment. Otherwise, they would start a chain reaction that could severely damage their surroundings.

Seventeen of the throwers had been assigned to the company that would sail for Seagard, and another seventeen were among those who would make for Fair Isle. The remaining sixteen would remain in the king's reserve forces.

Gregor told the throwers that if any of the pouches remained unused after the war, he would need all the leftover ones returned to him. To ensure that that happened, he had arranged for each of the throwers to be accompanied by one of his Legionnaires at all times. That way, they could consistently monitor how many pouches of black powder were in their collective inventory.

_The Mountain trusts us to give the powder to the Ironborn… yet he does not trust us to give it back to him. How queer._
Jorah might have felt insulted for this notable lack of trust, but he could not fault Lord Gregor for being wary. The bear lord was actually inclined to believe that Gregor had only given him and the other throwers those Legionnaire escorts as a precaution. Some of the throwers had been longtime allies of the Mountain. A few were even Legionnaires themselves. All the same, no one was exempt from having a "chaperone." At least with that arrangement, no one would wonder if Gregor favored any of the throwers in particular. Additionally, the escorts would not be there simply to watch the throwers. They would also be there to protect and guard them, just in case anyone (Ironborn or otherwise) attempted to forcibly seize any of the black powder.

Be that as it may, Jorah noticed something peculiar. The status of each Legionnaire supervisor appeared to coincide with that of the thrower he or she was assigned to. Most of the throwers were men-at-arms or soldiers; their watchers held such ranks. There were some knights and heirs of highborn lords; their respective guides had been anointed and entitled to inherit their father's lands, too.

Jorah was the highest-ranking out of all fifty of the throwers. As such, he was given the highest-ranking supervisor, as well. That turned out to be the Mountain's foremost lieutenant, Prince Oberyn Martell.

Jorah had spoken with the prince at his cousin Dacey's wedding, but their meeting had not lasted for more than a few minutes. That had hardly been enough time to get to know the Red Viper on any personal level. He supposed Oberyn had thought him dull or uninteresting. If so, he was not the first.

From what Jorah could surmise, Oberyn had no intention of ignoring or disregarding the bear lord during this encounter. From the moment the Mountain had tasked his Dornish captain with shadowing Jorah, Oberyn seemed to develop a keen interest in him. At first, Jorah assumed the Red Viper was merely carrying out his orders. In actuality, it was more than that. He quickly realized that Oberyn Martell was genuinely interested in becoming better acquainted with the Lord of Bear Island.

Jorah was at a loss as to what could have triggered the prince's newfound fascination with him. He had not changed much since their first meeting. The biggest difference was that he was a widower now. Still, that meant little and less in the grand scheme of things. In his mind, at any rate. He had heard of Oberyn's… eccentricities. But he was certain that was not why Oberyn wished for them to become more familiar with each other.

On the voyage to Seagard, Jorah learned of Oberyn's true motivations.

The two of them had been posted on the war galley Lord Steffon, named in honor of the King's late lord father. The vessel had disembarked at the same moment as Lord Stannis Baratheon's flagship Fury, and it continued to sail directly alongside the flagship. The two vessels were at the very front of the small armada destined for the western shore of the Riverlands.

Jorah spent much of that maritime journey on the bridge. Oberyn did, as well. Often as not, his daughter Nymeria was in his company. Jorah was fairly certain they were not there merely because he happened to be there, as well. They simply seemed to prefer being on deck, just as he did. Nevertheless, their constantly close proximity to his position was hard to overlook. Strangely enough, Jorah did not even have any black powder with him.

Finally, on the third night of their voyage, Oberyn confessed his reasons for spending so much time with or near Lord Jorah. His elucidation was concise yet comprehensible: "You and I will soon be family."
"How so, my prince?" a perplexed Jorah Mormont queried.

"My eldest daughter is to wed the heir to Clegane's Keep," Oberyn pointed out, "As it happens, her betrothed is the younger brother of your first cousin's husband. Through House Clegane, you and I will be related."

"Distantly, but yes," Jorah noted, "I believe you and I would be… second cousins twice-removed."

"Or first, depending on how one examines the family tree," the Red Viper contended, "No matter how remote the relation may be, there will be some connection between my house and yours."

In some way or other, all of Westeros may be related eventually. I would not be surprised if that becomes the case.

"And that's why you are so engrossed in my affairs?" Jorah presumed, "You wish to know more of me and my house before we become part of your family?"

"Yes, my lord," Oberyn affirmed, "Let me assure you; it is not that I am wary of you or any other Mormont. It is more for my curiosity's sake that I wish to learn about you and yours. Dacey is the only member of your family that I can sincerely call my friend, and in these days, she is as much a Clegane as she is a Bear Islander."

"You met my aunt, Lady Maege, did you not?" Jorah recounted.

"Yes, I did…" Oberyn muttered bluntly, "I mean no offense when I tell you this, but I hope she is not a definitive indication of what all Bear Islanders are like."

Jorah Mormont chuckled at that and stated "She is not, I promise you. I understand what you are entailing, however. On occasion, my aunt can be a difficult woman. My father once japed that his sister was the true reason he left Bear Island to join the Night's Watch. But I know he loves her."

"Of course he does," Oberyn conceded with a smirk, "Siblings are expected to tease each other all their lives, even when they're well into adulthood. As it happens, my sister and I still make friendly quips about each other."

That must be amusing.

Jorah had no brothers or sisters of his own. He had never minded growing up an only child, but he had often wondered what it would be like to have a younger (or older) sibling.

"I can appreciate and respect a man who holds family in such high regard," Jorah proclaimed, folding his arms, "If there is anything in particular you'd wish to know, you can ask of me, my prince."

Lord Jorah and Prince Oberyn spent much of the evening talking about various matters. Some of their topics were private in nature; others were more casual or more professional.

For instance, both men knew how to read a map. Oberyn suggested that they get one to determine the exact distance between Bear Island and Sunspear, and Jorah decided to humor him.

They made an interesting discovery. House Mormont was located at the most northwestern point of the Seven Kingdoms, and House Martell was located at the most southeastern point. Because of that, they were literally farther apart than any two other houses in all of Westeros. There was the possible exceptions of House Redwyne of the Arbor and Houses Crowl, Magnar, and Stane on the isle of Skagos, which were found at the most southwestern and most northeastern points. respectively. But there were some who debated that the Skagosi did not count, given how seldom they came to the mainland.

Despite the vast distance between their ancestral homes, Jorah Mormont and Oberyn Martell got along very well. They passed several hours in pleasant conversation. At several points, Nymeria participated in their discussion. By the end of it, they felt as though they had known each other for years.

Around midnight, Oberyn decided to get some rest. He bade the bear lord a good night and retired below deck to his cabin.

Jorah stayed up a while longer. So did Nymeria. Other than the on-duty sentries and the ship's navigator, the bridge was deserted. But the sentries were preoccupied with guard duty, and the navigator was stationed at the wheel. So in every other sense, Jorah Mormont and Nymeria Martell were alone.

They passed a few minutes standing at the bough of the ship in total silence. Finally, Jorah broke the quiet atmosphere with "Lovely night, is it not?"

"Depends on what you call 'lovely,' my lord," Nymeria commented bluntly.

"It is quite calm and peaceful," Jorah clarified, "And all this water… some may find it immense and empty. I find it a wondrous sight. There is just something about seafaring that has always struck my fancy."

"Well, your home is on an island," Nymeria pointed out, "You would be no stranger to seafaring."

"Are you, my princess?" Jorah asked curiously.

Nymeria glared at him in mild annoyance, and she mumbled "Please do not call me that, my lord."

Jorah was stunned at her reaction to being addressed that way.

_Most women would embrace that title. She rejects it…_

"Your father is a prince," Jorah remarked, not unkindly.

"And I'm his daughter; I know," Nymeria stated, "That does not mean I have to equal him in status. I find the whole concept a little demeaning."

Jorah could understand her sentiment. He offered "If you insist, I shall only call you 'my lady.'"

"Thank you, my lord," Nymeria said gratefully, "Now, to answer your earlier question… this is my first time on a ship."

Jorah was somewhat intrigued. "Really?"

"Yes, indeed," she affirmed, "You see, Dorne has no fleet of its own to speak of."

"Neither does the North," he added in, "Brandon the Burner put his fleet to the torch after his father, Brandon the Shipwright, was lost at sea."

"I see," Nymeria avowed, "My ancestor, Nymeria Martell, burnt her fleet to ensure that it would never be used against her people."

Jorah nodded in acknowledgment and asked "Which of them would you say had the truer reason?"
"Neither," Nymeria debated, "I believe both had just cause."

"I am not certain of that," Jorah professed, "Brandon Stark's actions were fueled by grief; Nymeria Martell's by the desire to uphold the security of her land."

"Is grief any less a legitimate justification than security?" Nymeria contended.

"Perhaps not… in certain conditions," Jorah murmured, "But they are two very different facets. The wish for security is present in all of us. It preserves us, even in extreme cases. Whereas grief… grief can incite us to behave selfishly or irrationally. In extreme cases… it can undo us."

"I did not take you for a philosopher, my lord," Nymeria Martell said wryly with a small grin.

"I do not think myself one," Jorah proclaimed, "I am merely saying what I personally believe."

"If I may ask, what experiences with grief have you had?" Nymeria enquired curiously.

Where do I begin?

Jorah apprised her "In my youth, I lost friends and retainers to Ironborn raiders. When I was a man grown, I lost more to the wildlings. My mother died when I was in the midst of boyhood. My father left to join the Night's Watch before my thirtieth name day. Most recently… sickness claimed my wife."

At that, Nymeria placed a soft hand on the bear lord's shoulder and commented softly "Yes, I remember hearing word of that. I do not believe I had the chance to offer my condolences. So please know I am very sorry for your loss."

"I appreciate your words, my lady," Jorah asserted, "Seventeen turns of the moon have elapsed since my wife died. I do miss her, but my period of mourning for her has passed. I should not be wallowing in sorrow."

"I admire your strength," Nymeria claimed, "And I agree; your foremost concern should be finding a new bride."

"I have been searching for one," Jorah apprised her, "I have corresponded with several ladies from the other Northern houses. Alas, my endeavors have proven most unsuccessful."

"Was no one you found appealing to you?" Nymeria conjectured.

"No, I am not that particular," Jorah confessed, "It was they who were disinterested."

Nymeria appeared flabbergasted. "I find that very difficult to believe, my lord. My father and I have been speaking with you for hours, and we've both come to enjoy your company. How could your own countrywomen not?"

"They did not know me as you do now," Jorah explained, "I believe they think of Bear Island as nothing more than a huge rock in the center of the Bay of Ice. For that reason, they think little of the man who serves as its lord."

"I'd have thought Northwomen were less shallow than that," Nymeria uttered.

"Some are; some are not," Jorah revealed, "I have not given up my search yet. I am determined to find a new bride before the year's end."

"Maybe you should consider looking outside the North," Nymeria advised him, "There are plenty of open-minded women south of the Neck. And after this rebellion… you will be one of the most eligible bachelors in Westeros."

Jorah could not help but smile at the young Dornishwoman. "I thank you for your vote of confidence, my lady. I shall reflect on your counsel."

Nymeria smiled back and muttered "Please do. I am certain you will find a bride who can accept you for who and what you are. However she is, I hope she makes you happy."

Jorah continued grinning and lightly nodded at that. Then he murmured "Tell me, my lady; all this talk of marriage, yet we've spoken only of me. I'd like to know your thoughts on the matter."

Nymeria looked a little bewildered. "Why do you ask, my lord?"

"I am simply curious," Jorah declared, "I imagine marriage was far from one of your worries during your childhood. But not as much today."

"You are correct," Nymeria confirmed, "After the King legitimized me, I suddenly became a fair deal more interesting to the men of Westeros. In fact, at the Twins, Ser Ryman Frey tried to proposition his son to me. He was not even sober when he presented that option."

Jorah scowled at that and mumbled crossly "That sounds just like the Freys. Discretion and courtesy are foreign to them, they care little for kinship and loyalty, they have no bravery, integrity, or compassion to speak of… and they still wonder why the whole world hates them."

"Not all Freys are like that, my lord," Nymeria contended, "Lord Walder's heir, Ser Stevron, is at least a decent man. But I would have to agree with you that most Freys are not very different from Ser Ryman, who happens to be Stevron Frey's eldest son."

"I assume you refused him?" Jorah theorized.

"No, my father did that for me," Nymeria humorously recounted.

Jorah scoffed. Then he queried "Is there any man you actually have considered swearing your life to?"

"Not yet," Nymeria revealed, "I am still young, my lord. My father says I am still a girl. Then again, I'll always be a girl to him. So far, I have no given much thought to marriage itself. It could be possible that I may never wed."

"Well, if you ever do, I hope you find a man who will treat you kindly fairly," Jorah muttered.

Nymeria grinned and said appreciatively "Thank you, Lord Jorah."

She then raised herself up and kissed the bear lord on his cheek. At that, he smiled back at her friendly. Before long, the two of them turned in for the night.

A couple days later, the armada came within sight of Seagard. Lord Jason Mallister used a beacon to signal the royalist ships. He informed them that he was prepared to defend his holdfast. He also notified them that he would send them reinforcements (if they were needed).

When the royalist fleet was two hundred meters from Seagard, Lord Stannis had the ships for a blockade along the length of Ironman's Bay. The ships were far enough from each other that they could veer hard to left and right without fear of collision, but close enough that the Ironborn would be unable to break through their ranks.
Then they waited. That was the worst part, the waiting. They all knew that the Ironborn were coming.

_They must not be in a hurry to get here._

But they were coming. There was no question of that. Seagard was the Riverlands' sole line of defense along the west coast. If it fell, the whole of the Riverlands would be at the Ironborn's mercy. After their failure to burn the Westerlands' fleet, they would focus their attention on either the North or the Riverlands next, and the Riverlands were closer.

_Not that close, apparently. Where could the Ironborn be?_

Finally, after half a day of inactivity, a warhorn was blown. Everyone snapped to full attention then.

In the distance, a silhouette of a single vessel. Then another appeared. Then two more. Then three, five, eight, eleven, fifteen, twenty… fifty more.

When the whole of the invasion force was visible, Jorah realized the Ironborn outnumbered them by at least two-to-one. Every one of those vessels was headed directly towards the blockade.

But he was not afraid. He would not let fear take ahold of him.

Slowly, very slowly, the Ironmen came further closer. They were headed due east. They did not deviate from their course in the slightest amount. Before too long, Jorah could see the crew on the bridges of the lead ships.

"Steady," Oberyn muttered softly, "Hold it steady."

He was speaking to the tense crew, not to Jorah or his daughter. Jorah knew why; the prince knew that neither he nor Nymeria would buckle or panic.

A small table had been moved onto the bridge. Jorah was standing next to it. His twenty-two pouches of black powder had been placed on the surface of the table.

When the Ironborn were five hundred feet away, he heard Lord Stannis announce "Throwers, at the ready!"

Along the length of the blockade, callers repeated his command: "Throwers, at the ready!"

At that, Nymeria brought Jorah a torch. He took it from her, but he did not light any of the pouches yet. The Ironborn were still too far away. He and the other throwers remained on standby.

Soon the Ironborn were four hundred feet away. Then three hundred, two hundred, one hundred…

Finally, when they were fifty feet away, Lord Stannis shouted "Pouches!"

Jorah and the other sixteen throwers each picked up one pouch of black powder.

A few seconds later, Stannis yelled "Ignite!"

Jorah promptly moved the wick of his first pouch to the flame of his torch. The oil-soaked string caught fire almost straightaway.

Very soon after, Stannis bellowed "Unleash!"
It took a moment for the flame to spread to the pouch's interior. Once it did that, Jorah focused on the nearest Ironman ship, drew back his arm, and flung the pouch at it.

The pouch landed on the port side of the bridge of the ship he had aimed at. Upon impact, the pouch detonated.

The damage it inflicted was minor, but lasting. One crewman had a leg blown off. Three more were thrown off their feet. A large hole was blasted into the ship's upper hull.

Sixteen more explosions were heard from all along the Iron Fleet's ranks. All of them were followed by the sounds of men screaming and wood splitting. Those sounds livened Jorah's spirits.

There is plenty more where that came from.

Stannis then announced "Release at your own will!"

Jorah picked up a second pouch, lit it, and tossed it at the same ship. This one landed near the mast, causing serious damage to the bough of the ship and setting it afire. Because of that, the vessel was unable to continue sailing in a straight line.

Jorah's third pouch landed at the base of the main sail. He managed to hit the rigging, which was demolished in the next explosion. As a result, the huge pole was in danger of collapsing, and the vessel was thrown off course.

Three more pouches, and the ship was scuttled. Jorah watched as the surviving crew struggled to abandon ship before it sank. He smiled in immense satisfaction.

Jorah and the other throwers managed to hinder the Ironborn's advance. However, they were unable to prevent it altogether. After each of the thrower had dispatched an average of nine pouches apiece, a number of enemy vessels finally reached Lord Stannis'.

Several of those vessels already had boarding parties assembled on deck. When they were close enough, they leapt aboard the ships of the royal army. Swords were drawn, and hostiles were engaged.

Soon, the air was filled with the clash of steel on steel and the battlecries of hundreds of soldiers. The black powder explosions became progressively more infrequent and fewer in number. Most of the throwers decided to abandon scientific warfare in favor of traditional combat tactics.

For a while, no Ironborn boarded the Lord Steffon. Jorah was free to continue using his pouches of black powder. He selected a target, took a pouch, set fire to the wick, chucked it at his target, and repeated the process many times.

Thirty minutes into the battle, Jorah noticed a certain warship twenty-five yards away. It was going awfully fast, nearly at ramming speed. He studied his surroundings, and he discovered that the warship was on a collision course with the Fury.

Jorah felt a surge of nervousness run through him. At this moment, the Fury had already been boarded by three other Ironborn vessels. So far, Lord Stannis, Ser Davos Seaworth, and the rest of the crew had successfully avoided being overwhelmed by the invading parties. However, they were all too preoccupied with the foe to notice the warship coming right towards them.

Jorah decided he had to intervene somehow. Unfortunately, his supply of black powder was nearly depleted. He did not have enough to sink the warship, or even cripple it. He could have attempted to call out to Lord Stannis, but the excess ambience drowned out his shouts.
Soon, Jorah concluded that the only way to save the Fury was if another vessel cut the warship off. Since no other Royal Army vessels appeared to have noticed the accelerating warship, Jorah surmised that the Lord Steffon would have to be the interceder.

Jorah hastily sought out the captain of the Lord Steffon and pointed out the warship to him. He explained his idea to save the Fury, and to his good fortune, the captain did not seem averse to it. Other than the ships around the Fury and the ones that were half-sunk, there were no other Ironborn vessels in the immediate area. So even if the Lord Steffon broke its position, there would be no risk of the Ironborn slipping through the blockade.

When the Lord Steffon started to move, Jorah focused his attention on the warship. When it was close enough, he was able to read the name printed on its side: Iron Fist.

His eyes widened when they saw those words. That was the name of the ship captained by Rodrik Greyjoy, Lord Balon's firstborn son and heir. Jorah and everyone else in Stannis' forces had heard that Rodrik would be leading the assault on Seagard. They had been given orders to capture him alive, if possible.

When the Iron Fist was ten meters from the Fury, the Lord Steffon lurched in front of the Royal Army's flagship. The Iron Fist attempted to alter course, but it only managed to turn five degrees port before it collided with the war galley. Both ships shook uncomfortably, but the hulls of both managed to withstand the force of the impact.

It took very little time for either crew to recover from the shock. Although the crew of the Iron Fist was furious that they had slammed into the wrong vessel, they were determined to make the most of this error. Rodrik Greyjoy could be heard shouting "Let's drown these greenlanders!"

Jorah promptly drew his sword Longclaw. His family's ancestral sword, made of Valyrian steel. It produced a shrill whistle when pulled from its scabbard.

Nearby, the rest of the crew was arming themselves, as well. Almost all wielded a sword. Oberyn Martell was twirling his spear in his hands. It moved so fast and so speedily that he almost appears to be waving a large black wheel around his body.

Nymeria Martell carried her whip in her right hand, and a long knife with a thin edge and a very tall point in her left.

Soon came the first boarding party. A wave of fierce, angry Ironborn climbed aboard the bridge of the Lord Steffon on the starboard side.

One of them immediately went for Jorah. He was yelling maniacally, swinging a Morningstar in the air. Jorah hastily dodged the spiked ball, maneuvered around the Iron warrior, and slashed him along the neck. He succeeded in opening the flesh between his opponent's throat and shoulder blade. The Ironborn shrieked as his life's blood leaked out of him. He was dead before he hit the deck.

Not ten feet away, another Ironborn had just engaged Nymeria Martell in battle. He was armed with a battle-axe, which he held in both hands. He sneered and spat "You'd make a fine salt wife."

Nymeria seemed amused by his overconfidence. She cheekily rejoined with "Maybe. Not for you, though."

She cracked her whip forward. It coiled around her adversary's left forearm. She gave the whip a tug, forcing him forward. When he was close enough, she raised her dagger and plunged it into his upper chest. Within moments, he dead on the deck, too.

Oberyn Martell proved to be the deadliest person currently aboard the Lord Steffon. Moving with exceptional speed and gracefulness, he took on three Ironborn at once, and all three were dead before ten seconds had passed.

Several of the Ironborn chose to stay clear of the prince, deciding to pursue less dangerous rivals. Many of them thought of Jorah and Nymeria as such. They soon discovered they had made a serious error in judgment.

Jorah and Nymeria stood back-to-back, offering any Iron warrior who dared approach to do so. Working together, they were able to dispatch any opponent who hoped to best them. The sounds of Longclaw hacking and Nymeria's whip cracking joined the many sounds that emanated all over Ironman's Bay.

When the first boarding party from the Iron Fist was almost obliterated, the second one came. A young man led this one. He could not have been older than twenty, but he had a beard that covered his cheeks, his chin, and his neck. The image of a kraken was imprinted on the front of his breastplate.

Jorah knew the instant he saw the lad; he was Rodrik Greyjoy.

Rodrik saw him just one moment later. When that happened, he smirked wickedly and brought out his own sword. Then he raised it in the air and signaled for his crew to charge.

Having no time to recover from the first boarding party, the crew restlessly moved to defend themselves against these new aggressors.

Jorah paid them no mind. His only interest was in their captain.

Slowly, the bear lord marched towards Rodrik Greyjoy, Longclaw in both hands. The heir to the Iron Islands retained his smirk and lifted his sword up high. He taunted Jorah with "Come at me, bear."

Jorah did just that. When he was upon Rodrik, he leaned back as though he was going to hack at his side… then he made a slash at the younger man's legs.

Rodrik was caught off his guard; he had expected the first blow to come from higher. He managed to dodge the blow in time, but it was immediately following by a thrust at his shoulder. This time, Rodrik parried Jorah's sword with his own. Then the two men were locked in combat.

Jorah Mormont had at least ten years and six inches over Rodrik Greyjoy. He soon discovered he was twice the swordsman, as well. Rodrik Greyjoy was by no means an amateur with a blade, but his crude, barbarian style had nothing on Jorah's disciplined, strategic approach.

Nonetheless, Rodrik was faster than Jorah. He was also the more agile of them. He evaded more blows than he countered. That more than compensated for his inferior swordsmanship.

Jorah realized that Rodrik was trying to exhaust him. He must have believed that if he kept him on his toes, he would wear the Lord of Bear Island out. And if not that, he would still keep Jorah preoccupied long enough for them to deal with the rest of the crew of the Lord Steffon. Based on how quickly the boarding parties were coming, there was a distinct possibility of that.

For those reasons, Jorah decided that this skirmish would have to end as soon as possible.
As he sparred with Rodrik, he took note of a number of exploitable openings in the younger man's technique and posture. However, all those attacks would have been fatal, and Jorah was still determined to capture him alive.

At last, he spotted something that he could use to his advantage without killing the kraken lordling. Whenever he hacked with his sword, he held it with both hands. The fingers of his right hand were always turned towards Jorah whenever he moved in on him. With careful timing and the correct angle of attack, Jorah could incapacitate him. There would be some irreparable damage done, but the order had only been to take Rodrik alive.

Alive… but not unharmed.

Jorah waited for Rodrik to attempt to hack at him again. When the heir to Pyke got into that stance, the Bear Island lord delivered an underhand cut at his arms.

Rodrik Greyjoy yelled in anguish as Longclaw bit into the skin of his right hand. It sliced deep in his flesh, cutting through muscle and bone alike.

Rodrik's sword clattered to the ground. Three of the fingers and part of the palm of his right hand fell with it. He dropped to his knees and clutched what remained of his right hand with his left one, groaning in agony.

Jorah did not allow him an opportunity to rebound. He gripped Rodrik by his shoulder, held Longclaw to his throat, and declared "Rodrik Greyjoy, by the authority of Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell and King Robert Baratheon, I arrest you for the crimes of rebelling against the crown."

Rodrik was still in tremendous pain from losing part of his hand, but all the resistance seemed to have gone out of him. He gave a labored sigh and mumbled crossly "I… I yield."

Before long, the crew of the Lord Steffon managed to overpower the crew of the Iron Fist. Most of the Ironborn were put to the sword, but a few chose to surrender with their captain.

Within an hour, the entirety of Rodriks' armada had been sunk, seized, or put to flight. A number of Lord Stannis' ships had been lost, but it was a clear victory on the part of the Royal Army. Cheers ran all along their column as the surviving Ironborn vessels hastily made their way back towards the west.

After the battle, Jorah took charge of Rodrik Greyjoy and the other prisoners. Nymeria helped him bind them and escort them to the brig. On the way there, she congratulated him with "Good work subduing the kraken's heir, my lord."

Then she smiled at him. This smile of hers stood out to Jorah. It was very unlike the other ones she had given him. He found it to be warm, affectionate… and a little sensual.

That's not so different from the way Blinda used to smile at me.
A hundred miles to the southeast (more east-southeast than south-southeast), another former Sand Snake was smiling at another man. In this case, it was Obara Martell smiling at her intended, Sandor Clegane of Clegane's Keep.

The two of them were standing on the bridge of the Lady Jeyne, the flagship of the Westerlander fleet. It was one of the many ships that had been saved by Lord Gregor Clegane's warning.

The flagship had been named in honor of Lord Tywin Lannister's late lady mother, Jeyne of House Marbrand. When she had lived, her husband Lord Tytos had known by many as the Laughing Lion. After her death, no one could ever call him that again. That was when he had been mocked and derided by even his vassals as the Toothless Lion.

No one would ever think or dare to call his eldest son by that moniker. Lord Tywin had teeth, and anyone with the sense of a goat would never try to provoke him into bearing them. The last time someone did… a very ominous and infamous song had been written about what Tywin had done to them in response.

The Lady Jeyne was part of another blockade that had been established along the northwestern coast of Fair Isle. Lord Tywin Lannister himself was on board, commanding the whole of that fleet from the bridge. He was known to rule more by fear than by discipline, but his blockade was every bit as formidable and stalwart as Lord Stannis'.

Sandor was there to serve as Lord Tywin's squire and as the commander of the units from House Clegane of Clegane's Keep. For that very reason, Obara had accompanied him. Although she was not yet a member of House Clegane, she would be soon enough.

Her presence on the vessel had garnered a lot of stares and scowls, all of which she had decisively ignored.

Glare at me all you want. It won't make me disappear or change the fact that I'm here.

The Lady Jeyne was fully manned, and it carried half a dozen platoons of Royal Army soldiers. Most of them were Westerlanders by origin. That did not surprise Obara in the least.

Only in the company of his own does the lion feel comfortable. Then again, 'comfortable' may be Obara was not bothered by the fact that she was one of the few on board who was not sworn to the Westerlands. After all, if she had been born a Westerlander, she would not have been here. Of course, she would marry into the Westerlands soon enough. Luckily for her, her betrothed was more broad-minded than most of his compatriots, and he did not wish to squander her abilities. He had seen her fight, and he knew she possessed excellent combat prowess.

Apart from that, one of the six platoons was composed of the men-at-arms of House Clegane. Obara had gotten to know each of them very well over the past year. She could identify each by his name, his face, and his strengths and weaknesses. Most of them already thought of her as their lady. Obara was comforted by the knowledge that if any of the other soldiers on board the Lady Jeyne tried to harass her, they would intervene. But only if things got out of hand. After all, it was no secret that Obara could defend herself as well as any man there.

In any case, Lord Tywin Lannister would not allow any disputes to erupt into quarrels on board his ship. He tolerated no nonsense or disorder from the units under his command. With that in mind, Obara would not have to worry about any serious "disagreements" breaking out until the Ironborn showed up.

Still, being so close to Tywin Lannister was not exactly appealing to her. The man was responsible for the murder of her cousins. Her father Prince Oberyn had told her how Ser Amory Lorch had – under Tywin's orders – killed Princess Rhaenys and Prince Aegon and attempted to kill her aunt Elia. It was only by the valiant actions of Lord Gregor Clegane that her aunt still lived.

Had Princess Elia died alongside her children, another war might have broken out between the Westerlands and Dorne. Her survival prevented that, but her children's deaths had greatly impaired relations between those two regions.

Her marriage to Sandor would be the first of many steps in the process of mending their relations. That was the chief political advantage of their union. As it happened, great many factors of their union were political in origin. But needless to say, there was more than politics at work there.

Obara was still uncertain if she actually loved Sandor, and she was more than a little certain that he did not really love her just yet. Nevertheless, no one could deny that the two of them were quite taken with one another. They had come to admire and respect each other's strengths, as well as accept and embrace each other's weaknesses.

Additionally, they were both still at the age when it was not uncommon for one to be playful with members of the opposite gender. The two of them enjoyed joking, japing, and jesting. They even liked to tease each other (but only in an affectionate manner).

For instance, there were the occasions when Sandor referred to Obara as "Princess." He was well-aware that she detested being addressed that way, even though it was now her rightful title by all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms. He mostly just called her that because he found her exasperated reaction to it amusing.

While Obara was annoyed, she had never gotten angry with Sandor. Instead, she had decided to come up with a pet name for him, as well. In this case, "pet name" was a rather fitting label; she had started to call him "The Hound."

As it happened, Sandor did not mind that moniker. If anything, he thought it appropriate, given the sigil of his house. However, Obara did not daub him "The Hound" simply because of the three dogs he wore on his doublet. She also called him that because in the time since their betrothal had first been considered, he had gone out of his way to spend much of his time with her. Sometimes, he followed her around like a loyal puppy.

Obara knew he was not obsessed or infatuated with her; he merely wished to know more of the woman who would be his wife. She could understand and relate to that desire. She actually thought it was sweet of him. But she never told him that; in her experience, gruff men like Sandor Clegane did not wish to be described as "sweet."

Obara was only the first to label Sandor "The Hound." Before too long, the other occupants of Clegane’s Keep had taken to calling him that, too. However, even when using that moniker, they still addressed Sandor with respect. The servants generally went with "M'lord Hound," and the men-at-arms used "Master Hound." His parents frequently alternated between the name they had given him and the name Obara had given him. Ellyn Clegane called her brother "Hound" so much and so often that one would think she had forgotten his birth name.

In the end, nearly everyone who lived or worked in the keep was referring to their future master as "The Hound." Obara was a little astounded by how that title had gotten so popular so quickly. She was not even part of the Clegane family yet, and already she was influencing them and their retainers.

To her dismay, though, some of them had fallen Sandor's example, as well. Every now and then, she would be addressed by someone as "Princess" or "Your Grace." Actually, "Your Grace," she did not mind as much. But she would have appreciated it if no one spoke to her as though she were a royal. Even if she really was one then, she had not been one for most of her life.

The Hound and the Reluctant Princess. What a pair we make.

Whatever she or her intended were, they would be fighting the upcoming battle against the Ironborn together. Lord Tywin Lannister may have discriminated on basis of gender when it came to selecting his generals, but even he did not deny capable warrior women the opportunity to utilize their skills. For that much, Obara was grateful.

Shortly before they set sail, Lord Tywin had convened a meeting between the top commanders of his company. Obara had not attended, as she had not been permitted to. Sandor had been permitted to, but only because he was the squire to the Lord of Casterly Rock. Gregor and Dacey were there because they were the leaders of the Legion without Banners.

After the meeting, Sandor came to his betrothed and briefed her on the more important or noteworthy parts of the conversation. Most of it was just battle plans or strategies for creating and maintaining the blockade. However, there were a few… intriguing points.

Namely, there was the issue of who would be leading the Ironborn at this encounter. Lord Balon's younger brother Euron Greyjoy – known by many as the Crow's Eye – would be heading the invasion force aboard his Silence.

Even in the days of Lord Quellon, the Crow's Eye had been feared by those who lived on the west coast. His name was far more infamous across the Narrow Sea, as his father had never officially outlawed raiding there. He had plundered Yi Ti, Asshai, Ibben, Qohor, the Summer Isles, and even the ruins of Old Valyria. Because of that, he had accumulated much wealth in his travels.

Lord Tywin Lannister believed the battle would be a short one if Euron Greyjoy was taken out fairly early. He had given his officers an incentive to carry out that objective quickly. He declared that whoever managed to capture or kill the Crow's Eye could lay claim to his cargo.
If Sandor did not have Obara's full attention before, he certainly did when he made that point. She was amazed that Lord Tywin would make such a generous offer. Any other commander in the Royal Army – except Lord Eddard Stark, and possibly Lord Gregor Clegane – would have seized the Crow's Eye's riches for himself.

Either Tywin Lannister is not as utterly harsh and cruel as I was led to believe, or he really does shit gold.

Neither of those options seemed very plausible. In fact, the latter almost had a greater probability of being true than the former.

In any case, Obara was hoping the Lady Jeyne would have the opportunity to meet the Silence in battle. While the former Sand Snake personally carried little for gold and jewels, that much wealth would be beneficial to ensuring the endurance of her future house. Furthermore, the Silence carried things far more valuable than gold and jewels.

The exact size or composition of Euron's inventory was unknown, but Sandor had heard tell that he possessed a number of Valyrian steel blades. He told Obara of a master blacksmith in King's Landing who had been trained to handle Valyrian steel. If he was given enough of the substance, he could melt the metal down and reforge it.

After he informed her of this, Sandor had told Obara that if they managed to claim the Valyrian steel aboard the Silence, Clegane's Keep could have a Valyrian steel sword of its own. He would probably make it a longsword or a bastard sword. But that was not all. He brazenly offered Obara "How about I get you a Valyrian steel-tipped spear as a betrothal gift?"

Obara actually found that offer quite appealing. She was already plenty deadly with a spear. One with a Valyrian steel point might make her all but insurmountable.

Sandor mentioned that the Crow's Eye may have had enough Valyrian steel to forge at least four weapons. He felt it would be wrong if only one branch of House Clegane acquired such a rare and precious blade. As such, he wanted to have a greatsword made for his brother, and a longsword or bastard sword for his sister-by-law.

Sandor revealed that he and Gregor had made a deal with each other. If either of them happened to subdue Euron Greyjoy, they would share his supply of Valyrian steel with each other. Dacey had consented to that arrangement, so Obara felt she could, as well. She just hoped no one would beat them to the Crow's Eye.

Gregor Clegane and Dacey Mormont were stationed aboard the warship Sea Lion, another vessel that had been saved from the burning at Lannisport. Lord Tywin's blockade covered the entire northwestern border of Fair Isle. However, the Sea Lion was posted near the rightmost section of the blockade, whereas the Lady Jeyne was posted near the center. So there were a few dozen ships separating the Clegane brothers. But neither feared for the other's safety. The Mountain and the Hound were strong men, and anyone who said otherwise was a fool.

Once the blockade was in place, Obara spent much of her time interacting with the few people onboard the Lady Jeyne that she was familiar with. Since the entirety of the units from Clegane's Keep were there, she and Sandor were able to converse with Ser Wallis Peckledon and the other men-at-arms.

Interestingly, Ser Wallis was one of the fifty people that had been selected as a thrower for Gregor's black powder pouches. The Legionnaire that had been assigned to supervise and protect him was Garth Hightower, a member of Gregor's inner circle.
Also on board was Lord Tywin's youngest brother, Ser Gerion Lannister, who also happened to be in the Mountain's inner circle. He was rumored to have shown more loyalty to Lord Gregor than he ever had to his brother. Two of Gregor's men-at-arms, Tobbot and Rafford, were there, as well.

Obara knew that no one on the Lady Jeyne was there without Lord Tywin's leave. She wondered why Tywin had agreed to put so many of Gregor's closest companions on his flagship. Perhaps he wished to observe them; see just how disciplined they were when they served under a different commander. That was one theory. Whatever his motivations, he must have had his reasons for keeping the Mountain's men close to him.

In any case, Obara did find their presence somewhat comforting. Her father and sister were both at Seagard, and the half-dozen Dornishmen that had accompanied her to the Westerlands had stayed behind. As a result, Sandor was the closest thing she had to family on the Lady Jeyne. After him, the next closest was Ser Gerion, Garth, Ser Wallis, and the other Clegane men. None of them were Dornish, but they had treated her like family at Moat Cailin and Clegane's Keep.

Obara noted that the men on the Lady Jeyne were restless. That was not surprising. Most of them had never fought the Ironborn before, and those who had did not desire to do so again. She personally did not know what to expect. As far as she was aware, Dorne had almost never been raided. It had as little in common with the Iron Islands as the Vale did with the Reach. She was not even old enough to remember the days before Quellon Greyjoy. Still, she could imagine that she would always remember the upcoming encounter with the Ironborn. It would be her first true taste of battle, after all.

Once the blockade was formed, Obara wondered how long it would be before the Ironborn actually came. As it turned out… not that long.

Unlike the company at Seagard, the company at Fair Isle did not have to wait twelve whole hours. Euron Greyjoy proved to be much more eager than his brash nephew. Just three hours after Lord Tywin's ships arrived at Fair Isle, a great host of enemy vessels was spotted in the distance.

"Everyone to attention!" Lord Tywin sternly shouted.

As that command was repeated along the column of the blockade, everyone moved to their predetermined posts. Obara was stationed on the bridge. Sandor was there, as well. He was in the process of helping Lord Tywin into his armor.

It was a long process, but Sandor had been doing it before years. He could put Tywin Lannister's armor on blindfolded (and actually had). He even claimed to know his liege lord's exact measurements. Obara did not know whether to be impressed or disturbed by that.

Sandor was fast yet efficient. It took him no longer than ninety seconds to dress Tywin Lannister. When he was finished, the lion lord was clad from head to heel in enameled plate. His brother Gerion and the Lannister men-at-arms were dressed similarly.

As for Sandor, the Hound wore a mail hauberk, along with gauntlets and greaves of lobstered steel. Garth Hightower, Wallis Peckledon, and most of the crew preferred that variety of armor, as well.

Obara was dressed in her typical Dornish leather armor. It was not as protective as the metal armor of the other Seven Kingdoms, but it enabled her to remain light and nimble. After adorning a half-helm, she picked up her spear and held it firmly in both hands.

By the time everyone was properly armed and armored, the Ironmen were considerably closer than they had been when Tywin first ordered them to their positions.
From her spot on the bridge, Obara could see everything that was happening on the command deck. She saw Ser Wallis Peckledon and Garth Hightower at the very front of the bough. Ser Wallis had his supply of twenty-two black powder pouches in front of him. No one had brought him a torch just yet.

Obara had seen the very first demonstration of black powder at Casterly Rock. It had amazed her then, and she was certain it would amaze her now.

We’ll give those Ironborn a proper “greelander” welcome.

Lord Tywin did not put very much faith in black powder. Having served an insane monarch who worshipped wildfire, he was wary of using what was described as its dry equivalent. If the decision had been his, he would have forgone the powder and relied on groups of archers instead. But Robert Baratheon himself had authorized and demanded the use of black powder, and even Tywin could not refuse the King.

Not this King, anyway.

So Tywin had agreed to take on seventeen of Gregor Clegane’s fifty handpicked throwers. Even so, he kept a large number of archers in reserve. Obara and everyone else could hardly protest. Having a contingency plan never harmed anyone. Apart from that… Lord Tywin did not take kindly to people who obstinately disagreed with him.

When the Ironborn were a hundred yards away, Lord Tywin gave the command for the throwers to be given their lights. Gerion Lannister brought Ser Wallis Peckledon a torch, which Ser Wallis promptly accepted.

When the Ironborn were sixty yards away, Lord Tywin called for the throwers to prepare for the first volley. At that, Ser Wallis took up the first of his pouches.

When the Ironborn were less than twenty yards away, Lord Tywin authorized the throwers to set fire to their pouches. Ser Wallis carefully moved the flame of his torch to the string of his pouch. Even from higher ground over twenty feet away, Obara could see the wick catching fire.

Not long after that, Lord Tywin shouted for the throwers to release. Ser Wallis Peckledon chucked his pouch at the nearest ship. The instant it touched the bough of the Ironborn vessel, it exploded in a cloud of smoke, doing substantial damage to the hull and a number of the vessel’s crew. Even from the bridge, Obara could smell the burnt coal and sulfur.

After that, Lord Tywin told the throwers to use their remaining pouches of black powder at will. Ser Wallis was quick to obey that command.

Over the next several minutes, pouches were thrown from all along the blockade. Everywhere they landed, agonized screams and the sounds of shattering wood could be heard.

Any sensible foe would have turned their ships around after the fourth or fifth wave of pouches. The Ironmen, however, were a stubborn lot. Furthermore, this armada was better-equipped than the one that had sailed to Seagard.

Unlike Rodrik Greyjoy, Euron Greyjoy had not neglected to include archers in his ranks. He brought them out after the sixth wave of black powder pouches. Soon enough, the sky was filled with the arrows of Iron bows. Then it was the royalists’ turn to scream. Scores of them were claimed in the first volley alone.

None of the arrows reached the bridge of the Lady Jeyne. However, the lower part of the command
Every now and then, Ser Wallis Peckledon, Garth Hightower, and everyone else on that level had to duck down to avoid being hit.

Lord Tywin hastily called out their own archers in retaliation. Before too long, arrows were flying back and forth between the two sides. So much was happening that hardly anyone had time to aim. Most had to resort to pointing, notching, and releasing in rapid succession. That approach was successful for some, but ineffective for most.

Even the throwers were unable to concentrate on a target for long. But they never launched another pouch of black powder unless they were certain they would not miss.

Soon the Ironborn ships reached the Royal Army's. The foe already had boarding parties at the ready. Soon, bows were exchanged for blades, and clashing steel was audible all along the column. A number of Iron vessels attempted to break through, but the blockade held.

So much activity was happening off the coast of Fair Isle, but Obara could only focus on her immediate surroundings.

Ser Wallis Peckledon moved very quickly. In the span of ten minutes, he managed to sink four Ironborn vessels with twenty of his pouches.

Before long, he was down to his last pouch. He would have to make this one count; one single pouch would do little damage.

Just then, Obara's eye caught a certain vessel. It was as big as the Lady Jeyne and far more ominous. It had a single mast, and a massive black sail with a golden kraken had been erected. Its hull was painted a dark shade of red.

That has to be the Silence.

A moment later, Obara saw the ship's name imprinted on its side, and she confirmed her theory.

A tall figure was standing at the bough of the ship. By squinting her eyes, Obara was able to determine that he had long black hair, and a patch was over his left eye. On the breastplate of his armor, an image was imprinted. It was a red eye with a black pupil beneath a black iron crown supported by two crows.

No question; he's the Crow's Eye.

The Crow's Eye seemed to have noticed her; he was glaring right at her. Or perhaps it was Lord Tywin Lannister he was staring at. In any case, he had noticed the Lady Jeyne, and the Silence was coming directly towards the lion lord's flagship.

Obara went to the front of the bridge and called out "Ser Wallis!"

In response, the master-at-arms of Clegane's Keep turned around and gazed up at her. Once she had his attention, she pointed in the direction of the Silence. Ser Wallis followed her finger, and he spotted Euron Greyjoy at the front his fearsome vessel. Obara could not see Ser Wallis' face, but she was certain he was smirking at that moment.

Obara Martell watched as Ser Wallis Peckledon picked up his last pouch of black powder. He waited until he could see the white of Euron Greyjoy's one visible eye. Then he ignited the wick of his pouch. Once the flame vanished beneath the mouth of the pouch, Ser Wallis looked up and raised his arm in the air.
Obara expected him to throw the pouch straightaway. He did not. He seemed to freeze in his stance.

A moment later, Ser Wallis Peckledon collapsed onto his back. To her horror, Obara realized that an arrow was protruding from his throat. Ser Wallis had been shot down by an archer from another vessel.

The pouch of black powder was still lit. It slowly rolled out of Ser Wallis' hand. Garth Hightower hurriedly moved to pick it up and dispose of it. He managed to swipe it up of the ground, but before he could toss the pouch overboard or fling it elsewhere, its contents came into contact with the flaming string.

Obara turned away before the explosion came. When it did come, she expected a shout or yell to accompany it. But she heard nothing of the sort; not even a yelp of shock.

After about ten seconds, Obara forced herself to look back at the bough. Part of the mast had been blown off, and the ramparts were knocked a little loose. A small fire had broken out near the front of the deck. Several crewmen had ducked for cover, but Gerion Lannister bravely made his way through the cloud of smoke.

Even before the smoke lifted, Obara could predict what Ser Gerion would find. Sure enough, she saw Ser Garth Hightower lying flat on his back. While his body was somehow intact, it was devoid of all signs of life. Ser Gerion shook him vigorously in effort to incite a reaction out of him, but he got nothing.

Just like that, the Lady Jeyne had lost two of her crew. Unfortunately, that was the least of the surviving crew's worries. The Silence was almost upon them.

Tywin Lannister seemed unfazed. He stoically declared "Take up your steel!"

At that, Obara raised her spear, and Sandor drew his bastard sword. Gerion Lannister, Rafford, Tobbot, and everyone else bared their melee weapons, as well. Lord Tywin brought out his longsword, but Obara doubted he planned to actually use it. Tywin Lannister was an excellent swordsman, and he could never be called a craven, but in a battle, he deemed himself most useful at the sidelines, directing the actions of his subordinates.

Not twenty seconds later, the Silence reached the Lady Jeyne. The first boarding party was about to cross over. Euron Greyjoy himself would be leading it.

"Your orders, my lord?" Sandor requested.

Lord Tywin remained focused on the menacing Ironborn galley and its equally-menacing captain. Without the slightest indication of emotion, he muttered quietly "Spill their blood."

Right away, Obara Martell, Sandor Clegane, and everyone else on the bridge apart from Lord Tywin's personal guard made their way to the bough. Soon after, they met with Euron Greyjoy's encroaching warriors.

Obara had heard that the Silence was manned by mutes. Apparently, that was not a measly rumor; none of Euron's men unleashed a battle cry. Then again, neither did the Crow's Eye himself.

One of the very first boarders immediately went for Obara. He waved a huge mace at her head, and she evaded the blow just in time. He swung again at her chest, but she darted backwards. As he raised his weapon for a third move, she thrust her spear upwards. It pierced through the underside of his chin, and it went so deep that the tip remerged from the top of his head. Obara withdrew her spear as the mute slumped onto the ground.

Nearby, Sandor was engaging two more boarders in combat simultaneously. One brandished a heavy battle axe; the other a spiked club. They both launched a number of blows at Sandor's head. Sandor was one of the few people on either side who wore no protection for his head. Obara knew he had never been fond of helms, but she knew he would manage well enough without one.

Indeed, after dodging and countering the attacks of his two opponents for thirty seconds, he threw a cut at the throat of the one with the spiked club. That mute dropped his club, and his hands went to his neck as blood leaked out of it. As he bled out, his associate slashed at Sandor's chest. Sandor ducked, and when he came back up, he plunged his sword into his second adversary's chest. This mute fell to his knees as his entrails began to leak out of his midsection. He breathed his last before his head even touched the deck.

Obara did not know how long the fighting went on for. It felt like hours. In actuality, it was only minutes. Obara found the skirmish quite exhilarating. Unfortunately, not every member of the Lady Jeyne's crew managed as well as her and Sandor. The crew of the Silence had its share of capable fighters, too. Euron Greyjoy himself managed to bring down five Westerlanders singlehandedly.

At one point, Gerion Lannister engaged Euron Greyjoy in single combat. Obara was able to catch glimpses of their encounter. Both men were unbelievably fast. So fast, in fact, that Obara had difficulty discerning which blade was Gerion's and which was Euron's. For a while, no one on either side dared to intervene for fear of being cut down.

After five uninterrupted minutes of intense swordplay, their match reached its conclusion. It ended in Euron's favor when his sword went for Gerion's left arm. The lion warrior yelled in pain as his foe's blade sliced through his gauntlet. The steel cut his forearm deep, almost to the bone. Euron nearly took off his arm.

The Crow's Eye extracted his blade and prepared to strike again. Obara Martell and Sandor Clegane rushed to intercede. Sandor brought his sword between Euron's and Gerion, deflecting the blow in the nick of time. The captain of the Silence growled in frustration at being denied his kill, but he hastily diverted his attention to his new challenger.

"Obara, get Gerion to safety!" Sandor told his intended, maintaining eye contact with Euron Greyjoy.

She nodded and helped Ser Gerion off the ground. She brought his undamaged arm around his shoulder and escorted him away from the scene. To her good fortune, none of her enemies tried to come near here. But neither did any of her allies. She looked to the lion warrior and asked him "Are you alright, Gerion?"

He weakly turned to look at her, grinned slightly, and murmured "Y-yes. Th-thank you, Obara."

She smiled back and asserted "Anytime."

From behind her, Obara could make out the sounds of steel striking steel. Euron Greyjoy had begun another duel. This time, it was with Sandor. Once Gerion was safely away from the conflict, Obara turned to witness the clash between her betrothed and his fearsome enemy.

The Hound was a fair amount younger than the Crow's Eye, but he was taller and stronger. Euron appeared to be the better swordsman, but Sandor had the more diverse skill set. Obara was not surprised by that.
Over the past year, Obara had taught him a few traditional Dornish tactics. Evidently, Sandor had been honing his skills from those routines. Several times, they enabled him to gain the upper hand over Euron. He was combing what Obara had taught him with his brother's teachings, essentially employing two different fighting styles at once. That made his moves utterly unpredictable, much to his (and Obara's) delight and Euron's annoyance.

In the third minute of their brawl, Sandor managed to back Euron into the front corner of the bough. The Crow's Eye realized he had nowhere else to go, but he had no intention of losing this duel. He hacked viciously at Sandor's face. Sandor dodged the blow and deftly delivered a counterattack to his opponents' wrists. It only touched the hilt of Euron's weapon, but the force of the blow was so powerful that he lost his grip on it. His sword was knocked out of his hands, and it flew overboard. It fell through the surface of the water with a gentle splash.

Now Sandor had Euron Greyjoy trapped, unarmed, and defenseless. Obara could not help but smile.

"Surrender," Sandor heatedly advised him, pointed the tip of his sword at Euron's throat, "Or I'll send you to your Drowned God."

For a moment, it appeared as though the Crow's Eye was actually going to yield. Then his eye fell across something, and he smirked. Obara was confused... then she saw it.

The small fire that had broken out from Ser Wallis Peckledon's last pouch was still blazing. It had not gotten any bigger, but given how much flammable rubble was around it, it would not go out any time soon, either. It continued giving off heat and light near the bough of the Lady Jeyne. That was less than five feet from the mast, which was where Sandor and Euron currently were.

Euron Greyjoy slowly raised his arms and said in a deceptively calm voice "Very well, boy. I give in."

Sandor gradually lowered his sword and gave a nod of his head. He took Euron by the shoulder and gestured for him to come along. Euron did so, but as he walked, his eye drifted to the fire at the head of the bough.

Obara jumped up from Gerion's side and shouted "SANDOR, LOOK OU-"

Before she could finish, Euron slid his legs between Sandor's and tripped him. The heir to Clegane's Keep lost his balance and fell onto his stomach. He landed directly beside the fire, his head less than a foot away from it.

Euron rapidly knelt down next to Sandor, seized his head in both hands, and shoved him towards the blaze. Sandor's face came in direct contact with the flame.

The sound that emanated from Sandor's mouth was practically inhuman. It was not a shriek, a wail, or a scream. It was like the sound of a dragon being tortured in the worst possible fashion. Of course, fire did not harm dragons. The same could not be said of humans. Or hounds.

At first, Obara could only stare in utter terror as Euron Greyjoy held her betrothed's head against the fire. She thought she could smell his flesh cooking. It did not smell very different from the aroma of venison roasting over a spit. That thought only made her feel even more uneasy.

She was finally brought back to reality when Ser Gerion Lannister shouted at her "Obara, do something!"

At that, Obara Martell cleared her head, took up her spear again, and charged towards Euron
To her displeasure, another of Euron's mutes came between them. She tried to go around him, but everywhere she went, he managed to jump in front of her. Everyone else was still preoccupied, so Obara was forced to fend him off.

In the end, she did not have to save Sandor. He was able to save himself. Even when overcome with unspeakable pain, he had not forgotten that he was still carrying steel. His bastard sword had fallen out of his reach, but a dagger was still sheathed in his belt.

Through tremendous force of will, Sandor brought his left hand to the hilt of his dagger and drew it from its scabbard. His left eye gazed upward and saw Euron's head directly above his. He brought his arm around, gave a bloodthirsty yell, and thrust his hand upward.

The dagger sank full into the side of Euron's throat. The sadistic grin on his face was quickly replaced by an astounded grimace. Immediately, he released his grip on Sandor's head. The Hound extracted his dagger and stabbed the Crow's Eye again. This time, Euron stumbled backward and landed on his side.

Sandor had just enough strength left to pull his head out of the fire. Once he was safely away from the embers, his arms dropped listlessly to his side.

By then, Obara had eliminated her own adversary. After she removed her spearhead from the mute's chest cavity, she rushed to Sandor's side and turned him over. The right side of his face was much redder than the left side.

Obara swiftly removed her helm and pressed her ear against Sandor's chest. His heart was still beating, but he had passed out. Obara frantically shook him, hoping against hope that that would bring him back to consciousness.

She roughly patted his arms, saying agitatedly "Sandor? Sandor. Sandor!"

After a minute, she felt a hand on her shoulder. She turned around with her spear raised, but the hand's owner was only Tobbot. He backed away in alarm and told her "I mean no harm, m'lady. I only wish to ask if you would like some assistance."

What the fuck do you think?!

Obara was annoyed by the redundancy of that question, but she kept herself from losing her temper. She lowered her spear and stated in a tone as serene as she could muster "Yes, yes, please. Sandor's badly hurt. He needs a maester NOW."

Tobbot nodded in acknowledgment and moved to assist his lord's younger brother. Rafford the Sweetling quickly came to assist him. Working together, the two of them carried the wounded Sandor Clegane off the command deck and to the medical bay.

The fighting aboard the Lady Jeyne was rapidly coming to an end. After the death of their captain, the crew of the Silence seemed to have lost their confidence. It was not long before they were overcome. Most of them were put to the sword; the rest were clapped in irons.

Lord Tywin Lannister ordered a group of his own men to board the Silence and take control of the galley. If the surviving members of the crew resisted, they were to be executed. If they surrendered, they were to be put in chains and confined to quarters.

Tywin had given his boarders firm instructions that they were not to seize anything in the cargo bay. He had seen Sandor's triumph over Euron Greyjoy, and he declared that the contents of the Silence were now the sole property of House Clegane.

Ordinarily, Obara would have been pleased. She and Sandor had been hoping to win custody of the Silence's caches. But after what her betrothed had gone through to earn that treasure, she wondered if it was all truly worth it.

Less than an hour after the Silence was commandeered by Lord Tywin's units, the rest of the Ironborn armada disbanded. Over half of their ships managed to retreat; the rest had been scuttled or taken by the ships of the blockade.

The sea-battle off the coast of Fair Isle was another victory for the Royal Army, but their losses were over three times greater than what they had been at Seagard. Lord Tywin seemed unperturbed by the greater casualty list. Not only was he expecting a greater fight from Euron Greyjoy, but he was also rather dispassionate when his troops were concerned.

Obara was not surprised that Lord Tywin was not bothered by his losses, but she was outraged at his indifference to what had happened to his own squire. Especially since said squire had saved his youngest brother from losing a limb (or worse).

Whenever Tywin gazed in her direction, Obara retained a neutral expression. But behind his back, she sneered at him angrily.

If Sandor dies, you will join him, Lion.

She was very serious in that allegation. She was fully aware that killing Lord Tywin would bring about her own death and ruin Dorne's relations with the Westerlands, but Obara did not care. The only reason Sandor had been aboard the Lady Jeyne was because of his liege lord, and Tywin Lannister had sent him into the fray. But Lord Tywin himself had not even directly participated in the fighting.

Obara was unable to see Sandor whilst the maesters were tending to him. They would not even give her progress reports on his well-being. To keep her mind occupied (and to avoid fearing for the worst), Obara busied herself with examining the cargo hold of the Silence. She discovered there was enough wealth for even the most destitute house in Westeros to thrive. Gold, jewels, and other valuable trinkets were in abundance.

Obara wondered who these items had belonged to previously. Given Euron Greyjoy's reputation, most of the former owners were likely dead. Some were probably still alive. If so, the right thing would have been to return their stolen goods to them. However, those individuals were half a world away, between the Port of Ibben and Asshai by the Shadow. The expenses of bringing back their lost property could have greatly outweighed the value of the property itself.

I wonder if that's ample justification for holding onto all of this.

Most lords in the Seven Kingdoms might have thought so. There were some, such as Stannis Baratheon and Eddard Stark, that might have called it laziness or selfishness instead. Even so, by right of conquest, everything aboard the Silence belonged the House Clegane.

Both branches of House Clegane. That was the arrangement.

Obara spent an hour searching through the vast piles of treasure. She managed to locate a large stash of Valyrian steel daggers. There had to be scores of them. There were enough to arm the entire crew of the Silence.
There's definitely enough for a spearhead, a longsword, a bastard sword, and a greatsword.

She could find some comfort in that, at least.

When Obara finally returned to the bridge of the Silence and climbed back aboard the Lady Jeyne, she noticed another ship drop its anchor nearby. She discovered it was the Sea Lion.

A gangplank was extended between the two ships so the people onboard both could traverse between them safely. After the gangplank was secured, several of the Sea Lion's passengers crossed over to the Lady Jeyne. Gregor Clegane and Dacey Mormont were the first to come aboard.

Obara tentatively approached the Mountain and his wife. When they saw her, she lightly bowed to them, and they bowed back. She briefly looked them over. Their armor was dented in some places and soaked with blood in others, but they appeared unharmed. The hull of the Sea Lion was riddled with arrows, but other than that, it was undamaged.

"How'd it go?" Obara enquired curiously.

"We managed to sink the Golden Storm, Aeron Greyjoy's longship," Dacey informed her merrily.

"He was floating in the water for a half-hour before we fished him out," Gregor recounted, scoffing a bit, "Now he rests in the brig of the Sea Lion."

"Nice," Obara commented.

After a short pause, Dacey queried "What about you? Did anything exciting happen on your end?"

Obara hesitated at first. She did not know how to break the news of what had happened. But her quietness would have been enough to reveal that something was amiss.

She ultimately began with "We suffered some losses. Chief among them are Ser Wallis Peckledon and Garth Hightower."

Gregor and Dacey seemed dismayed by that. Obara could understand why. Ser Wallis had been the master-at-arms of Clegane's Keep since the days when the Mountain had been the keep's heir. Ever since she came to the Westerlands, Obara had grown fond of the middle-aged knight. Dacey had never actually met Ser Wallis, but she would mourn for him merely because her husband would.

Garth Hightower, on the other hand, would be properly mourned by both Gregor and Dacey. was one of the top officers of the Legion without Banners. Not only that; he served on Gregor's secret council. The same council Obara's father was a part of. Prince Oberyn had spoken kindly of Garth Hightower. That by itself said something; there were few genuine friendships between a Reachman and a Dornishman in those days.

"However..." Obara resumed, hoping to give the conversation a bit of a more positive edge, "There is some good news. Euron Greyjoy is dead."

Dacey and Gregor seemed to brighten up at that. The Bear Islander enquired "Who was it that slew him?"

"Sandor had that honor," Obara notified them, pride easily discernable in her voice.

Gregor and Dacey Clegane were even more elated by that piece of news. The Mountain stated "So, does that mean...?"
Obara nodded and diverted their attention to the nearby galley with the black sail. As they turned to the Silence, she pronounced "That ship and everything on it is now Sandor's. And, by extension, yours and mine."

"Anything good?" Dacey asked rhetorically.

"Some gold and jewels here and there," Obara slyly replied, "And a fine assortment of Valyrian steel daggers."

At that, her two tall companions hastily turned back to her.

"How many?" Gregor queried curiously.

"Enough," was all Obara said in response.

That one word by itself was enough to answer the real question on the Mountain's mind. He broke into a wide smile and muttered "I'd better congratulate and thank Sandor when next I see him."

Obara softly nodded his head, trying not to frown.

Then Dacey looked around the deck and inquired "Where is Sandor?"

Obara had been dreading that question, but she knew it could not be avoided.

They have to know eventually.

"He's... well... he's..." she began uneasily, gazing off to the side.

By the break in her speech and her deliberate avoidance of making eye contact, Gregor and Dacey surmised that something was quite wrong.

"Obara?" Gregor beckoned her.

Finally, Obara Martell let out a sigh and told them grimly "Follow me."

She then took them below the command deck of the Lady Jeyne, and she led them all the way to the medical bay. When she got there, she lightly tapped on the door.

By this point, the ship's maester had finished treating the wounded. He came to the door and opened it just enough to peek outside. "Yes?"

"I'm here to see Sandor Clegane," Obara Martell remarked.

"He is in no condition to receive visitors, my lady," the maester apprised her.

"Not even his brother?" Gregor Clegane retorted sharply, stepping into the maester's field of vision.

At the sight of the massive Lord of Moat Cailin, the maester changed his mind. He slowly opened the door and stood aside. He mumbled softly "Very well. But please refrain from making any loud noises. He and many others are still recovering."

Obara, Gregor, and Dacey quietly stepped inside the infirmary. All of the beds – and some spots on the floor – were occupied. Relatively few of the bodies were covered by sheets. The rest were still breathing and moving.

Most of the victims were being treated for sword or arrow wounds. Gerion Lannister was among them; he was sitting up in bed with his left arm in a sling. He smiled at his companions when they entered; they smiled back.

"Are you alright?" Gregor asked his longest-serving Legionnaire.

"I'm fine," Gerion assured him, "All thanks to the Hound."

Gregor chuckled at that. Of all the people who had heard Obara's pet name for her betrothed, Gregor Clegane appeared to join it the most. In fact, by the way he acted, one would have thought that he… expected Sandor to be given that moniker. Obara could not account for that, but then again, she did not particularly care.

Gerion then frowned a bit and gestured to the other end of the room. He proclaimed "Sandor's over there."

Obara, Gregor, and Dacey turned around and saw Sandor Clegane on a bed in the corner. He was propped up on his pillows, and he barely moved at all. The right half of his face was heavily bandaged.

"Oh, no… no, no, no," Gregor tensely muttered, his eyes wide in shock. He rushed to Sandor's bedside and knelt beside him, "No, no, no, no, no!"

Obara and Dacey quickly joined the Mountain at the side of his brother's bed. Dacey placed a comforting hand on her husband's shoulder. She placed her other hand on the left hand of her goodbrother.

Obara took a seat directly by the front of Sandor's bed. His uncovered left eye was open, and every few seconds, it blinked. Although he was still virtually motionless, at least he was awake now.

"This wasn't supposed to happen," Gregor murmured firmly.

Obara found that statement perplexing, but Dacey was the first to speak. She asked her husband "What wasn't supposed to happen, my love?"

Gregor did not answer right away. Instead, he stared at the wall, as though he was carefully contemplating his response. After a minute, he told his wife "I promised Father I'd keep him safe."

It was then that Sandor finally spoke. He focused his eye on his brother and said quietly "This isn't your fault, Gregor. You were on another ship in a different part of the blockade. There was nothing you could have done."

Obara felt waves of relief passing over her. Her betrothed had regained his tongue, and he spoke no differently than he had before.

"How do you feel?" Dacey queried in concern.

"I can't feel the right half of my face," Sandor informed his sister-by-law, "It's like it's been melted."

"Melted?" Gregor repeated, as though the mere utterance of that word was a curse.

"The Crow's Eye forced his face into a pit of fire," Gerion Lannister disclosed from across the room. Gregor's countenance suggested he was horrified.

"But that didn't stop me from shoving my dagger into his throat," Sandor muttered gruffly,
"Twice."

Obara and Dacey smiled at that, but Gregor retained his terrified expression.

"Greg?" Sandor asked, noting his brother's apprehensive look, "What's wrong?"

Gregor did not reply. Without looking over his shoulder, he called out "Maester?"

At that, the maester appeared at the foot of Sandor's bed and uttered "Yes, my lord?"

"Remove my brother's bandages," Gregor ordered him, "I would see his injury."

Obara, Dacey, and Sandor were alarmed by how demanding he sounded. The maester appeared indifferent, but he said sternly "I must protest, sir. His wound is still healing."

"Now," Gregor said through gritted teeth, "You can wrap them back up later."

At that, the maester sighed and conceded "As you command."

Gregor, Dacey, and Obara stepped aside so that the maester could kneel beside the heir to Clegane's Keep. He slowly unfastened and unraveled the gauze that covered Sandor's face. When he was finished, he stepped aside so that the others could see the damage.

The damage was even worse than Obara thought.

The right half of Sandor's face was grotesque. Everything between his brow and his lip had been charred. The skin was blackened, as if it was dead. His nostril was much thinner. His eyelid was drooping slightly over his eye. A patch of his hair had been seared away.

For a moment, Obara felt the urge to scream. She had to bite her tongue to stop herself. She looked over at her other companions. Dacey seemed just as shocked as her. But Gregor… Gregor was downright mortified. He continued whispering in denial "No, no, no, no, no, no!"

His words and the expression on his face were enough to tip off Sandor. The Hound turned to the maester and barked tensely "Get me a looking glass."

The maester was slow and hesitant to obey, but he obeyed, all the same. He retrieved a small looking glass from his desk and brought it over to his tallest patient. He held the object out, and Sandor promptly took it in his hands.

Sandor gradually brought the looking glass up to his face. When he saw what the others saw, he was flabbergasted.

"Oh, Gods…" he mumbled as he stared at himself.

Obara wanted to say something to comfort him, but what words could possibly comfort a man who lost nearly half his face to a fire?

After an unpleasant period of silence, Sandor gazed from the looking glass to the man who had given him it. He muttered hopefully "Maester… please tell me something can be done about this. Something. Anything."

The maester let out a sigh and professed "I have prevented the wound from festering, and I can alleviate the entirety of your pain. But I'm afraid the damage to your facial tissue is irreversible. You will bear this scar for the rest of your life, my lord."
"Oh, no. You cannot be serious."

For a few moments, Sandor just stared at the maester, as though he had not heard those words. Then he reacted. He scowled and flung the looking glass at the opposite wall. As it shattered into dozens of tiny shards, Sandor let out a roar of fury.

"My lord, please," the maester beseeched him, "The other patients are trying to sleep."

"Fuck you!" Sandor spat angrily, "Their wounds will heal! According to you, mine won't!"

"If I could repair your injury, I would," the maester insisted, "But I cannot. None of my order can."

"And you're telling me I should just live with that?!" Sandor shot crossly.

"Yes, you should."

It was not the maester who spoke then, but Obara. Sandor, the maester, and everyone else turned to look at the former Sand Snake. She leaned closer to her intended and declared "Sandor, you shouldn't take your anger out on the maester. This is not his fault. It is not yours either. The only person you can blame is dead now. Killed by your hand."

"I know," Sandor muttered quietly. He had calmed down a bit, but his voice was still full of tension, "But what will other people say when they see this?"

"It shouldn't matter to you what they say," Obara contended, "Aside from that, you got this scar defending your country from hostile invaders. They will respect you for that."

"But they will still think me a freak," Sandor debated.

"No, they won't," Obara refuted.

"How can you be sure?" Sandor questioned her.

"Because you aren't a freak," Obara proclaimed, "If anyone dares to call you one, I will make them regret their words."

Sandor appeared taken aback by that. "You... you will?"

Obara firmly nodded her head and stated "I don't care if you've been permanently scarred. Burn or no burn, you and I are still betrothed to each other. I have every intention of exchanging vows with you in a sept. It will require far more than a deformity to dissuade me from that."

Sandor was speechless, but in a good way. It was as though she had given him the self-confidence he had lost. Gregor and Dacey seemed to feel much better, as well.

Obara knew it would still be a long time before they could all fully cope with Sandor's injury, but at least they were past the denial stage. There would be grief, of course, but grief would fade away. Perhaps in time, Sandor will come to cherish his scar.

At that moment, Sandor raised himself up, cupped Obara's cheek with his left hand, and gently pulled her closer. He kissed her lightly on the lips.

A few times before the war, the two of them had kissed in private. Those kisses had always been playful. This one was fueled purely by passion. As such, Obara found it much more enjoyable.
Furthermore, to Obara's vast surprise (and delight), Sandor's kiss was not so different than it had been before his scar. His lips were just as soft, his skin just as smooth, his breath just as pleasant. If anything… his kiss felt even better. It felt special.
Hope Endures

Chapter Notes

Note: Well, I'm back home in Texas now! Really enjoyed my vacation in Rome, though. I even got to see the Pope make his public appearance on New Year's Day. Unfortunately, I got sick the day before we left. Still somewhat sick right now, but I should be better in a day or two. At least being sick did not impair my writing ability. In fact, I wrote almost this whole chapter in one day.

Anyway, this is the last chapter that includes the events of Greyjoy's Rebellion. The next three or four (maybe five) chapters will cover the aftermath of the war, namely the tourney at Lannisport and other things of similar precedence. And yes, Tywin has not forgotten his plan involving Ellyn Clegane.

It was not long before news of the Royal Army's maritime victories at Seagard and Fair Isle reached the mainland. Lord Stannis Baratheon and Lord Tywin Lannister informed King Robert that they had successfully neutralized Lord Balon Greyjoy's heir and killed the Crow's Eye. The stag king was quite pleased by his brother and goodfather's respective actions.

Now that the west coast of the Riverlands and the Westerlands was secure, there was nothing standing between the Royal Army and the Iron Islands. As such, King Robert amassed the rest of the Royal Fleet and set sail directly for the Islands.

Of the seven islands, only three presented any real challenge for besiegers. Harlaw, Saltcliffe, Orkmont, and Blacktyde had little defensive capabilities when they stood alone. However, Old Wyk, Great Wyk, and Pyke were far more formidable, and none of them would fall easily.

With that in mind, King Robert kept his armada divided into three smaller fleets. Each one would lay siege to one of the three strongest islands. Lord Stannis' forces would take Old Wyk, Lord Tywin's forces would take Great Wyk, and the king's forces would take Pyke.

Victarion Greyjoy was among the last company. He had not been at Seagard or Fair Isle. At the king's request, he had remained in the Westerlands to counsel the King on how to seize the Iron Islands with minimum loss of life or resources. Nonetheless, in the final stage of the war, Robert had decided to allow the Iron Captain to join into the fray.

Victarion now stood on the bridge of the Iron Victory. Before he and his fellow Legionnaires left Moat Cailin, he had arranged for the ship to be brought to Casterly Rock. In the meantime, he had ridden by horse to the Westerlands.

He was not as averse to travelling by land as he had been once, but he would always choose sails over horses. He never felt more alive and at peace as he did when standing on the deck of a ship.

As the king's fleet sailed towards Pyke, Victarion reflected on the present scenario. He had not been home in years. The only contact he had had with his people were the friendly interactions he shared with his fellow Ironborn Legionnaires. Victarion had always intended to return eventually.

Who would have thought I'd be returning with a host of greenlanders?
Victarion had very mixed feelings on what was happening at that time. On the one hand, he was on the winning side in this war. On the other hand, his family was on the losing side. Based on how easily the Iron Fleet had fallen at Seagard and Fair Isle, the Royal Army's triumph was all but guaranteed.

But at what cost will victory come?

In front of his fellow top officers of the Legion without Banners and the leaders of the Royal Army, Victarion Greyjoy had sworn his fealty to Robert Baratheon. He had meant those words when he spoke them, and he still did at that time. Even so, he could not help but wonder what consequences his oath would produce for his family.

His eldest nephew had already been maimed, one of his brothers had been imprisoned in the bowels of Casterly Rock, and another of his brothers had been killed. Only Victarion's eldest brother, niece, and younger two nephews remained free and unharmed.

Will they remain such for very long?

The uncertain fate of the rest of the Greyjoys was not all that troubled Victarion. He also thought on what would become of his name and reputation. On the mainland, they would probably hail him as a brave hero who willingly defied his traitor kin and protected the country from them. But in the eyes of the Islands… he would be the traitor. Not only that; he would be seen as a disgrace to everything the Ironborn stood for.

It was no secret that the Iron Islands were viewed as the most savage and unruly of the nine regions of Westeros. All the same, even they had principles and standards. On the voyage, Victarion realized that he was about to violate a great many of those policies.

He had told himself he could live with that. That was true enough; he had no reservations about breaking a few codes for the greater good. The king and his subordinates would surely understand and sympathize with him. As for the other Ironborn… they might understand, but they would never show any sympathy. Worst case scenario, they would ostracize him completely.

Whenever I decide to leave the Legion... I may not be able to return to the Islands. Moat Cailin may be the only home I have left.

That was the worst aspect of it all.

As trying and disconcerting as these mediations were, Victarion decided to push them out of his mind. He could not afford to have doubts. Not at such a crucial moment. He needed to stay focused on his current assignment. He would worry about his status in the Islands later.

When Victarion came out of his reverie, his ears detected something. Between the noises of wood creaking, waves breaking, and voices calling, he heard a soft buzzing sound. It appeared to originate from behind him.

Victarion looked over his shoulder and saw Nute the Barber standing a few feet away. He was leaning against the port rampart and gazing out to sea. His lips were quivering slightly; the buzzing sound was coming from his mouth. Victarion listened closely, and there actually seemed to be a melody to that sound.

"What is that you are humming, Barber?" Victarion asked him.

Nute turned to his commanding officer and answered him with "A song, my lord."
"What song?" Victarion murmured curiously.

"I heard it from the Mountain," Nute apprised him, "He claimed it's an old navy song where he comes from?"

"I didn't know the Westerlands had navy songs," Victarion commented.

"Neither did I," Nute admitted, "Perhaps he mistook its origin."

"Are there words?" Victarion queried. He was genuinely interested. While the Iron Captain had little taste for music, songs about the sea always intrigued him.

"I believe so," Nute the Barber replied, "However, I only picked up a handful of them."

"Indulge me, if you would," Victarion bade him.

Nute the Barber nodded and stood up straight. Then he cleared his throat and softly sang in a rather pleasant voice: "Anchors Aweigh, my boys, Anchors Aweigh. Farewell to foreign shores; we sail at break of day. Through our last night ashore, drink to the foam… that's all I can recall off the top of my head."

"Fascinating," Victarion remarked, rubbing his temple, "I must remember to speak with Lord Gregor on this later. I'd be interested to hear the whole song."

"Oh, he'd be delighted to share it, my lord," Nute proclaimed, "He mentioned that he's hoping to teach it to more people. Particularly those of us who are more comfortable on water."

"What happens today will certainly be worthy of a song," Victarion pronounced.

"Indeed," Nute conceded, "In any case, it would definitely be a good distraction."

"A distraction?" Victarion repeated, bewildered.

"Yes…" Nute affirmed, a little apprehensively. After a pause, he sighed and muttered "May I speak plainly?"

"Yes, but be mindful of what you say," Victarion cautioned him. Even from his own men, he did not tolerate any slights.

"I believe in what you are doing," Nute declared, "Working for the Legion without Banners has accomplished far more good for us than raiding Essos ever did. I also admire you for openly siding with the King over your own countrymen."

"Every man here has done the same," Victarion debated.

"True," Nute stated frankly, "The difference is that your family reigns over the Iron Islands. But it may not remain that way for long."

Victarion was confused. "How do you mean?"

"After the Rebellion, the King may remove your family from the seat of Pyke," Nute contended.

That statement gave Victarion pause. He had not considered that concept. Now that he had, he noted there was in fact a great possibility of it. Despite his loyalty to the Iron Throne, all the rest of Victarion's family had revolted against Robert Baratheon. For that reason, the king had legitimate grounds to take Pyke away from House Greyjoy and bequeath it to another house. Probably not even a house from the Islands.

"You could be right," Victarion glumly admitted.

Nute leaned against the rampart again and uttered "If you will permit my asking, how does that make you feel, my lord?"

Victarion spent a good minute contemplating the idea of House Greyjoy being severed from Pyke. Ultimately, he looked the Barber in the eye and firmly declared "I am willing to accept that. If I must sacrifice my family's ancestral home for the sake of Westeros, so be it."

Nute merely nodded his head and said quietly "Very well. If that is what you believe, then I shall support you."

I just hope you will not be the only one who does.

A day after King Robert Baratheon's fleet departed from Casterly Rock, his company met up with Lord Stannis' and Lord Tywin's. The Iron Islands were nearly in sight of their rendezvous point.

When they met up, the King took some time to evaluate the composition of each company. In several instances, he chose to reassign certain units to a different armada.

Namely, he transferred the Cleganes and the Mormonts to his company. Since they had been instrumental in the battles at Seagard and Fair Isle, he wished to have them present at the fall of Pyke, as well.

Victarion was aware that it was Jorah Mormont who had crippled Rodrik Greyjoy, and Sandor Clegane had killed Euron Greyjoy. He did not hold those actions against either men; they had simply done what needed to be done. Apart from that, Victarion felt his cocky nephew could afford a harsh lesson in humility, and there had been little love between him and the Crow's Eye.

Once King Robert finished reorganizing the Royal Army, he launched the invasion of the Iron Islands.

The offensive began in the early morning, when the Sun was barely peeking over the eastern horizon. Before noon, Old Wyk and Great Wyk fell. After receiving a signal in the sky from both Lord Stannis and Lord Tywin, King Robert's forces advanced towards Pyke.

The siege of Pyke was conducted in a very methodical fashion. First, there was the conflict at sea. Half of the king's vessels – led by Lord Paxter Redwyne, Lord Mace Tyrell, Lord Hoster Tully – engaged the majority of what remained of the Iron Fleet occupied out in Ironman's Bay. Only a select few ships were still garrisoned on the coast, and all of them were at Lordsport.

While the sea battle raged on, the other half of the king's ships made for Lordsport with the intent of docking there.

To Victarion's surprise, when they reached Lordsport, the town's residents put up little resistance, if any. In fact, when Robert's flagship pentered the harbor, Lord Sawane Botley sailed out on his Swiftfin to meet the stag king under a banner of peace.

Robert was skeptical, but he agreed to meet with the lord of Lordsport. After Lord Sawane was brought on board King Robert's Hammer, he declared that he and his family were prepared to bend the knee.
When Victarion heard this, he was surprised. His astonishment was shared by many others. This sort of move was uncharacteristic of the typical Ironborn.

Ironmen usually did not give in to foreign power very readily. Even if they were faced with overwhelming odds, they were normally too stubborn to accept defeat. As such, Lord Botley's motives for surrendering were brought into question.

Initially, his bravery (or lack thereof) was suspected to be the reason. But Victarion was certain Lord Sawane had not yielded out of fear. Cowards and cravens did not last long on the Islands, and House Botley was not known for siring any.

It was discovered that Sawane Botley's true reason for yielding was that he no longer believed in Lord Balon's cause. As it happened, he did not have very much faith in it to begin with. Apart from that, his eldest son Harren was currently serving in the Legion without Banners. Lord Sawane had no desire to risk doing harm to any member of his family, particularly his heir, and Harren Botley's involvement in the Legion had brought about great things for their house.

At least some Ironborn have a bit of sense.

After some thoughtful deliberation, Robert Baratheon accepted Lord Botley's surrender. The rest of the king's vessels were allowed entry to the harbor of Lordsport. Once they were docked, the crews hastily disembarked.

It took over an hour for the king's forces to regroup on land. Over ten thousand units from all over the realm were gathered. They were complemented by an additional few hundred that Lord Botley was able to spare them. Once they were all assembled in an orderly manner, they began the trek for Pyke.

The castle of Pyke was only a short way away by horse. Alas, there were not enough horses for all the king's men. The king himself was mounted, as were his generals (which included Victarion). Everyone else had to proceed on foot.

Two hours later, they arrived at the front gate of Pyke. Victarion had been born there, he had been raised there, and he had lived there for a good part of his adulthood. In spite of that, the magnificence and vastness of the castle still amazed him. He was not alone in that sentiment; he could actually hear some of the soldiers mutter their awe.

Just wait until we're on the inside…

Pyke was composed of five towers built on a group of islets. The gatehouse was the only one that could be accessed directly on land. If one wished entry to the Great Keep, the Bloody Keep, the Kitchen Keep, and the Sea Tower, they would have to be a fair climber. The king had no intention of sending his units to scale the cliffs of Pyke, so they would have to enter through the gatehouse.

At this time, the gatehouse was sealed. The portcullis had been lowered, and the walls' six defensive towers were fully-manned. Evidently, Lord Balon Greyjoy would not give in as easily as Lord Sawane Botley did.

Fortunately, the king's forces had come prepared. A number of siege engines had been brought ashore by the Royal Army. These included scorpions, catapults, battering rams, and other fearsome machines. Robert called for all of them to be rolled out. Once the engines were within proper range of the gatehouse, they were unleashed on the walls.

The bulk of the king's forces were able to merely stand by and observe as the siege engines ravaged the nearest wall of the gatehouse. Most of them did not have to worry about retaliation from the men in the towers. The only units who did were those of them who operated the engines. Most of them managed to duck for cover at the appropriate times, but more than a few of them fell to an arrow, a large stone, or a stream of boiling oil.

The Ironborn on the walls were determined to hold them, but they were too few and too slow to stop the king's siege engines. A few minutes into the assault, they had to be wary of enemy archers who returned fire on the ground below.

Within twenty minutes, the siege engines broke through. The southern part of the gatehouse buckled and swayed, and then it collapsed. The southernmost tower descended with it. The men stationed in that tower screamed as it vanished over the adjoining cliff.

Once the wall was breached, King Robert gave the order to advance.

Victarion Greyjoy managed to be the second man to climb the walls of the gatehouse. Lord Jorah Mormont was the first. He was immediately met by one of the crossbowmen posted on the wall. The guard attempted to shoot the bear lord at close range. Lord Jorah evaded the bolt and sank his Valyrian steel blade into the man's chest.

At approximately the same moment, Victarion engaged another of the wall's guards in combat. The Ironborn was initially stunned to see him, and then he sneered and mumbled angrily "Traitor…"

Victarion would not let that go unchallenged. He took out his axe and clashed it with his adversary's sword. After parrying blows for ten seconds, he delivered a fatal slash to the Ironborn's upper chest. His opponent sputtered and dropped listlessly to the ground.

All around him, similar deadly encounters were happening. Between his own bouts with other Ironborn, Victarion made a note of several of his companions' bouts.

Gregor Clegane was easy enough to spot, due to his massive height and impossibly heavy armor. He carried a shield in his left arm, and he wielded a greatsword in his right hand. There were few men alive who could balance a greatsword in one hand. Gregor Clegane did so perfectly. He moved about here and there, cutting down any Ironborn who dared come near him.

His lady wife Dacey Clegane was close-by. She bore a longsword in her right hand. With her left, she swung a Morningstar. If that was not quaint enough, her imposing size made it so. Anyone who attempted to challenge the Bear Islander did not last more than twenty seconds.

Victarion remembered when he had first met Lady Dacey. That was long before she had married Lord Gregor. But even back then, the Mountain did not allow anyone to slander her. Victarion had done so, and the Mountain had nearly struck him for it.

In time, Victarion had come to admire the Bear woman in many ways. He had accepted her as a soldier and as a leader. This was the first occasion when he saw her in full-fledged combat. From what he saw, no one could deny that she was an excellent warrior. For a woman.

No, not just for a woman. She's a fine fighter even for a man.

At one point, Dacey was approached by a tall man with a spear. He seemed amused to discover that his opponent was a woman. As he sparred with her, he commented derisively "You wish to resist my spear? Very well. It happens I've got a longer one. Put away your weapons and I'll show it to you."

That's not going to happen, you poor damn fool.
Victarion lightly scoffed at the Ironman's bluntness. In a strange way, he somewhat pitied the man, as he could predict how Dacey would respond to that lusty slur.

Sure enough, just a few seconds later, Dacey took her Morningstar and threw an underhand blow at the man's lower body. The spiked ball struck the spot directly between the man's legs. Almost straightaway, his hands let go of his steel-tipped spear and shot towards the one on his body. He fell to his knees and let out a shriek that was eerily reminiscent of a banshee.

Dacey smirked and remarked "It's not so long now."

Then she took her sword and plunged it into the area between the man's shoulder blades. Just like that, she made him a corpse as quickly as she had made him a eunuch.

If Victarion did not fully respect Dacey before that moment, he undoubtedly did then.

Not long after, something bright caught Victarion's attention. He paused to get a better look, and at first, he assumed it to be a line of fire. It was in fact a line of fire. But it was moving. Moving very erratically, at that.

Soon Victarion realized that the fire was really a burning sword. The blade was encompassed in the flames, but the damage to the steel seemed minimal. It cut down opponents as easily as any normal blade, and it struck much more fear into anyone who clashed with it.

Victarion then turned his attention to the man holding the sword. He was a plump man clad in red robes, like those of the priests of the R'hllor, the Lord of Light. It only took him a moment to recognize the man. He was indeed a red priest. He was Thoros, a follower of the Lord of Light from the Free City of Myr.

Thoros had arrived in the Royal Army's camps a few days before Robert Baratheon's company set sail. He had joined as a freerider, but he had requested to be on the front line when the king laid siege to Pyke. All it took was a single demonstration of his flaming sword and its abilities to convince Robert to grant his request.

Victarion had heard of Thoros' flaming sword, but he had not believed it to be true until that very moment. Now that he saw it… he was legitimately impressed.

I never would have thought that fire could be harnessed for melee combat.

Just then, a shout of anguish was heard from further up the walls. Victarion turned to the center of the disturbance, and he saw Jacelyn Bywater, a men-at-arms from the Crownlands, on the ground.

A moment earlier, Jacelyn had engaged three Ironborn at once. He had dispatched two of them quickly enough, but the third had managed to trip him. When he was on his back, his last opponent hacked at his right side. As a result, Jacelyn's hand was severed at the wrist, disarming him in both ways.

Victarion rushed to intercede. As the third Ironborn prepared the killing blow, Victarion waved his axe at the man's torso. He succeeded in burying it deep into the man's chest. The Ironborn dropped his sword, slouched, and fell. Victarion grinned in satisfaction as he pulled out his axe.

After getting Jacelyn Bywater to safety, Victarion reentered the fight. As he fought, he continued to observe his colleagues' performances in the battle.

Twenty feet away, Sandor Clegane and his intended, Obara Martell were dueling with a pair of swordsmen. Victarion had heard of the mark his brother had left on the Hound before he was slain.
The scar was very conspicuous, even on the field of battle. It had gained Sandor a fair amount of unwanted attention, but he had given little mind to it. Victarion had to praise him for that. Ironborn generally cherished their own scars of war, but even the Iron Captain would have dreaded to be deformed as the Hound had been.

There had been some debate on whether or not Sandor was well enough to return to active duty. Ultimately, Lord Tywin Lannister and the King had deemed him fit. Indeed, despite the temporary partial blindness in his right eye, Sandor was just as adept with a blade as before. Furthermore, his scar made him seem even more intimidating than Thoros of Myr's burning sword. On that note, Victarion noticed that Sandor was making an effort to avoid going near the read priest.

After his last experience with fire, I cannot blame him.

Sandor and Obara's duels ended with his bastard sword in his opponent's throat and her spear in the abdomen of hers.

By now, nearly all of the guards on the walls of the gatehouse had been eliminated. The few that were left began to retreat to the Great Keep. Unfortunately for them, the entrance to the Keep had been boarded up from the inside. Some of them pounded frantically on the doors, pleading to be let in. But the doors did not budge an inch.

Before too long, the soldiers of the Royal Army caught up to the Ironmen stuck outside the Great Keep. Those Ironborn were vanquished very quickly. Once they were all put down, the king's forces concentrated on breaking down the entrance to the Great Keep.

A score of strong men brought a large hewn log up the walls of the gatehouse. Together, they carried it to the doors of the Great Keep, and they used it as a battering ram.

It was quite a while before the log even had an impact on the Keep's sturdy entrance. The doors were made of ironwood pilfered from the wolfswood of the North. This wood would did not split easily, so neither would the door.

The Royal Army's problems were not limited to the door itself. As before, they had to deal with threats from above. Volleys of arrows, clusters of stones, and streams of boiling oil rained on them from the top of the outer wall. There was no canopy or covering for the battering ram, so those who held it were left extremely vulnerable.

Every minute, several of them fell to the dangers from overheard. Many of them had to be replaced, and the replacements were themselves replaced frequently. But they never panicked; they heaved and struck at the king's command.

Finally, after ten minutes and close to a hundred replacements, the battering ram smashed through the entrance of the Great Keep. After that, only a dozen more blows were needed to cast the doors aside. The Great Keep was breached.

The Royal Army poured in like the rapids of a flood. This time, the first man to enter was Dunsen, one of Lord Gregor Clegane's personal men-at-arms, and one of his longest-serving retainers.

He did fare as well as Lord Jorah had on the walls of the gatehouse. Almost the exact instant he stepped inside, Dunsen was intercepted by an Ironborn with a huge double-sided axe. The Ironman swiftly raised his axe and gave a hefty swing.

A moment later, Dunsen's head tilted backward. So far backward that it almost fell off his neck. Only a few strings of cartilage prevented him from being totally decapitated. Alas, those strings of cartilage made no difference in the long run. Dunsen collapsed dead right at the entrance of the Great Keep.

He was avenged very soon after. Gregor Clegane let out a roar of fury and strode over to the Ironborn. Before the Ironman had a chance to even lift his weapon, Gregor delivered a powerful blow from above with his greatsword. He succeeded in opening up the man's head and much of his torso. Dunsen's killer was almost cut in half vertically.

All around the room, more skirmishes were breaking out. Soon enough, the fighting had resumed full-pace.

Victarion hurried to dodge this blow or parry that blow. He hastily moved to meet any foe that hoped to best him. None of them could.

Of course they can't. Only a kraken can beat a kraken.

Right then, he turned abruptly to the left and came face-to-face with a young man. This young man happened to have a kraken imprinted on his hauberk. Victarion recognized him immediately.

It was his nephew, Maron Greyjoy. He was armed with a longsword, which was pointed at the Iron Captain.

Maron smirked wickedly and muttered "So, Nuncle, I see you've forsaken your oaths to the Ironborn."

"I have done no such thing," Victarion crossly refuted, "Your father is the only oathbreaker."

"My father is simply executing his authority as Lord Reaper of the Islands," Maron disputed, a note of confidence in his voice, "You rose up in defiance of him. That makes you lower than the greenlanders."

"It is still higher than Balon," Victarion snapped back. He gripped his axe in both hands and murmured sternly "Maron, this is over. Your father's rebellion ends today. Your only option is to surrender. Yield, and I will ensure that no harm comes to you."

"I do not take advice from one who would stab me in the back," Maron heatedly countered.

He was about to raise his longsword and attack his Uncle. Right before he could, he was grabbed from behind. He struggled against his attacker, but he was speedily overpowered. This third party was clad in white enameled armor and a long white cloak. Victarion saw that he was Ser Barristan Selmy, Lord Commander of Robert's Kingsguard.

"Now would be a good time to start," the middle-aged knight's cleverly suggested, placing the tip of his sword against the backside of Maron Greyjoy's chest.

Victarion snickered at the knight's clever jape and looked to Maron for his nephew's response. Within five seconds, Maron grudgingly threw down his sword and gave in. His hands were bound and he was led away, glaring hatred at his uncle.

Soon, Ironborn reinforcements appeared. However, a corresponding number of royalist soldiers entered the Great Keep to counter this new strength. For the better part of an hour, the two armies fought for control of the Keep, replenishing their numbers as needed. In a little over an hour, the Ironborn began to run out of backup units. That was when they were forced out of the front room. After that, they were consistently pushed further and further back into the Keep.
Twenty minutes later, the fighting reached the Keep's long smoky hall. This was the very same hall where the Seastone Chair was found. Balon Greyjoy himself was seated in that chair, his hand firmly clasped around the hilt of his own sword. A makeshift crown of driftwood was upon his head, symbolizing his status as the self-proclaimed King of the Iron Islands. The crown was planted so deeply that Balon's eyes were hardly visible.

Scarcely two score of the castle's soldiers now remained. Most of them moved to surround their liege lord protectively, in case anyone made a move toward him. The rest fought on against the royalist units and perished.

For the moment, the fighting stopped. What happened next would determine if it had ended permanently or temporarily.

King Robert Baratheon stepped forward quietly. Lord Eddard Stark, Ser Barristan Selmy, Lord Gregor Clegane, and his other highborn warriors moved behind him and kept close. His warhammer was caked with blood, as well as bits of bone and brain. He had slain no less than half a hundred of the Ironborn soldiers. He was prepared to slay more, if need be. Nonetheless, Victarion could see that even the stag king was hoping to avoid additional loss of life.

When Robert was halfway to the Seastone Chair, he halted. Then he steadfastly proclaimed "Balon Greyjoy, Invader of Westeros and False King of the Iron Islands, I, Robert Baratheon, the rightful King of the Seven Kingdoms, order you to surrender your crown and put an end to this insurrection."

The surviving Ironborn looked to their lord. He did not respond to the king’s demand right away. Instead, he remained situated firmly in his chair, staring at Robert dispassionately.

"Come on, Balon. Even you know when you've been beat."

Eventually, the Lord Reaper rose. When he was on his feet, he started walking towards the king. Some of his men-at-arms moved with him to function as his guards. Simultaneously, Ser Barristan Selmy and a few other royalists came closer to Robert to guarantee his safety in turn.

Balon Greyjoy ceased his approach when he was nearly within arm's length of the King. His eyes were finally visible then. They were full of spite and malice. When they fell on Victarion, they bore an expression of utter loathing.

Victarion did not quiver. He had to make his position abundantly clear to his brother. It was the only way he could get him to surrender without any more deaths.

After a long, tense silence, Balon Greyjoy dropped to one knee and dipped his head. He pronounced in a hard yet steady voice "I relinquish my throne to you, King Robert."

Robert grinned, obviously pleased by the Lord Reaper's decision. He reached out his hand, took ahold of Balon's crown, and roughly removed it from his head. He tossed it to the side, not bothering to see where it landed. Then he stated in acknowledgment "I accept your surrender."

That denoted the official moment when the war which would be known as Greyjoy's Rebellion ended.

The rest of the day was spent negotiating the terms of the Ironborn's surrender.

Robert had considered allowing Balon Greyjoy to continue to rule in exchange for a renewed oath of fealty and a political hostage (one of his sons, most likely). Just before the siege, he had informed his generals of this tactic. Most of them found it to be an effective solution. However, a few of the bolder ones had counseled the king to be much more severe with his chastisement of House Greyjoy. Chief among them had been Gregor Clegane.

Victarion had been present when Lord Gregor had advised King Robert. The Mountain had recommended that Balon Greyjoy be made an example of. As such, he debated that the Lord Reaper should be sent to the Wall for rising against the Iron Throne. Robert saw the logic in his Master of Order's words, and he agreed it would be the safest and most practical course of action.

Furthermore, to ensure the Ironborn's loyalty to the crown, Gregor proposed that Balon's children serve as hostages of the throne. Robert Baratheon was quite content with this suggestion. Doing so would help to prevent retribution on the part of the Ironborn. He himself decided what would be done with Balon Greyjoy's brood.

His daughter Asha would be allowed to remain at Pyke. But his sons would be sent away. Rodrik would be taken to King's Landing, Maron to Moat Cailin, and Theon to Winterfell. They would serve as wards to Lords Arryn, Clegane, and Stark in turn.

Rodrik and Maron had voluntarily joined the fight alongside their father, but Theon was still an innocent boy.

Normally, Robert Baratheon was not of a mind to completely separate a family, and Gregor Clegane was not one to threaten the life of a child, but they both had to make an exception in this instance. Still, to prove that they were not without empathy, they would not force Balon's sons to remain wards for the entire year. Once, on a predetermined date each year, each son would be permitted a week-long furlough to return home to Pyke. The furloughs would be arranged by the King and the respective lord who watched each Greyjoy, and only one of them would be allowed to return to Pyke at any point in time. After the furlough ended, they were to resume their position as political hostages.

Needless to say, Balon was not pleased with these terms when he first heard them. But he was forced to consent to them, as his only option other than the black was the block.

His wife Alannys Harlaw was deeply distraught over the loss of her sons. Interestingly, she did not seem even remotely troubled by the fact that her husband was to go north and never return.

Either she's already given up on him, or... they've had some "disagreements" since I was here last.

After Balon accepted the conditions of his surrender, he and his wife and children were led away. It was then that King Robert Baratheon made an announcement. An announcement that would change Victarion's life.

He declared to his subjects: "It has been brought to my attention that not all Ironborn resort to raiding simply because a thirst for conquest. Many of them raid because they are short on food. While that is still not a justification for pillaging and plundering, it is a sentiment that can at least be understood. Every man needs to eat. If a man does not eat, he starves. He will go to great length to avoid starving. Normally, when he is hungry, he will grow or buy crops. Those options are always present in the Seven Kingdoms. Alas, they are missing in Iron Islands. It is very difficult to cultivate crops in the soil, and the market here is quite poor. The Islands' unstable relations with the mainland make trade rather difficult. Fishing is an excellent resource for sustenance, but no one can live on fish alone. With all that accounted for, the only remaining method a man of the Iron Islands would use to gain his daily bread is if he takes it by force. Hence, the raiding."

You are rather observant, Your Grace. Did you arrive at that conclusion all on your own?
A moment later, Victarion Greyjoy spotted the smug expression on Lord Gregor Clegane's face, and he knew the answer to his question right away.

Robert continued with: "The raiding was what led to this rebellion in the first place. Although we now have assurances that the Iron Islands will not revolt again, I say more can be done to improve relations between the Islands and the Seven Kingdoms. Therefore, I shall take steps to make food more accessible to the Ironmen."

That gained the interest of everyone there, especially Victarion and the other Ironborn.

"How will you manage that, Your Grace?" Eddard Stark queried curiously.

"By making the Islands productive, Ned," Robert Baratheon notified his best friend and every other person there, "Most of the landscape is barren and eroded, but with proper tending, it can be made fertile. Once it is fertile, fruits, vegetables, and grains can be cultivated here."

"That's never been done, Your Grace," Jorah Mormont pointed out.

"Because no one's ever bothered with trying," Robert claimed, "Nothing is impossible if it's never been attempted."

"A very good point, Your Grace," Gregor Clegane conceded, "I for one believe fertilizing the Islands is an excellent idea. If the Ironborn are capable of feeding themselves, they will be much less inclined to seek food from others."

"But you are neglecting one thing," Dacey Mormont told her husband, "House Greyjoy's words are We Do Not Sow."

"Then it is past time they were changed to We DID Not Sow," King Robert debated.

That produced a long round of laughter from the assembled people. Even Victarion could not hold back a mild chuckle.

After the last of the giggles died, Robert Baratheon stated "When I return to King's Landing, I will have the small council draft the appropriate motions for farmland to be cultivated on the Islands. I will also push for better trading networks between the Islands and the rest of Westeros. That should ensure that no further disputes arise between them."

It will be difficult to undo the traditions of millennia, but then again, no one's ever tried THIS. And who knows? It just might work.

There were mutters of agreement all around the room. Robert Baratheon then gazed around and stated "We are nearly finished here. But before we return to the Westerlands, there is one last matter that must be resolved. Victarion Greyjoy, come forward."

For the duration of this meeting, Victarion had stood still as a statue, not uttering a single word. Now all eyes were fixed on him.

He fearlessly stepped up to the stag kind and tilted his head, saying "I am yours to command, Your Grace."

"Indeed you are," Robert coincided, "When this war began, I questioned where your loyalties truly lay. Since then, you have proven many times over that you serve the throne first and foremost. Such devotion is commendable, and it merits reward. Now you shall receive a reward; one fitting of your actions and deeds. Kneel."
Victarion slowly dropped to one knee, keeping his head inclined towards the stag king. Robert placed his hand on the Iron Captain's shoulder and announced "Victarion of House Greyjoy, for your unwavering allegiance to the crown and for your valiant efforts in purging the insurrection precipitated by your own family, I bestow upon you the lordship of the Iron Islands."

That declaration left many individuals in that room stunned. None was more stunned that Victarion Greyjoy himself. He gradually looked up at the stag king and murmured haltingly "Your Grace…?"

"No, you have not misheard, Lord Victarion," Robert cheekily remarked, "The Seastone Chair is yours now."

"But my nephews…" Victarion began.

"Cannot rule the Islands as captives," Robert finished for him, "Especially in their current predicaments. To remove all questions of inheritance, I'll have them removed from your house's line of succession. Or, I could have them placed in line behind you, if that is what you wish."

"I would prefer the latter," Victarion disclosed, "At least until I have an heir of my own."

"Very well," Robert conceded. He then extended his hand and bade the Iron Captain, "Rise, my lord."

Victarion took the king's hand, allowing him to full him back to his feet. Robert then turned to face everyone else there. He held Victarion's hand high in the air and pronounced resolutely "I give you the new Lord of the Iron Islands, Victarion Greyjoy!"

That declaration was met with almost unanimous approval. All the Ironborn present drew their weapons and bent their knees to Victarion. Everyone else loudly and energetically cheered for him. As for Victarion… he just stood absolutely still, as if paralyzed in disbelief.

He had always wanted the Seastone Chair, but never once did he think it would ever be his. Now it was.

Some good came from this rebellion, after all.

Although he was now the Lord Paramount of the Iron Islands, Victarion still wished to remain in the Legion without Banners for a while longer. Of course, it would be extremely difficult for him to rule the Islands from the mainland. Fortunately, Lord Gregor Clegane offered a solution. He suggested that Victarion appoint a steward to run the Islands in his absence.

Victarion found that strategy a favorable one. He spent the better part of an hour determining who would be his steward.

I'll need someone highborn, obviously.

Although he had been away for years, Victarion still knew the names of the heads of all the families on the Iron Islands. Several of them, such as Lord Baelor of House Blacktyde, Lord Sawane of House Botley, and Lord Gorold of House Goodbrother, had long yearned for peace between the Islands and the Seven Kingdoms. Many of them had served since the days of Quellon Greyjoy's reign, and they still believed in his policies just as strongly as Victarion did.

In the end, Victarion chose Lord Rodrik of House Harlaw. Known as the Reader by his compatriots due to his profound love of books, Rodrik Harlaw was an intelligent, reasonable, and cautious individual. He was also the brother of Balon Greyjoy's wife, which made him Victarion's brother-by-law. Lord Gregor Clegane had also taken steps to ensure that Lord Rodrik's sons were captured alive and returned to Harlaw unmolested.

Victarion was confident he could trust Rodrik Harlaw to maintain the peace and uphold the integrity of the Islands while he was gone. He sent a raven presenting this offer to Lord Rodrik, and before the day was out, he received a response. To his satisfaction, the Reader had accepted the responsibility eagerly and with grace.

Soon after this, the Royal Army returned to their ships and departed from the Islands.

Lord Gregor Clegane and the other Legionnaires sailed back on the Iron Victory at Victarion's personal invitation. Victarion met with the Mountain in secret and thanked him profusely for all he had done for the Ironborn. Gregor asserted that there was no need for thanks; he had simply acted out of the best interests of everyone in Westeros.

_Just like he always does._

Victarion also approached Lord Gregor on the subject of the song Nute the Barber had picked up from him. He revealed that he was curious to know more lyrics of that song. Gregor Clegane claimed that he was more than willing to share the full song with him. He claimed there were a few verses that needed to be "tweaked," whatever that meant. He needed a few minutes to do this, and when he was finished, he presented the abridged song to Victarion and everyone else on the ship.

The song proved rather popular with the crew and the passengers. As a matter of fact, every single person onboard the Iron Victory sang the full, modified version of "Anchors Aweigh" for the entire voyage back to the Westerlands.
Signs Of Adjusting

Chapter Notes

Note: Longest chapter yet. Hope the extra length does not bother you, as it may not be very exciting. There is not as much action in this one as there was in the last three, but it will contain a fair amount of character development. Also, this chapter focuses more on the family dynamic, as well as how it drives the people of Westeros. You also get to see the beginning stages of a new conflict; one even more complex and dangerous than Greyjoy's Rebellion.

It had been over four months since the Ironborn Fleet attempted to burn the Westerlander ships at Lannisport. Three and a-half months since King Robert Baratheon declared war on the Ironmen. Two months since the sea battles off Seagard and Fair Isle. Less than one month since the siege of Pyke.

Now, the insurrection known as Greyjoy's Rebellion was over. The result: a decisive tactical victory for the Royal Army. Balon Greyjoy would be sent to the wall, his three sons would be wards of the crown, and his brother Victarion was the new Lord of the Iron Islands.

That was all the information that had reached the mainland of Westeros. The specific details, such as who had endured and who had perished, had not yet been released. Some saw this as a blessing, as they could not bear receiving news that any of their loved ones had fallen in the fighting. Others, however, would wish to be told straightaway. To them, silence was worse than no news at all.

Alas, they had no sway on when the news would arrive. So until it did, they would have to tolerate this silence.

Ellaria Sand had come to terms with the silence long ago. Every time her lover needed to employ his combat expertise elsewhere, she did not protest. Sometimes he could afford to bring her along. Normally, he did so whenever he was simply required to settle a dispute nonviolently. But whenever his errands involved straight-up fighting, she opted to remain behind. So she had not joined Prince Oberyn or her stepdaughters when they set sail with the other royalist soldiers.

Instead, she lingered at Clegane's Keep. There she looked after her own daughters, as well as the children of the other parents in the Legion without Banners.

Ellaria was with Lady Daliah Clegane and her daughter Ellyn in the keep's nursery when they were visited by Maester Velix. He revealed to them that a message had just arrived; a message from the king. He read it aloud, informing them of the Royal Army's triumph over the Ironborn. The Royal Army would be coming back to the mainland eminently.

Furthermore, the King had proposed for a tourney to be held in Lannisport in celebration of their victory. The majority of the royalist soldiers would stay camped at or near Casterly Rock. However, House Clegane's retainers had been granted the exclusive privilege of returning home before the tourney. Lord Gregor Clegane and the other Legionnaires would be accompanying them. They were due to arrive within one day of the raven that carried this message to Clegane's Keep.

That's the best news I've heard all year.
After sharing this news with his lady and Ellaria, Maester Velix went to share it with Ser Tarrence Clegane, whom he had been seeing a lot more of ever since he diagnosed him with palsy.

Ser Tarrence's condition was still a secret to all but his family and his family's closest allies. Oberyn and Ellaria were counted amongst those in the latter category, given their close friendship with Gregor Clegane.

From what Ellaria could gather, she had done much to lessen Lady Daliah Clegane's prejudices towards bastards. In fact, after spending so much time with Lord Harmen Uller's baseborn daughter, Daliah thought of Ellaria Sand as a dear friend.

So there are some decent Westerlander women. What a pleasant surprise.

After Maester Velix left to find her husband, Daliah walked over to the center of the nursery. There her grandson Rickard was playing with Ellaria's girls, Elia and Obella. Daliah Clegane – who would once have sneered at the very thought of her own sons mingling with bastards – smiled at the sight of how well her grandson was getting along with two of the Sand Snakes. That in turn made Ellaria smile.

Just then, Daliah gently picked Rickard up and cradled him in her arms. Rickard giggled and welcomed his grandmother's warm embrace. As she held him close, she whispered softly "Your father's coming home, sweetling."

"And his mother," Ellaria added in coyly.

"Of course," Daliah conceded with a light chuckle, "Never forget her."

I don't think anyone is likely to forget the woman who set the record for the largest babe ever born.

Rickard Clegane was entering his twenty-first month. According to Lady Daliah's claims, he was still not as large as his father had been at that age, but he was still much bigger than average. Seeing Rickard next to her eldest daughter, Ellaria could confirm that herself.

Elia Sand had seen roughly thirty-nine months, eighteen more than Rickard. Yet the two of them were roughly the same size. In addition to that, Obella Sand was only two months younger than Rickard, but she was tiny compared to him. She would grow, of course.

But not at the rate "little" Rickard has.

At one point, Obella got up off the ground and toddled over to her mother. When she got to Ellaria, she smiled up at her. Most of her primary teeth had grown in. Only the secondary molars had yet to appear. So the smile was complete.

It's a beautiful smile, nonetheless.

Ellaria was sitting down at this time. She reached down, picked up her younger daughter, and set her on her lap. Obella was still at the age where she craved her mother's attention. Elia had nearly grown out of that phase, but she still thoroughly enjoyed her mother's attention.

I hope she always does.

In Ellaria's mind, she had the two most wonderful children anyone could ask for. Granted, many mothers thought the same of their own. Still, Ellaria felt Elia and Obella were everything she could ever want.
That was not to say she did not truly want more, or at least the possibility of more.

As she held her younger girl close, Ellaria wondered if Oberyn would be interested in having a third child someday. He already had six (or seven, as far as the rest of the country knew), but he done what most fathers of baseborn children had not. He had acknowledged each of them as his, and he had gone to great lengths to win full custody of them from their mothers. Except in the case of Elia and Obella, of course. Because of her status as his lover, he and Ellaria shared custody of his two youngest girls. Maybe they would someday share custody of three. Or four. Or even more…

I should speak to Oberyn on this when he returns to me.

A couple minutes after Obella came to her, Ellaria noted Rickard Clegane stand up. For some reason, his legs were quite shaky. She watched as he made his way over to his grandmother and tugged on her dress. He said a little anxiously "Grandma… Grandma…"

Daliah Clegane looked down at her grandson and stated curiously "Yes, Rick?"

That was what his parents often called him. As such, Lady Daliah had agreed to address him by that way, as well.

"Have to… have to…" Rickard began haltingly.

Ellaria was a bit bewildered and concerned by the young boy's actions. Then she saw that only one of his hands was griping his grandmother's gown. His other hand, he held near the top of his trousers. Additionally, he was squirming in place.

Straightaway, Ellaria knew what the trouble was. Luckily, so did Lady Daliah. She grinned down at Rickard kindly, took his outstretched hand in hers, and told him "Very well, let's go."

The two of them went over to the privy in the adjoining room. Daliah beckoned Rickard to enter first, and she stepped in after him. She made certain to shut the door.

Ellaria soon heard the sound of liquid striking metal. It started as a stream, but it gradually faded to trickling, and then it disappeared altogether. That noise was soon followed by water being splashed in a wash-basin.

He remembered to wash his hands. Very good.

Ellaria next heard Daliah say "Stand still, dearest."

She must be helping him refasten his trousers.

"Yes, Grandma," Rickard affirmed. Ellaria's supposition was proven true a moment later, when he added in "Thank you."

"You're welcome," Daliah said plainly.

There was a slight pause. Then the door to the privy opened, and Rickard and his grandmother remerged.

As Rickard went back to playing with Elia, Ellaria asked curiously "How'd it go?"

Daliah looked to the Dornishwoman, smirked, and stated merrily "I think he's nearly mastered the chamber pot."
"Good for him," Ellaria commented, grinning back. She gazed down at Obella after that. As she brushed her daughter's hair, she thought aloud "As I recall, that's usually a rather messy affair."

"Not this time, thankfully," Daliah wryly remarked.

"That's fortunate," Ellaria pronounced, "I taught Elia how to use the chamber pot easily enough, and Obella is learning quickly, as well. But I can imagine male children would have… more room for 'error.'"

Daliah Clegane scoffed and muttered "You'd be correct. That was the case with Sandor."

"What about Gregor?" Ellaria enquired. Again, she was genuinely interested. Although she and Oberyn had been friends with the Mountain for years, they still knew very little about his childhood. For whatever reason, he seemed unwilling or reluctant to discuss it with anyone. But his continuous refusal to divulge anything about his early years only made the Red Viper and his paramour more determined to find out about him.

It was at that moment that Ellaria realized that she had the next best source of information on Gregor Clegane's early life: the one who had primarily carried for him during those years.

Why did that not occur to me before now? I could have asked Lady Daliah about Gregor's life months ago.

At least she had this realization before Oberyn and Gregor returned. Now once they got back, she would know something one of them did not, and something the other did not know she knew.

Ellaria had to resist the urge to smile deviously.

A few seconds later, she was able to. That was when she saw the expression on Daliah's face.

Daliah folded her hands over her stomach, and she revealed "Actually… it wasn't so difficult with Gregor. It was surprisingly easy, as a matter of fact."

"You mean training Gregor to use the privy was a simple affair?" Ellaria presumed.

Daliah nodded her head and informed her "After the first lesson, he seemed to understand the process straightaway. He didn't even require a… demonstration."

Ellaria lightly nodded her head in acknowledgment. Then another thought entered her mind. She asked the elder woman "How old was he at the time?"

"He had not even seen seventeen moons," Daliah Clegane disclosed, "Interestingly, a few months before even that, he was able to clothe himself."

"That's rather unusual," Ellaria observed.

"Yes, but Gregor managed it," Daliah recounted, "In fact, even as a babe, he matured at any alarmingly fast rate. He said his first word when he was closer to his birth than to his first nameday. He spoke in complete sentences very shortly after his first nameday. He was weaned in his fourteenth month. He could walk without stumbling in his sixteenth. And he hardly ever cried."

Ellaria whistled at that. "It sounds as though he was the ideal babe."

"At the time, he certainly seemed so," Daliah expounded, "But there was something that always perplexed me. It was not the fact that he grew out of infancy sooner than the average babe. It was..."
the fact that he almost seemed… eager to grow out of it."

"You mean on a subconscious level?" Ellaria supposed.

"No, not just subconsciously," Daliah clarified, "Even when awake, I was under the impression that Gregor physically desired the ability to communication, move independently, and feed and care for himself."

Now Ellaria was baffled. "Forgive me if I sound impertinent, my lady, but you seem to be implying that Gregor was… already aware of the world when you could hold him in one arm."

"You are not out of line, Ellaria," Daliah asserted, "That truly is what I believe. From the day I brought Gregor into this world, I was convinced that he was smarter and wiser than any babe had a right to be. Whenever his name was mentioned, he would give his attention to whoever said it."

Ellaria must have looked very astonished, for Daliah told her next "I know; it sounds ludicrous. For the longest time, I keenly denied it all myself. But now, I can assure you everything I say is the truth. I honestly believe there is a distinct possibility that Gregor understood and comprehended his surroundings from the moment he drew his first breath."

Ellaria thought on that concept, and after a minute, she murmured "That... would be nightmarish. I mean, if one could not only remember, but also fully grasp the entirety of one's life... I don't like to think on what effect that might have. The experience would be both unimaginable and unbearable."

"To say the least," Daliah coincided, "Even so, allow me to set your mind at ease, if you will. As of yet, there is no firm proof that Gregor actually was conscious of the world as a babe. All the same, as hard as I try to, I cannot think of any way to negate that he was, either. So until I can arrive at a definite conclusion, I cannot wholly ignore my theory."

_I can relate to that mindset._

"Does anyone else know of your theory?" Ellaria enquired in interest.

"I have shared it with several others," Daliah Clegane illuminated, "None of them found it very plausible."

"What of your husband?" Ellaria Sand contended, "Or the maester?"

Daliah shook her head and disclosed "Tarrence and Velix strongly contested my claims, as well. They have dismissed them as nothing more than 'motherly intuition.'"

Ellaria released a heavy sigh and mumbled "I cannot claim to be surprised. Men are often so irritatingly ignorant."

"Indeed," Daliah concurred, "Alas, we do not live in a world where our sex has the better say."

_Unless that 'world' includes Dorne. Or Moat Cailin. Otherwise, that grim observation is incontestably true._

Ellaria felt that this conversation was rapidly becoming uncomfortable for Lady Daliah. It certainly was for her. As such, she elected to change the topic.

She smiled lightly and stated "In any case, I'd like to make an observation, my lady."

"What sort of observation?" Daliah Clegane queried curiously.
"It is often said that the first child is the hardest," Ellaria pointed out, gazing over at Elia, and then looking back down at Obella, "That was how it was for me. I assume it was not that way for you?"

"Indeed it was not," Daliah confirmed, grinning slyly, "For me, my first child was by far the easiest to raise. My second was slightly more difficult, and the third and final one was an absolute chore."

At that time, Ellyn Clegane was in the nursery. She was playing a game of cyvasse with Joy Hill, Ser Gerion Lannister's daughter. Ellyn was about to position her elephants so that they would flank Joy's dragon. Then she would have the younger girl cornered.

But before she could make her move, she heard her mother's last remark. She could tell that her mother was somewhat joking. Even so, she turned to Lady Daliah and glared at her. Her countenance suggested she was quite unamused. She uttered in a very sardonic voice "It happens that I'm right here, Mother."

Daliah Clegane chuckled at her daughter's reaction to her words. She stated in a reassuring tone "I am only being partly serious, Ellie."

"On which part?" Ellyn inquired.

"Well, you were a bit of a handful," Daliah claimed, "Your brothers can attest to that."

"Of course they can; they were there," Ellyn debated, "Whereas I wasn't even around until well after they were babes. They remember the earliest part of my life better than I ever will, but I have no way of knowing that what they tell me is the truth. That's a disadvantage I have to put up with. I mean, I'm the only one in this family with no memory of any other member's infancy."

"Not so, my dear," Ellaria countered, gesturing to Rickard Clegane in the center of the room. "Rickard does not count," Ellyn disputed, "He's been in the North for most of his life. He's hardly even an infant anymore. Apart from that, Gregor and Dacey could always have another child."

They probably will. I am almost certain they will.

"I know how you must feel, darling," Daliah proclaimed, "All your aunts and uncles are older than I. I know full well how challenging it can be to be the youngest in the family."

"Being the youngest is not what troubles me, Mother," Ellyn murmured, gazing off to the side, "It's... well..."

Ellaria could tell that Ellyn was upset. Out of concern, she asked the tall girl "Ellyn, is something bothering you?"

"No, not really, Ellaria," Ellyn claimed, staring down at the floor. After some quietness, she looked back up and uttered softly "Well, actually, yes."

"Tell us what troubles you," Daliah beseeched her daughter, "Please."

After a little more silence, Ellyn slowly turned to Lady Daliah and said inquisitively (and worriedly) "Mother, am I really a burden to you?"

Daliah looked downright flabbergasted at that. "I never said you were anything of the sort."

"You said I was a 'chore'," Ellyn reminded her
"That was just a jape," Daliah insisted, "A very poor jape; I see that now."

"I know it was a jape," Ellyn pronounced, "But the jape itself is not what bothers me."

"Then what is?" Daliah Clegane asked her daughter.

"You might call it… a feeling of inadequacy," Ellyn vaguely answered.

"Inadequacy?" her mother repeated, baffled.

Ellyn opened her mouth to speak again, but this time, nothing came out. It was here that her motivation and desire to continue this conversation must have declined. Eventually, she did talk, but all she said was "Oh, never mind. Please, let's not go on with this. I was merely being too sensitive about all this."

Ellaria was in no way convinced that the tall girl's sensitivity was the sole motive behind her outburst. Lady Daliah did not seem convinced, either. The latter assuredly told her daughter "Are you certain, sweetling? I'm your mother; you can tell me anything."

"Perhaps some other time," Ellyn proposed, "I do not wish to cause a conflict to arise. We've already won one war. No need to start another so soon."

That was when Lady Daliah agreed not to force the issue. "As you wish, Ellie."

Daliah may have been content not to discuss this topic anymore. Ellaria, however, could tell what Ellyn's problem was right then. Her so-called "feeling of inadequacy" evidently stemmed from the insecurity often felt by the youngest child in the family.

I wonder if Lady Daliah realizes that Ellyn is jealous of her brothers. Oh, she loves them; no doubt of that. But it's very probable she wants to be them, too.

In that one afternoon, Ellaria learned more about Ser Tarrence Clegane's children than she had during her entire stay at Moat Cailin. She had found answers to some questions, but so many more questions had been raised, as well. She decided she would simply meditate on what she had learned for a while before she looked for any more explanations.

The following morning, before daybreak, the Royal Fleet came within sight of Lannisport. By dawn, all their ships were garrisoned in the harbor. By midmorning, virtually all the soldiers had disembarked onto the docks. They spent the remainder of the morning and part of the afternoon returning to their camps in the fields between Casterly Rock and Clegane's Keep.

In the early afternoon, House Clegane's units and the units from the Legion without Banners could be seen approaching Clegane's Keep in the distance. Ser Tarrence, Lady Daliah, and Ellyn Clegane all stood at the front of the keep, eagerly awaiting the return of the Mountain and the Hound. Daliah currently held Rickard in her arms. Ellaria Sand was there, as well. She held Obella in her arms, and Elia was standing near her feet, as was Joy Hill.

Just before one o'clock, the Legionnaires and the Clegane soldiers reached the keep. Once again, Gregor rode at the very head of the column. Alongside him were Dacey Mormont, Oberyn Martell, Victarion Greyjoy, Gerion Lannister, Allard Seaworth, and Smalljon Umber. Ellaria noted Garth Hightower was missing from the top Legionnaires' ranks.

Isn't that curious?

As before, Gregor was the first to enter the grounds of the keep, and the first to dismount. His captains and lieutenants followed him straight after; the rest of the Legionnaires remained ahorse outside the walls.

Once the Mountain was on his feet, he strode over to his parents, his sister, and his son. There he removed his helm and held it under his armpit. He gave Ser Tarrence a respectful bow, kissed Lady Daliah a kiss on the forehead, and hugged Ellyn warmly. He gave his regards to Ellaria and her daughters, and then he turned his attention to Rickard.

"Hello, dada!" the little boy said excitedly.

Daliah Clegane gently passed her grandson over to her eldest. The Mountain had a very strong grip, but he was delicate with his son. After placing a kiss on the top of Rickard's head, Gregor said to his mother "I hope he was on his best behavior."

"No trouble at all," Daliah reassured him.

A proper gentleman, like his father.

It was then that Dacey joined her husband and his family. The moment she saw Rickard, she broke into a wide smile, and he smiled back.

"Mama!" he joyously remarked.

Dacey reached out for Rickard, and Gregor carefully transferred their son to her arms. She embraced him tightly, as though it was the last time she would hold him. She told him softly "Mummy missed you, Rick."

This display of affection brought warm feelings to Ellaria's heart. Dacey Mormont may have been fiercer and gruffer than most Westerosi women, but at times, she could be very caring and tender. Ellaria always admired such unconditional love.

The reunions were not limited to the Cleganes. Just then, Joy Hill ran to her father, and Ser Gerion Lannister embraced her affectionately.

A moment later, Oberyn Martell came to Ellaria and their two daughters. He hugged both Elia and Obella, and he gave their mother a kiss on the lips. A very passionate, elongated kiss. It was insufficient in conveying just how much the prince had missed her, but Ellaria did not mind.

He’ll be able to properly show me how he longed for me tonight.

Smalljon Umber, Allard Seaworth, and Victarion Greyjoy had no immediate family there. So they just stood off to the side as their colleagues reunited with their relations.

"So, I hear you're now the liege lord of the Iron Islands," Tarrence Clegane called out to Victarion.

"You've heard correctly, good ser," the Iron Captain affirmed, "It was the king's way of repaying my devotion to the crown."

"I'd say you've earned it, my lord," Ellaria commented.

"Thank you, my… Ellaria," Victarion said in response, remembering at the last moment that Ellaria hated to be addressed as "lady."

"Your Ellaria?" Oberyn humorously muttered.

"Oh, let him be," Ellaria beckoned her lover.
Ellyn then stepped up and asked "Where is Garth Greysteel?"

That was the alias Lord Leyton Hightower's second son normally went by.

"He was killed at Fair Isle," Allard Seaworth grimly informed the others, "I wasn't there when he died, though."

"It happens that I was," Gerion Lannister disclosed, "I saw it with my own eyes. One of Lord Gregor's black powder pouches did the deed."

"I thought Ser Wallis was managing the black powder, and Ser Garth was monitoring him," Lady Daliah recalled.

"He was, my lady," Smalljon Umber confirmed, "Alas, Wallis Peckledon was slain in battle. He was down to his last pouch, which had already been lit before he died. Ser Garth tried to dispose of it, but it went off before he could."

That was an even more astounding revelation. Ser Tarrence said in astonishment "Ser Wallis is dead?"

"Arrow to the throat," Gerion Lannister responded.

Ser Tarrence sighed in frustration. Ellaria could hardly blame him; Wallis Peckledon had been the master-at-arms of Clegane's Keep for over two decades. He would be mourned by those who knew him, and replacing him would not be easy.

"Did you bring Ser Wallis' bones back?" Tarrence Clegane asked the Legionnaires.

"Of course we did," Dacey answered him.

"Good," her father-by-law stated appreciatively, "They need to be sent back to his family's ancestral home. I also need to write to Lord Peckledon, expressing my sincerest condolences for the death of his eldest nephew."

"Very well," Gregor agreed, "We'll be sending Greysteel's remains back to Oldtown, as well. Along with an official apology for Lord Leyton."

A somber silence came over that vicinity. It lasted about thirty seconds. Then Gregor announced "There is some good news, though."

"What?" Ellyn asked her brother.

"The Ironborn vessels at Fair Isle were commanded by Euron Greyjoy," Gregor disclosed, "His galley, the Silence, is infamous for its vast horde of treasures stolen from the lands beyond the Narrow Sea. Lord Tywin offered possession of those treasures to any man who managed to successfully apprehend or slay the Crow's Eye. Now he is dead. Guess who did the deed?"

"You?" Ellaria assumed.

"Close," Gregor told her, smirking.

The answer came to nearly everyone straight away. Tarrence assumed eagerly "Sandor killed him?"

"He did," Gerion validated that presumption, "Originally, I thought to be the one to eliminate the Crow's Eye. I almost lost my arm in the process. I risked losing even more, but Sandor saved my life. Now because of him, I still draw breath and Euron Greyjoy is a rotting corpse."

"Good for Sandor," Ellaria remarked in amazement.

"Good for all of us," Gregor corrected her, "He and I made a deal. If either of us take out the Crow's Eye, we would split the wealth."

"Fair enough," Tarrence Clegane perceived. After a short pause, he asked "Do you know when Sandor will be here?"

"Soon; very soon," Oberyn Martell proclaimed, "He is bringing in the treasures taken from the Silence. Naturally, the goods are under heavy guard. My daughters are assisting him with the convoy."

"They should be here momentarily," Allard Seaworth contended.

Tarrence and Daliah smiled and nodded in acknowledgment. Their smiles faded slightly when they saw the uneasy look on the Mountain's face.

"Gregor?" Daliah said worriedly.

"There is… something else you should know," Gregor uneasily revealed.

"What?" Tarrence inquired apprehensively.

"It may be better if Sandor showed you himself," was all their firstborn son told them in response.

"Showed?" Ellaria noted.

"Or told, depending on how you wished to be informed," Gregor muttered solemnly.

Neither option sounds very favorable.

Ten minutes later, three more horses rode through the gate of Clegane's Keep. They were followed by a dozen heavy-laden carts, which were surrounded protectively by no less than a hundred Legionnaires and Clegane's Keep soldiers.

The riders on the right and the left were both young women clad in leather armor. The one with the spear was Obara Martell; the one with the whip was Nymeria Martell.

The middle rider was wearing a cloak with the hood drawn over his head. His head was tilted so that his face was totally invisible to anyone on the ground. But based on his height and the massive black destrier he rode, he could only be Sandor Clegane.

The Hound and the two former Sand Snakes remained astride their mounts as they approached the large group that had already assembled in the courtyard. Sandor stopped when he was five feet from his family. Beneath his hood, he smiled at them and declared "Father, Mother, Ellyn, I come bearing gifts."

He then gestured at the carts behind him and continued with "These are the exploits I earned from my triumph over Balon Greyjoy's treacherous brother. Half of them are ours now. The other half belongs to Gregor."

"We know," Tarrence proclaimed, looking over the treasure carts in fascination, "He told us of your agreement."
Sandor nodded his head to acknowledge that statement.

Daliah Clegane was not as interested in the carts as her husband. She was far more intrigued by her younger son’s current appearance.

"Sandor… why is your face concealed?" Daliah asked nervously.

Sandor did not answer straightaway. Instead, he looked to his brother.

"We told them," Gregor revealed.

"How much?" the Hound requested.

"Just that something happened," the Mountain elaborated, "I felt you should be the one to tell them what that 'something' is."

Sandor let out a sigh and conceded "Yes, I suppose that's best."

It was then that the younger Clegane son got off his horse. He gradually came closer to his parents and sister. Gregor stayed close by. Ellaria and everyone else there watched him intently.

Even on the ground, Sandor's face was hidden in shadow.

"Just what happened at Fair Isle?" Tarrence questioned in an almost demanding tone.

"My victory over the Crow's Eye came at a price," Sandor ambiguously declared.

"What price?" Daliah inquired, her voice dripping with worry.

For a moment, Sandor just stood there, not moving a muscle. Then he sighed once more, took ahold of his hood with both hands, and threw it back.

Oh, Seven help him…

...

Most young girls would likely shriek at the sight of a man with a deformed face. Even if said man was her elder brother.

That was not the case with Ellyn Clegane. When she saw Euron Greyjoy's mark on her brother Sandor's face, she did not scream. She was stunned, but she did not scream.

"What did he do to you?" Ellyn muttered quietly.

"The Crow's Eye tried to burn my head," Sandor illuminated, "In response, I planted my dagger in his neck twice."

Now that's what I call retaliation.

Ellyn's mother did not share her composed reaction. By contrast, Lady Daliah Clegane appeared to be in shock. Sandor noticed her discomfort, and he told her "If you wish to scream, Mother, go ahead. I would not blame you if you do."

To some, that comment may have seemed mocking. Sandor was known for his bluntness and occasional lack of tact, but he was not trying to be disrespectful or insensitive when he made those two statements.
At any rate, Mother did not scream, either. But if she did, it would not have been out of fear. Instead, it would have been out of horror for what had happened to her son.

Amidst an unpleasant quietness, Ellyn observed Mother as she stepped up to Sandor. When she stopped, she slowly lifted her left hand and moved it up to his head. Sandor remained silent and motionless as his mother lightly tapped the tips of her fingers against his scar.

He doesn't so much as flinch.

"Does… does that hurt?" she asked in concern.

You probably should have asked before you touched it. Ellyn did not say that aloud, of course. She was not indifferent to her mother's grief.

All the same, Sandor firmly shook his head and revealed "The right half of my face is completely numb. The maester who treated me claimed that feeling will eventually return to it. But the damage to my skin cannot be undone."

Maester Velix was in the company of House Clegane retainers assembled in the courtyard. Father beckoned him to come forward and inquired "Maester, what say you to that?"

"My colleague was correct in his diagnosis," Velix dismally informed his master as he looked over Sandor's wound, "The numbness will subside, but the scar, I'm afraid, is permanent."

At that, Mother finally broke down. She pulled Sandor close and embraced him as though he was on his deathbed. She sobbed loudly into his breastplate. Sandor said nothing; he merely wrapped his arms around his mother and held her tenderly, all the while letting her weep onto his shoulder.

Ellyn was inclined to try to comfort her mother, but she chose not to intercede just yet. She would wait until Mother moved away from Sandor. That turned out to be a prudent choice on her part.

Eventually, Mother regained her composure and forced herself to let go of Sandor. She was still crying, but most of her tears had been spent. She wiped her eyes with a handkerchief, and she mumbled glumly "I'm so… so sorry, Sandor."

"Mother, you did not cause this," Sandor attempted to reassure her, "You were nowhere near Fair Isle when I faced the Crow's Eye. You did not participate in the fighting, nor did you push my head into that fire. You have no reason to apologize. And there was nothing you could have done to prevent this."

"There was something I could have done," Tarrence Clegane debated, apparently cross with himself, "I could have led the troops. I could stopped Euron Greyjoy."

"In your condition, Father?" Ellyn whispered so that only those who were immediately around them – which were the Cleganes and the Martells – could hear.

"Ell is correct," Sandor conceded, "The Crow's Eye could have killed you, Father. You may have fought as valiantly as I, but the risk to your safety would have been too great. I am not that eager to succeed you. Especially when you're so close to getting your lifelong wish."

Father raised an eyebrow in bewilderment. "What wish would that be?"

"Lord Tywin has all but decided to go through with his proposal to raise this house to lordly status," Gregor announced.
That produced a fair deal of muttering from the assembled crowds. Father uttered gleefully "He has?"

"Indeed so," Sandor confirmed, "We'll know his final verdict on the issue sometime before the tourney at Lannisport begins. That will be about a month from now."

"That is wonderful," Father stated, stepping forward and patting Ellyn's brother on the back. "Very good work, Sandor. You've done well."

"I just do what I can, Father," Sandor casually remarked, smiling. Oddly enough, when he smiled, his face looked a little less deformed.

Maybe now he'll smile more often.

Ellyn then noticed Mother did not seem to share Father's joy. As a matter of fact, she appeared somewhat outraged at his happiness.

"Your son has been mutilated beyond hope of recovery, and all you care about is that you may become a lord soon?" she snapped angrily.

Father was alarmed by that outburst. Ellyn, Sandor, and Gregor were quite stunned, as well. They had all seen their parents argue on many occasions, but Mother had never raised her voice to Father like that.

Ellyn knew that Father would not tolerate that sort of insolence from anyone at Clegane's Keep, least of all his lady wife. But he made an effort not to seem unruly in front of the present company. He murmured through gritted teeth "Of course not. I am pleased that Sandor has secured a great deal of wealth and the almost-official guarantee of lordship for this house. But that will not be sufficient to distract me from the suffering he endured to acquire those benefits. Nothing would ever make me immune to that."

"By your behavior, you could have convinced us otherwise," Mother snapped in fury.

"Mother, I very much appreciate your concern," Sandor claimed, gently placing a hand on Mother's arm, "But I do not wish for this scar to be the cause of any conflict, particularly amongst my own family. I already got justice and revenge when I buried my knife in the Crow's Eye's neck. Perhaps you can take some comfort from that."

"I believe I can," Mother admitted, calming down considerably "But do you mean to say that you've already come to accept having this scar for the rest of your days?"

At that, Sandor shook his head and disclosed "I don't suppose I'll ever fully accept it. But I have learned to live with it."

"That is what truly matters," a feminine voice interjected.

Ellyn and the other people on the ground looked in the direction of the voice. It belonged to Obara Martell, the woman who would soon be Ellyn's sister-by-law.

Prince Oberyn's oldest daughter had remained mounted on her horse, as had her sister Nymeria. It was at that moment that both of the Dornishwomen climbed off their mounts and joined the others on the ground. Nymeria stayed close to her horse whilst Obara stepped next to Sandor.

The former Sand Snake then took Mother's hand in hers and proclaimed "I cannot pretend to understand how you must feel, my lady. I do not, and – at the risk of sounding selfish – I hope I "I hope you never have to know it either, child," Mother claimed softly.

Ellyn noticed there were still a few tears in Mother's eyes. Obara gently wiped them away, and then she declared "When I first saw Sandor's scar, I was just as shocked as you are now. He was not the least bit receptive of it, either. But I persuaded him to look at his scar differently."

"Differently how?" Ellyn enquired. She got her answer immediately.

Obara kept one of her hands interlocked with Mother's. Then she turned to Sandor and delicately placed her other hand on his burn. After that, she gazed around the area and announced "I have no way of knowing what form of anguish Sandor went through when Euron Greyjoy gave him it, but you must remember that it was he who survived that skirmish, not the Crow's Eye. I myself saw Sandor stab and kill his opponent… while his head was still in the flame. He overcame unspeakable pain to triumph over his adversary. A weaker man would have given up in his situation. Not he. He proved to be the strongest man in that battle. As such, I say that this scar is not a blemish to be pitied or scorned. It is a symbol of victory and hope. Those carts of treasure we brought in, Lord Tywin's newfound respect for House Clegane, this family's practically-guaranteed ascension to lordly status… we owe all of that to this scar."

For more than a minute after Obara's speech ended, the entire courtyard was struck by tense silence. Ellyn looked around and saw that many of the others were taken aback. In the good way. One could plainly tell that Obara Martell had greatly impressed everyone with her words. Oberyn Martell just smiled proudly at his daughter.

The quietness was ultimately broken by Ser Tarrence Clegane. He gazed at the assembled crowd and professed "My lady Obara Martell has the right of it. Sandor's scar was what won the battle of Fair Isle. For that, I declare he should be praised for the scar."

"Yes, he should," Mother quietly conceded. Her hand was still being held in Obara's. Her other hand was free, and she used it to wrap the former Sand Snake in a hug, much to Obara's surprise… and Ellyn's amusement.

Mother soon released the Dornishwoman and stated gratefully "Thank you, Obara."

"I only said what needed to be said, my lady," Obara decreed, smiling a bit.

"Nevertheless, not every woman can bring such comfort to her future mother-by-law," Mother contended, "I know that you will make a fine ruling lady in your own right one day."

"I thank you for your confidence," Obara stated appreciatively.

A moment later, Sandor stepped behind Obara. He placed his hands on her biceps and kissed her on the cheek. Mother, Father, and Gregor smiled at that. Ellyn tried not to roll her eyes.

Really? Do you have to be so open with her in public?

Sandor then turned to Mother and remarked "On that note, Mother… I wish to remind you that the tourney at Lannisport will not be for at least a month. A lot can be done in a turn of the moon."

He kept his hands on Obara's arms when he said that. He subtly gestured at his intended with a nod of his head. His family grasped the meaning of the gesture almost right away.
According to the ecstatic expression that had just appeared on Obara's face, Sandor was not the only "eager" one there.

"Well," Father thought aloud, "We were talking on conducting the ceremony sometime after Greyjoy's Rebellion ended. Prince Oberyn is here, and we have a large congregation nearby. There is plenty of food and wine on-hand, and there are bound to be minstrels somewhere in the Royal Army's camp. So... yes. I agree with you wholeheartedly, Sandor."

Sandor and Obara grinned widely and asked in unison "When?"

Father stood contemplating a reply for about twenty seconds. Then he folded his arms, grinned kindly, and announced "Three weeks from today, you two shall be joined together."

Sandor and Obara ardently nodded their acceptance. Then he turned her so that they faced each other, and they kissed passionately on the lips. That produced a large wave of cheers and applause from the assembly. Even Ellyn Clegane could not help but clap energetically for her brother and his betrothed.

The following three weeks, Clegane's Keep was busier than it had been since Gregor relocated to Moat Cailin. That by itself said something; the keep was three times larger than it had been in those days, and it housed five times as many soldiers and servants.

The rest of the Royal Army was preoccupied with the upcoming tourney. But that affair was of little importance to House Clegane. They were focused entirely on preparing Sandor and Obara's nuptials. Gregor and his Legionnaires planned to attend the tourney, but for those three weeks, they wasted no thought on it. They would wait until after the wedding to worry about the tourney.

Mother was principally in charge of all the arrangements. This was perhaps the only occasion where Father virtually relinquished total control of the keep to his lady wife. After how hard Mother had worked to prepare Gregor's wedding to Dacey at Moat Cailin, Ellyn could understand and respect Father's decision to do so.

Since Mother was the one primarily responsible for the wedding, she ensured that everything got done, and that everyone in the keep pitched in. Gregor handled security preparations. Dacey busied herself with guest accommodations. Ellaria Sand sent out invitations. Father assumed the position at the front of the receiving line. Smalljon Umber was made head of catering (how that happened, no one knew, but it turned out to be a good choice). Victarion Greyjoy selected the drinks. Allard Seaworth organized the gifts. Gerion Lannister monitored the funds.

Oberyn Martell was able to provide the cloak of his house. Obara and Nymeria were a little suspicious that he just "happened" to have the cloak with him. He innocently claimed that he believed in being prepared. His daughters and Ellyn doubted that, but even so, Obara was grateful to have the cloak.

Ellyn helped out when and where she could. Her mother mainly put her on the decoration committee. Like at Gregor and Dacey's wedding, the adornments of this one were relatively modest. There were plenty of banners that displayed the sigils of House Nymeros Martell and both branches of House Clegane. Apart from that, decoration were limited to some tapestries and various wall-hangings.

Mother also took it upon herself to stitch together a dress for Obara. Dacey's wedding gown had been made of silks and laces from the Free Cities. They had no such expensive and exotic materials at Clegane's Keep, but Lady Daliah Clegane was able to make do with what they had.

Ellyn was there when Obara was being fitted for her bridal gown, as well as when she put it on for the first time. At first glance, Obara looked as though she detested the garment. Then again, after living with the former Sand Snake for nearly two years, Ellyn had surmised that she hated dresses in general. When Mother saw the look of disgust on Obara's face, she fretted that she had done something terribly wrong.

Obara's disgust hastily vanished, and she assured Mother that the gown was gorgeous. She reminded her that she had an aversion to all formalwear. However, she could tolerate this dress. While looking beautiful had never been one of her foremost concerns, she wanted to at least look beautiful for her wedding.

Mother became visibly relieved and elated when Obara admitted that she loved her bridal gown.

Nymeria had also been in the room when her sister first tried the dress, and she had teased her relentlessly for it. Obara attempted to disregard her younger sister's playful jeering, but after a while, it just flat-out annoyed her. Luckily, she got her vengeance when she told Nymeria "You could be in this same position one day. And when that happens... be afraid, little sister."

Ellyn all but guffawed at the subsequent expression that struck Nymeria's face. It was a mixture of realization and what appeared to be sheer terror. Those emotions could have been feigned, but even if they were, Ellyn could not resist the urge to snicker. Soon after, Obara joined the Clegane daughter in laughter. After a while, so did Nymeria. Then all was well between the two sisters once more. For the time being, of course.

The day before the wedding, nearly all the guests who had been invited to the wedding had sent a response. The majority of them were from the Westerlands, so they were able to attend.

That very night, Clegane's Keep received a response from a most unexpected invitee. It was from Lord Tywin Lannister himself.

Ellyn recalled reading somewhere that in all nine regions of Westeros, whenever a marriage was held by a house, it was traditional for the liege lord of that house's respective region to be invited to attend. Lord Tytos Lannister had attended nearly every wedding that occurred in the Westerlands during his reign. His eldest son was not so outgoing. He rarely went to any of his bannermen's weddings. Nonetheless, every time one of his vassals held a marriage, an invitation was sent to the lord of Casterly Rock as an act of courtesy.

This was one of the rare instances when he decided to accept the offer.

When word of this spread around the Keep, most of the people – including Father and Mother – were surprised, but thrilled. However, Ellyn noticed that everyone else was also surprised, but instead of being thrilled, they were skeptical.

Gregor and Dacey fell into the latter group. From what Ellyn could tell, they suspected Lord Tywin had an ulterior motive. She distinctly remembered overhearing a brief exchange of dialogue between the two of them.

"What do you suppose he's planning, my lord?" Dacey Mormont queried.

"I don't know, Dacey," Gregor admitted, "But I do not believe for a moment he is coming only to sample House Clegane's hospitality. He must have his own intentions for attending the wedding."

"Then we must be cautious whilst he's here," she proposed.
"We must be cautious always," he debated, "This is just one situation where we must be even more cautious than usual."

Ellyn ran off after that. She would have lingered to hear more, but she did not wish to be caught eavesdropping on her brother and his wife.

She found herself agreeing with their sentiment, however. It was possible that Lord Tywin actually did have something planned. Something unforeseen and unwanted. But she chose to push that to the back of her mind. Tomorrow was supposed to be a joyful event. It would do no good if anyone was distracted by what Lord Tywin might do when he arrived.

The next morning, the residents of Clegane's Keep awoke earlier than usual. They broke their fast even before the Sun rose. By the time the first rays of sunshine appeared over the eastern horizon, everyone was in the process of finishing up the final preparations for the ceremony.

The guests started to arrive very early in the day. Many of them were friends and acquaintances of Father and Mother, such as Stafford Lannister and Myranda Lefford, Damion Lannister and Shiera Crakehall, Darlessa Marbrand, and Gawen Westerling and Sybell Spicer.

When the Westerlings showed up, Gregor had gone out of his way to avoid making any form of contact with them. He was subtle in his evasion, but Ellyn was able to detect his distaste. She had a talent for noticing things that most others disregarded or thought unimportant.

For instance, she was aware of Gregor's profound disdain for House Westerling. She had realized that facet of his at a very young age. But she did not try to discuss it with him, as he never discussed it with anyone else. Even so, his deep-seated, unexplained hatred of one of the smallest houses in the Westerlands caught her interest. Later in life, she had discovered he held a similar loathing towards House Frey, House Bolton, House Whitehill, and several of the Ironborn houses. This was the same brother of hers who preached universal tolerance everywhere he went, yet he secretly abhorred quite a few individuals in Westeros.

There were several other occasions when Ellyn's shrewd observance served as a valuable asset. One such example was when Gregor moved to the North. Even before he broke the news to his family, Ellyn had surmised that something both good and bad would happen. A similar scenario had transpired when Sandor returned with a horde of wealth and a lengthy scar across his face. In that instance, she had conclude that something good and bad had already taken place. For all her life, Ellyn had been able to determine if she would receive good or bad news before she was even given it.

No one was aware of just how perceptive Ellyn Clegane truly was. That was because she had never told any other human being about it, and she had always done a fine job of keeping it a secret. She never shared the knowledge of her gift with anyone because she felt it made her special, and there was a possibility that it could get her in trouble. Most of all… she was not quite as sociable as her brothers.

Despite being one of the tallest and assertive females of her generation, Ellyn Clegane was more than a little shy. She preferred the company of her family and brothers to the company of other girls her age. Her bonding time with Obara Martell had made her less reluctant to socialize, but she still did not go out of her way to make friends.

But that did not mean she was without ambition or empathy.

That was the most unique aspect about Ellyn Clegane; there was something of a peculiar contradiction about her. While she never troubled herself with making friends, she had an internal desire to positively impact those around her. In that (as well as height and strength), she was most similar to her brothers.

The difference was that their brothers already had made such an impression.

Gregor had been a recognized warrior throughout all of Westeros for the past five years (and in the Westerlands for even longer), and Sandor had been pivotal in ending the country's last war. Now both men were beloved and praised by the people of the Seven Kingdoms.

Meanwhile, Ellyn was known by few, and those that did know her only thought of her as the younger sister of the Mountain and the Hound.

Ellyn was content if no one actually knew her name. Due to her shy nature, she had never craved attention. Even so, she felt queerly inefficient, like she could be doing something noteworthy or for the good of others. Recently, her selfless yearning had led her to worry that she would never accomplish anything of the sort. Her brothers' celebrated deeds only intensified her insecurities.

That was the reason for Ellyn's outburst in the nursery three days earlier. On top of the knowledge that she had contributed practically nothing in comparison to Gregor and Sandor, the idea that she was actually a chore to others instead of a helpful person made her feel downright useless. She knew now that her mother had not meant to hurt her feelings, and she had forgiven her for implying that. Even so, Ellyn wondered constantly if she would ever be capable of greatness like her brothers.

The wedding preparations had helped to distract her from that envy. For the last three weeks, she had remained focused on making certain the ceremony and the feast were ready in every way possible. She had rarely given any thought to how she had done so little compared to her brothers.

By now, she had decided that her anxieties were unfounded, needless, and silly. If she was meant to do good things, then in time, she would. There was no need for her to wish a challenge would come her way before she was actually ready to face it.

Besides, today Sandor is the one facing a challenge

From what Ellyn had seen, marriage suited Gregor very well. It remained to be seen if it would do the same for Sandor. But from what she knew of his betrothed, Ellyn was convinced that he and Obara would make a wonderful couple.

In the late afternoon, the grand event took place at last.

The sept of Clegane's Keep was one of the many addendums that had been made to the keep in the past five years. It was about a quarter of the size of the Great Sept of Baelor in King's Landing; it could hold around two hundred individuals.

That many people had gathered there for the ceremony. The first row on the right was composed of the groom's family, meaning Ellyn, Mother, Father, Gregor, Dacey, and Rickard. The first row on the left was composed of the bride's family, meaning Nymeria, Ellaria, Elia, and Obella.

At the front of the sept, the keep's septon – a thin man named Ames – stood waiting with two other men. On his right stood the father of the bride, Oberyn Martell, clad in his traditional royal Dornish robes. On his left stood the groom, Sandor Clegane.

Sandor wore a leather doublet over a clean tunic, as well as a pair of ceremonial boots and a pair of starched trousers. The cloak of House Clegane of Clegane's Keep was draped over his shoulders.
His hair was combed back and tied in a small ponytail. From where he stood, the burnt half of his face was invisible to all but the prince and the septon. All the same, he no longer attempted to hide his burn. Instead, he displayed it shamelessly.

Before too long, the bride appeared. All eyes were on her as she gracefully went down the aisle.

All those who knew Obara – which included Ellyn – would normally have thought the sight of the spear-wielding former bastard in an elaborate gown as a comical one. But even the Clegane daughter had to admit that in this dress, she was absolutely stunning. Around her shoulders, she wore the cloak of her father's house: a golden spear impaling a red sun on an orange field.

Soon Obara Martell reached the front of the sept. There Prince Oberyn kissed her on both cheeks and carefully removed the orange cloak from her shoulders. With little prompting from Septon Ames, Obara turned her back to her intended, and he took his cloak of three dogs on a yellow off and meticulously placed it around hers.

Everything gradually fell into place after that. Septon Ames' traditional speech of unity and love, the tying of yellow and orange motley ribbon around the groom and bride's interconnected hands, the septon's blessing, and Sandor and Obara's vows to each other. It was a very similar routine to Gregor's wedding, only there was no mention of the Old Gods or anything pertaining to their worship.

Finally, they got to the part where the union was officially sanctioned. That was when Sandor placed both his hands on Obara's cheeks, announced "With this kiss, I pledge my love," and firmly pressed his lips against hers. The kiss was meant to be a short one, but Obara kept it going for nearly an entire minute. Sandor did not resist her (or he was unable to).

Apparently, the Dornish really have perfected the art of kissing.

There was applause and cheering; plenty of both. It seemed to last hours. At least it did to Ellyn. But eventually it did end, and after that came the festivities.

Like Gregor and Dacey's wedding, the feast for Sandor and Obara's took place outside their holdfast. The fields east of Clegane's Keep were more crowded than any part of the Royal Army's camp. The dais and trestle tables covered an area of approximately 10,000 square feet, and there was at least one person per every ten square feet. The Hound's wedding may not have been as big a deal to some as his brother's, but it had more than twice as many guests as the Mountain's.

Several officers and prominent men-at-arms of the Royal Army were in attendance. Ellyn's mother's father, Lord Lewys Lidden, was there with her aunts and uncles. And, as foretold, Tywin Lannister himself had come.

Lord Tywin had not been at the ceremony. He had waited until after the words were said to make his appearance.

His sudden arrival from seemingly nowhere had taken many by surprise. But Father was able to properly welcome the lion lord before his house lost face.

Out of respect, Lord Tywin was offered the seat of honor on the dais, which the Lord of Casterly Rock declined, claiming it belonged to Sandor and his new wife. However, he asked to give an announcement at the beginning and the end of the feast. No one dared to deny him that request. Apart from that, it was a reasonable one.

It was here that Ellyn began to share her eldest brother and sister-by-law's belief that Tywin Lannister may have been there for a sinister purpose. He was being uncharacteristically benign to the other guests, many of which were his own bannermen. Ellyn had never actually met Tywin Lannister before that day, but she knew enough from Sandor to know that such behavior was not typical of him.

After the Cleganes and the Martells were seated on the dais, Lord Tywin was given a spot on it, as well. The lion lord called for wine, and after his goblet was filled, he stood up tall and straight. He raised his goblet and made his first announcement: "As you are undoubtedly aware, there are two branches of House Clegane. The branch in the North is considerably younger, but from the moment of its creation, it has been run by a lord. Whereas this branch is still led by a landed knight. Not long ago, House Clegane of Clegane's Keep had done nothing of worthy repute. But in time since the rebellion of our good King Robert, it has grown in power and influence. Its rate of growth is almost unprecedented, and one could debate it would merit some form of reward. The king and I have deliberated on this issue, and we have made a decision."

Lord Tywin kept holding his goblet in his right hand. With his left, he produced a scroll marked with the seal of House Lannister. He continued with "For everything the Westerlander branch of House Clegane has accomplished in the last five years – with especial emphasis on its achievements in the Ironborn rebellion – I decree that it has earned the right to be recognized as a noble house. Therefore, this very moment, effective immediately, I raise House Clegane of Clegane's Keep to lordly status."

Tywin Lannister gestured for the nearest servant to take the scroll and deliver it to Father. Between that moment and the moment when the scroll reached Father's hands, there was absolute silence. Once Father had the scroll, he gradually stood up, turned to face his liege lord, and proclaimed delightedly "I accept your declaration, my lord."

Lord Tywin then raised two toasts. The first was to Tarrence Clegane, lord of Clegane's Keep. The second was to the union between his heir, Sandor "The Hound" Clegane and Obara Martell, the future lord and lady of the keep. Ten thousands goblets were subsequently drained twice.

The first of the feast's three planned courses was served. It consisted mostly of Westerlander appetizers, but there were a number of Northern and Dornish hors d'oeuvres, as well. Smalljon Umber had evidently done his research.

While the first course ended, a troupe of mummers came out and did a dramatic reenactment of Greyjoy's Rebellion. All of the actors and actresses playing the soldiers of the royalist army were made to appear attractive and refined. On the other hand, most of the actors playing the Ironborn were made to look savage and unruly. But one of them – who was obviously meant to be Victarion – was handsome and civilized. By the end of the performance, he was the only actor playing an Ironborn left standing. Every other one was on the ground or on his knee.

The thespians earned a long wave of applause for their performance. Even Victarion was intrigued by the quality and attention to detail of the reenactment.

The mummers' entertainment was soon followed by the second and main course. This one had a much more diverse selection of food than the first course. Once again, Smalljon earned a pair amount of praise for his work.

Music began to play halfway during that course. By the end of the course, many couples where out on the space reserved for the dance floor. Among them were Father and Mother, Gregor and Dacey, and Sandor and Obara.

Ellyn would have been content to remain seated until the dancing ended. But someone else had Near the start of the dancing, Tywin Lannister approached Ellyn and asked for a dance. Ellyn was taken aback, but she decided to oblige her liege lord. So she took his hand and allowed him to escort her off the dais to the ground below.

Unsurprisingly, Ellyn garnered a number of stares when she and the lion lord were together on the dance floor. This attention was unwanted, but Ellyn managed to ignore it.

To her astonishment, Lord Tywin was a rather fine dancer. She would have thought his movements would be as stiff as his mannerisms. But that was not so. He was very graceful. Ellyn was only thirteen, but given her family's size, she stood only six few inches shorter than Tywin Lannister. Their relative evenness in height made them function better as partners.

While they were on the dance floor, Ellyn watched Lord Tywin closely. She was now more certain than ever that he had something planned. Whatever it was, she was determined to at least have an inkling of it. In order for that to work, she would have to remain as observant as possible.

However, Lord Tywin did nothing menacing or out-of-the-ordinary. All he did was ask her some questions about herself, her family, and her interests. The questions appeared harmless, so Ellyn answered them as best she could. Although she tried to be totally honest, there were times when she had to bend the truth a little. She never flat-out lied to him, though. She was not that foolish.

Ellyn and Lord Tywin continued their dance until the music finally ended. After that, they and the other participants went back to their seats. Then the third course – the desserts – were brought out.

As she helped herself to a strawberry tart, Ellyn thought back on her encounter with Lord Tywin. By this point, she could all but confirm that Lord Tywin was up to something sinister. He may have been a proper gentlemen when he had his hands on her waist, but she knew a conniver when she saw one.

All the same, she could not guess what the Lord Paramount of the Westerlands was scheming. But she suspected it would not be pleasant.

The dessert course was shorter than the first two. Once it ended and the dishes were cleared away, Tywin rose again and told Father "The wedding and the feast have both been done, and quite well, my lord. But one matter must be attended to before your son's marriage is deemed legitimate in the eyes of the Gods and the law. Shall we commence the bedding?"

Of all the people who might have called for the bedding ceremony, Lord Tywin was far from the top of Ellyn's first guesses. He may have been a strict follower of procedure, but a bedding ceremony seemed too crass for his liking.

All the same, Father had to answer the lion lord's proposition. He gazed over at his son and his new daughter-by-law. The two of them looked to each other, and then they looked back at Father and gave a synchronized nod.

At that, Father looked around the area and declared "Yes, let the bedding begin!"

In response to that, no fewer than a hundred guests got up from their chairs and rushed towards the bride and groom.

The men quickly surrounded Obara, picked her up and carried her back to the keep. On the way, they began to strip her out of her dress. They avoided getting too firsy, as many of them were aware that she could kill them easily.

The women took a little longer with Sandor. He was quite a bit larger than his new wife, and the sight of his deformed face up-close was discouraging to some. However, a number of them found that his strong physique more than compensated for his scar. Once they managed to get him off his feet, they worked together to carry him to the keep, as well. They wasted no time in removing his clothes.

After Obara and Sandor were taken off to be bedded, the atmosphere gradually eased down. It was then that Tywin Lannister made his second announcement. This time, he did not lift his goblet.

Ellyn had no doubt that this was when Lord Tywin would make his true intentions known. But she said nothing; she simply watched the lion lord intently, as did everyone else there."

The Lord of Casterly Rock announced to Father "Now that your son has gone to bed his wife, the future of House Clegane has been guaranteed. I congratulate you on how far you have come, Lord Tarrence."

"You have my gratitude, my lord," Father proclaimed.

Tywin lightly nodded his head, and he went on with: "However, while your house has developed rather finely, there is one aspect it lacks that the other noble houses in the Westerlands do not. That aspect is a direct connection to its Great House. Every other chief Westerlord house has married into House Lannister at least once. Yours has not. In order to solidify your new position, this problem should be remedied as soon as possible."

"How so, my lord?" Father queried.

Tywin gradually leaned forward, placed his hands on the table in front of him, and he declared "I propose a marriage contract between your daughter Ellyn… and my son Tyrion."

For that entire evening, Ellyn had been paying attention to everything and everyone, and she herself had never been the center of attention. But after that last statement, that was not the case in any way. Now, every single eye was concentrated on her… and she paid no mind to anything that went on around her.
Chapter Notes

Note: Okay, so I made in error in judgment on which would be the longest chapter. Oh, well. No harm ever came out of making an update longer than one intended. Then again, considering how long it's taking Martin to publish The Winds of Winter…

Anyway, I hope you guys enjoy this update. Especially since it's been only five days since the last one. But don't get used to that. Last week, I began my final semester of graduate school. Unlike previous semesters, this one is heavily project-based, and it involves a huge amount of group work. As such, my time for writing will be stretched thin, and updates will be a little more spaced-out than they have been. They'll still come, I promise you. But I cannot guarantee that they will be weekly anymore. Just wanted you to be aware of that.

At the very same instant, the bedding ceremony was well underway. By the time the guests carried the bride and groom to the bridal chamber, both of them had been clad in only their smallclothes. Once there, Sandor Clegane and Obara Martell were deposited inside.

After taking a minute to shut and lock the door, Sandor turned his attention to his new wife. Already, she was laying on the bed, striking a lusty pose. She gazed at her husband with what he classified as her "Dornish seductiveness." She wordlessly beckoned him over.

That was enough for the Hound to catch his bone.

The bedding lasted for about three hours. The people standing outside or beneath the chamber could verify that. That was how long the noises could be heard, at any rate. Even so, Sandor did not give a fuck how long the bedding went on for. Time actually seemed to lose meaning when he held Obara in his arms. And when he was inside her.

It was well after midnight when the future lord and lady of Clegane's Keep finally drifted into a deep slumber. It was the most restful night of sleep Sandor had gotten since before the Ironborn attacked Lannisport.

Sometime after midmorning, Sandor awoke rather abruptly to a throbbing sensation originating from his groin. As he sleepily opened his eyes, he gazed downward. When he discovered the source of the disturbance, he smirked.

Obara had her lips wrapped around his manhood. She was sucking vigorously on his morning wood.

What a thing to wake up to.

The former Sand Snake quickly realized her husband was conscious, but she did not relent. Nor did he ask or gesture for her to stop. He just laid his head back down and moaned in arousal. She kept increasing her pace overtime. The harder she sucked, the louder he moaned.

It only took Obara five minutes to bring Sandor to climax. After he hit his peak, she removed her mouth from his cock and swallowed everything it had released. Sandor just smiled and placed his hands behind his head.

Obara wiped her mouth and laid down next to Sandor again. She was on the right side of the bed, so she saw the burned half of his face. That may have bothered some, but Sandor knew Obara was not repulsed by his scar.

She probably never was.

"How was that?" Obara queried.

"The best wake-up call I've ever had," Sandor slyly commented, tracing his hand along her left breast.

"Just as I hoped," Obara impishly remarked, caressing the dry skin of her husband's right cheek, "You know, we could have been doing that long before today. If someone hadn't insisted on waiting…"

"It was more at the insistence of my mother that I abstained," Sandor debated, a wry grin on his face, "In some parts of the world, people actually respect their mothers' wishes."

"If I did that, I wouldn't be here," Obara muttered bluntly.

"I know; you told me," Sandor murmured.

Your father told you to pick between his weapon and your mother's, and you chose the spear over the tears.

That turned out to be the right decision.

Sandor then took his wife's hand and lightly kissed her knuckles. Then he stated "Now that we've been joined, I won't deny you any longer… Princess."

He expected Obara to scowl, groan, withdraw, or feign the act of slapping him. That was what she had done every other time he had addressed her by that title.

Surprisingly, this time, she gave no apparent negative reaction. For a few seconds, she just looked him in the eye with a neutral countenance. Then she gave a small smile and admitted "I think I actually could become accustomed to being called that."

Now that's something I never thought to hear her say.

"Truly?" Sandor asked, thinking he may have misheard her.

Obara nodded her head a bit, and then she expounded "But only by you, and only when we are alone."

"I can accept that," Sandor conceded. He paused and added cheekily "Princess."

She just giggled.

The bedchamber's window was open. It faced the south, but based on how the light flowed in, it had to be around ten o'clock in the morning. More than two hours later than when Sandor and Obara normally awoke.

"We should probably get up and head downstairs," Sandor proposed.
"As you say, my lord," Obara agreed. She and her husband pulled themselves out of bed and proceeded to dress themselves. Although she had worn a gown the night before, Obara did not feel the need to continue wearing that form of apparel. As she slid on her normal pair of leather breeches, she asked Sandor "Are you hungry?"

"Somewhat," the Hound replied as he put his jerkin on over a white tunic, "What about you?"

"Well, I just ate," Obara Clegane wittily told him.

Sandor snickered and stated humorously "Indeed. Are you interested in another 'course'?"

"I certainly wouldn't mind a second helping of what I just had," Obara uttered slyly, wrapping her doublet over her breasts. Her stunning breasts.

"You can have one later," Sandor asserted, fastening his trousers around his waist, "I'd prefer to eat something that I did not make myself."

"Very well," was Obara's simple response.

By that point, the Hound and his princess were both fully clothed. Neither of them had bathed since before their wedding, but other than their activities following the feast, they had done nothing that warranted one. At least, that was their belief.

We can take one later. Maybe together. If so, I could give her that 'second course.'

The moment they stepped outside the bedchamber, they came face-to-face with a brown-haired man. He was Zedric Sarsfield, the man who had replaced Erryk Ruttiger as the castellan of Clegane's Keep.

"Hello, Zedric," the Hound greeted him warmly.

"Good morning, my lord," the castellan bade his master's heir. He looked to Obara, dipped his head, and added in "My lady."

"Zedric," she said in response kingly.

"I assume you wish to break your fast?" Zedric proposed.

"You assume correctly," Sandor affirmed, "We did not keep anyone waiting, I hope."

"As it happens, you did not," Zedric revealed, "Your parents and siblings have already broken their fast."

"So the Main Hall is empty?" Obara asked rhetorically.

"It is," Zedric replied, "And it most likely will remain as such until the midday meal. Today, you will be served the morning meal in your father's solar."

Interesting…

"Why might that be?" Sandor inquired.

"Ser- pardon, Lord Tarrence requested that you both come to his solar as soon as you were up," Zedric Sarsfield elaborated, "He has a matter of precedence to discuss with you."

"So be it," Sandor acknowledged, "Go ahead and have the servants prepare our breakfast. Obara and I will head to the solar."

Zedric nodded, bowed his head, and headed down the corridor.

Sandor and Obara remained at the door of the bedchamber for another minute longer. Obara must have noted the perplexed expression on her husband's face. She murmured in concern "Sandor? Are you alright?"

He hastily turned to her and claimed assuredly "I am fine, Obara. Come; my father awaits us."

To his relief, his wife said nothing; she merely followed Sandor through the holdfast's hallways.

In actuality, Sandor was not entirely truthful when he told his wife that nothing troubled him. He was not exactly anxious about anything, but he was a little troubled by the prospect of breaking his fast in his father's solar. When last he had done so, Gregor had announced that he was leaving Clegane's Keep.

Sandor and his wife soon arrived at the keep's solar, expecting to find Father there.

He was indeed there, but he was not alone. Mother too was there, and so were Gregor, Ellyn, and Dacey. For whatever reason, Ser Gerion Lannister was present, as well. They were seated in six of eight chairs that had been placed around the desk. All of them smiled at Sandor and Obara entered. They both smiled back, but almost straightaway, Sandor could feel that the aura in the room was not wholly a happy one. That struck him as curious.

"Sit down, please," Father beckoned his son and his new daughter-by-law, gesturing to the two empty chairs.

Sandor and Obara promptly took up the two vacant chairs. Once they were settled, the Hound gazed around at the others. Their smiles had faded, replaced by expressions lined with apprehension. He enquired nervously "Is anything amiss?"

"We'll tell you once your food arrives," Mother claimed in assurance.

Her younger son and his wife found that arrangement fair.

Within ten minutes, a pair of servants brought their breakfast. After setting it in front of the Hound and the former Sand Snake, they departed from the solar, making certain to close the door behind them.

As Sandor and Obara began to eat, Gregor leaned forward and asked them "Enjoy last night?"

"Very much," Sandor answered him, chewing on a large piece of bacon

"In many ways," Obara stated wryly, peeling a blood orange.

"Yeah, we heard," Dacey mumbled cockily.

"Good. Then we were doing it right."

Instead of saying that, Sandor chuckled. So did Obara. The former of them gazed as his brother and goodsister, and he contended "We couldn't have been any louder than you two were."

"I'd say not," Ellyn commented as Gregor and Dacey blushed lightly, and Obara chuckled again. After a pause, the Clegane daughter mumbled sullenly "All else aside, you two must've enjoyed last night more than the rest of us did."
Sandor found that statement a little baffling. He asked his sister "How do you mean?"

"That is what we are here to discuss," Father disclosed. He waited for everyone in the room to be silent and give him their attention. Then he explained to Sandor and Obara "After you were taken away for the bedding, Lord Tywin made his second announcement of the evening. Like the first, this one was centered on the future of House Clegane. But unlike the first one, it also involved the potential future of House Lannister."

As Sandor salted and bit into a hardboiled egg, he asked in interest "And just what did he have in mind for the future of our house and his?"

"Something none of us could have foreseen," Gregor revealed ambiguously.

Mother provided some clarification to that remark: "Lord Tywin was keen to point out that our house is now the only noble one in the Westerlands that has never wed into House Lannister. Determined to 'remedy' that problem, as he claimed, he suggested another contract."

"Between whom?" Obara queried, biting into an orange segment and a piece of buttered bread.

It was Ellyn who responded this time. She sighed and pronounced "His son Lord Tyrion… and me."

At that moment, Sandor had been in the midst of taking a swig of ale. Once he heard his sister's reply, he sputtered into his mug, spilling some on the table. He managed to swallow what was in his mouth, but he coughed violently at being forced to down so much liquid at once.

Obara patted him on the back to help him steady his breathing. Once he stopped coughing, he gave her a brief look of appreciation, and then he turned to Ellyn and muttered in astonishment "What?"

"Lord Tywin seems convinced your sister and the Imp would be a good match," Mother apprised him.

Sandor had not reacted as he had because he was disgusted or flabbergasted by Lord Tywin's proposition. He had done so simply because he had not expected it.

Evidently, no one else here did, either.

"How did you respond?" Obara asked the very question that was on her husband's mind.

"I begged some time to consider his offer," Father disclosed, "He 'generously' agreed to grant that favor. By the time the tourney at Lannisport begins, he will want an answer."

"Six bloody days from now?!" Sandor pointed out crossly, "That is hardly enough time to make a decision of this magnitude!"

"Alas, it is all the time we have," Gregor solemnly informed his brother, "We must use it wisely."

"Quite so," Father conceded, "By the time we leave this room, we must have arrived at a decision on whether or not we will go agree to Lord Tywin's offer."

Obara appeared both stunned and slightly angered by that declaration. She heatedly muttered "My lord, you cannot honestly mean to consider delivering your own daughter to that monster."

To her credit, she at least tried to sound respectful. Even so, Sandor and the others were alarmed by her angry remark. Especially when given the apparent meaning of it. He told his wife patiently
"Obara, Tyrion Lannister is many things, but he is definitely not a monster."

"I know, and I apologize for my outburst," Obara calmly said to everyone, not just to Father or her husband, "But you should know that I was not speaking of Lord Tyrion."

It only took a moment for realization to come to Sandor and everyone else there. Mother cautioned her gooddaughter "Obara, you can't say such things. Lord Tywin is not a man to take slights lightly."

"Be that as it may, Lady Daliah, she is correct," Gerion Lannister interjected, "My eldest brother is a monster, and anyone who claims otherwise is a lackwit."

Again, everyone was taken aback by a very eloquent comment. Sandor noted Gregor did not seem to disagree with Gerion's. Neither did Dacey. Of course, the two of them had spent much of the past few years with Ser Gerion in the North. So either they already knew of his feelings towards Lord Tywin, or they shared them.

It could be both, but I'd lean more to the latter.

Sandor had to agree with the three of them. He had been Lord Tywin's squire for the past few years; he had seen him at work. While he himself had been fortunate enough to avoid incurring his liege lord's wrath, he had often stood witness when the lion lord implemented his form of justice. What was regarded as justice at Casterly Rock was often seen as cruelty throughout the rest of Westeros.

But just because Lord Tywin is a monster, I could not say the same of Tyrion. I don't think anyone could.

"So what shall we do?" Sandor queried in genuine interest.

"Gregor recommended that we go over all the possible advantages and disadvantages of accepting or refusing this union," Mother illuminated, "As well as all the… personal factors involved. We all must have some input to contribute. That is why every member of our family is present."

"And Ser Gerion," Obara noted, looking to the blond man.

"It was also Gregor's idea to have Ser Gerion here," Dacey revealed.

Gregor nodded in confirmation and debated "All things considered, he's the only true ally we have from House Lannister."

"Believe me, Gregor," Gerion Lannister pronounced, "After all you've done for this country and its people, and after serving with you, I would choose you over Tywin any day."

Gregor must be honored. By his brother's prideful expression, the Mountain have been quite touched indeed by Gerion's words.

"Alright," Sandor remarked as he and Obara continued eating, "May as well begin our discussion now. Where do we start?"

"Well, let us say we refused the match," Mother conjectured, "Obviously, we'd need to supply a reason."

"We could merely claim we do not think our house worthy of his son," Sandor proposed.
"Tywin would never buy that," Gerion argued, "Given how readily Tarrence accepted his lordship, he would expect him to be similarly thrilled by the prospect of joining House Clegane to House Lannister."

"Furthermore, Lord Tywin hates false modesty," Gregor pointed out, "Almost as much as he hates true modesty."

"Could you claim you've already got a betrothal planned for Ellyn?" Obara suggested.

"That's an even worse idea," Father refuted, "While we have been considering some potential suitors for her, we have not so much as contacted any of them. It would take far too long to even arrange a meeting with one of them, let alone negotiate a marriage contract. Lord Tywin would insist on knowing who we had in mind for Ellyn, and once he realized we were misleading him… I shudder to think what he would do.

"Well, Tywin has no tolerance for liars," Gerion commented.

"What if we say Ellyn is too young?" Dacey contended.

"He would say she will grow, and that the marriage could wait," Gregor disputed, "In fact, he may say that she'll be old enough to wed once she's bled for the first time."

"It happens that I had my first moon's blood last month," Ellyn informed the others.

Sandor was astounded to hear that. Based on their reactions, Gregor, Gerion, Dacey, and Obara were, as well. Mother and Father did not react, which suggested they already knew. The Hound eyed his sister and mumbled "And you did not tell us of this sooner because…?"

"It wasn't really your business," Ellyn proclaimed frankly.

"It is now," Gregor countered. Yes, it is. Girls have been known to marry at younger than thirteen.

"We cannot claim Ellyn does not wish to marry, either," Mother noted, "Lord Tywin would just say marriages are supposed to be done out of duty, not out of desire."

"Then I suppose our only available alternative is to refuse for… the obvious reason," Father disclosed.

Sandor stared at his Father as though he had gone mad. After hearing that last remark, Lord Tarrence may as well have had the sanity of Aerys II.

Gregor shared his shock and disbelief. "You propose we refuse the marriage contract on the grounds that the groom is a dwarf?"

"It's been done before," Mother explicated, "Lord Tywin once offered Tyrion to the second daughter of the Lord of Riverrun. Hoster Tully denounced the offer as an insult."

"In my mind, it was an insult," Gregor irately debated, "But not to Lord Hoster."

Father appeared dumbfounded by that comment. He questioned incredulously "What do you mean by that, Gregor?"

"Have you met Lysa Tully, Father?" Gregor snapped somewhat angrily, "I have, and just being in the same room as her made me uncomfortable and edgy. I wouldn't wish her hand on anyone, including Tyrion Lannister."
"In case you've forgotten, she's the wife of the Hand," Mother needlessly reminded him.

"I know," the Mountain muttered indifferently, "And I deeply respect Lord Arryn for his patience and endurance."

"You could tell him that when he arrives for the tourney," Dacey cockily proposed.

"I've more tact than that," Gregor humorously told his wife.

We're getting a little off-topic here.

"Back to the issue at hand," Gerion Lannister advised the others, as though he had read Sandor's mind, "I am very much against the concept of using the fact that Tyrion's a dwarf to dissuade Tywin."

"So am I," Gregor coincided, "That's probably the worst solution we've thought of so far. Lord Hoster had the privilege to call the match between Tyrion and his daughter an insult, but only because he is the head of another Great House. THIS house, however, is one of his vassals."

"You're right, I suppose," Father admitted, "Lord Tywin would not be pleased if we all but called his son a freak. Especially so soon after raising us to lordly status. He would call us 'ungrateful.'"

"You might say he's backed us into a corner," Dacey contended, "In recent years, both branches of House Clegane have been recognized throughout the country for their tolerance of everyone. People believe we are accepting of all. But if we refuse Lord Tyrion merely because he is a dwarf… our image would be seriously damaged. People would call us hypocrites and condemn us for being so shallow."

Sandor was impressed with Dacey's argument. Mainly since everything she said was the truth.

"Apart from that…" Gregor began tentatively. He gazed around the solar, and he continued with "In the long run, are there really any benefits to turning down Lord Tywin? I mean, even if he agreed with our refusal, imagine what the other Westerlords would think. The lesser houses might be led to believe we thought ourselves too good for House Lannister, and – by extension – for them, too. The noble houses might think the same."

"Well, that's their problem," Sandor argued. By now, he and Obara had cleaned their plates.

"It's also ours, if no one else in the Westerlands will have Ellyn because of it," Gregor contended.

"Couldn't I just marry outside the Westerlands?" Ellyn proposed, looking back and forth between her brothers, "Both of you did, after all."

No denying that.

"And just who from the other Kingdoms would you see yourself with?" Gregor inquired.

When Ellyn was unable to give a response, the Mountain smirked and stated "Then let's focus on the local prospective match that has been offered."

"No matter how we do it, refusing Tywin seems to yield bad results," Obara perceived, "Perhaps there is a way to turn him down discreetly and peacefully. If so, it may come to us later. But until then… maybe we should actually give the other approach some thought."

That's surprising, coming from the one who wanted to protect Ellyn from the 'monster' at Casterly Rock.

Despite what he thought, Sandor was not averse to this proposal. Neither were Gregor, Obara, or Dacey. Father and Mother appeared more than a little skeptical and unwilling. As for Ellyn… she was practically unreadable.

"Alright, let's discuss the possibility of accepting Lord Tywin's offer," Mother conceded, "Where would that bring us?"

"Well, for starters, you'd be marrying into the wealthiest house in the Westerlands," Dacey pointed out, "Perhaps even the wealthiest house in the country. That by itself is a benefit."

"That may have been a compelling enough reason five years ago," Father disputed, "But money is no longer a concern of ours. Particularly after what Sandor brought back from the Ironborn rebellion."

True that. Maybe someday it'll be Lord Tywin who wishes to borrow from us, not the other way around.

"Still, House Lannister has more to offer than wealth," Obara notified the others, mainly her sister-by-law, "Tyrion is by all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms Lord Tywin's his heir. Imagine what influence you'd have as Lady of the Rock."

"That sounds appealing," Ellyn admitted, "But it would come with a lot of risks. I mean, remember what happened to the last Ellyn Lannister and her family?"

"Of course we do, sweetling," Mother asserted, "Actually, that could be a sign, seeing as the last Lady Ellyn Lannister did not meet a pleasant end."

Sandor had heard this story many times before. Tytos Lannister had had an elder brother, Tion Lannister, who had wed Lady Ellyn Reyne of Castamere. Lord Tion had died childless, leaving the title of lordship to Tytos. Nevertheless, his widow Lady Ellyn had made a daring and foolish attempt to hold on to her power as Lady of Casterly Rock.

And we all know how that ended. The Rains of Castamere were not just a couple of light showers.

"All you have in common with Ellyn Reyne is her given name," Father informed his daughter, placing his left hand – the unstable one – on his daughter's shoulder, "You were not named after her. So there is no reason to believe you'd share her fate."

"We would never let that happen to you," Gregor assured his sister.

"I know you wouldn't," Ellyn pronounced, placing her hands on her lap, "But that aside… this seems too much a burden to cope with. I mean, I didn't ask to be Lady of Casterly Rock. I don't want to be Lady of Casterly Rock."

"In all probability, you won't be," Gerion apprised her.

Sandor looked to the blonde and asked in perplexity "How so, Ser Gerion?"

Gerion Lannister told the seven Cleganes "Tywin has no intention of passing the Rock to Tyrion. He is hoping that Jaime will be released from his vows to the Kingsguard, or that he will find another wife who will give him another son. If neither scenario transpires, he is content to pass lordship on to our brother Kevan, who would then give it to our nephew Lancel."
"What possible reason would he have for that?" Father inquired, astounded.

It was Gregor who answered: "Lady Joanna Lannister, Tyrion's mother and Tywin's wife, died in childbirth. For that, his father has never forgiven him. Neither has his sister, the Queen."

“Yes, Lady Joanna died birthing a dwarf, whereas our mother delivered three babes who were all twice as large, and she survived in perfect health. That just shows which the stronger bloodline is."

“So, Lord Tarrence, Lady Daliah, I hope you weren't expecting your daughter to be the wife of the future lord of Casterly Rock," Gerion commented straightforwardly.

"The thought was tempting." Mother professed, "But at the end of the day, it may be better if Ellyn married a member of House Lannister besides its heir."

"I agree," Father proclaimed, "We are still a relatively young house, and we were only just granted lordly status last night. If a member of our family was to wed the Westerlands' next Lord Paramount so soon after… the older noble houses – and the lesser houses which have yet to wed into House Lannister – would almost certainly come to resent us."

"And the last thing we need is the ire of the other Westerlords," Obara surmised.

"Exactly," Gregor concurred, "This could put us in an ideal position."

"In terms of prestige and overall standing, I agree," Mother uttered plainly, "But we have yet to discuss Lord Tyrion himself."

"Discuss him how, Mother?" Gregor inquired.

"Think on this, Gregor," Lady Daliah Clegane beseeched her firstborn, "If we accept, we'd be establishing a contract between Ellyn and a man who is at most three-quarters her height. That by itself is disconcerting. But that is not Tyrion's sole defect. I… I have heard he is hideous. His face alone is a horror to behold."

Sandor grimaced at that. He leaned forward and barked "Have you looked at my face recently, Mother?"

Mother went pale in her own face. She hastily tried to retract her last statement. "No, no, Sandor! That's not what I meant-"

"Then what did you mean?!" Sandor sharply retorted, "Tell me."

Daliah Clegane was at a loss for words. She had not seen Sandor that angry in a very long time. He knew she had not meant to offend him, but he was disappointed in her for making such a shallow observation.

Ultimately, Mother lowered her head and mumbled "I'm sorry. I did not mean to imply I was disgusted by you or Lord Tyrion."

"You've done nothing to warrant forgiveness, Mother," Sandor asserted, "I won't deny that Tyrion is ugly. Neither will he. He is not ashamed of being a dwarf. Instead, he's embraced it. Just as I have embraced my scar."

"That's rather mature of you both," Father contended approvingly.

I'd call it optimistic.
"I don't care if Lord Tyrion's attractive, and neither should any of you," Ellyn drily murmured, "I just want to know what kind of man he is."

"I could tell you plenty on that, dear sister," Sandor told her, smirking.

"So could I," Ser Gerion claimed.

"And I, as well," Gregor put in.

For the next hour, much of the conversation was controlled by the two Clegane brothers and the Lannister knight. They spent most of that time divulging what they knew of Tyrion Lannister. Gregor and Gerion both knew a fair deal of the Imp's early life, but Sandor was the one who knew the most about his post-childhood years.

Sandor and Tyrion had become fast friends during the former's time at Casterly Rock. He told his family and Ser Gerion all about their experiences together.

Sandor's visits to the Rock had been frequent and mostly work-related, but he and Tyrion always found some time to mingle with each other. In the Hound's mind, Tyrion was almost nothing like his father. He was just as intelligent as his father, if not more so, but Tyrion held none of Lord Tywin's ruthlessness and utter disregard for ethics.

Indeed, beneath that gruesome façade and mismatched physique, there was a compassionate, decent young man of unrivaled wits, tremendous cunning, and commendable chivalry. He would never be a warrior like his elder brother, but not all men were destined to wield a sword.

Sandor told his family everything about his time spent with Tyrion, including a certain incident that occurred a few years back.

A number of months before Gregor and Dacey wed, Ser Jaime Lannister had been given leave to return home for a few weeks. He had spent much of his furlough with Sandor and Tyrion. On one particular evening, the three of us had been riding on the crossroads when they encountered a young woman being pursued by a group of would-be rapists. The three of them had rushed to her defense. While Tyrion gave the girl his cloak to cover herself, Sandor and Jaime each managed to kill one of the assailants before the others fled.

Jaime had been determined not to let a crime so close to Casterly Rock go unpunished. So he had chased after the remaining attackers. Sandor would have joined, but the Kingslayer had ordered him to escort Tyrion and the girl to safety.

They ended up taking shelter in a nearby inn. Sandor had mostly kept to himself, but he had observed the chemistry building between Tyrion and the girl, whose name turned out to be Tysha.

Tyrion ended up bedding her that very night. That was the first time he ever laid with a woman. Additionally, the women had done so willingly.

The following morning, Tyrion had mentioned to Sandor that he was already scheming to marry Tysha in secrecy.

Sandor made an effort to talk him out of that. While he did not hold any ill will towards Tysha, he had pointed out that she was merely a common girl, whereas he was a Lannister of the Rock. Even if they were to wed in secrecy, Lord Tywin would eventually find out. And there was no telling what he would do to either of them then (or to Sandor himself for allowing it to happen).

Initially, Tyrion had been hesitant to heed Sandor's words, but before long, they ended up sobering him. He decided he would not wed Tysha, but for her safety (and his reassurance), he would give her asylum within Casterly Rock.

He had gotten Tysha a job in the laundry as a washerwoman. She received fair pay for her services, and occasionally, Tyrion visited her privately. Overtime, their encounters became more and more infrequent. As far as Sandor can tell, Tyrion had not made any form of contact with Tysha in nearly a year. But she still lived within the Rock, and neither Tywin nor Jaime had been made aware of his relationship with her.

When Sandor was done recounting this episode, Father told him admiringly "You made the right decision, Sandor. If would say that, even if Lord Tywin had not made his offer last night."

"So far, Lord Tyrion does indeed sound to be a respectable man," Mother perceived, "And if an ordinary woman could come to love him, there could very well be a chance that Ellyn might, as well."

"It is possible," Obara conceded, "But even with all of this accounted for, there is one detail about this matter that perturbs me."

"What might that be?" Sandor questioned his wife.

"Lord Tywin's real reason for wanting this contract to happen," Obara explicated, "I do not believe for an instant that the sole purpose for the match is that he wishes for each noble house in the Westerlands to be connected to his own house. He must have another motive."

"That is what we believe, too," Dacey revealed.

"By 'we,' you mean...?" Ellyn inquired.

"Gregor, Gerion, and myself," Dacey elaborated.

"We spent the better part of an hour going over this topic last night," Gerion pronounced, "By the end of our discussion, we arrived at the same conclusion for Tywin's true reason for proposing the match."

"Go on," Father bade them.

Gregor sat up in his chair, leaned forward, and declared "We believe he intends to use Ellyn as a hostage."

That brought an interval of unpleasant silence to the room.

Why in the Seven Hells did he not mention this sooner? Perhaps this should have been addressed at the start of this conversation.

"Why?" Sandor uttered quietly.

"Ever since the fiasco with Amory Lorch, Lord Tywin and I have not gotten along," Gregor explained, "That was why he forced me out of the Westerlands in the first place. Even today, he still sees me as a threat to his authority. Luckily, now that I am sworn to Lord Eddard, he knows he cannot touch me. You, however, are still his subjects."

"As such, we believe Tywin is convinced that having one of you close will keep Gregor inline," Dacey went on for her husband.
A thought occurred to Sandor "So, is that why he made me his squire?"

"It more than likely was the reason," Gerion admitted, "But even if it was, you should know that Tywin does not tolerate incompetence in his ranks. So even if you were there as a hostage, he must have appreciated your skills as a squire."

That does bring me some comfort. I never thought for a moment that Lord Tywin was giving me special treatment by making me his squire. But it's reassuring to know that he did not just see me as a head he may have separated from its shoulders.

"Of course, now that Sandor is a married man, he can no longer serve as Tywin's squire," Gerion professed, "So he'll need someone else from this family to play the part of hostage."

"In other words, me," Ellyn realized.

Gregor, Dacey, and Gerion gravely nodded in confirmation.

"Unlike Sandor, Ellyn would be bound to the Rock once she and Tyrion wed," Father noted.

"But after they married, Ellyn would be Lord Tywin's daughter-by-law," Mother pointed out, "Surely even he would do nothing to harm his own blood."

"Alas, Tywin does not hold the same reverence for kinship as others," Gerion disclosed, "He would not hesitate to kill Ellyn if either branch of House Clegane did something to severely displease him."

"Worse yet, he knows we, on the other hand, do respect kinship," Gregor proclaimed, "So we would be obligated to make no move against him, for fear of angering the Gods."

"Why would you move against him?" Father queried in interest.

"I do not know, Father," Gregor claimly, "I am merely considering all possible situations. Even so, based on our discussion thus far, it appears the best way to resolve this predicament is if we agree to Lord Tywin's proposal. And that could prove just as bad as refusing him would."

Several of the others murmured in agreement. Sandor then tapped his mug on the desk to get everyone's attention. Once he had it, he stated "There is one thing you all seem to be neglecting: Ellyn's opinion. She's the one who will be most affected by the outcome of this meeting, after all."

"He's absolutely right," Obara agreed with her husband.

"Yes, he is," Father concurred. He turned to his daughter and told her firmly "Ellyn, despite everything we have talked on, the final choice should be yours. What answer would you prefer to give to Lord Tywin's proposal?"

Every other person in the room locked their eyes on Ellyn, as well. She had never yearned to be certain of attention, but this was one scenario when she had to be.

She sat in complete quietness for five minutes, contemplating her options. Evidently, she wished to be thorough in her considerations.

Ultimately, she rose from her chair and announced "From what's been said, we would take a risk regardless of whether we accept or refuse. At least if we accepted, we'd appease Lord Tywin for a time. Sandor, Gregor, and Gerion all seem to agree that Lord Tyrion is a good man. The fact that he is a dwarf does not bother me, nor does the fact that his father plans to remove him from their family's line of succession. So perhaps a contract between him and myself might actually work out well. Nonetheless… I'd like to meet Lord Tyrion just once before I decide."

"I can arrange that," Gregor informed her, "Tyrion is supposed to be at the tourney. You can talk with him there."

Ellyn nodded in acknowledgment, and she declared "After I have spoken with him, I'll make my decision."

Everyone there found that an acceptable arrangement. No lord would ever deny his potential daughter-by-law the request to meet his son before they were joined. Even Lord Tywin would grant her that opportunity.

Soon after this, the meeting ended, and everyone departed from the solar.

After he exited, Sandor remained at the door. He beckoned for Obara to go on without him; he would catch up in a minute.

Ellyn was the last one to leave. Sandor stopped her and asked to speak with her privately.

"What do you need, San?" she asked her brother in interest.

"I just wished to tell you that I admire what you are doing, Ell," the Hound told her, "You're doing something that most other highborn girls wouldn't even consider doing. Moreover, you're willingly putting yourself in danger."

Ellyn just shrugged and debated "You and Gregor honor our House in your ways; I honor it in mine,"

"What amazes me is how fearless you're being about all this," Sandor thought aloud.

"I am not afraid to risk my life for the good of my family," Ellyn candidly informed her brother. She then adapted a wicked smile and muttered "And even if Lord Tywin intends to use me as a hostage, being at the Rock would produce an advantage or two for us, as well. For all you know, we just might be able to turn Lord Tywin's plot against him."

Sandor was initially stunned by that proclamation, but then he saw the truth in it. Now it was his turn to grin. Right there, in that very moment, he realized his sister had grown up.

She's not a girl any longer. No; a woman stands before me.

…

Thousands of camps, hundreds of campfires, and dozens of pavilions composed the massive camp of the Royal Army. However, a considerable portion of the camp was currently deserted.

Willas Tyrell noticed that as he came down the hills from the south. He rode at the head of his party astride his brown courser.

His younger brother Garlan rode beside him on his red garron. He squinted at the camp in the distance, and, noting the significant number of missing individuals, said inquisitively "Where is everyone?"

"Most likely at Lannisport," the heir to Highgarden speculated. Where else would they be?

"No, they would not start without us," Garlan firmly debated. After a pause, his conviction faltered a bit, and he looked to his elder brother and asked "Would they?"

Willas had to keep himself from snickering.

"The tourney has already begun, but the main events are not scheduled to take place for a few more days, my lords," a stout voice muttered from behind.

Willas peered over his shoulder to gaze at Mathis Rowan, Lord of Goldengrove. Lord Mathis had been the last of their father's bannermen to merge his company to theirs. Since Goldengrove was the only holdfast in the Reach that stood directly between Highgarden and Lannisport, House Rowan had been given special permission to wait until the other Reachmen arrived at his home to join up with them. Every other present lord had been ordered to go straight to Highgarden instead.

Not long after leaving Goldengrover, Willas found himself wishing that Lord Mathis had been with them from the beginning. He was quite pleasant to be around, and he was a great conversationalist. By contrast, the days before had been rather dull. He had mostly had Florents and Fossoways for company, and they had proved to be a tiresome lot.

If only Grandmother Olenna could come. She'd definitely liven up that crowd.

Fortunately, Lord Mathis had accomplished that on his own.

The Hightowers had gone ahead and travelled from Oldtown to Lannisport by sea. Willas could at least look forward to seeing his aunts, uncles, and grandfather when he arrived there. That would not be long, given how close Casterly Rock seemed in the distance.

"Hey, Willas, aren't they holding the knighting ceremony today?" Garlan queried in interest.

"I believe so," Willas replied, getting out a piece of paper from his vest. It contained a copy of the planned agenda for the tourney. He had received it alongside the invitation to the tourney at Highgarden. It was concise, but very specific. After looking over it, he revealed "Yes, it is scheduled for midday."

"If we hurry, we might get there in time to witness it," Garlan proposed eagerly.

Willas scoffed at his younger brother's enthusiasm. As he tucked the agenda back into his vest, he remarked "We'll get there soon enough, Garlan. It won't do us any good to rush the convoy."

"Yes, I suppose you're right," Garlan conceded, albeit a little grudgingly, "Oh, well. Hopefully we'll arrive in time to see the last of the knightings."

"I'm certain we will," Willas claimed assuredly.

Truthfully, he himself would have preferred to watch the whole of the knighting ceremony, as well. But his company had been travelling for days with just enough time in-between rides to adequately eat and rest. He did not wish to chance overexerting his father's vassals before they even reached their destination.

That would be irresponsible for the future liege lord of the Reach.

A moment later, Lord Mathis appeared at Willas' other side. "A word, my lord?"

Willas Tyrell promptly turned to the head of House Rowan. "Yes, Lord Mathis?"

"If you wish to get to Lannisport sooner, you have the means to make such happen," the Lord of Goldengrove notified him, "Simply given the command, and the convoy will quicken its pace to your liking."

Willas scoffed at that. "I appreciate your advice, but I am not Lord Paramount of the Reach yet, my lord."

"Even so, there is no harm in reasserting your position," Mathis Rowan contended. As he took ahold of his horse's reins and returned to his place behind Willas, he added in "Your choice, my lord."

Willas turned back to his front and thought on Lord Mathis' counsel. Out of the corner of his eye, he spotted Garlan watching him intently. Clearly, his brother – a plump yet fierce and levelheaded boy of twelve – was hoping him to follow that proposal.

After a minute of contemplation, Willas looked back at the Lord of Goldengrove and told him "Pass the word down the column. We shall go from a hard trot to a soft gallop."

"As you command, my lord," Mathis Rowan avowed.

As Lord Mathis went to call out Willas' command along the Reachmen's ranks, Willas remained focused on the lands in front of him. He gradually increased his horse's step until it was just barely starting to run. Garlan increased the pace of his own mount to match his brother's.

There were times when Willas Tyrell was truly amazed at just how much authority his voice carried. With one word, hundreds – no, thousands – of grown men, many of them hardened by battle and winter, would hasten to obey the order of a boy who had only recently seen his thirteenth nameday. What intrigued him even more was that the Reachmen responded even better to his command than they did to his lord father's.

But such was the way of the world. He was the firstborn son of the head of a Great House. Thus, he was expected to rule that house and all the other houses in the region after his sire passed on.

Some future heirs often wondered if they would lead their houses as well as (or even better than) their fathers had. Willas was not among that group. He had never once doubted himself or his capabilities. He knew he would be an excellent leader. Some would say he already was.

In any case, that was the general impression he got from Garlan and Lord Mathis.

Within an hour, the Reachmen appeared at Lannisport. Another camp (almost as large as the Royal Army's) had been erected in the stretch of land between the port and Casterly Rock. This one, however, was filled with a huge variety of noises. Even before he reached the site, Willas could hear blacksmiths hammering at their forges, vendors announcing their products, soldiers laughing as they raised their tankards, children playing, and cheering everywhere.

If it's this abuzz with excitement now, I wonder what it will be like once the main events begin.

Willas brought his horse to a halt when he reached the edge of the tourney grounds. The whole of his company stopped right when he did. He gave the order to dismount, and several hundred men collectively climbed down from their horses.

A great number of stableboys immediately came forth to take charge of the Reachmen's mounts. After giving custody of his courser and Garlan's garron to one of them, the two Tyrell sons headed further back into the caravan. Every now and then, Willas received a bow of the head and a murmur of "m'lord."
Soon, he and Garlan came to a wheelhouse. At his beckoning, one of the servants opened the door, revealing a tall woman with silver hair.

Willas smiled, extended his hand to the woman, and said politely "Mother."

Lady Alerie Tyrell, formerly of House Hightower, grinned at her firstborn and took his hand, allowing him to aid her down to the ground. Once she was on her feet, she turned back to the wheelhouse and muttered sweetly "Come along, darlings."

A boy of seven and a girl of six swiftly exited the vehicle. Both of them shared their elder brothers' brown hair, but whereas Willas' was short and smooth and Garlan's was tied in a short ponytail, the boy's was flowing and the girl's was curly.

"Are we there yet?" the boy asked, impatience detectable in his tone.

Garlan chuckled, and Willas drily answered him with "Yes, Loras; we're here."

Loras Tyrell's impatience was quickly replaced with ecstasy. He can barely contain his excitement.

Willas knelt before his youngest brother and told him "Now, we need you to watch Margaery. Garlan and I are expected to pay homage to father's bannermen, and Mother must seek out Father. You can either go with her or us, if you want, but keep a close eye on our sister."

Most brothers would dread the chore of watching after their younger sister. Loras, however, was never one to decline a task. At least when it came from his parents or brothers, or when it involved protecting or fighting someone.

Loras saluted his brother and pronounced solemnly "I won't fail you, Willas!"

Again, Garlan chuckled. Willas just gave a proud smile. I know you won't.

Loras had always been somewhat protective of Margaery. Like Willas and Garlan, Mace Tyrell's third son and only daughter had been born just one year apart. Since there were five years between Garlan and Loras, Margaery had become fonder of Loras than their elder brothers. But she loved all of them just the same. No one could contest that.

After Willas stood back up, he headed towards the tourney grounds. He rapidly moved through the camp with his mother, siblings, and household guards. All the while, he kept an eye open for his father and for his mother's family.

He ending up spotting Father first. He was near the center of the grounds, conversing with Lord Randyll Tarly and Lord Paxter Redwyne.

At first, Willas was inclined to both wave and cringe. On the one hand, Lord Paxter was the nephew of his grandmother, Olenna Tyrell, as well as his uncle by his marriage to Willas' aunt, Mina Tyrell. So he always enjoyed Lord Paxter's company. Lord Randyll, on the other hand, not so much. As a future Lord Paramount, Willas knew he was supposed to be exceptionally brave. In spite of that, the head of House Tarly secretly intimidated him. There were many who said Lord Randyll was a just man; as just as Lord Stannis Baratheon. Nevertheless, he was known to be even less forgiving and compassionate than the king's stoic brother. Willas had heard of how he had tormented his own son Samwell in effort to make a man out of him.

Still, as he approached the three men, Willas did not let his face display any indication of fear. When he, Mother, and his siblings reached them, he dipped his head to Lord Mace Tyrell, greeting him with their house words "Growing Strong, Father."
The Warden of the South grinned and placed a hand on his heir's shoulder. He remarked merrily "No need for formality here, my boy. This is a celebration, not a conference."

Willas resisted the desire to roll his eyes. As much as he loved his father, Lord Mace Tyrell had a habit of disregarding protocol and forgetting his courtesies on occasion. If he only exhibited that behavior in front of his immediate family and no one else, Willas could probably tolerate it. Alas, Father tended to act the way in front of his own lords bannermen, which annoyed and bothered Willas.

Fortunately for him, Lords Redwyne and Tarly paid no mind to their liege lord's conduct. They both bowed their heads to Willas and Mother, and they greeted them with the usual civilities.

"How was your journey, my lady?" Lord Paxter asked Mother friendly.

"It went well, my lord," she responded, smiling again, "I appreciate your concern, my lord."

"Concern is expected of us, Lady Alerie," Lord Randyll mumbled, not disrespectfully, "You are Lady of Highgarden. As such, your well-being and that of your children is supposed to be a foremost concern of ours."

"Yes, Lord Randyll," Mother avowed, trying to keep her grin, "All the same, please know I am grateful to you for readily answering my husband's summons when he went off to war."

"I simply did what was required of me," the Lord of Horn Hill uttered indifferently.

I don't think I've seen a man show so much contempt for gratitude.

By her façade, Mother strongly wished to change the subject. She asked Father and the other two lords "Is Lord Stark here?"

Most people might have been inclined to wonder why Alerie Tyrell would suddenly seem so interested in the whereabouts of the Lord Paramount of the North. Of course, Willas was aware that she only asked that question because she was actually more interested in Robb Stark, Lord Eddard's son and heir. Specifically, she must have been interested in the proposition that had been made concerning Robb and Margaery. Looking over at his sister, Willas mused.

"I'd be very interested in knowing how that turns out, as well."

"Yes, I believe he is with King Robert," Paxter Redwyne disclosed.

"So where's the King?" Loras queried gladly. He seemed elated at the mere mention of Robert Baratheon.

"He is occupied with knightng a few hundred men," Father proclaimed.

"So the knighting ceremony has already started?" Garlan presumed.

"Not just yet," Randyll Tarly said bluntly. He looked to Mother and added "Incidentally, I believe I sighted your lord father amongst the ceremony's audience, my lady."

"Is that so?" Mother murmured, a trace of happiness in her voice. Lord Randyll nodded once, and she muttered in mild glee "Thank you for informing me of this."

The Lord of Horn Hill said nothing in response. He and the Lord of the Arbor were dismissed by the Lord of Highgarden, and then Father proposed that they head to the knighting ceremony. His wife and children gave no word of protest. Subsequently, Willas made his way to the knighting ceremony with Father, Mother, Garlan, Loras, and Margaery.

As they neared the huge stage, Willas caught of glimpse of his mother's father, Lord Leyton of House Hightower. He was at the back of the assembly, surrounded by his children. He had been accompanied to the tourney by Willas' uncles Baelor, Gunthor, and Humfrey and his aunts Malora and Lynesse. Apparently, his aunts Leyla, Denyse, and Alyssanne had been unable to attend. And his uncle Garth, of course.

Grandfather Leyton was laughing at something Uncle Gunthor had said when he noticed the Tyrells. He directed the attention of his other five children towards Willas and his family. All of them made a grin at their sister, her husband, and her children.

"Alerie!" Lord Leyton Hightower cheerfully called out to his second daughter when she was within earshot.

Mother grinned widely, stepped up to her father, and embraced him. He held her tightly, as though he had not seen her in over a decade. In actuality, it had only been a few months.

For a long time, Willas had suspected that his mother was his grandfather's favorite child (even before she had wed his liege lord). For obvious reasons, he had never asked either of them if his suspicions were true. All the same, he was somewhat convinced that they were.

After Mother came apart from Lord Leyton, she, Father, and Willas exchanged pleasantries with her siblings. Uncle Baelor and Uncle Humfrey were as gracious as ever, Aunt Malora and Uncle Gunthor were less excited but still pleasant, and Aunt Lynesse… she just said "Hello" and left it at that. She was not one to get sentimental, even at reunions between family members.

"Have we missed anything?" Garlan enquired.

"No, you arrived just in time," Uncle Gunthor revealed, "The ceremony should commence very soon."

"Oh, quiet down; quiet down," Aunt Malora beckoned the others, "It is starting now!"

At that, Willas and the other present members of his family looked to the stage. Indeed, King Robert had just stepped onto it. The audience silenced as one as he moved to the front of the stage. A tall man with dark hair and an image of a direwolf on his doublet stood off to the side of the stage.

Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell.

Willas wondered what purpose Lord Eddard had for being on the stage. He had heard there were few knights in the North, as they held to the Old Gods. They preferred to kneel before ancient trees than before seven statues.

In any case, Willas noted Lord Eddard did not seem to care very much to be there.

Perhaps he's merely there out of obligation.

Given the knowledge that Eddard Stark was said to be Robert Baratheon's lifelong best friend, that was not unlikely.

Willas quickly discovered Lord Eddard's true reason for being there. When the King stopped in the center of the stage, a number of individuals from the crowd climbed onto it. As they entered the stage, their names were called out by a herald. Gregor Clegane. Dacey Mormont. Oberyn Martell.
Gerion Lannister.

All of them were renowned members of the Legion without Banners, whose base was located in the North. Not all of the Legionnaires were Northmen by birth, but they had been living in the North for much of the past few years.

In any case, Willas was glad to see Lord Gregor Clegane there. Now once the ceremony was over, he would be able to see to an affair that had been on his mind since before he left Highgarden.

From what Willas could discern, the Legionnaires were there as overseers of the knighting ceremony. Once they were all in place, King Robert gave a short speech. It was nothing very eye-opening; just a basic summary of the importance of fighting with honor, integrity, loyalty, and truth, and how those qualities were quintessential to being a knight.

Once that was over, a score of men were called onto the stage. They stood apart from each other in four rows of five. It was then that Ser Barristan Selmy, the Lord Commander of Robert Baratheon’s Kingsguard, made his appearance. He drew his sword and stood beside the King.

One-by-one, King Robert and Ser Barristan approached each of the twenty men. In turn, each man felt to his knees and dipped his head. As King Robert said some words about what deeds each of them had done to earn his place on that stage, Ser Barristan lightly tapped his sword against the shoulders and head of that respective man. Then each man was told to rise as a knight of the Seven Kingdoms.

After those twenty men had been knighted in full view of the assembly, they climbed off the stage, and their spots were quickly replaced by twenty more men.

This routine went on for close to three hours. Twenty men entered the stage as simple men, their deeds were announced, and they exited the stage as knights. Interestingly, each new group’s deeds were more praiseworthy than those of the preceding group.

The final group was composed of men who had played a key role in bringing about the Royal Army’s victory against the Ironborn. One of them was Jacelyn Bywater, who had lost his hand during the siege of Pyke. He now wore a prosthetic made of iron in place of it, giving him the alias Ironhand.

He’s probably the only non-Ironborn to ever receive a moniker with the word "iron" in it.

The last two men to be knighted struck Willas as the most intriguing. First, there was a tall man with a brown beard who had a bear as his sigil. He was Lord Jorah Mormont, and he had maimed and captured Rodrik Greyjoy in the battle of Fair Isle. The second was an equally tall man with a sigil of three hounds. Many people in the audience gasped at the sight of his face. But he gave no heed to their shock. He was Sandor Clegane, brother of Lord Gregor, and he had managed to kill Euron Greyjoy in single combat at Fair Isle.

Like Eddard Stark, Sandor Clegane did not seem to care very much for being there. Willas found that curious. Lord Eddard may have been there out of duty to his best friend the King, but the men being knighted were all there voluntarily.

So why does the Hound not seem pleased by his knighthood?

After Sandor Clegane had been given the title of "Ser," the audience finally broke into a long round of applause and cheers. Unsurprisingly, most of the new knights were very receptive of that recognition. But Sandor appeared deaf to it. He just stood still as a statue at the front left corner of the stage with a neutral facial expression.

The ceremony was concluded a moment later. King Robert and Ser Barristan exited the stage through the back side, where no one was gathered. The last twenty knights and the Legionnaires went their own ways. Similarly, the people on the ground started to disperse.

Willas noted that Lord Jorah Mormont and Sandor Clegane exited with Gregor Clegane, Dacey Mormont, and Oberyn Martell. Lord Eddard Stark got off at the same spot as them. That may or may not have intentional, but in any case, it was convenient.

"Mother, I believe you wished to have words with Lord Eddard," Willas told his mother.

"So I did," Lady Alerie Tyrell affirmed.

Willas pointed out the wolf lord to her. He was currently in the midst of speaking to some of the Legionnaires. Willas proposed "Now is your opportunity."

Mother smiled at that and said "Indeed."

Willas would have been content to walk over to Eddard Stark. Alas, his father happened to overhear that exchange of dialogue, and he must have thought himself too good to be the ones to approach. So before Willas or Mother could take a single step, Father raised his arm and called out "Lord Eddard!"

Despite the tumultuous noise in the area, Father was loud enough to be heard by Eddard Stark. When the wolf lord heard his name, he turned in that direction. He saw Mace Tyrell waving at him. After a moment's pause, Lord Eddard excused himself from the Legionnaires and made his way over to the Reachmen.

He did not come alone. A few of the Legionnaires chose to follow him. To Willas' good fortune, Lord Gregor was among them.

Eddard reached the Tyrells and the Hightowers first. He spoke to Father "You wished to see me, Lord Mace?"

"No, my lady wife did," Father revealed.

"I see," was all Lord Eddard said in response. He sounded grim. He turned to Mother and stated inquiringly "Lady Alerie?"

She grinned at the Northman and "Have you some time to converse, my lord?"

"On what, might I ask?" Eddard Stark murmured

"A certain arrangement that was proposed," Mother told him vaguely, "One meant to benefit both our families."

With her eyes, she pointed out Margaery, who was standing near her feet. Lord Eddard caught on to what she was implying fairly quickly.

"I was hoping to discuss that with you myself," the Warden of the North proclaimed, "Shall we go somewhere… a little less crowded, perhaps?"

"Excellent idea," Father declared, as though he had thought of it himself, "Come to my tent. We can talk further on this issue there."
Lord Eddard was taken aback by Father's abrupt interruption, but he made no remark.

"Willas, look after your siblings," Father ordered his firstborn, "Your mother and I have business to go over with Lord Stark."

"Yes, Father," the heir to Highgarden conceded.

And please make an effort not to embarrass us in front of Lord Eddard.

Willas noted that Gregor Clegane was one of the people who had followed Lord Eddard over. Shortly after Mother and Father exited the vicinity with the Lord of Winterfell, Willas tried to speak with the Mountain. It turns out he would have to wait a while.

Right when his parents left, Gregor went over to his grandfather. He expressed his sincerest apologies and regrets for the loss of Uncle Garth. Although condolences were expected of him, these sounded genuine. Grandfather Leyton must have thought so, too; he accepted them accordingly.

In fact, he decided to introduce his children and grandchildren to the people in Gregor's company.

Not all the people who had accompanied Lord Eddard were Legionnaires. In addition to Dacey Mormont and Oberyn Martell, the newly-anointed Jorah Mormont and Sandor Clegane had come over, as well. There were also a trio of Dornishwomen. One of them was around the same age as Prince Oberyn. She was actually Ellaria Sand, his paramour. The other two were his daughters. The elder, Obara, turned out to be the wife of Sandor Clegane. The younger, Nymeria, was currently unwed. However, Willas noticed that she spent a lot of time by Jorah Mormont's side.

Ellaria had been holding a small boy; he could not have been older than two years. He was Rickard Clegane, the son of Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey. Ellaria had been watching over him throughout the ceremony. Now that it was over, she was able to return Rickard to his parents. Thus, he was speedily transferred from Ellaria's arms to Dacey's.

After Grandfather Leyton introduced his descendants to Lord Gregor's colleagues, he asked to know more about the latter group. That was rather characteristic of him; he always was interested to learn more about new people.

Some of Gregor's companions decided to indulge the Lord of Oldtown. So they mentioned a few tidbits of information about themselves. When Lord Jorah revealed he was a widower, Aunt Lynesse suddenly became a fair deal more interested in him. She walked up to the bear lord and bade him to talk more about himself.

This could mean trouble.

Willas must not have been the only one who felt so. Gregor Clegane sneered at Aunt Lynesse, and Nymeria Martell appeared outraged.

In fact, the Mountain discreetly brought the former bastard girl over and whispered something into her ear. Several times, one or both of them glared over at Aunt Lynesse.

When Lord Gregor stopped whispering, Nymeria nodded her head, smirked, and muttered compliantly "You can count on me to do that, my lord."

Willas wondered what "that" was, but decided he would rather not find out.

He did, however, find out why Sandor Clegane was less than thrilled about his knighthood. As it happened, the Hound had only attended the ceremony at the insistence of King Robert and his brother. Truthfully, he did not care much for being a knight. He eloquently professed his belief that a true warrior was one that fought selflessly and for the good of others, not one who had "Ser" in front of his name.

Now that's a sentiment I can understand.

Eventually, all the small, separate conversations ended. Before long, Willas' aunts and uncles went their own ways, as did Gregor Clegane and his associates. Still, Willas was determined to have a word with the Mountain before the day was out.

He turned to Garlan, Loras, and Margaery, and he instructed them "I need you three to stay with Grandfather Leyton for a few minutes. There is something I have to get done elsewhere."

To his relief, his younger siblings did not try to protest or argue. After entrusting them to Grandfather Leyton, Willas rushed to catch up with Lord Gregor Clegane.

He found the Mountain near the blacksmiths. He and his lady wife were speaking to one of the metalworkers on a certain project they had commissioned his services for. Something involving Valyrian steel, if what little Willas managed to overhear was true.

Not knowing how long this endeavor might take, Willas chose to interrupt rather than to wait. He approached the massive man and said as civilly as possible "Excuse me, Lord Gregor."

The Mountain hastily looked over his shoulder. "Yes, Lord Willas?"

Willas took a deep breath and stated "I was hoping maybe you could spare me a few minutes of your time. There is something I wish to consult with you."

After a few mere seconds of contemplation, Gregor decided to grant Willas' favor. He turned to his wife and told her "I'll be right back, Dacey."

The Bear Islander nodded at that. She was still holding their son in her arms. But even with her hands full, she was a capable negotiator.

As the heir to Highgarden and the Mountain headed away, the former heard the latter's wife say to the blacksmith "Now, Master Mott, where were we?"

After walking for about a minute, Willas and Gregor managed to find a quiet, secluded spot where they could converse without being eavesdropped on.

"Now, what can I do for you, my lord?" Gregor stated enquiringly.

Willas did not answer straightaway. He chose his words carefully: "In all honesty… it's more a matter of what I can do for you."

Lord Gregor was intrigued. "How so?"

"It's quite simple, my lord," Willas Tyrell proclaimed. "I wish to join the Legion without Banners."

That remark seemed to take the Mountain by surprise. Lord Gregor stood in silence for a minute, and then he uttered tentatively "Normally, I would always welcome a promising, young volunteer…"

"But…?" Willas beckoned him to continue.
"But we do not receive many firstborn sons of highborn families," Gregor apprised him, "And we've never gotten the heir to a Great House."

"It appears I would be setting a precedent, then," Willas wittily observed.

"Yes, you would," Gregor conceded, rubbing his temple, "But tell me; what reason do you have for wishing to enlist?"

"The same reason as most of the other Legionnaires," the heir to Highgarden replied, "To establish peace, order, and stability in Westeros."

"You could accomplish plenty of that well enough from Highgarden," Gregor debated.

"Yes, but my influence does not extend far beyond the Reach," Willas contended.

"It could if you marry into a house outside your homeland," Gregor suggested.

"That might take too long," Willas uttered dourly, "I am merely a lad of thirteen."

"Well, I was a man grown at thirteen," Gregor countered.

Willas glared at him incredulously. He wordlessly emphasized how much he had to crane his neck upwards to look the Mountain in the eye.

"Alright, bad example," the Lord of Moat Cailin admitted, scoffing a bit.

"My lord, I am here offering you my services by my own volition," Willas pointed out, trying to remain patient, "Just tell me; am I wasting my time?"

Gregor stood thinking for another minute, and then he asked the younger man "Have you discussed this with your lord father and lady mother?"

Somehow, I knew he was going to bring them into this.

"I have not," Willas confessed, "But not because I was reluctant or afraid to. Instead, it was because I was more concerned about being denied this chance by you than by them."

Gregor seemed to understand that point. It appeared as though Willas was starting to convince him that he would indeed be useful to the Legion.

"Alright, let us say for a moment I allowed you into the Legion," Gregor hypothesized, "Every Legionnaire brings something practical and valuable to the table. Tell me, my lord; what makes you special? What would you have to offer that others would not?"

Willas had prepared for a question like that. He apprised the older man "I'm a fair jouster and swordsman. I'm also skilled at training horses, hawks, and hounds; they make fine animal companions. At the risk of sounding vain, I am very well-educated on the many ways of the Known World."

Gregor Clegane nodded in approval and thought aloud "That all sounds quite appealing."

After a long and hopeful silence, the Mountain nodded again and declared "Alright, my lord. I will permit you entrance into the Legion without Banners."

Willas soon broke into a wide grin. He was about to open his mouth to thank Lord Gregor profusely. Before he could, the Mountain hastily added in "On two conditions."
Willas Tyrell closed his mouth to listen. Once Gregor Clegane had his attention, he told him "Firstly, if you ever get the idea to joust with Oberyn Martell, I must have assurances that you will be cautious."

That's a strange proviso.

"May I ask why, my lord?" Willas enquired.

"Simply because the Red Viper is known to be deadly with a lance," Gregor claimed, "I will not have any person under my command being harmed by him or any other Legionnaire. Especially when the former party will one day be the Lord Paramount of the Reach."

"I understand," Willas asserted, "And the other term?"

"Have your parents arranged any prospective marriage contacts for you yet?" Gregor inquired.

Willas raised an eyebrow in confusion. But he gave an honest answer: "As of yet, no."

"Then for the present, I would like you to avoid forging any marriage contracts involving yourself," Gregor told him, "And here is why: I believe there is an ideal betrothal candidate for you. But circumstances as they are, I may not be able to secure a contract between you and her right now. Furthermore, due to another complicated drawback, I cannot tell you or anyone else about her just yet."

Now Willas was absolutely fascinated. And more than a little suspicious of Lord Gregor's intentions.

Just what is he planning to accomplish? And who is this mystery woman?

He did not bother asking those questions; he could tell he would not get answers. That aside, he decided that Lord Gregor's stipulations were reasonable. "I can accept that, my lord."

The Mountain grinned, held out his hand, and commented "Then I welcome you to the Legion, my lord."

Willas took his hand and shook it firmly.
The Unexpected

Chapter Notes

Note: So, in spite of how busy my projects have kept me, I still managed to post a new chapter one week later. Not only that, but this one is even longer than the last one. Don't worry; I don't intend for this "each-new-update-is-the-longest-yet" thing to be a routine. By the way, some of you may have questions about Lord Arryn's family and the Royal Family by the end of this chapter. If so, let me go ahead and reassure you that those topics will be addressed sometime in the next few chapters. So will Ellyn's possible betrothal to Tyrion. In fact, the latter issue will be the main focus of the next chapter.

It was a magnificent armament. Nearly six feet long, taller than its owner. Made of solid ironwood, straighter than an arrow. But its primary feature was the blade. It was the sharpest and lightest spearhead anyone had seen in recent years.

Genuine Valyrian steel. I never would have thought to see it in my own lifetime.

Lady Daliah Clegane had never been trained in the ways of war. Growing up in Deep Den, she had been kept safe by her father's men-at-arms. There had never been any great reason for her to learn to fight; most Westerlander women generally stayed at home and indoors.

She could defend herself with her hands and feet, if need be, but she had no formal experience with weapons. She had rarely even held anything deadlier than a steak knife. But she could not resist the opportunity to examine this newly-made masterpiece of a weapon.

Presently, Daliah was on the tourney grounds with her husband, sons, grandson, daughter, and daughters-by-law. They were just outside the forge of one Tobho Mott, a master blacksmith from King's Landing. In her hands, she gripped Master Mott's latest creation: a long, hefty spear fitted with a Valyrian steel tip.

Daliah have arrived early that morning with Tarrence, Ellyn, and a handful of their retainers. Gregor, Sandor, their wives, and Rickard had camped in the tourney grounds overnight, and – as such – had already been present when the lord and lady of Clegane's Keep appeared with their daughter.

As the eight Cleganes broke their fast, Gregor, Dacey, Sandor, and Obara informed Daliah, Tarrence, and Ellyn that they had something special to show them. They never gave any direct hints as to what that "something" might be; they merely claimed it was to be a surprise.

Quite a marvelous surprise it is.

Up until the moment they came to Tobho Mott's workshop, Daliah had been clueless as to what her sons and daughters-by-law had planned. When they arrived at the workshop, she presumed they had hired the blacksmith to forge some new weapons for House Clegane. While that assumption turned out to be correct, she never would have expected an object of this quality.

"Would you care to give it a spin, Mother?" Obara suggested kindly.
Ever since her wedding to Sandor, the former Sand Snake had made a habit of addressing Daliah that way. The Lady of Clegane's Keep found she deeply enjoyed being called that, especially since she was aware that Obara had severed all connections to her own mother.

Daliah Clegane gazed at the spear and thought on that proposal. Then she shook her head, held the spear out to the Dornishwoman, and pronounced "I appreciate your offer, dear, but I would rather not. I may cause unintentional harm to someone."

"I understand, Mother," Obara acknowledged, accepting her spear back.

"I'll try it out," Ellyn abruptly suggested. Daliah and everyone else looked at her in slight astonishment. She bashfully gazed at the ground and added in "If you do not mind, of course."

Obara Martell smiled at the young girl's remarks, and she offered her the spear. As Ellyn tentatively took it into her hands, Obara cautioned her "Be careful with it."

Oh, she knows how to handle it.

Unlike her mother, Ellyn Clegane was not unversed in combat. After she had been born, Gregor had proposed that when she was old enough, she be taught to wield a weapon. Sandor had backed his brother's idea, and Tarrence ultimately agreed to it.

Thus, starting after her eighth nameday, Sandor and Wallis Peckledon had drilled Ellyn on how to properly brandish a dagger. After she mastered that, they moved her up to the longer melee weapons. She fought with wooden swords for a long while before they let her have a real one. She was a slow learner, but she turned out to be a promising fighter.

After Obara moved to the Keep, Ellyn was able to expand the range of her expertise to the spear, as well. Interestingly, she turned out to be more proficient with Obara's weapon of choice than the Mountain's and the Hound's.

I doubt she'd be able to defeat Gregor, Dacey, Sandor, or Obara in a duel, but she could definitely hold her own against the average soldier.

Although Daliah had initially been averse to her daughter learning how to handle weapons, she had come to appreciate and embrace that idea. She was secretly proud of Ellyn for becoming such a superb combatant. That was something Lady Daliah herself never had the chance (or wish) to do.

Ellyn gripped her sister-by-law's new spear firmly in both hands. She backed away from the other members of her family, and she waited until nobody else was within ten feet of her. After that, she began to twirl the spear in both her hands.

Her pace started out slow, but gradually, she quickened it. She spun it directly in front of her for about twenty seconds, and then she waved it along the sides of her body. She moved so quickly that Daliah had difficulty keeping track of where her hands were.

She's so fast. Now that is impressive.

"Faster," Obara instructed her. Ellyn compliantly twirled the spear faster.

"Show me those techniques I taught you," Obara proposed. In response, Ellyn efficiently and expertly demonstrated some of the various maneuvers she had picked up from Obara.

"Good," the Dornishwoman remarked, nodding in approval, "Now, deliver home!"
At that, Ellyn turned to her family, took the spear in a backhand grip, and lunged forward. When she landed on her feet, she stabbed at the ground in front of her. Grass, dirt, and soil went everywhere when she struck.

If someone's throat had been there, she could have taken his head off.

Panting a little, Ellyn hastily withdrew the spear from the ground and gave it back to Obara. The former Sand Snake proceeded to clean its head with a piece of thick cloth. She was careful with how she wiped the blade; she did not wish to chance cutting herself on the edge of the steel.

And if Ellyn is that good... no one in his right mind would strive to cross Obara when she's armed with that.

Once the spearhead was clean, Tarrence enquired "Have you thought on a name for it?"

Obara shrugged and muttered "Names are usually reserved for swords. Normally, no one bothers with giving a name to a spear. But, of course, I have never been one to uphold all customs. So I suppose I shall make an exception."

*I expected you to. So did everyone else, apparently. Daliah asked her gooddaughter "Do you have any apt names in mind?"

Obara stood looking over her spear for a couple minutes, and then she declared "Because it's so light, agile, and formidable, I can only think of one name that would do it appropriate justice: Swift Thrust."

"I like it," Sandor told his wife almost right away. He was not being untruthful, Daliah could tell.

"Simple, accurate, and unpretentious," Lady Daliah commented, "It definitely suits your weapon."

Everyone else appeared to approve of Obara's choice of name, too.

She grinned and stated "Then it seems one of Master Mott's four projects has been officially completed."

"Indeed," Tarrence conceded, "When can we expect the others to be ready?"

It was Gregor who answered: "As you can imagine, the longsword, the bastard sword, and the greatsword all require a far larger amount of steel than the spearhead. As such, they will take longer to forge. We have spoken with Master Mott, and according to him, all three of them will need at least a week to fold; no more than two."

"So you'll be unable to use them in the tourney's melee?" Ellyn presumed.

"Correct," Sandor affirmed.

"That's a shame," Daliah remarked, though she was not truly disappointed.

"Not really," Gregor disputed, "Sandor and I already possess superior strength and size to most of the other participants."

"It would be a touch too unfair if we had this advantage over them, as well," Sandor contended.

"Whoever said a tourney had to be fair?" Dacey cheekily uttered. She was currently holding Rickard in her arms. When everyone chuckled at his mother's jape, he joined in with a bit of "That aside," Gregor bluntly murmured, dismissing his wife's jest, "It would be unwise to enter a skirmish with the Valyrian steel swords before they have been tested."

"True," Sandor stated, "Furthermore, Valyrian steel is known to be lethal. The purpose of the tourney is to best our foes, not slay them."

"Yes, but you never know," Ellyn debated, "These tourneys are unpredictable. Even in the safest of conditions, accidents can occur."

"No denying that," Gregor coincided, "For all we know, an accident or two could happen at this one."

Daliah felt her eldest son sounded strangely certain of that prospect. That made her worry. She bade her sons "Promise me you'll be safe."

"You needn't worry, Mother," Gregor asserted, "I was not implying that we would be in an accident. Sandor is much too wary to be caught unawares, and I am in control of everything that occurs on the jousting field. And I mean everything. It is the other contenders who should worry about accidents."

While that was likely meant to reassure her, Daliah was still a little concerned. It was as though Gregor was confident some manner of accident would indeed transpire at the tourney. She must have been the only one there who believed so; everyone else appeared to assume the Mountain was merely providing an example of one possible occurrence. So she chose to disregard that suspicion of hers.

"At any rate, once the swords are ready, we'll be back here to receive them," Sandor professed, "Gregor and Dacey will take the greatsword and the longsword back North. The bastard sword, however, will remain at Clegane's Keep. I intend for it to be the ancestral blade for this branch of House Clegane."

He then turned to his father and proposed "If it be your wish, Father, you may take possession of the sword first. I am content to wait until I succeed you to take custody of it."

Daliah looked to her husband, and she discovered that he was not tempted by that offer at all. A few years ago, he would have been. But not today.

Lord Tarrence Clegane solemnly shook his head and stated "No, Sandor. From the moment of its creation, the sword is yours."

Sandor and Gregor were stunned by their father's refusal. The Hound pointed out "You are my sire and my lord. By rights, the sword should belong to you for the duration of your life."

"Only if I had a hand in acquiring it," Tarrence countered, "It was you who triumphed over Euron Greyjoy in single combat; you who won his stash of Valyrian steel. Therefore, ownership of this sword goes straight to you."

There was a very brief pause, and then Tarrence explicated "Additionally… I've no more use for a blade. Such a superb weapon would be wasted on me."

It was at that moment when he lifted up his hands. He had worn leather greaves that day. They were thick and tight enough that his arms were mostly stable. But even with that safeguard, Daliah could spot a quiver in both of her husband's wrists.
In these past few months, his palsy had gotten worse. Before Greyjoy's Rebellion, it had only encompassed his left arm. Now it had spread to his right arm, too. Maester Velix had counseled him not to attend the tourney, but Tarrence would not be denied the first opportunity to appear at a grand event as a lord.

Sandor grudgingly sighed and mumbled empathetically "If that is your wish, Father."

Tarrence lowered his arms and reassured his heir "It is."

Daliah had sided with Velix on the issue of whether or not Tarrence should attend the tourney. Alas, he had paid as little heed to his wife's advice as he had to the maester's. He was very determined not to be absent from the festivities. Daliah was not pleased by Tarrence's obstinacy, but she could not protest.

As long as his twitches do not become any more pronounced, everything should be alright.

Just then, there was the sound of a horn being blown. All heads turned in the direction of the noise. Many people in the area began to make their way to its point of origin.

"The jousting's about to start," Dacey observed.

Ellyn nodded and asked rhetorically "Shall we head over?"

"Better we do," Daliah said candidly.

The Cleganes speedily proceeded towards the grounds set aside for the jousting competition. When they got there, Sandor and Gregor parted from the group. Daliah and the others went to the stands.

Other than the platform designated for the Royal Family, no section had been reserved for people from any one specific region. Even so, the Reachmen and the Dornishmen tended to sit apart from one another, as did the Riverlords and the Westerlords.

Even when celebrating the victory of war, old rivalries are hard to expunge.

Daliah spotted Nymeria Martell and Ellaria, Elia, and Obella Sand in the front of the eastern stands. They were near the center of that section. She suggested sitting there, and the Cleganes seemed to advocate the idea. The Dornishwomen were very accommodating of them. Daliah herself sat next to Ellaria in the front row.

Whoever would have thought I'd make such good friends with a bastard?

She no longer thought of Prince Oberyn's paramour as a baseborn woman who mothered two more baseborn girls. In fact, in the past few years, her opinion of bastards had changed as a whole. She was even willing to have Elia Sand sit on her lap.

Nymeria sat on the other side of Daliah, and Obara positioned herself next to her sister. The four women and the two young girls occupied a whole bench in the front row.

Since Tarrence, Ellyn, and Dacey were the tallest of their group, they chose to sit in the second row. Tarrence took up a spot behind his lady wife, and Ellyn sat on her father's right side, in turn. Dacey seated herself to his left with Rickard on her lap.

The jousting field was empty for the present. Though she did not show it, Daliah was excited for the competition to begin. She was looking forward to seeing her sons contest some of the other renowned fighters in Westeros.

I wonder who they will face-off first?

Daliah was aware that Dacey and Obara had considered entering the lists. They had ultimately decided against it. For one thing, they would have had to argue with many of the knights and lords who intransigently insisted that women had no place in tourneys. The only fighting Dacey and Obara were in the mood for was the type that involved steel, not words. Plus, if either of them actually won, crowning a Queen of Love and Beauty would have been terribly awkward for both of them.

If the crown was made of steel instead of flowers, they might have been able to crown a King. But a King of Love and Beauty would be exceedingly foolish.

Other than her sons, Daliah did not know who all would be involved in the joust. She had heard from her daughters-by-law that Lord Jorah Mormont and Prince Oberyn Martell had enlisted. While she did not know either of those men particularly well, Daliah would not have been surprised if they did.

It had been rumored that King Robert himself would be partaking in the joust. That would certainly be a remarkable sight.

Once the stands were filled, a herald climbed onto the platform and called out "All rise for His Grace, Robert Baratheon, the First of His Name, King of…"

Daliah paid no mind to the rest. In her opinion, the time it took to give the entirety of the king’s title was tediously long.

We know he's our King. Can you not leave it at that?

When the herald finished, the crowd stood as one. It was then that Robert Baratheon made his appearance. Daliah had to admit he did look quite regal. He was fully clad in black and gold leather. From his shining boots to his stag-adorned crown, he seemed the very image of what a king should be.

A few seconds later, the Queen appeared on the platform. In contrast to her husband, she instead wore a dress of crimson, the color of the Lannisters. It hung loosely around her thighs and legs, but it was tighter around her arms and chest. The space around and beneath her throat was left uncovered, rendering her bosom partly visible.

As beautiful as she is shameless.

Cersei Lannister took her place next to Robert Baratheon. Soon after, they were joined by the Hand of the King, Lord Jon Arryn took up the spot beside his former ward. His lady wife, Lysa of House Tully, stood beside her own husband.

Jon Arryn was an elderly man, but he was said to still be spry and healthy. His wife actually appeared to be far feebler by comparison. Daliah had heard that after the death of her childhood friend, Petyr Baelish, Lady Lysa had been devastated, almost to the point of mania.

She knew that the Legion without Banners had been assigned to escort Baelish to Harrenhal safely, and Gregor himself had been in command of the convoy. Nevertheless, on the way, their party had been attacked by the mountain clansmen of the Vale, and Littlefinger had perished.

That had been three years ago. Lysa Arryn had not yet gotten over the loss of the Mockingbird.
Despite that, she had improved much since then. Her mental state was still in question by some, but at least she did not disgrace or shame her husband or her king in public. She had even managed to give Lord Jon a child a year ago.

Daliah had heard that childbirth had not been easy for her. On that note, Daliah considered the possibility that that could have been the real reason for Lysa's slightly disheveled appearance.

There are some women who simply cannot handle the burden of childbirth.

Daliah could not speak for herself, of course. She had birthed three of the largest children in Westeros' modern generation, and she had recovered excellently after each one. As a result, she had come to believe that there was no excuse for any mother who could not take to childbirth as easily as she had. Some would call that haughty, but she felt her belief was a reasonable and justifiable one.

Looking at Lysa Arryn and her husband, Daliah was reminded of the early days of her own marriage.

As the youngest daughter of Deep Den, Daliah Lydden had grown up believing she would never be part of anything great. She had often been overlooked by many, including her own family. She had been fifteen when her father first approached her with the idea of a match between her and the master of Clegane's Keep. Back then, the keep had been small, foreboding, filthy, and generally unpleasant to look at. Furthermore, House Clegane had only seen its second generation at the time, and Tarrence Clegane was more than a decade her senior. Worst yet, he was the son of an upraised kennelmaster.

Daliah had adamantly refused the betrothal at first. She had argued that she was a highborn lady; if she was to marry into any family, it should be to one of the other noble houses. Her father Lord Lewys had explained to her that her sisters were to marry into noble houses. She, however, was supposed to be content with a landed knight.

Her father had not been unsympathetic to her qualms. Neither had her mother nor her siblings. Even so, they had all encouraged her to consent to the contract. Their primary argument was that House Clegane was closer to Casterly Rock than any other family – highborn or otherwise. As such, her presence at their keep could somehow help strengthen House Lydden's relations with House Lannister.

Eventually, Daliah had agreed… albeit resentfully and with much reluctance. Her wedding had been arranged very expediently afterward. The ceremony had been a ridiculously simple affair. It seemed to be just a step or two above a wedding conducted by the smallfolk. She did not even have the luxury of meeting Tarrence beforehand.

She had wed the master of Clegane's Keep sometime after her sixteenth nameday. The ensuing feast (if one could call it that) had been as simple as the wedding. Only two courses with no form of entertainment or merriment. At that time, that had not bothered Daliah as much as what she knew would follow.

The bedding ceremony had been the most unsettling part of the evening by far. At the very least, Tarrence had been gentle with her. Even so, he had refused to consider the idea of putting the bedding off. He claimed he would be a laughingstock if it became known that he had not lain with the woman who became his wife on the same day he had married her.

The next two years were probable the most miserable of Daliah's life. Tarrence and his retainers went to great length to try to make her comfortable. She never once complained about or criticized anything, but her lord husband could tell she was not pleased. In an attempt to persuade him otherwise, she had started calling him "my love." That ploy had failed.

Daliah had not yet reached her twentieth nameday when Gregor was born. That was easily the most traumatic event of her life. She had been in labor for hours, and on several occasions, she was convinced she would not survive the ordeal.

Of course, in the end, she did. Once her firstborn finally came into the world, she could relax.

Tarrence had held their boy first. Daliah had her turn soon after. That very moment, when she took Gregor in her arms… that was the happiest she had been since she left Deep Den. At the time, she had not even loved her husband. But the child they had created together… she felt overwhelming adoration for him immediately.

Daliah needed a good couple weeks to recover after Gregor was born. She was bedridden for nearly a fortnight. Maester Velix was the one primarily responsible for her health, but Tarrence played the most significant role. He had constantly checked up on her throughout her recovery. All his other functions and responsibilities around the keep were secondary to her well-being. It was as though he had been personally obligated to see to her every need.

During that period of time, Daliah finally realized just how much her husband cared for her. Not only that; he actually did love her. In that moment, she began to love him in return.

By the time Sandor was born, she had come to call Tarrence "my love" not out of duty, but out of genuine affection.

By the time Ellyn was born, Daliah truly felt at home at Clegane's Keep. Despite its drear appearance and decaying structure, she found happiness in the arms of its master and their children. In fact, she no longer cared for wealth, power, or influence. She had discovered that family was the one greatest, irreplaceable joy in life; the one that mattered the most. As such, she had become far more comforted with living at the keep than she had ever been at her father's ancestral home.

Daliah would even have been happy to have raised her children and grown old with Tarrence in that decrepit building. Regardless of its state, she would feel at home in Clegane's Keep, being the wife of a landed knight. She was prepared to remain that and nothing more.

But the Gods decided to reward my family for my humility.

Thirteen years later, House Clegane's status in Westeros had greatly improved. There were now two branches of it; both holding lordly status. Clegane's Keep had been cleaned, refurbished, and expanded. It was a proper ancestral home by the nobility's standards. Her sons had married outside the Westerlands, and there was a chance her daughter would wed the son of her liege lord.

When Daliah was first sent to Clegane's Keep, she had inwardly cursed her father. Now she blessed him for it.

As it happened, Lord Lewys Lydden had attended Sandor's wedding. During the feast, Daliah was able to reunite with her father for the first time in twenty years. He had embraced her tenderly, and he had whispered to her "I'm so proud of you, Dali."

That was the best part of all. She had done what she had always endeavored to do: she had won her father's praise.

Of course, all good things must end at some point.
She had faced the truth of that at the beginning of the year, when her husband and Maester Velix had shared some grim news about the former's health.

Palsy was said to be fatal. Daliah did not know how long her husband would last, but she prayed to the Gods for his relief (if they would not grant his recovery) every day. The very same gods she had once beseeched not to send her to Clegane's Keep.

Love comes about in the most unexpected and mysterious ways.

Daliah wondered if Robert Baratheon and Cersei Lannister were in the same dilemma she and Tarrence had been in. No one could say with total certainty that the King and Queen truly loved each other. Be that as it may, Daliah could sense no enmity between them, either. The marriages between the Targaryen kings and their sisters had been notoriously unhappy. This one, however... it had promise.

After the Hand and his wife arrived on the platform, Robert turned to Cersei and held his hand out to her. She interlocked her fingers with his, smiling all the while. He smiled back, and the two stepped forward, raising their connected hands together.

"Let the joust begin!" the King declared boisterously.

The audience voiced their approval of that announcement with a wave of enthusiastic cheers. They all remained standing, as it was traditional not to sit until the King did.

Six seats had been set out on the platform beforehand. Three were thrones, meant for the Royal Family. The other three were elaborate chairs, meant for the Hand's family. Two of each trio were normal-sized. Between the two thrones and the two grand chairs were each a smaller throne and grand chair of similar design.

King Robert, Queen Cersei, Lord Jon, and Lady Lysa gradually took their place in the four large chairs. As the people in the audience went silent and sat down in turn, a young boy and a young girl were brought out onto the platform.

The girl was Lord Arryn's daughter. She was placed on the small grand chair in-between her parents. As soon as she was in her seat, Lysa Tully leaned over to her and placed a kiss on her forehead.

The boy was the Crown Prince. He was old enough to walk to the throne and climb onto it himself. Once he was settled, the Queen smiled down at her son and delicately brushed her hand through his natural black locks. The King grinned again. And so did Daliah.

Even if they do not love each other now, there is one thing they both love already. That's a hopeful sign.

Now that the King had given his blessing for the jousting competition to commence, the first of the contenders came out.

A knight of the Kingsguard, the sullen Meryn Trant, was on the one side. A pair of young boys – who Daliah could have sworn were actually girls – were assisting him with his arms and horse.

On the other side was Gregor. He had already donned his armor. Only his head was uncovered, but that changed when his helm was given to him by his new squire, Willas Tyrell, the heir to Highgarden.

Gregor put on his helm, and he climbed onto his massive destrier. Once he locked his feet in the stirrups, Willas handed him his lance. By then, Ser Meryn Trant was astride his own horse with his own lance in hand.

The Kingsguard and the Mountain brought their horses to the front of the platform. They dipped their heads to their King, and he gave a wave of his hand and proclaimed "Start your round, gentlemen."

At that, Ser Meryn and Gregor rode to the opposite ends of the jousting field. Once in position, they faced each other off. Both men lowered their lances in the direction of each other, and they waited for the signal. Once it came, they broke into a charge.

Daliah watched intently as the distance between her son and his opponent became progressively smaller. She knew the Kingsguard was no match for the Mountain That Rides, but in spite of that, she found herself holding her breath.

Soon the two men were upon each other. Daliah willed herself not to look away.

Meryn Trant's lance merely bounced off of Gregor's shield. But Gregor's lance struck true. He roughly jabbed the other rider in the center of his chest. The impact that blow was so powerful that Ser Meryn practically flew off his saddle.

The audience burst into cheers again as Meryn Trant hit the ground and rolled around in the dirt. After letting out a sigh of relief, Daliah joined her voice to theirs.

 Needless to say, she was very proud of her son's performance. But she did not rejoice just yet.

This is only the first round, after all.

The next tilt was between Jorah Mormont and Jason Mallister. The Lord of Bear Island managed to unhorse the Lord of Seagard on the first pass.

Nymeria had cheered louder than anyone else in Daliah's company when that happened. Amidst the applause, Daliah heard her whisper to Obara "One day, he's helping him defend his holdfast. The next, he's beating him with a lance."

Daliah scoffed at that observation, partly because it was true. Both Jorah and Nymeria had been present at the defense of Seagard.

The next four rounds were between men Daliah had either never heard of or did not especially favor. She was relatively indifferent to the outcome of each of those bouts.

After that, Sandor was up against Ser Ryam Florent, younger brother to Lord Alester Florent of Brightwater Keep and Lady Selyse Baratheon's father.

Sandor had chosen to forgo wearing a helm, as usual. Of course, that was the reason half of his face made most people cringe. Even so, he believed leaving his scar visible would drive fear into the hearts of his opponents.

His theory may have had some merit to it. When he and his adversary faced off, Ryam Florent appeared to become startled by the Hound's countenance for a split-second. That momentary distraction was enough for Sandor to catch him off-guard and knock him off his mount.

After three more duels between six unfamiliar parties, Oberyn Martell made his first appearance. He sparred with and easily defeated Ser Jon Fossoway of New Barrel.
Within a few hours, over thirty matches had been staged, and just as many men had been removed from the competition.

To the astonishment and delight of many, Robert Baratheon participated in the last round of the first wave. There were some who tried to dissuade him, but he insisted that he had the situation in control.

He did indeed. The King had gained a little weight since his Rebellion, but he still fit into his armor perfectly. He held his lance and balanced his shield with the same stable hands as before.

Ironically, his opponent was Rhaegar Frey, one of Lord Walder's many grandsons. Unsurprisingly, the Frey was far from the King's equal. Robert managed to defeat him far more effortlessly than he had defeated his namesake.

Among the group of victors in the first wave of tilts were Ser Barristan Selmy, Ser Jaime Lannister, Polliver, and Rafford. Three more of Gregor's personal men-at-arms had entered the lists, but they had not lasted beyond the first wave.

The first three rounds of the second wave were between Sandor and Galbart Glover of Deepwood Motte, Jorah and Ser Boros Blount of the Kingsguard, and Gregor and Ser Ryman Frey of the Twins.

Sandor eliminated his opponent on the third pass; Jorah on the second. Both rounds ended with the head of House Glover and the Kingsguard knight lying in the dirt.

Gregor's round ended a little differently.

To Daliah (and others), it was a wonder that Ryman Frey had survived the first wave. He had been conspicuously half-drunk at the time, and his posture had been lacking of grace and discipline. Then again, his adversary had been Shitmouth, and while the most foul-mouthed of Gregor's men-at-arms was excellent with a sword, he was hopeless with a lance. In fact, he had kept mumbling "Bugger me with a lance" after he had been knocked off his mount.

It's fortunate he did not say something worse.

At any rate, Daliah had no doubt as to who the victor of this round would be.

Not only was Gregor the superior fighter, but Ryman Frey was even more disheveled than before. He was closer to full-drunk than half-drunk, he did not even bother to secure his feet in his stirrups, and he could not hold his lance straight. He looked more a mummer playing a rider than an actual rider.

"This should be unexciting," Ellyn muttered blankly. Daliah had to agree with her daughter.

Ellyn's prediction turned out to be untrue.

Ryman Frey and Gregor Clegane soon began their charge. Somehow, Ser Ryman managed to keep his horse galloping alongside the rail that separated him and Gregor. That was about the only thing he did right. He could hardly even lift his lance.

Gregor kept his horse running in a straight line. He held his lance in a steady hand. He had it pointed directly at Ser Ryman's chest. The Frey knight's shield was hanging uselessly from his left arm, leaving his upper body exposed. One firm nudge would have been enough to throw him off.

Gregor gave him more than that.
In the split-second before they were upon each other, Gregor raised his lance slightly higher. Instead of striking Ser Ryman in the chest, the lance was driven through his throat. Upon impact, Ryman Frey lurched violently. By the time Gregor passed him, the tip of Gregor's lance broke off, and he had fallen off his horse, flat onto his back.

Many of the women in the audience screamed in response. Daliah fought hard to suppress a scream of her own. She, Dacey, Obara, and Nymeria managed to stay silent, but Ellaria and Ellyn did not hold back.

Ryman Frey was erratically convulsing on the ground. His eyes were wide-open, blood was spilling out of his throat, and the only sound that came from his throat was a sickening gurgle.

Gregor hastily brought his horse to a halt and climbed off it. He rushed to Ryman's side. He had his back to his family, but Daliah could hear him say "Ser Ryman? Hold in there. Try not to move. You're going to be alright."

He sounded authentically frantic and anxious. If Daliah did not know better, she would have thought he really was convinced that Ryman Frey would live. But it happened she knew her son very well.

He's killed enough men to know that a stab to the throat is deadly.

Apart from that, Gregor was not one to feed people false hope. If a person was doomed to die, Gregor would not mislead him into believing otherwise. Daliah had never seen a man die before, but she could tell Ryman was going to.

By the time a maester arrived on the scene, Ryman Frey had breathed his last. His body was carried off the field, and servants moved in to clean up the mess.

Once that was done, the King announced that due to the circumstances, the remainder of the second wave of the joust would be moved to the following day. No one there gave a word of protest.

As the crowd dispersed, Gregor came to his family. He seemed quite guilty over what had just happened. His wife, father, and the Dornishwomen attempted to comfort him.

Daliah just remained in her seat. She felt a tap on her shoulder, and she turned to see Ellyn. She whispered softly "Mother… did you see it?"

Ever the observant one. Daliah knew what "it" was. She lightly nodded her head.

Clearly, Ellyn too had noticed how Gregor had lifted his lance at the very last moment before he had reached Ser Ryman. There had been no need for him to do so; he could have kept his lance level with Ryman Frey's chest and he would have won.

He must have spotted the opening above the Frey knight's chainmail vest. Gregor did not miss details such as that. Furthermore, Daliah could not forget what Gregor had mentioned earlier. He had proclaimed rather certainly that an accident might take place during the joust. Either he had correctly forecasted this fiasco, or…

That was no accident.

Daliah realized this when she recalled something else Gregor had said. He claimed to be in control of everything in the joust. He made certain to emphasize "everything."
Although he had seemed concerned for Ryman's well-being, anyone could feign concern. Additionally, Daliah knew her son could kill a man with any weapon, including a lance. He never killed anyone by mistake.

What bothered her most was that he had made a victim of Walder Frey's grandson. Daliah was less than fond of Freys herself. But even so…

What possible reason would Gregor have for killing a member of House Frey in a joust?

…

In spite of what happened, the death of Ryman Frey did not generate any lasting hostility between his kin and Gregor Clegane. Straight after the jousting field was vacated, the Mountain had gone straight to the other members of House Frey who had attended the tourney. Then he offered them a hundred golden dragons to atone for his misdeed.

Any other family would most likely have been outraged to be given money as reparation for the loss of one of their own. The Freys, however, were not known for being mournful of anyone. They had eagerly accepted the Mountain's recompense.

You would think they much prefer the dragons to Ser Ryman.

If that was so, Nymeria Martell would not have been astounded. She could still vividly recall how rudely Ser Ryman had treated her during both of her visits to the Twins. The first time, when she had first gone north, many of his brethren had been rude to her simply because of her baseborn status. Ryman in particular had been downright harsh. His opinion meant little and less to her, but she would not forget a slight.

On the second occasion, most of the Freys treated her with a considerably larger amount of respect. Actually, they were closer to nonexistent.

He had been as drunk as he had during the joust, and he had tried to pressure her into agreeing to a marriage contract between her and his son Edwyn. Even after she had clearly voiced her disdain, he had continued to force the issue.

At least Papa put him in his place before I had to.

Nymeria had never been more grateful to her father than when he had led Ryman Frey away and knocked him out cold. She personally would have done worse. Luckily, worse had ultimately happened to him anyway.

When Gregor thrust his lance through Ryman Frey's throat, Nymeria had been as shocked as everyone else in the stands. But right after, she felt a queer sense of satisfaction from watching him bleed out on the ground. She had received suitable retribution from when Ryman Frey had humiliated her.

Nymeria had suspected that Ser Ryman's death might not have been accidental. Truthfully, she did not really care if it was. All the same, after the jousting field and the stands were cleared, she had gone to Gregor Clegane with the intention of talking to him on the topic. Fortunately, even before the Mountain killed the Frey knight, Nymeria had already been planning to speak to him on a different matter.

"I will be honest with you, Nym," Gregor admitted to her when they were alone, "I did not misjudge the distance between Ser Ryman's neck and chest. My hand did not slip. My horse did not buckle. My lance struck precisely where I intended it to."
He must be honest right now. No one else would confess so readily.

"I would much sooner praise than condemn what you did, my lord," the former Sand Snake pronounced, "But I'm curious to know; why did you do it?"

"For three reasons," the Mountain enlightened her, "Firstly, he was the heir to the heir of the Twins. While Stevron Frey could help his house regain its honor, Ryman would destroy his work upon succeeding him. By removing Ryman and installing his son Edwyn as Ser Stevron's heir, we have avoided that problem. Secondly, I did it for you. Your father told me of how crass Ryman had been to you. Any man who treats women – especially a highborn lady – like that is an insect, and should be dealt with as one."

Isn't that chivalrous of him? Nymeria folded her arms and queried "And the third reason?"

"I killed him for Dacey," Gregor disclosed candidly.

Nymeria raised an eyebrow and murmured in confusion "For Dacey? Why? Did Ser Ryman insult her, too?"

"He did not," Gregor informed her, "But given the chance, he would have something far done worse to her."

"How can you be certain?" Nymeria said inquisitively.

"That, I cannot explain," Gregor claimed, "Not yet, at least. But believe me; as inept and simple as Ryman Frey was, he was also capable of terrible things. I did not cherish the act of killing him, but even so, I did it out of necessity. In my mind, he was nothing more than a waste of space."

"Mine, as well," Nymeria conceded "But are you not worried about fallout with House Frey?"

"I am not," Gregor told her drily, "I have already compensated House Frey with a stash of golden dragons. Given how quick they were to accept my remuneration, Ryman will not be missed. It is quite probable that even Ryman's father and children will not shed any tears for him."

Oddly enough, Nymeria felt a touch of pity for Ryman Frey then. As much as she despised him, it would be a terrible thing for anyone to die and have no one grieve for them.

A moment later, she remembered her personal encounters with Ryman Frey, and she decided he was undeserving of her sympathies.

"Your mother and sister may suspect foul play, my lord," Nymeria informed the tall man. Back at the jousting field, she had noticed how Lady Daliah Clegane and Ellyn Clegane had seemed a little dubious about the whole affair with Ryman Frey. As such, the young Dornishwoman thought it best to let Gregor know of that."

"They may talk to me on this later," Gregor muttered, "If so, I'll tell them something to set their minds at ease."

"Will you tell them the whole truth?" Nymeria inquired.

"If I must," Gregor told her, "I derive no thrill from lying to my family, but at times, I must do so to protect them and myself."

"I understand, my lord," Nymeria asserted.
"Does anyone else suspect?" Gregor queried.

"Not that I know of," Nymeria replied.

"Excellent," Gregor said approvingly.

But if anyone else does suspect, I know he'll find a feasible solution to ease their minds. That's his way.

There was some silence, and then Gregor remarked "While you're here, perhaps we can discuss that other subject of precedence."

"That's what I was hoping to do, my lord," Nymeria revealed.

This other matter had to do with Lord Leyton Hightower's youngest child.

A few days ago, the tourney's knighting ceremony had been held. Nymeria had attended it under the premise of wishing to see her sister's husband get knighted. In actuality, there was another reason for her presence there.

In addition to witnessing Sandor Clegane's knighting, she had gone to see Jorah Mormont gain his knighthood, as well.

Nymeria's experiences with Lord Jorah had not been limited to their time on board the Lord Steffon. Even after they returned to the Westerlands, the two of them had continuing to bond. Since then, she had grown to greatly appreciate the bear lord's company.

He was one of the few men outside the Legion without Banners who treated her like a fellow comrade. She was aware that the women of House Mormont were seen as equals to the men, and that they fought alongside the other Northmen in battle.

Still, Nymeria was pleased to discover that Lord Jorah's tolerance for warrior women extended beyond his own family. He had developed a profound fascination with the totally unbiased military principles of Dorne. She had been all too happy to educate him on them.

The subject of how the two of them were of opposite genders had never entered into the conversation. As a Dornishwoman, Nymeria was accustomed to talking to males and females in the same fashion. Even when the topic of sexual intercourse entered the discussion, she spoke indifferently.

Nevertheless, she had to admit Jorah Mormont was a fine specimen of a man. Strong, brave, relatively handsome, understanding… those were desirable qualities in any male.

Even so, Nymeria did not have any suggestive thoughts about the lord of Bear Island. Lord Jorah was around twice her age. He was past his thirtieth nameday; Nymeria had only seen her sixteenth. For that reason, she did not believe he truly regarded her as a woman. He probably saw her the same way her father did: as a girl.

Nymeria would have been content with that. She had seen friendships between men and women fall apart when the issue of sex came up. She did not wish to jeopardize her relationship with Jorah Mormont on that basis. Not unless there was a distinct chance it might lead to something greater.

Alas, there may never be such a chance.

So Nymeria elected to keep her friendship with Jorah Mormont strictly platonic. For the last several weeks, she had done an admirable job of maintaining that mindset. They had interacted, they had talked, they had exchanged interesting stories, and in all that time, they had never once brought up their difference in gender.

At the knighting ceremony, Nymeria had only appeared to provide support for the bear lord and cheer for him.

However, her resolve was put to the test straight after the ceremony. That was when she first encountered that harlot from Oldtown.

It was common knowledge that the Reach and Dorne had never peacefully coexisted with each other. The only two notable exceptions were the Night's Watch and the Legion without Banners, the latter of which had proven to be more successful. But the number of Legionnaires from the Reach and Dorne accounted for a mere fraction of the total populations of both countries.

Be that as it may, Nymeria's reason for detesting Lynesse Hightower was not her homeland.

Nymeria had actually been relatively indifferent to Lynesse and her family when they arrived. She did not know very much about House Hightower. She knew that their seat was Oldtown, which was where the Citadel was located. Secretly, her half-sister Sarella plotted to apply to the Conclave and become the world's first female maester one day.

In addition to that, her father and Aunt Elia had been there at least once.

They had been very young at the time; the reason for their visit was to seek out potential betrothals for the both of them. Nymeria's grandmother had considered wedding her daughter and second son to Lord Leyton's two eldest children, Baelor and Malora.

For a while, the prospect of those matches actually seemed quite plausible. Oberyn had discovered that Malora had indeed earned her moniker Mad Malora, but he could put up with a bit of madness.

Just when the contracts were practically on the verge of being drawn up, Baelor Hightower had the misfortune of farting in Aunt Elia's presence. After that, she had been unable to even be in the same room as him without laughing. She had gone so far as to call him Baelor Breakwind.

The prospect of marriage between House Hightower and House Martell had quickly died after that.

Despite that, Nymeria's family and Lord Leyton's were able to treat each other fairly when they met up after the knighting ceremony. Although the Hightowers all held their heads high, most of them at least possessed the chivalry the Reach was lauded for.

Nymeria Martell did not officially decide she disliked Lynesse Hightower until the latter threw herself at Lord Jorah. The primary reason she was so angered was because Lynesse had waited until Jorah mentioned that he was unmarried to approach him.

Whatever idea's she getting, it cannot be a good one.

Gregor Clegane seemed to greatly object to Lynesse Hightower's behavior, as well. However, unlike Nymeria, he appeared to dislike the Reachwoman from the moment he first saw her. Perhaps even before that.

During the bear lord's first encounter with the Hightower woman, the Mountain had come to the former Sand Snake and whispered into her ear.

"We must be mindful of Lady Lynesse," he had remarked to her, "I have seen her like before: manipulative, greedy, and selfish. She does not truly care for Lord Jorah. She is merely out to exploit him."

Nymeria was appalled by the mere concept of that. She did not even have to say a word for Gregor to realize just how disgusted she was.

"I know what you must be thinking: we cannot allow that to happen," Gregor had continued, "And we will not. I have a task for you, Nymeria. If you think yourself up to it."

Nymeria had given a lone nod in compliance, and the Mountain had told her "For the time-being, I need you to keep a close eye on Lady Lynesse whenever she's around Lord Jorah. He is a strong man, but still a man all the same. Even he can fall victim to the intimate charms of a woman. You must guarantee that he does not give in to hers."

Lord Gregor must have noticed how much time Nymeria had been spending with Jorah, as well as how close the two of them had become. However, his knowledge of their relationship was not what perturbed her at that moment.

What really perturbed her was that Gregor was right. Lynesse Hightower had the means and the will to seduce Lord Jorah, if she so wished.

Nymeria had never once considered the likelihood that she would be jealous of another woman, even if said woman was after the affection of the Lord of Bear Island. Lynesse's intimate interaction with Lord Jorah was a kind of sudden awakening to her.

For the first time in her life, she actually felt envious of another woman.

As a result, she had earnestly responded to Lord Gregor's request with "You can count on me to do that, my lord."

Indeed, he could.

Over the next few days, Nymeria continued to spend time with Jorah Mormont, just as she had been doing since the battle of Seagard. However, whenever he was not with her or his retainers, he could usually be found in the company of Lynesse Hightower.

Whenever they were together, Nymeria watched both of them from a safe distance. She monitored everything they did. For the most part, they just talked. But she could see Lynesse giggled at times, and at other times, Jorah smiled back at her.

Part of her felt a little guilty for spying on the bear lord. But another part recalled that in the long run, she was doing so for his benefit. That lessened the guilt considerably.

In the end, nothing especially notable had happened these past few days. At least nothing which suggested that Lynesse Hightower was striving to have Lord Jorah wrapped around her finger. Even so, she recounted every detail of all their encounters to Gregor Clegane. When she was finished, he did not seem displeased by her report. But his reservations about Lynesse Hightower had not waned.

"Either she is merely flirting with him, or she has already done more than that, and he has ignored her advances," Nymeria conjectured.

"It could be either case," Gregor perceived, "She may make more of an effort to entice him as the tourney goes on."
"After he's won a few more tilts, I'm certain she will," Nymeria supposed.

Gregor nodded at that. Then he patted the young Dornishwoman on the shoulder and stated in approval "Good work so far, Nymeria. If you wish, I can take over from here. You do not have to continue observing Lord Jorah and Lady Lynesse."

"I would not mind continuing to do so, my lord," Nymeria sternly proclaimed, "I have the situation well in control. Other than browsing through a few shops and visiting with family and friends, I had nothing special planned for the tourney. I have more than enough time to do all that and ensure that Lynesse Hightower behaves herself. That will also allow you to devote your focus to the remainder of the joust."

Gregor was visibly proud and impressed by the logic of her answer. He smiled down at Nymeria and said to her "Very well. Keep up the good work."

"I shall, my lord," she swore. With that, she and the Mountain exited their shelter and went their own ways.

The joust lasted for four more days. Sandor, Gregor, Papa, and Jorah continued to be amongst the contenders most likely to win. Nymeria cheered for all four of them with her family and theirs.

Inwardly, the former Sand Snake would have been satisfied if any of them won the competition. She wondered who would be the Queen of Love and Beauty in each case. She felt she could predict who would receive that honor if the Mountain, the Hound, or the Red Viper emerged victorious.

If Gregor won, Dacey would be crowned. If Sandor won, Obara would be crowned. Alternately, they could have crowned their mother Lady Daliah, if their wives did not want it. If Papa won... he had five choices between his paramour and his four present daughters.

Secretly, Nymeria would have preferred for her father to crown Ellaria over her and her sisters. It would have been worth it just to see the expressions on those stuffy highborn cunts' faces when a baseborn woman was made Queen of Love and Beauty.

Jorah's choice was a mystery. Nymeria honestly had no idea who he would pick. He might have selected Dacey, given she was his closest living relative.

Regardless of who he chose, she was praying he would not give the crown to Lynesse Hightower.

For the next three days, Nymeria monitored the interactions between Jorah and Lady Lynesse. To her delight, he still made time to mingle with the young Dornishwoman. But with each passing day, he spent a little less with her and a little more with the Reachwoman. She tried not to assume the worse, but she could not ignore what that may have entailed.

At the same time, the joust went on. No more deaths (staged or otherwise) took place, but more and more names were removed from the list of participants.

Even Robert Baratheon was no longer among the remaining contenders. In the fifth wave, he had faced Gregor. The King had put up a very formidable bout. He actually appeared to have had the upper hand over the Mountain for most of their round. But the Lord of Moat Cailin managed to wear him down and unhorse him on the eighth pass.

In the sixth wave, Oberyn and Sandor were removed from the lists. They had been dispatched by the Kingsguard knights Ser Barristan Selmy and Ser Jaime Lannister respectively.

Jorah Mormont was still at the top of his game. He had defeated Yohn Royce, Hosteen Frey, Walter Whent, and Lyle Crakehall in rapid succession. Every time he won a tilt, Nymeria cheered loudly. Across the field, she could hear Lynesse Hightower cheer just as loudly. But Nymeria felt that at least with regards to cheering, she was the Reachwoman's superior. Lynesse's cheer lacked passion, whereas hers was laden with it.

By the end of the seventh wave, only four contenders were left: Gregor, Jorah, Ser Barristan, and Ser Jaime. The victor of the joust would be determined on the morrow.

After the field was cleared, Nymeria met up with Jorah and offered "Would you care to go for a walk, my lord?"

"Perhaps later, Nymeria," he replied, "I beseech your pardon, but I have a previous engagement elsewhere."

"As you say," she said in response. She sounded understanding, but inwardly, she was apprehensive.

Nymeria watched Jorah as he headed away from the area. When he had gone thirty feet, she went after him. She kept that much space between them, as always.

Five minutes later, they arrived in the section of the tourney grounds set aside for vendors. Nymeria spotted Lynesse Hightower standing at a jewelry kiosk. She appeared to be haggling with the jeweler over the price of a necklace.

When Jorah showed up next to her, she turned away from the kiosk and grinned at him. He smiled back at her. Then they began to talk with the jeweler.

Nymeria could not hear what any of them were saying, but she could surmise much from their gestures.

Evidently, Lynesse wished to purchase the necklace, but she was unwilling to pay the established amount for it. She had had no luck convincing the jeweler to lower his price. Jorah attempted to negotiate with the jeweler. The jeweler seemed to appreciate Jorah's patience and reasonable nature, but he still refused to lower the price. Subsequently, Jorah…

Oh, no. Please, no.

Jorah BOUGHT the necklace for Lynesse. He even fastened the clasp around her neck. The Reachwoman was elated by his gift to her. She kissed the Northman on both of his bearded cheeks. He appeared alarmed at first, but he did not resist. He even smiled afterward.

Nymeria just stood by and watched, overcome with both bewilderment and fury.

Jorah departed from the vicinity soon after. He was heading towards the camps. Lynesse did not go with him. She instead walked in the opposite direction, almost towards Nymeria.

Normally, Nymeria would have avoided making any form of contact with the Reachwoman. But at that moment, she was so angry that she could not restrain herself.
When the woman from Oldtown was nearly upon her, the former Sand Snake emerged from her cover and muttered through gritted teeth "Lady Lynesse."

Lynesse Hightower promptly stopped and turned her head when she heard her name. When she saw who had addressed her, she gave a slight nod and uttered nonchalantly "Oh, Princess Nymeria."

Nymeria did not even bother informing the Reachwoman that she deplored that title. Instead, she mumbled crossly "I have some information for you."

Other than a slight raise of her eyebrow, Lynesse did not seem interested. Nevertheless, she stated "Fine. Be quick about it, though."

Nymeria stepped closer and said menacingly "If you value your well-being, you will stay away from Lord Jorah," Lynesse's eyes widened for a second, and then her brow furrowed and she murmured indignantly "Excuse me?"

"You heard me," Nymeria pronounced irately, "I've seen the way you gawk at him. You may claim to be fond of him, but I know that all you care about is what luxuries he could provide. It's disgraceful, appalling, and outrageous, and I will not allow it to go on."

Lynesse did nothing to deny that accusation. That was enough to convince Nymeria that it was in fact true. Even so, the Reachwoman merely smirked and presumed "And you plan to stop me?"

"Yes, I do," the Dornishwoman firmly answered. At this time, she still had her whip attached to her belt. It was coiled up tightly, but the handle was accessible. After that last statement, she touched the palm of her right hand against the whip's handle.

The threatening gesture did not go unnoticed by Lynesse Hightower, but she did not appear intimidated.

"Do not think I can be frightened so easily, little girl," Lynesse spat, putting a mocking emphasis on the last two words.

"You call me 'little girl?" Nymeria snapped heatedly, "You cannot be more than two years my elder."

"You would be amazed what difference two years could make," Lynesse wryly retorted, "Especially to the eyes of a man."

Nymeria enclosed her fingers around the handle of her whip, took another step forward, and proclaimed "I am warning you, bitch. If you do anything to shatter Lord Jorah's happiness, I will make you suffer."

Lynesse scowled and uttered angrily "Why do you care?"

"I care because he is my friend," Nymeria professed.

"And you believe that gives you the right to decide who Lord Jorah pursues?" Lynesse countered hostilely, "I may be interacting with him out of my own interests, but at least I am not forcing him to do so. He's doing so by his own choice. But you… you're standing directly in his way."

"Because I know he'd be better off without you," Nymeria declared.
"Even so, whoever he wishes to be is his decision alone," Lynesse sharply debated, "Yet you're trying to make his decision for him. You are dictating his actions. You claim to care about him, but you do not even allow him to make his own choices."

Nymeria was speechless. She never would have thought Lynesse Hightower would be so clever. Nor had she considered the point the Reachwoman had just made. Now that it had occurred to her… she was at a loss for words.

Everything she just said is true.

Lynesse Hightower smirked, thinking she had won the argument. She continued walking away from the vicinity. As she left, she gazed back and called out scathingly "Think on that, Princess."

By her tone of voice, one would have thought she meant to call the younger woman "cunt" or "bastard" instead.

Nymeria remained where she was for a good few minutes, hardly moving a muscle or saying a word. After that, she went to find her family, and she spent the rest of the day with them. She had totally forgotten about the walk she had planned on having with Jorah Mormont.

The next morning, right before the final rounds of the joust, Nymeria rendezvoused with Lord Gregor Clegane again. She told him about her encounter with Lynesse Hightower. She expected him to be frustrated or disappointed with her for confronting Lynesse as he had. Instead, he was sympathetic to her. Lynesse had made her question what she was doing, but Gregor had reassured her that it was the right thing.

The Mountain had some disquieting news to share with Nymeria, as well.

"Last night, Dacey and I visited Jorah at his tent," Gregor apprised her, "He was not there when we arrived. A few minutes later, he showed up. He was carrying a clock over his shoulder. His house cloak."

Nymeria was stunned to learn that. "Are you certain of that, my lord?"

I am," Gregor affirmed, "I recognized it as the very same cloak Dacey wore when she and I wed."

"Why did he have it?" Nymeria queried.

"He claimed the cloak had gotten damaged on the journey south," Gregor disclosed, "A couple days back, he had hired one of the seamstresses on the tourney grounds to repair it. Last night, when we met with him, he was just coming back from picking it up from her."

"I see," Nymeria avowed. She folded her arms and inquired "Why did he bring it to the Westerlands on the first place?"

"He explained that, too," the Mountain replied, "Since his wife Blinda died without giving him an heir, he is expected to take a new bride. Even before he left Bear Island, he thought to find one after the war with the Ironborn ended. According to him, the tourney has made his search all the easier."

"What do you mean?" Nymeria asked, though part of her did not truly wish to know more.

"He mentioned that he has his eyes on a certain woman," Gregor revealed, a note of tension detectable in his own voice, "When I asked who, he was very vague. All he said was that I knew who she was, I have met her before, she appears to have a personal interest in him, and he has called upon her frequently during the tourney."

Sounds too much like someone from Oldtown.

"I see," Nymeria muttered frankly.

Gregor smiled gently at her and remarked optimistically "Actually, Lynesse Hightower is not the only woman here who meets those criteria. There is another."

Nymeria was genuinely perplexed. "Who?"

At first, Gregor looked at her as though she was jesting. When it dawned on him that she was not, he frowned and stated incredulously "Nymeria, if you yourself do not know by now, I will not even be bothered to tell you."

"Suit yourself, my lord," Nymeria conceded. She did not truly care who this other woman was. As long as she was better than Lynesse Hightower, she was content. "So, how will he approach this woman he wishes to marry?"

"He told me he has a plan," the Lord of Moat Cailin elucidated, "If he wins the jousting competition today, he will crown her his Queen of Love and Beauty."

"And if he loses?" Nymeria proposed.

"Then he will simply propose in the tradition way," Gregor professed, "He argued that she should be content with having one of the tourney's finalists, if not the winner."

If I were him, I would not be too certain of that, my lord.

"Now that does not sound like Lynesse Hightower," Nymeria commented slyly, "I imagine that with her, it's either the best or nothing at all."

"I agree," Gregor concurred, "With that in mind, the only surefire way to keep Lynesse Hightower away from Jorah… is if he is defeated in the final tilts."

"True…" Nymeria admitted, "Not pleasant to think on, but true just the same."

This conversation came to an abrupt end. Mostly because neither the Mountain nor the former Sand Snake wish to say anything more on the topic.

As Nymeria made her way to the stands, she wondered how the joust would turn out.

For the duration of the competition, she had been cheering for Lord Jorah. However, he was one of only four men she would have liked to see win the joust. The others were Lord Gregor, Sandor, and her father. Only Lord Jorah and Lord Gregor had made it to the finals.

Before this moment, she would have loved to see either of them emerge victorious. Now… she had mixed feelings about the bear lord. If he lost, his troubles with Lynesse Hightower would be over. But despite that, Nymeria could not bring herself to actually wish defeat upon Lord Jorah. She still wanted him to win. Just as much as she wanted to see Gregor win.

Of course, if Jorah did win…

I do not know who this other woman Lord Gregor mentioned is, but I just hope she's the one Lord Jorah truly favors. Then again… oh, Gods; what if she's even worse than Lynesse Hightower?
Nymeria tried not to dwell on that concept. She managed to push it from her mind once she reached the stands. After she took up her usual spot in the stands with the other Martells and the Cleganes, she talked to no one, preferring to sit in relative silence.

The first round of the day was between Jorah Mormont and Jaime Lannister. That proved an extremely tense bout, even by the standards of this tourney.

Lord Jorah and Ser Jaime managed to strike each other on the first tilt, and both of their lances practically splintered apart.

After the two men were given new lances, they charged each other once more. On the first pass, their lances only hit each other's shields. On the second pass, Jorah's lance broke against Jaime's gold armor.

The third tilt yielded similar results. Only this time, it was Jaime's lance that shattered against Jorah's shield.

This pattern went on for the next five tilts. Each time, one or both riders' lances ended up in pieces. Clearly, neither man would go down easily.

Finally, in the ninth tilt, Jorah's lance struck Jaime's armor in his far left torso. The off-center blow was enough to disorient the Kingslayer. A moment later, Jaime Lannister lost his balance and fell off the right side of his horse.

Nymeria could have sworn she saw the Queen herself join the audience in the subsequent cheers.

Her twin brother, her bodyguard, the sworn protector of her husband... yet she applauds when he faces defeat. Or maybe it is for him she cheers.

The following round between Gregor Clegane and Barristan Selmy was not as long, but it was just as intense.

Half a-dozen passes were made before Ser Barristan jammed his lance against Lord Gregor's shoulder. The Mountain groaned in pain loudly, but he remained ahorse. Alas, he was unable to lift his shield so that it protected the whole of his chest, which Barristan was quick to note.

Thrice more, the Lord Commander of Robert's Kingsguard delivered a fierce jab to the upper left of Gregor's chest. Each time, the Mountain's concentration and endurance seemed to weaken more and more.

Just when it appeared Barristan Selmy had won... Gregor Clegane made an astonishing comeback. On the next pass, he kept his shield lowered until Ser Barristan was nearly upon him. Then, with the agility of a Braavosi water dancer, Gregor threw up his shield to divert Barristan's lance and simultaneously drove his own lance towards his opponent's midsection. He caught the legendary knight right in the abdomen. Ser Barristan had the wind knocked out of him. Unable to catch his breath soon enough, he leaned to the side and collapsed onto the ground.

Dacey Mormont's cheer was so loud that it could be heard above everyone else's, all around the jousting field. Nymeria snickered at that.

I wonder how she'll cheer after the last round. No matter who wins, she'll be pleased.

Nymeria did not know if she herself would be, though.

After a five-minute hiatus, the final two contenders – Lord Jorah Mormont and Lord Gregor
Clegane began the last round. If the two previous rounds were not exciting enough, this one most definitely was. That was partly because the two participants were cousins-by-law.

Only in a joust could a domestic quarrel be a source of entertainment.

Both men had been rendered somewhat fatigued by their brutal stints against the Kingsguard knights. All the same, they were determined to come out on top.

Nymeria constantly shifted her gaze between the Mountain and the bear lord. She had no idea which of them would be named victor. Nor could she decide who she favored more.

After a while, the more likely candidate became obvious.

Gregor's left shoulder still pained him greatly. Because it had not been tended properly, he was unable to lift his shield higher than his pectorals. That left a very small part of his upper body vulnerable. But it was not too small that Jorah did not notice it.

After eleven rounds of Jorah's lance merely grazing the top of Gregor's shield, he managed to break through the Mountain's defense.

He thrust his lance high up and to the right. He struck Gregor directly on his already-wounded shoulder.

The Mountain let out a horrific shout of anguish as he toppled backwards. Had he been a regular-sized man, he would have landed on his head. It was only due to his great height that he landed on his upper back.

"Gregor!" Dacey yelled in shock.

Nymeria sat up and covered her mouth with both hands. A collective gasp ran through the stands. Even Ryman Frey's death had not been so terrifying to behold.

Lord Jorah Mormont led his horse around the rail and stopped a few feet away from his fallen opponent. He gazed down at the Mountain in deep concern.

"Lord Gregor?" he stated nervously.

For a moment, Gregor Clegane lay totally still. The next moment, he stirred and forced himself to sit up. Then he raised his right arm, used it to pull off his helm, and looked up at the bear lord.

He just smiled and declared wittily "I'd be the first to congratulate you, my lord"

Jorah Mormont chuckled at that. Nymeria, Dacey, and everyone else in their company joined in. So did the whole of the audience in the stands.

Jorah dropped his lance, brought his horse a couple paces closer, and leaned down, holding his now-free right hand out to Gregor. The Mountain took ahold of the offered hand and allowed the Lord of Bear Island to pull him to his feet.

That'd be hard enough to do on the ground. Jorah must be even stronger than I thought.

After helping Gregor back to his feet, Jorah rode over to the platform at the far end of the field. The King and Queen were on their feet.

Nymeria noted that while Gregor could stand unaided, he had his right hand pressed against his left shoulder. Obara must have noticed, as well.
"Are you alright, my lord?" she asked compassionately.

"I will be fine," Gregor asserted, "It's just a sprain."

That's a relief. But hopefully not the only relief to come out of this.

The whole audience shifted their attention to the platform. Jorah was directly before the King and Queen. Robert Baratheon gazed around the area and boisterously announced "The champion of the joust: Jorah of House Mormont, Lord of Bear Island!"

That was when the cheers came. They came louder than those of any prior tilt. Nymeria joined them with hesitation.

Cersei Lannister was holding a wreath of flowers in her hands. She stepped forward and held it out to Lord Jorah, who accepted it graciously.

Here it comes… the moment I've been anticipating and fearing…

Nymeria watched Jorah as he trotted along the perimeter of the jousting field. Out of the corner of the eye, she spotted Lynesse Hightower with her father and siblings. She could have sworn the Reachwoman was smirking at her. Nymeria tried hard to ignore her and kept her focus on Jorah Mormont.

As Lord Jorah drew nearer and nearer to the youngest of Lord Leyton's children, Nymeria let out a deep sigh. She wanted to look away, but found she could not.

Soon, Jorah reached Lynesse Hightower… but he did not stop. His horse trotted right past Lynesse, and her smirk changed to a sneer.

Now it was Nymeria's turn to smirk. At that very moment, she felt an overwhelming sense of satisfaction in knowing that Jorah had never intended to marry Lynesse Hightower after all.

Her own smirk faded when Jorah finally brought his ride to a halt. He had stopped only three feet from her seat. In other words, he was directly in front… of her.

A wave of silence came over the crowd. But Nymeria took no notice. She could barely even register Lord Jorah as he smiled at her and placed the wreath of flowers in her lap.

He then looked around the field and proclaimed severely "I give you my Queen of Love and Beauty, Princess Nymeria Martell!"

The cheers returned after that. For the second time in as many days, Nymeria did not rebuke a person who called her by that dreaded title. Her mind was too busy trying to piece together what had just taken place.

She managed to see Lord Gregor standing behind. He had his arms folded (despite his sprained shoulder), and he was grinning and nodding.

Suddenly, she recalled the description Lord Jorah had given Lord Gregor of the woman he intended to marry. Every one of those aspects applied to her as they had to Lynesse Hightower.

Nymeria never felt more foolish than at that moment.

How did I not see this coming?

She would have been alright remaining friends with Lord Jorah, but never once had she thought would be the one who wanted more.

Be that as it may… Nymeria was not opposed to the idea. As a matter of fact, she reveled in it. Her astonishment was hastily replaced with enthusiasm.

After coming to her senses, Nymeria picked up the wreath of flowers and placed it on her head delicately. Then she rose to her feet, eliciting even stronger cheers from those around her.

With a single gesture of her hand, she beckoned Lord Jorah forward. When he was within reaching distance, she leaned over the handrail and kissed his lips passionately.
During the Age of the First Men, weirwood trees were ubiquitous throughout Westeros. Then the Andals came and instilled their Seven as the country's dominant religion. As a result, the majority of the heart trees in the Seven Kingdoms were uprooted. The godswoods of the North were spared, but nearly all the ones south of the Neck had been destroyed.

Nevertheless, a few godswoods could be found in just about every other region in Westeros. An example was the one in the Stone Garden at Casterly Rock. Its weirwood was twisted and small for its size, but it was sufficient to serve its intended purpose.

Three men and a young woman now stood before the godswood. Two were Northern lords. The younger had his back to the weirwood; the other stood to his right. The first had a direwolf on his attire; the second wore a bear on his doublet and the cloak around his shoulders. The third man was from Dorne, and he stood across from the elder of the Northmen. The young woman – who seemed more a girl – stood in-between them the bear lord and the Dornishman. The latter was obviously her father; aside from their similarity in appearance, the image of a spear impaling the Sun was found on both his robes and her cloak.

At that moment, there were only five other persons present in the Stone Garden. Two of them were exceptionally tall men, and they – along with the two women by their sides – bore the icons of mountain and three hounds on their clothing respectively.

The fifth individual had not been officially invited, but he had chosen to come anyway. There was nothing the other eight could really do to protest. They are in my home, after all.

Even so, he did not wish to disturb them, as he could imagine how much this event meant to the rest of them. So after he quietly entered the godswood, he climbed up the wall and sat on the balustrade that encircled the Stone Garden. Once he was comfortable, he witnessed the ceremony from his perch.

He observed as Lord Eddard Stark conducted the ceremony in the typical fashion of the Northmen. At one point, Prince Oberyn Martell removed the cloak of his house from his daughter Nymeria's shoulders. After that, Nymeria allowed Lord Jorah Mormont to drape the cloak of his own house around her.

More words were said by Lord Eddard, and then Lord Jorah and Princess Nymeria shared their first kiss as man and wife. In response, Prince Oberyn, Lord Gregor Clegane, Ser Sandor Clegane, and their wives Dacey of House Mormont and Obara of House Martell applauded.

The dwarf atop the bannister offered a few soft claps of his own.

A wondrous thing, marriage.

Tyrion Lannister had once given the concept some consideration himself. His friend Sandor Clegane had dissuaded him from going through with it. Although Tyrion had been a little resentful at first, he was grateful that the Hound had intervened now. Marrying a common girl would have been a huge mistake.

Tyrion knew his father would have found out sooner or later. His father always found those types of things out somehow. Once he learned of Tysha… it would have ended badly for Tyrion and worse for her.
At least now she's safe in the Rock's laundry rooms, and at least I learned what it was like to lay with a woman.

Then again, even if his episode with Tysha had been avoided, it appeared he would be destined to learn that experience anyway. Furthermore, it seemed he was destined to become a married man. Those were the plans his father had for him, at any rate.

Seeing the wedding ceremony, recalling his past with Tysha, and undertaking his potential future made Tyrion reflect more deeply on the topic of marriage.

Marriage suited some people rather well. In fact, there were some who said marriage was the best thing to ever happen to Lord Tywin Lannister.

And I was the worst.

Both the Mountain and the Hound had married outside of their homeland, but their marriages were clearly happy ones. One glance at Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey or Ser Sandor and Princess Obara, and Tyrion could easily surmise that much.

He predicted that Lord Jorah and his new wife would be likewise prosperous. He did not know the bear lord as well as he knew the two Clegane men. However, Tyrion's brother, Ser Jaime Lannister, respected Lord Jorah as a warrior, which by itself said something. Additionally, Jaime had told him how the betrothal between the Lord of Bear Island the former Sand Snake had come about.

Just the day before, Jorah Mormont had won the joust at Lannisport and crowned Nymeria Martell as his Queen of Love and Beauty. That same day, he had asked her father for her hand, and Oberyn Martell had been quick to give his blessing.

The wedding had been put together hastily, and it was shockingly modest by highborn standards. Luckily, neither the bride nor the groom were partial to extravagance.

Since Lord Jorah kept to the Old Gods, it was quickly decided that the wedding would be conducted in their manner. The only godsdowd to be found for over fifty miles was at Casterly Rock, so Lord Jorah had sought out Lord Tywin Lannister to request the usage of the Stone Garden. Eventually, Lord Tywin agreed to the bear lord's wish, but he demanded that as few people attend the ceremony as possible.

Of course, Father would say that a wedding only really needs a bride, a groom, the bride's father or guardian, and a minister.

Be that as it may, four guests had been permitted at this wedding. Dacey Mormont and Obara Martell had been allowed, as they were the only legitimate members of the groom and bride's immediate families. Since Lord Gregor and Ser Sandor were the ladies' respective husbands, they had been allowed to attend, as well.

Nymeria's bridal gown had been put together somewhat hastily, but she still looked very much the part of the bride. Once the ceremony was concluded, Obara Clegane made some playful remarks about Nymeria's current appearance. She seemed to derive a certain vindictive pleasure from ridiculing her younger half-sister on her formal apparel. It may have seemed cruel, but Nymeria did not deny her sister this "vengeance." Whatever that means.

The subsequent meal was as modest as the wedding. Lord Tywin had not given permission for a full-fledged feast to take place in the confines of the Rock. After all, neither the bride's family nor... the groom's family were among his vassals. However, he did allow Lord Eddard, the Mormonts, the Cleganes, and the Martells a brief three-course meal at the Rock. The eight of them were given part of the Grand Hall after the Lannisters and their retainers had eaten.

They had brought most of their own food. Everything else, they had bought from the Lannisters. They had paid for the services of the Rock's cooks, as well. In any case, the small feast was sufficient for all eight of them.

It was during the second course that Tyrion chose to approach them. He waddled up to the trestle table that had been designated for the guests, and he casually inquired "Is everything to your liking?"

Most of them did not even notice him until he made that remark. He did not mind. He was used to not being spotted straightaway, seeing as there was less of him to spot than there was for most other men.

"It is, Tyrion," Sandor Clegane said appreciatively.

As the dwarf nodded at that, Eddard Stark proposed "Can we offer you a plate, my lord?"

"No," Tyrion responded, "I have already eaten. Still, know that I appreciate your asking, my lord. Most would not even afford me that courtesy."

"That mistake is their loss, denying themselves the pleasure of your company." Gregor Clegane cheekily remarked. Tyrion and a few of the others snickered, and the Mountain suggested "Even if you will not eat, would you sit with us anyway, my lord?"

"Certainly." Tyrion pronounced. The spot to Lord Gregor's right was vacant, so Tyrion climbed next to him. Once he was settled on the bench, he queried "Have you any more wine, perchance?"

Oberyn Martell passed him a jug of Dornish red. As Tyrion poured himself a goblet, the prince asked him "Did you enjoy the ceremony, my lord?"

For a moment, Tyrion was stunned. He had never made a sound in the Stone Garden. So I did not go totally unnoticed, after all.

The Imp's astonishment did not betray his facial expression. He merely sipped his wine, nodded his head, and stated "Yes, I did. Short, private, and eloquent. Reminds me of someone I know."

More laughter. Obara then said "There was no need for you to sneak in, my lord. We would have welcomed your company."

"I will remember that next time," Tyrion bluntly muttered, "And if you were wondering, no; I have no intention of showing up uninvited to the final event, as well."

Gregor, Dacey, Sandor, Obara, and Oberyn chortled at that. Nymeria gave a giggle, but Lord Jorah and Lord Eddard seemed indifferent. If anything, they were annoyed by that jape.

Tyrion looked back and forth between the eight individuals there. Recalling their origins, he got an idea to make a toast. He held his glass into the air and proclaimed "I would like to raise a glass for what has been accomplished here."

A few of the others reached for their mugs. They were the ones who were always willing to share a toast. The others stayed still; they were a little perplexed.
"Just what has been accomplished, my lord?" Dacey Mormont enquired.

Tyrion explicated "Ten years ago, the North, the Westerlands, and Dorne had absolutely nothing in common. Now one house from each of those regions has married into another house from the other two. If that does not warrant a toast, what does?"

No one could dispute that logic. Consequentially, everyone who had not picked up their own mugs did so and lifted them accordingly. This is excellent; I've gotten them to agree.

After the cups were drained and filled again, Nymeria murmured "I did not realize you were so interested in the relations between the Seven Kingdoms, my lord."

"Oh, I am interested in all manner of current affairs," Tyrion claimed, "Particularly those that may change the balance of the country."

"Is that why you came to the wedding?" Jorah presumed.

"It is partly why," Tyrion disclosed, "I also came to learn. It is not often the weirwood in the Stone Garden is put to use. I was curious to see how a wedding in the style of the Old Gods was carried out. As I said before, I enjoyed the experience."

"So did I," Nymeria giddily declared, "And before yesterday, I myself never thought I would ever even kneel before a heart tree, much less be wed in front of one. Yet I find the godswood strangely appealing. It has an air of simplicity and openness to it that a sept tends to lack."

"So do you plan to pay homage to the Old Gods or the New Gods?" Sandor queried.

"She's never really given much thought to either," Obara jested.

Nymeria rolled her eyes at her sister's remark. She answered the Hound's question with "Maybe the Old Gods. It would be intriguing to follow a different faith. Aside from that, Bear Island has no sept."

"One can be built," Jorah contended.

"I will keep that in mind, my lord," the former Sand Snake told her husband with a smile.

There was a bit of quietness, and then Tyrion looked to Eddard Stark and observed "On the subject of marriage contracts between regions, I have heard tell you yourself are in the process of forging one, Lord Eddard."

"You've been informed correctly," the wolf lord candidly affirmed, "I have spent the better part of the week conferring with Lord and Lady Tyrell on the possibility of a betrothal between their daughter and my son. After some lengthy discussion, we arrived at an arrangement. When Lady Margaery is of age, she will come north to meet my boy Robb. We will not decide to finalize the match until then. But in the meantime, no other contracts will be considered for either of them."

"Sounds like an ideal pact," Oberyn Martell professed, "Children should always be allowed the option to meet the one who is supposed to be their future intended."

The Mountain and the Hound would have to agree, given the plans my father has for their sister.

Either the two Clegane men could read his mind, or they were thinking similar thoughts. The dwarf noticed both of them flashing a glimpse in his direction. Neither of them seemed quizzical or suspicious of him, but they were not entirely empathetic, either.
I should count myself fortunate that Sandor regards me as a friend. Otherwise he and Lord Gregor might be giving me a warning about messing with their sister about now.

It was said that Gregor Clegane was twice the size of any other man. While that was mostly an exaggeration, it was literally true in Tyrion's case. If he stood on the shoulders of another dwarf of similar stature, he and the Mountain would be of a height.

Although Tyrion was accustomed to looking up at everyone else, even he could not ignore the Mountain's conspicuous size. Still, he did not forget that Gregor Clegane had a reputation for being an abnormally tolerant man, and although he was capable of inflicting great carnage, he was only violent towards those who wronged him or others.

Long as I do no wrong, I should be safe.

Soon the second course was cleared away and it was replaced with the third. Tyrion decided to indulge himself with some more wine and a cup of berries and cream.

"By the way, Tyrion," Sandor mentioned as he bit into a cherry tart, "I was surprised to not see you at the jousting competition."

The dwarf looked to the tall man with the half-burned face and pronounced "It happens that I actually did see the joust. I simply was not there in person."

Upon seeing the confused looks the others gave him, Tyrion illuminated "If you go to the very top of the Rock, you get a very fine view of Lannisport. The whole of the tourney grounds is visible from up there. With the use of a far-eyes, I could clearly make out the jousting field. I witnessed the entire competition from that vantage point. It was quite a spectacle, I must say."

Particularly the ending.

"Ingenious approach," Prince Oberyn remarked approvingly, "Now you know what it's like to see from a bird's perspective."

"Still, would it not have been more practical to take a place in the stands?" Eddard Stark debated.

"Yes, it would have," Tyrion glumly conceded, "Alas, certain factors prevented me from appearing."

Factors that could not be altered. Or reasoned with.

Gregor Clegane seemed to catch on to that implication. He presumed "Would one of these factors by any chance have the approximate size and appearance of your brother, only without either of his swords?"

"That is the main factor," Tyrion confirmed.

Dacey Mormont looked somewhat baffled. "What do you mean?"

"He is referring to Queen Cersei," Lord Gregor informed his wife.

Tyrion Lannister nodded and clarified "My sister and I do not get along."

"They never have," Oberyn Martell disclosed, "I can attest to that."

Tyrion made a note to question the Dornishman on that statement later. In any case, it was true.
From the day he was born, Cersei Lannister had despised him. She blamed him for the death of their lady mother, Joanna Lannister. So did their father. Despite his attempts to win their affections, they had never forgiven him.

Fortunately, not every member of Tyrion's immediately family held such disdain for him. His uncles Kevan and Gerion had always treated him fairly, and his brother Jaime had been closer to him than any other person he had met.

Strangely enough, in these days, Jaime too seemed closer to Tyrion than he was to anyone else in their lives. That included their sister.

Once, Jaime and Cersei had been nigh on inseparable. Only Tyrion knew just how close the two of them really were. But ever since Cersei married King Robert Baratheon, a distance had formed between his elder twin siblings. From what Tyrion could gather, the Kingslayer and the Queen hardly even spoke to each other anymore. He would not go so far as to say he was the favorite of Cersei's brothers, but Jaime was not very far ahead of him.

I do not envy Jaime. Spending the last five years guarding someone you once loved but now resent and who resents you in return… that cannot be pleasant.

"The Queen will not be present at the melee, my lord," Jorah Mormont apprised the Imp, "Perhaps you could attend that."

"I just might," Tyrion supposed, shrugging and taking another drink of wine.

"Our lady sister will be there, too," Sandor added in.

At that, Tyrion abruptly stopped chewing his tart and sat totally still. He slowly turned his head towards the Hound, gazing at him in astonishment. THAT came out of nowhere.

Gregor noticed the expression on Tyrion's face, and he inquired "Were you hoping to avoid that topic?"

Yes.

"No," Tyrion claimed, "But I did not anticipate it would be addressed at this very moment, either."

"It would have to be addressed at some point," Obara pointed out.

"True enough," Tyrion coincided, "But tonight should be for your sister and Lord Jorah."

"I appreciate that, my lord," Nymeria said gratefully, "But you should know I do not care to be the center of attention very much."

"Neither do I, as it happens," Jorah Mormont remarked.

"Well, I myself am rarely the center of attention," Tyrion disclosed, "I will confess; there are times when I'd love to be. But this is not one of them."

Everyone quickly understood his meaning. They dropped the subject of Ellyn Clegane's future whereabouts and resumed the dessert course.

Fifteen minutes later, the dishes and cups were cleared away by the servants. It was then that Lord Gregor, Lord Jorah, Lord Eddard, Sandor, Oberyn, Dacey, Obara, and Nymeria prepared to take their leave of Casterly Rock. Tyrion elected to accompany them to the stables.
"A pity you couldn't stay the night," Tyrion commented.

"Lord Tywin did not extend us that hospitality," Eddard informed him. Ever the courteous host, my father.

"Besides, we've all some form of business to see to tonight," Gregor revealed.

"Of course, some of us will be mixing business with pleasure," Obara uttered, gesturing to the bear lord and the younger former Sand Snake.

Nymeria and Lord Jorah walked at the front of the group. They had missed Obara's gesture, but they could tell she was referring to the two of them.

"At least we were able to forgo the bedding ceremony," Jorah thought aloud.

"I would not say 'at least,' my lord," Obara debated, "In Dorne, the bedding is actually taken more seriously than the wedding."

"Then perhaps you and I should travel to your homeland sometime," Sandor slyly proposed to his wife, wrapping his arm around her waist. Obara just giggled at her husband's playful suggestion and placed her own arm around his shoulders.

Nymeria stepped up to her own husband and stated sensually "In the meantime, we should make haste for our tent, my lord."

Well, someone is eager.

Lord Jorah must have thought the same. He muttered softly "Why the rush? The night is young."

Those should be House Nymeros Martell's words.

"It took us nearly five hours to climb the Rock," Nymeria recounted.

"We were going uphill," Gregor reminded her, "That is how long the ascent generally takes. The descent only requires about half that time."

"Even so, it could still be past midnight by the time we clear the Rock," Nymeria pointed out, "Not to mention we'll need more time to reach the camps. Once we arrive there, we may only have three or four hours before sunrise."

Hardly enough time for a proper bedding by Dornish standards.

"If you are concerned we will run short on time, we could put off the bedding until tomorrow," Jorah offered.

"Not a chance, my lord," Nymeria wryly stated, "What kind of Dornishwoman would I be if I did not consummate my marriage on the same day as my wedding?"

Jorah scoffed at his young wife's point and murmured "A fair argument."

Before long, the nine people arrived at the stables. The stableboys dipped their heads to Tyrion respectfully, and then they helped the other eight with their horses. Lord Eddard Stark, Prince Oberyn Martell, Lord Gregor Clegane, Lady Dacey Clegane, Ser Sandor Clegane, Lady Obara Clegane, Lord Jorah Mormont, and Lady Nymeria Mormont all swiftly mounted their rides. Tyrion merely stood off to the side and watched as they began to head out.
Lord Eddard, Prince Oberyn, Lady Dacey, Lady Obara, Lord Jorah, and Lady Nymeria proceeded down the long cobblestone path that ran all the way down to the Lion's Mouth.

The Mountain and the Hound did not join them straightaway, but instead lingered behind for a minute. They brought their horses over to where Tyrion was.

As they neared him, Tyrion noticed how absolutely massive both of them looked whilst mounted, particularly in the case of Lord Gregor. If he thought the Lord of Moat Cailin was exceptionally tall on his feet, he was practically a giant out of legend ahorse.

If he was just a little higher, I'd probably have to lend him my far-eyes in order for him to see me.

"So, can we expect you at the melee, my lord?" Gregor assumed.

Tyrion thought for a minute, shrugged, and proclaimed "Yes, you can. Can I expect you both to be there, as well?"

"Of course," Sandor remarked, "We'll be there as participants."

"But our lord father and lady mother will be there as spectators," Gregor amended.

"So will Ellyn," Sandor pronounced.

That again. At least this time they waited until we were alone to bring it up.

"I hope she enjoys the experience," Tyrion commented candidly.

"Oh, she will," Gregor asserted, "You should know she is looking forward to meeting you, Tyrion."

For the second time that evening, the Imp was taken by surprise. This time, he did not hide his astonishment so well. He could not be blamed; no one had ever expressed a wish to make his acquaintance before. Someone may falsely claim to have such an interest as a cruel joke at his expense, but as far as Tyrion knew, the Cleganes would not mislead him.

"Truly?" Tyrion asked skeptically.

"Truly," Sandor confirmed, a grin across his scarred face, "Queer as it may seem, this is the first time she's ever had such a strong desire to meet anyone."

That could either be good or bad on my part. If Lady Ellyn is anything like her brothers, it's most likely good.

"In that case…" Tyrion tentatively began, "Tell her I eagerly anticipate our first encounter, as well."

"She'll be delighted to know that, my lord," Gregor disclosed.

Tyrion smiled slightly, gave a small salute to the two large men, and pronounced in an official tone "Until next we meet."

The Mountain and the Hound bade the Imp a good evening and departed from the stable yard. Tyrion kept his eye on them as they regrouped with their six companions. After that, they galloped down the cobblestone path that wound all the way to the bottom of Casterly Rock.

Tyrion spent much of the next five days in solitude. That was how he normally preferred to spend his time anyway, but usually he was reading, drinking, or whoring. He still read and drank plenty, but he kept a safe distance from anything with a skirt. He made a vow that until after the melee, he would not seek out another whore.

Since he was not preoccupied with fucking, Tyrion was able to focus on other matters. He primarily focused on preparing for the melee. To be precise, he prepared for his first encounter with one of the attendees.

Before the evening, Tyrion had not given much thought to the possibility of his betrothal to Ellyn Clegane. He had fully expected her parents to refuse, just as Lord Hoster Tully had done. Hopefully, Lord Tarrence and Lady Daliah would have had more tact than to publicly call the match an insult. If not, Tyrion not have cared. He was accustomed to being the laughingstock of his family.

Tyrion had been stunned when he learned that House Clegane did not turn down the match right away; there was a chance they would actually accept it. At the time, he had presumed that Gregor and Sandor may have convinced their parents into considering the marriage contract. Perhaps Lord and Lady Clegane were striving to gain some political advantage, or they feared the consequences of displeasing their liege lord.

Tyrion had never once contemplated the idea that Ellyn Clegane herself had consented to the match.

Now he had discovered that it was Lady Ellyn who had wished to meet him in the first place. Her own brothers had brought that to his attention.

As a result, Tyrion quickly became a fair deal more invested in the likelihood of their betrothal. He was now genuinely curious about Ellyn Clegane. He found himself wondering what type of woman she was.

The majority of women, even the most well-mannered, would cringe at the mere concept of meeting him. Ellyn Clegane was not only willing to meet Tyrion, but also excited to do so. That alone established that she was neither shallow nor closeminded. Normally, Tyrion would consider the likelihood that she simply wished to see how grotesque Tyrion really was; that was a common reason for wanting to meet him. But given the family she came from, that was unlikely.

Ultimately, Tyrion decided not to reflect too much on Ellyn Clegane's personality. In his experience, by having small or no expectations, he was far less likely to be disappointed. Aside from that… there was no point in imagining what a woman would be like before he actually knew her. In his opinion, the image of a woman in his mind's eye and the woman's actual image should be one in the same. Otherwise, he would be making a fool of himself.

The day of the melee soon arrived. In the early morning, Tyrion departed from Casterly Rock. He rode on a horse fit with a special saddle designed to accommodate his specific measurements. He was accompanied by a pair of his personal bodyguards. They were not among the best of the Lannister soldiers, but they were competent and loyal, and that was enough for Tyrion.

Tyrion and his guards reached the tourney grounds shortly before midday. From the moment they entered the vicinity, a number of people paused and turned towards the Imp. The Westerlanders bowed their heads respectfully; everyone else just continued to gaze at him in bewilderment. Tyrion had long ago learned to disregard those stares, so he paid them no mind.

The melee was to be held in a large arena that been assembled in the center of the tourney grounds. It was five times larger than the jousting field, and it sat ten times as many spectators.
Tyrion was among the first hundred to be seated. As a member of a Great House, he was given a spot in the front row. His guards sat directly behind him.

Before long, more and more people showed up. As the rows were gradually filled, Tyrion kept his eyes open for anyone bearing the sigil of the Cleganes of Clegane’s Keep.

When the stands were halfway occupied, Tyrion spotted Lord Tarrence and Lady Daliah. They arrived with their daughter-by-law, Obara Martell. However, their own daughter was nowhere to be seen.

The three of them went to the other side of the arena. They were in the same section as Dacey Mormont and Nymeria Martell. Ellaria Sand and her two daughters were nearby, as well.

Yet there's still no sign of Ellyn Clegane.

Tyrion initially assumed that Lady Ellyn was fixing her hair or doing whatever women did before they appeared at a public event. Women tended to be very self-conscious of their façade, especially when around so many other people. Not all women were like that, of course. But it applied to just about every woman Tyrion personally knew. Even whores want to look their prettiest.

When the arena was closer to completely full than halfway full, Tyrion began to suspect Ellyn was not being delayed because of her hair or anything of the sort. It was then that he developed a more grim theory.

Could it have been possible Ellyn had elected not to come at the last moment? Maybe Gregor and Sandor had misinformed him. Maybe they had been misinformed. Or maybe Lady Ellyn had actually come to have second thoughts on this meeting. He would not have blamed her; she would not be the first woman to avoid his acquaintance. But even so… he was hoping this scenario would be different.

I should not rush to conclusions just yet. She's probably just…

"Is this seat claimed, my lord?" a soft, feminine voice interrupted his broodings.

Tyrion promptly turned to his left, and he finished his thought. Just right here.

Standing before him was a maiden of thirteen. She was quite tall; she had to be closer to six feet in height than five. Despite her large stature, she was clearly blossoming into womanhood. Her breasts were already forming. They were emphasized by her tight bodice. Her somewhat wide hips accentuated her thin waistline. She maintained her posture and her stance with the confidence and grace of someone twice her age. Her long, dark hair was combed neatly and hung loosely over her shoulders.

At first glance, Tyrion honestly thought he was looking at a woman grown. The only indication that she was still a girl was in her face. Her lips still had the fullness that was commonplace in children. Nevertheless, when she opened her lips, her white teeth formed a lovely smile. Additionally, although she looked down at Tyrion from a great height, she gazed at him with understanding and compassionate eyes. Those were her most endearing features: her smile and her eyes.

After taking a moment to absorb the beauty before him, Tyrion composed himself and said in his most polite tone "Oh, no. Not at all, my lady. Please, settle down."

Ellyn Clegane continued to grin and moved to sit beside Tyrion Lannister, saying appreciatively "Thank you."
Tyrion had come to the melee in a doublet, cloak, and trousers; all of them a hue of Lannister crimson red. Lady Ellyn had likewise worn the colors of her own house. She clad entirely in yellow and black apparel. But in place of a formal dress, she had worn a riding gown. Beneath that, she wore a pair of breeches, and a cloak was fastened around her shoulders. Tyrion thought she quaintly resembled one of the warrior women from Westeros' history.

On her back, she wore what seemed to be a parcel of some sort. It was wrapped in a sheet of thick brown wool, which was tied securely with a length of string. It was at least five times longer than it was wide. Tyrion's interest was piqued.

"Would you care to place that on the ground, my lady?" Tyrion proposed, pointing out the parcel.

"No, my lord," Ellyn respectfully declined, "But if it please you, I would place it in your lap."

Tyrion was perplexed by that commented, but he did not throw aside his chivalry. He stated "I would be happy to hold your burden for you."

"It is not a burden, nor is it mine," Ellyn apprised him as she reached back, took a hold of the parcel, and brought it to her front, "It is a gift meant for your family."

Tyrion raised an eyebrow at that. This is rather unusual. Despite his skepticism, his curiosity got the better of him. "Oh? What might it be?"

"Something that was once lost to House Lannister," Ellyn revealed as she carefully held the parcel out. As Tyrion took it in his short arms, Ellyn went on with "My brothers intended to give it back to your father weeks ago. But due to the circumstances, they thought it better if I was the one to present it."

Tyrion gave a slight nod at that. He then turned to the parcel and swiftly unwrapped it. When he saw what was inside, he was aghast.

It was an ancient greatsword. Its length was nearly one and a-half times Tyrion's height. The handle was large enough that a grown man could hold it comfortably with both hands. The blade was five feet of metal. The hilt was made of solid gold painted red; the pommel was shaped in the form of a lion's head.

Normally, Tyrion could hardly even lift a weapon of such size. In spite of that, he was able to pick this one up without difficulty. And he knew why; it was because of the blade's composition. Valyrian steel... So light yet so sharp.

And he knew it was made of Valyrian steel because he knew this weapon. He had only seen illustrations of it in books of his family lineage, but there was no mistaking it for anything else.

Tyrion slowly gazed up at Ellyn Clegane and murmured quietly "This... this is my family's ancestral sword."

The tall girl lightly nodded her head and proclaimed "Yes, that is indeed Brightroar. It is past time it was returned to Casterly Rock."

Tyrion grinned again and looked back to the sword. As he wrapped Brightroar back up in the wool sheet, he muttered "I'm amazed you are just handing it back to my family like this. You could have sold it back to us for a healthy sum. Its worth is said to be so great that it could pay for an entire army."

"I'm aware of that," Ellyn declared, "But money is no longer a concern for my family. You see,
"Brightroar was found amongst the spoils aboard Euron Greyjoy's galley. Since Lord Tywin awarded my house all that wealth, parting with a single sword was easy. And even if we were in need of gold... well, what kind of people would we be if we forced our liege lord to buy his rightful property from us?"

"That is a superb point," Tyrion admitted, tying the parcel shut again, "Only mercenaries and pirates would be so bold as to sell a person's own goods back to them."

"Precisely," Ellyn conceded, "House Clegane has no desire to be associated with those types of people."

"That's commendable of you," Tyrion perceived. He then placed the parcel at his feet. He could have given it to one of his bodyguards, but he would not trust either of them with his family's ancestral sword. He trusted them with his life (to a reasonable extent), but not with Brightroar.

After sitting up straight again, Tyrion remembered he had brought something to offer, as well. He reached into his vest and proclaimed "On the subject of gifts... I have something I'd like to give you, as well, my lady."

Now it was Ellyn's turn to be intrigued. She gazed down at Tyrion expectantly. A moment later, he pulled out a small wooden box.

"This is for you personally," Tyrion enlightened her, holding it out to her, "Not your family."

"I'm certain my parents and brothers will be thankful all the same," Ellyn conjectured, gratefully accepting the box.

"What matters to me is what you think of it," Tyrion proclaimed frankly.

Ellyn opened the lid of the box, and she let out a small gasp of surprise. Pleasant surprise; I can tell.

Inside were two items. One was a golden necklace. The other was a dagger.

The necklace contained two ornaments: a lion's head and a lioness's head. Based on how they were positioned on the chain, they were meant to be facing each other.

The blade of the dagger was standard smith-forged steel, but its hilt was exceptional. The pommel bore the likeness of a massive hound bearing its fangs, and its balance was remarkable. Ellyn picked the dagger up first, and she examined it thoroughly.

"I know from your brothers that you have been trained in armed combat," Tyrion apprised her, "Hence the dagger. By the way, the blade is interchangeable. So if you wish, you could switch it out for the blade from one of those Valyrian steel daggers your brothers won from the Crow's Eye."

"Now there's a thought," Ellyn muttered, fascination evident in her voice. She set the dagger back down in the box, and she turned her focus to the other object "And the necklace?"

Tyrion plainly replied with "Well, I know from other experiences that all women are fond of jewelry."

"I cannot dispute that, my lord," Ellyn professed, smiling a bit.

Tyrion picked the necklace up and enquired "Would you mind if I put it around your neck?"
"Please do," she bade him.

Lady Ellyn turned her back to Tyrion as he rose to his feet. By standing on the bench, he was taller than she was when seated. After Ellyn moved her hair aside, he pulled the necklace around her neck and fastened the clasp at the back.

"Alright, let me see," he requested.

When Ellyn faced him again, he got to see the necklace on her, and Tyrion found he quite liked how it looked on her. I have to admit it suits her rather well.

"It's a beautiful necklace, my lord," Ellyn told him sincerely.

"I am glad you think so," was all Tyrion said in response.

Just then, one of Tyrion's bodyguards tapped him on the shoulder and whispered "Beggin' your pardon, Milord, but I believe the melee is about to start."

Tyrion turned to his front and saw that the soldier was correct. The contenders for the melee were beginning to file into the arena. There had to be over a hundred of them.

Gregor Clegane and Sandor Clegane were both among the first twenty men to enter the field. Not long after they appeared, both of them managed to spot Tyrion Lannister and his companion. Ellyn remained seated, but she vigorously waved at her brothers. They both smiled and waved back at her.

Tyrion's other bodyguard leaned down to Ellyn's level and informed her "I've bet ten golden dragons on your lord brother to win, milady."

"He'll be pleased to know that," she pronounced happily.

For his sake, let's hope Lord Gregor does win. I doubt he even has ten dragons to his name.

The last man to enter the arena was Robert Baratheon himself. He was clad in his stag armor, looking regal as ever. Under one arm, he carried his antlered helm. With the other, he held his warhammer. The entire audience became silent as the king took up his position in the very center of the line. All the other participants momentarily bowed their heads to him in respect.

Once he gained everyone's attention, Robert addressed the crowd and his fellow participants. He announced "Remember, gentlemen. This is by all means a mock combat scenario. The concept involves defeating your opponent without slaying him. I cannot emphasize that strongly enough. Blood may be shed here, but I will not allow outright bloodshed. We are not Dothraki; we do not celebrate victory with death. We celebrate as brothers-in-arms and as compatriots. We do NOT kill brothers-in-arms or compatriots. Is that understood?"

"Yes, Your Grace," the other fighters chorused altogether. Most of them at least sounded truthful.

Robert nodded in acknowledgement, donned his antlered helm, gripped his warhammer in both hands, and declared "Then let the melee commence!"

In response to that, a wave of approving applause swept through the stands.

The melee was essentially a free-for-all battle. Everyone could fight whomever he pleased at any time. In the beginning, the majority of the fights were one-on-one duels. Sometimes, two people had to team up in effort to best someone who was more skilled than either of them.
However, no renowned swordsmen ever opted to pair up with another fine swordsman so that they could gang up to beat weaker opponents. That was a craven's tactic, and cravens were not welcome in tourneys.

The main rule of the melee was quite simple: once you were knocked onto the ground or your blood was drawn, you were eliminated from the competition. The last unwounded man standing was the victor.

For a while, Tyrion kept his concentration primarily on his brother, Ser Jaime Lannister. The Kingslayer managed to dispatch five men in as many minutes. Tyrion felt an odd sense of pride, seeing his brother perform so superbly. He did his family proud. If only I could somehow do that, as well.

Of course, Jaime was not the only notable warrior on that field. There was something to be said about Lady Ellyn's brothers, too. Not only did they have substantial combat prowess, but their fighting style also utilized a fair amount of their presentation.

Sandor Clegane did not wear a helm. The sight of his face up-close was sufficient to scare the fight out of many of his adversaries long enough for him to overpower them. Gregor Clegane had no deformity to display, but his sheer height was just as intimidating. He was like eight feet of heavy metal with a hazardous, fast-moving steel addendum. Between the two of them, a dozen combatants fell in the first ten minutes.

Of course, the melee could only have one winner.

We'll have to wait and see which turns out to be the more ideal asset: repulsion or size?

"My lady," Tyrion spoke to Ellyn Clegane, "Between your two brothers, who would say is more likely to emerge victorious?"

Lady Ellyn reflected on that, and she pronounced "Most people would pick Gregor without hesitation. However, I know that bigger is not necessarily better. Sandor may have learned the basics of swordsmanship from our brother, but he knows a few things even Gregor does not. His skill set is just as broad, and he is just as adept with a blade."

"I see," Tyrion avowed, "But who do you believe to possess the better chances?"

"That would really depend on the setting," Ellyn contended, "In close quarters, I would have to favor Sandor. On an open field, Gregor would have the upper hand. Since both of those conditions apply here, it would be hard to decide. But if I absolutely had to choose one… I would place my money on Gregor."

"So would I," Tyrion admitted, "At the end of the day, he's still the Mountain, and mountains do not fall easily."

"Quite so, my lord," Ellyn agreed, "But be that as it may, my brother says a warrior's capabilities should not be evaluated by his height. There are even times when he debates that tremendous size can actually be a disadvantage. On that, I would have to agree with him."

"Why is that?" Tyrion queried in interest.

"Because I would know," Ellyn somberly apprised him.

Tyrion was taken aback. "How do you mean, my lady?"
"Well…" Ellyn Clegane began uncertainly. After a pause, she let out a sigh and asked "May I confide in you, my lord?"

"Absolutely," Tyrion assured her.

Ellyn leaned in so that only he could hear her, and she mumbled softly "Just look at me. I have only seen thirteen namedays, but I am already as tall as the average man in Westeros. I am taller than my lady mother, and I will continue to grow overtime. If my lord father and brothers are any sign, I could ultimately grow to six and a-half feet or more. Other than my sister-by-law Dacey, I might be the tallest woman in the Seven Kingdoms."

"You make it sound a travesty," Tyrion noted.

"I do not mean to," Ellyn asserted, "But being so much taller than others can be difficult at times. The majority of the men I've met seem to prefer to be friends with women who are shorter than them."

"Not all men are like that, my lady," Tyrion assured her, "If we were, I would have no one of your gender as a friend. Besides, there are some men who actually appreciate tall women."

"Yes, but they are a rarity," Ellyn disputed, "It is not uncommon for members of my gender to be fond of tall men, either. But they do not feel the same about tall women. In fact, I know firsthand that many girls see tall women as freaks."

Tyrion was stunned. "What are you saying? Have you been ridiculed or scorned… because of your height?"

"Not directly," Ellyn gloomily revealed, "However, behind my back, there are some who point and whisper about me. I ignore what they say, but I cannot ignore them altogether. Because of that… making friends with other girls is harder for me."

"You cannot mean to tell me you are friendless," Tyrion firmly insisted.

"Oh, I have plenty of friends," Ellyn proclaimed, "But I believe some of them are only my peers because their fathers are retainers to my father. As far as I am aware, I have made enemies of no one. Still, there are very few I'd call a true friend."

"I find that very difficult to fathom," Tyrion contended, "In the time since you sat beside me, you have been nothing but kind, empathetic, and accepting. How could someone with those qualities be so alone?"

"By choice, my lord," Ellyn expounded, "In all honesty, I have never cared very much for social interaction. I appear in public when it is expected of me, and I make time for my closest friends and my family. Even still, apart from them, my favorite company is my own."

I know that feeling far too well. By now, Tyrion had developed an interesting theory about the woman before him. He placed his hand on his shoulder and stated "My lady, are you saying you are… resentful of your height?"

Ellyn did not answer straightaway. After ten seconds, she looked away and shrugged. She professed "Somewhat. I mean, what good is being so tall if people are instinctively wary of you?"

Never in his lifetime did Tyrion consider that viewpoint.

As far back as he could remember, Tyrion Lannister had wondered what it would be like if he was taller. He frequently imagined himself of a height with Cersei and Jaime (and sharing their goods looks, as well). In his mind, there was no such thing as being too tall. There had even been a time when he had thought that if he was tall enough, most (if not all) of his problems would vanish.

Now, in the span of five minutes, this young but precocious woman had made him rethink his whole position on height. Seeing the issue from her perspective, he fully realized that height played no role in determining one's overall standing in the world. It was merely a single aspect of one's identity.

It appears being too tall can be just as challenging as being too short.

"You present an interesting argument, my lady," Tyrion remarked, "Long ago, I came up with an ideal that the amount of esteem a person garners from others is proportional to his or her height. Generally, one who stands higher can command respect more easily. However, I have found that that is true only if the individual has the confidence to match."

"That would explain my situation," Ellyn pronounced, "Confidence is something I tend to lack."

"You approached me without protest," Tyrion pointed out, "An unconfident person could not have managed that. You are more confident than you realize."

"Or, one could argue, a shallow person could not have done that," Ellyn contended, "I may be a solitary person, my lord, but I always remember my courtesies. When I have an appointment with someone, I never miss it. What my brothers told you is true; I really did wish to meet you. But that was not my only reason for coming here. I also came here because it was expected of me. Confidence had nothing to do with the affair."

"On the contrary," Tyrion countered, "It had everything to do with it. In fact, you are far more confident than you realize, my lady."

Ellyn seemed mildly astonished and relieved by that. "How so?"

Tyrion explained: "Although you claim interest and obligation led you here, neither of those reasons can truly dictate your actions. A person may wish to see what is north of the Wall, but he may decide he does not wish to climb the massive structure or pass through it. Just because one is willing to do something, it does not mean anything unless they actual do it. Additionally, a person's duty does not always determine what course of action he or she will take. My brother was once sworn to serve Mad King Aerys; now he is known as 'Kingslayer.' Similarly, you and I were expected to meet eventually, but this meeting was not arranged by our fathers. You could have chosen to avoid coming to this melee. You did not."

"Indeed not," Ellyn perceived frankly, "You were not forced here either, my lord. May I ask what exactly brought you here?"

"Several reasons," he revealed, "Firstly, there's the obvious reason; the reason every other spectator in this arena is here. But other than that, my motivations are the same as yours. I was eager to make your acquaintance, I was expected to follow my father's wishes… and I possessed the confidence to appear here. In front of all these people. Many of whom may be false friends."

Ellyn must have seen the point he was trying to make. Judging by her countenance, she was now a great deal cheerier than she had been when the subject of height first came up in this conversation. She also seemed far less self-conscious about how high her head stood.

Tyrion placed his hand on her shoulder and professed "I have struggled with having an unusual height myself, my lady. But I discovered that at the end of the day, the difference in height is not worth brooding over. So do not let other people bother you because of it, and do not allow other people to be unintentionally intimidated by you because of it, either. You are who you are, regardless of how much of you there is."

For a minute, Ellyn said nothing in response. I hope I was not too philosophical for her. Tyrion did not believe so. Ellyn Clegane struck him as an intelligent young woman, in spite of her apparent low self-esteem. As such, he wished to know what she thought of his interpretations.

Ultimately, Ellyn Clegane turned to Tyrion, smiled down at him, and uttered sweetly "Thank you for telling me that, my lord. You said precisely what I was hoping you would say."

Hoping I would say? Once more, Tyrion Lannister was perplexed. How could Lady Ellyn have hoped he would say anything? Had she expected to converse with him on this matter? Did she anticipate he would attempt to reassure her when she discussed her sensitivity to her height? Could that have been why she had chosen to confide in him in the first place?

As those questions passed through Tyrion's head, he looked back up at Lady Ellyn. Her smile was still there, but his eyes went immediately to hers. He was drawn to the look she was giving him now.

He knew that look. It was one that graced his own face quite often. And whenever he had that face on, he was always busy pondering or analyzing something. The look of inquisitiveness and knowledge.

While he lacked the ideal physique for a soldier, Tyrion felt he had the ideal brain for an intellectual. Since he first learned to read, Tyrion had gone to the library as often as Jaime had to the training yard. Jaime was deadly with a sword, but Tyrion was just as deadly with his mind. In his sixteen years, he had become smarter, wiser, and more cunning than just about anyone else who dwelt in Casterly Rock. In time, probably more so than anyone else in Westeros.

He firmly believed that, as he had never met anyone with a mind that could contest his in such a way.

Until this very moment, perhaps. Sandor did mention that his sister was very astute for her age, but I never would have thought her capable of this. I wonder if she ever actually had those insecurities about her stature, or if she just invented them to see if I would comfort her.

He was partly inclined to believe both possibilities. It was well-known (in this part of the Westerlands, at least) that unlike her elder brothers, Ellyn Clegane was not very outgoing. Her unnatural height was as good a reason as any for her shyness. In any case, Tyrion knew that the most introverted people were often the ones with the greatest opportunities to learn the ways of the world. Often, they also developed the ability to notice things that were often overlooked by most other people.

It suddenly occurred to Tyrion Lannister that Ellyn Clegane had to be one of those individuals. She was definitely more assertive than she claimed to be. Moreover, she was incredibly observant; observant in the studious sense. That whole discussion about height and how it affected her emotionally… it must have been a test. A rather elaborate test meant to bring out Tyrion's good nature (assuming it was there, and it was).

She may have invented that test after she sat down beside me. If so… she is even cleverer than Sandor gave her credit for.
In a match of wits, Tyrion had never been caught off guard. This marked the first instance when he was. One would think he would hold a grudge against the person who managed to outwit him. But as it may, he did not resent Lady Ellyn for her actions. In fact, he admired her for it. In his experience, sharp women were scarce to come across. Now he found one who could probably match him in acumen, and that was a blessing in itself.

It is likely she intends to observe me all throughout this meeting. In that case… I shall do the same.

As the melee progressed, Tyrion Lannister and Ellyn Clegane discussed various other issues in depth.

They talked about the role one's appearance has in making both first and lasting impressions. Tyrion used Sandor Clegane for one of his major points. One thing he and the Hound now had in common was that both their faces were partly deformed. He paid especial attention to Lady Ellyn's reaction when he addressed that fact. In the end, she contended that while a person's appearance could impact how others saw them, it was not what was mainly responsible for leaving an impression. Their deeds were. Tyrion had to agree with her.

They talked about ambition and how it influenced one's achievements. In five years, Gregor Clegane had gone from a mere knight of the Westerlands to a renowned lord of the North. Along the way, he had formed the most unified fighting company in all of Westeros, and he had made the country the safest it had been in decades. Tyrion and Ellyn wished to be part of something just as magnificent and grand, but they had never been given the opportunity. But... the opportunity could certainly become available in the future.

They talked about change and how it was consistently coming to the country with each passing year. Once more, the Legion without Banners was a focal point in the discussion. Ever since the tourney at Lannisport began, Lord Gregor and his lieutenants had been searching the grounds for new recruits. Dozens of Legionnaires had been made in the last few weeks, including Thorsos of Myr, Ser Jacelyn Bywater, Eddison Tollett, Ser Wendel Manderly, and Ser Bonifer Hasty. Most notably, Gregor had taken on Willas Tyrell, the heir to Highgarden, as his own squire. Lord and Lady Tyrell had put up surprisingly little protest to their firstborn joining the Legion. Ellyn had even heard that her brother had convinced Lord Randyll Tarly to consider sending his son Samwell to Moat Cailin when he was of age. Samwell was said to be a craven. That gave Tyrion and Ellyn an idea. If cravens were welcome in the Legion, why not dwarves or giantesses? Just one possible future to think about.

With every new topic they discussed, Tyrion came to appreciate and like Lady Ellyn even more. By her behavior and the way she looked at him now, she was rapidly developing similar feelings for him. They were now longer calling each other "my lord" or "my lady." By now, they were on a first-name basis.

The last thing they talked about was love and the role it played in everyday life. By the time they reached this topic, the melee was nearly over. Only a dozen contenders remained unwounded and on their feet. Gregor and Sandor were among them. Tyrion and Ellyn frequently alternated their attention from each other and the ongoing battle before them. All the while, they spoke about the various types of love.

First, there was domestic love. Ellyn had always been loved by her parents and brothers unconditionally. Tyrion, however, had never been loved in such a way. While his brother and uncles had loved him in a way, his father and sister had never had anything but cold disdain for him. Then again, it was debatable as to whether or not Lord Tywin or Queen Cersei were actually capable of loving anyone. Other than themselves, that is.
Then there was platonic love. That was the type of love Ellyn felt for her sisters-by-law Dacey Mormont and Obara Martell, as well as all the friends she had made growing up. Tyrion had a number of friends at Casterly Rock he felt a similar form of love for.

Lastly, they arrived at romantic love. The type of love people normally thought of when they heard the word "love." Ellyn admitted she was totally unversed in that field, and Tyrion confessed to her that he was not. There was only one woman he had loved, and he had not seen her in a year. He was not surprised when Lady Ellyn revealed that she knew about Tysha. Tyrion had fully expected Sandor to tell his sister about the Imp's first and thus far only love.

Tyrion also revealed that he had lain with a number of whores. Luckily, he had not been such a fool as to fall in love with any of them. Ellyn did not mind the whores; she was just pleased that he was honest with her. Furthermore, Tyrion assured her that he took marriage vows very seriously. Once he was a married man, he would never look at a whore again.

Of course, the outcome of this meeting will determine whether I ever will be a married man.

By the end of that talk, there were only two participants left in the melee: King Robert Baratheon and Lord Gregor Clegane.

Throughout the stands of the arena, the spectators watched closely as the two men sparred, greatsword against warhammer. All eyes were locked on them.

Actually, in all technicality, all but four eyes. Tyrion Lannister and Ellyn Clegane were more engrossed in each other.

It was in this moment, as two of the strongest men in Westeros fought in mock combat, that Tyrion finally addressed the issue that had brought him and Lady Ellyn together in the first place. He took her hands in his, gazed up at her, and he told her in a delicate yet firm voice "Ellyn, we have talked at length for hours, and in that time, I have come to admire you both as a woman and as a person. I already feel as though I know you as I would my dearest friend. But friendship is not the intended result of this engagement. So it is now that I must ask you... will you one day do me the honor of becoming my lady wife? I will not force you to accept; the decision is yours entirely."

In spite of how well he now knew Lady Ellyn, part of him still expected her to flat-out refuse him or take a very long time to reply. But she did neither. Instead, she grinned gently and placed a kiss on Tyrion's forehead. After that, she gazed into his eyes and declared "I doubt there is any man I would rather ask me that question. I gladly accept your offer, Tyrion."

Tyrion smiled. He could not see his own face at that time, but he was certain his smile extended the length of his cheeks.

At that very same moment, the melee ended. Lord Gregor Clegane managed to knock the King onto his back. No one uttered a sound while the King was on the ground. After Lord Gregor helped him back to his feet, the king spontaneously burst out laughing. He laughed for nearly thirty seconds. Then he shouted comically "That's one mountain this stag won't try to conquer!"

Everyone in the arena laughed and erupted in tumultuous cheers. Everyone except Tyrion Lannister and Ellyn Clegane. The two of them paid no mind to that or anything else that was happening around them. Instead, they moved closer together and embraced each other fondly.
After the melee, the archery competition was all that remained of the tourney's major events. This time, the list of contenders was not as long or diverse as that of the joust or the melee, but it still had an impressive turnout.

King Robert Baratheon chose not to participate in this event. He inwardly felt archery was for those who were too craven to meet their foes face-to-face. Then again, it had been quite a while since he had last used a bow. Although there was a chance he could still shoot as straight as he did in his youth, he had no desire to risk humiliating himself in public by displaying his lack of practice. Ned would probably accuse me of "just not wishing to lose."... And he would not be entirely incorrect.

The winner of the archery turned out to be Lothor Brune, a Legionnaire Robert had knighted at the tourney.

For the early part of his life, Ser Lothor had been a freerider of the Crownlands. He was a distant cousin of the Brunes of Brownhollow, but no one of that house regarded him as kin. For that reason, he had chosen to join the Legion without Banners, who treated him far more pleasantly than his own relations ever did.

Lothor Brune had shown considerable skill and dedication during Greyjoy's Rebellion. At the siege of Pyke, he had been pivotal in singlehandedly fighting off a wave of Ironborn reinforcements at both the top wall and the Great Hall. That in turn enabled the King's forces to advance through the castle more easily. For those heroic deeds, the king had knighted him.

Although he did not partake in the archery, Robert had attended it all the same. He still found it quite exciting, and he cheered as loudly as anyone else in the stands.

After Ser Lothor Brune was declared victor, the tourney more or less reached its unofficial end.

Several days had elapsed since then. The tourney grounds had been almost entirely disassembled. The majority of the traders, merchants, and vendors had left with fewer of their goods and a greater amount of gold than when they had arrived. Many lords and knights had returned to their homes.
with their men.

Some had decided to linger. The King, his forces, the Lords Paramount, their retainers, and the Legionnaires were among those who remained. They too would be leaving soon enough. But first, they were to attend a private gathering at Clegane's Keep.

The gathering had been sanctioned by Robert, but it had been called at the request of Lord Gregor Clegane.

Robert could still vividly recall his duel with the Mountain, and how he had laughed at its conclusion, even though it had not ended in his favor. Normally, Robert Baratheon did not accept defeat so well or in such good humor. But he made an exception when Lord Gregor Clegane bested him in the melee.

As a matter of fact, King Robert had come to greatly respect the Mountain, and not just as a warrior. Ever since he took the throne, it had been his duty to stabilize the realm, secure his rule, and unify the Seven Kingdoms. Lord Jon Arryn, Grand Maester Marwyn, Lord Varys, and the rest of the Small Council had done plenty to aid him in those endeavors, but none of them had done as much as his Master of Order.

It all began on that one fateful day, when Lord Gregor had told Robert of Lyanna's "last words." The stag was not one to shed needless tears (one of the few things he and his brother Stannis had in common), but he had nearly been driven to them when he was told that Lyanna's dying wish was for him to be the best king he could possibly be.

At the time, Robert had doubted his own ability to govern Westeros properly. Lord Gregor had given him the assurance that he could. From that day onward, Robert had put his all into being a good king.

He liked to believe he had done an excellent job so far. At the end of his rebellion, the North, the Vale, the Riverlands, the Stormlands, and the Westerlands had terrible relations with the Reach, Dorne, and the Crownlands. Now, they were fighting alongside each other as brothers and sisters-in-arms. A couple months back, the Iron Islands had been welcomed into the fold, making the entire realm completely whole for the first time in recent history. As much as Robert would have loved to claim credit for this accomplishment, he could not. Much of it belonged to his subjects; Gregor Clegane most of all.

So when Lord Gregor asked to have a private gathering without even providing a reason for it, Robert Baratheon had granted his request without hesitation. Lord Gregor then presented the king with a list of people he expected to appear at the gathering. Fortunately, all of them had not yet departed. As such, Robert assured him that every person on that list would be summoned to the Main Hall of Clegane's Keep as soon as humanly possible.

The king took some time to look over the list by himself. There were a total of thirty individuals on it.

Lord Gregor had placed himself, his wife Lady Dacey, and his immediate family at the top of the list. That was composed of Lord Tarrence, Lady Daliah, Ser Sandor, his wife Obara, and Lady Ellyn.

After that, Robert noticed that his Hand, his best friend, his brother, and his father-by-law were the next people on the list. So were Mace Tyrell, Victarion Greyjoy, and Hoster Tully. All but one of the Lords Paramount had been asked to go to the gathering. Since Prince Doran Martell was currently in Sunspear, Oberyn Martell would be there in his brother's place.
Next were a few more Legionnaires, such as Smalljon Umber, Allard Seaworth, Gerion Lannister, Willas Tyrell, and Lothor Brune.

With the death of Ser Osmund Kettleblack at Moat Cailin, Lord Gregor Clegane's inner circle no longer had a representative from the Crownlands. Sometime during the tourney of Lannisport, the Mountain had picked Ser Lothor to serve as Ser Osmund's replacement. Furthermore, the Reach's vacancy caused by the death of Ser Garth Hightower had been filled by his nephew, Willas Tyrell. Lord Willas was only a lad of thirteen, and he was merely serving as Gregor's squire for the time being, but he already had the respect of the Reach and the means to speak for them.

The next eight people on the list were Davos Seaworth, Barristan Selmy, Jorah Mormont, his wife Nymeria, Ellaria Sand, Kevan Lannister, Tyron Lannister, and Jaime Lannister. Unlike the twenty listed before them, the reason for their inclusions did not seem as obvious. The Onion Knight, the Lord Commander of my Kingsguard, the bear lord and his Dornish bride, the Red Viper's baseborn lover, Tywin's overlooked brother, the Imp, and the Kingslayer. Quite an ensemble. But what could they possibly have in common with the others? Or, in some cases, each other?

The last two people on the list had been marked as "optional attendees." They were the King and his Queen. Apparently, the two of them were not being commanded to attend. Instead, they had been invited to come. At least Lord Gregor does not try to abuse his authority.

All the same, after some meditation on the issue, Robert decided he and Cersei would go to the gathering. Whatever his Master of Order had to show them, he figured it would be worth their attention. Lord Gregor would not waste the king's time with petty matters.

It was not difficult to talk Cersei into accompanying him to the gathering. In fact, she seemed just as eager and curious to learn the purpose of the gathering as he was.

Then again, Cersei had never denied herself the privileges of being Queen. Ever since their wedding, she had insisted (or "begged," as he called it) on joining Robert at the Small Council meetings. Initially, he had been reluctant to bring a woman to that table. Overtime, though, he was able to look past Cersei's tits and focus more on her brain. She had a special talent for politics. She was definitely more familiar and better-versed in them than he was, at any rate. Now she there was always a seat for her on the Small Council. All of the members, especially King Robert, appreciated and valued her input.

The private gathering was set to take place in the Main Hall of Clegane's Keep right after dinnertime. Robert and Cersei reached the keep in the late evening, just after the Sun disappeared over the horizon. Ser Jaime and Ser Barristan had accompanied them there.

As they approached the large holdfast, Cersei mentioned she was impressed by how much the Cleganes had improved it, but she still felt Casterly Rock would have been a more appropriate place for the gathering. She would know; she grew up there. Robert had to admit Casterly Rock would make a more ideal meeting site than most other places. All the same, the ascent took longer than he would have liked, and Lord Tywin would not have been pleased to host anyone in his ancestral home without his consent. Robert ultimately reassured Cersei that the keep would be adequate.

The King, the Queen, and the two Kingsguard knights soon arrived in the keep's Main Hall. Robert discovered they were the last ones to show. Everyone else was already assembled in the room.

Once the four of them were inside the Main Hall, Lord Gregor dismissed the guards, the servants, and anyone else whose name was not among the thirty he had sent for. After that, he had the doors locked and braced, and he had the walls examined to ensure that there were no openings anywhere.
He would not allow even the slightest possibility of eavesdroppers. Now I'm very interested to know what he has to tell. It must be extraordinary. Or dangerous. Or extraordinarily dangerous. Or dangerously extraordinary.

It turned out to be all the above.

The trestle tables had been arranged in such a way that they formed a circle around the Main Hall. A bench had been placed on a platform directly below the dais. Robert, Cersei, and Lord Tywin took up spots on that bench. Everyone else took up a spot on one of the trestle tables. They sat so they were facing inward.

Gregor Clegane stood in the very center of the circle. Although he was dressed informally in a doublet and a pair of trousers, he was armed. Strapped to his back was a massive greatsword. At least, it would look massive in the hand of a regular-sized man. Next to the Mountain, it looked no longer than the typical bastard sword.

Also, this greatsword was not the one Lord Gregor had fought with in Greyjoy's Rebellion or the one he had used at the tourney. Robert had seen that blade up close a number of times during the melee, and he could tell at a glance that this sword was different. It seemed far sharper and deadlier, yet much lighter at the same time.

Looks quite a bit like Ice. I wonder if Ned thinks so, too.

Gregor Clegane waited for everyone to give him their undivided attention. Then he commenced the meeting. He opened with the following introduction: "Twice over the course of the last sixteen months, I provided you vital information about the Ironborn Rebellion. That information was critical in minimizing the length of the ensuing war and the damage it inflicted on the realm. Of course, since I was able to produce this information before the war actually began, many of you were left wondering on how it came into my possession. Alas, the only explanation I gave for my knowledge was that I had a 'source.' I am grateful you did not pressure me into yielding further elaboration at the time. Nevertheless, I have decided it is time you were all told the truth of my source."

That last sentence succeeded in capturing Robert's interest. From the looks of the others' faces, it had captured theirs, as well. During the Rebellion, Robert had given little thought to this source of Lord Gregor's. Back then, all that mattered to him was that it was reliable and accurate. However, throughout the tourney, his mind had occasionally drifted back to the "source" and its origin. It enabled us to win the war swiftly and decisively. Yes, I would very much like to learn the nature of it.

Gregor folded his hands together behind his back and began pacing around the circular space within the trestle tables. As he walked, he made eye contact with whoever was directly in front of him. After a minute of this, he asked rhetorically "Have you ever pondered on our purpose for being here?"

"Well, you summoned us," Ser Lothor commented bluntly. That produced a number of scoffs.

"I don't mean here specifically," Gregor stated, "I mean 'here' as in 'anywhere.' Do you know our reason for living? Moreover, what would you say is the reason for us to even exist?"

"I am not certain we understand the questions," Kevan Lannister remarked. There were some murmurs of agreement.

"Let me clarify," Gregor expounded, "Imagine life as a tale out of a book. Suppose the Gods are "The storytellers and the people of the world are merely characters in their saga of the ages."

"That would be a fitting description," Tyrion Lannister debated, "After all, regardless of who among men has the most power in this world, the gods are the ones who really pull the strings."

"Precisely," Gregor Clegane affirmed, "Now, as features of the story, we – meaning the characters – would be expected to go about their daily lives while the gods played the part of the authors to determine our fates. Each character would have a unique part to play, no matter how insignificant it may seem. However, suppose one particular character somehow became aware that he was living in a story. Now suppose that overtime, he became capable of predicting what the authors would write next."

"How could a fictitious individual possibly gain such an awareness?" Tywin Lannister disputed.

"This is merely speculation, Lord Tywin," Lord Gregor reminded him, "Look past the relationship between the authors and the characters, and you'll see I am making an analogy of the relationship between gods and men."

"By that logic, if a real man learned the will of the gods, he could foresee the intended future," Oberyn Martell contended.

"Correct," the Mountain muttered. He gazed around the room and announced "That is my source."

That is quite a fabulous declaration. Some of the others began whispering to each other. A few stared at Gregor Clegane as though he had gone mad or as though he was speaking in tongues. Most everyone else seemed rather intrigued by that revelation.

"What do you entail, Lord Gregor?" Robert enquired, "Are you saying you can communicate with the gods?"

"Not necessarily communicate with them, Your Grace," Gregor disclosed, "But I have the means to learn what plans they have for the future."

He paused for a moment, but before anyone could ask a question, the Mountain added in "Alas, these means are not entirely within my control."

"Well, what are these means?" Allard Seaworth queried.

"Yes, tell us, Lord Gregor," Willas Tyrell bade the huge man, "How can you gain such insights from the gods?"

"They come to me in the form of visions," Gregor Clegane claimed, "They always come in my sleep. At first, I dismissed them as mere dreams. But when I observed the exact same sequence every night for a week, I was quick to reevaluate my judgment. In addition to that, each sequence is far too vivid and detailed to be a dream. Before too long, I began to connect the visions with events that were occurring in real life. That was when I started to believe that the gods were showing me glimpses of the future on an irregular basis."

"Remarkable," Tarrence Clegane mumbled softly. Just what I was thinking.

"Could you possibly be a greenseer?" Eddard Stark hypothesized.

"I can see why you might think so, Lord Eddard," the lord of Moat Cailin admitted, "However, whatever a greenseer sees, he cannot prevent. That restriction does not apply to me."
That statement only captivated the Mountain's audience even more so than before.

"How so, Greg?" Sandor Clegane asked his brother.

"Here I go back to the scenario of the authors and their characters," Gregor Clegane pronounced, "Let us assume for a moment that the self-aware character discovered that a certain imminent part of the story would produce dismal repercussions for himself or those he cared about. What do you imagine he would do?"

"There is nothing he could do," Hoster Tully debated, "If the authors decide to incorporate that unfortunate part, then it is their choice and theirs alone. Once it is written, the story cannot be undone."

"The original story, perhaps," Lord Gregor disputed, "But the original story only truly exists in the authors' minds. They may have intended for things to occur differently than they actually did. Those alternate ideas would live on elsewhere. Apart from that, the authors have no direct control over this rogue character they created."

"In that case... the character would be free to change the story as he saw fit," Ellyn Clegane theorized.

"That is my point," the Mountain revealed, "For more than fifteen years, I have seen certain events of the future countless times. If I wished to, I could have been a spectator and nothing more. Instead, I chose to take advantage of this knowledge of what was forthcoming. Now, the Westeros of my visions is no longer the definite Westeros of the future; it merely one possible future Westeros."

"Do you mean to tell us that you have deliberately altered history?" Stannis Baratheon uttered incredulously.

"That is indeed what I have done," Gregor shamelessly confirmed.

He's done what many have hopelessly attempted, yet he speaks as though any person could have done the same. Whether it's modesty or confidence, I could not say. Both, perhaps.

Although Robert was astonished and impressed by the Mountain's audacity and conviction, not everyone else seemed to share his fascination. Some were startled, some were shocked, and some were beyond flabbergasted.

"Gregor, do you realize the risks of what you have done?" Daliah Clegane murmured nervously, "Tampering with fate is dangerous enough. Tampering with the will of the gods... that is perhaps the most dangerous act a person could ever dare commit."

"I agree with your lady mother," Jorah Mormont conceded, "Neither the Old Gods nor the New nor any other gods look kindly upon mortal interference. Your actions could put the entire country at the risk of incurring the gods' wrath."

"I understand your concerns," Gregor Clegane proclaimed, "I assure you that I did not act hastily. I spent many hours considering all the possible consequences of my intervention. Even so, I ultimately decided that while the risks were great, they were worth the overall benefits. Aside from that, if the gods did not mean for me to become an unpredictable factor, why did they allow me to have these visions in the first place?"

No one there could dispute that point. Robert had to admit it was a very practical and sensible argument. The only reason he'd even have those visions is if he was meant to rewrite our country's history.

Lord Gregor grinned in mild satisfaction when no one offered a counterargument. He folded his arms and muttered "I doubt any one of you would have done differently. Especially if you saw the things I saw."

"What did you see?" Mace Tyrell inquired.

"And what all have you altered?" Queen Cersei demanded.

Gregor answered both their questions at once: "I have seen many things; all of them equal parts undesirable and horrific. I try to alter them in any way I can, but like the visions, I do not have absolute control over how much change I can instill. It mostly depends on where I am and the position I am in."

"Could you give us an example?" Nymeria Mormont requested.

The Mountain nodded and kept walking along the small circular area as he illuminated: "Near the end of King Robert's Rebellion, when the Westerlords made for King's Landing, I had a vision every night for the duration of the march. This vision was of the Sack of King's Landing. The taking of the city was meant to be far more violent than it really was. Thousands would have been put to the sword, and I do not mean just soldiers. Unarmed men, women, and children alike would have been slaughtered indiscriminately. Moreover, Princess Elia would have been among them."

That statement made the Dornishmen gape in astonishment. Prince Oberyn sat up and murmured quietly "She was not?"

Lord Gregor solemnly nodded and explicated "She was destined to die alongside her children. So I took steps to ensure that the duty of supervising the Westerlander units who seized the city. I knew King's Landing would never fall without a few civilian casualties, but I was determined to minimize the number."

"Yes, and you accomplished that superbly," Jon Arryn stated in approval.

"Thank you, my Lord Hand," Gregor said appreciatively. Then he returned his attention to everyone else present and continued with "After the city was secure, I rushed to the Red Keep with the intention of rescuing Princess Elia and her children. I was unable to save Rhaenys and Aegon, but I managed to prevent Ser Amory Lorch from butchering their mother."

"For that, Dorne will always be grateful," Obara Clegane declared. Her half-sister, her father, and father's paramour all mumbled in agreement.

"That solves your mystery, Tywin," Kevan Lannister slyly said to his older brother.

Mystery? What in the gods' name...? Gerion Lannister seemed to share the king's curiosity. He turned to the Lord of Casterly Rock and asked "What does he mean by that?"

"Never mind that," the lion lord told his youngest sibling dismissively. He then focused his glare on Lord Gregor and uttered "You expect us to believe it was the gods who told you that Amory Lorch would go after Elia and her children?"

"Yes, I expect you to believe that," Gregor Clegane confirmed plainly, "I also expect you to believe that from that very same vision, I know the true reason why your elder son earned his moniker."
Now even Lord Tywin was perplexed. He leaned back in his seat and said sharply "What?"

"Ser Jaime did not slay Aerys just to do us all a favor," the Lord of Moat Cailin revealed, "Granted, it was a favor. Even so, he had another motivation for shoving his sword through the Mad King's back. A far more noble and admirable reason."

"Gregor, that's enough!" Jaime Lannister sternly interjected.

The Kingslayer had not spoken since the meeting began. That sudden outburst took many of the others by surprise. Lord Gregor appeared indifferent to it.

"Is it?" the Mountain snapped, "They should know."

"Know what?" Victarion Greyjoy uttered inquisitively.

Neither Gregor Clegane nor Jaime Lannister answered straightaway. The Mountain took a minute to gaze at the people around him. Then he looked back to the Kingslayer and pronounced "Either you tell them or I will. Why protect the name of an insane, undeserving monarch who burned people alive for pleasure? What could you possibly gain by continuing to withhold the truth?"

That argument seemed to sway Ser Jaime's mind. A few seconds later, he sighed and remarked "Very well."

When all eyes were on him, he rose to his feet and proclaimed "When Father's forces took King's Landing, Aerys issued the order for the city to be burned to the ground. Up until then, I had stood by his side without a word of protest. But when he yelled "Burn them all," I reached my breaking point. So I left with Lord Rossart under the pretense of guarding him to the Alchemist's Guild safely. Once we were alone, I ran him through. Then I returned to the throne room and did the same to the Mad King. Even as he died, his last words were 'Burn them all… burn them all… burn them all…'"

A wave of silence came over the room. Everyone except Lord Gregor was dumbfounded. Robert could not even find words. He always knew that Aerys was a sadistic lunatic, but he never would have thought that even the Mad King could have been capable of such atrocities. And I let Ser Jaime be scorned by the very people he broke his oath to protect. I should have had him reveled as a hero.

"Why did you not tell anyone this?" Tywin Lannister muttered crossly.

"Who'd believe the word of an oathbreaker?" Ser Jaime retorted heatedly.

"His bloody brother, perhaps?" Tyrion countered irately.

"Or his sister?" Cersei spat. One of the very few moments when the two of them agree on something. How ironic they are arguing against their other sibling; the one who is usually on better terms with both of them.

"As family, people would have expected you to believe me," Jaime Lannister argued, "Your word would not have been any more credible than mine."

"I have a hard enough time believing it myself," Lothor Brune murmured.

"Everything Ser Jaime just said is true," Gregor Clegane announced, "I can attest to it."

That seemed to ease the potent feeling of disbelief that was present all around the room.
Just then, Ser Barristan Selmy got to his feet, and he declared "While I take my oath as a Kingsguard as seriously as any other man who's worn a white cloak, I cannot deny that I may very well have done the same as Ser Jaime, had I been the one left with King Aerys in his place."

He then turned to Ser Jaime and offered him his hand. The blonde knight was hesitant at first, but he ultimately took the elder knight's hand and shook it firmly.

That was quite unexpected. For the last six years, Ser Barristan the Bold had looked at his young colleague with nothing but contempt. Now, he actually seemed to look at him with a mixture of remorse and respect.

"I would have done it, too," Sandor Clegane professed, "No oath is worth the lives of half a million people."

"Quite so," Gregor coincided, "In fact, when I arrived in the Red Keep during the Sack, I considered making a detour to the throne room and killing Aerys for Jaime. But I had no way of knowing if Ser Amory would reach Princess Elia before or after that happened. So I took a moment to reflect on my options. In the end, I gave priority to rescuing the princess. Alas, that one instant of hesitation may have cost her children their lives."

"Do not blame yourself, my lord," Eddard Stark bade the Mountain, "For all you know, Princess Rhaenys and Prince Aegon might have been killed by someone other than Ser Amory."

Robert noticed Ned sneered at Lord Tywin when he said that. Both the king and his best friend where aware that the Lord of Casterly Rock had sent Ser Amory after the royal Targaryen family in the first place. Odd how Lord Gregor did not mention that Ser Amory was acting under his liege lord's orders. Then again, perhaps that is a good thing. I have no desire to incite a struggle between Lord Tywin and Prince Oberyn.

"What really matters is that my sister survived," Oberyn declared, "If she was killed, diplomatic relations between the Westerlands and Dorne would have been beyond disastrous."

"I believe that," Dacey Clegane muttered drily.

For starters, the Hound would not be sharing a bed with Prince Oberyn's eldest daughter.

There was a brief period of silence, and then Robert looked to his Master of Order and supposed "So, Lord Gregor; I assume these visions of yours are where you acquired your intelligence on the Ironborn's rebellion?"

"You assume rightly, Your Grace," Gregor Clegane confirmed, "In my vision, I saw the Westerlander Fleet burn at Lannisport. That is why I sent out ravens to alert the country of an invasion from the sea. Of course, it would have been suspicious if only the Westerlords received this warning. As such, I ensured that the residents of all the maritime holdfasts in Westeros took steps to fortify their defenses. By doing so, I ensured that the entire coast would be safe if the Ironborn chose to bypass Lannisport. Fortunately for us, almost all of the Westerlander vessels were saved."

"We are indebted to you for that, my lord," Tyrion Lannister proclaimed, "But we received your raven six months before the Iron Fleet attacked. You said your vision of King's Landing first came no less than a fortnight before the Sack. How do you account for the vast difference in time?"

"I cannot," the Mountain confessed, "I have no influence over when the visions come, or how often they recur. Luckily, they always seem to happen at a very opportune time."
"Your vision of Seagard and Fair Isle was definitely convenient," Robert debated, "It enabled us to win both battles, and it proved Lord Victarion's loyalty to the throne."

"I will not forget that anytime soon," the Iron Captain commented in an uncharacteristically warm tone. Ever since he had been named Lord Paramount of the Iron Islands, he had been conspicuously friendlier to the people of the mainland. People he used to call "greenlanders" in disdain.

"According to my vision, you would have won the war regardless, Your Grace," Gregor informed the king, "My actions in response to the vision just made victory more easily attainable."

"Nevertheless, I am thankful for all you did," Robert Baratheon claimed in a sincere tone, "But there is still one aspect I do not fully comprehend. Why did you wait until this moment to tell us all this?"

"I'd like to know that myself," Mace Tyrell conceded.

"As would I," Davos Seaworth muttered.

Practically every other person in the Main Hall shared a wish for some form of explanation. Luckily, Lord Gregor was able to provide one.

"Because at the time, I would have sounder madder than your predecessor, Your Grace," the Mountain professed, "Up until Greyjoy's Rebellion, the majority of my visions had only been about small, isolated incidents. The Sack of King's Landing was an exception, of course. Other than that, they were all relatively minor. There were also some where I ended up making little difference or none at all. For instance, I saw Prince Rhaegar making off with Lady Lyanna, the skirmish at the Tower of Joy, the death of Queen Rhaella at Dragonstone, the flight of Prince Viserys and Princess Daenerys across the Narrow Sea… I was either partly or wholly unable to change the outcome of all of those events."

"But you did plenty in the war with the Ironborn," Ellaria Sand perceived.

"Nonetheless, if I told you of my visions before the war, it would have sounded fantastical," Gregor pointed out, "Back then, I had no evidence to support my claims of these visions. I knew I would need some irrefutable proof before I could present you my explanation. Now, since I correctly predicted the attempted burning of the Westerlander Fleet and the assaults on Seagard and Fair Isle, I like to think that my word is sufficient evidence."

"It is more than enough evidence for me," Robert decreed.

"It may be enough for me, as well," Stannis Baratheon remarked.

That took Robert by surprise. Normally, Stannis was far more difficult to convince than his royal brother.

The Lord of Dragonstone leaned forward and said to Gregor inquisitively "My lord, when you warned me on the likelihood that my daughter would contract greyscale, was that one of your visions at work?"

"It was," Lord Gregor validated, "So long as you burn every doll that is gifted to her anonymously, she should be safe from the disease."

"And is that why you cautioned me against jousting with Prince Oberyn?" Willas Tyrell presumed.
"Hmm?" said the Red Viper, a little baffled.

"Yes," Gregor answered the heir to Highgarden, "Your horse would have fallen on your leg in the tilt. It would have been an accident, and you would have remained on good terms with the prince, but you would have been stuck with a cane for the remainder of your life."

"Then I owe you a great debt, my lord," Mace Tyrell proclaimed with a wide smile.

Oberyn Martell raised an eyebrow in amusement. Then he leaned back in his seat a bit, and he uttered inquiringly "Tell us, Gregor; have you any other visions involving the forecast of the world that you would care to share with us?"

At that, the expression across Lord Gregor's countenance seemed to darken. Then he pronounced in a rather unsettling voice "Yes. As it happens, that is my main motivation for this private gathering."

Hoster Tully cocked his head and stated "I thought your main motivation was to explain your 'source',"

"No, that is only my secondary reason," the Lord of Moat Cailin enlightened them, "The primary reason is far more noteworthy and imperative, and it is infinitely more disturbing."

That is not a very promising transition.

"What could be more disturbing than learning that one has inexplicably received the ability to see all the possible ordeals of the world in the future?" Eddard Stark contended.

"Learning that the world might not even have a future," Gregor Clegane ominously replied.

The atmosphere in the Main Hall quickly changed from fairly inquisitive to overwhelmingly anxious. Even the King and Lord Tywin were notably bothered by the implications of that statement.

"What are you saying, my love?" Lady Dacey asked her husband.

Lord Gregor looked to his wife and held eye contact with her for about thirty seconds. Then he reluctantly looked away and resumed his stride along the circular space between the trestle tables.

He began this next account with "Most of my visions, I only see a couple weeks or months ahead of time. However, there is one vision I have had at least once a week for the last seven years. That is far longer than I've ever had any other vision. All the same, the event it focuses on will not transpire for another decade."

Here he paused for a few seconds, and then he went on: "As you know, the country's last winter ended nearly two years ago. However, as you may have noticed, it is not officially summer yet. The Conclave has yet to dispatch the white ravens. We're having an abnormally long spring, don't you think?"

"Now that you mention it… yes," Smalljon Umber admitted. From what Robert could recall of what Ned told him of the North, the Umbers of Last Hearth lived closer to the Wall than any other family on the mainland. If they can tell it's still spring, it must be warm indeed.

"The seasons will change soon enough," Gregor Clegane revealed, "The next summer will be the longest in recorded history. It will last ten full years."

Allard Seaworth whistled in amazement. There were a few more mutters of surprise.
"You heard me correctly," Gregor asserted, "Due to its length, some will believe it to be the Great Summer of legend. For many people, those ten years will be the greatest of their lives. However... they could also be the last."

A very tense, very unpleasant silence encompassed the room. Mace Tyrell asked worriedly "Why? What will come after this decade-long summer?"

Gregor gazed around the room and proclaimed "It is said that a long summer is followed by an even longer winter. When was the last time a winter of ten years or more struck this country?"

"Not for eight millennia," Eddard Stark grimly responded, "When the Long Night came."

"Just so, Lord Eddard," Gregor affirmed. He stopped pacing, and he asked rhetorically "Do you see where I am headed with this?"

I'm afraid I do see. So did everyone else, given the horrified expressions that had come across their faces.

"Gregor... did you have a vision that the Long Night would return?" Lady Daliah murmured softly.

The Mountain gave a light nod of his head. "Normally, I view these visions as gifts or blessings. But this one is a curse. I have been forced to endure it hundreds of times. It always ends the same way: Westeros is buried under yards of snow, and the land becomes overrun by the Others."

No one spoke for the next five minutes. Most of them needed that much time to comprehend what they had heard. Even after that interval, some of them could not fully grasp it. Robert personally did not know what to make of it. His Master of Order – a man of unquestionable integrity and moral standing – had just told him that in less than fifteen years, the world would end. Had anyone else told him that, he would have written it off as inane ramblings. But after what he had just learned from Lord Gregor, he saw no reason to doubt him.

Robert was the first to come to terms with Lord Gregor's haunting revelation. He did not lose his composure or panic. There must be a way out of that nightmare. The king remained totally calm and queried "So... how do we avoid this?"

"That cannot be done, Your Grace," Gregor dismally expounded, "Most of the events in my other visions were avoidable in some degree. Be that as it may, no amount of intervention on my part or anyone else's can prevent the Long Night from happening."

"So, what?" Victarion said sardonically, "Are we supposed to just lie down and freeze to death?"

"I did not say that," Gregor Clegane serenely refuted, "The Long Night will come; make no mistake of that. But there is much that can be done to prepare the country for its arrival. Still, I am only one man. There is only so much I can do, even if I command thousands of proficient warriors. That is why I brought you all together."

"To alert us?" Davos Seaworth assumed.

"To plead for your help," Gregor Clegane clarified. "Together, the thirty people in this room possess more influence than everyone else in the Seven Kingdoms combined. The other houses and the smallfolk need to know what is coming, and we need to guarantee their full cooperation in the measures we take to prepare for it. The only way we can ensure that is if we deliver the news together."

"He's right," Ellyn Clegane observed, "If just one of the Lords Paramount – or even the King – announced that the Long Night was quickly approaching, he would be laughed at and ridiculed. But if all the Lords Paramount, the King, and the commander of the Legion without Banners made that announcement, people would be far more willing to listen and believe."

Robert could understand that logic. Strength in numbers is not limited to brute force.

"It will be no easy task to persuade the residents of the Seven Kingdoms to come together fully," Stannis Baratheon observed.

"Indeed," Hoster Tully concurred, "We will be asking former enemies to become allies."

"Their only other option is to die alone," Gregor firmly contended, "Whatever our past grievances, they are trivial compared to the hardship that awaits us."

"But even if the whole of Westeros is united, how can we ensure the survival of its occupants?" Ellaria Sand enquired.

In response, the Mountain smirked and stated "I'm glad you asked that. I've had plenty of time to review my vision of the Long Night. I have analyzed it from every angle, and you'll be pleased to know that it is very much possible for us to overcome it. I have a plan."

_He always does._ The King smiled, folded his arms again, and said to the tallest man there "Very well, Lord Gregor. Proceed to tell us of your plan. We are all listening."

In that, he spoke for every person there. Although it was considerably later than it had been when the meeting began, Gregor Clegane still had everyone's undivided attention. However, he notified them that this meeting would likely go on for several more hours. While no one offered a word of complaint, they were hoping they would be able to leave before dawn. Gregor assured them he would do his best to have the meeting wrapped up by midnight, but he made no promises.

_It's going to be a long night. But at least we'll be using it to prevent a different type of long night._

The first item of business was relatively small in scale. Lord Gregor proposed that Jaime Lannister be released from the Kingsguard. No one could have anticipated that, least of all the Kingslayer. Even after he stained his sword with Aerys Targaryen's blood, Ser Jaime had shown no eagerness in hanging up his white cloak. The king had offered him a pardon from his duties, but the blonde knight had adamantly refused. Much to Lord Tywin's despair, Robert Baratheon had accepted his choice.

Gregor would not give up so easily. He seemed determined to persuade Jaime to resign from the Kingsguard and reassume his birthright as the heir to Casterly Rock.

Having seen the Kingslayer in combat, the Mountain contended that Ser Jaime had to be among the top ten greatest swordsmen in the country. Maybe even top five. As such, it made no sense to waste in his skills in the mundane role of a bodyguard. Lord Gregor also pointed out that with the realm at peace, the king was as safe as he would ever be. There was also the matter of how unpopular Jaime had become in King's Landing since he rid them of the Mad King. With all that in mind, there was absolutely no reason why Jaime could not be honorably discharged from the Kingsguard.

Tyrion Lannister and his intended Ellyn Clegane did not protest this suggestion. As a matter of fact, they seemed to be in favor of it. Lord Tyrion seemed to enjoy the pleasures of being a second son; he liked to think he had been spared the burdens of the heir. He and Lady Ellyn actually cared little for the positions of Lord and Lady of Casterly Rock, and the Imp argued that Jaime would be far better suited to the role of Lord Paramount of the Westerlands. *Ser Jaime would certainly have an easier time of gaining the respect and allegiance of the Rock's vassals. Even so, it's debatable as to whether he or Tyrion would be the better ruler. From what I hear, the Imp's the one with all the wits.

Despite his younger brother and future sister-by-law's words of assurance and encouragement, Ser Jaime Lannister had no intention of stepping down from the Kingsguard. Then Cersei and Lord Tywin joined in the attempts to dissuade him. She claimed she had no more need for her brother to protect her; he claimed he had every need for his firstborn son to be close-by. Quite a rarity; Lord Tywin, Cersei, and Tyrion all agreeing on one thing. But even then, Jaime declined.

Over a half-hour passed before Ser Jaime finally gave in. It was Ser Barristan Selmy who persuaded him to see reason. He argued that although Jaime had tainted his cloak with the slaying of King Aerys, he had cleansed himself of that taint with his years of loyal service to Robert. At the same time, he had redeemed himself for acting out of the best interests of the populace of King's Landing.

It was then that Jaime finally agreed, albeit reluctantly, to resign from the Kingsguard. Right then and there, he stood up and removed his white cloak. He was not so imprudent as to carelessly deposit it onto the ground. Instead, he folded it up neatly and set it on the trestle table before him.

Replacing him will not be easy. But I need to find another knight to fill the new vacancy. Maybe Ser Malcolm Branfield. His sister's husband is of the North. Then again, his family was loyal to Aerys. Oh, well; I'll worry on that later.

Lord Tywin was pleased by his son's decision. He actually thanked Lord Gregor and Ser Barristan for convincing Jaime to shed his white cloak. That in itself was an astonishing sight. Lord Tywin never thanked anyone for anything.

The next topic of discussion pertained heavily to the Wall. In recent history, the Night's Watch's numbers had dwindled to an all-time low, and over half of the current black brothers had been criminals before.

In Lord Gregor's mind, this degradation was unacceptable. He pointed out that the Wall was the Seven Kingdom's primary line of defense from the Others. If it fell, the rest of the country would, too. That said, Gregor Clegane argued that steps be taken to reinforce the Wall in every way possible.

To begin with, it would need more men. By that, he was not referring to the occupants of the country's dungeons. He debated that the Wall would require good men. Learned men. Honorable men. Men trained extensively in the art of war. Most of all, it needed men who would join willingly, not men who merely chose it as an alternative to chastisement.

In order to encourage people to enlist, Gregor suggested that incentives be offered. Ideally, whenever a man voluntarily took the black, his family would be given enough food and coin to last them for a year. If they had relied on the volunteer heavily for everyday life, that would be enough time for them to learn to care for themselves.

King Robert and the Lords Paramount all greatly approved of this tactic. I'll draw up that decree as soon as we get back to King's Landing. He claimed as much to the others in the Main Hall.

Of course, no matter how many men joined the Night's Watch, their numbers would amount to little and less if they did not have the appropriate means to defend the Wall. Fortunately, Gregor Clegane was able to give them assurances that such means were well within their reach.
There was a well-known expression: in time of war, one must fight fire with fire. Lord Gregor claimed it would apply here, but instead, they would be fighting ice with fire. According to his visions, there were only three known materials that could successfully obliterate the Others and the White Walkers.

The chief of these materials was fire. The only approach that could permanently dispel the wights was by burning them. Lord Gregor felt he could not emphasize that strongly enough.

The other two materials were substances that been designed from fire. They were obsidian and Valyrian steel. Obsidian was said to be solidified fire, and Valyrian steel was described as fire-made-metal.

Obsidian was also known as dragonglass, which could be found in abundance on Dragonstone. Lord Gregor bade Lord Stannis to authorize the mining of obsidian on the Targaryen island stronghold and the transportation of it to the Wall. Robert was relieved that his brother was quick to accept the Mountain's proposal. Weapons made of dragonglass could prove invaluable against all manner of foes, not just the White Walkers.

Valyrian steel was a little harder to acquire. More than a little, actually. Be that as it may, it was still attainable. Gregor and Sandor Clegane had come into the possession of scores of Valyrian steel daggers when they seized the Silence from Euron Greyjoy. They had also found House Lannister's ancestral blade amongst the vast horde of treasure. The sword had been returned to its rightful owner.

It had been Ellyn Clegane who gave the sword to her intended Tyrion Lannister just before the melee began. The Imp had gone to his father immediately after the melee and given the weapon to him.

Robert had been present at that occasion. He would never forget the expression on Lord Tywin's face when he is dwarf son presented him with Brightroar. He doubted anyone had ever seen the lion lord look so happy. He had actually dared to smile. Lady Ellyn had arrived on the scene a moment later, and Tywin had given her a very appreciative kiss on the cheek. He commended both her and his son for their actions. He was even more pleased when they informed him that they had agreed to the betrothal he had suggested for them.

Although Brightroar was back at Casterly Rock, all the other Valyrian steel blades found on board the Silence were still being held by the Cleganes. Lord Gregor revealed that they had sought out the services of one Tobho Mott to have several of the daggers reforged into four new blades. The first had been the spearhead on Obara Martell's javelin, which she had named Swift Thrust.

I'll bet my thrust is swifter. Heh heh.

The other three blades were a longsword for Lady Dacey, a bastard sword for Ser Sandor, and a greatsword for Lord Gregor. The three of them had brought these blades to the gathering; they took the opportunity to show them to the other attendees.

Ser Sandor had named his bastard sword Hound's Fang, and Lady Dacey had named her longsword Beastrwraith. His had the head of a large dog on its pommel; hers was fit with one of a fierce bear. Both of them were as deadly as their owners.

The biggest attraction of all was Lord Gregor's greatsword. He had named it Summit. He drew it from the scabbard on his back so that everyone could get a closer look at it. It was larger than even Ice, but its owner could balance it in one hand effortlessly. The pommel of its hilt bore the likeness of a mountain's peak. The hilt was so sharp that it could be used to stab an adversary just as well as Gregor revealed that they still had a few dozen Valyrian steel daggers left over. One of them, Lady Ellyn had taken for herself. Her brothers did not intend to hold on to the rest for too much longer. Gregor recommended that they make a gift of the daggers to any high lords who desired one. While the Night's Watch would have weapons of obsidian, the Valyrian steel would be reserved for the citizens of the Seven Kingdoms. If only they made warhammers of Valyrian steel. Then again, I suppose a dagger would do just fine. With that arrangement, everyone would have a probable chance to fend off the Others.

While they were on the subject of how fire and weapons based on it were the White Walkers' greatest weakness, Lord Hoster Tully proposed that Lord Gregor consider manufacturing more of his black powder. Of the eleven hundred pouches the Mountain had supplied to the Royal Army, slightly less than two hundred remained unused by the end of Greyjoy's Rebellion. All of them were back in his possession, and he still intended to lock them away, but he was open to considering the manufacture of more, as long as they were only used against the White Walkers.

After this, they moved on to the next issue of precedence. This time, Gregor mentioned that there may not have been enough people in the Seven Kingdoms to stand against the Night King's massive undead army. He declared that they would need to build up their own forces. Initially, Robert had assumed Lord Gregor was suggesting that they seek out one of the free companies of Essos, such as the Golden Company or the Second Sons. I always wanted to see one of those sellsword armies in person.

While Gregor admitted that that was not a foolish idea, he claimed he was looking a little closer to home for reinforcements. Neither the king nor anyone else understood his meaning at first. Then he made this point: "Are the people of Westeros limited to the citizens of the Seven Kingdoms?"

Eddard Stark and Jorah Mormont were the first to realize what he was implying, and they were quick to apprise the others. They stated that Lord Gregor was advising them to make an alliance with the wildlings who lived north of the Wall. The Mountain did not deny that accusation; he fully admitted its truth.

That part of the conversation took well over an hour to resolve. Nearly every person there was against that concept. For as long as the history books could tell, the wildlings and the people of the Seven Kingdoms had never been at peace. They had invaded each other's territory at every opportunity. Although the wildlings rarely made it past the Neck, the Northmen were not the only ones who detested them. The other residents of the Seven Kingdoms despised them greatly. Even the Ironborn held little love for them.

Lord Gregor claimed he understood why they were reluctant to even consider the possibility of an alliance with the wildlings. Even so, he argued that it was safer than remaining adversaries with them. For every person who died north of the Wall, the Others would have one more body to make a wight out of. Aside from that, the Mountain informed everyone that the wildlings would one day attempt to come south of the Wall anyway. That had been part of his vision. In the autumn before the Long Night, Mance Rayder would amass an army of one hundred thousand of his people and send them charging towards Castle Black all at once. Gregor was hoping desperately to avoid that.

I cannot blame him. We'll already have plenty of undead enemies to worry about. We don't need any live ones making things worse.

Lord Gregor claimed that he had seen how the wildlings lived. Normally, the tribes did not coexist with each other peacefully. Then again, for the longest time, neither did the Seven Kingdoms. Since Mance Rayder would somehow manage to establish a peace – be it a tentative peace – between his own people, there was no reason to think the Seven Kingdoms and the Free Folk could not reach some type of compromise with each other.

The Mountain pointed out that the main reason the wildlings disliked the Seven Kingdoms was because they looked down on "kneelers." That was why they called themselves the Free Folk; no one ruled over them. In spite of that, Gregor debated that the wildlings could be persuaded to keep peace without bending the knee.

Gregor was willing to take full responsibility of any wildlings that were brought south of the Wall. He would ensure that they did not harass the people of the Seven Kingdoms or vice versa. Perhaps in time, they would even come to coexist with each other. Although Gregor could not ascertain that they would answer a call to arms, he was absolutely confident that when the time came, they would be more than willing to join the fight against the Others.

Lord Gregor was quite persuasive. By the end of the hour, he had convinced most of the twenty-nine other people in the Main Hall that the idea of a coalition with the wildlings was worth pursuing. The King and Lord Eddard gave the Mountain authorization to open negotiations with the wildlings. But they would not allow them to settle south of the Wall until he could guarantee their cooperation.

Gregor Clegane assured them that within the next couple years, he would be dealing with Mance Rayder directly. He'll have to find him first, and that is no easy task. If the man is caught south of the Wall, he is likely to be beheaded for a deserter.

Robert was relieved when they were able to agree on the matter of the wildlings. He doubted anything else discussed at this gathering would be more difficult or controversial.

Then Lord Gregor made his next proposal. This one involved making peace with someone even more unexpected and unpredictable than the Free Folk: the Targaryens.

Unsurprisingly, that suggestion was very unpopular with practically every person in the room. Particularly the king. He had never forgotten what Rhaegar had done to his beloved Lyanna, what Aerys had done to Rickard and Brandon Stark. It had been six years, and he still hated the Targaryens as much as ever. He would never allow them to set foot on the country ever again. That was what he told himself, at any rate. He had believed that at the beginning of his reign. But now his conviction was beginning to lessen.

He had mourned Lyanna Stark when he learned of her death. He could have drowned his sorrows in wine. But that was not what she would have wanted. She wanted him to move on, and he had. Robert had found happiness in his marriage to Cersei Lannister. She was a caring wife; she had given him a strong son. She was everything he could have hoped for and more. At times, he went full months without even thinking of Lyanna Stark.

There was also the matter of the throne itself. Robert had never asked for it. He had never wanted it. He would have been content to have remained the Lord of Storm's End and the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands. Actually, he would have been content with even less than that. If he could, he would have given Stannis the lordship of Storm's End and travelled across the Narrow Sea to join one of the free companies.

At times, he still entertained the idea of doing that when his son was old enough to succeed him. But he knew it would have been grossly irresponsible of him. Aside from that, he was already doing a fine job of ruling the Seven Kingdoms. It was unenviable work, but someone had to do it. The smallfolk and the highborn alike had faith in him. As long as they believed in him, he could not and would not stand down. Not unless someone better qualified and more deserving of the crown was to come along.

That bade the question; would Robert allow the dragons to return to Westeros and reclaim the Seven Kingdoms? He would never allow them to take back the throne, but under the right circumstances… he may welcome them back.

Robert was not the same man who had looked upon the mutilated bodies of Princess Rhaenys and Prince Aegon and called them "dragonspawn." That man had indiscriminately hated all Targaryens. But the man who now sat the Iron Throne was a different Robert. This one would never sanction the murder of innocent children, even if their parents were anything but.

Robert had developed that ideal that even before Lord Gregor suggested bringing the Targaryens back to Westeros. The Mountain was able to provide a number of legitimate reasons as to why this course of action was worth considering.

Firstly, he debated that if it was known that Robert and the Targaryens were cooperating, the Targaryen sympathizers would sympathize with him, as well. That would severely reduce the possibility of another insurrection. Furthermore, it was the Targaryens who had brought the Seven Kingdoms together in the first place. Despite the fact Aegon the Conqueror had done so by force, Gregor contended that there were some Targaryens that were capable of innovative thought. According to his visions, Viserys was likely as mad as his father, but Daenerys could be reasoned with.

Lord Tywin pointed out that even if they somehow managed to make peace with the Tagaryens, certain Targaryen loyalists could still attempt to put Viserys or Daenerys on the throne. In response to that, Lord Gregor bade the lion lord to tell him who would ever follow a ruler who was put in power against his or her will. Such a ruler would be a figurehead leader and nothing more. Those types never lasted long, and neither did the people who manipulated him into doing their bidding. He's got a great point there.

In the end, Robert agreed to consider bringing Prince Viserys and Princess Daenerys back to Westeros. Years back, he had sent out hired knives to put an end to them. When he returned to King's Landing, he would give those pursuers new orders. Rather than having them kill the Targaryens, they would be instructed to either capture them alive or approach them peaceably. Lord Gregor found that acceptable.

Lord Gregor also mentioned that when the Long Night happened, the Targaryens would likely have one other advantage than no one else in the Known World possessed. However, he did not specify as to what that advantage was. Robert and a few of the others in the room would have liked to have known, but the Mountain claimed the Targaryens did not even have this advantage currently, and there was a slight chance that they might not even have it when they were supposed to. For those reasons (among others), he did not wish to feed the king or anyone else with false hope before he could confirm that his interference had not impacted the Targaryens’ advantage. Whatever this "advantage" is, it must be absolutely incredible. I mean, if it can actually help us gain the upper hand in the fight against the Others…

Shortly before midnight, the gathering finally ended. Gregor thanked everyone for their time, and he asked that they remember everything that was discussed. Their actions from this day onward would determine how prepared Westeros would be when the next winter occurred. Let the Others come. I'll show the Night's King there is only room for one king in Westeros.

At the conclusion of the meeting, Lord Gregor asked his brother and the king to linger for a moment. Everyone else left the Main Hall. Ser Barristan and Queen Cersei stood outside the door and waited for Robert. Now that he had been released from his vows, Ser Jaime was not required to remain behind. Instead, he left the keep with his father, uncle, and brother.

When Robert was alone with the two Clegane brothers, he asked the elder of them "What do you need, my lord?"

"I just wish to give you a word of caution, Your Grace," the Mountain disclosed, "There is something you must know about these visions of mine. Something very unsettling. I thought it best not to share it with anyone other you two."

"The King, I can understand," Sandor Clegane remarked, "But why do you want me to know? It can't be because I'm your sibling. If it was, you would have had Ellyn stay behind, too."

"Because this concerns you directly," Gregor revealed. After a pause, he looked between Robert and his brother, and he went on with "From my visions, I have managed to impose many positive changes throughout Westeros. But in spite of how many changes I have made, I believe there are certain things that cannot be fully prevented. Some things are predestined to happen."

That caught Robert's interest, as well as Sandor's. The latter asked "How do you mean?"

Gregor apprehensively revealed "I had this one certain vision when I was in my eleventh year. In it, your face was burned. Horribly burned to the point where half of it was damaged beyond recognition."

The Hound stared at his brother in shock. Slowly, very slowly, he reached his hand up to the right side of his head. He placed his fingers against his burned cheek and let it rest there for a moment.

"I was able to prevent the initial incident that was supposed to give you that scar," Gregor pronounced, "But, much to our misfortune, it appears you were meant to acquire it in any case. And if that is the case… there is no telling what else fate will deny us the chance to change."

_Different setting; same results. That's an alarming notion._ "Have there been any incidents of a similar nature?"

"Not so far," Gregor reassured him, "But we need to be on full alert. Fate could strike back at any moment. It already took its toll on my brother. There is no telling who else it could turn against."

Robert nodded his head and "I appreciate your telling me this, my lord."

"It is no bother, Your Grace," the Mountain proclaimed, "I simply did not wish to give you too much hope in my ability to affect change from my visions. I can change many things, but not everything."

"I suppose that is for the best," Robert Baratheon murmured, "No man should have that much power."

"Which is why I chose to share it," Gregor Clegane revealed, "It is only just that you knew the full scope of my capabilities."

"Then you have performed superbly as Master of Order," the stag king debated with a smile.

Gregor Clegane smiled, as well. Sandor Clegane did not.

The Hound was standing still and openmouthed with his fingers pressed against his blackened cheek. He appeared to be in some form of trance.
"Ser Sandor?" the king said in concern. At that, the Mountain turned his attention to his brother.

He placed his hand on his shoulder and queried "What's wrong?"

The younger Clegane son gradually removed his hand from his face and looked up at his brother. He murmured softly "In that other life, how did I get burned? Was it an accident?"

Gregor did not answer right away. Then he gazed at the wall and muttered "No, it wasn't. But it was not the Crow's Eye who did it."

"I gathered as much," Sandor remarked, "If you were eleven, I was only six. I assume someone else did this?"

"Correct," Gregor affirmed.

"Well, who was it?" Sandor inquired, "Who burned me then?"

I'd like to know that myself.

King Robert and the Hound looked to the Mountain for a reply. He hesitated at first. Then he stared blankly at the wall. Finally, he let out a deep sigh, turned to face his king and brother, and disclosed "I did."

To say Robert and Ser Sandor were stunned would have been an understatement. They were flat-out speechless.

"What?" Sandor Clegane murmured quietly.

Gregor had to look down to make eye contact with anyone. But now, he was looking down at his feet. He gloomily pronounced "There is one thing all my visions had in common. In all of them, I was a much different person. Seven Hells, I was a monster. I had no principles, no ethics, and no morals whatsoever. I would have been responsible for the deaths of countless innocents, including Father, Mother, and Ellyn."

"Why would the gods possibly show you that?" Robert asked, baffled.

"I do not know," Gregor claimed, "Perhaps it was a warning. They may have been telling me that if I became the man in those visions, I would cause suffering on an immense scale. But I promise you; I would sooner die than become that man."

Robert reflected on that for a minute, and then he declared "I believe you, Lord Gregor."

Gregor Clegane grinned and dipped his head. "Thank you for continuing to have such confidence in me, Your Grace."

"After all you have done, I would be a fool not to," Robert Baratheon debated.

The Mountain was obviously pleased to hear that.

The Hound remained silent. He did not seem to share the King's conviction.

At that, Gregor looked his brother in the eye and remarked "Sandor, on the day I was supposed to burn your face, I did not. I defied the will of the gods so that I could be the brother you deserve. I told you I would be there for you. I meant it then and I mean it now. But I need to know now; will you be there for me?"
Sandor Clegane scowled momentarily, and then he scoffed and said "Do you even need to ask? Of course I will. Even if you were a total cunt in another life, you're the greatest brother one could ever hope for in this life, Gregor."

Certainly better than the ones I have. Then again… the fault may rest with me, not with Stannis or Renly.

The Mountain smiled and clapped the Hound on the back amiably. In response, Sandor grinned too and patted Gregor on the arm lightly.

Seeing the way the two Clegane brothers interacted with each other impressed Robert. He lamented on how poor his relationships with his own brothers were. Perhaps I could mend things with Stannis and make some more time for Renly.

"The gods may have intended for you to be mortal enemies," Robert contended, "But you are not, despite their greatest attempts. So for that, I say fuck them."

"Aye; fuck them, Your Grace," Gregor Clegane coincided.

"Fuck them very much," Sandor added in.

The three men got a good long laugh at that. It's always nice when men are not afraid to swear in front of their king.
Steady Preparations

Chapter Notes

Note: Well, here's the first of the two time-skips. Be warned; this chapter has some inconsistent pacing. Sometimes it discusses certain events in great detail, and sometimes it jumps between events constantly. In any case, I hope this update provides sufficient clarity on what all happens during the Great Summer in this universe, particularly in how Gregor helps prepare for the Long Night.

The very next day, the king and the leaders of the Royal Army rose early to break their fast and strike their tents at first light. The Stormlords were the first to leave. The Reachmen and the Riverlords followed soon after. The Westerlords took their time, as they had less distance to travel. The last to depart were the Northmen, and the Sun was still not halfway over the eastern horizon when they vanished from sight of Casterly Rock. All those present who belonged to the Legion without Banners went with them.

After bidding his family a fond farewell, Lord Gregor Clegane and the Legionnaires began the long march north. On the way, they had to call upon the Lord of the Crossing for the use of his bridge again.

As Gregor had predicted, the majority of House Frey (including the Late Lord himself) held no ill will towards House Clegane for Ser Ryman's death. It had been an accident (or so Gregor had them believe), and the Mountain's "atonement" of one hundred golden dragons seemed to please Lord Walder more than his eldest grandson ever did.

Just as they did when they first came south, the Legionnaires and the Northmen had endure Lord Walder's "hospitality" for another night. In the early morning, they resumed their heading. This time, a number of the residents of the Twins accompanied them. This group was led by Ser Stevron Frey, and among its members were his grandson Edwyn and his half-brothers Danwell, Jammos, and Perwyn. They went to Gregor and informed him of their desire to join his forces.

Despite being the largest house in the realm, so far no Frey had entered the Legion without Banners. Part of Gregor still wanted the entire family to perish in misery, but he was not of a mind to deprive himself of potential allies. Plus, if he refused them, Lord Walder would most certainly have taken it as a slight. Aside from that, Gregor believed that some of the Freys had to be honorable, despite the horrid atrocities they had committed in another life.

A full turn of the moon elapsed between the moments when Lord Eddard Stark, Lord Gregor Clegane, and their companies left Lannisport and when they arrived back at Moat Cailin. Once they got there, the Northmen continued onward, but the Legionnaires regrouped with their colleagues.

Brynden Tully had managed the Legion's reserve forces well in the Mountain's absence. The damage inflicted by the small insurrection by the Ironborn Legionnaires had been minimal, thankfully. In fact, most of the Ironborn stationed at the moat had stayed loyal to the Legion. Only about a quarter of them had rebelled, and most of those had been put to the sword. The rest were locked in the dungeons, awaiting Lord Gregor's judgement.
After order had been restored, Ser Brynden proposed that the remaining three-quarters of the Ironborn Legionnaires be confined to their quarters. That was done for everyone's safety (including their own). Nearly all of the Ironborn voluntarily consented to that idea, and they kept to their rooms for the following months. When word of Lord Balon's surrender reached the moat, the Blackfish allowed them freedom of the moat again.

Once Lord Gregor's forces settled down at Moat Cailin, he assembled his secret council in their meeting chambers again. He permitted Lothor Brune and Willas Tyrell a few minutes to get acquainted with Brynden Tully and Lyn Corbray, and vice versa. After that, they started to discuss business.

Gregor apprised Ser Brynden and Ser Lyn of the gathering in the Main Hall of Clegane's Keep, as well as everything that had been covered there at length. Naturally, the Riverlord and the Valeman were just as shocked and perplexed as everyone else had been when they were informed of the terrifying crisis that would touch Westeros in little more than a decade. But they were not afraid. They were two of the most fearless men Gregor knew. They were confident that they would survive the Long Night, especially since Gregor and the king were already taking measures to overcome it.

When the meeting ended, Gregor retreated to his solar at the top of the Lord's Tower. Dacey was playing with Rickard in their quarters, so the Mountain had some time to himself. He sat at his desk and made notes on a large piece of parchment. On the left side, he wrote a list of the things that had incited the most turmoil in the Known World during the original franchise. On the right side, he wrote a list of the things he had done to avoid or alter each of them in this universe.

Unsurprisingly, many of his bullet points pertained to the War of the Five Kings.

Mainly, there was the legitimacy of Queen Cersei's children. That issue had been handled. King Robert's firstborn son, Crown Prince Jasper Baratheon, was black of hair and blue-eyed. So long as Cersei's children had that feature, Gregor could rest assured that Robert's seed went into making them. With Jaime now gone from King's Landing and away from his sister, that was all but ascertained.

Therefore, neither Stannis nor Renly would make a claim for the throne, and in the unlikely event they still did, Eddard would definitely not support either of them. Hence, there would be no need for Robb to call his bannermen or for them to declare him their king.

Lord Jon Arryn's line was now secure, as well. Gregor had guaranteed that when he arranged the death of Petyr Baelish. Not only would Littlefinger not coerce Lysa Arryn into poisoning her husband, but she was also able to provide him with more heirs.

In his first life, when he was but a fan of the series, Gregor had wondered if Sweetrobin was actually Littlefinger's bastard son. After all, Lord Jon made seven attempts at siring a child on Lady Lysa, and the only one she could produce was a halfwit weakling? Very unusual for two of the strongest lines in the Seven Kingdoms, especially since Robin looked little like either of them.

Furthermore, Gregor had believed that Petyr Baelish may have been directly responsible for Lysa's miscarriages and stillbirths in the original series. Granted, he was not entirely certain how Baelish could have pulled that off. He had been in the Vale during her early losses, and she had been in King's Landing with her husband. Of course, that did not entail that he could not communicate with her through raven or rider. Perhaps he had written to her, and his letters had instructed her to terminate Lord Jon's unborn children, ideally by tripping and falling on her abdomen or by taking moon tea in secret. After all, as unstable as Lysa was in the books and show, there was no other valid explanation as to why she was incapable of having more than one child. The fact that she was able to birth one at all proved she was not infertile.

Now that Lysa had successfully birthed a daughter, Gregor was convinced of the merit of his theory regarding Littlefinger's influence on her. In addition to that, Gregor was certain Lysa's daughter was indeed Lord Jon's; he had seen her at the tourney of Lannisport. Lady Alyssa Arryn had her mother's face, but she also had the hair and build of her father.

If Lysa could produce one child in this new timeline, she could certainly birth another.

Since Robert now had a trueborn heir of his own, the War of the Five Kings would at most be the War of the Two Kings. But Gregor had resolve that dilemma during Grejoy's rebellion, when he persuaded the king to send Balon Greyjoy to the Wall.

On that note, Gregor wondered if Balon would end up at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. If so, it would have been both poetic and amusingly ironic, as Eastwatch was under command of Cotter Pyke. Gregor could not help but snicker at the thought of the former Lord Paramount of the Iron Islands serving under a bastard from the Islands.

In any case, Balon had no means of rising up against the crown again. Additionally, his brother Euron had been killed, his brother Aeron was being held prisoner in Casterly Rock, and his sons had been taken as wards of the throne. Apart from his brother Victarion, the only other member of House Greyjoy who had total freedom of the land was his daughter Asha, and Gregor was not concerned that she would be a problem. It was unlikely that all the Ironmen would willingly follow a woman into battle.

What truly mattered was that the lordship of Pyke had been granted to Victarion Greyjoy, and the Iron Captain supported the concept of a unified Westeros. Gregor could count on him to keep the peace between the Iron Islands and the mainland. He would not be so rash as to declare himself king of the Islands or anything else.

Of course, the whole war truly came about as a result of Robert Baratheon's death. He was destined to die hunting a boar, but Gregor had even managed to avert that disaster.

In his youth, Robert Baratheon had been a man of indulgence. He loved to eat, drink, and whore greatly. When he had been a young lord with no immediate responsibility, such behavior was deemed acceptable. As king, he was expected to show some restraint. Alas, in the original universe, he did not even know the meaning of the word.

Whereas in this one, he evidently did. After hearing that fake speech about Lyanna's dying wish, the king had changed. Very much for the better. While he had already been strong in body, he became strong in mind and will overtime, too.

He drank sparingly. Rarely was he ever drunk anymore, and whenever he was, it was only in the late evening, when he had turned in for the night. He may have gained half a stone or even a full one since he took the throne, but he compensated for that by keeping active in the training yard. So while he was a little fatter, he was by no means lazy. Gregor had confirmed that himself during the tourney at Lannisport.

The issue of his many bastards had also been remedied. According to the reports from Lord Varys, the king occasionally flirted with the maids and the serving girls of the Red Keep. He even snuck in a mild grope every now and then. Be that as it may, the only woman whose bed he had shared was his wife. In spite of his devious nature, he had remained faithful to Cersei Lannister.

As far as Gregor knew, the only bastard Robert currently had was Mya Stone, and she had been conceived whilst her father was being fostered by Lord Jon Arryn. She had never set foot in King's Landing. She had never been outside the Vale. As long as she remained at the Eyrie, Cersei was pleased.

Robert had been very careful with the royal treasury as well. He did not throw tourneys at every opportunity. Nor did he waste money on selfish or aimless pursuits. He was very mindful with how the crown's finances were spent. In fact, it had managed to grow in wealth since the days of Aerys.

Most of all, Robert genuinely cared for the people of Westeros. He was far worthier of their love and adoration than his predecessor had ever been. Even Gregor was beginning to believe that the stag was what was best for the country, not the Targaryens.

But Gregor had never been one to make premature conclusions hastily. In both his lives, he would evaluate a scenario from every possible angle before reaching a verdict. In this instance, he had come to believe that the Baratheons and the Targaryens were equally qualified to rule the Seven Kingdoms. Nonetheless, only one house could be the country's ruling family, but he could not officially decide which for at least another ten years.

These were just a few of the many notes Gregor made. When he finished his list, he reviewed it thoroughly, and he made a gratifying discovery. It appeared as though he had successfully evaded all the events that were primarily responsible for bringing about the War of the Five Kings.

That was good. Extremely good, actually. With the looming threat of the Long Night, the Westerosi could not afford to waste any time fighting amongst themselves. The War of the Five Kings was ultimately resolved, but the outcome was totally and utterly undesirable. In fact, when the last book ended, Gregor honestly did not think there was anything left in the Seven Kingdoms that was actually worth saving from the Others.

Boltons in control of the North, Freys in control of the Riverlands, an unscrupulous murderer in control of the Vale, the Stormlands vacant of a liege lord, the Crownlands ruled by a female Aerys, the Iron Islands ruled by a one-eyed Aerys, the Westerlands still relatively untouched, the Reach occupied by selfish, power-hungry egomaniacs, Dorne occupied by backstabbing bastards… Gregor would almost have preferred to see all of Westeros obliterated than to have it ruled by the likes of such disreputable people.

The only thing that prevented him from actually believing that was the small amount of lingering hope that the Starks and the Targaryens would rise up and set the country to rights. In the show, they had at least begun to do that. But he did not know what happened after Jon was hailed as the king of the North and Daenerys finally set sail across the Narrow Sea.

Even though Westeros was finally united in this universe, Gregor knew it was still far from safe. The Long Night would be far more dangerous than any character could ever hope to be.

Gregor wished he could have lived long enough in his previous life to find out how the series ended. He was certain the Citadel would be involved somehow, otherwise Samwell's entire arc was pointless. As such, he thought about contacting the Conclave and addressing this matter directly. He hoped they would be willing to cooperate with him.

If they were not, then so be it, Gregor decided. He and everyone else in the realm would face the harshness of the Long Night through other means.

On the back of that same piece of parchment, Gregor made a list of predicaments that would crop up before or during the Long Night, along with a list of potential solutions to lessen or solve them. Again, he was extremely meticulous. Not wanting to overlook anything, he went over the entire sequence of events that led up to the Long Night, and he contemplated on all the possible ways he could intervene.

Once his list was complete, Gregor committed it to memory. Then he picked it up, walked over to the hearth, and placed it atop the burning logs. He eyed the parchment as it caught fire along the edges. Soon, the flames engulfed it, and before very long, it was reduced to a small pile of ash.

It would not do if anyone else found that parchment and learnt of the Westeros that could have been. Especially since that was the Westeros that would have been.

A couple weeks later, the white raven finally arrived, signaling the end of spring and the start of summer. That was when Gregor set into motion his plans to prepare Westeros for the Long Night.

He started by writing a letter to the Lord Commander of the Night's Watch, who happened to be his wife's uncle. In the letter, he addressed two topics.

The first was the promise that the Watch could soon expect a number of new recruits, many of them willing volunteers. Hopefully, more than a few of them would be decent swordsmen, as well. Doubtlessly that would be met with much appreciation; it was practically common knowledge that the Wall was desperately undermanned.

The second related to a certain aspect of black brothers' oath, specifically how they were sworn to protect and guard the realms of men, and how the Free Folk – or wildlings, as they were called – happened to be a realm of men. They simply resided on the wrong side of the Wall. Gregor used that as the basis of his argument that an alliance should be made between the people of the Seven Kingdoms and those who lived north of them.

He did not include many details about the alliance or how it would be formed. Truthfully, Gregor himself was not entirely certain how it would be formed, or if it actually could be. He did not mention that, obviously. As it happened, the full extent of what Gregor wished to tell Lord Jeor could not fit on a single piece of paper. Essentially, all he said was that Lord Eddard and King Robert had given him the authority to open up negotiations with Mance Rayder. He also wished to meet with Lord Jeor in person to discuss the matter in greater detail. Lastly, he asked them to attempt to capture a wildling alive, and that their meeting wait until after they had done so. Once the letter was composed, he sent it out by raven.

Gregor had known from the start that it would be difficult – practically impossible, even – to convince the Night's Watch to make peace with Free Folk. But he had to try all the same. If he did not, it would mean another war. This war was even less desirable than the War of the Five Kings, seeing as every casualty of it would become another soldier of the Night King's army.

Less than a week later, a raven flew in from Castle Black. It carried Lord Jeor's response.

As Gregor suspected, the Lord Commander was very skeptical at the idea of forging an alliance with the Free Folk. Fortunately, he was not totally averse to it. It happened that he thought the way Gregor did: why have as an enemy one who could be an ally instead?

The Old Bear agreed to meet with Gregor face-to-face, and he would have a wildling prisoner beforehand. In his letter, he revealed that he had been planning to send a party of rangers north of the Wall to deal with a small host of wildling raiders. Initially, their mission had been to exterminate the raiders. However, at Lord Gregor's behest, they now had orders to capture at least one of the wildlings alive. As soon as the rangers returned, their Lord Commander would write Gregor again.
Surely enough, a fortnight passed, and then Gregor received another raven from the Wall. The Lord Commander apprised him that the rangers had managed to take five of the eight raiders alive. Right then, they were all being held in the ice cells at Castle Black. They could not hold the wildlings indefinitely, and Lord Jeor's duty to the Watch inhibited from going south. Therefore, the Old Bear bade the Mountain to come north as soon as possible.

Gregor did just that. Immediately after reading that missive, he assembled a group of Legionnaires at the stables. Within the hour, they left through the northern gates on horseback. Naturally, Gregor's wife was among them. He also brought his son, figuring Lord Jeor would like the chance to meet his grandnephew.

After riding for several days, the company reached the Wall. This was the very first time Gregor actually saw it in real life. Words could not sufficiently describe the awe he felt when his eyes fell upon the immense structure. Never mind the fact it was not even the tallest edifice in the Known World; it still had to be the most breathtaking. Gregor was so impressed that he almost did not mind the intense cold that appeared when he neared the Wall.

When the Legionnaires were within sight of Castle Black, they signaled their coming, and the gates were opened to them. They swiftly piled into the fortress' courtyard. There they were greeted by the Lord Steward, Bowen Marsh.

As the stableboys helped the Legionnaires with their mounts, Gregor heard the sound of steel clashing nearby. He gazed around and saw that a number of new recruits were being drilled by Ser Alliser Thorne in the training yard. Ser Alliser soon noticed Gregor was looking at him. To his credit, he did not sneer. But he did not smile, either. Still, a look of indifference was better than what most got from the bitter knight.

Ser Alliser was undoubtedly aware that Gregor Clegane had been in the Westerlander forces that had seized King's Landing at the end of Robert's Rebellion. However, he must also have known that it was Gregor who had ensured that the civilian casualties of the Sack were kept at a minimal. That was likely why he did not flash a hostile glare in his direction.

After their horses were stabled, Gregor Clegane asked to see Lord Jeor Mormont. He was swiftly led to the Lord Commander's Tower by Ser Jaremy Rykker. Dacey and Rickard accompanied them. Everyone else remained out in the courtyard.

When they arrived in the Lord Commander's chambers, they found him speaking with Maester Aemon and the First Ranger, Benjen Stark. When he saw the Mountain, Lord Jeor moved to dismiss his black brothers, but Gregor bade him not to. He declared that he preferred them to be present during his meeting with the Lord Commander.

Once the chambers were clear of everyone except the Old Bear, the First Ranger, and the ancient Targaryen, Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey sat at the table with them. It was then that Dacey showed off her son to her uncle and. As Gregor forecasted, Lord Jeor was delighted to meet Rickard Clegane. He commended his niece for producing such a stout heir.

The Old Bear was nearing his sixtieth name day, so he was older than both of Gregor's parents. Unlike Lord Tarrence and Lady Daliah, however, Lord Jeor was not a grandparent. But he was holding out hope that he would be one soon. Recently, his son had written him that he had gotten married again, and this time, it was to a Dornish princess (who apparently hated to be addressed as such). Since they had been in attendance at Jorah and Nymeria's wedding ceremony, Gregor and Dacey could verify that information.

Lord Jeor had expected his son to take another Northern girl as his bride, but he had no qualms about a Dornishwoman being the new Lady of Bear Island. His predecessor, Lord Commander Qorgyle, had been a Dornishman, and the two of them had gotten on quite well.

As far as Gregor knew, Jorah and Nymeria were not trying for children yet. But there was no question that sooner or later, they would. Lord Jeor seemed to share his conviction.

After Lord Jeor was properly introduced to his grandnephew, Aemon asked for a chance to hold Rickard as well. At first, Dacey was a little hesitant, considering the elderly man was blind. But her husband assured her that the former Targaryen knew what he was doing. At that, she gave in.

The young Clegane boy seemed strangely at ease in Aemon's arms. Dacey and Benjen helped the ancient maester hold Rickard properly. At one point, their eyes met, but they quickly looked away right after.

Gregor remembered Dacey once mentioned that her mother had considered a marriage contract between her and Benjen before he joined the Watch. Lady Maege never had the opportunity to approach Lord Rickard Stark on the issue. Still, it was possible that Benjen was aware of the prospect, just as Dacey was.

Maybe that was why he had joined the Watch. Or one of the reasons why, at any rate. It could not have been the only one. Gregor did not think of Benjen as someone who would resolve his problems by running away from them. Given his mysterious whereabouts throughout the majority of the original series, he was definitely someone who ran towards his problems.

While Aemon fawned over little Rickard, Gregor and Dacey turned back to Lord Jeor and Benjen. They proceeded to explain why they were at the Wall. Logically, Gregor led the conversation, and he included nearly everything that had been discussed in the Main Hall of Clegane's Keep. He even told them the truth about the country's probable impending doom.

Back in the Westerlands, Gregor had convinced King Robert and the Lords Paramount to go public with the news of the Long Night sometime in the future. They did not wish to incite a panic by informing their vassals and the smallfolk straightaway. First, they would allow the people to enjoy a period of serenity and opulence. Ideally, this period would last the first five years of the Great Summer. Then they would inform the public. That would give them five more years to fully comprehend and acknowledge that the Others were returning to the world.

Although the smallfolk and most of the lesser lords and landed knights were currently unaware of the approaching Long Night, they were still able to help prepare for it in their own way. They had been instructed by their liege lords to fortify their homes and store an additional ration of their crops at each harvest. This would ensure that they would be better protected and adequately supplied throughout the whole next winter.

In spite of the temporary "nondisclosure agreement" Gregor had established between the other thirty-one people he had told of the Long Night, he had chosen to be forward with the three men in the Lord Commander's chambers.

All three of them reacted just as Gregor predicted they would.

As Northmen, Lord Jeor and Benjen almost readily believed in Gregor's claims of the White Walkers. Of course, the Northmen also had the greatest feuds with the Free Folk, but Jeor Mormont was not one to lament on old grievances, and Benjen Stark had a firm grasp on the priorities of the world.

Aemon Targaryen did not reply right away. He needed a few minutes to reflect on everything he had heard. After sitting for a time in motionless silence, he lightly ran his frail fingers through the dark mop of hair on Rickard Clegane's head, and then he gave a short speech on visions and prophecies.

In it, he mentioned the prophecy his great-grandnephew Prince Rhaegar Targaryen had consulted him about. The one about the Three-Headed Dragon and the ending of all life. That prophecy was the very thing that had led to the demise of House Targaryen. While most called Rhaegar a fool for putting so much stock in a myth, Aemon had considered the possibility that the Silver Prince was actually wiser than anyone could have fathomed.

He ended his soliloquy by stating that due to the evidence provided by Lord Gregor's visions, he was now indisputably certain that the Long Night would indeed come again. He also agreed that there was no way to prevent it, but much could be done to prepare for it. That included uniting with the Free Folk.

Gregor was pleased he had won the trust and the friendship of Lord Commander Jeor, Maester Aemon, and Benjen. They carried a great deal of authority in the Watch, and they were greatly respected by their brothers in black. In that regard, they would prove invaluable allies to Gregor.

Once the conversation ended, Gregor asked to see the wildling prisoners. While Dacey stayed with Maester Aemon and Rickard in the Lord Commander's chambers, Benjen and Lord Jeor led Gregor down to the courtyard. There the Mountain and the Old Bear waited whilst Benjen gathered some of his rangers and went off to the ice cells.

All five wildlings were swiftly brought out. Their hands and feet were bound, but they were struggling angrily. The eldest of them could not have been more than three and twenty. Three were male; two female. One of the men and one of the women could have been siblings, based on their similarity in physique and appearance.

Gregor watched as the five captives were brought before him. They immediately took notice of his height, and it seemed to startle them. But they were not intimidated. Gregor did not expect them to be, given the land they had come from.

One of them made a remark along the lines of "So there ARE giants on this side of the Wall."

His companions chuckled at that before they were silenced by the watchmen who restrained them. Jeor Mormont then looked to Lord Gregor and asked what he wanted with the prisoners.

To the vast surprise of everyone there (especially the wildlings themselves), Gregor proclaimed that he wished for them to be set free.

That command confused everyone there, and it angered Alliser Thorne. The Crownlander knight claimed that two of their brothers had died bringing these Free Folk back, and he declared that letting the prisoners live was an insult enough to their comrades' memory. Letting them go was an outrage.

Gregor calmly assured Thorne and the others present that he was not being inconsiderate or hasty. He debated that these five wildlings would serve a greater purpose than vengeance. Since Lord Commander Mormont was aware of Gregor's goal to bring the Free Folk south of the wall, he ensured that the Mountain's order was obeyed. The five prisoners were promptly released from their bounds.

As the tunnel to the Wall was opened up, Gregor approached the five wildlings and said that he had a message for them to deliver. Normally, they did not take orders from "kneelers," but since he had given them back their freedom, they chose to listen.

He told them to go back to their "King-beyond-the-Wall" and tell him that Moat Cailin was in need of a bard. Specifically, one who was "able" to carry any tune. He advised them to hurry, as it was a "long night" without music, and there were hardly any "others" who could keep his mind occupied. He instructed them to use those exact words.

The vagueness of the message baffled them, but they agreed to convey it. After committing it to memory, they turned to the Wall and sprinted into the tunnel at its base. Once they were all through, the gate slammed shut behind them.

At this point, there was nothing further Gregor could do to mend the relationship between the Night's Watch and the Free Folk. All he could do was wait for those five wildlings to find Mance Rayder and hope that Mance understood the hidden meaning of that message.

Gregor and the rest of the Legionnaires departed from Castle Black that same day. Before they left, Gregor bade the watchmen to have some faith in what he had done. Their Lord Commander and First Ranger did; there was no reason they could not.

Of course, the alliance with the Free Folk was merely the first of Gregor's preparations against the Long Night. When he and his colleagues returned to Moat Cailin, he shifted his focus to some of the other ones.

He thought on the truce and possible treaty with the Targaryens. At the present, that affair was mostly out of his hands. Be that as it may, the plan to recover Viserys and Daenerys was already underway. A small fleet of ships under the mutual command of Lord Monford Velaryon and Ser Davos Seaworth had sailed across the Narrow Sea to locate the two surviving children of the Mad King.

King Robert had given explicit orders that the Targaryens were not to be killed or harmed. Instead, they would be taken into protective custody. That was certain to gain the stag king some degree of support from the Targaryen loyalists. There was also the matter of the Targaryens' "advantage," which was currently unknown to everyone but Gregor.

Until Viserys and Daenerys were found, Gregor would not partake in that affair. He would instead concentrate on issues closer to home.

There was one particular matter that was quite close to home. That was the matter of House Bolton. Since the events leading up to House Stark's downfall had been averted, Lord Roose would have no opportunity to betray his liege lord. Thus, it was likely that he would remain loyal to Lord Eddard, in spite of his ever-present desire for dominance of the North. Gregor decided to keep a watchful eye on Roose Bolton, but he would not move against the Leech Lord unless he acquired some concrete proof that House Bolton was plotting against the Starks.

Even so, Gregor had no intention of extending that same courtesy to Roose's bastard son. Ramsey's fate had been sealed long ago.

The Mountain was willing to give just about any person in the series a chance of redemption. So far, Amory Lorch, Pycelle, and Petyr Baelish had been his only three exceptions. But he planned to make a fourth exception for Ramsey Snow. He was determined not to allow that inhuman monster to torment the realm. The same would go for his redolent servant, Reek.

In the books, Roose had made an argument that perhaps it was Reek who had corrupted Ramsey and not the other way around. While that may have sounded more plausible, Gregor was not going to risk finding out the hard way if it was wrong. He was going to kill both master and servant.

But not right away. He would have to wait for the most ideal occasion, and he would have to find the right people for the job. He could not use any of his Legionnaires, not even those on his council. Ramsey was still a child, after all, and officially, the Legion without Banners did not harm children.

Perhaps the Free Folk would be useful in that regard.

In any case, Gregor was not in any tremendous rush to have Ramsey killed. He just had to make sure the deed was done before Domeric Bolton made the mistake of seeking out his baseborn half-brother.

On the subject of family disputes, Gregor thought greatly on the predicament surrounding the future of the largest house in the country.

Stevron and the other Freys who had enlisted in the Legion managed to demonstrate their usefulness quite often. Whatever their assignment, they performed diligently, and they represented their house with honor, integrity, and valor. There was the possibility that they were simply the pick of the litter, but even so, that was enough to appease Gregor and the other Leigonnaires.

Before very long, more Freys joined the Legion's ranks. A few others voluntarily entered the Night's Watch. Ser Theo Frey even took up the vacancy in Robert's Kingsguard after Jaime Lannister was dismissed.

Gregor was amazed by just how much good the Freys were actually be capable of doing. He felt as though he had severely underestimated them. Most of them, at least. There was one he was certain he had been correct about all along.

House Frey may have been on the road to regaining its honor, but its patriarch was long overdue for retirement. However, for all his many flaws, Lord Walder was the only person who was maintaining the order of his house. Once he breathed his last, his progeny would likely be fighting and killing one another for lordship of the Twins.

While that prospect would have thrilled Gregor once, he was determined to avert it now. All he had to do was ensure that Ser Stevron had enough support to dissuade any challengers and uphold his ascension to the lordship of the Crossing.

As an officer of the Legion without Banners, Stevron already had plenty of support. In fact, Gregor doubted he would need any more than that. Since the Legion answered directly to the Mountain, who answered directly to the King, Ser Stevron would essentially have the backing of Robert himself. Gregor doubted any Frey would be so bold as to defy the will of the king.

Now that Stevron had all the support he would require, Gregor wondered on how he could assist him in replacing his lord father. He thought on the fact that Walder was past eight. No one would question the sudden death of an old man, but Gregor had given Eddard Stark his word that Lord Walder would not be assassinated. Furthermore, he knew Walder would not be kind enough to die on his own anytime soon.

As such, Gregor set his mind to finding a nonviolent and subtle technique to removing Lord Walder from power and installing Stevron in his place. Obviously, the old weasel would not step down voluntarily. He could not be forced to do so, either.
The only ways a son could succeed his father whilst the latter was still living was if the father joined the Night's Watch (just as Lord Jeor had), or if the father became incapacitated somehow.

Walder was too old and too proud to take the black, but... there were plenty of ways a man of eighty could be deemed unfit to lead his house. Gregor elected to think on these ways for a while. All the same, he would not decide on one until he was confident in both its success and security.

A few months after Gregor visited the Wall, a bard appeared in Moat Cailin. No one could say for certain who this bard was or where he came from. He just showed up and offered Gregor his services.

Only the Mountain realized these "services" were not his talents with a harp.

Gregor invited the minstrel up to his solar under the premise of discussing a contract with him.

Once the door to the solar was locked and the area was deemed secure, the bard dropped his act. It was then that Gregor Clegane and Mance Rayder met face-to-face.

Of course, Gregor had seen through the King-beyond-the-Wall's disguise right away. Then again, the farce was never meant to fool the Mountain.

Mance admitted that he had been highly skeptical about answering Gregor's summons. For all he knew, it could have simply been a trap meant to lure him south and face King Robert's justice. No one could fault him for developing that theory.

When Gregor asked Mance what ultimately encouraged him to give the meeting a chance anyway, the former watchman stated that since Gregor had spared five of his people, he felt partly indebted to him. He also quoted the words of House Clegane of Moat Cailin: All Are Welcome. He debated that even the Free Folk counted as "all." Most of all, there was the content of the message Gregor had sent him. The Mountain's references to the Long Night and the Others had convinced Mance that Gregor was not misleading or deceiving him.

In any case, Gregor was pleased the King-beyond-the-Wall had chosen to hear him out. That marked the completion of the first of many steps in the long process of bringing the Free Folk south. The second step was discussed at that meeting.

Again, Gregor provided the elaborate account of his "visions," and how one of them had warned him of the Long Night. Mance seemed to believe that story almost without question. That was not surprising, seeing as he himself had forecasted the Long Night through lessons learned from timeless tales and myths.

Mance did not deny Gregor's accusation that he was scheming to bring the entirety of the Free Folk south of the Wall. If he did not return from this meeting, he claimed they would still march without him. Only they would be less organized and more desperate. And they would have much less to lose.

Shortly after that, Gregor confessed he did not desire a war any more than Mance did. Be that as it may, he was hoping to give the Free Folk the safety and protection that had been provided to all the Westerosi who lived south of the Wall. The solution he was looking forward was the one that involved the least amount of bloodshed.

It was then that Gregor revealed that he desired to establish diplomatic relations with the Free Folk. In this endeavor, he had the support of Lord Eddard Stark, Lord Commander Jeor Mormont, and King Robert Baratheon. The three men would allow Gregor to bring the wildlings south, but only under the condition that he could ensure that they would be able to coexist with the residents of the Seven Kingdoms.

Gregor explicitly clarified what was expected of the Free Folk once they relocated south. Firstly, they would not have to kneel to Robert or any other man. They would not have to fight in any conflicts or disputes. For those that wished to live separately from society, certain tracts of land would be designated for them. Ideally, they could live on the hundred miles of the Gift. For those that were willing to live alongside the "kneelers," they would be provided ample housing.

Regardless of where they went, the wildlings were expected to abide by the same standards as the people of the Seven Kingdoms. They could not steal, rape, or kill. If they wished to, they could enter the services of a lord or a landed knight in exchange for gold, food, and shelter. Gregor would not protest if they thought to join the Legion. He would actually welcome any who came to him.

Mance thought long and hard on Gregor's proposal. He was impressed that the Mountain had accounted for virtually every detail. Clearly, he cared just as much for the well-being of the Free Folk as Mance himself did. He was also very much aware of the consequences of leaving them north of the Wall.

In the end, the King-beyond-the-Wall decided to accept Gregor Clegane's proposal.

That moment denoted the beginning of step three.

Since there were so many who lived north of the Wall, and due to the eight-thousand-year rivalry between the Free Folk and the Seven Kingdoms, Mance would not be sending all of them south right away. Gregor agreed with him that it would be wiser and more practical to bring a small group of select individuals down at first. Once the people of the Seven Kingdoms became accustomed to their presence, larger, more diverse groups of wildlings could be sent overtime.

At the end of the meeting, Mance told Gregor that he would head back north and gather the leaders of the Free Folk clans together. He would tell them of the Mountain's arrangement. There was little doubt some of them would question its plausibility. Some would question Mance's motives just for negotiating with a "kneeler" in the first place. It was his belief that most of them would look past the means and focus more on the ends.

Once he won them over, he would select which among them would be the first to go south. He would compose that group carefully, prudently, and heedfully.

Mance would bring this group to Craster's Keep in exactly four months. He beseeched Gregor to ride out to the Keep at that same date, as regardless of who he picked, the Free Folk would want to meet the man who was bargaining for their lives at the risk of his own.

As long as he did not have to go inside Craster's house, Gregor was content with having the keep as their meeting site. Apart from that, he would have liked the opportunity to encounter the wildling immigrants and evaluate their strengths and weaknesses directly.

After Mance left Moat Cailin, Gregor wrote to Winterfell, King's Landing, and Castle Black, informing Lord Eddard, King Robert, and Lord Commander Jeor that he had successfully negotiated what could have been constituted as a treaty with Mance Rayder. He told them of the plan to bring the wildlings south in incremental measures, and he asked them for clearance to go ahead with this plan.

All three men promptly wrote back, verifying that the Mountain could proceed with this endeavor. However, they were still unwilling to allow Mance Rayder himself to settle in the Seven Kingdoms. For the present, he was still seen as a deserter and a rebel to the Watch. Even so, they would allow the negotiations with Mance to go on, as they were for the greater good.

Near the beginning of 290 A.C., Gregor, Dacey, Smalljon Umber, and a party of Legionnaires – most of them Northmen – rode north of the wall. The Watch had supplied a team of half a-dozen rangers to escort them all the way to Craster's Keep.

Although Westeros was in the midst of summer, it felt almost as cold as a Northern winter in this part of the country. Gregor was clad in two lairs of thick leather and double-knit wool, but the chill was still very much detectable.

However, Gregor's primary concern was not for himself. It was for the one who rode beside him.

All throughout the ride to Craster's, Gregor's gaze constantly drifted to Dacey. A couple months prior, she had fallen with child again. The bump in her abdomen was not yet noticeable, but it was there all the same.

Gregor knew that Dacey was a capable fighter even when pregnant. Still, he could not be spared the worries typical of a caring husband and expectant father. Nevertheless, he had reluctantly granted her pleas to accompany him north of the wall.

It took them nearly a week to reach Craster's Keep. Mance and his countrymen were already assembled there when they arrived. To be precise, they were on the outskirts of the keep, as Craster had been a very gracious host. Gregor had expected as much.

On the plus side, Craster had declared his property neutral ground. He announced that if there was any fighting on it, no one – be they Night's Watch, Legionnaire, or Free Folk – would be welcome there ever again.

Some angry glances and insults were exchanged between the watchmen and the wildlings, but no weapons were drawn. The Legionnaires had no conflict with either party, so they were able to maintain the peace.

It was then that Gregor met the wildlings Mance had chosen to be the first to immigrate to the Seven Kingdoms. To his surprise and delight, Tormund Giantsbane was one of them.

Gregor took some time to briefly but thoroughly interview each of the Free Folk. Some refused to answer his questions at first, but when he claimed that their very lives depended on their level of cooperation, they were much more compliant then.

Ultimately, the Mountain decided that each and every wildling in this group was ready for integration into the Seven Kingdoms. In fact, they were probably the most ideal picks to represent the entire Free Folk. That was a very hopeful sign.

Gregor chose to bring this group south straightaway. Before they headed back to the Wall, he told Mance to pay another visit to Moat Cailin in two months. By then, the Mountain would have determined whether or not the moat's other occupants could tolerate the Free Folk enough to live with them.

If it did not work, they would not give up on the immigration plan. They would simply try settling the first group of wildlings somewhere more remote and wait a while.

If did work… then in four more months, Mance was to have a second group of wildlings assembled at Craster's Keep, and Gregor would meet them there once more.
Gregor had notified the residents of Moat Cailin in advance of his pact with the Free Folk. Naturally, many of them had questioned it, but after everything their lord had done for them, the vast majority were willing to give his proposal a chance.

Initially, having wildlings at Moat Cailin proved to be quite a challenge indeed. The first couple of weeks involved a number of fights and disagreements. No one was killed, but there were more than a few who were seriously wounded. Thankfully, Maester Kennick managed to treat them all before infection set in.

The top officers of the Legion decided to set an example for their comrades. They frequently sparred with the Free Folk in the training yard and shared meat and mead with them in the Great Hall. Gregor even established a seat for the Free Folk on his private council, which Tormund was appointed to.

Two months after the first meeting at Craster's, Mance returned to Moat Cailin as a bard. Gregor informed him that was so far a success, and he bade him to assemble a second group of Free Folk with all due haste.

Another two months later, Mance did just that. Gregor rode north to Craster's once more, and he examined the King-beyond-the-Wall's newest choices for immigration. This group was slightly bigger and broader, but the Mountain gave each of them his approval. All of them were swiftly led south.

This process went on for the next five years. Every four months, the population north of the Wall decreased by a certain amount, and the population south of it increased just as much. The composition of each group of wildlings varied in size, nature, and overall status, but one thing they all shared was a desire for survival. As long as they did not ruthlessly murder others in this endeavor, that was enough for Gregor.

Not wishing to overcrowd Moat Cailin, Gregor had petitioned the Northern lords for possible sites to settle the Free Folk on. Most were unwilling to yield as much as an acre to the wildlings, but some of the more forgiving and good-natured among them agreed to set aside some tracts of land.

By the end of the fifth year of the Great Summer, wildlings camps could be found throughout a significant part of the North. Some of those camps even hosted lifelong residents of the Seven Kingdoms.

More than half of the Free Folk still resided on the other side of the Wall, but at the rate they were being incorporated into the Seven Kingdoms, most – if not all – of them would be on the right side by the time the next winter began.

Since the North was the largest of the Seven Kingdoms, no one was concerned that there would not be enough space for both the wildlings and the Northmen. Given how empty and desolate the North had seemed beforehand, insufficient land would not be an issue.

However, some had been concerned that there would not be enough food to go around. They were proven wrong. The Free Folk had survived the eons by hunting alone. They had ways of growing crops in even the harshest of weather conditions. Using a method similar to the glass gardens of Winterfell, they managed to sow their own crops. With the assistance of the Legion without Banners, the Free Folk even managed to open their own market and enter trade relations with the other regions of Westeros.

A lot of people had suspected that the Free Folk would merely be a danger to them or a waste of space and food.
The Free Folk were a danger indeed, but only to those who crossed them. And they were by no means a waste of space and food.

Gregor found they could be rather useful. Useful in ways that the Legionnaires could not be (or could not afford to be).

For instance, they were able to help Gregor resolve the issue of Ramsey Snow.

Two years, Gregor summoned a dozen of the most bloodthirsty wildlings to his solar, claiming he had an assignment for them. As long as it involved killing something, they were happy to oblige.

Once they were all together, Gregor told them that their objective was to murder a young baseborn boy. That took them by surprise. Not because they had any reservations about slaying a child, but because it was uncharacteristic of the Mountain.

Then he told them what Ramsey was and what he would grow up to be. Even the Thenns were appalled by Gregor's description of him. They accepted this job with no hesitation.

Their objective was simple: they had to kill Ramsey subtly and without being seen. Once he was dead, they were to find a way to frame his foul-smelling servant, Reek, for his death. A few of those twelve were experts at manipulation and deception, so this secondary goal was doable for them.

The dozen wildling assassins departed in the direction of the Dreadfort and its adjoining villages in the early morning. They returned to Moat Cailin three days later. A few of them were spattered with blood, but most of it was not theirs.

They said nothing to Gregor; the leader of the team merely gave him a slight nod, which was all the confirmation the Mountain needed.

Sure enough, later that week, Gregor overheard two Legionnaires gossiping near the armory. One was telling the other that he had heard somewhere how Lord Roose Bolton had gone into a great rage over the death of a young boy on his lands. The alleged perpetrator of the crime – a man who smelt as though he had never bathed in his life – had been literally torn to pieces at Bolton's command. Gregor could only smile at the news.

Another instance when the Free Folk demonstrated their usefulness occurred in the fourth year of the Great Summer. This time, they helped Gregor in the affair surrounding the line of succession of the Twins.

When they first relocated south of the Wall, the wildlings had brought a number of herbs and other ingredients that were key to the art of alchemy. A person trained in that field could use those ingredients to craft medicines, poisons, sedatives, stimulants, and all manner of potions.

With the aid of a pair of experienced alchemists, Gregor was able to concoct a draught that functioned similarly to a certain drug he had once used as a CIA agent in his first life. That particular drug triggered a stroke in the one who ingested it. The stroke was not fatal, but the victim would be rendered indefinitely catatonic.

Once the draught was perfected, Gregor sought out Ser Stevron Frey and told him of the draught's effects. Lord Walder Frey's eighty-fifth nameday was approaching soon. The Mountain gave Ser Stevron the idea to attend his father's celebration and quietly slip him the draught.

Ser Stevron was stunned by the suggestion, but only for a moment. He was quick to go along with it after that.
A fortnight before Walder Frey turned five and eighty, Ser Stevron left for the Crossing with a party of his father's retainers and his fellow Legionnaires.

On the day of Lord Walder's eighty-fifth nameday, nothing especially exciting or noteworthy happened at Moat Cailin.

The day after, something did.

In the afternoon, a raven flew in. It carried a missive which was stamped with the symbol of the Twins. The missive contained a proclamation that House Frey's lord had gone into what could only be described as a shock-induced coma. There was no indication of what had triggered the attack, and Walder Frey showed no signs of recovery. As such, his son and heir, Ser Stevron, had assumed the position as head of their house.

Several days later, another letter arrived from King's Landing. This one was a declaration confirming the removal of the catatonic Walder Frey from power and the subsequent installing of Stevron Frey as the new lord of the Crossing.

As Gregor had hoped, there was no feuding over lordship of the Twins. Ser Stevron Frey still had the full support of the Legion without Banners, and many of his half-brothers and kin already preferred to have him as their leader over anyone else, including themselves.

Soon after, Stevron sent Gregor another message, saying that he would likely not return to Moat Cailin, as the Twins were in dire need of proper organization. Gregor wrote back that he understood, and he bade Lord Stevron the best of luck in bringing his house to order.

Gregor was not concerned that Stevron Frey would be unable to establish stability amongst his house. He was just glad Lord Walder was no longer in control. That old weasel had infested the world with enough of his seed. Now there would be more room for other children.

That was rather fortunate, as a lot of couples had been busy lately. That included House Mormont and both branches of House Clegane. Gregor made sure to keep track of all the children who were born in the Great Summer, especially those of them that belonged to the families he was close to.

The first member of the post-Greyjoy's Rebellion generation was Arya Stark. She was born shortly after Balon yielded his crown to Robert.

A few months later, Lady Selyse Baratheon bore her lord husband a daughter, named Shireen.

In the middle of 290 A.C., Lady Dacey gave birth to her second child. This one was another son, whom she and her husband named Alyver after Gregor's paternal grandfather.

That same year, Catelyn Stark bore her husband another son named Brandon, and Queen Cersei birthed a black-haired daughter named Joanna.

Additionally, both Obara Martell and Nymeria Martell both fell with child, much to the glee of their father and husbands (and Gregor's, incidentally).

Obara gave birth in the first month of 291 A.C. She and Sandor had a daughter named Tyta.

Nymeria gave birth two months later. She gave Lord Jorah a son named Edwyle.

In early 292 A.C., Lysa Tully had her second child and first son. She named the child Robin, and he was by all accounts a healthy boy. An ideal heir for Lord Jon.
In late 292 A.C., Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey were graced by their third child and first girl. They gave their daughter the name Vallory, and she quickly became the joy of Moat Cailin.

Prince Oberyn Martell had not grown idle. Ellaria Sand provided her paramour with two more daughters: Dorea in 291 A.C. and Loreza in 293 A.C.

Both of these girls had been aunts from the moment of birth. Not long after, they became aunts again.

Near the end of 293 A.C., Nymeria produced a daughter named Jeyne for Jorah.

At the start of 294 A.C., Obara gave Sandor a son named Mors.

In the latter-half of 294 A.C., Queen Cersei gave birth to twin girls – Myrcella and Cassana.

It seemed that every year, Gregor's family – meaning both his blood relatives and the Legion without Banners – got larger.

Alas, at one point, it got a little smaller.

For the first year following Greyjoy's Rebellion, Victarion Greyjoy had been searching for an ideal wife. Despite Gregor's suggestion that he marry a woman from another region of Westeros, Victarion debated that the Islands were not quite ready for that form of diplomacy just yet. He would arrange for his own heir to wed outside his family's domain, but he himself would take an Ironwoman for his bride.

By the start of the next year, Victarion was courting Gysella Goodbrother, the second of Lord Gorold Goodbrother's twelve daughters. Less than a year after that, a drowned priest saw them wedded by the harbor in Moat Cailin.

Shortly after Gregor and Dacey were blessed with their daughter Vallory, Gysella was expecting a bundle of her own. That was when her lord husband approached Gregor on a personal matter.

As much as Victarion genuinely loved Moat Cailin and the people who occupied it, he wished for his children to be born at Pyke. Furthermore, he believed he had been absent from the Iron Islands long enough. It was time for him to properly take up his place as the Lord Paramount of the Islands, and he could not do that from the mainland.

Gregor completely understood Victarion's obligation to return to Pyke. He wished him the best of luck in his duties as the liege lord of the Ironborn, and he hoped Gysella would provide him numerous strong sons and daughters. The Iron Captain was greatly touched by those words, and he made a vow that if his first child was a boy, he would name the lad after the Mountain.

With Victarion gone, the Iron Islands had no representative on Gregor's council. But the vacancy was taken up fairly quickly. Oddly enough, it was filled by Maron Greyjoy.

Although Maron had come to the moat as a hostage, he had adapted to his captivity rather well. No one treated him unfairly or unkindly. He was allowed everything except the ability to travel outside the grounds of the moat alone. Victarion had taken the time to educate his nephew on the morals and principles of the Legion without Banners. Maron had been extremely resentful of his uncle and those lessons at first, but he eventually came to firmly grasp and appreciate them.

Gregor could actually see the change in Maron overtime. That was the type of change Victarion had undergone when he first joined the Legion.
By the time Victarion became a married man, Gregor had petitioned King Robert to release Maron from his role as a hostage. After looking over the Mountain's basis for this request, Robert Baratheon agreed to give Maron back his freedom. Not long after, Maron was given entry to the Legion without Banners.

Maron had been there when Victarion Greyjoy left the moat. He had watched as his uncle sailed down the Cut aboard the Iron Victory with his aunt. They had waved to him, and he had waved back.

Although Maron was already free to go home, he had chosen to stay at Moat Cailin by his own volition. That was when Gregor approached him with the offer to join his secret council. Maron accepted almost immediately.

In the middle of 293 A.C., Gregor received a raven from Pyke. He was informed that Lady Gysella Greyjoy had given her lord husband a son, and, true to his word, Victarion had named his heir Gregor.

So many new lives were coming in to the world. The majority of them would never have even existed in the original universe. Upon realizing that, Gregor felt a quaint sense of self-satisfaction.

The middle of 294 A.C. marked the halfway point of the Great Summer. It would not be long before the King and the Lords Paramount made the coming of the Long Night common knowledge. They had decided on a specific date when they would come forward; it would be the first day of the seventh month of that year.

Gregor spent much of the week leading up to that date in his solar. He was trying to think of a way to minimize the fallout of the Long Night being made public. There would be turmoil, obviously. His job was to ensure it did not devolve into anarchy and chaos. The people had to know; they couldn't not know about the Long Night. But some of them would be unwilling to listen or refuse to listen altogether. Gregor's job was to ensure that as many people as possible admitted to and comprehended the truth, and they do that as soon as possible. The sooner they faced reality, the better things would be for them.

While he was in the midst of his brooding, Gregor was visited by Polliver. The tall man with the black beard held out a piece of rolled-up paper and told his master "Message for you, Ser."

As Gregor took the parchment from his man-at-arms, he asked "Where from?"

"Well, there was no raven, Ser," Polliver disclosed, "A rider came up the Causeway. He dropped it off."

"A rider from the south?" Gregor muttered, a little perplexed.

The nearest house south of Moat Cailin was House Reed. After that, the closest house was located in the Riverlands, and that was over a fortnight's journey by horse.

Gregor shrugged off his bewilderment, opened the parchment, and read it.

Then he read it again, as he thought he had misread it the first time.

He had not. Every word was just the same the second time around.

Without looking up from the parchment, Gregor announced "Polliver… we're about to have a visitor. A rather unexpected visitor at that."
"Ser?" Polliver uttered, raising an eyebrow.

"I can't explain now," Gregor proclaimed, "Just… keep me apprised if any crannogmen come within sight of the gates."

"As you say," Polliver avowed. He then turned and exited the solar, leaving the Mountain alone once more.

Gregor watched Polliver leave, and then he closed his door and leaned against the adjoining wall. As he did, he looked down at the parchment in his hand, and he let out a deep sigh.

Currently, he already had plenty of problems to worry about. He had had the privilege of choosing to solve most of those problems himself. He had not asked for this newest problem. Nonetheless, it seemed as though he was stuck with it.

There was a saying in the North: If you take a wolf pup away from its mother, the she-wolf will always try to reclaim her child, even at the risk of her own well-being.

According to the message, Gregor would soon find out just how true that saying really was.
Note: I have received complaints about the story's apparent lack of "conflict" recently, particularly with regards to how the Northmen and the Free Folk seemed so readily willing and coexist with each other in the last chapter. While I can understand these people's viewpoint of the situation, I wish to assure them and the rest of you that the Long Night will not be the only danger in this story.

Remember, this is a series where things go wrong when one least expects them to. I have plans for something of that sort to happen before very long. Something that could probably even rival the Red Wedding in terms of tragedy and shock (I say "probably" because I don't want to give myself too much credit).

Oh, and if I gave you the impression that Mance has already won the support of ALL the wildlings, I apologize for that. When I address him as King-beyone-the-Wall in the previous chapter, I only do so because Mance styles himself as such. I am aware at this point in time, he has not yet gathered all the Free Folk together. Although it took him until the events of the series to win over nearly every wildling to his cause, I believe he must have already made great progress by the end of Greyjoy's Rebellion. So, for the sake of argument, let's continue to use that assumption.

Lastly, a few certain individuals were vocally displeased with how the last chapter was formatted (no dialogue, very concise summary of certain events, and such). For those of you who did not like that approach, I ask you to bear with me just one more time. After this update, all future chapters will return to the previous format, in which characters talk and a more elaborate description of events is provided. This chapter will be a fair deal shorter than several of the ones preceding it, in any case.

Another turn of the moon elapsed.

Then, one day in the early morning, a small party of thirteen approached Moat Cailin from the south. The group was composed of a dozen men and one woman. Lord Gregor Clegane himself greeted them at the gate, as he had been expecting them.

The men were evidently crannogmen. They were relatively short, especially when compared to the average Northmen. They wore hooded cloaks that draped their shoulders like shrouds, and instead of swords, they carried tridents and nets.

The woman was taller than any of her twelve male companions. Gregor knew why; she was no crannogwoman.

She was clad in a cloak as well. The hood was drawn up so that it concealed her face in shadow. While they were outside, neither she nor the twelve men removed their hoods.

Gregor bade them welcome to the moat, and he escorted them up to his solar.
Once they were there, the thirteen new arrivals pulled back their hoods and revealed their faces.

The Mountain's attention immediately went to the woman.

She had changed.

For one thing, she was taller and more curvaceous. But those changes were natural. Some of the others were not.

Her hair was dyed blond. Her once grey irises were now hazel. Her cheeks were dotted with freckles. Her face had somehow been molded so that it appeared smaller.

Only her dearest friends and her immediate family would recognize her up close. Anyone else would have not the faintest inkling that she was a wolf in sheep's clothing.

But she was still a wolf. A brown-haired, grey-eyed, pale-skinned, long-faced wolf. One day, she would appear as such again.

Those changes to her complexion were all reversible; none of them were permanent. For the present, however, they would have to remain. That was the only way to keep her safe. And the only way to keep the one she loved most in the world safe and nearby at the same time.

The present situation had been the result of Ashara Dayne's ingenious thinking.

When she saw how desperately Lyanna Stark yearned for her son, Lady Ashara had devised an elaborate plan to bring her and Jon together. This plan would not involve revealing to the world that Lyanna was still alive or exposing Jon's true identity.

Strictly speaking, the concept was simple. Lyanna would travel to Moat Cailin in disguise under the pretense of a commoner looking for work. Subsequently, Eddard Stark would send his "bastard" nephew to Moat Cailin to be fostered by House Clegane.

Gregor's job was to have Jon serve as his squire, and to have Lyanna serve as a maid. To be precise, she would be Jon's personal maid.

Changing Lyanna's appearance and giving her a new identity had been the easy part. The hard part had been to convince Lord Eddard to collaborate with them. That was not only hard, but also rather time-consuming.

Since Greywater Watch had no rookery, the only means to communicate with House Reed was through riders. Lord Howland had had Lady Ashara's plan delivered to Winterfell just a few weeks after its inception. The message had been written in a type of riddle-based code, just in case it was somehow intercepted by another party.

At first, Lord Eddard had refused to even entertain considering this plan, for fear of what could happen to his sister or her son if they were discovered. Although he had dispatched that response very soon, it had taken the rider a few more weeks to return to Greywater Watch.

This was why it had taken seven years to bring Ashara's scheme to fruition. Most of that time was spent exchanging pieces of a written argument between Lord Eddard and Princess Lyanna. He was determined not to accept that extremely risky plan; she was equally determined to persuade him to accept it.

Lyanna ultimately won the argument when she pleaded to her brother to hear her as a fellow parent. She pointed out that if Eddard was somehow separated from Robb, Sansa, Arya, or Bran, he would do everything in his power to reunite with them, even at great personal risk. When Ned was unable to deny any of that, he finally gave in.

Fortunately, Jon Snow himself did not protest when he first learned of this proposal. As a matter of fact, he was ecstatic at the thought of going to Moat Cailin and meeting the famous Lord Gregor Clegane. Gregor's deeds were well-known at Winterfell, especially by the children, highborn or otherwise. As it happened, Robb and Arya Stark were apparently a little jealous that their cousin would be the first of them who got to meet the Mountain.

Gregor Clegane had not been informed of this matter until after Eddard had conceded to his sister's request. That was the day when that one rider arrived with that fateful letter.

After getting over his initial shock over Lyanna's coming to Moat Cailin, Gregor was quick to go along with Ashara Dayne's ploy. He almost wished he had thought of it first. He felt he could have; he had to admit it was very meticulously and cleverly devised.

He was pleased with the notion of having Jon Snow as his squire. Willas Tyrell had been his squire since the tourney at Lannisport, but while he had performed his duties superbly, he had celebrated his eighteenth nameday that year. He was getting a little too old to continue squiring. As the future lord to a Great House, he had an image of dignity and respectability to uphold in his adulthood.

The heir to Highgarden would continue serving on Gregor's secret council, but Jon Snow would replace him as the Mountain's squire.

Meanwhile, the arrangement between Lyanna and Jon had been very specifically detailed: she would be his maid and nothing more. To protect him, she would not tell him who she was or how she was related to him. Even if he swore he would never tell anyone else, she could not risk anyone else finding out the truth. Of course, Varys already knew the truth, and he would continue to keep it secret, but the Spider was not the only person in Westeros with spies.

Despite these conditions, Lyanna had no intention of withholding the truth from Jon forever. All that mattered was that she was close to him; that was all she wanted. Plus, with this arrangement, he would at least be familiar with her, and it would be a whole lot easier for him to grasp the truth when she finally came forward to him.

Jon Snow arrived at Moat Cailin later that same day. He was escorted there by a score of his uncle's men-at-arms. Gregor welcomed him at the northern gate and showed him to his room.

Jon's quarters were in the middle of the Lord's Tower. Gregor and Dacey's bedchamber was located five floors above him. Vallory was still in the nursery on the floor below her parents' room, whilst Rickard and Alyver shared a room on the next highest floor.

The Lord's Tower was typically reserved for House Clegane and their most prominent retainers. Despite being labelled a bastard, Jon Snow was still recognized as the son of a Stark. Due to that and the fact that he was Gregor's new squire, he was given a private room in the Lord's Tower.

Lyanna was in Jon's room when he and Lord Gregor got there. When she finally saw her son after eleven years of estrangement, she was awed. He had grown so much. He looked so much like her (before she had modified her appearance, at any rate).

She felt an overwhelming desire to rush forward and embrace her son. For his sake and hers, she did not. She merely greeted him with a smile, a light dip of her head, and a practiced muttering of "m'lord."
He thanked her for making him feel welcome and proceeded to get settled.

Gregor decided to leave them alone for a time. He figured he may as well let them bond, even if they could only do so as master and servant.

He walked away from that bedroom with a deep-seated feeling of relief. So far, Lady Ashara's scheme had been executed perfectly and without any unexpected complications. As long as Lyanna could keep up this mummer's farce as a maid, there would be no need for Gregor to worry that she or Jon would ever be placed in grave danger.

A couple months after Rhaegar Targaryen's second wife and third child arrived at Moat Cailin, Gregor had his next name day. That year, he turned nine and twenty years old. Nine and twenty. He had never lived to that age in his first life.

Gregory Welch had been twenty-eight years and seven months old when that terrorist suspect shot him in the back. He had served the Central Intelligence Agency faithfully for six of those years, and he had accomplished many great deeds in the span of those six years.

Gregor Clegane was still proud of what he had managed to do as a federal agent of the United States. Be that as it may, he was far prouder of what he had achieved as a Westerosi.

Gregory Welch may have done a fantastic job of protecting his country, but his occupation had left him with very little time for personal life. Because of that, he had never known the joys of having a family of his own. He had never married. He had never had children. He had even been single at the time of his death.

Gregor Clegane was able to execute his duty to the Seven Kingdoms and start a family at the same time. He had been married for eight years, and he was a father of three. Dacey, Rickard, Alyver, and Vallory meant more to him than anything else in either world. They were his primary source of everyday inspiration; they motivated him to continue working towards making Westeros a better place for all.

On the subject of bettering Westeros, Gregor had been contemplating various ways he could use his knowledge from his first life to benefit the Seven Kingdoms. He had already enhanced the architectural aspect by introducing cement and concrete, and he had invested gunpowder in the wartime effort.

During the Great Summer, he wondered how else he could enrich Westeros' culture. Then it dawned on him: why not do so through speech?

CIA Agents were often encouraged to learn a second language. Gregory Welch could speak three. Apart from English, he was fluent in both Spanish and Italian. He had learned both in college. They proved especially useful in his assignments that involved investigating drug cartels and the mafia.

Obviously, no one spoke Spanish or Italian in this world. As such, there had been no opportunity for Gregor to use either of them. All the same, he could still remember how to read, write, and speak in both without error.

That gave him a distinct advantage. He could use both languages as a secret code. All he had to do was sort out his most trustworthy allies and teach them one or both dialects. Then he would be able to communicate with them without risk of being overheard.

After pondering on the issue extensively, Gregor decided he would teach Spanish to the officers of the Legion without Banners, and he would teach Italian to his family members and closest allies.
Unsurprisingly, everyone who was made aware of one or both of those languages was stunned. They were under the impression that Gregor had composed those languages on his own. Luckily, he managed to convince them otherwise. He claimed that he had discovered a set of scrolls aboard Euron Greyjoy's vessel, and that these "scrolls" had been plundered from two long-gone civilizations from beyond Essos. The scrolls contained an extensive catalogue of those kingdoms' respective languages, as well as a comprehensive manual of how to translate both of them to the Common Tongue.

To properly "preserve" the languages, he claimed to have taken sole custody of those scrolls, and he would honor the memory of the ancient civilizations by reviving their languages and utilizing them as secret codes. His retainers and subordinates had been in high favor of that idea.

Ever since the start of the Great Summer, Gregor had been teaching Spanish to hundreds of people and Italian to dozens. After five years, most of them could speak them rather well. None of them had fully mastered either language, but they showed tremendous promise. As such, there was definite hope that some of them would manage to master Spanish, Italian, or both.

While he educated his family, friends, and allies, Gregor Clegane considered learning yet another language. That would be quite useful if he ever had need to sail across the Narrow Sea. After looking over his options, he concluded that High Valyrian seemed to be the most ideal.

Thus, Gregor made it his goal to learn the old dialect of the Targaryens. That objective proved to be challenging, but doable all the same. His progress learning High Valyrian was gradual; it was far harder to understand than Italian or Spanish. Fortunately, Maester Kennick and a few of the more cultured Legionnaires were able to guide and assist him.

Despite all this time focused on language skills, Gregor did not spend the entirety of his day developing new forms of communication with others. In fact, that only occupied a minor part of his typical day. The rest involved training with swords, conversing with his lieutenants, more covert meetings to discuss the fate of Westeros, and similar topics.

One of these topics was the main relationships throughout the nine regions of Westeros, especially the ones that involved his family.

A few more months after Gregor celebrated his twenty-ninth nameday, he received a raven from Casterly Rock. It brought news of a certain wedding. This wedding was significant in that it made Gregor kin to the Great House of the Westerlands.

Earlier that week, Tyrion Lannister and Ellyn Clegane had been joined together in the sept of Casterly Rock. Their betrothal had lasted a full five years, as they had decided to wait until Ellyn turned eight and ten.

Normally, Tywin Lannister would have had the two of them joined as soon as possible. However, due to certain circumstances, he had allowed them that half-decade wait.

Ever since Ellyn returned Brightroar to House Lannister and Gregor convinced Jaime to retake his place as the heir to Casterly Rock, Lord Tywin had been much more thoughtful and amenable of the Cleganes. Gregor was still certain the Lion Lord would use Ellyn as a political hostage, but at least now, he would treat her with some amount of kindness. As harsh, unforgiving, and immoral as Tywin could be, he did not become cruel without provocation. Long as Ellyn behaved – and Gregor had little doubt she would – she was in no danger.

Gregor wished he could have attended his sister's wedding, but his duties in the North impeded his availability. Sandor managed to attend, though. In fact, he was the one who sent the letter. He provided his brother with a lengthy account of what had happened.

The cloaking part had been an interesting spectacle. By now, Ellyn was over six feet tall, whereas Tyrion was slightly closer to four than five. In order for him to drape his house cloak around her shoulders, she had to kneel down in a relaxed pose. Luckily, she had done that willingly and happily, much to Tyrion's relief. She had spared him a great deal of embarrassment, which he was grateful for.

The feast had been seven courses long with an occasional minstrel playing a few songs. Unsurprisingly, "The Rains of Castamere" had been a recurrent number. Only Tywin Lannister would play such a song at a wedding feast.

At Tyrion's insistence, they had skipped over the bedding ceremony. Gregor was pleased by that. He did not like the thought of a bunch of strange men publicly stripping his sister down and then groping and fondling her while they carried her to be bedded by her husband.

According to what Sandor told him, Ellyn was now tall and strong enough that she could lift almost any man she faced. With that in mind, Tyrion would be no challenge.

While the bedding ceremony had been called off, the bedding itself had not. Sandor could verify that; he and Obara had the misfortune of being given the guest bedroom right next to the bedding chamber. He had heard everything – everything – that went on in the adjoining room. Even he and Obara had never been THAT loud. Worse yet, Obara seemed engrossed in listening.

Sandor was glad they had not brought Tyta and Mors with them to the Rock. Still, the Hound had gotten no sleep that night. Apparently, neither did Tyrion or Ellyn.

When he encountered Tyrion and Ellyn at breakfast the following morning, they seemed rather smitten with each other. Evidently, she had been looking forward to and enjoyed the previous night just as much as Tyrion had. It must have helped that Ellyn had spent much of the last five years travelling between Clegane's Keep and Casterly Rock. That had enabled her and Tyrion to get much closer to each other.

In any case, Gregor was pleased to discover that his sister was now happily married. He knew Tyrion would do everything within his power to keep her safe from everything and everyone who could ever mean her harm, including his lord father.

Alas, the joyous period following Ellyn's wedding did not last as long as Gregor hoped it would. Not a fortnight later, another raven reached Moat Cailin. This one's words were as dark as its wings.

Lord Tarrence Clegane's palsy had gotten consistently worse over the course of the past five years. It had encompassed his legs as well as his arms, and it had continued to spread throughout more of his body. At the start of that same year, it had reached his head.

Just the other day, he had suffered what Gregor would have called a cerebral hemorrhage in his first life. In this universe, it was simply referred to as bleeding of the brain.

Whatever one called it, it was what finally killed Lord Tarrence Clegane.

Even after reading the letter four times, Gregor could not believe it. His father was dead.

A short memorial service had been held for Lord Tarrence. It was a private affair; only the Cleganes of Clegane's Keep had been in attendance. Tyrion had come as a sign of respect for his wife and his late father-by-law. Lady Daliah had been quite appreciative of that act of kindheartedness.

Gregor was the only member of his family that had been unable to attend. His mother and siblings did not fault him for being unavailable, but he still felt guilty for not being able to help lay his father down to rest.

After the funeral, Sandor had renewed House Clegane's oath of fealty to Lord Tywin and King Robert. He was no longer the heir to Clegane's Keep; he was now the lord of it.

Like his family in the south, Gregor mourned deeply for his father. However, he could not afford to lament on his death for too long. Or, at least, he could not make it the sole occupier of his thoughts. Much work remained to be done to prepare Westeros for the Long Night. That was still the Mountain's primary responsibility.

By this point in time, around ten thousand wildlings had been brought south of the Wall. Every four months, more of them arrived in the Seven Kingdoms.

The wildlings were no longer confined to the North. Using his connections throughout Westeros, Gregor had managed to arrange for many of them to locate to other parts of the Seven Kingdoms.

Some of the more aggressive wildlings had settled in parts of the Vale. They got along rather well with the mountain clans of the region.

Some of the more peaceable wildlings had settled in parts of the Riverlands. They mostly resided along the Trident. Under Lord Stevron's command, House Frey had been very accommodating of the Free Folk.

Some of the more prolific wildlings had settled in parts of the Reach. They had shared their farming and hunting techniques with a great number of the natives, which enabled the locals to be even more productive than before.

It required great deal of time, patience, coercion, initiative, debate, and tolerance, but Gregor finally managed to establish some form of lasting peace between the Free Folk and the inhabitants of the Seven Kingdoms.

Every now and then, there were still a few isolated incidents between the wildlings and a certain lord. Gregor took charge of mediating in those disputes. Usually, he managed to offer a solution that most of the involved parties were content with. Of course, he could never please everyone, but what mattered was that the conflict was always put down without any lasting damage.

There were still over ninety thousand wildlings in the lands north of the Wall. Of those, Mance Rayder had sway over perhaps thirty or forty thousand. Fortunately, he was continuously working towards winning over more of them. With every new party that was successfully sent south, more of the Free Folk were induced to join Mance's cause.

Gregor would leave the burden of bringing the wildlings to the Seven Kingdoms up to Mance. The Mountain's job in that regard would only be to care for and monitor the Free Folk once they were there.

Relations between the Free Folk and the residents of the Seven Kingdoms gradually improved overtime. By the latter half of 294 A.C., they were more or less stable.

That was when Gregor decided it would be most ideal to tell the public the true reason for bringing the Free Folk into their domain. He sent a message to each of the King and each of the Lords
Paramount with the suggestion that they break the news, and each of them wrote back their agreement.

At the end of 294 A.C., news of the Long Night was announced throughout the realm.

Gregor could not predict how every person in Westeros would react, but he could imagine how they would take the news. As it happened, the average person's actual reaction was not very different from the expected reaction. There was shock. There was disbelief. There was terror. There was fear. There was skepticism. Most of all, there was fanaticism.

Many had refused to believe that the Others were actually going to return to the world.

There were a few individuals who suspected that this announcement was merely a ploy designed by the Mountain and the Great Families to ensure the smallfolk's loyalty. Then the wildlings claimed that they believed in the credibility of the announcement. The Free Folk had no reason to mislead them in this regard, so the theory that the announcement was a hoax had died very quickly.

Once its credibility was generally accepted by all, there was nationwide panic. Many wished to fortify themselves in their homes or relocate to someplace further south. There were several who even considered sailing across the Narrow Sea. At one point, the people were so frantic that they nearly turned on each other.

Luckily, under the guidance of Lord Gregor Clegane, King Robert Baratheon, and the other eight Lords Paramount, the country was saved from a tumultuous wave of chaos. Ironically, the Free Folk proved to be quite useful in that process. They were able to assure the smallfolk, the landed knights, and the noble lords alike that they all have excellent chances of surviving the Long Night. Their prior experience north of the Wall provided ample credits to those claims.

That reassurance was what primarily enabled Gregor, the King, and the Great Lords to restore peace and order throughout the realm. In turn, relations between the Free Folk and the Seven Kingdoms took a sharp turn for the better.

Indeed, now that there was a form of lasting peace between the two civilizations, everyone could focus properly on taking additional measures to prepare against the Long Night.

For the last five years, Lord Stannis Baratheon had seen to the mining of dragonglass on Dragonstone. Several crates of the compound had been transported to the Wall to be forged into daggers, swords, arrowheads, and spearheads.

Already, Lord Stannis had provided the Night's Watch with enough dragonglass to properly arm each and every one of the black brothers.

That in itself said something, as the Watch was about five times larger than it had been during Greyjoy's Rebellion. It had grown from six hundred in number to approximately three thousand.

The King had followed Gregor's recommendation of providing certain incentives in effort to convince more people to enlist in the Watch. As a result, men from all over the country had voluntarily taken the black for the sake of their loved ones. With some convincing from Gregor Clegane, Jeor Mormont, and Mance Rayder, many of the wildlings were persuaded to join the Watch, too. There were even a handful of Essosi who joined their ranks.

With all these new black brothers, the Watch was able to reopen several of their abandoned fortresses. Castle Black, Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, and the Shadow Tower were no longer the only occupied castles along the Wall. Now Westwatch-by-the-Bridge, Greyguard, Icemark, Deep Lake, Greenguard, Long Barrow, Oakenshield, and Sable Hall were adequately manned and defended, as well.

The Torches, Rimegate, Stonedoor, Woodswatch-by-the-Pool, Sentinel Stand, Hoarfrost Hill, Queensgate, and the Nightfort were still closed, but it was hoped that they would be reopened by 300 A.C. Based on the Watch's projected rate of recruits, that could very well be the case.

Supplying the Wall with weapons and men was just one of the.

Trade agreements had been established between Westeros and Essos. In the event that the Seven Kingdoms ran out of food during the next winter, they would have to ensure more provisions were brought in from across the Narrow Sea. It would not do for them to survive the onslaught of White Walkers just for them to perish of starvation.

Furthermore, the bonds between the nine regions of Westeros continued to grow stronger, mainly through marriage. It seemed that every other month, a landed knight, minor lord, or noble lord from was getting wed to a highborn lady from another part of the country.

There was one match in particular that surprised even Gregor.

After some long, ponderous meditation, Tywin Lannister had decided to setup a match between Jaime and a highborn lady from outside the Westerlands. That alone may have astonished many. What really stunned Gregor was who Lord Tywin chose for his heir. He had selected Lynesse Hightower.

Since all the daughters of the current Great Lords were too young for Jaime, Tywin had to resort to picking a woman from a noble house. Gregor could understand why he chose a woman from the Reach, and why he chose that specific house, but why Lynesse?

Then again, of Lord Leyton Hightower's six daughters, the only other one who was still unwed was Malora, but she was likely too old for Jaime. Plus, she still carried the moniker Mad Malora, and considering what Jaime had done to the last person who had been labeled "Mad" by others… just the thought was disconcerting.

At any rate, Jaime Lannister and Lynesse Hightower were wed near the start of 295 A.C. Their wedding was much grander than the one between Tyrion and Ellyn, but the bride and groom were notably less taken with each other this time. Indeed, there was little love between the Kingslayer and the Oldtown girl. He had only married at the insistence of his lord father, and she was more interested in the benefits that she could gain from this union.

Fortunately, Jaime was not as exploitable or easy to coerce as Lord Jorah Mormont would have been. He kept his wife finely clothed, sheltered, and provided for, but he did not go out of his way to please her. He encouraged her to count her blessings and cherish each one.

Whatever the case, this marriage could not have been any worse that Jaime fucking his sister.

Additionally, Gregor had little doubt that House Lannister would not suffer the same fate as House Mormont had in the original universe. He was gladdened by the knowledge that Jaime was more assertive than the man who was supposed to have been Lynesse's husband original. Of course, Lord Jorah was by no means a pushover, but he had been hopelessly misled in his failed attempts to appease Lynesse.

It was quite fortunate that he had fallen in love with Nymeria Martell in this universe. The Dornishwoman was nowhere near as demanding as the Reachwoman, and she was far easier to please. In fact, all she ever asked of her lord husband was that he let her fight alongside him in everything. Having seen her in battle and knowing what she was capable of, Lord Jorah coincided to that simple request.

Although House Mormont's honor had been spared, there were still some quarrels from the original universe that required Gregor's mediation.

The biggest example of these disputes came about in 296 A.C., when House Whitehill of Highpoint threatened to go to war with House Forrester of Ironrath. This had been precipitated by how Asher Forrester had lain with Gwyn Whitehill and claimed her maidenhead. Even though she had gone to Asher's bed willingly, her father Lord Ludd had been quick to call it rape.

The Forresters were sworn to Deepwood Motte, and the Whitehills were sworn to the Dreadfort. However, neither Galbart Glover nor Roose Bolton were eager to get involved in this matter. Even Lord Eddard Stark himself would not intervene. All of them were just allowing the two houses to resolve the conflict amongst themselves.

Lord Gregor Clegane, however, was more than willing to intercede. He, Dacey, and a whole platoon of Legionnaires made for the wolfswood as soon as they heard of Lord Whitehill's threat to declare war.

They arrived at Ironrath just in time. Lord Ludd was there; he had been "negotiating" with the Forresters. He had given Lord Gregor Forrester an ultimatum: either banish Asher from Westeros, or he would rally his forces and march on Ironrath.

Fortunately, Gregor Clegane stepped in before Lord Forrester had to make his decision. That was when he took over the talks, and the negotiating went much more smoothly from there.

Lord Gregor Forrester and his kin were gracious hosts, just as Gregor expected them to be.

Meanwhile, Lord Ludd Whitehill was every bit as pompous, irritating, unpleasant, obstinate, and insufferably rude as he had been in the video game.

Of course, Gregor was not limited to a set of dialogue options like in the game. That was very fortunate, as he thought most of those options were pathetically submissive, especially when compared to what he would have preferred to have said in the Forresters' position.

Truthfully, Gregor had not cared very much for the video game to begin with. He had been a bit of a casual gamer in his first life. Most of his experiences involved products by Bethesda, Valve, Ubisoft, and Electronic Arts. He had played a few Telltale games, as well. He thoroughly enjoyed their Walking Dead and Wolf Among Us games. But he despised their Game of Thrones game.

One reviewer had called it "a masochist's wet dream." While Gregor felt that was an accurate description, he preferred to call it "a torturous, unrewarding heap of fuck-trash."

But that was just his opinion. Season 2 of the game was rumored to be in development. Alas, he had not lived long enough to see it released. Even so, He was certain it could not have been any worse than the first game, especially since House Whitehill had lost the protection of House Bolton at the end of Season 6 in the show. They were all but doomed to fall.

Aside from that, Gregor had to admit that for all its numerous flaws, Season 1 of the game did have its redeeming moments. Mainly stabbing Britt to death and kicking him off the Wall, beating and blinding Gryff Whitehill, shoving a longsword through Harys' mouth, and beheading Ludd Whitehill.
Sitting at the meeting table across from Ludd, Gregor would have loved to behead him for real. He had the means, the opportunity, and the privilege to do so. He could do it just as stoically and emotionlessly as that cunt Ramsay had murdered Ethan Forrester.

All he had to do was approach Ludd, draw Summit, swing it through the air, and then his ugly melon of a head would roll across the ground. Later, when Ned Stark wished to know what happened, the Mountain could just claim that Lord Whitehill posed a direct threat to the security of Westeros, and he had merely eliminated that threat accordingly.

Nonetheless, Gregor was still determined not to make any unnecessary enemies. In addition to that, since Gwyn Whitehill was a reasonable person, Gregor was certain one of her brothers had to be somewhat reasonable, as well. Obviously Gryff was not. Karl was already long dead, and Ebbert was studying to become a maester. Hopefully Torrhen was more decent than his father and younger brother.

When Ludd was finished ranting about how Asher had "dishonored" his daughter, Lord Gregor Forrester had his chance to defend his son. The Mountain listened attentively to both men, but the Lord of Ironrath was plainly the more rational of the two.

To avoid confusion, only the Lord of Ironrath was called "Gregor." The Lord of Moat Cailin was simply referred to as "The Mountain" when both men were in the same room.

Lord Forrester revealed that Asher was willing to marry Gwyn to lay any questions of honor to rest. Asher was there, and he confirmed his father's claims; he was not opposed to wedding Gwyn. Gwyn herself had attended, as well, and she did not protest Lord Gregor Forrester's proposal. She actually seemed in favor of it.

Apparently, Lord Whitehill thought his family was too good to be associated with a member of House Forrester in that way. He would only be content with Asher being deported from the Seven Kingdoms or with Forrester blood on his blade.

The Mountain would allow him neither.

As the King's Master of Order, the Mountain's authority superseded that of either lord. As such, he decreed that no one would be banished and no one would declare war on another house without his consent. He was, however, partial to Lord Forrester's proposal of wedding Asher to Gwyn.

Asher and Gwyn themselves were delighted by that prospect, and Lord Forrester was pleased to consider any course of action that did not involve bloodshed.

Ludd was the only individual there who disapproved of that suggestion. He seemed adamant that unless Asher was sent away, he would march against House Forrester.

Now it was the Mountain's turn to give Ludd an ultimatum: he could either accept his proposal of marrying Gwyn to Asher, or he could go ahead with his declaration of war. But if he chose the latter, the Mountain informed him that the Legion without Banners would join the fighting on the Forresters' side.

The Mountain felt a type of vicious satisfaction at watching the smug grin on Ludd Whitehill's face be hastily replaced by a horrified grimace. Lord Gregor Forrester seemed just as startled as Ludd, but when he grasped the fact that the Mountain was on his side, a grin came across his face. As for Asher, he merely smirked. Gwyn looked nearly as nervous as her father.

Ultimately, Ludd Whitehill grudgingly agreed to Lord Gregor Clegane's terms, much to Asher and Gwyn's delight and Lord Forrester's relief. However, he refused to have any part in financing the wedding. The Mountain was content with that. Since the proposal had been his, he offered to pay for it out of his own pocket. That was quite doable, as Moat Cailin's treasury was practically overflowing with gold.

Three weeks later, Asher Forrester and Gwyn Whitehill were married before the heart tree of Ironrath. Galbart Glover, master of Deepwood Motte, conducted the ceremony. Ludd had elected not attend, so Torrhen Whitehill came in his father's place to give Gwyn away. He did not seem averse in any way to the concept of his sister marrying a Forrester.

That was a sign that the Mountain had not been overly optimistic about Ludd Whitehill's thirdborn son.

The Mountain and the top officers of the Legion without Banners had been invited to the wedding, and the Mountain had gladly accepted.

When Asher and Gywn took their vows before the heart tree, no one there could question that they meant every word they said. They were smitten with one another.

During the feast, Lord Gregor Forrester raised two different toasts. The first was to this grand step that was being taken to repair the old rivalry between House Forrester and House Whitehill. Indeed, Gregor Clegane felt they were a regular Romeo and Juliet. Hopefully, they would not have the same ending as Romeo and Juliet (even though it was in this world, where people literally dropped dead all the time).

The second toast was to Lord Gregor Clegane and the Legion without Banners. The Mountain was surprised to be singled out in such a way, but he said nothing when the Lord of Ironrath made this announcement. Lord Gregor Forrester declared that he and his owned the Mountain a great debt, as without him the union between Asher and Gwyn would never have been possible.

The Mountain humbly accepted that honor, and he did not deny the truth of Lord Gregor's allegation.

Immediately after the feast, Asher and Gwyn retreated to the bedchamber. Although there were no bedding ceremonies in the North, one look at the lustful gaze exchanged between the bride and groom, and there was little doubt that their marriage would be very much consummated that very night.

Gregor Clegane and his Legionnaires returned to Moat Cailin later that night. On the ride back, Gregor wondered how long it would be before Asher and Gwyn became parents. He guessed not too much time would pass before they had their first child. After all, it seemed just about everyone else was having babes these days. More of them, in some cases.

For instance, Lady Catelyn Stark gave her lord husband a third son in early 295 A.C. He was named Rickon, a variant of Rickard, after Lord Eddard's late father.

That same year, Lysa Arryn gave birth to her third child, a daughter named Donella.

In the final month of 295, A.C. Nymeria Mormont gave Lord Jorah another daughter named Alys.

In the first month of 296 A.C., Dacey had her and Gregor's fourth child. This one was a boy they named Larys.

Later that same year, Obara Clegane gave Sandor a second son named Dermot, and Nymeria birthed her and Jorah's third girl, whom they named Bessa.
Queen Cersei Baratheon had her final child, a son whom she and Robert named Tommen, in 297 A.C. Like his elder brother and sisters, he possessed black hair and blue eyes.

For the latter half of the Great Summer, House Lannister was as busy as any other family.

For each year following her marriage to Jaime, Lynesse Lannister birthed one child. All three were girls, whom she and Jaime named Merian, Eryn, and Selina.

Gregor could imagine that Tywin Lannister was at least a little furious that his firstborn son still did not have a male heir after three attempts. Jaime probably did not care which gender his children were, and Lynesse was most likely indifferent one way or another.

In early 298 A.C., Tyrion and Ellyn were blessed with their first child. They had a healthy baby boy named Duncan. Like all children of Clegane descent, he was larger than normal at birth. Fortunately, Ellyn had a far easier time birthing her son than Dacey or Obara had birthing their own children. At first, Tyrion had simply been overjoyed that his son had not been born a dwarf. After that relief set in, he was happy just to have a child of his own.

Gregor was ecstatic for both his sister and Tyrion. They were two of the best people he knew; they deserved to find happiness with each other and with their newborn son.

Near the start of 299 A.C., Dacey had her and Gregor's fifth and final child. They had another boy, and they decided to call him Torrhen after the King who Knelt.

Shortly before Torrhen Clegane entered the world, Gregor received news from across the Narrow Sea.

Lord Monford Velaryon and Ser Davos Seaworth's forces had finally caught up with Viserys and Daenerys Targaryen. They had intercepted the Mad King's two younger children in Pentos. They were staying at the estate of Illyrio Mopatis.

Magister Illyrio had the means to keep the Targaryen children in and the Westerosi soldiers out indefinitely. Fortunately, Lord Varys had apprised him of the Royal Army's intentions beforehand. When the Magister was assured that the prince and princess would not be harmed, he allowed Lord Monford, Ser Davos, and a fraction of their forces entrance to his home.

They had spent the next week explaining their presence in Essos. They revealed that although they had been ordered to locate the Targaryens, they were not going to force them to travel anywhere with them. Essentially, Viserys and Daenerys could continue to travel as they had before. But there were a couple of conditions. Firstly, they could not come to Westeros just yet, and secondly, they had to have a large, heavily-armed Westerosi escort with them everywhere they went. King Robert had been very adamant on both of those terms.

At the end of the week, Lord Monford and Ser Davos sent back a thorough report of their first encounter with the Targaryen children. Basically, Viserys Targaryen had been exceptionally difficult to work with, but Daenerys Targaryen was more than willing to hear them out. The prince was clearly the Mad King's son; the princess was not-so clearly the Mad King's daughter. In any case, the Royal Fleet had successfully established contact with the Targaryen children.

Lord Monford, Ser Davos, and the majority of their ships were back in the Seven Kingdoms by year's end. They left behind a company of one hundred men – made up of warriors from all over Westeros – to protect, guard, and supervise Viserys and Daenerys' activities at all times. Naturally, Viserys had protested, but he had little choice but to comply with Robert's orders. Daenerys, on the other hand, welcomed the Westerosi soldiers. From her point of view, they would be able to protect her from everything, including her brother.

Once more, Gregor was pleased. So far, all his measures and objectives to prepare Westeros for its darkest hour were coming along very nicely. Nearly everything had gone according to plan. At this rate, Westeros would very soon be fully prepared against any type of threat to its balance of harmony. He managed to achieve this goal in the middle of 299 A.C.

That was fortunate indeed, as winter was coming.

Chapter End Notes

Next up: the ending of the Great Summer. The Long Night still won't come about for quite a few more chapters, but the threat of it will be rapidly approaching.
It was cold. Painstakingly cold, actually. He thanked the gods for gloves, otherwise his hands would have gone numb long before now.

Normally the cold did not bother him. Three years on the Wall had accustomed him to it.

But there was something about THIS cold that perturbed him. It chilled more than his body. It seemed to disquiet his peace of mind, as well.

I am not looking forward to the next winter. Then again, who is?

As unsettling and frigid as his surroundings were, Whalen took comfort in the knowledge that he was not alone.

He was in the company of half a dozen others. Like them, they were all mounted on sturdy horses.

Including he, only five of those seven were dressed in black.

Gared rode at the head of the party. He was the eldest of them, and he had been on the Wall for forty years, longer than the other four Watchmen combined. One could see his services had taken a toll on him. He had lost both his ears, three of his toes, and the little finger of his left hand to the cold. But what truly mattered was that he was the survivor of far more than a hundred ranges.

Behind him was Ser Waymar Royce, the "leader" of the company. He had been a black brother for little more than a few months. Even so, he had insisted on taking command of a ranging, due to his knightly status and highborn birth. For whatever reason, Lord Commander Mormont had decided to grant the young Valeman's request.

The wildlings were next. Only one of them, Leathers, was in black. He had been among the first of the Free Folk who had chosen to enlist in the Watch. Frenya rode directly beside him. Although women were forbidden from taking the black, she and some of the other spearwives could still be helpful in their own ways.

Will was next. A fellow native of the Riverlands, and an excellent tracker, as well. He was considered laconic and normally kept to himself, but whenever he spoke, he never wasted words.

Ser Myles Manwoody came up after. He had his arms wrapped tightly around his upper body. The climate seemed to agree with him least out of all of them. Considering his homeland, that was unsurprising. How the Dornishman could endure these temperatures was a bit of a mystery. He must count himself fortunate he is only here temporarily.

Ser Whalen Frey was positioned at the very back. His job was to remain alert and be heedful of the environment. No easy task, given where they were. Even so, he did not utter a word of complaint. He just kept his eyes and ears open for the slightest abnormality.

It had been ten hours since they left Castle Black. Or maybe nine. It was hard to keep track of time out here. I just know it hasn't been eight.

The Sun was freshly emerged in the east when they set out. Now it was just barely visible over the western horizon. The Wall was still within their line of sight, but just barely.

They had stopped once for the midday meal and twice to water the horses. In all that time, they had exchanged very little dialogue. Other than the occasional call of a bird or snap of a tree branch, there had been practically no noise whatsoever.

Having grown up in the most overcrowded holdfast in the Seven Kingdoms, Whalen typically always welcomed some peace and quiet. However, this much silence north of the Wall was quite unusual. The Riverlander tried to enjoy it, but he found it disturbed him as much as the cold did, if not more so.

Ser Myles finally broke the silence with a question: "Have we much farther to travel?"

Leathers gazed around them and disclosed "Another day. No longer."

Ser Waymar peered over his shoulder and stated mockingly "Are you in a hurry?"

"No," the Dornishman mumbled in annoyance, "I just wish to ascertain that we'll arrive on time."

"They'll be there, Ser Myles," Frenya insisted, "Trust me; they have no place better to be."

"I do," Myles grimly murmured. He spoke so softly that only Whalen and Will could hear him.

"You'll be back at Moat Cailin soon enough, ser," Will told the Dornishmen in effort to reassure him.

Yes, and with half a thousand wildlings for company instead of us.

Myles attempted a grin in Will's direction and gave him a nod of understanding.

The group proceeded in relative silence again. Before too long, Gared gestured for everyone to halt. Once they did, he announced "We should make camp here."

"I will decide when we make camp, Gared," Waymar Royce haughtily declared, "We still have some amount of daylight left. So long as we do, we must take advantage of it."

"How far can you expect us to travel in three minutes?" Leathers wryly muttered.

"Every minute we move today is a minute less we'll have to traverse tomorrow," Waymar debated.

"I would have to agree," Will conceded.

"I can see why one would," Ser Myles thought aloud, "But one could also debate that every minute we move today is simply a minute less we'll have to rest for tonight."

"Besides, who's to say we would actually have less distance to cross tomorrow?" Frenya contended, "Do you expect us to get back to the Wall by the next sundown?"

"If we make good time, yes," Waymar Royce pronounced.

"Don't overestimate us or yourself, milord," Gared cautioned the Valeman, "We're already over fifty miles north of Castle Black, and we have at least another twenty to go before we reach our destination."

"Apart from that, we'll be going back with a far larger crowd," Ser Whalen finally spoke up, "And unlike those present, not all of them will have horses."

"He has a point," Leathers avowed, looking to the youngest knight, "And as you yourself said, we are not in any rush to return."
Waymar Royce was a little indignant that most of the party was protesting his command. Nevertheless, Whalen could tell that he was more than a little fatigued, just like the rest of them. Men are generally more agreeable when they're tired. Or maybe they're less stubborn. I suppose it depends on the man.

Ultimately, Ser Waymar let out a deep sigh and professed "Very well. The Mountain and the Old Bear gave us five days, anyway. We can spare a few extra minutes of respite."

That decision was received much more favorably than his most previous one.

They made camp in a small clearing. It was surrounded on three sides by ironwood trees. It did not do much in the way of shelter, but it kept out the wind and provided adequate protection from the creatures of the forest.

Once camp was assembled, Will and Frenya went to hunt, Leathers tended to the horses, and Gared and Ser Myles made a fire.

Whalen stood guard at the open end of the clearing. Just as he had done on the ride north, he kept his eyes open for anything out of the ordinary.

Waymar stood nearby, studying a map of the lands north of the Wall. The map was old and lightly damaged in parts, but it was a reasonably accurate depiction of the northernmost part of Westeros.

As he looked over the map, he made some notes on the group's progress. Whalen heard him faintly mutter to himself "This could still set us back. We'll have to go faster tomorrow."

"We'll make it back to the Wall on time, Ser Waymar," Whalen told him assuredly.

The Valeman looked over at the Riverman. He grimaced and uttered irately "'On time' is not my goal, Ser Whalen. We can do better than 'on time.' I intend to do better."

"As you say," Whalen commented bluntly. He waited until he turned back around to roll his eyes. And to think I came to the Wall to avoid his type.

In actuality, that was not his only reason for taking the black. He had also done it for a more selfless reason.

Ser Whalen Frey was aware that Ser Waymar Royce had enlisted in the watch was that he wished to earn a name for himself on his own, as he believe he came from a house with too many heirs.

If one could call two older brothers too many heirs. Waymar Royce was the thirdborn son of Lord Bronze Yohn Royce of Runestone. As of yet, his elder brothers Andar and Robar were unmarried and did not have any heirs of their own.

Strictly speaking, Ser Waymar was the fourth in his house's line of succession. Had he been a less tactful man, Whalen Frey would have chided the Valeman to be grateful that he was a third son.

Whalen Frey had the misfortune of being a fourteenth son. Worse yet, his elder brothers had made him an uncle dozens of times collectively, and several of his nephews had made him a granduncle. So Whalen's chances of gaining lordship of the Twins had always been next to nonexistent.

Furthermore, if Waymar Royce was so determined to make a name for himself, Whalen could not help but wonder why he had not joined the Legion without Banners instead. Unlike the Watch, the Legion was a temporary service. At the very least, he would have had the option to look elsewhere if being a Legionnaire had not agreed with him. Whereas at the Wall, he would have to continue serving, whether the black agreed with him or not.

It happened that Ser Myles Manwoody was fourth in his family's line of succession, as well. His elder brother Dagos was the current lord of Kingsgrave, and Lord Dagos had two sons, Myles' nephews Mors and Dickon. Be that as it may, Ser Myles had not been compelled to leave his home entirely. He fully intended to return to Kingsgrave someday and see his nephews give him grandnephews. Maybe he would also give them some cousins.

Then it occurred to Ser Whalen; perhaps Waymar actually had given the Legion some consideration, but he had ultimately decided on the Night's Watch. Whalen Frey had made that very decision himself; it was not hard to fathom that others had made it, too.

Will and Frenya returned a few minutes later with some squirrels and rabbits. Whalen would have preferred deer, but he was glad just to have some meat. Up here, no one could afford to be finicky.

Once the fire was made, Will and Frenya gave the squirrels and rabbits to Gared. He proceeded to skin them, placed them on a spit, and roasted them over the flames. The smell of cooking meat soon permeated the air.

About ten minutes later, the party had their supper. They stayed around the fire to keep themselves and the food warm. Ser Whalen sat between Ser Myles and Frenya.

Leathers and Will had brought some additional provisions from Castle Black. They passed around a bowl of greens and some slices of bread.

Whalen helped himself to a rabbit leg, a handful of lettuce, and a couple slices of rye.

The leg was seared on the outside and bloody on the inside. It could have used a pinch of spice, too. The heat was far more pleasing than the taste. The lettuce was cool and crisp, but it had wilted a bit. The bread had been baked fresh that morning, and it had been wrapped properly, but the climate had rendered it a little brittle. It was difficult to chew.

I suppose this is still better than what they served at the Twins.

It took Ser Whalen a total of five minutes to eat. As he wiped his fingers clean of crumbs and grease, he looked to the man at his left. Ser Myles Manwoody was huddled closer to the flames than anyone else. Despite being dressed in three layers of warm clothing, the environment did not agree with him at all.

"Are you alright, Ser Myles?" Whalen queried in concern.

The Dornishman said nothing at first. He did not even look in the Riverman's direction. Then he mumbled crossly "This is the last time I volunteer for escort duty."

Ser Waymar scoffed at that and murmured derisively "Where's your sense of adventure?"

"I'm not here for adventure," Ser Myles snapped, "I'm here for the good of the realm."

"As are the rest of us," Will muttered.

"Yet you don't wish to keep doing that good," Leathers pointed out to the knight of Kingsgrave.

"I can still do things for the good of the realm in the south," Myles Manwoody debated.

Unlike some people here.
Ser Myles was there for the same reason as the rest of them: he had volunteered. However, his role as a volunteer was not for life, as Ser Myles had not taken the oaths of the Night's Watch. He was merely there as a representative of the Legion without Banners.

Ser Myles Manwoody had been a member of Oberyn Martell’s entourage when the prince came north to join the Legion. Ser Myles had enlisted in their ranks alongside the Red Viper. They had been Legionnaires for the past thirteen years.

Lord Gregor Clegane had struck an agreement with the Night's Watch and the Free Folk. Thrice each year, he would arrange for a large number of wildlings to be relocated south of the Wall. The wildlings would be handpicked by Mance Rayder, and they would be inspected by Lord Commander Mormont at Castle Black. Once they were cleared, they would take up residence somewhere in the Seven Kingdoms.

That was the purpose of Ser Whalen's current venture beyond the Wall. He and his six companions had been dispatched to intercept the newest band of wildling immigrants and lead them all the way back to Castle Black. In total, this was the thirtieth occasion in which this dangerous errand was undertaken.

For the very first occasion, Lord Gregor had come himself with a great troupe of Legionnaires and Watchmen alike.

On every subsequent occasion, Lord Gregor had been preoccupied with the affairs of the rest of the realm. Due to his inability to come and meet the wildlings before they were moved south, he had sent at least one other Legionnaire in his place.

Originally, the number of Legionnaires and Watchmen had been quite large, and the number of wildlings had been quite small. Now it was the other way around. These days, the number of wildlings per trip was at least five times greater than the number of Watchmen and Legionnaires put together.

Ser Whalen Frey knew this was not because the Legion or the Watch lacked for manpower. As it happened, both organizations now had over five thousand members each. They could have spared a few more people to be sent beyond the Wall.

The true reason for cutting back on their numbers was because in recent years, the regions north of the Wall had become considerably safer to traverse. The number of raids by the Free Folk had dropped significantly, and the only ones among them who tried to pass the Wall were those of them who were admitted through its gates.

In the early days, some of the more savage wildlings had tried to prevent their countrymen from abandoning their lands. With the combined forces of the Legion, the Watch, and the migratory Free Folk, the threat posed by these aggressors was quickly purged. Nowadays, the most hostile wildlings tended to keep their distance from the Legionnaires, the Watchmen, and the southern-bound wildlings.

As such, five black brothers, one veteran Legionnaire, and a reformed spearwife were deemed enough for this assignment.

This was Ser Myles Manwoody's fourth trip beyond the Wall. Based on his claims, it would also be his last.

Ser Whalen found that queer. Although he was aware that the Dornish sun could burn one's skin even in winter, Ser Myles Manwoody had adapted to life in the North fairly quickly. In fact, based on the way he talked of his prior experiences north of the Wall, he had been able to tolerate and overcome the hardships of the inhospitable weather on those three occasions rather easily.

Perhaps he too has noticed this new type of cold.

That was the best explanation Ser Whalen Frey could think of. It made the most logical sense, after all. The Great Summer would be coming to an end very soon, and during the changing of the seasons, even the land of eternal winter witnessed a great drop in temperature.

"When we get back, you're free to do whatever you please," Ser Waymar Royce contended, "For now, I need you focused on the mission."

"I'm always focused," Ser Myles Manwoody proclaimed, rubbing his hands over the campfire, "It happens I can focus on two objectives at once."

"What matters to me is that you can remain focused on the one," Ser Waymar murmured drily.

"I can, ser," Ser Myles crossly repeated.

Just then, Frenya got up off the ground, walked around Ser Whalen, and knelt beside Ser Myles. She bore a devious grin and uttered suggestively "You know, fire is not the only means of keeping warm, ser. There are… other ways."

South of the Wall, if any woman other than a tavern whore had been that direct, she would have shocked every person around her. Southron ladies generally preferred to be subtle. Whereas here… subtlety was cast aside in favor of directness.

Ser Myles was a little surprised by how forward Frenya had propositioned him, but he quickly adapted a wicked smirk and responded with "Well, I would be pleased if you would share with me this 'other way.'"

Whalen had to suppress the urge to laugh at his candidness. Only the Dornish…

Ser Whalen Frey observed Frenya and Ser Myles Manwoody as they retreated to a more secluded part of the clearing. When they got there, he quickly averted his gaze. He had no desire to continue watching them then.

"I hadn't noticed there was anything between them," Gared muttered plainly.

"Well, you don't have to be attracted to someone to fuck them," Waymar Royce argued.

"That is true," Leathers commented, "Some of my people fuck as often and as casually as they eat or piss."

"Then perhaps my father was a wildling," Ser Whalen jested.

Gared, Waymar Royce, and Leathers got a good laugh at that. Will stayed silent, as he normally did.

"Perhaps she'll want a turn with one of us later," Gared conjectured. By his voice, he did not sound very hopeful of his chances of being "one of us." That statement sounded more an empty remark than an actual proposal.

"I believe our oaths would complicate matters," Whalen Frey.

"Half the Watch would disagree with you," Waymar Royce slyly uttered.
"Indeed," Leathers conceded, "Just because you got these black garbs, don't mean you have to keep your cock in 'em."

"Yes, but before I wore black, I took another oath in a sept," Ser Whalen revealed, "I am a married man."

"So am I," Waymar Royce said sardonically. "We all are. We're married to our duty."

"With mistress for our honor," Gared added in, echoing Benjen Stark's philosophy.

"You know what I mean," Whalen Frey murmured in annoyance, "My wife may be in the Riverlands hundreds of miles to the south. Even so, as long as she lives, I shall lay with no other woman."

Ser Waymar scoffed and cheekily uttered "Look at that; a Frey who takes his vows seriously."

"There is such a thing, boy," Whalen Frey remarked, putting a spiteful emphasis on that final word.

Waymar Royce scowled at the slight, and he challenged the elder knight with "Care to repeat that?"

"Alright, enough!" Will abruptly interjected.

At the quiet ranger's sudden outburst, a wave of silence rapidly passed over the clearing. The only sounds that could be heard were the light moans produced by Frenya and Ser Myles Manwoody from their private little corner.

"I'm certain Frenya would fuck any of us, long as she's willing," Will stated frankly, "If any of you lot want a go with her after Ser Myles, then ask her. But as you said, Ser Waymar, we need to remain focused on our quest. So focused I shall remain. I'll take the first watch."

At that, he picked up his sword, attached it to his belt, and sauntered to the entrance of the clearing. The other four black brothers kept their eyes on him as he moved further away.

Just before he stopped walking, Ser Waymar Royce shrugged and mumbled in acknowledgment "Certainly, Will."

He's just as nervous as the rest of us. Small wonder.

After a brief pause, Waymar Royce looked to the others and pronounced "We should settle down soon. I'll check on the horses before I turn in."

That was likely just an excuse to get away from the others.

Ser Whalen did not doubt that Ser Waymar would somehow try to make him pay for calling him "boy." He was not especially worried, though. He saw no reason to be afraid of a knight half his age, even if said knight was higher born and in common of this company.

By this point, Gared, Leathers, and Ser Whalen Frey were the only ones who were gathered around the fire. Gared concentrated on keeping his hands and feet (or what remained of them) warm.

After a couple minutes, Leathers rose to his feet, stepped over to where Whalen was seated, and sat down beside him.

As he got comfortable in this new position, he looked to the Frey knight and asked rhetorically "Do you miss your wife, Ser Whalen?"
"Very much," Whalen replied honestly.

Holding his open palms near the embers of the campfire, Leathers bade the younger man "Tell me about her."

Whalen Frey turned to wildling and uttered inquisitively "What possible interest would you have in that?"

"I like to know the people I work with," Leathers elucidated, "It's my belief you don't truly know a man until you know his family, too."

Ser Whalen chuckled a bit and claimed "It would take far longer than the night to tell you about my family."

"So I've heard," Leathers said with a smirk, "But your wife would suffice."

That's a much more reasonable request.

"Very well," Whalen coincided. He paused for a moment to add another log to the fire, and then he began with "Her name is Sylwa. She was born a Paege of Serpentine. She's the daughter of Ser Halmon Paege, the house's master. On that note, it happens that my elder full brother Jammos is married to her elder sister Sallei. But my wedding came first. We were wed at the Twins in late 286 A.C."

"Had you met her before that day?" Leathers inquired.

"Once," Whalen recounted, "When she and her sister visited the Twins at my father's request. No words were exchanged between us. She barely even took note of me."

"I assume she made up for that on your wedding night?" the wildling cockily muttered.

"Oh, she did," the Riverman humorously affirmed, "For the entirety of the bedding ceremony, I felt as though I were the Lord of the Crossing."

"Any children?" Leathers enquired.

"Of course," Whalen chided, as though that was the stupidest question he had ever heard, "I come from the most productive family in the country. Nearly all my elder brothers have at least one child. The only exceptions are my half-brothers Luceon and Danwell. One's a septon in King's Landing; the other has a wife who's suffered many miscarriages and stillbirths. But other than them, nearly every grown son of my father has progeny of his own."

"How many do you have?" Leathers asked

"Two," Whalen expounded, "My son Hoster has seen twelve namedays, and my daughter Merianne has seen eleven namedays."

"Where are they now?" Leathers queried.

"At Serpentine with their mother," Whalen answered him, "Before I came north, I had Sylwa return to her ancestral home. I felt she and the children would be safer there than they'd be at the Twins."

"Because it was so overcrowded?" Leathers assumed.

"That, and I didn't trust my kin with her," Ser Whalen proclaimed, "While I may believe in the sacredness of wedding vows, some of my brothers are not so faithful. In fact, before our betrothals were drawn up, Jammos had mentioned that he hoped he would get Sylwa instead of Sallei."

"Then I understand your concerns," Leathers professed.

The two men sat in silence for about thirty seconds, and then the wildling black brother said to the Frey knight "If you do not mind my asking… why did you leave them?"

Whalen scowled at that statement, but he did not let it provoke an angry response out of him. Leathers had merely chosen his words poorly. He could imagine what the elder man meant to ask.

Whalen Frey shifted his attention back to the fire and sincerely replied with "To protect them."

"From what?" Leathers said inquisitively.

"Two things," Ser Whalen told him, "First, from destitution. A large house requires a large treasury, and given how large my father made House Frey, there was a chance our treasury will eventually run dry. The benefits King Robert offered to the family of any man who voluntarily joined the Watch were quite appealing. Spent with caution, the money my wife and children received is enough to sustain the three of them for many years."

"Was Ser Halmon unwilling to support them at Serpentine?" Leathers contended.

"No, he welcomed them happily," Whalen Frey explicated, "But I was not about to force his grandchildren onto him without giving him something in return. No man tries to utterly abandon his responsibilities at the feet of his father-by-law."

"No man with a thimble of self-respect, you mean," Leathers disputed. As the younger man nodded his head, the wildling inquired "And the second thing you wish to protect them from?"

Ser Whalen Frey gradually turned to the wildling and softly told him "The very thing your people are running from."

That one sentence spoke plenty on its own. Leathers seemed to be content with it, at any rate. He did not ask for any clarification. Thank the Gods for that; the last thing we need is to talk about that dreaded event.

"Then I respect your reason for taking the black," Leathers disclosed, "I myself have a number of similar reasons for doing so. I have a list, in fact."

"A list?" Whalen said, intrigued.

"It is a list of the names of my sons and grandsons," Leathers clarified.

_Ah, that makes sense._

"I am here for all of them," Leathers stated, "Just as you are here for your wife and young ones."

Well, then we have more in common than I dared to think.

Strangely, that thought made Ser Whalen feel a little more at ease.

"Have they settled close to the Wall?" Whalen queried.

"Yes, they're at a camp near the top of the Gift, just outside of Mole's Town," Leathers informed him.
"Do you keep in contact with them?" Whalen said in interest.

"I try to," Leathers revealed, "Neither they nor I can write, so letters are not an option. So they ride up to the Wall to visit every once in a while. They never stay long, but I cherish those visits."

"You should," Ser Whalen declared, "I would love to have my own family call upon me. Alas, the North is too inhospitable for them."

"Because of the cold?" Leathers assumed.

"Mainly," Whalen confirmed.

"Soon enough the whole rest of the country will be just as inhospitable," the elder man pointed out.

"I realize that," Whalen asserted.

The two black brothers sat in quietness for a couple minutes. Then Whalen turned to look at Leathers and noticed an uneasy expression across his face. He asked "What ails you?"

Leathers continued staring at the fire, but he heard the knight's question. He solemnly answered with "I was among the first of the Free Folk to ally with Mance. I was one of the first of my people who moved south of the Wall, and I was the first of them to dress in black. Somehow, I cannot cast aside the notion that I may be one of the first to perish, as well."

Whalen could comprehend that anxious thought. A few times over the past three years, he had wondered it, as well. Still, he had hoped it would not be addressed that night.

"If we are not careful, any one of us could be the first," Whalen debated.

"We'll just have to be more careful then," Gared commented from the side. I almost forgot he was here.

"Indeed," was all Leathers said in response.

By now, Frenya and Ser Myles Manwoody had finished warming each other up. As they got redressed in their outermost layers of clothing, they stumbled back over to the campfire. It would seem Ser Myles has managed to overcome his distaste for this climate. Indeed, the Dornishman appeared much less averse to the cold than he had been earlier. Truthfully, Ser Whalen was, too.

Waymar Royce returned to the clearing soon after. He declared that it was about the hour when they should get to bed.

Ser Whalen drew the third watch of the night after Will and Ser Myles. The Dornishman woke him shortly before midnight and went to sleep almost immediately after.

As he made his rounds around the clearing, Ser Whalen found his mind wandering back to the talk he had had with Leathers. Specifically, he thought about three people who had been mentioned in that conversation.

The night he left the Riverlands, Ser Whalen had shared a passionate evening with his wife. True to his word, he had not laid a hand on another woman since then. Still, he loved and longed for her tremendously.

His son Hoster had been named in honor of his liege lord, Hoster Tully of Riverrun. Hoster Frey was currently serving as a squire to his uncle, Ser Damon Paege. Earlier that year, Ser Damon had written Ser Whalen to tell him about his son's achievements. Whalen had been pleased to discover that his son was performing magnificently.

His daughter Merianne had been more precious to him than anyone else in his life. She was still a little girl, but her father knew she would be a woman soon. He hoped her mother and grandfather would be able to arrange a good marriage for her. Once, he had considered approaching Lord Hoster Tully on the possibility of a match between Merianne and his heir. Ser Whalen did not believe the Lord of Riverrun would actually accept the suggestion, but he figured it never hurt to ask.

Then Ser Edmure had to go and marry Balon Greyjoy's daughter, Lady Asha Greyjoy. At first, that union had shocked the Riverlords. Even so, the match had not been made without due cause. Apparently, its purpose had been to resolve the age-old hostilities between the Riverlands and the Iron Islands.

So far, it appeared to be well on the way to accomplishing that goal. Lady Asha captained her own vessel, the Black Wind. After they were wed, Ser Edmure did not force his wife to relinquish her command. On the contrary, he encouraged her to hold onto it, which she did. At the beckoning of her uncle, Lord Victarion, Asha had used the Black Wind to improve trade agreements with the Riverlords and improve security along the coast.

Recently, Whalen had heard somewhere that Ser Edmure and Lady Asha were expecting their first child. Regardless of whether their firstborn would be male or female, this babe would be the first one born from a willing union of a Riverman and an Ironwoman in over three hundred years.

Whalen had to admit; this marriage was far more advantageous for the Riverlands and the rest of Westeros than a marriage between Riverrun and the Twins ever would have been. Aside from that, Ser Edmure was around twenty years older than Merianne Frey. Ser Whalen's own father had been even older than his lady mother Alyssa Blackwood, but he did not wish for his daughter to suffer such a fate.

As long as his wife and children were secure and happy, Ser Whalen Frey would be content. Part of him constantly regretted leaving them behind. But a greater part of him knew that he would be able to do far more at the Wall to keep them safe than he could do south of it. A lifetime of service to the Watch was worth the knowledge that his loved ones would be protected.

Perhaps sometime after the Long Night was over, he could travel to Serpentine and visit them, if only for a short while.

If I live that long, that is…

When that thought entered his mind, Ser Whalen Frey's eyes drifted down to the dagger on his belt. It was made of the obsidian mined from Dragonstone. Lord Commander Mormont had decreed that every person who went north of the Wall was required to carry one such weapon.

Ever since he arrived at the Wall, Ser Whalen had carried a dragonglass blade on his person at all times. So far, he had never had cause to use it. But he knew that sooner or later, he would have to.

If Lord Gregor Clegane is to be believed – and I see no reason why he should not – the Great Summer is in its last year. But it is still summer, and it will be for a few more months. I suppose we should be thankful for that much. Because once summer ends…

He instinctively placed his hand over the hilt of his obsidian dagger. He did not draw the blade, but he kept his fingers wrapped around it firmly. Somehow, just touching this weapon brought him some relief.

Until the next spring, I'm always keeping this thing within reach of me.

At one in the morning, he woke up Frenya so she could take the next watch, and then he swiftly retired to his bed. He slept soundly for the rest of the night.

It was still dark when Ser Waymar Royce had everyone awoken. The crack of dawn did not arrive until after they broke their fast. Ser Whalen could see the sun rising in the distance when the group finally set out again.

Their journey took them past Craster's Keep. The incestuous old man and his daughter-wives were nowhere to be seen. That was unusual; normally some of the girls were always out in the yard, tending to the animals or the crops.

Perhaps they are simply waiting for us and the other wildlings to leave the area. From what I've heard, Craster is not very partial to crowds.

In the late afternoon, the seven companions came within a mile of their destination. Once more, Ser Waymar instructed them to halt.

"Will, Leathers, Frenya, proceed," the Valeman ordered, "Gared, Ser Myles, Ser Whalen, and I shall remain here until you return."

The tracker and the two members of the Free Folk promptly climbed off their mounts and continued onward on foot. Although Frenya and Leathers stayed near each other, Will kept about ten feet of space from the spearwife and the wildling in black. This was done so that they could cover more ground and ensure that at least one of them would have a chance to retreat in the event of an ambush or a similar hindrance.

The main reason Frenya and Leathers had come along in the first place was for diplomatic reasons. Some of the previous bands of migratory wildlings had been reluctant or skeptical to cooperate with the Night's Watch or the Legion without Banners. To reassure their qualms, Lord Commander Mormont had elected to include at least one black brother wildling and one spearwife in each escort party. He figured that their presence in the escort party would encourage the new arrivals to comply. So far, that ploy had worked without fail.

Since the wildlings were supposed to be assembled less than a mile away, Whalen Frey expected the others to return within an hour.

It took them close to two hours to get back. By then, the sun had nearly set. When the others finally came, they came running.

Whalen spotted two figures sprinting towards them. When they were close enough, he saw that they were Frenya and Will. By the time they regrouped with their companions, both were panting and gasping for air.

Ser Whalen gazed down at them in worry and concern. Gared and Ser Myles seemed similarly disconcerted.

As usual, Ser Waymar Royce was indifferent. He simply trotted forward a bit and asked "Did you find the wildlings?"

After regaining his breath, Will answered with "We found them alright. But someone else found them first."
"What do you mean?" Ser Myles enquired.

Frenya slowly gazed around at the four mounted men and said quietly "They're dead. They're all dead."

Whalen felt a chill run down his spine. Waymar Royce appeared a little perplexed, but he remained composed. "All five hundred?"

"Can't say," Will frankly murmured, "We only saw enough parts to make about fifty."

'Parts?'

Gared echoed Ser Whalen's thought: "Parts?"

Will restlessly elaborated with "Arms and legs torn from their sockets. Heads pulled off their necks. Bodies mangled like mincemeat. Those are some of the least terrible things we saw."

"What happened to those people…" Frenya mumbled nervously, "Even Thenns wouldn't do that."

As disturbed and perplexed as Whalen felt at that moment, he managed to find his voice long enough to ask "Where's Leathers?"

"He stayed behind with the bodies," Will expounded. He turned to Ser Waymar and added in "He assumed you would wish to see them, ser."

"He assumed correctly," Waymar Royce stated with a grin. He looked around at the other five and announced "Let us press on."

"We should turn around," Gared hastily advised.

"And go back to the Wall emptyhanded?" Ser Waymar countered.

"Better than not going back at all," Frenya argued.

"But you said you only saw fifty bodies," Whalen Frey pointed out, "Perhaps some of the other four hundred and fifty wildlings are still in the area."

"If so, we should look for them," Myles Manwoody proposed, "Whatever killed those fifty could certainly kill them, too."

"It could also kill us," Gared sharply retorted.

"Only if we allow it to," Waymar Royce cheekily disputed. He glared down at Will and Frenya and uttered demandingly "Get back on your mounts. We are going to see those mangled remains. Then we will search for the other wildlings."

Will and Frenya grudgingly obeyed the directive. Once they were ahorse, the group headed north. Ser Whalen took the reins of Leathers' horse and led it alongside his.

Ten minutes later, they reached the intended spot of the rendezvous.

Leathers was nowhere to be seen. Neither were the wildlings. As far as Ser Whalen could see, no one else was there, alive or dead.

"Your dead men seemed to have moved," Waymar Royce scoffed mockingly.
"I know what we saw," Will insisted, "I never saw anything like it."

"Could someone have moved them?" Ser Myles theorized.

"Not possible," Frenya countered, "Look around you; there's no blood. When we first came, there was so much red that a blizzard could not have covered it all."

"If someone did move them, they did a remarkable job of cleaning up," Whalen Frey wryly commented.

"Perhaps this is the wrong place," Waymar Royce hypothesized.

"No, I recognize these trees, ser," Will asserted firmly, "This is the exact spot where we found them."

"Then why is Leathers not here?" Ser Waymar queried.

No one could provide a suitable answer to that question straightaway.

After thirty seconds of silence, Gared proclaimed "I say once more; we must get back to the Wall."

"Do the dead frighten you?" Waymar Royce murmured scathingly. Not bothering to wait a response, he declared "Until we find Leathers or the wildlings, we are not going anywhere."

How did this idiot boy ever become a knight?

Despite this antagonistic thought, Whalen Frey was just as curious as Ser Waymar to find out what became of the wildlings. In addition to that, he was not about to leave Leathers behind without at least looking for him.

Ser Whalen and the others climbed off their horses and spread out.

Will climbed a tree to get a better vantage point. Ser Waymar got out his map, and Gared paced the perimeter of the vicinity.

Frenya squatted down in the middle of the area and gazed down at the ground. Every now and then, she ran her hand over the snow and poked at it with her spear. Then she rubbed her chin and went "Hmmm…"

"Something caught your interest?" Whalen Frey presumed, a little intrigued.

"The ground seems… different somehow," Frenya apprised him, "When we got here, it was rough and flat. Now it's softer and more uneven."

"Peculiar," Ser Whalen commented, rubbing his temple, "I wonder what could have caused that."

"Your guess is as good as mine, ser," Frenya admitted.

"I'm more interested in the whereabouts of the wildlings," Ser Myles Manwoody commented from a few feet away, "What do you suppose happened to them?"

"I do not know," Frenya pronounced, "But whoever took them could not be far from here."

"Whoever took them also took the time to cover their tracks," Whalen noted, "Other than the ones we've made, there's not a single footprint anywhere."
"Then who are we dealing with?" Myles inquired.

Or what?

"We shall find out soon enough," Waymar Royce proclaimed without looking up from his map, "And I promise you; we'll find the other wildlings, as well."

"I certainly hope so," Myles Manwoody thought aloud, "I would hate to displease Lord Gregor by returning to Moat Cailin with no one."

_He's rather determined to see the entirety of this mission out. He's just as devoted to the Legion as the rest of us are to the Watch._

Ten minutes passed without anything noteworthy happening. Then, they heard Whalen call out from above "I can see someone approaching from the northeast!"

At that, the five people on the ground turned in that direction. Sure enough, they saw a figure moving towards them. The figure moved gradually and with a limp, but it never paused or faltered. Initially, they could only make out the figure's silhouette. As it came closer, they realized that its head was covered by a hood. They also noticed that its attire was black, and it was carrying a sword in its right hand.

"It's Leathers!" Myles Manwoody declared. _So it is._

"Looks as though he's been wounded," Frenya noted.

"Gared, investigate," Waymar ordered the oldest member of their company.

The veteran ranger cautiously advanced forward. When he was ten feet away, he stopped and muttered "Leathers? What happened? Where did you go? Where are the wildlings? Are you well?"

The black brother wildling did not stop nor give reply to any of Gared's questions. He just continued shuffling forward without uttering a sound.

Gared turned back to the others and commented "He seems to have lost his tongue."

"Something must be amiss," Frenya noted.

"Quite amiss," Ser Myles conceded.

Waymar looked up at Will and asked "Do you see anyone or anything else?"

"No, ser," Will responded, "Far as I can see, we're alone."

Just then, Leathers stopped walking. At this point, he was standing a mere three feet away from Gared. He was almost directly behind him, as well.

Whalen Frey realized right at that moment that Leathers' head had been tilted forward this entire time. As such, his head had been fully concealed from the others.

Very slowly, he brought his head up. It seemed to take him an entire minute to move it a bare inch.

Eventually, he was standing up straight. That was when his face was visible to the others.

The first thing Whalen Frey noticed was Leathers' eyes. Last night, he could have sworn Leathers' irises were a shad of dark green.
Right now, they were a very bright blue. Even from twenty feet away, they seemed hollow and empty.

As if by reflex, Ser Whalen Frey took a step back.

A moment later, Leathers reached out with his left arm and seized Gared by the top of his head. The veteran ranger grunted as he was grabbed. Before he could make any effort to struggle or fight back, Leathers raised his right arm and swung his sword through the air before him.

Immediately after, Gared's body crumped onto the ground. His head remained n Leathers' hand for a few seconds, and then Leathers tossed it forward. It rolled a bit before stopping near the feet of Ser Waymar Royce.

"What in the name of the gods?!" Waymar shouted in shock, recoiling in disgust and horror. He glared at the wildling in black and demanded furiously "Leathers, explain yourself!"

"That's not Leathers," Frenya softly professed, gripping her spear in both hands.

"She's right," Whalen whispered. He reached for his obsidian dagger and drew it swiftly, "It's one of… them."

At that, Ser Waymar Royce grinned and wielded his sword. It was made of dragonglass, as well. He gripped it in both hands and stepped forward. As he held his blade aloft, he taunted the figure that had once been Leathers with "Come at me, then."

The wight was quick to answer his challenge. It came forward and slowly lifted its own sword, which was still dripping with Gared's blood. With every step it got closer, Ser Waymar raised his weapon higher into the air. From what Whalen could see, the wight was totally vulnerable and it making no attempt to defend itself.

Just before Ser Waymar could deliver the first blow, a hand broke through the surface of the snow. It emerged just inches from where Ser Waymar was standing. Its appearance was so sudden and so alarming that everyone jumped in surprise.

The hand reached out and seized Ser Waymar by the ankle. He tried to pull himself free, but it gripped him tightly. Ser Whalen rushed forward to help. He took his dragonglass dagger and plunged it into the back of hand.

The effect was almost immediate. Upon contact with the obsidian, the hand released Ser Waymar, and it shattered a mere few seconds later.

Ser Whalen would have felt proud, but he discovered the dagger had done more damage than he intended it to. The tip of the blade had pierced Ser Waymar's right foot.

The Valeman shouted in pain and mumbled angrily "You bloody fool!"

Oh, fuck; you must be kidding me.

Meanwhile, the wight formerly known as Leathers was nearly upon him. Luckily, Ser Myles Manwoody managed to intercept it before it reached Ser Waymar. He roughly forced it onto the ground, and while it was recovering, he got out his own dragonglass dagger and stabbed the wight in the neck.

The Leathers wight unleashed a shrill shriek and convulsed violently on the ground. Seconds later, it shattered just as the hand did.
Whalen Frey and Frenya hurried to help Waymar Royce back onto his feet.

"Orders, ser?" Frenya requested as she wrapped his right arm over her shoulders.

"We will depart from this area immediately," Waymar Royce announced.

This time, not even Myles Manwoody argued with him. While Ser Myles may have been determined to locate the rest of the wildlings, the Dornishman was not prepared to go to this much trouble to locate them. The way Ser Whalen saw the scenario, if any of the five hundred would-be immigrants had survived this onslaught, they were long-gone from the area.

"Will, climb down from there!" Ser Waymar yelled. "We're leaving!"

"Aye, ser," Will avowed. The tracker hurriedly made his way back down the tree. He was very nimble and graceful in his movements. Whalen thought he seemed better composed than any of them. Probably because he was spared the horror of seeing Leathers up close.

The moment Will reached the ground, the group had more company. This company was just as unexpected, and far more unwanted.

Thirty wights burst from the snow in half as many seconds. Simultaneously, more of them appeared from behind trees and large rocks. Before Whalen and the others could even register what was happening, they were practically surrounded.

"To arms!" Waymar Royce yelled.

Straightaway, the five remaining companions got out all their dragonglass weapons. Ser Myles Manwoody had two daggers, Ser Whalen Frey had a sword and a dagger, Frenya had her spear, Ser Waymar had his sword, and Will only had a dagger.

"Take them down," Waymar muttered through gritted teeth.

The next minute saw a flurry of activity.

Whalen Frey rushed towards the nearest wight and thrust his sword into his chest. Not even waiting to watch it shatter, he turned to the next wight and slashed at its throat with his dagger. Both were nothing but dust in seconds.

He managed to catch glimpses of his colleagues' performance in the battle. Ser Myles Manwoody was quite handy with his two daggers. He was maneuvering with the agility of a feline and the accuracy of a maester. Frenya successfully dodged and avoided every blow that was thrown her way. She only used her spear when she could afford to stand still for longer than a split-second. Due to his wound, Ser Waymar Royce was unable to balance his weight on his right foot, so he was forced to remain standing in one spot. Even so, he made short work of any wight that came to close to him.

Will lacked one advantage Ser Whalen and the other three possessed: he was not within spitting distance of them. The others would have helped him, but there were too many wights between them and him. The tracker tried desperately to fend off a growing stream of attackers, but he was quickly overwhelmed. Whalen could only watch helplessly as the wights seized him from all sides and stabbed him repeatedly. His scream was almost as terrible as Leathers’ death rattle.

Shortly after they lost Will, Ser Whalen realized that the horde of wights was not getting any smaller. He had lost count of how many they had killed, but it had to be more than thirty. Even so, their numbers only seemed to get larger every second. They were no longer sprouting from the ground, but they were appearing from the sides, as if out of nowhere.

We're fighting a losing battle.

"If we stay here much longer, we'll be overrun!" Whalen declared.

"He's right!" Ser Myles coincided, sparring with three wights at once, "We must withdraw!"

Ser Waymar was preoccupied in a duel with a particularly large wight. Once his foe was vanquished, he nodded and proclaimed "Our only hope is to reach the horses! Concentrate on clearing a path to them!"

Subsequently, he, Frenya, and Ser Whalen combined their efforts on breaking through the line of wights to the south. Ser Myles covered them from the north. The going was gradual, but with every second, they came closer to the horses.

It's damn good we tied them to trees beforehand. Otherwise they'd be long gone by now.

Indeed, while the wights paid no mind to the horses, the beasts were struggling desperately to break free and get as far away from the scene as possible.

Mere moments before, Ser Myles Manwoody encountered three wights. One was armed with a spear, one with an axe, and one with a scythe. He managed to bring down the scythe-wielder and the axe-wielder at once, but the spear-wielder managed to strike first.

Ser Myles screamed as the spear impaled his lower chest. He angrily shoved one of his obsidian daggers into the spear-wielder's eye, and the wight disintegrated.

Ser Myles dropped his other dagger and pulled the spear out of his abdomen. He groaned and collapsed onto his knees.

Before Ser Whalen could try to aid the Dornishman, the mob was upon him. In the span of three seconds, Myles Manwoody was stabbed in no less than a dozen places, including the chest cavity, his right arm, his left leg, and his throat.

By the time Ser Myles hit the ground, Frenya and Ser Waymar Royce had reached the horses. Frenya mounted hers first. As Ser Waymar climbed onto his, he looked back to Whalen Frey and shouted "Come on!"

Ser Whalen pushed through the crowd and sprinted to where his two surviving companions were. Over a dozen wights followed close behind.

"Just go!" Whalen Frey beckoned the other two, "I'll catch up to you!"

Waymar Royce was quick to follow that suggestion. He turned his horse to the south and urged it in that direction. Frenya, however, proved to be the more dedicated of the two. She took the reins of her horse and forced it to put itself between Ser Whalen and the mass of wights. She continued to fight them back from horseback. This bold action gave the Frey knight enough time to jump onto his own horse.

Just as Ser Whalen had his feet secured in their stirrups, Frenya's horse whinnied and reared on its hind legs. The spearwife was vaulted from her saddle and landed flat on her back.

"Frenya!" Ser Whalen shouted worriedly.
Thinking quickly, he directed his horse towards the wildling woman and leaned down with his arm extended. Frenya reached out with her own arm as his came closer. She managed to grab his hand, but before he could pull her up, another huge wight reached her, swinging a mace.

A split-second later, Whalen Frey had Frenya's blood all over his face. The wight with the mace had all but smashed her head in.

A moment later, Ser Whalen felt three very potent emotions, all which were the direct result of watching Frenya's death. The first was shock at how sudden it had been. The second was grief that it had occurred. The third was rage at how brutal it was.

Whalen Frey turned to the wight with the mace and hacked at its head with his dragonglass sword. Like all the other defeated wights, it screeched and shattered.

Ser Whalen was not content with that. He had just seen five of his associates murdered. He would make these monsters pay for what they had done.

With his dagger in one hand, his sword in the other, and no thought of his own safety, Ser Whalen charged towards the mass of wights. He heatedly yelled "Come and get me, you bastards!"

Almost straightaway, the first wight reached him. He thrust his dagger into his forehead. A moment later, another wight approached his horse. He responded by driving his sword into the space beneath its neck.

For the next several minutes, Whalen continued this routine. He killed every wight that came within reach of him.

Before long, he was jabbed in the thigh. He managed to kill the wight who wounded him, but soon after, he was slashed across his leg. For every five wights he destroyed, he received an injury from another of them.

Most of those injuries were minor. Then one managed to stab him in the center of his chest. That was when Ser Whalen's endurance gave out. He dropped his weapons and fell off his horse onto the ground.

As the crowd of wights closed in around him, Whalen struggled to remain conscious. As his undead foes bore into him, Whalen thought not of the pain or the hopelessness of his current setting, but of his family.

Sylwa… Hoster… Merianne… forgive me.

He thought they would ultimately stab him to death, but they did not. They simply carved him up until he was too weak to fight back. After that, they relented and stepped away from him.

A few seconds later, a figure clad in grey came forward. He was dead, no question of that. But unlike the wights, he still had flesh attached to his bones.

The Others…

There was no doubt of that in Ser Whalen's mind. The being before him had to be an Other.

The Other knelt beside the knight and stared in the eyes. Whalen Frey tried to look away, but his gaze was fixated on this malevolent entity before him.

After a time, the Other slowly extended his arm and placed his hand to Ser Whalen's forehead. He held it there for as long as the Frey drew breath.

Whalen Frey felt his entire body go completely numb. He could not feel his arms, his legs, his head, or even his multiple injuries. After a time, all he could feel was the cold.
Before he had enlisted in the Night's Watch, Ser Waymar Royce and his father Lord Yohn had been hosted at Winterfell by Lord Eddard Stark. They had been guests of the Starks for under a turn of the moon. That was more than enough time for the occupants to get to know the Valemen.

Waymar Royce was every bit as brilliant, upright, and skillful as his sire. However, he was notably lacking of the gallantry and humility Bronze Yohn Royce was known for. Unlike the Lord of Runestone, Ser Waymar did not exhibit common courtesy towards those he considered lesser to him. His cocky grin and pretentious attitude routinely conveyed an air of arrogance and smugness.

Jon Snow doubted he would ever see Ser Waymar again after the latter headed north to the Wall. But he did. And how he's changed.

The man being brought forth by Desmond and Alyn was a shadow of his former self. There was no trace of haughtiness or conceit anywhere in his countenance. A crazed look was in his eyes. His gait was uneven, his posture was sloppy, his appearance was disheveled, his clothing was ragged and greasy.

Sansa had thought him handsome. If she could see him now, I wonder what she'd say.

Most of all, when he first came to the North, Waymar Royce claimed to fear nothing.

At a glance, Jon could tell he was scared now. Not only was he afraid; he was making no effort to hide his fear.

Desmond and Alyn led Ser Waymar to the ironwood stump and stopped there. Even though Waymar's hands were tied tightly behind his back, they continued to hold on to his arms to ensure he would not try to flee. Standing on the other side of the stump was Lord Eddard Stark, or Uncle Ned, as Jon was accustomed to calling him.

Waymar Royce and Uncle Ned made eye contact, and for a few seconds, neither spoke. Then the young Valeman said softly and unsteadily "I know why we're here, Lord Eddard. I am sorry it had to come to this."

"I am sorry, as well, my boy," Eddard Stark muttered in a genuinely apologetic tone, "But you know what must happen now."

"I do," Waymar Royce spoke candidly, "And I am ready. But before I die, there is something I must tell you."

"What would that be?" Lord Eddard inquired.

Ser Waymar did not reply straightaway. He stared blankly at the ground for a few seconds. Then he tried to talk. Jon saw his mouth move, but he could not hear the words that came out of them. Apparently, neither could Uncle Ned.

"Speak up, if you please," the Lord of Winterfell requested.

Waymar Royce seemed to have lost his voice. Despite his best efforts, all he could manage was an inaudible whisper. Lord Eddard had to bring his ear over to the young knight's mouth to coherently discern what he was saying.

Jon watched this exchange from several feet away. He stood with his cousins and his friends in silence. Or at least he was silent.

"He seems wrought with apprehension," Rick perceived.

"You would be, too, if you were on the brink of death," Robb contended.

"I don't believe it is death that bothers him," Sam noted, ever the observant one.

A few minutes later, Eddard Stark moved his head away from Waymar Royce's. Jon noticed he seemed a little perturbed.

"You are certain of all this?" Uncle Ned asked.

Ser Waymar meekly nodded his head. Jon could faintly hear him say: "I saw them. Soon enough, you'll all see them, too. You must prepare, my lord. It is not too late for you and yours."

Now it was Lord Eddard's turn to nod his head. "Have you anything more to say?"

"No," Waymar Royce declared, "Only that I should have died with my companions. Instead I ran like a coward."

"Perhaps you did," Eddard Stark debated, "Even so, you may have redeemed your actions and given their deaths meaning just now."

Waymar could only shrug. It was a skeptical type of shrug, as though he did not know whether he agreed with that statement or not.

A moment later, he beckoned Uncle Ned "Be on with it, my lord. While part of me still desires not to die at all, this is a far preferable fate to the one that claimed my companions."

"As you wish," Lord Eddard said in acknowledgment.

Waymar Royce got to his knees and placed his head over the stump. Although he showed no signs of resistance, Desmond and Alyn kept their hands pressed against his back in case Ser Waymar decided he actually wished to live.

He proceeded to remove his gloves and given them to Jory Cassel, the captain of the household guard. Theon brought forth the greatsword Ice. The ringing of Valyrian steel could be heard all over the square as the blade was drawn from its scabbard.

As Eddard Stark placed the tip of the, Waymar Royce turned his head and uttered quietly "I ask of you a simple favor, my lord. When you send my bones back to Runestone, please do not tell my lord father that I died a deserter."

"Your father will hear no word of your disgrace from me," Eddard Stark asserted the young knight. Meaning Lord Royce might hear of it from someone else.

That thought did not seem to cross Ser Waymar's mind, as he appeared strangely content at receiving that assurance.

Bran was at Jon's side. As Eddard Stark sentenced Waymar Royce to die in the name of King
Robert, the bastard of Winterfell whispered to his cousin "Don't look away. Your father will know if you do."

Sure enough, the younger boy did not attempt to avert his eyes from Uncle Ned and Ser Waymar. Samwell was tempted to look away. A year ago, he would have. Somehow, he willed himself not to.

Once Lord Eddard finished passing the sentence, he carried it out. With one swift movement, he lifted Ice high into the air and brought it down. In one motion, Waymar Royce's head was severed from his body. Blood spouted from the stump of his neck for a few seconds, but it slowly reduced to a smooth trickle. His head rolled on the ground a bit and came to a halt near Theon's feet. What do you know? Sam didn't even vomit.

After sheathing Ice and returning it to Martyn Cassel, Jory's father and the master-at-arms of Winterfell, Theon picked up Waymar's head by the hair and gazed into his still-open eyes. Then he smirked and muttered "I find him more agreeable this way."

Jasper scowled. "Have you no respect for the dead?"

"Certainly," Theon cheekily murmured, dropping the head, "The same respect they showed others when they lived."

"Ass," Jon mumbled under his breath.

It took a minute to wrap up Ser Waymar's body in a length of cloth. After it was loaded onto the back of a horse, the company set out.

"Ser Waymar died bravely," Robb proclaimed at the beginning of the ride.

Bravely? Jon countered with "No, it was not courage. You could see it in his eyes. He did not accept his fate simply because he was not afraid of dying. He accepted it because he was afraid of living."

"Afraid of living?" Theon muttered, seemingly amused, "Whoever heard of such a thing?"

"Such is possible," Rick debated.

"Indeed," Sam agreed.

Robb paid those remarks no mind.

"Father?" Jon heard Bran call out to Lord Eddard. The Lord of Winterfell had been riding at the head of the party. Bran was a little further back with the Cassels. Uncle Ned reined his horse back a few paces so that it trotted alongside his second son's pony.

While Eddard Stark conversed with Bran, Jon Snow was at the head of the company with the older boys. Including him, there were six of them.

Theon Greyjoy was the oldest, and something of an oddball. He had seen his twentieth nameday, and he was the only one of the group who had lain with a woman. But that could change soon.

Theon had come to Winterfell at age ten as a hostage. He was one of many children who had to pay for their fathers' crimes. In the aftermath of Greyjoy's Rebellion, Theon was being held on the mainland to guarantee the Ironborn's good behavior. Too bad this condition of 'good behavior' did not apply to Theon, as well.
Much had changed in the ten years since then. As of now, Theon was no longer a prisoner. Even so, he had remained a resident of Winterfell. He was being fostered there at the request of Theon's uncle, Lord Victarion Greyjoy, the Lord Paramount of the Iron Islands.

The next oldest in the group was Samwell Tarly. Sam was the elder son and heir to Randyll Tarly of Horn Horn. Of course, there was still some debate as to whether he would remain Lord Randyll's heir. If ever there was a man who was not his father's son...

Unlike his stern and ruthless father, Samwell Tarly was a timid, plump, and cowardly person. Lord Randyll had attempted many times – often through excessive or outlandish means – to toughen up his son. Despite his best efforts, all of them had failed miserably.

Eventually, Lord Randyll's patience reached its end. He considered sending Samwell to the Wall so that his second son, Dickon, could be his heir instead. Fortunately, Lord Gregor Clegane had approached him at the tourney at Lannisport. After some discussion, Lord Randyll agreed to send his son to Moat Cailin when he was older. However, before Samwell rode north, his father rigidly told him that the Legion without Banners would be his very last chance. If he let Lord Gregor down, the Wall would be the only place left for him.

So far, the Legion had worked out well for Samwell Tarly. While he was poor as a swordsman and warrior, no one could deny his intelligence. He was an invaluable source of information to men twice or thrice his age. He had been a personal notary to Lord Gregor Clegane for the last four years.

For the last five, Jon had been Lord Gregor's personal squire, so he and Samwell saw a lot of each other. Jon saw Sam as his best friend. Under his direction and Lord Gregor's patient guidance, Sam had overcome his reluctance to wield a sword. While his skills still left much to be desired, he could at least defend himself when the situation called for it. He had also lost at least thirty pounds. He was still fatter than most boys his age, but at least his fat was balanced with some muscle now.

Mounted on the destrier beside Jon was Rickard Clegane, the heir to Moat Cailin. They liked to call him "Rick." At twelve namedays, Rickard was the youngest of the six. Nevertheless, he was also the largest and the strongest of them, as well. Obviously that was the direct result of the fact that his parents were the tallest man and the tallest woman in the whole of the Seven Kingdoms. Excluding the giants, of course. It happened that Rickard was also the only one among them that had been born in the North.

Although his father was the commander of the Legion without Banners, and his mother was one of their captains, Rickard was not a recognized Legionnaire. He was still too young to even be a squire. Even so, in addition to teaching him in the ways of running a holdfast, Lord Gregor was training him in the ways of leading an army, as well. Someday, he intended for Rickard to succeed him as the Legion's commanding officer. In spite of his youth, Rickard was shaping out to be a very promising ruler. All the same, he was hoping he would not have to inherit the responsibilities of Moat Cailin and the Legion for many more years. If I were him, I'd feel proud. After all, he'll have much more to inherit than any of us. Excluding His Grace, of course.

Jasper Baratheon, the Crown Prince of Westeros, was the next youngest. Two years back, the King had decided to educate his son on the ways of war and diplomacy. He could have done this through lecture and references to the past, but one could only learn so much through history. King Robert wished Jasper to learn these matters through direct experiences.

Of course, the Royal Army had not been mobilized since Greyjoy's Rebellion. The Legion without Banners, however, was active every day of the year, and Lord Gregor Clegane was perhaps the best military leader in the country.

Like Rick, Jasper was not old enough to be a full-fledged Legionnaire. However, he was tempted to enlist in the organization when he reached his sixteenth nameday. For the present, he was squiring for his uncle Renly, who had joined the Legion a couple years earlier. Allard Seaworth was currently preoccupied with business across the Narrow Sea, so Renly had replaced Allard as the Stormlands' representative on Lord Gregor's secret council. Whether Renly would remain on the council would depend on Allard's willingness to fully relinquish the position when he returned from Essos.

Lastly, there was Robb Stark, Jon's cousin and the heir to Winterfell and the North. Robb was only a few months older than Jon, but he stood to gain very much when his lord father passed on. He took after his mother, Lady Catelyn, in appearance, but he took after Lord Eddard in everything else. He was the future of the North. He's the future... and what am I?

Jon was the product of a free union between Brandon Stark and Ashara Dayne. Since they had not been wed during his conception or his birth, he was stuck with the unfortunate label of "Snow," the name of bastards of the North.

There were times when Jon rued being baseborn. After all, Brandon Stark had been the elder brother of Lord Eddard. Had Brandon married Lady Ashara before he died, Jon would have been the rightful lord of Winterfell when he was born.

Despite these occasional feelings of envy, Jon was usually fairly content with his baseborn status. Since he stood to gain no titles or lands, he had liberty to do as he pleased with his life. Furthermore, his Uncle Ned and Aunt Cat had always done right by him. They had loved him and raised him as one of their own children. He thought of his cousins more as siblings, just as they did of him.

Although he was a bastard, he had made plenty of trueborn acquaintances at both Winterfell and Moat Cailin. He and the five young men around him composed a very tight circle of friends.

There was only one thing about this circle that bothered Jon Snow. Each of the others had distinguished himself in some way. Theon was the best archer. Samwell was the best reader. Robb was the best lancer. Jasper was the best rider. Rickard was the best leader.

Jon was more than fair in all five of those fields, but he was never the best at anything. Except being a bastard. And maybe the sword, were it not for Rick.

He was determined to stand out in a similar way. Someday, he would indeed stand out. Even he did not know how just yet. And even if he did know... he likely would not have believed it.

By now, Lord Eddard had finished talking with Bran. After riding in silence for a while, Robb gazed over his shoulder and queried "Father, what did Ser Waymar tell you?"

Uncle Ned slowly turned his head towards his firstborn. Then he uttered stiffly "You heard what he said."

"Not all of it," Jon Snow debated, "There was something he said which only you heard."

"If I was to tell you it was simply the ravings of a madman?" Eddard presumed.

"With all due respect, we would not believe you, my lord," Samwell stated, "If it was mere ravings, you would not have looked so astonished when you moved away from Ser Waymar."
Jon smiled. I can always rely on Sam to back me up.

"Sam has a point," Jasper conceded. He then scoffed and muttered jokingly "I could order you to tell us, my lord."

But he won't. He wouldn't abuse his authority so blatantly.

Uncle Ned must have known that. Even so, a rare grin came to his normally grim face. It faded after a few seconds, and he let out a slow sigh. Looks like we've convinced him to share his words. As their horses continued along the trail, Lord Eddard looked around at Jon and the other boys, and he pronounced "As some of you may know, it is nearly that time of the year when a number of the wildlings immigrate to the Seven Kingdoms."

"Yes, I recall my lord father mentioned that shortly before I left Moat Cailin," Rickard Clegane affirmed.

Eddard Stark nodded at that, and he continued with "Just before he fled the Wall, Ser Waymar went north of it. He was leading the escort group that was meant to bring the wildlings south."

"'Meant to?" Samwell noted, "They didn't succeed?"

"No," Eddard disclosed, "His party was ambushed. Ser Waymar was the only survivor."

Jon and the other boys were alarmed to discover this. Rickard Clegane looked over at the Lord of Winterfell and stated anxiously "One of the Legionnaires was in that party, my lord. Ser Myles Manwoody."

Eddard Stark lightly shook his head and revealed "He fought valiantly. Alas, he did not make it. From Ser Waymar's description, he and the rest of their group were all slaughtered."

Rickard seemed dismayed. Jon could understand why; Ser Myles Manwoody had been at Moat Cailin longer than either of them. He was a great man.

"By whom, my lord?" Jasper inquired.

For a moment, Uncle Ned hesitated. He tentatively resumed with "It was not the wildlings that were supposed to relocate to the North; they were. Nor was it any of the other Free Folk."

"Then who was it?" Robb queried curiously.

Again, Eddard did not reply right away. His silence spoke volumes, however.

"My lord," Samwell uttered uneasily, "Was it… the Others?"

Jon and his friends collectively looked to the Warden of the North, eagerly awaiting an answer to that question. Ultimately, Eddard Stark gazed around at the younger men and muttered plainly "It was."

The color drained from Sam's face. Jasper and Rickard's eyes widened in shock. Theon tried to look cocky, but Jon could tell he was as startled as any of them. Robb merely grimaced edgily.

"The Others… are here now?" Theon asked rhetorically.

It would appear so.

"But it's still summer," Jasper pointed out.
"Winter is coming," Robb reminded the prince.

Lord Eddard nodded in approval and repeated "Winter is coming."

An atmosphere of restlessness passed over the group. That was not the result of discovering that the Long Night was soon to occur. Truthfully, they had known for a while that the Long Night's arrival was imminent. As it happened, all of Westeros had known that for the last five years. But no one would have expected the Others to return in summertime.

But they're here now. And how long will the rest of us be?

"My father must be told immediately," Jasper firmly proclaimed.

"Perhaps we should inform my father first," Rickard suggested.

Jasper seemed bemused by that idea. "The person with the most power should always be given dire news first before anyone else. Your father does not have Seven Kingdoms to manage."

"Have you forgotten what my father does for this country?" Rickard snapped, a little irate, "If not for him, we would never have been prepared for the Others in the first place."

"There is no need to argue, lads," Eddard told the massive boy and the prince to assure them, "When get back to Winterfell, I will write both Lord Gregor and the King. That way, they will both be told of this matter at the same time."

But the raven would reach Moat Cailin first, wouldn't it?

Jon did not give voice to that thought. He did not wish to incite another disagreement between Rick and Jasper. Fortunately, both of this friends appeared satisfied with Lord Stark's proposal, and they dropped the subject.

That's damn good. With the Long Night approaching, we'll soon have enough conflict to worry about without causing any amongst ourselves.

Jory Cassel had ridden ahead a bit to scout the way. When Jon turned to his front, he noticed Jory had halted near the bridge. His horse was whinnying and threatening to vault him from the saddle. With great difficulty, Jory managed to calm her.

"Trouble, Jory?" Uncle Ned asked the captain of his guard when the rest of the group reached him.

"Can't say, my lord," Jory responded, looking to Lord Eddard. He gestured to the space in front of them and beckoned them "Look at that."

On the path was the body of a stag. Part of one at least. Its entire lower body was missing. The head, the front legs, and the upper half of its torso were all that remained, and they had been mangled viciously. Uncle Ned chose to investigate.

"A mountain lion?" Theon conjectured.

"There are no mountain lions in these woods," Eddard proclaimed.

"Where's the rest of it?" Robb wondered aloud.

"Looks as though it's been dragged off," Martyn Cassel perceived, pointing out the trail of blood that was smeared across the ground. It led off into the woods.
"Whatever took it may come back for the rest," Samwell muttered worriedly, "Maybe we should move on."

"We could," Jasper contended, "Or… we could take a closer look."

In the end, they chose the latter course of action. Eddard, the Cassels, and the boys dismounted and followed the trail of blood into the woods.

The trail ended by a small brook. There they found the lower half of the deer. They also found the creature that had dragged it off.

A massive wolf was lying by the stream. It was gnawing on the remnants of one of the legs.

At the sight of the huge wolf, Rickard and Theon promptly drew their swords. Jon, Robb, and Jasper placed their hands on the hilt of theirs, but they did not draw them just yet. Samwell backed away a bit. As for Bran… the youngest boy eyed the beast inquisitively.

Before long, the wolf noticed them. Other than a menacing snarl and hostile glare, it made no move towards them. It was too engrossed with feasting on its kill.

"It's a freak!" Theon exclaimed.

"No," Robb countered, "It's a direwolf."

"There are no direwolves south of the Wall," Jory murmured.

"A few years ago, there were no giants or wargs south of the Wall, either," Rickard Clegane professed, "Now we have the likes of Mag the Mighty and Varamyr Sixskins living along the White Knife."

Next thing we know, there will be mountain lions in these woods.

"But we control the influx of beings from the lands beyond the Wall," Jasper Baratheon contended, "I doubt anyone would have allowed a direwolf to cross over."

"He could have slipped through," Martyn Cassel theorized.

"She," Samwell Tarly corrected.

"Hmm?" the master-at-arms uttered in puzzlement.

"That's a female," Sam announced, pointing towards the wolf.

Jon and a few of the others followed his finger, and their eyes fell across the direwolf's underside. Sure enough, the beast's lower belly was protruding conspicuously. She's pregnant.

"Not only is there a direwolf on this side of the Wall," Samwell observed, "There will soon be several."

"Or maybe not," Jory countered. He drew his sword and began to walk towards the direwolf.

"Wait!" Bran interceded, stepping in front of his father's captain of the guards. Jory paused long enough for the small boy to turn to Lord Eddard and say "Father, must we kill her?"

"It would be best, Bran," Uncle Ned proclaimed, "We cannot allow a direwolf to roam free in our domain."
“Then we could take her back with us,” Bran proposed.

Theon and Jasper chuckled at the absurdity of that statement. Samwell seemed very averse to it. Robb raised an eyebrow, as though he thought it intriguing. Jon found it worth some consideration.

“You saw what she did to that stag,” Samwell recalled, “She’d do it to a man just as easily.”

“We could find a warg to tame her,” Rickard proposed.

“Unless the warg is ready to devote the remainder of the direwolf’s life to this endeavor, I would not place too much faith in that idea,” Theon muttered.

“That aside, what would we do once she gives birth?” Jasper enquired.

“The pups could be domesticated,” Robb suggested.

Now that’s a thought.

“No one has ever trained direwolves,” Martyn Cassel commented.

“Probably because no one has ever tried,” Jon Snow contended. He turned to his uncle and told him “My lord, your house’s sigil is the direwolf. Could it be possible we were meant to find this beast?”

“That could indeed be possible,” Samwell coincided, “The Tullys have plenty of trout, the Tyrells grow the greatest roses, the Arryns have gyrfalcons, the Lannisters used to hold caged lions, the Baratheons catch many stags, the Martells keep their vipers, and Targaryens had their dragons. Why can’t the Starks have their direwolves?”

“Now that you mention it, I’m still waiting for my uncle to snag us a pet kraken,” Theon japed cockily.

Jon rolled his eyes and muttered “Mantén la boca cerrada, tonto.” (Keep your mouth closed, fool.)

Samwell and Jasper scoffed at that remark. Although Theon could not understand what had been said, he could tell some slight was being made at his expense. He glared at Jon and mumbled “I do not take insult from a bastard.”

Jon smirked and retorted with “No, ma tuo padre prende ordini da uno.” (No, but your father takes orders from one.)

Rickard chortled at that. Theon fumed angrily, but he did not lose his temper. He just looked away. It appears I’ve won this round.

During Greyjoy’s Rebellion, Lord Gregor Clegane had found records of two long-gone civilizations among the bounty of Euron Greyjoy’s Silence. He had taken steps to revive the languages of those civilizations. He did so by using them as codes. Every member of the Legion without Banners was taught Spanish, and each of the Mountain’s friends and allies was taught Italian.

Samwell was Gregor’s notary and Jasper was Renly Baratheon’s squire. As such, both of them knew Spanish. As Lord Gregor’s eldest son and heir, Rickard knew Italian.

Jon had the distinct privilege of knowing both dialects, as he was both Gregor’s squire and his ward.

On a few occasions, he had taught Robb a bit of each language, but never more than the basics.
Theon, however, did not know a word of either. Jon was more than happy to take advantage of that.

"With the proper rearing, the direwolf pups can be brought to heel," Samwell contended.

"I will train and feed them myself," Bran swore to his father.

"So will I," Robb promised.

Lord Eddard stood thinking for a minute. Then he folded his arms and declared "If you can bring the mother to me without harming her or yourselves, I will consent to taking her back to Winterfell."

Clearly, Uncle Ned expected them to give up straightaway. But the boys were more determined than he gave them credit for.

When Jory and Martyn started to approach the direwolf, she snapped her fangs violently at the two men.

Strangely, when Jon and his cousins approached her, she did not so much as grunt. When they were within ten feet of her, she switched her focus from her pretty to them. She eyed them not in suspicion, but in perplexity.

Bran was the first to reach her. He slowly reached his hand out and stroked her behind the ears. Her muzzle was covered with chucks of fur and fresh blood, but when she opened her mouth, she did not move to bite Bran's arm off. Instead, she licked at his face playfully, causing the young boy to laugh.

"Incredible," Jasper murmured in amazement.

Five minutes later, they were all back on their horses, and they were following the road back to Winterfell once more. The direwolf padded alongside Robb and Bran's mounts. Jon found his gaze wandering to her every now and then.

At one point, Jon Snow told his uncle appreciatively "Thank you, my lord."

Eddard smiled at his nephew and stated "Consider it my gift to you,"

"Since it's today of all days, I suppose that'd be appropriate," Jon muttered slyly.

Although Jon and his five friends were close, they were not usually all in the same place at once. Most of the time, Robb and Theon were at Winterfell, and Rickard and Samwell were at Moat Cailin. Jon and Prince Jasper were the only ones who alternated between the two fortresses frequently.

Still, on special occasions, the six of them came together. Today was one such occasion. It happened to be Jon's nameday.

Most bastards were not afforded nameday celebrations. Jon did not have that misfortune. Then again, he did not wholly regard it as a misfortune. As anyone who knew him could tell, he was not one for pomp and ceremony. Every year before, he had chosen to celebrate his nameday quietly with only his family and his dearest friends. However, Aunt Catelyn had insisted on throwing him a celebration this year. Since it was his sixteenth nameday, Jon had given in to his aunt's wishes.

The other lads had jested that since Jon would be a man grown today, perhaps he would become a man in the more "physical" sense of the word.
Theon and Robb had been surprised when Jon confessed to them that he had yet to lay with a woman. They claimed that they had always assumed he may have slept with Myrna.

Just the thought of that was appalling to Jon. Myrna was old enough to be his mother. As it happened, she acted like his mother, as well.

Ever since Jon came to Moat Cailin, Myrna had been his maid. His own maid; she served him and no one else. For the duration of his stay at the moat, she had waited on him night and day, tending to his every need. She was perhaps the closest thing he ever had to a mother.

For some reason, Myrna never accompanied him to Winterfell. Jon never thought to ask why. He just assumed it was because she was a retainer of Lord Gregor Clegane.

Myrna was one of three people outside of his family that Jon felt he could trust with anything. Samwell were another. The third was Ser Marvyn.

Ser Marvyn had been in the employ of Uncle Ned ever since the end of Robert's Rebellion. Jon did not know very much about him, only that he was from the Reach. Since Sam was a native of the Reach, Jon had asked him if he could tell where the old knight had originated from. The most Samwell could discern was that Marvyn was an Oldtown man. He may have even been a distant relative of Lord Leyton Hightower.

Ever since he came north, Ser Marvyn's primary duty had been as Jon's bodyguard. For the last fifteen years, the old knight had loyally followed and protected the baseborn boy. Whenever Jon travelled to Moat Cailin, Ser Marvyn went with him, even though he had sworn his sword to Winterfell. In fact, he went everywhere with Jon. He had even attended Ser Waymar Royce's execution. But he had given Jon some space so that he could mingle with his friends.

Despite his age, Marvyn's experience had not faded with time. That much Jon knew; he had seen him in combat firsthand. There were maybe three or four men in the Seven Kingdoms who could match his skills with a blade. Just having the old knight nearby made him feel safe.

There were times when Jon felt Ser Marvyn's services were wasted on him. After all, why would anyone task such a fantastic swordsman with a chore as menial as watching over a bastard?

On the other hand, Jon supposed he should not question his good fortune. What matters is that I have people who actually care for me. Some bastards don't even have people.

When they got back to Winterfell, Lord Eddard went to find Maester Luwin so he could write King Robert and Lord Gregor. Jory went with him. Robb, Bran, and Martyn Cassel led the pregnant direwolf to the kennels. Jasper helped Harwin and Hullen stable the horses. Rickard assisted Alyn and Desmond with moving Waymar Royce's body.

Jon, Sam, and Theon were left on their own.

Jon had been eager to get back, but not because of his nameday celebration. That would not be for a few more hours, anyway.

"Well, I have business to do," he announced to no one in particular.

"Oh, is that her name now?" Theon wryly uttered.

Jon glared at the Ironborn and muttered "Vete a la mierda." (Fuck off).

Samwell chuckled as Theon sneered. Jon just smiled and sauntered away from the scene. As he left, he called over his shoulder "Oh, and while you're at it… vai a inferni." (Go to the hells)

A few minutes later, Jon arrived at the broken tower. Ser Marvyn had accompanied him, but he bade the old knight to remain at the base of the foundation. Once Marvyn agreed, Jon made his way to the entrance of the building, forced it open, and climbed up the ancient stairs.

Jon knew that the broken tower was an ideal meeting place. Especially for those who wished to be left alone. And gods know, I want to be left alone. With her.

When he got to the top room, it appeared to be deserted. Then he heard her voice. "You're late."

He spotted her laying on a makeshift bed of furs in the corner. He grinned and recalled "You said you'd wait for me."

"So I did," she conceded. She beckoned him over, and once he reached her, she asked expectantly "Well?"

Jon shrugged and said "Well… Theon and Robb think we should go ahead with it."

"They have good sense," she perceived, "Tell me; what do you think?"

Jon stood thinking for about a minute. Finally, he smirked and "You're right. They do have sense."

At that, he dropped down beside her on the pile of furs. Then he took her in his arms and pulled her into a passionate kiss. From her touch, he could tell she was quite pleased with his choice.

When they came apart, she told him "It's about time. Where I come from, boys younger than you have done the deed."

Jon grinned at her and held her close. He ran one of his hands through her flowing red hair. He said to her "Well, I will not keep you yearning any longer. Still, I know that in most affairs, good things come to those who wait."

She scoffed, kissed him again, and declared "You know nothing, Jon Snow."

...

As far back as she could reminisce, Daenerys Targaryen had spent most of her life running.

When she was fresh from the womb, she and Viserys had been forced to run away from their homeland. Their entire family had been massacred by the Usurper. The two of them were the only survivors.

Since arriving in Essos, they had run from one Free City to another. Braavos. Norvos. Lys. Myr. They tried to seek refuge in each place they visited, but every time they tried to settle down, the Usurper's hired knives managed to track them down.

Once that happened, they had to pack up and run. Sometimes they had not even enough time to pack up. As such, they often had to leave behind some precious objects that could have been sold for a bit of gold. So every time they ran, they ended up a little poorer than before.

They had run from sellswords. They had run from bounty hunters. They had run from slavers. They had run from all manner of thieves and cutthroats.

There were times when Dany wished she could have run from Viserys, as well. But he was her only true ally in the world. Apart from that, even if she tried to run from him, he would have found her eventually. And once he did… the thought did not bear reflection. \textit{Never wake the dragon. Do not 	extit{ever} wake the dragon.}

A couple years ago, they had come to Pentos. There they had sought asylum with Magister Illyrio Mopatis. Unlike most of their prior "hosts," the cheesemonger did not charge them for their lodgings. He provided them food, shelter, and clothing out of his own pocket. Fortunately for the Targaryens, he had a very large pocket. \textit{Almost as large as his actual pockets.} So, unless he chose to throw them out (which was not pleasant to mediate on, but always possible), Illyrio would be able to keep Dany and her brother as his guests indefinitely.

For a time, it seemed as though they had finally found a haven from their worries.

Then one morning, Dany awoke to find an army at Illyrio's gates. There were thousands of soldiers. The colors, types, and designs of their banners, armor, and weapons varied, but none of them had the look of an Essosi. Indeed, they had all hailed from the same land as her and Viserys.

Magister Illyrio let the army in voluntarily. At first, she assumed he did this because his household guard was hopelessly outnumbered or because he was worried that they would destroy his manse.

She later found out that Magister Illyrio had actually been expecting the Westerosi. But he had not double-crossed her or her brother. From what Dany could gather, he was on no one's side and everyone's side at the same time.

To Daenerys' relief, the Usurper had lifted the price on the Targaryens' heads. He still had people searching for them, but for a different reason.

When Dany learned this reason, she realized that the things she had been running from were trivial compared to the true greatest threat to the Known World.

Growing up, Dany's knowledge on the history of Westeros was shabby at best. Most of what she knew of it was what she heard from her brother. Although it was at least eight thousand years old, Viserys only considered everything from the time of Aegon's Landing – meaning the past three hundred years – to be of any interest. Before then, the country had been a land of lawless savages who murdered, raped, and stole from each other as they pleased. Or so Viserys had claimed.

Dany had sometimes questioned the validity of the things her brother told her, but recently, she had come to wonder if he had ever made a single completely truthful statement in his life.

When the Westerosi forces arrived in Illyrio's estate, Daenerys, Viserys, and the magister had sat down with their commanders. One of them was Ser Davos Seaworth, a former smuggler who had been knighted by Lord Stannis Baratheon. Daenerys was aware that Stannis was the Usurper's brother, and that he was the current Lord of Dragonstone, which was the Targaryen ancestral home. Viserys had angrily claimed that the Onion Knight insulted them with his very presence.

The other commander was Monford Velaryon, Lord of Driftmark. Dany knew the Velaryons were distant relations of the Targaryens, and they had been their loyal vassals all the way up until the very end of the Rebellion. After that, they – along with every other house in the Seven Kingdoms – had bent the knee to Robert.

Luckily, Viserys harbored no ill will towards Lord Monford for bowing to the Usurper. He had acted in the best interests of his hose, after all. Viserys must have thought that Lord Monford, Ser Davos, and all their men meant to turn their cloaks and support the Targaryens instead.
Dany did not dare to hope for so much. Thus, she was less disappointed than her brother when she found out why the Westerosi forces had come for them.

Lord Monford and Ser Davos revealed that they were not there to help restore the Targaryens to the Iron Throne. They were not preparing to bring them back to Westeros, either. Not yet, they claimed. Why not yet?

They discovered that the Usurper did not want them dead. Instead, he had been advised to seek an alliance with the Targaryens. Both Viserys and his sister thought that queer.

What could we possibly offer him? There is literally nothing more we could give than the clothes off our backs.

They learned this alliance had initially been the suggestion of one Gregor Clegane. That name came up many times throughout the conversation.

Viserys had once told her of Gregor Clegane. He was known as the Mountain That Rides. He was an enormous monster in human skin who butchered women and children for his own amusement. It had been he who murdered their niece and nephew Rhaenys and Aegon, as well as their goodsister Elia Martell.

According to Lord Monford and Ser Davos, that was by no means true. Well, it was more half-true. Gregor Clegane was a massive man, but he was benevolent by nature. In actuality, he had saved Princess Elia, and Rhaenys and Aegon had been butchered by another knight named Amory Lorch. Furthermore, the Mountain had killed Lorch on the spot for committing that atrocity.

By the end of that conversation, Dany had an entirely different view of Gregor Clegane from the one her brother had put in her head. He was originally a vassal to Lord Tywin Lannister of Casterly Rock, who had caused the Sack of King's Landing. Now he was a vassal to Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell. Stark had been made the Mountain the lord of Moat Cailin, an ancient fortress which separated the North from the rest of the Seven Kingdoms.

The Mountain also had a seat on the Usurper's Small Council. A new title had been created just for him. He was Robert's Master of Order. By occupying that position, he was charged with maintaining stability and diplomatic ties all throughout the realm. So far, he had done a commendable job fulfilling this duty.

He had not done it alone, however. A decade and a-half ago, he had formed an organization known as the Legion without Banners. Dany had heard talk of the Legion throughout her lifetime. However, the extent of her knowledge was the gossip she and her brother had picked up in the marketplace and taverns (as well as the occasional brothel).

Davos Seaworth and Monford Velaryon were able to provide a much more elaborate description of the Legion without Banners. They depicted it as the most diverse, most cooperative, and most prestigious organization that anyone of modern day had ever seen. It had achieved a level of unity and brotherhood that the sellsword companies of Essos could only dream of attaining. In fact, quite a few natives of Essos had travelled across the Narrow Sea to enlist in the Legion's ranks.

Ser Davos revealed that his second son, Allard, was one of the Legion's top officers. Allard was among the soldiers that had accompanied his father and Lord Monford to Pentos. When Daenerys and Viserys asked (more demanded in his case) to know more about the Legion without Banners, Allard was summoned to the table.

He only had good things to say about the Legion and its commander. In his mind, there were very few men alive as honorable as Lord Gregor Clegane. The man had established order and peace all throughout the nine regions of Westeros. He had even succeeded in forming a pact between the Free Folk and the inhabitants of the Seven Kingdoms. Because of his great deeds, Westeros now flourished in a way that it had never done under the reign of the Targaryens.

Viserys was not pleased with that observation. Dany, on the other hand, was intrigued. Even without her brother's influencing words, she had been convinced that Westeros would suffer, decline, and ultimately collapse without a Targaryen ruler. In that regard, it appeared she was as wrong as her brother. From all accounts, Robert Baratheon was a just ruler with a wise council backing him. I dare not say that near Viserys, though.

Despite all these positive change Gregor Clegane had inflicted upon Westeros, there was one major issue that had yet to be resolved. Interestingly, this issue had not yet struck the land. Even so, it had been made aware publicly four years earlier.

Allard Seaworth claimed that this issue was the very reason he, his father, Lord Monford, and the Westerosi units had sought out Viserys and his sister.

That was when they addressed Lord Gregor's revelation of the Long Night.

At first, Viserys had laughed dismissively at the concept that the Others would soon return to the world. Dany had been tempted to laugh, too. But the more she listened to Allard, the less inclined she felt to scoff at his words. After enough time elapsed, even Viserys was beginning to believe in the credibility of Allard's testimony.

The whole of Westeros had already accepted the truth that the Long Night would occur sometime in the next few years. Now Viserys and Daenerys shared their conviction. Still, the thought was rather disquieting.

I miss the days when our biggest concern was finding safety from the Usurper.

Dany and her brother was still perplexed as to what Gregor Clegane wanted with them. Allard Seaworth confessed that even he and the other top Legionnaires did not know. Allard was one of a privileged few who knew that Lord Gregor claimed the Targaryens had a certain "advantage" that no one else in the Known World possessed. For whatever reason, the Mountain was currently withholding the specifics of this "advantage" from everyone else. He had claimed that the Targaryens were not aware of this advantage, and they did not even possess it just yet.

I'd be surprised if we had an advantage over anyone.

Still, Dany felt a little comforted. Even if it turned out that this advantage did not truly exist, it had saved her and her brother from being murdered in their sleep. For that, she was grateful to Gregor Clegane.

After the explanation was finished, Allard, Ser Davos, and Lord Monford asked the Targaryens if they were willing to work in conjunction with King Robert. Fortunately for everyone there, Viserys had one of his rare rational moments of coherent thought, and he agreed to collaborate with the Westerosi envoys.

Dany was certain he was secretly plotting to overthrow Robert Baratheon. But naturally, she did not mention that to anyone else.

Shortly after this agreement was struck, Ser Davos, Lord Monford, and the majority of the Westerosi forces had departed from Pentos and sailed back across the Narrow Sea. Dany longed to go with them, but for the present, it appeared as though her place was still in the east.

One hundred of the soldiers had stayed behind in Pentos to guard Viserys and Daenerys (and to keep a close eye on them, doubtlessly). They had ample coin to pay Illyrio Mopatis for lodgings, and they had brought their own provisions. Since they were essentially fending for themselves, the magister was more than willing to accommodate the Westerosi.

Nearly one full year had passed since then. She and Viserys were still no closer to finding out what Robert Baratheon planned to do with them, no closer to returning home, and no closer to learning what this supposed "advantage" of theirs was.

Viserys and Daenerys were not confined to Illyrio's manse. So long as they were accompanied by the hundred Westerosi soldiers, they were free to go anywhere they pleased. Still, they had chosen to remain with the magister, as they had no true friends anywhere else on this side of the Narrow Sea.

Daenerys was content to stand by and wait until their advantage made itself known. Be that as it may, Viserys was determined to have something to show for their stay in Essos before they returned to the Seven Kingdoms. Dany knew he was scheming to amass an army of his own.

He was hoping to assemble this army quietly and without notice. Of course, since Robert's soldiers had them under tight scrutiny, his options were quite limited. Every time he tried to contact a group of soldiers that may have fought for him, his efforts were intruded upon by their guards.

The guards were actually willing to aid Viserys in this endeavor, as they debated that Westeros would need every warrior it could find in the hardships to come. Viserys was reluctant to accept that type of help from them, but even he was not such a fool as to turn away such an offer.

Viserys could expect none of the Westerosi to give him their swords, either. Less than half of the hundred had fought on the side of the Targaryens during the Rebellion, and the majority of those were loyal to the stags now. They were not likely to turn their cloaks a second time.

While Viserys busied himself with searching for his own forces, Dany passed her time by learning more about their homeland. Several of the soldiers were rather accommodating in that regard, as well.

Of the hundred soldiers that had stayed behind with Dany and her brother, twenty of them were members of the Legion without Banners. While most of their guards at least tried to be chivalrous, Dany found she preferred the company of the Legionnaires.

On a late morning in the middle of 299 A.C., Dany stood on the balcony of her bedroom. She stared off into the west, off into the direction of her homeland. She did this at least once every day. She paid especial attention to the Narrow Sea. She liked to imagine sailing across that vast expanse of water until she found land again.

Unlike her power-hungry brother, Dany did not desire the crown. She would have settled for a small holdfast and a handful of servants. Perhaps once we return, the Usurper could grant us Dragonstone. She doubted King Robert would do so willingly, but maybe Gregor Clegane could convince him to allow the Targaryens their ancestral home. If the Mountain was able to persuade him to allow wildlings to come south of the Wall, it should be relatively simple for him to speak on our behalf.

Daenerys was brought out of her reverie by voices. They came from the courtyard beneath her window. She leaned out, peered downward, and spotted six of the Westerosi conversing with each other on the ground below. She had taken the time to learn the names and faces of each of her guards. After a few seconds, she recognized these six as Ser Bonifer Hasty, Ser Malcolm Branfield, Eddison Tollett, Alysane Mormont, Ser Perwyn Frey, and Chiswyck.

Legionnaires, all.

Daenerys decided to call upon them. She swiftly left her bedchamber and made her way down to the courtyard. She walked hurriedly yet elegantly, as she was accustomed to moving.

Malcolm Branfield was the first one to notice her. He smiled politely, gave a small nod, and said in acknowledgement "Good morning to you, my lady."

"Good morning, Ser Malcolm," Dany returned with a grin.

One-by-one, the other five Legionnaires turned to the Targaryen girl and bade her a fine morning, which she returned cordially.

The six of them were crowded around a stone bench. Perwyn Frey and Eddison Tollett were seated on the ground by the base of the bench, Ser Bonifer Hasty and Chiswyck sat on the surface of the bench, Alysane Mormont was standing with one foot resting on the bench, and Ser Malcolm Branfield was leaning against the back of the bench.

When Dany reached them, Alysane removed her foot, and Ser Bonifer and Chiswyck scooted off to the sides to make room for her. Dany happily accepted the spot in the center of the bench.

"I hope I did not interrupt anything," she stated humbly.

"Not at all," Ser Perwyn assured her, "We were merely chatting."

"'Chatting?'" Dany uttered, unfamiliar with that expression.

"A term coined by our commander," Ser Bonifer enlightened her, "It refers to speaking casually on various subjects."

"Oh, alright," Dany avowed. I should add that to list of the Mountain's accomplishments. She decided to address that topic. "Construction materials, weapons, languages, songs, alliances… and now speech. Is there anything Lord Gregor has not tried his hand at?"

"These must be something," Perwyn Frey contended, "But I could not venture to guess it."

"Maybe because he's already contributed to every area that's worth contributing to," Chiswyck hypothesized.

"At any rate, Lord Gregor has all but revolutionized the modern world as we know it," Eddison Tollett murmured, "He's done more than any of us could ever hope to do. Or at least what I could do."

Dany chuckled at that. Eddison Tollett had been daubed Dolorous Edd by his colleagues. That was a direct result of his very dour and pessimistic sense of humor. Although he seemed to possess very low self-esteem, Dany appreciated the remarks he made. Like as not, they often made her grin.

"This past year, I've heard very much about Gregor Clegane," Daenerys thought aloud, "I know of him as a lord, as a general, as an inventor, and as a diplomat. However, I've yet to know of him as a man. Tell me; what is he like as a man?"
"For starters, he's a giant among men," Dolorous Edd expounded, "The rest of us are mere dwarves next to him."

"So he really is as tall as I've heard?" Dany presumed.

"Oh, yes," Perwyn Frey muttered with a smile, "My lady, he is as tall as Magister Illyrio is wide."

Dany and the others burst out laughing at that observation. After a few seconds, Malcolm commented jokingly "I'm not certain he is that tall, Perwyn."

More chuckles were produced. Still, he must be tall. Anyone with eyes could clearly see how morbidly obese Magister Illyrio Mopatis was. If he stopped eating, Westeros might have enough food to get through the next winter.

Then she remembered what the next winter would be like. She quickly purged the thought of it from her mind, and she elected to return to the original subject of the conversation. She gazed around at the Legionnaires and said inquisitively "How well do you know the Mountain? Personally, I mean."

"First and foremost, he's committed to his cause," Bonifer Hasty perceived.

"Which is?" Dany enquired.

"The endurance and prosperity of Westeros," Ser Malcolm clarified.

"Far as I know, that's been a lifelong goal of his," Chiswyck proclaimed. He would know; he's been a retainer of the Mountain longer than most others. Dany was aware that Chiswyck had been a man-at-arms to Gregor Clegane since before the Legion without Banners was formed.

"And he has already accomplished very much in the way of his goal," Dolorous Edd claimed.

"Under his direction, the realm has thrived like never before," Alysane Mormont professed, "Pardon me for saying this, my lady, but I believe the Mountain has done more for Westeros than any of the Targaryen kings ever did."

"So I've heard," Dany uttered candidly. Viserys would have raged at that statement. Daenerys was a little more openminded and objective than her brother. At the very least, the Mountain did a fine job cleaning up the mess my father made. Just then, another thought occurred to her. She mentioned it to the Legionnaires: "If the Mountain is so good for the realm and so beloved by its people, could it be possibly that he might someday come to rule the Seven Kingdoms on his own?"

"Gods, no," refuted Ser Malcolm, "Lord Gregor may have the love of the smallfolk and many knights and lords, but love does not equal support."

"Aside from that, Lord Gregor has made it quite clear he has no desire to sit the Iron Throne himself," Perwyn Frey disclosed, "He is content to be a noble lord of the North."

"Yet already, he is lauded as a hero out of the legend," Dany noted, "And he is not even dead."

"There are some heroes who needn't die before the world praises their names," Alysane contended.

"Doubt anyone will praise mine even after I'm gone," Edd mumbled grimly.

"I'll praise it, Edd," Dany kindly assured the Valeman.
Eddison Tollett gave her a coy grin and remarked "I thank you for that, my lady."

She smiled back and patted him on the back gently. After sitting back up, she stated "Since Gregor Clegane is a lord, I assume he must have heirs. Does he?"

"Yes," Alysane Mormont affirmed, "It happens he has five. His oldest son Rickard is twelve. His second son Alyver is nine. His daughter Vallory is seven. His third son Larys is three. His fourth son Torrhen was born just a few turns of the moon ago."

Daenerys was impressed that Alysane knew all that. "You took the time to learn all their names and ages?"

The She-Bear snickered and pronounced "I would not be a very good aunt if I did not."

That caught Dany's interest. "'Aunt?"

"His daughter is my niece and his sons are my nephews," Alysane apprised her, "My elder sister Dacey is Lord Gregor's lady wife."

Daenerys raised an eyebrow in astonishment. One really does learn something knew each day.

"I'm surprise you didn't know that, my lady," Perwyn Frey commented.

"I knew the Mountain was wed to some Northwoman," Dany declared, "But I was never told her name or what house she was from."

"Now you know both," Edd bluntly remarked.

Dany lightly nodded her head. She gazed around at the others and inquired "Do any of you have children?"

"I have a son and a daughter," Alysane proudly declared, "They're at Bear Island with the rest of my family. My mother and younger sisters are caring for them in my absence."

"And your husband?" Dany said curiously.

The She-Bear gave a smirk and muttered slyly "When did I ever say anything about a husband?"

"Then your children are baseborn?" Daenerys assumed.

"Oh, no," Alysane replied. She donned a very wicked grin and pronounced "There is a custom on Bear Island. When unwed women wish to have children, they go hunting for bears. But not to kill them." Dany quickly realized what the female Legionnaire was implying. She muttered in bewilderment "You… mated with a bear?"

"Bears, most likely," Alysane expounded cheekily, "I can't say for certain that the same one fathered both my son and my daughter."

"And… all the Mormont women do this?" Dany queried.

"Not all," Alysane claimed, "My mother did, though. My father was a bear. So was Dacey's. And Lyra's. And Jorelle's. And even Lyanna's. Five daughters my mother Lady Maege whelped, and all our sires are skulking about in some cave."
For a minute, Dany stared blankly at the She-Bear. She could not tell whether Alysane was being truthful or feeding her an elaborate hoax. She asked no one in particular "Is she serious?"

"I find it best not to ask that question, my lady," Dolorous Edd Tollett advised her.

Yes. Now that I think on it, I would rather not know.

"Oh, well; I can think of plenty unions worse than a woman and a bear," Malcolm Branfield remarked.

So can I. Namely one between brother and sister, if my family is any indication.

"So Alysane is a mother," Dany acknowledged, looking around at the men, "What of the rest of you? Are there any fathers here?"

"I may have a bastard or two somewhere in the Seven Kingdoms," Chiswyck suggested, "And maybe one in Pentos, if we're here long enough."

"Most of my elder half-brothers have children," Perwyn Frey illuminated, "And even one of my younger full ones, Benfrey. As of yet, I do not. That mightn't change. If you ask me, my lady, there are enough Freys in the world."

"Not enough good ones," Edd drearily uttered. He quickly turned to Perwyn and added "If you mind my saying."

"I do not mind," Perwyn asserted, scoffing, "Because you're correct, Edd. For every three or four Freys that are born into the world, there is maybe one good one."

Just like that old saying about how the gods would flip a coin at the birth of each Targaryen.

"With my father's brood, the odds are even worse," Perwyn heatedly went on, "Lord Walder spent nearly all his time fathering children and almost no time being a father. Because of that, there was always discord and strive in our house. Luckily, my father had the decency to die a couple years ago. Before that, he was in a coma. Since then, my half-brother Stevron took over lordship of the Crossing, and he is running the Twins far better than the Late Lord Frey ever did."

Daenerys was stunned. By the expressions on their faces, so were the other Legionnaires. She had never seen a man talk with such disdain about his own sire. Certainly, she had rarely heard anyone say a kind thing about King Aerys II, but Viserys had never spoken ill of their father.

Perywn soon noted the startled looks the others were giving him, particularly Dany. He told her "I've made you uncomfortable. I apologize, my lady."

"You needn't apologize, ser," she reassured him, "It is not always pleasant to speak one's mind, but at times, it must be done."

"True," Eddison Tollett concurred. He leaned back against the sold leg of the bench and stated "I suppose it's my turn."

"Go on, Edd," Dany beckoned him.

"Very well," the Valeman conceded, "No sons. No daughters. No bastards. No wife. No prospective matches. My love life couldn't be any more pitiful if I took the black."

Chiswyck, Ser Perwyn, and Alysane snickered a bit. Dany patted Edd on the back sympathetically.
Maybe a family is what can finally make him happy. It would certainly bring happiness into my life.

"You next, Ser Malcolm," Dany requested.

Malcolm Branfield nodded and professed "Like Ser Perwyn, I’ve become an uncle several times. My sister Elissa has six children. Whereas I have never married, and I do not intend to. The Branfield line will die with me."

"And that does not bother you?" Dany asked rhetorically.

"No," Ser Malcolm proclaimed, "My house was sworn to the Crownlands, so it fought for your father during the Rebellion. My father and siblings died for their devotion to the Mad King. Elissa lived because she had married into the North a few years beforehand. The only reason I too was spared was because I bent the knee before it was too late."

"I am deeply sorry for all you've lost," Dany sincerely told him, placing a hand on his shoulder, "You and your family were loyal vassals of my family, and you were rewarded for that loyalty with death and destruction. I know what it is like to lose almost everyone close to you."

Malcolm smiled thankfully, placed his hand atop hers, and stated "You have done nothing that requires my forgiveness, my lady. The blame for my family lies with them, as it was their decision to follow King Aerys to the bitter end. And while you may feel my pain, I cannot claim to feel yours. Yours is worse, I am certain. I was never banished from Westeros, nor did my sister ever vent her anger on me."

"I suppose not," was all Daenerys said in response, remembering how Viserys had been less than brotherly to her several times in the past. Those are the types of wounds that never fully heal.

She turned to the man seated next to her and stated "That leaves you, Ser Bonifer."

The middle-aged knight from the Stormlands nodded and muttered "Indeed, my lady."

Daenerys could detect a trace amount of reluctance in his voice. She told him "If the subject unsettles you so, you do not have to discuss it."

"It does not unsettle me, I promise you," Ser Bonifer proclaimed, "It may, however, unsettle you."

"Why is that?" Dany inquired in interest.

"Because it concerns a member of your family," Bonifer Hasty informed her.

Dany was equally parts perplexed and captivated by that revelation "Go on, please."

"As you wish," Ser Bonifer conceded. After a pause, he disclosed "I never wed nor had children. But not because I could not find an ideal woman. It happens that I did. I loved her, and she loved me. Although her status was far higher than my own, I considered arranging a betrothal between her and myself. Alas, I was unable to wed her."

"Why?" Dany inquired.

"Because she wed the king," Bonifer Hasty notified her.

Dany's eyes widened in alarm. "So you mean…?"

The middle-aged knight nodded again and confirmed "The woman was your mother, Queen Rhaella.

Daenerys was flabbergasted. Nevertheless, she was eager to hear more.

Ser Bonifer indulged her with "Your great-grandfather Aegon V tried to break the Targaryen tradition of marrying brother to sister by taking Betha Blackwood of Raventree as his bride. He intended for his son, your grandfather Jaehaerys II, to do the same by marrying to Celia Tully of the Riverlands. Unfortunately, Jaehaerys and his sister Shaera were smitten with each other. Against their father's wishes, they wed. I had hoped the cycle would end with them, but it did not. When King Jaehaerys announced the betrothal between his son Aerys and his daughter Rhaella, your mother and I were deeply dismayed. But her father was still the king; there was nothing we could do to protest his decree. So we agreed to stop seeing one another."

Again, Bonifer Hasty paused for a few seconds. Then he continued with "I've hardly even looked at another woman since then. After your mother and father's wedding, I decided to devote my life to the Seven instead. I formed my own company known as the Holy Hundred."

"Yes, I know of the Holy Hundred," Daenerys pronounced, "They fight in the name of the Father, the Mother, the Crone, the Warrior, the Smith, the Maiden, and the Stranger."

"Just so," Ser Bonifer affirmed, "We were an independent company for many years. After Greyjoy's Rebellion, I realized that Lord Gregor Clegane was fighting for an even greater cause. So I elected to augment his forces with my own. For the last decade, the Hold Hundred have also been Legionnaires."

"And the realm is all the better for it, I'm certain," Dany debated.

Bonifer smiled gently at that. "Your royal mother meant much to me, my lady. Though I never held her as a man holds a woman, I felt strongly for her. I see her in you. You are more her daughter than Aerys'. For that alone, you have my word; long as I live, no harm will come to you."

Daenerys was touched. She leaned over, lightly kissed the Stormlander on the cheek, and told her gratefully "Thank you, ser."

I can see it in his eyes. He's speaking truly. It was details like that which gave Dany hope.

An interval of quietness passed over the vicinity. Dany found her eyes drifting back to the eastern horizon. By now, the Sun was nearly overhead. Like most people, she enjoyed the sunlight. However, she found a certain unique pleasure in it. The heat made her feel warm both inside and out, and no matter how long she was exposed to it, it never burned her skin.

For a brief moment, she wondered what she would do without sunlight. Then it occurred to her… in the not too distant future, everyone in Westeros would be faced with that very predicament.

Somehow, my mind keeps wandering back to that dreaded event. That is either realism… or paranoia. She hoped it was not the latter. Paranoia was an offshoot of madness.

Ser Perwyn was the first to see the anxious frown on her face. He inquired "Are you well, my lady?"

Although Dany kept her gaze on the distance, she was able to nod her head in response and ask "How long will it be before the next winter?"

"According to the Citadel and Lord Gregor, this will be our last year of summer," Malcolm Branfield disclosed.
"Then we shall have autumn for about two years," Alysane stated.

"Maybe three, if we are fortunate," Chiswyck offered.

"Then we have at most four years until the Long Night comes?" Dany assumed.

"Will we be ready?" Daenerys said enquiringly.

No one answered at first. Ultimately, Ser Malcolm sighed and observed "We will have to be."

"Don't lose faith," Bonifer Hasty bade the others, "Westeros survived the Long Night once. Now it is stronger than it's ever been in history."

"But so is the Night's King," Chiswyck pointed out.

Perwyn Frey rested his chin on his arm and stared in same direction as Dany. He muttered "I suppose we should count ourselves lucky we're on this side of the Narrow Sea."

"We could for now," Dolorous Edd conceded, "In the end, though, it won't matter."

"That's true," Alysane agreed, "Once the Others have taken over all of Westeros, they'll set their eyes on Essos next. Then Slaver's Bay. Then Ulthos, Sothoryos, and all the rest of the Known World."

The She-Bear is right. Leagues upon leagues of water will not stop the undead.

"I wish there was more we could do to prepare for it," Dany muttered under her breath.

"Well, Lord Gregor still believes you and your brother will play a pivotal role in the Long Night," Malcolm Branfield reminded her.

"I have not forgotten, Ser Malcolm," Daenerys commented, "I only wish I knew what this role requires of me. Whatever this 'advantage' Lord Gregor claims my brother and I possess is, it must be extraordinary."

"In time, it will make itself known, my lady," Alysane Mormont reassured her.

Dany nodded at that. I only hope 'in time' will not be too long.

Just then, Allard Seaworth entered the vicinity. His eyes dared around the courtyard, as though he was searching for someone. When he spotted Daenerys, he rushed over to where she and the six other Legionnaires were seated.

He stopped before her, dipped his head, and stated "My lady, I must ask that you accompany me to the gate."

"May I ask why?" the dragon girl said inquiringly.

"A woman just turned up there," Allard informed her, "She claims she is here to see you and your brother."

A woman? Viserys had "known" quite a few women in their travels of the Free Cities, but Daenerys had not been very well acquainted with any of them.
"What does she look like?" Ser Perwyn queried.

"She has long hair," Allard disclosed, "It is fair in some parts and dark in others. She is also clad from head to heel in red attire."

"A priestess of R'hllor?" Malcolm Branfield conjectured.

"That is my guess," Allard Seawroth confirmed, "She mumbled something about the Lord of Light when I talked to her."

"Then she is a red priestess," Bonifer Hasty declared.

"What possible business would she have with Viserys and myself?" Dany said in bafflement.

"I asked her that myself," Allard responded, "She refused to supply an answer."

"I say turn her away," Chiswyck suggested.

"I agree," Edd Tollett proclaimed, "You can't trust red priests; they'll burn you soon as aid you."

"I will see her," Daenerys firmly decided. Perhaps this is the advantage.

The blonde girl got up from the bench and stood beside the second son of Davos Seaworth. Allard gestured for his six colleagues to join them. Due to his status in the Legion without Banners, Allard had been given command of the Legionnaires that had remained in Pentos. The other eighty Westerosi soldiers had their own officers.

As the eight of them made their way to the gate, Dany walked alongside Allard Seaworth and asked him "Did this woman tell you anything else? Where she is from? Who she is? Why she is in Pentos?"

"She did say her name," Allard enlightened her, "She calls herself 'Melisandre.'"

Chapter End Notes

Note: I'm certain more than a few of you will be compelled to point out that in the original series, Melisandre had already been with Lady Selyse Baratheon for a few years before the events of Game of Thrones began. I would remind those people that that was still the ORIGINAL universe, where Cersei's children were all bastards. And for those of you who were hoping for something other than Jon/Ygritte, do not despair.
Note: I'm not wholly satisfied with how this chapter turned out. Or rather, I'm not as satisfied as I expected to be upon completing it. Originally, it was going to have a third perspective character, whose section would have involved a significant plot twist involving all the Targaryen characters. I ultimately decided to wait until the next update to include that section. However, the next update might take a while longer.

You see, as we near the end of March, I am facing the last six or seven weeks of my current semester of graduate school. After May 13th, I will be done with academics for good. With that in mind, my primary focus has to be to my studies. Because of that, I have been a little distracted during my writing.

This may just be my stressed and preoccupied mind speaking, but I cannot help but feel that parts of this chapter are extremely rushed or difficult to follow. If so, I apologize. Just know that from this point on, updates are going to be either shorter or more infrequent. Nonetheless, I am not going on a hiatus, and I am not going to become one of those writers who lets their work suffer because of inability to manage their time effectively.

The frog sat on the log, motionless and silent. For the most part. Every now and then, it expanded its jaw and opened its mouth to emanate a loud "ribbit." Apart from that, there was no sound anywhere else in this part of the bog.

She moved towards the log slowly. One hand noiselessly padded through the murky green waters. The other hand gripped her trident firmly. She kept her gaze on her prey. As far as she could see, the frog was convinced it was alone and safe. Not for long.

She swam closer and closer until she was less than a yard away from the green amphibian. It was staring in another direction, so it had yet to notice her. She was not about to give it a chance to. Once she was upon the frog, she abruptly emerged from the waters and thrust her trident forward.

The frog immediately jumped off the log in fright, but its escape attempt made no difference. She easily caught it in midair, impaling it with the center prong of her trident. The frog struggled for a moment, and then it ceased moving altogether.

She smiled in satisfaction at her latest kill. I'm becoming quite proficient at this.

"A fine catch, Your Grace," a voice called out from behind.

Princess Rhaenys Targaryen turned to look at Meera Reed, her friend and Lord Howland's daughter. With her were two of her father's soldiers. All three were armed and dressed similarly.

Rhaenys removed the frog from the head of her weapon and brought it over to the crannogmen. Meera took the lifeless amphibian, inspected it, smiled, and dropped it into a large sack she wore on her shoulder. Inside that sack was a large collection of freshly-caught frogs, snakes, and lizard-lions.
"That should be more than enough for today," Meera declared, "What say we return to Greywater Watch?"

"Excellent idea," Rhaenys agreed. We would not wish to risk getting back after the castle departs.

The trek back to Greywater was treacherous. Then again, one could argue that the whole of the Neck was treacherous. At least it was to someone who was unfamiliar with the terrain and the perils it had in store for the unwary.

Fortunately, Rhaenys had spent most of her life in the Neck. It had taken her little time to adapt to the landscape, as she had learnt the ways of the natives in her upbringing. By this point, she was just as capable of enduring the many hardships of the region as the crannogmen were. No swamp is going to swallow me up anytime soon.

As she and her companions traversed through the bogs, Rhaenys looked herself over. She was clad in a thin woolen hunting gown, which was absolutely soaked. She was barefoot, as shoes only interfered in swimming. Her fingers and toes were a little wrinkled, and she was covered in small amounts of moss and algae. No leeches this time, thankfully. Her skin and hair were tinted a faint shade of green from her time in the bogs. Only her teeth were free of green, as she had not opened her mouth underwater.

She certainly did not look a princess right then. Not that she was complaining. She doubted princesses were afforded this much entertainment or thrill. Apart from that, oftentimes she secretly enjoyed getting dirty. It made her feel wily. No wrong with a little clean dirty fun.

Soon enough, they arrived at Greywater Watch. They had returned just in the nick of time. The castle was about to get underway once more. That was one aspect that made it unique; it was always changing its location.

As she, Meera, and the two men of House Reed stepped onto the island that made up the grounds of Greywater, Rhaenys was promptly approached by a tall man in white enameled armor. Even in his later years, Ser Oswell Whent was as vigilant and reliable as ever.

"How went the hunt, Your Grace?" the Riverlander knight inquired.

"Bagged us a fine assortment, ser," Rhaenys informed her protector, gesturing to the sack on Meera's arm, "We'll eat well tonight."

Oswell Whent smiled and remarked "Indeed."

Ser Oswell had initially been against the concept of Rhaenys learning how to forage for food in the style of the crannogmen. That was mostly attributed to how he was somewhat unfit to travel through the bogs, given his age. He was reluctant to have the princess go anywhere without him. It had taken a great deal of reasoning and persuasion from Rhaenys, Lord Howland Reed, and Ser Mark Ryswell to convince the elderly knight that the Targaryen girl would be safe.

As it happened, there was no real need for Rhaenys to learn how to hunt; there were already plenty of excellent hunters at Greywater. The idea had been Rhaenys' originally. She debated it would be in her best interests. If ever she needed to fend for herself, she did not wish to be unversed in the art of hunting. Since the Neck provided adequate shelter in its natural state, she was most interested in locating food in that environment. Plus, anyone could hunt on plains, valleys, forests. It took a truly patient and committed individual to master how to hunt in a swamp.

That was a challenge Rhaenys had eagerly accepted. She was by nature a persistent person, and – for the present – she had all the time in the world.

"Enjoy your swim?" another voice sardonically inquired.

Rhaenys looked to her side and saw the only other Dornish occupant of Greywater Watch. Her mother's dearest friend and the alleged mother of her younger half-brother. Even in her thirties, Lady Ashara Dayne was a vision of beauty. A sharp contrast to me at this moment.

"Very much so," Rhaenys informed the older woman, a sly grin on her face, "You should try it some time, my lady. The marsh water does wonders for your skin."

"So does a bath," Lady Ashara dryly muttered. She stepped closer to the princess and added in "Speaking of which…"

At that, she took Rhaenys by her arm and began to lead her over to the holdfast. Ever the loyal bodyguard, Ser Oswell Whent followed them close behind.

Rhaenys knew where Lady Ashara was taking her. Every time she returned from one of her outings in the bogs, Ashara insisted that she wash up straight after. Rhaenys did not protest, but she did roll her eyes. Her and her obsession with cleanliness. It was mostly Rhaenys' cleanliness, to be precise.

"Perhaps we could forgo the bath one of these days?" Rhaenys cheekily suggested.

Ashara Dayne was not amused. "Your Grace, you could remain green if you do not take proper care of your body."

"Is that so?" Rhaenys murmured in slight interest, "Then perhaps I'll consider that. It would make camouflage a little easier."

Ashara Dayne sighed and proclaimed "Your mother would throw a fit if she saw you now."

"Which one?" Rhaenys Targaryen humorously countered.

Truthfully, she did not think either of her mothers would be so displeased with her appearance. She had inherited her devious nature from her birth mother Elia Martell, and her stepmother Lyanna Stark had never cared much for the traditional habits of highborn ladies. Between the first's Dornish broadmindedness and the second's wolf blood, Rhaenys did not believe they would be upset with her for failing to remain spotless on a regular basis. They might even say I'm still presentable.

Ashara let out a little scoff, and then she said in a serious tone "Rhae, we may be hidden from the outside world, but you are still a princess. As such, you must adhere to certain standards."

"Very well, my lady," the Targaryen girl coincided, a little grudgingly.

It only took a couple minutes for them to get to Rhaenys' bedchamber. When she got there, she found two maids standing by with pails of steaming water. They must have been waiting for her at Lady Ashara's orders. I would have had this bath, whether I complied or not.

Ser Oswell stood vigil outside the door, which Ashara shut and locked. The window to the room was covered, so the women now had total privacy.

One of the maids proceeded to strip Rhaenys out of her filthy, drenched clothing. At the same time, the other maid poured the hot water into the tub and added the usual salts and soaps to it.
Rhaenys shivered as her moist skin was exposed to the damp air of her room. Although the Neck generally exhibited a different climate than the rest of the North, one could still feel a chill at times. Once she was fully naked, her maids helped her into the tub. Relief passed over her as the hot water encompassed her entire body. The water was just a few degrees shy of boiling. But Rhaenys did not mind. She cherished the sensation of soaking in water, no matter how hot it was.

She did not have long to enjoy the feeling, as her maids went to work right away. They each took a brush and scrubbed away vigorously. They were very thorough; they managed to wash every part of her, including the parts she normally kept concealed from others.

Her hair was the hardest to clean. It was soaked from her dip in the marshes, and the subsequent interval above water had allowed it to dry a bit, which rendered it a little brittle. Additionally, tree sap, scum, and several dead insects had gotten tangled in it. Fortunately, her maids were experienced in keeping such hair neat. After brushing it extensively for ten minutes, Rhaenys' flowing locks were as smooth, soft, and straight as they had been before.

The bath water was murky and opaque by the time Rhaenys emerged from the tub. Luckily, it had served its purpose; she was now spotlessly clean. The tint of green had faded from her hair and skin, and her skin was practically glistening. Her maids left her dripping for a few moments while they armed themselves with some fresh towels. After that, they swiftly dried her off. They couldn't even let me do that by myself.

Once Rhaenys was dry, her maids dressed her in a gown of silk and lace. Attire such as this was not often found in the Neck. Lady Ashara had arranged for some Dornish fabrics to be exported to Moat Cailin and delivered to Greywater Watch. She felt the princess would be more comfortable in the apparel of her mother's homeland. Lady Ashara certainly was.

Rhaenys did not wear these formal dresses very often. Whenever she did, it was usually for a special event. Or what passed for a special event in the typically uneventful Greywater Watch. Since Ashara chose her daily attire for her, Rhaenys could always tell when one of these events was going to occur.

As one of her maids fastened her bodice and the other tied up the back, Rhaenys looked to her mother's best friend and enquired "What's the occasion?"

"During your expedition into the swamp, we received a rider," Ashara apprised her, "The missive he delivered has only been seen by Lord Howland. He is reviewing it in his solar as we speak. But once he is finished, he will wish to discuss it with the rest of us."

"Alright," Rhaenys acknowledged, slipping on a pair of soft shoes, "Shall we go to the lounge?"

The elder Dornishwoman nodded in confirmation. Rhaenys followed her out of the bedchamber and into the corridor, where they were rejoined by Ser Oswell. The princess, her guardian, and her sworn shield made their way to the sitting room on the next floor.

Ser Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, Theo Wull, and Lady Jyanna Reed were already there. Meera and her younger brother Jojen were also there. They sat with their mother on a bench lined with cushions.

"You look quite beautiful today, Your Grace," Ethan Glover kindly told Rhaenys a few seconds after she entered. Just today, huh?

It had been seven years since she had blossomed into womanhood, and in the time since then, she had been given countless compliments on her astonishing beauty. At first, she would blush redder than a radish when she received such praise, but now she had come to accept it graciously.

"Thank you, Ethan," Rhaenys said gratefully, flashing a grin, "But I fancy you wouldn't have said so a half-hour ago."

"I should say not," Lady Ashara japed.

Ethan Glover and Mark Ryswell chuckled at that remark.

Rhaenys went to a chair next to the bench Lady Jyanna and her children were on. She spotted Balerion lying at the base of this chair. She grinned and picked him up.

There was once a time when he would have hissed or shown his claws when somebody touched him like that. Well, he was a much younger tom then. Now he was elderly and feeble. He was nearly as old as Rhaenys herself. It was a wonder he had lived so long. Be that as it may, she still adored him every bit as she did when she was a girl.

As the princess sat down with Balerion in her lap, the Lady of Greywater Watch stated "Meera's told me all about how the hunt went today. She says you have nearly perfected the trident and your stealth technique."

"She is too kind," Rhaenys humbly proclaimed, scratching Balerion behind his ears, "Nevertheless, I will admit she is by no means wrong. I finally got the trident to feel like an extension of my arm, and this morning, I was so quiet that there were moments when even I would not have known I was around."

"Then you've learned all there is to learn about the trident and stealth, Your Grace," Meera perceived, "Perhaps we should move on to another topic soon."

"Good idea," Rhaenys concurred. But what to pick? I've already mastered the net, the dagger, climbing trees, making fires, swimming with eyes open, and most forms of hunting. Then it dawned on her: "How about you educate me on poisons next?"

"Poisons?" Meera uttered in mild surprise.

Rhaenys nodded and pronounced "I'm aware that the crannogmen are well-known for coating the tips of their arrows in lethal compounds. These compounds can be far more effective than steel in direct warfare. As you may already know, my mother's family knows quite a bit about poisons. Why do you think my uncle is called 'The Red Viper'?"

"That is a fair point," Meera admitted, rubbing her chin, "If you're genuinely interested in learning about the various poisonous substances of the Neck, I'd be happy to oblige you, Your Grace. All the same, I must warn you; we possess a very wide selection of them."

"I'd have been surprised if you did not," Rhaenys Targaryen commented bluntly, giving Balerion's stomach a light rub, "I am not one to back down from an endeavor simply because it is exhaustive and time-consuming. In fact, I find those qualities endearing in a challenge. I gladly accept your proposition."

Meera grinned at the older girl and told her "Very well. I can teach you most of the poisons of the Neck on my own. However, there are a few exceptionally deadly compounds that even I have yet to master. We would need to speak to my father if you wish to learn about those."

"First we'll handle the basics," Rhaenys suggested, "Once we get to the higher levels, we can ask Lord Howland if he'll be willing to teach us."
"I'd be honored to," came a voice from the entrance to the room.

Rhaenys looked up and saw Lord Howland Reed standing in the doorway. In his hand, he held a folded piece of parchment. She grinned at him, and he returned the grin. Then he grimly muttered "Alas, that will have to wait for a time. Right now, we have matters of greater precedence to contend with."

"How so, my love?" Lady Jyanna asked her husband.

Lord Howland held the piece of parchment in the air and revealed "I have spent the last hour going over this letter. It is actually very short, but the news it contains is most disquieting."

"How do you mean, my lord?" Rhaenys queried in interest.

Howland Reed approached the princess, held out the letter, and bade her "See for yourself, Your Grace."

Rhaenys kept one of her arms around Balerion. She tentatively accepted the missive in her free hand, unfolded it, and looked it over. It was written in the hand of Lord Gregor Clegane. Since Lord Gregor was one of only two men who wrote to Greywater Watch regularly – the other being Lord Eddard Stark – it was fairly easy for Rhaenys to recognize his writing. Rhaenys was always glad to receive a letter from the Mountain.

This missive, however, held shocking and grim news. As she read, she could honestly feel her eyes widening and the atmosphere becoming colder. His unease did not go unnoticed by the other people there.

"What is it, Princess?" Jojen Reed inquired.

Rhaenys did not answer him immediately. She waited until she finished reading the letter, and then she slowly looked up and revealed "The Others have been sighted north of the Wall."

Lady Jyanna and Lady Ashara gasped in alarm. Ethan Glover, Mark Ryswell, and Oswell Whent all bore uneasy countenances. Meera and Jojen seemed a little unsettled, but they did not let their anxiety show too much. Theo Wull was the only one who gave a relatively indifferent reaction.

"Then it's begun," Theo Wull uttered. Count on him to accept the truth first before anyone else.

"So it has," Lord Howland conceded. He moved to the center of the room and announced "The Great Summer is almost over. As the Starks are fond of saying, winter is coming. Now that the white walkers have made their grand entrance, we cannot afford to be caught unprepared."

"As long as we stay in the Neck, we are fixed for provisions, lodgings, and armaments," Oswell Whent pointed out.

"True, Ser Oswell," Howland Reed stated, "But our preparations for the Long Night cannot be limited to our everyday needs. There is much more that must be done before the white ravens are dispatched from the Citadel."

"Such as what?" Ashara Dayne enquired.

"Meera and I must travel to Winterfell soon," Jojen proposed, "Is that not right, Father?"

Lord Howland nodded and disclosed "Much of the Neck remains to be secured, so I cannot afford to leave Greywater just yet. You and your sister will go in my stead."
"As you command, my lord," Meera assured her lord father.

Rhaenys noted Meera was speaking simply out of obligation. Jojen, however, seemed to carry some hidden ulterior motive. He must be eager to visit the Starks.

"Is there anything the rest of us can do, my lord?" Mark Ryswell offered.

"As far as the world is concerned, the rest of you are supposed to be dead," Howland Reed remarked.

"A small setback, my lord," Oswell Whent slyly muttered, "We can simply become someone else."

Lady Jyanna seemed perplexed. "I beg your pardon, ser?"

Rhaenys realized what her sworn shield was implying. That gave her an idea of her own. "Ser Oswell may be on to something. Lyanna Stark used to be in hiding here. Now she is living as the maid Myrna for my younger brother. Lyanna was far better known in the North than any of us. If she could successfully disguise herself to blend into that region, the rest of us could do so easily."

"Perhaps," Ethan Glover concurred, "But where would we go?"

"Moat Cailin, of course," Rhaenys declared, "The one location where no person in this country is ever made to feel out of place."

By their facial expressions, the others were beginning to see the appeal in this suggestion. Some of them, anyway.

"And who among us would travel there, Your Grace?" Theo Wull queried.

Rhaenys smiled and answered with "Why, all of us."

"All?" Ashara Dayne repeated, a little astounded.

"Yes," Rhaenys confirmed, "You, I, Ser Mark, Ser Oswell, Ethan, and Theo."

"Is that wise, Your Grace?" Lady Ashara uttered nervously.

Rhaenys continued grinning. She then rose to her feet, gently set Balerion down on her chair, and proclaimed "I would have thought you'd approve, Lady Ashara. After all, it was thanks to you that my second brother was reunited with his mother. I stand an even lesser chance of being recognized, as I was only three when I last appeared in public. There are few in the world who would recognize me at a glance. Fewer if I was in disguise."

She paused for a moment so that Lady Ashara could reflect on that argument. Then she added in "Aside from that, I believe the six of us have been away from the world long enough. It is past time we reentered the great game."

"I must agree with the princess on that point," Mark Ryswell declared.

"So must I," Theo Wull debated.

Ethan Glover and Oswell Whent muttered their agreement, too. Lady Ashara initially seemed somewhat dismayed that even Rhaenys' sworn shield was in favor of this risky plan. In spite of that, even the elder Dornishwoman could not deny anything the princess had said.

"Very well," Ashara ultimately remarked, "Wherever we go, the most important thing is that we stay together. And as much as I have enjoyed this stay in the Neck, a change of scenery would be welcome."

"I do not fault you for thinking so, my lady," Howland Reed candidly murmured, "Life in a swamp is not for everyone."

"Well, I've developed a fondness for it, my lord," Rhaenys said cheekily.

"So I have noticed, Your Grace," Howland Reed commented, giving a slight smile.

"But..." Ashara Dayne added in, turning to the ward of Greywater, "I worry for your safety, Rhae. If you are discovered, you could be killed. Or worse."

"A couple years ago, that may have been the case," Rhaenys contended, "Now, I am not so certain. Seeing as how the Usurper gave orders for my aunt and uncle to be captured alive and unharmed, I do not believe he would be so quick to order my death. Anyway, he still believes me to be dead. So long as my cover is not compromised, I will be in no immediate danger."

No more than everyone else in the country current is.

Ashara thought on that for a minute. Then she sighed and proclaimed "If you truly wish to leave, I will not protest. I am sworn not only to protect, but also to obey you. The decision is yours to make."

"Then I wish to go," Rhaenys announced, "We will accomplish nothing by staying here. Whereas we can accomplish plenty by leaving here."

"So be it," Ashara avowed.

Rhaenys Targaryen smiled at the elder woman.

As much as she enjoyed her stay in the Neck, she was looking forward to travelling to Moat Cailin. This will be a fine time to test all I've learned about camouflage. In addition to that, there were two people at the moat whom she was particularly looking forward to meeting.

The first was Willas Tyrell. The heir to Highgarden had been a member of the Legion without Banners for the entirety of the Great Summer. For the first half, he had been squire to Lod Gregor Clegane. Now he served as the Reach's representative on the Mountain's secret council. By all accounts, he was a good man.

That was important to Rhaenys, as Lord Gregor had suggested forging a betrothal between her and Lord Willas.

Lord Willas was only partly aware of the betrothal; all he knew was that the Mountain had a prospective match in mind for him. He had yet to discover who the woman was, but at Lord Gregor's request, Willas had agreed not to consider any other matches until he found out who she was.

From what Rhaenys heard of Will Tyrell, he would make a fine lord and a great husband someday. Even so, she wished to meet the man before he became her husband.

The other person Rhaenys desired to meet was Lord Gregor's current squire, the supposed bastard of the late Brandon Stark and Lady Ashara. Rhaenys was one of the few in the country who knew the truth of Jon Snow's heritage. He was not a bastard, nor was he a Stark on his father's side. Instead, his mother was a wolf, and his father was a dragon. The same dragon that sired Rhaenys.
Even more so than Willas Tyrell, Rhaenys Targaryen was greatly anticipating her reunion with her half-brother.

It is past time the dragons were brought back together.

…

He cut to the right. Then he cut to the left. Then he delivered an overhand strike. His opponent deflected all three blows before any of them struck home.

"Very good," Ser Garlan Tyrell remarked. He returned to his original position and beckoned him "Again."

He backed up a pace and examined his opponent closely. Come on; he must have some weakness. A moment later, he thought he spotted one. Garlan's right shoulder was undefended. He focused on that region of the Reachman's body, raised his sword, rushed forward…

…and fell right into the trap. Garlan casually dodged the blow, parried it with his longsword, and struck his adversary behind the knee. He groaned and stumbled for a few feet. But he recovered quickly and moved to deliver a retaliatory strike. This time, he almost caught Garlan off his guard. He enjoyed seeing the momentary expression of astonishment on the Reachman's face.

The two of them crossed blades for nearly an entire minute before Garlan managed to deliver a nonlethal blow to the Dornishman's side. The blow was by no means so powerful that he was unable to continue fighting, but the rule was "first to hit flesh wins the round." As such, he conceded defeat.

"You're getting better, Edgar," Garlan stated approvingly. He sheathed his sword and extended his arm.

Edgar Sand accepted the Reachman's hand and shook it firmly. He knew Ser Garlan was sincerely praising his skills. He was not the type to mock people, subtly or directly.

"Shall we go again later?" Edgar suggested as he slid his own sword into its scabbard.

"I can think of no reason why not," Ser Garlan proclaimed.

"I can, perhaps," a sultry voice remarked from off to the side of the yard. The owner of the voice was Princess Arianne Martell, Edgar's cousin, the heiress to Sunspear… and, quite possibly, Ser Garlan's intended.

Arianne had been observing the sparring from a chair positioned along the wall of the yard. She had been accompanied by her brothers Quentyn and Trystane and their cousin Tyene Sand, who were also sitting. Ihtos was there, too, but he was standing. Never forget Ihtos. He's always nearby.

Edgar could not miss the lusty gaze Arianne was giving Garlan. That alone was enough to tell him what "reason" she believed he and the Reachman might have had for not having another duel that night. Obviously, the reason would impact Ser Garlan's availability, not Edgar's.

"Maybe after," Edgar cockily muttered, flashing a devious grin at Ser Garlan, who flushed furiously.
The idea to wed the future Princess of Sunspear to the second son of Highgarden had originally been Lord Gregor Clegane's. Sometime after Greyjoy's Rebellion, he had passed the recommendation along to Lord Mace Tyrell and Prince Doran Martell.

Twenty years ago, this match would have been tossed aside the instant it was proposed. But many things are possible in modern Westeros that were not in the past. After some thoughtful meditation, the Lord Paramounts of the Reach and Dorne had agreed to entertain the suggestion. Garlan Tyrell had consequentially come to Sunspear a few months earlier.

Ever since he arrived in Dorne, Ser Garlan had made an honest effort to get to know Arianne. She had made an effort to know him in turn, only hers involved a type of familiarity on a more "corporeal" level. Despite his apparent discomfort, Garlan did not ignore Arianne's advances. He could charm her in his own way, but he was not much of a flirter. One would think skirts were more threatening to him than swords.

Although Edgar could tell Arianne was attracted to the son of Highgarden, he was also aware that she was not so eager to fuck Garlan as she appeared to be. If she was, they would have shared a bed long ago. For the present, she was only testing the Reachman to have some fun with him and to see how strong his resolve was. Thus far, Garlan had not given in to her, meaning he could not be enticed easily. That must please Arianne. To her, the ones who resist are always the most appealing.

Garlan has spent much of his time with Edgar, as well. Both men were formidable warriors. Of course, we've yet to determine who's the more formidable. A sort of friendly competition had developed between them. In the last several weeks, they had taught each other plenty in the fighting styles of their respective homelands. This very afternoon, Garlan had drilled Edgar in an advanced confrontational tactic that had originated in the Reach. The tactic was difficult to learn and harder to master, but Edgar was a determined and persistent man. Arianne is not the only one who enjoys a challenge. Soon enough, Edgar would have his turn to knock Ser Garlan on his ass.

Edgar won these bouts almost as often as Garlan did. The Reachman was a few years older, and he was more experienced in actual combat. Those were the two primary advantages he had over Edgar. That, and his birth.

"We'll discuss this later," Garlan Tyrell frankly pronounced, ready to change the subject, "I, in the meantime, am famished."

"Here, here," Quentyn Martell voiced agreement.

"Luncheon should be ready by now," Tyene proclaimed, rising from her chair, "Let us adjourn to the dining hall."

No one had any objection to that.

Edgar Sand and Garlan Tyrell took a moment to wipe their brows. They had worked up a bit of a sweat in the training yard.

The Reachman was notably perspiring much more than Edgar was. That came as no shock. The only people who felt at ease in the Dornish climate were the Dornishmen themselves. It generally took years for a foreigner to become accustomed to the sweltering heat.

Edgar had not been born in Dorne, but he had lived there for most of his life. In his opinion, he had adapted to the climate rather well. It is never too hot for me. In fact, the only times he sweated were when he exerted himself, such as this instance when he sparred with Garlan Tyrell. As far back as he could remember, he had never once broken a sweat due to heat. Even his cousins, who had been born in Dorne and raised in Dorne their entire lives, could not make that claim.

Once Edgar and Ser Garlan had wiped themselves of perspiration, they regrouped with the Sand Snake and Uncle Doran's children. The six of them hastily made their way to the dining hall. Ihtos went with them.

Arianne and Garlan walked at the front of the group. Edgar noticed the two of them were holding hands as they walked. That struck his interest. Lovers don't hold hands. But 'sweethearts' do. Potential ones, at any rate. That was a term he did not use sparingly, particularly when it concerned his own family.

In spite of how she teased him, it was clear that Arianne respected Ser Garlan. He evidently respected her, too. Edgar had heard of how the Reach was regarded as the heart of chivalry, and Garlan demonstrated that quality very well. That must be why he's called 'The Gallant.'

They reached the dining hall a few minutes later. Uncle Doran and Aunt Elia were already there. As usual, Areo Hotah, House Nymeros Martell's Norvosi captain of the guard, stood at his post behind Uncle Doran.

In the last few years, Prince Doran Martell had contracted a debilitating case of gout. It had rendered him nearly incapable of standing and walking independently, and as a result, he had been confined to a portable chair. Yet even when seated, he spoke with power in his voice, and he was still a figure to be both admired and feared.

There was only one other person in the dining hall. It was Caleotte, the maester in service to Prince Doran's household. That was quaint. Normally the maester ate the midday meal in his office below the rookery. The only times he made an exception were when he had pertinent news to share. That can either mean goodwill or trouble. He was inclined to believe the latter, given the uneasy expression on Maester Caleotte's face.

Arianne released Ser Garlan's hand long enough to approach her father and place a kiss on his cheek. Quentyn and Trystane gave no kiss, but they smiled warmly at their sire. Edgar, Tyene, Ser Garlan, and Ihtos each tilted their heads to Doran Martell in respect.

As the head of the family, Prince Doran sat in the middle of the dais. Aunt Elia sat to his left, and Arianne sat to his right. Garlan sat on the other side of her, and Quentyn and Trystane took the two adjoining seats. Ihtos stood by the wall next to Areo.

Edgar Sand sat in his usual seat beside Aunt Elia. Even though he was baseborn, his aunt and uncle insisted on giving him a high place on the dais. That was irregular, even by Dornish custom.

Edgar was the fifth child and only male of Oberyn Martell's nine bastards. Of his eight sisters, Tyene was the only one who was in Dorne at this time. Her mother was a septa. By her apparel, one would think she was in training to become one, too. She normally long, loose-fitting robes that covered the entirety of her body. Edgar was not so foolish as to classify that as modesty. In Tyene's mind, longer garments meant more places to conceal her vast array of daggers. Areo Hotah must have noticed that, as well. Whenever Tyene wore an outfit that bared her arms and legs, the captain of the guard was generally more serene and at ease. Most men would be pleased because of what is there, not what isn't.

Obara and Nymeria had both been legitimized by King Robert. The first was married to Lord Sandor Clegane and a mother of three children; the second was married to Lord Jorah Mormont and a mother of four. For the last decade, they had been the Ladies of Clegane's Keep and Bear Island respectively.

Sarella was unaccounted for at present, but Edgar could imagine where she was. She had often spoken of her wish to travel to Oldtown and infiltrate the Citadel in effort to become Westeros' first female maester. Edgar would have bet his longsword that she had done just that.

Elia, Obella, Dorea, and Loreza all had the same mother, Ellaria Sand, the baseborn daughter of Lord Harmen Uller. Prince Oberyn was one of the captains of the Legion without Banners, and he was Dorne's representative on Lord Gregor's secret council. For those reasons, he could typically be found in Moat Cailin these days. His paramour and their four girls were living there with him. Elia was nearly old enough to be a Legionnaire.

Edgar had thought about going north to join the Legion on a few occasions, but his family had dissuaded him. Aunt Elia had been especially averse to that concept. Then again, Edgar should have expected that. For whatever reason, his whereabouts and well-being were always one of her foremost concerns.

Aunt Elia had been heavily involved in Edgar's upbringing and education. She was like the mother he never had. Edgar never understood why his aunt seemed so deeply invested in his life. If he were to guess, it was probably because he may have reminded her of her late son, Prince Aegon Targaryen. That was definitely a plausible explanation. Perhaps the only plausible one.

After all, Aunt Elia mourned for her late daughter Rhaenys every day. While she grieved for Aegon, too, she did not seem nearly as miserable when she thought of him. Edgar was under the impression that she only missed him the way a parent misses an estranged child, not a deceased one.

Edgar had concluded that either Elia Martell loved her daughter more than her son (which was quite unlikely), or she had found some type of solace in caring for Edgar. He may have been something of a replacement son for her. That made him feel quaintly proud of himself. Even if I never marry, at least I managed to make one woman happy.

As soon as everyone was seated, the servants brought out the midday meal. Everyone ate in silence for the first few minutes. Then Edgar looked to his left. Tyene was sitting beside him. Seated on the other side of the Sand Snake was Maester Caleotte.

"So, what is new in the world today, maester?" he stated inquisitively.

Caleotte turned to Edgar and gazed at him with an eyebrow raised. He seemed bewildered. "I am afraid I do not quite understand the question, Master Edgar."

"I assumed you had some information you wished to present to us," Edgar clarified, "Whenever you join us for luncheon, that is normally the reason."

"Rather perceptive of you to notice that," Elia complimented her nephew, patting him on the back. He smiled at that praise.

"Quite so," Caleotte remarked. He wiped his mouth with his napkin and pronounced "As it happens, you are not premature in your assumption, young master. There are indeed some items of business that need to be addressed."

"He has already reviewed these items with me, Edgar," Uncle Doran revealed, "He and I agreed that it would be in the best interests of you and every other individual in this room if you were told straightaway."
"Well, by all means, go ahead, Father," Arianne beckoned Prince Doran, "We're listening."

She spoke for everyone there. Edgar and everyone else in the dining hall continued eating, but they each gave the maester their attention.

"I received two ravens in the late morning," Caleotte apprised them, "One was from Oldtown; the other from King's Landing. I will discuss the one from the Conclave first."

"Anything amiss at the Citadel?" Tyene presumed.

"No," Caleotte proclaimed, "But my colleagues are growing restless. They have noticed a bit of a drop in countrywide temperature, and the days are gradually becoming shorter. They do not believe it will be long before autumn is upon the Seven Kingdoms."

"Then we should enjoy these last few months of summer," Quentyn wryly proposed.

"Yes, we should," Trystane concurred, seeming a little anxious, "They could be the last of any summer that some of us will ever see."

"Don't think that way, Trys," Arianne gently advised her brother, "Fretting never did anyone any good."

No, but it oftentimes proved a useful motivator for one's survival instinct.

"What of the other letter, maester?" Garlan Tyrell enquired, "What word did King Robert send?"

Caleotte waited a few seconds before he responded with "There was an incident in the North."

"What manner of incident?" Edgar asked.

"A little over a fortnight ago, a party of Watchmen was dispatched to the lands north of the Wall," Doran began for the maester, "Their objective was to bring a company of five hundred wildlings back south with them."

"So far, none of those wildlings set foot in the Seven Kingdoms, and they likely never will," Caleotte went on, "Only one of the Watchmen made it back, and he died soon after. But not before telling the world what happened to his companions and their charges."

"Were they attacked?" Quentyn presumed.

"Yes," Doran Martell confirmed. He gazed around the dais in utter silence, and then he quietly added in "By the Others."

Eleven years ago, if someone made a declaration such as that in Dorne, they would most likely have been laughed at or ridiculed. Back then, the Dornish had hardly even acknowledged the presence of the Others in ancient history. Nowadays, every Dornishman and Dornishwoman had not only admitted to the existence of the Others, but they had also fully grasped the truth that the Long Night would return to Westeros. Thus, everyone in the dining hall reacted accordingly.

Arianne placed a hand over her mouth, Tyene winced, Quentyn went pale, Trystane looked deathly scared, Garlan became agitated, and Aunt Elia frowned distressfully. Edgar merely looked down at his plate and pushed it away. Suddenly I'm not so hungry.

Arianne had a similar line of thought. She muttered in a slightly sharp tone "This could not have waited until after we ate?"
"This was the only time of the day when I knew all of you would be in the same place," Uncle Doran enlightened his daughter to justify the setting. Excluding dinner. But that would have the same outcome as this, only there would be a lot more people assembled than the present company.

"You could have summoned us, my prince," Garlan Tyrell pointed out.

"Yes, but some of you tend to ignore my summons," Uncle Doran mumbled, his gaze alternating between Arianne and Tyene. The heiress to Dorne and the false septa did nothing to refute that silent accusation, mostly because it was true.

"Apart from that, I doubt there is ever a truly opportune time to announce that the potential end of the world is imminent," Aunt Elia professed.

"That is a good argument, Aunt Elia," Quentyn coincided. "Yes, it is. But we had to hear of this at some point. At the end of the day, I suppose sooner is better.

"So… what are we to do?" Tyene Sand queried.

"Just what we've been doing," Doran professed, "Stockpiling our resources, strengthening our soldiers, building up our arsenals, and establishing better connections with the rest of Westeros. If the Others invade, Dorne will be the last to fall, but it will fall just the same as everywhere else. I have no intention of seeing all my work destroyed by creatures that have been dead for eons."

"Nor do I, Father," Arianne asserted, placing a soft hand on Uncle Doran's shoulder. He slowly turned to his eldest child. He made eye contact with her, and he gave her a smile, which she merrily returned. Her frustration from earlier had all but dissipated. The atmosphere of the room at large appeared to have lessened, as well. For now, at least. Once realization sits in, it may not be so easy for some of us to remain so composed.

Doran Martell then turned to his left and pronounced "Edgar, after the meal is finished, please go to my solar. I must speak with you in private."

"As you command, my prince," Edgar Sand acknowledged with a dip of his head.

Despite the loss of his appetite, Edgar managed to swallow a few more mouthfuls of food. After that, he asked to be excused, and Uncle Doran readily granted his request. So Edgar swiftly left the dining hall. When he stepped out, Ihtos joined him.

Although Ihtos was employed as a guard for all of House Martell, he generally favored Edgar over everyone else. The helmed swordsman was never more than twenty or thirty yards away, and he always drew his sword or threatened to draw it at the slightest possibility of harm to Edgar's well-being. He wondered if Aunt Elia had a hand in that. Maybe she had asked Ihtos to keep an extra careful eye on her nephew.

Or maybe I'm not just her favorite. It was equally likely that Ihtos did not actually have a personal interest in Edgar Sand; perhaps he just happened to protect the baseborn boy more often than anyone else at Sunspear.

Soon, Edgar Sand and Ihtos arrived at Prince Doran's solar. Once they stepped inside, Ihtos began walking along the walls, stopping every now and then to examine them. Edgar stood in the center of the room, watching the guard curiously. "What are you doing, Ihtos?"

The helmed swordsman did not reply. He just kept pacing the perimeter of the room and studying the walls closely. Edgar had come to expect little more than silence from Ihtos most of the time. Normally, the only people he routinely spoke with were Uncle Doran, Aunt Elia, Maester Caleotte, and – on rare occasions – Areo Hotah. Even with them, he never wasted words.
Around fifteen minutes later, the two men had company. Uncle Doran was rolled into the solar by Aunt Elia. Aro Hotah entered behind them, along with Maester Caleotte. I was not expecting this.

"By 'private,' you meant…?" Edgar Sand said drily.

"I never said I would speak to you alone," Doran informed his nephew, "Nor did I intend to. I simply planned for us to converse without the threat of eavesdroppers."

"The walls are free of holes, my prince," Ihtos proclaimed, "We will not be overheard."

"You are certain?" Doran enquired.

"Absolutely," Ihtos assured him, confidence detectable in his voice.

"Very good," Prince Doran muttered approvingly, "Stand by the entrance."

Ihtos nodded and went over to the door, which he closed and locked. He also placed a length of cloth at the base of the door and stood with his back to the keyhole. The windows in the solar had been tightly shut, and even the flue to the fireplace had been barred. This seems a little extreme for a private audience.

Once the room was fully secure, Edgar turned to Prince Doran with his arms folded and queried "What is this about, Uncle?"

"We have something of great import to tell you," the Prince of Sunspear revealed.

So I gathered. Edgar kept his arms folded and remarked "You have my undivided attention."

There was a brief interval of quietness in the solar, and then Uncle Doran opened the discussion with a rhetorical question: "You are familiar with the Sack of King's Landing?"

"I am," Edgar told him straightforwardly.

"What all do you know of it?" Doran queried in interest.

Edgar Sand apprised him with the following: "It marked the end of Aerys Targaryen's reign, as Ser Jaime Lannister stabbed the Mad King in the back. From what I heard, Grand Maester Pycelle helped the invading Westerlander forces gain entrance to the city, but he died an accidental death during the Sack. The city was also taken with surprisingly few civilian casualties, which was primarily due to the leadership of Lord Gregor Clegane. And, of course, Aunt Elia lost her children that day. If not for Lord Gregor, she would have lost her own life, as well."

Uncle Doran sat in silence during Edgar's summary of the Sack. He kept his hands folded together and watched the boy closely. When Edgar was finished, the Prince of Dorne pronounced "You are correct in all accounts," Uncle Doran pronounced. Except one."

Edgar was perplexed. I know my history well. Unless Maester Caleotte's lessons were flawed. "Which one, my prince?"

It was Aunt Elia who answered this time. She stepped forward beside her brother and illuminated "I did lose my children. But I did not lose them that day. Nor did I lose them in the way everyone believes I did."

"How so?" Edgar Sand asked in interest.

"Contrary to popular belief, Lord Gregor Clegane was not too late to save my babes," Elia informed him, "He arrived just in time to stop Ser Amory Lorch from murdering them. Right there in front of me, he disarmed and killed Ser Amory like the pig he was. After that, Lord Gregor had his men-at-arms escort me and my children out of the Red Keep to safety."

Now Edgar was downright baffled. He recounted "Their bodies were presented to King Robert afterward."

"Those were not them," Maester Caleotte revealed, "They were two children of the smallfolk that had been killed during the Sack."

Decoys? This whole conversation was one surprise after another. Edgar presumed "Lord Gregor knowingly deceived the King?"

"Yes," Aunt Elia confirmed, "He did so at tremendous risk to himself, just to save my daughter and my son."

Edgar was stunned. I knew the Mountain was bold and daring, but even by his standards, a deed such as that is impressive. Another thought abruptly occurred to the male Sand Snake. "If he saved them, where are they?"

"We are getting to that," Aunt Elia professed. After a pause, she continued with "As you know, after the Sack of King's Landing, Robert Baratheon tasked Lord Gregor with taking me back to my homeland. We returned to Dorne by way of sea. Just before our vessel departed, the Mountain managed to smuggle Rhaenys and Aegon on board."

Edgar narrowed his eyes and observed in intrigue "So they came back with you."

"Of course," Elia affirmed, seeming a little hurt for some reason, "At the time, they had nowhere else to go. I'd never abandon my children. I apologize if I gave you that impression."

"That's not what I meant," Edgar reassured his aunt, "What I meant was… you still haven't answer my previous question. Where are Princess Rhaenys and Prince Aegon?"

No one gave him an answer straightaway. Prince Doran and Princess Elia looked to each other and maintained eye contact for a tense minute. Finally, they turned away to each other and back to Edgar Sand.

Uncle Doran then raised his right arm and held it out to his sister. She took his hand in hers, and she pulled him up. It was arduous for him to even get to his feet, but with great difficulty, he managed to stand up and face his nephew at equal height.

Aunt Elia kept her hands on her brother's arm to prevent him from collapsing or stumbling. Once he was balanced on his feet, Prince Doran proclaimed "What we are about to tell you is something we have wanted you to know for the longest time. I pray that once you've been told, you will understand why we kept it secret."

"Go on, I beseech you," Edgar all but pleaded. It must be momentous if he is going to the trouble of getting up to tell me.

Doran Martell indulged him with "After King Robert claimed King's Landing, the Targaryen influence was virtually gone from the Seven Kingdoms. Even so, there were already a great many Targaryen sympathizers in the world. Many of them were natives of Dorne, given Elia's marriage to Rhaegar Targaryen. For that reason and others, we sought to keep Rhaenys and Aegon out of harm's way."
Elia continued with: "After how coldly Robert Baratheon reacted to the 'deaths' of my children, we decided that the world would have to continue to believe that Rhaenys and Aegon were dead. That was the only way we could guarantee their survival. So we arranged for them to disappear."

"Disappear?" Edgar Sand repeated. He did not like the sound of that.

"For lack of a better term, young master," Caleotte elaborated, "We merely gave them the opportunity to begin a new life. As an additional precaution, Princess Elia's children were separated from each other."

"Rhaenys was sent north," Doran expounded, before Edgar could ask another question, "The head of a reclusive Northern house offered to foster her at his family's castle. That is where she has been for the last sixteen years. We have heard little from her or her protectors since then, but by all accounts, she is safe and happy."

Edgar lightly nodded his head to show that he understood. After that, he enquired "And Aegon?"

Truthfully, he had already developed a theory of his own about what became of Elia Martell's youngest child. But he did not put much faith in this theory. It was far too outlandish to be true. There is no way in the Seven Hells it can be true. No way whatsoever. Still, part of him was not so certain of that.

"Aegon's situation was… quite different," Caleotte notified him, "Princess Elia insisted on keeping him near her. So in place of a new home, he was given a new name. Along with a new identity."

"Instead of my son, he was passed off as my nephew," Princess Elia anxiously revealed.

"Her bastard nephew," Doran hastily added in.

Edgar had kept his arms folded this entire time. But right then, they listlessly fell to his sides. His jaw had dropped open, as well. He found himself unable to blink, breath, or move. So great was the shock he felt at that time that he had lost control of all voluntary movement. It was a miracle he managed to avoid fainting.

No… this… this is impossible. Isn't it?

Eventually, he found his voice. He stammered "You… you mean to tell me…"

"There are no male Sand Snakes," Doran Martell notified him, "You are not Edgar Sand, only son to Oberyn Martell. You are Aegon Targaryen, the Sixth of his Name, the rightful King of Westeros."

At that moment, Aegon could not have cared less if he was the supreme dictator of the entire Known World. He was already far too shocked by the knowledge of his true name. All his life he had wondered who he was, where he came from, who had birthed him.

Now he finally knew, and he had not been prepared for the truth at all. Never in his life had he felt so overwhelmed by anything. Even the news of the Long Night approaching had not astounded him to this degree. I feel as though I'm losing my wits. This must be what madness feels like. Could this be how Aerys went mad? How... my grandfather went mad?

Aegon Targaryen tried not to reflect on that. He diverted his focus to the people in front of him.

He gradually turned towards Elia Martell… to his mother. Everything made complete sense now. He had not been a substitute for her son. He had been her son all along.
He could see in her eyes that she was undergoing many mixed emotions, probably more than Aegon himself was undergoing. The two emotions he primarily saw were joy and apprehension. Joy at Aegon finally learning the truth of his heritage… and apprehension at how he would react, especially towards her.

On one hand, Aegon wished to scream and curse. For sixteen years, he had been constantly misled and deceived. Everything he thought he knew was a fraud. His whole life was a sham. The realization of that made him question if he could trust in anything or anyone ever again.

On the other hand, he was alive. Had it not been for all those lies, he might have died before he even had his first memory of the world. Furthermore, his family had done all this because they loved him. He had never wanted for anything, he had been raised in a pleasant environment, and he had been given a wonderful home, all thanks to the Martells.

It took over five minutes for Aegon to even begin to sort out his feelings. After those five minutes, he was still very conflicted, but at the very least, he knew what he had to do next.

He marched forward to his mother and embraced her warmly. As if by reflex, Princess Elia Martell released her brother's arm and wrapped hers around her son tightly. She began to weep in happiness. Aegon felt he might have wept, too.

Aegon did not know how long he and Mother stood locked in that embrace. However long it was, it was still too short. Far too short to make up for the last sixteen years.

Ultimately, the two of them did come apart, even though they were both extremely reluctant to do so. Once that happened, Prince Doran remarked "I know you must have questions."

"More than even I can count," Aegon Targaryen conceded, "The main one is this: why are you telling me all this now?"

No one answered him straightaway. Then Princess Elia – no, Mother – began to explain "At first, when you were still a babe, we decided we would not inform you of this until one of two events occurred. The first was your Uncle Viserys and Aunt Daenerys' return from across the Narrow Sea. The second was Robert Baratheon's death."

"So far, neither has transpired," Aegon pointed out.

"We know," Uncle Doran proclaimed, "You see, dear nephew, after Greyjoy's Rebellion, we added a third event to our brief list of constraints."

Aegon only needed a few seconds to realize what this "third event" was. "The arrival of the Others?"

"Correct, Your Grace," Maester Caleotte contended. It felt queer to be addressed that way. I suppose I'm going to hear a lot of that from now on. In private, anyway. "As you are aware, Lord Gregor Clegane convinced King Robert to make peace with your uncle and your aunt. According to the letters we've received from Prince Oberyn, Lord Gregor believes the Targaryens will be instrumental in getting Westeros through the Long Night."

"Instrumental in what capacity?" Aegon inquired.
"As of yet, Lord Gregor has not clarified that point," Doran Martell professed, "He has even implied that the Targaryens themselves are likely unaware of the role they will play. Nevertheless, he places a great deal of stock in them, and that is sufficient for us. To us, the Mountain's word is as good as law."

Coming from a man who typically questions everything he is told, that is saying quite a bit.

"I'm still a little bewildered," Aegon declared, "How does knowing who I truly am relate to the return of the Others?"

"It relates to it in the simple fact that you are a Targaryen," Maester Caleotte apprised him, "Based on what we have learned from Lord Gregor Clegane, you and the other members of your father's family are destined to save the Seven Kingdoms from eternal winter."

"Yes, but alone or together?" Aegon said inquisitively, "That's an important detail."

"Most likely, you would be together," Doran Martell supposed, "We surmised that long ago."

"For that reason, you and I are to go north," Mother abruptly claimed.

Aegon looked to her, perplexed. "We are?"

"Not now, but soon," she clarified with a small grin, "Before we go anywhere, the proper arrangements will have to made. We'll get into those later. All you need to know is this: by year's end, you and your siblings will be reunited."

Aegon would have smiled. But one particular word in that last statement stopped him. "Did you say 'siblings'? I thought Rhaenys was my only sibling."

"On my side of the family, she is," Mother illuminated, "But there are some things about your Father that are not common knowledge."

Yet again, Aegon was lost in confusion.

"My boy, let there be no more secrets between us," Doran Martell sternly announced. He turned towards the man by the door and beckoned him "Ser Arthur, come forward."

Did he just call Ihtos 'Ser Arthur'? For a moment, he assumed he misheard his uncle. Then, he saw that he had not. The guard known as Ihtos approached the others and stopped in front of Aegon. Then he slowly brought his hands up and removed his helm. For the very first time, Aegon saw his face.

He recognized that face from books. Its owner was Ser Arthur Dayne, the Sword of the Morning, deadliest of Aerys II Targaryen's Kingsguard.

Upon this discovery, Aegon did not feel stunned, flabbergasted, or in awe. Instead… he felt a quaint desire to laugh. This whole day is just one goddamn surprise after another.
Note: Five more weeks. Then I'm done with graduate school forever. In the meantime, updates will still be shorter and spaced a little farther apart than usual. But they aren't stopping! I just hope my anxious mindset hasn't impacted my writing prowess.

Originally, I planned for this section to be Viserys' perspective (hence why I wished to include it in the previous chapter, with the other two Targaryens). After giving it some thought… I concluded that I would rather not write a section from HIS point of view. Not yet, in any case. I'm certain Viserys must have had an occasional rational thought, but not many. I may have a section from his perspective in the future, but if I do, it will be very short.

Anyway, I decided to have this chapter be from the point of view of another prominent character in Pentos. It will mostly be another buildup chapter, but it will have a significant breakthrough, too. As well as an unexpected twist.

By the way, I'm willing to bet several of you will have questions by the end of this chapter. If so, feel free to share your questions with me, and I assure you they will all be answered in time. I just ask of you one favor: do not make any premature assumptions.

The Red Woman was a curious individual. That much, Allard learned straightaway. She was curious in both senses of the word. She made it her business to know as much as possible, and she incited fascination out of nearly everyone she encountered. Additionally, there was something about her that captured one's interest.

An enigma is what she is.

Nevertheless, from the moment he met her, Allard became inexplicably anxious around Melisandre. He was not alone in that regard. Judging by how my colleagues react to her presence, I am far from the only person she unsettles.

When Melisandre first arrived at the manse, Allard had heavily considered turning her away. Since she claimed to be there for the Targaryens, he had decided to leave the choice up to Viserys and Daenerys. He did not speak a word of protest when they agreed to see the priestess.

Of course, even if Allard had not consulted them first, it was not his place to dictate who was or was not allowed entry to the manse. That prerogative was Magister Illyrio's, and the magister had opened the gates for the Red Woman with hardly any hesitation.

Still, Allard Seaworth did not trust the priestess. There were few people he did trust, but fewer that he innately distrusted. Melisandre was one such individual. In Allard's mind, it was doubtful that she had travelled all the way from Asshai simply to enter the services of a deposed prince and princess. No one would do that. Not unless they expect to receive something in return.

Allard was convinced Melisandre had an ulterior motive for seeking out the Targaryens. Whatever it was, he was determined to uncover it.

After the Red Woman was welcomed into the manse, Allard Seaworth decided to assign two of his comrades from the Seven Kingdoms to accompany her everywhere. More specifically, he would assign several pairs of them to follow her at different times of the day. Essentially, they would watch her in shifts, alternating every few hours. That arrangement would minimize the chance that Melisandre got too close to any one of his colleagues. At least one member of each of those pairs was a fellow Legionnaire.

Allard had told Melisandre that his comrades would be with her to ensure her safety. Melisandre politely declined the escort at first, but Allard insisted.

While Melisandre appeared grateful for the gesture, it was unlikely she truly was. In fact, Allard would not have been surprised if she saw straight through this mummer's farce of "chaperoning" her. Strangely, though, she never said a word against it.

A fortnight had elapsed since Melisandre came to the manse. Nothing of particular note had occurred during that interval. At the end of each day, Allard spoke with each of the Westerosi soldiers that had been with Melisandre anytime earlier.

Their reports were always quite concise, yet never very informative. The Red Woman ate three meals a day, went on walks around the courtyard, used the privy every once in a while, and read the occasional book in the library. Just like the rest of us.

There was, however, one thing Melisandre did that did not conform to everyman behavior. Four times a day or more, she perched herself in a chair before the fireplace in the manse's study and stared into the flames. Whenever she did this, she went into a type of trance for at least twenty minutes, but never longer than an hour. Once she went into that trance, it was very difficult to bring her out of it.

Allard Seaworth and the other Westerosi were aware that followers of R'hllor believed they could receive wisdom or knowledge of the future by gazing into flames. A few of Melisandre's escorts had asked her what she had seen, and her answers were always very vague and undescriptive.

Personally, Allard greatly questioned the plausibility of using fires as a buffer for information. He thought fires should only be used for keeping warm and lighting up dark rooms, and he thought information should be gathered through conventional means, such as research or spies. She must be getting something out of the flames that the rest of us are not.

Melisandre did not spend all of the past two weeks by herself. She had been with Viserys and Daenerys for a fair portion of that time frame. Despite the Red Woman's attempts to converse with them in private, Allard ensured that three or more Westerosi were always present whenever the three of them were together.

At first, the Targaryens' talks with the Red Woman were – for the most part – limited to a detailed recollection of the events of their lives. Melisandre spoke of how she had become a servant to the Lord of Light, and Viserys and Daenerys had spoken of their lifelong struggle for survival. Viserys had a tendency to be dramatic at times, but Daenerys never embellished anything.

According to what his colleagues told him, Viserys was evidently bored and somewhat disinterested in these talks. He seemed far more interested in getting to know the Red Woman through more "corporeal" means. I'd wager my spot on the secret council he is not the only one. Daenerys, however, was always eager to learn more of the world. She was as interested in getting to know the priestess as the other way around.
Sometimes Melisandre spoke with the Westerosi soldiers instead. Apparently, she was interested to learn of their background, too. At Allard's bidding, they indulged her. By the second week's end, she had interacted with all one hundred of them at least once. Including Allard himself. He did not have much to boast about; only that he was the second son of Lord Stannis Baratheon's right-hand man, and he was a top officer of the Legion without Banners. Nevertheless, that seemed to intrigue the Red Woman.

Other than being raised in Asshai and sold to the temple of the Lord of Light at a young age, there was nothing especially remarkable about Melisandre. But Allard knew better than to judge someone at a glance. If there is one thing I've learned from Father, it is that it's folly to evaluate another person by appearance only.

Allard Seaworth was under orders to keep the Seven Kingdoms up to date on the status of the Targaryens. He would send a missive to Lord Gregor Clegane whenever there was a major development concerning Viserys and Daenerys. He had yet to inform his commander about Melisandre's arrival. He had elected to wait until she instigated some form of breakthrough. In the first fourteen days of her stay in Pentos, nothing of the sort had come about.

On the morning of the fifteenth day, Allard was in his quarters. He was sitting at his desk, going over a list of the Westerosi soldiers' stores when someone knocked at the door.

"Enter!" Allard called out. As he gazed up from his papers, the door opened to reveal Ser Bonifer Hasty. Allard grinned and muttered "Hello, Ser Bonifer."

"Good morning, Allard," the middle-aged knight bade him. Allard noticed he seemed a little restless.

"Is anything wrong?" the younger man queried.

"At this moment, the Red Woman is with the Queen's children," Bonifer Hasty informed him. Hardly anything new.

Allard just nodded and inquired "Who watches them at this time?"

"Rupert Brax, Gerold Dayne, and Hugh Beesbury," Ser Bonifer disclosed.

Three guards; none of them Legionnaires. That was queer. Regardless of the time of day, one member of the Legion without Banners was always with Melisandre. "And from the Legion?"

"I was the Legionnaire on duty," the elder Stormlander admitted.

Allard Seaworth leaned back in his seat and remarked "I assume you have a good reason for not being with the priestess right now."

"I do," Ser Bonifer Hasty affirmed, "She asked to see you."

Allard was surprised. "Me? Why me?"

"She would not divulge that information," Bonifer confessed, "She just bade me to find you and bring you to her. By her tone, it was urgent."

"Very well," Allard Seaworth conceded. He rose from his chair, grabbed his sword off its rack, fastened it to his belt, and instructed the older man "Take me to the Red Woman."

Five minutes later, they reached Melisandre's bedchamber. The priestess was there, and so were Viserys Targaryen, Daenerys Targaryen, Rupert Brax, Gerold Dayne, and Hugh Beesbury.

As far as Allard was aware, this was the first time the Red Woman had invited anyone into her room. Allard had agreed to give her privacy and solitude in her own quarters. Her guards had always remained at the entrance; they had never been allowed through the threshold. At nighttime, just before she turned in, she locked the door tightly. Allard wondered why she was so wary. No one there would dare harm her; she was a guest of the manse, and to harm a guest was to violate all the laws of gods and men. Could it be possible she is harboring a secret? If so… perhaps that is why she summoned me.

Predictably, Melisandre was standing in front of a brazier, staring longingly into its flames. Rupert, Gerold, and Hugh were leaning against parts of the wall. Viserys and Daenerys were seated at a table off to the side of the room.

When the second son of Ser Davos Seaworth stepped inside, Melisandre looked towards the entrance of the room. She gave a friendly grin and said "Good morrow to you, Master Allard."

"My lady," Allard Seaworth rejoined, dipping his head respectfully. Bonifer Hasty entered the room alongside him. Allard flashed a glimpse at his colleague, and then he turned back to the priestess of R'hllor. "Ser Bonifer claims you wished to see me."

"Yes," Melisandre confirmed, taking a step closer to the Legionnaire officer. After a pause, she declared "The time has come that I explain my purpose for coming."

Initially, Allard was taken aback by the forwardness of that statement. Up until this point, every single thing the Red Woman said or did had been ambiguous in nature. Be that as it may, when the meaning of that statement sank in, Allard was not displeased. It is past time we addressed this issue.

"As you say, my lady," Allard mumbled, giving a light nod.

He expected the priestess to begin her explanation straightaway. But when Allard gestured for her to speak, she did not open her mouth. Instead, she folded her hands together and shook her head slightly.

"You misunderstand," Melisandre proclaimed. She gestured to the two people seated at the table and added "I only wish to explain my purpose to them."

Now Allard was perplexed. By their facial expressions, so were Bonifer, Hugh, Gerold, and Rupert.

Seeing their confusion, Melisandre provided some clarity: "What I mean is I would prefer to confer with Prince Viserys and Princess Daenerys alone. Alas, it has been made clear that you will not permit us to speak in private. So, to appease all of us, I would ask that as few parties as possible be present during my account."

"How few, my lady?" Allard enquired.

"Myself, the Targaryens, and one other," Melisandre pronounced. She looked Allard in the eye and told him "I would like that one to be you."

Allard was more fascinated than he was bewildered by that claim. "May I ask why?"

"Because of all the Westerosi in this manse, you carry the most authority and influence," the priestess contended, "You may come from a small, recently-founded house, which was created by..."
a former criminal. In spite of that, you have made a name for yourself in the Legion without Banners. Although only twenty Legionnaires are among the hundred Westerosi soldiers who reside in this manse, it is not difficult to see that even the eighty non-Legionnaires respect you and your position.”

She is remarkably perceptive.

Allard could not deny anything the Red Woman just said. He was not happy she had called his father as a criminal, but at least she used the term "former criminal." Apart from that, Ser Davos Seaworth took pride in his experience as a smuggler.

Melisandre was also correct in how the other Westerosi viewed Allard Seaworth. Although he was only meant to be the leader of the Legionnaire members of the hundred, the others had chosen to appoint him as their unofficial leader a few months ago.

That spoke volumes of how much faith they had in him. Some of the other Westerosi had already been hardened veterans even before Robert's Rebellion. In those days, Allard's greatest accomplishments had amounted to assisting his father with moving contraband around the Seven Kingdoms. All the same, he had done very much to repair the Seven Kingdoms in the aftermath of the Rebellion.

Allard had accepted the role as the tentative commander of the hundred Westerosi in Pentos, and he had performed this responsibility superbly thus far. Still, it was not a duty that he coveted. He had never vied for power. Principally because as he grew up, he never expected to have very much of it, even after his father was made a landed knight. That viewpoint was commonly known as "the outlook of the second son." Dale's the one who'll be leading House Seaworth after Father passes on. He's much better suited to the task than I.

He never voiced these qualms, as it would not do for a leader to openly question his own competence in front of his subordinates. These men have faith in me. For their sake, I should, too.

Despite being named leader, Allard was always considerate of the other ninety-nine soldiers' feelings. He looked around the room and asked "Does anyone have any objections to Lady Melisandre's request?"

Gerold Dayne, Hugh Beesbury, Rupert Brax, and Bonifer Hasty collectively shook their heads. One or two of them quietly murmured "No."

Allard nodded again, folded his arms, and instructed his colleagues "Wait out in the corridor. Make certain no one interrupts or disturbs us."

The other four men swiftly filed out of the bedchamber. On the way out, Hugh bowed a bit, Rupert nodded his head, Gerold gave a salute, and Ser Bonifer murmured "Take care, my lord."

I'm no lord. I'm no knight, either. I'm just the man the Red Woman requested.

That distinction by itself would turn out to be much more meaningful than Allard Seaworth gave it credit for.

Once the other soldiers were out of the room, Allard shut the door and bolted it at Melisandre's behest. She also had him place a length of cloth at the base of the door so that even the slightest sound could not pass through the crack. I would never have guessed she was this secretive. Allard did not think it a coincidence that there were no windows in this bedchamber. She must've seen to that, as well.
When the bedchamber was deemed secure, Melisandre led Allard over to the table and beckoned him "Sit, if you please."

Allard sat down beside Daenerys. He gave her a benign grin, which she returned. Viserys was on the other side of Dany, and Allard avoided making eye contact with him. Without even looking, he could imagine the ever-present scowl on the older Targaryen's face.

Melisandre took the remaining chair between him and Viserys. After giving her a minute to get comfortable, Allard folded his arms again and stated "You may begin at your leisure, my lady."

Melisandre opened with a question. A question directed at the Targaryens: "Are you aware, my prince and princess, that your family were followers of R'hllor in the days of Valyria?"

"Of course we are," Viserys bluntly replied. Right. And 'of course' you are a proper gentleman to your sister.

"I do remember learning that somewhere, my lady," Daenerys claimed. At least she sounds believable.

"Then you would know that your family thrived in the days when they worshipped the Lord of Light," Melisandre proclaimed.

"Yet the red priests were unable to save Valyria from the Doom," Viserys rigidly pointed out.

"The Doom was a natural disaster," Allard Seaworth countered, "There was nothing anyone could have done to prevent it."

"Not so, Master Seaworth," Melisandre proclaimed, "My brothers and sisters of the faith saw the Doom before it occurred. They warned the people of Valyria that it was coming. A certain prudent few chose to listen and fled. All other occupants of Valyria foolishly dismissed the Lord of Light's warning. Their deaths were the result of their own ignorance."

"How can you be certain of this, my lady?" Allard inquired.

"Because the people of Valyria who trusted in R'hllor lived," the Red Woman claimed, "On the eve of the Doom, all the red priests in Valyria disappeared overnight. They, along with those who heard them out, were the only ones who lived to see a whole civilization crumble."

"That is rather unfortunate," Daenerys uttered softly, "But why are you telling us this?"

"Because it is paramount that you heed my counsel," Melisandre declared, "You must not ignore it or idly cast it aside. It could mean the end of everything if you do."

That successfully captured my attention. Evidently, it had also gotten Daenerys', and even Viserys seemed genuinely interested now.

"Go on," Viserys goaded her.

Melisandre folded her hands beneath the long sleeves of her robes, and she stated "You have been told that when the Long Night comes, the Targaryens will have a unique advantage over the White Walkers."

"I suppose you believe you are the advantage?" Viserys wryly presumed. Let us hope not. All most red priests are good for is predicting events, and we already have a forecaster in Lord Gregor. What we need now is strength or power.

Melisandre firmly responded with "I am not the advantage, but I will guide you on the right path towards claiming that advantage."

"Guide us how?" Daenerys inquired.

"The Lord of Light knows and sees all," the priestess pronounced, "It is through him that I will do so."

I assumed as much. Allard sat up in his seat and murmured "Tell me, my lady. Was it the Lord of Light who directed you to Pentos in the first place?"

"Yes," Melisandre revealed, "In ordinary times, R'hllor only reveals the events of the immediate future. But soon after word of the Long Night's forthcoming arrival reached Essos, he began to show us glimpses of events that would not occur for several years, as well."

"Then you must know plenty about the Long Night already," Daenerys supposed.

"That would depend upon what you view as 'plentiful,'" Melisandre perceived.

"Well, to begin… can you tell us when the Others will appear?" Allard Seaworth conjectured.

Melisandre slowly turned her head towards the Stormlander and said quietly "They already have."

Allard could physically feel his eyes widening. He also heard Daenerys gasp and Viserys quaver in his chair. The Legionnaire lieutenant gradually leaned closer to the Red Woman and muttered in shock "What?"

"Mere days before I came to Pentos, R'hllor gave me another vision," Melisandre revealed, "In it, I saw seven figures surrounded by a growing crowd. Everywhere the crowd went, it spread a wave of terror and devastation. Six of those seven figures were consumed in the wake of destruction, and the seventh one only lived long enough to perish peaceably."

"Is this supposed to meant something?" Viserys muttered irately.

Allard already managed to determine the meaning of that vision. He observed "The Night's Watch sent a group of rangers north of the Wall, and a single black brother returned. Not long after, he deserted his post and was subsequently executed, but not before he alerted the people of the Seven Kingdoms on what he ran from. In any case, his fate was much more merciful than the one which claimed his companions."

The Red Woman seemed mildly impressed. "You make a fine interpreter, Master Seaworth."

"Thank you, I suppose," Allard stated candidly, "To be honest, I was actually hoping I was wrong."

"Soon enough, you will have proof that you were not," Melisandre claimed.

"How so?" Allard inquired, intrigued.

"It has been over a fortnight since the Others ambushed that unfortunate party," the priestess illuminated, "By now, word of their arrival has surely been passed throughout all of Westeros. It will not be long before you and your comrades receive this grim news."

Allard could not dispute that. If the Others truly had returned to the world, he knew Lord Gregor Allard Seaworth was not looking forward to that missive. It would mark the last legitimately tranquil moment of his life until the Long Night ended. He sighed deeply, rubbed his temples with his hands, and muttered "Gods help us."

"There is only one true god, Allard," Melisandre said in a voice that brokered no argument.

Nevertheless, Allard furrowed his brow and muttered crossly "For you, perhaps. For myself, there are seven."

"I would caution you to turn away from those pagan gods," Melisandre suggested. And if I were a less tactful man, I would caution you to consider the consequences of calling them pagans.

"As I recall, you are here to advise them," Allard Seaworth muttered bitterly, looking over at Viserys and Daenerys, "Not me. I respect that you follow the Lord of Light. Please respect that I follow the Seven."

"I could not do so in good conscience," the priestess declared intransigently.

Allard resisted the desire to scowl. "That mindset will not gain you many friends or allies, my lady."

"I am not concerned with making friends or allies," Melisandre stoically claimed, "I am more concerned with curing the ignorant of their misguided beliefs."

"Such extremist behavior is frowned upon where I live," Allard professed, "In the Seven Kingdoms, we do not force others to follow any religion against their will."

"Yet you do force them to follow whoever sits the Iron Throne," Melisandre pointed out.

"That is a different matter entirely," Allard debated.

"Is it?" Melisandre disputed, "Men are loyal to the one known as their king not because they chose to be, but because the alternative is death or exile. I see no reason why religion cannot be imposed upon them in a similar fashion."

Allard frowned and murmured in an impatient tone "My lady, this talk of religion is getting us nowhere. I would like to remain focused on our original topic of discussion."

"I assure you, this is very much related to that topic," Melisandre remarked.

Allard scoffed and queried "How?"

"In another life, you would have been a fellow servant of R'hllor," Melisandre straightforwardly expounded.

Allard stared at her blankly for a few seconds. Then he spat heatedly "What in the Seven Hells are you talking about?"

"The Lord of Light does not just tell us the possible future," Melisandre claimed, "He also reveals what could have been. During my stay, I grew curious about you, and I beseeched my Lord to tell me more of you. I was intrigued to discover that under different circumstances, you and your brothers would have exchanged your Seven for R'hllor."
"And I suppose you would have been the one to persuade us to convert?" Allard asked rhetorically.

"Indeed," the Red Woman alleged, "You would have been reluctant to do so at first, but you would have given in soon enough. Your father, however, would only have claimed to embrace the Lord of Light. He would never have changed his faith willingly."

That does not surprise me. Father grew up in a city where it was commonplace to worship the Seven. I remember he used to pray to them whenever he went smuggling.

Allard folded his arms again and mumbled "I find it unlikely that the Lord of Light would consider me and my family important enough to give you an entire vision about us."

"As I said afore, R'hllor sees and knows all," Melisandre repeated.

"My lady, with all due respect, you could claim you saw anything in one of your fires," Allard contended, "Unless you are able to provide some evidence to support yourself, there is no concrete reason why we should put so much stock in your words."

"It is evidence you desire?" the Red Woman drily uttered. When Allard nodded his head, she proclaimed "Then evidence I shall give you."

At that, Allard allowed himself a satisfied his smirk vanished when the priestess told him "This brings me to why I summoned you to this chamber. You are not at this table simply because you required one of your hundred to stand witness for my meeting with the Targaryens. There is another reason – a more important and more exceptional reason – why I asked you here, Master Allard."

"What reason is that?" Allard Seaworth inquired.

"Unlike your ninety-nine compatriots, you are in contact with the most dangerous man alive," Melisandre disclosed, "You serve directly under him, as well."

Allard raised an eyebrow and assumed "You mean Lord Gregor Clegane?"

"Yes," the Red Woman affirmed, "That man is perhaps the greatest threat to the modern world."

In response, Allard bristled and tightened his fists. He snapped angrily "How dare you."

Melisandre stated serenely "I would advise you not to lose your temper, Master Allard."

"Then I would advise you to be mindful of the way you speak of the Mountain," Allard mumbled through gritted teeth. "Lord Gregor Clegane has unified a country that had always been broken since the days of the First Men. What have you ever done that could possibly compare?"

"A person's greatness is not determined solely by their deeds," Melisandre plainly observed, "Gregor Clegane has established stability throughout the Seven Kingdoms; I do not deny that. But this stability will not last. He who made it will also be the cause of its undoing."

Normally, Allard could remain levelheaded and composed in nearly every situation. But he would not tolerate anyone slandering the Mountain's name as the Red Woman just had. His right hand closed around the hilt of his sword, and he muttered curiously "Explain what you mean. If you value your tongue, I'd suggest you chose your words very carefully."

Melisandre did not seem intimidated in the slightest. Not on the surface, at any rate. Regardless, she held a hand up and declared "Stay your hand and I will tell you."
Allard removed his hand from his sword and placed it back on the surface of the table. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Daenerys exhale slowly and tensely. She must have been holding her breath for the last twenty seconds. I may have frightened her. If so, I should apologize to her later.

"Continue," Allard stated in a more relaxed tone.

Melisandre proclaimed "It is not my intent to condemn the Mountain. In another life, he may have been a terrible man. But not in this one. In this world, he is a good man. I know, because only a good man could have accomplished the things he has."

Allard grinned and nodded his head at that. As it happens, I helped him accomplish some of those deeds.

"But…” Melisandre hastily resumed, "There are times when goodness can produce disaster. There is such a thing as a man who is too good."

"That is true," Allard concurred, "King Baelor Targaryen was one such man. He fasted daily so that his people could have more to eat. He ended up starving himself to death."

"It was more his blind devotion to the Seven that killed him," Melisandre contended. How did I know she would say that? The Red Woman then remarked *"In the case of Gregor Clegane, his weakness is his desire to protect the innocent."

Allard was more perplexed than astounded by that. He inquired "How is it a flaw to want to defend the innocent?

"Usually, it is not," Melisandre pronounced, "But when one labors under the misapprehension that he can save all the innocent, he risks placing the world in jeopardy."

"When has Lord Gregor ever done that?" Allard muttered demandingly.

Melisandre answered him with "*Sixteen years ago, when he ensured the survival of Rhaegar Targaryen's children."

Silence passed over the chamber. It was a chilling, unnerving, elongated period of silence. Allard had been rendered almost completely speechless. So had Viserys and Daenerys, by their countenances. All three were staring with their mouths hanging open in shock. Melisandre just sat in her chair with her hands folded, looking as stoic and collected as ever.

After a minute of total inactivity, Allard abruptly jumped to his feet. He drew his sword out of its scabbard and whispered menacingly "You lying witch…"

"I may be a witch," Melisandre contended, "But I did not lie."

"You did," Allard refuted, pointing his sword at the Red Woman, "Prince Rhaegar's children perished at the end of Robert's Rebellion. Lord Gregor was there when they died."

"Yes, that was what he told the world," Melisandre admitted, "But you must not believe everything you are told."

"A lesson anyone who ever listened to you should live by," Allard sharply retorted, stepping forward two paces. Let us see how insolent she is when less a tongue.

"Wait!" Viserys interjected, rising to his feet hastily. Allard turned to the elder Targaryen, who sternly declared "I would hear what she has to say."
"I'd like to know more, too," Daenerys thought aloud, "Maybe she speaks true, Allard. If she does, removing her tongue will not alter history."

"Indeed not, my lady," Allard Seaworth coincided. But for the sake of everyone here, she better not be deceiving us. He gradually sheathed his sword, returned to his seat, and gazed at Melisandre. Secretly, he was beginning to wonder if perhaps she was not feeding them falsehoods after all.

Once Viserys was seated again, the conversation continued. He asked the priestess in a commanding voice "How do you know our brother's children are alive?"

"R'hllor gave me a vision of them," Melisandre revealed, "As it happens, this vision was the very same one which led me to you and your sister."

"Please, tell us what you saw, my lady," Daenerys bade the priestess. She asked a lot more politely than I would have. Certainly, more than her brother would have.

Melisandre elaborated with "The vision came to me over a year ago. It began with six dragons flying together in an open field. After a time, they were attacked by all the other animals in the world, and during the attack, they were separated from one another. Two of the dragons flew across a vast expanse of water, another of them went to the top of the world, and the last three sought shelter in the lands adjacent to the field. After the other animals disbanded, a wave of darkness passed over the land. It consumed everything in its path. Before it could devour all, the dragons reunited, and – working together – they overcame the darkness and expelled it from the world."

Allard whistled in amazement. Viserys and Daenerys appeared partly flabbergasted and partly enthralled. Now, if only this 'advantage' would come to light.

Viserys scoffed and observed "Obviously, Dany and I are the two that traversed the ocean."

"Evidently," Allard drily coincided. So, he's not completely witless.

"It is for that reason that I came to you," Melisandre proclaimed, "You were the closest of the dragons, and according to my vision, you will somehow grow the most in strength."

"Astonishing," Daenerys commented, giving a wide grin. In a strange way, seeing her so happy made Allard feel a little merry. After a momentary pause, the younger Targaryen looked to the Red Woman and inquired "What of the other four dragons?"

"I believe I may know who the one at the top of the world is," Allard thought aloud.

"Who?" Daenerys queried eagerly.

"Your great granduncle, Aemon Targaryen," Allard replied, "The elder brother to your ancestor Aegon the Unlikely."

Viserys seemed equal parts astonished and skeptical. "How do you know that?"

"Lord Gregor mentioned him once," Allard Seaworth disclosed, "He informed me and the others on the secret council that the maester of Castle Black used to be a Targaryen prince before he joined the Night's Watch. He asked us not to tell anyone else of that, but I believe present company can be excepted."

"In any case, you are correct," Melisandre claimed, "Maester Aemon, formerly of House Targaryen, is the last of his generation. He has been on the Wall longer than most men have been alive. But he is still a dragon in his heart."

Daenerys nodded her head, agreeing with the sentiment. Allard found he agreed with it, too. Dany then inquired in interest "What of the last three dragons? Did they ever get to shelter?"

"They did," Melisandre apprised her and the two men, "After soaring through the skies for a long while, they ultimately found refuge on a mountain. A very tall mountain."

I don't need to be a master interpreter to know the meaning of that symbol.

"Who are these last three meant to be?" Viserys enquired.

"Rhaegar's children, of course," Melisandre proclaimed. Three? Did she miscount?

"Pardon me, my lady," Daenerys stated, clearly having a similar thought, "Rhaegar only had two children. Rhaenys and Aegon."

"Not so," Melisandre firmly asserted, "There was a third."

"How could that be?" Allard Seaworth wondered, "Elia Martell was incapable of having another babe after Aegon."

"Yes, but her husband's seed was still fertile," Melisandre professed. Before anyone could pose another question, the Red Woman explicated "When the three dragons reached the mountain, two of them landed near a viper. The third, who happened to be the youngest, landed near a wolf."

Allard placed his hand over his mouth and murmured quietly "Lyanna Stark…"

Melisandre nodded approvingly and said "Right again."

Viserys snorted. "So the Stark whore lived long enough to give our brother a bastard."

"Have you no respect for the dead?" Allard stated in disgust.

"Lyanna Stark may not be dead," Melisandre frankly countered, "And her child may not be a bastard, either."

What the honest fuck? Allard was beginning to feel overwhelmed by confusion. "My lady, this explanation is starting to raise more questions than it answers."

"I'm afraid your new questions must remain unanswered a while longer, Master Seaworth" Melisandre told him, "The Lord of Light has not yet seen fit to tell me more of Rhaegar's third child. But there is one who may be able to enlighten you."

"Just 'may'?” Allard noted.

"The Mountain That Rides helped Rhaenys and Aegon disappear," Melisandre pointed out, "It would not be unreasonable to assume he did the same for their half-sibling. I cannot say for a certainty that he did anything of the sort. You have the means to determine whether or not he did."

Allard frowned and inquired "Are you asking me to confront my commander on this issue?"

"Not necessarily confront him," Melisandre expounded, "Whenever you next correspond with Lord Gregor, bring up this topic. He may be quite reluctant to address it, but you just may convince him to be straightforward and truthful."
"That is a huge gamble, my lady," Allard Seaworth commented, "Even so… I will try. I can make no promises as to my success, but I will strive to succeed all the same."

"Very good," Melisandre avowed. She seemed rather pleased by that assurance.

There was a lengthy period of quietness in the room. Then Allard looked to the Red Woman and told her "Earliest, you spoke at length of how the Mountain would be responsible for the collapse of his own achievements, namely the stability of Westeros. Just what did you mean by that?"

"Sooner or later, the remaining dragons may attempt to reclaim what was taken from them," Melisandre conjectured, "Doubtless, the possibility of that has occurred to Gregor Clegane. Nonetheless, he refused to let any harm befall Rhaegar's children when they were babes. Now they are grown. If they decide they want the Iron Throne, Lord Gregor's mercy could ultimately turn out to be a grave error."

"I can comprehend your reasoning," Allard Seaworth declared, "But your worries are not entirely justified, my lady. Westeros may have been in a sorry state when the Targaryens were overthrown sixteen years ago, but I doubt there are enough people in the Seven Kingdoms who would actually support the Targaryens if they attempted to return to power."

"You're likely right," Daenerys glumly conceded, "After all, why would they need or want us if Robert Baratheon has done so much more for them than our father ever did?"

"They wouldn't," Viserys proclaimed, folding his arms. Then he smirked, leaned back in his chair, and stated "However, suppose that when we returned to Westeros, we did not go back alone."

"You won't go back alone," Allard contended, "In all likelihood, my colleagues and I will be the ones to take you back."

"Yes, but perhaps you will bring back more than my sister and myself," Viserys supposed.

Allard was intrigued by that remark. Where is he going with this? "Who do you envision would sail back with us?"

"An army of my own making," Viserys smugly declared.

Allard had to bite his lip to keep from laughing. He allowed himself a small grin, and he cheekily murmured "And just where do you imagine this army would come from?"

"Magister Illyrio and I are the process of finding one," Viserys claimed, "I will not say anything beyond that. It is no concern of yours."

"It is, depending on the true purpose of this 'army,'" Allard argued, eyeing Viserys suspiciously.

Viserys chuckled at the accusing glance the Stormlander gave him. He leaned further back in his chair and said scathingly "You probably think I plan to amass an invasion force. Do not be so naïve. When the Long Night comes, the Usurper will need all the help he can get. If I am able to provide some units of my own, he should be grateful."

_I do not think for one moment that you're raising an army for a selfless motive._ Viserys Targaryen was far too ambitious to give up what would have been his. If given the chance, he would seize the Iron Throne and exterminate House Baratheon at the same time. Allard would not allow him the opportunity to do either.

Be that as it may, he was not entirely opposed to the Targaryens marshaling some forces of their own. Under the right supervision and leadership, the Targaryen's foreign forces could be made to cooperate with the forces of the Seven Kingdoms.

I wonder who he has in mind. Perhaps a sellsword company or two. Or three. But then again, where would he find the gold? At this moment, he did not particularly care. Whoever Viserys won over, they would not be going to Westeros without the Legion's consent or the crown's.

Allard folded his arms again and announced "Very well, I will not ask who you intend to recruit to your cause. For now. But make no mistake; you shall not keep me in the dark indefinitely. Until I know who you'll be in league with, I will sanction passage across the Narrow Sea for no one other than the people in this building."

Viserys seemed quite displeased, but he nodded his head and grudgingly muttered "Fine. So be it."

Allard smiled, as he was glad that he could forgo another pointless argument. That's probably the most reasonable he's ever been. There were times when Allard found it difficult to believe that Viserys and Daenerys were actually related. He was easily aggravated, extremely impatient, and very unforgiving. She, on the other hand, was intelligent, cautious, clever, and sweet almost to a fault. For a certainty, they landed on opposite sides of the gods' famous Targaryen coin.

The bedchamber was immersed in silence once more. After twenty seconds of this silence, Allard Seaworth turned to Melisandre and asked her "Have you anything more to tell us, my lady?"

"At present, I do not," the priestess proclaimed, "But R'hllor will continue giving me visions of the future. I would ask that the three of you make yourselves available at all times of the day."

"As you say," Allard tentatively coincided. Viserys and Daenerys both nodded their heads in agreement.

Melisandre concluded the meeting with this sentence: "Above all, you must remember; the night is dark and full of terrors."

If you believe that now, wait until the Long Night comes.

It was not even noon when Allard Seaworth and the Targaryens left the Red Woman's bechamber. Nevertheless, he was unable to get much of anything completed by the time night fell. For the rest of that day, all he could think about was what had been said during their conversation. That had to be the biggest awakening of my life.

Finding out that he and his brothers would have forsaken the Seven under different circumstances. Discovering that Rhaegar Targaryen's children were still alive, and that he had three of them. Learning that Lord Gregor Clegane may have had a hand in ensuring their survival. Being told that Lord Gregor's actions could eventually bring ruin to the Seven Kingdoms. Being informed that the Mountain was keeping dark secrets from even his closest allies.

Ultimately, it was the knowledge that the Red Woman knew so much about the world that bothered Allard the most. Not only was she aware of hidden truths of the past, where the present would lead, and what the future would hold, but she also knew of what the world would have been like in another life.

As far as Allard Seaworth knew, red priests were not accustomed to seeing into other worlds. In fact, there was only one person in the Known World who possessed that ability. That was the very same man that Allard had loyally followed for over thirteen years. The man whose premonition of the Long Night had enabled the people of Westeros to prepare for it.

When he made this connection, Allard developed a very unnerving theory.

What if the Red Woman knew even more than she let on? What if the Lord of Light gave her more than just glimpses of the future? What if she was actually receiving elaborate warnings of the upcoming hardships of the world?

Could it have been possible that the gods had given Lady Melisandre the very same gift they had given to Lord Gregor Clegane?
Note: My final projects in all three of my classes will be due sometime in the next two weeks. So I'll be concentrating on meeting those deadlines. After that, all I'll have left before I graduate is a final exam in one of my classes. In any case, I won't be able to do more writing until the last week of the month.

In the meantime, here is an update that I hope will tide you over until I return. This chapter is where a lot of story arcs begin to converge, and a number of characters start to come together. This chapter will in large part be an account of how Westeros has developed since Greyjoy's Rebellion (Moat Cailin in particular), but it will not just be a status report. Certain parts of it will be key to the plot development of several subsequent chapters.

"We have arrived, my ladies," Erryk or Arryk – she never could tell which – announced from the other side of the door.

"Very well, Right," Olenna Tyrell murmured. And not a moment too soon. It was getting stuffy in here.

She turned to the other occupants of the carriage. They were her beautiful granddaughter Margaery and Margaery's two trusted handmaidens. They were beautiful, as well. Not as beautiful as Margaery, of course. But they can still turn many a lad's head. They were all young maids, and she had lived longer than the three of them combined. Gods willing, they will all live to an even greater age.

Olenna looked to the girl across from her and stated "Would you care to lead, Lady Mira? It would be most fitting if one native to this land stepped out first."

Mira Forrester gave a sweet smile and declared "I would be honored, my lady."

Olenna could not help but smile back. Mira was always so polite. Of her granddaughter's handmaidens, Olenna preferred her over Sera Durwell. Although Sera's family were distant relatives of the Tyrells, she was also quite reserved and laconic. That was likely a direct result of her "secret."

Nevertheless, Sera was just as competent and capable as the girl from the North. If only she was as resilient, as well.

Ever since they entered the Neck, Sera had been coughing nonstop. She seemed to have taken ill. Before they came up the Causeway, Sera had selflessly offered to travel separately from the others so as not to bother them, but Margaery insisted that she ride with them.

Mira Forrester rose from her seat just as Right opened the door. He offered his hand, and she took it, allowing him to help her out of the carriage.
Left appeared a moment later, and he and his brother aided the Queen of Thorns to rise and exit that birdcage on wheels, as she was fond of calling it.

As soon as she was on the ground, Olenna shuddered a bit. The sudden change in temperature was so noticeable it was startling. It did not feel so cold when we first entered the Neck.

"Shall I fetch your shawl, my lady?" Left offered.

Fool, I'd need more than a shawl. Olenna did not give voice to that thought; she merely nodded her head.

As Left went to find her shawl, Right assisted Margaery and Sera down from the carriage. When the two of them were on the same level as Olenna and Mira, Sera stumbled. Mira quickly moved to catch her friend before she could trip.

"Thank you," Sera weakly told her friend, before coughing into her arm.

"Anytime," the lady of Ironrath assured her.

Like Olenna, Sera and Margaery seemed to have detected the shift in temperature. They both shivered the instant they touched the ground. Mira, however, did not seem bothered in the least. That was remarkable, considering how she was garmented differently, as well. Olenna wore a constricting gown that only left her face and hands exposed, and Sera and Margaery wore warm woolen cloaks of sheepskin over their flowing dresses. Mira had forgone such apparel in favor of her usual bare-sleeved gown. Despite this, she did not appear affected by the cold, or to have even noticed it.

When Sera stopped coughing, she held herself for warmth and mumbled "It's freezing."

"You'll get used to this, I assure you," Mira proclaimed confidently, "All of you will."

"Do not mistake my meaning, my dear," Olenna Tyrell pronounced, "But I do not expect to be here long enough that I would even need to accustom myself to the climate."

"I can hardly blame you for thinking so, my lady," Mira Forrester drily contended, "The North is not for everyone. Only the hardy and the determined can take to it."

"It happens that I am both," Margaery claimed with a smirk, "It will take more than a slight chill to dissuade me from my duty."

"I never doubted that, my lady," Mira Forrester said sincerely. Nor did I. A true flower does not yield to frostbite so easily.

Left returned a minute later. He brought back more than his mistress's shawl. He also brought along the party's travelling companions.

Not long after the company of Reachmen entered the Riverlands, they had encountered another company. This one was from the Westerlands, specifically Casterly Rock. At the head of it were Lord Tyrion Lannister and Lady Ellyn Lannister.

At Olenna's insistence, the three of them had supped together that night. At the table, Lord Tyrion and his wife had revealed they were on their way to visit her brother in the North. Lady Olenna's party was also going North, but for different reasons. Since they were headed in the same direction, Olenna had proposed that they travel together. Some new faces can always add some excitement to a long and dull journey.
The following morning, they had merged their parties. The lions had been among the roses since just before they reached the Trident. On the way, Olenna Tyrell discovered that Tyrion and Ellyn Lannister made a rather pleasant couple of travelling companions. As well as a rather pleasant couple in general.

"A little nippy today," the dwarf commented bluntly, reining his courser up beside the Tyrell women. The mare was a special saddle designed to accommodate her master's measurements.

Lady Olenna and her granddaughter had ridden in a carriage all the way from Highgarden. Most highborn ladies generally preferred that method of travel. That was just one more area in which Ellyn Lannister was an exception. She currently rode beside her husband atop a large brown destrier.

If her destination was too far to walk, she always travelled by horse. She claimed to feel much more comfortable in the open on her own mount than seated in a small, cramped compartment. She also japed that she always hit her head on the doorframe of a carriage, anyway. I could believe that. She is taller than Left and Right, and neither of them could ever sit up straight in a carriage.

"Really?" Lady Ellyn stated jokingly, gazing at their surroundings, "I hadn't noticed, my love."

"Neither did I," Mira Forrester proclaimed, though she was only partly jesting. Her skin was the only one free of goose prickles at this time.

Although they had technically been in the North for several days, Mira had informed everyone beforehand that the Neck was not like the rest of her homeland. It was a generally temperate landscape. Sure enough, the climate as they came up the Causeway had actually been favorable to an extent. But after clearing the marshes, warmer clothing became obligatory for those of them who were born outside the North. Which was everyone save for Margaery's favorite handmaiden. It would seem Lady Mira is more naked than the rest of us.

Presently, Lady Olenna and the others were clustered together in the courtyard of Moat Cailin. The moat's stableboys were assisting the riders with their mounts. A pair of them came up to Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn. One offered his hand to Lady Ellyn, but she gently refused it and climbed down from her mount by herself.

When she was on her feet, Ellyn Lannister casually made her way over to her husband's courser. Lord Tyrion was in the midst of climbing off his own mount when his wife crept up behind him, took ahold of him by the arms, and lifted him out of his saddle.

For a moment, Tyrion appeared somewhat startled by this abrupt action. Then he eased down and laughed in amusement. Ellyn chuckled with him as she playfully swung him through the air, embraced him firmly, and set him down on the ground delicately.

Olenna observed this interaction between the two Westerlanders. She was not quite certain what to make of it. On the one hand, they were behaving a little like children. She and Luthor had never been so devious. On the other hand… they were being quite affectionate to each other. She and Luthor had never been so tender in public. Then again, Luthor had been too much of an oaf to properly display such feelings in private, either. At least he was not too much of an oaf to sire children. Then again, he gave me an oaf son and two oaf daughters.

Truthfully, Olenna Tyrell loved her husband and children greatly, but she had always been critical of them. She was critical of everyone, but never to the degree of harshness and cruelty.

While the pair of stableboys led away Lord Tyrion's courser and Lady Ellyn's destrier, a young woman came to the two spouses. Olenna recognized her as one of Ellyn Lannister's handmaidens. She had not bothered to learn her name, though.

Be that as it may, Olenna did know the name of the small boy the handmaiden was currently holding in her arms. He was Duncan Lannister, the only child of Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn. And perhaps the future Lord of Casterly Rock. Provided the Kingslayer still only has girls.

When she reached her mistress, the handmaiden carefully transferred young Duncan from her arms to his mother's. Lady Ellyn smiled down at her son, who giggled and grinned back.

"He didn't give you any trouble, I assume?" Lord Tyrion asked the handmaiden rhetorically.

"No trouble at all, milord," the handmaiden affirmed giddily, "He slept most of the way."

"Thank you, Greta," Ellyn told her handmaiden appreciatively, "You may go now."

The handmaiden – Greta, apparently – bowed respectfully and went to see to her other duties.

Tyrion Lannister gazed up at his son in his wife's arms and inquired "Do you think he's warm enough?"

"He should be," Ellyn Lannister contended, looking down at Duncan, "I had Greta dress him in two layers of thick clothing this morning. But if you are concerned that that might not be enough, I'll hold him close to my chest."

Tyrion smirked and nodded his head in approval, saying cockily "That always keeps me warm. At night at least."

Ellyn's cheeks flushed red for a moment, but immediately after, she scoffed at her husband's remark. Mira Forrester and Margaery snickered a bit, too.

The Queen of Thorns herself grinned, but not because she was amused by that innuendo. She grinned because she was strangely pleased by how Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn treated each other. They were so tranquil, so spirited, and so loving.

Her grandfather was the kennelmaster of his. Moreover, she is tall enough to match one and one-half of him in height. Yet they have found happiness with one another.

Lady Olenna took that as a sign. If a lion of Casterly Rock could be happily wed to a hound of Clegane's Keep, just about any match in Westeros could produce the same fine results. That included the joining of a wolf and a rose. As it happened, that was precisely why Olenna and Margaery were there in the first place.

Olenna Tyrell was brought out of her momentary meditation when Margaery placed a soft hand on her shoulder. She swiftly turned to face her granddaughter, who was glancing in another direction and told her excitedly "Grandmother, they're here!"

Lady Olenna looked in the same direction as Margaery, and she saw straightaway who "they" were. A small company of people had just entered the vicinity. Among that company were two young men with the same type of hair as Margaery. My, how they've grown.

The Queen of Thorns smiled at her grandsons as they and their associates came nearer. Soon enough, the distance between the two groups was reduced to nothing.

Loras went directly to Margaery. He hugged their sister warmly and placed a kiss on her cheek.
Willas, however, greeted their grandmother first. He dipped his head to her, she dipped hers in response, and then he brought her into a kind embrace.

"It would appear the Reach's bouquet of roses is whole again," Mira Forrester jokingly commented. Olenna allowed herself a scoff. That girl has more wit than I gave her credit for.

"Not quite whole, my lady," Loras countered, not unkindly, "Our brother Garlan is in Dorne right now."

That statement incited Olenna to reflect on the current whereabouts of her son's children. One of them was located in a land composed of miles upon miles of sand. The other three were in a land where it snowed year-round. Neither offers hospitable conditions for a flower to grow or flourish.

But Growing Strong were not House Tyrell's words without reason. My grandchildren are not pansies. They are roses, and our roses can take root and thrive anywhere.

"With him down there and three of us up here, Father and Mother must feel rather lonesome," Willas conjectured.

"Actually, they're more worried than lonesome," Margaery informed her brothers, "Father is, at any rate. He was more than a little reluctant for us to make this journey."

"Because of what happened north of the Wall last month?" Loras presumed.

"Just so," Margaery confirmed, "The raven carrying the news of that fiasco reached Highgarden mere days before we were scheduled to set off. Once he read the missive, Father tried to persuade us to consider cancelling our departure. Or postponing it, at the very least."

"Naturally, we were not about to halt our plans simply because your lord father misplaced his nerves," Olenna Tyrell proclaimed adamantly, "Once I convinced him to listen to reason, he agreed to let us go on our way."

"Under the condition that we take with us twice as many guards and servants as we initially intended," Margaery added in.

Willas seemed to be exasperated by that remark, and Loras appeared entertained by it.

"Surely Father does not honestly believe a few more soldiers would make any difference if the Night's King chose to send his forces south," the Knight of Flowers pronounced sardonically.

"No more difference than postponing the trip would have," Willas debated, "If anything, delaying the journey north would have been counterproductive. The threat of the Long Night becomes greater with every passing second. The sooner one gets to the North, the longer they will be there in safety."

"That is precisely why we chose to go north," Tyrion Lannister proclaimed from a few feet away, "Knowing what is awaiting the Seven Kingdoms in the near future, coming to this region now instead of later is much more sensible."

"Well, if you do not mind my asking, why are you here, my lord?" Willas enquired.

"I will tell you later, over a cup of wine," was all the dwarf said in response. Ah, personal reasons. In any case, Willas seemed content with that answer.

While the Tyrells had their brief reunion, Lady Ellyn had one of her own. Two of the individuals that had accompanied Willas and Loras were the tallest man and the tallest woman Olenna had ever seen. They could only have been Gregor Clegane and his lady wife Dacey of House Mormont.

Lady Ellyn handed Duncan to Lord Tyrion so that both of her arms were free. She then moved to embrace her elder brother and sister-by-law. Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey took her in what could have been regarded as a bear hug. With an actual bear.

When she first met Ellyn Lannister, Olenna Tyrell had been impressed by her tremendous size. Yet even Lady Ellyn was diminutive next to the elder of her brothers and his wife. Standing next to them, Lady Olenna noted that Lady Dacey stood at least four inches higher than Ellyn, and Lord Gregor was over a full foot taller than his sister.

Olenna could not help but wonder how tall their children would grow to be. In all three of their house's generations and before, every Clegane had been big-boned.

It appeared that attribute would apply to the members of its fourth generation, too. After all, Duncan Lannister was at least a third larger than the average babe, and his father was a dwarf. With Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey… there was no telling how big their brood would ultimately grow to be.

Years ago, the giants relocated south of the Wall. Soon they may encounter more of their own kind who were born on this side.

After exchanging pleasantries with Ellyn Lannister, Gregor and Dacey Clegane paid their respects to her husband, as well. They had to kneel to even be close to the same level as him. Fortunately, Lord Tyrion did not seem to be so self-conscious about his stature.

Lord Tyrion was not one for embraces. Unless it's his wife, of course. So he simply shook hands with the Mountain and the Bear Islander. At the same time, he managed to hold onto Duncan securely with his left arm.

"And who is this handsome rascal?" Lord Gregor muttered wittily, gesturing to the small boy.

Obviously, that question had been a rhetorical one. Lord Gregor did not actually require an answer. Nevertheless, Lord Tyrion bluntly replied with "Just a little something your dear sister made. With my assistance, that is."

"Well, you both did fabulous work," Lady Dacey perceived, humoring the men.

"We like to think so," Lady Ellyn pronounced candidly.

As far as Olenna Tyrell knew, this was Lord Gregor Clegane's first time seeing his youngest nephew. According to what the Lannisters had told her on their journey north, the Mountain had not been in the Westerlands since a year before Ellyn became pregnant. Even then, he had not been able to visit her at Casterly Rock. He had, however, been able to see her sometime after her wedding. It's an honorable man who goes to such length to make time for his family.

When Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey were finished becoming acquainted with their nephew, they both rose back to their full height. The Mountain finally turned his attention to the individuals that had begun their trek in the Reach. He and his lady wife nodded their heads in polite acknowledgment.

"My ladies," Gregor Clegane proclaimed, gazing around at Olenna, Margaery, Mira, and Sera, "On behalf of the Legion without Banners and Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell, I officially welcome you to Moat Cailin and the North."
"In Lady Forrester's case, we welcome you back," Dacey Clegane slyly added in.

Mira Forrester scoffed at the older woman's jape and commented "I thank you for that."

"As do the rest of us," Margaery spoke in a firm and authoritative tone. She had practiced using her "lady's voice" extensively on their way north. She may or may not need it here.

"Indeed," Olenna Tyrell conceded, gazing around at her surroundings, "I had heard Moat Cailin was a ruin. If so, it is the most remarkable ruin I have ever seen."

"Would you care to see more of it, Grandmother?" Willas suggested.

"Perhaps," the Queen of Thorns answered her grandson, "So long as doing so would not consume too much of our time."

Loras was confused. She could tell by the expression on his face. Mace wore that countenance quite often. "Are you in a hurry, Grandmother?"

"No, but I am on an errand," Olenna Tyrell disclosed, "I told Margaery I would take her to see her betrothed as soon as humanly possible. Winterfell is our final destination, not Moat Cailin. Lingering here or anywhere else would cause us a great setback."

"Not so, my lady," a new voice declared.

Olenna could not see who it belonged to or where it originated from. She furrowed her brow and asked sternly "Who said that?"

A plump young man stepped out from the small crowd that had accompanied Lord Gregor into the courtyard. He appeared to become rather nervous at being addressed by the Queen of Thorns directly. That was hardly new. Olenna Tyrell had a talent of making all manners of men shiver. Be that as it may, this man looked as though timidity was second-nature to him.

"Your name, boy?" Olenna queried.

"T-Tarly, if it please you," the lad revealed with a slight stutter.

She recognized the name immediately. Another Reachman. "You must be Lord Randyll's."

"Aye, my lady," the plump man confirmed, standing up straight and speaking with a little more confidence now, "I am Samwell Tarly of Horn Hill, personal notary to Lord Gregor and scribe of the Legion without Banners."

"Then you must have your work cut out for you, young Samwell," Olenna drily observed.

"As you say," Samwell Tarly avowed.

After a short pause, Olenna said inquisitively "Just what did you mean a moment ago? Why would remaining here for any length of time not impede our progress to the heir of Winterfell?"

"Because Robb Stark is not in Winterfell at this time," Samwell apprised her, "He is here."

That took Olenna by surprise. Margery must have been surprised, too, as she stepped forward and stated inquiringly "He is?"

"He arrived two days past," Lord Gregor Clegane disclosed, "We were just as astounded by his arrival as you are. Normally, he gives us some prior notice. In spite of that, he had his reasons for "What reasons might those be?" Olenna enquired.

"The day before he got in, he made what you would call a last-minute decision," the Mountain recounted, "Essentially, the decision involved how he would make his first impression on you."

"How so?" said Margaery.

It was Lady Dacey who gave response: "He claimed that since his intended was coming all the way to the North to call upon him, he felt obligated to escort her through his lands to his home himself."

Olenna and Margaery were astonished by that revelation. Albeit astonished in a good sense. I have not even met the boy, and already I begin to like him.

"If you say so, it must be," Tyrion Lannister interjected, "After all, you of the Reach know all about chivalry,"

That remark yielded a number of snickers from the people in the area.

"So, where is Lord Robb?" Margaery inquired.

"He is preoccupied with a task at the moment," Gregor Clegane pronounced, "But you will see him soon enough, my lady. That much I promise you."

"Very well, my lord," Margaery coincided with a polite grin.

Just then, Sera broke into another loud round of coughing. She looked as though she would collapse. Luckily, Mira caught her before she did.

"Is she alright?" Loras inquired in concern.

"Yes, I… I'm fine," Sera claimed. Not very convincing.

"Forgive her," Mira beseeched everyone present, "I believe she has contracted a fever."

"It would appear so," Gregor Clegane muttered in agreement. He turned to his notary and ordered him "Samwell, escort Lady Sera to Maester Kennick's office. Her fever could worsen or spread if left untreated."

"It will be done, my lord," the heir to Horn Hill assured the Mountain. He made his way over to the coughing handmaiden and took her from Mira Forrester. Sera seemed to have difficulty standing, so he gently pulled her arm over his shoulders. After that, he told her softly "This way, my lady."

"Thank you, ser," Sera Durwell said gratefuly, grinning up at him. He flushed and solemnly led her out of the area.

Olenna and the others watched in silence as the two of them left. Once they were gone, Margaery turned to the tallest person there and muttered eagerly "So, Lord Gregor, I believe you mentioned the possibility of giving us a tour of the moat."

"I did," Gregor Clegane affirmed, "Are you still interested in having the tour?"
"By all means, go ahead," Olenna Tyrell bade him, wrapping her shawl around her shoulders, "So long as it culminates in us meeting the heir to Winterfell."

"I shall endeavor to please," Lord Gregor proclaimed, giving the Queen of Thorns a light smile, which she was oddly compelled to return. "He should be finished with his task by then."

Olenna believed him. I know a man of his word when I see one. Such men are a rarity in these times.

Over the next few hours, Gregor Clegane gave Olenna Tyrell, Margaery Tyrell, Tyrion Lannister, Ellyn Lannister, and Mira Forrester a very thorough tour of Moat Cailin. They were accompanied by Dacey Clegane, Willas Tyrell, Loras Tyrell, and everyone else who had come to the courtyard with the Mountain.

Moat Cailin was unique in that it had no singular main building. Instead, its structure was composed of a series of towers within and along the walls.

When the moat was first constructed, there had been a total of twenty towers. Overtime, all but three of them had collapsed. Fortunately, in the time since he had gained lordship of the moat, Gregor Clegane had managed to rebuild all seventeen of the fallen towers. He had also refurbished and reinforced the surviving three.

They started the tour at the Gatehouse Tower. One of the original three, it had served as Lord Gregor's main accommodations in the early days of his domain over the moat. Now it was used as a guardhouse and a base for sentries. That was due to the fantastic view the windows on the south wall gave of the Causeway and the bogs adjoining it.

The Armament Tower came next. This was where the bulk of the moat's weapons and armor were kept. The term "arsenal" hardly did it justice. It was a magnificent assortment of tools and equipment from all over the Known World, not just Westeros.

Next there was the Flour Tower. Despite its ridiculous name, it was one of the most. This was where all the moat's provisions were stored. Teams of professional cooks and bakers worked around the clock to keep the moat's vast population fed. The dishes they produced were impressively broad and tasteful. While they were there, Gregor passed around some bread, salt, and wine to Olenna and the others to ensure that they were protected under guest right.

At the northeast corner was the Worship Tower, one of the more intriguing features of the moat. This was where people went to pay homage to their gods. A godswood could be found just to the north of the tower. A sept was found on the first floor, and the higher levels had space set aside for other faiths, including R'hllor, the Lord of Light. This tower was built right by the moat's harbor, so even the Ironborn and other followers of the Drowned God could practice their religion properly.

Ironically, the Drunkard's Tower was the very next one. This was another of the first three, and nowadays it lived up to its name. It had been made into a tavern, where off-duty Legionnaires and the smallfolk could pass their free time with a skin of wine, a mug of beer, or a tankard of ale. Thoros of Myr could be found going back and forth between this tower and the adjoining one frequently.

At the northeast corner was the Worship Tower, one of the more intriguing features of the moat. This was where people went to pay homage to their gods. A godswood could be found just to the north of the tower. A sept was found on the first floor, and the higher levels had space set aside for other faiths, including R'hllor, the Lord of Light. This tower was built right by the moat's harbor, so even the Ironborn and other followers of the Drowned God could practice their religion properly.

At the northeast corner was the Worship Tower, one of the more intriguing features of the moat. This was where people went to pay homage to their gods. A godswood could be found just to the north of the tower. A sept was found on the first floor, and the higher levels had space set aside for other faiths, including R'hllor, the Lord of Light. This tower was built right by the moat's harbor, so even the Ironborn and other followers of the Drowned God could practice their religion properly.

Ironically, the Drunkard's Tower was the very next one. This was another of the first three, and nowadays it lived up to its name. It had been made into a tavern, where off-duty Legionnaires and the smallfolk could pass their free time with a skin of wine, a mug of beer, or a tankard of ale. Thoros of Myr could be found going back and forth between this tower and the adjoining one frequently.

After this, they came to the Banquet Tower. As the name suggested, this was where Lord Gregor feasted his family, his soldiers, and his household. To be precise, it was meant to feast all those who had time to sit down to eat. A passageway had been established to connect it to the Flour Tower, so service was easier to conduct.
They followed that up with the Knowledge Tower. This was Samwell Tarly's favorite, as the library could be found here. This was also where Gregor's spies and intelligence gatherers would convene to report on all the different crises that had emerged throughout Westeros. Maester Kennick's office and the rookery were here, as well. However, the most interesting aspect of this tower was that it contained a secret passageway which led outside the walls of Moat Cailin. It was basically an emergency escape route, which would only be used in the event that the moat's occupants were forced to flee. Prepared for all possible situations, I see.

The Captains' Tower was where they went next. Here was where Willas, Oberyn Martell, Brynden Tully, Lyn Corbray, and the other top officers of the Legion without Banners – along with their families and their most trusted deputies – had their lodgings. The Red Viper, the Blackfish, and a few more of the more prominent Legionnaires were there when Olenna visited it. She took the time to exchange pleasantries with them, too.

The Meeting Tower was the smallest, and the second closest to the center (after the Lord's Tower). Lord Gregor also spent the least amount of time at this one. He revealed that this was where he and his lieutenants normally convened to discuss matters of precedence (which were also matters of secrecy). Naturally, he did not disclose or elaborate on any of these "matters."

The Lord's Tower was very remarkable. It was the tallest, and the only one where the entirety of the moat could be seen from the top. Lord Gregor, Lady Dacey, their children, and their household resided there. Olenna was glad they did not end up climbing this tower. Climbing long flights of stairs did not agree with her. Lord Tyrion seemed to think the same of himself.

The Smelting Tower was rather fascinating. This was where all of the moat's mining operations were carried out, as well as where Lord Gregor had several creations of his own – primarily cement and concrete – made all throughout the day. This was also where he had his private stores of black powder kept under lock and key. Olenna had to admire how innovative this one was.

The Pleasure Tower came after. Gregor and Dacey were reluctant to approach this one, and Olenna could understand why. As the name implied, the tower was just a fancy brothel. This had been the last tower to be built, and it was only established as a means to "entertain" unwed Legionnaires or visitors to the moat. The Mountain and the Bear Islander actually thought little and less of whores. All the same, the brothel happened to bring in a fairly large amount of income for House Clegane.

They subsequently went to the Healing Tower. This one was designed similarly to a greenhouse or a botanical garden. Dozens of medicinal herbs were grown in half of the rooms. The other half of the rooms had alchemy labs, where the herbs were mixed and tested to determine their specific effects. Because of this, the Legion's medicinal capabilities had expanded dramatically.

While the Lord's Tower was the tallest, the Infantry Tower was a close second. It was also by far the longest and widest. This was where the common soldiers of the Legion had their accommodations. Nearly four thousand men, women, and their families resided there. Despite the vast number, the living conditions were not too overcrowded.

The Children's Tower was the last of the three original ones. Although the Clegane children had their own nursery below their parents' bedroom in the Lord's Tower, this tower was essentially one giant nursery for all the other children in the moat. This was where on-duty Legionnaires left their children while they were working. They left them in the hands of a great number of highly qualified caretakers. Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey's second son, Alyver, was at the front of the building. He was looking after his younger siblings Vallory, Larys, and Torrhen.

The Artist's Tower was equally parts exotic and soothing. This was where some of the more expressive Legionnaires went to hone their love of the arts in their spare time. Some took up mummery. Some painted. Some sculpted. Some sang. The whole building was basically a center of discovery and talent.

The Reproach Tower was aptly named. It was the dreariest and least crowded of the towers. This was where criminals, dissidents, traitors, and even defiant Legionnaires were taken to be chastised. While there were no instruments of extreme torture to be seen anywhere, there were plenty of whips, chains, and other unpleasant devices. They did not stay long at this one, thankfully.

The Boarder Tower was yet another building designed to house certain people. However, it was intended to serve as a place of temporary residence. People who were simply visiting the moat or passing through the region were given rooms there. The top floors were set aside for highborn guests. As such, Olenna, Margaery, Mira, Tyrion, Ellyn, and Duncan would be given rooms up there for the duration of their stay.

The Parish Tower did not seem very interesting at first, but it turned out to be curiously complex. There were three small villages on the lands immediately north of Moat Cailin. All of them had been built during Lord Gregor's tenure, and all three were continuing to grow alongside the moat. Since all three were located within the perimeter of the moat's concrete wall, they only had so much room to develop. This tower was devoted to optimizing whatever space was left and ensuring that all three villages benefited from it fairly.

The final tower they visited was the Novice Tower. This was where the Legion's newest recruits were sent when they first arrived at the moat. There they were put through a series of trials designed to test their mental, physical, and intellectual proficiencies. It was an exhaustive and exhausting process, but it effectively determined where each Legionnaire would be most useful in the organization.

In the end, even the Queen of Thorns could not deny that Moat Cailin was an extremely impressive holdfast. Even Highgarden was not so expertly coordinated as the moat on a regular basis. Lord Gregor certainly knows how to make the most of his land.

Despite how rewarding and enlightening this excursion had been, Olenna Tyrell had not forgotten the pledge the Mountain had given her when they began. Luckily, neither had he. After they cleared the Novice Tower, Lord Gregor announced "Now, let us go find the Young Wolf."

"'Young Wolf?'" Margaery noted in mild perplexity.

"That's the moniker he uses for Robb Stark," Dacey informed the younger woman. Well, considering the sigil of House Stark, that would be appropriate. At least it sounds respectful. Some aren't so fortunate to have such a fierce moniker. As I recall, there are some who are fond of calling Mace 'the Fat Flower.'"

A few moments after they left the Novice Tower, Samwell Tarly finally rejoined the company.

"Lady Sera will be fine," he notified them, "Maester Kennick says she does indeed have a fever. She just needs to rest for now."

"Alright," Margaery acknowledged, breathing a sigh of relief, "Thank you for seeing to her needs."

"It was no burden, my lady," Samwell assured her.

Gregor Clegane then stepped up to his notary and asked him "Sam, have you seen Robb?"

The plump boy from Horn Hill thought a moment, and then he proclaimed "Yes, I believe I spotted him by the training yard on my way here."
"Near the training yard or in it?" Dacey Clegane enquired.

"Hard to say, my lady," Samwell admitted, "I suppose there is only one way to find out."

"Quite," the Mountain coincided. He looked around at everyone else in the vicinity and declared "If no one has any objections, we will make for the training yard."

Unsurprisingly, there were no objections. Especially not from Margaery Tyrell or her grandmother. As such, the company swiftly headed for the moat’s training yard.

When they got there, they saw that it was being used. Two young men – grown boys, really – were in the center of the ring. They were in the midst of a fierce duel.

Both duelists wore chainmail over doublets of boiled leather, iron-studded breeches, woolen gloves, spiked boots, and plated greathelms that covered their heads entirely. Each was armed with a bastard sword.

Even before Olenna and her company arrived, they had not been alone. The duel was being observed by several people who stood in various places along the perimeter of the ring. Two of the spectators wore the exact same set of armor as the fighters. One of those two sat on a bench with his arms folded. The other was notably tall, and he stood beside a middle-aged knight whose cheeks were covered with white whiskers.

There were three more men in the area. One of them wore a hauberk, trousers, and a swore at his waist. He was older than the other two men put together. The second man was clad entirely in the white armor of the Kingsguard. The third was dressed rather elegantly, and he had short hair and a close-cropped beard with the distinctive black coloring of the Baratheons. Olenna identified him almost straightaway.

There were two women. One was a little older than Margaery. She had flaming red hair and a physique may have looked more natural on a man. Olenna could not tell if she was highborn or lowborn. Perhaps neither.

The other woman appeared to be a chambermaid. What she was doing there, Olenna could not venture a guess. Then she noted that the maid was sitting by three mounds of what appeared to be fur. Half of her attention was directed at the duel; the other half on the piles of fur. Maybe she is here to ensure that no one in the yard freezes his arse off.

One of the duelists was slightly taller than the other. Both of them were armed with a bastard sword. The taller of them held his in both of his hands. The shorter one only used one hand. While the taller one's attacks were based more on strength, the shorter one's tactics relied more on agility and speed.

Each has his own gifts and his own flaws. I wonder which of them shall triumph.

About three minutes later, Olenna found out. The shorter boy managed to knock the taller boy flat onto his back. Before he could rebound or attempt to counterattack from the ground, his opponent stood above him with his sword pointed directly at his neck.

Everyone in the area watched in tense silence and waited for something to happen.

Ultimately, the boy on the ground let out a frustrated sigh, held one of his hands in the air, and declared glumly "I yield."

The red-haired girl, the maid, and the elderly knight cheered, whilst the Kingsguard and the young man with the black beard frowned a bit.

The victor of the duel moved his sword away from his victim and offered his free hand in its place. The loser grudgingly accepted the gesture and allowed his bester to pull him back to his feet.

The white-whiskered knight then entered the ring and approached the duelists. When he was close enough that they could touch him with the tips of their swords, he folded his arms and asked both of them "Would you say this was a fair match?"

"More than fair, Ser Rodrik," the shorter one proclaimed.

"Fair as it could be," the taller one disputed.

Judging by the former boy's addressing of the knight, Olenna deduced that he must have been Ser Rodrik Cassel, the master-at-arms of Moat Cailin. Loras had mentioned Ser Rodrik in one of his letters. He claimed the Northerner was a formidable warrior… for a man of his age. Dear Loras, as vain as he is skilled in combat.

Ser Rodrik turned to the taller duelist and queried "Can you tell me what you did wrong, Your Grace?"

Your Grace? Olenna was aware that Crown Prince Jasper Baratheon was being fostered at Moat Cailin. But when she entered the training yard, she had not suspected for a moment that he was one of the duelists. That would explain the presence of the Kingsguard knight and Lord Renly.

"Yes," the taller duelist retorted. He raised up his left arm, took ahold of his helm, and pulled it off. In doing so, he revealed the face of a black-haired, blue-eyed lad of fourteen. He glared down at his headgear in disdain and mumbled "I agreed to wear this damnable helm."

"The helm is the whole point of this exercise," Rodrik Cassel reminded him.

"Well, it is not a very practical point, Ser Rodrik," Prince Jasper contended, turning back to the Northern knight, "The only opening is a thin slit. Would not a helm with genuine eyeholes be more practical?"

"Eyeholes are just big enough for an arrow to sail through," the tallest armored boy professed from the sideline.

"Be that as it may, the slit is inadequate to see properly," Jasper claimed, "So much so that it greatly impairs my field of vision."

"It impairs mine, as well," his as-of-yet unmasked opponent disclosed, "The key is to find a way to compensate for your loss of sight."

"In return for what?" Jasper Baratheon countered, holding up his helm again, "What possible advantage would be worthy of fighting in near-total blindness?"

"The assurance that you will not lose your head," Rodrik Cassel pronounced, "In the heat of battle, men will aim for any part of their enemies which they can reach. Most of them tend to aim for the upper body, the head in particular. If ever you are surrounded by overwhelmingly greater numbers, my prince, you will need all the defenses you could muster. This type of helm will repel the blow of any weapon, be it sword, axe, mace, spearhead or even arrowhead."

Prince Jasper stood in silence for a minute, reflecting over the validity of those points. After that, he stated "While I appreciate the assurance of keeping my head, let us suppose my opponent catches on to how impenetrable my helm is. Logically, once he realizes that my head is not a vulnerable target, he would simply redirect his focus to another part of me. If I cannot see him clearly, how am I to know where his attack will come from?"

"Once you have mastered seeing as plainly with the helm as you would without it, we will move on to defending yourself with it on," Rodrik Cassel replied.

"We may be at this a while then," Jasper bluntly remarked.

Ser Rodrik Cassel frowned at that and muttered "No one is forcing you to learn these techniques, Your Grace. As I recall, you yourself asked me to teach you alongside these other lads. If the exercises seem unreasonable, you have every right to pull out."

Jasper looked indignant, as though Ser Rodrik had just called him a eunuch. However, he did not lose his temper. He merely smirked and murmured "Stags do not give up so easily, my good ser. If there is one thing I've learned from my royal father, it is that no one ever gets anywhere without trying. You can rest assured; I will continue to try until I succeed."

That seemed to please Ser Rodrik. He grinned at the black-haired boy and stated "I've no doubt you will, Your Grace."

"In any case, Ser Rodrik does not undershoot the importance of having protection for one's head," the largest armored boy contended, "My uncle Sandor did not wear a helm at the Battle of Fair Isle. Look what happened to him."

"An excellent point," the boy who defeated Prince Jasper conceded. Olenna was not yet certain who he was, but she believed she had figured out the largest boy's identity.

Her assumption was proven correct a moment later, when Rodrik Cassel looked up at the boy and proposed "Would you care to go next, Master Rickard?"

"Ordinarily, I would be glad to oblige, Ser Rodrik," Rickard Clegane remarked. He then removed his helm, exposing his youthful yet stout façade. He could not have been older than twelve namedays, but in terms of stature, he was already a man grown. After he took off his helm, Rickard looked towards the entrance of the yard and observed "However, it would seem we have visitors."

He was the first to acknowledge the arrival of Lord Gregor, Lady Olenna, and their companions. The others in the training yard were quick to do the same.

"Indeed we do," Jasper Baratheon concurred. Holding his helm under one arm and his sword in the other, he made his way over the large crowd that had assembled at the mouth of the yard. His uncle Renly, the Kingsguard knight, and Rickard Clegane accompanied him.

When he came near, Olenna saw that Rickard was the fifth tallest person there, after his father, his mother, and his aunt. Right and Left may have been a little taller, but they had not accompanied Olenna on her tour of the moat. Since they were not with her at this time, she could not compare their height to Rickard's.

Olenna Tyrell, Margaery, Mira, Tyrion, Ellyn, and everyone who had made the journey north with them dipped their heads in respect as the Crown Prince approached them.

"There is no need for that here," Jasper Baratheon humbly told them, "In the training yard, we are all equal in status."

_The only place in the realm where you can knock a prince on his arse and everyone jests about it._
Jasper took a moment to introduce the Kingsguard knight. He apprised the newcomers "This is my sworn shield, Ser Arys Oakheart."

I thought he had the look of a Reachman. Olenna Tyrell stepped forward and presumed "You are the son of Arwyn Oakheart of Old Oak, are you not?"

"One of her sons, yes," the knight in white confirmed.

Olenna smiled lightly and declared "Lady Arwyn is a close friend of mine."

"I know, Lady Olenna," Ser Arys pronounced, returning the smile, "My lady mother speaks fondly of you quite often."

And the rest of the time, she is probably telling the secrets I shared with her when we were girls. Is that what you mean to say? Olenna did not think Arwyn Oakheart would actually tell anyone those secrets. The two of them had been friends since they were younger than Margaery.

Despite Jasper's dismissal of customary royal greetings, Margaery remembered her courtesies. She hastily curtsied and told the black-haired boy "It is an honor to meet you, my prince."

"Likewise, Lady Margaery," Prince Jasper proclaimed cordially.

Olenna and her granddaughter were stunned. She did not even have a chance to introduce herself yet.

"How did you-?" Margaery began.

"Permit me this interruption, my lady," Jasper Baratheon politely cut in, "But one look at Willas and Ser Loras, another look at you, and it is not hard to tell you are their sister. Far as I know, they only have one."

Margaery chuckled at that. "You are rather observant, Your Grace."

"When women are involved, he always is," the winner of the duel cheekily proclaimed, "If only he were so observant in the yard. Then he might win a little more often."

Rickard Clegane, Renly Baratheon, and some of Lord Gregor's affiliates laughed at that. Jasper just rolled his eyes and muttered "One of these days, it'll be me helping you off the ground."

"I'll believe that when it actually happens," the triumphant duelist uttered drily. It was here that he finally took off his helm. In doing so, he exposed a mass of dark brown hair, which was fastened in a hairnet. He removed the net and shook his head to let his hair return to its normal length. He appeared to have seen six and ten namedays.

Margaery leaned over to the Queen of Thorns and whispered "Could that be him, Grandmother?"

He does have the traditional coloring of the Starks. But I remember being told that all of Lord Eddard's sons take after their mother in appearance. Then again, one cannot believe everything one hears.

"Let us find out directly," Olenna proposed. Margaery nodded compliantly.

The Queen of Thorns and her granddaughter broke off from the rest of their company and walked to the center of the training yard. As they neared the boy with dark brown hair, he bowed his head and greeted them with "Good day, my ladies."
"Good day to you, my lord," Margaery bade him accordingly.

He paused at that, grimaced, and murmured "Forgive me, but I am no lord."

"Not yet," Olenna commented, taking note of his reaction.

"Not ever, most like," the lad refuted gloomily.

At that moment, the red-haired girl crept up behind him and placed her hands on his biceps. He looked back and smiled at her. She smiled back and remarked "Well, you just bested a prince in a contest of skill. That could be a sign of good fortune in your favor."

"Or it could mean that I'm a better swordsman than Jasper," he argued.

"Don't forget; survival of the fittest," she told him, "Only those best suited to enduring the world will come to master it."

"This was one duel, Ygritte," he pointed out, "One duel does not determine my place in the world. Aside from that, I told you I would win the duel. Anyway, you knew I would win just as I knew I would win."

The red-haired girl snickered, placed a kiss on the boy's cheek and chided "You know nothing, Jon Snow."

Ah, so this is not the heir to Winterfell after all. Quite the contrary, Olenna realized that she and Margaery had not been speaking with Eddard Stark's son. They had been speaking with his nephew. His bastard nephew, in fact.

To his credit, he is a little more courteous than the average bastard.

While Olenna's face betrayed no indication of emotion, Margaery's suggested she was a little dismayed.

Jon Snow was quick to notice this. He asked in concern "Are you unwell, my lady?"

"Oh, no, ser," Margaery hastily claimed, "Not at all. When I first saw you, I... I thought you were someone else."

She did not have to clarify who "someone else" was. Evidently, the bastard boy already knew who, as he scoffed and uttered "Think nothing of it, my lady. You are not the first to mistake me for my cousin."

It should come as no surprise that he knew we were looking for Robb Stark. The marriage contract between his cousin and my granddaughter is practically common knowledge in these parts.

"He's much too handsome, anyway," a cocky voice from the side of the yard called out.

Olenna turned in the direction of that voice. The fourth armored boy had just risen from his bench. He was making his way over to the Queen of Thorns, Margaery Tyrell, Jon Snow, and his red-haired flame, Ygritte.

When he was less than three feet from all of them, he stopped, tilted his head slightly, and declared to Margaery "I believe I am the one you wished to see, my lady."

At that, he proceeded to remove his helm. Beneath that headpiece was a head of short auburn hair and a pale face that had seen sixteen namedays. He held a grim, stoic countenance for about ten seconds. Then he broke into a benign smile and declared in serious tone "Robb Stark, son and heir to Lord Eddard of Winterfell, at your service."

In response, Margaery took two steps forward, grinned at the heir to the North, and announced "Margaery of House Tyrell, only daughter to Lord Mace of Highgarden. I am delighted to make your acquaintance, my lord."

"Much appreciated, my lady," Robb Stark returned genially. He walked up to Margaery and placed a chaste kiss on each of her cheeks. She flushed at first, but then she giggled in pleasant surprise. Robb told her and her grandmother "I hope you enjoy your time in the North. I will do everything in my power to make your stay as comfortable as possible."

"Thank you, my boy," Olenna Tyrell stated gratefully. Margaery merely continued to smile.

If that smile is any indication, Margaery's stay may turn out to be exceptionally long. Already, we are off to a fine start.

"Have you been around the moat yet?" Jon Snow queried.

"Yes, Lord Gregor gave us a comprehensive tour," Margaery disclosed.

"Well, I wish to apologize for not presenting myself to you until this moment," Robb Stark said sincerely, "Had I known you would arrive today, I would have been there to greet you myself."

"You needn't explain yourself, my lord," Margaery asserted, "Lord Gregor told us you were busy with a task."

"What a task it was," Olenna commented sarcastically, gazing around the training yard.

"Oh, this isn't what he meant," Robb Stark revealed, "I was seeing to a task, but it involved something more than clashing steel."

"Something a little more mundane than swordplay," Jon Snow claimed, "But even more rewarding."

"What?" Margaery queried in interest.

Neither boy replied straightaway. First they looked to each other, and then Robb asked "Would you really like to know?"

"Absolutely," Margaery avowed.

Robb and Jon simultaneously raised their chins upward and gave a sharp whistle.

Out of the corner of her eye, Olenna Tyrell could see the maid sitting by the three piles of fur. All of a sudden, the piles of fur started… moving.

Olenna soon discovered that the piles of fur were not mere piles after all. They were live wolves. The two smaller wolves bounded over to Robb Stark and Jon Snow. Robb's wolf was mostly grey, whereas Jon's was white as fresh-fallen snow. The largest wolf got to her feet, but she stayed near the maid.

"Allow me to introduce Grey Wind," Robb announced, gesturing to the wolf by his side.
"And this is Ghost," Jon pronounced.

Olenna and Margaery watched as Ygritte reached down and scratched Ghost behind his ears. Despite his menacing exterior, he growled like a puppy at this friendly action.

Margaery seemed to get an idea. She took a tentative step closer to Grey Wind and outstretched her hand. The wolf snarled and bore his fangs, causing her to hesitate. Robb knelt beside his wolf and muttered sternly "You be nice to her, understand?"

After that, Grey Wind seemed to settle down. He allowed Margaery to approach him and place her hands on him. She knelt before him and rubbed his muzzle and neck. In response, he licked her hand playfully, eliciting some giggles from her.

This is beyond remarkable. Remarkable or no, it was a definite sign that a wolf and a rose could coexist in happiness.

"They're rather large for their age," Olenna perceived.

"Because they are not ordinary wolves," Jon Snow proclaimed, "They are direwolves."

"Whatever they are, they're amazing," Margaery commented as she continued to pet Grey Wind, "Where did you find them?"

"In the backside of their mother," Ygritte drily replied.

Margaery bit her lip to suppress the urge to laugh. Olenna just shook her head and inquired "And where did you find their mother?"

"In the woods outside of Winterfell," Jon Snow disclosed, "She was heavily pregnant when we first encountered her. She had a litter less than a day after we brought her home."

"So how many wolves do you have now?" Olenna queried.

"Seven," Robb informed her, "Jon, my brothers, my sisters and I each took one of the pups as our own."

"And what of the mother?" Margaery inquired, "Who took responsibility of her?"

"I did, my lady."

Sometime in the last minute, the chambermaid had gotten up and entered the ring of the training yard. The third wolf had accompanied her, and it turned out she was the mother direwolf. That was when Olenna saw just how large the third wolf truly was. She was just a little smaller than a horse. Nevertheless, she seemed remarkably well-trained and civilized.

"And who might you be, my dear?" Olenna inquired curiously

Jon Snow walked over to the young woman and announced "This is Myrna, my personal maid."

Myrna nodded and placed a hand on the mother direwolf's back. She revealed "And this lovely creature is Lyarra."

Chapter End Notes
Note: Some of you are likely wondering what Tyrion and Ellyn are doing in the North in the first place. I will explain that in detail soon enough. They are not there simply because they are visiting with family; I am not so lazy that I chose to just incorporate them without thinking of a practical reason for doing so. Their presence in the North at this point in time will be critical to the main storyline.

Also, some people complained of the notable lack of Gregor in the last four chapters. I assure you this that he and Moat Cailin will appear much more in the next updates than they have in the last four chapters. Also, it will still be a few more chapters before Rhaegar's children reunite at the moat. So don't expect Gregor to make any confessions to the secret council in the immediate future.

Lastly, I am speaking to the one reviewer who keeps requesting for a certain "scenario" to transpire between Gregor, Dacey, and Elia. I'll go ahead and say this: I actually have something of the sort planned in one of my future updates. Just be patient.
Branching Out

Chapter Notes

Note: I survived my first two presentations. They went very well, I am pleased to say. All that is left are a paper due and another presentation on Tuesday, an exam on the following Monday, and then I am finally done with the semester (and academics, as a whole).

Unfortunately, that means there will not be another update until sometime after May 8th. But after that, I will try to go back to updating this story on at least a weekly basis.

Hope you enjoy this chapter. This time, it is from the perspective of an original character.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The Banquet Tower was large enough to feast the entirety of Moat Cailin's occupants. The servants and smallfolk who resided in the moat ate on the first three floors. The common soldiers and their families were allotted the next four floors. The sergeants of the Legion without Banners and their families were given the next two floors. Lord Gregor Clegane, his family, his household, his lieutenants, and any honored guests of the moat always feasted in the Great Hall on the top floor.

For as long as he had been in the North, Jasper Baratheon had eaten nearly every meal in the Great Hall. At any normal meal, he would be seated at the dais with Lord Gregor, Lady Dacey, their children, Sylas Vikary, Erryk Ruttiger, Rodrik Cassel, and Maester Kennick. Jon Snow, Samwell Tarly, Beth Cassel, Brynden Tully, Willas Tyrell, Oberyn Martell, Ellaria Sand, the Sand Snakes, Maron Greyjoy, Lyn Corbray, Lothor Brune, his uncle Renly Baratheon, his great uncle Gerion Lannister, his second cousin Joy Hill, Smalljon Umber, Tormund Giantsbane, and Tormund's children (if they bothered to show up) would be seated at a large circular table below the dais.

Ser Arys Oakheart was always present at each meal. But he never sat at the dais or the table. Along with a rotating number of Clegane guards, he always stood by the wall. Specifically, he stood at the wall directly behind Jasper's seat. For as long as the prince sat, the white knight never moved from his post. Jasper had never seen him eat, but he knew Ser Arys must have had his own meals on a lower floor in the Banquet Tower when he was off-duty.

Allard Seaworth would typically be there, as well. But Allard was currently busy across the Narrow Sea, supervising the Mad King's children with ninety-nine of his countrymen. Until he returned, Uncle Renly would be speaking for the Stormlands on Lord Gregor's secret council. If only he took the affairs of the Legion as seriously as Allard. In many areas, Allard was a much better representative, though Renly was an adequate substitute.

There were around a score additional chairs at the dais and the table that were usually empty. They were designated for the moat's highborn visitors.

Seven of those chairs were occupied at present. Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell sat beside each other near the head of the table. Olenna Tyrell was seated beside her eldest grandson Willas. At Lady Margaery's insistence, her handmaidens Mira Forrester and Sera Durwell had been seated close to her. Lastly, Jasper's uncle Tyrion Lannister and his aunt Ellyn Lannister were afforded two seats on the right side of the dais.

Lady Margaery Tyrell, her grandmother, and her handmaidens were invited to sup with the Cleganes.

As the future Lord of Winterfell and Warden of the North, Robb had been offered a spot on the dais. He had politely refused, claiming he would prefer to sit beside the woman who would very likely be the future Lady of Winterfell.

As the Crown Prince of Westeros, Jasper was required – forced, more like – to sit on the dais. It would have been unseemly for the heir to the Iron Throne to be seated lower than a noble lord, even if it was in said lord's house. And if said lord has loyally served his liege for the past sixteen years.

So Jasper was always given a seat on the dais. Nevertheless, he would have preferred to have sat at the table. Nearly all his closest friends were at the table. The only one who shared a part of the dais was Rickard Clegane, and Rickard was always on the other end of the dais.

Jasper knew he could have simply requested to be seated closer to Rickard, or better yet, to have Jon and Samwell sit beside him on the dais. But he did not wish to appear displeased with Lord Gregor's accommodations. Nor did he desire to force the Mountain to give out special favors. As such, he chose to stay quiet and not utter a single word of complaint about the seating arrangements.

The seating arrangements were not all bad, in truth. While Jasper was unable to have private conversations with his friends, at least he could have friendly conversations with them from across the room. Oftentimes, these conversations ended up including some of the other people in the Great Hall.

They had one such conversation that night.

During the main course, Willas Tyrell looked up from his place on the table and turned to the right end of the dais, where Tyrion Lannister sat. He called out "So, my lord, about that drink…"

The blond dwarf focused on his attention on the heir to Highgarden. Raising an eyebrow, he queried "What drink?"

"When you arrived earlier today, I asked you why you and Lady Ellyn are in the North," Willas recalled, "You said you would tell me over a cup of wine."

He then picked up his goblet of Arbor gold, held it in the air, and commented "It happens I have a cup now. So do you, as a matter of fact."

When does he not? Despite his stature, Tyrion Lannister had a rather great thirst for drink. It was almost as great as his thirst for knowledge. That is quite advantageous for him. Unlike most drinkers, he knows when to stop drinking. No matter how much alcohol he consumed, Uncle Tyrion never became full-out inebriated. As far as I know, anyway.

"If I might ask, why are you so curious to know of our reason for being in the North?" Aunt Ellyn inquired.

"I am simply curious for curiosity's sake," Willas Tyrell replied. He gazed around the table and muttered "No one ever comes here without reason, even if their reason is something as basic as wanting to see the Legion without Banners in all its glory."
Oddly enough, a great many people have come to Moat Cailin for that exact reason and no other.

"Meaning no disrespect, but that is not what brought us here," Tyrion Lannister bluntly stated.

Ellyn Lannister nodded in agreement and observed "Besides, with word of the Others' return circulating the Seven Kingdoms, I doubt any one would choose to travel this far north just to sightsee."

"Just so, my lady," Samwell Tarly declared from the table below, "Ever since the Night's Watch alerted us of the wight ambush in the haunted forest, many of the moat's residents have decided to relocate to the south. Even before we received that warning, a fair number of them went south in preparation of the next winter. Every day, a few more people leave or consider leaving."

"This close to the end of summer, they cannot be faulted," Oberyn Martell professed.

"Be that as it may, the majority of the Legionnaires are determined to stay here and see the next winter through," Brynden Tully pointed out.

"That is fortunate," Olenna Tyrell remarked, "After the Night's Watch, you are Westeros' secondary line of defense against the White Walkers."

"What you say is true, my lady," Dacey Mormont perceived, "But we are praying daily that the Others do not overcome the Watch. The Night's King and his army will not encounter another formidable adversary until they reach Moat Cailin, and the Legion is only in a position to defend the Neck and everything south of it."

"She is quite correct," Uncle Tyrion agreed, "If the Wall falls, the North will, as well."

"Yet the possibility of that did not discourage you from visiting it, Uncle," Jasper Baratheon noted.

At that statement, most of the heads in the room turned in the prince's direction. A few of them had been engrossed in their supper and had not even been listening to the dialogue. Why is it I'm the only one who gains the notice of a whole room when he speaks? In actuality, he already knew why. It was not because Jasper always had something interesting to say. It was because one day, his word would be regarded as law.

Jasper was used to people dropping everything and giving him their full attention whenever he opened his mouth. Even so, he was not fond of it. Some things are not meant to be heard by all.

"No, dear nephew, it did not," Tyrion said in affirmation, gazing at Jasper from further down the dais.

"Then you're not concerned that the Wall will collapse?" Jasper assumed, leaning forward a bit.

"Unless a sudden heat wave passes over this land, I have no such worries," Uncle Tyrion proclaimed, "It would require the flaming breath of a thousand dragons to melt that structure."

"Tormund's breath might accomplish the same thing," Smalljon Umber japed.

Several people in the room promptly burst into laughter, including Tormund Giantsbane himself. Through his loud guffawing, the wildling uttered cheekily "I'll have you know I clean my teeth at least once every turn of the moon, Smalljon. That's more often than when you bring a woman into your bed."

The heir to Last Hearth scowled, but his grimace vanished almost as quickly as the next round of laughter began. He chuckled alongside the others.

Although both men were making jokes at the other's expense, Jasper knew it was all in good fun. In fact, ever since Tormund Giantsbane was admitted to the Seven Kingdoms, an unlikely friendship had developed between him and Smalljon Umber.

Since Last Hearth was closer to the Wall than any other holdfast in Westeros, it had historically been one of the most frequent targets of wildling raiders. Because of that, the Umbers had built up a hatred of the Free Folk greater than most other houses.

Nevertheless, Smalljon Umber and Tormund Giantsbane had come to respect and appreciate each other's company. Jasper had seen them drink together, spar together, and pray together. Whenever they were out on assignment, each challenged the other to succeed in his task first. They effectively made their goals a type of friendly competition whilst continuing to do their duties.

Interestingly, they were both in pursuit of the same woman, one Brienne of House Tarth, only child and heiress to Lord Selwyn of Evenfall Hall.

Lady Brienne had come to Moat Cailin about two years ago, at around the same time as Jasper. She had enlisted in the Legion without Banners alongside his uncle Renly. Interestingly, Brienne Tarth could often be found in the same place as Renly Baratheon. Jasper wondered why that was. It could not be because she was attracted to him. She never made anything resembling a romantic gesture towards him. And it certainly could not have been because he was attracted to her. Given the way Renly had interacted with Loras Tyrell ever since the Knight of Flowers joined the Legion, Jasper could tell his uncle's interest was not in women.

Brienne Tarth was an enigma in more ways than one. She was among the tallest women Jasper had ever seen. She was not the absolute tallest; that honor belonged to Lady Dacey Mormont, who stood at slightly over seven feet.

Lady Brienne may be the tallest woman from outside the North. Jasper could not say she was with total certainty. Like Brienne, his Aunt Ellyn was much closer to seven feet than six. At a glance, the two of them were approximately the same height. I'd need them to stand back-to-back to render a judgement on who's the taller.

Although Brienne had a similar build to Dacey Mormont and Ellyn Clegane, her façade was much different from theirs. Lady Dacey and Lady Ellyn were undeniably handsome women, but no one could say the same of Lady Brienne. She was plain, dull, and lacking in woman curves. Some of the less tactful occupants of the moat had mockingly daubed her "Brienne the Beauty."

Despite her unappealing appearance, Brienne Tarth was a proficient warrior. She had gotten revenge on all those who scorned her by roughly besting them in the training yard. She had also beaten Ser Loras Tyrell, Lothor Brune, Maron Greyjoy, and many other renowned swordsmen.

Once, she even managed to win a one-on-one bout against Dacey Mormont. Then again, Lady Dacey had given birth to her fifth child just a fortnight beforehand.

Her combat prowess was what primarily drew Smalljon Umber and Tormund Giantsbane to Brienne Tarth. The two of them had a friendly rivalry going on to see which of them could woo her first. They had tried to charm her through various means, such as flattery, flirting, chatting, and even dueling.

Thus far, Brienne had not yet returned either man's affections, or even acknowledged them. Be that as it may, both were genuinely interested in winning her favor. As the heir to his house, Smalljon needed a wife who was tough, sturdy, and strong enough to give him some heirs of his own. Tormund already had four sons and a daughter, but a match between him and Brienne would go a long way to improving relations between the Free Folk and the Stormlands.

Let’s just hope that if Lady Brienne does pick one of them, the other will accept her decision. Last time two men fought over a woman, my father ended up on the Iron Throne.

"If the Wall ever does fall, hopefully it will not be until after we get back," Ellyn Clegane wittily murmured.

That remark caught Jasper's interest, along with the interest of everyone else there.

"What do you mean by that, my lady?" Oberyn Martell enquired.

"I am finally providing an answer to Willas' question," Lady Ellyn disclosed, leaning back in her chair, "The main reason Tyrion and I are in the North… is to pay homage to its greatest landmark."

Several people in the Great Hall seemed stunned by that revelation. Jasper was not one of them. Somehow, I'm not surprised. I might have guessed that that's why they're here. Of all the members of his mother's family, his uncle Tyrion was easily the most adventurous. While Ellyn Clegane was not as outgoing as her husband, she was just as spirited and lively. And every bit as intelligent and cunning.

"You plan to see the Wall, Ellie?" Lord Gregor Clegane asked his sister rhetorically.

"We're going to see the Wall, Greg," Lady Ellyn corrected her brother, smiling at him, "We're greatly looking forward to it, I might add."

"Indeed, my lady," Ser Rodrik Cassel commented, "Now may not be the best to visit the Wall, though."

"Now is the perfect time to visit it, good ser," Tyrion disputed, "With the threat of the Long Night looming so close, we'll never have a better opportunity to see the Wall than the present."

Fair argument, I suppose. Jasper folded his arms and presumed "So that's your purpose for coming North, Uncle? To get a glimpse of the Wall whilst it's available?"

"Not our only purpose," Ellyn pronounced, "We have other affairs to attend to, both before and after we visit the Wall."

"What sort of affairs?" Dacey Mormont inquired.

"Family now; business later," Tyrion responded, "We will accomplish both here at Moat Cailin."

The family objective is obvious. Aunt Ellyn is here to visit her brother and his family. But the business objective…

"What do you mean by business?" Gerion Lannister enquired.

Tyrion gave a smile and professed "Before very long, you will not be the only Lannister in the Legion without Banners, Uncle."

That remark intrigued Jasper. It also intrigued the Mountain. Lord Gregor assumed "You wish to enlist?"
"Oh, yes," Tyrion confirmed with a smirk, "Again, with the threat of the Long Night just around the corner, the world will need people of wit and intellect. Your sister and I easily qualify as such.
We will be of far greater use here at Moat Cailin than we would at Casterly Rock."

"That is true," Gregor contended, returning the smirk, "Truthfully, I've been hoping you would come here to enlist for a while now."

"Actually, Ellyn and I first considered joining the Legion a long time ago," Tyrion apprised him,
"The only thing stopping us was my father."

Can't say I'm surprised. Jasper was quite aware that his grandfather, Lord Tywin Lannister, despised his uncle Tyrion just as much as his mother did. Both of them blamed him for the death of Jasper's grandmother, Lady Joanna Lannister. I've never seen Grandfather smile. Naturally, he wouldn't care less about other people's happiness, least of all Uncle Tyrion's.

"Do not take this the wrong way, Uncle," Jasper candidly remarked, "But I'd have thought Grandfather Tywin would have been pleased to see you leave the Rock."

"Oh, he was, Jasper," Tyrion drily muttered, "But for whatever reason, he was quite reluctant to let me leave with my own family."

By his tone of voice, he must know full well what "whatever reason" actually was.

"He's right," Ellyn pronounced, "It was rather difficult to convince Lord Tywin to permit me to leave the Rock. It was even harder to convince him to allow us to take Duncan along."

Gerion Lannister rolled his eyes and mumbled "Is he still laboring under the misapprehension that you're a hostage of the Rock?"

"Apparently, he is," Ellyn perceived, "But he's finally realized that at times, a hound is just as unpredictable and difficult to control as a lion. Apart from that, I was not about to leave the Rock without my son."

"Neither was I," Tyrion coincided, "Duncan may have been safer in the south, but at least we would be assured of his safety by bringing him with us. While my father is more invested in legacy than family, that does not imply the rest of us should be, as well."

Sometimes I wonder if Uncle Tyrion really is his father's son.

Rickard Clegane grinned lightly and genially declared "Whatever the case, whenever you and Aunt Ellyn get back from the Wall, both of you will be most welcome here, Uncle Tyrion."

It was quaint to hear Rickard call Tyrion "Uncle," too. Partly because it was totally appropriate for him to do so. On that note, it was even more appropriate for him to address Lady Ellyn as "Aunt" than it was for Jasper to.

After all, Rickard's father was the brother to Ellyn Clegane, and Jasper's mother was the sister to Tyrion Lannister. That meant the heir to the Iron Throne and the heir to Moat Cailin were first cousins once-removed. Even stranger than that was the fact that Lord Gregor Clegane and King Robert Baratheon were goodbrothers twice-removed.

Furthermore, both men were uncles to Duncan Lannister, who would quite possibly be the future
Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West.

Another generation or two, and the entire damn population of Westeros might be related to each Tyrion and Ellyn seemed pleased by Rickard's declaration. The dwarf told his wife's nephew in a candid tone "I've no doubt of that, my boy."

Rickard gave a light nod of his head and returned to his food.

A moment later, Lady Mira Forrester politely called out "If you happen to pass through the wolfswood on your way to the Wall, please give my regards to my family, my lord."

"We plan to stick to the kingsroad for most of our journey, so I cannot guarantee we will go anywhere near the wolfswood," Tyrion thought aloud, "Of course, I have no issue without deviating from preset plans. It is something I am oft one to do."

"Apart from that, House Forrester has been a reliable source of ironwood to the crown and the Westerlands," Lady Ellyn professed, "It would not hurt to tell them in person that we appreciate their services."

Uncle Tyrion nodded in agreement. He turned back to Lady Margaery's handmaiden and told her "I will not make any promises, Lady Mira. Nonetheless, if we have the time, we will call upon your lord father at Ironrath."

Mira Forrester smiled sweetly and stated "For that, I thank you, my lord. I haven't seen him or any other member of my family in over a year. Other than the occasional letter, I have had almost no correspondence with them. It would mean very much to me if someone told them in person that I am thinking of them. And that I am well."

I can relate. If she didn't dread the cold so much, Mother would probably have paid me a visit long ago.

Mira Forrester was seated to Margaery Tyrell's left. Robb was on Margaery's right. He turned to look past his intended and focused on her handmaiden. He said inquisitively "Tell me, Mira; when did you last receive a letter from your family?"

The Northern girl sat thinking for a few seconds, and then she replied with "About a fortnight before we departed from Highgarden."

That must have been six weeks past.

Robb gave a smirk and commented "Then it appears you need to be brought up to date on certain current events."

Mira looked perplexed. "How so, my lord?"

"Exactly three weeks ago, Winterfell received a raven from Ironrath," Robb informed her, "As you likely know already, your lord father organized a betrothal between your brother Rodrik and Lady Elaena of House Glenmore. He sent my lord father that raven to ask for his consent to hold the wedding in the near future."

Mira leaned a little closer and queried "How did Lord Eddard respond?"

Robb smiled again and revealed "He gave Lord Gregor his blessing, along with his congratulations. A date has not yet been set, but I can tell you with certainty that sometime within the next two turns of the moon, Rodrik and Elaena will be wed in Ironrath's godswood."
Mira beamed at that news. She seems downright ecstatic. "Thank you for telling me this, my lord."

"It is my pleasure, my lady," the heir to Winterfell asserted.

Like everyone else in the Great Hall, Margaery Tyrell had spent the last minute sitting in silence and observing the exchange of dialogue between her betrothed and her handmaiden. When they were finished talking, Margaery turned to the latter and enquired "Do you think you will attend your brother's nuptials, Mira?"

"Only by your leave, my lady," Mira Forrester responded almost involuntarily, "My duty to you comes first."

Margaery and her grandmother were pleased by the Northern girl's response. The young rose of Highgarden took a moment to wipe her mouth, and then she muttered "I would be glad to give you leave. More than that; I might accompany you."

Margaery took a moment to wipe her mouth, and then she muttered "I would be glad to give you leave. More than that; I might accompany you."

"So would I," Sera Durwell remarked. Samwell had told Jasper how Lady Margaery's other handmaiden had had a fever when she arrived at the moat. She looks rather well for someone who was sick just a few hours ago. This was the first time she had opened her mouth to speak, though. She asked no one in particular "How vast is the difference between how weddings are done in the North and how they are done in the rest of Westeros?"

"The difference is merely a change of setting," Jon Snow interjected, "While followers of the New Gods prefer to have their weddings indoors, the followers of the Old Gods proudly hold theirs out in the open. That, my lady, is the quintessential difference."

"And how many weddings have you attended, Snow?" Robb Stark cockily asked his cousin.

"Just as many as you, Stark," Jon Snow retorted. Jasper was just close enough that he could hear Jon add under his breath "And definitely more beddings."

Jasper scoffed. Ygritte says he knows nothing. What does she know?

"It looks as though you will not need us to give your family your regards after all, Lady Mira," Aunt Ellyn noted.

"I suppose not, Lady Ellyn," Mira Forrester conceded, "By Lady Margaery's good grace, I will be able to do so myself."

MargaeryTyrell flushed a bit at her handmaiden's praise. Robb seemed mildly amused by her reaction. He leaned over and told her "If you do decide to go to Rodrik Forrester's wedding, my lady, I could join you."

"I would be delighted, my lord," Margaery proclaimed, "It would not inconvenience you?"

"Well, my friend Daryn Hornwood will be joined with Alys Karstark of Karhold in about four weeks," Robb thought aloud, "I was thinking of riding out to Hornwood and standing witness to the ceremony. The date of their wedding may conflict with the one for Rodrik and Elaena's, but that is..." not very probable. Other than that, I have nothing great scheduled for the next few months."

"Alright then," Margaery conceded, grinning at the heir to Winterfell once more.

As Robb grinned back, Oberyn Martell started to chuckle. His soft laughter gained a number of odd looks, which he paid no mind to. After a minute of chuckles, the Red Viper lounged in his chair and folded his arms. He uttered in amusement "Isn't this remarkable? Everyone is getting married these days."

That would appear to be the case. At least in the North.

"Oh, not everyone, my prince," Olenna Tyrell countered. She gradually turned to face the young man seated beside her, and she murmured "I have yet to see you drape our house cloak around a lady's shoulders, Willas."

Willas blushes much like his sister, Jasper noted the Reachman's reaction to his grandmother's remark. The prince wondered what reason the older man had for going red in the face. Most likely, either he did not enjoy being the center of attention, or he was not eager to converse on this particular topic.

After the pinkish tint faded from Willas Tyrell's cheeks, he casually gazed over at the far wall. He mumbled bluntly "I am… working towards that goal, Grandmother."

"Is that so?" Lady Olenna queried, seeming unconvinced, "Just what progress have you made in accomplishing it?"

"Truthfully… very little," the heir to Highgarden admitted, "But it is not out of disinterest or laziness that I have not looked for one."

"Then why have you not looked?" the Queen of Thorns almost demanded.

"Because…" Willas tentatively began. Before he said another word, he glimpsed over at Lord Gregor Clegane. Jasper noticed the Mountain gave the Reachman a small nod. What could that mean?

He got his answer a moment later, when Willas Tyrell let out a sigh and disclosed "Lord Gregor believes he has found the most ideal woman for me. He requested that I not consider any other matches until I met her, and I agreed not to."

Lady Olenna was evidently intrigued. She enquired "Who might this 'perfect bride' be?"

Willa hesitated before straightforwardly replying with "I… do not know."

His grandmother scowled at that. "I beg your pardon?"

"It is a complicated matter, Lady Olenna," Gregor Clegane cut in for his comrade, "The woman I have in mind for your grandson would suit him well, but I have not yet secured her hand for him. Until I do, it would be best if the match was kept anonymous. Because in the event that I am unsuccessful, the outcome could be disastrous. But only if the match had been made public beforehand."

There is logic in those words. A firm refusal of a marriage contract with the heir of a Great House could be seen as an insult, unless the refuser's identity was not common knowledge.

Lady Olenna appeared to be having a similar thought, as she eased down a bit. Although she could see the sense in the Mountain's argument, she still seemed somewhat skeptical about this matter. She asked her eldest grandson "How long ago did you and Lord Gregor first discuss this match?"

"The day we met," Willas told her sincerely.

Olenna was flabbergasted, as well as a little shocked. "You entrusted a man you just met with the future of your house?"

"No, I entrusted a man with a sounder reputation than most," Willas firmly debated, "Even ten years later, I trust Lord Gregor's judgment as much as I ever did. I would also remind you, Grandmother, that it was he who first suggested Robb and Margaery's contract."

From the look of things, that one will turn out quite well.

"I will not deny him that," the Queen of Thorns contended, "Even so, I do not appreciate being kept in the dark on anything that directly concerns House Tyrell. I would very much like to know this 'mystery woman.'"

"If it gives you any comfort, Lady Olenna, I intend for Willas to meet her before summer ends," Gregor Clegane professed, "I am simply waiting for the most opportune time. If you are willing to stay in the North until then, I can arrange for you to meet her, too."

Olenna Tyrell thought on that for a minute, and then she nodded and declared "That is acceptable."

"Very good," Lord Gregor commented, glad that he had appeased the Queen of Thorns, "I can all but assure you that you will approve of her."

"I hope I shall, my lord," Olenna Tyrell murmured. A few seconds later, she added in "For your sake."

Jasper was taken aback by those last three words. From the way they were delivered, there was an ominous undertone to them. If he did not know better, he would have supposed that Lady Olenna was trying to be menacing.

He appeared to be the only one in the Great Hall who had that thought, as no one else had stiffened with shock or begun to stare at Olenna Tyrell dumbfoundedly. Even the Mountain was entirely indifferent. Does he realize what Lady Olenna just insinuated?

In actuality, Jasper was not wholly certain what Olenna Tyrell had meant by those three words. If her intention was to be hostile, he would not let that go unanswered. But if she had meant that statement only as a harmless comment, he did not wish to wrongly accuse her in public, either.

Fortunately, he had the means to approach this issue tactfully and subtly.

Prince Jasper Baratheon slowly rose to his feet, gazed down at the heir to Highgarden, and asked him "Willas, ¿su abuela amenazó a lord Gregor?" (Willas, did your grandmother just threaten Lord Gregor?)

Once more, he became the center of attention. This time, he paid no mind to all the eyes on him. At this moment, the only eyes that interested him were the pair that belonged to Willas Tyrell.

Initially, the Reachman seemed surprised by that question. Then he smirked, lightly shook his head, and proclaimed "Oh no. Ella simplemente quería que él supiera que estaría de acuerdo con su arreglo, pero ella estará bastante disgustada si no cumple." (Oh, no. She simply wanted him to know that she will agree to his arrangement, but she will be quite displeased if he fails to deliver.)
Jasper raised an eyebrow and inquired "¿Está seguro de eso?" (Are you certain of that?)

Willas nodded his head and muttered "Mi abuela sólo amenaza a sus enemigos, y créeme; Ella no considera que lord Gregor era su enemigo." (My grandmother only threatens her enemies, and believe me; she does not regard Lord Gregor was her enemy.)

At that, Jasper abruptly felt his skepticism diminish. It was quickly replaced by the feeling of awkwardness. Perhaps I should have considered that first.

Although only members of the Legion without Banners could speak and understand Spanish, nearly half the people in that room were Legionnaires. As such, half of them had heard Jasper's cynical, premature assumption. In front of all those people, he had drawn unwanted attention to himself and Lady Olenna.

Samwell Tarly must have noticed his discomfort. Just then, he gazed up at the dais and told his friend assuredly "Relájate, Jasper. No eres el primer hombre en interpretar erróneamente el significado de Lady Olenna." (Relax, Jasper. You are not the first man to misinterpret Lady Olenna's meaning.)

Willas Tyrell murmured in agreement "Eso realmente tiende a suceder muy a menudo." (That actually tends to happen quite often.)

Jon Snow said sarcastically "¿Por qué no me sorprende?" (Why does that not surprise me?)

Jasper Baratheon then turned back to Willas Tyrell and told him "En cualquier caso, pido disculpas por este malentendido. Es sólo ... bueno, perdóname por decirlo, Willas, pero su abuela es una mujer muy espinosa." (In any case, I apologize for this misunderstanding. It's just... well, forgive me for saying so, Willas, but your grandmother is a very prickly woman.)

The heir to Highgarden snickered a bit and jokingly pronounced "Ahora ya sabes por qué la llaman 'La Reina de las Espinas.'" (Now you know why they call her 'The Queen of Thorns.')

Jasper, Willas, Jon, Samwell, and several of the Legionnaires shared a short round of laughter in response to that witticism. When the laughter subsided, Jasper swiftly sat back down in his chair.

It was then that he saw that Olenna Tyrell was looking right at him.

"Did something amuse you, Your Grace?" she stated inquisitively.

"I suppose so, my lady," Jasper Baratheon alleged, "But that laughter was not at your expense, I assure you."

"I never suggested it was," Lady Olenna refuted. Jasper noticed she was gazing at him with prying eyes, as though she was scrutinizing him. It is almost as though she just now realized I was here.

"Is everything alright, Lady Olenna?" Jasper enquired in concern.

"Everything is fine, my prince," the Queen of Thorns insisted, easing back in her chair, "But while we are on the subject of unions, I am curious to know; who will the next queen of Westeros be?"

Jasper found himself more than a little bewildered. Well, that topic came out of nowhere. Despite the suddenness of that question, he merely shrugged and answered with "If I knew, I would tell you, my lady. Alas, I have not the slightest idea. In all honestly, I have not given the matter very much thought."
"At your age, that is to be expected," Olenna Tyrell murmured, "You are young. But no one is young for long. Sooner or later, we all must make choices. I would encourage you to choose wisely."

"You needn't worry on that, my lady," Jasper proclaimed, "Whenever I start searching for a bride, I will not pick hastily or imprudently."

"I am not simply referring to your future queen," Lady Olenna clarified, "I wish to advise you to be mindful of all your decisions. The ability to make good decisions is ideal in any leader. In your situation, it is vital. In time, every decision you make – and I do mean, every decision – will impact the Seven Kingdoms. Whether those decisions will be for the better or for the worse is entirely up to you."

A wave of silence subsequently passed over the room. Jasper took a moment to absorb those words. At first, he took them as sage advice and nothing more.

Then they sank in. That was when he realized the full depth of them.

That was not a pleasant thought. Not in the least.

At this time, Jasper's plate was only half-empty, but he found he had quite suddenly lost his appetite.

He was dimly aware that all eyes were on him yet again. He gave them no notice. Instead, he slowly rose to his feet once more. He placed his hands on the surface of the table, as if to support himself.

"Your Grace?" said his great uncle Gerion Lannister. He sounded worried.

Jasper abruptly lifted his head up, mumbled "Excuse me, if you would," and swiftly departed from the Great Hall. Ser Arys Oakheart promptly followed him out. Everyone else remained behind, likely gaping in bafflement.

Soon enough, Jasper was outside on the balcony of the Banquet Tower. He felt a very sudden unexplained urge to retch. He rushed over to the rafter and stuck his head over it. Nothing came out, but the desire to expel his supper still lingered for a time. Once it disappeared, Jasper rapidly made his way to the stairwell and exited the building. Ser Arys trailed close behind, saying not a word but appearing quite confused.

The heir to the Iron Throne spent much of the next several days meditating on Olenna Tyrell's words. There was wisdom and truth to be found in them, but Jasper had also find a fair amount of apprehension in them.

Crown Prince Jasper Baratheon was destined to rule the Seven Kingdoms. He had never assumed even for a moment that being king would be simple. Nonetheless, he had never fully admitted just how challenging it would be, either. His experience with Lady Olenna had been something of a rude awakening. She had made him fully realize how difficult ruling an entire country would be. As of now, he felt he was hopelessly unprepared to ascend the throne. I cannot possibly take on that much responsibility.

Jasper attempted to continue about his normal everyday routine. He ate three meals a day, he attended lessons with his friends in Maester Kennick's office, he drilled with weapons in the training yard, and he prayed in the sept in the Worship Tower. However, no matter what he did, he could not get Olenna Tyrell's words out of his mind. He began to spend much of his free time alone.

"At your age, that is to be expected," Olenna Tyrell murmured, "You are young. But no one is young for long. Sooner or later, we all must make choices. I would encourage you to choose wisely."

"You needn't worry on that, my lady," Jasper proclaimed, "Whenever I start searching for a bride, I will not pick hastily or imprudently."

"I am not simply referring to your future queen," Lady Olenna clarified, "I wish to advise you to be mindful of all your decisions. The ability to make good decisions is ideal in any leader. In your situation, it is vital. In time, every decision you make – and I do mean, every decision – will impact the Seven Kingdoms. Whether those decisions will be for the better or for the worse is entirely up to you."

A wave of silence subsequently passed over the room. Jasper took a moment to absorb those words. At first, he took them as sage advice and nothing more.

Then they sank in. That was when he realized the full depth of them.

That was not a pleasant thought. Not in the least.

At this time, Jasper's plate was only half-empty, but he found he had quite suddenly lost his appetite.

He was dimly aware that all eyes were on him yet again. He gave them no notice. Instead, he slowly rose to his feet once more. He placed his hands on the surface of the table, as if to support himself.

"Your Grace?" said his great uncle Gerion Lannister. He sounded worried.

Jasper abruptly lifted his head up, mumbled "Excuse me, if you would," and swiftly departed from the Great Hall. Ser Arys Oakheart promptly followed him out. Everyone else remained behind, likely gaping in bafflement.

Soon enough, Jasper was outside on the balcony of the Banquet Tower. He felt a very sudden unexplained urge to retch. He rushed over to the rafter and stuck his head over it. Nothing came out, but the desire to expel his supper still lingered for a time. Once it disappeared, Jasper rapidly made his way to the stairwell and exited the building. Ser Arys trailed close behind, saying not a word but appearing quite confused.

The heir to the Iron Throne spent much of the next several days meditating on Olenna Tyrell's words. There was wisdom and truth to be found in them, but Jasper had also find a fair amount of apprehension in them.

Crown Prince Jasper Baratheon was destined to rule the Seven Kingdoms. He had never assumed even for a moment that being king would be simple. Nonetheless, he had never fully admitted just how challenging it would be, either. His experience with Lady Olenna had been something of a rude awakening. She had made him fully realize how difficult ruling an entire country would be. As of now, he felt he was hopelessly unprepared to ascend the throne. I cannot possibly take on that much responsibility.

Jasper attempted to continue about his normal everyday routine. He ate three meals a day, he attended lessons with his friends in Maester Kennick's office, he drilled with weapons in the training yard, and he prayed in the sept in the Worship Tower. However, no matter what he did, he could not get Olenna Tyrell's words out of his mind. He began to spend much of his free time alone.
in his quarters, reflecting on them.

As a result of this newfound fixation, he tried to avoid Lady Olenna Tyrell whenever he could. He still held no ill will towards the Queen of Thorns; he simply did not wish to receive any more of her "insight." Plus, he did not wish to have any more awkward encounters with her.

Fortunately for Jasper, Lady Olenna was only at the moat for another week. After that, she departed for the North with Robb and Margaery. The heir to Winterfell was quite eager to introduce his intended to his parents, and she was just as eager to meet Lord Eddard and Lady Catelyn. Jasper was among the small crowd of people who saw their party off. He bade Robb and Margaery a very fond farewell, but he kept his farewell to Lady Olenna brief.

A little later that same day, Uncle Tyrion and Aunt Ellyn left, as well. Jasper saw them and their company off, as well. He bade them to have a safe trip to the Wall. It was somewhat queer that he had to crouch to embrace his uncle and stand on his toes to kiss his aunt on the cheek. All the same, they appreciated these gestures. He even had the chance to hold Duncan in his arms.

Jasper noticed his cousin had the blonde hair and façade of the Lannisters, but the physique and robustness of the Cleganes. He's a perfect combination of both his parents. I wonder if he's inherited their intellect, as well. If so, he'll grow to be one of the most eligible bachelors in Westeros.

"Be sure to keep him warm," the prince cautioned his aunt and uncle as he gave Duncan back to the former, "And you better stay warm, too. From now until you reach the Wall, it only gets colder."

"We'll keep that in mind," Uncle Tyrion drily remarked.

At this moment, Aunt Ellyn was playfully tickling Duncan's chin, making him giggle. She smiled at her son in joy, and then she turned to her nephew and told him "You stay warm, too. By the time we return, it may be as cold here as it is on the Wall."

"I'm certain we will manage," Jasper asserted. In a way, this little display of affection between his aunt and her son made Jasper feel warm internally. He held family in very high regard; it was perhaps the most important aspect of everyday life. In his opinion, motherhood really suited Ellyn Clegane. More so than it suits even my own mother.

"Well, good luck to you," Jasper Baratheon bade his aunt and uncle.

"And to you, as well," they both said in union. Shortly after that, they headed north.

Lord Gregor Clegane had been present when his sister and her husband left the moat. Jasper was walking through the moat's courtyard when the Mountain intercepted him.

"Are you indisposed at the moment, Your Grace?" Lord Gregor queried.

"No, I have nothing planned for the day, my lord," the prince replied.

"Then I would request that you accompany me to my solar," the Mountain stated.

Normally, whenever someone asked him somewhere, Jasper would have asked what the purpose of the meeting was in advance. However, he knew Gregor Clegane would never waste his time or have an audience with him without reason. So he just nodded and said compliantly "Very well."

Lord Gregor Clegane, Prince Jasper Baratheon, and Ser Arys Oakheart went to the Lord's Tower.
They climbed it all the way to the third highest floor, where Lord Gregor's solar was located. Since Lord Gregor wished for privacy, Jasper ordered Ser Arys to stand guard outside the room. The white knight dutifully obeyed his prince's command.

Once inside the solar, the Mountain offered Jasper a seat in front of his desk, which the prince graciously accepted.

There was a small table beside the desk. On the surface of it were a jug of water, a jug of wine, and a bowl of fruit.

"Would you care for some refreshment?" Lord Gregor proposed as he neared the table.

"A peach, if you please," Jasper beseeched him. They were his favorite.

Gregor Clegane picked a peach from the bowl of fruit and tossed it in Jasper's direction. The prince caught it in one hand almost effortlessly. "Thank you."

The Mountain nodded his head, poured himself a glass of wine, and took his chair on the other side of the desk. After taking a moment to get comfortable, he turned to face Jasper Baratheon. He looks anxious. I wonder why that is.

"Why did you wish to see me, my lord?" the Crown Prince inquired.

"I am concerned for you," the massive man revealed, "And so are your friends, as well as the top officers of the Legion."

"Why is that?" Jasper asked in bewilderment.

"These last several days, you have been rather withdrawn," Gregor pointed out, "Ever since that dinner with Lady Olenna, you have spent nearly every moment of your leisure time in your chambers."

"I have?" Jasper murmured, astonished. I know I recently spent some of my leisure time in seclusion. Could I truly have spent nearly all of it by myself?

"Yes, you have," Gregor Clegane affirmed, "This past week, Septon Norvin has seen more of you than I have."

"Is it wrong for one to yearn for some solitude?" Jasper disputed.

"No, but it is unusual of you to wish for this much of it," Lord Gregor contended. He sipped his wine, and then he remarked "Is something troubling you, Your Grace? You know you can be straight with me."

Of course I can. Had anyone else asked for his thoughts, Jasper would have denied them. He was more than a little reluctant to speak plainly on the topic that was currently occupying his mind. Lord Gregor Clegane, however, could be trusted with even his most intimate secrets.

Ultimately, Jasper released a slow exhale and muttered "Alright, I will be frank with you, my lord."

The Mountain gave a nod of acknowledgment and sat back in his chair.

Jasper took a minute to contemplate how to best begin the discussion. Then he looked to Lord Gregor and opened with "Have you ever had the feeling you do not belong, my lord?"
He was expecting the Mountain to automatically tell him that he had never had such a feeling. After all, Gregor Clegane was among the most admired and charismatic men in the Seven Kingdoms.

The answer Lord Gregor actually gave surprised the prince. He frowned and stared at the surface of his desk for a moment, and then he turned back to Jasper and told him "More often than you could possibly imagine."

Jasper was quite perplexed. He would have asked for clarity, but the Mountain had brought him to the solar to talk about the prince's sorrows, not his own. I can always ask him what he meant at a later time. Right now, let us not stray too far from our original topic.

Jasper Baratheon sat up in his chair and murmured "Well, that is the precise feeling I experienced at that dinner."

Lord Gregor raised an eyebrow. "You felt as though you did not belong in the Great Hall?"

"No," said Jasper as he bit into his peach. He chewed a few times and swallowed. "I felt as though I did not belong on the dais."

"Why is that?" Gregor Clegane asked.

Jasper did not reply straightaway. After a brief silence, he informed the huge man "Lady Olenna's words to me. Even though she meant well by them, the impression they left on me was not a positive one."

"Did she demean you?" Lord Gregor presumed.

"No, not at all," Jasper proclaimed, "But all that talk about the importance of making decisions and how the wrong choices can lead to catastrophe… it made me realize just how complex and dangerous being king would actually be."

Gregor offered a small, sympathetic smile and told him gently "I can understand your worries, Your Grace. However, that is precisely what Lady Olenna was trying to tell you. She spoke a fundamental truth. That truth is not easy to embrace, but it is an invaluable one. Far better you learn it now than when you inherit the throne from your father."

"That's just it, my lord," Jasper Baratheon disclosed, taking another bite of his peach, "For the longest time, I've been asking myself whether I truly want the throne, or if I should even have it. Now, I am inclined to believe I may not even be worthy of it."

By the expression on his face, Lord Gregor was stunned. "Did Lady Olenna's words truly discourage you so?"

"No, they just incited me to evaluate my own ability to rule," Jasper pronounced, "That is precisely what I have been doing in my quarters for the last few days."

"And have you reached a conclusion yet?" Gregor Clegane queried in interest.

"Yes," Jasper responded, a note of grimness detectable in his voice, "At this point in time, I can say with total confidence that I will be a lousy king."

The Mountain was astounded by that revelation. He frowned and asked "Since when do you have such low self-esteem, Your Grace?"
"My self-esteem is not the issue, my lord," Jasper claimed, "The issue is reality."

"'Reality?'" Gregor rejoined, "Jasper, ask any person in this fortress their opinion of you, and I can say with certainty that none of them would make the same deduction as the one you just made."

"Then they do not know me as well as they think," Jasper perceived, "And, with all due respect, neither do you."

That remark did not please Lord Gregor. Nevertheless, he did not become cross. He took another swallow of wine and muttered "If there is one aspect of your persona I do know, it is that you are not swayed easily. You are not one to be manipulated or misled by the ideals and views of others. You've always had strong conviction in your own ideals and views. So where is this coming from, Jasper? Why do you suddenly have these qualms?"

"'Suddenly?'" Jasper repeated, as though he had been slighted, "My lord, I have always had these qualms. You are just the first person I have ever spoken to about them."

"I should not have been," Gregor Clegane murmured. He sounds irate. "You should have sought out counsel for these problems long ago, even before you came to Moat Cailin."

"And just who should I have gone to?" Jasper retorted snappily, "Who would have been willing to listen to me fret?"

"Lord Jon Arryn, for one," Lord Gregor debated, "He is as much your advisor as your father's. You could have also sought out Grand Maester Marwyn o Lord Varys. Your uncle Stannis would have heard you out, too. Most of all, you could have asked the King and Queen. They are your parents; it is their responsibility to provide you with guidance."

"My father and mother were too busy ruling to be bothered with my petty troubles," Jasper claimed.

"No good parent ever regards their child's sorrows as 'petty.'" Lord Gregor disputed. His eyes widened momentarily, and then he rubbed his chin and queried "Did you even attempt to ask them?"

Again, Jasper hesitated. He had another bite of peach to delay his answer. After he swallowed, he admitted "No… I did not."

"Therein lies your problem," Gregor Clegane illuminated, "If you are so apprehensive, you should not keep your insecurities hidden away. You must talk about them. That is the only way you can confront and eventually overcome them."

Jasper could not deny that Lord Gregor made a very fine argument. He is absolutely right. I need someone to talk to. Maybe talking will finally cure me of my anxieties.

The prince steadily looked the massive man in the eye and asked him "Would you be willing to hear me out, my lord?"

"You know I would," was all the Mountain said in response.

Jasper Baratheon had never respected Gregor Clegane more than he did at that very moment.

He proceeded to tell the Lord of Moat Cailin of his many reservations about being the future leader of the Seven Kingdoms. Most of his qualms were centered around his capacity to handle the pressures of office. His main argument was that a true leader never doubted himself or his capacity to lead, yet he had doubts about his own ability almost every day.
Nearly all of Jasper's apprehensions were not problems that someone else could solve or help him solve. Only he could solve them, and only on his own. All the same, Lord Gregor managed to pacify many of his worries with sound words of advice. This advice relieved him of a fair amount of stress and self-doubt. It did not provide a solution to all his dilemmas, but it did give him a general idea on where and how he could begin to resolve them.

By the end of that conversation, Jasper felt considerably more confident in himself than he had been when he entered the solar. He still had mixed emotions on the concept of being king, but he suspected those would not vanish anytime soon. In any case, he was much less opposed to it.

There was, however, one subject that Jasper still wished to address. For various reasons, he had never mentioned this particular subject to any other person, as it was a very delicate one. However, he believed he could confide in Lord Gregor. Not only was he wise, empathetic, and reliable, but the Mountain was also quite possibly the only person who could relate to him on this subject.

By now, Jasper had finished his peach. He wiped his fingers clean of juice, and he fiddled around with the pit. As he did this, he muttered inquisitively "Lord Gregor, do you believe in superstitions?"

"Certain superstitions, yes," Gregor Clegane revealed. An appropriate answer from a man who can see into the future and allegedly alter the course of history.

"Would prophecies be among them?" Jasper enquired.

"I suppose," Lord Gregor contended, "It is no secret that I have courted fate many times and emerged victorious. Nevertheless, I cannot triumph over fate every time. Some events are predestined to happen."

Chief among them the Long Night. Jasper rubbed his chin and professed "Well, I have a philosophy I would like to share. You see, these misgivings of mine seem more instinctive than anything. Could they actually be a sign, my lord?"

"A sign of what?" the Mountain queried.

"A sign that the Baratheons were never meant to hold King's Landing," Jasper expounded.

Lord Gregor appeared to be puzzled. "That is a wildly fantastic hypothesis, Your Grace."

"I know it is," Jasper Baratheon admitted, "But consider the series of events that led to my father winning the Iron Throne. He killed Rhaegar Targaryen on the Trident. That victory did not mark him as the better ruler; just the better warrior. Forces loyal to my father may have seized King's Landing in his name, but it was you and my grandfather who commanded those forces. Lastly, he used the fact that his grandmother was a Targaryen to stake his claim to the crown. While his claim may have been legitimate, ours was not the only highborn family the dragons were kin to."

When he made those points, Jasper kept his attention closely on Lord Gregor's face, taking note of any changes in his expression. Based on what he saw, Lord Gregor was beginning to see the validity in his words.

Lord Gregor leaned on his arm and uttered "You make a fascinating argument, Your Grace. While we're speculating, allow me to present you with a hypothetical scenario. If the Baratheons did not possess the Iron Throne, who do you believe would be best-suited to ruling the Seven Kingdoms? In other words, who would you prefer to see in their place?"

I had not given that issue much thought. But I suppose it would merit some contemplation.
Jasper sat in silence for a minute, thinking on several possibilities. Which family would produce the most ideal rulers for all of Westeros? Soon, he singled out his most appealing prospects, and he gave voice to them. "Since we are still on the topic of superstitions, did Jon tell you the full story of how we found Lyarra?"

"Just that you picked her up in the woods," Gregor Clegane commented.

"Well, there is a certain detail he left out," the prince recounted, "When we found her, she had just killed a stag. She managed to completely devour half of it before we took her back to Winterfell. Maybe that was another sign."

"Do you think it meant that the Starks will overthrow the Baratheons?" Gregor presumed, disbelief evident in his tone.

"No, Lord Eddard is too honorable to do such a thing," Jasper debated, "All the same, he was just as instrumental to the Rebellion as my father was. The Starks are the oldest family in Westeros. Furthermore, they are just, they are hardy, they are noble, they are fiercely independent, and they are practically immune to corruption."

"I cannot dispute any of that," Gregor Clegane acknowledged, "It is for those same reasons that the Starks would not do well on the Iron Throne. While those attributes have enabled them to magnificently rule the North for millennia, the North has always been an anomaly in Seven Kingdoms. Even with the diversity of the Night's Watch and the Legion without Banners, the North is ruled too differently from the regions south of the Neck. I admit a Stark could do well on the Throne, but before that happened, great readjustments would need to be implemented."

Jasper had to admit; Lord Gregor Clegane presented a fine counterargument. Jasper scratched his temple for a moment, and then he proposed "What if you were king?"

At that moment, Lord Gregor had been on the verge of taking another swig of wine. He had just touched the rim of his goblet to his lips when Jasper asked that question. Just before he could drink, his eyelids expanded and his countenance was etched in surprise. Had I waited another second to ask, he might have sprayed that red all over my doublet.

The Mountain hastily set his goblet back on his desk. Then he chuckled a bit. After that, he folded his arms and stated "I will admit that the notion of being king has its own type of appeal. Alas, I would be grossly unfit for the part."

"Take a look outside and say that again, my lord," Jasper countered. Does he think I jest? I do not; I am quite serious.

Gregor Clegane shrugged and stated "What I have accomplished at Moat Cailin with the Legion is remarkable; I will not deny that. But running a holdfast and running an army are not like running a kingdom."

"I'm aware of the differences, my lord," Jasper asserted, "I would remind you that my father was once the Lord of Storm's End, and he led men during the Rebellion. He adapted to the life of a king fairly well. There is no reason you could not do the same."

"The circumstances have some dissimilarities," Gregor pointed out, "Your father was born to be a Lord Paramount. I was born the son of a landed knight. There are some who would say I have already risen higher in the world than I had any right to."

"But the people love you," Jasper Baratheon proclaimed, "And I know you love them."
"It takes much more than love to win a crown," Lord Gregor obstinately muttered, "Jasper, we could sit here all day and argue over how qualified I might be to rule the Seven Kingdoms. All we would do is waste a great deal of precious time. So allow me to save us that time by saying this: I have no intention of being king in this life. Even if your father offered it by his own volition, I would not accept it."

Jasper was perturbed by Lord Gregor's declaration. He knew the Mountain was a persistent man, but now he was being downright inflexible. And I thought I was averse to sitting the Iron Throne.

"I understand, my lord," Jasper patiently remarked, "I apologize if I said anything that unsettled you."

"You did not, Your Grace," Lord Gregor reassured him. He drained the contents of his goblet in one smooth gulp. He wiped his mouth, withheld a belch, and set his goblet back down. After that, his mouth formed a wide grin, and he said humorously "All arguments aside, I doubt the Iron Throne is even large enough to accommodate a man of my… girth."

Almost immediately, Jasper started snickering. It had been two years since he last saw the Iron Throne, but he had seen it enough times that he knew its precise measurements. While Father and Lord Jon could sit in it just fine, and they were slightly taller than the average man. But Lord Gregor is far more than "slightly" taller than most.

Jasper tried to imagine the Mountain sitting in the Iron Throne, and the image in his head was not pleasant. Maybe if he held his breath and did not fidget or move at all. Otherwise, I doubt it could be done.

"Most likely not," Jasper coincided with a sly smile.

At that very instant, there was a knock on the entrance to the solar. The prince and the Mountain simultaneously turned towards it. The latter called out "Come in."

The door opened to reveal Maester Kennick, who hastily stepped inside. He approached the desk and bowed to Jasper and Lord Gregor. Jasper noticed a piece of parchment in his right hand. The maester held the parchment out to his lord and announced "Missive for you, my lord. It is marked 'Priority One.'"

Jasper had been at Moat Cailin long enough to know that "Priority One" meant "for the Mountain's eyes only." Information does not get any more classified than that.

Jasper noticed that the parchment was stamped with a glob of black wax. On the wax was the image of a boat with an onion on the sail. The seal of house Seaworth. That intrigued him. "Why would Ser Davos be writing you, my lord?"

"He isn't, Your Grace," Maester Kennick disclosed, "The raven did not come from the south. It flew in from the east."

"The east?" Gregor murmured in interest. Maester Kennick just nodded.

The only thing east of here is whatever lies across the Narrow Sea. Jasper knew what that meant. We're finally receiving some news from Allard.

Lord Gregor took the parchment, murmured his appreciation, and stated "Wait outside, maester. I may need to send a follow-up letter."

Maester Kennick bowed again and shuffled out of the room, closing the door behind him.
"Would you like me to leave, as well, Lord Gregor?" Jasper inquired.

"No, this should only require a minute or two, Your Grace," the Mountain claimed.

"Very well," Jasper avowed.

After Lord Gregor returned to his seat, he broke the seal on the parchment, smoothed it out, and began to read the contents.

All this talking has left my throat parched.

Jasper rose from his chair and made his way over to the table beside the desk. He filled another goblet with iced water until it was three-quarters full. He topped it off with a little bit of wine. Then he made his way back to his seat.

As the prince enjoyed his drink, he observed Gregor Clegane as he read his missive.

The Mountain spent five minutes reading that paper, and another five rereading it twice. Overtime, his countenance changed. When he started to read, his facial expression had been neutral. After those ten minutes passed, he looked stricken with worry.

Jasper, by contrast, was now composed and calm. My, how our positions have reversed.

He would have scoffed at the irony, had it not been for the fact that Lord Gregor was not usually one to exhibit signs of panic.

"Grave tidings, my lord?" Jasper said inquisitively.

After a tense pause, Lord Gregor gradually looked up from the parchment and murmured "Extremely grave."

He swiftly got out of his chair again and made his way to the lit brazier by the door. He held the parchment up to the flame until the corner of it caught fire. As the flames spread to more of the paper, Gregor moved over to the chamber pot and deposited the burning note into it.

Jasper set his goblet down, stood back up, and cautiously walked across the room to the elder man. He asked "What is it, my lord?"

Gregor Clegane did not answer him right away. He just stared down at the parchment as the flames caused it to blacken and curl up.

Once a small pile of ash was all that remained, Gregor murmured quietly "Jasper, just before the maester brought that letter, you and I were speculating on how Westeros would fare if a house other than yours held the Iron Throne."

"True," Jasper affirmed, uncertain where this was headed, "Why do you mention that?"

"Because I received some very unsettling news from Allard Seaworth," Lord Gregor Clegane apprised him, "Based on his account, there is a very distinct chance that we will need to revisit that scenario soon. Worse yet, we may be forced to do more than mere speculation."

Chapter End Notes
Note: The main purpose of this chapter was to provide some insight on what type of person Robert and Cersei Baratheon's trueborn son really is. I originally intended for the conversation between Gregor and Jasper to be much longer, and to go into even greater depth. Alas, I found myself pressed for time, so I decided to edit it down. Despite that, I will still include the parts I cut out in a future update, so if you were at all dissatisfied with my description of Jasper, just know that his full persona has not yet been uncovered.

By the way, some of you may be inclined to think that Jasper is surprisingly reluctant to inherit the Iron Throne, and, therefore, that he would just willingly give it up if and when the Targaryens try to retake the Seven Kingdoms. Believe me, that is not going to happen. I would never make the resolution of the Baratheon/Targaryen rivalry that simple. I simply wish to establish that Jasper is capable of reasoning, and that under certain conditions, he can be persuaded to relinquish control of his possessions. All the same, he is still willing to fight for his family and what belongs to them.

Anyway, I will see you all again in another two weeks. Good luck to those of you who are still in school (and to those of you who are not, as well).
Chapter Notes

Note: I've done it! I have survived my paper, my project, and my last exam! I will officially be done with academics on Friday. Next time I post an update, I'll be in possession of my Master's Degree.

Now, about the chapter. I intended to introduce the plotline of the Three-Eyed Raven here. Alas, as usual, I ended up incorporating more material than I originally intended. So instead, I'll be accelerating two of this story's more critical plotlines. At first glance, this chapter may seem dull, uneventful and relatively unimportant. But it will be vital to the story arcs centered around the Targaryens and the Long Night.

When she first learned of the North, Catelyn Tully had envisioned a vast, empty expanse of barren land perpetually covered with no less than an inch of snow. When she first travelled to the North as a young bride and mother, she had discovered that while it was indeed enormous, it was by no means a wasteland.

It had snowed the day Catelyn arrived in her husband's homeland. It was only a light flurry, but considering the season, it was a bewildering sight to behold. Had she not seen it with her own eyes, she would never have thought there could actually be snow in the middle of summer.

She hoped that was not a sign of how her marriage would fare. Even if it was, she was determined to keep true to her house's words of Family, Duty, Honor.

A great many things had changed since then. Firstly, the North was not quite as desolate as it once was. In recent years, it had established greater connections with the rest of Westeros. Lord Gregor Clegane and his Legion without Banners had made those connections possible.

Moat Cailin was now regarded as a small city, and it was the sixth largest town in Westeros after King's Landing, Oldtown, Lannisport, Gulltown, and White Harbor. On top of all that, the moat had a more diverse populace than any other settlement in the Seven Kingdoms.

Catelyn herself had only seen the moat once, when her lord husband and his bannerman returned home after Robert's Rebellion. The moat had been little more than a ruin in those days, even though it admittedly served as a sufficient blockade against any southron threats. It had taken the Northmen nearly a week to travel up the narrow road that was the Causeway, so they had taken up shelter in the moat for another day.

The three towers had been large enough to host the entirety of the Northern forces, but most of the men had to lodge with four or five others. Catelyn and Ned were a little more fortunate; they had spent a night in one of the warmer, more private rooms of the Gatehouse Tower. They had Robb sleep between them so he would stay warm. He may have gotten a more peaceful sleep than any of us. If only we all could sleep so peacefully.

Back then, Robb had been only a babe at her breast. Now he was six and ten. My oldest babe is a man grown. In the time since he learned to sit a horse, Robb had revisited the moat several times. Whenever he came back to Winterfell, he always told his parents of his experiences with the Sometimes Robb went by himself to the moat. Sometimes he went with Theon Greyjoy. Sometimes he went with Jon Snow and Prince Jasper Baratheon. Sometimes he went back with Samwell Tarly and Rickard Clegane. Sometimes he brought a visitor back to Winterfell.

On one occasion, Robb came back with her beloved uncle, Ser Brynden Tully. The Blackfish had proudly regaled Catelyn with tales of his heroic deeds, just as he had done when she was a little girl. Even though she was now a woman grown, those tales still excited her every bit as much as they did back then. To him, I am still 'Little Cat.'

Robb's most previous trip to the moat had occurred within the last turn of the moon. This time, he came back with a whole company of new faces. Among them was a young woman. A young woman who would be my daughter-by-law.

Catelyn Stark was a mother of five children, and she loved all of them unconditionally. Nothing was more important to her than family. That quality had gained her a fair amount of praise from her husband's countrymen. Eddard adored her for it. Perhaps that was what first made him love me.

While she was protective of her children, Catelyn always knew that she would not be able to protect them forever. Even in the early days of motherhood, she was aware of the inevitability that at some point, she would have to arrange a marriage contract for Robb. She would likely have to arrange matches for all her children. But Robb's was the one who mattered the most, as he was Eddard Stark's heir. He is the future of the North.

Catelyn had been intrigued when Uncle Brynden first suggested forging a contract between her son and Lord Mace Tyrell's daughter. She was downright perplexed when she learned that the idea had originally been Lord Gregor Clegane's. Truthfully, she would have preferred for her and Ned to have decided their son's future wife all on their own. Nevertheless, they agreed to give the match with Highgarden some consideration.

Now, Catelyn was glad they had.

When they first met, Margaery Tyrell had left a very benign impression on the Lady of Winterfell. Catelyn had only grown fonder of the lovely rose from the Reach since then.

Margaery was perhaps the embodiment of courtesy and kindness. She was always putting the welfare of others before her own. She always tried very hard to please. Although the contract between her and Robb had not yet been finalized, she was taking it just as seriously as though it already was.

Margaery spent a great deal of time in Robb's company every day. They had gone riding together. They had visited the godswood, where he had shown her how to pray in the style of the North. They took the time to learn of each other's hobbies and interests. Catelyn was reminded of her own courtship. However, in her case, the man who courted her was not the man who ultimately married her. That man was her husband's older brother.

Before long, Margaery began to get on superbly with Robb's siblings, as well. Sansa had the most things in common with her; they were well on the road to becoming best friends. Sansa was still of the age where girls dream of noble princes and massive castles, and Margaery was all too willing to indulge her with such talk.

Arya did not care much for the obligations and duties of being a lady; she was more interested in swordplay and activities that were traditional of men. Fortunately, she and Margaery found common ground when the latter told her of the deeds of her elder brothers Garlan and Loras.

Bran would often listen in on those accounts; he was just as fascinated with knights as Arya was. Additionally, at Bran's request, Margaery had accompanied him to the Broken Tower so he could show her how high he could scale the exterior. Catelyn had initially been furious when she learned that Bran had been climbing again, but Margaery assured her that Bran only intended to do it the one time. Incidentally, he had made it all the way to the roof of the Broken Tower. A wolf who is part squirrel; that's what he is.

As for Catelyn's youngest… within a couple days of meeting her, Rickon treated Margaery as though she was his long-lost third sister. At this pace, she likely will be soon enough.

Margaery also became familiar with each member of the household. Maester Luwin. Septon Chayle and Septa Mordane. The steward Vayon Poole. His daughter Jeyne. The master of horse Hullen and his son Harwin. Martyn Cassel. Jory Cassel. All of them took an almost immediate liking to their future lord's intended. *That is as hopeful a sign as any.

Most of all, Margaery demonstrated how excited she was by the prospect of becoming the future Lady of Winterfell… by taking the time to mingle with the current Lady.

Every day she was at Winterfell, Margaery Tyrell would spend at least one hour in the company of Lady Catelyn Stark. Sometimes they conversed on various affairs, both the ones that concerned them and the ones that did not. Sometimes Margaery simply stood by and observed the elder daughter of Hoster Tully as she carried out her duties. Sometimes Catelyn indulged her with a recount of her experiences in the North. Sometimes Margaery told Catelyn of her views of certain topics, including the ideal marriage. She has a very realistic mindset for her age. Such realism would be invaluable to the head of this house.

Margaery was not the only realistic member of her house, Catelyn quickly discovered. Her lady grandmother, Olenna of House Redwyne, had a demeanor that was equal parts sobering and eloquent. Straightaway, Catelyn realized she was not the conventional highborn lady. Arya would get along quite well with this woman. Strangely enough, she did.

Olenna Tyrell did not bother with false courtesies. She did not mince her words. She did not speak in riddles. Everything she said and did was completely direct. Clearly, she is not known as the Queen of Thorns simply because of the sigil of her house.

It took Catelyn nearly a week to form an opinion of Lady Olenna. Ultimately, she decided that could come to like the Reachwoman. That was mostly due to the fact that Olenna seemed to approve of Robb, and Margaery claimed she would not marry a man her grandmother did not approve of.

Despite her bitter persona, Olenna Tyrell was very close with her grandchildren. Reportedly, closer to them than she had ever been to her own children. She had been a mentor to Lord Mace's sons and daughter. Apparently, her guidance was what drove Willas to join the Legion without Banners, Garlan to become a knight, and Loras to do both.

Margaery, however, was her special case. At the first opportunity, Mace Tyrell would have attempted to make his daughter Queen. While Lady Olenna was just as ambitious as her son, she was not so brash as to overshoot their house's bounds. She was more concerned with ensuring that her granddaughter would have a good marriage. She always intended for the marriage to benefit Highgarden in some way, but Margaery's happiness meant more to her than anything.

I expect this union would benefit us all. After all, if the heir to Winterfell is not good enough for...
Margaery – if my son isn't good enough for her – who is?

On one occasion, Lady Olenna had asked Catelyn to tell her some intimate details of Robb. Catelyn had been stunned by that request. What stunned her even more was that Olenna offered to tell her some intimate details of Margaery in return. Although she assured Catelyn that nothing especially compromising or embarrassing had to be shared, the Lady of Winterfell was very much reluctant to comply. As politely as she could, Catelyn demanded to know what the point of such disclosure could have been.

Olenna revealed to her that she wished to know if Margaery and Robb were compatible even on the intimate level. She also argued that Catelyn was probably as curious to know as she was. She is not entirely wrong. Furthermore, she contended that this information would ultimately serve Catelyn better, as Margaery would spend the rest of her life in Winterfell if she married Robb. Just as I intended to when I married Eddard.

Eventually, Catelyn agreed to this exchange of private information, but she only did so when Lady Olenna assured her that no one else would know of this discussion.

A fortnight and a-half after Margaery and her grandmother arrived at Winterfell, Robb went down to Hornwood to attend the wedding of Daryn Hornwood, Lord Halys' son and heir, and Alys Karstark, daughter of Lord Rickard of Karhold. Robb planned to be gone for about five days.

While he was away, Ned asked Margaery and her grandmother for a private conversation. He went to Catelyn and asked her to join them. As if by reflex, she conceded to go right away.

A few minutes later, the four of them were gathered in the lord's solar. Lord Eddard took up his usual spot behind the desk. Lady Catelyn sat in a chair by his side. Margaery and Lady Olenna sat opposite them.

Once they were all seated, Ned folded his arms together and opened with a question: "How do you find the hospitality of the North, my ladies?"

"Quite different from the hospitality of the Reach, my lord," Olenna Tyrell bluntly remarked.

"But a pleasant form of 'different,'" Margaery sincerely amended. Catelyn grinned at that.

Ned merely gave a slight nod. He shifted in his seat a bit and muttered inquisitively "Then you have enjoyed your stay here thus far?"

"Very much so, my lord," Margaery proclaimed with a smile.

"It has been most gratifying," Olenna drily murmured. So, at the very least, it was not unpleasant.

"I know you plan to return to Highgarden before too long, Lady Olenna," Eddard told the Queen of Thorns. He then turned to her granddaughter and queried "But do you, Lady Margaery?"

Margaery thought about that question for a few seconds before answering with "I was not making any plans to go back yet, Lord Eddard."

She chooses her words carefully. Just like her grandmother.

Eddard must have noticed that, as well. By his countenance, he had quickly picked up on the implication of those words. He firmly pronounced "You appreciate forwardness. As such, I shall be forward with you right now."
"Forward on what, my lord?" Margaery enquired.

Ned responded with "I know you care deeply for my son. I know he cares deeply for you, as well. Your contentment with one another is very important to me for many reasons. Chief among them is how your relationship with Robb could determine the state of the relationship between the North and the Reach. You already know that, of course. Just as you know what that relationship will require to come to fruition. So now I ask you: could you see yourself by my son's side?"

That is indeed rather forward. Normally, Eddard Stark would approach a subject such as this gradually and with more tact. However, in this particular scenario, being candid was the only option.

Margaery needed a minute to compose her reply. She frequently shifted her gaze between her grandmother, the Lord and Lady of Winterfell, and one of the walls.

Finally, she looked to Eddard and Catelyn, and she began with "Well, I have only known him for about four weeks."

Nearly four weeks longer than Ned and I knew each other.

"Cat and I had known each other for far less time," Eddard gave voice to her thought. He then turned to his wife and extended his hand to her. She grinned and happily placed her own hand in his. After that, Eddard turned back to his front and proclaimed "Even so, we have come a long way since then."

Yes, we have. We've gone much farther than I would have dared to imagine back then.

"I can see that, my lord," Margaery professed. "But you didn't let me finish. I was about to say that I have come to more than care for Robb since I arrived in the North. So has he. By the way he treats me, one could be forgiven for assuming I was already his wife. As such... I would be honored to give merit to those assumptions."

A rare smile came to Ned's face. He presumed "Then you will consent to the contract?"

Margaery lightly nodded and declared "I would be honored to accept."

Catelyn then smiled, too. She told the younger Reachwoman "Oh, no; it is we who are honored by your acceptance."

"I am certain we are all honored somehow," Olenna Tyrell contended. She speaks the truth, I've no doubt.

"Shall we set aside a date?" Eddard proposed.

"Well, once Robb gets back from Hornwood, he and I will be going to Ironrath," Margaery disclosed, "We'll be attending the wedding of Rodrik Forrester and Elaena Glenmore."

"We know; Robb told us of that," Catelyn disclosed. What greater way to prove one's affection than by escorting one's intended to another person's wedding?

"About how long might that take in total?" Eddard enquired.

"Two or three weeks, I suppose," Margaery thought aloud, "Four at the most."

"Then shall we schedule the affair for sometime next month?" Catelyn proposed.
"That would be excellent, my lord," Lady Olenna said approvingly.

"Very good," Eddard muttered in acknowledgment, "Will that be long enough for Lord Mace and Lady Alerie to travel here?"

"I believe it would be," Margaery casually muttered, "But truthfully, I doubt my parents would be able to attend."

"Why is that?" Catelyn queried. No parent should be denied the ability to witness their child getting married.

"Firstly, I don't think the cold would suit my father well," Margaery debated. By the exasperated expression on Lady Olenna's face, that statement was quite true. "Apart from that, there are already too many other Tyrells out of the Reach. You see, the news of the Long Night was not very well-received in my homeland. My lord father and lady mother must remain in Highgarden to maintain order in the Reach."

"I understand and respect the sentiment," Eddard Stark mumbled, "As we say, there must always be a Stark in Winterfell."

Under normal circumstances, Catelyn would have advised that they delay the wedding until both the bride and groom's parents were available. But since Lord and Lady Tyrell were remaining in Highgarden to prepare the Reach against the Long Night, their availability would not come about until after the next winter. Eddard was definitely not going to wait that long. For that matter, neither was Catelyn.

Still, the bride would need someone from her family to remove her house cloak from her shoulders. On that note, she would need her house cloak.

"Do you have someone who can give you away, my dear?" Catelyn queried.

"Yes, my brother Willas would be pleased to do so," Margaery apprised her, as though she had read the older woman's mind, "And before you ask, my lady, we brought our house cloak with us."

Catelyn smiled and nodded. They are rather prudent to think in advance.

Before another else could speak, there was a knock at the door of the solar. Eddard looked to it and called out "Yes?"

Jory Cassel entered the solar. He muttered sternly "You asked to be informed when Lord Howland Reed's children arrived, my lord."

"I did, Jory," Eddard affirmed. Catelyn was bewildered. That's the first I'm hearing of this. I hadn't known the Reeds were sending us any wards.

"They just got in," the captain of the guard illuminated, "Lady Meera and Lord Jojen are requesting an audience with you at your earliest convenience."

"I will be with them momentarily," Eddard Stark declared.

Jory nodded and went back outside. Ned slowly rose to his feet, looked around at his wife and the Reachwomen, and he bade them "If you will excuse me; I must see receive our newest guests."

"Of course, my love," Catelyn said in understanding. Margaery and Lady Olenna merely nodded in agreement.
Eddard gave a grateful grin. He cordially suggested "If you so wish, you may go ahead and begin to plan the wedding. For the moment, I do not believe I am needed in this matter."

Now it was Catelyn who nodded. Far as history can tell, that has always been the way of weddings. The men propose; the women plan.

Ned walked over to the entrance of the solar. Jory held the door open for him. Just before Eddard stepped outside, he froze in the doorframe.

Catelyn noticed how abruptly her husband stopped, and she asked "Is something amiss, my lord?"

Ned turned back to the women, smirked, and murmured "It seems you have a visitor of your own."

He then stepped aside, and Grey Wind bounded into the room. He stood by the entrance and sniffed the air for a moment, and then he trotted swiftly over to Margaery.

The typical lady would have shuddered or screamed if a direwolf – even one who was less than two months old – came directly towards her. The day her husband, sons, and nephew brought back a pregnant she-wolf, Catelyn had been startled. Be that as it may, she had quickly overcome her fear when she discovered that the direwolf was docile.

Likewise, it had not taken Margaery Tyrell and her grandmother long to become comfortable around the direwolves. Grey Wind in particular had become rather attached to the young rose of Highgarden. So much so that Robb had decided to leave his loyal beast with her at Winterfell while he was at Hornwood. Another promising sign, right there.

After Grey Wind padded over to her, Margaery reached out and scratched him behind the ears. He sat on his hindquarters by her chair and licked at her hand playfully.

"Would you care to pet him, Grandmother?" Margaery asked Lady Olenna.

"I just washed my hands," the Queen of Thorns stiffly replied. Catelyn scoffed at her bluntness.

By now, Lord Eddard Stark had left the solar. He had closed the door on his way out, leaving the three women alone with the direwolf.

Margaery's attention was still principally on Grey tickled him under his muzzle and giggled at his reaction. I cannot tell which of them is the more adorable. Catelyn did not have such thoughts often, so that said something of how awed she was by the young Reachwoman's interaction with the wolf.

After observing them for a moment, Catelyn proposed "Would you like to start organizing plans for the wedding?"

Margaery turned back to the woman from the Riverlands and murmured "Certainly, my lady."

Lady Olenna then interjected with "Before we do, there is something I wish to ask you, my dear. Something about the wolves."

Ned would probably be more helpful in that regard. Nonetheless, Catelyn agreed to oblige the Queen of Thorns. She inquired "What would you like to know, my lady?"

Olenna Tyrell professed "Each of your children has one direwolf. Your bastard nephew has one, too."
"He also has a name," Catelyn remarked, more sharply than she intended.

"Jon Snow has one, too," Olenna Tyrell drily corrected herself, "As you undoubtedly noticed, the mother direwolf produced a litter of four males and two females. Including your nephew, the current generation of House Stark has four sons and two daughters."

"I know it is more than a coincidence," Catelyn admitted, "Even before they were born, Jon speculated that he and his cousins were meant to have the pups."

"I would have concluded the same," Olenna declared, "However, since the pups bonded to your children and your nephew, by that same logic, would not the mother direwolf have bonded to you, as well?"

Catelyn shrugged and muttered "I see why you would assume she would. Robb and Jon suspected that, as well. Even so, Lyarra and I were not quite as well-matched for each other as her children and mine were. She did not dislike me or anything of the sort; we simply never developed the same connection."

"Peculiar," Margaery thought aloud, "Perhaps only Starks can truly bind themselves to direwolves."

"I thought much the same," Catelyn disclosed, giving a light smile, "But you and Grey Wind get on just fine."

"True," Margaery coincided, smiling back. She will be a Stark by marriage, of course. But then again, I have been one for nearly half my life.

"When we were at Moat Cailin, we saw Lyarra," Lady Olenna recounted, "But only Ghost and Grey Wind were there. One would think she would prefer to stay here in Winterfell, where most of her pups were."

"One would think," Catelyn concurred, "An interesting tale behind that."

"I'd very much like to know this tale," Olenna requested. Margaery nodded her agreement.

Catelyn then explained "Because Jon serves as squire to Lord Gregor Clegane, he spends half his time at Moat Cailin and the other half here. The day they found Lyarra happened to be his sixteenth nameday, so he was at Winterfell to celebrate with his family. Lyarra gave birth the following morning, and Jon and his cousins each had their pick of the litter. He stayed with us for a fortnight so that Lyarra could tend to all her pups. When they were old enough to walk and hunt, Jon went back to Moat Cailin. He planned to bring Ghost – and only Ghost – back with him. Lyarra… well, she 'objected.'"

"Objected how?" Margaery asked.

"When Jon tried to take Ghost out of Winterfell, Lyarra became fiercely protective of him," Catelyn recalled, "She went so far as to threaten to tear someone's arm off. At first, we assumed that was just motherly instinct. Then Samwell Tarly suggested that we bring the other five pups out of Winterfell to see how their mother would react. Unsurprisingly, she protested when any of her pups were taken away. But only in the case of Ghost did she nearly resort to violence. We still don't know why."

"Could it be that direwolves pick favorites?" Margaery hypothesized.

"I wouldn't know," Catelyn responded, "Maybe it was because Ghost was the runt of the litter."
"That would follow," Margaery agreed, "I believe all parents – humans and animals alike – care for the smallest of their brood the most."

"Lord Tywin Lannister would disagree with you, dearest," Olenna slyly countered.

Margaery and Lady Catelyn chuckled a bit. That cannot be disputed; even in the North, it is well-known that Tywin Lannister despises his youngest child.

Catelyn then continued her account with "Anyway, Jon was expected to return to Moat Cailin, but he did not wish to leave Ghost behind. It was ultimately decided that the most practical solution was to let Lyarra go along with them. As it happened, all parties involved were pleased with that arrangement."

"That is fortunate," Olenna Tyrell commented. After a pause, she stated "As I mentioned previously, we saw Lyarra whilst we stayed at Moat Cailin. Are you aware that she now has a mistress of her own?"

"Yes," Catelyn responded, "Jon told me that the mother direwolf developed a bond with his maid."

"Myrna, her name was," Lady Olenna remarked.

"Ah, yes," Catelyn remarked with a smile, "Jon speaks almost reverently of Myrna. I imagine she is a wondrous person."

Those statements appeared to intrigue the Queen of Thorns. "So you've never met her?"

"I have not," Catelyn confirmed, "I haven't seen Moat Cailin since the aftermath of Robert's Rebellion, and Myrna never accompanies Jon to Winterfell. As far as I know, she has never left the moat even once in the last five years."

"How interesting…" Lady Olenna muttered quietly. She rubbed her chin, and then she said "One final question, Lady Catelyn. Who was it who gave Lyarra her name? Was it your lord husband?"

_I can see why she would assume that. That was the name of Ned's own mother._ "No. Each of my children and Jon named their own wolves. So I believe it was Myrna who named hers."

"Why do you suppose she gave the mother direwolf the name of your late mother-by-law?" Olenna Tyrell inquired.

"I haven't the slightest idea," Catelyn professed, "But she must have had a reason."

"Oh, I do not doubt that, my lady," Olenna Tyrell conceded. She sat in silence for a few seconds, and then she remarked "You say Jon reveres Myrna. For the sake of my curiosity, how would you describe the exact nature of their relationship? Is she like an elder sister? An older cousin? An aunt? Or is she… like a mother to him?"

Catelyn needed a moment to contemplate an answer. Then she pronounced "Now that I think on that… she is most like a mother to him."

"His true mother is dead, isn't she?" Margaery asked rhetorically.

"Yes," Catelyn disclosed, "Jon's mother was Lady Ashara Dayne of Starfall. His father was Brandon Stark, Eddard's brother and the man I was initially meant to marry. Of course, Brandon's death – along with his father's – was what sparked Robert's Rebellion. After the Rebellion, Eddard went to rescue his sister Lyanna from the Tower of Joy in Dorne. Alas, he was too late; she died in his arms. Before he left Dorne, Eddard rode to Starfall, as he had heard of Brandon and Ashara's free union, as well as what it had produced. From what I heard, Lady Ashara begged Ned to let Jon stay with her, but he insisted on taking his nephew back to the North."

"And that was what drove her to suicide," Lady Olenna finished.

"Yes, my lady," Catelyn confirmed, a little tensely, "In my mind, that is the only atrocious thing Ned has ever done in his life."

_Depriving a mother of her own child and subsequently inciting her to jump into the sea... there is no excuse for that._

"Does Jon know any of this?" Margaery queried.

"He knows all of it," Catelyn explicated, "In spite of that, he holds no ill will towards Ned."

"He must be a very forgiving person," Olenna contended.

"I like to think so," Catelyn stated, letting out a small sigh, "I have tried my hardest to be a mother to my nephew. I've raised him just as I've raised my own children. In his youth, he regarded me as his mother. Yet these days, I suppose Myrna is the closest thing he'll ever have to one. By the way he speaks of her, one might be led to believe she actually was his mother."

"Indeed," Lady Olenna avowed, folding her arms and speaking in a quiet yet firm tone of voice, "One might be led to believe that."

_She almost speaks as though she does believe it,_ Catelyn noted.

…

The Night's Watch had existed for nearly as long as the Wall had. The black brothers had manned the immense structure ever since it was first erected by Brandon the Builder eight millennia ago.

The Wall itself still stood tall and proud. It had retained all of its magnificence and wonder. The same could not quite be said of the forces that guarded it. While the Watch was once a highly-respected organization, it had slowly fallen into decay since the days of Aegon's Conquest.

By the time the Mad King fell, only a few hundred black brothers were on the Wall, and half of those were simply there to avoid punishment for crimes committed in the south. Only three of the Wall's nineteen fortresses were occupied regularly. The rest had been boarded up and abandoned. Meanwhile, the wildlings who lived north of the Wall only became progressively stronger.

Ten years ago, one would not have been blamed for assuming that the Watch might collapse in the near future.

However, much had changed over the last decade, and with every passing year, the likelihood of that occurrence became more and more unlikely. Fortune reared its head, and the Night's Watch had regained much of its former glory.

That process began when Lord Gregor Clegane of Moat Cailin approached Lord Commander Jeor Mormont and told him of an imminent disaster. This disaster had occurred once before. It was what had led to the construction of the Wall and the establishment of the Watch in the first place.

At first, Lord Jeor did not want to believe Lord Gregor's cautionary message. Who would have? All the same, he could not bring himself to ignore it, either. So he, Benjen Stark, and Maester Aemon had chosen to hear the Mountain out.

Even by the end of that conversation, Jeor Mormont was uncertain if he could fully trust in Lord Gregor. Still, until he could confirm otherwise, he decided to act upon this warning as though it was completely authentic.

Consequentially, a number of measures were taken to prepare the northern border of the Seven Kingdoms against its upcoming hardships. Several of these measures were quite ambitious, as no one had ever attempted them before.

A tentative truce had been negotiated between the Night's Watch and the Free Folk. Many of the wildlings now fought alongside the black brothers. Thousands more had settled along the Gift or somewhere in the lands south of it. A steady supply of obsidian was transported to the Wall so that dragonglass weapons could be forged. The rate of voluntary enlisters was at an all-time high. Many knights and valiant warriors had taken the black, and nearly every castle on the Wall was adequately manned.

Lord Commander Jeor never would have believed that a dying order could have rejuvenated so superbly in the span of ten years. Once again it was respectable. Once again it was honorable. Once again it was prestigious. Once again it had captured its sense of purpose. He was proud to serve as its commander. Even if the Others were not truly returning to the world, the Watch had come a very long way, and it had achieved a standing it had long ago misplaced. In any case, these preparations will not have been for nothing.

Alas, these preparations would have to serve their intended purpose. It turned out Lord Gregor Clegane's warning did indeed have merit.

A couple months ago, a party of rangers had been dispatched to bring back a group of five hundred wildlings. None of the wildlings made it to the Wall, and only one of the black brothers came back. Ser Waymar Royce. That had been his first time north of the Wall.

Ser Waymar was a promising young knight from a noble house in the Vale. His primary flaw was his arrogance, but all men had their flaws. Lord Jeor did not believe he would have any trouble on his first ranging, and that he would not lose his nerves so easily.

Ser Waymar had not been back at Castle Black three hours before he chose to desert his post. But in those three hours, he had constantly raved about "the rising dead" and other things. While the whole of the Wall was aware that the Long Night was fast approaching, most of the black brothers were inclined to question anything they heard from the mouth of one who is paralyzed by fear.

After Ser Waymar was beheaded by Eddard Stark, the Lord of Winterfell wrote to the Lord Commander and told him the Valeman's last words. In the final minute of his life, he had been sane enough to clearly recount what he had seen in the haunted forest, and he had relayed what he remembered of that experience to the Warden of the North.

There was no point living in denial now. The Others had finally begun to reappear in the world. But this time around, we will be ready for them. We have no intention of going down without a fight.

"How often do you come up here, my lord?"

At this time, Lord Jeor was standing at the top of the Wall. He had spent the last few minutes gazing off to the north, deep in silent meditation. That question brought him back to reality.

He turned to his right, but no one was there. Then he looked down. It was the dwarf.
"If I can, I make an effort to come up here at least once a day," Lord Jeor informed the westerman, "Sometimes, the best I can manage is thrice a week. I may be the leader of the Watch, but I am just as obligated to stand guard on the Wall as the rest of my brothers are."

"You're a busy man," Tyrion Lannister remarked, "The fault is not yours if you haven't the time to do so. What really matters is that you care enough to try."

"Indeed, my lord," Jeor conceded. He turned back to his front and stared off into the distance. A few seconds later, he asked "How was your time at Queensgate?"

"Considerably better than our time at Oakenshield," Lord Tyrion replied, "Iron Emmett is a much more accommodating host than Frostfingers."

"So I have heard," Jeor Mormont murmured drily. "It is a bit of a relief to be rid of him. Even so, I pity those I placed under his command. "Did you make it to Deep Lake?"

"We got so far as to catch a glimpse of it," Tyrion recalled, "Then we turned around and headed back east."

"A shame," Lord Jeor perceived, "Deep Lake is a much fairer castle than this one. Apart from that, Qhorin Halfhand would have been pleased to receive you."

"You're probably right," Tyrion remarked, "I have heard the Halfhand is a typically gracious man. But can you say the same of his second-in-command?"

"You refer to Mors Westford?" Jeor Mormont presumed.

"Yes," Lord Tyrion confirmed, "I understand that his primary task is to hunt down and execute deserters before they traverse the Gift."

Hence his moniker 'The Butcher.'

"House Westford is sworn to the Westerlands, is it not?" Jeor asked rhetorically.

"Yes, and no one knows that better than Mors," Tyrion proclaimed frankly, "He served in my father's army during King Robert's Rebellion. Apparently, Mors refused to obey an order concerning one of his bannermen. Whatever the order was, it's the reason he ended up here. So it would not surprise me if he harbors a grudge towards anyone bearing the name Lannister."

"You are not your father, my lord," Jeor Mormont pointed out.

"If I was, I would be two feet taller, a great deal balder, and slightly less ugly," Tyrion cheekily muttered, "And I would have far fewer friends."

Lord Jeor allowed himself a snicker. Your sense of humor would not be nearly as grand, either.

Just then, they were joined by a tall man carrying a spear. He greeted them with a nod and a murmur of "Milords."

"Good afternoon, Fornio," Jeor Mormont rejoined.

"Evening, actually, Lord Commander," the ranger apprised him, "I'm here to relieve you."

Has it been two hours already? How time passes up here.

"Very well," the Old Bear coincided.
He stepped aside so that Fornio could take his place. Then he turned to Lord Tyrion and said inquisitively "Would you care to accompany me, my lord? Or would you rather remain up here a while longer?"

"I will join you in a moment, Lord Jeor," Tyrion pronounced, "First, though, there is something I have been wanting to do since I got here."

The dwarf then turned to the north and waddled over to the edge of the Wall.

"Careful, milord," Fornio advised him, "Men have slipped and fallen getting that close."

"Do I look so clumsy?" Tyrion uttered wryly.

"No, not at all," Fornio hastily remarked, "Just a word of caution."

"Appreciated, but unnecessary," Tyrion told him.

Tyrion stopped when he was mere inches from the tip of the Wall. Then he reached down and began to unlace his breeches. Before he brought anything out, Jeor and Fornio quickly looked away.

Jeor heard the sounds of water being made and Tyrion whistling as he relieved himself. The Lord Commander and the ranger simply stood by and waited for him to finish. It only took him thirty seconds. Even so, those thirty seconds were rather awkward.

When he was finished, Tyrion refastened his breeches, wiped his hands on his cloak, and turned back to the two watchmen. "There. Now we can go."

Jeor nodded. As Tyrion walked over to him, he looked up at Fornio and instructed him "Keep a heedful eye. Anything could be out there."

"Oh, nothing will get past me, milord," Fornio asserted, smirking, "I know the haunted forest like the back of my father's hand."

Tyrion paused and raised an eyebrow. "I believe the expression is 'the back of my hand.' Meaning your hand, not your sire's."

Fornio shrugged and disputed "What interest would I have in my own hand? How often does one actually look at their own hands?"

"About as often as they study the hands of their parents," Tyrion refuted.

"Oh, in my youth, I saw the back of my father's hand plenty," Fornio disclosed, "If you get my meaning."

_I believe we do. That is quite unfortunate. But some fathers are like that._

"Just do your duty," Jeor Mormont commanded his subordinate.

"I shall, milord," the ranger declared.

Lord Jeor and Lord Tyrion swiftly made their way to the winch elevator. Luckily for them, the cage was already at the top of the Wall, so they did not have to wait.

During the descent to Castle Black, Jeor asked the dwarf "How much longer do you suppose you will remain with us, my lord?"
"Just the night," Tyrion informed him, "On the morrow, we plan to head south."

"Have you enjoyed your time here thus far?" the Old Bear queried.

"On the whole, yes," the Imp responded, "I speak for both myself and my lady wife when I say that."

Jeor gave a nod of acknowledgment. "Where is Lady Ellyn?"

"Down in the training yard," Tyrion replied, "Some of the spearwives challenged her to a bout in the ring."

"Are they fighting her individually or-?" Jeor began.

"Altogether," Tyrion promptly clarified.

"I'd be worried," Jeor mumbled. A moment later, he added in "For them."

"I thought just the same, my lord," Tyrion remarked with a chuckle.

"Your wife reminds me of my sister Maege," Jeor disclosed, "Tall, strapping, and proficient with weapons, yet very womanly in appearance. Lady Ellyn is a touch more civilized, though. Not to mention easier to get along with."

Tyrion laughed again. Of course, I still love Maege, regardless of all that.

Soon enough, they arrived at the bottom of the Wall. The cage door swung open, and Tyrion and Jeor stepped out of it.

As they climbed down the platform, Jeor spotted a tall woman dressed in chainmail and a hauberk. She was armed with a sword and a dagger whose pommel bore the likeness of a hound's head. She was coming directly toward them. At a glance, he recognized her as Lady Ellyn Lannister, formerly of House Clegane.

Tyrion saw her coming, as well. He smiled at her, and she smiled back. When Lady Ellyn reached them, she knelt down to her husband's level and embraced him. Then she released him, returned to her full height, and told Jeor "Good to see you again, Lord Commander."

"Likewise, my lady," the Old Bear proclaimed, "How went the sparring?"

"Child's play," Ellyn cockily remarked, "Those spearwives like to boast, but they can't parry to save their hides. I could have beaten them with Duncan cradled in my left arm."

"I would rather you not test that claim," Tyrion muttered drily.

"I could hold you in my left arm," Ellyn proposed jokingly.

"Now that would just be downright unfair," Tyrion humorously retorted, "The spearwives wouldn't stand a chance. Hells, veteran knights wouldn't stand a chance."

The two spouses shared a laugh at the jape. Jeor resisted the urge to smirk, although he had to admit it was a clever one. The Old Bear might not have looked it, but he had a fairly decent sense of humor. He just kept it concealed in public so that his men would show him ample respect and take him seriously.

"Your lord husband tells me you plan to go back south on the morrow," Jeor proclaimed.
"He told you true, my lord," Lady Ellyn affirmed, "We've already been here for nigh on a moon's turn. A week here, a week at Oakenshield, a week at Queensgate, and a week travelling between the three. Much as we'd like to see the rest of the Wall, we haven't the time or the resources."

"I should say not, my lady," Jeor Mormont concurred, "There are few in history who have managed to traverse the full length of the Wall."

"I suppose we could always try some other time," Tyrion slyly murmured.

"You would be most welcome, if ever you return," Lord Jeor asserted. He spoke the truth. Lords and ladies like Tyrion and Ellyn Lannister were a rarity. I haven't seen a lord so invested in the Night's Watch since Lady Ellyn's brother. After a bit of silence, the Old Bear offered "I would invite you both to dine with me and the officers tonight."

"We would be delighted to accept the invitation, my lord," Tyrion rejoined.

"Quite so," Ellyn coincided. She then wiped the sweat off her brow and muttered "First I will require some time to feed Duncan and wash up. Would you mind waiting to eat for about a half-hour?"

"Not at all," Jeor Mormont replied. Supper will not be for another forty-five minutes anyway.

The Lord Commander and the two Lannisters parted ways there.

Jeor went to his quarters to change out of his armor and into some more comfortable apparel. He donned his boiled leather doublet and trousers. Over that he wore the cloak of the Lord Commander of the Night's Watch. Like the rest of his wardrobe, they were all a shade of black.

Jeor's pet raven had been on its perch by the hearth when he entered the bedchamber. After its master finished changing, the bird spread its wings, took to the air, and flew over to Jeor Mormont's shoulder, where it settled. It screeched "Corn. Corn."

"Later," Mormont grumbled. There are times I wonder why I bother keeping this damn bird.

Three-Finger Hobb had prepared a special meal for the officers that night: crab legs. Even with their new connections with the wildling fisherfolk, those were not easy to come by. Somehow, that only made them seem even more of a delicacy.

Soon after, the Lord Commander went to dinner. He always supped with the officers. Among them were Maester Aemon, First Steward Bowen Marsh, First Builder Othell Yarwyck, and First Ranger Benjen Stark, and master-at-arms Ser Alliser Thorne. That night, two more places at the table were set for their guests from the Westerlands.

The meal that night was an eventful one. At the start of it, Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn recounted the highlights of their visits to Oakenshield and Queensgate. That alone took up almost fifteen minutes, not including the raven's occasional interjections of "Corn. Corn" and other random words.

When the Lannisters were done with their recollection, Othell Yarwyck asked them "What will you do now? Are you going to go back to Casterly Rock?"

Since House Yarwyck was vassal to House Lannister, Othell's interest in Tyrion and Ellyn's activities was reasonably well-founded.

"Not just yet," Lady Ellyn revealed, "We will go back eventually. But we decided that we will take up service with my lord brother at Moat Cailin."

"Joining the Legion without Banners, are you?" Benjen Stark supposed.

"Just so," Tyrion affirmed, "Our minds would be of greatest use in the Legion."

Jeor could not dispute that. I must admit; they are two of the finest minds I have ever met.

"The Watch has great need of sharp minds, too," Bowen Marsh contended, "Did you ever consider employing yours here?"

"I don't think that would go over very well in my case," Ellyn Clegane uttered frankly, "I am very much aware of what happened to Danny Flint."

She did not have to say any more. That was one of the more shameful events in the history of the Watch. A young girl wished to guard the realms of men... and her 'brothers' replied by raping and murdering her.

"I might give it some consideration," Tyrion murmured. He hastily added in "If I was not required to go celibate."

"Yes, neither of us would want that," Lady Ellyn cockily remarked. Everyone but the cheerless Alliser Thorne laughed.

When he was done sniggering, Tyrion murmured "Aside from that, I have a son who has only seen his first nameday. I fully intend to be there for his second nameday. As well as his third, his fourth, his fifth, and at least the next eleven that follow. Some men may be content to sever their family ties for the good of the realm. I could never do such a thing."

"There are not many who can, my lord," Jeor Mormont contended, "I waited until my son Jorah was a man grown to take the black. He was still a lad when I entrusted him with the care of our family sword, our house, and our ancestral home. Almost twenty years have elapsed since then, and never once did I question whether I made the right choice."

I would have liked to have gotten to know my Dornish daughter-by-law and the four children she gave Jorah a little better, however.

"I will keep that in the back of my head, Lord Jeor," Tyrion Lannister proclaimed, "All the same, if I ever do come back here, my stay will likely be a temporary one."

"Fair enough, my lord," Benjen Stark remarked, "You would still be invaluable to us as a temporary advisor."

That appeared to amuse and perplex the dwarf all at once. "What could I possibly advise you on?"

Initially, Benjen said nothing. He just turned the Lord Commander, as though expecting a gesture from him. Mormont actually had arranged something of the sort with him before dinner. When he noticed the younger man's gaze on him, he gave Benjen two solemn nods.

The First Ranger then got out a long roll of parchment and held it out to Lord Tyrion. The dwarf tentatively accepted the parchment in his hand.

"What is this?" he enquired curiously.

"Our plans for countering the threat posed by the Long Night," Benjen revealed, "If you have time before you leave, my lord, we would be most grateful if you and Lady Ellyn were to look them over and give us your opinion on them."

Tyrion thought on that for a moment, and then he shrugged and set the parchment aside. He stated "Very well. If we have time."

"We would appreciate it, my lord," Maester Aemon murmured quietly, "Other than the people in this room, no one has seen those plans."

And you, dear Aemon, have not seen them at all.

"I am surprised you would trust us with so much," Lady Ellyn noted, "Even if my lord husband and I are two of the best minds in Westeros, we are still only two minds."

"Two minds who happen to have connections to Casterly Rock and Moat Cailin," Jaremy Rykker pointed out.

"Connections we know better than to abuse," Lord Tyrion countered. Before anyone could argue that point, he added in "Be that as it may, we will take a closer look at these plans of yours tonight. But I must say; this seems quite elaborate for defense."

"Oh, those plans are not composed solely of defensive techniques," Mallador Locke pronounced. That seemed to intrigue both Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn. The latter enquired "How else would you prepare the Wall for the fight against the Others?"

"By going beyond the Wall and facing them on their own ground," Jeor Mormont proclaimed. Again, Tyrion raised an eyebrow. "What precisely are you entailing, my lord?"

"In my experiences as the Lord Commander of the Night's Watch, when one is up against a foe of indeterminant strength, it would be foolish to allow the enemy to come to them," Mormont professed, "One would generally stand a better chance by being the first to take the offensive instead. This is one such case."

"So, what you're saying is…" Lord Tyrion began. He did not finish that statement, but he did place his hand on the hilt of the dagger on his belt.

The gesture did not go unnoticed by the Old Bear. He realized the implications of it almost straightaway, and he nodded his head, saying in a somber tone "Yes, my lord. We are not going to sit here on our arses and wait for the Night's King to appear at our gate. I aim to take the fight directly to him."

"Fight." The raven quorked, "Him."
Note: I have done it, my friends! I have successfully earned my Master's Degree! Now I am officially done with academics forever. Unless, of course, in ten years or so, I get profusely bored and decide I want to work towards a PhD. But until then, I'm going to concentrate on finding a better job (and my fanfictions, of course).

At any rate, posting this chapter feels much more gratifying than posting several of the most previous updates. Maybe that's just the lingering sense of euphoria brought on by the fact that I am finally out of grad school. Whatever it may be, I feel quaintly proud of this chapter. Enjoy it!

The largest men in the Seven Kingdoms came from House Clegane. The largest women came from House Mormont. Wed one to the other, and the product of their union would likely be taller than either. In theory, at least.

Rickard Clegane, the son of Lord Gregor and Lady Dacey, weighed seventeen pounds when he entered the world. No newborn babe in Westerosi history had ever weighed that much. Nevertheless, he had grown at a slightly smaller rate than one may have expected.

His father had been six feet tall at the age of eleven. Rickard had recently seen his twelfth nameday, yet he stood two inches' shy of six feet. Even so, he was bigger than all of his friends, even the ones who had a few years on him. Maester Kennick claimed it was quite possible that he might ultimately rise higher than even the Mountain himself. But I've a way to go before I'm there.

Needless to say, Rickard would need more than a couple feet before he could even begin to hope to match his lord father. He was not a man grown, even if he had the height of one. He still had much to learn about politics, leadership, combat, diplomacy and other critical issues. As it happened, Rickard was a very inquisitive person by nature. As such, he was always willing to learn.

Of the twenty towers in Moat Cailin, Rickard Clegane had unrestricted access to seventeen of them. The Pleasure Tower, the Drunkard's Tower, and the Meeting Tower were the only ones he would ever be denied entry to.

In the eyes of his mother, he was too young to lay with a woman or consume excessive quantities of alcohol. Hence the restrictions on the first two. Hopefully in a few years, Mother will allow me to visit the Pleasure Tower and the Drunkard's Tower whenever I please. Rickard was aware that he could have simply snuck into either tower when Lady Dacey was not around. But he respected his mother too much to disobey her so. That aside, Rickard did not have much taste for whores or wine in the first place. He simply did not appreciate being denied the opportunity to sample either.

He did, however, possess a great desire to expand his intelligence. The Knowledge Tower could generally appease his thirst, but the library and Maester Luwin did not hold all the information in the Known World. Then again, no place in the Known World could legitimately claim to hold every piece of worthwhile information. All the same, a particular amount of meaningful, exclusive knowledge could sometimes be acquired in certain places of the world.
The Meeting Tower has to be one of those places. Nothing anyone else said could dissuade Rickard from believing that. The Meeting Tower was, after all, the place where the secret council convened.

For the last fifteen years, Lord Gregor Clegane had handled all the most sensitive affairs of the Legion without Banners with the aid of his secret council. The council was typically composed of twelve Legionnaires. Two of that dozen were Father and Mother. The other ten were representatives from each region of Westeros, including the land north of the Wall.

A total of sixteen people had served on the secret council. Osmund Kettleblack and Garth Hightower had died during Greyjoy’s Rebellion, and they had been replaced by Lothor Brune and Willas Tyrell. Victarion Greyjoy had returned to the Iron Islands to take up his role as the Lord of Pyke, so his nephew Maron Greyjoy had taken his place. Allard Seaworth was currently occupied with business across the Narrow Sea, so Renly Baratheon was temporarily serving on the council in his place.

The secret council was called thus not because the names of its members were meant to be confidential, but because their affairs and the topics of their discussions were kept absolutely classified. It was so clandestine, in fact, that those sixteen people were the only ones who had ever set foot in the main chamber of the Meeting Tower. The only ones so far, that is.

Rickard was aware that Lord Gregor Clegane meant for him to assume command of the Legion without Banners someday. It’s quite likely that day will not be for many years. In spite of that, Rickard was hoping that his father would elect to bring him into his inner circle before that day. After all, how can I be a suitable commander if I am oblivious to the Legion's most delicate activities?

Rickard knew better than to merely ask Father to be included in the meetings. He would no doubt refuse, and were I to insist, he’d give me at least half a dozen reasons why not. Obviously, there was the issue of Rickard's youth. Furthermore, all the members of the secret council were full-fledged Legionnaires, most of them for over a decade. Presently, Rickard was not even old enough to be a Legionnaire-in-training.

For now, all Rickard could do was loiter outside the Meeting Tower whenever the secret council gathered and brood on when his father would finally decide to entrust him with their doings.

That was precisely what he was doing at this time. Incidentally, he had been doing quite a bit of it lately.

Recently, the secret council had been assembled much more frequently than usual. Normally, they only met once a fortnight. Sometimes, even less often than that. However, they had gone to Meeting Tower thrice a week every week for the last month. That was six times their normal rate. Something atypical must be afoot.

Apparently, he was not the only person with that line of thought.

"How long have they been in there?" a voice asked from behind.

He turned to the owner of the voice and saw her standing a few feet away. He answered her with "Around an hour. Maybe two."

"Have you been out here ever since they went inside?" she presumed.

"Just about, my lady," Rickard affirmed.
The young woman smirked and proclaimed, "Rick, I've told you afore; you needn't call me 'my lady.' My given name will suffice."

Rickard shrugged dismissively and stated "As you wish… Rhaella."

Rhaella was a dark-haired maid of nine and ten years. She had been named for the late sister-wife of Mad King Aerys, though her birth had preceded the Queen's death by three or four years. Since that was back when the Targaryens were still in power, that name was by no means out of place.

This Rhaella exhibited the grace and essence of a highborn lady, despite the fact she was of relatively common birth. Her parents had been retainers to House Dayne of Starfall. Her mother was a native of Dorne, but her father had been from somewhere else in the Seven Kingdoms. He had died shortly after she was born, so she had not known much about him or his background. In any case, she tended to favor her mother in appearance; her Dornish heritage was plentifully evident in both her complexion and her skin tone.

Rhaella had arrived at the moat about twenty days earlier. Her party had been a small one; there were only five other people apart from her. One of them was her mother. The other four were a tradesman, a sellsword, an old knight, and a guardsman who had sworn service to the Dornishwomen.

Lord Howland Reed had provided them an escort up the Causeway. Father had been there when they arrived at the southern gate. Naturally, he had been expecting them. It is rare that anyone ventures here without him being aware of it beforehand.

While Rickard had not been present when Lord Gregor received Rhaella and her party, he had seen his father direct the Dornishwomen and their companions around Moat Cailin in the days that followed. Father seemed rather friendly with them. Then again, the Mountain always went out of his way to make all the moat's visitors feel welcome. Still, there was something quaint about his interaction with Rhaella and her mother. Rickard was almost inclined to suspect that his father may have known them even before they came to the moat. But that would be ludicrous. He's only been to Dorne twice since the Targaryens fell from grace, and neither visit was to Starfall.

Rickard had already asked Rhaella and her mother, Shaara, if they had ever been acquainted with his father before they came to the moat. He was surprised by the vagueness of the answers he had received. They did not deny his allegation, but they offered no compelling evidence to support it, either.

Perhaps I am just overthinking Father's ambassadorial mannerisms. Oh, well. If he and Rhaella actually have a history, I'll learn of it in time. If I'm meant to learn any of those precious secrets of his, I suppose he'll share them with me. Someday.

Whatever the case, Rickard was certain there was nothing "intimate" between Father and Rhaella. Not only were their encounters always out in the open and in the company of other people, but the Mountain was not the only Clegane she mingled with.

Rhaella had gotten to know Mother quite a bit, as well. It was not difficult for them to share in each other's interests. They actually had a number of similar interests, such as their combat prowess and their appreciation for other warrior women.

Rhaella also spent some time with Lord Gregor's children. Rickard did not know what could have sparked her intrigue in him and his siblings. After all, he was seven years her junior; his siblings, even younger. Nevertheless, it had not taken them long to come to enjoy her company. Rickard quickly discovered she was a delight to be around.
At this time, when Rhaella met up with Rickard on the exterior of the Meeting Tower, she had not come alone. Two men had been in her company. To be precise, one man and one boy. The man was the knight in Shaara's employ. Ser Rebinald, I believe that was his name. Why can't I remember his name? It seems he always goes wherever Rhaella goes, and I've seen much of her since she arrived. Rickard knew the boy's name, though. He would have been a lousy brother if he did not.

The boy stepped forward and humorously observed "You have a talent for wasting time, Rick."

"And I suppose you've passed the day working towards some grand accomplishment, Al," Rickard sarcastically remarked.

Alyver Clegane scoffed at the dryness of that statement. Then he donned a serious expression, folded his arms, and gazed at the outer wall of the Meeting Tower, saying "At least some day, you'll actually be permitted to go inside that building. I have no such assurances."

"Who says you don't?" Rickard countered, "When I'm the lord of the moat, you'll be free to go in there as often as you like."

One facet Alyver shared with his elder brother was a yearning for knowledge, though his was more a sense of childlike curiosity than an actual wish to hone his intelligence. In time, he may come to enjoy learning for the rewards it provides, just as I do.

"I will hold you to your word," Alyver muttered slyly. Nine namedays old, and he's already a smartass. I don't know whether to be proud or exasperated.

"Fear not," Rickard asserted, turning towards the entrance of the Meeting Tower, "Someday, we'll both be on the other side of that door."

"You lads are rather young to be so invested in your lord father's doings," Ser Rebinald noted, "A word of advice: you are only young once in your life. You should treasure your youth while it lasts."

"We treasure it plenty, Ser Rebinald," Alyver declared, "Be that as it may, Cleganes grow up faster than other children. In mind as well as body."

"He speaks true," Rickard conceded, "And with the Long Night fast approaching, we cannot afford to squander any time on the frivolities of childhood."

By her countenance, Rhaella seemed impressed with that observation "You may still be boys, but you speak with the wisdom of old men."

"Perhaps you could tell our lord father that, Rhaella," Alyver proposed, only half-joking, "It may sway him to allow us to attend the next meeting of the secret council."

"He'll include us when he sees fit," Rickard hastily declared, "No sooner nor later."

"Your brother has the right of it," Ser Rebinald told the second son of Lord Gregor Clegane.

"I suppose he does," Alyver grudgingly admitted.

Not long after this exchange, the front door of the Meeting Tower swung open and the twelve members of the secret council stepped outside. Most of them went their own ways. Ser Brynden Tully headed towards the Novice Tower to inspect the newest recruits. Tormund Giantsbane and Smalljon Umber went to the training yard for a few rounds of "friendly" sparring. Gerion Lannister headed off to the Smelting Tower to inspect the yield from the week's mining operations. Lothor Brune and Renly Baratheon headed to the Drunkard's Tower to lounge and have a few drinks (and to ensure that no one there had too much before noon). Maron Greyjoy went to the Worship Tower to give his daily prayer to the Drowned God. Lyn Corbray made for the Pleasure Tower for... predictable reasons.

Gregor Clegane, Dacey Mormont, Willas Tyrell, and Oberyn Martell lingered by the entrance to the Meeting Tower for a couple minutes. It only took the Lord and Lady of Moat Cailin a moment to notice Rickard and Alyver standing nearby. They smiled at their sons and walked over to them.

"Good morning, Father, Mother," Rickard bade his parents.

"Is it still morning?" Mother thought aloud.

" Barely, but yes," Alyver confirmed.

"That is fortunate," Father pronounced, "There is a task I must see to before mid-afternoon."

"Why mid-afternoon?" Rickard queried.

"We're expecting company today," Father apprised him. He then looked around at those who were in the immediate area and declared "Oberyn, Willas, Rhaella, I would speak with you in private sometime before then."

"As you command, my lord," Rhaella avowed. The heir to Highgarden and the Red Viper nodded their acknowledgment.

"If none of you has any objections, I propose we have that talk now," Willas Tyrell recommended.

"At present, I have nothing of greater precedence to do," Oberyn Martell stated.

"Neither do I," Father murmured. He looked to Rhaella and asked "Do you by chance know where your mother is?"

"I believe she is still in the Boarder Tower," the Dornishwoman professed.

Father claimed "This matter concerns her, as well. So let us make a detour to the Boarder Tower. Once we have found Shaara, we shall congregate in a more discrete place."

"Sounds like a plan," Oberyn said wryly. And Father has no shortage of those.

Gregor Clegane, Willas Tyrell, Oberyn Martell, and Rhaella swiftly headed to the southwest towards the Boarder Tower. Ser Rebinald followed close behind, keeping no more than ten feet of space between himself and the Dornishwoman.

Rickard still did not know why Rhaella and her mother were at Moat Cailin in the first place. Of course, these days, people were not required to have a legitimate reason to come to the moat. There were some who visited it for the experience, and some for the simple pleasure of seeing the base of the Legion without Banners.

All the same, the longer Rhaella was at the moat, the more Rickard was induced to think that she had some explicit motivation for coming. Her motivation may be hidden, but it is most certainly there. He was inclined to believe that her purpose had something to do with Willas Tyrell.

The first day Rhaella came to the moat, Father had led both her and Willas up to his solar. Rickard could not say for a certainty how long they were up there, but it had to have been for at least three hours. When they finally came back down, Rhaella and Willas had spent the rest of the day together. Ever since then, they had gotten progressively more comfortable in each other's presence.

Just then, when they departed from the vicinity, Willas and Rhaella walked side-by-side. At one point, Rickard noticed that he took her hand in his. I could be wrong, but I would say they were enamored. Or well on the way to it. Rickard wondered if Willas and Rhaella were falling in love with each other. While it may have been likely, it was quite impossible. Social norms would never permit a union between the heir to a Great House and the daughter of a retainer to a noble house, especially when the former was from the Reach and the latter was from Dorne. They may get along here, but south of the Neck… not so much.

It had occurred to Rickard that Rhaella may have had more than one goal when she came to the moat. If so, her secondary objective may have concerned Jon Snow, Father's squire and one of Rickard's closest friends. Rhaella did not spend as much time with Jon as she did with Willas, but she spent enough that Rickard found it noteworthy. He could not guess what interest she may have had in the bastard of Winterfell. Perhaps she was actually more interested in his direwolf Ghost than she was in Jon. She did seem to get along with Myrna well enough, though. Whatever Rhaella's interest in Jon is, let us hope it is nothing suggestive. Not only would that complicate her relationship with Willas, but Ygritte might have made her life the Seven Hells.

Once Father, Rhaella, Willas, Prince Oberyn, and Ser Rebinald were gone from the area, Rickard was left alone with Mother and Alyver.

Lady Dacey Clegane looked to her firstborn and cheekily muttered "Are you convinced that if you stand here long enough, your father will let you inside the Meeting Tower sooner?"

"Surely you know me better than that, Mother," Rickard bluntly replied.

"I do know that for the last four weeks, you've waited outside this building every time your father held council," Mother contended, "Every time we've adjourned, I've found you standing in that exact same spot when I exit."

"She is correct," Alyver coincided with a smirk, "You are obsessed, you do realize?"

"Is it wrong of me to harbor an interest in Father's duties?" Rickard irately refuted.

"No," Mother asserted, "Someday, they will be your duties, as well."

"Which is why I am so interested," Rickard revealed.

Mother lightly scoffed. It was not a mocking scoff; it was more an amused one. She then formed a kind expression on his face, stepped closer to her firstborn, and suggested "Rick, what say you and I walk the perimeter of the moat?"

Well, I have nothing better to do right now. "Certainly, Mother."

As Rickard moved closer to Lady Dacey Clegane, she turned to Alyver and told him "You're welcome to come along, Al."

"I'd be delighted to, Mother," the second Clegane son stated sincerely, "But I promised Vallory I'd show her the proper way to wield a sword today."

For a moment, their mother appeared a little concerned by the implications of that statement. Alyver told her in assurance "Worry not; it'll be made of wood, not steel."
"All the same, please be careful," Mother cautioned him, "Even with a wooden sword, she could get hurt."

Says the woman who was swinging a morningstar when other girls her age were playing with dolls.

"Everything will be fine," Alyver insisted. He sounds as though he knows what he is doing. Mother must have thought the same, as she grinned and nodded.

Alyver headed off to the Children's Tower to locate their sister. After that, the woman from Bear Island turned back to her firstborn and proposed "Shall we take that walk?"

Now it was Rickard who grinned and nodded.

Over the course of the subsequent three hours, the heir to Moat Cailin and his lady mother went all around the moat. They spent most of that interval atop the outer walls.

Moat Cailin's design was very different from that of other holdfasts. Instead of having one main edifice with several smaller structures constructed around it, it was composed of twenty towers of relatively equal size. Apart from the Armament Tower, the Banquet Tower, the Lord's Tower, the Meeting Tower, and the Infantry Tower, all the towers of Moat Cailin had at least one side along the outer wall. Furthermore, all the towers were connected to two or more of the other towers by way of both stone walls and catwalks.

By traversing the entire length of the outer wall, one could move between all fifteen of the outward-facing towers without even setting foot on the ground. That was just what Rickard and his mother did.

They started along the Captains' Tower, as it was nearest to the Meeting Tower. From there, they passed through the Smelting Tower, and they went completely around the Pleasure Tower. Just like we always do.

They continued westward along the outer wall in what Father would have called a counterclockwise route. Proceeding eastward would have been a clockwise route. Clockwise and counterclockwise were two of the many terms his father had established. I still wonder what a 'clock' might be.

There were guards stationed all along the outer wall every twenty feet. None of these guards were Legionnaires; they were all sworn to House Clegane. Every time Lady Dacey Clegane and Rickard walked past them, the sentinels dipped their heads respectfully. Many of them muttered "milady" to Mother, "milord" to Rickard, or both. All who spoke did so with genuine admiration in their tones. Rickard appreciated that; it demonstrated just how highly House Clegane's retainers viewed their lord and his family. Of course, it is rather difficult not to like the Mountain.

Gregor Clegane was as good a father as he was a lord and commander, but sometimes his ability to manage all three at once was challenged. There were times when his obligations to the realm and his retainers had to come before those of his family. Rickard did not begrudge his father for that. The Mountain was simply doing what was required and expected of him as a noble lord of the Seven Kingdoms.

Dacey Clegane was often as busy as her lord husband, but her duties as Lady of Moat Cailin included managing the household and raising the Lord's children. As such, she was more often available for Rickard and his siblings. She was the one he normally went to whenever he needed guidance or advice. This time, it is she who came to me instead. That generally happened whenever Dacey wished to discuss an intimate matter with her son.

One of their best ways to bond was by walking around the moat. They did this often. But not just for the exercise and the sights. These walks doubled as talks. As it happened, that was the fundamental purpose of them.

The subjects of their conversations typically varied. Some of the things they talked about that day were the moat's new trade agreement with Qarth, the recent slight decline in the Legion's enlistment rate, and how the marriage contract between Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell had been finalized.

Around midday, they reached the Flour Tower and stopped there for a bite to eat. After that, they continued onwards to the Worship Tower. It was there that the nature of the conversation shifted from casual to personal.

As they passed over Merchants' Block, Lady Dacey turned to her eldest son and asked him "Rickard, did I tell you how your father and I first met?"

"No, he did," Rickard stated plainly.

Mother chuckled at the straightforwardness of his answer. Then she enquired "Do you know what was remarkable about that occasion?"

Rickard thought on that for a minute. He tried to recall all the details Father had told him about when he and Mother had first met. Ultimately, he shrugged and muttered "Off the top of my head… I cannot think of anything particularly remarkable. I do not mean to be rude when I say that, Mother."

"Oh, it is quite alright, Rick," Mother reassured him, "Because you are correct. There was nothing remarkable about it."

Rickard was perplexed. "There wasn't?"

"Well, it did mark the moment when the Legion without Banners gained its first female member," Lady Dacey stated with a smile, "But that would have inevitably happened in any case. I am speaking of what occurred between your father and myself. There was nothing special in the least."

Rickard raised an eyebrow and gazed off to his side. He uttered softly "So, there was nothing passed between you? Nothing at all?"

"There was amity," Mother disclosed, "But that exists between every occupant of Moat Cailin. Even so, that was all there was between Lord Gregor Clegane and me on our first encounter. Your father and I were strictly colleagues."

"And how long did you remain 'strictly colleagues?'" Rickard stated inquiringly.

"The entire rest of that year, and much of the following one," she apprised him, "We gradually grew closer as top officers of the Legion. At some point, we discovered we had chemistry. However, we did not acknowledge that chemistry until our first joint mission to the Vale."

"The one that ended in failure?" Rickard asked rhetorically.

Mother hesitated a moment before she mumbled "Yes… I suppose it was a failure."

Baelish died before you could get him to Harrenhal. Sounds every bit a failure to me. Rickard noted his mother did not seem so convinced of that.

She continued with "While the mission did not end in success, it did produce some fortunate results. On our way back to the moat, your father and I confessed our true feelings for each other. After we admitted that we were compatible, he suggested we solidify our relationship."

"I assume you accepted?" Rickard muttered.

"I told him I would ask your grandmother for her blessing first," Mother recounted, "Once she gave it, then I accepted. In the time since then, I have never once regretted my decision."

Rickard smiled at that and nodded his head slightly. Then he folded his arms and commented "This is all very fascinating, Mother. Truly it is. But why are you telling me this now?"

There must be a point to it.

He found out what it was a moment later. Lady Dacey Clegane notified him "When I first met your father, I thought of him as a fellow warrior and my leader, but nothing more. I swore him my allegiance as a soldier. I never thought I would devote myself to him as a woman. Back then, I had no plans to wed any man. Now, I cannot imagine sharing a bed with anyone else. To me, that is a sign that relationships can be wholly unpredictable. One never knows how they will change or where they will end."

Rickard reflected on those words, and he found he could not argue with any of them. He admitted"That's all very true. There is no way to tell how a relationship turn out. Strangers can become friends. Acquaintances can become lovers. Friends can become enemies."

"And underlings can become leaders," Mother added in. It was here that the full meaning of this lecture was made clear. "You won't always be just my son, Rickard. Before too long, you will be old enough to enter the Legion without Banners. When that day comes, you will also be my soldier. Gods willing, someday you will be my commander."

He could not decide if he was more alarmed or astonished by that statement. He shook his head softly and murmured "You give me too much praise, Mother. How could I ever give you orders?"

"When your father passes on, you will be obliged to," Dacey Clegane reminded him, "Commanding an army and heading a house may appear very different from each other. But they are more alike than you might think. When you are lord of this house, I will no longer be its lady. In the same fashion, when you assume control of the Legion, I will have no official authority over you. I will only be your lieutenant and your advisor."

"No," Rickard firmly disputed, "You'll still be my mother. I'll still be your son. A son should love and respect his mother as a man just as he did in boyhood."

Mother appeared touched by that declaration. She smiled at him, placed two gentle hands on his shoulders, and pulled him into a hug. She whispered "And even when the boy grows into a man, the mother loves him no less, either."

Most adolescents may have been embarrassed to be so affectionate with their mother in public. Rickard was not one of them. When his mother hugged him, he returned the embrace thusly. In his mind, domestic love was the purest form of love; it was not to be scorned or made ridicule of. Aside from that, Rickard and his mother were taller than anyone else in the immediate area. So even if he was not the heir to the moat and she was not its lady, he was not concerned that they would deride him. They know I am big enough to teach any of them a lesson in manners. And I will,
When Rickard and his lady mother pulled apart, she looked him in the eye and asked him not unkindly "Rickard, if you were to become lord of Moat Cailin in the near future, would you be reluctant to take up the role?"

"Of course I would," Rickard replied straightforwardly, "I would still do my duty and assume the lordship, but I would be far from pleased to do so. I do not say that simply because I feel I'd be unprepared for the role. It would be a grievous blow to all of us if we were to lose Father."

"Yes, it would be," Mother solemnly concurred.

Rickard suddenly became a little anxious. "Mother, is something wrong with Father? Is that why we are having this discussion?"

"No, your father is fine," Dacey Clegane assured her son, "Aside from near-excessive levels of stress and the occasional migraine, that is."

"I would expect nothing less from a man in his position," Rickard commented drily.

Mother smirked and gave a small nod. Then she put on her "serious" expression, and she said "I know you wish to be included in the secret council meetings. Your father knows, as well."

"I cannot claim to be surprised," Rickard Clegane uttered, "Since you've found me outside the Meeting Tower after each of the council's sessions, my desires were not what you would call 'subtle.'"

"Rick, we knew of your desires even before the last turn of the moon," Mother told him.

The heir to Moat Cailin was stunned. He began "How…?"

"Parents always know such things," Dacey Clegane claimed. Hardly an original explanation. But a fitting one all the same. "Your father and I have talked at length on when you should start to attend the secret council meetings."

Now Rickard was pleasantly surprised. He asked hopefully "Do you think I am ready? Or on the verge of 'ready'?"

"We have not reached a verdict just yet," Mother revealed, as though she was discussing a business matter, "If the choice were mine alone, I would bring you into the secret council very soon. Perhaps as soon as our very next meeting. I believe you deserve to be in the know. Alas, your father believes you need more time."

Rickard grimaced a bit. "Would it be impertinent to ask why?"

"Mainly, he wishes for you to focus more on your duties to our house," Lady Dacey Clegane explained, "There is also the fact that you are not yet a member of the Legion. He argues that we should wait another year."

Rickard nodded grimly. This does not bode well.

Even if his mother was on his side, he was well-aware that the final decision would ultimately be his father's. After all, Dacey Clegane was Lord Gregor's officer and his lady wife. It was her responsibility to uphold his decisions, just as it was Rickard's to accept them.
Still, it was not a totally lost cause. By his next nameday, he would be old enough to enter the Legion. He could only hope for the position of a squire, but he would still be a part of the organization. After that, he might earn a spot on the secret council.

"Just one full year," Rickard mumbled, "If fortune smiles on me."

"Do not despair just yet, Rick," Dacey advised her son, grinning mischievously, "I have ways of swaying your father's mind."

Rickard stifled the urge to laugh. "I did not need to know that."

Dacey snickered at that. Then she stated "Regardless of what your father decides, I would ask that you be patient."

"I give you my word that I will be," Rickard asserted. Though I would still much prefer to be in the circle sooner rather than later.

As though he had spoken those words instead of thought them, Mother looked at her son sympathetically and told him "If it gives you any consolation, your father does not share everything he knows with the secret council. There are certain things he does not tell even me."

"Every person is entitled to a few secrets," Rickard contended casually, "I do not want to join the secret council just so I can be aware of the Legion's private affairs. I want to join so I can be of use to you and Father."

"I never once thought otherwise," Lady Dacey Clegane pronounced, "With the threat of the Long Night approaching, we will need every bit of help we can get. However, you know as well as I do that it is not enough to be prepared for the Long Night."

"Indeed," Rickard conceded, "We must think beyond it, as well."

"Just so," Dacey Clegane confirmed. Next there was an interval of relative quietness in the area. Following that, Dacey bore a wide grin and stated "On the subject of thinking beyond the Long Night, it is not enough for a family to merely survive. It must prosper, as well. Therefore, I have another important question to ask. Have you given any thought to the future of this house?"

"I think about the future of this house all the time," Rickard claimed.

"Is that so?" Dacey uttered tersely, "Then how much thought have you given as to who you'd like to continue the house's future with?"

Rickard quickly realized what she meant. She wants to know if I have any prospects for the next lady of the moat.

"Truthfully, I have not given the topic very much thought at all, Mother," he admitted to the woman from Bear Island. But I probably will, and fairly soon.

His assumption was correct. Dacey Clegane smiled again and declared "Your father and I are willing to consider any eligible woman for you, so long as she is not a Frey."

Again, I am not surprised. While Father always preached fair treatment and equality, Rickard knew that Gregor Clegane did not like most Freys. There were some he could stomach. But not many. "Why all the hostility towards House Frey? I know they've had an unsavory reputation for the last century. But I would say they've begun to regain their honor these last ten years."
"Perhaps they have," Dacey Clegane uttered cockily, "Another three or four generations, and they'll be on the same level as us."

Rickard snickered at her observation. "Very well. No Frey brides."

He could tell Mother was pleased by that.

Rickard leaned back against the wall, rested his hands on the rail support, and thought aloud "It may be too soon to rush to any conclusions, but I believe it would be most advantageous if I were to marry a Northern girl."

"I was hoping you might say that," Dacey Clegane revealed, "I have a number of healthy prospects lined up for you."

This should be 'mesmerizing.' As he remained slouched against the Wall, Rickard gazed up at his mother and proclaimed "Alright, Mother. Who have you in mind?"

"Off the top of my head, I can think of at least a dozen highborn girls that would suit you," Mother declared, "Among them, I believe the three most promising ones are Wylla Manderly, Klara Dustin, and Talia Forrester."

Rickard gave three nods of approval. He perceived "Each brings her own rewards. A contract with White Harbor would strengthen our access to the sea. A contract with Barrowtown would improve our relations with the houses of the Barrowlands and the Boltons. A contract with Ironrath would increase our supply of ironwood. Of course, I have never met any of the three girls, but that can easily be remedied by scheduling a trip to each of their ancestral homes. Or they could come to visit me."

"Where would you like to start?" Mother queried.

"Let us not get ahead of ourselves," Rickard requested, "I would like some time to reflect further on the advantages and disadvantages of each match. Then I shall pick which one to pursue first."

"That seems a fair arrangement," Mother conceded, "Take all the time you need to think on this matter. I do not wish to rush you, nor do I intend to. Whoever you marry should be your choice and yours alone. Your father and I had that prerogative; it is only right that you should have it, as well."

"I am most grateful for that, Mother," Rickard said appreciatively.

Rickard would indeed consider all the advantages and disadvantages of marrying each of those three girls, just as he claimed he would. However, while he did not doubt that Wylla Manderly, Klara Dustin, and Talia Forrester would each make a fine wife for some man, he was not especially interested in being that man in the case of any of the three.

Unbeknownst to Mother, Father, and just about everyone else at the moat, Rickard had forged a close bond with another highborn girl of the North. Currently, they were good friends and nothing more. But there was potential for their relationship to grow into something more. Secretly, he was hoping it would grow into something more.

Unfortunately, even if it did, it was unlikely that the two of them could ever be together as husband and wife. For one thing, she was one of the few girls in the Seven Kingdoms whose birth was even higher than Rickard's. Winning the approval of her lord father and lady mother would have been a tremendous challenge in and of itself.

An even greater challenge would have been to win her approval. Rickard was aware that she had no interest in marriage and children. As a matter of fact, she was almost totally averse to the very concept of being a lady. She much preferred riding horses, hunting game, and sparring with weapons. She even carried her own sword. Her "Needle," as she called it.

She reminds me very much of Mother. Maybe that's why I enjoy her company so.

Although it seemed highly improbable that she and Rickard would ever be joined together, as long as there was still the slightest possibility that they could be, he was not going to give up on her. He just felt so comfortable being who he was around her, and she felt the same with him. That much I know for a certainty.

Be that as it may, he was prepared to deal with disappointment. There was a very high probability that he would have to settle for someone else. He had come to terms with that likelihood already. If he had to sacrifice his own happiness for the good of his house and the realm, he was willing to do so. There were more honorable men who had lost much more for lesser causes.

Near the beginning of the last part of their conversation, Rickard and his mother had stopped walking. They were still atop the section of the outer wall that connected the Flour Tower to the Worship Tower. Whenever they discussed personal topics, they preferred to be standing still. It helped them concentrate better.

They were about to continue walking when a shrill noise broke through the calm atmosphere. It only took Rickard a few seconds to realize that it was the sound of a horn being blown. He listened closely, and it appeared to originate from the southwest. It's coming from the harbor.

"Someone's sailing up the Cut," he thought aloud.

"It would seem so," Mother agreed.

"How about we investigate?" he cheerfully proposed. She nodded her approval of the idea.

They reached the harbor just in time to see the gates being opened. A lone vessel passed through them. It appeared to be a Dornish galley. That by itself caught Rickard's fancy. The Dornish had infamously few ships, and each of them was only put to use on special occasions. What could one be doing this far north?

Soon enough, the galley pulled into the docks. After that, the gangplank was extended, and four people disembarked. One of them was the ship's captain. The other three appeared to be passengers. Rickard noticed that the captain and two of the passengers were Dornish. The fourth might have been, as well, but it was difficult to tell; he was helmed. And armed. That's a fine sword he's got there.

It was then that Rickard and his mother saw that a welcoming party had been assembled on the waterfront. Father was at the head of it. Prince Oberyn Martell, Rhaella, her mother Shaara, and Ser Rebinald were there, as well.

Rickard Clegane and his lady mother watched as Prince Oberyn stepped up to the two passengers who did not wear a helm and embraced them both. Shaara walked over to the helmed individual and embraced him, as well. After that, Ser Rebinald shook that man's hand.

A moment later, Rhaella stepped up to the first two passengers, and the three of them shared an even longer and tighter embrace. It was the type of embrace one might give to an estranged family member. Perhaps they are family. Then again, as far as I know, House Martell and the retainers of House Dayne have no immediate kin. Then again, I am not a professional on Dornish genealogies.
After the six Dornish people and Ser Rebinald were finished greeting one another, Father approached them. Evidently, he is officially welcoming the new arrivals to the moat.

The helmed man shook Father's hand. So did the younger of the unarmed passengers, who was also a man. However, the elder of the unarmed passengers, who was clearly a woman, disregarded the Mountain's hand altogether and embraced him instead. Father was currently standing with his back to Rickard, but based on how his head was inclined, it looked as though the Dornishwoman had induced him to bring his head down to her level. It was almost as though she had kissed him.

My eyes must be deceiving me. Father would never be unfaithful to Mother, nor she to him.

Once all the formalities had been dispensed with, Lord Gregor Clegane and Prince Oberyn Martell led the others off the waterfront. They hastily made their way towards the stone staircase along the outer wall. This staircase happened to lead up to the section of the outer wall that Rickard and his mother were standing on top of.

"It looks as though they're headed this way," Rickard pointed out.

"I believe you're right," Lady Dacey Clegane validated.

A minute later, Lord Gregor Clegane and his party ascended to the top of the staircase. Mere moments after stepping onto the outer wall, the Mountain saw his wife and his heir standing a few dozen feet away. He flashed them a smile, and then he and those in his company ambled over to them.

"Afternoon, Father," Rickard bade Lord Gregor Clegane, who nodded in acknowledgment. He then shifted his attention to the three passengers from the Dornish vessel, and he remarked "I presume this is the aforementioned company you were expecting?"

"You assume correctly," Father confirmed. He proceeded to introduce the three newest visitors. He started with the youngest of them, who had to be about five years Rickard's elder. "This is Edgar Sand, the only male of Oberyn Martell's infamous Sand Snakes."

Then he pointed out the armed man with the concealed face and disclosed "This is Ihtos, a freerider in service to House Nymeros Martell."

Finally, he gestured to the woman and declared "And this is Princess Elia Martell, Prince Oberyn's sister."

Although Ihtos appeared less than genial, Edgar Sand and Princess Elia seemed friendly enough.

Father then approached Mother and Rickard and encouraged them to come closer to the new arrivals. He swiftly introduced them, as well.

He placed his hand on his firstborn's shoulder and announced "I would like you all to meet my son and heir, Rickard Clegane."

Remembering his pleasantries, Rickard stepped forward and extended his hand to Ihtos, Edgar Sand, and Princess Elia Martell. He told them in a genuine tone "I am honored to make your acquaintance."

Ihtos shook his hand rather stiffly. Edgar's handshake was a little gentler but just as firm. Elia did not bother with the handshake. Instead, without any warning whatsoever, she rapidly moved closer to Rickard, placed her hands on his cheeks, and kissed him softly on the lips.
The kiss only lasted a split-second, but it caught him off his guard. In effect, Rickard froze in astonishment. He stood absolutely still for about ten seconds before he regained his senses. I knew the Dornish were more casual about sex and working charms on others than the rest of Westeros. Even so... I did not expect that. All the same, the kiss was not unpleasant. Princess Elia had a rather enticing kiss for a woman in her early forties.

Mother giggled, moved up beside him, and muttered humorously "Still convinced that you should only consider girls from the North?"

Rickard did not even elect to dignify that with a proper response. He just rolled his eyes, which made his mother giggle even more.

"You must be Lady Cleagne," Edgar Sand conjectured.

"Correct," she avowed.

Father stood behind Mother and pronounced "This is my beautiful wife, Dacey of House Mormont."

"She is beautiful, my lord," Edgar Sand proclaimed, "I will grant you that,"

"Well, I thank you, Edgar," Lady Dacey Clegane muttered, flushing.

Ihtos gave Mother another rough handshake. Again, Edgar's handshake was more delicate, and this time, he placed a chivalrous kiss on Mother's knuckles.

Mother moved to shake Princess Elia's hand, too. This time, it actually looked as though Elia was going to accept the hand. She almost did. But at the very last moment, she sauntered past the taller woman's arm, took a hold of her cheeks, and kissed her full on the lips, too. This kiss lasted longer than a split-second.

Rickard had to bite his tongue to keep himself from laughing. When Princess Elia pulled away, he could not decide whose facial expression was more priceless at that time: Mother's or Father's.

Elia Martell placed her hands on her hips and proclaimed "All this time, I've been under the impression that you were a very lucky woman, Lady Dacey. But it could be that your husband is an even luckier man."

Rickard could no longer resist his urge to laugh. He promptly broke out guffawing. Prince Oberyn, Edgar Sand, Rhaella, and Shaara soon joined in. Before long, Father, Princess Elia, and even Mother began to chuckle a bit, as well.

When the laughter faded away, Gregor Clegane told the three new guests "You must be tired after your voyage. What say I show you to the Border Tower?"

"We would appreciate that, my lord," Edgar Sand stated gratefully.

"Indeed," Ihtos coincided.

"Your quarters have already been prepared for you," Father declared, "Follow me; I'll take you to them."

Lord Gregor Clegane, Prince Oberyn Martell, Princess Elia Martell, Edgar Sand, Rhaella, Shaara, Ihtos, and Ser Rebinald continued along the outer wall. Just before she left, Elia flashed a grin towards Rickard and his mother. It was probably only meant to be a harmless, innocent gesture.
Had someone outside of Dorne made it, it most certainly would have been. But what would the Dornish know about harmless, innocent gestures?

Soon, Rickard was left alone with his mother once more. He noticed Mother still seemed half-paralyzed by shock over what had just happened.

Rickard smirked, stepped up to her, and said inquisitively "First time kissing a woman, Mother?"

She gradually turned to face her son and slowly nodded her head. "It was."

"Don't take it so hard," Rickard beckoned her audaciously, "It was my first time, as well."

That was all it took to encourage his mother to overcome her surprise over her introduction to Elia Martell and to instead get another laugh out of it. Rickard decided to join in the laugh. He laughed for three reasons. Firstly, he wished to partake in his mother's amusement. Secondly, he had just had his first intimate experience with a member of the opposite sex. Third and most of all, he felt very relaxed and at ease at that moment. He had not felt so tranquil in quite a while. He wanted to savor that feeling; there was a chance he would not get to experience it again for a very long time.
The Wolfswood looked just as she remembered it. Strong, immense, and somewhat intimidating to gaze upon. Intimidating, even to those who were born in it.

As intimidating as it was, the wolfswood also gave its residents a feeling of empowerment. Ironwood grew in abundance there; the healthiest stable supply in all of Westeros. For centuries, House Forrester had held domain over this supply. It had enabled them to develop prestigious connections with other houses, especially in the last ten years.

That was how Mira Forrester had come to serve as handmaiden to Margaery Tyrell. The idea had been her lady mother's originally. Lady Elissa Forrester had debated it would be in the best interests of their house if Mira became acquainted in such a way with the daughter of the Warden of the South.

Lord Gregor Forrester had not been in favor of that idea at first, but he had chosen to trust his wife's judgment. After all, her family was from the Crownlands, so she definitely knew more of southron cultures than he did.

Mira Forrester had travelled to Highgarden by way of the Kingsroad. She had returned by almost the same route, only she had stopped at Winterfell for a few weeks first. Either way, the road to Ironrath was a smooth one. Seems more peaceful than I remember.

"Excited, my lady?" Robb Stark enquired.

She turned to the heir to Winterfell and told him "Very much, my lord. I have not seen my ancestral home in nearly two years."

He seemed impressed. "That is longer than the collective lengths of time my siblings and I have ever been away from ours."

She gave a nod of acknowledgment "Have you ever been to the south, my lord?"

"I was born at Riverrun," the Young Wolf revealed, "But I have no memory of my time there. I was still a babe when my parents returned from King Robert's Rebellion. I have not been south of Moat Cailin since then."

"It is well worth the trip," Mira proclaimed, "The North is my home and always will be, but an occasional change of scenery has its appeal."

"I am certain it does," Robb Stark contended. After a short pause, he asked rhetorically "I assume you saw your brother Asher married before you left for the Reach?"

"I did," she affirmed, thinking back on the affair. That was a bit of a momentous event. Indeed, it was the first time in a very long while that House Forrester and House Whitehill put aside their rivalry and began to reconcile with one another. "I haven't heard much about him or Gwyn since I went to Highgarden. How are they faring, my lord?"

"They are doing rather well," Robb apprised her, "Their marriage may have only been a means of avoiding a private civil war, but as it turns out, Asher Forrester and Gwyn Whitehill are well-suited for each other."

"That is fortunate," Mira commented. Hopefully, Rodrik and Elaena will be just as happy. Lord
Robb and Lady Margaery, as well.

Mira gazed over her shoulder. The carriage that had brought her to Moat Cailin was about two dozen feet behind her. Lady Margaery Tyrell, her grandmother Lady Olenna, and Sera Durwell were sitting comfortably inside that vehicle. Mira, however, had opted to return to Ironrath on horseback. I intend to see my home before I enter it. She and the future Warden of the North were riding near the front of their party.

At that moment, Mira's horse halted in its tracks. It reared slightly and whinnied, as if frightened. Mira took ahold of the reins and beckoned her mount "Steady, girl. Steady."

The mare quickly calmed down. A few seconds later, Mira discovered what had startled her. A large mass of grey came bounding out of the trees. It stopped in the middle of the road. Some of the other horses shied away from it. One threatened to throw its rider.

Robb Stark gave a sharp whistle. "Grey Wind, to me!"

The direwolf swiftly padded over to his master. As he approached, Mira saw that a rabbit was trapped in his jaws. Bones and flesh crunched as the beast grinded his teeth on its neck. He gave a menacing snarl to stake his claim on the kill.

When Grey Wind noticed his master and Mira, he eased down. She breathed a sigh of relief. Even after a moon's turn, he still scares me witless.

Grey Wind and his packmates were wary of everyone at first. Excluding the Stark children and their bastard cousin, of course. From the moment of birth, the pups had been attached to them. They were more loyal to them than any hound or hawk, and they followed and obeyed their masters and mistresses faithfully. It was as though they were somehow bonded to Lord Eddard's sons, daughters, and nephew.

Every other person in the world had to be mindful of the wolves. At least, until they were convinced that the person meant no harm to the Starks.

Grey Wind had come to accept Margaery and Mira as friendlies of Robb and his family. He was indifferent to Sera, and he still seemed a little suspicious of Lady Olenna. Mira could hardly blame him. Anyone with any sense would be heedful of the Queen of Thorns.

Once the horses were again calm, the party continued onward. Grey Wind moved alongside his master, feasting on his prey. Even when gorging, he was vigilant and deadly as ever.

An hour later, they came upon Ironrath. They were received very warmly. The entire household, including Lord and Lady Forrester, had assembled in the courtyard.

Mira smiled at her parents when she spotted them. Naturally, they smiled back. This was the first they had seen of her in two years. At that moment, she realized just how deeply she had missed this place and the people who resided in it.

Mira Forrester remained atop her horse until the whole of the procession was through the gates. Even then, she did not dismount. She waited until Lady Margaery, Lady Olenna, and Sera stepped out of the carriage. Only then did Mira come down from her mount. Lord Robb got off his alongside her.

Together, the five of them approached Father and Mother. Once they were with a few feet of them, Lord Gregor Forrester donned his warmest grin and declared "My lord, my ladies, on behalf of my house, I bid you welcome to Ironrath."
"We are most gratified for your greeting, Lord Gregor," Robb pronounced in his most official tone. It is they who have been gratified.

Mira would have stepped forward to greet her parents in a more informal capacity. Before she did so, she looked at Lady Margaery, as though awaiting instruction from her. When the Rose of Highgarden noticed this, she smirked and told her handmaiden "Go right ahead, Mira."

After that, Mira walked up to the Lord and Lady of Ironrath and threw one arm around each of them. In response, Father wrapped her in his left arm; Mother in her right. The three Forresters held each other for a full twenty seconds. No words were spoken, but none needed to be.

When they finally came apart, Mira proceeded to introduce those who had accompanied her through the gate. "Father, Mother, this is Lady Margaery Tyrell of Highgarden, her grandmother Lady Olenna Tyrell née Redwyne, and Sera Durwell, a fellow handmaiden. My honorable ladies of the Reach, these are my parents, Lord Gregor Forrester of Ironrath and his wife, Lady Elissa Forrester née Branfield."

Although she attempted to sound professional, Mira could not help but speak with a heavy note of pride in her voice. No one seemed to hold that against her, fortunately.

Half a dozen handshakes were exchanged between the five named individuals. At one point, Mother humbly stated "You honor us with your presence."

Margaery and Sera accepted the compliment with considerable grace. Lady Olenna also accepted it, but with more conviction. Modesty is lost on her.

Robb needed no introductions. Obviously. He told Mother and Father "Although we sent a raven informing you of our coming, I realize we were not officially invited to your son's nuptials. As such, I beseech your pardon for any inconveniences we may have caused you."

"I do not give my pardon, as you've done nothing to require forgiveness, my lord," Father asserted, "There will always be room for the Starks at Ironrath."

"Your fealty is very much cherished," Lord Robb pronounced, just as Grey Wind appeared at his side. Father, Mother, and several of the household shuddered at the sight of the fearsome beast, but Robb placed his hand on the wolf's head and said "You have nothing to fear. He does not attack unless provoked."

While that was not a very assuring statement, his words helped everyone there to ease down a bit. Robb did not appear ashamed to have startled anyone, however. Still nothing that requires forgiveness. Let us hope it remains that way, especially in the case of the direwolf.

Duncan Tuttle, the castellan of Ironrath, came forward and announced "Chambers have been set aside for all of you. Though I am not certain we can accommodate the wolf; the kennels are packed as they are."

"That is quite alright," Robb disclosed, "Grey Wind will stay with me. If no one's any objections."

"None, my lord," Father proclaimed. Long as no wolfshit needs to be scraped up off the floors. After a pause, Lord Gregor Forrester said "I imagine you are all fatigued after your journey. If you wish to retire, Duncan will take you to your quarters."

"Very well," Robb Stark avowed. His female companions did not offer a word of protest.

Duncan then led Robb, Margaery, her handmaidens, and the Queen of Thorns into the main building. Like the Wolfswood, the holdfast looked just as Mira remembered it, both internally and externally.

Robb was given a private room near Father's solar, which he shared with Grey Wind. Margaery and Lady Olenna had their own rooms, as well. Since space was a little tight due to all the wedding guests, Mira had to share her old room with Sera. Not that I am complaining.

As luck would have it, Mira's bedroom was in-between the chambers that had been set aside for the Tyrell women. After ensuring that her Grandmother was settled, Margaery went over to join her handmaidens.

"Are the rooms to your liking, my lady?" Mira inquired when the young rose entered. More importantly, are they to Lady Olenna's?

"Oh, yes," Margaery informed her, "Grandmother seems even more comfortable here than at Winterfell. For myself, it is about the same."

Mira was pleased. She knew her ancestral home could never hope to compare to Highgarden, but at least Ironrath had met the Tyrells' standards for comfort and hospitality.

She sat down on her bed, and then she looked to the other girl from the Reach and asked her "What do you think of my home, Sera?"

"As of now, I must agree with Lady Olenna," Sera Durwell remarked, "I've been at Ironrath ten minutes, and already I prefer it to Winterfell."

Mira was alarmed by the conviction in her friend's voice. "I thought you enjoyed our stay at Winterfell."

"I did," Sera claimed, "For the most part. The Starks were gracious hosts; they made me feel more than welcome. Nonetheless, I could have done without Theon Greyjoy making those passes at me."

Mira scoffed. Oh, that explains her answer.

"I should have warned you; the man's a shameless flirt," Robb Stark drily commented. Mira turned to the entrance to the bedchamber and saw the Young Wolf standing in the doorframe. It was likely that he had been standing outside the room a little while longer, though. Let us hope he did not misinterpret Sera's assessment of Winterfell's hospitality. Grey Wind was not with him at this time.

Sera shrugged and murmured "I would not have minded the flirting if he hadn't sung so much."

Margaery raised an eyebrow and assumed "He sang to you?"

"Yes," Sera affirmed, "One song in particular. I cannot recall the exact words. But the refrain was 'Sera, Sera, storms are brewing in your eyes. Sera, Sera, no time is a good time for good-byes.'"

I do not recognize that song. Neither did Margaery, but her intended did. Robb remained standing by the door with his arms folded. He thought aloud "That is one of Lord Gregor's songs."

Sera was baffled. She looked to the lady of Ironrath and stated "I was unaware that your father wrote songs, Mira."

It was all Mira could do to keep from rolling her eyes.

"I believe he means the Mountain," Margaery bluntly enlightened her handmaiden.
"I do, my lady," Robb told his betrothed, "'Sera' is one of many songs Lord Gregor Clegane has composed himself. I am not wholly certain who the Sera in the song is meant to be. Perhaps it is merely a random name that suits the song's rhythm. But I have surmised that the song itself is about separation from an old flame."

"If that's the case, Greyjoy missed the purpose of the song," Sera mumbled crossly, "Otherwise he would have let me be after he sang it for the first time."

"Theon is the type of person who values things more for their appearance than for their meaning," Robb disclosed, "But I cannot have guests of Winterfell harassing other guests. So for your sake and his, I'll speak to Theon when we get back. He will not bother you anymore then."

"Thank you kindly, my lord," Sera stated gratefully.

Robb Stark grinned knowingly. A moment later, Mira thought she heard footsteps out in the corridor. She was not the only one, as Robb leaned out slightly and peered down the hallway. After that, he maintained his grin, looked to Margaery and her handmaidens, and announced "It looks as though we have more company."

Before the girls could ask him what he meant, they found out. Five more people appeared at the entrance of the chamber. They were her elder brother, his wife, her younger brothers, and her younger sister.

As Robb shook hands with all five of them, Mira broke into another smile. Then she promptly rose from her bed and walked over to these five individuals. Halfway there, Ryon ran to her and wrapped his arms around her waist. She tenderly wrapped her arms around his upper back. Ethan and Talia soon approached them; Mira took both of them in a warm embrace, as well. Finally, they were joined by Asher and Gwyn.

The six of them stood locked in their group hug for close to thirty seconds. Someone, it sounded like Ryon, muttered "We missed you so much."

Mira had noted that someone was conspicuously absent from this reunion. When they all came apart, she inquired "Where is Rodrik?"

"Rillwater Crossing," Asher apprised her, "He wanted to escort Elaena and her family here himself."

"Rather admirable of him," Margaery stated approvingly.

"Your kind of gentleman, my lady?" Robb wryly muttered from his position at the door.

Margaery smirked and retorted with "My kind, indeed."

Given how he went all the way to Moat Cailin just to see her to Winterfell, I am not surprised.

"Well, it is wonderful to see you all," Mira told her siblings and her sister-by-law, "But I would have thought to see you in the courtyard when we got in."

"Our apologies for not being there," Ethan told her, "We were in the godswood, praying for your safe arrival. And Rodrik's."

"Your prayers are appreciated, but not wholly necessary," Sera remarked, "We met no trouble on our way here."
"Perhaps that was because of our prayers," Talia slyly countered.

Mira giggled and patted Talia on the back proudly. Her little sister may have appeared quiet and meek, but Mira believed that beneath that innocent façade, she already possessed a precocious mind and sharp wits to complement it.

The elder Forrester girl proceeded with another round of introductions: "This is my mistress, Lady Margaery Tyrell, and another of her handmaidens, Sera Durwell. Margaery, Sera, these are my brothers Asher, Ethan, and Ryon, my sister Talia, and Asher's wife Gwyn."

Margaery stepped closer and stated sweetly "It's a pleasure to meet you all."

"Likewise, my lady," Gwyn Forrester said to the young Reachwoman, "Mira writes us very often. She talks of you fondly and at length."

Mira flushed at that revelation, but Margaery seemed flattered by it. She claimed "She also speaks of her family with nothing but praise. Now that I finally meet you all, I see why."

"Thank you, my lady," Ryon murmured quietly. He can be so adorable when he tries to be formal.

After a bit of silence, Ethan stated "We would be delighted to stay around and know you a little better, but Mother needs us to assist her in preparing for Rodrik's wedding."

"The grand event is tomorrow, after all," Talia added in.

"That's right; we got here just in time," Mira conceded, "Can I be of help in any way?"

"No, you needn't worry yourself," Gwyn disclosed, "Lady Elissa has everything under control. The arrangements are on a very tight schedule. The slightest alteration, even if beneficial, could disrupt everything."

Well, we cannot have that. Mother would be frantic if anything went wrong. Mira shrugged and stated "Then I suppose I will be here, if you decide you need me."

"We'll still see you at dinner, right?" Ryon said hopefully.

"Of course," Mira assured her youngest brother.

Soon after, Ryon, Talia, Ethan, Gwyn, and Asher left the bedchamber. Right before he stepped back out into the hallway, Asher turned back and stated sardonically "Oh, by the way, Mira, you'll be interested to know that a certain party will be making an appearance at the feast."

Mira was intrigued by that statement and the undertone it was delivered with. "Is that right? Who might it be?"

Asher cockily uttered "I will only say this: his type makes you want to cling to your skin."

That alone was enough to tip Mira off. She raised an eyebrow and presumed "Dom?"

"Yes, our good friend Dom is attending," Asher muttered cheekily.

Mira did not know whether to smile or grimace. "I was unaware that he was invited."

"Officially, he wasn't," Ethan called out from the corridor, "Apparently, his lord father wished to convey his congratulations, and a raven was not sufficient to do so. As such, he chose to send his son instead."
"That was what they claimed, at least," Talia remarked, "Truthfully, I believe the idea to come was actually Dom's."

"So do I," Asher professed. He then smirked, glimpsed over at Mira, and murmured amusingly "Furthermore, I don't think the wedding is all he is coming for."

Mira's cheeks went a slight pink, making her elder brother chuckle. She dreamily gazed at the wall and remarked in a very blunt tone "Thank you for notifying me. You may go now."

Asher continued scoffing as he exited the bedchamber. Robb remained standing at the door and watched Asher, his wife, and the three Forrester children walk away. Once they were gone, Margaery commented "You have a lovely family, Mira."

"Thank you, my lady," Mira Forrester said appreciatively. "Though lovely is not what I'd use to describe some of them. Namely Asher."

Sera was lounging in an armchair beside the open window. She crossed her legs and asked curiously "Who is this 'Dom' you mentioned?"

"Domeric Bolton," Robb answered for her, "The heir to the Dreadfort."

At first, Mira was stunned that he deduced that much. Then it dawned on her. There are not many highborn men in the North who could shorten their name to 'Dom.' Since I have been away for the last two years, Lord Robb would know better than I who all of them are. Apart from that... the 'skin' remark must have given it away.

"Mira has told us of the Boltons," Margaery recounted, "As I recall, their sigil is the flayed man, and their words are Our Blades Are Sharp. Most disturbingly of all, there was once a time when they skinned their enemies alive."

Sera shuddered. "It's a relief that flaying is outlawed in modern times."

While this was true, it was rumored that the Boltons continued to practice flaying in secrecy. No evidence of these rumors had ever been unearthed, but there was more stock in them than there was in most conventional gossip.

"Still, with a history such as that, the Boltons do not sound an agreeable sort," Margaery perceived.

"You are not alone in making that observation, my lady," Robb proclaimed, folding his arms again, "Every region of Westeros has one house which stands apart from the rest. For the North, it is House Bolton. If you desire proof, consider its current lord. Roose Bolton is regarded by many as a terrifying man. I have only met him once, but I would sooner fear him than any other man I've ever met. He is utterly devoid of emotion and empathy, and he can be inexplicably harsh and cruel to disobedient retainers. Some say he smiles even less often than Lord Tywin Lannister, he has an even weaker sense of humor than Lord Stannis Baratheon, and he could even rival Randyll Tarly for the distinction of the coldest man in the Seven Kingdoms."

That was enough to make Margaery and Sera wince. Since House Tarly stood vassal to House Tyrell, the Reachwomen were familiar with the Lord of Horn Hill. Lord Randyll had come to Highgarden twice whilst Mira was in Margaery's service, and neither of his visits had been memorable in a pleasant way.

"Be that as it may," Mira debated as she sat back down on her bed, "The only thing Domeric Bolton has in common with his father is their family name. He is a very proficient swordsman and archer, and he is scholarly, resourceful, congenial, and compassionate. At times, he can be severe and ruthless, but only towards those who have wronged him or his."

If Robb had managed to give Margaery and Sera a very grim depiction of House Bolton, Mira had succeeded in getting them to reevaluate that negative outlook. Furthermore, while Robb may have been reasonably accurate in his description, he had mostly spoken from information he had acquired from others. Mira had spoken from personal experience.

"Well, Lord Roose may not be a model gentleman," Sera contended, "But Domeric certainly seems to be an ideal man."

"I am pleased you think so," Mira murmured softly, "He is also my intended."

Sera and Margaery were taken aback. So was Robb, despite his apparently neutral countenance.

"What?" Margaery murmured in astonishment.

"My probable intended, more like," Mira clarified, leaning back against her pillows, "Lord Roose was the one to propose the match. My father and I suspect he simply wished to strengthen his main ironwood connection. Even if that is his only reason, it does have other advantages."

"Such as…?" Sera bade her continue.

"My house's greatest rival is House Whitehill," Mira went on, "The union of Asher and Gwyn lessened the rivalry slightly, but not entirely. The Whitehills have been vassals to the Boltons for as long as the Forresters have been vassals to the Starks. The union of myself and Domeric could go a long way into improving relations between all four houses."

"That would prove to be an asset for the North as a whole," Robb declared, "It is past time our old enmities were cast aside."

_There we agree. As your house is fond of saying, Winter Is Coming._

"But all economic and diplomatic relations aside, Domeric is a decent man," Mira contended, "He has called upon Ironrath several times in the past. While he may not be a friend of the family, I like to think of him as a friend of mine."

"Yet you appear to have mixed feelings about his coming here," Sera noted.

"She is well within her rights to have such feelings," Robb Stark declared, leaning against the wall, "Domeric Bolton is a close acquaintance of mine, as well. He is much better at being a human than his lord father; on that, Lady Mira and I agree. However, since he will be here for a wedding, his presence could be a sign."

"A sign of what?" Sera enquired.

"A sign that Lord Roose may intend for me to be more than Domeric's 'probable' intended," Mira replied for the Young Wolf.

"Is that necessarily a bad thing?" Margaery asked rhetorically.

"No," Mira admitted, "Sooner or later, I anticipated that I'd be married off to a northern lord. All the same, I was holding out hope that that would not be for a few more years."

"Who's to say it would have to be in the immediate future?" Margaery disputed.

"A fine point," Robb conceded, "Think on this, Mira: even if a marriage contract is drawn up for you very soon, it does not have to be honored straightaway. For instance, the contract between Margaery and myself was drafted almost eleven years ago."

Mira snickered and pointed out "With all due respect, my lord, at the time, you and she were younger than my brother Ryon."

"She is correct," Sera confirmed.

"Well, in any case, do not think overmuch of Domeric Bolton's arrival," Robb advised her, "Maybe he truly is coming here simply to pay you respects on behalf of Lord Roose."

"And if he has other motives, you are always within your right to refuse," Margaery added.

"I will bear that in mind," Mira claimed. \textit{Refuse the contract or refuse the man?} Mira decided not to ask. Whatever the case, she would rely on her own sound judgment when she encountered Domeric.

Supper was served a few hours later. The meal that evening was relatively plain, but Mira found the atmosphere quite marvelous. There was nothing at all like eating at the table under the roof of one's own home. She had been deprived of that luxury for the last two years.

At dinner, Mira also had the opportunity to get reacquainted with the household staff. Maester Ortengryn's beard and chain had both grown a bit. Ser Royland Degore was still as gruff as ever, but he did not raise his voice without cause. Gared Tuttle, Duncan's nephew and Mira's childhood friend, had been taken on as Father's squire, and thus far, he was performing excellently.

Uncle Malcolm had enlisted in the Legion without Banners a long time ago, and at present, he was across the Narrow Sea on Legionnaire business. Even though he would miss the wedding, his family did not begrudge him his absence. \textit{At least he is helping Westeros to grow stronger in another capacity.}

Early the next morning, House Forrester was finally made whole again, when Rodrik showed up at the gates with Elaena Glenmore and her family at first light. Mira wanted to be the first to welcome him back. Alas, Father, Mother, and Ryon managed to reach him before she did. Luckily, Mira was content with being the fourth to see him.

In any case, Mira and her siblings only had time to exchange a few words with their eldest sibling before Mother hastily escorted him and Elaena indoors. \textit{She is very much determined to remain on schedule; that much is evident.}

The entire day was devoted to readying Ironrath for the upcoming festivities. Lady Elissa Forrester took it upon herself to oversee all the preparations firsthand. She spent a considerable amount of time with Rodrik and Elaena. \textit{Never together, of course. The groom mustn't see the bride so soon before the event.}

Since the Glovers were the overlords of the Wolfswood, it was decided that the master of House Glover would conduct the wedding. As such, Galbart Glover of Deepwood Motte arrived in the late afternoon. At the time, Mother was preoccupied with assisting Elaena with her gown, so she was unable to welcome Galbart. Fortunately, Father could receive and greet the master of Deepwood without her.

The moment the Sun disappeared over the western horizon, the wedding ceremony commenced.

Ironrath had once of the largest godswoods in the North, so there was more than sufficient space to accommodate all the attendees. Mira, her family, and their guests from the Reach stood in the front of the crowd on the right side; the Glenmores at the front on the left side. In a similar fashion, Galbart Glover stood before the heart tree with Lord Glenmore to his right and Rodrik to his left. The three men were quickly joined by Elaena.

Mira did not think words could do justice to convey how handsome and beautiful Rodrik and Elaena looked respectively. That had to be among the most gorgeous couples she had ever seen. Even so, she contained her awe and watched on in silence as Lord Glenmore removed his house's cloak from his daughter's shoulders and Rodrik swiftly replaced it with the clock of House Forrester.

The customary sermon was given, and then the vows were exchanged. It culminated in Galbart Glover declaring the union whole in the eyes of the Old Gods. It was then that Rodrik cupped Elaena's cheek with his hand, announced "With this kiss, I pledge my love," and pressed his lips against hers.

The applause that followed the kiss was deafening. It was so loud, in fact, that Mira could hardly even hear her own voice amongst the thunderous cheers.

The subsequent wedding feast was held in the courtyard. It was then that he showed up.

Although Domeric Bolton was not at the actual wedding, at least he was dressed for the occasion. He was clad in a doublet of boiled leather, a pair of riding trousers, and a hooded cloak, all tinted a shade of dark pink. I cannot deny that he looks splendid. His party was small; he had only been accompanied by half a dozen of his father's guards.

One particular table at the feast had been designated for honored guests of Ironrath. As the future Lord and Lady of Winterfell, Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell sat at the head of it. Olenna Tyrell, Sera Durwell, and Domeric Bolton sat beside them. Mira Forrester would have taken a chair at their table, but by mandate of tradition, she was required to sit with her family on the dais.

For the first two courses, Mira talked with her eldest brother and his new wife. The two of them claimed they were going to try to have an heir as soon as possible. They did seem quite eager to have one. Certainly more eager than Asher and Gwyn were. The two of them have been together three years, yet they still have no babes of their own. She suspected they were just waiting for the most ideal time. In any case, it will be nice to have more children at Ironrath soon.

After the second course, the dancing session began. As rehearsed, Rodrik and Elaena started the dance, and Lord and Lady Forrester and Lord and Lady Glenmore followed them up. A number of other couples, including Robb and Margaery, swiftly moved to partake.

A few minutes in, Domeric Bolton rose from his chair, strolled over to the dais, and stopped in front of Mira. He offered his hand to her and coolly requested "May I have this dance, my lady?"

His approach was not what one would call "charming," but he clearly remembered his courtesies. Mira decided to oblige him. She put on her most sincere smile, accepted his hand, and bade him "Lead the way, my lord."

Domeric Bolton was a nimble dancer. He did not hold Mira too close or too tightly, and his hands did not wander aimlessly along her body. For a while, they did not exchange any words.

The silence between them broke when Domeric asked "How was the wedding?"

"It went swimmingly," Mira informed him. Wonderful way to use that word for the very first time, she derided herself.
"Excellent," the heir to the Dreadfort commented. After a pause, he queried "Did you enjoy your time in the Reach?"

"Oh, yes," she responded, thinking back to her days at Highgarden, "Everything is so beautiful there. There's green as far as the eye can see, and all manner of crops grow in abundance. Fruits, vegetables, grains; they have it all. A single year's harvest could be enough to feed the total population of the North for two or three years. And I have not even begun to tell you about the people. You always hear that the Reach is the heart of chivalry. I can verify its truth firsthand. Never have I seen such etiquette demonstrated daily."

Mira abruptly stopped there. She felt like blushing, but she did not. She just gazed down at her feet and murmured "My apologies; I did not mean to rant. I just got a little caught up in my memories."

"Rants are still preferable to silences," Domeric assured her kindly, "And please; do not apologize. What matters is that you relished the experience."

"'Relish' is not the word I would use," Mira claimed, "But I suppose it is applies well enough."

"I would say it does," Domeric disputed, "I'm pleased to know the south pleased you so. I'd wager you pleased a few of the Reachmen, as well. While I was seated, I had some words with Lady Olenna. According to her, you and Lady Margaery are practically sisters."

Mira was astounded. That is perhaps the highest form of praise one could get from the Queen of Thorns. "Did she actually say that?"

"No, but it was heavily implied," Domeric disclosed, "Maybe she regards you as the closest thing she has to another granddaughter."

"It happens that she already has a granddaughter other than Margaery," Mira informed him, "Desmera Redwyne of the Arbor. Her parents are Lord Paxter Redwyne and Lady Mina Tyrell, Lady Olenna's first daughter."

"I said 'another,' not 'a second,'" Domeric reminded her, scoffing a little, "Regardless, she clearly holds you in some form of esteem."

"You surmised that much from one brief conversation with her?" Mira presumed, somewhat skeptical.

"No, I just made a simple observation based on logic and reason," Domeric illuminated, "Lady Olenna's words left little to the imagination."

"I cannot claim to be surprised," Mira coincided, "The Queen of Thorns does not bother with subtleties or half-truths. She always speaks very plainly. That is how she earned her moniker, after all."

"So I gathered," Domeric thought aloud, "Margaery does not take after her grandmother in that regard, I've noticed. At a glance, she seems much more discreet."

"At times, she is," Mira declared, "Depending on the situation, she can either be very straight or very discreet. I would say she more oft tends to lean toward the latter."

"Well, that is what I was hoping for," Domeric commented straightforwardly.

Now Mira was more than a little bewildered. "What you hoped for? Dom, what are you talking about?"
He did not answer her right away. Instead, he casually looked around to make sure that no one was listening in on them. Then he turned back to Mira and quietly told her "Mira, although I came here under the pretense of extending my father's best wishes to Rodrik and Elaena, you and I both know he cares little and less for the relations between houses. Unless they concern his own, of course."

"Of course," Mira repeated drolly. She leaned a little closer to him and remarked assumingly "I can probably guess why you actually came here."

Domeric did not smirk and nod, as she expected him to. Instead, he donned a serious facial expression and muttered sternly "As much as I delight in your company, Mira, I did not come to Ironrath only to see you. I am also here on business."

Once more, Mira was taken aback. "What business?"

He took ahold of her waist and whispered into her ear "Let us dance our way over to Robb and Margaery. I will tell you once we reach them."

"Very well," she said in response. This must be imperative if he wishes to include both of them.

Mira Forrester and Domeric Bolton casually waltzed over to the center of the courtyard, where Robb Stark and Margaery Tyrell were engaged in a rather intimate dance sequence. She had her hands on his shoulders; he had his on the lower part of her back. There were less than six inches of air between their bodies, and even less between their faces.

"They're smitten with one another, aren't they?" Domeric assumed.

"What gave it away?" Mira retorted sarcastically. I envy them. How often do two betrothed persons become enamored even before their own wedding?

Less than a minute later, Mira and Domeric were dancing alongside Robb and Margaery.

The Young Wolf must have noticed how quickly they had moved across the dance floor, as he commented jokingly "Well, you two are quite frisky tonight."

"You're one to talk," Domeric retorted, gesturing to how Robb's hands were literally an inch above Margaery's arse.

"Whatever you say," Robb muttered, giving a slight eyeroll.

"Nothing wrong with getting frisky," Margaery murmured, a little saucily, "This is a wedding feast, after all."

"Yes, but I don't recall being invited to the bedding," Domeric slyly muttered. Robb and Margaery got a good laugh at that.

"Well, you weren't really invited to the wedding, either," Mira pointed out.

"I realize that," Domeric admitted, "But I was determined to come all the same."

"Determined?" Mira remarked, "Domeric, you make it sound as though you're here on an errand, not a celebration."

"Between you and me, I am here on errand," Domeric revealed, "But not the type of errand you might think. I did not travel all the way from the Dreadfort simply to wish Rodrik well. I also came... because I deemed it critical to do so."
"What do you mean 'critical'?” Margaery asked.

Again, Domeric checked to ensure that no one was eavesdropping on them. Then he beckoned Robb and Margaery to come a little closer, which they did. For safety’s sake, Mira moved a little closer, as well. Now there was even less space between her and Domeric than there was between Robb and Margaery.

When they were all close enough to hear each other breathe, the heir to the Dreadfort subtly told the three younger people there "After the feast, I would like for us to speak alone."

"By 'us,' you mean…?” Robb queried.

"You and I, my lord," Domeric explicated, "And Lady Mira and Lady Margaery. This concerns them, too."

"What is it about?" Margaery enquired in interest.

"I cannot elaborate while we are out here," Domeric Bolton proclaimed, "All I can say is that it is a very delicate and pressing matter, and it is urgent that we talk on it before the night is out."

Mira, Robb, and Margaery looked between each other for about twenty seconds, as though they were having a private conversation with their eyes. Ultimately, all three of them looked to Domeric and nodded their heads in approval. He was quite satisfied with that response.

An hour later, the feast reached its conclusion. As the scraps of the final course were cleared away, Rodrik and Elaena Forrester went to carry out the bedding. Most of the attendees went ahead and turned in for the night; the few that stayed up would go to bed soon enough.

Sera had had a little too much to drink that night. Mira had to give her a helping hand back inside. Domeric assisted her with that unpleasant task.

When they were halfway to the Great Hall, she lurched, as though she was going to throw up. When they were at the stairs to the Great Hall, she DID throw up. Luckily, it landed on the grass, and no one was standing near that spot when it happened.

A few minutes later, they reached Mira's bedchamber. An additional bed had been brought in for Sera; Mira and Domeric managed to tuck her into that bed without disturbing or unsettling her. After that, she promptly passed out. She really cannot stomach her drink.

After seeing to Sera, Mira and Domeric made their way to the adjoining room, which was Margaery's quarters. Margaery and Robb were already there. For whatever reason, so was Grey Wind. For security purposes only, I hope.

Unlike most, Domeric Bolton did not cringe or recoil when he saw the direwolf for the first time. He did not seem awestruck or flabbergasted, either. Instead, he only appeared a touch fascinated.

Grey Wind eyed the heir to the Dreadfort inquisitively for about a minute. Then he eased down, as though he had already accepted him as an ally to his master. That provided Mira some amount of comfort. At any rate, now we know Domeric is not a threat to any of us. Or to Robb, at the very least.

Domeric took a minute to shut the windows and lock the door. After securing the area, he declared "Now we may begin."

Margaery repeated her question from earlier: "What is this about, Domeric?"
She was sitting up on the side of her bed. Robb was standing directly behind her, and Mira was sitting beside her in an armchair. Domeric stood a few feet before the three of them.

He placed his hands behind his back, released a deep sigh, and proceeded with: "A couple months ago – shortly before you and Mira arrived in the North, I believe – I went on a hunting trip. My company was relatively small; I only brought a handful of my lord father's soldiers and servants. My friend Harrion Karstark, the heir to Karhold, and a few of his retainers joined up with us. We had a fairly prolific hunt. On the first three days, we shot us an average of two boars, three deer, and eleven rabbits each."

"That is quite intriguing; it truly is," Robb claimed, "But I assume you did not call us here just to tell us of your skills as a hunter. I suppose you are going somewhere else with this."

Domeric solemnly nodded his head in confirmation. Then he continued with "On the fourth day, we bagged something more than animals."

That alone captured Mira's interest, as well as that of Robb and Margaery. She bade him "Go on."

"Sometime around midmorning, Harrion spotted this one abnormally large rabbit," Domeric recounted, "It was an especially evasive one, as well. He spent twenty minutes pursuing it until he chased it all the way back to its lair. It vanished underground before he could catch it, but even then, he did not give up. He dug up the ground himself to get at the buck. Eventually, he found it. But… he also found the skeletal remains of a human hand."

Mira had a sharp intake of breath. "What?"

"He and I were just as shocked as you," Domeric recalled, "We decided to investigate further, and we found much more than a hand. The body it belonged to was buried there, as well. Bones were all that remained, so we could not hope to identify who it was. However, the body was clad in the armor of a Winterfell guard."

By this point, Margaery, Robb, and Mira were captivated by Domeric's tale. That last detail would have been enough to engross them, if the rest had not already.

"What happened next?" Robb enquired.

"Naturally, the hunting trip was put on hold," Domeric pronounced, "We were still on Bolton lands, so it was my father's jurisdiction. We send a rider back to the Dreadfort. In the evening, Lord Roose himself came to meet us. He took personal charge of the situation."

"What did Lord Roose do about this predicament?" Margaery inquired.

"He had the Winterfell guard's body brought back to the Dreadfort," Domeric replied, "He claimed that he would write Lord Eddard Stark, informing him of the incident."

"As far as I know, my lord father has received no such missive lately," Robb commented.

"I suspected as much," Domeric murmured, letting out an irritated sigh.

"That is rather quaint," Margaery thought aloud, "One thing I learned of Lord Eddard is that he cares dearly for every man in his service. Surely he would have noticed if even one of them went missing."

"He would have noticed, indeed," Robb affirmed.
"Well, Maester Wolkan examined the soldier's remains," Domeric revealed, "He determined that the body had been in the ground for at least fifteen years."

"Roughly the same time as Robert's Rebellion," Mira noted.

"True," Robb contended, "My father lost a great number of his soldiers back then. The one you found near the Dreadfort could have been listed amongst the casualties by mistake, seeing as he did not return from the war with the survivors."

"That would be a reasonable assumption," Domeric admitted, "However… I believe the soldier died even before the Rebellion."

"Why do you say that?" Mira said inquisitively.

"Because he had this on his person," Domeric answered her, pulling a piece of parchment out of his trouser pocket. "I saw my father remove it from the soldier's hauberk before they carted him away. At the time, I said nothing and pretended to see nothing. Even so… my curiosity ultimately got the better of me. So a few weeks back, I snuck into his solar and searched until I found it."

He then held the parchment out so that they could all see it better. The paper was roughly crumpled, stained with earth in some places, and turned to yellow in others. Even so, the grey direwolf of House Stark was still discernable on the seal. Grey Wind moved over to Domeric and sniffed at the parchment. He then backed away from it hastily.

"So the soldier was a courier," Margaery deduced.

"Yes," Domeric confirmed, "But he never reached his destination."

Evidently not. Mira asked him "Have you read it?"

"I've tried to," Domeric expounded, "Alas, fifteen years in the ground have not been good for the parchment. Most of the writing has been rendered illegible. Nevertheless, there are certain phrases I managed to decipher."

He handed the letter to Robb, who proceeded to examine its contents. Or attempt to, anyway. Mira, Margaery, and Domeric watched him in silence as he did so. Overtime, his facial expression shifted from inquisitive to bewildered. Grey Wind noticed his master's change in mood, and he growled quietly.

"This is… quite perplexing," the Young Wolf murmured. By his tone, he must mean perplexing in a bad way.

"May I see?" Margaery bade her betrothed.

Robb tentatively passed her the parchment. The Rose of Highgarden had her turn to look over the paper. Mira moved her chair closer to the bed so she could read over Margaery's shoulder. As Domeric had claimed, most of the letter could not be understood, due it being largely unreadable. Then again, even the readable parts were difficult to understand.

Neither Mira nor her mistress knew what to make of the contents.

When they were finished with their review, Domeric stated "There is one other thing you should know. The seal to the letter was broken even before my father removed it from the soldier's clothing."
"So someone must have opened it beforehand," Mira grasped. Domeric merely nodded his head.

"Could the courier have read it?" Margaery conjectured.

"My father's men are more discreet than that," Robb insisted.

"Then it must have been whoever buried the soldier," Mira supposed.

"That is just it," Domeric professed, "I believe my father may have been the one to put that soldier in the ground in the first place."

Margaery and Robb were stunned by that hypothesis.

"He may not have done it himself," Domeric contended, "He could have arranged it. Whatever the case, I am convinced he had something to do with the soldier's disappearance."

"I would not put it past him," Mira drily mumbled. Lord Roose sees everyone as a potential enemy, even his allies.

"What motivation could he possibly have to do such a thing?" Margaery asked, baffled.

"I do not know for a certainty," Domeric confessed, "But he took steps to ensure that word of this discovery did not spread. He actually intimidated Harrion and his retainers into agreeing not to speak a word of this to Lord Rickard Karstark or anyone else. I know my own retainers would never go against him, lest they risk incurring his wrath."

"You seem to have no qualms about disobeying him," Robb observed.

"Well, I am his heir," Domeric argued, "If I displeased him, he would be cross, but he would be more lenient with me. He still needs me to continue his line. Aside from that… he does not know anything about this conversation."

"Still, you took a huge risk coming here and telling us this," Mira declared. He is even braver than I thought.

"It was a risk worth taking," Domeric asserted, "Truthfully, I would have gone to you sooner. But Father could not know of my intentions, and it would have been too suspicious if I asked for his leave to travel to Winterfell for no explicit reason."

"So that's why you came to Ironrath instead," Robb realized.

"Just so," Domeric verified, "It was no easy feat to get here, but I managed. The concept of my wishing to give my regards to Rodrik Forrester on his wedding day was a plausible excuse. The harder part was acquiring the letter. My father hid it well, and his solar is almost always guarded, even when he is elsewhere. But I was able to sneak into it unnoticed and get my hands on the letter shortly before I left the Dreadfort."

He went against his own father's wishes. More to the point, he went against Roose Bolton's wishes. It is not just bravery; he is downright fearless.

"By the way, I'll need the letter back," Domeric remarked, holding his hand out to Margaery, "For all I know, even though my father put it away, he may check on it every now and then. If he discovers that it's missing, it will not bode well for any of us."

"That is a good argument," Margaery concurred. She closed the letter and gave it back to the heir.
"I admit that it is," Robb stated, "But enlighten us, Domeric; what exactly do you expect us to do with this information?"

"With your connections, you can pass it on to the right people," Domeric Bolton advised them, returning the letter to his pocket, "You could share what I've told you with Lord Eddard Stark or Lady Olenna Tyrell. Better yet, you could tell Lord Gregor Clegane. He would undoubtedly know what to do from here."

"Yes, he would," Mira agreed. It was he who averted a civil war between the Forresters and the Whitehills and made Asher and Gwyn's wedding possible, after all. If he could do that…

"We are grateful that you brought this to our attention, Domeric," Margaery proclaimed, "However, I cannot help but question your reasons for coming to us. While you may be doing the right thing, you are essentially informing on your own sire."

"Quite so," Robb concurred, "This could yield dire consequences for Lord Roose. He might be sent to the Wall. Or worse. You must realize that."

"Of course I realize that," Domeric muttered candidly, "I cannot fault you for wondering why I am going behind my father's back. Most men may innately be more loyal to their families than to their liege lord. But when the father's actions threaten to jeopardize the integrity of the entire house and other houses, one must choose where his fealty truly lies. If my father is covering up the murder of a Winterfell soldier – or worse yet, a conspiracy the soldier was involved in – I cannot in good conscience support his decision."

Mira, Robb, and Margaery thought on that argument. After a few seconds, Mira murmured "You have a point. Were I in your place, I doubt I could do that, either."

"I don't think I could do it," Margaery debated.

"Neither could I," Robb admitted.

"Well, you three are fortunate," Domeric contended, "Your fathers are honorable men."

My father and Robb's are. Margaery's, on the other hand... well, he is too foolish to try anything too dishonorable. By her countenance, Margaery Tyrell had a similar line of thought.

"Even so, Roose Bolton is your lord father," Robb, as though Domeric had forgotten that.

The heir to the Dreadfort gazed over at the wall and stated "People say my father is heartless. He may very well be. Even so, I still love him and respect him. Part of me is hoping that this will not end badly for him. But the other part realizes that if he has committed a crime, he must suffer the repercussions of his choices."

Admirable to have such conviction. Mira then interceded with "It appears to me that the main issue here is not whether Roose Bolton killed a retainer of House Stark. The main issue is what he was hoping to hide by doing so."

"Precisely," Domeric affirmed, placing his hand on the pocket that concealed the old letter, "It may be too early to make any assumptions. Even so, from what little we've uncovered, there is a likelihood Robert's Rebellion started all because of a grave misunderstanding."

Not pleasant to think on, but too perilous to ignore. Robb and Margaery appeared to share the sentiment. Mira looked up at Domeric and inquired "So what happens now?"

"What happens next is your decision," Domeric told her, Robb, and Margaery. "There is nothing more I can do at this point."

"We may need you to produce the letter again," Robb disclosed.

"If I must, I will," Domeric pronounced, "All I ask is that you be wary of who you tell of its existence."

Domeric seemed appeased by that. He then gave a yawn and uttered "Thank you for having me. Now, I must make for the Dreadfort right away."

"You couldn't stay the night?" Mira proposed.

"I wasn't invited, remember?" Domeric wryly murmured, "My men and I could camp outside the walls, but that would still be imposing. Anyway, the sooner we get underway, the sooner we return to the Dreadfort, and thus, the sooner I can return this letter to my father's solar."

And the less likely he is to notice it is gone. As much as Mira would have liked for Domeric to lengthen his visit to Ironrath, she could not deny that it would have been safer if he left that night instead of the following morning.

She got up from her chair and offered "I'll see you to the gate."

"Very well, my lady," he uttered graciously.

Domeric bade Robb, Margaery, and even Grey Wind farewell. The three of them stayed in the bedchamber while Mira escorted him outside. The servants were in the process of cleaning up the remnants of the feast in the courtyard. Other than that, the vicinity was deserted.

The half-dozen men-at-arms who had accompanied Domeric were waiting around the stables. They dipped their heads to their future lord respectfully, but they regarded Mira with little more than scowls. That came as no shock, House Bolton's retainers were generally as dispassionate as their current lord. I wonder if they're bitter because they serve House Bolton, or if they serve House Bolton because they're bitter. In her mind, either was equally possible.

As the stableboys readied the Bolton horses, Domeric asked Mira "When will you go back to Winterfell?"

"In a week or so," she informed him, "Robb and Margaery's nuptials will occur sometime within the next month."

"I see," Domeric avowed, "Will you remain in Lady Margaery's employ after she weds the Young Wolf?"

"Yes," Mira responded, "For a little while longer, I suppose."

"How much longer would you say?" Domeric enquired.

"I have not decided just yet," Mira confessed, "Perhaps as long as Margaery will have me. She has had no complaints about my work so far."

"Well, I imagine you would be nearly impossible to replace," he uttered cheekily.
She scoffed and remarked "I suppose so."

There was an interval of silence which passed between them. It ended when Mira stated "Domeric, can I ask you something?"

"You know you can," he asserted.

Mira was not certain how best to word the question on her mind, so she kept it simple: "Why me?"

Domeric was confused by her vagueness. "I do not quite understand the question."

"I can understand why you wanted to talk with Robb and Margaery," Mira specified, "They belong to two Great Houses. But why did you want me present at that conversation? I couldn't just be because I'm a Northwoman or because I'm Margaery's handmaiden."

"You are correct; neither of those is the reason," Domeric confirmed, "The real reason I had you there is because I want you to know that I trust you."

Yet again, Mira was taken aback. This time, pleasantly. "You do?"

"Yes, I do, Mira," he declared, "I trust few men. I trust fewer women. But you… you I would entrust with anything."

Mira felt herself beaming widely. "Do you honestly mean that?"

"Of course," Domeric affirmed. He smiled at her gently, placed a hand on her shoulder, and asked "Do you trust me?"

"Yes," she promptly replied, "Completely."

"Good," was all he said. Then he leaned forward and kissed her once on either cheek.

Before he could back away, Mira found herself lifting her own hands, placing them on either side of his head, and pulling him closer. Then it was her turn to kiss him. Only this one was on the lips.

She could sense that Domeric was initially alarmed, but a few seconds in, he closed his eyes and voluntarily kissed her back.

By the time they parted, the stableboys had returned with the Bolton horses. The six men-at-arms were quick to mount theirs. Domeric was not so hasty. He shared an affectionate embrace with Mira Forrester before getting onto his destrier.

Mira chose to accompany Domeric to the gates. There, they said farewell one last time, and then Domeric Bolton and his soldiers departed from Ironrath and galloped down the eastern road. Mira Forrester stood at the gate and kept an eye on them until they faded into the distance.

As she reentered her ancestral home, she took a moment to reflect. Lady of the Dreadfort. No one wants that distinction now. But with Dom as the Lord, the title does not sound so bad.
Chapter Notes

Note: I already know what all will happen in this story, but I need to decide how to order the events. Like the original series, I am now balancing at least six different story arcs all at once. So updates may take longer than a week, but never as much as two. I want you to know that now because this chapter is when all the major events will start coming together.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

After placing a chaste kiss against her forehead and releasing her from his grasp, he had asked "How do you fare?"

She had gazed at her feet for a long sullen moment before looking up at him and replying "I am afraid the tidings I bear are ill, good ser."

He had frowned and stated restlessly "Does that mean…?"

She had just nodded and confirmed his assumption with "The union has already been sanctioned by both the crown and the faith."

"You said you would speak to your father," he had recalled, trying not to sound accusatory.

"I tried to," she had insisted, "Alas, he could not be swayed. He is determined to see the match through."

"And there is no recourse to this?" he had presumed, though he pretty much already knew the answer.

"None that I can see," she had told him in dismay, "The wedding will happen. There is nothing anyone can do to prevent it. Not even you or I."

As if the King would ever heed my counsel. Or request my opinion. But the least he could have done was ask his daughter's.

He had sighed a long, sullen sigh and muttered "I suppose that is it then."

"Aye," she had agreed, "That is it."

He had said nothing in response, but his dissatisfaction must have been evident on his countenance. She had placed a soft hand on his shoulder and asked in worry "Will you be alright?"

"I will survive, my princess," he had reassured her. He had then turned to her and said "My main concern is whether you will."

"Ever the valiant knight," she had commented admirably, "You needn't worry, ser. I can handle my brother."

"If he ever harms you, you need only send for me," he had claimed.
She had asked worriedly "What would you do?"

"Whatever was necessary to protect you," he had answered.

"You could lose your head for such talk," she had cautioned him.

"Some things are worth losing one's head for," he had argued.

"I am not one of them," she had insisted, "Please, expel such ideas from your mind."

"Very well," he had conceded, albeit reluctantly, "For your sake, I will not intervene in your marriage."

"Thank you," she had said gratefully. She had then queried "What will you do now?"

"I will move on in my own way," he had proclaimed, "Everyone is meant to be with someone. For most, there is one person. For myself… I believe there are seven."

She had seemed surprised. "Did you decide that just now?"

"No, I have been contemplating it for a time," he had revealed. In the event that a scenario such as this one was to transpire. "At present, I believe it is the most appropriate option available to me."

"Then I hope you find solace in that pursuit," she had stated kindly.

"I shall strive to," he had declared. He had then shared another kiss with her; this one was on the lips. The mark to the end of a forbidden romance.

It had been forty years since that conversation. Ser Bonifer Hasty still remembered every moment of it, as though it had occurred minutes ago. It was special to him; it was the very last time he and Princess Rhaella Targaryen had seen one another in person.

Ser Bonifer had spent the last four decades of his life fighting in the name of the Seven. In all that time, he had found peace of mind in his work. More than he ever thought he would find. Definitely more than Her Grace found.

Rhaella Targaryen had become Queen of the Seven Kingdoms. Alas, she was wife to the least sane monarch the Seven Kingdoms ever had. Ser Bonifer had often heard of how King Aerys Targaryen had tormented and raped his sister. Their marriage was analogous to his rule.

Bonifer Hasty did not mourn the Mad King when Jaime Lannister drove his blade through his back. In fact, he had reveled in that sadist's demise. Alas, his satisfaction was short-lived. Just a few months later, Queen Rhaella died birthing her final child on Dragonstone. When he leaned of her fate, Ser Bonifer had prayed to the Seven for the rest of her soul, and to the Maiden especially. He had never prayed so hard as he did that night.

With the death of Prince Rhaegar on the Trident and the deaths of his children during the Sack of King's Landing, the only Targaryens left were his siblings Viserys and Daenerys. The prince, unfortunately, seemed to take too much after his father. The princess, on the other hand…

Bonifer Hasty had had seventeen namedays when he courted Rhaella Targaryen, and she had had fifteen. This year, Daenerys Targaryen had seen her own fifteenth nameday.

At this time, Daenerys was in the courtyard of Magister Illyrio Mopatis' manse. She was sitting in a comfortable chair and reading a book. Alysane Mormont was sitting on the ground nearby, sharpening her sword on a whetstone. A few of the Westerosi units who did not belong to the Legion without Banners were lounging around the vicinity.

Bonifer Hasty was standing idly on the platform that overlooked the courtyard. He had come to that spot to admire the view of Pentos and the Narrow Sea to the west. He had stayed for another, equally beautiful yet more corporeal view.

Not only did Daenerys Targaryen look nearly identical to her royal mother; she was every bit as gentle and compassionate, as well. When he gazed at her, Bonifer felt he was staring at the spitting image of his late beloved. If only she and I were not born four decades apart.

He quickly shook that notion from his head. None of that, ser. To date, that was the only suggestive thought Ser Bonifer Hasty had had of the Lady Daenerys. Every other thought he had of her since he first met her was clean and platonic. He intended to maintain that type of relationship with her. Even though he was tempted to do otherwise.

In the midst of his reverie, Bonifer Hasty managed to discern the sound of footsteps approaching him from behind. He casually peered over his shoulder and saw his colleague Malcolm Branfield walking towards him.

"Ser Malcolm," he murmured in greeting.

"Ser Bonifer," the other knight returned cordially. He stopped a few feet away and inquired "Enjoying the sights?"

"Yes," Bonifer Hasty disclosed, "The Narrow Sea is rather peaceful this time of day, whilst Pentos is at the height of activity. Yet despite being in opposite states, they complement one another perfectly."

Malcolm Branfield smirked and muttered drily "You and I both know I was not referring to the city and the surrounding landscape."

*Indeed not. I sense what could be an accusation in those words, but it could also be a point of debate. *Malcolm, enlighten me. Are you commenting on the object of my admiration, or my admiration itself?"

"The latter, although the former merits some consideration," the native of the Crownlands remarked, "I would be a lackwit not to have noticed Lady Daenerys' beauty. You, however, have done more than notice it."

"How so?" Bonifer Hasty enquired, genuinely perplexed, "I have made no advances."

"True, you have not," Malcolm Branfield muttered, "But I can tell you would if you could. Go ahead and admit it."

"Very well; I admit it," Bonifer Hasty said grudgingly.

"Do not sound so ashamed," Malcolm calmly bade him, "It is not wrong to desire things. Even if said things are beyond your reach."

"No," Ser Bonifer supposed, "But it is foolish to hope one might actually have such things."

"There we agree," Ser Malcolm contended, folding his hands behind his back, "Men like you and I have a firm grasp of what is and is not within our grasp. We may wish to reach for certain things, but we know better than to pursue them."
"That is precisely what I believe, too," Bonifer Hasty coincided, "Nonetheless, even the most disciplined cannot help but to yearn for something. There is little that can be done to keep them from wanting it."

"Do you want her?" Malcolm Branfield asked straightaway, gesturing to the spot in the courtyard where Daenerys was reading.

Bonifer would have been alarmed by the suddenness of that question, had he not predicted the possibility of it being asked earlier on. Instead, he looked Malcolm in the eye and told him "If you must know... no, I do not. I may desire the image of her, but only because that image bears so great a resemblance to the last Targaryen Queen. But the mother is not the daughter, and the daughter is not the mother. I loved Rhaella dearly, but I feel nothing of the sort for Daenerys."

"Are you certain?" the slightly younger knight asked, skepticism detectable in his tone.

I am sensing an accusation. Bonifer was quick to answer it. "I know my place, Ser Malcolm. As well as I know hers. Her parents were King and Queen of Westeros. Even if deposed, her station in this world is much different from mine. Apart from that, I am old enough to be her grandfather."

"In another life, you might well have been her grandfather," Malcolm pointed out.

That was an intriguing concept. I more likely would have been her father, seeing as she is Rhaella's child. Either way, none of us would have had to venture to Essos in the first place with that manner of arrangement. "Perhaps. But the chance for that has long passed, and I am a man of the gods now. That will never change. Thus, it is no use lamenting on missed opportunities."

Malcolm Branfield appeared astonished by the elder knight's conviction. "It is that simple?"

"It is that simple," Bonifer Hasty affirmed.

Again, Ser Malcolm smirked. Then he murmured approvingly "Well, then I applaud your resolve. A great number of men, even husbands and fathers, would likely lunge at the prospect of courting a maiden such as Daenerys Targaryen."

He is not far wrong. Even so, I wonder how many of those men would be interested in more than appearance? A thought occurred to Ser Bonifer. "Would you?"

"No," was the former Crownlander's prompt response. Too prompt to be wholly believable.

"I have lived a solitary life because of my devotion to the Seven," Bonifer Hasty remarked, "But I am curious, Ser Malcolm. What reason do you have for remaining unwed and childless at your age?"

"If you must know, I just never had any interest in having a family. I never saw the need to, either. I was not my lord father's eldest son. I was not groomed to be a lord; I was spared the responsibilities of the heir. Instead, I became a knight and travelled the Seven Kingdoms, looking for adventure."

And found plenty of it, I am certain. Bonifer Hasty contended "I can understand why you followed that course in your youth. Back then, your house had no shortage of members. Yet even after your parents and siblings perished, you still never felt compelled to continue your line?"

"That is correct," Malcolm Branfield mumbled, a little drearily, "House Branfield's seat was burned to the ground during the Rebellion, so even if I wished to have a family of my own, I had nothing to be lord of. Fortunately, of all my siblings, I was always the closest to my sister Elissa. When she married Lord Gregor Forrester of Ironrath, I went north with her. I was able to make a new home for myself in the North."

"But who did you side with during the Rebellion?" Bonifer said inquisitively.

"The Targaryens, at first," Ser Malcolm disclosed. Ser Bonifer expected as much. He may have been living in the North at the time, but he was born a Crownlander. "However, when I realized that we were fighting for a lost cause, I bent the knee. Alas, my brothers – the obstinate fools they were – refused to yield and perished for it."

Then Ironrath was the only home left for him. Not knowing what else to say, Ser Bonifer stated "They died for what they believed in."

"Or, one could argue, their beliefs were what killed them," Malcolm disputed bitterly. His bitterness did not linger for long. Soon, his usual jovial grin returned. He turned to his colleagues and asked "Which side did you join, Ser Bonifer?"

"The Holy Hundred stayed neutral throughout the Rebellion," Bonifer Hasty recounted, "Our members were from all over the Seven Kingdoms. We lived like brothers, and we would not pit brother against brother. Therefore, we opted to rally to neither side whilst the fighting lasted and rally to the victor whenever it ended."

"A prudent course of action," Malcolm Branfield observed, giving a nod of the head, "However, let us suppose you had not formed the Holy Hundred. Who would you have fought for then?"

"I am a Stormlander; naturally, I would have been obligated to support Robert," Ser Bonifer professed.

"Jon Connington was from the Stormlands," Malcolm countered.

"And he was exiled for his loyalty to the Targaryens," Bonifer reminded him. Exiled by the Mad King himself.

"Yes, but considering what Aerys normally did to those who displeased him, exile was a rather merciful punishment," Malcolm debated.

"Be that as it may," Ser Bonifer pronounced, "It would have been no contest for me. Had I not been a man of the gods, I would have sworn my sword to the Baratheons, and if need be, I would have died for them."

At that, Malcolm grimaced and said glumly "Then you are a better man than I."

That statement perplexed Bonifer a bit. "Why do you say that?"

The native of the Crownlands brushed the tips of his left thumb and index finger against his forehead for a few seconds. Then he lowered his hand and proclaimed. "A moment ago, I called my brothers fools for dying in the name of the Mad King. Between the two of us, there are times when I instead regard them as heroes who died for the realm. There is also the issue of my surrender in the war. On the whole, my choice to deflect seemed a wise one. But at times, I wonder if my choice was really dictated by cowardice. There are even certain occasions when I am ashamed outliving my family for so long."

Bonifer Hasty took a minute to reflect on everything he had just been told. After that, he lightly shrugged and professed "I see you live with a fair deal of guilt, Ser Malcolm. But you are not the only one. We have all done things we regret. All the same, you are not to blame for the destruction of your house and the demise of your family. You made your decision; your brothers made theirs. All willingly."

"I… cannot disagree with that," Malcolm Branfield admitted after a moment of thought, exhaling deeply, "At the end of the day, I suppose there were no favorable options whatsoever in the Rebellion. Regardless of which paths we chose to take, we each had to pay the price for them."

"At some point in our lives, we all must pay for our decisions," Ser Bonifer debated, "The difference between you and your brothers is that you can atone for the wrongs you may have done."

"Atone how?" Malcolm enquired, intrigued.

"By doing just what you are doing now," Bonifer replied.

"Discussing my personal grievances about myself with you?" Malcolm stated sardonically.

"No, I mean what you are doing here," Bonifer Hasty uttered with a scoff, gesturing to their immediate surroundings, "Although you forsook the Mad King during the Rebellion, you can make peace with your desertion by protecting his children."

That remark seemed to bring a strange form of contentment to the knight from the Crownlands. He rubbed his chin, and then he smiled, lightly nodded his head, and murmured "That is a peculiar view of our present situation. But it seems fitting, just the same."

"Of course it does," Ser Bonifer asserted, "You fought for the Targaryens once. Now you can do so once more."

Malcolm raised an eyebrow. "Fight for them in what capacity?"

It took Bonifer a moment to realize what he was insinuating. "I mean you should fight to protect them. I am not implying you should shed blood for them."

Malcolm seemed somewhat relieved. He mumbled softly "I certainly hope not. Because as of now, the only person who would ever wish harm upon them is the man who sits the Iron Throne."

"True," Bonifer Hasty coincided, folding his arms and leaning against the balustrade to the platform, "Lord Gregor may have convinced the King to spare the Targaryens for the present, but I've little doubt that Robert Baratheon would still order their heads if he felt they posed too great a threat to his reign."

"Then we must assure him they do not," Malcolm proposed.

"Just what I was thinking," Bonifer professed. Long as we maintain the truce, neither party has anything to fear from the other.

"That is not as simple and straightforward as you make it sound," Malcolm debated, "Daenerys is harmless. Anyone with eyes can see that. But Viserys…"

He did not need to say any more. Where to even begin with him?

"That lad is impossible to control," Bonifer Hasty perceived, "If left unchecked, he'll be a threat to everyone. Including himself."

"Especially himself," Malcolm said with a note of malignance, "Do you know what I was doing before I came here?"

Without even bothering to guess, Bonifer asked "What?"

"I was in the lounge, having another heated discussion with the self-proclaimed rightful king of Westeros," Malcolm revealed.

Bonifer rolled his eyes and let out a slow breath. He mumbled irately "What was it about this time?"

"His most recent attempts to amass an army of his own," Malcolm responded.

"Failed attempts, I presume?" Bonifer asked rhetorically.

"Aren't they always?" Malcolm muttered sarcastically, "As of today, he has suggested every sellsword company out there which he had yet to put forth. Alas, these prospects had many of the same problems as the others. Too small. Too honorable. Too remote. Too unknown. But, as usual, the most common excuse was too expensive."

It is not without reason that Viserys is scorned as the Beggar King. Bonifer Hasty rubbed his temple and thought aloud "Perhaps we could write King Robert and ask him for coin to hire an army. If not him, we could send a raven to Lord Gregor. The Legion can certainly spare enough funds to procure at least one sellsword company."

"Allard tried to explain that to Viserys," Malcolm disclosed, "In response, he looked at him as though he said his mother was a whore."

If anyone called his mother a whore, I would not react well, either. Bonifer quered "Did he give you the impression that he was displeased?"

"More than the impression," Malcolm said drily "He had a whole speech prepared about how he was above crawling to anyone and begging for money, least of all the Usurper and his Mountain. But his main argument was that this is all a matter of pride to him. He is very much determined to produce an army of his own making, without financial aid from anyone."

"Somehow, I am not surprised," Bonifer Hasty muttered bluntly. Pride; a faster kill of men than blades. "What are we going to do with him?"

"Just what you suggested; we will protect him," Malcolm Branfield stated, suddenly a fair amount calmer.

"Yes, but how do you protect someone from himself?" Bonifer disputed, "The lad is too pompous by half. If he goes on as he has, that malicious attitude of his will someday be the death of him."

"Oh, unless it improves, I'd wager that any person in this building could be the death of him," Malcolm conjectured, "Directives and discipline be damned; it is only a matter of time before he provokes someone here into giving him the same fate as his father."

"I hope it does not come to that," Bonifer remarked. Though there is a distinct likelihood it will. "I may care little for Viserys, but we are still under orders to keep him safe."

"I give you my word that no harm shall befall him from my hand at least," Malcolm Branfield assured the older man.

Bonifer Hasty smiled and "I know I can count on you."
"Always," Ser Malcolm confirmed, "Just as the rest of us can you."

"Of course you can," Bonifer affirmed.

If Allard Seaworth was the unofficial commander of the hundred Westerosi units that were guarding Viserys and Daenerys Targaryen, Bonifer Hasty was his unofficial second-in-command. While the second son of the Onion Knight oversaw the company's affairs, the leader of the Holy Hundred took responsibility of their behavior and the way they conducted themselves. For whatever reason, he was deemed better-suited to the task than anyone else in their party. Maybe it was due to his being a lifelong follower of the Seven. They do not call me 'The Good' without cause, I suppose.

Bonifer Hasty had a strange effect on people. Whenever he was around, people generally seemed more agreeable. For instance, Viserys did not beat his sister like he used to. The Westerosi solders had been able to protect her from his volatile mood swings, and none of them more than Ser Bonifer. Viserys' behavior still left much to be desired, but at least Daenerys was no longer a victim of his abuse.

Despite the observations made by Malcolm Branfield (and others), Bonifer Hasty truly had no profound feelings of sexual attraction towards Daenerys Targaryen. He was fond of her, and he appreciated her beauty, but he swore to himself that he would never lay a finger on her. All the same, he would protect and defend her with his life. He was aware that she never asked that of him. For that matter, neither did anyone else. Nonetheless, it was the very least he could do to honor the memory of her late mother.

Just as the conversation between Ser Bonifer and Ser Malcolm seemed to reach its conclusion, they received more company. Eddison Tollett arrived on the scene, looking as cheerless as ever.

"How do you fare today, Edd?" Bonifer asked the Valeman as he came closer.

"About as well as ever, ser," Dolorous Edd glumly answered him.

"That bad, eh?" Malcolm japed. Bonifer chuckled, whereas Edd Tollett sneered.

Bonifer Hasty noticed Dolorous Edd held something in his hand. "What's that you have there?"

"Message, ser," Edd replied, displaying the object to the two older men. It turned out to be a scroll.

"For me?" Bonifer Hasty assumed, taking the scroll in his hand. It was tightly wrapped, but the ribbon was loosely tied, as though it had already been opened.

"Well, not exactly..." Eddison Tollet murmured.

Ser Bonifer removed the ribbon and unrolled a foot of the parchment. Straightaway, he understood what the Valeman meant. He could not make sense of the contents.

"What the hells is this?" he thought aloud.

Malcolm Branfield stepped up behind him and peered over his shoulder. He furrowed his brow and noted "That's not the Common Tongue."

"Indeed," Bonifer conceded, "It is definitely in another language."

"I concluded as much," Dolorous Edd Tollett stated, "I consulted one of the magister's scribes. She claimed it was written in Dothraki."
Bonifer was stunned. He looked to the younger man and repeated "Dothraki?"

As Edd Tollett nodded his head, Malcolm Branfield scoffed and muttered "I was not aware the Dothraki could write."

"I believe they have scribes of their own," Bonifer Hasty thought aloud. As he rolled the scroll back up, he asked "Why did you bring this to me?"

"Well, the scribe I spoke to was able to translate it," Eddison Tollett disclosed. He reached into his doublet and pulled out a smaller piece of parchment, which he held out to Bonifer. "She was even kind enough to write it down. When you see the contents, you'll understand."

I may as well take his word. As Bonifer Hasty took the parchment, Dolorous Edd added in "I should warn you, ser. You're not going to like it."

He was quite right. When Ser Bonifer began to read the translated message, he was somewhat bewildered. Overtime his confusion gradually disappeared, and it was hastily replaced with shock and anger. By the time he was finished, his fists were clenched and his face was contorted in fury.

"That conniving rat..." he whispered darkly.

Bonifer speedily turned around and marched towards the manse. Eddison Tollett and Malcolm Branfield hastily followed him into the building. Bonifer stomped through three hallways until he arrived at the lounge. Without even bothering to knock, he burst inside.

As he expected, Viserys Targaryen and Allard Seaworth were still there. Magister Illyrio and the Red Woman were there, as well. All four of them were seated at a table on the side of the room. They all sharply turned to the door when the Stormlander knight made his entrance.

"Trouble, Ser Bonifer?" Allard Seaworth queried in concern.

Bonifer did not bother to answer him. When he came into the room, his eyes immediately went to Viserys Targaryen. He solemnly walked over to the blond man and seized him by the throat with his free hand. That action alarmed everyone there, the deposed prince most of all.

"Get your fucking hand off me!" Viserys yelled.

With no regard for the younger man's well-being, Bonifer Hasty forced him out of his chair and slammed him against the adjacent wall. He glared into his eyes and muttered through the gritted teeth "You bastard. You filthy, degenerate bastard."

No, even bastards have more integrity than this.

"Unhand me at once," Viserys snapped angrily.

Instead, Bonifer tightened his hold, as though he meant to choke the life out of Viserys Targaryen. Under different circumstances, he may very well have done just that.

Before he could, Allard Seaworth rose from his chair and shouted "Ser Bonifer! Stand down!"

Bonifer Hasty did not acknowledge the command right away. For a minute, he continued to grip Viserys by his throat, as though he was contemplating whether or not he would strangle him.

Ultimately, he chose to obey Allard's order. He released his hold on the blond man and backed away a pace. As Viserys gasped to regain his breath, Bonifer gazed down at him in malice.
By now, Malcolm Branfield and Eddison Tollett had entered the room, as well. Out of the corner of his eye, Bonifer spotted them standing by the doorway. He did not know how long they had been there, but it must have been long enough to see how he had handled Viserys. That must not have been a pretty sight.

"I knew he wouldn't like it," Dolorous Edd uttered drearily, "Count on me to be the bearer of bad news."

"Wouldn't like what?" Allard Seaworth enquired.

Bonifer Hasty turned to him and held out the parchment Edd had given him, saying "See for yourself, Allard."

The younger Stormlander took the piece of parchment and swiftly read it over. When he was done, he was considerably calmer than Bonifer Hasty had been, but he seemed no less angry. He slowly looked to Viserys Targaryen, waved the parchment in front of him, and mumbled heatedly "What is the meaning of this?"

Viserys did not reply right away. Then he said stiffly "First tell me what 'this' is."

Ser Bonifer gestured for Edd to come closer. When the Valeman reached them, Bonifer pointed to the scroll in his hand and proclaimed "That message is addressed to you. It was sent by a Dothraki horselord named Khal Drogo."

"And instead of bringing it to me directly, you had it translated and read it yourself beforehand?" Viserys snapped.

"That is beside the point," Malcolm Branfield contended.

"No, it is not," Viserys countered, swiping the translated note out of Allard's hand, "This is my business."

"Well, everything you do is our business," Bonifer Hasty debated, "Especially when it concerns your sister."

"Or your plans to marshal forces of your own," Allard Seaworth added crossly, "What in the name of the gods were you thinking? A khalasaar?"

"We do not have the money to hire sellswords," Viserys argued, "No one outside of Westeros is willing to fight out of duty or obligation. Everyone on this side needs incentive to fight for our cause. Thus, our only alternative is to deal with someone who was willing to barter instead."

"So you chose to barter with your own flesh and blood?" Bonifer Hasty spat.

"I would not sell Daenerys to just any man," Viserys pronounced, as though that made his intentions any less disgraceful, "She is the last female Targaryen; her virtue by itself is worth a fortune. In fact, I would say Drogo will be the one to get more out of the bargain."

"He won't get anything," Ser Bonifer declared stalwartly, "This 'bargain' will not happen."

"That is not for you to decide," Viserys muttered plainly, "Dany may feel safer with you and your lot around. But she will still do as I tell her."

"A man with a broken jaw or a missing tongue can tell no one anything," Bonifer Hasty murmured ominously, placing one hand on the hilt of his sword and tightening the other into a fist, "Which do
"Enough," Illyrio Mopatis interceded, right before any blows were exchanged. The magister proceeded to get up from his own chair. That took a bit of time, given how large he was. Once he was on his feet, he muttered sternly "I will not have this squabbling. Not under my roof."

"If it unsettles you, we could take this matter outside," Bonifer Hasty suggested. He was being sarcastic or spiteful; he was absolutely serious.

"That is not what I meant," Illyrio declared, "You are all guests of mine. Long as you are here, I demand you treat each other accordingly, or I will have you all thrown out."

"Thrown out of the manse?" Viserys assumed in astonishment.

"Thrown out of Pentos," Mopatis bluntly clarified.

The hostile atmosphere rapidly dissipated there. Some may have viewed that as an empty threat, but Magister Illyrio had the means to make it happen. He was one of the most influential men in the Nine Free Cities, not just Pentos. Additionally, he was the closest thing to an ally the Targaryens and their Westerosi guards had in Essos. They could not afford to lose their connection with him.

Although the threat of violence was gone, Bonifer Hasty was still quite displeased with this newest development. He looked to the cheesemonger and told him "I will keep my sword sheathed, but you cannot seriously mean to advocate this proposal, Magister. Daenerys is under your protection, as well."

The morbidly obese man gave a small smile and muttered "I have not forgotten that, good ser. I would advise you to relax."

"How can I relax?" Bonifer Hasty said, almost demandingly.

"Because no harm will come to Daenerys Targaryen," Lady Melisandre claimed, "I have seen it in the flames."

Bonifer Hasty was taken aback. So were Allard Seaworth, Eddison Tollett, and Malcolm Branfield. Allard said inquisitively "What exactly are you saying, my lady? You knew?"

"Of course I knew," Melisandre pronounced, "This is the most logical course of action for the prince to take."

"Hold up," Edd Tollett interjected, "Do you mean to say you put Lord Viserys up to this?"

"We both did," Illyrio Mopatis confessed. Upon seeing the shocked glances the Westerosi gave him, he smirked and muttered "Did you honestly believe I would have allowed this sort of business to go on in my establishment without my knowing of it?"

"Magister, I am appalled," Allard Seaworth uttered in disgust. You are not alone, my friend.

"Lady Melisandre and I only presented the idea to Viserys," "The choice to follow through was his entirely. Call it the act of a desperate man."

"Desperate for what?" Malcolm Branfield snapped, "Some delusion of glory?"

"Salvation for my homeland," Viserys claimed in an uncharacteristically noble tone, "The Usurper will need every sword he can find. Even among his own people, Khal Drogo is a legend. He commands forty thousand, each of which would follow him to the death. They would make an impressive complement to the soldiers of the Seven Kingdoms.”

"Or, alternatively, they would make an impressive invasion force to the people of the Seven Kingdoms," Allard Seaworth debated, "When we return to our homeland, the only people we will bring back will be those that Robert Baratheon and Gregor Clegane have approved of. Lord Gregor may make an exception for a Dothraki horde, but hard as I might try, I cannot imagine the King granting such an unsavory mob entry into Westeros."

"Then wait for the Others to come," Viserys stated mockingly, "By then, he'll be begging the Dothraki to cross the Narrow Sea."

"We will return to Westeros long before that happens," Allard asserted, "But if the King and the Mountain refuse to give passage to the Dothraki, they will not come back with us."

"Good luck explaining that to Khal Drogo," Viserys shot scathingly.

"Frankly, I do not see why we should even bother negotiating with this horselord," Malcolm Branfield remarked.

"He has already received Prince Viserys' proposal," Melisandre pointed out, "Now he is coming here to see Princess Daenerys. If she does not appear, there will be trouble. On a grand scale."

"What trouble could he give us?" Edd Tollett disputed, "We could deny him access to the manse. Or better yet, the city."

"If we do, he would besiege Pentos," Illyrio Mopatis contended, "That would effectively cut off all the city's supply routes along the land. The supply lines from the sea would not be enough to sustain the city indefinitely."

"Then we could evacuate," Allard Seaworth recommended.

"And go where?" Melisandre countered, "Robert Baratheon has not yet summoned you back to the Seven Kingdoms, and you have no other trustworthy allies outside of Westeros."

If we could call the magister trustworthy. Bonifer Hasty let out a deep sigh and uttered "Then it appears our only option is to meet with him."

At that, Viserys smiled wider than Ser Bonifer had ever seen him smile before. The expression on his countenance was sickening. And I said he did not smile often enough.

Bonifer Hasty pointed a finger in Viserys' face and told him "Do not get too cocky just yet, boy. Drogo has only agreed to meet with you; he has not consented to your proposal."

"What if he does?" Viserys cheekily murmured, "What will you do about it?"

Off the top of his head, Bonifer could conjure up at least a dozen different threats, all of which he could make good on. Even so, he did not put forth any of them. Instead, he eased down and proclaimed "Nothing I suppose. For the present."

But you will not remain in the magister's custody forever, and King Robert may change his mind about you. If so, the Seven have mercy on your soul. Even the Stranger has little love for a man who would sell his own sister for an army.
The Legion without Banners was the largest brotherhood in the Seven Kingdoms. Some argued that it was a brotherhood in a more literal sense of the word. Those people saw it as an actual family.

Samwell Tarly was one of those individuals. While he loved his mother and sisters and they loved him, his relationships with his father and brother were not so spectacular. Then again, while he and Dickon were not the closest of brothers, at least there was no enmity between them. He could not say the same of Randyll Tarly.

The kindest thing Samwell's lord father had ever done for him was send him to Moat Cailin. He had intended for Samwell to serve as a squire to one of the top officers of the Legion. Samwell did no squiring; he instead earned the position of Gregor Clegane's personal notary. It turned out to be a position he was much better suited for.

For the last few years, Samwell had been aide to Lord Gregor in everything that did not require a sword. He had copied important letters, he had done the moat's sums, he had kept a record of the moat's stores, he had catalogued every new member of the Legion, he had assisted in determining where each member would be most useful, and he had even helped Lord Gregor with many of his inventions.

The work was tiring, but Samwell found it extremely rewarding. It was work he enjoyed doing, and work he was very much qualified for.

Apart from that, Moat Cailin was more of a home to him than Horn Hill, and the Legion was more of a family to him than his own. Most of all, Gregor Clegane was a better father than Lord Randyll. Not just to me; he is a better father in general. After all, I have never heard Rick or his siblings say a single negative thing about the Mountain.

Samwell Tarly was proud to be a Legionnaire. It was as though he had found his calling in life. In fact, while most Legionnaires would eventually leave the organization and return to their homes, Samwell could see himself staying on indefinitely.

At times, he was even tempted to renounce his birthright just so he could remain in the Legion permanently. However, he would not do something so rash without considering the possible ramifications of it. Furthermore, regardless of how serene he felt at Moat Cailin, there were times when he yearned for home. He missed his mother, his siblings, and, in a strange way, even his father.

Sooner or later, Samwell would go back to Horn Hill. In all likelihood, that will not be for at least another ten or twenty years. Maybe whenever I return, Father will be slightly less displeased with me than he was when I last saw him. There was a chance of such, but Samwell would not give his hopes up.

Whenever Samwell Tarly was not carrying out his duties to Lord Gregor, he could normally be found in the Knowledge Tower alone or in other parts of the moat with his friends. He was the type of person who liked to keep busy, even when on his leisure time.

At present, he was on the second highest floor of the Banquet Tower. He was seated at one of the trestle tables nearest to the entrance of the hall. It was almost time for the midday meal.

While he waited for the food to arrive from the Flour Tower, Samwell kept himself occupied with a number of sheets of parchment. One had the sketch of a contraption that he and Lord Gregor had been working on. The rest had detailed accounts of each feature of the device. He had an inkwell in front of him and a quill pen in his hand. Every now and then, he made a slight modification to the blueprint and chronicled the alteration thusly.

As he worked, Samwell sang softly under his breath. He was fond of singing when no one was within earshot. It happened that he was on the only person currently seated on his bench, so he could sing without drawing attention.

As he amended the drawing and its description, he quietly chanted: "So give me reason, to prove me wrong, to wash this memory clean. Let the floods cross, the distance in your eyes. Give me reason, to fill this hole, connect the space between. Let it be enough to reach the truth that lies…"

"Across this new divide," a voice from behind finished the lyric.

Samwell glimpsed over his shoulder and saw Jon Snow standing over him. He smiled at his best friend and japed "You've heard that one too often."

"As have you," Jon Snow cheekily remarked.

He was not alone. A certain wildling girl with flaming red hair had entered the room alongside him. She muttered in assumption "Is that one o' the Mountain's songs?"

"Yes," Samwell affirmed, "It's one of my favorites of his."

"It is one of mine, as well," Jon concurred. He turned to his female companion and stated "I'm surprised you have not heard that song before, Ygritte. Ever since Lord Gregor patented it, it has been played from here to the Red Mountains."

"The lyrics are a trifle… bewildering," she observed.

"That is the beauty of them," Samwell debated, "That song – along with most of the other songs Lord Gregor has produced – are unconventional in that they do not have any direct story. Or, if they do, the story is meant to be interpreted in more than one way."

"That does sound interesting, I suppose," Ygritte commented bluntly, "Perhaps we could discuss this further. But what say we do so over lunch?"

"You'll hear no argument from me," Samwell slyly uttered. I am famished, in any case.

While Samwell usually ate breakfast and dinner on the top floor of the Banquet Tower with Lord Gregor, his family, his household, and the members of the secret council, he generally had luncheon on a lower floor with the lower-ranking Legionnaires. He was not the only one who preferred that arrangement. Jon and Ygritte often joined him.

Just then, nine cooks from the Banquet Tower arrived. Six of them were carrying three large black cauldrons in pairs. The other three were carrying platters of fresh-baked bread. The cooks set the cauldrons and the platters on a short stone table in the center of the room.

"Go ahead and sit down," Jon beckoned Ygritte, "I'll get our food."

He headed over to where the cooks were passing out bowls and spoons. The other soldiers in the room had already begun to crowd them. There was some pushing and shoving, but none from Jon. None was given to Jon, either. The Legionnaires always treated him respectfully, due to his status as Lord Gregor's dedicated squire.
While her lover got their food, Ygritte took a spot on the bench beside Samwell. As she sat down, the Reachman turned to her, flashed a smile, and nodded his head once. She did not acknowledge the gesture, but he was certain she had noticed it.

_Not so long ago, I would have cringed if any woman outside of my family sat next to me. Glad I've cured myself of that compulsion._

Samwell was far less timid than he had been four years ago. He did not get quite so nervous around women any more, but he still had yet to have a paramour of his own. _Maybe if I learned to flirt. It seems to work for Theon Greyjoy well enough._

"You're perspiring," he noted. _Brilliant way to start a conversation,_ he chided himself. Still, Ygritte did seem rather sweaty.

"You do not jest," Ygritte wryly muttered, wiping her brow.

"Have you been working out?" Samwell enquired.

"Yes," Ygritte replied, "But not outside."

At that, her eyes shifted from Samwell to a spot across the room. Without even looking, Sam could tell that she was looking at Jon. _She means that form of workout._

"Alright, new subject," Samwell proposed. Although the topic of intimacy between man and woman fascinated Samwell, he did not like discussing it at the table. Apart from that, Sam had no desire to know about Jon and Ygritte's sex life. Especially since he himself had no sex life to speak of. _Not yet, that is. I plan to change that soon. Hopefully before the Others get here._

Jon returned a minute later. He had two bowls in his right hand, a third in his left hand, and a loaf of bread tucked under his left arm.

Ygritte scooted down the bench a little to make some room for him, and he subsequently sat down between her and Samwell. He placed the two bowls in his right hand in front of her and himself. He started to place the bowl in his left hand in front of Samwell, but the heir to Horn Hill hastily stopped his friend and beseeched him _"Not on the parchment, please."_

Scoffing, Jon moved to place the third bowl next to Samwell, beside the sheets of parchment instead of on top of them. After that, he pulled out the loaf of bread and divided it into thirds.

Although Samwell did not like to leave jobs unfinished, he could afford to break for a meal. So he exchanged his quill for a spoon, pushed the bunch of parchment off to the side, and concentrated on his bowl. He grinned when he saw what was inside.

"So we're having stew," Ygritte remarked.

"Not stew," Samwell corrected her, "This is chili con carne."

Ygritte seemed bewildered, so Jon enlightened her with "It is Spanish for 'chili with meat.' When Lord Gregor found those scrolls about the long-dead civilizations of Spain and Italy, he uncovered much more than just their languages. The recipe for this dish was included in the Spanish one. Lord Gregor thought it looked appetizing; so he gave it to the cooks."

Ygritte lightly nodded her head in acknowledgment, but she still seemed more curious in examining the chili than eating it. She enquired "What all's in it?"
"Well, meat, obviously," Samwell Tarly revealed, "There are also tomatoes… onion… beans… herbs, spices, and peppers from the Free Cities… and a few other things which I cannot place. If you want the full list of ingredients, you could ask the cooks."

Ygritte shrugged and muttered "Alright, I will try it."

"You'll need a spoon," Jon told her, handing her one. He gave a second to Sam and kept a third for himself.

"Bread works, too," Samwell suggested, "Great for dipping."

Samwell noticed that his bowl held a little more than Jon's or Ygritte's. He was appreciative of that. Jon knows how to distribute portions. While Sam was not a selfish person, and while he was not as fat as he once was, he still ate a little more than the average man. Given how much he used his brain, Samwell felt he actually needed a little more nutrition than the average man.

Ygritte tried a spoonful of the chili. Immediately, she dropped her spoon and her hands went to her mouth.

In response, Jon placed one comforting hand on her chest and another on her shoulder, and he asked "Are you alright?"

"This is fuckin' hot!" Ygritte barked.

Jon chuckled, patted her on the back, and murmured "It's not hot. It's spicy."

"Which is a variant of 'hot'," Samwell pointed out.

At that moment, a serving girl placed three tankards of ale before them. Ygritte promptly picked up hers and gulped down a hefty amount. After that, she seemed fine.

"Give it another try," Jon bade her, "I know you'll love it."

She turned to him, grinned, and proclaimed "You know nothing, Jon Snow."

Samwell snickered. I never get tired of hearing that. Even though it is quite erroneous. Nevertheless, Ygritte picked her spoon back up and continued eating. The next spoonful went down more easily than the first. Looks as though it agrees with her.

Samwell broke off a fragment of bread, dunked it into his bowl, scooped up a bit of meat and a few beans, and shoved the result into his mouth. He chewed it happily.

After he swallowed, Jon restarted the conversation. He asked him "So, what have you been up to today?"

"I've been modifying some schematics," Samwell apprised him. Not as fun as what you've been doing, but still engaging. Not to mention just as meaningful.

"Schematics for what?" Jon queried.

"Lord Gregor's latest creation," Samwell disclosed.

"Oh?" Ygritte murmured, gazing at the heir to Horn Hill, "What is it this time?"

Even the Free Folk know of Lord Gregor's accomplishments as an inventor. How about that? Samwell ate two more spoonfuls of chili. Then he wiped his hands on a linen, picked up the sheet of parchment with the drawing, and slid it in front of Jon and Ygritte. As they looked down at it, he proudly announced "He calls it a printing press. He's been working on it for over a year now, and I've been helping him every step of the way. The design has almost been finalized. Once it is complete, we shall start building. If it proves functional, it will be a breakthrough in modern literature."

Jon and Ygritte were intrigued.

"What exactly will it do?" Jon asked in interest.

"Basically, it is a machine that writes text," Samwell professed, "It will copy words at a much faster rate than the human hand. In my opinion, it will revolutionize the world."

Jon smirked and drily uttered "Lord Gregor has revolutionized the world before. Nine times, if I count right. He practically does it at least once a year."

"I suppose he'd need something extraordinary for the tenth occasion," Ygritte presumed.

"This is certainly what I would call extraordinary," Samwell giddily pronounced, "If you ask me, this will be far more beneficial than cement, concrete, black power, or anything else Lord Gregor has patented to date. With a printing press, letters will be written and copied in minutes. Books in days; whole libraries in months. Just think of all the information we'll be able to share with the world."

Jon seemed indifferent, but he raised an eyebrow and nodded his head, as though he quite liked the sentiment. He candidly remarked "Only you could get so excited over books, Sam."

"It is not just books," Samwell contended, "It is the ability to print them. With more books, we could educate more of Westeros. In time of war, books are just as invaluable as swords. Many people are reluctant to admit this, but it is undeniably true."

"Then when the Night's King comes along, how about we just chuck a bunch o' books at him until he retreats," Ygritte cockily proposed.

Jon laughed again, whereas Samwell glared at her. He did not get angry, though. It took a great deal to make him angry. He merely smirked and muttered "Fine, mock me now. But soon enough, you'll see that wits and strength are equally essential."

"I might agree…" Ygritte began. After a pause, she added in "Except my people survived north of the Wall without books for thousands of years."

"Yet they still ventured south," Samwell disputed, "Tormund and some of the others have learned to read. It has done them much good."

"He has you there," Jon perceived, taking his best friend's side for once. She just shrugged and went back to eating her chili.

"If you'd like, I could teach you to read, Ygritte," Samwell submitted.

He half-expected her to flat-out decline his offer. To his pleasant surprise, she actually seemed to consider it for a few moments. Eventually, she turned to him and uttered "Maybe."

"If you rather I taught you, I am willing to oblige," Jon declared.

Samwell grinned wickedly and commented "Why would she want to learn from someone who knows nothing?"

Almost right away, Jon and Ygritte broke out laughing. Samwell soon joined in.

When the laughter subsided, Jon looked to Samwell and remarked "Oh, well. I suppose you would be the better teacher anyway. Every now and then, I enjoy a good book as much as anyone. But I am not eager to mentor anyway. I don't like books that much."

"Why not?" Sam queried curiously.

"Because they have an air of pretention about them," Jon professed, "In my experience, the average book is riddled with countless incidents, ironies, and abrupt shifts in the plotline. Those are the very things that separate fantasy from reality. If there is one thing about life I appreciate, it is that most everything about it is in our control. There are never any sudden, unexpected twists."

While some may have seen that as a good argument, Samwell did not. In his mind, life was full of "sudden, unexpected twists." Robert's Rebellion alone was ample proof to counter Jon's proclamation. Maybe Ygritte is right about him after all.

Be that as it may, Samwell said nothing to contradict his best friend's philosophy. He just accepted it and resumed eating.

Samwell, Jon, and Ygritte spent the remainder of their meal eating instead of talking. Within ten minutes, their bowls and tankards were empty.

After wiping his fingers of grease and crumbs, Samwell gathered up his sheets of parchment and organized them into a small neat pile. He thought aloud "I better deliver these to Lord Gregor. Once he approves them, I expect it will not be long before he commissions the construction of his printing press."

"Good luck to you there," Jon bade his best friend. He wrapped his arm around Ygritte's waist and muttered "We're going to get some exercise."

Initially, Samwell thought that was an innuendo. Then Jon saw the expression on his face, and he rolled his eyes and amended that last sentence with "In the training yard."

"In any case, have fun," the heir to Horn Hill uttered plainly.

The three young adults exited the dining hall at the same time. They found Jon's bodyguard, Ser Marvyn, standing just outside the door.

Very little was known about Ser Marvyn, just that he was originally from the Reach. Most likely Oldtown; Samwell was inclined to think he held the guise of a Hightower.

Interestingly, Ser Maryn was not the only person they encountered outside the room. Jon Snow's maid was there, too.

"Afternoon, Myrna," Samwell told her cordially.

"Jon, Sam, Ygritte," Myrna kindly greeted the three of them, "Are you busy?"

"Not especially," Jon claimed, ignoring the exasperated look Ygritte threw him.

"Then I would like you to come with me," Myrna politely requested, "Lord Gregor… has something he wishes to tell you."
And he sent a maid to summon us? As strange as that may have appeared, Samwell decided not to argue. Jon and Ygritte decided the same.

"Did he say what about?" Jon queried.

"No," was all Myrna said in response.

They were content with that. Lord Gregor would not ask for us without good reason.

"Very well," Ygritte uttered, "Lead the way."

Samwell, Jon, Ygritte, and Ser Marvyn spent the subsequent ten minutes following Myrna in relative silence. Sam expected her to bring them to the Lord's Tower. Instead, she brought them to the Meeting Tower. That was not only unusual; it was all but unheard of. As far as Sam knew, no one outside of the secret council had ever been inside that building.

Myrna led them to the primary council chamber on the highest level of the Meeting Tower. Samwell was expecting to find Lord Gregor up there by himself. Again, his assumption was premature. Prince Oberyn Martell, Princess Elia Martell, Edgar Sand, Ihtos, Lady Shaara, her daughter Rhaella, and Ser Reinald were all there, as well. What could they all possibly have in common?

All of them except Ser Reinald and Lord Gregor were Dornish, but being from the same region did not always entail further similarities. Besides, when did Lord Gregor ever distinguish an individual based on one's background?

Ser Marvyn was the last person to enter the council chamber. He shut, locked, and bolted the door behind him. Now it is just us. The whole rest of the world does not exist.

Before Jon or Ygritte could ask any questions, Samwell took the opportunity to approach Gregor Clegane. He held out all the sheets of parchment and announced "I've finished reevaluating and updating the schematics, my lord. I believe you will find everything in order now."

The Mountain took the sheets and spent a few moments shuffling through them. After that, he smiled down at his notary and told him "Very good, Sam. But the printing press will have to wait for the morrow. Now, we have something more urgent to discuss."

Samwell nodded his acknowledgment and declared "As you say, my lord."

There was a large table in the center of the room, yet no one was seated against it. Rhaella and Edgar Sand were leaning against two of the tall chairs, Ihtos and Ser Reinald were posted against the wall, Prince Oberyn was slouched against the table, and Shaara, Princess Elia, and Lord Gregor were standing in various spots around the room.

"Myrna claimed you wished an audience with us, my lord," Jon muttered simply yet respectfully.

"That is correct," the Mountain affirmed, "You in particular, Jon."

If Samwell was not intrigued before, he was now. Needless to say, so was Jon. The latter enquired "Why me?"

"Because what I have to say has to do with your… genealogy," Gregor tentatively apprised him.

"Well, you have my full attention, my lord," Jon proclaimed.
"Mine, as well," Samwell conceded.

"And mine, I suppose," Ygritte commented, though she actually sounded rather disinterested.

Everyone in that chamber stood in absolute silence for about two minutes. Finally, Lord Gregor exhaled a sigh through his teeth, and he told Jon "What I am about to tell you, I and others have been wishing to tell you for the longest time. I have considered all the possible ways to tell you. After all this time, I've decided the kindest approach is also the most direct one."

"Well, by all means, be direct," Jon implored him.

Lord Gregor most certainly was, as the very next statement out of his mouth was: "What you were told about your parents is a lie."

The suddenness of that revelation was almost as shocking as the revelation itself. Jon stared blankly at him for about ten seconds. Then he breathed out "What?"

Lord Gregor elaborated with "You were raised believing that you are the baseborn child of Brandon Stark and Ashara Dayne. That is untrue. He was not your father, nor was she your mother. You are not even a bastard. You were born from a legitimate union."

"Between who?" Jon asked, almost demanded.

It was not Lord Gregor who answered him. He instead turned to Myrna and beckoned her forward. Samwell watched Jon's maid as she gradually approached his best friend. She seemed extremely anxious.

When she was less than three feet away from Jon Snow, she told him in a soft tone "I know you hate being lied to Jon. I hated having to lie to you, as well. But I will lie to you no longer. There will be no more secrets between us."

Shaara was holding a length of cloth in her hands. At a signal from Myrna, she approached the young maid and held the cloth out to her. Is it scented? I definitely smell something, but I am not certain what. Myrna turned to her, picked up the cloth, covered her head with it, and pressed it against her face. She held it there for close to three minutes before she removed it.

When she turned back to Jon and Samwell, her façade had greatly changed. She had gone from blonde to brunette. Her hazel eyes had turned grey. Her freckles had disappeared, and her face had somehow gotten larger. The cloth... it must have been a type of poultice.

After giving the length of cloth back to Shaara, Myrna looked back to Jon and softly told him "My name is Lyanna Stark… and I am your mother."

Samwell had been expecting a shock, but nothing like this. He was downright flabbergasted. And if I'm this stunned... I cannot possibly fathom what is going through Jon's head right now.

Jon seemed frozen in this stance. It was as though he had ceased to blink, breathe, move, or do anything indicative of a living being.

In spite of that, Myrna – or the lady who was now Lyanna Stark, apparently – continued restlessly with "History claims that I was kidnapped by Rhaegar Targaryen. In that matter, history errs. I loved Rhaegar and he loved me. By my own volition, I ran away with him. He and I were wed before a heart tree. When the Rebellion began, I wanted to stay with him, but he refused to put me in harm's way. So he took me to Dorne and sheltered me there for my own safety. He promise he would return to me when the fighting was done. Alas, I never saw him alive again. But... before he left, I was with him long enough to conceive a child."

That all but answered the question on Samwell’s mind. But he had to be certain it was accurate. So he cleared his throat and asked "My lady, does that mean…?"

Lyanna Stark just nodded at him, and then she told Jon "Prince Rhaegar Targaryen was your father."

Had he been in Jon's position, Samwell did not doubt that he would have fainted. What was incredible was that Jon did not. All the same, he had yet to physically respond to what he had just learned. He must be in shock. Jon was so motionless that Samwell was starting to worry for his best friend.

Ygritte seemed to handle the news better than either of them. She casually folded her arms and said to Lord Gregor "This is all most incredible, my lord. Most incredible, indeed. But just what are Sam and I doin' here?"

"You are Jon's two closest friends, Ygritte," Gregor Clegane debated, "Additionally, Samwell is here because I can rely on him to remain discreet. And you are here because… it would have been wrong for to have remained in the dark."

"Yes, I think it is my business to know just who I'm bedding down with," Ygritte stated jokingly. After that, she quickly turned to Lyanna Stark and said apologetically "I meant no offense, my lady."

Lyanna did not seem bothered by the former wildling's jape, or even by the meaning behind it. She merely nodded at Ygritte. Then she promptly returned her gaze to Jon Snow.

No. Not Jon Snow. Jon... Targaryen? If Lyanna and Prince Rhaegar wed, then... my lord; Jon... he's a prince. A fucking prince, for gods' sakes!

"I know I cannot begin to understand how or what you must be feeling," Lyanna Stark softly admitted, "But please understand, I did not just give you up. I tried to find some way to keep you with me. But it would have been impossible. You would have had to live apart from the rest of your family, as the whole world thought I was dead. Letting your uncle take you back to Winterfell was the only option. I would have given anything to have been there for you as your real mother. Please, believe me. I love you with all my heart."

If there was any question left as to whether Jon's mother truly loved him, any lingering doubt had effectively been expunged by that short speech. She sounds far too sincere to be lying. No one, not even the best mummers out there, could say that without meaning it.

Jon was still standing in the same motionless position as before.

"Jon?" Sam uttered nervously. He was getting seriously worried now.

So was Lady Lyanna. She seemed she was on the verge of tears. She begged her estranged son "Jon, please. Say something. Anything. Tell me you hate me. That you'll never forgive me for lying to you. That you never want to see me again. Just please… don't say nothing."

Finally, Jon answered her. He did none of those things. Instead, he stepped closer to Lyanna Stark, reached his arms out, and pulled her into a tight embrace, which she swiftly returned. As he held her close, he whispered in an anguished tone "Mother…"

That was the most heartbreaking thing Sam ever heard in his life.
Lyanna soon began to weep. Jon wept, as well. Most of the women in the room threatened to do the same.

Samwell Tarly had never seen his best friend cry. Not even once. Sam himself used to cry plenty. He still cried every now and then, but Jon, never. Jon almost seemed too manly to cry.

Even so, the present situation was entirely excusable. Not that it required an excuse anyway. Still…

If ever it was manly to weep…

Chapter End Notes

Note: It has finally happened! Jon no longer knows nothing (but part of him wishes he still did)!

I can imagine some of you were hoping for more interaction between Jon, Lyanna, and the other people involved in the Targaryen disappearance conspiracy. Do not fret; you shall have more of that in the following update. The very next chapter will pick up right where this scene left off, but it will be from the perspective of a difference character. So the full revelation of the Targaryens is by no means complete. Believe me, as Al Pacino would say, I am just getting warmed up…
Note: For those of you who like to keep official track of all that is happening, there will be a total of six major subplots in this fanfic: Gregor's continuous efforts to establish universal peace through Westeros (obviously, the primary one), the Targaryens' endeavors across the Narrow Sea, the Three-Eyed Raven and the attempts made to contact him, the Night's Watch and their plans to counter the Night's King, the constant development of family ties through various actions such as trade agreements and weddings (mainly Robb and Margaery's in the latter category), and a new arc which will be introduced in the latter half of this chapter. Everything you read from now on will stem from one or more of those six storylines.

It all started at Harrenhal.

It was there that Lyanna secretly fought for Lord Howland's honor, inadvertently gaining the crown's attention in the process. It was there that Rhaegar crowned Lyanna as his Queen of Love and Beauty over his own wife, prompting the wolf girl to seek out the Dornishwoman. It was there that Elia and Lyanna subsequently came to care for one another, inciting a dangerous plot. It was there that the precursor to the fall of the Targaryen dynasty occurred.

Most of all, it was there where Ashara Dayne met Brandon Stark. Although he was betrothed to the daughter of Riverrun, the then-heir to Winterfell had lain with the exotic beauty from Starfall. He had claimed to love her, that he wished he could wed her instead of Catelyn Tully. He was even considering relinquishing his birthright for Ashara. I actually believed him. I am certain I was not his first, but Starks value their word and treasure their honor.

But everything changed when Lyanna ran off with Rhaegar and Elia. Brandon Stark had rashly gone to King's Landing to rescue his sister and bring her supposed kidnapper to justice. His rashness and his quick temper were what got him, his father, his friends, and their fathers killed. Their murders (or executions, depending on one's perspective) were what incited the Rebellion.

Like most of Dorne, Ashara had remained out of that war. She mourned to loss of her one-time lover. He left a piece of him with her, which she took comfort in. For a time.

When her daughter came into the world, she was stillborn. Ashara's agony only increased from there. There were moments when she even considered throwing herself into the sea, just as people later said she did.

Then Arthur returned home. She had thought for a certainty that her brother would perish in the fighting. She was spared that bit of grief, at least.

Although Rhaegar Targaryen had lost his life in the Rebellion, Gregor Clegane had ensured the survival of both his wives and all three of his children. However, in order to guarantee the continuance of their survival, the Mountain would require additional aid.

By her own choice, Ashara had offered to assist him. She had accompanied Rhaenys Targaryen, Howland Reed, and Lyanna Stark to Greywater Watch. She had also consented to the Mountain's idea to pass along the belief that she was the mother of Lyanna's son, Jaehaerys (better known as Jon).

Ashara had even arranged the first meeting between Jon and Lyanna. Of course, at the time, Jon was unaware that she was anything other than a maid. Despite the fact that she was assigned to Jon exclusively, he never once suspected that she was his mother. Nonetheless, she served him for nearly five years, which allowed a type of closeness to form between them.

Now Jon finally knew the truth. Ashara had been concerned that nothing, not even the last five years, could have prepared him for it. Fortunately, after a brief period of shock, he seemed to have come to terms with the revelation. He is likely experiencing a number of conflicting emotions. If so, that cannot be held against him.

Seeing Rhaegar Targaryen's youngest child embrace his mother, Ashara felt quite proud of herself. After all, it was she who had made this reunion possible.

Ashara did not know how long Jon and Lyanna remained locked in their hug, but she wagered it could have been less than five minutes.

Eventually, Jon and Lyanna removed their arms from each other. Probably because they finally remembered they were still in the company of others. Were they alone, they may have stayed together longer.

"So…" Jon mumbled awkwardly, wiping away the remnants of his tears and staring at the ground, "What now?"

"Now, there are a few more people I need to reintroduce to you," Lord Gregor Clegane declared, gesturing around the room. After a moment, he hastily added in "If you think you can handle it."

Jon scoffed. He turned to the tall man and stated "You needn't condescend me, my lord. After what I just learned, I can handle anything else you have to tell."

It looks as though he has already regained his usually stoic yet witty demeanor. That's a sign that he is ready to accept virtually anything else he is told now.

"Even the news that you are not an only child?" Gregor Clegane asked rhetorically.

Once more, Jon appeared stunned, but he was not flabbergasted this time. "What are you talking about?"

"As you know, your father had two other children from his first wife," the Mountain disclosed, gesturing to Princess Elia Martell.

"Yes, but they died during the Sack of King's Landing," Jon pointed out.

Lord Gregor solemnly shook his head and expounded "Contrary to what you've been told, I was not too late to save only their mother. Ser Amory Lorch nearly succeeded in putting Princess Elia and her children to the sword. I arrived just in time to stop him from killing any of them."

"But the small corpses that were presented to the king…" Samwell Tarly remarked.

"Although the city was taken with minimal loss, there was still some loss," Gregor Clegane recalled, "A young girl and a male babe were among the casualties. While their deaths were unfortunate, they did serve some purpose. A terrible, gruesome purpose, but a meaningful one, just as well."
In any case, the ruse with their bodies worked.

Princess Elia took over for a moment: "Lord Gregor managed to smuggle my son and my daughter out of King's Landing. They sailed back to Sunspear with us. Soon after, we rode for the Tower of Joy. Within a fortnight, Jon, you came into the world."

"That was the last time all three of Rhaegar Targaryen's children were in the same place," Gregor Clegane muttered, "For their own safety, it was decided that they would be kept apart. You, Jon, were raised in Winterfell with your uncle and his family. Rhaenys was sheltered in Greywater Watch by Lord Howland Reed. Aegon stayed in Sunspear under the pretense that he was Oberyn Martell's only male bastard."

At that, Jon gradually turned to face "Rhaella" and "Edgar Sand." Both of them gave a small smile. After a few seconds, Rhaenys began to approach him. Aegon started towards him a moment later. They both reached Jon at approximately the same time. It was then that he smiled.

"Brother," Aegon murmured kindly, extending his hand.

Jon took the elder boy's hand and shook it firmly. After that, he looked to Rhaenys, and he shook hands with her, as well. He also placed a light kiss on the back of Rhaenys' hand, causing her to giggle. She obviously appreciated the gesture.

"This must come as a surprise," Rhaenys wryly presumed.

Jon chuckled and muttered "Ten minutes ago, I did not have a mother. Now I have a brother and sister."

Half-brother and half-sister, in all technicality. But that is not the important part.

Jon then turned towards Ashara and thought aloud "Then you are not Rhael – I mean, Rhaenys' mother, my lady?"

"Indeed not, Jon," she bluntly admitted, putting down the poultice Lyanna used to remove her disguise, "Furthermore, Shaara is not my name. However, my true name uses the same letters."

Samwell Tarly was the first to understand her meaning. He softly uttered "Lady Ashara Dayne of Starfall."

Ashara merely nodded her head to confirm. The woman Jon's always believed to be his mother.

"The reports of my suicide were false," Ashara professed, "A fabrication invented so I could disappear with Lyanna and Rhaenys. I went with them to Greywater, where we all lived together in secret. A while later, your mother moved to Moat Cailin."

"All thanks to you," Lyanna murmured gratefully. She then informed her son "You should know our arrangement at Moat Cailin was Lady Ashara's idea entirely. Even with a disguise, I could not risk going back to Winterfell, as too many people there could have recognized me. Ashara thought around that. It was she who suggested that you be Lord Gregor's squire, and that I masquerade as your maid."

Ashara could not decide to smirk or blush at Lyanna's praise. Jon turned back to her, slowly walked over to her, and held out his hand. After this handshake, Jon stepped closer to Ashara and kissed her softly on the cheek. "I am will be forever grateful for what you've done, my lady."
This time, she smirked and blushed. He has his father's charms. Of course, Ygritte could attest to that.

Ygritte said nothing when her lover pressed his lips against Ashara's face. The Dornishwoman glimpsed at the redheaded girl out of the corner of her eye, and she seemed indifferent. That was a relief. Say what one will about the wildlings; at least they do not get the wrong impression.

Right then, Jon raised an eyebrow. He looked around the room at large and muttered "If you all reached the Tower of Joy before I was born, you must have been there for quite a while. Were you there during the ensuing skirmish between Lord Eddard's men and the Kingsguard?"

"Actually, there was no skirmish at the Tower of Joy," Prince Oberyn Martell revealed, "You see, my boy, the Kingsguard were unwilling to bend the knee to Robert, and even if they were, they refused to leave their late prince's children unprotected. So they went into hiding, as well."

"Where are they?" Jon inquired.

"I believe I know," Samwell Tarly interjected. When all eyes were on him, he declared "They're standing in this room."

Before any questions could be asked, he gazed around the meeting chamber and announced "Ihtos, you came here with Princess Elia's party. Ser Rebinald, you arrived with Lady Ashara's. In the time since then, both of you have hardly left Prince Aegon or Princess Rhaenys' respective sides. Similarly, Ser Marvyn, as far back as I recall, you have never been more than fifty feet from Jon."

After a short pause, Samwell went on with "Despite always wearing that helm, Ihtos is clearly a Dornishman. Based on how he interacts with Lady Ashara, he has to be her brother, Ser Arthur Dayne. Secondly, the Reach is a large place, but Oldtown is not too far from Horn Hill. Thus, I can tell at a glance that Ser Marvyn is really a Hightower. Ser Gerold Hightower, no less. Lastly, Ser Rebinald shares some facial features with Lady Catelyn Stark, whose mother was a Whent. So even without the use of process of elimination, he must be Ser Oswell Whent."

Ashara was impressed. He is very observant. Then again, I should have expected as much. Samwell Tarly was one of the most intelligent people Ashara Dayne had ever met. She was not stunned that he was able to deduce all that on his own.

"If there was no fight at the Tower of Joy, what became of the three among Lord Eddard's company who did not return to the North?" Jon enquired, "What happened to Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, and Theo Wull?"

"Who do you think were the three men – apart from Ser Oswell – who arrived at the moat alongside myself and Lady Ashara?" Rhaenys slyly murmured.

Lord Gregor stepped forward and elaborated with "No one would have believed that the Kingsguard fell without taking at least one of the Northmen with them. Some of them would have had to disappear, too. Lord Eddard Stark and Lord Howland Reed were not expendable, Martyn Cassel had a son of his own, and Lord Willam Dustin was the last of his line. But Mark Ryswell, Ethan Glover, and Theo Wull were all childless bachelors from large families."

"Why aren't they here?" Samwell enquired curiously.

"I have them standing guard outside the chamber," Gregor Clegane answered him simply, "I needed them to ensure that we were not disturbed by anyone. Given what they know, they are better-qualified for that task than any of my guards."
Jon and Samwell seemed content with that response.

"Well, this has been a most peculiar day," Ygritte drily mumbled. Ashara and a few of the others chuckled at her candor. Is there anything that astonishes her?

"The day is not over yet," Gregor Clegane said sternly, "There is much more we have left to discuss."

"Such as what, my lord?" Aegon said inquisitively.

"Such as where we go from here," Gregor Clegane professed. He turned so that he faced Jon, Aegon, and Rhaenys all at once, and then he told them "The plan for you three to live in hiding was always meant to be a temporary one. Sooner or later, I meant for your existence to become common knowledge."

"And you believe the time for that is now?" Ashara Dayne conjectured.

"No, but it will be soon," Gregor Clegane contended, "Much sooner than I originally intended."

"How do you mean, my lord?" Rhaenys enquired.

The Mountain told her and her brothers "I have studied this issue from every angle, and I have determined that there were only two ways your identities could be made public without jeopardizing your lives. The first was if you had the means to retake the Iron Throne. Currently, support for the Royal House of Baratheon is at an all-time high, and none of the Targaryens has the power or influence to even begin to match Robert Baratheon. Apart from that, I was hoping to avoid that path. I have no wish to incite another insurrection, especially with the Long Night nearing."

Understandable. No civilized person wants bloodshed if it can be avoided.

"And the other 'way?'" Jon said in interest.

"The more passive of the two approaches," Gregor Clegane claimed, "I would have you emerge from the shadows only when I was certain you were safe from your grandfather's enemies."

"So you believe we are safe now?" Aegon assumed hopefully.

"No," Gregor Clegane bluntly responded, "Right now, the Starks, the Arryns, the Tullys, and even the Baratheons are capable of reasoning with you. But Tywin Lannister has never been a reasonable man. Unless by some miracle he becomes one, you'll never be safe whilst he draws breath. I was hoping he would die on his own sometime before the next winter. Alas, he is not dead now. Nonetheless, I can no longer afford to wait until he is."

"Why is that?" Lyanna Stark queried.

"Because I aim to be the one who tells Robert Baratheon the truth," Lord Gregor professed, "This may sound haughty, but I believe I am the only person who can tell him of this affair without endangering any of the involved parties. But if I do not act fast, he could learn of it from someone else."

"Someone else?" Elia Martell repeated, a little perplexed, "How could that happen? There are only a few dozen people who know about Rhaenys, Aegon, and Jon, all of whom are our trusted allies."

"For the sake of curiosity, who all knows about us?" Aegon enquired.
"The people in this building, obviously," Gregor Clegane revealed, "Prince Doran Martell, a few of his retainers, some of my men-at-arms, and Varys. Other than Varys, none of them would betray our trust. For the present, we can count on Varys to keep his silence. Oh, and the members of the secret council, but with the exception of Prince Oberyn, all of them were only made aware recently."

"Wait, you told all of them?" Jon noted.

"That is correct," Gregor Clegane confirmed, "For the most part, their reactions varied. I'd say Willas took it best."

I can imagine why. Ashara glimpsed over at Rhaenys, and based on her smile, she appeared to be having a similar line of thought. I wonder which of them is the luckier?

"What about the others?" Aegon asked.

Lord Gregor recalled "Lyn, Lothor, and Tormund were more or less indifferent. Brynden, Smalljon, and Maron were astounded at first, but came to terms with the news quickly. The one I was most concerned about was Gerion. He has assured me he would still chose the Legion over his brother, so long as I continue to pursue the best interests of all Westerosi. I was also worried about how Renly would respond, but he claims he will not tell his brother, simply because he is curious to see what I have planned. Dacey… I am actually somewhat amazed by how well she accepted the news."

Ashara knew Lord Gregor did not like having to keep so many secrets from anyone, Dacey Mormont least of all. He should count himself fortunate to have such an understanding woman as a wife. Then again, had it been her and Brandon, Ashara had little doubt that she would have reacted the same way.

"Have you told anyone else, Gregor?" Oberyn Martell asked

"No one," Gregor firmly claimed.

"Then everyone who knows about Rhaegar's sons and daughter will not speak of them out of turn," Oberyn debated, "So why are you so concerned that someone other than you will tell Robert?"

"All of the people who know the full extent of this matter are our allies," Gregor Clegane pronounced, "However, there are some individuals who at least know certain aspects of it. Two in particular we should be mindful of, and neither of them can be counted an ally."

"Who might they be?" Samwell Tarly queried.

Instead of answering the heir to Horn Hill right away, Gregor Clegane turned to Rhaegar Targaryen's second wife. He muttered "Lyanna, at the Tower of Joy, do you remember when you claimed to send out ravens and riders to your father and brothers shortly before you fled with Rhaegar?"

"I did more than claim to do that, Gregor," Lyanna Stark asserted, "I know I dispatched them. I was not about to run away from home without telling my family what I was doing and why. The three couriers I sent out were all Stark men; reliable and unwavering. They should have reached their destinations."

"Under other circumstances, they would have," Gregor Clegane disputed, "After sixteen years, I have finally discovered what became of each of them. The one sent to the Eyrie was ambushed by the Moon Brothers, one of the mountain clans of the Vale. Given how dangerous the road to the Bloody Gate normally is, he should never have gone out by himself. The one sent to Riverrun tried to pass through the Twins, but he was denied the use of the bridge. He consequentially tried to ford the forks of the Trident and drowned in the attempt. Now, both those losses were entirely accidental. But the rider who was sent to Winterfell... what happened to him was no accident."

"Go on," Elia Martell beckoned him. By this point, he had everyone's full attention.

"A few days past, I received a raven from Lord Eddard Stark," Gregor Clegane illuminated, "Within the last fortnight, his son Robb attended the wedding of Rodrik Forrester and Elaena Glenmore. During the feast, Domeric Bolton, son and heir of Lord Roose, showed up and spoke with Robb in private. He talked about a hunting trip he went on earlier this year. During the hunt, he stumbled across the buried corpse of a Winterfell soldier."

He allowed a moment for that to set in. Ashara could hear others gasp softly. She herself was stunned. Lord Gregor soon continued with "Lord Roose did not report the discovery, and Domeric saw him remove something from the soldier's body. He did some investigating of his own, and it turned out to be a letter. He showed the letter to Robb Stark, Margaery Tyrell, and Mira Forrester. After so much time underground, the letter was practically indecipherable. But they managed to decipher certain parts of it. Mainly the passage which utilized the words 'Rhaegar' and 'wed' in the same sentence."

Even before that last statement, Ashara had had a very good idea as to where Lord Gregor was going with this revelation. Nevertheless, she was alarmed by the confirmation he provided to her hypothesis.

"Where was the rider found?" Rhaenys enquired, rubbing her temple.

"That's in the northeastern section of the North," Lyanna thought aloud, "Rhaegar and I were wed near Castle Cerwyn, which is no more than thirty miles north of Moat Cailin. The rider should not have gone anywhere near the Dreadfort on his way to Winterfell.

"Unless he was only buried on the Boltons' lands," Elia countered, "Perhaps he was killed elsewhere."

"Of course he was," Gregor Clegane candidly affirmed. He almost sounds as though he's talking to a bunch of lackwits. Then again, he has already given us plenty of clues. If anyone he was talking to had failed to realize what he was implying by now, he may as well have been. "Domeric believes his father had the soldier tracked, murdered, and interred. He also believes that the message was Roose's motive for doing all that in the first place."

"That makes sense," Lyanna muttered through gritted teeth, "Bolton has always coveted the seat of House Stark. By keeping that courier from doing his duty, he allowed my father and eldest brother to be murdered by the Mad King. He probably hoped Ned and Ben would meet the same fate."

Then Lord Roose was just as big an instigator of the Rebellion as anyone. That filthy leech...

"If he could make that happen, I've little doubt he would," Oberyn Martell drily stated, "But Roose Bolton's profound desire to become Lord Paramount of the North is not the main issue. How much does he know about...this?"

"For the present, I believe Roose only knows that Rhaegar and Lyanna eloped," Gregor debated,
"He may not even know that much; he probably only suspects. I am reasonably confident he has no idea that Rhaegar's children are alive, or even that the prince had three."

"But Robb, Margaery, Mira, Domeric..." Jon muttered worriedly, "Even if they only received minimal knowledge of this issue from that letter, we should still take their involvement into account. How much do they know?"

"They know nothing," Gregor Clegane reassured him.

Ygritte smirked and began to open her mouth. Without even looking at her, Jon held up his hand and said snappily "Don't..."

The wildling girl closed her mouth, but she smirked again.

Gregor Clegane then pronounced "On that subject, Lord Eddard did mention that Margaery told him that Lady Olenna was fairly inquisitive about the direwolves, especially how the mother direwolf seemed to favor Ghost the most, and how she bonded to the woman who was serving as maid to Ghost's master."

_A prime example of what Lord Gregor would call 'juxtaposition' or 'lives in parallel.'_

"Then the Queen of Thorns suspects?" Elia assumed anxiously

"I spoke with Willas on this, and he believes it is quite possible that his grandmother may have deduced all by herself that Lyanna is alive and that Jon is her son," Gregor Clegane professed, "Moreover, he supposes that she may have also determined that Rhaenys is the unnamed bride I have selected for him."

Flushing slightly, Rhaenys queried "So why has she not said anything?"

"I asked Willas the same," Gregor disclosed, "He claims that his grandmother actually approves of the match, as it will strengthen relations between the Reach and Dorne. He has also assured me that Lady Olenna will stay silent about Jon and Lyanna as long as our plans work in her family's favor. Since they do, we needn't worry that she will share what she has learned with anyone."

_Just so, it would be both impertinent and impractical to cross the Queen of Thorns._

"Well then, if – after fifteen years – Roose Bolton has still not come forward, I would say he is no threat to us, either," Aegon contended.

"He is very much a threat to my brother's family," Lyanna bitterly remarked.

"Unfortunately, Lord Eddard cannot confront him, lest we run the risk of Bolton exposing us," Ashara Dayne noted.

"Just so, my lady," Lord Gregor conceded, "All the same, Lord Eddard is going to be more heedful of Bolton from now on. He has no intention of allowing that flayer to overthrow his family."

"Sooner or later, Bolton will have to be dealt with," Elia Martell argued.

"It will have be later, then," Gregor Clegane proclaimed, "Of the two hostile parties that may be on to us, Bolton is the one I am less worried about. He has held his tongue for fifteen years. He will not loosen it until he believes he has a practical chance of seizing the North from the Starks. Long as the Legion is garrisoned here and Lord Eddard maintains order, that will never happen."
He would not say that unless he was certain. That is sufficient for me. Based on the expressions of the others, that was sufficient for just about everyone else in the room.

"What of the other individual?" Ashara Dayne inquired, "Who is the one you believe to be the greater threat?"

Again, Gregor Clegane did not give a direct, immediate answer. Instead, he stayed silent for a minute, and then he asked no one in particular "What do you know of the followers of the Lord of Light?"

"They wear all red," Jon muttered.

"They treat fire like a holy object," Rhaenys uttered.

"They spit on all other gods," Aegon murmured.

"They claim to be able to see what is to come," Samwell mumbled. They are also fond of drink. Or maybe that is just Thoros of Myr.

"All true," Gregor Clegane averred, folding his arms, "My colleague Allard Seaworth is occupied with business across the Narrow Sea, as some of you are already aware. He is leading the company that was tasked with guarding Viserys and Daenerys Targaryen. Currently, they are all still in Pentos as guests of Magister Illyrio Mopatis. A few weeks back, Allard sent me a letter. In it, he notified me that a red priestess had shown up at Illyrio's manse."

"What was she doing there?" Rhaenys queried.

"According to Allard, she wished to enter your aunt and uncle's services," Gregor apprised the young princess and her brothers, "Now, before I say anything more, you should know I am familiar with this red priestess."

"Familiar how?" Princess Lyanna inquired.

"She was part of my vision of the Long Night," Gregor Clegane disclosed, "Her name is Melisandre. In my premonition, she entered the services of Lady Seylse Baratheon of Dragonstone. Overtime, she tried to convince Lord Stannis Baratheon that he was Azor Azai reborn. She also supported him in his efforts to seize the Iron Throne."

"Hold right there," Elia Martell interjected, "Stannis Baratheon would have sought to take the crown from his own brother?"

Lord Gregor merely nodded.

I would never have thought it possible. "I heard it said Lord Stannis values honor as much as the Starks."

"In my vision, he believed himself to be Robert's rightful heir," Gregor Clegane claimed, "Under different circumstances, he would have been. But none of that matters now. I have averted the fiasco that encouraged him to rise against the crown. In this world, Stannis would no sooner rebel than I would."

"That is fortunate," Aegon contended, "As you said earlier, my lord, we do not any more unnecessary conflict, even if it was just civil war between the Baratheons."

That may be advantageous for those loyal to the Targaryens, but it would yield unfavorable results for the rest of the Seven Kingdoms. And ultimately, even the Targaryens would be worse off for it.

"Anyway, since I have avoided the events that caused Lord Stannis to forsake the Seven, I assumed Melisandre would give us no trouble," Gregor Clegane explicated, "This marks one of the few times when my assumption proved to be premature. I never once considered the possibility that she would seek out the Targaryens instead."

"We've encountered unexpected difficulties before, Gregor," Prince Oberyn reminded his friend, "This is just another to add to the list."

"Normally, I would agree with you, Oberyn," Lord Gregor proclaimed, "However, there is one thing Allard mentioned about the Red Woman that greatly unsettles me. It is something I never would have imagined possible, even in my most vivid dreams."

If Ashara was not engrossed before, she definitely was now. So was everyone else, apparently. She stepped closer to the Mountain and asked him "What did he tell you?"

Gregor took a moment to gaze around the room, and then he sighed and revealed "Allard believes the Red Woman may have the same gift from the gods as I."

Silence. That was what followed. A tense, unpleasant, elongated period of silence.

Jon broke it with the proper question: "What led him to think that?"

"Less than a moon's turn ago, the Red Woman asked to speak with him, Viserys, and Daenerys privately," Gregor Clegane expounded, "During that meeting, she claimed to be aware of certain events. Some of these events would only have occurred if the scenarios in my visions came to pass. Furthermore, she told him that Rhaenys and Aegon were not dead, and that I was the one who saved them. She even knew that Lyanna was alive and that Jon was her and Rhaegar's son."

Everyone in the chamber was effectively rendered speechless.

"There must be some other explanation, my lord," Rhaenys proposed.

"None that I can see," Gregor Clegane refuted frankly, "We have already established that none of our allies who know of you, Aegon, and Jon would have informed on us. As such, Melisandre must have learned the truth all on her own. While it is normal for red priests and priestesses to make outlandish predictions of the future, Melisandre is not just supplying predictions. For instance, she claimed she would have entered the service of Lord Stannis Baratheon in another life. The only way she could have known that was if she has the same visions I have."

Two people who could see into the future and act to change it as they please... that sounds nearly as dangerous as the Long Night itself.

"What does this mean, my lord?" Aegon stated enquiringly, "More to the point, what does it mean for us?"

That is the real question.

"On the plus side, Allard has shared this information and his theory with no one else," Lord Gregor professed, "However, if he is correct about Melisandre – and it is very likely he is – everything is now far more complicated than it once was. And I mean everything. Not just the matters that concern Westeros and its residents. This affects the whole of the Known World."

"Surely she cannot be as troublesome as all that," Samwell Tarly contended.
"Oh, she can," the Mountain insisted, "You have seen how much change I have brought about, Sam. Melisandre could inflict just as much change. Perhaps more, as she is not bound by the laws of the Seven Kingdoms. She has the liberties of the Free Cities on her side. Additionally, the Red Woman knows everything I know. Fortunately, I in turn know everything she knows. So neither of us has an advantage over the other. Even so, she has the same capacity to garner great power and influence."

"Do you honestly believe that, my lord?" Ashara asked. Lord Gregor was not one to exaggerate or make grand allegations without cause. Any observations he made about anything and anyone had to be believed. Especially when such observations were about potential hazards to the stability of the world.

"Yes," Gregor Clegane affirmed, "Because of Melisandre, I have already had to revise some of my long-term plans. Originally, I was not going to share the news of Jon, Rhaenys, and Aegon's existence with the secret council until I told King Robert. You see, in the event that the Targaryens were somehow exposed before then, I wanted the secret council to have complete deniability. At least they would have been spared the king's wrath. However, the predicament with the Red Woman necessitated a change in my plans, and I had to be forward with Allard. As such, I deemed it necessary to be forward with the rest of the secret council."

"Your straightforwardness could turn out to be a benefit, Gregor," Elia suggested.

"Maybe," the Mountain admitted, "But be that as it may, I must now accelerate another of my timetables."

"Which one?" Ashara Dayne queried.

"The one concerning the world's awareness – or lack thereof – of Rhaegar's children," Gregor Clegane answered her, "Every day we delay is another day Melisandre could tip off the king. It is unlikely she would feed him this news directly, but he could acquire the information secondhand from one of a number of intermediate third parties."

"Well, that, we cannot have," Lyanna Stark sternly proclaimed.

Ashara then gazed over at the wolf girl, and a thought occurred to her. It may be best if she stayed in hiding, even after Jon, Aegon, and Rhaenys come out of it. Lord Gregor had likely arrived at that same conclusion. After this conversation ended, Lyanna would don her facial disguise and become "Myrna" again. She may have to remain Myrna for as long as the Usurper lives. After all, it was the "death" of Lyanna Stark that had inspired Robert Baratheon to turn his life around for the better of all. If he were to discover that that was all a fallacy… just thinking about the potential consequences that would result from that made Ashara shudder.

"I quite agree," Oberyn Martell conceded, turning to the tallest man there, "Now that I reflect on this, I feel you are correct, Gregor. You should be the one to tell Robert Baratheon about Aegon, Rhaenys, and Jon. I just need to know first: do you think he can be persuaded not to harm them? I mean, would he seriously grant them amnesty if they were to appear before him?"

"At this point, we can only hope," Lord Gregor glumly admitted, "But I like to think he would. At the very least, he is a much better man than he was when he first claimed the Iron Throne. From what Jasper has told me of his father, the Robert Baratheon who sits the throne now would never sanction the murder of innocent children, Targaryen or otherwise."

"That is good enough for me," Aegon declared.
"Me, as well," Rhaenys decreed.

Jon stayed silent for a few seconds, and then he shrugged and commented "Me, too, I suppose."

Ashara doubted that was enough consolation for Elia Martell or Lyanna Stark, but neither princess said anything to protest. Either they trusted their children's judgment, or they had faith in Lord Gregor Clegane's ability to overcome rather unfavorable odds. In this situation, I'd lean more towards the latter. After all, it was Lord Gregor who got us this far.

"Then I must arrange a meeting with the King and soon," Gregor Clegane swiftly decided.

"How soon?" Lyanna queried, stepping closer to Jon and placing a protective hand on his shoulder.

"Before the year is out," Lord Gregor announced. Just a little over three months. "At this time, however, when is not as important as where. I have come to the conclusion that our audience with King Robert will have to be on neutral ground."

That would be for the best. That much, Ashara could tell straightaway. If the King came to Moat Cailin, he would question why Gregor had waited until he was in the company of the Legion without Banners to tell him about the Targaryens. Lord Gregor would not have meant that as a threat, but if Robert interpreted it as one, Ashara would not have blamed him. Holding the meeting in King's Landing would pose similar risks. Even if King Robert gave the Targaryens safe quarter, at least half of the guards in the Red Keep were loyal to House Lannister. If the Queen or her father commanded them to attack Rhaegar's children, they would undoubtedly obey without hesitation.

The meeting will have to be somewhere between Moat Cailin and King's Landing. Someplace where neither man has higher ground, but both feel safe and out of danger within reason.

"Have you chosen a location yet, my lord?" Jon queried.

"As it happens, I have," Gregor Clegane notified his squire, "In preparation for occasions such as this, I have designated a multitude of holdfasts in the Seven Kingdoms as possible temporary meeting sites. Earlier this week, I wrote to Lady Shella Whent, asking her if she would be willing to host us in the near future. I just got a raven back from her this morning. In the message, she said she would be honored to accommodate us sometime in the following three turns of the moon."

Just about everyone in the room seemed satisfied with that proposal. Ashara was not, but she made no objections. Still, she could not ignore what this arrangement meant. Life is full of these little ironies, I suppose.

They were going back to Harrenhal. They were going back to where it all started.

…

"Does this hurt, my lord?" Maester Velix asked, squeezing gently on the boy's bicep, right on top of the bruise.

Young Lord Mors winced but did not groan, and he lightly nodded his head, saying "Yes, Maester."

He is wounded, but he does not let the pain consume him. Very much like his lord father. He smiled and declared "I am pleased to say nothing is broken. But your arm will feel a little sore for the next day or so, and I will need to wrap it up to bring down the swelling."

"As you say, Maester," Mors said, quite accepting. He was expecting worse, I imagine.
"So, he'll be alright?" Young Lady Tyta asked in concern for her brother.

"Yes, my lady," Velix assured her. For the fifth time. He did not allow himself to become irritated, though. After he retrieved a roll of gauze from his bag, he told the girl gently "You mustn't blame yourself for this."

"But it was my fault," Tyta debated.

"No, it was mine," Mors insisted, as Velix treated the abrasion on his arm, "I didn't listen."

He listened as well as any lad of five nearing his sixth nameday could. The difference is that most others are unwilling to admit their flaws.

"Oh, stop blaming yourself, Mors," Tyta urged her brother, "You did nothing wrong."

"Then how did I get this?" Mors asked rhetorically, gesturing to his now-bandaged wound.

"I did that," Tyta remarked, as though he had forgotten, "Your form was fine; it was I who used too much force."

"Father says there is no such thing," Mors reminded his sister.

"In a real combat situation, perhaps," Velix contended, pulling the boy to his feet, "In a drill, restraint is important as aggression, my lord."

Mors sighed and mumbled heatedly "I knew you would side with her."

"I have not sided with Lady Tyta," Velix claimed, "Nor have I sided with you. This was a simple accident. There is no point in placing guilt for it."

If need be, the maester was prepared to give a whole speech on the importance of making amends and moving on. Fortunately, the speech was unneeded. Those simple words were sufficient to appease both children. They were still young enough that they did not require an elaborate soliloquy.

Velix was pleased by that. It would have been a rather unusual speech, given the circumstance. At this age, most children generally blamed their siblings for any damages incurred on one another. Tyta and Mors were dissimilar in that they tended to blame themselves sooner than each other. Both of them were abnormally empathic for their age.

Some people may have thought that quaint. Then again, the Cleganes were an unusual family. If there was one person who knew that, it was Velix. He had served them longer than any other living man.

Velix was born the only son of the steward of Lord Piper of Pinkmaiden. He had had two sisters of his own. Even past childhood, his relationship with them had never been as good as the one between Tyta and Mors. That was mostly because his parents had always seemed to prefer them to him.

From the beginning, Velix’s ambition had been to become a maester. He had to actively work towards that goal every step of the way. He took whatever work he could get, whenever and wherever he could find it. Most of the time, it was legitimate work. But there were some things he did which he was not proud of. Nothing illegal, but certainly not honorable, either.

It ended up taking Velix six years to save up the coin needed for both the passage to Oldtown and the Conclave's tuition. In his days as a novice, he had apprenticed under Archmaester Walgrave. Back when he was in control of all his senses. He had also worked with the esteemed Marwyn the Mage, the current Grand Maester of King's Landing.

Velix's first links had been in history, medicine and healing, ravenry, and economics. Overtime, he had also forged links in astronomy, warcraft, and smithing. His abilities were not what one would regard as exceptional, but in most areas, his skills were greater than those of the average scholar.

After doing his time as an acolyte and forging a proper chain, Velix had remained at the Citadel for a while longer. Two full years elapsed before he was finally sent somewhere. Although maesters had no say over where they were posted, Velix had hoped that he might be assigned to a holdfast in the Riverlands. Even if he went to someplace other than Pinkmaiden, he would have appreciated the opportunity to go back home.

Before he was dispatched, Velix had been aware that the odds that he would actually return to the Riverlands were quite small. As such, he had been fully willing and prepared to apply his chain elsewhere. Nevertheless, he was gravely disappointed when he ended up in the Westerlands instead. Worse yet, he ended up in the service of the smallest, newest, most insignificant house of that region: House Clegane of Clegane's Keep.

Back then, House Clegane was only in its second generation. It was also considerably poorer. Its keep was barely large enough to pass as a lone tower; its retainers numbered under a hundred. Its lands and holdings were laughably tiny. Only those willing to swallow their pride would serve such a house. But unlike everyone else who entered House Clegane's employ, the maester was not afforded the luxury of choice.

Only two other maesters had served House Clegane before Velix. The first had succumbed to an illness; the second had fallen from a horse and broken his neck.

Velix suspected a similar death awaited him, and that it would claim him soon. He would almost have welcomed such a fate. At the very least, it would have spared him the indignity of having to live and work in that sordid place.

Now, Velix was ashamed to have ever had those thoughts. He regretted them more than anything else he had ever done in his entire life.

Maester Velix did not know the exact moment his view of House Clegane changed, but he believed it was the day the house began its third generation. Somehow, the day Gregor Clegane came into the world, fortune started to smile on House Clegane.

Four and thirty years had gone by since then. In that time, House Clegane had grown in power and influence at an almost unheard-of rate. It had risen to lordly status, it had married into Dorne, it had married into the house of its Lord Paramount, and it had established trade alliances all throughout the Seven Kingdoms. Clegane's Keep was no less than nine times larger than its original size. After House Lannister and House Lefford, House Clegane was now the third richest family in the Westerlands.

Of course, like all who rose high in the world, House Clegane had to suffer its share of hardships on the road to greatness. That included the loss of its patriarch.

Tarrence Clegane had been the head of his house for nearly four decades. In the final six years of his tenure, he had contracted palsy. Velix had been the one to diagnosis him, and he had deemed the case incurable. Nevertheless, he had done all he could to make Lord Tarrence's everyday life as comfortable and normal as possible. Even as the palsy spread through more of his body, Tarrence never once complained about it publicly or privately. He had often expressed his gratitude to Velix for his invaluable services.

Velix had been there when Lord Tarrence Clegane drew his final breath. He had pronounced him dead one day in the middle of 294 A.C. It happened in the early morning, shortly after the morning meal. For a long period afterwards, the entire household mourned him, and Velix was no exception. In fact, the death of Lord Tarrence had hit him especially hard; he had known the man longer than anyone else at Clegane's Keep, including his lady wife, Daliah of House Lydden.

Lord Tarrence had always treated Velix as more than a mere vassal. He had also regarded him as a friend. Indeed, Velix felt Tarrence Clegane was one person he could count as a lifelong friend. Sometimes outliving one's closest friends is just as painful as outliving one's family. In Velix's case, it was actually worse, as he had felt more at home at Clegane's Keep than he ever felt at Pinkmaiden, and he had been far closer to the Cleganes than he had to his own family.

Be that as it may, Velix had managed to cope with the change and move on. Although Lord Tarrence was gone, his house lived on. He was very much determined to keep doing his duty. The Cleganes will need my help to guarantee the continuance of their prosperity.

Although Gregor was Tarrence's firstborn son, Sandor was the one who ultimately became his heir. He had succeeded his father at the age of four and twenty. Although the lad had initially had doubts about his capacity to replace his father, he had quickly proven himself worthy of the position of Lord of Clegane's Keep.

Sandor had already been a father of two at the time of his succession. In the five years that followed, his lady wife had given him a third child.

As it happened, Lady Obara Clegane entered the vicinity just then. She walked straight over to where Tyta and Mors were standing. She was holding their younger brother Dermot in her arms. He was still at the age where his favorite thing to do was cling to his mother, even though he had been weaned off her breast a while back.

Maester Velix dipped his head and stated respectfully "My lady."

She flashed a grin in response. It appeared to be a sultry grin, but Velix could tell it was not meant to be suggestive. I have been around Lady Obara long enough to know better. The Lady of Clegane's Keep then looked down at her two elder children and said enquiringly "Is anything amiss, Maester?"

"Not any longer," Velix apprised her. He picked up the two discarded wooden swords off the ground and displayed them to his lady, saying "Lady Tyta was teaching Lord Mors a certain offensive technique. His execution of the move was fine, but her counterattack turned out to be a little more powerful than she intended."

At that, he gestured to the gauze around Mors' left bicep. Lady Obara's eyes momentarily widened in concern.

"You needn't worry, Mother," Mors claimed, casually rubbing his bandage, "It doesn't hurt anymore."

That was enough to console Lady Obara. She lightly smirked and murmured "Of course it doesn't. You are a Clegane. Cleganes are tougher than that."

"Then let's get back to it," Ser Bronn cheekily suggested, grabbing the wooden swords from Maester Velix. He held one out to Tyta and the other out to Mors, and he added in "No sense wasting any more time."

Maester Velix glared at the younger man and muttered "Did you not hear anything I just said? For the moment, Mors cannot use his left arm in combat."

"He has two arms," Bronn drily disputed, "Long as one works, he can fight."

"I agree, Ser Bronn," Mors pronounced, taking his wooden sword from Bronn. He then turned to Velix and told him "I'll be careful, Maester. I promise I'll only use my right arm."

Velix sighed and murmured "Very well, my lord. But I would prefer not to have to treat any more injuries today."

"Then I'll go easy on him, maester" Tyta slyly uttered as she retrieved her wooden sword.

"I would rather you did not," Mors rejoined, cracking a smirk which bore an uncanny resemblance to Lady Obara's, "'Easy' is no fun."

"Now that is more like it," Bronn stated approvingly. He led the two children back to the center of the training yard, and he had them get into position. This time, Tyta took the offensive and Mors took the defensive. Once they were ready, Bronn folded his arms and asked "Alright, what shall we learn next?"

'We' meaning the children, of course. There is little Ser Bronn could learn.

Bonn was originally a freelance sellsword. His background was largely unknown. The only thing anyone knew for a certainty was that he was from neither the North nor Dorne. Velix suspected Bronn may have been a fellow native of the Riverlands, as most of the tales of his exploits took place there.

Bonn had spent much of his life roaming the Seven Kingdoms, offering his skills to whoever had need of them. Which was often the highest bidder. He believed in a strictly business approach in his line of work. As such, he had purposely avoided getting involved in any political scuffles, including Robert's Rebellion and Greyjoy's Rebellion.

Then a few years back, Lord Tyrion Lannister and his wife Lady Ellyn had decided to travel the Westerlands' countryside. One night on their trip, they stopped to rest at an inn. Bronn happened to be a lodger at that very same inn. By pure chance, the three of them had had their dinner at the same bench.

A conversation had started up between Bronn and Lord Tyrion, and a strange friendship had blossomed from it. Lord Tyrion and Lady Ellyn had ended up bringing Bronn back with them to Casterly Rock. Tyrion Lannister had been hoping to hire him as a soldier for House Lannister. Bronn was willing to take the job, given the stories he had heard of the Lannisters' tremendous wealth.

Unfortunately for him, Lord Tywin Lannister was very averse to the concept of having sellswords in his employ. There was little Tyrion could do to protest his father's decision. Luckily, Lady Ellyn managed to procure some other means of work for Bronn. She sent him to her brother's holdfast. The arrangement worked out for everyone, as the pay was nearly as good, and while Bronn would not be at the Rock, he would be on the lands immediately east of it. So Tyrion and Ellyn would still be able to correspond with him regularly.

Initially, Bronn only served the Cleganes as a household guard. However, he had plenty of opportunities to demonstrate his skills with a blade, and they were quite superior to those of any other guard in the service of House Clegane. In the span of three years, Bronn had risen from common soldier to master-at-arms of Clegane's Keep.

That was a bold and somewhat controversial move on the part of Lord Sandor. The master-at-arms was rarely anyone other than an anointed knight or a renowned swordsman of high birth. At the time of his appointment, Bronn had no title or lands to his name, and he was no one of great import. But when did 'trivial' details such as those matter to House Clegane? In any case, Bronn is a knight now. Not the type of knight one may envision when they hear the word, but a knight all the same.

Velix was loath to admit it, but Bronn was the best master-at-arms Clegane's Keep had seen since the late Ser Wallis Peckledon. Other than Bronn, three other men had served as the keep's master-at-arms after Ser Wallis. The first had died of sickness, the second had been sent to the Wall for pilfering goods, and the third had resigned his post at the insistence of Lord Sandor.

In a queer way, Ser Bronn reminded Maester Velix of himself. Both of them had started with nothing, but through constant struggle and hard work, they had both made something of their lives. Bronn still had yet to completely renounce his habits as a sellsword. He required a little more incentive to serve House Clegane other than duty. Fortunately, his wages were not demanding. All he asked was enough to feed and shelter him, plus a bit of coin for him to spend on his leisure time. He is fortunate we could easily spare that much. Given Bronn's popularity with the local whores, Velix could imagine what he did with his money, but while he might not have approved, Lord Sandor did not object.

For all his flaws, Bronn was a brilliant swordsman. And, Velix had to admit, an excellent teacher. Tyta and Mors enjoyed his teachings, and they always learned something. Sometimes something more than tactics. He also gave them valuable lessons in realism, which Lord Sandor and Lady Obara approved of. Their children were precocious both mentally and physically; they would not have them growing up ignorant of the ways of the world. They believed Bronn was the perfect one to familiarize Tyta and Mors (and later Dermot, as well) with many of those subjects.

So long as Ser Bronn does not tell Tyta and Mors what happens when boys grow into men and girls into women, I would not be surprised if their parents will allow him to be their mentor in virtually everything.

Of course, Bronn was not the only role model for the children of Clegane's Keep. Maester Velix had raised and educated all three of Lord Tarrence's children. Now he was doing the same for all three of Lord Sandor's. While he may not have been as "exciting" as Ser Bronn, he was wiser and more esteemed. Additionally, what he taught Tyta and Mors (and eventually Dermot, too) may not have been as practical as Bronn's teaching, but it was more orthodox. And, in the long run, more versatile.

"How about blocking?" Tyta humorously suggested, grinning deviously and glancing over at her brother, "That might be useful for some of us."

Mors scoffed and uttered cockily "I would mind that mouth, sister dear."

"Why?" Tyta murmured jokily, "Because that is the only place you have a chance of hitting?"

"No," Mors rejoined wittily, "Because if you use it overmuch, you'll just make the rest of yourself too easy a target."
Lady Obara chuckled at this interaction between her two eldest children. Velix could not help but join her. A few minutes ago, Tyta and Mors had been comforting each other over an accident. Now they were exchanging japes and playfully teasing one another. That was a definite reminder that they were still children. Moreover, they are still siblings.

"You are here to trade blows, not taunts," Bronn bluntly remarked.

Mors hastily said in a serious tone "Blocking is fine with me."

Tyta shrugged and stated in agreement "Me, too, I suppose."

"Good," Bronn acknowledged. He drew his sword and waited for the two of them to give their full attention. He held his blade in the air, took a certain stance with it, and proclaimed "Now, I picked this technique up during a commission from House Estermont."

In which life might this have been? Velix doubted Bronn had ever been in the Stormlands long enough to enter the employ of the Estermonts. Still, he did not ask that question aloud. Anyhow, the source of Bronn's lessons did not matter so much as how useful and efficient they were.

As Ser Bronn instructed Tyta and Mors, Maester Velix turned to their mother. He asked politely "How are you faring on this fine morn, my lady?"

"I am well, maester," Obara Clegane replied, "And you?"

"Just fine, thank you," he informed her.

After a brief pause, she inquired "Have any ravens come in today?"

That may have seemed a vague question, given the lack of context. Even so, Velix knew what his lady was actually asking. The very same question she has asked every morning for last six days.

Velix tucked his arms into the long sleeves of his robes and shook his head. He disclosed "I am afraid there has been no further word from Lord Sandor."

Lady Obara sighed. Dermot began to fuss a little, as though he shared his mother's discomfort. She only needed a few seconds to pacify him. Once her boy was tranquil again, the Dornishwoman looked back to the maester and commented "It's been nearly a week."

One more day and it will have been. Wanting to set her mind at ease, he thought aloud "I am confident Lord Sandor is alright."

"So am I," she claimed, "But what is taking him so long?"

"He is simply being thorough," Velix conjectured. Just like always.

"He shouldn't have to be," Lady Obara debated, "After all, how hard could it be to track a group of bandits?"

"There was once a time when doing so would have been simple," Velix observed, "But Westeros is much more secure than it used to be. Thanks in large part to your brother-by-law. These days, very few people are still bold enough to attempt to make a living as a bandit. Only those who believe they can do it without being apprehended will try."

"That is quite possible," Lady Obara contended, "Even so, of all the countless villages in the Seven Kingdoms, why did one of ours have to be one of the few that were raided in recent years?"
"That, I cannot account for, my lady," Maester Velix said candidly, "All I can say is that it was bound to happen to someone eventually."

"So perhaps we simply had the misfortune of being 'someone,'" Obara theoried.

"Precisely," Velix affirmed, nodding his head, "What truly matters is that Lord Sandor is determined to bring the assailants to justice."

"Yes, it is commendable of him," Obara murmured in agreement, "I only wish it took him less time. Or, better yet, that he could have sent Ser Bronn or someone else to do it in his stead."

"He could have done that," Velix admitted, "But the bandits attacked his people. I need not remind you that any attack against a lord's people is an attack against the lord himself. As such, he is obligated to hunt down those who have wronged him and chastise them accordingly."

"Well, that is his prerogative," Lady Obara pointed out.

Velix nodded again and professed "It may not be my place to say, my lady, but if the villages surrounding Sunspear had been raided, I reckon you would do the same as your lord husband."

"You're right," Obara coincided. Is it not my place? "I would have done just that. Only I would not bother bringing back their heads. I would bury them in sand until the heads were all that were visible."

Although that statement left a gruesome image in his head, Velix had to snicker at how plainly Lady Obara said it. Knowing her, she is not jesting.

By then, Bronn had finished drilling Tyta and Mors on the blocking technique he had supposedly picked up whilst in service to House Estermont. Now it was time for a trial run.

He stepped back a few paces to give them some space, and once he was clear of them, he signaled them to begin.

Mors made the first strike. He chose to cut from above. His sister was quick to parry; she intercepted the blow before it came anywhere near her shoulder. Her brother swiftly rebounded and delivered an underhand cut to her right side. Tyta managed to stop it, but by a narrower margin this time. This one almost made contact with her thigh.

While they sparred, Velix noted Obara seemed strangely content. He wondered if that was because she was intrigued by the mock combat scenario, or because they were both performing so well. Either way, she was not as restless as she had been earlier.

Velix decided to take advantage of that moment. With compassion in his voice, he told Obara Clegane "Worry not, my lady. While I have every confidence in Lord Sandor's ability to capture those bandits, in the unlikely event he does not, someone else will. The Legion without Banners would certainly be up to the task. The circumstances might be different than he planned, but the outcome would be the same."

Lady Obara reflected on that for a short while. Ultimately, she looked to the maester, smiled kindly, and said "You are quite correct, Maester. Of course, I know that no bandit can escape justice forever. To my knowledge, for the last fifteen years, no bandit has remained at large for longer than a week. As such, Sandor has likely caught up with those raiders by now."

"If he has, I would not be surprised in the least," Velix stated sincerely. After all, Lord Sandor is every bit as tenacious and resilient as his brother Lord Gregor. "I would be willing to wager that is on his way back here right now."

"We shall see," was all the Lady of Clegane's Keep said in response.

Maester Velix's hypothesis turned out to be true. Not an hour after his conversation with Lady Obara ended, the sound of a horn being blown resonated all around the grounds of the keep. That particular horn meant only one thing. The Lord is returning.

At the time, Maester Velix was still in the training yard with Lady Obara and her children. When she heard the horn, she flashed him a smile, as if to say "How about that?"

Ser Bronn clapped his hands together once and announced "Alright, that's enough for today. Go and welcome your lord father."

Tyta and Mors did not need to be told twice. They speedily returned their wooden swords to the rack that had been designated for them. Then they proceeded towards the front yard. Their mother and Maester Velix accompanied them. Bronn came along, as well. Mainly because he felt like doing so, I imagine. It is not likely he is coming to receive Lord Sandor simply out of duty.

By the time they reached the front yard, the portcullis to the main gate had been raised. Subsequently, three score mounted soldiers passed through the gate and onto the grounds of the keep. Maester Velix watched them as they gathered in the area before him. The majority of the riders appeared to be fatigued, and several of them were wounded. Thankfully, their leader was neither. Velix could determine that at a glance.

Lord Sandor Clegane was very easy to tell apart from his men. That was not solely because of his size and his face. He also wore a very distinctive helm. It bore the likeness of a hound's head, complete with ears, a muzzle, and bared fangs.

The moniker Sandor's lady wife had given him in the days of their betrothal had stuck with him. Much like his elder brother was known as "The Mountain," he was still known throughout the Seven Kingdoms as "The Hound," and he wore that label proudly.

As Lord Sandor and his party gathered in the front yard, a small crowd started to assemble in the vicinity. Maester Velix spotted Lady Daliah Clegane amongst the smallfolk. Soon enough, she noticed him and who he was with, and she made her way over to them.

When they saw their grandmother, Tyta and Mors greeted her quite merrily. And they saw her just a few hours ago. They had not seen their father in nearly a week. Velix could only imagine how affectionately they would greet him.

Once Lord Sandor's company was amassed in the front yard of Clegane's Keep, they all proceeded to dismount. Velix noticed a couple of the men were carrying some brown woolen bags. The bags were full, and they had a number of large, round lumps in them. They also emitted the foul odor of rotting flesh. The results of the mission.

Furthermore, some of the horses carried more than one rider. However, only one person from each of the shared mounts was clad in armor. The other was clad in rags or worse. He did not recognize anyone of the individuals in the latter type of garb. They must have been through an ordeal. They look terrible.

There was one man who seemed downright abysmal. This particular man was so pale that it was almost as if his body had been drained of blood.

Lord Sandor Clegane was the last to climb down from his horse. Once he was on the ground, he opened up his Hound's Helm and removed it. Some people said he looked better with it on. Never to him directly, of course. Not that he would care. It was well-known that Sandor Clegane was not ashamed of the scar that encompassed most of the right half of his face. Like his moniker, he wore it with honor, and he never allowed anyone to use it against him as an object of scorn.

After handing over his helm to his squire, Sandor saw his mother, his wife, and his children standing close-by. He grinned.

Due to the deformity on his face, it was not a wholly pleasant grin. But that mattered little and less to his loved ones. They see past the scar. Velix did, as well.

Lord Sandor hastily walked over to his family. He kissed Lady Daliah on both cheeks, and she kissed him once on the forehead. After that, he turned to Lady Obara and embraced her tightly. He was careful not to suffocate Dermot. Then he picked up Mors in his right arm and Tyta in his left arm. The two of them giggled and embraced their father as he lifted them into the air.

The Cleganes of Clegane's Keep are finally all back together once more. Velix could not help but give a smile of his own.

"Successful hunt, my lord?" Ser Bronn inquired. He could not have waited until the reunion was finished?

Lord Sandor Clegane was not annoyed, fortunately. He merely turned towards his master-at-arms and nodded, saying "Quite successful. It took time, but we managed to locate every last raider. We collected their heads to keep track."

Velix shot another glimpse at the brown bags that smelt of corpses. Just as I thought.

"Shall I have those mounted on spikes, my lord?" Bronn asked rhetorically.

"That was the intention," Lord Sandor replied drily.

Bonn scoffed a bit. Then he declared in his most official voice "It will be done, my lord."

As Bronn went to put the raiders' heads on spikes, the Hound turned to Velix and told him "Maester, we recovered the villagers the raiders took prisoner from the village. They will require your attention."

"As you command, my lord," Maester Velix asserted. He proceeded to the center of the front yard, and there he announced "If you require healing or medicine of any sort, come to me, and I will attend to you."

Despite all the activity that was currently going on in the immediate area, the maester was loud enough so that all could hear him.

Slowly, the wounded began to congregate around him. There was about sixteen of them altogether. More than half were the villagers that had been held hostage by the bandits.

"Follow me, if you would," Velix bade them. He subsequently led the group to his office in the keep.

On the way there, the man with the pale face walked alongside Maester Velix. He was clutching his arm, and he moved with a noticeable limp.

"Let me help you," Velix kindly advised him. He took the pale man's free arm and slung it over his shoulders. He held the man so that his maester's chain would not leave marks in the skin of the man's arm. After continuing in silence for a few seconds, he looked to the pale man and told him in assurance "You will be alright; I promise you that."

The pale man gradually turned his face toward Velix and murmured quietly "A maester is correct. A man will not die today."

Velix was perplexed by those odd remarks. Without trying to sound rude, he remarked "I beg your pardon, ser?"

"A man cannot say more," the pale man disclosed, "But know that a man is thankful for a maester's aid. A man shall not forget it."
"Well... what do you think?" Trisfier Botley asked expectantly.

Rodrik Greyjoy took a good, long look at the vessel before him. It is quite grand; no disputing that. He glimpsed down at the large blueprint he was holding. He could not manage a firm grip with his right hand, but his thumb and forefinger where sufficient to keep it steady. He looked back and forth between the vessel and the blueprint, and he found he was not pleased. But not grand enough.

"This will not do," Rodrik announced, lowering the blueprint.

"And why not?" Ser Harras Harlaw inquired. He did not sound genuinely interested in receiving an answer, or even in knowing what it was. Instead, he sounded irate, as though he had expected Rodrik to be dissatisfied. He is likely fed up by this point.

In any case, Rodrik supplied a reply: "The head sail is inadequately tethered to the mast. Its rigging will need to be reworked. The hull has not been properly reinforced, either. I said to use ironwood, not ash."

"We were short on ironwood," Tristifer revealed, "We had to make do with what was available."

"I would have been content to wait until the next ironwood shipment came in," Rodrik claimed, trying to stay patient, "That would have taken far less time than rebuilding the entire ship. Unfortunately, that is precisely what will have to be done now."

"Alright, we'll start over from scratch," Ser Harras mumbled, swiping the blueprint out of Rodrik's hands. As he rolled the parchment up, he added in "For the fifth time."

"Calm down, Harr," Tristifer beckoned him, "Rod said we were in no great hurry to complete this project."

"So I did, Tris," Rodrik affirmed, "For the present, we aren't. But that does not imply that I wished to waste our time with needless miscommunications."

"Then we'll have to ensure that nothing is miscommunicated this time," Harras declared, tucking the roll of parchment under his arm. Let us hope nothing will be.

"What about that?" Trisfier queried, gesturing to the vessel before them, "Should we scrap it?"

Rodrik stood thinking for about a minute. Finally, he remarked "No. While it is not good enough to be the new flagship, it is still a fine vessel. It will make a superb addition to the Royal Fleet."

"Very well," Trisfier avowed, clapping his hands together once, "Who should we give it to?"

"How about Gormond?" Harras proposed, "It's about time he had a ship of his own."

Perhaps so. Rodrik thought aloud "I'll consider him, but I make no promises. For now, just keep the ship docked. We'll pick a captain later."

"Fair enough," Trisfier commented. Ser Harras nodded in agreement.
"Now, let's find those shipwrights," Rodrik decisively pronounced, "I want construction to begin as soon as possible. This time, we have to make certain they follow the blueprints to the last detail."

"Too bad we're not on the Islands," Tristifer slyly muttered, "We could have threatened them with drowning if they fail to deliver."

"We could still do that," Ser Harras suggested. He does not sound as though he is japing.

"No point in making a threat we could not make good on," Rodrik Greyjoy debated.

"Who says we couldn't make good on that one?" Harras countered.

"The City Watch, for one," Rodrik bluntly responded, "As well as the dockhands, the nobles, the smallfolk, and, of course, the King. Basically, the entire fucking city."

"He's right," Tristifer concurred, "The laws of the Seven Kingdoms strictly prohibit drowning, unless it is done by a priest."

"So we should just allow the greenlander laws to dictate our actions?" Ser Harras presumed.

"If doing otherwise throws us out of the crown's good graces, then yes," Rodrik contended, "As you said, Harr, this will be our fifth attempt to build a new flagship. I do not plan for there to be a sixth. But there are ways to achieve our goal that do not involve intimidation."

"I'm aware of that," Harras asserted, "Still, these 'ways' are not as simple or efficient. And nowhere near as fun."

"All true," Rodrik admitted, scoffing a bit, "Even so, there is little that can be done about it. We have to build a new flagship, and we have to do it while killing as few people as possible."

"It can be done, Rod," Tristifer proclaimed. Count on him to take my side.

"It will be done," Rodrik declared, "Now let's go."

Tristifer Botley, Harras Harlaw, and Rodrik Greyjoy made their way along the docks towards the section where the shipwrights' offices were located. Tris walked at the head of the group. He was always eager to get somewhere, even if he did not know where it was.

Harras and Rodrik were by each other's sides. Just as when we were boys. As they headed down the marina, Harras turned to his best friend and stated quietly "Tell me something, Rod. About the shipwrights."

"What?" Rodrik said, disinterest evident in his tone.

Nevertheless, Harr proceeded to ask him "Between the two of us, would it honestly bother you if anything happened to the shipwrights?"

"No, it wouldn't," Rodrik flatly answered him. Frankly, I could not care less about those imbeciles. They're supposedly the best maritime architects in Westeros, yet they've failed to produce satisfying results four times.

"You know, the shipwrights might take the work more seriously if they realize how dangerous failure can be," Harras proclaimed, a wicked grin on his face, "Now I am not saying we should kill them ourselves. But suppose an 'accident' was to befall one of them…"

"If we could afford to lose them, I'd be all for it," Rodrik uttered candidly, "But with everything that’s going on in the world right now, we cannot spare even one of those builders. We need their services now more than ever."

"As you say," Harras conceded. He maintained his sinister smirk and remarked "All the same, inform me when you change your mind. I already have half a dozen ideas on how to bring about a tragic yet motivational incident to the docks."

Were it not for the law, I'd be ordering you to carry out all six of them. If only we were back on the Islands.

Despite being a recognized region of Westeros, the Iron Islands had traditionally stood quite apart from the Seven Kingdoms. Most notably, they were a fair deal poorer than any part of the mainland. As such, the Ironborn had to resort to extreme means to provide for themselves. The most extreme of these means was the Old Way, where the Ironborn way of life principally involved reaving, raiding, reaping, raping, and taking whatever they pleased.

The Old Way had been forsaken long ago, shortly after Aegon the Conqueror burned Harren Hoare and his sons alive and liberated the Riverlands from the control of the Iron Islands. Only a few bolder individuals, namely the late Euron Greyjoy, stuck to the Old Way after. In the three hundred years that followed the Targaryens' arrival, the Ironborn had kept the tradition of raiding alive.

Lord Quellon Greyjoy had attempted to put a firm end to Ironmen raids once and for all. His efforts had nearly succeeded during his lifetime, but ultimately failed upon his untimely death at the end of Robert's Rebellion. His eldest surviving son Balon had intended to revive the raids by invading the western coast of Westeros.

And we all know how that ended. The outcome was so abysmal that one might think we were always predestined to fail.

Indeed, one could be led to think just that. The Ironborn defeat in Greyjoy's Rebellion was due largely to how Lord Victarion Greyjoy had chosen the realm over his family and sided with King Robert Baratheon and his lot. Some on the Iron Islands called Victarion a traitor for swearing fealty to the crown. Be that as it may, Victarion had given the lordship of the Iron Islands in exchange for his loyalty. Yet he never even asked for it.

Ever since Victarion was named Lord of Pyke, the Iron Islands had prospered like never before. Some innovative farming techniques had been brought to the Islands, allowing crops to be cultivated on a grand scale. These methods made possible what was once deemed impossible. Although most Ironborn continued worshipping the Drowned God, septs had been built and weirwoods replanted at various locations on the Islands. Furthermore, trade and diplomacy between the Islands and the mainland had reached its pinnacle.

Most of all, there was no raiding. None. Not a single holdfast on this side of the world had been struck by Iron ships in over a decade. The majority of the Westerosi viewed this as a good thing. Most greenlanders found the whole concept of raiding to be the equivalent of living off the misery and suffering of others. Who are they to judge us?

Nonetheless, the ending of the raids had changed the overall image of the Ironborn, as well. The tension and fright that used to be associated with the Ironborn no longer existed in Westeros. Whenever people spotted an Ironborn ship in the distance, whether they were on land or sea, they either waited patiently for the vessel to come to them, or they did nothing and waited for it to leave. Simply put, there was no longer any reason for anyone to feel intimidated by the Ironborn. While that may have been good for relations between the Seven Kingdoms, there were some Ironborn who despised that prospect. Fear was what made the Ironborn so strong and great to begin with. They once held the fear of all those who resided on the shores of Westeros. Now they held no one's.

How the mighty have fallen. More to the point, how they have fallen astray.

When Balon Greyjoy rebelled against the crown, his eldest son and heir, Rodrik Greyjoy, had joined him willingly and without hesitation. Back then, Rodrik had sincerely believed that his father's campaign would be successful, and that through constant and considerable show of force, the Iron Islands would gain the respect of all Westeros. Rodrik Greyjoy also believed that one day, after his sire was laid to rest in the waters surrounding Pyke, he too would sit the Seastone Chair.

_Had I known that I'd actually end up here ..._

Many Ironborn had suffered losses in Greyjoy's Rebellion. Rodrik's losses had been especially great. His uncle. His freedom. His birthright. Most of his right hand.

He would never forget that day at Seagard, when Jorah Mormont maimed him in one-on-one combat. Even after ten years, he could still vividly recall the sensation of that bastard sword cutting through his hand. _It is true what they say; nothing holds an edge like Valyrian steel._

That was only the first of the many tribulations Rodrik had faced during Greyjoy's Rebellion. Not long after he was captured, his uncle Euron's forces were defeated at Fair Isle. The Crow's Eye himself was slain at the hand of Gregor Clegane's brother, Sandor. Soon enough, the Ironborn defeat at Pyke came about, as well. Subsequently, Rodrik's father was removed from the Seastone Chair and sent to the Wall.

After Victarion was named the new Lord Paramount of the Iron Islands, Lord Balon's sons were made hostages of the crown. They were forced to relocate to certain other places in Westeros; places that were strange to them. Theon was sent to Winterfell, Maron to Moat Cailin, and Rodrik to King's Landing.

Rodrik and his brothers had not been made prisoners of the crown to ensure their Uncle's fealty. Victarion Greyjoy had already proven his loyalty to the realm many times over during the rebellion. However, there were still some Ironborn who shared Lord Balon's ideals. These same Ironborn had believed Balon and his sons deserved to remain in the line of succession before Victarion.

Rodrik later learned that he and his brothers were actually taken prisoner to guarantee that those Ironborn behaved themselves. The concept and reasoning behind it had both been devised by Lord Gregor Clegane. The Mountain had debated that as long as Balon and his sons were away from the Iron Islands, none of the Ironborn loyal to them would be incited to do anything to compromise Victarion's power or worsen the Islands' relations with the mainland anytime soon.

_Indeed, nothing of the sort happened._

Although Lord Balon was now a sworn brother of the Night's Watch and would remain one for life, his sons were no longer hostages of the realm. By the time Uncle Victarion returned to Pyke to lay claim to his lordship, nearly all the Ironborn who sympathized with Balon had died, disappeared, or – in most cases – switched sides. There were some who still supported Balon's cause as strongly as ever, but their numbers were far too few to pose any real threat to the stability of Westeros.

Therefore, it was decided by both Lord Gregor Clegane and King Robert Baratheon that there was no longer any need to hold Balon's sons hostage. As a result, Theon, Maron, and Rodrik were freed from their captivity soon after.
Interestingly, even after they regained their freedom, none of the three Greyjoy sons immediately returned home to Pyke. They had each chosen to remain right where they were for a while.

Theon had done alright for himself. He had become close to the children of Lord Eddard Stark, and he had many friends among the noble families of the North. That was a sign that he could improve overall relations between the Islands and the North.

Maron had fared even better. He had been inducted into the Legion without Banners, and after Victarion returned to Pyke, he had replaced his uncle as the Iron Islands' representative on Lord Gregor's secret council. He was one of the Mountain's closest allies and friends.

Some might have said Rodrik had done the best of all. In the ten years he had resided in the capital city, he had gone from an Ironborn prisoner to the Iron Islands' official liaison to the throne. He provided all direct correspondence between his people and the crown. A couple years back, the King had even appointed him to the position of Master of Ships on the small council. He had performed that role quite well, thus far. Despite certain… limitations.

Shortly before he and his companions made it to the shipwrights' offices, Rodrik felt an itch on his nose. He involuntarily raised his right hand to scratch it. When his fingers reached his face, he scowled and mumbled "Ow."

Harras turned to him and asked "Something wrong?"

"No," Rodrik told him frankly, scratching the tip of his nose with his index finger, "Just poked myself. Again."

"Alright then," Harras remarked, scoffing a bit. Rodrik resisted the desire to grimace at him. You find this amusing, huh?

During his first year at King's Landing, Rodrik Greyjoy had quickly discovered that life was much harder with only half of his right hand. Then Grand Maester Marwyn had provided a partial solution to his problem. The Grand Maester had crafted a prosthetic which could be attached at the wrist and fastened in place where part of Rodrik's palm was missing. With the prosthetic, he had five fingers once again. But only two of them were real. The other three were made of metal, and they could never be moved.

After he scratched his nose, Rodrik gazed down at his right hand. He flexed his thumb and his index finger. His middle finger, his ring finger, and his little finger were stuck in a partly-bent position. The Grand Maester had fashioned them that way so that Rodrik could lift things, hold things, and pick things up almost as easily as he had when his hand was whole.

Rodrik could still eat and drink as effortlessly as before with his half-flesh, half-iron hand. However, he had to retrain himself to swordfight and learn how to write with his left hand. He had spent years in those endeavors, and his form and posture still left much to be desired.

In spite of all else, Rodrik could not overlook the irony of his injury. The vessel he had captained during his father's rebellion was called the Iron Fist. Now, one could argue the name applied to him just as well. It would have been a much choicer moniker than the one he had actually been given. Rodrik Never-Right. If ever I find the scum who first coined that term…

His aggressive reflection was cut short. Right then, he and his companions reached the shipwrights' offices. There they found Dale Seaworth, eldest son and heir of Ser Davos Seaworth. Based on how he was casually leaning against the wall, he had nothing on his schedule at this time. That indicated that he was available.
Finally, someone who actually knows what he's doing is on-hand.

In Rodrik's mind, Dale was the one shipwright in King's Landing who never disappointed anyone with his creations. Rodrik regarded him as one of his closest non-Ironborn friends. It happened that Dale also captained his own vessel. From what Rodrik seen and heard, he was as good a commander of ships as he was a builder of them.

When he saw Rodrik Greyjoy, Harras Harlaw, and Tristifer Botly approach him, Dale flashed a friendly smile and greeted them with a gruff "Good morning."

Rodrik gave a stiff nod in return. He remarked "I hope you are not indisposed."

"Not at the moment," Dale Seaworth claimed. He folded his arms and queried "What can I do for you?"

"They just completed the latest attempt on the flagship," Rodrik apprised him, "I am not satisfied with the results."

"So you're doing the whole thing over?" Dale presumed. It's as though he read my mind.

"Precisely," Rodrik confirmed, "This time, I'm looking for a shipwright who is actually qualified for the job."

Dale smirked and cockily muttered "You should have come to me in the first place."

"I would have," Rodrik claimed, "But I know you're a busy man."

"Fortunately for you, my immediate timetable is empty," Dale revealed. He stood up straight, extended his right arm, and asked "May I see the designs?"

At Rodrik's signal, Harras stepped forward and held out the blueprints. Dale took them in his hands, unrolled them, and spent a couple minutes studying them. After that, he gazed up from them and declared "I'll have these plans recommissioned straightaway. Once the required capital and space have been set aside, I will assemble a team of builders."

"How long would you estimate this will all take?" Rodrik inquired in interest.

Dale stood thinking for a few seconds, and then he replied with "If we allocate our resources efficiently and properly… a turn of the moon or two."

Anyone else would have needed three or more. He's fast and reliable.

"Good," Rodrik murmured in approval, "Send us daily reports of your progress."

"Absolutely," Dale acknowledged. He then moved towards the entrance to the shipwrights' offices. Just before he went inside, he peered over his shoulder and muttered "Oh, by the way, Rodrik, you'll be interested to know that the Black Wind was sighted further up Blackwater Rush not a half-hour ago. It should be docked here within the next few minutes."

Initially, Rodrik was somewhat astonished. Then he grinned lightly and stated "I appreciate you telling me this, Dale."

"Anytime," was all the Stormlander captain said in response. Then he opened the main door to the building and swiftly entered it.

After Dale Seaworth deprived the three Ironborn of his company, Tristifer observed "She's here ahead of schedule."

"That's Asha for you," Ser Harras drily uttered. Yes, it is.

"We're not too far from the highborn docks," Tristifer professed, "If we head that way now, we may get there in time to receive her."

Count on Tris to be the first to make that suggestion. Oh, well. No point in avoiding it.

"Since I am not needed back at the Red Keep until this afternoon, I suppose we can afford to be there when the Black Wind pulls in," Rodrik thought aloud, "But remember, Tris; things have changed since you last saw Asha."

"I am not as dense as I appear, Rod," Tris sarcastically commented, "I am very much aware that things are not as they once were."

"See that you do not forget," Rodrik cautioned him.

"Relax," Tristifer bade him, "I can stay out of trouble."

"If that was true, you wouldn't have gotten yourself banished from the Islands," Harras uttered cheekily.

"I was not banished," Tristifer disputed angrily, "I was asked to temporarily live on the mainland. For my own safety, mind you. The situation has improved now, and I can go back home whenever I please."

"Yet you're still here," Rodrik pointed out.

"So are you," Tristifer contended. That was a fair point. So I am.

"Well, I'm Master of Ships," Rodrik countered, "What's your excuse?"

"I'm the assistant to the Master of Ships," Tristifer slyly proclaimed.

"I thought that was my title," Harras Harlaw stated jokily.

"There is no such title," Rodrik Greyjoy told them candidly, "You two are my aides, plain and simple."

"Your chief aides," Tris debated. He thinks overmuch of himself, doesn't he?

"Again, no such thing," Rodrik murmured plainly. He then exhaled sharply and mumbled "Just behave yourself, Tris. The woman we're about to encounter is not the girl you once loved."

"Well, she no longer has an axe for her lover," said Harras, "That's for certain."

"I do not need you pointing out the obvious either, Harr," Rodrik told his best friend, "Treat her as you would any other person of great import."

Better yet, treat her with due respect.

"Aye, Rod," Harras avowed. Tristifer nodded his agreement. That was enough to assure Rodrik that they would stir up no mischief. Thereafter, they hastily left the vicinity.

Five minutes later, they came to the highborn docks. Like the rest of the harbor, the place was bustling with activity all around. Fishermen and merchants were selling their wares. Porters were loading and unloading cargo from various ships. The on-duty gold cloaks were making their rounds on patrol. Six years previously, a shrine to the Drowned God had been built in the area's southernmost section. Standing by the altar was Beron Blacktyde, the drowned priest who led the congregation of drowned men in King's Landing.

Some of the people on the docks dipped their heads to Rodrik as he passed them. They undoubtedly knew who he was. Everyone else only gave him enough regard to stay out of his way. To their credit, they know their place. Or their courtesies, at least.

At present, most of the vessels stationed in the hightborn docks were Stormlander, Westerlander, or Riverlander in make. Additionally, there were a few foreign ships that had sailed here from all the way across the Narrow Sea. Only two ships there were of Ironborn design, and neither was particularly outstanding.

Then the Black Wind made its appearance. Even alone, that one ship made for a very fine display of Ironborn strength. It certainly compensated for the conspicuous lack of Ironborn presence at the hightborn docks. Rodrik could not help but grin when the longship entered his field of vision. She's a real beauty. More so than her captain.

Soon enough, the Black Wind pulled into the nearest empty port and dropped anchor. As Rodrik and his companions headed over to that spot, the gangplank was extended from the bridge of the ship to the platform below. Once the crossway was deemed stable and secure, the crew began to disembark. As usual, the captain was the first off. Normally, the captain came down alone. Not this one. This captain emerged alongside her husband.

Although Rodrik had not seen his brothers since Father's rebellion, he had occasionally seen his sister at some points in that interval. The last such occasion was only a couple years ago, when he had attended her wedding at Riverrun. While Ironborn were infamous for crashing festivities, Rodrik had not shown up at that event with the intention of ruining it. In fact, he had been invited.

The wedding between Lord Gregor Clegane and Lady Dacey Mormont had been done in such a way that it paid homage to both the Old Gods and the New Gods. Similarly, the nuptials between Ser Edmure Tully and Lady Asha Greyjoy had involved a combination of two faiths. It had taken place in the sept of Riverrun, and it had been conducted by the Old Grey Gull, a renowned drowned priest from the Islands. The oaths had been sworn by the Seven, and the saltwater blessing had been poured on the heads of both the bride and the groom.

Rodrik had been the one to give Asha away. Beforehand, he had been concerned that his lack of a whole right hand might have impeded his ability. He did not share those qualms with anyone, lest they think him insecure. Luckily, even with only seven fingers, he managed to remove the black and gold cloak of House Greyjoy from around his sister's shoulders without botching the job. He recalled how he had breathed a huge sigh of relief when Ser Edmure replaced it with the blue, red, and silver cloak of House Tully. He had never thought he would be so consoled by such a sight. Not often will a kraken willingly mate with a trout.

Many of the dishes at the feast had involved fish. That was unsurprising, seeing as most of the attendees were Riverlords and Ironborn. There were more types of fish served that night than Rodrik knew existed. Salmon, sea bass, tuna, sardines, clams, oysters, and plenty of trout. There were even some crabs that had been plucked from the Bay of Ice. Rodrik and all the other guests ate heartily that night. Wine and beer had flown freely, but Rodrik drank sparingly. Although he had been a bit of a drunk in his youth, he had become more responsible with his cups in his later years. Too much drink makes a man reckless. For all I know, that could be the real reason I lost Naturally, Rodrik did not participate in the bedding ceremony. That was not solely because he was related to the bride. Even if someone other than his sister had gotten married that day, Rodrik doubted many women would have enjoyed having her tits groped by cold metal.

Rodrik and his party had left Riverrun the morning after. He saw his sister and his new brother-by-law once more before he left. They were visibly exhausted from the previous night's... activities. Nonetheless, they seemed to be very happy with one another.

Two years later, they still looked every bit as happy together. As a matter of fact, Asha was glowing. In more than one way.

Rodrik was aware that he was going to be an uncle soon. A few months ago, he had received a raven from Riverrun, informing him that the castle's future lord's wife was with child. He had sent a follow-up raven, expressing his congratulations to Ser Edmure and Asha. While he mostly did that as a courtesy, he was genuinely delighted for his sister and her husband.

At this point, Asha was in the fourth month of her pregnancy. She was really starting to show by now. Her abdomen had a palpable bulge, she was slightly pale, and walking straight was a little difficult for her. When she descended the gangplank, Edmure lent her his arm for support. When they saw Rodrik, they both gave a warm smile, which he returned.

The moment Asha set foot on the docks, she practically leapt forward and threw her arms around Rodrik. He was taken aback by both that action and the suddenness of it. His sister had never been so affectionate to him before. Must be one of her mood swings. Regardless, he hugged her back.

Once they came apart from each other, Rodrik turned his attention to Ser Edmure. Continuing to grin, his brother-by-law stepped closer and cordially extended his left arm to him. Least he remembered to offer his left hand this time. The Master of Ships took the hand of the future Lord Paramount of the Trident and gave it a steadfast shake.

"How was the voyage?" Rodrik asked when Edmure released his one good hand.

"Smooth as they come," Edmure apprised him.

"Indeed," Asha conceded, "Rather scenic, as well. If you sail along the Red Fork, you'll find some lovely sights throughout the Riverlands this year."

"Fascinating," Rodrik uttered bluntly. Based on their countenances, his tone must have been enough to indicate that he did not especially care for sightseeing. When I get on a ship, beautiful scenery is far from the top of my list of priorities.

After a brief pause, Rodrik declared "Go ahead and check in with the harbor master. Once the rest of your crew has disembarked, come with me. I'll escort all of you to the Red Keep."

"Sounds like a plan," Asha commented favorably.

"Only one drawback," Edmure thought aloud, "King Robert does not yet know we got in earlier than we anticipated."

"I'll send a rider to inform him of your early arrival," Rodrik proposed. That suggestion seemed to please Ser Edmure.

As Asha and Edmure waited for the crew of the Black Wind to assemble on the docks, Rodrik turned to the two Ironborn who had been there all along. "Tris, ride on to the Keep. Notify the King that the Tullys have arrived."

"You got it, Rod," Tristifer proclaimed.

As the youngest of the three Ironmen departed from the vicinity, Harras turned to Rodrik and drily muttered "So Tris can be trusted with such a critical task, but I cannot?"

"Of course not," Rodrik retorted wryly, "I did not send Tris ahead because he is more reliable or anything like that. You are still here because unlike Tris, you and Asha do not have a history."

"Ah," Harras remarked, realization setting in. He then smirked and patted Rodrik on the shoulder, saying "You know I was only jesting with you, right?"

_Naturally. He definitely needs something to do._ "Go help Asha and Ser Edmure get signed in with the harbor master. I'll have the stableboys ready the horses."

"Whatever you say," Ser Harras drily murmured. He promptly went to carry out that task.

About forty-five minutes elapsed. At the end of that interval, Rodrik Greyjoy, Ser Harras Harlaw, Ser Edmure Tully, Lady Asha Tully, and the whole crew of the _Black Wind_ were out of the marina and heading for Aegon's High Hill on horseback. Most of the crew were fellow Ironmen who had moved to the Riverlands with their captain. The rest were lifelong vassals of the Tullys.

Rodrik rode at the front of the large group. He gripped his reins tightly in his left hand. Although he could direct the horse well enough with both his hands, he had long ago learned how to do so by using only one of them. This will be useful if I'm ever without my prosthetic. Or if my injury ever gets any worse.

Near the start of their ride to the Red Keep, Ser Harras, Ser Edmure, and Asha fell in beside. Right then, Asha called out to her brother "Hey, Rod!"

He promptly turned to face his younger sister. She grinned and began to softly sing: "Let the river run…"

Rodrik smiled. He sang the next lyric with his sister: "Let all the dreamers wake the nation…"

Edmure and Harras joined in and finished the verse with "Come the new Valyria…"

They all knew that song well. It was one of the many that had been composed by Lord Gregor Clegane. It was one of his earlier pieces, having been around since shortly after Greyjoy's Rebellion.

That song had been played at Edmure and Asha's wedding feast. That was the first time Lord Hoster Tully ever heard it. Rodrik could remember how perplexed Lord Hoster had been by the song's beginning. He had asked aloud "Let the Riverrun what?"

Rodrik, Edmure, and Asha had all been amused by how badly he had misheard the opening verse.
They had quickly enlightened him that the actual wording was "river run," not "Riverrun."

Afterward, Lord Hoster said he felt a bit of a fool for having misinterpreted the lyric. _Not that anyone could really blame him for it. The first time I heard that song, I thought much the same._

In any case, it was a very pleasant song. It was especially popular in the Riverlands and the Iron Islands, given how its title and subject matter pertained to both water and success.
Soon they got to the lyric that went "It's asking for the taking. Trembling, shaking. Oh, my heart is aching…"

At that exact moment, Asha stopped singing. She placed a hand over her chest and swayed in her saddle slightly.

Edmure promptly trotted closer to his wife, placed a gentle hand on her back, and asked in concern "Is something wrong?"

After a few seconds, Asha shook her head to clear it up, and then she turned to her husband, smiled kindly, and assured him with "Yes. Just a slight dizzy spell. It's gone now, though."

Edmure let out a sigh of relief and stated "Good. If you need anything, I'm right here, my love."

"Thank you," Asha told him gratefully. She leaned over and pecked him once on the cheek.

Rodrik observed this interaction between the two spouses. Who would have thought my sister would marry such a protective man? On that note, who would have thought she would marry in general?

Given Asha's current condition, Edmure's worries were justified. Rodrik happened to share them. He looked back at her and enquired "Are you certain you should even be riding a horse right now?"

Asha flashed her elder brother an annoyed glare and spat "I'm pregnant, not helpless."

"I never said you were," Rodrik calmly rejoined.

"You implied it," Asha contended, a little ire in her voice.

"I did not," he refuted, "I merely questioned whether it was most sensible for you to be on horseback at this stage. Being temporarily unfit to ride a horse does not mean you are helpless."

"Oh, what do you even know of being helpless, anyway?" Asha snapped.

It had occurred to Rodrik that Asha was not actually trying to start a fight. Most likely, she may have simply been experiencing another mood swing, and she was just more prone to anger and other negative emotions this time. Nevertheless, that last remark of hers struck a nerve. Without uttering a single word, Rodrik slowly turned to face his sister. Then he raised his right hand so that Asha could see it.

Asha quickly realized how tactless and thoughtless her last statement had been. She looked away from her brother in shame and uttered softly "Never mind. I'm sorry, Rod. I didn't mean-

"It's alright, Ash," Rodrik told her in reassurance. She's changed moods yet again. Three emotions in as many minutes. That is rather peculiar. "You needn't worry yourself. It'll be a dry day on the Islands before I allow harsh words to trouble me."

"I was not that harsh, was I?" Asha asked him anxiously.

"No, you were not harsh at all," Rodrik firmly proclaimed. He turned his horse so that he was facing her. Then he stated "You'll be here for at least a fortnight. Let's not start your visit off by getting all excited over nothing."

At that, Asha nodded her head and declared "Alright then."

The heated discussion ended there, much to everyone's relief.
The party trotted on in silence for a couple minutes. Then Rodrik restarted the conversation with "So, Edmure… how is your lord father?"

The heir to Riverrun did not supply an immediate answer. Instead, he gazed down at his hands in quiet contemplation, and then he drearily disclosed "He is ailing, I am afraid to say."

Normally, Rodrik did not bother to learn about the physical health of others. However, Edmure was his brother-by-law, and Edmure's father was Asha's father-by-law. Family meant very much to Rodrik Greyjoy. As such, he looked to his sister's husband and inquired "How so?"

"He has been bed-ridden for the last few months," Edmure apprised him, "His condition has only gotten progressively worse since then. Maester Vyman believes he only has a year or two left."

"I am sorry to hear that," Rodrik uttered sincerely, "Hopefully, he’ll live long enough to see his ninth grandchild."

Edmure then perked up a bit and pronounced "Ninth and tenth, actually."

Rodrik was confused. "Come again?"

Asha brought her horse next to her eldest brother's and placed a hand on her abdomen. She told him "Maester Vyman believes I am carrying twins."

"Oh?" Rodrik murmured in pleasant surprise. When Asha nodded her head, he smiled again and declared "That's wonderful!"

"Yes, it is," Edmure concurred, beaming with pride.

"Have you decided on names yet?" Rodrik asked quite suddenly.

"As it happens, we have," Asha disclosed, "For the girl, Minisa, in honor of Edmure's late mother."

"And for the boy, Urrigon, in honor of your late uncle," Edmure supplemented.

"Excellent choices," Rodrik proclaimed. Ah, yes. Good old Uncle Urrigon. I have so many fond memories of him from my youth. Too bad he had to die just because that useless maester could not treat his infection properly. "Well, give my regards to Lord Hoster when next you see him. Tell him I am honored that my nephew will one day be the Lord of Riverrun, and that he will be named for my beloved uncle."

That came off as more sentimental than I would have liked. Be that as it may, Edmure and Asha had no objections to it. They seemed perfectly willing to grant that simple request.

By this point, the company was more than halfway to Aegon's High Hill. The Red Keep was starting to loom up on them quickly.

Edmure and Asha had never been to King's Landing before. Logically, they had never seen the massive edifice that was the Red Keep before, either. One look at their faces was enough to tell Rodrik that they were both deeply amazed by its size, structure, and magnificence. Rodrik had a similar reaction to the first time he saw the Red Keep. Of course, back then, it had been his prison. Even though it no longer was, it was not as impressive as it used to be. It isn't so splendid after you've lived in it for ten years.

Once they got over their awe, Edmure and Asha resumed focusing on the path in front of them. Edmure turned back to Rodrik and remarked "Well, enough about my father for now. Tell me; how is yours?"

Still on the Wall, last I checked, Rodrik replied with "I would not know. I have not seen him lately. Not since he went north."

Last he heard of Father, he was at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, which was under the control of Cotter Pyke. The thought alone sickened Rodrik. My father, the great Balon of House Greyjoy, taking orders from a bastard of the Iron Islands... this is truly a cruel world we live in if such a thing can come to pass.

"You may be interested to know that Father has been promoted," Asha apprised him.

That succeeded in catching Rodrik's interest. "Promoted how?"

"The Wall recently reopened another of their castles, Woodswatch-by-the-Pool," Ser Edmure expounded, "Lord Balon was tasked with leading its garrison."

"Oh, jolly good," Rodrik mumbled mockingly. He went from serving under a bastard to being the lord of a fucking pool. That's progress if ever I saw it.

"Look on the bright side, Rod," Asha advised her brother, "Father finally has a command of his own."

"He already had a command of his own eleven years ago, Ash," Rodrik muttered bitterly, "Or have you forgotten that Uncle Victarion was not always meant to be Grandfather Quellon's successor?"

Asha appeared indignant. "Of course I haven't forgotten. What kind of question is that?"

One that warranted asking, given what I just heard, sister dear. "That was his last true command. Even if he has control of a whole garrison of black brothers, he still answers to Lord Commander Jeor Mormont. Isn't that remarkable? It was Lord Jorah Mormont who crippled me at the battle of Seagard. Now his father is giving orders to ours. It is as though we are destined to be subjugated by the Mormonts. There was once a time when our names were feared by those who resided on Bear Island."

"Those days are long gone, brother," Asha muttered solemnly, a bit of tension detectable in her voice, "There is no point in brooding on them anymore. Anyway, we are hardly servants of the Mormonts. The Greyjoys still wield far greater power and influence than they."

Seeing as the Mountain married a Mormont, I would question the validity of that observation. Ser Edmure must have sensed some hostility, as he hastily muttered "I should not have addressed this matter. Let us not say anything more on it."

"That may be for the best," Rodrik agreed. Unless you want tempers to flare.

"Well, here's a new topic," Asha announced, "Aunt Gysella is having another babe."

"Is that right?" Harras asked rhetorically. I nearly forgot he was here.

"Yes, it is," Asha affirmed, "Nuncle Victarion sent a raven a few weeks before we departed Riverrun. According to what the maesters have told him, little Gregor will be an elder brother in about six or seven months."

"That's marvelous, Asha," Rodrik said in a tone so dry that it was obvious he really thought the news was anything but, "This is still not something I'd like to converse on. If I was interested in what goes on back home, I would have asked for word of it. I propose we just continue on to the Red Keep in silence."

Edmure, Asha, and Harras said nothing to protest that suggestion. They do not wish to aggravate me. Whether that's for my benefit or theirs, I could not say. In either case, it is fortunate. All this talk about Uncle Victarion and Father can produce no good whatsoever.

Rodrik was aware that Asha was one of the many Ironborn who now frowned upon the rebellion their father had launched, as well as everything Lord Balon and his uprising stood for. By all accounts, Maron and Theon shared those views. Rodrik had yet to develop such a mindset. If Balon Greyjoy still had one stalwart supporter in the whole of the world, it was his eldest son.

Another major difference between Rodrik and his younger siblings was how pleased they each were with how their lives were going. There was no denying that Asha was quite happy with her life. After all, she was married to the future Lord of Riverrun, and she was carrying their children, one of whom would also be Lord of Riverrun one day. From what Rodrik heard, Theon and Maron were also very happy with their current accommodations in the North. What I'd give for a taste of their happiness.

At first glance, one would have assumed that Rodrik found his life in the capital city to be quite fulfilling. Alas, he was not content with it. In public, he may have seemed so. In actuality, it was a different story.

Secretly, Rodrik Greyjoy HATED King's Landing. He hated virtually everything about it.

He hated the pretentious atmosphere. He hated the absurdly small ratio of Ironborn residents. He hated the never-ending political disputes. He hated having to constantly look over his shoulder for fear of being overheard by spies. He hated that godawful smell.

Then again, the smell had improved since Rodrik first came to King's Landing. A few years back, Lord Gregor Clegane had proposed that proper waste management be implemented in the capital city. After the King approved the suggestion, the Mountain had commissioned a team of Essosi architects – the very same team which had renovated Moat Cailin – to build a sewer system for King's Landing. It had been an expensive and time-consuming endeavor, but the outcome was well worth everything. Now the city no longer smelt of piss, shit, and other unpleasant, unidentifiable odors. One could say it finally smelt how a city was supposed to smell. Rodrik was not entirely certain what that was. What is a city supposed to smell like?

The closest thing the Iron Islands had to a city was Lordsport, the seat of House Botley, and it smelt of salt and fish. Of course, everything on the Islands smells of salt and fish. A proper Ironborn city would smell that way. But this is not an Ironborn city, and it never will be.

As much as Rodrik despised living in King's Landing, it was preferable to the alternative. He had been allowed a one-week visit back to Pyke during each year of his incarceration at King's Landing. When his confinement ended, he was free to go back home as often as he pleased. If he wanted to, he could even leave for the Islands and never return to the mainland.

However, the end of Rodrik's confinement had coincided with when Victarion Greyjoy withdrew from the Legion without Banners and sailed back to Pyke to sit the Seastone Chair. Rodrik had not gone back to the Iron Islands since then. He had no desire to go back there whilst Victarion was in charge. He could hardly even think of his uncle without being consumed by the overwhelming feelings of malice and betrayal.

So he opted to stay in King's Landing indefinitely. Much as he detested the capital, he detested a Pyke ruled by Victarion Greyjoy far more. At least here, I can make a name for myself, and no one will deprive me of what is mine.

Master of Ships was not as powerful and prestigious a position as Lord of Pyke, but Rodrik had earned it on his own merits. He took some comfort in the knowledge that his services were appreciated, that his work was benefiting the whole of Westeros (particularly the Iron Islands), and that he was establishing himself by doing something he enjoyed doing.

Designing and building ships for the Royal Army was the one highlight of Rodrik Greyjoy's otherwise grim and uneventful life. Oftentimes, it was essentially the very thing that inspired him to keep going. It may not be much, but it is all I have.

Needless to say, there were still times when he yearned for more. Mainly, if he had the opportunity to seize the Seastone Chair from his Uncle, he would undoubtedly do so. But the way things stood now, that would never happen. After all, he was about as significant and prevailing in the world as the Targaryens.

However, unlike the Targaryens, Rodrik still had his connection to his ancestral home. He had never been officially removed from his family's line of succession; he had merely been displaced. If anything happened to his uncle and cousin, lordship of Pyke would fall to him. That thought was tempting. Be that as it may, Victarion and Gregor Greyjoy were on the other side of the Seven Kingdoms, surrounded by hundreds of loyal retainers. No way to get past them without anyone noticing. Oh, well. That aside, I am no kinslayer.

Soon enough, Rodrik and his company came to the Red Keep. They found the portcullis raised and the drawbridge lowered. Tristifer Botley was waiting for them there, astride his chestnut palfrey.

"Hey there, Tris," Asha greeted her one-time love interest.

"Pleasure to see you again, my lady," Tristifer said formally.

"None of that 'my lady' crap," Asha murmured cheekily, "My name is Asha."

"Oh, and here I thought it was 'Yara'," Tristifer joked.

"Yara? What kind of stupid name is that?"

Tristifer was not alone. There were two other men with him. One was a Dornishman with long black hair, a pointed beard, and large golden earrings. He was Ser Aron Santagar, the master-at-arms of the Red Keep. The other was a middle-aged landed knight of the Stormlands. He was Ser Davos Seaworth, Dale's father and Lord Stannis Baratheon's most trusted advisor. Each man was sitting atop a brown garron.

"Welcome back, Lord Rodrik," Ser Aron bade the Master of Ships. Ser Davos gave a polite nod.

Rodrik was no real lord. Even so, as a member of the small council, he was normally addressed as such. Not that I have any complaints.

"Good day, Ser Aron, Ser Davos," Rodrik returned the greeting, "Fancy seeing you here."

"The King was holding court when I got here," Tristifer notified him, "As such, I was unable to speak to him, but I managed to find Lord Stannis instead. I told him of Ser Edmure and Asha's arrival, and he sent Ser Davos and Ser Aron to receive them."

"We are grateful for the acknowledgment," Edmure Tully proclaimed, "I hope our early coming "Not at all, my lord," Ser Davos asserted. "The King is still holding court as we speak, but you will be able to seek an audience with him this afternoon. Would you care to get some rest before then?"

"Certainly," Asha replied.

Ser Aron nodded and announced "Chambers have already been prepared for you in the Maidenvault. Most of you will room with two or more others. Ser Edmure and Lady Asha will have their own private chamber near the Tower of the Hand."

There were no objections from the company, apart from the occasional grumble. But that was to be expected. Ironborn will find anything to grumble about, even if they are pleased.

A couple minutes later, they were at the stables of the Red Keep. The horses were turned over to the stableboys, and a small group of porters assisted them with their baggage. Once all that was handled, the entire party went inside the Red Keep.

They parted ways there. Ser Aron led the Ironborn and Rivermen to the Maidenvault. Ser Harras and Tristifer accompanied them. Rodrik and Ser Davos escorted Asha and Ser Edmure to the Tower of the Hand.

Though Davos Seaworth was over a decade his senior, Rodrik Greyjoy got on with the Onion Knight quite well. Almost as well as Rodrik got along with Ser Davos’ eldest son. It turned out they had very much in common.

Both had a mutual love of ships and maritime adventures. Both had gotten into a fair amount of trouble in their youth. Both now served under the King and his brother. Additionally, neither of them had two complete hands. However, Ser Davos was only missing the first knuckle of each of the fingers on his left hand. He kept the bones in a pouch around his neck. He liked to call the pouch his luck. If four knuckles were all I lost at Seagard, I would have called it luck, too. Furthermore, when their hands had gotten maimed, the action had been called "justice" by the man who did so. It would seem wartime justice and peacetime justice are two entirely different things. Ser Davos is fortunate it was not his right hand.

When they got to the Tower of the Hand, they came across a tall woman with auburn hair. The moment she saw them, she broke into a wide grin and came to them with her arms outstretched. She called out merrily "Edmure!"

Edmure Tully braced himself as his sister approached him. She pulled the heir to Riverrun into a tight hug, which he tentatively returned. He whispered not unkindly "It is good to see you, too, Lysa."

After a few moments, Lysa Arryn pulled away from her younger brother and turned her attention to the woman at his side. She smiled and thought aloud "This must be your blushing bride."

"That’s not a word I’d used to describe her. Nonetheless, Asha did blush slightly at being referred to as such.

Lysa stepped forward to embrace Asha, as well, but the Ironwoman hastily held up her hand and beckoned her "No hugs, please!"

Lady Lysa seemed alarmed, bewildered, and a little hurt. Luckily, Asha thought fast and placed a hand on her midsection. She added in "At least not until this passes."
Lysa appeared to understand that. I thought she would, having been through that process three times herself.

The Hand's wife smiled again and leant forward until that her face was nearly level with Asha's abdomen. She cooed softly "Hello, you. I'm your Aunt Lysa. You're going to be part of a wonderful family, little darling."

Rodrik did not know whether to chuckle or cringe. His sister did the latter. Her husband did the former. He must have seen this coming. Too bad he could not have warned Asha in advance.

Lady Lysa Arryn had to be the most eccentric person Rodrik knew. She had been that way for as long as he had known her. But it could have been far worse. He had heard that shortly before he came to King's Landing, she had been very unstable. Apparently, the death of a childhood friend had shocked her into a near-unresponsive state. Thankfully, her husband and the Grand Maester had helped her through that ordeal. I doubt she ever made a full recovery, but at least she is not violent or delusional. Just strange.

Soon enough, Lysa returned to her full height and declared "Alyssa, Robin, and Donella are at their lessons with Prince Tommen and the princesses, but I hope you'll see them later."

"Of course we will," Edmure assured her. Asha nodded compliantly.

Lysa grinned again and pronounced "In the meantime, come with me. I'll show you to your quarters."

Edmure and Asha allowed the Hand's wife to lead them to the highborn bedchamber that had been set aside for them. Once they were gone, Rodrik was left alone with Ser Davos. But not for very long.

"I should get back to the Great Hall," the Onion Knight thought aloud, "Lord Stannis is expecting me to return soon."

"Then do not let me keep you, good ser," Rodrik told the older man, "Will I see you again when the small council convenes today?"

"If I am summoned, yes," Davos Seaworth replied, "But I have yet to be."

"In any case, take care," Rodrik Greyjoy bade him.

As Ser Davos headed back to the throne room, Rodrik went to his own bedchamber in Maegor's Holdfast. As soon as he was behind locked door, he allowed himself a few moments of respite.

Without even glimpsing at the looking glass against the wall, Rodrik knew he looked filthy. He certainly felt filthy. Spending half the day by the harbor will do that. It would not do if he showed up at the small council meeting looking so disorderly. Better wash up.

Rodrik swiftly called for hot water. As ever, the maids were quick to obey. Once the tub was full, he dismissed them and stripped out of his soiled clothing. He removed his prosthetic half-hand last, and then he climbed into the tub and soaked for a good twenty minutes. While some people may have been content to be washed by their maids, Rodrik preferred to do his own bathing. He wanted to be as independent as possible to make up for all the situations where he could not be, due to his injured hand.

Once his body was rid of sweat and grime, Rodrik emerged from the tub, toweled off, and proceeded to get into some new attire. That morning, he had only worn a tunic and breeches. He always dressed casually whenever he went down to the docks. The afternoon would require some more formal apparel.

Rodrik Greyjoy clad himself in a black doublet with the golden kraken of his house emblazoned on the front, along with a pair of woolen trousers and a cloak of black and gold. In the last ten years, he had mastered putting on a belt using only his left hand. After fastening the belt's buckle, he picked up his prosthetic, attached it to the clamp on his right hand, and locked it in place.

He took a few more moments to study his appearance in the looking glass. He smoothed down his hair so that it was not so unkempt. He also trimmed his beard with a small pair of shears. He had had this beard since before Father's rebellion. He liked to keep it thin and even. He had once considered losing the beard altogether, but he decided shaving it with only one good hand was not worth the effort.

Shortly after Rodrik finished tidying up, there was a knock on the door. He called out "Yes?"

