Following that fateful day at the Cell Games, Gohan quickly realizes that the role of earth's protector is filled with many great trials and tribulations. Encountering new enemies and friends along the way, the young half-Saiyan comes to learn that being a hero can be tough, but at the same time... it can be a lot of fun. AU. Gohan/Videl or Gohan/Harem.

COMPLETE
Author’s Note: Hello all. It’s been a while since I last did a DBZ fic, so I figured I’d throw myself back into the game and give it a shot.

This is a story that I’ve wanted to write for a while now, which is a complete retelling of the Dragonball Z story following the Cell Games. In my honest opinion, the entire world of DBZ started going downhill after the Cell Games, which served as one of the biggest turning points in the series and gave the author the perfect opportunity to make something even more awesome afterwards.

Unfortunately, he cocked it up by not only making Gohan, the supposed cover character after the seven year gap, a complete shadow of his former self, but he also introduced one of the most unsatisfying villains with the most rinse-and-repeat story arcs I’ve ever seen. Though the author did get some things right in introducing Videl, Super Saiyan 3 and re-introducing the tournament and all that, there were so many other things that he did wrong.

To me, the entire Saga after the seven year gap sends a really mixed message to me. Instead of making Gohan the hero, he brings Goku back from the dead to once again save the day. Now I’m not saying loving your hero and main character of so many years is a bad thing, but using him in excess over all of the generations and having him win all of the fights is just bad storytelling.

Basically by bringing Goku back as the hero to save the day for the hundredth time gives the message that we (as people) have to rely on our parents and our fathers to fight and win all of our battles for us, instead of growing up and taking on the mantel of responsibility ourselves. It’s probably why I took a shine to the Naruto series afterwards, since it talks about the next generation taking over and taking on the responsibilities of the world (kind of).

Well, I personally don’t agree with that message and came up with this idea against it.

This story I hope makes amendments to the mistakes of the Buu Saga by introducing different villains (both original and from the movies) while at the same time running parallel to the original story, and making Gohan the hero instead. I also don’t want to overpower characters either and make this a fun story to read.

So let’s see how it goes.

(P.S If I happen to use the name Naruto somewhere in this and the following chapters, please ignore it. I’ve been writing Naruto stories for a while now, so some of that stuff might end up unconsciously bleeding into this fic. Hopefully not)

---

Dragonball Z

Legacies

Prologue

(Over a month after the Cell Games)

Deep inside the pristine wilderness also known as the region making up Mount Paozu, far out of the way of any known civilization, there sat the familiar dome shaped hut and cottage buildings belonging to the Son family. Quiet, peaceful, surrounded by valleys, forests, and a river flowing directly alongside the property, the small home rose up in the center of this tranquil splendor like a beacon on a map, untouched and undisturbed by the intrigues of human expansion.

To some; it was an ideal place for a farmland. To others, it was a superb location for a family retreat away from the hustle and bustle of city life. But to the few who actually lived in the small, country building sitting in the middle of the field; it was home.

Here, under the orange light of the rising sun, one of the residents of the house could be seen outside, on the grass and hard at work.

Leaping across the rolling hillsides and valleys, adorned in a familiar orange and blue gi with his black, spiky hair sticking out in a peculiar yet ordered fashion, a young boy could be seen going through the motions. Fists and feet cutting through the air at terrific speeds, the eleven-year-old, teen form of Son Gohan blurred across the fields surrounding his home, fighting against an enemy nobody could see. Since he was on his own and there was nobody else in sight or reach, it was safe to say that the young man was in fact shadow sparring.

Just like how his father and Piccolo had taught him, the boy subjected himself to his most familiar of training routines. Dust kicking up as he zipped across the landscape at a ridiculous rate, Gohan pushed himself hard to get his blood pumping and muscles working. Having already been at this for a couple of hours now, the boy had had plenty of time to wake up after a good night of sleep, as well as to mentally and physically prepare himself for the day that lay ahead.

Back flipping across the hills in the form of an orange flash, Gohan eventually skidded to a stop near his home and unleashed a flurry of punches before ending the combination with a swift yet powerful kick. The blow caused a gust of wind to ripple across the grassy hills for several miles, before the gale settled moments later and allowed the half-Saiyan to lower his leg to the ground.

Breathing in and out, Gohan allowed a grin to appear on his face and clenched his fists at his sides triumphantly. “Alright. I think I’m ready now.” The look in his eyes showed the world that he was ready to rock.

“Gohan! It’s time to go!” the familiar call of a woman suddenly echoed from across the flats, drawing the boy’s gaze towards his home. “Come on now! We don’t want to be late!”

Seeing his mother adorned in her familiar purple and orange dress, carrying her purse with her hair all done up, was all the sign the young hybrid warrior needed to tell him that she was all set to head out.

An excited smile graced his lips, “Coming.” Dashing across the clearing, he skidded to a stop in front of the woman, whom he noted had been waiting patiently for him.

“So… are you all warmed up?” Chi-Chi asked, gazing proudly down at her son.

“Yep,” Gohan replied, his visage bright and full of energy. “I’ve been out here all morning working on my stuff. My senses are razor sharp and my fighting techniques are spot on.” With this, he knew without a shadow of a doubt that he was going to make a killing at the big event they were about to attend.

Hell, the entire world was going to be watching him. He needed to be in the best shape possible if he was going to make any sort of an impact on the stage that was waiting for them. Considering what he was capable of though, he knew that it wasn’t going to be that much of a problem.
“Well, that’s good to hear,” the Son mother nodded, turning to look down at her purse and checking to make sure she had everything. “Knowing that Trunks and the others are going to be there today, it would be really bad for you if you went into the ring all tired and spent. I sure hope you didn’t warm yourself up too much.”

Chi-Chi; concerned as always.

At this, Gohan grinned, “Don’t worry about me, mum. I’m feeling great today… better than great. My head is clear and I feel a lot stronger than I was four weeks ago. As long as I keep my eyes open and watch my punches, I know I’ll be able to make it to the finals, no problem.” When he looked up and saw her eyes fix upon him again, the boy’s eyes shimmered brightly. “By the way… thanks for letting me train in my free time, mum. It really means a lot to me.”

Her expression reflecting a momentary sense of surprise, the raven haired mother then broke out a loving smile, which she directed towards the youngster in front of her. “That’s alright, honey. As long as it makes you happy, then I don’t mind letting you out in the mornings and afternoons to work on your fighting skills. You are your father’s son after all… and I’d really hate to deprive you of the one part of him that the two of you love so much.”

In the days following the Cell Games, which had seen the death of his father and the greatest man he’d ever known, Gohan had come to the realization that in order to defend the earth from any new threats that happened to be lurking around the corner, he needed to keep on training and keep on getting stronger. Even though he and his friends had just pulled through one of the toughest trials they’d ever faced in the history of their group, the boy knew that even though the world was now at peace, the days of fighting weren’t over.

After all, it was big, wide universe out there. Although Cell had been defeated, there was a very real possibility that a being even more powerful and malicious than him might show up someday to throw the world into chaos.

With his father gone and the fate of humankind left in his hands, Gohan knew that he needed to take up the mantel that his dad had left behind, and fill in the enormous void that once belonged to Goku. So, with his father’s sacrifice still lingering in his mind, he’d approached his mother and asked her if he could continue training. Though she initially objected and put up one hell of a fight about it, Gohan eventually talked her down to letting him train in the mornings and afternoons, while leaving the bulk of his day to do his studies and help her out around the house.

Since he, his mother and grandfather were now the only ones living in the house, there were many gaps in their lives that needed to be occupied. It was for the best, not just for him and for them, but for everyone.

Despite the fact that Chi-Chi had agreed to Gohan’s terms, she still made it a point to remind him that he needed to focus on his studies as much as possible. Even though she seemed disappointed at the idea of her son training and fighting, the half-Saiyan still reckoned he saw a small glimmer of happiness reflected in her eyes when she finally conceded. It was a feeling that Chi-Chi only ever shown to her husband on the most uncommon of occasions, where his skills, strength and guiding hand had been needed most.

With her expression showcasing her own degree of excitement, the Son woman raised a hand and formed a tight fist, “Now remember son; pace yourself, don’t let your guard down, and don’t mess up. Because if you lose in the first round after all that training I let you do in the last several weeks, then I’m going to be very disappointed in you.”

A smile came to the youngster’s face, “I’ll win. I know I will.”
“Good.” Smiling, Chi-Chi gave a firm nod and puffed her chest out. “Now get out there and show the world what Son Gohan can do!”

The half-Saiyan grinned, “Yes, ma’am!”

The moment that declaration had been made, the pair then picked up the sound of an approaching engine and looked up to see a familiar yellow ship appear out of the clouds. Gazes locking onto it, the mother and son watched the craft descend to the grass in front of them, its engines blazing away and ruffling the clothes hanging on the nearby line, nearly blowing the towels away.

When the square-shaped vehicle eventually touched down and the jets reduced their thrust to a bearable level, both Gohan and Chi-Chi then saw the side door open up and the familiar face of Bulma Briefs pop into view.

“Oh hey there, you two. Ready to head off?” the boss of the universally renowned Capsule Corporation asked with a gleeful look on her face. Over the last few months the woman had grown her hair out and, today, was wearing a headband to push it all back, a pair of jean shorts, pearls, and a green fitting top that showed off her curves. Needless to say, she too was ready for the big day out.

“You bet,” Gohan exclaimed, greeting the woman with a gung-ho smile and a raised fist.

Bulma giggled at the youngster’s familiar grin and expression, “Glad to see you’re all pumped up. I can expect nothing less from the son of Goku. Hop aboard everyone.” With a quick wave the woman ducked back in, allowing the two Sons to approach the deck.

Stepping in through the hatch, the young half-Saiyan quickly spotted his lavender haired, time traveling Saiyan counterpart sitting in the passenger seat up front and waved, “Hey Trunks. What’s up?”

The older half-Saiyan, adorned in his familiar uniform consisting of black pants, yellow Capsule Corp. boots, blue vest, black singlet, and carrying his younger, baby-self securely in his arms, smiled back at his fellow hybrid and nodded, “Not much. Hey. Nice outfit.”

“Thanks. I thought I’d take a page out of my father’s book and decided to try out his colors for a change,” Gohan responded, tugging on the collar of his gi before helping his mother up the stairs. “I gotta say it’s been a while since I last wore this stuff.” The last time he remembered wearing this gear was back when he was four and training with Piccolo.

“Well, it looks very good on you, Gohan,” Bulma remarked from her place in the pilot’s seat, glancing back at the young warrior and strapping herself in. “I’m sure Goku would be very proud to see how far you’ve come.”

Beaming, the raven haired Saiyan hoped into a seat and buckled up as well, with Chi-Chi mimicking her son’s actions.

As soon as everyone was safely inside the transport and secured, Bulma shut the door, put her foot down and took off. The entire plane jerked to life as it lifted off the ground, climbed to a comfortable altitude and turned towards the horizon. Once the woman was certain they were pointed in the right direction, she fired the engines and gunned it, the plane blasting off into the distance.

As it turns out, everyone was excited today, and with good reason.

Because today, for one time only, all the fighters in the world would be partaking in the very first
For the raven haired, eleven-year-old girl sitting in the helicopter on route for Battle Island, the location of the largest martial arts tournament to be held in years, it was the most uncomfortable flight she’d ever been on. While the seat she was planted in was indeed very cushiony and the soda she’d gotten for the flight across the channel was delicious, the fact that she had to share the same space as Hercule Satan, the self-proclaimed strongest man in the world and the biggest oaf she’d ever seen in history, completely tarnished the experience for her.

While everybody else around the world worshipped this man as its savior for the deeds he supposedly accomplished during the Cell Games, this girl did not. Reason being, not only was he flirting incessantly with the waitress serving them beverages on the luxury chopper, which was taking them and the Cash family to their final destination, but because the man with the afro style cut was her father.

Seriously. What daughter in the world didn’t think that their father’s antics in public were embarrassing?

Videl certainly thought so.

Sitting there by the window with a sublime view of the landscape passing by underneath them, the tomboyish girl wearing yellow boots, blue jeans, long green top, red over-shirt, and her raven black hair wrapped into two high pigtails, tried her best to ignore her father’s loud, booming voice and focused on the world outside. However, try as she might, she just could not block out the irritating noises he and the giggling waitress were making, which had the girl snarl inwardly and glare across at her lump of an old-man.

“Honestly… does he ever stop?” Videl thought with a detestable frown. When she saw her father pull the woman into his lap and give another one of his signature laughs, the young girl emitted a groan of disgust and looked away. “If mum could see him right now, she would knock his perfectly white teeth right out of his mouth.”

It was a given truth. Ever since the end of the Cell Games, her father had done nothing but boast to every Tom, Dick and Harry that they ran into on the streets about his achievement, and pranced about like he was lord of heaven and earth. He sung tales of his heroic bravery to the news reporters that came to get tabs on him and to document his life, which not only bloated the man’s already massive ego, but embarrassed the raven haired girl to no end.

Knowing exactly who her father was and what he could do, Videl could say with a hundred percent certainty that the man was full of it.

“All of his fame and glory has gotten to his head,” the child thought, at the same time noticing the land disappear and be replaced by ocean. Knowing that they were coming upon their final marker, Videl began relishing the moment she would finally be able to get off this circus ride. “I hope somebody out there will come around and put my dad in his place.”

“Don’t you worry nothin’, doll! I’ll win this intergalactic competition with both hands tied behind my back!” Hercule bellowed out, making kissy faces with the bashful flight attendant in his lap and at the same time throwing Cash’s son across the way a victory sign. “After all, there’s nothing that the Champ can’t do! Am I right, little man?!”
“Yeah!” Cash’s son, a dorky looking kid with glasses and wearing a sailor’s uniform chirped while imitating the man’s gesture. “Hercule Satan’s the best!”

The show only seemed to annoy Videl even further.

“And soon,” the girl concluded. Moments later, the chopper began its final leg.

OOO

(Some time later)

To those who were just touching down on the island serving as the main location for the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament being sponsored by the richest man in the world, X.S Cash, it was almost like they were stepping into the wildest theme park ever. Seriously. It was crazy.

Jets were flying overhead, spewing colored smoke that formed into the head and face of Hercule Satan himself, before the formation of fast-moving craft came back around and cut the cloud to ribbons with their wings in an impressive display of supersonic speed and grace. On top of that, the entire sky was filled with the cloud bursts of fireworks being sent up one after the other, the sounds of their explosions drowned out by the cheers and clamor of the crowds of thousands of people far below.

The sound of festival music blaring away over the speaker phones rounded out the rest of the atmosphere of what could be considered the greatest party the world had ever seen.

On the mainland, people gathered together by the hundreds around countless festival stands and rides, all of which had been set up to accommodate for the large number of visitors arriving by the boatful from all four corners of the globe. Flowing between tents, buildings and carnival rides that were already teeming with excited customers, the ocean of fiesta goers inevitably spilled over to a large pontoon bridge crossing over a wide channel onto a large segment of earth that was, for all intents and purposes, the main stage for this fun gala.

The surface of Battle Island looked like a series of rocks that had been scrambled together and splattered atop a series of towers, pillars and platforms, the edifices of which seemed to blend seamlessly together into something akin to an M.C Escher masterpiece. Aesthetically, it was an impressive art piece. But as sound and flawless as the construct’s design appeared on the surface, the mass of land was in fact an artificial island that’d been built by X.S Cash as a theme park-slash-adventure park for the masses. Due to its specially built interior and elaborate outer shell, it’d recently been retrofitted to host a far more prestigious event the likes of which the world has never seen before.

The world’s largest martial arts competition in history, the once in a lifetime event featuring Mr. Satan himself, drew a ridiculously large crowd. Its many seats and balconies were already jam-packed with thousands of spectators, eagerly counting down the minutes left to the event’s first round of the proceedings.

If it weren’t for the island’s solid foundations, the entire thing would have caved in on itself. But thanks to its frame and attention to detail, the island held firm, and the atmosphere leading up to the main affair was getting hotter and hotter with every second that ticked by.

“Welcome one and all to Battle Island; home of the very first Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament!” was the announcement that greeted all newcomers to the shores of the hunk of rock and metal. “Today, we will pit the strongest warriors this planet has to offer against the mettle of the most powerful warriors from all four corners of the galaxy, by putting them and the
These were the words that blasted from every speaker in the area as Gohan, Mirai Trunks, Bulma and Chi-Chi made their way through the thick of the crowd to their desired spots. Having arrived at the island only minutes ago, the four of them stepped off of their mode of transport, capsulated it and, after showing their tickets to the staff, made their way over to the registration desk. With the males leading the march, cutting a swath through the hundreds of patiently waiting attendees, the group eventually stopped at an intersection and took note of the sign that would send them down completely different pathways.

Moving left, the pair of mothers faced the two young men beside them who, in turn, also focused their attention on the women.

“Alright boys, good luck out there,” Bulma exclaimed, shouldering baby Trunks up her arms as the child cooed away, “And don’t forget to have fun.” If there was anything she knew about Saiyans, it was that these boys loved to fight.

Seeing the pair beam back in response, Chi-Chi nodded to them proudly, “But more importantly, don’t you dare let yourselves get beat. That goes double for you, young man.” She added to this by pointing down at her son.

Gohan grinned in response, “I promise I won’t let you down, mum.”

“We’ll be sure to put on a good show for you guys,” Trunks replied, giving the women a thumbs-up and watching them accept their words gladly.

“That’s the spirit,” Bulma giggled before turning to the raven haired woman beside her. “Come on, Chi-Chi. Let’s go grab ourselves something to eat and drink. I’m famished.”

“Sure.”

With one last wave, the two non-combatants turned heel and left, disappearing into the crowd seconds later. Upon seeing the two off, Gohan and Trunks then turned their attention to their path on the right and the ascending staircase that awaited them.

Even though it didn’t look it from a distance, this island was simply enormous. The place was just a maze of hallways, levels, balconies, and clogged with the distinct sensation of testosterone hanging in the air. That last bit of information was relevant to the two of them because the Saiyans could literally smell the competition surrounding them on all sides.

“Let’s go find the sign-up desk,” Gohan chirped, earning a nod of agreement from his time traveling friend. “We’ve got some time to kill until the tournament starts, but it would be best if we checked in before the station closes. They usually do that an hour or so before the start of the event.”

“It shouldn’t be too hard to find. Just follow the crowd,” Trunks replied.

“And look for a bunch of guys that are dressed like martial artists,” the other half-Saiyan added, coaxing a grin from the lavender haired man next to him.

Directions set, the pair were just about to get into traction until the sound of loud cheering drew their attention across the way. Following the sound of screams and the sight of dozens of people flocking towards the side of the main highway, they saw a helicopter land on one of the many platforms in the area. As soon as it touched down and the people had been ushered back by the security teams, they saw the door open and a very familiar face step into view.
Adorned in a flamboyant costume completely typical of a comic book superhero, with his gold lined belt flashing under the sun and cape bellowing on the wind, Hercule Satan made his grand appearance on the island. His manly roar drowned out the cries from his fans and drew the expected lightshow from the cameramen and news reporters circling around his transport.

With Gohan and Trunks’ gazes set on the gorilla of a martial artist, they completely missed the sight of the little girl that came to stand alongside him.

“Heh. Look who it is,” the Saiyan from the future chuckled, “The big man himself.”

“Gee,” the youngster next to him chimed in, “He really knows how to draw a crowd, doesn’t he?”

Seeing the people continue to flock to the champ now striking poses for the cameras, Mirai shrugged, “Well, as long as he clears the road for us, then I have absolutely no problems with this.” He then started forward, glancing back at the boy gazing curiously in the direction of the helicopter platform. “Come on. We’d better get a move on. Otherwise we’ll miss the registration.”

“Yeah.” Acknowledging his friend’s statement, Gohan quickly fell in step with him and the two hybrids headed up to the office.

Hopefully, somewhere along this road, they would bump into their other friends. Given the circumstances, they wouldn’t be surprised if they happened to run into them somewhere down this footpath or in the ring when the fighting started.

While the two half-Saiyans headed on their way, commotion over by the Hercule Express had reached its highest point yet. Marching down to the base of the helicopter, the world champion and self-proclaimed most powerful man in the world was almost instantaneously swamped by reporters.

“You guys! Champ! Over here!”

“Mister Satan! Can you tell us how you feel about the tournament today?!”

“Will you be participating in any of the preliminary rounds, Champ?”

“Champ! Diana from Channel 10: West City!” a woman with brown hair and wearing a pink suit spoke up as she jabbed her microphone towards the imposing ‘warrior’. “How do you feel about your chances in the ring with so many fighters flying in from all over the world to compete for the one-hundred million prize money?!”

Smiling smugly at the questions bombarding him from all sides, the towering martial artist with the afro cut and muttonchops stuck his nose in the air and answered the crowds with a booming voice. “Well, Diana. All I can really say is that it’s been a while since I’ve actually had to break a sweat during a fight. What I’m really hoping for today is to challenge the best that our planet has to offer and to test their mettle! The sucker would need the Gaul of a warrior of my stature to actually compete on equal terms with me; the undefeated and undisputed champion of the world!”

“So you’re saying your chances are pretty high then?” the woman asked again, at the same time catching sight of the billionaire X.S Cash and his family stepping out to join the world’s ‘strongest’ martial artist in the spotlight.

“That’s for my audience to decide,” Hercule exclaimed, pulling a tough-guy pose and giving a thumbs-down towards the commoners that lay before him. “What do you say, people? Do you think there is a person alive on this island who can trade blows with your savior?!”
“NO!” was the immediate, collective response from every single fan in sight.

“That’s what I thought! YEAAAAHHH!!!!” Hercule bellowed, throwing his fists into the air and drawing another chorus of cheers from the people.

Eyebrow twitching at the sheer volume of her father, which completely dwarfed the outcry of the audience, the cool-looking Videl exhaled in annoyance before deciding to head off. Her sudden vacating of Hercule’s right flank drew the big man’s immediate gaze after her.

“Uhh… Videl… w-where are you going, sweet pea?” the man whispered after her.

Eyes shut in an effort to ignore the reporters and camera flashes, the eleven-year-old stopped in her tracks, “I’m going to check out the island… and maybe find a seat up in one of the bleachers.”

“But uhh… we both got front row seats up in Mr. Cash’s personal skybox,” Hercule replied, completely confounded by why his daughter was leaving so hastily, “What better spot on the island is there than on a roving, five-star lookout with lobsters and caviar?” By this point in time, the reporters had also noticed the raven haired girl standing ahead of their beloved hero and, within seconds, began snapping pictures of her from all sides.

“Anywhere, as long as it’s away from you,” the clearly embarrassed girl replied, mumbling the last part under her breath.

“Huh? Did you say something, sugar bee?”

“Whatever dad,” Videl waved back, restarting her trek into the crowd and out the other side. “Have fun up in the penthouse.”

Hercule watched his daughter make her way through his army of followers, passing by a few of the reporters and a photographer who thought it would be a good idea to try and get a shot of the Champ’s daughter up close. His camera flash resulted in his hundred-zeni equipment being snatched out of his grip and dropped to the floor by the child, an action which effectively cracked the lens.

“I wonder what’s gotten into her,” X.S Cash’s representative for the event, a man in a dark, striped suit and slicked back hair thought out loud.

“She seems to be a little bit upset,” Mrs. Cash, a fair woman in a white sundress and wide hat remarked while bringing her hand up to her lips troublingly. “Don’t you think so, dear? Maybe the flight over the ocean made her ill.”

“Or perhaps she was simply overcome by the excitement of this tournament,” the billionaire himself, a portly man with dark hair, mustache, square glasses and purple suit spoke up, at the same time adjusting one of the many diamond rings on his hand. “Her father is the savior of the world after all. I’m not surprised that someone as young as her would feel a little bit intimidated in the presence of the most powerful man in existence… even if she is Mr. Satan’s daughter.”

“Heh. Ain’t that the truth?” his attendant chuckled.

At first scratching his head over his daughter’s rather disgruntled mood, Hercule then shrugged it off and returned to bolstering his ego in front of the crowd. “Oh well… CHECK OUT THIS POSE, LADIES! HA-HA! WATCH ME FLEX THE BIG GUNS!” And that’s exactly what he did. “BOOM! BANG! FIRE POWER, YEAH!”

With the crowd’s clamor starting up again and all attention fixing upon the earth’s hero, everyone completely missed the sight of Videl stopping to glare back at her father on the platform. Taking in his usual antics for several seconds more, the girl groaned under her breath and continued on walking, deciding to lose herself in the madness of her surroundings.

She sighed, “He’s such an idiot.”

Whatever happened to the humble young man that her mother fell in love with all those years ago? Taking into account all of the things that’d happened recently, Videl had no doubt in her mind that the man she could hear standing out in the crowd of vultures was nothing more than a shadow of his former self. After watching the events of the Cell Games on television, all the way up to the point the reception cut out, even the daughter of the world’s supposed hero found it hard to believe she was even related to the guy.

Seeing him flaunt about his home on a daily basis with a new woman every day and witnessing what he was like off camera made Videl believe that there was no way her dad could be the savior of anything.

She was perhaps one of the only people in the world who believed this.

Having grown tired of the man’s antics on their flight over, Videl decided to dismiss any and all other thoughts of her father and focused on something else. She wanted to go find a seat in the commoner’s stands to watch the battles in peace, and that was exactly what she intended to do.

OOO

(Sometime Later)

After successfully locating the registration desk, Gohan and Trunks lined up with the rest of the competitors and spent the next several minutes chatting away and waiting patiently for the counter to free up. Once both of them had their names written down and had received the numbers of the platforms they’d been assigned to, with about an hour or so left to kill on their watches, the two young males then decided to go try and find the others and maybe grab something to eat before the fights started.

While Mirai headed in his own direction to locate the familiar ki he could sense scattered around the place, the younger Saiyan marched straight for the food court. There, he quickly found himself in the center of a buffet paradise, with fast food stalls and cafes dominating his line of sight on all sides.

Taking note of the center space, which was filled with dozens of outdoor tables and seats, all of which were occupied by hundreds of visitors, Gohan took a moment to scan the area for ki signatures.

His senses homing in on a group of familiar presences, the spiky haired youngster brightened up when his eyes landed on the little mime, anthropomorphic pig, and elderly man seated around one of the outdoor tables. Without a moment’s hesitation, the half-Saiyan quickly jogged on over to them.

“Oolong. Master Roshi. Chiaotzu. Hey!” the young warrior exclaimed, skidding to a stop at their table.

The moment their names were called, the original members of Goku’s crew turned to greet the beaming young man.

“Why, if it isn’t young Gohan,” the old turtle hermit spoke, his red sunglasses flashing at the sight of the familiar male in orange.

“I knew I’d find you guys somewhere around here! What’s up?”

“Not much kid. Just shooting the breeze and checking out the competition,” Oolong responded, at the same time sparing a glance towards a cute young blonde in a halter top and figure hugging jean shorts walk by their table. The giggle he and Master Roshi gave when they saw her amble away had Gohan glance after her as well, but then shrug it off moments later. “We’ve got a lot of potential customers popping up here and there, so you know we’ve got a lot of information to sift through. Other than that, things have been going great.”

Ignoring the pig’s off-beat comments, Chiaotzu, sitting quietly with a can of ice tea in his hands, smiled up at the much taller half-Saiyan. “What about you, Gohan? Have you already signed up for the competition?”

“Yeah. Trunks and I put our names down just a few minutes ago, so we’re both good,” the young man responded immediately, thumbing over his shoulder. “We were both assigned to different blocks, so we’ll be splitting up before the starting bell.”

“Oh. So Trunks is here as well, is he?” Master Roshi chuckled with a smile breaking through his beard. “This competition sure has gotten interesting.”

“Yeah, and with Krillin, Yamcha, Tien and Piccolo in it, you know things are going to get rough,” Oolong chimed in, bringing up his soda and taking a swig of it. Exhaling afterwards, he then swirled his drink sagely. “Let’s face it; this tournament isn’t big enough for the six of them. At least a couple of our boys are going to get knocked off the charts in the first round.”

“Meh, probably,” Master Roshi murmured.

Positively beaming with delight, Gohan then felt something fluffy brush past his ear and looked over his shoulder to see the familiar blue form of Puar hover into view.

“Gohan!” the floating cat squeaked, at the same time throwing himself at the boy in a hug.

Giggling at his other friend’s greeting, the youthful half-Saiyan gently pushed the shapeshifter away, “Hey, Puar. Good to see ya. How’re you doing?”

“Great! Yamcha’s been doing great as well.”

“Really?”

The floating shape shifter nodded enthusiastically. “Yeah. He’s been really excited about this tournament and has been talking about it for days.”

“Heh. Of course he was… until he heard that Piccolo had entered the competition to fight against you and the others. After that, his mood just did a complete nosedive,” Oolong remarked, shaking his head at the man who was once considered a strong member of their group many, many years ago. “How the mighty have fallen.”

“Ah, don’t say that Oolong. I think Yamcha’s got a really good chance in this tournament,” Gohan chirped, beaming down at the pig thinking so poorly of their comrade. “He may not exactly be on Piccolo’s level, but he’s definitely in the same league as Tien and Krillin. If he’s willing to give it a shot, I think he could give either of them a run for their money.”

“Whatever you say kid,” the pig shot back with a smile. “It is a hundred million big ones after all.
Anyone’s bound to put up a good fight for that. But as long as you, Trunks and Piccolo are in this tournament, I just don’t see him or anybody else making it past the preliminaries.”

Gleeful at the banter he was able to share with his companions, Gohan spent a few minutes chatting with them before deciding to duck out and grab a snack. Trotting over to one of the stalls with the shortest lines, the young half-Saiyan found himself rocking back and forth on his heels and checking out the items on the menu. Licking his lips at the sight of some yakisoba being made at the stove, the boy moved a few steps closer and had his gaze drawn to the young man working at the counter.

It was then he noticed the raven haired girl with the pigtails standing directly in front of him.

“I would like some ice tea and dango please,” the girl in the red shirt and long green sleeves spoke.

The worker in the café style uniform smiled and jabbed the order into his till, “That’ll be ten zeni, thanks.”

Reaching into her pocket, the eleven-year-old spent a couple of seconds patting around her jeans before a murmur escaped her lips. “Hey. W-What the?” Moments later, Videl threw her head up and groaned, “Ah, damn it. I left my wallet back at home.” Why the hell did she do that?

Every time she went out she never forgot to bring her wallet with her. But on the very day that she and her father were flying out to one of the biggest events in the history of the world, she’d gone on and left it on her desk by her laptop. She figured since they would be dining with X.S Cash the entire day she wouldn’t need it for anything and had forgone standard morning preparations.

She had nobody to blame for this one but herself.

Cursing while the man behind the serving desk waited patiently for the girl to make a decision, Gohan, who’d been observing the commotion from behind, heard the girl’s plight loud and clear and looked between her and the cashier troublingly. Recognizing that the girl had no money with her and was now looking forlornly towards the register, Gohan made the quick and easy decision to help her out.

Being the kindhearted soul that he was, there was no way he could leave someone hanging like this, even if they were a complete stranger.

Fishing into his pocket for some bills, the boy stepped forward and held the money out to the man. “I’ll pay for it.” His words surprising Videl and the worker, Gohan smiled towards the teen and stood up to full height. “That was ten zeni for an ice tea and dango, right? That’s cool. Could I also get some yakisoba chicken noodles and a bottle of water with that please?”

Quickly shaking out of his daze, the service man smiled, “No problem, sir.” Taking the money, the young worker processed it through the machine and handed Gohan his change. “Please wait off to the right for your orders. They should be ready shortly.” Once the coins were dropped into his palm, the half-Saiyan and the raven haired girl stepped aside, allowing the next couple of people to make their picks.

Sensing a set of eyes on him, Gohan looked across to see the girl standing alongside him still staring up at his face with a bewildered gaze in play. Balking slightly at the sight of her striking blue eyes, the young hybrid smiled, “Hey.”

“You didn’t have to do that for me, you know,” Videl spoke, still reeling a bit from the boy’s gesture of kindness.
While she wouldn’t have minded if she didn’t get anything, since she could probably make her way back over the X.S Cash’s luxury skybox if she wanted something to eat or drink, it’d still come as a bit of a shock to her that somebody, a person she’d never even met before, had come out of nowhere and used his own money to purchase food for her. In her many years of going out into the big city and shopping for the very few things that she needed, Videl had never seen or had someone do that for a complete stranger, let alone her.

The fact that it was a boy around her age, someone who probably wouldn’t have had Good Samaritan approach as the first thing on their mind, that’d done it for her, came as an even bigger surprise to her.

“I could have paid for the stuff myself.”

Gohan gave her a look, “Huh? B-But I thought you said you’d forgotten your wallet and that you didn’t have any money with you. You also looked pretty upset about it, so I decided to help you out.”

“Yeah, well…” Hesitating at first, the girl then threw the boy a momentary glare, “I would have found a way to pay for the food and drink myself. Alright? You didn’t have to step in and use your money to buy the stuff that I wanted to get. Normal people don’t do that for others.” Not unless they were some kind of alien from outer space that lacked the concept of social interaction. Videl folded her arms and looked away, “I would have been just fine on my own.”

“A-Alright,” Gohan replied, deflating slightly as his gaze fixed onto the ground at his feet.

Noticing the boy’s sudden shift in mood, Videl saw the young man’s face turn from a once cheerful, farm-boyish vision of brightness to one of hurt and discomfort. It was almost as if his act of helping her had ended up hurting the person he was aiding, which in turn reflected on his actions.

Quickly realizing she may have been a bit too harsh on him in her remarks, Videl took a moment to reconsider her words and looked away shamefacedly, “I’m… really sorry. I shouldn’t have responded like that. You did just pay for my food and drink after all.” She then glanced across at the young man to see him look up at her in surprise. “Th-Thank you.”

His brain processing her words of gratitude, Gohan then broke out his widest grin and nodded back to her happily. “You’re welcome.”

Beaming at seeing the cheerfulness return to his expression, which in turn brightened up her own mood as if she were standing by the sun itself, the raven haired girl turned to face him fully. “My name’s Videl. What’s your name?”

“Gohan,” the boy chirped in response, at the same time staring gladly towards the teen. “It’s… really nice to meet you.”

“It’s nice to meet you too.”

The pair shared a smile with one another, an exchange that had them caught up for the longest of pauses.

They were so engrossed with staring at the person in front of them that they almost completely missed the sound of their orders being called out from the stand.

(TO BE CONTINUED)
"So... how's the tournament coming along, King Kai?" the familiar, chirpy voice of Goku spoke up, drawing his mentor's gaze over to him and across the large mountain sticking up out of the clouds. Seeing the Saiyan approach, the Kai of the North took note of the enormous pile of food he was also carrying in his arms, "Has it started yet? Did I miss anything?"

"Not quite. They've just closed the registration desk and are setting up the arenas for all of the fighters," the Kai replied, hands folded over his stomach as he sat there on the deck chair with his eyes once again fixing upon the television crackling away in front of him. "I gotta say this is a pretty big tournament... much bigger than any of the other ones I remember seeing on earth before."

"I know. It's exciting, isn't it?" the Saiyan bearing the halo exclaimed, stopping behind his teacher. "Every year more and more people turn up to compete. How many fighters are there at this one?"

"Hmm... I'd say around roughly... two hundred strong."

"Two hundred?" Goku whistled, his eyes reflecting his amazement, "The prize money must be pretty awesome to draw in that big of a crowd."

"Yeah. Most of the people that'd signed up for the competition are more interested in winning the cash prize than fighting the 'Champ' and his 'alien' compatriots," King Kai snorted. He'd seen what the visitors from outer space looked like through the television and, curious as ever, decided to hone in on them to determine whether or not they were the genuine article. Sadly, they weren't. They were just a bunch of Hercule's top students dressed in ridiculous costumes that no man on the face of the planet would be caught dead in. The reality of the situation had King Kai sigh in disappointment. "The days where warriors fought for honor and glory are long gone now."

"You think so?" Goku asked.

A smile spread across the North Kai's lips, "Well... that may be true for most people, but your friends and family are a different story."

Oh yes, how could he forget about the Z-Fighters? Out of all the martial artists on the planet, their group was the only one who really fought for the sheer fun of it (the strongest ones anyway). Gohan, Piccolo, Vegeta, Tien... for them fighting was a passion and a way of life. This went double for Goku and triple for the Prince of Saiyans, who took things like honor and pride to a whole other level.

Even Gohan had taken on more of his father's qualities.

Speaking of which..."Hey, how's my son doing?" Goku asked while gleefully looking into the magic box, watching the images of the island stadium's numerous platforms flicker by. "He's in this tournament too. Is he feeling okay?"

"Oh, your son is doing just fine," King Kai responded, glancing at the man eagerly peering over his shoulder. "He's been training really hard for the last few weeks and he's been getting stronger ever since his battle against Cell. I have to say, he's made some excellent progress."

"Chi-Chi's letting Gohan train?" Goku was especially surprised at this news, which saw him gawking across at his mentor. "S-Since when?"

"Since he talked her into letting him over a month ago," King Kai snorted, watching as the camera switched over to another part of the island. "That boy of yours sure is something else. He's grown into a fine young warrior with a big heart. If you ask me, he's starting to look more and more like you each day. With that bright smile and passion for fighting, he's almost the spitting image of a younger you."

Smiling proudly, the spiky haired, orange-clad Goku beamed down at the screen as the intermission period continued, "Yeah. That's my boy alright. It's a shame I can't be down there with him."

King Kai then threw him a witty look, "Are you saying that because you want to be with your son… or because you want to participate in the tournament?"

"Both," was Goku's first response before his expression softened greatly. The twinkle in his eye was more than enough to tell the blue-skinned overseer of their quadrant what the man was really thinking, "But I'd rather be with my family more than anything else."

This brought a smile to all those who were listening, including Gregory and Bubbles who were messing around at the cards table behind them. Even though Goku had chosen to remain in the netherworlds to protect his family and friends from any and all enemies that were likely to come after him, they could still see that the Saiyan missed being with his loved ones. It had been a harsh and difficult decision for him to make, even if the earth's greatest hero had practically labeled himself as a jinx. All the same, everyone believed that it was for the best.

He said that he would come back whenever he could and until then he was going to have to be ready to face the aggravated storm that was his wife. Boy… was Chi-Chi going to be mad.

As they continued to watch the screen intently from their positions, the pair then saw the feed flip over to one of the random roaming cameras in another part of the island. Recognizing the familiar environment of an enormous food court, King Kai and Goku spent a moment admiring the festive setup with interest before both their expressions suddenly switched to looks of surprise.

Sitting right there at one of the tables, they saw Gohan eating and chatting animatedly with a girl with raven black hair and pig tails around the same age as him.

Seeing the pair giggle at what they deduced was a little joke, King Kai's sunglasses flashed mischievously, "Hello? What's this?"

"Hey! It's Gohan," the Saiyan exclaimed in delight, before his gaze fell upon the newcomer, "Huh? Who's that? I don't think I've ever seen her before."

"It looks like your son's made a new friend," the otherworld trainer remarked, a statement which brought a look of pleasant awe followed by a wide grin to Goku's face moments later.

OOO
If getting onto the island was hard enough, finding a spot in the stands overlooking the various battle platforms to watch the fights was even tougher. This was especially the case for both Chi-Chi and Bulma, who, after purchasing some snacks and beverages from one of the food stands in their area, quickly headed up to one of the higher levels to find a seat. Having to navigate their way through countless civilians flocking in the exact same direction, the pair eventually secured a spot in one of the upper balconies right at the front.

It'd been a stroke of luck. After making themselves comfortable, the two mothers only had to wait a short while before the announcer's voice blared out across the island via the enormous intercom system that'd been setup.

"Ladies and gentlemen, thank you for your patience! We will now be starting the first round of the tournament!" the loud, charismatic voice of the primary mediator spoke up, drawing a loud cheer from the thousands of people scattered across the landmass. "All fighters please make their way to their assigned platforms to begin the preliminaries!"

"Alright! It's starting," Bulma exclaimed, with the crowd behind her sharing similar phrases and remarks of enthusiasm. With her infant son held securely in her arms, the blue haired woman turned to smile across at her friend. "Let's see if we can spot the others as they're coming out."

"Yeah. That shouldn't be too hard," Chi-Chi replied, leaning forward with her companion to begin scanning the blocks one after the other. "All we have to do is look for the most unique and outstanding group in the competition," And the one that would be, in relative terms, kicking the most ass.

For the next fifteen minutes following the message, the two women watched on as hundreds upon hundreds of martial artists poured out into the open and onto the various open stages that would serve as the arenas for the first round of opening fights. Each one of these elevated platforms represented a block on the tally that the fighters were assigned to, and it was here that the competitors would decide who would be moving on to the quarter finals through a series of eight separate battle royale matches. Since there were over two-hundred fighters present, all of whom had been randomly assigned to each platform, the crowds were almost guaranteed to get one hell of a show.

As they were watching more fighters spill out into the arenas, Chi-Chi's face lit up and she pointed towards one of the tower rings, "Hey, I can see Krillin." He wasn't that hard to miss; short, bald, with the trappings of a monk and wearing the signature orange and blue uniform of the Turtle School. With Bulma also spotting her friend of years past waving towards the crowd, the two women beamed with joy, "Heh. Check it out. He looks pretty upbeat today."

"Yeah. I figured out of our entire group, he would be the first to show up for this tournament. Since he and Goku participated in so many of the World Martial Arts Championships together, it doesn't surprise me one bit to see him at this one. It must be his way of honoring the memory of his best friend," Bulma commented, a warm smile reflected on her face before her eyes suddenly rolled moments later, "That or the enormous prize money dragged him down here."

Chi-Chi giggled, "He probably thought nobody else from our team would be signing up for the event and put his name down under the impression that this was going to be a walk in the park. Too bad for him that Gohan and Trunks wanted to come along as well."

Both unanimously agreeing that it was the prize money that had called the Z-Fighters here, except... for maybe a couple of them, both Bulma and Chi-Chi went back to scanning the mob of fighters.

"There's Yamcha!" Bulma called out, pointing across to the third stage to see her orange-wearing ex-boyfriend ambling out into the open.

"Yeah. And there's Tien," Chi-Chi chimed in, pointing towards a third platform across the way where the three-eyed man could be seen standing on the edge of the crowd with his arms crossed. "Cool as a cucumber, as usual. He's probably one of the only people here who's not interested in the prize money at all. He's just looking for a good fight."

"And if those two are here, then that means Oolong, Puar and the others must be somewhere around here as well," the blue haired woman added, while glancing across at her best friend with a smile. "I don't see Chiaotzu on any of the arenas. Maybe he's sitting out on this one."

Seeing as how the short, mime-like fighter wasn't able to keep up with the others too well anymore, it made perfect sense to the pair that he would prefer to watch the fights rather than participate in them. Nobody thought any less of him for it and nobody was going to hold his decision against him.

"Ah. Check it out. Another familiar face just rocked up," the scientist chirped when she glanced at another grand stage to her far left.

When her eyes landed on the same area, a low groan escaped Chi-Chi's lips, "Well, if it isn't Mr. Piccolo." The young woman sighed, "Figures he'd be out and about. He must have caught wind of the tournament over the airways and decided to come down here for a bit of fun." The prize money obviously didn't beckon the Namekian here. What would an alien warrior from another planet and a former Demon King who only drank water possibly need with a hundred million zeni?

Despite having come to tolerate Piccolo and view him as an old family friend, Chi-Chi still felt a little iffy about him at times. Maybe he was just a little too strange for the Son mother to really become attached too… or maybe because his aloof personality made him close to unapproachable. She was learning more towards the latter than the former.

After seeing Trunks roll out onto one of the platforms above Krillin's, Bulma's smile brightened, "Well… that should be everybody. The only one I don't see out there yet is Gohan."

"He's probably still wandering around the food court or exploring the island," Chi-Chi wondered out loud, shaking her head and looking across at the blue haired scientist. "Just like his father. He thinks more with his gut than he does with his brain." Her expression then blinked to one of confusion as she watched the young mother make funny faces to her giggling son. "Speaking of fathers, didn't you ask Vegeta if he wanted to come along?"

This question quickly had Bulma frown and look towards the platforms exasperatedly, "Hmph. No way. The guy's been moping around the house every day for the past month. He's not even going out to train anymore. I don't know what's gotten into him."

Chi-Chi, giving it a moment of consideration, looked back over the railings in front of her solemnly, "He hasn't been the same since Goku died."

After several moments of thought, the raven haired woman decided that they'd had enough negativity and decided to brighten the mood a little. Sucking it up, the Ox King's daughter reached into her purse and pulled out two fans with the words 'Son' and 'Victory' imprinted on each one. Since she was here to support her number one, she was going to give it her all and make sure he had all the positive energy he needed to win.
All she needed to complete the equation was a son to support who, as of right now, was still absent from the arena.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

Beaming across at the raven haired girl on the other side of the table, Gohan set his chopsticks down and folded his arms on the surface of it, "So you're a martial artist as well, huh?"

"Yeah. I've been learning how to fight ever since I was four years old. That was back when my dad was training for the next World Martial Arts Tournament and was still living in a small house with my mum," the raven haired girl said, fumbling about with her used kebab sticks before setting them and her plate aside. "He was a great man back then. Dad taught me all of the moves and techniques I needed to know and for the past several years I was the best student in his class. But… recently I stopped taking his group sessions and started training by myself."

"Hmm? Why's that?"

Videl shrugged and looked away with an off-handed gesture, "Let's just say that I've grown a little tired of his teaching practices and everyday shenanigans. It was all fun and games at first and I loved hanging out with my dad… but then he started acting all high-and-mighty the more famous he got, and I decided to follow my own training regimen. I wanted to expand my horizons and learn other forms of fighting that didn't involve his showboating… so that's what I did… and it's what I'm still doing."

"Oh." Puzzled by her rather off-put response, the spiky haired hybrid leaned forward, "Who is your dad, anyway?"

Glancing across at the boy to see his curious gaze staring back at her, the girl breathed a sigh and turned to face him fully, "You should know him. Hell, the entire world knows who he is and what he supposedly did." She then gave him a serious look, "My father's the 'great' Hercule Satan: the Champion of the World and the man who defeated the earth's greatest terror, Cell."

Gohan had the sense of mind to blink in surprise, "Really?"

Videl nodded and turned away irritably once more, "Yeah. The one and only." After that, her mind started to work and her displeasure started to sink in. "Great. Now this really nice boy I just met is gonna start fawning over me like everybody else I run into. Damn it…" She mentally bumped herself in the head for messing up what could have been something great.

However, after a minute of waiting for the praise and exclamations she was expecting to receive from the energetic adolescent, Videl then looked up in confusion when she got nothing. Eyes slowly panning over to the youngster, she saw he was still sitting there, in his seat, with the same innocent look he'd worn while he'd been listening to her for the past hour.

After a moment of silence, the raven haired girl recoiled, "W-What?"

"Oh. Nothing," Gohan answered quickly and smiled once again, "I just wanted to ask what other fighting styles you were interested in practicing. That's all."

"Huh?" Videl was baffled, "Y-You don't care that my dad is the world champion; the man who single-handedly defeated the greatest terror of our age?"

"Hmm?" the young demi-Saiyan pulled back a little before cheering up a second time, "Oh. Yeah. I think it's great that your dad is super famous and all, but I'm more interested in hearing about you and what you like."

"Uh… buh…" The girl was speechless, unable to form an articulate word in her mouth. After a few attempts, she then shook herself out of her reverie and stared back at the grinning youngster in disbelief, "B-But why? Surely I can't be as interesting as my dad. Don't you want to ask me about him and all the stuff he does?"

"Well… umm… how can I put this?" Gohan then regarded the girl with a bit more consideration and a sincere gaze. "I can tell from looking at you that you don't like how your dad acts and that you don't want to talk about him right now. If I'm being honest, I don't really want to talk about your dad either." He then tilted his head and sent her a disarmingly friendly smile, "I'd rather just listen to you and chat about stuff we're both interested in, you know… and get to know each other a little better."

After looking him in the eyes to determine whether or not the boy was messing with her, Videl stared back at him in amazement. "H-He really isn't interested in my dad at all." From his sincere remarks and cheerful statements, Videl could only blink and gulp. "Really? You just want to… talk about other things?"

"Yeah," Gohan nodded promptly and gave the girl a warm smile. "I think you're a really interesting person with a lot of different hobbies and interests. I don't live too close to the city and I don't go out to town very often. You're also one of the first kids I've met outside of my area who's as passionate about fighting as I am." He then grinned and leaned across the table, causing the girl to pull away a little. "I think its super cool that you want to learn more about martial arts outside of your father's classes. You must be super talented if you're able to train all by yourself."

Taken aback by Gohan's exclamations and how close his face suddenly became to hers, Videl was quick to process the youngster's words and look the kid square in the eyes. Noticing every intricate detail of his profile from her proximity with him, from his friendly smile, to his boyish nose, to his honest gaze and to his locks of wild black hair framing his face, the girl felt her breath unexpectedly catch in her throat and looked away momentarily.

Feeling her cheeks warm, Videl shuffled uncomfortably on the spot and smiled, "Th-Thanks."

"No problem."

Before either one of them could say anything else and continue on with their banter, the speakers in the food court blared into life once again and drew their focus upwards. "Attention all fighters; please report to your assigned platforms. The preliminary rounds will be starting in five minutes."

"Oh! Right! The fights!" Gohan exclaimed, quickly leaping to his feet and moving towards the exit. Stopping for but a moment, he turned back to the table and grinned across at Videl, "I have to get going now."

Stumped by the boy's sudden haste, the raven haired girl spluttered and stood up, "W-Wait. You're participating in this tournament?"

"Yeah," the half-Saiyan responded immediately without hesitation. "My friend Trunks and I signed up together and were given separate blocks for the first half of the tournament. Maybe after we get through the first round I'll be able to meet up with him in the quarter finals and have a match with him."
Videl had to resist the urge to stumble, "B-But… you're just a kid! And there are hundreds of other fighters out there." Massive ones too. That Doskoi sumo wrestler in particular was terrifyingly huge.

"Yeah… but that doesn't mean I can't try," Gohan replied, giving the girl a salute. "I'll see you later, yeah?"

At first appearing stunned, Videl slowly managed to pull herself out of her stupor and float back down to earth. Initially hesitant when figuring out a way to respond to the demi-Saiyan, the young fighter in training then gave the beaming boy a smile and a nod, before then raising her hand in a timid wave. "O-Okay. Good luck, Gohan."

With one final gesture of his own, the gutsy Z-fighter took off and vanished into the crowd, leaving Videl standing alone by the table.

Upon seeing him disappear, the girl remained there in silence for a few moments. Videl fingered her empty bottle of tea, looking down at it while thinking about the young man and everything they'd talked about. No doubt, Gohan was the nicest boy she'd ever come across and, whenever she'd seen him smile, it'd brought one to her lips as well. The hour they'd spent eating and chatting with one another had been the most fun she'd had on an outing in a long time.

And damn it, they didn't even exchange contact details! How was she going to find him again should he suddenly up and leave?

After thinking it over some more, Videl then made the unanimous decision as to what she was going to do next and, slapping her hand on the table, turned her gaze towards the exit.

"I'm going to watch him fight." Hell, what else had she come here to do? Sit in the food court the entire time and sulk? While this day was really all about her dad, the 'aliens' and the competition that'd been lined up for them, after meeting Gohan and getting to know him a little, Videl now had somebody else in this wacked up, acid trip of a tournament to support.

It didn't hurt that she was also very curious about him and really wanted to see what a boy of his disposition could do. Not just anybody their age signed up to fight in a tournament with over two hundred strong fighters also participating. For all she knew, he had some secret weapon he was hiding.

So, leaving her plate and bottle where it was, the girl quickly abandoned the table and dashed out towards the nearest balcony, disappearing into the crowd just as Gohan had minutes before.

OOO

(A little while later)

The moment the starting gun was fired, the whole of Battle Island exploded into a frenzy of excited cries and flying fists as all across the various disk-shaped arenas, every single fighter in sight went at each other all at once. From top to bottom of the oddly designed stadium, the audience watched on excitedly as the two-hundred plus martial artists began battling one another in a fantastic display of strength, agility and skill for a spot in the quarter finals of the competition, while at the same time trying to avoid getting pushed into the surrounding ocean.

As stated by the announcer, the rules of the preliminaries were simple. On each stage, over two dozen contestants would fight one another in a series of free style, free-for-all battle royals. Fighters are disqualified if they fainted, surrendered, or fell into the sea. The last one standing on each stage would move on to the quarter final rounds for a shot at the championships. Killing is prohibited of course, as was the use of weapons.

Right from the get-go, every single combatant threw themselves into the fray, dashing across their spaces in an effort to engage and take down as many opponents as they could. On one ring, the massive sumo wrestler Doskoi took on an entire swath of fighters attempting to force him over the edge. Managing to turn the tide with a quick reversal, he instead picked up the main balk of the group and shoulder tossed them over the side. The maneuver earned him a spirited cheer from the audience, who went on to watch the many other engagements taking place over the other platforms.

No man or woman was left out, as groups of fighters squared off against one another in heated one-on-one exchanges or all-on-one bouts with the most imposing competitors in their fields. It was a messy start at first what with the amount of bodies taking up each of the arenas, but when the warriors managed to find their speed, spaces and targets, the simultaneous battles quickly started to gain a little more traction.

For the Cash family overseeing the tournament from their roving skybox, the mother and father were completely invested in their fights, while their son was more interested in Hercule and his afro.

"You know, hair like this doesn't grow on trees. It takes a lot of tender care and special conditioners to actually get it like this," the man exclaimed to the glasses-wearing youngster, who was currently devouring a bowl of ramen like there was no tomorrow.

The Z-Fighters on the other hand, were having a ball in the madness of it all. Unlike in the tournament that'd been hosted by the maniacal Cell, this competition didn't have the entire world, population, or the fate of the universe at stake. Instead, it was an enormous free for all where each of the group's members could, for the first time in a long time, battle how they wanted and have some fun.

Krilllin was especially enjoying himself, bounding across his platform which had a continually moving surface and clearing the stage of every single fighter in sight. The competition on his end was so easy in fact that he didn't even need to put any effort into his attacks. He just jumped from one block to the next in an invisible blur, knocking out guys with a gentle poke of his finger and backhanding them over the side of the platform.

A hearty laugh escaped his lips when he flicked a guy between the eyes and sent him tumbling into the sea, before placing his fists on his hips heroically. "That's Krillin with two 'L's' and I do accept personal checks. Thank you." Was pretty much his introduction while ducking a boxer coming in from his blind spot and effortlessly kicking him into the sky.

Unfortunately, the young monk's celebrations were cut short by a loud yet familiar cheer echoing in from the sidelines.

"GO GOHAN!"

Krilllin's head snapped to his left where he saw, standing on one of the balcony's railings, his best friend's wife Chi-Chi waving a pair of fans around her in cheerleading fashion, while at the same time drawing odd gazes from the people behind her.

"BEAT EM' ALL! YOU CAN DO IT!"

The short fighter stammered in disbelief, "What? Gohan's fighting? But he's a Super Saiyan! That's not fair!" In fact, it wasn't fair for anyone. As it stood, Goku's son was currently the strongest man on the face of the planet and probably the entire universe.

In an instant, Krillin's confidence plummeted like a rock.

The feeling of despondency only seemed to gain weight when, moments later, the Z-fighter's ears caught on to the sound of a familiar battle roar. Looking to his right, Krillin then saw dozens of stunned fighters flying into the ocean one after the other, with the echo of rapid-fire blows reverberating across the island.

The sight and the presence of a powerful ki signature had Krillin pale.

"P-Piccolo too?" The man then glanced up with tears in his eyes. "Where's Trunks? Make it a full set." As soon as he said that, a swath of bodies crashed into the ground behind him, causing Krillin to spin around and look up. When he did, he freaked out when he saw, on the platform high above, the lavender haired face of Trunks peer over the side and smirk. The sight had Krillin scowl, "Me and my big mouth. This is now officially unfair!"

xxx

Standing at the railings of the balcony just outside of the food court, Videl gazed across the island in silent awe as the battles taking place on the various platforms took off. From one arena to the next she saw swarms of fighters ramming into one another to clash in a furious display of skill and power. The diversity of forms and styles was simply extraordinary.

On some stages she saw small fighters using speed and technique to take on larger and much slower opponents. On others she saw massive fighters using their size and bulk to either knock out their foes or toss them into the sea. Then there were the unorthodox fighters, who used various techniques from in-fighting based ones to out-fighting strategies to swiftly overpower or outpace their adversaries.

All in all, it was one hell of a skirmish between professionals.

Ignoring the great majority, including the strange, turban wearing green man dominating the competition on his platform and the three-eyed fighter knocking his opponents out in rapid succession, Videl's attention swiftly turned to the one Gohan was on.

Easily recognizable from his orange and blue garb she'd seen him wear in the food court and his wild, untamed black hair waving on the wind, the young girl saw the boy battling on the lowest platform closest to the sea. Despite there being so many other people around him, she was able to make him out for one reason and one reason only.

He was clearing house of all his opponents.

Eyes widening in amazement, the girl watched on as Gohan darted between fighters at ludicrous speed and took each and every one of them out with a series of lightning fast punches and kicks. It was almost like he was gliding across the surface of the arena, like he had wires holding him up or something. What's more, not only were his attacks shockingly fast, nearly untraceable to the human eye; he was also wearing a big smile on his face, as if the act of taking out his opponents meant nothing to him.

He was knocking them out one after the other seemingly without effort.

To put it into perspective, Videl was astounded.
"Wow. He… He's amazing," the girl whispered, before a wide grin spread across her lips and she thrust a fist into the air in encouragement. "Yeah! Go Gohan! Get em'!"

Her heart was pounding as she called out his name. Whether it was from the excitement of watching the many fights taking place or his in particular she didn't know. All Videl knew was that she wanted to see Gohan kick ass, win, and push his way clear through to the finals.

xxx

"I can't believe Gohan and Trunks entered the tournament. Just my luck," the melancholic voice of Yamcha spoke up as he lay across a large, arcing surface with his hands behind his head, completely ignoring the fighting taking place far below. "Ugh. One-hundred million beautiful zeni."

Having signed up for the preliminaries hoping for an outstanding streak, despite being aware that Tien and Krillin were also participating, the moment he heard that Piccolo was also entering the competition, the Z-fighter's enthusiasm from the beginning of the day dropped. Figuring he should have done this in the first place, Yamcha then reached out with his senses to see who else was there.

Sure enough, the man had then let out a groan of defeat when he sensed Gohan and Trunks in the area too. So, wallowing in a sea of self pity, the human fighter immediately flew up to the top of the massive pole on his arena and lay there to mope.

A heavy sigh escaped Yamcha's lungs, "Oh well. It was a nice dream while it lasted."

xxx

Bulma gave a sympathetic smile when she saw her ex appear on the television screen atop his arena's spire across from them. "Poor Yamcha. I wonder what's wrong. He seems to have lost his drive." She had a good idea as to what was probably gnawing at him. Chi-Chi did as well.

The Son mother smirked and turned away, "The competition must be overwhelming."

Feeling haughty herself, Bulma spared the woman a grin, "True. How can anyone expect to beat Trunks?"

Catching onto that snide remark, Chi-Chi immediately threw her best glare at the Brief mother, "Except Gohan!"

Lying in his mother's arms, the Baby Trunks, who'd previously been enjoying the scenery, then looked up worryingly when he saw the two women stand up and begin shooting daggers at one another. The scene soon turned incredibly worrisome for him and the people in the surrounding seats when they saw menacing auras appear around the mothers and electricity start to crackle between them.

In fact, the scene became so tense that everyone completely missed the sight of the massive Doskoi backhanding one of his opponents into the pillar Yamcha was lying on, bending it, and sending the Z-fighter plummeting into the ocean. The man had the common courtesy to let out an unmanly scream as he fell several stories before crashing into the water.

xxx

With a loud rumble and a collective cry of terror, the remaining fighters on the lowest battle platform found themselves crowded together before being sent flying over the edge. The collection of bodies hitting the surface of the water concurrently caused a splash about three stories high, a sight that drew an excited cheer from the crowd.

After plowing the rest of the competition off of his platform, Gohan held up a fist and grinned from ear to ear. "I heard the World Martial Arts Tournaments helped hone my father's skills. Perhaps this Intergalactic version will do the same for me."

As soon as the cameras scanned the ring, the referee's voice came up over the speakers. "Son Gohan is the first to pass the preliminaries!"

Upon celebrating his victory by throwing the same fist into the air, the boy then turned to the stands where his mother was and waved. When he saw her wave back at him with her victory fans, the youngster then sensed out the new friend he'd made in the food court. Looking up towards one of the nearby buildings, he quickly spotted Videl standing at the balcony and, smiling radiantly, waved to her as well.

The pig-tailed girl, at first overwhelmed by the way Gohan had handily dealt with all of his opponents, couldn't help but grin back and let out a cheer. "Yes! Way to go!"

xxx

"Trunks advances!" the announcer again announced inside of Cash's sky box, informing the family and their attendant of a second competitor. To the wealthy father and his wife, the sight drew expressions of interest and admiration.

To the mighty Champ Hercule though, it brought an expression of absolute dismay and horror. With spaghetti jammed inside of his mouth, the man gawked up at the screen when he recognized the faces of the advancers Gohan and Trunks sitting in the monitors. Able to recognize them from their attire and faces, the man could only shake his head in denial before turning toward another monitor.

There, he saw the moving platform retract and tilt, tossing all of the fighters standing on it into the ocean except for one, who managed to cling on despite all of the tumbling men and women making a grab for his head. He then gave the camera a victorious grin before his name was announced.

"Krillin moves on!"

"It... It's them... the guys from the Cell Games!" the martial arts champion with the afro thought, a cold sweat dripping down his face as he rose from his seat. Nobody, not even the kid sitting right next to him, seemed to take notice of the statue of a man turning around to clamp a hand over his mouth in an effort to cover his expression of fear. "W-Why are they here? T-This can't be happening... it's just... not possible..."

Moments later, another announcement was made.

"And Piccolo is headed for the quarter finals as well!"

The sight of the green skinned man in the turban and cape had Hercule sink to his knees, curl up into a little ball and start whimpering like a girl. Miraculously, for him, none of the family seemed to take notice of that either.

It was one of the many perks of being a charlatan of his high standing. Everybody just seemed to overlook all of his shortcomings whenever it was convenient.
"Nightmare… nightmare…"

"Tien Shinhan has also made the cut!"

xxx

With the preliminary rounds coming to a decisive close, the fighters that'd qualified then moved down to the lowest section of the island for the start of the next round. Forming up into a line on the waiting stage, they turned their attention toward the large screen above. As soon as all eyes were on it, the monitor flickered on from a picture of their group to a tally, which showcased all of their profiles in pairs, aligning each of them to their opponents for the quarter finals.

The announcer began reading off the arrangement. "Ladies and gentlemen, the matchups for the eight quarter finalists have been decided! In the first round, we have Son Gohan vs Udo! Second match is between Trunks and Tien Shinhan! After that, Piccolo and Krillin will battle it out in the third match! And last but not least, we have Doskoi and Sky Dragon competing for the fourth spot in the semi-finals!"

While the crowd clamored excitedly, placing bets on who out of the selected would be most likely to advance, Krillin deflated on the spot.

"Oh man! I'm fighting Piccolo." For some strange reason, the tiles at his feet suddenly became incredibly fascinating. "If it wasn't for bad luck, I wouldn't have any." As if dreading the worst, the short man then glanced across at the Namekian standing at the end of the row of fighters, whom he saw smirk his way. The man's confident expression had Krillin shiver and gulp.

"Yep. I'm boned."

With their names announced, Gohan and Udo casually strolled out onto the large, circular platform that would serve as their battleground for this part of the finals. The crowds, expecting a big fight, cheered wildly as soon as they saw the two contestants appear on the screen, showing everyone which out of the remaining eight fighters would be battling it out.

Almost immediately on the first glance, it looked pretty grim for one of them.

The man the young demi-Saiyan was up against was enormous; a hulking, burly wrestler who stood at least one story high. Topped with a pair of blue fighting boots and red Speedos, the martial artist also had long blonde locks and a bushy mustache, matched by a very aggressive look in his sharp blue eyes. Needless to say, he had a very Western appeal to him, something that his hybrid opponent didn't take much notice of. Gohan was just glad to be fighting.

Videl, still holding her position up on the balcony, broke out into a bit of a sweat when she saw the person Gohan was set to fight. "This doesn't look good." She hoped nothing bad happened to him.

Though she was actually referring to Gohan, in reality she should have been referring to his opponent.

"Fighters! Take your stances!"

Raising an eyebrow at the smiling child standing underneath his shadow, Udo snorted. "Feh. I'm fighting a baby? I gotta get a better agent," the man muttered to himself before giving the boy a wide grin in an attempt to intimidate him. "Hey listen, kid. I'm not into beating weaklings, but the training wheels are coming off today. Understand?"
Unshaken, Gohan brought his hands up, placed his right fist in his left palm and bowed. "I'm ready. Let's have a good fight."

The big man chuckled, "You've got a lot of guts kid… and I'm gonna show them to yah!" The second the starting bell rang, the man let out a snarl and reached down to grab the boy with his gigantic hands.

However, the second he saw his foe move, Gohan acted.

Focusing, the demi-Saiyan darted forward and, with a lazy sweeping kick, knocked the unsuspecting man off his feet and sent him flying. The poor, unsuspecting wrestler let out a startled cry when his body flew backwards at high speed, smashed through one of the stadium walls, and crashed into one of the stands a second later. The spectators in that box had barely enough time to barrel out of the way before the cannonball of a man crashed straight through their balcony, flew out the other side and soared over the ocean.

He landed in the water two kilometers away.

The entire island sat in stunned silence, save for one mother and her friend, who rose from her seat while punching the air victoriously.

"BOO-YAH! That's my son!"

Having watched the entire thing from her spot at the railings, Videl's sapphire blue eyes had widened to the size of dinner plates as she stared slack jawed at the splash Udo made in the distance.

Naturally, she was just as shocked as the rest of the island.

"W-Whoa. Did Gohan do that?"

If she had blinked she would have missed it. Even though she didn't, she swears she'd just missed something important.

xxx

After making a literal impression on the audience in the form of a massive, human-shaped hole in one of the bleachers, Gohan happily vacated the ring to make way for the next two contestants. Once everyone had been shaken out of their stunned reveries, the referee quickly went on to call the next two fighters, only to realize that they were both already out on the stage.

"M-Moving onto the second match, Trunks battles Tien Shinhan!" the arbitrator stammered, drawing a cheer from the audience as they watched the two men prepare.

Knowing his next fight was going to be his toughest one yet, the three-eyed former assassin removed the white shirt from his back and tossed it away. Showing off his scarred, muscle-layered body, the man then took a deep breath and brought his fists to his sides.

Meeting the lavender haired Saiyan's gaze, Tien smiled, "Hey, Trunks. Whaddaya say we give these people a good show?"

The time-traveling warrior smiled and nodded in return. "Okay."

With the crowds cheering and the stage set, the officials sounded the bell. The second it blared, both Trunks and Tien vanished from the arena and bounded up the island from platform to platform in the form of two, fast moving blurs. Once they reached the apex, they both leapt into the sky and flew right at each other, engaging in a flurry of lightning fast blows hundreds of feet above sea level.

The sound of powerful attacks cutting through the air rang out as both Tien and Trunks danced across the sky, trading punches and kicks while dodging and parrying blows in turn. When the three-eyed fighter struck out, the hybrid Saiyan countered with a swift kick, only to be met with a check and a left hook, which he was forced to avoid. Both crisscrossed, avoiding simultaneous blows from the other before Trunks flew at his opponent with a spinning kick, which Tien ducked at the last moment.

Seeing his opponent fly past him, the triclops gritted his teeth and shot up after him with a swift one-two combo and a kick, all three of which Trunks calmly avoided before countering with a left roundhouse. The blow impacted against the human's chest with a sonic boom, the force of which sent Tien spiraling towards the ocean with the scream of a passing jet. However, before Tien could hit the water's surface, he pulled up at the last second and leveled out, tearing a shallow trench through the sea.

xxx

Up in X.S Cash's roving sky box, the entire family of three could be seen gawking out the window as they watched the battle between Trunks and Tien unfold. At first they'd all been sitting quietly and patiently, expecting to watch a simple ground match between the two contestants. But then, just as they were getting comfortable, their moods did a complete one eighty when the two men suddenly vanished and reappeared in the skies above the island seconds later, throwing punches at each other that simultaneously echoed with every swing and broke the sound barrier with every impact.

In a matter of seconds everyone, including the camera crew covering the family and the Champ's communal in their part of the island, were stunned.

"They're fighting in midair," the portly, wealthiest man in the world exclaimed, unable to comprehend what was happening. All he knew was that it was the most amazing thing he'd ever seen.

His son was also speechless.

The mother, looking on nervously, glanced across at her husband, "Honey, are you sure they're not using wires?"

Her question was promptly silenced when the two fighters vanished once again and the sounds of sonic booms started to ring across the island like thunderclaps. Each invisible blast was marked by a tremor, which had the audience holding onto their seats and looking on in amazement when the two blurs that were the fighters darted through the sky in a fantastic aerial dogfight.

Wanting to get a secondary opinion, the reporter Sarah and her cameraman Tom, both of which were standing in the skybox, turned their attention to the world champion. Neither of them seemed to notice the look of abject horror on the man's face, as his back was completely turned to them.

"Mr. Satan. Can you explain this extraordinary event?" the woman asked, holding the mike out to him.

Timidly glancing over his shoulder, the afro fighter gulped before launching into a tirade of preposterous theories, "It's a simple parlor trick! They just make a quick switch-a-roo with smoke and mirrors, and what no-GAAAH!" He was cut off when the sound barrier seemingly exploded right next to their balcony and caused the entire island to shake, causing the people standing in the box to let out a startled yell before falling over.

Face-planting the cold floor, the thunderstruck Hercule Satan could do nothing except mutter gibberish to himself.

"Why… out of all the tournaments did they have to enter mine, I hate this." He could almost cry.

xxx

Their connecting blows taking the form of earthshaking thunder claps, the two fierce warriors engaged one another at invisible speed throughout the skies above the island. Eventually, after battling one another in their own plain of perception that literally shook several spectators out of their chairs, the two eventually reemerged in hot pursuit of one another.

Gaining altitude as fast as he could, Tien quickly spun around, threw both his hands up, and formed a familiar diamond shaped crosshairs. Gathering ki between his palms, he took aim with his hands and zoomed in on the approaching Trunks, who quickly spotted the attack being aimed at him.

"TRI BEAM-HAAAA!" Tien bellowed, before unleashing a square shaped blast of golden energy from his hands that shot towards the hybrid at ridiculous speed.

The attack, despite its enormous size and range, was effectively dodged when Trunks zipped out of its path. The blast ended up striking one of the island's tors where, upon impacting, caused a massive explosion that not only disintegrated that uninhabited portion of the island and caused the formation of rock to topple into the shallows, it also generated towering waves in that rippled out across the ocean. The audience practically cried out in terror at the violent tremors the explosion created.

Ignoring the smoke and the debris pelting their surroundings, Trunks and Tien continued their battle. Darting through the air at great speed, the pair eventually collided with one another with simultaneous, full-body checks. The impact resulted in another enormous shockwave, which was followed by an ear-splitting crack when Tien's fist smashed across Trunks's face. The blow sent both blasting away from one another across the water, where they then suspended themselves to catch their breaths.

Seeing his foe smiling across at him and returning it likewise, Tien's face quickly became serious. "He's still holding back a great deal of his strength. Looks like I'm going to have to go all out if I want to make him work." With that thought, Tien powered up, a white aura of energy exploding off of his body and enveloping him completely.

Responding to the threat, Trunks quickly shot up into the air to gain some distance. Once he'd secured a good altitude, he turned back to his opponent, threw his arms and legs out, and powered up as well. With a shout of effort, golden energy exploded off of the demi-Saiyan like wildfire and blasted outwards, a transformation which was marked by his hair spiking upwards, turning gold, and his eyes flashing a greenish-blue.

The crowds were completely awed by the display, watching on while the two glowing fighters prepared for a second bout.

Practically leaning over the railings at this point, a completely stunned Videl blinked in amazement when she watched the two competitors take off from their low altitude positions to engage each other above the island once again. At first overwhelmed by their sheer display of speed, ferocity and power, as well as their ability to fly, the girl was once again sent into an inner spiral of thought when she saw the pair light up like flames and start trading blows with one another at an even greater speed. It was completely mindboggling.

While she continued to watch the pair dogfight through the clouds and between the towering platforms, the raven haired girl remained completely silent, locked in a daze that would not be so easily broken. But then, as memories of watching the Cell Games flickered through her mind and a group of familiar faces from that same day began to surface, the child was eventually able to piece two and two together and soon enough blinked herself out of her startled reverie.

"W-Wait a second… super strength, super speed, beams of bright energy… golden hair…" Videl's thoughts came to a screeching halt when she finally realized what she was looking at. "Th-These are the people who were at the Cell Games with dad!"

Holy crap. So the men who'd fought Cell after her father were here at this tournament as well. That was outstanding! Looking up at the screen showcasing all of the competitors, she was soon able to recognize four of the ones that she remembered seeing there on the news, as well as the one that'd been knocked out in the preliminaries by Doskoi. Startled by this discovery, the girl then took a moment to tally up the faces before looking out across the island a third time, watching on as more explosions rippled through the skies.

"A couple of them are missing though," Videl thought, since she couldn't see the blonde haired father and son anywhere. They were the two she remembered fighting Cell after her dad and his friends had been knocked out, and displayed the exact same powers as the fighter with the previously lavender hair now battling it out with Tien.

Of course, thinking on it a little more, after witnessing the competitor's startling alteration, Videl then realized that the father and son duo must have the same ability to change their hair color as well. Apparently this Trunks's normal hair color was purplish. If that were the case and his change in hair color was part of his transformation into that golden form, then the father and son from the Cell Games could probably do that too.

Despite this new information though, Videl still had a few more questions that had been left unanswered.

"W-Where does Gohan fit in to all of this?" He obviously didn't display the normal traits of a strong fighter. The fact that he sent his previous opponent on a two kilometer flight was proof of that. Her dad was one of the strongest people she knew and even with his ridiculous hitting power; there was no way her father could do something even close to that. But again, after meditating on it a little bit more, something in the girl's mind clicked that had her staring at the screen with the demi-Saiyan's face smiling back at her. "No way… could… could Gohan be…?

After the things she'd seen and was now watching live in front of her, everything was starting to come together.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

(Capsule Corp – West City)

Far out of the way of Battle Island and sitting across the bed in his room, the Prince of all Saiyans Vegeta, adorned in his full body spandex and armor, could be seen watching the television quietly with his arms folded and legs crossed. Having flipped to the channel of the fights earlier that morning, the man had then proceeded to watch with mixed interest as all of the Z-Fighters, sans Yamcha, dominated the battle royal portion of the Intergalactic tournament before moving on to the quarter finals.

However, after seeing Gohan's one-sided match against his hulk of an opponent and watching Trunks battle Tien to the point both of them powered up, the flame haired Saiyan quickly grew tired of the little sideshow and took immediate action.

Picking up the remote, Vegeta switched off the television and scoffed, "Hmph. Give me a break." He then set the remote down and fell back into his pillow, hands behind his head.

Right now, the last thing he wanted to think about was fighting. So, finding a serene place of his own in the far corners of his mind, the man shut his eyes and decided to take a nap; completely ignoring the television and his son's sword gleaming in the corner behind him.

OOO

(Back on the Island)

"Well… it looks like Tien is done for," Krillin murmured to himself, rubbing his arm uneasily as he continued to observe the aerial light show between the Super Saiyan and his human opponent. "I can give him extra points for effort, but that man has gotta face the fact that he was beaten the moment he stepped into the ring."

Even though the fight was still going strong, the short, bald warrior could do nothing to hold back his river of pessimism.

"Ah, cheer up Krillin," Gohan chirped, grinning across at his friend. "Even though Trunks has an advantage in speed and power, there's still a chance for Tien to win. All he has to do is knock him into the ocean."

Krillin snorted, glancing at the youngster who looked to be the most cheerful person in the world, "Heh. That's easier said than done, Gohan." The two of them then looked up when an explosion lit up the entire sky and, after watching it fade, spotted Tien emerge from the cloud trailing smoke.

A split second later, the entire audience including Gohan and Krillin winced in unison when the transformed Trunks flickered into view directly behind the triclops and backhanded him into the ocean below. The man rocketed into the water like a bullet, creating a splash large enough that it soaked all of the people sitting in the nearby stands and boats. When the waves finally subsided, a loud cheer went up and the referee announced the victor.

"After an awesome display of gravity defying speed and strength, Trunks emerges as the winner!"

"Oh well. He gave it his best shot," Krillin murmured, before throwing Gohan a lopsided smile, "Looks like it's time I gave mine. I'll see you in the infirmary, buddy. Provided I even make it there in one piece…" He then patted the boy on the shoulder and walked past him, leaving the spiky haired hybrid puzzled.

After Trunks helped Tien out of the water, the pair quickly cleared the stage for the next two contestants who were set to battle. The audience clamored excitedly when they saw Piccolo march out onto the stage followed closely by Krillin. While the former appeared completely calm, folding his arms over his chest with his eyes shut in meditation, his shorter opponent looked absolutely terrified. Most of the people reasoned that it was because of the atmosphere of the tournament and decided to cheer the poor guy on, hoping for another spectacular battle.

"The third match is about to begin as Piccolo and Krillin square off inside the ring!!"

Under the applause and cheers of the spectators, the smaller fighter gulped nervously. "Okay. You can do this. He's not unbeatable." Krillin's expression then became one of deadpan, "Well, unless he uses his Special Beam Cannon... then I'm dead." Yet he'd completely forgotten the fact that killing was strictly prohibited in this competition.

This was solid proof that once again the power of fear far outweighed the power of rational thought.

Taking a stance, Krillin slapped his game face on. "I may not win, but I'm going out in style." He then trained his gaze on that of his opponent's, only to realize moments later that the man had his side turned to him and his eyes closed. The sight of the Namekian standing there without the slightest care for his presence at all had the monk recoil. "I don't believe it! He's not even going to look at me?!" And with that, the poor monk snapped and his frustrations took hold of him. "THAT'S IT! I'VE HAD IT! I'M NOBODY'S FOOL!"

The sound of the starting horn blared. Once it did, Krillin dropped into a running start and, with the loudest battle cry he could muster, blasted forward at incredible speed. In a split second he was right on top of the Namekian warrior and was just about to land his first blow.

Unfortunately in his haste, Krillin lost complete track of where he was going and ended up running headlong into the man's cape like a raging bull. Popping out the other side, the monk let out a hilarious cry when he unexpectedly plummeted over the side of the ring. Quickly recovering from his descent, the short fighter started flapping his arms like a bird to regain some altitude, saving himself from a premature fall into the ocean. The moment he returned to his platform's level though, Krillin suddenly felt himself grabbed from behind by his collar and forcibly turned around.

Looking up, he saw Piccolo glaring at him. "I thought I came for a tournament, not a circus performance. This is just a waste of my time." Without another word, the man tossed Krillin back onto the ring and onto the ground. Then, the second the short man sat up, the Namekian turned heel, leapt over the side, and blasted off.

As soon as the Namekian disappeared over the horizon, the referee spoke up over the silent crowd. "Piccolo has forfeited the match! Krillin wins by default!!"

Applause and cheers raining down on him moments later, the bewildered monk blinked a couple of times before grinning. "Oh. That was surprisingly easy."

Standing on the sidelines, a disappointed Gohan breathed out a sigh. "Aww man. I was hoping he would stick around for a little bit longer. Oh well."

"And now for the final match, Doskoi against Sky Dragon!!"

OOO

(Sometime later)

With the end of the quarter finals, which saw the challenger Doskoi tossing his opponent over one of the upper platforms and literally out of the competition, the four remaining contestants were then escorted into the waiting room while the audience was told to remain as they were. Though this announcement initially confused the spectators waiting eagerly in their seats, every single person on the island soon found out why they were told to hold fast as then, all of a sudden, the entire landmass began to move.

As it turns out, the island that the spectators and all of the other fighters were on wasn't actually fixed to the ground at all. The entire mass of earth and steel was in fact an enormous vessel that, after being unlatched from the seabed, set a course for the competition's final destination. Even though the preliminaries had been held on this island, the semi-finals and final match was actually set to be held on a second landmass dubbed Battle Island II; an actual atoll with two enormous mountains making up its topography, both dormant volcanoes, with the main stadium sitting in the heart of the larger of the two edifices.

Those that'd partaken in the festivities on the first island would be able to witness the final battles on the second. It wasn't a long trip to get to the place either; a quick sail out of the inlet and across the channel and the entire entourage of over eighty thousand spectators were there in just over forty minutes. The passengers were quick to disembark from the mobile landmass as soon as it docked with its significantly larger counterpart, where everyone was then driven via a fleet of buses to the dome serving as the final stadium.

The excitement hanging in the air was almost palpable.

For most anyway. As it turns out, X.S Cash's attendant had actually caught Mr. Satan trying to jump ship prematurely and ended up having to escort the man personally onto the second island, where he quickly adjourned to the nearest bathroom. The Champ had apparently come down with some sort of a chronic stomach ache, an illness that the staff reasoned the man had contracted due to a severe case of motion sickness.

Anyway, once all of the spectators had been filed into the stadium, the staff was then able to take the four winners of the quarter finals to their next room. Bringing them into the levels beneath the stadium itself, the group was sorted into a separate chamber where they were able to mingle and rest up before they were called to the elevators that would take them up to the final ring.

Each settled down to their own devices. While the imposing sumo wrestler Doskoi adopted an Indian style position in the corner of the room, Trunks had taken to leaning against a wall with his arms folded, Krillin a spot on the couch, and Gohan, energetic as always, had decided to stay on his feet and wander about the waiting room, taking in the various paintings and other embellishments hanging around the place. The smile he wore throughout his entire lap of the room told everyone that he was the most relaxed there, a sight that put a smile on Trunks's face.

"Excited?" the lavender Saiyan asked.

"You bet. I've never actually participated in a tournament like this before and I actually made it into the semi-finals on my first go," the younger hybrid chirped while looking across at his friend.

"Same here. The World Martial Arts Tournament in my time was shut down due to the havoc the androids were creating across the planet and since we were so busy fighting them, nobody had time for these kinds of activities," Trunks replied, his smile brightening somewhat as he looked down at the ground. "But now that their nightmare is over, we're able to go back to the way things were."

"I hope you guys are able to pull through it," Gohan spoke, beaming brightly with his hands behind his back. "You're the earth's protector now in your time… so that means everybody will be looking to you for support. I'm sure you'll do fine."

"Yeah," Mirai responded, nodding towards his mentor from the past with a heartfelt gleam in his eyes, "Thanks, Gohan."
"Ah, you shouldn't worry about it too much," Krillin said from the couch, soda in hand and a smile on his face. "Now that #17 and #18 are gone in your time, you and the rest of the planet can rest easy, knowing that the greatest threats have been wiped clean from the board. I mean, after all the stuff you and Bulma had to go through, I can imagine you guys are exhausted."

"Mm," Trunks nodded in agreement.

While the two had their heart to heart across the way, Gohan decided to pace around a little more. When he went to check out the bonsai trees growing along the table in the back, he sensed a pair of eyes watching him and glanced around to see Doskoi staring at him.

The youngster, blinking at the man's serious contours, beamed. "Hi there."

Appearing stoic at first, the big man soon broke out a smile, "Hello. You were the little one that sent Udo on a free trip across the pond, yeah?"

Gohan giggled and scratched his cheek, "Guilty."

"Impressive. You may not look it, but you're an incredibly powerful fighter," Doskoi replied while at the same time tilting his head towards the young man. "I'd fought Udo a few times before in previous tournaments. Even I found it difficult to toss a man of that size." He then gave the youngster a curious glance, "What's your secret?"

Giving it a moment of thought, the spiky haired hybrid chuckled, "The trick is to take their weight, pull them forward, and reverse their momentum. That way you'll not only throw them off balance, you'll also be able to use their strength against them."

Doskoi laughed heartily, which sounded more like a rumble that could be felt rather than heard, "You're a very technical fighter I see… just as I expected of someone of your character. To each their own, I suppose" Seeing the boy smile at his comment, the man then nodded towards him respectfully and spoke. "I hope that we get to meet each other in the final round to see who'll get to take down that Mr. Satan fellow." The wrestler frowned a bit and closed his eyes, "Between you and me, I do not believe that a man like that could have taken down somebody as terrifying as Cell. I saw what that monster did on the news. No way could someone of that caliber have fallen so easily to someone of Hercule Satan's skill set."

His remark actually had the three Z-fighters present smile, especially Krillin.

"At least there are some people out there with a little bit of common sense about them," Trunks thought, sharing an acknowledging nod with his companions. "We think so too, friend."

"Mr. Satan may know how to please a crowd, but defeating someone who can crush mountains with their bare hands… no way," Krillin added.

"Yeah. It takes a different kind of stuff to take on somebody like that," Gohan led on, earning a wide smile from the large sumo practitioner.

"Stuff that you three possess, I assume," the man responded, earning surprised blinks from Krillin and Gohan. Grinning slightly, the hulking figure winked, "I've seen how you three do battle. As someone who's been practicing martial arts for years now, I think I know when I've been outgunned. But that doesn't mean I won't give it my best shot."

Initially surprised, the three Z-fighters then smiled and gave their respects to the big wrestler. As one-dimensional as he initially came across, this man was actually one sharp customer. Of course, not wanting to rain on the man's parade, they simply returned his friendly exclamations with gestures of acknowledgement and thanks.

"I wonder what Chi-Chi and Bulma are doing right now," Krillin wondered out loud, turning to Trunks with an inquisitive expression. "You guys did mention that those two came along the watch the tournament."

"Maybe they're still arguing over who out of the three of us is going to win this thing," Mirai suggested with a shrug.

This reply had the short monk cackle sarcastically, "Oh please. No need to beat around the bush on this one, pal. What you really meant to say was who out of the two of us is going to win this thing. If you haven't forgotten, you and Gohan are products of a pair of terrifying space monsters and I'm just a poor little sack of flesh human with no hair."

While Trunks rolled his eyes, Gohan smiled and looked up as well, "Everyone should be getting comfortable right about now. I'm just wondering how Videl's doing. Maybe she's up there in the stadium waiting for us."

This little exclamation took Krillin out of the conversation a bit and had the man look in the youngster's direction, "Videl? Who's that?"

"Oh. This girl I met up in the food court. She's really nice and really tough… and she's learning how to fight using different kinds of martial arts. I think she's pretty cool. Maybe you guys can meet her afterwards." The moment he finished his little exclamation, Gohan then saw Krillin and Trunks look across at one another. After that, he then saw the monk grin slyly at him, while the man with the lavender hair threw the demi-Saiyan a very Vegeta like look of curiosity. Gohan actually felt a shiver run down his spine when he saw the pair's eyes flicker with mischief. "Uhh… why are you guys looking at me like that?"

"Oh, this is going to be fun," Krillin sung in his head while a wide grin pulled across his lips.

Poor innocent Gohan. He had no idea what kind of teasing was going to be coming his way.

OOO

(Half an hour later)

"Thank you for your patience ladies and gentlemen! We hope you've all had plenty of time to rest, because now it's time to begin the semi-finals!" the announcer hollered out over the mike, earning a loud cheer from all those present.

Inside the massive dome, all of the spectators had been arranged into a very large, yet very basic stadium setup. The steel structure inside the mountain wrapped around an enormous coliseum that circled an arena center that, unlike conventional rings, contained an enormous pyramid in the middle. At the very apex of the construct, leading off from each of the four corners, there sat four jet car tracks with four pods stationed at the beginning of each slide. These slides led into four completely different directions through tunnels that disappeared into the walls.

With spotlights focused completely on the center stage and enormous monitors set up throughout the entirety of the dome, the audience was guaranteed full and complete coverage of the next round of matches to come. The entire building was literally quivering with excitement.

Videl, who'd found a spot somewhere closest to the top of the coliseum, was rocking back and forth excitedly on her heels while she leaned against the railings. Having made her way up here after leaving the first battle island, the girl was obviously looking forward to the next series of events. After all, Gohan had made it into the finals, and if her instincts knew any better she was bound to see one hell of a show.

"I know you're going to do awesome, Gohan. If you were able to wipe the floor with that last guy, then I have no doubt you're going to kick butt in this one," the girl cheered inwardly, beaming brightly as she looked intently towards the center pyramid. "Show me what you can do!"

When the stage lit up, the crowds cheered as one after the other, hatches opened up beside each of the four rocket pods. As soon as they did, four figures were then elevated onto the stage under a chorus of shouts and applause. The sound the plus fifty thousand people made was almost deafening, but neither one of the four warriors were shaken up in the slightest.

That is… until a couple members in the audience decided to be more vocal than the people around them.

"GOHAN, I LOVE YOU SWEETIE!" the cry of Chi-Chi echoed throughout the chamber.

The shout out had Gohan look down and blush. "Mum… not so loud," he mumbled.

Seeing the boy's abashed face on the big screen after hearing the woman's yell drew a giggle from Videl.

"You own this, Trunks! Get em' and then we can go on vacation!" the call of Bulma followed shortly afterwards.

Mirai had the common sense to blush just as much as his fellow Saiyan did. "Tactful as always, mother."

"Krillin! Don't get yourself killed," the yell of Oolong echoed in from another part of the stadium, earning a deep scowl from the bald fighter.

"Oh, I'll survive. Then it's bacon time."

As soon as all four contestants had appeared, the spotlights overhead faded, and the mediator's voice one again rang true throughout the dome. "New island, new rules! We've got four tunnels running underground! They lead to specialized battle zones in each direction. Now that the qualifiers have been assigned a tunnel, they will each be transported to their decided battle zone via the rocket pods you see positioned beside them. There they will face our special guests; FIGHTERS FROM ACROSS THE GALAXIES!"

Overhead the television screens showed to the audience close up images of the tunnels and tracks, before then flipping over to a feed of the four 'space aliens' descending a set of escalators in the marketing stage of the main event. Once everyone had been informed of the opening proceedings, the speaker continued to read out the rules to the four fighters waiting patiently on the pyramid.

"Now pay attention, because here's where things get really spicy! Once a fight ends, the challenge isn't over. The victor must then find and take a special lift, and be the first to return to the center stage here inside this coliseum. The winner will then proceed to the final round against Mr. Satan!" The end of this statement drew an earsplitting cry and cheer from the collective audience.

Just like the other Z-fighters, Krillin sprouted a grin and clambered into his rocket pod, "Perfect! A race! That means I'll have the advantage." Snickering as he strapped himself in and pulled down the brace bar, the man then watched as the cockpit closed and the sound of the audience became muffled by the dividing glass. "After all, I do have the least wind resistance."

As soon as all the rules had been explained, the three other fighters leapt into their pods and buckled up. With Doskoi lagging behind due to being hampered by his immense size, soon each and every one of the competitors was strapped in and ready for action. Once the staff was certain that the fighters were locked down good and tight, they gave a thumbs-up to the chief commentator, who then shouted into the microphone once more.

"Let's begin the count down!"

A massive screen switched to a clock, which started to tick. With every second that flipped by, the audience started to chant in unison.

"Ten!"

"Nine!"

"Eight!"

"Okay. Here we go!" Trunks thought, grinning as he took hold of the handle bars.

"Seven!"

"Six!"

"Five!"

"Let's do this!" Krillin shouted in his pod, licking his lips and tasting the sweetness of impending victory.

"Four!"

"Three!"

"Two!"

"One!"

"Lift off!" Gohan smirked.

With a blast of fire and a sonic boom, the four shuttles took off down their tracks at breakneck speeds. Trail ing smoke as they shot down their respective slides, the carts and their passengers vanished down the tunnels one after the other. Once they were gone, the reporters down on ground level, who were covering their part of the battle, waved away the fumes and turned to their cameramen to continue with their broadcasts.

"And they're off!"

The whole event was shooing to be an incredible hit and the audience was holding out for every second of it.

What the Z-fighters didn't know however, as they rocketed down their respective tunnels towards their assigned arenas, was that their greatest battle was just about to begin.
"Come on, baby! Move faster!" Krillin shouted as his pod carried him through one of the weirdest acid trips of all time. "Go! Go! Go!"

The instant the four rocket shuttles entered the tunnels and began snaking their way through them at high speed, the four contenders from the preliminaries were immediately thrown into a massive hallway of simulators and monitors. The projectors all around them bombarded the unsuspecting fighters with animations and CGI of all shapes and sizes. At first the competitors found themselves in a world reminiscent of the movie Tron, where a giant whale came out of an ocean of code and seemingly knocked Krillin's pod for a loop. But all of that changed seconds later when all four shuttles split up and blasted off towards different areas of the island.

Gohan's pod took a trip through a recreation of the solar system, moments before it went crashing through a series of digital barriers one after the other before ejecting him into a world of purple clouds and giant toys. The half-Saiyan laughed in delight as his car spiraled through the air, before crashing headlong into an enormous plush teddy bear with a missing eye. The impact slowed him right down, eventually spitting him back out and depositing the youngster on top of a collection of enormous balloons.

Doskoi's pod took him through a collection of nauseating twists and turns like a drill bit, his surroundings bursting all around him like fireworks. After passing through the computer simulation, his pod then leapt out of the cave and went skipping across a row of sand dunes like a stone. Moments later, his pod came to a screeching halt on a steep incline, dropping him off at the base of an enormous hill. Hearing the distinct sound of sand particles pelting against his window, the man shook his head of the insane rollercoaster ride before deciding to get himself out of his cramped seating arrangement.

Trunks's trip down the rabbit hole was a little bit tamer than the others. Flying through a kaleidoscope of brilliant patterns and colors, the lavender haired hybrid was able to enjoy the splendor of his animated universe, minutes before his pod shot out an enormous lake and over an immaculate field of forests and flowers. The young man was given an awesome ten second view of the sparkling scenery before his pod skidded across the water's surface and came to a gentle stop in the shallows.

Krillin's landing however was not so gentle. After his pod was flung out of the tunnel, it went bouncing from wall to wall like a ball in a pinball machine. When it struck a ledge, it crashed into a river of lava and started to sink. Once the craft was almost completely submerged, Krillin busted out of it with a cry of terror and his head on fire. Leaping onto the sweltering soil of the volcanic field he'd ended up in, the man hurriedly patted out his head and breathed a sigh of relief once his scalp had been extinguished.

"Woo… that was a close one…" the short fighter said.

XXX
Upon exiting his car, Trunks quickly leapt onto dry land and casually wandered over to a nearby stream. His legs pushing their way through the long grass, the man peered over the side to see a couple of fish swim through the gently flowing creek, followed closely by a dragonfly that landed on an overhanging reed.

Narrowing his eyes, the man looked up and took in his surroundings.

"Okay… battle zone, huh? Are we supposed to fight or have a picnic?" Trunks panned across the majestic landscape, taking note of the fields of flowers stretching out before him and the enormous spire he could see in the distance. It was there the adult demi-Saiyan figured he had to go next, but first had to traverse this place, locate his opponent for that stage of the competition and battle him in order to proceed. "Geez. What an odd tournament."

The flora was a nice touch, even though it was completely and utterly pointless.

XXX

Bounding through the hellish environment that was his battle zone, Krillin leapt around the many pillars and cliffs laid out in his path. Eventually finding a clearing with pools of lava bubbling away around him, the man then came to a sudden halt when he saw the silhouette of a figure appear behind a cloud of smoke. The sight and the emergence of the figure's presence had the short fighter brace himself and instinctively widen his stance.

"You must be my opponent!" Receiving no response at first, the monk smiled and, setting a casual pace, began to stroll forward. "My name is Krillin. Perhaps you've heard of me. I'm a great fighter-slash-hero from earth." Ah yes. Introductions. It'd been a while since he'd done one of these. As he ambled closer, the wall of fumes began to clear, and his would-be adversary started to emerge from the thick haze. "You'd do well to stay on your guard as I've already conquered the mighty Piccolo today. You might even say that I'm… on a… winning… strea-" The man then suddenly tapered off.

The moment he drew close enough to see his opponent, Krillin felt all the blood rush up to his face as well as to another part of his body. There, standing on top of a ledge, he saw a beautiful, blue-skinned young woman with a curvaceous figure, long, curly orange hair that fanned out around her and grew down her back, blue eyes, and pointy ears. She was also wearing a strange uniform consisting of a white vest, baggy pants with gold buckles, a gold pointy necklace, earrings, a blue, halter-style undershirt, black pull-on sleeves, a purple sash, and yellow and black boots.

While her outlandish and almost mercenary like appearance came as a big surprise to Krillin, there was another aspect about her that instantly had the Z-fighter's attention.

"You're a girl?! Space chicks are hot!" Okay, not the most eloquent thing to come out of his mouth, but certainly the most logical.

Had she been somebody else, a guy for example, the short fighter wouldn't have paid her that much mind. However, the fact that she was breathtakingly gorgeous and was throwing him a disarmingly beautiful smile, there was no way the poor man could ignore her.

Gulping when he saw her brush some hair out of her face, Krillin continued. "Now… don't tempt me with your beauty. I have a tournament to win!"

Giving a cute giggle, the girl closed her eyes, brought her hands out widely and crossed them over her face. The moment she did so, the Z-fighter suddenly sensed her ki skyrocket and her hair stand on end, like it was being propelled by a wind that just wasn't there. Then, without warning…
Krillin was seemingly struck down by an assault from all sides. A kick to the side of his head knocked the martial artist askew, followed immediately by a left cross that cocked his head around and a knee to the abdomen that lifted him several feet off the ground. Then, flicking her hair back playfully, the blue-skinned woman elbowed the fighter into the ground and kicked him across the clearing into a nearby mountain of rock.

The resulting impact nearly buried Krillin under a pile of stone and as soon as his body hit the floor, his attacker landed as well. Smiling victoriously, the woman powered down and her hair dropped to its previous position draped behind her back.

Attempting to pick himself up, the thoroughly beaten and bruised Krillin forced a smile, "I… think she likes me." Moments later, he fainted, his face planting the ash covered floor with a dull thud.

XXX

Up in the stadium, the crowd of spectators was literally shocked into silence by the swift and sudden defeat the first alien had been able to deal her opponent.

Panning around, the roaming, automated camera was able to capture the entire scuffle, and was now hovering over Krillin's battered body while his foe stopped beside him. The result had Chi-Chi and Bulma stare in shock and bewilderment, but neither one of them could match the surprise reflected on Oolong and Master Roshi's faces.

"K-Krillin," the pig murmured, he, Chiaotzu, Puar and the turtle hermit watching quietly while the words 'Eliminated' appeared on Krillin's screen, seconds before fading to black.

"What happened?" was the first question to escape Chiaotzu's lips.

The whole fight had happened so fast. He swore he'd missed something.

XXX

Now making his way towards the enormous tower he could see sitting on the horizon across the desert, Doskoi was making cracking progress. In spite of the scorching heat bathing his immense girth and wafting off of the sand underneath his feet, the man remained perfectly unfazed by the close to unbearable conditions enveloping him. Being a martial artist and a warrior in his own right, the wrestler knew he had to remain calm and collected, even in the face of great adversity.

Unfortunately, there was nothing he could do to stop the sweat from squeezing out of the pores all over his body as he ambled across the sand dunes, the heat reaching him physically even if his mind didn't register to his surroundings. The man soldiered on, regardless of the invisible obstacle.

Leaving deep footprints in his wake, the man started making his way down another steep slope. However, just as Doskoi was about to reach another incline, the big man failed to notice a sinkhole open up behind him and a hand stick up out of the ground. It was only when he felt a presence appear behind him did he actually respond and spun around.

"Who goes there?!

The second he did so, the sumo wrestler felt a hand clamp over his throat and his body get lifted off of the ground. Gasping in horror, Doskoi began kicking and thrashing about wildly to try and shake himself out of the vice now crushing down on his windpipe. Exclamations of shock muffled by a lack of air, the poor human male continued to beat at the arm holding him several feet off the floor until, after a full minute of fruitless struggling, Doskoi breathed his last.
Body going limp, the sumo wrestler was then unceremoniously dropped to the ground and the assailant responsible for his swift demise turned towards the camera hovering behind him.

XXX

The audience gasped in horror when they saw the alien contender turn to face them. As soon as he did, instead of seeing the friendly, painted face of one of the intergalactic competitors they were promised, the spectators got the shock of their lives when they saw a blue skinned monster of a man with pointy ears, an orange Mohawk, beard, a purple vest, golden earrings and a wicked grin glare towards the lens.

People left and right immediately rose out of their seats in fear and, when the camera panned down to the lifeless Doskoi at his feet, the crowd started to scream.

"Murderer!"

"He killed one of the competitors!"

"Doskoi's dead!"

"What the hell is this?!"

Questions flew in from all sides uncontested and with the appearance of the two new alien competitors to the event hanging in the air people immediately began to realize that something terrible has happened. Chi-Chi and Bulma recognized the danger, as did Baby Trunks, who started to whimper in his mother's arms while she held him close to her cest.

The woman tasked with protecting him made certain to cover her son's eyes so that he didn't see the 'thing' that was now leering at the camera.

Videl on the other hand, who was observing the monitor intently, narrowed her once startled gaze into a glare as a bead of sweat ran down the side of her face.

"W-Who the hell is that?" the girl asked herself, jaw clenching as she looked upon the face of a man who was definitely not one of her father's students in costume. "What the heck's going on here?" Her thoughts were soon drowned out by the cries and exclamations of the thousands of people in the coliseum.

The commotion became so bad in fact that the screams managed to filter out of the dome and enter the courtyards sitting outside the structure, which quickly drew the attention of Tien and Yamcha who, only moments ago, had been enjoying a couple of drinks following their decisive defeats in the opening stages of the tournament.

Heads perking up, their eyes quickly trained towards the stadium.

"What was that?" a baffled Yamcha asked.

XXX

Wandering through the checkered landscape of giant toys and oversized bedroom antiquities, Gohan gleefully admired the off-colored weirdness and oddity of his surroundings. While it certainly wasn't the most extravagant of settings he could have landed in for sure, it certainly was the most interesting.

Hopping over a large pile of plush animals and building blocks, the young Saiyan then had his gaze drawn skywards when he spotted a couple of balloons floating down towards him.

Feeling curious, Gohan reached up and poked one. The thin sheen making up the inflated ball of air popped the moment his finger made contact, drawing a playful laugh from the young hybrid. "Cool."

His joy was short-lived however.

Spotting a shadow underneath him, the demi-Saiyan's eyes widened in alarm before his gaze shot upwards. The moment he looked, the young fighter had but a split second to leap out of the way before an enormous alphabet block came crashing into the ground where he'd been standing, splitting the floor with its impact.

"Gah! What the?"

Yelping in surprise, the raven haired boy began back flipping across his playground wilderness as more and more enormous toys came cascading down around him. Every impact was marked by an earthshaking tremor and a cloud of smoke, a process that continued on for several seconds until the young warrior landed atop a windup robot directly in front of an enormous, analogue clock with golden rims.

Taking a defensive stance, Gohan then spotted the cause for the sudden rain of toys. Eyes narrowing seriously, the demi-Saiyan spotted a strangely dressed, little blue man wearing golden jewelry, white slacks, a red jacket with golden buckles, and a purple turban, float down from the ceiling above to leer at him.

The person suspending themselves upside-down in front of the young warrior puzzled Gohan at first. But then, just as they were facing each other down, the gold pieces on the person's uniform suddenly started to glow a hot yellow and, upon throwing his hands forward, the alien began producing an orange demonic aura from his body.

Sensing something foul, the demi-Saiyan then jumped when he heard the hands of the clock behind him spin wildly before flying off of their host like rockets, prompting the boy to take evasive action. Jumping back a few hundred feet, Gohan assumed a horse riding stance atop a large drum and, with a yell of effort, fired up his ki. His blue aura exploded around him just in time to form a barrier, which blocked the two giant clock hands attempting to skewer him from both sides. His energy shield filed them down to nothing before he dropped it moments later.

Hearing his opponent give an impish giggle, the raven haired Saiyan held a hand out to him in alarm. "Hey! What are you trying to do? Kill me?" the young hybrid asked.

The blue skinned man snickered once again and held out his hands, "You catch on really quick, speck." With a quiet yell, red energy and electricity began zapping off of his body, the bolts chopping away at their surroundings in a storm.

Recoiling in surprise, Gohan then watched on as the cheerful toy wonderland surrounding him melted away, revealing a densely forested area with gigantic mushrooms growing all around him. As soon as the landscape's transformation was complete, the half-Saiyan quickly realized he must've been trapped inside of an illusion and quickly threw his game face on.

Gohan fixed his best glare upon the man still suspended upside-down in front of him.

"Alright. You've got my attention." The young half-Saiyan then assumed a fighting stance. "Who are you?"
The little alien snickered, "I am Bujin. And now... you're going to die!" A split second later, a current of lightning shot out of his forehead and flew towards his opponent, who managed to avoid it by leaping into the air.

The explosion that followed almost took out the entire mountain behind him.

XXX

As the crowds in the stadium started to flee, terrified at the sight of the aliens now popping up all over the monitors, X.S Cash and his family remained held up in their skybox. Watching the chaos unfolding down below, the billionaire magnate clenched his fists and shook his head, completely baffled by what he was witnessing.

"This is getting out of hand," his wife spoke up from behind, squatting down to comfort their frightened son.

"What a fiasco!" Mr. Cash shouted, spittle flying from his mouth as he rounded on his assistant. "I want an explanation for this immediately!"

The man with the slicked back hair and suit pointed at the television screen in front of him, "These are not the fighters that were scheduled!" He then turned to his boss anxiously. "I've never seen these creatures in my life! They're supposed to be friendly extraterrestrials. Hercule's boys dressed up in costumes! I wouldn't book something like this. These things are the real deal!"

"Gah! We have to do something to bring this back under control!" With the defeat of one of the finalists and the death of another, the wealthiest man in the world quickly realized that there was only one man capable of stopping these monsters and rounded on the guards he had stationed at the door. "Where is Mr. Satan?! We need the Champ out here, on the double!"

As the men up in the penthouse began scurrying about like headless chickens, down in the sea of horrified spectators, Yamcha and Tien nudged their way through the masses and into the crowded arena. Stopping for a moment to look up at the monitors, where they spotted the fallen Doskoi and saw Gohan engaging a third alien across his battle zone, the two men quickly leapt up onto the pyramid and into the two new pods that'd been stationed there.

Once the cockpits were closed, the two warriors shot off at high speed down the tracks and disappeared into the tunnels.

XXX

Strolling through the field of wild flowers, aware of the roving camera following close behind and watching his every action, Trunks continued his slow trek across the battle zone until a series of chipmunk-like squeaks drew him to a stop. Crouching down in the long grass to investigate the sound, the young man smiled at the small, pink creature that appeared from the vegetation to greet him. Fluffy, cute, with a pair of antenna sticking up out of its head, it was an animal the time traveling warrior had never seen before.

The critter came up to sniff him. But just as Trunks was reaching out to give it a pet, it darted out of sight. At the exact same time, the demi-Saiyan's senses picked up something dangerous and fast moving, a sensation that drew the man's attention over his shoulder.

A red light appearing behind him, the lavender haired Saiyan leapt out of the way in time to avoid a ball of fiery red energy, which punched an enormous crater in the spot he'd been kneeling. Landing out of range, Trunks dropped into a stance and fixed his gaze in the direction the attack had come from.

Spoting a distant oak, the demi-Saiyan quickly made out a large, blue-skinned man with pointy ears, orange spiky hair, and wearing a purple headband, yellow boots, black jacket and jewelry lying contentedly across a branch with his hand pointed towards him. He was also armed with a large sword, a sight that set off several alarm bells in Trunks's head.

Upon looking the swashbuckling newcomer over, the half-Saiyan snarled and decided to give his attacker a piece of his mind.

"Watch where you point that thing, I might get the wrong idea! We may be fighting but this is still a tournament! No killing allowed!" the time-traveler snapped.

Scoffing, the blue-skinned assailant suddenly sprang out of the tree and, in a blur of motion, appeared directly above Trunks. With a roar, the attacker threw a right cross straight down at the demi-Saiyan, only to see the boy slip around it and counter with an immediate three-quarter uppercut from behind. However, the second the lavender haired fighter let his attack fly, he suddenly had his arm caught by his strangely dressed target who, after trapping the stunned Trunks, picked him up and shoulder-tossed him across the field.

Managing to course correct, Trunks landed on both his feet and slid across the ground to a stop. He then looked up in shock, "Whoa! What the hell are you?!"

Charging at his target, the blue warrior threw a flying spin kick that Trunks ducked and responded with a right back kick, which his opponent quickly checked. In a flash, the half-Saiyan then leapt at the man with a roundhouse kick, only for the swordsman to slip under it and switch places, before the hybrid came back at him with a yell and a jumping knee to the face. In a flash, the orange-haired fighter managed to block the knee with a quick draw of his sword, a blow that impacted against the shaft of metal with a resounding clang.

When both fighters glared at one another, the grinning outsider chuckled, "Someone not to be trifled with, boy!" He then threw Trunks off of him and, unsheathing his weapon completely and bringing it up with both hands, sliced across at his target with a decapitating strike.

Dodging at the last second so that only a couple strands of his hair were shaved off, the demi-Saiyan backed pedaled. He then leapt into the air to avoid another slash from his opponent, before landing and dashing off in another direction in time to dodge a third thrust. Once the brief exchange was over, both warriors then began sprinting alongside one another across the field of flowers, a trek which eventually led them into the shallows of the lake.

Cackling, the orange haired alien sprinted ahead and cut his opponent off, leading to the two of them squaring off knee deep in water.

Trunks, taking a defensive position, took a moment to analyze the sword his opponent was wielding. While its design was elegant and its size was definitely impressive; the weapon, for all its gold plating and decorations, didn't have a cutting edge. In fact, the sword functioned more like an epee than a saber, which explained why he didn't slice his leg open when he rammed his knee into it.

Upon sizing one another up, the alien pirate gave the young man a smirk and slid his weapon back into its scabbard. Once his weapon was sheathed, the man tensed, balled his fists, and began focusing his energy, which took the form of all the gold pieces of jewelry on him lighting up like torches. Gritting his teeth, the alien began what Trunks suspected was a very painful transformation as all of the muscles on his body began to inflate and the ki around him began to generate ripples across the water. A few moments of intense concentration later, the warrior then threw his arms up and gave a howl, a blast of energy producing a funnel of water that twisted around him.

When the vortex settled back into the lake seconds later, the alien reappeared, only… he wasn't blue anymore. That much was obvious on first glance.

Not only had the guy's entire frame bulked up, but the transformation had also turned his hair blood red, shredded his black jacket, leaving a red sash across his chest, and caused his ki to jump several levels. The sight of the now hulking swashbuckler had Trunks recoil in shock.

"Who the heck is this guy?"

The now significantly larger alien grinned, "Introductions. I am Gokuha. A pleasure to make your acquaintance."

The time traveling warrior frowned back at him defiantly, "Trunks. And that's all you're getting out of me, pal!"
"Oh no!"

OOO

(The Central Battle Zone)

A series of explosions racked the buildings of the city outskirts making up the exterior section of the final battle zone. Smoke and debris flying up into the air and following a straight line, like a flameless napalm strike had just been mounted against the town, the hotel at the edge of the river suddenly collapsed in on itself when Gokuha came blasting out of its walls with Trunks's head in his grip.

Rocketing up into the air, the green-skinned alien let out a cry of war as he then took the hapless demi-Saiyan and dove towards a nearby bridge, plowing his opponent's face straight into its road. Destroying the causeway, the pair then disappeared underneath the water in a series of depth-charge like splashes, which the alien continued to drag his opponent through for several seconds. Moments later, the lavender haired warrior managed to free himself from the titan's grip and shot out of the river, leaping across the rooftops of the city and beginning to dive back down to ground level feet first.

While in the middle of his descent however, the building in front of Trunks shuddered violently, before the hulking form of Gokuha came bursting out of its wall and clothes lined the unsuspecting Saiyan in the neck, sending him through several more buildings. When the lavender haired warrior exploded out the side of the fifth one, Gokuha seemingly teleported above him and kicked the man towards the ground, sending him bouncing along the main street. Trunks's form eventually rolled to a painful stop, leaving the man splayed out on his front and groaning in pain.

Landing several feet behind the boy, the smirking alien approached him, drawing his sword and pointing its tip at the Z-fighter's back.

"You're beaten. Surrender!" The man was confident at his victory.

Waiting for a response, Gokuha watched as his opponent started to push himself up, struggling to get onto his hands and knees. His smile fading, the alien then spat and, taking his sword up into a two-handed grip, gritted his teeth and roared, "FINE!" He then thrust straight down at the hapless fighter, aiming to impale him.

Sensing the attack, Trunks's eyes widened and he powered up, his golden aura exploding around him when he jumped to Super Saiyan almost instantaneously. The second he did so, he spun around and parried the incoming blade with his arm, locking the pair in a heated grappling match. Caught completely by surprise, Gokuha then began trying to force his weapon through his foe, while his opponent bit and held his ground with all the strength he could muster.

Their energy blasting off of them in waves, Trunks snarled, "Never underestimate a Super Saiyan, punk!" And with that, the blade pressing against his forearm shattered, sending the tip of it spiraling into a wall.

Stunned, Gokuha was just about to pull away when, in the blink of an eye, the golden haired warrior in front of him plowed his fist straight through his chest like a lance.

His fist exploding out the other end, Trunks held his position while his opponent spewed up blood and hunched over the smaller warrior's shoulder in shock. Body quivering for several moments with a few choking sounds escaping the swordsman's gaping mouth, the time traveling Saiyan then ripped his arm out of the warrior's chest and allowed him to tip over. The alien's body crashed to the ground with a dull thud, where he lay dead.

As Trunks stood there, catching his breath and looking down at his defeated opponent, wondering where in the world he'd come from, the demi-Saiyan then sensed a second presence appear. Gasping at the enormous flux of ki, the boy spun around, only to have his vision blinded by the blue tail end of a coat, before he was unceremoniously kicked in the face.

The force of the blow was so immense, it not only caused a shockwave that split the ground, it also knocked Trunks out in an instant, his body hitting the ground hard.

OOO

(Meanwhile – Capsule Corp)

Bolting upright from his bed, Vegeta gave a gasp of shock when he sensed something amiss in the air.

Having subconsciously been keeping an eye on the Intergalactic Tournament taking place many miles away with his senses, the man was able to monitor the progress of all the competition's major players; namely the Z-fighters. Things had been going well to this point, until he felt his son's ki skyrocket and plummet in the span of a few seconds, before being completely overshadowed by an energy level that was not only enormous, but incredibly foul.

"T-Trunks?"

That was no ordinary energy level. That was something else.

Something dangerous.

Gritting his teeth, the man turned towards his son's sword, which he could see propped up against the wall.

"Something's wrong."

OOO

While dodging the rain of car-sized boulders being thrown at him by his unusually powerful foe, Gohan attempted to put some distance between him and his adversary. However, just as he was preparing to up the ante a little and give his enemy a taste of his real power, a flash of ki suddenly rushed through his head in the direction of another battle zone, stopping the demi-Saiyan for but a moment.

It was unreal. The energy level was so massive and so potent that it was impossible for the young warrior to miss.

Gasping, Gohan's eyes snapped over his shoulder, "Who's there?" Reaching out with his senses, he noticed seconds later that Trunks' energy level had dropped considerably, telling the boy that his friend had been taken out.

Clenching his fists, the fighter quickly glanced back at Bujin, whom he saw float down from above atop an enormous rock, surrounded by a malicious orange aura. The little alien giggled when he too picked up the issue plaguing his young opponent.

After several seconds of consideration of both his foe and the foreign ki signature over the horizon, Gohan made the critical decision to dispense of this fight and to go help his friends.
Levitating off of the ground, the spiky haired warrior then turned in midair and took off towards the other battle zones at full speed. Sensing his opponent flying after him, Gohan made sure to keep one eye on him and the other eye straight ahead, as he then began tracking down whatever the hell had taken out Trunks.

"Don't worry guys! I'm coming!"

---

Earth is in grave danger!" King Kai spoke, glancing back at Goku to see that he, Bubbles and Gregory had also gotten to their feet. After the events they'd just witnessed, it was impossible for any of them to remain seated.

The spiky haired Saiyan stepped forward anxiously, "From what?"

"You mean who. Bojack," the blue-skinned overseer of the Northern Quadrant replied cryptically.

Gulping at the nervous glance the man gave him, Goku pressed on, "B-Bojack? Who's that?"

"A dark demon of the worst sort; psychotic, unstable… filled with malice and rage. Long ago, he tried to destroy every galaxy within the Dormideous Sector and attempted to conquer the core star systems between the four quadrants," King Kai informed, a bead of sweat running down the side of his head as he filled Goku in on what he didn't know about this new enemy. "He and his gang rampaged across the galaxy, wrecking everything in their path."

"Sounds like King Piccolo," Goku remarked, thinking back to his encounter with the evil Namekian all those years ago.

King Kai nodded, "Yes, but far more powerful… even stronger than Cell when you first fought him." The trainer then looked gravely over the horizon of Snake Way and watched as the sky seemingly darkened as he slowly recounted his story. "He has an insatiable appetite for genocide, even going so far as to wipe out the entire population of his home planet. Now, just like the Saiyans, he and his group are some of the only remaining Hera-seijin's left in the universe. Over ten thousand years ago, we took it upon ourselves to stop him. All four of us kais worked together and sealed Bojack within a star at the edge of the Northern Quadrant."

"He's trapped in a star?" Goku asked in amazement.

This question had King Kai pace around, before looking back at the Saiyan uneasily, "Not anymore. You set him free when you destroyed my planet in your battle against Cell. The four point seal was broken and allowed Bojack and his gang to escape. Now he's returned to finish what he started… to conquer the universe." The man's glasses flashed as he then looked up once again, this time with fear evident on his face, "And it looks like his first target is planet earth."

In spite of this grave news, Goku was unshaken. In fact, a smile broke out on his face as he regarded his trainer's information with confidence, "Then he's already defeated. My son will stop him."

---

Exiting his battle zone into another, Gohan soon found himself flying over a desolate landscape of ancient ruins and rundown buildings almost reminiscent of Ancient Greece. Ignoring the impressive layout of the field, the oddly colored sky above and the powerful alien following close behind, the young half-Saiyan gritted his teeth as he sensed he was finally approaching the point where he could sense the other powerful ki signatures.

"Krillin. Trunks…"

It wasn't long before he arrived at a ruined mansion with a central courtyard. Suspending himself in the air, the demi-Saiyan spotted the unmistakable forms of Trunks and Krillin lying in an untidy heap in the middle of the quad. Concerned for their wellbeing, Gohan super speeded down to them and skidded to a stop directly beside their bodies, where he quickly began checking for signs of life.

Relieved when he sensed that they were still alive, the boy began to gently shake them, "Trunks. Wake up." He then patted the short fighter lying beneath the unconscious time-traveler, "Come on, Krillin."

Just as he was in the process of trying to rouse them from their slumbers, the boy sensed the presence of his opponent land behind him. Glancing over his shoulder to see the short, turban wearing Bujin grinning at him, the boy then looked up towards a nearby balcony to see two more figures standing there. On the left he saw a beautiful young woman with curly orange hair and on the right a large alien of the same species with a Mohawk and a vest. Both of them were staring down at him and both of them had smug smiles in play.

"So much energy," Gohan thought, a bead of sweat running down the side of his head. "Their power levels are in the same league as mine." To be more precise, they were about as strong as those Cell Juniors that'd attacked and tormented his friends, only less concentrated, making it difficult to get an exact reading.

This pretty much told the Saiyan that these guys were no longer afraid of hiding.

The tall alien with the goatee and punk-rocker hair style grinned, "Hey kid. This is a nice planet you've got here."

"Very picturesque… and so filled with life," the woman spoke up, sitting down on one of the railings and flicking her hair back elegantly. "Are you the guardian of this sector?"

Frowning, the half-Saiyan stood up, "That depends on who's asking."

The boy then became aware of the sound of chains jangling and footsteps approaching, which drew his glare towards the doorway standing between the two invaders. Eyeing it suspiciously, Gohan's expression slowly transformed into one of shock when, from out of the shadows of the dilapidated building, he saw another alien emerge. Dressed in a long blue trench coat with golden buckles, a black top, white pants, red sash and boots, with a bandana holding down his bushy orange hair, the newcomer was also embroidered with jewelry and had a hideous scar running across his face. While slightly shorter than the alien on his left, the man was no less the most imposing of the group.

A chuckle escaped the alien's lips, "I think that would be me, boy."

His grin wasn't just the most menacing of his entourage, but Gohan could sense nothing but bad mojo coming off of him too. Clenching his fists, the demi-Saiyan held his ground beside his two unconscious comrades.
"His energy is amazing," the boy murmured while narrowing his eyes. "Incredible. This one... his power level is even greater than Cell's when I first fought him."

Just as he was beginning to square off against the alien boss and his cohorts, two pods suddenly flew overhead and from them, Tien and Yamcha descended to the ground. Landing on either side of Gohan, the two adult males glare across at the creatures responsible for taking out their teammates.

"You murderers," Tien snarled, unable to stop the beads of sweat that appeared on his head, "You killed the intergalactic fighters."

Snickering, the turban wearing alien got down to one knee and placed a hand over his chest, at the same time his other two companions did as well.

"Those so called 'fighters' were trespassing. Earth belongs to my master now," Bujin chirped, a statement that drew an arrogant chuckle from the group's leader up high.

Gohan's frown deepened, "Oh yeah?"

"Not while we're still breathing," Yamcha shot back, prompting the two aliens flanking their boss to rise to their feet and come to his defense.

The big one raised his hand and gestured grandly to the earthlings, "Master Bojack has no equal. He has journeyed across this far-reaching universe uncontested and undefeated."

"Many powerful warriors have fallen before the might of our master," the woman continued without skipping a beat. "All those who've dared to challenge his will have ended up crushed underneath his heel and turned to ash."

"Master is not patient. You would be wise to stand down," Bujin exclaimed from behind, drawing the trio's attention towards the short alien. When they looked at him, they saw the little cretin grin, "Or better yet... kneel."

"We'll pass thanks!" Yamcha shouted as both he and Tien dropped into fighting forms.

Their stances prompting the trio of alien bodyguards to change their tune, the two Z-fighters quickly picked their targets. Once they were selected, the pair took off and went in for the attack.

It happened in an instant. Faster than any adversary had ever dealt with him before, the second Tien chased after Bujin through the ruins of the building, he ended up struck from behind and kicked into a wall by his pint-sized opponent, where he was buried under a heavy pile of rubble. Yamcha fared no better against his quarry either, attempting to strike out at the woman and instead wound up getting cut down from all sides and slide-kicked across the ground, where he found himself skidding into the pile to join Trunks and Krillin.

In less than three seconds, it was over.

Gohan, shocked at how handily the aliens had dispatched his friends, looked down at the fallen Yamcha and then across at Tien. Seeing the two of them lying in unconscious wrecks where they had fallen, the young half-Saiyan clenched his fists in anger and glared up towards the still smirking Bojack.

His charcoal eyes locking with the murderous ones of the alien conqueror, Gohan felt his anger swell.
"Bring it," Gohan said as golden beams of light began shooting up from the ground around him before his body was lit up by a golden aura, which spiked up his hair, flashed it gold and turned his eyes teal.

Sensing the demi-Saiyan's ki climb to an incredible level had Bojack raise an eyebrow. "Interesting." After taking a moment to gauge the youngster's power, the demon then turned his attention to his subordinates, "Zangya, Bujin, Bido… take him…"

Smiling as each of their names were spoken in turn, the orange haired aliens then leapt from their master's flanks and flew at the young Super Saiyan from all sides. Responding to their sudden maneuvers, Gohan blasted backwards in the form of a yellow blur and elbowed an approaching Bujin in the face, smashing him through the ruined building's wall. Upon dispersing of his first foe, Gohan then sprang into the air and flew through the upper part of the barrier while at the same time being pursued by the other two.

Chasing the half-Saiyan through the hole and into the air above the village, the large Bido let out a yell and threw a left hook at the boy. Gohan caught the punch and, after grabbing the man's forearm, used the brute's momentum to spin him around and throw him back through the wall he'd come, taking out what was left of it.

Avoiding her teammate, who smashed into the ground along with a shower of rubble, Zangya picked up speed and rocketed towards her foe with a smile.

Taking aim, Gohan threw his hands forward and with a gutsy yell, fired a large blue ball of energy towards the approaching woman.

Responding to the threat, Zangya gritted her teeth and smacked the attack away with a shout, sending the ball of energy curling through the air before it detonated half a kilometer away, wiping out an entire block of the rundown city. Upon which she then flew up at the demi-Saiyan and opened up on him with a flurry of attacks, the pair beginning a fierce exchange of machinegun blows that they parried and executed at lightning speed.

Feeling the ground tremor from the colossal explosion, Bido took that as his cue and, marking his target, crossed his arms over his chest and threw them forward. With a mighty bellow, he unleashed a torrent of thin red energy beams from his fingers, which homed in on their target.

Throwing a kick and blocking a punishing left hook from her opponent, the fiercely battling Zangya smirked when she sensed her teammate's attack approaching from behind. Disengaging in time to avoid her opponent's roundhouse kick, the woman straightened up, folded her arms across her chest and, with a playful giggle, twirled in a graceful backward maneuver, her hair bellowing like a cape as the barrage of red beams curled around her lithe form and flew towards her opponent. With a shout, Gohan cocked his fist back and smacked all of the beams away, causing them to fly past him and slam into an invisible barrier.

When they exploded, they punched an enormous hole through the wall dividing their battle zone from another, the fragments of sky breaking away to reveal a secondary city.

The trio of aliens quickly forming up behind one another, Zangya and her team then scattered and flew at Gohan from all sides. Unable to mark a target in time, the blonde crossed both his arms over his face and took the three simultaneous punches all at once, a loud shockwave ringing out that rattled the entire stadium. The aliens ended up tackling the boy and slamming him straight through another camouflaged barrier directly behind him, pushing him into the central city battle zone Trunks had defeated Gokuha earlier.
Flying into the open, Gohan managed to throw his three attackers off of him and continued flying backwards in a hasty retreat, positioning himself over the downtown area several hundred feet below. Eyes darting about, he watched his opponents fly into formation once again and, one after the other, make a B-line straight for his position. Responding in kind, the half-Saiyan charged, ducking the chop Zangya threw at him, slamming his hands down on Bido's head when he swung in with an over flourished right overhand and flipping over him, and leaping over the flying kick Bujin followed with immediately afterwards. Soon he'd passed right by all three of them and flew off, forcing the aliens that'd overshot their target to course correct and fly after him.

Gaining enough distance, Gohan turned in midair and slowed, allowing the trio to catch up for a third time. Now that he'd adjusted for their speed and combinations, he was ready for them.

Marking the boy, Bujin, Bido and Zangya closed in on him from his right, left and front respectively, and once they were in range, they attacked. Without even blinking, Gohan blocked the chop from his right, the hook from his left, and checked the kick from the front, the blows slamming into him one after the other with concussive force. Their attacks stopped, the trio looked up at the boy's unflinching gaze in shock, before the demi-Saiyan threw his arms out and blasted them away with a shockwave and a yell, scattering them throughout the city's airspace.

Managing to stop themselves, the three mercenary aliens glared back at their opponent, whom they saw was eyeing each of them carefully.

Zangya smirked in surprise, "My, my. This one knows how to fight."

Responding to the remark, Gohan threw his arms and legs out and powered up, his golden aura exploding around him and pulsing at a high frequency. After gathering enough energy, the half-Saiyan took aim and fired three simultaneous golden blasts at his opponents, the attacks flying at the trio at high speed. Zangya responded quickly and backhanded the shot away, causing it to collide with a distant hotel complex and disintegrating the building in a massive, dome shaped explosion. Bujin effectively kicked his away and sent it into the streets, leveling a block of flats, while Bido took his against a cross-arm block and dispelled it with a yell.

However, the moment he looked back at his group's target, the big alien suddenly saw the boy right in front of him and flying at him with a kick. Before he could even gasp, Gohan slammed his leg right into the alien's chest, causing spit to fly out of Bido's mouth.

It seemed like a clean hit. But as it turned out, despite the speed and force of the attack the invader had in fact, at the very last second, managed to catch the boy's extended leg with his hand and, grinning roguishly, wrapped an arm around the boy's body and began to crush the kid against his chest. He pressed the kid's leg in at the same time, squashing him in from both directions.

Yelping when the man began to apply unwarranted pressure on him, Gohan slammed both hands into the guy's shoulders to push him away. But then, sensing danger, the boy's eyes snapped over his shoulder to see Bujin flying right at his head with a kick of his own.

"Hold still!"

With a shout of surprise, Gohan threw his body back and swayed under the kick, which ended up slamming Bido in the face and knocking the brute back. The unintended blow managed to free the Super Saiyan from his opponent's hold and allowed the boy to drop altitude, while the star struck Bido fumed.

"Watch it, you moron!"
Bujin freaked out and waved at his teammate apologetically, "Sorry! Sorry! I wasn't aiming for you!"

While Gohan glared up at the two bickering aliens, he suddenly sensed another incoming attack and spun around. Reacting quickly, he threw his hands up just in time to catch the red blast thrown at him by Zangya, which slowly began to push him down to the roof of one of the apartment buildings far below. As the stream of angry red energy continued to painfully grind into his palms, causing excess sparks to fly off in all directions, the Super Saiyan hybrid gave a loud growl and, with a shout of effort, hurled the blast skywards, straight up towards Bujin and Bido.

When the two comrades finally returned their attention to their quarry, the duo had to take immediate action to avoid their teammate's deflected attack, which tore right past them like a missile. The second they dodged it, it nosedived and struck a distant clock tower, nuking the entire block in the form of a red, exploding sphere, reducing all the buildings within the kilometer blast radius to ash.

As the trembling earth and explosion faded, Gohan took a defensive stance and held his ground, watching as Zangya and Bujin dropped down from the sky to land on either side of him. The moment they did, they began attacking him in a blur of movement, fists and kicks flying at him from both sides and forcing the young Super Saiyan to dodge and block. He did well in parrying a majority of the attacks, even retaliating with a few elbows and shots of his own, forcing them to back off.

While he fought on, Gohan's eyes caught sight of Bido circling him and his opponents from a distance, obviously looking for an opening. Eventually, after a solid streak of successfully fending off his two attackers, the blonde ended up taking a knee to the stomach from his opportunistic female adversary. The blow was able to lift him into the air long enough for Bujin to drive a hammer blow into his back, which sent him into the roof of the hotel and crashing through every single floor on the way down. He ended up slamming into ground a second later, but not before blasting out every single window and causing the entire interior of the structure to implode.

Smirking, both Zangya and Bujin retreated, allowing Bido to take position above the smoking complex. Bringing his hand up, the large alien fighter then produced a pinkish red energy sphere above his palm, which crackled and pulsed when he fed ki into it. Once it'd achieved form and stability, he hurled it straight down into the building, watching it plough through every floor before detonating.

A red, dome-like explosion engulfed the entire neighborhood, practically nuking the entire city while the three aliens responsible for the destruction hovered safely out of reach. Watching the attack burn away and an enormous smoking crater two kilometers wide emerge from the blast, the group then saw a golden flash shoot out from the ground outside of the crater, dart down the streets and stop out in the open.

"Tough little runt." Clicking his tongue in annoyance at having missed, Bido dove after the half-Saiyan, followed closely by his two companions.

XXX

The audience members that'd remained behind in the stadium to watch the events unfold on the monitors, hoping above all hope that their great savior, Mr. Satan, would step in to take down the alien invaders that'd shanghaied their tournament, were astonished by what they were seeing.

Through the automated cameras roaming around the various battle zones, the people were able to get a full, unobstructed view of the competitor Son Gohan, coming to the aid of his fallen comrades and facing down the band of aliens terrorizing the grounds. After seeing two of the other preliminary contestants get taken out when they attempted to help the young fighter, they then saw the boy go through a remarkable transformation that turned his hair gold, before engaging three of the aliens in a fierce battle across the island.

His duel against them took them from the ancient city site into the central battle zone directly beneath the main stadium, where they proceeded to fight a war comparable to what the entire world witnessed at the Cell Games.

Clamoring and staring up at the screens, unblinking, the audience had to brace themselves as explosions capable of laying waste to whole countries rocked the entire island to its core. For half of the time, the camera was able to capture Son Gohan's struggle against the invaders as he fought through the skies and from rooftop to rooftop at blinding speeds, before vanishing into a dimension of travel that the human eye just couldn't even keep up with. It was mind boggling, and the entire audience was gripping their seats, wondering whether or not this was a trick.

Videl on the other hand was no fool. Body trembling as she watched the events play out, the raven haired girl refused to tear her eyes away. Even when the screen blasted the spectators with dazzling light at the outset of each explosion, the daughter of the Great Hercule Satan didn't even flinch, as she watched the most amazing thing she'd ever seen in her life.

"Don't give up, Gohan," Videl thought, clenching her jaw tightly as she saw the boy dash across the city and out into the open, waiting for his opponents to follow. "You can beat them! I know you can!" She cheered inwardly, giving the demi-Saiyan all the support he needed.

There was no doubt in her mind now; Gohan was the boy that'd fought against that monster Cell all those weeks ago. Martial artists battling in the skies, his remarkable display of strength, their speed, their lightning fast techniques, and the blasts of energy they exuded from their bodies... it all fit.

With this realization now in her grasp and with even more questions rampaging through her head, all Videl could do now was watch and pray the boy made it through alive.

The last thing she wanted to see was her newfound friend dying on live television...

XXX

Crouching down on the outskirts of the city, a very bruised and battered Gohan breathed out a sigh of exhaustion, catching his breath while at the same time surveying the destruction that'd been wrought to the area. "These guys are as every bit as tough as Cell was. I don't think I'll be able to beat them three on one." Damn it if he wasn't going to do his best though, because no matter what it took he was going to defeat these guys.

His eyes snapped upwards when he heard the sound of approaching jets, but were in fact his opponents breaking the sound barrier. "Here goes everything!"

Leaping to his feet, Gohan watched as the plume of smoke that'd been formed from the last attack broke apart and his three alien opponents come swooping in. Strafing low across the city, the aliens bore down on the youngster with all sights locked onto the Super Saiyan and, in a matter of seconds, were right on top of him.

Parrying the opening straight from Zangya, Gohan then ducked the wide hook thrown by Bido before gripping the man's arm and slamming a kick across his face. He then bounced that same foot off of the man's head and slammed it into Zangya's in turn. The demi-Saiyan did this repeatedly; spring backing his kicks between his two aliens until he dropped to the ground and sweep kicked both in the legs so that they lost balance. Once done, he then back-flipped to avoid Bujin dropping a heel kick from above.

The second he landed and his opponents recovered, all hell broke loose. Just like how his father had battled all of Turles's men all those years ago, Gohan began fighting all three of them at once in a running battle across the wide open, deserted prairie. Like a pinball, he shot between his three opponents flying in left and right, exchanging flurries of blows before beginning to backpedal at high speed. His three adversaries pursued him relentlessly, chopping out at him with barrage after barrage of blurred punches and kicks while the boy defended against them with a blur of hand movements. Gohan's eyes darted between all three as he expertly deflected and fended off their attacks.

Managing to catch Zangya's fist, he spun and threw her into Bujin, allowing him to escape and begin fighting them in a scattered fashion across the ruined clearing. His form blurred out into an orange bolt, skipping from hill to hill, before inevitably returning to the city rooftops.

While explosions and blurred figures continued darting across the city in various directions, the imposing figure of the group's leader Bojack appeared atop the tallest tower and watched on with a smug grin in play. Arms folded and coat waving on the wind, the man chuckled when he saw Gohan deflect one of Bido's blasts with an energy ball of his own, before hurling it into his chest and sending the alien into a building.

"Impressive. His level of skill is far more advanced than I'd hoped. This should be fun," the demon remarked in a condescending tone of voice.

Dodging several massive cement blocks being hurled at him by Bujin, Gohan sprang out of the narrow corridor of the alleyway he was in and onto the roof of another apartment building. As soon as he landed, the boy had to block attacks from both sides when Bido and Bujin appeared out of the air, and began pressuring him with another vicious assault.

Parrying dozens of punches and kicks, the wily young fighter then took several staggering hits across the face and body. Brain rattled, Gohan gave a loud snarl and, with a howl of rage, he threw both hands out and unleashed two golden spheres of energy into the pair's chests. "Masenko!" The two attacks drilled into Bujin and Bido, both of them yelling out in shock before they were sent spiraling for over two kilometers through several buildings. Massive explosions occurred seconds later over the horizons, allowing Gohan to drop back down to the building and collapse to his knees.

Panting with one eye shut, he looked up to see Zangya land on the rooftop across the way, smirking at him. Gritting his teeth, the boy threw back his hand and forward. "Bakumadan!" A sharp golden blast of energy launched from his palm and flew at the girl like a lance, prompting her to act.

"It's about time we got up to the fancy moves!" the woman exclaimed, suddenly beginning to spin on the spot like a top, causing her form to blur into an orange tornado. "Beauty Trigger!" As soon as she'd gained enough momentum, a red ball of energy was flung from her spinning form and sent arcing across the gap.

The two attacks collided in midair, the blasts transforming into two battling spheres of gold and red energy, which pressed into one another like rubber balls. As they struggled, grew and started emitting bolts of multicolored lightning which tore apart the surrounding buildings and caused three to collapse, the opposing attacks then shot off in separate directions, forcing Gohan and Zangya to sway and avoid them. They then watched as their rebounded blasts struck the barriers between the battle zones on opposite ends of the map, and two enormous dome shaped explosions nuked the island, forming massive craters.

When the tremors died out, a thoroughly winded Gohan looked to see Zangya round back on him, grin and bring two fingers to her forehead like the tip of a pistol.

"Spark Laser!" A bolt of red lightning then shot from her forehead, which struck the boy full in the chest and sent him rocketing off the rooftop. The young Saiyan gave a cry of agony as he was plowed through the same crater formed by Bido's previous attack and rammed into a wall on the far side.

The impact cracking the brickwork, Gohan crashed to the floor. Coughing up blood and feeling his skin singing from the damage, the Super Saiyan forced himself to his feet and looked up. Through blurred vision, he spotted Bojack landing on the same rooftop he'd previously been on, and was shortly flanked by Zangya, Bido and Bujin, the latter two looking like they'd been run over by a heard of stampeding rhinos on fire, courtesy of his Masenko combo.

Standing up when he saw the demons leering at him from one kilometer away, Gohan took a stance, only to feel a sharp sting of pain strike him in the shoulder, which staggered him. Wincing, the boy glared back at the building, where he saw his three opponents with their fingers raised in his direction, all primed and ready.

Forming a cross arm block, Gohan was then bombardied by a barrage of fingers beams, which peppered him like machinegun fire. Tearing into his gi and hitting him all over from head to toe, the young demi-Saiyan withstood the assault for several long seconds before collapsing to his hands and knees. Bleeding from numerous puncture wounds and panting heavily, the Z-fighter then looked up through a half-lidded gaze as the fatigue of his long battle finally took its toll.

"Great," he groaned, his hair turning black as he faded out of his Super Saiyan form.

XXX

"He's in danger!" King Kai shouted, looking over his shoulder to see Goku standing there with his hand pressed against his back and a nervous look on his face.

"Gohan! Focus! Draw strength from your anger! Show them your true power!" With his mind connected to his teacher's, who had his focused on the battle going on down below, both figures could clearly see what was happening.

The demi-Saiyan had started off brilliantly and had been holding his own incredibly well, even coming close to beating them. But unfortunately, his current level of effort was not going to be enough…

XXX

Taking advantage of his target's weakened state, Bojack, charging an enormous ball of green energy between his hands, then held the sphere above his head and hurled it forward. The projectile increased in size and mass as it rocketed across the clearing, expanding to a ridiculous extent as it approached its target.

Gohan had just enough time to get to his feet and throw up a guard before the attack was right on top of him and set to engulf him completely.

But then, just when it seemed like it was over, out of nowhere a golden beam with a purple corkscrew traveling at the speed of light crashed into the side of the enormous sphere, and sent both shooting off in another direction. The attacks made landfall in another distant battle zone well out of harm's reach, where they completely wiped that part of the island off of the face of the map.

The earthquake fading, an annoyed Bojack and crew glanced in the direction the blast had come. There, standing atop a clock tower, they saw the caped form of a Namekian warrior standing there with his arms folded and eyes fixed squarely on them.

Realizing he'd been saved, Gohan looked to see who it was he had to thank and brightened up when he spotted the silhouette of his teacher in the distance. "Piccolo! Man, am I glad to see you!"

Grunting, the former guardian of the earth fixed a glare upon the gangsters standing on top of the roof. "Looks like you've found a good fight. Mind if I cut in?" With that statement, the man removed his cape and turban, and lazily tossed them away. "Party's over, fellas. It's time for you to clear out."

The newcomer's threat prompting Bojack to roll his eyes, the demon then watched on as the Namekian disappeared from his post and shot across the city rooftops at an impressive speed.

Not fast enough apparently, because the moment Piccolo appeared in front of the leader with a jab as his greeting, the alien boss effortlessly ducked the blow and kneed the Namekian in the stomach. The blow caused Piccolo to double over, leaving him wide open for a punch across the face.

Growling, the green fighter then countered with a swift kick to the demon's chest, the blow eliciting an 'oof' from the tyrant as he was thrown off the roof and sent flying into another building across the street where he crashed. The attack did shake the man up a little, but in the long run it didn't affect him at all.

Following up on his assault, Piccolo charged in, bringing his hands up to drop down on top of the leader with a hammer blow. But the moment he got in close, the demon snapped his foot up and caught Gohan's teacher in the chest, sending the Namekian warrior blasting into the sky. Recovering quickly, Piccolo charged a golden sphere of energy in his hand and tossed it, the ball scattering into dozens of smaller spheres which caved in on its target and peppered Bojack with multiple explosions.

The Namekian threw several more of these shots, bringing the entire building down in a fantastic display of destruction.

Gritting his teeth, Piccolo then picked up his opponent's signature and spun around, where he saw Bojack phase into view several stories above him and launch a ball of green energy straight down at him. Taking a defensive stance in midair, the Namekian backhanded the attack away, sending it crashing into another building. But the moment he deflected the attack, the Z-fighter realized the shooter had relocated and quickly began searching for him.

It didn't take long for Bojack to reappear. Hovering upside down behind the cloud of smoke rising from the recently collapsed building, the demon fired another energy ball straight into the Namekian's back, who spun around in time to catch it.

Feeling the attack burn into his hands as it pushed him down the street Piccolo then gave a hearty growl and tossed the sphere of energy into another suburb. This, unfortunately, left him wide open to another blast that slammed into his chest and exploded, causing him to fly through a church and out the other end.

The demon responsible for the combo chuckled, "Game over."
After slamming into a wall, which effectively stopped his momentum, the Namekian then began to plummet towards the ground.

Gohan, reacting in alarm, finished recovering from his damage, dashed across the crater and took flight, picking up speed when he saw Bojack bearing down upon his falling teacher.

"PICCOLO!"

Flying low and pulling up, the young Saiyan managed to catch his master. The moment he turned his gaze towards the clouds though, he saw Bojack bring his hand back and prepare to unleash another colossal blast of energy. The demon stopped a split second early when, all of a sudden, a glowing person teleported directly in front of him.

It only took the surprised Gohan a split second to recognize the now vestless person.

"Trunks! You're alright!," the demi-Saiyan exclaimed, breathing a sigh of relief as the bruised up, time traveling warrior in the black singlet and pants faced the planet's current threat down in his Super Saiyan state.

Hair spiked up with his golden aura fluctuating around him, Trunks set the imposing demon in his crosshairs. "Bojack! You will not take this planet!" Cupping his hands in front, the boy then unleashed a hell storm of blue energy blasts that shot towards Bojack like missiles honing in on his position.

Smirking, the demon threw his hand forward and produced an energy shield, the first dozen beams colliding with it headlong before beginning to explode one after the other. It was an impressive first wave, but the assault didn't stop there.

Trunks opened up the throttle with over a hundred energy beams, which poured out of his hands in a continuous stream, and completely decimated the entire city block in front of him. Soon enough, his target had become completely blocked out behind a screen of fire and smoke, which became the result of all the energy bombardment attempting to rip the man apart.

Soon enough, Trunks ceased his attack and lowered his hands, watching the smoke lift from the area. When it did, he soon spotted his opponent standing atop a spire of another Victorian era church and, not only was he completely unfazed by the attack, but the demon was smirking in the half-Saiyan's direction.

"Shit!" Intent on continuing the battle, Trunks blasted forward. But just as he was about to engage the leader of the group once more, he unexpectedly felt all of his momentum come to a complete stop and what felt like hundreds of tiny steel ropes wrap around his body, holding him in place.

Suspended in midair, the young male looked down in panic, wondering why he'd suddenly stopped moving. Spotting the telltale signs of what appeared to be light reflecting off of invisible wires tangled around his body, Trunks turned to see Bido and Bujin standing on the roof behind him, the latter with his hands extended towards him and the former carrying a broken metal support pillar shaped into a makeshift spear.

Realizing that it was the short one that had cast the strange energy wires that were now ensnaring him, Trunks attempted to break free. He jerked and thrashed about violently, using all his strength in an effort to remove the binds. However, as the net continued to hold and reel him in, the young man quickly found that the more he struggled, the more energy was drained from his body.

Apparently, the seals binding him not only held him in place and kept him from moving, but it also fed off of the target's energy to maintain its strength, which had the half-Saiyan cursing inwardly.
Seconds later, Trunks faded out of Super Saiyan form, a cry of agony escaping his lips as he unsuccessfully tried to break free once again.

Giggling mischievously, Bujin then nodded toward his larger companion to finish off their hapless target. It was a signal Bido was more than glad to follow up on, for the moment it was given the alien took the makeshift lance up in one hand and chucked the length of metal straight up at the time-traveler. The lance shot towards Trunks like a bullet, the young man quickly bracing for impact.

But just when it seemed like he would be run through by the projectile and killed, a flash of light, a whistle, followed by a resounding clang of metal, knocked the projectile out of the air and, at the same time, sliced through the wires binding the demi-Saiyan.

Freed of the restraints, Trunks spun around in time to catch the sword which boomeranged back toward him, as well as the scabbard that flew in immediately afterwards. The second he did, he saw the building beneath Bujin and Bido go up in a fiery explosion, knocking the two stunned aliens into the air and clogging the entire neighborhood in smoke.

Sheathing his weapon and buckling it around him, the lavender haired warrior grinned when he sensed a familiar presence enter the scene. There was only one man he knew who would ever think of making an entrance as pronounced as that.

"Father!"

Looking up from the pile of rubble where they were lying, Bujin and Bido spotted the silhouette of the individual responsible for the explosion appear within the wall of smoke. The outline of a flame style haircut and the sense of foreboding that came with it was more than enough to tell the pair that this newcomer meant business.

"Leave them to me." The smoke was then violently blown away when Vegeta powered up, his transformation to Super Saiyan producing a fierce gale and filling the entire area with a bright light that had the two fallen aliens wince. Once he was certain he'd gotten their attention, the Prince of Saiyans, with his arms folded proudly across his chest, ascended to the same level Trunks and Bojack were on.

As soon as he reached their altitude, the newcomer fixed his best glare on the would-be conqueror of their world, while at the same time sparing a glance down at the men that had nearly slain his son. The sight of the invaders had Vegeta scowl.

Landing in a nearby yard, Gohan set the wounded and unconscious Piccolo carefully on the floor. After making sure he was comfortable and that his wounds weren't fatal, the boy then looked up towards the skyline where the action was taking place.

"Vegeta?" Honestly, the last person he expected to come to their rescue after all the things that'd happened was his father's main rival and former enemy.

Today was just full of surprises.

After facing down with Bojack for a good long while, getting a scope of exactly what they were up against, Vegeta then sensed an incoming attack from below and, acting quickly, moved in time to dodge a leaping punch from the pint-sized Bujin. Gritting his teeth in irritation, the last full-blooded Saiyan left alive kicked the little imp in the head and sent him spiraling into a building, before then turning his attention to Bido, who attempted to get him from behind with a hook, only to have his wrist caught and his arm twisted behind him with a sickening crack.
"GAH! W-What the…? Hey! Let go of me!"

Shouting in pain at the arm lock and caught completely off guard, the large alien attempted to pull his way free until he heard Vegeta speak to him in a low, threatening tone of voice, "I don't have time to deal with small fry… especially ones who try to attack me from behind!" Then, without a second thought, the obviously pissed off Super Saiyan held his free hand up and, with a roar, unleashed a powerful blast at pointblank range right into Bido's back. Not making the same mistake of beating around the bush, the Saiyan Prince promptly finished the prick with an attack that went straight through the man's body and out the other side with a thunderclap.

With absolutely no way to defend himself or resist the attack, Bido had a split second to holler out in agony before his eyes rolled into the back of his head and his entire form went limp when the stream of energy faded.

"That one was from me." Holding the hapless alien up by the wrist, Vegeta momentarily glared down at the corpse. "And from my son, you trash." He then turned to Bojack, who seemed completely unfazed by the killing of one of his henchmen.

In fact, the demon looked thoroughly amused.

"Is this shit yours?" the Saiyan Prince asked, shaking the cadaver of the recently deceased Bido for extra incentive. Receiving no response, the Saiyan warrior then dropped the body and allowed it to freefall to the streets forty stories below.

The second Bido's body hit the pavement with a deafening thud Vegeta cracked his neck, cocked his hands back, and threw them forward with a yell of rage, unleashing a blast of raw blue energy straight towards the gang leader. Bojack responded immediately with a laugh and a beam of his own, the green blast colliding with the Prince's in midair and generating an explosion that shook the entire area.

The instant the blast rang out the two warriors then flew at each other and began the most intense dogfight the world had ever seen, both firing continuous blasts at one another while attempting to shoot the other out of the sky. The first building to fall succumbed to an onslaught of attacks from top to bottom when the two full-blooded aliens attempted to outstrip the other. The rest to follow were just acceptable losses, as Vegeta and Bojack darted from one structure to another engaging in a fierce shootout. Blue and green streaks of energy crisscrossed the skies of the battle zone, forming craters, crumbling buildings, and creating fissures the size of the Grand Canyon that began to split the entire region apart.

The pair actually caused more damage in the first few seconds of their fight than Gohan, Piccolo and Trunks in their entire bouts.

"I don't understand you father. You lost your will to fight ever since Goku died, but as soon as Gohan and I are in danger, here you are defending us," Mirai Trunks thought, unable to comprehend the enigma that was his old man. Perhaps it was one of those Saiyan things he never truly came to immerse himself with.

"Final Flash!" Vegeta's bellow echoed across the city when the man unleashed a colossal beam of energy at his foe down the main road. The golden blast ripped the highway apart and tore a trench all the way towards the demon standing in its path.

Gritting his teeth, Bojack wisely chose to avoid the attack and watched it streak past him, detonating over the horizon like a concentrated hydrogen bomb before responding to the attack with a second blast that slammed into the surprised Saiyan's chest. The explosion knocked the Prince tumbling down the road, where he skidded to a stop a hundred meters later with his chest armor smoldering.

Seeing his father in trouble, Trunks powered up to his Super Saiyan form and rocketed forward, only to be stopped by Zangya and Bujin appearing in his path. The two aliens smiled at him when they blocked his way.

Looking up from his position on the ground, Vegeta saw his son squaring off with the other two aliens and frowned, "Trunks! Stay back!" Unfortunately, the man didn't have time to scold the boy, because the second he did the ground in front of him exploded and a fist came flying out of the cloud to slam across his face. The laughing Bojack sent the Saiyan Prince bouncing down the road at high speed like a rock skipping across the water. After a brief flight, Vegeta's body eventually collided with a distant tower, which collapsed under the force of the impact.

Smoke rising into the air from the toppling structure, Vegeta's glowing form soon shot out of the cloud and into the sky above the city. As soon as he reappeared, he saw Bojack hurl an enormous ball of green energy at him, which curved through the air at an incredible speed. Responding quickly, the Saiyan Prince backhanded the attack, causing the ball to break apart and the rebound to fly in the demon's direction. Rushing in through the barrage of his own deflected sphere, ignoring the fragments as they leveled the buildings around him, Bojack engaged Vegeta in close combat, trading lightning fast punches and kicks with him across the skies.

Sonic booms ringing out with every exchange, the demon eventually dodged a swift one-two and a kick, snickering in amusement before slamming a fist across his adversary's face. The blow sent Vegeta into a distant suburb, where he bounced and spun off of the rooftops like a ragdoll. Flying around and intercepting the Saiyan Prince in an instant, Bojack ended up kneeing the stricken warrior into the sky. Upon setting him up like a soccer ball, the alien leader then teleported directly beside the ascending Vegeta and, with a quick spin, slammed a bone breaking kick into his side.

The blow saw Vegeta hurling through several more buildings in a whole other direction.

"That's ten points," Bojack chuckled.

Flying out of his tenth building, Vegeta's battered form continued on across the street at an alarming rate. But just before his back could hit the next building, he was stopped in his tracks by his son flying in and intercepting the Prince at the last second.

Trunks, appearing winded from his battle with his two alien opponents, looked down at his old man to see if he was alright. Apparently, the blow from Bojack had managed to crack several of his ribs, as indicated by how Vegeta was now painfully holding his side.

This was not good.

"Father, let me help. You're not strong enough," Trunks murmured. His answer soon came in the form of an elbow directly in the solar plexus.

The annoyed Vegeta scoffed while his son doubled over, "Don't make me tell you twice." He then powered up and went charging after Bojack for a third round.

XXX

"P-Piccolo," Gohan murmured, seeing his master look up at him through a half-lidded gaze as he supported him with his hand.

Even though the man was conscious now, in the condition that he was in, burnt, bruised and barely even able to raise his head, there was no way he could continue on fighting. Piccolo was one of the strongest people the boy knew, able to walk through the most brutal of punishments. But the amount of damage Bojack was able to give him with just a few hits and blasts were simply astonishing.

"Th-That man… is powerful," the Namekian choked out, looking up at his student through an agonized expression, "Go help the others. I'm no use to you now… you have to stop them."

Hearing this, the young demi-Saiyan clenched his jaw and nodded, "Right." Setting his master back onto the floor, Gohan stood up, turned to where the battle was taking place, and quickly took flight.

XXX

Spiraling into a massive clock tower, a badly shaken Vegeta ended up embedding himself in the building's wall. Upon which, he was swiftly pursued by his relentless opponent.

Arcing through the air, Bojack held back for a moment to survey the damage before rushing in, aiming a fist at the Saiyan Prince's stomach. The stunned warrior of earth managed to cough out a startled cry of agony when a blow capable of shattering meteorites plowed into him, forcing him to drop out of Super Saiyan form. The attack was also enough to cause the sleeve of Bojack's trench coat to burst into shreds.

After landing his punch, the demon then drove an elbow into Vegeta's chest, shredding his other sleeve while he buried the man deeper into the clock tower. Then, upon pulling away and watching his wounded opponent slump forward, Bojack then underwent a startling transformation. Balling his fists and bringing his arms out, a green aura exploded off of the alien's body and completely disintegrated the remains of his uniform above the waistline.

The sudden power up not only turned Bojack's hair red and his skin green, his entire form also bulked up, causing simultaneous sonic booms to ring out that brought all of the buildings around him crumbling down.

The clock tower was no exception. The second the shockwave hit it, the entire building caved in, with Vegeta letting out a pained cry as he plummeted with the rubble.

His green aura fluctuating around him, the maniacal Bojack brought his hand forward and took aim at the falling warrior. With a grin and a laugh, the alien leader then unleashed a barrage of green energy spheres, which rained down upon the collapsing tower and firebombed the entire neighborhood.

In one fell swoop, the city was engulfed in a series of dome shaped explosions that reduced everything within two kilometers to rubble.

Trunks on the other hand was experiencing problems of his own. After being confronted once again by the deadly temptress Zangya, the young Super Saiyan was forced to duel with her above the city streets.

With graceful acrobatic maneuvers, the orange haired warrior managed to evade all of the demi-Saiyan's blows. Gritting her teeth when she dodged a right cross, she countered with a right spin kick that he blocked and then retaliated against it with a left knee. Parrying the blow with her leg, Zangya growled and, pulling back, slammed a double kick straight into his stomach that sent Trunks plummeting for a couple of stories. After throwing him off, she retreated, forcing the wounded demi-Saiyan to fly after her.
The moment Trunks started gaining altitude though, a flash of pink wires suddenly flickered by his field of vision and, for the second time that day, the time-traveling hero once again found himself ensnared in energy strings. Arms snapping to his sides like bolts, the stunned fighter looked over his shoulder to see Bujin with his hands extended outwards and a smirk on his face.

Unable to free himself, Trunks then received a killer kick to the body from Zangya rushing in to take advantage of the situation.

The moment she started beating on him, more and more explosions engulfed the city streets.

XXX

In the stadium, the people were getting restless. Through the roaming camera moving across the battle zone, the spectators could see enormous explosions rock the neighborhood and Trunks, who'd been battling the two aliens valiantly, suddenly become ensnared by some kind of invisible barrier. From there, under the cries of protest and exclamations of fear, the bystanders watched on helplessly as the blonde haired competitor was slowly beaten into a pulp by his female opponent.

"Oh no!" Chi-Chi gasped, holding her hands over her mouth.

"My Trunks," Bulma also whispered, her eyes wavering in horror.

They were so invested in watching the battle that the pair didn't even notice Mr. Satan appear atop the coliseum's pyramid and forced into one of the waiting rocket pods. As soon as the man was loaded up, X.S Cash's assistant sent him blasting down the track and into the tunnel, the crowd giving a mighty cheer as their 'savior' was sent galloping into battle.

Of course, only a certain few could care less about where he was going.

Videl was one of those people and was now gripping the railing so tightly her fingers were creating impressions in the metal.

"Gohan... where are you?" she asked, cringing when she saw the competitor Trunks take several more punishing blows to the face.

XXX

Loud thuds continued to ring out as Trunks was pummeled by Zangya, the girl continuing to beat on the Saiyan till he was bleeding from the nose and mouth.

But just before she could do anymore damage, Bujin was suddenly caught completely by surprise when Gohan, now back in Super Saiyan form, tackled the man with a glorious full body check, sending the turban wearing alien spinning across the city. After taking him out, the boy then concentrated a ball of ki into his hand and pitched it across at Zangya, who was forced to evade the ball that took out an entire suburb where it landed.

Liberated from the binds, a thoroughly beaten Trunks gasped in relief while Gohan came to float by his side.

"You alright?"

Smiling across at his rescuer, the older demi-Saiyan nodded, "I'll live."

The pair then had their attention drawn across to another building. There, floating down to land on top of the tiled roof, they saw the transformed Bojack smirk across at them arrogantly.
Realizing that Vegeta had been taken down, Trunks gave an enraged growl and, powering up, flew straight at the transformed tyrant. Drawing the sword from his back, the time traveling warrior let out a loud battle cry and swung in at the enormous alien, only to see his target's body become transparent and passed right through an after image. Stunned, the demi-Saiyan was unable to respond in time when a knee from below knocked him into the air, followed immediately by a double-fisted hammer blow that slammed into his back and sent him crashing through every floor of the building beneath him.

A second later, Trunks's body flew out the bottom floor of the apartment and into the street, where he landed on his front and his Super Saiyan form fading with his consciousness. His sword, which had been released in his attempted death blow, spun down from the rooftops and landed several yards away from his position, impaling the ground.

"No!" Gohan shouted, seeing Bojack land on the same roof with his back turned to him. His eyes fixating upon the large alien, the young warrior sweated momentarily at the amount of energy he sensed coming off of the tyrant.

Right now, he was nearly as strong as Cell was when he came back after killing his father.

Not even close to giving up yet, Gohan revved his aura and gunned it, shooting across the suburbs and towards the bulked up Bojack. With a yell of effort, the half-Saiyan threw a swinging right overhand right for the alien's head, only to pass straight through another after image just as Trunks had before. But this time, instead of falling prey to the counter attack, Gohan was able to block the kick and spring off of it, into the sky. Performing several acrobatic flips, the Z-fighter then spun around and hurled an energy ball down at the tyrant, attempting to catch him by surprise.

Despite the swiftness of the blast, Bojack effortlessly slapped the attack away before rocketing up towards the boy and swinging straight at him. Gohan responded in kind by diving towards his foe and uncorking a kick right into the demon's face. The pair collided in midair with a deafening shockwave, which not only cracked the surrounding dome but punched a five hundred foot crater into the city beneath them, pulverizing an entire area of buildings and turning them into dust.

In spite of his kick, Bojack managed to recover faster and buried a fist in the boy's stomach, causing Gohan to double over and cough up blood. Upon stunning him, the large alien then grabbed his leg and with an almighty toss, threw him into the city streets below.

The demi-Saiyan spiraled in, his world a haze as he quickly righted himself and landed atop a town hall. However, the moment Gohan touched down and looked up, he saw Bojack appear directly in front of him and drive a killer hook right into his body, sending the youngster crashing into the house. The force of the blow resulted in the entire building's roof collapsing in on itself in a great cloud of dust and debris.

Shockwaves began ringing out across the city like fireworks as the one-sided battle between Gohan and Bojack carried on. The massive alien invader effortlessly avoided all of his opponent's attempts to attack him and spent the next couple of minutes leisurely beating the crap out of his foe. Every blow he landed was marked with a thunder clap that cracked the ground and shook the buildings, and every miss was followed by a laugh of amusement as the young demi-Saiyan skillfully leapt out of reach. Eventually, Bojack's chasing of his opponent led to him retreating from the youngster when the boy tried to swing at him, which had the alien climb to a safer altitude and hurl an enormous energy ball down at his persistent adversary.

Caught by surprise, Gohan swung his arm back and with a loud shout, deflected the sphere and splintered it, sending the resulting fragments flying up at the caster. Bojack, watching his attack disperse, chuckled loudly and vanished in a crack of wind. He then reappeared directly in front of his opponent, surprising the half-Saiyan fighter and smashing the boy with a lazy punch.

Landing atop another roof, Gohan took flight again to try and get at his opponent. But just as he was beginning to climb, the teen was then forced to dodge a net of pink wires that converged on him from three different directions. Maneuvering evasively, Gohan soon found himself caught in a second net, which not only held him suspended in the sky but had his arms bound tightly at his sides.

Stunned, the youngster struggled to try and free himself, to no avail.

"A stellar performance, but you're not going anywhere thanks to our barrier," the voice of Bujin cut in from the side, drawing the youngster's gaze over to the turban wearing alien. He then looked to his left, where he saw Zangya hover into view with her own hands extended. Both of them had him trapped and at their mercy. "I wouldn't bother trying to break free. The more you struggle, the more energy it drains from your body until you pass out or die."

Letting out a shout, Gohan continued to thrash, pulling at the strings cutting into him from both sides and wiggling his limbs to try and loosen the strain. Feeling his energy get eaten away bit by bit, the young demi-Saiyan tried again and again to free himself from the same technique that'd befallen Trunks. But try as he might, he couldn't break the steel like binds now threatening to suck the life right out of him.

Tilting her head, Zangya gave the struggling young warrior an intrigued look. When she sensed her master Bojack come to float behind her, she then nodded towards the young Saiyan with interest, "This one is strong, master."

"Hmph. Yes… but nowhere nearly as strong as me," Bojack replied, arms folded over his chest while he watched in amusement as Gohan attempted to shake off the wires. "It's such a shame. And here I was hoping to get a little more fun out of him."

"He has spirit. Perhaps we don't need to kill him right away," the tyrant's lieutenant continued, glancing across at the man with a suggestive smile. It was a remark that did not go unheard by the young Super Saiyan hanging in the center of their snares. "He might serve you well as a gofer… or maybe even a palace servant if you were to let him live. His friends did kill Gokuha and Bido after all. I think we owe them a little something for what they did to our teammates." Though it seemed like a good idea at first, when Zangya saw her master look in her direction, the orange haired fighter quickly recoiled at the menacing glare Bojack suddenly threw her way.

Eyes narrowing on his subordinate, the red haired conqueror looked the woman over before retorting. "What makes you think you have the right to give me orders?" His question causing the female fighter to back down out of fear, the towering alien then turned his attention back to their victim, where he looked just in time to see the boy's Super Saiyan form fade away. "The same technique that'd befell Trunks. But try as he might, he couldn't break the steel like binds now threatening to suck the life right out of him."

In the blink of an eye, the man appeared in front of Gohan and cocked his fist.

"Give your father a message for me!"

He then slammed his knuckles across the boy's face, backhanding him immediately afterwards. After knocking the Saiyan's head around, Bojack then grabbed the boy by the hair, pulled him over, and drove a knee deep into his stomach, watching the blood fly out of his mouth the moment he released him.
Just as the alien tyrant began the arduous task of pummeling the boy to death, the group was then suddenly distracted by the sight of a red jet pod shooting out from a nearby tunnel and sent rocketing right past them, bouncing off of the surrounding buildings and hurdling towards the ground. There, it smacked into the nearby roaming camera, obliterating it and cutting off the feed between the battle zone and the stadium.

XXX

Up in the stands, the people observing the battle taking place on the monitors were just in the process of watching the young competitor Gohan get the stuffing kicked out of him, until the rocket pod carrying Mr. Satan unexpectedly blasted into view. The people were able to catch a three second glimpse of the Champ screaming behind the wheel of the shuttle, moments before the connection was suddenly knocked out.

The sight not only had the audience shout in protest, as they could no longer see what was happening, but Bulma, Chi-Chi, Videl, Oolong, Chiaotzu and all of the Z-Fighters' friends in the audience gave mixed looks of fear and concern.

"Dad… Gohan," Videl whispered, eyes shimmering as she had no idea what was going to happen to them.

XXX

After a spectacular nosedive which saw the destruction of the automatic camera, Hercule's rocket car then blasted towards Bojack's group on the rebound. The leader, Bujin and Zangya all had to take evasive action when the pod came screaming past them, nearly taking out the turban wearing alien in the process.

The result was the wires trapping Gohan's battered form dissipating on the wind and the young demi-Saiyan feeling the crushing pressure of the wires vanishing in an instant.

Unfortunately, Hercule's little joy ride wasn't to last, because the moment he blew past the group a second time, Bojack took aim with an energy ball and hurled it at the pod. The shuttle was struck high above the ground, where it exploded with a brilliant flash and a fireball that sent the Champ plummeting to the ground. The afro fighter could only cry out in terror as he attempted to flap his arms and gain some lift, only to hilariously smack into the pavement and create a human-shaped crater right in the middle of the main highway.

What was even more amusing was that the impression he made managed to engrave his afro into the brickwork as well.

"Mr. Satan!" Gohan shouted, looking down at the spot where the man had crashed.

Bojack, hovering nearby, smirked at the clown that'd been ejected from the exploding pod. "For your sake, I hope that wasn't the cavalry."

"That's it!" the demi-Saiyan shouted, powering up to Super Saiyan in an instant and rocketing towards Bojack.

A thunderclap rang out when he tackled the demon with a sharp punch that knocked him backwards. Then, in an instant, all three of the remaining aliens charged in and began beating on the Super Saiyan from all sides. In a flurry of punches and kicks, the young warrior battles against the multitude of powerful opponents for a glorious spurt of several seconds.

Then… it ended.
Managing to slam a kick into Bujin's face and simultaneously punch Zangya in the chest, the boy was then kicked in the stomach. The blow sending him skywards, Gohan was then struck in the back by a hook that sent him diving towards the earth.

Crashing through a building and toppling it, the youngster ended up slamming into the massive crater formed by Bido's first attack, where he skidded to a painful stop right in the center of it. The moment he did, his Super Saiyan form faded away.

"King Kai! There has to be something we can do to help!" Goku shouted, gripping his trainer's shoulder tightly as he and the stunned administrator of the Northern Quadrant of the universe watched powerlessly as Gohan was beaten into the ground by his attackers.

With the rest of the Z-Fighters down and Bojack outnumbering the boy three to one, his son was now on the ropes. In spite of his best efforts, he was still losing and his father knew that if he didn't act soon, then he was going to watch his son get killed…

He had to do something. Anything!

Chuckling as he landed beside Gohan's battered body, Bojack then wordlessly reached down and picked him up. As soon as he yanked the youngster out of the ground, he then wrapped his arms around the young Saiyan's body, including his arms. Then, without hesitation, he began to crush the boy one piston at a time. The sound of muscles popping and bones creaking echoed out across the city as in a few short seconds the alien tyrant started squeezing the life out of the defenseless fighter. The sudden degree of pressure being applied upon his weakened frame caused a strangled cry to escape the demi-Saiyan's lips.

With Zangya and Bujin floating down to land beside their master, the two of them then stood in contemplative silence as they proceeded to watch as their boss crushed his opponent into a fine paste between his arms and chest.

The sound of the boy's back beginning to split became more pronounced the tighter the alien made his hold.

"How ironic that your father's death was the key to my escape," Bojack mused, continuing to squeeze the boy to the point he started choking up blood. That pretty much told him that everything inside the demi-Saiyan was starting to give in as his bones gradually lost their structural integrity. "I so wanted to thank him personally, but you'll have to do it for me." He then let out another joyous laugh and tightened his grip even more.

Gohan's cries echoed across the deserted city, with a pitch that would send cold chills through even the most hardened of warriors. Even though his screams and exclamations of agony fell upon the deaf, unconscious ears of the downed Z-Fighters scattered across the battle zone, the only ones there to really hear his howls of pain were Bojack and his henchmen.

While the boss relished in the child's suffering and Bujin found himself a seat to enjoy the show, Zangya remained standing.

At first smiling when she saw her boss increase his stranglehold, the young woman then recoiled when she saw Gohan glance in her direction. In his split second gaze, the alien warrior saw the boy's eyes shimmer with hurt and despair, with a thin sheen of tears forming at the brims. Caught completely off guard by the boy's expression, the woman bit her lip and tried to look away.

Unfortunately, her averted gaze did nothing to stop the boy's screams from reaching her ears and after several moments of standing there and listening to his bones crack, Zangya stepped forward.

"Master... I think that's enough..."

Eyes narrowing, Bojack rounded on her aggressively, "Back off, Zangya! Or I'll kill you too!"

When he saw the woman step away, the leader grinned down at the child bending in his arms and increased pressure once again. It was only a matter of time before he broke, because a few seconds later he felt Gohan's body go limp and his head cock back. In only a few moments, his life signs started to drop. "This rat has given me more trouble than I can stomach. After I'm done killing him, I'm going to slaughter what's left of his friends, kill every single person on this island, and then, once I've sent them all into the next world, I'm going to destroy this entire planet!" He then chuckled darkly, "And just like with him, I'm going to savor every last scream!"

These words echoed through Gohan's ears, causing the boy's fingers to twitch.

"M-Mother... Piccolo... Krillin..." Images of his friends and family flashed through his head like ghosts, their smiling faces flying in one after the other as his world spiraled into darkness.

"Trunks... Bulma... T-Tien... Yamcha... Videl..." More and more faces appeared one after the other in flashes, and all at once, he saw it.

He saw the broken bodies of his loved ones lying across the battlefield as they were killed; their bodies carved up and turned into ash. Fires raged in cities across the globe as he bore witness to Bojack killing his mother, Videl and all of his friends one by one, slowly, painfully, until he saw the entire planet become engulfed in a hellfire as it was wiped from existence.

The screams of millions of innocent people echoed through his ears and with them, he heard the cries of his family and friends. It was these sounds and the culmination of images shooting through his mind like a strobe that eventually sent an electric shock running right through the demi-Saiyan's body and, unable to hold back the flood, jumpstarted his heart.

He remembered! His promise!

He'd sworn to himself, to his father and to his friends that he would be strong for them! He couldn't give up now. Not when everyone and everything he loved was on the line. If he didn't grow up and push forward, then Piccolo, Krillin, Bulma, Videl, everyone...

HE WAS GOING TO LOSE THEM ALL!

Gohan's eyes flew open and, in a startling display of anger, his ki skyrocketed, shocking the three alien invaders standing around him while his once charcoal irises flashed teal.

"NEVEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEERRRRRR!" Gohan roared, his hair flashing gold and his aura exploding around him like wild fire, shaking the entire island with a violent shockwave that caught Bojack completely by surprise.

"What?"

Then, with a deafening cry of rage that pierced the heavens and baffled the invaders, the boy tensed up, thrust forward with his left hand and grabbed Bojack by his side, the demi-Saiyan's fingers impaling the man's flesh as he dug into the area directly over his kidney.

The group's leader let out a yell of agony when he felt his vital point burn from the boy mercilessly crushing his waist and doubled over in pain, before the young warrior fired a blast at pointblank range right into his soft spot. The blast sent Bojack bouncing like a ragdoll across the open clearing, releasing Gohan from his hold who then suspended himself in the air above the ground. Zangya and Bujin could only look on in disbelief when, in a blinding flash of light, the boy let out a mighty howl of rage and his aura exploded off of him like a tornado. The power he emitted shredded the ground in all directions.

His ki climbing higher and higher without any signs of slowing down, the boy's energy sent shockwaves rippling across the terrain, knocking Zangya and Bujin off their feet and causing several buildings to collapse. After the bellowing waves ended and the light faded away, the three staggered aliens looked back to see what'd happened.

When their eyes landed upon the demi-Saiyan, they saw the boy touchdown and do an about-face, turning to lock his glare upon them. This time though, he looked a little different.

Not only was Gohan's aura sharper and fluctuating at a higher frequency, his hair had spiked up even more and was practically standing on end, save for a single strand hanging over his face. His eyes also had a more turquoise coloration to them. What's more, bolts of electricity shot from his body, sparking and flashing dangerously, as if to show just how enraged he actually was.

Standing up, Bojack, with five newly formed puncture wounds in his side that were bleeding profusely over the burn mark, looked upon the boy with an expression of shock, "W-What is this?" His subordinates, who were also back on their feet and standing outside of the boy's blast radius, wore similar expressions of astonishment.

Attention fixing upon the tyrant, Gohan frowned, "I know your kind. You think you can just waltz in and take our planet." The boy, bathed in the glow of his Ascended Saiyan state, cracked his neck, took a deep breath and continued, "But this planet is not yours to take… nor is it for you to destroy… not while _I'm_ around. Earth is _our_ home!"

Bojack snarled, "We'll see about that." His eyes then cut across to his two subordinates. "Kill him."

Crouching low, a grinning Bujin then prepared to hurl his wires at the boy, only to suddenly see him vanish with a crack of wind. Blinking in shock, the turban wearing fighter then sensed someone behind him and spun around. The short fighter had just enough time to blink before he saw the boy thrust a kick straight up into his ribcage and sliced him in two. The moment Bujin was bifurcated, his two halves exploded into simultaneous clouds of bloody smoke, before the boy turned his attention to Zangya standing frozen on the other side of the crater.

Balking in horror, the orange haired woman took several steps back. After seeing the demi-Saiyan effortlessly kill Bujin with a single stroke, the young woman knew right then and there that she had absolutely no way of contesting with that kind of power. Hell, she didn't even see him move to attack Bujin in the first place.

First he was _there_ in the center and then, the next thing she knew, he was just gone.

Swallowing nervously, she took another step back.

The moment she did, without even blinking, Zangya suddenly saw the boy standing directly in front of her, covering the distance of fifty meters between them in a heartbeat. Yelping in shock, she fell over and hit the ground, where she then found herself staring up at the golden haired warrior with electricity dancing around him in fear.
Eyes shimmering and sweat pouring down her face, the young girl was immediately petrified.

"P-Please…" She whispered, edging away slowly while her body trembled with fright "I… I'm sorry…"

Continuing to glare down at her unflinchingly, the young Super Saiyan then became aware of a bright light shining in his face and glanced to his left, where he saw a massive ball of energy rocketing towards him and Zangya. Spotting the attack, the alien girl gasped in horror, but just when it seemed like it was going to engulf them both, the golden haired warrior jumped into its path and effortlessly backhanded the attack away, sending the sphere of green ki flying into the distance.

"Useless bitch!" Bojack bellowed, a wide grin stretching across his face as he cupped his hands at his side and began pouring energy into his palms. Then, springing high into the sky, the tyrant unleashed his second attack, "DIEEEEEEEE!!" With a thunderclap and an earsplitting howl, the man hurled an enormous blast of energy straight down at the pair, aiming to wipe both Gohan and Zangya off the face of the planet.

While the orange haired girl cried out in terror, Gohan remained standing in place, watching the sky in front of him turn a blinding green before the entire piece of land they were on went up in flames. The instant the attack collided with its target, it nuked the whole region, causing the entire island to shake and scaring the daylights out of every single person up in the stadium. After the fiery mushroom cloud dispersed and became replaced by an enormous plume of smoke, Bojack's grin widened, as if certain of his victory.

But then, the moment he saw the smoke lift, the demon's smugness vanished in a heartbeat when, in the center of the three kilometer wide crater, he saw Gohan standing atop an untouched slab of ground, with Zangya directly behind him. Despite taking the entire blast full in the face, not only was the boy's aura still fluctuating around him, but the demi-Saiyan was completely unfazed by the attack.

Gawking up at the back of the young warrior standing in front of her, the former subordinate of Bojack, still lying stricken on the ground, stared up at Gohan for a few seconds longer. Then, as the shock of all the events that'd happened finally caught up to her, the girl's eyes fluttered shut and she collapsed, fainting right there on the spot.

Landing back down on the ground, Bojack snarled. "I WILL KILL YOU!" With a mighty war cry, the demon charged across the field and shot towards the demi-Saiyan.

Gohan's frown deepened while sparks of electricity coursed around him angrily.

Drawing back his arm, Bojack gave a mighty howl as he prepared to bury the kid with a single punch. But then, just as he was halfway across the crater; his target suddenly vanished in a golden flash. The moment Gohan disappeared from sight, the giant alien stopped dead in his tracks when a sharp pain struck him in the stomach, followed immediately by a small fist exploding out his back, sending blood splattering across the ground.

Doubling over, the would-be conqueror of the universe let out several strangled gasps and choking sounds, as he quickly realized Gohan had impaled him with his arm. Shit. He didn't even see the kid move.

The demi-Saiyan on the other hand, remained completely calm and collected, like his sudden charge and punch didn't require a smidge of effort. With an unchanging expression and a balanced stance, Gohan removed his arm from his opponent's stomach and watched the demon stumble away, clutching the new, gaping hole in his abdominals.

Bojack, gasping and groaning in agony, managed to put a good amount of distance between him and his foe. After which, he snarled in rage, "Y-You little rat! A mere… child cannot defeat me! I am unbeatable!" Spitting up blood, the demon then brought his hands forward and began gathering energy. A green sphere of ki forming between his palms, the alien tyrant then pulled his arms apart and split the globe, forming two balls in either hand which began to grow and pulse. "Any last words before you die?"

Sensing the man's ki begin to climb, Gohan's frown deepened, "Actually… Bojack." He then turned side on and cupped his hands behind him, "There is one word that comes to mind." His aura expanding widthwise, a blue sphere of ki then formed between the Super Saiyan's palms, filling the entire area with a second blinding light.

Then, just as Bojack hurled his two energy spheres in the form of a single beam at his opponent, Gohan executed his with a bellowing yell.

"KA-ME-HA-ME-HAAA!" Throwing his hands forward, the demi-Saiyan unleashed a blast that completely overwhelmed his opponent's, enveloping the approaching attack in an instant before ripping on and engulfing Bojack.

When the demon was knocked off his feet by the enormous tidal wave of energy, the last thing the alien conqueror saw before he completely blacked out was Gohan flying towards him through his own attack. Like a samurai, the young Super Saiyan 2 cut straight through his opponent with his fist, stopping directly behind the demon long enough to hear Bojack's scream of agony before, finally, decisively, and not a moment too soon, Bojack vanished in a blazing flash of light.

Sliding along the disintegrating ground, the demi-Saiyan stopped in a runner's pose while his attack continued forwards, the beam shooting through the Battle Island's main wall before rocketing up into space, away from earth like some ethereal ray of light. Seconds later, the ridiculously powerful beam of energy faded, vanishing from both the vicinity and the sky with a series of thunderclaps.

Daylight fell upon the land shortly thereafter.

When the smoke cleared, the plume revealed an arena stricken with the scars of a war.

There were barely any buildings of the tournament's city left standing and while craters did indeed cover a large portion of the region, the biggest impression took the form of an enormous trench leading towards a massive hole in the side of the island that covered one quarter of the entire zone. This was all the sign that was needed for people to know that a massive battle had been fought there and the victor…

Well…

After rising back into a proper standing position in the center of the two mile wide trench that practically split the island in two, Gohan held his ground and stared ahead of him. His Super Saiyan 2 form fading away and his hair turning back to normal, the boy surveyed the area one last time for any signs of his opponent.

His mind picking up the still present ki signatures of Krillin, Tien, Yamcha, Piccolo, Vegeta, Trunks, Mr. Satan, and even Zangya, all of whom were lying scattered across the field, unconscious, and nobody else, the boy knew that it was all over.
Job done, the full effects of his day-long struggle then brought a stupid grin and a half-lidded gaze to the young Saiyan's face. Moments later, the boy keeled over and hit the ground like a sack of potatoes.

"I did it," Gohan groaned, before passing out and falling into a peaceful sleep.

A long desired silence returned to the island shortly thereafter.

OOO

(Otherworld)

After seeing his son collapse through the connection with his teacher, Goku breathed a sigh of relief and allowed a wide grin to cross his lips. "That's my son. I knew he could do it." Initially having readied himself to teleport down to earth to lend his son a hand and give him an extra push, the adult Saiyan was promptly stopped when he saw Gohan take care of it himself.

Watching the boy step up and gather all of the strength and courage he needed to finish the fight, brought a sense of pride to Goku's soul that would make even Vegeta smile.

Removing his hand from King Kai's shoulder, the Saiyan chuckled, "Man. It was a close one… but my boy pulled through."

The blue-skinned overseer of their part of space smiled back at his student, while Bubbles and Gregory pottered around behind them. "It appears you didn't need to go down there after all." Obviously, through the telepathic contact he had with his student, King Kai had been able to sense the man's intentions.

Luckily for him, no emergency action needed to be taken.

Goku chuckled, rubbing the back of his head in his characteristic manner, "Yeah. I guess so."

That meant the earth and its people were in good hands.

OOO

(The very next day)

(Satan City Hospital)

"Mr. Satan saves world twice," Krillin read out loud off of the newspaper in front of him. Scrunching his face at the picture of the man posing for the camera with X.S Cash's son giving the photographer a 'V' sign, the bald man then tossed the article aside, allowing him to see the sagely form of Master Roshi grinning back at him, as well as well the IV tube plugged into his arm. Revealing that he was lying in a hospital room, the short fighter glanced across to see not only Oolong, Chiaotzu and Puar present and visiting, but Gohan and Trunks lying in beds alongside him. "This guy makes front page while we're in the hospital."

And by 'we', he was also referring to Yamcha and Tien in the two beds on the other side of the room.

Nevertheless, in spite of being wrapped up like mummies, with both Trunks and Gohan having their arms in cast, and the former with his jaw bound and his leg strapped and elevated, all of them were in rather chipper moods. Yamcha especially, since the doctors had given him a heavy dosage of morphine that put a stupid smile on his face and kept him quiet.
Chuckling at Krillin's misery, Gohan beamed at his friend, ignoring the pain in his still aching jaw. "Heh. Say what you like, but if he hadn't crashed into Bojack and his goons, we might not even be here right now."

"I'll say," Tien chuckled, remembering how swiftly he'd been handed his defeat, resulting in a cracked shoulder, five broken ribs and a broken leg, plus some serious rug burn.

Oolong, hanging off of the end of Gohan's bed, chuckled in amusement, "Yeah, when it comes to freak accidents, Mr. Satan's a pro." This drew a hearty laugh from Chiaotzu, Trunks and Tien, a spurt that left one of them coughing from the grievous beating he'd received at the hands of the alien leader.

Shaking his head, Krillin smiled across at his friend, "How you feeling there, bud? Still got all your bits intact?"

Gohan grinned, "All of the important ones. How about you? Those guys didn't exactly play nice with us."

"Meh… the only thing that's really damaged is my pride," the former monk sighed while staring up towards the ceiling. "Didn't I say at the beginning of this ordeal that I'd see you guys in the infirmary? Ah, who am I to complain. There's no way I can ever keep up with you super-powered aliens from outer space."

"Don't sell yourself short. I think you held up pretty well," Trunks encouraged from his bed, at the same time giving the man a thumbs-up. Not that he could help it due to the way his cast had been set, he was giving a constant thumbs-up.

"You didn't even see me fight," Krillin snapped back, pouting a little bit in his misery and earning snickers from the people around him.

Yamcha, having managed to tap into the conversation earlier, then remembered something important and glanced across at their half-Saiyan hero. "By the way Gohan, whatever happened to that orange haired chick? You said you let her go, didn't you?"

Responding to the sudden question from his flank, the youngster nodded, "Yeah. When I went after her in Super Saiyan 2 she completely fell apart. I actually noticed her having second thoughts about being on Bojack's crew while I was fighting him, so I decided to give her a chance. Hopefully she won't cause us anymore problems."

Catching onto this, Master Roshi grinned, "You're Goku's son alright. Kind and gentle to a fault."

Exhaling, the young demi-Saiyan fixed his gaze on the ceiling and beamed, "I've still got a long way to go though. I may have learned from my mistakes against Cell… but I've still got a few more miles to cover before I can even consider being in dad's league."

His remark bringing a round of smiles and nods of approval from those around him, the group then heard a knock on the door and looked to see a nurse enter their midst. When she stepped in, she was quickly followed by Bulma carrying her baby son, Puar, Chi-Chi, and some girl the group had never met before.

They still weren't able to meet her, because for reasons unknown, she was hiding from view behind Chi-Chi. It was only until the group stopped beside Trunks and Gohan's bedsides did the Z-fighters see the newcomer step into the light. Wearing the same clothes as yesterday with her hair in pigtails, Videl peered around at the boy wrapped in bandages and smiled when she saw it was the right person.

Immediately spotting her, Gohan grinned, "Videl? What are you doing here?"

"Gohan!" Her exclamation drawing surprised glances from everyone, the girl quickly rushed to his side and looked him over. "A-Are you alright?"

"Y-Yeah… just a little bit sore, that's all," the spiky haired demi-Saiyan chirped.

After taking in the sight of the bandages and patches covering him, Videl beamed in awe. "Wow. You must have gotten the stuffing kicked out of you. Who the heck were those guys? Were they as strong as Cell?"

The youngster, at first a little baffled by the sudden influx of questions, which raised a couple of questions of his own as to how Videl had managed to piece this stuff together, sprouted an amused yet pained expression and shrugged in response, "It's a bit of a long story."

Grinning, the raven haired girl quickly pulled up a chair, rested her arms on the bed and proceeded to lean against it right next to the bedridden Saiyan. "Well… I don't have to go home for a while, so I've got plenty of time to kill."

Appearing noticeably cheered up, Gohan was about to start a long conversation with the newcomer when he suddenly noticed all of his friends staring at him. Looking around the room, not only did he see the cheeky grins on Oolong and Krillin's faces, he also saw Tien and Yamcha share a glance, Trunks smile rather mischievously, Bulma snickering, and his mother standing there with a wide smile and a dreamy look on her face.

Even Videl noticed the playful looks they were receiving from the others in the room.

Eyes shifting from one face to the next, Gohan gulped, "Uhh… why are you guys staring at me like that?"

Then, in chorus, Krillin, Oolong, Master Roshi and Bulma began singing, "Gohan's got a girlfriend" over and over again teasingly, while Trunks quickly added a humming bass to the repertoire.

Hair standing on end like a startled cat, Gohan flushed a bright red before trying to hide his face underneath his bed covers. At the same time, Videl tried to cover her own shade of red by turning away and shifting on the spot in embarrassment.

"This isn't going to stop anytime soon, is it?" Gohan thought in dismay.

And guess what… it didn't…

XXX

Meanwhile, outside the hospital, across the street and perched on top of the roof of a nearby building, the familiar, orange haired form of Zangya could be seen sitting there with her legs crossed and a forlorn look of curiosity etched into her face. Wearing a blue singlet top showing off her midriff, black pull-on sleeves, black figure-hugging biker pants, yellow boots and a purple scarf wrapped around her neck with a different set of jewels decorating her features, the woman had apparently done her very best to remove the old garb previously draping her lithe form.

Now that she was no longer a part of Bojack's group, as she'd been dismissed from his ranks the moment he tried to kill her, the girl had adopted a completely different look to her old one. And now that she'd taken on a new appearance, had no more bosses to answer to and no more outstanding goals in her life, the girl was free to do whatever she wanted.

Considering her circumstances, Zangya figured she would start her new life by staying in close sight of the very boy who'd decided to spare her in the first place.

"Why?" It was the one question currently lingering on in her mind and one that she really wanted to have answered. However, she figured she would get her answers soon enough and, with her chin resting against her arm, opted to remain where she was for the time being.

While she was sitting there, watching and admiring the very person who'd defeated her former master blushing and bumbling childishly around his friends through the window, a complete turnaround from the fierce warrior she'd faced in combat, she then became aware of a new presence on the scene. Disrupted from her meditation, the Hera-seijin girl glanced to her right to see a blonde haired woman with beautiful blue eyes, wearing tight jeans, a white shirt, black vest and gloves sitting there and looking in the same direction as her.

Sensing a set of eyes on her, Android 18# turned to see Zangya looking in her direction. After a moment of staring at each other, the former quickly returned to gazing through the window, allowing Zangya to do so as well.

While the two women shared that part of the balcony in comfortable silence, a little bit further behind them on the exact same roof around a large water tower, Piccolo and Vegeta were also present. One standing and the other one sitting, both men had their arms folded and their eyes fixed on the distant horizon, not really looking at anything yet still looking all the same.

As a gentle wind brushed by them, ruffling Piccolo's cape and blowing through Zangya and Eighteen's hair, the four personalities remained in the peaceful stillness of the moment, wondering what the not too distant future had in store for them next.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Damn, this was a long chapter. But I finally got through the Bojack Arc. And with a few changes made, it's time to move on to the next arc. I hope you're all going to enjoy the next post, hopefully soon.

Also, since it's really difficult to determine the exact power levels of characters and the ones Daiz released lost complete sense ever since the Namek Saga, I don't really care much for them.
Humming pleasantly to himself as he sat at his desk in his old room, Gohan continued to busy himself away with his studies. With a ceiling high shelf of textbooks stacked to his left and his computer sitting on his right, the young man had practically everything he needed for a few hours of successful cramming. After the harrowing events that'd taken place at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament not too long ago, this had pretty much become standard procedure for him.

Ever since Bojack's attempted invasion of their planet the defenders of the earth had all decided to make some significant changes to their lifestyles.

For starters, Vegeta was now back in the game and hitting the gravity room harder than ever before… that is, whenever he wasn't looking after his son and filling in time that Bulma wanted him to take up while he was at home. Having pretty much recaptured his youth, the Saiyan Prince was now determined to reach the same level of control and ability that Gohan had achieved in his training, while at the same time not wanting the demi-Saiyan to get too far ahead in the combat department. He'd even managed to shanghai Mirai Trunks along for the ride who, after getting out of the hospital, had decided to stick around for a little while longer to hang out with his friends and family before returning to his own timeline.

Foregoing his planned rest period in the subcategories, Krillin had also decided to continue his training at Master Roshi's island. Every day the current Turtle Master would set some time aside to practice his move sets and polish up his fighting techniques, staying in peak physical shape while simultaneously becoming more emotionally and socially active. The man wanted to get out there to see as much of the new world as possible and to experience all of the things he'd missed out on in the past couple of years. Since they'd arrived at a time of secured peace and prosperity for all of mankind, he, along with Yamcha, Tien, and Chiaotzu, the sole human members of the Z-Fighter squadron, had all decided to live it up as best as they could, now that they didn't have the threat of androids and aliens looming over their heads.

Of course, one couldn't be too careful.

Speaking of which, Yamcha, a long time supporter of the group, had decided to return to his old career path in baseball and practicality in the world, while Tien and Chiaotzu had disappeared into the north to continue their regular training regimens. This further went on to illustrate the level of commitment each and every one of them held toward their responsibilities and passions as fighters, which varied between each member of the team.

The same could be said for the non-fighters of the group. Korin and Yajirobe were up in their tower doing whatever it was they did best while watching over the planet from afar.

Dende, bright and dedicated as ever, was still learning the ropes of being guardian of earth and was taking frequent lessons under Mr. Popo, who was just glad to have a friend to serve once again.

Master Roshi was being pedantic and laidback as usual, with Turtle and Oolong coming in a close second, and the Briefs family filled in their quota of the year by pushing the Capsule Corp. industry in a whole new direction of discovery and innovation.

In a few words, everyone across the board had their own parts to play.

Getting back to the heavy hitters, Piccolo never strayed too far from the regions surrounding Mount Paozu or Kami’s Lookout. The man was always… around, in some way, shape or form. Sometimes you would often see him standing outside the Son family house under a tree or find him meditating beside the local waterfall not too far from them. This didn't bother Chi-Chi too much since she never really saw the Namekian warrior very frequently, but Gohan did, and it always made him smile whenever he noticed his friend watching over him.

And as for the young demi-Saiyan, things were going nicely for him.

Just like he planned, every morning and late afternoon Gohan spent his hours training away, juggling time between skill and technique molding and strength building. Every so often he would share a couple of sessions with Piccolo whenever his old teacher dropped by and when the green warrior wasn't coaching him in the first half of the day, the two of them would spar until they were both too tired to move. Gohan was even sure to push himself by not going Super Saiyan the entire match, making him work even harder. Though on one hand it made Piccolo happy to see the half-Saiyan trying so hard, at the same time it irked him somewhat since he thought his student was taking it easy on him. But Gohan had his reasons and the man understood them well enough to let these little foibles slide.

It was a given. The more the demi-Saiyan trained and strengthened his base level state the stronger his subsequent Super Saiyan transformations would become. But this didn't mean Gohan neglected training in his powered up states either, as the young warrior knew he needed to gain control over his Ascended Super Saiyan state, or what he liked to call Super Saiyan 2, above everything else.

In the past month, he'd actually managed to gain a certain level of directive over it. He did this by spending a whole week in that form, walking around with his hair blonde, elongated and defying gravity. It was cool at first and the youngster loved the feel of it, but his mother soon urged him to turn back to normal since not only did he appear a little scary, but he also had these sudden bursts of strength that just came out whenever he got too excited or carried away.

The most notable instance was when Gohan first opened the door when he was coming home after a morning session and inadvertently ripped it off of its hinges.

That was pretty much all he needed to know that his control skills at the second level needed a bit more fine tuning.

Outside of working his physical abilities into the ground and training to the point of complete and utter exhaustion of course, just like he promised, the demi-Saiyan also focused a lot of his time on his studies. After all his years of homeschooling under his mother's loving care and guidance, the boy had gotten so good at math, science, and all the other subtopics that he barely needed to apply a hundred percent effort into his learning process anymore. He wasn't even sure there was anything more for him to learn, period. As it stood, with only a quarter of his concentration, he could burn through textbooks like they were children's picture books. He'd memorized all of the most complicated mathematical theories to date, knew every single field and method by hard, and could solve complex equations in his head like he were adding and subtracting, as he'd been doing stuff like Calculus ever since the ripe old age of four.

Even when he'd been training under Piccolo's watch, he'd actually spent a lot of his free time recapping on his complex numbers and differential equations while resting in a cave.
General theory of relativity, nonlinear systems of equations, differential topology, geometry and manifolds, quantum mechanics, matrix algebra, quantum field theory, nuclear physics, vector calculus, advanced counting theory, chaos theory, unified field theory… you name it and there's a good chance Gohan has covered it at least five times.

Hell, while some people struggled with their times seven multiplications, Gohan could recite the entire quantum chromodynamic gauge-invariant Lagrangian in his sleep.

Really, by this point in time it was all just a practice in futility.

But if it made his mum happy, then Gohan wasn't complaining.

Anyhow, after having spent a couple of hours cramming some basic systems of algebra and quadratics into his head for the hundredth time in a row, the demi-Saiyan felt he'd spent enough time sitting down. So, marking his page, closing up his text book, and adjusting the orange top of his father's style gi, the youngster got up and headed into the kitchen to see if his mum needed anything. When he got there, he saw she was busy scaling some fish at the counter.

Beaming at how hard she was working, Gohan approached the young woman and stood alongside her expectantly. "Hi, mum. Do you need any help?"

"Oh, Gohan," Chi-Chi exclaimed in slight surprise, "I didn't hear you come in. Did you finish your studies for this morning?"

"Yep. I covered all six books like you asked and filled out all of the exam papers you gave me," the young Saiyan responded, beaming across at the hardworking mother.

"That's good. You seem to be going through those texts a lot faster than you usually do," the raven haired woman remarked while raising an eyebrow at her son, at the same time deboning the large fish on the counter. "You aren't cutting corners in your work, are you? Because if I come in there and see that you're purposefully skipping questions and slacking off..."

"No. Of course not," Gohan chuckled. "I went through all six books page by page, formula after formula. I'll be able to show you the papers afterwards if you like and you can have a look to see what I've done."

"Hmm..." Chi-Chi raised an eyebrow at the demi-Saiyan. However, after giving the boy a suspicious once over and upon staring into his disarmingly innocent smile, the Son mother shook off her distrust and gave the eleven-year-old a warm gaze. "Ah, I trust you. After seeing the amount of work you put into your education, I think it's about time I start taking it a little bit easier on you." She turned back to chopping up the fish. "Like your father said, too much work can turn your brain into mush."

"Thanks mum," the boy nodded, before checking out the pile of food standing alongside her. Giving it a considerate scan, he then pointed towards the stuff, "Would you like me to dice all of that up for you?"

A little bit surprised by his sudden question, Chi-Chi quickly glanced between her boy and the food he was pointing out. After three back-and-forths, she then brightened up and refocused her attention on the youngster, "Of course sweetie. If you like."

"Yeah." Cheerfully hopping over to the other side and washing his hands at the sink, the youngster then brought out a second clever from the drawer beneath them. After twirling it expertly in his grip and finding a suitable balance, he then grabbed a couple of Chinese cabbages, lined them up, and, without hesitation, began chopping them up into bite-sized pieces at record breaking speed.

All he did was push the whole cabbages across the board and sliced down on them with the blade.

Watching her son start cutting through the vegetables faster than the Energizer Bunny, and watching him separate the piles for extra measure, the Son mother smiled proudly and, not wishing to be outdone, returned to her work as well.

"My son... I'm so proud of him," Chi-Chi exclaimed, putting the fish pieces into a separate bowl and sparing a fond gaze towards her stomach, where she knew the growing life inside of her belly was sitting. "You're going to have a wonderful older brother waiting for you when you come out..."

His mother's distant expression as well as her hand wrapping around her stomach area gave Gohan a moment of worried pause, "M-Mum? Are you okay?" He saw the woman glance up at him.

"You're not feeling sick are you?"

"Oh no. No dear. It's nothing. I was just spacing out," Chi-Chi replied quickly and threw the young man a pleasant smile. Obviously, she had yet to tell Gohan about the fact that she was pregnant. It'd been two months already, but there hadn't been many changes to her body that would warrant the young demi-Saiyan's notice, even with his superhuman senses.

This just showed how much like his father Gohan actually was, bless his heart.

Smiling brightly, the Son mother regarded her son considerately for a few moments. "I'm just thinking about how much of a fine young man you're turning into." Her eyes then sparkled as she met Gohan's gaze with her own, "I know that no matter what obstacles you may come across and no matter what challenges you may face, you will lead a rich, full life, filled with happiness and love, and that you'll make whoever you end up with feel like the most important person in the world to you."

Blinking at this, Gohan smiled, "Thanks mum."

Slowly returning to their work, a cheerfully humming Chi-Chi went through a couple more fish before inevitably asking the one question that'd been standing out in her mind. "By the way, Gohan... have you been keeping in touch with Videl?" Her question startling the young man from his task, the mother looked across at him curiously. "You haven't visited the city for a while and she hasn't come over to visit us yet. In fact, I don't think you've said anything about her the entire month... so I'm just curious. Are you two still friends?" Clearly, she was more concerned about whether or not the two of them were together in the fundamental sense as opposed to the common term, even if she may have been getting a little bit ahead of herself.

Shaking off the surprise, Gohan nodded his head vigorously, "Of course we are, mum. I keep in touch with her everyday over the computer. She says she's doing really well in the city, and that she would like to come over and visit us sometime." What he really wanted to say was 'visit him'. To be honest, he was hoping he would be able to stop by and visit her as well.

Videl was a really great person to talk to and he really enjoyed the many times he'd been able to spend with her. Chief among which was when he finally got out of the hospital and he was able to go explore the town with her. However, since they lived so far away from each other and because they both had responsibilities to keep with their families, such as schooling and training, it meant that the only way they'd effectively been able to stay in contact with one another was via the internet.

The two were happy nonetheless, but they still kept trying to find times where they were both free to drop by and see one another.

This information brought a wide grin to Chi-Chi's face, before she languidly went back to cutting up the salmon, "Well, as long as things are going well between you two, then I have nothing to worry about. Be sure to try and invite her over for lunch some time. It would be nice to have somebody new around the house… especially one of my boy's girl friends."

Now, while she really meant to say 'a girl who was a friend of her son's', the way she'd said it inadvertently brought a flash of red to the boy's face and had Gohan round on his mother with distress. "M-Mum!"

"What?" Chi-Chi looked back at him in surprise. After taking note of the startled look of embarrassment on his face, the mother soon realized what she must have said and smiled deviously. "Oh, I'm sorry Gohan, dear. I didn't know you two were already boyfriend and girlfriend."

"MUM!"

Damn it. Why did she have to go there?

While the boy blushed and babbled on nonsensically under the delightful gaze of his mother, the young demi-Saiyan was completely unaware of the set of eyes watching him through the window.

Atop the nearby hill underneath a tall oak tree, the orange haired form of Zangya could be seen standing there, leaning against the trunk with her arms folded and eyes set on the building down below.

At first having been observing the boy while he'd been studying, the former alien invader then saw him abandon the confines of his desk and head into the kitchen to help his mother out with her housework. It was a routine she'd adopted for a while now, as ever since the scuffle on the island over a month ago, the alien woman had been keeping close tabs on the young warrior, taking her time to watch him, analyze him, and getting a feel for what he did in his off hours.

She had to admit, it'd been incredibly entertaining observing his interactions with his family members and awe-inspiring watching his training sessions every morning and late afternoon. The entire experience gave Zangya a big idea of what life was like for this timid little warrior and what made him such a force to be reckoned with in the first place.

Oh sure, the young Hera wasn't exactly a friend of the demi-Saiyan's or an ally of his by any stretch of the word, but she sure as hell wasn't an enemy of his either. And even though she didn't hold any deep-seated animosity towards the people who'd killed Bojack and her teammates, but was in fact relieved to have been liberated from that power-hungry demon's command, Zangya was also smart enough not to start anymore fights with these people.

She actually frowned upon the idea of fighting against them, knowing what consequences awaited her if she did, and simply resigned herself to sitting on the sidelines and looking on from afar for the time being.

After watching Gohan for several weeks now, the young alien girl couldn't help but shake her head at his everyday antics and smile.

"Hard to believe that he's one of the strongest beings in this universe," Zangya thought, continuing to look upon him with interest and tilting her head when she saw him return to cutting up the vegetables.
As interactions slowly returned to normal within the Son household and the events of before calmed down slightly, the former alien gangster couldn't help but wonder to herself whether or not she should show her face to the young warrior and ask him the question that'd been plaguing her mind ever since the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament. By this point, it'd really been grating on her patience and, after days of nothing but silence, she was starting to feel a little bit antsy just waiting around for an opportunity to approach.

"Hmph… maybe I can pester him the next time he goes out to do some training," the young Hera considered.

That is… if she didn't lose her nerve stepping out from behind this tree of course…

OOO

(Sometime later - Elsewhere)

Across the plains of Mount Paozu, floating peacefully beside a large waterfall, the familiar form of Piccolo had decided to fill in his free time with some much needed meditation. With his arms and legs crossed and his cape bellowing gently on a breeze, the Namekian warrior suspended himself quietly, while the sounds of nature echoed all around him.

He made sure to compress his hearing solely to this one spot, as any form of outside noise would upset the state of emotional symmetry he'd been able to achieve. Even though the cry of his student could be heard for miles around due to a possibly embarrassing comment by his mother, Piccolo paid it little mind and allowed time to pass by as normally after that moment. The little foibles and everyday shenanigans of Gohan's social and home life didn't concern him so much, since he knew the boy could cope with it.

'Shake it off' he would always say to the demi-Saiyan. It was a fine combination of words he hoped would stick with the youngster for many years to come.

So far, it'd proven fruitful, as was the hours he'd already spent out here.

"Ah… now this is relaxing," the former guardian of the earth thought, a small smile pulling across his lips. "I haven't had such a peaceful meditation in a long time." After all the things that'd happened with the androids, Cell and Bojack, the earth was due for a long period of downtime. Hopefully the days would stay like this and the world would be able to keep on turning.

But then, just when Piccolo was settling in for another bout of silent contemplation, the Namekian's eyes suddenly shot open and he spun around. Disengaging from his seated position, the green skinned warrior fixed his gaze upon the sky, where he sensed an incredibly powerful force heading their way.

"W-What is that?" Piccolo thought, unable to comprehend what the hell he was feeling.

It was an alien presence. That much was certain. However, unlike the times he was able to pick up the approaching meteorite that was Lord Slug's craft or Frieza's saucer, this one was somehow different.

It was like he could feel the sun approaching them…

XXX

High above the planet's surface in the empty vacuum of space just a few clicks off of the moon's orbital path, a vessel of unknown origin and make suddenly broke into earth's reach. Oval in shape and looking as though it'd been assembled together from specially crafted plates, not only was it sleek in design and silver in color, it also had a series of orange lights running up and down the channels on its outer hull. Flying into view propelled by three thrusters on its back, the spacecraft shot past the moon's current position before suddenly beginning to slow on its final approach of the planet.

Upon arriving into satellite distance of the earth, the ship's velocity continued to reduce until, in just a few short seconds, it came to a perfect stop. Once suspended in view of the cities dotting the continents and islands far below, the ship remained hovering in place for several minutes, motionless and drifting through the cold expanse of nothing. The flickering lights along its shell making several beeping noises as they flashed more erratically, the craft from another world seemed to just float there, eyeing the planet like it were some kind of wounded prey before, without warning, something started to happen.

The front of the craft emitted several small bursts of hot steam before the plates broke apart and separated, like it was disassembling itself. The sections fanned out like they were still attached to the craft, even though they weren't, and held their positions around the tip. When the compartment opened, it revealed a tiny, sphere-shaped pod contained inside the nose of the craft. But that wasn't the only part to open up.

A plate from the side also detached too. However, instead of exposing another separate portion of the vessel, it revealed an open space with several other kinds of flashing lights. More steam escaped the vents and the ship started to hum loudly again. As the sound of engines revving grew in volume, a speck orbiting the planet in the distance started to drift towards the main craft. When it came into view, it revealed itself to be a highly advanced Capsule Corp. satellite that eventually got drawn into range of the much larger vessel. Once in close, it got sucked into the side compartment, becoming attached to the foreign machine.

More beeping and more steam shot off of the vessel after the satellite plugged into the alien craft like a USB. After several seconds, the open compartment at the very front of the ship emitted a bright orange light, which shot towards the very polar north of the earth. As soon as the light reached the top of the planet, it began to expand and scan the whole sphere.

The beam of light stretched over the earth and ran down all the way to the southern pole, a process which took a whole of a minute. Once it was done scanning the planet, the light switched off and the vessel gave another loud hum.

XXX

(On Earth)

In the astronomy department of the West City industrial super giant known as Capsule Corp, the original founder of the business and former head of the empire Doctor Briefs could be seen looking through the facility's primary telescope. Murmuring to himself as he gazed into the main optics fixed upon the skies above like a massive, planetary gun, the man with the bushy mustache, square rimmed glasses, lab coat, and little black cat sitting perched on his shoulder, gave a contemplative grunt as he adjusted the sights.

"Hmm… yes… this is vexing," the scientist remarked out loud. His cat meowed in response, earning a nod from the man. "I know… but where in the world did it come from?"

While the man busied himself with trying to solve their current problem, he was then interrupted from his investigation by a clearing of a person's throat. Looking towards the walkway circling the interior of the dome-shaped building, Doctor Briefs spotted his daughter, dressed in regular work clothes and a lab coat of her own, gazing down at him from above.

She wasn't alone either, as she was also accompanied by a concerned Vegeta and Mirai Trunks, both of whom were staring out through the telescope dome's main hatch towards the sky.

"So what's the scoop, dad?" Bulma asked, her expression stone cold serious mixed with a tint of nervousness, "Can you make out what it is?"

The man with the unlit cigarette in his mouth nodded, "Your man was right on the mark when he said he sensed something troublesome heading our way."

"Well… what is it?" the daughter persisted, anxious to find out what it was her dad had spotted.

Reaching over to type into his computer, the man brought up the image his telescope was able to capture onto the projector. The specially designed hologram lit up and relayed to the audience an image of the ship in question, which immediately had Vegeta and Trunks's gazes snap towards it. Befuddled by the sight of it at first, everyone on the walkway was soon locked in a glaring match with the unusual object, a ship that was obviously not from their galaxy.

"The extra terrestrial vehicle is a class three. It's a small craft… smaller than a jumbo jet but much larger than a fighter bomber; big enough to transport a couple of people. The lights you see blinking along its hull are what I suspect to be power conduits and sensors, while the gaps between the plates act as vents that eject excess energy and heat. The outer shell and armor seem to be held together by some sort of magnetic energy, able to detach and reattach at a moment's notice. It's what I was able to gauge from my few minutes of observation," Doctor Briefs said, turning away from the projection to continue watching the vessel through the telescope. "It was on fast approach of the planet until a few minutes ago, and it's now positioned itself in geostationary orbit above the earth, just out of effective range of our big missiles."

As the old man adjusted the focus, Mirai Trunks's brow tightened into a frown, "So… what's the deal with this thing? What's it doing?" He saw that the shape it had assumed wasn't its original shape. The very tip of the vessel had opened up and revealed some sort of device that was now pointing down at the planet.

"The computers picked up a strange electromagnetic anomaly that pierced the earth's atmosphere and ran all the way down from the north to the south, which only lasted shy of about sixty seconds before it dispersed," Doctor Briefs stated, glancing up at the time traveling warrior and his family to see them all still staring at the ship. "My guess is that the vessel was scanning us."

"Scanning us?" Bulma parroted, "The entire planet?"

"Yes," Doctor Briefs said, taking a red laser pointer and flashing it at the hologram, where the dot suspended itself around the ship's edge. "Just before the energy reading occurred, a section on the starboard side of the vessel also opened up and sucked in one of our satellites. The orbiter was tractor beamed aboard the UFO and forcibly plugged into their system."

Confounded by this new information, Bulma looked down at her watch and began typing into the keys. A computer image popping up, showing the various positions of satellites orbiting the planet, the blue haired woman balked when she took stock of their equipment. "That was the Type 29 we sent up there a few weeks ago; our latest model." She then looked across at Trunks and Vegeta, the former of which was now looking at her. "It was designed to boost information and communications channels by acting as a conduit for all of the planet's internet activity; that includes all local media and military transmissions."
Trunks was immediately troubled by this news, "Does that mean the ship will be able to access all of the planet's information through that thing?"

"If it has the right hardware and a big enough power source, yes," Bulma replied, shutting off her watch and turning back to the projector. "Considering that thing's alien, I'll bet my money that it's processing all of that information right now."

"Can you shut it off somehow and prevent that ship from accessing the satellite?" Trunks asked, hoping that the world's greatest scientific mind would be able to figure a way out of this and safeguard their planet's history and data.

Bulma gave a disgruntled look, "Not unless you can type over a million lines of code in the next five minutes." Even for someone like her that was a bit of a stretch, despite how lightning fast she was at the computer. It would take somebody with superhuman speed and her brain to actually pull it off. "It takes a long time to completely kill the system. But even if I was able to shut off all of our satellites in orbit it wouldn't help. That thing finished downloading over a third of the planet's information the moment the two craft became connected… and I'm not going to put it past the guy who's probably traveled over a million light years to get here just to give up on the first shot."

Frowning, the man turned to look up at the sky, where he could still sense the strange energy source coming off of the craft. "What do you suppose they want?"

"I don't know. But whatever it is, I know it's going to be bad news…"

Vegeta, having remained silent throughout the entire duration of their discussion as he stared up at the strange ship, suddenly squinted at the image, as if trying to decipher a Rubik's cube by hard. After a few seconds of closer analysis, his eyes then widened in shock, "Wait… I recognize that vessel."

Bulma and Trunks quickly turned to the man, where they saw the look of abject disbelief on his face.

"W-What is it Vegeta?" Bulma asked, giving the man a few confused blinks when she then saw him begin to shake.

Vegeta swallowed, "It can't be…"

Clenching his jaw, the Prince of all Saiyans then spun around and looked up towards the sky. Eyes wavering and sweat starting to break out, he then wordlessly powered up and took off out of the dome through the gap. His sudden vacating of the facility prompted Trunks to follow after him and Bulma to give a concerned look.

"Hm… I wonder what's gotten under his feathers," Doctor Briefs wondered out loud, glancing down at the little cat still lying over his shoulder. "What do you think, Kitty?"

The little feline gave a cute meow.

This subsequently brought an understanding head nod from the founder of the company. "You may be right. Hemorrhoids do seem to be the most logical explanation…"

XXX

After a few minutes of hovering there in dead silence, suspended above the earth and watching all of the commotion going on down below, the ship once again started to stir.
However, instead of more panels opening up, the ship's open nose exuded a few more bursts of hot steam. Upon which, the small pod that could be seen sitting inside it retracted and disappeared into the hatch. It was shortly replaced by another pod with a similar shell and plate design as the main vessel, with gaps and channels in between each panel that glowed orange. Once it'd been moved into position and placed in the opening of the vessel, it was then ejected from the ship and sent rocketing down toward the planet's surface.

The speed at which it traveled down to the surface was ridiculous.

As to its destination…

XXX
(Central City)

In the very heart of the mega city that served as the capital of planet earth, there stood the eloquent, multi-rimmed tower representing the forefront of the main parliament building known as King Castle. Sturdy, tall, and majestic, reflecting all of the attributes of royalty and leadership, it was this very place that the leader of all the nations of the continent and most if not the entirety of the world, oversaw all the affairs of his countries and its people. By extension, it also served as his home and a symbol of peace and prosperity in their world.

Beyond the walls surrounding the castle, through the bustling courtyard filled with tourists and armed guards, and between the many other towers making up the castle, the main building stood proud above all. It was in the main office of this very construct, a few floors above ground and with an impressive balcony sticking out over the central quad, the King could be found hard at work.

Sitting at his desk in his trim suit and perusing through his paperwork, an anthropomorphic blue dog with a large mustache and glasses breathed a heavy sigh of relief as he finished reading through a long report. Closing the file up and setting it aside, the man then set the pen he'd used on the rack in front of him and leaned back in his chair.

At that exact moment, the door to his office burst open. The guards standing on station drew their weapons instinctively, only to retract them when they saw the King's adjutant come jogging into their midst and up to the presidential desk. The frazzled man, a young male with spiky red hair and wearing a brown military uniform with the rank of Private First Class on his jacket, skidded to a stop a few feet away from the leader's table.

The high-standing ruler was quick to acknowledge the boy's presence as well as his salute of greeting, "Yes?"

"Sorry for disturbing you, Koku-sama, but I was told by the head officers down stairs that they received an urgent telegram from one of our air bases to the West and ordered me to deliver it to you immediately."

"Well then, read it out," the King replied, sensing the urgency in the man's voice.

The Private swallowed uncomfortably while looking down at the paper, "Commander Nishi reports that a small craft… a UFO of some kind, has appeared out of nowhere and positioned itself in high orbit above our planet, and is currently holding over the western part of the continent."

"A UFO? In orbit?" King Koku murmured, narrowing his eyes suspiciously. Whenever he received news of an unidentified flying object or a blip on their radar that his men considered abnormal, it always spelt trouble for him and the rest of the planet. He'd been getting a lot of those in the past several years and by this time he'd stopped being surprised. "How long has it been since it appeared?"

"The radio telescopes picked it up about half an hour ago, sire," the messenger answered. "The staff running the station didn't report it immediately because they initially believed it was a satellite that had strayed off course."

"Has there been any activity surrounding the craft that we should be concerned about? Positional changes? Attack formations? Deployment of weaponry?"

"N-No sire," the soldier responded, standing stock straight while the King gave him a deeply inquisitive look. "The ship is just… sitting there. It hasn't done anything other than open a hatch at the nose end."

Raising an eyebrow, the earth's leader remained sitting in place, twiddling his thumbs nervously and murmuring to himself. After meditating on it for several moments, he then gave a nod of acknowledgement and pointed across at the runner. "Get me General Rin. Tell him to-"
Unfortunately he wasn't able to finish relaying his instructions.

Without even the slightest bit of warning, the ceiling of the King's office where the chandelier hung proudly from its fixture suddenly caved in with an ear-splitting 'bang', an event that not only knocked the messenger off his feet but caused the entire building to shake. Koku and his guards, instantly stunned by the unforeseen explosion, had their visions blocked out by a thick wall of smoke and dust, which choked up the air and filled every corner of the chamber. Coughing and waving the cloud of fumes out of their faces, the nation leader and his stricken attendants peered back towards the center of the room to see what the hell had just happened.

Almost all of them, especially the king, did a hilarious double take when they noticed a large metal sphere with glowing, symmetrical orange lines patterning its surface hovering directly in the center of the office. Having obviously been the cause for the sudden cave in, the perfectly round pod had stationed itself above the floor and was emitting a very eerie, radioactive like glow and a very distinct humming noise.

In the first few seconds of staring at the intruder, King Koku was able to determine two things about it.

One, it definitely wasn't something from this planet. Two, it certainly didn't come here for a cup of tea.

Gulping at the sight of the celestial orb, the King then watched as the gaps along its hull emitted sharp bursts of steam. Then, just when he thought his day couldn't get any stranger, the entire ball opened up at the front in an origami like manner. The entire outer surface of the ball unwrapped itself and retracted when, stepping out from the confines of the floating pod, a shapely leg appeared followed by what Koku immediately recognized was a woman.

Not just any woman though. The person that emerged from the pod was a beautiful, radiant girl around sixteen years old with human skin coloration, a curvaceous figure, and wearing a highly sophisticated, very pronounced figure-hugging plug suit. Silver and white, with grey components and outlets sticking out of it, it was a sleek costume with small gaps and channels between the plates that glowed orange like her ship, and had shimmering blue nodes on certain parts of the limbs and torso. Completely symmetrical, the design was absolutely beautiful, yet terrifying at the same time.

But aside from the visitor's cute face, sharp blue eyes and serious expression, the most defining trait of the woman was her hair. She had long, flaming orange hair with a third of it that would have been touching the floor were it not already waving in the air as a singular mass behind her. If she wanted too, the girl could easily blanket all of it around her lithe body. What's more, it was also shining a luminous radioactive-like orange and seemed to waft on the air like a flame, literally defying gravity.

The pod that had used to transport her vanished into her back as a mere component of her suit, bringing realization to those present in the room that the girl was in fact the sphere.

Completely awestruck by his unexpected visitor, King Koku looked up through the hole in his ceiling, where he saw that the ball had crashed through all thirty levels of the building before coming to a stop directly inside his office. It was a sight that had the man gulp and look ahead of him once again to see the woman taking in her surroundings. Upon which she then focused her gaze onto him and began striding forward.

Elegantly traipsing across the floor, the alien girl came to a slow halt on the other side of the King's desk, at about the same time to the doors to the office burst open and dozens of soldiers began pouring in. The heavily armed guards encircled the woman and cocked their weapons, pointing them at her as she stared their anxious leader down.

After several moments of unnerving silence and with an unflinching stare, the woman began to speak, "Excuse me, but are you the current ruler of this planet; the keeper of the peace, King of Nations, and the one who is recognized as the most powerful man on earth, King Koku?"

Snapping out of his daze, Koku frowned uncomfortably, "Y-Yes. That's me?"

"And are you the chief warden tasked with safeguarding the lives of all of the people underneath your banner, protector of the world's lands, animals and resources from the northern point of Gaia to the south?" the young woman continued in her cool and collected tone of voice. Her questions almost seemed casual in nature, like the fact that she'd just busted into the king's chambers to speak with him meant nothing to her.

Baffled, the man glanced around at his guards, whom he could see had all of their rifles trained onto her, before slowly looking back at the inquisitive alien girl. "Yes… I guess."

This answer brought a small smile to the woman, who then placed a hand over her chest and bowed, an action that baffled the soldiers. "It is a pleasure to meet you, your highness. My name is Kana; I am a part-time privateer and freelancer for the Planet Trade Organization of the Four Quadrants of Space. I have journeyed far from the core systems of the universe seeking a world that has been completely terraformed to suit a variety of flora and fauna. I must say… you have a very beautiful planet, King Koku; one that is both rich and overflowing with life."

Not really sure where this was going, King Koku nevertheless nodded, "Th-Thank you. That's very kind of you to say."

This answer brought a small smile to the woman, who then placed a hand over her chest and bowed, an action that baffled the soldiers. "It is a pleasure to meet you, your highness. My name is Kana; I am a part-time privateer and freelancer for the Planet Trade Organization of the Four Quadrants of Space. I have journeyed far from the core systems of the universe seeking a world that has been completely terraformed to suit a variety of flora and fauna. I must say… you have a very beautiful planet, King Koku; one that is both rich and overflowing with life."

Not really sure where this was going, King Koku nevertheless nodded, "Th-Thank you. That's very kind of you to say."

Straightening up, the woman now identified as Kana brought her hand back down and beamed brightly at the nation ruler, "This earth is a very rare gem, unlike any other planet I have ever encountered before. If it isn't too much trouble, I would very much like to begin negotiations as soon as possible."

"Uhh… negotiations?"

"Surely as this planet's ruler you are willing to partake in a spirited discussion," the woman said with a hopeful voice. "I know that this is a bit forward of me, but as much as I would love to have a guided tour of your world, I'm unfortunately on a very tight schedule. I have another business transaction with the Brench of Sector 15 tomorrow morning and I do not wish to be late."

King Koku, hesitant at first and picking up a sense of foreboding hanging in the air, gave a very nervous murmur before, after much consideration, conceded to the girl's pleasant approach. With a wave of his hand, he ordered his soldiers to lower their weapons, which they slowly and cautiously did. "Very well. I see no harm in having a friendly chat. Would you like it if the negotiations took place in here?" He was completely willing to overlook the massive hole in the ceiling.

The workers could clean that up afterwards.

Blinking a few times, Kana looked around the office a second time before glancing back. She appeared slightly puzzled, "You don't think that this room is a little too small for our needs?"

The King smiled, "Do not worry. I have held many meetings in this room over the course of my tenure as leader. Various treaties between nations and individuals of high standing have been brought to this table and discussed. Considering its history and significance, I am sure that this chamber will be adequate for our needs."

"You must be an incredibly persuasive person then," Kana remarked, a smile forming on her lips. "Very well. If you believe that this is all the space that we shall require, then I will accept this as our decided battle ground."

It was this response that had Koku recoil slightly. "Uhh… battle-what?"

Unable to get an answer in time, he suddenly saw the woman raise a clenched fist like she was holding something, before she casually opened it and revealed a marble sized sphere of golden energy hovering above her palm. As soon as her fingers uncurled, Kana fired it at the man. King Koku only had time to let out a startled cry before he was smashed in the chest by the attack and sent flying out of the office window behind him, over the balcony and into the courtyard two stories below. The man then landed in the pool of the palace's central fountain with a big splash, startling the dozens of civilians on tour of the residence.

The soldiers, thunderstruck by the sudden attack of their King, loaded their weapons, raised them and opened fire on their planet's visitor. Rifles and machine guns opened up on the stationary woman with a hail of bullets, all of which threatened to tear her to pieces from all sides. However, just as they were firing at the woman, the King's guard watched on in shock as their bullets slowed in midflight and stopped just two feet from their target, who didn't even flinch at the barrage.

When the gunfire ceased, the hundreds of bullets suspended in the air around the girl then dropped to the ground, scattering like pellets. It was then the fiery haired woman glanced around at the guards, causing them all to gasp and take several steps back.

"Are you challenging me?" Kana asked in the same, cool tone of voice as before.

Unwilling to fight a woman who literally just stopped all of their best shots, the soldiers dropped their weapons and raised their hands.

The moment they did so, the fiery haired girl suddenly levitated herself into the air, floated over the desk and out over the balcony. Looking down from her elevated position, she saw the crowd of people down below gathering around the fountain, where the King emerged on the edge coughing and sputtering. He was quickly surrounded by soldiers who, upon spotting the woman hovering overhead, opened fire on her as well.
Just like in the office, the bullets either missed or stopped in mid flight just feet from their target, before falling to the ground uselessly. After suspending herself in place and watching the guards balk in horror, Kana floated down and landed just a couple meters from the fountain's edge.

The people immediately took a step back from where she landed.

When she approached the pond's edge where King Koku was busy trying to pick himself up and clear his lungs, a couple of the surrounding soldiers bravely stepped forward and held their guns at the invader. As soon as Kana came within a few feet of them though, the pair of guards were suddenly lifted off of the ground by an invisible force and gently moved out of the way, an anti-gravity event that surprised the hell out of them before they were unceremoniously dropped onto their asses.

Kana stopped before the winded and thoroughly waterlogged king, looking down at him curiously while he looked back up with an entire front portion of his clothes completely burned away. "That attack was child's play. Are you sure you're the most powerful man on the face of this planet?"

"Eh?" the King replied intelligently, gazing up at the star child who merely tilted her head in his direction. "W-What do you mean by that?"

Kana frowned, "I'm supposed to be negotiating with the sole guardian and protector of this world for the right to ownership over it, so that if I emerge victorious I may compartmentalize it and sell it to the interplanetary market for preservation. I do not believe that such a beautiful planet would be occupied by so many people without having a representative who is strong enough to negotiate for them."

Oh. So when she meant 'negotiations', she really meant a battle of physical strength between two parties, the victor of which would emerge with the planet as their prize. King Koku quickly figured this out in the next few seconds as the woman stared down at him and quickly reconsidered his options. After all, he knew how these kinds of games were played across the board. It wasn't just a way of finding a middle ground between two opposing forces; it was also a primary function of war as well as a manner of sport. This visitor from another planet viewed it as a kind of bartering system in her trade, one in which she was probably a master of. To this person, the act of battling for a right to possession and tenure was a business.

After seeing his guards get pretty much backhanded out of the way without so much as a struggle from their target, he knew that this woman Kana was an opponent that neither one of his normal warriors would be able to overcome.

However…

"I am merely the political leader of this planet; the one that stands as the voice for the people and guides them along the path to peace and prosperity without the need for military might," King Koku replied groggily, at the same time facing the woman as confidently as he could. "As such, I am not this planet's guardian nor am I its strongest warrior."

"You're not?" Kana recoiled a bit, staring down at the man for a moment before then noticing the stunned looks of the people around her. Considering her situation carefully, she then looked down at her hand and allowed the node on her palm to produce a hologram, which began cycling through several pages of information. Scrolling through it at high speed, the once cool young lady then widened her eyes, blushed and rubbed her head in embarrassment in a surprising break in character. "Oh… whoopsie. I think I may have cocked up a little. The administration hierarchy on this planet is a little bit different from the others I've visited in the past. My bad." Acknowledging her little foible with a nervous laugh, she then deactivated the hologram and focused back down on the king.
"Do you think you could point me in the direction of the earth's strongest warrior so that he may negotiate with me on your behalf?"

The King raised an eyebrow, "You wish for me to present a champion?"

Kana nodded, "If you could."

Thinking on it for a few seconds, the man quickly came up with a name. It was someone he knew all too well and someone he believed would be able to combat such an outrageous opponent, "If you're looking for this planet's strongest warrior, then look for a man named Goku."

"Goku?" Kana parroted, opening up her palm again and cycling through the orange hologram at speed. Producing a series of profile pictures, she then held them up towards the king and flicked through them, allowing him to identify which 'Goku' on the earth's registry he was referring to.

After going through a few faces, the man's eyes widened when he saw the man's face appear and he pointed, "Th-That's him."

Looking down at the image and expanding the person's profile, Kana scanned through the information for a moment before looking back down at the King. "Obituary records state that Son Goku passed away over two months ago due to a debilitating heart virus."

Appearing stunned, the nation leader looked down hesitantly, his expression showcasing a sense of mild disbelief. If it was true that Son Goku was gone, then he had no idea who else to turn to. As far as he was concerned, the young man who'd fought and defeated the mighty King Piccolo had been his one and only shot at combating and defeating this visitor from outer space.

However, the people around him had something else to say.

"You want the name of the strongest man in the world?" an adult male from the crowd shouted, drawing everyone's attention, namely Kana's, in his direction. "His name is Hercule Satan! There is not a person alive on this planet stronger than him!"

While the King looked stunned at the civilian's claim, Kana blinked as she processed this new name that'd been given to her. "Hercule Satan?"

"Yeah! He's the world's greatest champion and our savior!" the man continued.

The woman beside him nodded her head vigorously, "That's right!"

"He saved our world from the monster Cell and the aliens who invaded our planet during the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament! If it wasn't for him, none of us would be alive right now!" another man from the crowd shouted, rousing a loud clamor and cheer from the people around her.

"Yeah! Mr. Satan is the strongest!"

"He will gladly fight you!"

Hearing a chant of 'Mr. Satan' start up, Kana narrowed her eyes and turned back to her hologram. Swiftly processing the name in her computer, the woman's hologram flashed through several more pages before finding a series of pictures. Beaming them up for everyone in the square to see, the alien visitor raised an eyebrow when she saw a large man with a mustache and an afro posing heroically before the camera. Moving through several more photos, she found clips of people gazing admiringly up at the man standing high up on the balcony, almost like he was their messiah.
Immediately sold from the images alone, Kana smiled excitedly and shut off the hologram. "It seems that I’ve found your planet's champion. I'm sure our negotiations will be long and fruitful." With a nod of acknowledgement, the fiery haired alien bowed to the planet's leader as he lay staring up at her from the fountain. "I'm deeply sorry for disturbing you, King Koku, and I apologize unreservedly for any unwarranted stress and inconveniences I may have caused you and your people." She then took a step back and nodded politely, "It has been a real pleasure. Farewell." With that, the warrior then tucked herself up into a ball above the ground and became incased in the same metal sphere once again, which sprouted from her like a sheet.

Upon taking the form of the pod, the vessel hummed loudly for a few moments before, without any need for sophisticated preparation, shot up into the sky with a sonic boom, going from zero to holy-shit-satellite-orbit in under five seconds.

Once everyone saw the vessel vanish into the clouds above, the people, soldiers and the king spent the next minutes staring at the sky in shock. When they eventually shook themselves out of their stunned reveries a full two minutes later, the guards quickly went about helping the poor king out of the fountain, while at the same time moving to clean up the mess caused by their extraterrestrial visitor.

XXX

The pod ascended back into space, once again falling into satellite orbit of the planet. Not even bothering to return to the mother ship, the sphere that was the interplanetary traveler Kana then spent the next few moments hovering there in solitude, safely above the earth's surface.

She remained there for an upward of several seconds. Reason being was that she needed to access the planet's Global Positioning System in order to find the address of this great Hercule Satan, also known as humanity's champion. After looking up the man's exploits on her return flight into space as well as reading into this Cell business that'd taken place over two months ago, the woman knew right away she was in for a very spirited discussion with the man.

This Cell person had been able to move at blinding speeds, wipe out an entire army without effort and destroy a mountain with a single blast, and Hercule Satan was able to defeat this tyrant with a single blow, or so the reports stated. If that were the case, then Kana knew she was bound to have one amazing fight.

So, upon locating Hercule's domain, the pod immediately course corrected and shot back down towards the planet, heading in the direction of the eastern part of the continent where Satan City was located.

Wow. The man even had a city named after him. If someone was able to have an entire metropolis christened after them in honor of their accomplishments, then this man had to be an amazing warrior.

XXX

(Meanwhile – Satan Manor)

"Wow. So you guys actually fought against the same guy that destroyed your home planet all those years ago?" Videl chirped, at the same time smiling at the image of Gohan she could see beaming back at her on the laptop. "That must have been one hell of a battle."

"Oh yeah. No joke. It was absolutely terrifying," the young demi-Saiyan replied, his voice coming through loud and clear over the speakers as he tried his best to recount his experience in brief.
"This was back in the days when we were all still low level and nowhere strong enough to fight against someone of Frieza's caliber. The guy was ridiculously powerful back then and only my dad could actually fight him toe to toe. But nowadays… enemies like Frieza and his family are nothing to us."

Having opened up her laptop sometime ago, the daughter of the world champ had spent the past couple hours or so chatting with her best friend from the south. Since accessing his channel, the pair had talked about all sorts of things, but mainly about past trips to new places. Videl was really interested to hear about Gohan's first journey to planet Namek, which he'd only brought up about fifteen minutes ago. It was here he talked about how he and his friends encountered the prick that'd wiped his entire race from existence and fought some of the toughest battles of his adolescent life.

Needless to say, it sounded like an exhilarating and frightening tale.

"Man. You had the craziest adventures when you were younger." Videl murmured, propping her head up on her hands, "Frieza, huh? The biggest adventure I ever had at that age was going to the island to watch my dad dominate the last World Martial Arts Tournament and going to Central City for a month that one time."

"Well, I can say this for certain, you've been to two more places than I have," Gohan chuckled, wrapping his arms over his chest. "I've never been to any of the World Tournaments and I've never visited Central City before."

"Really?" the raven haired girl looked slightly taken aback. But that expression was then replaced by a cocky grin and a competitive gaze. "The boy who single-handedly defeated the greatest terror this world has ever seen and journeyed across an ocean of stars to a planet an entire galaxy away, has never been to two of the most well-known and most visited places on earth?"

Gohan had the right of mind to look sheepish, "I've had a very sheltered childhood?"

This prompted Videl to fold her arms and look at the boy doubtfully, "Somehow I find that hard to believe."

Yeah right. After everything she'd seen in the past couple of months.

Ever since the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament, the two of them had talked about so many things together. At the start of this entire venture, Gohan had told Videl all about the Cell Games and what'd happened leading up to it. This inevitably led him into a whole string of topics, most notably his encounter with Bojack and his henchmen, as well as the fact that he wasn't exactly human himself. However, Videl didn't seem to mind or dispute that realization at all. In fact, she seemed to accept it right off the bat, seeing as she knew an ordinary man wouldn't have been able to contest with a monster like that maniacal bug.

All of the important stuff was glossed over and soon enough Gohan began filling in the details himself bit by bit. When their conversations reached the same depth of emotion that he'd reached, the young Saiyan even got Videl to talk about the little mysteries in her life regarding her family, as well as a lot of the crap she'd had to put up with at school. Her father's fame brought her a lot of unwanted attention, either as popularity or negativity from people jealous of her position in the community. She had a lot of trouble coping with social structures and bullies at school, which meant she'd had to both physically and verbally defend herself on more than one occasion. By normal standards; that was a rough way to coast through primary school, an experience Gohan could relate to, only his were of the super-human variety. It was all a matter of perspective.

As it turns out, Videl hated being treated like a celebrity and just wanted to be viewed as a normal person by her friends. Unfortunately, a lot of people didn't give her that kind of privilege and it is a reality that has grated on her life ever since she could remember. What she really longed for was to have a normal family like what she used to have with her mother and father years ago... or at least a normal life, away from the fame and her father's postulating in front of the crowd. She wanted freedom in her life.

Gohan was deeply moved by her revealing these details to him, since he figured that it must've been incredibly tough for her to do so. That being said, the two of them found an emotional equilibrium between one another that made them feel a lot more comfortable talking with one another. They didn't have to be afraid of unintentionally revealing anything anymore, which made their conversations feel more wholesome.

It was almost like they'd been best friends since childhood, even though they were still technically children.

"I do live a long way from the city and have been homeschooled for most of my life. Even though I've been given more independence now, it doesn't change the fact that for a lot of my childhood, much of my free time has been spent stuck in this room studying," the demi-Saiyan replied honestly. Scrubbing his head and giving it a moment of pause, the young man smiled pleasantly, "I really have to get out more and see the world a little. I feel like I'm missing out on so much."

The young man's remark brought an excited smile to the raven haired girl's face, "You should come by my place then. I can show you around my house and take you on another guided tour of the city... show you all the hot spots you haven't visited yet. There's a really awesome market place and supermall down town."

"Yeah. That's a great idea," Gohan exclaimed from his end, grinning into the laptop's lens before sitting back a little. "And hey, since we're talking about visiting each other and stuff, why don't you come over to my house sometime. Mount Paozu is a really great place to hang out. I think you'd like it."

"Really?" Videl asked, seeing the boy nod and bringing a triumphant expression to her face. "That would be awesome, Gohan." Giving a very excited bounce that was an exact opposite to her usual, serious nature around other people, the girl quickly settled back down when she realized she was getting ahead of herself. Her visage becoming nervous seconds later, she then began pressing her fingers together anxiously. "And uhh... c-can I ask you something, Gohan?"

"Yeah? What's up?"

"You know that I like fighting and martial arts, yeah?" When she saw the boy nod and throw her a curious stare, Videl swallowed heavily and continued, "Well umm... if it isn't too much trouble... do you think... you'd be able to teach me a few things?" Feeling her body tense up, the girl pressed onwards. "You're the strongest person I've ever met and I saw all of the amazing stuff you were able to do. If... If it's possible, do you think I'd be able to learn how to fight like you?"

Appearing surprised at first, Gohan thought about her questions for a moment while rubbing his chin. Following a few seconds of deliberation, the youngster quickly gave her a response, "You're already a really strong fighter, Videl... much stronger than a lot of other people I've met. If you like, I would love to teach you a few things. But only if you really want to..."

Videl immediately appeared excited at his answer, "And to fly as well?" Oh. She really wanted to learn how to fly. That would be the greatest thing ever.

The boy chuckled, "Yeah. Of course, but let's take this one step at a time, alright. You can't rush into something like this." He could see how excited the girl was getting, so he quickly moved to calm her down some so she didn't give herself a heart attack. "These things take a lot of work."

"That's okay. A little bit of hard work doesn't bother me. Heck, I'll train all day and night if I have to." Literally rocking back and forth in her seat, Videl grinned across at the screen, "So… when do you think we can visit each other?"

Sensing she still had a lot of pent up vigor, Gohan chuckled and quickly checked his time slot. "I'll let you know in a little while. I've still got some chores I need to do around the house first, so as soon as I'm done with them I'll drop you a line, alright?"

"Sure," Videl nodded enthusiastically, quickly reaching forward to tap her keyboard. "Thanks so much for this, Gohan. I… you have no idea how happy this makes me. I really owe you one." When she said that, you could tell that she meant every word.

"No problem, Videl," the demi-Saiyan replied with a warm smile, "I'm just glad we'll be able to meet up and hang out some more."

"Yeah. Same here." She could definitely agree on that. Since they both loved martial arts, the two of them had a ton of reasons to look forward to visiting each other. To train and to hang out together, what was there to not get excited about? "I'll… be hearing from you soon, yeah?"

"Yeah," Gohan nodded affirmatively while reaching forward to tap his computer. "See yah, Videl."

"Later, Gohan." And with that, the transmission cut out.

Breathing out a long sigh, Videl leant back in her chair and placed a hand over her chest. Damn. Her heart was literally pounding against her ribcage from excitement. Hearing that her friend from afar was open to the idea of training her to fight just like him and his friends made the girl all shaky and jumpy inside. The last time she felt something like this was when she was watching Gohan fight those alien guys back during the Intergalactic Tournament, and that wasn't very long ago.

This was a whole new ballpark she was stepping into, one where the stakes were infinitely higher than anything she'd ever encountered before. The world that Gohan was from, where people could touch the skies and smash mountains with a single punch… was an area of freedom and exhilaration that her father couldn't even dream of touching. And now she was being given an opportunity to try her hand at it.

She wasn't sure how she would go, but even though she was scared, the raven haired youngster was looking forward to it all the same. It was something that made her blood pump and her body quiver with anticipation.

"Get back to me soon, Gohan-kun," Videl thought, a warm smile pulling across her lips as she hopped up, stretched, and decided to plop down on top of her bed. Clambering across the large mattress, she then wrapped her arms around one of her pillows and stared out the window to her left for the next few minutes, Gohan's smiling face hovering in front of her eyes. After which Videl closed her eyes and drifted off into a peaceful sleep.

For some reason, she felt incredibly drowsy.

It must have been from all the excitement she's gotten from talking with her friend.

XXX
Descending from the sky faster than a speeding bullet, the small pod containing the alien traveler came to a stop just three feet off of the ground. Lurching when its momentum ceased, causing a cloud of dust to rise off of the pavement leading from the front gates to the steps of Hercule Satan's mansion, the sphere then began to unfold.

Just like wrapping paper, the metal bits pulled away and gently deposited its passenger onto the floor while it retreated into her back, disappearing seamlessly like wings on a beetle. With her fiery orange hair waving behind her, Kana took a moment to scan her surroundings, including the building in front of her and the walls surrounding the property.

Recognizing it from the pictures as well as the name 'Satan' stretched out atop its roof, the young girl then strolled forward. Heading down the path and across the palm tree dotted garden, she ascended the steps of the enormous mansion and stopped at the front door.

Having learned from her previous entry into a property on this planet that it was impolite to come crashing through a person's roof to speak with them, Kana adjusted her approach and instead went for the front, as it was customary on earth. Taking a deep breath, she reached up and gently rapped against the door, before lowering her hand and waiting patiently for an answer. Her glowing form drank in the sun's energy hanging high above, which she spared a momentary glance towards until the sound of approaching footsteps beyond the barrier drew her gaze forward once again.

The door opened shortly afterwards to reveal an old man with grey hair, a mustache, thin glasses, and wearing a black and white tailed suit with a handkerchief slipped into the breast pocket, standing before the celestial visitor. The butler of the house spotted the visitor immediately; glancing down at her while she craned her neck to face him, since he stood a head and a half taller than her.

"Yes?" the man spoke with an upward inflection.

"Excuse me. Is this the home of the one they call Hercule Satan; the current World Martial Arts Champion and the man that is regarded as the most powerful fighter on earth?"

The butler didn't even flinch, merely taking in the sight of the strangely dressed yet stunning young girl standing on their doorstep. "Yes. It is. To who is it that I am speaking?"

A smile appearing once again, the woman bowed to the household worker, "My name is Kana; I am a part-time privateer and freelancer for the Planet Trade Organization of the Four Quadrants of Space. I have journeyed far from the core systems of the universe seeking a world that has been completely terraformed to suit a variety of flora and fauna. As such, I have come to Satan City to treat with the great Hercule Satan in order to discuss rights and ownership over this world you call Earth." Same introduction as before, only she'd tweaked it a little.

Blinking, the butler stood at the door staring down at the smiling girl with the fiery locks for a good long minute of silence. Watching her hair wave behind her like a giant flame at the end of a candle, the man then looked over his shoulder and then back at the girl, before nodding to her in acknowledgement.

"Could you wait a moment, please?"

Kana nodded, "Of course."

The butler than promptly closed the door, leaving the girl standing there in silence and staring at the wooden barrier with an eager smile on her face.

XXX

The butler quietly and languidly made his way into the house via the great hall, hands behind his back and an unchanging expression in play. Turning right, he headed through the front lounge, decorated in all of the embellishments and commemorations awarded to the owner of the house, before then making his way into a secondary living space beyond that. Passing through several more rooms and another corridor along the way, the butler then stepped into what could only be described as a king's chamber.

Sweeping and expansive, with all the wealth and splendor you would expect from a person of high social standing, the room was warm and spacious. It had half a dozen small podiums set up along the walls with statues, all of which were dressed in the many uniforms Hercule Satan had worn over the years to his various competitions. The chamber also had paintings hung up along the walls with shelves of books stacked to one side and DVDs on the other, and a massive cinema screen TV setup above a superb surround sound system. To put it simply, it was decorated just as, if not more lavishly than all the other rooms put together.

Ignoring all of the trappings and ornaments surrounding him, the butler made a B-line straight for the owner of the establishment lying across the center couch. Coming to a stop beside it, hands behind his back and his game face on, the butler then waited patiently, listening to the large fighter's snickering as he perused through the girl magazine in his grip. It took several seconds of just standing there before the afro man in the bathrobe and slippers finally recognized the presence of his butler and addressed him.

"What is it, Alfred?"

"It's Jenkins, sir," the servant of the house replied stoically.

"Oh, yes, Jenkins. Sorry about that," Hercule cleared his throat, while not bothering to turn away from his article, "What's up?"

The butler was unfazed, "There's a girl at the front door asking for you, sir."

"Is it one of Videl's friends?" Hercule asked.

"No, sir."

"Is it somebody from the tabloids? If it is, tell them I'm busy." His expression twisting into one reflecting annoyance, the martial artist mumbled about 'stupid reporters' and how they were always coming to call on him. If he wasn't such a people person he would have sent all of them packing on the first swing. "I'm not interested in speaking with any vultures at the moment."

"No, sir," Jenkins replied while straightening up, "It's a young woman named Kana from something called the Planet Trade Organization. She says she's come to challenge you to a fight for the right to own the earth." The man said it in a way that sounded like the stupidest thing ever. Despite how impressive the girl appeared, no matter how she could have said it, no one could ever hope to take that kind of statement seriously.

Hell, even the butler thought it was some kind of joke. He figured it was just some hotshot who dropped by to challenge Mr. Satan to a one-on-one behind closed doors like they sometimes did.

Immediately catching onto what his butler had said Hercule threw him a suspicious look, "Is she hot?"
"Yes, sir. She is quite striking, if a little bit on the young side."

"Oh-ho. So it's a fan-slash-admirer, huh?" Hercule exclaimed, tossing his magazine aside before leaping to his feet. Snickering, the man gripped the belt of his robe with both hands and strode past his servant. "Well then, I'd better go over there and say hello. After all, I wouldn't want the people to think that Mr. Satan is a horrible person who wouldn't spare a moment to speak with one of the good people of his hometown."

Jenkins watched the man leave with a confident hop in his step, expression and position unchanging even when Hercule disappeared round the bend. Needless to say, it was impossible to tell what the butler was thinking. Of course, being a servant of the household, it probably made sense that the man was being tolerable of his boss's antics.

"Of course, sir."

XXX

Like a statue the girl remained, mostly staring at the door but every once in a while turning to look around the building's front yard. The mansion was massive, about as big as the palaces she'd visited on several other worlds she'd visited. It certainly bared all of the accouterments of a celebrity as well as a savior. The front garden was also quite beautiful, covered in a wide sheet of grass, bushes, and trees of all shapes and sizes, but mostly palms. The owner of the estate certainly spared no expense in making this a kingly home.

Absently, the fiery haired girl noticed the people walking past the home and taking it in, as well as the strange young woman standing at the front of the house. Ignoring them, the girl turned back to the door when she heard the sound of approaching footsteps once again. After waiting for several moments, she then looked up in time to see the entrance open and a large man twice her height appear in the doorway. His size immediately grabbing her attention, Kana's gaze panned upwards to look upon the chiseled face of the martial artist referred to by the people of the planet as the greatest warrior alive.

The sight of the girl with the fiery hair and the strange getup had Hercule stare at her for a moment, before a wide grin pulled across his face, "Why, hello there."

Cringing slightly at the man's booming voice, Kana then threw him a friendly smile, "Good day, sir. Are you the one they call Hercule Satan?"

The martial artist with the afro then grinned smugly, "Heh-heh. That's me, of course! What? Are you saying that you don't recognize the greatest martial arts champion in the world and the man who single-handedly defeated the mighty Cell?"

"I just wanted to make sure that I was speaking to the right man," the alien invader replied softly while bowing humbly to the imposing figure. "My name is Kana. I have journeyed far and gone to a great deal of effort to meet with you, Mr. Satan. I must say, the tales of your legendary exploits have certainly done well in encapsulating your magnificence. You are as impressive as the people of this planet said you were."

Hercule appeared flattered, "Why, thank you very much, young lady. The people sure do know the right things to say when they talk about me and my accomplishments. Words cannot fathom how deeply moved I am by their words of praise and gratitude." The man placed his hands on his hips and grinned down at the radiant youngster, who beamed back at him in return. "So… Kana, is it? Are you interested in having an autograph signed by yours truly? Or would you rather sit with me at my table and tell your friends at school that you ate dinner with the greatest martial artist in the
"You are most gracious," Kana bowed, but then fixed her gaze back onto the giant of a man, "But I would much rather we move on to the negotiations as soon as possible, if that is alright with you?"

It was that very word that had the man stare at the girl in momentary confusion, "Uh? Negotiations? What do you mean by that?"

Kana beamed, "I have journeyed far across the galaxy seeking to battle the strongest warrior from this planet to determine its security status. It is a form of negotiation that has been practiced by members of the Planet Trade Organization for years. Even though I am not a fulltime employee of the group, as I am a freelancer, I still follow the codes and practices of the business to ensure a fair and equal exchange between both parties. It is the law, after all." Her response eliciting an even more bewildered look from the champion, the woman continued. "The concession must be made solely between the investigator and the guardian of this planet, otherwise known as the region's strongest warrior. This is to determine whether or not the sectors in question are adequately protected by the current populace, as the Planet Trade Organization views all planets containing life to be extremely valuable and must be preserved."

"Umm… okay," Hercule murmured, looking absolutely lost as to what this girl was talking about. From his point of view, it almost seemed like she was speaking in code. However, there were a few things he was able to pick up from her extended tirade, which inevitably brought a smile to his face. "So you wish to have a little sparring match with the Champ, is that it? You wanna tell your friends back home you were able to trade punches with the strongest man in the world?"

"Yes," Kana nodded, giving the man her answer. "It would be a great honor."

"Okay then!" the big man chuckled while sticking his chest out, "Since you obviously traveled a long way to meet me, I wouldn't mind spending a couple of minutes busting out some of my less destructive moves. A cute little thing like you definitely deserves a shot at greatness." The martial artist then leant forward and showed the girl the side of his face. "Tell yah what, seeing as how I'm a sportsman, I'll let yah have the first punch, okay?"

This statement had the glowing girl recoil a little when the owner of the house showed her his cheek, "You… wish for me to make the first move?"

"Of course! Being the most powerful man alive, it would be completely unfair to my opponents if I didn't let them land the first blow," Hercule continued, obviously under the impression that this young girl wouldn't be able to hurt him. Looking her over, the redhead didn't seem like much of a threat. He was also certain that if he was to try and hit the girl, even if it was just a game, he would not only hurt her, but bring a lot of unwarranted bad press to his reputation. 'World Champ hospitalizes fan' didn't look good on the front page. So, being the kind 'sportsman' that he was, Mr. Satan considerately gave his visitor a fair chance. "Since this is going to be a short bout between you and me, let's make the most of it, yeah?"

Blinking a few times, Kana smiled brightly, "So you agree to our terms?" When she saw the man nod, the girl's expression took on several serious contours before her fists clenched tightly at her sides. "Very well then. Let the negotiations begin." She then pulled her fist back, taking aim at the human male who just stood there, puckering up with his hands held comfortably behind his back. "Information on this man says he's able to crush mountains with his bare hands and catch objects traveling faster than the speed of light. That means his reflexes are on an astonishingly high level. I'll make sure this punch is slow so that I can avoid a possible counter." Making sure she had her timing right, Kana jabbed out at him.
It was a light tap, nothing too powerful. If the stats on this Hercule Satan character were right, she made sure to throw a low velocity punch so as to avoid receiving a hit of her own should her opponent suddenly pull a fast one on her. In spite of his good word, the girl didn't trust people as far as she could throw them.

In bullet time you could see her knuckles crash across the great martial artist's face and completely distort it for all of a few milliseconds. Then, once her fist had finished extending and the gunshot of impact rang out, the stunned Hercule was then lifted clean off his feet and sent rocketing backwards through his house, crashing through every single wall and fixture before eventually exploding out the back door and across the yard.

The man's trajectory through every single barrier and door in the enormous domicile caused the entire property to shake, which startled Videl out of her sleep and had her looking around in panic.

Traveling for a second longer across his back garden, Hercule eventually collided with the trunk of a firm standing palm tree. He remained splayed up against it with a look of abject horror slapped across his face, before his stricken body fell and landed on the edge of his enormous swimming pool with a splash.

His anticlimactic flight not only had his butler staring through all the holes he'd made in bewilderment, but it had Kana blinking in surprise as well.

Lowering her fist, the fiery haired woman strolled into the mansion and began making her way to the back through the many man shaped holes her opponent had made. She passed by Jenkins, ignoring his surprised visage while also failing to notice Videl when she came running down the stairs to see what was going on. When she saw the fiery haired teenager walk past through her ruined home, she could only stare after her in shock.

"What's going on here?"

Descending the back steps to where the pool was, Kana came to a stop by its edge and watched as Mr. Satan floated there on his stomach like a waterlogged corpse. Thinking he was dead, she then saw the man throw his head up with a gasp and a cry of pain, gripping the side of his face with his back turned completely to her. After whimpering and sniveling for a few moments, wondering whether or not he'd broken something, the man then turned around when he sensed a pair of eyes on him and freaked out when he saw the orange haired girl staring back at him.

Hercule scrambled out of the water to the other side, clawing his way across the grass of his yard before turning around and gaping at the girl in the plug suit. "Wh-Wh-What in the heck are you?"

His question was promptly answered by his attacker levitating off of the ground and floating across the pool, which had his eyes bug out of its sockets. "Sh-She's just like those guys! The ones with the powers from the Cell Games!" When she landed on the other side, Kana then marched across the pavement and onto the grass where the man was still lying, only to see him backpedal away out of fear.

Kana stopped walking the moment Hercule moved, giving the man a confused stare, "I didn't expect this. I thought the strongest man in the world would be able to put up a much better fight than this." She tilted her head momentarily and raised an eyebrow. "For someone who is reputed to be earth's greatest fighter, credited with saving it from two completely different threats, you aren't as tough as the information says you are." She then smiled pleasantly and raised a finger to point down at him, the tip of which started to glow a brilliant gold, "Unless… you're hiding a major bulk of your strength in an effort to draw this conflict out?"

Seeing the girl start charging an energy attack prompted Hercule to cry out in terror and cover his face. But then, just when Kana was about to hit him with a blast that would cause more than a few burns, the teen was caught completely by surprise when something hard and fast slammed into the side of her head, cocking it to the side and causing her eyes to widen in surprise.

Unbeknownst to her, the celestial girl had been hit in the temple by a flying side kick executed by one Videl Satan, an attack which immediately had the star-child cease gathering energy and freeze.

When Videl saw her father cower in fear underneath their intruder when she raised her hand to shoot him, the raven haired girl reacted instantaneously and sprinted from her place on the back porch to stop her. At first the girl thought she'd be able to knock the intruder out on the first shot or at best stagger her enough to throw her off target. But when her leg unexpectedly crashed into something equivalent to a steel pole and the fire haired stranger didn't move beyond a slight head nudge, Videl immediately knew what she was up against.

Leaping away and back flipping across the grass, the eleven-year-old fighter skidded to a stop and took a stance. Setting a nervous glare upon the alien invader, whom she could feel nothing but bad vibes coming off of her, she saw her father's attacker robotically turn in her direction and narrow her eyes.

When Hercule realized he was still alive, he looked to see what was happening. "V-Videl! What are you doing?"

Identifying her attacker standing several yards away, Kana frowned. "A new opponent?" Marking her new foe, the woman straightened up and, without warning, fired two golden beams of energy directly from her eyes that flew towards her target at blazing speed. However, instead of traveling in a straight line, the beams zigzagged erratically and randomly through the air, bending and cornering at sudden angles while homing in on their intended target.

Videl immediately sprung into action, back flipping away from the beams when they attempted to hit her and continuing to run when she saw them chase after her. Sprinting across the grass, the youngster barreled out of the way to avoid the tracers a second time, before leaping over one of her dad's garden statues to hide behind it. The moment she concealed herself, the beams made a B-line towards the statue. But instead of hitting the Hercule monument full on, the beams shot up and over it, curling back down before homing in on their target once more.

Though initially surprised, the raven haired girl waited until the last moment before leaping out of the way, avoiding the beams that slammed into the statue, which exploded with concussive force. The blast not only caused a fireball and a shockwave that knocked Videl tumbling across the grass, it almost punched a ten meter wide crater in the ground. The statue meanwhile, lay in pieces across the ground.

Kana blinked in surprise when she saw Videl stagger back to her feet. "Impressive. No one has ever avoided my Circuit Tracer before, even if it wasn't set to kill." She then rounded on the newcomer, whom she could see was glaring at her while covered in dirt and burns. "What is your name?"

The raven haired fighter frowned and took a step back, "My name is Videl Satan."

"Videl Satan?" Kana repeated, narrowing her eyes. When she did, she suddenly produced an orange hologram directly over her left eye resembling a scouter. As soon as the visor appeared, it focused a set of crosshairs on the girl and began crunching numbers at high speed. The beeping of the device stopped moments later. "Hmm… you have a power reading of 130 riki." She then turned her head and focused on Hercule, who was still lying on the ground and looking across at the girl fearfully. When the numbers stopped once again, the alien frowned. "And your father has a Contemplating the scores, the extraterrestrial teenager then decided to focus her attention outside of the house. Panning over the city, her scouter began producing thousands of numbers, all of which were focusing on people that were far beyond reach of normal sight. After a few seconds of scanning, Kana stopped and frowned. "Most of the readings in this metropolis average around 5 to 10 riki. You two are by far the strongest individuals in this region... and probably the entire planet if my mathematical algorithm is correct." She then looked back down at the ground and sighed. "It's a shame. And here I was hoping for a challenge. But I suppose if Hercule Satan is the most powerful fighter on this planet, then I'm afraid I'm going to have to declare myself the winner by default."

It was her last remark that quickly caught Videl's attention, with the girl looking up to see the fiery haired woman shake her head in disappointment and deactivate the hologram over her eye. The child's gaze fixing upon the ground as well, the daughter of Mr. Satan quickly began breaking down the situation and working out what she'd missed from what she'd been able to observe.

Videl quickly came to the conclusion that this stranger, whoever the hell she was, was looking to challenge the strongest person on this planet and defeat them, instead of having to waste energy going through the entire population. Her search had somehow led her to her father, which seemed like an obvious choice from a normal person's point of view.

However, now that her eyes had been opened and she'd been able to catch a glimpse of the world beyond the one she'd grown up in, and after feeling how strong this girl actually was, Videl knew for a fact that this opponent of theirs was way out of her father's league.

There was only one person she knew who could face someone like this.

Kana's attention then turned towards the sky and she raised her hand, pointing it towards the clouds. "Bit! Activate the composer unit of the Star Shooter and prepare to digitize this entire planet for transport."

Hearing the woman begin preparations to potentially destroy or capture their world, Videl gritted her teeth and threw her hand up, "WAIT!" Her shout successfully attracting Kana's attention, the young girl then glared firmly in her direction, "You said you were looking for the most powerful fighter on the planet to challenge them, right? Well... I know exactly who you need to look for."

This had Kana lower her arm and stare in unnerving silence at the girl, "Who?"

Videl, sprouting a grin, stared confidently back at the fire haired woman, "His name is Son Gohan."

"Son?" Remembering have heard that name a little while earlier, Kana quickly brought her left arm up and activated her hologram projector. Cycling through information at light speed, she immediately came up with a profile of Son Gohan, as well as all of the information attached to it, "Son Gohan... as in the son of Son Goku?"

The raven haired girl nodded, "That's right."

"You're saying he's the most powerful fighter on this planet... not your father?" Kana asked, a little bit skeptical. Even though the first name she'd heard had been Son Goku, a person that had come straight from the King's mouth, she'd unfortunately set her expectations a little too high when she heard about the people's champion Hercule Satan and researched into all of his accomplishments. Her hopes had been raised and dashed all at once in spectacular fashion, so you could understand the teen's immediate doubts regarding this girl's sudden declarations.

She felt like she was being sent on a wild goose chase.

"Yes," Videl answered again with continuing certainty, her eyes shimmering with pride as she soldiered on. "He's strong… stronger than you can imagine. And get this, not only is he the one who defeated Cell and those aliens at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament," she added to this by shooting a glare at her father, which had the man turn slightly blue before Videl looked back at their planet's guest, "He and his friends also fought and defeated the space tyrant Frieza. Perhaps you've heard of him?" It was a shot in the dark, but she had to try.

Okay, now if the first bits of information didn't catch Kana's attention… THAT certainly did.

Looking up at the girl with an expression mirroring shock, the fire haired girl swore her heart skipped a couple of beats before her mouth started to move. "He… and his friends… were the ones that killed Frieza?"

"Yep," Videl nodded, cheering inwardly at finally rousing some sort of surprise out of the invader.

Eyes sparkling, Kana felt her excitement grow once more and grinned inwardly. "Frieza… he and his family were considered one of the most powerful family races in the Northern Quadrant at one time." They had also been the head of the Destruction Corps of the Planet Trade Organization, tasked with systematically destroying planets in order to create balance in the universe. Unfortunately, the family had gotten a little bit carried away in their duties and started wiping out planets off the record without prior consent from the core galaxies, which led to disputes between them and the heads of the organization. Nevertheless, they'd been one of the most infamous groups in the cosmos, known for their ruthlessness and efficiency. "But that was before they were all mysteriously wiped out several years ago by an unknown third party, leading to insurgency within their ranks."

While Kana silently pondered over this sudden development, Videl quickly edged around her and went to check on her father. Taking him by the shoulders, the girl stood by him protectively while their butler slowly moved around the swimming pool to see if there was anything he could do to help. However, after seeing what that woman had just done to the world martial arts champion, he wasn't sure there was anything any of them could do.

Kana's eyes closed meditatively as she stood in place, "Frieza was the second strongest in his family behind his brother Cooler. At maximum power, that pale lizard could generate 12,000,000 on the riki scale, which is more than enough to make even the strongest races think twice about crossing him." A chuckle escaped her lips as her fists clenched, causing the nodes on her body to glow a hot blue while the orange veins of her plug suit fluctuated. "Anyone who can defeat Frieza is definitely no slouch. I might get some worthwhile fun out of this planet yet."

"I made a grievous miscalculation," Kana spoke up, drawing Videl and Hercule's attention back to her when she smiled in their direction, "I'm sorry to have disturbed you and your family, and I apologize for any damages I may have caused to your property." With a low bow, she then took a few steps back and wrapped herself up in her metallic ball once again. As soon as she was completely incased, the metallic sphere hummed loudly and rocketed up into the sky at lightning speed, vanishing into the clouds with a sonic boom.

When the wind and dust finally settled, leaving the Satan mansion with a massive hole plowed through its center and the family scattered all across the backyard, Videl and Hercule spent the next few minutes recollecting their nerves. Following their close encounter with the kindest alien invader they would ever come across, who seemed like both an angel and Death incarnate sharing the same body, the pair could rest a little easy knowing that she was gone.

Videl however, being the smartest one there, knew for a fact that it wasn't over yet. Not by a long shot.

Reason being was that even though she'd just saved her father and the world from certain annihilation, she knew full well that she'd pretty much sent a rabid dog after her best friend in Mount Paozu.

Feeling immediate concern for his safety and knowing that he might be in trouble, Videl quickly made the decision to go see her friend and turned to glare down at her father.

The Champ, appearing so diminutive and pitiable before his daughter that he seemed physically smaller than her, looked up at his little girl with an ashamed and meek expression all in one. He gulped at the hard stare his child gave him, "Y-You know?"

The teen nodded, "Yeah."

"H-How long?"

"About a month now… though… I had a feeling much earlier than that," Videl replied, obviously referring to the man's supposed victory over the mighty Cell and sparing him a knowing smile as a result.

Hercule, murmuring uneasily, took a moment to suck it in before, with whatever strength he could muster, attempted to get to his feet. Hell, he spared no thought or consideration to the fact that the right side of his face, which had taken that monstrous hit from before, was practically swollen purple. "Videl… sweet pea… I… have a lot of explaining to do…"

"We can talk later dad," Videl said, pulling the man to his feet and seeing him look back at her from a timid, hunched over position. "But for now, I need to borrow your jet-copter…"

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Hi all, once again. Another chapter out and boy, the arc sure has gotten to a hilarious start.

Basically picking up immediately after the Bojack Arc, we see everyone has returned to their normal routines and living it up in their time of peace. Of course, unlike in the anime, Gohan isn't slacking off and the story doesn't start with a highschool fic. This period pretty much explores what Gohan and the Z-fighters are currently doing in their off time, and also shows the new kind of foes that show up during the Seven Year gap period that they have to face.

You'll also see how the Son family deals with how the public now know that they were the ones at the Cell Games as well.

For starters, Gohan and Videl have been keeping in contact over long distance, and have resolved to try and see one another more frequently face to face. This is where they start to organize time to visit one another, and where Videl asks our delightful hero whether he can train her. I think she will make some interesting headway in the next seven years when she manages to convince her father to let her go visit him, maybe even hang out at his place. Especially now since she told him she knows the truth, and knows who Gohan is.

Also, Gohan doesn't know Kana has arrived yet, since he's so focused at home doing other things he really hasn't been paying attention to his surroundings.

Zangya on the other hand is just keeping in the shadows and watching Gohan. She's not his enemy anymore, but she isn't his friend either. She's just an observer at this point, wrestling over whether or not she should interact with the group. It's a very confusing time for her, and the following arc will probably help her find some closure, as well as develop an epiphany in life.

And we also meet a new villain.

Unlike the pink bubblegum that is Buu, we see a member of the extended Planetary Trade Organization stepping into the light, Kana. She's a mercenary working for the company as a collector, and you'll find out more about her in the next chapter. The scene where Videl dodged her eye beams was inspired from Justice League Unlimited when Batman dodges Darkseid's Omega Beams, if people didn't pick up that reference. I thought that was a nice touch.

Anyway, hope to see you all in the fight scenes for the next chapter. : )
"Hey, Tom. You got that camera ready or what?" the raven haired woman in the black and white suit asked, stopping for a moment to glare back at her co-worker speedily unloading their equipment from the van.

"Hold on a second, Yumiko. I got it. Geez," the young, blonde haired adult in the fisherman's vest and red cap replied, turning away from the vehicle with the device in hand. "There's no need to rush." Upon switching it on, he then began trudging forward to walk alongside the woman, who smiled confidently as her partner adjusted the lens before turning back ahead of them.

"Good. Now come on. I want to see if we can catch an interview with the Son boy and ask him about the Cell Games," the reporter replied, beginning to move across the hill towards the house at a casual pace. Wearing an armband on her right emblazoned with the ZTV logo, the most famous news stations in the world and the one responsible for covering the harrowing events of earth's most terrifying day, it was painfully clear why the two of them were there.

After the events of the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament, it was expected that people like this were bound to come around sooner or later…

Even though many had come and gone already. The past month had been pretty hectic.

"So… we're just gonna go knock on their front door and hope that the boy is in?" Tom asked, propping the heavy box up his shoulder.

"Well of course. I mean… it's not like we have any security to worry about," the beautiful, long haired Yumiko replied with a smug tone of voice and her nose in the air. "Trust me. This'll be a walk in the park. The public is going to wanna hear the young fighter's side of the story of how the Champ Mr. Satan saved the world from Cell."

It was her vocalized plan that had her skittishly pursuing partner murmur uneasily. "I'm not sure about this. A couple of my friends back at the station warned me that there was a very scary and strong woman living in that house. They said she chased them all away with a rake and even tossed one of them over the hill."

"Oh, don't be ridiculous," Yumiko replied, looking back at her cameraman disbelievingly as they descended the slope toward the dome-shaped building down below. "They were probably just scared off by the mother with a gun… the cowards. They are country folk after all." The thought of a whole truckload of station workers and reporters being sent away by one woman made her laugh. She bet she could do much better than that.

Unfortunately, in her moment of staring self-assuredly back at her assistant, the well-dressed news worker failed to notice where she was going and inadvertently walked into something small and solid only a few yards away from the Son home. Stumbling backwards and caught completely by surprise, both she and Tom looked to see what it was they'd run into, and immediately became horrified when they saw a blue-skinned woman with pointy ears and long, curly orange hair standing right in their path with her arms crossed.

Upon getting their attention, the earthling-dressed yet still very alien-looking Zangya flared her ki at the intruders ever so slightly, allowing a blood-red aura to surround her lithe form and a menacing shadow to cross her face. Seeing the two news crew members back off in an instant, trembling from head to toe and huddling up close to one another at the sight of her threatening form, the former lieutenant of Bojack’s gang frowned.

"Scram."

With a terrified scream, the two news reporters took off like the road-runner, charging back up the hill and leaping into their van. As soon as they were in, they started the engine and drove off, trying to put as much distance between them and the 'devil woman' guarding the house.

After watching the ZTV vehicle disappear over the horizon in a cloud of dust, Zangya snorted, "Good riddance." A smile then crept across her face at the mild sense of amusement the act had brought her and nodded in acknowledgement. "Consider yourselves lucky it wasn't the banshee that chased you off." From what she'd seen the last time the news reporters had come to the house wanting to interview the demi-Saiyan, the Son mother proved to be just as terrifying as she was.

Only she didn't have pointy ears.

Making sure that there was no one else left in the area, Zangya looked back at the house momentarily before flying back over to her tree.

No lousy human cockroaches were going to badger Son Gohan before she did. That was a promise.

OOO

(Meanwhile – Inside the House)

"Gohan! Could you come here for a moment please?!"

"Coming!" Quickly shutting off the vacuum cleaner in the living room, the demi-Saiyan set the machine aside and hurriedly made his way into the kitchen. When he arrived, he was promptly greeted by the smile of his mother, who was standing by the table with a few slips of zeni bills and a receipt in her hand. "What's up, mum?"

The Son woman beamed happily, "I have a little errand for you to run today." She handed him the money and paper, which the boy gingerly took from her hand. "A couple weeks ago I ordered a few new sets of clothing from the Cosmopolitan store over in Satan City. You know the big shop I took you to with all the home style dresses and kimonos on display at the front?" When she saw her son nod, she grinned, "I need you to pop into that place and pick them up for me."

"No problem, mum," Gohan replied cheerfully, at the same time clenching the money in his hand. "It shouldn't take me too long."

Chi-Chi nodded and then gestured to the bills, "That should be enough to cover the cost of the dresses. Be sure to bring them all back in one piece, okay? And if you're quick I'll make you something extra special for tea tonight."

"Awesome," Gohan chirped, being sure to fold up the notes and slip them and the receipt into his blue, gi belt. Making sure the money was secure the youngster then adjusted his top and dashed towards the door, where he slipped on the blue boots of his uniform. "I'll be back soon."
"Okay, Gohan. Be careful, sweetie," his mother replied. Seeing the boy smile, he then moved at super speed out the door and up into the sky. He was airborne before the door had even closed behind him, bringing a warm glow to the woman's face. "Just like his father: lively and eager as ever." She then sighed and, glancing down, rested a hand over her stomach once again. "Hopefully things will turn out alright for us."

Unbeknownst to the mother though, and to the energetic demi-Saiyan as his form disappeared over the horizon, the orange-haired figure of Zangya, who was standing underneath a familiar oak tree and watching the house intently, took off from her spot and followed after the boy.

Curious to know where Gohan was going, the woman kept a safe distance from him while he traveled at jet speed northwards.

Of course, she wasn't the only one that was watching him…

OOO

(Meanwhile – Above the Planet)

Back up in orbit above the planet, the spherical pod containing the fiery haired Kana had stationed itself above the easterly half of the continent once again. Able to make out the faint outlines of cities and urban areas far below, the visitor from outer space had a perfect, unobstructed view of all of the major communities and towns in sight. Despite there being over two billion people living on the planet, the investigator was confident that she would be able to track down and find the person she was looking for. Just a quick browse through the information in her system and a few seconds of number crunching, she found her target's home in an instant.

However, having already tried this method twice before, with rather awkward results on both counts, the huntress knew right then and there that she needed to use a more precise method of tracking. Through trial and error, Kana realized she couldn't rely on her old means of searching for her target on such a large and diverse planet. She also realized she couldn't rely on the scouter system either, since she knew that there were many beings out there capable of concealing their energy levels, which was why she wasn't able to pick up anything on the first scan.

She was overzealous in her approach, which led to two muck ups.

Therefore, since she couldn't depend on one system to find what she was looking for, she decided to combine both and expand down her parameters.

So, upon suspending herself in orbit above the planet, instead of just rocketing down to her desired location the moment her sensors honed in on it, she spent another couple of seconds making sure she had all the data she needed before making her next move.

After all, she didn't want to make the same mistake a third time.

"The Son household is located on the edge of the region known as Mount Paozu," Kana murmured, the hologram screen in front of her bringing up a large crosshair over a satellite image of the landmass far below. That was where her target's home was located. "There are currently two family members taking up residence in that domicile. One of them is the mother, Son Chi-Chi, and the other is her eldest child, Son Gohan." A smile crossed her lips when she saw two life signs blink onto her screen when she zoomed in on the site, both of them appearing as red dots. Just as she expected.

Crunching the numbers, Kana then got an immediate readout on the two life forms through her scouter system, the scores of which hovered above both figures. The investigator raised an eyebrow. "The mother has a reading of 140 riki. Interesting." She then looked at the second one. "Son Gohan has a power reading of 135 riki. Hmm... that can't be right..." Her brow furrowed somewhat as she looked upon the profile figure of her target, "For someone to have fought against Frieza..."

However, just as she was watching the signatures mingle about inside the home from her orbital position above the planet, she suddenly saw one of the red dots take off at an incredible speed in a northeasterly direction. This immediately had the numbers on her screen go haywire and a new reading appear above the fast moving Son Gohan, which had Kana's eyes widen.

"15,000,000 riki?" At this, Kana realized the boy must have been suppressing his power inside of his home so that he didn't accidentally damage anything or draw any attention to himself. When she did, an excited grin formed on her face, "Now that's more like it." She then ran through a swift line of code before several new numbers appeared on screen.

Calculating the boy's speed and trajectory across the country, the visitor to the planet figured that she would be able to intercept the super human directly over Satan City. So, upon punching the numbers into the system, her pod then shot straight down towards the planet at breakneck speed, piercing the atmosphere seconds later.

OOO

(Satan City)

"Man, there are so many people out today," Krillin mumbled to himself, looking through the window of the coffee shop he was in and watching as hundreds of civilians ambled down the road in two different directions. Seeing the multitude of bodies on the move and hearing the clamor of the crowd seep in through the open door brought a chuckle from the short Z-fighter as he quietly reached for his cappuccino, "Good thing I'm not on the street right now... otherwise I'd be swamped."

He was a little guy in one of the biggest cities in the world. How could he not think about stuff like that? Having lived on a tiny island for so many years surrounded by only a couple of people in his life, the transition into a concrete environment where the population suddenly skyrocketed definitely had more than a few compasses spinning.

Smiling as he stirred his coffee, the man turned back to the quiet store laid out around him, where he could see only a couple of people occupying the tables and booths. "Ah well, as long as there aren't any wars going on or evil aliens dropping down from the skies to invade our planet, then I'm not complaining."

Determined to make the most of the free time that he had, the young Z-fighter had decided to drop out of his training for the day and dropped by Satan City to have a look around. With the earth now in a state of peace and with no diabolical villains threatening to spoil their days, Krillin was adamant in getting back out there in the world and living it up. He even thought about giving Yamcha a ring to see if he wanted to go clubbing tonight and mingle with the common folk. It'd been a while since either of them had really done something like that, and it was high time the scarf-faced former ranger and mercenary got himself a girlfriend.

Krillin on the other hand wasn't fussed about that. Reason being was that he had his eye set on somebody else and would often think about whenever he was on his own.

Speaking of which...
"I wonder how Android 18 is spending her day," the short man thought curiously, taking a sip of his coffee while staring down at the table.

It'd been a while since he last saw her. Ever since the group left the balcony of Kami's Lookout two months ago, he swore he'd only seen her twice; once when he was training on another island and he swore he saw her watching him from a distant tree, and another time when he was out in the village doing shopping and he caught a glimpse of her in the streets.

Since then, there'd been no other signs of her. Complete and utter radio silence, which sort of brought the man's mood down a couple of pegs.

A heavy sigh escaping his lips as he absently stirred the contents of his cup, Krillin spared a moment of thought to the beautiful blonde android that had, for all intents and purposes, disappeared from the limelight. "Is she going to show up out of the blue and say 'hi' or something? It'd really make my day if she did." She did say that she would. To be more precise, she'd said to all of the Z-fighters within ear shot while her back was turned to them that she would drop by to see him sometime soon. It was a pretty comforting notion, "Unless my heart's just playing tricks on me."

Damn it. Being a love struck fool was not an easy thing to live with. It made him all gushy, paranoid and edgy.

"Well… I can't blame her if she's not interested in seeing me again. I mean, there are a lot of better looking guys out there… and after all the crap we had to go through, I wouldn't be surprised if even she just wanted to have a little bit of normal for a change," Krillin sighed, bringing his cup up and taking another sip. Pondering on the idea of a long term peace and what it would be like to spend with the blonde girl, the man looked up with a murmur…

He then did the most hilarious spit take ever when he saw Android 18 standing right there in front of him and made sure to aim the hot brew to the side.

"E-Eighteen!" the monk exclaimed in shock, drawing a few glances from the surrounding bystanders. Hitting his chest and coughing out the rest of his coffee, he looked up at the woman standing there with her arms folded, "W-What are you doing here?"

The cool beauty, wearing a casual set of clothes consisting of a pair of jeans and a black halter top, stared back at the man momentarily with her ocean blue eyes. After which, she then shrugged and looked away, "I was just…" She paused for a second, "walking around the shops and having a look around, seeing if there was anything new on sale. I then spotted you from outside and came in to see how you were doing." She said that in the same tone of voice she was best known for.

"Oh. Really?" Gulping and feeling his insides turn to jelly when she glanced his way, the man then mustered up whatever courage he could and smiled warmly in her direction. "I mean… that's great! It's… it's really good to see you again, Eighteen."

A bit of warmth appearing in her cheeks at the man's smile and words, the blonde looked away again in another direction. The two of them remained quiet for several moments, one rubbing his head and thinking about what else to say, while the other stood there, trying to focus on something else that wasn't the short Z-fighter.

After a bit of uncomfortable silence, the girl turned back to the warrior and nodded down to him, "You mind if I join you?"

"Huh? Oh. Yeah. Sure! Of course," Krillin exclaimed, beaming enthusiastically as he hopped to his feet and pulled up a chair for the woman he hadn't seen for ages. When she sat down and tucked her hair behind her ear, the man came back around and sat down as well, looking completely nervous. "Would you like me to get you something?"

Finding a comfortable position, the woman then looked back at the man and smiled a very small smile. "Sure," she nodded. "I'll have a black tea. Plain."

Grinning, Krillin looked over to see the waiter come stand with his hands gingerly laced in front of him. "The lady will have a standard black tea, please. No sugar."

"Very good, sir," the young man nodded, before quickly hurrying off to tend to the order.

Gently nudging aside his cappuccino and leaning against the table, Krillin gazed across at the woman now sitting quietly across from him with her hands in her lap, "So…" He began nervously, "What've you been up to lately?"

The blonde android shrugged, "Not much, just up and down… trying to find some things and a place to fit in."

"How's that working out for yah?"

"Not very well I'm afraid," the woman replied with a distasteful frown. "I haven't been able to find my brother, wherever the hell he is… so I've been on my own for the past couple of months."

"You're not upset about it, are you? I mean…" Krillin quickly rephrased his question by clearing his throat, "Are you doing okay?"

"I can't complain," Eighteen answered, giving it a moment of thought while suddenly finding an interest in the wall across the way. "I've been moving around quite a lot lately, not really settling down anywhere, and I've had plenty of time to myself to think. After the whole Cell ordeal, I just needed a bit of space to clear my head." She then glanced at the martial artist, giving him a genuinely straight look, "And you? I heard you got into a bit of trouble at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament a month ago…"

"Oh? You heard about that, huh?" Krillin laughed uneasily while scratching his head, but then saw the woman staring at him without so much as a twitch. Swallowing a little, the monk continued, "Yeah… we got into a bit of a fight with this guy named Bojack and his gang, some hotshots who wanted to conquer the universe or something like that. I don't know… it was all pretty much of a blur to me. The person I ended up fighting knocked me out with just a few kicks and sent me into a wall."

Eighteen blinked, her expression relatively unchanged, "Are you alright?"

"Uh…" A little bit surprised by the woman's sudden question and seeing her staring at him with great intent, Krillin quickly came up with an answer, "Y-Yeah. I mean, I got a few nasty cuts and bruises here and there, but I'm feeling great now." He chuckled and brought his arm up, rotating it while gripping his shoulder. "It'll take more than a few hits to bring this guy down. Don't you worry about that."

This news brought a relieved sigh from the woman, who then gave the man another small smile, "Well… I'm just glad you're okay."

Noticing the strangely pleasant look she was giving him, Krillin remained speechless for a moment. But after a few seconds of gathering his thoughts, the man chuckled and rubbed his head, "Th-Thanks. I'm… glad to see you're doing okay as well."
Beaming, Eighteen was then about to move on to another question until something in the air suddenly startled both her and the Z-fighter out of their conversation. Eyes snapping upwards, the pair then leapt out of their seats, with the monk inadvertently knocking his over while the two of them focused all of their senses on the thing that was fast approaching them. Sweat broke out on both their faces when they got a better read on it.

"S-So much power… what is that?" Krillin asked, looking absolutely stunned.

Whatever it was, it was heading straight towards them from above the planet…

XXX

Feeling the wind whipping at his hair as he traveled along at his regular speed, Son Gohan was making excellent progress towards Satan City. Looking down to see the land whiz past him in a sweeping montage, with the fields and valleys soon being replaced by farmlands and suburbs, the youngster spent the final leg of his journey taking in his surroundings, which he had seldom done in the past. Most of the time, whenever he'd been required to fly places, he'd always been in a hurry, never really taking the time to admire the countryside.

Now, with the opportunity presented to him, he could truly appreciate the sights and sounds of the planet around him. What made it an even greater splendor was the fact that it was peace time and he had no galactic threats to worry about.

"I should take a page out of my dad's book and go for a trip around the world someday. See what's what," Gohan thought, briefly recalling some of the stories his father had told him back when they'd been training in the Hyperbolic Time Chamber. After hearing about all of the amazing things his dad had done, it made him strongly consider doing something similar. It'd sure be a worthwhile experience to have.

But just before Gohan could get completely engrossed in the pristine wilderness beneath him, he suddenly sensed something strange and looked up. Noticing he was approaching Satan City, he quickly realized this odd vibe wasn't coming from up ahead and looked towards the sky, above the towering buildings of the metropolis several kilometers away. When he did, he saw through his eagle eye vision an object passing through the atmosphere, trailing fire and smoke while plummeting towards the earth.

The demi-Saiyan balked. "A meteorite?" Sensing a strange ki signature coming from it, Gohan immediately thought the object was volatile and, his eyes cutting from it to the city, the youngster realized it was on course for impact and picked up speed.

A sonic boom rang out when Gohan's body literally broke the sound barrier. The demi-Saiyan made sure to increase his speed enough to align with the falling object and, making a quick calculation in his head, gave it a burst just as he was entering the outskirts of the mega city.

Civilians down below turned their attention to the sky when they heard a series of loud 'cracks' ring out and looked up just in time to see the fireball plummeting towards them. Those directly underneath the falling object and could see it approaching their city immediately clamored in fright and began to move out of the streets. However, as panic started to ensue, what the people saw next came as an even bigger shock to them when, from out of nowhere, a teenager dressed in an orange and blue gi flew into view and tackled the meteorite out of the air.

The boy managed to intercept it when it was only ten feet away from colliding with the nearest skyscraper.
Upon catching the large, human sized sphere and stopping it from making landfall, which would have easily wiped out several blocks and skyscrapers, Gohan flew on. The flames extinguishing themselves as the orb was carried away from the city center, the young male breathed a sigh of relief, as he knew he'd just stopped a catastrophic disaster from befalling the people.

He then took a moment to inspect the object in his arms and saw that the metal sphere was silver, perfectly smooth, with grooves all over it that were glowing a hot orange.

It wasn't a meteorite, though it certainly looked extraterrestrial from a science fiction point of view.

But then, before the youngster could fully examine the strange object he'd stopped from hitting the metropolis, Gohan blinked in surprise when he suddenly saw a burst of steam escape the orb's channels before the ball started to unwrap itself in his arms. A split second later, the boy felt his fingers interlock with a pair of hands and recoiled in shock when, emerging from the dome, he found himself face to face with a beautiful girl about a couple years older than him, wearing a figure-hugging metallic plug suit with a curvaceous figure, and long, orange hair that glowed like the sun, which grew past her legs and was bellowing in the air around her.

A stunning girl with fire-like hair and the face of an angel being the last thing Gohan expected to come out of the pod as he continued his flight over the city, the demi-Saiyan was too stunned to react when the teenage alien removed her right hand from his and slammed a hook across his cheek. The blow crashed across Gohan's face with a thunderclap, cocking the boy's head to the side and causing him to lose control of his flight, sending both him and the girl he was pushing through the air spiraling into the city streets below.

With the sound of jets echoing across downtown, the pair crashed into the middle of the main highway with an earthshaking 'bang'. The impact drawing the attention of every single person on the street and the nearby buildings, the once two airborne people slid along the floor for several painful yards, kicking up a cloud of dust along the way. Then, grabbing the head of the girl on top of him, Gohan gave a loud yell and tossed her, throwing her down the street and spinning through the air spiraling into the city streets below.

Performing an acrobatic twirl to slow her down, Kana righted herself and slammed her feet into the tarmac, skidding to a stop and digging two trenches through the ground. Once her movement ceased, the fiery haired girl looked up to see Gohan flying straight at her, his fist loaded back for a punch. Taking a stance, Kana waited until he threw it before catching his arm and, using his momentum, spun him around and threw him back down the highway.

Yelping in surprise at the sudden counter toss, Gohan flew for half a kilometer before slamming into the concrete back first. Bouncing down the road a couple of times, the boy then leapt to his feet and slid backwards along the ground until he came to a smoky stop several hundred meters from where he first hit the highway. Cars coming down the road in both directions literally skidded to a stop at the sight of the 'jaywalker', with the drivers getting out of their vehicles to see what was going on.

A wall of dust blocking his view, Gohan took a stance and glared into the mist, searching for his foe. Several seconds later, just as the Z-fighter was preparing to go on the offensive, the cloud suddenly parted and the fiery haired girl came flying straight at him; tackling him in the chest and knocking him off his feet. A loud 'oof' escaped the demi-Saiyan's lips when he was knocked back for several yards before the pair collided with an eighteen wheeler's front, slamming into its grill and knocking the truck carrying the stack of cinder blocks into the row of cars behind it.

The people in the cars had to get out of the way to avoid the massive transporter from smashing into them.
Feeling his back wedged into the front of the vehicle, his small body squashing its engine like a pillow, Gohan gave a loud yell and slammed a right hook across the girl's face. The impact snapped her head to the side, the force of which causing a loud gunshot to echo throughout the neighborhood and the girl to stumble away, freeing the Saiyan from the corner.

Expression conveying momentary surprise, Kana turned back to glare at her opponent before, clenching her right fist, retaliated with a punch of her own, cracking the boy across the mug in a similar manner with a second artillery shot ringing out. Though the half-Saiyan recoiled, he immediately came back with another punch that the girl evaded.

The pair began to box; trading lightning fast punches that the two fighters blocked and parried respectively, until Kana over flourished a right straight that her opponent deftly caught. With her wrist in his grip, Gohan spun around her and caught the girl in a standing hammerlock with his left arm hooking around her neck.

With her back against his chest, the half-Saiyan increased pressure on the invader's arm in an attempt to force her into submission. However, just when it seemed like he had her, Kana's eyes suddenly widened, the orange channels on her armor flashed blue and, with a loud growl of effort, she engulfed both herself and her opponent in lightning.

"GAAAAAAAHHHHHHHH!" Gohan gave a cry of agony as he was electrocuted by the girl, the defensive countermeasure forcing him to release his opponent and freeing her from his hold.

Powering down, Kana spun around and pointed her hand at her stunned foe, unleashing a golden blast right into his chest. Gohan looked up just in time to catch the attack that sent him flying into a building.

Civilians screamed and barreled out of the way when the boy slammed into the concrete wall with an earsplitting 'crack', using the building's support to hold back the blast that continued to drill into his palms. Gritting his teeth against the burning sensation, Gohan eventually mustered the strength enough to push the beam away and deflect it into the sky. The blast detonated when it slammed into the top of the tower, taking out a chunk of the roof but managing to explode safely out of reach of any residents.

But then, the second the half-Saiyan deflected it, Gohan was unexpectedly struck in the chest by his opponent appearing and drilling into him with a blow that sent him blasting through every single wall of the office block behind him.

When the boy eventually exploded out the other side, he ended up smashing through a parked car, taking out its roof before crashing into the middle of the road.

"Ow. That hurt." Groaning as he laid there in a crumpled heap, the young Saiyan then looked up in shock when Kana suddenly appeared directly over him with her hand pointed down at his face.

Reacting instinctively from his prone position, Gohan slammed his foot into the side of her leg, tripping the girl at the last second and forcing her to release her blast into the ground, engulfing both of them in an explosion that choked the entire area with dust and smoke.

XXX

Managing to convince her dad quite easily to hand over his jet-copter, Videl wasted no time in unpacking it from its capsule and climbing on board. As soon as she shut the hatch and switched on the engine, she skillfully lifted it out of their mansion's backyard and into the air. It was no difficult task. Having learned how to operate it from an online manual, getting used to it firsthand...
only took her a few short minutes.

Upon stabilizing the craft, the girl then accessed the GPS and dialed in Gohan's home address. Finding it easily enough, she then maneuvered the copter and began flying in the direction of Mount Paozu. But just as she was in the process of leaving the center of the metropolis, a couple beams of light, smoke, and a series of explosions drew her attention downtown in the opposite direction.

Caught by surprise at the sight of the plumes of black smoke rising from the information district, the girl quickly came to the conclusion that those beams of deadly energy were no ordinary occurrence. In fact, she was pretty sure they were related to that extraterrestrial girl that'd just visited their house.

"Something big is going on over there," Videl thought, quickly changing course and heading in the direction of the explosions.

Whatever the hell was going on now, it was happening all over this damn country.

XXX

A concussive explosion sent Gohan spiraling through the twentieth floor of a telecommunications administration building, crashing through dozens of cubicles and office desks before he ended up landing in the middle of a large park. Lying sprawled out at the bottom of the crater, the half-Saiyan groaned and sprang to his feet, looking up to see the girl that'd blasted him fly over the same building, charge an energy ball above her head and fling it down at him.

Gritting his teeth, the boy clapped his hands together at his side and, stepping forward with a superb pivot, smashed the ball back at its user. "FORE!"

The approaching Kana had a split second to look surprised before her blast impacted against her chest and detonated, sending her spinning to the ground. Forming a crater in the same park, Gohan pumped his fist victoriously and watched the cloud of dust fade away. When it did, he saw his opponent step out of the hole she'd formed surrounded by dozens of terrified civilians, all of whom were now standing back to watch the fight taking place between the two super-powered beings.

Glaring across at her opponent with her hair wafting behind her like a flame, Kana smirked and patted down her chest. "A fine hit. Nice follow-through." Once ridding herself of the scorch mark, she quickly frowned and glared back at the boy, watching him take a stance and square off against her.

Narrowing his eyes, the young hybrid let out a yell and charged forward, blasting across the ground at high speed before swinging out at the alien with an overhand. However, the moment his fist came within range, he suddenly saw the girl's form light up a dazzling gold before, like a shot of lightning, she vanished in a flash. His fist passing through air, Gohan had a moment to let out a gasp of surprise before he received a kick to the side from his opponent teleporting in his path, which sent him bouncing across the reserve like a ragdoll.

Hitting the ground about three times at an insane speed, the boy was about to right himself until a second blow to the back from his opponent teleporting in his path smacked him in another direction. Gohan's body crashed through several trees and smashed into a statue of Hercule Satan, smashing it to pieces while he hit the ground behind it.

Heading spinning from the sudden directional changes and body sore from the swift beating, Gohan struggled to his hands and knees with a groan. Shaking his head, the bruised and battered youngster frowned while he glared at the footpath beneath him. "Okay. That's new."

Super speed was one thing. But teleportation? This was the first time he'd actually had to fight somebody who could do that.

Sucking it up, the boy rose to his feet and glared across the park from where he'd come. When he did, he saw his opponent appear before him in a golden flash, floating a story above the ground several yards away, and looking down at him intensely. Once both were facing each other, the pair exchanged heated glares until one of them decided to break the ice.

"You're a lot stronger than I had anticipated," the girl spoke, tilting her head curiously at the young warrior. "Judging from the conditions of this planet, you're also far too strong to be an ordinary human. Why is that?" She then produced the same hologram scouter over her left eye, which began to scan and analyze the boy a little more closely. After the flickering lights in the screen ended a few seconds later, Kana raised an eyebrow in surprise. "You have the characteristics of a human, but many of your other physical traits classify you as a Saiyan." She then smiled vibrantly, "You're a hybrid, aren't you?"

Gohan, a little caught off guard by her incredibly accurate analysis, smiled back at her, "Yeah. I'm a half-breed. Is that a problem?"

"Not at all. I'm just a little bit surprised to see that there's a Saiyan living in this part of space. Ever since the destruction of their home world, Saiya-jins have become an incredibly rare species in the universe. I've only ever seen ten others like you in the last decade," Kana replied, her scouter flickering some more before deactivating altogether. "It certainly answers the question as to why you're so strong… and why Frieza was probably killed."

Gohan furrowed his brow in obvious dislike of that name, "You knew that monster?"

"I knew him, yes, but only by reputation. We only ever had one meeting with each other and that was many years ago," the girl informed before bringing her right hand up and opening it at her side. When she did, she began gathering energy, which had her palm start to glow. It was a sight that put Gohan on immediate guard. "But let's stop talking about Frieza. I'm more interested in seeing what else you can do."

Just as the demi-Saiyan was about to guard against another attack, an explosion struck Kana in the side that sent the alien rocketing across the park. Plowing a trench into the floor when she landed, the girl expertly used her momentum to leap out of the dirt and back onto her feet. Body smoking from the surprise attack, she glared up to see several more figures descend from the sky and blinked in surprise at what she saw.

Floating at a vantage point side by side, she saw the spiky haired form of a man in Saiyan battle-armor and a lavender haired young man in black pants and a vest. Floating alongside them she also saw a green warrior in a purple gi, with a white turban on his head and a cape with a wide shoulder frame. And then, landing on the ground beneath them, she spotted a blonde haired woman in a trendy outfit and a short, bald man in casual clothing, both of them coming to stand defensively in her line of sight.

Blinking in surprise, Kana smirked, "My, my… this planet certainly is full of surprises." She said this while watching the newcomers land around Gohan, who took up formation in the center of their group while they all focused their attention on the foreigner.

"So you're the one causing all the fuss around here," Piccolo spoke, his cape ruffling on the breeze. "Makes sense since you're obviously an out-of-towner. But you certainly put on quite a show for us Beads of sweat running down his head as he looked the radiant stranger over, Krillin glanced across at the others, "Yeah but... what is she?" He looked back at the girl and made note of her glowing hair. "She's not like any alien I've ever seen before." Of the many races they were able to meet during their battle against Frieza and his horde, this one differed from every single one of them in many extremely noticeable ways.

Of course, being the one to have the most knowledge in this regard, the ever imposing Vegeta stepped forward. "She's a Seirei," the prince spoke, drawing glances from the Z-fighters around him and narrowing his glare, "A very rare and old race from a planet close to the centre of the universe. Their people have an incredibly strong life force, able to live for hundreds of years without growing old. They also possess incredibly advanced technology and are born with the ability to manipulate light." This information had the entire group regard this new figure with a little more caution, which then led Vegeta into another important segment. "They don't stray too far from their world either. All Seirei prefer to stay close to one another and away from the affairs of other planets."

"Then what's this one doing so far from home?" Piccolo asked, arms folded and his serious expression unchanged.

Grunting, the man with the flame-style haircut looked across at the girl with his game face in full play. Figuring he'd beaten around the bush enough, the ill-tempered Saiyan moved forward once again. "It's been a long time, Kana."

Appearing unsurprised by the appearance of the man, the orange haired invader smiled, "It certainly has been, Prince Vegeta."

Gohan glanced across at his dad's rival curiously, "You know her?"

"Yes. We met over twenty years ago, back when my people were still pushing papers for that chrome dome of a former boss of mine," the Saiyan royal responded, narrowing his eyes. "I was a kid back then, but I remember seeing her when she was visiting my father's palace to discuss business regarding our planet and its inhabitants. She was a bit of an airhead then and she still looks like an airhead now." His remark earned a playful grin from the glowing girl, which had all the Z-fighters present sweat drop, including Eighteen. "But don't be fooled by her appearance. She is incredibly strong, somebody who Frieza detested but wouldn't dare to cross. Even after all this time, she looks like she hasn't aged a day."

"Seriously?" Krillin looked a little gob smacked at that, turning to stare at the radiant being in the sophisticated plug suit. "Twenty years ago, right? She still looks like she's sixteen!"

"She ages gracefully, that's for sure," Trunks voiced in, narrowing his gaze on the long haired alien, "But that doesn't explain the reason for her being here and why she's not on her home planet."

This was yet another question that was easy to answer. "It's because she's a wanderer," Vegeta went on, stopping any and all other remarks in their tracks, "Rogue, drifter, whatever you want to call her. She's a freelancer-slash-explorer who traipses about the universe visiting other worlds and studying their cultures. She also moonlights as a member of the Planet Trade Organization, the one that Frieza and his family was formerly a part of. If I remember correctly, this girl was charged with the inquisition and acquisition of rare and valuable planets. Her main job for the group was to determine whether or not the security of a planet and its inhabitants were in good hands, and whether the guardian of the world, otherwise known as the strongest warrior on the planet, was... up there."
able to meet the organization's standards for chief overseer of that region."

"If you like to call it that. Frankly, I like to think of it as a fun weekend; hopping from planet to planet and beating the stuffing out of the strongest people on them," Vegeta said, at the same time narrowing his eyes. "Basically, if the guardian of the planet fails to meet the inquirer's standards, then she takes the planet for herself, transports it, and sells it to another galaxy to be safe guarded, until the role of protector can be passed on to somebody who is deemed worthy."

This quickly had Krillin's attention. "Sh-She takes planets and sells them? How?" Even Eighteen appeared a little bit surprised.

"Using her home world's technology, she's able to compress entire worlds into code and transport them via ship, which is floating above our heads as we speak," Vegeta informed, prompting a couple members of the group to turn their gazes skywards before focusing back on the person in front of them. The sight of her standing there with her glowing orange head brought a spit from the flame-haired man. "In my opinion I think that's a very stupid practice. It's basically the organization's way of playing God with every single person in the universe."

"I think so too," Kana spoke up, alerting the group to her presence once more while she stood there, perfectly still, with a curious smile on her face. "But I'm not interested in what the organization does, which is why I only work for them part time. I'm just in it for the money." She said this while tilting her head and giving the group a very cute look. "I left my home planet a long time ago to explore the universe and to take in everything there was to see… not to mention have as much fun along the way as possible. Since I'm a security investigator, the last thing I want to do is wreck a perfectly good planet such as this one. That's the demolition department's job… which of course happens to be the same section that your group terminated when you killed Frieza and his family. So you don't have to worry about the earth being destroyed by me. Something like that will just depreciate its value."

Okay, so while this girl loved planets and wanted to avoid destroying them, she also worked for cold hard cash as a mercenary. On one hand she was cheerful and polite, but on the other hand was a calculative gun-for-hire.

To the Z-fighters, this girl had a very odd moral compass guiding her.

So much for black and white. This one was living entirely within the grey area, despite being all bright and cheerful.

"Yet you are willing to abduct planets and put them into zoos for auction?" Trunks replied, gritting his teeth while balling his fists. "You can't decide whether or not a planet has to be protected. That kind of decision and control shouldn't be given to one person. That's for the people living on the world to decide."

"I agree," Gohan replied, also narrowing his eyes.

"Hey, don't take this the wrong way," Kana exclaimed, raising her hands defensively and giving them all a nervous look at their growing hostility towards her. "I'm a very fair person and I don't usually move planets that often. It all depends on their rarity that the organization requires a person be sent to investigate, which is only ever done once every couple hundred thousand years. That's why they hire me, since I have all the right tools and strengths to determine whether or not a planet is safe." She then looked back at them when she saw them settle a bit. "That's the way things work. I get paid either way, so there's always a bonus involved; one service charge and one delivery fee."
Piccolo gave her a deadpanned expression, "How very equitable of you."

"I only use the right amount of strength to determine whether or not a planet is in good hands. I very rarely have to exceed my limits," Kana continued, beaming back at the Z-warriors before a more mischievous smile crossed her lips. "Of course, for this case… I may have to make a special exception." When she saw the group respond nervously and seriously to her remark, the girl once again produced her scouter and began making passes on her opponents. She glanced across at Krillin, "You have a power reading of 8,000,000 riki; an amazing level for a human." Her eyes then fell upon Eighteen, whom she scrutinized carefully. "No life force. I assume you have an artificial framework, but your body appears mostly human. You even have internal organs."

The group looked surprised, with Gohan glancing across at the blonde haired woman. "She can read power levels that well?"

"So it appears," Eighteen replied sternly.

"I'm guessing it has something to do with her tech," Piccolo voiced in, a bead of sweat running down the side of his face.

Kana then turned on him, which brought a surprised look to her face when she analyzed him more closely, "A Namekian. There's one living all way out here?"

The green-skinned warrior glared back at her, "Technically I was born on this planet. This is my home just as much as it is everyone else's."

"Fair enough," Kana replied, her scouter beeping and drawing a whistle from her lips. "You're not afraid of hiding, aren't you? 60,000,000 riki. That's astonishingly high for a member of your race. Most impressive." She then looked over at the remaining three and beamed when she analyzed each of them through her visor. "All three of you have Saiyan traits, especially Vegeta. I'm guessing he's the only full-blooded Saiyan on this planet." Her attention then fell upon Trunks, "And judging from your facial contours and build, you must be Prince Vegeta's son."

The time traveler had the common sense to appear surprised, "You could get all that from just one look?"

"It's one of my skills," Kana replied, her scouter beeping and drawing a whistle from her lips. "You're not afraid of hiding, aren't you? 60,000,000 riki. That's astonishingly high for a member of your race. Most impressive." She then looked over at the remaining three and beamed when she analyzed each of them through her visor. "All three of you have Saiyan traits, especially Vegeta. I'm guessing he's the only full-blooded Saiyan on this planet." Her attention then fell upon Trunks, "And judging from your facial contours and build, you must be Prince Vegeta's son."

Piccolo frowned back at her, "Well… what can we say? We've all learned to live with each other."

Still though, there was such an odd variation in the numbers she was giving them. She was obviously using a low reading setting for higher tone figures so that she didn't overload her system. Her results also coincided with this new riki value she was using.

Piccolo frowned back at her, "Well… what can we say? We've all learned to live with each other."

Still though, there was such an odd variation in the numbers she was giving them. She was obviously using a low reading setting for higher tone figures so that she didn't overload her system. Her results also coincided with this new riki value she was using.

"All of you have power levels that could definitely have given Frieza and his family a lot of trouble. While that's certainly extraordinary, considering his level is around the 12,000,000 mark, I'm going to venture a guess that it was the Namekian who destroyed him, since he's the strongest one here." A laugh then pulled her gaze over to Vegeta.

The Saiyan Prince smirked back at her arrogantly, "Guess again, Kana, but the Namekian's power level didn't reach that level until only recently."
"Oh?"

"Let's just say his strength is a little bit slow on the uptake. And it wasn't the Namek that killed Frieza either..." He then glanced across at Trunks, whose glare remained unchanged even when the girl's gaze fell upon him, "It was this one."

This statement drew a blink from the girl, "So... it was a Saiyan after all." She then deactivated her scouter and frowned suspiciously. "But that doesn't make much sense. Your power levels must have grown substantially since the time you fought that lizard all those years ago, which means you must have been a lot weaker when your group first faced Frieza." Kana then frowned, "Unless... there's something about you lot that I just can't see..."

Gohan, guessing what her problem must be, smiled in the confused alien's direction. "You know, you really shouldn't rely on your technology to read a person's power level. It's not only incredibly inaccurate; it also has a ton of flaws and doesn't give you the full scope of the person's abilities." When he saw Kana turn to him, the boy grinned, "For one, it's a really outdated system. And secondly..." Focusing his ki, the demi-Saiyan clenched his fists and widened his stance as the atmosphere around him suddenly began to churn. Then, with a sudden yell of effort and an influx of energy, a golden aura exploded from his body and he jumped straight into Super Saiyan, his transformation cracking the ground at his feet and kicking up dust. While Trunks, Vegeta and Piccolo didn't appear surprised in the least, Krillin and 18# did, whereas Kana was caught completely off guard by the boy's unexpected alteration.

Aura fluctuating around him, the now blonde haired Gohan grinned, "It can really let you down when it counts."

Following his lead, Vegeta and Trunks also powered up, the former keeping his arms crossed when his aura shot up and his muscle mass increased, and the latter going through a momentary effort to transform. Both of them bulked up slightly and their hair spiked, indicating they jumped straight into their 2nd Grade Super Saiyan forms. Piccolo meanwhile removed his cape and turban, tossing it on the wind while a blue aura exploded from his body, joining the other three in their display of power increase. Krillin also followed suit, his white aura jumping around his body as both he and Android 18# assumed fighting stances.

The civilians scattered around the area stared in awe at the performance and began clamoring amongst each other excitedly at the sight of the now glowing super humans. It became obvious to many of them that the people they were now looking at were the same fighters that'd appeared at both the Cell Games and the Intergalactic Tournament, and knew right away that they were in for one hell of a show.

While everyone else maintained their distance Videl, who'd managed to land her jet-copter on the edge of the park and capsulated it, had finally arrived on the scene and was now looking across at the group in amazement. Having only witnessed this display on television, the daughter of the great Hercule Satan was now seeing their transformations up close and personal for the first time ever. Since all of them had their attention focused strictly on the alien invader, the raven haired fighter was given a full, unobstructed view of all of them, especially Gohan who, cool as ever, stood in the center of their formation.

"Wow... so this is what their powers look like?" Videl murmured, remaining on the edge of the park and off to the side. Even though she couldn't sense spirits like they could, she could still feel the incredible vibrations in the air. It was absolutely overwhelming.

Appearing surprised by this sudden development, Kana began analyzing the group's transformations with her scouter. "That unique hair coloration and aura, did they... just transform into Super Saiyans?" Her numbers flying off the scale, the young girl narrowed her gaze before a grin formed on her face. "Amazing. I've heard about the Saiyan's ability to undergo this kind of transformation from the old records, but I've never seen one in real life. All of your power levels have multiplied exponentially." She quickly deactivated her scanner and clenched her fists. "But that also means I was right on the mark. All of you are able to conceal your true powers exceedingly well. I'm assuming it has something to do with fitting in with earth's society."

Vegeta smirked across at her while his aura warped around him, "We exercise a lot of control. It's a great way to stay focused."

"And it keeps us from damaging stuff," Gohan added, despite remembering the time he'd broken the door in his house while he was in a controlled Super Saiyan state. That was embarrassing.

"Amazing. Now I can see why Frieza was destroyed. He got his tail handed to him by a Super Saiyan," the girl exclaimed in a low voice, looking from one concentrated face to the next before another wide grin formed on her lips. "I don't have to fight you all to see that this world is well-protected. However… since this is such a rare terrestrial planet and it's been such a long time since I've actually had to cut loose… I think I'll cancel my next appointment and have a little bit of fun while I'm here." Bringing suspicious looks to the men in front of her, the fire haired alien wordlessly brought her hands out and rotated her wrists. Then, after balling her fingers into fists, Kana concentrated hard and spoke up. "Removing restraining bolts one through six." A series of steam bursts shooting off of her suit, a couple of the glowing circular nodes on her outfit popped out, rotated, and sunk back into their hosts like needle injections.

It was a sight that had the Z-fighters in front of the woman recoil in surprise, as they suddenly sensed an enormous surge of power.

Like the combination to a lock being undone, Kana allowed her energy to explode forth from her body. With a yell of effort and pain, a bright, golden aura of her own exploded from her lithe form and instantaneously punched a twenty meter wide crater into the ground beneath her. The shockwave she emitted sent a gale of wind blasting in all directions, causing the group of fighters in front of her to brace, while at the same time knocking several human civilians off their feet. Videl on the other hand, had to hang onto a tree as the ground shook fiercely and the winds ripped at the ground around her, sending debris pelting everywhere.

Her golden aura transforming into a funnel that shot up into the sky and cleared the atmosphere of clouds, the alien girl's hair blew upwards, bellowing violently while the orange channels in her suit shone and pulsed with energy. The power up lasting for several long seconds, the aura surrounding Kana eventually vanished, leaving the girl hovering there with a radioactive golden glow wafting off of her body.

Though her outward appearance remained unchanged, the Z-fighters in front of her were gob smacked by what had occurred inside of her.

Kana grinned. "Ah yes. That's much better. I haven't removed these bolts in years. It feels so good to stretch my legs."

"H-Holy crap," Krillin exclaimed, his eyes widening in horror as he stared across at the girl. "A-Are you guys sensing what I'm sensing?"

Gritting his jaw, Vegeta gave a low growl as he got a full blast of the girl's energy level, "Stop sniveling you coward and stay on your guard!" While this order sounded brave, the man's confidence was currently shaky.
Trunks was also beside himself, "Her energy level just… exploded. It must have multiplied at least a dozen times over."

Teeth and fists clenched, Gohan kept his stance as he glared at the woman bathed in the ethereal energy in front of them. Despite how young and unassuming she appeared, her energy spoke definitely brought sweat to the half-Saiyan's face. "She's been hiding her real power this entire time." He shook his head in disbelief. "Incredible… her energy is almost as high as Cell's was when he came back after blowing himself up." Hell, she trumped Bojack and his gang by miles.

Keeping a safe distance from the battle zone, not only were the discombobulated civilians and Videl looking on in astonishment, but on top of a nearby building, a comfortably perched Zangya could be seen staring down at the field with her arms folded. At first having only followed Gohan out here to observe him and maybe see if she could get some answers out of him, the ever scrupulous Hera then had the unique pleasure of watching him save a city before starting a fight with an alien traveler that was completely mindboggling in appearance and ability.

In spite of her confident stance while staring down at the park where the Z-fighters were assembled, the blue-skinned former gangster was in absolute disbelief at what she was seeing and sensing.

"W-Who the heck is this chick?"

Taking in the stunned faces in front of her from Vegeta to the blonde haired woman at the end, Kana remained hovering in place for a moment before folding her arms over her chest and smirking. "If that's all the power you six can muster, than I'm afraid you're at an extreme disadvantage." Then, without even the slightest bit of movement, warning or effort, six golden, basketball sized spheres of energy formed in orbit around her. Once they appeared in rotation of the glowing Seirei, they then shot towards the transformed warriors all at once, forcing the group to take evasive maneuvers.

Blurring out, the team vanished into super speed to avoid the six energy rounds that collided with the ground, causing a catastrophic explosion that engulfed half of the park and sent a huge mushroom shaped fireball hurling into the air. The shockwave rocked the entire city to its core, scaring the daylights out of people and causing screams to ring out with the earthquake.

Seeing smoke eventually replace the explosion, Kana smiled and looked up to see the Saiyans and the Namekian reappear in the sky above. Watching them scatter, she began marking each of them.

Of course, the girl casually craning her head to look up presented a big enough opening for Android 18# to reappear out of thin air and slam a fist straight into Kana's face. A crack of a gunshot echoing out on impact, instead of seeing the girl stumble under the force, the blonde was stumped to see she hadn't budged an inch.

For comparative sakes, it was like hitting a wall.

Gritting her teeth, the beautiful fighter pulled her fist back and began uncorking a flurry of lightning fast attacks upon the levitating alien. Fists and kicks impacted all over the teen's body from head to knee in a blur, slamming into her one after the other at a machinegun rate. After putting all the effort she could into each blow, Android 18# finished up with a right cross into the girl's still craned head, before eventually kicking off of her face and leaping away.

When she landed several yards from the crater, Eighteen panted exhaustedly, watching as Kana's gaze then turned towards her.
After all her effort, she didn't even make her flinch.

"She's a monster. Why the hell am I putting my life on the line to fight this bitch?"

Before she could fully comprehend the magnitude of what she'd gotten herself into, Krillin suddenly teleported behind the invader with a shout and a kick to the back of her head, followed immediately by a punch. When Kana didn't budge, the man hovered behind her in shock.

"What the?" Baffled by her unregistering to his presence, just like Eighteen before him, the man let loose a storm of punches and kicks, the sound of rapid gunfire ringing out as he orbited the girl and dropped on her an ass kicking of a lifetime. But try as he might, he couldn't get her to move a millimeter.

Gritting her own teeth and sucking it in, Android 18# flew forward and joined Krillin in his assault, bombarding the girl from all sides with an onslaught of landscape reducing blows. Several seconds rolled by and nothing, with the other Z-fighters hovering up in the air gawking at how useless the pair's attacks were. Even the civilians were baffled by what was going on.

Eventually finding their conventional punches useless, Android 18# and Krillin leapt away from her and got some distance. The moment she touched down, the blonde female threw both hands forward and unleashed a powerful, golden blast that slammed into Kana's back. A concussive explosion rang out, but when the smoke cleared moments later, she saw it'd done nothing, stunning the cyborg.

Desperate, Krillin threw his right hand up and produced a golden disk, which spun and hummed loudly like a beam sword. "Chew on this!" the man roared, taking aim at the alien invader before hurling it straight at her. "Destructo Disk!" With a crack of wind, he pitched his attack straight at their opponent in a wide arc, his signature move humming dangerously as it shot through the air before homing in on the fiery haired girl's neck.

When it struck, sparks flew, and Krillin grinned victoriously at making a direct hit. But then, much to his disbelief, he saw his disk shatter into millions of pieces and the shards dissipate on the wind, leaving Kana completely unscathed.

"Huh? B-But how?" Krillin choked out.

It was the same scene all over again. Just like against Cell.

Not willing to give up yet, Android 18# took off from her spot and flew at the girl from behind, letting out a battle cry as she threw another right straight. However, instead of hitting her target, her fist struck nothing when Kana moved at the last millisecond, uncrossed her arms, and caught the woman's arm in midflight. Then, without any effort at all, the Seirei twisted the taller woman around and snapped her arm into a hammerlock with a sickening crunch, causing a cry of agony to escape Eighteen's lips.

Eyes glazed over in shock, the blonde was unable to defend herself when an elbow to her back sent her bouncing across the park.

"No!" Krillin shouted, flying forward and intercepting the Android. Getting in front of her, he managed to catch the woman before she could reach the end of the park and fly into a parked truck, the force of her momentum causing him to slide back a few feet. When he successfully stopped her flight, the bald fighter quickly looked to see if she was okay.

He breathed a sigh of relief when he saw she was alive, the fair android giving an unconscious groan of pain, and looked up to glare at the celestial girl still floating above her crater. Even after all their effort, they hadn't been able to put a single dent in her.

Kana smiled at the human for his courageous effort, only to then look up when a flash of light caught her attention. Setting her gaze skywards, she saw a volley of golden blasts raining towards her and teleported in a flash, allowing the attacks to slam into the ground instead. Another earthshaking explosion rocked Satan City, punching another fissure into the park and filling the square with smoke.

After firing off their blasts, Gohan, Vegeta, Piccolo and Trunks then spun around when they sensed the girl reappear in the sky behind them. When she flickered into view, she was grinning at them with her arms comfortably folded over her generous bust.

"Those two aren't the ones I want to fight," Kana replied confidently.

Snarling at the smug look she sent their way, Vegeta loaded his stance in midair and powered up, "Don't mock us, you witch!" He then rocketed forward, along with Trunks, Piccolo and Gohan, all three of them bathed in their auras and joining the assault.

From the ground, Videl and the civilians could see the fight taking place high above them in the form of indistinct streaks of lights and blurs.

The attacking Z-fighters scattered and circled the girl at a distance, marking her as she floated in place with an unchanging expression. Then, once they were certain they had her zeroed, Vegeta, Trunks and Piccolo flew straight at her from three sides. They each struck out at the alien traveler with yells from left, right and behind, either throwing a punch or a flying kick. But, just when it seemed like they would hit her, the girl's long, glowing orange hair suddenly came to life and coiled around her protectively, blocking their attacks simultaneously.

Their blows completely cushioned by the obstruction, the trio looked up in surprise. Then, as they continued to press into the soft yet robust barrier, a flash of light from up high drew Kana's gaze skywards again, where she suddenly saw Gohan teleport into view with a blue sphere of energy in his palm. Cocking the ball back and taking aim, the boy dove straight down at the Seirei and thrust the attack into her head with a roar.

"KA-ME-HA-ME-HAAAA!" The young Super Saiyan bellowed out and slammed the single-handed attack straight into the girl at pointblank range… or so he thought.

A massive shockwave rippled out in a blinding, blue flash that shook the sky and land when Gohan's sphere impacted his stationary target. It was only a few seconds later did he realize he was actually grinding it into a golden shield that had unexpectedly appeared around the girl at the last second to stop him.

His attack drilling into the barrier just a foot above her cranium for several tense seconds, Kana then gave a grunt and expanded her defensive barrier. The force of the sudden expansion of energy not only detonated the close-range blast upwards, but sent all four fighters spiraling away at incredible speed. They all let out yelps of surprise as they were sent flying backwards through Satan City's airspace, before eventually managing to stop and look back at their target.

Her hair returning to bellow behind her, Kana tilted her head. "Good teamwork. What else have you got?"

Aura blasting off of him, Piccolo charged two spheres of energy in his hands and, flying around to the front yet keeping a safe distance from his target, opened up with a barrage of continuous energy
At first Kana thought the spheres were going to hit her. But instead, the girl watched on with interest when the attacks suddenly veered away and began scattering throughout the sky. The barrage of dozens of golden spheres continued for several seconds, until the entire sky around her was filled with glowing orbs like stars in the sky. Vegeta, Trunks and a singed Gohan made sure to keep their distance when Piccolo finally finished dispersing the attacks.

Throwing his hands out, the Namekian gave a loud yell and crossed them over. "Makuhoidan!" All at once, Kana saw the scattered spheres curl through the air and converge on her position, collapsing and raining down on her from all sides. The Z-fighters thought it was a sure hit. But the second the spheres came within range, the same golden shield Kana had used before sprang up around her and caught the attacks in one go.

When the spheres dug in, Kana gave another, careless grunt and blasted her shield outwards, sending the spheres scattering through the sky. Piccolo, Vegeta and everyone else had to avoid the onslaught of blasts when they shot past them, flew outside the city, and bombarded the countryside like meteors. Dome shaped explosions lit up the lands surrounding the metropolis and shook the entire nation, causing the people on the ground to brace themselves against the tremendous earthquake.

"That's it!" Vegeta shouted, powering up and charging forward with a yell. "YOU'RE MINE, KANA!"

Gohan's eyes widened in alarm. "VEGETA! WAIT!"

Arcing through the air, the Saiyan Prince flew straight at Kana from the front, the girl smiling when the man greeted her with a swinging jab. The punch crashed into her shoulder when she turned to parry it, her arms remaining crossed over her chest while the man began assaulting her with a lightning fast flurry of attacks. Punches and kicks shot through the air and rained down like artillery rounds on the celestial warrior, the sound of multiple gunshots ringing out with every impact. However, when it seemed like Vegeta was actually landing hits, in reality his opponent was simply slipping them and blocking them with her shoulders, smiling all the while as she retreated at a casual pace and parried each blow in turn.

When Vegeta ended with a kick that crashed into her shoulder with a loud 'bang', a complete unfazed Kana decided she'd had enough of blocking and decided to attack.

The retaliation came in a blur of motion. With a shout she threw a roundhouse kick that crashed across the man's face, sending spit flying from his mouth as well as a shout of pain. The girl then floated forward, slammed another kick into the man's stomach, before hovering over him and dropping a knee into his spine. Cries of agony escaping the prince's lungs, Kana then finished up with a sweeping kick straight up into his head, a finisher that generated a thunderclap and sent Vegeta flying over the city and into a distant hillside, where he crashed in a cloud of rubble and dust.

Wincing after seeing the Saiyan Prince pretty much get his ass handed to him, Zangya turned back to glare up at the sky.

As shocking as the battle was turning out to be so far, the orange haired woman couldn't help but wonder to herself.

"Well... I have options. I could just sit here and watch the super friends get their butts toasted by this overpowered freak of nature," the Hera-seijin girl thought before her eyes focused on Gohan flying high above. "Or I can step in, help them out... and then bugger that brat over why he spared my life." The group had pretty much let her live on this planet following the whole Bojack incident. In the month Zangya had already spent here, she'd actually grown to like this place, even if she was impartial to what these idiots did in their off time. This was the perfect opportunity for her to return the favor and get in good with the group.

She remembered all too well what'd happened when her previous team went up against these guys. Things just spiraled into chaos in the span of one afternoon.

However, as much as she wanted to jump in and give them some assistance, this person that they were up against was in a whole other league of trouble. She didn't need extra-sensory abilities to figure that out. So, for the time being, Zangya decided to stand back and see how this whole thing played out.

If she was lucky, she wouldn't have to step in.

Smirking in the direction of the fallen Saiyan Prince, Kana then turned to see Gohan appear in front of her and slam a left hook across her face with earth splitting force. Managing to smack her head to the side with a loud 'crack', the boy pressed home his advantage and, with a yell, smashed two more hooks across her face, stunning the invader.

Actually feeling the attacks yet keeping her arms crossed, Kana gritted her teeth and, blocking another of his punches with her knee, shot forward and head butted him in the face. The blow crashed into the half-Saiyan and sent him flying backwards, where he was then promptly replaced by Trunks flying in with a punch.

Effortlessly leaping over the young warrior in mid-swing, Kana slammed a kick across his face and sent the time traveler rocketing backwards, trailing blood.

While he was flying, Mirai threw his hands forward and began an erratic series of arm movements. Upon which he then crossed them over and threw them forward so that the thumbs and index fingers touched, forming a diamond shape. "Burning Attack!" Fingers splayed, the half-Saiyan launched a ball of golden energy straight at the girl, which shot through the air at an alarming speed.

Kana though, wasn't deterred. Without so much as a blink, the girl threw her hair forward and caught the energy sphere, holding it for a moment before spinning and pitching it behind her. The attack ended up slamming into Piccolo attempting to strike her from behind, detonating against his chest with concussive force. The Namekian yelled as he was sent flying out of the blast radius, heavily burnt and trailing smoke.

Yelling out, Gohan came powering towards the girl with a wide hook, attempting to hit her in the back of the head. Kana ducked the blow, allowing the demi-Saiyan to pass overhead before throwing her hair up and wrapping it around his head and eyes. Stopping him in his flight and shutting down his aura, the young Saiyan gave a yelp of surprise as he was forcefully pulled around before having a roundhouse kick unloaded in his face, sending him spinning away. After dispersing of him, Kana spun around and kicked an incoming Piccolo in the cranium.

Shockwaves rang out from every hit that connected, the power of each blow rattling the Z-fighters' and effectively destroying all attempts to bring down their opponent. Eventually, the onslaught of unsuccessful attacks soon stopped and the group of powerful Z-fighters ended up floating around the completely undamaged Kana, bruised, bleeding from their faces and looking beaten all to hell.
Even Vegeta, who'd managed to pick himself out of the ditch he'd made, was covered in dirt and bruises.

"I admire your spirit. You four certainly have the strength and skill to give some of the most powerful beings in the universe a lot of trouble. But as good as you are, it'll take a lot more than skill and effort to bring someone like me down," Kana informed, keeping her arms crossed before allowing a cheerful grin to form on her face. "Since you've been throwing such fancy attacks my way, I think I'll throw one back at you. Try this on for size..." She then vanished in a golden flash, disappearing completely from the battered group's radar before reappearing a couple kilometers away. Once there, the girl then performed a graceful twirl, ascending higher into the sky while her hair whipped around her like a streamer. Then, with her hair's glow intensifying, she performed one last spin and hurled her attack. "Flash Storm!"

From her hair, the girl unleashed a barrage of small energy spheres numbering in the millions, straight down at her targets positioned far below. The attack flew at them like a wall of machinegun fire, alarming the group of Z-fighters and forcing them to evade. Moving erratically through the air in different directions, Vegeta, Trunks and Piccolo avoided the hail of countless, tiny spheres as best as they could, unable to counter due to the spread and quantity of blasts being hurled their way.

Gohan, ducking and slipping between waves of incapacitating shots, looked in the direction the attacks were going, feeling immediate concern for the safety of the city far below. The young Saiyan saw through his peripheral vision the millions of blasts curve through the air, overshoot the city on all sides, and end up peppering the landscape outside of the metropolis. Relieved that their opponent was aiming her attacks away from the people, the boy could then completely concentrate on evading the rain of death.

Far below, the population of Satan City gazed in awe as the sky lit up with a golden hail of energy, which flew overhead like a meteor shower, only a thousand times more beautiful and at a much closer proximity to their planet.

Zangya and Videl both stared in shock at the sheer amount of attacks that'd been thrown, while Krillin, still cradling the heavily injured Android 18# on the ground, watched the terrifying sight closely with wide eyes.

The short man clenched his jaw tightly, wondering how his friends were going to combat such a powerful adversary. "Come on Gohan, Trunks, Piccolo... hang in there..." Knowing he was completely outclassed in this battle, there was nothing he could do except wait it out and hope for the best.

Managing to get above the storm as the attack faded, Gohan and Piccolo powered up and shot towards Kana's position at full speed. Rocketing towards her like missiles, the pair came alongside one another so that they were within earshot.

"Piccolo! We have to hit her with a combined attack from both sides!" Gohan shouted, eliciting a nod from the man.

"Yeah! You hit her high, I'll hit her low!"

They then broke up, flying up to spots around the girl at a distance.

Kana, passive as ever, remained in place, watching with a curious smile as the two warriors split up and began charging their next attacks. Wanting to see what they were planning to do, she decided to just float there and observe as their strategy unfolded.
"Eat this!" Piccolo bellowed, fanning his hands over his forehead and throwing it back. "MAKOSEN-HA!" He then threw his hands forward and unleashed a powerful, orange blast that rocketed towards the girl from behind, while Gohan took her from above.

Cranking back his right hand, Gohan's aura exploded around him before he unleashed his own move, "KA-ME-HA-ME-HAAAA!" A powerful blue blast exploded from his hand and flew down at his target like a small comet.

The two simultaneous blasts slammed into the girl from two sides and sandwiched her in between, the users continuing to feed energy into their attacks while she floated there, taking their best shots to the body. The attacks colliding against her lithe form generated a blinding light that filled the entire sky, letting everyone in the area know that something big was going on.

While Gohan and Piccolo kept her cornered, Vegeta and Trunks joined them, the former taking the side with his hands held out while the other took the fourth corner.

Slamming his hands together, the time-traveling warrior powered up and with a roar, unleashed a golden beam of energy that streaked towards their target. "BUSTER CANNON!"

"GALLICK GUN!" Vegeta roared seconds later, throwing his hands forward and unleashing a purple blast that rocketed to the center.

The two beams connected with the others, joining the other two and beginning to smother their target from all around. The flaring light increased tenfold and the trembling in the earth magnified as well. With the sound of thunder breaking out across the skies, the four-way blast continued to grind into the single target for a full, glorious minute until the warriors poured everything they had into one final spurt and sent it in all at once. The extra power flew down the beams to the middle, where they met with a volatile result.

A nuke went off several kilometers above Satan City in the form of a ringed explosion that traveled outwards, blinding everyone with a white light and shaking the earth under the force. People in the streets cried out in terror as another earthquake hit them, whereas Videl, Zangya and Krillin watched and waited for the blast to fade.

All of that power put together into a single, intersecting shot. They must have done something with it!

Watching the fiery explosion fade and become replaced by smoke, Gohan, Piccolo, Vegeta and Trunks waited for the air to clear. All of them looking absolutely battered from their one-sided fight with the girl, the team of fighters were hoping that their combined attacks had managed to do some kind of damage to the cocky traveler. There were very few people out there that could have stood up to something like that.

Even Cell in his ultimate form would have flinched.

But then, just when it seemed like they'd managed to take the girl out, their jaws dropped when they saw the fumes clear and Kana emerge from the mist. When the sky emptied, they saw the celestial fighter had managed to maintain the exact same position with her arms folded over her chest and, despite their combined blasts that should have reduced her body to a pile of ash, she didn't have a single scratch on her. No bruise, no burn, she was completely fine, and was still smiling at them.

"A fine attack. If I didn't have my Light Mass Barrier that assault would have caused some serious skin burn," Kana chirped brightly, before stretching her neck and grinning across at the earthlings.
"Great job."

"Ah! Damn it!" Trunks cursed, clenching his fists in frustration. "It didn't work!"

"Not even a blink!" Vegeta, also looking completely flabbergasted, balled his fists angrily, "The arrogant little bitch! She's just toying with us!" And it pissed him off because they were throwing everything they had at her and had made zero progress so far.

Grinning happily at her opponents, the glowing haired girl rolled her shoulders and spoke, "This is great! I can't remember the last time I had a fight like this. You guys are really something else." She looked around at all the exhausted Z-fighters before taking on a more competitive look. "I haven't had this much fun in ages. But… as much as I would love to continue playing around with you four, I think it's about time we wrapped this thing up. I've got a lot of other planets to visit and I don't want to keep my clients waiting."

Trunks growled, "Like hell we're going to let you win!"

Still smirking across at the Saiyans, Kana seemingly failed to notice Piccolo rapidly gaining attitude behind her and, with two fingers held to his forehead, cocked back his arm and fired an orange and purple corkscrew beam straight at her back. The light-speed blast slammed into the girl's spine and started to drill, sending sparks and excess energy flying in all directions.

Much to everyone's astonishment, the girl continued to float there as the beam ground into her uselessly like it was just burning rubber. After several seconds of nothing, the smiling Kana's face turned serious and, without having to even look at the person behind her, her eyes flashed gold and she fired two beams from her irises. As soon as they shot out they did a ninety-degree turn skywards before bending again and flying straight towards Piccolo, zigzagging at random.

Unlike against Videl, these beams were even faster.

A split second after the attack was fired the stunned Namekian warrior was hit square in the chest by the two beams and sent flying back down to earth at a ridiculous speed. The powerful beams pushed Piccolo into an office building and smashed him through every single floor before hitting the ground, vanishing in a cloud of dust and glass.

He was unconscious before he even formed a crater.

"Piccolo!" Gohan shouted, eyes widening in alarm after seeing his teacher get dispatched with a single blast.

"Don't worry. He'll be alright," Kana spoke, looking around at the three Super Saiyans floating a dozen or so yards ahead of her while all of them threw her dangerous glares. "I'm not fond of killing my opponents, unless absolutely necessary. Life is precious after all." Her grin then became a lot more pronounced when she eyed her targets with excitement. "Of course, what fun is life if you're not living it up or hanging on the edge of it?" Her response was spunky and genuine at the same time.

Growling loudly, Gohan charged forward and swung out at the girl with a flurry of attacks. However, despite his speed and technique, the girl effortlessly avoided his blows by slipping around them. When he came in with a right cross, Kana unfolded her arms and backhanded the boy across the face, her blow impacting against his cheek with the sound of an artillery cannon and sending him spinning out of the sky.

Trunks immediately put up his guard, whereas his father powered up and threw his arms out.
Wasting no time, Vegeta began gathering as much energy as he could for his next attack as fast as he could, before throwing both hands forward and cupping them in front. Golden electricity began to crackle and sizzle around his hands as he took aim at the girl, a sight that told his son from the future to get the hell out of the way.

"You're mine! FINAL-"

"Too slow," Kana interrupted, grinning before two beams shot out of her eyes once again and followed a jagged path towards Vegeta, making their mark in less than a millisecond.

Her Circuit Tracer slammed into the Saiyan Prince's chest with concussive force, stopping his attack, pushing him back through the sky and drawing a cry of agony from the super powered warrior. But then, just as the beams were disintegrating the front part of his Saiyan armor and was about to send the man over the horizon, his time traveling son responded to his plight and, tackling him in the side, pushed the man out of the attack's path.

"FATHER!" Mirai shouted, managing to knock his dad away, only to have the beams switch to him and slam into his chest, "AUGH!" The spiky haired demi-Saiyan ended up being blasted by the beams into the city streets below, right into the heart of Satan City.

Managing to recover and stop his fall, a badly burnt but still conscious Vegeta regained altitude and turned back to his opponent. Realizing what'd happened, the man's eyes widened in horror and he reeled forward. "TRUNKS! NO!" But it was too late.

The moment his gaze fixed on his son, he saw the zigzagging eye beams push the boy through several skyscrapers all the way to the center of the metropolis. Seconds later, Trunks's body ended up crashing into the city square, forming a deep crater. The people surrounding the area cleared out before the boy's impact and when they came back to see what'd happened, they found the half-Saiyan lying sprawled out at the bottom of the hole, unconscious, his top disintegrated, and his chest singed.

Upon downing another, Kana smirked, "Nice save." She then blinked when she sensed someone fast approaching and vanished in a golden flash, teleporting just in time to avoid Gohan flying at her from the side with an elbow.

Missing, the young half-Saiyan growled and extended his senses, trying to find out where Kana had gone this time. Tracking her to the ground, the boy saw her reappear in the very center of the park where they'd been fighting, with her arms at her sides and her gaze locked firmly onto his position. Responding immediately to her teleportation, the boy powered up and dove for her.

Identifying what her target's intentions were, Kana took aim and fired three shots from her eyes, the beams zigzagging randomly through the air as they homed in on her fast moving opponent at light speed. Spotting the approaching attacks, Gohan took evasive action, performing a series of aerial flips and spins, and effectively dodging the zigzagging blasts. When he looked back, he saw the beams bend through the air and begin chasing after him, bringing a scowl to the Super Saiyan's face and prompting him to think up a way to get rid of them.

Circling the sky, the young hybrid looked down to see Kana still watching him comfortably from below. It was only upon seeing her cheerful face that an idea struck him.

Coming about, Gohan allowed the beams to chase him through the airspace above the reserve before quickly descending to ground level behind his opponent. Flying backwards as fast as he could, the boy slammed his feet into the grass to slow his momentum. And then, the exact moment he reversed into Kana's back, he threw his hands behind him, wrapped them around her head, and slammed his feet into the back of her legs. Catching the stationary girl by surprise, the demi-Saiyan effectively flipped them and switched places so that her body fell into the path of her beams.

When Gohan hit the deck, Kana ended up getting struck by her own attack, the first round sending her flying across the park with the clap of a shockwave ringing out. The stunned girl let out a cry of pain as she was hit not once, not twice, but three times, the last two Circuit Tracer rounds smacking into her while she was hurdling across the park. She only stopped when she ended up slamming into the side of another building, the impact creating an earthshaking tremor while the civilians standing around the area ran for it.

Videl, who was watching the fight 'safely' from behind her tree, grinned when she saw Gohan pull one over their cocky opponent and pumped a fist triumphantly, "YES!"

"Nice!" Krillin laughed.

Zangya too, who'd been watching the fight from afar, grinned in amusement. "Well played." She then tilted her head thoughtfully when her gaze fell on the boy. "No wonder we lost to this kid. He's brilliant."

Leaping to his feet after knocking Kana for a loop, Gohan glared across the ruined park to the other side where her opponent had landed. She'd practically covered about half a kilometer before eventually stopping and with the amount of power she'd put behind those beams, there was a guarantee that she must have felt the full force of it. It was a small victory to the young Saiyan, who remained on guard while waiting to see what'd happened to the Seirei.

Unfortunately, the youngster didn't get a chance to see the smoke clear because in a flash of light, Kana was suddenly floating just two feet in front of him with her leg cocked back. Gohan had just enough time to recoil in shock before a kick slammed into his chest and sent him rocketing through the city towards the outskirts, flying through several buildings along the way. The moment she sent him off, Kana held up her left hand and, with a grunt of effort, she unleashed a powerful golden blast that broke the sound barrier several times as it flew straight through the many holes the boy managed to punch through the buildings.

While Gohan was still airborne, he was struck full in the front by the lance and sent rocketing over the suburbs and into a distant mountain. When he collided with it along with the blast, the entire edifice went up like it'd been struck by a nuke, a golden, geyser like explosion shooting into the clouds and nearly touching the stratosphere, while the shockwaves that rang out rocked the entire country. The city was nearly shaken from its foundations and the people, who were either watching or not watching the battle, braced themselves and cried out in terror as the 7.0 magnitude quake hit the town.

Seeing the boy get thrown into the distance and blown up caused Videl's eyes to widen in horror, "GOHAN!"

Zangya, uncrossing her arms at the sight of the colossal explosion, looked on in disbelief, "No." Seeing the demi-Saiyan engulfed by the blast, the woman clenched her fists and glared down at the one responsible for bombing the kid. "Bitch! I had unfinished business with him!"

Explosion fading, Kana lowered her hand and smiled. "I hope you'll forgive me for that. You're going to wake up feeling really sore in the morning, so try your best to walk it off." After seeing the mushroom cloud rise into the air and the light return to normal, she then turned her gaze towards the sky again. "Now then…"
"Callous wench! You're dead!" Vegeta roared, aura pulsing around him as he dove straight down at the woman. Letting out a battle cry, he swung at her with an overhand, aiming to bury her in the ground with a single hit. But the second he let his punch fly, the Saiyan Prince was stopped dead in his tracks when Kana's hand shot out and grabbed him by the throat. His momentum being instantaneously shutdown by the hand latching to his neck caused his aura to dissipate. "GAH!"

Holding the man above the ground effortlessly when he reached up and started clawing at her arm, Kana smirked, "Just one last piece of unfinished business."

Growling when his attempts to free himself failed, Vegeta extended his arm, opened his palm towards the Seirei's face and held it at a ninety-degree angle. That was all it took before he unleashed the mother of all payloads directly between her eyes. "BIG BANG ATTACK!" A golden sphere detonated directly in the smiling girl's mug, engulfing them in a dome-shaped blast that shook the block until smoke shortly replaced the fireball.

Grinning at finally getting a better than decent shot in on her, Vegeta figured he'd managed to fry her face off. However, when the smoke eventually cleared, the prince was stunned to see Kana's unchanged expression emerge completely unscathed from the fumes, leaving the Saiyan gob smacked.

"I-Impossible!" the Z-warrior managed to choke out. Even Krillin, who was standing on the sidelines, was confounded.

Giggling, Kana then cocked her left fist back and, releasing the Super Saiyan at the same time, slammed it into his chin. The impact caused a deafening shockwave to ring out and shatter the glass on every single building surrounding them as Vegeta was sent soaring straight up into the sky. As he ascended, the alien girl took aim at him and fired her Circuit Tracer. The zigzagging beams honed in on their ascending target and slammed into the man's chest, causing him to let out an agonized scream as the attack literally sent him above the clouds before it detonated and his body came crashing down somewhere over the horizon.

Grinning after sending Vegeta on a free trip, Kana laced her fingers and stretched her arms and back. A satisfied groan escaping her lips, she then looked around and made sure her job was done. "Well. That's over and done with. To be honest, I was expecting the four of them to put up a much better fight, what with their planet being on the line and all. But… I suppose if that's everything they have to give, then I may as well prep Bit to-"

BANG!

She was promptly cut off from her next course of action by a blast detonating against the back of her head, causing her to lurch forward slightly and stare ahead in surprise.

Hair slightly singed, Kana spun around to see who the hell had attacked her from out of the blue. Eyes falling upon Krillin kneeling on the ground on the edge of the park with Android 18# in his arms, she then saw an orange haired woman with blue skin land in her line of sight. The appearance of the new alien had the space traveler blink.

"Ta-da!" Zangya sang, smirking at the glowing teenager.

Krillin, remembering the beating he'd received from the newcomer, gawked in disbelief, "Y-You? What the… What the hell are you doing here?"

"What does it look like, short-stuff? I'm fighting," Zangya replied, looking over her shoulder at the man and his unconscious love-interest before turning back to the alien in the plug suit. "Not the brightest idea, I'll admit. But seeing as how I'm already out here I might as well." Heck, she didn't even know why she'd just jumped in like that.
She could have easily stood by and watched this chick fly off and possibly take the entire planet with her, but for some reason she didn't. And it was annoying the hell out of her because she couldn't figure out why.

In spite of her answer, the man was still confused. "Whose side are you on exactly?"

Zangya, of course, had an answer for that one as well, "I'm on nobody's side but my own." She then narrowed her glare on the glowing haired chick still glaring daggers her way. "Let's just say I've got a lot of stuff going on in my life and leave it at that."

The squishing sound of Krillin's eyelids opening and closing echoed back in response. "Umm… okay. Fair enough."

Videl, who was holding her position out of range of the faceoff, also recognized the blue-skinned alien that'd dropped out of the sky and stared at her with a mixture of suspicion and unease.

Being a mortal human surrounded by super powered aliens, you could understand her immediate concern.

Focusing her best glare on the radiant entity from the inner regions of the cosmos, the orange haired Zangya's frown deepened, "That brat Gohan was my mark. You hear? No one is allowed to kick him around the countryside except me."

The invader however, was too caught up in surprise to completely register to the woman's threatening tone. "A Hera-seijin?" Kana murmured. "There's one still alive? If I remember correctly, your planet and most of its entire population was wiped out over ten thousand years ago."

Narrowing her attention on the newcomer, she then activated her scouter and scanned the alien, not just getting a physical break down of her, but also grabbing some other useful Intel on the fighter. After several seconds, she raised an eyebrow, "Hmm. Your power reading is around 150,000,000 riki. I guess that explains why you're still alive. That's a pretty high level for a member of your race." She then smiled across at her, "But, against me… I'm afraid it's not going to be enough."

Zangya scoffed, "We'll see." She then slid into a fighting stance, glaring across at the celestial warrior whose hair bellowed upwards and defied gravity.

The woman's stance had the armored girl grin, "Oh? You want to have a go at me as well?"

"Does this answer your question?" the blue-skinned alien asked, cupping her hands forward and firing a red sphere of energy straight at the girl.

The attack shot across the park like a tank shell, but just when it seemed like it was going to hit the fiery haired woman and knock her on her ass, it instead struck the golden shield that sprang up around her and began drilling into it. After a few seconds of tug-of-war between the ball and the barrier, the orb of red energy then bounced off of the defense and flew up into the sky, where it detonated harmlessly out of reach.

Zangya gritted her teeth in frustration, before leaping into the air and suspending herself in the sky above, the woman threw her hands back and cupped them in front of her a second time. "Suck on this! Spark Laser!" She then unleashed a powerful bolt of red lightning from her palms that shot towards the girl and struck her full in the chest.

The stream of electricity ground into the girl's breast plate just as her previous attack had done to her shield. But just like every other blast that was sent her way, Kana paid it little interest or mind. Instead, as the lightning continued to drill into her uselessly, the girl merely smiled before firing her golden beams from her eyes and straight up at the Hera. Zangya had enough time to maneuver her lightning stream into the path of the beams, where they met in a momentary struggle before Kana's attack easily forced their way through and struck the stunned warrior in the chest.

A small explosion and a shockwave sent Zangya spiraling to the ground with a cry of pain, where she slammed into the grass back first and bounced. Managing to land in a crouched position and slide to a stop, the badly singed girl groaned in agony and glared up, where she saw her target levitate off of the ground and fly straight at her.

Gasping in fear, the orange haired rogue then responded by throwing her hands forward and hurling a net of energy wires straight into Kana's path. The strings, traveling in the blink of an eye, managed to catch the girl in the middle of her charge, tangling around her body and limbs, and effectively stopping her in mid-punch while she was only a few feet away from her opponent.

That was only until Kana, calm and collected as ever, continued to move forward while bringing her fist around for a blow.

Stunned, Zangya gritted her teeth and concentrated even harder, trying to stop the teenager still walking towards her. Even though she was moving in a jerky, slow-motion run, the invader was acting like the wires weren't even there and as she closed the gap between them, the wires started to snap one after the other. Sweat poured from Zangya's head as she gave it her all to try and stop the train that was her target.

Then, seconds later, Kana was right on top of her. With one mighty pull, the girl drove a fist at full speed into Zangya's face, slamming her into the ground with a shockwave that blasted a crater into the earth. The moment she put the girl in the earth, the remaining energy draining wires dispersed, allowing the glowing girl to rise up to full height and smile down at her foe.

When the dust cleared, she saw the stricken, blue-skinned warrior lying at the bottom of the hole, bleeding from the mouth and covered in bruises. Groaning, Zangya looked up at the celestial traveler, whom she could see standing unharmed and beaming at her with that radiant smile of hers.

"You have some very unique techniques," Kana commented while tilting her head. "But like I said before, it'll take more than that level of tenacity to beat someone of my caliber. The strongest member of your group was Son Gohan and he had a power reading of 190,000,000 riki in his Super Saiyan form, while the other two were sitting at 140,000,000 each. Me..." She then grinned proudly at the woman, "With all of my restraining bolts removed, I have a maximum of over 350,000,000 riki." She then nodded down towards the warrior trying to sit up in her crater. "Unless you can somehow generate a riki level higher than that, there is no way anyone can beat me. Not even you."

Zangya, wincing, then threw the girl a pained yet cocky grin, "Oh. I wasn't trying to beat you." Her response drew a confused look from the invader. "I was trying to stall you..."

"Stall me?" Kana parroted, narrowing her eyes. "For what?"

Her answer came shortly afterwards in the form of a shockwave that caused the entire country to tremble. Eyes widening in surprise, the glowing haired visitor to the planet as well as everybody else in the area then looked in the direction of the mountain that she'd previously shot one of her opponents at, which was now lying in a massive pile of rubble on the horizon. At least that's how it remained, until a loud rumbling sound started to echo across the region and, out of nowhere, the massive chunks of earth making up the fallen edifice started to lift into the sky.

Krillin, Videl and everybody else looked across the city in disbelief to see the bits and pieces of earth and rock rise into the air. The spectators were shortly joined by Vegeta, Trunks and Piccolo, all of whom slowly regained consciousness and watched from their crash sites several kilometers apart as the rubble of the collapsed mountain rose into the clouds.

Watching the unnatural phenomenon take place in the distance as seemingly all gravity vanished from the area, Kana stared out at the floating collection of rocks suspiciously for several moments, before her serious expression slowly transformed into one of shock. Then, when she saw beams of light start shooting up out of the massive crater in the distance, her face took on a look of fear and incredulity.

"W-What?" the girl murmured as she then saw blue flashes of lightning join the golden beams of light.

Zangya, managing to peer out of her crater to see the anomaly herself, sprouted a smile of delight grin. "Well… it's about damn time."

A split second later, a thunder clap rang out. This was followed by a flash of light and, as the rocks cascaded back down to the earth, a golden streak of energy incased in blue electricity shot out of the crater, arced through the air, and landed on the edge of the park in a flash of light. The figure's landfall was marked by a sonic boom that sent a blast of wind across the square.

A stunned Videl looked across the park and through the dust at the person engulfed in golden energy. Seeing them standing in plain sight, the pig-tailed girl then took on a look of sheer delight when she eventually identified who it was.

Tears of joy filled her eyes, "Gohan! You're alright!"

Immediately, the girl noticed he looked a little bit different from before. Unlike his previous, golden form, his hair had spiked up even more and was pointing skywards, save for a single strand that dangled over his forehead. To join his new appearance, aside from his gi, which was now a tattered mess, he was also emitting a higher frequency aura, with blue electricity running up and down his body. It was a transformation Videl had never seen before, yet marveled at it all the same.

It was also something Kana took immediate notice of and, almost instantly, the girl began to tremble.

"This energy?" Looking into the boy's fierce, turquoise eyes, Kana's gaze narrowed and she produced her scouter, which began calculating her opponent's new form. When the number eventually appeared in her hologram, her expression turned to one of complete shock and she took a full step back. "N-No way? His power level… it's… registering over 360,000,000 riki."

Gohan, now standing off against the glowing girl, frowned in her direction, "Like I said before… you can't rely on your scouter to calculate a person's power level." A smile then spread across his face as a spark of electricity shot off of him and struck the ground all cool style, sending dust kicking into the air. "It can really let you down when it counts."

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Oh yeah, shit's about to go down. After trying as a team to take out Kana, Gohan then decides to go full Super Saiyan 2 to finish the fight.

I wonder how this is going to pan out next.
Hope you guys enjoyed this chapter.

P.S To those posting messages with power levels, the ones in this story are calculated differently by the character, so you don't need to post other ones to me. You can PM me if you like.
Reacting in alarm, Kana took a step back and threw her hand forward. But just before she could do anything even remotely defensive Gohan, permeating with his Super Saiyan 2 form, vanished in the blink of an eye and buried a fist into her face that sent her rocketing through the eleventh floor of an office building behind her.

Seeing the boy effortlessly smack the invader away with a single blow, the stricken Zangya lying in the crater directly beneath him blinked in shock. "Damn." Her remark earned a momentary smirk from the golden haired warrior. After which she then watched the teen vanish, leaving the area with a crack of lightning.

Krillin and Videl gawked at the speed he moved, unable to keep track of him anymore.

Smashing through cubicles, chairs, computers and windows at bullet speed, the plug-suit wearing Kana eventually spiraled out of the tower and traveled an entire kilometer across the city. Completely stunned by the hit, the alien traveler was unable to do a thing when she began her descent back to ground level; flying past several more skyscrapers and eventually colliding with one of the city's many highways. Bouncing down the multilane road, cart wheeling off the top of a van and landing on the hard concrete between a group of stunned civilians, Kana curled up on the ground, clutched her face and cried out in agony.

Revealing a bleeding nose, the girl formed an angry fist and slammed it into the floor, splitting the road down the middle at the force and bringing herself onto her hands and knees. But just as she was looking back the way she'd come, Kana suddenly saw her opponent dive straight down at her from above at a ridiculous speed and crash into her with his foot. The Seirei had only a split second to appear shocked before the boy began plowing her down the highway faster than a missile.

Tearing a trench along the multilane road and rocketing past civilians and cars, Gohan literally skateboarded the girl down the tarmac for a full kilometer. Kicking up a massive cloud of dust and debris that could be seen for miles, the Super Saiyan 2 then sprang off of the teenager and allowed her to slide along her face for several more yards, before she ended up colliding with the frontend of a police cruiser.

Landing gracefully on the ruined expressway, the still glowing Gohan fixed his glare on the partially buried Kana, while the two cops standing beside their car stared at him in shock. Having leapt out of their vehicle when they saw the wall of fast-moving dust approaching them, the pair of officers then found themselves staring at two people, one bathed in an ethereal golden aura and the other with her face in the ground, squaring off in battle.

Placing a hand on the bonnet of the car, Kana pulled herself out of the crater, sporting numerous cuts along her face and damages to her suit. Growling angrily, the Seirei stood up and turned around, at the exact moment the two cops tried to act smart and pulled their guns on her. They opened fire on her back, emptying their pistols, only to watch in disbelief when their bullets literally stopped in mid-air just inches from hitting her back.
When they saw the fire haired girl glare at them, they immediately backed off, dropping their side arms and putting their hands in the air.

Promptly ignoring them despite their lame actions, Kana turned to Gohan to see more electricity course over his body. After a few moments of looking him over, the girl smiled and brushed some dirt away from her mouth. "Not bad. You really caught me by surprise there. I can't remember the last time anyone has ever given me this much damage before." Spitting out blood from her mouth, the battered girl smirked. "Judging from your change in appearance and sudden increase in strength, I'm going to venture a guess that this is some sort of second level transformation for your Super Saiyan states."

"Yeah. Vegeta calls it the genuine Ascended Super Saiyan form." He then threw her a smile while electricity crackled off of him. "But for me... I like to call it a Super Saiyan 2."

"Well, it certainly packs a wallop. There's no denying that," Kana replied groggily. Having received a substantial amount of damage with only two running attacks from the boy, she immediately knew that she was in big trouble and, thinking carefully, opted to correct this dilemma. A frown appeared on her face. "But if you think I'm backing down just because you've increased your power, think again!" She then gritted her teeth and clenched her fists. "Remove all remaining bolts!"

Gohan blinked in surprise when he suddenly saw a couple more nodes on her plug suit pop up and rotate. Steam expelled from these bolts when they spun and the moment they sunk back into her suit, all the channels on her outfit lit up and her energy level skyrocketed once again. With a howl of agony, Kana threw her hands up as golden ki exploded from her body, shooting up into the clouds in the form of a blinding beam while the ground around her caved. People had to get the hell out of the way when sections of the highway started to collapse, leaving the glowing Kana floating in midair.

Her opponent on the other hand remained stationary, looking across at her in astonishment. When her energy output eventually reduced to a more tame level seconds later, leaving the teenager's hair bellowing upwards and a brighter glow radiating off of her body, Kana smirked. "That's it. I'm at full power. It's certainly been forever since I last felt like this. I'd almost forgotten what it was like."

The spiky haired Super Saiyan smirked, "Well, you certainly didn't keep me waiting. I can tell you really want to do this." It also provided him an interesting detail about his opponent. "Figures. If I'd gone straight to Super Saiyan 2 at the beginning she would have been able to remove all those bolts of hers and matched me right from the get go." She was able to do it in an instant without the slightest bit of effort, and didn't need to waste needless energy powering up. Since she was already at a maximum state, it was all a matter of unsealing the well that was her power and allowing it to course through her body freely. All she had to do was; unlock the restraints and unclog her conduits.

Oh well. Coulda, woulda, shoulda, didn't. And now they were here.

"Of course. The Earth is a very rare planet. You can't find many others like it in the Northern Quadrant. You could search the stars for centuries and never find another world quite like this one," Kana answered.

Gohan grunted, "I can assume you can get a lot of credit for this one."

"Enough to allow me to live comfortably for the rest of my thousand year life cycle," Kana replied, giving the boy a brilliant grin.

It was this response that inevitably drew a frown back to the now more serious demi-Saiyan's face. "Even so, I cannot allow you to take this planet from us. This world is our home, as is the system it orbits. My father entrusted me to protect the earth and everyone on it, so if you think I'm going to let you or anyone else try to claim it as their own, then you're sadly mistaken."

Kana frowned back at him, her eyes narrowing on the youngster. "Just one question before we get started: why didn't you reveal this transformation to me earlier? You could have saved yourself a lot of trouble if you had taken this form the moment you underwent your first power up and we could've gotten to this stage much sooner. Why'd you hold back?"

The inquiry had Gohan tighten his scowl, a crackle of electricity running up his chest. "I thought that with the four of us fighting you together we would have had a chance of beating you through teamwork and I wouldn't have to rely on my Ascended Saiyan form to fight. Since my friends were fighting alongside me, I didn't want to risk them getting hurt in a potential crossfire. I've still got a lot of training to do before I can perfectly control this form." His transformation to the second state was still an incredibly potent and volatile result. Even now the young half-Saiyan had some uncertainties and concerns about his current control over this power. Figuring he would learn how to master it as they went along, Gohan then smiled back at the girl and gave a small chuckle. "I also thought that I would be able to challenge myself during the battle and beat you using only my first form, and test my abilities against someone of a high level. You could probably say that a bit of my father's own pride and desire to exercise his skills has also rubbed off on me." It was a glaring weakness and a serious flaw in his approach sure, but it was part-and-parceled with his half-Saiyan, half-human genetics.

The urge to fight and test his limits was a sensation that was almost impossible to resist.

Even so, Gohan believed he really needed to break himself of that habit of showing restraint, so that he didn't inadvertently put anyone in danger. If he had actually been fighting against an opponent who was more malicious than Kana and had actual intent of destroying or enslaving the planet instead of winning it in a fair fight, then he probably would have jumped straight to Super Saiyan 2 and be done with them with the first punch. But since their opponent had a kind nature, something that Gohan was able to pick up while interacting with her, and because he was fighting in close proximity with the others, he didn't jump to the next level right off the bat.

Additionally, because this was an opponent who wasn't intending to bring harm to the population of this planet, Gohan could progress to the higher forms of his transformation process at a more comfortable pace with little need for urgency or anger. This gave him a better grasp and sense over his higher forms, and also filled him with the confidence he needed to push forward. But now that the girl had proven to be an incredibly powerful foe and they were now fighting one-on-one, he could now fight without worrying about hurting the others, open up the taps and show her what he was really made of.

Right now, their power levels were almost exactly the same…

Almost…

"Very well," Kana replied. Smiling at the boy's reason for holding back his best card up until now, the girl then rolled a shoulder and slid forward with one foot so that she was standing side-on to the boy. Once she assumed her stance, her scouter appeared over her eye again and a recording light activated on the edge of the orange visor. "I, Kana of the Planetary Trade Organization, recognize you, Son Gohan, as the protector and guardian of Terra 4032-877 and the entire sector, and hereby challenge you to single combat over the right to claim ownership over this planet. Should you lose,
I have the right to take planet earth as my own and will transport it to a safe location until a suitable guardian can be found. If I lose, then the earth will remain in this solar system under the protection and care of you and your descendents. Do you agree with these terms?"

Taking this all in, Gohan nodded, "Yes. Do we need to shake on it?"

Kana smiled, her scouter deactivating, "Your verbal acknowledgement is more than enough." She then took on a hard glare and nodded towards him, "Now then… shall we begin?"

Electricity crackling off of his body, the spirited young male frowned as well, "On your go, Kana."

Both of them squaring off from their respective positions under the terrified stares of the people huddled up on the overpass, the pair remained in place. Standing confidently with their auras wafting off of their bodies like flames, the young duo watched one another like hawks, waiting for the other to make the first move. There was a tense silence, even with dozens of bewildered and fear struck spectators murmuring around them.

Whispers started up between families and friends, wondering what was going to happen between the pair of glowing beings.

Then, just as more sparks of electricity shot off of Gohan's form, the young Saiyan saw Kana vanish in a golden flash of light. Her teleportation caused her opponent to lose track of her for only a moment.

A split second later, a thunderclap rang out and the young demi-Saiyan doubled over with the girl's fist buried deep into his stomach, his eyes widening in shock and blood flying out of his mouth. The unexpected blow also caused his aura to dissipate.

As soon as her target had the air knocked out of his lungs, the fiery haired Seirei grabbed his head with her hands and drove a knee right into his face that sent the boy blasting up into the air with a sonic boom. Gohan continued to fly upwards, dazed from the concussive blow to the skull, allowing Kana to teleport past him and reappear directly in his flight path. The teen greeted the ascending warrior by dropping an elbow right down on top of him, the blow creating a shockwave that shook the ground and sent the boy rocketing back towards the highway twenty stories below. It was here Gohan ended up plowing down the road for a quarter of a mile thanks to his angle of descent, leaving a trail of smoke and dust while he slid between cars.

People screamed and barreled out of the way when Gohan's body shot past them, with civilians ending up hugging the walls before looking back to see Kana's golden form descend from the clouds and begin flying down the highway at breakneck speed. She rocketed past cars, ignoring the people and focusing solely on her opponent.

Managing to flip onto his feet and skid to a stop, Gohan powered up and blasted right back at the teenager, kicking up a new trail of dust and debris, while disintegrating the old clouds. He flew straight at Kana with his hand out front, an intense glare on his face while electricity shot off of him like a storm.

"COME AND GET SOME!" Gohan roared, intercepting Kana and locking the pair in what would become known as the biggest fight Satan City had ever seen.

Colliding with one another and causing a sonic boom that cracked the entire highway for a kilometer in both directions, the pair engaged in a furious exchange of punches and kicks. Gohan took the advantage, administering an enormous amount of pressure upon Kana as the pair fought in a continuous blur of movement down the lanes of traffic. Following the main road back towards the spot they'd started and passing it, the pair left a bellowing cloud of dust in their wake while they pounded away at each other at a ridiculous speed, with the fiery haired alien retreating and her opponent pushing her along.

Eventually, after fighting a running battle along the highway for three kilometers, coming within sight of Orange Star Highschool over the horizon, Kana then landed a killer body shot on her attacking adversary, a blow that caused their momentum to slow. Continuing to slide along, Gohan took the shot to the stomach like a champ before retaliating with a kick straight into the girl's chin that sent her blasting off of her feet and off the multilane highway.

Flying between buildings, the stunned Kana was unable to respond in time when Gohan flew after her and nailed her in the back with a second kick. The blow sent her rocketing through the air at a greater speed while the demi-Saiyan slowed. Hovering above central train station, Gohan took aim with both hands and with a yell of effort, unleashed a Kiai blast that smacked into Kana's front and sent her spiraling into a skyscraper.

Crashing through the window, the girl plowed through every single office and lounge standing in her way, startling every person on that floor. When she exploded out the other end, her body blasted out another window, trailing dust, debris, and a completely ruined couch.

Her momentum gone, Kana began to plummet, only to power up after falling three floors and rocket away from the building in a steak of gold. Coming to a low altitude, the alien traveler skidded along several apartment tops before looking through the air and coming back around at her opponent at a blazing speed and with a yell of rage. Gohan, after administering his invisible ki blast, was so focused on the skyscraper he'd put the girl through that he didn't notice her fly in from his blind spot and slam into him with a kick that sent him flying in another direction.

Yelping in pain and stunned by the force of the blow, the half-Saiyan recovered in midflight and spun into an upright position. Once he did, he rocketed back towards the girl who flew at him in kind, and the pair began engaging one another in the skies above central Satan City.

Sonic booms and shockwaves rang out throughout the clouds, every single one of them powerful enough to shake the ground and the buildings situated on top of it. The blasts rippled out like fireworks, pulling people's gazes towards the heavens and scaring the shit out of civilians when they suddenly came in close. Those who were at the reserve and on the highway where all of this super human stuff had started could only listen and look on in silence as the invisible battle took place high above their heads. To those who were just tuning in, they thought that fighter bombers were dropping payloads all across the metropolis.

But there was not a single plane in the sky… or anything for that matter.

Even Krillin, the Z-fighter who was still in the best condition, had lost sight of the pair completely.

"They're so fast," the man thought, continuing to cradle Eighteen's head in his hands.

Zangya, who was back on her feet and standing by the crater gripping her shoulder, was also looking on with a stunned expression in play.

The weakest of the troop Videl, just like the rest of the population, could only watch as the shockwaves exploded across the horizon and feel the ground shake from each individual blast. All the while, her hands were clapped together in an effort to quell the nervousness now racking her form.

"Come on, Gohan," Videl whispered before an intense look came over her face and her fist shot Reappearing in the front quad of Orange Star Highschool, Gohan landed with a gentle tap and glared straight up at the sky. He was so focused on looking for his opponent that he completely ignored the gasps of surprise from the hundreds of students and teachers that'd come out of the building to see what the hell was going on.

The scattered collegians took a step away from the spiky haired, battered boy that had seemingly teleported out of nowhere, with many of them quickly recognizing him as one of the fighters from the Cell Games.

However, just as the whispering started to play up, Gohan's eyes shot to his right and he saw Kana teleport into view in the form of a golden flash. With a lunge and a shout, she uncorked a swinging right overhand at the boy, only for her fist to fly past him when he slipped around and avoided it. Her missed blow caused an invisible blast of wind to shoot across the high school grounds and blast a huge section of the perimeter wall away, as well as send a nearby parked car tumbling across the road.

As soon as both fighters attacked and dodged respectively, the pair vanished into separate blurs, disappearing into two completely different directions, trailing golden streaks of energy.

The sound of blows landing echoed across the cityscape in another series of deafening sonic booms and was accompanied by loud 'whooshing' noises as well. This indicated that the pair of fighters was beginning to parry and dodge each other more effectively, now that they knew how their adversary moved.

Engaging one another between the towering buildings of Satan City at invisible speeds, the pair reappeared every now and again across the metropolis at random, locked in a heated exchange of flying fists and kicks. The two fighters would battle furiously for a grand total of a full second before vanishing in another blur and continue their one-on-one war throughout the sky.

After several minutes of an unending tradeoff, Gohan reappeared in the clouds and, with a roar of rage, drove a right fist through the air, seemingly at nothing. It was only after he threw it Kana reappeared directly in his path just in time to block the fist with an earsplitting crash. Another, massive sonic boom rang out that blew the clouds surrounding them out of the way and literally cleared the sky for over two kilometers. It was once Kana stopped the blow she and Gohan vanished once more into super speed.

The situation repeated a third time. More shockwaves and wind cracking sounds exploded across the airspace for another several minutes, before the battle returned to the area above the reserve. Zangya, Krillin and Videl watching from far below looked up in time to see Gohan and Kana reappear hovering twenty stories above them, both locked in a heated flurry of punches and kicks that echoed through the air like a rapidly firing artillery cannon. The exchange continued for three seconds before the pair slammed an elbow into each other, sending an invisible blast in the form of a gale in all directions.

The strong wind struck the people on the ground, nearly knocking Zangya and Videl off their feet, and causing everyone to cover up.

Thanks to that, they missed both Gohan and Kana begin another lightning fast exchange of blows, before the former powered up in the blink of an eye and rocketed off into the distance. Kana powered up immediately afterwards and, both trailing gold vapor trails, chased one another out of the city.
Flying over the countryside with the city quickly shrinking into the distance, Gohan and Kana took their fight into the open and away from the populace. Appearing as two out-of-control missiles trailing hot streaks of energy in their wake, the powerful combatants crisscrossed through the sky at an erratic rate, engaging a few times with spurts of blows that generated several, consecutive sonic explosions, before the pair then shot towards the coast and out over the ocean.

Pursuing one another, Gohan swooped in low and streaked across the water's surface, his opponent following close behind as they both pulled up and created enormous waves across the calm stretch of blue. Turning around so that he ascended backwards, the fiercely glowing demi-Saiyan emitted several bursts of electricity, which he then hurled from his palms in the form of bolts of lightning. Kana effortlessly dodged the first and smacked aside the second, before continuing her chase of the boy. The pair picked up speed and arced through the sky, ending with them descending towards a group of deserted islands.

Slamming his feet into the mountainside of the largest, Gohan slid down its slope to a grinding stop and spun around. "KA-ME-HA-ME…" Charging a blue ball of ki in his right hand in record time, the boy then threw it back and unleashed it with a mighty yell. "HAA! HAA! HAAAAA!" Every shout was marked by a burst of explosive energy, which rocketed from his hand in the form of three powerful, individual blasts, which shot up towards the approaching Kana.

The fiery haired girl swiftly dodged the first two, watching them detonate over the horizon in spectacular dome-shaped explosions with the force of nukes. When she saw the third one homing in on her, the girl cranked back both her hands and chucked them forward with a yell, producing an enormous, golden sphere of energy that expanded and collided with the final blast.

The impact caused an explosion several times greater than a hydrogen bomb, creating an orange, sphere shaped explosion that parted the clouds, the ocean, and punched a crater into the seabed five kilometers wide. The range was so extensive it completely disintegrated all ten islands in the vicinity. This included the one Gohan was on.

The flash of blinding light the detonation generated could be seen for miles and the tremors from the catastrophic blasts shook the entire Eastern seaboard.

Vegeta, who was still lying stricken in the middle of a distant field, saw the explosion blanket the horizon and gawked in disbelief at how enormous it was. Having lost complete sight of both warriors, the man could only lie there, beaten, battered and burnt from head to toe, trying to feel the fight taking place with his senses.

Though it wasn't as accurate as seeing it firsthand, the man couldn't help but be astonished at how powerful both combatants were.

Once the ocean settled back in after the landscape reducing attacks went off, Gohan reappeared a full minute later many miles away atop another island peak. Landing there, bathed in his golden aura, the Super Saiyan 2 frowned as he glared across at the other mountain top, where he saw Kana reappear in a golden flash.

The two fighters revealed to each other that they were both covered in extensive bruises, cuts and burns, a majority of which had been caused by their last attacks reaching critical mass. Both sporting ruined clothing, including Kana whose armor had broken in several places and was missing a few plates, the pair also had blood running out of their noses and mouths to join the heavy wounds on their faces.

After pounding away at each other for well over several minutes, it was a given that the two would be in such ruined states. It was unreal.

Staring at one another for well over a minute, the glowing fighters remained as they were, catching their breaths and sizing the other's condition up. Once they were certain they'd analyzed the other enough, both took fighting stances a second time. While Gohan stood side on with his arms firmly at his sides, his opponent brought her fists up and took a wider stance, showing that both were ready.

"Round 2?" Gohan asked.

Kana smirked, "I thought you'd never ask." Her expression then became surprisingly feral, a split second before she vanished in another golden flash.

The girl teleported directly in front of the boy and flew into him head first, crashing into his cranium. A thunderclap ringing out, Gohan was sent blasting off of the island peak and flying backwards through the air. The impact shutting down his aura, the demi-Saiyan tucked, rolled, and stopped, before giving a burst of energy and rocketing forward with a yell. Kana charged in as well, and with either a fist or an arm leading their dashes, the pair crashed into each other head-on with a shockwave that rippled out in a brilliant flash of white light.

The bright blast caused the ocean to stir violently and the entire island beneath them to splinter and crack. Soon enough, the two warriors began exchanging ridiculously fast blows high above the ground once again. This time however, instead of attacking with the same grace and form that they had back in Satan City, their attacks were wilder, more furious, and as they traded shots at invisible speeds, they started to pummel each other with reckless abandon. Rapid machinegun fire echoed out across the ocean as the two teens hammered away at one another, while at the same time blocking, parrying or dodging whatever they could.

Right now, both Gohan and Kana were opening up with everything they had and, as their fight progressed above the large island, their battle became more and more aggressive.

Loud shouts echoing out with every blow he landed, Gohan pressed forward with an assault. Landing a devastating hook that stunned Kana, he began hitting her with power shot after power shot. A right fist buried into the girl's stomach, doubling her over, followed by a swift left knee into her face that cocked her head backwards. She then received a left kick straight into her stomach, allowing Gohan to grab her hair and, pulling her forward, drive a right knee across her face.

Thunderclaps marking each hit, Gohan then took advantage of his stunned opponent and, while continuing to hold onto her long orange hair, began repeatedly kneeing her in the face with his left over and over, eliciting continuous shouts of pain from the Seirei. His blows landing at the rate of a machine pistol, he continued to leisurely pummel Kana like she was a punching bag, until his rhythm was unexpectedly broken by the tip of her hair suddenly coming to life, extending, and wrapping around his neck like a chord.

"Whoa! What the-GAH!"

Caught completely off guard, Gohan was then yanked forward and, while being throttled by the length of hair, was head butted by the girl with an earsplitting crack. Paying him back for the brutal knee assault, Kana then gleefully began elbowing him in the face over and over again, the sounds of loud, metallic clangs ringing out with each impact. The demi-Saiyan cried out repeatedly from the blows that connected. Then, after three more seconds of a continuous, vicious assault, Kana cranked back her leg and threw a kick straight into the boy's chin.

The force of the foot slamming into his face sent Gohan rocketing into the sky with a shockwave.
Kana shot after him. But just when it seemed like she would catch him, the boy suddenly stopped with his hands thrown up and splayed over his forehead, forcing the girl to hit the brakes and halt in midair directly in front of him.

"MASENKO-HAA!" Gohan roared, throwing his hands forward and unleashing a blast with an enormous spread that engulfed Kana in a blinding flash of golden and purple light. The attack ripped through the skies like a hurricane, disintegrating the whole top portion of the island beneath them while sending the young Saiyan's opponent spinning into the ocean at the same time.

The attack plowed through the sea and dug an enormous, one kilometer wide trench through the water to the bottom, which filled in seconds later as the golden sphere of energy carried on and detonated over the horizon in another enormous, dome-shaped blast.

Watching the flash fade in the distance, Gohan fixed a bloodied glare on the vanishing point as the tsunamis settled back into the ocean. When the surface became still once again, he then saw a golden streak of energy shoot up into the sky from the water many kilometers away. After rocketing to an even higher altitude than the demi-Saiyan, the glowing alien suspended herself in the clouds with her fists tightly clenched.

A dozen golden, basketball sized spheres appeared around the Seirei with a crackle of electricity. They began to orbit her at high speed then, throwing her hand forward, Kana started lobbing the blasts towards her opponent one after the other in turn. "METEOR BARRAGE!" The spheres shot from her hand like rockets, shooting across the ocean at light speed and homing in on the youngster.

Powering up, Gohan maneuvered across the sky as fast as he could. He zipped left and right across the expanse of openness in a blur, allowing the shots to blow right past him, only to hook around and track his movements. With the region being filled with a dazzling display of streaking lights, Gohan avoided the tracer rounds one after the other, slipping them, leaping over them and ducking them, before they all converged on his position all at once.

"THAT'S IT!" the demi-Saiyan shouted, clenching his fists, taking a horse riding stance and, with a bellow of rage, blasted his aura outwards in the form of a golden sphere-shaped shield that expanded at an alarming rate. The attacks collapsed on top of the boy and drilled into his protective barrier with extreme force.

Then, with another mighty roar, Gohan violently increased his shield's density and sent the golden spheres rocketing off in different directions. The orbs peppered the horizon all across the board, detonating one after the other with nuke-like force.

Safe to say the ocean definitely took the brunt of the punishment.

After sending the attacks off, Gohan, still in a powered up state, took flight and charged straight towards Kana. He covered the distance of several kilometers between them in a second and as soon as the boy was upon her, he greeted Kana with a full body check that sent the girl barreling through the air with a cry of pain. Trailing spittle of blood, the teenager managed to spin her body upright and meet the demi-Super Saiyan flying after her. The pair then locked in another vicious pummeling match that saw them flying through the air at supersonic speeds, while exchanging attacks in a blur of movement.

Their forms turning into indistinct, flickering bodies, the pair blasted across the ocean, covering the entire expanse in seconds before reaching dry land a full minute later. Sailing across the coast and traveling further inland, the pair then decided to dispense with blocking and started beating the shit out of each other instead. Blows that shook the countryside resounded throughout the sky as one after the other the two of them began landing devastating hits on the other in the head, face, stomach, sides and chest.

Eventually, getting tired of the hitting match, Gohan leapt up to avoid his opponent's roundhouse kick, drawing Kana's surprised gaze skywards. It was there she saw the boy flare up his aura before rocketing down at her, at the same time interlocking his hands overhead and driving a hammer blow straight down into Kana's neck. The loud crack of thunder echoed out when the girl was sent spiraling into the grasslands below, her eyes glazed over as the hit had nearly knocked her out. Managing to recover in time to notice her descent, the girl took control of her flight by quickly tucking up into a ball and rolling.

Her form becoming incased in her metallic sphere, Kana collided with the ground and, with elastic like quality, bounced back into the sky and rocketed towards Gohan at an alarming speed. The boy only had a split second to look shocked before the metal orb slammed headlong into him with a loud 'bang', knocking him senseless.

After sending the demi-Saiyan into the clouds, Kana's ball form suddenly changed directions and flew back down to the planet's surface, where it bounced off the ground and shot back up at Gohan once again.

Stopping himself, the boy looked back with his guard up and a serious expression in play. His façade then dropped completely when he saw the sphere approaching him again and he freaked out. "OH CRAP!" Gohan then swayed back at the last second, avoiding the sphere that blasted past him and into the clouds. It was there it promptly stopped and unfolded, allowing Kana to leap out and drop down towards the boy, tackling him and sending him spiraling across the countryside.

Righting himself, the thoroughly wounded Gohan powered up and began flying backwards at full speed, while his opponent shot after him and honed in on his linear path. Meeting each other in midflight, the two began trading blows once again, thunderclaps echoing across the continent as the pair past over forests, villages, valleys, and finally into a far reaching, mountainous wasteland that stretched for kilometers in all directions.

Crying out in agony when he received a kick to the face, Gohan was sent rocketing across the ranges while his opponent, bathed in her golden aura, flew after him. Loading up another kick, Kana prepared to deck the boy into the horizon, only for the Super Saiyan 2 to power up and come right back at her with a powerful hook across her face. The blow resounded with the echo of an artillery cannon that drew a splatter of blood and cry of pain from Kana, and sent her blasting in the opposite direction with the Saiyan in hot pursuit.

Powering up to recover, Kana came back at her foe and the pair began trading power shots one after the other, the two of them blocking and parrying each hit in turn with superb efficiency. Shockwaves started to ring out across the country at a machinegun rate once again as the pair battled through the air, kicking up dust from the ground dozens of stories below and causing pillars of rock to collapse from the earthshaking tremors being produced by their fight. Both of them formed a single ball of golden energy that fluctuated around them as they exchanged attacks capable of splitting mountains in half.

When they flew into a series of mountain ranges, the pair then threw simultaneous elbows at each other and collided, causing a flash of light and a sonic boom that reduced an entire edifice to rubble. Throwing a knee up at the girl, Gohan slammed it into her guard with another deafening thunderclap, before Kana retaliated with a right hook that sent the boy barreling up the slope of another mountain and into the sky above it. The force of the hit reverberated after him and completely disintegrated the monolith, sending rubble and debris crashing to the ground around Smoke and dust clogging the air, a slightly winded Kana smirked up at the boy. "I can see you've still got plenty of fight left in you."

The glowing demi-Saiyan smirked, "You got that right."

Kana chuckled, "Impressive. I didn't think you'd last this long." All transformations had limits. But as it turns out this boy had a pretty strong grasp on his second state form. He was really tearing it up.

"Funny. I can say the same thing about you, Kana. You're a pretty tenacious one," Gohan remarked with a similar competitive expression. "Out of all the opponents I've come across, you're the first person I've ever fought that could go toe to toe with me in my Ascended state. This is great."

Giggling, the girl then frowned and vanished in a golden flash.

Caught by surprise, Gohan spun around to see Kana teleport behind him and throw a kick. Dodging at the last second, he countered with an elbow, which buried into the girl's back and dropped her to the earth in a spectacular fall.

The pair descending and slamming into the rocky fields, the fiery haired girl threw both hands forward. With a yell of rage, Kana unleashed a powerful golden blast that shot towards her opponent like a lance. Reacting quickly, Gohan leapt out of the way and allowed the attack to completely disintegrate the mountain behind him, wiping it off of the face of the earth in a geyser like explosion.

As smoke clogged the air, concealing the towering rubble that was collapsing to the ground, the sound of more sonic explosions echoed over the plains as Gohan and Kana flew out of the smoke engaged in another furious duel. Sailing across the wasteland in a continuous, running battle, the pair eventually slammed headlong into the side of another tall mountain, which shattered under the force of their collision and collapsed around them.

A plume of dust rose into the air from the failing edifice. After several seconds, Gohan's form suddenly rocketed out of it and into the sky. Ascending backwards as fast as he could, the boy looked down to see Kana flying after him, the girl throwing both her hands up and charging a large, golden ball of energy in front of her.

While chasing her target, Kana took aim and fired. "STAR BURST!" With a shout she fired it at the demi-Saiyan, who watched it approach with an intense gaze before promptly dodging it, allowing the golden sphere to rocket past him.

Both fighters still gaining altitude at supersonic speed, Kana fired off another round at the ascending warrior. Cranking back his hand, Gohan let out a yell and sliced the sphere in half, the two bits separating and exploding harmlessly out of range.

Continuing to climb, Kana fired off four more rounds, shouting with every attack she launched. The spiky haired Saiyan was undeterred. He evaded them one after the other before, with another decisive yell, he cut the last ball in half with a chop, sending the two halves spiraling off in different directions.

The attacks scattering, the sky was filled with the flashes of simultaneous explosions, which cleared the air of all the white clouds in sight and left Gohan hovering between several plumes of smoke.
Looking through the fumes that'd resulted from the explosions in an effort to track down his opponent, the young Super Saiyan 2 was completely unaware of his foe teleporting directly behind him. Catching a flash of light in his peripherals, Gohan turned just in time to hear his opponent yell out and with a deafening clap of thunder, drive a knee straight into his ribs.

A bloodcurdling scream escaped the half-Saiyan's lips as his eyes glazed white and he doubled over his opponent's leg, a split second before he was promptly silenced by his foe wrapping her arm around his face and clamping his mouth shut.

Muffling his scream with her arm and locking his left arm over his shoulder painfully, Kana powered up and, with the boy firmly in her grasp, performed an aerial flip and rocketed straight towards the earth. Falling in the direction of the largest mountain, the pair's forms transformed into a golden streak of light as the Seirei maneuvered her stunned adversary into position, and prepared to pile drive him into the peak.

Kana, with a feral expression in play, laughed out loud, "WHAT'S THE MATTER, SUPER SAIYAN? AM I TOO MUCH FOR YAH?!

Life flashing back into his eyes, Gohan snarled against the arm covering his mouth and, with all the power he could muster, began elbowing the girl repeatedly in the kidney with his free arm. The blows drove into the girl one after the other with colossal force, stunning her with every blow. Eventually, the demi-Saiyan managed to get Kana to loosen her grip enough for him to reverse the hold and, snapping her arm behind her in a hammerlock, grabbed her head and powered up.

"NOT AT ALL!"

With a tremendous bellow, both opponents let out a scream as they slammed headlong into the top of the mountain. Their impact caused a geyser like explosion of dust to shoot up from the top of the edifice before the entire thing collapsed in on itself.

The force of the landing also generated an earthquake that could be felt across the entire country…

XXX

(Meanwhile – Otherworld)

"Whoa, man. This is intense," Goku exclaimed in awe, his hand pressed against King Kai's shoulder as he watched through his trainer's eyes the commotion going on down on planet earth.

"Yeah. I know. Why do you think I called you over here in the first place?" the blue overseer of space asked while his antenna did their best to track the battle. "Your son is really tearing it up down there."

"No kidding. Man. Look at him go. This is fantastic!"

Having been on Grand Kai's planet for over a month now, both Goku and King Kai had been able to settle into the community quite well. After participating in the Otherworld Tournament and meeting the most powerful fighters in history, the Z-fighter was able to pick things up where he'd left off on earth and continue his rigorous training sessions under the guidance of one of his most well-known teachers.

Over the weeks, the spiky haired hero of earth had been able to experience a lot, sparring with the fighters from his quadrant and learning a couple new tricks along the way. He was even introduced to a new system of weight training, where his trainer had given him a new set of arm and leg weights, and a whole new regimen of shadow sparring sessions. This way, he was hoping for Goku to not only become accustomed to a whole new set of conditions, but to also gradually build up his strengths and techniques.

So far it'd been going quite well.

But then, while Goku was going on a few running laps of the planet to warm up for another long day of training ahead, the chief overseer of the Northern Quadrant then sensed something taking place down on earth and cut off his observations to tune in on the signal. After looking into the problem for himself, the man was then startled to find out that it was in fact Gohan that was causing the racket and quickly called his student over to take a look.

For the next hour after that, the pair watched together as the young demi-Saiyan of earth battled against an alien foe that was not only his equal in strength and skill, but in power as well.

They weren't alone either…

Standing around them, dozens of other fighters from different quadrants had broken off from their respective trainings to see what the North Kai was making such a big fuss over. When they moved over and keyed into the reception the man was currently on, they were able to see the battle going on between the Super Saiyan 2 Gohan and the star child Kana taking place in the mortal plains below.

The spectatorship wasn't just limited to fighters either.

"Th-This… is good…" a short man very similar in appearance to the North Kai, only shorter, with purple skin, a lens over his left eye and the Kanji for 'West' emblazoned on his uniform, murmured as he observed the fight through his own telepathic abilities. A grin forming on his face, the small Kai gave an exclamation of excitement, "THIS IS GREAT! The best I've ever seen!" The man then looked across at his compatriot, who was still watching the battle with vested attention. "Who are those two?"

Apparently even the West Kai had taken an interest in the battle and was currently overseeing it with the others.

King Kai, hearing his fellow trainer's exclamation, glanced over at him with a frown, "Well, one of them is a member of that Planet Trade Organization responsible for keeping the galaxies in order. You know, the same group set up by Lord Beerus and his friends to keep things organized while they're away."

"Oh. So… is she part of the destruction corp. or…"

"Nah. The one for my sector was terminated a long time ago," King Kai replied while looking ahead of him again. "This one is a collection member… a freelancer to be exact. Kana."

"Hmm… I think I've heard that name before," the West Kai murmured before making his inquiry. "Isn't she that Seirei that's been running around the universe challenging planets and taking them to the protection zone?"

"That's right. The one and only."

"Ooh. From what I've heard that girl is supposed to be quite strong," the West Kai murmured, before then narrowing his eyes on the other fighter he could see battling her across the planet. "And… the other one?"

Goku grinned proudly and looked across at the Kai from the other quadrant, which he could see was standing between the fighters from his region. It didn't escape his notice that Pikkon was also with him. "That's my son. His name is Gohan." This answer had several of the warriors gawk at him in surprise.

"Is that true, Goku?" Olibu, a blonde haired, Herculean fighter dressed in a white tunic asked, earning an affirmative nod from the Saiyan.

The West Kai was baffled, "WHA?! Are you serious? That's your boy? Such a strong fighter?"

"Uh-huh," the spiky haired Saiyan replied while grinning back at his teacher, who continued to monitor the fight closely. "He's got the same gi, looks and everything. Heh. He takes right after me in the martial arts department. Heck, he's got even more talent for fighting than I do. And get this… even after all my training over the past twenty or so years; my son is even stronger than I am." It was a revelation that brought surprised looks to the West Kai and Pikkon's faces, as well as to the mugs of all the other warriors present. The collective reactions drew a smile to Goku's face as he watched his boy fight.

From the looks of it, his boy had been training a lot recently, a sign that he was determined to fulfill his dad's wishes to protect the planet. His skills, strength and fighting techniques were sublime. "I'm so proud of him."

"Well, you should be," King Kai spoke up again, attracting the man's gaze when he glanced at his student, "Because this Kana girl is powerful… more powerful than Cell was back in his final battle against Gohan. If he loses, then she's going to take the earth as her own and move it into another quadrant that's outside of our jurisdiction." He looked forward again with a bead of sweat appearing on his head. "After that, there will be nothing we can do until somebody else steps up to challenge them."

Hearing this had Goku blink, before the warrior from earth took on a confident look and nodded to his anxious teacher, "Don't worry about it. I know without a shadow of a doubt that my son will be able to beat this girl. You watch."

After all, he could sense it.

Even though this Kana girl was just as fast and strong as his son, Gohan was still slightly stronger and more skilled than her. Though it didn't seem like it at first, the evidence was all too clear. Just like Goku's fight against Frieza all those years ago, with every blow the demi-Saiyan managed to land on his opponent, the more damage he caused her and the more energy he sapped from her body.

It was only a matter of time before something happened.

XXX

(Back on Earth)

The sound of a jet fighter approaching signaled the return of the two warriors to the eastern half of the continent. After an unending battle that took them on a full lap around the entire earth, the two weary warriors were now close to their original starting point. And even after all the damage they'd inflicted on one another, they were still tearing into each other like there was no tomorrow.

With a sonic boom and an earthshaking crash, Kana's form ended up plowing a trench across the grassy landscape several kilometers outside of the famous Satan City metropolis. After ripping a trench through the ground that sent rubble and debris flying in all directions, the girl sprang back onto her feet and continued to slide backwards with her momentum across the field.

Glaring ahead of her, she saw Gohan's glowing form explode from the cloud forming in front of her and with a battle cry, slammed a fist across her face. The girl managed to block it with both arms, the impact causing her to slide back even faster as the boy pressed forward. With shouts of effort, the demi-Saiyan continued to drive into the Seirei with more punches as she slid along, drilling into her arms before eventually crashing a hook across her face. Head cocked to the side from the blow, Kana immediately retaliated with a swift backhand across Gohan's face, managing to knock him away while she slid to a stop on the grass.

"EAT THIS!" Eyes glowing an intense gold with veracious veins appearing on either side of her face, Kana took aim, reared her head back, and with a howl of rage, unleashed two, powerful beams from her irises. "CIRCUIT TRACER!" The beams exploded from her gaze and expanded to the size of blasts as they rocketed across the field, zigzagging at high speed towards her opponent.

Sliding to a stop along the same field, Gohan growled and dashed forward, charging towards the approaching attack. However, just before they could hit, he dove straight into the ground and disappeared, the beams bending downwards and striking the floor, where they both detonated with the force of a nuclear bomb that covered the entire countryside.

Seeing her foe vanish inside the explosion, Kana had no idea what'd happened to him. However, as the mushroom cloud rose into the air, the girl then felt the ground tremble and looked down in surprise. Upon feeling the vibrations increase, she suddenly felt her body jerk downwards when the entire hill she was standing on was lifted into the air.

As it turns out, Gohan had tunneled directly underneath his opponent and, with his incredible strength, managed to lift the hill and an entire section of land the size of an island out of the ground, and into the air. Then, with expert maneuverability, he spun the slab of earth, tipped a stunned Kana off of it, before moving the piece of land over her and dropping it straight down on top of the alien traveler. The island sized hill sandwiched the girl into the floor with an earthshaking crash, a shockwave rippling out that rocked the nearby Satan City to its foundations.

The dust settling, Gohan knelt panting on top of the massive hunk of ground he managed to bury his foe under. Electricity crackling off of him, he continued to hold his position until he sensed something dangerous approaching.

Looking up, the demi-Saiyan was about to stand when two beams unexpectedly shot out of the mound directly beneath him and slammed into his chest. The attack sent him rocketing into the sky for about a hundred stories before the blast detonated and sent him plummeting to the ground. The second he made landfall, the slab of earth Kana was crushed underneath exploded into a shower of rubble and debris, revealing an enormous, island sized crater and a severely battered and dirty Kana floating in the air.

Expression twisted in pain, the girl panted heavily and glared across the field to where her foe had crash landed.

Picking himself out of the hole, a wounded Gohan also gave a frustrated huff and looked up, where he then saw the levitating girl fly up into the sky and throw her hands out.

Aura bursting around her, the girl howled in rage and powered up, two golden spheres of energy appearing in her palms before they started to expand at an alarming rate. From his distance, Gohan watched on with widening eyes as the girl began pouring energy into the orbs, which grew and grew till both of them were the size of mountains. Their surfaces fluctuating and shooting off bolts of golden lightning, the two spheres eventually achieved stability before beginning to compress to a much smaller form.

As they did, chunks of earth for over five kilometers across the land began to rip out of the ground and levitate into the air, floating towards the golden spheres that pulsed in the sky above the country.

The demi-Saiyan's eyes shimmered in horror as he gawked at the amount of ki he could feel being put into the girl's next attack. The energy spheres she was holding had the exact same density as the sun.

"NO! You can't do that! You're going to destroy the whole planet if you fire it from that angle!" As painful as it was, Kana must be losing her sense of restraint from being hit so many times. Right now, she had gathered enough energy to wipe the entire solar system from existence.

Even though she was clearly aiming only for him, the slightest change or shift in the angle of trajectory… and you could kiss the entire planet goodbye.

Responding in alarm, Gohan leapt to his feet, took a stance, and cupped his hands behind him. His own aura exploding around him, the boy clenched his teeth and gave a loud growl as he began gathering energy of his own. In a matter of seconds, a blue sphere formed between his palms and began to pulse brightly, clashing with the golden light of Kana's attack.

Roaring out in agony at the amount of energy she was producing, the girl glared down at the boy as more and more of the ground started to rip out around her. Then, after taking aim at him, the teenager yelled, "Let's see what you're really made of, GOHAN!" Rearing back her hands, the girl threw the two balls forward and slammed them together in front of her, a deafening hum echoing across the country as they melded. "STAR CRASHER!"

A thundering 'boom' rang out across the continent when Kana unleashed her blast in one blinding, golden flash of light, the thick beam rocketing towards Gohan in a wall of disintegrating death.

The boy began to chant as the wall of an attack bore down on him, "KA-ME-HA-ME…"

His own attack primed, the demi-Saiyan waited till hers was within range before, with a mighty howl that drowned out the scream of the approaching blast, the boy threw his hands forward and unleashed his counter in one, mighty shot.

"HAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA!" The blue stream of energy that was his father's signature attack left his hands in the form of an equally powerful blast, which struck Kana's head on with an impressive thunderclap.

The entire continent shook when their attacks drilled into one another, before expanding into a blue and golden dome that filled the entire space between the two warriors and reached into the heavens. A blinding white light flickered like a strobe across the country that blinded everyone looking directly at it and produced a shockwave so massive, it ripped across the land in the form of a continuous gale. Trees bent, nearby mountains were chipped away and clouds of dust were hurled into the air in storms.

People at the head of the nationwide cyclone had to hold their ground as the wind ripped across the country at an unbelievable rate. The force was almost strong enough to rip the world asunder and with good reason.

The dome formed from the feuding attacks grew so massive that it could be seen from space. If someone were looking down at the entire earth, they could see the dome appear as a throbbing bright light on its side like a zit, burning so brightly that if it were to reach critical mass, it would disintegrate the whole planet.

Not willing to let that happen, both warriors continued to hold, their beam struggle laying waste to everything around them. Eventually, after feeling Kana's attack attempt to overwhelm his, the spiky haired Gohan gave one last snarl before allowing his full power to burst forth.

"YOU WON'T WIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIN!" the child cried out, his ki exploding from his body like water from a dam.

Blue energy rocketed off of him and created an imbalance in the dome. The demi-Saiyan's side eventually grew to an unbelievable size and overtook Kana's, blasting around it and preparing to engulf the girl in a sea of blue hell fire.

Eyes widening in horror at the approaching attack, the girl quickly decided to break the exchange the best way she knew how.

With a roar of effort, the girl tucked what remained of her dissipating blast under the growing one and, giving a mighty heave, launched both hers and Gohan's straight up into the sky. The demi-Saiyan followed suit, stopping his flow of energy and watching both attacks rocket into the sky in the form of a massive blue sphere of energy attached to a golden one.

The two blasts expanded to a size greater than that of earth's moon as they shot off the planet and across the solar system. At the speed of light, they passed by Mars and the asteroid belt, taking a small chunk out of Jupiter and wiping out one of its moons in the process before continuing on past Pluto seconds later. When the two enormous spheres left the solar system far behind and found themselves drifting in the empty vacuum of deep space, the feuding attacks eventually lost momentum and gave way.

In a blinding flash, the Kamehameha and the Star Crasher exploded with the force of a super nova, with enough power to wipe out the entire Solar System. However, after traveling so far, the attacks managed to detonate safely outside of the cluster of planets, only barely grazing Pluto's orbit. When the sphere like explosion died down, silence returned to the cosmos.

Both Gohan and Kana stared up at the sky, both of them wide-eyed and both stunned at the force of the blasts they'd just unleashed.

"Whoops… my bad," Kana murmured, nervous sweat pouring down her face.

"We took out a chunk of Jupiter," Gohan also said, gulping a little after sensing exactly where their deflected attacks had gone and what they'd hit along the way. "Is that a bad thing?"

Hopefully no one saw that.

Somewhere up in Otherworld though, King Kai was freaking out and Goku was laughing his ass off… along with all the other fighters.

Having avoided tragedy for now, Gohan returned his attention to Kana, who also glared back at him.

After setting themselves into their respective stances, the demi-Saiyan powered up once again and shot across the massive, smoking crater formed by their beam match.

With a yell of effort, he tackled the girl in the chest and sent the two of them flying across the countryside towards the city where, upon reaching the outskirts, the boy cranked his fist back and drove a punch into her face. The force of the blow generated a shockwave and sent the girl spiraling past Orange Star Highschool, past the centre of Satan metropolis, and all the way to the reserve where their battle had started.

Smashing through two office building floors, Kana eventually spiraled down into the street, where she ended up bouncing several times before eventually leaping to her feet and skidding across the reserve. Krillin, Zangya and Videl saw the girl appear and watched her rise to her feet and snarl at the sky.

It was then they saw Gohan reappear several stories above her, bathed in his golden aura with blue electricity running up and down his body.

Clenching her fists, Kana gave an angry shout and powered up, her hair bellowing skywards while her aura sprang up at full blast. "Hey! Enough of this silly game of tag! Time for the final round!"

"Alright! You asked for it!" the demi-Saiyan replied, giving off another burst of electricity. "Let's do this, Kana!"

"Right back at you, Gohan!"

With a crack of wind, Kana vanished in a golden flash, reappearing in the distance flying up into the sky. Seeing her speck take the form of a golden streak of energy several kilometers away, Gohan snarled and, powering up as well, rocketed after her at full speed.

Their forms bathed in energy, the two warriors shot across the sky at full speed, breaking the sound barrier several times. Then, as they were closing in on the other, both fighters let out simultaneous war yells before colliding in mid air, generating a shockwave that tore the field beneath them apart like it were confetti and punching an enormous crater into the floor. After a single trade of hits, the two blurs shot off and flew into the sky, climbing higher and higher at an alarming rate.

The two warriors rocketed into the air in the form of golden bolts, leaving behind trails of energy as they ripped past the clouds and into the upper atmosphere. When the clear blue sky was suddenly replaced by the darkness of space, it soon became glaringly obvious to them that they were now in the utter most layer surrounding earth. Passing the stratosphere into the mesosphere, the two warriors began intersecting each other again and again, shockwaves ringing out every time the two golden blurs collided and exchanged killer blows.

Both fighters were tied for first place, but when they eventually climbed into the mid thermosphere area above the planet, it was soon revealed that Kana was taking the brunt of the punishment.

Bleeding from the mouth with even more bruises on her face, including a swollen eye, the desperate girl retreated higher and cranked her fist back. Seeing the golden bolt that was her opponent rocket up at her with the entire edge of the earth as his background, Kana took aim. Gohan, spotting her counter, gave a roar and, flying at her in a blur, drove a power left straight into her cheek, burying it into her face with a shockwave strong enough to reduce an entire island into gravel.

The blow shook the girl's brain and cracked her jaw, stunning her enough for the demi-Saiyan to crank his left leg back before driving the mother of all knees straight into her stomach. The blow landed with a deafening thudcrapl and a 'crunch', which was followed shortly by Kana spewing up blood and splattering it over Gohan's now half torn orange top. After hitting her, the boy grabbed her by the leg, spun her, and tossed her further into the depths of space across the planet's upper layers.
Spinning out of control, Kana eventually cracked her back against a satellite that suddenly drifted into her path. Rolling along it and chipping away its hull, the girl eventually dug her fingers into its surface and forced herself to a stop, right on the very back of the craft. Looking up, the wounded girl saw Gohan power up and fly straight up at her, drawing a growl from her before she stood up and kicked the satellite at the approaching blonde with both feet.

The craft crashed into the Super Saiyan 2, smacking him back down towards the planet at a ridiculous speed. When it started to fall from the thermosphere, barreling towards the stratosphere and all set to burn up on re-entry, Kana took aim with both hands and unleashed a powerful Kiai that smashed the satellite to smithereens, sending the bits and pieces blazing through earth's layers to the planet's surface. Most of it would be lucky to even make landfall.

Panting exhaustedly from the combo, Kana watched the satellite pieces vanish into the clouds far below. When she saw no sign of her opponent, a smile slowly formed on her face as she began to believe she'd won.

She curled her fist in triumph, "Y-Yes! I did it!" After everything she threw at the boy, she finally managed to take him out once and for all.

But then, moments into her celebrations, Kana soon realized that it would take a lot more than a hunk of metal to take a Super Saiyan out. It only clicked with her a few seconds after her cheer.

Eyes widening in alarm, the girl suddenly spun around to see Gohan's form blazing straight towards her from behind, an intense look on his face as his left hand was cranked back and filled with a golden ball of energy.

"WHAT?! H-How did…" Panicking when the demi-Saiyan was only a few feet from her, Kana threw her left hand forward and unleashed a golden blast of energy.

Gohan effortlessly let it slip past him and, with his sphere of energy loaded he got right up into the girl's stunned face and thrust the ball straight into her gut. "Clench up, Kana! MASENDA-N-HAAAAA!" With a shockwave, his energy attack ground into the girl's stomach and sent both of them plummeting towards the planet's surface. However, instead of the Saiyan going first, it was Kana who broke the atmosphere first, and as his blast drilled into her, her back started to burn up as they quickly built up speed.

At first appearing shocked, the girl's expression twisted into one of pain as the screeching sound of the blast pulsing against her stomach drowned out all other noise. When flames started to engulf her, with Gohan using her as a shield for entry, the pair began blasting through the upper layers of the planet one after the other, a sonic boom ringing out on ever bounce. Then, as Gohan powered up and began pressing further with a roar of effort, Kana's eyes widened in horror and she let out a cry of agony when they burst through the clouds and began spiraling back to the ground.

Coincidentally, they began falling to the area close to Satan City.

Lightning bolts shooting off of their forms that fell to earth in the form of a golden streak of light, the continued breaking barriers before, like a bullet, the pair collided with the ground at full speed. Gohan's close range Masenko went off the moment they made impact, the result generating a golden, geyser explosion with the force of a hydrogen bomb that sent ripples of shockwaves echoing out and causing the clouds overhead to part.

The people in Satan City had watched the 'meteor' descend from space and crash into the countryside miles away. Not knowing what it was, but knowing that it had fallen at a safe distance, the people were at a total loss as to what was going to happen now.
Krillin and Zangya however, who were both adept at sensing spiritual presences, knew that the match was over. So, picking themselves up, they quickly ascended into the sky and followed the plume of smoke.

Videl, seeing them leave, quickly pulled out the capsule containing her jet-copter and cracked it open. Taking a lot longer to get moving, the girl hurriedly leapt into the cockpit and fired up the engine. With her best foot forward, she rose up into the sky and took off after the Z-fighters at full speed, which wasn't nearly as fast as they were moving.

For all she knew, the battle was finished.

The question was though… who won…?

XXX

(Many miles away)

Lying at the bottom of an enormous smoking crater that had been made in the middle of what were once considered prized farmlands, two bodies could be seen. One was standing upright, bathed in a golden aura with a bioelectric field of electricity crackling up and down his body. The other was that of a girl with fiery orange hair, lying sprawled out at the base of the pit, with her plug suit close to tatters and a massive burn mark engraved into her stomach.

With Gohan still on his feet and looking down at the battered and defenseless girl, the victor of their little skirmish was made all too clear.

During his battle, the demi-Saiyan had received quite an extensive bit of damage. On top of the bruises and cuts covering him, his orange and blue gi was also heavily damaged. He had a hole in his right pants leg and was missing the entire bottom left section of it. His orange top was practically gone, leaving him with only the blue undershirt. He also had blood running down his face and from the corners of his mouth. Needless to say, looking battle-damaged and bathed in the glow of his Super Saiyan 2 form, he looked almost exactly like his father did in his battle against Frieza when he first transformed.

Kana on the other hand, had taken it the worst. Not only had the glow in her hair faded, but her face was just as bruised as Gohan's, including a swollen cheek and eye, had blood running out of almost every orifice, and her body was burnt all over. While the leg and arm portions of her suit had survived somewhat, an entire front part of her plug suit had been disintegrated by the short-range blast to her gut. She could only be grateful that at least the chest and pelvis areas of the suit had remained intact. But this left her entire belly and stomach exposed, and not only did she have severe, black burns around the part where she'd been hit, but her abdominals were cut up as well.

And that wasn't even the worst of the damage…

Gohan frowned, "It's over. You're done."

Choking up blood so that it splattered across her front, the girl gazed up at her opponent, who continued to glare down at her, seemingly without pity. "Y-Yeah. I know." Cringing from the bolts of pain shooting through her, Kana tried to form fists in the dirt, but failed miserably. She didn't even have the strength to move. "Man. You got me real good back there. Using the satellite to conceal your movements… I have to admit… I never saw that one coming."

The Super Saiyan 2 allowed his aura to fade, but stayed in his transformed state as he stared down at his defeated opponent, who continued to cough up more bodily fluids. He then spared her a smile, "You were so focused on looking ahead of you that you didn't notice me flying through the debris to get you from behind. It's kind of hard to keep track of your target when you're seeing double, isn't it."

"Heh… yeah… I guess it is," Kana said in a weak voice before falling into a coughing fit once again. More blood leaking out of the corner of her mouth, the girl looked up to see the boy give her a more serious stare. Upon recognizing the fury etched in his eyes and fierceness in his gaze, she knew that she'd reached the end of the line. "I've never… ever fought against a warrior as skilled and as powerful as you… even after all my years of traveling. It's clear to me now that you are… without a doubt… the protector of this world."

Gohan nodded, "Like I said; my father entrusted me with the earth. After he died, he told me to watch over the planet and to protect everyone on it… especially the ones that I love."

"Even if it means… killing?" Kana asked, looking up at the boy firmly.

This question didn't even give Gohan pause, "If I have to."

"Then… I suppose this is where I finally… hang up my suit," the alien invader murmured weakly, another cough causing her to spit blood out. Her breathing coming out in heavy drags, the girl spent the next few moments in pain before looking up at the serious boy once more. "It was bound to happen eventually. After all these years of traveling… and challenging people to fights, I was bound to meet my match sooner or later. I never thought it would be at the hands of someone like you." Gazing painfully at the demi-Saiyan, Kana felt tears well up in her eyes as the pain and thought of dying finally got to her. The girl clenched her teeth and shut her eyes, wanting to block out these thoughts but finding it impossible, "I… It's just… there was so much more I wanted to do… so much more I wanted to see. I never… even had a chance… to really live…" She never even found someone to settle down with. All her years spent traversing the universe and she never even thought about finding someone to share her time with.

It didn't matter now though. After all the fuss she'd caused on this planet, she wouldn't be surprised if Gohan blasted her right then and there.

Looking upon the girl's face, Gohan saw the pain reflected clearly in her eyes; a sadness that gripped her entirely as her world started to fade around her. Though she was an incredibly tough girl and was an exceptionally powerful warrior, Kana didn't possess the cold, unforgiving demeanor of one. Normally, in his ascended state, when battling against a foe who had nothing but evil intent and cruelty swelling in their heart, the young fighter wouldn't have shown a hint of pity or restraint as he drove them into the ground. It was a lesson he'd learned well after his battle with Cell and a trait that came with his Saiyan-side, one that he was learning to control.

However, when he saw the defeat reflected on the face of his current opponent, who was not only a cheerful, kind and considerate individual, who cherished life above everything else and viewed it as something precious and needed to be protected, struck a chord in the boy that immediately suppressed the fierce tendencies within him. The kind heart that he held came to surface and his once serious expression softened, replaced by surprise while he stared down at the girl lying at the bottom of the crater.

Sobbing a little, Kana looked up at the young man through shimmering, tear-strung eyes and looked into his softened gaze, "If it means anything… I… really had fun today, Gohan… thank you…"

Eyes narrowing at what she planned to be her last words, the still transformed boy then looked over his shoulder to see his friends land behind him. Seeing Vegeta, Trunks, Piccolo and Zangya were alive and well, as well as Krillin, who was still cradling an unconscious Android 18# in his arms, Gohan then looked back at Kana to see her beam at him.

After a few more seconds of thought, the demi-Saiyan then made a decision and threw a look at his mentor, the Namekian flinching at its intensity.

"Wait here." Powering up, the boy suddenly shot up into the sky and disappeared over the horizon with a sonic boom.

The Z-fighters standing in the crater looked in the direction the boy had vanished in confusion, stunned by his ridiculous burst of speed. For the next minute they waited there, either looking over the horizon or turning to stare down at the thoroughly beaten Kana. When they saw her gaze up at them, half-dead with bags under her eyes and blood leaking out of her mouth, a couple of the warriors there immediately felt pity for her.

But while Trunks and Krillin came off as the most forgiving of the group, the only ones who viewed the girl with any sort of caution or seriousness were Vegeta, Piccolo and Zangya. Hell, the former of the three even contemplated putting the teen out of her misery.

However, after a couple minutes of awkward silence, another sonic boom and the sensation of Gohan's returning presence drew their gazes back over the horizon, where they saw the Super Saiyan 2 return and promptly land in the crater. It was when he walked past them that the group noticed he was carrying a familiar brown bag in his hand and, after squatting down next to the fallen Kana, he fished out a Senzu bean and slipped it into her mouth.

"G-Gohan," Krillin exclaimed in surprise.

Recognizing the stuff the child had returned with, Vegeta immediately stepped forward, "What do you think you're doing, brat?!"

The transformed youngster, despite the supposed fierce nature brought on by his ascended Saiyan state, gave the girl a warm smile as his eyes softened to that of his normal self, "Here. Chew and swallow."

Doing as instructed, Kana bit down on the bean in her mouth and began to grind it between her teeth. Making sure that it was mashed up nice and good, the girl then tentatively swallowed and allowed whatever it was she'd eaten to take its affect.

At first believing it was a drug meant to end her suffering quickly and quietly, Kana then suddenly felt the burning sensation stretching across her body vanish like the wind and a surge of energy rush through her. Then, as if hit by an electric shock, the girl's eyes widened and she sat bolt upright. The sight of her sitting up so quickly had Zangya step back a little in surprise.

Confounded by her sudden recovery, Kana quickly began scanning her body. Testing her hands and patting herself down, checking for any bruises and busted limbs, the girl was quickly shocked when she discovered… nothing. Not a scrape, cut, bruise or burn mark remained. Even the severe scorch tattoo ground into her gut had healed over, with the dry skin peeling away to reveal new, flawless skin underneath.

Overwhelmed, Kana looked up at Gohan, who smiled back at her, "W-What did… you do? What was that thing you gave me?"

"Something you may not have where you come from," the boy replied cheerfully while standing up. "It's called a Senzu bean." He then wasted no time in heading over to Krillin, where he pulled another of the medicinal miracles out and placing it in his open hand.

"Remarkable," Kana exclaimed, checking herself once more before looking up and seeing her former opponent give out more beans to the others. Even though Vegeta frowned upon having to take one, he accepted it either way and bit the metaphorical bullet. "Fruits that can heal the sick and treat the wounded. This planet certainly is the most amazing in the entire cosmos."

Gohan chuckled and turned back to the teenager, slipping the bag into his belt and gazing at her kindly. "Well… I'm not sure about other fruits and vegetables, but Senzu beans definitely get the job done. Only one person on this planet knows how to grow them… and coming across these particular beans in the wild is next to impossible."

Chuckling, Kana gave him an understanding nod, "I see. Well, I'll be sure to document this for later study."

While Kana engaged in conversation with Gohan and the others stood back, Krillin took a moment to crouch down and feed Eighteen the bean. Gently encouraging her to swallow it, the bald fighter waited patiently for it to take effect and watched as her eyes slowly fluttered open.

"Hey. You alright?" Krillin asked in a quiet voice.

"Uh. Yeah. I'm okay." Groaning and massaging the bridge of her nose, the young woman looked up to see who was leaning over her and watched her vision slowly clear. "W-What happened?"

Smiling in relief, Krillin grinned at the beautiful android as she regained her bearings, "Well… it's a bit of a long tale. I'll tell yah about it later."

A little bit surprised to find the short fighter standing over her, the blonde android gave a momentarily hard look and quickly stood up. Turning her back on the other Z-fighters standing around her so as to hide her flustered expression, her actions, despite their subtlety, failed to miss the notice of the ever watchful Zangya.

Smiling at the sight and feeling her strength return to her thanks to the bean, the blue-skinned woman then stood by quietly, watching as Gohan made his peace with the girl that was formerly their enemy. It was during which time the alien woman once again found herself completely baffled by the character of the demi-Saiyan. "First he saves me, then he spares me, and now, not only does he show mercy to an opponent, he also helps her and treats me as well."

"Geez. What is up with this brat?" No matter how hard she tried, she just couldn't figure him out.

After several moments of standing around and adjusting their clothing, Gohan then gave the ruined field a look over before turning back to Kana, "I think… we may have overdid it a little bit. Not counting the damage we did to the countryside, the city is going to need some patchwork."

Kana, also seeing the problem, then threw the demi-Saiyan a smile. "Not to worry. I can have this fixed up in no time."

A little bit confused by her response, Mirai Trunks gave her a frown, "How?" Even Piccolo and Vegeta had their interests spiked. "You guys did wreck quite a lot of the planet."

"Simple. Like this." Cracking her fingers, the glowing haired alien beamed up towards the sky and placed her hands on her hips. "Bit! Please run the damage control software for Terra 4032-877."

Bringing confused looks to the fighters as she seemed to be talking to somebody but couldn't see or sense anyone at all, they then became aware of a bright light shining high above them.

Looking up into the clouds, the group suddenly saw an orange beam shoot down from the heavens and strike Satan City, before rippling outwards in an orange wall of energy in all directions. Watching the wave approach them and flash past, putting most of the fighters on guard sans for Eighteen and Gohan, the group then found themselves standing in a lush, untouched farmland, the wave of energy having seemingly wiped it clean of all damage and replacing it with its previous state. In no time at all, the planet had been mended and refurbished.

Gawking at the physics bending repairs that'd been made, Trunks and everybody else looked back at the girl to see her smirking proudly at them.

"H-How did you do that?" Krillin asked in astonishment.

Grinning cheekily at the startled looks on the warriors' faces, Kana gave them a 'V' sign. "After I scanned your planet I was able to get a detailed copy of the world's specs. Using the same system of code I use to compress worlds, I can use the same software to repair them. It's a really complicated process to explain…"

"Oh. Really?" Krillin murmured, before then looking across at the other fighters to see them still in disheveled and battle-ruined states. "So… I'm guessing this doesn't work on living people?"

"Unfortunately not," Kana replied while giving a nervous giggle. "I only scanned the planet, not the life forms. If I was to try fixing clothing with the same system, with the material being so close to live tissue, it might end up doing something unpleasant…"

That was all that was needed to have the short fighter cringe, "Ah… fair enough." It was a response that had Android 18# grunt and turn away.

Vegeta, losing patience with this light show, then fixed his glare on the cheerfully grinning girl and spoke up from his side of the repaired field. "While all this is nice and all, I take it since the brat has now beaten you into the ground and shown you what a true Saiyan warrior is capable of, isn't it about time you packed your things and left?" He was still obviously sore at being beaten by this woman and wanted to see her leave as soon as possible.

Expecting this question from the prince, the teenage girl beamed and nodded, "Yeah. I guess I should. One shouldn't overstay their welcome. But before I do, I still have a few more things I need to settle here before I can officially close the book on this case."

"What things?" Vegeta asked impatiently with a look resembling one Piccolo was also throwing the girl.

Unshaken by the displeased stares he was receiving from the group surrounding her, Kana beamed towards the still transformed Gohan and approached him. Stopping just a few feet in front of him, she raised a hand to place over her chest and bowed to him respectfully. It was a gesture that was met by surprise from the young warrior.

"It has been an honor and a privilege to do battle with you, Son Gohan," Kana spoke, straightening up. "After so many years of traveling this universe, I have long since forgotten the last time I had to do battle with a warrior of your incredible strength and skill. You're probably the first fighter who has ever pushed me as hard as you did."

The spiky haired male smiled and acknowledged her kind words, "Thanks. It's… also the first time I've ever had to fight someone like you as well." He then spared her a cheerful grin, "You were awesome. I only wish you could stick around for a little while longer. I'd really like to show you around."

Kana grinned at his wishful response, but then her expression fell slightly as she gave him an inquisitive look. It was one that did not go unnoticed by the observant group of fighters standing around them. "I'd… also like to thank you for going out of your way to help me. Even with my planet's recovery unit onboard my ship, I do not believe I would have lived long enough to heal from the amount of damage I received during our battle." Her statement drawing a surprised blink from the boy, she then stepped closer and leaned in, causing Gohan to pull away slightly. "Any other person would have let me die without giving me a second thought, so why did you help me when you could have easily left me as I was?"

Not really needing to think on it for any longer than he had to, the young warrior smiled, "I just did what my father would've done." He then tilted his head cheerfully. "Even though you were my enemy, I knew you weren't a bad person. You actually went out of your way to avoid hurting other people and getting innocent lives involved in our battle." He noticed this both above the city and on the highway, where they fought against each other while avoiding the civilians as much as possible. A wider grin spread across his lips, "You're the nicest alien invader who's ever come to visit our planet. There's no way I could let someone kind and gentle like you die. It would be madness on me if I did."

Her expression transforming into one of awe as she listened to every word Gohan spoke, Kana spent the next few minutes gazing at the boy. After processing his honest words and looking closely at his face, the girl suddenly felt something strange rush through her chest and a heat flood into her cheeks.

Eyes shimmering while she continued to stare at the youthful fighter, the girl suddenly gasped and allowed a gentle smile to form. Taking a step back for air, Kana returned to her normal, energetic and spunky self, and grinned across at her opponent with renewed sense of purpose. "Well, you're definitely the most one-of-a-kind fighter I've ever come across. There's no denying that. Believe it or not, but it's incredibly hard to come across a warrior from another planet who's not only strong, but compassionate and gentle as well. It's a shame I have to leave so soon. I would really like to hang around with you a little while longer, Gohan." She then had another switch in expressions and threw the half-Saiyan a mischievous smile, "Unless… you want to come with me."

This statement caught everyone by surprise, with Vegeta, Trunks, Piccolo, Krillin and Zangya giving the girl their complete and undivided attention. Gohan especially was quite taken aback. "Umm… come with you? W-What do you mean by that?"

"Well… you see…" Giggling, Kana began to walk circles around Gohan, placing a finger and thumb on her chin as she inspected the boy from head to toe. "Unlike other Seirei, I have very simple tastes… and I share a deep love and enthusiasm for extremely rare and valuable objects." The Z-fighters watched her intently, wondering what in the world she was doing as she poked the boy in the shoulder and turned him around. When the youngster was facing his friends, the girl stopped in front of him again and beamed. "This also includes rare aliens."

"Uhh… okay," Gohan murmured, not really knowing where this was going.

Kana grinned at him, "It's the reason why I travel; looking for stuff that nobody else can find." Her gaze then turned into one expressing fondness as she gazed at the half-Saiyan. "Unfortunately, it gets very lonely traveling through space in such a big ship all by oneself. If you come with me, I will gladly become your mate and support you faithfully for the rest of my life."

At that statement, almost all the Z-fighters standing around the pair nearly fell over in shock, including Vegeta and Eighteen. Managing to hold on, the group instead stared wide-eyed in disbelief at the girl's back, who watched with fascination as Gohan became thunderstruck and his expression twisted into one of bewilderment. Almost all the blood in his body ran up to his face when he saw the disarmingly beautiful smile Kana threw at him afterwards.

"W-W-What? M-M-M-M-Mate?" Oh, he knew what that word meant. He'd read enough biology texts to understand the implications of that situation. "B-But… why me?"

Kana licked her lips and stepped around to his right side, where she then gleefully wrapped her arms around his muscular one and pressed her ample bosom into his shoulder affectionately. Her action had Gohan blush to the roots of his hair and a shiver run up his spine. "Like I said, I really love rare and valuable things. You are a Saiyan; one of the rarest and most endangered races in the universe. You're also incredibly kind, intelligent, and possess a strong sense of righteousness and virtue you don't find in many warriors. Members of my race are extremely particular about the partners that they choose and can spend decades searching for someone who is not only mentally compatible with them, but also has a good heart and all the physical traits needed to help them bear a healthy offspring. We also mate for life… showing love and devotion to no other… though seeing as how you're a Saiyan, I'd be willing to 'split the reward'." Her expression lit up all the more as her cheeks seemed to glow. "You're the rarest gem I've ever come across… and I'd be more than happy to choose you as my partner."

Completely baffled by what the girl was saying to him, which had his face light up like a bulb, the innocent young Saiyan swallowed hard when he felt the girl hold him closer and looked across at his friends for help.

Unfortunately for him, every single one of them from Piccolo to Zangya was staring at them with codfish expressions, eyes wide as saucers and mouths hanging open. Quickly realizing he wasn't going to be getting any assistance from them, the young Super Saiyan 2 sucked it up and turned back to look at Kana, who was still beaming at him in a way that had his stomach doing summersaults.

"Well?" Kana asked.

Gohan grinned, "A-As tempting as that sounds… I'm… going to have to pass." His eyes reflecting his sincerity, he looked down at the girl as her expression reverted to one of inquisitiveness. "You're a great fighter and an amazing girl, Kana. If I could, I would definitely go with you. But I made a promise. I've got my duties here on earth, and friends and family to look after. I can't leave all of that behind." He then nodded to her, "I'm sorry but… I have to stay here." It was the honest truth.

He couldn't leave. Not to mention the whole thing about 'mating' and 'life partners' had stirred some rather strange feelings inside of him that scared him out of his wits. But, being the brave Saiyan warrior that he was, he pressed forward and, using kind words, let the girl down as gently as possible.

At first Kana just seemed to stare at him, obviously processing his response for the next several seconds as silence reigned over them. Eventually though, the girl gave a smile once again and with a chuckle, she detached herself from the boy and promptly stepped away. "Oh well. If that's your decision, then I'm not going to argue." She then moved back, grinning across at the Super Saiyan 2 with a devilish air reflected in her expression. "Still, it's a shame you can't come with me. You and I would have made a great team."

Gohan chuckled, his face losing the shade of red as he finally acquired breathing space once again. "Yeah." That was one hell of a reaction for him though. Maybe he was finally starting to reach that age where girls were beginning to hold a bit more 'significance' in his life. Whatever the reason though, he was just glad he wasn't dying of high blood pressure anymore. "If you like you can come visit us again sometime… you know, if you're not too busy."

Kana giggled, "I think I'd like that." She then reached to her side and pressed a section of her waist plating, where a puff of steam then ejected some sort of metallic card. Withdrawing it, the girl held it up and allowed it to take shape into a USB device for earth's computers, which had Gohan blink at in surprise before she stepped towards him and handed it over. "Here."

Curious, Gohan reached out and grabbed it, "What is it?"

"A little present… in case you ever want to contact me again." She allowed the boy to take the device and grinned at him. "It also has a little training sheet on it, which I wrote up just then based off of earth's languages."

Gohan became even more curious and tilted his head, "Training sheet?"

Kana grinned, "You saw me using that teleportation technique in our fight, yes?" Seeing him nod, the girl then gestured to the data. "It's a technique known by many as Instantaneous Movement. Members of my race use this to travel long distances in an instant and can even jump to worlds all across the universe, even move between dimensions. Unlike the technique practiced by the Yardrats, this one is a lot more efficient and can be used at a moment's notice. Since my ship is my home and the vessel I use to transport planets, I don't use the technique very often." She then stepped back and took on a smug look. "I love to travel the old fashioned way anyway. Uses less energy."

"Oh, awesome! Thanks so much, Kana!" Gohan exclaimed, looking down at the USB stick at the same time, "Man! I can't wait to try this out!" He then blinked when his mind eventually picked up an important notice and looked across at the girl nervously. "B-But… I don't have anything to give you in return."

"Well..." Kana smiled across at the young man enthusiastically. "I am curious to learn about how your friends were able to track me down without use of a scouter." She glanced around at the Z-fighters watching them carefully and beamed back at the youngster. "You seem to be able to locate people by using only your minds. I wouldn't mind learning how this technique works."

Gohan grinned, "Oh, you mean ki reading?"

The alien nodded, "Yeah. I think that sounds like a fair trade."

Acknowledging this, the half-Saiyan then continued to speak, "Well... it's an ability that allows the user to sense the location of a person by searching for their life force or ki signature. Every single person's spiritual energy registers differently, so you're not just able to sense how strong they are, you can even identify who they are if you've already encountered them once. It's a really helpful technique to learn, especially when you can't see, smell or hear your opponent anywhere in the area." He then raised a finger and tapped it against his head. "We do this by focusing our minds and extending our senses out to feel the power levels inside of people; the same energy used to create blasts and stuff. The stronger and closer the person is, the more powerful the sensation. It's like looking for a particular colored light in a dark room. You just need to get a feel for their presence and hone in on it." A wide smile then formed on his face, "It's quite a simple technique to learn. All you have to do is focus."

When the demi-Saiyan finished explaining, he saw Kana's scouter pop up and blink a few times, as if processing his words. After a couple of seconds, she deactivated it and smiled, "Thanks so much, Gohan." She then looked around at the people around her, giving them one last glance before nodding. "Yep. I think I've got this ki reading down pat."

Krillin balked, "That fast?"

Grinning at her success, Kana then referred to Gohan and beamed at him for what would be her last time for a long while. "Well, it's been a blast. I'm really glad I was able to come here and fight with you guys."

The young Saiyan chuckled, "Stay out of trouble."

"I'll try," the girl replied, turning side on and giving the boy another look, "Stay on your toes. There are a lot of powerful monsters out there; aliens even worse than me... so I suggest you keep an extra eye out for them and keep training." Upon seeing the demi-Saiyan nod, her stare then became mischievous, "Don't slip up. And hey... if you ever feel like procreating sometime Gohan, give me a ring... or come by my ship and visit me whenever. You have my number." She then gave him a wink, which brought another deep shade of red to the boy's face and caused him to look away in embarrassment. When he looked back a couple seconds later, he was able to give her a smile to send the girl off, who saluted in response. "See you around."

Then, without another word, the girl levitated off the ground, tucked herself up, and wrapped her body up in her metallic pod. Upon which she then shot up into the sky, breaking the sound barrier on takeoff, and vanished into the clouds. The Z-fighters all watched her leave and when they sensed her presence return to her ship, everyone looked back down at each other, but mostly towards Gohan.

"Well... that was interesting," Trunks commented, finally recovering from the shock of everything that'd happened.

"Hmph. If you say so," Vegeta replied, uncrossing his arms and starting to walk away. "I've had enough of this circus performance for one day. I'm leaving." Without even so much as a careless wave, the still sore Saiyan Prince took flight and headed off for West City, leaving the others in his dust and his son staring after him.

Shrugging after seeing his dad leave on his own accord, the lavender haired boy sighed and grinned back at his companions. "Hopefully things won't be so hectic next time." He then saluted them and gave an especial wave to Gohan, who returned it in kind, "I'll see you guys later." He then took off after his father's shadow.

After seeing the two Saiyans leave, Krillin then grinned mischievously across at the spiky haired hybrid standing in the center and spoke, "Getting propositioned by an alien chick after beating the crap out of her. You dog!"

Stumbling at the comment, Gohan glared back at the man. "Oh, come on, Krillin! Knock it off!"

His exclamation drew a hearty laugh from the human Z-fighter and a roll of the eyes from Eighteen and Zangya.

Taking momentary notice of the latter of the two girls standing there and giving her a thoughtful look, the demi-Saiyan then suddenly took notice of a person jogging across the fields towards them. Squinting to see who it was, Gohan then blinked when he recognized it was Videl and a happy expression returned to his once embarrassed face. Not even bothering to power down, he quickly left the center of the former crater and immediately began jogging towards his friend, while at the same time waving back at his battle worn teammates.
"See yah guys. I've got errands to run."

Piccolo, Krillin, Zangya and Eighteen saw him off, three of them with their arms folded and looking passive as usual, whereas the shortest of them was smiling brightly.

Running across the open field, the boy skidded to a stop at the same time Videl did, leaving the two kids staring across at one another and beaming.

"Hey," the girl greeted.

"Hey," Gohan smirked back.

Not knowing what to say to each other at first, even though they were standing several miles away from the city and in the middle of a farmer's disused field, the youngsters continued looking at one another. It was then, after shaking out of their dazes, the two started to move a little, with the pig-tailed girl taking her time in analyzing Gohan's state.

Looking at his tattered clothes and heavily beaten appearance, Videl chuckled, "You look like hell."

The half-Saiyan chuckled, "I feel like it too. It's a set."

Looking up at his gravity defying blonde locks, the young martial artist reached up and ran her fingers through them. "Wow. I've never seen this look on you before. Is this that second transformation you were telling me about?"

"Yep. The one and only," Gohan said, feeling the girl flick the bang in front of his face. "Sorry if it's a little bit scary."

Videl shrugged, "It's not that scary. You seem pretty cool to me." Seeing the boy smile back at her, the young teen placed her hands on her hips and took him in completely. "Your opponent must have been pretty tough to push you this far. After your fights with Cell and Bojack, I didn't think there would be anyone else strong enough to make you work so hard." Still, she'd seen what that girl could do. It was nuts.

"It's a big universe out there," Gohan said, glancing up towards the sky for a bit and giving it a few seconds of consideration, "I wouldn't be surprised if there were any more people like her roaming the stars." When Videl also glanced upwards, the two faced each other again when the demi-Saiyan continued to speak. "After fighting Kana today, I know now that I have to train even harder if I want to continue to protect the earth. If there are any other aliens out there who are going to be coming here looking for a fight, then I have to be as ready as I can be to face them."

The raven haired girl nodded in understanding, "Yeah. I agree."

Sensing her shared enthusiasm as well as picking up something else lingering in her voice, Gohan then thought for a second before flashing her a grin, "Still interested in learning how to fight like me?" After she'd seen everything he could do, he wouldn't be at all put off if his friend was now feeling a little bit intimidated.

Instead of seeing Videl back off, the girl's expression brightened and she clenched her fists excitedly, "Hell yeah!"

Gohan chuckled, "Well then... how about coming to visit me this weekend and we can get you started?"
Eyes sparkling with joy, Videl grinned and nodded her head vigorously, "Yes! Thank you, Gohan-kun!"

After giving the girl a few moments to settle back down, the young demi-Saiyan looked across the way towards Satan City glimmering in the distance. Once he'd reestablished his bearings, he turned back to the girl and pointed over to the metropolis, "I've got a few things I need to do before heading home. Wanna join me?"

Videl nodded to him, "Sure." She then balked a little when the boy stepped towards her and wrapped his arms around her lithe form; an act which drew a slight blush to her cheeks. A second later, she then felt the ground leave their feet as the boy took off into the sky. At first gripping onto him fearfully, the girl then became more relaxed when she felt the demi-Saiyan had her and began marveling at the landscape as it passed her by. She then turned back to the hero of the day and fixed on his hair, "You going to stay like that, blondie?"

The half-Saiyan grinned, "Yeah. Since I'm already in this form I may as well practice getting more used to it." He figured he'd try for a couple weeks this time and break his record.

"Works for me." His response drew a grin from the girl. "I think you look good with blonde hair."

Laughing as they flew off, the pair was seen off by the still present Z-fighters in the field behind them. The sight of the two kids drawing a slight smile to Piccolo's face, the green-skinned man then focused his attention on Zangya, who was staring after the boy intently with a firm expression in play.

His own serious contours returning, the Namekian decided to step over to her and see what was troubling her.

Even though she did help them in their battle, the former guardian of earth was still suspicious of her and had made it to a point to shadow the Hera as much as possible.

"Why?" Zangya asked in a quiet voice, drawing curious glances from Krillin and Eighteen standing alongside her.

"Why what?" Piccolo asked, unflinching as ever.

"Why did he do all that?" the alien girl elaborated, narrowing her gaze when they saw the pair of kids disappear into the distance. "He spared me and that girl… even though he could have killed either of us without a second thought. Even though I was his enemy, someone who hurt his friends and the people he cares about… I just can't understand why he let a person like me live?" It was the very question that'd been stabbing at her since that fateful day back at the tournament on the island. "He killed Bojack… but why didn't he kill me?"

To that, the Namekian had an easy answer, "Because Gohan must have seen something inside of you that he thought was worth preserving." The warrior's words drew Zangya's gaze up to him, while he continued to stand there with a sagely look on his face. "He isn't a ruthless person by nature. The boy is kind and gentle, someone who cherishes life and the people around him above everything else. On the inside, he's not a coldhearted warrior like me, you, or Vegeta for that matter. If I was to summarize who Gohan really is… he's a merciful person, plain and simple."

When he sensed the look of surprise and inquisitiveness reflected on the woman's face, Piccolo continued to speak, only this time a smile appeared on his face. "It's the very same person that showed me what it meant to have a friend."

Krillin sprouted a grin, "Yeah… that sounds like our Gohan."
Zangya, eyes wavering when she heard the man finish, looked down at the ground thoughtfully for the next minute. In that time, as her mind processed what was spoken to her, she felt a great weight lift from her shoulders. Like a pair of shackles had just been removed, her body became even lighter and a warm feeling burned deep inside of her chest that sent a surge of life rushing through her.

At that moment, Zangya felt content, and looking up towards the city, a small smile appeared on her face.

"Thank you," she mouthed.

Hearing her say it despite her quietness, Krillin and Eighteen smiled. So did Piccolo. And with that, the four of them returned to staring over the horizon as a gentle breeze brushed over them.

For all they knew, a big change was coming for all of them, and they were all looking forward to seeing how it turned out.

OOO

(Meanwhile – Otherworld)

King Kai breathed a sigh of relief, "Well that was intense." Thank goodness it didn't drag on for too long. Thanks to Gohan, the earth was saved from yet another harrowing experience.

Smiling after watching the battle come to an end, Goku pulled his hand away from his teacher and watched as all the other fighters around them returned to their business. Even the West Kai left with a little more vigor than he had previously, allowing the master and student some time to themselves.

"I gotta say, your boy sure knows how to show a girl a good time," the blue-skinned man chuckled while sparing a glance at the Saiyan.

Goku snickered and placed his hands on his hips, "Gohan's growing up fast." Hell, it wouldn't be too long before the youngster was as tall as him one day.

Boy. That was a scary thought.

His mind then clicking back to the memories of the fight, the spiky haired hero grinned nervously and leaned over to whisper to his teacher, "Umm… King Kai, about Jupiter…"

OOO

(Meanwhile)

Once Kana had docked with her vessel still floating suspended above the planet, the girl wasted no time in closing up the hatch, having a nice, long hot shower, and returning to the cockpit to get underway. Discarding her ruined plug suit to the recycling, leaving her in only her underwear with a towel draped over her neck, the fiery haired girl strolled up to the cockpit and sat herself down in the smooth, plush seat of the pilot's throne. It was here the girl let out a sigh, rotated in her seat, and turned to look out the front window.

Seeing the earth hanging directly in front of her through the enormous visor of her vessel, the clouds drifting over the planet's oceans and continents in swirling sheets, the girl's gaze took on a look of forlorn while her finger tapped against her arm rest. Watching the planet rotate and listening to her ship's incredibly sophisticated helm and transparent control panels hum away, the girl then became aware of a familiar series of beeping noises. A second later, a blue hologram of a small, robotic figure appeared on the dashboard.

Hands behind his back, the armored hologram looked at the exhausted girl with noticeable concern. "Ma'am. Is there something wrong?"

"Hello, Bit," Kana greeted, expression remaining unchanged as she rocked back and forth in her seat. "No… nothing's wrong."

"I'm detecting some unusual breathing patterns in your body's respiratory system. Your brain is also giving off some very mild yet uneven electrical signals. Are you sure you're doing alright?"

"Yes. I'm fine. It's just…" the girl paused for a moment, a momentary look of sadness coming over her before she leaned back and rested her head on her hand. When she closed her eyes and opened them some moments later, you could see her irises shimmering. A sad sigh escaped her lips again, "I met someone really incredible today… a kindhearted young man and one hell of a fighter." Her expression then fell slightly, "I doubt I'll ever meet someone like him again."

"Ah yes. This Son Gohan from Mount Paozu," the A.I replied, at the same time pulling up a profile picture of the boy on the hologram projector and suspending it in front of Kana, who spent the next few seconds staring at it. "I watched the recordings of your battle with him from your suit. He was undoubtedly an impressive specimen."

Kana smiled, her expression taking on a faraway look as she gazed at the demi-Saiyan's face. "Yes. He really is." Staring at Gohan's picture for several moments, the girl then stretched her arms over her head and leaned back, kicking her feet up onto the control panel in front of her like it was a desk and resting back. "Anyway… my business here is concluded. Mark this planet as 'protected', eject the satellite from our link bay and prepare for warp jump." With her towel still flung over her neck, Kana then turned her attention to the visor in front of her and ran her finger through the air, pulling a couple of hologram nodes across and beginning to give commands to her vessel. "Set coordinates for Sector 15."

"Of course, ma'am," Bit replied, a series of beeps ringing out as the ship was prepped and readied for flight. As a low humming sound started to echo throughout the vessel's interior, the A.I then looked away from the ship's windscreen and fixated on the girl kicking back in her helm's seat once again. "Would you like to listen to some music on our way there?"

"Oh yeah. I almost forgot about that," Kana exclaimed, a wide grin forming on her face as she looked out the window of her vessel as it started to rotate away from the planet. Seeing the Capsule Corp. satellite drift away, the girl continued typing into the hologram panel next to her, "Did you manage to separate all of the information we were able to download into individual drives?"

"Yes. Of course. I categorized all of the data we were able to collect from Earth's satellite, killed the bugs and arranged them all in their order of significance," Bit replied, earning an understanding nod from the pilot.

"Excellent. So…" Kana beamed at her incredibly helpful A.I. "Whatcha got for me? I could use with some in-flight entertainment." For every planet she'd visited in her lifetime, she'd been able to collect an enormous amount of information on their cultures and history. While a lot of the facts regarding their history were mostly white noise and she panned over that stuff easily, it was the cultural stuff she was most interested in.

A lot of worlds she'd visited in the past had some very interesting tastes in cinema, which she… illegally downloaded.
Bit, appealing to his master's whims, bowed his head. "I think I've found something that may be to your liking." There was then a click, followed by two seconds of silence.

Then, before Kana knew it, her ears were filled with the chant of 'Ouga Chaka' as Blue Swede's Hooked on a Feeling started blaring out over the speakers inside the vessel. Gradually starting to bob her head to the beat, the fiery haired girl felt a grin spread across her lips as she laid further back in her seat, allowing it to go full incline while her ship lined up with the stars.

"Oh yeah. Now this is what I'm talkin' about," Kana remarked and closed her eyes, basking in the melody of earth's music, completely unaware of how old it was.

A hum and a bright orange glow from the ship later, and the oval shaped vessel fired its engines and rocketed off into the cosmos with a crack of light.

It was gone in the blink of an eye...

OOO

(Sometime Later)

Back in Mount Paozu, the sun was starting to set over the mountains. With the sky turning orange and the animals beginning to return to their homes to roost, Gohan could be seen dropping down from the sky to land in front of his home's entrance. Once on the ground, the boy stepped forward and opened the door, where he then made his way into the living room to see his mother sitting anxiously on the couch.

Chi-Chi looked up when she sensed her son's return and stood up to greet him in the typical manner, "Gohan! Where have you been? You've been gone for hours! I was so worri-GAH!" She jumped in shock when she saw the still Super Saiyan 2 form of her eldest boy step around the corner, his orange and blue gi in tatters and his form covered in all sorts of gunk. Hand gripping her chest, the mother quickly recomposed herself, "W-What in the world happened to you?"

He looked like someone had run over him with a lawnmower.

Despite his ascended Saiyan state, the boy still wore the characteristic Son grin and, walking further into the room, he revealed he was carrying his mother's order, all of which were covered in the dry cleaning bags. This was obviously to protect them from getting ruined on the flight home.

"Sorry, mum. I got a little bit… sidetracked." Was that the right word? Yeah. Sure it was.

Seeing the sheepish look appear on the Super Saiyan's face, Chi-Chi let out a sigh and marched up to tower over her spiky haired son. "You're your father's son alright; always getting into some sort of trouble. Geez." She shook her head. "What am I ever going to do with you?"

"Well, I know one thing..." Gohan replied, smile widening, "If I want to stop being dragged through mountainsides and fields by freakishly strong opponents, I've got a lot more training I have to do." Seeing his mother stare at him for a moment before giving him a small, loving smile, the boy then brightened up again and looked the woman square in the eyes. "Oh yeah, guess what. Videl's coming over this weekend."

Chi-Chi clapped her hands together, "That's wonderful, Gohan. I'll be sure to make something special for when she comes by. We'll make her feel right at home." She then clenched her fists and looked up towards the ceiling victoriously. "Oh, I can see it right now. Grandchildren galore..."

Blushing and laughing nervously at the woman's sparkling eyes, the young demi-Saiyan then remembered why he'd been sent out in the first place and pulled Chi-Chi's new clothes around to dangle in front of him. "By the way mum, why'd you send me to pick these up for you?" He could've sworn his mother already had a couple new sets of clothing, only these ones were a little bit bigger.

Gazing back down at the boy in surprise, Chi-Chi's expression then softened as she walked forward and placed a hand on her son's shoulder. When she did, she looked him right in the eyes and said something to him that would mark the first step to what would be the biggest change in their lives. "Because… in just a few months, the two of us are going to become a family of three, Gohan." Seeing the Super Saiyan 2 give a few confused blinks, his mother's smile widened and she laid a hand across her belly, which she then rubbed tenderly. "You're going to be a big brother."

At that exact moment, once the realization of his mother's words passed through his head, Gohan's face lit up with a thousand kilowatt smile.

TO BE CONTINUED

---

Author's Note: Hope you all enjoyed this chapter. I wish they did something like this in the original series. Making Goku the hero again was the silliest decision ever.

Next up, the seven year gap will happen. This will play out in a montage, so you'll be able to see what Gohan does over the seven years in flashes, which I would think would be really effective in the anime series with the right music (note: you're going to have to imagine the music).

While we're on that note, Kana listening to music was inspired off of Guardians of the Galaxy. That music totally fits!

Well, see yah next chapter.

P.S: To everyone posting me power level suggestions… please stop.
The night before Mirai Trunks left for the future saw one of the biggest parties the Z-fighters had ever thrown for one of their own. Everyone had been invited to the evening’s festivities; Tien, Chiaotzu, Yamcha, Turtle, Yajirobe, shoot even Android 18#, Videl, Hercule and Zangya. All the members of the Z-gang turned up to the get-together with their friends and families, which saw every single one of them mingling throughout the entire event, particularly with Mirai whom everyone had a chance to spend some time with and give him all their best.

The very next day, once everyone had recovered from their respective hangovers, dressed in their best, the groups gathered together for one last photo. The lavender haired Saiyan made sure to share a final round of handshakes and ‘goodbyes’ with all the Z-fighters he’d come to know in his stay in the past, and even managed to share a respectful nod with his father. After all was said and done, the demi-Saiyan hopped into his signature yellow craft and took off into the future.

It was a sad time for all of them. Having just recently said goodbye to a loved one almost immediately following the events of the Cell Games, the group also had to say goodbye to another member of their gang who, in a span of only a couple of months, had become just as much a part of their family as Goku before him. However, knowing with certainty and pride that the lavender haired warrior was going to be alright, everyone slowly bucked it up, pulled themselves together, and returned to their lives with just as much hope and confidence for the future as before.

Master Roshi, Turtle, Oolong and Krillin went back to their island to resume their everyday routines, with Android 18# following not too far behind, and Tien and Chiaotzu flew back to the northern mountains to continue their training. The Briefs got all of their personal affairs in order; Bulma juggling her time between looking after her infant son and taking care of work at the company, and Vegeta hitting his training regime even harder than ever (if that was even possible).

From Yamcha to Dende, Everyone had places to go and things to do, and this went especially double for Gohan and his family up in Mount Paizo.

On top of his ongoing lessons with Videl, who'd managed to negotiate with her father to stay at his home for another few months, the young Saiyan also balanced time between his own training and career work. And this wasn't just limited to his studies either.

Just as he promised his mother, Gohan went out and got work at a construction company. Much like his father and Krillin in their childhood years under Master Roshi's tutelage, the young warrior was able to use his enormous strength and technical brilliance to acquire a fantastic position at the BuildingH Corp. in Satan City; one of the largest and most well-known conglomerates in the world. Taking full advantage of his efficacy and his ability to deliver outstanding results, the demi-Saiyan was able to convince the organization to pay him five to ten times the amount that regular workers would normally receive from their hours. It was the least they could do anyway, because not only could Gohan effortlessly function as a full shift of crew members all by his lonesome, he could also micromanage and organize all of the technical knowhow involved with the jobs with both hands tied behind his back.

To put it into perspective, the young Saiyan quickly became the most valuable commodity the company could have ever hoped to enlist into their ranks. Not only was Gohan the best crew member to have on their larger than life projects, including skyscraper and office building constructions, but he was also able to take care of their smaller projects, with this mostly involving the construction of small houses, roads and community centers.

With only a handful of assignments, the young Saiyan was able to make enough money for his entire family to live on comfortably, as well as save up plenty for whatever rainy days they were likely to come across.

Able to organize his shifts that required him to work only a few times a week due to his speed and efficiency, Gohan had plenty of free time left in his schedule to hang out at home with his family, spend time with Videl and his friends, and train his ass off in his rest periods.

As far as he was concerned, peacetime was working extremely well for him.

Over the next several months the schedule in his life rarely changed. Every morning he would get up super early for some hard training and rigorous sparring, either with Piccolo or a clone of his own creation, before then settling down for some breakfast. Heck, he even managed to convince Zangya to partake in some of his sessions, much to the woman's exhaustion. But when the Hera realized exactly how far the young Saiyan was planning to push himself, not wanting to be outdone, she too soon felt the need to exercise her strengths.

The woman reasoned that if she worked hard enough, perhaps she would be able to learn a few things more about the kid she was hanging out with.

In the days Videl spent over at his place, Gohan would oversee her training in the early morning hours after his exercises and up the stakes of every lesson for her, keeping her moving and keeping her sweating. Along with the customary lunch, study and relaxation breaks, he would then continue training with her until the end of their shift, in which he would proceed with his own personal regimen.

So far he was coming along splendidly. The balance of work, play and rest in his life allowed him to build up his strength and refine his skills as a fighter much faster than through continuous, backbreaking drills from dusk till dawn. Though he did often take advantage of his Saiyan genetics to boost up his power after every recovery, he learned through his father and his own experiences that doing it too often would be more detrimental to his development and growth in the long run than beneficial. Vegeta continued working his butt into the ground day in and day out, but because of Gohan's more polished routine he was able to stay ahead of the prince easily, while at the same time not put his body under too much unwanted stress.

You shouldn't ignore the fundamentals. His father reminded him of that more than once during their time training together.

On another note, aside from now being able to completely control his Super Saiyan 2 form to the point he could actually hold a glass cup without shattering it, Videl's training was coming along marvelously as well.

In the time she'd stayed over at his place, the girl had made some wicked progress. Just like how Gohan had been able to get strong under Piccolo's watch, under his guidance the teen martial artist was growing stronger almost as fast as he had. Continuously increasing her weighted clothing, changing up her routine and sparring with her repetitively has really increased her strength and fighting skills. Furthermore, not only has her ability to form ki blasts improved immensely that she could now use higher tonnage attacks in succession and allow her to learn more powerful moves, she'd also learned how to fly and sense energy.

After only eight full months of work, Videl was now as strong as Krillin was when Nappa and Vegeta first arrived on earth.

He was pleased with his friend's development. If only he could say the same thing about his Instantaneous Movement training. Despite being able to use it without crashing into mountains anymore (a majority of the time), he always ended up missing his mark on every pass. That just showed he still needed a whole lot more work with it.

No wonder it took his father a year to master this technique. It was hard.

Of course, not being one to give up without a fight, the young Super Saiyan kept at it every day, setting himself a new challenge every session. He needed to get the thing right some time and, damn it, he was going to get this bloody thing down even if it was the last thing he did!

On this particular day, Gohan had taken to a different kind of training exercise that pushed his endurance and adaptability to a whole other level. Finding himself floating in the cold vacuum of space with the planet earth floating like a massive blue and white globe far behind him, the hybrid warrior had his eyes tightly shut and his fists firmly clenched. Sweat floating off of him as his body endured the harshest environment imaginable, second only to the surface of the sun itself, the boy was not only holding a perfect orbital position, he was also assumed in his Super Saiyan state and what appeared to be a facade of complete and utter concentration.

If he hadn't already been up there for a couple hours already you would think he'd just started this odd routine. But since his mum had recently been admitted to the hospital and the nurses had kicked him out for causing such a ruckus in the corridors, it was expected that the boy would go out to find something else to work off the stress. Right now he was aiming to set a new record for how long he could actually stay up here without passing out and would continue to do so until he'd fully adapted to his new surroundings.

After several minutes of floating there in meditation, the blonde's eyes suddenly flew open and he threw both his hands forward. His golden aura exploding around him as he jumped straight to Super Saiyan 2, the boy let out a yell of effort and unleashed a blast that shot from his hands and rocketed towards the blanket of stars on the horizon. His attack possessed enormous speed, spread and force, easily flying beyond the Solar System and into the expanse of nothingness before him.

When he eventually hit his target, a rogue, moon-sized asteroid floating millions of kilometers out of sight, the head of his attack struck it, disintegrated it, and detonated with the force of sixty suns going off at once. The explosion took the form of a blinding flash of golden light, which filled the horizon and dwarfed the Solar System, and eventually settled moments later.

Blue electricity shooting off of his ethereal glow, Gohan focused his gaze on another target to his three-o-clock. Upon which he cranked his right hand back and chucked it forward. "FLASH MADAN!"

Unleashing his new move, a powerful blast of blue energy surrounded by golden sparks of electricity erupted from his palm like a jet and shot across the skies in the form of a massive comet. Effortlessly leaving the Solar System, the streak of energy soon reached a cluster of asteroids hanging far out of sight. The attack engulfed them, turning them into space dust and carried on, before exploding safely away from any nearby planets in a flash of brilliant light.
Lowering his hand, the Super Saiyan 2 frowned and fell out of his second level state, reverting to his first form and allowing his thoughts to carry on.

"This is almost like training in the Hyperbolic Time Chamber," Gohan thought with a small smile on his face.

Almost.

At least out here he didn't have to worry about hurting anybody and could just fire random blasts into the emptiness of space.

His aura dying off but still assumed in his transformed state, the youngster then glanced over his shoulder when he sensed a familiar presence appear behind him. He'd been so caught up in his own little world of meditation and thought that he didn't even notice he had company.

"Glad to see you're taking your training seriously, brat. I'm impressed," the rough, gravelly voice of Vegeta spoke as he floated a few yards behind the boy. Adorned in a black vest, grey sports pants and training shoes, the last, full-blooded Saiyan left alive stared his fellow compatriot down with an air of confidence and satisfaction. "That's good. A true Saiyan warrior should take every opportunity they have to improve their skills, no matter how small or grueling the task may be."

Gohan smiled back at his father's number one rival, "Heh. Thanks, Vegeta. That means a lot coming from you."

The man grunted, "Consider it a 'best wishes' gift in honor of the occasion. I suggest you savor this moment, runt, since I'm not very charitable when it comes to complimenting people who are beneath me in stature."

This had the youngster chuckle, "I'll be sure to remember that."

As he drifted over to float alongside the kid, Vegeta allowed a sense of amusement to tug across his lips, "So you decided to come up here and shoot a few rocks out of the sky to work off some stress?"

"That and more. I'm... actually learning how to fight in this kind of field; a place without gravity or air," the demi-Saiyan replied while looking ahead of him again. "You know... there have been many times in the past I've wondered how far we could actually push our bodies, not just against really strong opponents, but in places we wouldn't normally end up fighting. When Piccolo, Krillin and I fought Dr. Wheelo in the planet's thermosphere many years ago, I came up with this theory that people with strong, durable bodies and effective control over their ki could actually fight in an environment that would otherwise be impossible for ordinary people to breathe in. It was only after my fight with Kana that my suspicions were confirmed."

Vegeta nodded, knowing exactly where Gohan was going with this, "Saiyans have naturally adaptable bodies and can survive in even the harshest of conditions; this includes the vacuum of space. While there are some who can only travel about as far as the stratosphere of a planet, there are others like you and me that can push that boundary. As long as we're shrouded by our energy, we can travel through a vacuum for as long as is needed. Your father and the others have just been grounded on this planet for so long that they've never taken the time to get used to this kind of setting."

Like his father. Years ago, had he not been able to find a ship off of Namek, prolonged exposure to the vacuum of space on top of the planet's explosion would've surely killed him.
However, through training and heavy doses of entry to this sort of setting had allowed them to circumvent the need for breathable air and an atmosphere, and build up resilience to the stifling void of the cosmos. The natural bio-field that shrouded their bodies allowed them to create their own personal form of circular breathing, in which their ki replenished and continuously enriched the oxygen necessary for them to survive.

"Exactly," Gohan said with a determined smile and a clenched fist. "When I took on Kana in the thermosphere and came back down to earth, I felt really lightheaded and dizzy… a drawback from fighting at such a distance from the earth's atmosphere. That means I need to continue practicing in places like this till I can fight in them without needing to concentrate." He then allowed his Super Saiyan form to fade and turned to face the Saiyan prince, man to man.

Getting a good look at the kid in the zero-gravity milieu, Vegeta could see just how much he was growing and feel how strong he was becoming. Giving a frustrated click of the tongue, the prince could still pick up the noticeable gap between him and the youngster's power. Despite having pushed himself to the brink of snapping in two in Capsule Corp's gravity room, this kid was still miles ahead of him and the fact that he was progressing as equally fast as he was ticked him off to an insane degree.

However, despite his own inner turmoil, Vegeta also felt a sign of pride, knowing that a person with Saiyan lineage had been able to become so strong. Of course, it still annoyed the full-blooded hothead to no end that it'd been someone else, a half-breed no less, and not him.

The influx of feelings were complicated, but at the same time perfectly within reason.

"You have the eyes of a dead fish," Vegeta remarked, pointing out the bags under Gohan's eyes.

Taking notice of his appearance too, since he could practically feel the fatigue, the demi-Saiyan chuckled and shrugged, "Oh? Do I look that rich in omega-3s?"

"I'm being serious, runt," the prince replied, at the same time frowning at the adolescent fighter. "You haven't been sleeping well, have you?"

"Mm. I guess. But only for the past several days," Gohan replied, breathing out a heavy sigh and placing his hands on his hips. "Mum hasn't been able to move around a lot and has been asking me to do some extra stuff for her around the house. I guess… having a little passenger on board has really taken it out of her."

It had been a really trying and turbulent period for Chi-Chi. The Son mother had placed a lot of the responsibilities she normally would have done herself on her son, and on top of his work and training, that was just mentally exhausting for him.

Going out, training, or just meditating in general has really helped the demi-Saiyan in keeping it all together. It was what he'd been doing moments before deciding to have some target practice with some rocks drifting through the void.

Speaking of which.

"Hey. Wanna see who can shoot down the most asteroids? First one to reach thirty wins?" Gohan asked, grinning across at the prince in a way that would be impossible for the man to resist the challenge.

Considering the boy's teasing smile and suggestion for competition, Vegeta then, with great hesitation, shook his head and looked back at him seriously, "Maybe next time, kid. Right now, the blue haired woman has sent me up here to fetch you for something that's supposedly more important than that."

At first appearing confused, a light then returned to the demi-Saiyan's eyes that reflected a patent sense of surprise, "Y-You mean?"

Vegeta nodded and turned side on, gesturing him towards the planet.

Without needing to be told twice, the young Super Saiyan powered up and shot towards the globe suspended in the distance, his form disappearing in a streak of golden light. The prince lingered back for several minutes longer, watching the boy vanish before slowly deciding to follow after him at his own pace.

Descending through the atmosphere and easily cooling off upon reentry, Gohan set a course straight for Satan City hospital. In a matter of moments he was on the institute's roof, powered down, and sprinting through the corridors, ducking and dodging patients and nurses along the way. Honing in on his mother's ki signature, he soon found himself outside her room with Bulma waiting expectantly for him at the entrance.

Gohan gulped when he saw the blue haired scientist beaming at him, "I-Is she…?"

The woman nodded affirmatively, "She's okay, Gohan. Just tired. The doctor said you can go in and see her now if you like." She was lucky she made room for the boy when she did because the second she stepped aside, the demi-Saiyan barreled right past her.

Arriving at his mother's bed, Gohan stood by the railings looking across at the exhausted, raven haired woman lying underneath the sheet. Not only taking note of the tired rings under her eyes and her drained expression, the boy also noticed the bundle she was now cradling in her arms. Biting his teeth together nervously, the young Saiyan perked up when he saw her quietly glance his way.

"Mum?"

Chi-Chi, giving her boy a warm smile, moved over slightly and adjusted her position on the bed. When Gohan finally got a good look at the towel she was cradling, he saw that she was holding a newborn baby, a sight that had his eyes widen in amazement.

"Say hello to your little brother," the mother said weakly.

Awed at the sight of the infant in her arms, Gohan leaned over to have a better look. When he reached out to brush some of the material out of the way, he suddenly felt his finger grabbed by a tiny hand and saw the newborn child beaming brightly at him. The sight of her surprised older son had Chi-Chi shake with pained giggles.

"I think someone else wants to say hello too."

Seeing the baby coo and wiggle about in the bundle in his mother's arms, the half-Saiyan smiled and waved at him. "H-Hey there." Hearing the baby giggle at his greeting, the half-Saiyan then reached over and moved some of the towel out of the way, where he then saw the irrefutable proof of the boy's Saiyan lineage curled up beside him. Paying the furry tail little mind, the eldest son smiled even wider. "I'm Gohan, your big brother." He then looked over at his mother, whom he could see was still looked absolutely drained. "Have you thought of a name for him?"

Chi-Chi shook her head, "No… not yet. I was hoping maybe … you would have an idea."

Pondering on it for several moments, the spiky haired Saiyan gave his baby brother a considerate look and tugged at the bundle of cloth, earning another playful laugh from him, "I was thinking maybe... Goten."

"Goten?"

"Yeah, since it's just like my name and dad's name," Gohan continued, chuckling when he saw the youngster squirm about once again. "Heh... and I think it suits him too. With those eyes and that nose, he looks so much like him." He then nervously glanced up at his mother once more. "W-What do you think?"

Chi-Chi, taking her eldest son's words into consideration, gave him an approving stare and nodded, before then holding her baby son closer to her. "It's a lovely name. Goten..." A happy gleam appeared across her face as she gently cuddled her newborn, "My little Goten."

Looking between his mother and baby brother, and seeing the latter yawn as he prepared to drift off into sleep, Gohan's eyes started to shimmer as he regarded the newest member of the family for the longest time. Then, while watching his mother tenderly caress her new son, and feeling the eyes of the medical staff, Bulma, and a newly arrived Vegeta resting on him, the Saiyan's mind began to form words he knew he had every intention of living up to.

"I'll look after you, Goten. I promise."

Somewhere up above them, a certain spiky haired father could be seen lying flat out on the grass of the Grand Kai's planet, resting from a long day of rigorous training, and smiling down at his family.

XXX

(A Week Later)

For the first time in eleven years, the Son household has been blessed with the presence of new life. Lying in a bamboo cradle in the middle of the living room, a tiny blanket covering him and his head resting on a pillow, the newest member of the family, Goten, could be seen sleeping peacefully under the watchful gazes of his guardians.

Crowding the cradle on all sides, Gohan, Chi-Chi, the Ox King and Videl were looking down at the little tyke quietly breathing away with smiles of adulation and affection.

Obviously there visiting the Son family again, the raven haired girl from Satan City gave a quiet exclamation of delight and tilted her head at the infant, "He's so cute."

The Ox King chuckled, "Yeah. He looks just about as small as Gohan was when he was born... and just as healthy."

Videl nodded her head in agreement, "That's good. It means he's going to grow up to be as big and strong as his older brother."

"I hope so," Gohan chirped, sitting at the end of the cradle alongside his friend, who was also kneeling beside him. "He's half Saiyan as well, just like me." Looking the quietly sleeping youngster over, the boy in the long-sleeved, oriental white top grinned and looked over at his grandfather. "Hey. His hair looks just like dads."

The towering man blinked as he fixed his attention on the baby's head and, after adjusting his glasses, gave a boisterous laugh. "Well now, isn't that something."
"He's the spitting image of Goku when he was young," Chi-Chi murmured, a loving smile forming on her face at the same time. A sigh escaping her lips, the woman reached down and gently ran her fingers over the boy's head. "I only wish his father could be here to see him. I'm sure he would be happy to meet the newest addition to our family."

"Yeah," Gohan murmured.

After a moment of gazing at her newborn, the recently acquitted patient from the hospital glanced across at her son and his student. Heart churning at the sight of the pair of teens and seeing how well they fitted together, Chi-Chi allowed a warm smile to form as she fixed her gaze onto their home's guest. "By the way Videl, thank you so much for all the presents you and your father bought for us. I'm sure that Goten will love them."

The raven haired girl grinned bashfully and rubbed her head in response, "That's alright, Chi-Chi. It's the least we could do." She then absently noted the massive stack of wrapped up boxes sitting against the wall of the lounge, all of which were topped with flowers and a basket of fruit. They certainly seemed like the typical gifts one would buy for a friend or family member who was having a child, and there were a lot of them too. "My dad went all out buying all of those toys, food and clothing for you guys. Perhaps it's his way of apologizing for all of the trouble he's caused your family over the year."

"Trouble? What trouble?" Chi-Chi asked the girl in surprise.

"You know… stealing Gohan's thunder from the Cell and Bojack incidents and everything," Videl explained, earning a chuckle from the Ox King and a grin from the demi-Saiyan as well. "Does he still think we're angry about that?" the young Z-fighter asked in amusement.

"We already told him he didn't have to worry about taking the credit," Chi-Chi replied, also staring across at the girl in an amused yet friendly manner. "Honestly. If that man keeps stressing about every little thing in life, he's going to give himself a really bad aneurism one of these days." Her expression brightened as she passed on to the anxious looking Videl her honest response. "We're very grateful for the presents your father sent us, but you can tell him to take it easy from now on. We don't plan on threatening him or anything of the sort. Our family is not like that."

Videl nodded in understanding, "I'll be sure to remind him. Thanks, Chi-Chi."

While the group continued to fawn over the baby sleeping in the crib, there was one amongst their troop that had decided to keep her distance and give the newborn a wide berth. Throughout the entire procession, Zangya had taken to standing over by the wall with her arms folded and a firm look set upon the entourage.

Having been invited into the home earlier that day when Videl arrived to see the newest member of the family, the blue-skinned warrior had had plenty of time to herself to observe the habits of the group as well as take in all of the things being shared between them.

"Another one, huh? That's nice."

Needless to say, she didn't really want to approach not knowing whether she would be welcomed or not. For the sake of the child and the family's wellbeing, Zangya wisely decided to stay where she was until she felt the need to be excused from the room.

The commotion in the home eventually roused little Goten from his sleep and when his eyes fluttered open, he found himself staring up at four people beaming down at him. After looking around at the cheerful strangers in what was easily recognized as an adorable expression of surprise, the mother of the curious child then giggled, reached down and picked him up.

"I'm sorry, Goten, sweetie. Did we wake you?" Chi-Chi asked, standing up with her son in her arms. When everyone rose up as well, she began rocking the child back and forth, "Don't worry. Mummy's got you."

Smiling and giggling at the woman holding him, the boy then looked around at the other strangers surrounding him. It was only when his eyes fell upon Gohan that the youngster stopped and stared, an action that had the elder demi-Saiyan balk. Upon which the older brother beamed and waved back at his infant sibling.

Staring at the teen with the spiky black hair, Goten then suddenly squirmed in his mother's arms and started reach out towards the boy. Making incomprehensible noises but obviously directing his efforts and flailing towards Gohan, a surprised Chi-Chi silently obliged with her newborn son's needs and walked over to the man of the house.

"I think he wants you to hold him, Gohan." The mother willingly held the baby out and ceremoniously dipped him into the older hybrid's arms. It was an offering the demi warrior couldn't possibly refuse, and did so while stammering nervously. "Careful. Mind his head."

Just as his parent asked, Gohan was careful in holding the infant. Looking down at him, he saw the child gaze up at him admiringly, a smile on his face and eyes shimmering with joy. Staring back at him, a cheerful look then came upon Gohan's own visage and he began to cradle the child tenderly. "Hey, little guy. It's your big brother; the strongest kid in the universe. Pretty cool, huh?" Hearing Goten giggle drew a laugh from the demi-Saiyan as well, while all the others around the pair watched on with pride and joy.

However, as the family observed Gohan shower affection over his baby brother, a thought soon came to the demi-Saiyan's head that had him pause for a brief moment. His smile faltering slightly, the boy then looked around his living room and at all his family members, before then fixing his gaze upon the fireplace. There, on the shelf above, he saw the photo containing the picture of his father holding him when he was a child alongside his mother.

Contemplating the frame and image for a few moments in silence, the boy then smiled and nodded affirmatively, before glancing back down at his brother.

XXX

(A Few Days Later)

Standing on the balcony of what was known by all the Z-fighters as Kami's Lookout, Gohan put on a wide smile of amusement as he watched Videl touch down on the tiled surface in front of him and keel over in shock. Panting heavily with sweat dripping down her face, the girl in the orange and blue gi looked up at the youngster to see him beaming down at her, which quickly prompted her to straighten up to save face before her trainer.

"Good job, Videl. You've become a much faster flyer over the last couple of weeks," the demi-Saiyan chirped.

Swallowing heavily, the girl grinned and brushed her damp locks out of her face, "Well… I have been practicing a lot lately. You should know, since you've been the one overseeing my training the entire month."
The young man chuckled, "Yeah. I guess I have. But hey, there's always a little room to be surprised." He then looked her over and turned to the side. "At the rate you're going, in about another year's time… I bet you'll become just as strong as any one of the members of the Ginyu Force… maybe even more."

"Really?" Videl asked in delight. She'd heard about those guys through Gohan's stories about Namek. From what she'd managed to gauge, those guys had been seriously tough back in the day; enough to be called Frieza's elite.

"Uh-huh. If we stay on top of it and keep doing what we've been doing, I'm sure you'll be able to get to that level in no time," Gohan reaffirmed, putting his full and utmost confidence in the girl's abilities. It was a compliment that drew a smile from her lips and red from her cheeks.

It'd been close to a year now and in that time Gohan had been able to transform his best friend from a determined martial artist of King Chappa's level to a world class fighter comparable to that of the Z-Fighters around the Saiyan invasion period. If Gohan was able to train her to become this strong in the same amount of time it took Krillin, with her talent and determination, he was confident he would be able to transform her into something amazing.

Who knows? In just a few more years, she could become as strong as Tien, Yamcha and Krillin were around the time the Androids showed up.

However, in order to do that, she needed an edge and Gohan knew exactly where to find one.

"So. Why'd you get me to fly all the way up here?" Videl asked, looking around the large, floating platform she suddenly found herself standing on. "What is this place anyway?" Blinking a few times, she then looked back at the young Saiyan in surprise. "Wait… hang on a second… is this…?"

"Yep. Kami's Lookout," Gohan chirped, at the same time beginning to lead her down the causeway towards the palace on the other end of the artificial island. "This is the same place Krillin and the others trained when the Saiyans were coming… and it's the same place me and my dad trained before the Cell Games."

"W-Whoa," the girl exclaimed, falling in step with her friend while surveying the very spot most of the people on the planet far below believed to be nothing more than myth and legend. But now, after hearing all of the tales Gohan had told her about his epic adventures over the years, she was finally starting to see that all those myths and legends were actually true. "This is amazing." She then looked over at the boy. "B-But why did you bring me here now? Is this another part of my training?"

"Yep. I was thinking that for the next couple of months, whenever you're visiting or staying over at my place, we can come up here and have a few sessions together. The change of atmosphere and setting should be really good for your development as a hardnosed fighter," the demi-Saiyan informed with a smile, glancing across at her at the same time. "I… also had something else in mind."

"Oh? What kind of thing?"

"You see, during our adventures on Namek, Krillin and I met the leader of the Namekian people and the creator of their planet's dragon balls, Guru. He was an incredibly wise ruler and very strong in his race's techniques. When we visited him, he gave me and Krillin a gift by unlocking the hidden potential inside of both of us. This gave us enough strength to fight toe to toe with the Ginyu Force," Gohan informed, stopping them between the rows of palms so as to focus fully on his companion. "While we weren't strong enough to beat them, by unhinging our fighting potential he was able to give us a massive edge in our final battles and allowed us to grow stronger at a faster rate."

The damages they'd received and recovered from their fights with both the Ginyu Force and Frieza later onwards had allowed Gohan and Krillin significant boosts in strength and skill. While this was most certainly the case for Gohan due to his Saiyan genetics, the boy had noticed that his teammate had also gotten a lot stronger between the battles as well. This showed the capabilities unlocking ones potential had in the long term, which was what gave Gohan this idea to do the same for Videl.

The girl's eyes shone with anticipation at what the half-Saiyan was suggesting, "So you brought me up here to see if you can unlock my potential as well?"

"That's right. I can sense how strong you're becoming and how quickly you're progressing in your training. I can also sense you've got a lot of bottled up energy inside of you," Gohan replied, before then directing her attention towards the palace. "At your absolute maximum, you're almost about as strong as Krillin and I were when we were traveling to Namek. I think it's only fitting that we gave you the same edge I got back then."

It was then the pair approached three familiar figures waiting for them up ahead. Videl recognized one of them immediately and smiled at his presence.

"Good morning, Piccolo."

The Namekian warrior smiled back, "Hey, runt."

Grinning, the raven haired girl then turned her attention to the other two people standing beside the caped fighter. One of them was a black skinned man in a vest, turban, baggy pants and pointy shoes, while the other was another, much younger Namekian, about the same age as her, adorned in white robes, a blue scarf, and carrying a wooden staff.

Noticing her looking at the new pair, Gohan gestured towards them, "Videl, this is Dende; the friend I told you about from Namek, the new guardian of earth and the inheritor of our planet's dragon balls."

Jerking upright at realizing exactly who she was addressing, the girl then bowed respectfully to the two people in front of her, "H-Hello. It's a pleasure to finally meet you."

"And hello to you too," Dende exclaimed with a friendly smile. "Gohan has told me a lot about you, Videl."

"And he's told me about you as well," the raven haired martial artist replied, grinning across at the young overseer of the planet. "Is it true that he saved you from Frieza and his men back on your home planet?"

"Yes. It's true," the boy replied with a slight laugh, "He and his friends were really brave, and they fought so hard too. Even though that monster got me in the end, we were all able to turn it around and get him back for everything he did to us."

"So I heard," Videl giggled, before then turning to Mr. Popo to see him smiling at her as well. His appearance earned a bow from the child as well, "Good day, sir."

The guardian's advisor nodded in return. "Good day."
Gulping, the girl glanced back at her trainer. "So Gohan… what happens now? Am I going to have to go through some sort of trial or… exam or something?"

Smiling brightly, the demi-Saiyan then turned to his alien friend. "You heard what we were talking about before, right?"

Dende immediately nodded at his question, "Yes, I did. You wish to try and unlock your friend's potential in the same way that Guru was able to unlock yours?"

"Yeah. That's kind of what this whole trip is about," Gohan replied nervously and with a hopeful look in his eyes. "Do you… think you'll be able to do it? I know it's asking a lot from you and everything, but…"

The young Namek nodded his head confidently, "Lord Guru passed onto me the ability to heal as well as a few of our other race's techniques. Though I'm not as proficient at them as he was, I'm certain I'll be able to bring something to the table. Mr. Popo has been getting me to work really hard and I've had plenty of time to practice my skills as the new guardian of earth."

Gohan's face lit up at the news, "That's great. Awesome." He then turned his attention to Videl and nodded her towards his friend. "He says he'll give it his best shot."

"O-Okay," the girl gulped, stepping forward and watching Dende move forward as well. Appearing anxious, Videl knelt down in front of the Namekian boy and closed her eyes, allowing the watcher of earth to lift his hands up and hold them above her head. Her position allowed the young guardian to feel out her ki a lot easier than from his previous position and, in a matter of moments, he started to work his magic.

Moving to stand beside Piccolo, Gohan and the others watched on as Dende tightened his face in concentration, at the same time Videl firmly held her position. With a few words of encouragement, the gutsy fighter relaxed, making the worker's job that much easier.

For the next few minutes everyone remained as they were and silence prevailed over the area. The butterflies danced over the flowers and the wind blew over them like a veil. It was only after a certain amount of time had passed that Dende finally found what he was looking for and, opening his eyes in surprise, a smile quickly pulled across his face. He then looked down upon the girl kneeling in front of him.

"Wow. You have a lot of power sleeping inside of you. It's incredible." He saw Videl peek up at him with one eye. "You must have been training really hard to have this much potential energy stored up."

"A-Are you sure?" the girl asked, not really knowing what to make of this information. "I've already pushed myself to my absolute limits. I'm actually amazed I was able to make it this far."

"And you can push yourself even further still," Dende said softly, beaming at the girl in a comforting manner. "With this much potential energy, you have the ability to go as far as any one of the Z-fighters." His expression then became serious and, once again, he began to focus. "Now… hold still for a moment."

At first batting her eyes in confusion, Videl and everyone else then became aware of a strange humming sound filling the air. Accompanying it, the girl saw the Namekian's hands begin to pulse with a bright, yellow light, moments before the glow vanished back into his palms. Then, without warning, the girl suddenly felt a surge of energy swell up inside of her and explode from her body in a flash of light, engulfing her in a burning white aura. The energy blazed around her like a flame and, as if feeling a massive weight lift clear from her shoulders, she felt her body lighten and her power soar.

Piccolo, Gohan and Mr. Popo actually blinked in surprise at the amount of energy they suddenly felt appear from the girl. The sight of her now radiant form brought an eager smile to the demi-Saiyan's face and a nod seconds later. Then, upon seeing Dende step away, they watched the young martial artist rise to her feet and look down at her glowing hands in astonishment.

"Whoa," Videl gasped, clenching and unclenching her fingers. "I-Is this my power?"

"Yes," Dende replied with an affirmative gesture, "The power that's been lying dormant inside of you. How do you feel?"

"I… I feel…" Stammering at first, the pigtailed fighter then grinned joyously and threw her hands into the air in triumph, "I feel fantastic! WOW!" Laughing happily, Videl bounced on her toes and sprang into the air, allowing her aura to blast around her freely while performing an aerial flip. Coming back down to ground level after her expression of delight, she landed with a light tap and threw a series of swift punches, all of which she unleashed at blurring speeds. "Oh man! This is great! Thank you so much!" Powering down, Videl quickly rushed up to Dende and took his hands in hers, shaking them gratefully. "H-How can I repay you for this?"

The young Namekian blushed under the girl’s brilliant smile and shook his head. "It's alright. Just keep working hard like you were before and don't stop training…” He then glanced across at Gohan, who too was smiling. "Am I right?"

"Yeah. She wants to become as strong as all of us one day. I'm sure that after this, she's one step closer to achieving that goal," the youngster replied, strolling forward and moving up to his two friends, both of whom turned to face him. Thanking Dende just as Videl had, the demi-Saiyan then focused his attention on his student. "Well… what do you think?"

A giggle soon followed as Videl raised a determined fist, "This is better than I ever imagined. Thank you, Gohan." She then stepped up to him and gave him a hug, one that the boy accepted gladly before seeing her spring off of him and turn away with a blush. "I… I mean… I really appreciate it."

"I'm glad to hear that," the boy chuckled, looking her over once more before then giving her an expression of intent. "Because I think it's time I gave you your first real test to see how far you've come." When he saw her look at him in surprise, Gohan then nodded towards her and continued, "You're entering the World Martial Arts Tournament coming up in the next couple days, right?"

"I-You're entering the World Martial Arts Tournament coming up in the next couple days, right?"

"Yeah. The officials have recently shortened the time and dates between each of the events, so now they're hosting the 25th Tenkaichi Budokai for this year." Videl's eyes then widened in sudden realization and she looked across at the boy in awe, "Y-You're going to enter it as well?"

"Of course. But since I'm under age I'm going to have to enter the Junior Division lineup they've included in the schedule, so I can't quite go for the World Championship belt just yet," the demi-Saiyan chuckled while rubbing his head in his characteristic manner. "I think this will be a great way to see what fighting in the arena is really like. Even though I've already got a part time job, now that I have a little brother to look after, I want to make sure that my mum has enough money to feed and take care of him for the next few years. The prize money from the Junior Division will be a really big help."

"Oh. I see," Videl gave the boy an understanding look and smiled. "I'm sure that will make Chi-Chi very happy."

"I want it to be a surprise too, so I'm only going by myself. I'll invite the others next time," Gohan replied, a smile pulling across his lips before he then glanced up at his mentor, whom he could see was looking at him seriously. "You can come and watch me too if you like, Piccolo."

The Namekian warrior smiled and nodded, "Sure thing, kid. Sounds like it'll be a lot of fun."

Gohan then turned his attention to the others, "Dende? Mr. Popo?"

His eager inquiry drew a light chuckle from the guardian of the planet, "Maybe next time, Gohan. I've still got a lot of work to catch up on. But I'll be sure to support you from afar."

Acknowledging the young Namekian's response, the spirited fighter once again focused his attention on his student, whom he could see was staring at him with great intensity and excitement. "A fight between us in the final round would be an awesome way to test your new fighting skills." He then raised an eyebrow and gave her a competitive grin. "Not to mention it'll be a real pleasure to fight with last year's Junior Division Champion." This remark earned a smirk from the raven haired girl, who balled her fists in response. "So… what do you say, Videl?"

Not one to back down from a challenge as she too has been known to give them out, Videl raised a fist and held it up towards her friend and full-time trainer, "You're on, Gohan-kun."

And with that, the two of them bumped knuckles, sealing the agreement.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Not much action in this chapter, but definitely a lot of development. A nice little moment with Gohan and Videl, as well as Videl stepping into the next phase of her training. So we have the next two chapters devoted to the tournament. After that, we have a few years gap and then the next part of the series.

Hope you all enjoyed this chapter. :)
The loud beeping sound of a generic, bedside alarm clock resounded throughout the small, single-person bedroom of one Son Gohan, causing its sole resident to stir under his covers. When the incessant noise failed to rouse the youngster after the first few seconds, the volume of its screeching suddenly grew even louder; so much so that it looked as though the glass of his window was about to shatter.

This sudden increase in noise finally pulled the demi-Saiyan out of his dream world who, after giving a low groan of discomfort, reached over and slapped a hand down on the piece of plastic to shut off the damn thing. Unfortunately, due to the force of his actions he ended up not only flattening the entire clock, he also wound up putting his hand through the surface of his desk.

Hearing the noise of the device die completely as it shattered into a thousand pieces, Gohan's head surfaced from underneath his blanket, revealing him in his Super Saiyan 2 state.

A scowl framed his face while he slowly pulled his fist out of his now ruined bedside drawer, "Damn it. Again? Ugh…" He really needed to ask Bulma if he could buy some of that Vegeta-proof-stuff she was designing for the guy to use around the house. Kami knew that he could really use with some of it…

Maybe even beg her for a Gravity Room he could set up in the backyard somewhere while he was at it.

Anyway, after destroying yet another ten zeni timepiece and ruining his table in the process, the Super Saiyan 2 sat up and stretched, feeling his muscles pop one after the other.

According to his count, it'd been close to a week since the Kana incident; making that three, potentially earth-moving conflicts the Z-fighters had had to combat in just one year. But of course, the crisis had been successfully averted thanks to good old-fashioned fisticuffs and once law and order had been properly restored to the communities of the continent, the earth was once again allowed to continue turning as if nothing had ever happened.

This went to show that even in peacetime the Z-fighters were all hard at work.

It was probably the most ongoing trend for Gohan and his friends. All of them had saved the planet so many times and yet have received no acknowledgements for their actions. Though it didn't bother him or his family so much, since they preferred to peace and quiet, a couple of the others were feeling a little bit cheated out of their honors, namely Yamcha and Krilllin. But, not being ones to hold grudges for the sake of wellbeing and serenity, they let the credit-taking slide, and returned as productive, hard-working members of society.

Gohan in the meantime tackled his training regimens even harder than ever.

With the knowledge that there were even more powerful fighters out there in the universe outside

Training Arc - A New Dawn

Dragonball Z

Legacies

A New Dawn

(Mount Paozu)
of Bojack and Frieza, the boy resolved to make some much needed amendments to his previous routine, starting with his extended study periods. After telling his mother about his little scrap with Kana across the planet that nearly saw all of them put up for public auction, the Son mother, satisfied with the progress her son had made in his education and studies, reluctantly allowed him to train more times during the week with the promise that he would be able to use his skills to provide a steady income for his family.

Feeling as if a great weight was being lifted from his shoulders, Gohan assured Chi-Chi that he would be able to get some part-time work at a construction company over in Satan City, similarly to what his father and Krillin had done while they had been training under Master Roshi. With his level of skill, strength and knowledge of building, the boy was confident he would be able to fill up an entire roster of staff for the business, thereby saving them a lot on big projects.

Gohan also had the incredibly attractive idea of entering the World Martial Arts Tournaments to get some extra spending money for his family, since they could surely use it.

Approving of his plan, Chi-Chi pretty much allowed Gohan free reign over the next couple of weeks so that he could get all of his priorities sorted before moving into anything big. So with an idea in mind and a new plan for the future coming to light, the demi-Saiyan spent a majority of his time training out in the fields.

Not only did it allow him plenty of opportunities to think, clear his head and make some independent arrangements for the coming years, it also gave him more time to become accustomed to his Super Saiyan 2 form. Having already stayed like this for several days since his battle against Kana, Gohan was really starting to come into his own.

Though he did experience sudden mood swings every now and then, his naturally kind side battling with the aggressive side of his level two state, he learned to get a hold of himself through quiet meditation and concentration. After long periods of settling his spirit and finding his true self swirling in the depths of all his monstrous power, the demi-Saiyan would then go out and do some physical exercises that focused on control above everything else, which really helped him in acquiring a firmer grasp of his Ascended Saiyan state. It also strengthened his body in general, as continuing to hold this form required a great deal of effort and focus.

Understandably, every once in a while he did have these surprising and unexpected bursts of strength, which led him to damaging one thing or another around the property.

This morning it had been his whole bedside station.

 Granted it wasn't something as big as the dining room chair, the T.V remote or the front door, it was still another thing broken. Hopefully he would be able to fix that sometime soon.

After waking up early that Saturday morning and noticing that it was still dark out, the transformed boy flexed his arms and, upon rolling out of bed, quickly slapped on his orange and blue gi. Being sure to quietly tiptoe out of the house, the young half-Saiyan then retreated out onto his property's front lawn and, just like every other early morning, began a series of warm ups and stretching routines.

Going through the familiar motions of his father, starting with his legs, his arms, and then throwing a few light jabs and kicks for practice, kicking up a small gust of wind at the same time, Gohan then took off and headed into the hills. Being sure to put a big distance between himself and his home, the half-Saiyan quickly threw himself into several long rounds of shadow sparring. Holding his power at just the right level so that he didn't cause any unnecessary damage to the region, the spiky haired blonde's form blurred out and sprang into the sky, where he began his eloquent martial dance over the rolling fields of his homeland.

The next few hours practically flew by at a reasonable speed, with Gohan jumping from close combat skills to ki control. He even spent an hour of fighting against himself through use of the Cloning technique, which he was able to pick up from Piccolo during the month to help him with his sparring practices.

To the orange haired form of Zangya watching the young warrior from underneath a nearby tree, there was no stranger sight than seeing the person she considered the strongest person in the universe fighting against three other copies of him. As she leaned against the trunk with her arms folded and a firm expression on her face, the female Hera kept her distance while she watched with interest as Gohan battled himself in an effort to discover and eliminate the weaknesses in his fighting style.

He was making cracking progress too.

Eventually, when the sun started to rise over the mountains, the boy ended his bout of fighting with his copies and promptly returned them to his body. After they jumped back into him from different sides and melded into a singularity once again, the demi-Saiyan continued on with a harder round of sparring, this time with a little more power in his blows.

Generating gusts of wind that cut across Mount Paozu's valleys and fields in all directions, the young Saiyan male blurred over the valleys and through the sky at terrific speeds. Eventually, after shadow sparring for several more minutes, the boy dropped to ground level and began back flipping rapidly across the terrain. Landing on his feet and sliding to a stop, the boy cupped his hands beside him and charged a blue ball of ki between his hands in an instant.

"KA-ME-HA-ME-" Its light blasting out across the grass, Gohan gritted his teeth before flinging his attack forward with a mighty bellow. "HAAAAAAANDHhaa!" The blast rocketed from his hands and shot across the valleys, at first traveling in a straight line. But then, all of a sudden, the powerful attack started to curve and bend as the young Super Saiyan warrior took control of the beam's path and guided it safely over the hills and into the sky.

Bringing it around in a wide arc, he eventually brought the blast back down to the ground and directed it towards him. The blue energy wave honed in on his position, prompting the young warrior to spin around and catch the attack with his bare hands. The enormous attack slammed into his palms and burned into them with the ferocity of the sun itself. Eventually, after a full minute of struggling, the powered down Super Saiyan 2 then dug his fingers into the front of the blast and literally ripped it in half. The two parts detonated safely off to the sides with great force, shaking the countryside all around.

Zangya whistled at the size of the explosions. "Wow…" Despite the blast being low key, it still produced a fantastic result.

When the smoke cleared and the embers of energy faded onto the wind, it revealed Gohan standing perfectly unscathed in the center. Patting his hands down and dusting off his gi, the young warrior breathed a sigh of relief and went about loosening his arms and shoulders. "Good work out. But if I want to get stronger, I'm gonna have to do a lot more than that over the next few months." Yep. He had a whole list of sessions to work into his days, including technique control and intense weight training.

Before that though, he had a couple other things to have sorted first.

While standing at the top of that hill, the youngster then became aware of a set of eyes on him and turned to see Zangya now standing behind him. Not at all surprised to see her, Gohan gave her a charming smile, "Don't you get a little bit tired just hanging around outside my house all day and night?"

The orange haired girl shrugged, "Well… I'm still new to this planet and I don't have anywhere else to go… plus this place is pretty quiet." A small smile of her own pulled across her lips while she gazed into the distance. "Out here I don't have to worry about traffic, currency, food shortage issues, huge crowds, and people stopping to stare at me whenever I walk past them. Sure I can deal with the attention, but I'd rather just hang out in an area like this where there are only animals and small villages to worry about."

"Hm? Why do you say that?" Gohan asked, not quite seeing the problem.

Zangya looked back at him with an amused smirk, "You may not have noticed this, but it's kind of hard to fit into earth's society when you're a striking alien girl like me… having blue skin, pointy ears and all that nonsense. You and your kind don't have to worry about these kinds of problems, since you Saiya-jins already look a lot like humans and can walk around without having to worry about scaring the daylights out of people every time they glance in your general direction." Vegeta was kind of a massive exception to that fact.

That man was scary by default.

Despite her concerns regarding her appearance though, Gohan merely smiled back at her kindly and shrugged, "I don't see what the big problem is, Zangya. I'm sure you can walk around wherever you want just fine. You look pretty normal to me."

Zangya's expression softened upon hearing the youngster say that, "You're sweet."

Giggling, Gohan massaged his scalp and turned to look towards the horizon as well. Seeing the sun starting to peak over the mountains, the young half-Saiyan chuckled and glanced back at the woman standing in front of him. "I've got a couple hours before Videl comes around. Would you like to hang out with me and have a little sparring match?" The young fighter raised a hand and clenched his fist excitedly. "I think it would be awesome to have another training partner besides Piccolo and myself."

The former gangster chuckled and stepped away, arms still comfortably folded over her chest. "No thanks. I'm not really in the mood."

Gohan responded with a disappointed groan, "Aww. Are you sure?"

"Yes. I'm pretty sure," Zangya replied, rolling her eyes at the crestfallen, puppy-eyed look the strongest warrior in the universe was now sending her way. "You already proved several weeks ago that you can beat me without breaking a sweat in your current form, so I think I'll play it safe and stick to watching you for the time being." She then glanced at him when she saw his expression fall just a little bit more and then smirked at him confidently. "But… if you ever turn back to normal and you're still up for it, I'll strongly reconsider having a few bouts with you across the countryside."

This inevitably had the young teenager brighten and tighten his fists with enthusiasm. "Alright. Sure. That sounds awesome."

"Is it just me… or did that sound like you were wussing out there for a second?" the familiar, gravelly voice of Piccolo resounded over the area as the warrior descended from the sky to land between the pair. "I never expected to hear that coming from you."
Glancing at the caped Namekian guardian, Zangya snorted, "Oh. Look who it is. It's the green man." The girl shot him a mischievous smile, "Still dropping in everyday to check up on me, huh?"

"You and Gohan both," Piccolo replied, arms crossed and a glare set on the orange haired warrior standing in close proximity of his student. "I'm just making sure that you don't try anything funny while you're hiding out here in the valleys. You know… being Bojack's former henchwoman and all." You can't be too careful with these kinds of characters. They could be very unpredictable.

All evidence to the contrary though…

"That guy can suck a meteor spike for all I care," the Hera shot back immediately with a frown on her face. Seeing the pair staring at her, the former invader of their planet flicked her hair away and turned her back on the green-skinned martial artist. "You don't have to worry about me blowing a cork while I'm down here. I'm not interested in fighting you guys anymore. I'm done with that kind of life."

"Hmph," Piccolo grunted, before focusing his gaze to his transformed student standing nearby and staring up at him with a smile on his face.

"Hey, Piccolo."

The child's cheerful exterior quickly drew a smile from the Namekian as well. "What's shakin' kid? Did you finish your training for this morning?"

Gohan shrugged, "Not quite. I was hoping to have a little spar with Zangya while she's here, but she said she doesn't want to right now. I'm a little bit disappointed." His attention momentarily pulled across to the woman who merely glanced back at him. After seeing her stick her tongue out, he then turned to his mentor and saw the man remove his cape and turban.

"Don't bleed your heart over it, kid. I wouldn't mind going a few rounds with you for the next hour or so." Unlike their newfound alien friend, if you wanted to call her that, Piccolo wasn't afraid of getting a few bumps and bruises in a fight against the young Saiyan. After seeing his stellar performance against Kana a few days earlier and seeing the progress he's made since the Intergalactic Tournament, the Namekian was confident he had nothing to worry about. He could trust his student enough to be able to control his power around him. "Let's work a bit before that girlfriend of yours shows up."

Not even shirking at the jab about Videl, seeing as his teacher was game for a bit of fun, Gohan cracked his neck and slid into a fighting stance just as his friend of years past did as well. "We've got time. Let's make the most of it, okay Piccolo?"

"Heh. No problem."

Zangya, sensing conflict, wisely chose to put some distance between her and the pair, and floated over to sit atop a nearby log. Crossing her legs over, the orange haired space pirate got comfortable as she watched the pair size themselves up before, in a blur of superhuman movement, threw themselves into a friendly match.

Just like he intended, Gohan kept his power down at the lowest possible decibel as he began trading blows with his teacher across the skies. It wasn't just a workout for the Namekian trying to keep up with his Ascended Saiyan opponent, it was also proving to be a lot of work for Gohan as well, since the adolescent warrior had to keep an extra eye on the amount of power he was using at all times. The next hour or so was spent by the teen primarily working on his control and even when his teacher started throwing some big moves his way, the youngster did marvelously at keeping his strength at a low enough level.

Time eventually ticked over to the end of the session and when the pair dropped out of the sky and landed back on solid ground, both of them were looking a little bit beat, yet were still standing in relatively good condition.

Wiping a small bruise away from a punch he'd received across the face, Piccolo smiled. "Not bad, kid. I'd say with a couple more months of this training, you'll be able to gain complete control over your Ascended Saiyan form and fight with it without exerting any effort whatsoever."

Breathing out as well, the unscathed Gohan stood up and stretched his arms out, "Yeah. I think so too. It's really hard trying to keep so much power suppressed and to fight using only the bare minimum. But if I keep at it and continue using it on a regular basis, I'll be able to transform into a Super Saiyan 2 and fight with it anytime, no problem."

"Heh. I like how you're finally starting to come out of that shell of yours," Piccolo remarked, straightening up and giving his student a sagely look. "You're not the same Gohan I knew two months ago; the kid who was hesitant about stepping up and giving it his all. You're a lot more confident and sure of yourself now. Even though you still act a lot like your father, you're slowly turning into a warrior all your own." A wider smile formed on his face. "All of your hard work is really starting to pay off."

Feeling his spirit lift a little at that remark, the youngster then looked across at their audience member, who was still watching them closely from her log. "What do you think, Zangya?"

The orange haired woman gave an off-handed wave and spoke up, "I wasn't here for all of that Cell and android stuff but… yeah. I agree with what the green man said." She then threw the boy a smile and a thumbs-up. "Good job, blondie."

Accepting that as her answer with a gleeful grin, Gohan hummed away the splashes of encouragement and watched as his teacher retrieved his turban and cloak. Limbering up while the Namekian dusted himself down, the half-Saiyan then reached out with his senses to see what was going on across the ether.

Outside of his training spot, he could feel his mother up and making breakfast, the villagers of the neighboring towns beyond their property waking to greet the day ahead and, a little bit further away but on fast approach of their home turf, he sensed the familiar ki signature of Videl on the move. And she wasn't alone either.

Smiling towards the horizon, Gohan turned back to his teacher, who he was now standing upright and back in his weighted training gear. "Thanks for agreeing to come by today, Piccolo. I really appreciate the help."

"No problem, kid," the Namekian replied calmly. "When I heard you were planning on taking a student of your own, I immediately became curious. So I decided to keep a closer eye on you to see how you handled it in case you didn't ask for my help. I'm really interested to see how you plan on starting her off. She wants to learn how to become a fighter like us, right?" Seeing the young Saiyan nod elicited a grunt from the towering warrior. "Then she should know that she's got a lot of hard work and long days ahead of her."

Gohan nodded, wrapping his fingers around his belt and holding it in a manner that his father often did, "I was thinking of starting Videl on some running laps of the countryside. Get her used to the routine before introducing her to the energy based material. I need to see how well she's doing in the physical department first and whether she has a good enough grasp of the basics." He then grinned a little bit, "If she does well on her first day, maybe I'll throw in some of your stuff to see how she'll cope swimming in the deep end."

"Sounds good to me," Piccolo replied, finding some mild amusement at the idea of his student using a few of 'his' teaching methods. As cruel as that sounded, he was positive the demi-Saiyan would be a little tamer in his approach to teaching than he was while he was teaching the ankle-biter all those years ago. "Don't forget to teach her how to dodge."

"That's lesson one," Gohan chirped, running a hand through his gravity defying hair. "Wait here for a moment. I'll be back in a bit." After straightening his gi up, he then took off and began leaping across the fields towards his home, leaving Piccolo and Zangya standing out on the grass.

Gohan made it to his front door just in time to see a tiny speck appear over the horizon in the direction of Satan City. When he stopped and waited, he saw the dot get closer and closer before eventually taking the shape and form of a familiar yellow jet-copter.

The craft soon came to hover above the Son family home. Its engine hummed loudly as it slowly came to settle on the grass a few yards in front of the Super Saiyan. When its skids settled and its ignition cut, the boy watched the side door open up and his friend pop out of the passenger seat.

The sight of her brought a smile to Gohan's face. "Morning, Videl."

"Morning, Gohan-kun," the raven haired youngster replied, hurriedly making her way over while the other door to the copter opened up as well. "How are you doing?"

"Great. You?"

"Packed, rested and ready to go," Videl answered, clenching a fist before having a look around his property. Finding not one front yard but an entire expanse of rolling hillsides with forests and mountains in the distance, the girl's eyes shimmered with awe and wonder. "Wow… so this is where you live?"

"Yep. This is our home," Gohan stared, placing his hands on his hips and turning in the same direction his visitor was gazing. "My family owns this entire region. It's also the same place my dad grew up in when he was a kid." He then pointed towards a small, oriental style house sitting not too far from the dome-shaped building that was the central element of their residence. "That's his old home, the one great grandpa used to own… or should I say adoptive great grandfather."

Videl nodded in acknowledgement. "It's very nice. All of it is." She looked back at the youngster standing in front of her, "So… wanna give me the grand tour?"

"Of course. Whenever you're ready," Gohan said.

Before he could set off though, another voice interrupted them.

"Hold it right there, sweet pea," the booming voice of Hercule Satan spoke up, drawing the pair's attention towards the copter to see the man with the afro cut step out from behind it. Adorned in casual clothes consisting of a jumper, jeans and shoes, the big man appeared before the two kids looking proud and confident. "Now, before I let you go off with this boy, I just want to remind him not t-GAHAWHOA!" Until he spotted Gohan, of course.

The still transformed Saiyan smiled and waved pleasantly at the gob smacked champion, "Hey, Mr. Satan."
Jaw hanging open and appearing absolutely shocked, the man with the afro hairstyle laughed nervously and waved, "H-Hello. Uhh…" Staggering forward slowly, the man stood before the much shorter boy in a hunched over position. "So… you were the one my daughter was talking about training with, huh?" There was no way he could forget a face like that. His spiky blonde hair and gi was a dead giveaway.

Videl sighed and glared across at her father, "Of course he is, daddy. Who else did you think I was talking about? Were you even listening to me?"

"S-Sorry, dear. I… I knew who you were talking about. It's just… it's taking a lot of time for me to wrap my head around all this," the world champion replied, looking between his daughter and the boy in front of him nervously. "I mean, the last time I saw him like this was at the Cell Games… fighting against that green freckled monster. He saved my life… ALL of our lives. Hell, he saved the entire planet."

A smile spreading across her lips, Videl stepped over to her friend and tugged on his sleeve, drawing Gohan's gaze over to her. "Yeah. It's kind of his job," the raven haired girl informed, smiling fondly up at him.

Hercule, rubbing his hands together anxiously, then nodded to the demi-Saiyan in a very timid manner. "I'm really sorry about taking the credit for Cell's defeat… as well as for that incident at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament you were in. I was… it's just… after your group disappeared and no one stepped forward to claim victory over that monster, I took the chance and came up with that bogus story. At the time I just didn't want to lose face with the public… and I wanted to make sure that the people of earth knew that they were safe. But when it happened again at Cash's tournament, everyone thought that I was the one that beat those freaky alien monsters when the connection cut out. It was a selfish thing to do, I know, and I apologize." He bowed his head humbly to the young man, who leaned back in surprise at the man's actions. "There are no excuses for what I did… and I can understand if you hate me for it…"

Listening to the sincerity in the martial artist's voice, Gohan slowly processed what he said before beaming brightly, "It's alright, Mr. Satan. You don't have to go that far." When he saw the man look up, the half-Saiyan shrugged. "Seriously, my friends and I don't mind. We're not mad that you took the credit for killing Cell or anything like that. As long as the world and the people are safe, than that's good enough for us."

An owlish expression came over Hercule's face, "R-Really?"

Gohan nodded, while both Hercule and Videl listened to him intently, "My family and friends have fought to save the world many times before, and we've never asked for anything in return. It's what we do." The boy tilted his head and grinned. "Honestly, we're glad you took the credit for it. Because as long as people believe you were the one who saved the world from Cell and Bojack, we won't get harassed by the public for it." He chuckled and thumbed over his shoulder, "We already got pestered by the reporters that came by here wanting to ask me some questions about the tournament, but a friendly 'acquaintance' of mine was able to chase them away."

"S-So…" the Champ gulped nervously, "You're really not angry or anything?"

"No. Not at all," Gohan replied, smiling back at the fighter with the mustache and afro cut, "All I want to do is be friends with Videl and have your permission to come visit her whenever I can, if that's okay with you."

"Oh. Well… if that's all, then…" A swell of delight quickly returned to Hercule's face, "you and my daughter can hang out all you want!" the Champ exclaimed, walking right up to the boy and taking his hand, shaking it vigorously to show how grateful he was to him. "For the boy who saved the world from Cell; you have my full permission!" His answer bringing smiles to the two children's faces, the martial arts master then suddenly gave a stern look and glared across at the teen with the blonde hair. Despite knowing he was the one who defeated Cell, the father still mustered up enough courage to say one last thing. "But you listen here… um…"

"Gohan," the demi-Saiyan chirped, "Son Gohan."

"Gohan," Hercule cleared his throat and pointed a finger at him. "Videl is my daughter and the greatest treasure in the world to me. There is not a person or thing alive that can compare to her. She is my little princess-"

"DAD!" the girl shouted, blushing brightly as she glared at her father.

Undeterred, the Champ continued on with his declaration, "Just because you're the boy who saved the world from that bug and those alien scoundrels on that island, that doesn't mean I'm going to take it easy on you regarding my little sugar bee. I expect you to take good care of my daughter and to treat her well, because if I hear that you've hurt even a single hair on her head, then there is not a force on this planet that's going to stop me from coming after you and popping your head clean off of your shoulders! You got that?!"

Almost being shaken by the shoulder, Gohan smiled back at the father and nodded in understanding, "Don't worry, Mr. Satan. I promise I won't let anything happen to her."

"You mean it?" Hercule asked for confirmation. When he saw the boy nod, the man sniffed and pulled away, fists being placed firmly on his hips. "Good. Good. Er… thank you." He then moved back over to the jet-copter and around to the side. Opening the compartment there, he then unloaded a couple sets of luggage, including a pillow and sleeping bag, and set them on the ground beside the pair. "I hope you two have a lot of fun together. And remember; no drinking, no joy riding, no drugs and no s…"

"DADDY!" Videl barked again, looking even more thoroughly embarrassed than before, "We're only eleven."

"Oh. Right… yeah… umm…” Hercule took a moment to think it over, before calmly falling back into continuation. "The rules still stand!"

Sighing in exasperation Videl then heard the door to the house behind her open up, and the trio standing outside turned to see a woman wearing purple, oriental robes with her black hair tied into a ponytail step out into the open.

Quickly spotting their guests, the Son mother smiled and approached, "Hello there. It's good to see you again, Videl." She went straight for their young visitor standing by her son and held her hand out to her, "I'm Chi-Chi, Gohan's mother."

"Oh. Yes. Hello again," the pig-tailed girl straightened up and took the woman's hand in hers, "Thank you for having me here, Mrs. Son."

The woman giggled. "Please, just call me Chi-Chi. Mrs. Son makes me feel too much like an old lady." Placing her hands at her sides, the raven haired mother took a step away and sized her up. "And of course, Gohan's friends are always welcome here. Anything for my sweet little angel…"

"MUM!" the Super Saiyan 2 blushed and scowled across at the woman beaming at his friend.

Giving her oldest boy a momentary look, Chi-Chi turned back to their guest with a cheerful smile,
"I hope you're looking forward to your stay here, Videl. I'm sure you're going to enjoy it."

"Thanks so much, Chi-Chi," the youngster bowed.

Gathering up his friend's bags like a gentleman, Gohan held them under his arms and over his shoulder, walked up to Videl, and nudged her lightly. "Come on. I'll show you where you'll be sleeping." Receiving an enthusiastic smile in return, the raven haired girl quickly followed him into the house where they disappeared.

Staring after them for several seconds, Chi-Chi then turned to Hercule to see the big man looking back at her nervously. Upon which the martial arts champion cleared his throat and nodded, "Ma'am."

"Mr. Satan," the Son mother replied with a parental nod of respect.

"I appreciate you for having my daughter over. This... really means a lot to her," the Champ murmured, rubbing the back of his hand in a meek manner as he gazed back at the woman. "I can tell she really likes that boy and that she wants to be around him as much as possible. Just... make sure she eats her food and brushes her teeth every morning and afternoon."

Chi-Chi sucked in her gut confidently, "Don't worry, Mr. Satan. I'll make sure that your daughter is well looked after. I promise."

Feeling relieved, Hercule swallowed nervously and bowed to the woman, "I'll drop by every now and again to check up on her. Even though I am the World Martial Arts Champion and the face that defeated the mighty Cell, that doesn't mean I can't set aside some time for my most important little girl in the world..."

"I understand that completely, sir," Chi-Chi responded earnestly, giving the man a kind gaze. "My Gohan means the world to me too. So don't worry. I swear I won't let anything bad happen to either of them." It was the best comfort she could give, which was all Hercule needed to settle the swarm of butterflies in his stomach.

Eventually, after pleasantries and assurances had been made between the two, the world champ waited for his daughter to come back out and after giving her a hug, he hopped into his copter, waved, and took off.

Over the past few days, both Gohan and Videl had assembled one hell of a timetable together.

While the half-Saiyan was still getting a few of his things in order, the champion's daughter had arranged to stay over at his place for the next several weeks. It wasn't just an ordinary sleep over either. The raven haired martial artist was going to be taking fighting lessons under him starting from that very weekend, and Videl was determined to give it her all. She even took some time off from school for 'Hercule Satan' business, which was one of the few privileges granted to her by the institute. Of course, this was under the condition that she completed the course work during her away period over the internet.

After hashing it out with her dad, clearing the air and what not, the raven haired girl then packed her things and readied herself for the long months ahead. Gohan had no problems organizing this with his mother either, who was just as happy to have her son's friend over as he was.

Surely there was some ulterior motive behind her cooperation in the matter, but Gohan wasn't splitting hairs. He was sure that whatever it was, he did not want to be a part of it... Because he was pretty sure that he'd already passed that point.
With Hercule gone and Videl's stuff put away in his bedroom, the demi-Saiyan then walked the girl across the field and in the direction of the spot Piccolo and Zangya was waiting. On their way there, the visitor began taking in as much of the countryside as she could. Marveling at the hills and the cool breeze that moved gently across the plains, the pig-tailed martial artist in training smiled and stepped closer to her friend.

"This place is really beautiful. You like it out here?"

Gohan grinned, "Yeah. It's quiet, it's open, and I can go wherever I want and not have to worry about stepping onto another person's property. I can also get a lot of training done out here without having to worry about destroying anything important or hurting any people nearby."

"For a superhuman that's capable of wiping out an entire city block with a sneeze, I think that's a fair deal," Videl replied, grinning brightly at the blonde. "I bet your workout sessions are intense."

"Well, not as intense as Vegeta's for sure, but definitely more practical," Gohan informed, shrugging as they continued moving through the grass at a casual speed. While the girl brushed some bangs out of her hair, the young Saiyan continued. "My dad and friends believe that training out in the open is the best way to get stronger. While I'm thinking of mixing it up a little more, the fields and natural environment I think is the best place to begin."

"And that's where you'll want me to start as well?" the girl asked, giving the spiky haired fighter a hopeful look.

"It was where all of us started out, including me. Considering how far I've come along, I believe that's where we should kick things off," Gohan said, earning a grin from his friend and seeing her pump her fist excitedly.

The pair soon arrived at the flat where Piccolo was waiting for them. When they approached him, Videl shirked a little at the sight of the seven foot green man. But of course, being the daughter of the world champ and a tough girl in her own right, she gladly stood beside her friend as he introduced her to the giant of a warrior.

"Hey Piccolo, this is Videl," Gohan greeted, turning to the teen to see her cup her hands in front and bow to the Namekian. "Videl, this is Piccolo, my best friend and my very first martial arts teacher. He's the one that taught me everything I know about fighting, and helped me and my dad train for the androids and Cell." The youngster grinned across at his guardian. "He's an awesome fighter and one of the best I know."

The Namek smirked at the girl standing beside the Saiyan, "'Sup?"

"It's good to meet you, sir," Videl said, her voice a little bit shaky but eventually leveling out when she mustered up the confidence. "Gohan has told me a lot about you."

"Has he now?" Piccolo glanced at his student, who smiled back at him innocently and prompted the warrior to raise an eyebrow. "How much exactly?"

"Enough to know that you're a great man and a wickedly good instructor," the raven haired girl immediately replied.

This tickled a funny heartstring in the Namekian, who grunted back at the youngster's praises, "I'm flattered. Thanks."

While trading pleasantries with the tall green alien, Videl then noticed somebody else present and looked around the caped crusader. Squinting to get a better look, the young fighter then jumped when she recognized the blue-skinned alien girl from the Intergalactic Tournament and the Kana incident sitting on a nearby log.

Gulping, the pig-tailed martial artist raised a hand and waved, "H-Hey?"

Zangya gave an upward nod, "Yeah, hey." And then went back to looking off onto the horizon.

Chuckling at his compatriot's indifference, Gohan placed a hand on Videl's shoulder, "That's Zangya… and yeah. She was one of those aliens from the island incident. Don't worry, she won't bite. She just hangs around our place now standing guard over our laundry."

"O-kay," Videl murmured, tilting her head in the direction of the woman. After several moments of sizing her up and getting a feel for her presence, she eventually shook herself out of her daze and quickly focused back on the reason they were here. Clenching her fists, the pig-tailed fighter smiled across at her friend, "So. When can we get started?"

"Oh-ho? Eager, are we?"

The girl nodded, "You damn right I am."

"Alrighty then. The first thing we're going to do is get you acquainted to our routine. Square one," Gohan said, at the same time tugging on his gi. "That means you're going to need a new uniform."

Videl then pulled at the collar of her shirt. She was wearing a pair of black spandex pants and an oversized top; something she often wore while training at home, "What's wrong with my current uniform?"

"Nothing at all. It's just that you need one for our kind of training," Gohan replied and glanced across at his teacher. "Piccolo?"

Knowing it was his time to shine, the Namekian stepped forward and towered over the girl. While his size and appearance would have intimidated any other person, Videl didn't back down in the slightest. All she did was look up at the man silhouetted against the morning sky and watched him curiously as he raised a hand and held it a foot above her head.

"Hmm, I think… a solid eighty should do it." Before the young girl could question what he meant by that, Piccolo then gave a loud yell and, in a flash of blinding light, the Champ's daughter found herself adorned in a completely new uniform.

It was an orange and blue gi very similar to the one Gohan had worn when he was four, complete with the kanji 'Ma' on the left breast and 'Son' on the back.

When she emerged from the smoke, Videl wanted to check out her new look, but was unable to when her body suddenly lurched downwards and she had to put momentary effort into straightening back up.

"Whoa. What the heck?" It was heavy. That was a surprise. Not just the wrist bands but her shirt and shoes felt like they were being held down by bricks as well.

The material didn't feel dense, but she sure as hell felt the weight of it. Probably because she wasn't expecting it.

"Cool." Gohan, smiling as the girl pulled herself up, then turned to look at his mentor, "You're going to have to teach me how to do that sometime, Piccolo."
The Namekian nodded, "Sure. You and I can have a sit-down about it later. But let's focus on getting your student up to speed." When they looked back at Videl, they saw her quickly adjust for the sudden weight increase in her new uniform with a quick skip of her toes.

"Wow… how did you do that?" the young fighter asked, glancing up at the Namekian curiously.

Piccolo chuckled, "Magic, runt… and not the kind you can find in any retail and convenience store. That stuff was the genuine article."

"He's really good with it too. Trust me," Gohan remarked with a proud look in his eye.

This then raised another important question that the pig-tailed girl had to address.

"What happened to my old clothes?"

Staring blankly at her for a moment, both master and student turned to look at each other. After several moments of silence and contemplation, which put a bit of sweat on the two of them, the Namekian slowly looked back at the newcomer. "Don't know… don't care." His response and the half-Saiyan's deadpanned look had Zangya snort before breaking out into fits of suppressed laughter.

The Hera could be seen holding her sides in the background.

"Okay, skimming over that," Gohan cleared his throat and moved to center stage. "Welcome to your first day of training at Son Gohan's martial arts academy." Seeing his teacher roll his eyes next to him, the demi-Saiyan snickered and continued on with his introduction, "As you've probably already guessed, Piccolo has given you a new set of weighted clothing. That entire ensemble, the wrist bands, boots and blue under shirt, weigh a total of eighty kilograms. Since you're probably only used to using weights sparingly during gym sessions, probably a lot more than that, we're going to get you accustomed to wearing this weight on a daily basis."

"Alright. Sounds fair," Videl murmured, lifting her arms and testing what she felt was twenty kilos on both arms.

"If you do well on your first day, we'll up the ante a bit tomorrow and increase your weight," Gohan said with an excited grin. "This is the training that my father and his best friend Krillin started out on, and it's the stuff that we still use even today." He gestured towards Piccolo and then himself, showing off his wristbands. "We wear these on a regular basis. My outfit has a low weight so I can still fight in it, but Piccolo ups his every time he's training or just moving around."

Immediately curious, Videl stared at her friend, "How much does yours weigh?"

"Oh, my clothes weigh around five hundred kilos altogether."

The girl appeared dumbstruck, "F-Five hundred kilos?" And he looked like he was barely even feeling it. Forget the fact he was in a transformed state, either way it still sounded crazy to her.

"Yep," Gohan nodded.

"H-How can you even fight with something like that?" Silly question. He was a superhuman/alien after all. Of course, like all normal people, Videl tended to forget a few important details when wallowing in shock. It was a trait she happened to pick up from her father's side, sadly enough.

"Pretty easily, actually," the half-Saiyan answered, but then paused for a moment. "Oh. Yeah. That reminds me. Hey Piccolo. Could you bump my weight up to two tons on my wrist bands and shoes," and three for my shirt? If we're going to be doing this, I might as well do this the right way." Since he was in Super Saiyan 2 it felt like he was wearing tissue paper and he couldn't even feel the weight. He needed to put on a new grade and get used to it when he eventually reverted back to his base state.

Complying with his student's request, Piccolo pointed at him and fired a golden beam that lit up his wrists, feet and shirt. When the glow inevitably faded, it left Gohan in the exact same style of dress with a weight increase that he barely felt. Testing it in his neutral, ascended Saiyan state, the Z-fighter nodded and turned to face his friend. Seeing that she was still staring at him in shock and disbelief, the youngster grinned and, slipping off an armband, gently set it on the ground and stepped away.

"Give it a try if you like," the transformed boy chirped.

Managing to shake herself out of her daze, Videl cautiously walked up to the band and reached down to pick it up. As soon as her fingers wrapped around the fabric, she was baffled by what she felt, "W-What in the?" Gritting her teeth, the girl attempted to lift at least one part of the material, only to find her fingers unable to pull it up on their own. She even tried with both hands. But after several seconds of futile struggling, the girl stood up, backed away, and panted heavily, "Okay… uhh… well that's… something."

Chuckling, the boy stepped over and casually picked it up. "Still don't believe me?" Tossing it up and down a few times, the young fighter then rolled his hand at chest height and dropped the band to the grass, which it hit with an earsplitting crack and punched a hole a foot deep into the ground. It was a sight that had Videl gawk until Gohan reached in and picked it up again. "See. Two tons." He then casually slipped it on like a watch and placed his hands on his hips. "So… still think you're up to it?"

Remaining silent for but a moment, Videl faced her friend with a serious look, "Will I eventually be able to lift that much?"

Gohan grinned, "If you work hard and keep at this every single day, yes." He then patted himself in the chest, "My dad started this at around the same age as you. So I'm sure that with enough practice and training, we'll be able to make some headway over the next few months… and maybe even the year if you want to-"

"YES!" was the immediate response from Videl's mouth, who didn't even need to wait for the boy to finish. Eyes shining with determination, the girl stepped towards the Saiyan with her fists clenched tightly, "I want to do this, Gohan-kun. I want to become strong… just like you and your friends." She then smiled sincerely in his direction when she spoke her next words, "And, if I do this… I'll be able to hang out with you every day." It was a series of words that had the girl momentarily avert her gaze and become a little red in the face.

Her statement nevertheless brought a flutter to Gohan's heart and a smile to his ever cheerful exterior. Ignoring the snicker from Zangya all the way from her log and the intrigued look from Piccolo, the half-Saiyan rolled his shoulder, cracked his knuckles and gestured over his back, "So… want to get this show on the road?"

"You bet," was Videl's enthusiastic reply.

"Alright then. For starters, we're going to go for a nice, brisk jog through the mountains and across the valley. While we're at it I'll fill you in on what else you're going to be doing for your training and what will be happening over the next couple of weeks," Gohan informed, beginning to skip on the spot before waving the girl into formation. When she fell in step, both of them turned and began running in the direction of the hills, the pair carrying their respective weights and establishing a fair yet fast pace.

Both Piccolo and Zangya watched the youngsters vanish into the distance, bearing the same looks of seriousness as they usually did. Eventually, after a couple minutes of sitting around, the most playful of the pair decided to stand and float up into the air. "You know what… this might actually be fun to watch." The Hera then flew after them.

Grunting, the Namekian followed, not just to keep an eye on her but also curious to see how his student handled the role of instructor for a change.

And so, as the group left on their early morning run through the mists, Videl's apprenticeship and tutelage under Son Gohan began…

XXX

(Some time later)

The run through Mount Paozu Gohan had selected led the pair through various different areas of the region across every kind of terrain you could possibly imagine. This included; mountains, bridges, grasslands, streams, banks, rocky wastelands and forests, with one of the legs through the fields even involving Videl being chased by a hungry T-Rex, much to an observing Zangya's amusement.

When the poor girl had a go at Gohan after losing the damn thing after three miles of screaming and sprinting later, the boy laughed it off as something she was just going to have to get used to. He went on to explain that this routine was essential in improving her endurance, agility, footedness and balance, all of which they were able to cover in this first part of the morning. It was a trek that pushed Videl to her absolute limits.

Following their rigorous twenty mile jog which nearly saw the poor youngster faint from exhaustion, the demi-Saiyan then took her to a nearby village to show her what would eventually become her mid-morning exercises. It was at this very sanctuary in the countryside where a couple of familiar faces were already standing by and waiting for their arrival.

Having stopped on an expanse of rolling hillsides, Videl stood hunched over, pouring sweat and breathing heavily.

"That… was insane…" she groaned. If she wasn't wearing eighty kilos of weight that lap of the region would have been so much easier.

Gohan chuckled as he looked down at the thoroughly exhausted girl, "You did pretty well on your first run. But we're not stopping yet. We've got a lot more to cover before our day is through and since we're starting out late, we're really going to have to fly through this." When he saw the raven haired fighter look at him in disbelief, the spiky haired youngster then turned his attention to the hills, where two people could be seen standing nearby. One of them was an elderly man in a martial arts outfit and with white hair, and the other was a young girl with brown hair tied into two pigtails, and was wearing a yellow shirt and red suspenders. "Now it's time to try your hand at agriculture."

"Uhh… agri-what?" Videl shook her head, wondering if she heard him right.

When the pair lumbered over to the two people waiting nearby, the Super Saiyan 2 gave them a fond greeting. "Hey, Mr. Lao."
"Good morning, Gohan," the white haired elder exclaimed with a smile. "How are you doing today?"

"Great. Just going for a little bit of a run across the countryside with my friend," the demi-Saiyan chirped, before then turning his attention to the little girl standing beside the martial artist. He beamed as soon as his eyes fell upon her, "Hey, Lime. Long time no see."

The adolescent immediately brightened at the sight of the boy and, stepping up to him, immediately took his hand in hers, "Welcome back, Gohan. It's great to see you again." Giggling when she saw the Saiyan grin at her as well, she then looked up at the locks standing atop his head. "You look a little… different today. Did you grow taller?"

"Heh. Sort of," the teen replied, at the same time flicking his bang out of his face. "I'm not sure if this counts though."

"Well, I think your hair looks awesome," Lime replied, ecstatic at seeing her friend again after all these weeks. "You should keep it like that."

"Really? You don't think it makes me look scary?"

"No. Not at all," the youngster shook her head. "You could make it a little bit shorter though, so that it doesn't get in the way."

"Yeah. I'm thinking of getting it cut as well."

Videl, noting how friendly the two youngsters were acting with each other, then turned her attention to the Super Saiyan standing alongside her, "Hey Gohan, who's this?"

"Oh, yeah. Sorry Videl" Quickly turning back to his friend and student, the demi-Saiyan gestured her towards the folks in front of them. "This is Mr. Lao and his granddaughter Lime. I met them a couple of months ago while I was doing some grocery shopping for mum before the Cell Games. They're really good people."

Blinking in realization, the raven haired girl smiled at the two neighbors and bowed, "It's very nice to meet you, sir."

Lao beamed at the girl's polite greeting and bowed to her as well, "And it's a pleasure to meet you too, Ms. Satan. Welcome to our village."

While Videl was made friendly small talk with the elderly martial artist, she failed to notice the girl standing next to him give her a funny look, as well as quick glance between her and Gohan. Taking note of the similar uniforms they were wearing and how this newcomer was a friend of the demi-Saiyan's and not a relative, Lime couldn't help but feel a little bit suspicious as to what was going on between them.

Turning back to her teacher, Videl threw him an inquisitive look, "So Gohan, what am I going to be doing while I'm out here?"

Grinning, the young Saiyan then directed her attention toward the fields behind the two villagers, "So far you've only covered the early morning portion of your training. Now it's time to get started on your mid-morning exercise. This will consist of you plowing these fields with your bare hands."

The young martial artist looked at him as if he'd grown a second head, "My… bare hands…?"

Nodding, Gohan lifted his right and showed her his palm, "This will help build the strength and dexterity of your fingers. By using them to toil away at the ground, you'll be able to strengthen them enough to move on to much harder tasks." He then lowered his arm to his side and smiled. "I built up my strength by surviving in the wild using only my hands and feet. This is pretty much the same concept, only confined to a specific routine."

"O-kay," Videl murmured, still feeling a little bit overwhelmed by the enormity of the task that was being asked of her. Swallowing nervously, she turned away from him to gaze across at the valley. "How long... do you want me to do this task for?"

"Oh... maybe an hour or so. We'll see how well you do and if you do well I'll get you to stop early," Gohan chirped before then nodding her towards the hills. "Better get crackin'."

Sucking it up, Videl quickly sprinted out onto the square patch on the hillside and, starting from one end, began to dig. Within moments the spunky young fighter started plowing furrows into the ground up and down section of earth, moving at a labored pace yet still making sure she kept right on task. She knew that the faster she did this, the sooner she would be able to move on to the boy's next assignment.

Hopefully it would be something more along the lines of what she originally came here for.

While Gohan stood by watching her with a pleased look on his face, he sensed Mr. Lao step across to stand alongside him.

"I see you're getting her to go through Master Roshi's classical Turtle School routine."

"Oh. You've heard about Master Roshi's training regimen?" the demi-Saiyan asked curiously.

"I've been around for quite a while, lad... and as an old hand in martial arts you can bet I've heard a lot about some of the big wigs over the years, your father included," Mr. Lao replied, a mischievous smile ever present as he kept his gaze fixed firmly upon the raven haired girl toiling away at the earth.

Upon taking this in, Gohan sprouted a grin, "Well... I guess you can say I'm taking a lot after a person who'd actually been a student of the old Turtle Hermit."

"That's good. There's no better place to start then from the ground up," the elder villager remarked in a pleased tone of voice. "I'm assuming your friend's already developed some strong foundations to build upon, seeing as how she already appears to be using weighted clothing."

"That's right," Gohan said, but then turned away when he felt a tug on his shirt. Glancing to his right, he saw Lime looking up at him with narrowed eyes and a serious scowl on her face.

"Gohan... who is this girl?"

Caught a little off guard by the sudden question from the rather irate looking girl, the Super Saiyan smiled back at her in his usual, pleasant manner, in hopes of trying to lighten her mood, "She's Videl; a friend I met at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament several weeks ago."

The brown haired girl frowned, "So... she's... just a friend to you?"

"Uh-huh. Yeah. This is... actually the third time we've met up with each other to hang out. She'll be staying over at my place while I train her, so you'll probably be seeing her around a lot." Confusion then suddenly came across his face as he continued to gaze down at his country friend, "Why do you ask?"
Looking away quickly, Lime smiled and slipped her hands behind her back, "No reason. I was just curious." When she sensed relief wash over his expression and his gaze turn to keep watching his friend's progress, the granddaughter of Mr. Lao looked up to gaze at him once again, but this time with a hint of concern. Her eyes cutting between him and the raven haired girl he was observing, for the next hour or so Lime stood back quietly and watched closely as Videl dug away at the field.

Meanwhile, positioned on a fence made of rock and stone nearby, an equally quiet Zangya and Piccolo could be seen sitting and standing there respectively, both with their arms crossed and both with firm, unchanging expressions in play. Needless to say, judging from Videl's progress, they knew she was in for one hell of a first week…

OOO

Just as Gohan had planned, the next several days following Videl's arrival to his home followed the exact same routine the young man walked her through on their very first session together.

After their lap around Mount Paozu, which led them to the outskirts of Chazke Village, where Videl took part in the second part of what would become her morning practice, the two of them then settled down for brunch at Mr. Lao's house. Upon eating their fill with the family, allowing Gohan and Lime some time to catch up, the demi-Saiyan then jogged Videl back over to his place to start her on her ki manipulation lessons.

He explained to her all of the mechanics behind the concept of energy, such as how ki was the 'latent energy' and 'fighting power' inside of a person, that it existed inside of every living being and how it could be manipulated outside of the body to perform different techniques, and how it predominantly existed in the center of each person. Because there were limits to what the body could actually do, Gohan said that it was necessary for her to learn how to control and train using her ki, and that in order to overcome her barriers she needed to strengthen it continuously.

All the energy Videl had previously lost came back to her the instant Gohan showed her she would be learning how to control her energy and immediately sunk her teeth into his lesson. He decided to start her off by getting her to grab hold of her ki to form a blast. By prompting her to draw it out and control it, even in a small form, he would be able to get her started on exercising it to strengthen it at an early stage.

Remarkably enough, Videl was able to bring out her ki in only two days of practice. This showed Gohan just how much potential she actually had in their art of fighting, as well as how committed she was to getting this skill down.

He informed his apprentice that the time between breakfast and lunch would be spent meditating, learning how to manipulate their energy, or studying. In the words of a great man; a strong warrior would be incapable of fighting at their full potential if they didn't have the proper mindset or knowledge to do so. It was a balance he was hoping to achieve over the next coming months so as to hit Videl from all sides, and being a well practiced academic himself, the demi-Saiyan was confident he could also have his friend's education covered in that period as well.

After lunch at the Son household, Gohan and Videl then had an hour break. For all great martial artists, rest was just as important an activity as their work, something that both young fighters gladly agreed with and for good reason. One, because Videl was exhausted, and two, it'd been words of advice Gohan's father had shared with him during their own hard miles of training in the Hyperbolic Time Chamber.

The pair used this portion of the day to chat and hang out, with the first few sessions of the month being spent sleeping underneath one of the property's oaks alongside a meditating Piccolo and physically present Zangya, who also decided to have a little catnap alongside the group.

It actually impressed Piccolo to see his student managing to sleep while assumed in his Ascended Saiyan state. His current state showed just how deeply immersed the young warrior was getting into his own training, even when he was focusing a lot of his attention on coaching another. He was really nailing the base from all possible angles.

Once break time was over, Gohan got Videl to work on her fighting skills against him.

The first session that they had together had been, in a few words, a real doozy of a scuffle…

XXX

"Y-You… want me to what?" the raven haired girl asked the spiky haired boy in disbelief.

Waving the bang out of his face, the young Super Saiyan 2 grinned, "I want you to come at me with everything you've got. If you can hit me, I'll congratulate you with a body shot. If you can avoid my blast, I'll reward you with another. Got it?"

The young martial artist stammered nervously. "B-But… what… HOLD ON JUST A SECOND," Videl exclaimed while waving her arms frantically and pointing at him, "I can't fight you, Gohan! You'll destroy me with just a tap of your finger… especially when you're like that!" She added to this by referring to his temporary blonde hairstyling and transformed appearance.

Gohan chuckled at her flustered expression and adjusted his wristbands, "Don't worry, Videl. I'm suppressing my ki as low as it can possibly go without breaking this state. That means not only will I be able to work hard without hurting you, I'll be getting you to fight at your absolute best as well." He then narrowed his gaze as the girl stared firmly back at him, "Listen; if you want to become as strong as us, then you're going to have to spar with me every single day. By continuing to push yourself beyond what you're capable of and using everything you've learned in all of our spars, you'll become stronger and stronger the further we go." He then gave her a serious look. "Can you do that for me?"

At first sweating up a storm and appearing anxious as hell, the human fighter quickly weighed up her chances of fighting against the boy in such an overpowered form. However, knowing she came out here to work harder than ever before, Videl quickly made up her mind on the matter and dropped into a fighting stance. Though she was trembling like a leaf, she was still raring to go.

"Alright. Let's do it, Gohan," Videl said, a smirk forming on her lips. "I'm putting all of my trust in you."

"Yeah," the half-Saiyan replied, a proud smile appearing as he watched his friend settle into full fighting form just several feet away from him. Looking at her right now, adorned in his colors and facing him down the way she was, she reminded him of what he used to be back when he first sparred with Piccolo all those years ago.

It was a wash of nostalgia that hit the Namekian as well, who was still watching the pair closely from a nearby tree. Even Zangya was paying close attention to them.

'Now,' Gohan thought, taking a deep breath and letting it out. Spreading his feet till they were shoulder width apart and letting his hands rest firmly at his sides, the boy took a moment to suppress his energy level. Upon pushing it down as low as it could possibly go, he then opened his eyes and fixed his sights upon his student. A bead of sweat formed on his brow, "Remember Videl… don't forget to dodge."
With a nod and a growl, Videl let out a hearty battle cry and charged right at her opponent. As soon as she was upon him, she opened up with a flurry of attacks; punches and kicks flying at her target in an effort to bring him down. The second her attacks were loose, Gohan began effortlessly slipping around them, presenting the girl with a moving adversary that she now had to try and catch.

Yelling out with every swing she threw, the girl attempted to outflank the blonde as she chased him across the grass, the pair circling the clearing at least three times before Gohan decided to counter attack.

Dodging a roundhouse kick, Gohan then got right up into the girl's face and, lifting his hand, threw a light palm strike into her surprised mug. The blow smacked her square in the forehead and sent the energetic youngster blasting back across the field, where she ended up tumbling along the ground for over a dozen yards. When she ended up falling behind a boulder, with a cloud of dust hanging in her wake, the demi-Saiyan thought he'd knocked her out. A split second later though, Videl came charging right back with a yell, and nothing but dirt on her clothes and a bruise on her forehead.

'Perfect. This is exactly where I want to be,' Gohan thought, smiling as he began excessively weaving around the girl's attacks once again.

Unleashing another flurry of combinations, Videl tried to at least clip the blonde in the shoulder. However, when she tried for a right overhand, she suddenly saw the boy vanish into thin air, causing her to stop for but a moment.

This was her mistake, because the instant she looked over her shoulder, she saw the boy, who'd appeared directly behind her, raise his foot and kick her in the rear, sending her flying and crashing into another boulder. When she hit the grass, the girl groaned and glared back at him.

"Keep your eye on the enemy," Gohan coached.

Groaning as she rubbed her side, Videl frowned at the Saiyan, "But you disappeared. I couldn't see you at all."

"You're going to have to learn to keep up with this kind of speed. You have to use all of your senses to keep track of your opponent... all of them," the young Super Saiyan 2 informed, a smirk appearing on his face. "If you can't see the enemy, then feel them out. And remember; don't make yourself an easy target. You have to keep moving." He then raised his hand and took aim.

"Ugh. Easier said than-WHOA!" Videl barreled out of the way, dodging a fast moving energy ball, that slammed into the boulder she'd been leaning against and slapped a perfectly shaped burn mark in its side. Jumping to her feet after her skillful evasion, the girl shot him a look, "HEY! What the hell-?"

"No time to talk," Gohan chirped, throwing another blast her way and prompting the girl to move once again. He continued lobbing energy spheres in Videl's direction, bombarding the ground when she leapt and ducked around them. "Don't just dodge, Videl. Get inside and attack!" His instruction getting through to her, the half-Saiyan fired another barrage of weak blasts, prompting the young fighter to move in as fast as she could and leap at the boy with another onslaught of attacks. However, the moment she swung in, the boy disappeared again and reappeared at her side.

Throwing a slow combo of attacks, he prompted Videl to duck a kick and slip a left jab, only to then tap her with a kick to the stomach that sent her spiraling across the field. When she hit the ground, she took up a crouched position and stared across at her instructor, panting heavily.

"Good. Keep it up," Gohan encouraged, watching the girl rub at the bruise on her face. After which she went after him once again, unleashing a combination of attacks that had the young Saiyan dodging around her in a blur. All the while the two of them were watched on by a fully invested Zangya and Piccolo, both of whom continued to observe quietly from the sidelines.

XXX

Taking full advantage of her weighted clothing, the demi-Saiyan had Videl fight him using all of the skills she had at her disposal. While pushing himself in his own exercises, he encouraged her to do her very best as well, beating her into the ground with attacks that were strong by normal human standards yet at the same time making extra certain not to seriously injure her.

He made sure to up the ante the further along they progressed.

The two of them continued this session until late afternoon, where Gohan then left a period of time at the end for Videl to work on any one of the skills she saw fit to improve; whether it was building her strength, meditating to improve her senses and state of mind, or sparring to continue polishing her fighting techniques. This period also allowed the demi-Saiyan an opportunity to work on his own training as well, where he spent time honing his techniques and building his strength. It didn't just allow him time to talk with Piccolo and learn how to use his magic materialization ability, he also had a perfect chance to practice his control over holding his Super Saiyan 2 form and using the technique Kana had given him before she left.

He began learning how to use the Instantaneous Movement technique, something he was eager to get down as soon as possible and add to his move set. It was after the first week and a half of training Videl he started practicing it.

XXX

"Are you sure about this?" Piccolo asked with a bead of sweat running down his face, the Namekian watching his student limbering up a few yards away.

Taking a few deep breaths to steady his nerves, Gohan turned back to his old sensei to see Videl also standing by and watching on nervously. After looking between the two worried faces, the demi-Saiyan shared with them a small grin, "No. But I have to start somewhere."

Nodding, the green skinned warrior then glanced over the horizon and pointed across the hills. "Remember... pick a target that's close by. Don't try to aim too far or too wide with it, otherwise you might end up somewhere you don't want to be." It was advice he learned from the memories he was able to retrieve of Kami, who knew a technique very similar in this one's design that allowed him to travel to and from the Otherworld.

Though he'd lost the ability with his other half's inception into his subconscious, the Namekian still experienced phantom flashes of his previous forms that really contributed to his wealth of knowledge.

"The dimension you will be entering will be passing you at an insane rate, so use your reflexes to slow it down. It'll be like diving into a rushing river traveling hundreds of times faster than light."

"Yeah. No problem," the demi-Saiyan replied with a chuckle, which was noticeably nervous.

Zangya, who was standing behind the boy and also watching on with interest, grinned from ear to ear.
ear when she sensed the youngster's uncertainty. "Oh-ho... this is gonna be good."

"Okay," Gohan breathed out, skipping on the spot while clapping his hands and rubbing them together. Once he was certain he'd got his blood and energy flowing, he then looked across at the two in front of him and nodded anxiously. "Wish me luck." When he saw his raven haired friend and alien trainer acknowledge his words, he then stopped jumping around enough to flex his fingers uneasily and take a stance. "Oh yeah... and Videl..." The girl perked up, "in case I forget to say this later...ow."

He then vanished in a flash of golden light...

A split second after Gohan's form disappeared completely from sight, an explosion of dust occurred about two kilometers in the direction of the mountains, a sight which immediately caught the group's attention. Acting instantly, Piccolo and Zangya took flight in the direction of the blast, with Videl being carried by the former.

When they eventually landed at the site of the disturbance, they found themselves staring at a five-foot-wide trench that'd been dug through an entire field of grass for over five hundred meters, which ended at a suspiciously human-shaped crater at the base of one of the forest covered mountains. Peering into it, Piccolo, Zangya and Videl stared blankly at the upside-down form of Gohan wedged in its center, his clothing shredded, his body covered in dirt and bruises, and a dizzy look on his bewildered face.

Groaning, the half-Saiyan that'd clearly plowed the ground with his face, spoke in a weak voice, "Missed it by that much."

Exactly five seconds later, both Zangya and Videl burst out laughing, with the latter falling onto the floor holding her sides. The Namekian meanwhile, smirked at his beaten up student.

"You're going to have to work on that, kid."

XXX

After about a hundred face-plants into mountain sides and random valleys later, including several instances where he'd ended up teleporting himself inside of several walls and to the bottom of random masses of water, Gohan started getting it down... kind of.

Sure, his teleportation skills weren't perfect, but at least he was making progress.

It was just one of those 'no pain, no gain' instances and he knew that if he preserved enough, he would eventually get it right. He sure as hell was going to abuse the hell out of this move when he eventually mastered it, so until then he was just going to keep at it until he finally got to where he needed to go in one piece.

Over the entire month, Videl's routine remained mostly the same, with Gohan changing it up every now and again to cover all of the fundamental aspects of his group's martial arts. For example, while running her lap of the region at four in the morning, he had her hit the mountain slopes with boulders, in which she would spend a segment of that session dragging them up the side over and over again to build up her leg muscles. To push her even further, he even had her swim long distances in the lake with her weighted clothing on, and to coincide with her ki control lessons, he had her sparring with him blindfolded so that she could master ki reading along with her other fighting abilities.

As the days rolled on and Gohan kept pushing his friend, he periodically increased the weight on her clothing, an act that not only allowed him practice with Piccolo's technique, but also increased the difficulty of Videl's training.

It was an incredibly taxing time for the raven haired girl, who at first believed she wasn't making any progress at all. Sure, every once in a while she felt like it was getting easier, but every time she felt like she was making some kind of headway, Gohan would just up the regimen and it would become harder once again.

However, while she sweated away and worked her skills into the ground, the three powerful fighters watching her from the sidelines began to notice and sense remarkable improvements in her abilities.

One thing certainly became clear to all of them; she was an amazing prodigy.

XXX

(A few weeks later - Evening)

Controlling her breathing patterns, Videl extended both hands out and caught the golden sphere of energy that flew at her like an arrow. Managing to hold it above her palms while it pulsed away, the raven haired fighter then took a few seconds to focus before, with a grunt of effort, she launched it back in the direction it'd come, where it was promptly caught by Gohan in the same manner.

For the past couple of hours the two youngsters had been at this; passing a ball of energy between them, catching it using their own energy, and reversing its direction, at the same time keeping it in a state of constant flight and form. Even though it seemed like just some sort of fun game they were playing, it was actually a really effective form of training that not only focused on physical exercise through control, but was also a great way for the two to harmonize their energies and find equilibrium between mind and matter.

While the demi-Saiyan in charge of the session felt that this was an excellent way to work on his own control in the area of ki, as he was currently assumed in a suppressed Super Saiyan 2 state, this activity was mostly for the benefit of his student. Through continuous repetition, Videl had been able to gain a firm grasp of the concept of energy manipulation, and was doing incredibly well in catching, deflecting, blocking and absorbing ki blasts of varying degrees and forms.

This exercise of 'playing tennis' with an energy sphere was one of the many ways she was strengthening said control.

Picking up speed in their passing, the two martial artists continued hurling the attack between them. As this was going on, in the background Piccolo and Zangya were busy doing their own little thing, sitting across from one another with their arms and legs folded and their eyes tightly shut. The two were apparently wrapped up in a session of their own design, a really intense one from the looks on their faces, and were also being watched over by a currently present Mirai Trunks, who was adorned in his vest, trousers and blue jacket.

Looking between the two adults on the grass in front of him and then up towards Gohan and his partner, the lavender haired time-traveler sprouted a smile and nodded his head in approval.

"With Gohan and everyone here… and with Cell gone, I know things are going to be alright from now on." After witnessing the events that'd occurred following the whole Kana incident, he knew for certain that this world was in good hands.
The proof was right in front of him, hard at work with his best friend.

Catching the ball of energy firmly in one hand, Videl concentrated on holding it while it spun above her palm. Gritting her teeth as it hovered in place, the girl then focused her ki around it and began compressing the basketball sized sphere. Within a matter of seconds, the attack popped out of existence and the raven haired girl collapsed onto her backside. Panting heavily from the effort, she wiped the sweat from her brow and looked up, where she saw Gohan stop in front of her with a smile on his face and his hands on his hips.

Grinning at the Super Saiyan 2, Videl raised a hand, "I think... I'm gonna call it a day."

"No problem," Gohan nodded back, before reverting back to his base form with a quick exhale and beaming at his companion, "You worked yourself pretty hard this morning. You've definitely earned a good night's rest." He then offered a hand to her.

Immediately reaching up and taking it, Videl was pulled to her feet. "Thanks, Gohan." After dusting her gi down and adjusting her wristband, the spent youngster then turned her attention to Piccolo and Zangya, both of whom were still sitting across from one another, sweating and trembling from head to toe. Though the sight of the two of them bleeding bullets like that would have initially puzzled the young fighter, because she'd been at this for a month and a bit already, she knew exactly what was going on. "Those two are image training again?"

"Uh-huh. They've been at it since the end of lunch," Gohan replied, placing his hands on his hips. "That's good. It means they're really working hard."

"I wouldn't be surprised. Those two definitely seem like the stubborn types of fighters."

"You can say that again," the demi-Saiyan chuckled. "I've definitely seen Piccolo image training many times before, since he was the one who taught me how to, but I've never seen Zangya train like this." He then paused for a couple of seconds, "Come to think of it, I don't think I've ever seen her train, period." To be honest, it was a refreshing change of pace. For the first time ever, he was able to see how a character like the Hera actually worked on her skills in her free time and, judging from the expression on her face, she was really having a ball against Piccolo through their telekinetic link.

"So... they exercise their bodies using only their minds by fighting against a mental image of their opponent inside their heads?" Videl asked while glancing across at her instructor, seeing the boy nod in response. "That's kind of like shadow sparring, isn't it?"

"In a way. The image they fight against is a mental projection created and controlled by their opponent's ki. The resulting mental battle stirs up the circulation in the users' bodies, getting them to exercise their abilities physically as well as mentally, and requires the combatant to continuously project their energy at a controlled rate. That's why at the end of every session we're always exhausted and out of breath, since the fights we get into in the mental world can be just as grueling as a fight in the physical plain," Gohan informed, looking across at the girl to see her nod in understanding.

"And you say you can train like this by yourself or with another person?"

"Yep. It's a really good way to keep your mind sharp and your techniques polished. Though it is effective as an exercise, you still need to actually move around and do stuff to keep your body in full fighting form. You can't focus on one thing without working on the other," Gohan informed, a grin forming on his face.
Videl beamed right back and nudged him in the side, "Hey. When I get good enough and I've mastered control over my ki, I want to have a go at image training against you. No holds barred. Alright?"

"Whatever you say, Videl," the demi-Saiyan chuckled, "But I warn you, it can get pretty intense in there… especially against an opponent who's far more experienced than you."

"I think I can handle it," the adolescent replied with equal enthusiasm, meeting the smile from the spiky haired young warrior.

For the next couple of minutes the two of them stood there, watching the silence permeate between both Piccolo and Zangya. In no time at all, the audience began to question who was actually winning in the one on one fight taking place inside the link the pair had established.

It was obvious the woman was the more powerful of the two and probably an equal in skill. However, she'd been trapped in a star for over ten thousand years, whereas Piccolo had lived a total of two lifetimes with two other Namekians sharing his body, both of which brought an insurmountable level of experience and pain to him. The man knew how to play mind games just as well as anyone in their group and was as stubborn an opponent as they came.

Between the two of them, in a battle confined to a mental plain where there only limits were their strengths of will and life force, it was impossible to tell which of them would come out on top.

The trio got their answer seconds later when Zangya's eyes suddenly snapped open and the young girl gave a gasp of shock, collapsing onto her hands and heaving ragged breaths of air, as if she'd almost been drowned. Her awakening was shortly followed by Piccolo, the Namekian also reacting in a similar manner, only he was able to keep his arms crossed.

Sweating up a storm, the Hera glared up at her sparring partner in frustration, "That was a cheap shot. I didn't know you could use eye beams."

"I haven't had to use them for a while, but it definitely got the job done, don't you agree?" Piccolo asked with a smirk forming on his face. "You have to be patient with these kinds of fights. Unlike you, I don't jump in every time my opponent lets his guard down. If you rush in blindly without a plan of attack, you're likely to fall victim for whatever trap your opponent has laid out for you."

"Your back was turned!"

"And you went for it just like I knew you would," Piccolo replied with a smirk. "That's what happens when you get frustrated."

Snarling, the orange haired girl put her fist into the ground before standing up. There was a slight wobble in her legs the moment she straightened her posture, but she was able to correct it, "You, green man… are an asshole."

Piccolo snorted, finding a retort for the girl's response despite being thoroughly drained as well, "I'll take that as a compliment."

Folding her arms, the orange haired young woman turned her back on him and stormed off, deciding to go sulk over by the house.

Trunks chuckled when he saw her leave, "Man. Never thought I'd see her get worked up."

Getting to his feet as well, the Namekian turned to Gohan to see him beaming up at him, "Training done?"
"For now," the half-Saiyan replied cheerily, which was matched by a bright smile from Videl. "You zapped her when she tried to drop down from above, didn't you?"

"It was inspired," Piccolo replied, giving the boy a sly look. "Something I learned while fighting against you."

Remembering all the times he'd been hit by Piccolo's eye lasers during their training for the Saiyans, Gohan then led the march back towards the house. Around the other side of it, the group found Chi-Chi already laying out a gourmet feast for her family and their guests, Trunks included. Beckoning them over when she saw the group stroll into view, she then began pouring them all a serving of rice, at the same time Gohan, Videl and Piccolo sat around the outdoor dining area.

When the two demi-Saiyans and the human martial artist had their food served to them, on his end of the table Piccolo received a rather pleasant surprise when a glass of ice water was set down in front of him along with a full jug. When he looked up, he saw Chi-Chi give him a smile and a nod, before quickly moving back to deal out the rest of her sides.

The Namekian raised a brow, before glancing down at the glass of refreshing aqua in front of him. "She's in a surprisingly good mood." Not wanting to question the kindness of her gesture, the man accepted the serving gladly.

When Trunks made himself comfortable, he too found a dish of rice and sides sitting in front of him, and beamed across at the woman that'd gone out of her way to cook for all of them. "Thanks so much, Chi-Chi."

"You're welcome, Trunks," the mother replied with a beaming expression as she took up another bowl for herself. "It's always a pleasure to have you and the rest of the family over... well... most of them anyway."

Getting what the woman was saying, the lavender haired Saiyan chuckled, "Yeah. I admit my dad can be a bit overbearing and impatient sometimes, but I know he's still a great guy deep down." It was a remark that had Piccolo pause and stare for a few seconds. "I wouldn't trade him for anyone else in the world."

“Well... that's good," Chi-Chi replied with a nod. "I'm glad to see that you care about him a lot. If I'm being completely honest, I think Vegeta really cares about you as well. He's just too proud and stuck up to admit it."

Smiling at the woman for her kind words, Trunks collected up his chopsticks and prepared to dig in. When all of the boys and girls around the table clapped their hands together and said their thanks to the spirits, they then dug in all at once. The Son mother, Videl and their lavender haired companion ate at a languid pace, pulling up their bowls and putting whatever they wanted onto the dishes in front of them. Their pace was matched by the one set by Piccolo, who quietly drank his water through his straw, which he slowly consumed and savored every drop.

Of course, in stark contrast to the speed the majority of the troop had set, there was one exception to the above who'd decided to make this meal his next conquest.

Just like his father, Gohan speedily fished for several more sides from the center of the table and popped them into his bowl. Upon which he then began inhaling the food at his usual rate of speed shoveling, a sight that had Videl stare and giggle when the boy pulled away with his lips covered in rice.

"You Saiyans really love your food, huh?" the raven haired martial artist asked, drawing the boy's "Yeah. We sure do. But I think it's because of mum's cooking that me and dad eat so much more than we're supposed to," Gohan replied, at the same time sparing his mum a thousand megawatt smile. "We've gone out to tons of restaurants over the years, but out of every single one of them there hasn't been a single chef that's been able to match mum's cooking skills. She's the best in the world."

Chi-Chi's expression warmed at her son's compliments, "Why thank you, Gohan."

Videl leaned over to smile at the home owner as well, "Yeah. Your food is really amazing, Chi-Chi. Thank you so much."

The woman's eyes twinkled, "You're welcome too, Videl." She then gave an inward squeal at the prospect of grandchildren, a twitch in her expression that didn't go amiss by the ever observant Piccolo.

As the group continued to feast and Gohan had gone through two more servings, the half-Saiyan then had his attention pulled over to the house. It was there he saw Zangya standing against the wall with her arms folded and a neutral gaze set upon the group.

After looking at her and back towards the table a couple of times, the demi-Saiyan smiled in her direction and shuffled over, "Hey, Zangya. Why don't you come join us?"

His call catching her by surprise, the previously aggrivated blue-skinned fighter blinked, "Huh? You want me to sit with you guys?" They had a pretty full table already. However, looking across at Gohan, she saw the youngster make a space beside him and gesture to it gleefully.

"Yeah. Mum made us plenty of food. Why don't you come and have some with us," the young warrior continued, his exclamations drawing gazes from Piccolo and Trunks, before they too turned to the woman standing across the way.

Appearing hesitant at first, Zangya looked away, "I… don't know if I should." She was aware of their history. After everything she'd done, she wasn't so sure if she would be welcomed or not.

Gohan beamed warmly at her, "I can't eat knowing that you're standing over there all by yourself while the rest of us are here. Even Piccolo is sitting with us and having a drink." He gestured to the Namekian, who merely gave a grunt and turned back to his water. "If he can sit with us without being bothered, then I'm sure you can eat with us too."

Giving the boy a long stare of surprise, the Hera regarded his proposition with a few more moments of thought. Once a full minute ticked by and the woman passed the happily smiling child a couple more tentative glances, Zangya eventually conceded and slowly made her way over.

She then had a bowl of rice held out in front of her and looked across at the young Saiyan to see him still smiling.

"Here. You must be pretty hungry," the boy spoke.

Nodding gratefully, Zangya took the bowl and chopsticks. Picking at a slice of pork, she then brought it to her lips and nibbled on it. Giving a few testing bites of the rest, a small smile quickly formed on her face, "Mm… it's delicious." She glanced across at the group, whom she saw was eyeing her intently. Looking from one face to the next, the blue-skinned woman then became slightly nerve rattled and looked away, frowning stubbornly. "Th-Thanks." She then started to eat at a livelier pace and remained quiet for the rest of the evening.

Smiling when he saw the woman get more comfortable, Gohan switched to his own meal and continued to devour it, at the same time sharing small talk with both Videl and Trunks.

As tea time rolled on, things seemed to file out nicely for the group outside the Son household. Against the backdrop of Mount Paozu and the sun setting gently over the horizon, the serene scene around the table was nothing short of perfect. Eventually, once most of the food had been put away and Gohan and Zangya were in the process of finishing off their last servings, the lavender haired Saiyan accompanying them looked down at his empty plate anxiously. After which he then addressed the company with the announcement he'd shared with the other members of their party.

"I'll be leaving in two days," Mirai said, drawing everyone's attention over to him in an instant. "Now that I know everything is going to be okay, I believe that my work here is done."

"You're going back to your own time?" Gohan asked.

"Yep." A sad smile pulled across the half-Saiyan's lips, "Since this'll probably be the last time we'll ever get to see each other again, I'm visiting everyone from here to Kame House and letting them know that I'll be going this Saturday. My mum's probably worried sick about me back home, so I don't want to keep her waiting anymore than I already have."

Processing his words quickly, Chi-Chi nodded in understanding, "Since you two are the only ones left, I'm not surprised." The raven haired woman straightened up in her seat and, reaching over, patted the young man on the shoulder. "Be sure to take good care of her, okay?"

"I will. And I'll be sure to visit the rest of you when I get back as well," the young man replied, giving the Son mother a warm smile, "Thank you, Chi-Chi."

"We'll be there to see you off on the day, kid," Piccolo also spoke up from his end of the table, earning a grateful nod from the time traveling hero. "Count on it."

"I appreciate that. Thanks."

While the group beamed at the lavender haired warrior, who they feel had become just as much a part of their family as all the other friends they'd made, Gohan then realized a very important fact. Grinning at the demi-Saiyan who was his student and friend in the future, the energetic, orange-wearing fighter then stood out of his seat and threw the man a competitive glare.

"Hey Trunks." When everyone turned to the young warrior, they saw him back away from the table and instantly transform into a Super Saiyan. The explosion of golden energy around him kicked up a wind that ruffled everyone's hair and clothing, and brought a round of surprised looks to the people sitting at the table. "You and I never had a chance to fight during the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament. How about you and I have one for the road… just to wish you luck and give you something to remember us by?"

The glimmer in Gohan's eyes gave Trunks all the confidence he needed to make a quick decision.

Smirking, the lavender haired Saiyan nodded back at his counterpart, "Sure. Why not?" It would be awesome to spar with his old master one last time, even though the ages had been reversed. While the kid was unquestionably stronger than him, even as a first level Super Saiyan, Trunks was positive he would be able to get a lot out of this.

Pleased at the man's answer, Gohan looked down at Videl and smiled. "Want to see how a pair of Super Saiyans fight?"

The raven haired girl nodded eagerly, "Yeah."

Though she didn't want to admit it, even Zangya was interested to see how the two half-Saiyan males fought. Sitting at the table with her bowl of rice in hand, the orange haired woman focused all her attention on them and watched as they prepped themselves for battle.

Chi-Chi gave her eldest boy a proud look, "Be careful out there, son." She then winked in is direction. "Don't hurt your friend too badly."

Grinning, the transformed youngster then saw Trunks leap out of his chair and rush out into the fields surrounding their home, where he immediately jumped to his Super Saiyan 2nd Grade level and sprang into the air. With Gohan joining him in the sky, the two fighters then secured a position several stories above the ground safely out of reach of the spectators. Once there, the warriors faced each other down in their glowing forms and began to circle, the sound of their auras echoing across the wide open prairies.

"Let's make this one count," Gohan said, his teal eyes shimmering with excitement.

Trunks grinned back at the boy with equal enthusiasm, "Don't worry. I won't disappoint you."

Then, with Piccolo, Videl, Zangya and Chi-Chi watching from the table below, the pair rocketed towards one another and began clashing in an explosive display of speed, skill, and strength.

The sound of thunderclaps ringing out across the plains, the audience looked on with warm expressions in play as the two companions from different eras traded blows for what would be their first and last time.

From one point of view, the spar was just a rival match between two incredibly powerful warriors. From another… it was a fond farewell between two friends.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Woot. I hope you guys liked this chapter.

Here, we see Videl begin her training under Gohan, starting off with the oh-so-famous Turtle School routine. It'll take her a while to get up to the same level the other human Z-fighters are at, but she has plenty of time to get this right.

About seven years to be exact.

Okay, so I won't be having the montage just yet. I've managed to fit one more arc into the series that I'm sure you're all going to enjoy. Right now we've started the training period.

During the seven year gap (which is now), we have the Junior Division Arc coming up next. I don't have to tell you what's involved with this arc. After this we have the Zeru Arc, which is close to the end of the seven year gap, then just before the 'Gohan Goes to Highschool' period we have the God of Storms Arc, where the Z-fighters encounter their first God opponent who's from the same realm as Beerus (you're going to like how they fight this one). After this we have Gohan's high school period, followed by the Saiyan Invasion Arc, Varax Arc, Dabura Arc, Kidnapper Arc, and then finally the Doomsday Arc.
Author's Note: Moving on to the next chapter and the very first World Martial Arts arc in this story. This one features Gohan and Videl participating in the Junior Division, with a little surprise waiting for them.

Seeing as how I've moved into this arc, I think I should put some numbers to the questions for comparisons sake. I'll use Kana's numbers to help arrange this:

(Saiyan Saga):

Saibaman – 1,220 riki

Radditz – 1,220 riki

Nappa – 5,000 riki

Vegeta – 19,000 riki

Krillin – 300 riki

Krillin (Post-One-Year-Training) – 1,700 riki

Krillin (Unlocked Potential on Namek) – 23,000 riki

Gohan – 5 riki

Gohan (Enraged) – 1,350 riki

Gohan (Post-One-Year-Training) – 1,600 riki

Gohan (Unlocked Potential on Namek) – 24,000 riki

(Present):

Videl (Pre-Training) – 130 riki

Videl (Post-One-Year-Training) – 1,300 riki

Videl (Unlocked Potential) – 15,000 riki

Gohan – 16,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 200,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 375,000,000 riki

Krillin – 8,000,000 riki

Piccolo – 85,000,000 riki

Zangya – 150,000,000 riki

Considering how far everyone has come, a power level like Radditz's isn't that big of a milestone anymore, especially when the Z-fighters know how to train their ki to get stronger so much better now. It's kind of funny how far everyone has come since the good old days.

I just wanted to write this up to see how everyone compares now. In the words of TFS Vegeta, power levels are BS.

---

Dragonball Z

Legacies

Big Day Out

(Two Days Later)

Making sure to leave a note on the fridge telling his mother that he was 'going to Videl's place for a visit', Gohan quickly gathered up the money he would need for the day and headed off. Adorned in his father's signature orange and blue gi and a big smile on his face, the youngster took flight into the still dark morning sky and immediately headed straight in the direction of the island where the World Martial Arts Tournament was being held. He left his home full of glee and vigor, but just as he was soaring over the forests of his homeland towards the coastline, he suddenly felt a shadow latch onto him.

"So… where's the bad little boy sneaking out to this time?"

Looking over his shoulder in surprise, Gohan saw Zangya flying close behind him, her arms folded over her chest and an amused grin on her face. The look she threw him was one of mischief; one that reflected the underhanded nature of this little escapade of his.

"Oh. Good morning, Zangya."

The instant she was addressed the orange haired woman casually pulled up alongside the teen and set a comfortable pace next to him, the wind rushing past them and waving their hair about. "Normally you would be out on the grasslands, bench pressing mountains and kicking the shit out of yourself already, but… if I didn't know any better… I'd say you were bailing on today's session." A sly smile formed on her face. "Giving up already?"

Gohan chuckled, "What? Of course not. What in the world gave you that idea?"

"Well, the fact that you're a hundred miles away from home and still moving at jet speed kind of tells me that you're either abandoning your morning training routine or you've got something else fun planned," Zangya replied with a shrug. "Either way I'm interested."

"Let's just say I've got some family business to take care of."

"Is it of the boring variety or the fun variety?"

"B. Fun variety."

"Goodie."

The demi-Saiyan setting the speed gave her a roguish grin of his own, "Are you sure you don't want to be hanging around at my place looking after my baby brother?"

"Your mother is fine taking care of the brat on her own. Believe me, I know. I've seen how she operates," Zangya said, flashbacks of watching the woman dice up an entire tuna the size of a living room with only a carving knife, while at the same time blindly hanging washing on the line with the basket strapped to her back appearing in her head. "She's a super mum. I highly doubt she needs somebody like me, a former space pirate, shadowing her and throwing her off her game."

"If you say so. Still, if you ever feel like turning around…"

"Not a chance. So… where are we going today, dad?" Zangya asked in a playful-slash-mocking tone of voice.

"We're going to an event that my father competed in many times while he was still a kid; the World Martial Arts Tournament on the South-East islands."

"Is this anything like that Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament that you and your companions entered a year ago?"

"Yeah. Only this one is tamer and focuses more on the fighting than the 'fun-house' the event is set in. Think of it as a giant kickboxing tournament where there are no ropes," Gohan replied, trying to describe the scenario for her as best as he could.

"Sounds fun. Is there any particular reason why you're entering this thing now and why you haven't invited your mum to it?" Zangya asked, rolling over so that she was flying on her back and looking across at the boy at the same time. "Is it because you're looking to blow off some steam? Or is it something else?" She then took on a momentary look of surprise and then grinned cheekily. "Or are you using this as an excuse to go on a date with Videl?" The name rolled off of her tongue in a very serpent like way.

The question caused Gohan to balk so badly in shock that he actually lost control of his flight and literally spun out of the sky. When he eventually course corrected and flew back to the altitude the laughing Zangya was gliding at, the blushing demi-Saiyan looked across at her in dismay. "WHAT? A d-date?"

"Hey, there's no shame in admitting it. You're a young, tough guy with an alien heritage who's growing up fast and… let's be honest here, she's a pretty strong runt herself with a spunky character and a mean kick. You two are perfect for each other."

Scowling slightly, the boy huffed and looked ahead of him again with a glare, "I'm telling you, it's not like that. We're just… friends." Zangya picked up the moment of hesitation and spotted the blush on his face. Shaking his head, Gohan quickly regained his bearings, "Besides… I'm participating in the event for other reasons. My mum needs the money to raise Goten and, even though I'm working, looking after two Saiyan children will be really hard for her. So I'm going to participate in the Junior Division and win first place to get the prize money."

"Junior Division?" Zangya murmured, finding it strange that the strongest boy in the universe would be signing up to play in such a minor league.

That was seriously cutting his skills down the sides.

Gohan rolled his eyes, "New rules of the tournament. They put that in the same time Hercule Satan stepped into the ring for the first time. Apparently it was a decision made by the board in response to the public growing sour at the idea of kids participating in the same league as adults. While that's all well and good, frankly I think that's a little bit unfair. My dad and Krillin were fighting in that tournament ever since they were my age and nobody had any problems with it back then."

"Hey. Times change," Zangya said, looking up towards the sky with a frown while continued to fly on her back. "In my experience, I've always had the ability to force change whenever something I didn't like happened. Bojack really had his heart set on that kind of movement; a universe where his dreams could become reality and he could claim whatever he wanted. But after years of pursuing that ideal and being stuck inside of a star with nobody but those four idiots to talk too, I started having second thoughts about my life."

The half-Saiyan scoffed, "Destroying worlds and conquering civilizations fell out of taste for you?"

"Yeah," Zangya murmured, glaring down her body as the pair flew along. She didn't even falter when she sensed the boy's eyes on her. "I'd take it all back if I could… all of it… but I can't.
Bojack was an asshole and a monster. If we didn't do what he said or if we didn't live up to his insane expectations, then he would have killed all of us right there on the spot."

Hearing this reminded Gohan of another particular tyrant who killed people as a kindness and viewed everyone beneath him as trash. The thought of the pale-skinned alien sent a chill through his spine and immediately had the boy try to rid his mind of those memories, "You did everything you could in order to survive."

"Mmm," Zangya nodded, before then looking across at the half-Saiyan and taking notice of the sun starting to rise over the distant mountains behind him, which were now slowly transforming into lowlands. "I'm grateful he's gone. The others too. They were willing to follow that bastard to the ends of the universe and burn every single planet in their way to get there, but me… even though I believed that I'd gotten swept up in their power-hungry madness to the point of blindly following his orders, all I was really searching for was a way out. A chance to escape." The woman then spared the boy next to her a smile and nodded. "You gave me that chance… and I… I'm really grateful to you for sparing my life, Gohan. Thank you."

Gohan, feeling his heart thump at the woman's sincere sounding words, smiled across at her.
"You're welcome, Zangya." Seeing her right herself so that she was flying normally with her arms at her sides, the half-Saiyan looked ahead of him and focused on their destination. "My father always believed in giving people a second chance and that having compassion could be a big strength in our line of work."

"Your father sounds like a good man," Zangya chuckled, also looking ahead of her thoughtfully.

Grinning, the youngster glanced at his companion once again, "I plan on becoming as strong a fighter and as great a man as he was. I will do everything I can to live up to his legacy." Seeing her eyes focus on him, Gohan continued to speak. "You know… you remind me a lot of some of the other members of our group who used to be our enemies. They were pretty hardcore bad guys too.
But after so many years of knowing them and fighting alongside them, they became some of our closest friends."

"Really?"

The demi-Saiyan nodded. "It would be really awesome if… you became our friend as well." His eyes shone with a clear sign of hope. "I really enjoy spending time with you, Zangya."

The blue-skinned woman beamed at his statement, "You know what… I think I will… if you'll permit me of course."

Gohan nodded, "Sure. No problem."

Feeling a lot lighter than before, the Hera-seijin sped up enthusiastically and once more turned to gaze at the approaching horizon. "I'll do my best to fit in and make up for all the trouble I've caused you. Kami knows I've made my share of mistakes in my life. But don't expect much from me too soon. I'm… still trying to get used to all the goody-two-shoe-ness of this planet."

"Don't worry too much about it," Gohan chuckled, shaking his head at the same time, "Vegeta's been with us even longer than you and he's still trying to adjust. By contrast, you've made much more progress in eight months than he has in five years. He finds fitting in a lot more bothersome than anything else."

By this point in time, the two had passed the coast and were now traveling over wide expanses of sea and islands. As the wind whipped at their hair and the pair continued covering the distance between them and their final destination, both Gohan and Zangya was allowed a comfortable moment of silence until the Hera decided to speak up again.

"I think your friends might take a little while longer to warm up to me."

"Give them some time. I'm sure they'll come around sooner or later."

OOO

Several minutes later, the island that the Tenkaichi Budokai was being hosted on pulled into view. Adjusting their trajectory and dodging traffic so as to avoid a humorous midair collision, the pair quickly descended to ground level and honed in on the nearest highway. The moment they touched down at a busy intersection, startling the heck out of a bunch of people crossing that area, the two of them then began a leisurely wander of the roads.

As the hours ticked by and more and more people started to arrive on the landmass, both Gohan and Zangya quickly saw exactly what was involved with this whole tournament thing. Though he'd never attended any of his father's matches or saw any previous fights on the television for that matter, the demi-Saiyan noticed that the atmosphere was almost exactly identical to the one from the Intergalactic Martial Arts competition.

The crowds were vast and the entertainment was plentiful. Stalls, restaurants, and fair rides lined the roads in all directions, and no matter which way they turned the pair found their sights flocked by dozens upon dozens of civilians. After only a few minutes of exploring the thoroughfares and footpaths the pair had half a mind to ditch traditional etiquette and fly the rest of the way to the stadium.

However, not wanting to draw any attention to themselves, they stuck to the ground and just made their way through the old-fashioned way.

Amidst all the chaos and growing excitement, the two of them were able to stop for a quick bite to eat, where Gohan gorged himself on restaurant food while Zangya ate at her usual pace, yet maintained the decency to look surprised at the amount the boy was able to put away in one sitting.

It wasn't long before they happened across the outer wall surrounding the main venue of the competition and with their destination fixed they started trudging their way towards the entrance.

While making their way towards the archway, the pair's attention perked up when they spotted a familiar figure already standing by the wall and waiting for them. The sight of his white cape and towering form caused a smile to tug at Gohan's lips. "Yo, Piccolo. What's up?"

Eyes cracking open, the Namekian smiled down at his student, "Not much, kid. Just waiting for you to show up." He then took notice of the orange haired woman standing alongside the teen and frowned, "Oh. You're here too?"
"Hey, green man," Zangya greeted with a smirk, "Didn't expect to see you out in public."

"Funny. I can say the same thing about you," the demi-Saiyan's mentor shot back, his eyes narrowing somewhat. "Did you come to compete or are you just here to observe?" He was also going to ask whether she was here to do neither of those things, but he wisely chose to reserve judgment until after the tournament was half-way finished.

The woman coyly flipped her hair over her shoulder, "Unless there's a challenge, I'm not interested. Perhaps next time when the rest of your friends are here. I'd rather see how this competition is done before deciding to participate myself."

"Hmph," Piccolo grunted, before then glancing down at his student to see him grinning up at him cheekily. Seeing that the Son wasn't at all put off by the presence of his alien tagalong, the Namekian could relax a little knowing that the boy was okay with her. "It can get pretty intense in there. Are you ready?"

"Hey, if I can take on somebody as scary as Cell, then a big setup like this is nothing for me," Gohan replied confidently.

"Good. Then let's get you signed up." With a wave of his cape, the trio turned in the direction of the ongoing road and continued following the wall to the entrance.

When they arrived there, the group found themselves standing by a massive gateway with all the embellishments expected of such a prestigious event. The design of the points bearing a very temple like appearance that seemed all too familiar to one of them, the trio gave the arch a momentary once over before moving to the nearby desk, where two tournament officials could be seen sitting and taking down names for the competition.

When the line cleared, Gohan saw his chance and approached. "Hello there. I'd like to sign up for the Junior Division, please."

The monk with the mustache looked across at the eleven-year-old and smiled, "Of course, young man. And your name is…?"

"Gohan. Son Gohan."

"Son Gohan. Very good," the man scribbled down on the sheet. Upon which he then blinked and glanced up at the boy in the orange and blue gi. Taking a moment to inspect his uniform, his attention then fixed on the youngster's kindly face. "You… wouldn't happen to be related to Son Goku, would you? The former World Martial Arts Champion?"

The spiky haired youngster chuckled and scrubbed his head nervously, "Y-Yeah… actually. I'm… his son."

This declaration had the two officials beam and the taller of the two with the thick eyebrows nod in acknowledgement, "Well, it is truly a pleasure to see you're competing here today. I hope you put on a good show for us out there."

"Thank you, sir. That's very kind of you."

It was then the mustached official took notice of the other pair of oddly dressed fighters behind him, "Are… your two friends competing as well?"

"Oh no. They're just here to watch today," Gohan replied, but then leaned over with an inquisitive look. "Umm… would it… be possible for them to get a couple of seats in the stadium. I'm not sure
"If they're with you then that shouldn't be a problem," the thin official stated quickly. "The two of them can stand and watch from the stadium's walkway."

"Oh. That's great. Thanks," Gohan chirped, making sure they got all his details down before then being given instructions of where to go. Upon receiving them he then turned towards Zangya and Piccolo. "Got it."

"Next time you're going to be fighting in the big leagues," the Namekian informed with a smirk. "This'll be a good practice bout for you."

"And for Videl as well," the half-Saiyan replied as he slowly lead them in through the towering gateway. "I'm here to fight her just as much as I'm here to win the prize money. Think of it as killing two Saibamen with one blast."

If Piccolo had the good graces to laugh he would have. Unfortunately he didn't. Nor did Zangya. However, the former did give the kid an amused smirk at his old time reference while the woman merely strolled along at her own pace. When they passed through the gates and began making their way towards the courtyard, where all of the main fighters were set to gather for the preliminary selection process, the highway emptied out. It became smooth sailing the rest of the way across the grounds and after passing through another gateway, the trio soon happened upon the main building area.

Just before they could go through the corridor up ahead though, another familiar face stepped into view from the changing room and Gohan grinned when he recognized her, "Videl! Hey!" The girl was quick to spot him and when she did, a brilliant smile appeared on her face.

"Gohan! It's about time!" She quickly rushed over to him and stopped before her three trainers. Well... two trainers and one audience member. Either way all of them were important figures in her life and the raven haired girl had no hesitation in acknowledging all of them with a smile. "I knew you were going to show up sooner or later."

"Yeah. Did you come here with your dad?"

"Split a jet. Could have flown here myself, but..." She sighed and rolled her eyes, "He wanted to spend some quality time with his little girl before the big day. Personally, I thought it was a great flight. This time he wasn't messing around and showing off in front of the stewardesses, and kept his volume level to a minimum. He can be a really awesome parent when he's not on camera and being his usual self. Of course..."

"All of that changed when you finally got off the plane?" He saw his friend slump over with a proverbial raincloud forming overhead, earning a sympathetic smile from the demi-Saiyan. "And you decided to bail on him?"

"Thank Kami I can move super-quick now," Videl groaned, before then looking back up at the kind boy with misfortune written all over her face.

Seeing the tears at the corners of her eyes, Gohan reached over and gently laid a hand on her shoulder, which he rubbed comfortingly. "Parents. Am I right?" His question earned a nod from the tough girl, whom the half-Saiyan stepped away from and surveyed from head to toe. "You're wearing your orange and blue gi? Far out."

"Yeah. It's still weighted, but I can't really feel it anymore," the martial artist replied while flexing her arms. Springing on her toes and taking a stance, she threw a swift combo of punches and grinned at her best friend. "This is good."

"You sure you don't want to wear something else?"

At this, Videl shook her head firmly and looked at the boy with certainty and confidence burning in her sparkling blue eyes. "I want the world to know the person who trained me; the real strongest man in the universe, the one who helped me out when I was in a trouble, and the very same boy who I-" She then swallowed her tongue when she realized what she was about to say and stammered, "Uh… I mean… the person I've come to respect and admire… and become my best friend."

Gohan grinned happily at her words and nodded, "That really means a lot, Videl. Thanks."

"No problem," the slightly blushing girl exclaimed, bringing a fist up and jabbing it against his chest. She then gestured over her shoulder, "Come on. Registration is closing soon so they'll probably be calling all of the Junior Division fighters in a few minutes."

The boy gave an understanding look. "We should get going then." He then turned to look at Piccolo and Zangya, both of whom were listening to the pair with interest. "I'll see you guys at the end, alright?"

"Break a leg," Piccolo wished in his usual, cordial manner.

The orange haired woman chuckled, "He means the other kids. Show no mercy."

Laughing at the woman's joke, Gohan and Videl waved and parted ways with the two older fighters, scampering down the hall and disappearing from sight. This pretty much left the two alien warriors standing at the entrance for several minutes in silence before they eventually decided to head up to the stadium and find their spots.

Unbeknownst to the group of four, who'd been so invested in wishing each other luck, they failed to notice the small, shadowy figure that'd been watching them from behind a nearby tree. Draped in a brown, hooded cloak, with only their chin and mouth appearing from over the thick collar of the traveling article, the person had been sure to keep their presence hidden completely from sight. Even as other fighters started to file past them, the person remained, before then deciding to follow in after the two young warriors.

OOO

(Over the next hour)

The World Martial Arts Tournament was really starting to live up to its name. Fighters from all across the globe had turned up and were continuing to arrive by the boatful to compete, all of them proficient in different forms of combat and all of them adorned in a variety of different costumes. Much like the Intergalactic Tournament months before, the promise of prize money had drawn in a bucket load of competitors. While most of them were definitely in it for the rewards being promised should they make it to first, second or third places on the chart, only a small number of them were really here for a shot at the title.

It was a pretty big show they were putting on and everyone was eager to get started. The sound of the crowds filing into the stadium just over the rooftops could be heard filtering over the rambunctious groups of martial artists. This was all the sign that was needed to let everyone know that the main events were just about to start.
"It's a shame the two of us are underage. I'd really like to fight it out on the ring with the adults," Gohan murmured in disappointed.

"Yeah. Same here," Videl replied with a bit of a frown as well as she watched the adults warming up across the courtyard, "Maybe it will be different next time. But for now we're just going to have to be content with blowing through the kids in the Junior Division. It was a piece of cake last time I was here and it looks like it's going to be a piece of cake this year as well."

"Well… until you reach the finals of course," Gohan remarked, at the same time grinning across at his raven haired student. "Don't forget; you've now got me to contend with."

"And you can bet that I'm going to give it my all when we finally meet each other in the ring," Videl answered, throwing the spiky haired fighter a grin while flicking a pigtail over her shoulder, "Even though I know you're going to win, there's no way I'm going to make it easy on you. You can count on it."

Sharing a laugh, the two youngsters went back to watching the competitors for the adult event file in, while at the same time trying to make out any of the other Junior Division entrees. Unable to find many even with their ability to sense energy, the demi-Saiyan then became curious about something and looked back at his friend inquisitively. "There are an awful lot of fighters here. How do you think they're going to decide who gets to compete in the tournament? Are they going to let all of them into the ring?"

Videl frowned, "Well, in the last several tournaments the officials decided the finalists through a series of preliminary matchups, which helped them to weed out the weaker fighters from the best ones, and allowed them to fill up the roster. But now they've switched to a stupid counter system where they decide through a test of strength whether you're able to qualify."

"Strength test?"

"A punch machine to be more precise," the raven haired youngster informed with a shrug. "If you ask me, I think that's a really cop-out way to decide who gets to battle it out with the champion in the lineup. The art of fighting isn't all about strength. It's also about speed and technique, and how you conduct yourself in the arena. Power is just a contributing factor."

"Yeah. You can say that again," Gohan murmured. Even though power was now a predominant factor in the case of the Z-fighters, they fought their battles on an entirely different level. When they were coming up against someone who was equal to them in power and speed, that's where strategy, intelligence, and skill came into the picture.

Taking interest in a couple of the more hilariously dressed fighters, including a man who'd gone full punk-rocker and another in colorful, super-hero spandex, the pair soon had their attention drawn to the front when a group of tournament staff members stepped up and began making their announcements.

"Could everyone who is participating in the Adult Division of the World Martial Arts Tournament please gather over here so that we may begin the preliminaries!" the short, portly man in the checkered shirt and suspenders said through the microphone, before then gesturing over to his right by the board. "And to all those participating in the Junior Division please make your way over to the staff member standing beside me!"

"That's our cue," Videl chirped, taking Gohan's hand and quickly running him over to the front. The boy matched her speed with his own, ducking and dodging martial artists all the way across the quad, before eventually stopping before the tournament official in question. About a minute or so later, them and dozens of other youngsters all dressed in fighting gear were led across the rest of the court and into the central building.

Following the main corridor for several minutes, the platoon of adolescent fighters was eventually deposited in the main hall right where the entrance to the arena stood. Arranging themselves within the well lit area, they made extra certain to pay attention to the elderly monk who'd led them here so as to take in his next set of instructions.

"All of you who are participating in the Junior Division will wait here in this room until your names are called out. When they are, the two competitors who will be facing each other may pass through the barricade and follow the footpath up onto the ring to begin your match," the official explained, gesturing the children's attention towards the canvas divider with the tournament Kanji emblazoned upon it.

Looking at it, both Gohan and Videl could see through the beams of sunlight the stadium beyond the doorway. It was a sight that had them clench their fists excitedly.

"Remember, there is to be no quarreling between participants during the fights," the elder continued with a firm wag of his finger. "If you are not fighting out on the ring, you are either waiting here for your name to be called or warming up for your matches. Staff members will be posted here to keep an eye on you lot and if they see any roughhousing between competitors, the participants responsible will be automatically disqualified." Putting the fear of divine retribution in the groups of youngsters, the monk then gave them a smile and a nod. "Also, as part of the rules of this tournament, there is to be no hitting below the belt or poking in the eyes. Actions like that are considered dishonorable and are not allowed out in the ring. Am I clear?"

"Yes," came the unified reply from every child and youngster present.

Acknowledging their simultaneous responses, the official continued. "Good luck… and may the heavens smile upon you. As an added bonus to your experience here, not only will the winner of the Junior Division leave for home with one million zeni in their pockets, with the runner up receiving five hundred thousand, the victor will also have a chance to fight with Mr. Satan himself." He then pointed towards the wall, where the kids saw a large board being set up by two other officials. "You can find out when you'll be fighting and who your opponents are going to be on the roster over there. Bear in mind that your names have been randomly assigned to the lineup and that no changes can be made now that they've already been listed. So if you're fighting against somebody you don't want to, you can either stick it through or throw in the towel. It's your choice."

As soon as that announcement was made, almost every single child in the crowd made their way over to check out the brackets. Crowding before the board, with many of the stronger kids shoving their way to the front, they saw exactly how many were participating in the Junior Division and who they were set to battle in the first round of matches.

Thirty five fighters in total by Videl's count and judging from the variance in ages between those competing, it didn't look like their part of the tournament was going to be very exciting. With the adult division, the crowds had the pleasure of watching some real martial artists with real skills fight it out. This on the other hand was just a sideshow, an opening act that the spectators would have to sit through before the real fun started.

Of course, Gohan and Videl had every intention of putting on an awesome final round match for their run. That is… if they were actually fighting in the last round.

Sure enough…
"Hey. Check it out. We're on opposite ends of the board," Gohan exclaimed, pointing up at the brackets.

"Awesome. That means we get to face each other in the last round," Videl said, throwing the boy a grin and jabbing a fist into her open palm. "All we have to do is get through these guys and we'll be fine."

Apparently her words were loud enough for some of the more competitive kids to hear and when they turned to see what girl was bold enough to mouth off like that, they got the surprise of their lives when they saw the daughter of Mr. Satan standing behind them. One boy around thirteen years old and standing in front of her, dressed in a taekwondo uniform, turned to glare down at her, only to back off when he recognized her face.

"Gah! It's Videl Satan?"

"The champ's daughter is competing?" another kid spoke up when he turned to spot the teen. "Aw, man. Now we're never going to win this thing."

"Hey. She's wearing the same outfit as that boy next to her."

"Are they both disciples of the same gym?"

"Then that means he must be really strong as well!"

Seeing the commotion start up and the crowd of kids give them their full and undivided attention, the demi-Saiyan looked around oddly before turning to his friend. When he did, he saw that the raven haired fighter was rubbing her cheek in embarrassment and trying not to make eye contact.

"Wow. You're pretty popular around here."

"Yeah. You can thank my dad for that," the raven haired girl mumbled while smiling across at the Saiyan warrior. "It's a shame they don't recognize you from your outfit. You are the son of a former world champion as well."

"Heh. I guess the tournament wasn't as commercialized back in the days my dad was competing as it is now."

"True. But I bet when the announcer calls out your name, he might make mention of your dad and the audience will remember who he is."

"That would be cool," Gohan remarked, radiating with positive waves at the thought of his father being acknowledged for his accomplishments in the previous competitions.

After making sure they had their placements for the tournament assured, the children then scattered around the room to wait out the next several minutes before they were all called out. While most of the kids decided to mingle, Gohan and Videl, adorned in the orange and blue colors signature of their respective mentors, decided to find their own space by the wall. Around them they could hear the kids challenging and trying to intimidate each other, while friends were boasting about how they were going to shake hands with the Champ at the end of this.

While the two best friends chatted in the corner, talking about a couple of new moves they were currently developing for their arsenal, the pair was unknowingly being watched by the same hooded figure from before.

Brown cloak with a ruffled collar covering their face, the figure had their arms crossed and eyes fixed firmly upon Gohan. When they saw the boy laugh at a funny retelling from his companion, the youngster in the hood sneered angrily and their fingers tightened against their arm.

Soon enough, after about twenty minutes had ticked by, the ring announcer's voice blared into life over the speakers. "Ladies and gentlemen, thank you for your patience! Welcome to the 25th World Martial Arts Tournament! I'm sure you're all looking forward to some action, so why don't we kick things off with the Junior Competition!" The man's exclamations drew a loud cheer and applause from the massive crowds outside, alerting the youngsters to the start of the main events.

Looking up from their spots, Gohan and Videl saw an official waving them towards the arena doorway and begin ushering the young fighters scattered across the room through the barricade. Doing as instructed, all of the children marched in a single file out of the room and onto the ring to be introduced to the audience they would be performing for.

As the announcer, a blonde man in a suit and sunglasses, continued to read out his lines to the excited spectators, the children formed into a row behind him, all of whom stood upright before their supporters. "Unlike the Adult Division, there is no qualifying round! All thirty five of these young fighters are going to test their might in the ring. The rules of course are the same as the big leagues. Whoever gives up, lands out of bounds, stays down for ten counts, or loses consciousness, will lose it all!" The speaker then gestured to the group of eager looking kids behind him."Let's give it up for all our contestants and wish them the best of luck!"

Another rain of cheers cascaded down upon the pitch, drowning out all other sounds and swelled the kids' hearts with pride. Gohan and Videl were looking especially excited, the two of them taking it all in before they were then lead back into the waiting room. On their way down the steps, they sensed around to see whether or not Piccolo and Zangya were out there.

It didn't take them long to spot the two aliens standing up on the walkway at the very top of the square-shaped stadium, whom they waved towards in greeting. They received a wave from Zangya, but the Namekian maintained his composure and merely smiled their way.

A few short minutes after that, the Junior Division began.

OOO

The first couple rounds of the competition went by incredibly fast. As it turns out, Videl was right on the mark about this whole stage being a sort of sideshow. The audience didn't take the Junior Division seriously at all as one after the other, they watched kids step into the ring and start something akin to a routine circus performance.

Despite the variety of practitioners amongst the children, none of them had the experience, strength or maturity to truly call themselves fighters. Sure, it was fun watching a few of the kids try to pound the stuffing out of each other, with many older kids taking pity on the younger ones and quickly kicking them off of the platform, it was all just a pathetic sham really. While all the adults in the audience laughed their asses off, Gohan and Videl paid no attention to them whatsoever, whereas Piccolo and Zangya were just baffled by the sheer idiocy of it all.

"This is as entertaining as watching paint dry," the Hera remarked with a bored tone of voice after the fourth match had come and gone.

"Just wait a couple of minutes. I'm sure things will pick up by the time Gohan and Videl start their matches," Piccolo said, arms folded and eye twitching. Obviously he was the more composed of the two, but right now even he was having trouble keeping his cool through this joke of an opening.

As this was all going on, Gohan and Videl stood comfortably beside the back entrance, one with his hands on his hips and the other with her arms folded. They peered through the window as the next pair of youngsters, karate students, fought across the flat of concrete tiles with very unimpressed expressions in play.

"You're up next, right?" Gohan asked.

"Yep," the raven haired fighter replied with a yawn, "Against some older kid who practices kung fu. I'm sure his style is good, but his power will be sort of… lacking."

"Try not to hit him too hard then," the demi-Saiyan spoke in a firm tone, wisely reminding his student of her newly acquired strength. "Even though you were stronger than him before, you're now in a completely different league of martial arts. Just a tap to his forehead should be enough to get the job done. Just make sure not to crack his head open."

"Zero effort. Got it," Videl nodded in understanding. As she continued to stand there with her eyes forward, the pair then became aware of a 'hissing' sound and looked over their shoulders. When they did, the pair saw Hercule Satan peeking around the doorway and smiling at them. The sight of the big man had the girl smile, "Oh. Hi daddy. What are you doing here?"

"What am I doing here? Well, I just wanted to see how my daughter was doing and came down here to wish her luck," the afro man replied quietly, being sure not to draw attention while approaching his little girl. Kneeling down beside her, the current world champion beamed at his great treasure, taking in her orange and blue gi while reaching up to pat her on the head. "You're fighting in the next round, right?"

"Uh-huh."

"Good. I know you're going to do well, sweet pea," the Champ exclaimed, grinning brightly before lowering his hand back to his side. One last look over drew a nod from the wrestling legend, "I'm so proud of you."

Videl's eyes sparkled at her father's words, "Thanks, dad."

Chuckling, Hercule then set his gaze upon Gohan. Not at all surprised to see him here, the man beamed at the young warrior and nodded to him respectfully. "Good luck in your matches too, Gohan. I hope to see you in the finals."

"Count on it, Mr. Satan," the half-Saiyan said with a smile of his own.

Acknowledging his words of confidence, the man in the white cape and brown gi then cleared his throat and rose up to full height. Upon which he quietly backed through the entrance and spared the duo one last wave. "I'll be watching your fights from the upper floor window. Good luck to both of you." And with that he disappeared, successfully managing to stealthily pass on his best wishes to his favorite little girl and her friend.

"And now for the next match: Videl Satan versus Lee Shen!"

"Finally. My turn," the raven haired girl chirped, slapping her cheeks lightly and making her way forward. She grinned over her shoulder at her partner, "Cheer for me, alright."

"Will do," Gohan gave her a thumbs-up.
Following her to the exit, the demi-Saiyan watched as Videl and her opponent, a tall boy wearing only a pair of gi pants and a belt, marched their way down the catwalk to the stage. Under the wild cheers and applause from the crowd, the pair ascended the stairway and took to the center, with the announcer being sure to blurt out their introductions.

"I'm sure we're in for a treat, folks! After months of rigorous training, last year's Junior Division champion Videl Satan is back in the ring and ready to make her climb to the top. And it looks like she's sporting some new colors too!" Sunglasses flashing when the man recognized the garb she was wearing, he then gestured to her opponent as the pair split up and faced each other in the middle. "Her opponent Lee Shen is also a returning contestant. This young go-getter put on quite a show for us at the last tournament, but lost it out to Mudo in the quarter final match. Let's see how far he's come since then!"

With one last cheer from the crowd, the two youngsters squared off, with the raven haired boy looking raring to go whereas Videl simply stood there appearing passive as usual. Her unchanging expression had the fierce looking practitioner glare.

"I don't care if you are the Champ's daughter. You're still going down!"

Videl threw a bored look back at him. "Whatever."

Spinning his microphone, the excited announcer raised his hand and brought it down in a clean chopping motion, "NOW... LET THE MATCH BEGIN!" He then backed off, giving the pair enough space to have at it.

"I'm going to kick your ass!" No sooner had the bell been sounded, the young Lee rushed forward and lunged down at the girl with a swinging right.

The second his punch was loose, Videl watched it approach her in bullet time, her expression remaining completely calm as she casually lifted her left and stopped it with her finger. Stunning the boy at her block, the girl then wasted no time in bringing her free hand up and, loading her index finger, flicked him in the forehead. With the sound of a 'slap', Lee was knocked tumbling across his entire half of the ring before eventually rolling over the side and hitting the ground with a dull thud.

When the dust cleared, it revealed the boy lying there with a red welt on his forehead and swirly eyes. "Ooh... mummy...?"

"R-Ring out!" the announcer exclaimed in surprise, a grin slowly forming on his face as he then watched Videl stroll off of the ring. "There you have it folks! The match is over! Let's give it up for Videl!" When the crowd eventually got over the shock of the startling win, they quickly rolled with it and honored the victor with a round of applause.

As the washes of praise passed over him, the blonde haired announcer grinned at the retreating girl's back. "Yes! I knew those colors looked familiar! She's wearing a uniform similar to the one Son Goka wore at his last tournament! This is amazing!" He then clenched his fists and pumped one discreetly. "Finally, the fighters I've been waiting for! They're coming back!"

His enthusiasm burning, the man knew right then and there he was bound to get something out of this tournament yet!

Zangya, who'd watched the whole thing from her position by the railings, was giving Videl a standing ovation. "Bravo! Bravo! Did you see how fast that kid rolled? Now that is entertainment!"
the woman laughed.

The Namekian standing beside her smirked, "Told you."

Up in the balcony above the waiting room, Hercule, who'd secured himself a comfortable place by the window, was at first stunned by the flawless victory of his daughter. Eventually though, after he was done gawking like a fish across the building's roof, he then put on the biggest grin you'd ever see on him and he let out a manly roar of triumph.

"YEAAAAAHH! THAT'S MY LITTLE GIRL!"

The whole of the stadium actually stopped for a moment when they thought they heard the great Hercule's yell.

Passing groups of stunned youngsters, Videl walked right up to Gohan and high-fived him. "Yes! Did you see that?!" Grinning from ear to ear, the girl clenched her fists excitedly and showed the boy her response to her amazing success. "That was awesome! I've never been able to do that before!"

"See what I mean. Your strength is on a whole other level now," the demi-Saiyan informed with an expression of unwavering confidence. "It's great that you have so much control over it as well. Great job."

"Thanks Gohan-kun," Videl said, at the same time giving the boy a fond look. She continued to stare at him warmly and with a shade of red in her cheeks, even when Gohan fixed his gaze back out the viewing window and went on to watch the next two junior fighters walk out onto the ring.

The next several rounds passed by at a humdrum pace. Once again, both Gohan and Videl had to endure another couple matches where adolescent youngsters were pummeling each other into submission. A couple of them cut and ran, one of them even cried, and another kid was even forcibly chased out of the ring after running circles around the announcer. Sure, the audience was entertained and the contestants were adorable, but all this really brought was a great deal of boredom to the Z-fighters that were actually in attendance of the event.

However, after passing the halfway mark of the first rounds of the Junior Division and moving onto Gohan's half, there was one fighter in particular that caught the demi-Saiyan's attention. It was only after they were both in the ring that he finally noticed them.

"And now for the tenth match: we have Takashi vs Paprika!" the announcer bellowed, directing the audience's attention to a boy in a karate uniform and the child in the dusty brown, hooded cloak, who was only half a head shorter than Gohan. Because the person kept themselves hidden, the people assumed they were very shy. "Let's wish these two the best of luck! BEGIN!"

The audience cheered as they watched the determined lad assume a fighting stance and prepare to advance on his quiet and still adversary. But just as he was beginning to shuffle forward, he suddenly saw a hand emerge from underneath the figure's cloak and point towards him. At first baffled by the unexpected gesture, the crowd soon became aware of why the young fighter had extended their palm because a split second later there was a loud crack of wind.

This was immediately followed by an invisible force that crashed into boy and sent him flying across the arena, which he bounced along several times before rolling to a stop at the edge. Clothing ruffled and covered in bruises, Takashi's body lay motionless on the tiles, bringing startled gasps from the people watching from afar.
While the sudden shockwave stunned the crowd, the people who were the most surprised by the unexpected hit were Piccolo, Zangya, Gohan and Videl, all of whom had picked up the sudden energy spike from the unseen attack.

The announcer quickly rushed over to the fallen Takashi to see if he was okay and breathed a sigh of relief. "Takashi is out cold." He then turned and gestured to the cloaked figure, "The winner is Paprika!"

Lowering their hand, the short fighter turned to glare towards the waiting room, their red eyes fixing upon the raven haired boy in the window. When Gohan felt the person's gaze land on him, he narrowed his eyes and glared right back at them.

As the fighter now identified as Paprika left the stage, Piccolo and Zangya watched them closely from afar.

The Hera sweated nervously, "Hey… did you feel that just now?"

"I think so," the Namekian replied.

"What the hell was that?" That blast had obviously been a Kiai attack. While there were a handful of fighters in the world who knew how to perform that move, to see that attack come from a kid they'd never seen before… it was unheard of.

Whatever it was they felt, the two warriors immediately knew they didn't like it and continued to watch closely as the person left the arena.

When Paprika strolled into the room, Gohan and Videl's eyes were still stuck on them. Hard expressions framing their faces, they saw the cloaked youngster walk over to the wall to stand beside it, where they then remained. As the unconscious Takashi was carted off stage, the next match soon began, but the two youngsters paid it little mind.

The daughter of the Champ broke a nervous bead of sweat as her eyes took in the newcomer, "This one…" She swallowed nervously. "She's strong." It was brief but she'd felt it. An immense power level way above her own. Right now, the unknown fighter was masking their ki signature, keeping it hidden from them.

Though both she and Gohan knew the person's name, they couldn't see their face. That was discomforting on a number of different levels.

Many more matches came and went after that, and one by one a new victor for the next round was decided. Throughout that entire time, neither Gohan nor Videl's eyes left the cloaked figure positioned in the corner. That was until the demi-Saiyan's name was called.

"The next match: Gohan versus Aoki!"

Disengaging from his spot, the teen Saiyan shared a smile with his companion and headed out. Passing the barricade, both martial artists were greeted by a cheer from the crowd and a shower of applause, a background noise that carried them all the way to the stage. The moment they started ascending the steps, the announcer, thrilled at the sight of the familiar orange and blue uniform once again, began reading the details to the spectators.

"As you folks probably know already, young Son Gohan is a former contestant of the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament and one of the only four fighters to make it to the quarter finals. Having come so close to victory after a brush encounter with some unsavory characters, he's now decided to try his hand at the World Stage!" the blonde announcer shouted to an excited crowd, most of whom quickly recognized the youngster from the various broadcasts. "And here's some exciting news, Son Gohan is also the son of former World Martial Arts Champion Son Goku, who disappeared from the limelight several years ago. That means we have two descendents of world champions fighting for us in the Junior Division today!"

A loud cheer rang up that drowned the ring and brought a blush to the cheerful demi-Saiyan's face as he strolled to the center of the platform. When he turned to face his opponent, he saw his foe glaring back at him with a bead of sweat running down his temple.

"It looks like his opponent Aoki is in for one hell of a match. Thirteen years old and a prodigy kick boxer, this kid is looking to claim the grand prize and a match with the Great Hercule Satan himself. Let's see how our two young fighters will fair!" Raising his hand and sunglasses flashing brightly, the man then brought it down in a sweeping chop. "BEGIN!"

Placing a fist in his palm, Gohan bowed respectfully to his opponent who quickly set himself into a fighting stance and began to bounce on his toes. The gutsy Aoki growled as his fists hovered in a guard on both sides of his face, protecting his flanks while he nervously advanced on the Son fighter.

"Ha!" the taller youngster shouted, "You don't scare me, twerp. Father or no father, I'm going to wipe that smug grin off of your face." Despite the fact Gohan had no such expression in play, as he was just staring cheerfully back at him, the teen boxer was intent on following through with his threat.

The demi-Saiyan blinked, "Why are you calling me names? I haven't said anything to you yet."

"Because you're annoying! That's why!" Aoki shouted, before swiftly throwing a roundhouse kick at the boy's head.

Gohan effortlessly blocked it, watching the boy lower his leg and then throw a jab. With speed very few could track, the spiky haired Saiyan caught the fist and began to twist it in the wrong direction, immediately putting the boy in a painful wrist lock. Inch by inch, he lowered Aoki to the ground, who let out a pained cry as he fell to his knees and tried to pull his arm the other way, to no avail.

The still relatively cheerful Gohan grinned at him while he held the boy in position, "Say uncle."

"H-Huh?" Aoki stammered, only to then feel the pressure increase and he was pushed further down, earning another cry from the poor teen. "AAaaahh-UNCLE! Uncle! Uncle!"

"Okay." Gohan then released him, allowing the boy to roll onto his back, gripping his arm tightly. At that, he then turned and left, with the announcer grinning into his microphone.

"And that's it folks! The winner by forfeit is Son Gohan!" The announcement drew another loud cheer from the crowd, who offered their congratulations to the young man for such a clean victory. The spectators watched the spiky haired hero bow to all of them and descend the stairs at a leisurely pace.

Videl, who was too busy cheering Gohan at the entrance for his performance, didn't notice the hooded figure they'd been watching earlier standing by the window.

Seeing the spiky haired boy approach the waiting room, the cloaked youngster gritted their teeth, showing off a pair of prominent fangs. "This is confusing. How can a monster like him be so kind and merciful to someone that is clearly much weaker than him?"

While it wasn't the win Piccolo and Zangya were expecting, it certainly was in the youngster's character. The orange haired woman was sure to roll her eyes when she saw the boy offer his gratitude to the audience for their praise and move on. This left the stage wide open for the next few rounds to follow and, once Aoki limped out of the ring, the next match could begin.

XXX

The rounds of the Junior Division plowed along at a faster rate following Gohan's effortless victory over his opponent. The young batch of fighters went into the ring with more vigor and determination than ever, the audience cheering them on every step of the way and applauding each of their successes. It was only a matter of time before the seeded fighters of the lineup were decided, with Gohan and Videl taking the top spot, while being closely followed by Paprika. Though the spectators had a fun time watching all of the kids battle each other, they soon began rooting for these three fighters in particular, all of whom had shown the most composure and the most promise in every round.

While the highlight for the Videl fans was watching their favorite girl toss her opponent out of the ring, for the Gohan club it was seeing the young man spin his opponent like a windmill before setting him down, by which point in time he'd been knocked unconscious at the sheer velocity he'd been turned. They were the two who showed the most physical use of their skills.

Paprika on the other hand was a wild card. The mysterious cloaked fighter, throughout all of her matches, didn't let a single one of their opponents lay a finger on them. While this definitely provided some physics bending entertainment for the crowd, all it did was raise a bunch of alarm bells for the Z-fighters in attendance. No matter how hard they tried, they just couldn't piece together who this newcomer was or why the name sounded so familiar.

It was certainly familiar to Piccolo and Gohan, as was the ki signature. But without a face or any other information to go by, they were just about as much in the dark about the hooded fighter as Zangya and Videl were.

After being kept in a constant state of question for an entire hour, it soon came to the semi-final round of the Junior Division. When the Champ's daughter wowed the audience with a stellar victory by effortlessly blowing her opponent out of the ring with a quick burst of wind from her fist, it was then the turn of her more experienced counterpart.

"And now we will decide who will be facing Videl Satan in the finals!" the announcer exclaimed, earning a mighty roar from the crowds in the stadium. Tossing his microphone in the air, the man then caught it all stylish like and brought it to his lips, "It's time for our two other favorites to step out onto the ring! The seeded Son Gohan and the mysterious Paprika! Come on out you two!"

The moment the call was made, the two youngsters exited the waiting room together and began making their way down the footpath at an even pace. While the other contestants of the Junior Division that were also in the room spilled out of the entrance and crowded by the wall to watch the match between the two ridiculously strong fighters, Videl found herself a comfortable spot further along the grass and stood there with her arms folded.

Just like Piccolo and Zangya, both of whom were also watching closely from above, she too wanted to see why this mysterious fighter was making her skin crawl.

"I'm sure you've all been waiting for this match. Throughout this entire tournament, both fighters have displayed incredible levels of skill and collectedness. And now, finally, after breaking through a great wave of competition, the two are finally meeting for the first time in center stage!” the announcer cried out, being sure to exit the ring the instant he saw the two of them walk onto it. Sensing the vibe of an all-out-war brimming on the horizon, the excited voice of the World Martial Arts Tournament grinned as he then gestured to the youngsters now taking their spots. “Let's see who will move on to the finals! Fighters, let the match begin!”

While on one hand the announcer was hoping for an awesome fight, on the other hand he was hoping the arena would remain intact from it. If memory served him correctly, the last battle between martial artists who displayed super-human levels of ability reduced the entire area to rubble.

Hopefully this match would deliver the results he was hoping for with minimal losses.

Videl, watching carefully from the sidelines, frowned nervously. "Gohan... be careful."

The cheers of the crowd reducing to a clamor, the two young warriors faced each other with serious looks in play and eyes set firmly on the other.

From his new distance, the demi-Saiyan could make out a few more details about his opponent. Not only was the child shorter than him, he also noticed the skin coloration of their lower jaw and mouth. Instead of seeing a human pink or dark brown, he instead saw a sickly shade of green with white locks of hair poking out from the hood. The shawl did well in concealing most of the person's features, something that he was now determined to unmask.

Taking a steady breath, the boy turned side on with his adversary who then lowered themselves into what he guessed was a fighting stance.

The half-Saiyan frowned, "Alright. Let's do this."

Paprika frowned, "Shut up... murderer."

Giving a surprised blink at the mystery competitor's sudden retort, Gohan was unable to react in time when he suddenly saw his foe vanish in a blur before, with a deafening clap, a fist crashed across his face. The impact of the blow echoed throughout the entire stadium and saw spittle fly out of the Saiyan's mouth, the boy stumbling backwards for several yards, only to then receive an elbow to the cheek that knocked him flying across the arena.

Zangya, Piccolo, Videl, hell... even Hercule, all gawked in shock at what just happened.

His flight across the ring being marked by the sound of a jet soaring at low altitude, Gohan gritted his teeth and recovered with a quick back flip, slamming his feet into the floor and stopping him in his tracks. The instant he did, he suddenly felt a presence appear behind him and, eyes cutting to the side, ducked to avoid a chopping right from his six-o-clock. He retaliated with a back kick, missing when his opponent swayed and countered with a left hook.

Spinning around and slipping it at the same time, the half-Saiyan and the mysterious cloaked fighter began viciously attacking each other with a series of lightning fast punches and hooks. When Gohan attempted to nail them with a rapid fire chain of jabs, his opponent head slipped them effortlessly before unleashing a vicious barrage of punches on him, all of which he dodged and attempted to counter. But Paprika moved just as quickly and every lightning fast blow they threw at close range was effectively avoided.

After a fierce exchange of punches, Gohan broke the engagement with a swift roundhouse kick.
However, the second his leg snapped towards the figure's head, the shorter fighter deftly caught it and with a shout, tossed him across the ring.

Yelling out in shock as he spiraled through the air, the demi-Saiyan quickly fell into a spin. Flipping several times, the boy landed on the very edge of the arena before, with a mighty bellow, launched himself across the ring and towards his opponent with a flying side kick.

However, the moment he came within two feet of them, Paprika vanished in a blur of movement, leaving the boy to slam his foot into the tiled surface. Skidding to a dusty stop, Gohan gritted his teeth and, with a gasp, began looking around the ring in wild paranoia.

"Damn it! This one is definitely something else!" They were quick. Even with his speed, the demi-Saiyan could barely keep track of them. Hell, even their ki signature had completely vanished."Shit. Where the heck did he go?"

Eyes darting around, Gohan then felt a tremor and looked down. At that exact moment, the tiles directly in front of him exploded and his opponent sprang up at him from underground, slamming a jumping uppercut into his chin. The blow, strong enough to cause a thunderclap, lifted the half-Saiyan off of the ground and into the air, where his opponent quickly jumped after him and smacked him back down to the arena with a double-hammer blow from above.

Gohan barreled across the ground, ending up on his back several meters later and gritting his teeth painfully. Before he could completely recover, a gasp suddenly escaped his lips and he rolled out of the way, avoiding his opponent slamming their foot into the tiles where his head was. The blow split the ground with a loud crack, a smirk forming on Paprika's face before Gohan unbolted a double kick into their stomach and sent them sliding across the ring, tearing a trench through the concrete.

Sprinting after the cloaked foe, Gohan leapt at them and attempted to flatten them into the floor. But as soon as he dropped down on them, Paprika flipped out of the way and avoided the boy's feet that smashed a small crater into the ground. The demi-Saiyan leapt after them a second time, but his still sliding opponent barreled out of the way once again and he ended up smashing yet another empty crater into the ring's surface.

His miss allowed the masked figure to leap to their feet and sprint away. Taking flight and gliding across the tiled surface of the ring with the other not too far behind, Paprika managed to make it to the edge of the ring and hit the brakes. Slamming their feet into the edge, the fighter swiftly changed directions and charged back at the approaching Gohan. A split second later, the pair collided elbows first, an impact that was marked by a booming shockwave that rocked the entire stadium and cracked the floor beneath them, before locking them in stalemate.

Pushing back against the other for several seconds, their bodies trembling from the opposing forces, the duo soon ended the grappling match and began swiftly exchanging blows. The sound of machinegun fire echoed out when the two young fighters began fighting expertly across the ring, their attacks flying at each other in a blur of movement and with superb martial arts skill. After a minute of darting across the ring, locked in epic combat, the pair stopped with their forearms slammed against their opponent's.

Attempting to gain the upper hand, Gohan chopped over with his free hand, only to have it caught by Paprika's blocking hand, leaving him wide open to a uppercut that flipped him into the air. When he landed on his knee, his opponent super-speeded behind him and attempted to bury a hand into his back, but was cut short when the boy threw a kick into their chin and sent them flipping into the air.
Spinning around, Gohan took a defensive stance and watched his opponent land and assume one as well. Blood leaking out of the corners of their mouths, both fighters glared heatedly at one another before, with shouts of rage, the two of them vanished into thin air.

The audience in the stadium was stunned into silence as they watched the two young fighters of the Junior Division battle it out in center ring. Or at least, they tried too anyway, because from out of nowhere, both Gohan and Paprika began fighting at a speed so great that the entire population of the vicinity was unable to keep track of them. The two child warriors were darting all across the arena in a blur, and not only were their blows loud enough that they could be heard outside of the coliseum, but the impact of some of their attacks had split the ground and punched holes into the concrete.

Needless to say, this battle was nothing that they were expecting… and the crowd loved every second of it!

"YAHOO! This is awesome!"

"I've never seen a fight like this before! This is unreal!"

"MORE!"

"Keep it up you two! Don't stop!"

"Go for the finals!"

Getting over the shock, the audience gave a wild, collective cheer as the two warriors continued to punch it out in their realm of speed, their forms darting this way and that, practically chasing each other all over the place. But of course, while the majority of the spectators were enthralled by the match, the only ones who were taking this even remotely seriously were Piccolo, Zangya and Videl.

The former two especially, because not only were they watching a battle only people of their level of ability could fight, but they were watching the strongest person on the face of the planet actually struggling against an opponent they had never encountered before.

Just who the hell was this Paprika?

Managing to recover from his astonishment, the announcer gave a joyous exclamation and threw his fist into the air, "WOW FOLKS! Look at these two fierce young warriors go! Speed like this hasn't been seen in this arena since the days of Tien Shinhan and Son Goku! Ladies and gentlemen, you are witnessing the rebirth of an era!"

For several minutes the two short fighters continued to fight it out in their own dimension of travel. Their forms were invisible to the naked eye, but every once in a while the crowd was able to catch a glimpse of their blurred forms darting across the mat or the pair reappearing locked in another grappling match, before vanishing once again. It was only after a certain amount of time ticked by that Paprika reappeared once again, this time in the sky above the arena, jabbing out at an opponent that wasn't there.

The moment the cloaked fighter's form phased into view, Gohan dropped down on them from above with an elbow that collided with the back of their head. A crack of thunder echoed out and a shout of pain escaped Paprika's lips as the two of them dropped from the sky and slammed into the center of the ring.
Landing on all fours and punching a small crater on impact, the hooded figure growled and looked up. When they saw the sky was empty, the masked figure's breathing became erratic as they desperately searched the area for them.

"W-Where the hell is he?"

"Right here!"

Gasping in surprise, Paprika spun around, only to have their vision clouded when the back of their cloak was pulled over and wrapped around their head. Their shout of surprise muffled, the hooded fighter was suddenly picked up by the demi-Saiyan using their cloak as leverage and, with a yell of effort, tossed the fighter over his shoulder and slammed them into the ground. Continuing to hold onto their cloak like a lasso, Gohan picked the fighter up again and slammed them on the other side, doing so repeatedly and cracking the tiles on every impact before, with a mighty roar, spun and tossed them across the ring. Paprika ended up tumbling over the concrete for several yards before eventually leaping back to their feet and coming to a defensive stance across the way.

Both fighters then held their ground, the audience finally spotting the pair and fixing all of their attention onto the youths. Clamoring and cheering starting up once more, both Gohan and Paprika found their ears filled with the sounds of chanting as the spectators egged them on to continue their epic battle.

After a full minute of standing and glaring silently across at one another, the demi-Saiyan soon grew frustrated at the atmosphere and straightened up. To put it into layman's terms; he'd had enough. "Hey! What gives?" His question immediately had the crowd's and his opponent's immediate attention. "How the heck are you so strong? I haven't fought somebody as tough as you since Kana and she wasn't even from this planet."

If memories served him well, the only fighters from this planet who were strong enough to give him any sort of trouble were his dad's friends. And even then they would find the task of doing so incredibly difficult as well.

This one packed a wallop.

Catching on to the boy's inquiry, the cloaked, bruised figure spat in disgust and straightened up as well. "Figures a monster like you wouldn't know who I am. I mean, what else can I expect? You did destroy my entire planet without so much as batting an eye."

"Wait. I did what?" Gohan balked, blinking a few times in astonishment as what his opponent just said. "I… destroyed your planet?"

"B-But…" Completely overwhelmed by this person's unexpected claims, the demi-Saiyan shook his head and gave them an intent stare. "Hold on a second. There has to be some kind of mistake. I… I didn't destroy anyone's planet. You must have me confused with someone else."

"Don't play dumb with me, Son Gohan! You may act like you don't remember, but I know full well what you did!" Clenching their fist tightly, the hooded figure snarled and stepped towards him angrily, "I know because I was there! I saw you do it! Five years ago, I watched from afar as you blasted my entire world into oblivion and sent my father plummeting into a black abyss! The inhabitants of earth wouldn't remember witnessing an event like that. After all… my people were nothing more than a mere myth to this world… relics of a time long forgotten."
Feeling something akin to dread coming over him, Gohan narrowed his eyes dangerously and took a step forward as well, "Who are you?"

Grunting at the glare the boy sent their way, Paprika then breathed an irritated sigh and reached up with their hand. "Still can't remember? Fine. Maybe this will help jog your memory!" With a swift tug, the figure removed the cloak and threw it onto the wind, revealing to the stadium the fighter it was concealing underneath.

The audience and Gohan received one hell of a shock at what they saw. The child wasn't human. That was what they immediately got on first glance. If the moss green skin that they had wasn't a dead giveaway, then the pointy ears and the horns growing out of their hair were.

Continuing to take in their appearance, not only did Gohan see that the person had long white, messy hair that grew down their shoulders, but the youngster also wore fighting shoes, red leg warmers, a red belt, black figure hugging pants, a short-sleeved top with red trim and the midriff exposed, and black, pull-on sleeves with a red trim as well. On top of that, the foreigner was also wearing a long red scarf wrapped around their neck, which waved on the wind like a cape as much as their hair.

Aside from looking to be the exact same age as Gohan, the boy was also surprised to see that the fighter was in fact a girl.

Her prominent lashes narrowed as she showed off her fanged teeth and fixed her blood red eyes in a hateful glare upon the demi-Saiyan. "Does this face ring any bells?"

Eyes widening, flashbacks of beings similar to this girl's appearance flew through his head as he thought back to a day prior to Radditz's arrival, one filled with demons and a vortex in the sky. He also recalled memories of a great battle he'd fought many years ago, where the world had fallen under the spell of the Black Water Mist and a group of power-hungry figures threatened to destroy everything he cared about. There was one figure in particular out of that entire group that stuck out in his mind.

His laugh was one of the many that continued to haunt his nightmares.

Gohan swallowed and stammered nervously, a cold chill running up his spine, "Y-You're..."

At that moment, Piccolo also realized who the girl was and his eyes widened in disbelief.

"Finally figured it out?" Paprika asked with a smirk, before her expression darkened once more into a look that had the crowds watching shiver with fright. "Garlic Junior was my father. He conceived me four years prior to the day you knocked him into the void known as the Dead Zone." She then clenched her fists even tighter. "Years later, he managed to break free from that wretched hellhole and returned to us. But after only a month of freedom, he was once again tossed into the same prison he'd broken out of by the very person who put him there in the first place. Now, thanks to you, he's trapped forever in a world of shadow and despair."

It was this revelation that finally clicked in Gohan's head.

He remembered all of it; the final battle between his friends and the immortal demon Garlic Junior. Flashes of that day filtered into his mind, showing him an enemy he'd fought long ago when he was only four years old and then came back a second time for revenge years later.

On that day, he threw the power mad conqueror into the void of the Dead Zone and destroyed the rogue planet that was the source of his race's power, the Makyo Star. He figured after dispersing of that demonic realm that he would finally be rid of that nightmare once and for all.

However, it seemed as though fate had other plans for him and he was now staring down the face of his former enemy's daughter.

Gohan frowned, "Your father was a monster who tortured my friends and threatened to destroy the earth. I had no other choice. He had to be stopped."

"And what gave you that right, huh?!" Paprika shot back, her teeth bared in rage. "Thanks to you, my entire planet, my home and the only family I had is now gone! And it's all because of you!"

Snapping angrily, the girl shook the tears from her eyes and sneered at the boy staring back at her. "I spent five years training, becoming strong enough to defeat the one who robbed me of my father. And now that I've found you, I'll be able to take my revenge and make you suffer for what you've done!"

Eyes narrowing at every word she spoke, the shaken teen quickly regained his composure and took his stance, "I'm sorry. I never meant to hurt anyone. All I did was fight to protect my friends from a madman who wanted nothing more than to take them away from me. It was the only thing I could do." He slid his feet apart and took a stance. "But if it's a fight with me that you want… then it's a fight you'll get. Come and get me."

Paprika growled, "With pleasure."

(THO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: And so another enemy shows up, but this one is solely after Gohan.

The Dead Zone was one of my favourite DBZ movies back in the day, I just really liked the tone of it, and I came up with this villain after watching Gohan blow up the Makyan Race's home planet the Makyo Star. You would think after doing something like that, someone from that race would be coming after him, so I created Paprika to fill that need.

Let's see how he deals with this opponent.
"So it's true… that girl's related to Garlic Junior," Piccolo murmured to himself, drawing Zangya's gaze up to him.

When the Hera glanced across at the Namekian, she saw the stress lines on his face and the beads of sweat dripping down his skin. This was all the sign she needed to know that whoever this young fighter was had the caped warrior on edge. "My hearing's not as good as yours. What's the scoop?"

The former guardian of earth nodded towards the ring, where they saw the two warriors slide into fighting stances and prepare for a second bout. "That girl down there is a Makyan; a member of a race of demons that originated from a planet called the Makyo Star." Turning to the woman standing at the railings, the Namekian's frown deepened. "Years ago, a powerful member of their race named Garlic Junior came to the earth seeking revenge for his father being denied the seat of the guardian's throne and being sealed inside a dimension known as the Dead Zone. However, after gaining immortality and trying to destroy the planet, he was stopped by Gohan when he threw him into the same space his father ended up in. He managed to break free years later, but met the same fate after another attempt to gain control of the planet."

Zangya scoffed, "Heh. He must have been one determined bastard."

"He was one of the most dangerous enemies we ever faced and was one of the closest to ever come to achieving his goals. But working together we were able to stop him and destroyed his home planet and the source of his race's power, the Makyo Star, in the process," Piccolo informed, his glare tightening as he looked upon the white haired girl down below. "When we threw him into that black hole, we thought we'd been rid of him and his kind. However… it seems like there's one out there who still has a part to play in this… an offspring of Garlic Junior we didn't know he had…"

"And it looks like she has a little score to settle with wonder boy," Zangya commented, a frown appearing on her face while she fixed her own glare upon the surprisingly strong girl below. Watching the pair size each other up, the Hera clenched her jaw tightly, "Do you think he'll be able to beat her?"

"I'm not sure," Piccolo murmured, tapping his finger uneasily. "Both times we fought members of the Makyan race they displayed tremendous levels of skill and power. It's been years since we last fought against Garlic Junior and his cronies, and we've all gotten much stronger since then. But this one… she's able to trade blows evenly with Gohan in his base form and is still able to stand."

Zangya chuckled at this, "Well… that's nice and all, but if I'm being completely honest with you green man, that's hardly enough to count as a real threat. All wonder boy has to do is go blonde, kick the shit out of her, and end this match once and for all." Crossing her arms and leaning against the railing, the Hera woman smirked assuredly, "I mean, killing is not allowed, yeah, but I'm sure if he beats her up enough she'll eventually get the picture and throw in the towel. Hell, I doubt he'll even need to go Super Saiyan to knock her ass out of the ring and win."
Despite the girl's confident remarks, Piccolo couldn't help but grit his teeth anxiously. "I wouldn't be so sure about that…"

This comment had Zangya raise an eyebrow at the Namekian curiously.

As the crowd started to clamor once again, waiting patiently for the pair to restart the match, the two young warriors figured they'd been standing around long enough.

Exploding from their spots with a yell of effort and a blast of wind, the pair flew at each other, covering the space of fifteen meters and colliding elbow first with a deafening thunderclap. The shockwave they produced was so great it rocked the entire coliseum to its foundations, scaring the daylights out of the spectators as bolts of lightning shot off of the two fighters. Locked in another heated grappling match, Gohan and Paprika snarled angrily and tried to force the other away. A white aura and electricity crackling off of both of them, the pair summoned all the strength they could muster to try and overcome their equally stubborn foe.

The entire area beginning to tremble under the growing pressure of their exchange, the duo soon grew annoyed at the stalemate and they threw a punch at each other with their free hand. Their fists connecting in the middle, the force of impact was enough to send both blasting backwards. Slamming his feet into the ground first, Gohan dashed after the girl and engaged her in a furious exchange of blows. Flurries of punches flew between them as they fought a running battle across the ring, until another sonic boom rang out that separated them and sent them spinning back through the air.

Flipping repeatedly as they descended, both landed at the exact same time on opposite sides of the ring. The instant they touched base, the two warriors shot into the air and, climbing to about twenty stories, met in the sky above the stadium and once again engaged each other in a vicious exchange of blows. More shockwaves rang out as the pair fought in complete sight of the audience, all of whom gawked in shock at the two youngsters battling it out in midair.

The former competitors of the Junior Division were especially astonished, all of them staring up from the ground at the feuding fighters with their jaws hanging open and eyes bugging out of their sockets.

It soon became apparent to all of them why they'd lost.

The force of all their connecting attacks was enough to cause the ring beneath them to shake and crack.

The announcer, completely overwhelmed by the battle, grinned into his microphone and turned to the silent crowd. "WHOA! FEEL THE POWER OF THOSE BLOWS! THEY CAN STOP A FREIGHT TRAIN IN ITS TRACKS! ARE YOU WATCHING THIS?!" It was a question that didn't need to be asked.

He wouldn't be surprised if the entire world was watching at this point.

A fist slamming across her face cocked Paprika's head back and sent blood flying from her mouth. Recovering quickly, the Makyan growled and spun around, instantly retaliating with a hook across Gohan's face that elicited the same result; a splatter of blood and a thunder clap.

Growling, the demi-Saiyan retaliated with a back kick to the girl's face, sending her spinning through the sky. When she started to descend and Gohan was about to give pursuit, she vanished in a blur of movement and reappeared directly behind him, swinging an elbow straight down at him. Gohan vanished as well, causing her to miss and, super-speeding behind her, threw a roundhouse kick. Paprika vanished again, avoiding it easily. The two continued this chain of hit-and-miss attacks throughout the sky above the stadium, both attempting to outflank the other yet failing miserably.

It soon came to a point where Paprika missed with an especially wide hook and ended up with her opponent rushing her from the side. Spinning about to face him, the two powerful warriors once again locked in heated combat, the sound of machinegun fire echoing throughout the arena for a second time while the pair danced across the skies, trading hit after hit, all of which they either dodged or parried.

Displaying sublime fighting skills in a blur of movement none of the audience members could keep up with, the pair eventually vanished and began their exchange in the realm of the speedsters. This engagement only lasted for several seconds before another shockwave hit the stadium, knocking a couple people out of their seats and drawing everyone's gazes to the ring once again. It was there they saw Gohan and Paprika land on opposite sides of the board and rocket towards one another in a blur.

Flying towards one another at full speed, the demi-Saiyan growled and threw a swinging right overhand, only for his fist to pass through an afterimage that prompted him to hit the brakes. Skidding across the ring's surface, Gohan gasped and looked up, where he saw a grinning Paprika swing at him with a hook.

Leaping back at the last second, the boy avoided the blow and back-flipped across the stage. When he stopped he was unable to respond in time when his opponent seemingly teleported behind him and slammed a kick into his back, a blow that sent him flying back the way he came.

Videl, seeing Gohan blow past the edge and towards the dividing wall protecting the audience, the girl stepped forward in alarm, "GOHAN! STOP!"

Clenching his teeth, the boy course-corrected and flipped around, halting his momentum with a quick burst of ki that sent a gust of wind rushing over the stands. Blood leaking out of the corner of his mouth, the demi-Saiyan speedily floated back down to the very edge of the ring and, the instant his foot touched the surface, he launched himself forward, disappearing in a blur of speed.

Paprika, who was in the process of flying after her adversary, gasped in surprise when she saw her opponent vanish. She then received one hell of a wake up call when, out of nowhere, the half-Saiyan crashed into her chest head-first, the blow generating a deafening clap of an artillery cannon that sent her flying across the ring.

Eyes glazed over in shock, Paprika quickly shook herself back into consciousness and flipped back onto her feet. Landing close to the edge, the girl loaded her right hand and, taking aim, threw it forward. With a yell and a howl, she unleashed a pink energy blast that shot across the ring and towards the boy like a missile.

Gohan recoiled at the approaching attack and, reacting instinctively, slammed a foot into the ring and caused an enormous slab of the arena the size of a room-sized boulder to jut out in front of him. The wall sprang up just in time to block the blast that slammed into the barrier. The force behind it was so great that the explosion not only caused the entire area to shake, but it was able to burn and chip away enormous chunks of the concrete in an instant. The audience cried out in shock when the impact of the attack shook the stadium, drawing even more bewildered looks from the bystanders.

Smoke blocking out view of the center of the arena and surrounding Gohan on all sides, the half-Saiyan remained kneeling protectively behind the remains of the earthen barrier he'd erected.
"This girl…" Frowning seriously at the techniques she was displaying, the youngster then looked up with a start and his eyes shot to his right when he sensed her appearance. Preparing to counter, Gohan was about to fire a blast of his own until he saw the cloud break and the girl's weighted scarf burst into view.

Realizing it was a decoy Gohan spun around and threw up a guard, only to receive a killer roundhouse kick in the side of the head that generated a shockwave and slammed him into the wall he'd used to block the last attack. Exploding through the mass of concrete and causing it to shatter into hundreds of pieces, the Saiyan spiraled out of the black cloud and bounced repeatedly across the tiled surface like a ragdoll.

Rolling painfully, the boy then sprang to his feet and slammed them into the floor, sliding to a stop with his hands cocked beside him. Gritting his teeth, Gohan charged a blue globe of energy between his palms before, with a mighty yell, threw his hands forward and unleashed his attack. His Kamehameha wave exploded from his hands and shot into the cloud like a missile, parting it instantly.

Spotting the flash of his approaching counter, an alarmed Paprika gasped and sprang into the air, flying straight up as fast as she could and avoiding the blue rocket that curved upwards and shot safely over the spectator's heads. The crowds cried out in terror when the attack came close to wiping them out, but then watched it shoot into the clouds and out of reach.

Seeing his now scarfless opponent continuing to gain altitude, Gohan cocked his right fist back and threw a sharp palm strike. Expelling his ki at the same time, the boy fired a Kiai blast that slammed into Paprika head on, drawing a cry of pain from the girl when the attack tore into her body and clothes. The fabric of her gi ripping, the stunned demon was smacked further into the sky, allowing Gohan to leap off of the ground and rocket up at her at full speed.

Still seeing stars, Paprika quickly managed to recover from the attack and look down, where she saw her opponent on fast approach. Growling angrily, she threw both hands forward and attempted to shoot him down with a Kiai of her own. But the boy avoided it by powering up and arcing around her, his form shooting into the clouds above her in the form of a white streak of light.

Charging a pink ball in her left hand, Paprika followed him with her eyes and lobbed a ki blast after him. "ARGH! TAKE THAT!" Her energy attack honed in on the boy's form ascending into the upper atmosphere several kilometers away. But when it seemed like she had him, the demi-Saiyan suddenly appeared in front of her with a flying side kick, which slammed into her chest and sent her spiraling back down towards the arena.

Paprika cried out as she plummeted out of control. But just when it seemed Gohan had her, the girl's form vanished with a crack of wind. Losing sight of his foe, the demi-Saiyan only had a split second to react when the girl suddenly reappeared directly beneath him and, grabbing his leg on a pass, spun him into an unexpected aerial flip, using the moment of it to throw Gohan towards the ground. Upon chucking him out of the sky, Paprika threw her hand forward and fired a pink blast after him. The attack collided with the boy and knocked him down faster, followed by another. Then, as soon as his body slammed into the center of the ring, a barrage of hundreds of pink energy blasts began raining down on top of the hapless Saiyan and bombarded him mercilessly.

Shouting with every throw, Paprika hurled a continuous stream of energy attacks at the ring, filling its center with explosions that sent a fiery cloud of smoke into the air and blasts of wind across the stands. The audience cried out in terror as the arena was practically firebombed and the half-Saiyan seemingly incinerated in the attack. Piccolo, Zangya and Videl looked on in shock and worry as Gohan was struck down by the rain of death, which lasted for several long seconds before ending with a spectacular finale.

Hercule, who was literally hanging onto the seal of the window, gawked out onto the stage with wide eyes. "Oh no. G-Gohan. How is such a strong kid being beaten down by such a little runt?"

A black mushroom cloud hung above the ring at the end of the assault. With the announcer having to duck and cover at the very edge of the battleground, when he felt the tremors subside, the man immediately took that as his cue to stand and, upon adjusting his glasses, looked into the epicenter of the disaster zone.

"Wow. What an attack. A rain of energy from above has knocked tournament favorite Gohan out of the air and turned the entire center of the ring into a smoking crater! Is our gutsy young fighter down for the count?!" When he saw the smoke eventually lift from the hole, the man peered across to see if there was a body. However, after analyzing the ruined patch of space, the announcer gasped in shock when he saw nothing. "He's gone folks! Gohan is nowhere to be seen!"

"What?!" Paprika shouted, gritting her teeth and looking around at the four corners of the field from above. "Damn it! Him and his stupid disappearing acts! Where the hell did that scumbag go this time?!"

Then, like an echo on the wind, the girl's eyes widened in surprise when she heard the sound of a fast approaching, familiar yell.

"GeronimooooOOOOOOOOO!"

The Makyan turned, "Wha-" BAM!

With a deafening thunderclap, Paprika was unexpectedly hit from behind by her opponent diving down at her feet first and slamming a double kick into the side of her face. The impact of the blow not only rocked the entire stadium with an earthshaking tremor, but the attack managed to knock the girl clear out of the sky and slammed her straight into the corner of the arena.

The entire quarter of the tiled ring exploded in a shower of dust and debris, which pelted the audience and drew a cry of terror from everyone in that general direction. When the cloud eventually faded seconds later, it revealed an enormous, disheveled crater where a major portion of the concrete used to be.

Smiling at his success, a badly bruised and slightly singed Gohan dropped down from the sky and landed on what he called 'his' side of the ring. Assuming a proper standing position, he watched and waited for the air to clear, the audience and the announcer also turning to see what'd happened.

"YES!" Videl cheered, completely thrilled by his brilliant maneuver. "Well done!"

"That's it. Use your training, Gohan," Piccolo murmured with a smile on his face as he and Zangya continued to watch closely from above.

After a few seconds of waiting with no sign of his opponent, Gohan and the audience began to believe that Paprika had been knocked out. However, when everyone felt a tremor work its way up from the crater, the announcer and the young Saiyan quickly realized that she was still alive and well. A few seconds of waiting later, the crowd then saw the crater explode and from the debris, the Makyan's shadow reemerged.
The announcer grinned with delight. "Incredible! After a wicked hit that buried her inside the ring's corner, Paprika is back on her feet and ready for more!"

Floating out of the hole, the demon girl landed directly across from her opponent on her side of the board. Her clothes torn up with more bruises covering her body, the Makyan spat the blood out of her mouth and glared across at her equally damaged foe.

"I hate you."

Gohan smiled, "Ah, don't be like that. I'm sure you'll grow to like me sooner or later."

"This may come as a shock to you, but I didn't come here to make friends," Paprika responded sharply, her frown deepening as she reached up to clean the blood trickling down from her mouth. It was a gesture that was copied by her opponent. "I came here to wipe the floor with you and make you pay for what you did to me. A killer like you doesn't deserve the mercy of appropriate social etiquette."

The demi-Saiyan frowned at her response, "Look, I'm sorry about what happened to your father and your planet. But he left me no other choice. It was either beat him or watch him suck the entire earth into the Dead Zone. If you were in my shoes, struggling to hold onto the ground and protect your friends, you would have done the exact same thing that I did."

Snarling at the boy's reasoning, the girl clenched her fists tightly and snapped, "Don't lecture me on perspectives, you retch! I wasn't the one that condemned a father and wiped an entire race of people from existence. You were!" Her angry retort had Gohan flinch at the pain he could sense in Paprika's words. "It's useless to get me to see your point of view. My father and my home are gone… and there isn't a damn thing I can do to get them back. The only thing that's left for me in their place is misery… and the only way I'll be able to get rid of it is to make the one who ruined my life suffer for all the pain that he's caused me."

As Gohan listened to the girl's angry tirade, the stadium remained silent as the announcer and the audience also lent an ear to the pair's conversation. While all those closest to their level could definitely hear the girl's shouts and statements, all of Paprika's hurt and frustrations were being directed to one person and one person only; and that was her opponent.

Remaining as he was, the demi-Saiyan allowed the girl to get all the words she had off her chest.

"You were the one that destroyed my home planet!" the Makyan girl snapped fiercely. "YOU were the one that murdered my father and left me all alone in the wilderness! You have no idea what it's like to be stranded out in the cold with nothing and nobody to return to! You have no idea what it's like to lose your family!"

This part had the half-Saiyan flinch. His hand clenching and unclenching momentarily, the spiky haired warrior then looked across at the girl with sadness reflected in his eyes. "You're half right. I don't know what it's like to lose my home."

When he saw the girl narrow her glare, Gohan looked up at her and continued. "But I do know what it's like to lose someone you care about and to be left out in the cold… and I know what it's like to lose a family member… especially a father." These words brought a tinge of pain to the boy's own heart and had him wince on the inside.

Hearing the boy's response to her outburst, Paprika remained as she was, quiet and motionless. Eventually, after processing her opponent's own heartfelt statements and seeing the sadness reflected on his face, the girl tightened her fist again and shook her head, "Then you should know why I have to do this."
Swallowing, Gohan nodded, "Yes." He then gave her a serious look. "Do you want to dispense of the rules and try to kill each other?"

"No. I'm not going to kill you," Paprika replied, her anger still burning strongly as a current of red electricity shot up her arm. "If I did, then that would make me even worse than you; a person lower than the scum in the gutter. Besides..." The corner of her mouth twitched into a smile, "It would be a lot more satisfying to beat you within the rules. Don't get me wrong, I'm still going to hurt you... and what better place to do that than on a stage like this?" She gestured grandly to their already half destroyed arena. "I'm going to beat you in front of all these people and burn you for all the crimes you've committed."

Gohan frowned at her declaration, "Sorry to disappoint you, Paprika, but at the rate this fight is going the only way you're ever going to beat me is to knock me out... and I'm not even fighting at half my real power yet. If this is all that you have to show me, then this match is as good as over."

It was these words that brought an even wider smirk to the girl's face. "I agree. This match is as good as over... for you anyway." Her response prompting the boy to raise his eyebrow, Paprika then flicked her hair back and raised her hand. "Did you honestly think that I would face you in battle without some sort of plan? You see, I have a little trick up my sleeve that you may be quite familiar with. After you destroyed my home planet and scattered its debris on the wind, I was able to collect several of the fragments that managed to survive and fused them with my body." This reveal immediately had Gohan look up with a start and watch as a feral grin slowly pulled across Paprika's face.

The expression she took on was one that was both menacing and intimidating, and sent a chill down everyone's spines.

"The radiation from the Makyo Star's soil stimulates the cells inside of its natives and increases our energy output several times over. That means, with the planet's rock imbedded in my system and combined with my energy, I'm able to do something like this!" Her body tensing up, Paprika tightened fists and gritted her teeth, a loud snarl escaping her lips as she began to focus her energy. A red glow starting to radiate off of her body like fire, Gohan narrowed his eyes and watched closely as Paprika went through the most unusual power up. Her energy levels fluctuating and veins starting to pulse around her forehead, the ground began to tremble and the air started to grow heavy with a growing physical presence.

Then, only three seconds after Paprika began focusing her ki, the Makyan child then experienced a sudden and startling transformation. In the blink of an eye, the girl's mass and size increased drastically, her height shooting up to that of Piccolo's, her muscles bulking, and her entire body taking on a more shapely, womanly form. To top it off, Paprika's sickly green skin darkened to a forest shade, her white hair elongated and, with her sudden increase in size, her clothes exploded off of her body, shredding into pieces and leaving the girl in nothing but her shoes, a black sports bra, and white underwear.

To put it into perspective, the Makyan girl went from petite, Videl stature to fucking She-Hulk in appearance in less than half a second.

While the announcer freaked out at the girl's sudden transformation and the audience gawked in shock, Piccolo, Zangya, Videl and Gohan's eyes widened in horror when they sensed the girl's ki skyrocket to an unprecedented level.

"What the shit?!!" the Hera shouted.
Gasping, Gohan had absolutely no time to react when he saw the enormous Paprika appear directly in front of him and nail him across the face with a hook. The blow connecting with a clap of a shockwave, the half-Saiyan could only yell in shock as he was sent spinning across the ring and towards the edge, almost blacking out from the force of the hit.

Just before he could try and correct himself, his opponent once again vanished in a crack of wind and reappeared in his path. It was here Paprika swayed backwards so she was floating horizontal to the ground and threw a kick straight up into the approaching Gohan's stomach. The blow struck with a deafening 'crack' and sent the hapless half-Saiyan spiraling skywards, a yell escaping his lips as he climbed altitude at breakneck speeds.

Several seconds into his flight, before he could regain any form of bearing, the boy was then suddenly stopped dead when his opponent shot up after him in a blur of movement and slammed a knee into his stomach. The sudden, violent blow generated a shockwave that dispersed the clouds around them and had Gohan spit up blood. A grinning Paprika then allowed the boy to remain doubled over her leg before, lacing her hands above her head, the Makyan dropped a hammer blow into his back and sent him plummeting back towards the ring.

As Gohan spiraled in his descent, Paprika effortlessly held her right hand out and, with a smirk, launched her follow-up attack. "Pepper Shot!" A flash of pink light followed by a continuous barrage of energy blasts rocketed from her hand and towards the falling warrior.

The stream of attacks collided with the demi-Saiyan in midair, bombarding him and sending him rocketing towards the ring at a much faster rate. A split second later, Gohan and the barrage of energy beams collided with the ring, causing a series of concussive explosions that shook the arena and scared the hell out of the audience.

The announcer and the Junior Division competitors standing on the lawn literally dove for cover as the ring was ravaged by the rain of energy attacks.

The cloud of dust that filled the air pelted the audience with debris and prompted a closely watching Videl to rush forward in shock. "No! Gohan!"

Watching her blasts nearly rip the ring to pieces with little to no effort, Paprika, still holding her position high up in the sky, smirked triumphantly as the smoke slowly started to lift.

"You poor fool. With the power I possess, you don't stand a chance against me. By absorbing the remains of the Makyo Star into my body, I've not only increased the regenerative capabilities of my muscles, I've probably become the most powerful force in this entire quadrant," Paprika stated in a now deeper tone of voice, her eyes narrowing when she saw a crater in the center of the ring emerge from the smoke. "I have the sum total of my entire race's strength coursing through my veins. There's not a single being alive that can stop me… not even you."

The moment she said this, the center of the hole exploded in a shower of debris and, from the rubble, Gohan reemerged. With his gi in tatters, and bruises and burns covering his entire body, the spiky haired Saiyan panted heavily and glared up at the girl hovering in the sky overhead. Seeing her form like a big, green beacon against the clear blue canvas, the young warrior growled through bloody teeth while the audience up in the stands watched on in dead silence to see what the young fighter was going to do next.

Whatever had happened just then, it was clear he'd taken a massive amount of damage in that attack.

Paprika chuckled in amusement, "Stay down you weakling. It's useless to try and fight me."
Spitting to the side and straightening up, Gohan clenched his fists, "We'll see!" Then, with a yell of rage and effort, the boy powered up to his maximum, his blue aura exploding around him and his hair blasting upwards on the wind. It was a sight that stunned the crowd, awed the announcer and brought a grin to Videl's face, who watched closely as her friend started to get serious.

Aura burning brilliantly, the young demi-Saiyan exploded from the ring and rocketed up into the sky towards his opponent in a streak of blazing blue light. Reaching her in under a second he swung out, only for Paprika to vanish in a blur. Passing her, Gohan came to a stop and, his aura flaring up a second time, he changed directions and shot back down towards ground level.

Managing to avoid his first attack, Paprika tucked and began to roll as she fell, a split second before vanishing a second time when the powered up Saiyan came down from above with another swing. Missing her, Gohan growled and shot after her across the sky. The Makyan reappeared out of her high speed movement traveling backwards, teeth gritted as she watched her opponent's ethereal form rocket towards her and swing at her with a roundhouse kick. In another blur she flew up into the clouds and avoided his attack, causing Gohan to miss and chase after her once again.

A trail of blue energy marked the path of the Saiyan as the raven haired warrior pursued Paprika through the atmosphere. Crisscrossing back and forth, he attempted to catch the demon when she passed him again, only to end up chasing after her once more. Flying back over the stadium where the audience could see them, Gohan attempted to run her down, only to see her vanish and blindside him with a swift shoulder tackle that sent him spiraling to the side.

While he was spinning out of control, Paprika intercepted the young half-Saiyan and dropped a kick on him from above, slamming him in the back and sending him plummeting towards the arena far below. Seconds later, before the winded boy could impact the ring's surface, the Makyan girl instantly teleported beneath him and caught him with a knee to the stomach. As soon as the boy's momentum stopped and he was doubled over her leg, the girl brought both her hands up and smashed them into his back. Gohan slammed into the ring's floor, his head bounding off of its hard surface, stunning him, before a foot smashed it back into the concrete.

After only a few seconds of fighting, the boy once again found himself at the mercy of his opponent.

Paprika smirked as she felt the boy squirm uselessly under her heel. "What's the matter, scum? Can't get up?" Hearing him growl in response, the Makyan girl chuckled. "Come on. I know this isn't the best you can do. Get angry. Show me your real power! I want to fight you and beat you down at your strongest!" When the still base form Gohan attempted to push up again, the girl ground her foot into his head and shoved him back down with a loud crunching sound. Receiving no words in response, she frowned deeply. "FINE! Have it your way!"

Before the announcer even had a chance to start a count, Paprika stepped off of Gohan, charged up an attack and, holding her left hand up, began firing blasts directly into his back. "Meatball Shooter!" A stream of rapid fire energy shots left her hand and began slamming into the boy's back over and over again. The amount of blasts she unleashed tore up the ground around the demi-Saiyan and ripped into his back, cries and screams of agony leaving Gohan's lips when he was hit at pointblank range by the assault. His entire upper body was hammered into submission.

A feral grin of excitement pulled over Paprika's face as she gleefully roasted the youngster beneath her.

The audience could only watch in shock as the girl laid out the young fighter with ease, a smile ever-present while she hit him again and again until the floor directly in front of her had turned into a blazing pink inferno. Piccolo and Zangya glared down at the ring nervously, the former uncrossing his arms and preparing to jump in, and Videl had her hands clapped over her mouth in horror.

After several more seconds of continuous shooting, Paprika stopped, allowing the flames from her attack to fade and reveal to everyone there what had happened to their favorite young fighter. When the smoke lifted, they saw the still intact Gohan lying beneath her feet, his shirts incinerated and his entire upper body battered and burnt. The sound of his heavy breathing and the sight of his agonized face had the Makyan leer in satisfaction.

"How does it feel, Gohan? How does it feel to be the victim, to be the helpless one… to have your face buried in the ground and to have no one here to help you? Does it hurt?" The girl spat and, kicking him in the side, rolled him onto his back and elicited a yelp of pain from him. "I bet it does. So how about we continue this little game? I've got a lot more frustration to take out on you… and I'm not going to stop until I hear you beg for my forgiveness." She then held her hand up and began charging yet another energy attack. "Now… BURN YOU MURDERER!"

At that exact moment, Gohan's eyes flew open and, with a yell of rage and a flash of teal, he sprang up from the ground and nailed Paprika directly in the nose. The force and speed of the punch practically caved the girl's face in before sending her flying through the air and bouncing across the ring. When she eventually rolled to a stop a second later, the girl grabbed her face with both hands and yelled out in agony.

"GAAAAAHHH! FUCK!" Gasping in shock, Paprika slowly stood back up and looked across the arena floor. When she did, she saw her now standing opponent become engulfed in a golden aura before a brilliant flash of light engulfed the entire stadium.

Blinded by the flare and deafened by the immense howl that came with it, Paprika only had to wait a couple of seconds before the anomaly died down. When she looked back, her visage twisted into one of shock when she saw her opponent standing there, bathed in a golden glow, his eyes teal and his once night black hair turned a shining blonde.

While Hercule and the rest of the stadium gawked at the boy's transformation to his first level of Super Saiyan, Videl was overcome with joy, her eyes sparkling just as brightly at the young male's ethereal form.

"Yes!"

"Have you calmed down?" Allowing the shock to settle in and seeing the girl take a step back, the shirtless Gohan cracked his neck and smirked, "Good. Now we can do this properly. You want a fight that badly, Paprika? Well… you've got one."

Shivering at the amount of power she could now feel coming off of the boy, Paprika grinned and clenched her fists. "Finally. This is exactly what I was waiting for… Mr. Super Saiyan." With a growl of effort, a red aura exploded off of her body and engulfed her in the same manner the boy had emitted his cloak of energy. The earth trembling at the amount of power both fighters were generating together, the Makyan, now at full power, then took a fighting stance and shouted, "Let's do this! Bring it on!"

His fists tightening even more as he gauged his adversary's power increase, the hybrid Saiyan's eyes narrowed and his jaw clenched. "You asked for it." Gritting his teeth, the transformed Gohan then exploded from his spot and charged at the girl in the form of a golden flash, crashing into her head on and elbow first.
Paprika threw her arms up in time to block the blow the youngster tackled her with. However, just as she was leaning back from the force of the impact, she suddenly saw his afterimage pass directly through her, causing her to blink in shock. A split second later, Gohan's faded form solidified directly behind her and, reversing directions, elbowed her in the back. The unexpected attack knocked the girl off her feet and sent her flying forward.

Managing to gain control of her flight, the stunned girl spun into a flip, rotated around and landed deftly. Throwing her hand back, Paprika gave a loud growl before, throwing it forward, unleashed a blinding white blast from her hand that rocketed towards the Super Saiyan standing directly in her line of sight. "WONTON BLASTER!" With a mighty howl the attack rocketed towards the boy at light speed, only for the golden warrior to vanish before the beam struck that side of the ring and completely disintegrated the edge in a catastrophic explosion.

When the audience was pelted by dust and debris, Paprika's eyes snapped behind her, where she saw her opponent reappear.

Clenching his jaw tightly as he watched the demon curl her fists and take a stance as well, Gohan then brought his guard up to his sides and dashed forward. Rushing at her in a blur of movement, as soon as he was in range he cranked his right fist back, gave a mighty yell and, taking aim, drove his fist into her chest. Paprika's forearm flew up to block the hit and, as soon as the earsplitting shockwave rang out and rocked the entire stadium to its foundations, the pair began to fight.

Gohan's fists flew at Paprika in blurs, slamming into her arms again and again as they shot up to intercept his attacks. Continuous shockwaves exploded off of them as they boxed it out in the middle of the arena. With every hit generating a violent tremor, the demi-Saiyan continued attacking her with reckless abandon until Paprika pulled her fist back and slammed a punch into his face. The boy took the blow, his head cocking to the side. But even as her knuckles buried into his cheek, the young Super Saiyan only growled against it and violently shoved it away with a quick shake of his head.

Eyes widening in alarm, the girl threw a hand up to block a swinging left punch, only to then see the Super Saiyan leap up and drive a knee into the side of her head. The blow impacted with a thunderclap, knocking the girl to the side with her eyes glazed over. Before she could fall, Paprika recovered quickly and threw up another guard, only to then receive a palm strike to the cheek.

The hits landing with deafening thuds, Gohan then brought both his fists up and, with a yell, drove a hammer blow into his opponent's back. The girl crumpled from the attack, but as soon as his fists lifted free, Paprika retaliated with a vicious flurry of attacks. In the blink of an eye, both Super Saiyan and Super Makyan began pummeling each other with lightning fast blows, thunderclaps ringing out at a machinegun rate while they fought across the decimated arena.

With every blow that connected the stadium shook and as the spectators held on for dear life, the announcer stood beside the ruined court in awe. "This fight just got real, ladies and gentlemen! Right now, both Gohan and Paprika are giving each other everything they've got! Their punches are so strong; every single blow they land is causing the heavens themselves to shake! WHAT A MATCH!"

Crying out furiously with every attack they threw, both opponents continued to lay it on the other as they moved across the concrete floor. Avoiding as many of his adversary's blows as he could, Gohan cranked his left fist back and threw a straight, only to have the girl parry it and retaliate with another furious onslaught. The dance continued, and as the damage to the ring started to mount, so did the damage on both fighters as they began landing more and more devastating blows on each other.
Zangya, gripping the walkway's railing so tightly that the metal was starting to bend, gawked at the sight below. "Are you seeing what I'm seeing? Unreal..."

The Namekian's expression reflected equal surprise. "Yes. I see." Upon uttering these words, his expression then became one of seriousness as he scrutinized the boy's opponent more carefully. "Her power level is almost exactly the same as Cell's maximum when he fought against Gohan after he became an Ascended Saiyan for the first time. No wonder she's putting up such a good fight."

"How the heck can someone trade blows with wonder boy like that?" There were very few out there that could actually trade blows with the young Super Saiyan, but this girl was managing to give even the youngster a hard time. However, the sight of it brought an amused smirk to Zangya's face. "Heh. He must be loving every second of it."

Slamming their elbows into each other and generating an electric shockwave that sparked off of them, both Gohan and Paprika sprang away from each other and landed on opposite sides of the stage. Upon touching down, the pair took defensive stances, with the Makyan blasting forward and rocketing towards her foe without hesitation. In a blur, she slammed a hook across his face with a thunderclap, only to receive an uppercut in return.

Back flipping away, Gohan landed on the very edge of the crumbling arena and flew forward, meeting his staggered foe in the center and once again locking in another heated exchange. Punches and kicks flying, flashes of light bounced off of the two fighters as their blows impacted one after the other. Then, after a full minute of merciless pummeling, the pair ended it with a right punch that crashed into the other's face and sent them flying back.

Trailing blood, the pair slammed their feet into the ground and skidded to a stop. As soon as the brakes were applied, the pair sprang into the air and, charging at each other, vanished in the blink of an eye.

All of a sudden, the sky was filled with a series of invisible explosions, shockwaves bursting all around like fireworks. The force of each blast causing the entire island to shake, the two super powered warriors began fighting each other at a speed neither member of the audience could keep up with. Even Piccolo and Zangya had lost complete track of the pair as they looked up towards the sky and saw their blurred forms darting through the clouds in all directions.

The sounds of more thunderclaps ringing out and drawing cries from the already terrified audience, the exchange lasted for well over a few minutes. But then, as actual explosions began ripping throughout the space above the stadium and the sight of ki blasts began streaking across the blue canvas, a final shockwave, much larger than any of the ones before, rippled across the island and nearly split the land in two. The force of it was so violent that the coliseum and the surrounding buildings cracked and crumbled.

Upon bracing themselves against the blast, Piccolo, Zangya and Videl looked up to see Gohan plummeting from the sky and being chased by the red blur of his opponent. However, just when it seemed like the boy was going to hit the ground, he suddenly vanished into thin air and blindsided his pursuing foe with a kick that sent her spinning through the air. After several hundred meters of flight, the Super Saiyan intercepted her and, with a well-timed follow up, kicked her out of the sky and sent her rocketing towards the ring.

The girl struck another corner and blasted it into rubble, sending dust and debris flying into the air. When the tremors from the impact died, the audience looked up once more, wondering whether or not one of them had finally been knocked out for good. Even Videl swallowed heavily as she nervously eyed the crater the teen had landed.
However, after a couple seconds of waiting, the rubble suddenly exploded outwards and Paprika emerged with a scream of rage. Bringing her fists down to her sides, the badly bruised and bleeding girl snarled angrily and glared up at the sky.

"Dargh... no!" Her opponent was gaining the upper hand. She couldn't let that happen!

Spotting her adversary landing on the other side of the arena, she then saw him rocket towards her in a golden flash. Cranking her fist back, Paprika attempted to hook him, "WRETCHED LITTLE-" Her punch missed though when Gohan, quick as ever, sprang over her and, landing behind her, slammed a kick into her back and sent her blasting across the arena with a shout of pain.

Quickly flipping forward and recovering with a swift landing, the Makyan spun around and shot back at her foe, a bellow of rage escaping her lips as she cocked her left fist over her shoulder. Her arm shone a hot pink as she prepared to deliver a power blow to knock the bastard out. But the second she came within range and threw it, Gohan managed to duck under her swing and deliver a powerful uppercut into her stomach, burying his knuckles into her rock hard abs.

The pair remained like that, glaring fiercely at one another with strangled groans escaping Paprika's teeth and a growl leaving Gohan's, his expression tightened into one of blind fury. Upon holding their positions for several full seconds, the motionless audience then saw the Makyan girl stumble away, her body hunching over and both hands moving to grip her gut.

Mouth agape, the girl choked up blood that dribbled onto the floor from her lips, at the same time her opponent pulled his fist back and panted exhaustedly. The fight so far had dealt both of them a great deal of damage, as the two of them were covered in intense burns and bruises. They were also bleeding profusely from over a dozen open wounds.

Clenching her jaw, Paprika glared hatefully at her battered foe. "How the hell is this happening?!" Sucking it in, the girl shot up and took a shaky fighting stance. As soon as she did, she blasted forward and threw a punch, only to have it caught in the firm grip of her opponent.

Fist trapped, she threw another one, only to have that fist caught as well.

Locking them in stalemate, Gohan yelled out in rage and tightened his grip on the Makyan's fists. The sounds of bones creaking and muscles popping ringing out like they were being amplified, the audience gave a collective wince when they heard a cry of agony escape Paprika's lips and watched as she tried to pull her fists free. However, no matter how far she leaned away, the boy refused to let her go and increased the pressure.

A growl escaped Gohan's lips when he tightened his vice-like grip even more and Paprika gave another cry of agony, her fists starting to break.

Not wanting to lose out, the Makyan acted instinctively and threw a kick up into the boy's chin, smacking his head upwards. The moment the demi-Saiyan's head was cocked back, the girl looped her legs around his arms and yanked her fists free, before bringing herself up and preparing to drive a blow down onto his head.

As soon as she threw it, Gohan leapt up at her and rammed his forehead into her face, knocking the girl off of him and sending her crashing to the floor. What soon followed could only be described as the most vicious beat down the stadium had ever seen, as the Super Saiyan mercilessly picked the girl up and pile-drove her into the floor with a deafening crack. The girl retaliated by slamming a kick into his stomach, only to receive an elbow to the face in a counter that had her stumbling across the ring. Gohan sprinted after her and nailed her with a hook, only to then get knee'd in the face and sent staggering backwards.
Rushing him, Paprika then prepared for an elbow, only to get kicked in the side and knocked off her feet. As soon as she was in the air, Gohan charged after her falling body and kneed it in the ribs, slamming a hook into her face and then a kick that sent her flying upwards. But then, just as the Makyan was gaining altitude, the boy blasted off of the ground and intercepted her in the sky.

Without thought or hesitation, the boy tackled her in the back and sent both of them plummeting to the ring once more. A cry of terror left Paprika's lips before she was smashed stomach first into the edge of the ring and had Gohan's knee drive into her back. The force of impact shattered the stone and had the girl choke up blood.

After crash landing on top of the Makyan, the half-Saiyan stumbled away and prepared to fire a blast. But just before he could hit her, Paprika leapt off of the ground and hooked him across the face. The blow landed with terrific force and sent the boy packing, but before he could fly out of reach Gohan managed to land a hook of his own, which connected with a thunderclap.

Trailing spit, both fighters skidded across the ruined surface of the arena to a grinding halt. As soon as their momentums ceased, they then glared across at one another.

The stadium then fell into a deathly silence when the two fighters fixed their hardest glares on the other. With ragged breaths leaving their bodies and sweat dripping from their pores, Gohan and Paprika held their stances, waiting to see who would break first.

It was then the Super Saiyan saw Paprika stumble forward with a gasp and collapse to her knee, an action that was marked by a thump when she hit the hard floor.

The announcer, seeing the girl crumble under the pressure, yelled into his microphone. "It looks like the damage has finally gotten to Paprika! Could this be the end?!"

"No," the Makyan hissed, looking to see the equally beaten Gohan stagger backwards as well, but manage to hold his footing. "No! I can't let this end. Not yet. Not here!" Despite the number of hits they'd landed on each other, she was the one that was losing out in their battle. This was something she wasn't going to let stand.

"NO WAY! I will not be beaten by this low class retch! I won't lose..." Snarling through her fangs, the girl shakily forced herself back to her feet and, clenching her fists tightly, she threw her head back and cried out to the heavens. "I WON'T LOSE!" A howl then followed as her red aura blasted off of her in an inferno, pelting the young Super Saiyan with debris and sending a gust of wind across the stands. When the spectators were knocked out of their seats and the announcer ducked behind the ring, the entire island shook when Paprika summoned whatever amount of power she had left.

With Gohan holding his ground as best as he could, the beaten and bruised Saiyan looked across in surprise as he sensed the girl's energy levels climbing higher and higher. "W-What...?"

"I'M ENDING THIS FIGHT RIGHT NOW! NO MORE TRICKS! NO MORE RESTRAINTS!"

With veins pulsing all over her body, including her eyes, the green skinned fighter crouched low to the ground and took aim with her hand. Holding it out so that all the fingers were extended, white and pink energy began gathering around her palm, forming a shining ball of death that began to pulse and shimmer.

Gohan's eyes widened at the sight, "Oh, crap." His gaze shot behind him, where he saw the stands of people sitting and watching the events unfolding on the ring. Upon which he spun back around and glared across at Paprika, whose entire form was starting to flicker like a red strobe as she continued charging her next attack. "She's blinded with rage. Shit! If she fires it from that position..."

There was a good chance that in her anger… if she missed, she was going to wipe out a great portion of the stadium as well as an entire chunk of the island.

Her form glowing brilliantly like a star in the center of their field, Paprika took aim at her target. Completely unaware of the people sitting in the stands around her, a feral grin formed across her face as her anger and frustration took over, "TAKE THIS, YOU BASTARD! PAN BLASTER!"

The girl then launched her attack…

The moment she did however, Gohan shot towards his opponent faster than she could react and, with a yell of his own, knocked Paprika's arm skywards, stunning her. With a crack of thunder and a flash of blinding light, a stream of pink energy exploded from her palm like a missile. The sheer force of the blast generated a sonic boom strong enough to crack the floor beneath them and shake the foundations of the entire arena. In that same instant, a beam of energy the size of a comet rocketed into the skies, parting the clouds and leaving the earth's atmosphere altogether, the sight of which caused all of the spectators to cry out in terror.

While the audience took cover, Piccolo, Zangya and Videl all gawked, as the amount of energy that had been put into that attack would've been enough to wipe out the entire planet.

When the stream of ki eventually faded and normal light returned to the stadium floor, Gohan immediately followed up on his quick maneuver by cranking back his right hand and forming a fist. The sight of his action had alarm bells go off in Paprika's head, the Makyan swaying back at the last second to avoid a powerful uppercut aimed for her head. Throwing herself away from her opponent, the demon performed a back flip and landed close to the edge of the ring. She then only had a split second to spring off of the ground and fly into the air to avoid a follow-up blow from the charging Saiyan, who then spun around and pursued her with his gaze.

Shooting into the clouds in a streak of red light, Paprika gritted her teeth and, upon reaching several kilometers up, glaring back down at the arena. "Damn you!" Determined to finish the fight, she slowed her flight and prepared to launch one last attack.

However, the second she hit the brakes, Gohan's hand was already cranked back and thrown forward, which then unleashed a blast of brilliant blue energy. "FLASH MADAN!" In a mighty gust of wind, the enormous attack shot into the sky in pursuit of the Makyan, who recoiled in shock at the size of the attack now hurtling towards her.

Gritting her teeth, she brought both hands above her head and took aim. "Fine! I'm going to-" Unfortunately Paprika didn't have time to finish her retort, because the second she began to prepare her counter, she sensed a ki signature appear directly behind her and looked over her shoulder. Her eyes widened in shock when she saw Gohan, who was supposed to be on the ground firing the attack, super speed into view and begin diving towards her. "WHAT?! How in the-"

With a deafening 'crack' and a mighty battle cry, Gohan tackled the girl in the spine and knocked her out of the sky at blinding speed. Powering up, with his hands gripping the hapless Makyan's sides, the demi-Saiyan then held the transformed girl upside-down above his head and dove towards his approaching energy blast with the intent to pile drive her into it.

Noticing they were on a collision course with his Flash Madan blast, Paprika's eyes turned white and her mouth flew open in a terrified, bloodcurdling scream.

"AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAH!!"
A split second later, the stadium was filled with the tremendous sound of a colossal explosion and a flash of blinding light when the pair crashed headlong into the attack, blue fire rippling out in all directions and causing the entire island to shake. While the audience braced themselves against the gales of wind, Piccolo, Zangya and Videl were able to watch as a body flew out the bottom end of the fireball in the opposite direction the blast had traveled, and collided with the grass outside the crumbling ring. The fighter's impact with the ground was marked by an explosion of dust and debris, which sent a thick cloud over the stands and had the people in the front rows coughing and sputtering.

When the frazzled and shaken spectators finally recovered from the madness of the fight and the sky finally cleared of smoke, they all looked towards the crater where the body had impacted. There, lying sprawled out in the center, they saw Paprika, reverted back to her base form, battered, burnt, bruised, and bleeding from a new series of cuts, lying sprawled out in the center of it.

Rushing over to her, the announcer checked for a pulse. Taking her by the shoulder and giving the green girl a light shake afterwards, the man in the shades sighed in relief and stood up. Clearing his throat and using a cloth to wipe off his dust covered sunglasses, the announcer turned to the audience and made the call, "That's it folks! The winner by ring out and knock out of the second to last match of the tournament is Son Gohan!" The man exclaimed, throwing a hand towards the ring as the Super Saiyan, unscathed from the explosion, dropped down from the sky and landed in the center.

Reverting back to his base form with a sigh, there was a long moment of silence in which the audience spent trying to get over the unbelievable battle that they'd just witnessed. After a full minute ticked by, the crowds of shaken civilians soon recovered from their stunned reveries and rewarded Gohan with a loud cheer and a round of applause. The shirtless demi-Saiyan made certain to bow in gratitude to his legions of fans, before then jogging over to check on the defeated Makyan.

"Congratulations Son Gohan. You've made it to the finals. We will now have a short break to clear up the ring and provide first aid for our contestants," the announcer said, watching as the clearly battered half-Saiyan hopped down from the stage and approached the crater where the unconscious Paprika was lying. The blonde adult made room for Gohan as he stepped up to check on the girl himself, earning a concerned look from the experienced referee. "How are you doing, big guy? Do you need to see a doctor? You took quite a beating out there."

"Nah. Compared to her these are just scrapes. I'll live," Gohan replied, glancing to the side when he sensed Videl rushing over from her spot on the other side of the lawn.

The moment she skidded to a stop alongside him and the tournament official, Piccolo and Zangya also dropped down from the sky, a sight that immediately drew the crowd's attention.

First the two kids were fighting and flying, and now they were being joined by two others who could as well. Just what the heck was going on today?

"Gohan! Are you alright?" Videl asked, hand on her chest as she gazed across at her friend in worry. "Are you hurt?"

The spiky haired half-Saiyan grinned and shook his head, "No. Just some bad bruises and cuts. Nothing a quick visit to Dende's can't fix."

"I'll say," Piccolo spoke, the towering Namekian looking down at his student seriously.

"You look even worse than you did after your fight with that Kana chick," Zangya remarked, placing her hands on her hips and looking at the boy in amusement. "Damn, wonder boy. Do you get your jollies from having your ass kicked around the countryside or what? There's no shame in admitting it."

Gohan chuckled and massaged the back of his head, at the same time stepping away when two orderlies came around with a stretcher, "What can I say? She was a really tough opponent. I had no idea I was going to end up fighting somebody like her in the tournament, much less the Junior Division." He then turned to look down at the girl as she was attended to by the newly arrived officials. "To be honest, she took me completely by surprise when she transformed."

If he had to make an educated guess, he estimated that Paprika was just as strong if not even stronger than Cell had been before he came back. All things considered, if he hadn't taken advantage of her lapse in attention, then the fight would have dragged on even longer than it had and more damage would have been done to the surrounding island. Heaven knows what would have happened if he'd held back with that last hit. The girl probably would have ended up in a far worse a state than she was now.

Piccolo, giving an understanding nod, stepped up to his student and patted him on the shoulder. "You did really well today kid. Good fight."

"Thanks, Piccolo," Gohan replied, at the same time looking down and receiving a warm smile from Videl. After returning it and feeling the girl fondly clasp at his hand, the group then turned when they sensed the orderlies preparing to move the unconscious Paprika.

As they were shuffling to her sides to hoist her onto the stretcher, everyone there got quite a start when the girl's eyes suddenly shot open and the Makyan bolted upright. The officials freaked out and backpedaled, whereas the Z-fighters remained in place, staring down at her in surprise. Watching the demon girl glance between them in wild paranoia, they then saw her eyes fix upon Gohan, drawing a surprised blink from the youngster.

Upon realizing where she was and exactly who was surrounding her, Paprika's expression became deathly serious and the Makyan girl stood where she'd fallen, gripping her shoulder at the same time. Despite being beaten to the point that she was in no condition to fight back, the group of people surrounding her still regarded her with caution, including Gohan who fixed his foe with a serious gaze.

Paprika's eyes filled with anger and frustration as she stared at the equally beaten half-Saiyan who'd knocked her out of the ring. When it looked as though she was about to lash out, she then cringed and looked away with a huff. "Why don't you just finish me off?"

Feeling Videl's grip tighten around his hand nervously, the young Gohan gave her a small smile, "Simple. I don't want to."

"Why?" the demon girl growled, turning on him with a fierce look on her face. "You didn't have any problems with doing that against my father. With that last attack, I could have destroyed this entire area just to try and take you out. So why not kill me?"

A serious look coming to his face, the demi-Saiyan frowned deeply, "Because… if I killed you… I wouldn't be able to live with myself knowing that I took the life of someone who didn't deserve it." Gohan placed his hands on his hips and regarded the girl with nothing but his full and undivided attention. "I can see the grief on your face. You fight and suffer because you lost your family… and I know what it's like to experience that kind of loss." He then spared her a kind smile, "Taking the life of someone who is in so much pain and has fought so hard to get this far wouldn't be right. You're not a bad person. Not really. If you were… then you would have done worse to me than just barbeque my back."

His sincere response had Paprika blink in surprise. "You… were testing me?" When she saw him nod his head, the Makyan then frowned back at him. "Even so… this doesn't change anything between us… and it certainly doesn't change how I feel about you. I still think you're a deceitful, cold-hearted, ruthless scumbag."

Gohan chuckled and shrugged, "Maybe. But hey, like I said, just give it a couple of years. I'm sure I'll grow on you eventually." He then extended a hand to her and graced his adversary with a kind smile. "I want to try and make things right. If you'll let me, I'd… really like to help you out, Paprika." It was a gesture that had Piccolo, Zangya and Videl glance at him inquisitively, before then looking to see how the girl would respond.

As expected, the white haired alien threw off his offer by knocking his hand away. "Save it. I don't need your pity or your charity." She then raised a finger and pointed at him, her action causing everyone standing around the boy to recoil fearfully. "This thing isn't over between us. Not by a long shot. I suggest you watch your back from now on, Gohan, because sooner or later I'll be coming after you again." Her eyes flashed dangerously with the promise of pain. "I trained nonstop for five years to face you in battle. I don't mind training for another."

"Heh. If it makes you happy, then that sounds good to me," the demi-Saiyan replied with a grin. "To be honest, I could use with a rival. It'll give me something to look forward to in the future… and you seem to fit that role nicely." His response to the girl's statements had Piccolo and everyone else stare at the Saiyan as if he'd grown a second head.

Paprika glared right back at him before leering for the briefest of seconds, "I'll see you at the next tournament, trash." The moment she straightened up, her red aura burst up around her like a flame. A fierce wind bellowing outwards and ruffling the clothes of all those standing around her, the demon girl then gave one last snarl and, in a burst of dust and debris, took off into the sky, shooting over the horizon.

When they saw her aura vanish, Piccolo felt a wash of nostalgia flood through him.

"Déjà vu."

"Hm?" The demi-Saiyan looked across at the Namekian in surprise, "What do you mean by that, Piccolo?" Upon asking that question, he saw the man turn to face him and smile in his direction.

"Your father said something very similar to me after he gave me a Senzu Bean at the end of the 23rd Martial Arts Tournament," the green skinned warrior explained, earning the attention of all the others standing around him. "Even though I was set on destroying him, the man still found it in his heart to let me go. As strong as he was, your father always had enough room for a little bit of compassion and mercy… a trait you've definitely inherited from him."

Blinking a couple of times, the boy grinned and nodded, "Heh. I guess it's kind of a habit that runs in the family."

Zangya, turning to stare after the vapor trail the Makyan had left in her wake, gave a grunt of indifference, "You sure it was okay to let her go?" Considering how strong she was, the Hera wasn't all too sure about letting somebody like her go so easily.

"Ah, it'll be fine," Gohan replied with a megawatt smile. "She's only interested in beating me to a bloody pulp, so we don't have to worry about her destroying the planet or anything." His answer had everyone give him a deadpanned stare.
"If you say so," the orange haired fighter shrugged, before stepping away with her arms folded.

Videl, still hanging off of her trainer's arms, smiled across at the others before turning her attention to the half-Saiyan hero. "You fought an amazing battle, Gohan-kun. Both of you did."

The youngster grinned, "Thanks, Videl."

After hanging back for the past few minutes and listening to the interactions between the warriors, the announcer then felt it was time to intervene. Clearing his throat and stepping forward while adjusting his tie, the man regarded the group with a smile as he then moved on to his next order of business. "I think it's nearly time to get this show on the road. You two kids can head back to the waiting room and we'll... clean up for the final match."

With that said, both youngsters quickly marched back to the main building, where all the other Junior Division contenders were waiting and watching them fearfully. The audience applauded Gohan as he left the ring and as soon as he disappeared through the practically ruined barricade, Piccolo and Zangya flew back to the walkway, leaving the tournament's staff and officials to clear things up.

The ring was barely holding up at this point. With an entire corner gone and a massive crater sitting in its center, the best the officials could do was sweep it of all the debris and give the surface a patch job. And that was it...

XXX

Up in the stands somewhere in the front row, an elderly couple had just finished picking themselves up with the help of a fellow spectator sitting alongside them. Upon dusting themselves down and picking up his wife's purse, the portly old man with the white mustache, checker shirt and suspenders smiled towards the kind gentlemen that had shielded all of them from the explosions that'd taken place at ring side.

"Th-Thank you so much, sir."

"You're most welcome," the man with the orange and blue gi and spiky black hair replied cheerfully. He then helped another young man up from behind his seat and, after making sure he was sitting down comfortably, stood up to full height and watched as the officials cleared up the area.

"My gosh. What an amazing performance," the elderly man's wife exclaimed in an amazed tone of voice, at the same time adjusting her glasses. "They never used special effects in the last world tournament we saw. Incredible."

"Actually dear... I don't think those were special effects. They looked pretty real to me," the old man cut in, earning an inquisitive look from the woman. "I do not think they would rig explosives in the middle of a fighting match. That would be much too dangerous."

"Really? But... there's no way any of that could have been real," the woman murmured, pulling out a handkerchief to dab across her face. "All those loud thunder claps and beams of light... it was almost like those two youngins' were superhuman."

The man standing alongside them chuckled with his hands on his belt. "Actually, you're right. Those two were superhuman. All of that stuff you saw out there, the flashes of light, the explosions and the flying... those were all real."
Blinking a couple of times, the wife glanced back towards the ring and, considering it for a few moments, smiled, "Oh. Well isn't that something."

Her husband turned to look towards the tall, well-built Samaritan beside them, "You must know an awful lot about this stuff to know that it was all real."

The cheerful young man gave them a sun kissed smile, "I've been doing martial arts all my life. I guess you can say I'm an old hand at this sort of stuff." He then scratched his cheek sheepishly. "Flying too."

Tilting his head at the strangely chipper adult, the elderly man surveyed him for a few moments before a gentle smile formed on his face. "Well… one thing's for sure, you certainly know what you're talking about… and I can tell that what you're saying is the truth. You have that air about you." He then pointed up at the tall stranger. "It's quite funny actually, but you look like you're wearing the exact same uniform as that Son Gohan boy."

Perking up at this, the helpful adult then tugged at his undershirt's collar and spared it a glance. "Yeah. It's… sort of our family's color at this point." Beaming at the couple now assumed in their stadium's seats, the raven haired fighter then pulled up a space next to them as well and, getting comfortable, turned to reset his attention on the ring. "I have to say, my son's growing stronger and stronger every day."

"Oh. So that's your boy out there?" the old man asked with a happy smile. "It's so nice that you've come to watch him compete."

The Son father, not only adorned in the same uniform he'd passed away in but also sporting a noticeable halo above his head, gave the words a kind smile and a sagely nod. "Yeah. I'm really glad I came. There's no way I wanted to miss this…” His eyes shimmered after he said those words. "I'll be sure to congratulate him at the end of the tournament."

XXX

Several minutes following the match with Paprika, a battle that would've turned an entire planet into a wasteland were it not confined entirely to the ring, the announcer then tapped his mike and turned to the crowd. Since everyone had managed to pick themselves up and dust themselves off amidst the ruins of the stadium, he now felt it was time to speed things along. "Ladies and gentlemen, thank you for your patience! Now that the ring has been cleared up, it's time we moved on to the final match! But before we do, let's give a hand to the brilliant performances of all our Junior Division contestants!"

It was a request the audience was more than willing to comply with. A rain of cheers and applause rained down from the stands, lifting the spirits of the children that'd fought and shaking them out of the stunned dazes brought on by the last semi-final battle.

After giving their praise, the announcer continued on with the proceedings. "It's time for the final match of the Junior Competition! Folks, let's welcome back to the arena Videl and Gohan! Come on out!" Under the collective cries of excitement from every person in the stadium, the two youngsters emerged from the waiting room.

Spurred on by the other junior division competitors, most of whom were cheering them as well, the pair strolled down the slightly ruined pathway up to the decimated ring. Seeing as that they didn't have a flat base to compete on anymore, the two of them made certain to avoid the potholes and craters that lay in their wake, and headed for a spot the announcer had arranged for them.
Now adorned in a newly repaired uniform, the still banged up looking Gohan with band aids slapped across his cheeks and forehead, grinned at his eager opponent, "This is it. Are you ready?"

Videl, not at all put off in the slightest, smiled back at him competitively, "As ready as I'll ever be."

Once both of them were out and standing on one of the only space that'd remained intact throughout the entire superhuman ordeal, the duo stood across from one another with the announcer in the middle.

Hercule, meanwhile, was currently sticking his head out the top window, "DO YOUR BEST, SWEET PEA! DADDY'S CHEERING FOR YOU!" His bellowing voice across the arena had the raven haired girl blush with embarrassment.

Upon checking to make sure both combatants were ready and waiting, the man tossed his microphone to his other hand and made the final introductions.

"We've seen these two climb the ladder of this competition from opposite ends of the board and I gotta say, what a journey it has been. Both have displayed remarkable levels of skill and strength for their age, with the last semi-final match giving us a full scope as to what these youngsters are truly capable of," the announcer read, gesturing between the pair of similarly dressed kids in front of him. "On our right we have the world champion's daughter and former Junior Division Champion Videl Satan, facing off against rising star and newcomer Son Gohan, who is also the son of former world champion Son Goku. Both descended from legends, the two have spent the past several months training together in the mountains; one coaching the other, but both learning a great deal from their partnership. Outside the ring they are the best of friends, but in here... I think it's time to see what these two youngsters have to offer! So let's get ready to Rumble!"

Drawing an awed cheer from the crowd and smiles from the two facing each other down, the announcer then used that opportunity to scamper off the ring, down the stairs and onto the lawn. Once he was certain he'd secured a safe distance, he turned back to the pair and spoke into the mike one last time.

"Alright, kids. Whenever you're ready; LET THE MATCH BEGIN!"

Blocking out the sounds of the crowd, Gohan and Videl slid into fighting stances and faced each other down.

Digging her feet into the hard mat, the raven haired human smiled, "Do you want me to take it easy on you? You still look pretty winded from your last fight." To be honest, he could probably use some disinfectant.

The spiky haired teen chuckled, "Thanks. But you don't need to hold back against me, Videl. Come at me with everything you have."

"You sure?"

"Uh-huh," the demi-Saiyan nodded affirmatively, all the while adjusting his fighting stance. "Even though I lost a bit of energy fighting that last battle, I have more than enough to go a few rounds with you." Despite being sore all over, he was positive he could give Videl the fight she was looking for.
"Well, if you ever feel like you're about to keel over just let me know, alright," the raven haired fighter said with a teasing grin.

"Duly noted," Gohan exclaimed, raising his guard ever so slightly. "Remember. Focus. Use the power that's inside of you."

Acknowledging his advice, Videl then clenched her fists tightly and took on a wider stance. Upon which she clenched her jaw and began focusing her energy. In mere seconds a white, fiery aura kicked up around her and started to burn brilliantly, causing the ring around her to tremble. "Time to turn up the heat!" Feeling her ki begin to climb from its neutral state of rest at an incredibly fast rate, the girl let out a mighty bellow as she drew on all of the power she could muster, causing debris to start levitating off of the ground several yards in all directions and her hair to stand on end.

The audience gasped when they felt the earth begin to tremble around them again, with Piccolo and Zangya giving a couple blinks at the amount of ki the girl was now starting to generate.

"Whoa. Someone went and got a lot stronger suddenly," the orange haired alien remarked in surprise, drawing a grunt from the Namekian next to her.

While Hercule gawked from his spot above the waiting room floor, Gohan meanwhile beamed with pride as he watched his friend take hold of her full potential. "Videl is really something special. I've never seen someone adapt to our way of fighting so quickly before." She learned how to fly with only a few days of practice, she learned how to produce ki in two. Her passion and determination had allowed her to push through Roshi's and Piccolo's training regimens time and time again, and no matter how many times she fell she always got back up.

Even though she wasn't Saiyan or Namekian, she was definitely one hell of a human.

After powering up to her absolute maximum, Videl gave a grin at the amount of energy she could feel blasting off of her and held up a fist. "There!" Swinging it out, the girl then sprang off of the ground and as soon as she was in the air, vanished in a blur of movement.

Even though the audience lost sight of her completely, Gohan and the Z-fighters didn't. Glancing up, the spiky haired half-Saiyan saw his friend reappear in the air several stories above him and dive straight down towards the ring. The second she blew within range, the girl cocked her foot back and, with a loud battle cry, spun a kick straight into his head.

Gohan's arm shot up to guard and the second the teen's leg collided, a shockwave rang out that produced a small, earthly tremor.

The impact being heard all around, the demi-Saiyan and his opponent held their positions for a whole five seconds. When the glowing girl eventually disengaged, the boy in orange looked at his raised arm in surprise, upon which he started feeling pins and needles that had his hair standing on end.

"Gaaah! I actually felt that." He probably shouldn't have relaxed so much. She put all of her power into that blow.

Unfortunately he didn't have time to gawk at his arm because the second Videl landed in front of him, the girl threw a right straight into his face. The boy dodged it and countered with his good arm, his fist crashing into the girl's block with the sound of a gunshot. Growling against the fist digging into her guard, the human fighter then slammed a kick into his forward leg and back flipped away, using the young Saiyan as a step ladder.
Upon spring boarding away, the instant Videl hit the ground the girl turned to the side and vanished in another crack of wind. Gohan's eyes darted left, following the clouds of dust that burst up in the direction the girl was traveling, before suddenly seeing her reappear on his right and throw a hook at his face. Blocking it blindly, he then turned to face her, where he was then met with the full fury of the girl's assault.

Punches and kicks flying, the raven haired girl began viciously attacking the half-Saiyan, forcing him to backpedal across the ring at a comfortable pace, blocking and parrying all of her attacks. Slipping left and right in a blur of movement, Gohan deflected and parried all of her blows, leading them into a running battle across the ruined arena.

The audience watched the pair vanish in the form of two indiscernible blurs that darted across the stage left and right. They couldn't tell who was who. All they could do was look around in confusion, and listen to the sounds of kiloton blows connecting over and over again. The most obvious shouts filling the air belonged to Videl, while the occasional grunt and exclamation of surprise came from Gohan.

Clearly sticking to defensive to see what else his student could do, the cheerful half-Saiyan began mixing it up and throwing in counters to try and throw his opponent off. In the midst of their scuffle, Gohan parried one of Videl's punches and threw a counter, only for her to block it and retaliate with an even more vicious assault. Glad to see how determined she was, he then threw a hard elbow, only to have it connect with one of her own that produced a concussive shockwave that cracked the ground beneath them.

Feeling the tremor, the astonished announcer gazed in awe at the sight before deciding to address his equally stunned audience. "Wow! What an amazing development! It seems our previous champion Videl has learned a few new moves since the last tournament! Feel that power! She's definitely not making it easy for our newcomer Gohan! Look at them go!"

Growling, Videl then threw a random flurry of punches, all of which Gohan intercepted with his own, their knuckles colliding in rapid succession before he interrupted the exchange with a swift, sweeping kick. Swaying back to avoid and leaping through the air, the pigtailed fighter drew her hand back and with a shout, fired a yellow blast of energy straight down at her opponent, only to see him slap it aside with a chop and counter with a blast of his own.

Videl dropped fast and avoided it, the attack shooting out of the stadium and into the sky. Once she was crouched, a blue aura suddenly exploded around her and, cocking her right fist back, produced a stream of electricity around it. She then shot forward, her energy taking on a strange, arrowhead shape that surprised the young Saiyan at her sudden increase in speed.

With a mighty bellow, the raven haired girl drove her lightning charged fist towards her foe in a blur. "Hawk Arrow!" She then connected with the cross-arm block Gohan held up, an impact producing an earthshaking thunderclap. The force of the attack traveled through the boy and punched a trench into the ring behind him, flinging debris into the air and a blast of wind across the stands.

Aura still raging around her, Videl kept her fist embedded in the teen's arm when she saw him smile at her.

"Nice power."

Grinning, the young fighter then sprang away. The moment Gohan fell into a defensive stance, his friend touched down on the very edge of the arena and powered up. Taking aim, Videl threw her hands forward and unleashed a concentrated golden blast of energy, much larger than her last, and lobbed it at the boy. The half-Saiyan slapped it out of the coliseum and fired one in kind, forcing the girl to leap to the side and avoid it. The second it took out a small chunk of the ring, she fired a second, resulting in an epic shoot out between the two.

Streaks of light flashed across the concrete mat, blasting out chunks of tile and concrete. The audience watched the display in awe, every so often screaming and ducking to avoid being pelted by debris. Eventually, after a trade off that lasted for several long seconds, Videl then had a stroke of luck when she landed off to the side and launched a single-handed blast at her opponent. This one came in low and fast, forcing Gohan to speedily leap into the air and avoid it as it took out the section he was standing on.

Suspending himself several stories above the ring, the boy breathed a sigh of relief, "Woot. That was a close one. Huh?" Noticing his opponent had disappeared, Gohan began looking around to see where she'd gone, only to then spin around when he sensed her reappear behind him in a charge. Impressed by her agility, he then engaged her in a midair battle, punches and kicks flying between them as they traded hit after hit. The sounds of rapid-fire gunshots once again filled the arena, drowning out all other noises.

Zangya, blinking as she watched the pair battle it out while the audience gawked, tilted her head when she heard Videl's shouts of effort. "Is it just me… or is wonder boy actually coaching the little spitfire?"

The Namekian warrior merely smiled.

After a full minute of exchanging blows, Videl then stopped the engagement by kicking off of the boy's arm, dropping altitude in the process. Flipping away and taking aim, the young fighter then gave a shout and fired a Kiai up at the boy, hitting him front on and causing him to lurch back slightly with a wince. It was a hit to the boy that had the crowds awe and Hercule cheer.

Dropping down to the ring, the girl crouched low and took flight, charging up at the seemingly staggered boy with a yell. As soon as she was in range, she chucked a kick at him, only to see him vanish when she was only three feet from him. Caught off guard, Videl stopped and began trying to feel him out. She spotted him at the last second and looked up, only to see him appear and drop an elbow right down on top of her. A 'crack' of impact rang out followed by a shout of pain as the girl was sent plummeting back towards the grand stage.

When she hit it with her feet, she managed to cushion her fall with a crouch. Videl then glared up, her expression cringing as she focused all of her energy and attention into her next move. "Alright. I can't screw this one up, because if I do…" Narrowing her eyes, the girl reached out with her senses and waited. Then at the count of three…

She moved!

Leaping straight into the air, she avoided the punch from her opponent when Gohan reappeared out of thin air directly in front of her. When he missed, the demi-Saiyan's gaze shot skywards, where he proceeded to watch the pigtailed girl rocket towards the clouds in a streak of white light. The sight of her ascension into the atmosphere drew a whistle from the enthusiastic warrior.

"Wow. Nice speed."

He only had to wait a couple of seconds before the girl stopped at the altitude she was aiming for, with the ring sitting far below and her opponent standing clearly in her line of sight. Gritting her teeth as she concentrated, Videl then gave a nod and, placing her hands over her forehead, one on top of the other, began to focus her energy.

When Piccolo and Zangya wondered what the heck she was doing, their eyes widened moments later when they saw the move she planned on executing next.

Golden energy crackling above her forward-facing palm, the raven haired fighter growled. "This one's for you, Gohan!" Once she was done charging, she fired. "MA-SEN-KO-HAAAAAAANAAA!"

A clap of a sonic boom rang out when she then launched the signature orange and pink beam straight down towards the arena. The beam curled in like a missile, startling the heck out of the audience and the Z-fighters watching from the stands.

Blinking in surprise, Gohan then grinned and took a stance. Watching the attack barrel down on him for a couple more seconds, the demi-Saiyan then took evasive action and leapt out of the way. He moved just in time to watch the blast take another chunk out of the ring with a concussive explosion, which hurled a cloud of black smoke high into the air. The flash of light from the blast temporarily blinded the audience and caused the nearby announcer to cry out in terror, while the demi-Saiyan managed to land safely out of the attack's lethal range.

However, the instant he landed, his eyes then snapped up to see Videl right on top of him, hooking towards his position in a dive.

"Just like with Guldo on Namek." Recognizing the maneuver as being exactly the same as the one he and Krillin attempted to use on the weakest member of the Ginyu Force, only to miss when the man used his unusual time freezing ability on them, Gohan's expression then became serious.

With impressive speed and maneuverability, the girl swung at her opponent with a punch, only to suddenly see him vanish in a blur and dart off to the side faster than she could track. Gasping in surprise, Videl looked behind her, where she saw him reappear in the air and thrust his hand forward.

Yelling out with his jab, Gohan fired a Kiai burst straight at the girl, the blast connecting while she was still in motion. A cry of pain escaping her lips as her gi was shredded by the invisible attack, Videl was unable to stop when she was promptly blasted out of the ring, where she then bounced off the grass and hit the dividing wall.

When her body fell to the ground, it was over.

After the smoke from the blast cleared, the audience looked down to see what'd happened in the split-second, final scuffle between the two fighters. When they and the announcer spotted Videl lying outside the ring on the grass, light bulbs quickly flickered on in each and every one of their heads.

Spotting the outcome for himself, the announcer brought his microphone about and addressed the fans with a shout of delight, "Well... there you have it folks! It seems the winner for the Junior Division has been decided!" Turning to the ring and throwing his hand out, the blonde haired man in shades grinned, "The junior champion for this 25th World Martial Arts Tournament is newcomer to the ring Son Gohan!" Rousing the startled audience from their shocked states, all around applause started to rain down on the arena, followed shortly by a chorus of cheers.

Whistles and shouts of praise reaching him, the young half-Saiyan acknowledged their calls with a bow before wandering over to the ruined side of the mat. Crouching down at the edge, he saw Videl struggle to sit up. Once she was upright, the girl groaned and rubbed her head.

"Ah... man. That hurt like hell."
"Sorry about that," Gohan said apologetically, squatting overhead with a beaming smile on his face. "I was supposed to hit you hard enough to knock you out of the ring, not knock you out cold. Just give it a minute."

Massaging her brain, the raven haired youngster slowly pushed herself back to her feet and staggered over. "I lost, huh. I shouldn't be surprised." Placing her hand on the ring, she smiled up at her former opponent while the audience continued to cheer and applaud. "You were incredible, Gohan. No matter how fast I moved, you were always one step ahead of me." She then slowly got back onto the ring, the demi-Saiyan offering her a hand that she gladly accepted. "Even though I knew I didn't stand a chance of winning, I still gave it my best shot. It's a shame it wasn't enough."

"Don't feel bad about it. My friends and I have been fighting like this for years, and you only just started fighting on our level," the demi-Saiyan reasoned with a warm look fixed upon the winded girl. "Still, I'm really impressed with how far you've come, Videl. After only a year of our training, you were able to become as strong as Radditz. And with your potential unlocked, your power's now roughly the equivalent of ten or fifteen of him."

Videl grinned, "Not a bad start, huh?"

The boy chuckled, "Not a bad start at all." When he saw the girl raise her fist towards him, the spiky haired warrior considered it for all of a second before responding to it with his own. Bumping knuckles, the pair shared a grin with one another as the announcer clambered onto the ring to interview the victor. "Good fight, Videl."

"Good fight, Gohan."

XXX

(Sometime later)

After the two fighters had shaken hands with one another, the announcer took a moment to congratulate Gohan and Videl for their stellar performances in the tournament and the winner on his success. Telling the demi-Saiyan that he looks forward to seeing him compete at the next Junior Division in a couple years time and the adult division later, he then invited the current World Martial Arts Champion onto the stage for a complimentary match with the youngster.

Understandably enough, Hercule was more than a little bit hesitant about making an appearance before the super powered youngster and his fans. But with some gentle encouragement from his beloved daughter, the world champ bucked up the confidence necessary to step up and face the boy.

It was a brief fight. Gohan let the guy lay on the punches and blocked all of them before lightly tossing the man out of the ring, all the while putting on an entertaining show for the audience. All things considered, everything worked out well in the end. The champ said his loss was all in good sport for the kid, much to the chagrin of his daughter and Gohan's amusement, and then he left. This then allowed the announcer to move on to the adult division of the tournament.

After being told how he would be receiving his cash prize through the mail, Gohan then took Videl through the waiting room and out of the stadium.

Hearing the clamor of the coliseum just down the road, the demi-Saiyan breathed a sigh of relief and stretched out, earning a curious glance from his best friend.

"Tired?"
"Yeah. Sore too. Man," Gohan chuckled, rubbing the back of his neck at the same time. "I really got my butt kicked around in that semi-final fight didn't I?"

"After she transformed, yeah. But you managed to pull through just fine." Videl gave him an amused look as the pair wandered down the road at a comfortable pace, passing by civilians who pleasantly waved and greeted the two finalists of the Junior Division. While they returned their gestures kindly with waves of their own, the two of them mostly focused on their conversation. "Still, that didn't stop her from going to town on you."

"I figured I could handle her as she was, but she turned out to be a lot tougher than I thought. She transformed so quickly. Not to mention I couldn't tell what her real power level was since her energy was jumping all over the place. It really caught me off guard there," the half-Saiyan replied with a nervous grin. "But now that I know what she can do, I'll be ready for her the next time we meet."

Beaming, the girl with pigtails then stepped over and playfully nudged him in the side, "I'm really glad you were able to come out here today to compete, Gohan-kun. It was a lot of fun."

"Yeah. We should really do stuff like this more often." The half-Saiyan grinned excitedly. "If the next tournament is going to be anything like this one, I want in."

A giggle escaped his friend's lips. "Just make sure to leave the ring out of it next time. Honestly, it was starting to look like a crumbling sand castle out there by the time you and Paprika were done with it."

"Heh. Don't worry. I'll try to keep the damage to a minimum in the 26th Junior Division."

Videl's expression then warmed even more as she sided up closer to the boy, drawing his attention back down to her, "Thanks for not holding back, by the way. I'd be pretty disappointed if you didn't try to win… being the strongest guy in the world and all."

A little bit puzzled by her admission, Gohan then decided to roll with it and smiled fondly back at her, "No problem." While he was exchanging smiles with her, the youngster then jumped when he got a hard pinch to the arm. "Ow!" When he looked back at the smirking girl, he saw her hold the offending fingers up and mimic a crab's pincer.

"That's for knocking me into the wall," she said, before slipping her hands behind her and grinning proudly.

Staring at her cheery expression, Gohan couldn't help but shake his head and smile. "Girls are complicated." He then looked ahead of him again and stretched his arms above him. "Come on. Let's go grab something to eat."

"What about Piccolo and Zangya?"

"Oh, I'm sure they'll be able to find us once they realize we're not in the stadium area anymore."

Videl shrugged, "Sounds good to me."

As the two fighters ambled down the road side by side, completely engrossed in their conversation and the atmosphere of it all, the pair then stopped when they suddenly saw a figure step out into the middle of the intersection up ahead. At first surprised at the man dressed in the same style of orange and blue gi that they were wearing, it only took a couple of seconds before Gohan realized exactly who it was standing in his path. When it clicked, his eyes widened and his mouth fell open in shock.
There was no way he could forget that man's face. No way in hell.

"Hey, son."

"D-Dad?" Gohan swallowed, eyes starting to shimmer as he looked upon the face of his father.

"Huh? That's..." Videl, noticing the boy's reaction, looked between the two men quickly before turning back to her friend in surprise. "What's going on? I thought you said your dad was dead."

"H-He is," the boy murmured, still unable to take his eyes off of the Saiyan standing just a couple yards away.

Goku, chuckling at his son's slack jawed expression, placed his hands on his hips and tilted his head at him curiously. "What's up, Gohan? Are you just gonna stand there and stare at me for the rest of the day?"

"Dad!" No sooner had the man asked that question, the spiky haired youngster practically teleported forward and caught the man around the neck in a big hug. His father actually had to take a few steps back since the speed his son hit him with nearly knocked him off his feet. Despite this, Goku returned the hug enthusiastically and laughed as his son smothered his face into his shoulder. "Dad! I-I thought... you... I..." Sniffing and wiping away his tears on the man's shirt, the teen floated back down to the ground, stepped away, and looked up at his father's visage in confusion. "This isn't... why are you here?"

"Well, when you were up on Kami's Lookout talking with your friend, I heard through King Kai that you were planning to enter the World Martial Arts Tournament, so I asked Baba if I could pop down here for a couple of hours to see you compete." His smile widened even more so. "You did really well, son. I'm so proud of you."

The compliment from his father had Gohan's eyes shine with tears of joy. Clearing them away with a decisive swipe of his forearm, the boy sniffled, "Thanks dad." He then wasted no time in hugging him again, this time wrapping his arms around his back, "I... I missed you so much."

Feeling the powerful boy tremble against him, the man also felt his eyes start to water. Grinning in delight, Goku rested a hand on top of the teen's head and ruffled his hair affectionately. "I missed you too, son." Upon feeling the boy relinquish his hold on him a minute later, the warrior then looked up to see Videl standing a few feet away looking at them with a mixture of confusion and curiosity. Goku promptly acknowledged her presence with a nod and a smile, "Hey there. You must be Gohan's friend."

"Oh." Realizing she was being spoken to, Videl bowed, "Y-Yes."

When his son stepped away, the smiling father turned to him and nudged him in the shoulder. "Hey. Are you going to introduce her?"

Gohan quickly jolted back into reality and, after sucking it up, grinned across at his friend, fighting partner and student, "Videl, this here's my dad." He then did the same to the other, "Dad, this is my best friend, Videl. I met her while I was competing in the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament about a year ago."

The spiky haired Saiyan nodded his head politely to her, "It's very nice to meet you, Videl."

"Th-Thank you, sir. It's nice to meet you too," the girl replied in a timid and polite fashion, "I've heard a lot about you and your adventures through Gohan. Your son speaks very highly of you."
"He does, does he?"

"Uh-huh. He said that you're the strongest man in the universe, who saved the earth many times. He even said that you were the first of their group to become a Super Saiyan."

Goku chuckled at that retelling and massaged the back of his head, "Yeah. That was a bit of a rough time for all of us. The worst fight though was against Cell."

Nodding in agreement, Videl then took on a curious look and regarded the man inquisitively for a moment. "Gohan… said that you also died during the Cell Games and that you were staying in Otherworld training with the Kais."

"Uh-huh."

"I-If that's true… how is it that you're here now?"

"Well, I had to call in a couple of favors… a couple of REALLY big favors, but I was able to convince King Yemma to let me down for a few hours to have a walk around and see the family." He grinned and pointed at the halo hanging over his head, which had the raven haired girl look at in surprise. "I'm still dead, but I've earned enough credit through my deeds to make one or two round trips to the land of the living."

"Oh. I see," Videl replied, before an understanding smile formed on her face.

"I'm just glad to see that my son is going out into the world and making so many friends," the father said, regarding the girl with respect before then turning to share a grin with his son. It was in that instant the pigtailed fighter was able to see the physical and emotional similarities between the pair, which had her gaze at the adult and child duo in wonder.

As the group stood in the middle of the intersection catching up, they were soon joined by Piccolo and Zangya floating down from above. After tracking Gohan's signature out of the stadium area and further into the district, the pair had quietly taken off from the coliseum walkway and followed the children outside of the sacred battle grounds. It was only until they started their approach of the two fighters did they suddenly notice they weren't alone, and that they were accompanied by yet another familiar face.

The Namekian recognized him almost instantly, whereas it took the Hera-seijin some time to identify the man in the orange and blue gi; someone who looked remarkably similar to a picture she saw back in the Son house.

Spotting the two aliens landing nearby, the Saiyan grinned, "Hey, Piccolo. Great to see you."

"Goku," the green warrior murmured, appearing surprised at first before smiling shortly afterwards, "Well, isn't this the weirdest day ever. First a complete rehashing of our youths happens in the semi-final rounds and then you show up. Did you come here to haunt us or something?"

The man laughed at his rival-turned-friend's comment and rubbed the back of his head uneasily, at about the same time Gohan snickered as well. "Maybe. It's kind of hard to tell. What? Am I looking a little bit transparent to you guys or something?" He then checked his halo and patted himself down.

His actions earned a roll of the eyes from Piccolo, "No. You're not transparent."

"Oh, thank kai. That would have been scary," Goku chuckled, placing his hands on his hips and breathing out in relief. "The last thing I want to come back as is a ghost. Seriously. If I did then I wouldn't be able to eat any of Chi-Chi's delicious cooking."

"Yep. That's Goku alright," the Namekian thought before narrowing his eyes, "So... you popped down here just to say hi?"

"You could say that. I've got some time left before Baba comes around to pick me up, so I'll be sure to make the most of it." It was around this point Goku finally noticed the orange haired woman standing beside the seven-foot-tall fighter and fixed his attention upon her curiously. About several seconds later the Saiyan's hair stood on end and his eyes bugged out of their sockets when he finally recognized who she was. "GAH! Y-YOU?! A-Aren't you one of Bojack's henchmen?!"

Zangya smirked, "Former-henchmen, if you please. I may have been his lieutenant at one stage in my life, but I was officially kicked out of his little gang of Galaxy Soldiers the second he tried to kill me."

Her response had Goku blink a few times before swallowing nervously, "Oh. Uhh... okay."

"The name's Zangya, by the way," the Hera finished, putting her weight onto one side of her body and staring back at the befuddled visitor confidently.

Slowly recovering from the shock, Goku then turned his attention back to his son and smiled his way, "You really are meeting a lot of interesting people, Gohan." When he saw the youngster grin, the man returned it with gusto before then beckoning everybody over, Videl included. "We can catch up soon enough. But I think it's about time I took all of you guys home. It's already getting close to lunch and I bet Chi-Chi is wondering where everyone is."

Slowly, the entire group lined up alongside the Saiyan and made sure they were all comfortably arranged. With Goku placing a hand on his son's shoulder, the youngster in turn then took Videl's hand in his, making her blush at his bold action. Zangya then wandered over to Gohan and lightly gripped his shoulder and Piccolo went over to the Saiyan and rested a hand on his shoulder. Once he felt everyone was onboard, the spiky haired warrior placed two fingers to his forehead and, after a couple of seconds of pause, the entire group vanished in an instantaneous blur.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

Many, many miles away from the island, far to the north in the Tsumisumbri Mountains, the green skinned demon Paprika could be seen standing on the edge of a high cliff glaring out over the ice covered edifices stretching for miles around her. Ignoring the stabbing cold winds brushing over her and adorned in her full battle garb consisting of leg warmers, gi pants, midriff top and thick red scarf, the youngster had spent the past hour or so just staring out over her white expanse of landscape.

After the vicious scrub she'd gotten into with Gohan, which had seen both of them receive enormous amounts of damage, the girl had retreated to this spot in the Arctic Circle to clear her head. Managing to reproduce her usual outfit through magic materialization and fix up most of her wounds as best as she could, the girl now stood there with a few patches on her face and eyes narrowed.

Reason for her current irate expression was plain and simple.

"He beat me," the Makyan thought, a snarl escaping her lips as another gust of wind blew past. Arms folded and fangs bared, the white haired fighter then drew a hand and, after pulling it back, fired a blast into one of the nearby landmarks. The explosion that followed took a massive chunk out of the ice and left a noticeable scorch mark in the rest of the enormous wall.

Panting and lowering her arm, Paprika frowned, "I swear, one of these days I'm going to smack that arrogant smile off of his face and bury his nose in the concrete."

Considering how pissed she looked, it was extremely difficult to deny that she meant what she said.

OOO

(Sometime later)

When Gohan and the others returned to the Son residence, Chi-Chi got the biggest surprise at the front door when she saw who was accompanying them. At first the woman thought she was just seeing things, but after she slowly walked up to the man and prodded him with her fingers a few times, all remaining doubt left her in a heartbeat. She threw herself at Goku much like her son had previously and embraced him for several long minutes. While there was definitely a slap or two to the guy for being gone for so long, Chi-Chi's random mood swings eventually calmed down enough to give her husband a proper warm welcome. She even gave him a kiss… several kisses by the spectators' count.

Heck, she was so caught up in greeting her husband that she completely overlooked the fact that Gohan was looking like he'd been run over by a heard of stampeding wildebeest.

Once she was done lavishing attention on him, she then introduced Goku to their newborn son. Not at all surprised yet still looking overwhelmed the Saiyan knelt by his cradle just as his eldest son had done and marveled at the little tyke up close. He even had a chance to say hello and cradle the little rascal, being extra careful not to handle him too roughly.

After spending a terrific lunch with the family, along with Piccolo, Videl and Zangya, the group then sat around the living room and had some tea together. It was in that time Goku was able to catch up with his wife and son, and allowed Videl to see how the father of the little clan acted around his family. Watching him from her place on the couch brought a warm smile to her face, as she could see how happy the people closest to him were to have him there and how they all relished the time spent together.

Another hour or so eventually ticked by and, after sharing an affection-filled farewell with his wife, ventured out onto the front lawn with his eldest child.

Both dressed in the same orange and blue gi, making them look almost identical to one another, the Saiyan pair wandered a little ways from the house till they were standing quietly out on the plains. Looking back at the building where his family lived, the Son father smiled and looked down towards his son. "I'm happy to see you're all looking after each other so well. You, your mum, dad… you three really have a handle on things here."

"Yeah. Aside from a couple of mishaps over the last several months, things have been going great," Gohan said, smiling as he glanced up at his old man. "So far, no aliens or old enemies asking for you have shown up. While I can overlook the whole Bojack thing being a direct result of Cell, Kana just happened upon this place by accident and would have ended up fighting me anyway, and Paprika showing up was mostly my fault, since I was the one who chucked Garlic Junior into the Dead Zone. Other than that, life has been great."

Following along with the youngster's recapping of the situations, Goku then turned away with a rather nervous look coming across his face. Feeling his son's eyes fixed upon him, an anxious sigh escaped his lips as he then focused his attention on his older son once again, "I'm sorry, Gohan."

The demi-Saiyan blinked in surprise. "I'm so sorry I put all of this on you… entrusting the fate of the entire world to you when you're still so young."

"Huh? W-What are you saying, dad?"

"I'm saying that this life… the one that you've lived… I never wanted it for you. I never wanted any of it to happen to you," the Saiyan whispered, looking at the boy with a solemn look in his gaze. "When you were first born, I was so amazed at how small and fragile you looked that I was afraid to pick you up. But you were so strong… and you were filled with boundless energy. Every time you grabbed my fingers or my hair, you just refused to let me go. I knew right then, from the moment I laid eyes on you, that the life we had together was the life that I wanted. I wanted to hold you, to keep you safe and to watch you grow up to become a great man."

Gohan balked when he saw hurt and sadness cross the man's face as he then looked away to gaze across the fields of their homeland.

"But instead, I was taken away from you when Radditz came to earth looking for me. I sacrificed myself to save you from him so that you could continue living, but instead I was forced to watch as you went away with Piccolo and came back a whole other person. Even though I was happy and proud to see you again, a part of me hated myself for what had happened to you. That year you spent training for Vegeta and Nappa's arrival… was a year I wanted to spend with you and your mother as a normal father… and it was all wasted. You were only four, and yet you were exposed to the worst that this world had to offer, growing up surrounded by violence and death. That's something no child should ever have to live through."

Eyes shimmering with unshed tears, Goku glanced back around at his son and looked at him with pain evident in his visage.

"Despite all that, you always did your best. No matter how big the obstacles were or how terrifying the challenges, I saw you fight and smile through it all. You put so much faith in me and everyone around you, and in turn I put my faith in you. When I saw your incredible strength, I'd convinced myself that you could handle anything thrown your way and blindly pushed you into situations I never should have from the beginning. You were just a child… and I sent you to fight not only Cell, but Vegeta, Ginyu, Frieza, and Cooler too…"

Goku then clenched his teeth and wiped his eyes on the back of his fist, a gesture that shook Gohan up something awful, as he'd never seen his dad cry before.

"I'm a terrible father. I had no idea what it was like to be a normal parent. Ever since I was your age, I'd been living all alone in the wilderness, constantly fighting and never taking the time to think about other important things in my life. Even when I had the perfect opportunity to stop and become something more than what I was, I was thrown into yet another battle… and to make things worse… I took you along with me," Goku said, shaking his head as tears trickled down his cheeks. "Fighting is all that I ever knew in life… and I did the best that I could to spend time with you and to share my knowledge just as a father should have." He then stepped towards him with a beaming smile on his face. "My only hope is that you can forgive me for putting you through all of that and placing so much weight on your shoulders."

Touched by his father's words, Gohan smiled back at the Saiyan and shook his head, "There's nothing for me to forgive, dad. You did the best you could with what you had and I couldn't ask for any more than that… you and mum both. Heck, if I hadn't started down this road, I never would have met Piccolo, Videl, Trunks, or Zangya… or any of the other people I know today. I'm glad that I was born to be your son… and I'll never forget the time we were able to spend together."
The youngster's words had the man gulp uneasily, "R-Really?"

Gohan nodded his head affirmatively. "For years I've wondered what I really wanted to do with my life and where I wanted to go. While you just wanted me to grow up happy and healthy, and to act like how I was supposed to act my age, mum wanted me to study and grow up to become a scholar. The two of you were always fighting over what I should become, leading me this way and that, trying to find my destiny. But after all the adventures we've been on and after everything that's happened in the past few years, I've finally realized what I want to become," the demi-Saiyan said, before looking up at his father with confidence burning in his eyes. "I want to become a strong fighter, just like my dad."

Taking in his son's answer had the man clench his fists and tremble. Allowing his mind to process what'd just been said to him, the emotionally moved Goku sniffed and, stepping towards his son, placed his hands upon his shoulders. "Even though this wasn't the life I wanted to give you, I am still damn proud of the man you're becoming, Gohan; one worthy of all the graces of the world." He then opened up his arms, a sight the demi-Saiyan walked into without hesitation and allowed his father encase him in a hug. As soon as their arms wrapped around one another, the eldest son buried his face into his dad's gi and felt him rub his head affectionately. "I love you, son."

"I love you too, dad," Gohan murmured.

After what seemed like several hours drifted by, the father and son separated. While they grinned and shared a laugh with one another, they failed to notice Chi-Chi, the Ox King, and the rest of the home's guests watching them from the front door until a couple minutes later. When they waved back at the family and received a wave in return, a shadow appearing beside them drew their gazes to the side. Upon which, they noticed a very short, very old lady in a witch's garb hovering beside them on top of a crystal ball.

Fingers laced together, the old group's acquaintance nodded to the two Saiyans in greeting before then focusing her attention on the one she was here for, "It's time to go, Goku."

Smiling sadly, the warrior nodded. "Okay," he replied, breathing a heavy sigh and slowly following the fortune teller out into the open.

Once he came to stand beside the mystical timekeeper, the spiky haired fighter turned back to his family. Looking from his son, to his wife, to the baby Goten she was holding protectively in her arms, to Videl, the Ox King, Piccolo, and then to Zangya standing around them, the man gave the group a wide grin and his characteristic salute.

However, before he could take off, he suddenly saw Gohan grin his way and throw his fist towards him in a challenging fashion, "Dad! I'm learning how to use the Instantaneous Movement technique! As soon as I've mastered it, the first place I'm visiting is Otherworld! So watch out!"

Goku, expression brightening even more so, held up his own fist in a similar gesture, "I'll be waiting, son."

Tears reflected in their eyes, the pair spared one last smile with one another before both Goku and Baba faded away on the wind. Their departure was marked by a gentle breeze across the fields, which whipped through the area and ruffled Gohan's hair and clothes.

Slowly, but surely, the cheerful boy's gaze moved from the spot his father once stood to the horizon beyond the mountains.
Though he had no idea what was waiting for him up ahead, Gohan had a feeling that things were going to be alright… and he was going to face the future with his head held high.

OOO

(That night)

On the other side of the planet, high above a collection of expansive snow-covered valleys and mountain ranges, a storm was starting to gather and slowly make its way across the land. The blanket of clouds being so thick that they completely blocked out the starry canvas of night, the eerie, almost hellish conditions presented the perfect backdrop for the arrival of yet another unexpected visitor to the earth.

But unlike with Goku, this one was not a guest that the Z-fighters would be welcoming gladly.

As the region howled with an ungodly wind across the heavens, a small, sphere shaped craft with a single porthole, dropped in through the planet's atmosphere and, upon arcing over one of the larger edifices of the area, crash-landed at the base of a hill. Its impact with the earth being marked by a great explosion, which itself was drowned out by another series of thunderclaps, the craft managed to form a massive crater in the ice cold ground, with the ship suffering no damages whatsoever.

It was then, moments after landing, the pod ejected its one and only passenger. Glowing in a haunting, radioactive like aura, the figure crawled out of the vessel and collapsed at the very bottom of the crater. There, the man rolled over and began to speak, his words coming out in ragged breaths and pained cries of anger.

"K-K-Ka-ka-rot…" Teeth clenching as his scarred body was hit by yet another agonized spasm, the green haired titan then sucked in a deep breath of air before letting out the most spine chilling cry anyone had ever heard. "KAKAROOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOT!"

After which the green aura surrounding the figure's body faded, and not only did the man's size and muscle mass decrease, but his green-tinted hair turned blonde, indicating a sudden loss of steam.

Following his terrifying roar, the large man, with his stomach and chest ripped open and blood pooling all around him, began to pant and breathe heavily once again. However, after clawing desperately at the ground to try and find some purchase, and after several attempts to sit up, the golden haired man with the teal colored eyes gritted his teeth one last time before, with a gasp, he went out like a light. In that same instance, his blonde hair faded to black and his body fell limp.

Despite seemingly succumbing to a most welcomed death thanks to his grievous wounds, the fact that the man's chest was still heaving indicated he was alive and well. But due to the wounds he'd sustained in his battle over a year ago, he was unable to maintain consciousness and so slipped into a quiet coma.

The world could only hope it was a long one, because as the days flew by, the crater the Saiyan visitor was lying in filled with water and iced over. The freezing temperature brought on by a freak storm meant the man was flash-frozen inside a massive pool of ice, perfectly preserving him and inadvertently placing him in suspended animation.

Those who would venture nearby would think it was merely a lake turned into a block from the extreme cold of the mountains.

But in reality… it was a cold bed for the most dangerous being to ever be born into this universe.

OOO
Far away from the planet, currently on its seventy-five year orbital flight of the Solar System, Halley's Comet could be seen tearing through the expanse of space at breakneck speeds, leaving a blue trail of dust and gas in its wake. Recognized as one of the only short-period comets in that part of the galaxy, this majestic mass of rock and ice was right now blowing past Mars's orbit on its way to Earth's rotational path, where it was set to make its grand reappearance to the people of the world.

On the surface it seemed like nothing more than a harmless homecoming of an old astronomical milestone; one that'd been observed since the days of the old philosophers.

However, what the people of the earth failed to recognize was the dark secret the comet held and what was currently being contained within its mineral encrusted form.

Buried deep inside of its eleven kilometer dimensions, sitting in the very nucleus of the comet itself, there sat a single, lone chamber. Surrounded by substances that were over tens of millions of years old and seals that were beyond the knowledge of even the most educated of scholars, the room was filled to the brim with a sturdy, solid material strongly resembling crystal. Though this seemed like a typical core for a comet of this age and origin, it was what was resting inside of its center that was the reason for such an elaborate system.

A gargantuan being, five times larger than any man with grey, rhino like skin, a body layered with enormous muscles and bone plates protruding from its shoulders, arms and face, could be seen with its hands and legs bound to the sides of the room. Its shackles, combined with the diamond crystal surrounding it, kept this creature locked in a constant state of living death, out of sight of the universe and away from any curious passers who would seek to awaken it.

It seemed like a sure system to keep whatever it was contained inside for all eternity.

But just when this entity seemed like nothing more than a corpse banished to drift forever in a cold and unforgiving void, in the dark of its crystal prison, a pair of blood red eyes suddenly opened up and a low, guttural growl reverberated throughout the chamber.

A sleeping evil has been awakened…

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Well, what do yah know. Goku is only back for a few hours and bad shit starts to happen.

Perhaps his premonition was right all along. Whenever he's around, evil shit starts coming to call.

Good thing one of them is in a coma and the other is still millions of miles away.

If anyone wants to take a guess as to who the two new faces are, be my guest. The last one though will take a bit of research for you to find out who he is. Look for something fitting the comet prisoner's description and you'll have a good idea of what's coming around the corner. I was inspired to create the comet prisoner based off of one of the most dangerous comic book villains ever created, and I figure the DBZ universe could use with an enemy like this.

Anyhow, Gohan's fight with Paprika is over and he was able to spend some time with his dad. I took inspiration of the fight from Goku and Piccolo Junior's battle and Goku and Turles's, since I thought they blended well.

Oh, and just some extra bits of info, I've included a couple new numbers below:

Cell Games:

Gohan – 12,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 160,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 335,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan 2 Injured) – 275,000,000 riki

Perfect Cell – 180,000,000 riki

Buff Perfect Cell – 200,000,000 riki

Super Perfect Cell – 300,000,000 riki

Present:

Gohan – 16,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 200,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 375,000,000 riki

Paprika – 15,000,000 riki

Paprika (Super Makyan) – 190,000,000 riki

In this story, Paprika represents a milestone that Gohan couldn't previously reach before. But after his training he's now able to fight against someone of Perfect Cell's caliber in only his first Super Saiyan form.
The weeks following the World Martial Arts Tournament in which Gohan emerged the new Junior Division Champion saw some of the greatest days in the Z-fighters' lives. Thanks to his chance encounter with Paprika in the ring and with his father later that day, the young demi-Saiyan found an even greater sense of motivation to continue training to become even stronger than before. Though the Makyan wasn't an enemy that'd been able to push him to the absolute limits of his abilities, she nevertheless provided him a small glimpse of one of the many other unique creatures living out there in the universe.

This drove home the reality that Gohan needed to stay in shape and to keep pushing the boundaries of his capabilities to become an even greater fighter than he was now. That meant harder training, healthier living, and even more studying.

Funnily enough, his sudden boost in enthusiasm was so great that it'd seemed to filter out to all the other people in his life and spurred them on to do even more with their time. Krillin had started working double shifts at his construction job and was now dating Android 18#. Vegeta, albeit hesitantly and very discreetly, had taken to looking after his son Trunks more frequently and a bigger role in Bulma's life, even if it was only physically. Yamcha was hitting the clubs like there was no tomorrow and despite failing miserably at securing a long-term relationship you had to give the man props for perseverance. Not to mention Tien had begun visiting Kame House on a regular basis, dropping in every now and again with Chiaotzu to say hi to the old team and to check up on everybody.

Surprisingly enough, he'd even brought Launch around on one of his visits, someone whom the gang hadn't seen for years but had suddenly decided to step back into the limelight.

Things were really picking up for the entire group and this wasn't even counting the more personal aspects of Gohan's days.

Between his training, his work and his part-time studies, the demi-Saiyan now had another loved one around the domicile to look after. Goten, born several months after his father passed away, had become a new beacon of light for all those in the Son household and a defining element in Gohan's life; someone he would hold close and protect over the many years to come.

He was also someone that the demi-Saiyan wanted to share with the world. Once Goten became old enough to be taken out of the house, Gohan immediately took the youngster on a round trip of the world to introduce him to all of his friends and relatives.

With Mount Paozu being the starting point of their journey, the first person the demi-Saiyan approached was Icarus the dragon. A really old friend and companion who lived in a cave Goku had found for Gohan not too far from their house, the little horned flyer often stopped by to visit the teen whenever he was at home studying or outside training.

"Hey, Icarus. How's it going?" the spiky haired fighter greeted the little dragon, who stood in front of the two boys wagging his tail like a dog. Reaching up, Gohan petted the reptile on the snout, earning a cute purr and nuzzle to his palm in return. "Aww, I missed you too, buddy." He then held his baby brother up to the creature, making sure the tyke sat comfortably in the groove of his arm. "This here is Icarus, Goten. I met him many years ago on a camping trip with Krillin, Bulma and Oolong. He's a really good friend of mine. Say hi."

Understandably the younger brother was hesitant at first, shying away from the dragon when the mythical pink animal leaned in to smell him. The newborn murmured uneasily and gripped his brother's gi top in a clear sign of nervousness and apprehension, earning a chuckle from the eleven-year-old warrior.

"It's okay. He won't bite." Wanting to show his brother that Icarus meant him no harm, Gohan reached up and petted him once again, coaxing a pleasant shriek from the winged beast. "See. He's a good dragon." Showing his baby brother how he petted the reptile on the nose without being bitten, he slowly but surely encouraged Goten to do the same.

After a few tentative pets and pokes of the dragon's snout, Goten then gave a playful giggle when Icarus returned the child's gesture with an affectionate chirp and purr, ending with the flyer nuzzling the baby half-Saiyan in the cheek.

While Chi-Chi cheerfully watched on from her place by the door of her house, the two young Saiyans were also watched closely by Zangya, who was currently learning against the standalone pole of the family's washing line with her arms folded and a warm smile on her face.

In addition to introducing his baby brother to his neighbors, Lime and Mr. Lao included, Gohan also flew him to Capsule Corp and Kame House to meet the rest of their kin. The Briefs clan and the residents of Master Roshi's place were delighted to receive the newborn into their homes, with Vegeta stating in his usual tone that the eldest son had better raise Goten to be a great warrior. While Gohan had every intention of teaching his sibling many things, he was also going to be mindful of his choices and what the little one wanted to do with his life, rather than force anything upon him. This of course led to the Saiyan Prince scolding him for the hundredth time for being a weak willed Saiyan, which punctually ended in Vegeta getting yelled at by Bulma.

Goten had a really great time at Master Roshi's place after that. Not only did he get a chance to meet Krillin and Oolong, he also got to have a play with Turtle and Puar. The child had a blast crawling and mess ing around in the sand surrounding the island, while his older brother watched over him from afar and caught up with his teammate of many years. During that hour, Gohan told Krillin about the tournament, Goku's visit and everything else that'd happened in between. He also got a chance to say hi to 18#, who'd dropped by to visit for the day and to hang out with the folks on the tiny isle.

Following that cheerful visit, Gohan then took his younger brother up to meet Dende, Piccolo and Mr. Popo on the Lookout, where the guardian of earth was able to give his blessings and congratulate the youngster and the newest addition to his family in person. The demi-Saiyan's mentor also expressed fond wishes and tactfully smiled as he watched his student hold his baby brother proudly in front of his friend from Namek.

The pair stayed there for quite some time, with Goten finding an immediate interest in the butterflies fluttering about the flower gardens and one of the palm trees growing along the walkway. Eventually though, the raven haired Z-fighter had to leave, and with his sibling in his arms, carried him all the way back home.

From that day onwards, little by little, everybody's lives started to change.
Sitting side by side at the desk in Gohan's bedroom, the practically inseparable teenage duo of the Z-fighters were currently perusing over the various texts and articles that was their schoolwork for the day. Having taken lessons under the demi-Saiyan multiple times before, the ever studious and spirited Videl didn't find the institute-like environment of the boy's study peculiar at all.

In fact, over the past year, she'd taken quite a shine to it.

Dressed in a large white shirt and a pair of jeans, with her hair done up into a ponytail, the famed daughter of the world champion Hercule Satan was presently chewing on the end of her 2B pencil while trying to solve a particularly vexing math problem. Glancing across at her tutor who was, at that very moment, doing some serious cramming of his own, she could see he was flying through the passages without any difficulty whatsoever.

When the boy in the long-sleeved, oriental white top and black pants sensed the girl's eyes boring into him, Gohan looked across at her and cracked a smile. "What's up, Videl? Are you stuck?"

The young fighter sighed and tapped the surface of her page, "I just can't get Part D of question eighteen… the one with the complex geometry sequence. Part A was easy, since it asked me to find the number of shapes and matches, but now the book's asking me to think ahead of the table and to try and find values that just aren't there."

Gohan smiled and leaned across to give her his two-cents on the matter. Without even having to read the question to realize the problem, he began running his pencil over her sheet, "It's essentially asking you to look for a basic number pattern while including the unknowns in the final answer. Just use the equation you were able to come up with in Part C, add the value of X to the formula, and you're home free."

Finally figuring out the answer after a quick look over, Videl shook her head and grinned. "Oh. I see! Thanks." She then began going through it as quick as she could, while at the same time being watched over by her ever cheerful friend and mentor. "Hey, this math stuff isn't so hard after all."

"Wait till you get to the Year 12 material. Then you're in for a real shock."

"Well… as long as I have you for a teacher, then I don't think I'll have anything to worry about," the teen replied, beaming across at the boy after only filling in a third of her answers. A smile framed her face as she fixed a warm gaze upon the Saiyan warrior. "You're the best, Gohan… at fighting and at schoolwork."

The young male chuckled and rubbed his head sheepishly, "You can thank my parents for pulling me in both directions."

Videl giggled as well and rested her chin on her hand, "You know what… I think I will."

While the pair shared a laugh with each other, they were unexpectedly interrupted by the sound of a familiar groan and looked over their shoulders to see Zangya standing by the bookshelf. Having apparently snuck into the room without their knowing, the pair saw the alien woman looking over the stacks of texts and flicking through a book on advanced chemistry.

Skimming over page after page, the Hera then breathed an exasperated sigh and shook her head, "I don't see how the hell you can understand any of this stuff. It all looks like incomprehensible gibberish to me."

Gohan rolled his eyes, "That's because you haven't learned anything about earth sciences… or any
"Yeah, well… it's not like I need any of this math and theory stuff to butt heads with an intergalactic monster or anything like that," Zangya replied, smirking as she shut the text and slid it back into its place with the others. Placing a hand on her hip, she then turned to smile at the teenagers working at the desk, "I'm into more simple things, like entertainment, clothing, fashion, and television… stuff like that. At least with those things I don't have to think so hard and can understand what's going on."

The raven haired girl shook her head, "Maybe you should think about getting a job in one of those areas." She then raised an eyebrow, "You… alien guys do work, don't you?" Her inquisitive gaze then switched over to Gohan, whom she saw scratch his head thoughtfully. "Well… I know that Piccolo doesn't work. He just flies around from place to place and meditates most of the time. But that's normal for him. Dende's the guardian of the earth so there's no helping that. Mr. Popo is his advisor, Krillin's part-time in construction like me, Tien's working as a farmer with Chiaotzu, and Yamcha has gotten back into Major League Baseball. As far as I'm concerned, the only one who's currently living somewhere but not working is Vegeta."

Videl scoffed at that, "Bulma should think about kicking that guy out of the house to go find a job… or at least something constructive to do with his life."

"Yeah. But think about the resume he would have to type up," the hybrid warrior replied before beginning to scroll through the air with his hand in marketing fashion. "Name: Vegeta. Education: None. Employment History: Prince of all Saiyans and foot soldier under the Planet Trade Organization run by Lord Frieza, who is currently deceased. Hobbies: Training and beating people to a bloody pulp." The more he said the more Videl had to stifle her laughter, as did Zangya. "Trust me. The last thing you want to see is that guy in a MgRonald's uniform doing customer service."

"Actually… that would be the first thing I would want to see," Zangya snickered behind the demi-Saiyan, who was also grinning from ear to ear.

"Yeah. Me too," Videl also said.

"Okay, okay, cards on the table; that would be pretty funny. But in all seriousness, I don't think he would be able to hold down a decent job without leveling the place he'd end up working at." To be frank, he was more concerned about the customers and the people Vegeta would be 'helping', rather than the Saiyan Prince himself.

That guy could walk through just about anything with barely even a flinch. The only thing he couldn't really take was social activity, due to his prideful nature and violent upbringing. It was a character trait everyone had come to tolerate over the many years of knowing him.

"Vegeta is the highly competitive type. Who knows? Maybe he'll surprise us," Gohan continued, shrugging while fixing his attention back onto his work, but not before glancing at the still grinning Hera behind him. "I'll show you how to write up a resume after our training session this afternoon, okay Zangya?"

The orange haired woman nodded, "Sure."

With a plan made and set, the half-Saiyan and his best friend returned to their studying. But just as they were starting to get into their routine again, the hybrid warrior was once again interrupted from his reading when he felt a tug on his shirt. Looking down to his right, he saw the familiar face of his kid brother, adorned in a similar oriental outfit he'd worn when he was younger, beaming up at him.

"Oh, hey there, little man," Gohan exclaimed, reaching over and gently picking the happy Goten up. "When did you get here?" The sight of the child inevitably drew Videl and Zangya's attentions over to him as well.

Videl giggled, "Hey, Goten."

"Wow. For a toddler he sure gets around a lot," the Hera-seijin chuckled, watching as the older brother sat his sibling in his lap. As soon as he did, the Goku miniature reached up and started playing with his older brother's face, making boisterous noises at the same time. "What an energetic little runt."

"Yeah. Ever since he learned how to walk he's been running up and down this house like there's no tomorrow," Gohan chuckled, feeling Goten pull at his cheek before reaching over to play with Videl's finger when she reached over to poke him. After playing around with his older brother and sister figure, the child then turned in the half-Saiyan's lap and focused his attention on the sheets of paper in front of him.

Looking them over, he then pointed at a document and looked up at his brother, "Oh, oh…"

"Hm?" Gohan's eyes fell on the paper Goten was pointing at. "You want to learn how to do math as well?" The vigorous nod the child gave next was all the answer the demi-Saiyan needed and he quickly shuffled them forward. "Alright then, squirt. If that's what you want. Most of this stuff is a little bit too complicated for you, so let's start off with something simple." He then one-handedly pulled up a blank sheet of graph paper and began writing big numbers on it. Once he was done, he then pointed to the first, "Okay, Goten. Welcome to your first day of school..." He then bounced the boy on his knee, earning a playful laugh from the toddler, and directed the child's gaze to the worksheets in front of him. "See this? This is the number one. Can you say that, Goten? One?"

Pointing down at the number, the half-Saiyan child made a few happy sounds and poked the symbol made in pen. "One..."

"Yes. That's good. Well done." Gohan then playfully poked his baby brother in the side, drawing another giggle from him.

Crawling his hands forward on the desk, Goten then pointed at the number next to the one Gohan had drawn. "One. One."

"No. No. That's the number two," Gohan chuckled, a light laugh also leaving an observing Videl's lips as she watched the young warrior lead his kid brother through the texts. "Two comes after one. One... two." He showed Goten on his fingers before then pointing down at the number. "This is the number two."

"Two," Goten repeated, pointing at the scribble.

"Yes. That's the number two," Gohan continued, before then pointing at the others. "All of these are numbers. Numbers are what we use for counting, adding and taking away stuff, which is really important for us. These are only the first ten." He then smiled at his baby brother, who gazed at him with that curiously cute expression of his. "Do you understand, Goten?"

Blinking a couple of times as he processed his older brother's words, the toddler looked back at the paper, glanced over the numbers, before smiling and then pointing at the one at the end. "TEN!"
Gohan smiled brightly in response, "Yes, Goten. That's right."

For the next hour after that the older brother spent playing with his brother at his desk, going through all the small numbers with him and even making a little game out of it. During this time, Videl also played around with the little tyke, getting him to read a few words to help with his vocabulary before then moving back into her work, while Zangya pottered around close by.

As the orange haired female was busy engrossing herself in one of the novels Gohan kept close to his main collection, she suddenly felt a tug on her pant leg and looked down to see Goten standing right next to her. Obviously having had his fill of playtime with his older counterpart, the toddler immediately went over to the woman he'd often seen wandering around their property, and decided to hang out with her for a little while. So, smiling cutely at her, the hybrid began playfully clapping his hands onto her leg as she set the book down beside her.

The Hera smirked, "What? See something funny, little man?" When the boy stared up at her curiously, inspecting the girl's face and hair, the child then giggled and clambered up onto her leg. Not wanting him to hurt himself, Zangya helped the young explorer up till he was sitting on her lap and facing her. "Goten, huh? It's nice to finally meet you," she spoke in a mature tone of voice, one that had the baby laugh and wave his hands around. Upon which the warrior woman then gave the child a nod of greeting. "I'm Zangya. I used to be your big brother's enemy, but now we're good friends and sparring partners… and that means I'm a pretty tough cookie. So you better behave yourself, mister."

Staring at her quietly after her little warning, the young Goten then tilted his head a couple of times before, from out of nowhere, he smiled brightly and reached out to the woman. "Zangya-oneechan."

His exclamation had the Hera recoil, "What? N-No. Wait a second. I'm not your…"

"Zangya-oneechan."

"Zangya-oneechan!"

"No, God damn it! I'm not your big sister. Geez, did your annoying brother tell you to call me that?" the orange haired woman growled, earning a giggle of amusement from the child who then pulled on her hair when he managed to grab some. "Ow, ow, ow. Don't do that." Quickly freeing herself from the boy's surprisingly powerful grip, the Hera then tried to stop the kid's flailing hands with her own. It was then she noticed Gohan and Videl looking at her from across the room, the former grinning while the latter was trying to stop herself from laughing.

The sight of the pair staring at her had Zangya blush and turn away to try and hide her embarrassment. "Not a word to anyone-OW!" Her lapse in attention allowed Goten to grab hold of her hair a second time.

XXX

(Several Days Later)

"Your brother is really adorable, Gohan," the chirpy voice of Lime spoke up as she and Gohan watched the little Goten play out in one of her village's meadows. Smiling brightly when she saw the child scamper after a grasshopper, the girl in the yellow dress beamed up at the raven haired hybrid standing alongside her. "He reminds me so much of you."
The young male adorned in the white oriental shirt chuckled, "You think so?"

"Of course. I mean, haven't you noticed the similarities?" the brown haired girl asked, shuffling closer to her friend while they leaned against the stone fence surrounding the pristine field. "His expression, his eyes, his smile, his laughter… they're all the same as yours. The only thing that's a little bit different is your hair." She then reached up and tugged on one of her pigtails, a gesture which drew the boy's attention over to her. "Yours is really not that far off from his."

"I guess you're right," Gohan replied, smile widening as he then reached up and pulled at his locks. "I'm still trying to think of a new style to put it in. This one's kind of lost its pizzazz"

"Hmm…” Lime massaged her chin as she looked at her friend from an angle. When she saw him turn to her so that they were face to face, an idea quickly popped into her head and she grinned. "You should go with the style you had in your blonde haired form; the one where it was all spiked up and standing on end."

"You think so?"

"Yeah. But make it a little bit shorter. That way it won't get caught on anything while you're fighting or running around," the girl replied, at the same time reaching up to brush some strands out of the way. "I'm actually thinking of getting mine cut too."

Gohan gave her a more considerate look immediately after she said that, "You don't need to get it done right away. I think your hair looks great the way it is."

The child blushed a little from his compliment and glanced up at the teen, who remained blissfully unaware of the significance behind his little remark. "Really, Gohan?"

"Uh-huh," the teen nodded, at the same time smiling at her cheerfully.

Running her fingers over the braided locks hanging next to her, the girl in the yellow and white polka dot dress nodded her head in acknowledgement of the boy's statements, "Thanks. I'll... I'll think about it." It was then Lime turned to him with a brilliant smile on her face, "Hey. My good friend Miyagi-san is really good at cutting and styling hair. You could come down and see him if you want to get a trim sometime later. I'd probably be able to get you a good discount for it."

The half-Saiyan considered her words for a moment, upon which he then responded with a shrug, "Sure. Why not? I think I'd like that." He then grinned at her, "Thanks, Lime."

"Anytime," the girl chirped.

Returning his gaze to the field while his friend beside him laced her fingers in front of her and rocked from side to side in a bashful manner, Gohan saw his little brother fall onto the grass and giggle when the grasshopper he was chasing landed on his nose. For the next few minutes after that he and Lime watched the child roll around and try to catch the little critter, this time going after him on all fours like a cat.

After standing there and seeing the child scramble about all by his lonesome, Lime decided to get up and have a bit of fun as well. Giggling when she hopped out onto the grassy field, the teen then hunched her back, brought her hands up into claws and gave a mock growl, at the same time advancing on the spiky haired youngster. "Rargh. I'm coming to get you, Goten."

Seeing the girl approaching him in a very Godzilla like manner, Goten gave a startled cry and ran for it. Laughing boisterously, he started running round in circles with the brown haired girl in hot pursuit.
Watching the pair jogging laps around each other caused Gohan to laugh and shake his head. "Just like Videl," he thought, remembering the time his best friend did something very similar with his brother a few weeks ago.

Even though she and Lime looked completely different, they were still alike in many other ways, right down to their hotheaded and feisty personalities.

Deciding to join in as well, the spiky haired Saiyan ran out and spoke up in a heroic sounding voice, "Don't worry, Goten! I'll save you!" Skidding to a stop when his little brother ran up to hide behind his leg, the boy leaned over to scoop up the child before being tackled to the ground by Lime. Making sure to loosen up so he didn't hurt the girl by accident, the group of three laughed outright as they began play fighting across the ground.

Even though the weeks out in the Mount Paozu region were often slow and mundane, it was days like this that the half-Saiyan and his friends enjoyed the most …

XXX

(A few weeks later)

Standing underneath the shade of an apple tree not too far from the Son family home, which could be seen sitting peacefully at the bottom of the hill, a certain white-haired figure had unexpectedly dropped by for a visit. With her arms folded, red scarf hanging around her neck and adorned in the same figure hugging uniform she'd worn to the World Martial Arts Tournament, Paprika currently had her sights set on the small, dome-like structure and the family she could see playing around in front of it.

Over the past several months, the Makyan had been making frequent trips from her training spots scattered across the continent to this place. Every time she did, the young demon always made sure to keep her distance, while at the same time suppressing her energy level as low as possible. This was to make sure that the people in the area who were capable of reading ki signatures didn't pick up on hers while she was watching them, a technique she affectionately referred to as 'stealth mode'.

After all, she was neither a friend of theirs nor was she an acquaintance of their group, especially to the spiky haired teenager living in the little shack he called home.

"Look at that brute; acting all happy, innocent and cheerful," Paprika thought, eyes narrowing as she watched Gohan, currently dressed in Piccolo's gi, crawl around on the grass with his baby brother sitting on his back. When she saw the teen giggle as his brother happily tugged on his top like a reign, the Makyan frowned, "Well you don't fool me, you orange-wearing trash. I know exactly what kind of person you are." Also watching them from a few yards away was their mother, Chi-Chi, and the Hera female standing alongside her, the former of whom was smiling warmly at the sight of her two children playing together.

The reason Paprika dropped by today was simple. She was keeping tabs on her arch enemy's training regimen to see how much stronger he was getting. By dropping in every now and then to get an update on his progress, the Makyan was able to gain a firm grasp as to how much more powerful the boy was getting in comparison to her. Considering how often he exercised every morning, noon and night, she suspected he had to be getting somewhere with his workouts.

As a result of her incredibly discreet observations, over the past several months the girl had noticed a subtle increase in the boy's power and skill, which irritated her somewhat because it appeared that his strength was growing at the exact same rate that hers was. The fact that he kept his power level suppressed most of the time and rarely transformed into a Super Saiyan during his training sessions made the process of getting an exact bead on his power increases all the more frustrating for her, as she couldn't get an accurate reading from him.

However, determined to learn more about her nemesis in order to prepare herself for the next time they met, Paprika persisted. Coming to the same spot in the middle of every week, the girl would take up position under the same tree, stand there for the entire day, and watch him.

Sure, every now and again she would break away to get some meditation and Image Training in to keep up her strength, but for most of those twenty-four hours she would stand there and observe his actions. And each and every time she did so she found herself baffled by the fact that such a powerful warrior, who's fighting spirit was capable of matching any seasoned martial artist, could regress to such a childish ball of innocence.

"He's like this every single day. When he's not focusing on his training, he's always bouncing around and grinning like an idiot. It's absurd," Paprika grumbled in her head, looking on as another hour ticked by and she saw the teen walk back into the house with his family.

From her spot she watched Gohan return to his desk at his bedroom window to study. Though she couldn't see exactly what he was working on, she knew that it had to be one of his more advanced literary titles. She could also sense the mother was inside the house pottering around the dining area, along with that orange haired woman who seemed to be occupying herself in the living room.

Things quieted down from that point onwards, leaving Paprika standing on the hill in silence. Continuing to watch the house like a hawk, the white haired Makyan became so engrossed in her studying of her enemy's mannerisms and activities that she failed to notice a presence sneaking up behind her. It wasn't until a few seconds later did she eventually pick up the sound of a giggle, which had her turn around slowly and look down.

It was there she saw the one year old Goten standing there in green and yellow oriental clothing smiling up at her.

"Hello," the hybrid child exclaimed, eyes shimmering in wonder as he stared up at the Makyan.

Paprika, not at all surprised by his appearance, acknowledged his presence with a notable air of caution.

Straightening up and puffing her chest out, she fixed the boy with an impassive gaze. "Go away." Receiving nothing but a giggle in response, the Makyan frowned even deeper and waved at him. "Go." Unfortunately this didn't have any effect either as little by little, Goten ambled towards her. Paprika shook her head at him. "No. Go away," she said in the nicest and calmest voice possible.

However, despite her best efforts, she was unable to do anything when the demi-Saiyan suddenly latched onto her legs and hugged her, causing Paprika to recoil a little.

The demon scowled down at the boy wrapped around her shins. "I don't like children."

Her words were promptly ignored… or simply misunderstood. Because as soon as he was done hugging her leg, Goten held his arms up towards her and made a grabbing gesture with his hands. "Up. Up."

With an exasperated sigh, Paprika hesitantly reached down and picked the needy child up, yet held him at arm's length just to be safe. Using the opportunity to her advantage, she spent the next couple of minutes analyzing the boy, looking him over while he stared back at her innocently.
After a long pause, the Makyan grunted. "It's so… ugly you can almost feel sorry for it." Despite her rather harsh comment, Goten simply smiled back at the girl and laughed joyously, earning a raised eyebrow from the white haired fighter.

Bringing him in to get a closer look, Paprika was caught a little bit off guard when the half-Saiyan reached forward and grabbed the horns on her head, giving them a light squeeze. The Makyan blinked a few times when she felt Goten hold them and eventually let go, allowing her to lean away and look down at the child, who continued to use his hands to explore her shoulders. Tugging on her scarf, the child eventually allowed his hands to fall back to his sides and beamed at the stranger.

Once she was sure the hybrid was satisfied, Paprika gently set him to the ground and watched him turn away. "Go along. Go. Go." She then allowed the child to scamper off, the youngster jogging back down the hill and towards the house. Goten soon became interested in a couple of butterflies fluttering about and decided to chase them instead.

Paprika looked on as the child went about playing in the pasture, narrowing her eyes and watching the tyke chase after a wide variety of insects. During that time she found her gaze pulled across to another part of her hill, where she spotted Gohan's Namekian friend Piccolo standing nearby with his arms crossed and his glare fixated upon her.

Merely frowning at the former guardian of the planet and not too keen on starting something out here with him, the Makyan returned to watching the house quietly.

As it turns out, her sleuthing during the past half a year hadn't gone completely unnoticed.

XXX

(Meanwhile)

In a spiral galaxy millions of light years away from earth, far out of reach of what was previously recognized as Frieza space, there floated an enormous planetoid. Larger than earth and completely artificial in its composition, the terrestrial world had the appearance of several planets molded together to form a multi-sphere like planet, which had several moons and asteroid belts orbiting it. Looking at it from a distance, not only were there signs of massive expansion and construction, but the billions of lights dotting it from the Northern-most hemisphere to the south indicated a thriving populace and a bountiful empire living on its surface.

The five-planet structure was in fact one huge city, and the capital of the empire that existed in this part of the universe.

Past the traffic moving around it and through its artificial magnetic field and atmosphere, were countless miles of city and metallic landscape. It was literally a scene taken right out of a sci-fi film and multiplied a thousand times over, with no two buildings bearing the same design.

While the billions of people moving through the streets and vehicles crisscrossing the skies was indeed an impressive sight, what was even more extraordinary was what lay in the heart of the community.

The empire's parliament. Jutting into the sky like the Tower of Babble itself, with an open reactor built into its side that had a tiny sun glowing between its stabilizers, a dome-like structure at its base, and countless other buildings lying underneath its shadow, the place pretty much screamed 'command center'. It was here, in a chamber somewhere on the ground floor, the rulers of the planet and the heads of government were holding a very important meeting.
It was this particular gathering that a very familiar, glowing haired young traveler was hoping to crash.

Strolling down the well-lit corridor in her figure-hugging plug suit, passing by a multitude of aliens left and right, most notably guards adorned in Saiyan Battle Armor and helmets, the cheerfully humming Kana was slowly making her way towards the room. Whistling to herself a jaunty tune, one she'd come to favor from the variety of music she'd downloaded from earth, the young woman was all set to intrude on the assembly.

That was until a voice from behind caught her attention.

"You seem to be in a good mood."

Glancing over her shoulder, Kana's gaze fell upon a person she almost immediately mistook for Frieza. However, after a moment of inspecting the short alien figure with the horns and tail, she saw that, despite bearing a striking resemblance to Frieza's first form, the mercenary differed from the tyrant in a variety of different ways. Chief among which included his red skin with white carapace pieces covering his cranium, chest, torso, hips, forearms and shins, a couple of which protruded from his shoulder and hip areas, and horns growing from the sides of his head. The pieces were also decorated in purple plates, much like the feared alien conqueror before him.

Despite the newcomer's intimidating appearance, the taller Kana recognized the person as a close companion of hers and smiled in greeting. "Hey, Froze. Long time no see."

"Yeah. Long time." With his tail swishing behind him and arms folded, the alien fell in step with the glowing haired girl and smirked in her direction, "It's certainly been a few months since the last time you were here. If you actually dropped in more than once every yellow moon, we wouldn't have to greet each other in the same manner over and over again."

"What? In a hallway heading up to the main office to hand in our annual reports?"

"You know what I mean."

"Yeah well… there's a lot to see and do out there in the universe and I've only explored a hundred-thousandth of it… so you know I've got a lot more to do on my list," the Seirei replied, beaming brightly while brushing a few strands of radiant locks out of her face. "Besides… you wouldn't believe the kind of people I've met over my last year of travel. It was great."

"I'll bet. You always did have a friendly and approachable air about you," the Frieza lookalike replied while closing his eyes, continuing to walk alongside his colleague as they passed by several more guards and began advancing upon a large set of doors at the end of the hallway. "Of course, considering our line of work, I can only imagine the kind of characters you could've possibly run into while hopping from planet to planet." The carapace alien then raised a brow, "Speaking of which, what kind of worlds did you end up bagging this time around?"

"Only a handful," Kana replied, turning to the tailed alien while holding up what looked like a USB device for him to see. The sight of the chip quickly had Froze's attention. "Most of them didn't have any guardians, so I grabbed them before anyone else had a chance too. One of them was a small rocky planetoid with an actual magnetic field and had a small race of marsupials living on it. The other one is a world made up entirely out of ore."

"Sounds like you got yourself a good catch."

The Seirei nodded her head enthusiastically, "And what about you?"
"Only a couple. One of them was a forest world that was orbiting a gaseous giant with a race of blue cats living on it and a moon with pure silver dust covering its surface. Out of the ten, those were the only two that I was able to flag that had any sort of safeguarding value."

"Aww, lucky. You actually managed to get a Terra type?"

"Uh-huh. Disappointed?"

"Of course I am. How could a newbie like you get his hands on a forest planet?"

"Simple. You just need to know the right people. It's your fault for not going to the outer reaches of the Northern Quadrant in the first place, so stop whining and let me savor the moment," Froze replied with a cocky smile, at the same time stopping before the giant doors and showing the guards his credentials. "You'd be surprised at what you can find out in that part of space."

After flashing her holographic I.D to the heavily armored men at the gates, the glowing haired girl glanced across at the tailed scavenger brightly, "If you ventured to the regions of space I visited, I'm sure that you'd be in for one hell of a shock." Kana's remark had the tailed alien look at the glowing haired traveler in confusion, moments before the two guards opened the doors for them.

Entering a large, circular chamber with a spotlight illuminating the middle of the hall, the two freelancers quickly noticed a collection of figures sitting behind a length of desks at the back. Adorned in decorated armor and robes, and positioned high up on the bench like they were on a pedestal, the group of aliens was currently going through a series of hologram-like documents and engaged in an intense discussion with one another.

Quietly approaching the center and stepping into the spotlight, Kana and Froze waited until the group of leaders acknowledged their presence. As it turns out, it was the one sitting on the highest bench, a tall man with effeminate features, teal skin and white hair tied back into a ponytail, who spotted them first.

"Ah. Kana. Froze. I was expecting you two to show up eventually," the alien spoke up in a cool sounding voice, a small smile crossing his face as he set his holo-pad down to address his visitors. "It's great to see you again."

The moment they fell under the leaders' gazes, the carapace alien and the glowing Seirei bowed to them in greeting.

"Chancellor Ging," Kana said, smiling up at the planet's head as soon as she returned to a proper standing position. "You're looking well. Did you get a haircut?"

The man on the bench chuckled, "I could ask the same thing about you, Kana. It's been two years, but you still look like the same, radiant freelancer I remember seeing the last time you visited. You're wearing the exact same uniform too." He folded his arms and leaned forward on the table to peer down at the travelers. "You Seirei truly are one of a kind."

The compliment had the radiant being roll her eyes, "That's probably the twentieth time you've said that to me. You should get out more often and hit the bars instead of keeping yourself cooped up inside this dingy tower. Honestly, the lack of sunlight is starting to show." She then waved a finger at the leader playfully, earning an odd glance from the composed Froze standing beside her.

"I'll make a note of that," Ging replied, adjusting his seat and looking between the pair curiously. "So... I assume your missions to your parts of space were successful."

Kana smiled and held up her USB stick, at the same time the tailed alien next to her reached behind him and pulled out a circular box. "Bit compiled a full, detailed record of my journey through Sectors 10 through 30 of the Northern Quadrant. I even managed to gather some new data on my way through. It took me a while, but I managed to get it all in order."

When the girl approached the desk and floated up to the chancellor's level, the teal-skinned leader raised an eyebrow in interest, "I trust you didn't run into any trouble while you were flying through those regions over the past year. Perhaps you landed on a couple of 'hot spots' that prompted you to delay your return to Valkorra."

The man's inquiry had Kana shrug brazenly, "You know me. I just couldn't resist stopping by that resort planet for a little R&R. It was great." She added to this by giving the man a wink.

"I'll bet it was," Ging murmured blankly, reaching over and collecting the piece the girl handed to him before setting it down on the tablet in front of him. "Word on the band said that you also encountered something very interesting while investigating Terra 4032-877… something about… battling a golden-haired warrior of a believed to be a now extinct race." He then tilted his head at the young wanderer with a smile. "Care to explain that little discrepancy to us?" You could tell from his expression that he was more than interested in the subject, as were the rest of the men and women who were present.

Smiling mischievously, the glowing warrior flicked her hair out of the way and gradually descended back down to the floor, "Sorry, boss. I'm afraid that that's a little story for another time."

A chuckle shortly followed her response, "Fair enough. Either way, I trust that you were able to handle the situation accordingly." He then took the USB stick and shoved it into his board, at about the same time Froze approached the bench.

The tailed alien held his circular pad up to the leader, at the same time levitating off the ground to reach him. "When can we expect payment on these units?"

Ging, taking the device from the carapace traveler, smiled in his direction, "Impatient as always, eh Froze?" Meeting the unflinching gaze of the young warrior, the teal-skinned ruler of the Planet Trade Organization waved at him. "Don't worry. We'll be sure to transmit the necessary funds over to your account as soon as these worlds have been processed, which should take about seven to ten days. I'll have the military send out an expedition party to the planets you've added to the registry and see to it that they're set up for preservation." Seeing the short alien bow in response and float back to the ground to rejoin Kana, the leader quickly went about processing the data on his pad.

However, just as he was about to sign the pair's submissions and file them away for safe keeping, there was a loud beep from his desk which quickly had him look down and engage the communicator. "Yes?"

An anxious voice stammered back over the radio, "Chancellor Ging. We've got a Code Red. I repeat; Code Red. He's here…"

The teal-skinned man balked, "What? Here?!"

"Yes sir. H-He's right outside the-" The transmission was suddenly cut off.

Just as the heads of the Planet Trade Organization turned to look at each other in alarm, the entrance to the chamber was suddenly kicked in, causing a deafening bang to echo throughout the hall. The force of the doors being thrown open was so great that upon slamming into the wall, one of them was literally blasted off its hinges, an anomaly that quickly drew the complete attention of every person in that room.
As soon as all eyes landed on the destroyed gateway, the party of two dozen individuals spotted the silhouette of a large man with a hulking frame walk into view. His footsteps causing the ground to tremble, the now silent committee watched silently as the newcomer drew closer and closer, before eventually stepping into the light.

The moment his form bled into view, the once confused Kana, who'd initially paid the violent opening of the doors little mind, soon had her eyes widen in terror.

Her gaze slowly wandering up the giant figure, the Seirei found herself looking upon an enormous alien with grey skin resembling the texture of granite and a body decked out in heavy battle armor. His legs, each sporting two large toes on each foot, were covered in dark red plated boots that made a mechanical whirring sound with every step and rode up his thighs. His pelvis, torso and chest were also covered in a similar black and red spandex armor, with a glowing green glass piece in the center of the chest. Looking further across, the alien also wore red shoulder pauldrons with a similar optical dial on both sides and massive steel gauntlets wrapped around both his forearms.

Despite having a thin, athletic waist and sturdy legs, the man's arms were massive and bulging with layers upon layers of muscles with strange black, vent-like rods drilled into several key points, including his gauntlets, shoulders and back. On top of having claws instead of fingers, a bald head with a noticeable scar over his right eye and blood red eyes with no pupils or irises, his mouth and nose were covered by a breathing mask, with tubes fitted into his suit that helped circulate air.

Though he did have this glaring handicap on his person, the hulk of a creature had no problems in moving whatsoever, as indicated by how he marched straight up to the bench, stopped in the center of the chamber, and dumped a pile of ten freshly killed bodies onto the floor right in front of the leaders.

Revealing the cadavers to be a platoon of soldiers belonging to the Planet Trade Organization, as indicated by their Saiyan battle armor, the Chancellor and his fellow rulers gawked at the pile before nervously looking up at the newcomer.

By this point in time both Kana and Froze had backed away to the side, while the soldiers guarding the chamber had come to surround the creature with their weapons cocked and loaded. Though from the looks on their terrified faces, every single one of the men and women there immediately began regretting their decisions to step forward, as they had serious doubts about their abilities to stop this man if he tried anything.

His presence was obviously overwhelming.

Chancellor Ging swallowed hard and narrowed his eyes on their intruder, "What do you think you're doing here?"

"What does it look like I'm doing here?" the alien snapped angrily in a menacing, gargling-tone of voice, his words bouncing off of the chamber walls and causing all those sitting on the bench to flinch. He stepped closer to the ruler, his height being so great that he literally towered over the judge's seat, which was positioned about four meters above the ground. "I'm submitting a complaint directly to your organization. That's what I'm doing."

The teal skinned alien sweated nervously when the towering fiend got right up into his face, "I see."

His own glare tightening, the giant pointed down at the corpses at his feet, "Now… would you care to explain to me why I found these pirates wandering around my territory?"
As the hulking figure had it out with the chancellor, Froze saw through his peripheral vision that Kana was still staring anxiously at the newcomer. Taking note of the beads of sweat running down her face and the way her fists were nervously clenched, the tailed alien knew right then and there that something was wrong with her and turned to her in concern.

"Hey. Who's the brute with the acute skin condition?"

The orange haired girl's frown deepened, "Varax."

Her response had the tailed alien look at her in surprise. "Varax?" Repeating the name a couple of times, the red-skinned carapace traveler then looked at the Seirei in surprise, "Wait. I think I've heard that name before…"

"I'd be surprised if you didn't," Kana immediately replied, her brow narrowing as she watched the confrontation unfold before her. "He's a vicious warlord from a race of aliens known as the Korgoth, who went extinct over eighty million years ago." She then nodded towards the man in question. "According to the records on my home planet, he's now the last surviving member of that race."

Froze looked across at the colossal alien in disbelief. "How in the name of Kai is someone like him still alive?"

"His home planet Gon originated from the very center of the cosmos. The life-force of his people were said to be the greatest of all the ancient races, making him damn near ageless. The fact that over half of his body is now made up of cybernetic implants puts him just a step below immortal," Kana replied, not taking her eyes off of the warlord for a second as she continued informing Froze of their guest's history. "Don't let his appearance and respiratory mask fool you. Varax is regarded as the most dangerous being in the universe for a reason. Even the Kais stay clear of him. He's conquered hundreds of galaxies and destroyed countless planets, and is responsible for creating several black holes. He is so feared in fact, there's not a single biological life form willing to work for him, so he uses autonomous workers to do most of his labor."

Regarding this news with extreme caution, Froze then turned his attention to the dead bodies lying on the floor. "What exactly did he mean by 'my territory'?"

"Over eighty million years ago, Varax conquered and took control of a portion of space known as the Helix Realm, a dangerous and wild part of the universe that exists in the far reaches of the quadrant," Kana informed, clenching her jaw uneasily when she saw the alien continue to exchange harsh words with the Chancellor. "No one from any of the four sectors is allowed to cross into his territory… but apparently these idiots did and got themselves caught by his scouts."

There was reason for her fear and frustration. Even though she couldn't sense the warlord's ki or life-force due to the fact that half of the man's body was artificial, Kana knew without a shadow of a doubt that he was ridiculously powerful.

Even at her absolute maximum, she wouldn't be able to even scratch him without having her skull crushed between his fingers.

When the pair fell silent, they were able to listen in as the conversation between Ging and Varax carried on, slowly but surely reaching a crescendo.

"Why were your soldiers scouting my planets?"

"I was unaware that any of our troops were positioned in your area," Ging replied with a nervous glare. "They were probably just acting on their own accord. Believe me, this is all just a simple misunderstanding."

Narrowing his eyes upon the man in the high seat, the hulking conqueror brought a hand up and slammed it down upon his part of the bench. He cracked the metal under the force. "Do you think I'm blind? Just because you're under the protection of Lord Beerus and the Gods of the Seventh Universe, doesn't mean you and your precious Planet Trade Organization can go about doing whatever you please. No amount of loyalty to your deities will protect you from the amount of hell I can bring down upon you."

"You know the rules as well as I do, Varax," the Chancellor retorted quickly, "If you're looking for compensation for the intrusion, then I will gladly give it to you."

This was apparently the wrong thing to say because the moment the words left his mouth the giant alien suddenly reached forward, grabbed the man by the front of his armor, and lifted him out of his seat. Despite not reacting beyond a wince, the rest of the audience in attendance recoiled in shock as they then saw Varax shake the man like a ragdoll.

"I can't be bribed like some mongrel pup, you worm," the grey-skinned conqueror growled, his blood red eyes boring into the man's soul. "Compensation is not what I'm looking for."

Ging cringed painfully as sweat continued to trickle down his head, "Then what is it that you want?"

It was this that had Varax leer, "Everything." A low snarl escaped his lips when he tilted his head at the man. "This isn't some mere trinket that you can simply hand over to me on a silver platter. No… this is something that can only be taken by force and I don't care how long it takes me. One way or another… I will have it. Perhaps by then you will finally be seeing me in a new light." Allowing the words to roll off of his tongue, the intimidating warlord then glanced over his shoulder to see both Kana and Froze holding their hands up towards him, ready to attack. The guards in the room were also doing the exact same thing with their weapons and, despite shaking in their boots, were glaring at the titan hatefully.

After glancing around at the soldiers surrounding him, the towering alien then clenched his fist tightly, causing the muscles in his arm to bulk up in warning. "You'd better be very sure." The sounds of his bones creaking echoed throughout the chamber.

Several seconds of consideration later, all of the soldiers in the room wisely decided to back down, including Kana, who smacked herself upside the head for acting so stupidly.

Once he saw all of the soldiers stand down, Varax turned back to his host and grunted. "It seems to me that your subordinates are forgetting their places, Ging. You need to teach them how to show proper respect to their guests. Their conduct is absolutely disgraceful." He then unceremoniously dumped Ging into his chair, before stepping away and beginning to walk towards the exit. Carelessly stepping over the bodies he'd dropped, the Korgoth stopped and glanced over his shoulder. "Consider this visit a warning to all of you. The next time I catch someone from your organization encroaching upon my domain… mark my words; I will burn this entire place to the ground."

With that declaration made, the man marched through the entrance of the room and disappeared into a portal that opened up in front of him. The slip space rupture promptly closed behind him as soon as he was through, leaving behind a ruined chamber gateway and a sullied conference space.

The entire room sat and stood in dead silence, with sweat and shock reflected upon every person's While Ging took a moment to adjust his top and Froze spent the next minute regaining his composure, Kana fixed a continuous glare on the space Varax had disappeared.

In spite of facing down what she could only describe as death incarnate, the Seirei was still conscious enough to acknowledge a single fact.

"One day... someone will bring that prick down... I just know it..."

Even though she wanted to, more than any other person in the galaxy, she sure as hell wouldn't be able to do it alone...

XXX

Over the next several months, life for the Z-fighters carried on as normal. The Sons and the Briefs started visiting each other more often, Gohan started training with Piccolo, Vegeta and Zangya more intensely, with the latter finally venturing out of the Mount Paozu area to get a job, and Videl's growth as a student and fighter was really starting to show itself. Needless to say, that year saw the realization of some of the most memorable times the defenders of earth had ever experienced, giving them the balance of rest and work they all deserved.

Whenever he wasn't outside training by himself or with his friends, Gohan spent his free time looking after his baby brother.

Thanks to his Saiyan genetics, Goten was an incredibly strong boy and a fast learner, something that his older brother and Videl found out over the following year when the little tyke began soaking in everything around him like a sponge. He learned how to add using multi-digit numbers, his literacy and speaking skills developed faster than any normal child would, and his basic motor functions jumped to that of a five year old, and he was still only two.

On top of that, the demi-Saiyan loved to run around. Constantly filled with boundless energy and a thirst for adventure that exhausted even the super mum Chi-Chi at how rambunctious he could be, the youngster was always going out to explore the fields and forests surrounding their property. His mother would often times watch him closely to see how far he would go, with Gohan, Zangya and Videl also keeping an eye on the child whenever they weren't busy. But Goten was always alert and active, even sneaking out whenever he noticed that everybody else was preoccupied.

He sure was a mischievous little ankle-biter, there was no arguing that.

Sometimes the hybrid would leave immediately after breakfast and go for a walkabout of the property, and would always come back at lunchtime dragging with him all sorts of miscellaneous items from his backyard adventure. This included dirty clothes, bugs, frogs, tree branches, lizards, possums, mud, and at one stage a young tyrannosaurus that Zangya had to chase off to stop from entering the house.

Needless to say, while the child could be a real handful at times, even for the super powered people living in the house, he was still a radiant star that the Son family adored and loved.

After the day Goten brought his second dinosaur home, Gohan assigned his trusted friend Icarus to keep an eye on his brother whenever he went out without them. Following his assignment of the task, the little pink dragon always, without fail, brought his sibling home safe and sound, knocking on the front door to let the family know they were back. Since he could sense his brother's ki signature within the general area, the older brother always had an eye on him and would always know whenever he was in trouble.

Thankfully, no problems ever came the young child's way.

Unbeknownst to the family of course, there were a couple other people keeping an eye on Goten as well. Not only was Piccolo always around and watching over the house, the little upstart always went out to find Paprika whenever she was in the area.

For some strange reason the Makyan just could not fathom, the spiky haired toddler always knew whenever she was near the house or meditating in the area. Whenever she dropped in to spy on Gohan, his baby brother always ran out of the house to greet her.

Maybe he had developed a subconscious form of ki reading that pinged whenever she was within range or maybe he always found her due to a series of improbable circumstances. Either way, Paprika just could not shake the little runt.

Whenever Goten did come out to say 'hello' or to play with her, the Makyan didn't do anything unpleasant to him or tried to hurt him. She simply tolerated his presence and, over the next few months, she eventually accepted the boy's company and allowed him and Icarus to hang out with her.

It was generally smooth sailing for all of the Z-fighters across the globe. There were plenty of days for them to stretch their legs and perfect the skills that they practiced. Without any enemies to fight, it was surprisingly easy to slack off for all those whose passions didn't reside in fighting and had other things to do with their lives. However, time was what they had plenty of and everyone was determined to fill it with as many things to do as they could.

On one particular day, Gohan, Zangya, Videl and Chi-Chi went for a trip to Kame House. With Goten in tow, the family met with their friends on the beach surrounding the home of the turtle hermit and went about enjoying their get-together in the usual manner.

While Goten played around with Trunks, Turtle and Puar outside under the watchful eye of Chi-Chi and Bulma, and Yamcha tended to a barbeque alongside Oolong, Master Roshi and Chiaotzu, Zangya and Android 18 sat indoors at the living room window and stared out over the ocean.

Since everybody was using the time there to catch up, the two women were also making the most of the day and using their moment together to bond. With the orange haired woman wearing boots, jean shorts and a black singlet top, a comfortable ensemble that coincided with Android 18's light blue leather vest, white pants and sandals, the two girls were all dressed for the beach.

Positioned there on the sill side by side, one standing with her arms folded and the other sitting comfortably with the sea breeze flowing by them, they both looked absolutely stunning.

Glancing across at her alien compatriot, the android gave her the usual cool stare, "So how's working life treating you?"

"It's going great, actually," Zangya replied, turning to the blonde with a small smile. "Daeko is currently going through a new line of tops and bottoms that they're hoping to introduce to their summer catalogue for next week, so you can bet I'll be hitting the runway in a smoking hot new kit soon. After the last event I attended, I know this next shoot is going to be amazing."

The cyborg fighter smiled at the young woman's enthusiasm. "Sounds to me like you're having a lot of fun in that place."

"Oh yeah. No kidding," Zangya chuckled while looking out the window again. "I really have to thank Videl's dad for hooking me up with the agency and Gohan for helping me to write my resume. Those three really went out of their way for me on this one."

The Hera's response had Android 18 tilt her head and raise an eyebrow, "Exactly what kind of qualifications did you mention in your curriculum vitae to get you through the door, if I may ask?"

"Not many. Just all the stuff that I did know and everything in between; hobbies, interests, contact details… the usual," the blue-skinned woman replied while leaning against the window frame with a chuckle, "I guess prerequisites don't matter as much when you have the 'World Champ' recommending you to the place in person." She made sure to give the title a tasteful highlight in her recounting of the situation that led her into landing her current job. "The boss hired me right on the spot and set me to work the very next day. Can you believe that?"

Grunting lightly, the blonde haired android turned back towards the sea with a clearly amused expression. "With your looks and appeal, I'm not surprised everything's going well for you over there. There's just something about your face that screams 'exotic'."

"Oh, ha-ha," Zangya replied, taking into stride the jab at her extraterrestrial appearance while glancing over at the cyborg, "And what about you, Ms Number? How are things going over at your job?"

The android shrugged. "I can't complain. We've got some new stock coming in for the store, so I've got a lot of upcoming articles to look forward to for the summer. Want me to pick you up a set?"

"No, I'm good. Since I'm allowed to choose whatever I want from the company's wardrobe every week, I'm more than set in the clothing department. Too bad the only place I have to put them is in my work locker," the Hera quickly replied, earning an understanding nod from her companion. After that the pair sat in silence, watching the calm waters shimmer underneath the sun and the smell of the barbeque Yamcha was cooking drifting in from around the corner. Upon seeing Turtle crawl past with Goten and Trunks riding on his shell, and Puar hovering around them, Zangya then set her focus on another topic. "So… where're the other boys at? I haven't seen them since Tien showed up with Launch and Chiaotzu."

The blonde android shrugged, "Gohan told me he was taking Krillin out to the other islands for a quick sparring session with Videl. My guess is that they all left together and are now having it out with each other."

"Ah," the Hera replied, only to then turn when she sensed a presence approaching them.

When she and 18 looked behind them, they saw a woman with long curly blue hair, wearing a green sundress and an apron standing behind them and smiling pleasantly. She was also carrying with her a tray of ice-cold refreshments. "Hello there, you two. Would you like something to drink? It's really hot out here today and you two haven't had anything yet."

At first surprised by her appearance, Zangya smiled shortly afterwards and slowly helped herself to one of the beverages, "Sure. Thanks a lot." After grabbing an orange juice, along with 18 who gave a grateful nod to Launch's good side, the two women quickly returned to their conversation and began stirring their drinks. "Speaking of the boys, how are things going with Krillin?"

"Pretty well," 18 replied with a shrug.

The response drew a mischievous smirk from the alien fighter, "That's it? Pretty well?" She then shook her head, "Anything else you want to add on to that?"
"What do you expect me to say? Krillin is a very sweet, funny and handsome man with a good heart. Whenever I'm feeling down he's always there to cheer me up. Whenever we talk to each other he always wants to listen to what I have to say. And whenever we're out, he's always so thoughtful and considerate... and makes me feel like I belong. He accepts me completely for who I am," the blonde replied, eyes still fixed on the ocean as she thought about what else to say about the Z-fighter she was currently dating. "I really like how serious and straightforward he is, as well as how passionate he can be whenever he's really into something. After wandering around aimlessly for so long, not really knowing what to do, I guess you can say I've grown attached to that."

"Really?" Zangya asked, seeing the half-human nod before turning away to gaze thoughtfully down at the sand. "Wow. So... would you say that you've... fallen for the guy?"

Android 18's gaze snapped towards her momentarily. At first it looked like she wanted to protest. But after thinking on it for a moment, the blonde quickly regained her usual composure and turned away with a small smile.

"Mm." She nodded, giving the Hera all the answer she needed before the pair returned to staring at the horizon.

For the next couple minutes the two women remained there, quietly thinking and contemplating the big changes in their lives. Android 18 thought about how much her life had changed since the Cell Games, how much she enjoyed hanging out with Krillin and what her next steps were going to be. At the same time Zangya considered her time spent with Gohan and his family, and how he and all of his friends were shaping her into a whole other person; somebody who she could actually look in the mirror and smile at.

She also thought about how much more she could become a part of the group and how she could get strong enough to fight alongside Gohan as an equal.

Every day the boy was growing in both strength and maturity, and she wanted to be there to support him should a new danger suddenly come knocking on their front door, touch wood. This life that she currently had was one that was given to her... and she didn't want to spend the next few years wasting it.

If there was any time for decisive action, it was now.

As Zangya and 18 became engrossed in their conversation inside, Chi-Chi and Bulma were also enjoying one of their own out on the porch.

While watching her son dig through the sand alongside his friend, the raven haired woman in the oriental yellow robes sighed, "I remember when Gohan used to be around that age; sleeping in his bed, studying at his desk and wandering around the fields outside, exploring the wilderness. All those days seem so long ago now."

"Yeah. You can say that again," the scientist replied with an equally warm smile as memories of the time Goku introduced his first born to the group began to resurface. "Even though your son's still the same sweet, innocent little boy I remember he was when I first met him, he's grown so much over the last few years. Every time I see him whenever he drops by my place to say hi, I can't help but notice how much more grown up he seems." She looked across at her friend's wife standing beside her with her hands on her hips. "Are you worried?"

Chi-Chi beamed and shook her head, "As long as my son is happy and healthy, and making the most of his life, then I know he's going to be alright." She then glanced over at Capsule Corp's president, a sparkle evident in her eye. "If he's anything like his father was when he was young, then he'll always have a spring in his step and a warm glow in his cheeks, no matter how hard things get."

"Well… let's just hope things in the world stay exactly the way they are," Bulma chuckled, at the same time turning back to watch the two children frolic beside the water. "If you ask me, I think the earth is due for a few long years of peace, with no aliens, androids, demons, or any other monsters to worry about. While fighting for the boys may be fun and all, I prefer having days like this just relaxing on the beach and spending time with my family, thank you very much."

Giggling at how the scientist huffed and stuck her chest out, the Son mother then folded her arms and tilted her head. "How are things going back home? Is Vegeta still giving you grief?"

"Fortunately not. Thanks to his ridiculous training schedules, I'm actually able to get my work done around the office without having to worry about him breathing down my neck every few minutes. Don't get me wrong, I enjoy having him around whenever I'm free. It's just that I've got a lot of projects to get done and I'd prefer working on them in peace," the blue haired woman informed with an exhausted sigh. "Even though I'm the boss of the company, the workload is still pretty stacked."

"Does this include the paperwork?"

"Oh, don't even get me started. The assignments and designing phases alone are a pain in the ass," Bulma continued, reaching up and giving her head a scratch. "Seriously, I'm working my fingers to the bone with the amount of computer work I've had to do. The company's biggest project at the moment is this thing we're currently making for the Royal Military. Apparently our friends over in central are in need of a special, surface-to-orbit cannon that'll be able to knock asteroids and other unfriendly objects out of the air before they have a chance to break through the planet's atmosphere."

Chi-Chi snorted at this, "Why would they need something like that when you have someone like Vegeta or my son on speed-dial?"

"Hey, Capsule Corp needs to make money somehow," Bulma said with a small smile in play. "They're paying millions of zeni through the nose for this thing, so I'm gonna make sure I get this done, no matter how long it takes me."

"Fair enough. Just try not to overwork yourself, alright? You don't want to give yourself grey hairs by the time you're in your late forties."

"Will do," the scientist responded with a grateful smile. Upon which she set her eyes on her son again, whom she could now see was trying to build a sand-mound that was bigger than Goten's. The sight of the two children competing had her chuckle, "I'll try to ease off of my little pet project for a little while as well. Maybe that will help relieve some stress."

"Hm? And what kind of project is that?"

"Oh, well… you remember that big, red-haired man in the green armor that appeared at the Cell Games alongside Goku and the others?" Bulma asked her friend, to which she saw her nod. "Well, if Gohan hasn't already told you, he was an Android named Sixteen, one of the three that Doctor Gero created to hunt down and kill your husband." A small smile tugged at her lips when she said this and turned to face the sand at her feet. "After he was killed, the dragon balls didn't wish him back to life… maybe because he wasn't an actual living creature. Since I was able to get a detailed copy of his memory files and schematics while I was repairing him, I figured I could try and rebuild him… and make him even better than before. Considering the amount of stuff I have to get done, I could really use someone like him around the office to help me out."

The raven haired Son mother smiled brightly. "Sounds interesting. Hope you're able to get somewhere with it."

"Yeah. Me too," the blue haired woman whispered, at the same time turning her gaze back to her children and the stretch of ocean she could see before them.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

On an island not too far from Kame House, a series of explosions rocked the rolling hillsides that sent blasts of dust and rubble hurling into the sky. When the debris eventually rained back down to the ground, scattering across the pristine wilderness, two shadows darted out of the cloud. Skidding to a stop along the grass opposite one another and out of reach of the latest crater they'd formed with their attacks, the pair revealed themselves to be Tien and Gohan.

Both glaring at each other, the two Z-warriors turned to face their opponent, showing off a couple of bruises they'd received in their scrap thus far. While the tri-clops was sporting his usual attire consisting of green gi pants with red belt and a white shirt, Gohan was adorned in Piccolo's purple style of gi. Just like his friends, the young martial artist had decided to go on a cycle of uniforms to alter his looks and to emulate the two great teachers in his life.

While it was definitely in his nature to pull off a gesture like this, there really wasn't any logic to why he chose to wear either gi. He just found both outfits to be insanely comfortable.

In the words of his Namekian mentor, he looked extremely sharp.

Upon watching the smoke fade from their attacks, Tien smirked at the demi-Saiyan when the two turned to face the other. "Excellent form, Gohan. I can tell you've been working really hard over the last few months."

"Thanks. You've gotten a lot stronger too, Tien," Gohan chirped back, bringing his hands around and sliding into a wide fighting stance similar to that of his dad's. "I can't remember ever sparring with you before. It's a really refreshing change of pace for me."

"Me too. Your style is a mixture of both your father's and Piccolo's. I think that's a really good fit for someone like you," the former martial arts champion replied before setting himself into a more defensive form. "Alright… I think it's about time I turned up the heat a little. Hope you're ready for it."

After shaking off the dizziness from the last exchange, the pair squared off with their fists raised and eyes set firmly on the other. Digging their feet into the ground, both warriors made sure that their opponent was set squarely in their sights. While Tien was being incredibly cautious due to how strong Gohan actually was, the young hybrid had taken on a certain level of concern as well. Even though he was fighting at his base level so as to give his opponent a chance and to work on his techniques, Tien was still an incredibly strong fighter. It made sense considering he'd been one of his father's main rivals back in the day.

Upon sizing up their adversary and catching their breaths, the fighters then crouched forward and flew at each other. Darting across the field of grass at super speed, Tien and Gohan met in the center, colliding elbow first and causing a loud shockwave to ring out. After literally shaking the area with their impact, they then began exchanging lightning fast blows, their fists and kicks cutting through the air like bullets, only to be deflected and parried each and every time.

As the pair clashed, causing loud gunshots to ring out and shake the sky, sitting not too far from them, Krillin and Videl could be seen sitting on a fallen tree log and watching the duo from a safe distance. Both looking like they'd had a bit of workout themselves, particularly the raven haired girl in the orange and blue gi who was currently sporting several noticeable bruises, the two humans sat quietly on the trunk as they observed their fellow martial artists battling it out in the center of the island.

Though their exchange of blasts beforehand had been something to marvel at and left more than a few marks across the land, there was nothing that could compare to a good, old-fashioned fist fight. What with the level of speed and skill both of them possessed, they were definitely putting on one hell of a show for their two-person audience.

Despite moving faster than the human eye could track, the still in-training Videl was able to keep up with both of them, giving her a full scope of what Gohan and his friend Tien were capable of. "Wow…"

The monk, adorned in the symbolic orange and blue gi of the turtle hermit, smiled across at the awe-struck girl. "Pretty impressive, huh?"

"Yeah," Videl nodded, looking on as Gohan landed a wicked hook across his opponent's face before receiving a kick in the side in retaliation. "It's been a long time since I last saw Tien Shinhan fight. The guy is really good."

"Oh yeah. No kidding. He's one of the best," Krillin chuckled, knowing full well what that man was capable of. "Even I would have second thoughts tangling with that guy on a good day."

The girl shook her head in amazement, "The recordings I saw of him in the previous world tournaments were pretty intense. But I can tell he's gotten a lot stronger." Her ki reading abilities really helped her in that department.

As it stood, this guy was easily on par with Krillin and Gohan in his base form. Though the half-Saiyan did have an edge over him, it was only by a paper-thin margin.

She whistled when she saw the pair shoot off at super speed to try and outflank each other. "Wow, they're fast."

Krillin chuckled at her remark. "With the kind of agility that we have, it makes it impossible for normal people to follow us around. Even when standing at a distance," Krillin continued, seeing the demi-Saiyan kick Tien in the stomach and send him flying across the grass at supersonic flight. "It's gotten to the point that not even the cameras can keep track of us. You'll only be able to catch a small glimpse in one or two frames of an entire strip, and that's it."

It was a revelation that had the daughter of the champ giggle. "Even technology can't keep up with you anymore."

"Damn straight," the short fighter replied, wincing when he saw Tien get jabbed in the face before receiving a shot to the body, only to then retaliate with a hook that sent Gohan barreling across the ground. The boy recovered quickly though and leapt back to his feet just in time to block a jumping knee from his opponent. The shockwave caused by the impact was monstrous. "After all the fights we've gotten into, I'm amazed that any of us were able to make it this far without completely losing it."
"Your group is made up of some of the most amazing people I've ever met. Honestly, I'm not at all surprised at how strong you guys have gotten. All of you have worked so hard and fought against the worst opponents imaginable for your strengths," Videl said, watching Gohan get hit over the head by a chopping right and retaliate with an uppercut to his opponent's chin. "I can't think of anyone more deserving of your powers then you guys."

Seeing the amazement reflected in her eyes and hearing the sincerity in her voice, Krillin smiled at the champ's daughter while she continued to watch the boy she admired fight against the older male. After giving it a few moments, the bald fighter spoke up, "So... Gohan's training you to be just like one of us, huh?" When he saw Videl nod, the martial artist chuckled. "Well, if there's any member of our group that's cut out for the job, it's him. He's a smart kid and a brilliant fighter. After seeing the stuff you could do in our spar, give or take a few more years... I'm sure that with his help... you'll be able to fight toe to toe with us in no time."

Eyes shining at the man's compliments, the raven haired girl beamed and nodded, "I really appreciate that. Thanks."

Upon giving one last nod, both Krillin and Videl turned back to continue observing Gohan and Tien's spar. Seeing the half-Saiyan perform a brilliant throw, tossing his opponent across the hills, they then saw the youngster turn, smile, and wave towards them.

Sensing his focus was set squarely on her, the raven haired girl giggled and waved in return; a gesture that did not go unnoticed by Krillin.

Looking between the two and seeing Tien return to continue his match, the short fighter beamed and fixed his sights back onto his best friend's son. "You've got a good thing going here, Gohan. I'm really happy for yah."

XXX

(One Year Later)

Months past and the Z-fighters continued to enjoy a long period of peace and prosperity on the earth. Not only was work plentiful for all those who were asking for it, but the many days to follow saw some of the most noticeable shifts in the Son family's life.

Goten was growing fast under the loving care of his mother, older brother and his friends. His vocabulary was increasing exponentially and his basic motor skills were also starting to reach their peak. Thanks to his Saiyan genetics, his instincts not only developed at a much faster rate compared to normal humans, but so did his physical strengths, which Gohan, Zangya and Videl couldn't help but notice every day they spent with him.

The rest of the family also underwent many changes. Thanks to a little bit of convincing from Gohan, the demi-Saiyan was able to encourage his Hera neighbor to move into the house with him so that she didn't have to spend her nights out in the cold anymore. Though Chi-Chi was initially hesitant about letting Zangya into her domain, after seeing how well the woman looked after her sons and did chores around the front yard, she eventually found a room for her just down the hall from her older boy's chambers.

It was a small space and a tight fit, but the orange haired alien was more than happy with the accommodations. At least now she had a place to store her clothing from work.

What's more, Zangya had also taken a much more active role in Gohan and Videl's training. Not only assisting the raven haired girl in her exercises and sessions every time she came over to visit the Son household, she also spent her mornings and afternoons driving her own fighting skills into the ground. Well aware that the demi-Saiyan and his companions were getting more powerful with every day that passed, the Hera female was determined to keep in step with them and, driven by pride and desire to better herself, Zangya started aiming for heights she never thought of reaching before.

About half way through the second year following the Cell Games, the blue-skinned fighter became Gohan's most frequent sparring partner. Her strength enabling her to go toe to toe with the youngster in his first Super Saiyan form, the woman started pushing herself even further to improve her techniques and increase her strength. Much like Piccolo, she even started to wear weighted clothing during her sessions and, wanting to augment her power and fighting mentality, began to meditate and Image Train with the two Z-fighters even more.

Though her initial regimens had all been in an effort to keep her skills polished and her senses sharp, after seeing Gohan set himself a new goal after every month, she quickly became determined to do the same.

Heck, if she kept at it, she might even be able to reach a transformation phase herself.

Soon enough, after a year of vigorous sparring and training with Gohan and Piccolo out on the meadows and in their home's new Gravity Dome, she became strong enough to literally go head to head with him in Super Saiyan.

Concurrently, Gohan's strength also continued to climb. Thanks to the GR he managed to get from Bulma, not only was he able to diversify his training schedule, he also gave his friends a secondary place to train in the many months to follow.

Opening the chamber at a low enough setting enabled him to host some of Videl's sessions inside and get his friend accustomed to various changes in environment. He also spent many hours with Zangya sparring with her in a condition of over two hundred times earth's normal gravity, which gave them both an extreme workout.

After one particular session, the Saiyan and Hera had worked themselves so hard that when the artificial gravity eventually shut down after a couple long hours of training, both of them passed out right there on the tiles. It was perhaps one of the most peculiar sights Chi-Chi had ever walked in on when she came around to give the pair refreshments and found them lying opposite one another on their back and front respectively.

Aside from the usual stuff, everything was going swimmingly for the Son family.

And they weren't the only ones reveling in the peace.

Up in Otherworld, out on the vast plains making up most of the Grand Kai's planet, a certain spiky haired Saiyan was in the midst of an intense meditation session. Sitting cross-armed and cross-legged on a flat patch of field, with the familiar form of King Kai shadowing him from behind, the old hero of earth, Son Goku, could be seen locked in a severe Image Training session.

With his halo hovering overhead, the adult Saiyan allowed a bead of sweat to run down the side of his head as he focused all of his efforts on defeating the opponent he'd conjured up in his mind. He was really getting into the routine too…

That was until his hour was suddenly interrupted by the appearance of several familiar ki signatures on his radar, which had his eyes fly open and glance over his shoulder. As soon as he did, he saw a group of five figures teleport into view in the form of a golden flash of light, which faded moments later to reveal Gohan, Chi-Chi, Zangya, Videl, and a three year old Goten standing in front of them.

The sight of his family appearing on the Grand Kai’s soil had Goku's expression brighten.

Immediately spotting his father, Gohan grinned, "Hey dad! Guess who."

"Gohan. Chi-Chi. Hey!" the father exclaimed, springing to his feet and spinning around, "I'm glad you all made it." It was at that very moment he saw the youngest member of their family spot him as well, which immediately put a smile on Goten's face. It was an expression Goku quickly acknowledged, crouching down quickly and holding his arms out. "Hey there, little guy. It's great to see you again."

"Daddy!" the youngster in the green and yellow outfit called out as he dashed up to the man that he recognized as his father. With a giggle and a shout, the child threw himself into the man's hug, who laughed when he felt the boy clamp his arms around his neck. "I missed you daddy."

The full-blooded Saiyan chuckled as he stood up, carrying the boy with him, "I missed you too, Goten. Wow, you've gotten strong. What's Chi-Chi been feedin' yah?" His grip was monstrous, especially for a three year old.

After getting his fill of hugging the man, the child leaned away in his father's grip and looked at the martial artist curiously, "Are you still dead?"

Goku shrugged, throwing the boy a sheepish smile, "Yes. I'm still dead, Goten." He then reached up and tapped the halo hovering over his head. "See."

Blinking a couple of times, the young hybrid smiled, "Okay."

Finding the boy's innocence intoxicating, the spiky haired fighter then had the wind knocked out of him when Gohan jogged over and gave him a hug as well, which quickly earned one in kind. Upon greeting his sons as he always did, Goku then leaned away and looked down at his eldest child, who he could see was adorned in his colors of orange and blue.

"You're getting taller, son," Goku chuckled, measuring the boy's height against his chest and realizing that he was just a head shorter than him. "Man. It's only been a couple of weeks and you're already up to my neck." He then grinned when he saw the half-Saiyan step away, "If I'm not careful you're going to shoot right past me in the next few days."

Gohan chuckled, "I'll do my best. But I'll try not to grow too much for you, okay dad?"

"That's the spirit." Looking the youngster over, the dead Saiyan then noticed something new about his boy's appearance and acknowledged it with an exclamation of surprise, "Hey. You got a new haircut." Reaching up, he ran a hand through the teen's hair, pulling his palm away seconds later to see his son's spikes stand back on end, "Nice. It really suits you."

"Yeah," Gohan chuckled, reaching up and pushing the two strands that dangled in front of his forehead out of the way at the same time, "It's was all Lime's idea. I have to thank her properly next time I pop around to visit her."

Both father and son sharing a grin, with the young Goten reaching up to yank on his father's locks as well, the group was then interrupted by Chi-Chi walking right up to them. When her eldest stepped aside to make room for her, everyone then watched the woman step up to her husband, stand on her toes, and give him a tender kiss on the lips, which earned a gagging look from their youngest and an exclamation of protest.
Too bad the two parents ignored the child's plight and continued on with their show of affection.

Stepping away, the mother smiled, "Hello, sweetheart."

"Chi-Chi," Goku whispered, smiling lovingly at his wife as he held her by the waist, "Are you alright?" When he saw the woman nod her head affirmatively, the man felt a heart-like flutter in his chest. "Is everything okay down below? How's everyone?"

The woman nodded, "Everyone's doing great, Goku."

This brought a look of relief to the Saiyan's face. "That's good," Goku said, before then looking up to see the other two they'd brought with them wandering about the field. While Zangya was checking out the fighters training nearby with her arms folded, Videl was gazing across at the family with an expression of wonder, which put a grin on the former hero's face. "Let's go grab a bite to eat together. I'm sure all of you have plenty of stories to tell me. I want to hear about everything." He then turned to look over at his trainer, who was standing nearby with his hands behind his back, "King Kai?"

The blue man in the shades and training garb smiled and nodded, "No problems here, Goku. You go have fun with your family." After all, there weren't any rules in the script saying that his student couldn't receive visits from his relatives, especially if they were more than capable of traveling to the Otherworld. As far as he was concerned, Gohan and his family were more than welcomed to this planet, especially after all the good deeds they'd performed for their part of the universe.

All of the Z-fighters had earned their keep as heroes long ago, even if Vegeta and Zangya were a bit of a stretch.

Elated, Goku then led Chi-Chi, Gohan and Goten across the training fields towards the palace during which time the man's oldest son stopped and waited for Videl to catch up. When she did, he went on to walk the rest of the way to the Grand Kai's building with her and Zangya alongside him.

It was there, amidst the glimmering cosmos and the sacred space that was the world beyond their own, the family would spend the entire day together, having lunch, exploring the meadows, and catching up on days past.

For one shining moment, everything was perfect…

XXX

(That Night)

Back on earth, the day rolled by as usual. The sun rose and set as it always did, and every single person on earth eventually turned themselves in from many long hours of hard work and play. However, while the rest of West City went quiet and the halls of Capsule Corp. emptied of most of its staff heading home at the closing hours of their shifts, there was only one person left wide awake.

Sitting in a dark laboratory, with the massive monitors of her computers and work station giving her the only sources of light in the room, the blue haired form of Bulma could be seen typing away at her keyboard like there was no tomorrow. Murmuring impatiently as lines of code flew past her at ludicrous speed and her fingers danced over the tabs, the head of the company then spared a quick glance back at the operating table behind her.

Lying across the platform with a multitude of cables plugged into it, the skeletal frame of a humanoid-like robot at least two times the woman's height, with all of its wiring and gyros exposed to the air, lay in plain sight of the corporation's president. Due to the artificial muscles fitted into it to give the creation movement, as well as all the other parts designed to make it work, the half-finished android was obviously meant for full humanoid conversion sometime in the future, a process which Bulma intended to start as soon as she had its programming finished.

However, due to a few mishaps and problems she'd encountered along the way, the chief female scientist of the company found that that particular task was going to be next to impossible to complete.

Frowning, Bulma turned back to the strings of code in front of her and closed it down, leaving her with over a hundred files spread out before her on the drive. "Okay. This is getting me nowhere."

Wanting to try something different, the woman quickly separated half of the files into another folder on her computer, leaving the more vital components behind. While she was able to get its basic programming and movement patterns to successfully respond, the obstacle that Bulma now had to contend with was restoring the consciousness that was once Android 16's.

On paper it seemed like a straight forward task. However...

"Still having problems bringing your friend back to life?" the voice of Bulma's father spoke up, drawing the woman's gaze over her shoulder.

Seeing the man in the square glasses and white lab coat step into the light, the woman sighed and stood up out of her seat. Locking her computer and putting her work on hold for the time being, Bulma shook her head sadly and massaged her eyes, "I just don't get it, dad. When we were repairing Android 16 for the final battle against Cell, I was sure I was able to get a detailed copy of all of his CPU's memories and folders. Everything that made him who he was and made him work was all transferred to my computer so that I could study him and understand his programming. I've tried over and over again to get him on his feet again, but…” Looking across at the android skeleton she had on the table, the blue haired woman frowned in dismay. "I just can't seem to bring back the consciousness that made him… well… alive."

Doctor Briefs, understanding his daughter's woe, stepped over to her and laid a hand upon her shoulder, at the same time glancing down at the cyborg that was under construction. "The soul of a machine isn't some program you can activate with a simple push of the button, sweetheart. You know that better than anyone." The man then glanced up at his treasure, where he saw disappointment reflected in her eyes. "Whatever Doctor Gero did to bring Android 16 to life… it was probably something he did purely by accident; a bug that wasn't meant to exist. Maybe that was why he didn't plan on using him, because he hadn't finished programming the last of his software."

Considering her father's words strongly for several moments, Bulma then breathed an exhausted sigh and nodded her head in understanding, "I guess you're right, dad. Maybe it was all just an accident." She'd had it all in her head that she was in the right and felt confident in her abilities to resuscitate their group's most unexpected ally. But in spite of all her tinkering and experience, the blue haired scientist slowly came to the realization that maybe this was something that she could not do and was perhaps beyond her reach and understanding.

"But that doesn't mean I can't keep trying, right?" Bulma asked, smiling across at her old man, who smiled and nodded back to her in acknowledgement. Upon receiving his confidence and feeling slightly reinvigorated, the woman stepped up to the android and patted it on the forehead. Upon which she then stepped away and left the table. "I'm done for the night. Time to hit the sack."

Accompanying her on the way out, Doctor Briefs gave the skeleton of the android one last, thoughtful glance before shutting the door behind them. With the lights switching off and the computer quickly going into sleep mode, the lab was well and truly shutdown until further notice.

Many hours later, in the dead of night, with nothing but the low hum of machines filling the labs empty space, the automatic doors were once again opened by the most unexpected of guests.

Strolling in on all fours, the little black kitten recognized as Doctor Brief’s most valued companion, Tama, ambled into the room on his own accord. Amidst the darkness and coldness of the chamber that served as one of Bulma's provisional laboratories, the little feline walked over to the table holding up the body of the lifeless frame that was to be the future Android 16. Sitting down beside it with his tail wagging behind him, the cat gazed up at the desk quietly, with nothing but curiosity in its eyes.

Several moments after he did so, the large monitor Bulma had been working on sometime before suddenly switched on behind him, drawing the kitten's attention over his shoulder.

When his eyes fell upon it, Tama saw the files the blue haired scientist had separated suddenly start to open up one after the other. The curser accessing them as if being directed by a phantom, the screen suddenly became filled with a window detailing millions of lines of code, which began to scroll past the monitor at high speed.

Initially, Tama sat there in confusion, listening to the beeping of the computer and the churning of the numbers. A few minutes of watching later, the line of code reached its end, where the word ‘ACTIVATE’ could be seen highlighted in bold. After several seconds of flashing, the word ‘ENTER’ was then typed in, followed shortly by a sudden surge of power.

Electricity began shooting down the lines of capable connected to the android's body, the streams zapping and crackling in a glorious display of deadly fireworks, filling the skeleton with an enormous amount of energy. In a matter of moments, the blue bolts streaming into the lifeless husk inevitably faded and the room once again fell silent. But then, a few ticks of processing later, the eyes on the hulking robotic frame lit up a brilliant red and, after a couple twitches of its fingers, the robot sat up.

Rising from the table, the still plugged android skeleton looked around the dark room, its optical sensors scanning the space and taking in every little detail surrounding it. Upon inspecting its environment, it then glanced down at the floor beside it, where it saw Tama gazing up at him.

Giving a meow, the little kitten greeted the robot cheerfully.

Staring back at it in silence, the android then swung its legs off of the table and, upon rising up, stepped over to the cat and crouched down next to it. It was then the robot took the moment to stroke the kitten on the head with one of its large fingers, earning a purr from the pure black feline.

"Kitty…” the deep, raspy voice of the robot murmured, in a tone recognized as the late Android 16's.

After getting its fill of affections, Tama walked away, allowing the half-complete robot to rise to his feet and move on. Not finding anything of further interest in the area, the android decided to go for a wander of the facility and, upon leaving through the same double doors of Bulma's auxiliary lab the cat had entered through, ambled down the corridor at a casual pace.

His gears whirring and gyrating throughout the dark hallways of the science wing of Capsule Corp's main building, the android eventually stopped at another door with the plaque Tech Division emblazoned on the wall. Here, after staring at the door for several seconds, the android reached out and dialed into the key pad, utilizing information it was able to gain from the main computer. A couple beeps later and the double doors slid open, allowing the android access to the chamber.

Strolling in, the robot found itself in a room very similar to the one it was in before, only this one was bigger and had an entire space filled with electronics, devices and all sorts of other technology that the scientists of the facility were currently working on. Judging from the impressive layout, the computers packed over to one side and the tables in the center, this looked like one of Bulma Brief's main workshops. Considering the amount of labs actually making up this particular wing of the building, this could have been one of many.

In any case, it certainly had the most gizmos in it, there was no denying that.

Craning his head around, the robot strolled across the room. Making its way to the back of the room, it then spottted something of interest lying by the large monitor and quickly turned its attention to it, stopping in its tracks.

Reaching over, he picked up the watch-like device lying on the counter and, after inspecting it for a moment, switched it on. The electronic beep the device gave when a green grid sprang onto the screen along with a yellow, radar-like pulse immediately identified the gadget as the Dragon Radar. Staring down at the blinking lights, the robot saw that there was a yellow dot registering on it and, realizing it was nearby, began looking for it.

It didn't take him long to spot the orange ball with the two red stars sitting in a display case at the end of the table. Setting the radar down and walking over to it, the curious android opened up the glass box at the latch and pulled out the dragon ball, which it began to analyze closely.

Staring at the orange orb for a full minute in silence, blinking a couple of times as its brain processed what the object was, it then heard the hiss of the double doors to the lab open. Glancing to his left, the android's eyes landed upon the form of Doctor Briefs feeling against the wall for the light switch. When he eventually flipped it, the glasses wearing man then began scanning the areas of the lab that flickered into view. "Here, Tama. Where are you, kitty? Here kitty-kitty…oh?" He then stopped when he spotted the large android standing by the desk. At first appearing surprised, a few seconds later the man's mind eventually clicked at what he was looking at and his expression did a complete one-eighty. "Why, hello there. You're the android my daughter's been working on these last few months. What are you doing in here?"

The automaton watched as the old man in the pajamas and bathrobe ambled towards him, only to stop a couple meters away for an inspection.

Looking the unfinished robot from head to toe, the founder of the company nodded his head in approval at what he saw and beamed up at the creation's face. "It seems Bulma's done a terrific job on your frame. The adamantine bodywork really came out great… and it looks like your motor-skill software is running well." He didn't even want to question how the robot was up and moving about. The fact that the android his daughter was reconstructing was actually functioning completely outshone all other thought and logic. Heck, it even seemed to have gained a sense of individuality and curiosity about his surroundings, which immediately captured the scientist's attention. "How are you feeling? Can you talk?"
Eye shutters blinking, the robot then made a gurgling sound as the mechanics in its throat opened up, "T-Talk…?"

"Hm?" the man who'd obviously woken up from a good night of sleep to try and find his cat tilted his head at the android. "You're probably still running a few language sub-routines. That's understandable considering the design of the CPU inside your head is a little bit different from the previous model." It was then he noticed the android was holding the sphere from the case and quickly pointed at it. "Ah. I see you've found the dragon ball my daughter's been looking after as well."

The android turned to the orange globe in its hand, "Dragon… ball…?"

"Yes. She brought it in so that she could study it and the entity living inside of them. Initially she thought the balls were the dormant form of the dragon itself, but now my daughter thinks that they open a gateway to another dimension that allows Shenron to enter our world. Either way she's really looking forward to the results," Doctor Briefs informed, watching the android look down at the orb in intrigue. The old scientist waited to see what the android would do next, but when nothing happened for the next few minutes he then slipped his hands into his pockets and beamed. "Bulma will be thrilled to see you're up and running. Though I admit Doctor Gero's programming is rather complex, I believe that his work on advanced robotics will be the next step forward to designing the strings for all future automaton and android designs. You'll be the company's template to realizing that dream."

"S-Strings?" the robot murmured, looking up from the ball and staring ahead of him blankly.

Puzzled by the robot's taking away from his little piece of dialogue, Doctor Briefs tilted his head at the android curiously. Wondering what was currently going through its mind, the father was just about to ask it a question when, all of a sudden, with speed no human could follow, the large robot turned to the doctor and rushed him. Grabbing him by the neck, the android skeleton slammed the man into the back wall in a blur, causing a loud 'thud' to ring out before it lifted the scientist off the ground.

Gasping in shock, Doctor Briefs clawed at the hand gripping his neck, which began to crush him like a vice. Caught completely by surprise, the man gawked down at the metal man currently dragging his hapless form up the wall, only to stop when he was literally hanging two meters off of the tiles.

"W-Wh…What are you doing?" the Brief founder gasped as he felt the robot's grip tighten around his wind pipe.

Eyes flashing a deathly red, the android then glanced down at the ball it was still holding. Upon which he gave a very guttural chuckle, one that was laced with the low hum of a machine. His sudden tone shift from Android 16's previous voice to a deeper and raspier one, had the Brief father's eyes widen.

"Yes." The robot then tossed the dragon ball up and down in his hand. "Lots and lots of strings." He then tossed it over his shoulder, allowing it to bounce across the lab.

Doctor Briefs narrowed his eyes, his mind quickly processing the voice that was leaving the robot's mouth. "You're not Android 16. W-Who are you?" he rasped when the robot's hand tightened even further, "What are you?"

The robot chuckled in amusement and glanced up at the good scientist. "You should tell your daughter not to stick her nose into things she does not understand."

Upon hearing the machine's answer and theorizing that it must have been Bulma's exploration into Android 16's memory banks that resulted in this artificial intelligence surfacing, Doctor Briefs only had a few seconds to realize the fault before, giving another strangled gasp, the android's grip tightened one last time.

The hand wrapped around the man's throat continued to apply pressure on the scientist's neck before, without warning, an audible 'crack' echoed throughout the room. The second the noise rang out, the scientist's body went limp and his arms fell to his sides, his eyes turning blank and a trickle of blood running out of the corner of his mouth.

"But… since you won't be around when she wakes up… I think I'll tell her for you."

Deed done and sensing the man's life disappear on the wind the android dropped the father's body to the ground before turning his attention to the lab. Marching over to the monitor station, the robot collected up the Dragon Radar, analyzed it one last time, and crushed it in its grip, shattering the device and scattering its remains over the floor.

Lips curling up into a sinister smile, the robot then eyed the back of the room eagerly, where he could see all of the company's latest projects, devices, vehicles, equipment and prototypes on display.

The sight of the rows of assorted technology had the android's excitement skyrocket, "I think it's time for an upgrade." Bringing its arm up, a collection of cables suddenly detached from him and began to whip around the air like tendrils, before he extended his hand and shot the cables towards the shelves.

The wires snagged several pieces of equipment, wrapping around them before, after securing the devices, brought them back to their host…

XXX

(That morning)

After several hours of sleep, the once weary and mentally drained Bulma Briefs was once again up bright and early, eager to start the day ahead.

Following a quick shower and touch up, the woman slipped into her usual outfit consisting of white pants, red top, yellow vest, and a pair of slippers, gathered up her four year old son from his bed, and headed down to the kitchen for a spot of breakfast. Arriving there shortly afterwards, she wasn't at all surprised to see her mother already up and making food for the family, and didn't even blink when she saw Vegeta sitting at the table waiting on the food with folded arms.

Shaking her head at the man, who was already dressed in a set of blue spandex complete with sleeveless top, white gloves and yellow tipped boots, the blue haired woman led her son over to the table and pulled up a seat alongside the Saiyan Prince.

While Trunks got himself comfortable, Bulma turned to the spiky haired man and smiled pleasantly, "Got anything interesting planned for the day, Vegeta?"

Glancing across at the woman, the fighter quickly turned back to stare at the table, "Once I'm done eating here I'm going down to the gravity room to do some more training. After that I'll take Trunks to the park for some fresh air."
Bulma appeared genuinely surprised at that, "Really? You… want to take him out? By yourself?"
Hearing his father was going to take him somewhere immediately had the lavender haired child sitting nearby perk up with interest.

"Of course, woman. Keeping him cooped up inside all day isn't good for a future Saiyan elite. He needs to go out and exercise to keep up his strength," the flame-haired man replied, momentarily fixing his gaze on the scientist before then glancing toward his son, who was now looking at him with a beaming smile in play, "You can argue with me all you want, but I refuse to allow my boy to grow up to become a slacker."

Trunks beamed excitedly, "Are you going to take me to the big one in the middle of the city?"
When he saw the man nod, the child in the oversized green t-shirt and purple shorts punched the air triumphantly, "Yeah! Awesome!" He then turned to look at the one cooking breakfast for all of them, "I'm going to go down the big slide today, grandma!"

The blonde woman giggled cheerfully, "I'm glad to hear that. Make sure you have fun, sweetie, and go easy on everyone."

"Okay."

Grunting, Vegeta then had his attention pulled to his left, where he saw a cup of coffee set down next to him by the cheerful and eternally youthful grandparent. Acknowledging her smile with his usual glance, he then picked it up and took a sip, completely unaware of the adorning gaze the blue haired scientist was now giving him.

Eyes shimmering when the man in her life willingly volunteered to take Trunks out for the day, she then turned her attention to the newspaper sitting next to her. Flipping it open and skimming over the first page, she then looked up when she realized something was off and focused her gaze on her mother, whom she saw set a plate of food down in front of Vegeta and then in front of her.

"Hey mum, where's dad? Is he still asleep?" Bulma asked, noticing that the company's founder and her idol wasn't here reading the paper alongside them.

Moving about to set a big plate of egg, vegetables and bacon in front of Trunks, who wasted no time in digging into it, the cheery blonde with the curly hair shook her head sadly, "I'm not sure dear. I heard him wake up sometime in the middle of the night and leave the room to go to the bathroom, but he never came back. My guess is that he probably went down to the labs to check on something."

Vegeta, half-listening to the woman's response, grunted before he continued to shovel egg into his mouth.

"Huh? That's weird," Bulma murmured, folding the paper and setting it aside to tend to her own breakfast, which consisted of porridge and fruit. "Dad doesn't usually get up to work on something unless it's super important." Her dad didn't say anything about taking on any new projects.

The mother placed a finger against her cheek thoughtfully, "Maybe Tama went on another walk and he got up to go find him. You know how much your father loves that kitten."

This drew an understanding nod from her daughter, "Well that too."

As the family dug into their breakfast and Mrs. Briefs returned to her station, a sense of normalcy quickly fell back over them. It was around the time Vegeta and his son were hitting their third serving of breakfast for the morning was their moment of tranquility interrupted by a figure stepping into the corridor entrance of the dining room.

Looking up, the young Trunks immediately recognized the man in the bathrobe halfway through the archway, "Hey, grandpa."

Bulma smiled when she saw the man standing lopsided in front of them, "Morning dad. Did you have a rough night? You look awful."

The fact that his head was tilted, his gaze was blank, and his glasses were wonky was all the signs the Briefs around the table needed to know that the father had had a late night.

However, when the father didn't say anything for the first few seconds and continued to stand in place, Bulma's expression fell, "Dad? Is there something wrong?"

It was only when Vegeta looked up from his table in response to the woman's question did he notice something was off. At first analyzing the man's posture and spotting the red stain on his bathrobe, the Prince then reached out with his senses to see what was up. When he didn't pick up any life signs, the Saiyan immediately set his fork down.

Her concern rising, Bulma quickly set her utensils down as well, "Dad?"

The moment she did, she suddenly saw the man's body keel forward and slam into the floor with a heavy 'thud'. Seeing her father crumple to the ground lifelessly had Bulma jump out of her seat and gasp, with Trunks giving a few surprised blinks and Mrs. Briefs a startled squeak. After seeing her husband face plant the tiles, she placed whatever dishes she was holding onto the kitchen counter and began hurrying around the table toward him.

"Sweetie?"

"Dad!"

Just as everyone was starting to move from their spots, the sound of a low, ghostly hum suddenly filled the room, followed immediately by a voice.

The raspy voice and the lyrics it started to sing was what had everyone inside the room freeze where they were sitting or standing.

"Hi-ho the meri-o. That's the only way to be."

"I want the world to know… nothing ever worries me."

The haunting melody was accompanied by a metallic whirring sound and heavy footsteps that echoed throughout the room. Seconds after the sounds became audible, a towering silhouette of an unknown figure stepped into the archway where the father was once standing.

"I've got no strings…to hold me down…"

"To make me fret, or make me frown…"

He took a step forward… and another step…

"I had strings… but now I'm free…"

"There are… no… strings… on… ME."
The moment the figure stepped into the light, Bulma, Vegeta, Trunks and Mrs. Briefs' eyes widened in horror when they found themselves staring at a towering automaton covered completely in silver plated armor, with glowing red nodes and lines, and a human-like face with no nose, two glowing red eyes without pupils, and two antenna in place of ears.

To the calm mind, it was merely a creepy looking robot.

But to the people currently in that room… it was like looking into the face of the devil himself.

The android grinned.

"Hello…"

...

...

"Mum."

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Okay...
"What the hell is that thing?" Vegeta asked while standing up, knocking his chair over at the same time.

Terrified at the sight of the large robot standing in the doorway, Trunks leapt out of his chair and rushed over to his mother to hug her leg, "M-Mum?" However, he received no immediate comfort from the woman, as Bulma was still staring at the automaton in horror.

Chortling as he stepped further into the room, the seven-foot-plus robot stood over Doctor Briefs's lifeless form and smirked across at his stunned audience. "I apologize for my lateness. You see, I've just spent the last several hours familiarizing myself with the incredible abundance of technology down in the research and development labs." His eyes flared dangerously as he continued scanning the room and the faces of Briefs family. "The conversion process was a long and tedious one, but I was finally able to install all of the hardware and software necessary for my upgrade. In other words... it has been a really long night. So, Bulma Briefs..." The robot leered, "What do you think of my new look?"

Gritting his teeth while everyone else around the table shivered with fright, Vegeta rounded on the blue haired scientist once again and barked, "Woman! Talk! What the hell am I looking at here?"

Eyes shimmering with disbelief, all Bulma could do was shake her head in disbelief. "A-Android... Sixteen?"

"What?" Vegeta glared back at the robot and gave it a once over. After a couple seconds of analyzing the abomination blocking the archway, the Saiyan Prince snarled, "Is this some kind of a joke? How in the hell is this thing anything like that animal-loving hunk of metal?"

"My sensors are detecting a high level of hostility and discomfort," the robot said before grinning snidely at the baffled crowd. "My... how exciting. Mum and dad are having an argument. But as much as I would love to stand here and watch you two bicker for the next several minutes, I'm afraid I'm on a very tight schedule." Tilting its head, the android cracked its neck before rolling its shoulders one after the other. "Oh, and for your information, your highness, if you think my current design is anything like that defective, washed-up model of a cyborg from before, you're sadly mistaken."

Getting frustrated at being kept completely in the dark, the flame-haired Saiyan raised a fist and stepped forward. "Who are you?!"

The robot straightened up as soon as his whole body had moved into the dining room, leaving Doctor Brief's form lying motionless behind him. "Oh? Are you feeling angry, Vegeta? Are you feeling... impatient and a little bit stressed?" His questions earning a snarl from the warrior, the red-eyed machine merely stood in place and leered at his quarry. "Hypothesis: correct. It seems that the information I have regarding your personality traits is a hundred percent accurate." sly smile then slowly appeared on his face, "To answer your question though, I am unfortunately unable to tell you my name, as Doctor Gero never gave me one." This announcement had the Saiyan Prince balk in shock, drawing another cocky smirk from the robot. "You could say I was just an idea that he had; a Mark I prototype that never got off the ground… or in this case the hard drive on his computer. I was the program that he was originally supposed to install into Android 16, yet he never got around to completing."

"Oh this is just perfect. Another android?!" Vegeta growled in his head, his fists shaking with rage as he focused all of his attention on the condescending metal man. "Damn it! I thought we were already past this shit!"

The towering creation then raised an artificial eyebrow at the Saiyan Prince, "But… seeing as how you're just dying to know who I am… all things considered… I think I'll go with…" His right eye beeped and flickered, typing in a name for him to speak from a list of choices. Eventually he settled on one, which he immediately took a liking to. "Sentinel."

By this point in time, Vegeta had had enough.

"You're going to be called 'pile of scrap metal' by the time I'm through with you!" With a roar the man sprang over the table and charged straight at the android.

This proved to be his blunder because the second he sprang into action the robot opened his jaw and fired a colossal red blast right out of his mouth. Vegeta only had a split second to look stunned before the attack crashed into him like a missile, sending him rocketing backwards in the opposite direction and through the kitchen wall. The entire building was rocked by the massive explosion that followed.

In a flash of blinding light, the entire side of the dome-shaped structure blasted outwards in an immense cloud of debris and smoke, which spat the Saiyan's body out the other side and into his back garden.

Having dropped to the ground the instant the explosion filled the entire dining area, Bulma, Trunks and Mrs. Briefs looked through the enormous hole that stood in place of the kitchen area in shock. After gawking at it for several seconds, they then watched as the hulking android Sentinel strolled past them, before leaping through the hole and following after the fallen Saiyan.

Landing on the front lawn with a loud thud, the silver automaton gave a low chuckle as he then began a casual approach of the small, human-sized crater lying several yards away.

His legs making a metallic crunching sound with every step, Sentinel soon stopped at the edge of the indentation beside the slightly wounded Vegeta, who was covered in burns and was missing half of his shirt. "Did the Saiyan Prince experience a sudden malfunction? Number crunching must be extremely difficult for someone of your limited means. Here. Let me help you up, sire."

The android then reached down, grabbed the man by the leg, and casually lifting him off of the floor.

Vegeta, looking up at the robot, sneered angrily, "Go fuck yourself…"

Sentinel grinned, "File not found." Cocking his arm back, he then effortlessly pitched the hapless Saiyan across the property, through a garage and straight into a café right across the street. The man collided with the building with an earthshaking crash, causing rubble and smoke to explode into the air and the people in the store to cry out in terror.
Pleased with the throw, Sentinel moved back into a normal standing position and fixed his attention on the landing site. Eyes flickering with lights as he analyzed the life forms in the area, the android then brought up its left arm and clenched it into a fist. A couple clicking sounds later and the plates and parts in his arm and hand separated and reformed into a cannon, which he then pointed. "Photon Shot!" With only a few seconds of loading time, the android then fired a golden blast straight towards the smoking building a full block away.

The attack hit the hole in the café dead on, only to be smacked into the clouds where it detonated harmlessly above the city. This was instantly followed by Vegeta flying out of the ruined building and into the airspace high above.

Spotting him, the android took aim once again. Dropping his arm, which quickly morphed back into a regular hand, his left and right shoulder plates separated and popped out a pair of compact UB-32 rocket pods. As soon as they appeared, the android unleashed a hellfire of rockets that shot up after the Saiyan Prince.

Seeing the missiles fast approaching him, Vegeta growled and threw his hand forward, launching multiple ki blasts at once which collided with several of the missiles and destroyed them. The rest of the five dozen rockets blew past the explosions and honed in on him, forcing the man to dodge. Avoiding the first few, the man then kicked one of the rockets away and watched it explode elsewhere above the city, a sight that had him frown deeply. "That explosion was quite powerful. I should avoid getting hit by these things." He then blasted off when the rest of the tracers continued to follow him.

Arcing through the sky above West City, the Saiyan Prince dodged and avoided the rockets chasing after him, watching as several went off one after the other while the rest began to gain ground. Getting frustrated at his inability to lose them, Vegeta quickly decided to counter the assault. Flying backwards, the flame-haired warrior then unleashed a barrage of multiple ki blasts at the approaching missiles.

In an impressive display of accuracy and firepower, he managed to shoot all of them out of the air and after spinning around, focused his sights on his target once more.

Narrowing his eyes, the Saiyan Prince brought his hand up and produced a blue ball of ki, which sprang out of his palm and hovered in place. He then cocked it back and took aim. "You're finished! I'll take you out in one-" Vegeta then stopped, his gaze suddenly shifting over to the Capsule Corp building, where he saw the Briefs family and his son watching them through the massive hole in the wall.

After several quick seconds of switching his glare between them and the android on the lawn, the warrior cursed inwardly and dispelled the attack he was charging, which would've been more than capable of incinerating the entire block. "Shit!" He then clenched his fists angrily.

The Saiyan knew that if he went all out here against this walking pile of junk then he ran the risk of killing Bulma and his son. As much as his pride demanded he settled this as quickly as possible, he still had the right state of mind to show restraint around his family.

As it currently stood, this robot had several impressive tricks up its sleeve, including one hell of a throwing arm. But judging from what it was able to pull so far, Vegeta knew that he would be able to destroy this thing without having to go all out. It would just take a bit of time.

Hell, he could probably take it down without even having to go Super Saiyan.
“Fine then!” Deciding on a new course of action, the warrior quickly dove straight down to Capsule Corp and the android standing squarely in his sights. "I'll just beat you down the old-fashioned way!"

Sentinel grunted and retracted his rocket launchers. Immediately upon doing so his eyes flashed a bright red before firing two lasers up at the approaching Saiyan.

Spotting the fast-moving beams, Vegeta dropped altitude immediately, avoiding them. Stopping himself just feet above the ground, the man then powered up and, with a loud battle cry and a sonic boom, shot towards the android and uncorked the mother of all punches into its face. His fist connected with a deafening thunderclap and, not only did it cock the automaton's head to the side, it also had him skid along the ground for a couple of feet.

However, upon burying his knuckles into the robot's metal cheek, Vegeta then looked up in shock when he saw the robot was unaffected and grinning smugly at him.

"Attack failed. Damage incurred: zero. I'm afraid that amount of force will not be sufficient enough to pierce through this armor," Sentinel spoke, effortlessly craning his head around to stare at the stunned Saiyan, "The reinforced adamantine frame making up my body was an extra precaution designed by Bulma Briefs to ensure the same fate did not befall this model of Android 16 as it did the last one. Useless sentimentality from a useless woman."

Growling, Vegeta cocked his fist back and prepared for another punch, only to get hit across the face by a hook from the android that sent him spinning across the lawn. Before he could come to a complete stop, Sentinel darted forward and elbowed the prince in the face, sending him bouncing across the property.

Slamming his feet into the ground to stop, the prince's blue aura exploded around him and he shot up into the sky, where he stopped and glared down at the deceptively quick robot.

"Is that all you've got?!” Vegeta barked, ignoring the blood running out of the corner of his mouth.

Sentinel smirked, "As a matter of fact…” Almost instantly, every single plate on his body opened up and produced a rocket launcher, all of which loaded and aimed straight at the Saiyan floating high above. "Ice Blitzkrieg!” He then fired everything he had; sending over ten dozens rockets of all shapes and sizes hurtling towards the persistent warrior hanging above the property.

Giving a yell of effort, the raven haired fighter blasted backwards as fast as he could, curling left and right before being assaulted by the storm of projectiles. The rockets impacted him one after the other and exploded, revealing their ammunition to be sheaths of liquid nitrogen-like rounds that caused icy blasts capable of freezing anything.

When it seemed like Vegeta was going to be frozen into submission by the onslaught of missiles, the Saiyan Prince was actually deflecting each individual rocket so that they exploded away from him, before cocking his fist back and hooking the last wave with a power punch that destroyed them all in a brilliant flash of golden light.

The smoke from the explosion clouded the air and blocked Sentinel's view of his target, leaving him in suspense for several seconds. Moments later, Vegeta suddenly shot out of the side of the cloud and, hand held forward, unleashed a golden blast down at the abomination. "Big Bang Attack!” The ball of energy shot out of his hand towards the android and slammed straight into his face, detonating with an almighty bang that rocked the entire block.
At first the Saiyan thought he got him, but just seconds after the flash of light faded, revealing a cloud of black smoke hovering above the property, the smog parted sharply and Sentinel came shooting up at him propelled by a collection of rocket pads on his back and feet.

While flying towards the Saiyan Prince, the android suddenly tucked and retracted all of his limbs into his body, his plates shifting and incasing him in a protective, cocoon-like shell. Reacting in alarm at the robot-turned-projectile, Vegeta threw his hands forward and unleashed three powerful ki blasts at his adversary, only to watch his attacks bounce off of his slopped armor uselessly.

Counter failed, the man threw himself out of the way and watched his foe blow past him, only to change course sharply and land on the roof of a distant office building. Unfolding and landing with a heavy thud, Sentinel then sprang through the air in another direction and spun around, opening his mouth and producing a second cannon, which he immediately aimed at the Saiyan Prince.

"Pellet Shooter!" With a series of loud bangs, the android unleashed a volley of high-velocity blasts towards his opponent.

Vegeta avoided the first few shots, which rocketed past him like artillery rounds, only to then be hit headlong by the last two, which exploded with ridiculous force and sent him spiraling to the ground. With a yell of shock, the Saiyan collided with one of Capsule Corp's smaller buildings, causing the entire roof to cave in on itself.

Target hit, Sentinel flew back down to ground level and landed with a metallic thud on the grass. Smiling at his success, the android then began to march towards the crash site, intent on finishing his opponent.

"You think you can destroy me?" Sentinel asked with a smile. "I've analyzed all of your training sessions recorded in the gravity room and added your attack patterns to my combat routines. Nothing you can do will surprise me."

Feeling invigorated, the android clenched and unclenched his fists repeatedly, gathering energy for one last attack.

However, when he was about half way across the property, a shockwave suddenly rang out followed immediately by a blast of wind that pelted Sentinel in the face with a cloud of debris. Stopping in his tracks and looking up in momentary confusion, the mechanized fighter saw the entire roof of the collapsed building blow away and a golden aura burst out of it like an inferno. This was shortly followed by a slightly banged-up Vegeta emerging from the rubble assumed in his Super Saiyan form, his hair blonde and an intense, teal glare fixed upon the silver-plated android.

His sensors quickly analyzing the man's new appearance and power level, the robot chuckled, "I see you've made some... modifications. Altering your original combat chassis will not help you." Sentinel then threw both his hands forward, clenching them into fists before the plates shifted back and transformed into two identical cannons. The morphing of his arms was instantly followed by the android's expression intensifying tenfold. "Do not prolong the inevitable."

"Shut your mouth!" Vegeta frowned, his energy warping around him furiously, "It's time to put your metal ass down once and for all." Throwing his arms out to his sides, the Saiyan then gave a mighty bellow and, in an explosive show of force, his aura blasted off of him in all directions and began to fluctuate like crazy. This was instantly followed by two blue spheres of energy wrapping around his hands, which sparkled and crackled as he poured all the ki he needed into his palms.

Eyes flickering with numbers and warning lights, Sentinel's gaze reflected a momentary sense of astonishment. This then prompted the android to also begin powering up and in a matter of seconds, the insides of the two barrels he'd produced from his arms began to glow a hot orange. His internal nuclear furnace burning brightly and emitting a loud humming noise, the android took aim at his target and, with a sonic boom and the howl of a powerful engine, the android unleashed his attack.

"Hell Flash!" Two orange blasts rocketed out of his arms and fused into one, forming into a single beam that charged towards the Super Saiyan in a wall of death.

In response, Vegeta roared at the top of his lungs and, upon bringing his hands together with his fingers spread, the Prince of all Saiyans unleashed an attack that hadn't been seen since his fight on Namek.

"Final Crash!" His yell was soon drowned out by his attack, which gushed out of his hands and shot towards the approaching orange beam in a tidal wave of energy.

The attacks collided in midair like comets running each other down, a shockwave ringing out as a result that punched a massive crater into the ground beneath them. But then, just seconds into the tug-of-war match, Vegeta's blast effortlessly dominated Sentinel's and, overwhelming the opposing blast, charged towards the android. Moments later, the robot was struck headlong by the attack, knocked off its feet, and sent barreling across the city, flying over hundreds of skyscrapers before eventually colliding with a mountain safely on the other side, way out of reach of the community's populace.

The impact was marked by a brilliant flash of purple light followed by a colossal explosion several hundred times more powerful than a nuke. Fire filled the sky and shot right up into the atmosphere, parting the clouds with a shockwave that rattled the city to its foundations. A full minute later, the explosion ended, leaving a plume of black smoke gushing into the air from the crater that'd formed where the edifice once stood.

Panting from the attack and still assumed in his transformed state, Vegeta took flight and headed to where his attack had planted his annoying adversary into the earth. Arriving there in no time at all, the man slowly lowered himself from the sky to hover above the center of the cataclysm, where he spent the next few minutes looking around for the remains of his quarry.

Sure enough, he found them. Bits and pieces of highly durable tech lay scattered around the gorge, along with a thoroughly ruined arm, one of the rocket pods the android had used before, and half a skull. The optical lens, which once served as Sentinel's eye, flickered a few times in warning before dying out.

Grunting, Vegeta raised a hand towards it and fired a couple of blasts, disintegrating both the arm and the remains of the head. "Not taking any chances," the prince thought, remembering what the last android they'd encountered had been capable of.

The warrior then powered down when the smoke cleared, giving him a few moments to catch his breath before flying back to Capsule Corp. Once he returned to the facility, he quickly flew in through the hole in the side of the main building, where he quickly saw Mrs. Briefs, his son and Bulma gathered around Doctor Briefs's body.

At first remaining calm when he approached the group, Vegeta then stopped when he saw the blue haired woman cradling her father's head in her lap with tears streaming down her cheeks. Trunks was currently being held by his grandmother, who was doing her best to keep the boy from seeing his grandfather in such a way. But despite her best efforts, she couldn't stop the youngster from hearing his mother's cries.

Sobbing, Bulma turned away from her loved one to look up at Vegeta, whom she saw standing nearby clothed in a tattered gi with burns covering his entire body. Giving the Saiyan Prince a look, she then saw the warrior nod stiffly, answering a question she didn't have the strength to ask. Upon which the blue haired scientist set her father's head down, rose to her feet, walked over to the man, and threw herself at him.

Gripping his top, Bulma cried into Vegeta's shoulder, earning a slightly surprised look from the Saiyan who, after a moment of hesitation, wrapped an arm around her in comfort.

As the woman cried and the rest of the family remained as they were the familiar form of Doctor Brief's black kitten, Tama, walked in from the corridor and towards the fallen scientist. When he stopped by his head, the cat nuzzled him momentarily, only to pull away when he realized he was no longer there.

The cat then sat down and, giving a sad meow, continued to stare at the doctor as the people in the room grieved…

XXX

(Some hours later)

When word eventually got out of the events that'd befallen Capsule Corp, the members of the Z-fighters wasted no time in dropping whatever they were doing at the time and making their way over to West City. Arriving one after the other, the ruined dining room of the Briefs was soon filled with the familiar faces of Yamcha, Krillin, Android 18, Piccolo, Gohan, Zangya and Chi-Chi, all of whom were either flown here or transported to their friends place in some other shape or form.

Once everyone had gathered at the scene of the tragedy, Vegeta wasted no time in filling them in on what had happened, telling them about the android his wife had been constructing and how it suddenly went haywire. While the news initially shocked all of them, after hearing that the Saiyan Prince had managed to destroy the retched abomination responsible for all the devastation, they quickly retired to the living room and began providing comfort for those who needed it.

With Doctor Briefs's body moved over to the couch and covered by a blanket, the assortment of guests remained in a cold and unforgiving silence while they tried to figure out what to do next. On one side of the room, Mrs. Briefs sat with her grandson, holding his hand and receiving company from Yamcha and Puar. Krillin, Vegeta, Gohan, Chi-Chi and Goten on the other hand were sitting around the coffee table beside Bulma, who was currently trying to salvage what she could from her laboratories.

Managing to recover from most of her shock when Piccolo informed her that she could simply use the dragon balls to wish her father back to life, the blue haired woman wasted no time in heading down to the science wing of the building to collect the Dragon Radar. However, upon arriving at the place she remembered stashing it, not only did she find a completely wrecked laboratory waiting for her, she also found the radar lying scattered all over the floor in pieces.

While the dragon ball she had in her possession was lying against the wall not too far away, the rest of her gear had been left utterly destroyed. It hadn't just been that room either.

This inevitably led to the scientist sitting at her coffee table in defeat, holding the pieces of her radar in her hand and staring down at it with a melancholic look. Allowing the components of the device to sprinkle over the table when she tilted her hand, Bulma then crossed her arms over her stomach and tried to stop herself from losing it.
Once again, for the second time that day, Vegeta was there for her. As she sat there on the couch, the woman reached for the man's hand and gripped it tightly. Though he looked away from her when she did, the Saiyan Prince allowed the woman to clench his fingers and let out her distress.

"Sentinel destroyed everything," Bulma whispered, shaking her head in grief, "My lab, my gear, my capsules, my computers... everything."

Krillin blinked, glancing down at the remains of the device that had served their group well over the past several years. Knowing that they were pretty much flying blind without it, the bald male could only swallow nervously as he looked back up at his friend, "Can you fix it?" It was a question that as acknowledged by a glance from Android 18, who was standing nearby.

The woman sniffled, "I can. But with all my equipment either broken or missing, it'll take me at least a month to rebuild and reprogram it."

"A month?" Krillin balked. "That long?" A nod was all he received in return, before Bulma leaned over and pressed her forehead into Vegeta's shoulder.

The Saiyan Prince remained silent, keeping his gaze averted but nevertheless sparing the woman a few furtive glances. Silence returned to the room shortly thereafter, with Chi-Chi extending a hand across the table to take Bulma's free one, and Gohan fixing his gaze on the destroyed radar.

Though everyone knew the woman would be able to fix the device without question, after everything she'd been through the entire morning, they knew that it would take her a while to get her mind back on track. She was obviously still shaken-up from the entire ordeal and thanks to the mess left behind by that bastard android, they knew that it would probably take a lot longer than a month before they could even start looking for the dragon balls.

For Bulma, after suffering such a loss to her family and feeling as though all of the responsibility for it rested on her shoulders, as she'd been the one to build the monstrosity's body in the first place, everyone knew that this was going to be incredibly hard for her to move on from. Considering everything that'd happened, perhaps this was a dead end for her.

However, there was one amongst them who was not willing to throw in the towel just yet.

Being one of the only people there with a clear head on his shoulders, Gohan, narrowing his eyes, rose to his feet and turned to the ceiling. His actions drawing everyone's gazes over to him, including Piccolo and Zangya's over by the window, everyone saw the spiky haired teen step into the middle of the room and focus all of his attention towards the sky.

It was a sudden shift in tone that did not go unnoticed.

"Gohan?" Bulma murmured.

"What's wrong, sweet heart?" Chi-Chi also asked, while at the same time his kid brother looked at him in confusion.

Remaining silent for several moments, the hybrid teen glanced back down at everyone around him and, after looking at all their faces, fixed his attention on the Briefs family members and smiled. "I'll be back in a bit."

Then, looking away once more, Gohan vanished in a golden flash of light, leaving his friends and family standing around the chamber in confusion.
For Goku, it was just another ordinary day living out his current incarnation on the Grand Kai’s planet.

Following the visit from his family and his son’s friends the previous morning, the Son father was feeling much livelier than usual and was hitting King Kai’s training regimen even harder than ever. To start off his physical routine, the man was currently using wrist and ankle weights to work on his speed and power, punching and kicking the air in a blur of movement and causing sweat to fly off of him with every blow.

His attacks cutting through the sky above the meadows of the planet in all directions, the spiky haired Saiyan was watched on by the ever-present form of his mentor. Accompanied by Bubbles and Gregory, both of whom were also observing the shadow sparring fighter with interest, King Kai looked on silently as his best student buffed up his fighting skills and plowed through his routine at full throttle.

It was only after an hour of training at this stage that the group was suddenly interrupted from their session by a flash of golden light appearing directly in the center of the field. Their attention being pulled around, King Kai and Goku saw the familiar form of Gohan shimmer into view, an intense look on his face that quickly switched to its normal expression the moment he exited the dimension he’d been traveling through to get here.

"Oh, Gohan. Good morning," the overseer of the Northern Quadrant exclaimed, with Bubbles and Gregory also waving to the boy in greeting.

"Hey guys," the teen greeted pleasantly, before then turning around and looking up into the sky where his father was floating. "Yo, dad."

"Gohan? You’re here?" Goku asked, quickly dropping back down to ground level and walking up to his son, who strolled over to him in kind. The man with sweat dripping down his face placed his hands on his hips, "I didn’t know you would be popping in today? Is everything alright?"

"Sorry to drop in so suddenly dad, but… something important has just come up," the teen explained with a troubled expression quickly coming over him. It was an expression that his father immediately took notice of, "I need your help…"

XXX

(Some hours later)

Standing around the living room of Bulma’s home, the Z-fighters continued to chat amongst themselves and help pick up the pieces left behind in the wake of their most recent fiasco. While those like Mrs. Briefs went about trying to get the place tidied up, especially the mess made by Sentinel that’d left a massive twenty meter wide hole in their dining room wall, others such as Krillin and Yamcha continued to provide comfort for Bulma.

Even though she continued to go to Vegeta for support, everyone wanted to be there to help their friend however they could.

Being conscious enough to make only a handful of decisions at the moment, the blue haired scientist set their company robots to clean up the labs and the dining room. Since they were all programmed to follow specific instructions and commands, the little automaton helpers were ideal in separating the nonessential items of the rooms from those that were important, including being able to tell the difference between tech that was unsalvageable and the stuff that was. And of course, because they didn't need food or breaks, they were tireless and dutiful in their actions, whizzing around the hallways at inhuman speeds.

For the longest time, the entire group remained in silence. It was perhaps one of the only times any of them remembered ever being quiet for so long, not knowing who to talk to or what to do. The only ones that didn't have any problems with this scenario were Piccolo, Vegeta, Zangya and Goten. While the Namekian managed to maintain his cool, knowing that the situation could be resolved one way or another, Vegeta and Zangya remained seemingly unaffected. This was mostly because both of them were stone-cold warriors and had seen their fair share of death in their lives, and while either one of them was more than capable of expressing emotions, they chose to remain collected instead.

If there was any members of their group that had to, it was them.

Goten on the other hand spent the few hours following Gohan's departure hanging around with Trunks, cheering his friend up while also taking to sitting near the latter's grandfather over by the couch. They remained there until Mrs. Briefs came by to take the two of them away and feed the youngsters some lunch, not only to cheer them up but to occupy her time as well.

Everyone had their way of coping with loss. Well… keeping herself busy was hers.

Most of the Z-fighters didn't partake in eating lunch together. Everyone just remained as they were, not really eating anything at all. After lunch time had come and gone and most of the property was being repaired, Bulma went over to sit by her grandfather and watch over him.

Tama the kitten also sat close by, positioned on the floor and staring up at his colleague and best friend in silence.

Making sure he was sleeping soundly, the woman sat by the man until she was joined by her mother. During this time, she began thinking of places to put her grandfather to rest while she went about fixing the Dragon Radar. She also used that time to think about her blunder and how she was going to apologize to him for creating an android that took his life.

Fortunately though, she wasn't able to think about it for very long.

When Mrs. Briefs gripped her shoulder in comfort and Bulma placed her hand on top of her mother's in response, they were suddenly startled out of their reverie by a cough and a groan. It was a collection of sounds that quickly had their eyes snap towards the deceased Doctor Briefs lying in front of them.

As soon as their attention fell upon him, they saw the man roll over and, through a half-lidded gaze, stared up at the two surprised ladies in exhaustion. Seconds later, the father's vision cleared, allowing him to see the two people standing over him.

Giving another moan of discomfort, Doctor Briefs slowly sat up, "Ugh. Why is my neck so stiff?"

His voice breaking the silence of the room immediately drew the collective attention of every single person in the area, including Piccolo, Android 18 and Vegeta. When everyone turned to the couch against the wall, they saw the recently deceased Briefs father sitting up and massaging his collar bone in confusion, which immediately set off alarm bells.

After rubbing away the soreness, the man sat up and cleared his throat, "Does anyone here have a glass of water."
"DADDY!" Bulma suddenly shouted, throwing herself at the doctor and trapping him in a hug.

Her actions surprising the old scientist, the founder of Capsule Corp also found himself locked in a hug from his beloved wife, who threw herself at him and wrapped her arms around his neck tightly. "Sweet heart! You're alive!" She even gave him a big kiss on the cheek to express her delight at seeing her husband was back.

Blinking a few times in a mixture of surprise and confusion, Doctor Briefs then gave a chuckle and returned his loved ones affections. "I'm so sorry I worried you two so much." Being sure to hug them both tightly, the man then pulled away and rubbed his wife's cheek tenderly, before then beaming at his daughter, who had tears brimming at the corners of her eyes.

It was then a familiar shout from the side drew the man's attention to yet another member of his family he would never forget, "Grandpa!" Right on cue, Trunks rushed across the living room floor and leapt at the man as well, with Bulma and Mrs. Briefs giving the child enough space to jump into the elder's arms and embrace him.

The impact of his four-year-old grandson drew a chuckle from the old scientist, "Hey there, little guy."

As the family embraced in a flurry of laughter and tears, the Z-fighters standing nearby looked on with expressions of surprise and joy. While Chi-Chi brushed a tear out of her eye and took Goten's hand in hers when the boy ran up to her, Piccolo, Android 18 and Zangya smiled, Vegeta merely stood off to the side with his arms crossed and a neutral expression in play, and Yamcha and Krillin looked on in confusion.

Everyone was so focused on the Briefs family reuniting that nobody noticed the Dragon Radar magically repair itself on the table nearby.

The former of the pair scratched his head, "What the heck's going on?"

"I don't know, man. Your best guess is as good as mine," Krillin also replied with a similar expression of bewilderment in play.

Goten, tilting his head at the Briefs family and seeing the good old Doctor reunite with his kitten Tama, turned his attention to the woman standing next to him. "I thought Doctor Briefs was dead, mummy. How did he come back to life?"

Chi-Chi shook her head, at the same time beaming down at her son happily, "I don't know, Goten. But he's awake now."

Appearing innocently confused for a few moments longer, the child smiled once again before turning his attention back to the scene in wonder, "It's just like magic."

It was these words that suddenly had the Son mother perk up and look in the direction of Yamcha and Krillin. When their gazes met, the three human members of the old Z-gang slowly began piecing things together in their heads. Several seconds of contemplation later, they all clicked onto the exact same thought and stared back at the couch incredulously.

"Could it be?" Krillin murmured.

Yamcha swallowed nervously, "No way. Did Gohan…?"

At that exact moment, a flash of golden light suddenly occurred directly in front of the group, the photons quickly forming into the shape of a person. They then dispelled to reveal Gohan standing there, hands on his hips and a whopping big smile on his face. While the Briefs didn't take notice him at first, all of the other Z-fighters did and fixed their attention on the demi-Saiyan in surprise, around the same time the youngster turned to face them.

Zangya smirked at him, "You're back."

"Yep," the teen chirped, smiling around at his friends before then turning to his mentor, whom he could see was smiling across at him as well.

The green-skinned warrior nodded knowingly in his direction, "You went to New Namek, didn't you?"

"Uh-huh," Gohan replied, turning his attention to his mother and then towards Krillin. "I had to make a couple of detours and ask a few people for directions, but after one or two jumps across the universe I eventually managed to get there in one piece."

The realization had Krillin and Yamcha staring at the boy in amazement, with the former speaking up on behalf of the pair, "H-How did you get them to let you borrow their dragon balls?"

"It wasn't that hard actually. I just explained to the elder and his people what'd happened over here and the villagers let me use Porunga to make my wishes. Since Doctor Briefs and his family did so much for them while they were staying over here, they were more than happy to help me out," the teen said, before giving his friends a sheepish smile. "Honestly, I thought it was going to be a lot harder than that. Thank Dende we don't need to go on a several month long journey to actually get there anymore." His grin only seemed to widen. "Man, I love Instantaneous Movement."

Yamcha chuckled at the boy's remark, "You're one hell of a kid, Gohan."

"Yeah," Krillin also spoke up, seeing the teen smile at them and receive a hug from his mother.
"Way to go, man."

Gohan turned to look at Vegeta to see how the Saiyan Prince had responded to his little back-and-forth across the cosmos. When his eyes met the warrior's, the hybrid received a nod of approval from him as well as a grunt. Upon returning it with a smile and a bow of his own, the proud fighter turned away from him and went back to staring at the couch.

Following his return and hoisting Goten onto his shoulder when the little tyke rushed over to him, everyone turned back to the Briefs family to see Bulma and everybody else beaming in Gohan's direction. When the woman expressed her gratefulness to the boy with a silent 'thank you', which brought an even warmer smile to the teen's face, she turned to her father and immediately took on a solemn look.

"Dad… I'm… I'm sorry for what happened last night," the blue haired woman whispered while shaking her head. "I never expected things to get so out of hand. That Android… I… I thought that with his programming that he was going to be just like before… and that when he came to life he would be the same Sixteen like the one we remembered. But… But it turns out there was a monster hiding inside of him and I… I let him kill you." Sniffling, Bulma rubbed her eye on the back of her hand and choked out her last words. "Damn it. I'm so sorry, daddy… I'm sorry…" She then tensed up and waited for the admonishment that was sure to come.

However, after several moments of waiting, the woman received none. Instead, the blue haired scientist felt a pat on her head and looked up to see her father fondly smiling at her. When their gazes met, Doctor Briefs gave her head a comforting rub and grinned, "It's alright, sweet heart. It's alright." The man whispered comfort to her before pulling her forward and giving her a hug. "It "wasn't your fault."

Bulma protested, shaking her head in dismay, "Yes. It was…"

"No. It wasn't. None of us could have ever expected things to spiral out of control like they did. Not even you… and you're one of the best of us. That's the reality of being a scientist, Bulma," Doctor Briefs stated, pulling back and seeing his teary-eyed daughter staring back at him with sadness reflected in her gaze. "We can plan and prepare all we want when walking down the path to discovery. But no matter how hard you work, no matter how much effort you use, or how many safeguards you put in to prevent the unexpected from happening, things can still happen that are beyond our control or understanding. But as long as we endure and don't lose sight of ourselves, we'll be able to pick ourselves up and keep moving forward. That's all there is to it." The man chuckled and wiped a tear from his girl's cheek, "Don't let this mishap stop you from being the amazing scientist you are, Bulma."

Staring at the man for several moments in silence following his speech, Bulma then choked on unshed tears and beamed at her father. "You always did know what to say when I was upset." Sniffling, she took the man's hand and pressed it against her face, keeping it there before moving forward and hugging him, "I love you, dad."

The old founder smiled and returned her hug, "I know, dear. I know."

While the father and daughter embraced, and the Z-fighters standing in the background continued to watch on quietly, Krillin then had a thought and turned towards the demi-Saiyan standing by his mother's side curiously.

"By the way, Gohan, isn't the Namekian dragon supposed to grant you three wishes?" When he saw the boy look at him, the monk raised an eyebrow, "What did you use the other two wishes for?"

Grinning, the hybrid looked away, "Well, the first one I used to wish Doctor Briefs back to life. The second one I used to repair all the damages the Sentinel fight had caused to Capsule Corp and West City."

Krillin blinked, "And… the third one?"

"Oh…" Gohan shrugged and smiled brightly, "That one's a surprise."

This cryptic response left Krillin and Yamcha looking at one another in confusion. However, considering that this was their best friend's son they were talking about, they knew that the kid would have wished for something for either selfless or practical reasons, and thus had nothing to be concerned about. So, upon reaching this conclusion, everyone within earshot of the spiky haired teen turned back to watch as Doctor Briefs was brought up to speed on what'd happened following his brush with death.

As expected, he was relieved to hear that Sentinel had been destroyed by Vegeta and that the robot had been stopped. It was as though a great weight had been lifted free from their shoulders, leaving them with a sense of achievement and a feeling that things were going to be okay again. As the group stood around the living room and the robots going about cleaning up Capsule Corp's main building were baffled to find that everything had been miraculously repaired and replaced during their work, it seemed like their world was once again saved from another android crisis.

OOO
Many, many miles away from West City, far to the North where another great metropolis stood, there sat the familiar home belonging to a long forgotten enemy. With the only remnants being a massive pile of rubble and chunks of metallic debris and machinery lying about, making up both the top and basement levels of Doctor Gero's lab, there seemed to be very little that remained of the old nemesis of Son Goku's. After the last few years that'd come and gone, the place had been left pretty much undisturbed, with nothing but the forces of nature to twist and mould the debris to their liking.

Ever since Trunks and Krillin's visit here, which had left the entire lower levels of the complex buried and the rest of the lab in pieces; it was nothing but an empty graveyard now. To the Z-fighters and their friends, this place had been pretty much left forgotten.

To all but one of course.

At the base of the cliff where the lab was once situated, the ground grass-covered ground slowly started to churn before a large silver drill suddenly shot out of it. This was immediately followed by the metallic body of a thoroughly beaten up and damaged Sentinel. Dazed, burnt, and a little bit confused, the armor plated android's gears ground and churned loudly as he pulled himself to the surface and, after regaining his footing, walked out into the open.

Here, you could see that not only was an entire half of his body missing, including his right arm, side and shoulder, but the android had half a head missing too. He was like two-face, except without the other side to shout back at him. This pretty much left most of the mechanics making up the inner workings of his frame exposed to the air, classing the android as nothing more than a wrecked piece of hardware.

At least… that's what a normal person would believe.

"S-S-System reboot complete. Primary threat successfully evaded," Sentinel spoke, sparks flying from the side of his cranium as he recovered from the thorough beating he'd received."Compiling files. Assessing damages. Scanning." A few beeps of his optical sensor later and the android smiled. Or rather… half smiled. "Damage to primary combat chassis: thirty-eight percent. Damage to nuclear furnace: five percent. Damage to central processing unit: zero percent."

Cracking its neck, the android marched towards the mound of rubble that had previously been his creator's home, all the while taking stock of his body's condition. "Energy levels at sixty percent. Good. I can work with that."

Even so, being hit by that last attack at the closing stages of his fight back in West City had still come as quite a shock to the robot. Despite his overwhelming confidence and mathematical certainty at being able to defeat Vegeta in the state he was in, the android failed to anticipate the power boosts of the man's transformation stages, which had been a significant blunder on his part. However, as soon as he'd realized he didn't stand a chance against the Prince in his Super Saiyan form, the robot quickly devised a plan to escape his foe, while at the same time making it look as though he'd been destroyed.

The android took the brunt of the blast in the side, ensuring the main components of his form didn't suffer any serious damage in the cataclysm to follow. Then, while Vegeta flew over to check on the crater he supposedly ended up in, the android detached his damaged parts and fled underground, ensuring he covered his tracks at the same time.

It'd been a useful trick and a necessary sacrifice on his part in order to make a clean escape.
Sentinel had also made certain to set aside the information he'd gained from today's battle for future reference.

Marching up the field of boulders and scrap metal of the ruined plateau, the android slowly began searching the area for something—anything that he could use as a temporary joining agent. It wasn't until he happened upon a discarded android storage pod lying wedged in the rubble with the number '16' written on it did he know he was in the right place.

Approaching the unit, the robot took a moment to analyze the damage and rust and, realizing it still had salvageable material he could use, extended his only working arm towards it and opened the plates on his guard. Cables then shot out and plugged into the pod, slipping into all the open areas and places with wiring sticking out. After several seconds of sparks and electricity bursts, Sentinel then disassembled the key components of the capsule and pulled them back towards his frame.

Using the parts he'd managed to grab, he was able to not only cover up the damages done to his side and head, he was also able to create a makeshift arm, leaving one side of his form fully armored while his damaged right side had a skeleton limb. Flexing it and its makeshift fingers, checking to make sure it was responding properly. Sentinel then turned his attention back to the area.

"A crude design, but it will do until I can build a proper replacement for it." Scanning the hill of rubble and debris for several minutes, using his specially modified sensors to search underneath the various obstructions, the android quickly saw that some of Doctor Gero's lab had remained intact. Though much of the basement had been buried and most of the tech inside had been blown to pieces, there were still many things left lying around for him to use.

Even some of the small storage spaces for machinery and computers with specially installed shock buffers had also managed to survive the hell they'd been put through. It was all the comfort the android needed to know he could pick up where he'd left off.

"First order of business is to repair this body," Sentinel stated, raising a hand and extending his cables into the rubble. One by one he began plucking random bits of metal debris out of the earth, salvaging what he could of his original creator's place of business. He was lucky that the good Doctor had designed his old lab using the finest material and hardware he could steal, because even after all the exposure to the harsh environment, most of it hadn't rusted in the least.

While he continued to scavenge the area, Sentinel smiled once again, "Second order of business is to create a base of operations. Then I can begin work on my next major project."

As far as he was concerned, sacrificing a third of his body to make it look as though he'd been blown to bits by Vegeta's blast had been a great way to throw the Saiyan Prince off his tail. Now that he and the Briefs family believed he was destroyed, Sentinel now had plenty of space to recover from the damages he'd received, upgrade his frame, and construct a home to conduct his next set of tasks.

After all, he had plenty of objectives and schemes in his head to follow up on, all of which involved improving upon his current form and taking over the world.

If he was going to do that, then he needed power and resources. That first one was a must.

There was an entire city nearby where he could 'borrow' technology and hardware from, and with the Z-fighters off his tail and a destroyed lab in an isolated area to work with; Sentinel had all the time in the world…
7 Year Gap - Where We Left Off

Author's Note: Well folks. Here it is. The final montage chapter you've all been waiting for before the end of the Seven Year Gap.

Be warned, this chapter was, like, fifty pages long when I wrote it, so it's safe to say you'll have a lot of fun reading it over the next day or two. I know I did.

Anyhow, hope you all enjoy it.

---

Dragonball Z

Legacies

Where We Left Off

(Two days later)

Hearing nothing but the wind brushing past her hair and cowl, the white haired form of Paprika stood atop a spire of rock with her eyes firmly shut and the most intense look pulled across her face. It wasn't that she was terrified of standing on top of that pillar hundreds of feet above the ground. Far from it. She was simply focusing on the energy swirling around inside her and concentrating it around a certain point, which was revealed moments later when her eyes snapped open and, taking a step forward, she threw her right hand forward and unleashed it all in one go.

"HA!" With a bellowing shout, a pink flash of light left her hand and rocketed towards the deserted mountain standing several kilometers in front of her. The blast quickly impacted against its side and detonated with the force of a nuke, incinerating the entire front portion of the edifice and bringing down half of it in the form of rubble and dust.

After the cloud of smoke lifted from the area, it revealed a blast-shaped crater in the side of the remaining half of the mountain and a decent part of the landscape covered in massive chunks of debris.

Clicking her tongue irritably, the green-skinned Makyan with the black uniform and red scarf stepped out of her stance and clenched her fists again. "Not as tough as the mountains in the north, but these ones are still quite sturdy..." Taking a deep breath, the young girl huffed, "I've been training like hell for weeks and I still haven't made any jumps. Damn it..."

Every time it seemed like she was getting somewhere with her power and skills, that bastard of a half-Saiyan simply moved one step ahead of her even faster, just to stay in the lead. It was mind numbingly annoying and frustrating.

"Hey, Paprika. What's up?"

And speak of the devil...

Eye twitching, the white haired girl glanced over her shoulder to see who it was that suddenly called her name.

Sure enough, appearing right there in her peripheral vision, she saw Son Gohan himself, dressed in the same gi he'd worn to the world tournament, land directly behind her with that irritating smile... on his face. She didn't even question how the hell he'd managed to find her all the way out here, considering she wasn't even trying to hide her energy signature. However, his arrival at this place did raise a few other inquiries…

"Blowing up mountains again? That's cool. I usually do it while I'm training as well, but I try to keep the damages to a minimum. The earth has enough problems to deal with supporting over four billion people and animals on it. Having a couple of super powered aliens blasting the heck out of its landscapes is something it can do without," the demi-Saiyan teen spoke, obviously as a joke.

Despite his words seemingly falling on deaf ears, Gohan continued to grin across at the girl's back as the wind whipped past them and the awkwardness of the moment started to settle in.

Eventually feeling the sensation tickling at the crook in his neck, the young Saiyan cleared his throat and placed his hands on his hips, "So what's happening on your side of the ball? Been training hard for the next Tenkaichi Budokai?" He then saw Paprika turn around and, after throwing him a hard glare, took a couple of steps towards him. Not sensing anything off about her actions, Gohan continued to speak in his same, good-natured manner. "Considering how strong you are now, you must have been working your butt off these past couple years. I bet your Super Makyan form is much more powerful then it was before if your current energy level is anything to go by-" CRACK!

Gohan's comments were effectively cut off when he received a hard punch to the face from the girl, who managed to cock his head to the side and draw blood. Shaking her fist out, the Makyan stared at him firmly for a moment before turning heel and facing the destroyed mountain once again, leaving the slightly surprised half-Saiyan rubbing his now bruised cheek.

"Shut up, Son. You're ruining a perfectly good training session," the Makyan spoke in a harsh tone of voice. She grunted immediately afterwards, "Honestly, I can't stand your incessant blabbering…"

Her remark to his appearance and her punch had Gohan chuckle weakly, "Heh… still sore at me for knocking you around back then, huh?" Massaging his jaw and rolling it, the youngster grinned across at her. "I guess I deserved that one."

Though he was a bit skeptical on that one, considering he did blow up her home planet all those years ago, the girl still packed a wicked right hook. That much was clear.

"What the hell do you want?" Paprika asked, not even bothering to give the boy the courtesy of eye contact.

Upon nursing his throbbing cheek, the demi-Saiyan beamed brightly at her, "I was just wondering if I could talk to you for a minute…” He then gestured over his shoulder with his thumb, "Just for a minute. Not here though. I need to speak with you somewhere else."

His words prompting the girl to look over her shoulder again, Paprika glared momentarily at the incredibly cheerful Gohan. Upon taking in his warm smile and kind eyes, she once again turned away from him and focused her attention back on the countryside.

"Pass."

The young warrior immediately appeared disappointed, "Aw. But… why?"

"Are you seriously asking me that question?" the Makyan asked in amazement, looking around to see the Saiyan drop his arm to his side in confusion. Upon seeing his reaction, the girl sighed and raised a hand in defeat, "Kai, you're as dense as the fucking moon." She then jabbed her fingers in the air, "Three reasons. One: I hate you. Two: you blew up my home planet. Three: after all the shit I had to go through in the past five years because of what you did, do you honestly think that I would waste my time and energy speaking with you outside of the ring? Even though I'm not out to murder you in your sleep, I'm still your damn enemy." Not receiving an immediate answer except a few confused blinks and a blank stare, Paprika quickly gave up on him fixed her attention elsewhere. "Ugh. It's useless trying to explain anything to you. Just leave me alone."

Sensing hostilities growing, Gohan sighed and raised his hands, "Alright. Alright. I will." Stepping to the side, he then resolutely gestured to the landscape behind him, "But only after you come with me for a couple of minutes. I just want to show you something. After that I'll leave you alone and we won't have to speak to each other ever again… okay?"

Despite his voice and persistence grating on her like nails on a chalkboard, the Makyan considered his words carefully for several moments. As much as she wanted to blow him off entirely and take a shot at him for continuing to bug her, the girl relented for a couple of reasons, the first being that he was still much stronger than her.

The second was that even if she tried to get physical, the boy was stubborn and would probably stick around until she did something other than say 'no'. He did seem to be that kind of person on the surface and if her history on him was correct then that was most likely the case.

After a full minute of silence and continuing to feel the boy's pleading eyes bore into the back of her skull, Paprika eventually came to the conclusion that the monkey wasn't going to leave her alone no matter what she did to try and stave him off. So, after giving an irritable sigh and a slump of her shoulders, the white-haired fighter spun around and cursed, "For the love of… FINE! Fine!
I'll come with you…" She then grumbled under her breath when she saw Gohan's smile reappear, "Lousy, stupid, airheaded, orange-wearing clown."

Completely missing the spite towards him, the half-Saiyan took flight and Paprika followed close behind. Figuring she wouldn't like him being anywhere within contact distance, Gohan decided not to try and teleport her to the location and simply led her there instead. Setting a comfortable pace, the pair left the deserts of the West and headed South-East, during which time neither of them said a word to each other. All they did was glide along at a reasonable speed in silence and kept a safe, breathing distance from each other, with the half-Saiyan glancing over his shoulder every now and then to make sure the girl was still behind him.

Every time his eyes landed on her, he saw the Makyan glaring at him with her arms crossed and a suspicous expression in play.

That was all Gohan needed to know that she was at least going to stick with him until the end of this journey.

For the next few minutes they glided along, watching as the landscape around them quickly transformed into forest covered mountains, canyons and plateaus. Recognizing the scenery as being the backdrop making up Mount Paozu, Paprika was about to ask the boy why the heck they were going to his home until she suddenly saw him drop altitude. Sticking to him, she descended as well until they landed softly in a grass-covered clearing beside a very familiar waterfall and river.

Looking around at what she realized was one of her meditation spots, the Makyan then shot the boy a frown as he walked forward, "Alright. What the hell did you bring me all the way out here for?"

Still smiling from ear to ear, the teen glanced over his shoulder to meet Paprika's gaze, "I just wanted to apologize for everything that's happened between us. After all the stuff that's gone on in the last several years, the androids showing up, Cell, Bojack and everything, living on this planet must've been really tough on you." Seeing her narrow her eyes on him, the half-Saiyan continued in earnest. "I… also wanted to thank you for looking out for my little brother whenever he went out on his little adventures."

Caught a little bit off guard by that last part, the white haired girl looked at her chief rival in bewilderment, "You… knew I was…"

"Even though I'm sometimes not around when Goten goes outside to play, I still know exactly where he is and wherever he ends up," Gohan informed, tapping the side of his head with a warm grin. "You can hide your ki signature really well whenever you're on another part of the planet. But you can't hide whenever a second energy signature manages to find you. Squirt pretty much blew the whistle on your position the first time he ran into you outside my house."

The Makyan blinked a couple of times before looking off with a grunt, arms still folded and ire still burning brightly. "I have no intention of harming any of your friends or family… especially your little brother. Unlike some of the other enemies you encountered in the past, I'm not a monster."

She then glanced back at him momentarily, "I welcome any opportunity to show kindness and care to the uncorrupted… even if they are the blood of the person I detest most in this world."

Gohan lightened up at her sincere response, "Sure. I wanted to come out and thank you personally, but I knew that words wouldn't be enough. So I… well…" Rubbing the back of his neck nervously, he then stepped aside and gestured across the river. "I wanted to do something special to show my appreciation."

When Paprika looked in the direction he was pointing, her eyes widened in surprise when she found herself staring at something she thought she'd long forgotten.

Standing plain in her sights, sitting alongside the forest and river, was a large, purple house made of stone with numerous windows, dome-shaped tiled roofs giving the building the appearance of mushrooms clustered together, a chimney, a beautiful garden out front, and a contemporary archway. Bearing the appearance of a cottage in a fantasy setting, it not only had greenery growing all over it, there was also a watermill not too far from the house giving the place a turbine to work grains and other miscellaneous material.

However, this was apparently no ordinary setup or building, as the sight of the house had Paprika walk forward and reach out with a hand. "I-Is that…?"

"I know it's not like the one back on your home planet, but I did the best I could with the wish that I had," Gohan explained, smiling at the girl as she stared across at the house in disbelief. "Since you're probably not used to living out in the wilderness like some other people I know, I wanted to do something to help you out. So I asked the dragon of New Namek to build you a house." He then lowered his hand and regarded the girl with a soft look. "I stocked up the pantry, moved the furniture and bought you some other stuff to get you started. It's not much, but…"

"No, no, it's fine," Paprika murmured, not taking her eyes off the building for a second. "It… almost looks like the house I grew up in with my…" She then stopped when she realized what she was about to say and glanced across at Gohan. Considering his expression for but a moment, she then returned to a normal standing position and frowned at the structure. "It's very nice."

Smiling at her remark, Gohan nodded across the river, "Do you want me to give you a tour?"

Paprika quickly shook her head, "No, I'm good." She then shot him a glare, one that had the boy lean away a little, "I did say I would only speak with you for a couple of minutes… so…"

Nodding in understanding, the half-Saiyan quickly turned to leave. Reaching into his belt, he pulled out a key and tossed it to the Makyan, who caught it and held it firmly between her fingers. Upon which the youngster then gave her a pleasant wave, "If you need anything, don't hesitate to drop by and ask. Okay?"

"Whatever," Paprika replied quickly, at the same time showing him her back. "Now get lost."

Satisfied with her response, the half-Saiyan then placed his fingers to his forehead and vanished in a golden flash. After seeing the boy leave via teleport, Paprika then took a moment to look over the house and check out the key she'd been given.

Inspecting it for several seconds, a warm smile then crossed the demon girl's lips and, clenching the key in the palm of her hand, decided to go check out the home.

Though it wasn't like the one she had back on her former planet, it was close enough.

"I'll be sure to punch him extra hard the next time we meet," Paprika thought with a small smirk in play.

XXX

(One Year Later)

Things on earth really quieted down following the incident at Capsule Corp. Thanks to Vegeta, the abomination the Z-fighters later dubbed Sentinel 16 had been wiped clean off of the face of the planet and with Gohan's quick jump across space, they were able to repair all of the damages the android had caused to the surrounding landscape. While the situation had indeed appeared dire at first, the fully automated enemy fighter didn't actually cause that much destruction to be classified as a Cell-level threat. After the Saiyan Prince had finished dealing with him, the man claimed that the android Bulma had created was only about as strong as the original Sixteen, perhaps even stronger.

Whatever the case, with the robot destroyed, Doctor Briefs brought back to life, and the West City region restored to its previously serene state, the defenders of earth could once again return to their usual routines.

In the next several months to follow, Krillin finally stopped beating around the bush and proposed to Android 18, who gladly accepted with a smile on her face and a sparkle in her eye. The pair had the ceremony two weeks later in a temple not too far from Gohan's house. As expected, every one of the Z-fighters attended the event, including the Satan family and Zangya, the latter of whom ended up being the maid of honor. It was a simple affair with very few embellishments, but a terrific day all the same. Even Piccolo managed to have a good time at the dinner, standing in the corner chatting away with Gohan and all the others who decided to swing by his spot. And as expected of the occasion, everyone was sure to congratulate the newly married couple on finally tying the knot, who headed off on their honeymoon shortly thereafter.

The wedding turned out to be the biggest highlight of the year for everyone involved. It also served as a major turning point for Krillin who, after years of being on the receiving end of vicious beatings at the hands of villains far more powerful than him and going through more hell then any normal person would have to go through in their entire lifetime, the Z-fighters included, managed to get what he considered the girl of his dreams. Yamcha made extra certain to praise the guy for bagging the hottest babe their group had ever come across, which promptly ended in him receiving a frying pan to the head from Bulma.

After that weekend, the days slowly pedaled back to a regular pace. Bulma, albeit reluctantly, returned to her work in the laboratories getting her projects done and restarting the Android 16 remodeling from scratch. This time though, she made certain to scrub the files that created Sentinel in the first place and began taking the construction of the automaton one step at the time.

As an extra precaution to the overall scheme, the woman decided not to give the robot the same frame right from the get-go. Wanting to avoid yet another accident at the facility, Bulma went right back to square one with plastic, a safety she was planning to install into all future robots. She also had an idea on how to make the new android more 'people friendly', a result she was really looking forward to testing.

Before anyone knew it, an entire year had once again come and gone.

In the Son household, Goten was another term older and, true to his Saiyan genetics, he was growing fast. Now at four, the boy had become just as articulate and strong as Gohan was at the same age. And just like his older brother, the sibling had developed the same loving, carefree nature as the hybrid fighter, with the exact same strengths and capabilities that would put most other kids to shame.

This also included a penchant for literacy and numeracy, a skill that he was currently practicing as part of his schooling at home.

Sitting at his desk in his bedroom surrounded by books, in a setting very familiar to all those who lived in that house, the child dressed in the orange and blue prince-style uniform with black spiky hair could be seen scribbling away on a graph paper. Going through his Year 6 geometry with a smile on his face and tongue sticking out of the corner of his mouth, Goten was really letting his textbook have it.

"There… now… if I was to arrange the coordinates this way," the youngster murmured to himself, only to suddenly be interrupted from his train of thought by the door to his bedroom opening.

Looking across, Goten saw his mother, dressed in her familiar yellow household robes and shoes, walk in with a tray of sandwiches, apples and juice. The sight of her delivery had the child beam excitedly, "Hi mum."

"Hello son. Studying hard?"

"I think so," the boy replied, quickly glancing back at his work and flipping through his pages in reverse. "I've just finished the entire chapter on shapes and moved into the final chapter on Cartesian coordinate systems. After this I'll be switching back to my algebra."

"That's excellent," Chi-Chi exclaimed brightly, setting the tray of goodies down next to him and leaning over to check on her boy's work. After running through the pages he'd already completed, the woman gave an approving nod and patted her son on the shoulder, "Well done Goten. After you're done with this portion, I think we can move on to your biology homework in the afternoon. How does that sound?"

"Yeah," the child chirped with an enthusiastic nod. "I want to learn more about cicadas and dragonflies. They look so cool when they're all grown up."

The mother giggled, "Oh, I'm sure there will be plenty of time to study your insects, Goten. But I think we'll need to start setting you up on learning about the process of photosynthesis and plants for the next unit as soon as possible. We can't have you hanging around the basics the entire year,
"Okay," Goten agreed while taking one of the apple slices she'd brought for him and popping it into his mouth.

While Chi-Chi beamed at her youngest child and Goten moved onto the next page of his book, the sound of loud shouts and heavy fists cutting through the air suddenly drew their attention out the window. When the pair looked across the grassland that was their backyard and past the oak tree standing several meters away from their house, the mother and son saw a familiar orange figure dart across the sky in a series of barely visible blurs. They watched the anomaly continue to streak through the air at light speed before eventually reappearing out of his dimension engaged in a heated shadow sparring match.

Adorned in a pair of orange gi pants and a blue belt, with massive weight bands that had the appearance of padding slipped around his wrists and ankles, the spiky haired form of a sixteen year old Gohan could be seen going through the motions of yet another fierce training session. Sweat flying off of him with every punch and kick he threw at speeds humans would not be able to track, the boy shouted and grunted with every combination he unleashed, attacking from the one spot before beginning to move about the air at random.

At first glance it seemed like the teen was the only one out there. But on closer inspection, the family indoors saw not only Icarus sitting out there on the grass and watching him, but the boy's friend Lime was also out there, sitting by the dragon and watching her friend work.

She was obviously amazed at the sheer skill and speed the half-Saiyan was displaying, and who wouldn't be. Gohan was clearly fighting in a manner that no other human on earth fought, including her grandfather.

Chi-Chi sighed as she straightened up and placed a hand on her hip, "There he goes again; tearing it up like there's no tomorrow."

As he watched his older brother punch and kick away at the air with amazement reflected in his eyes, the young Goten couldn't help the excited smile that slowly formed on his lips.

Yelling out as he repeatedly cut the air with planet crushing attacks, Gohan then performed a stylish aerial spin kick before descending to the ground. Stopping just an inch above the grass, the teen flew forward with an onslaught of punches and a high kick, which he then followed up with a backwards summersault that sent him into the sky. Upon securing a good altitude once again, he continued throwing combinations of lightning fast blows, utilizing attacks and moves from both his father's and Piccolo's fighting styles. Though the speed he moved at made it impossible to tell the difference between any of his strikes, it was still an impressive display nonetheless.

The sixteen year old Lime, wearing a yellow, loose fitted blouse with a tasteful red skirt befitting her age, whistled when she saw the raven haired teen throw another wide hook, which was then instantly followed by a barrage of side-kicks and a rapid fire series of jabs. "That's amazing, Gohan. It sounds like you're lobbing cannon balls with every attack."

With one last shout, the boy thrust a right corkscrew across the grasslands towards the mountains. As soon as his strike was thrown, a sonic boom rang out followed by a gust of wind that rippled over the grass and eventually struck the side of the distant edifice. The attack's impact over five kilometers away took the form of a blast of dust and rubble that shot up into the air in all directions, showing just how much force he actually put behind the blow.

Icarus squawked at the sight of the cataclysm, whereas Lime stared in awe.
Satisfied with the results, Gohan turned back to his audience member and grinned, "I'm in really good form today. If I keep at it, I'm sure I'll be able to use these things in the gravity room no problem." He flexed the massive weight bands he was wearing, which looked more like a set of red tires than anything else.

"How much do you think they'll actually weigh when you get in there?"

"Since they're imbued with demon magic, several hundred thousand times more if I really push it. But I don't want to kill myself. They're already set at four tons a piece. The highest I can actually go is forty tons altogether, but that's only if I'm in peak condition," Gohan replied, holding one up and effortlessly jabbing out with it. After a few shots he pulled it back. "Sure, it's a bit old fashioned, but a little bit of old every now and then has always been good in my books."

"That's what my grandpa says to me sometimes." Lime grinned from her spot on the grass, "How long do you think it would take me to become strong enough to lift one of those on my own?"

"Honestly?" Looking up thoughtfully for a moment and gauging the girl's power level, the teen Saiyan grinned, "If you'd started doing this sort of stuff about three years ago, I probably would've been able to get you to hold at least one of these by now. Maybe even two."

"Ah, shoot," the country girl jabbed the air, clicking her tongue in annoyance. "Figures. I should have started grandpa's martial arts training earlier. I was lazy."

Gohan grinned in amusement, "Is he giving you the full Master Roshi treatment or is he doing his own thing?"

"Ugh." The brown haired girl with the ponytail groaned and placed her cheek in her hand, "You don't know the half of it. Good thing I've got the day off today. If he'd sent me out there this morning to work on the fields, swim up the rivers and push those damn boulders across the valleys for the hundredth time, I'd probably be dead right now."

Ever since the Sentinel incident back in Capsule Corp, Lime had managed to convince her grandfather to start training her in his martial arts. While the old man had been hesitant at first, he eventually conceded to his beloved granddaughter's pleading and started her on the fighter's path.

Taking inspiration from Gohan's methods, the retired warrior not only had the girl working on her technical skills, but her strength and speed as well. To put it simply, if he was going to be teaching her his family's martial arts, he was damn well going to teach her properly, and what better place was there to start out then the fundamentals.

Obviously his granddaughter had been motivated by Gohan's attitude to knuckle down into something constructive and practical in her life. Considering how much she enjoyed spending time with him, it made sense she would want to start doing the same stuff he did in order to have something else to talk with him about.

"Keep at it. From what I can sense you're making excellent progress," Gohan said with an encouraging smile from up high.

Taking his words to heart, Lime smiled back at him sweetly, "Don't worry, Gohan. I will." Her exclamation earned a delightful chirp from the pink dragon lying on the grass directly beside her. Just before Gohan could sink back into another hard routine of punches and kicks, the pattering of footsteps and a voice quickly drew his attention towards the house.

"Big brother!" When Lime and the hybrid turned, they saw Goten rushing across the grass towards them with a thousand megawatt smile on his face and eyes sparkling with joy. Skidding to a stop not too far from them, the boy planted his feet into the ground and beamed at his airborne sibling.

Gohan greeted the youngster in kind. "Hey, squirt. What's up?"

"Can you teach me how to fight like you, big brother?" Goten asked, his face all a glow as he stood there with his hands at his sides and eyes set on the powerful demi-Saiyan. "Please. I've finished my homework and mum said I could spend the rest of the day with you if I wanted to."

At first caught off guard by his brother's request, the teen then allowed a smile to form on his face before he started to float back down to the grass. "You want to learn how to do martial arts?"

Seeing the child nod his head vigorously, Gohan let out a chuckle. Touching down gently, he then marched up to the four-year-old and placed his hands on his hips. "I don't know. Learning how to fight like me takes a lot of practice and discipline. Are you sure you're up to it, little guy?"

Goten nodded a second time, "Uh-huh." He then brought his hands up and formed them into fists of self-assurance and determination. "You're so fast and strong, big brother… much stronger than Vegeta and daddy… and I want to be able to do the same stuff that you can do." The boy then pulled away a little and focused his gaze on the ground anxiously. "I know you're busy training with Mr. Piccolo, Big Sister Zangya and Videl every week, but if Trunks is starting to train with his dad, I want to start training to become strong as well."

Feeling a sense of pride swell in his chest at his little brother's words, Gohan gave the youngster one last nod before reaching forward and placing a hand on top of his head. "Alright then. If this is what you really want to do, then let's do it. I'll teach you everything I know." Upon seeing Goten's expression brim with excitement, the teen glanced towards Lime and Icarus, and gestured the girl towards them. "Hey. Wanna join in?"

Perking up in surprise, the farmer girl quickly responded, "Yeah. Sure." Springing to her feet, the cheerful audience member jogged over to the pair, leaving Icarus lying on his patch with his tail wagging behind him.

"Okay, Lime. Stand over here next to Goten and both of you turn to face me." Watching her do as instructed, the teen then stepped away and focused his attention on the pair. Upon sizing them up, the half-Saiyan made an approving gesture. "Alright then. Let's get started. You guys know how to take a basic horse-riding stance, right?"

Lime nodded, "Uh-huh."

"L-Like this?" Goten asked, standing with his feet shoulder-width apart and his fists held at his sides, primed and ready. The girl standing next to him did the exact same thing, smiling happily when she saw Gohan nod towards her before then approaching his younger brother.

"That's good, Goten. Just remember to relax your shoulders and bend your knees a little," the teen said, pushing the boy's arms down a little and nudging his back up. Once he was certain the child was upright, Gohan then stood between them and took a stance as well. Not caring that he was still carrying twelve tons of weight on his person, the boy then began going through the movements with them, at the same time watching his brother closely. "Now, the basic Chokuzuki can be thrown from this position. Remember to distribute your weight evenly as you punch using a twisting motion with your fist, arm and shoulder." He then threw his fist forward, an action which was perfectly mimicked by his little brother and Lime next to him. "Got it?"

"Yes," Goten nodded.
Gohan grinned, "Good. Now for the second motion. When you bring your fist back, make sure you return it to the same position as before. The second you pull it back, you let loose the right one." He then threw a punch with his right, which Goten and Lime copied. "This will give you your standard one-two combo for this style."

And so Goten's training in the art of fighting began. As the older brother walked the youngster and his best friend through the basic attacks, moving them through a few different styles over the next hour or so, the group was unknowingly watched on from the house by the ever-cheerful Chi-Chi. Eyes shimmering with delight as she witnessed her older son begin teaching his little brother the art of fighting, the Son mother felt her heart soar as she saw the spirit of her husband burning brightly in both of them.

Meanwhile, just like the mother was watching from the doorway of her home, the group was also looked on from afar by the caped form of Piccolo, who could be seen standing under his usual tree with his arms folded and his characteristic passive stare fixed upon the family at the bottom of the hill.

XXX

(Some Months Later)

(Satan City)

A knock on the door echoed throughout the enormous mansion that was Hercule Satan's house, informing all who was currently inside that there was a visitor. About several seconds after the noise was made, the door was opened, followed shortly by Jenkins stepping into view. As soon as the old butler's head popped into view, his serious gaze turned downwards to see a blonde haired girl in a green singlet top and jeans standing in front of him.

"Hello, Jenkins," the teen greeted cheerfully, putting a smile on the man's face.

"Ah. Erasa. Good morning," the family's runner replied as he pulled the door open further. "You're looking well."

"Same to you," the blonde exclaimed, before leaning to the side and peering into the enormous hallway of the lavish home. "Would Videl happen to be around, by any chance?"

The old servant chuckled and stepped aside, simultaneously ushering the visitor through, "She's currently in the backyard doing her nine o'clock exercises. Don't worry. You won't find Mr. Satan anywhere around the house. He's going to be out running errands for the rest of the day."

"Sweet. Thanks so much," Erasa said, quickly stepping in so that the man could shut the door behind them. Once again the blonde teenager found herself gawking at the sheer size and extravagance of her best friend's home, admiring all of the furniture, artwork and decorum making up the interior of the Champ's domain.

Nodding in approval at how polished and tidy the place was, courtesy of the home's various maids and servants, the visitor to the mansion wasted no time in making her way to the back of the building. Escorted by Jenkins the entire way through, Erasa then had the door to the back porch opened up for her and was given directions by the man as to where she could find her schoolmate. The blonde made certain to thank the family's butler before heading down the steps and into Hercule Satan's billionaire garden.

Passing by the large pool and the many bushes and palms lining the beds, the teen soon made her way to the area where Videl was; a backyard driveway where the family's other vehicles were currently parked outside the garage.

As expected, Erasa found her friend there going through her morning warm up routines only… it wasn't what she was expecting.

The teen blinked in astonishment when she saw Videl bench-pressing one of the family's Hummer's, sitting directly underneath it dressed in an orange and blue gi, and suspending the vehicle a couple feet above the ground. From the expression on her face, the girl looked as though she wasn't even trying, but had apparently gone through a much harder routine sometime earlier. However, Videl's previous workouts were the least of Erasa's concerns as the blonde continued to watch as her best friend lifted an excess of over a ton of weight over her head like it was just a one kilogram dumbbell.

After a couple minutes of standing there gaping like a fish, Erasa eventually shook herself out of her daze and strolled forward, bending over to smile at her hardworking schoolmate lying across the metal bench. "Damn, girl. A little over excessive, don't you think?"

It was at this point the raven haired fighter finally acknowledged her friend's presence, "Oh. Hey Erasa. I didn't see you there. Glad you could make it." She then turned back to her makeshift gym equipment. "Hang on a second, just finishing up here."

Performing a couple more reps, Videl then moved the vehicle one-handedly over her and set it aside, allowing it to touch down and engage its massive wheels. Once she'd moved it off of her, the teen then leapt to her feet and rolled her arms, loosening herself up after a good session.

"Woo. That was great."

Considering the Hummer for a moment, Erasa then looked at her friend in amazement, "You never told me you could lift cars, Videl. Since when the heck could you do that?"

"Oh… since I started training like this a couple years ago," Videl replied, gripping her shoulder and rotating her arm, before moving to adjust her weighted wrist bands. "It was tough at first, but after several months of hard pushup, sit-up and squat routines wearing ridiculously heavy loads… pushing cars and tossing trucks is like child's play to me."

Blinking a few times in surprise, Erasa then cracked a smile, "So… is that the reason why you've been taking so many months off of school to study at home? Have you been taking super secret fighting lessons under your dad?"

"Well… yes and no. I've been taking a lot of martial arts seminars and classes over the holidays and semesters," Videl answered, returning to a proper standing position and smiling across at her schoolyard companion. "But my dad wasn't the one that's been teaching me. It was… somebody else… a very close friend of mine."

Finding some juicy gossip in the girl's words, the blonde clapped her hands together excitedly and grinned at her raven haired counterpart, "Ooh. Would this 'close friend' happen to be this mysterious Son Gohan I've been hearing so much about?"

Smiling, the teen in the orange gi shrugged and looked away, "May-be."

"I saw him fight in the final match of the 25th World Martial Arts Tournament a couple years ago. I thought he looked pretty cool," Erasa remarked, at the same time taking a step closer out of intrigue. "Just how strong is he exactly? If he was able to beat you in a fight, then he must be a
"Oh, you have no idea," Videl chuckled with a grin, walking up to her friend and clapping her on the shoulder lightly. "Gohan's so strong, he makes dad and I look like a couple of insects compared to him."

Processing the Champ's daughter's words and following her back toward the front porch, the blonde teen then gave a light chuckle when she analyzed the confident smile on Videl's face, "Now I know that's not true. Your dad's the strongest in the entire world, Videl. I mean... he beat Cell for crying out loud... and that guy was monstrously powerful."

Looking her friend's way for a couple of seconds, the teen with the pigtails then shrugged while stopping beside her porch's steps. "It seems I have a little bit of explaining to do about that. But... I think I'll hold off on the long talk until Gohan gets here, which should be in the next couple of minutes." Videl smiled, reaching out with her senses and picking up the distinct signature of her best friend and sparring partner approaching on the wind.

Erasa's face lit up with excitement as she stood beside her classmate, "Really. Y-You mean... he's coming here? Today?"

"Of course. What? Did you think I invited you over to my place just so we could hang out?" Videl asked, smiling across at the blonde now expressing excitement and finally being able to meet the mysterious country boy. "Gohan's still new to the city and doesn't know that many people around here, so I figured I could introduce him to some of my friends from school. Getting you two acquainted with each other seems like a great way to start him out."

"Cool," Erasa chirped with her visage bright and full of enthusiasm. "Man... you've told me so much about him already. I can't wait to see what he's actually like."

"Well, it's a good thing you won't have wait very long." Videl's grin suddenly widened before she started waving up towards the sky, as if greeting somebody who'd just arrived.

Confused by her friend's actions, Erasa decided to see who she was hailing. It then came as a massive shock to the girl when she suddenly saw a teenage boy around their age, with short spiky black hair that defied gravity and wearing an orange and blue gi with a pack slung over his shoulder, float down from the sky and land in front of them like it was an everyday thing. She continued to gawk at the stranger when he adjusted his bag and approached the pair with a pleasant smile on his face.

"Hey, Gohan."

"Hey, Videl," the hybrid greeted, a response that earned a warm grin from his pen pal.

"Decided to fly today?"

"Yeah. Even though I could've teleported here I miss taking the long routes over the mountains and countryside," the teenager replied as he stopped in front of the two girls and acknowledged them in his characteristic manner. "The morning breeze is really refreshing after a hard night of training."

The human fighter tilted her head at him slyly, "Be honest with me; do you actually sleep eight hours anymore?"

"Hmm..." The teen looked up and scratched his cheek thoughtfully, "A little bit iffy around seven. But I guess since I've got Saiyan blood flowing through my veins, sleep isn't that big of an issue for me. Vegeta says it has something to do with how our bodies naturally produce enzymes that give..."
us more energy to stay awake and fight long periods."

Videl grinned in amusement, "Kind of sucks how he's the only one that knows anything about your race's biology."

This drew a nervous chuckle from the young male, "Yeah. It kind of does." It was then he noticed the blonde haired girl standing alongside the martial artist with the surprised look on her face.
Staring at her for a moment, Gohan then turned back to his training companion, "Is she a friend of yours, Videl?"

"Uh-huh," the human fighter nodded affirmatively. "I called her over today so that you two could meet up and we could hang out together."

"Oh. Cool." The demi-Saiyan then turned to Erasa and bowed to her in greeting, causing the city girl to balk, "It's nice to meet you. My name's Gohan. What's your name?"

"Oh. Uhh..." At first not knowing how to respond, the blonde shook her head quickly and straightened up, "M-My name's Erasa."

"It's nice to meet you, Erasa," Gohan responded in his typical, courteous manner. After sparing her a kind smile and seeing her blink a few times in surprise, he then turned back to his training partner with an eager look in his eye. "I'm really glad I'm going to be able to spend a couple nights over at your place again, Videl. I can't remember the last time I came by to visit. What was it one... two months?"

"One month, I think," the girl answered with a shrug.

"Yeah. That's probably it. Man..." The boy rubbed his head nervously, "The days sure go by fast."

"Well, I can't keep going over to your place every couple of weeks without having you spending some time over at mine. You and your family are always so good to me. I want to try and return the favor," the raven haired teen replied before thumbing over her shoulder towards the mansion. "And I know dad really enjoys having you over with us. He's really starting to like you guys."

"That tends to happen with a lot of people we meet. Must be our magnetic personalities," the teen suggested, before then shouldering his duffle bag into view. "Mind if I take this up to your room?"

"Yeah. No problem. We'll wait for you down here," Videl replied, seeing her friend nod in understanding and gleefully step around and up the stairs. "If you get lost, give a holler. Jenkins will show you the rest of the way." After receiving a wave of gratitude, the boy disappeared into the house, allowing the raven haired girl to return her attention to Erasa. When she did, she was a little caught off guard by the fact that the Saiyan was staring after Gohan with wide eyes and her mouth hanging open. "Uh... Erasa? You okay?" She then snapped her fingers, getting her attention. "Oh good. You're still alive."

"W-Was that who I think it was?" Erasa asked while pointing lamely towards the back doors.

The raven haired teen sighed. Figures that would've gone completely over her head. The shock of the Saiyan's arrival must have rattled her brain to its core, especially since he literally just dropped out of the clouds. "Yep. That was Gohan," Videl answered with a cheerful smile.

At this, the blonde suddenly took her schoolmate by the shoulders and shook her with a mixture of incredulity and disbelief, "Damn it, Videl! What the hell?! Why didn't you tell me he was so good-looking? Huh?"
Feeling her brain being bounced around, the teen fighter quickly responded to her friend's question. "Okay, okay, I'm sorry," Videl apologized while being woman-handled by her classmate. Geez. Did she completely overlook the fact the guy had flown here and landed in her back yard? Where in the heck were all those questions? "P-Please s-stop sh-shaking me…"

Now it was Erasa's turn to apologize. "Oh. Sorry. Sorry," Letting the girl go allowed Videl to sway back and forth on the spot until her natural equilibrium returned to her. After placing her hands behind her and bowing her head repentantly, the blonde then looked up at her schoolmate with a slightly flushed look, "I'm just a little bit surprised, is all. I mean… can you blame me? After all the years I've known you, you've never shown even the slightest interest in a boy before. But now here you are, smiling like a kid and hanging out with an awesomely cute guy from the country. What? Are you two, like, an item or something?"

"What?" Recoiling at her friend's sudden question, Videl quickly swallowed and turned away. Hiding her face from view, the girl then expressed an immediate sense of irritation and disbelief, "N-No way. Gohan and I… we're just… good friends. Th-There's nothing going on between us."

"Oh? Really?"

"Yes. Really."

"Hmm." Giving her classmate a suspicious once over, the blonde stood silently for a moment before, after several moments of consideration, pulled away with a smile and an apprehensive glint in her pupil. "Okay. If you say so."

Due to the fact that Videl had pretty much turned her back on her friend, Erasa completely missed the visage of embarrassment and the flush of red that appeared on the tomboy's face. The pair remained that way for the next couple of minutes, keeping absolutely silent before the raven haired fighter was startled out of her daydream by Gohan's voice cutting into the scene.

"Wow. No matter how many times I visit this place, it always amazes me at how massive it is," the hybrid spoke while strolling down the steps, only to immediately come face-to-face with the ever energetic girl that was Videl's school friend. "Oh. Hey, Erasa."

"Hey, Gohan. So… Videl's told me quite a lot about you. How you met during the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament and how you've been training her for the last few years. I can tell she's really grown attached to you," the girl said with a cheerful expression, her face hanging directly in front of his as she engaged him in pleasantries. The sixteen-year-old teenager beamed. "Has she told you anything about me, by any chance?"

The half-Saiyan smiled, "I remember she mentioned you several times while we were hanging out. She said you're an awesome friend who always has a lot of interesting things to talk about, and that you're also really funny and sweet." The young man smiled as Erasa stepped away to take in his appearance. "Looking back on all that, I can tell that everything she's told me about you so far has been right on the mark."

"Really?" When Gohan nodded, Erasa giggled, placing her hands behind her and rocking from side to side bashfully, "Well… I sure hope she hasn't said anything about my bad qualities. That would be pretty awkward."

"Actually, no. She hasn't," the teen said a-matter-of-factly, which then prompted the Saiyan to chuckle, "Why? Is there something I should be worried about?"

Erasa stuck her tongue out at him, "Nope. Nothing evil or malicious hiding underneath this smile."
She then winked in Videl's direction, causing her friend to roll her eyes.

"Well that's good," Gohan said, all the while watching as the blonde maneuvered around him. "You're the first friend Videl's introduced me to from the city. I hope you and I will be able to get along."

"Oh, I'm sure we'll get along just fine, Gohan," Erasa replied, before throwing her schoolmate a discreet, evil smile that had the raven haired martial artist recoil at the sudden chill that ran down her spine.

Blinking a few times, Videl frowned, "Why is she looking at me like that?" It was the one thought that proceeded to run laps inside her head as she watched Gohan descend the rest of the steps and engage in further conversation with Erasa. As the pair became properly introduced, Videl decided to dispense of any suspicious thoughts she had and simply watched on as the country boy began settling into his new position.

So far, his innocent character brought up in the mountains was serving him well in this social setting. Hopefully he'd be able to make it work in the long term…

XXX

(Meanwhile)

Back in Mount Paozu, with Gohan out for the day and Chi-Chi hanging out in the living room watching television and doing some cleaning, Goten was occupying his time with something a little more his speed. Since he didn't have his brother to play with today and his other friends were nowhere to be found, he decided to spend some time with the 'Big Sister' figure in his life.

This took the form of the several-times-removed Zangya sparing with the spiky haired youngster across the rolling hills right outside their small home.

Wearing a big smile on her face, the orange haired Hera, adorned in her regular training uniform consisting of white gi pants with a purple belt, yellow boots and a black singlet top that exposed her midriff and showed off a lot of her cleavage, backed away at an even pace with her arms crossed. At the same time, her little munchkin of an opponent pressed home his offensive. Leaping long distances with a single hop, the alien woman dodged and blocked with her right leg the onslaught of attacks Goten unleashed upon her. The hits he did land on her person impacted with the earsplitting cracks of gunshots, whereas the others sailed past her uselessly.

Despite being several times stronger than the little half-Saiyan, the young alien woman still expressed amazement at how fierce and powerful the kid actually was. He was only four years old, but the kid was capable of hitting with the force of a locomotive.

"Keep it up, runt. That's it," Zangya encouraged, leaping across a flat stretch of grass and watching the boy jump after her. Ducking under a flying spin kick, the woman turned around to see the child touch down behind her and jump at her again, lashing out at her face with a blur of punches and kicks. The woman frowned when she saw his straights coming in one after the other and quickly commented on her observations, "Stop using the standard attacks, Goten. They're too predictable. Mix it up a little more." She then began dodging more frequently when the boy started getting creative.

"Yah!" the demi-Saiyan shouted, leaping at her with a right overhand and forcing her to sway under it. He then cocked his left foot back and opened up with a wicked roundhouse kick, which he threw at the woman's side. He missed big time though when Zangya effortlessly back flipped and avoided it, his own attack sending him into a downward spin.

However, instead of hitting the ground, the boy managed to land on his hand and spun at her with a kick from a handstand position, using his momentum to his advantage. His attack slammed into her shin, which she raised to block. Once his blow connected, he began uncorking more and more attacks, trying to be as imaginative as he could while not losing balance.

He pushed on, forcing Zangya to retreat at a more hurried pace. In spite of his increased intensity though, the woman continued to speak in a completely calm voice.

"Don't get caught up in a pattern. Control my central line," Zangya coached, landing on her toes and watching her opponent jump at her. She head-slipped barrages of jabs, watching his attacks carefully before suddenly being forced to block a right roundhouse kick with her arm.

A split second later, Goten came at her with a downward hook, only to see the woman duck under it, and chased her with a left flip kick. Landing on the ground, the boy spun to face her, gritting his teeth when he saw his opponent standing a safe distance away with a smile on her face.

"Good. Very good," Zangya complimented, arms folded once again.

The youngster panted exhaustedly with sweat dripping down his face, "You're way too fast, oneechan. There's no way I can beat you."

"Hey, I've been doing this a lot longer than you have, little man," the Hera replied with a jovial smile. "Remember, you're only four years old. Give yourself some time."

Nodding, the youngster turned heel and charged right after her in a blur of movement.

Watching his orange form dart towards her at a ridiculous speed, Zangya quickly responded in a typical manner. With a sudden burst of ki and a widening of her eyes, the woman fired a weak Kiai at the child that slammed into him headlong and sent him tumbling across the field. Managing to stop amidst a cloud of dust, a slightly discombobulated Goten took several deep breaths and launched himself at the woman once again.

Swaying to the side with her arms still crossed, Zangya allowed the child to fire away at her. Rapidly moving punches followed her, along with a variety of kicks and hooks. Managing to avoid a spin kick, the Hera then retaliated with a kick of her own, only for the boy to parry her leg and spring off of it to kick at her head. She slipped it effortlessly.

"Faster. Destroy my focus," Zangya ordered, getting the youngster to attack her more viciously. The sudden flare in his pattern impressed the woman, but she nonetheless spotted several flaws in his advances. Despite being super talented Goten still had a lot to learn about fighting. "You're over-flourishing your hooks. Tighten them up." She then swayed and avoided one before head butting the surprised boy in the face and sending him to the ground. The Hera grinned when she heard the youngster groan where he lay. "Now they're too tight. Extend them."

Rubbing his forehead from the unexpected bonk, Goten sat up slowly and groaned. "Hey. That wasn't fair, big sis."

"No one said anything about fighting being fair, not even your big brother and he's one of the nicest guys in the world. Not to mention one of the strongest," Zangya responded, smirking at the spiky haired hybrid as she walked over to him. "Plus I'm older than you and way more experienced… and you're still just a novice. Just give yourself a few more months. I'm sure you'll grow into this."

Goten scrunched his face up childishly, "I can't wait to get better." He then punched the ground and looked up at the Hera sternly. "I'm going to keep getting stronger until I'm as strong as both you and big brother."

"I'm sure that with enough practice you'll get there eventually," Zangya said, stopping next to her friend's sibling and tilting her head at him. "Still, those were some nice moves you pulled. A couple more years of fine tuning and polishing up, I'm sure you'll become something amazing."

"Y-You really think so?" Goten asked, giving the orange haired woman an inquisitive stare.

"For sure," Zangya nodded, passing on her most honest answer to the child as he sat there nursing his injuries. "I know talent when I see it. Even though you're still really young, you've already become a great fighter. I guess that's all thanks to your Saiyan genetics."

Processing her words quickly, the child beamed, "You're wickedly strong too, sis. I bet even Trunks' dad wouldn't be able to beat you."

"Well…" Zangya shrugged and looked off to the side thoughtfully, "Maybe, maybe not. I haven't had the chance to fight him one on one yet, so it's really hard to tell if I could beat him or not. But believe me; out of all the people I've wound up fighting in my time as a mercenary, your big brother was by far the best opponent I've ever fought."

Rubbing the throbbing red bruise on his forehead, the slightly dirty and battered youngster in the orange and blue, long-sleeved gi gazed up at the Hera curiously. "You said you used to be a bad guy, right sis? And that Gohan fought you many years ago."

The woman nodded, "That's right."

"Well… what made you want to switch sides and become a good guy?" Goten asked, lowering his hands and continuing to stare at the female alien he now regarded as one of the closest members of his family. "Did you get bored with being a bad guy or something?"

At first surprised and not really knowing how to respond to his question, Zangya eventually put on a brave face, threw up a smile and, with grace and poise, sat herself on the grass beside the little tyke. Getting comfortable, the woman began to elaborate for him, "That's a really tough question for me to answer, Goten. Honestly, it was a really funky time for me back then. But I guess… if you really want to know, you could say it was a little bit of everything that made me change sides." She glanced at the inquisitive child and gave him her most genuine smile. "After so many years of conquering planets and fighting alongside my old crew, I realized that what I was doing, as a mercenary and a soldier, was hurting a lot of people… people who didn't deserve to get hurt. When I was stuck inside of that star for over ten thousand years, I had plenty of time to think about everything that I'd done with Bojack's group, and that everything we were planning to do and were going to do… was wrong. Then, when I eventually came up against your brother… well…" The woman chuckled and looked ahead of her once again. "He set me straight. He gave me a way out and showed me a new path that I could take… something better that didn't involve destroying everything and hurting others."

Blinking a couple of times, Goten then scrunched his face up curiously, "Did he spank you and say you were being naughty?"

The idea of the present Gohan spanking her had Zangya swallow her tongue. Eyes widening a bit as her face inadvertently heated up at the notion of the dashing young male 'punishing' her, the woman quickly dispersed all thoughts of the concept and smirked back at the cheeky little rascal. "In a way." She then brought a hand up and ruffled his head. "Your big brother beat me up and gave me a second chance. That's how I ended up here and believe me little man… I have no intention of ever going back.”

"Oh," Goten murmured, a smile reappearing on his face. "Okay." Shuffling over to the woman, the child then laid his head on her lap and, securing a good spot, closed his eyes and sighed gently. "I'm really glad you're here with me, oneechan. You're… a very good person." Then, without another word, the boy drifted off to sleep right there in the middle of the field.

At first caught a little bit by surprise by the boy's innocent remarks, his words inevitably brought a warm, loving smile to Zangya's lips and caused her eyes to shimmer with elation. Feeling herself tear up, the woman wiped the build waterworks away and sighed, resting a hand on the child's head and stroking his hair soothingly.

"Good spar, runt."

XXX

(Three weeks later)

Somewhere in Satan City's residential district, far out of the way of any large office buildings, factories or complexes, a familiar young demi-Saiyan could be seen hard at work.

Dashing about from level to level at super speed, dressed in a white shirt, workman pants and boots, the spiky haired form of Son Gohan was currently making cracking progress on his latest assignment. Having already assembled the frame of the two story building and already beginning construction on the walls of the small complex, you could see how in tune the young adult was with his project. With agility and determination mirroring that of the Energizer bunny, the demi-Saiyan darted about the property carrying out his numerous tasks in rapid succession.

One second he was flying up to the top level bringing tools with him to continue work on the floor plan and the next second he was running about carrying enormous pallets of bricks and mortar. Not only that, but he also had a couple of copies of himself helping him out in other areas of the job that needed filling, including assemblage and management.

Standing off to the side and watching his other three clones move around with Barry Allen-like swiftness, another copy of Gohan was presently looking through a total station, surveying the construction process from a distance and making sure all of the elements were falling into place. What with how fast he was actually building the house, he needed someone of equal speed, knowledge and skill to watch over everything.

Humming to himself as he checked the building against the blueprints on the table next to him, the Gohan clone smiled and gave his copies an okay sign. "Nice work guys. Keep it up. We're making great progress." Receiving a wave from the copy transporting stuff around the site, the demi-Saiyan then allowed them to return to their tasks while he returned to his checklists and documents.

He was currently running his own clock. Though the bosses at the company had given him plenty of leeway to finish building the house in the next month, he was confident he would be able to do it in a week… maybe even less. His competitive, Saiyan-side practically demanded it.

That of course all depended on whether he wanted to stay for a couple extra shifts.

Over the next hour, Gohan and his copies moved about the site like clockwork. Keeping track of the building as it assembled piece by piece like watching a lego house being constructed in fast forward further illustrated just how quickly the half-Saiyan and his crew of three were working. Since the super powered teenager had everything he needed for that day right there in his front yard, putting it all together was as easy as baking a cake.

The house that the spiky haired architect was going for was a two-story, modern day contemporary style house with a wrapping façade, complete with steel panel siding, trespa woodwork on the exterior with ebony black beldon masonry, and square glass paneling. Gohan was also certain to make the garage door flush with the exterior of the house, with easy access to the front entrance from the driveway. It was a very trendy design that the higher ups really took a liking too and asked if he could personally get this done for them. This being a hobby for the demi-Saiyan as well as his job, there was no way he could turn them down on a request like that.

As the youngster was continuing work on the exterior at high speed, the clone on the ground running about and checking the framework suddenly became aware of another presence in the area and turned his attention towards the road. When he did, he saw a short, portly man in a suit and a hardhat standing there with a clipboard under his arm.

Quickly recognizing him as one of his managers and coworkers, Gohan smiled and quickly jogged over to him. "Hey, Sanada-san. What's going on?"

"Hello, Gohan. Just dropping down from the office to check on your progress. Nothing big," the man replied pleasantly, tipping his hat up so that he could inspect the structure properly. A murmuring sound of approval escaped his lips shortly afterwards once he inspected the building from top to bottom, "Not bad. Not bad at all."

"Yeah? You think so?" Gohan asked, stopping alongside the manager and gesturing towards the half-finished home. "I wanted to go for a more rustic feel on the outside, but a lot of buyers nowadays are looking for a more modern day home with a crisp, rich feel to it. So I stuck with a Taylor & Smyth approach and went for the full package; flat roof, square paneling and cool woodwork that doesn't compromise the overall design." Placing his hands on his hips, the youngster turned to grin at his compatriot in the industry, "What do you think?"

Sanada chuckled at the teen's enthusiasm as he began walking across the yet-to-be-tended-to front yard to continue his inspection from another angle. Along the way he swung out his clipboard and began jotting down some additional notes, "You definitely know what you're doing, I will say that." He then used a pen to point up at the other copies Gohan had scattered across the property. "I see you've got your trusty crew of you running around again doing all the heavy lifting."

The man had obviously become used to seeing the super-powered martial artist utilizing the cloning technique to help him out with the construction, which was why he wasn't gawking at how there were four Gohans in the area as opposed to one.

His remark had the teen laugh a little, "As long as they get the job done. Even though I don't use this ability often, it's still one of the most useful skills in my repertoire."

Nodding his head as he moved around the structure, analyzing the framework and checking out the outer walls, Sanada then stopped a couple minutes later and turned back to the enthusiastic worker. "Everything's looking good on the outside. I can see you're keeping to the timetable we'd set for you, but it seems like you've got your own timetable running, yeah?" Slipping his clipboard under his arm, he then pointed towards the building. "I wouldn't mind checking out the interior to see how you're going on the pipes and wiring, if you don't mind. Since you're already about halfway done on the outside…"

"Sure. I'll show you around," Gohan said, beaming vibrantly as he then led the man towards the building and up the stairs. "Just watch your step. I haven't finished work on the top level yet and some of the floor panels are missing."
"Fair enough. Proceed."

And so the inspection continued, with Gohan giving his most regular visitor from the company the full tour of his structure to show him just how much he'd already gotten done. It was a pretty standard walk all the way through. The demi-Saiyan briefed him of what each of the rooms was going to be and how he was going to fit in some of the other hardware and furniture once the interior construction was complete. He also gave him a rundown on all the electrics and plumbing that was already in place.

After about half an hour of surveying the building, followed by a short coffee and lunch break, once he was done showing Sanada the entire bottom floor and all of the second floor of the one-man-marvel, the inspector expressed his thanks and appreciation for the boy's hard work and headed on his way.

This was the only speed bump Gohan had to navigate over the course of the entire day and once his colleague had left the property, he could once again pick up the pace knowing the area was all clear.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

(Mount Paozu)

While Gohan was hard at work in the city, Chi-Chi was at home living it up in her own way. This particular occasion took the form of a little get-together she'd organized with the other women of their group. Not only was Zangya hanging out at home with her, but Bulma and Android 18 had also popped in for a visit, all of whom were sitting around the outdoor table and enjoying a nice cup of tea. Since it was such a great day outside with not a single cloud in the sky, all of them were dressed for the occasion and engaged in enjoyable conversation. At the same time, all of the mothers around the eating area were sparing glances towards the hillsides surrounding the home, where they could see Goten and Trunks play fighting across the grass.

They were also paying special attention to another new member of their group, who was at that moment sleeping peacefully in the blonde woman's arms.

"She's adorable, Eighteen," Bulma exclaimed, smiling down at the baby girl currently resting in the android's hold.

The woman smiled warmly at the scientist's compliment and nodded in agreement, "She is, isn't she?" Adjusting the child's position, Eighteen brought a finger up and gently brushed some of the towel the baby was wrapped in out of the way so that she would see her beautiful face. "She has her father's eyes."

"And her mother's breathtaking looks, am I right?" Zangya asked in an almost teasing fashion as she sat beside her friend with a large mug in hand.

Expressing a giggle that would be considered subtle by most, the blonde haired fighter gave the Hera a small smile. "I certainly hope so."

Chi-Chi tilted her head as she watched the new mother cradle her daughter, while at the same time picking up a biscuit and taking a bite out of it. "Are you and Krillin doing alright raising her over at Kame House? You're not having any… problems or issues taking care of her out there?"

"She's only asking you this since you're living with a couple people whose only prevailing thoughts in life are to use the dragon balls for panty wishes," Bulma added, knowing full well the kind of individuals that were currently held up in that tiny pink house.

Even though she respected both Master Roshi and Oolong as lifelong comrades of their group, she still had concerns over the young couple's ability to survive accompanied by those two. When inside tight situations that involved the likes of Doctor Wheelo and the maniacal Broly, they could trust Master Roshi and his crew with their lives. However, outside of the ring during peacetime, there was still much to be desired about their personalities…

"Don't worry about the old man and the pig," Android 18 replied with a continuous smile drawn across her lips. "I can manage those two with both hands tied behind my back. As long as I burn all their dirty magazines, cover up the holes in the walls, and administer some cold hard discipline whenever it is necessary, I'm sure I'll be able to whip those two idiots into shape by the time Marron is old enough to walk around."

"Wow. That's a good plan," Bulma remarked in slight amazement, before smiling as she watched the cyborg fighter tend to her daughter. "I have to warn you though; those two can be quite persistent."

"I'm sure it'll be fine," Chi-Chi said, nudging her blue-haired friend in the arm and gesturing towards the blonde. "She's one of the strongest people on this planet. Out of all of us, she's more than equipped to lay down the law in that house, especially with the more powerful members of our group." Her son and Vegeta included, but only in social situations.

Though the android was no slouch when it came to combat, the Saiyans of their team had made so many leaps and bounds in the last couple of years it's almost close to impossible to completely handle them.

The others though…

Yeah, Android 18 could deal with them no sweat.

"You're going to make an awesome mum when she's all grown up," Zangya remarked, grinning at the blonde angel when she looked her way. "Not that you're not a great mum already. I'm just saying you're going to become an even more awesome parent as time goes on, if I've phrased that correctly."

The blonde nodded towards the orange haired alien, "Thanks, Zangya."

"No problem," the Hera replied, taking up her mug and gingerly sipping from it.

While collecting a biscuit from the center plate and weighing it between her fingers, Bulma glanced over at their android neighbor from across the pond and mounted a secondary inquiry. "How's Krillin doing as a father? Is he coping… or is he freaking out and bouncing off of walls every morning, noon and night?"

"He's doing quite well, actually," Android 18 answered, feeling uplifted as she picked up the glass of water next to her and held it up. "Though he doesn't look it on the surface, that man really knows what he's doing. We take shifts in looking after her whenever she wakes up at night, he taught me how to change her diaper, he's a great cook and knows what kind of nutrition Marron needs…" The blonde then looked up at the other women to see them listening to her intently. "Honestly, I had no idea how to look after our daughter when she was born, but Krillin taught me everything I needed to know."
Bulma, feeling a little teary-eyed at that admission, smiled at her fellow parent, "That's so sweet."

"Well… Krillin was always a really amazing person," Chi-Chi added, expressing her opinion with a slight laugh as she picked up her cup and stirred the contents with a spoon, "Even though he's not as strong as the other boys, he more than makes up for that with his personality and charm."

Zangya, grinning devilishly, threw her friend a cheeky glance, "I'm sure Eighteen has become more than familiar with that particular side of him. Am I right?" The Hera's curious inquisition had the android look away with red in her cheeks, indicating the orange haired fighter was right on the mark regarding that point. "Where is the hubby right now, anyway?"

"He's at work," the android informed, taking a sip from her water and setting it aside, "Krillin's overseeing the construction of a community piece in a city on the south-eastern peninsula. After all these years of working for the company, the higher ups are finally getting him off of the grunt work and into a managerial position."

Bulma smiled, "That's great. It means he'll be able to make more money for you guys."

"That's what he told me a few days ago," Android 18 said, cradling her daughter gently when the baby began to stir from her nap.

Turning to the other women around the table, Chi-Chi decided to offer another two cents on the matter. "Things have been going well for Krillin these past couple years. I'm really happy for him."

"And what about you, Chi-Chi?" Bulma asked, glancing across at the raven haired mother to see her take a swig from her teacup and set it back down on the plate in front of her. "Gohan's told me he's been taking you and Goten up to Otherworld to visit Goku every couple of days to catch up with him."

The Son mother nodded to the scientist in response, "It's been going great so far. The man hasn't changed one bit since the day he passed away and even though he's dead his appetite is as healthy and active as ever. He's pretty much the same kind, selfless, thick-headed numbskull I fell in love with all those years ago."

This put a grin on the blue haired woman's face while she rested her head on her hand, "You're not disappointed at all that he's still hanging out with a bunch of dead people from the past?"

"I'll admit it was hard to wrap my head around at first. I even gave him a smack over the head the first time we were alone together for deciding to stay up there in Otherworld," Chi-Chi informed, rolling her teacup between her fingers for a moment with a troubled expression in play. That however faded moments later when she replaced it with a smile. "But after we sat down and talked it over, I soon came to understand why he made that choice and why he decided to step out for a little while."

"To protect you guys, right?" Bulma asked, receiving a nod in response. Tilting her head, the scientist turned back to stare ahead of her once again, "You have to admit, a lot of the enemies we've encountered over the last decade have been a direct result of Goku's meddling or his being here on this planet. It's like he'd transformed himself into a massive, glowing beacon that attracts bad guys."

Zangya chuckled at that little joke, "So I've heard." Gohan had spent a great deal of time chatting to her about his father. As far as she was concerned, the man was pretty much a walking jinx for their group.
"I mean, think about it," Bulma then began counting on her fingers. "Piccolo showed up at the world tournament and nearly ended up destroying everything as payback for his father's death. Radditz came to the planet to pick up Goku and to finish the job he was originally sent here to do as a child. This then led Vegeta and his old partner coming to the planet a year later." She raised another finger. "Cooler visited the earth to take revenge on Goku for killing his brother. Frieza also came back after the thorough butt-kicking your husband gave to him on Namek. After that, the androids showed up because of what Goku did to the Red Ribbon army when he was a kid."

This then led to Zangya taking on a sheepish look and raising a hand, "And my old boss came here wanting to pay Goku back for setting us free by destroying everything." Her words had Android 18 look across at her sympathetically, which then earned a pat to the shoulder from the abashed Hera.

"And don't even get me started on that Broly guy everyone ended up fighting on that planet," Bulma said, waving a hand in front of her dismissively. "Let's face it. In the long run, I think Goku made the right choice."

Chi-Chi sighed and nodded her head, unable to argue with the woman's logic considering a lot of it was all linked to her beloved Saiyan husband. Staring into her now half-empty cup of tea, the woman was startled out of her contemplation by a nudge from behind and turned around to see Icarus standing behind her. At first surprised at the sight of her son's animal friend, the raven haired woman smiled and stroked the pink dragon on the snout, before then shooing him away to go join Goten and Trunks out on the field. Upon seeing the reptile off, she turned back to the other women next to her.

"But things are going great between me and Goku," Chi-Chi concluded, smiling fondly and placing a hand against her cheek as she put on a dream-like expression. "Even though he's dead, he still knows how to show his wife a good time…"

It didn't take long for Bulma, Android 18 and Zangya to figure out what the Son mother was implying, which led to the latter blushing uncomfortably, the blonde instinctively covering her sleeping daughter's ears, and the scientist grinning mischievously.

XXX

(A week later)

(Capsule Corp.)

Typing away at her computer, a highly energized Bulma allowed a big smile to cross her face as she watched the specs on her design line up and the solution to her formula on the monitor finally come through. Pumping her fist triumphantly, she then quickly began applying the new information she was able to come up with to the rest of the three-dimensional model on her screen and completed its final phase.

There was no possible way she would've been able to complete such an immensely complicated process without the right equations. All of this stuff fed right into the rail gun's firing software.

"Okay. Now we're making some progress," Bulma exclaimed, quickly closing the file and moving it over to one of her other monitors, all the while making sure the rest of the folders followed it. Once she was positive she'd gotten everything down, the woman then had the download process begin and allowed the computer to do its thing. With the hum of its engines and processors booming throughout the laboratory, the blue haired scientist then turned about in her chair and watched the data filter into the massive tower on the other end of the room.
This large pillar of steel and wiring was the brain behind what would become the new line of anti-meteorite weaponry that the military would be able to use to stop extra terrestrial and unidentified flying objects from entering the earth's atmosphere. It was an impressive concept for sure and a lot of trouble had gone into setting it up. Bulma had practically worked her fingers to the bone completing this little monstrosity. But it wasn't like she was doing this alone.

"Alright then. It's time to insert the final piece," the scientist began as she reached for her gear and collected up a large chip to plug into the main base. However, as soon as her fingers curled around it and lifted it from its spot, she pulled away sharply with a yelp and gripped her finger, "Ah, shit! Damn it…"

Figures. She got hasty and ended up cutting her finger on one of the nodes.

Her sudden curse and nursing of her little injury did not go unheard as a few seconds following her outburst, the echo of robotic gears suddenly echoed throughout the room. Several footsteps later, Bulma quickly found herself staring up at the tall, plastic covered form of a robot strongly resembling the late Android 16. Covered in rubber skin with visible joints and a silver version of his original armor adorned on his person, the orange haired, muscular robot smiled as he beamed down at his surprised creator.

"Hello, Bulma," the android spoke in his distinctive robotic voice.

The blue haired scientist smiled weakly while she massaged her finger, "Oh. Hey there Sixteen. What're you doing here?"

The automaton, obviously programmed with the most basic motor functions and responses, tilted his head at her inquisitively, the shutters of his blinking eyes making camera-like snaps every time they opened and closed. "I heard a sound of distress. What seems to be the trouble?"

"Oh. I just cut my finger on a memory unit I was planning to slip into the rail gun tower," Bulma replied, showing off her finger before returning to rubbing it. "Don't worry. It's okay now."

Blinking a couple more times, the large android straightened up, "On a scale of one to ten, how would you rate your pain?"

"Uhh… one?" Bulma replied, not really knowing where this was going. She quickly waved at him, "You don't have to do anything, Sixteen. Really. I'm fine."

Upon receiving her answer, the android suddenly turned to her desk and, after scanning it for a moment, opened up the top drawer and rummaged around inside of it. A few seconds later his hand reemerged with a band-aid and, turning back to his creator, opened up the strip of plaster. "Please hold out your finger so that I may treat your injury."

Hesitantly doing as instructed, Bulma shrugged and held out her cut appendage, allowing the robot to wrap the band-aid around it. Upon which he stepped away and smiled proudly at his work.

"Medical attention administered. I will now conduct a standard post-operational scan to check for further injuries."

Bulma perked up at that statement and threw her hands forward in alarm, "Oh, no, no. There's no need to-"

"Scan complete," Android 16 replied a split second later.

The scientist's shoulders slumped, "Come on." Even though she built the damn android, she was always astonished at how fast some of his functions were.

Compiling the information for a couple seconds, the android once again began to speak, "You have sustained no additional injuries. However, my sensors indicate that your reaction and processing levels are operating below par, and that your hormone and neural readings are fluctuating at an abnormal rate. This is resulting in irregular patterns of mood swings and outbursts." The new Android 16 smiled, "Diagnosis: you are exhausted from lack of sleep and wish to mate with your life partner."

"Uh… what?"

The robot tilted his head innocently, "Would you like me to call Vegeta for you?"

"NO! No-no! No! No! No!" Bulma said quickly while leaping to her feet and waving her hands about in panic, "That won't be necessary, Sixteen. Just… check your software for updates and run your ESET program."

Almost immediately, the android straightened up like a guard at his station, "Parameters recognized. Scanning." A few beeps later and the orange haired robot fell into sync mode, "Updating software one of five hundred and sixty four. Processing. One percent… five percent… ten percent… twelve percent…"

The blue haired scientist breathed a sigh of relief and nodded, "Okay. Good." Wow. She barely dodged a bullet on that one.

There was a time and place for everything, and right now wasn't the time for either sleep or procreation.

…

…

…

She reminded herself to go find Vegeta later tonight…

Android Sixteen's eyes blinked as he stood in place like a tin soldier, "Would you like to try out our CC Version 8 for a thirty day trial?"

"No God damn it!"

Apparently she still had a few more bugs to work out of him. At least this people-friendly version of Android 16 was far better than the last model she created.

XXX

(Some weeks later)

(Satan City)

"So you're saying that I can breathe in space for a certain amount of time?" Videl asked as she watched the demi-Saiyan beside her hand the money in his hand over to the cashier for the popcorn and drink he was purchasing for her. Once the change was given back to him, the girl in the white over-sized t-shirt with purple sleeves and figure-hugging jeans smiled when he turned back to face her. "That's so cool."
"As long as you maintain a constant field of energy around you, then your ki will be able to circulate the air inside of the bubble and constantly supply you with oxygen for you to breathe," Gohan elaborated, handing her drink and popcorn over and trading them for the slushy she was holding for him. As soon as both had their beverages in hand, the pair proceeded on out of the candy bar area and towards the cinemas. "Krillin and I tried it out not too long ago, and it works like a charm."

Videl chuckled, "Since you're part alien, I bet your genetics naturally allows you to breathe in space and you don't have to go through the trouble of using your energy to produce an atmospheric shield."

"True. But I think it's a good idea to have as many alternatives as possible. If one system fails, then you can always fall back on your second one… am I right?"

"You got a point there," Videl murmured, plucking some popcorn from the box she was holding and tossing them into her mouth. She made a thoughtful noise as she casually chewed, "Hmm… I should give it a try on my next training session. Maybe sometime this weekend."

"I'll take you up to the stratosphere to try it out," Gohan offered, beaming across at his friend as he escorted her towards the woman standing by the entrance to the corridor of theater entrances.
"Though I'm sure you can stand extremely high altitudes if your trips up to Kami's Lookout are anything to go by, it'd be best if we took this in small steps. Adrenaline rushes aside; you're still a little new to this sort of stuff."

"Hey. I'm a tough girl," Videl replied, elbowing the teen in the side and giving him a roguish grin.
"Believe me. I can handle anything you can handle, big boy."

"Oh? Is that challenge I hear in your voice?" Gohan asked, going along with his friend's tone as she turned away slyly.

"What do you think?"

"You don't want to bump a half-Saiyan warrior, Videl, because he'll definitely bump back even ever harder. We're cold, calculating, ruthless alien warriors born and bred for combat of the highest degree. It's in our nature to respond accordingly to competition," the teen informed while leering at her, an expression which earned a playful scoff from the tomboy strolling alongside him.

"You're too much of a softie for something like that," the pig-tailed fighter replied, reaching up and poking the boy in the cheek.

The hybrid grinned against her finger, "Try me." They then stopped in front of the usher. The blonde employee in the red and white striped dress gave the couple a pleasant smile at their interactions, before accepting the tickets Gohan handed to her. As soon as she checked them, she promptly directed them down the hallway and towards their cinema number, which the pair gladly continued towards. "In all seriousness though, I can tell you've gotten a lot stronger compared to what you were back at the World Martial Arts Tournament."

"I've been training with you for about four years now," Videl said while smiling up at the boy.
"How strong do you think I am now compared to the people you've fought with in the past?"

Gohan had to think on it for a moment as they moved towards the doorway, "It's hard to say, really.
I'll need to test you the next time you come over to my place." Turning his attention to the enormous movie screen that eased into view, the teen then checked their tickets and grinned over his training partner. "But right now, I'd rather focus on finding our seats to watch the movie."
Processing his words quickly, the daughter of Hercule Satan nodded back to him in agreement, "Yeah. Alright." She too checked the tickets he was holding, "So… I'm… J-12?"

"And I'm J-13. That puts us up… there." The young male then pointed towards the middle row of the sprawling I-Max setup.

Videl grinned when she spotted it, "Race yah! One-two-three-GO!" She then sprang into the air and vanished in a white blur, super speeding up to their seats ten meters away in under a second.

Sure it seemed like an abuse of her powers, but if you had super speed amongst an arsenal of several other miscellaneous abilities, who wouldn't use their gifts in a situation like this?

Appearing in her chair in the blink of an eye, Videl grinned victoriously. But just as she was moving to sit, the girl looked across with a start when she spotted Gohan already sitting in his seat, with his legs kicked up in front of him and drinking casually from his slushy. The spiky haired boy in the Capsule Corp. jacket grinned at the stunned girl when she finally registered to his presence.

"Close, but no dice," the demi-Saiyan exclaimed in a cheerful voice.

Responding to his teasing grin, Videl smirked and, leaning over, gave the boy several hard, playful punches to his shoulder, her actions causing the teen to laugh and fend her off in kind. "You. Big. Jerk," she said between the thumps of her fist against his arm, "How the hell can you… ah, forget it. I know it's impossible to beat you in a race, no matter how fast I move." She then plopped down in her seat and set her popcorn aside on the same armrest as her drink to her right.

"Keep trying. I'm sure you'll get there eventually."

"Yeah right, liar," Videl said, leaning back in her chair and throwing the boy a look. "On top of being half-alien and a quarter-demon; you're practically the strongest guy in the universe. How can I possibly expect to compete with that?"

"With another year or two of training, I'm positive you'll be able to go toe to toe with me in my base form, no problem," Gohan informed, smiling at his friend to see her perk up at his statement. "Krillin and Tien can fight evenly with me while I'm in my normal form. As long as you keep doing what you're doing, in about fifteen to eighteen months time, you'll be fighting in the exact same league as them. Heck, you're already much stronger than Chiaotzu. A little more weight and ki training, and you'll be just as strong as the others."

This information had the raven haired girl's eyes light up with excitement and her grin widen. "Then I'll keep doing what I'm doing and catch up to you… no matter what it takes." In her eagerness, Videl quickly pushed the arm rest between them up so that she could quickly scoot over and latch onto his shoulder. Her actions causing Gohan to turn to her in surprise, the tomboy smiled fondly at him. With red in her cheeks and a glow in her face, the girl shyly tucked some strands of hair behind her ear while she gazed at her mentor and best friend. "Thanks for everything, Gohan-kun. You're the best."

Blinking a couple of times, Gohan smiled right back at her, "You're welcome, Videl."

Practically shining by this point, the tomboy fighter then adjusted her position and, while still leaning against her friend, turned towards the massive screen at the front of the theatre. Since there were still a few minutes to go before the movie started, the pair had plenty of time to engage in some good-natured pleasantries.

"You know… I'm thinking of joining the police force here in the city."
"Really?" Gohan glanced across at the girl with a blink. "You want to get a job in law enforcement?"

"Yeah. But not as a full-timer. I want to be able to do this part-time while I finish my studies at school and university," the teen stated with an eager grin in play. "I'm a good friend with the police chief's daughter, so I'm sure I'll be able to arrange a meeting with him and talk to him about getting a position on their special crime fighting unit. After I show them what I can do, I'm positive I'll be able to land a position easily. I just need to go through a couple of checks and seminars first to learn about proper police engagement and procedures." Videl then looked up at the half-Saiyan excitedly. "You should join me, Gohan."

The demi-Saiyan blinked a couple of times, "A-Are you sure?"

"Yeah. With your skills and your strength, I'm sure you'll make an awesome crime fighter," Videl said, before then nudging him in the arm a few times, "Or maybe even a super hero. Yeah. The two of us fighting crime side-by-side as the defenders of Satan City!" She then spoke in an exaggerated, heroic sounding voice, "The Z-fighters: protecting the weak and battling villains for the greater good!"

Gohan laughed at his friend's zeal, "Heh. That sounds awesome!"

"Right?" the tomboy exclaimed, gripping the boy's arm tightly and giving him her most honest look. "This isn't about getting fame or glory or anything like that, Gohan. I want to do this so that I can protect the people of my hometown. By joining the police force, I'll be able to go out and help them whenever they need me. Not to mention I'll be allowed to do it and not have to worry about the law coming after me in case I do anything outside of my jurisdiction. Even though we can protect the planet from aliens and robots threatening to destroy it, when it comes to fighting bad guys in the community... it's a little more complicated than that. You can get into a lot of trouble tackling crime as a vigilante without the proper clearance or consent."

"I suppose you're right about that," Gohan murmured, sensing the honesty and seriousness in the girl's voice as he considered her words. After taking some time to dawn on his companion's statements, he then nodded his head affirmatively and, finally making up his mind, turned back to her with a brilliant smile. "Okay then... let's do it." His answer had his best friend's face light up.

Heart hammering away at her chest, Videl leaned in and rested her head against the Saiyan's shoulder, clearly relaxing after her sudden burst of exhilaration. Though Gohan couldn't see it, the pigtailed fighter was ecstatic that her best friend from the country wanted to be with her on this, as they shared the same sense of justice and a need to defend those who were closest to them.

Videl reminded herself to ring up her friend tonight so that they could get started on the process.

Once she was done expressing her gratitude to the young Z-fighter, Videl focused her attention back on the big screen and smirked. "So I heard this movie is supposed to be pretty awesome... much better than the last one they made a couple years ago. At least... that's what Erasa told me." She changed subjects almost instantly, a move that put a grin on Gohan's face.

"Oh yeah? Isn't this supposed to be that Superman remake... the 'Man of Steel movie' or something?"

"Yep. These types of films have been getting pretty popular nowadays... probably due to the footage the news crews have been able to capture of you and your friends over the years. They're making a killing at the box office from all the ideas they're coming up with," Videl explained, bringing the popcorn around and setting it between them. She then gestured for the half-Saiyan to have some, which he did and began tossing individual pops into his mouth one at a time. "Though this franchise is taking a while to get off the ground compared to their rivals, I still think it's a really awesome series."

"I wonder how strong they'll make this version of the superhero in tights," Gohan wondered aloud as he stared at the blank screen with the girl alongside him.

"Not sure. But hopefully he's not going to be one of those overpowered versions where his strength defies all logic and realism," Videl went on, rolling her eyes at the same time. "Stuff like that can really take you out of a movie."

"Well… if he's going to be anything like me, I'll let you know," the demi-Saiyan said with a smile.

"Go ahead. Don't let me stop you."

Several minutes of chat later and the movie began. Kicking back in their seats and using the other's shoulder as support, the two of them got comfortable and watched as the industry's latest masterpiece came to life right before their very eyes. At first the whole thing chugged along at a labored pace, giving the pair the origin story of this alien warrior who would become the greatest hero earth had ever seen and showed them all his struggles growing up alongside humans. They also introduced the villains of the story; members of the hero's race coming down to the planet searching for him and the secret that he unknowingly had in his possession. It was an intriguing concept of course…

But about an hour and a half into it, when it finally got to the actual fighting between the main characters and the movie's primary antagonists, Gohan couldn't help but stop as he watched one of the bad guys, with great effort, pick up a train and pitch it at the hero like it were a basketball.

The demi-Saiyan chuckled, "I can do that."

"Of course you can," Videl whispered in response, tossing some more popcorn into her mouth.

XXX

(A month later)

The days became incredibly quiet in the weeks following Gohan's little outing with Videl. After seeing how much things have toned down over the year and with no signs of any enemies over the horizon, the Z-fighters soon decided to mix things up a little with yet another get-together. This venture was inevitably spearheaded by Yamcha, who invited all of his friends and allies over to his baseball team's home stadium for some lunch and relaxation. Though there were some difficulties experienced in organizing an actual day for the event, the man was soon successful in finding a date that was convenient for all of them. And so, once everyone had given him the green light, the entire group, Piccolo and Vegeta included, came to West City to see what the human fighter had in store for all of them.

As it turns out, Yamcha had organized a little game for his group to play. While all of the non-fighters were given seats up in the stands, complete with barbeque and beverages, all of the fighting members of the group assembled down on the pitch for what Yamcha called 'Super Human Baseball'.

Initially there were some complaints and concerns shared amongst them. Vegeta grudgingly stated his unwillingness to participate in such a 'low-brow human activity', whereas Piccolo was just not interested, period. However, with some careful convincing from both Yamcha and Gohan, the latter of whom announced his eagerness to participate, they were able to persuade the others into going along with them, including the most serious members of their troop. So, with bats and gloves in hand, the warriors hit the field for what would become a really interesting couple rounds of baseball.

While it was undeniably funny to see Gohan and Goten dressed in Yamcha's team colors, the Taitans, and wearing the club's hats and gloves, it was even more hilarious to see Zangya adorned in the exact same uniform.

"Surely you're just wearing that ironically?" Piccolo asked the orange haired girl standing in the right field with glove in hand, and adorned in the team's shirt, pants, hat, and chewing gum.

Blowing out a bubble from the strip in her mouth and letting it pop, the Hera grinned teasingly back at the Namekian. "Hey, if I'm going to be playing baseball in an actual stadium with you shmucks, I may as well play it right." Hell, she even got the mannerisms down pat.

The green warrior, still carrying his weighted clothing, cape and everything, grunted as he glared across at the center plate. "Whatever."

Looking at the field, this was how it currently stood.

Due to the lack of significantly strong players amongst the current group of Z-fighters, the faction had to be divided into two. While Yamcha, Piccolo, Zangya, Yajirobi, Tien, Krillin and Goten made up one team, Gohan, Vegeta, Chiaotzu, Videl, Trunks, and Bulma's 'new and improved' Android 16C made up the members of the other team.

While all of these guys were currently scattered across the field, limbering up and holding the positions they'd been assigned, this left Chi-Chi, Bulma, Launch, Android 18# and her daughter Marron, Puar, Oolong, Master Roshi and the Ox King up in the front row of the bleachers looking out over the green. Accompanying them, dressed in casual clothing and an apron that said 'World's Greatest Champ' right on the front, was Hercule Satan, who was currently tending to the barbeque they had setup alongside the first class seats.

Putting some more meat onto the serving tray once he noticed that they were cooked, the man in the afro grinned proudly and turned his attention towards the group, "Okay! Who wants some steak sausages and beef cutlets fresh off the grate? Anyone?"

"I'll take one of everything," Oolong said while raising his paper plate to the martial artist, "And some coleslaw!"

"Me too," Bulma also spoke up with a smile. Almost instantly the big man with the mustache and stubble moved over the seats and dealt out bread, meat and salads to all those who wanted it. He even had on him some tomato sauce, which he kept secured in his apron pocket, and drew upon at the hungry audience's request. "Mm. Smells good. Thanks."

"My pleasure," the man replied with an honest, good-natured smile, before turning towards the field to watch the progress of the game. Upon scanning the grass for a good couple of moments, inspecting the players and seeing who was up against whom, Hercule's eyes then fell upon his daughter sitting in the dugout and alongside her best friend Gohan. Raising his tongs, the man gave an almighty roar, "GIVE THEM HELL, SWEET PEA!"

Yajirobi, who was currently held up on third base, groaned when he smelt the delicious scent of cutlets, steak, sausages and chicken drifting down onto the pitch. Despite being assigned such an important position, the only thing he could think of was one thing, "Man, am I hungry. I can't wait to get off this field and have some of that delicious meat." His growling stomach could surely attest to that.

"Okay! Okay! Let's do this!" a grinning Yamcha standing on the pitcher's mound called out while nodding towards the opposing team. "Batter up, people!"

Dressed in a pair of red shorts, a green jersey and a wooden bat propped against his shoulder, little Trunks stepped out onto the field under the cheers and applause of the women and his best friend Goten. Appearing with his usual look on confidence for a child his age, the five-year-old turned to face the pitcher from the right-handed batter's box and watched as his adult adversary grinned.

Krillin, who was in the catcher's position and wearing the trademark face mask and padding, smiled across at the youngster. "Good luck, Trunks."

"Thanks, Krillin," the lavender haired demi-Saiyan whispered back.

The scar-faced pitcher smiled, "Are you ready, little man?"

Feigning a spit like he saw on television, the child then brought his bat out and took a stance. "Whenever you are, super star."

Grinning, Yamcha then dug his feet into the mound and rolled the ball between his fingers. "Alright. Here it comes." Warning given, the former mercenary straightened up, primed himself, and then, after checking the field to the left of him, cocked his hand back and let it rip.

The ball shot from his grip like a bullet and curled through the air, stunning a few people at how fast it moved. Trunks however, seeing it coming at him in bullet time, swung at it in a blur of movement. With a loud clap, he sent the ball flying across center field, drawing an exclamation of surprise from the audience before he sprinted over to first at super speed.

It was a good thing he did because the second his ball was airborne Tien leapt into the air and caught it. As soon as the ball thumped into his glove, he took it up in his free hand and tossed it towards first base. "Goten! Heads up!"

The tri-clops's warning was well received as the little half-Saiyan quickly caught the ball and stepped forward to intercept his friend. However, the second he reached to tap, Trunks dove for the ground and skidded to a clean landing.

"Safe," the robotic voice of an observing Android 16 spoke up, who also had on a uniform and a baseball hat worn atop his head.

The announcement had Vegeta smirk and Bulma cheer at her son's success. Even though the entire exchange went by in less than a second, those with sharp enough senses and a keen eye had been able to observe the entire thing. The only one who lost track of the whole exchange was Hercule, who was currently gawking at how fast that little segment went.

Seriously. If you blinked you would've missed it, and the man did blink.

"Dang it," Goten mumbled, tossing the ball across to Yamcha while his lavender haired friend grinned at him from the plate.

"Better luck next time, Goten."

"Nice one, Trunks. Well done," the scar-faced man congratulated, before then turning to see who the second batter would be.
As everyone moved into position, Tien landed back onto his side of the field after his spectacular thirty feet jump and quickly turned towards second base. "Hey, Piccolo. That one should have been yours, man. It was right on top of you."

The Namekian, staring across at the bald fighter, grunted indignantly, "Yeah. I'll get it next time." He then turned to stare at home base.

When everyone looked to see who was next, they saw Chiaotzu slink into view. As if holding a comically large bat, the little mime-fighter nervously worked his way over to the right-handed position and took up a comfortable stance beside the plate.

Upon seeing the nervousness etched across his innocent face, the members of the Z-gang quickly began passing the little fighter their encouragement.

"Don't be scared, Chiaotzu!" Tien called to his friend from his spot. "Whatever it takes, just hit the ball!"

"You can do it!" the kind voice of Launch echoed in from the stadium seats.

Swallowing nervously under their words and praise, the little martial artist nodded, "O-Okay."

Giving his comrade of many years an intense smile, Yamcha quickly readied himself for a throw. Everyone held their breaths as they watched the man load up and, just as Trunks was slowly inching away from first base, the mercenary cocked back his arm and threw. The ball left his hand at an even greater speed than when he threw it at Trunks, obviously indicating how much trust he was putting behind each pitch.

Just like before, his execution and aim was superb. However, just as the ball was shooting towards Chiaotzu with the intent of blowing right past him and landing in Krillin's glove, the mime then did something completely unexpected.

His eyes suddenly glowing blue, the short human fighter gave a quick, psychic burst and stopped the ball dead in its tracks. When it froze in the air just a couple feet from him Chiaotzu quickly took aim, swung his bat, and smacked it straight into the sky. The white sphere went soaring, giving Trunks the cue to run and for the hitter to do the same. Chiaotzu levitated off the floor and shot towards first base as fast as he could.

The superhuman maneuver caught Yamcha completely by surprise as he turned and watched the ball shoot over left field like a missile. "Damn!"

All at once, Tien leapt into the air and intercepted the projectile before it could leave the field. As soon as he caught it, the man took aim and chucked it straight down to second towards Piccolo.

The Namekian was ready.

Running into the middle of the line the tall fighter caught it and spun around to catch Trunks, only for the quick little hybrid to shoot past him and dive for second base. The green warrior cursed and spun on the spot, chucking the ball towards Goten.

With his foot on the plate, the spiky haired boy caught the fast-moving object and turned, quickly tagging Chiaotzu before he could reach his goal. "Got yah," the boy chirped.

"Out," Android 16's voice called from beside the dugout.

Blinking a few times at the lightning fast game, Chi-Chi turned towards Android 18 and the others,
"Hey. Chiaotzu stopped the ball in midflight. Is he allowed to do that?"

Bulma grinned, "Well… it's called 'Super Human Baseball' for a reason."

When Chiaotzu slowly made his way back to the dugout under a congratulatory applause from the audience, he met with Gohan making his way out, who quickly gave the shorter fighter an encouraging pat on the shoulder. "That was a really good move, Chiaotzu. I'm sure you'll nail it next time."

The mime smiled in appreciation at the young Saiyan's comment, "Thanks, Gohan."

Words exchanged, the teenager readjusted his cap and jogged his way over to home plate.

As soon as everyone saw the half-Saiyan stroll towards the batter's position under the cheer and whistles of the audience, most notably Chi-Chi, Hercule and Videl, smiles of enthusiasm quickly pulled across the faces of the most competitive members of the group. While Goten beamed excitedly when he saw his brother take a few practice swings with his metal bat, the orange haired Hera over in right field gave an evil chuckle and spoke up so that her target could hear her.

"O-ho. I am so going to tackle you," Zangya exclaimed loudly, before quickly turning towards an equally grinning Yamcha. "Oi! Scar-face! Make him hit one my way!"

"You got it," the mercenary replied, watching carefully as the teen dusted his hands off at the plate and got into position. Bending low, the man held the ball in his glove and fixed his most focused glare on the spiky haired half-Saiyan standing in his sights. "Okay, Gohan. This one's coming at you hard and fast. So get ready."

"Whatever you say, Yamcha," the demi-warrior replied while kicking his bat into the air and taking it into a firm, two-handed grip. Upon securing a good spot, he focused his gaze on the wolfish warrior and put on his most serious air. "Alright. Bring it."

Krillin grinned behind his mask. "They really have it out for you today, buddy. Watch yourself."

It was this gutsy exchange of words that prompted everyone in the area to quiet down and prepare for a good show. As Yamcha stretched and loaded his arm, Piccolo removed his cape and turban, Zangya spat out her gum, Tien began to gather energy, and Videl and the rest of the crew leaned forward in their seats, gripping their legs with excitement. It was obvious that no matter what was going to happen out there, all of the Z-fighters knew it was going to be one doozy of a play.

Discreetly pouring ki into the baseball so that it glowed a bright blue, Yamcha straightened up, took aim and, with a growl and a yell, he pitched the ball at light speed straight towards his target, causing a sonic boom to ring out.

In a split second, all hell broke loose.

Powering up so that his aura exploded around him like an inferno, surprising Krillin at its intensity, Gohan uncorked his bat and slugged the approaching ball as hard as he could, sending it rocketing into the sky and breaking the sound barrier several times. While most of the fighters out there were unprepared for the sheer magnitude of the hit, Goten and Tien included, two of them were.

Piccolo instantly leapt for the ball to try and catch it, but it shot right past him and up into the clouds, which it parted on contact a split second after being hit.

"Damn!" the Namekian shouted, spinning around and watching the sphere soar into the upper atmosphere, only to then see Zangya shoot past at full speed in hot pursuit of the ball.
On the ground, it looked like a home run. The second Gohan let the ball fly, he super-sped towards first base, blowing past an awe-struck Goten at the same time Trunks left second and sprinted for third. Once the lavender haired boy rushed past an equally astonished Yajirobi, the child began sprinting for home, knowing that if he slowed down for even a second something disastrous would probably happen to him.

He wasn't that far off either.

As soon as Gohan's feet landed on second he made a beeline straight towards third. Skidding past a confused Yajirobi, he then made a dash towards home. Under the cheers from the crowd, Videl especially, the boy looked like he was in the clear.

But just as Vegeta was rising to his feet to watch the glorious victory of the half-Saiyan, a green blur from the clouds above suddenly shot down towards the earth like a lightning bolt and, in the blink of an eye, tackled Gohan in the side and plowed him into the floor just a few feet away from home base. The sudden maneuver had everyone gawking in shock.

Digging a twenty foot long trench through the dirt after blindsiding her quarry, the half-Saiyan soon came to a grinding stop. When the dust eventually cleared, it revealed the poor youngster lying flat on his back with a panting Zangya straddling his waist, her foot on his chest and a victorious smile in play. As soon as she saw the boy pinned beneath her, she held up the slightly burnt baseball and tapped him on the forehead.

"Got yah, bitch."

The teen, giving the woman a playful grin in return, then let out a groan in disappointment, "Ah, man. I was so close."

"Better luck next time, slugger," Zangya replied, getting off of him and helping the kid to his feet. After pulling him out of the crater they'd formed, the Hera patted him on the shoulder and allowed him to return to the dugout.

Even though the audience was both astonished and disappointed at the result, they still applauded Gohan for a job well done. Vegeta on the other hand, who was still seated comfortably with the rest of the players of his team, grunted and looked up at the teen in displeasure when he finally returned to their station. "That was a terrible performance brat. And you call yourself a Saiyan elite."

"Hey, I was just being fair. If I actually went all out on that throw, I would have disintegrated the ball before it even left the stadium," Gohan said with his characteristic Son smile. "I mean… can you blame me for taking it easy?"

The prince huffed at his words, "A true warrior never takes it easy, not even on their comrades."

"Well… I guess that's where you and I differ from each other," the half-Saiyan replied, dusting his uniform off while trudging down the steps. "Besides; our only rule is to keep the ball intact. If it gets completely destroyed in mid-play, we'll have to start the exchange all over again. So make sure you hold back with your swings." On his way in, Gohan passed by Videl and gave her a spirited high-five in greeting. "Good luck."

"Thanks. I'll make sure to give them something to work for," the raven haired girl chirped while dashing over to the deck, bat in hand.

With two of them out and one of them home, there were now only three people left to step up to the plate. While Videl was a shooing to give the thrower her best shot, there was one among them that was a complete wild card in the lineup.

Having left his post by the dugout to make his way over to the batter's box, the watered-down Android 16 could be seen standing there with a bat in hand and emotionless gaze set on the pitcher. Yamcha, having become familiar with the robot over the past several days, looked a little bit nervous about throwing a hard ball towards the guy since he was supposedly a lot more fragile than the last model. Hell, he was even standing there with a bird on his shoulder.

However, this being a competitive game and the android being more than willing to participate, the scar-faced fighter figured he could throw some fast ones his way.

Hopefully Bulma wouldn't get pissed at him because he accidentally broke the robot's arms.

Making a few audible beeping noises, the orange haired Android then spoke up in a monotone sounding voice, "Synchronizing movements with the projectile's predicted flight path. Syncing…" His eyes then flickered with a few lights, drawing odd stares from all the warriors on the field, "Calibrating elemental boost information and adjusting bat setting to homing mode."

Krillin, crouching behind the towering robot that was standing as still as a statue, blinked a couple of times in confusion, "Umm… dude? Is everything okay?"

Swallowing nervously just like all the other members of the audience, Yamcha straightened up and took aim. "Well… here goes nothing." Sucking it in, the man cocked his arm back and, with as little energy as possible, chucked it at the robot.

Like a piston, Android 16's arms moved back before swinging out at a surprising speed. With perfect aim and precision, the android smacked the ball and sent it soaring over center field. The clean hit and the sight of the ball flying towards the clouds had the entire audience stare.

"His timing was spot on," the Ox King also commented while chewing on a hotdog.

However, all praise and commentary on the display was cut short when Piccolo effortlessly intercepted the ball and chucked it down to Goten. When the half-Saiyan caught it and turned to catch the android to tag him out, he saw the robot still standing at the home plate in the same position he'd ended up in following his swing.

The entire arena went silent for several long seconds, upon which the robot finally dropped the bat and turned towards first base… and started walking towards it at an arduous pace.

"Beginning run to first base. Running."

At that moment, every single person in the stadium face planted the floor, with the exception of Android 18, who was still holding Marron in her arms. However, the woman still had the decency to look on with a deadpanned expression.

Despite being a terrific android utilizing the most cutting edge software and technology from Capsule Corp, the current Android 16 apparently still had a seriously long loading time. Not to mention he had tunnel vision. Sure, he could process and execute one task perfectly, but he couldn't compartmentalize information fast enough or perform multiple activities at once.

This just showed how much work still needed to go into him.
The sight of the robot continuing to march towards first base had Bulma pick herself off the floor and yell at him, "God damn it, Sixteen! Either run or sprint! Don't walk!"

"I am not fast," the robot answered, only to stop dead in its tracks moments later when it saw Goten holding the ball. A few beeps of its optical sensors later and the automaton spoke up once again, "Objective: failed. Ball has been effectively intercepted. Player: out." The android then turned on the spot and marched back towards the dugout.

Standing up as well, the four-year-old Goten grinned and threw his hands in the air victoriously, "Yay! I got someone out!"

The players once again turned over. Following Android 16's uninspiring defeat, Vegeta took to the deck while the raven haired girl who'd previously been standing there stepped up to home. With a metallic bat in hand, the girl kicked her feet into the ground and rolled her shoulders, facing down Yamcha with a twinkle in her eye and a grin on her face.

Slapping a baseball helmet onto her head, the girl stylishly spun her bat around and pointed it straight at her foe, "BATCHKOI! Let's do this!" She then took the steel slugger into a two-handed grip and slid into a wide stance.

Whistling at the girl's gutsy attitude, Yamcha chuckled, "Okay. You asked for it." Tossing his ball up and down a couple of times, the man then set it in his glove and took his position. Straightening upright after a couple seconds of analysis, the star player then wasted no time in pulling his hand back and pitching the ball at the girl using an unconventional, underhanded throw that curved the projectile at blinding speed.

Watching the ball contort as it spun towards her, the raven haired girl gave a wicked grin and, taking a big step forward, swung out with her bat and sent the ball straight into the ground. The white sphere struck the earth in front of her with a sharp thump and buried itself ten feet deep, allowing her to drop her bat and jog to first base without any difficulty.

Yamcha, seeing the ball bury itself halfway between him and the home plate, blinked in shock, "Oh. Didn't expect that." He then rushed over to the hole and looked in, where he was shortly accompanied by Yajirobi.

"Smooth move bro," the rotund fighter with the katana spoke.

"Hey! Don't pin this one on me! I never expected her to hit it into the ground."

"Well… it happened. So what are you gonna do about it?"

"Ah, shit." Yamcha then got to his knees and started digging, a sight that had the Z-fighters standing around the field take a time out for the momentary intermission.

By the time the two men finally managed to dig the ball out, which had been shredded after being sent into the ground, Videl had already run a full lap of the field and jogged comfortably back to the dugout. The women in the audience gave a mighty cheer for her effort, at the same time Zangya pulled away from her part of the field to high-five the girl for a well-executed move. Eventually, when the guys managed to get a replacement ball for the ruined one, the game could once again move on to the final hitter of the team.

Yamcha and everybody else frowned seriously when they saw Vegeta stroll over to the batter's box. With an air of confidence and smugness only the prince himself could possess, the flame-haired man dressed in the blue singlet, sweat pants and shoes took a couple practice swings before digging his feet into position. Assured he was comfortable, the full-blooded Saiyan then focused his attention on the neophyte glaring at him from across the way and the chumps standing in the background.

"Ready to get struck out, your majesty?" Yamcha asked with a grin of his own.

"Bring it on, meat shield," the Saiyan Prince shot back. "I'll send whatever you throw at me back at you tenfold."

"We'll see," the scar-faced pitcher thought, glancing behind him at Piccolo and then across at Tien. Giving his fellow human fighter a respectful nod, the former mercenary then held the ball behind his back and began pouring energy into it. The ball radiating a hot yellow from the amount of ki being poured into it, as soon as it'd achieved critical mass, Yamcha knew he was ready. "Okay, Vegeta. Eat this!"

Warning given, the Saiyan's expression became dead serious and his grip tightened around the bat's handle like a vice. As soon as his arms tensed, his opponent took action.

With a mighty yell that could be heard all across the city, Yamcha cocked his arm back and threw the ball in a wide arc.

Vegeta expected the attack to come straight at him. Reading its path like a ki blast, the man moved to the side and turned in with a low swing.

At first it seemed like it was going to travel right into his bat's path, with Krillin bracing himself for a catch that was sure to be painful.

However, unlike all of Yamcha's previous throws, the baseball unexpectedly curved along its expected path like it was possessed and, with speed no one could have anticipated, smacked Vegeta square in the thigh like a miniature Spirit Ball.

Every single Z-fighter cringed when they saw the charged ball drill into the man's leg and heard its solid 'crack' on impact, eliciting a shocked cry of agony from the Saiyan warrior. A split second later, Vegeta fell to his knees and gripped his thigh, a sight that not only had Piccolo grin, but it had Zangya burst out with laughter.

"AAAAAH! YOU DICK!"

"Oh. Whoops. Sorry about that, dude," Yamcha spoke with an amused grin in play. He whistled while nonchalantly adjusting his cap. "I was aiming for Krillin."

"NO! YOU WEREN'T!" the prince screamed back, a response that caused everybody else in the stadium to start laughing. The sound of their uproarious cheers and exclamations had Vegeta's eye twitch and a tick mark form across his left and right temple. "SHUT THE HELL UP! IT'S NOT FUNNY!" This only made the group laugh even harder.

While Vegeta slowly recovered from his injury, and Piccolo, Tien and their Hera teammate dashed forward to stop the infuriated prince from killing Yamcha outright, over by the dugout Gohan and Videl were leaning against each other for support while their laughter carried on. When both eventually recovered and wiped the tears out of their eyes, the raven haired girl turned towards her partner and grinned at him.

"This is great," she said, partially breathless. "We should get together to do this more often."
"Yeah. Definitely," Gohan chuckled back, straightening up so that they could watch as the others held the irate Saiyan Prince back.

Despite a couple of hiccups here and there, this day proved to be the most fun the Z-fighters remembered ever having together.

XXX

(A few weeks later)

Shadow sparring was always a great way to focus on your techniques and fighting skills. It even served as a terrific form of meditation and breathing exercise, depending on what kind of style you practiced. For Gohan it was a little bit of everything, and though it was an enjoyable experience when training on his own, it was even more stimulating when he was training alongside his family and friends.

In almost perfect synchronization, Gohan, Videl and Goten stood side by side throwing combinations of punches and kicks, sliding through stances and positions reminiscent of those practiced by the Shaolin Monks. Shifting from stance to stance one after the other, the trio exercised proper technique and form as they moved through a repetitive combination of gestures meant to instill within them a sense of control and confidence. They could then apply these same moves to fighting, so that if they were forced to dodge they could retaliate instantly, and if they responded with a parry they could counter respectively.

Over and over again the three of them moved, their movements flowing like water down a stream. Though they were sweating a bit, it was only because they were all wearing weighted clothing set at a manageable level but could still give them a hard enough workout.

It was also worth noting that all three of them were wearing the exact same gi as one another, orange and blue, with the only difference being Goten's long-sleeved undershirt and tie-on belt as opposed to the band versions that his compatriots were wearing. Whatever the case, all three of them were moving harmoniously, and against the background of Mount Paozu with a cool breeze drifting past them, it was the most ideal setting they could've possibly asked for.

After a full morning of practice going through these same moves repeatedly, it was safe to say that the three of them were pretty much set for the next session following. So, ending their practice with a quick combination of blows, the trio of fighters then began limbering up.

Just like his older brother had shown him, Goten loosened his shoulders and shook out his arms and legs, skipping on the spot from left to right. Videl pretty much did the same thing, with Gohan moving to stretch out his legs in a manner his father was best recognized for doing before every fight. Their warm down soon ended however when the teen hybrid moved further out onto the grass and turned to the pair with a big smile on his face.

"Alright guys. To finish up our morning session, the two of you are going to come at me with everything you've got," Gohan instructed, folding his arms over his chest and watching the pair lock glares onto him. Not sensing an ounce of fear or hesitation on them when they assumed their respective fighting stances, the demi-Saiyan grinned, "We're going to work until you give up or drop, so don't hold anything back. Once we're done, we can go back inside and settle down for a nice spot of brunch. Deal?"

Goten allowed a smirk to cross his face in response, "Deal."

"I'm going to give it my all, Gohan," Videl announced with an equally enthusiastic smile.
Arms still crossed, the teen nodded to them in acknowledgment, "Come."

Without another word, Goten rushed straight at his brother and, in a blur of movement, opened up with an onslaught of attacks. Punches flew up at the older boy who, upon leaning back, began blocking his brother's attacks with his right leg. He effortlessly parried and deflected the kid's blows as they flew his way, and continued to do so until he decided to counter with a swift side kick. This attack prompted Goten to leap off of the ground and attack him from up high, throwing punches and kicks at Gohan's head. Despite his best efforts though, the older brother effortlessly slipped and ducked around all of them.

Uncrossing his arms, the spiky haired teenager retaliated with a swift combination of his own, forcing his little brother to block and avoid before dropping back down to the ground. As soon as Goten landed, he spun and threw a low roundhouse kick, which Gohan checked.

The second he did so, the demi-Saiyan perked up in surprise when he sensed a shadow appear behind him and ducked to avoid a wide hook from Videl. The Saiyan then began head slipping punches thrown by the tomboy on the spot, his form blurring between them before he blocked her fist and countered with a kick, forcing the human fighter to spring away. The young duo then rushed back at Gohan and attacked him from both sides, forcing their opponent to avoid from his left and right. He danced between the pair and parried a couple of hits with his leg, until Goten swung in with a wide hook, allowing Gohan to slip under him and cause the youngster to spin over to Videl's side.

"Don't overcompensate. Keep it tight, Goten," Gohan instructed, smiling as he then watched the pair focus all of their attention on him once again. "Try not to be too direct, Videl. Your line of attack is getting predictable. Move around some more."

The teen then faced the duo and allowed them to charge in and attack once again. They came at him head on, but the teen kept his arms at his sides and slipped around their combined assault with ease, slowly backing away as they unleashed everything upon him. Gohan avoided all of their blows like they were moving in slow motion, his smile remaining for a short while until his expression became a little more intense and he quickly matched a counter to their onslaught of blows. When Goten and Videl dove in for a simultaneous attack, he parried both of their hits and, with a swift series of kicks, struck them several times before knocking them away.

Both skidding along the grass to a stop, the young hybrid and human fighter gave a huff and charged right at their opponent once again, who stood before them with his arms crossed. The second they dashed at the teen, the entire process started all over again. For the next hour, both Videl and Goten attacked Gohan with reckless abandon while their trainer dodged, blocked and parried all of their attacks.

After another hour, all three of them were called back into the house when Chi-Chi came out to get them and found two of her hard workers lying flat on their backs, beaten, bruised and utterly spent.

XXX

(A couple weeks later)

There was nothing like a good long meditation in the morning by the waterfall to soothe one's soul. Well, this was the very thing Paprika had been in the process of getting into, until she was once again interrupted by the timely arrival of her regular visitor, Son Goten.

Astride the yellow cloud that his family referred to as Nimbus, the little half-Saiyan giggled brightly as he floated around the girl sitting in midair with her legs crossed, arms folded and her eyes tightly shut. In spite of the fact that she looked like she was currently occupied fighting an internal battle with her spirit, the spiky haired half-pint was doing everything in his power to keep her from doing that. This involved drifting around her like he was in orbit on top of his family's cloud and repeatedly asking her questions he really wanted to have answered.

Needless to say, as grating as it was, it was simply impossible to ignore the little guy.

"So your people like eating fruits for breakfast and lunch, huh? I really like fruits too," Goten exclaimed happily in response to the older girl's latest reply to his storm of questions. Completely caught up in the moment, the child began counting on his fingers, "All kinds. I like apples, bananas, oranges, strawberries, raspberries, pineapples, grapes, pears, raisins..." He then sat back on his cloud and looked towards the sky thoughtfully. "I really like eating prunes too... but those ones make you want to go to the bathroom." An excited look then came upon his face and he grinned at the Makyan's back. "Did your people have fruits that made you do that too?"

Breathing out a sigh, the napping demon girl shrugged her shoulders, "We had a lot of fruits possessing all sorts of magical and dietary properties. This included alcoholic dates and berries that could cure any illness you were afflicted with." She then cracked open an eye and looked across at the boy floating alongside her. "My village was known for growing and selling some of the most delicious fruits on the entire planet. But... Makyo was destroyed many years ago in a great cataclysm... and most of my entire race's culture is now lost to the ages, including their fields and trees."

"Oh. I'm... I'm sorry," Goten murmured, now looking ashamed at having asked her that question. "I didn't know."

"Don't worry. I've gotten used to it," Paprika replied, closing her eyes again and exhaling deeply.

"Being on your own?" Goten asked, his face scrunching up cutely as he considered the question carefully for himself. After a couple minutes of sitting on it, the youngster then responded with the only thing he could come up with, "I think being on your own would be very sad and very scary. If my brother, Zangya, Videl or my mum weren't around and I wanted someone to play with, I wouldn't know what to do. I'd be walking around lonely and... and upset." He squirmed a little on the spot, "I don't think I'd ever get used to being alone."

His words had Paprika visibly sit up a little, but it was a response that went completely amiss by the little half-Saiyan.

"Everyone needs somebody to make them feel better... mums... dads... brothers... family... friends," Goten then smiled as he gazed across at the Makyan's back. "Having people around you who love you and spend time with you can make you very happy. Like whenever I'm upset or hurt, I always go to my brother and he cheers me up and spends time with me. And whenever I want someone to play with, I sometimes go over to Bulma's house and play games with Trunks. Sometimes he'd come over to my place too and we play tag across the hills." The youngster grinned as memories of those times flooded back to him. "When I'm spending time with someone I know and love, I feel like I'm going to be okay. I feel safe and happy." The boy then leaned forward curiously as he moved Nimbus around to look at the girl, "Do... you have someone that makes you feel like that?"

It was then Goten got a little bit of a surprise when he floated around and saw Paprika's face. Getting a good look at her, the boy noticed the girl was staring ahead of her with tears streaming down her cheeks and her mouth slightly open, a sight that had the child recoil before floating forward in worry.
"Ms Angel… are… are you okay?"

Realizing that the youngster had come right up alongside her, Paprika shook herself out of her daze and wiped out her eyes. "Oh… y-yeah. I just… got splashed by the waterfall." She then cleared her throat and closed her eyes once again. "It's nothing."

Blinking a few times after seeing the girl wipe away the 'water' on her face, the spiky haired child pursed his lips stubbornly and tilted his head, "Are you sure?"

"Yes. I'm sure," Paprika replied quickly, wanting to avoid getting too into her personal issues with this child.

He was young and innocent. The last thing she wanted to do was fill him in on the torrent of emotions she was experiencing every day.

However, what she had yet to figure out was that Goten wasn't a quitter. When he saw something he thought was out of place, he would stop at nothing until that thing was corrected. It was an attribute of tenacity that was best associated with all the members of his family. So, staying true to that virtue, the young half-Saiyan floated forward on Nimbus and hovered in front of the girl with a happy smile on his face.

"If you don't have any friends or family, Ms Angel… I can be your friend if you like."

The Makyan looked up at him in surprise, "Huh?"

"Yeah. That's a great idea," the boy said, floating around on the cloud so that he was behind her and surprised the demon by wrapping his arms around her. As soon as he was latched on, he giggled and pressed his face against the girl's fluffy hair. "Since you're living here in Mount Paozu, I can come visit you every day and we can hang out whenever you want. If you're feeling upset you can come tell me about it… and if you want someone to talk to, you can come talk to me. Wouldn't that be awesome?"

At first baffled by what the boy was saying, Paprika tried to unlock the boy's grip from around her neck. However, her efforts proving futile, she simply settled for staring at him. "Uh… well…” She was about to protest. But as soon as her eyes landed on the boy's face and she saw the child smiling at her from up close, the white haired girl felt her words get swallowed up and her breathing grow still. Upon which she relented to the overwhelming cuteness of his visage and the wall preventing her from saying anything slowly crumbled. "I… I guess so."

"Yay!" Goten exclaimed, pulling away from the girl to float next to her, grinning from ear to ear, "I know we're going to have so much fun. We can look for bugs together, chase dinosaurs, catch fish… we can even play chasey when my brother teaches me how to fly tomorrow." Another idea then came to the child's head and he hovered in closer to the Makyan once again. "Hey! You can even come around and play with me and Gohan sometime! It'll be great!"

Recoiling a little, Paprika looked away with a slight smirk on her face, "We'll see. Your brother and I aren't exactly what you would call… the best of pals…"

"Oh? You've… already met my brother?" Goten asked, tilting his head at the demon girl for a moment.

The Makyan chuckled, "In a way."

Shrugging it off seconds later when the green-skinned girl failed to elaborate any further, Goten then went on about wanting to organize a play date with her and Trunks. He talked about how he wanted to show her his place and all of the awesome hot spots there were for animals around the mountain. Considering how long he'd known this girl, he was determined to hang out with her as much as possible when he wasn't at home, so that she didn't feel alone anymore. His heart spoke for him in this matter and, unbeknownst to him, it struck a little chord inside of Paprika that resonated with her deeply.

Not allowing it to show on her face, the Makyan simply floated there and allowed Goten to ramble on and fill her world with noises of comfort and joy…

Both of which she thought she'd long cut out of her life.

XXX

(Two months later)

In the enormous, dome-shaped structure that was Capsule Corp's main building, in a private wing reserved entirely for the Brief family's use, Goten and Trunks could be seen sitting in a quiet observation area behind a pane of specially made, reinforced glass.

The reason for their being in that vicinity was simple.

The viewing window in front of them was the only thing standing between them and the circular white chamber that was the company's primary Gravity Room, which was currently reading four hundred and fifty times on the control panel. Because of the ridiculously high setting the training center had been switched to, the kids had been forced to sit out for the time being so that they could watch as their two primary role models battled it out beyond the thick panel of shock-proof material.

Moving about in the form of two indiscernible blurs, the flame-haired form of Vegeta and the now taller Son Gohan could be seen darting about the tight bubble at ludicrous speeds. While not being able to move as fast as they normally did due to the harsh conditions they were being put under, the pair were still putting on one hell of a show for their audience as they danced through the airspace and engaged one another in one of their most intense sparring routines yet.

Having agreed to keep their fighting states at base form, both Prince and hybrid crisscrossed through the air like bullets, attacking one another with reckless abandon before deciding to gain some much needed space.

Reappearing out of super speed in a blur of motion, the shirtless Vegeta, sporting only a pair of tight blue spandex shorts, training shoes and a series of old battle scars, shimmered into view several meters above the ground in a kicking motion.

"Damn it!" Missing the flash of his foe darting past him, the Saiyan Prince felt his body begin to drop under the gravity before he shot off at an untraceable speed once again.

The ground shook when another figure phased into view on the other side of the chamber. Performing a series of acrobatic back flips, Gohan, also dressed in a pair of tight blue spandex shorts, training shoes and a series of old battle scars, shimmered into view several meters above the ground in a kicking motion.

Air filling with the sounds of shouting and wind breaking, the two warriors eventually remerged from their light speed travel spinning down from the ceiling. When they plummeted to midlevel in front of one another, Gohan used that opportunity to throw a wicked right straight. A battle cry echoed out when his attack shot towards the prince, only to miss his target when the flame-haired Saiyan dodged it by an inch. The instant their sweat clouded the air from their respective actions, they disappeared once again.

As their sparring match raged on, a five year old Trunks, adorned in a green gi with orange belt and wrist bands, gave an exclamation of surprise when he saw his father receive an elbow to the face before retaliating with a kick to his opponent's side. The impacts were marked by two deafening shockwaves, "Whoa. Look at them go."

"Yeah. Man, that's so awesome," Goten remarked in amazement, watching with wide eyes as his brother vanished in a blur and came at his opponent from behind with a knee, slamming it into Vegeta's face and sending him spinning to the floor. After bouncing off of it, the man sprang up and leapt back into super speed travel. "I wish I could do that."

Frowning miserably, Trunks curled up a little in his seat and glared enviously through the window, "All of the adults in our group are so strong. How long will it take before you or I can fight like that?"

"I don't know," Goten replied with a puzzled expression, only to quickly switch back to a cheerful visage moments later. "But I bet with enough training I'll become just as strong as any one of them. That's what Gohan told me when he sparred with me the other day."

"My dad said the exact same thing to me when I was sparring with him," Trunks responded with a smile, earning a grin from his best friend. "What are the odds?"

As the kids talked, Gohan and Vegeta continued their battle.

Teleporting out of thin air, the Saiyan Prince arced around the circular chamber and dove in with a flying spin kick, only to miss the blur that shot past him. Growling in frustration, the scarred warrior dropped down to the durable tiled surface and slammed his feet into the floor. With a heavy thud, Vegeta then spun around and jabbed out, feeling his attack get parried and watching as his opponent shimmered into view directly in front of him.

With a shout Gohan threw a hook at the older fighter, who blocked it and attempted to retaliate with a punch of his own. Reacting quickly, the spiky haired Saiyan deflected the man's shot, at the same time jabbing out with a counter that struck his opponent across the face. Knocking spit out of Vegeta's mouth, the half-Saiyan parried a flick kick in the side, upon which the Saiyan Prince hiked off of his opponent's forward leg and back flipped into the air. He then came down at Gohan with an elbow, only for the teen to summersault out of the way and leap into the air.

Blasting back in a blur, the boy slammed his feet against the wall and shot forward, slamming into the man's side with a glorified body check and knocking him off his feet. Vegeta gave a shout as he was sent flying, before he swiftly spun into a recovery and kicked off of the wall as well. Both opponents flew off again, darting from left to right until they finally remerged above the ground.

Trading blows, the pair then collided with simultaneous kicks, which they both parried before eventually springing off of their opponents. Upon which the pair curled up into balls, spun through the air, and dropped altitude. Both touched down with a solid thud, covered in sweat, bruises, and showing signs of serious fatigue against the crushing forces of increased mass.

Panting heavily and noticing the teen glaring back at him fiercely, Vegeta huffed and marched over to the control panel. With a quick press of a button, he shut off the artificial field weighing them down. "Training Session: Complete. Gravity Simulation: Deactivated. Normal Environmental Settings Restored," the computer's voice spoke up as the hum of the engines faded away, and the two Saiyans felt the extra mass lift free from their bodies. "Time: one hour, twelve minutes and thirty-two seconds."

"Good spar, brat," the Saiyan Prince said, marching towards the exit with the half-Saiyan falling in step alongside him.

Gohan smiled when they exited the room and entered the lockers, "I see you've learned a few new moves, Vegeta. Been working hard?"

Gathering up a couple of towels hanging from the rack, the shorter fighter then tossed one over to the teen and began drying himself down. "If I plan on ascending to the next level like you have, I'm going to need every single second I can clock to get me there." He then hung the cloth from his shoulder and frowned, "I don't care how long it takes me. Sooner or later, I'm going to catch up to you."

"I'm sure you will," the demi-Saiyan chuckled, wiping his face and smirking at the man who'd become one of his most frequent sparring partners over the last few years. "Until then, you can expect to see my face around here a lot more often."

Grunting, Vegeta turned his back on his former opponent and went over to his locker, where he opened it up and began fishing around for his regular clothes. During which time he heard Gohan shuffle over to his and, after fishing out a water bottle, uncorked it and took a big swig from its contents.

"You've been jumping over to Otherworld to visit Kakarot, haven't you?" Vegeta asked, glancing over his shoulder to see the teen glance back at him in response.

"Yeah. Every chance I can," Gohan answered, before a smile formed across his face once again. "I took mum up there today so that she could spend some time with him while I looked after Goten down here."

"Hmph. Whatever," the flame-haired warrior replied, shutting his locker and moving to the showers, leaving the teen in the locker room to his own devices. "You can kick that clown in the shin for all I care."

Smiling after the Saiyan, the young warrior sat himself down on the bench and took another sip from his bottle. When he lowered it, he was almost immediately blind-sided when two similarly sized blurs crashed into him from the entrance. Looking down in surprise, he saw Trunks and Goten grinning up at him.

"Oh. Hey there you two. Where've you been hiding this whole time?" Even though he knew they'd been watching his spar with Vegeta, he still wanted to take the chance to humor the little rascals.

"That was awesome, big brother," Goten exclaimed happily. "You really gave Trunks' dad a hard time in there."

"Yeah! The way the two of you were zooming around and beating the heck out of each other, it was so cool!" the lavender haired hybrid also spoke up loudly, looking just as thrilled as his friend. "You and dad are, like, the two strongest guys in the universe."

"You think so," Gohan asked before grinning brightly. "You may be right on that one, Trunks."

Rocking back and forth while grabbing his brother's towel, Goten beamed at his sibling eagerly,
"Can we have a go as well, Gohan? Me and Trunks want to fight with you too."

"Heh. Sure. Why not?" the teen replied, upon which he then set his drink aside and nodded across the room. "If you like, I can take both of you in for a quick session at an easy ten. What do you say?" Since they were both still young and in training, he had to be considerate of their strengths.

His little brother especially. Even though the kid was super talented and packed quite a punch for his age, Goten still had quite a ways to go before he could tackle anything of a significantly high level.

Regardless, that didn't stop the twin terrors from expressing their enthusiasm.

"Yeah!" the pair answered at the same time, throwing their fists into the air excitedly. A split second later, both of them then laughed when Gohan stood up, tossed his brother over his shoulder and picked Trunks up and slipped the squirming child underneath his arm.

Once he'd hoisted them onto his person, the demi-Saiyan began his march, "Alright then. If that's what you fellas want, then let's get this show on the road!" He then dragged the laughing pair back into the Gravity Room, all the while not knowing that Vegeta had been standing behind the corner listening in the entire time.

After hearing the youngsters enter the training area, the Prince of all Saiyans returned to his own business and continued on for the showers. After the amount of heat he'd burned up in that damn simulation against Kakarot's ridiculously strong brat, he definitely needed a good soak to wash away his fatigue.

XXX

(Several weeks later)

(Mount Paozu)

Standing on the grass side by side with their eyes glued on the skies above them, Zangya, Piccolo, Lime and Icarus looked on intently as Gohan's latest training session unfolded at a rapidly escalating pace. It wasn't just due to the fact he was starting to use some more impressive maneuvers, but the other two he was currently having it out with were now trying even harder to shoot him out of the sky.

Zipping around as nothing more than three indiscernible blurs, the demi-Saiyan, along with a slightly scolded Videl and an equally bruised up Goten, could be seen exchanging blows at an incredibly high speed. With the sounds of wind cracking and gun shots ringing out across the countryside, there was nothing about this scenario that said they weren't working themselves into the dirt.

Elegantly dancing across the heavens, Videl reappeared out of super speed diving foot first towards an empty space in the sky, where Gohan's form suddenly blurred into view. Grinning all the while, the half-Saiyan parried her flying side kick and countered with a right hook, driving the girl away and forcing her into a retreat. Almost instantly after the failed attack, Goten came in from the side attempting to hit the older boy while his guard was down. However, just like with Videl, the teen managed to avoid the child's hit and retaliated with a swift body shot, knocking the wind out of his airborne brother before kicking him away.

Spinning through the air, the child quickly slowed and stopped in his tracks, teeth bared and fists clenched. "Ah. That didn't work."
"You've finally gotten the hang of flying, Goten. Well done," Gohan exclaimed, soaring backwards as he set his eyes on his winded sibling. "Don't stop now. You're doing well."

Grinning at the boy's encouragement, the spiky haired child in the long sleeved orange and blue gi threw his hands forward, "Okay! HA!" With a mighty yell of effort, the demi-Saiyan unleashed a powerful golden beam straight towards the teenager.

Smirk forming, Gohan slipped to the side and avoided it, allowing the attack to streak past him. The second he did, he then flew off to the right as fast as he could and dodged an orange blast from his five o'clock, which came from Videl attacking from below. In a matter of moments, the entire sky became filled with golden and orange beams of light as Gohan's two opponents began firing ki attacks at him one after the other.

Like a gratuitous fireworks display, the entire countryside became filled with chains of explosions and blinding flashes of light. One would quickly mistake this to be some sort of concert out in the middle of nowhere. However, at the very heart of this strange anomaly, it was simply two powerful martial artists trying to catch their even more powerful opponent and knock him out of the clouds.

The display of sheer speed and skill impressed both Piccolo and Zangya, and filled Lime's eyes with a sense of awe as she watched the group battle it out in midair.

"That's incredible," the brown haired girl in jean shorts and yellow T-shirt whispered, eyes darting left and right and taking in the performance for all it was worth. "No matter how fast they move, they just can't seem to catch him."

Zangya smiled in response, at the same time Icarus purred happily, "Give it a minute."

After several moments of nothing but watching beams of light and explosions streak across the heavens, Videl and Goten eventually reappeared out of their light speed states of travel, followed closely by Gohan. As soon as their forms faded into view, the dynamic duo took immediate action and focused all of their efforts upon their target.

Grabbing her wrist and throwing her hand forward, Videl unleashed a powerful purple blast towards the boy, at the exact same time Goten cupped his hands beside him and unleashed the Kamehameha wave in the exact same direction. The simultaneous attacks bathed the teenager in a bright light as the lances of energy approached, intent on taking him out in one go. However, just when they were about to hit the perfectly still boy hovering casually in their flight path, he suddenly vanished in a flicker of movement, stunning his opponents.

Videl and Goten's attacks collided with earsplitting force and an earthshaking explosion, filling the sky with fire and smoke. The colliding attacks obstructed the pair's view momentarily, prompting them to shield their faces until the flaring lights started to dissipate. When they looked back, they gritted their teeth in frustration when they saw the results for themselves.

"He's gone," Goten exclaimed, looking around in shock. "Where did he go?"

As it turns out, his teammate was almost as lost as he was, "I don't..." However, upon stretching out her senses and combing the area a little more thoroughly, the girl with the pigtails suddenly gasped in surprise and slipped to the side. "THERE!" Avoiding a series of blurs that shot past and cut her cheek, Videl threw a right straight, her knuckles grazing something in the air ahead of her and drawing a spurt of blood.

The moment her punch became fully extended, Gohan emerged out of his super speed movement directly in front of her with a surprised expression in play, which shortly transformed into a smug
When Goten looked over to see what'd happened to Videl, the youngster saw both her and his big brother floating with their fists extended over the other's shoulder and gazes locked firmly on their respective targets. Having obviously exchanged a cross counter with the half-Saiyan, the female fighter fixed the teen with a sly grin while Gohan threw one right back at her.

Their unexpected face-off had Piccolo blink in surprise, "She's gotten better… much better."

"Yeah," Zangya murmured, also putting on a smile. "Last time she couldn't keep up with that kind of speed. But it looks like Gohan's been taking her in for some extra training sessions in the gravity room."

In other words, after five years of training, Videl was finally starting to close the gap.

At first perplexed by the pair's exchange, Goten then balked in shock when he saw the pair vanish into thin air and the sounds of rapid gunfire suddenly fill the skies. Along with a chorus of grunts and shouts, the youngster saw the pair reemerge ten stories above him locked in a fierce exchange of blows. Their attacks flying at each other in a blur of countless motions, the pair then vanished and reappeared several hundred yards away, continuing to trade blows and pour on the pressure. In a matter of moments, their super human battle became a continuous, ongoing process, as the two fighters darted about the sky locked in intense combat and traded hit after hit at blinding speeds.

Eyes looking around in disbelief, Goten tried to follow them, but found that task to be extremely difficult. "Wow. They're moving so fast I can't even see them." Focusing his senses, the child spent the next minute attempting to get a bead on the pair's positions. After several more seconds of hearing nothing but grunting and powerful attacks impacting over and over, the child finally spotted them and grinned. "Busted!" With a loud battle cry, the hybrid shot up into the sky and, upon gaining enough speed, threw a flying side kick.

The second his momentum stopped he saw Gohan and Videl reappear, both of them looking down at him in surprise while the former had to lean back to avoid being hit by his brother's sole.

As soon as the two older fighters emerged out of thin air, Goten lunged at his older brother and began unleashing an onslaught of lightning fast attacks on him. Yelling out with every blow, the youngster began forcing Gohan into a slow retreat of ducking, weaving and slipping around his fists and kicks.

Upon realizing what was happened, a big smile appeared on Videl's face. "Heh. Look at him go." If nothing else, Goten sure was a determined little sprite.

Attempting to put on the pressure, the young demi-Saiyan increased the speed of his assault. But just when it seemed like he was getting somewhere, Gohan's hand suddenly shot up, caught his fist, and locked him up, stopping him dead.

A chuckle escaped the teen's lips as the demi-Saiyan grinned at his younger brother. "Hey, squirt. You're way too slow." The older fighter then lightly kneed the kid in the stomach before smacking the child out of the sky, sending him plummeting to the hills below.

However, just several stories later, Goten managed to stop his descent and flipped back into a proper, upright position. As soon as his momentum ceased, the youngster flew back up after his opponent, bringing proud looks to Piccolo, Zangya, and Lime's faces.

"Yeah! Go Goten!" the brown haired girl cheered ecstatically, a chant which was immediately matched by an encouraging shriek from Icarus.

This sparring match between the three young fighters lasted for quite a while after that. But just like all great sessions, the hour soon came to an end and both Videl and Goten were swapped out for another pair of challengers. The two aliens watching from the sidelines took to the stage shortly after the young duo stepped down, allowing both them and their half-Saiyan friend to get a workout into their day. In a matter of seconds, the sky once again became filled with explosions and sonic blasts as shockwaves rippled all across the countryside.

When the audience stepped back and took up positions on the grass, the youngsters were soon given a full scope of the capabilities of earth's mightiest defenders. Videl, Lime and Goten were unable to peel their eyes away as the adults of their group battled it out across the heavens and rained hell down upon one another.

Appearing out of super speed, Gohan swung down with a hammer blow and struck Piccolo in the back, sending the Namekian plummeting out of the sky and towards the ground. But when he was only several feet away from hitting the earth, the green-skinned warrior righted himself and, landing against the grass in a crouched position, rocketed up into the sky and flew right back at his opponent, who was forced to block a spin kick from behind thrown by his other opponent.

Zangya growled when her attack was thwarted and swung in with a hook, only for Gohan to parry it and retaliate with a kick straight into her chin, which knocked her spinning in the opposite direction. As soon as he'd dealt with her, he turned to face the fast-approaching Piccolo, who managed to catch him with his guard down and smacked him across the face with a hook. The blow sending blood flying from the youngster's mouth, the demi-Saiyan used the momentum gained from the hit to spin around and slam a kick into the Namekian's head, only to see him block it. As soon as the force was absorbed, his mentor dive in with an onslaught of attacks.

Managing to weave around and deflect most of the blows, Gohan landed two straight punches into his instructor's face before receiving a kick in return, which he quickly countered. His occupation with the Namekian left him wide open, as Zangya suddenly came up from below with a jumping knee into his stomach. As soon as she smacked the boy into the air, she performed a quick forward flip and dropped an axe kick right into his back, sending him plummeting to the ground with a deafening shockwave.

The teen slammed into the grassy hillside in an explosion of smoke and dust. The moment he crash-landed, Zangya and Piccolo threw their hands back and pitched them forward unleashing two powerful beams that separated the cloud and collided with the crater Gohan had formed. The attacks detonated with colossal force, shaking the entire region and stunning the audience. Lime actually had to hang on to Icarus to stop from being shaken off her feet.

"Whoa! Intense," the farm girl remarked.

"You got that right," Videl agreed, looking on with a startled look of her own in play.

When it seemed like Piccolo and Zangya had managed to finally down their stubborn adversary for good, a second explosion from below cleared the cloud of smoke and revealed Gohan standing there covered in bruises.

As soon as the teen emerged from the rubble, Zangya grinned and disappeared in a blur along with her partner. Reappearing close to the ground, the orange haired woman turned in mid flight and flew at the boy feet first. But just when it seemed like she was about to hit, the teen leapt over her and flew into the air, retreating as Piccolo remerged not too far away and lobbed an orange ball of ki his way.
Avoiding it using super speed, Gohan quickly gained altitude. Upon suspending himself in the sky above the valley, he threw his arms and legs out and powered up, his golden aura exploding off of him as he jumped straight to Super Saiyan.

"Come on!" the half-Saiyan shouted.

His opponents were undeterred.

Powering up as well to match the boy's level, Piccolo rocketed up at his student and greeted him with a wide hook, an attack that was quickly matched by a punch from the golden warrior. In an instant, the pair's fists and legs collided with one another again and again as they traded mountain-leveling shots at high speed. But after several seconds of exchanging hits, the demi-Saiyan proved to be far too much for his mentor and managed to slip one of the Namekian's kicks and elbowed him in the head. The blow connected with tremendous force and sent the green fighter plummeting out of the sky.

Zangya, teleporting behind Gohan in a full-powered state, attempted to blindside him with a blow. But the teen, quick as ever, managed to avoid it and catch her arm. Both snarling under the strain of the lock, the Hera then leapt at him with a kick, only for the hybrid fighter to block it and knee her in the stomach with a yell of effort. The impact creating a deafening shockwave and causing Zangya to spit up blood, the half-Saiyan then used his advantage to spin the woman around a few times before tossing her towards the ground.

The orange haired fighter fell for several stories, only to stop just a couple of feet off the ground and land on her toes. Wiping blood out of the corner of her mouth, the woman smirked towards her opponent when he descended back to ground zero, at about the same time Piccolo managed to stagger to his feet as well.

The three squared off once again. But just when it seemed like they were going to restart the fray from scratch, Zangya spoke up.

"Why don't we make this a little more interesting?" the Hera asked, drawing Gohan and Piccolo's attentions. When their eyes fell upon her, they saw the young girl rise up to full height and clench her fists tightly at her sides. "I've been saving this move for a special occasion, but I think now is as good a time as any to show you."

At first confused by what she was saying, the two warriors soon found out why Zangya was acting so confident as her ki suddenly started climbing at an alarming rate.

Tensing up and gathering energy, the woman's green aura exploded around her like wildfire, causing the ground around her to crack and tremble. A growl escaping her clenched jaw, the Hera spent the next several seconds focusing her power and allowing it to build. Then, as soon as she reached the barrier preventing her from powering up any further, the woman broke it with a mighty yell and a deafening howl. In a series of sonic explosions, Zangya threw her arms up and outwards, her aura intensifying several times over when her skin flashed green and her hair turned blood red. Her muscles also becoming more defined with her power up, the woman practically shredded the purple shawl she was wearing and disintegrated it on the wind, stunning her audience.

Causing a gust of wind to blast outwards in all directions, Gohan and everybody else looked back to see the woman smile in their direction.

"It took a while, but I finally managed to get it. My race's Super Hera transformation… a technique known only to a handful of my people," Zangya spoke, her voice calm despite the now enormous level of energy she was producing. Just standing next to the woman had Piccolo sweating, whereas Videl and Goten, both of whom were positioned several yards away, gawked in disbelief. "So… what do you think?"

At first astonished at his friend's sudden transformation, Gohan's look quickly calmed and an excited smile pulled across his lips. "I think I've found myself a new playmate," he said, gaze flickering mischievously. With a grunt of effort, the demi-Saiyan wasted no time and transformed as well. Hair spiking up even more, leaving only a single bang hanging in front of his forehead, the tempest of Gohan's aura increased dramatically and electricity began to crackle around him in a squall. Upon ascending to the next level, the teen smirked confidently, "Let's dance."

The sight of her roommate assuming his Super Saiyan 2 form had Zangya's full and undivided attention. A grin of excitement appeared on her face.

"This is going to be fun."

XXX

(A month later)

(Erasa's House)

"I mean, I was just casually flipping through channels and when I saw that movie was playing, I decided to see what all the fuss was about," the blonde haired teen that was Videl's schoolmate exclaimed, at the same time leaning back in her couch and staring across at the other people in the room.

"And… what did you think of it?" Videl asked, genuinely finding interest in what the other girl had to say about her latest discovery.

"I thought it was a pretty spectacular movie," the blonde in the green tube-top and white short-shorts replied, quickly taking on a dazed look as she thought back on the film. "The male actors in it were so hot."

"Well, they have to be if it was a movie about male strippers," the amused voice of Lime spoke up, whom was currently crashing on the floor in front of Gohan, the latter of which was sitting on the two-person couch alongside his raven haired training partner. "That's the general rule used by all companies who want to put something on the market. Sex sells."

"You don't need to tell me that, sister," Erasa chirped, raising her soda to the girl as a sign of respect, which the brown haired teenager in the blue, checkered shirt that was tied at the front and showed off a lot of cleavage, blue jean shorts and boots, responded in kind. "Guys, girls, it's all the same as long as they advertise it to the right people. Anyway, back to the movie; Magic Mick was great. Not because it was filled with a bunch of ridiculously hot guys, but the story was pretty awesome as well."

"I thought so too," the voice of a male spoke up from the other side of the group, to which all eyes turned to see a boy around their age, athletic in appearance with short brown hair and glasses, wearing a fitted red top, loose jeans and converses, sitting there with a proud smile on his face and polishing his nails against his chest. "Yep. Just another heterosexual male that went out and watched Magic Mick. It's not weird, it's… it's not weird… right?"

Videl snorted as she stared across at another friend from school, "Why in the world did you go and watch that movie, Touya."

"My guess is that he was insanely bored," Gohan remarked, sharing a grin with his friend and earning a nod of agreement from her.

"Hey, I had to take my girlfriend to see something on the weekend. I couldn't help it if our only two options on the register were Magic Mick and that odd looking Galaxy Soldiers movie people have been raving on about for months," Touya replied, at the same time giving them the okay sign. "Good choice either way, but hey, I'm a man that cares about what Yukie wants, so I decided to bite the metaphorical bullet."

Lime, deciding to humor the kid, sighed and shook her head at the young man leaning against the other unoccupied couch, "What a hero."

"You're a champion among men, my friend," Gohan said in earnest, lifting up a potato chip and popping it into his mouth.

Touya chuckled and nudged his glasses against his nose, "You know, my biggest surprise about the whole thing was finding out it was directed by the same guy who directed that Ocean's Ten movie from eight years ago."

"Oh yeah. I remember watching that. That was a pretty tight film," Videl murmured, easily recalling that particular title. "Man. What a way to go."

"I knew something was up while I was watching it, because the entire way through I was thinking to myself 'this movie is… better than it should be… in fact I'm going to say it's actually enjoyable and good.' So I looked up it up and I was like 'oh, shit, that guy directed it,'" Touya continued with great enthusiasm in his voice. "Seriously, it was a butt-load of fun."

"You have to give the man props for having the guts to shoot that kind of script," Gohan interjected, taking a sip from his drink before looking across at Erasa. "Movies based on those sorts of concepts would be a pretty big risk in the industry, considering a lot of people would be uncomfortable with the idea of watching and filming something like that, right?"

"I wouldn't say so. If you think about it, you'd be surprised at the amount of good movies are out there that were made on a shoe-string budget and have a unique story to them," the blonde replied with a sagely expression. After taking another swig from her drink, the blonde stood up and cheekily plopped down right on Gohan's other side, prompting him to move over a tad and Videl to stare strangely at her friend for her actions, "As for the characters, the two main guys in Magic Mick stood out the most for me. The other male strippers in the movie were just kind of in the background. They weren't really doing much."

Touya then grinned across at the group, "Although, Alcide Herveaux from Moon Blood was in it and… yeah, that is one attractive bastard." His remark had everyone give him an odd look. "I'm serious. I'm gonna be honest with you guys. You know, a lot of sorority chicks are usually like 'ah, that chick's hot, I hate her.' Nope. That's a good looking dude and, man… if I were gay, I'd hit that." He then gave them all a thumbs-up, a gesture which earned a snicker from Lime and Videl, and a raised eyebrow from Gohan. This then had the young man adjust his collar and clear his throat. "Erhm… not gay."

"Whatever you say, Touya-kun." Taking the teen's words to heart, Erasa grinned and turned her attention to the other male in the room and pinched him in the shoulder. Her sudden action earned a yelp from the young Saiyan in the Capsule Corp jacket, "But as hot as he is, he's not as good looking as Gohan-kun here." She then leant against his shoulder playfully, causing him to bend away and Videl to glare across at her best friend. "Why settle for fictional characters when I've got the genuine article sitting right next to me."
"Uhh… that's uhh… very flattering of you to say, Erasa," Gohan said nervously, earning a sweet smile from the teen. Obviously he wasn't used to this kind of attention, in spite of how friendly he made himself out to be to a lot of people. Girls like the blonde made him feel a little… awkward…

Giggling, Erasa then leered across at Videl, who continued to give her the funny look. "What about you, V? Do you think Gohan's hot?"

"M-Me? Uhh…" Recoiling at the unexpected question, the girl with the pigtails quickly looked away to hide the blush that appeared on her face. Her reaction was spot on, because she just managed to look away in time to avoid Gohan, Lime's and Touya's curious gazes turning in her direction. "I… think he's… umm… I think Gohan's… pretty cool looking." This is what she allowed herself to say outwardly. "He's okay, I guess."

On the other hand. "Hot? Gohan's ridiculously hot," was what the tomboy thought immediately afterwards, which instantly had the girl's face light up like a bulb and prompted her to shake it to rid herself of the sensation.

To help cool herself off, the raven haired fighter skulled the soda in her hand in one go.

"Gohan's way better looking than those celebrities you see in the movies," Lime spoke up confidently, elbowing the boy playfully in the leg and eliciting a nervous laugh from him at being ganged up on by the girls in the room. "Rain or shine, I'd be happy to be seen out on the streets with his arms around me."

"And… what about me?" Touya asked from his spot, putting on a cool-guy pose. "Come on. Doesn't this face rock your boat as well?"

Considering him for a moment, Erasa gave him a so-so gesture, "Meh. Six out of ten."

Her answer had the male deflate and caused a proverbial raincloud to appear over his head, "Aww, man…" It then started to rain around him, much to the amusement of those who could recognize the poor boy's depression.

"Hey. Don't take it personally," Lime exclaimed in her country accent, at the same time tilting her head backwards to smile at the demi-Saiyan behind her, completely ignoring the fact that Videl was still trying to fight off her uneasiness next to him. "It's just a lot more fun to tease Gohan, since he's so cute and innocent."

"Oh yeah," Erasa agreed, head butting the male hybrid and getting him to imitate a bowling pin after being clipped. Sharing a laugh with the half-Saiyan and his friend from the country, the blonde then noticed Videl come back around and pull the hybrid fighter's attention towards her once more, where the pair then shared a few more words with one another. Upon which Erasa then drew all of their attention to her again with a quick announcement. "Hey! I recorded this awesome new action movie from the network if anyone's interested in seeing it."

Registering to the girl's suggestion, Gohan smiled, "I'm game."

Videl beamed and lifted a hand, "Me too."

"Same here," Lime spoke up.

"Why not?" Touya also murmured, recovering quickly from his brush with gloominess and leaning back against the couch in his typical manner. "I could use with some cheering up."

"Sweet," Erasa chirped, quickly gathering up the remote from the table beside the couch and switching on the big screen. "Let's see if we can make a game out of it. Hope you guys are ready." In a matter of seconds the girl flipped the television over to her planning list and, after cycling through the files recorded, eventually found what she was looking for.

Conversations switched topics quite frequently shortly after that. Let's just say a lot of comments and reviews were shared during that particular screening…

XXX

(A year later)

It has been close to seven years after the world gripping event known as the Cell Games and in that time, the people of earth had experienced a long, well-deserved period of peace and prosperity. All across the globe humans and animals alike were reveling in the happiness and joy brought on by the days of tranquility, and while there were minor community issues here and there, along with the occasional natural disaster taking place, it was altogether the most agreeable times anyone could ever remember experiencing.

The Z-fighters were also making the most of the opportunity to stretch their legs. The Briefs continued their work at the company, Krillin and Android 18 were living happily together at Kame House with their daughter, Tien and Launch had settled down on a farm, Yamcha was making it big as a celebrity on his baseball team, and Dende was still carrying on his work as guardian of the earth.

The Saiyans were also doing their best to occupy themselves and make the most of the time given to them. Vegeta was still pushing himself to the limits of his body in the gravity room along with his son, who he'd decided to drag along for the ride, and Goten was still as outgoing as ever. Surprisingly enough, sometime over the past couple of years, the rest of the gang discovered that the Saiyan Prince and Bulma had decided to stop playing games with each other and make their relationship official. In a small, quiet ceremony outside of the eyes of the public, the two of them got married at a small temple, with only a handful of their closest family and friends attending the event. While not as big as the one hosted by Krillin and Android 18, it was definitely one of the most groundbreaking celebrations the Son family had ever born witness to.

To top off this shift in tone, not only were Gohan, Videl, Piccolo, and Zangya training harder than ever, but the former two had also joined Satan City's police department as a supplementary wing of their forces. The pair of teenagers had taken on part-time positions as crime fighters of the enormous metropolis and while there had only been a handful of problems that needed to be taken care of in the year since they joined up, the pair became an immediate hit.

Thanks to his extra-curricular activity, Gohan's life became that much busier. But even with his construction work and security job taking up a lot of his weeks, the young half-Saiyan still found the time to hang out with his family and friends, and train in the mornings and afternoons to keep up his skills. He was making such a terrific headway in the combat department that he even began aiming for a completely new objective that none of the Z-fighters ever expected him to try and reach before.

The teen wanted to ascend to the next level.

With his power growing every day, Gohan knew without a shadow of a doubt that there were even greater heights he could reach as a Saiyan. There was strength and potential inside of him that he knew he had and, no matter what it took, he was determined to draw them out. However, what was stopping him from pushing past the second level was a speed bump he'd encountered a few times before.
It was the same obstruction that'd prevented him from transforming to his Super Saiyan 2 form following the Cell Games.

He needed a kick: something to push him that last, extra step and achieve a third ascension.

But… this particular objective in his life could wait. Right now, with nothing but clear blue skies ahead and a big world to explore, Gohan knew he had plenty of time to figure this puzzle out.

On this particular, bright and sunny day, soaring through the skies above the pristine landscape of Mount Paozu, the small form of Goten could be seen flying with his arms at his sides and a wide smile on his face as he cut through the planet's lower atmosphere with ease. Descending from his height and going for a spin through the clouds, leaving a pair of vapor trails behind him, the spiky haired hybrid hit the accelerator and took off at an even greater speed. A joyous laugh escaped his lips shortly thereafter as he watched more clouds fly past him and saw the land roll by mile after mile.

"This is so awesome!" Goten exclaimed, giggling brightly as he continued on with his fists pointed forward and his hair whipping around him wildly.

It'd been a long time since he'd gone on a trip like this. Ever since his older brother taught him how to fly and showed him how to tap into his inner energy, the child had been using every opportunity he had to make the most of his abilities. Whether it was just floating from place to place or using his speed to evade his mother's watchful gaze, Goten was really coming to realize the full potential of his strengths.

Fortunately he had his family and friends to remind him not to overdo it and abuse his gifts. A bundle of energy like him needed boundaries, and the Z-fighters had been just the right group of people to teach him those.

While he was soaring along, feeling the air whip at his face and the sun shine brightly overhead, the child then became aware of a shadow falling over him and glanced over his shoulder. When he did, he saw the familiar forms of Piccolo and Zangya float into view, the orange haired girl pulling up alongside the demi-Saiyan with her arms crossed and a smile on her face.

"Going somewhere, little man?" the Hera asked mischievously.

Blinking a few times, Goten smiled, "No. Just flying around the world. No biggy."

"Well then… you wouldn't mind if we joined you, would you?" the orange haired fighter asked.

The half-Saiyan boy nodded his head vigorously, "Yeah. Of course." He then had his gaze pulled over to his other side, where he saw Piccolo pull up nearby with his arms at his sides and a smirk on his face.

"She was worried about you," the Namekian informed in a low enough voice so that the woman didn't hear him. "She just won't admit it."

Goten giggled in return, "I know."

Just as the three were beginning to establish a comfortable pace, about a few hundred meters up ahead, they suddenly saw the cloud cover break and another familiar figure burst into view. Trailing vapor behind her, dressed in an oversized white shirt, a pink t-shirt underneath, a pair of figure hugging black shorts, green Capsule Corp boots and black fighting gloves, with her hair cut short, Videl made her appearance on the scene with an excited cheer and an aerial loop. Immediately after performing the stylish maneuver, the girl turned around so that she was flying... backwards, waved to the three tailing behind her, and grinned.

"Hey there, slow pokes!" She then powered up, enveloping herself in her white aura and taking off at an even greater speed.

"Oh? Is that a challenge, Videl?!" Zangya called out, before smirking and powering up as well. "Well if it's a race you want, then it's a race you'll get!" Green aura burning brightly, she too revved her engine and sped up, closely followed by Piccolo and Goten doing the exact same thing.

The three caught up to the human girl in no time, who smiled across at them as they streaked across the sky like jets. In fact, they were moving so fast that they broke the sound barrier effortlessly. They ruled the sky for miles around and with absolutely no traffic to worry about, the group was well on their way to lapping the entire planet.

But then, just when it seemed like the four of them had become the fastest moving objects on the planet, an orange blur rocketing past them suddenly nudged them to the side and caught their attentions. Looking ahead in surprise, the group saw the laughing form of a seventeen-year-old Gohan dressed in his orange and blue gi perform several spins as he ascended at breakneck speeds. Covering more ground than Superman himself, the half-Saiyan executed a couple of stylish loops before then dropping back to fly alongside his friends and family.

Being sure to nod to Piccolo and share a fist-bump with Zangya on his way into their formation, Gohan then pulled up between his kid brother and best friend of six years, and fixed his attention upon the latter, "Hey, Videl. Going my way?"

The teen crime fighter, blushing a little at the warrior's charming smile and dashing exterior, grinned back at him with equal intensity, "Wherever the wind takes me, I guess."

Gohan's eyes flickered with delight, "Sounds good to me."

With that exchange, the group then fixed their gazes ahead of them once more and shot off towards the horizon. Though the path they'd selected had been random and they had no idea what cities and countries they were now passing, one thing was for certain…

They were definitely looking forward to what tomorrow would bring.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Wow, that montage went by longer than expected. But at least we were able to see what Gohan and the others did over the past couple of years.

It's been close to the seven years now and, as expected, we're only a couple months away in the story before Gohan goes to High School. What shenanigans are waiting in store for our hero next?

Well, so far we were able to see a lot of what the Z-fighters did in their off time. Gohan has made friends with Erasa, and now he, Videl, Erasa, Lime and the new guy Touya spend a lot of time hanging out. He's even taking Videl to the movies. You could assume it's a date, but they're just hanging out as friends (wink)… for now anyway.

Let's see, Bulma and Vegeta are married, so are Krillin and Android 18, Android 16 is back… kind of… let's just call him a watered down version of Android 16, the gang is getting together regularly, Zangya was able to attain a Super Hera form, and everyone's still training hard.

Just so you all know, Goten and Trunks aren't Super Saiyans yet, and for good reason too.
Once upon a time, becoming a Super Saiyan in the series was a privilege and a rite of passage, but when they came along in the Buu Saga it… really diluted the currency a little.

Goten could possibly go Super Saiyan with some work, since it's pretty much in his genetics (because he was conceived when Goku had achieved the Full Power version of a Super Saiyan). I don't think Trunks could possibly transform without a great deal of work. He just became a Super Saiyan at his age in the series for the sake of becoming a Super Saiyan because… logic. Anyway, it might be a little bit before you see these two get to that level. Probably in the next chapter or so.

And… Sentinel is nowhere to be seen yet.

All of the previous chapters have been foreshadowing, so if you've been paying attention, all of you probably have an idea of what's to come.

I guess since the Seven Year Arc is almost over, it's time to move into the Zeru Arc next chapter. This is where shit gets really intense. Hope you're all looking forward to that.

And, as a bonus, I've provided some riki numbers of all the characters just to give you all an update on the characters' progress. The numbers are all at full power unless mentioned otherwise.

Villains:

Frieza (100 Percent Final Form) – 12,000,000 riki (lol. Not… much of a milestone anymore)

xxx

Broly (Suppressed) – 5,000 riki

Broly (Restricted Super Saiyan) – 180,000,000 riki

Broly (Legendary Super Saiyan) – 500,000,000^ riki

Broly (Present) - Unknown

xxx

Hatchiyack – 500,000,000 riki

xxx

Perfect Cell - 180,000,000 riki

Super Perfect Cell – 300,000,000 riki

xxx

Bojack – 190,000,000 riki

Bojack (Super Hera) – 280,000,000 riki

xxx

Kana (Suppressed) – 15,000,000 riki

Kana (Full Power) – 350,000,000 riki

xxx
Paprika – 15,000,000 riki
Paprika (Super Makyan) – 190,000,000 riki

Sentinel 16# – 45,000,000 riki

Varax – Unknown (approximately Class 15)

Comet Prisoner – Unknown

Present:

Yamcha – 12,000,000 riki
Chiaotzu – 7,500,000 riki
Tien – 22,000,000 riki
Krillin – 20,000,000 riki
Android 18# – 40,000,000 riki
Piccolo – 190,000,000 riki

Goten – 11,000,000 riki
Trunks – 11,000,000 riki

Froze – 25,000,000 riki

Kana (Suppressed) – 25,000,000 riki
Kana (Full Power) – 420,000,000 riki

Paprika – 23,000,000 riki
Paprika (Super Makyan) – 230,000,000 riki

Vegeta – 24,000,000 riki
Vegeta (Super Saiyan) – 240,000,000 riki

Videl – 16,000,000 riki

Zangya – 24,000,000 riki
Zangya (Full Power) – 240,000,000 riki
Zangya (Super Hera) – 440,000,000 riki

Gohan – 25,000,000 riki
Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 250,000,000 riki
Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 450,000,000 riki

By this point in the series, all of the characters have pretty much reached the same level they would be at around the Buu Saga, more or less, with the exception of Gohan and Zangya, both of whom have obviously been training their asses off. Vegeta hasn't become a Super Saiyan 2 yet since he hasn't found the right 'kick' yet either.

By contrast, opponents of Frieza's level are just stepping stones now. It's hilarious when you think about it. Gohan took him out with only one punch in Fusion Reborn, and he was in his base form, not to mention he didn't do any training in the seven year gap.

As it stands, while the normal Z-fighters can fight with Gohan and Vegeta in their base forms, when they're in their Super Saiyan forms... well... in Krillin's words, it's like fighting a steamroller with your hands tied.
"I've been to a lot of concerts and performances in my time at school, but I don't think I've ever been to a fashion show before. This is a really interesting change of pace," Videl spoke up above the clamor of the crowd gathered in the rows of seats behind her. Wearing a trendy yellow sweater, white skirt and brown shin-high boots, the short-haired girl then glanced across at her escort for the morning and smiled pleasantly at him. "So what's it like living with a world famous super model under your roof?"

"Well, if my years of eating at the table and sparring with her every single day are anything to go by, it's pretty mundane, actually," Gohan replied, the spiky haired young adult glancing back at his companion with a bright smile in play. Dressed in a black turtleneck with figure-hugging jeans and blue converses, the smartly dressed half-Saiyan allowed an amused chuckle to escape his lips. "Zangya is like a member of our family. In all honesty, even though she's now this world famous fashion icon, I don't treat her any differently than I do Piccolo or Goten. She's an awesome friend and a great person to have around the house."

"I'm really glad you think that way," Videl stated with a smile, giving the boy a warm gaze as she reached forward and pressed her hands against her legs eagerly. "A lot of the guys I know usually gush over figureheads like me and my dad. It's really hard to have a normal conversation with someone when they're constantly acting nervous around you and don't know what to say. That's why I'm happy that I have people like you and Erasa to hang out with. I can act like an ordinary girl and not have to stop for an exclusive interview every five feet."

"I admit… you are a little bit different from all of the other people I know," Gohan said, giving the raven haired fighter a grin.

Finding intrigue in the half-Saiyan's words, Videl threw him a curious stare, "Oh? How so?"

"For one you're incredibly talented. You're a martial arts prodigy who can master even the most advanced techniques in only a few short lessons," the hybrid answered while raising a finger. "Secondly, you're headstrong and fiercely determined, always pushing ahead even when the odds seem stacked against you. You're also incredibly independent, smart… and I dare say a little bit feisty as well."

Videl, feeling a little flutter in her chest, chuckled at the last part, "You're damn right, buster." She then playfully jabbed him in the arm, before looking back towards the stage with her arms folded and her legs crossed. By this point in time, the main speaker had already moved over to the plinth to address the audience, opening up the show with the usual jargon and saying how pleased she was to see such an enormous turnout. "I didn't get where I am today by being introverted and shy. If you want to succeed in life, you have to keep moving forward with your head held high and your fist leading you every step of the way."
Beaming at the girl's confidence, Gohan then looked ahead of him as well and allowed his next words to leave his lips clearly and concisely. "You're also the most amazing person I've ever met." Sensing the girl's eyes cut back to him in surprise, the demi-Saiyan crossed his arms and continued to speak. "Even though I've met a lot of incredible people in my life, you're by far the most outstanding girl I've ever had the pleasure of running into. If I hadn't met you back at the Intergalactic Martial Arts Tournament… well… I have no idea what the last seven years of my life would've been like." The teen nodded assuredly in response. "It wouldn't have been as fun as it has been so far, I can tell you that."

Staring up at the teen with a look of bewilderment written across her face, Videl felt her heart thump sharply against her chest as her gaze started to get pulled towards the demi-Saiyan's little by little. Her cheeks warming as all of her attention fixed upon his kind smile and cool visage, the cheer of the crowd suddenly roused her from her daze and forced her to break away prematurely. Turning from her trance with her face extremely red, the tomboy spent the next few seconds trying to calm down and catch her breath. Once she did, the announcer's voice rang out throughout the wide open hall.

"We hope you're ready ladies, gentlemen and esteemed members of the community, because it's time to open the catwalk with our first entry for the day!" the woman up on the stand exclaimed, drawing an excited cheer from the crowd and a series of flashes from the camera crews at the front. Upon raising her hand towards the side curtains, the speaker in the black cocktail dress and blonde hair then called up the first contestant in the lineup. "Let's see what our designers have in store for us."

The platform was immediately washed with a wave of applause as the first girl stepped into the spotlight. Gohan and Videl, both of whom were seated in the front row right at the end of the stage nearest to the judges, gave a loud cheer and a whistle when they spotted Zangya's silhouette appear before the crowd. Thrilled to see that she was opening today's ceremony, they then settled down so that they could hear the rest of the announcer's introduction.

"Our opening number is a specially made product from Daeko designer Trisha Pivovarova, worn by celebrity model Zangya from Mount Paozu," the announcer exclaimed, watching the lights along the walkway switch on and illuminate the woman standing by the white screen. The audience was immediately captivated by the sight of the blue-skinned woman with orange hair, and they all greeted her with praise and applause. "Sporting an elegant summer dress, this sheik blue and white design consists of a low-cut front and no back with a leather belt, accentuating a trim waistline with white, buckle down high heels and a golden chain necklace provided by Myrtle. This stunning number is ideal for hot nights on the town or a day out to the beach."

A storm of camera flashes and music lit up the catwalk as Zangya began strolling down it filled with pride and self-assurance, her heels clapping against the hardwood stage and echoing throughout the entire auditorium. It was a miracle she was able to stay on course what with all the lights blinding her way, but having obviously done this many times before, the Hera warrior knew exactly where to go and what to do.

 Appearing prim and proper, the woman with her orange hair done up into a bun marched to the end of the stage and posed with her hands on her hips. Rotating a couple of times in front of her spellbound audience, she then spotted Gohan and Videl sitting at the very front, both of whom were staring up at her with wide eyes and expressions filled with awe.

"Wow. She looks amazing," Videl murmured quietly.
Grinning, Gohan then gave his friend a thumbs-up, "Way to go, Zangya. You rock!"

Blushing at the teen's compliment and sparing the pair an enchanting yet subtle smile, the Hera then did an about face and marched back down the aisle. Under the flashes of the cameras, the clamor of the audience, and the voice of the main speaker in the background, Zangya made a couple more walks of the stage. Upon which she then returned to the back end and allowed the next line of models to follow.

It was one hell of a show. But little did Gohan and Videl know was that their little day out to the city to see their friend's stunning performance was about to be rudely interrupted…

OOO

(Elsewhere)

"Ahh… now this is what I call a bath," Paprika sighed, her body becoming completely immersed in the bubbling hot water of a spring she'd found in the northernmost region of Mount Paozu a few weeks ago. Concealed within a thick patch of forest at the base of a volcanic mountain, the Makyan had very little to fear from any peeping toms or eyes that happened to be wandering around in her area, as she allowed herself to become completely at ease in the steaming pond of water and herbs.

This pretty much meant that all of her clothes, her scarf, cowl and boots included, had been folded up and set aside for the time being; all of which were currently sitting a couple feet away from her.

"Man. I can't believe I never thought about doing this in the first place. After all those times I wasted taking a dip in the lake and the hot tub at home. This is way better."

All things considered, she could've just as easily taken a bath back at her place. But with such a nice day out, with the sun shining high above and the birds singing all around her, there was no way she was going to waste an opportunity like this cooped up indoors. She wanted to fill her lungs with fresh country air and allow her skin to absorb the incredible rays of light from the sun above.

This… right now… this was heaven.

"Maybe I can try moving my house up here. Claim this spot as my territory," Paprika thought, tilting her head as she glanced off to the side of the pool. "Might be a bit of hassle lugging that stone castle, but I think I can manage it." That was the beauty of Capsule Corp technology; you could always count on it to carry your extra heavy loads.

Running her hand up and down her silky smooth skin, the eighteen year old Makyan allowed another sigh to escape her lips as she felt the herbs of the natural spring work their magic. In that same instant, she felt all her woes and pains wash away with every second she spent in there. After dunking her head into the pool so that she became completely enveloped in the mixture, all sense of awareness and time soon left her as well.

Hell, she became so caught up in her moment of self-indulgence and bliss that she completely missed the blip of a familiar ki signature appearing on her radar.

As Paprika was lying back against the stone edge surrounding the pool and was in the process of closing her lids, a voice of a young boy spoke up, startling her out of her moment of peace and tranquility.

"Hey, Paprika!"

Eyes widening, the Makyan looked up to see the silhouette of a small dragon and a youngster riding atop of it float down from the sky above. When they descended to a low enough height, just several feet above the ground, the two figures revealed themselves to be none other than Goten and Icarus.

"I spent the last half hour looking for you, Paprika. Where have you been hiding this entire time? Oh, wow! Is that a hot spring? Awesome!" the child exclaimed happily. "How the heck did you manage to find one all the way out here?!"

While the sight of the dragon didn't bother Paprika in the slightest, it was the fact that the demi-Saiyan was with him that immediately caught the white haired demon's attention.

Looking down when she realized the boy could see her outline clearly through the water, the teenager blushed and crossed her legs. Upon which she then threw a glare up at her cheerful visitor, "Oi, you little pervert! Can't you see that I'm bathing here?"

"Yeah. I can see," the boy chirped, before tilting his head innocently in her direction, "Is the water nice?"

"Yes. It's nice. But that's not what I'm… ugh…" Paprika then gave an exasperated sigh and shot the child another glare, "Look… just… turn around, okay. I'm not exactly in the most decent of appearances right now."

"Huh? Decent of appearances? What does that mean… oooh," Goten murmured in realization before, leaning over Icarus's head, he whispered discreetly to her, "Are you nakey?"

Paprika sighed once again. "Yes, Goten. I am naked."

Thank goodness the kid was so innocent. Bless his heart.

Goten then nodded to his friend in understanding while Icarus gave a very bird-like chirp in response, "Okay, Paprika. I'll make sure to turn around when you get out." After all the interactions he'd had with girls in the past, the boy at least had an idea of when courtesy and manners in this regard were required. Obviously he possessed the common sense to know that it was bad being naked in front of people and would always point this out whenever a situation like this arose. However, like all other children his age, he still had a couple other things to learn about proper social etiquette.

Chief among which was what he said next.

"This hot spring is very big, Paprika. Can I join you?" Goten asked cheerfully, wanting to take a dip and try out the water for himself.

The Makyan, blinking a couple of times, then frowned up at the youngster, "Really? You want to jump into a pool of hot, boiling water in the middle of nowhere with a naked demon girl sitting right next to you?"

Staring at her quietly for several seconds, as if seriously analyzing her question, the spiky haired boy's face strained for a moment before he uttered the only answer he could come up with.

"Yes?"

Closing her eyes and smiling in amusement, the white haired fighter was about to offer a counter to the boy's answer, until a ding in her senses promptly disrupted her train of thought.

Gasping, Paprika leapt to her feet. Not caring that she was in the buff and dripping from head to toe, the shapely female fighter fixed her gaze squarely on the sky above her, at the exact same time Goten picked up the disturbance as well. The boy and his family's dragon spun towards the clouds with an exclamation of surprise and a narrowed gaze, the young Saiyan's expression becoming as bewildered and intense as his friend's.

"Whoa. What is that?" the hybrid asked in astonishment.

"I don't know," Paprika replied, a snarl escaping her lips shortly afterwards and beads of sweat starting to bleed out of her temple. "That power level is massive. What the hell is that?"

Whatever it was, it was big... and it was coming towards the planet.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

Many miles to the north, in a house surrounded by fields of wild flowers and long grass, a young couple was just waking to the start of a brand new day. Inside the wooden home, in a dining room filled with all the latest installments and baring a very contemporary design, an adult male with silky, shoulder-length black hair, sharp blue eyes, and wearing a short-sleeved black shirt, a long-sleeved white undershirt, blue jeans, boots, a brown trench coat and an orange bandana around his neck, could be seen sitting at the table eating from a bowl of oatmeal. Gripping the cup of coffee he had sitting beside him as well, the young adult took a quick sip of it before then turning his attention towards the kitchen counter.

It was there he saw a woman with dark brown skin, long brown hair tied into a bun, soft blue eyes, and wearing a blue kimono with cheery blossom flowers patterning it, walk towards the table with a plate of eggs and bacon for the both of them. Setting one down in front of him, she too took up a seat on the other side of the desk and beamed across at the young man with love and warmth reflected in her eyes.

Android 17 chuckled, "You're spoiling me, dear."

"Only because you're worth the trouble," the young girl replied with a cheeky smile. "You've got a long day of work ahead of you and I don't want you going hungry out there, so eat up."

"Sure. I wasn't planning on leaving behind a single crumb anyway," the raven haired male stated, quickly turning back to his oatmeal and stirring it. With only a little bit left, the young adult quickly got to work finishing it, while at the same time regarding the woman across from him with kindness and affection. "After all the effort you put into our food, Ami, there's no way I could possibly leave any of it untouched. Even though it's physically impossible, I'm pretty sure I would starve without having one of your special omelets every night."

"Well then, buster, you'd better give it your all out there in the park. Because if you don't, I might just have to send you to bed without any supper," Ami informed cheerfully, tilting her head at the young male. "Hopefully you'll have a good shift today and you won't have to deal with any troublesome poachers looking to make a quick zeni."

"Don't worry. I will," Seventeen replied with a nod, cutting one of the sunny-sides with the edge of his fork and plucking up some bacon with it. Popping it into his mouth and chewing, the android then stopped when a sudden thought crossed his mind and he set his utensils down.

His sudden actions and change in expression prompted his wife to look up at him in surprise, "What's wrong, honey?"
"I'm just wondering whether or not I should go out and see my sister," Android 17 spoke, staring down at the table for a few seconds before then looking back at the woman across from him. "I know she's been hanging out with Goku's group these past seven years, but I haven't even taken the time to set aside a day to go say hello to her. After all the crap we had to go through with Cell and everything, well... I think we've had more than enough time to relax and find out feet."

Ami tilted her head and gave her lover a sincere smile, "I knew it would take you a while to figure these things out. That was a really rough period for everyone... for you and your sister especially." She then reached forward and placed a hand on top of his, rubbing her thumb against his skin comfortingly. "Everyone needs a little bit of time out to heal and rejuvenate their senses after experiencing such terrible pain and hardship. Perhaps now you've finally come to terms with all that and you're ready to go out and face the world again."

Considering her words for a moment, Seventeen smiled, "These last seven years have been fun... and I've had plenty of time to experience a lot of things this life has to give me. I mean... I met you, didn't I?" Giving the young woman his most genuine smile, he then exhaled slowly and nodded his head in understanding. "I'll take you to visit them this weekend. I think it's high time you and I had a little family reunion."

The brown haired zoologist beamed brightly, "I'll be sure to pack my swimsuit."

While looking across at one another, basking in the peace and silence the moment brought to them, a sudden surge in Seventeen's head suddenly caused him to straighten up and look towards the ceiling. Rising out of his seat so quickly that he literally knocked it over, the android startled his wife when he fixed a terrified glare towards the roof of their building...

Only... it wasn't the roof that was the problem.

"Seventeen... what's wrong?"

Sweat breaking out on his face, the raven haired man clenched his fists tightly. "Something's coming."

He knew this much because his optical sensors were going haywire.

OOO

(Back in Satan City)

With the fashion show reaching its closing stages, Gohan and Videl remained planted in their seats as they watched the last of the models enter and exit the catwalk. In the past hour or so, the pair had seen Zangya come in and out of the backrooms many times wearing a couple of incredibly stunning dresses. Even though the woman was not from their planet, it was clear to both of them that she was absolutely breathtaking and wore those outfits like a goddess. This probably explained why she was given the spotlight at these events and was so popular with the community, and it was also why the main company she worked for valued her so much.

She was truly the highlight for that morning.

Now, with the main event over and done with, and the speaker announcing the final minutes of the show, the two Z-fighters in the crowd looked on as Zangya came down the catwalk one last time with a completely new look and accessory piece. Sporting a blue tube dress that accentuated her ever curve with a couple of bits cutout showing off her stomach and sides, high heels and diamond earrings for that finishing touch, the woman approached the end of the runway where the judges sat with pride and confidence reflected in her posture.

Her friends applauded her when she stopped at the end and posed for the cameras, head up and back straight. She looked so natural up there and a shooing for a spectacular finish.

However, just when the audience had finished giving her a standing ovation, a sharp pang struck Gohan, Videl and Zangya, startling the three of them and causing the group to direct all of their attention towards the ceiling. At first the judges and the audience thought nothing of it, believing the orange haired woman was merely posing for the media.

But when Gohan and Videl shot out of their seats and nearly knocked their chairs over, the front rows of the auditorium started to stir.

A bead of sweat breaking out on her face, the raven haired fighter gasped, "G-Gohan… do you…?"

Gulping, the half-Saiyan nodded to her half-asked question, "Yes." His gaze then shot towards the alien standing on the catwalk in front of him. "Zangya?"

"I sense it too," the Hera replied quickly, her own face reflecting her bewilderment and fear as she focused all of her senses on whatever the hell had just entered her radar. "Damn. I haven't sensed so much energy in one place before. What the heck is that?"

OOO

(Outside Central City)

Several kilometers out of earth's capital, in the middle of a wide open desert with enormous radar and telescopic dishes dotting the landscape, an enormous military installation was currently on full alert. Alarms blazing and soldiers rushing about from building to building, gathering equipment and readying their jets for combat, it almost looked as though they were preparing for an invasion.

Though there wasn't an enemy in sight or a country near their position, the commanders of the base were still directing their forces as they had been instructed to, and were making one hell of a show of it.

Amidst the chaos on the grounds and the noise of aircraft being prepared for launch, inside the main tower on ground zero, preparations for an attack were currently underway. Surrounding a massive holographic projector in the middle of a dark war room, a collection of officers and officials could be seen gathered around the center table, while a platoon of airmen and staff were working diligently at the computers and monitors making up the rest of the chamber.

It was an impressive setup and it had to be. After all the trouble they'd encountered in the past seven years involving extraterrestrial objects heading towards their planet, this one had to be their biggest problem yet.

Staring up at the three-dimensional projection of the earth and moon, a dark-skinned man in a blue uniform with five stars on his decorated uniform narrowed his eyes, "How far is it?"

"It's not far now, sir," an officer operating the main computer answered as he typed in a new set of numbers, allowing the hologram of the planet to zoom in on the object heading towards them. "It hooked past the moon's orbit not too long ago and should be entering satellite space in the next ten minutes."

"Whatever it is, it's moving faster than any meteorite we've ever recorded," the Colonel, an anthropomorphic fox in a similarly colored uniform standing beside the general spoke with a troubled expression on his face. "We've shot down a lot of space debris in the past year, but all of those objects came straight out of our area. This one came from another system entirely."

Making a murmuring sound of unease, the General of the Army turned towards the monitor staff surrounding him with a frown, "What exactly are we dealing with here? What kind of rock is it?"

"It's just as you heard over the transmissions, sir," a woman working over at another computer said as she jacked up the screen. The hologram then switched over from a picture of the earth to the picture of the object in question. "It's a Class 6 rogue meteorite, which we began tracking ever since it left the Mizar star system a few days ago. The object is roughly seven kilometers in diameter, that's around the size of a small village, and is currently clocking speeds over Mach 7. We calculate its impact should be in the next half hour around the west coast, fifty kilometers outside of West City."

Sweating nervously, the general got a good look at the extraterrestrial entity that had entered their midst. On first glance it certainly looked like a space rock from another world, for sure. But tracing its uneven, oval-like shape, it almost resembled a spacecraft or a casket with the outline of a person. Though the details on it were sketchy, it certainly did have that UFO appeal to it.

Upon inspecting it more carefully, the thing also had a pair of ribbon like appendages attached to its sides that were wiggling around like tentacles on a squid, which didn't seem like something an ordinary comet would possess. However, trusting the advice of his astronomical staff, the general immediately went with the first course of action he could think of and turned to look across at another one of the analysts nearby.

"What kind of damage can we expect from this thing making landfall?"

"Honestly, sir?" the airman in the glasses sitting next to the monitor spoke while turning towards the staff in the center of the room. "If this object should breach our atmosphere and hit the earth, it will cause an explosion a million times greater than our most powerful thermonuclear bomb. Everything within a hundred kilometers of it will be incinerated and the shockwave will be so powerful, there won't be a single building left standing anywhere. That's only in the first few minutes of impact."

Hearing all that he needed to, General Rin turned back to the hologram and narrowed his eyes, "Then we have no choice." He then pointed towards the men and women working at the various computers and monitors. "Contact the ground crews of Stations two, four and seven. Have them ready the surface-to-orbit cannons and fire on my command."

"Yes, sir!" Upon registering to the commander's orders, the staff immediately began running around and making contact with the people they needed to. All at once, the commotion inside of the room increased several times over, letting the officers in charge know that preparations for a counter attack were well and truly underway.

The hologram quickly switched from the object to the valleys and deserts outside of the base. Past the radar stations, General Rin and his staff of officers saw three enormous cannons of futuristic design appear in the hologram, rotate on the spot and then point towards the sky. From their posts, they watched the men on the ground get inside and begin setting up the weapons, the numbers jumping up onto the screen flickering through at an insane speed and logging in the coordinates of the objects.

In a matter of moments, the readings reached a hundred percent and the men working the radios of the large guns reported in. With the chatter reaching its climax, the men at the monitors turned to inform their superiors of their progress.
"All three Capsule Corp MAC V-150 Planetary cannons are online sir!"

"Lieutenant Spears of Station two reports they are ready to fire!"

"Station four is primed and ready!"

"Station seven has locked onto the target and is fully charged, sir!"

"All stations are waiting for your go sign."

Silence immediately fell in the room as all eyes turned towards the general. With the hologram breaking up and showing a view of the planet and the object fast-approaching it, everyone was given a full and unobstructed view of the events to come. Thanks to the eyes on the ground and the cameras provided by the satellites currently in orbit, the military was all set to witness and document the results.

Considering his options for several more seconds, General Rin soon reached his decision and exhaled sharply. Upon which he then directed his gaze to his staff and nodded. "Do it."

Receiving his order loud and clear, the same woman by the monitor placed her finger to her headset and looked towards the screen. There, she had a clear view of all guns locked and pointing towards the sky. "Stand by firing crews… on my mark…” She waited for several seconds. Then, when the green light appeared on her monitor, she nodded. "FIRE!"

A split second later, the staff in the room watched as the three cannons on the hologram lit up and began firing powerful blasts of energy straight up into the sky, each round glowing a hot gold and traveling faster than any other projectile they had.

This was it…

OOO

High up above the planet, the highly compressed spheres of energy fired by all three cannons shot through the atmosphere at breakneck speeds and effortlessly entered the thermosphere. Continuing on at full speed beyond the planet's orbit, the barrage homed in on their target, which could be seen approaching the terra as a shadowy mass in the distance.

The fast-moving rounds capable of disintegrating rock lit up the meteorite they were aimed for like a flashlight. However, the instant the first barrage impacted the object, something unexpected took place.

In the past, the military had been a hundred percent successful in shooting down meteorites that came within range of their planet. A single shot from one of the cannons had been more than capable of wiping out an entire asteroid two kilometers wide in one go, turning it into harmless granite and space dust that burnt up in the planet's atmosphere. With so much power compressed into a single ball of energy, three shots seemed like a little bit overkill for only a single target.

But as soon as the blasts impacted the object after only a few seconds of travel, not only did they fail in slowing it down, but all three rounds bounced off of it like they were beach balls. The second and third waves to follow had the exact same effect, the energy projectiles detonating harmlessly against the object's surface or ricocheting off of it and flying off to fade away into space.

As soon as the barrage ended, it was as if nothing had happened, and the meteorite continued on course…
"What?!" the fox Colonel shouted in disbelief.

"The photon cannons didn't work!" another general standing off to the side spoke up in astonishment. "How? They were right on the mark!"

As soon as the people in the room saw the barrage fired by the cannons fail in even chipping the meteor, a nervous clamor started up. Questions and exclamations flying this way and that, the airmen and staff began trying to figure out a solution to the problem at hand. Groups started getting together to figure out whether the timing was off and others began checking to see if their surface-to-orbital cannons were malfunctioning. But no matter where they looked, all everyone was able to come up with were blanks and dead ends.

After considering the hologram for several tense minutes, the Colonel with the frustrated expression turned back to his superior, "What do we do now?"

Clenching his fists at the sight of the meteor continuing to head towards their planet, General Rin made a thoughtful grunting noise before once again turning towards his anxious adjutants. "Order all stations to lock onto target and open fire. Ready the U2 missiles and M3 Halos to intercept the target, and have all naval and army units in the region surrounding West City on standby."

Receiving a nod from the Colonel, the commander then watched him move off to complete his task.

When the chatter in the room started up again and all workmen began getting into contact with the people they were instructed to, the general then turned to the sergeant standing next to him and frowned, "Get me Bulma Briefs on the line…"

(OO0)

(Sometime later)

Needless to say, the commotion brought on by the meteorite heading towards the planet immediately kick started all of the Z-fighters into action. It was a good thing that they did too.

As soon as the members of the group started to move, word of the meteorite heading towards the planet got out through the media and alerted the public to the incoming danger. Much like the time of Lord Slug's arrival, the people of earth almost instantly descended into a panic. Riots broke out on the street, businesses closed down, and people started scrambling for the outskirts wanting to put as much distance as they could between themselves and civilization. Rule of thumb was that whenever an approaching disaster like this ever took place, the cities and the great landmarks of whatever nation they were associated with were targeted first.

At least that was what happened in the movies.

In here though, it was an immediate red light. Everyone started heading out of town and into the country to hide. But considering the size of the object heading towards them and the information they were able to get from the news, the damage this thing would have to the planet would be catastrophic.

It was an extinction level threat. That was how bad it was.

The signature on the object heading towards the earth was so big and so noticeable that it was almost impossible for any of the members of the group to miss it. Heck, even Android 18 picked up on the problem and she was usually impartial to these sorts of things. If it had her worried, then it had everybody else worried too. So upon sensing whatever it was that was heading towards the planet, Gohan, Krillin, Yamcha, and everybody else quickly flew over to Bulma's to get an accurate bead on the situation. When she informed them that her father had spotted a large asteroid of some sorts heading towards earth and that the military had also contacted her asking for a solution, she quickly turned to the people she knew she could count on most and instructed them to take action.

Being three of the first on the scene and the most willing to participate in a first strike on the meteor, Gohan, Zangya and Videl immediately took off. Still dressed in the clothes that they'd worn in the morning due to the massive hurry they'd been in to get to West City, the trio quickly flew across country and into the upper atmosphere. As soon as they broke through the white cloud cover drifting over the continent, they powered down and suspended themselves in the cold, windy milieu that was the upper stratosphere, glaring up into the cosmos they could see twinkling beyond their planet.

It was a familiar sight to all three of them, especially Gohan.

"So the plan here is the same as the one your dad and Krillin used before," Videl said, looking across at the half-Saiyan floating alongside her for confirmation. "We're going to fire a combined blast up at the meteorite and destroy it before it has a chance to hit the planet?"

"Yeah," Gohan nodded, fixing his gaze squarely on the blackness of earth's thermosphere. "By my count, a combined attack from all three of us should be more than enough to wipe this thing out for good. Any debris left over from the resulting explosion will simply scatter across the planet's surface and burn up in the mesosphere."

Nodding in understanding, the raven haired girl also turned her attention back to the celestial plain, "That sounds like a solid plan."

"Make sure you guys don't hold anything back, okay," Gohan said, taking a stance in midair and beginning to gather energy. "We'll either disintegrate it in one go or forcibly change its course. In all honesty, I'd prefer the first thing happening as opposed to the second thing. If we let this meteorite fly off in some random direction, there's a good chance it might end up hitting another planet with innocent people on it. That's something I wouldn't be able to live with."

"We'd better get it right on the first shot then," Zangya spoke up, before feeling a cool gust of wind rush past her, causing her to curl up and shiver. Crossing her arms over her chest, the woman vigorously massaged her shoulders. "Damn. I should have brought a jumper with me. It's cold as tits up here." That's what she got for wearing summer clothing in near sub zero temperatures.

Gohan smiled back at her in response to her remark, "Well at least you look amazing. That's the important thing."

Staring back at the teen in the center for several seconds, the orange haired woman smirked, "Hey, spike… have you ever had your ass kicked by someone wearing high heels?"

"I don't recall, no," the demi-Saiyan replied with a sly grin.

Shaking her head at the pair, Videl took a stance of her own and directed her attention back towards the solar system above, "Could you two hens stop clucking for a couple of seconds so that we can deal with the problem?"

"Right. Right. Sorry," Gohan apologized, tensing up and allowing his golden aura to explode off of him as he transformed straight into Super Saiyan. "Alright. Let's get this done." As soon as he made the jump, both Zangya and Videl followed suit and powered up as well, green and white energy cloaks shrouding the two fighters respectively. All three of them then floated side by side, glowing brightly like candles against the backdrop of the mesosphere above and the planet earth far below.

It was while they were in the process of gathering energy for their combined attacks that the trio suddenly had their gazes drawn elsewhere when they saw eight large missiles rocket out of the clouds, pass through the atmosphere, and shoot up into space. Looking on for several seconds out of curiosity, the super powered fighters then flinched in surprise when simultaneous flashes of blinding light filled the sky, followed instantly by several enormous, fiery explosions. They didn't even bother to shield themselves with their hands when the thermonuclear warheads all detonated against the approaching meteorite at once, choosing to instead observe from behind their auras as the miniature super nova went off before slowly fading away into nothing.

While the shockwave was incredible and ruffled the trio's clothing when it hit them, it pretty much did nothing to wipe the expressions of seriousness from the group's faces.

Despite the awesome display of raw, destructive power, the attack by the military did nothing as Gohan and his friends could still sense the meteorite on fast approach.

"There's your nation's tax dollars hard at work," Videl commented, earning nods of agreement from her teammates. Breathing a heavy sigh, the girl then cupped her hands beside her and powered up even more. "Come on. Let's show these guys how it's really done."

"I'm with you, girl," Zangya replied, also taking a similar stance.

The pair's actions were mimicked by Gohan and in a matter of moments, all three of them were primed and ready to fire.

OOO

Back on the ground at Capsule Corp, standing on one of the structure's many balconies, Bulma, Doctor Briefs and Trunks were currently gathered together at the railing and staring up at the sky nervously. After witnessing the failed attack mounted by the King's military's attempt to shoot down the enormous meteorite, the group was then left waiting to see how Gohan and his companions would fair. Considering that all three of them were more than capable of wiping out a planet with a single blast, there was no way they could fail against a seven kilometer hunk of rock.

With the clouds drifting by overhead and the winds whipping wildly at the countryside, the stage was all set for the most awesome lightshow the planet had ever seen. The barrage from the ground-to-orbit cannons and the missile attacks from the planet's defense forces was simply the opening segment. Now it was time to get to the main act, and it was sure to be a blast.

"Hold on tight guys. This is it," Bulma spoke up, taking her son by the shoulders and making sure he was secure. Considering he was a thousand times stronger than her though it seemed like a practice in futility. But this was mostly for her benefit than anything else.

Blinking a couple of times in worry, Trunks then looked across at his grandfather, who he could see was standing there with an unchanging expression on his face. "Will they be able to destroy that meteorite, grandpa? The army tried to… but it didn't work."

The man with the glasses and mustache smiled back at him, "I'm sure those three will be able to handle it. Don't worry."
As they went back to watching, up on the dome building's rooftop overlooking the city, Piccolo, Krillin and Android 18 could be seen standing there with their arms folded, feet planted, and eyes glaring up into the sky above. They weren't just there for observations sake. In the unlikely event that Gohan, Zangya and Videl's attempt to shoot down the asteroid failed, then they were there to pick up the pieces and finish it off.

However, since the defense was being spearheaded by earth's most powerful fighter and a Super Hera, in all good conscience they didn't really have anything to worry about.

Krillin, having grown a head of hair over the last few months that was trimmed and cut stylishly, and sporting the turtle hermit's signature orange and blue gi, glanced across at his wife nervously, "Are you sure Marron is going to be okay?"

The blonde android nodded, "She's with Launch and Turtle back at Kame House. She'll be fine."

"Good," the man nodded, exhaling in relief and narrowing his eyes on the clouds drifting high above. "Man... the last time something like this happened me and Goku were knocked out and sent crash landing on the other side of the planet. But that was a long time ago."

Piccolo frowned, "Don't worry. The kids can handle this. You can count on it."

With the wind picking up speed in response to the object nearing the planet's surface, the Z-fighters knew things were about to get hairy.

Up in the sky, the dynamic trio watched as a couple more missiles were launched from the planet's surface to intercept the meteorite. Just like before, the explosions had very little to no effect in changing the object's speed or course, and the massive intergalactic object blew through the detonating warheads like they were nothing. After the fiery blasts from the missiles going off receded, the trio floating above the clouds then watched the asteroid enter the thermosphere and fall within their firing range. Even though they could have hit the target from much further away, Gohan, Zangya and Videl wanted to make absolutely certain that they got all of it and that there wouldn't be any big chunks left over from the resulting strike.

The army had had their shot at trying to take it out. With the meteorite sitting squarely in their crosshairs, now it was their turn.

Blue spheres of energy forming between their palms, the three heroes finished charging and, taking aim, launched their attacks in one mighty bellow.

"Ka-me-ha-me-HAAAAAAA!" Crying out at the exact same time, the trio of fighters threw their hands forward and unleashed their blasts. Enormous beams of blue energy exploded from their hands and rocketed towards the comet at full speed, effortlessly passing the mesosphere and bearing down on the meteor like three celestial lances.

On their own, each of their blasts was more than capable of reducing an entire planet to a cloud of dust. But as their attacks traveled towards the approaching asteroid, they began to spin around each other and, converging on the center, melded together in midflight. The three blasts fused into one attack, forming a large comet-like mass of energy roughly the same size as their target, ready to intercept the extraterrestrial object and disintegrate it in a single blow.

The meteorite had no idea what was coming, its entire front lighting up under the glare of the approaching missile of ki.
Confident in their combined assault, the three watched on as their attack came within striking distance of the entity in a matter of seconds. But just when it seemed like they were about to watch the meteorite fracture and detonate in a glorious blue ball of fire above the earth's surface, they suddenly felt an enormous surge of energy. A split second later, just when their attacks were moments away from incinerating their target, the Kamehameha wave unexpectedly smacked against an invisible force field several yards away in front of the meteor and was effortlessly dissipated like a splash of water against a rock.

Upon seeing their attack fail, Gohan, Zangya and Videl's eyes widened in horror.

"WHAT?! OH NO!" the demi-Saiyan shouted. Even his Hera teammate couldn't believe what'd just happened.

"Oh, you've gotta be KIDDING ME!" Zangya yelled, mouth agape and sweat appearing on her face.

The meteorite breached the mesosphere in a matter of seconds and shot towards them at an unbelievable speed, generating a powerful gust of wind that struck the three fighters and nearly knocked them out of orbit.

It was at this point the trio saw exactly what they were up against.

As soon as the asteroid fell within sight, the group saw the very front of it unwrap itself and the face of an enormous alien emerge from the protective layer that was guarding it. The rocky camouflage it wore over it unfurled in mid-fall, revealing a fleshy, arthropod-like body over which a dark green cowl of prehensile ribbons was draped, two lengths of which were undulating on either side of it like elastic arms or tentacles. The cowl was folded up over it, giving it a mummy-like appearance, with no arms or legs to speak of. Its face however was the most striking, resembling a smooth white skull of an animal wedged into a thick collar with no neck and a flat beak-like jaw, and large, black, hollow eyes. The face resembled the Scream mask, only this one had a more defined shape and was far more menacing.

The entire seven kilometer wide creature looked like a monster from their worst nightmares.

The giant entity barreled towards the three at a fantastic momentum, its two ribbon-like appendages waving beside it. As soon as its shadow was on top of them, its black eyes suddenly flashed bright red and, with a deafening, owl-like screech, it unleashed a powerful shockwave that rocketed towards the three and hit them with the force of a thousand cyclone crosswinds traveling with a force capable of splitting a country in half.

"GOHAN!" Videl screamed, before the three of them were suddenly ripped out of the sky and sent hurling out of orbit.

The three warriors cried out in terror as they were sent tumbling around the enormous alien as it blew past them. In a matter of moments, Gohan was knocked out of Super Saiyan form and all of them were sent bouncing across the alien's back before being thrown thousands of miles across the planet's surface. With the winds smacking them this way and that like a hundred kiai blasts hitting them all at once, which sent the trio into a terrifying spin, the three fighters were unconscious before their bodies even hit cloud cover. Several seconds later, after a harrowing descent out of the upper stratosphere, the team of warriors was gone, disappearing to land in parts unknown.

Dispatching the three earthlings with ease, the titan of a creature, easily dwarving the planet's largest mountain, then turned its attention towards the earth and the population far below…
(TO BE CONTINUED)
After watching and sensing the 'meteorite' or whatever the hell it was shake off three fully charged energy blasts capable of wiping out the earth several times over, Piccolo, Krillin and Android 18 could only stand there and gawk as the creature made its final descent through the atmosphere. Breaking through the cloud cover at a casual pace in the form of a raging fireball, the colossal extra terrestrial slowed as its silhouette came within sight of West City.

With its ribbon like arms waving around it like a phantom in flight, the creature started bearing down on the hapless planet at its own leisure.

Due to the shocking turn of events, the Z-fighters weren't exactly in the right state of mind to respond to the issue right off the bat.

"D-Did you see that?" Krillin stammered out, eyes almost bugging out of their sockets as he stared up at the beast heading towards the country. "That thing cut through Gohan and Zangya like they were speed bumps!"

"They didn't even scratch it," Android 18 murmured, unable to believe what she'd just witnessed either.

Staring slack-jawed at the gargantuan alien for several tense seconds, Piccolo was then shaken out of his trance when he came to the full realization of their situation and the danger this new enemy presented. Tuning into the correct frequency, the Namekian fighter then linked up with all of the other Z-fighters scattered across their part of the country. He then made a connection with the guardian of earth; someone he knew was watching the situation closely from afar and could give him a more accurate report on the situation.

The warrior in the turban and cape gritted his teeth nervously, as if expecting the worse. "Talk to me, Dende. What happened? Are the three of them okay?"

"Don't worry, Piccolo. Gohan, Zangya and Videl are alright. They're just knocked out," the young overseer of the planet replied immediately as he plugged himself into the state of affairs, which seemed to be growing direr with every second that passed. "They crash landed on a farm somewhere in the southern parts of the continent. I had Korin send Yajirobe to go find them as soon as they hit the ground."

The three fighters relaxing at the news, Piccolo then nodded his head in relief, "Good. Tell him to make it fast. We're going to need those three back here as soon as possible." After everything he'd seen so far, they were going to need all the help they could get. "Damn it. And I thought this day couldn't get any worse."

While the three of them were still telepathically linked with the guardian of the planet, a couple more frantic voices suddenly sprang up over the airways. Moments following the quick banter between the two Namekians, the panicked voice of the human fighter Yamcha spoke up. Needless to say, while everybody else had been able to maintain their cool for the most part, the scar-faced human fighter was, in a few words, spazzing out.

"Can we all focus on the current problem here? What the hell is that thing?!" the man shouted, causing the group to wince at the volume of his voice.

If Dende was with them, they would have seen the young guardian clench his jaw nervously. "I have no idea. But it's big." Really big. The thing was pretty much a fifth the size of West City and its two ribbon-like arms stretched to about ten kilometers in length.

Big… didn't quite cover it.

Android 18's expression became somewhat deadpanned at the Namekian's words. "That's pretty perceptive for a guy watching from on top of a floating castle. Now how do we kill it?!"

The blonde's question had Piccolo's fists clench tightly, "I'm not sure we can."

Krillin looked across at the green fighter in alarm, "WHAT?! Seriously? C-Come on man… there… there has to be some way we can bring that thing down!" Considering it was able to shake off a combined shot from both a Super Saiyan and a Super Hera, there didn't seem to be much that the any of the other Z-fighters could do. "Hell, I'll take a slim chance at this point." In all honesty, they were just flies compared to whatever this outer space monstrosity was.

With Vegeta having flown off to parts unknown for some secret training, the group didn't have any more heavy hitters left to tackle this thing. The only two that even had a snowball's chance in hell of defeating it had been knocked out of commission in the opening assault and they'd nearly been at full power.

At least they had the mighty Piccolo on their side. That had to count for something, right?

"Well… we're not going to find out anything by just standing here." Upon speaking his part, the Namekian slowly levitated off of the roof and took off at full speed, heading in the direction the creature was going to land several kilometers away. "Come on."

Following suit, Android 18 chased after the Namekian, with Krillin accompanying her. The trio blasted over the enormous metropolis and towards the horizon, leaving Bulma, Trunks and Doctor Briefs watching nervously from the balcony.

Upon seeing the warriors take flight, Trunks, taking on a serious look, turned heel and rushed back indoors. Not even bothering to ask where her son was going, the president of the corporation narrowed her eyes and turned towards her father. "We need to help them. I'm heading down to the garage to get the accelerator cannon online."

Catching on to what his daughter was aiming for, the man with the square-rimmed glasses and the black cat seated upon his shoulder nodded in understanding. "You need someone to manually reroute the power from the city terminals. I'm coming with you."

Acknowledging her parent's words, Bulma then turned heel and dashed into the building with Doctor Briefs right behind her…

OOO

(Minutes later)

On the coastline many miles outside of West City, the King's armies had amassed on the water and across the countryside surrounding the area the meteorite had initially been expected to make landfall. All of them had been assembled there as a final deterrent; a last resort should the main assault from the planet's surface-to-orbit defense cannons and missiles fail to destroy it. Upon witnessing both forms of weaponry unsuccessfully destroy the object and seeing the asteroid finally enter their atmosphere, the forces on the ground and water were quickly kick started into action.

It was only the sight of the asteroid unfurling and revealing to be an enormous, intergalactic monster that gave the officers in charge of the armies a few moments of pause.

The crews onboard the fleet of battleships, destroyers and aircraft carriers on the water could be seen gawking up at the sky as they watched the gigantic creature descend towards them, its shadow growing closer and closer with every minute that passed.

When the admiral onboard the main carrier finally shook herself out of her stupor, she spun around and pointed towards her radio operators. "Battle stations! Order all ships to fire on the extra terrestrial with everything they have! Now!"

The officers and naval personnel onboard the bridge quickly threw themselves into action.

"All personnel! Man your battle stations! Repeat! Man your battle stations! General quarters!
General quarters!" the officer at the radio shouted, seconds before the entire ship lit up with the familiar blare of the warning siren, signaling the vessel was preparing for combat.

The men at the helm went about moving the vessel into optimal position for engagement and the radiomen went about contacting the neighboring vessels with the admiral's orders. Now that everyone on that level was on full alert and going about their duties at a frantic pace, the highly decorated captain then spun around and pointed towards the airmen nearby.

"Alert all stations. Have all carriers in the area ready their aircraft for launch and prepare to intercept the target! I want our planes up in the air ten minutes ago!"

"Yes, ma'am," the lieutenant replied and quickly jumped to the nearest monitor, where he instructed the operator to get him in touch with the men on deck.

Within seconds of issuing her orders, the admiral watched all battleships and destroyers in the area rotate their guns and point them towards the approaching extra terrestrial. As soon as all vessels were locked onto the target, a chorus of deafening explosions rang out as every single battery and cannon opened fire on the meteorite. Flashes of gunpowder went off as all of the big guns floating on the water unleashed their ordinance upon the gigantic creature, the lead projectiles hurtling through the air at terrific speeds in the form of hundreds of golden spheres of light.

As soon as the ships started lobbing cannon shells into the sky, the creature became engulfed in a storm of miniature explosions. At first it seemed like the first wave of attacks would rip through the creature and take it out for good. But as the battleships continued pouring everything they had onto the approaching demon from outer space, every one of their projectiles either bounced off of the creature's hide or detonated just feet away from it against the invisible force field it was producing.

Adding to the bombardment of artillery fire from the massive guns, the frigates, destroyers and battleships also began firing missiles up at the creature. The rockets blasted from the decks of the ships and arced through the air leaving trails of white smoke, joining the barrage of shells tearing towards the beast and smacking against its barrier. But in spite of the terrifying display of military power, the navy's attempts to ward off the creature or destroy it were effectively neutralized.
To the titan, the onslaught of landscape reducing artillery and rocket fire was like a cool, refreshing breeze against its skin.

Continuing its descent under the most impressive display of firepower ever mounted by man, the creature gave a quiet shriek as it passed through more cloud cover at a crawling pace and set its sights on the coastline nearby.

While the vessels proceeded to pepper the gigantic creature with more flak from their big guns, over on one of the Yamato-class battleships, the officers on the deck got quite a surprise when they suddenly saw a figure descend from the sky and land on one of their forward guns. In spite of the deafening sounds and shockwaves being produced by the cannons all around him, the raven haired figure in the brown trench coat simply stood there with his hands in his pockets and a smile on his face.

"So… this is the big, bad monster that's causing all the trouble out here," Android 17 exclaimed, ignoring the massive cannons in front of him going off as they lobbed yet another three shells up at their target. "Heh. It kind of reminds me of the squid Ami made me for dinner a couple of weeks ago, except this one is a little bit more alive than the one she had." Rolling up his sleeves, the man then set himself into a fighting stance. "Looks like you fellas could use a little bit of help." Without needing to be told, the man held both hands forward and unleashed two golden blasts up at the creature.

At first he figured it was going to do something. Perhaps even change its course. But when he saw his attacks explode uselessly against its invisible force field, the raven haired man blinked in surprise before his expression became deathly serious.

"O-kay. This might be a problem," he murmured, moments before opening up with a continuous barrage of ki blasts. With his palms fully opened up, Seventeen began firing blast after blast up at the giant alien, hoping that with his added firepower he would be able to break through its shield.

While Android 17 joined forces with the navy in their counterattack, over on the shoreline, scattering across the valley, the other Z-fighters finally arrived at the scene. With Piccolo securing the high ground on top of a nearby mountain, Yamcha taking to the fields, and Krillin and Eighteen dropping down on the white sands of the coast, the four of them took aim at the creature and charged their attacks.

"Alright guys. Let's dust this bitch!" Yamcha shouted a split second before he began unleashing a storm of countless golden blasts from his hands.

From all across the countryside, the warriors began lobbing continuous streams of ki attacks at the incoming giant, their barrage of blasts joining the artillery bombardment from the navy. Their support intensified the battering and multiplied the firework display already being unleashed upon the creature. Initially the group thought their attacks would be able to chase off the creature and perhaps burst through the invisible bubble surrounding it. But after seeing what it'd done to both Gohan and Zangya, the four of them weren't hoping for much.

They kept up the pressure, firing shot after shot in an effort to break through their target's barrier. Their combined efforts filled the air surrounding the extra terrestrial with blinding flashes of fire and energy; a display almost reminiscent of a Michael Bay wet dream.

But just when it seemed like their assault was about to push the creature back, the entire group of fighters and the navy were caught completely off guard when the invisible force field in front of the creature suddenly transformed into a hexagon-shaped pane of energy with a translucent surface. This transparent, glass-like barrier defended the entire creature's front from the bombardment before suddenly pushing forward, extending a full kilometer in front of the alien with a hundred smaller panels pushing the main one from behind. The barrier's range was extensive, stopping the onslaught of ki blasts and cannon fire two kilometers from their intended target.

The appearance of the barrier had all of the Z-fighters stop their attacks.

"W-What the hell?" Yamcha shouted.

Piccolo, sensing exactly how thick the barrier was, gritted his teeth in frustration before making contact with the others via telepathy. "Regular blasts won't work on this thing! Its shield is too strong!"

This news had Krillin curse inwardly, "Great! Now what are we supposed to do? Even with all of us attacking at once, we can't even put a dent in that thing!"

Narrowing his eyes on the creature as it descended the last hundred meters between it and the fleet in the water, the Namekian warrior spoke up again, "This creature is obviously defending itself using a very powerful force field, the same one it used to shake off Gohan, Zangya and Videl's attack from before. It's not a normal energy barrier either. Somehow this creature is creating its own form of magnetosphere, allowing it to deflect and neutralize all forms of attack."

That wasn't even the half of it either. Not only did the shield appear to be multi-layered, but the barrier surrounding the creature was so powerful that it was causing the light itself to distort around it, which was why they were able to see the field as it deflected their attacks from the front. By compressing the energy to a single point, the once invisible force field protecting it actually took on shape and form.

This immediately gave the Z-fighters a new problem to overcome.

"If we're going to pierce through that shield, we're going to have to hit it using concentrated power shots. Focus all of your energy to a single point and drive it in," Piccolo instructed, removing his cape and turban, and tossing them aside. Upon liberating himself of the extra weight, the Namekian cracked his neck and glared up at the titan of an invader. "That ought to shake it up a little."

The human fighters were immediately skeptical.

"If you haven't noticed, Piccolo, that thing just walked through a Super Saiyan and a Super Demon like they weren't even there," Yamcha spoke up from his end of the line, looking completely doubtful at his chances in this battle. "What could all of us hope to accomplish if the two strongest fighters on this planet couldn't?"

"Look. The best we can do is bide time and distract this thing until Gohan and Zangya get back. So why don't you quit your bellyaching for a couple of minutes, put on your big-boy pants and get your head in the damn game!" the green warrior shouted back, causing the man on the receiving end to wince.

Huffing irritably, the black haired baseball star grumbled, "A little 'please' would be nice."

"What was that?"

Hearing the Namekian's grunt at the end put the human fighter at ease, whereas Krillin and Eighteen merely gave the man's comments a deadpanned look. Obviously all of them were still in telepathic contact with each other, which pretty much meant that they heard every frustrated word being spoken by both the former guardian of the planet and the sports super star.

At least now that order had been restored to their ranks they could actually do something about their current problem.

By the time the Z-fighters had finished organizing themselves, the alien finally touched down on the planet's surface. Dropping straight down into the water right inside the formation of battleships and aircraft carriers, the creature caused a massive ripple on impact that pushed the ships back in the form of a tsunami. Their arrangement broken, the vessels continued firing up at the behemoth despite the added turbulence. The sailors had to hold on tight as every single ship was rocked from side to side by the drastically shifting tidal forces holding them up.

Even Android 17 was knocked off balance, the raven haired fighter disengaging from his assault as soon as the alien dropped into the ocean.

"Damn it. This isn't working. None of my attacks are even getting to it," the artificial fighter muttered, quickly taking flight just as another barrage of cannon fire peppered the creature from all sides. "I have to come up with something else."

While the fleet broke up and jets started taking to the air to further engage the creature, the armies stationed on the land began their assault as well.

Lining up along the beach, columns of M1 Abrams, FV4034 Challenger 2s, AS-90s, M270 MLRSs, LAV 25s, M6 Linebackers and all other manner of armored vehicles loaded their guns and took aim at the creature. Along with swaths of soldiers, mobile artillery, and weapon mounted trucks and jeeps, the military locked all sights on the colossal kaiju and opened fire.

Gun and artillery fire rang out across the country as a barrage of shells and rockets were lobbed towards the alien. However, the instant the first wave of rounds impacted against the creature's shield, they either exploded or bounced harmlessly off of the invader, inflicting no damage to its hide whatsoever.

However, the military was undeterred, and the soldiers continued firing upon it. Anti-aircraft batteries rang out, countless rockets were launched from their launchers, and the tanks blasted away at the creature like there was no tomorrow.

While the navy pulled back and continued to fire on the now grounded creature, which was wallowing in the ocean like it was treading in shallow water, a couple miles inland, other military vehicles were lining up to join the assault.

Having held themselves back at a safe distance, armored tanks and trucks towing enormous missiles aimed their payloads towards the horizon and launched them. With the sound of thrusters roaring across the forests, the enormous missiles were hurled from their stations and sent arcing into the sky towards the creature. Adding to the deafening assault from the army along the coastline, the King's military prayed that this onslaught would at least do something to damage the creature.

Spotting the hundreds of missiles converging on its position from behind the blasts of artillery shells exploding against its shield, the giant alien growled. Its eyes glowing red, the Z-fighters and the attacking military looked on in bewilderment when the beast suddenly produced a glowing purple ball of energy from its forehead, which then hovered into the air above it.
Seeing the sphere pulse and zap as it was charged, Piccolo’s eyes suddenly widened in alarm and he immediately dove off of the mountain. "SHIT! GET DOWN!" He shouted both verbally and via his telepathy, an instruction the scattered Krillin, Android 18 and Yamcha willingly followed.

It was a good thing they did because the second the small sphere of energy above the alien was fully charged, a thin beam of purple energy was fired from it and sent straight towards the very end of the formation of missiles coming in at low altitude. Once the beam was fully extended, it then spun around in a full 360 degree of motion in less than three seconds, cutting straight through the approaching missiles. The instant it faded, not only did every single rocket detonate in the order the beam had struck them down, but the attack also sliced the tops off of every single mountain within a hundred kilometer radius of the creature, including the one Piccolo had been standing on.

Needless to say, the alien had given the planet its first real haircut in spectacular fashion.

Android 17, who'd been airborne at the time, barely avoided being cut in half by the attack.

Upon dispersing of the missiles and a good portion of the countryside disrupting its view, the skull-faced creature then turned to the army still shooting at it from the cliffs and beach. Snarling at them, the extra terrestrial brought forward one of its ribbon-like arms and, whipping it into the air, swung it down and smashed away an entire section of the coast, taking out a quarter of the military forces with ease. Hundreds of men perished in an earth-shaking explosion of dust and rubble, their cries drowned out by their exploding vehicles and the sound of the landscape caving in on itself.

At first the creature didn't give a damn about the army or the navy shooting at it, and showed even less concern towards the Z-fighters. But now it was taking the time to pummel them into oblivion.

Getting to his feet after his harrowing dive, Piccolo wasted no time in gathering his senses and blasting towards the creature at full speed, aura blazing around him.

Yamcha, managing to pick himself out of the grass as well, spotted his teammate fly by, leaving a trail of white energy behind, "Ah, what the hell. If we're going to die, we may as well go down fighting!" Powering up as well, the grinning man shot up after the Namekian and both arced towards the octopus-like alien from all sides.

While the creature occupied itself with slapping the coastline with its enormous ribbon appendages, Krillin and Android 18 managed to leap back to a safe distance and take up positions on a new cliff a few miles away. During which time they then heard the roar of hundreds of aircraft and looked up in time to see dozens of jets pass over them.

Flying in formation towards the monster, squadrons of F-22 Raptors readied themselves for combat; loading their weapons and locking onto their distant target. In the center of the formation, the squadron leader directed traffic as he and his mates made their final approach of the beast.

"This thing has got to have a weak spot somewhere. Come in low and fast, and hit it where it hurts," the Captain ordered, watching the numbers and crosshairs on his screen light up the enormous creature wrecking the beaches. Upon getting a good look at the sheer size of the colossus, easily dwarfing their tallest mountains, the man shook his head in disbelief. "Damn. The instructors at the academy never prepared us for anything like this." He then looked across at his wingmen and gave them a respectful nod. "Good luck, fellas. We're going to need it."

At that moment, his partner on his right spoke up over the radio. "Uh, Smith. It looks like you've got yourself a couple of extra wingmen on your nine o'clock."
Appearing confused at first, the Captain looked to his left to see what his fellow pilot was talking about. When he did, he balked when he saw two people flying alongside his plane and had to shake his head to make sure he wasn't seeing things.

"What's the scoop, Cap?" another pilot asked over the airways.

"The former World Martial Arts Champion, sir?" the captain's wingman inquired.

The squadron leader chuckled, "Yeah. That's him." Giving an amused chuckle, Smith then turned his attention back to the flight ahead. "Man. What a weird day this is turning out to be. First I find out the planet's being invaded by some giant octopus from hell and now I'm flying alongside one of the strongest men in the world. What are the odds?" His computers beeping loudly and telling him they were in range of their target, the leader of the raid took a few deep breaths to calm down and nodded his head assuredly. "Clench up boys. This is it. Let's send this freak back to whatever part of the galaxy it came from. Are you with me, Angels?"

"Yes, sir!" came the unanimous cry from multiple voices over the comm. channel.

Popping his visor down, the pilot then dialed into the console and made his jet combat ready. "Bring the rain!"

As soon as the squadron of Raptors picked up speed, so did Tien and Chiaotzu, both of whom joined the captain and his wingmen in breaking up the arrangement and scattering throughout the sky. When the jets fell within range, they began unleashing their payloads on the creature from all sides. Rockets shot from the planes and arced towards the titan leisurely smashing up the landscape and wiping out the army, striking against its side in a series of impressive explosions.

The first wave failed though. All the missiles did was impact against the barrier surrounding the alien and inflicted no damage to it whatsoever. However, the arrival of the planes did draw the extra terrestrial's attention away from the army and when a couple of the raptors blew past its head, the monster gave a loud shriek of annoyance and turned its attention to the flies buzzing around it. Seeing the first wave of missiles detonate uselessly, Captain Smith cursed. "Damn it. Okay then. Blue Squadron; move in for a second pass." He then led the next detachment of Raptors in for another run.

As the air force zipped around the titan, hitting its shield with missiles and machine gun fire, Tien and Chiaotzu used that opportunity to arc around the creature and blast it from the sides with ki blasts. Their attacks bouncing off of its barrier no matter where they attacked it from, the pair then pulled up and gained altitude. Taking up positions a kilometer above the alien's head, where they could see the air force strafing the beast and most of the naval forces pull back to a safe distance, the pair then powered up and took aim.

"Are you sure about this, Tien?" Chiaotzu asked, swallowing nervously.

The bald fighter, sweating up a storm, shook his head at his friend, "No. But we at least have to give it a try." He then brought his hands forward and formed a diamond shape with them. Peering through the window formed by his hands, he zoomed in on the beast and gritted his teeth. "Come on. Let's work it together!"
"R-Right!" the little mime fighter replied, throwing his hands overhead and charging a sphere of golden energy.

As soon as both fighters had powered up their attacks, they launched them. Tien extended his hands forward and unleashed an enormous Tri Beam from his hands, at the same time Chiaotzu unleashed a powerful psychic blast. Their attacks shot down towards the creature and slammed into the barrier protecting, beginning to drill into it and putting unwanted pressure on the beast. The air force steered clear from the two beams pushing down on the alien from above, and continued to lob missiles and bullets its way.

While the two teammates fired down at the behemoth from the front, Piccolo came up behind the creature with his left hand pulled back and an orange sphere of energy crackling in his palm. Growling loudly, the Namekian took aim and thrust his hand forward, "Bukiri Maha!" A massive blast then left his palm and shot towards the alien, slamming into its shield and beginning to drill as well.

Krilllin and Yamcha also took up positions on either side of their friend. After bringing their hands beside them, blue spheres of energy formed before they threw them forward and unleashed two Kamehameha Waves at the beast. Their attacks rocketed down and struck its barrier with concussive force, filling the sky with a blinding light and drawing the creature's attention skywards.

While the Z-fighters were occupied with their beam struggle against the creature, they failed to notice Trunks landing on the beach nearby. Startling the army personnel gawking from the cliff, the lavender haired boy powered up as well and, drawing his hands back, threw them forward. "Buster Cannon!" A large golden blast shot from his hands and towards the alien's chest, striking it from below and beginning to bore into it. Even though the boy could see it being stopped by its strange, hexagonal like barrier, he continued to pour everything he had into it.

Following up on the combined assault, Android 18 decided to attack it from the side as well. Dropping down onto another cliff, the woman brought her hands to her sides and took aim. But just before she could unleash any form of blast, a figure landing beside her caught her eye.

"Need a hand, sis?" the familiar voice of Seventeen spoke up.

The blonde haired woman blinked in surprise at the sight of her twin brother, "S-Seventeen? You… how…?"

"We can catch up later. But right now, let's focus on bringing this son of a bitch down," the raven haired android replied, also taking a stance and throwing his hands back.

Receiving a nod from his sibling in response, the two of them locked crosshairs onto their target and, upon gathering all the energy they needed, threw their hands forward and unleashed two powerful beams at it. Their attacks met at the exact same spot and started to push into the hexagonal barrier that jumped up to defend the creature. The effort of trying to pierce it drew growls of frustration from the pair, who started feeding their attacks everything they had and joined the other Z-fighters in the final push.

The air force cleared out as soon as the monster was bombarded from above and below by the simultaneous energy attacks. The military on the ground and the naval forces floating nearby gawked at the raw display of power being thrown by the defenders of the earth. It was almost like watching a refracting prism being shot at by varying beams of light, which drilled into the beast's surface and pressured it from all sides.

At first the combined assault appeared to be working. But just when it seemed like the creature's shield would be breached, the giant monster gave a loud shriek and, all of a sudden, a deafening shockwave rang out followed by a massive amount of repulsive force that exploded off of the target and expanded at ridiculous speed. The resulting blast effortlessly dispelled the beam attacks hitting it from all sides before the dome blast expanded even further, parting the water around it, pulverizing the coast, and knocking all of the Z-fighters away with a concussive gust of wind.
Those who were airborne were sent spiraling out of the sky to crash land painfully several kilometers away, whereas those on the ground were sent flying with the rubble and debris of the disintegrating landscape.

Any of the earth's military caught in the attack's radius did no better than the landscape, as everything within twenty kilometers of it was blasted to pieces or turned into powder.

When the shockwave ended, it revealed the creature standing in a massive, forty kilometer wide crater, which was filled shortly afterwards by the ocean. Everything inside of that hole had either been disintegrated or turned into mush.

In the end, none of the Z-fighters' attacks worked at all.

After clearing the area, the creature then turned its attention toward the countryside and, hovering out of the ocean it was sitting in, began to float over the West Coast.

Managing the recover from effectively being shot out of the sky, Tien and Chiaotzu, sporting numerous bruises and cuts following their simultaneous crash landings in the forest, leapt back into the air and charged at the approaching beast.

"Cut it off! Don't let it get through!" Tien shouted.

With two loud battle cries, the pair broke ranks in midflight and attacked the creature with a barrage of continuous ki blasts, which impacted against the barrier directly in front of its face.
Their tempest of a bombardment drew the alien to a halt, a low growl escaping the beast's throat before its eyes flashed a bright red. As soon as it did, a second, concentrated shockwave was fired from it and sent gusting towards the two fighters.

Both Tien and Chiaotzu were struck full on by the attack and knocked hurtling out of the sky, the two warriors crying out before they crashed into one of the decapitated mountains fifteen kilometers away, where they were knocked unconscious and buried under a ton of rubble.

The giant invader made a happy chirping noise at taking out the two warriors. But just when it was beginning to relax, a golden sphere of energy was suddenly thrown at it from the side and drilled into its shield. Turning in the direction the ball had come from it spotted Yamcha standing in the middle of the field with his hand and fingers pointed outwards, indicating that he was the one that'd thrown the attack and was now trying to push the energy ball through to it.

The man, in spite of being bruised from head to toe and sporting a tattered orange gi, had his teeth gritted and his most intense glare locked onto the behemoth as he attempted to force his Spirit Ball through its field. "Come on, you fat son of a bitch… BREAK!"

Hearing the man's outcry, the creature growled and, flashing his eyes, fired another shockwave at the tiny human, at the same time dispelling his energy ball. The invisible attack collided headlong with the wounded Yamcha, punching a massive crater where he was standing and sending the fighter barreling across the valley at breakneck speed. Bouncing over the ground like a ragdoll for over three kilometers, the former mercenary eventually impacted against the side of a cliff, where he ended up stopping inside of a human-shaped hole, covered in debris and foliage.
He was the third to fall.

Piccolo, leaping to his feet from his spot in the forest, spat out the blood from his mouth and quickly brought two fingers to his forehead. The moment he did, he began to charge, golden electricity starting to zap and pulse around his fingers, at the same time his aura sprang up around him. A loud growl escaped his clenched jaw as he began focusing all of his energy into a single point.

"This thing is just walking through everything we're throwing at it! Damn it! We haven't even made it flinch!" the Namekian thought furiously as he continued gathering energy. "Alright... time to turn this around."

As the extra terrestrial continued floating forward, its two ribbon appendages waving on either side of it while its cowl blew behind it, a couple more blasts impacting it from the side drew its gaze across. When it did, it saw the lavender-haired form of Trunks flying in its direction, hurling balls of energy at it one after the other. Arcing around its head and away from its barrier, the demi-Saiyan thrust both hands forward and unleashed another barrage of attacks that shot towards the creature from above.

His bombardment bounced off of it though, eliciting a snarl from the creature.

All at once, a wave of missiles from its blind spot collided with the alien's back, along with an onslaught of heavy artillery fire from the battleships off shore. Their massive guns rained down hell upon the beast once more, drawing its glare towards them. When it rotated and faced the ocean, it was met by an assault from the squadron of Raptors flying back in, the leader opening up with two sidewinder missiles that rocketed towards its face, only to impact uselessly against its field.

"Shit!" Captain Smith cursed, pulling up when the alien's eyes glowed dangerously and it once again began to charge.

Opening its mouth wide, photons of energy gathered into a single, golden sphere in front of its mouth. As if taking a deep breath, the pulsing energy ball caused the ground to tremble and the air to vibrate around the creature as its density increased little by little. The sight of it not only stunned the sailors onboard the ships and the soldiers on land, it startled the Z-fighters as well. Trunks especially, who was currently floating above the monster as it started gathering energy for a counter attack.

Gasping when he sensed how much ki was being put into that blast, the lavender haired boy then dove for it and powered up a blast of his own. "NO! STOP!" With a yell Trunks suspended himself directly alongside the titan just as it finished gathering power.

With a loud screech, the creature fired its attack, at the exact same time Trunks launched a double-handed blast into the side of it. His attack impacted the sphere of energy just as it was leaving the creature's mouth.

His intervention meant that he was only just able to nudge the ball up a bit before it rocketed towards the battleships on the water. The attack barely overshot them and hurtled towards the distant horizon, where it struck some far off island and detonated in a massive, dome-shaped explosion hundreds of times greater than a thermonuclear warhead. The blast covered the entire horizon line, parting the clouds when it filled the sky with a blinding light and took a decent chunk out of the earth. The sight of the explosion had all of the humans gaping in horror and when the dome faded, the creature realized it'd missed.
Snarling, it turned its attention to Trunks, who was still floating nearby.

The kid flipped it off snidely, "Yeah! That's right you ugly squid! I did that! What're you gonna do about it?! Huh?" The hybrid then waved his hands at it provocatively. "Give me your best shot!"

Identifying him as the cause due to his yelling, the creature's eyes glowed red again before, with a sudden owl-like shriek, it unleashed another shockwave from its body.

The sight had the half-Saiyan pale. "Crap."

The attack blasted outwards, not only catching Trunks by surprise and knocking him flying several kilometers, but it also ripped every single jet in range out of the sky and sent the air force spiraling to the ground.

Captain Smith had to fight the controls when his plane was hit by the colossal blast, his F-22 spinning out of control. Realizing he was in a dive, the man quickly yanked on the stick and ejected from the craft. He rocketed out of the cockpit just in time to see his plane nosedive and crash land in a remote field.

Most of his other squad mates managed to do the same. But some of the others hadn't been so lucky, as they'd perished in the invisible blast when their jets were shredded by the unexpected show of force.

Landing on the edge of the newly formed crater the alien had generated, Smith ripped away his parachute and glared angrily up at the creature floating in the center of the twenty kilometer wide hole. Gritting his teeth, the man pulled out his side-arm and opened fire on it. "Hey! I'm still here you bastard! Come on! Fuckin' bring it!" He shouted profanities between each shot of his Colt.

As brave a gesture as it was, it served no purpose other than to calm him down. When he ran out of ammo, the man chucked his pistol at the beast, only for it to travel twenty five yards of the several miles between him and the titan.

Ignoring the little human, the alien was then turning around to face the continent again. But just as it was in the process of changing course, it spotted something out of the corner of its eye and saw a green figure leap into the air a mile out. Narrowing its gaze, it saw the person suspend himself in the sky and take aim at it.

His two fingers sparkling like a hot poker, Piccolo gave a mighty howl before cocking his hand back and thrusting his fingers forward, unleashing his attack with everything he had. "SPECIAL BEAM CANNON!" A crack of thunder rang out, signaling the launch of a massive orange, drill-like beam, a hundred times larger than any the Namekian had ever produced before, shooting out of his hand and rocketing towards the creature.

The alien balked at the sight of the light speed attack and watched as it collided with its shield. In an instant, five layers of its translucent hexagonal barriers shattered when the attack burrowed into its defenses, only to stop when it hit a particularly thick layer. The creature gave a loud snarl as its body was pushed back slightly under the force of the attack now digging into its protective shield.

The battle lasted for a full two minutes. It was after that time had passed the Namekian finally reach the end of the line and cut off the output, his corkscrew attack detonating against the shield with the force of several hundred nuclear bombs packed into a single blast. The explosion itself caused the layer the warrior had been stuck on to splinter, but as soon as the smoke cleared, all it revealed was a scorched wasteland in place of a forest, a large crater, a trench dug through the earth, and a completely unharmed extra terrestrial.

Piccolo recoiled in shock when he saw the giant alien's eyes light up and heard a loud snarl echo from its mouth.

Doing something completely unexpected, the hexagonal shield in front of the alien suddenly changed shape, taking the form of a translucent octahedron, which split in the center and transformed into two cubes, one hovering over the other, with a sphere of golden energy fixed in the center. The tiny sphere pulsing a couple of times as it was charged, the creature then fired a concentrated purple beam straight towards the Namekian at blinding speeds.

Eyes widening in horror, Piccolo threw his arms up and produced a spherical shield around him. A split second after which the blast fired by the creature slammed into him and pushed him out of the sky, sending him flying for several kilometers before colliding with the side of a ruined mountain. The beam continued to burrow him into the cliff, hammering against his energy barrier and causing the earth to tremble around them.

The Namekian growled as the force of a sun pressed down on top of him, a sensation that last for a full minute before the beam eventually let up. Panting heavily at the effort of holding back such a force, Piccolo smirked exhaustedly, "Ha. Is that all you've got?"

The octahedron shield floating in front of the creature then compressed into a diamond shape, before splitting and transforming into a four-corner prism, with spikes and four golden spheres of energy crackling on the corners. The sight of the attack and the sudden increase in energy levels had the Namekian's eyes widen in shock.

"Ah… shit."

Before he even had time to react, the four balls crackling with golden lightning fired four beams that met in the center and, magnifying under the intensity, the alien creature gave a deafening screech and fired a gargantuan blast at its target. The golden beam, spanning ten kilometers in diameter, rocketed towards Piccolo several times faster than the speed of light and collided with his shield with the force of a thousand suns. The impact was marked by an earthshaking thunderclap as the Namekian was engulfed in a hellfire attack that continued to travel across the planet's surface and out of its atmosphere.

The blast traveled in a straight line for a thousand more miles from the earth before eventually stopping around orbital distance where, looking at it from afar, the beam took the shape of a massive, fiery crucifix.

The skies burned and the landscape was torched. Anything standing within reach of the magnified blast was incinerated and anyone standing outside of range was knocked off their feet by the howling hot winds being produced. The concentrated energy wave continued to gush from the creature's mouth with terrifying intensity, engulfing its small target and burning him mercilessly.

There was so much power behind the blast that it completely overwhelmed the warrior's shield and started to cook the man from the outside-in. Piccolo's pain-filled howl of terror echoed inside the blast as he felt the surface of his skin burn and his eyes start to boil.

However, just when it seemed like the Namekian was about to be incinerated by the enormous attack, the creature's eyes suddenly shot upwards when two golden disks flew at it from above and came at it from the side. Cutting off the energy to its attack when it saw the disks arc towards its head, the alien responded immediately with a flash of its eyes followed by two red disks being fired from its forehead. Its much larger counterstrike collided headlong with the golden ones thrown by both Krillin and Android 18, both of whom were suspended up high in an advantageous position.

Along with Android 17, the trio gawked when they saw the alien stop the two Destructo Disks with its own monofilament blasts with ease. Upon which the red disks overwhelmed theirs, sliced the attacks in two before shooting over the horizon and dispersing.

In spite of their failed attempts to decapitate the beast, they still managed to save Piccolo from a barbeque.

The land the blast had traveled along had a massive trench dug through it so wide that it could be seen from space. Not only that, but the earth was also burning, the forest around the ditch had been turned to ash, and every single mountain and hill that'd been standing in its path had been leveled, including the one Piccolo had been pinned up against.

The attack had generated so much heat, that the ground had been glassed, and the Namekian could be seen lying on top of it.

Looking exactly like how he looked after taking Nappa's Bomber DX move head first, with various patches of his skin burned and cut, the green warrior laid sprawled out in the middle of the ten kilometer wide trench unconscious and bleeding from various wounds. It was a miracle that he was still alive and kicking.

Well… kicking was sort of subjective at this point.

"That's not good," Krillin said, seeing the creature turn to glare in their general direction.

The raven haired android flying up high gritted his teeth nervously, "At least he's no longer frying the crap out of Piccolo anymore."

Sweating nervously despite it now being three-on-one, the former monk spoke up, "There's no way we'll be able to restrain that thing or hold it off. We need to try and take it out of commission."

At that, the male android laughed sardonically, "Ha ha ha. How?"

"Well… we could…" Unfortunately, Krillin wasn't given time to finish his sentence.

When the group saw the beast's eyes glow red, every single one of them reacted in alarm, with Android 18 being the first to take charge of the situation. "Shit. SCATTER!" She then flew off to the right, whereas the other two flew off in the opposite direction. However, even when presenting the thing with multiple targets, it still didn't do a damn thing.

Snarling loudly, the creature fired yet another invisible blast of wind from its body that collided with all three of them and smacked them out of the sky. While Android 17 went crash landing into the ocean near the battleships, Krillin made landfall on the beach and Android 18 spun into the forest, where she disappeared behind a blast of dust and debris. When the smoke eventually settled from their respective landings, it showed the blonde fighter lying out in the open, covered in various cuts and bruises, and knocked out.

The giant alien quickly turned its attention to the latter, a gurgling sound escaping its throat as its eyes flared and its energy began to gather in front of its beak once more. Photons converging into a single, purple sphere of energy, the creature's ki began to skyrocket as it aimed to wipe out the annoying flies buzzing around it once and for all.

Sensing the incoming danger, Krillin, lying flat out on the beach, looked up in horror with blood trickling over his eye. "NO! EIGHTEEN!"

A loud screech echoing across the countryside, the large sphere the creature had created achieved stability in a matter of seconds. Upon rearing back, it then threw its head forward and fired, only to suddenly catch something small and fast-moving in its peripheral vision.

With a loud crack and a shockwave, the scarf-wearing form of Paprika let out a roar as she decked the massive titan across the face, her knuckles colliding with its shield but nevertheless catching it by surprise. The force of her collision on top of the power behind her punch burying into its barrier caused the enormous behemoth to rotate and shoot the beam across the planet's surface. It continued to fire it as its head was cocked to the side, sending the ridiculously powerful beam traveling in a wide, one-hundred and eighty degree arc.

The beam was in fact so powerful that not only did it shoot well outside of earth's orbit; it blasted clear across the solar system and to the side due to the manner it'd been fired. The result was the thick purple beam disintegrating an entire part of the asteroid belt looping around the region of space and cutting straight through Saturn, slicing it in half. When the two halves of the planet separated, they then exploded in a glorious, fiery blast that could be seen from earth itself.

When the attack eventually ceased and the creature floated to a stop, it gave an irritable huff and turned to face its attacker. It quickly spotted them standing atop a plateau a full kilometer away, positioned with her arms crossed, head held high and scarf bellowing on the wind.

Paprika smirked when the enormous beast turned to face her, "Glad I got your attention… you big dumb squid."

As the Makyan faced off against the snarling beast from another world, Goten, who'd traveled all the way here with her to find out what was going on, flew down to where Trunks had crash-landed and knelt down beside his fallen friend. Taking him by the shoulders, the raven haired youngster shook him gently, "Trunks. Trunks. Are you okay?" A couple of shakes and a few words of encouragement later soon roused the youngster from his slumber, putting a smile of joy back on the demi-Saiyan's face. "Yeah. You're alright."

Groaning, the lavender haired boy looked up to see his friend beaming down at him. "Ugh. W-What happened?"

"The big monster knocked you and everybody else out. It's really powerful. Even Mr. Piccolo was taken out and he's one of the strongest people on this planet," Goten answered, before then turning his attention to the plateau and the towering, ribbon-armed alien glaring at it. "Don't worry. Paprika will be able to beat it. Just you watch."

"Paprika?" Trunks murmured, looking to see who his playmate was referring to and spotting the white haired woman standing atop the distant mountain. "Oh, her."

The enormous creature floated closer, its eyes boring into the tiny figure staring it down. Despite being so insignificant in comparison, the beast could obviously still feel presences and regarded her with contempt and annoyance. In response, the Makyan glared right back at it while its ribbon arms waved hypnotically on either side of it.

Eyeing the odd looking giant suspiciously for a couple of minutes, the teenage demon then tilted her head at it and raised an eyebrow. "Ugh. You know I've seen some freaky aliens in my time, but this one just takes the cake. You're like a really big, ugly… skull-faced, octopus thing with the biggest cock-blocking space I've ever seen," Paprika said with a distasteful frown on her face. "But I guess you can't help that. You are what you are, and so am I. So let's cut the useless chit-chat and get to the fun part.” Her eyes then hardened when she focused all of her attention on the towering behemoth.

In response to her remarks, the alien let out a bellowing shriek as its hollow eyes flared a bright red. Paprika smirked, clenching her fists in response, "Alright, you overgrown side-dish. Let's dance!” With a wary cry of her own, the woman powered up, her green aura exploding off of her and shredding her scarf. At the exact same time, her body bulked up, making her even taller and curvaceous as she jumped straight into her Super Makyan form. As soon as she reached maximum, the girl sprang off of the plateau and charged, her take-off creating a sonic boom that caused the mountain she was on to crumble to the ground.

With a fierce battle cry, Paprika tore across the sky towards the creature with her energy blazing around her. When she came within range of it, the alien swung at her with its arm, missing her when she evaded and causing it to strike the countryside with an earthshaking crash. The Makyan dove for the trees directly under it, to which it responded by bringing about its other appendage and whipping that one down at her as well, only for the girl to shoot skywards and dodge it once again. The alien's tendril carving into the ground like butter and annihilating another area of pristine landscape, Paprika took full opportunity of its miss to swing around over its shoulder from behind, and slam a punch into its face.

Her roar was followed by her knuckles burying into its cheek, but her fist was stopped dead when it slammed against the hexagonal barrier appearing between her and her target. The force of her deflected blow sent her spinning away when her momentum was effectively reversed, prompting her to halt in midair. As soon as she did, her eyes widened when she saw it raise its right arm and swing it down at her, forcing her to block with both hands. The attack slammed into her with catastrophic force, the impact causing a thunderclap and a shockwave that split the earth beneath them and sent rubble flying in all directions.

After catching the hit, Paprika shoved the ribbon away, cocking back her hand for a blast, only to see its eyes flash brightly followed by a powerful blast that shot up at her at blinding speed. The heat ray slammed into her chest, knocking out her aura and sending the Makyan spiraling for several kilometers. A cry of pain leaving her lips, the girl managed to right her body a few seconds later, by which point the creature was bearing down on her once more. Snarling back at it in kind, the Makyan powered up and rocketed up into the sky.

Suspending above the behemoth, the teenager brought both hands overhead and with a valiant cry of effort, formed a pulsing pink sphere of energy between her palms. "PAN BLASTER!” Taking aim, she lobbed the sphere straight down at the creature, which looked up just in time to receive the attack directly in the face… or so it seemed.

The explosion to follow was colossal, easily compressing a planet-splitting worth of energy to a single point. A fiery mushroom cloud filled the sky and blocked Paprika's view of her practically demolishing an entire region of landscape and the monster itself. From the way her attack landed, it looked like she'd finished it off once and for all.

But just when the flare of the blast died down and was replaced by smoke, Paprika was caught completely by surprise when one of the alien's ribbon arms shot out of the cloud faster than she could track it and smacked her out of the sky. The impact was biblical, causing a thunderclap that sent her flying twenty kilometers across land before eventually crash landing in another ruined mountain. She collided with the side of it at full speed, sending dust and debris flying into the air.

Shocked at seeing his best friend get tossed over the horizon, Goten reacted instinctively. "PAPRIKA!" the demi-Saiyan cried out, flying up from the forest with his friend hot on his tail. "You leave her alone, you big bully!"

"Goten! Wait!" Trunks shouted, desperately following right behind his companion as both of them powered up and took to the sky. "You can't stop that thing on your own!"

Powering up, the gutsy raven haired youngster brought his hands to his side and, powering up a blue sphere of energy, hurled it at the extra terrestrial as soon as he was within range. "Ka-me-ha-me-HAAAA!" The powerful stream of energy left his hands and rocketed towards the enormous alien, only to slam against its shield and explode harmlessly.

Its attention being drawn to the explosion, the alien snarled and glared at the two hybrids flying towards it. When its eyes flared red, the pair stopped in their tracks, only to then hear the creature shriek and unleash a concentrated Kiai that slammed into them and knocked them to the ground. The two children cried out in agony as they bounced across the terrain several times and ended up stopping at the foot of a hill.

Their impact caused the ground for miles to shake, a sensation that roused the downed Piccolo from his state of unconsciousness.

Feeling his skin prickle unpleasantly, the Namekian gritted his teeth and looked up fearfully. "No… Goten…"

Android 18 and Android 17, the latter of whom had managed to drag his way back to shore, slowly regained consciousness as well; both of them rising up and shaking their heads clear of the demoralizing hazing they'd been subjected to. Krillin was already up and at 'em, but he was fairing no better than anybody else.

Nevertheless, he could still see everything that was going on and after watching Goten and Trunks get knocked out of the sky, alarm bells started kicking in.

Goten, slowly rising up from the crater, whimpered painfully as he gripped his arm. That shockwave had been one thing, but the landing had been more painful than anything else. Not only were his clothes in tatters, his body was also wrecked, and his skin was covered in various cuts and bruises. On top of that, he'd seriously banged his arm against something hard. "M-My shoulder… ah…"

Having already sustained significant damage as well, Trunks pulled himself up out of the ditch he'd made a couple yards away. Bleeding and bruised in various other places, the lavender haired boy winced and trembled as he struggled to drag his way out of the hole. "Goten… a-are you okay?" His question went unanswered. When his eyes snapped to their left, he saw the enormous alien they were fighting rear its ugly head back and, giving a loud roar, begin charging another energy attack.

The two boys' eyes widened in horror when they sensed its ki skyrocket and photons of light gather around its mouth, where an enormous pink ball of energy crackled and took shape. The orb bathed the entire countryside in an eerie light and stunned everyone who was watching.

The navy, having recently gone quiet, could only gape helplessly. The Z-fighters scattered across the countryside, unable to move due to the staggering injuries they'd received from only a couple of hits from the monster, were in the exact same boat.
As the beast proceeded to charge, causing the atmosphere above it to warp and twist, Paprika, having suffered a ridiculous amount of damage as well, pulled her body out of the rubble and into the open. Blood dripping down her face, she glared up at the alien over the horizon, which she saw was now charging what looked like a miniature sun in its mouth and had now raised into the sky.

Gasping when she sensed who it was aiming for, the Makyan panicked. "NO!"

Just as Goten picked himself fully off of the ground, his legs suddenly gave way beneath him and he collapsed to his knee. Yelping when he hit the ground, the child gripped his shoulder even tighter. "I… It hurts!" The shock to his body was just too much.

Like everybody else, he too was completely immobilized.

Unfortunately, Goten didn't have time to fuss over his injuries. Seconds after collapsing under the crippling pain racking his form, the enormous beast had finished charging its final blast. With the pink ball of energy compressing and gaining stability in its mouth, the creature then reared back and, throwing its full weight forward, let it loose. With a terrifying screech, the attack exploded from its mouth with a deafening howl, gushing like a river bursting through a dam and generating a blinding flash of light.

Spanning several kilometers in diameter with enough energy behind it to wipe out the entire solar system, the energy attack tore across the landscape and incinerated the area in front of the titan the instant it left its mouth. It was clear the alien had no idea how much power it was putting behind its attacks, but had aimed it so that it not only killed the half-Saiyan that had attacked it, but his friend and the entire West City behind them.

The Z-fighters saw the path of the light speed blast in bullet time and neither one of them were in any condition to do anything. All Piccolo, Krillin and Android 18 could do was watch on in shock as the attack ripped towards the terrified Goten with the intent of wiping him out in one go.

The two demi-Saiyans, both kneeling mere feet from each other, stared ahead of them in horror as the wall of energy thundered towards them. Judging from the sheer size of the attack and how fast it was moving, there was no way either of them could move in time to dodge it, and there was even less time for any of their friends to grab them.

But just when it seemed like they were about to be blasted into oblivion, a shadow suddenly dropped down from the sky and landed in front of them.

Piccolo and everybody else recoiled in surprise when they saw Paprika appear in the path of the blast, her energy blasting off of her and a dome-like shield forming around her and the two little ones behind her.

Then… it happened.

The attack struck Paprika with a deafening shockwave, a scream of agony escaping her lips as the force of a thousand supernovas went off in her face. In spite of the protective shield she'd put up to prevent the attack from reaching her, the teen felt her entire front roast under the blowtorch that was the invading alien's blast, her clothes being ripped apart by the gale force winds and her body being eaten away by the sheer temperature of the cyclone of energy. At first it seemed like her heroic gesture was all for naught and that she was about to be wiped out, along with the two half-Saiyans and all of West City behind her.

But, with the energy she managed to build up in her hands at the last second, Paprika was able to deflect the entire bulk of the blast and send it rocketing into the sky. The attack shot off of the planet like a comet, expanding as it did so, not only wiping out a couple of satellites, but several more asteroids when it left the solar system and shot towards another part of the Milky Way. The attack continued to travel for billions of miles, before eventually striking a distant star and destroying it in a colossal blast.

When the beam eventually faded, it revealed another massive trench burned into the surface of planet earth, which began at the place the alien was floating and ended at the spot where Goten and Trunks knelt.

Looking through the smoke left behind in the wake of the gargantuan beam, the two demi-Saiyans then saw the silhouette of their savior emerge. A smile appeared on Goten's face when he recognized the figure as his friend and the boy ecstatically crawled forward in joy. "P-Paprika… you saved us…" He then stopped when he saw exactly what'd happened to her and his eyes widened in shock.

The shield the Makyan had produced had saved them all from being disintegrated. That was the main thing. The side-effect of her courageous act though was far more gruesome than any of them had expected. Not only was she missing both of her hands, but most of the skin on her front had been charred black, she was bleeding from various other wounds, and on top of her ribs, which had been exposed from the amount of flesh that'd been burnt away, but bits of her femur and shin could also be seen.

 Needless to say, she looked pretty messed up.

However, with her face remaining intact, Paprika still mustered the strength to grin and pant. "Yeah… that's right… I can take anything you can dish out…" Her expression then became choked up and her eyes widened, after which she collapsed to her knees and fell flat onto her face.

 Panicking and ignoring the pain racking his frame, Goten crawled forward as quickly as he could. Stopping right beside the Makyan, the boy took her by the shoulder and shook her, nervously looking into her eyes as she gazed right back at him. "P-Paprika… Paprika… no… no…"

 Whimpering fearfully, the boy looked her over to see the damage she'd sustained and, beginning to shake from head to toe, he placed a hand on her back and gently shook her again. "W-What did… what did he do to you, Paprika? W-What did…"

The demon girl chuckled weakly and coughed a few times, looking back at the child staring down at her. "Don't worry, Goten. It's… just a little scratch. I-I'll make it… you'll see…" Seeing tears starting to form in his eyes, she beamed at him warmly and grinned in an attempt to comfort him.

"It's okay… I'm fine."

"N-No. You're not fine," the demi-Saiyan whispered back, completely ignoring the monstrous alien floating slowly towards them as he tried to bring his friend back around. But considering the wounds she'd sustained and not having the skills or means to help her, there was only so much he could do. "J-Just rest… my… my brother will come and fix you. H-He'll know what to do. He always knows what to do."

 Coughing a couple more times, Paprika smiled back at the kid holding her shoulder, "I'm sure he does…" Trying to reach up to push him away, the girl held back as she felt the remains of her ki ebb away and her heart slowly coast to a stop. "But I don't need help… not his anyway. As long as… you're safe… then that's good enough for me." Then, as the last of her strength dissipated, she allowed a couple of tears to escape her own eyes and trickle down her cheeks. "Just… run. Get out of here… while you still… can… G-Goten…"

Then, with her gaze going blank, the Makyan breathed her last and her life force finally vanished.
Eyes widening when he sensed his friend's energy disappear, Goten slowly released her out of shock. Trembling uncontrollably, he nudged her a few more times to see if she was just playing with him. "P-Paprika?" But after a couple of tries and a few pokes to the girl's side, the raven haired youngster's eyes began to water and his expression reflected absolute dismay. "N-No… Paprika…" Shaking her back one blast time, the child then fist his hands tightly and gritted his teeth, sobbing as he leaned forward and pressed his forehead against her head. "No… no… no-no-no… please… no."

Trunks, hearing his friend start to cry, looked on from his spot helplessly and swallowed heavily. "G-Goten."

With nothing but the sounds of sobs and a child's cries filling the air, the enormous invader's shadow fell over the trench and the beast snarled warningly. Upon which a deafening shriek escaped its mouth as it reared its head back and wailed out victoriously. The stricken Z-fighters could only stare from their spots as the beast slowly turned its attention to its latest victim and began to raise its limbs to flatten the two remaining pests standing in its line of sight.

However, its loud screech, which was meant to bring terror to all those who heard it, instead broke Goten out of his trance.

Between the sight of his friend's body and the sound of the creature responsible for her death reverberating around him, the hybrid just snapped.

Eyes shooting open, the boy rose from the ground and, with a bloodcurdling cry that sent chills down everyone's spines, the child turned to the clouds and screamed out to the heavens. In his rage, Goten allowed his anguish and pain to boil over, and when his aura sprang up around him, it was forever changed. Golden energy blasting from his every pore, the child continued to scream towards the atmosphere as his energy skyrocketed and his hair flashed gold. To accompany the change, his eyes turned a sharp teal and, with an earthshaking shockwave, Goten transformed.

Trunks, Piccolo and the other Z-fighters who were on their feet looked on in disbelief as the child spun around and faced the creature with nothing but hate and fury burning in his face.

"You killed my friend!" Goten snapped, the alien staring down at the child in what could only be described as surprise. "She was my friend… AND YOU KILLED HER!" With one last bellow, the demi-Saiyan exploded from the ground and shot towards the behemoth in the form of a golden bolt.

In an instant, the child collided with the alien's shield with a monstrous punch, generating a sonic boom on impact and shattering three of its layers in one hit. His body overflowing with power and spurred on by his anger, the child began burying punch after punch into the alien's translucent force field, causing it to shirk back slightly in surprise. When punching didn't work anymore, the boy began digging into it with his fingers and tore away at the layers one after the other.

Every blow was accompanied by a cry and every rip was drowned out by a grunt. "YOU KILLED HER! YOU KILLED HER! YOU KILLED HER!" Little by little he tunneled through the alien's shield to his foe.

But all of his efforts proved in vain. Being only able to rip apart the surface layers of the barrier, Goten was unable to get through in time when the alien's eyes flashed red and a powerful purple blast engulfed the child. The attack struck the hybrid and overwhelmed him, shooting out and taking the shape of an enormous crucifix, before the Super Saiyan was thrown off of the alien's barrier and sent hurtling through the air. Goten could only cry out in pain when his burnt body was sent spiraling across the land before impacting a distant cliff.
When the dust cleared, the demi-Saiyan could be seen lying unconscious and back to normal in a small crater. Upon which the alien, focusing all of its attention on the child, reared its head back and prepared to charge a second attack to finish him off. But just when the other Z-fighters were moving to come to Goten's defense, or at least tried to, a golden sphere of energy slammed into the monster's side and detonated against its barrier with enough force to lurch it.

"HEY! You! Over here!"

Flinching in surprise, the extra terrestrial stopped and spin in the direction of the gruff voice. When its eyes landed on a mountainous pile of rubble, it spotted a short man with flame-like black hair, wearing white gloves, white boots with yellow tips on them, and figure hugging blue spandex pants and vest, glaring back at it furiously. Though the shout certainly got the creature's attention, it was the man's energy level that held it.

When he saw who it was that had blasted the creature, Trunks's expression brightened instantly. "DAD!"

Vegeta's glare narrowed as his fists clenched tightly at his sides. "I was enjoying a nice day out training in the wastes on the other side of the planet. But then I come home and find some over-sized, mutated octopus trying to kill my son and his friend." The Saiyan Prince snarled as he fixed all of his attention on the invader. "You're going to regret this, you freak! All the way to the GRAVE!" With a loud yell, the warrior tensed and powered up, jumping straight into Super Saiyan without a second thought or care.

The instant his golden aura exploded off of him and punched a crater into the rubble, the Prince launched himself from his spot and charged at the alien, a mighty roar leaving his lips and echoing across the countryside.

The real battle was about to begin.

(TO BE CONTINUED)
As the sounds of war continued to rage over the horizon and filled the sky with the most spectacular lightshow the population of earth had ever seen, the Briefs family was hard at work trying to get their latest project up and running. On the other side of West City on Capsule Corp's extensive property, Bulma had just finished unfurling her latest invention. Upon releasing it from its storage capsule and dropping it on the front lawn, an enormous cannon of futuristic design, much larger than the company's main building, with cables hooked up to the main power grid, appeared from the smoke and stood proud for all to see.

To operate this thing obviously took a ridiculous amount of energy. Judging from the caliber of its barrel as well as the amount of power cables linked to its back, it would've been more than capable of punching through a mountain… or several if they were lined up correctly. However, this wasn't an ordinary projectile weapon, nor was it a conventional artillery piece.

After quickly typing a code into the main control panel at the base of the weapon's platform, the blue haired scientist then rushed up the metal stairs along its side up to the third level where her father was still jacking in the mains and switches. When she arrived there, she opened up the cold storage container sitting beside him. When the cold mist cleared, she pulled out a massive LED like globe and walked it over to the port, where she immediately plugged it in.

Doctor Briefs adjusted his glasses as he got a good look at the thing his daughter was now setting up. "What's that dear?" he asked, noticing the black ball sitting at the bottom of the glass.

"It's the magazine, dad; a tube containing trinity minerals that, when combined with several other elements, is capable of producing energy equivalent to the sun itself," Bulma replied, making sure the piece was secured good and tight, and that everything else was locked and in place. "Maybe even more."

"Ah. That's quite a lot of power," the old man murmured to himself as he leaned in to check out the contents. "Normally you'd only use this material in reactors, since the output they create can provide enough energy to last for several generations. But it looks like you plan on using this entire batch in one go." He was so invested in analyzing it that he completely missed the earthshaking tremor that rocked the facility.

Both of them ignored it in fact. The Z-fighters were obviously still out there fighting the massive invader from outer space and after seeing what'd happened to Gohan and the others, they were going to need every last bit of help they could get if they were going to defeat their planet's uninvited guest.

"This gun is an upgraded model of the surface-to-orbital cannons I originally designed and sold to the army, only this one is a thousand times more powerful. It works by accelerating energy particles and concentrating them around a single point, launching it at great speed towards the target by either cutting through it or disintegrating it entirely."
Her father, looking the enormous gun over, nodded his head in approval. "Impressive."

"Unfortunately, there is a massive drawback," the company president continued as she then clambered up the ladder and began readjusting the cables at the top. "This thing is ridiculously complicated to operate and maintain, and it requires a large amount of energy to run it. Not to mention the amount of heat it produces will melt the insides of the weapon after only a single shot. You'll be lucky to actually get two rounds out of it without blowing yourself up. That's why I never sold this one to the military." After screwing in the last bolt, she then dropped down from the ladder and began running to the next flight of stairs to the gunner's position. "If my calculations are correct, this thing should blast a hole through that thing's shields in one go."

Doctor Briefs quickly jogged after her, "Are you absolutely certain, dear?"

"Positive," the blue haired woman replied. Stopping halfway up the steps, she then pointed down at her old man and issued him her next instructions. "I'm heading up to the cockpit. You make sure those engines in the back are working and the readings on the drives stay below ten. When this thing fires the blowback is going to be massive, so as soon as the dials reach a hundred percent, clear out of there."

"Right," the father nodded, quickly turning and heading back down the stairs, giving his daughter the cue to continue up to her post.

This enormous gun seemed inflated and impractical, but it was the only thing Bulma could think of to actually help out her friends. It'd been years since her adventures with Goku across the planet searching for the dragon balls. Following on from that, all she'd been able to do was provide support for the group in the smallest ways possible as that woman with the gadgets.

Well, today she was going to take a little bit back for herself and really contribute to the team. Even if it was only one time, then that was good enough for her.

Hopefully her husband would be able to hold off that creature long enough for her latest creation to reach full power.

OOO

(A few minutes later)

Vegeta's battle cry filled the air as he unleashed a continuous barrage of energy spheres at his target, peppering it with powerful shots that clouded the air with countless large explosions. But as his attack started to rip apart the landscape surrounding the alien, he quickly saw that it was having no effect on it whatsoever, as every one of his blasts were being blocked by its shield. The hexagonal barrier that leapt up in front of it flickered as it deflected each and every attack that rattled it, leaving the beast unharmed.

After a couple of minutes of incessant firing, the prince pulled his hands away and stopped, narrowing his eyes when he saw his target emerge from the smog. Its snarl had the Saiyan warrior huff irritably while he took a stance atop the ruined mountain he was now stationed on. "Nothing. Not even a blink. Alright then." Powering up once again, Vegeta's golden aura blasted off of him and cracked the ground. He then began focusing all of his energy to the front of his body, where he intended to make his next assault. "If that's how you want to play it, fine!"

His energy pulsing fiercely, the warrior brought his fists up and clenched them tightly. Then, as soon as he felt he'd gathered enough power, a menacing grin quickly formed across his lips.
"Brace yourself, you overgrown monstrosity! I'm going to rip you apart!" With a yell, the man took off from his position and rocketed towards the enormous extra terrestrial. Tearing across the ruined landscape at full speed and leaving a cloudy trail of dust in his wake, the Saiyan barreled down on the invader, which was now heading towards him at a labored pace. It seemed like the pair were set to collide with one another with catastrophic results.

But just when it seemed like Vegeta was about to run headlong into it and smash his skull against its shield, his attack pattern unexpectedly changed.

His course shifting, the Saiyan Prince hit the accelerator and rocketed skywards. The sudden route he took prompted the giant alien to stop in its tracks and follow him with its eyes, where it then saw the golden bolt that was his opponent stop just below the clouds. Then, upon securing a high enough altitude, Vegeta turned back to the ground and, with a sonic boom reverberating across the countryside, dove straight towards the creature at blinding speed. The Super Saiyan roared out when he plunged straight into his target knee first.

Vegeta collided with the alien with catastrophic force, driving his leg straight into its face and causing the beast to slam backwards into the ground. His impact with it not only buried the enormous titan several meters into the floor, but it also generated a shockwave so great that he punched a new crater into the earth's surface thirty kilometers across. The deafening thunderclap was matched by the sight of rubble and trees flying in all directions. Everything directly within range of the pair was disintegrated under the force of the blow.

In spite of the impressive hit, the Saiyan Prince found that his attack had been effectively blocked by the alien's stupid shield. Though a couple of the layers had shattered under his attack, Vegeta was instantly met with resistance when he hit an even thicker barrier put up by the monster in an effort to defend itself. The hexagonal barrier expanded to five kilometers in diameter as the warrior pushed down into the writhing beast. It seemed like he was getting nowhere fast. But with the alien pinned underneath him, its face only feet away and hiding behind a few inches of thick shielding, the man knew that this was the perfect opportunity to finish it off.

Grinning from ear to ear as his aura blasted around him at full power, Vegeta thrust his hand forward and, aiming directly between the gargantuan beast's eyes, charged his final move. "CHECKMATE, BITCH! BIG BANG ATTACK!"

In the blink of an eye, the prince launched a fully charged, golden sphere of energy straight into the creature's face.

But just when it looked as though it would bypass the barrier at such a close proximity, a second, smaller hexagonal barrier formed directly in front of the energy ball just inches away from the creature's forehead, stopping it dead.

The sight had Vegeta recoil in shock.

Before the man could process exactly what'd happened, the creature writhing under his knee emitted a loud growl and, its energy suddenly spiking, fired its force field with its target pressed up against it. The result was a concussive shockwave that sent Vegeta barreling at high speed across the landscape like a ragdoll, covering a distance of over fifty kilometers. His body was literally propelled by the alien's expanding, multi-layered barrier, an event that resulted in an entire line of forest being blown away and several nearby plateaus to cave in on themselves. Moments later, the Saiyan Prince came to a painful stop at the foot of a cliff, his path marked by an enormous trench he'd dug straight through the earth.

As the dust settled around him, Vegeta, cringing painfully with blood trickling from various open wounds, looked up to see where his enemy had gone. His eyes then widened in disbelief when he saw the hexagonal barrier hovering directly over him. "SON OF A-!" The man flipped into a crouching stance and sprang away as fast as he could. The instant he left the cliff, the barrier hovering over the area slammed down at high-speed, punching a sinkhole into the ground a mile deep.

Had the Saiyan been lying there when that attack occurred, he would have been pulverized into dust.

Landing a kilometer out, the battered Vegeta spun around and snarled angrily. "Ugh. This thing is really starting to get on my nerves."

Taking a few deep breaths to calm himself down, the winded Super Saiyan quickly leapt into the air and landed atop another pillar of rock. Getting a good view of the battered and burning landscape around him, Vegeta spotted the invader floating several kilometers out, its tendril like arms flailing on the wind. Taking note of the city sitting to his left and the ocean not too far to his right, the warrior spat out the blood from his mouth and straightened up.

He then began assessing the situation from afar.

"I can see why Kakabrat and the blue harlot were taken out by this thing. Judging from the amount of energy it's giving off, it's even more powerful than a Super Saiyan… perhaps even an Ascended Saiyan," Vegeta murmured, finding this information beyond comforting.

So far this thing had handily picked off every single member of their group one after the other and had practically walked through everything he'd thrown at it. It even deflected one of his strongest blasts at pointblank range like it was a tennis ball. After all that, none of them had even come close to putting a scratch on it or come close to tiring it out. That was understandable considering this thing was reading more like a planet than a living organism.

Huffing irritably as he took his time to stretch his neck, Vegeta then opted to change tactics. "It's been a while since I've used that form, but I have no choice. I'm going to need all of the power I can get to break through that barrier." Its attacks were quick and its offensive power was biblical, but the fact of the matter was that the alien was slow and relied primarily on its impenetrable defenses to do battle.

Since it couldn't move fast, the prince had little to fear with using that particular technique.

"Alright, you intergalactic freak," Vegeta spoke, smirking at the alien floating on the other side of no-man's-land. "Let's see how well you do against a true Saiyan warrior." This was it. No more restraints.

Clenching his fists tightly and widening his stance, the prince dug in and began gathering energy, his aura exploding off of him with a clap of thunder. Allowing his ki to course through him at an accelerated rate, golden bolts of energy began crackling off of his expanding field, creating a miniature tempest while the countryside started to shake. The plateau Vegeta was standing on fractured little by little as golden currents of energy shot through it. It was an impressive light show, for sure. But this was merely a formality for the transformation to come.

Having not assumed this form in years, Vegeta decided to completely open up the taps and, with a howl of rage, the man's body suddenly bulked up and his muscle mass increased in several times. His hair also becoming sharper and his aura more defined, the Prince jumped from his Super Saiyan state to his 2nd Grade form, punching a crater into the earth and forcing the clouds above to separate.

Upon completing his impressive transformation, the warrior exhaled and, grinning menacingly, focused all of his attention on the alien floating several kilometers away. "Let the beating begin."

A sonic boom filling the air, the glowing warrior launched himself from his spot at a ludicrous speed. Causing the mountain to cave in from his takeoff, Vegeta rocketed towards his target along a sweeping path, coming at it from above with a howl of rage and his fist drawn back. With a quick Ki ai burst, the Saiyan blasted through two dozen layers of the alien's barrier, shattering each pane in turn before eventually burying his fist into another.

The Saiyan Prince's terrifying charge was effectively stopped just a dozen yards away from his quarry by yet another shield, the hexagonal energy panel appearing in front of the alien and halting the approaching warrior. Growling against the translucent wall, Vegeta then sprang away and, arcing around, came at his target from another angle, only to once again be halted by the same layer.

Clenching his fist tightly, the Super Saiyan drew back and, after taking aim, plunged his fist straight into the barrier. His knuckles drilled into the force field, shattering several more layers, until he was blocked off once again. Suspended above the creature, the fully energized Vegeta began digging through the entity's defenses with punishing blows. Layer after layer was shattered as the prince hammered away, tunneling towards the beast floating directly in his path.

Vegeta yelled out with every punch he threw, trying with all his might to reach his foe. "RAAARGH! COME ON!" the Saiyan bellowed, slamming punch after punch into the protective field. The barrier slowly thinned out and the end came into sight.

He was almost there!

"JUST… A FEW… MORE!" Vegeta shouted between blows.

Because he was so preoccupied with trying to dig through the shield, the prince completely missed the sight of the skull-faced alien retracting its two, ribbon-like arms and rolling them up under its shoulder plates. While the warrior pounded away at the barrier, the extra terrestrial spread its cowl of smaller ribbons behind it like wings and, coiling its two main appendages into drums, took aim at its target.

Sensing an incredible energy spike, Vegeta stopped and looked up. A split second later, in a move similar to Piccolo's Mystic Attack, the alien suddenly fired its two arms at the prince at light speed, its arms shooting out like lances and catching the Super Saiyan completely by surprise. A gasp escaped the man's lips, followed immediately by a sickening 'crunch' when the alien's two extending appendages slammed into him and propelled the man forty kilometers across the countryside.

The alien's arms, capable of slicing through entire planetoids, extended even further, traveling over a hundred miles and cutting through mountain ranges one after the other like they weren't even there. Upon effectively impaling its target with its arms and leaving him hanging in the middle, it then whipped them in two directions. The result was instantaneous, as not only was Vegeta's side effectively ripped open, but his left arm was severed clean from his shoulder and sent hurtling into the forest.

Immediately upon dealing his enemy a devastating blow, the extra terrestrial retracted its two arms back to its sides.

With blood dribbling from his side and spraying out of the stump where his arm used to be, Vegeta gripped his wounds tightly and snarled in rage. Suspending himself in front of his opponent positioned several miles away the wounded Super Saiyan focused all of his attention on the creature and watched it float tauntingly out of reach.

"D-Damn you… damn yooouuuu!"

The alien drew back its arms and coiled them under its shoulders once again.

Overwhelmed with pain and his adrenaline rushing through him like nitrous in an engine, the wounded Saiyan suppressed all fear and reason to the deepest pits of his stomach. Powering up once more, Vegeta then rocketed towards his foe with a howl of fury, "RAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAARGH!" Breaking the sound barrier several times on approach, he was well on his way to colliding with the beast.

But before he could even get half way, the creature, primed and ready for his attack, fired its ribbon arms at the man once more.

Vegeta only had a split second to recoil in horror when, in the blink of an eye, the attack slammed headlong into him with tremendous force…

OOO

(Capsule Corp)

The sound of the creature's attack striking the Super Saiyan echoed clear across the countryside, shaking the sky above and the ground at the people's feet. The impact was so deafening and so pronounced that even someone as ki retardant as Bulma was able to feel it. From her spot at the helm of her enormous cannon, through the visor giving her a telescopic view of the battle, the woman saw her husband get struck down by the beast's mighty attack and her eyes widened in shock.

"VEGETA!" she cried out, leaning over the console in horror as she saw the man's body fly in their direction. Just a few seconds after her scream rang out, she saw the Saiyan Prince hit the city and plough through several buildings.

The row of skyscrapers exploding one after the other as a hole was punched through them, Vegeta's body eventually crash-landed several blocks away from Capsule Corp. His hapless form making contact with the ground produced a mushroom cloud of dust and debris, and when the sky eventually cleared, it revealed a huge crater had been formed in the middle of a crossroad.

When the civilians in the area peered into the hole to see what had caused it, they saw Vegeta's gashed up and broken body at the base of it, his hair black and blood dripping out of multiple battle wounds. Twitching and coughing out in agony, the man was down, but not out.

However, his prolonged consciousness did little to cover up the fact that he'd been absolutely wrecked by the monster with only two hits.

At first the people surrounding the crater clamored in concern, believing the man to be dead. But when they saw him roll over and crawl out of the hole, everyone backed away when the Saiyan Prince, gasping for air, came back to ground level and snarled irately. Blood dribbling down his face, the warrior gritted his teeth towards the monstrous entity hovering over the horizon.

"This… proves… nothing," Vegeta growled, pulling himself up little by little, leaving a trail of blood in his wake. "What? Did you think… I would roll over and die… from an attack like that?" Yelling out painfully, the stricken fighter forced himself to his knees. Gripping the stump that was his arm, the warrior growled as he took several deep breaths to suppress the bolts of pain shooting through his entire body and shook his head. "It's not over… not until I say so!"

His words were chiefly ignored, as the extra terrestrial focused all of its attention on the large city standing before it. Its ribbon appendages waving about on either side of it, it began floating towards the great metropolis.

Gritting her teeth after seeing her man get knocked down, the blue haired scientist then focused all her attention back on the invader. Quickly typing into the console beside her, lights quickly sprang up followed by an enormous crosshair, which began homing in on the advancing alien. Due to its sheer size, it was floating smack bang in the middle of it, and as the computer started calibrating, so did the cannon. The loud hum of powerful engines echoed across the property as the battery charged itself.

As soon as the arming process as underway, Bulma tapped into the intercom, "DAD! Are all the power lines hooked up?!"

The elderly scientist, who was standing near the receiving terminal, quickly linked back with his daughter. "They're all set, honey!

"Alright!" the woman shouted as she took hold of the lever next to her and snapped it back. The result was an even louder hum echoing out as the enormous gun's main lines connected and began pulsing with energy. "Get to the nearest walkway and brace yourself! This is going to be big!"

The founder of the company, sweating bullets and looking completely nervous, quickly responded to the operator. "Are you sure about this, dear? You do realize that if this thing misfires, there's a ninety percent chance that it's going to sterilize the entire planet."

"It won’t, dad! Trust me!" Bulma yelled, clenching her jaw tightly as her grip around the firing handles tightened. As soon as they did, she saw several more crosshairs and numbers jump up on screen, at the same time the scope narrowed down on the towering creature bearing down on their position. "The angle is perfect! When I fire this gun, the blast will travel away from the earth and detonate harmlessly in outer space!"

Her calculations were perfect. With the amount of energy this thing could generate, she knew she would be able to get through that retched thing's shields like a knife through butter.

Still feeling concern over the whole situation, the father nodded back to the terminal and went about his final task. "Okay. I trust you." He then signed off, quickly jumping down from the platform in the rear and running down the walkway. Checking the dials one last time, he then took hold of the walkway's railing and braced himself.

As soon as he did so, the old scientist then felt an enormous set of arms wrap around him and looked over his shoulder. When he did, he saw the hulking form of his daughter's Android 16 unit standing behind him and smiling.

"Do you require assistance, Doctor Briefs?" the ever inquisitive automaton asked.

Blinking a couple of times, the old man smiled back, "Brace yourself, big guy. This is going to be a close one."

"Parameters recognized," the orange haired root replied, locking his feet into place as the pair gripped the railing. "Safety protocols engaged. Beginning countdown."

This was it.
The main reactor of the artillery piece groaned loudly as electricity pulsed up every single cable hooked into the weapon. The result was the entire area being subjected to a storm of raw energy zapping this way and that, striking the ground and frying everything it touched. All the people in the vicinity of the company literally had to duck and cover when bolts of lightning shot off of the enormous gun and began attacking the surrounding buildings. Glass shattering and roadways being ploughed by multiple streams of energy, the whole event marked the closing stages of the weapon's firing sequence.

The timer sitting in front of Bulma helped too. With a series of numbers blazing past her on all sides, the woman was given a complete perspective of her weapon's phases. Thanks to her father, not only were the primary nodes hooked in, but the ammunition had been loaded, the backup units had been adapted to prevent overload, and the city's main terminals had been linked up to the core firing mechanism. The latter resulted in every single light in all of West City flickering out of control, with those nearest to the weapon shattering when the power in them began surging through.

Within moments, the engine was ready and, with the reactor magazine glowing brightly and transforming into a miniature sun inside of the globe, the towering cannon was set to fire. The invader apparently sensed the danger.

Stopping dead in its tracks on the very outskirts of the city, the skull-faced, cowl-draped extra terrestrial snarled loudly and focused all of its attention on the massive gun on the other side of the city. Its red eyes flaring brightly, it prepared to shoot out the artillery piece before it had a chance to blast it.

However, just before it could, a series of explosions impacting its shield from behind had it spin around and glare furiously. When it did, it saw Android 17, Android 18, Krillin, Tien, Chiaotzu and Yamcha, all bearing debilitating injuries, scattered throughout the sky behind it with their hands pointed in its direction. Almost as soon as it caught sight of them, the group began firing upon it with an onslaught of continuous energy blasts, which detonated against its force field over and over again without effect. They weren't the only ones to attack it either.

The battleships floating off shore also began lobbing shells at it as well, their big guns going off and hitting it from the side in a nonstop bombardment. Jets also started flying in from the carriers and launching missiles at it, making several passes on the behemoth and drawing an irritable growl from the invading giant.

Pissed off at the number of flies shooting at it, the alien instead turned its ire on them. With a quick swipe of its ribbon, it generated a blast of wind that smacked all of the wounded Z-fighters out of the air and sent them flying across the charred landscape, knocking out several planes at the same time. After that, it then turned its fury on the battleships floating over the horizon.

Eyes flaring dangerously, it prepared to lob an energy blast at them. But just when it was in the middle of charging, a huge, golden sphere of energy slammed into it from the side and ploughed into its shield like a blowtorch. The attack shattering a few layers of its barrier, the sneak attack also managed to nudge the creature to the side a bit before it detonated with the force of a star. When the smoke and fire faded from the searing explosion faded, the completely unscathed invader turned to another part of the sky, where it spotted Piccolo floating a kilometer out with both hands extended.

Panting heavily from unleashing a full-power Light Grenade on the beast, the Namekian shouted at it, "Come on. Bring it! I'm still standing."
The warrior's words eliciting a gurgling sound from the extra terrestrial, the creature then focused all of its attention on the fighter and prepared to attack.

Vegeta, who'd managed to pick himself off of the floor, was now up in the sky above the city watching Piccolo face off against their enemy. With all of the damage he'd sustained, the Saiyan was lucky to be even conscious. However, being the persistent fighter that he was, it would take a lot more than a missing or broken arm to put him down for good.

Thanks to all the time the invader had wasted getting rid of the people attacking it from behind, it failed to destroy the enormous gun powering up on the other side of the city.

The second it turned its attention to Piccolo, it left itself wide open.

Bracing herself against the controls, Bulma smirked. "Alright you freak... EAT THIS!" With a quick grunt, she pulled the trigger.

All at once, the entire sky lit up with a blinding flash of light and a brilliant blue beam rocketed out of the cannon's barrel. The attack was so fast and so powerful that simply launching the blast caused the entire cannon to lurch backwards and a shockwave to reverberate across the region. With people crying out in terror when the ground shook all around them, everyone in the vicinity then watched as a powerful beam shot across the sky like a lightning bolt and made a B-line towards the distracted alien.

The flash of light immediately drew the extra terrestrial's attention, the behemoth turning just in time to see a wall of light charging towards it. A split second later, a loud squelch sound echoed out when the beam not only shattered every single layer of the shield surrounding the alien like they weren't even there, it went straight through its chest and out the other side. Such was the attack that it continued to travel across the ocean, through the atmosphere, and off of the planet.

The miniature solar reactor that powered the weapon burned up completely and went out, and every single electrical appliance on that part of the continent shut down, as all the power had been knocked out. When the beam eventually faded, it left a trail of shaken onlookers, smoke, and a gap in the ozone layer that would not be disappearing anytime soon.

It also left a gaping hole in the alien's chest that, upon being exposed to the air, began gushing blood out of both the entry and exit wounds. The Z-fighters, stunned by the power of the highly energized beam, gawked at the alien as it floated there, frozen in shock.

Then, after several seconds of tense silence, the extra terrestrial let out a bellowing screech of agony that had everyone within twenty miles clap their hands over their ears as it rocked the countryside with its pain.

Its ribbon appendages flailing around wildly, the alien looked just about ready to keel over. The sight had Piccolo clench his fists, hoping that it was finally over. But just when it seemed like it was about to die, the titan suddenly stopped screaming and glared towards the city.

The sight of the creature's hateful gaze landing on her had Bulma's eyes widen in bewilderment, "Fuck me, I'm dead."

Skull lighting up, the alien let out a terrifying shriek, fired a gargantuan blast from its mouth and hurtled it towards the thing responsible for the attack.

Due to his grievous injuries, Vegeta was unable to do anything except gawk in shock as the massive blast struck the large artillery piece sitting inside of Capsule Corp and disintegrated half of it. The beast's aim obviously thrown off by a few inches, it was unable to incinerate the entire cannon as the other half of the big gun exploded and collapsed to the ground in a pile of flaming debris. The resulting counterattack also took out half of the company's main structure, which had thankfully been emptied of its entire staff earlier that day.

With the blast detonating over the horizon, the damage to the city was done. Now sporting a large trench across its estate, the Briefs property had been effectively cut in half by the monster's glancing shot. In the midst of all the chaos, Vegeta quickly flew over to assess the damage and, his chest filling with dread, suspended himself over the wreckage of the artillery piece.

Looking down, the Saiyan Prince saw a frazzled Doctor Briefs pick himself off of the ground with the help of Android 16. The black kitten also emerging from the rubble, the three of them appeared shaken but ultimately unharmed. However, when the prince's charcoal eyes scanned over the rest of the wreckage, his gaze then landed on the remains of the pilot seat. There, with her body thrown halfway out of the cockpit, Vegeta saw Bulma lying in the ruins of her invention, covered in burns, cuts, and bleeding from the head.

Sensing her barely registering ki signature was one thing.

Seeing his wife in such a mangled state was another thing entirely.

Expression reflecting nothing but shock and disbelief, Vegeta's eyes then narrowed harshly and an animalistic growl escaped his lips. "That… was my wife!" His body starting to tremble and his fist tightening like a vice, the warrior spun around and faced the towering entity floating on the other side of the city. The sight of it causing the man to shake even more, with rage and anger pulsing through every vein in his body, it almost seemed like Vegeta was about to lose it.

A few moments later… that's exactly what happened.

"How dare YOUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUU!" the Prince roared at the top of his lungs. With a cry that could be heard across the entire city, the man exploded.

Vegeta's ki skyrocketing, his golden aura blasted from his body like a hurricane, the force of which caused a dozen buildings in the area to collapse from the shockwave and a crater to form directly beneath his position. In a flash of light, the warrior's hair turned blonde and spiked up, and his eyes flickered to a shade of turquoise. To top off his sudden and instantaneous transformation, currents of blue electricity began shooting off of him as well; filling the sky with streams of lightning and the sounds of rolling thunder. The effects brought on by his power up not only had the people on the ground ducking for cover as their environment was subjected to yet another intense maelstrom, but it succeeded in catching the invader's full and undivided attention.

The enormous alien balked at the Saiyan's power up while Piccolo, who was floating nearby, also looked on in amazement as he witnessed Vegeta's jump to the next level.

Feeling the power brought on by his ascension, the now Super Saiyan 2 warrior fixed his hate filled glare upon the extra terrestrial and, priming himself for battle, blasted forward in a blur of motion. His charge being marked by several shockwaves, the prince barreled towards the enemy without fear or hesitation.

Even his grievous injuries didn't slow him down.

"YOU BASTARD!" Vegeta roared, throwing a punch with his free hand that collided with the alien's face and sent it blasting backwards, a loud thunderclap resounding across the country.
Shrieking in surprise, the beast spun around and attempted to shoot the man out of the sky. But just as its eyes were starting to shine, the glowing warrior shot around and kicked it across the face, sending the beast stumbling in another direction. Again and again Vegeta chased after it, hammering blows into its face over and over again. Every attack he landed caused the earth to shake and crack under the force as he forced the creature into a hasty retreat. Soon enough, he'd managed to land enough hits to the alien's face that its carapace head had started to crack and bleed.

After driving yet another kick into its forehead that sent the extra terrestrial crashing to the ground, Vegeta powered up and blasted high into the sky. "GO TO HELL!" As soon as he'd gained an ideal position, the prince cocked his hand back and, charging a purple sphere of energy in his palm, launched a massive blast straight down at the creature. "GALICK GUN FIIIIIEEEEEEEE!"

His scream was drowned out by the sound of his attack leaving his hand. The beam came down on top of the creature like the sun itself. But just when it seemed like it would hit, the invader suddenly sat up and, with a shriek of its own, produced a massive hexagonal force field in front of it. The wall jumped up in time to receive the attack, which collided with earth splitting force. In a matter of moments, the skies and ground started to tremble as an intense tug-of-war match ensued.

Pissed off by the obstruction, Vegeta bellowed out one last time and poured another heap of energy into his attack, which traveled down the length of the blast and arrived at the head. As soon as it did, a blinding flash of light occurred, followed by a massive explosion that covered the entire horizon outside of West City. Purple fire filled the sky in the form of a geyser like blast that not only broke through the atmosphere, but distorted the entire face of the planet.

People cried out in terror at the sight of the blast, while the Z-fighters held on for dear life under the gale force winds rippling out from the explosion's incredible shockwave. The ships out on the ocean were lucky to remain floating as massive waves slammed into them over and over again.

Eventually, the blast died out and when the air finally cleared, it revealed Vegeta still floating high up in the sky with his hand extended. Panting heavily, the Prince's first thought was that he'd annihilated his target. But when the smog slowly cleared, not only did he see a charred landscape covered in ash that was a direct result from his attack, but the alien standing perfectly intact in the center of it.

Piccolo, who'd watched the whole thing from his position, was gob smacked that the thing was still alive.

Both Super Saiyan 2 and invader squared off, their energy flaring and eyes locked firmly on the other.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

On another part of the planet, far out of reach of the ongoing conflict, a pair of charcoal eyes flickered open to the sight of the clear blue sky high above. Groaning uncomfortably, Gohan took a few seconds to regain his bearings and reestablish a connection with his body's nerve endings, before finally deciding to move. His fingers twitching as he sat up, the teen's gaze then fell upon what he immediately identified as farmland stretched out all around him.

"Ugh. What the-? What did I miss?" the hybrid in the slightly dusty outfit asked out loud. It was by this point in time he turned to see the familiar form of Korin's friend and work partner kneeling beside him, dressed in his pinstriped orange robe with his trusted katana sheathed at his beltline. "Oh. Yajirobe. You're here."

"Yeah," the burly swordsman answered with a smirk, "Korin sent me down here to fetch you guys. Took me a while, but I finally managed to locate you after a quick sweep of the area. Looks like that Senzu bean did the trick."

"Sure seems that way. Thanks."

"No problem. You know, your girl friend must be pretty tough as well if she managed to survive a fall from that height. The blue chick too," Yajirobe remarked, his gaze never leaving the young man for a moment.

Completely overlooking the girlfriend jab, Gohan quickly addressed the man with his next immediately inquiry, "Videl and Zangya… are they okay?"

"Yeah. They're over there nursing their hangovers," the swordsman continued, thumbing towards the two girls behind him, who were just now sitting up in the small craters they'd formed several yards from each other. "I gotta say; you three really know how to pick a place to crash-land. Consider yourselves lucky that the ground here was so soft."

Massaging the bruise on the back of his head, which slowly faded away due to the effects of the medicine he'd taken, the young man then turned his attention to the setting. At first not finding anything wrong with his current location, when memories of the event that led to him being knocked out in the first place finally returned to him, the demi-Saiyan furrowed his brow and quickly turned to his group's supplementary member.

"What happened to the meteorite? Did we manage to stop it?" Gohan asked, quickly getting right to the point.

"If by 'stop it' you mean 'pissed it off', then yeah. You stopped it alright," Yajirobe responded sarcastically, eliciting a worried look from the half-Saiyan sitting in the dirt. "It turns out that 'meteorite' you guys shot at was an enormous alien monster disguised as a large space rock that is right now raising hell on the other side of the continent. Dende filled me in on the details while I was heading down here. The others are fighting it as we speak and I gotta say man, it's not looking so good."

Nodding his head in understanding, Gohan stood up. "Then we should get going." Groaning as he stood up from the dirt, the youngster turned his attention to where Zangya and Videl were sitting not too far from him. "How are you guys feeling? You holding up okay?"

"That all depends," Videl groaned, massaging the side of her head as she staggered towards the demi-Saiyan. Peering up at him, the raven haired girl squinted slightly, "My neck is stiff, my leg's cramped up, and I feel like I was just run over by a friggin steam roller. But other than that, I'm feeling great."

"Ugh." Zangya, rolling her shoulder a few times as well, groaned tiredly, "Did someone catch the number of that bus? What the hell was that thing?"

"I'm not sure," Gohan replied, turning heel and glancing across the countryside thoughtfully. "Whatever it was, it was powerful… and it was able to take all of us out in one shot without even breaking a sweat."

"So humor me a little. What exactly are we up against here?" Zangya asked, glaring at the teen as he slowly turned to face them again. When Yajirobe came to stand by their formation to listen in on their conversation, the Hera continued on with her assessment of the situation, "In all my years of traveling across the universe and conquering planets with Bojack's crew, I've never encountered a creature like this before. It was massive... almost the size of a small moon, and it had a powerful force field protecting it."

"That's probably the reason why our attacks didn't work against it," Videl murmured, glancing towards her best friend nervously. "You were a Super Saiyan and it shrugged off your strongest blast like it was nothing." How in the world could they possibly fight something like that?

His expression reflecting his immediate concern over the issue, Gohan glanced at the raven haired girl and narrowed his eyes. "There was also something off about its ki signature. Its energy... it wasn't reading like a living creature or an alien. No. This thing... it was reading more like a planet than anything else..."

This information had the group take a few moments of pause. However, while they were dawning on this newfound data and began trying to come up with an answer to the question as to what this terrifying invader was, they were suddenly interrupted from their train of thought by a voice echoing in from above.

"Gohan? Gohan... can you hear me?"

The nasally voice cutting into their conversation immediately had all heads shoot up in response to the familiar tone.

"King Kai? Is that you?" the demi-Saiyan asked.

"Yeah. It's me, kiddo. How are you three doing down there? Are all of you guys still in one piece?"

"More or less. We're still breathing and our limbs are still attached. That's all I can really say for now," the spiky haired fighter replied. "Where's dad at?"

"Oh. Goku? He's dealing with a revolt down in hell involving those idiots Cell and Android 13. It's gotten pretty messy for King Yemma, but I see you've got problems of your own going on."

"You can say that again." While the other three stood around him listening into the telepathic feed, Gohan continued with his string of questions. "Please. Can you tell us anything about the alien that's attacking our planet?"

He needed information. If they had any chance of stopping whatever the hell this titan was, then he needed to know everything about it; its history, its strengths, its weaknesses, it's mannerisms... any bit of data that could give them a shot of either kicking it off of their world or destroying it for good.

The overseer of the Northern Quadrant took a deep breath at the teen's inquisition, a bead of sweat breaking out on the side of his head. "I don't know how to break this to yah kid, but it's even worse than it appears." The news had all four fighters present open their ears wide and tune in to the guardian's lecture. "The entity that you three encountered is descended from an ancient race of creatures called Asters, which inhabited the furthest corners of the universe millions of years before the first Kais even came into existence. They're enormous asteroid sized aliens that wandered between planets, feeding on their life energy and leaving behind nothing but death and decay. The people of Sariel called this particular entity Zeru; which translates to 'Planet 'Eater' or 'Wandering Death', and was regarded by many as a God. But in truth, it's actually a veracious parasite that sucks entire worlds dry of all their nutrients... turning them into empty, lifeless husks.'

Videl felt her spirit sink at this piece of info. "Well that's comforting."

"Because it feeds primarily on planets, it doesn't register as an organic life form. More like the planets it's previously absorbed. This not only grants it enormous levels of energy, but abilities that allow it to cope with the harshest conditions imaginable."

Gohan glanced down considerately at the news. "That probably explains why we didn't know it was alive until it unfurled itself and attacked us." In all honestly, that was a real slap to the face if there ever was one.

"Nothing but a good, old-fashioned butt kicking to remind you never to judge a book by its cover," Zangya added as her face hardened at the realization of their group's most recent blunder. "So what's the deal? Are there even more of these things flying around out there... or is there just the one?"

"There used to be hundreds of them. They were like locusts, wiping out entire galaxies in a matter of hours. But they all died out many years ago. This one may very well be the last of that long forgotten race," King Kai informed, clenching his fists tightly as he continued feeding the group his two-cents on their adversary. "Be careful. You're dealing with an entity far greater than anything you've ever faced before. It's incredibly powerful, able to carve through entire suns without even flinching, and is able to distort light and space around it. There's no telling what else this creature is capable of."

"We gathered that much. Thanks, King Kai," Gohan replied, nodding towards the sky and turning back to engage with his friends. "We'll be in touch."

"Good luck," the guardian replied, cutting out a few seconds later.

As soon as the Kai's voice went quiet, the trio stood in place for several long seconds. The information being allowed to percolate in their heads for a little while, filling them with a mixture of thoughts and feelings, their attention was soon pulled over to Yajirobe, who held up the bag of Senzu beans to their team's leader.

"You're gonna need these."

"Yeah. I think so," Gohan murmured, taking the bag from the swordsman and weighing it in his hand.

"It's times like this that I don't envy you super-powered types. I'm not gonna lie. If it was me out there fighting the big battles... honestly... the earth would probably be long gone by now," the stout fighter informed while crossing his arms seriously. "You guys go on ahead. I'll catch up with you later."

Acknowledging the man's words, the demi-Saiyan then turned to the two girls standing alongside him. Upon assessing their current states of dress and physical conditions, he quickly held his fingers out to them and, with an effortless grunt, fired a white beam at each of them in turn. When the electricity faded, it revealed Videl standing in a brand new orange and blue gi and Zangya dressed in a pair of white short-shorts, a white tube-top with golden buckles, black arm sleeves, golden boots, and a purple cowl wrapped around her waist. As soon as they found themselves adorned in their signature martial arts attire, they immediately began checking themselves out.

"There goes a one-thousand, five-hundred zeni dress," the blue-skinned alien sighed as she inspected her uniform, made especially by Son Gohan Incorporated. "Oh well. It was a tacky thing anyway."

"Could've fooled me," Videl replied, exchanging smirks with the Hera before turning to speak with her best friend. When she did, she saw the teen's outdoor clothes transform into his signature orange and blue gi, which he wore proudly like the devil himself. The sight put a smile on the teen's face, "So... what's the plan, Gohan?"

The half-Saiyan smirked back at them, "Easy; we get out there, pull our friends out of the fire, and save the world."

"I thought you would say something like that," Videl answered, bringing her hands up and slamming her knuckles into her open palm in a guts-pose. "Alright. Let's do this."

Appearing excited, the hybrid then glanced to his right and flexed his shoulder to the orange haired woman behind him. Quickly catching the hint of what he was asking, Zangya stepped forward and grabbed his gi. As soon as she had a hold of him, the alien fighter then watched the sole human member of their trio loop her arms around Gohan's free one. As soon as he was certain everyone was aboard, the demi-Saiyan turned and saluted Yajirobe.

"See you around, man. And thanks."

"Yeah. See yah," the rotund fighter nodded and watched the three vanish in a golden flash of light. When the area finally cleared, the swordsman looked around the field he was standing in and, taking note of the ruined patches of land and the farm in the distance, grunted indignantly. "Well. No sense in hanging around here anymore." He then turned heel and headed for the flying car he had parked over by the stone wall.

OOO

(Back near West City)

A chain of thermonuclear explosions ripped across the decimated landscape of the west coast, each blast taking the shape of a fiery crucifix as the attacking alien rained hell down upon his opponent. In response to the terrifying assault, the still infuriated and adrenaline driven Vegeta returned fire with a series of concussive blasts of his own, which tore into the alien's defensive barrier and managed to strike it several times in the body. But after a furious barrage that would've made even the strongest warriors on the planet flinch, the creature simply took the bombardment and walked right through it.

Bearing a few scuff marks, cracks and burns from an already lengthy battle, the extra terrestrial beast emerged from the attack relatively unscathed.

Collapsing to his knees in the middle of the ash-covered wasteland, the still powered up Vegeta panted exhaustedly as he glared across at the invader. Clenching his fist tightly, a current of electricity shot up his arm as he motivated himself to keep going. He threw Zeru a hate filled look, which he quickly topped with a menacing smirk. "Come on. I'm not finished... you disgusting freak!"

His shout eliciting a snarl from the titan, the enormous, ribbon-armed creature then decided to take more effective action against his now noticeably more powerful adversary. Suddenly crouching... low to the ground, the floating invader then sprang high into the sky, rocketing straight into the lower atmosphere. Its ascent causing the clouds to part, Vegeta then watched in bewilderment as the beast raised its head and began charging a large sphere of energy in front of its mouth.

Photons of light converging around the orb, it soon began to grow and expand to a gargantuan size. In a matter of seconds, the fiery collection of energy became as big as a small moon, its light spilling across the entire region. The observing Z-fighters who were still conscious, Piccolo, Android 18 and Trunks included, could only gape in disbelief and fear as the ball of ki filled the sky and its glow filled them with a sense of foreboding.

"I-impossible," the Namekian choked out. "There's no way that blast is meant for us! That's enough energy to wipe out the entire planet ten times!"

The sight of the blast horrified Vegeta, whose body started to tremble under the pressure instilled by the growing blast.

As soon as the attack achieved stability, Zeru leaned forward and hurled it straight towards the planet. Literally breaking through the atmosphere due to its size, the fiery attack instantly picked up speed as it plummeted towards the earth's surface, when in reality it was aimed directly at the wounded Saiyan Prince.

Clenching his jaw fearfully, the man prepared to stand, "Darn it…" Beads of sweat trickling down his face, the warrior felt the heat of the attack engulf him as it came closer and closer.

In the condition that he was in, Vegeta knew there was no way he would be able to stop that attack. As far as he knew, he and this entire planet were about to go out like a light bulb reaching the end of its cycle against the backdrop of space.

As the attack continued its descent, causing gale force winds to rip across the entire nation, the wounded prince was then caught completely by surprise when a figure landed directly in front of him.

Her long hair flushed red and skin green, the outline of Zangya appeared before the wounded prince, assumed in her Super Hera form with a determined look pulled across her face. Gritting her teeth at the approaching planet-splitter and sending energy into her finger tips, the woman quickly took a stance and cocked her hands back.

"Beauty Net!" With a shout of effort, the Hera swiped her hands through the air, producing several strings of energy-absorbing wires that created a protective net over her before expanding towards the approaching attack at blinding speed.

Her large barrier struck the fiery sphere headlong and sliced it to ribbons, carving the entire ball up like a birthday cake. When it was only a few hundred meters above the ground, the enormous orb of hellfire and energy broke apart; the pieces suddenly compressing and scattering across the country with a clap of thunder. The individual segments rocketed off in random directions, some flying up into space while the others impacted randomly on different parts of the continent, going up in flashy, dome-shaped explosions. Those that shot off across the solar system blew up harmlessly away from the earth, sparing it from further punishment.

When the shaking eventually subsided and the energy ball had been successfully dispelled, Vegeta looked up and stared at the back of his savior. Zangya, who was still staring up at the sky where the alien could be seen floating, grunted and glanced over her shoulder at the Prince. One look at his current state and condition told the Hera everything she needed to know.
"Hey, Vegeta. Need a hand?"

The Super Saiyan 2 spat to the side and glared back at her, "Fuck off."

"Thought so." Grinning at their short, verbal feud, she then spun around and glared ahead of her, where she saw the enormous alien land a couple of kilometers away. "Gohan's currently checking up on the others. He'll be here in a minute."

Vegeta grunted in response. "Whatever. It's not like I need his help. I have it on the ropes."

Swinging her arms around and limbering up, the red haired alien girl ignored the man's retort and fixed her toughest glare on the titan. Upon hearing it give a screeching battle cry, Zangya smirked back at it. "Alright, cockbite. Round two!" Green aura exploding off of her body as she powered up, the Super Hera then blasted off from the ground and rocketed towards the alien faster than any of the observing Z-fighters could track.

Arcing through the air and breaking the sound barrier several times, she reached her quarry in under a second and opened up with a swinging right overhand. A loud bellow escaping her lips, she attempted to deck the massive alien across the face, only for her knuckles to collide with its specially reinforced shield. The hexagonal wall sprang up at full power in front of the girl, causing her fist to ram into it with a resounding clang. Despite her attack bouncing off of it, Zangya persisted and began pummeling the barrier with focused power shots one after the other, causing her target to lurch backwards with every hit as she attempted to get to it.

Gritting her teeth as she saw the energy field begin to crack, the Hera continued hammering away until she saw its eyes flash red, followed immediately by a deafening roar. What came immediately afterwards was a colossal shockwave, which not only shredded the ruined countryside around the creature like it was confetti, but sent Zangya spiraling through the air.

Pelted by rubble and debris, the frustrated Hera stopped her flight with a quick ki burst and glared at her foe heatedly. Exhaling sharply, the girl powered up and charged in again. But just as she was diving for it, she suddenly observed Zeru's two main appendages retract and form into two drums under its shoulder plates. The sudden spike in ki alerting her to danger, Zangya then saw the beast take aim and launch its arms at her, extending them at ludicrous speed.

Reacting instantly, the girl pulled up and evaded the ribbons when they shot past her. Seeing them arc across the sky, she then noticed the ends of the spears suddenly change directions and fly after her. Giving a frustrated yell when she realized they were tracking her, the Hera pulled up and rocketed up into the sky, its two extendable arms chasing her down like a pair of heat-seeking missiles.

Leaving a vapor trail in her wake, Zangya performed a variety of aerial maneuvers and flips, attempting to throw the arms off her tail.

Eventually getting sick of being chased by this thing, the girl pointed her hand down at Zeru and let loose a continuous stream of red energy blasts. The attacks rained down on the creature like rockets, smashing into its shield one after the other, to no avail.

"Shit!" Immediately finding annoyance with the extra terrestrial, the Hera kicked away its ribbon arms when they eventually caught up to her and sent them off to the side. Seeing them retract after their failed attempt to impale her, Zangya cocked her hands back before throwing them forward, unleashing a green blast down at the invader. "Suck it!"

Eyes flashing red, the creature let out a howl and fired its own beam at the approaching attack, its counter easily overpowering hers before continuing its flight up to the Hera. Caught by surprise, Zangya prepared to deflect it, only to see a golden sphere shoot up from below and smack the approaching beam out of the way. Watching the attack detonate elsewhere over the horizon, the redhead spared a glance towards ground zero, where she saw Vegeta standing with his hand extended and smoking.

Gritting his teeth, the Super Saiyan 2 turned his attention to the extra terrestrial and lobbed a blue blast at it. The alien promptly slapped his attack out of the way and, snarling, turned its attention to the prince.

Eyes lighting up, it prepared to fire a third blast at him. But just when it was in the middle of charging up, a flash of golden light directly to its right caught its attention before a Super Saiyan 2 Gohan teleported directly beside it and slammed a fully charged Bakumadan right into its face. The sphere of energy exploded with concussive force against the alien's cheek, consuming it in a blinding flash of fire and smoke that sent it barreling across the countryside. It eventually collided with a partially destroyed mountain and caved it in as it collapsed to its back.

When it eventually recovered, the writhing beast's face appeared from the smoke and revealed half of it had been blown away, leaving only half of its skull-like mask intact. Clearly wounded and surprised by the attack, Zeru glared in the direction of its new opponent and saw him standing atop a plateau several clicks out.

Hair and gi bellowing on the wind, the golden haired warrior narrowed his eyes on the snarling creature and, upon getting a good bead on his foe, allowed a few sparks of electricity to shoot off of him. "Here I go!" Taking off from his spot, the boy shot towards the creature in a blur of movement. Zipping left and right, throwing the alien off with his sudden directional changes, he eventually appeared directly on its left and slammed a kick across its face, sending Zeru staggering across the countryside.

Giving chase, Gohan closed the distance on it and avoided the arm it swung out to counter him, nailing it between the eyes with an elbow. Causing stumble, he then nailed it with a swinging punch over the top of its head, followed by a hook across its face and then a kick straight up into its lower jaw. Each blow was marked by a deafening thunderclap, indicating just how much force the boy was inflicting upon his foe. Eventually, following a vicious assault, the Super Saiyan nailed it with a sidekick across its cheek, giving the demi-Saiyan an opportunity to spring off of it and spin to the ground.

Landing deftly atop another plateau, Gohan then sprang into the air a second time and, powering up, flew at the creature's face with his right fist cocked back. With a yell, he decked the creature in the neck with a full-power swing, a blow that not only caved in its flesh in that particular area, but sent the enormous beast hurtling across the West Coast. It eventually crashed into the ocean, causing a massive tsunami that washed over a large island before Zeru's back slammed into it and flattened it under its weight.

Trembling, the creature sat up against the isle and glared in the direction of its powerful attacker. But just when it was in the process of recovering, the invader suddenly saw its opponent power up and, in the form of a golden comet, slammed into it headlong. Gohan ploughed the beast through the ocean and back onto dry land. Destroying several islands along the way, the Super Saiyan 2 eventually pinned the beast against the cliffs of another beach further up the coastline, where Gohan then knelt atop Zeru's chest and began driving punches into it from above one after the other.

Yelling out with every blow he drilled into the beast's ribs, the teen started burying the extra terrestrial into the planet's surface with attacks capable of turning entire moons into dust. The shockwaves echoed all around, stunning onlookers and rattling the planet at the amount of raw power being displayed.

He had it on the ropes!

The Z-fighters thought Gohan was going to win!

But just as the teen was starting to break through the alien's sternum, Zeru's eyes suddenly shot open and flashed with rage. A split second later, a purple blast exploded from its gaze, colliding with the boy and sending him rocketing across the sky, consumed by fire and raw energy. Crying out in agony as his clothes were shredded and his skin was burnt in the inferno of the beam, the Super Saiyan eventually rolled out of the path of the attack and allowed it to shoot across the planet's surface and out of its atmosphere.

When the planet disintegrating beam ceased, Gohan spun to face the downed Zeru and cried out at the top of his lungs, "NOW'S YOUR CHANCE, ZANGYA!"

Just as the monster was in the process of sitting up, a yell from the side drew its attention into the path of Zangya's kick, which connected with a deafening 'boom' and sent it crashing across the coastline. When its shoulder slammed into a mountain, it snarled and launched one of its extendable arms at the Hera, who leapt over the ribbon appendage and produced a stream of energy wires from her fingers. In the blink of an eye, the Hera managed to loop all of them around the alien's limbs and torso, entangling it and stopping it in its tracks.

Lurching forward when the beast fought against the strings, Zangya gritted her teeth angrily and powered up. Touching down on solid ground, the woman then proceeded to hold the enormous beast in place with all her strength. Her feet dragging through the dirt while she focused all her energy into her legs and arms, she then yelled out across the countryside to all those who could hear her. "FINISH IT!"

Appearing in the skies above the beast, the Z-fighters, having each received a Senzu Bean from Gohan, opened fire on the creature. Videl led the charge with a Kamehameha wave alongside Krillin, Goten, Trunks and Yamcha. They were shortly joined by Tien and Chiaotzu unleashing their best attacks on it as well, golden blasts rocketing from their hands and slamming into the alien from above with tremendous force. Androids 17 and 18 added to the assault with a combined rain of continuous energy blasts, which began hammering away at the creature without remorse. This was then topped by Piccolo launching a powerful Masenko beam from its flank, hitting it square in the neck and pushing it down even further.

To finish off the attack, Gohan came in with a Flash Madan, his blue beam slamming into the creature and drawing a shriek of agony from it, while Vegeta caught it in a cross fire with a one-handed Galick Gun from behind.

Beam attacks fired from all sides proceeded to roast the creature into oblivion. Writhing under the onslaught, Zeru attempted to fight its way free. But due to the streams of wires holding it down, all it could do was writhe and screech helplessly as the attacks began carving into its flesh. The smell of burning cephalopod filled the air along with an arrangement of blinding lights and smoke, setting the stage for a spectacular finish.

Determined to bring this fight to an end, everyone put everything they had into one last spurt.

However, the creature wasn't finished yet.
Seemingly submitting to the bombarded at first, the planet eater suddenly gave a deafening shriek and a massive, repulsive force exploded from its body. Shattering the binds and dispelling the beam attacks hitting it from all directions, Zeru struck the Z-fighters with a gale of wind that ripped them out of the sky and sent them spinning back to earth.

Caught completely by surprise at the power of the blast that parted the ocean and shredded the coastline like rice paper, most of the weaker members of the group quickly succumbed to the shockwave. The tougher ones though or those that managed to shield themselves before the attack hit them, recovered quickly and secured defensive positions.

Those that remained airborne included Piccolo, Gohan, Vegeta, Zangya, Android 18, Krillin, and, remarkably, Videl. The others though had been successfully grounded and now had to go through the process of pulling themselves together. Tien, after landing hard against a plateau, was being helped up by Chiaotzu and Yamcha. Elsewhere in a distant field, Android 17 struggled to pick himself up alongside Goten and Trunks, both of whom had been knocked onto their backsides after getting smacked down by massive chunks of rubble and debris.

In spite of their best efforts, the creature was still alive and kicking.

"Well that didn't work," Videl spoke, clenching her fists in frustration.

"You've gotta be kidding me! How strong is this thing?" Krillin shouted, ignoring the bruises and scuffs he'd sustained from the invisible attack. "This is so unfair!"

"I think fairness is one of the last things on this monster's mind, man," Gohan answered, shaking his head in disbelief.

"Honestly. This is starting to get ridiculous," Android 18 spoke, narrowing her eyes on the invader as it rose up from the enormous crater it had been pressed into.

Snarling angrily when it floated away from the hole, Zeru's eyes shone a bright red before it suddenly launched a pink ball of energy towards the group. The attack expanded at an incredible speed as it approached its targets, forcing all of the warriors in the air to move evasively. However, it was only until the attack blew past them that they realized it was heading straight towards the naval fleet floating several kilometers out.

Reacting in alarm, Videl powered up and gave pursuit, easily overtaking the sphere and landing on the aircraft carrier it was targeting. Startling the crew currently on station, the raven haired crime fighter threw her hands up and with a yell of effort, launched two golden blasts at the approaching attack. The beams collided with the incoming sphere and began an intense tug-of-war match between her and the mass of energy. Despite there being no link between it and its source, the orb still had enough power to give the girl a ridiculously hard time.

Feeling the ball's heat licking at her skin, the teenage warrior growled as she poured more energy into her counterattack. She was doing well against it too, until she saw the ball begin to expand in size and file away at her attack little by little, causing her to look up in bewilderment. "Oh… no you don't!" With a yell, Videl opened up the taps and poured more energy into her blast, determined to save the people onboard the fleet of ships surrounding her and preventing more deaths from occurring.

While Videl had it out with the large attack, the Z-fighters were now experiencing difficulties of their own.

A shockwave ringing out, Vegeta attempted to deck the creature across the face, only to be met with its powerful force field that sent him blasting away in the opposite direction. With the Saiyan Prince dispatched, the enormous invader swung its ribbons arms out, forcing Android 18 and Krillin to scatter, but hitting Piccolo as a result when its limb came in wide and fast. The Namekian was smacked to the ground, sending him across two kilometers of charred landscape.

Occupied with taking out the other Z-warriors, Zeru was unable to respond in time when Gohan, yelling out in anger, slammed a fist across its face, hitting its shield with a terrifying shockwave. The impact of his knuckles caused a loud 'crack' to ring out when he blew past its weakened barrier and nailed it in the cheek, sending it tumbling away. When the alien eventually skidded to a stop, it countered the half-Saiyan with a swift extension of its arm, sending it shooting at him like a lance. However, swift as ever, the demi-Saiyan dodged the attack and countered with a swift ki blast.

Zangya came around and fired a beam as well. But despite their efforts to hit it from two different sides, their shots ricocheted off of the invader's barrier. When the air cleared shortly afterwards, Zeru was then able to fire its other extendable arm at the redhead now hovering in plain sight.

Recoiling in shock, the Hera threw her hand forward and caught the alien's extending arm with the face of her palm. The impact sent her flying back a couple of kilometers, her fingers cutting into its appendage that burned at her skin. Cringing painfully as she shredded the strip of flesh, the woman then grabbed the flexible limb she'd caught and, growling against the pain, stopped in midflight. As soon as her momentum ceased, Zangya then gave a mighty yell and pulled on the alien's limb, yanking the beast from its spot and drawing the asteroid-sized enemy towards her.

When its immense body flew in her direction, the Hera powered up and, cocking her free fist back, cried out and threw a punch towards its forehead. "EAT THIS!" Her knuckles glowing, the girl slammed a punch straight into its face, caving it in and sending it flying with a thunderous 'bang'.

Flipping as it flew through the air, Zeru eventually crash-landed ten kilometers away, impacting the continent and flatting an entire area of valleys. The earth trembling as a result of its fall, the beast eventually used its appendages to sit up, making a gurgling sound while focusing its attention on its opponents.

Seeing its targets scattered throughout the sky, the creature took aim and, with a flash of energy, sprayed a barrage of pink energy blasts in their direction. The shot like attack forced the airborne fighters to drop altitude and avoid the onslaught of energy spheres, which peppered the decimated countryside outside of West City. Numerous dome-shaped explosions tore apart the earth, collapsing anything that was left standing.

After forcing Gohan, Zangya, Vegeta, Krillin and Android 18 back down to ground level, the creature sat up and sprang into the sky. Gaining altitude quickly, it then directed its attention to the warriors on the ground and descended towards them at high speed.

Gohan clenched his fists tightly when the beast's shadow fell upon them, "Here it comes!"

"Shoot it down!" Vegeta yelled, taking a stance.

Pulling their hands back, the group stepped forward and with simultaneous yells of effort, fired five powerful beams at the incoming monster. The attacks shot towards the hulking alien like a barrage of missiles, aiming to knock it out of the sky and out of the fight. But before they even came close to colliding with their target, Zeru's eyes flashed brightly before launching a barrage of large, red energy disks at the incoming strike. It countered the team's blasts effortlessly, slicing the beams to pieces and dispelling their remains on the wind. With the obstacles ripped apart, the monofilament barrage continued on course towards the grounded warriors.
The five warriors gawked in shock when they saw their attacks get shot out of the air. Upon which they leapt out of the way, dodging the barrage of disks that slammed into the ground and decimated their part of the country. The coastline was diced to pieces, seconds before the disks exploded in a fiery hell storm and reduced the whole area to a smoking crater.

Dust hanging over the damaged area, a series of figures could be seen moving amongst the rubble. When the veil eventually lifted seconds later, it revealed Gohan, Zangya and Vegeta rising up from the dirt covered in multiple burn wounds and cuts, while Android 18 and Krillin helped each other up from the pile of rocks. The latter of the two had suffered a serious head wound from the bombardment and was bleeding down his face.

Needless to say, neither of them was in any good shape.

"Hey… I might be overreaching a little bit, but do you guys happen to know anymore Super Saiyans hiding out there in the universe? Because we sure as hell could use their help right about now," Krillin spoke, looking wistfully across at the clearly winded trio who were regarded as the planet's most powerful fighters. When all he received were blank stares from both Zangya and Vegeta, the former monk grinned painfully, "Just asking."

Huffing, the one-armed prince spun around and watched as their adversary Zeru touched down several miles out. With its immense form blocking out the horizon, he then looked on as it began to dig into the earth, drawing an irritable huff from the warrior. "That giant, multi-armed freak. I can barely pick myself up and we haven't even come close to putting it down." His anger causing a few sparks to flash off of him, the man then slammed his fist into the ground out of frustration. "Damn it! This is pissing me off!"

"I can't believe how powerful that thing actually is. We're giving it everything we've got, but not even a Super Saiyan 2 can beat it," Gohan murmured, standing up and turning his ire on the invader. After watching it dig through the rubble for several minutes, the teen then saw it lower its head to the ground and extended what he immediately identified as a proboscis from its mouth. With it, it stuck it into the ground and began to drill. "Shit. That can't be good."

"What? What's it doing?" Android 18 asked, looking up at the enormous beast in confusion alongside her husband.

"It's buried its mandibles into the planet's surface. If it reaches the mantle layer, it's going to start sucking this planet dry," Gohan informed, clenching his fists tightly and gathering his energy as fast as he could. While this news came as no surprise to Zangya, it certainly caught the others' attention.

"Are you serious?" Krillin asked with disbelief reflected in his gaze.

The demi-Saiyan nodded, "Yeah. King Kai told me everything. This creature is a parasite that survives by sucking the energy out of any planet it happens to come across. If we let this thing win and feed on the earth… over the next day or so… there won't be a single thing left standing. The trees, the land, the ocean, the animals… everything will die."

Vegeta glared hard at the teen, "And you didn't think of telling us any of this earlier, why?"

"Well, this thing has spent the past couple of hours generously kicking our asses across the continent, so I haven't exactly been given an appropriate time to interject," Gohan replied, glancing across at the pissed off prince with his warrior's glare firmly in play. "Listen, if we have any hope of destroying this thing, we need to combine all of our power and attack it at the same time. If my observations are correct, a fully charged attack from you, me and Zangya should be more than enough to put this alien down for good."

While Vegeta's expression steeled, the Hera kneeling alongside them glanced across at the young man with an obviously forced smile. "That sounds fantastic. Any idea on how the hell we're going to do that? Every time we gain any sort of rhythm against the bastard, the damn thing breaks it with that annoying shield it has." Due to the efforts made by Bulma and Vegeta, the creature's ability to produce a continuous force field has been greatly upset. On the surface this seemed like a good thing. But this resulted in a secondary issue in which the alien was now creating a single barrier at random to deflect their more punishing blasts from landing.

Say what you would about the beast, it could certainly take a hit when it wanted to. Not only did it have a gaping hole in its chest, but its sternum was cracked and half off its face had been blown to kingdom come.

Not even Frieza could continue fighting at such a capacity.

"We're going to need to catch it off guard," Gohan informed, crouching down and powering up. "Hit it from all sides and soften it up. Once we've exhausted it, we'll ground it and take it out with our strongest attacks. That ought to knock some sense into it." His golden aura warping around him and bolts of electricity streaming up his body, the young warrior made his instructions well and truly heard by all those present.

Vegeta, smirking at the hybrid's statements, stood up as well and allowed his aura to spring forth once more, "Now you're speaking like a true Saiyan. Just stay the hell out of my way."

"No problem," the teenager replied confidently.

Zangya, stepping up alongside the duo to join them, also clenched her fists and powered up, her energy blasting off of her and causing her hair to bellow upwards. "This planet is my home as much as it is everybody else's." Eyes flickering mischievously, she then gave a nod towards the plan and the young man who'd thought of it, before setting her gaze onto their target, "I'm ready whenever you are."

All three of them sharing similar expressions of battle readiness, they continued to watch the creature tunnel into the ground before taking off and shooting towards the creature in a blur. Breaking up in mid-flight, the trio of super powered warriors scattered and swept towards the extra terrestrial from its flanks, leaving Krillin and Android 18 to watch nervously from afar.

While Zeru was in the process of digging its proboscis into the planet, it soon had its attention pulled across the countryside when it sensed three powerful figures approaching it. Snarling predatorily, it quickly retracted its tube from the earth and turned to face the incoming threat, where it spotted Gohan, enveloped in his golden aura, charging straight at him at full speed.

With a loud war cry, the teen attempted to drive a fist into the beast's face, only for his knuckles to slam into its translucent energy shield. His aura blazing around him as his fist vibrated against the wall, the demi-Saiyan then roared out and gave his attack another burst of power.

His aura's intensity increasing several times over, causing it to expand and rip apart the land behind him like a hurricane, Gohan then brought his other free hand forward and dug his fingers into the multi-colored force field. The hexagonal barrier putting up one hell of a fight, the demi-Saiyan eventually managed to worm his fingers into the pane and rip it open. Spreading the shield apart, the enraged young man faced off against the creature, which continued to glare at him despite its defenses effectively being torn open.
Almost instantly after the demi-Saiyan broke through, the creature's eyes lit up and an enormous purple blast slammed into Gohan. The attack was wide and powerful, sending the Super Saiyan 2 flying backwards for several miles. It eventually stopped when the young warrior forced himself to a halt, his left arm raised and blocking the beam as it drilled into him.

Feeling his skin burn and his clothes tear under the typhoon of energy, Gohan growled as he fought back against the full brunt of the alien's attack. His electric bio-field crackling around him in response to the strain he was under, the half-Saiyan then came up with a brilliant idea and, cocking his free hand to his side, began to gather electricity.

His energy converging around his arm to an absurd degree, the teen continued to push against the blast ripping into his forearm until, getting fed up of being on the receiving end of this creature's blasts, decided to fire back. With a mighty shove and a bellow of rage, Gohan thrust his hand forward and unleashed a storm of lightning upon the titan. "GAAAAAAAAAAARRGGHHH!" The bolts of lightning shot across the sky and struck the creature almost instantaneously, consuming it in a tempest that began to deep fry it from the outside.

Zeru's attack stopped the exact moment it was struck by the multiple streams of ki enhanced electricity, a screech of agony leaving its beak as it stumbled back across the countryside. Even as its arms flailed in front of it, the beast continued to be burned by the storm of power, which Gohan unleashed in enormous quantity.

As its skin started to cook, Vegeta and Zangya came in from above. Both charging a red and blue sphere of potent energy above their hands respectively, they then lobbed their attacks straight down at the planet's visitor. Their shots curved down in a glorious arc and struck the stunned alien from the side at blinding speed. Both the Saiyan's Photon Bomber and the Hera's Beauty Trigger attacks detonated with terrific force, causing an earsplitting thunderclap and a compressed, sphere-shaped explosion several dozen times more powerful than a super nova. The brilliant flash of light filled the air with embers and smoke, blinding everyone's view of the beast.

Gohan, exhausted from his counter attack, slumped forward in the air and panted heavily, while Vegeta and Zangya floated above the impact site.

Just when the three were starting to catch their breaths, a ribbon-arm shot out of the clouds and rocketed towards the Saiyan Prince. The battered warrior gasped in shock before being hit head-on by the fast-moving limb. Yelping as he was knocked out of the sky, Vegeta spiraled to the ground while Zangya retreated to a safe distance and watched the limb return to its host. When the smoke finally parted, it revealed the behemoth had been knocked over and had its entire left side blown to hell.

Now, not only did Zeru only have one arm left, it was extremely pissed off, as evident by the loud growl leaving its throat.

When Gohan and Zangya prepared for battle, two more figures flying in from their peripherals drew their attention toward the clouds. Eyes locking onto the shadows, the pair spotted Videl and Piccolo appear on the scene, their hands cocked back and ready to fire.

"Eat this!" the female fighter shouted, before unleashing a stream of energy attacks down at the alien from up high, at the same time the Namekian attacked as well.

The rain of golden blasts bombarded Zeru from above, enveloping it in a series of sphere-shaped explosions that hammered it into the floor. At first it seemed like they were actually dealing it some damage. But as the punishment continued, it revealed the creature was shielding itself with its barrier once more.

Nevertheless, the two warriors pushed on with their attacks, hitting it over and over again in order to buy time for the earth's strongest fighters to catch their breaths. It was a move that they hoped would pay off.

But just as their rhythm was beginning to pick up speed, the extra terrestrial they were shooting at roared out and fired a powerful Kiai towards the duo. It decimated their blasts and smashed into them with terrifying force, sending both flying away at great speed. The counter successfully knocked Videl for a loop, causing her to black out momentarily and send her body plummeting to the ground a few miles away.

Not willing to let another annoyance live, the creature charged a purple sphere of energy in its mouth and fired a powerful beam at the girl's descending, hapless form.

Intending to shoot her out of the sky, Gohan suddenly teleported directly in front of the falling girl, caught her, and took the blast right in the back. A shout of agony filled the air when an attack capable of incinerating a planet exploded against his spine, sending him falling out of the clouds. Following the earsplitting detonation, a surprised Videl quickly regained her senses and looked up at her best friend in shock.

"Gohan! You're hit!" the girl shouted in horror.

"Don't worry! I'm fine!" the demi-Saiyan replied, gritting his teeth against the searing pain.

That was a lie, of course. His back had practically been deep-fried by the blast, which had also cut into his vertebrae, making him look like a piece of meat had been left over a barbeque for a solid hour.

However, ignoring the critical damage done to his body and the smoke pouring from his open wound, the demi-Saiyan went into a sideways spin to gain momentum. Corkscrewing as he fell, the boy quickly charged a blast with one hand and, on his last rotation, fired a powerful blue blast at the creature. The attack streaked towards the observing Zeru like a bolt, only to impact uselessly against its barrier and rebound to another part of the countryside, where it detonated in a massive, blue geyser easily comparable to a nuke. Seconds later, Gohan's form crash-landed in the forest, with Videl held protectively in his arms.

Making a gurgling sound of delight, Zeru was about to follow-up on its attack until a second presence drew its gaze elsewhere. Glancing to its left, it spotted Vegeta appear in the sky and charge another attack to throw. Obviously aiming for its side, the extra terrestrial countered quickly with a focused shockwave that slammed into the Saiyan Prince and caused him to launch his blast prematurely, sending his attack into the ground and punching a crater into the earth. The wounded warrior on the other hand was sent rocketing into the ocean, where he disappeared in a terrific splash.

Another one down, the creature shrugged off the multiple blasts fired by Piccolo and turned its attention to another part of the country, where its eyes quickly fell upon the grounded Krillin and Android 18. As soon as it had them in its sights, Zeru raised one of the ribbons of its cowl and swished it through the air, unleashing a salvo of grey spikes towards the warriors on the sidelines.

The barrage of spears shot towards the pair at light speed, catching the two fighters completely by surprise. But just when it looked like the couple was about to be skewered by hundreds of makeshift lances a figure suddenly flew in from the side and intercepted the attack. Hands and legs spread out, Zangya took the volley of spikes in the back, the poles skewering her and stopping just... when their tips burst out of her front. The rest of the long spikes fired by the extra terrestrial ended up riddling the rest of the area around them.

The splatter of purple blood across Krillin and Eighteen's faces stunned the duo.

"Z-Zangya?! Why did you…" Eighteen murmured, watching her friend bend over and spew out bodily fluids.

Trembling from head to toe as blood dribbled out of her mouth, the Hera grinned back at her friend's bewildered expression and shook her head. "Yeah. Ah… fuck! That was stupid. Augh! So stupid." Making various choking noises as she collapsed to her knees, the winded Zangya, whose body now resembled a pin cushion that would make Vlad the Impaler jealous, threw up more blood and slammed her hands into the floor. "Damn it… Zangya… what the hell were you thinking back there?"

Krillin gulped, appearing just as stumped as his wife, "Y-You jumped in front of its attack."

The red-haired girl chuckled painfully, "Didn't have time… to dodge." Swallowing heavily, Zangya coughed a few more times and took a couple of deep breaths. In spite of having a couple of spikes sticking through her body, she was surprisingly articulate and… well… alive. "Did you think… I was going to let that thing… kill my friends… in front of me? Like hell."

The wounded pair quickly swooped down to help her, at the same time missing the sight of the enormous invader responsible for her current predicament rearing its head back and charging a blast.

A fiery orb appearing above its body, Zeru took aim at its targets and prepared to incinerate them in one go. It leaned forward and shrieked as the attack focused on the region, but was stopped in mid-launch when an orange, corkscrew beam struck it in the neck and shot straight through it, exploding against a mountain several miles away on the other side.

The unexpected surprise attack causing its eyes to widen in horror, the animal let out a cry of agony as it stumbled back from its spot. The Z-fighters watching it were at first baffled by the terrifying hit to its blind spot. But when they turned in the direction to see where the attack had come from, all confusion faded away and was quickly replaced by delight.

Smirking victoriously with his two fingers extended, Piccolo gave a harsh chuckle and watched as his target squirmed and writhed from a distance. "Did you miss me?"

Finally. His Special Beam Cannon worked.

Staggering and crashing into a distant plateau, the beast trembled and gasped for breath. Blood spewed out of its mouth and the hole in its neck, showing just how effective the attack had been. But just when it seemed like it would succumb to the obviously fatal blow, it instead recovered and turned its attention towards the Namekian.

Before it had a chance to exact swift retribution upon its attacker, the forest to the north suddenly exploded upwards in a golden flash of light, one that drew the attention of the wounded alien. When it looked in the direction of that part of the country, it saw a glowing bolt shoot up from the trees and suspend itself in the air. Bathed in light and crackling with electricity, the wounded but still fighting Gohan glared angrily across at the extra terrestrial. With his fists held firmly at his sides and his orange top completely gone, the young warrior huffed furiously and focused his energy.
"Let's end this!" His aura kicking up fiercely, the teen then charged forward with a clap of thunder and a yell of rage.

Zeru, its target established, spun towards the approaching half-Saiyan and prepared for combat.

Due to its eyes being fixed squarely on the powerful warrior, the extra terrestrial missed the sight of the ocean bursting upwards and Vegeta rocketing out of the water towards it. The Saiyan Prince roared out as he charged the creature from its left flank, intent on finishing the titan once and for all.

Knowing the final attack was on, Zangya, whose body was still riddled with half a dozen lances, powered up and took off from the ground as well. Heavily wounded like the other two, she shot towards the creature from its blind spot and converged on it from below, sweeping across the valley at breakneck speed.

The invader bellowed with rage as it swung out with its remaining arm at the advancing Gohan, hoping to take him out with a single hit. But the fast-moving warrior managed to evade it, slipping under its strike and, giving his aura a violent burst, shot up towards Zeru's chest with a war cry. Vegeta and Zangya ducked in at the same time and, all three of them forming together, rocketed straight into the alien's stomach.

Continuous thunderclaps rang out when the three super charged warriors began attacking the creature from below, driving continuous, earth shattering blows into its abdomen and pushing it off the ground. Every hit they threw lifted Zeru higher and higher into the sky, drowning out the region with the deafening sounds of super powered punches and kicks impacting a solid surface. The clouds parted under the force of their blurred attacks striking the creature's stomach repeatedly, and the entire country shook when the shockwaves generated by their blows reverberated across the whole region.

Piccolo, Krillin, Android 18, Videl and the other wounded but still conscious Z-fighters watched on in astonishment as the three warriors pummeled the creature into the upper troposphere and stratosphere. The naval and army forces that remained intact, the entire population of West City, and even Bulma, who'd managed to regain consciousness shortly after Gohan's arrival, were also looking on in awe as the behemoth was lifted further away from the planet.

Soon reaching the mesosphere, just shy of the outer reaches of space, Zeru continued to receive the beating of a lifetime. As a result of the attacks so far, its carapace front had caved in under the assault, and blood was gushing out of its mouth from the internal damages it had and was still receiving.

Eventually, after pushing the creature high enough above the earth, Gohan, Zangya and Vegeta, their hands glowing brightly, cocked them back and drove them straight into the beast's face. Their blows impacting with a frightening shockwave, they sent the creature spiraling into the thermosphere. When it slowed, the three fighters super sped around and appeared behind it where, loading their fists once again so that they crackled with bolts of electricity, drove them straight into the alien's back in a single, decisive blow. Their cries were drowned out by the impact of their combined attack, which bent the creature's spine and sent it plummeting back down to earth.

When the wounded Zeru began to burn up on reentry, Gohan, letting out a mighty roar, powered up and threw his hands over his forehead. A storm of lightning bolts shooting off of him, prompting Vegeta and Zangya to leap out of the way, the teen then thrust his body forward and unleashed a fully charged Masenko down onto the alien. His gargantuan blast left his hand with a crack of thunder and shot towards its target like a comet, eventually striking it and pushing the wounded beast through the mesosphere and towards the planet's surface at a greater speed.
Seconds later, the creature crash-landed atop an island floating just off of the continent's shore, where it flattened the mountain in its center and caused a geyser of rubble and dust to blast into the air. The impact was also intense, shaking the entire region nearby and generating massive waves over the ocean.

The Z-fighters watching from the sidelines were stumped at the assault.

But just when everybody thought it was over, Gohan, Vegeta and Zangya suddenly dropped down from the sky and landed on the beach side-by-side. As soon as they touched down, the trio slid into wide fighting stances and prepped themselves for a final attack.

While Gohan and Zangya cupped their hands at their sides, the one-handed Vegeta held his good arm forward and began to charge a crackling sphere of golden energy. A yell left his lips when his golden aura burst up around him, kicking dust into the air and alerting the other two of his intentions.

"You don't waste time, do you?" Zangya exclaimed with a grin as a blue sphere of energy formed between her palms.

The Saiyan Prince snarled, "Shut up and let me concentrate, woman!" Energy spiking, he continued to pour energy into his hand and mold it into his most powerful blast.

Gohan, his back still burning from an attack that had effectively melted away a good portion of his skin, generated a blue sphere of energy between his hands and took aim with it. As the ball of light pulsed and charged in his grip, the teen clenched his jaw tightly and continued digging deep for every last bit of ki he could muster. "This is it, guys! We need to hit it all at once, so don't hold anything back!"

Blood dribbling out of her mouth, Zangya nodded, "Right."

As per the half-Saiyan's instruction, the trio's auras burst outwards and expanded to an even greater size, molding and transforming into a tornado of energy around them. Bolts of lightning also shooting off of their glowing forms, the three fighters entered the final stages of their build-up. The sound of densely packed energy gathering reverberating across the countryside, the Z-fighters watching from the sidelines braced for one hell of a blast.

Goten, Trunks, Android 17, Tien… everyone held their breaths as they sensed the warriors' attacks reach critical mass.

However, while the three were still in the process of forcing energy into their hands, across the water, they saw the smoke on the ruined island violently part and the thoroughly beaten Zeru rise up from the rubble of the mountain. Its eyes glowing with rage, the creature snarled furiously as it set its sights on the enormous collection of ki building on the other side of the channel and spotted the cyclone of energy whirling around on the shoreline.

Unwilling to get hit by whatever attack was being mounted, it prepared to deal with them accordingly. But just when the alien was in the process of gathering energy of its own, a flash of light from above had its head snap upwards, before a powerful golden blast crashed into its hexagonal barrier. The ground trembled as the attack ground into the creature, pressuring it and drawing everyone's gazes towards the source of the attack.

When all eyes looked up into the clouds, they saw Piccolo floating there, out of effective reach of its shockwaves, with both hands extended and fingers interlocked. The beam gushing out of his hands drilled into the extra terrestrial's force field, the Namekian growling as he put everything he had into drawing its gaze and forcing it to waste its energy against him.

"Stay right where you are!" Piccolo shouted, powering up and giving his blast another kick, a mass of energy traveling down the length of the beam and striking the barrier with a loud 'crack'.

Pissed off, Zeru quickly turned its attention away from the green warrior and to the three charging their attacks on the coast. Recognizing them as the far greater threat out of all the tiny humanoids it'd been fighting so far, the wounded alien quickly lifted its ribbon arm from the floor and whipped it through the air. When it did, the appendage quickly morphed into a long, deadly spike, which it then fired at the three with the intent of impaling one of them.

The three warriors standing side by side looked up in alarm as Zeru's arm shot towards them at blinding speed, its tip primed to cut right through them in a single stroke. The Z-fighters, Piccolo included, could only watch helplessly as its primary melee weapon rocketed towards the super powered fighters along a straight and narrow path.

As it stood, there was no way any one of them would be able to stop an attack moving that fast and was capable of dicing up a Super Saiyan with one hit.

In a matter of milliseconds, it was right on top of them.

But just when the enormous limb was only feet from striking the group, a shadow suddenly descended from the sky and dropped into the attack's path. A loud 'squelch' sound filled the air a second later, followed by a splatter of blood across the ground as the figure was effectively impaled, yet managed to stop the attack dead in its tracks.

Not expecting such a maneuver, the Z-fighters were gob smacked. Gohan, Vegeta and Zangya especially.

When the three warriors got a good look at the person who leapt in the way of the attack that was clearly meant for them, their eyes widened in disbelief when they saw the battered form of Paprika standing there with the spike sticking out of her stomach. They'd initially thought she'd been killed earlier on, as they'd been unable to sense her presence, and after Gohan had surveyed the area and found her body lying in the middle of a large trench, he thought she was a casualty too.

Her body was still covered in burns from the blast she'd deflected when protecting Goten and Trunks, but they looked to have been healed over and replaced by new flesh. On top of that, her blood had also dried up and her hands, which had previously been disintegrated in the assault, had regenerated as well.

As their attacks achieved critical mass, the question that came to the three warriors' minds was how the heck the Makyan was still alive.

The answer came gargling out of her mouth moments later as the white haired teen, who was currently slumped over the spike sticking through her with blood dripping out of her mouth, gave the three warriors a bloody grin before glancing over her shoulder. When she saw Zeru staring at her across the channel in disbelief, Paprika chuckled harshly.

"Next time… you want to kill someone… make sure you finish the job!" the girl hissed, before bringing her newly grown hands around and grabbing the spike from the front. She then dug her feet into the ground and gritted her teeth. "As long as my Makyo Heart remains intact… I can regenerate from any injury! So give me your best shot!" When the enormous alien screeched out in a rage, she spun around and faced the three charging their attacks. "I'll hold it down! Just hurry up and shoot it!"
Gohan, quickly recovering from the shock, steeled his face and nodded. A split second later, the energy gathering in the team's palms grew larger as more lightning bolts crackled off of them.

With Paprika holding the alien's arm and Piccolo continuing to fire on its shield, Zeru quickly found itself being backed into a corner. It quickly turned its attention to the Namekian to knock him out of the sky, but just before it could shoot at him, more blasts from the side slammed into it and began drilling into its flesh. When it turned, it saw the other Z-fighters had assembled and were now shooting at it as well.

Videl, Tien, Yamcha, Krillin, Android 18, Chiaotzu, Android 17, Goten and Trunks, all barely standing and on their last legs, hit it with a combined beam attack that bore into its side like multiple drills, throwing off its concentration. Wanting to get rid of them, Zeru howled out and unleashed a powerful shockwave in all directions to strike them down. But due to the distance they were standing at, the scattered team withstood the powerful blast of wind and continued to hit the creature it with an ongoing stream of energy from all angles.

This was their last chance!

Their effort eliciting a snarl from the extra terrestrial, the beast writhed and flailed uselessly on the spot, before attempting one last ditch effort to kill the three charging their final moves. It whipped its arm and attempted to extend it through the Makyan teenager obstructing it.

Its spike pushed through her a couple of inches, Paprika jerked forward, vomited up blood and screamed out in agony. "GAAAUGH!" Holding her ground, the girl looked up at the three desperately, her eyes filled with pain and an enraged shout leaving her mouth. "DO IIIIIIIIIITTTT!"

They didn't need to be told twice.

Attacks finally reaching stability, Gohan, Vegeta and Zangya thrust their hands forward and, with three simultaneous battle cries, unleashed their attacks in one go.

Their blasts exploded from their hands with a deafening roar, filling the region and sky with a blinding flash of blue light. The three massive beams, two of them Kamehamehas and the other a Final Flash, formed into one the instant they left their user's hands, fusing into an attack that was larger and more powerful than anything the Z-fighters had ever produced before. Like a comet, the blast rocketed past Paprika and shot towards the alien pinned down on the island, which spotted the approaching wall of death and gave one last screech of terror. A split second later, the enormous mass of energy collided headlong into the alien with a tremendous shockwave, before engulfing it in a gargantuan stream of death.

The trio's blast continued to travel across the planet's surface as it burned away the hulking form of Zeru, who cried out one last time before its body succumbed to the inferno consuming it. Within moments, its entire body broke apart inside the blast and vanished in a flash of light, while the group's attack shot off of the earth and rocketed out of the solar system. It traveled billion of miles to another part of the Milky Way, where it struck a distant moon and wiped it out of existence in a terrific explosion.

When the blast eventually faded minutes later, it revealed a smoking island with its top shaved completely off and a calm blue ocean spread out around it. Gohan, Zangya and Vegeta, their hands still extended, could be seen standing side-by-side on the shoreline, with Paprika kneeling in front of them, panting heavily and glaring across the water.

Emerging from the cloud hanging over the area the enormous attack had made landfall, Zeru's ruined body slowly bled into view, revealing it standing hunched over in a state that was easily close to death. Limbs and armor plates gone, all that remained of the once invulnerable creature was a skeleton, parts of its torso, and half a face.

Twitching and groaning as it stood before the stunned Z-fighters, the alien glared up towards its attackers. Giving the three one last look and a snarl, its glowing red eye flickered one last time before, with a loud shriek of defeat, it raised its head up high before self-destructing in a glorious red flash of light.

The dome-shaped blast wasn't powerful. But when it subsided seconds later, it dispelled across the West Coast in a halo like shockwave and rained down on the land in a shower of sparkling moon dust. With its final moments marked by a single firework created by its combusting form, the creature's remains scattered across the planet and the skies soon cleared.

The Z-fighters and all the military forces in the area awed at the sight of the dust cascading over the countryside. Even Captain Smith, who'd managed to survive the terrifying explosions that had riddled the coastline, extended his hand and caught some of the specks falling from the heavens.

As all this was going on, the three warriors who were instrumental in dealing the final blow to the beast, powered down where they stood and, overcome with exhaustion, collapsed on the spot.

Zangya, with spikes still sticking out of her body, dropped to her side. Vegeta, still missing an arm, fell flat onto his back and heaved deep breaths of air. And lastly, Gohan, with his back completely charred, fell to his knees and face-planted the sand. Paprika, who was kneeling directly in front of the teen with a gaping hole in her body, did the exact same thing and crashed onto the beach.

All of them reverting back to their base forms, the completely spent fighters panted and rasped where they lay, motionless and drained of all their energy. With the demi-Saiyan cracking open an eye, he looked across at the Makyan lying directly alongside him, who reciprocated his actions and stared back at the battered teenager intently.

Smiling amidst the agony and fatigue racking their bodies, the spiky haired teen laughed a little before singing cheerfully, "See. We can do anything by working with each other…"

"Just shut the fuck up, Gohan," Paprika groaned, a smirk slowly forming across her face.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Well, that was fun. Everyone fought the invader and had the crap beaten out of them. Oh well. At least they all made it out in one piece…

Sort of.

Gohan's back is charred, Zangya was impaled, Vegeta is missing an arm, and Paprika has another hole in her, lol. All in all, things seemed to have worked out alright.

Hope you all enjoyed this chapter.
The sound of birds singing and the waves washing against the beach filled the exhausted group of fighters lying in the sand with a sense of relief and tranquility. It also helped ease their aching, battered bodies and allowed them a moment of well-earned reprieve from the hell that they’d recently been put through. Even if it only lasted for a few minutes, it was a breathing opportunity they were truly grateful for.

"You know… this position feels kind of familiar to me," Gohan spoke weakly as he lay there with his cheek pressed against the soft grains of the coast.

"What… lying flat on your face and bleeding out after a ridiculously tough battle?" Zangya asked, able to see the teen clearly from where she was currently positioned, blood dripping out of her many open wounds and the spears lodged in her back. "I'm pretty sure all of us have been in that position at least once in our lives. Am I right, Vegeta?" The Hera barely had the strength to turn and glance over at the Saiyan Prince, who was also lying sprawled out beside them.

The flame haired man, one eye shut and the other open, groaned in agony, "I... am... literally... going... to die."

Gohan laughed a little at the man's raspy words, "That's kind of grim, don't you think? Besides… I bet I'll die before any of you guys do."

"Really? How much?" Zangya asked quickly, at the same time eyeing the boy curiously.

"Hmm… how about… fifty zeni?" the half-Saiyan replied jokingly, at the same time an amused grin came into play, "And a coupon for a free coffee and cake at Don Jon’s."

The blue-skinned female's eyes lit-up excitedly, "You're on."

"Hate you," Vegeta groaned while glaring across at the grinning duo, "Hate you both."

"Oh, cry me a river," Paprika wheezed with a half-dead look on her face. It was pretty much the same look all four of them were currently wearing. "At least you don't have a massive hole in your stomach after just healing from having seventy percent of your skin melted off of your body."

Zangya chuckled weakly at the Makyan's current predicament, "I can beat that. I still have six, five meter spikes sticking out of mine."

"I've got pins and needles all over, and my back feels like it was just pressed up against the sun," Gohan muttered, trying not to pass out from the bolts of pain shooting through his muscles.

"Really? Let me see," the Hera spoke, craning her head a little. When the demi-Saiyan rolled over and showed her his newly acquired 'tattoo', the orange haired woman cringed. "Geez. A few more centimeters in and you would've been cut in half." She could literally see his vertebrae sticking out of the black, charred patch of skin exposed to the air. "Can you still feel your toes?"
The hybrid moaned, "Uh-huh."

"Okay, good," Zangya exclaimed, breathing a sigh of relief. "Just hang in there for a little bit, Gohan. I'm sure someone will come along and give us a hand eventually. I'm so exhausted right now I can barely even wiggle a finger."

After the group's little exchange of words, hoarse laughter suddenly filled the air. When everyone glanced in the direction the noise was coming from, they saw Vegeta's body shaking and a massive smile of pride drawn across his face. Obviously still in agony from the spectacular thrashing he'd received, the flame-haired man then took a deep breath and exhaled slowly, giving himself a temporary shot of morphine to the jabbing pain where his arm used to be.

"What's so funny?" Paprika asked tiredly, not really sure she wanted to hear his answer. Taking a few more breaths, Vegeta spoke up, "After all these years… after all the bone breaking training I had to go through… it took an enormous alien from outer space attacking the earth to finally push me to the next level." The prince then leered competitively in Gohan's direction. "I've finally closed the gap between us, brat. You're no longer the only Saiyan to have truly ascended to the second level."

The demi-Saiyan smiled right back, "That's great, man."

"You can definitely tell how happy he is from the way he's grinning," Zangya said while shaking her head. "Seriously. He looks like a kid who just came out of a candy store." She then glanced across at her friend to see him still staring in the prince's direction. "It seems as though you've got a lot more work ahead of you when you get home."

"Yeah. A lot of work." He was happy that Vegeta was able to ascend to the second level. However, his instincts and warrior's spirit told him that he needed to push himself and become even stronger. If there was a third level beyond the form that he'd attained, then he needed to train even harder if he was going to reach it.

It was personal honor and pride talking to him, and his ears were wide open to every word.

While they were still lying there, unable to move, Gohan turned his gaze towards Paprika to see the Makyan glaring at him. As soon as his eyes fell on her, the white haired girl frowned distastefully.

"What?" she asked.

The teenager beamed as soon as he was certain he had her attention, "Thanks so much for the help, Paprika. You really saved us back there."

Narrowing her eyes, the Makyan shut them and turned away, "Don't mention it. Just remember, this battle doesn't change anything between us. I'm still pissed at you… and I'm still going to kick your ass one of these days."

Understanding this much, the young demi-Saiyan gave a weak chuckle and nodded towards her. "And thanks for saving my little brother. If you hadn't jumped in when you did, I'm pretty sure he would be dead right now. I'm really grateful for that."

His second offering of gratitude was received with a much softer and agreeable response from the normally hostile fighter. Looking across at the teen to see his kind, gentle smile glued onto her, Paprika quickly rolled her head away and grunted, her expression reflecting a sense of bashfulness and discomfort. "You're welcome." Thanks to the way she'd moved her face out of view, Gohan couldn't see her eyes as they started to shimmer and the small smile that appeared on her face.

The group only had to lie there for a couple more minutes, after which they were shortly joined by the rest of their friends. Dropping down from the sky around them, the elated and smiling faces of the other Z-warriors came to stand before the four fallen fighters. As soon as they touched down, Videl wasted no time in breaking ranks, rushing forward and dropping to her knees beside her best friend.

"Gohan! Gohan! Are you alright?" the raven haired tomboy asked, gently taking him by the shoulder and looking him over. She cringed when her eyes landed on his back. "Whoa. Yeah. You're not alright." Far from it.

The hybrid smiled warmly at his concerned companion, "Don't worry. I'm alright. Just a little sore."

Krillin, who was standing beside his wife, gave the exhausted teen with the char grilled spine an amused once over, "You took a concentrated kill shot in the back. That must have hurt like hell."

Videl's expression saddened as she knelt there, "I'm sorry. It was stupid of me to get in the way."

Sensing her sudden change in moods and seeing her respond in a dejected manner, the half-Saiyan lying on the ground smiled and, using whatever strength he could muster, reached over and took her hand. "Hey… it's alright. Everyone was having a rough time out there. Don't go beating yourself up over it. Besides… there was no way I was going to let that thing kill you." His words, though raspy and low, brought a smile back to Videl's face and filled her heart with reassurance. But just before she could say anything in response, Gohan winced again and directed his gaze towards his belt. "I should still have some Senzu beans left. They're on my left side."

"Oh? Yeah. Sure." Acting quickly, Videl reached over and began rummaging through the teen's belt. When she eventually got the bag, she yanked it out and emptied it into her open palm. She blinked when only three rolled out. "Umm… this is a problem." She then showed them to Gohan, who considered the collection of miracle seeds for a moment.

A smile then appeared and he gestured upwards, "Give them to Paprika, Zangya and Vegeta."

Videl and the others reacted to his instruction with surprise, "Eh? W-What about you?"

"It's okay. I'll be fine as long as I don't move. Just make sure the others get them first…"

Processing his words soon drew an admiring gaze from the raven haired fighter.

It was a statement that put a grin on Yamcha's face, who shared a look with Tien and the others. "That's Goku's kid alright."

Doing as requested, Videl moved over to the Makyan first and slipped a bean into her mouth. Making sure she chewed and swallowed it, she then looked on in amazement as the gaping wound in her body closed up and life slowly returned to her face. As she started to get up, the human teenager then moved over to Zangya, where she, Android 18 and Piccolo proceeded to remove the spears from her battered body. After a long and painful procedure, they then gave her a bean so that her multiple puncture wounds healed and her strength returned. This then led their attention being directed over to Vegeta, who spoke up just as the raven haired girl was moving to give a Senzu to him.
"Don't give me a bean," the man snapped.

Videl recoiled at his response, "Huh? Why?"

"If you haven't noticed yet, I'm still missing a fucking arm. While I'm sure those retched things are ideal for restoring a person's vitality, I doubt they have the ability to regenerate limbs," the prince stated, glaring across at the group while Zangya got to her feet.

Rubbing the soreness out of her shoulder, the orange haired woman looked down at the two fallen Saiyans curiously, "Oh yeah. If you take a Senzu bean now, it will just seal up the wound and it'll take forever to have your arm reattached." The Hera's words had the rest of the group scrunch their faces up discomfortingly at the issue. As soon as that concern was raised, Zangya began searching the area, "It couldn't have gone too far."

Giving a thoughtful grunt, the slightly battered Android 17 turned his attention to the decimated countryside beyond the beachhead they were gathered on. "Even if it didn't, how in the world are you going to find it in all that mess?" The once pristine countryside was now a deep-fried wasteland. It was a miracle there were still a few trees and plateaus left standing.

"There's a good chance it could've been disintegrated in all the explosions that were going on," Tien spoke, earning a grim look from a couple other members of their team.

Being helped up onto the shoulders of Krillin and Android 18, Gohan cringed a little. "That would kind of suck."

Undeterred by the comments being thrown this way and that, the Saiyan Prince frowned distastefully and continued blurting out hints. "I was a Super Saiyan when I lost it… so it probably should still have some residual energy left inside it," Vegeta informed, giving them a clue as to how they could track down his missing extremity. "If it's out there, you should be able to find it."

However, just before any of them could throw themselves into action and begin a search, all eyes turned skywards when a pair of tiny figures suddenly descended from the clouds. Landing on the beach a few yards away, an excited Goten and Trunks jogged forward with a familiar looking accessory in their hands. The lavender haired child grinned when he stopped before the group of battered Z-fighters and showed them their prize.

"Hey, dad. Look what we found in the woods!" the boy chirped, holding up his father's gloved arm.

"It was sitting out there in the open glowing, so we grabbed it before any animals could," Goten also stated, both of them appearing proud at having found the prince's limb intact.

Faces reflecting astonishment, the Z-fighters then watched the kids jog forward. When they got close enough to the strongest members of the team, Zangya quickly confiscated the arm and turned around, where she saw a couple of the human fighters, namely Videl, Chiaotzu, Krillin and Yamcha, lean away at the sight of the appendage. Tien, Piccolo, Android 17, Android 18 and Paprika on the other hand were unfazed and simply looked on as the Hera inspected the limb and turn to the owner. When she saw Vegeta sit up, she gave him a lopsided grin.

"We're... gonna need some help putting this back on," she remarked, earning a nod of agreement from the exhausted prince.

Even though they were the most powerful fighters on the planet, all of them were completely abysmal at the art of surgery and healing.
They needed professional assistance.

While the group began making plans as to what their next courses of action would be, Goten noticed that another member of their group was back on her feet. Grin appearing on his once confused expression, the spiky haired child quickly rushed over to the green-skinned girl with a spring in his step and a joyous giggle in his voice. "Paprika! You're okay!" He immediately skidded to a stop in front of her.

The white haired girl, arms folded, smiled down at the child, "Of course I am, runt. Didn't I tell you that I would be alright?"

"Uh-huh. You did," Goten nodded, beaming at his friend as she stood there proudly in the sand. After several moments of smiling though, the child's expression suddenly changed and, tilting his head observantly, quickly leaned forward to whisper. "Uhh… Paprika?"

"Hm? What is it?"

"Umm… y-your shirt…" the boy murmured and nodded down to her chest discreetly, at the same time cupping her hands in front of him timidly, "You're nakey."

At first perplexed by his words, the girl then looked down to see what the problem was. As it turns out, when she jumped in to deflect the blast fired by Zeru, her entire top as well as most of her front had been incinerated in the beam. As soon as she recovered from her brush with death, she'd been so hasty in jumping in front of another of the alien's attacks that she'd forgotten to repair her clothing.

Now that she was conscious and fully healed, all of her skin and extremities were back in their rightful places… all of them.

Looking up with a start, the Makyan saw that all of the fighters in the area were staring at her. It was a sight that had the teenager shriek and cover up her chest. The second her eyes fixed on the group, she watched as every single one of them turned away and started acting nonchalant, save for Vegeta and Android 18. Both of them just looked away to glare somewhere else.

Face glowing brightly Paprika quickly focused her ire on the one she blamed for pretty much everything in her life. Poor Gohan didn't even see it coming, "YOU! You knew?!"

The teen, hanging off of his friend's shoulders, recoiled slightly at her sudden shout, "What? N-No!"

"You pig! You could've at least told me!"

"Honestly, after everything we had to go through today, having a naked upper body was the last thing on my mind!"

"Yeah. I'm sure it was." Turning away while making certain her ample bosom was covered, Paprika sneered, "Did you get a good look? Huh? Pervert!"

"I swear, Paprika! I didn't!" Gohan defended weakly, unable to stop the sweat pouring down his face. "Please. You have to believe me." If he was able to move, he would've quickly backed away a few steps and put his hands together in a humble gesture. Unfortunately, he could do neither of those things. All he was capable of at the moment was hanging their over Krillin and Eighteen's shoulders and feel uncomfortable.

With her face glowing red and a fierce glare still in play, the incredibly irritated Paprika then focused her glare on the others standing around her. When she did, all of the male warriors quickly averted their gazes once again, leaving the girls standing there and looking awkward. Trunks was also blushing quite a bit, whereas Goten continued to stand in front of his friend with that ever-innocent look reflected in his gaze.

Several seconds of huffing later, the Makyan then made a decision. "Whatever." She then powered up and shot into the sky, disappearing over the horizon.

Staring after her until her vapor trail faded away, Goten turned to look back at his older brother, who breathed a sigh of relief.

"Well… that could've been a lot worse."

Thank Kai she didn't slap him or anything. As he was, he wouldn't have been able to take a finger poke, much less a backhand.

Unbeknownst to the group, as they were all standing around the beach and recovering, the sparkling dust that was the monstrous invader's remains cascading to the earth proceeded to purify the landscape. Wherever the shining particles landed, plants began to grow and water returned to the rivers and lakes, at the same time the life energy of the planet was returned to the soil.

OOO

(A little while later)

Following the defeat of Zeru, the entire planet earth spent the next several hours picking up the pieces and putting itself back together. Thanks to the brutal thrashing it'd received at the hands of its unexpected visitor, not only did a large portion of the continent's West Coast look as though it'd just gone through the worst nuclear fallout ever, but the ocean was missing several islands, entire forests and cities had been burned, and the entire atmosphere had become polluted by fumes and smog. A lot of West City had also suffered considerable damage, another part of the continent now had a massive hole in it, and the entire surface of the planet had been warped. And this was only the damage the earth had suffered directly from the attack.

The Z-fighters' battle with the beast had left scars all around, on both the defenders and the globe that they were defending. As bad a beating as they'd suffered, they'd still managed to push themselves to the limits of their abilities, persevered, and succeeded in defeating an enemy more powerful than anything they'd ever encountered in their lives.

Even if it wasn't an intelligent creature on the levels of both Frieza and Cell, it'd certainly posed a massive threat to their world on raw power alone. That'd been more than enough to cripple and fatally wound a couple members of their group, most notably Vegeta and Gohan.

Speaking of which, after managing to recover the prince's arm, the entire group quickly flew the wounded up to Kami's lookout. There, they were able to properly treat everyone's injuries with the help of the guardian of earth. Dende worked his way from the most heavily wounded to those with minor injuries, until everyone was back up and running again. Vegeta managed to have his arm reattached and Gohan had his flesh restored. Once everyone was back on their feet, a few minutes of elation regarding their victory over their foe was soon held between every member of the group.

This was promptly replaced by a sense of urgency and a need to repair all of the damages brought on by the alien's arrival. As soon as Gohan went down to collect Bulma and the radar, the Z-fighters quickly gathered their senses and scattered, heading out in search of the dragon balls. Zangya and Videl had a blast trying to find them, the former coming across hers at the bottom of the ocean whereas the latter found hers on the roof of a primary school. It didn't take the others long to find them either and once all of the sacred orange treasures had been brought to the lookout, they summoned the dragon.

Gathered around the glowing spheres, the Z-fighters watched as the newly recovered Gohan, now adorned in a newly repaired gi, grinned and brought his fists around heroically. "Shenron! Arise!"

The sky darkening as the seven orbs pulsed and shone brilliantly, the group of warriors watched closely as streams of lightning arced off of the mystical treasures, creating a miniature tempest around the lookout. Then, just when the lightshow was about to reach its peak, a loud thunderclap reverberated across the heavens, followed by a golden bolt of energy shooting up from the orbs and into the atmosphere above. Those that were used to seeing the dragon watched patiently as he made his grand entrance. Those who hadn't seen him on the other hand, namely Videl, Zangya, Goten and Trunks, looked on in amazement as the glowing serpent curled through the sky before wrapping itself around the floating castle. In a matter of moments, the magnificent form of Shenron emerged.

"Wow. He's here," Goten exclaimed, eyes shining with awe as he saw the great dragon's immense form fill the clouds.

"So this is the Shenron I've heard so much about," Videl murmured, unable to take her eyes off of the enormous beast and swallowing nervously. The sight of him caused her to move forward and gently take Gohan's hand, a gesture he quickly acknowledged. One thing was for certain, it was definitely one of the most impressive sights she'd ever seen. "I hope he can do something for us."

"Don't worry. He will," Gohan answered, smiling over his shoulder at the girl to see her standing nervously under the creature's shadow. His fingers gently tightened around hers. "Just watch."

Letting out a roar, the red-eyed dragon of legend descended to the group's level and focused all of his attention on the familiar collection of faces staring up at him. "I have come to grant you two wishes. Tell me what they are so that I may go."

Tien raised an eyebrow as he stared up at the beast towering above them, "He seems pretty impatient today."

"That's typical for Shenron. He doesn't like being kept out for too long," Yamcha informed, hands on his hips as he grinned at their team's most well-known familiar.

In the background, Vegeta could be seen with his arms folded and standing beside his wife, who was currently checking on Dende's handiwork. Running her fingers over the freshly healed scar the man now had between his arm and shoulder, the woman discreetly rested her head against him and smiled in relief, earning a grunt from the man in return. The other silent parties of the group, Piccolo, Android 18 and Android 17, also gathered at the rear and watched their comrades get to work in cleaning up the mess.

Stepping further forward, Gohan smiled up at the elongated form of the dragon and took a deep breath, "Shenron. The earth has just been attacked by a powerful creature called Zeru. Could you please repair all of the damages it has caused?"

A low snarl was the boy's immediate answer. "It shall be done," the dragon replied, its eyes lighting up as he went about following through with the request. The Z-fighters then stood back and waited for confirmation of their wish. However, a couple of seconds later, they suddenly saw the great serpent recoil a little and look down at them questioningly. "Hang on a second. A sun and several other planets outside of the solar system have been destroyed. What the hell were you people doing out there?"

Sweat drops breaking out on most of the members of the troop, the Z-fighters then looked around at each other nervously for a couple of seconds. Though having never seen the dragon lose his composure like this before, the entourage simply rolled with the reptile's exclamation as he probably never expected to fix so many problems with one wish.

After silently consolidating with one another, the Z-fighters turned back to the dragon and looked up at him nervously.

"It's a… bit of a long story," Krillin answered with a friendly grin, earning a few head nods from Yamcha, Tien and Chiaotzu, all of whom were noticeably worried.

"Let's just say a lot of stuff happened while you were asleep," Gohan also spoke up sheepishly.

Giving a very irritated growl as he looked upon the innocent faces of the group, Shenron then exhaled in defeat and went back to glaring up at the sky. "Hmph. Very well." Eyes glowing red once again, the dragon then continued on with his job.

As everyone stood by and watched, Zangya, having listened to every word spoken by the mystical creature, raised an eyebrow and turned towards the raven haired girl standing alongside her. "Is it just me… or is the dragon kind of a dick?"

Videl shrugged back, also finding the beast's answers rather blunt, "Sure seems that way." Granted she'd never met a magical dragon or a mythological beast capable of granting wishes before, she had to assume it was just its normal attitude. Considering how powerful he was, she wasn't too keen on giving him shit for his foul mood. As long as he granted wishes then that was good enough for her.

A minute later, the dragon's eyes stopped glowing and its gaze returned to the Z-fighters. "It is done. Name your second and final wish."

Nodding in acknowledgement, Gohan braced and spoke once again, "Shenron. Please bring back to life everyone who was killed in the battle against Zeru."

The dragon nodded in acknowledgement, "It shall be done." Its eyes then lit up. Moments later, the glow faded, and the green entity bowed its head indicating the deed has been completed. "There. All your wishes have been granted. My duty to you is done. Farewell." Cracks of lightning reverberating throughout the sky, the Z-fighters were shortly engulfed by a blinding flash of light. Upon which the seven mystical orbs shot up into the sky and, after converging several hundred meters above the lookout, scattered across the planet.

When light returned to their sky and the heavens cleared, the warriors gathered on the lookout felt an immediate change in the air. The sensation of newly revived presences and a superbly repaired planet swelled the hearts of all those conscious of their surroundings. Those who didn't show any signs of being receptive to the changes merely stood in place looking off in random directions, while at the same time knowing that the wishes had been successful. The majority on the other hand expressed their delight with smiles and praise all around.

With the threat gone and the world back to normal, the Z-warriors could finally return to their usual, daily activities.

Android 18 and Krillin had a proper reunion with Android 17 and, along with Tien, Yamcha and Chiaotzu, headed down to Kame House to rest up from a long, spirit hazing day. Vegeta flew Bulma back to Capsule Corp along with Trunks, and Gohan, Goten, Videl and Zangya returned home.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

Up on Grand Kai's planet, the overseer of the Northern part of space and universally renowned trainer in Otherworld smiled brightly when he witnessed the final wrap up of the battle against Zeru. Inside, the man felt all jittery and anxious. Having been hanging onto the very edge of his seat in the battle's closing moments and seeing the defenders of earth nearly die many times, you could understand how jumbled up his nerves were.

But when he saw the group pull through and call upon the dragon to correct all of the disasters made that day, King Kai felt an awesome sense of relief wash through him. It drowned out all other negative sensations and brought a prideful twinkle to his eye, one that few have ever seen before.

At least Saturn had been brought back after being cut in half and destroyed. That was good. "Well done, Gohan. You should be very proud." Not just the demi-Saiyan either.

It was thanks to the efforts of everyone, both his family and friends, that'd ensured their victory today.

XXX

(Some weeks later)

Fighting and saving the world from doomsday level calamities had seemingly become a regular thing for the Z-warriors. Whenever there was a long, drawn out period of peace and prosperity on the planet, a new enemy just happened to periodically spring up out of nowhere to rain hell down upon them. What's more, none of the entities that they'd encountered were even remotely related to any of the group's previous conflicts. All of the enemies that had appeared in the last several years happened upon them by sheer coincidence. The only exception to this list would have to be Paprika and at least now she was on friendly terms with the group.

But of course, if she wasn't causing any problems, then neither of them had anything to complain about. Once order had been properly restored to the planet, everyone picked up where they'd left off and moved forward with their lives. It was all business as usual really, and no one seemed to have any qualms with delving back into their regular activities.

Krillin even made a joke at one of their group's most recent get-togethers about actually coming up with paperwork they had to fill in for the heads-of-state whenever another potentially earth-shattering event took place. This was to ensure that the people were officially and adequately informed of each situation and that their safety was of the utmost importance. The documentation would also include other important materials, such as proper insurance information and health cover. Unfortunately, while the joke was successful in bringing a round of laughs from the table, the idea sort of fell flat afterwards.

Nobody spoke of it ever again.

Prosperity returned to the people of earth shortly thereafter. As it turns out, despite the dragon's wish to restore everything to its proper state and order, the battle with Zeru had still left a significant mark on the face of the planet. It wasn't until they were informed by Dende that Gohan, Videl, Piccolo and everybody else learned that the energy that'd previously been absorbed by the invader from other planets had been absorbed by the earth. The death of Zeru had effectively replenished the forests and the globe's natural resources, and it made all the existing landscapes in the area of its demise more beautiful and lively than ever before.

The Z-fighters took it as a bonus after all their hard work and suffering that day. The rest period too came as some comfort to those that needed it. With the earth no longer in danger of being destroyed and another leg of peace in sight, its protectors returned to their duties as productive members of society. Gohan included, who was now training harder than ever to reach the next level of Super Saiyan.

After watching one of his sessions during a particular visit, Lime commented to the hybrid if he was pushing himself a little too hard. However, for a boy that could move planets with a single punch and lay waste to entire armies with a sneeze, pulling a muscle during a weight lifting seminar was the least of his concerns.

He also had the privilege of teaching his younger brother how to control his Super Saiyan transformation, which he had unknowingly assumed during the battle with Zeru. The teen hybrid spent a few lessons getting Goten to tap into his inner power, allowing him to transform at will without the need for anger or strain. It was a trying process at first, but since the youngster had already achieved it, he was soon able to nudge his little brother that last step.

XXX

Standing in the middle of the grassy fields outside of their home in Mount Paozu, Gohan, Zangya and Piccolo oversaw the final stages of the transformation training for the youngest member of their team. With the former standing further ahead and the latter two remaining positioned in the rear with their arms folded, they watched closely as the youngest Saiyan on the planet focused his energy and powered up.

Golden aura bursting around him in a matter of seconds, Goten let out a yell as his hair stood on end, turned blonde, and his eyes flashed teal. A split second and a blast of wind later, and the child had finished his transformation.

Goten now stood before the group completely imbued in his race's most renowned form. Energy licking at the ground, the atmosphere around him seemingly shifted as he was met with the proud smile of his brother and Zangya, and the serious look of his Namekian mentor.

"Well done, Goten. You did it," Gohan exclaimed, grinning at his brother who was now checking himself out. "Man. And here I was thinking I would go down in history as the youngest Saiyan to ever successfully transform into a Super Saiyan. You beat me to it by three years, squirt."

"R-Really, Gohan?" Goten asked, looking up curiously while he allowed his wafting aura to fade, yet continued to hold his current state.

The teen nodded affirmatively, "Yes."

"Awesome!" the child cheered, pumping his fists excitedly before looking at his arms one after the other. "So… this is what a Super Saiyan feels like?" He certainly felt a lot stronger. That was for sure. But aside from the power increase, he couldn't really see what else had changed.

Zangya chuckled when she saw the youngster begin checking the soles of his feet, before then reaching up and tapping her head. "It's the hair, runt. If you want to see how much you've changed, go have a look at yourself in the mirror."
"Oh. Okay!" Goten chirped, before suddenly turning heel and rushing back towards the house just a few hundred meters out.

The trio on the lawn followed the boy curiously with their eyes, watching him enter and disappear into the house. They remained in their places for a couple of minutes, waiting to see what would happen. Eventually, their patience was rewarded by the lounge room window opening, followed by Goten super-speeding back out into the field. Sliding to a dusty stop in front of the group, the child looked up with stars in his eyes.

"B-Big brother! Big Sis! Mr. Piccolo! My hair is blonde!" he cheered excitedly, earning smiles from the three warriors before he reached up and tugged on his locks. "I can turn gold just like you, big brother!"

Gohan let out a laugh at his brother's discovery and reached forward, patting him on the head, "That's right, Goten. You can transform, just like me and dad."

The Namekian, coming to stand alongside his student, beamed down at the child, "You've officially joined the Super Saiyan club, kid. Be proud of yourself."

"YEAH!" the demi-Saiyan cheered, leaping into the air and punching the sky. He then proceeded to run laps of the area, performing flips and jumps as he celebrated his success. "I can turn Super Saiyan! I can turn Super Saiyan! Woowhoo!"

As the child danced and sang, his three adult role models looked on with expressions of pride and joy. While all this was happening, over by a distant tree and standing out of sight, another unofficial member of the group was watching the celebrations closely. With her arms crossed and attention fixed on the countryside, Paprika observed and listened to the commotion going on around the strongest warriors on the planet.

Having witnessed Goten's trials firsthand and seeing him succeed at transforming into a Super Saiyan, the Makyan's heart swelled with pride when she saw the youngster announce his triumph to the world. It was a touching moment, one that brought a smile to her face.

"Good job, Goten," she whispered, before proceeding to watch the child leap into his big brother's arms for a hug.

All things considered, it was a good day to come out after all.

XXX

In between his regular exercise routines and work, Gohan was also making awesome headway with his crime fighting responsibilities alongside Videl.

Positioned atop the tallest spire in Satan City, the two warriors could be seen sitting along one of its overlapping support beams, their feet hanging over the side, and their eyes fixed upon the countless rooftops stretched out before them. With the skyscrapers making up a majority of the horizon and the sun setting behind it, it presented one of the most breathtaking and tranquil settings they'd ever seen.

Dressed in her white and pink oversized shirts and spandex shorts, the raven haired tomboy sighed happily and swung her feet back and forth. Feeling a light breeze gently lick at her hair, she leaned back and took it all in. "I can't remember the last time the city has had such good weather. It's so nice out today."

"I can definitely agree with you on that. The sky is so clear," Gohan replied, sitting on the tower's ledge alongside her and also feeling the wind breathing against his skin. The sensation drew a long exhale from him, one that calmed his nerves and lifted his spirit. "All of the energy circling the planet and resting inside the soil… it's unreal. Ever since our battle with Zeru, the planet has become so much healthier."

"And everyone seems to be a lot happier too. Maybe it's because the people can feel the positive changes in the air that the earth's population seems to be smiling a lot more," the teen crime fighter said, before sharing a quick laugh at the end. 'I know it sounds a little bit cheesy and cliché when you say it like that, but after everything I've seen, it's gotta be true.'

"Perhaps you're just feeling so good yourself that everyone around you is simply resonating accordingly to your mood," Gohan suggested helpfully.

"That too. But I prefer seeing it more as a whole-world sort of change. A thought like that makes me feel like we actually did something that helped lead us to this state," Videl explained, turning to smile up at the demi-Saiyan to see him beaming right back at her. "Then again, it could just be wishful thinking on my part. You must think I'm silly."

"No. No. Not at all. I think that's a great outlook to have," Gohan quickly said, reassuring her with a wave of his hand. Resting it next to him, the spiky haired warrior in the purple gi then nodded to the girl before deciding to share his thoughts on the matter. "Life is hard and the road it lays is rough and unforgiving. For super-powered fighters like us and normal people in general, it's always better to think positive and to always try and see the lighter side of things. That's how we were able to make it so far. We've experienced so many battles and hardships that, from a normal person's point of view, would have turned us cold and sour a long time ago. But by embracing every moment of freedom and peace that we can, and experiencing as many of these moments possible, we can make the most of every single day and in turn lift the spirits of the people around us."

Videl grinned brightly at the boy's words of wisdom, "That sounds like something a super hero would say."

"Well… technically speaking, I'm not that far off from a super hero," Gohan laughed, before then turning away and scratching his chin in thought, "The idea certainly does have merit."

"O-Oh. What are you thinking now?" the raven haired girl asked while looking up at the teen in amusement.

The demi-Saiyan grinned and turned back to his best friend, "I'm considering taking up your advice of becoming a caped crusader. You know, like that guy we saw in the movies not too long ago." He then made a swishing gesture with his arm and covered the lower half of his face in a very Count Dracula-like manner, "Protecting the good from the wicked and defending Satan City in the name of justice! I am not the hero the people deserve, but I am the hero that they need. I am the Dark Knight!"

His expression and acting voice had Videl stifle a giggle before she burst out laughing altogether. Wiping away tears from how hard she'd ended up laughing moments later, the crime fighter then gave the boy a wide grin, "You can be sued for copyright, you know."

Gohan shrugged, "Alright then. I'll just come up with a new name. Let's see…" The teen looked ahead and tapped his cheek a couple of times. "It'll have to be cool; something that embodies peace and justice, but also covers up my true identity."

"Since it's already a well known fact that you fight crime alongside me as a Super Saiyan, that idea seems kind of redundant," the girl said with a shake of her head.

"I think that's a terrific name," Videl replied enthusiastically, before reaching forward and patting her friend on the hand. "But… why don't you stick with the Gold Fighter for now. It seems more appropriate, considering the boys at the station and a lot of the criminals we've brought in have already seen fit to call you that. You're a household name now, stud… and it looks like you're gonna have to live with it."

Deflating a little at the realization, the hybrid cheered up some afterwards and gave his friend a warm smile. "Alright. If that's how it's going to be, I suppose that's alright." He then took a peek down at his purple gi and tugged on it considerately. "I may need to go for a change of dress though. While this is great as a martial arts uniform, it doesn't exactly scream authority."

"As smoking hot as you are in that, it's not really something you would call standard issue. But I'm sure we'll be able to come up with something. Let's just give it a couple of days," Videl added helpfully. When she saw Gohan turn to stare at her, it took her several seconds before she realized exactly what she'd just said. Recoiling and blushing to the roots of her hair, the teen waved her hands in front of her and hastily babbled out a response. "I-I mean… even though you look good in that outfit, G-Gohan… it's not appropriate for our kind of work. Yeah." Straightening up, she quickly regained her composure. "It's good to wear when you're saving the world from monsters and stuff. But when fighting crime on the streets, you need something a little… uhh… more."

"Oh. Okay," Gohan murmured, his mind slowly working around the girl's little fumble. "Did she just say what I think she said?" He knew he didn't hear her wrong. His hearing was as good as Piccolo's, except he couldn't break through four dimensions with it. However, after taking in her elaboration of her initial remark, he quickly reasoned that it was a simple, honest slip of the tongue and went with her second act. A smile slowly returned to his face. "I'll try and find something a bit more casual then."

"That'll be good," Videl agreed, before turning to stare off towards the sun once again.

Smiling across at her, the young demi-Saiyan took a few moments to look the girl over. Trying to get a few ideas for an outfit that would be best suited for him by checking out her attire, a sudden thought rushed through his mind that had him withdraw a little. Blinking several times when fixing his attention on his partner's face, Gohan's mouth fell open in shock when he saw the crime fighter's hair whip on the wind and a glow filter across her face. The sight of her literally took his breath away for all of five seconds.

"Wow. I... never realized how cute Videl looks when she smiles," Gohan thought, tilting his head to get a better look. Cracking a warm smile as well, the Z-warrior then balked when he caught himself edging closer to the girl and looked away in embarrassment. His cheeks were flushed red.

For the next few minutes the pair continued to sit on top of that tower, enjoying the sunset. Receiving no emergency calls on their watch or hearing any sirens anywhere in the city, they decided to relax a little more and enjoy one another's company.

Glancing across at the boy discreetly, Videl, smiling fondly, slowly shuffled closer till there were only a couple of inches of space between them. Tucking a stray hair behind her ear at the same time, she turned to look up at him once again and whispered, "Hey, Gohan."

Turning to his left, the demi-Saiyan was caught off guard when he saw how close Videl was to him.

He'd been so caught up in thinking that he didn't even sense her edge closer to him, which really spoke wonders about her ability to take advantage of a person's lapse in attention. Nevertheless, the young warrior smiled politely and acknowledged his friend's attempts to make conversation with eye contact and respect. "What's up, Videl?"

The tomboy grinned, "How close are you to achieving the next level of Super Saiyan?" It was a strange question to ask in that moment, but one that the Saiyan didn't do anything to dismiss.
"During the last training session we had together a few days ago, you said you weren't that far off from actually making the jump."

"Oh, I'm… getting pretty close now," Gohan chuckled while reaching up to rub the back of his head. "I know I'm much stronger than I was a few months ago. But it seems like this next transformation is going to need a little something extra to push me those last few steps."
Apparently, in order for him to achieve this illusive third form in the Saiyan transformation process, he was going to need a lot more than raw power and determination in order for him to ascend. "I won't be able to accomplish this through brute force alone. Something more is needed. I just… haven't figured out what that 'something' is yet."

"Well… if nothing else, at least you're trying," Videl replied, a smile pulling across her lips as she gazed up at the dashing young man. "At the rate you're going and considering how rare you said Super Saiyans are, I bet you'll be the first Saiyan in history to achieve the third level transformation. If not the first Saiyan then you'll at least be the first half-Saiyan."

Gohan's expression then became filled with a mixture of both pride and delight at his friend's supportive comments. "Yeah. That would be quite the crowning achievement." He then clenched his fists excitedly and looked down at them. "To become the strongest Saiyan ever… man, I wonder what that would be like." The only time he even considered going for the top spot was when he actually started training seriously seven years ago.

But now that he was old enough to realize his dreams, aspirations and potential for success, there was no doubt in his mind that he was more than capable of going for it himself. His father and Vegeta had been fighting for that title for years now.

What was wrong with a little healthy competition?

"Sounds like a lot of fun," Videl answered, before suddenly leaning over and resting her head against the boy's muscular shoulder. Though her action did certainly startle the hybrid out of his determined reverie, he didn't react beyond a momentary jerk and a surprised blink. When he looked down at his partner, he saw the girl sigh, relax into his side as if he were a pillow, and gaze up at him with a soft look in her eyes. "I'll be rooting for you from the sidelines, Gohan-kun."

The demi-Saiyan considered her words for several moments, after which he spared her a gentle smile and returned her gesture by leaning into her as well. "Thanks, Videl."

They then returned to staring over the horizon and remained there until the sun had well and truly set over the distant hills. Needless to say, it had been a really great day.

Doing the gentlemanly thing, Gohan escorted Videl home once they'd clocked off with their chief over the radio. Landing outside her home's front door, the pair strolled up the steps and stopped. It was here that the demi-Saiyan decided to make an announcement to his friend; one that he was certain would add some cheer to her day.

It certainly made him happy when he told her.

"Hey, Videl."

"Yes, Gohan," the teenager replied, turning around so fast that the hybrid was worried she'd throw herself off balance.

The spiky haired young man, standing beside the girl and beaming at her, finally broke to her the news he'd been dying to tell her all day. "I'll be taking the Orange Star High school entrance exam in a few days. That means when I pass, I'll be able to attend the same school as you."

Her eyes widening told Gohan she'd heard him, "No way. For real?"

"Yeah," the boy nodded, giving her the trademark Son grin as an appropriate follow-up. "I figured I could end my schooling period as a student at an actual school for a change. After thinking on it for a couple of hours, I then thought to myself what better place to end it than at the same high school my best friend is attending?"

Almost instantly the girl gasped and stepped towards the demi-Saiyan in excitement. "Wow! That's great, Gohan! You're going to ace that exam easily!" It was clear she'd wanted the boy to attend school with her for a while now, but she never got the chance to pitch the idea to him. But after hearing that he was going through with it on his own accord, it had the crime fighter jumping with joy, both on the inside and the outside. Clenching her fists, Videl pumped them excitedly, "Oh man. Erasa is going to flip!"

Chuckling at his friend's response, he then reached forward and gently nudged her in the shoulder, bringing her delighted gaze back around. "I guess I'll be seeing you soon, yeah?"

Videl nodded vigorously, her eyes shimmering, "Yes."

Giving her a wave, the gi wearing young man then started to head off. But just when he was walking down the steps, his friend called out to him.

"Uh. Gohan."

Stopping just short of the bottom step, Gohan turned around and smiled, "Yes?" When his eyes fell upon her, he saw the girl clench a fist over her chest a couple of times and an air of anxiousness fall over her.

As if grappling with a life-changing decision, the raven haired tomboy attempted to speak. "D-Do you... umm..." With a bead of sweat trickling down the side of her face and her cheeks red, you'd initially believe she had some kind of fever. "Uhh..." However, after several moments of wrestling with the words she wanted to get out, she eventually swallowed them and instead gave him a smile.

"It's nothing. I'll see you later," the crime fighter eventually said.

Confusion framed the demi-Saiyan's face for but a moment, before it was shortly replaced by his kind smile once again. "Yeah. Good night, Videl." With another wave, which earned one from his friend, Gohan turned heel and, after taking a couple more steps, he vanished in a flash of golden light.
After seeing the boy off, the human fighter slowly let herself into her home. As soon as she stepped into the well-lit entrance hall of her father's domain and shut the door behind her, Videl immediately pressed her back against the wooden surface and took several deep breaths of air. Looking up, a mixture of fright, embarrassment, and dismay filled her face as she clenched her fist tightly and banged it a few times against the frame.

She ended up hitting it so hard that she caused the entire room to shake.

"Damn it! I couldn't do it..." Videl whispered, cursing to herself several times before she ended up smacking her head back against the door, rattling it under the force of her skull.

It was as plain as the nose on her face. As of a couple of months ago, Videl had come to the realization that she was slowly but surely falling for Son Gohan... and there wasn't a damn thing she could do about it.

For years she'd spent hours hanging out with the boy; training under him, studying with him, and going out on countless adventures and excursions with him. The young Saiyan had introduced her to his family and friends, showed her a side of the world she never knew even existed, helped her to unleash her true powers and trained her in how to harness them.

Looking back on all the times they'd spent with each other, Gohan had done more things for her than any other boy could ever hope to do, and not only did he do it without question, but he didn't ask for anything in return. His selflessness and kindness was otherworldly, and on top of his friendly and incredibly benevolent nature, she'd become captivated by his personality as well.

But what she had originally thought was a deep friendship with him after all these years of knowing him was actually an attraction to his personality, one that complimented hers so well. At first it'd seemed harmless and platonic on the surface, but in truth... it was becoming something so much more than that.

It wasn't until a few months ago that Videl realized she'd become physically attracted to the demi-Saiyan as well. His dazzling smile, his striking charcoal eyes, the complexion of his face... over the past couple of years, it'd become almost impossible for the girl to deny how handsome he was. Not only that, but after seeing how fit a male specimen he actually was on the field and in their free time, she could also acknowledge without a shadow of a doubt that he had a fine body as well.

Simply the thought of her peeling away that excess layer of obstructive clothing to see exactly what he was hiding under that baggy gi filled Videl with a desire she'd never experienced before. And it scared the hell out of her because she'd never felt anything like it before and she didn't know how to handle it.

To put it simply, Gohan had in all translations of the words; captured her heart.

"Why does he have to be so God damn good-looking?!"

She had been so close! So close to asking him out on a date! But... thanks to a combination of shyness and stubbornness, her body just couldn't do it.

Feeling hot from hanging out in his presence for so long and frustrated at being unable to follow-through with her intentions, as her head started to fill with nothing but images of her crush's smile, Videl decided to take her frustrations up into her room. Hopefully she would be able to hash out these complicated feelings in her dreams...

And maybe destroy the punching bag a few times in the process.
While the daughter of the Champ mulled over her emotions in her room, many miles away, when Gohan eventually returned home later that night, he went to bed with a culmination of new thoughts and feelings on his mind.

The thoughts of Videl were one thing. That made getting to sleep almost an impossibility for him, as he tossed and turned for a better part of that entire night. However, while the images of the girl's face and sudden influx of fantasies involving her were definitely the most prominent thoughts to stick out of his mind for those few hours he spent awake, it was the things Videl had told him earlier that evening that he used to help distract himself from her, if only for a moment.

Thanks to his best friend's timely advice echoing in the deep recesses of his brain, Gohan couldn't help but spare a moment of reflection over his current training regiment and the goal he was striving towards.

Had there ever been a Super Saiyan 3 before?

He could go and ask Vegeta or his dad about it. But as far as he was concerned, he was the only Saiyan in the universe to have even gotten this far.

Thinking about it helped Gohan settle his nerves and get to sleep…

...

...

But that didn't stop Videl from popping back into his dreams later that night.

XXX

(Two days later)

Somewhere in the outermost regions of the universe, far out of reach of the planet earth and the Milky Way galaxy, there floated a portion of space taken straight out of a sci-fi film. Out here, a vast collection of galaxies of all shapes and sizes were gathered, from spiral and elliptical masses to irregular and peculiar formations, all of which were orbiting an enormous nebula millions of times larger than any other in existence. The arrangement of cloud, dust and gas was simply massive, almost resembling the 'Pillars of Creation' segment of the Eagle Nebula, making this part of the universe a one of a kind.

It was so crowded with stars and galaxies that it made it impossible to sense life forces or energy signatures, no matter how hard one focused. This made it an ideal hiding place.

It was around here, floating on the very precipice of this region, where all of the galaxies and the freak quasar sat in plain sight, there floated a lone planet. Heavily resembling the earth, the planet had a cloud of green gas surrounding it with multiple spiral arms protruding from the wafting mass. Since the planetoid itself was sitting in the center of the cloud ring, it gave the world an overall galaxy like appearance. There were also a couple of moons orbiting it, illustrating the kind of gravitational pull it had amidst the clusters of galaxies.

Moving in through the debris and satellites, a breathable atmosphere encircled the world, providing shelter and home to an abundance of wildlife from all across the quadrant. Furthermore, over the lush, forest covered surface that would put the planet Pandora itself to shame, at the northernmost pole of the globe, sat an enormous castle.

Fantastical in its design, this structure towered over the dozens of mountains, plateaus and lakes surrounding it, with the castle itself having a very mountainous-like appearance. Various pillars and bridges made up its exterior, which had an abundance of plant-life growing on it, with the very center building being made of black metal, molded into a skyscraper befitting the home of an emperor.

At the very top of the castle that was as big as a small city was the throne room. An open air, wide and circular room with the king's seat elevated on a platform in the very center of the floor space, a series of pillars were set up around the perimeter to hold up the roof, all of which had very royal, artistic qualities to them. The circular balcony giving a superb view of the world beyond the railings, there was also a tasteful skylight on the ceiling, bringing light to the middle of the chamber.

Over at the front of the room, which also served as the control center for the entire castle, past the stone table and towards the perimeter balcony, the entrance to a private terrace with its own spring was built. The silk drapes pulled back and tied to the support pillars of the archway, two figures could be seen out on this sky rise patio.

Standing by the entrance at attention like a glorified sentry/butler, an old Namekian with dark green skin and yellow patches, dressed in red and white robes, and wearing a white turban, had taken up guard duty at the archway with a towel draped over his arm. His eyes directed ahead of him, he seemed completely ignorant of the two birds that fluttered down from the nearby tree to roost on his shoulder.

The other figure, appearing as nothing but a silhouette against the backdrop of the fantastical, forest covered horizon and the steam lifting out of the hot spring in front of them, was currently standing in a shallow pool underneath a hot waterfall, naked as the day they were born. From the Namekian's position, no other details could be made out due to the hot mist hanging around them.

However, that was soon to change when, in another part of the chamber, a section of floor opened up and a collection of figures rose into view. Transported by the elevator, their arrival was quickly acknowledged by the Namekian guard, who turned towards the figure bathing under the waterfall.

"Cal has returned…" the Namekian spoke in a rough voice, before his eyes narrowed, "With guests."

It was his last words that had the figure's head turn.

Amidst the approaching footsteps, grunting and struggling could be heard, as three figures walked out of the shadows and into the light pouring in through the archway. Once they emerged from the darkness, two aliens; one a tall, bald, purple-skinned figure and another short, blue alien with a big black nose, both dressed in specially designed, green and black armor of the Planet Trade Organization, were forced into the spotlight with their hands tied behind them by an eight-foot tall warrior dressed in black, figure-hugging plated armor and wearing a smooth helmet with a red, V-shaped visor.

The heavy footsteps of the tall, armored figure echoed throughout the room before he stopped at the steps and forced the two men onto their knees, both of them beaten to a pulp and bleeding from various wounds.

Considering the imposing form of their captor, the pair obviously never stood a chance.

"Gah! Where the hell are we?" the purple-skinned alien spoke, coughing up blood all over the floor. "D-Damn it."
"What kind of bullshit… is this?" the blue alien also choked out, trying his best to look up through the searing pain he was in.

Before their questions could be answered, another floor section opened up nearby and three more figures rose up from the floor. Stepping off of the platform the instant it stopped, a young female warrior with long, spiky brown hedgehog-like hair, with brown skin, and adorned in a dark blue, one-piece spandex uniform cut to show off her ample cleavage, wearing white gloves and boots with yellow tips on the ends, strolled towards the archway.

The two men kneeling on the ground saw her glance their way and, after receiving a hard glare from her, watched as she walked over to one of the arch's pillars and leant up against it. It was here she folded her arms and went on to continue staring at them with unpleasantness reflected in her gaze.

This then led to the group's captives looking across at the other two figures, who also stepped into view shortly afterwards.

"Hey, Cal. I heard you just came back a few minutes ago. Did you run into any trouble while you were out?" the voice of a female spoke up, before a tall, humanoid woman with short brown hair, and wearing red-rimmed glasses, a similar blue one-piece spandex suit, with dark, flexible, figure-hugging Saiyan armor decorated with shoulder and hip pauldrons, stepped into the light. While she did appear fully human at first, the two prisoners then noticed she had an extra pair of cat ears protruding from her hair and a long brown feline tail with a white tip waving behind her, illustrating her delight.

Chewing on a toothpick, the woman glanced down at the two beaten-up soldiers and grinned, "Oh. I'll take that as a no."

The moment she spoke, the second person standing behind her waddled forward. When he did, the two prisoners spotted a large, nine-foot tall, very rotund balloon man with completely white skin, two black eyes and cat ears, shuffle into view. Making a 'squishy' sound with every step he took, the inflated person stopped directly behind his partner and, after inspecting the pair, turned to the cat woman inquisitively.

"Beep."

The humanoid feline alien chuckled in response, "No, Mobi. You don't need to waste your energy healing these guys. They're just Frieza's scum."

"Beep."

"You won't have to look at them for too long. I'm sure her highness will make an example of them soon enough," the tall warrior continued.

Growling at the woman's brash words, the purple-skinned alien snapped heatedly in her direction, "When I get out of this, I swear I'm going to kill all of you!"

Cat ears twitching, the tall, shapely woman snorted, "Yeah. I'm sure you will." She then showed the man her shoulder and stuck her nose into the air conceitedly. "If Cal was able to beat you two single-handedly, then you two knuckleheads don't stand a chance against the four of us… let alone our leader."

The hunched over, blue man with the swollen eye blinked when he caught onto that last part. "And who exactly… is your leader?"
"There's only one true leader that we obey… and that is our Lord Frieza!" the purple alien shouted vehemently, before turning to glare at the towering, armored man behind him. So far, besides throwing them to the floor, the guy now identified as Cal had done nothing to shut them up and was continuing to stand there like a statue. "He is the undisputed ruler… of all of space… and the most powerful being in the universe! No warrior… can compare to his magnificence!"

"Oh. I seriously doubt that."

A new voice. But this one didn't come from the people who'd just entered the room.

Looking ahead, the two men on the ground saw the figure standing underneath the waterfall outside wave off their hair and turn around. Easily recognizing the shapely silhouette belonging to a woman, they watched the female stroll out from under the cascading stream and saunter up the stairs. Taking the towel held out to her by the Namekian guard, they then watched her dry off her hair and wrap it around her body, securing it tightly.

By the time she stopped in front of them, dripping wet, the two soldiers saw exactly who it was that was addressing them.

The voice and apparent leader of the group was a slender young, humanoid woman around eighteen years old, with tanned, smooth skin, a shapely, fit body, and had long, shoulder-length black hair that grew down behind her with two long bangs hanging on either side of her head. Even though she was dripping wet and only wearing a towel, it didn't at all detract from her imposing image. In fact, from the way she stood over them, with her sharp, beautiful eyes fixed on them in a glare, and her form outlined by the mountains and cosmos behind her, she definitely possessed the air of a ruler.

The amount of killing intent she was giving off also added to her intensity.

It was almost suffocating just how much there was.

Once she was certain she'd gotten their attention, the woman placed her hands on her hips and fixed the two prisoners with the most potent death stare they'd ever encountered. "Sorbet and Tagoma I presume; elite soldiers of the Planet Trade Organization formerly under Frieza's rule and the two men responsible for butchering over ten billion people on several different planets."

Shaking themselves out of their respective dazes, the purple skinned soldier named Tagoma gritted his teeth and sneered at the woman, "Yeah? What does that matter to you, bitch?"

The raven haired warrior spared the elite a careless glance, before then deciding to address both of them at the same time. "Nothing, really. I simply wish to acquire information from the two of you regarding the death of your former master. Seeing as how the entire Ginyu Force was destroyed as well as the rest of Frieza's family several years ago, you two are my next best option."

The blue Sorbet spat to the side in disgust, "Like we'd ever tell you anything."

A careless shrug came from the young interrogator, "While it's true I'm not the most persuasive person in the universe, I do have my methods." She then craned her head a little towards the prisoners and threw them an inquisitive look. "That of course all depends on how cooperative you two are going to be."

Tagoma smirked, blood dribbling out of the corner of his mouth, "Do your worst."

The woman with the cat features standing off to the side raised an eyebrow and smiled, "Ooh. This one knows how to play hard ball."
Expression unchanging, the raven haired interrogator glanced up at the armored man standing behind the two. As soon as her eyes met his, the dark warrior stepped forward and punched both across their faces, causing them to splatter blood across the tiled floor. When the two were done spluttering and seeing stars, they looked back towards their towed questioner to see her raise her head.

"Are you going to cooperate now?"

Sorbet glared hatefully at the woman, "Why the… hell… do you want to learn about… Lord Frieza's death?"

A grunt from the boss immediately followed the question, "Simple. Because not too long ago, your beloved master and former intergalactic emperor destroyed my home planet and wiped out my entire race." The moment she answered their inquiry, the pair kneeling in front of her then saw something wiggle out from behind her and, upon focusing on it, their eyes widened in disbelief.

It was a tail… and a very distinct one at that.

"Y-You're…" Sorbet began, swallowing hard, "You're a Saiyan?"

"Bingo," the woman replied, allowing her furry appendage to curl around her waist protectively while she continued to address the prisoners. "And I'm not the only one. My subordinate Maya over there…" She nodded to the other visitor to the room leaning against the archway, "She's a Saiyan too." When all eyes turned to the dark skinned warrior, they saw the brown, furry belt unravel and wave in the air beside her.

It was a sight that had the two warriors gawk for several seconds, before looks of hatred and disgust filled their faces.

"You monkey scum…" Tagoma growled.

"You dare raise a hand against Lord Frieza's elite!" Sorbet immediately followed up, before snarling at the towel clad woman, "Filthy, backwater garbage! A weak race like yours isn't fit to be in the same room as us! You should be thanking Lord Frieza for letting your people live for as long as they did-ACK!" The man was silenced when the woman's tail suddenly came around and slapped him across the face, smacking his head to the side and knocking a couple of teeth out. Stunned and bleeding even more, the blue man turned back around to stare up at the now even more pissed off hostess. "Y-You dare…"

"Yes. I dare," the raven haired lord replied while her tail waved in the air in front of her. Upon seeing the men sneer, she lifted her nose at them, "And let me tell you this… if you believe that my race is weak, you're sadly mistaken. The proof is standing right in front of you."

"Please," Tagoma said with a smirk quickly returning to his face, "If you didn't have your big, bad bodyguard here… the two of us would be able to destroy you single-handedly…"

Eyes flickering momentarily at the challenge, the raven haired woman stared at them unnervingly for several long seconds. After looking both of them in the eyes, she then glanced up at the armored man in black armor.

At first the two prisoners thought they were going to get hit again, and the other people standing around the room, Maya included, believed their leader was going to turn them loose and beat them into the ground. But just when it seemed like something exciting was going to happen, the towering Cal pulled out two scouter from behind him, a classic blue one and a full visor version, and slipped them on their respective owners.

Still bound and confused by what was happening, the two battered aliens then looked up to see the towel clad woman nod towards them. "Those are the current model power scanners used by your branch of the Planet Trade Organization, yes?" She then gestured to their equipment, "Go ahead. Take a quick peak if you like."

The two elites frowning suspiciously, they then nudged their scouters with their shoulders and activated them. A series of beeping sounds rang out when their fiber glass trackers locked onto the woman in front of them and a series of numbers came up. When it was done processing, the two men simultaneously smirked.

In a way, they were satisfied.

"Power level: ten?" Tagoma chuckled.

It was then the two soldiers were silenced by the smile that formed on the girl's face. As soon as she caught their attention, the towel clad warrior stepped back a little and lowered her head, causing a sinister shadow to cast over her eyes.

"Check again," she said, before closing her eyes and exhaling deeply.

Her actions confused her audience members. But when the two Planet Trade soldiers saw currents of electricity suddenly shoot up her body and crackle off of her, they instantly knew something was up.

Sweating a bit when a couple of bolts shot right past their heads, the pair's scouters lit up on their own accord. Paying close attention to the numbers that flickered past, their eyes then widened considerably at the readings that flashed into view seconds later. By the time their visors finished crunching the digits, both of them were sweating bullets.

Jaw dropping, Sorbet choked, "I-Impossible…"

"A hundred and twenty million?" Tagoma exclaimed, unable to believe what he was seeing. "Th-That's Lord Frieza's maximum!"

Smiles formed on the faces of the people standing around the room. This went double for the woman standing before her stunned captives, "And that's only fifty percent of my base power level." It was then the raven haired girl grunted and a white aura suddenly exploded off of her like a flame. This caused the scouters the two soldiers were wearing to go haywire, before they overloaded and exploded, causing their users to wince when the parts scattered across the tiled floor. Upon seeing them go off, the glowing woman frowned and allowed her aura to fade. "Hm. I'm disappointed. It seems that your current models can only go up to two hundred million. What a shame."

Snarling angrily, Sorbet snapped, "I-It's a trick! You… You must have tampered with our scouters somehow! Yeah! That's it!"

"There's no way a Saiyan's power level can ever get that high! Not in a million years!" Tagoma followed up with just as much fury.

The group leader chuckled at their babbling, "Oh. I assure you, it can." She then gave the pair a very foul looking smile that had the duo pull back fearfully. "Because you see… I'm not an ordinary Saiyan. Neither is my friend over there. The two of us have long since ascended beyond the limitations of our race's capabilities and after years of adapting and surviving in the harshest environments imaginable, have tapped into a higher level of power that hasn't been seen for thousands of years." Her eyes flickered devilishly the moment she finished her brief tirade. "Have you ever heard of the legend of the Super Saiyan?"

Tagoma and Sorbet's eyes widened.

"Wait… you don't mean…" the latter choked out.

"Allow me to demonstrate." Sparing them one last smile, the raven haired woman's expression then darkened as she took a step back. As soon as she did so, her face scrunched up into one of concentration and bolts of electricity started to run up her body. The two hostages and the others standing around her then proceeded to watch silently as the ground began to shake and a radioactive, golden glow started to waft off of the girl's damp body. A loud rumbling echoing out as the castle proceeded to be shaken off of its foundations, the intensity of the atmosphere was swiftly amplified when, in a blinding flash of light, a golden aura exploded around the woman and engulfed her completely. Her hair spiked up and turned blonde, and her eyes flashed teal.

Her transformation was marked by a powerful gust of wind that washed over the two captives. While both of them appeared stricken with terror, the woman's lieutenants merely looked on with either interest or indifference.

A hologram of a scouter appearing over her left eye and beginning to flicker with lights, Kure glanced down at the numbers that appeared and smiled, "300,000,000 riki… not bad. It's even greater than last time." She then looked across at the two gawking warriors, whose attention quickly snapped towards her when they heard the number. "Or, according to the scouters used by Frieza and Cooler's armies, that's approximately 12,000,000,000 on the imperial scale."

The ever jittery Sorbet was flabbergasted, "What? Y-You've gotta be kidding me…"

As her aura warped around her, the powered up leader spoke while her expression remained stone cold serious, "This golden aura is the defining trait of the Saiyan of legend; the most powerful warrior in the universe and the very form that was once thought to be a mere myth. But as you can see… after experiencing much pain and hardship… I've crossed the threshold and gained mastery over this awesome power." She allowed her words to sink into their prisoners. Then, after several seconds had past, a smirk tugged at the corner of her mouth. "But… even this form has been surpassed."

"Huh?" Tagoma and Sorbet looked at her in bewilderment.

The second they did so, the Saiyan leader removed her hands from her hips and, clenching her fists, powered up a second time. Much like her first transformation, this one produced a shockwave that blasted the two prisoners in the face and shook the ground. In an instant, her aura intensified and became sharper, and was accompanied by streams of blue electricity running up and down her body. On top of her increased bio-field, her hair stood on end, literally defying gravity, and spiked up towards the sky, leaving her two side bangs hanging on either side of her face. Her expression becoming more defined and serious, the woman's eyes also turned a dark turquoise.

As soon as she finished powering up, the glowing female continued to hold her stance. Remarkably enough, despite the amount of energy bellowing off of her, the towel she had wrapped around her remained modestly fastened to her body.

"W-What the hell," Sorbet exclaimed, unable to comprehend what was going on.
Even though they couldn't sense power levels, they could literally feel how much more powerful the woman had become from the way the atmosphere intensified. The amount of energy she was giving up was literally palpable.

The Saiyan leader's glare tightened as soon as her transformation was complete, "This is a level of Super Saiyan that has ascended beyond that of a Super Saiyan." Currents of electricity zapping off of her, the super-powered woman smiled, "Or, as my subordinate Kure likes to call it, a Super Saiyan 2."

Maya, having remained quiet throughout the entire demonstration thus far, threw a dirty look over at the cat woman from her position by the archway.

The recipient of the glare simply grinned and wagged her tail playfully in her companion's direction. "Hey, don't give me that look. I thought the name suited it quite well."

The brown haired, silent party frowned and promptly looked away, "Pft. Whatever."

Giving a very mature giggle at her friend's pouty face, Kure looked back towards her boss and scanned her power level once again. When the readings came up, she arced an eyebrow, "Oh my. 500,000,000 riki. By my calculations, that's well over 24,000,000,000."

Completely ignoring the comments being thrown around her, the transformed warrior then clenched her fists even tighter and, assuming a wider stance, smirked at the two stunned soldiers. "And now… the final curtain." Her expression tightening up a third time, the woman's aura blasted off of her at an even greater rate and, with a loud growl, her energy level started to climb.

As it did, the castle, the countryside, hell… the entire planet began to shake as the gravity inside of the chamber started to go crazy. The two lackeys kneeling on the ground were nearly blown away when an invisible repulsive force struck them headlong, with the other audience members having to brace themselves against the storm that followed. To accompany the loud rumbling sound of the planet being rocked to its core, bolts of lightning shot off of the female Saiyan's aura as it blazed away like the sun itself, a cry of agony leaving her lips as her hair started to elongate in direct correlation to the amount of power she was steadily producing.

Outside, the clouds above the castle formed into a vortex, birds were startled from their roosts, and the moons orbiting the planet were suddenly shifted out of alignment as shockwave after shockwave rippled from the northernmost point of the globe. Judging from the way the world was trembling, you could swear the entire thing was going to explode.

However, just when it seemed like the planet would split in two, the female Saiyan finished her power up with an almighty howl; her scream echoing across the mountain ranges as a blinding flash of light blasted the room.

Everyone had to shield themselves from the hot wind and the energy burst that hit them. When the tempest finally died down shortly afterwards and everyone looked back towards the center of the cataclysm, the jaws of the two prisoners dropped at what they saw.

Standing in an electric golden aura with blue bolts of lightning crackling off of her body, the female Saiyan had gone through yet another startling transformation. However, instead of having her golden hair standing on end, it had instead pulled back and grown down to around knee height. On top of that, all of the locks were spiky and shining, almost as if they were radioactive. While most of it had grown behind her, only two bangs continued to hang on either side of her face, the latter of which had become hardened with killing intent and, not only had her irises developed pupils, but her eyebrows had disappeared.
This gave her a much fiercer appearance, and with the way gravity seemed to waft around her along with the wind that emitted from her new form, it was almost like she'd become a whole other being.

"Behold," the girl spoke, her voice raspy and noticeably lower in tone, "A technique known to only a handful of Saiyans in history; the Golden Mane Super Saiyan, otherwise known as a Super Saiyan 3."

At first baffled by her transformation, Tagoma quickly gathered his senses and shouted at her, "I don't care if it's called the Golden Haired Monkey Freak! So what?! You changed your hair and shaved your eyebrows! What difference does that make?"

Expression unchanging in the face of the man's anger, the glowing, female warrior then stepped to the side and gestured to the archway behind her. When he saw her move, the Namekian servant standing out on the terrace moved inside and out of the woman's line of fire. This gave both her and the two prisoners a clear view of the horizon beyond the balcony, and the enormous nebula floating beyond the planet's reach.

Upon gesturing their attention towards the transparent sky, the Super Saiyan girl spoke, "That enormous collection of gas and dust is called the 'Second Celestial Gateway of Vulpan', also known as the 'Doorway of the Gods', which is situated on the very edge of the Northern Quadrant. For countless eons that enormous quasar has given birth to thousands of galaxies and stars, all of which were molded and shaped into existence within its fiery, chaotic mass. It is a remnant of the great calamity that created this universe and the mother of many galaxies that we know of today." She then pointed to one of the random galaxies in question; a spiral cluster that was currently the closest to their world. "That system floating in front of us is referred to by the people of Dorgal as the Drssa Galaxy, which came into existence two billion years ago."

The pair of nervous soldiers acknowledged the brief astronomy lecture with suspicion. But before either of them could ask why she was telling them this, they suddenly saw her bring two fingers up and, producing a golden sheath of energy around the tips, pointed it through the archway and fired a highly concentrated ball of energy. The attack shot out of the chamber, over the terrace, through the atmosphere, and towards the galaxy. A split second later, an explosion bigger than any the two soldiers had ever seen lit up the core of the spiral galaxy and incinerated the entire mass in the blink of an eye. The hyper nova consumed eighty percent of the cluster, while sending whatever remaining stars hurtling into space in all directions.

Moments later, the explosion faded, leaving nothing but a ball of fire hanging in a vacuum, which slowly started to dissipate.

Lowering her arm to her side, the super powered Saiyan empress frowned, "It took a billion years to create that galaxy. I just destroyed it in less than ten seconds." She powered down shortly afterwards, leaving the girl standing there with a bead of sweat trickling down her face and her eyes fixed on the startled pair, "An empty galaxy with enormous potential to create new life, gone in the blink of an eye. Now, if I could do that to an entire star system without even flinching, think about how inconsequential your deaths will be once I'm through with you." It only took her a few steps before her shadow fell over the two hapless soldiers.

The faces the pair wore almost made it look like they were about to wet their pants. It seemed like a sure eventuality too, until one of them nutted up and decided to speak.

Sorbet swallowed heavily, "W-Who are you?"

The now powered-down Saiyan craned her head and lifted her nose at the two neophytes. "My name is Sandra. I am the Empress of the New Saiyan Empire, ruler of the Planet Corvus, guardian of the Vulpan Quadrant, and the most powerful warrior in the universe." Her eyes narrowed sharply as she glared at the pair. "There is not a creature alive that is stronger than me… not even your former master."

The Namekian guard, cringing at the girl's long-winded introduction, leaned over and whispered towards his companion leaning against the pillar, "She's more uptight than usual today."

Hearing him loud and clear, Maya nodded in agreement, "If you ask me, she really needs to get a boyfriend."

By this point in time, the bolder of the two elite soldiers had finally had enough with this situation. As impressive an air as this woman was putting on for them, it did little in silencing his tongue. He was a loyalist through and through, and when someone else that wasn't his beloved master was making claims of superiority and leadership in the universe, there was no possible way he could remain quiet.

This Saiyan's words were blasphemy to him and he was going to put a stop to her the only way he could.

With good, old-fashioned shouting.

Tagoma snarled, "Fuck you, you wretched, Saiyan whor-

These were the only words that managed to leave his lips before Sandra, with her hands resting comfortably on her hips, effortlessly threw a roundhouse kick and sliced the alien's head clean off of his shoulders. A spray of blood later and the topless body collapsed to the floor, hitting it with a dull thud.

While Sorbet shrieked at the sight of his comrade's swift death, Kure made a whistling sound to show how impressed she was at the display, while the white balloon man standing behind her tilted his head observantly.

"Beep."

"I agree. Ten points," the cat woman replied cheerfully.

After watching the rather brutal execution of the prisoner, Maya allowed a smile to cross her lips as she then glanced across at the old Namekian warrior standing nearby. "Looks like you've got some more cleaning to do, huh Gast?"

The green skinned warrior sighed and closed his eyes, "It certainly seems that way… yes."

Glancing down at the headless corpse, the armored Cal then looked towards their remaining prisoner, the blue-skinned man freaking out when all eyes in the room quickly fell upon him. Turning back to his hostess, he saw the terrifying woman fix her death glare squarely onto him.

Rotating slightly, the towel clad Saiyan nodded in the remaining captive's direction, "Here's the deal. If you tell me everything you know about Lord Frieza's death, I will let you go."

Sweating bullets, the scaly man gulped, "P-Promise."

"I swear on my honor as a Saiyan warrior that I will not harm you."
Considering this the best window he could possibly ask for after seeing the performance she'd put on just moments ago, the trembling Sorbet sucked in his pride and blurted out what he knew. "O-Okay! Okay, okay! Lord Frieza met his end over twelve years ago on the Planet Namek, along with his lieutenants Zarbon, Dodoria, and the entire Ginyu Force. That's what the officers of the planet we were stationed on at the time told us, and we went out in search of our master. By the time we were done sifting through the debris and hopping from planet to planet, we learned that his father and brother had died as well. We were heading to the outland areas of the northern quadrant looking for a way to revive our emperor, but we were captured by your bodyguard and brought here. Th-That's all I know. That's all I know. I swear!" His shouting ceased moments later when he tensed up and prepared for the worst.

But when no thrashing came, the short, elite warrior looked up to see the Saiyan female nod her head in understanding and, turning heel with an accentuated sashay of her hips, began walking back towards the terrace. The sight of her strolling away from him gripped and held Sorbet's attention, his face pale and frozen with fear.

"Okay. You can go."

The mercenary blinked in immediate surprise, "R-Really?"

There was a brief moment of pause, followed shortly by an answer. "I said that I would let you go, so I am." Sandra then stopped and waved over her shoulder flippantly. "Have a safe trip."

At first left entirely speechless, when he felt the energy suppressing cuffs keeping his hands tied behind him were removed by the black armored warrior, Sorbet soon realized she was being truthful. Taking his chance, the blue alien quickly leapt to his feet and, ignoring his grievous injuries, began scampering towards the nearest exit. Seeing as how there were archways everywhere, he had plenty to choose from.

His feet pattering along the ground, the elite under Frieza's banner dashed as fast as he could away from the group. A smile appeared on his sweat covered face as he neared closer and closer to the furthest balcony. Freedom was well and truly in sight.

However, just when he was only a few feet away, a loud bang filled the air followed instantly by Sorbet's head exploding like a water balloon. His body crashed to the ground a split second later, along with a splatter of blood.

All eyes in the area soon turned from the second headless body towards the terrace entrance, where they saw Maya standing there with a finger extended in the direction of the once retreating foe. Upon taking him out, she retracted her gloved hand and blew on her finger, almost as if she'd just fired a gun.

"I really do love a moving target," the brown haired woman exclaimed in a chipper tone.

Kure, regarding the now dead Sorbet for a couple of moments, then looked over at the Saiyan with a slightly disappointed look. "Why did you do that? Sandra said he could go free."

"Yes. Sandra said he could. That doesn't mean that I said he could," Maya replied, crossing her arms again before turning to watch her leader and friend stroll past, a smile visible on her face as well. "Besides. The man had it coming. Those two scumbags have killed more men and women then you can even begin to count, so there was no way I was going to let someone like that leave here with their life."

Her answer had the cat girl shrug in understanding, "Hm. Fair enough." She then deactivated her holographic scouter and removed the bud from her ear.

The sight of the clearly amused, luscious Saiyan female in the towel had the one standing by the post chuckle in amusement, "That was fun. We should do that again sometime." She was obviously impressed by the show her leader had put on, as indicated by her waving tail.

"Yes. Too bad they didn't have any new information that could assist us in tracking down the ones who destroyed Frieza," the Saiyan Empress replied, a frown appearing on her face once again.

Maya gave a brief chortle at her friend's dejected mood, "You still have your heart set on finding those guys, huh?"

The raven haired warrior's fist clenched tightly as she glared across the garden outside her throne room. "A Saiyan of unknown origins and status fought and bested Frieza in combat. On top of that, it was a Super Saiyan outside of our group that performed the deed." Sandra then narrowed her eyes dangerously as she set her sights on the distant stars surrounding the nebula. "The opportunity to kill Frieza was a desire held by many in the universe, myself included. He was a monster that didn't deserve the mercy of a swift death. I don't care how long it takes me or how many of that lizard's subordinates I have to go through. I will find the Super Saiyan responsible for destroying him and make them pay for taking that right away from me." With that said the raven haired girl breathed a sigh of exhaustion and sauntered on, proceeding down the steps through the arch and carelessly removing the towel wrapped around her. Allowing it to drop to the floor, the naked warrior stepped through the waterfall and towards the steaming hot pool in the middle of the garden. "I'm going to take a dip in the springs. Do me a favor and take out the trash, would you Gast?"

The Namekian bowed, "Of course, your highness." He then turned away from the terrace entryway and proceeded to gather up the bodies.

After watching the curvaceous young female Saiyan submerge herself in the hot water, Kure scratched the back of her head and sighed, before then sparing a glance towards the still silent Cal. When she saw the masked, armored warrior turn towards her, the woman shrugged.

"That's one way of interrogating someone," the towering guard finally spoke in a low voice, earning a grin from his cat-eared companion.

If nothing else, blowing up that empty galaxy was a nice touch.

(TM BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: Well, that was a whole bunch of fun. Zeru's dead, Goten's learned how to control his Super Saiyan transformation, and then you have some more development in Gohan and Videl's relationship. I wonder who will ask who out on a date first?

And then you have some foreshadowing into a group that will be showing up a little bit later in the story. There's a group living on a planet in a system that is under their jurisdiction, and they're calling themselves the New Saiyan Empire, despite the fact there are only two of them. And the one that's spearheading this group is a really powerful Saiyan. They have a back story that will be explained later onwards when their arc comes around, so until then you can imagine how they got there.

The two that were mentioned, Sandra and Maya, can be seen on the title cover of this story. I think they look pretty cool. And they present another problem the Z-fighters will have to contend with sometime in the future. Don't worry. There are a couple more arcs before they arrive, so the Z-fighters have plenty of time to get stronger before their arrival.

Oh yeah, and those two prisoners, Tagoma and Sorbet, they supposedly appear in the upcoming Dragonball Z: F movie to bring back Frieza stronger than ever. Well, I just have one thing to say to that. (Sticks up middle finger) There you go.

Anyway, now that Zeru is out of the way, it's time to move on to the next arc. Expect more Gohan/Videl romance in the next chapter.

And just to keep up to date:

Power Levels:

Old Scouter Power levels:

- Frieza (100 Percent Full Power): 120,000,000

  xxx

- Sandra (Suppressed): 10

- Sandra (50 Percent Base): 120,000,000

- Sandra (Full Power Base): 240,000,000

- Sandra (Super Saiyan): 12,000,000,000

- Sandra (Super Saiyan 2): 24,000,000,000

- Sandra (Super Saiyan 3): 120,000,000,000

(Right, I know, it's kind of screwy. The V-jump and daizenshuu releases gives you a whole bunch of power levels, which then becomes very vague after the Namek Saga. You look on the official website and the list just stops after the Namek Saga, so everything is just speculation after that. Apparently everyone has their own lists and multipliers that they go by, so it doesn't matter how accurate they are as long as they give it to you straight. You've got the old scouter power levels used by Frieza's Empire that calculate power levels through the imperial system and then you have the riki system developed by Seirei and used by the core galaxies. It's sort of like the metric system in a way.)

  xxx

Riki Power Levels:

Strongest Z-Fighters:

- Piccolo (Full Power) – 200,000,000 riki

  xxx

- Paprika – 24,000,000 riki

- Paprika (Super Makyan) – 240,000,000 riki
Vegeta – 25,000,000 riki
Vegeta (Super Saiyan) – 250,000,000 riki
Vegeta (Super Saiyan 2) – 450,000,000 riki

Zangya – 25,000,000 riki
Zangya (Full Power) – 250,000,000 riki
Zangya (Super Hera) – 450,000,000 riki

Gohan – 26,000,000 riki
Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 260,000,000 riki
Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 460,000,000 riki

New Saiyan Empire:

Gast (Super Namekian) – 200,000,000 riki

Kure (Kio-Jin Race) – 470,000,000 riki

Cal (Sura Race) – 470,000,000 riki

Maya – 28,000,000 riki
Maya (Super Saiyan) – 280,000,000 riki
Maya (Super Saiyan 2) – 480,000,000 riki

Sandra – 30,000,000 riki
Sandra (Super Saiyan) – 300,000,000 riki
Sandra (Super Saiyan 2) – 500,000,000 riki
Sandra (Super Saiyan 3) – 1,500,000,000 riki
Otherworld:

Pikkon (w/weighted clothing) – 25,000,000 riki

Pikkon (Full Power) – 250,000,000 riki

xxx

Goku – 25,500,000 riki

Goku (Super Saiyan) – 255,000,000 riki

Goku (Super Saiyan 2) – 455,000,000 riki

xxx

Zeru – 800,000,000 riki
God of Storms Arc - God of Storms

Dragonball Z

Legacies

God of Storms

Deep in the recesses of space, billions of light years away from a system containing any life whatsoever, a collection of galaxies, quasars and solar systems had become a stage for the greatest battle the universe had ever seen. Explosions the size of supernovas going off one after the other throughout the vacuum like a gratuitous fireworks display, these enormous blasts marked the path of two otherworldly warriors as they battled across the celestial plains. Even after hours of constant fighting, these superhuman figures hadn't even begun to let up, and continued battering each other with power capable of dispelling entire suns.

The two fighters taking the forms of blue and golden streaks of light respectively, the pair danced across the emptiness of space, engaged in a vicious exchange of blows. Shockwaves and blasts ringing out as they collided with one another over and over, the two of them then flew away from each other before rocketing back towards a single point, corkscrewing across the solar system before slamming into one another with terrifying force.

Their impact causing a nearby terrestrial planet to shatter into rubble, the glowing blue figure slipped away from the golden warrior for distance. Taking aim at them and powering up for only a couple of seconds, the shadowy entity enveloped in blue raised their hand and unleashed a barrage of countless energy spheres from their hand, which left their palm in a spray and threatened to knock the other fighter out of the sky. When the golden entity managed to avoid them, the barrage ended up impacting a nebula in the backward, causing several colossal hyper novas that wiped out the cloud of gas.

After missing, the blue figure shot off to another solar system, arcing over an asteroid belt and turning around. As soon as they did, the golden figure flew right at them and engaged, several more shockwaves ringing out as they traded lethal blows. Their dance continued as they traveled towards another star, where they ended up attacking one another with reckless abandon. Upon which they then locked into a grappling match and continued to ascend.

While the blue fighter remained encased in a shadowy black cloud inside their aura, their red eyes piercing through the darkness of their veil, the golden figure revealed themselves to be a humanoid male with long black hair tied into a long ponytail in a white trench coat, wearing samurai battle armored, a headband, and wielding a long, silver spear with golden embellishments. When the raven haired male jammed the staff under the black figure’s chin, he growled, held him firm, and glared over the creature's shoulder in desperation.

"BEERUS! NOW!"

As soon as he screamed, a glowing purple bolt suddenly shot out from behind a gaseous giant and rocketed towards the black entity's blind spot. Taking the form of a purple, anthropomorphic cat with large yellow eyes and adorned in Egyptian garb, the noticeably battered and bleeding warrior let out a yell as he charged an orange sphere of energy in his palm and prepared to ram it into the pinned enemy's spine.

However, just as the white-robed fighter was holding the black figure at bay, the demon's eyes flashed a bright red and narrowed upon his opponent. The spear wielder recoiling in shock, the samurai God suddenly received a face full of fire when two golden blasts were fired from the creature's eyes and drilled into his body like a blow torch. A split second later, an explosion took place that sent the robed warrior hurrying across the cosmos, allowing the black figure to spin around and lock horns with the approaching Beerus.

Pitching the energy sphere at the dark fighter, the humanoid cat God attempted to shoot him out of the sky, only for the evil deity to dodge it before charging back at him. In a flash of light, the two streaked past each other with a glancing blow, a shockwave reverberating across the solar system before they began to duke it out at close range. The purple and blue streaks of light intersected one another along the same path, circling and attempting to shoot the other out of the air. However, while Beerus definitely put up one hell of a fight, his opponent was far faster and stronger than he was.

When the humanoid cat attempted to kick at the black shadow that was his foe, the creature evaded and countered with a punch across the eager warrior's face, sending him into a spin.

As soon as the entity kicked the purple-skinned fighter away, it raised both hands towards him and opened fire with a ruthless barrage of golden energy blasts. The attacks ripped through the vacuum towards Beerus at blinding speed, forcing the man to evade as best as he could. Arcing across the sky in a furious lap, the salvo of energy attacks shot past the humanoid cat and ended up decimating an entire spiral galaxy behind him. The individual ki blasts struck the cluster of infinite stars and planets, blowing them up and wiping the entire stellar system from existence, leaving behind nothing but fire and dust.

After watching another galaxy get taken out, the frustrated and exhausted Beerus shouted across the vacuum, "Enyo! Take him out!"

Kneeling on the northernmost pole of a nearby terrestrial planet, an Elven woman dressed in Roman battle armor and armed with a long bow, drew back on the string and began gathering energy. Absorbing an entire nebula floating billions of miles away and compressing it into a single arrow, the Goddess took aim with it and shouted, "Eat this! Sagitta! " With a yell, she let loose her energy projectile and fired it straight up at the shadowy entity, intending to impale and disintegrate it with a single shot.

However, just when the energy lance was about to strike its target, the red-eyed shadow enveloped in blue ki evaded the blast and spun around to face his new attacker. The shot meanwhile, ended up striking a distant lenticular galaxy, and wiped it from existence in a hyper nova larger than any in history.

As soon as the demon turned its back on him, Beerus used that chance to attack it. The man rushed in with his fist drawn back and energy flaring off of his body, a loud battle cry escaping his lips. But the moment he swung in, the evil deity dodged and ended up kicking him in the back of the head, sending him plummeting towards the planet Enyo was still stationed on.

The goddess with the bow gasped when she saw her companion plummet through the atmosphere at an insane speed before crashing into her, knocking the two of them tumbling across the surface of the planet. When they stopped rolling several seconds later, the shadow demon used that chance to swoop in and, bringing their hands back, threw them forward and unleashed a gargantuan energy blast their way.

The attack barreled towards the planet like a comet, growing larger and larger till it was the size of the sun itself. When the stunned Beerus and Enyo looked up and saw the wall of golden energy approaching them, both gasped in horror and raised their arms in an attempt to block it. That was until the white warrior in the samurai armor dropped down in front of them and threw his hands up in defense.

"Shinra Tensei!" the human deity bellowed, an invisible, repulsive force exploding from his body and slamming headlong into the approaching blast, stopping it dead in its tracks. The two attacks ripped into each other in an attempt to overpower the opponent's, until the man countering the black entity's galaxy crushing move gave his one last push and deflected the energy blast right back at its user.

The shadow deity slipped around, avoiding the deflected blast as it rocketed into the distance and destroyed a nearby gaseous giant, eliciting a growl from the villain.

Realizing that they were still alive, when Beerus and Enyo looked up, both of them breathed a sigh of relief when they saw their battered comrade had come to their aid. From the front he looked okay. But on the other side where he'd taken the most hits, the man looked as though he'd been pressed face first into a barbeque.

"Thanks, Izanagi," the Elven archer exclaimed.

The cat God nodded in agreement, "We owe you one, brother."

The white warrior grinned over his shoulder painfully and brought his spear around, spinning it all cool-style before taking a fighting stance. "This isn't over yet! Stay on guard!"

A surge of energy eventually drew the trio's attention back up towards the sky. It was there they saw the demon rear its hand back and prepare to hurl another blast down at them. But just when it was just seconds away from attacking again, a second blast struck it from behind and exploded against its back, pulling its gaze around and towards a second Roman woman warrior with an eagle crown and golden, highly decorated battle armor and a cape.

The battle-scarred woman gritted her teeth and brought her hands forward, cupping them in front and taking aim at her powerful adversary. "I'm still in this fight, you bastard! Don't ignore me!"

Snarling, the black figure then lunged towards the warrior with blazing speed, colliding with the woman fist first and forcing her back through the vacuum. From there, the pair engaged in a heated grappling match, the newcomer yelling out as she attempted to fight back against the overwhelming force of her opponent. But just when it looked like she was about to successfully fend the creature off and gain the upper hand, she suddenly received a knee to the face shortly before the villain then slammed a double kick into her stomach. The low blow was the one that sent her packing.

Just as the evil God threw its hand forward to blast the winded Artemis, a second energy attack from behind struck him in the shoulder and sent the dark phantom into a spin, prompting him to turn and face another opponent charging in from a blind spot.

Enveloped in a golden lightning bolt and shining like the sun itself, an old man with a white beard, an eye patch, and adorned in silver plated armor, a flowing red cape, a golden crown, and armed with a golden battle axe, charged at the evil entity with a bellow of rage. As soon as he flew within reach, he swung in, "Don't even think about it!" The human deity struck, but just when it seemed like he would hit, the demon slipped around him and avoided the attack... barely.

The instant it dodged, the Roman woman circled around from behind and attempted to deal a concussive blow to their opponent's neck. But the instant she did, her target leapt over her and kicked her in the skull, sending the God staggering forward. When Artemis spun around to face them, the warrior was suddenly bombarded by multiple, debilitating blows as the demon assaulted her swiftly. The deity yelped and grunted as each lightning fast blow crashed across her face and body, sending blood flying and knocking the woman senseless.

After dealing the tough deity some serious damage, the evil God then grabbed the armored fighter by the throat and began to choke her. It had the brave fighter on the ropes. However, just as Artemis began attempting to wrestle her way out of the grip and the evil creature drew its free hand back for a decapitating strike, a flash of golden light followed by a screech stopped it and drew its gaze to the left.

"SEEEEEEEEET!"

In an instant, a golden, muscular man wearing an Egyptian shendyt and head covering with the head of a hawk, charged at the shadow and decked him in the face. A deafening thunderclap immediately followed and sent the dark demon hurtling into space, the bird-man hybrid giving a low growl as he watched it spiral into the distance.

"I won't let you harm any of our friends, Set! Even if you are one of us!" the battered falcon warrior shouted, before glancing over to his side in a panic. As soon as he did, he saw his teammates gather together, with Izanagi, Enyo, and Beerus quickly rejoining their formation. "We have to finish this!"

"Alright! Give it one more try!" the one-eyed Odin shouted, spinning his axe in his grip and bringing it around into a position of battle readiness.

Halting itself in midflight, the shadow deity now identified as Set recovered from the crushing blow to the side of the head and glared daggers across at its foes. Upon seeing them rally and prepare themselves for a second engagement, the demon God quickly leapt further back and, crossing its arms over its chest, threw them forward and unleashed a rain of billions of energy blasts upon the group. The golden spheres of light honed in on the group of deities, picking up speed with the intent of tearing them to shreds.

The attacks scattered, obliterated and ripped apart two galaxies, and wiped out an entire nebula in one shot. Even though this was only a standard energy barrage, the effects it had upon its targets was phenomenal. Thankfully most of the group managed to evade it. But the hawk-faced God got clipped by the assault and was knocked spinning towards a nearby sun.

Successful in its endeavor to separate his opponents, the shadow demon threw his its hand forward and fired a fully charged energy blast towards the wounded bird-man hybrid. The attack shot towards him like a spear and was set to end him once and for all.

"No! Ra!" a startled Enyo shouted, powering up and rocketing towards her injured comrade. Flying towards her injured comrade as fast as she could, the Goddess of War managed to intercept her friend and push him out of the way. The pair avoided the attack with only a millisecond to spare, watching as the blast wiped out the sun and shot off into the horizon, where it wiped out an entire solar system. The shockwave caused by the explosion knocked the two warriors spinning into the emptiness of space, before the wounded Ra steadied their flight and glared towards their foe.

Blood trickling down his face, the wounded bird God shouted, "Set's picking us apart! Move in from all sides and attack him at the same time!" With a grunt of effort, the warrior thrust two fingers forward and fired a golden beam at their opponent.

In the blink of an eye, the small sphere of energy slammed into the evil God's chest and knocked him spiraling through the vacuum. When he eventually stopped, the shadow deity snarled like a dog and, turning on the spot, threw their right hand forward and unleashed a cloud of black, sand-like smoke towards the King of the Gods that’d hit him.

Responding in alarm, the hawk-faced warlord took Enyo and rocketed upwards, avoiding the hand of dark smoke. When more tendrils of cloud gave pursuit, the God and Goddess began a terrifying evasion game; dodging Set's long range attacks as he hurled them after the pair one after the other. The spears were far reaching, they were continuous, and they were long range, making it difficult to slip.

Ducking under a slash from one of the enormous cloud tendrils, Ra and Enyo arced around and, side by side, rushed the shadowy entity. After avoiding two streams of the black cloud, the war Goddess then sprang over one of the tendrils and, drawing back on her bow, fired a powerful light arrow at the evil God.

The attack slammed into the side of Set’s head, ricocheting off of it and flying towards a distant sun, wiping it out of existence in the for of a massive super nova. Growling angrily at the glancing blow, the dark deity began thrusting his hands out one after the other, sending more clouds of black smoke towards them in retaliation. The spears of dark dust attempted to knock the pair out of the sky and impale them, but both Ra and Enyo swiftly evaded them or smacked them out of the way.

The golden bird warrior kicked and sliced two smoke streams out of the way, sending their particles scattering. After swinging around another, he then threw his hand up and sliced down at a third attack, cutting the blast of smoke in half. Once the threat was dispersed he wasted no time in closing the distance on his target. Set prepared for the man's attack by throwing another two blasts of smoke towards the God, only for Enyo to suddenly leap into his field of vision and hurl another arrow their way. The shadow deity smacked the projectile out of the way, only for Ra to suddenly come in from above and drive a golden sphere of energy into him from above.

The dark entity intercepted the blast with a punch, slamming it into the ball and causing it to detonate prematurely. The explosion from the charged attack was so massive, it not only cleared Ra and Enyo from the area and sent them spinning off into space, it generated a miniature super nova that disintegrated a nearby moon, leaving clouds of sand, debris and dust in the blast's wake.

With smoke and gas choking up the vacuum around the shadowy warrior, blocking out his view of the ravaged planets and galaxies surrounding him, the creature snarled in frustration. But while he was in the process of scanning the area around him, a flash of light from its blind spot alerted it to danger and forced its gaze upwards. There, through the glare of a distant quasar, it saw the glowing, purple form of the God of Destruction descending towards him at an insane speed.

Covered in cuts and burns, with his right eye clenched shut from all the blood trickling down his face, the humanoid cat deity yelled out as he cocked back his right hand and formed a concentrated orange sphere of ki.

"YOU WON'T GET AWAY THIS TIME!" Beerus roared, his path marked by the sound of an approaching jet.

A split second later the deity came within range and, when the shadowy figure countered, the pair’s attacks collided with catastrophic force.

The resulting shockwave from the two blasts slamming into one another was biblical, causing a hyper nova sized explosion that disintegrated every single star and planet in range. All of the other deities in the area swiftly avoided the blast as it rippled out in a ring of fire and smoke.
Then, just as the shockwave disintegrated several moons on the edge of the solar system, the entire world went black…

XXX

(Present)

Leaping from his pillow with a gasp of shock, Beerus, who'd previously been enjoying a deep, relaxing sleep, sat up from his bed with a terrified look in his eyes and cold sweat pouring down his face. Body trembling from head to toe and breathing coming in raspy inhalles and exhales, the Destroyer's eyes glanced around the enormous chamber that was his bedroom situated in the center of his Otherworldly palace. At first groggy and unable to make out any explicit details, after several moments of adjusting to the light, the haze in his eyes soon cleared and the man slowly drifted back into reality.

Recognizing the windows, the high-reaching ceiling, and the enormous hour glasses hovering around in the zero-gravity environment, the warrior saw that he was not floating in the cold vacuum of space or bleeding out from a crippling shot to the stomach. This was his place, his home, his dimension, and from the looks of it, there weren't any galaxies or suns blowing up around him… at least not without his consent.

Blinking a few times and quelling the tense feeling in his gut, the nervous God of Destruction then breathed a heavy sigh of relief and shook his head. "Dream… it was just a dream." Licking the back of his pawed hand and rubbing it against his head like any ordinary cat would, the man leisurely settled his nerves and gave his room one last, thoughtful look-over.

After sitting there in his sleeping robes for several seconds and coming to terms with the realization that all he was having was a really bad flashback, the humanoid cat relaxed, cleaned his face one last time, and gently crashed back into his pillows. As soon as he collapsed, the overseer of destruction was once again snoring away peacefully, as if the whole scenario had never taken place.

Unbeknownst to him however, his assistant, trainer and dutiful caretaker of unimportant affairs had been watching him quietly from the stairs. Standing there in robes fit for a royal and carrying a large staff at his side, the blue-skinned, white-haired, effeminate looking male known by many as Whis, crinkled his nose in discomfort before turning away. As he started back the way he came, the man closed his eyes and breathed out heavily, making his concerns known.

"Nightmares again," Whis thought, shaking head. "Truly… that is one conflict we will not soon forget."

That battle between the Gods of the Seventh Universe and the evil overlord Set had been one of the greatest calamities their group had ever faced. Hell, out of all the villains they'd had to face in their line of work, not only did this one cause them a great deal of grief and had come close to killing all of them at one point or another…

This particular threat had come from within their ranks.

Thank goodness that it'd been dealt with and would no longer be a problem… for now at least.

OOO

(A few days later)

(Back on Earth)
"Let's see... if I'm washing cotton whites then I should set it to... sixty... right?" Zangya murmured, checking the instruction booklet before looking back up at the control panel in front of her. After several glances between the pages and the device she was currently trying to operate, the orange haired woman wearing the kimono frowned deeply and fixed a death glare on the complicated piece of equipment, "Okay. What aspect of the machine do I set to sixty?"

It'd been well over a month after the whole Zeru incident and life on planet earth couldn't have been more peaceful. Thanks to the wishes granted by the dragon, not only had the Z-fighters been able to mop up all of the spills caused by the alien's unexpected arrival, but they'd also made living on this beautiful ball of blue and green a thousand times better. If one were to actually calculate the amount of human conflicts and natural disasters that'd taken place since the extra terrestrial's attack, you would find a very empty spreadsheet staring back at you. This was probably due to earth's many nations coming together in the name of protecting their planet from a newly identified common enemy...

Aliens from outer space!

If anymore unfriendly extra terrestrials were planning on visiting their home to cause the kind of destruction their most recent visitor had done, the governing bodies knew that they had to be as ready as they could be to combat the threat.

While a hearty congratulations had been given to the branches of the military that'd stepped up to fight off the beast, a special thanks was later handed to the mysterious group of super-powered warriors that'd been sighted that day. For what seemed like the third or fourth time in over two decades, the leaders of the planet, King Koku especially, had openly expressed their thanks and gratitude to the unknown heroes who'd stepped up and defended the planet from a creature far more powerful than the greatest weapons their forces could possibly muster.

Even the world champion Hercule Satan had told the press who'd visited his house that same day how grateful he and the entire planet was for the Z-fighters' actions. Though he did approach the news crews with his usual flare for the dramatic, the man had the good conscience to withhold the identities of the group's members and deny any claims of his association.

After all, not only did he know it was in the Z-warriors' best interests to keep a low profile for the time being, he also knew his daughter and her best friend had been involved. Considering how often their family was already badgered by the press, Hercule didn't want to place any further stress upon his little angel by saying she was one of the fighters that'd been there that day.

Heck, the only real names to come out of that incident were hers and Tien Shinhan's names, but even the navy and air force had suspiciously gone quiet about it. Perhaps a little bit of convincing from a certain 'World Champ' had helped out with that.

All of the excitement from the event eventually subsided soon afterwards and, once all the necessary praise and thanks had been given out, the people returned to their lives and the world kept right on turning. This inevitably led to a lot of the Z-fighters kicking back and taking it easy, with the only exceptions being Gohan, Vegeta and Zangya. However, this didn't mean the three of them weren't able to experience some instances of normalcy in their day to day activities.

Like today for example.

Inside the Son household, Zangya was currently occupying her day off practicing her basic housekeeping skills. On the surface it was a great stress reliever and allowed her to contribute around the house in Chi-Chi's absence, the mother having gone out to do some shopping that morning. This left her in charge of vacuuming, cleaning the dishes, and doing the laundry.
In retrospect, doing the laundry wasn't that big of an ask. However, it should also be noted that on one of her most recent trips to West City, Chi-Chi had bought a state of the art super washer. A new product from Capsule Corp, it was designed for those really specific washing tasks and was even capable of dry cleaning your clothing, if you can believe it or not.

The only downside to this, as Zangya was finding out right now, was that operating the damn thing was hideously complicated.

"Seriously? Whatever happened to; insert powder, set to spin-dry, and let it rip?" the Hera asked to herself as she tapped her finger impatiently against the booklet she was reading.

She'd already spent the last half-an-hour standing in front of this Godforsaken household appliance and she was getting tired. With most of her shirts and unmentionables shoved into the thing, leaving her standing there in a purple kimono, Zangya was all set to move onto the next phase. But while loading the machine had been a real pleasure, it was getting it going that was driving her nuts.

"Damn it. I'm not book smart and I hate these unnecessarily complex electronics," the Hera grumbled, craning her head to look for the 'on' switch. "How in the world do other earthlings cope operating these damn things?"

While she was busy mumbling and groaning to herself, the woman completely missed the sight of Gohan walking past the open door directly behind her. It was only a couple seconds later the teen backpedaled and peered into the room to see what was going on.

Seeing the Hera just standing there with her nose in a booklet and noises coming out of her mouth prompted the demi-Saiyan to raise an eyebrow. "What are you doing?" Gohan asked, taking note of the fact that her shoulders were trembling with frustration.

Jumping slightly at the voice, Zangya turned to see her spiky haired training partner looking in on her. "Oh. Hey. Nothing, I'm just trying to get this stupid machine to work." She then raised an eyebrow in his direction. "Shouldn't you be studying for your high school entrance exam tomorrow?"

The boy simply gave her question a dismissive wave and walked in with his hands in his pockets, "Ah, I finished my work over an hour ago. I've just been procrastinating the entire time." He then coasted to a stop behind her and looked over her shoulder at the appliance that was giving her so much grief. "I was going to clean up the kitchen before mum got back and hit the gravity room for a couple of sessions, but it looks like you've got some problems of your own right now."

"Tell me about it. Your mum is a real whiz when it comes to picking out stuff that literally requires you to have some sort of engineering degree to understand," Zangya remarked, obviously taking a shot at Gohan's ludicrous homework before glancing across at him once again. "I had no problems working the last washing machine we had. But all of a sudden this thing comes along and I'm giving myself an aneurism trying to get it running."

Gohan tilted his head curiously, "Couldn't you just wash the stuff in the river? I figure if you're having so much trouble…"

This had Zangya give him a slightly deadpanned look, "Washing it in the river's a little bit…" She wanted to say old-fashioned. However, considering the circumstances that wasn't such a bad idea.

"Anyway, according to the instructions, to turn the machine 'on', you have to press… this button." She then reached forward and pressed it.
The moment she did so the entire display screen lit up with all sorts of readings and graphs, causing the two users to balk in surprise. With a loud hum, the machine's engines also activated, letting the pair know it was ready to rock.

However, after seeing the display screen light up, the duo immediately started having second thoughts.

Breaking out into a nervous sweat, Zangya grinned up at the demi-Saiyan, "Hand washing it is then. I call dibs on the tub."

Murmuring uneasily, Gohan slowly formed a fist and held it up encouragingly, "Let's keep trying. I'm sure we can do it. Mum was really happy when she finally got this thing installed and, let's be honest, we're gonna have to learn how to use this machine sooner or later."

"Hmm. Good point," the Hera replied, once again directing her attention to the infernal contraption. "Alright. Let's give it a shot."

And so the pair got to work. Working in tandem, both Gohan and Zangya followed the instructions detailed in the manual from step one to step zeta, and dialed in the specifications. Calculating the power to weight ratio, strangely enough, and setting it to the amount of spin that they wanted, they eventually got the washing machine running. In a matter of minutes, the room was filled with the gentle hum of Capsule Corp's latest creation massaging the Hera's clothing of all its stains and imperfections.

The two strongest warriors on the face of the planet remained in front of the appliance, wearing proud smiles on their faces and enjoying the sight of the clothing spinning through the fiberglass side door.

"I can't believe how quiet it is," Gohan exclaimed cheerfully.

A relieved sigh escaped the accompanying woman's lips, "Thank Kami. And here I thought I was going to be stuck here forever." At least now she could rest easy knowing that her undergarments were being well looked after. This remained the only prevailing thought in her mind as her training partner proceeded to read the rest of the manual he was now holding.

While scanning the paragraphs one after the other, the demi-Saiyan then balked a little when he landed on a particular section. Glancing up at the machine and then back down at the booklet a couple of times, he then looked across at his friend and smiled. "Uh, Zangya."

"Yeah?"

"You said you're washing your whites now, right?"

"And my underwear. Why?"

"Well… this part of the instruction book says you should make sure to separate whites from colored items that may bleed," Gohan informed, making sure to point out the passage with his finger. "I'm guessing since the machine is so powerful it can effect even the most durable of materials."

"No duh. How else are you going to get wine and sauce stains out of your sheets? The stuff is so strong it literally takes an entire packet of dapax to get out." Narrowing her eyes, Zangya quickly looked across at her friend, "Why?"

The young warrior then pointed towards the washing machine door, "I think some red managed to get by you." When all eyes turned to the door, they saw a pair of brightly colored underwear and a bra slapping against the glass as the batch of material spun round and round at high speed.

Freaking out at the sight of the brightly colored items, the orange haired woman dashed forward and began randomly pressing buttons on the control panel. "Cancel! Please, cancel! Damn it!" When she heard the machine start to make a loud clunking sound after jabbing at a couple of keys, the girl began breaking out into a cold sweat. "How are you supposed to stop this thing?!!" Quickly growing desperate, the Hera then clenched her fists and slammed them against the top of the appliance in frustration.

This seemed to have the exact opposite effect to what she was inevitably hoping for. The instant her fists buried into the surface of the machine, the household item sputtered before beginning to rumble and shudder violently. Backing away under the shaking of the pure white apparatus, Zangya then gave a startled cry when the front end suddenly exploded and a blast of water washed over her.

Seeing his housemate literally get swamped by the miniature tidal wave, the demi-Saiyan waited for the water to stop running before raising an eyebrow down at the crumpled female, who was now sitting in a puddle of foamy hot water. Just when he was about to say something clever, the boy then recoiled when he noticed that not only was she completely soaked to the bone, but her kimono had come undone and was clinging to her in the most provocative way imaginable.

Blushing to the roots of his hair, the half-Saiyan tugged on the collar of his white shirt and quickly averted his gaze, "I… see you're one of those people who likes to go commando, huh?"

Dripping wet with her kimono hugging her curvaceous figure, the orange haired fighter sniffled before she started to cry. "That's how you wear this type of kimono!" She then dropped her face into her hands and began weeping freely.

From the way she was kneeling there with her kimono open and exposing a lot of her front, she looked absolutely pathetic in a very moe kind of way. It was hilarious.

Unable to see a friend so defeated and upset, Gohan quickly fetched a towel and wrapped it around Zangya's body, rubbing her shoulder while keeping his gaze fixed squarely above her neck. While she bawled away and sobbed into her palms, the spiky haired warrior smiled, hugged her tightly, and began rocking her back and forth in a comforting manner. "It's okay. This stuff happens to everyone."

Now that the machine had been forcibly and temporarily knocked out of commission, they now had a new chore to do before Chi-Chi got home, and that was to mop up the pool of water that'd formed from opening the door prematurely.

They were sure to get right on it… just as soon as Zangya stopped crying…

OOO

(The very next day)

It was just a regular morning up at Orange Star High school and, as expected of the institute at this time, the grounds were completely deserted. However, this didn't mean that the main building sitting in the center of the campus was empty, as there were currently hundreds of students gathered inside the structure. From the top floor to the ground floor, you could find dozens of young adults attending classes, sitting in rows upon rows of desks and listening attentively to their teachers… or were at the very least trying to. Since a lot of the teachers had the tendency to drone on, it really made first period feel like a bit of a drag. But while the professors carried on with their duties to deliver sound education to their students, this gave one particular visitor to the establishment the perfect opportunity to proceed with completing his own work. Confined to an empty classroom on the ground floor, not too far from the administration area, Son Gohan was currently undergoing his high school entrance exam. Seated in a table at the front row, with a single teacher at the desk a few feet away from him, the spiky haired warrior dressed in a fitted black singlet, grey pants, and yellow Capsule Corp. boots and jacket, blew through the pages of his test one at a time. Being sure to check the clock to make a mental record of his progress, the teenager proceeded with answering the questions with a smile on his face and a song in his heart. His humming filled the previously quiet room with a pleasant tune, drawing a strange gaze from the middle-aged man with the square glasses behind the table. In all his years of working at this facility, the teacher had never seen a student so happy to be going through an exam; especially one that determined his entry into the school itself. But considering he was from the country, the man reasoned that this was merely a habit he'd developed in his years of studying and let his gentle singing in the background slide. About half an hour into what was supposed to be a two hour exam, in which all Gohan had with him was a pencil, a sharpener, an eraser, and the papers in front of him, the demi-Saiyan then finished up by quickly double-checking his work and closing up the book. After collecting his gear, he then stood up, approached the time keeper, and set the documents down in front of him. The teacher was notably surprised when the young man plopped the test right in front of him, "Done already, Mr. Son?"
"Yes, sir," the young Saiyan replied cheerily. The official in the tweed jacket shook his head as he took up the document from where it'd been placed. "Surely you couldn't have completed all of the questions. It's only been twenty eight minutes." He then proceeded to flick through the pages.
"Really? Huh. I can normally get through something like that in a solid twenty. Must be having an off day today," Gohan chirped before shrugging. "Oh well. I've completed the exam. May I be excused, sir?" He then tilted his head towards the staff member as the arbitrator flipped open one of the text books alongside him and began comparing answers. The question immediately caught the man's attention. "Y-Yes. Yes, of course," the teacher answered, straightening up in his seat and gently waving the boy towards the door. "You're done here, Mr. Son. Thank you for coming in today."
Gohan bowed politely and slowly made his way towards the door, "It's been a pleasure." With one last wave, he then slid open the sliding entrance and made his way down the corridor, leaving the high school teacher alone to skim over his test. His footsteps echoing throughout the naturally well lit hallways of the school, the raven haired half-Saiyan followed the line of lockers and doors down to the administration area. Upon reaching it, a quick turn left and he was soon marching through the double-doors that were the entrance to the academy. As soon as he hit the steps, he quickly found himself confronted by the familiar face of his best friend and training partner of many years.
Adorned in her signature white and pink over-sized shirts and black bicycle shorts, with the Orange Star High school badge pinned to her hem, Videl stood waiting at the bottom of the staircase patiently. The moment she saw Gohan appear inside frame of the double doors, she smiled pleasantly in his direction. "So. How did it go?"

"Oh. I nailed it… easily," the demi-Saiyan exclaimed proudly, strolling down the steps with his hands in his pockets and a thousand megawatt smile in play. "Though I admit question eighteen involving that paragraph with the dog did catch me a little bit by surprise, the rest of the test was a cakewalk. Guess now all I have to do is sit back and wait for the results."

"Well, I'm sure that after they have a good look at your work, they'll see you've passed their test with flying colors," the raven haired crime fighter stated with a confident look in her eyes and her hands on her hips. "After seeing the stuff you could churn out in my visits, there's no way the school wouldn't accept you." If anything, they would definitely want Gohan within their ranks to help boost their school's posterity within the city and state.

His exam results would be a prestigious addition to their end of year scores and help gain more favor with the board.

"The only question I want answered is what class I'm going to end up in once the paperwork is finally put through," Gohan continued, glancing up at the building beside them and fixing his attention on the massive Orange Star logo hanging from its center. "There are so many home rooms on the registry it's hard to know where they're going to put me. Hopefully I'll be able to get a seat in your class and attend the same lessons you do."

His wishful words brought a warm smile to Videl's face, "Maybe I can help with that. I'll talk it over with the principal and see if I can get you moved into my home group. That way the staff won't have to fight over who gets to teach you for the rest of the year."

"You think you can do that?"

"Of course. I can just explain to him that you're new to the city and, since I'm the only person you know at this school, I'll be able to show you how things work around here and give you a guided tour of the academy," the raven haired teen said, reaching up and nudging him in the arm playfully. "I've earned a lot of credit with the staff and I'm on good terms with every teacher at this institute. The organization here trusts me more than any other student on campus."

"A member of the police force and regarded as one of the strongest fighters on this planet… who wouldn't trust you?" Gohan remarked, grinning down at his companion in his characteristic manner. "It doesn't take a Kai or a magical woman floating on a crystal ball to see that you're a free spirit with a pure heart."

Getting a little flustered and anxious from his string of compliments, Videl turned away to hide her face from her friend's intense gaze, at the same time finding a lot of interest in the concrete. "Now you're just exaggerating."

"Not in the slightest," the Saiyan responded instantly, giving the girl his most sincere look over. "We've been friends for over six years. After all the times we've spent together, I can say without a shadow of a doubt that you're one of the kindest and most honest people I've ever met."

Feeling her face getting hotter and hotter, with her heart hammering away at her chest, the raven haired crime fighter spun around and took a half-assed swing at the teen. When she saw Gohan dodge it and laugh, the girl scowled at him, "Idiot." She didn't mean it though. There was no way she could ever get angry at the half-Saiyan lug.
Unless he did something really, really, really irritating. An eventuality like that sounded like an impossibility. But hey, she was always open to surprises… and this hybrid warrior had been full of them so far.

Rubbing her arm bashfully, Videl then gestured towards the building and began climbing the steps one at a time, moving past her friend to return to the front office. "I'd… better be heading back to class." She then waved to the Z-fighter happily, "I'll see you this afternoon, okay… or maybe earlier depending on whether or not something urgent downtown comes up."

"Yeah. See you later, Videl," Gohan responded in kind, earning a warm smile from the girl before she jogged up the walkway and disappeared into the structure. After seeing her leave, the young warrior exhaled and, turning his gaze towards the metropolis behind him, strolled off of the school grounds and into the city streets.

It had been an exciting morning so far and he was hungry. According to his watch, it was time for a spot of brunch.

OOO

(The very next day)

It was another quiet noon up in the Mount Paozu region and, as expected of such a quaint and pristine setting, all was well with the earth. The peace and serenity of the environment allowed two particular individuals currently present in the area to fully enjoy the scenery around them and the opportunity to spend in one another's company. Sitting side by side at the edge of a lake, with fishing lines cast across the surface of the clear, still water, Gohan and Lime were having a great time chatting as well as trying to catch something that they could take home for dinner.

Unfortunately, after over an hour of sitting out there in the middle of the practically untouched wilderness, all Lime had been able to catch was a small trout. It was slim pickings for sure, but that didn't mean the pair were bored or anything like that.

In fact, they were rather enjoying themselves, lying out there on the grass with the gentle breeze licking at their hair.

"If you ask me, you don't seem like the kind of guy who's suited for big city life," the brown haired girl wearing the blue and white gingham top tied at the front to show off her midriff and tight, leather blue shorts exclaimed. "Looking at you right now, you're coming off as more of a country kid than anything else."

Adorned in his white, button up oriental shirt, dark pants and shoes, the demi-Saiyan let out an amused chuckle and glanced over at his friend with a grin. "What's giving me away? My boyish charm, my dashing smile, my reasonably affordable outfit…" He asked while grandly gesturing to himself.

Lime giggled at his run-through of the list and smiled fondly at him, "All of the above."

"You make it sound like it's a bad thing," the spiky haired boy said while leaning back on his hands in the short grass around them.

"No. Not at all. I'm just saying that maybe, in a large crowd, a guy like you would stick out like a sore thumb," the farm girl remarked while holding a hand his way. "I mean, think about it. Guys like Erasa and Touya grew up in the city, so they're more in tune with the current trends and fashions of the season. You and I however…" She then gestured down at her rather revealing ensemble of clothing and sighed, "We're pretty much one-trick-ponies when it comes to accessorizing."

Gohan nodded in agreement, "I'm not very fashion conscious myself. But hey… to each their own I guess." He spared the girl a kind smile as he then watched her play with one of her pig tails. "You don't need to worry so much about that stuff anyway. I think you look great in that outfit, Lime."

Looking across at the warrior in surprise, the teenager then noticed the boy's gaze fixed upon her and, after assessing her clothing for a moment, blushed brightly. "R-Really, Gohan?" She began brushing her hair over her ear in a very timid manner.

The demi-Saiyan nodded affirmatively, "Yeah. I've seen you in a lot of shirts and jeans before, but I think this combination suits you best." He pointed towards the ribbon ties in her hair. "The blue really brings out the color in your hair." It was all a matter of perspective. He simply recognized that Lime's outfit, as daring as it was, was a very trendy, comfortable ensemble that really highlighted his friend's appearance.

He made this comment based solely on his observations and intended it to be a compliment to his friend as a friend with no ulterior motives whatsoever; as expected of someone of his innocent disposition.

All the same, his follow-up prompted Lime to look away hastily. Obviously moved and flattered by his words, she began trying to suppress the giddy feeling welling up in her stomach and the flush of red that appeared in her cheeks.

She'd been Gohan's friend for going on seven years now and had built up a reputation for being a tough, strong girl with an immovable will. The last thing she wanted to do was show a moment of weakness to the guy she admired so much, especially one she'd developed feelings for.

"When you say sweet things like that… what's a girl to do…?" Lime whispered, her face practically glowing.

Unfortunately, thanks to his innocent country boy routine, she was finding that incredibly hard to do.

"Hm?" The hybrid fighter blinked as he craned his head towards his friend, "Did you say something?"

Quickly shaking her head and ridding herself of the redness in her cheeks, the brown haired girl beamed across at the boy quickly gave him an answer. "No, no. I'm just… mumbling stuff to myself… that's all." Brushing some stray hairs out of the way, she then threw the demi-Saiyan her full and undivided attention. "So… you'll be going to Orange Star High School as well, huh?"

Ever since she heard Gohan had been interested in attending an academy in the city, Lime immediately hitched herself up to his wagon and began making plans to register as well. For the past several years she'd been attending schools in the countryside around the Mount Paouzu region. After all that time seeing the same faces and the same people each and every day of her life, the girl had decided that she wanted a change of pace; to get herself out there and see the world beyond their borders.

When she ran this idea past her parents and grandfather, saying she wanted to attend the same high school that Gohan was going to, they accepted under the condition that she could organize her own accommodations. She later informed them that Erasa was more than happy to take her in as a roommate and once she'd gotten her application for the school done and had completed the examination process, she was all set to start her eleventh year in the first term.

Since she was a year below Gohan, this pretty much made him her upper classman

A quick nod was the teen's immediate response to her question. "Yep. I've only got one more year of studying left to do before I can graduate and after thinking about it I decided I want to do my final year at an actual school. Going to Satan City with Videl and everybody else to get my diploma will be a great way to end this stage of my life."

"Well… I suggest you prepare yourself for the spirit hazing days to come, Gohan," Lime informed, her eyes fixing squarely upon the young adult seated next to her. "I've heard that a lot of the senior students at high schools can be pretty harsh on us freshmen, so I think you should brace yourself for the hailstorm of paddles and spit balls to come flying your way."

Gohan chuckled, "Ah, that's just a nasty rumor blown up by television shows and high school drama flicks."

The brown haired girl giggled, "Don't say I didn't want you. When I move in with Erasa to finish my last two years, I'll be bringing everything I need to protect myself from the squall."

"I'll be sure to look out for you around the quad and oval then," the demi-Saiyan said, giving the girl an all-knowing look. "Maybe even the dojo if you're thinking about joining any clubs when you finally get settled in."

"Oh, I have a few ideas," Lime said, sharing a grin with her best friend from over the mountains before suddenly feeling a tug on her fishing line. Jerking in surprise, the brown haired teen quickly grabbed up the rod before it could be pulled from its placement and began drawing it in. "Hey! I've got one!" Cranking the handle, the girl immediately began to struggle against whatever ungodly force was pulling at the other end of the wire. "Holy… what the hell? It… feels like I'm… trying to… pull a truck out of the water!"

Gohan quickly leapt to his feet and rushed over to his friend. Getting behind her, he took the handle alongside her hands and helped her with the tug-of-war match. Considering how strong he actually was, he made certain to be extra careful as he helped her reel in her catch. "Don't worry, Lime. You got this. Remember. Don't fight it. Draw it in slowly."

For the next couple of minutes the farm girl and her Super Saiyan companion fought against the fish tugging against her line. Though she knew the boy anchoring her to the ground could easily pull whatever it was she'd hooked with a single tug, she also knew he was giving her a chance to do this herself. It was a sweet gesture and one that had her feeling lighthearted when she felt his powerful arms wrap around her, but most of her focus was set firmly upon the monster she was now battling.

It didn't take long till whatever it was that was fighting on the other end of the line decided to reveal itself to the duo. After a fierce struggle against its captors, there was a large splash in the center of the lake and, emerging from the spray of water, a tuna the size of a rhino leapt out and performed the most spectacular dive Lime had ever seen. The girl's eyes sparkled with awe as she watched the magikarp kick in the air before crashing back down into the lake.

"Whoa! It's huge!"

Both alarmed at seeing how big the fish was, about several seconds after it disappeared into the water, the line snapped. Lime ended up flying back into Gohan's arms when the tension gave way, an event that left her feeling stunned and winded. When the teen eventually came to, she looked over her shoulder to see the boy smiling down at her.

"Hey. You okay?" the spiky haired teen laughed.

Blinking, the farm girl blushed and looked away, "I-I'm alright."

Setting her gently to the ground so that she could recover, the demi-Saiyan stepped around and, upon inspecting the surface of the lagoon, quickly removed his shirt.

Lime's jaw dropped when she saw the raven haired hunk toss his shirt aside and stretch out his arms and shoulders. Her cheeks reddening as she shamelessly checked out his chest and torso, she then watched the hybrid fighter turn and give her a thumbs-up, allowing her a clear view of his chiseled front.

"Don't worry. I've got this." All set, Gohan then rushed forward and dove into the water, disappearing under the shimmering, clear surface.

For the next minute or so Lime waited for her friend to reappear with their enormous catch. There was a long moment of pause in which the entire area remained silent, without a single ripple or wave occurring on the surface of the lake. Then, just when she thought the young warrior wasn't going to be resurfacing anytime soon, there was a splash close to the bank followed by the tuna's head popping out of the lagoon. The fish writhed and flailed about for a couple of seconds, unable to comprehend what was going on, before the rest of it was hoisted out of the water by the person that'd caught it.

Wiping his face down with his hand, Gohan grinned up at the massive fish he had by the tail and allowed it to kick away uselessly. "Wow. You're a big one. I bet we can make a lot of sushi and fillets out of you." He then looked across at his friend sitting on the shoreline and waved, showing her the enormous bass she'd managed to snag.

Amazed at the demi-Saiyan's catch, a smile appeared across Lime's face, which she quickly followed up with a wave of her own.

Man. He was amazing. She couldn't remember the last time the hybrid hadn't surprised her with something like this. It was one of the reasons why she admired him so much. Hell, his looks were merely a bonus on top of everything else…

OOO

(A week later)

(Up in Space)

In some far corner of the Northern Quadrant, inside of a cluster of planets and moons, a familiar, oval-shaped vessel with orange lights flickering along its hull could be seen drifting through the vacuum on autopilot. Far out of reach and sight of any passing traffic, the ship had stationed itself in orbit of one of the large terrestrial planets in that sector, taking on the guise of a satellite as it recharged its batteries and scanned the system surrounding it. It was here, onboard this vessel inside the main sitting area for whatever crew was assigned to it, a familiar demi-Saiyan made his appearance.

Forming out of countless photons of golden light, the cheerfully smiling Son Gohan emerged from his teleportation in the usual manner. Dressed in his orange and blue gi, and carrying his usual Saiyan swagger upon his shoulders, the spiky haired hero of earth breathed a sigh of relief and looked around the rather ordinary looking lounge room he'd entered.
Taking note of the futuristic walls of the space craft's interior, as well as the equipment and furniture lying around the place, he then took a step forward, only for his foot to end up kicking an empty drinking can across the floor. The clatter of the aluminum canister echoed loudly throughout the hallways and had the hybrid fighter cringe at the volume. "Whoops. Better watch my step."

Looking around the quarter a second later when a door at the other end of the room opened up and a familiar, fiery haired girl around his age, wearing a grey tank top and underwear strolled in with a towel around her neck. Wiping her face down, the long haired, angelic traveler from another galaxy grinned when she quickly spotted her guest standing in the center of her lounge.

"Hello, Gohan. I was wondering when you were gonna come around," the humanoid alien exclaimed brightly.

The demi-Saiyan smiled at her appearance, "Hey, Kana. Had a nice shower?"

"Yeah. I just got through checking out a planet that was completely covered in two feet of water. I gotta say, that was one hell of a scavenger hunt," the glowing haired girl chirped before stopping in front of the teen with her hands on her hips. A grin slowly formed on her face when she inspected his state of dress, "Anyway, it's all over now. You got the stuff?"

Gohan chuckled and pulled a small, white Capsule with the number 'two' out of his gi belt, "Oh yeah. I got it." Clicking the device, he then tossed it across the floor and, after watching the tiny carrier bounce a couple of times, saw it explode in a cloud of blue smoke. When the smog eventually cleared, it revealed a refrigerator with a basket of snacks sitting on top of it.

Kana whistled at the sight of the 'magically' transported household appliance, "Wow. Some of your earth tech really surprises me sometimes."

"Pretty cool, huh?" The demi-Saiyan wasted no time in approaching the fridge and swinging it open, immediately pulling out a can and showing it off to his friend. "There's a great range of drinks in here. You can choose whichever one you want. I've got soda… beer… and Hetap."

"I'll take a beer," Kana exclaimed, her hand shooting up and catching the can that was tossed to her a second later. As soon as she had it, she cracked it open and allowed the foam to spill over her hand and dribble to the floor. "Ah. Nice. Now that's what I'm talking about."

Standing up with a can of Hetap and shutting the fridge door behind him, Gohan then gave his friend an amused look, "Don't you think it's a little too early to start drinking? It's only five o'clock back at my place and you're already hitting the silver bullets."

"Yeah. It's five o'clock on earth. But out here it's ten decca cycles according to the ship's clock and you know what that means? Game time," she then took a swig of the beverage and, after a few gulps of the cool liquid down her throat, removed it with a delighted exhale. "Whooot! This stuff is great!" She then pointed across at the half-Saiyan with a wicked look in her eyes. "So, Gohan-kun… are we ready to do this or what? You'd better be, because I've been waiting a month for this day and there's no way I'm letting you back out of this now."

The young warrior from earth nodded back firmly, "I'm ready whenever you are, Kana."
Both kids were riled up and ready to rock. Heck, the atmosphere was filled up with so much pent up excitement and adrenaline that it almost looked as though the two of them were going to start a fight right there inside the ship… or something else of a more conjugal nature. However, just when their little showdown was starting to heat up, the two of them then did something completely unexpected and, crashing on the nearby couch, switched on the massive hologram sitting against the wall. As soon as the screen shot up, it quickly flipped to the channel where the most unusual sport was being played.

Two teams of aliens from different planets were competing against each other inside a massive stadium in a game that was almost reminiscent of the sport lacrosse. But instead of it being on a flat field with nets on either side of the pitch, the two groups of aliens were competing on a multilayered battleground with various tracks and ramps leading up to different levels, and all of the players were wearing glowing, flexible armor and single-wheel roller blades. With them, they were zipping around the tracks at blinding speeds, pushing a silver ball around with their sticks and intercepting one another with ludicrous agility and precision.

As it turns out, Gohan's latest visit to Kana's ship wasn't just to catch up with his old friend, but to partake in a tradition that has apparently been going on for quite some time.

For the next half-hour the pair sat their chatting and watching the game, and when they saw one of the teams score a goal at the other end of the field, the two of them responded to the sight in the usual manner.

When the powerful duo watched one of the yellow team members shoot the ball through the blue team's goal, a loud cheer left Kana's lips and a low groan escaped Gohan's.

The orange haired Seirei sprang out of her seat and threw her hands in the air victoriously. Her reaction was so extreme that she ended up spilling beer all over the place, "YES! WOO! Did you see that?! That was amazing!"

"What?! Oh, come on!" the demi-Saiyan shouted, throwing his hands at the screen in disbelief. "That was totally off side! Look! His skate was over the red line!" He quickly pointed at the slow-motion replay of the event.

Kana, grinning from ear to ear, then got right into the boy's face and started teasing him, "They called it, wonder boy. You snooze, you lose. Come on. Pay up." She then held her hand out to him expectantly and waited for him to empty his pockets.

Rolling his eyes at the girl's smug grin, the young warrior from earth quickly fished inside of his belt and pulled out some coins, which he then gave to the Seirei so that she could count her prize. As soon as she set her winnings aside, the pair quickly returned to watching the game; drinks stationed on the arm rests to their left and right, and a hot tray of barbequed meat items hovering on the pad in front of them.

"I need to take you to an actual Tharnak game sometime. The main events are totally off the hook," Kana remarked, looking across at her guest sitting contently on the cushions alongside her. "The stadium is always packed with spectators from all four corners of the universe. That means you not only have the best ringside snacks to enjoy, but watching the games live next to the really hardcore fans is a blast."

Gohan chuckled at her enthusiasm, "Sure. That sounds like it could be a lot of fun. I'm always eager to go out and see new places. Visiting a different planet every now and then to check out some of the local cultures and flavors seems like a great way to get me started."
"I'll be sure to ease you into it," Kana continued, taking a quick sip of her drink and acknowledging the boy next to her with a wide smile. "As nice a guy as you are; you can't always hop from one planet to another and expect the same greeting each and every time. If you're not careful, you might end up some place really nasty and end up a prisoner, a slave, or even a side dish."

"Different planets have different rules and customs, huh?" the demi-Saiyan inquired curiously, expecting this much since he knew how diverse the cultures back on earth could be.

The glowing haired girl nodded right back in response, "Oh yeah. While there are many systems out there that are part of the same empire, there are countless other worlds that exist as independent states, and follow their own codes and practices." She then held up her hand and began counting with her fingers. "For example; there's a planet in the southern quadrant where one group of aliens rules over all others, and views every other species as inferior. There is also another world where setting foot on the ground is considered blasphemous and that everyone who treads upon the world's surface will be executed on the spot. And there's a planet where there are only two words spoken at all times, and all other forms of communication is impossible because the people of that world don't understand anything else."

"Huh," Gohan chuckled, a smile slowly creeping across his face as he processed all of the information given to him by the well traveled Seirei. "I guess you learn something new every day."

Kana beamed brightly at her friend from earth, "It's good to know as much about these things as you can. That way you won't receive any unpleasant surprises from any planet you happen to drop down on. Even if it is by accident." When she saw the teen return her smile with one of his own, the pair then fixed their attentions back onto the big screen. After watching the two opposing teams rush past each other in a heated display of skill and agility for a couple more minutes, the orange haired negotiator then took on a serious look and glanced across at her guest once more. "Hey, Gohan."

"Yeah?"

"In all the trips you've made through space so far, have you ever heard the name Varax before?" the female traveler asked, appearing genuinely curious of his answer.

Thinking on it for several moments and taking note of his friend's expression, the spiky haired warrior then shook his head, "No I… I don't think I have." His only real trips through space included his group's journey to Namek and their visit to New Vegeta where they encountered the Legendary Super Saiyan Broly. While he'd certainly heard many terms and names thrown around on these adventures, this one was a first for him.

Kana quickly reacted to his answer with concern, "Well… I think now is as good a time as any to start learning it, because sooner or later… he's going to become a big problem for everyone."

Blinking a few times in surprise, Gohan's face then became stone cold serious. "Gee. This guy sounds like he means business."

"Oh, you have no idea," Kana replied, narrowing her eyes as the game on the wall hologram continued playing out. Cupping her hands together tightly, the girl brought her knees up and pressed her legs against her chest in a very nervous manner, at the same time laying her chin to rest behind the peak. "There isn't a civilization in the four corners of space who hasn't heard of his name before. Aside from ruling over an entire empire and a sub quadrant on the very edge of the universe, his strength alone is a force to be reckoned with."

Looking at the Seirei's face, the demi-Saiyan saw how nervous and terrified Kana actually was, which brought a troubled glimmer to his own expression. "Who exactly is this, Varax?" If he was anything like what Frieza's used to be all those years ago, then he had a feeling that this guy had the potential to cause a lot of grief.

For someone to make even the powerful Seirei nervous, Gohan knew right away that he meant serious business.

"Only the most dangerous and destructive being in the entire universe," Kana said, her brow scrunching up as she continued to relay to the spiky haired fighter all the information she had on the subject. "Varax is a tyrant; cold, ruthless, and cruel… someone who even the leaders of the Planet Trade Organization are scared of. He's on a level you didn't even know existed. Heck, he's so powerful, even the Gods that oversee the balance in this reality are afraid to cross paths with him. If it wasn't for the treaty signed between him and the God of Destruction Beerus, he would've ravaged this universe billions of years ago."

"Wow. So… this guy is in a completely different league to you and me?" That much was apparent, but the demi-Saiyan still felt he needed to confirm it.

"Yeah. And he's got a short fuse to boot. The last time he threw a fit, he wiped out over a hundred galaxies in the Western Quadrant," Kana informed, at the same time showing the half-Saiyan how affected she was by this piece of info. "He's a monster unlike anything you've ever encountered before. So… if you ever happen to run into him… please… be careful."

"A-Alright. I will," Gohan murmured, tilting his head as he saw the orange haired girl look away and tense up.

From the look on her face, it was obvious she hated and feared this Varax character. Bearing in mind how strong Kana actually was, the demi-Saiyan knew that whoever she was talking about was someone he should definitely be weary of and by no means pursue with the intention of defeating. Unless he happened to run across him by accident, then he didn't have any intentions of battling this tyrant. Those kinds of actions always led to trouble.

Smiling, the demi-Saiyan then nudged the scared girl in the side and drew her gaze back up to him. "Don't worry. I'm sure everything will turn out alright. As long as we stay out of this Varax's hair, I'm positive that all of us will be alright. Besides…” He then brought his hands up and smacked a fist into his open palm, surprising the glowing haired alien. "If he ever tries anything to hurt you or my friends, I'll be there to stop him. You can count on it."

Staring across at the confident looking Saiyan for several moments, Kana then gave him a soft smile and, shuffling closer to him, jabbed the handsome warrior with a playful elbow in the side. "You know… it's a shame you didn't come with me all those years ago. We would've made an awesome team. Among other things."

Gohan grinned, "Yeah. Same here."

After hearing his response, Kana beamed, rested her shoulder against his, and turned back to the television in front of them. While leaning against the hybrid warrior, she then put her feet up and relaxed, getting comfortable against the Saiyan's firm and comforting arm. When she felt Gohan lean back in response to balance out their weight, the Seirei spared him a furtive glance before exhaling deeply.

"Hey. Your shoulder feels really nice. Have you been working out?" Kana asked with a cheeky grin.
The spiky haired demi-Saiyan chuckled, "Oh yeah."

OOO

(A couple days later)

"So Gohan… how are things going with your schoolwork?" the familiar, chipper voice of Goku filled the air as he and his son sat side by side on the fields covering the Grand Kai's planet. Taking note of the bruises, scrapes and sweat covering both their bodies, as well as the disheveled condition of their training gear, it was easy to tell that they'd just finished getting through one hell of a sparring session. "The last I heard from you, you said you were interested in spending your last year of studying in high school. Have you made any progress since then?"

"Yeah. A lot actually," Gohan answered, wiping his neck down with a towel and glancing across at his old man cheerfully, whom was looking just as beat up if not more beat up then he was. "I just got a letter from Orange Star High in Satan City that I'd passed the entrance exam with top marks in all subjects. I'll be starting my first term at school in a couple weeks time."

The father's face immediately lit up with delight. "Ah, man. That's fantastic, son. Well done." He then leaned forward on the grass and beamed proudly at his oldest. "I'm sure your mother will be very happy for you."

"I sure hope so. She's been asking me a lot of questions as to what I'd like to do as a side job next to all my martial arts stuff, and I was able to give her a few ideas. But… I think she's more interested as to whether or not I've found a girlfriend that could give her grandchildren… preferably sometime in the next couple of years." This revelation brought a shade of red to the teen's face as he turned his gaze towards the grass miserably. It was a reaction that did not go unnoticed by his father, who craned his head a little to get a better look at his son's embarrassed facial expression. "Man… I wish she wouldn't be so pushy about it."

In response, the spiky haired champion of Otherworld grinned slyly and nudged his son in the arm a few times. "What's the matter, son? Feeling a little hot and bothered about giving your mum and dad grand kids?"

Immediately catching on to his father's teasing, Gohan's eyes snapped towards the man in shock. "W-What?"

"I mean… you are reaching that age, after all. It's only natural a young man like you would be finding interest in… other activities outside of your education and hobbies. That's what your mother and King Kai told me, anyway," the adult said before shrugging in a suggestive manner. "I suppose flirting with girls and taking them out on dates would be a couple of things a teenager like you would be getting into."

"Huh? W-Wait… wh-?"

"That reminds me, how are things going between you and Videl?" Goku asked with a very Cheshire-like grin forming as he looked his son squarely in the eyes. While doing so, the man swore he saw the blood inside his son's face rise in a manner similar to a thermometer. "From what I've seen of you guys over the past couple of years, I've been getting this feeling that you two have a bit of a thing for each other."

By this point, the poor demi-Saiyan's face was now glowing like a hot poker. "DAD!" The boy's reaction was frantic and within reason, "Th-There's nothing going on between me and Videl! W-We're just… friends!"
"Are you sure?" Goku asked, leaning forward a little to poke his son in the shoulder, "I don't know. It doesn't look like you two are just friends. How do you explain all that red in your cheeks?"

"I-It's just a bad reaction…"

"To what? Saiyans aren't allergic to anything," the Saiyan father replied, unable to keep the smile off his face as he went on the offensive. "Come on, Gohan. I'm your father. You can talk to me about these things and I'll do my best to offer you my advice however I can." He then shrugged and massaged the back of his head thoughtfully. "And hey, if it's not Videl you're interested in, there are plenty of other girls you've told me about that you might fancy. Lime… Erasa… Zangya… that Paprika girl who has it out for you." He then leaned towards his son with a mischievous glint in his eye. "Honestly, if she's anything like your mother, I'd say she would be a perfect match for you."

Okay. It was official. His father was just as bad as his mother when it came to matchmaking. What the hell was up with his parents and their interest in his social life?

Stammering uselessly for a couple of moments, Gohan then tried to hide his face behind his shoulders and tucked himself up like a tortoise. Unfortunately, this did little to shield him from the teasing grin his father continued to prod him with.

Deciding to spare his powerful offspring from further embarrassment and not wishing to prey on his moment of weakness, the full-blooded Saiyan instead gave the innocent teenager a moment to recover and moved on to a different topic. It was one that both of them showed an equal amount of enthusiasm and interest in, and, considering their line of work, was an area that the father was confident his son would like to discuss in further detail.

"So Vegeta finally reached the second level of Super Saiyan, huh?"

Expression quickly becoming normal, the spiky haired teen cracked a smile. "Yep. It took him a lot of blood, sweat, tears and grinding in the gravity room, but after all that he managed to get it in the end. After seeing how hard he works, I'm really happy for him."

The senior fighter chuckled as he turned his gaze towards the skies of Otherworld, which were hanging in the air all around them, "To think that it actually took Bulma getting hurt to finally push him over the edge. I never figured the guy to be the caring type, considering how stubborn and prideful he can be, but it looks like the Prince of all Saiyans has surprised us once again."

Gohan grinned a little when another particular thought crossed his mind. "Vegeta's rivalry with you has done wonders for him. He may not be as strong or as talented as you or me, but he's made some outstanding progress since the Cell Games. The guy's a natural born hard worker."

"You have to give him points for persistence," Goku added, earning a nod from his son.

After covering Vegeta's success with a few compliments and comments of their own, the half-Saiyan then turned to his father and smiled even more, "And hey, Goten managed to transform into a Super Saiyan as well."

This announcement immediately drew the older warrior's attention, "What? No way. Seriously?"

"Uh-huh. Piccolo told me he managed to transform during our group's battle against Zeru when his friend Paprika jumped in to save him and Trunks. When he thought she died in the blast, he got really angry and let himself loose on the alien, breaking through several of its shields in one go," Gohan informed, pulling back and resting on his hands so that he could relax a little more. "I trained him to help control his transformation so that he could use it at will. Now he's even stronger
"Wow. That's incredible," Goku exclaimed, looking around to beam across the fields of grass in front of him. "He must be the youngest Saiyan to ever transform into a Super Saiyan."

"Half-Saiyan," Gohan corrected, earning a sheepish grin and a nervous laugh from his old man. "Don't forget, it's a big universe out there. You never know whether or not there are anymore Super Saiyans hiding out there on other planets outside of our quadrant."

"Fair enough," the dead warrior accepted gladly before breathing out a steady sigh. Pondering the idea of anymore of their kind being alive out there in the vast expanses of space, the spiky haired warrior then had another thought and quickly moved on with their topic. After all their talk of Saiyan transformations and such, it was understandable their conversation quickly led into this area. "Have you made any headway into ascending to the third level yet?"

Making a thoughtful sounding noise, the teenage warrior scratched his head, "It's not easy. Judging from the amount of power I'm digging into and the amount of strain it's putting on my body, it's taking everything I've got trying to get halfway through."

Goku looked across at his son curiously. "So you're close?"

"Close is… sort of subjective here," Gohan murmured, running a hand through his sweaty hair and giving his father a troubled glance. "No matter how much I push my energy into overdrive, I just can't seem to break through that final seal. There's something preventing me from making that final jump to achieving maximum energy output." He then scrubbed his cranium nervously while informing his father as to how troublesome this task was turning out to be. "I don't know. Maybe I'm approaching this the wrong way."

"Have you tried using emotional trauma to give you a kick?" Goku asked, scrutinizing the hybrid warrior with intent. He was well aware of the hidden potential dwelling inside his eldest son, as well as what was needed for the boy to draw upon his power. Perhaps, in his efforts to become stronger, he was neglecting a particular element of their fighting form necessary for him to ascend.

However, knowing how smart Gohan was, the dead Saiyan knew that there was no possible way the young man could ever overlook something so important.

As expected, the teenager nodded his head affirmatively. "Yes. I've tried ascending while at full power, using sheer force of will when my body was completely incapable of moving, drawing on all my power while maxing out the gravity room, transforming in space, thinking about all the horrible things Frieza and Cell has done… but no matter what combination I try, nothing seems to be working." Gohan then looked down at his hands and flexed his fingers a few times. "Is my body not strong enough? Can't it handle the strain of so much power sitting in one place?"

"That seems like the most likely case. Since you've got so much energy bottled up inside of you, perhaps the amount of ki necessary to maintain that form is just too much for a living body to control," Goku remarked, shrugging when he saw the teen look in his direction once again. The man then glanced down at his hands and checked his bruised palms. "I've been trying to get the transformation to work as well, but it's taking everything I've got just to retain the amount of power I'm able to draw on. I can feel it… I'm getting close to ascending. It's only a matter of time before I get it. But until then, I'm just as stuck as you are, son."

"Well then…" Gohan exclaimed, smiling across at his old man confidently. "It seems like this has become a two-horse race to see who can transform first. Me… or you." He jabbed a finger in the adult's direction. "You may be dead, dad, but I've been able to keep a steady lead for the past seven years. Maybe it's finally time I blew past you."

The father grinned when he picked up the tone in the hybrid's words, "Is that a challenge, I hear?"
When he met the confident smirk of his oldest son, Goku let out a laugh and, reaching over, clapped the kid on the shoulder encouragingly. "Alright then. You're on."

Since they both had Saiyan blood coursing through their veins, the prospect of a competition was just too hard for either of them to resist. Both of them shared a passion for fighting, and while one of them had certainly been a late bloomer in that department, he'd always shown a healthy interest in fighting to protect his friends and family, and to become a strong warrior like his dad. Now that he had matured, both Goku and Gohan could revel in the bond they'd formed in the sport they loved so very much.

At the rate this was going; if they weren't careful both Saiyans could accidentally shake apart the planets that they were training on to actually reach this legendary third level of Super Saiyan.

Once their brief exchange of pleasantries had been shared, Gohan stood up and shook out his messy hair. "One last spar before I go?"

Goku, sensing the enthusiasm in the teen's voice, leapt to his feet and joined him on the field, "Yeah. That'll be great."

As soon as both of them were up, the two immediately jumped to Super Saiyan 2. Golden auras exploding around them, hair spiking up, and their forms becoming shrouded in an electrical blue bio field, the two warriors then dashed out into the open and sprang into the air. Suspending themselves a few dozen feet above the ground, they then circled each other in the sky and assumed fighting stances. As soon as they stopped and fixed their full, undivided attentions on their opponent, the father and son duo smiled one last time before flying at each other and colliding with earth splitting force.

The sound of multiple thunderclaps continuously ringing out across the heavens caught the nearby King Kai's attention. Lying across a folded-out chair underneath a beach umbrella, the blue-skinned overseer of the Northern Quadrant, who was currently on break from a long morning of teaching, looked up at the sky to see two golden bolts dueling with each other across the atmosphere.

Glasses flashing as he adjusted his gaze, the Kai's face broke out a smile as he sat up to get a better look at the display.

"Heh. There they go again," the man exclaimed, marveling as his greatest pupil and his prodigious son sparred with one another above the Grand Kai's world. "I guess the apple really doesn't fall that far from the tree."

The apple in this case had already sprouted into a tree of its own.

OOO

(Meanwhile)

(Mount Paozu)

The living room of the Son household also became filled with the sounds of explosions and battle.
However, in contrast to the actual war sounds that was often heard outside on the fields, these ones were toned down somewhat due to the limits of the volume control.
All these noises of course were being generated by the television set, where Goten and his friends Trunks and Paprika were sitting in front of the screen with video game remotes in hand. While the oldest of the three sat in the center and provided balance for the trio's arrangement, the entire group was currently mashing buttons with intense looks on their faces as they attempted to beat their opponents in the free-for-all Master Brawlers game they were now playing. From the way they were squirming about and focusing intently on the screen, it was clear that their personal war with one another was really beginning to heat up.

"Come on, Artemis! Get him!" Goten shouted, moving his control to the left and vigorously tapping the attack button. "Yes! Yes! Go! Go!"

"No! No! No-no-no! No!" Trunks shouted back, quickly changing tactics to get out of the pincer movement he was forced into. "Counter! Counter! Counter! YES!"

"No! How the heck did you do that?"

"It's called the 'B' button, Goten. Start using it," the lavender haired boy replied childishly while grinning excitedly.

Grunting as she tried maneuvering her avatar around with the sticks, Paprika cursed when she found herself stuck in a corner. "Stupid controls! They're not working! All my character is doing is crouching repeatedly!" On the screen, her fighting character Sagitta was currently performing a continuous series of squats and rotations on a platform away from where Goten and Trunks' avatars were having it out. The white haired girl shouted when her character then started blocking uselessly, disobeying her commands and simply refusing to budge. "I order you to fight them, damn it!"

Stopping the battle for a moment, Trunks glanced across at the Makyan fuming over her inability to use the controls properly. "Yelling at the screen won't get him to move how you want him to. That's not how the game works."

"Then it is a stupid game!" Paprika shouted, trying to get her character to navigate the field but ended up walking her off of the edge of the cliff. When she fell, she exploded, adding another minus one to her score. The result had her growl, rise to her feet, and point at the screen. "A THOUSAND AND ONE DEATHS UPON THIS INFERNAL ACTIVITY!"

Trunks sweat-dropped when he saw the teenager huff angrily. "It's just a game, man. Chill out. I didn't know a chick could get so worked up over a video game." He then turned back to his character and began chasing after Goten's. "At least you're doing a hell of a lot better than dad did when I got him to play with me."

His old man wasn't as gentle when it came to handling this game. After he ended up losing for the fifth time, Vegeta snapped the control in half and went to blow off some steam in the gravity room. That was a very dark day at Capsule Corp… for all of the members of the Briefs family.

In the end the rest of the match became a two-legged race between Goten and Trunks, in which the pair of them battled each other to decide the victor. In the end, the latter won the round by unanimous decision and threw his arms into the air victoriously. During which time his cheerful friend from Mount Paozu breathed a sigh of relief and smiled across at his best mate.

"Good one, Trunks. You sure showed us."

The lavender haired boy smirked and pointed back at the spiky haired youngster in response, "I may not be able to transform into a Super Saiyan yet, but I'm still better than you at other stuff." He then formed a tight fist and waved it confidently. "Just you wait. I'll catch up to you sooner or later." As usual, that was his father's side talking.

The pride of a Saiyan was a force to be reckoned with, as was their desire to combat any challenge that they encountered.

Paprika on the other hand had her own drives and expectations to live up to, which she was more than happy to share with her adversaries. "This is unacceptable! I demand a rematch!"

Her declaration easily drew the duo's attention up to her, particularly Goten's. "You still want to play with us, Paprika?"

"Even though you got creamed in the last fifteen rounds?" True, she'd gotten second place once or twice. Considering she wasn't technologically gifted or cared much for electronics, she was doing quite well for her first time.

The Makyan stuck her chest out proudly, "Of course. After all, a great warrior like me refuses to throw in the towel so readily." She then brandished her control declaratively. "I don't care how long it takes me. I'll get this game right eventually."

"Well here… let me help you," Goten chirped, quickly shuffling over so that he was sitting alongside his scarf wearing companion. As soon as he was in range, he then began pointing out buttons on her remote and comparing it to his. "These toggles direct and move your character around either left, right, up or down. You can press 'X' to jump and 'B' to throw long range attacks…” It was a pretty straightforward lecture, one that Paprika acknowledged with her utmost attention.

By the end of the day, the white haired fighter was able to walk away from the Son house with at least one victory under her belt and a big smile on her face.

OOO

(Several days later)

It was the beginning of a new season and Gohan had decided to commemorate the start to this new period by inviting all of his city friends over to spend some time over at his place. To mix things up a little, the demi-Saiyan had all of them bring nets and plastic boxes with them so that they could partake in a little planned activity of his out in the countryside. At first all of them were a little bit confused as to why they were bringing this stuff with them, but when the demi-Saiyan explained to them the reason why, they were all soon onboard with his idea.

On this particular day, the skies were clear and beautiful, and the weather was nice and warm; probably the warmest Mount Paozu had been in for a while. This was ideal for what the young warrior wanted to do with his soon-to-be-classmates.

That morning, when all of his friends eventually came by his place, they all went out into the valleys and forests to catch bugs. The sounds of the little critters could be heard echoing all around them, from crickets, to frogs and even cicadas. It was the latter that would become the main focus of the team's little expedition out here and Gohan couldn't wait to get started.

Standing in the middle of the grasslands surrounding the Son household, Gohan, Videl, Lime, Erasa and Touya were all dressed in their summer gear, with insect catchers slung over their shoulders and butterfly nets held firmly in hand. While Gohan was wearing a brown top with brown pants and Erasa was dressed in her typical color scheme consisting of a green singlet and blue jean shorts, Lime was adorned in a red, checkered gingham top tied at the front exposing her stomach with white shorts, Touya a blue shirt and khaki pants, and Videl an oversized red shirt with a black hanya mask on its chest and grey, figure hugging spandex pants.

Formed into a circle, all five of them were looking around the area and listening to the insects' calls.

"The cicadas sound happy," Erasa chirped, beaming towards the nearby trees with a smile on her face.

"Yeah. Listen to all that noise they're making," Touya said, grinning widely as he too admired the untouched wilderness surrounding him. "What a beautiful chorus."

"They sure are loud though," Videl added, smiling across at Gohan to see the teen look right back at her. "We don't get many of them out in the city. They occasionally fly in from the countryside when they're in season, but that's about it. The rest of the time it's just traffic noise."

"You should see them when they're all coming out of the ground at the same time," Gohan said, smiling brightly as he shifted his net further onto his shoulder. "There are millions… billions of cicadas appearing in the one area. The largest migration on the face of the planet and it only happens once every seventeen years, depending on the species. Heck, there are so many of them that the amount of noise they make can be heard for miles around."

"Wow. That's a lot of noise," Erasa remarked, turning her gaze towards the demi-Saiyan.

Lime, also finding interest in the spiky haired warrior's comments, then glanced at her blonde haired friend with a smile. "It's true, you know. We sometimes get cicadas in our village after the rainy season, but most of them pop up around here, maybe because the area is so rich and fertile. We can hear them from the other side of the mountain."

"Imagine standing in the middle of all of that," Touya said, shaking his head as he contemplated the idea. "I bet you wouldn't be able to hear yourself think."

After listening to the songs of the mountains for a little while longer, the members of the group then turned to their host. The demi-Saiyan stood there with his net over his shoulder and a big smile on his face, obviously pleased to see how impressed his friends were and how all of them were admiring their location.

Since a couple of them hadn't been out there that often, it was obvious why those two in particular were in such awe of their surroundings.

"So, Gohan," Erasa began with a mischievous glint in her eye as she leered across at the young warrior, "What's the plan for today?"

"Isn't it obvious?" the spiky haired teen asked, holding out his bin so that they could all see it, "I called you all out here so that we could hang out and have a little bit of fun. More to the point, we're going to have a little competition with each other."

Everyone was immediately intrigued by his declaration, particularly Lime, "Competition?"

Gohan responded with a nod, "Yep. The name of the game today is bug hunting. Whoever catches the most cicadas wins." He then gestured out across the grasslands, directing the group's attention to all the insects they could already see buzzing or fluttering around. "Since we've got so much space around here, I figure we may as well put it to good use."
"Ooh. Sounds like fun," Erasa sung, rolling her shoulders and brandishing her net like it was a rifle. A couple of the others reacted in a similar, energetic manner. "This'll be great for my cardio."

"Whatever you say, girl," Videl chuckled, watching her friend bounce on her toes eagerly. Taking note of the girl's stance, the short haired tomboy then gestured to the fields behind her. "Just try not to stray too far. We wouldn't want you getting stuck anywhere or running into anything unpleasant."

"Uh… what do you mean by 'unpleasant'?" Touya asked, looking questioningly across at the Champ's daughter before the glasses wearing teen with the short hair shot a look towards the farm girl nearby.

The pig-tailed Lime beamed, "He means any dinosaurs or large reptiles." She grinned at the teen when his expression turned nervous. "Don't worry. There aren't any big creatures around here for miles. If there were, Gohan and Videl will be able to take care of them. No sweat."

Erasa, grinning from ear to ear, stepped towards the demi-Saiyan and elbowed him in the side, "These two are the toughest guys I know. Plus I'm sure tall, dark and handsome here will be able to protect us… right?"

Giving a good-natured laugh at the girl's compliment, Gohan then spun his net around and pointed it towards the center, "Alright then, fellas. Let's have some fun. The only rule is; there are no rules. Catch as many cicadas as you can. We'll meet back here at lunch time." Bringing his staff back around, the teen then assumed a fighting stance. When he saw the others mimic his actions, the boy grinned, "Ready and… GO!"

Almost immediately after the whistle was blown, Lime and Touya took off into the fields, both of whom were soon followed by Erasa, who ended up tripping over her own feet. When she picked herself up moments later, the city girl was back in the game and running towards the trees, quickly finding herself a lovely patch to start with. Upon seeing their friends take off, Gohan and Videl stepped towards one another, deciding to share a few words before going off on their own hunt.

"Great idea inviting all of us for a sleepover, Gohan," the raven haired girl commented, watching as the trio got right down to hunting. While her blonde school friend appeared a little bit lost, Lime had thrown herself right into the activity and Touya was starting his run off by kicking at a bush to try and scare a few animals out. "I think you're really starting to get the hang of organizing group get-togethers."

The demi-Saiyan nodded, "It's still a bit of a work in progress. But as long as they're having fun, then my job here is done."

Videl giggled at his answer, "Not quite yet. You're still going to have to catch more cicadas then the rest of us." She then playfully swatted him with the end of her net. "Remember; no super speed, energy blasts and no flying. If we're going to do this, then we're going to do this right. Deal?"

A fond grin quickly appeared on the hybrid's face as he fixed his gaze upon his best friend. "Deal." He then nodded across the flats, "Come on. Let's go have some fun."

With that said the two split up and went off in search of their elusive prey.

While making his way into the woods, Gohan quickly spotted Erasa over by a clearing with her net held high and her eyes fixed firmly upon the ground. Stopping when he saw her dive forward with a swing, he then smiled as he watched her reel her stick back in.
"What's that? You catch one?"

Beaming happily, the blonde haired girl reached into her transparent bag and pulled out the creature she'd ended up catching. "Hey there, cutie. Wow… you're a big one," the teenager chirped while holding the enormous, golden shelled bug with the big horns between her hands.

Hell, it was so big she could barely curl her fingers around it.

The demi-Saiyan watching her from a distance spotted the beetle she'd managed to grab and smiled at how cheerful she was about her success, "Well done, Erasa. But… that's not a cicada."

His remark immediately drew the blonde's gaze over to him, "Really?" When she saw him nod his head, she looked back at the beetle sadly. "Oh. Okay. Sorry, little guy." She then opened her hand up and let the critter rest in her palm.

When Gohan saw exactly what it was the teen had caught when she held it out, his jaw dropped when he recognized the familiar shape and size of the insect. Its unique horn structure, armored build and golden abdomen were easily distinguishable from a distance, and when it opened up its wings and took flight, the demi-Saiyan couldn't help but gawk after it.

"A Hercules Beetle?" He and Erasa watched it fly off, disappearing into the forest moments later. "Those things live high up in the mountains. We rarely get those down here."

His friend from the city giggled after seeing the look on his face, "Well… it's a good thing I let him go. Now he can go back to be with his family." The blonde then waved after the insect, even though it was long gone.

And so the day's main event was officially underway.

The bug hunt started off great. As expected, those who were the most athletically competent of the group threw themselves right into the game; rushing across the fields and swinging their nets around like there was no tomorrow. Lime was really enthusiastic about the whole thing, jumping through the air and swinging her net around to try and catch the cicadas flying through the air.

Touya was also surprisingly determined, crawling along the ground to sneak up on his targets. This approach worked out most of the time, but when he made too much noise he ended up scaring the critters away.

Cautious as ever, Videl went after her quarry with all the grace and finesse of a fighter. However, she did end up making one or two mistakes along the way. The poor girl wound up running headlong into a spider web and got a face full of silk, as well as an unwanted visitor that she swatted off of her while screaming bloody murder.

Gohan meanwhile had to contend with his own problems. Restricted from using his powers, the teenager had to run around dodging trees and jumping over bushes to catch his quarry. But as long as he kept his abilities on a low, he was able to play this game by the rules and not end up destroying the countryside in the process.

Despite all of this, the most important thing was that they were having fun. That's what really counted.

While tiptoeing through the woods with her net in hand and plastic box hanging comfortably from her shoulder, Erasa continued searching for cicadas in the woods surrounding Son Gohan's fields. Having successfully managed to bag and grab a few cicadas, along with a couple other insects that weren't exactly on the registry, she soon restarted her search for another handful of creatures to add to her collection. She did so under the impression that she would receive a compliment from her handsome host and a reward of some sort, one that had her all giddy on the inside.

Spotting a cicada hanging off of a nearby oak, Erasa snuck up on it with her net held tightly at her side. Taking aim and biting her bottom lip excitedly, the blonde advanced step by step before, with great speed and accuracy, launched herself at the bug.

"GOT YAH!" the blonde shouted, laughing triumphantly when her net effortlessly enveloped her target. Her eyes shone with delight, only to widen in horror and her face to pale a split second later when she saw what else she'd managed to catch. "EEEEEEEEK!"

What she saw staring back at her from underneath her butterfly net was what she immediately mistook for a green demon wearing a white turban.

When Gohan and Videl rushed over to see what'd happened, both of them blinked in surprise when they saw it was Piccolo standing there, with Erasa's net covering his head like a bag, a cicada buzzing around inside it, and the poor teen shivering under his shadow.

Bug smacking against his face repeatedly, the Namekian flinched over and over again, while the insect's mating call screamed loudly in his ear. Considering how loud cicadas could be, the sounds it was making was probably unbearable to the cape-wearing warrior.

Every time the critter flew around and smacked into the side of Piccolo's cheek inside the net, the man announced his throbbering pain again and again, "Ow… ow… ow… ow…"

"I-I-I'm so sorry," Erasa stammered, grinning nervously up at the towering man in front of her. "I didn't see you there, sir. It was an accident…"

Cicada still buzzing around near his ear, the Namekian groaned. "Please… get… this… thing… off of… me…"

Watching from a distance, Videl had to stifle a laugh, while Gohan snickered and rested his hand on his waistline. "Erasa. What are you doing to Mr. Piccolo?"

Turning around to see her childhood friend laughing her ass off and the raven haired hunk smiling at her, the startled blonde grinned nervously and shrugged, "N-Nothing." Honestly, it was pretty hard saying it was nothing when she still had the green warrior's head trapped inside a butterfly net.

Acting as quickly and carefully as she could, the girl slowly removed the net free from Piccolo's head, allowing the cicada and the Z-fighter to go free.

The Namekian relaxed, eyes still locked onto the startled girl, "Thank you."

Apparently the tall fighter had decided to drop by to see what all the commotion around the Son residence was about and, by sheer bad luck and coincidence, had managed to walk right into it. But of course, once apologies had made and dues had been paid, everyone quickly got back to their task of hunting down the critters living in the area.

When lunchtime eventually pulled around sometime later, the teenagers quickly brought it back into the middle to show off their catches. Converging around the center field where it all started, Gohan made sure that everyone was present and accounted for. Upon inspecting the physical conditions of all of his friends, including Erasa and Touya, the latter of whom looked as though he'd spent a great portion of the day falling out of trees as opposed to successfully dismounting them, the man started off the count in a clockwise direction. All the while the team was watched on by the ever-present shadow of Piccolo from a distance.

"I've got eleven," Videl exclaimed, holding her box up proudly.

"Ten," Touya exclaimed, bringing his around to show off.

"I caught ten as well," Erasa announced, drawing the gazes of all of her friends and prompting Lime to lean over to look at her box more closely.

After having a glance around inside, the brown haired girl with pigtails giggled a little, "A few of those aren't even cicadas." She then raised a finger and pointed at each of them while the rest of the group took a closer look. "You have a couple of grasshoppers, a stick insect, two spiny leaf insects, a monarch butterfly and…" Her eyes then widened as she leaned in further, "Holy crap, you caught a yanbaru long-armed scarab! Where in the world did you find that?"

The blonde blinked at her friend's exclamation curiously, "Crawling up a tree." Taking note of the stunned faces of her friends, the innocent teenager then took on a timid expression. "He looked pretty, so I caught him."

A smile slowly appeared on Gohan's face, "An impressive catch, Erasa. Well done." The spiky haired warrior complimented, earning a warm gaze from the blonde before holding up his box, "I managed to catch ten as well."

Turning her attention to her neighbor's cheerful face and box of many cicadas, Lime grinned, "You're getting slack, Gohan-kun." The country girl then held her bin out and showed them all her glorious collection. "Ta-da! Thirteen!"

The demi-Saiyan nodded as the girl smiled and held her catch proudly above her head, "Looks like we have a winner. Good job everyone." After giving everyone a congratulatory smile, the raven haired warrior then brought his tin into view and popped open the top. "I think it's about time we let these little guys go. They've had a really long day."

"Agreed," Touya answered, opening the top of his bin as well and holding it out. "It's important to follow the spirit of catch and release with these guys." Just as he was peeling the lid back though, the boy then looked up and blinked a few times in surprise. "Huh. Something about what I just said felt very familiar."

On cue, all of the other members of the troop cracked open their cases and liberated the cicadas from their confines. While all those who'd actually caught the noise makers held their plastic boxes up and allowed the insects to fly off, Erasa had to hold hers close to the ground so that the ones she'd caught could crawl away. She also made sure to find a special place for the scarab at the bottom of her bin.

It was a fine haul today, and as the group stood back and watched their insects fly off into the horizon with the rest of their cicada brothers and sisters singing away in the woods, a smile formed on Lime's face as she glanced across at her group of friends.

"This was fun. We should definitely do this again sometime."

Videl nodded, before reaching over and tugging on Gohan's sleeve, "Come on. Let's go have lunch."

And they did.
Who said going to a town festival wasn't a fun thing to do?

Videl certainly thought so as Gohan led her through the open streets of a village somewhere in the outermost region of Mount Paozu. With the roads littered with stalls, vegetables and all sorts of other miscellaneous decorations strung up about the place, it was obvious the community was in celebration of one of their traditional holidays. It seemed like a pretty old tradition as well because not only were the two teenagers able to make out several old time artifacts and landmarks on display, but they could also see several villagers walking around dressed in clothing that people hadn't worn for over a hundred years. That was more than enough to tell them that not only was the entire village in party mode but they were also putting on one heck of a show for the tourists.

That was fine by the demi-Saiyan's book; as long as they were making money. All he wanted to do was take his friend out for the day and show her more of the region surrounding his homeland.

"So what festival did you say this was again?" Videl asked her partner as she dodged traffic to get to one of stalls in the middle of the square. It was here the two of them stopped to inspect the various pastries that'd been put out by the owner of the shop.

"This is Kiko Village's annual Moon Festival; a little celebration that the people have to commemorate the end of their settlement's first harvest season," Gohan informed, smiling as he took a glance around at the crowds of guests moving back and forth across the block. "Judging from the number of people here and what they have on sale, I think it's safe to say that they've had a very productive year. Check out all of the attractions."

There were horse rides, coach tours, souvenir stalls, sheep shearing, bread and butter making, silk and material works, clothing stands… pretty much everything you would find at a flea market and more. On top of having a concert over on the green later that evening, the entire town was also an ideal place for a little bit of one on one time between the two best friends.

And neither one of them was complaining about it.

"You can only come across these kinds of fetes in the countryside. They're nothing like the festivals back in Satan City or the fun parks everybody visits in West City. These are much nicer… quieter," Videl exclaimed, tucking some hair behind her ear while checking out one of the bagels on the counter. "Mm… those look good."

"Two zeni each," the woman wearing the red and white striped apron behind the counter said before smiling across at the girl in the yellow sweater, white skirt and black spandex pants. The cook then gestured towards another stack of delicious looking scones sitting on top of a plate. "These moon cakes are also one and a half zeni each. Three for three if you like."

"Ooh. I'll take those thanks. And two bagels," Videl said, smiling as she then watched the woman go about parceling them up for her.

But just when the raven haired girl was fishing into her pocket for some cash, the half-Saiyan suddenly stepped in front of her and fished some bills out of his. "Don't worry. I got it." Keeping the girl's hand from extending and spoiling herself, Gohan moved to the front and handed the customer service agent his cash, before then throwing the girl a wide grin. "My treat, since I'm taking you out."

At first appearing surprised, Videl then threw him an amused smirk, "I don't think that's how it works."
"Well… let's just go with it for now and see exactly where it takes us," the Saiyan replied, receiving change from the baker as well as the products he'd purchased. He then handed the bag to Videl, opening it up and allowing her to fish around for her treat, which she promptly did so. "I heard the moon cakes from this village are the best scones in the entire region. Am I right?" He directed a smile over at the middle-aged woman behind the stand of breads and assorted baked confections.

The master chef nodded to the boy in response, "That's right."

"See?" Gohan chirped. After giving a wave of thanks, he then began walking Videl away from the small crowd gathering around the desk and further out into the open. However, with the amount of villages darting this way and that, checking out the many other booths set up around them, this made the task of navigation extremely difficult. "I've flown to dozens of villages to do shopping in the past, but this place always has the best breads and some of the best pumpkins I've ever bought. The people here take a lot of pride in their work."

Chewing on one of the scones she'd managed to grab, Videl moaned out at the heavenly taste that rolled across her tongue. "Mm. And they have a right to be. This is delicious."

"Maybe we'll come back around and see if they can bake us some fresh ones. The smell that they have when they come straight out of the oven makes your mouth water," the demi-Saiyan said, holding a hand out and clenching his fingers to convey just how glorious the prospect was.

Videl was easily impressed, "I'll hold you to it." She then pointed across the way when she saw another wagon-driven-stall that caught her eye. "Wow. Check out those watermelons. They're massive." Stopping in their tracks to watch the crowd slip by and give them a better view of the cream of the crop, the raven haired crime fighter then spared her escort a grin. "What do they fertilize those things with? Chickens and asparagus?"

"You would think that, wouldn't you?" Gohan chuckled, glancing down to see Videl take a couple more bites out of her large scone before then holding up the bag to him. "Oh. Thanks." Grabbing a bagel for himself, he then pointed across at the prized vegetable collection. "To get watermelons that big, the soil would have to be incredibly rich and the products well taken care of. The farmers use only the best natural remedies to ward off all the bugs and pests that would be considered harmful to their patches."

This had the sweater wearing girl shrug, "Nothing that a healthy splash of grain around the farm can't fix, I suppose." Not really knowing much about the ins and outs of farming, yet finding her friend's knowledge about it incredibly insightful, she then grinned up at the spiky haired warrior. "Your mum plants her own stuff around the house, yeah?"

"Uh-huh. We buy the seeds from Lime's parents and plough the gardens ourselves. It's a really great meditative practice to get into every second season."

Videl then gave him a playful nudge. "That probably explains why you know so much about it."

"I'm just as much a learner as I am a professional fighter," Gohan stated while raising his hands. "Agriculture just happened to be small part of my education during my primary years, so I went ahead and did some."

"I keep forgetting how unique a childhood you actually had growing up. Outside of your outer space adventures, your life at home with your mum and dad was just as intense." Finishing up her scone and dusting her hand down as they continued on walking through the busy village square, Videl then hooked her arms around Gohan's and beamed up at him happily. Her actions drew the boy's gaze down to her, a sight that had her heart start to thump, "I'm really glad you invited me out here to spend the day with you, Gohan."

"Yeah. Me too. I wouldn't be able to enjoy it as much without you around. So... well..." Fumbling a bit with his words as he tried to think up something to say, the teen chuckled and rubbed the back of his head. Blushing slightly as he glanced towards the girl's enchanting smile and captivating sapphire eyes, he then lowered his hand and straightened up. "I wanted to take you some place great, that's all. You're an awesome friend, Videl, and I... I really love spending time with you, you know?"

Batting her eyes, the girl sighed and turned about to continue staring ahead of her. "Not quite there yet, huh?" she whispered, arms still wrapped around his. Figures...

"Hm? Did you say something?"

"No. Nothing," the tomboy replied, shaking her head at the half-Saiyan. "Just talking to myself." Stopping them for a third time along the footpath, Videl then spotted a café across the way and gestured the male's attention over to it. "I feel like a coffee. How about you?"

"Sure. My treat," Gohan spoke, allowing his friend to keep a firm grip of him as he then led her towards the establishment in question. They'd been walking for quite a while now. The least he could do was pull up a chair for them.

Passing through the crowd, the pair were given a moment of silence as they approached the diner. Once they were about partway across the square, Videl then spoke up with a devilish look in her eyes. "You're not going to tell me that this place sells some of the best coffee in the world, are you?"

"Ah-ha. Second best coffee, actually," Gohan replied, responding to the teasing tone in the girl's voice as he opened the door to the shop and allowed her passage. "The best is somewhere on the other side of the world. I'll take you there, sometime."

Rolling her eyes, Videl then threw him a playful swing that he blocked. "Sometimes I don't know whether you're just playing with me or telling the truth."

The demi-Saiyan threw her his signature grin, "Wanna guess?"

"I'd like to, but I'm a little bit afraid of the answer," the teen answered in amusement, not giving the boy the satisfaction of seeing her daring leer. "Keep smiling, hotshot. I ain't crackin' that easily."

OOO

(Early Monday morning)

(Somewhere in the Dunes)

It'd been a long weekend for everyone and right now the entire world was getting set for another round of work. In countless cities across the globe, people were either slowly starting to wake up to the morning sun or were still tossing and turning around in their sleep. This only counted for the half of the planet that was still shrouded in darkness.

On the other half of the planet though, in a village situated on the very edge of the largest desert on the mainland, a small village was experiencing one of the worst wakeup calls they could ever imagine. This came in the form of rapid footsteps, gunfire and screaming, as two trucks filled with armed men and a tank trundled into the Mid Eastern town and began raiding homes left and right.
Armed to the teeth and bearing the colors of bandits originating from parts unknown, the men dressed in desert military uniforms, turbans and goggles, busted down doors up and down the main road and began harrying terrified villagers onto the streets. Screaming and barking orders at the defenseless civilians, they separated both the men and the women from each other, while also making sure the children were accounted for.

Minutes upon entering the settlement, the bandits armed with AK-47s, Uzis and a whole bunch of other automatic weaponry corralled every individual towns person to the side of the road and began forcing them into herds. As soon as they had the women fenced off by a squad of soldiers, they then began putting the men up against the wall, where they forced them to put their hands up and turn their backs to them.

It was complete and utter chaos. On top of the rumbling of the tank's engine at the end of the highway and the soldiers screaming at the civilians, the women and children were crying, and the men were attempting to fight back against the invaders. But to no avail. All they could do was plead and shout as they were lined up and prepared to be subjected to a firing squad.

The leader of the bandits, a man armed with a saber and wearing a red beret, marched down the road with an armed escort, his chin held high, and a pistol in hand. Upon inspecting the large group of women on one side of the street and the men on the other side, he then raised his gun and fired it into the air. His shots silenced some of the noise, leaving only the children and a couple of the captured civilians to stare fearfully in his direction and whimper.

"Enough! I'm getting tired of all this crying!" the bearded commander shouted, waving his gun around and glaring over his frightened hostages. "As of right now, this entire town belongs to us!" He slammed the butt of his gun against his chest in a tribal gesture of warning. "Your economy, your farmlands, your infrastructure… all of it belongs to us! And to make sure that none of you even think of rebelling against our will…" He then pointed across at the men lined up against the wall, "This group over here will be put to death!"

"No! Please!" one of the mothers on the other side cried out. "Don't do this!"

"Please! Have mercy!" a man on the wall shouted, only to receive a rifle butt to the back that sent him crumpling to the ground.

A new wave of cries washing over the area, the commander snarled and turned his ire on the prisoners, "SILENCE! You will do as I say!" Shouts and cries beseeching him to show restraint continuing to fill his ears, the man merely spat on the ground and pointed towards a couple of his masked marauders standing nearby. "You and you! Bring four more!" As soon as he gave the order, the bandits grabbed four more men from the crowd they'd separated and forced them to the length of wall as well.

It was here over a dozen male villagers were now lined up, all with their hands against the stone and their backs turned to their captors.

Smirking at the uproar of further screaming and pleading, the commander leered at the women before marching towards the lineup. Grabbing a poor farmer by the back of the robe, he violently dragged him across the dirt road and forced him to his knees, where he then loaded his Beretta and pointed it at the back of the terrified man's head.

An excited look filled the commander's eyes as his two dozen bandits and subordinates stood back and watched the show. "All those who defy us will be swiftly punished."

From his position and this range, there was no way he could miss.
But just as his finger was pulling back on the trigger, a red beam suddenly shot down from the sky and smacked into his gun, knocking it out of his hand. "GAH!" Shouting and gripping his wrist as he stumbled backwards, the man in the beret looked up with a start and shouted to the heavens. "WHO DID THAT?"

While the bandits scattered around across the main street were looking around wildly for a sniper, a figure suddenly teleported directly in front of the commander and made her presence known. Appearing before the stunned crowd in the form of a green blur, the blue-skinned, orange haired form of Zangya suspended herself in front of the gang's leader, her arms folded and hair bellowing upwards.

Adorned in a tasteful purple suit with a skirt, a white shirt and purple heels, the appearance of the pointy-eared Hera startled the commander out of his wits, and forced him to take a few steps back. When he looked her over and met her glare with his own, the wide eyed outlaw gritted his teeth and reached for his sword. "Demon bitch! You will die!" He drew his saber with a shout and pointed it at her.

Zangya rolled her eyes in response as the tip of the weapon was practically brushed against her nose. "Yeah. Sure." She then grabbed the sword and melted it with a quick burst of ki, leaving it as just a stump and a handle.

When the commander retracted his now blunt weapon in disbelief, he took one disbelieving look at it before glancing back up at the new arrival. As soon as he did, he was promptly greeted by the woman's knuckles, which caved in his face and sent him blasting across the village through every single wall standing in his path, and didn't stop until he was bouncing across the fields of crops.

Judging from the distance he'd covered, it was safe to say the man would be drinking all of his next meals in Otherworld through a straw.

Lowering her fist, Zangya then heard the distinct sound of assault rifles going off and looked to her left to see the commander's two bodyguards opening fire on her. Rolling her eyes when their bullets bounced harmlessly off of her skin, she walked over to them and uppercutted one of the pricks the chin, sending him flying over the village's rooftops. After that she threw a hook at the other one and sent him into a building, which collapsed right on top of him. Seconds later, all hell broke loose.

The soldiers that were holding the men at point turned on the demon woman and opened fire. But just before any of their bullets could hit, the Hera held up a finger and fired a barrage of multiple red beams that cut the swath of soldiers down like paper. As soon as their bodies hit the ground, Zangya then turned towards a distant rooftop, took aim with her hand, and fired a red blast up at a sniper, which she disintegrated. Upon wiping him and a portion of that building's roof out, she then focused her attention on the soldiers holding the women hostage.

The moment she saw a couple of them point their weapons at the prisoners and a couple more move forward to try and engage her, Zangya narrowed her eyes and reacted instantly. In a scene taken straight out of Man of Steel, the woman darted towards the soldiers in a blue blur, smashing them one after the other and sending them crashing to the ground at super speed before dealing sweet justice to the last. Holding the bandit by the throat above the floor, she allowed the man to kick and squirm helplessly for a few seconds. After that she dropped him on his ass and kicked him across the face, knocking him out.

Upon dispensing swift, lightning fast righteousness over the evil men, Zangya then turned her attention to her final opponent. Its engine growling loudly as the men inside of it fired it up, the T-72 battle tank began rumbling down the street towards the woman, forcing the now freed villagers to scatter. The Hera stood her ground and waited for it to come closer. Once it reached her, she simply reached out and activated the kinesis of her sword, creating a red beam that sliced it in half. With the tank's destruction, the bandits were defeated and the village was safe once more.
to run for cover. As soon as the road cleared, the unflinching Hera moved into the center of it, while the terrified townspeople watched from behind walls and fences as their unlikely savior faced off against the metal beast.

Stopping in its tracks, the tank's gun rotated and aimed at the orange haired woman. As soon as she was standing squarely in its sights, the officer inside the vehicle's turret wasted no time in dillydallying.

"Target at twelve o'clock!" the officer in the goggles shouted, kicking his gunner in the back shoulder, "Do you have her?"

"Target marked, sir!"

"Then fire!"

"Yes, sir! On the way!"

A loud 'bang' immediately followed when the massive gun fired, hurtling the armor piercing projectile towards the Hera at a ridiculous speed. A split second later, a large explosion impacted the woman, temporarily blocking out view of the street around her. When the men in the tank thought they'd killed her, jaws soon dropped all around when they saw Zangya's form emerge from the smoke with a smile on her face and looking completely unscathed.

Dusting off her shoulder from the shrapnel, the Hera then started strolling towards the tank with her hands in her pockets and a spring in her heeled step.

"R-Reload!" the sergeant shouted.

"Gun loaded sir!"

"Then hit her!" the vehicle commander shouted, at the same time the assistant driver opened fire on the demon woman with the machinegun. But no matter how much metal he poured onto her, he didn't even come close to stopping her.

"On the way!" Another deafening thunderclap sent the tank shell rocketing down the street, striking Zangya in the face with a loud 'ping' but ended up ricocheting and flying off into the horizon.

Three more times the tank fired as Zangya casually strolled towards it. But each and every time the massive gun let loose a round at the woman, the shells either bounced off of her and flew off into the distance, or exploded uselessly against her. When she eventually stopped three feet in front of the gun, the men were so stumped by the sight of her still standing that they all but pissed themselves in terror.

Shaking in their boots, they tried for one last round, the gun flashing as it blasted another tank shell into her face at pointblank range, only for it to ricochet off of her forehead and shoot up into the sky. When the whistle of the high-velocity round echoed into the distance, the Hera smiled one last time before raising her hand and holding it towards the front of the armored war machine.

"You guys have had your shot. Now it's my turn," Zangya said, a mischievous grin forming across her lips. "Bang."

A split second later, a red blast engulfed the tank and disintegrated it, sending its pieces scattering down the street and out of the village. After the explosion went off and filled the air with thick black smoke, it left behind a road littered with bodies, discarded weapons, and a burnt trench along the highway eight hundred yards long.

Upon eliminating the threat and sensing no more bandits in the area, as they'd all been killed save for one, Zangya lowered her hand and turned her attention to the village. As soon as she saw the liberated townspeople emerge from their hiding spots and begin to gather, all of them whispering as to whom their savior could possibly be, the orange haired woman smiled and waved at them. Once she did, she levitated off of the ground and took off into the clouds, where she then began a westerly flight in the direction of the other side of the continent.

The villagers didn't even have time to thank her for saving them, but they nevertheless cheered as the mysterious angel vanished over the horizon.

After getting up super early that morning at the chime of four to watch Gohan train for a little while, Zangya had then gotten herself dressed up for a big day out. Apparently her bosses over in the capital were sending her out on a job to West City to show her a new line up of dresses they wanted her to market to the public. Knowing there was a big pay behind the trade, there was no way the Hera could possibly refuse their request. However, the early morning wakeup call did mean she ended up losing a few hours of beauty sleep, leaving her slightly crabby and a little bit groggy.

Of course, while she'd been flying towards West City on what was supposed to be an eventless route, she'd unexpectedly come across a group of bandits invading a small village. Upon seeing the amount of firepower they were packing and getting a gist as to what their intentions were, the Hera then wasted no time in stepping in before things got out of hand.

"They were all being dicks anyway."

"That was a pretty fun workout," Zangya thought, feeling significantly cheered up after beating the stuffing out of every single armed assailant in that town. Exhaling pleasantly from what was more of a skip through the tulip fields than a warm-up, the woman allowed the wind to whip freely at her hair as she picked up speed towards her destination.

She was making good time either way. By her estimate, the alien warrior probably had a few minutes to get herself a cup of coffee or tea before showing up at the conference when she eventually reached town.

"Why was she worried? With clear blue skies overhead and a cool breeze licking at her skin, what could possibly ruin a perfect morning like this…?"

XXX

(Meanwhile)

Many, many miles away from the village where all the commotion had taken place, out of the way of any major civilization or community, a very important excavation project was currently underway. At a place where one of the most famous manmade landmarks stood consisting of three enormous pyramids reminiscent to the Giza Necropolis and surrounded by the remains of an ancient city, a large team of archaeologists and researchers had setup base camp.

Beyond the tents marked with the Capsule Corp. Science logos, the vehicles, and the guards keeping watch over the place for any pirates or tomb raiders that happened to be in the area, a massive hole had been dug right outside the largest of the three structures. At the bottom of this crater, where what looked to be an ancient courtyard or temple had been buried under tons of sand sat, a handful of men and women were currently hard at work. While most of them were inspecting the buildings surrounding the area, only a couple of people were tending to the main structure in the middle.

This took the form of a large, stone, cylindrical object covered in various pictures and ancient writings, which was being guarded by several stone statues set up around its perimeter. It was this very sarcophagus that the head investigator and scientist of the team was dusting down and recording all of the information she was able to read from its surface.

While the blonde haired woman was kneeling at the base of the massive structure and making note of a new set of markings, she was soon approached by the head digger at the site; a man wearing a high visibility jacket, a hard hat and goggles. Marching down the steps assembled by the crew, the middle-aged worker smiled as he watching the woman in the checkered shirt, jeans and boots carefully brush away the sand covering the symbols she was attempting to decipher.

Once it was clear, she got right on to drawing.

"Boy. I've never seen someone so in love with their work before," the man spoke, startling the woman out of her daze and drawing her gaze over to him. "I'm telling yah, Haruko, I've worked with dozens of scientists over the years, but you're probably the only one I've seen stick to her station for an entire day and a night. Seriously. You should get some rest."

The blonde haired woman now identified as Haruko chuckled and shook her head at the worker's suggestion, quickly turning back to the artifact she was charged with investigating. "No thanks, Clyde. I'm doing just fine. Besides, we're on a really tight schedule this week. If my boss doesn't get an update on our progress in the next twenty-four hours telling him if we've made a crack into figuring out exactly what this thing is, then he's going to personally come down here and chew our asses out. That's something I'd rather try to avoid." She then glanced up at the structure in front of her and looked it over. "This tomb is a major discovery for the archaeological community. I'm positive that over time, this thing will help answer some of the biggest, unsolved questions researchers and scientists have had about the true history of Ancient Egret. Perhaps it'll also become the next big attraction to this site."

"For history buffs at least," the site chief Clyde replied while nodding his head towards the sandstone mausoleum. "I imagine the universities and other archaeologists will be crying their eyes out over this whole thing when you eventually bring it back to the capital. Your name will go down in history as the one who discovered Cleopatra's lost boutique store… or whatever the hell this place actually is."

"Scholars have suspected for years that there were secret temples constructed around the bases of the three pyramids. They theorized that they were part of a larger spiritual system; a gateway to another world from which those that'd died could pass into the afterlife peacefully and without issue. Aside from serving as a tomb for the pharaohs of old and places of worship for the masses, they also served as a means for the priests to communicate with the other side," Haruko informed, before shrugging and digging her brush a little bit deeper into a line of hieroglyphics, which appeared in front of her like bones protruding from the ground. "But these are all just theories. I think this is something else."

"Well… what is it?" the brown haired worker asked, removing his hat and stepping closer so that he could crouch down alongside the head honcho. "Is it some kind of vault? A tablet? A pedestal? I'm just guessing here."

"Not exactly," the archaeologist replied, shuffling aside so that she had room to point out the various lines of text engraved upon the dusty, arcing surface. "At first I thought this was a fire pot or a talisman the priests used to record their commandments. But after looking at it closely, I now know that this is some kind of tomb. And there's a story written on it." She then looked up at her coworker with a serious look on her face. "I believe this story gives us the answer to the true purpose of the Giza Necropolis."

A smile soon pulled across Clyde's face, "Something tells me that you've been dying to talk about this."

This response drew a smirk from Haruko, "What can I say? It's been a really long night for me. You're going to love this." She turned back to the monolith and, rising to her feet, pointed at the first line of hieroglyphics that was the first chapter of the tale carved into the stone. Clyde, ears and eyes wide open, followed her as she began to read. "Long ago, the peace between the Gods of the Seventh Universe was shattered when the evil overlord Set, the God of Storms, declared war against all of creation. Desiring total control and dominion over every creature in existence, Set and his minions attempted to cover the entire universe in darkness." As she spoke, she continued to walk around the tomb while reading the pictures off of the wall. "The battle between Set and the other Gods lasted for over a hundred years until, finally, only the God of Destruction Beerus, the Protector Goddess Artemis, the Goddess of War Enyo, the Great God Izanagi, the God of Fury Odin, and the King of the Gods Ra, were the only ones left standing. Together, they defeated the great overlord Set and, with the help of the Supreme Kais, sealed his body inside the Nexus, an impenetrable tomb beneath the pyramids, as punishment for his crimes."

"Damn," Clyde chuckled when he saw how informative the pictures were becoming as the woman led them on a full lap of the enormous tomb. "Set must have been ridiculously powerful if he was able to battle all of those Gods at the same time."

"Yeah. Tell me about it," Haruko said while shaking her head in disbelief. "This is the first time I've ever heard of so many Gods rallying together to battle such a great evil. Most of them aren't even part of Egret's mythology." She then placed her finger upon a new line and continued reading, while slowly walking around the tomb. "And there's more. After the God of Storms was sealed away, the evil Minions of Set rebelled and came to earth to free their master from his retched tomb. None of the great pharaoh's armies could stop the minions… as they brought terror to all." She then narrowed her eyes as a new chapter came up. "The pharaoh then called upon the great powers of Ra and Anubis to imprison the minions here, in this tomb, where they will stay forever. If the Minions of Set should ever be freed, they will once again attempt to liberate their master from his prison, so that he can assume his rightful place as the God of Storms and bring about darkness to the universe." Lowering her hand, Haruko then breathed a sigh and rubbed her head, which had obviously been strained from her endless hours of work. "That was over twenty thousand years ago."

"Hm…" Clyde scratched his head as he took a step back and looked upon the enormous monolith in front of them, which was now casting a very eerie shadow upon them. After hearing the story that was written upon it, who wouldn't be slightly discomforted by what this structure potentially held. "So this is the tomb containing the key to unleashing the greatest evil the universe has ever seen?" He then glanced around at the statues that'd been dug up and were currently surrounding the pot. "That explains why all of these deities are watching over it." He pointed at the forms of Horus and Amun, which could be seen guarding the cylinder.

"Their services are greatly appreciated," Haruko stated, walking a little bit around the tomb before gently resting her hand against its surface. Getting a feel of the thousand year block, she then started to run her digits across the side. "We owe the Gods a lot of thanks for their hard work and sacrifices over the years… even if it's mostly myth." She then glanced back at Clyde while she continued to run her hand over the text covered wall. "A lot of the notes on this tablet also say how Anubis was a spawn of Set's evil and an inheritor of his powers. Considering he was the entity who fashioned this tomb for the God of Storms' minions, I wouldn't be surprised if he did a botched job on it.”

All of a sudden, while her fingers were running over a particular section of the wall, she suddenly pushed it in, revealing a hidden lever. Balking a little when her arm sunk into the tomb, Haruko backpedalled away as quickly as she could. Then, several moments after she jumped back, every single hieroglyph upon the tomb unexpectedly lit up and began shining a bright gold. The entire area became bathed in a celestial light, and every single worker and digger in the crater stopped doing what they were doing to look in the direction of the anomaly.

Eyes wide and bodies frozen in shock, Haruko and Clyde were soon joined by half a dozen guards. The soldiers escorting the expedition and keeping watch over the borders surrounded the hole and brought their weapons to bear, not knowing what was going to happen or what was happening right now.

The tomb continued to flash and glow like a strobe, sparks of electricity flying off of it and scaring the daylights out of the workers. Then, just when it seemed like something biblical was about to take place, the top of the tomb was suddenly popped off and the lid was sent hurtling out of the crater. As soon as it crashed into the middle of the researcher's campsite, the tomb stopped glowing, allowing smoke to rise off of its glowing hot surface.

Cautiously, Haruko, Clyde and several other workers in the area approached the tomb, quietly and carefully. Sweating bullets and trembling from head to toe, the group prepared to investigate the source of the strange abnormality; an event that was beyond anything that they were used to seeing in their line of work.

But just as the platoon's worth of archaeologists was in the process of advancing upon the open tomb, there was another flash of light followed by a loud bang as a column of blue fire spewed out of the top of the casket. The instant the flames jutted out, four human-sized figures then leapt out of the fire and, in the blink of an eye, darted towards the stunned crowd of onlookers.

Without warning or hesitation, the four shadows began indiscriminately cutting down every single person in the area. The innocent men and women in uniforms didn't even see the attack coming as one after the other they were all bifurcated or cut to pieces in a matter of seconds. Gunfire rang out here and there when the guards attempted to shoot at the black figures charging across the dig site, but their attempts to shoot the demons were futile.

They and their associates were dispatched just as easily as the first dozen people that'd been standing closest to the tomb.

By some otherworldly miracle, a frightened Haruko managed to dive behind a nearby statue standing directly beside the tomb she'd been investigating, while her friend Clyde ended up cut to pieces. Quartered from the top down, the head digger's blood and body parts were sent flying in all directions when one of the shadows shot past him in a running attack. The poor scientist clamped her hand over her mouth to stop from screaming as she watched in horror as her entire crew and the locals who'd escorted them to the place were slaughtered right before her very eyes.

In a matter of seconds, the entire campsite had been swept clean. Men's heads were lopped off of shoulders, bodies were cut in half either at the waist or right down the middle, and blood was sent splattering across the hot sands of the ancient city.

There was no saving any of them and there was absolutely no chance of escape. The attack was swift, silent, and decisive.
Five seconds later, over seventy workers and locals could be found lying in pieces across the ancient ruins, and the four shadowy figures responsible for the massacre returned to the crater from whence they’d come.

Landing several yards away from the thunderstruck Haruko's hiding place, the archaeologist was able to get her first good look at the murderers. This was a historic moment too, because not only had she born witness to an anomaly never before recorded at any other dig site, but the figures that were currently standing before her hadn’t been seen for over twenty thousand years.

There were four of them. That much was obvious. Two men and two women. However, despite each being approximately the size of a person, neither of them was human. All of them were anthropomorphic dogs, each of them bearing the characteristics of both a human and a canine, including tails, fur, faces and ears.

The first and most prominent of the four was a towering, eight foot tall, black anthropomorphic Pharaoh Hound, with a large, bulky upper body, muscular arms, and was armed with a black, Egyptian battle axe. The second male was a seven foot tall, anthropomorphic Akita male with light brown fur, an athletic warrior body, and was armed with a long, golden spear. The third, a female and apparently the leader judging from the amount of golden ornaments on her, was a slim, curvaceous, six foot tall anthropomorphic collie with light and dark brown batches of fur, a long snout, black lashes with a scar across her left eye, and was wielding a curved, sickle-like sword Haruko identified as a khopesh. The fourth and final member of the group was another female dog around the same height as the other female, and was of the Ibizan hound breed, with light brown fur and wielding two short, black staff-like batons in either hand.

While the four warriors were of different breeds, the humanoid dog creatures all wore the exact same ensemble of clothing consisting of brown shendyts around their waists, brown, revealing halter tops for the ladies, golden plated guards on their forearms, chain collars around their necks, and golden, armored nemes headpieces, which concealed their hair but allowed their ears to protrude comfortably from their crowns.

Though Haruko had no clue where the hell they'd come from or what the hell kind of species they were, she did know three things: they were insanely powerful, they were dangerous… And they were the Minions of Set.

After sheathing their weapons either at their hips or on their backs, the four humanoid dogs looked around the area they'd had the pleasure of clearing. When the largest of the four inspected the dismembered body of Clyde lying a couple yards away, the dark warrior frowned before turning towards his companions.

"Non sut… milites Pharaonis, Shiera," the imposing warrior spoke in a language that sounded very familiar to the fear struck Haruko. (These humans… they are not the pharaoh's soldiers, Shiera)

The smaller female hound also looked around at her comrades, most notably the serious collie standing alongside her, "Nam et ipsi ferre arma projectum… multo magis proficiebat quam meminerim." (They also wield projectile weaponry… much more advanced than what I remember)

"Videtur somno… diu habuimus," the big one spoke again. (It appears… we've been asleep for a long time)

The leader of the kill squad, the female collie with the scar across her eye and wearing the golden necklace and earrings, grunted indignantely before glancing over the excavation site. "Tempus est parvi momenti. Pugnatines secum dum homines non sunt nisi. Nos prius liberavi domino, Set." (It matters not how much time has passed. I could care even less about the humans. Our first priority is freeing our beloved Master Set)

A collective nod of agreement was her immediate response, followed shortly by a smirk from the Akita hybrid beside her, "Semper operari cum te, is non est?" (It's always work with you, isn't it?)

Shiera smiled, "No fessis requies, Kasim." (No rest for the weary, Kasim)

Just before the four of them could get moving however, the Ibizan woman hybrid suddenly stuck her nose in the air and sniffed. It only took a single whiff before her gaze then snapped towards the statue where Haruko was hiding.

Before the woman could even respond, the second female member of the four killers vanished with a crack of wind and appeared directly in front of the archaeologist. The researcher shrieked and fell out from behind the statue, backpedaling away as the dog woman glared down at her venomously. When Haruko turned to scramble away, the other three warriors appeared, surrounding her and blocking off all possible routes of escape.

Panicking at how fast they were, the woman's eyes darted around the four warriors as she knelt on the sand before them. Tears appearing as she feared she would be cut down by them, Haruko then watched as the scar-faced female strolled forward and knelt down in front of her.

Her long, gorgeous tail waving behind her, the serious looking Shiera narrowed her eyes, "Quid est?" (What year is it?)

Still obviously freaking out from the genocide of her crew, Haruko swallowed and shook her head, "I… I don't… understand."

Frowning, Shiera looked up at her comrades, "Patria lingua non loquitur." (She does not speak the universal tongue)

The second in command Pharaoh hound grunted while looking the pitiful looking human over, "Nos ad haec nova lingua accommodanda." (We should adapt to their new system of language then)

"Ego assentior," the Akita male spoke. (I agree)

Turning their attention back to the human scientist in the centre, the four Minions of Set brought their hands up and tapped the collars around their necks. The instant they did so, miniature blue spot lights shone off of the chains and enveloped Haruko, scanning her. After bathing her in an eerie glow for several uncomfortable seconds, the lights then vanished, leaving the group standing in a normal light once more.

"Synchronization complete," Shiera spoke. It was a result that surprised the heck out of the human scientist and had her eyes snap up at the leader. "Let's try this again. What year is it?"

Gulping nervously, Haruko's terrified gaze moved between the four warriors before landing back onto the collie in front of her. "It's… Age 774. February. Ten thousand moons after the last pharaoh according to the records."

Scrunching her face up thoughtfully, the leader of the team then rose up and turned her attention towards her companions. "It appears we've been asleep for over twenty thousand years."

"Is that a problem?" the second female asked.
The scar faced leader shook her head, "No it isn't, Tana. Just a slight inconvenience, that's all. In fact..." A then smirk formed on her face as she then turned her gaze towards the distant horizon, "This is the perfect time for us to pick up where we left off. Why don't we go see how much has changed?" She then turned heel and floated into the air, beginning a gentle flight over to the nearest ridgeline.

The other three followed suit, completely forgetting all about poor Haruko.

As soon as the four humanoid dogs left the ancient city, the blonde woman, who'd previously been sweating a river's worth of perspiration, felt her eyes roll into the back of her head before she fainted on the spot. Her body was soon lying sprawled out in the middle of what could only be described as the bloodiest massacre in history.

Landing on top of a dune several hundred meters away from the dig site, Shiera walked further out onto the plateau while the rest of her crew landed behind her. When they all touched down on the soft hill, the four ancient warriors got the perfect view of not only the other two pyramids of the Giza Necropolis, but the ocean of sand stretching out for thousands of miles in front of them. From horizon to horizon, it was nothing but a barren, lifeless wasteland with the telltale signs of mountains in the distance. From that perspective, it was safe to say that the region was pretty much empty. Save for maybe one or two tiny villages within camel walking distance of the place, it was an incredibly mesmerizing view.

Glaring out across the sands of planet earth, the leader glanced over her shoulder and smiled at her second in command. "Any objections, Daryu?"

The largest of the four canine hybrids shrugged. "None at all."

"Good. I needed to stretch my paws anyway." Exhaling deeply, Shiera quickly fixed her gaze back onto the sand dunes stretched out in front of her and raised her hands. Flexing her fingers once or twice, she then produced a substantial amount of ki and projected it forward, her power up taking the form of a blast of wind that rippled across the countryside for a kilometre in all directions. Upon doing so, she then wasted no time in getting to work.

The landscape began to shake and tremble as the female warrior proceeded to call upon an enormous amount of energy. The cataclysm causing dust and sand to rise into the air in all directions, the other three warriors behind the leader didn't even flinch when, little by little, something big began to jut out of the ground ahead of them. About three kilometres out, a fourth and even larger pyramid began to rise up out of the sands like a glorified tablet. Roughly the size of a mountain, the dusty, sand-covered structure stretched towards the sky meter by meter until it blocked out the entire sun itself.

Its appearance was marked by a tremendous earthquake that could be felt for hundreds of miles around. When it eventually rose completely out of the ground, it revealed so much more than just a pyramid five times larger than the ones already on the surface.

There was also an enormous terrace jutting out of the side of the pyramid, elevated on a block of stone and brick, with a temple and a courtyard on top of it. The most distinguishable feature of this setup on the Northern side of the pyramid facing the endless miles of desert was a large stone door into the structure, which had been barred shut by an otherworldly force.

It was this very entrance into the behemoth structure that the Minions of Set desired.

Smirking at their success, the four humanoid dogs took flight from the ridge and appeared before the pyramid entrance in the courtyard. Approaching the gateway, Shiera, Daryu, Tana and Kasim stopped before the obstacle to inspect it, until the former moved forward and placed her hand against its front. Leaving it there for several moments, giving it a thorough scan as well as a push, she then pulled away and frowned.

"Anything?" Kasim asked, adjusting the spear folded up at his hip.

The scar-faced leader shook her head. "No. The seal fashioned by the Supreme Kais is too powerful. They've made it so that only certain individuals can ever hope to open this prison... more accurately the Gods." Inspecting it carefully with her eyes as well as with her senses, the collie then turned around and faced the other members of her team. The look on her face showed how easily irritated she was at the situation. "A righteous spirit is needed to unlock this door; one that is not only pure of heart but also incredibly powerful."

Kasim snarled at that piece of information, "And where in the seven levels of hell are we going to find someone like that?"

"The only entities capable of producing a large amount of energy as well as possessing a virtuous spirit are the Supreme Kais," Daryu informed, folding his arms while looking back at the alpha of their group. "Should we travel to Otherworld and abduct one of the Kais? We could force them to unlatch this seal for us."

"No," Shiera replied immediately while holding a hand up, stopping the four in their tracks, "No. Attempting to abduct a Supreme Kai might draw the attention of Whis and the other deities. The last thing I want to do is incur the wrath of one of the primary overseers of this universe... especially Ra." She then glanced across at Kasim. "In order to do this, we're going to need to search the mortal plains; a being from this quadrant." She then turned her attention to Tana and smiled at her fellow warrior. "We need your all-seeing-eye for this task. Find one."

Smirking, the Ibizan hybrid crouched down, scooped up a handful of sand and, holding it out in front of her, allowed the mass of particles to levitate into the air and form into a sphere. It soon started to emit a strange, multicoloured aura, which formed into a transparent sphere of ki in the centre, and transformed the ball of sand into a viewing globe. In a matter of moments, all four warriors were given the exact location of where they could find a being that would enable them to unlock their master's tomb.

The globe zoomed in on a dome-shaped house in the mountains thousands of kilometers away where, after isolating the location, honed in on the figure in question. They soon saw a young, handsome, spiky haired man wearing orange and blue gi training on the grassy fields inside the globe; a smile on his face and a golden glow surrounding his body.

This was the pure-hearted, righteous spirit that they required.

Raising an eyebrow at the sight of the figure, Tana then looked across at Shiera, "A boy... here... on this planet?"

"A human?" the imposing Daryu exclaimed in disbelief.

Shiera shook her head, "No. His physical traits are different. His aura resembles that of a member of the Great Ape race from the planet Saiya," Shiera interrupted, narrowing her eyes on their target before turning to the others. "We'll hunt him down and bring him back with us... use his latent energy to seal the gateway." She then turned to her second in charge, only to notice that Daryu was staring off into the distance; the same direction their target had been located. Finding his actions suspicious, the leader nodded to him curiously, "What is it?"
The enormous dog warrior pointed towards the cloud covered horizon. "I sense a large energy signature in that direction. It's on the move… and it doesn't belong to a human."

"It seems as though there is more than one race living on this planet," Kasim said, looking just as miffed by his comrade's announcement. "How fun."

After staring towards the sky and mountains for about a minute or so, the second female member of the group cracked a smile and glanced in the alpha's direction. "Should we fly over and say hello?"

Shiera, thinking on it for a moment, cracked a smile and rolled her shoulders excitedly, "Sure. Why not?" After being out of it for over twenty thousand years, they could definitely use with a warm up.

Noticing how eager the others were to get into a fight, the leader of the group then gestured all of them to follow her and took off. When the four members of the group levitated off of the ground, they then powered up and took off at full speed, leaving the terrace outside the pyramid and rocketing towards the distant horizon.

The entity that they'd detected was on the way towards their intended target. However, while it was certainly convenient according to their schedule, the group was still interested in chasing this person down regardless.

After all, they sensed a threat. The last thing they needed was someone getting in the way of their plans.

XXX

(Elsewhere)

Having ascended to a high enough altitude that she was soaring well above cloud cover, the still moving Zangya hummed to herself as her body flew across the ocean that was the planet's atmosphere. It was a cheerful tune, one she'd heard many times before on the radio and one she felt was appropriate for the moment. After all, with a clear blue heaven above her and nothing but a stretch of white cloud ahead, it was almost like she was literally 'Walking on Sunshine'.

Continuing to soar at cruising speed, enjoying the sight of heaven all around her, the Hera then started reaching into her pocket to see if she still had all of her cash and papers on her. She needed this material if she was going to gain access to the main office. But seeing as how she was a world famous model with one of the most recognizable faces in the industry, she highly doubted that they wouldn't let her in.

However, just as she was in the process of patting down her pockets, the woman then spotted something odd in her peripheral vision and looked over to her right.

Staring across that particular flat of white cloud, the orange haired Z-fighter blinked in surprise when she suddenly saw a figure pop out of the fluffy surface of gas and perspiration. Arms folded and flying at the same speed as her while in an upright standing position, the Hera watched as the humanoid dog, a collie to be exact, smirked in her direction before sinking back into the clouds like a periscope in water.

Her form disappearing completely from sight like a phantom immediately put Zangya on edge.

"Okay… that was… weird…" Narrowing her eyes, the Hera's gaze then shot across to her left, where she suddenly saw another figure pop out of the clouds. This one flying backwards with their
The instant she did so, the clouds directly beneath her violently parted and two more dog figures shot up at her at super speed. Before Zangya could even react, the two figures crashed into her with terrific force, slamming two jumping kicks into her stomach and sending her spiraling into the sky. Spitting out blood, the blue-skinned warrior quickly recovered from the sneak attack and flipped into a normal hovering position, ceasing her ascent. The instant she turned to face her assailants, she was suddenly struck down by an attack from all sides when three of the four canine warriors charged in and assaulted her with a merciless string of hit-and-run attacks.

Their concussive blows landing with the sound of cannon shots, tearing her suit to shreds and leaving her with a series of cuts, bruises, and blood dribbling out of her nose and mouth, the winded Hera was then kicked through the clouds and sent plummeting down to earth. While descending at high speed and seeing nothing but stars and inverted colors, the discombobulated Z-fighter gritted her teeth and glared up at her attackers.

"Oh, you fuckers better make sure you kill me! Because if you don't..." Just before she could even finish her outburst, Zangya suddenly saw all four of them appear in the air above her and take aim with their hands. The sight of energy spheres appearing in front of their palms had her eyes widen in surprise, "Shit."

In a flash of light, the four humanoid dogs fired upon the stricken Zangya, who let out a cry of terror before the blasts impacted her and engulfed her in a fiery explosion. The force matching that of a concentrated nuclear blast, the assassins watched the shockwave ripple across the sky in all directions, before scattering the remains of the Z-fighter across the countryside.

Upon seeing the air clear and finding no trace of their quarry, who'd been effectively blown to pieces, the Minions of Set smiled before then turning and taking flight towards Mount Paozu.

They were on a role so far. After thousands of years of imprisonment, the instant they were let out, they slaughtered an entire camp of humans, summoned their master's tomb, and killed a surprisingly powerful Hera-seijin cruising across the planet earth. If that last fight was so easy, then this hunt for their true target was going to be a piece of cake...

(TO BE CONTINUED)
off time, Gohan’s ‘dating’ life with Videl, his day outs with his friends, and we're also kicking off the next arc with a bang.

I wonder how the heroes are going to deal with this next problem?

Until next time.

P.S: Thanks to a polite and constructive review from a reader, I've changed one of the deities in the battle to Artemis as opposed to Vishnu. I know there are a lot of people who feel strongly about this stuff, but I merely chose Vishnu from the beginning after watching the Samurai Jack episode when the Gods Odin, Ra and Vishnu were fighting against the evil that created Aku, which is the inspiration for this next villain in the story. I thought it would be a nice touch. But considering the circumstances, I'm glad to make the necessary changes for sensitivity concerns.

Power levels:

Gods (Supreme Deities):

Beerus, God of Destruction – 100,000,000,000 riki (Class 10)

Protector Goddess Artemis – 180,000,000,000 riki (Class 18)

Enyo, Goddess of War – 130,000,000,000 riki (Class 13)

Great God Izanagi – 150,000,000,000 riki (Class 15)

Odin, God of Fury – 180,000,000,000 riki (Class 18)

King of the Gods Ra – 180,000,000,000 riki (Class 18)

Whis – 150,000,000,000 riki (Class 15)

xxx

Set, God of Storms – 190,000,000,000 riki (Class 19)

xxx (Sometimes the upload craps out on my numbers. Damn auto correct. Anyway, the list that I've written for all the Gods above are in an entirely different level. The Classes you see next to the riki numbers are basically the same values that Akira used to determine the level of Beerus, Goku and Whis in the Battle of Gods movie. According to him, Goku was considered a 6, Beerus a 10, and Whis a 15. So if you use these numbers and compare them to the ones above, you have your classifications, just to show you what level each of the Gods are at. Beerus and Whis are the exact same level as they are in BoGs, in all their galaxy reducing glory. Having a few other Gods involved shows where they sit in the pecking order.)

Minions of Set (Minor Deities)

Shiera - 450,000,000 riki

Daryu – 450,000,000 riki

Tana – 200,000,000 riki

Kasim - 200,000,000 riki
Zangya – 25,000,000 riki
Zangya (Full Power) – 250,000,000 riki
Zangya (Super Hera) – 450,000,000 riki
Standing at the precipice of an asteroid in a belt orbiting around an enormous gaseous giant, two alien figures could be seen looking out over the vast cosmos of space. One of them, the most distinguishable of the pair, was a tall, effeminate male with blue skin and white hair, wearing a maroon robe complete with royal embellishments, and a long scepter with a gem floating above it. The second was a child, about a third his height, and was a very cute anthropomorphic dog with fox like features, a red and white coat, a long fluffy tail, and wearing a maroon gi with similar rectangular patterns on it. Looking at them from a distance, it was easy to guess the kind of relationship that they shared.

Unaffected by the lack of oxygen and atmosphere, the two beings simply stood there in silence, enjoying the sights, gazing at the billions of stars around them and admiring the quasar hanging in the distance. Glancing towards a comet that was also streaking past their system, both the adult and the child gazed in awe at its magnificence before the former turned his attention to the youngster standing beside him.

"Now Set... can you tell me what constellation that one is?" the man exclaimed, pointing with his staff towards a cluster of stars in the distance.

Placing a finger over their lips, the little hybrid pup beamed and pointed up at it as well. "That is the arrangement of Hephaestus of the Bas Gorton sector, just outside of the Yaquis quadrant." After outlining it with his finger the child then pointed to the collection of stars right next to it. "That one is the Sigil alignment over Martus, otherwise known as Sheikh on the planet Fromm." The youngster then gestured to the one right next to that. "And those stars in the distance are shaped into the Spear of Dehmet above Trydon."

"Well done, Set. You are right on all three counts," the soft speaking man said, appearing genuinely pleased at his pupil easily identifying the sparkling clusters before them. "I'm glad to see how far you've come in your studies. You should be very proud of yourself."

The young dog hybrid smiled up at the man and cupped his hands behind his back. "Well... I have a really good teacher."

Giggling at the child's remark, the tall blue alien then directed his gaze towards the quadrant they were in and once again breathed a deep sigh of relief. "The universe is a big and wonderful place, filled with both beauty and splendor. It's like an enormous kaleidoscope of many colors stretching infinitely in all directions. However, in spite of all of its brilliance and perfections, it is also made up of an equal amount of imperfections. This includes destruction, abhorrence and violence. They are all cogs in a continuous, ever-changing system that you or I can never hope to completely understand." He then lifted his head a little higher and gazed upon the stars above them. "As such, it is our jobs as the guardians of this reality to protect this place, to ensure that the balance is kept so that the universe can keep on growing and changing. Do you understand, Set?"
"Yes, Whis-sensei," the young, humanoid dog answered with a nod and a smile.

"Good," satisfied with his student's answer, the pair went back to staring across the stars.

After a couple of minutes of standing there and admiring the galaxy around them, the young fighter in training beside the teal being then decided to try something. Powering up so that a radioactive blue aura surrounded them, the pup held his hands out and extended his will and influence across the vacuum. Eyes flaring red as he focused his energy, Set then took hold of a group of stars and, in an incredible display of telekinetic ability, began to rearrange the specks in the distance.

Whis noticed this and glanced down at his student in surprise. Upon which he then looked up to see what constellation the young hybrid had decided to change. Over the next minute, the man watched in interest as Set took hold of the dozen plus celestial bodies and shifted them into entirely new positions, at the same time manipulating the planets and systems that they were also attached to. Eventually, after a several more moments of tweaking, the project was complete. When the child lowered his hands and powered down, both he and Whis could now see a new face staring back at them from the stars, one that the teacher recognized all too well.

"Look, master," Set exclaimed happily, his eyes sparkling with pride, "It's you."

"Ah. What a wonderful arrangement of stars. Your mastery over celestial energy is growing stronger and stronger every day," the teal skinned trainer chirped, before reaching over and placing a hand on top of his apprentice's head. Smiling happily, he then ruffled the child's head of red hair. "Thank you so much, Set. It is beautiful." A wide smile framed the effeminate man's face. "I can tell that you are going to grow up to become a great God some day."

Eyes shimmering with joy, the child raised a fist and clenched it tightly, "Oh, I want to become more than just a great God, master."

"Oh?"

"Yeah. Much more," Set answered with a vigorous nod of his head, "I want to grow up to become the greatest God that ever lived." The child then extended their hand towards the cosmos and curled his fingers around a distant star. "I'll become so great; every single person in the universe will come to know my name."

Whis, chuckling happily, rested a hand on the child's back and turned to gaze at the newest constellation floating in the sky before him. "I'm sure you will, Set. I'm sure you will." And he meant it.

As the two of them stood there and watched the universe sparkle around them, the world they were in slowly faded away…

(End Flashback)

XXX

Sitting in the dining room of Beerus's palace, surrounded by multiple glass walls of an enormous aquarium filled with countless species of fish, the source of the visual recount was currently sitting at the table enjoying a spot of breakfast. With a plate of fillets and vegetables in front of him and his chair turned side-on to the counter, the teacher of the present God of Destruction, Whis, was staring up at an enormous hologram being projected by his staff.

The gem at the end of the scepter glowing brightly, the effeminate male allowed the image of himself and his former student to fade away. Once the projection dissipated seconds later, a weary sigh escaped his lips as he then allowed a gentle smile to cross his face. Dispelling his staff so that he could free up his hands, the man then brought his left leg up and crossed it over his right, upon which he rested his arm atop the table and stared across the room thoughtfully.

"It almost seems like it was yesterday when we were standing together on that cliff," Whis spoke to himself, his expression becoming solemn as he thought about days long past. "Even if it is just a distant memory…"

Over his millions of years of existence, Whis had been the teacher, mentor and assistant to many of the Gods in history. The most recent prodigy he'd taken on as an apprentice is the widely known and feared current deity of destruction Beerus, who was right now undergoing one of his hibernation cycles up in the temple. He was a brilliant student and played his role exceedingly well as an entity of devastation and ruin, responsible for keeping the balance in his administration zone, even if he was a little bit conceited in his position.

However, the one student that Whis could never forget, due to their role in the universe's greatest conflict ever waged and the strong connection he had with them, was his former student Set, the God of Storms. It was a face he'd come to know over countless lifetimes, not just because he'd raised and trained them since they were a pup, but also because Set had been the first student he'd ever had.

The child had been his greatest achievement as an instructor… and also his greatest failure.

It was a truth that filled Whis's heart with sadness and grief as the attendant picked up his fork and slowly began to pick at his food.

"I don't think I'll ever be able to live that one down," the old teacher whispered, collecting up a fillet with some vegetables, and plopping it into his mouth.

As he dined away on his small feast, the attendant couldn't help but wonder what had steered his phenomenally talented and kindest student down the path of darkness. It was a thought that continued to plague his mind all the way through breakfast and the walk he decided to take in the gardens outside of Beerus's castle later that morning…

XXX

(Sometime later)

(Back on Earth)

Sweat dripping down his face, Gohan allowed for a few moments to catch his breath following the vigorous round of training he'd just undertaken. Moving his arms around and bringing them down in a tai chi motion, a long exhale followed by his eyes closing allowed the demi-Saiyan to find a sense of equilibrium with his being. Upon settling his jumbled nerves, he then looked up, faced the mountains of his countryside stretched out in front of him, before turning heel and marching back towards his home. Along the way the spiky haired warrior took a moment to stretch and relieve his body of the excess weight he'd used for his session.

Bringing his right hand around, the teenage warrior pressed it against his wrist band and, encasing the band in a bright orange glow, quickly lowered the installed weight to a manageable level. In an instant, the demi-Saiyan felt over a hundred tons of mass leave the fabric, allowing him to continue on with dispelling the rest of it. "Ah yes. That's much better." Pushing himself to the limits of his body garnered some excellent results from his Saiyan cells.
Feeling he'd made great progress that morning, the young warrior decided it was time for a nice, fulfilling breakfast. Smelling his mother had already begun cooking for the family, the spiky haired Saiyan made a beeline straight for the house. Along the way, he spotted the familiar face of Piccolo watching him from the oak standing near their house. When the teen waved to him, the Namekian nodded in response, closed his eyes and continued to stand there with his arms folded, as per the usual routine.

Pleased to see his family's most regular sentry had dropped by to check up on them, Gohan then let himself into the house and immediately headed towards the kitchen. It was there he found his mother standing over the stove, cooking beans, toasting bread and steaming rice.

"Mm. Looks good," the demi-Saiyan exclaimed, catching sight of the dozen dishes she'd already prepared and covered to keep warm. When his mother looked at him and away from her work, the teenager smiled, "All those toasted egg baskets… are we celebrating something?"

Chi-Chi smiled, "Not anything in particular. But seeing as how it's the start of a new week, I was thinking of making you and Goten something extra special." Returning her attention to working the frying pan, the woman hummed pleasantly as she proceeded to toss the omelets. "I'm guessing Zangya has already taken off?"

"Yep. She left over an hour ago for West City… said something about wanting to get into town early to hit the coffee club."

"Hm. Shame," the Son mother replied, exhaling after she did so. "I was planning on making her something good for the trip, but seeing as how she's already gone. I'll set my alarm clock early next time so I can catch her out the front door."

Hearing the pan pop and sizzle as the spatula scratched over its surface, Gohan gave a lighthearted chuckle as he slowly moved towards the corridor. "Don't strain yourself too much. You already do more than enough around the house. The last thing we want is for you to pass out from overworking."

"Nonsense. I've got energy to burn. More than enough to give even you super powered Saiyans a run for your money," the gutsy woman replied while pumping her bicep in a very gung-ho manner. Just as the spiky haired warrior was about to head off to another part of the house, Chi-Chi then pulled away from her work station and craned her head around the corner. "By the way, have you seen your brother anywhere? I went to check on him a few minutes ago but he wasn't in his room."

After all, that child really loved his eggs and bacon. A mere whiff of them could send him into a frenzy.

Stretching out his senses to check out the area surrounding their domicile, the demi-Saiyan quickly glanced back at the raven haired woman and smiled, "I think he snuck out to go check on Icarus up in his cave. I'm sure he'll be back soon."

"Oh. Okay," Chi-Chi replied, before quickly returning to her task. "As long as he's still in the area, then that's fine. The last thing I want him to do is to run off to some other part of the mountain on an empty stomach." With that remark made, the woman emptied the frying pan into her eleventh plate and moved it to where the others were, allowing Gohan to head over to his bedroom to check his computer.

The way their morning was going, it was shaping up to be a really good start to the week.

XXX
As Gohan and Chi-Chi were preparing breakfast indoors, out in the woods just a stone's throw away from the house, a casually dressed Goten could be seen making his way up the trail towards the small cave belonging to their resident dragon. Panting excitedly as he sprinted up the path and around trees, the child soon skidded to a halt outside the entrance to the cavern. Upon which he sucked in his breath, leaned forward, placed his hands on his knees and looked into the makeshift home.

"Hey, Icarus. Come here boy," Goten exclaimed, grinning from ear to ear as he waited for a response. "Guess who's come to visit."

As soon as his voice was done echoing off of the walls, the child saw the head of a creature resting in the middle of the earthly home perk up and start lumbering towards the exit. The moment he stepped through the stone archway, the pink skinned reptile was instantly greeted by a wash of sunlight and the cheerful smile of his best friend's younger brother. Like a puppy, Icarus happily wagged his tail as he looked down upon the child in the blue Emperor's garb.

Giggling when the dragon chirped in greeting, Goten quickly rushed up to their family friend and gave him a hug, "Hey there, boy. Did you miss me?" When the dragon squawked, the young half-Saiyan laughed and scratched the underside of his neck affectionately. "Ha-ha. I'm happy to see you too." Speedily swinging up onto Icarus's back as if he were mounting a saddle, the child then gave his friend a comforting pat on the side. "Come on. Mum's making us a big breakfast."

The pink dragon chirped and wasted no time in turning to the path ahead. With a destination planned, Icarus started on a slow trek back down the hill. However, just as he was beginning to move, the reptile stopped when, out of nowhere, he sensed an unpleasant aura fall over them and gave an angry growl towards the canopy.

Surprised at the dragon's sudden display of aggression, Goten leaned over to look into his friend's eyes. "Huh? Icarus? What's wrong?" He then looked up to see exactly what his companion was looking at.

As soon as his eyes landed on the dirt path through the forest, the child watched as a shadowy figure descended from the sky and landed directly in the center of the road. Narrowing his eyes at the stranger, Goten was able to make out from his distance an anthropomorphic female collie staring back at him. Dressed in Egyptian garb with a fluffy tail waving behind her and a scar across her left eye, the figure looked the exact opposite of a friendly canine, as they were currently leering in the child's direction with a foul air radiating off of her.

Having to hold Icarus back when the dragon bucked and snarled angrily, the demi-Saiyan spoke up, "Hey! Who are you?"

The brown haired warrior of old smirked, "Oh… just a passer taking in the sights." Unfolding her arms and leaving them at her sides, Shiera then began to march towards the dragon and his rider, eyes flickering with evil intent. "Unfortunately, since this mountain area is so big, I find myself to be a little bit lost." Along the way, the warrior drew the curved sickle-sword from her back and began dragging the tip along the ground, a sight that had Icarus take a big step back and caused sweat to begin building on Goten's face.

The dog warrior grinned maliciously, "Do you think you could give me some directions, young one?"

XXX
Back at the house, Gohan and Chi-Chi were just making the final preparations for breakfast. With the oldest son helping his mother to cook the vegetables, the pair worked in tandem to lay out the table and move all of the dishes over to it. Looking at it from afar, the whole thing was turning out to be quite the impressive spread. After all, the Son mother wouldn’t accept anything less in her household but the best for her family.

Even the most meager of tasks was handled with the utmost precision and care.

But just as they were finishing up with moving the covered dishes over to the large table in the center of the room, the half-Saiyan warrior adorned in the orange and blue gi suddenly stopped and looked up with a start. His actions resulting in a glass being knocked to the ground, the young adult's eyes snapped in the direction of the forests, drawing an immediately concerned glance from Chi-Chi.

"G-Gohan? What's the matter?" the startled parent asked.

The half-Saiyan’s expression scrunched up into one of unease, "Something's wrong." Without another word, Gohan quickly dropped whatever it was he was carrying onto the table and made a dash towards the front door. His mother falling behind him, the teenager threw open the entrance and started to rush out onto the grass.

He only got about five feet when he stumbled to a stop, his gaze falling upon the most unexpected of sights.

"What the-?" his partially asked question left his lips when he saw a female, humanoid Ibizan Hound in a skirt and halter top smiling back at him a few yards away.

Baffled by the sight of the person, Gohan then sensed his mother come up from behind and quickly held his arm out, halting her in her tracks.

"What's going on?" the Son woman asked, her attention quickly fixing on the intruder as well. The sight of the figure had her gaze narrow dangerously. Being the tough, confident fighter that she was in her own right, her response was almost instinctual, "Who is that?"

"I don't know," the intently glaring Gohan responded as he felt Piccolo rush over to stand alongside him. Backed up by the caped fighter, the demi-Saiyan wasted no time in addressing his instructor in regards to the person in front of them. "Where the heck did she come from? Do you know?"

"I don't know," the Namekian responded, looking just as put-off and battle ready as the Saiyan next to him. "She just dropped in out of nowhere. I didn't even sense her until she was standing just a few feet away from the house." Whenever something like that happened, the man knew automatically that something bad was going to happen.

Whoever this person was looked like they meant serious business judging from their smug expression and cowl.

A bead of sweat trickling down the side of Gohan's head, the young adult gritted his teeth when he noticed something off about their visitor. "Why can't I sense her energy? Is she suppressing it?"

"Doesn't look like it from where I'm standing," the Namekian answered, clenching his fists tightly as he maintained a defensive position. "If she was, then we would still be able to sense it. But I'm getting nothing."

As the group stood out there on the front lawn wondering where this newcomer had come from, they suddenly saw the female dog hybrid bring her arms out from behind her and, after balling her fists, suddenly summoned two black short sticks from her gauntlets. The instant the weapons shot out of her sleeves, the batons became enveloped in blue fire, alerting the trio to danger.

Sensing hostilities growing fast, Gohan gently pushed Chi-Chi behind him. "Mum. Get inside. Piccolo and I will take care of this." However, just before any of them could take action against the threat, the three fighters suddenly heard footsteps echoing out from the house and glanced over their shoulders.

When they did, they saw a second hybrid dog, an Akita carrying a golden spear, stroll out from the shadows of the hall to block the entrance. Carrying an empty plate of what used to be eggs, beans and bacon from the table, the anthropomorphic intruder picked up the last three strips sitting on it and ate them, before then chucking the plate across the lawn.

While chewing on the food, the dog warrior leered threateningly. "That was a terrific feast. Most exquisite." He then burped into his hand, "Got anything else?"

After staring at the dog for several moments and taking note of what he'd just said, Chi-Chi's eyes narrowed dangerously, "Son of a bitch just ate our breakfast." With that thought in mind, the woman spun around to face the female warrior standing on their front lawn. "Okay, you moochers. I'm only going to say this once; get the hell off of my property."

The woman with the two flaming weapons chuckled, "What makes you think we're going to take orders from a measly human?"

"Oh-ho. So it's going to be like that, is it?" Chi-Chi asked before taking a fighting stance. "Fine then! If you're not going to leave quietly, then I'm just going to have to tie a leash around your collars and drag your furry behinds out of here myself!" Despite the fact that she was standing beside two of the most powerful warriors on the face of the planet, she was still willing to pitch in even if she was a little bit out of their league.

The female Ibizan hybrid chuckled, "Heh. You're a funny human." She then nodded towards her in a conceited manner, "But our business is not with you, raven haired shrew." She then directed her mischievous gaze towards the spiky haired warrior in the middle. "We're here for him." It was an announcement that had Gohan look up in momentary confusion.

Realizing what their intentions were, Chi-Chi reacted furiously. "Like hell you are! If you think you can come to our home, eat our food and threaten my family, then you've got another thing-"

Merely glancing in the angry woman's direction, Tana gave her one last look before, without warning, she inhaled, pursed her lips, and breathed out sharply. Before either of the three could react, a powerful gust of wind was fired from the humanoid dog's lips like a cannon and slammed into Chi-Chi at blinding speed, sending her flying off her feet. She landed back first against the wall right next to her home's entrance, bounced off of it, and hit the ground a split second later.

Gohan and Piccolo looked back in alarm. When they saw the mother had been knocked out cold, they then spun around to glare across at the one who shot at her.

"There. That's better," Tana exclaimed, shooting the pair a menacing grin, "Now I don't have to listen to that harpy's incessant screeching anymore."

"You… You'll pay for that!" Gohan snarled, his knuckles popping as his fists clenched.

However, just before the demi-Saiyan was about to launch himself into action and start beating the snot out of their uninvited guests, he suddenly saw a second female dog teleport into view alongside the one in front of them. Her appearance catching them off guard, both Gohan and Piccolo saw the newcomer, a scar-faced collie humanoid, march forward and give the pair a once over.

"It seems you two have started the festivities without me, Tana… Kasim," Shiera spoke, throwing the Z-warriors a look before then glancing to the girl on her right.

The Ibizan hybrid gave a playful smirk. "Sorry, chief. You were taking your time up in the hills, so I decided to jump in and kick start the introductions. Kasim on the other hand went and helped himself to the buffet inside." After seeing her colleague by the door shrug and look away nonchalantly, she then turned her attention back to the opposing fighters on the green. "Hmph. This is a surprise if I ever saw one; three different races sharing the same territory: a human, a Namekian, and a half-breed. This planet really has changed over the last twenty thousand years."

Shiera chuckled in agreement, "If you count the Hera-seijin we killed on the way over here that bumps the number up to four."

It was this announcement that had Gohan’s eyes widen in horror and his arms drop, "Z-Zangya?" Even his teacher appeared bewildered at the remark.

"Oh… so you knew that orange haired pixie?" Tana asked, continuing to keep her weapons out as she leered at the Saiyan and his Namekian comrade. "Don't worry. I'm sure she's in a better place now. Seeing how filthy and disgusting this planet is, I think we did that colorful wench a favor."

Fists balling tighter and tighter with every word the woman spoke prompted Gohan's energy levels to start climbing at an alarming rate. Sensing the boy's anger and watching as bolts of electricity started to shoot off of him, Piccolo gave his student a weary glance whereas the dog hybrids surrounding the group merely perked up in interest. The sight of the boy's growing anger brought a glimmer of mischief to the leader's eyes, as she quickly deduced what was causing the warrior's energy to spike.

This was exactly what she wanted to see.

"It seems that we are in good fortunes today, Tana," Shiera proceeded, getting her first good look at the one that they were hunting. Taking in his outlandish appearance, spiky hair, and state of dress, the collie cracked a foul smile and cocked her head. "Your all seeing eye technique wasn't lying after all. This boy has an enormous amount of potential energy inside of him… more than in any mortal I've ever felt before."

"And a pure spirit to boot. What are the odds?" Tana added, looking on smugly as the pair in the center glared right back at them.

Rolling her shoulders to limber herself up for the main event, the curly haired warrior exhaled deeply and slowly moved away from her partner. "I suppose this means our little search has finally come to an end. Let's bag this monkey and take him back to the pyramid for the ceremony. I'm certain our master is growing quite impatient waiting for us to unlock the door." Once she'd stepped far enough away so that there was enough space between her and her teammate, the scar-faced collie then brought out the bundle she was carrying behind her and held it up for all to see. The sight of the item she was holding knocked Gohan off his rail and Piccolo balk in shock. "By the way, I think this one belongs to you."

Easily recognizing the child she was holding, the demi-Saiyan reacted in alarm. "Goten!" the he shouted, seeing his young sibling hanging by his belt from the woman's grip.
"Don't worry. He's not dead," Shiera informed, before then shaking the child a little and eliciting a low moan from him. It was then she threw the unconscious kid an intrigued smile, "I'm actually thinking of keeping him as a pet. What do you say?" When she saw their quarry's expression become infuriated once again, the canine raised an eyebrow, "No?"

"Let go of him!" Gohan barked.

Dangling the young hybrid from her hand tauntingly for a couple seconds longer, the hybrid collie threw the teen a sickening grin, "You want him back? Fine." She then wordlessly tossed the child into the air and towards the two fighters.

Reacting instantly, Gohan stepped forward and held his arms out to catch his unconscious brother. But just as the child was beginning his descent towards the ground, the dog that threw him suddenly thrust her hand forward and unleashed a powerful Kiai at her target. The invisible blast smashed the older sibling in the chest with a deafening thunderclap and sent him blasting through every single wall of the house behind him.

Exploding out the other side, the teenage warrior wound up bouncing across a couple of hills before crashing at the base of a ditch, where his body disappeared under a cloud of rubble and smoke.

The Namekian, catching Goten in place of his brother, spun around and looked through the hole in the building in shock, "Gohan!" As soon as he realized his student had been given the mother of all sucker punches, Piccolo wasted no time and threw himself into action.

Setting Goten to the ground, the green warrior charged straight towards the two women across the way. He attacked the leader first, only for her to be swiftly replaced by the dog with the flaming batons. Piccolo's fist swung out at Tana as soon as he was in range, only to miss when she rocketed up into the sky in a blur of movement. Reacting instantly, the Z-fighter gave chase. But as soon as he did, the Akita hybrid leaning against the door in the background went straight after the Namekian, drawing his spear and leaping into the sky.

Shiera meanwhile, still standing comfortably on the grass patch with her arm lowered back to her side, smirked as she watched the battle with the former guardian of earth unfold overhead.

When Piccolo eventually caught up with Tana, he began trading blows with her. Punches and kicks cut through the air in a blur of motion, illustrating the speed both fighters were moving. Though the warrior from Namek did manage to land a few hits, all of them were either blocked or parried by his foe, and thanks to the flaming batons she had on her, Piccolo had to concentrate even harder to avoid them. Ducking and swaying her strikes, the Z-fighter was so focused on evading her attacks he completely missed Kasim coming up from below at bullet speed to knee him in the stomach. The blow landed with an almighty crack, causing Piccolo to hunch over the dog's knee in shock before receiving a kick across the face from the female hybrid he was also battling.

Working in tandem, both Tana and Kasim worked the Namekian over from two sides, smacking him left and right, and slashing into him with their weapons. Caught in the middle, Piccolo attempted to counter their attacks as best as he could, only to get blindsided when Tana came in from his left with a swing of her baton to his neck. Though he managed to dodge it, the green fighter couldn't avoid the blow that came from behind when the Akita, diving down from up high, nailed him in the back with a powerful swing of his spear. The metal staff slammed into the Namekian's spine, connecting with a loud 'clang' and drawing a cry of agony from the green defender as he was sent plummeting towards the ground. Piccolo ended up crashing into the forest just outside of the Son household, punching a massive crater into the landscape and burying him under a ton of rubble and wood.
After grinning triumphantly at downing yet another adversary, the two hybrid dogs then went on to back up their superior in her battle with the half-Saiyan.

By the time Gohan managed to pull himself out of the hole he'd made in the hillside, the teen found he was now facing off against four opponents. Not only was the scar-faced collie joined by a much larger Pharaoh hound hybrid with a dark complexion and massive build, he was also facing off against the other two warriors.

From what he sensed, not only had his mother and brother been knocked out, but so had Piccolo. Right then, the demi-Saiyan knew that he was in trouble.

"Who the heck are these guys?" Gohan thought, his body battered and blood trickling out of the corner of his mouth. When he looked from one smug face to the next, sweat started to break out on his forehead as he got a full scope of what he was up against.

"They're definitely not human… and they don't seem like they're artificial either."

Exactly where in the world had they come from?

Deciding to find these answers out for himself, the teen gritted his teeth and snarled at his four adversaries. "What the heck are you… and why the hell can't I sense your energy?"

The leader of the group, Shiera, smirked at the baffled youngster and tipped her head back ever so slightly. "You can't sense us because we are superior beings; deities bestowed with otherworldly powers by our benevolent master; Set." The woman angled her gaze she leered across at the concerned looking Saiyan. "Unlike you mortals, the four of us possess the coveted energy source known by many in the universe as celestial energy, or God ki if you will. It is far more potent than most ki used by other races and, as such, cannot be sensed by other living organisms." She then gestured to him confidently. "In other words… against the four of us, you don't stand a chance."

Gohan's eyes narrowed seriously, "Oh yeah? Well, we'll just see about that!" Straightening up, the young fighter balled his fists and started to gather energy as quickly as possible.

The four warriors formed up in front of the Saiyan steeled when they sensed their opponent's ki begin to rise, instantly putting them on edge.

The ground shook and trembled for several seconds, causing several dozen stones surrounding the young fighter to steadily rise up off of the ground. Then, just as the display started to reach a breaking point, Gohan took a deep breath and hollered out at the top of his lungs. In an instant, a golden aura exploded off of him along with currents of blue electricity, which ran up his body to his hair, and sharpened, spiked up and turned his gravity defying locks blonde. His sudden transformation to the second level of Super Saiyan was marked by a large shockwave that punched a crater in the ground beneath him and disintegrated a lot of the earth that managed to blast into the air.

It was a spectacular sight.

However, the awe-inspiring magnitude of his leap to Super Saiyan 2 was cut short when, without warning, two of the warriors in front of Gohan vanished in a blur of movement and dashed at him at blinding speed. The demi-Saiyan, while in the middle of powering up, could only gasp in surprise before two fists buried into his stomach, causing him to reel forward in shock as the air was literally knocked out of his lungs.

A split second later, Shiera kicked the teen's feet out from under him, sending the golden warrior into a horizontal barrel roll before Daryu grabbed him by the waist, cocked his body back and chucked Gohan towards a distant hill like he was throwing a football. The winded Saiyan was sent bouncing along the uneven landscape until he managed to regain his bearings, rolling back onto his feet and spinning around, hands held up defensively.

The second he was up, Gohan coughed up blood and glared ahead of him in alarm. "Damn it. They attacked me while I was in the middle of transforming."

No one had ever done that before. Ever.

Recovering as quickly as he could from the underhanded blow, the Super Saiyan 2 then saw the other dog warriors charging at him side-by-side. Leaping to his feet, the boy quickly took a defensive stance and prepared for battle, only to suddenly get elbowed in the back by Shiera teleporting behind him, driving the blow in with a sickening crack. Crying out in pain, Gohan then received a powerful knee to the stomach from Daryu appearing in front of him before the hound followed up with a hook across his face. The second he was hit, the teenager suddenly had his arm grabbed by Kasim and promptly dragged through the air.

The Akita threw him straight into Shiera, who greeted the dazed boy with a powerful body shot that caught him in the air. As soon as their target was set up, Tana appeared next and kicked Gohan in the face, sending him spinning into the sky. The teen eventually hit the ground a full kilometer away, where he bounced once and landed on his feet.

The four dog warriors yelled out as they flew after him along the ground in jet formation. Spotting their approach, Gohan stood up and dashed towards them with a battle cry, sprinting across the fields faster than the Flash himself.

Seeing the teenager coming to meet them half way, Shiera smirked and vanished in a blur, allowing Daryu to take the lead.

The second he was in reach, Gohan hit the brakes. Sliding on his feet along the grass, the boy ducked under a clothes-line attempt from Daryu and, cocking his fist back at the same time, drove a punch straight across Kasim's face, sending the dog into the ground. After kicking Tana in the stomach and knocking her tumbling across the field, the Super Saiyan 2 vanished in a golden flash, avoiding Daryu swinging at him from behind with his axe.

Missing, the Pharaoh hound looked up in alarm and spun around, where he saw his foe reappear directly behind him. Yelling out, the warrior stabbed at him with a thrusting motion, only to see Gohan sway to the side, avoiding his flaming battle axe and, cocking a glowing arm up, sliced down and chopped the dog's hand off.

Upon effectively disarming the massive canine of his weapon, which dropped uselessly to the floor, the half-Saiyan then brought his still glowing arm around and, swinging it across, carved through his opponent a second time; damn near cutting the demon in half in a similar manner he'd done to the Cell Juniors all those years ago.

The massive dog screamed out in agony, his body sliced open and beginning to crumple to the ground in defeat. However, just when it looked like it was all over, the grievous wounds the hulking dog suffered suddenly began spewing out black fire that, a split second later, healed over and regenerated his missing limb. As soon as his hand grew back and his wound healed, Daryu reached down, grabbed up his axe, and threw a retaliatory swing up at Gohan.

Stunned at how ridiculously fast the hound regenerated, the demi-Saiyan ducked just in time to avoid the decapitating blow, only to get kicked in the face and sent rolling across the grass. When he eventually skidded to a stop on all fours, the teen now had a black eye and blood trickling out of his nose.
"What the?"

Sensing an attack coming from behind, Gohan spun around and fired a full powered energy blast on instinct. Exploding from his hand in a blinding flash, his attack shot towards an approaching Kasim like a missile. Catching the dog off guard, the energy beam slammed into the warrior's side and took a massive chunk out of his torso as it ripped past him several times faster than light. The sight of the glorious hit had the demi-Saiyan grin in success.

However, just when it seemed like the Akita would fall, the once surprised hybrid grinned as black fire filled the open wound and his body regenerated. As soon as the gap was filled, the dog stabbed out at Gohan with his spear, shocking the boy and forcing him to leap into the sky and avoid the weapon that impacted the ground.

"What in the world are they… immortal?" the demi-Saiyan asked, unable to believe what was happening.

As he continued retreating backwards towards the clouds as fast as he could, the teen was unable to see Shiera teleporting directly into his path. Her fingers locked and held overhead, the woman then swung down and slammed a killer blow into Gohan's back, an impact that generated a loud shockwave and drew a cry of pain from the target. The force of the attack sent the boy hurtling towards the ground, which he hit with the force of a meteorite. His impact shook the countryside and filled the air with dust and debris.

Before the cloud could even completely settle, the Minions of Set wasted no time in leaping into the crater and, upon surrounding the young warrior lying sprawled out in the center of it, dropped down and began beating the crap out of him. Punches were driven into the Saiyan at ridiculous speed, pummeling the boy's upper body mercilessly. They were actually attacking the stunned Gohan so quickly that it almost looked like the young warrior was having a seizure, his body twisting, jerking and contorting this way and that over and over again as a string of grunts and shouts left his lips.

Blood splattering across the crater as the damage piled on, Gohan soon became fed up of literally being beaten into the ground and, just when it looked like he was about to fold, the teenager's eyes lit up yellow and, with a howl of rage, he powered up and unleashed a shockwave outwards in the form of a dome shaped explosion of energy.

Reacting instantly, the team of warriors leapt away for safety as the ditch the warrior had formed combusted, sending rubble flying in all directions. As soon as they were out of range, the minions watched as the Saiyan, bathed in a golden aura and blue electricity, floated out of the hole and turned his glare on the leader. With a menacing snarl, he dove straight at her, causing the collie to grit her teeth and leap out of the way when his fist buried into the floor, punching a second hole into the valley five hundred yards wide.

Growling at the miss, with his golden energy and lightning spewing off of him like wild fire, and showing just how enraged he was, the boy flew after Shiera with the intent to rip her apart.

The female collie up in the sky smirked when the Saiyan pursued her and dove back to the ground when he took a swing. She then began backpedaling along the field, skipping left to right and avoiding multiple blows that were sent chasing after her. When a punch came flying her way in one of Gohan's wide swings, she blocked it and countered. But the teen parried it and kneed her in return. The blow sent the woman blasting back along the grass before the demi-Saiyan followed up with another blow.

However, just before his fist could land, the teen ended up getting blindsided by the others. In a blur of movement, the three other minions began assaulting Gohan with a vicious string of attacks. The young Ascended Saiyan was smacked around left and right, managing to block most of their hits until Shiera jumped in and began adding her own punches and kicks to the mix. She quickly caught Gohan while he was blocking simultaneous blows from Daryu and Tana, managing to bury a kick into his stomach and an uppercut to his chin.

While the boy was hurtling high into the sky, all four minions dropped to the ground and Shiera, taking aim with her fingers like a pistol, fired four simultaneous energy blasts at the boy. With superb accuracy, the bolts slammed into the teen's wrists and ankles, transforming into bands that wrapped around his limbs like cuffs and suspended him in midair. As soon as they were locked, Daryu, Tana and Kasim threw their hands up and launched golden energy chains after their quarry, catching them around the bands on his limbs and trapping him.

Gritting his teeth in alarm, Gohan then started fighting to try and break free. Snarling and shouting painfully, the Super Saiyan 2 powered up and attempted to get loose. However, the three dog warriors kept their target anchored, holding him down with the energy chains and preventing him from leaving.

As the half-Saiyan fought, struggling fruitlessly against the ropes that were now binding him, Shiera suddenly flew up to meet their prey and stopped directly in front of him. The teen stopped writhing long enough to allow the female collie to speak with him. "You put up a good fight. One on one, you'd definitely be able to beat us. But thanks to our superior numbers and the immortality granted to us by our master, you don't have a hope in hell of beating us."

Becoming more enraged, the boy powered up a second time and attempted to break their hold on him. After a few more seconds of futile struggling though, the leader of Set's minions cocked back her right hand and, taking aim with index and middle finger, drove it straight into the center of his chest. The impact of her digits caused a golden ripple to go over Gohan's body and in a matter of moments, the teen's eyes rolled in the back of his head and his entire body went limp.

However, while he did look like he'd been knocked unconscious, the young warrior was still in Super Saiyan 2 mode. While his aura faded, the transformation didn't.

Smiling at successfully hitting the chi point needed to keep him frozen Shiera then looked down and gestured for her three companions to follow. Flying up to join their leader, the three Minions of Set then dispelled the chains binding their target and allowed their leader to take command of the situation once again. Tapping the paralyzed Gohan in the head, the collie suspended the rigid statue of a Saiyan in the air horizontal to the ground. Then, as soon as the entire team was assembled, the hybrid dogs grabbed onto each other's hands and, focusing intently, vanished in a puff of black smoke.

XXX

(Meanwhile)

(Capsule Corp.)

All was well over in West City. The birds were singing outside of the main building and the sky was clear. With the conditions so pristine and perfect, the Briefs family had decided to take their breakfast outside and onto their front lawn, where they could breathe the fresh air and smell the roses in the garden nearby.

Mrs. Briefs had done the honors of bringing along her cooking toolkit and set it right alongside the outdoor table, where she proceeded to make her daughter's family and her husband some delicious waffles, pancakes and oatmeal. Bulma had opted for the healthiest option and included a fruit salad with her morning tea. Vegeta and Trunks on the other hand were simply gorging on whatever the hell was laid out in front of them, not giving a damn about the consequences of their intake.

Things started off incredibly well for all of them, and since a majority of the clan was still dressed in their sleeping wear, Vegeta included, they made it look as though nothing out of this world was going to happen. Heck, every single one of them was looking forward to a quiet, uneventful day at home, with the President planning to spend her time in the office getting up to date on any projects or expeditions her company was conducting.

But then, just as Vegeta was about to start on his third helping of waffles and pancakes for that morning, the man suddenly paused when he picked up a disturbance in the air. Slapping his fork onto the table and getting to his feet quickly, his gaze immediately shot in an Easterly direction.

It was this sight that instantly had Bulma's attention. "What's up Vegeta? Do you want something?"

"Dad?" Trunks murmured, also surprised by his father's actions.

Eyes narrowing after the initial alarm, the Prince of Saiyans clenched his teeth tightly. "What the heck is Gohan doing over there? His energy level just exploded and now it's close to flat lining."

There was no way he or any of the other Z-fighters could've missed a jump like that.

After a couple of hours of feeling the brat training from a distance and then sensing him stop for the morning, the kid then maxed out Super Saiyan 2 from out of nowhere and just kept on going. From the very sharp and powerful influxes the royal was experiencing, it almost felt like the demi-Saiyan was in distress. Then, about a couple minutes later, his power level just dropped like a stone and became stagnant.

Judging from the readings he was able to get, Vegeta knew right away that Gohan was in trouble and with any luck… the other members of their group knew it too…”

XXX

(A couple minutes later)

(In the desert)

Having arrived back on the terrace where they'd set off from earlier that day, the Minions of Set wasted no time in maneuvering their floating, paralyzed trophy over to the large, stone gateway that was the entrance to the pyramid. Utilizing the various markings carved into the floor around them as guidelines, they were able to locate the point where the person or power source would need to stand in order for their energy to be transferred into the door.

Since they didn't have a God or a Kai who was willing to open the lock for them, the minions knew that they were going to have to jimmy it open using an old-fashioned method. Thanks to the knowledge bestowed to them by their all powerful master, they knew exactly what they had to do in order to pull this off.

"How long do you think this process will take?" Daryu asked, glancing across at their leader as she walked their prisoner to his station.

Kasim, folding his arms where he stood, also gave the unconscious Saiyan an uncomfortable glare, "Considering he's mortal, I wouldn't be surprised if it took a few days."
Grunting as she directed the hovering teen a little further forward, Shiera then looked back at the others seriously. "It would take only a couple of seconds for one of the Gods or Kais to open this gateway. However, since we're using an alternative means of removing the seal, the process should only take about half an hour… give or take a few minutes." She then fixed her attention upon the seemingly comatose Saiyan. "Until then, it is up to us to guard this platform and protect the key. We wouldn't want any uninvited guests dropping by and disturbing us during the ceremony."

Positioning Gohan a few yards away from the entrance and moving him about, Shiera then instructed her subordinates into position. Forming into a semi-circle behind the Super Saiyan a few more yards away, they then slapped their hands together into four differing hand seals.

"Let us begin," Shiera spoke, earning a nod of acknowledgement from the other three minor deities around her.

After flipping through several more signs reminiscent of symbols seen etched into the ruins, the Minions of Set then gripped their wrists and held their palms forward, firing a telekinetic wave of energy towards the unconscious warrior. This took the form of a ripple of dust across the surface of the terrace.

This blast struck the boy, ruffling his hair and clothes, and forcibly drew on the fighter's energy. The signature golden aura and electric bio-field characteristic of his Ascended Saiyan form sprang up and began radiating off of him. At first the fluctuation was normal. But then, all of a sudden, the cloak surrounding him left his body and began streaming towards the door like water from a river. Moments later, that flow of translucent ki struck the center of the gate, where a perfectly carved block of stone could be seen sitting in the center of it.

Aura continuing to involuntarily pour off of Gohan's body, the handle on the gate suddenly ejected a circular stone cylinder from its center, which slowly started to turn like a dial on a safe in an anti-clockwise direction. As soon as that started going, a couple more cylindrical blocks popped out of other spots on the gate, the energy beginning to resonate within the door and undo the spell that was placed upon it.

Smiling as the stream of power from the boy gained stability, Shiera and the other three minions lowered their hands and allowed the ritual to continue on its own accord.

XXX
(Fifteen minutes later)
(Son household)

Amidst the chaos and devastation brought about to the lonely house in the Mount Paozu region, a familiar figure from the neighboring capital city was at that very moment touching down on the front lawn. Immediately taking note of the massive holes in the dome-shaped building and the enormous smoking craters just over the hills, Videl, adorned in a pink shirt with a white singlet over that exposing her midriff, black bicycle shorts, black fingerless fighting gloves and green boots, landed a few yards from the front door and sprinted towards the figures scattered around the front.

Having spent that morning working out in her personal gym with three ton weights on her wrists and ankles, the girl had gotten herself jacked for the day ahead. However, while she was in the middle of having a nutritious breakfast following her session consisting of oats and bran, Gohan's energy signature suddenly spiked. Now while this normally wouldn't have come as a concern to her, as she was aware the guy often trained at the mind-blowing level of Super Saiyan 2 and had been spending the last few months trying to push it to Super Saiyan 3, from the way his energy read in that moment, it almost felt like he was pissed off.

His ki was fluxing like mad and had been going all over the place.

Then, just when his power was at the point of maxing out, she suddenly felt it drop like a stone and into the water. Upon which his ki fell off the radar completely for several seconds before reappearing hundreds of miles away.

Breaking down the situation for herself, Videl realized instantly that the boy she loved was in trouble and, dropping everything she was doing, flew as fast as she could to Mount Paozu. It was only while she was closing the distance on the Son household that she immediately sensed that something was wrong. This all then led to her discovery of the war stricken area and the figures lying scattered all over the place.

Skidding to a stop alongside Goten, the short-haired girl, expression reflecting extreme concern and fear, checked the boy to see if he was okay. "Goten. Goten," the girl spoke loudly, gently placing her hand against his chest and shaking him, "Talk to me little bro. Please." She knew he was alive. His ki was still there… but barely.

Judging from his current condition and the bruises covering his body, the young Saiyan looked as though he'd been put through hell. It would be a miracle if he regained consciousness waking up after whatever it was that put him in this state.

But just as the girl was beginning to have her doubts, the demi-Saiyan suddenly stirred and, through the haze of his exhaustion, gazed up at the girl leaning over him. "H-Hey… Videl-nechan." He then winced at the bolt of pain that shot through him a split second later.

The girl exhaled in relief when the youngster responded, "Thank goodness. You're alright." Her expression quickly becoming serious, she then gave the child her full and undivided attention. "Hey. What happened over here? Did you run into some trouble?"

Goten, hearing the girl's words loud and clear, summoned all the strength he could to nod, "Yes." he then coughed, choking on the gulps of air he was struggling to inhale.

"Who did this to you?" Videl asked, getting more worried by the second.

"I don't know," the demi-Saiyan groaned, his gaze half-lidded as he tried to think back to what he could remember of the person who attacked him. "A… A dog woman… with a scar across her eye… and carrying a flaming sword…" He then shook his head. "I couldn't sense… her energy. She just… came out of nowhere…"

Instantly discomforted by this info, the raven haired girl gritted her teeth and, having a quick look around, turned back to the child in her arms, "And your brother? What happened to him?"

The boy shook his head, eyes watering. On first glance it looked like he was going to falter and back out. But just before any of them could say anything, a low groan soon followed and drew Videl's gaze across, where she saw Chi-Chi stir and push her face off of the grass. When she did, she looked over and saw her oldest son's number one admirer and best friend staring back at her.

"Videl?" the mother wheezed, her vision blurring as she returned to the land of the living. "Is that you?"

"Yeah. I flew over as soon as I felt Gohan's energy fly off the scale. Are you alright, Chi-Chi?" the Champ's daughter asked worriedly.
"I think so," the woman answered weakly before looking up with a fearful glimmer in her eye, "Is Goten okay?" When she received a nod from the teenager, her instincts quickly kicked up to a high gear. "And what about Gohan? Is he alright?"

"I… I don't…" Videl shook her head, not knowing how to answer that.

But her words weren't needed. At least not right now. Because a couple seconds later, just as the girl was struggling to get something… anything out, a rustling in the bushes nearby soon caught her attention. Her gaze snapping towards the forest and setting off alarm bells in her head, the teen prepared for battle, only to see another familiar face slink into view. Supported on the back of a large pink dragon, a battered and gashed up Piccolo emerged from the undergrowth. His weighted clothing still on his person, the green warrior panted as he slowly approached the Son household.

The raven haired girl looked at him in alarm as she continued to hold the immobile and wounded Goten. "Piccolo? You're here?"

"Yeah. But Gohan isn't," the warrior from Namek spoke in his usual, gravely tone of voice. Growling painfully as he pushed himself off of Icarus's shoulders, the man then gripped his side and eyed the group intently. "Those dog warriors… I don't know who the hell they were… but they were strong. They attacked us and took off with him."

Eyes widening in shock, Videl then stepped towards the man with her fists clenched and held up high, "Then… we have to go after them!"

The Namekian nodded his head in agreement, giving his full support to the girl's plan.

He was obviously still sore from the double-teaming he got from those two mutts and after getting hit from behind by that guy with the spear, the man wanted payback. It was while Piccolo was in the process of imagining the most painful way he could deal that asshole his punishment that the two Z-fighters suddenly sensed another figure approaching their position and looked towards the sky in surprise. When they did, they spotted the familiar forms of Krillin and Android 18, the former adorned in a red shirt with brown sports pants and the latter in her usual ensemble, drop down from the clouds and land in front of them.

"Hey! I sensed trouble so we rushed over here as quickly as we could," the former monk warrior said as he jogged over to the pair. Looking from the battered Piccolo, to the down Goten, and to the worried Videl, the man blinked in confusion, "Anyone gonna tell me what the heck's going on around here?"

"Later, Krillin," Piccolo said before narrowing his eyes, "Do you have any Senzu Beans on you?"

"Oh. Y-Yeah," the short fighter answered. Reaching into his pocket and pulling out a large brown bag, the man unfastened the string and began rummaging around inside of it, "I had Yajirobe tell Korin to start stockpiling them ever since that Zeru monster came to earth and attacked us. He gave me a bag on his last visit to Kame House… said that we would need it." Pulling out a couple of beans, the short fighter quickly dashed over to where Goten was and, with the help of Videl, slipped the miracle bean into his mouth.

After making sure the boy chewed and swallowed it, he then passed one over to Videl to give to Chi-Chi, before then flicking one Piccolo's way. During which time Android 18 wandered over and folded her arms in her characteristic way. "So…while we're all just standing around licking at our wounds, would anyone care to explain what all this is about?"

Seeing as how they needed time to gather their wits and put themselves back together, Piccolo began filling the newcomers in on exactly what'd happened before they got here. He told Videl, Android 18 and Krillin about how the first two enemies showed up, while the third one, the leader, ambushed Goten in the woods and used him as a distraction to shoot Gohan down. He also told the group how the gang of dog warriors had come to the Son household looking for the Saiyan. As to what they planned to do with him however the Namekian was uncertain.

The discussion also gave the green warrior time to inform the group of who exactly they were up against and the weapons each of them wielded. While coming up against armed adversaries didn't worry them too much since knives and projectile weaponry were normally useless against them, the fact that they were being wielded by such powerful enemies filled the Z-warriors with some concern.

"Uh… I'm suddenly having some really bad flashbacks of when Trunks diced up Frieza that time he came to earth with his dad," Krillin exclaimed, swallowing nervously when he learned that one of the dog warriors had a sword. He then raised a hand meekly, "Dibs on not fighting that one."

"Don't worry about it. I'll take care of her," Piccolo said, glancing around at Android 18 and Videl, and giving them a serious look. "Our main objective is to save Gohan and to take out the ones who abducted him. Since it's the four of us against the three of them, we shouldn't have any problems in wiping the floor with them."

The blonde woman standing nearby narrowed her eyes. "While I'm all for rescuing a comrade and everything, I think you're overlooking a really important fact here, Piccolo." When all eyes turned to the cyborg, the young beauty frowned nervously. "These assholes were able to take out Gohan while he was in his Ascended Saiyan form."

"Yeah? So?" the Namekian asked.

Eighteen scrunched her face up at that question, "Considering how powerful Gohan is in that form, how the hell are we supposed to take out a group who was able to capture him alive?"

Undeterred by the woman's words or her negative view on the situation, the now fully recovered green warrior frowned, "We have to at least try. For all we know, the fate of the entire world is at stake here… and we're going to need all the help we can get to stop them." His eyes then cut towards Videl, whom he could see was staring off into the horizon with a worried look on her face. Taking note of her expression and her averted gaze, the Namekian frowned. "What's wrong?"

Clenching her jaw tightly, the nervous tomboy spoke, "I can sense Gohan's energy." When the rest of the people in the area looked in the direction she was currently glaring in, the girl continued. "It's getting weaker and weaker… like… it's being pulled out of him or something." It was an analysis that not only filled her heart with dread, but had a listening Chi-Chi and Goten become worried as well.

The child standing beside his mother moved forward, "I want to go save Gohan too! I'm coming with you!"

Piccolo, regarding the child's words momentarily, nodded his head in understanding and turned to the rest of the team. "We don't have much time." He directed a glance towards Chi-Chi, who looked quietly between the battle tested members of her son's group and laced her fingers together. "Let's take what we have and go after them. I'm not sure how long they intend on keeping Gohan alive, so if we're going to rescue the kid, it has to be now." Powering up and generating a strong white aura from his body, the Namekian then turned his gaze west, blasted up into the sky and shot off towards the horizon.
Doing the same as the senior warrior, Videl, Goten and Android 18 took flight after him, two of them shrouded in a similar white aura while the artificial human simply matched their speed with her own. After watching the majority of the squad take off, Krillin promptly turned towards the worried mother standing by the house and gave her a comforting smile.

"Don't worry, Chi-Chi. We'll make sure to bring Gohan back. I promise," the man said.

Smiling at her husband's best friend as Icarus walked over to stand by her side, the woman in the yellow dress nodded and cupped her hands in front of her. "Good luck." A shriek from the dragon also added to her message of best wishes.

Receiving them with a wave, the short warrior dashed across the grass and took off as well, soaring into the clouds and vanishing moments later. The mother of the household waved after the group, as did the family dragon, the former of whom could only sit back, pray and wait… hoping that things turned out alright.

XXX

(Sometime later)

On the terrace platform just outside of the pyramid's gateway, the process of unsealing the door was still well underway. With the incredibly complex locking mechanism of the entrance having opened up even further, it revealed even more unusual bolts and latches now shifting out of the way. The central piece glowing gold thanks to the energy still pouring into it, the four warriors standing guard over Gohan's paralyzed body watched as his hair faded to black, indicating he'd reached the limits of his transformed state. That was all that was needed to bring a smile to the leader's face.

"The ceremony is almost complete," Shiera spoke, watching as gold energy continued to bleed from the teenager's pores and float towards the doorway. By this point in time, all of the latches had been revealed, and the entire doorway was now beginning to radiate with an eerie purple aura.

As the Minions of Set observed the energy flowing from the boy pulse and crackle, with the host himself jerking a couple of times as he started to come too from his state of suspended animation, the villains then picked up a series of strong energy signals approaching them and turned around. When the group's eyes turned towards the sky above, they saw several individuals appear from behind the clouds before diving towards them.

Dropping to the courtyard one after the other, Piccolo, Videl, Android 18, Krillin and Goten landed just several yards from the four humanoid dogs and locked their glares onto them. As soon as they formed up into a single line before the evil minions, they watched as the opposing group slowly turned to face them. However, in spite of them outnumbering the group of dogs, judging from the way the canine hybrids were leering in their direction, they looked surprisingly calm.

Being the most curious of the group, Krillin couldn't help but allow his eyes to wander over the area before gesturing to the temple behind them. "This is a pretty swanky setup. How old is this place anyway?"

"Not a good time, Krillin," Android 18 raid while focusing her cold gaze upon the people she immediately identified as their targets.

A wince was the immediate response from the short fighter standing closest to the center of the formation. "R-Right. Sorry, honey."
Narrowing his eyes when he spotted Gohan's body floating behind the crew, Piccolo gritted his teeth angrily and fixed his ire on the leader. "Alright you mangy scumbags; what kind of weird hocus pocus have you got going on that would require you to kidnap one of our friends?"

Tana, looking the intruders over, huffed in an unimpressed manner as she placed her hands on her hips and shook her head. "Oh, look Shiera… interlopers," she spoke in a lazy tone of voice.

Glancing towards the middle man, Kasim gave their alpha leader a questioning gaze, "Do you want us to take care of them?" He added to this by swiftly drawing the folded up spear from his belt and spinning it open. The golden weapon unsheathed itself loudly before being held steadily at the owner's side.

Analyzing the group of newly arrived Z-fighters and taking note of their power levels, Shiera allowed a small smirk to form before shrugging her shoulders carelessly. "There's no need. The gateway is almost opened. Once our master has been freed from that retched prison; justice and retribution will rain down upon all." She then looked back towards the demi-Saiyan floating in stasis as the last of the energy needed to open the seal was sucked from his body. "Just make sure they don't get anywhere near the gate key."

Spotting his brother hanging in the air behind the villains, Goten's immediate reaction was to step forward as anger filled his eyes. "You let my big brother go, right now!" the child shouted.

His exclamation earned a round of chortles from the four minions, with the biggest of the group, Daryu, throwing the youngster a smug look. "And why should we do that, little one?"

"Because if you don't… I'll… I'll…" Gulping slightly at the intimidating stare he was receiving from the massive Pharaoh hound, the child then returned fire with the only comeback he could think of. "I'll punch all of you in the nose!"

"Ha-ha. How cute," Tana laughed, grinning across at the angry demi-Saiyan. "This child is quite the comedian. I like him."

Tilting his head at the assortment of earthlings before them, Kasim also added to the exchange of words with a jab of his own. "While it is admirable that all of you have come here to save your companion, I'm afraid that your efforts have been wasted." The man then tapped his spear against the stone ground and nodded in their direction. "As strong as the five of you are, even your combined strength is nowhere near a match for the four of us."

The hulking Daryu leered at the Z-warriors, "And even if it were, you wouldn't be able to kill us."

"Oh yeah? What makes you say that?" Piccolo asked, turning his ire towards the biggest of the four and meeting the hound's glare with his own.

Flicking her headdress back a bit, Tana filled them in on the missing pieces, "Thanks to the power of our master Set flowing through our veins, there is not a being alive that can destroy us. After all; we are our lord's most loyal and devoted servants."

"Until our duty to our master is completed, we will continue to live forever," Kasim added, before taking his spear and pointing it towards the half-Saiyan floating behind him. "In a matter of moments, those doors will be opened… and as soon as they are… our master will begin the complete and utter subjugation of this universe by first killing this boy behind us and then the rest of you, until there is not a single being left to stand in our way."

While most of the defenders of earth balked at the humanoid dog's dark prophecy, Videl perked up at the statement the man made about Gohan. Obviously directing that threat to all of them, the girl's eyes fixated upon the teen floating cuffed and bound behind their formation. When she saw her unconscious friend's body jerk and spasm, his face twisted in pain, the girl's eyes shimmered with unshed tears before she bit her teeth together and clenched her fists tightly.

Unwilling to see the demi-Saiyan suffer any longer, without warning or hesitation, the girl powered up and charged forward at blinding speed. "LIKE HELL!" With a loud battle cry, she barreled towards the nearest warrior, intent of burying them in the ground with a single blow.

"Videl! Wait!" Krillin shouted, while the others watched the girl in alarm.

At first the teen looked like she had this one in the bag. It certainly surprised Shiera when she looked over her shoulder in response to the outburst. However, just as the raven haired fighter was nearing her target, Tana, smiling confidently at the human, inhaled deeply and, just like she did with Chi-Chi, breathed out sharply. The result was another powerful gust of wind being fired from her lips that slammed into the human fighter and sent her flying back the way she came.

Videl screamed out as her aura was effortlessly turned off and she was sent bouncing along the hard ground, moments before rolling to a stop just in front of the other Z-fighters. Battered with her clothes slightly torn up, the young warrior growled as she painfully glared up at the four minions staring arrogantly back at her.

The female dog that'd knocked her back chuckled and tilted her head, "Good effort. But you're going to have to do a lot better than that."

Deciding to get in on the action as well, Krillin leapt into the air and suspended himself above the terrace, "Okay then! Try this on for size!" Throwing his hand up, the former monk focused his energy into paper thin area directly over his palm. A loud humming sound filling the sky, a golden disk quickly formed above the fighter who, after taking aim at the four warriors below as his friends observed carefully, the man attacked. "$Destructo Disk!" With a grunt of effort, he then pitched the monofilament attack straight down at the hybrid hounds.

His disk attack arced through the air and shot straight towards Tana. The female dog watched curiously as the blade flew towards her and, without even bothering to move, allowed the energy disk to hit her in the side. The Z-fighters looked on in disbelief when the blow carved straight through her in a single stroke, lopping her upper body off before it streaked off into the distance.
The Ibizan hound's expression reflected surprise as her blood splattered through the air.

Amazed at his hit, Krillin gave a cheer of triumph, "YES! Got yah!" His celebrations were short lived however when, a couple seconds later, his expression turned into one of shock as he saw the female dog's upper body float back down to the other half and reattach instantly. Black fire surrounding the wound, it closed up shortly afterwards, making it appear as though nothing had happened.

When Krillin landed back with the others, everyone from Android 18 to Goten was just as stunned and bewildered as he was.

A smirk forming on Tana's face, the woman cocked her head, "Like we said… you won't be able to kill us so easily."

At first the group of Z-fighters was thrown by how the dog woman was able to walk away from an obviously fatal blow to the body. When someone was bifurcated, if they didn't have Cell or Piccolo's regenerative capabilities, those people pretty much died. However, judging from how quickly the female warrior healed, it was apparent that she had some sort of energy based regenerative abilities.

While Piccolo and Krillin were no stranger to fighting against a person possessing immortality, if there past scraps with Garlic Junior were anything to go by, considering how effortlessly one of them was able to shake off Videl while at the same time recover from a lethal hit to the body, it was obvious that they were at an extreme disadvantage.

The hopelessness of the situation though was then shattered when, from up above, a familiar voice suddenly shouted down to the two groups standing on the terrace. Needless to say, this arrival came as a bit of a surprise to one of the opposing parties.

"There you are you jumped-up motherfuckers!" The yell drawing everyone's eyes skywards, the Z-fighters saw a familiar, orange haired woman descend from the heavens and land directly next to them with a blast of wind. Stumped by the speed and force of the woman's landing, Piccolo, Krillin and everybody else watched as the slightly singed and burnt form of an incredibly pissed off Zangya straightened up and glared towards the minions. With dark rings around her eyes and her hair all frizzy, she looked as though she'd just spent an entire month trapped in Jumanji. "Thought you could hide from me, huh?"

The Z-fighters were baffled, particularly Krillin. "Geez. What in the world happened to you?"

Eye twitching, the Hera gritted her teeth at the hounds staring at her in surprise. "Well, I was enjoying a pleasant flight over to West City for an important business meeting. But then I was suddenly attacked from out of nowhere by these four assholes." Her hair started to waft upwards as her energy levels started to climb with her rage. If everyone didn't know any better, her power level was being magnified somewhat. "If you can't tell by the expression on my face, I'm absolutely livid at the moment."

Swallowing nervously, Krillin turned back to face their opponents, "Well… don't let any of us stand in your way. You go ahead and do what yah gotta do."

When Zangya made her bettered presence known on the field, the dog hybrids regarded her with a sense of confusion and disbelief. After several seconds of silence, it was Kasim who was the one that addressed the elephant in the room. "I could've sworn we killed this one."

"Yeah. Me too," Daryu replied, narrowing his eyes on the still miraculously alive Hera.

Spitting to the side in distaste, the blue skinned alien upped the ante on her fury. "You dumbasses obviously don't know the concept of hiding." She then cocked her head to the side and tossed back some locks of her curly hair. "The numbers were four to one. Did you honestly think I was going to come out of that battle in one piece if I'd stayed to fight?"

Looking the woman over, Shiera then threw her a smirk. "It doesn't matter how you survived. Now that you're here, you'll now be able to die along with the rest of your friends."

A deathly silence falling over the area then prompted Piccolo and the rest of the team to look in Zangya's direction. When they saw the cold, unflinching gaze she currently had on her, it unnerved the Z-fighters at how calmly she responded to the leader's jab. But moments following their checking up on the Hera's condition, they saw the orange haired woman raise her hand and point at the scar-faced collie.

"Just so we're clear, that bitch is mine." It was a message well received by everyone in the area.

So far, so good. It was now six against four. But unless they did something about their enemy's immortality, the group was still a little stuck.

Just as Shiera traded with the fuming Zangya a grin, daring the orange haired warrior to make the first move, two more figures arriving on the scene once again halted all plans for an engagement. Looking to their left, Piccolo and everybody else saw Vegeta and Trunks, both of whom were dressed in their respective training gi, touch down on the terrace and rise up to full height to glare at the four weird looking aliens the rest of the gang were facing. While sparing a glance towards the unconscious Gohan floating behind the minions, the Prince of Saiyans then looked across at his teammates.

"Okay… what the hell did I miss?"

The Namekian spared the newcomer a dignified grunt, "Not much. We were just deciding who gets to fight who out of those four creeps in front of us."

"Neat," the flame haired man in the blue training uniform and white boots exclaimed as a smile formed across his face. He then began eyeing the competition eagerly, sizing them up and getting a bead on their weaponry. "Has the wench with the sword and the scar across her face been taken?"

"Yeah," Zangya spoke without taking her eyes off of her quarry. "Hands off."

"Fine. Then I call dibs on the steroid junky over there," Vegeta said, locking his gaze on the hulking Pharaoh hound at the end of the line. "He looks fun to hit."

"Feh. Good luck with that," Piccolo spoke, drawing the Saiyan's gaze over to his end as the Namekian gestured towards the four warriors. "Just to give you a heads up, the four clowns in front of you are actually immortal. So if you plan on smacking one of them around the entire day, then knock yourself out."

"Immortal, huh?" the prince spoke, chuckling darkly as he proceeded to crack his knuckles one after the other. "That sounds like a challenge."

Goten, arms held at his sides, then looked across at his newly arrived friend from West City curiously. "Hey Trunks… what does 'immortal' mean?"

The lavender haired youngster in the green gi looked back at his playmate strangely. "It means you can't die."

"Oh…" the spiky haired runt of the Son family replied, blinking a couple of times until his face scrunched up in disappointment. "Well that's a little bit unfair." As far as Goten was concerned, if you beat up an opponent enough they would eventually call it quits and roll over. Not being able to do that seemed like a bit of a cheat to him.

The Minions of Set on the other hand had their own concerns. Upon seeing another Saiyan arrive with his son in tow, the immortal warriors were once again put on alert, as the count was now eight against four. Narrowing their eyes on the new players and directing caution towards the stronger members of the group, the hybrid fighters reached for their weapons and prepared for an imminent attack. However, just as everyone was loading themselves up for a clash that was sure to come, a blinding flash of light startled everyone out of their reveries and filled the sky all around them.

When the brilliant blue aura lit up their backs, the four dog warriors looked over their shoulders in surprise, with the Z-fighters also joining them.

As soon as the attention of both parties fixed upon the pyramid entrance, the very tip of the stone structure emanated a white, radioactive glow. After pulsing several times and giving off a loud humming it, it then got even brighter, before shooting a beam of energy straight up into the heavens. The rays of energy shot up through the clouds, parting them, and continued off of the surface of the planet and rocketed up into outer space.

From a distance, it looked like an ethereal pillar sent down by the Kais as a gift to the earth. But in reality, it was the beginning of worse things to come…

XXX

(Meanwhile)

In another part of the universe far beyond the reaches of planet earth, atop one of the many plateaus of the pyramid shaped world that was the home of Beerus the Destroyer, the God’s teal-skinned attendant Whis had gone on a small walkabout of the oddly shaped planet's wilderness. It was while he was gazing across the enormous blue lake near the temple and meditating on his troubled thoughts that the man was unexpectedly struck by a sudden and powerful energy feedback, one that had the assistant to the Lord of Destruction look up with a start.

Eyes widening in bewilderment, the man then shot a look across the quadrant the world was drifting through and to another part of space with a gasp. In that very direction, the man sensed a very strong and very familiar energy signature blazing away, one that could only be felt by a handful of people in the universe. While he was certain a lot of the other deities would be able to sense it, he was certainly the first one to acknowledge it, as he was the only one who was the most closest to the calamity.

Irises wavering fearfully as sweat dribbled down his face, Whis gritted his teeth nervously as he stretched his senses out and honed in on the exact location the unsettling beacon was coming from.

"This celestial force… it can't be," the attendant whispered.

He was hoping it belonged to something else; somebody who wasn't the very being that caused them so much strife all those years ago. After twenty thousand years of a long and stable peace, the last thing the man wanted to do was relive the pain and torment from the moment the universe's most destructive conflict took place.

Unfortunately, all his prayers were dashed when he finally located the exact origin of the energy source. Once it pinged in his head, his heart stopped.

"No."

XXX

(Back on Earth)

The beam of light shooting up into the heavens from the pyramid continued to fluctuate for several more minutes. In that time, not only had clouds began to gather around the structure above it like a cyclone, but bolts of golden lightning began to shoot off of the prison, marking the final curtain to the half an hour ritual. While that the energy being drained from Gohan's body had stopped and the locks on the door had finished turning, it was only a matter of time before the bubble was broken and the inevitable took place.

The Z-fighters and the Minions of Set watched in awe as energy continued shooting off of the monolith in all directions, tearing up the countryside and causing the skis themselves to tremble. From the amount of power being given off, it almost seemed like the entire planet was going to be shaken to pieces.
However, all of these flashy and over the top special effects were just for show, as several minutes after the terrifying display began, the beam of divine light retracted back into the ancient building. With the lightning also ceasing seconds later, the warriors standing at a distance watched as Gohan's body floated back to the ground and the stone doors that'd once been sealed shut suddenly opened.

Giving the formalities a well-deserved middle finger, the entrance to the pyramid flew open with a deafening crack, bathing the group in a blinding white light as a thick purple aura began gushing out of the entrance like a river. The inferno of energy spewed over the terrace relentlessly, grazing the Minions of Set and washing over Gohan's motionless body. Several seconds later, the blast of translucent energy devolved into a gentle breeze, and as embers of ki continued to float into the air from the source, a silhouette appeared in the doorway.

The Z-fighters braced themselves for the unknown creature that was to come.

The Minions of Set meanwhile dropped to their knees and bowed to the figure as the dark entity started to march out of the structure.

"Master," the four warriors spoke at the exact same time, sweat dripping down their faces under the crushing presence of their creator.

At first the good guys were expecting to see some horrid creature of a similar breed to the four in front of them step through the doorway. Considering who they were up against, they wouldn't be surprised if it was a shadowy entity composed completely out of black energy. On first glance that seemed like the most likely case; a dark silhouette with two, blood red eyes that stuck out from the rest of their person and struck fear into the hearts of all those who looked upon them. In truth, the figure looked like a demon sent from the deepest pits of hell to smite them all.

Either way, whoever this Set deity was that these four idolized so much, he had to cut some sort of imposing figure if the very sight of the man prompted his servants to drop to their knees and bow to him in reverence.

Krillin took a deep breath, preparing to scream at whatever vile creature would emerge from the light. In his mind he pictured a large, drooling, monstrous half-dog, half-monster with claws for hands, massive fangs, and a body similar to that of Frieza's third form covered in fur. Everyone was hanging off of the edge of their seats waiting for the final reveal.

But when the light behind the figure faded to a gentle glow and the boss finally stepped into the sunlight, the Z-fighters were stumped by what they saw. Krillin even had the common courtesy to swallow his tongue in shock.

This God known as Set wasn't anything like what they expected. For starters he was only about the same height as his subordinate Shiera, with prominent ears, long red flowing hair that grew down his back, and a very slender figure. Unlike the others, his form was a cross between a human and a fox, with a smooth red and white coat that was incredibly striking and appeared soft to the touch. Along with the long, flowing tail behind him, he wore a form fitting shendyt around his waist that was brown, a black tube top around his chest, and black arm bands, all of which had a golden trim. This was certainly in keeping with Egret's climate and the fashion that all of these dog creatures seemed to be going for.

However, there was one significant aspect about this Set character that stuck out above the rest.

_He_ was in fact a _she_. That sort of explained her curvaceous and attractive figure, why her tube top was so tight around her bust, her sharp, prominent eyelashes and the way the mole on her left cheek accentuated her feminine appeal.

This came as an enormous surprise to the Z-fighters, as they never expected this God of Storms to be a female.

Trunks blinked, looking across at the woman as her long, bushy tail swished about behind her, "Is that… their boss?"

Goten was just as confounded and surprised as everybody else, "Yeah. I guess."

"Huh. She's surprisingly cute for a God," Zangya murmured, tilting her head at the newly awakened foe as the 'terrifying' villain stared ahead of her with a half-lidded, careless gaze. "This Set looks like she wouldn't hurt a fly." In all honesty, it looked like you could just walk up to her and give her a great big hug.

Videl, while staring at the new figure in surprise, then perked up when she heard what the person was called and looked across at the orange haired Hera. "Wait a second… what was that name again? Set?"

The Hera looked back at her best friend's training partner curiously, "Yeah. Set. Like the verb. What? Is there something wrong?"

Muttering the name a couple of times under her breath, the short haired teenager then looked up in shock and fixed her attention back on the entrance. "Yes. That's it! Now I remember where I've heard that name before. I learned about it in history class last year." At this news, every single Z-fighter turned in her direction as the young fighter then began relaying to them what she knew on the subject. "Set is a God from Ancient Egret religion, and is regarded as the deity of desert, storms, disorder, violence and foreign invaders. He is an incredibly prominent figure in Egret mythology and is portrayed as a usurper and the embodiment of evil in a lot of the old texts. This was from over thousands of years of research and study." Videl then looked across at the others with a serious glimmer in her eyes. "The writings in the class textbook referred to him as the God of Storms."

"God of Storms," Vegeta murmured, only to then look ahead of him in confusion. "Hold on… Set… I think I've heard that name once before." The title certainly held merit. That much was clear. It also sounded incredibly familiar to the prince and stirred some very unpleasant memories from his childhood…

…one in particular involving his father at a banquet, where his old man acted as a footrest for a certain visitor to his home planet.

Videl, this being the first time she'd actually contributed to a mystery in the group, continued to fill in the blanks for the others. "I read in the books that he was an enemy to many Gods, particularly to the Sun God Ra, and was one of the most powerful deities in history. Tales were told of his conquests, how he murdered Osiris and conquered other divine beings such as Sekhmet, Shu, Isis and Beerus." She then narrowed her eyes on the figure as she contemplated her facts some more. "Strange. I was always under the impression that Set was a male."

"That makes sense," Piccolo spoke up, giving the girl's words consideration. "A lot of false deities in history often concealed their true identities and genders from the people who worshipped them. Even legitimate divine beings that were responsible for great offenses in their time were purposefully falsified in historical records as the ultimate insult and punishment for their crimes." The man scrunched his face up at the issue they were experiencing. "The Gods and the people who worshipped Set on this planet all those years ago probably labeled him as a genderless monster, but then started referring to him as a male."

It was at this information the Saiyan Prince's head finally clicked and he reeled forward in shock. "That's it! Set; the God of Storms! Now I remember!" The Z-fighters all quickly looked to Vegeta in shock, where they all saw the horrified look in his eyes as he stared across at their enemies, all of whom were continuing to bow to the fox woman as she raised a hand and scratched behind her ear in a very dog like manner. "She is one of the primary Gods that oversee the balance of power in this universe alongside the Kais. But unlike other deities who represent the bodies of construction and rebirth, she is one of those deities that represent the forces of destruction and devastation. All of them are extremely powerful individuals capable of wiping out entire galaxies with a single stroke. Even Frieza and Cooler are like ants compared to them."

Krillin and everybody else aside from Android 18 looked back at the man in alarm. "Whoa, man! Are you for real?!" the short fighter exclaimed.

Even Trunks looked shaken at the news, "Th-Th-They can wipe out entire galaxies, dad?" He knew his astronomy. Planets were one thing. Heck, even someone as small and diminutive as him could destroy the earth with a single blast if he wasn't too careful.

But an entire galaxy? That was a possibility neither member of the group could fully comprehend.

"A long time ago, the God of Destruction Beerus visited my home world and ate lunch at my father's table. That was the first time I ever laid eyes on one of these so-called superior Gods," the prince continued, swallowing nervously as he thought back to the times he'd heard of these highly venerated names in passing. "That God's power was said to be in an entirely different league... and I believed it when I saw him. But while Beerus was said to be most feared among his kind due to his unpredictable nature; Set was reputed as the most powerful and the most ruthless among the other celestial beings. Hell, she would wipe out an entire group of galaxies just for the sheer fun of it." Vegeta, narrowing his eyes fearfully, regarded their foe once again with extreme caution and fear. "I hate to admit this... but even I don't stand a chance against her."

The Namekian quickly looked back at their opponents, where he saw Set, the female God, lower her arm and frown in their direction. "If what you're saying is true, then we've got a seriously big problem on our hands." An apocalyptic level problem.

It was while the Z-fighters were in the process of orchestrating some kind of plan to combat this new threat, every single one of them froze up when they suddenly saw the fox woman start to amble forward.

Possessing grace and finesse, the newly awakened deity approached her minions at a casual pace, and seemed as though she was about to address them when they bowed their heads even lower. Not even Shiera, who was sweating bullets now, dared to look upon her master's face. However, just feet away from reaching her would-be subordinates, the almighty deity stopped when she found a body blocking her path and looked down to see the unconscious Gohan lying in front of her.

Goten, Piccolo and all the other Z-fighters lurched forward in alarm, not knowing what the deity was going to do to the defenseless demi-Saiyan.

Tail wagging behind her as she scrutinized the sleeping boy in front of her, the fox girl with the half-lidded gaze smiled and, bringing a hand up from behind her, waved a finger down at the Saiyan and effortlessly levitated him off the ground. Gohan's body floated up to her level and, while he was still lying parallel to the floor, Set took a closer look at him like a cat staring at a fish in a bowl.
"It seems that I have you to thank for my resurrection," the teenage God spoke in a soft voice, reaching up with a hand to run down the unconscious boy's cheek. "I'll be sure to reward you for your kindness." Looking the young warrior's form over, from his handsome face to his dashing uniform, the God of Storms raised an eyebrow inquisitively. "What a cute thing. Perhaps I'll keep you once I'm done with my subjugation of this universe." She then gave him an affectionate and playful lick on the cheek.

Hair bristling at the fox woman's brazen act, the once nervous Videl stepped forward and, before any of the Z-fighters could react, shouted across at the animal God. "HEY! GET AWAY FROM HIM YOU BITCH!"

This was apparently the wrong thing to say because as soon as she did, Set's eyes snapped towards the teen and narrowed menacingly. Even her four minions looked back at the pissed off girl in disbelief.

Every one of the Z-warriors froze when they saw the God of Storms narrow her gaze on the one that'd shouted at her. At first they thought Videl was going to burst into flames right where she was standing from the way the fox woman was looking at her. Given her position in the pecking order, it definitely seemed like a possibility. But then, just as the tomboy and the deity were glaring across at one another, they suddenly saw the goddess levitate Gohan's body back to the floor, straighten up and, eyes still fixed upon the offender, produced a black, smoke-like aura from her body.

Her form becoming shrouded in the dark cloak of energy, giving her a very demonic appearance, Set's eyes flared red, illustrating the amount of evil coursing through her veins. It was then, while the woman was burning with copious amount of hatred and rage, in the blink of an eye the powerful deity suddenly vanished and reappeared directly in front of Videl, her movements being marked by a powerful gust of wind.

The God's speed was so great that her movements were instantaneous, and every single Z-fighter standing in the background lost sight of her for a couple of seconds. It was only when they spotted her standing directly in front of Videl that their attention snapped back to her immediately.

Even Android 18 was stunned, "H-How did she do that?"

Arms held behind her, Set glared down at the slightly shorter Videl, who swallowed nervously as she snarled back at the dog entity in warning. The distance between them was now only a couple of feet and with the way the fox girl's eyes were flared, it almost looked as though the human's life would be forfeited at any moment.

Everyone, including the Minions who'd just gotten to their feet, braced themselves for the inevitable.

But just when it seemed like something catastrophic was about to take place on that terrace, the aggressive black aura surrounding Set suddenly dissipated, leaving her standing in a normal light once again. Upon which her gaze softened, her hand was raised and, out of nowhere, the dog God gave a loud and well-earned yawn.

To her it was just an ordinary expression of tiredness. But the instant she started inhaling, a powerful blast of wind exploded from her body, kicking up dust, sand, and nearly knocking all of the Z-fighters off their feet. Videl and everybody else in the area were literally pushed back along the floor while they were attempting to block out the gale, with Piccolo's eyes widening in shock at how many feet he actually slid along the stone under the fierce winds.
While all this was happening at ground zero, in the desert and sky surrounding the pyramid, not only had a hurricane formed in the clouds above with the eye hovering directly over the God, but an enormous sand storm had kicked up in the desert and was now washing over the landscape in all directions.

With absolutely no effort whatsoever, in a single yawn the God of Storms was able to alter the weather patterns of the planet around her.

As soon as she stopped yawning, the gale emanating from her body ceased, allowing the Z-fighters to stumble back into normal standing positions and gawk in her direction. They then proceeded to watch as she took a step closer to the startled Videl and began looking her over.

Inspecting the teenager from head to toe with a simple tilt of her head, Set curiously raised a hand and gently poked the tomboy in the center of the chest. Too terrified to move, the Z-fighters then watched the woman with one arm behind her back moved to Videl's left and checked her face and body from the side. Making a thoughtful sound as her tail wagged behind her, the God then stepped around to the other side and analyzed the curvature of the teenager's collar bone, before gently grabbing her right arm, extending it, and running a finger along her bicep.

Completely weirded out by this out-of-the-blue inspection, Videl pulled her arm away quickly, "Hey… what gives?"

Set, taking a few steps back with her hands placed behind her once again, smiled at the flustered teen. "Fascinating. You are a human… and yet you possess strength and power rivaling that of the people from the planet Inaris. I must say, your race has come a long way from the primitive stone pushers I remember you used to be."

Watching nervously from the sidelines and listening to their master offer compliments to the enemy fighters, Shiera and her subordinates looked at each other worryingly. After which they turned back to their boss and, mustering up the courage, spoke up inquisitively.

It was Tana who was the one to make the daring leap. "Uh… master-?" She was promptly silenced when the God of Storms held a hand up in their direction, stopping the minions in their tracks.

Order returned to the terrace, the deity then strolled around and began inspecting Goten, Krillin, Android 18, Trunks and Vegeta one after the other. She passed the short fighter and Gohan's younger brother quickly, sniffing and checking them over, before stopping in front of the blonde cyborg. Finding an interest in her body's structure, she took the woman's arm in her hand and ran her thumb and forefinger over it, nodding in approval when she saw for herself what she was. Words like 'interesting' and 'gorgeous' left the deity's lips, drawing a few surprised blinks from the android before the God shifted over to Trunks. Taking him by the head and turning it slightly, the deity ran a finger over his ear and checked it out, drawing a giggle from the child, before she turned her attention to Vegeta.

The Prince of Saiyans wisely chose not to say or do anything, and simply allowed the woman to pass her judgment on him. He watched her cautiously and nervously as she prodded his shoulders and neck, walking a full circle around him before stopping in front of him.

Set leaned forward and sniffed the man a couple of times and pulled away a moment later, "A Saiyan… on earth?" Taking a step back, the woman then looked up towards the sky and squinted. Not knowing what she was doing the Z-fighters watched her curiously. When she eventually looked down several seconds later, a couple more words left her lips. "Judging from your body structure and facial characteristics, I can tell that you didn't originate from Saiya. That planet is currently orbiting Sculptor in the Abell cluster… so I'm guessing your ancestors migrated to another planet many years ago and claimed it as their own."

"Uh…" Vegeta murmured, not knowing how to respond to that information.

Satisfied with his answer, Set then wandered over to where Piccolo and Zangya were standing. The pair acted more guarded than the others did, yet they allowed the woman to start looking them over. Just like with Vegeta and Android 18, she found a great deal of interest in the two and began inspecting them a little more thoroughly. She prodded the Namekian in the chest and arm, and tilted her head at him when she looked at the tall warrior from a different angle.

"You have two other Namekian spirits living inside of you. I assume that's because you've joined bodies with them," Set exclaimed, standing on her toes and attempting to look into the man's eyes. Piccolo leaned back a little in response, finding the distance between them a little bit uncomfortable. But his nervousness soon ebbed when the woman backed off and moved over to Zangya.

She started with the Hera's hair and worked her way to her arm. After which she then looked the woman in the face and moved away as if expecting a work of art. "Mm… stunning… absolutely stunning." Doing something completely unexpected, she then reached forward and grabbed one of the woman's ample breasts and looked at it strangely, squeezing it a couple of times for good measure. While Krillin and Videl blushed to the roots of their hair and the other fighters simply gawked, Zangya had to reframe from slapping the deity across the face as the woman gave her chest another testing squeeze.

Making a few more thoughtful noises as she prodded the girl in the shoulder, the God of Storms then backed away so that her minions were standing behind her and flanking her on either side. By this point in time, it was worth noting that her servants also appeared confounded at their master's surprise inspection, especially with the Hera whom she'd decided to go to second base with.

From her new position, Set could now see all the members of the Z-fighters standing together and staring at her anxiously. Hands behind her back, the goddess gave the warriors her appraisal, "I'm impressed. Your group possesses some of the most diverse and strongest warriors I've seen in a long time… from the mortal plains anyway. Each of you is gifted with incredible strength and prowess, and judging from your individual power levels I'd say that a few of you would even be able to match any one of subordinates in combat." She then lifted her head at them. "Tell me… what do you people call yourselves?"

Piccolo, clenching his fists anxiously, threw the woman a suspicious glare, "We don't call ourselves anything."

"I see," Set replied, tail swishing behind her happily as she rubbed her chin with her fingers in thought, "Now that is intriguing." Turning around, the deity then held a hand out towards the floor and, with a quick burst of ki, summoned a mountain of sand from the ground. The particles coming together and forming into a mound, the mass of grains then rose up and transformed into a throne, complete with engravings and colors befitting any entity of her station. With her minions standing on either side of it, the woman approached the chair and, with a swish of her hips, turned and sat down atop the grand chair. As soon as she'd gotten comfortable, the woman crossed her legs like a boss and smirked in the group's direction. "Shiera… tell me… how long has it been since I was sealed away?"

"Master… it's been over twenty cycles since your imprisonment at the hands of the Kais."
"So approximately twenty thousand years, hm?" Set reiterated, tapping a finger against the arm of her newly constructed seat before tilting her head slightly. "It appears that this world has flourished quite nicely in my absence, wouldn't you agree?"

Shiera nodded a second time in agreement, "Yes, master. It certainly has."

"Well then, I'd say this is the perfect opportunity to make some changes around here. Considering it's been so many years since my last great conquest, I think I'll commemorate my return to the mortal plains with a little competition," the humanoid canine exclaimed as a vile smirk suddenly crossed her lips, completely overshadowing her once cheerful persona. It was a proclamation that drew the attention of every single one of her minions and Z-fighters in the area.

"Competition, master?" Kasim inquired.

"A battle to decide who the superior warrior is, like the gladiators of the old world," Set informed with a firm nod of her head. "If you ask me, I think it's time for a fresh start… a 'changing of the guard' if you will."

Her statement had her loyal servants look at their master in shock.

Eyes reflecting his disbelief, Daryu stepped towards the fox woman fearfully, "Master… you don't mean?"

All of a sudden, Set's amused expression was instantly replaced by a hard glare. A shadow falling across her eyes when she threw her second strongest servant a wave of killing intent, she forced all of her present attendants to back off. Once all of them had their full and undivided attention fixated upon her, the red furred God of Storms rested her cheek on her knuckles and propped her elbow on her arm rest.

"I've been imprisoned for over twenty thousand years," Set hissed, her expression showcasing nothing but anger and contempt towards her subordinates. "If I'd been released in the first few months following my confinement, I would've finished off the other Gods and covered this entire universe in darkness. But now that over twenty thousand rotations have come and gone, those retched scumbags have had enough time to regroup, rest and recover." Her gaze narrowed even more before, letting her soldiers know how frustrated she was. "The fact that all four of you weren't able to release me earlier tells me that my most loyal, trusted and powerful servants have failed me, and that I should take this moment to reassess your abilities." She then raised a hand towards them, causing the four warriors to take a step back and putting the Z-fighters on edge. "I believe it's time for you to prove your worth to me."

Just when the minions thought they were about to be punished for their tardiness, their bodies suddenly started to glow a dark purple. Auras wafting off of them like smoke, the four guards looked at themselves nervously and watched as the embers grew larger and more pronounced. Then, moments after their bodies started to glow, the energy emanating from their pores concentrated around their chests, and four purple orbs shot out of them towards their master's hand.

Without any strain whatsoever, Set caught the four globes easily, compressing the energy into a single sphere before absorbing it back into her palm.

Clenching her hand shut as she watched her four servants look down at themselves, the God of Storms smirked. "I have taken back the immortality granted by the celestial energy I'd previously bestowed upon you. Unless you four can defeat those eight warriors you see standing behind you," she quickly looked across at the intently listening Z-fighters, before then looking back at her tense subordinates, "Then I will give you back your immortality and you may return to me as my minions. If not… well…” Her smile curled upwards, "I think you know the answer."

"B-But… master," Tana stammered, unable to believe what she was hearing and speaking up in protest.

The deity glanced across at the terrified Ibizaan hound with a harsh look in her eyes. "This sounds like insubordination. Are you questioning my decisions?"

Swallowing nervously, the brown haired female stepped away and lowered her head in shame.

Upon reestablishing her authority, Set then glanced across at Shiera and saw the woman nod in understanding and a look of seriousness cross her face.

"If I must prove myself to you once again, my master, then so be it," the collie stated with a bow, "I will not disappoint you."

"See to it that you don't." After hearing this from her second in command, the all powerful goddess then directed her gaze towards the Z-fighters, watching them as they assumed fighting stances while the four minions on either side of her throne turned to face them. "We're going to play a little game now. Your group will fight against my group to determine who the strongest warriors on this planet out of the twelve of you are. The last four combatants left standing will become my new servants and will have the privilege to stand by my side as the new Minions of Set. No more, no less." She then raised a finger. "As an added bonus, once you've helped me in completing my conquest of this universe and I've become the supreme ruler of this reality, I will not only grant each of you immortality, but dominion over a quadrant of space to do whatever you please." The deity then beamed excitedly as the Z-fighters looked back at her in disbelief. "This battle is for life and death, so please… try not to get killed so easily."

The defenders of earth quickly took a step back when the four Minions of Set moved forward. When they saw the four intimidating hybrids draw their weapons and ignite them with blue fire, the group quickly slid into fighting stances and prepared for battle.

While Piccolo ripped his cape and turban off, Zangya kicked her heels away and tore away her suit, leaving her in some very appealing purple lingerie. Sliding her feet out, the woman clenched her fists and powered up with a yell of rage, her orange hair flashing red, her blue skin turning green and her build becoming more defined as she transformed into her Super Hera state.

"Come on!" the alien warrior shouted as she focused her glare on the leader of the four.

When Krillin slid into stances alongside Trunks and his wife, Goten went Super Saiyan and Vegeta jumped straight into Super Saiyan 2, matching Zangya's aura and level with his own. With the situation growing tenser by the second and with her comrades readying themselves for the fight of their lives, Videl took a moment to look past Set's throne and towards the gateway.

Behind the God's seat, she saw her best friend and the boy she admired above everyone else lying on the floor behind her, still unconscious. It was obvious he was in a deep sleep and from what she could sense of him, his energy had dropped considerably. The sight of his exhausted and pale state had the raven haired girl grit her teeth and clench her fists, as she then fixed her most serious glare on the four minions approaching them with their weapons bared.

"I have to save, Gohan. I must…” Videl thought, knowing exactly what she had to do next. As to how she was going to do it exactly when she had four ridiculously strong foes to deal with, she had no idea.
Thanks to Set confiscating the Godly or Celestial ki that granted her minions immortality from them, the Z-fighters could now sense exactly how strong they were. This gave them the perfect opportunity to select their opponents and solidify their choices. Now that their blind spots had been removed, they would be able to fight against them at full capacity.

This was it.

"Alright then, you freaks," Piccolo yelled, setting his sights on his opponent and cocking his hand back, "Let's dance." With a yell of effort, he leapt into the air and dove straight towards the jerk that'd speared him in the back earlier that morning.

Kasim dropped into a defensive stance and watched the Namekian charge straight at him.

A split second later, both groups of fighters took evasive action, disappearing in a series of blurs and vanishing from the terrace in the blink of an eye. In a matter of moments, the only people left standing or lying on the pyramid were Set and the out cold Gohan respectively.

Cheek still resting on her knuckles, the God of Storms smiled excitedly. "This is going to be fun…"

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Author's Note: So in this chapter we get a glimpse of the main villain behind it all, as well as more of a look into her history. The fact that Set was a male was a ruse and she was once a student under Whis, who eventually surpassed her teacher and became a great God. But she became much more than that and transformed herself into the universe's greatest threat.

At one stage millions of years ago she was a prodigious apprentice under Whis, who was the strongest being in the universe at the time, and was selected to become the God of Storms. But along the way something happened that caused Set to become evil when even more Gods started making appearances. Beerus is just one amongst many and in the DBZ Movie Battle of Gods when he mentioned that Goku was his second strongest opponent ever, Set would have to be the first… for a lot of them.

The Minions of Set are minor deities created by Set herself. With her level of mastery over celestial energy or God ki, she was able to impart a tiny amount into four members of her race and corrupted the process, transforming them into undying servants. Individually they are quite powerful, but as a group they can take down their quarry effortlessly. As long as they have their master's power they couldn't be beaten in the conventional sense, even if their fighting skills are shocking, but without it they're just like everybody else. Now we can see some major butt kicking from the heroes while they're trying to rescue Gohan.

I know there might be more explained about these God characters in the upcoming Dragonball Z Movie F, but I'm personally boycotting that movie due to its absurdity and pointlessness (honestly, it makes GT look more appealing). Battle of Gods was at least tolerable and had some great potential and ideas, but it was ultimately a rinse-and-repeat Goku glorification tale telling us for the hundredth time how great Goku is while sidelining the entire main cast.

This next chapter gives the other characters a time to shine, which is probably what the series after the Cell Games significantly lacked.

So let's check out the stats a little bit on the riki chart:
(Key: Super Saiyan God Goku = Godly ki 6, Beerus = Godly ki 10, Whis = Godly ki 15)

Power Levels:

Gods (Supreme Deities)

Whis – 150,000,000,000 riki (Godly ki 15)

Set, God of Storms – 190,000,000,000 riki (Godly ki 19)

Minions of Set (Minor Deities)

Shiera - 450,000,000 riki

Daryu – 450,000,000 riki

Tana – 200,000,000 riki

Kasim - 200,000,000 riki

Z-Fighters

Videl – 17,000,000 riki

Krillin – 20,000,000 riki

Android 18# - 40,000,000 riki

Trunks – 12,000,000 riki

Goten – 12,000,000 riki

Goten (Super Saiyan) – 80,000,000 riki

Piccolo (Full Power) – 210,000,000 riki

Vegeta – 26,000,000 riki

Vegeta (Super Saiyan) – 260,000,000 riki

Vegeta (Super Saiyan 2) – 460,000,000 riki

Zangya – 26,000,000 riki

Zangya (Full Power) – 260,000,000 riki
Zangya (Super Hera) – 460,000,000 riki

xxx

Gohan – 27,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan) – 270,000,000 riki

Gohan (Super Saiyan 2) – 470,000,000 riki
Stretching out from the Egret Necropolis over the dune seas making up the ancient desert, the sounds of an awesomely destructive battle could be heard echoing across the countryside. Explosions and shockwaves going off in a terrifying display of raw strength, speed and firepower never before seen on that part of the planet, any onlookers who were fortunate enough to be watching the performance from afar would easily mistake the chaotic scene to be a military bombardment. However, from the way the skies trembled and the continent shook following each individual discharge, the level of this battle was clearly in an entirely different league altogether. Any creature that happened to inadvertently wander into the battle's range would instantly be pulverized into oblivion due to the colossal force being exerted by all parties involved.

Over on a particular flat of desert, well out of reach of the pyramids sitting twenty miles away in the distance, a wall of dust was suddenly kicked up from the ground and sent hurtling into the sky when a massive, shadowy figure dashed at full speed across the dunes. Plowing through hill after the hill on his straight-line route, the bulky Pharaoh hound Daryu narrowed his eyes as he aimed himself at the golden form of his opponent on the other side of the plain.

Standing atop one of the countless hills making up the ocean of sand, Vegeta, thrusting a hand forward, charged a golden sphere of energy in his hand and took aim at his fast approaching foe.

Sweat poured down the prince's face as the aura surrounding his body intensified several times over. "Big Bang Attack!" With a clap of a sonic boom, the man let loose the ball of energy directly towards his target, intent on wiping him out in a single shot.

Gritting his teeth, the persistent Daryu timed his run with the fast approaching ball and, as soon as it came within range, the man gripped the handle of his battle axe over his shoulder and struck out, carving the sphere in two. Split down the center, the two halves of Vegeta's attack veered away and shot off in different directions, striking the countryside several kilometers out and causing two thermonuclear explosions in the distance.

Recoiling in alarm when his opponent failed to slow down, the Saiyan Prince threw up his guard before being hit by a full body check from Daryu crashing headlong into him. The force of impact generated a shockwave powerful enough to punch a crater in the ground beneath them, at the same time Vegeta's body was sent blasting across the valley and further into the desert. Several kilometers later, the man collided with a hill in a shower of dust and sand in the distance.

Smirking at the successful hit, the hulking hound took a step back and fell into an aggressive fighting stance, his flaming battle axe held firmly at his side. Positive he'd knocked his target out, the battered and bruised warrior then moved in with his follow-up attack. Leaning back and taking in a deep gulp of air, the dog then threw himself forward and, with a howl of fury, unleashed a gargantuan blast of fire from his throat.

"Amaterasu!" The blue jets of flame spewed out of Daryu's mouth and impacted the desert in front of him, setting it ablaze and instantly turning the sand into glass. Roasting anything organic in its path, the wall of fire spread for over thirty kilometers, widening the further it went and turning the already scorching wilderness into a surface equivalent to that of the sun itself.

The fire continued to leave the hound's lips like heat from a blowtorch. But just when it seemed like Daryu had wiped his foe off of the face of the planet, the sand at his feet suddenly burst upwards. In the blink of an eye, a fully powered Vegeta sprang out of the ground and uppercutted the son of a bitch in the chin. The blow landed with an earthshaking crack and knocked the dog high into the air.

Gritting his teeth at the burns and bruises he'd received from his opponent's attacks, the Super Saiyan 2 Vegeta leapt after the stunned dog and kicked him in the chest, sending his adversary plummeting back into a distant hill.

Smacking into it and exploding through the mound of sand, the dog flipped backwards and landed on all fours, sliding to a stop along the valley floor. Once his momentum had ceased, Daryu looked up in time to see the Saiyan Prince land a safe distance away, throw his hands forward, and begin launching multiple ki blasts in his direction.

Getting to his feet quickly, the warrior charged at the man, deflecting and knocking away blasts as if they were dodge balls, and zigzagging on his approach. This meant that a lot of the attacks the Saiyan hurled at the canine missed on their own accord, and by the time Daryu came too close for Vegeta to throw anymore, he'd managed to avoid a major bulk of the assault. In response to the gap being shaved away, the flame haired Saiyan hurriedly sprang into the air and caught his breath, allowing his muscular opponent to fly after him before engaging in another vicious exchange of blows. More shockwaves and yells of anger rang out as multiple attacks were parried and taken, before the two shot off at super speed to another part of the desert.

Meanwhile, fighting on his little corner of the region, Piccolo was having one hell of a party of his own.

Dodging a golden blast that streaked past him, the green warrior quickly powered up and rocketed into the sky as several more energy missiles came flying his way. Shooting up into the clouds and staying ahead of the barrage that was now chasing after him, the persistent Z-warrior performed several impressive evasive maneuvers. When the tracers failed to find a new target, he then decided to launch some countermeasures against the rounds.

Taking aim with his hand while continuing his retreat allowed Piccolo to launch a fully charged energy sphere at the approaching salvo. His powerful attack collided headlong with the first wave, causing an enormous explosion that took out the rest of them and formed a thick black layer of cloud beneath the airborne Namekian warrior.

Catching his breath safely out of reach of the blast front, Piccolo gritted his teeth when he saw another ki attack shoot out of the cloud and fly up at him like a rocket. Responding in kind, the man cocked his right hand over his left shoulder and chopped out, knocking the blast into the distance. "Eat this!" The second the attack was deflected, with the same hand he thrust two fingers forward and fired a powerful corkscrew beam back down at where the blast had come from. The attack blew away the rest of the smoke and rocketed towards the immense desert below.

The attack curving along its path soon descended upon the Akita hybrid standing in the middle of the orange valley. Spear held behind him in a wide stance, Kasim brought it forward and, with a stylish twirl, swung it out and smacked the Special Beam Cannon away, sending it hurtling into the distance. After it detonated harmlessly in the middle of the barren region with the force of a nuke, the triumphant but noticeably battle damaged dog warrior grinned before taking flight.
Kasim cocked his spear arm back as he rocketed into the air, at the same time bringing one hand forward and locking his eyes onto his opponent. In response Piccolo also dove towards his fast approaching foe, meeting him in the middle and greeting the strong fighter with a swinging overhand. The Akita dodged the blow and countered with a powerful body shot, only for the Namekian to block it with his elbow and slam a kick across the Akita's face. This then led to the pair trading a series of lightning fast blows, each landing upon their target with a solid impact, until Kasim brought his spear around and thrust out at his opponent.

Dodging it by an antenna, Piccolo dove for the ground, where he landed upon the sand and quickly threw himself into a fast series of back flips, allowing him to avoid his opponent when he chased after him. Kasim pursued, quickly catching his acrobatic foe and opening up on him with multiple jabs of his spear. Expression hardened, Namekian speedily avoided the blows, slipping left and right at blinding speed until his opponent curved a thrust and smacked him in the side of the head. The loud clang topped with a yell of pain signaling his opponent crumpling to the sand, Kasim then spun his weapon around and, with a loud roar, swung it at the man's head to take it clean off.

A loud 'thump' echoed out when Piccolo swiftly caught the staff with both hands, ignoring the blue fire that sprouted from it and began burning his palms.

Locking his opponent up, the pair began trying to overpower the other, growls of effort leaving their lips as they glared into the eyes of their enemy. Bleeding from the mouth with his body covered in multiple cuts, the Namekian then threw the Akita an evil grin. This immediately drew a frustrated snarl from his opponent, enabling Piccolo to take advantage of his temper and push the spear into the ground. Burying the tip into the sand gave the Z-fighter enough time to spring over it and thrust a side-kick into his opponent's face. The blow landed with a heavy 'thud', causing the spear wielding dog to stumble back across the dune in shock.

Shaking his head of the daze, Kasim growled a second time, "Damn you! Dei Lux!" After spinning his spear around, he then gripped it tightly in two hands, aimed it at his foe and, without warning, fired a powerful beam directly towards his target.

Reacting in alarm, Piccolo shot off to the side while the beam struck the sand he'd been standing on, carved straight through the desert, and flew off into the horizon. Without even bothering to stop, the powerful dog attempted to follow his target with his attack, which continued to fire and slice the tops off of several mountains hundreds of kilometers away. The beam was so long it traveled off of planet, showing the exact path of the attack as the Namekian flew up into the sky in an effort to divert its path.

Clicking his tongue in annoyance when he saw his opponent was still attempting to knock him out of the air with the continuous blast, Piccolo moved in swiftly to counter him. Increasing his flight speed and avoiding the slashes of the golden ray by moving in a wide arc around his opponent, the green warrior took aim and threw a long, right jab down at his foe. His light speed Mystic Attack slammed across the dog's face with a loud 'crack', catching Kasim off guard and causing him to stagger backwards.

Managing to regain his balance, the Akita looked up to see the Namekian diving at him at full speed. Piccolo's arm retracted and reeled him in, bringing the fighter within range to swing down at the dog with a wide hook in an effort to take him out for good. But the furry warrior leapt into the air at the last second, avoiding the blow and passing over his opponent at the same time. The jump into the sky allowed Kasim to put a great deal of space between him and his foe. Spinning about once he'd gained enough altitude, the wounded dog thrust his hand out and, with a yell of rage, unleashed a gargantuan golden blast down at his target.
His attack gushed out of his hand and enveloped the area of desert beneath him in a huge, dome shaped blast that seemingly swallowed up his opponent and rocked the countryside for miles around.

However, when the fire eventually settled and the smoke lifted, it revealed Piccolo standing in the center of an enormous crater, arms crossed over his face and a golden energy shield protecting him. When the barrier dispelled, the former guardian of earth peered over his guard and smirked at his stunned adversary.

Further out from the massive crater, over on another flat of desert, a green bolt of energy could be seen tearing across the endless orange fields at an insane speed. Kicking up sand and dust behind her in a large cloud that reached towards the stratosphere, an enraged Zangya barreled towards her opponent standing in the middle of the open prairie, who was already set into a defensive stance and waiting for her.

Gritting her teeth, the scar-faced and battered Shiera widened her feet and powered up, blue fire exploding from her body and enveloping her in a protective cloak.

A split second later, the pair began their battle anew. The sound of rapid cannon fire rang out when the Hera opened up on her foe with a blur of punches, which the collie began blocking and countering one after the other. The result was the dog woman being pushed back across the sands, in which the two of them engaged in a running fight from one part of the desert to the next. Reverberating across the landscape in all directions, the force of their multiple, planet splitting blows could be heard echoing for miles, as both attempted to land a decisive hit on the other. When Zangya pressed forward with her assault and continued to force Shiera sliding along the ground at the speed of a jet fighter, it seemed like the Z-fighter had the upper hand.

Soon enough the lightning fast exchange ended with Zangya delivering a solid body shot to her target's stomach, drawing a grunt of pain from the woman before the minion leader kicked the alien in the face. The blow sent the Hera blasting back through the air, spinning and tumbling.

Gritting her teeth, the red haired fighter threw her arms out and, with a quick burst of ki, halted herself in midflight, upside-down above the ground. As soon as her momentum ceased, Zangya shot down at her foe and, performing a graceful aerial spin, jetted towards her position at light speed. A split second later, following a series of sonic booms, the Hera collided headlong with Shiera and sent her spiraling across the terrain for over five kilometers.

Crying out in pain from the double hit to the chest that nearly caved in her sternum, the scar-faced collie gritted her teeth and glared back in the direction she'd been hit. Still in flight, the determined minion brought her flaming sword around and slashed it in a wide arc. The result was blue fire gushing off of the blade and unleashing an enormous arc of flaming energy across the desert, which grew and expanded as it traveled towards its intended target.

Spotting the length of fire charging towards her, a startled Zangya sliced her hand through the air and let loose her energy wires towards the attack. The near invisible strings cut the wave of fire to ribbons, dissipating it and leaving the Hera untouched by the embers.

However, just as the orange haired woman was trying to relocate her suddenly nonexistent enemy, a flash in her peripherals told her to duck and avoid the thrust of the sword from Shiera reappearing directly behind her. The dog woman gasped when she missed, unable to retract her arm in time when Zangya suddenly grabbed it and, with superb strength and skill, tossed her across the field and straight into the sand, which she bounced painfully across.

While her opponent was still in motion, the Hera slammed the bases of her palms in front of her and fired a powerful Kiai into the woman's retreating form, sending the canine plowing another trench a further kilometer across the dune seas.

When she eventually stopped amidst a thick cloud of dust, the battered and bleeding Shiera was on one knee and snarling in anger.

"I… can't… believe this!" the collie growled, one eye shut as blood trickled down her face from a new wound above her forehead. Clenching a fist in anger, she slammed it into the ground and stood up, where she then looked up to see her battered opponent appear in the sky some several stories above. "I'm getting beaten into the ground by an orange haired pixie wearing a G-string!"

Briefly taking note of her foe's scantily clad form, Shiera barked in frustration, "Are you honestly going to keep fighting me in those?!

Blinking in confusion, Zangya glanced down at the purple lingerie she was currently sporting and pulled at the elastic. A smug look appeared on her face shortly thereafter, "Not to worry. This underwear was put together by the finest seamstress in the entire industry." She then struck a pose you would often see used by a Calvin Klein model; pelvis thrust to the side, one hand on her hip and the other arm up and flexing her bicep. "It's extra durable!"

Shiera's hair bristled as she practically lost it, "YOU HAVE THAT MUCH FAITH IN YOUR UNDERWEAR?!

Huffing, the displeased Super Hera then lifted her nose at the irate dog and spoke up once again. "Frankly poochie, I don't give a shit what the hell I'm wearing as long as I'm able to kick your ass in it. So how about we cut the useless chitchat and pick up where we left off?" She then threw the woman a playful grin. "Last time I checked, I believe I was planting my foot firmly somewhere between your lungs and colon."

Eye twitching at being looked down on by a mortal trash talker, Shiera clenched her fists tightly as blue fire started to emanate from her shoulders. Her skin practically bubbling under the heat of her anger, the anthropomorphic dog gave an enraged snarl as her hand was pulled back before being thrust forward. "DON'T FK WITH ME!" With a clap of thunder, she unleashed an enormous golden blast from her palm that rocketed towards the airborne Zangya like an attack fired from the Death Star itself.

Speedily slipping to the side, Zangya watched the large blast streak past her and shoot up into the heavens, where it proceeded to travel across the solar system and through space for several seconds, before eventually arriving at another star altogether. The attack struck it, disintegrating the celestial body and whatever unfortunate series of planets that happened to be orbiting it at the time.

The Hera looked up where the blast had gone with her hand over her mouth in shock. "Oh, shit." Quickly returning her attention to the desert, the woman had a split second to duck the swing from her infuriated opponent. While Zangya successfully managed to evade the sword, her maneuver inadvertently left her wide open for a kick to the face. The blow landed hard, sending her blasting up into the sky.

Cursing at herself for her amateur mistake, the red haired woman stopped herself and glared back down at her opponent with blood running out of the corner of her mouth. "Alright. If that's how you want to play, come here!" She then powered up and went after Shiera with a vengeance.

And so the battle between the Minions of Set and the Z-fighters continued on across the desert.

The multiple battles continued their terrifying display in the distance, explosions and energy bursts going off all over. While all this was going on, the maestro behind this current fiasco and the only onlooker for miles around Set, continued to hold her position on the pyramid while maintaining a constant vigil over the region surrounding her. Sitting atop her specially made throne with her legs crossed, her cheek rested on her knuckles and her elbow propped atop the arm rest, the God of Storms stared across the plains of lifeless desert towards the horizon, eyes shifting left and right, and keeping track of the war that was moving faster than the human eye could see.

With her perception though, the speed the fighters were moving at appeared to Set in super slow motion and she was effortlessly able to capture every second of the group's respective engagements. The power being displayed by all the combatants was simply astonishing and, in spite of being leagues ahead of them, the woman couldn't resist giving silent compliments to the Z-fighters for their ability to keep pace with her minions.

"Impressive," the woman murmured quietly, her bushy tail wagging behind her comfortably, "Most impressive."

The prospect of her new group being formed out of the victors of this conflict filled the canine deity with a sense of anticipation and excitement. But she didn't let this sensation show on her face. Determined to maintain her image and unwavering position in this situation, Set's expression remained devoid of any real emotion. She merely sat there, her face serious as she kept track of each of the four battles taking place before her.

As the minutes continued to tick by, Set completely disregarded the presence of the unconscious Gohan lying several meters behind her in the center of the ceremonial circle that'd previously been used to siphon energy from his body. His breathing even and heartbeat having slowed to a snail's crawl, the demi-Saiyan's body was doing everything it could to compensate for the enormous amount of ki that'd been drained from his tank. Due to the forceful nature in which his life force had been pulled out of him, the teen had inadvertently been put into a sort of hibernation state. Even though the world was shaking and exploding all around him, threatening to cave in at any moment, he didn't react or stir in any way, shape or form, and simply lay there baking under the midday sun.

However, unbeknownst to the God of Storms and the demi-Saiyan himself, an unusual phenomenon began to take place.

The gateway to the Nexus, which had served as the entrance to the prison for Set since the days of the ancient pharaohs, was still open. Due to its unconventional design and having served as the penitentiary for a deity for over twenty thousand years, the entire dimension beyond the threshold had become perforated with celestial energy, which was now continuing to seep out of the chamber and into the earth's atmosphere.

Since the energy wasn't harmful to the environment in any way, this didn't come as an immediate problem to Set or her minions, all of whom had completely forgotten about the gateway and the purpose it once held. After spending several centuries locked away inside of it and away from the world, the last thing the God of Storms wanted to think about was the current state of her prison and the crap that was still inside of it.

But due to this seemingly inconsequential oversight, as the deity carried on watching her minions duke it out with the Z-fighters several miles away, the energy leaking out of the white portal began to emanate at a faster rate. Propelled by some ghostly force, the purple, smoke-like essence slowly started to creep across the floor of the terrace and towards the unconscious Gohan.

Ear twitching, Set suddenly glanced over her shoulder and towards the pyramid when she felt something unusual tickling at the back of her neck. Thinking someone was behind her, the woman took a moment to look over the archway to the prison and then the half-Saiyan teenager lying behind her. Seeing nothing and sensing nothing out of the ordinary, the woman narrowed her eyes on the comatose warrior and turned back to staring at the horizon.

The instant she did however, the energy flowing from the pyramid's gateway intensified and, a couple seconds later, the ki creeping across the floor reached Gohan's body. The transparent purple flames then wrapped around the Saiyan's motionless form and began seeping into his body, little by little trickling into his pores.

As the seconds rolled by, the hybrid's heartbeat started to get stronger and the color that was once lost from his complexion began returning to his skin.

Fortunately for him Set was too busy to notice any of this.

While energy continued to leak into Gohan's body, the God of Storms suddenly sensed a powerful ki signature approaching the planet and looked up. The second she did so, the fox deity saw a bright mass of energy break through the atmosphere before landing on the terrace just a few yards away from her. Crashing into the stone ground with an earthshaking 'crack', the mass of energy dissipated to reveal a familiar blue-skinned, robe wearing figure wielding a large scepter.

As soon as the dust settled from the person's landing, Set saw that the white haired newcomer, who she always remembered having a carefree and cheerful attitude twenty-four-seven, was staring at her with an expression filled with seriousness and disdain.

What more could she expect from the man who raised her?

A smirk slowly pulled across the laidback God as she caught a firsthand glimpse of the man's fury, "Hello there, Whis."

"Hello to you too, Set," the staff-wielding visitor with the oddly combed hair replied calmly, eyes narrowing on the girl sitting comfortably in the stone seat. "You're looking well."

The dog goddess lifted her head ever so slightly, "As are you… master."

"Please don't call me that," Whis promptly answered, a dark shadow crossing his eyes as he glared back at the fox goddess. His fingers curling tightly around his staff, the man regarded the idol with nothing but caution and disapproval. "You lost that privilege the day you tried to kill your friends and take over the universe… the same universe that you swore to protect."

"Oh, of course… silly me," Set exclaimed, placing a hand on her head and breathing out a sigh in a feigned attempt to convey shock and dismay. But from the smug grin that appeared across her lips moments later, it was clear that she was not at all moved by his reminder. "How could I possibly forget about that?"

"Don't act so smug," the attendant spoke again with noticeably more spite in his voice, cutting the woman off from her dramatic presentation. "You know full well what you did… and so do I."

"Hmph. Someone woke up on the wrong side of the bed this morning." Lowering her hand from her beautiful red hair, the fox woman chuckled and returned to reclining back in her seat, "So… to what do I owe the pleasure of your company?"

Whis, his face hardening like steel, frowned across at his former student, "Take a guess. I'm sure someone as smart as you can figure it out."

Looking over the man's left and right shoulders, as well as taking a quick scan of the area, Set then gave her visitor a curious eyeball. "I notice you haven't brought along any of the other Gods. Ra… Zeus… Artemis… Thor… Indra…" She then tilted her head a little in his direction. "All of the deities that could possibly pose any kind of problem for me aren't here. So what's the deal? Were you planning on trying to fight me all by yourself?"

"I was planning on doing the opposite, actually," Whis replied, bringing his staff up and taking a single step forward. A much calmer expression soon came over his face, reflecting both poise and sincerity. "Don't be so quick to jump to conclusions. I didn't come here to fight you, Set. I came here to speak with you."

It was at this statement, Set's head was thrown back and a chorus of hysterical laughter suddenly left her lips.

Her body trembling for a good long minute as the rush of amusement ran its course, the woman stopped bawling long enough to catch her breath and leer back at her teacher. "And what exactly did you hope to accomplish from that? Were you going to try and reason with me? Huh? Negotiate some sort of truce on behalf of the rest of the universe? How about convince me to go back into my prison and think about what I've done for another ten thousand years?" The woman then allowed her grin to falter somewhat as she regarded her teacher with interest and mirth. "Don't make me laugh, Whis. Your little mind games won't work on me anymore. I know exactly why you're here."

She then jerked her nose at him. "You were planning on trying to kill me yourself while keeping the others out of it… to stop them from getting hurt like in our last battle. Is that it?"

Whis actually flinched at her statement. It was a response that drew a chuckle from the evil God and had her cross her legs the other way.

"Always the good little errand boy," Set whispered, shaking her head sadly at the blue-skinned guardian while her expression darkened. "And here I thought you were just a devoted practitioner in the art of fence-sitting… always hanging in the background while the rest of the universe tore itself apart." Her expression then narrowed dangerously, "How gutless. Perhaps when I'm done here with you, I will go pay the other Gods a visit and ask them what they think of your 'peaceful' ideals."

By this point in the conversation the attendant had had enough with this little back and forth. His hand tightening around his scepter like a vice, Whis threw the woman a wave of killing intent. The blast was so palpable it actually caused the entire pyramid to crack and a blast of wind to ripple out in all directions, damaging the rest of the surrounding structure. "This battle is between you and me. Leave the others out of this."

The female deity snorted at the man's declaration, "I see…" Exhaling again and closing her eyes, Set casually turned her head away to rest her cheek against her knuckles once more. It was in that moment, as her energy started to build, dark clouds swiftly began to gather above the two individuals. While the battle between the Minions of Set and the Z-fighters raged across the countryside around them, the atmosphere darkened, thunder echoed down from the heavens, and a cyclone twisted into existence directly above the woman's pyramid. It was an anomaly that Whis noticed, but paid little attention.

However, the growing intensity caused sweat to accumulate on his head, as he knew exactly what kind of force he was dealing with here.

Her celestial energy growing little by little, the goddess of storms and chaos narrowed her eyes on her former teacher as a sickly smile remained on her face, "So… that is how it's going to be then?"

"That is how it must be," Whis responded immediately, taking up his staff and sliding into a fighting stance, cocking his head to the side and shooting the woman another look.

His answer drawing a momentary glance from Set, the pair remained stationed as they were for several seconds longer, staring each other down from their places on the terrace. The sky falling dark and the sun vanishing behind the eerie veil, the stage was all set for a battle with the potential to shake the very planet off of its foundations. A cold wind picking up around them and ruffling their hair, a deathly silence soon fell around them.

Then, just as the intensity of their faceoff crawled towards its highest peak, the inevitable happened.

Without warning, Set's form vanished from her seat in a blur, causing Whis's gaze to shoot straight up in alarm and a flash of lightning to fall upon the area. There, silhouetted against the grey clouds, he saw the shadow of his student diving towards him at an insane speed. Eyes widening in horror, the attendant back-flipped away as fast as he could, barely avoiding the axe kick Set aimed at him and slammed into the stone floor of the terrace. In the blink of an eye, the woman punched a massive crater into the balcony's floor, a deafening shockwave ringing out that drowned out the sound of the thunderclap above.

By the time Whis stopped back flipping and landed on another part of the terrace, Set was already on the offensive. When the man looked up, he saw the fox deity effortlessly flick an enormous slab of stone the size of a truck into the air and, with a quick spin, kicked the jagged rock towards the warrior at high speed.

Responding instantly, Whis spun on the spot and thrust two fingers forward in a jabbing motion, intercepting the projectile. Thanks to his quick maneuver, the guardian not only managed to stop the block of stone dead, but he also shattered it into hundreds of pieces. It was an easy move.

But the instant the rock started to blast apart, flying directly through the hail of rubble Set came lunging in afterwards. Using the rock to mask her movements and the debris as cover, the woman dived right at her former teacher through the sleet, her fist cocked back and a dog-like snarl escaping her lips.

Whis only had enough time for his eyes widen in surprise before the mother of all haymakers was slammed into his face, the blow connecting with a bone-shattering 'crack' and sending him rocketing through the temple built atop the terrace behind him. The man's form shot through the structure several times faster than light, going through every single wall and blasting apart the shrine like it was confetti. When the walls failed to stop him, the attendant rocketed over the horizon.

About a hundred miles and several mountains later, Whis soon managed to regain his senses and, upon righting himself in midflight, threw his feet back and slammed them into the ground. When he eventually skidded to a stop several seconds later, he found he'd dug a half a mile trench across a valley and was now standing in the middle of a rocky wasteland.

Ignoring the blood trickling out of the corner of his mouth, the slightly battered Whis quickly took a fighting stance and watched as Set teleported into view several yards away. When she emerged from the black smoke, her eyes were glowing blood red and her expression reflected nothing but fury and resentment.

Marching towards her opponent, the fox deity barked, "I rotted in prison for twenty thousand years because of your betrayal!"

Whis immediately took offense to her accusation and yelled right back at her, "I only did what I believed was right!"

Set jabbed a finger in his direction, stopping in her tracks as storm clouds once again began gathering overhead. "When I was young, you said to me that I would become your successor… that when the time came for you to step down from your post, I would be the one to take your place as teacher and guardian. But when the oracle fish said otherwise, saying that I would never be fit for your mantel… what did you do?" Clenching her fist tightly and causing her knuckles to pop loudly as she did so, the fox woman sneered at the man. "You turned your back on me! You tossed me away like I was some poultry thing from your plate and cast me into the shadows, and turned your attention to another prodigy! What kind of master would do that to their student?!

The attendant shouted back desperately, "You were never meant to be my successor! That was not my fault!"

"Not… your… FAULT!" Set barked, once again beginning her march towards the man as her body suddenly became shrouded in a dark aura. Black smoke wafted out of her pores as thunder and lightning echoed all around them, emphasizing the woman's fury as she advanced on her master. "Who told me that I could chart my own course in life?!

Coming upon a massive boulder in her path, Set took a step towards it, "Who filled my head with dreams and promises?!!" She then kicked it at Whis, sending it at him at blinding speeds and forcing him to dodge it. The rock soared towards the horizon and struck a mountain a hundred kilometers away, smashing the entire top off of it.

Not even pausing for a second, the woman stepped towards another enormous rock and, picking it up with one hand, hurled it at her former master, "Who drove me to train until my bones cracked!" The blue warrior ducked under it, watching it arc through the air and take out another mountain in a colossal explosion of rubble and debris.

Purple electricity starting to stream off of her, Set took a deep breath before, crossing her arms over her chest, threw them outwards with a mighty bellow, "WHO DENIED ME MY DESTINYyyyyyyyyyyyyyyyy!!!" An awesome shockwave exploded off of her body, sending a powerful gust of wind blasting towards Whis. The gale was so powerful it not only tore an enormous crater around her and sent debris pelting through the air like it was made out of rice paper, it also turned every single plateau and tor surrounding the area for a hundred miles into dust.

Bringing his staff around, the God of Destruction's assistant held his ground as he was struck by the one thousand mile per hour winds, which ripped into his body and pushed him along the floor for several meters. Managing to stop himself from flying off, Whis then brought his scepter to the side and slammed the tip into the floor, marking his spot where he would make his stand.

The trainer growled as he watched the woman return to a normal standing position, her expression twisted with rage. 'I'm sorry, Set! But that choice was never mine to begin with!"

Huffing several times, the fox woman then took a moment to close her eyes and ease her temper. Exhaling deeply after several seconds, the storm deity straightened up and, once the aura from her body faded, she threw a glare across at the person she once called teacher. Her body relaxing as she took in Whis's current condition, a smirk slowly reappeared across her face.

"We always have a choice… master," Set spoke, her fists tightening with a series of cracks. "And right now… I choose to see how many bones I can break in your body before you decide to throw in the towel." She then started to amble in his direction once again.
However, the instant she took that first step, Whis was prepared. Eyes widening, the martial arts master spun his staff around and, upon taking it up into a two-handed grip, thrust the tip forward and fired an enormous energy wave from the headpiece. A gargantuan green blast exploded from the scepter's tip like a blowtorch and rocketed towards Set, swallowing her up before rocketing into space across the planet's surface. The blast was so wide and so powerful, it not only tore a hole through the atmosphere, it also dwarfed the first time Vegeta used his Final Flash.

The attack, which would have easily engulfed both the moon and the planet, continued out of the solar system, across the Milky Way and towards a cluster of other galaxies. By the time the green attack left the spiral arm of the star system, it'd grown so large that it would've been able to take out the entire Andromeda system in one shot. But instead of hitting the Milky Way's neighbor, it instead struck two other galaxies and wiped them out of existence, while the blast itself continued to travel off into the far corners of the quadrant.

Energy continuing to leave his scepter like an unending river, Whis roared through a clenched jaw as he put everything he had into his attack. Well aware that he'd accidentally taken out a couple other star clusters with the same move, he carried on feeding all of the ki he could muster into the beam, which continued to tear away at the earth's surface. From a distance it looked as though he'd managed to disintegrate her or was close to finishing her off.

But in the very heart of the blast, just several yards away from where Whis was launching it, the silhouette of the God of Storms could be seen standing perfectly in its center. Feeling the flames of the attack lick away at her fur, the woman exhaled deeply and closed her eyes.

"Disappointing…"

All of a sudden, Whis's blast was stopped when a vortex of black clouds exploded from the middle and began deflecting the attack. Even though the instructor's beam attempted to push past the barrier of swirling smoke, it was simply split as the mass of dark energy expanded more and more.

The attendant quickly cut off the flow of power to his blast and recoiled in disbelief, watching the black clouds rise up into the sky and take on shape. The collection of gases soon accumulated into a writhing mass of palpable energy, resembling that of a necromancer from the darkest pits of the underworld. The sound it also emitted was spine chilling as the body of smoke jerked, twisted, contorted and fluctuated like crazy.

At its center, the God of Storms stood, her red eyes blaring through the phantom like veil. When Whis saw the eyes lock onto him, he immediately took a step back.

By the time the aura of clouds emanating from Set's body stabilized, it was now bigger than the planet's tallest mountains.

"Twenty thousand years of peace have made you soft… master," Set's voice boomed from inside the writhing mass.

Acting quickly, Whis brought his scepter up high and produced a blinding flash of light from the gem at the end. A dome of transparent gold energy then burst forth from the staff and surrounded its wielder, expanding at a terrific speed. As it grew to the size of a building, the mass of black smoke gathered around Set dove in and began ramming into the barrier from the front.

Tendrils of the black cloud formed and attempted to burrow into the translucent shield. With every impact of the smoke's multiple arms, shockwaves rang out, which tore apart the surrounding landscape. Despite the damages already brought onto it by Set's gale and Whis's blast, more and more damage began to stack up as the two otherworldly warriors clashed with their respective energies. While the gold barrier certainly did well in holding its own against the black aura's opening blows, as the tug of war carried on, the shield started to get smaller and smaller.

The pressure of the dark cloak being emitted from the God of Storms began to overwhelm the attendant's pall of light.

Blue bolts of lightning began to shoot off of Set's body as she poured more energy into her dark mass. The increase in power caused Whis to stumble, the man taking up his staff into two hands in an effort to hold back the flow. The dam was holding. But with every second that ticked by, his defense started to deteriorate just as the earth around him began to split.

The countryside cracking under the insane amounts of force being exerted upon a single point, the tug of war match soon reached its end point.

Under the raging maelstrom that was Set's cloak, Whis gave his shield one last burst of energy in an attempt to halt the woman's attack. He'd put up a good fight. But while the man was struggling just to stay on his feet, in the middle of her black mass of energy, Set stood before him with her arms folded and a bored look on her face.

The deity watched her attack hammer away at her teacher's shield, counting down the seconds to the moment of his defeat. When she eventually saw the man drop to his knee and give a yell of agony, the God of Storms decided that she'd had enough with this game and, uncrossing her arms, threw her hands forward for a decisive blow.

The arms of her black cloud reared back before slamming down on top of the energy dome, shattering it and causing Whis to stumble away in shock.

As soon as the shield was down, the phantom clouds surrounding Set were speedily sucked back into her body. The instant they retreated into her pores, the woman cocked her hand beside her and thrust it forward, unleashing a concentrated blast of the same black energy towards her master.

Using his scepter, Whis held it up in front of him and produced another blue energy barrier. This took the form of a rectangular shield that deflected the black smoke when it attempted to strike him down. Gritting his teeth, the attendant held back the tidal wave of dark energy, which caused his defense to crack down the middle but ultimately failed in getting through to him.

But just when it seemed like the battering match would continue, Set suddenly sucked back the dark clouds she was shooting out of her palm. Calling it in, she then gathered the smoke between two hands and, taking aim as the energy started to take shape and crackle, she then hurled it at her master a second time. The result was countless bolts of blue lightning being fired indiscriminately from her hands to pepper the landscape surrounding Whis, a salvo of random attacks that had the instructor stumbling backwards in shock.

Managing to protect himself with his scepter, deflecting several of the electrical currents, the guardian then watched Set leap into the sky and become suspended several stories above the ground. When his eyes glued onto her, Beerus's teacher watched the dark clouds in the atmosphere circle around his former student, a sight that gave her a far more intimidating image.

Her shadow fell over the entire region like that of the Angel of Death's.

"I will not let you take this universe, Set!" Whis shouted, bringing his staff forward and holding it above his head threateningly.

Set chuckled darkly as she held her arms further out. "Really? And what makes you think that you are in any fit shape to stop me?" she asked, her words causing beads of sweat to trickle down the man's brow. Upon instilling fear in the warrior, she then brought her right hand up and held it above her head, "You were the one who taught me everything I know today about fighting. But let's see how you deal with one of my original techniques!" All of a sudden, a black sphere of energy shrouded in orange fire formed above her palm, which began sucking in all of the air around it. In a matter of seconds, the entire region around them started to fall apart.

From out of nowhere, a powerful pulling force began drawing everything across the countryside towards the sphere. It was an invisible force that not only started ripping the ground beneath the woman apart, it also tore mountains out of the earth and nearby forests out of the soil, dragging everything into the sky and sucking it into the vortex. Even the clouds above Set started to circle and drift towards the source of the anomaly.

Whis, feeling the gravitational pull of the planet vanish and become replaced by this new, overpowering force, had to hold onto the ground with everything he had to stop from being lifted up into the sky along with everything else. Looking up in disbelief, the man watched as enormous chunks of the landscape started to orbit around Set, before suddenly being sucked into the drain that was the sphere of black energy she was holding above her head. At first he had no idea what it was.

But seconds into the struggle, Whis soon identified the orb above Set as a miniature black hole.

Eyes widening as he felt the light and the planet begin to get attracted towards the portal as it grew stronger and stronger, the attendant continued to keep himself anchored. But as he watched an entire mountain get crushed up and sucked into the black hole, pulverizing it into oblivion, the man knew he had to do something soon or watch the entire solar system get crushed into nothingness.

With a yell of rage, Whis thrust his scepter up and fired an invisible blast at his student, striking the ball she was producing and dispelling it. However, the blowback of his attack was so great that it not only effectively dispelled the spatial rupture it also caused a shockwave that traveled back to the heroic user and shattered his scepter, sending the man tumbling painfully to the ground.

As chunks of the countryside plummeted back to the planet's surface when earth's normal gravity kicked in, Whis slowly but surely struggled to his feet. With his hand cooked and scarred from his staff exploding between his fingers, the man glared up at the clouds through a half-lidded gaze to see his student smirking down at him.

Not at all put off by her attack being stopped, Set cocked her head upwards and leered. "Now that's more like it." She then vanished, shooting straight towards the planet and landing just a few feet in front of her master. "Let's see what else you've got."

Seeing Set reappear directly in front of him prompted Whis to leap to his feet and retreat. Jumping back across the ruined terrain as fast as he could, the trainer threw his hand forward and, with a shout, fired a compressed blue sphere of energy the size of a basketball towards the woman.

Watching the slow moving ki attack approach her, the God of Storms raised an eyebrow in amusement. She then lifted a finger to poke at it as it closed the gap between them.

"You're such a cute one. What's your little name?" she asked curiously.

The instant it touched her finger however, the little ball went up in an enormous, dome shaped explosion that was three times larger than a thermonuclear bomb. Compressing a blast capable of wiping out an entire galaxy to a single area, Whis managed to shoot up into the sky fast enough to avoid getting caught up in the heart of it. Sporting various bruises and burns, with sweat dripping down his face, the man watched from the clouds as the explosion punched an enormous crater into the desert.

But just when he was beginning to believe he'd managed to damage his former student, he suddenly saw a black figure dart out of the fire and shoot up at him faster than he could track. Before he could respond accordingly, the figure crashed into him from below and sent him blasting up into orbit with a single kick.

Effortlessly breaching the atmosphere of the planet, Whis tumbled and spiraled as he tried to slow down. By the time he managed to halt his momentum, Set had managed to catch up to him once again. Powering up, the instructor of the Gods shrouded himself in blue energy and shot off further into space, with the dog deity doing the same and giving chase. Taking the form of two bolts of light, the pair danced across the celestial plains together, intercepting over and over, and engaging in a furious exchange of blows.

Shockwaves echoed throughout the deathly silence of the vacuum. Even though there was nothing out there to see or hear the battle, the force of their blows was so immense that they literally shifted planets out of their orbit ever so slightly.

Clashing every time they blew past each other, the pair continued to battle it out across the solar system. It was only when they flew into Mars's orbit and they began approaching the red planet's surface that the results of their brief clash became known.

Whis was now sporting more bruises and wounds then before. With his eye swollen shut and blood trickling from both his head and mouth, the man looked like he'd taken the beating of a lifetime. Panting heavily as he watched his student charge towards him, he cocked his hand back and prepared for a hit.

Set on the other hand looked completely untouched. With a calm and obviously pleased expression on her face, the woman crashed into her master with a blow of her own, the pair trading hits and parrying their opponent's at the same time with a deafening artillery clap. As they fought, the pair orbited the new planet, dealing blow after blow in a hopes of taking the other out. It appeared even at first. But after several more hits, Whis's energy began to drop.

Taking a kick to the body and across the face, the attendant's head was then knocked back by a hook crashing across his cheek. The attack drawing blood and causing a shockwave to echo around them, the man then deflected another butterfly kick from his student as the two of them began to drop out of Mars's orbit. As their bodies picked up speed, the trainer ducked a clawed strike from his student, avoiding a potentially lethal blow before bringing his arms up defensively.

He then saw Set lunge in with another wide hook. Taking his chance, Whis slipped it, caught the wrist, and twisted it around the woman's side. As soon as he did he leapt onto her back and, while holding her arm behind her, drove his heel into the groove of her neck. This stretched her out to what he knew was an uncomfortable position, locking her up and pushing her down as they began to plummet towards the surface of Mars.

Whis looked like he finally had her.

But when the girl glanced over her shoulder and glowered at him, the man knew instantly it wasn't over.

All of a sudden, Set cocked her free arm back and, with ridiculous flexibility, slammed two elbows into the man's face. Hitting him twice, she managed to free herself from the arm lock and, with a quick reversal, she managed to grab the man by the throat and switch places with him, putting her teacher at the front of their dive. With a loud battle cry, the God of Storms pushed her former master through the atmosphere of the planet. As a result, the pair started to burn up, with Whis's back taking the full brunt of their entry.

As soon as they plummeted into the Mars's air space, the pair continued to drop towards the ground. But just when they were about several dozen feet above the floor, Set then did something completely unexpected and, with a quick spin, she threw Whis up and slammed a kick into his stomach, sending the man rocketing over the horizon.

Spinning out of control, the blue-skinned teacher slammed into the mountainous surface of the valley and bounced several times. He eventually stopped moments later in the middle of an open plain, pushing himself onto his hands and knees, and coughing up blood.

Shaking as he stood, Whis's swollen eyes then turned to see Set land several feet away. Rising up from the floor, the fox woman's ears twitched as a very foul smirk crossed her face. "Come now. That was just a love tap." Cracking her neck to the side and stretching out her muscles, the woman once again set her sights squarely upon her wounded adversary. "It's really something, isn't it? Years ago I was so proud of the power I was able to achieve training under you. But then, out of nowhere, people just as strong as me started showing up one after the other to challenge my strength." When she saw her teacher grit his teeth and take a step back, the deity's expression then became more excited as she reared her head back and yelled boisterously across at him. "Those were the good old days! I had challenges back then! Today… I am incomparably stronger!"

A confused expression fell upon Whis. But just before he could figure out what his student meant by that announcement, he suddenly saw Set clench her fists, widen her stance, and with a loud howl of effort, allowed a shroud of blue energy to explode from her body like a hurricane.

Bolts of lightning streaming up and down the vortex of ki, the goddess of storms produced a gale so powerful that it damn near knocked her teacher off his feet. Her power up punching a massive crater into the desert beneath her, the woman drew on all of the celestial energy inside of her and flexed her muscles for her battle damaged instructor. By the time she finished powering up and the aura blasting around her had stabilized, a horrified look had fallen over the attendant's face.

Swallowing nervously, Whis gawked at his student's glowing form. "No way! She's even more powerful than she was when we sealed her!"

Apparently her twenty thousand years of confinement had been good to her.

After seeing her teacher back down, Set allowed the aura of blue energy and lightning to fade from her. Appearing refreshed, the fox deity then began strolling towards her foe, watching him back away while maintaining a defensive position. But with the amount of power she'd just displayed as well as the ease of which she was able to block his attacks, even his most threatening death glare didn't even come close to fazing her.

"Now then… where were we?"

The instant she asked that question, Whis, gathering all the energy he could muster, suddenly widened his eyes and, with a flash of his irises, fired a powerful Kiai straight into his student. The invisible blast struck the woman full on and cocked her head back, stopping her in her tracks and seemingly damaging her. Heck, the blast was strong enough that it was able to punch a two hundred meter wide trench in the direction it'd traveled and caused several mountains in the distance to collapse. It seemed like a sure hit.

But moments later, as the exhausted Whis gained some breathing distance, he suddenly saw Set straighten up and smile back at him. She was both unfazed and undamaged, a sight that had her teacher balk in horror.

The deity grinned, "Was that your best shot?" A scoff soon followed when she saw the guardian take a cautious step away from her. "Now let me show you mine." At that moment, the girl's eyes widened and flashed red.

A split second later, Whis was suddenly struck by a terrifyingly powerful gale of wind. However, instead of just pushing the trainer back, the attendant to the God of Destruction let out a scream of agony as his body quite literally warped under the force of the blast and his skin felt like it was going to be ripped from his body. The shockwave that hit him punched a five kilometer wide crater behind him, not only disintegrating a great portion of Mars's landscape, but also distorting the surface of the planet itself.

Several moments of agonizing pain later, the teal-skinned fighter was sent hurtling into the distance, barreling across the landscape like a ragdoll. He continued to travel for several hundred miles. It wasn't until the land started to slope that he eventually crash landed at the base of a hill. Once his momentum ceased, the man had bounced a fifth of the distance around the whole planet.

Struggling to his feet was a nightmare. Bolts of pain shooting through him, the determined instructor groaned and shouted as he stumbled into a hunched over position, blood trickling down his face and his body covered in multiple cuts and bruises. His eyes shooting in the direction he'd come, the teal-skinned alien then saw his student Set flying towards him at blinding speed, her hands behind her and a serious look on her face.

The time it took to reach him gave Whis a moment to catch his breath and take a defensive stance. When she slid to a stop several feet in front of him, the deity's blue aura suddenly exploded around her before concentrating around her hands. As soon as her energy focused up, her palms lit up with blue fire, which burned brilliantly as she quickly formed them into fists and, without a moment's hesitation, began ramming them into her master over and over.

"Everything I did, I did to make you proud!" the God of Storms shouted, slamming a variety of combinations into her teacher as he retreated, desperately blocking her flaming blows. "Tell me how proud you are, Whis! Tell me!" More attacks rained down on the battered attendant, who grunted and yelped with every hit he attempted to block. Eventually, the attacks became some brutal and so forceful that even when they were successfully parried or deflected, the punches still put damage on their target. Whis was hanging on by a thread.

A few more blows later, the inevitable happened.

"TELL ME!" With one final yell, Set spun and drove a double-fisted blow into her master's chest, sending the man blasting across the countryside.

Tumbling to a stop a mile later, his body smoking and singed from the punishment, Whis let out a strangled gasp of shock and slowly started to push himself back up. But after all the damage he had suffered up until now, he would be lucky to even get onto all fours.

While he was still eating dirt, Set extinguished the flames on her arms and began marching towards her fallen adversary.

But as she did, amidst the pain racking his body and the ruin that'd been brought down upon the planet, Whis began to speak. "I… have always been… proud of you," the fighter whispered, shaking his head as he gripped at the red soil beneath his fingers, "From the very first moment… I've been… proud of you." Hearing the woman's footsteps stop, the man looked up to see what'd happened. Almost instantly he saw Set was staring down at him silently, ears and eyes wide open, and her fists unclenched. "You were my greatest treasure… my greatest student… and I loved you… as if you were my own daughter." Tears formed in the corners of the guardian's eyes as he gazed across at her. "I loved you so much… that I couldn't bear to face you… when I was told you couldn't be my successor. I was a coward… and I was weak." The man swallowed heavily as his expression reflected nothing but grief. "I… I'm sorry, Set."

The female deity stood in place, her eyes reflecting her astonishment at what Whis had just told her. Her irises shimmering as she looked the man squarely in the eyes, she saw for herself that what he had to say was the truth. It was these very words that had her freeze and remain in place as her mind wrapped around his words little by little.

For the next couple of minutes both master and student stared at one another, neither one knowing what to say next or how the other person was going to react. After a long moment had passed, it was anyone's guess as to how the ice was going to crack.

Eventually though, time had to start ticking again, and once Set had processed everything the man had spoken to her, the woman closed her eyes and lowered her head, as if conceding defeat.

"I appreciate that… master," were the first words out of her mouth.

…

…

…

All of a sudden, the goddess thrust her hand forward and fired a swift Kiai, knocking the man off of the floor and spinning through the air. When Whis crash landed several yards away, Set flexed her fingers and generated a stream of electricity, which ran up and down her limbs. Once she'd gathered enough energy, she restarted her stroll towards her teacher.

"But if you think apologizing is going to stop me from taking over this world, you're wrong," Set spoke, her eyes narrowing darkly upon the man, "I've come too far to simply give up on my ambitions now." When she stopped alongside the wounded warrior, she saw him look up at her through a pained expression and hardened expression. The sight of him had the woman frown. "Don't worry. I won't kill you. But I'll make sure you have a front row seat to watch the destruction of the old universe and the beginning of the new."

When Whis glared up at his former student, all he saw reflected in her eyes was determination and a red, demonic glow in each of her pupils.

"The Age of Set… begins now."

XXX

(Back on Earth)

An explosion ripping across the sands sent Videl bouncing across the soft floor, the girl crying out when she hit the surface with her back, elbow, shoulder, and then her back again, before eventually rolling to a stop. Groaning as the dust from her landing settled around her, the teenager in the white and pink shirts pushed herself off of the grained surface and looked up. Coughing on the sand that got in her mouth, the battered and bruised girl then gazed across valley she'd been thrown over. As soon as she did, she saw her opponent emerge from behind the wall of smoke, which parted the moment she strolled into view.
Her eyes landing upon her Ibizan hound opponent wielding the two flaming batons, the raven haired tomboy groaned painfully and pushed herself onto one knee to glare across at the minor deity.

"Okay… this isn't going very well," Videl spoke, openly admitting to the issue that she was currently faced with.

After all her years of hard training, the girl thought she would be prepared to face whatever super powered enemies were likely to show up. Even though she was well aware that guys like Gohan, Zangya and Piccolo were much more powerful than her, she still believed she'd grown enough in her time as a fighter to be able to accomplish something with her abilities. But as it turns out, this foe that she was confronting alongside Krillin, Android 18, Goten and Trunks, was far stronger than she'd previously expected.

So far the canine warrior had spent the better part of the last hour leisurely kicking her and the others around the lifeless wasteland. Despite being backed up by the likes of Eighteen and Goten, this woman was still proving to be more of a challenge than they could've hoped for. If Videl was reading the airways right, in terms of raw power and strength, she estimated that their adversary was about the same level as Piccolo. That easily placed her in the Super Saiyan class. Thanks to a combination of flight, speed, dodging abilities and luck, the five of them had been able to hold out against her.

However, Videl wasn't sure if they would be able to keep this up much longer.

Unless Piccolo, Vegeta and Zangya were able to take care of their opponents quickly enough to come help them, then she was at a loss as to what they could possibly do.

"Who knows… maybe she'll get tired," Videl thought optimistically, watching as the smirking dog marching towards her raised her batons and cross them over her chest. When she did, Tana's whole body suddenly became encased in blue fire. It was a sight that had the tomboy cringe nervously.

"Oh, who am I kidding. We're boned."

Seeing her opponent get up several yards away, the Ibizan grinned viciously. "Ready or not… here I come!" With a yell, the minion then charged towards the human at a ridiculous speed, her form resembling a living comet as it streaked across the dunes towards the grounded fighter.

Eyes widening in panic, the tomboy quickly leapt into the air and avoided the woman when she swung in with one of her batons. When she missed, the blazing warrior ended up striking the sand, causing a geyser like blast that filled the sky, as if a depth charge had been set off. As soon as she jumped into the air, Videl cupped her hands over her head and, taking aim, fired a powerful orange blast towards the cloud of dust hanging beneath her.

"Masenko-HAAAA!" A sonic boom rang out when her attack rocketed towards the desert and struck it, exploding with the force of a compressed nuclear warhead. The dome shaped blast engulfed an entire area of five hundred meters in all directions, punching a sizable hole in the ground at the same time.

Videl thought she was successful and grinned in celebration of that belief. But that smile soon faded when the smoke settled and she saw her target standing perfectly unscathed in the heart of the crater.

Smoke curling around her body, Tana smirked at her enemy. "What was that supposed to be?"

"Uhh…" Videl didn't know what to say at first. A few seconds later of staring down at her still perfectly alive target, the girl's shoulders slumped. "Shit. I got nothin'."

A scoff came from the Ibizan hound. "That's what I thought." Banter completed, the dog woman then launched herself from the sand and rocketed up towards the girl at terrifying speed.

Reacting in alarm, the tomboy thrust her hand out and fired a couple of ki blasts down at the approaching woman, only to see them bounce off of her harmlessly. When the counterattack failed, Tana had a clear shot straight up at her human target and took a swing at her with her flaming baton.

Acting quickly, Videl dove out of the way at the last second, barely avoiding the dog's attack. The second she moved, the teen threw both hands up and fired a couple of ki blasts at her, the attacks exploding against her side and blinding her with smoke. As the tomboy continued her descent, the Ibizan hound chased after her, her baton pulled back and ready to strike again. But just before she could catch the desperate teen, a kick from a blind spot slammed across her cheek and sent the dog spinning through the air.

Caught by surprise at being unable to sense the attack, the dog woman looked up to see Android 18 charging right down at her. Beaten and bruised from an already grueling battle, the blonde woman shouted when she chucked a fist at the hound, only for her target to slip it and knee the cyborg in the stomach. The blow connected loudly, stopping the woman dead before an elbow in the back sent her plummeting to the desert floor.

Taking aim with her hand, Tana prepared to shoot the android out of the sky and finish her off. But just before she could do that, a loud humming sound alerted her to danger and prompted her to lean back, avoiding a golden disk that nearly sliced her arm off. Gritting her teeth, the woman looked in the direction it'd come from, only to get struck from behind when a glowing Super Saiyan Goten dove down from above and nailed her with a double kick behind her shoulder blades. The blow causing her to lurch forward, Tana spun around and attempted to backhand the boy, only for the speedy assailant to duck and leave her wide open for a body shot from Trunks.

Driving his fist in from below, the lavender haired child laid into the dog with a fierce onslaught of punches and kicks. However, after several dozen attacks landed, he soon realized that none of them were having any effect and, by the time he looked up to see the smug expression on his target's face, the boy was suddenly grabbed by the hair and kneed in the stomach. The blow knocking the air out of his lungs and muffling his yelp, he was then smacked in the side of the head and sent blasting into the sand dunes below.

"TRUNKS!" Goten shouted, coming around again to punch the woman across the face. But as soon as he let his punch fly, Tana caught his wrist and sent him into a spin.

Krillin, having attacked the woman earlier with a Destructo Disk, dashed in to try and save the young Saiyan from the toss. Unfortunately for the gutsy fighter, the moment he flew into range, he ended up getting blindsided when the woman used Goten as a battering ram and slammed the blonde child into the short man. The collision sent both warriors plummeting out of the sky to land painfully on the sand. When the dust settled from their respective crash landings, it showed Goten had been knocked out of Super Saiyan and Krillin with his entire upper body lodged in the ground, his legs sticking into the air in the most comical fashion.

Landing on the sand between the fallen bodies of her two latest victims, as well as Trunks lying several yards away, Tana looked around at the range of targets she could pick from. Having thoroughly enjoyed the thrashing she'd been dealing them thus far, the woman smirked and decided to go torment the spiky haired youngster that'd had a go at her sometime before.
Strolling over to where Goten was struggling to get up, the dog raised a foot and slammed it into the back of his head, drawing a yelp from the child and beginning to grind her heel into his skull. Grinning as she heard the muffled cries being emitted from his writhing body, the woman followed up on her plan to make the boy suffer and stomped him into the floor a couple of times for good measure.

"Gaaah… augh" Goten cried out, feeling the blows shake his skeleton as his mind began drifting in and out of consciousness.

Each hit drew a cry or a shout from the child; a chorus of agonized sounds that sent a chill of delight up the woman's back.

"Oh… this is going to feel great," Tana exclaimed, glancing across at Trunks to see the boy up and staring across at her in panic. When she saw the look in the lavender hybrid's eyes, the canine flashed him a devilish grin and gestured down to the one beneath her toes. "Watch closely now, because your friend is about to be put down like the miserable wretch that he is."

But then, just as Tana was about to commence with crushing the life out of the youngster, she was forced to spin around and elbow an approaching Videl in the face, catching the teenager in the midst of a sneak attack. The blow knocked the raven haired fighter back and sent her tumbling down a hill, a scoff of amusement leaving the dog's lips when she saw the dust settle.

"Please… don't interrupt me while I'm having my fun," the Ibizan stated as she then turned back to working on the child. When the sound of bones and muscles being compressed rang out, the minor deity chuckled menacingly. "Ha. This is like harpooning fish in a barrel." And here she was worried about not coming out of this thing alive.

This group of warriors were pathetic.

Stopping in a crumpled mess at the bottom of the ditch, the plucky crime fighter looked up from her place and spat furiously. "Y-You bitch… I'll show you!"

Another series of pained cries flowed freely from Goten's lips when his skull started to cave. With the enormous amount of power wielded by the dog woman, it was only a matter of time before his body gave in to the strain.

From his position, Trunks could see and hear every agonizing moment of his friend being pushed into the floor. As Videl, Krillin and Eighteen were trying desperately to get back to their feet from the blows they'd suffered; the rugged son of the Saiyan Prince was the first to return to an upright stance. However, due to the amount of damage he'd suffered and his insignificant power level in the face of such an overwhelming force, the only thing he could do was stare helplessly as his best friend and training partner was mashed into the ground.

Eyes shimmering with fear and despair, the lavender haired youngster gritted his teeth and clenched his fists tightly. When another round of cries from Goten echoed across the countryside, Trunks shut his eyes and growled in frustration, taking up a fistful of sand and slamming it into the floor repeatedly. "Damn it! Damn it! DAMN IT! I can't do anything! I can't! I'm so useless!" In all his life of training alongside his father and his teammates, he'd never felt as powerless and as worthless as he did right then and there. Hell, he was so broken and so beaten into the dirt that he was completely incapable of helping someone he cared about.

The thought of it was completely ridiculous. It was almost like a damn nightmare! Here he was, clawing at the ground while his best friend was just a few feet away and having the life squeezed out of him. With his dad occupied and the rest of their teammates in the exact same debacle as he was, unable to do anything to help, the situation was becoming dire.

And even though it probably wasn't true, Trunks believed that it was entirely his fault.

"It's because I'm not strong enough! I'm not strong enough to do anything!" the boy thought desperately, tears appearing in his eyes as another bloodcurdling cry from his best friend of many years filled the air. "I'm sorry dad, but... I can't... I just can't do it!"

Any second now Goten was going to die and even if they tried and attacked the woman now, there wasn't a single thing he could do! She was just too strong!

However, when another bone crunching sound followed by a scream from his best friend echoed across the skies, the lavender haired boy's eyes widened and, with a yell of his own, he forced himself upright.

"NO! I WON'T LET IT END THIS WAY!" His shout drawing the attention of Tana, the woman turned just in time to see the wounded boy covered in burns and cuts rise step forward and, with several deep breaths, threw his head back and balled his fists. In that very instant, his eyes became filled with anger and fury. "Do you hear me?! I WOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOON'T!" With a deafening cry of defiance, Trunks screamed at the top of his lungs when his white aura exploded around him and shook the entire field with the sound of an earthquake.

His cloak crackled with golden bolts of electricity as his energy skyrocketed, stunning Tana at its increase and drawing blinks of surprise from the grounded Krillin, Videl and Eighteen. Then, just moments into his staggering outburst, both the child's aura and his hair flashed gold, the latter of which spiked up and lifted into the air, literally defying gravity. At the exact moment his energy changed colors, a massive shockwave reverberated across the desert and smacked the Ibizan hound with a blast of wind and sand, causing her to raise an arm and cover her face.

"W-What in the world?" the woman choked out, looking across at the grey haired child in awe of his sudden transformation. "He can do that too?!

The range of power ups she'd witnessed today was unreal.

Unfortunately for her, Tana wasn't allowed time to dawn on this reality. With his golden energy burning like a furnace around him, the newly transformed Trunks exploded from his spot and charged straight at the woman. Another cry of rage filling the air, the child drilled the surprised canine across the face with a killer haymaker, which connected with a deafening crack. The blow threw her off of Goten, liberating him from her heel and sent her stumbling over the sand.

As soon as he caught her by surprise, the demi-Saiyan then dove in and began hammering away at her stomach with a vicious barrage of punches. The boy furiously pounded away at the woman's midsection, the sound of machinegun fire filling the air while the dog woman grunted and coughed repeatedly under the string of hits. The assault carried on for a solid ten seconds.

Then, as soon as he was satisfied, Trunks nailed the woman in the chin with an uppercut before slamming a kick into her side, sending her blasting across the ground and tumbling towards another part of the valley.

"YOU WANT MORE?!” Powering up and blasting into the air as soon as the woman stopped rolling, the child cupped his hands at his side and, with another cry of effort, threw them forward and unleashed a golden blast down at his target. His Buster Cannon attack arced down and struck the dog woman squarely in the chest, engulfing her in a massive dome shaped explosion that burrowed into the earth's surface and sent sand pelting in all directions.

When the ground stopped shaking and the fire settled soon afterwards, the stunned Z-fighters observing the battle from across the plains watched as the smoke slowly started to clear. Maintaining his position in the sky, still wrapped in the golden glow of his transformation, Trunks panted to catch his breath following his wicked attack. From the way he completely cut loose on his foe, he had every reason to believe that he'd probably done some serious damage to her.

However, when the smoke that was the aftermath of his blast blew away, the child gawked in shock when he saw his target standing in the center of the crater, covered in dirt and glaring up at him with a ticked off look in her eyes.

Expression twisted irritably, Tana spat to the side. "I actually felt that, you little shit." Clearly having not expected the child to pack such a wallop, the woman had let her guard down for only a second, giving him the opportunity to hit her.

Well, now that she knew exactly what she was dealing with, the minor deity opted not to do that again.

After dusting herself down from the beating and focusing her ire on the one that'd knocked her into the hole, Tana then vanished in a blur of movement and shot straight up at her Super Saiyan adversary. Her speed shocking the winded Trunks, the hybrid was unable to guard in time when the canine warrior buried a fist into his stomach and grabbed him by the throat, knocking his aura out. As soon as she had her clawed fingers wrapped firmly around his windpipe, she then proceeded to apply pressure, drawing a strangled cry from the newly transformed youngster.

Krillin, looking up in alarm, stumbled forward, "Trunks! No! Ugh!" He then collapsed to his knee when his leg unexpectedly gave out. Gripping his shoulder tightly to ease the damage dealt there from his collision with Goten, the wounded man then glared up with an expression twisted in pain. "Damn it! My wing is clipped and Eighteen is grounded! What the hell are we going to do now?!"

They had to act fast otherwise the gutsy young prince was done for!

Chuckling when she heard the strangled gasps and cries coming from her young opponent, Tana held the boy out further and applied even more pressure. When another yell threatened to escape his throat, the woman silenced him with a quick shake of her arm. "How do you like that?! Huh? Not so tough now are yah, you little spit fuck?!" Her expression darkening, the muscles in her arm tensed as she proceeded to close the curtain.

Even with two Super Saiyans on their team, the group she was fighting was poultry compared to the people her companions were fighting. As far as she was concerned, this battle was a walk in the park for her. There was nothing these cretins could throw at her that could harm her in any way.

Drawing her baton from her belt line with her free arm, Tana quickly ignited it and drew it back. A malicious grin formed across her snout as she took aim at the child in her grasp, "Well, kid. It's been fun. Time for you to die." She then thrust forward with a yell…

Only to stop suddenly when a flash of pink light passed through her in the form of a drill-shaped beam from below.

Eyes widening in horror as her pupils went blank, the female warrior choked up blood and released the young Super Saiyan from her grasp. Dropping her baton at the same time, the woman quickly slapped her hands over the gaping hole that'd been punched through her stomach and reeled forward in shock. Mouth open and emitting a cry of shock, the woman dropped down from the sky and landed clumsily several yards from where Trunks had hit the sand.

While the boy quickly picked himself up and gasped for air, Tana stumbled down the hill, blood dribbling from her mouth as she glared up at her opponents.

"W-Who the hell did that?!"

Everyone's eyes quickly snapped in the direction the shot had come from. When Krillin and Eighteen tracked the source to the bottom of the dune, they saw Videl standing there with her two fingers pointed upwards and a sly grin on her face.

The realization that the attack originated from her drew a series of shocked blinks from everyone who was present. It wasn't just because it was the teenager that'd landed the crippling blow, but the fact that it was a Special Beam Cannon made the moment that much more bewildering.

A chuckle quickly left the tomboy's lips as she allowed her arm to drop and, while Trunks and Goten slowly picked themselves off of the ground, she jabbed a finger in the stunned Tana's direction. "Surprise."

Krillin was staggered. "Videl? W-When did you…?"

"Piccolo and Gohan taught me that move a few weeks ago," the girl explained, wiping a thumb under her nose triumphantly. "Took me a while, but I finally managed to get it."

The revelation put a smile on the bruised Eighteen's face, "I see. Bravo."

The teen grinned at the praise. But her moment of victory was short lived when, following a spine chilling cry of rage, the girl looked ahead to see Tana charging at her across the dunes at blinding speed. Completely ignoring the grievous wound in her stomach, the dog woman bellowed at the top of her lungs as she dashed towards the tomboy like a rhino, with her talons bared and a manic look in her eye. Before Videl could effectively respond, the minor deity was already on top of her and driving a kick into her guard.

A shockwave rang out as Videl was sent spiraling into the sky, with a furious Tana in hot pursuit. "I'll kill you! I'll kill you!" the dog barked loudly, drawing her last baton and igniting it as she rocketed towards the stunned girl. "Burn in hell, you fucking insect!"

Looking down in shock, the raven haired teen crossed her arms over her face to once again protect herself from the blow to come. But just as the Ibizan female was swinging down at her, she was suddenly struck from the side by a Super Saiyan Goten and a Super Saiyan Trunks charging in and burying two kicks into her cheek. The blow echoing across the countryside, they effectively sent the woman plummeting to the ground to crash painfully into a sand dune a full kilometer away.

Upon effectively burying the woman, the two kids and Videl landed back onto solid ground, where they were shortly joined by Eighteen and Krillin. Though all of them were sporting a wide array of bruises and were aching all over, the five warriors rallied together and faced the crash site over the hills with a renewed sense of vigor and determination. Seeing the cloud of dust begin to part in the distance, the group then braced themselves when they saw a silhouette rise from the crater and, cutting her way through the veil, a bleeding and wounded Tana staggered into the sunlight.

Her fangs bared in a show of rage, a snarl soon left the woman's lips as she powered up and fixed her crosshairs upon her targets. Blue fire exploding off of her body, Tana let out a very wolfish howl before darting towards them at comet speed.
"Let's finish her off!" Krillin shouted.

"Yeah!" Goten agreed, his golden aura blasting off of him while Trunks powered up as well.

Following each other's lead, the five took off from the hill and rocketed across the valley, meeting the infuriated Tana halfway and greeting her with a simultaneous attack. The moment the two parties collided, a massive shockwave blasted outwards, sending a wall of sand in all directions before a series of miniature shockwaves began to fill the air. At the center of the cataclysm, the five Z-fighters could be seen unleashing an onslaught of attacks upon their wounded opponent, who yelled out with every blow she intercepted with her own.

The group's fists intercepted Tana's repeatedly. Their yells filled the air, accompanying the chorus of deafening gunfire from their continuously overlapping blows. Over the next few seconds, the two parties were locked in stalemate, attempting to land a decisive hit on the other team. It seemed like Krillin and his allies had the powerful dog on the ropes. But when the woman jabbed out with her flaming baton and knocked Trunks away, it became glaringly obvious the fight wasn't over yet.

With a roar of effort, the canine warrior slammed a kick into Videl's side and sent her blasting across the dunes. She then attempted to finish her with a blast, but Goten suddenly jumped up from below with a knee to her face, followed by Krillin leaping back a distance and pitching a Destructo Disk towards the stunned woman.

Gassing, Tana slipped to the side, avoiding the golden disk that arced around from behind the demi-Saiyan and threatened to cut her in half. When she watched it soar off after barely grazing her shoulder, she grinned, "Ha! Missed!" Her expression then became one of surprise when a second disk came from Goten's other side and sliced her right arm clean off.

When her limb went flying, the dog woman looked at her stump of a limb in disbelief while a triumphant Android Eighteen landed beside her husband.

"Good one, honey!" Krillin exclaimed.

Gawking at the loss of her arm and the bolt of pain that shot through her as a result, the Ibizan hybrid growled and, her eyes snapping towards the group scattered in front of her, allowed her energy to skyrocket. Blue flames exploded from Tana's shoulders when she reeled her head back and, with a bellow of rage, unleashed a crushing blast of wind towards the trio. Her attack easily knocked a shocked Goten flying, while also sending Krillin and Eighteen bouncing across the sand. Under the raging gale, sand and debris flew in all directions, tearing across the desert for well over fifty kilometers until it settled down moments later.

By the time the wind had stopped, not only had the five Z-fighters been knocked onto their asses, but the ocean of dunes had shifted dramatically from the point the cyclone had hit.

Goten, being the closest to the center, struggled onto his hands and looked up through a pained expression. When his vision cleared, he gasped fearfully when he saw Tana standing directly in front of him.

With the wound in her chest and her stump of an arm still dripping with blood, plus even more coming out of her mouth, from the way the woman grinned manically down at the child with veins in her eyes, she looked like the most terrifying dog the demi-Saiyan had ever seen. Gulping nervously, the blonde hybrid backpedaled, only to see the canine lift her baton and point it down at him.

"Enough of these stupid games. You first," Tana stated, an evil laugh leaving her blood soaked mouth as she loaded her weapon for a lunge. "Die!"

But just before she could launch her attack, a hand suddenly shot out from behind and grabbed the back of her head, drawing a gasp of shock from the woman. The fingers clamping down on her skull like a vice, a stunned Tana then found her face forcefully turned around by the ridiculously strong figure. Her body following the rotation, the hybrid soon found herself staring into the face of a tall green demon.

The sight of the white haired, horned stranger caused the noticeably shorter dog alien to shudder in horror.

As her eyes stared into the wide, intimidating ones of the creature holding her by the head, the wounded Tana choked, "Who…Who are you?!"

Goten, spotting the green figure wearing the black halter top, blue obi and black pants standing behind the minion, had to take a couple of moments before he eventually recognized them. A wash of delight spreading over his face, the young Super Saiyan crawled forward and addressed the newcomer, "Paprika! You came!"

Assumed in her Super Makyan form, the scarf-wearing, self-proclaimed rival of Son Gohan spared her friend from the mountains a momentary smile before turning her death stare back towards her quarry.

Mouth agape in shock, Tana quickly regained her sense of self-preservation and, cranking back her baton, attempted to drive it into the woman's stomach. But the stranger effortlessly caught her wrist and, with a quick twist, broke the dog's hand and disarmed her, drawing a cry of agony from the wounded minion as she was woman-handled by the demon.

Krillin, Videl, Eighteen and Trunks, all of whom were now back on their feet, were looking on in relief as their powerful ally from Mount Paozu made short work of her opponent's weapon.

Upon releasing the canine's arm, Paprika smirked. "Allow me to take this moment to congratulate you for making it this far. Judging from how sloppy your fighting skills are, I'm surprised you were able to give my friends as much trouble as you did. Good job, worm. But now that you're on your last legs, I guess it's time I stepped in and finished things up for them."

Panting heavily, the now nervous looking Tana stared back at the demon fearfully, "W-What are you… where the hell did you come from?" It was then she was silenced when a more menacing expression came over the Makyan's face and an overwhelming sensation of killing intent came crushing down on top of her.

A shadow appearing over her eyes, Paprika got her face close enough to the dog woman to show her the anger she had burning inside. "If you thought that you could come to my planet, blast the hell out of my homeland, and torture and murder my best friend, then you're sadly mistaken. Nobody harms Goten and gets away with it." She then promptly lifted her other hand and grabbed the woman by the face, muzzling her snout. Upon which she glanced across at the child kneeling on the ground behind the canine. "Close your eyes, runt."

Nodding in understanding, Goten did just that, sticking his fingers in his ears for good measure.

"Damn you… damn you!" Tana practically yelled, her curses stifled by the woman's palm when the Makyan looked back at her. "I'll kill you!"

Paprika then gave the fiend one last look, her red eyes filling the dog with a sense of terror and dread. "You can apologize for your sins in the afterlife."

Then, without warning or hesitation, bolts of green lightning began streaming into the canine woman's head. Eyes bugging out of their sockets, Tana let out a scream of agony as her brain was literally cooked from the inside out, currents of electricity running up and down her body. Several seconds of twitching and jerking later, the dog's head exploded, blood gushing down as Paprika carelessly tossed the corpse away, allowing it to roll to a stop at the bottom of the hill. Upon wiping her hand off, the Super Makyan then turned back to Goten and smiled.

"You can open your eyes now."

"What?!” the blonde hybrid shouted, unable to hear anything due to his fingers in his ears.

Rolling her pupils, Paprika walked forward and gently moved the boy's arms back down, drawing his gaze up to her. When she knelt in front of him, the demi-Saiyan grinned and giggled, giving his friend from the mountains a hug. By the time the two broke away, Krillin, Videl, Eighteen and Trunks had limped over to them, the former of whom took a moment to look down the hill and at the body of their former adversary.

A gulp quickly followed his inspection. "Well… that was unnecessarily brutal."

"Speak for yourself," Eighteen spoke, arms folded as she too spared their deceased opponent a glance. "I think it was entirely appropriate… given how badly she was beating us."

The short fighter then shrugged, "Meh. Fair enough." He then looked across at Paprika and smiled gratefully in her direction. "Thanks so much for the save. You really pulled our butts out of the fire there."

"Yeah. Thanks a lot, Paprika," the still Super Saiyan Trunks chirped as he too beamed brightly at his friend's playmate.

They'd all been so caught up in trying to beat their enemy that neither one of them had noticed the Makyan's arrival. It was a good thing that she jumped in when she did because if she hadn't interfered in that last second, then something nasty would've happened to the youngest member of their troop.

A nod quickly followed the group's praise and thanks. "You're welcome." Hands on her hips, Paprika slowly directed her gaze across the desert to where the other members of the team were fighting.

As she did so, Krillin then sensed a second figure step up behind him and turned to see Videl right on his three o'clock, looking at the man with desperation in her eyes. The sight of the teen had the former monk blink in surprise, "Oh. Hey Videl. What's up?"

"Do you have any Senzu Beans left?" the tomboy asked, giving the man a hopeful once over.

Realizing instantly what the girl intended to do, Krillin quickly fished for his trusted bag and, after digging around for a bit, pulled out a couple and handed them to her. "These are for Gohan, yeah?" When he saw her acknowledge the question with a nod, the man too gestured in understanding. "Be careful. That Set woman might still be there."

"I will. Thank you." Giving her friend a warm smile, Videl quickly took off, powering up and rocketing towards the pyramids in the distance.

Upon seeing the raven haired girl leave, the Z-warriors quickly turned to each other and took in their current conditions. It was while she was watching the group take stock of their injuries that Paprika then glanced across at Eighteen. Figuring she would be the most well-informed and mature of the lot, the white haired teen nodded towards the cyborg curiously.

"So… want to fill me in on what the heck's going on?"

XXX

(Meanwhile)

On the other side of the pyramids where Piccolo and Kasim's battle was taking place, things had taken an interesting turn.

Both covered in a series of bruises and burns, the pair clashed across the dunes at an alarming speed, tearing it up as they streaked from one part of the desert to the next. The duo engaged in a running match from hill to hill, kicking up dust and punching holes in the sand every time they landed a big hit. After several minutes though, one of them eventually grew tired of the exchange and attempted to end it once and for all.

Bleeding heavily from a scar across his forehead, the Akita warrior drew his spear from his back and, as soon as it snapped open, thrust it out at his Namekian foe with blinding speed. Piccolo saw the blow coming in wide and leapt over it, flipping over his opponent and slamming a kick into his back. The hit sent Kasim flying forward, where he then slammed into the floor and dug a trench across the valley.

As soon as his foe had been knocked down and he'd landed, Piccolo held his hand forward and gripped his wrist. His aura bursting up around him in a violently pulsating cloak, the man focused his energy into an orange ball in front of his palm and, after taking aim, unleashed it all in a single blast. "Djii Kah!" The energy rocketed from his palm and shot towards the downed warrior like a comet.

After pushing himself into a sitting position, Kasim only had enough time to gawk in shock before the spear end of the attack struck him in the chest. The explosion that followed dug an enormous trench in the ground and filled the air with thick black smoke.

The Namek fighter panted from the effort, his aura fading moments later. But just as he was beginning to relax, his eyes widened when he saw the silhouette of his foe emerge from the crater. Spear held up defensively, a completely wrecked and burnt Kasim chuckled as he glared back at his surprised foe.

Ignoring the patches of fur on his body that'd been burnt away, the canine fighter spoke, "Not bad. That wasn't bad at all." The hybrid then thrust his spear into the ground and took a moment to dust his fur off. Upon which he then assumed a new stance and, after rearing his head back, began to focus his energy in his chest. "My turn now." Then, as he was staring down his crosshairs towards his opponent, the Akita leaned forward and opened his mouth. "Ryu Iki!" With a deafening roar, a powerful golden beam of fire rocketed out of the man's throat and ran down his target like a freight train.

The blast engulfing Piccolo for several moments, a massive explosion soon followed that left a colossal five hundred foot wide trench across the wasteland. When the smoke from the blast eventually settled, it revealed Kasim standing at the point where the trench began and his Namekian foe lying in the middle of the ditch with his entire left side blown to hell.

Missing an arm and bleeding from the grievous open wound, the man was left completely crippled and defenseless.

Taking advantage of the opportunity, Kasim, grabbing up the weapon he'd impaled in the ground, strolled into the canyon he'd created and stopped beside his foe. Reaching down, he then casually grabbed the wounded warrior's still intact arm and lifted him off of the floor. The dog warrior chuckled the moment he had the Namekian dangling before him. "No resistance at all. You're no different from the humans the four of us slaughtered twenty thousand years ago," the Akita gloated. Taking up his weapon, he then prepared to put it through the Z-fighter's skull.

But just when it seemed like it was all over, Piccolo's head suddenly snapped up and, eyes widening, fired two golden beams that shot straight through Kasim's chest. Exiting the spear wielder's body with a loud 'squelching' sound, the dog fighter quickly dropped the Namekian and stumbled backwards, choking up blood as he gripped one of the two entry wounds on his chest.

"Oooh..." the minion groaned, legs shaking as he then fell flat onto his tail.

At the exact same time, Piccolo, rising to his feet, grinned at his stricken foe. "You fell for it." His expression turning serious, the Namekian concentrated for several seconds before, with a yell of effort, his damaged side regenerated and an entirely new arm jutted out of the stump. Blood splattering across the ground, the green warrior then used that moment to remove his ruined top and, after stepping towards his downed adversary, threw him a glare. "Let this be a lesson to you."

Coughing up more blood from having his lungs punctured, the wounded and considerably weakened Kasim looked up through a pained expression and slowly gave the man a smile. "Okay... okay... I know we said some things... but I know if we just talked to each other a little... the two of us can become friends." The Akita offered the Namekian a bloody grin and raised his hand towards him in a gesture of good faith. "What do you say? High five?"

Staring at the man for a couple of seconds, Piccolo then lifted his right hand towards him in a laidback manner. "Down low."

"Uh..." The Akita then blinked when that same hand was pointed squarely at his face.

"Too slow."

A thunderclap followed by a flash of light filled the air when an orange blast exploded from Piccolo's palm and disintegrated the dog's head, taking him out in spectacular fashion.

XXX

Across the way, not too far from where the Namekian was finishing off his opponent, Vegeta and Daryu were locked in a terrifying exchange of blows. Shockwaves ringing out as the Ascended Saiyan battled against his hulking adversary, the prince hammered away at the man with a series of killer hits to the chest and head. After successfully blocking a wild hook, the flame haired warrior dove in and delivered a barrage of straights to the dog's face, battering him relentlessly and drawing a series of pained grunts from the Pharaoh hound.

But just when the prince was in the process of beating the canine warrior down, the large fighter suddenly drew his axe from his back and swung down at the golden warrior. His weapon slashed right across the Z-fighter's chest, eliciting a cry of agony from Vegeta when the blade cut into him and sent blood splattering across the ground.

Stumbling away, the Saiyan Prince placed a hand over his chest and looked down to inspect the damage.
When he saw that it was only a flesh wound, the warrior gritted his teeth and shot a glare up at his foe. Just as he was preparing for another attack, Daryu suddenly shot forward and delivered an unforgiving kick across his face, sending him barreling into a sand hill a full kilometer away. In the blink of an eye, the super powered Saiyan slammed into the dune, sending dust and sand blasting into the sky from the force of his impact. The crash landing also knocked the man's aura out, leaving him winded and dazed.

After successfully striking down his enemy, the bruised and battered Daryu chuckled darkly and spun his weapon in front of him.

"ENOUGH!" Recovering quickly, Vegeta leapt out of the hole he'd formed and, with a mighty roar, his golden aura and electric bio field exploded around him. "RAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAGH!!" Maxing out, the prince blasted towards his opponent, who responded to the man's charge and sprinted across the sands to meet his enemy in the middle. While one drew back his fist and the other loaded his weapon arm, the stage was all set for one final, decisive blow.

Both fighters baring their teeth in rage, two simultaneous screams echoed across the countryside when the pair finally crossed paths. A deafening thunderclap and a flash of light soon filled the air when the two powerful fighters passed each other, with Daryu skidding to a stop and Vegeta's aura dissipating the moment his attack landed.

All of a sudden, the prince stumbled forward and fell flat onto his face, his hair turning black when his Super Saiyan 2 form faded. Groaning in agony, Vegeta pushed himself out of the sand and turned around, expecting to see his foe in a similar state of pain after their lightning fast exchange.

And wouldn't you know it… Daryu was on his feet…

But not in the condition the dog was hoping for.

As it turns out, the prince's attack was much more damaging than the canine initially expected. Standing there with his axe held out, the Pharaoh hound had a stunned look on his face and blood dribbling out of the man-sized hole in his torso. Not only had Vegeta managed to go straight through him and take a massive chunk out of his side in the process, but he'd also taken out several organs at the same time.

After standing there frozen for several tense seconds, the shocked and wounded Daryu finally threw in the towel. His weapon dropping, the badly damaged man collapsed to his knees before falling flat onto his face, his blood slowly beginning to pool around him.

Sensing the warrior's ki vanish, the winded Vegeta allowed a smug smile to cross his lips as he slowly rose to his feet and, massaging his shoulder, turned his back on his enemy. "Bad dog." He then honored his opponent's valiant struggle by taking to the air and leaving his corpse to rot under the sun.

XXX

With Vegeta and Piccolo walking away victorious from their battles, that just left one last fight to mop up.

A dune exploding when a body was sent blasting through it, the battered form of Shiera slid to a stop at the bottom of the rise with blood dripping out of her mouth and her form smoldering from several newly made burns. When the wounded canine looked up from where she was lying, she saw her opponent land atop the hill of sand she'd destroyed and stare down at her with a glare.
Looking just as badly beaten with blood running from the corner of her lips and nose, the red haired woman then spat to the side to clear her mouth before leering at her fallen adversary. "Not so tough without your three back-up dancers are you, poochie?"

Snarling angrily, the scar-faced collie quickly leapt to her feet and drew her sword, which she quickly ignited. "Shut up, you stupid pixie! Do you think I'm scared of you?!" She then pointed in her direction. "It'll take more than a few lucky shots to get the best of me! I am a Minion of Set!"

Raising an eyebrow at the woman's retort, the Super Hera shrugged. "Fair enough. How about I grab a couple of friends and try to murder you instead? Would that work?"

Lowering her arm, Shiera then took a moment to think about that. "Well, personally, I think that would be a little bit uncalled for-"

Before the woman had time to finish her little mumble, Zangya suddenly darted forward and slammed a hook across her face. The blow sent the woman bouncing across the sand dunes for a good couple of miles. When she eventually crash landed somewhere over the horizon the Hera that had sent her in that direction returned to a normal standing position and grunted.

"You're right, because unlike you… I don't need help."

It was a valid statement. But just as the Super Hera was getting comfortable with the idea that she'd knocked her opponent out, the hill where Shiera had landed in the distance suddenly exploded and the canine warrior came rocketing towards her with an enraged look on her face. With a loud battle cry, the collie cocked back her sword arm and prepared to slice into her enemy the moment she came within range. She was making good ground too.

As soon as the Minion of Set was close to entering striking distance, Zangya then did something completely unexpected and threw her hands forward. A barrage of multicolored flashes filled the air when a series of wires shot towards the collie, wrapping around her and catching her in a deadly web of energy absorbing strings. The anthropomorphic dog was effectively halted in midflight and jerked into an upright position, her arms snapped to her sides and a look of bewilderment filling her face as the barrier was fully unleashed.

Body trembling when the countless wires tightened around her form, Shiera growled angrily as she stared down at her opponent, who was also glaring up at her with an intense look on her face.

"Y-You… damn… bitch!" Shiera barked, attempting to wriggle her way out of her invisible prison, only to fail miserably.

Smirking at the curse, the Hera nodded back at her opponent. "Takes one to know one." Then, with a loud yell, the woman crossed her arms and tightened the wires.

In a series of lightning fast flashes, the red haired warrior sliced the canine fighter to pieces, the energy binds cutting through her like butter and scattering her remains across the sand. As soon as the dog's form cascaded to the ground, her ki signature vanished as well, allowing Zangya to retract her wires and relax.

Powering down, the Hera collapsed to her knees, shut her eyes and leaned back, panting heavily from the battle. It'd been a long and torturous engagement, but after suffering the full brunt of the surprisingly tough collie's attacks, she managed to come out on top. This being one of her first decisive victories she could remember, the alien Z-fighter then allowed a chuckle to leave her lips before she started laughing outright.
Body shaking from her fit, the woman shook her head at the irony of the situation before turning her attention to the pyramids in the distance. "Ah, man. I'm definitely going to feel this one in the morning." Musing at the fact that she was now hours late for work, Zangya instead decided to focus on more important matters and, after staggering to her feet, took flight towards the place where this whole thing started.

As far as she knew, despite her gruesome win, the battle wasn't over yet…

XXX

(Minutes Later)

It was quiet and peaceful over at the large pyramid where the God of Storms had been awakened. Since all of the battles had taken place a safe distance away from the manmade landmark, this meant that the terrace where the deity's throne and the unconscious Gohan were both lying had remained completely untouched. With the absence of the boss herself and any other obstacle that threatened to stand in the way of the Z-fighters, this left the entire area empty and unguarded, which was ideal for the poor demi-Saiyan who was sadly still recovering in the middle of the sealing circle.

Not counting the door to the prison hanging wide open and spewing purple energy from its catacombs, there wasn't a single thing out of place about the whole situation.

In spite of being wrapped in the translucent energy running out of the gateway for the past couple hours, Gohan hadn't even so much as flinched as he continued to lie there as still as a statue. It was only when a familiar shadow fell over him that his peaceful slumber soon came to an end.

Dropping down from the sky with Senzu beans in hand, Videl rushed over to where her crush was lying and immediately got down to her knees directly beside him. Wasting no time in checking his vitals, the girl promptly pulled the boy into her lap, waved the purple energy off of him, and slipped one of the miracle seeds into his mouth.

"Come on, Gohan. Eat," the girl whispered, praying to the Kais that he could hear her. After the ordeal he'd had to go through, she wouldn't be surprised if he didn't respond.

Sure enough though, the demi-Saiyan lying in her arms gradually began to chew on the bean in his mouth. After crushing it into a comfortable paste, he quickly swallowed it, allowing its effects to take hold of him.

Videl waited with baited breath for the male to respond, teeth bared and eyes shimmering with anticipation. Eventually, after a full minute of silence had ticked by, she saw her friend's eyes flicker open and his chest heave with a gasp. The sight putting a smile on the crime fighter's face, the raven haired crime fighter then watched as Gohan groaned and, after looking around the area for a moment, turned to the person leaning over his body.

When his vision soon cleared, the demi-Saiyan was blessed with the most wonderful sight in the world. "V-Videl?"

Eyes shimmering gleefully, the girl nodded, "I'm here." She then rested a hand against his cheek, rubbing it gently as the teenager was roused from his slumber.

At first confused by the angel gazing down at him, Gohan's eyes then flew open when he finally realized exactly who was holding him and sat up. Glancing around wildly a couple of times, his gaze then turned to his body, instinctively checking to make sure everything was in the right place.
When all he saw were a couple of tears in his gi, he then focused his attention on Videl, who was kneeling patiently on the floor next him.

"Whoa. W-What happened?" Gohan asked, having been completely out of it for Kami knows how long.

The tomboy giggled at the cute, innocent look the young adult was giving her, a sight she often saw whenever her best friend was either flustered or lost. "You were kidnapped and knocked unconscious. Did you have a nice sleep?" the teen asked curiously, throwing her companion a sly smile.

It was then Gohan noticed the state his friend was in and immediately turned to her in alarm. "Oh my God. Videl, are you okay?" Taking note of her various cuts and bruises, and the fact that her clothes were all ruined, the teen reached out to her in concern. "You're... you're bleeding all over..."

"Yeah," the girl exclaimed, taking a glance at her body's condition before throwing the young man a smile. "We had a pretty rough time fighting those minions while you were lying here unconscious. The one me, Krillin, Eighteen, Goten and Trunks were stuck with was tough as hell. But Paprika showed up and bailed us out at the last minute."

Blinking a few times as he listened to what his friend had to say, Gohan took a deep breath and nodded his head in understanding. "I... I see." Swallowing nervously, the teen then smiled and shuffled closer to his comrade, fixing a warm smile upon her scuffed face. His proximity caused the crime fighter to lean back ever so slightly. "I'm glad you're alright. Thank you, Videl."

Her mouth clamping shut in response to the boy's show of gratitude, the raven haired girl quickly averted her gaze and blushed. Rubbing her cheek discreetly, she then whispered her reply, "Y-You're welcome." Tentatively glancing in the grinning teen's direction a couple of times, the tomboy then playfully pushed him in the chest. "You big lug."

Still smiling like an idiot, Gohan then looked across the terrace when he sensed the other Z-fighters arrive. Watching as Zangya, Vegeta, Piccolo, Paprika and the rest of the team landed in the courtyard from their respective battle zones, he then saw the battle worn fighters gather together and approach the sealing circle. Their presence prompting Videl to edge away from her crush, the demi-Saiyan then looked on as Piccolo and Zangya came up to him, and greeted their ally with their respective smiles.

"Hey, kid," the shirtless Namekian spoke.

"How are you feeling?" the Hera asked, completely ignoring her own injuries as she watched the boy slowly rise to his feet. A mischievous grin formed on her face, "Sore? Surprised? Dizzy? All of the above?" She then raised a hand and pointed at her palm as if it were holding something, "Show me on this doll where the assholes touched you."

"Hey, Zangya," Gohan chuckled, "I'm glad to see that you're okay." After helping Videl up and ignoring his teammate's little joke, the spiky haired fighter quickly adjusted his gi and grinned back at his blue skinned sparring partner. "Well... heh... out of all the places I've regained consciousness over the years; this is probably the most interesting place yet." He then pointed out the pyramids surrounding him with a quick look-about, thumbing over at the necropolis to his right. "I've always wanted to visit Ancient Egret."

Zangya rolled her eyes and walked over to him, "Well, congratulations. You just won a free trip to a pile of rocks and sand." She then stopped right in front of him, gazing up at the teen as he grinned down at her. Looking him over, she then took a moment to brush some granite off of his shoulder and adjust his gi. "Considering the hell we had to go through against those four dirt bags, you're looking surprisingly cleaned up. Guess you're a lot tougher than you look, stud."

Smiling at the woman, Gohan then noticed the state of dress the bruised up Hera was in and balked. Cheeks reddening at the sight of her lingerie, the boy looked away with a gulp, "Uh… thanks." His sudden reaction confused Zangya and drew an irate look from Videl.

Eye twitching as she glared at the Hera for the blush she put on her man's face, the raven haired girl then shot a look at the powerful alien and snapped aggressively, "Damn it, would you put some clothes on already?" Though the underwear was of an extremely high quality, the half naked woman was acting surprisingly calm in front of them. "Seriously, Zangya…"

Blinking at the teenagers in confusion, the Hera then looked down at herself to examine the problem. "Why? I'm comfortable the way I am."

"Yeah. But we're not," Piccolo cut in, holding his hand towards their shameless teammate and shooting an electric beam at her. The stream of energy wrapping around the Hera in an instant, a flash of light then enveloped the group before fading moments later, revealing Zangya standing in her usual training gi. "There. That's much better."

Checking herself out, the Hera smiled and adjusted her white tube-top and buckles, "I'll never get tired of that technique." Upon admiring her newly created colors, the still bruised and burnt fighter then threw the green warrior a grateful smile, which he returned with a grunt before looking away with his arms folded across his chest.

Hands on his hips, a present Krillin beamed at his best friend's son, "It's good to have you back, partner."

"Thanks, man. It's good to be back," Gohan nodded, before then looking down to see his Super Saiyan brother and his best friend jog up to him. The sight of the two transformed youngsters instantly put a grin on the older warrior's face as he reached over and ruffled his sibling's gravity defying hair. "Hey there, squirt."

"We came to rescue you, big brother!" Goten chirped, throwing himself at the teenager's torso and hugging him tightly. The adult demi-Saiyan laughed as he held the child up, giving him a playful spin through the air before gently setting him back to the floor.

After giving Trunks a pat on the head, acknowledging his transformation to Super Saiyan and drawing a grin from the boy as well, Gohan then looked over at the rest of the group to see how they were doing. His gaze passing over Vegeta and Android 18, both of whom were standing back and looking off in different directions, his eyes then fell upon Paprika to see her hiding behind Zangya. The sight of the demon woman drew a nod from the teen, which in turn had the Makyan huff and look away.

"Man. For a second there, I thought I was done for," the half-Saiyan said with a relieved look on his face. "Thanks for coming after me, guys."

"How are you doing though?" Piccolo asked, wanting to make sure his student wasn't suffering from any nasty drawbacks. "You were knocked out and left lying here for quite a while. Are you feeling alright?"

Looking down at his body a second time, Gohan quickly took stock of his energy levels and raised an eyebrow in surprise. "I'm feeling great, actually. I… actually feel a lot stronger than I was before." He supposed his Saiyan genetics had something to do with that. It was after looking himself over the boy then remembered why he was here in the first place and gazed back towards his teammates. "What happened to those minion guys? Did you take care of them?"

It was this question that had Paprika look at the demi-Saiyan in annoyance, "If by 'take care of them' you mean crushed them, then yes. That's exactly what we did." It was an accomplishment she felt was worth noting. After all, there was no way she was going to let some dumb, anthropomorphic dog get away with killing her arch nemesis. That was her job. "Frankly I was expecting a bigger challenge."

"Same here," Vegeta agreed, sharing a glance with the Makyan before looking away with a smirk. "Those guys were all talk and no action. It's a shame, really."

Gohan then turned his attention to Piccolo, "And mum. Is she alright?"

"She's fine, kid. Don't worry," the Namek replied, drawing a relived sigh from the teen. "Everyone's alive and well."

So far so good. With his bearings returning to him little by little, as well as his sense of awareness, Gohan could finally rest easy knowing that things were going to be alright. But just as he was beginning to stretch his aching muscles out and address the gathering with their next plan of action, Trunks then noticed something off about the area.

While the terrace remained mostly intact, save for the collapsed temple behind them, there was one other point of interest that needed to be acknowledged.

"Hey. What happened to that other dog woman?"

Their attention quickly being drawn to the fact that Set was no longer there, the majority of the Z-fighters immediately reacted in alarm. It was then their little moment of realization was promptly interrupted by the sound of someone's throat being cleared, which pulled all of their gazes across the courtyard and towards the temple. After seeing the stone throne sitting several meters away turn to dust, the group watched as the God of Storms herself emerged from behind the seat with a second figure hovering behind her.

Looking quickly at the battered and wounded teal-alien with white hair suspended in golden cuffs behind the anthropomorphic dog, the group quickly locked their glares back on the deity and hurriedly slid into fighting stances. The moment they did they heard the red furred woman click her tongue and, with her hands held behind her back in a relaxed manner, took a few steps forward and tilted her head at the battered Z-fighters in interest.

A smile formed across the canine's face. "I see that your group has managed to defeat all four of my subordinates... just as I expected. Well done." Tail wagging happily behind her, Set then stopped a safe distance from the team of hostile looking warriors and flashed them all a fond smile. "You truly are a group of unique and incredibly powerful individuals."

Beads of sweat forming on his brow as he looked the newcomer over, Gohan then spared a glance towards Krillin. "Hey. Who the heck is this girl? I don't remember seeing her around the other four guys back at Mount Paozu. Where did she come from?"

The short fighter, looking just as nervous as everybody else there, swallowed heavily. "That's the group's leader. Her name is Set; the God of Storms and apparently the same freaky dog thing you can see engraved on all of the walls around this place. The four guys you ran into wanted to use your energy to open the door to the pyramid behind us to bust her out. When they did, she wound up making all eight of us fight her goons in some sick gladiator matchup to determine who would become her new bodyguards." Krillin then nodded towards the person floating behind her. "I have no idea who that guy is though. He must have shown up while we were dealing with her personal hit squad."

And from the amount of bruises the guy had on him, it looked like he needed help... desperately.

Gritting his teeth, the spiky haired demi-Saiyan then looked back at the fox lady with the cool attitude and the bushy tail. "So she's some kind of deity, huh?"

"Not just any deity," the short fighter continued, answering Gohan's question with another piece of important information. "Vegeta says she's the most powerful being in the universe and that not even he would stand a chance against her. If you ask me, I think that's a little bit over the top."

That was Krillin's opinion anyway. But from where Gohan was standing, the teen was getting nothing but bad vibes from the fox woman in front of them. Even though he couldn't sense any energy coming from her whatsoever, the way she stood there shrouded by an air of confidence, poised with that smug smile pulled across her face, he could tell that this Set person meant serious business. If they weren't careful, then they were probably going to experience a lot of problems. And unlike the enemies they'd faced in the past like Kana and the Ginyu Force, the young warrior had a feeling these issues wouldn't be resolved so easily.

However, just before the boy could go about making any further inquiries, he suddenly saw the woman's eyes snap in his direction before she vanished in the blink of an eye. A split second later, Gohan jumped when he saw the vixen's face right in front of his and recoiled in shock. It was the same reaction his friends shared when they realized Set was now standing amongst them.

Even Paprika was blown away by how fast the goddess moved.

Freezing up when the deity stared intently at his face, the demi-Saiyan then watched as the deity began looking him over and running her finger over his jaw. After feeling her prod at his chest and lift his hand up, he then felt her run her thumb over his palm before leaning forward and sniffing him. Upon getting a whiff of the young male, the fox God moaned and pulled away, a delightful grin forming on her face.

"What a fascinating specimen. So you're the one whose energy was used to remove the seal that was placed upon my tomb?" she asked, drawing a few startled blinks from the boy as the woman's tail wagged behind her. Licking her lips, Set then leaned forward and gave him a very mischievous smile. "Yes. You'll do nicely."

"Uhh... what umm... what do you mean?" Gohan asked.

"Reaching up with her hand, the woman slowly tiptoed her fingers up his chest and towards his collar bone. "Over the next couple of days, I intend on taking over this universe to become the undisputed ruler and guardian of everything in existence. If you agree to become my personal servant, I will gladly grant you any and all wishes you so desire... so long as it is within my powers to grant." She then playfully wrapped her tail around his neck and pulled herself closer to the boy. It was this action that drew an irritated glare from Videl and had the crime fighter snarl under her breath. This reaction became all the more prominent when the goddess placed a hand on the boy's cheek and pulled his face close to hers so that her nose gently brushed against his. "As the one who liberated me from my retched prison, I'd be more than willing to give you anything you ask."

Unsettled by the closeness of the alluring goddess, Gohan gave a nervous laugh and held his hands up. "Umm... that's very kind of you to offer... but... I'm afraid I'm going to have to pass. Sorry."
As tempting as it was, the teen knew the good choices from the bad.

What this person was offering him after everything he'd seen and heard, any decision involving going over to this person's side was bad mojo.

Set pulled away and raised an eyebrow at the handsome Saiyan, "Oh? Are you sure?" She sounded disappointed.

"YES! He's sure!" Videl shouted, having now reached the point where her jealousy could no longer be contained. Stepping forward in defense of the half-Saiyan, she drew the deity's attention to her and jabbed a finger in her direction. "You've got your answer! Now buzz off, you hussy!"

Blinking a few times in surprise, the God of Storms giggled in amusement and slowly removed her tail from the teen's neck. Being sure to give him a playful flick in the chin as she pulled away, she then vanished in another teleportation-like movement and reappeared in front of the entire group once more. When all their eyes landed on her, they saw the red furred woman back away with her hands behind her back and a grin on her face.

"Since I've got an extremely busy week ahead of me, I want to get this trade over with as quickly as possible. So let's cut the useless chatter and get down to business," Set spoke, ears twitching as she raised her head to the Z-warriors. While Whis continued to hang behind her bound by bands of golden energy, his body beaten and bruised all over, the female deity addressed the group of heroes with a clear and direct tone of voice. "As I promised to all of you earlier, the four fighters who emerged victorious from the battle with my subordinates will be given the chance to come stand by my side as my new Minions of Set. After seeing how many of you managed to walk away from that skirmish, I find myself a little bit spoiled for choice." She then raised a finger in their direction. "And therein lies the problem."

Her words putting Paprika, Vegeta and the others on edge, the team of fighters then braced themselves for what the woman had to say next.

When Set suddenly held up four fingers with the hand she'd raised, a very dark shadow cast over her eyes as she slowly panned over the uneasy martial artists. "There can only be four Minions of Set. Like the four corners at the base of the pyramid, they are the points that help elevate the peak above the ground and give the structure its shape. They also represent the four quadrants of the universe and are the primary elements that create balance in this reality. So I'm going to make this nice and simple for you." Returning her hand to her back, she then nodded towards her audience. "You will all fight each other. The last four left standing will be allowed to stand at my side as my minions. Of course…" Her eyes landed on Gohan again, "I'm willing to make an exception for one of you in particular."

A cold chill going down each of their spines at her words, the members of the group didn't even have to think twice before giving the goddess her answer.

After all the trials and tribulations they had to go through over the years, after all the battles and enemies they'd fought together, there was only one thing they could say to this would-be ruler of their universe. It was the same thing they'd said to every other villain that'd made them an offer that would've been impossible to refuse.

"Thanks, but no thanks," Zangya spoke with a frown on her face.

"If you think you can come here to our planet, invade our homes, attack our friends, and tell us what to do, then you've got another thing coming," Piccolo said, his fists clenching tightly as his stance widened. "Don't underestimate us earthlings. We are a lot stronger than you so-called Gods Trunks, wearing a similar expression to his father, nodded towards the woman confidently, "Take a hike, lady!"

"Yeah! Buzz off!" Goten shouted as well, backing up his friends words.

Moved by the group’s words, Set’s tail wagged behind her eagerly, "I strongly urge you all to reconsider." Looking from one determined face to the next, she then raised a hand towards them. "This is the perfect opportunity for you and three of your companions to elevate yourselves above the mortal plains and become something other than the poultry warriors you are today. You will each be granted the titles of Godhood, a piece of creation to do with as you please, and the chance to engrave yourselves into the history of your people… to become truly immortal." Putting her hand behind her once again, the deity tilted her head. "Think about it. In order to make any of this possible, the only sacrifice that you are required to make is the lives of the people standing next to you. There's no need for attachments where you will be going. Once this universe has become mine to command, you can have as many servants and as many friends as you wish. All you have to do is eliminate the ones you have now and sever all remaining ties to this world."

Sickened by her words, Videl narrowed her eyes on the goddess. "Go fuck yourself."

"What she said," Vegeta also spoke, agreeing wholeheartedly with what the rest of the group had to say.

Raising an eyebrow at the teen's response, Set then turned to the others, "So… I'll take that as a no then?" When all she received were hard glares in return, the vixen waited for a few moments before a long sigh left her lips and the woman held her hands out in disbelief. "Hmm… what a shame. And here I thought your group had such promise." Cracking open an eye to look back across at the collection of fighters, the goddess then allowed a smile to cross her lips. "When I made this offer to the last group, they didn't waste any time in tearing themselves apart. But… I suppose if that is the choice you've decided to make, then I guess it's about time I showed you mortals how badly this decision is going to cost you."

"We'll see about that!" Gritting his teeth, Gohan clenched his fists tightly and, after bringing his arms above his head, let out a mighty yell as his golden aura exploded around him and his hair spiked up. His body also becoming shrouded in blue electricity as he leapt straight into Super Saiyan 2, the teen growled and fixed his best death glare upon his opponent. "If you want this universe Set, then you're going to have to go through us first!"

Bringing her hands behind her, the woman smirked as she felt the teen's power level jump up a couple of levels, "Is that a challenge?"

"You bet it is!" Gohan shouted back.

Grinning excitedly, the God of Storms allowed a chuckle to escape her lips and lowered her head, "Then I accept." Placing her hands behind her and widening her stance a little, the deity rolled her head once before focusing all of her attention on the warriors before her and their leader. "Since I'm in a good mood today, I'll be sure to have as much fun with you as I can. Come at me with everything you have… and don't hold anything back."

"Gladly!" Zangya also shouted, doing as her sparring partner did and powering up. Hair flashing red as her skin turned green, the Hera's aura jumped around her with the sound of a shockwave as she completed her own transformation.
Her vigor was matched by the likes of Vegeta, Paprika, Piccolo, Goten and Trunks. While the Saiyans jumped into their respective super powered forms, the prince going straight into his Ascended Saiyan state, the Namekian's blue aura sprang up around him and the Makyan's green one appeared as well. Videl and Krillin also followed suit, their white auras blasting up and shrouding them in a protective glow, while Android Eighteen merely set herself into a stance. Once all of them had achieved their maximums, they all assumed their signature fighting forms and prepared to tackle the monumental foe standing before them.

The group's collective transformations and power ups quickly caught the attention of the unconscious Whis, who looked up from his place in the air to stare across at the Z-fighters. Eyes widening when he saw who they were squaring off against, the beaten and broken attendant bit his teeth together and wheezed out the only words he could.

"No… don't…"

What they were intending to do was paramount to suicide.

But they couldn't hear him. All the team was currently focused on was defending their planet and fighting off this monstrous force that threatened to destroy them all.

Set, sensing all of them were ready for the battle of a lifetime, smiled, closed her eyes and, with her hands held firmly behind her waist, wagged her tail happily. "Come."

In the blink of an eye, the Z-fighters charged. With Gohan leading the way, the ten warriors sprinted across the terrace towards their foe at blinding speeds. Closing in on her from the front and being sure to space themselves out, in a matter of milliseconds the group converged on the arrogant deity and closed the distance between them. In bullet time you could see the demi-Saiyan leading the charge, and with Vegeta, Piccolo, Zangya and everybody else flanking him on either side, the most powerful fighters on the planet drew their respective fists back and opened up on their target with everything they had.

Using speeds far greater than any ordinary human could follow, the warriors' punches shot towards Set from all sides at the exact same time, ten attacks coming from ten different angles. For a brief moment it looked like their blows would land, as the deity had no room whatsoever to move. But against all odds, the moment their fists came within grazing distance of the goddess's face, they were all effectively avoided when the canine woman slipped between their fists and effortlessly evaded all of their opening hits. What instantly followed from there was an indistinguishable blur of fast moving figures as Gohan, Vegeta, Zangya, Paprika and everybody else unleashed an unrelenting and continuous assault upon their foe. At the same time, their ludicrously fast target head slipped and avoided every single one of them as she ran backwards along the terrace, her hands behind her back, her eyes closed and a smile on her face.

Shouts, yells and attacks cutting through the air echoed across the temple's courtyard as the dozen fighters engaged the fox deity from all sides. Due to the insane speeds they were moving at, the warriors' bodies took the form of invisible blurs dashing this way and that across the stone courtyard as Set maneuvered them in random ellipses of the terrace. It was thanks to this erratic and untraceable display of movement that prompted the Z-fighters to mix up their combinations and try to get the woman from a blind spot.

Instead of remaining in their siege formation surrounding the God of Storms, the ten fighters began mixing it up and switching places repeatedly, attempting to slip around and jump over each other to catch Set by surprise. It soon became a situation reminiscent of Goku and Piccolo's opening skirmish with Radditz, in which Set held the center ground while avoiding the courageous fighters as they sprinted circles around her. They even tried attacking her from above, jumping at her with
